The first Palestinian intifada followed directly on the heels of this non-violent success, and can be understood as an indirect consequence of the success experienced by peaceful campaigns throughout the region, as well as the rise at that historical moment of the non-violent motif in Islam. The civilian uprising known as the intifada was called to oppose Israeli occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, and later, on a larger, political level, for Palestinian self-determination. Despite popular representations to the contrary, the preponderance of activism during the first intifada, which began in December 1987, was deliberately non-violent. The greatest share of tactics employed was similar to those of previous successful movements: boycotts, strikes, rallies, tax refusals, and creation of parallel institutions. In addition to its political successes, not the least of which was the reclamation of authority over the West Bank from Jordan in 1988, the movement fundamentally reshaped the internal practices of the Palestinian struggle, perhaps its most significant accomplishment. For example, the intifada's proven record led the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO) to formally renounce violence in the late 1980s, and the movement's historic mobilization of huge sectors of the population established models of non-violent, participatory self-governance that future governments could have built upon and extended. Instead, violent countermovements ultimately undermined the peaceful achievements of the intifada and derailed resolution of the conflict indefinitely.

In what has been called "probably the largest grassroots eruption of diverse non-violent strategies in a single struggle in human history" (Wink 1987), the 1980s witnessed the movement that would eventually end the longstanding South African apartheid system. Though armed resistance was ever present and a regular threat to undoing the work of non-violent activists, the South African anti-apartheid movement was remarkable in its resolute commitment to peaceful tactics, despite appalling acts of brutality by the military and police against them. It is also significant for its clear depiction of the power of the international community (particularly through economic sanctions) to effect social change in transgressive states.

Led by now-legendary figures such as Nelson Mandela, Archbishop Desmond Tutu, and an impressive coalition of tribal heads and religious leaders, the indigenous anti-apartheid movement based its non-violent strategy on a classic tenet of Gandhian political thought: dependency. South African apartheid relied upon an entrenched system of exploiting the black majority for labor and society's everyday functioning. Importantly, however, South Africa was a valuable, fully enmeshed member of the network of global capitalism, on good trading terms with most western industrial powers. The movement reasoned that depriving the white minority of the acquiescence of the black majority – through strikes, boycotts, and non-cooperation – would seriously compromise their ability to manage the nation. By combining such strategies with symbolic, highly visible, and purposely provocative non-violent action, such as demonstrations, rallies, marches, and the like, the movement elicited the attention of much of the world, including crucial economic trading partners in the West. Solidarity and consciousness-raising movements arose in these nations as well, resulting in sanctions and divestment in 1986. The conjuncture of these powerful factors proved insurmountable for apartheid, which was finally legally abolished in 1990.

Non-Violence in “New Social Movements” and Globalization

The rise of so-called “post-material” values and the decline of Marxist-inspired ideologies around the world since the early 1990s accompanied an increase in what analysts have termed “new social movements.” Such movements, in contrast to those of previous decades, emphasize issues such as identity, recognition, and abstract values rather than the securing of collective benefits, rights, and material resources. Almost without exception, non-violent beliefs and tactics have been among the defining features of these new social movements.

A clear example of such a model of collective action is the lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender (LGBT) movement. The direct action and advocacy face of the LGBT movement emerged in the mid-1980s, most notably in the form of ACT UP (AIDS Coalition to Unleash Power), though its political rights and consciousness-raising component dates back to the Gay Liberation Front of the late 1960s. As one of the leading AIDS activist organizations, ACT UP innovated and perfected an array of non-violent tactics specifically geared to the idiosyncrasies of this modern pandemic. Central to its repertoire was the use of massive civil disobedience, particularly jail-filling and disruptive demonstrations. ACT UP is perhaps most known for its creative and provocative cultural action, such as its slogan “SILENCE = DEATH,” the DIVA TV project to document lives lost to AIDS, and the throwing of cremated remains on the White House lawn, all designed to generate public outrage and increase knowledge about the disease.

Globalization, the master trend in sociopolitical affairs for the twenty-first century, has emerged as both a target and a medium of non-violent collective action. A promising body of literature has grown in the last decade analyzing the unique dynamics and structure of global social movements. One of the consensus views of this preliminary line of inquiry has been the overwhelmingly non-violent character of transnational social movements. For example, the 1999 anti-World Trade Organization (WTO) protests in Seattle are widely held in the public imagination as dominated by riots, property destruction, and ugly conflicts between police and black-masked protesters. In truth, only a fraction of the 40,000 protesters were involved in violent activities. Most of these were anarchists not allied with the main organizing network, who began destroying property and inciting violence well before the WTO meetings. By all accounts, Seattle police either overreacted or instigated suppression in many cases, using tear-gas, rubber bullets, and batons without adequate cause.

Around the world, the anti-globalization movement has been characterized by remarkable restraint and the use of highly creative, even festive non-violent tactics, such as street plays, oversized puppets, and elaborate, traffic-disrupting dances. These have proved successful on several occasions, prohibiting delegates from conducting business or even conferring. The movement's scale and internal diversity, ranging from trade unions to students to communists, however, have complicated efforts to control episodes of violence, most recently witnessed in Prague, Genoa, and Melbourne.

The terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001 in the United States and the build-up to the invasion of Iraq in March 2003 by a coalition of American-led forces set the stage for the next chapter in global non-violence. Poignantly, the 9/11 attacks occurred exactly 95 years to the day after Gandhi began his South African satyagraha, and forever changed the face of social activism. However, in early 2003, as the prospects for diplomatic resolution to tensions between US President George W. Bush's administration and that of Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein evaporated, anti-war activists around the world began their own twenty-first-century satyagraha.

The extraordinarily long lead time before the actual invasion allowed for organizations around the world to create transnational networks, made possible by the Internet and cell phones. An unprecedented global coalition was assembled, consisting of groups such as Stop the War, Global Resistance (both from the UK), United for Peace and Justice, ANSWER, MoveOn.org (all from the US), members of the World Social Forum, and hundreds of trade unions and religious groups. Finally, on February 15, 2003, history's first synchronized global anti-war non-violent protest took place, with more than 800 cities in nearly 60 countries – even McMurdo Station in Antarctica – participating. Estimates of the number of protesters varied wildly, but even conservative numbers placed the figure well above 8 million. Demonstrations were largest in European capitals, such as Rome (1 million), London (750,000), Madrid, and Berlin (500,000 each). Incredibly, despite the massive human scale of these protests, virtually no episodes of violence were reported. Though critics have countered that the demonstrations ultimately failed to stop the invasion of Iraq, the effect of the protests on molding the global public opinion about the war almost certainly played a role in the gradual withdrawal of key allies only a few months into the conflict. It is also likely that this overwhelming display of public outcry made it impossible for political leaders to ignore the deep misgivings within their nations about the wisdom or necessity of military action.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Apartheid Movement, South Africa; Anti-Nuclear Protest Movements; Anti-Vietnam War Movement, United States; Chávez, César (1927–1993) and the United Farm Workers; Civil Rights Movement, United States: Overview; Freedom Rides; Freedom Summer; Freire, Paulo (1921–1997); Global Justice Movement and Resistance; Grandmothers of the Plaza de Mayo; Gutiérrez, Gustavo (b. 1928); Intifada I and Intifada II; Kent State Student Uprising; King, Martin Luther, Jr. (1929–1968) and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC); Lesbian, Gay, Transsexual, Bisexual Movements; Parks, Rosa (1913–2005) and the Montgomery Bus Boycott; Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC); Students for a Democratic Society (SDS); World Trade Organization (WTO) Protests, Seattle, 1999

References and Suggested Readings

- Abreu Hernandez, V. M. (2002) The Mothers of La Plaza de Mayo: A Peace Movement. Peace and Change 27, 3 (July): 385–411.
- Chernus, I. (2004) American Nonviolence: The History of an Idea. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books.
- Cockburn, A. & St. Clair, J. (2000) Five Days That Shook the World: Seattle and Beyond. London: Verso.
- Epstein, B. (2003) Notes on the Anti-War Movement. Monthly Review 55, 3 (July–August): 109–16.
- Jasper, J. M. (1990) Nuclear Politics: Energy and the State in the United States, Sweden, and France. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Meier, A. & Rudwick, E. (1969) How CORE Began. Social Science Quarterly 49, 4 (March): 789–99.
- Nepstad, S. E. (2004) Covictions of the Soul: Religion, Culture, and Agency in the Central America Solidarity Movement. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Parkman, P. (1990) Insurrectionary Civic Strikes in Latin America: 1931–1961. Cambridge, MA: Albert Einstein Institution.
- Simonson, K. (2003) The Anti-War Movement: Waging Peace on the Brink of War. Geneva: Center for Applied Studies in International Negotiation.
- Smith, C. (1996) Resisting Reagan: The US Central America Peace Movement. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Stoper, E. (1977) The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee: Rise and Fall of a Redemptive Organization. Journal of Black Studies 8, 1 (September): 13–34.
- Wink, W. (1987) Violence and Nonviolence in South Africa: Jesus' Third Way. Philadelphia: New Society Publishers.

- Wirmark, B. (1974) Nonviolent Methods and the American Civil Rights Movement, 1955–1965. Journal of Peace Research 11, 2 (Spring): 115–32.
- Zunes, S. (1999a) The Role of Nonviolent Action in the Downfall of Apartheid. Journal of Modern African Studies 37 (1): 137–69.
- Zunes, S. (1999b) Unarmed Resistance in the Middle East and North Africa. In S. Zunes, L. Kurtz, & S. B. Asher (Eds.), Nonviolent Social Movements: A Geographical Perspective. Malden, MA: Blackwell.
- Zunes, S., Kurtz, L. R., & Asher, S. B. (Eds.) (1999) Nonviolent Social Movements: A Geographical Perspective. Malden, MA: Blackwell.

Non-violent revolutions

Daniel Ritter

In the last three decades, activists have applied non-violent action in previously untested terrains. Beginning with the Iranian Revolution of 1977–9, non-violence has been employed in popular uprisings against domestic dictators and oppressive regimes. What distinguishes these non-violent revolutions is not merely the scope of the protests, but also the eventual outcome. While non-violent protest movements have been successful in shaping national policy, resisting invasions and occupations, and extending rights to groups of individuals previously excluded, non-violent revolutions have managed to transform entire political systems, and sometimes even society as a whole.

As sociologist Jeff Goodwin (2001) notes, the emergence of non-violent revolutions can be dated back to the Iranian Revolution in the late 1970s. While the Iranian Revolution and other subsequent revolutions that followed it are qualitatively different from previous revolutions, such as those of France, Russia, China, Cuba, Vietnam, and Nicaragua (the last of which occurred in the same year as its Iranian counterpart), Goldstone et al. (1991) found that non-violent strategies have been a component of virtually all revolutions throughout history, but the non-violent revolutions of the late twentieth century are historically unique because their success did not depend on the accompanying use of violence. While violence is frequently a part of political and social change, the non-violent revolutions of the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries suggest that the role played by violence in such processes can be kept at a minimum.

Islamic Non-Violence and the Iranian Revolution

As a result of what turned out to be the first non-violent revolution of the late twentieth century, Shah (King) Muhammad Reza Pahlavi was forced into exile by massive protests in Teheran and many other cities throughout Iran in the period between 1977 and 1979. The shah had ruled the nation from 1941, with the exception of a brief interlude in 1953, following a short-lived challenge on his power. American and British covert agents helped the shah to regain power later that year, and until the late 1970s he appeared virtually untouchable on the throne. However, the shah's connection in the West and domestic perceptions of him as a crony of the regime in Washington eventually played a major part in his fall from power.

The Iranian economy blossomed in the early 1970s, mainly due to rising oil prices. While the government profited from this development, its economic policies were naïve and unsophisticated, which led to high rates of inflation. The regime's inability to cope with this economic development resulted in widespread hardship, especially among poor Iranians, and discontent grew. It was not, however, the faltering economy that would be the primary cause of the subsequent revolution.

Rather than applying his enormous oil revenues to meet the nation's needs, the shah preferred to spend a large portion of the national budget on highly sophisticated American weapons. Ironically, these weapons were oftentimes so sophisticated that the Iranian military lacked the capabilities necessary to operate them. The shah's passion for American weaponry reinforced the perception of him as a westernizer and as a leader who had abandoned Iran's Islamic tradition, and it was under these allegations that various opposition groups could unite. For example, while the religious leaders, the ulama, and the traditional bazaar merchants differed in their primary complaints against the current regime, they agreed in their perceptions of the shah as a modernizer who had gone too far and caused their distress.

It was the discourse of Ayatollah Khomeini, an exiled Shi'i cleric, and other religious leaders that allowed protesters to unite under an Islamic banner of discontent. Khomeini did not reveal all his plans for post-revolutionary Iran, and while some of his allies cooperated reluctantly, they all assumed that they would be able to deal with Khomeini, already an old man, once the shah had been defeated. Fueled by Khomeini's skillful propaganda and speeches, which drew on both Iran's and Shi'i Islam's rich tradition of resistance to secular power, religious leaders mobilized Iranians in protest after protest. Several large and near-general strikes were also conducted, which further weakened the already faltering Iranian economy. Throughout the revolution, the opposition made masterful use of religious symbols and rituals in conducting non-violent protests against the regime. In December of 1978, two protests that reportedly drew over a million demonstrators to the streets made it clear that the era of the shah was quickly coming to its end.

While the last few days of the revolution did turn violent as the opposition fought for control over the armed forces, the ousting of the shah had been accomplished with overwhelming reliance on non-violent methods of struggle. Military confrontations only occurred a month after the shah had fled into exile, and the armed part of the revolution only lasted for a weekend.

People Power and the Philippine Revolution

In late February 1986, hundreds of thousands of Filipinos took to the streets of Manila in protests against fraudulent election results that had favored the incumbent president, Ferdinand Marcos. Marcos's rule, which had lasted over 20 years, had not always been dictatorial, but the last 14 years of his governance had been characterized by repression and martial law. The story of Filipino non-violence, or People Power as the phenomenon became known, is a textbook example of a non-violent revolution.

Although the political system of the Philippines under Marcos can only be described as an authoritarian dictatorship, Marcos, like many modern dictators, wished to give the appearance of heading a democratic society. In November 1985 on live American television, partly as a consequence of the desire to appear as a protector of Asian democracy, Marcos called for a presidential election to be held in early February of the following year. By calling a snap election and not allowing the opposition sufficient time to organize, Marcos felt certain to renew his mandate, either by winning the election fairly, or by rigging the vote.

As in many other countries under dictatorial rule, the Philippine opposition was plagued by internal division and appeared unable to unite behind one viable presidential candidate. Cardinal Jaime Sin, the archbishop of Manila, provided the opposition with a much needed consolidating presence. In the first of several important acts by the highest representative of the Catholic Church on the Philippines, Sin managed to convince prominent opposition leaders to agree upon the nomination of Cory Aquino. Aquino, the wife of martyred opposition politician Benigno Aquino, who had been shot at the airport as he returned to the Philippines after several years in exile, reluctantly agreed to run for president. The presidential election thus became a race between two main candidates, President Marcos and the widowed wife of his main critic.

As state employees counted the votes, security forces loyal to Marcos entered into the election authority's headquarters and interfered with the work of the technicians in charge of inputting the election results into computers. In protest, the technicians walked out on their still uncompleted task. Around the same time, several high-ranking military officers, along with the troops under their command, defected from the armed forces and barricaded themselves in two camps on Manila's main street, Epifanio de los Santos Avenue (EDSA). In desperation, the military officers called upon Cardinal Sin for help. After careful consideration, Sin in turn called upon the Filipino people to protect the military defectors in an attempt to prevent a civil war. The popular response to his call for action exceeded Sin's wildest expectations.

In reaction to Marcos's attempt to steal the election and heeding Sin's call, hundreds of thousands of Filipinos arrived at the two camps on EDSA, thus building a human wall in front of the defectors. As loyalist troops tried to get through to the camps, they were faced with the choice of massacring thousands of their fellow citizens or holding their ground. Armored personnel carriers ultimately stopped in front of kneeling, praying Filipinos, and at the sight of this massive expression of disapproval of the regime, which lasted for four days, troops steadily began to defect to the people. Marcos's power, which was always grounded in the military and security forces, was waning quickly, and after discussions with the American government he and his family decided to flee. People Power had succeeded and Cory Aquino was sworn in as the new president of the Philippines.

Revolutionary Change in Chile: The Ousting of Pinochet

On September 11, 1973, Chile's socialist president, Salvador Allende, was ousted in a military coup. While generals and admirals of all branches of Chile's military partook in the overthrow, it was the head of the army, General August Pinochet, who eventually became the junta's leader. After several skillful moves that eliminated some of his most potent opponents, Pinochet soon declared himself president, thus clearly violating his and the junta's promise to return power to democratically elected officials. Instead, it would take almost two decades for democracy to return to Chile.

In the late 1970s and early 1980s Pinochet held several referenda with the intention of passing laws that would secure his place in power for decades to come. Although the voting processes were less than regular by democratic measures, the Chilean opposition was too divided for any meaningful resistance to be realized. Protected by a prospering economy, Pinochet managed to keep the opposition in disarray. However, in 1982 the economy took a turn for the worse, and opposition to the dictator began to emerge. Strikes became commonplace but were unable to place any real pressure on the government. Shielded by the US government by virtue of being a staunch anti-communist, Pinochet put an effective end to many strikes by branding the protest leaders communists, banishing or even exiling them. Opposition forces lacked a clear strategy and strong organization, making themselves easy targets for suppression. Furthermore, Pinochet's rule was characterized by assassinations, disappearances, and other forms of terror. Consequently, fear became the greatest obstacle for the opposition.

In the mid-1980s, however, the tide began to turn against the dictator. American personnel changes in both Washington and Santiago initiated political opportunities that benefited the opposition and ultimately impaired the Chilean government. At the same time, resorting to guerilla warfare and other violent tactics, communist and socialist groups attempted to fight the government on its own terms. Not only was this approach destined to fail, but it gave Pinochet an excuse to remain in power – clearly the country, if left to its own, would spiral into chaos and destruction.

Realizing that non-violent resistance constituted the only viable option, opposition groups united under a common banner. According to Pinochet's design of Chilean democracy, 1988 would be the year for a plebiscite in which the Chilean people would decide whether or not there would be a presidential vote. Voting yes meant giving Pinochet one's blessing for another long term, while voting no meant that one preferred the scheduling of a presidential election. In a country held under siege by fear, the task of the opposition became to encourage people to vote. Through innovative methods that increased voter turnout, coupled with large protests that helped people shed their fears, the "No" side managed to win the election. The dictator's mandate had not been renewed, and in presidential elections a year later Patricio Aylwin, the opposition candidate, swept the vote, thus becoming Chile's first elected president in almost two decades. Democracy had returned to Chile, and it had done so ultimately through non-violent resistance.

Solidarity and the Polish Revolution

Shortly after World War II and the Nazi occupation of the country, the Communist Party assumed control of the Polish polity. Promising the Poles a society based on equality, and glorifying the position of the worker, the communists eventually managed to monopolize the country's political space by outlawing all competing parties. While "elections" were still held, these displays of democracy were ultimately meaningless, as there was only one party to vote for.

With the inherent problems associated with a planned economy came public discontent. The Polish laborers were forced to work harder and longer hours than most workers in neighboring countries, yet they made less money and encountered more expensive goods on frequently half-empty store shelves. Strikes and demonstrations were common, but the government, aided by the Polish army and backed by the Soviet leadership, always managed to suppress political unrest.

Secular change would, however, be set in motion by religious forces. In 1978 Polish Cardinal Karol Wojtyła was elected as the 264th pope of the Roman Catholic Church. The new pope, who assumed the name John Paul II, immediately began planning for a visit to his home country. When he celebrated mass in Warsaw in early June of 1979, a huge crowd attended, and on his last stop before returning to Rome, visiting his native Krakow, three million Poles, the largest public gathering in Polish history, joined him in an outdoor mass. In a supposedly atheist country under communist rule, this was naturally an astonishing turnout that indicated a turn of tides.

While the pope's visit was an important psychological turning point for the Polish nation, it was the dismissal of an outspoken factory worker, Anna Walentynowicz, from her workplace at the Lenin Shipyard in Gdańsk that sparked what would become the most serious challenge to Polish communism since its inception. On August 14, 1980, Walentynowicz's colleagues went on strike in protest of her dismissal, but in contrast to many earlier Polish strikes that had focused on increasing wages or reducing food prices, organizers decided to take the opportunity to instigate more fundamental change. The most important demand presented to the authorities was the creation of independent unions that would replace the existing government-sponsored ones.

After days of negotiations and sustained strikes, not only by workers at Lenin Shipyard but also by workers at over 500 other enterprises that ceased work in solidarity with their shipyard comrades, state authorities agreed to the workers' demands. Lech Walesa, an unemployed former shipyard worker, had represented the workers and would eventually become Poland's democratically elected president.

As a result of the negotiations, 500 representatives of 36 newly formed labor unions convened a month after the end of negotiations to form Solidarity (Solidarność), an umbrella organization that would represent ten million workers in a nation of 30 million people. Over the next few years Solidarity became a force to be reckoned with, calling numerous strikes and serving as the primary counterpoint to the communist regime. Economic and political circumstances eventually caused the government to declare a state of emergency, and Solidarity was forced underground. Although the state of emergency ended in 1983, Solidarity did not resurface until 1986 when political prisoners were released. In the following years, Solidarity continued to organize different types of strikes, and when economic and geopolitical conditions were ripe in 1988, the government invited Solidarity officials to roundtable talks. Economic reforms were negotiated and free elections reinstated, and by the end of the summer of 1989, a small coalition of political parties led by Solidarity formed a new democratic Polish government. Without resorting to violence, the workers' movement led by Solidarity had ended a 40-year-long era of communist rule.

Eastern European Revolutions: Tearing Down the Communist Wall in 1989

The Solidarity movement helped usher in non-violent transformations in other Eastern European states. Hungary, the Baltic States, and the USSR all experienced popular non-violent protests demanding change, but the most dramatic events unfolded in East Germany and Czechoslovakia. Following the collapse of Polish communism and the message sent from Moscow that the Soviet Union would not use its troops to protect vulnerable communist regimes, popular movements that had been brewing for decades recognized the time for change had come.

Democracy came first to Hungary, with that nation opening its borders to the West on September 11, 1989. Previously, Eastern Europe had been sealed off from the West while travel between communist countries had been fairly unproblematic. As Hungary opened its borders to the West, East Germans could now get to West Germany via Hungary and Austria. Sources estimate that 50,000 East Germans escaped in the first month.

As the government began to make concessions to popular demands, protests against the regime increased. During the summer and early fall of 1989, protesters gathered every Monday at the Karl Marx Platz in Leipzig after "prayers for peace” in the Church of St. Nicholas. In an attempt to quell the protests, Erich Honecker, leader of the Communist Party, ordered a “Chinese solution” (referring to the Tiananmen Square massacre a few months earlier) to the Leipzig demonstrations of October 6. Due to timely intervention by prominent community leaders, a potential bloodbath was avoided, and the 70,000 protesters could proceed with their peaceful demonstration.

The culmination of events occurred in East Berlin where Honecker resigned on October 18. Massive demonstrations continued, with 500,000 people protesting in Berlin on November 4, and another 500,000 demonstrating in Leipzig two days later. By this time the East German leadership was deteriorating rapidly. On November 9 authorities decided to let a few people pass through the Berlin Wall into West Berlin. The “few” soon became many, and the era of the Wall was over. Within six months, as the result of free elections, communists no longer controlled East Germany, and within a year Germany was reunited.

Events in East Germany served as a catalyst for the already existing resistance movement of Czechoslovakia. On November 17, 1989, a group of students gathered to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the death of Jan Opletal, a student who had been killed by the Nazis. Following the ceremony, the students marched on Wenceslas Square where security forces waited for them. Despite offering the police flowers and holding up their empty hands to show they meant no harm, the students were attacked with dogs and truncheons.

News of the assaulted students caused Czechoslovakia to erupt in non-violent demonstrations and protests. The turn of events that had been set in motion by student protests was now carried on by several civic groups. These groups united under the name Civic Forum and assumed leadership of the movement. Following a week of continuous demonstrations and negotiations between Civic Forum and the Communist Party, the Politburo and the party’s Central Committee resigned. More protests and demonstrations followed. A gathering at the Letna soccer stadium drew 500,000 people, and two days later a general strike took place. Twenty-three days after the student demonstrations that sparked “the Velvet Revolution,” the government had resigned, and a few weeks later Václav Havel took the presidential oath of the new Czechoslovak Socialist Republic.

Ousting Milošević: The Non-Violent Revolution of Serbia

Since 1987, Slobodan Milošević had been the political leader of Serbia. He had survived the collapse of the Soviet Union and communism in Eastern Europe, and once his term as president of Serbia had expired in 1997, he changed the title to president of Yugoslavia, rewrote the constitution to allow himself to remain in power for another eight years, and managed to win the election needed to secure his position as the leader of Serbia. A strong suspicion of election fraud hovered over Milošević’s latest political success, but the opposition was divided, and to many Serbs the political alternatives to Milošević were almost as bad as the dictator himself.

In 1996 Milošević had tried to deny the opposition key victories in municipal elections all over Serbia, which had led to protests and demonstrations. Eventually Milošević was forced to concede, allowing the opposition to grow stronger. In an attempt to counter this trend, Milošević, much like Marcos in the Philippines, decided to call for early presidential elections in 2000, anticipating that the opposition would not have time to unite and promote one viable candidate to oppose him.

This strategy might have worked had it not been for several student and civic organizations, the most famous of which went by the name Otpor (Serbian for “resistance”). Otpor helped unite the numerous opposition parties under one banner. The newly created coalition, DOS, or the Democratic Opposition of Serbia, agreed to promote one consensus candidate against Milošević in the upcoming elections. After careful research it was determined that Vojislav Koštunica would be the ideal nominee, and other opposition leaders began to campaign on his behalf.

Otpor and other organizations helped with the opposition campaign, but also ran a parallel campaign against Milošević. Using non-violent strategies and relying heavily on the use of humor, Otpor has been partially credited for mobilizing 80 percent of the Serbian voters. A high turnout had been considered crucial for opposition victory, and when the first unofficial reports of the election held in late September of 2000 were released, the projections of the opposition were verified: the large turnout had propelled them to certain victory.

As the opposition announced its triumph, government sources remained silent. Days later it was officially announced that neither candidate had received the needed 50 percent of the popular vote, and a run-off election was scheduled. Realizing that such a process would only give Milošević a second chance to steal the election, the opposition planned for a carefully devised non-violent campaign to force Milošević out of office. A few days before the protests were scheduled to commence, coal miners at the nation's largest mine went on strike in an effort to aid the opposition. Workers in other professions soon joined, and the country came to a standstill. On October 5, citizens from all over Serbia gathered in the capital of Belgrade. Despite numbering in the hundreds of thousands, the protesters managed to sustain non-violent discipline, thus pacifying the security forces. Two casualties were reported; one elderly man died from a heart attack during the protests, and another person was killed in a traffic accident.

The massive display of protest and disapproval forced Milošević to resign the very next morning, and the Serbian Revolution of 2000 had come to its conclusion. It is believed that the size of the protests caused police and army commanders to withhold orders to attack the crowd as they realized that Milošević had been defeated. The armed and security forces had no intention of sharing Milošević's fate. Once again non-violence had been used to oust a dictator.

Recent Developments: The Color Revolutions

In the first decade of the twenty-first century, several "Color Revolutions" occurred in the former Soviet Union. In three consecutive years, Georgia, Ukraine, and Kyrgyzstan all ousted political leaders more or less non-violently after fraudulent elections.

On November 2, 2003, parliamentary elections were held in Georgia. The allegedly fraudulent results heavily favored the government of the sitting president, Eduard Shevardnadze, which triggered severe opposition criticism against the regime and popular protests in the capital of Tbilisi. Shevardnadze had been ousted from his presidential post during a bloody coup in 1992, but was reinstated three years later. From 1995 he had again been the president of Georgia. However, criticisms against him had mounted after substantiated rumors of corruption and nepotism, and these personal accusations were coupled with a negative trend in the Georgian economy in the time leading up to the election.

As exit polls and official polls reported contradictory election results, citizens began to congregate in public places all over Georgia, but especially in Freedom Square in central Tbilisi, heeding the call of both civic groups and politicians. Modest crowds in the square during the first few days following the election grew to 50,000 protesters two weeks after the election. Less than three weeks after the election, on November 21, 120,000 protesters took over the parliament building and interrupted Shevardnadze in the middle of a speech. With the help of his bodyguards the president fled the scene, and two days later, after discussions with opposition leaders, he signed his resignation. The protests that led to Shevardnadze's resignation had been deliberately and successfully non-violent. Named after the roses worn by protesters to symbolize the non-violent nature of the protests, the ousting of the president became known as the Rose Revolution.

Almost exactly a year later, in the aftermath of a run-off vote for the Ukrainian presidency, hundreds of thousands of people gathered in the streets of Kiev to protest the allegedly fraudulent victory of government-supported candidate Viktor Yanukovich over opposition candidate Viktor Yushchenko. As in Georgia, Ukrainian exit polls had shown the opposition nominee to be on his way to a clear victory, but when the official results were presented the government candidate had won the run-off election. Yushchenko, backed by several civil and student groups as well as national and international NGOs, called on the people to non-violently protest the election result. Assuming Yushchenko's campaign color, orange, as their symbol, his followers participated in massive protests, while strikes occurred in many parts of Ukraine.

In the face of the protests, the Ukrainian Supreme Court decided that the election results were invalid and called for a second run-off election. This time, with the help of careful national and international electoral supervision, Yushchenko won a clear victory and was sworn in as the country's new president. As in Georgia, non-violent protests had forced the government to eventually admit defeat.

Inspired by events in Georgia and Ukraine, opposition leaders tried to mount a similar attack on the Kyrgyz regime after fraudulent parliamentary election results in March 2005. The elections favored the regime of Askar Akaev, the president of Kyrgyzstan, and large protests followed in what became known as the Tulip Revolution, a name coined by Akaev himself in a speech warning the nation of trying to replicate events in Georgia and Ukraine. While the Tulip Revolution did not exhibit the same level of non-violent discipline and sophistication as its predecessors – looting and significant violence did occur – the revolution was still relatively non-violent, and is therefore commonly associated with events in Georgia and Ukraine.

Conclusion

Recent history has demonstrated that large-scale, revolutionary social and political change can occur without the agents of change resorting to violence. In many cases the sheer number of people protesting the national leadership while maintaining non-violent discipline can be enough to topple dictatorial regimes. Although non-violent revolutions are a real and important part of the landscape of contentious politics in the twenty-first century, the phenomenon itself remains understudied.

One of the major questions that must be answered by scholars of non-violent social change concerns the sudden emergence of non-violent challenges to the very existence of oppressive states in the last 30 years. The use of non-violence for political purposes was not a novelty in the late twentieth century, but the realization that non-violence could be used to challenge the totality of state power certainly did constitute a new facet of non-violent action. Thus far social scientists and other scholars interested in non-violent social change have placed the burden of explanatory power of the success of non-violent challenges in general on the techniques and tactics used by non-violent movements. However, the sudden explosion of non-violent revolutions suggests that we may perhaps have to look at structural explanations as well, a conclusion reached by Lester Kurtz and Stephen Zunes, two of the most prominent scholars of non-violent social change.

Furthermore, Zunes has attempted to identify some of the specific reasons why non-violence has become the method of choice of revolutionaries on every continent. He hypothesizes that the dramatically increased costs from counterinsurgency warfare, the recognition that unarmed methods are more effective, and a growing concern over the impact of militarism on post-revolutionary society which harms efforts at unity, democracy, independence, and development, may be some of the reasons why contemporary revolutionaries and other challengers of the status quo choose to resort to non-violent methods of struggle.

The emergence of non-violent revolutions constitutes a promising development in contentious politics. Historical evidence seems to suggest that by avoiding violence, protesters and revolutionaries alike improve their chances of success in the face of an oppressive opponent. Nonetheless, the ability of non-violent challenges to bring about concrete changes should not be overestimated. Although non-violent action has been used to topple many oppressive regimes, few of these revolutions have been able to bring about lasting socioeconomic changes benefiting the citizens of the countries in which the revolutions took place. It is therefore important to be realistic about the potential of non-violent challenges – to topple a regime and establish a new political system is one thing; to improve the life of every citizen is a completely different one. One is highly realistic and well documented, while the other might remain the utopian dream of Mohandas K. Gandhi.

SEE ALSO: Cedar Revolution, Lebanon; Chile, Popular Resistance against Pinochet; Color Revolutions; Havel, Václav (b. 1936); Iranian Revolution, 1979; Khomeini, Ayatollah Sayyid Ruhollah Mussaui (1902–1989) and the Shi'ite Islamic Revolution; Serbian Revolution of October 2000; Sharp, Gene (b. 1928); Solidarność (Solidarity); Tulip Revolution, Kyrgyzstan; Ukraine Orange Revolution, 2004–2005; Velvet Revolution 1989; Walesa, Lech (b. 1943)

References and Suggested Readings

Arjomand, S. A. (1988) The Turban for the Crown: The Islamic Revolution in Iran. New York: Oxford University Press.

- Ash, T. G. (1983) The Polish Revolution: Solidarity 1980–82. London: Jonathan Cape.
- Bleiker, R. (1993) Non-violent Struggle and the Revolution in East Germany. Cambridge, MA: Albert Einstein Institution.
- Bujosević, D. & Radovanović, I. (2003) The Fall of Milošević: The October 5th Revolution. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Constable, P. & Valenzuela, A. (1991) A Nation of Enemies: Chile Under Pinochet. New York: W. W. Norton.
- Forest, J. & Forest, N. (1988) Four Days in February: The Story of the Non-violent Overthrow of the Marcos Regime. Basingstoke: Marshall Pickering.
- Goldstone, J. A., Gurr, T. R., & Moshiri, F. (Eds.) (1991) Revolutions of the Late Twentieth Century. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.
- Goodwin, J. (2001) No Other Way Out: States and Revolutionary Movements, 1945–1991. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Johnson, B. (1987) The Four Days of Courage: The Untold Story of the People Who Brought Marcos Down. New York: Free Press.
- Kandelaki, G. (2006) Georgia's Rose Revolution: A Participant's Perspective. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace.
- Katz, M. N. (2006) Revolutionary Change in Central Asia. World Affairs 168 (4): 157–71.
- Keddie, N. (2003) Modern Iran: Roots and Results of Revolution. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Krushelnicky, A. (2006) An Orange Revolution: A Personal Journey Through Ukrainian History. London: Harvill Secker.
- Ost, D. (1990) Solidarity and the Politics of Anti-Politics. Philadelphia: Temple University Press.
- Schock, K. (2004) Unarmed Insurrections: People Power Movements in Nondemocracies. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Sharp, G. (1973) The Politics of Nonviolent Action, 3 vols. Boston: Extending Horizons.
- Smithey, L. & Kurtz, L. R. (1999) "We Have Bare Hands": Nonviolent Social Movements in the Soviet Bloc. In S. Zunes, L. R. Kurtz, & S. B. Asher (Eds.), Nonviolent Social Movements: A Geographical Perspective. Malden, MA: Blackwell.
- Spooner, M. H. (1994) Soldiers in a Narrow Land: The Pinochet Regime in Chile. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Taras, R. (1995) Consolidating Democracy in Poland. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.
- Wheaton, B. & Kavan, Z. (1992) The Velvet Revolution: Czechoslovakia, 1988–1991. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.
- Wilson, A. (2006) Ukraine's Orange Revolution. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Zunes, S., Kurtz, L. R., & Asher, S. B. (Eds.) (1999) Nonviolent Social Movements: A Geographical Perspective. Malden, MA: Blackwell.

Nordic revolts and popular protests, 1500–present

Kimmo Katajala

The five Nordic countries – Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway, and Sweden – have a closely entwined history, with some major changes in the mutual combinations. From the end of the fourteenth century three Nordic kingdoms – Denmark, Norway (ruling Iceland), and Sweden (including the Finnish territory) – were united under the same king. In the collapse of this so-called Kalmar Union (1397–1520) two separate states, Denmark–Norway (and Iceland) and Sweden (sometimes called Sweden–Finland in historical literature), were born. These two kingdoms lasted as states until the beginning of the nineteenth century.

As a result of the Napoleonic Wars, Finland was annexed to the Russian Empire in 1809 as an autonomous Grand Duchy with its own senate, legislation, and customs borders. In 1814 Danish rule in Norway came to an end and the Dual Monarchy of Sweden and Norway was formed. Norway had its own constitution, government, administration, finances, high court of justice, parliament, and army. These two realms were equal to one another and shared foreign policy and the same king. In 1905 the Dual Monarchy was dissolved and after that Norway

Known as the father of modern Sweden, Gustavus Vasa often compared himself to Moses as a liberator of his people. An autocratic ruler and efficient bureaucrat, he introduced a more effective central government, as well as Protestantism, to the nation. His efforts were not always appreciated and he faced a series of rebellions, one of which was led by Nils Dacke in 1542. (Mary Evans Picture Library) and Sweden formed two sovereign and separate states. Finland gained its independence in 1917 and in 1918, Iceland, belonging to the Danish kingdom, gained an autonomous status. As the last of the Nordic states, Iceland became independent after World War II, in 1944.

Compared to the history of Central Europe, to say nothing of South and Central America, the Nordic countries appear as a quite calm region during the early modern and modern periods. Medieval times, the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, were restless ones in Scandinavian countries, particularly Sweden, Denmark, and Norway, but the sixteenth century saw the last large-scale peasant revolts in all Northern countries.

Sixteenth Century: Era of Last Great Peasant Revolts

The beginning of the sixteenth century was very turbulent in Scandinavia. Sweden was trying to leave the Kalmar Union and therefore many wars and war-like situations occurred in the borderlands of Sweden in Småland and Danish Scania, Halland and Blekinge (the southernmost provinces of present-day Sweden). In these provinces lots of peasant unrest occurred during the 1510s and 1520s. The background to these tumults varied. Generally, the peasant riots in Danish provinces were directed against war-taxes. The peasants also took part in politics, supporting some candidates for the Danish throne. In the Swedish borderlands war had ruined the peasant economy, in part due to the more antagonistic attitudes of leaseholders. These were the causes of the local tumults that occurred in the province of Småland in the 1520s.

The last large-scale uprising of Denmark was the revolt of Skipper Clement in 1534. The event was closely entwined with the complex struggle for kingship in Denmark after the collapse of the Kalmar Union. Discontentment among the burghers and peasantry with the rule of King Christian III was widespread. The party supporting the restoration of the former King Christian II to the throne sent a privateer – Skipper Clement – to the town of Aalborg. The task of Clement was to raise a revolt. This succeeded well and the revolt spread from Aalborg to the surrounding countryside. The wealthiest peasants whom the king's taxes had hit hardest took the lead. However, soon the revolt turned against the local nobility when the peasants and burghers armed themselves and begun rob and burn local manors. The king had to organize a large army to meet Clement's troops. After a few battles, the army of little less than 1,000 peasants and burghers was defeated. The soldiers ransacked the town and executed the lesser leaders immediately. Those parishes that had joined the revolt had to pay high collective fines to save the lives of the rebels. Clement himself was tried and executed in 1536.

After the collapse of the Kalmar Union the Kingdom of Norway was left under the dominion of the Danish king. Discontentment with the rule of King Christian II was widespread in Norway. Heavy taxation and political maneuvers against the king resulted in rioting along the Norwegian west coast in 1518–20. In 1508, as a viceroy of Norway, Christian II had got into trouble with the Hedmark peasantry. The peasants were opposing the king's bailiffs and taxation. The king's troops beat the armed peasants in a battle and took many prisoners. The bishop of Hamar had a big role in organizing the uprising against the viceroy. In a fierce attack, the king's troops stormed the bishop's castle, which was then looted.

Despite some smaller violent skirmishes between the peasantry and authorities, Norway seems to have been a rather peaceful territory during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. However, if we scratch the surface a little deeper, we find such legal peasant protests as petitions to the king and court cases between the peasantry and authorities. Unrest was present in many parts of Norway. The crucial reason for the rise of the protests did lie in the confiscation of church lands during the Reformation in 1537. Before the Reformation, the church owned about 40 percent of the arable land. The crown took most of these lands and gave them to local governors and bailiffs, who treated these lands as fiefdoms. This led to many confrontations with peasant societies. Although no big battles between the authorities and armed peasants took place, the non-violent protests of the peasantry were treated as illegal revolts.

Sweden and Finland were the territories where the last and biggest old-style violent Nordic peasant revolts took place. The Reformation, especially the confiscation of church properties in 1527 and the new Lutheran liturgy, caused several peasant protests. The bishops were in the lead of some of these revolts. They tried to restore the Catholic faith and their once-considerable authority in society. The most famous of these revolts is the Bell Revolt in 1530 against the king's new tax that parishes had to pay for church bells. King Gustavus Vasa put an end to these uprisings with a brutal hand. However, the new policies of the king evoked a new and dangerous revolt in the southern part of Sweden, in Småland.

The reasons for the unrest in Småland were the Reformation and the local economy. The new king had introduced many innovations that did not please the peasantry. New controls on the border with Denmark hindered the traditional local trade and the peasant economy. There was competition for land between the peasantry and the manorial system. King Gustavus needed funds for his warfare and therefore taxes rose. Moreover, the new Lutheran liturgy did not please the peasantry: they complained that it was so simple that in one hearing a shepherd boy could whistle it through. The peasantry wanted the old days back: trade unhindered, fewer manors, lower taxes, and the Old Catholic liturgy. Because the king turned a deaf ear to their petitions and complaints, in the summer of 1542 the peasants armed, robbed some manors, and mistreated the crown's bailiffs. They also founded a kind of self-government for the county.

The name of the revolt – the Dacke War – comes from the name of the leader of the rebels, Nils Dacke. King Gustavus sent troops to put down the revolt in Småland, but they were beaten back. The king had to negotiate an armistice with Dacke and to promise to take the demands of the rebels into consideration. This was only a pretence; the aim of the armistice was to gain time for another military expedition. In 1543 the territory was first isolated and then the rebellious peasants were beaten by a big army. The Dacke War was the last major peasant rebellion in Sweden proper.

The eastern half of the Swedish Realm, Finland, was not as turbulent as Sweden in the sixteenth century. Although peasant discontent with local crown officials and manors was widespread, only small-scale open skirmishes occurred. During the 25 Years War between Sweden and Russia (1570–95) the Finnish peasants had to bear the weight of provisioning the army with food supplies and taxes. This caused local riots in several places around the country. The interests of peasants seeking to protect their own property and those of soldiers demanding provisions clashed. Although the war ended in 1595, the commander of the army, Klaus Fleming, kept the soldiers armed for political reasons. Sigismund, the king of Sweden and Poland, struggled for the Swedish crown with his uncle Duke Charles (later King Charles IX). Fleming was the main supporter of Sigismund and he feared an attack on Finland. The peasantry, who had suffered from the exploitation of the troops and several years of crop failure, had waited for relief, but their hopes were dashed. Soldiers earning their livelihood from the peasants remained in the countryside. Waiting for support from Duke Charles, the peasants of Ostrobothnia began the last great peasant uprising in the Northern countries, the Club War (1596–7).

At Christmas 1595 small attacks against groups of soldiers occurred in some villages in the counties of Savonia and Ostrobothnia. The peasants killed some soldiers and drove the others to flee. The situation was calmed for a while, but in autumn 1596 a great peasant army gathered in Ostrobothnia. Messengers spread the word of the uprising to other provinces. The peasant army was divided into three main detachments and they began to roam to south towards the castle of Åbo, where the troops of Klaus Fleming were. The main battle between Fleming's 2,500 men and about 3,000 peasants took place at Christmas 1596 near the village of Nokia. The result was a total rout and about 500 peasants were killed. The peasants lost all their other battles, too. However, they were not yet suppressed. Soon, 3,000–4,000 peasants from northern parts of the province had armed themselves and had begun to march south. Troops engaged with them in the Battle of Santavuori in Kurikka village. Many peasants were killed and about 500 were taken to prison. Estimates of casualties in the Club War vary a lot, but about 2,500–3,000 peasants were killed.

Seventeenth Century: Non-Violent Protests and Local Riots

Although there were no major peasant revolts in the Nordic countries during the seventeenth century, tensions existed between social classes. Sometimes new payments demanded by the crown gave birth to local riots. For example, in Sweden proper, the new customs fee set for peasant products brought to towns – the so-called small toll – led to local skirmishes in several places and in Stockholm, especially in the 1620s. The nobility had increased in power and enlarged its manorial holdings at the cost of peasant lands. In the 1630s and 1640s the nobility in southern parts of Sweden feared travel to the countryside because of the hostile peasantry. At the same time, in several Finnish parishes, peasants protested heavily – demanding their rights in local courts, organizing tax strikes and other demonstrations, and sending supplications to the king against local landlords.

A small uprising of about 300 peasants occurred in the woods of central Sweden in 1653. The insurrectionists aimed to plunder the manors, kill the nobles, and establish a commonwealth. Their ideological inspiration clearly came from France and Britain. The revolt is named the Uprising of the Morning Star, after the main weapon of the peasants, a thorn-headed club, resembling a star-figure. The uprising was easily suppressed and the leaders were brought to Stockholm and executed in a public display as a means to prevent other possible uprisings by terrifying the contentious peasantry.

In peace treaties agreed in the first half of the seventeenth century, Denmark ceded to Sweden the provinces of Scania, Halland, and Blekinge. During periods of war with Denmark in the late seventeenth century the province of Scania experienced continuing guerilla actions (known as the Snapphane movement) from the local peasantry against the Swedes. Viewed as a local campaign for rejoining the province to Denmark, the actions are also interpreted as a social peasant protest against harsh Swedish rule.

In the easternmost corner of the realm, in Karelia (the province of Northern Karelia of present-day Finland), a violent food riot occurred at the end of the seventeenth century. In Christmas 1696 and January 1697, after several years of crop failures, conflict between peasants and landlords erupted into open peasant attacks on local manors. Three manors were plundered and destroyed, but only one person was killed in the attacks. A detachment of about fifty soldiers sent to the territory severely suppressed the riot. Many peasants were killed in the forests and about fifty rioters were brought to trial, with forty death sentences handed out.

Eighteenth Century: Protest Marches and Campaigns for Property Rights

As was the case in Sweden and Finland, seventeenth-century Norway experienced no major revolts, although peasant protests and conflict were widespread on the local level. A major subject of contention was the obligation of conscription. In 1611 the Norwegian attack on Sweden was abandoned due to mass desertion.

In the eighteenth century, popular protests were most notable in Norway and Sweden. In Norway protest movements emerged in opposition to taxation and in connection with fishing and trade. In Sweden protests were closely entwined with political upheavals. The burghers of Norwegian coastal towns promoted their own business by hindering peasants' free trade. In the town of Arendal, local restrictions on peasants' rights to trade with skippers and boats in the harbour led to an armed gathering of peasants and soldiers in 1725. The protestors forced their way into the bailiff's house and demanded their traditional rights, and the impasse was peacefully resolved. A similar protest occurred in 1752 when peasants' rights to trade in Arendal were again restricted. Some 300–400 people gathered in the town with muskets, sticks, and whips. They broke into some houses and the burghers had to escape through the windows. However, nothing much more happened.

One of the most famous events in Norway's eighteenth-century history is the Striler War in 1765. "Striler" was a nickname for peasants in the territory around the town of Bergen. Despite its name, the event itself was not at all bloody. A new poll tax had irritated the peasantry and some 2,000 peasants gathered in Bergen. The governor was given some cuffs to the cheek and to save his own and his bailiff's skin he had to pay back the collected tax to the peasants. A warship was sent from Copenhagen to Bergen to calm down the situation and the leaders of the rebels were tried. The sentences were lenient, with only three of the peasant leaders sentenced to penal servitude for life.

The Lofthus Uprising in 1786–7 was a mixture of protests against restrictions on trade, high prices of wares in burghers' stores, new taxes, and the abuses of local officials. The leader of the uprising was skipper Kristian Lofthus. He brought the complaints and demands of the peasants to the crown prince in Copenhagen. To promote their demands about 2,000 armed peasants of Agder and Telemark gathered together. The government in Copenhagen sent a detachment of troops to meet the peasant army, but no battle occurred. Lofthus himself died in prison and 13 peasant leaders were condemned to penal servitude.

In Sweden the political system had turned from a king's absolute power to the dominance of the Diet at the beginning of the eighteenth century. Four political estates were present in the Diet: the nobility, clergy, burghers, and peasants. While the form and status of the Diet had been established by the early seventeenth century, its role in politics was limited as long as the monarchy remained strong. In the aftermath of the disastrous Great Northern War (1700–21) the role of the king in political affairs was diminished to a minimum. The Diet had a crucial role in governing the country. The peasantry, although they usually had a minor role in the work of the Diet, participated in state politics for over a hundred years. The main opponent of the peasantry in the Diet was the nobility. The peasantry searched for allies in this combat and placed hope in a strong king, willing to limit the power of the nobility.

The most notable Swedish peasant protest of the eighteenth century, the so-called Dalecarlian Dance, is entwined in this political constellation. The War of Hats (1741–3) against Russia was very inauspicious for the Swedes. The king of Sweden had no heir and as a prerequisite for peace, the Russians demanded that a German prince be nominated as successor to the Swedish throne. The Swedish peasantry – waiting for a strong king – did not accept this and protested. They wanted the generals to be tried for their responsibility for the failure of the war and the successor to the throne to be taken from the Danish royal house. To give weight to their demands, peasants in the province of Dalecarlia organized a large march to Stockholm. In the capital, 4,500 peasants met a detachment of troops that opened fire. Official records refer to over fifty deaths and over eighty badly wounded. About 3,000 peasants were captured and 300 died in the dungeons of their captors. Six leaders of the march were sentenced to death and executed. The result of this massive and peaceful protest march had turned into a catastrophe.

Denmark was the calmest country in the Nordic region in the aftermath of the Revolt of Skipper Clement of 1534. No large-scale public revolts occurred in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The common explanation for this is that the manorial system in the villages ruled local societies so effectively that no open protests could be organized. This manorial system was based on a mild form of servitude called Vornedskab. This made it possible for manorial lords to forbid their peasants from leaving the yards of the manor. From the late fifteenth century, royal rights were transferred to the landowners. Therefore, in many areas, the manorial lord replaced royal bailiffs in matters of policing and justice. Abandoned in 1702, the Vornedskab was followed in 1733 by the Stavnsbånd, forbidding males of conscription age from moving away without the consent of their lords. Presumably, although local control was strict, passive forms of peasant resistance like working slowly or inadequately, sabotage, and not least the refusal to understand, continued in use.

Nevertheless, large-scale peasant unrest was also rare in Denmark during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. The best-known and perhaps largest of the conflicts took place in Nordfalster in 1768. In 1766 the local manors, ruled by the crown, were sold in auction, but peasants were not offered the right to purchase the yards to their property because they were not admitted to the auction. The manor with its yards was sold to a merchant in the town of Nykøbing. In a 1768 proclamation the king promised to sell the yards to the crown's peasants for their own property at a low price. Therefore, about two hundred peasants in Nordfalster sought to annul the former auction as illegal, sending several petitions to the king. Although the case was lost for the peasants in court, protests continued until 1769. In Dallunds manor near the town Odense conflicts on land-use and day-labor erupted. Peasant resistance took the form of public strikes and demonstrations. In court, two leaders were sentenced to one-year's penal servitude and seven peasants to four-days' prison on bread and water.

Iceland: Island without Protest or Conflict?

The history of Iceland is usually presented as a continuous campaign of poor, classless, and unified Icelanders against the suppression of Norwegian and then Danish supreme powers, and as a logical process towards independence. This does not examine the nature of protest in the country. It is true that open and large-scale peasant revolts never occurred in Iceland. However, Icelandic history can still be viewed from the perspective of conflict and protest.

The main causes of Icelandic conflicts during the ancien régime were the foreign trading monopolies, taxes, and rents on land and cattle. In the fifteenth century the English became partners with the Icelanders in the fishing industry. The English living in Iceland employed so great a labor force that Icelandic landowners lacked servants and peasants to work their farms. At the beginning of the sixteenth century the English were denied the right to remain in Iceland over the winter. In 1602 the Danish crown established a trading monopoly of three Danish towns in Iceland. The Icelanders protested heavily. All through the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries they sent complaints against the monopoly to Copenhagen. In addition, violent confrontations between the Icelanders and the Danish merchants occurred in Icelandic ports.

In the seventeenth century there were several attempts to introduce new taxes in Iceland. The Icelanders sent letters and supplications about the new taxes to the Danish king. The protests were quite successful in rejecting the attempts of the Danish crown to impose additional taxes. Iceland was very far away and Danish power very weak, with little possibility of using force. The land in Iceland was owned by a small class of elites. Most farmers were tenants who cultivated their plots and raised sheep and cattle. The rents paid for land and on cattle were a continuous cause of discontent through the centuries. In addition, famine caused food protests and hunger uprisings in the beginning of the eighteenth century.

The Long Nineteenth Century: From Agrarian Protests to Workers' Movements

In wars in the eighteenth century Sweden had lost large areas of territory in Eastern Finland to Russia. The Russians called these ceded territories Old Finland. After ceding the whole of Finland to Russia in 1809, the territory of Old Finland was annexed to the new autonomous Grand Duchy in 1812. During the eighteenth century the Russian tsar had donated vast territories from Old Finland to the Russian nobility. According to old Swedish laws kept in force in Old Finland, owners of the donation had rights only over land-rents and the day-labor of their tenants, whereas the Russian nobility was used to treating tenants as serfs. This contradiction caused much contention between the peasants and their proprietors in Old Finland. In the 1780s this developed into open violence between tenants and troops. In the 1830s the confrontation between tenants and proprietors was extreme. Tenants tried to protect their rights in lengthy legal cases. The tenants burned alive a crown's sheriff in a tumult that occurred in Salmi parish. These conflicts in Old Finland were finally solved in 1867, when the Diet of Finland bought the donated lands and tenants were able to buy their tenant-farms.

Because of the 1905 General Strike in Finland, with its roots in Russian revolutionary movements, the old four-estate Diet was abolished and a new parliament elected with universal suffrage was established. Because of the revolutionary situation in Russia, the grip of Russian governance loosened in Finland and the country declared itself independent in December 1917. However, the radicalized labor movement had organized a voluntary civil militia, the Red Guard, and the non-socialistic parties raised a White Guard to keep order. In January 1918 the tensions between the political groups broke into civil war and the two Guards formed the basis of the competing parties.

The country was divided in two. The southern and industrialized parts of the country – where the biggest towns were situated – were left on the side of the socialist army, the Reds. The non-socialistic Civil Guard, the Whites, ruled the vast but sparsely populated northern part of Finland. The Finnish government moved from Helsinki to the area of the Whites, to the town of Vasa in Ostrobothnia. The Reds had the support of the leftist intelligentsia, factory workers and landless cottagers, agricultural workers, and tenants in some parts of the country. The backbone of the Civil Guard were the wealthy landowning peasants and the bourgeoisie of the towns. The White army was better organized and armed and had some officers trained in Germany. On the other hand, the Reds obtained some support from Russian troops that still were present in the country.

The White army started to march southwards. The battles were harsh and about 5000 Reds and 3,500 Whites were killed. In acts of terror committed during the war the Reds killed about 1,400 people and the Whites summarily executed about 7,300 people. At the end of the Civil War, in May, about 13,000 men from the German army came to help the Whites and they seized the capitol of Helsinki from the Reds. Many Reds fled to Russia, but about 80,000 were imprisoned and sent to concentration camps. During the summer of 1918 some 11,000–13,500 prisoners died in these camps from starvation and disease. Only 113 Reds were executed after examination in court, but punishment had already been severe by means of acts of terror during the war.

In Sweden many smaller skirmishes occurred at the end of the eighteenth century. The reasons were many: the bitterness of the crowd against the aristocracy and well-off was behind most of the unrest in the capital, Stockholm, while the need to sell seed to distilleries in the years of crop failure in 1799 and 1800 caused several turbulent hunger-riots in many small towns.

The last large-scale peasant unrest in Sweden was the Klågerup Trouble in the southernmost part of Sweden in 1811. Peasants and agricultural workers had protested against the king's order to take 15,000 men for the army from the province of Scania. Soon, criticism was directed against the nobles and clergy. The peasants saw that they had to bear the burden of the continuing war. Demonstrations began peacefully, but soon turned to strikes, proclamations, and plundering of manors. There were about 1,500 people in peasant troops. Soldiers were commanded to calm the rebellion, but instead opened fire. About 30 rioters died and 395 were captured, of which 135 were taken to prison. Twenty rioters were sentenced to death and 43 were sentenced first to a severe corporal punishment and then to six-years' forced labor.

Several smaller skirmishes between crowds and police occurred in nineteenth-century Sweden. In 1810 Count Axel von Fersen was lynched by a mob during a funeral procession. The situation escalated into unrest and several people were killed when the military struck back against the crowd. In 1838 there were several days of street fighting in Stockholm because people wanted to free a writer named M. J. Crusenstolpe who had been jailed because of his criticisms of the king. Two people were killed in these actions. Ten years later, in 1848, the revolutionary situation in the whole of Europe could also be seen in the streets of Stockholm. In early March a large crowd went onto the streets and demanded reforms, the right to vote, dismissal of the king, and the founding of a republic. The unrest continued for several days. Finally, the king ordered a detachment of troops to open fire on the rioters. The result was tens of dead and wounded.

The climate in the North is severe and years of crop failure were common, especially in the mid-nineteenth century. The shortage of food caused remarkable food riots in many Swedish towns, for example in 1855 and in 1868. In the same year, 1868, in southernmost Sweden in the province of Skåne there were skirmishes between tenants and their landlords. The protests took such forms as day-labor strikes and court cases, but also violent clashes.

The strike of sawmill workers in Sundsvall in 1879 is seen as the start of the labor movement in Sweden. Workers in 18 sawmills went on strike and there were about 5,000 men in the largest crowds of strikers. With King Oscar's permission, the local governor ordered troops to the area. The eviction of strikers from their homes and the presence of armed soldiers finally put an end to the strike. There were lots of smaller strikes and unrest at the end of the nineteenth century and riots and protests at the end of World War I. These usually resulted from food shortage.

Norwegian society also saw some protest movements in the nineteenth century. A new silver tax and crop failure gave rise to a peasant march from Østlandet to Oslo in 1818. The leader of the peasant march was a wealthy peasant named Halvor Hoel from the county of Hedmark. The protest was stopped halfway by force; the leaders of the movement were fined and sentenced to prison.

In the mid-nineteenth century there occurred a significant movement of cottagers and landless people led by Marcus Thrane, the son of the director of the Bank of Norway. Influenced by pre-Marxist socialist ideas from Germany and Britain, he became the spokesman of Norwegian cottagers and landless people. Thrane founded local unions to promote the demands of the cottagers for better terms in their contracts with landowners. In 1850 there were 273 local unions with more than 20,000 members. A delegation of 100 participants took a petition to the government and parliament in Oslo. The main topics of the petition were manhood suffrage, restricting the cottager's obligation for day-labor to a maximum of four 11-hour days a week, and the possibility for a cottager to obtain his own holding. The government ignored the petition so that, finally, the situation was so inflamed that the military was sent into Oslo. The result was that 117 people were sentenced to prison.

The conflict between the Sami people – the original inhabitants of Lapland – and the Norwegian colonizers developed into a serious and violent skirmish in Kautokeino in 1852. A group of Sami attacked the Norwegian colonizers. The rebels killed the local merchant and police chief, burned the merchant's house, killed his servants, and whipped the priest and his servants. Violence was not generally accepted by the Sami. Therefore, the Sami people themselves seized the rebels. Two of the rebels were killed, and five men were taken to court. Two of the Sami rebels were executed; three were sentenced to forced labor. This Kautokeino Revolt is the biggest of the few violent responses of the Sami people to colonizing policies in Lapland and the only confrontation between the Sami people and Norwegians that led to loss of life.

Denmark was an absolutist constitutionalist state in the beginning of the nineteenth century. The king was an absolute ruler who made the law and took decisions. Liberal thought, however, entered Denmark in the first half of the century. The demands for liberalization of political society culminated in the turbulent year of 1848. The heated political situation in Copenhagen led the city government to march to the royal palace in a large crowd. A new government was elected according to the demands of the liberals. A constitutional assembly was founded and it prepared a new liberal constitution, which the king approved in 1849. Absolutism vanished virtually almost overnight.

Twentieth Century: From Right-Wing Protests to Leftist Sympathies

The Civil War meant that the new independent republic of Finland was sharply divided into two hostile camps. The Social Democratic Party, which had now adopted a reformist ideology, was able to take part in politics and the work of parliament. The revolutionary left had founded the Finnish Communist Party in Moscow in 1918, but it was prohibited in Finland. In the 1920s and 1930s there was a right-wing campaign against communist underground activities. The Lapua movement was founded to organize right-wing activities: the peasant march to the capital Helsinki in 1930 is perhaps the best-known event. Sometimes activities were violent:

communist-bashing, assaults on leftist politicians, and deportations of political enemies by car across the Russian border were common Lapua movement activities. However, deportation of former president K. J. Ståhlberg in 1930 aroused so much condemnation that this activity was stopped.

The Great Depression of the 1930s hit the Nordic countries hard. In Finland right-wing movements were able to suppress most of the protests of the labor movement. The so-called Mutiny of Mäntsälä in 1932 became a turning point in these right-wing activities. The Lapua movement claimed that the government had not done enough to hinder communists in the country. The mutiny started as a spontaneous event. Armed men began to gather in Mäntsälä village. Their aim was no less than to overthrow the government and replace it with a right-wing dictatorship. In Mäntsälä more than 500 men were armed, but in many other small towns armed men gathered as well. The situation was highly charged and a military coup d'état was near. However, the speech of President P. E. Svinhufvud, a well-known right-wing politician himself, saved the situation and the army in Mäntsälä was disbanded. Over fifty leaders of the movement were sentenced to imprisonment.

In other Nordic countries the dissatisfaction of workers with unemployment and the lowering of wages brought about many social and political protests. Many strikes, in Sweden and Norway especially, led to violent clashes between protesters and the military. In Norway the strikes were most common in 1921 and 1931. At Mensted near Skien, military forces were needed to restore order because of serious disputes between the strikers and employers at a dock facility. In Ådalen in northern Sweden, bringing in strike-breakers created a remarkable protest movement in the spring of 1931. Troops were brought in and for some unknown reason they opened fire on a protest march. Four strikers and a woman bystander were killed. The event shocked the Swedish general public. Rules for settling disputes in the labor market between employers and unions were agreed in Norway in 1935, in Sweden in 1938, and in Finland in 1940.

At the beginning of the twentieth century issues of defense were stirring people to collective action in Sweden. This was part of a political turn to the right among the agrarian peasantry. Conservatives demanded strong national defense and the lengthening of military service, which was anathema to social democrats. More than 30,000 farmers demanding strong defense policies gathered in the capital. The king's statement to demonstrators that the defense question should be solved immediately led to a political crisis. Despite a counter-demonstration of 50,000 workers, the government had to resign. Throughout the twentieth century social democratic governments channeled contention into political reforms and no significant protest movements arose.

The second half of the nineteenth century was a period of political stagnation in Denmark. The strong position of the Conservative Party in government blocked every attempt at democratization. Lower-class unrest was put down by means of legislation, use of the police, and censorship. Representatives of the Social Democratic Party entered "parliament" in the 1880s and the conservatives were pushed from power in 1901. The result was the democratization of Danish society. In 1915 a new constitution was established. It included universal suffrage, proportional representation, and the possibility of plebiscites.

Syndicalism was supported inside the Danish trade union movement. Therefore, strikes were very common in 1919 and 1920. Continuing demand for greater democratization led to a heated political situation in the spring of 1920. Dissatisfaction among the political left led the social democrats and communists to organize large-scale protests and demonstrations in Copenhagen, including outside the royal palace. Revolution was feared and establishing the republic was the topic of the day. The government had to bring troops in from the countryside to assist the police to keep the peace in Copenhagen. However, the Easter Crisis of 1920 – as it is called – was resolved without violence by means of long negotiations. The government resigned and new electoral law was established. A new government made several political reforms which strengthened the position of the common people in politics.

The Great Depression of the 1930s caused significant hardship for industrial workers and farmers in Denmark. Sometimes, as much as 40 percent of the workforce was unemployed. In Copenhagen there were large-scale demonstrations of workers and the unemployed, which the police sometimes broke up with force. Another significant protest was led by the right-wing LS movement (Landtbrugernes Sammenslutning) of farmers. Many farms were auctioned off in the early 1930s and most of the rest were in serious economic trouble. In 1935 the LS movement helped organize a massive protest in Copenhagen. Although the king and the government received a deputation from protesters, no specific help was offered. Farmers' protests continued with a dairy strike, but without much result.

In Iceland, threatened job cuts in the public sector led to violent riots in Reykjavik in 1932. Over twenty police officers were injured when rioting workers took over the town. Another clash occurred in 1949, when about 15,000 people protesting against Nato attacked the parliament building with eggs, mud, and stones. This led to hand-to-hand fighting with the police in the middle of Reykjavik. Protests in Iceland against the Nato military base in Keflavik continued until US forces withdrew in 2006.

In the aftermath of World War II, leftist parties and communists gained support in all Nordic countries, but this was a short-term reaction to the war. In Finland the support of Soviet diplomats for communist activities made the situation even more turbulent. In the town of Kemi in the northern part of Finland a demonstration by striking workers was met by armed police. In the chaos induced by violence and police gunshots two people were killed. Later, around 150 leaders of the strike were tried.

In Denmark, Sweden, and Finland the most significant post-World War II protest movements were probably those of the early 1970s, when political forces ranging from the center to the extreme left in all three countries found common ground in opposing the EEC. In Finland the agricultural politics of the European Union provoked a very uncommon and provocative protest march of about 5,000 farmers in Helsinki in 1999. Otherwise, Scandinavian welfare state politics have dampened social protest in all five Nordic countries.

SEE ALSO: Britain, Strikes, 1905–1926; European Revolutions of 1848; Food Riots; German Peasant Rebellion, 1525; Reformation; Socialism

References and Suggested Readings

- Adolfsson, M. (2007) Bondeuppror och gatustrider. Svenska Uppror 1719–1939 (Peasant Revolts and Street Fights. Swedish Revolts 1719–1939). Stockholm: Natur & Kultur.
- Alapuro, R. (1988) State and Revolution in Finland. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Barton, H. A. (1975) Count Hans Axel von Fersen: Aristocrat in an Age of Revolution. Boston: Twayne.

- Björn, C. (1981) Bonde, herremand, konge. Bonden i 1700-tallets Danmark (Peasant, Gentry and the King: The Peasant in Eighteenth-Century Denmark). Copenhagen: Gyldendal.
- Casanova, J. (2000) Civil Wars, Revolutions and Counterrevolutions in Finland, Spain and Greece (1918–1949): A Comparative Analysis. International Journal of Politics, Culture and Society, 13, 3: 515–37.
- Cederholm, M. (2007) De värjade sin rätt. Senmedeltida bondemotstånd i Skåne och Småland (They Enshrined Their Rights: Late-Medieval Peasant Resistance in Scania and Småland). With English summary. Malmö.
- Derry, T. K. (1973) A History of Modern Norway 1814–1972. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Derry, T. K. (1994) A History of Scandinavia: Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Finland and Iceland. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Gustafsson, H. (1994) Political Interaction in the Old Regime: Central Power and Local Society in the Eighteenth-Century Nordic States. Lund.
- Gustafsson, H. (2004) The Nordic Countries, So Similar and Yet So Different. In K. Katajala (Ed.), Northern Revolts: Medieval and Early Modern Peasant Unrest in the Nordic Countries. Helsinki: Finnish Literature Society.
- Johansson, K. (2004) “The Lords from the Peasants or the Peasants from the Lords”: The Dacke War and the Concept of Communalism. In K. Katajala (Ed.), Northern Revolts: Medieval and Early Modern Peasant Unrest in the Nordic Countries. Helsinki: Finnish Literature Society.
- Jones, W. G. (1986) Denmark: A Modern History. London: Croom Helm.
- Júliusson, A. D. (2004) Peasant Unrest in Iceland. In K. Katajala (Ed.), Northern Revolts: Medieval and Early Modern Peasant Unrest in the Nordic Countries. Helsinki: Finnish Literature Society.
- Karlsson, G. (2000) Iceland’s 1100 Years: History of a Marginal Society. London: Hurst.
- Katajala, K. (2004a) Against Tithes and Taxes, for King and Province: Peasant Unrest and Medieval Scandinavian Political Culture. In K. Katajala (Ed.), Northern Revolts: Medieval and Early Modern Peasant Unrest in the Nordic Countries. Helsinki: Finnish Literature Society.
- Katajala, K. (2004b) The Changing Face of Peasant Unrest in Early Modern Finland. In K. Katajala (Ed.), Northern Revolts: Medieval and Early Modern Peasant Unrest in the Nordic Countries. Helsinki: Finnish Literature Society.
- Kirby, D. G. (1979) Finland in the Twentieth Century. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Kirby, D. G. (2004) A Concise History of Finland. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Kujala, A. (2000) Finland and the Russian Revolution 1905. In Ethnic and National Issues in Russian and East European History. New York: St. Martin’s Press, pp. 103–20.
- Libæk, I. & Steineren, Ø. (1995) A History of Norway: From the Ice Age to the Age of Petroleum. Oslo: Grøndahl Dreyer.
- Lockhart, P. D. (2004) Sweden in the Seventeenth Century. New York: Palgrave.
- Maarbjerg, J. P. (1992) The Economic Background to “The War of Clubs.” Scandinavian Journal of History 17, 1: 1–24.
- Njåstad, M. (2004) Resistance in the Name of the Law: Peasant Politics in Medieval and Early Modern Norway. In K. Katajala (Ed.), Northern Revolts: Medieval and Early Modern Peasant Unrest in the Nordic Countries. Helsinki: Finnish Literature Society.
- Nordstrom, B. J. (2000) Scandinavia since 1500. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Paaskoski, J. (1997) The Russian Empire and its Western Borderland – Some Dimensions of Eighteenth-Century Russian Finland. In L.-F. Landgren & M. Häyrynen (Eds.), The Dividing Line: Borders and National Peripheries. Helsinki: University of Helsinki Press.
- Roberts, M. (1973) Swedish and English Parliamentarism in the Eighteenth Century. Belfast: Queens University Press.
- Sennefelt, K. (2004) Marching to Stockholm: Repertoires of Peasant Protest in Eighteenth-Century Sweden. In K. Katajala (Ed.), Northern Revolts: Medieval and Early Modern Peasant Unrest in the Nordic Countries. Helsinki: Finnish Literature Society.
- Sundin, J. (1986) Bandits and Guerrilla Soldiers: Armed Bands on the Border between Sweden and Denmark in Early Modern Times. In G. Ortalli (Ed.), Bande armate, banditi, banditismo e repressione di giustizia negli stati europei di antico regime. Venice.
- Upton, A. (1980) The Finnish Revolution 1917–1918. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Ylikangas, H. (1991) The Historical Connections of European Peasant Revolts. Scandinavian Journal of History 16, 2: 85–104.
- Zorgdrager, N. (1989) De Strijd der Rechtvaardigen, Kautokeino 1852. Religieu Verzets van Samen Tegen Intern Noors Kolonialisme (Campaign for Rightness: The Resistance of the Sami People against Norwegian Colonialism). Groningen.

Northern Ireland peace movement

Nada Halloway

The Northern Ireland peace movement began as the result of a tragedy and developed as a resistance to the violence that had gripped Northern Ireland. On August 10, 1976, Mairead Corrigan

Maguire, one of the founding members of the peace movement, experienced a personal tragedy when two of her nephews and one of her nieces were killed in a street in Belfast. The children paid the price for the constant battle between the British and the Irish Republican Army (IRA). On that day, a British army patrol spotted Danny Lennon, an IRA gunman, driving down a street in Belfast. The patrol shot and killed Lennon, whose car then plowed into the sidewalk, killing the children and severely injuring their mother and Corrigan's sister, Anne, who committed suicide in 1980. The deaths of the children shocked the people of Belfast and they realized that the killings had to stop. Betty Williams, who had witnessed the accident, contacted the Irish News and talked to its veteran reporter, Tom Samways. Williams's actions led to her friendship with Maguire and the development of the peace movement. Maguire also visited the Ulster Television Studios where she delivered an appeal for an end to the violence.

The two women met Ciaran McKeown when they were invited to take part in a current affairs program to be broadcast by Ireland's RTE, and organized weekly peace marches and demonstrations against the violence. The first rally, according to Maguire, was not a huge success as only about 1,000 people attended the rally. "But the astounding thing about it was that busloads came over from the [Loyalist] Shankill into the heart of [Republican] Andersonstown to participate. People came from very troubled areas" (Gilchrist 2006). It was obvious from the response to the rallies that people were in general getting tired of the daily violence. These weekly marches led to the formation of the Community of Peace People. The impact of these marches could be seen in the fact that the level of violence in Northern Ireland dropped by 70 percent after August 1976 and never returned to its previous levels.

The organization's platform then and now is "to build a just and peaceful society through non-violent means – a society based on respect for each individual" which "has at its core the highest standards of human and civil rights" (www.peacepeople.com). The aim of the Community was to help the Northern Irish people envision an alternative to the violence that had shattered their lives. While they experienced success, they were also attacked for their intervention in the public discourse. They were threatened and one member, Bridget McKenna, was shot in the face. Maguire's car was also torched in West Belfast. But Maguire and Williams continued their work. As Maguire has observed, she did not fear for their lives because she was "never a member of a political party . . . so [she] had no fear in that community" (Gilchrist 2006). Her apolitical stance continues to characterize the peace movement.

In 1976, Betty Williams and Mairead Corrigan Maguire were awarded the Nobel Peace Prize. The acknowledgment from the Nobel committee was quiet satisfaction that their vision for the future was one that was shared by many. One of those visions – the rejection of "the use of the bomb and the bullet and all the techniques of violence" (www.peacepeople.com) – rose from the genuine belief that their lives and neighborhoods had become battlefields and that they needed to regain a sense of normalcy. Today, Mairead Corrigan Maguire continues to work for peace. She remains an honorary president of the Peace People and has campaigned on behalf of Mordecai Vanunu, the Israeli "nuclear weapons whistleblower," and Aung San Suu Kyi. Betty Williams resigned from Peace People in 1980 but continues her humanitarian work.

In the end, it was the work of two women and their concern for their children, families, friends, and neighbors that highlighted the brutality of the campaigns in Northern Ireland. In creating a resistance movement that was community based, Mairead Corrigan Maguire and Betty Williams were able to appeal to their communities in ways that had not been done before. They offered their people an alternative to the daily cycle of violence.

SEE ALSO: Ireland, the Troubles; Irish Nationalism; Irish Republican Army (IRA); Irish Republican Army Resistance Campaign

References and Suggested Readings

Gilchrist, J. (2006) The Scotsman, July 28, p. 18.
www.peacepeople.com.

Norway, protest and revolution

J. Laurence Hare

Like much of Scandinavia, Norway's transformation into a modern nation-state witnessed relatively few of the violent revolutionary upheavals that rocked Western Europe. In explaining this phenomenon, some Norwegian scholars have pointed to the absence of catalysts for revolutions and polarizing forces such as strong class divisions and ethnic tensions. Others have cited the agrarian nature of Norwegian society or the country's long-standing liberal traditions. Yet there remain a number of unique aspects of the history of Norwegian protest that draw the interest of scholars, such as the impact of the pre-industrial Thrane movement on the development of European socialism and labor protest. Others include the integral role of the Norwegian independence movement not only to the emergence of Norwegian nationalism, but also to the development of liberal democracy, the labor movement, and the push for women's rights. Finally, the history of Norwegian resistance to the Nazis during World War II stands out as an important example of coordinated non-violent resistance and symbolic protest.

Until 1814, Norway was ruled by Denmark, first through the Kalmar Union of 1397, and from 1536 through a personal union with the Danish monarchy. Norway was thus deeply involved in the turmoil surrounding the insurrections against Denmark's King Christian II (1481–1559) in the early sixteenth century, which occurred alongside the advent of the Protestant Reformation in Scandinavia. In Norway, the convergence of these events sparked a war in 1529 between members of the Norwegian nobility and the church leadership, in particular Archbishop Olav Engelbrektsson (1480–1538). The struggle stemmed in part from local land disputes, but both sides viewed the broader Scandinavian conflict as a chance to pursue Norwegian independence within the Danish union. It was, in effect, the lack of a common vision for an independent Norway that prolonged the struggle and ultimately compelled Engelbrektsson and the nobility to take sides in the contest for the Danish throne. This was especially the case during the Count's Feud (Grevens Fejde) of 1533, which pitted the ousted Christian II against a new contender, Christian III (1503–59). Due to Christian III's well-known Lutheran sympathies, Engelbrektsson allied himself with Christian II, who had pledged to support the Catholic Church. By 1536, however, Christian III emerged as the winner, forced Engelbrektsson into exile in Holland, and mandated Lutheranism as the state religion of both Denmark and Norway.

One of the key consequences of the Reformation-era wars was a marked decline in the Norwegian nobility. As a result, there was little opposition to the continued union between Denmark and Norway aside from occasional and localized peasant disturbances directed at local officials. Indeed, it was not until the defeat of Denmark in the Napoleonic Wars that a new opportunity for independence arose. Under the terms of the Treaty of Kiel of 1814, the Danish king ceded Norway to Sweden. The Norwegians rejected the treaty and on May 17, 1814, held a constitutional convention in the town of Eidsvoll, where they named the Danish prince Christian Frederik (1786–1848) king of Norway. The moment of freedom was short-lived, as Christian Frederik fell short in his attempt to enlist foreign aid for the Norwegian cause from Great Britain and the United States. With little support, he was forced to abdicate in the face of a Swedish attack at the end of July. Although it was forced to accept the union, Norway nevertheless retained much of its constitution and kept its parliament (Storting). It also won the right to manage its own affairs on the local level. In practice, the Storting had little authority, and real power rested with the local bureaucracy. Such an arrangement favored the growth of liberalism in Norway and permitted middle-class officials to advance a program that included economic modernization and the extension of political rights.

The process of change, of course, was uneven at best, and the poor harvests and economic crises of the late 1840s fostered the emergence of a pre-industrial protest movement led by the journalist Marcus Thrane (1817–90). As the revolutions of 1848 swept continental Europe, Thrane organized a workers' association in the small town of Drammen. In the next year, the Thrane movement grew to almost 30,000 members across eastern and southern Norway. Modern scholars have since been interested in the movement not only because of the scale of its initial success, which drew support from nearly 10 percent of the adult male population, but also because of its broad social appeal. In addition to the well-documented links among Thranites from both the agrarian and urban sectors, Pryser (1993) has highlighted the strength of the movement's middle-class followers, which included large numbers of artisans and independent farmers.

The Thranites made a fairly moderate set of demands, including educational and legal reform and measures aimed at improving the standard of living of the lower peasant classes. More radically, they also demanded universal manhood suffrage. Following the example of the British Chartists, the Thranites directed petitions for reform to the Swedish king, a move that reflected the popular royalism of many lower-class Thranites and revealed the sense of paternalism indicative of the movement's pre-industrial character.

When the king rejected the petition, the movement grew increasingly radical, as more ardent members such as Halsten Knudsen (1805–55) began promoting socialist ideas and advocating revolution. By this time, the euphoria of revolution in Europe had diminished, and the more violent tone of the Thranite movement alienated many middle-class members. In 1851, the government felt strong enough to dismantle the movement and imprison Thrane and his closest associates. The Thranite era ended for the most part peacefully, but there were some violent final episodes, most notably in the town of Ringerike, where Knudsen's followers battled with police in the so-called Hatter's War.

Debate continues as to the relationship between the Thranites and the modern Norwegian labor movement. While some scholars have suggested connections between the demographic cores of the two movements, others have argued that the memory of Thrane's failure may have in fact hindered the development of organized labor in Norway. Among the first signs of the resurgence of left-wing ideology was with the appearance of the anarchist journal Fedraheimen (Home of the Forefathers) in 1877. The anarchist and communist movements maintained a presence in Norway until the twentieth century, reaching their intellectual apogee following the publication of Anarkiets Bibel (The Anarchist's Bible) by Hans Jæger in 1906, yet they never managed to achieve mass appeal. Socialist organizers struggled as well, in part because of the belated process of industrialization in Norway, which did not fully mature until after 1905.

Indeed, liberal groups such as the Venstre (Left) Party, which grew from a coalition of the rural and urban middle class, proved more successful at mobilizing workers. Venstre dominated Norwegian politics in the late nineteenth century with a platform that included government reform and a stronger Storting. As early as 1884, they organized both industrial and agrarian workers under liberal auspices with the formation of the United Norwegian Labor Association, and in 1898 with a successful drive to introduce universal manhood suffrage. As a result, the liberals managed to deliver many of the reforms desired among the working classes, which stymied efforts to lure workers into more radical groups. Above all, it was Venstre that led the push for Norwegian independence from Sweden in 1905, which Terjesen (1990) has claimed "acted as an obstacle to the advance and influence of the labor movement."

The rise in Norwegian nationalist sentiment had a more positive impact on the early feminist movement, which had been comparatively weak before the turn of the century. Women's emancipation initially appeared most prominently as a theme in literary circles, particularly in the work of Camilla Collett (1813–95), who raised the question of women's social roles in her 1854 novel The Governor's Daughters (Amtmandens Døttre), and later in the plays of Henrik Ibsen (1828–1906). In the public sphere, women had been creating independent charity and missionary organizations since the 1840s, although these groups at first had few political ambitions. The first political group appeared in 1884, when Gina Krog (1847–1916) led the way in founding the Norwegian Association for the Rights of Women (Norsk Kvinnesaksforeningen). Two successor groups emerged a short time later: the Association for Women's Suffrage (Kvindestemmeretsforeningen) in 1885 and the more radical National Association for Women's Suffrage (Landskvindestemmeretsforeningen) in 1898.

The breakthrough for these groups came in 1905 through an alliance with Venstre liberals in support of independence. The Norwegian suffragettes managed to enlist the aid of apolitical women's groups, in particular the Norwegian Women's Public Health Association (Norske Kvinners Sanitetsforeningen), to provide assistance in the event of an armed conflict with Sweden and, when the threat did not materialize, to use their mutual networks to support petition drives for separation from Sweden. Consequently, women made themselves visible as part of the political life of the new nation, and won complete voting rights in 1913.

Despite some tense moments, the negotiations between Sweden and Norway proceeded without bloodshed, and Norway became formally independent in the autumn of 1905. That same year, Norwegians held a plebiscite in which they elected to invite Prince Carl of Denmark (1872–1957) to take the throne as king of Norway. Taking the name Haakon VII, the new king assumed the throne in November. Even before its resurgence, the monarchy had been a key rallying point for building support for independence. In 1898, Sigurd Ibsen (1859–1930), who published the anti-Union journal Ringeren, authored an article calling for the establishment of a national monarchy as a way to win over both conservatives and liberals to the notion of separation from Sweden. It has been argued that the article changed the dynamics of the debate over the Union by offering the institution of monarchy as the solution to both the foreign and domestic impediments to independence.

Four decades later, the monarchy once again became an important national symbol as Norwegians faced German occupation during World War II. In the course of the initial attack on Norway on April 9, 1940, the king had managed to escape north and finally make his way to Great Britain. His flight at first engendered feelings of bitterness among Norwegians, but his refusal to abdicate transformed public opinion and allowed him to play an important role as a unifying force for the resistance and a tangible alternative to the pro-Nazi government of Vidkun Quisling (1887–1945). The Nazis inadvertently helped the resistance movement appropriate the king as a symbol of protest by prohibiting pictures or public references to the monarch. This led to one of the largest anti-Nazi demonstrations in August 1942, when thousands of Norwegians wore flowers in their lapels as a public commemoration of Haakon's seventieth birthday.

Such protest tactics were typical of the largely non-violent character of the Norwegian resistance following the country's military capitulation in June 1940. As in the case of occupied Denmark, the strategy was effective because it countered the Nazis' hopes for peaceful cooperation with Scandinavia. This was especially the case for the Norwegian resistance, which did not have to contend with an elected government and could apply the same tactics to both the Nazi administration of Josef Terboven (1898–1945) and the puppet government led by Quisling's Nasjonal Samling Party. Consequently, many protest activities, including the demonstration on the king's birthday, involved broad displays of national solidarity. Others were aimed at preventing the Nasjonal Samling administration from achieving legitimacy. Large numbers of Norwegian teachers, for example, signed a declaration in which they refused to join a new government association, leading to the detention of as many as one in ten teachers. Many civil servants, meanwhile, refused to swear oaths of loyalty to the regime, while judges resigned their posts to protest the politicization of the judiciary, and labor unions began staging strikes as early as 1941. There were also opportunities for ordinary Norwegians to resist by using a strategy known as the "Ice Front," which involved "quarantining" Nazis and Norwegians deemed to be collaborators by visibly shunning them in public places. These tactics depended on a well-organized network of coordinators and civilian leaders who maintained ties to the exile government, as well as an active underground press and access to broadcasts from Britain. Their success was measured not in their capacity to liberate Norway from within, but in their ability to hinder the normalization of the occupation regime while preserving the legitimacy of the prewar government.

Vidkun Quisling, the Norwegian politician and government official who supported Nazi Germany's occupation of Norway during World War II, was a fascist whose name became synonymous with Nazi collaboration. This cartoon, from the cover of the Norwegian family magazine Norsk Ukeblad of February 20, 1943, depicts a father teaching his son to ice skate. The boy, who resembles Quisling, cannot stand up on his own without the assistance of his father, resembling Adolf Hitler, who props him up like a puppet. (Courtesy of Norske Ukeblad)

The end of the war brought renewed strength to the Norwegian peace movement, which had long been a feature of national politics. As Norway cautiously revised its policy of neutrality and reconsidered its place in the international community during the Cold War, the numbers of Norwegians seeking exemption from military service as conscientious objectors increased to over 5 percent of the eligible population. The numbers spiked a second time during the late 1960s in the context of the student movement, which in Norway largely involved peaceful protests by both university students and concerned citizens against the Vietnam conflict and the threat of nuclear war. The same period witnessed a resurgence of anarchism through the writings of Jens Børneboe (1920–67), which became an important inspiration for new anarchist and syndicalist groups such as the Norwegian Syndicalist Federation (Norsk Syndikalistisk Føderasjon) and for the Norwegian squatters' movement in the following decade.

In more recent years, Norway has been the target of protests related to its whaling industry. Since the mid-1990s, Norway has permitted whaling in defiance of international bans and has joined Japan and Iceland in pushing the international community to lift restrictions. Although the move has spurred few protests within Norway, it has drawn criticism internationally from environmentalists and human rights activists and has led to formal protests from a number of western countries.

SEE ALSO: Denmark, Insurrection and Revolt; European Revolutions of 1848; Nordic Revolts and Popular Protests, 1500–Present

References and Suggested Readings

- Bjørklund, O. (1970) Marcus Thrane. Sosialistleder i et u-land. Oslo: Tiden.
- Blom, I. (1987) Women's Politics and Women in Politics in Norway since the End of the Nineteenth Century. Scandinavian Journal of History 12 (1): 17–33.
- Pryser, T. (1993) The Thranite Movement in Norway 1849–1851. Scandinavian Journal of History 18 (3): 169–82.

- Stokker, K. (1996) Hurry Home, Haakon: The Impact of Anti-Nazi Humor on the Image of the Norwegian Monarch. Journal of American Folklore 109, 433 (Summer): 289–307.
- Terjesen, E. A. (1990) Norway. In M. van der Linden & J. Rojahn (Eds.), The Formation of Labour Movements, 1870–1914. Leiden: Brill.
- Tønnesson, K. (1988) Popular Protest and Organization: The Thrane Movement in Pre-Industrial Norway. Scandinavian Journal of History 13 (2–3): 121–39.
- Wehr, P. (1984) Nonviolent Resistance to Nazism: Norway 1940–1945. Peace and Change 10 (3–4): 77–95.

Notting Hill Riots, 1958

Christian Hogsbjerg

Summer 1958 saw mass racial violence perpetrated by whites against black people in two areas of Britain, the city of Nottingham and, more seriously, in the area of “Notting Hill” in west London. The underlying causes were many and complex, but critical in working-class areas of London was a housing crisis due to “Rachmanism,” unaccountable racketeering slum landlords. Besides overcrowded, poor quality housing, black immigrants to Britain faced a “color bar” – racist discrimination in employment and public places. When the threat of unemployment raised its head in 1958, newly arrived migrant workers trying to make homes for themselves provided an easy scapegoat for racists.

By 1958, racist attacks were quite a common part of the black experience in London as groups of armed violent young whites went “nigger-hunting” in groups. Fascist organizations such as Oswald Mosley's Union Movement, the White Defence League, the League of Empire Loyalists, and the British National Party were active in Notting Hill. The dangerous rising tide of white terror reached a critical mass in August and September 1958, by which time serious attacks on black individuals, family homes, cafés, and community centers had become a daily occurrence. When warnings to black families to “clear out” and leave their homes were followed up with fire bombings, the failure of the authorities to act forced black militants to collectively organize resistance in self-defense. One night a local fascist headquarters was successfully hit, and the battle between black and white was joined.

Things reached a critical mass after August 31 when the police let an almost 400-strong “Keep Britain White” mob go on the rampage, smashing windows, and leaving five black men unconscious. From then on the police were ordered to keep the streets in the local area free of crowds, but white racists were able to continue their attacks in other areas of London. Eight months later, on May 17, 1959, Kelso Cochrane, an Antiguan carpenter, was stabbed to death in Notting Hill itself.

The British government’s response to the riots of 1958 was not to challenge the racism behind the riots but to institutionalize it, and in 1962 immigration controls were introduced in the Commonwealth Immigration Act. Yet the response from the black community to the white riots remains an inspiration. In 1958, Claudia Jones, a Trinidadian communist, had launched the West Indian Gazette, and the following year was to organize the now world-famous and celebrated Notting Hill Carnival. In the wider tumult of decolonization, formerly “British” subjects from the Caribbean found themselves forced to assert their West Indian identity in Britain and in the process led the way in imagining and shaping a new “postcolonial” culture.

SEE ALSO: Black Nationalism, 19th and 20th Centuries; Britain, Post-World War II Political Protest; Brixton Riots, 1981

References and Suggested Readings

- Pilkington, E. (1988) Beyond the Mother Country: West Indians and the Notting Hill White Riots. London: I. B. Tauris.
- Schwarz, B. (2003) Claudia Jones and the West Indian Gazette: Reflections on the Emergence of Postcolonial Britain. Twentieth Century British History, 14 (3).
- Sherwood, M. (1999) Claudia Jones: A Life in Exile. London: Lawrence & Wishart.

Nu, U (1907–1995)

Justin Corfield

U Nu (Thakin Nu) was a leading independence politician in Burma, and its first prime minister from 1948 until 1956, and then again from 1957 until 1958, and from 1960 until 1962. He was born on May 25, 1907 at Wakema and attended the University of Rangoon, where he gained his BA in 1929. Nu then turned to teaching and became the headmaster of the National High School in Pantanaw. In 1934 he returned to the University of Rangoon to study law and began his involvement in politics as president of the University of Rangoon Students’ Union, with Aung San (1915–47) as his secretary. The two were expelled from the university after an article critical of British rule appeared in their union magazine. The expulsion led to a massive university students’ strike in February 1936. This made Nu known all around Burma, and in 1937 he joined the Dobama Asiayone (We-Burmans Association), which had been formed in 1930. The members were known as the Thakins and Nu became known as Thakin Nu – in 1952 he announced that he would prefer to be known as U (Mr.) Nu.

In 1937 Nu founded, with Thakin Than Tun (1911–168), the Nagani (Red Dragon) Book Club, which was used to circulate Marxist classics around the Burmese literary community. Nu also founded the People’s Revolutionary Party (PRP), which was later reformed as the Socialist Party, and came together with other groups to form the Anti-Fascist People’s Freedom League (AFPFL). In 1940 the British arrested and jailed Nu for sedition, but he was released when the Japanese invaded Burma in December 1941. During the Japanese Occupation, Ba Maw (1893–1977) headed a pro-Japanese government with U Nu as his foreign minister. However, it was not long before he realized that the Japanese had no intention of giving real independence to the Burmese. This saw him ally himself with Aung San and the AFPFL. When Aung San and six of his cabinet ministers were murdered on July 19, 1947, the British were desperate for somebody to lead Burma to independence and with Aung San’s main rival, U Saw, arrested for organizing the assassinations, Nu was the obvious choice. As a result, when Burma was granted independence on January 4, 1948, U Nu became the first prime minister of Burma.

As prime minister, U Nu was an able and effective statesman; however, his government had problems with communist insurgents and ethnic minorities that wanted independence. The Pyidawtha (Welfare) program of 1948 included a Land Nationalization Act, but this was undermined by the low standard of living that resulted from the massive war damage sustained by Burma, and a decline in rice exports, which had been one of Burma’s main sources of foreign exchange.

U Nu managed to win the general elections in 1952 and again in 1956; however, on June 12, 1956

he stood down in favor of Ba Swe. On March 1, 1957 U Nu became prime minister again, but stood down for a second time on October 28, 1958, in favor of Ne Win. He regained the prime ministership on April 4, 1960, holding that office until March 2, 1962, when he was deposed in a military coup d'état organized by Ne Win. He was then held in an army camp near Rangoon for four years. On the pretext of going to India for a pilgrimage, and ill-health, U Nu left Burma in 1969 and went to India, and then to London. In the British capital, on August 27, 1969, U Nu held a press conference in which he declared that he was the legal prime minister of Burma. He then formed the Parliamentary Democracy Party and started leading an armed resistance against Ne Win. It never had more than a few thousand supporters at its peak, and eventually dwindled to several hundred. U Nu was eventually granted an amnesty and he and his wife returned to Burma on July 29, 1980.

U Nu, always a devout Buddhist, became a monk and kept a low profile until 1988 when he supported the pro-democracy demonstrations that came close to toppling the Ne Win government. However, the military remained in control of the country, cracking down on the pro-democracy activists led by Aung San Suu Kyi. U Nu died on February 14, 1995 in Yangon (the new name for Rangoon).

SEE ALSO: Aung San (1915–1947); Burma, Democracy Movement; Burma, National Movement Against British Colonial Rule; Saya San (Hsaya San) Movement of the 1930s

References and Suggested Readings

- Brooke-Wavell, D. (1995) Obituary: U Nu. Guardian (February 15): 17.
- Butwell, R. (1963) U Nu of Burma. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Tinker, H. (1967) The Union of Burma: A Study of the First Years of Independence. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Nuclear-Free New Zealand, 1987

Heather Squire

Nuclear-Free New Zealand was a campaign and social movement involving both government and civil society that succeeded in passing the

New Zealand Nuclear-Free Zone, Disarmament, and Arms Control Act 1987. Nuclear-Free New Zealand was part of a global movement against nuclear proliferation that emerged in reaction to the Cold War arms race in the early 1980s.

Since the 1950s, peace activists in New Zealand had been mobilizing mainly around two issues: fallout from nuclear testing (by the US, the Soviet Union, and France) in the South Pacific and US warships carrying nuclear weapons docking at ports in New Zealand. New Zealand condemned nuclear testing in the United Nations in 1959 in response to popular concern. Fairly regularly, protest fleets made of kayaks, boats, and surfboards would confront incoming US navy ships and submarines in an attempt to keep them from entering New Zealand ports. In 1979, such a protest fleet (organized by Peace Squadron) met the US submarine Haddo in Auckland port, and although it was not able to turn away the submarine, its spirited protest caught the imagination of the country and reinvigorated the anti-nuclear movement.

As the Cold War continued into the 1980s and Reagan's hawkish foreign policy (which included a naval build-up) took shape, New Zealand became more lucrative as a port of call for the US navy in the South Pacific. The prospect of increased nuclear activity in New Zealand's ports, as well as high-profile activism by groups such as Peace Squadron, Greenpeace, and the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament (CND), spread through the country, resulting in the formation of anti-nuclear groups within unions, universities, and local communities. A host of professional organizations, such as Scientists Against Nuclear Arms, emerged as well.

In 1980, the New Zealand Nuclear-Free Zone Committee was founded by Larry Ross, and a year later Peace Movement New Zealand was formalized as a central hub of information and some coordination for the host of anti-nuclear groups across the island. Together, these two groups helped to coordinate the two main actions of the anti-nuclear movement: declaring towns and municipalities (and eventually all of New Zealand) a "nuclear-free zone," and mass protest and direct action against the warships, both on land and in the water. Peace Squadrons continued to blockade ports and public protest continued to draw thousands of supporters. In 1982, tens of thousands of workers struck to prevent the nuclear warship USS Truxton from docking, and in 1983, 25,000 women staged an anti-nuclear rally in Auckland to support the International Women's Day of Action for Nuclear Disarmament. Maori groups participated in protests as well, seeing the nuclear issue as another appropriation of their independence, self-determination, and sovereignty by a colonial power. New Zealanders responded with enthusiasm, declaring homes, churches, and neighborhoods "nuclear free," and by 1984 more than 65 percent of the population lived in areas declared "nuclear free."

The year 1984 was also an election year, and the conservative National Party that had been in power lost to the Labor Party, which ran an explicitly anti-nuclear campaign. Newly elected Prime Minister David Lange immediately barred nuclear-powered or nuclear-armed ships from using New Zealand ports or entering New Zealand waters.

As a member of ANZUS (Australia, New Zealand, United States Security Treaty), New Zealand was expected to cooperate with the US in matters of defense in the Pacific Ocean; however, in 1985, New Zealand's staunch anti-nuclear stance led to a suspension of the treaty by the US over New Zealand's refusal to allow the docking of USS Buchanan, a US warship capable of launching nuclear depth bomb-equipped anti-submarine rockets. When the US refused to confirm or deny whether it had nuclear weapons on board the USS Buchanan, thousands of activists and workers sprung into action, fearful that the Labor government would succumb to pressure from the US. Some 15,000 anti-nuclear activists converged on Auckland, and the following day Lange refused entry to the warship. This bold move by Lange, coupled with the sinking of the Greenpeace protest vessel Rainbow Warrior in Auckland Harbor later that year and the 1986 Chernobyl nuclear power plant explosion, further emboldened the Labor government and garnered the support of the general population.

By 1986, an opinion poll revealed that 92 percent of New Zealanders opposed nuclear weapons in New Zealand, 69 percent opposed warship visits, 92 percent wanted New Zealand to promote nuclear disarmament through the UN, and 88 percent supported the promotion of nuclear-free zones (Dewes & Ware 2004). In 1987 the New Zealand Nuclear-Free Zone, Disarmament, and Arms Control Act was passed, which effectively made New Zealand nuclear free. The bill prohibited the entry into the internal waters of New Zealand within a radius of 12 miles (22.2 km) of any ship whose propulsion was wholly or partly dependent on nuclear power, and banned the dumping of radioactive waste within this nuclear-free zone. It also prohibited any New Zealand citizen or resident from manufacturing, acquiring, possessing, or having any control over any nuclear explosive device.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Nuclear Campaign, Britain; Anti-Nuclear Movement, Japan; Anti-Nuclear Protest Movements; Anti-Nuclear Protests, Marshall Islands; Greenpeace; Maori Indigenous Resistance

References and Suggested Readings

- Dewes, K. & Ware, A. (2004) Aotearoa/New Zealand: From Nuclear Ally to Pacific Peacemaker. Disarmament and Security Center. Available at www.disarmsecure.org/aotearoa_New_Zealand:From_Nuclear_Ally_to_Pacific_Peacemaker.html (downloaded August 11, 2008).
- Franks, D. (2007) Nuke Free New Zealand: The Real Heroes. Workers' Party (NZ). Available at workersparty.org.nz/spark-archive/nz-labour-party/nuke-free-new-zealand-the-real-heroes/ (downloaded August 12, 2008).
- Giugni, M. G., McAdam, D., & Tilly, C. (Eds.) (1999) How Social Movements Matter. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Smith, P. M. (2005) A Concise History of New Zealand. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Wittner, L. S. (2003) Toward Nuclear Abolition: A History of the World Nuclear Disarmament Movement, 1971–Present. Stanford, CA: Stanford University .

Nujoma, Sam (b. 1929)

Tilman Dederig

Sam Daniel Shafishuna Nujoma was born on May 12, 1929 at Etunda in Ongandjera district in the north of Namibia. Growing up in a traditional Ovambo household, the young boy tended the family's livestock and fulfilled other domestic duties. It was not before he was ten years old that he began to obtain a formal education by attending a Finnish missionary school. According to Nujoma's own account, he generally seems to have experienced his childhood as relatively undisturbed by disruptive outside influences. This changed when he moved to Walvis Bay in 1946. There he was not only able to immerse himself into the harbor town's cosmopolitan environment, but he also witnessed the harsh realities of migrant contract labor while working at a general store and at a whaling station. In 1949 he relocated to Windhoek, where he worked as an office cleaner for the South African Railways and complemented his rudimentary education by attending evening classes. In 1956 he married Theopoldine Kovambo Katjimune, with whom he would have three surviving children.

Windhoek exposed him even more unambiguously to the demeaning South African system of racial segregation. Conversely, his job with the railways also provided Nujoma with a degree of mobility, and he was able to visit Cape Town by 1955. Here he gained access to a wider world of communication networks and of political activists which alerted him to contemporary trends in decolonization in the Third World.

A number of politicized Namibians lived illegally in Cape Town where they had established contact with black and white members of a number of opposition groups. When the South African authorities found out that the group's spokesman, Andimba Toivo ya Toivo, had petitioned the United Nations (UN) to protest against the South African occupation, Toivo was deported back to Namibia in 1958. From this closely knit network the Ovamboland People's Organization (OPO) emerged in 1957. According to Nujoma, he decided in 1957 to become more actively involved in politics, although the precise circumstances of his political commitment during the period prior to the formation of OPO are not entirely clear.

The shift of OPO from Cape Town to Namibia coincided, however, with Nujoma's intensified political activities in Windhoek. In 1959 he became the organization's president. In the same year he joined the executive committee of the South West Africa National Union (SWANU), which was regarded as an umbrella organization for various Namibian opposition groups. Nujoma consolidated his leadership role when OPO was transformed into the South West Africa People's Organization (SWAPO) in 1960. Nujoma tapped into the political network which was at the time still dominated by traditional leaders, such as the veteran of the anti-colonial struggle, Herero Chief Hosea Kutako, and Nama Chief Hendrik Witbooi, the descendant of the renowned leader of the Witboois during the German colonial period. Inspired by their tenacious efforts in submitting complaints to the UN, Nujoma espoused the strategy of petitioning this international body. Submitting grievances to the UN in order to alert the world public to Namibia's occupation by South Africa became a mainstay of SWAPO's diplomatic campaigns. Circumventing the repressive pass laws, which hampered the unrestricted movements of Africans, Nujoma traveled all over Namibia. Apart from calling for a transfer of trusteeship from South Africa to the UN, he targeted the disruptive effects of migrant labor on the social fabric of indigenous communities. His activities not only attracted the attention of the police, but he also established a reputation for criticizing those chiefs who collaborated with the South African authorities.

After 11 protesters were shot during demonstrations against the forced removal of Windhoek's black population to Katutura Township in 1959, South African pressure on the opposition intensified. Nujoma left Namibia in February 1960 to commence what turned out to 29 years in exile. After a difficult journey all across the continent he arrived in New York, where he appeared for the first time before a UN committee in 1960 to report on conditions in Namibia. He set up the first SWAPO office in the Tanzanian capital, Dar-es-Salaam, in 1961. Nujoma built up a network of international contacts which extended from Africa to Western and Eastern Europe by the 1970s, attending international conferences and meeting representatives from the yet few independent states in Africa. In 1965 the Organization of African Unity (OAU) recognized SWAPO as the only representative of the people of Namibia, eight years before the status of the sole authentic representative was also conferred on SWAPO by the UN.

The period of decolonization presented Nujoma with an increasingly wider range of political and diplomatic possibilities, including international support for armed struggle. By the early 1960s SWAPO guerrillas were trained in Algeria, Egypt, Tanzania, and China. The year 1966 was an important date in the history of the activities of Nujoma and his collaborators. Nujoma tried to return to Namibia to disprove South African allegations that he had voluntarily chosen to leave the country, but he was put back on the plane by the South African police, who did not dare touch him. In the same year a small number of fighters of the People's Liberation Army of Namibia (PLAN) launched their first strike at Omugulug-Ombashe, initiating a prolonged military confrontation with South Africa. In 1966 the General Assembly of the UN called for the termination of South Africa's mandate for Namibia. In 1971 Nujoma became the first African leader of a liberation movement to address the UN Security Council. Through a combination of internal armed and political resistance and international diplomatic campaigns, Nujoma succeeded in consolidating SWAPO's preeminence in the struggle for Namibia's independence. During this period SWAPO relocated its main base to Lusaka in Zambia, but Nujoma pursued a busy schedule of shuttle diplomacy, constantly traversing large distances to keep the effort for national liberation on the internal agenda. Riding on the global wave of anti-colonial struggles, he was instrumental in transforming SWAPO from a marginal African movement that focused on petitioning the UN to a recognized player on the world stage.

In the wake of the sudden collapse of Portuguese colonialism in 1974, SWAPO was able to launch military strikes from Angolan territory. This period saw thousands of young Namibians fleeing into exile in order to join SWAPO, following a call to arms which Nujoma had broadcast from neighboring Botswana. After the Portuguese withdrawal, regional conflicts and global Cold War rivalry intermeshed and turned Angola into a battle zone of several warring parties, including South African and Cuban troops. SWAPO was drawn into an increasingly complex situation which pitted PLAN combatants against the South African army and against fighters of the rival Angolan National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA). The ferocious battles between the different parties in the 1980s finally led to a stalemate from which all the exhausted participants wished to escape. While SWAPO was largely excluded from the ensuing bargaining among the superpowers and their proxies, Nujoma and his associates succeeded in preserving the status of their organization as a key player in the international arena, without whom peace was impossible to establish. When peace negotiations finally led to the UN-supervised elections, SWAPO won a clear victory in the November 1989 elections to the constituent assembly. On March 21, 1990 Sam Nujoma became the president of the independent Republic of Namibia. In 1994 he was returned to the country's helm by an overwhelming majority. In 1999 he won a third five-year term as president after changes had been made to the constitution. After the presidency shifted to Nujoma's successor, Hifikepunye Pohamba, in 2005, Nujoma kept the influential position of the president of SWAPO until his retirement from that position in 2007.

Throughout his long and remarkable career Nujoma's politics were motivated by a visceral rejection of institutionalized racism and injustice, rather than by some ideological agenda. His leadership style, however, has been frequently criticized as authoritarian. Internal dissent which erupted among the ranks of SWAPO fighters during the 1970s was brutally crushed. The death and disappearance of large numbers of these dissidents, which became public in the early 1980s, is still a major concern among human rights activists in Namibia. In his autobiography Nujoma glosses over the dark side of the liberation struggle and gives short shrift to critics within the liberation movement who are routinely denounced as disloyal. During his terms in office Nujoma reacted swiftly to any challenges to his leadership. Critics have also argued that his outbursts against homosexuals grate with contemporary trends in democratic societies which prize minority protection. There is no doubt that Nujoma still enjoys enormous popularity in Namibia, but these and other ill-tempered comments in public reflect some of the problems which affect the transformation of African liberation movements into post-independence political parties.

SEE ALSO: Namibia, Struggle for Independence; SWAPO (South West African People's Organization); Toivo ya Toivo, Andimba (b. 1924); Witbooi, Hendrik (ca. 1825–1905)

References and Suggested Readings

- Hopwood, G. (2006) Guide to Namibian Politics. Windhoek: Namibia Institute for Democracy.
- Leys, C. & Saul, J. S. (1995) Namibia's Liberation Struggle: The Two-Edged Sword. Athens: Ohio University Press.
- Nujoma, S. (2001) Where Others Wavered: My Life in SWAPO and My Participation in the Liberation Struggle of Namibia. The Autobiography of Sam Nujoma. London: Panaf.

Nyerere, Julius (1922–1999)

Ayokunle Olumuyiwa Omobowale

Julius Nyerere emerged on the Tanganyika political landscape in the mid-1950s as the British prepared the country for political independence. Born on April 13, 1922 in Butiama village, Nyerere's father, Nyerere Burito, was recognized as a visionary who predicted the coming of the Europeans. And thus, when the first white man arrived, he was taken to Nyerere's father who confirmed that the white man was part of the new people he had talked about. Nyerere Burito was subsequently appointed a traditional chief by German colonial officials. After completing primary education in Tanganyika, Julius Nyerere went on to receive a diploma from Makerere University College in Uganda. From Makerere, Nyerere enrolled in the University of Edinburgh, where he earned a master's degree in the arts.

Though he had western training, Nyerere's ideology diverged from the oppositional capitalist and socialist worldviews of the Cold War. The system evolved around what he termed African socialism. Since the 1960s, Nyerere's initiative was quite novel in the context of global politics to the extent that Tanganyika (later Tanzania) became first and foremost associated with Nyerere as the personification of the nation. Thus, in the words of historian Ali Mazrui, "A major element in the mystique of Tanzania is, of course Julius K. Nyerere himself." Hence, starting from his ascension to power in 1961, to his voluntary relinquishment of power in 1985 after a 24-year rule, and to his eventual death on October 13, 1999, as well as afterwards, Nyerere remained a relevant factor in Tanzanian social and political development. Subsequent sections discuss Nyerere's nationalism and his transformation of Tanzania to a one-party state, an instrument he used to achieve his Ujamaa (community) socialism.

Ujamaa: African Socialism, Self-Reliance, and Non-Alignment

Nyerere's socialism was principally contained in two documents: Ujamaa: The Basis of African Socialism, released in 1962, and the Arusha Declaration of 1967. For him, African socialism had nothing to do with Marxism or with Soviet or Chinese socialism. Prior to the thoughts of Karl Marx, Africans had practiced their own form of socialism. Nyerere's socialist agenda was hence framed in the policy of the Ujamaa. It sought to ensure equality, cooperation, self-reliance, and Tanzanian development through collective production and ownership. Hence, the government nationalized multinational corporations, especially finance institutions, while also limiting the number of properties government officials could own. Furthermore, scattered settlements were brought together to form villages where collective production and ownership were encouraged.

At the level of international diplomacy, Nyerere appreciated the schism in international politics, with conflicting powers seeking allies while working against the interests of opponents. Not wanting Tanzania to be caught in the quagmire of international conspiracy, Nyerere opted for a policy of non-alignment while giving full support to the United Nations. Indeed, non-alignment might mean isolation from much needed foreign aid. Nevertheless, Nyerere opted for self-reliance, which required hard work, moderation, and forgoing luxuries as a means to reverse the country's poverty and underdevelopment. In short, Nyerere saw no hope in aligning with any of the Cold War superpowers. Rather, he preferred an inward-looking philosophy of development, which would be based on African ways of life, discard unfavorable aspects of the local culture, and adopt favorable innovations from abroad. Of course, Ujamaa, which eventually emerged as recourse to African socialism, was meant to be an indigenous way of channeling an independent course to development through self-denial and hard work by the entirety of the mobilized population, restructured into a classless whole, irrespective of political or bureaucratic positions held.

As laudable and seemingly workable as Nyerere's policy was, it began to fail soon after the beginning of the 1970s. Widespread poverty, a food crisis, and exploitation of peasants by government officials, as well as the nonchalance exhibited by the targeted peasantry, all contributed to the failure of the Ujamaa. Hence from a stance of self-reliance and cooperative ownership, the government of Tanzania started receiving several hundred million dollars in foreign assistance. In 1978, Tanzania received as much as US $800 million as foreign aid while also expecting as much as 50 percent of the US

$4 billion allocated for financing its 1977–82 development plan from foreign countries. In addition, the country invited 5,000 expatriates to the country and the private sector was permitted more active participation in the provision of services, while the government sector was dramatically eroded.

SEE ALSO: Charismatic Leadership and Revolution; International Socialism: Mass Politics; Kenyatta, Jomo (1893–1978); Tanzania, Protest and Independence; Ujamaa Villages

References and Suggested Readings

Ergas, Z. (1980) Why Did the Ujamaa Village Policy Fail? Towards a Global Analysis. Journal of Modern African Studies 18 (3): 387–410.

Hallet, R. (1974) Africa Since 1875. London: Heinemann.

Linton, N. (1968) Nyerere's Road to Socialism. Canadian Journal of African Studies 2 (1): 1–6.

Mazrui, A. A. (1997) Tanzaphilia. Transition 75/76: 162–73.

Nyerere, J. (1961) The Transition Profile: Julius Nyerere. Transition 2: 21–4, 30.

Pratt, C. (1999) Julius Nyerere: Reflections on the Legacy of His Socialism. Canadian Journal of African Studies 33 (1): 137–52.

Stoger-Eising, V. (2000) Ujamaa Revisited: Indigenous and European Influences in Nyerere's Social and Political Thought. Africa: Journal of the International African Institute 70 (1): 118–43.

Tordoff, W. & Mazrui, A. (1972) The Left and the Super-Left in Tanzania. Journal of Modern African Studies 10 (3): 427–45.

O

Oaxaca uprising, 2006

Gerardo Rénique

For almost six months in 2006, an unstructured coalition of workers, students, peasants, women, youth, indigenous peoples, and urban poor brought the government of the southern Mexican state of Oaxaca to a virtual standstill. Their massive campaign of non-violent civil disobedience – the biggest urban uprising in Latin America in the last 20 years – was sparked by outrage at the June 14 police offensive against an encampment (plantón) which striking teachers had set up three weeks earlier in the capital city's historic central square. Following the attack, Oaxacans came together to demand the resignation of Ulises Ruiz Ortiz, the latest in a series of famously corrupt governors from the Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI). Although the Oaxacan resistance was galvanized by the police offensive, distrust of Ruiz had been building since his appointment by the PRI-dominated state legislature, following an election in which federal electoral authorities had found clear evidence of fraud. His first year in office was marked by an aggressive campaign of political containment in which at least 36 opposition, community, indigenous, and grassroots leaders and activists were assassinated.

Since 1989, the teachers had staged a plantón each year as a negotiating tactic during the union's annual collective-bargaining drive. Spreading over 50 square blocks, the 2006 plantón – which served as a temporary home for some 50,000 teachers, many accompanied by their families – was the largest in many years. Familiar with the disruptions in commerce and traffic caused by the annual plantón, most city residents were initially either hostile or indifferent to the teachers' strike. But public opinion shifted rapidly after the violent attack on June 14, when the governor sent 3,000 police to beat and tear-gas sleeping teachers and residents in the plantón.

Contrary to its intended goal of isolating the teachers, the police repression generated an unforeseen outpouring of public outrage against Ruiz's government. After police destroyed the teachers' radio station during the attack, students occupied the university radio station (Radio Universidad) and opened the microphones around the clock. A week after the police attack activists called for an open assembly to rally support for the teachers' union. In the meeting, a broad array of popular organizations, including neighborhood associations, unions, indigenous communities, non-governmental organizations (NGOs), ecologists, artists, women, youth, and media activists coalesced to form the Popular Assembly of the Peoples of Oaxaca (APPO). From that point forward, what began as an act of solidarity with a teachers' strike transformed into a broad-based mobilization.

Following the formation of APPO, the teachers' plantón expanded to include a broad spectrum of political, religious, neighborhood, and social organizations. Thousands of Oaxacans from diverse walks of life joined teachers in sit-ins and human chains targeting local government institutions. Through such actions, APPO emerged as the central space for coordinating popular discontent and for defending neighborhoods, organizations, and activists from government repression and, in particular, from the caravanas de la muerte – death squads composed of government goons patrolling the city in police pickup trucks.

Eschewing traditional forms of vertical authority, APPO quickly took shape as a space for discussion and coordination among its various participating organizations and individuals. Although members differed in their assessment of strategies and goals, most agreed that APPO should function as a space within which its members could maintain their political autonomy. In this way, APPO – which brought together indigenous organizations, labor unions, human rights organizations, artists, anarchist collectives, feminists, ecologists, and street youth as well as a variety of communist and socialist groups and organizations – has contributed to a renewal of Oaxacan political culture. It has done so, in part, by creatively incorporating indigenous political forms like the consensual assembly, the philosophy that authorities should “rule by obeying” (mandar obedeciendo), and an agreement that no single leader or group should speak for or represent the movement. More than a governing body, the 30 consejeros (advisors) who sit on APPO’s Provisional Coordinating Council organize actions and disseminate ideas and information.

Among the more important forms of protest drawing together diverse participants were the “mega-marches,” which brought whole communities and organizations from across the state to Oaxaca city. With a crowd estimated at more than 400,000, the march on June 28, 2006 attracted the largest multitude ever in Oaxaca’s political history. Since then, despite government violence and assassinations, some occurring during the marches themselves, APPO has coordinated at least 12 other mega-marches.

During the early months of the insurrection, when Oaxacans still held out hopes that the federal government might intervene to unseat Ruiz, APPO launched several mass political actions designed to highlight the Ruiz administration’s inability to govern. Demonstrators closed Oaxacan state government offices and occupied the municipal police headquarters, padlocking its doors. Police forces vanished from the city streets.

Outside the city’s historic center, residential neighborhoods formed barricades at key intersections throughout the city to protect themselves from both the paramilitary “caravans of death” and thieves emboldened by the absence of state and municipal police. Established as a means of self-defense and security, the barricades quickly emerged as a crucial space for political discussion. Many were defended by workers, women, and youth who had never before participated in mass political actions.

Closed out of their offices and unable to move easily around the city, legislators and other government officials held furtive meetings in private residences and hotels where they felt safe from the daily mass mobilizations demanding an end to their hold on power. Ruiz eventually fled to Mexico City, where he set up office in a hotel and worked to guarantee federal government support. With both state and municipal authorities in hiding, APPO assumed de facto responsibility for the control and policing of public space. To counter delinquency and to control for government infiltration, APPO decreed its own laws on public order and security, festivities and celebrations, and mass mobilizations. In a bold move, popular organizations agreed to boycott the Guelagueta, an annual state-sponsored celebration of Oaxacan culture widely viewed as a cornerstone of the city’s tourist industry. Declaring culture a common good, the teachers’ union, with APPO’s support, organized an alternative and free Guelagueta in July 2006 and again the following year.

On August 1, 2006, thousands of women took part in a “pots and pans” march demanding that the governor resign. After women activists were denied airtime at the government-controlled radio and TV stations, they took them over. For almost three weeks they reconfigured public television to educate listeners about Oaxacan history and the ongoing struggle, to coordinate mass actions, and to broadcast the whereabouts of government goons and paramilitary patrols. Renamed Radio Cacerola (Radio Pots and Pans), the public radio station joined Radio Universidad in opening its microphones to callers. With the support of those involved in the media initiative, women coalesced to form the Coordinating Committee of Oaxacan Women (COMO). After government goons violently evicted the women from the TV and radio station and destroyed the publicly owned equipment, other APPO activists retaliated by briefly occupying all 12 of Oaxaca’s commercial radio stations.

Outside the city of Oaxaca, more than 30 communities recovered control of their municipal governments from corrupt authorities imposed by Ruiz. In indigenous regions with long histories of resistance, authorities and communal organizations pledged their support to the democratic struggle. In different parts of the state, APPOs were established at community, municipal, and regional levels. Abroad, organizations like the Binational Indigenous Oaxacan Front (FIOB), which has a strong base in California and elsewhere, joined with exiled members of the Indigenous Popular Committee of Oaxaca (CIPO) and Canadian supporters to establish an APPO in Vancouver. In late September 2006, in an attempt to gain momentum from growing public disapproval of Ruiz’s handling of the conflict and to pressure the Mexican Supreme Court to rule in favor of a legislative decree that would have unseated Ruiz, APPO organized the March of Dignity from Oaxaca to Mexico City. Along the lengthy route to the national capital, thousands lined the road to cheer, feed, and assist the marchers. In the city of Oaxaca, lawyers, doctors, artists, and intellectuals, as well as a number of businesspeople, voiced their support for APPO's democratic demands.

Bogged down in its own electoral scandal, the rightist PAN (National Action Party) government of then president Vicente Fox turned a deaf ear to Oaxacan demands and moved to consolidate its strategic alliance with the PRI by showing unwavering support for Ruiz. Finally, in late October, Fox mobilized the military and federal military police to repress the Oaxacan insurrection. In response, APPO launched a 48-hour strike and blockaded the main roads across the state. Paramilitaries descended on the barricades in an especially violent attack, during which Indymedia video maker Brad Will and two members of APPO were killed. On October 29, a force of 4,000 federal policemen, nine helicopters, 70 troop carriers, 15 combat vehicles, and at least ten anti-riot vehicles distributed in two columns destroyed many barricades, while elements of the army and the navy set up checkpoints in the most conflictive areas of the state. Two people were killed and more than 100 detained.

Defying the siege, members of Oaxaca's indigenous groups convened the Forum of Indigenous Peoples of Oaxaca, representing for the first time the state's 14 different indigenous peoples. The Forum called for peaceful resistance and the strengthening of APPO. Two days later, about 10,000 people marched to protest the federal police occupation. On November 2, as the federal police descended on the university, thousands rallied to successfully defend Radio Universidad. Four days later, with indigenous authorities at the front of the demonstration, thousands of APPO supporters again marched. Finally, during yet another mega-march on November 25, government agents who had infiltrated a demonstration provoked a fight with the federal police, leading to a bloody confrontation. More than 400 activists were detained and many others were forced to flee. The police randomly and indiscriminately beat, detained, and raped people in the streets. Teachers and activists were picked up from their classrooms and labor centers in broad daylight and sent to distant high-security prisons in northern Mexico.

Despite the government's massive display of force, APPO quickly regrouped. After a few days of cautious retreat, 5,000 APPO supporters marched on December 1, 2006, and again a week later, to demand the release of all Oaxacan political prisoners. Under the slogan "The fear is over," APPO organized its ninth mega-march to demand an end to the military occupation of Oaxaca. Then, in July 2007, APPO and Section 22 again organized a festive, participatory, and well-attended Guelagueta Popular, despite the government's refusal to allow the event to take place in the public auditorium.

The continuing resilience and creativity with which Oaxacans have met and moved past the paramilitary violence and police repression suggest that APPO, and the many other groups that make up the Oaxacan movement, will continue to play an increasingly important role in shaping the political ideals and aspirations of the region. Perhaps even more significant than the occasional public marches are the impressive number of meetings, discussions, assemblies, exhibitions, and workshops in which Oaxacans reflect upon their experiences and assess the challenges ahead. In the months since June 2006, Oaxacans throughout the state have met to discuss media politics, rights to water and other natural resources, cultural resistance, and the need for a new constitution.

In this respect it is important to remember that Oaxacans have not only actively contested the abusive policies of their current PRI governor, they have also launched a debate regarding the political future of Oaxaca. In this debate, APPO and other Oaxacan groups have insisted on moving beyond the limited temporal horizon of the electoral sexenio (six-year presidential term) to create forms of autonomous action and organization that can avoid being captured by either political parties or the state.

Driving this rejection of "politics as usual" is an understanding, gained from experience on the barricades and in the plantones, that politics is rooted in the social and ethical responsibilities of daily life, and in promoting new forms of social engagement, media activism, art, and democratic participation. The diversity of such initiatives, and the proliferation of spaces within which "politics" unfolds, represents a move away from vertical, party-like organizations. Instead, the discussions and political initiatives constitute the "spider's web" – as the Peoples of the Isthmus Regional Assembly aptly calls it – that binds together the diverse movements, initiatives, individuals, collectives, and organizations that give life to Oaxaca's democratic resistance.

This new approach challenges the network of PRI caciques, or political bosses, who "govern" through a combination of clientelism and violence. Following a call by APPO to cast a "punishing vote" against the ruling parties, the PRI was soundly defeated in the July 2, 2006 national elections by a margin of four to one in favor of the center-left opposition Party of the Democratic Revolution (PRD). Voters did not, however, hand the PRD a blank check. In the local elections of 2007, popular disillusionment with the Oaxacan PRD's support for federal police intervention and its failure to respect voters' preferences in the municipal primaries led to a record-setting 70 percent electoral absenteeism in the state. Although the PRI walked away with a pyrrhic victory, it had retained its control of state government with only a small percentage of the popular vote.

The Oaxacan struggle also speaks of the unique resilience and creativity of Mexico's popular political movement. Rather than taking power, APPO seeks a new mode of governance and a new constitutional regime that respects "human rights, indigenous communal life, and municipal autonomy." At the same time, it also struggles to build modes of political autonomy that do not depend on either state handouts or government recognition. It is here as well that the indigenous histories and cultures of Oaxaca come into play. As the state with the largest indigenous population in the country, the importance of the Oaxacan movement for understanding emerging popular politics resides in its ability to unite around principles of autonomy that are not restricted to either "identity politics" or the politics of recognition.

Although the defense of indigenous territorial and political autonomy, cultural rights, customary authority, and cultural patrimony is central to the Oaxacan political struggle, Oaxacan demands for autonomy are not restricted to indigenous communities or organizations. Like the EZLN in Chiapas, the Oaxacan movement goes well beyond the traditional domain of "ethnic politics" by acknowledging and incorporating indigenous political traditions and philosophies as a source of political renewal. Oaxacans have a centuries-long history of rebelliousness grounded in local struggles for municipal and territorial autonomy.

SEE ALSO: Indymedia Global Justice Campaign, 2000s; Zapatistas, EZLN, and the Chiapas Uprising

References and Suggested Readings

- Esteva, G. (2007) The Asamblea Popular de los Pueblos de Oaxaca, APPO: A Chronicle of Radical Democracy. Latin American Perspectives 152.
- Martínez, V. R. (2007) Autoritarismo, Movimiento Popular y Crisis Política: Oaxaca 2006. Oaxaca: Universidad Autónoma Benito Juárez.
- Osorno, D. (2007) Oaxaca Sitiada: La Primera Insurrección del Siglo XX. Ciudad de México: Grijalbo.
- Rénique, G. (Ed.) (2007) The Uprising in Oaxaca. Socialism and Democracy 21 (2), special section.

Obrador, Andrés Manuel López (b. 1953) and the PRD

Leticia Pacheco Espejel

Andrés Manuel López Obrador was born November 13, 1953 in Tepetitán, Tabasco, Mexico. He studied political science and public administration at the National Autonomous University of Mexico (UNAM). In 1977 he assumed office as director of the Instituto Indigenista (Indigenous Institute). Relocating to Mexico City in 1984, he became director of social promotion at the government's Instituto Nacional del Consumidor (National Consumers' Institute). At the same time he published his first books: Los primeros pasos (The First Steps) and Del Esplendor a la Sombra (From Shine to Shadow). After participating in the Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI) since 1976, he decided to join the Party of the Democratic Revolution (PRD) in 1989.

López Obrador gained fame in 1987 when he organized a social and political march to Mexico City known as el éxodo por la democracia (the March for Democracy) to protest election fraud when Salinas de Gotari (PRI) defeated the leading candidate, Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas (PRD), in an apparently fraudulent election. In 1995 López Obrador ran unsuccessfully for senator for the state of Tabasco. Between 1996 and 1998 he was president of the PRD. In 2000 he was elected head of government of the Federal District. The most important actions of his government were to promote neighborhood committees to strengthen citizens' self-administration, create a food program and free medical care for senior citizens, and provide scholarships for children from under-privileged families. The government also established breakfasts in schools, scholarships for the unemployed, and crime prevention programs, and coordinated an interinstitutional alliance with the Commission of Human Rights of the Federal District. It also founded Mexico City University and 16 preparatory schools in marginal areas of Mexico City.

In 2004, the PRI fought to undermine López Obrador's candidacy for president. López Obrador responded with a campaign of civil resistance and published his book, Contra el desafuero: Mi defensa Jurídica (Against the Lifting of Executive Immunity: My Legal Defense). López Obrador, with the Coalition for the Good of All and Felipe Calderón (PAN), were the most significant candidates for the presidential elections in 2006. The result gave victory to Calderón with a margin of 0.58 percent, in an election that was found to have irregularities in the voting process. López Obrador, with the majority of the population, insisted on a recount. Numerous protests formed and thousands of citizens remained for 48 days with López Obrador at the Zócalo (Main Plaza) of the city. At a National Democratic Convention, it was decided not to accept Felipe Calderón for president, and on November 20, 2006, López Obrador was proclaimed the "legitimate president" of Mexico.

SEE ALSO: Mexico, Labor Movement and Protests, 1980–2005; Mexico, Worker Struggles and Labor Unions, 1950s–Present

References and Suggested Readings

Revelez Vázquez, F. (2004) Partido de la Revolución Democrática. Los problemas de la insitucionalización. Mexico City: Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México.

Obregón, Alvaro (1880–1928) and the Sonoran generation

Bill Weinberg

The rise of the Sonoran dynasty represented the Mexican Revolution's Thermidor. It was a textbook case of Saul Alinsky's famous formulation: the have-nots being exploited as cannon fodder by the have-a-little-want-mores. It was led and typified by men of petit-bourgeois origins who resented the domination of the dictator Porfirio Díaz (1830–1915) and his favored oligarchs and administrators. The 1910 Revolution which toppled Díaz and brought Francisco Madero (1873–1913) to power was a balance between merely reformist and truly revolutionary forces. The second phase of the Revolution, beginning in 1913, would be characterized by an open contest between the "Constitutionalist" forces of Venustiano Carranza (1859–1920) and his Sonoran allies on one hand, and the peasant armies of Pancho Villa (ca. 1878–1923) and Emiliano Zapata (1879–1919) on the other.

This second phase opened after army commander General Victoriano Huerta (1850–1916), a reactionary holdover from the Díaz regime, ousted and killed Madero in a February 1913 coup d'état, establishing a counterrevolutionary dictatorship. A "Constitutionalist" army rose in the north to restore a legitimate regime, led by Coahuila's Governor Carranza. Proclaiming himself First Chief of the Constitutionalist Army, Carranza issued a "Plan of Guadalupe" – as narrowly focused on removing Huerta as Madero's 1910 "Plan of San Luis Potosí" had been on removing Díaz. Carranza was joined by Alvaro Obregón, the caudillo of Sonora and leader of the group later known as the Sonoran dynasty.

Obregón rose from modest origins to become Sonora's "Garbanzo King," with a hacienda and a factory where he manufactured a garbanzo harvester of his own invention. He entered the army with the Revolution of 1910, and fought for Madero against the counterrevolutionary Pascual Orozco insurgency in Chihuahua. Appointed by Carranza as commander of the Army of the Northwest, he seized nearly all of Sonora as well as parts of neighboring states by the end of 1913. The other major figure in the Sonoran group was Plutarco Calles (1877–1945). The scion of a great if declining Sonoran landowning family, Calles was a colonel in the Army of the Northwest, and won distinction by seizing the strategic railroad town of Agua Prieta on the US border.

The Sonorans were, from the beginning, clear on the limited nature of their revolution. "We have no agraristas here, thank God," Obregón said of his Sonoran domain, in a clear reference to Zapata's Liberation Army of the South, then seizing Morelos state. "We are doing what we're doing out of patriotism and to avenge the death of Sr. Madero."

But in Chihuahua, the third northern state to join the rebel alliance, a very different kind of revolutionary came to power. Francisco "Pancho" Villa raised the Constitutionalist Army's Division of the North – attracting legions from among the disenfranchised and expropriating the vast holdings of the state's cattle barons. While officially recognizing Carranza's leadership, Villa, with a far more radical program, soon became the real master of Chihuahua. His army of peasants and peons was the backbone of the northern revolutionary forces.

The Constitutionalist government established its headquarters at Hermosillo, the capital of Sonora, and began pushing south into Durango and toward Mexico City. In February 1914, Woodrow Wilson, alienated by the crude Huerta, lifted the Mexican arms embargo. US war matériel started flowing to the Constitutionlists. Soon, Huerta was besieged – by Zapata in the south and by Villa and the Constitutionalist Army in the north.

The fall of Huerta in August coincided with Villa's long-building break with Carranza and Obregón. Fearing the growing power of his peasant army and agrarian agenda, Obregón beat Villa to the capital by halting coal deliveries to the commandeered freight trains which moved Villista troops across the desert. But with the Constitutionalist alliance crumbling, governing would be more difficult.

The Aguascalientes Convention of October brought together delegates from revolutionary forces throughout Mexico to hash out a common government. Carranza and Zapata both stayed away, while Villa camped outside the city, only appearing at the convention's end to sign the final agreement. Obregón was the most prominent figure on the floor. Yet it was the Villista and Zapatista delegates who prevailed. The Sovereign Revolutionary Convention government declared in the final agreement, under the interim presidency of Eulalio Gutiérrez (1881–1939), embraced most points of Zapata's Plan of Ayala – most prominently, redistribution of lands from oligarchs to peasants. However, Obregón shrewdly remained neutral rather than sticking up for Carranza – the first sign of his astute tilt to the left.

In November, Carranza's isolated government evacuated Mexico City as the new Army of the Convention – made up mostly of the Villista and Zapatista forces – advanced on the capital. The US, which had been occupying Veracruz since April, pulled out of the Gulf Coast port just in time for Carranza, Obregón, and the Constitutionalist Army to take refuge there.

In December, the Villistas and Zapatistas took Mexico City. But after their troops had been masters of the capital for mere days, they withdrew. By the end of January, the Constitutionlists were back in the capital. Obregón, pursuing the Villistas northwards into El Bajío at the head of a newly dubbed "Operational Army," had learned the lessons of the trench warfare then underway in Europe. At the April battle of Celaya, Villa's waves of horsemen, who had been so effective against Huerta's federal forces at Juárez and Torreón, were cut down by Obregón's machine guns. The badly beaten Villistas retreated to Chihuahua – only to find that Constitutionlists had assumed control there and placed a price on Villa's head. He was reduced to guerilla insurgency.

Carranza had learned that maintaining power would entail more than mere fealty to Madero's liberal Plan of San Luis Potosí. But his "agrarian reform," which empowered military chieftains to distribute land ("fee simple" rather than as village property), was openly corrupt. As Friedrich Katz points out, the old landed elite of the Díaz era was increasingly replaced by a "new Carranza bourgeoisie," as Constitutionalist generals accrued new rural empires. Meanwhile, Calles, who had been left as military governor of Sonora, successfully defended Agua Prieta from Villa's attempt to take it in November. He also employed repression against the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) and like-minded radical unionists in Sonora's mines, farms, and factories.

Back in Mexico City after his Bajío victories over Villa, Obregón was Carranza's real political chief. He deftly consolidated Constitutionalist gains, playing the urban workers against the insurrectionary peasants. He reopened the Casa del Obrero Mundial, an organization founded by anarchosyndicalists in 1912 and closed by Huerta. Casa militants were recruited by Obregón into "Red Battalions" to fight Villa and Zapata. Obregón, who had lost an arm fighting Villa's forces, portrayed the Villistas and Zapatistas as "reactionaries." The Casa accepted this line, despite the best efforts of Antonio Díaz Soto y Gama, Zapata's liaison to the urban movement.

The movement was betrayed in the summer of 1916, when the Casa called a general strike to press the Constitutionals on their promises. The strike was broken, the leaders threatened with execution for violating "public order." Martial law was declared in Mexico City and the Casa was crushed. "As soon as Carranza felt himself the master of the situation, he kicked overboard his old friends, the working men," remarked the anarchist Enrique Flores Magón from exile. The strategy, however, had really been the fruit of Obregón's mind.

Carranza's new constitution, adopted in 1917, was nonetheless shaped by the pressure of populists and the left. Article 27 declared the nation as original owner of all lands and waters, including subsoil rights. *Ejid*os and other public or communal properties were protected as "inalienable and imprescriptible." Article 123 guaranteed the eight-hour day and minimum wage, abolished child and debt labor, and upheld the right to strike. Carranza simultaneously dispatched General Pablo González to finally crush the "Zapata rabble," waging a counter-insurgency war in Morales as brutal as that of Huerta before him. On April 10, 1919, Zapata was gunned down in a treacherous ambush. With the populist forces in retreat, Carranza started returning much confiscated land to former owners throughout Mexico. The "new Carranza bourgeoisie" was closing ranks with surviving elements of the old Díaz bourgeoisie.

This – together with Carranza's mobilization of federal troops to Sonora to put down labor unrest and the ongoing Yaqui Indian revolt, in what was perceived as an affront to states' rights – finally brought an open split between Carranza and Obregón, who left Mexico City for his home state in early 1920. In April, he pronounced the Plan of Agua Prieta – as single-mindedly focused on Carranza's removal as Carranza's own Guadalupe Plan had been on Huerta's. In a "strike of the generals," regional military commanders came over en masse to Obregón. Carranza was ousted by Obregonistas in May 1920, and killed in flight to Veracruz.

An interim government led by Adolfo de la Huerta – Obregón's appointee, and another son of Sonora's landowning class – made offers to the forces still in rebellion. The Zapatistas laid down their arms with promises of being able to keep all occupied lands. Obregón became president in September elections – the first in Mexico since Madero was fraudulently denied the victory by Díaz a decade earlier, sparking the Revolution.

Obregón was still proving himself adept at exploiting populism. A pact with the new Regional Confederation of Mexican Labor (CROM), and a stepped-up agrarian reform, helped secure his victory. "The principal purpose of socialism," he declared, "is to extend a hand to the downtrodden in order to establish a greater equilibrium between capital and labor." In other words, historian James Cockcroft notes, "it could be co-opted for other than its avowed purpose." The machine being consolidated through such politics was the foundation of the one-party state that would rule Mexico through the end of the century.

Meanwhile, the secretive Bucareli Accords gave back to US investors much of what the "revolutionary" government appeared to take away. As the price of US recognition, Obregón agreed to minimum reimbursements on expropriated US properties, and to refrain from expropriating oil companies as long as they developed their leases instead of speculating. De la Huerta, now Obregón's finance minister, sat down with Mexico's foreign creditors – represented by Thomas Lamont of JP Morgan – to sign the Lamont-de la Huerta Treaty, in which Mexico recognized a debt of the then-enormous sum of $700 million.

In 1923, Obregón chose Plutarco Calles, his interior minister, as his favored successor – sparking a short-lived military rebellion by the bypassed de la Huerta and some generals who followed him. The seesawing between left and right continued under Calles – with Obregón still in the background, although ostensibly retired to his Sonora hacienda.

In 1926, Calles supported the liberal Juan Sacasa (1874–1946) against the conservative Adolfo Díaz (1875–1964) in Nicaragua, who was then being backed by US Marines, and even sent ships in a token effort to defend Nicaragua's coast from US gunboats. Yet in 1927, he approved a force of federal troops – personally led by Obregón – to finally put down the Yaqui rebellion in Sonora. This constituted a grave betrayal, as the Yaquis had been lured into fighting for the Constitutionals on promises of having their traditional lands titled.

Calles slowed the agrarian reform and launched the National Revolutionary Party, marking the official beginning of Mexico's one-party system. His zealous anti-clerical measures resulted in the Cristero Rebellion, a rural Catholic insurgency centered in the Bajío region, which ended with a truce in 1929 after considerable bloodshed.

In 1928, Obregón announced his intention to run for the presidency again – and succeeded in getting the constitution changed to allow him to do so, suspending the “no reelection” provision (seen as a key gain of the Revolution) for a candidate who had been out of office for a term. But in July, he was assassinated by a Catholic militant while campaigning in Mexico City. There were inevitable rumors that Calles was behind the assassination, but he wisely declined to remain in power, agreeing with his top generals to support Emilio Portes Gil (1890–1978), the former governor of Tamaulipas, as president. But Calles remained the real power behind Portes Gil – more blatantly than Obregón had been the power behind Calles.

As so-called “Jefe Maximo,” Calles controlled a succession of three puppet “interim presidents” – Portes Gil, Pascual Ortiz Rubio, and Abelardo Rodríguez – while reliable electoral mechanisms were established. Ortiz Rubio's 1932 resignation was apparently on Calles's orders, and followed his being wounded in an assassination attempt which popular rumor blamed on Calles.

The ruling machine, now renamed that Mexican Revolutionary Party, was still ten years away from its final appellation of the Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI, adopted 1946). But the basic elements of the PRI state were established in the 1930s. The system would eventually be formalized around six-year presidential terms, with no reelection, but a presidential succession determined by the party elite in a ritual known as the dedazo, or “fingering,” then legitimized in a thoroughly controlled election. With the formal trappings of democracy, the PRI state would become known as “the perfect dictatorship.” Calles established another presidential tradition by becoming one of the richest men in Mexico.

But Calles's real chosen successor (formally elected, not merely “interim”) surprised him by moving sharply to the left – and truly crafted the centralized leviathan. The final indispensable element of the PRI state was corporatism – “incorporation” of popular struggles into the apparatus of the ruling party. The architect of PRI corporatism, Lázaro Cárdenas (1895–1970) – a Constitutionalist general who had fought the Villistas in Sonora, occupied the Tampico oil fields, and served as governor of Michoacán – became president in 1934. Cárdenas really reinstated the agrarian reform, finally breaking up haciendas and turning them over to ejidos. He also oversaw the founding of the Mexican Workers' Confederation (CTM), the mammoth industrial union, and the National Campesino Confederation (CNC) – built on the armed peasant organizations surviving from the Revolution, but now an instrument for delivering campesino votes and loyalties to the ruling party in exchange for access to land and credit.

These measures alienated Calles, who was then moving in precisely the opposite direction. While Cárdenas was one of the few world leaders to support the Loyalists when the Spanish Civil War broke out in 1936, Calles denounced the Spanish Republic on anti-communist grounds, and increasingly flirted with fascism. Cárdenas dispatched him into exile in California. Although he was allowed to return to Mexico when the PRI tilted back to the right again under Manuel Avila Camacho in 1941, this exile marked a final end of the Sonoran dynasty. Together with the 1938 nationalization of the oil industry, Cárdenas's populist programs effected the final “institutionalization” of the Mexican Revolution – and marked a break with the Sonoran dynasty's opportunist legacy.

SEE ALSO: Cárdenas, Lázaro (1895–1970); Casa del Obrero Mundial; Cristero Uprising, Mexico, 1928; Díaz Soto y Gama, Antonio (1880–1967); Madero, Francisco (1873–1913); Magón, Ricardo Flores (1874–1922) and the Magonistas; Mexican Revolution of 1910–1921; Villa, Pancho (ca. 1878–1923) and the Division of the North; Zapata, Emiliano (1879–1919) and the Comuna Morelense; Zapatismo

References and Suggested Readings

- Aguilar, C. & Lorenzo, M. (1993) In the Shadow of the Mexican Revolution: Contemporary Mexican History, 1910–1989. Austin: University of Texas Press.
- Cockcroft, J. (1990) Mexico: Class Formation, Capital Accumulation, and the State. New York: Monthly Review Press.
- Gilly, A. (2005) The Mexican Revolution: A People's History. New York: New Press.

- Hamilton, N. (1982) The Limits of State Autonomy: Post-Revolutionary Mexico. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Katz, F. (1982) The Secret War in Mexico: Europe, the United States, and the Mexican Revolution. Chicago: University Press of Chicago.
- Knight, A. (1986) The Mexican Revolution. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press.
- Krauze, E. (1997) Mexico: Biography of Power. New York: HarperCollins.

O'Brien, Bronterre (1805–1864)

Paul A. Pickering

Radical journalist James O'Brien was born in County Longford, Ireland and educated at a progressive school in Lovell Edgeworth and Trinity College, Dublin. After studying law at King's Inns, he removed to England where he was soon drawn into the world of politics. He joined the Radical Reform Association and met the leading radicals of the day, Henry Hunt and William Cobbett. Under the pseudonym Bronterre, he began contributing articles to the Poor Man's Guardian, a popular radical newspaper edited by Henry Hetherington.

When Hetherington was imprisoned in the struggle for a free press, O'Brien, who was influenced by the French Revolution, especially the nascent socialist ideas of the Parisian revolutionary Gracchus Babeuf, took over the editorship of the Guardian and began publishing his translations of Babeuf's writings there. He also published an English translation of Philip Buonarotti's account of Babeuf and the Conspiracy of Equals. Believing that cheap newspapers were a vital weapon in the campaign for political reform and an essential source for the political education of the people, O'Brien also helped Hetherington to produce other unstamped newspapers, including The Destructive and the London Dispatch. In 1837 O'Brien began his own venture: Bronterre's National Reformer, avoiding prosecution by presenting opinion rather than reporting the news.

In 1838 O'Brien became one of the "Irish O's" (the other was Feargus O'Connor) at the head of the Chartist campaign for democratic political reform. After the National Reformer ceased publication, O'Brien began contributing leading articles to O'Connor's Northern Star. He also published his own Chartist newspaper, The Operative, and undertook numerous speaking engagements throughout Britain, leading to his first serious brush with the law. In 1840 he was arrested, convicted of sedition, and sentenced to 18 months in Lancaster Prison.

When O'Brien was released he publicly disagreed with O'Connor over both strategy and policy. In 1841 the two leaders disagreed over election tactics, and they bitterly clashed after O'Brien lent his support to the Complete Suffrage Union, a rival campaign for political reform based on an alliance with the middle class.

O'Brien continued to publish newspapers, including the British Statesman in 1842 and a revival of the Poor Man's Guardian with Hetherington in 1843. In 1844 he revived the National Reformer. After the failure of these newspapers O'Brien concentrated on writing for other publications and became a familiar figure on the metropolitan lecture circuit. In 1851 he opened the Eclectic Institute in Soho which became a home for adult education as well as advanced ideas in politics and religion. He died in poverty in December 1864.

SEE ALSO: Babeuf, François-Noel (1760–1797) and the Conspiracy of Equals; Cobbett, William (1763–1835); Hunt, Henry "Orator" (1773–1835); O'Connor, Feargus (1796–1855)

References and Suggested Readings

- Plummer, A. (1971) Bronterre: A Political Biography of Bronterre O'Brien. London: Allen & Unwin.
- Taylor, M. (2004) O'Brien, James [Bronterre O'Brien] (1804–1864). In The Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

O'Connell, Daniel (1775–1847)

William H. Mulligan, Jr.

Daniel O'Connell, a member of the traditional Gaelic aristocracy, was an Irish patriot and nationalist. He emerged as one of the leading Irish political leaders during the first half of the nineteenth century. O'Connell advocated non-violent nationalism and furthered attempts to mobilize the Catholic community as a political force for independence.

O'Connell was born on August 6, 1775, at Carhan, Cahirciveen, County Kerry, Ireland.

His Uncle Daniel was a general in the French army and another uncle, Maurice, was The O'Connell, head of the name in the old Gaelic aristocracy. The O'Connells had managed to hold onto their land despite confiscations and the penal laws. As a child, O'Connell lived for a time with peasant families, as was customary among the old Gaelic elite, becoming fluent in the Irish language and familiar with the condition of the landless peasantry.

Because of restrictions on the education of Roman Catholics, O'Connell went to France to study, first at St. Omer and then at Douai. The French Revolution interrupted his studies, and by all accounts the violence of the Revolution deeply affected young O'Connell. Relaxation of the restrictions on Roman Catholics allowed him to read law, first at Lincoln's Inn in London, and then at the King's Inn in Dublin. In 1798, he was called to the Irish bar as a barrister. He quickly established a successful practice, and his Uncle Maurice named him as heir to his title and income, making him financially independent.

Because the authorities suspected him of United Irish sympathies following the Great Rebellion of 1798, O'Connell withdrew to the relative safety of Kerry until the situation in Ireland stabilized. Again, the violence of the Rebellion on both sides appalled O'Connell, who does not appear to have played an active role in the rising. In 1800, however, he was a very visible opponent of the Act of Union, which ended even nominal independence of Ireland, and became increasingly active politically. By 1805, he was a prominent supporter of Catholic emancipation – equal political and civil rights for all, regardless of religious affiliation – and was the leading opponent of what was known as “the Veto” – the British crown's right to veto appointments of the Roman Catholic hierarchy in Ireland. The debate over the Veto split opponents of the Act of Union, as well as Catholics in Ireland. O'Connell emerged from the debate as the clear leader of Catholic Ireland.

In 1823 O'Connell formed the first of several mass membership organizations, the Catholic Association, which was the prototype for others that followed. Roman Catholic priests received free membership, and dues were collected after mass. Full membership was priced at one guinea, which for the most part limited it to the emerging Catholic middle class. Associate membership, however, was available for a penny a month, making it possible for the masses to join. Within a year, the Association had nearly 960,000 members. The income funded the Association's activities and allowed it to assist members who had been victimized (often by being evicted from their land) for their involvement. When the Catholic Association was outlawed in 1825, a New Catholic Association, organized in the same way, was in place within a few months.

In 1828 O'Connell stood for parliament in County Clare and received two-thirds of the vote, but was denied his seat because he was a Roman Catholic. He won reelection, which stimulated the passage of the Roman Catholic Relief Act of 1829 allowing Catholics to sit in parliament. By 1832, O'Connell was the leader of a loosely organized faction within parliament of 39 members pledged to repeal the Act of Union.

With Catholics sitting in parliament, the central demand of Catholic emancipation had been won, whereupon O'Connell turned his attention to repeal of the Act of Union. In 1840 he organized the National Repeal Association, following the model of the Catholic Association, to mobilize popular support. The principal tactic was large outdoor meetings that brought hundreds of thousands of people together to demand repeal. O'Connell would begin addressing the rallies in English and then switch to Irish to confound the government agents in the crowd. O'Connell's “monster meetings” drew huge crowds and alarmed the authorities. The National Repeal Association was suppressed and quickly replaced by the Loyal Repeal Association. In 1843 O'Connell announced a monster meeting to be held at Clontarf, the site of the battle in 1014 where, according to popular belief, Irish King Brian Boru drove the Vikings out of Ireland. Amid fears of violence, O'Connell gave in to pressure from the government and cancelled the meeting.

The cancellation of the Clontarf meeting brought the conflict between O'Connell and the emerging Young Ireland movement to a head. There were a number of differences between O'Connell and Young Ireland, but the two most important were Young Ireland's refusal to disavow violence as a potential tool for Irish freedom, and its advocacy of an Irish nationalism that included all religious traditions. While O'Connell never explicitly linked Irishness and Catholicism, much of his base was built on advancing Catholic interests. The longer he served in parliament, the more committed he became to a political, rather than an armed, solution to Irish freedom. His support for separation from England was weakened by a growing respect for the British constitutional system during his service in parliament. He also came to perceive the cause of Irish Catholics for civil liberties as part of a larger struggle for human freedom, leading him to advocate the abolition of slavery, among other reforms.

In 1844, in spite of his efforts at conciliation, O'Connell was arrested for sedition and imprisoned. After three months the House of Lords reversed his conviction, but the period of incarceration had broken his health. After 1844, O'Connell was no longer fully committed to repeal, arguing that the Westminster parliament could provide the reforms needed in Ireland. In 1846, O'Connell demanded that all members of the Loyal Repeal Association renounce violence. His break with Young Ireland was complete.

O'Connell's heroic legacy is secure; he is widely revered in Ireland as "the Liberator" for his role in winning Catholic emancipation. Nationalists of a radical stripe, however, view him in a more critical light, echoing the denunciations leveled against him not only by the Young Ireland militants, but also by the Irish leader of the powerful working-class Chartist movement in England, Feargus O'Connor. James Connolly, for example, in his seminal Labour in Irish History, entitled his account of O'Connell's career "A Chapter of Horrors: Daniel O'Connell and the Working Class," and charged that O'Connell "gradually developed into the most bitter and unscrupulous enemy of trade unionism Ireland has yet produced" as he "attracted to himself more and more of the capitalist and professional classes in Ireland, and as he became more necessary to the schemes of the Whig politicians in England."

In 1847, with Ireland in the grip of the Great Famine, O'Connell traveled to Rome to seek assistance from the pope for the Irish people. He died on May 15, 1847, in Genoa, Italy, and is buried in Glasnevin Cemetery in Dublin in an elaborate tomb, topped by a round tower.

SEE ALSO: Catholic Emancipation; Chartists; Connolly, James (1868–1916); Ireland, Great Rebellion, 1798; Irish Nationalism; O'Connor, Feargus (1796–1855); United Irishmen; Young Ireland

References and Suggested Readings

- Connolly, J. (1910) Labour in Irish History. Dublin: Maunsel.
- McCaffrey, L. J. (1966) Daniel O'Connell and the Repeal Year. Lexington: University of Kentucky Press.
- McCartney, D. (1980) The World of Daniel O'Connell. Dublin: Mercier Press.
- MacDonagh, O. (1988) The Hereditary Bondsman: Daniel O'Connell, 1775–1829. New York: St. Martin's Press.
- MacDonagh, O. (1989) The Emancipist: Daniel O'Connell, 1830–1847. New York: St. Martin's Press.
- Nowlan, K. B. & O'Connell, M. R. (Eds.) (1984) Daniel O'Connell: Portrait of a Radical. Belfast: Appletree Press.
- O'Connell, M. (1990) Daniel O'Connell: The Man and His Politics. Dublin: Irish Academic Press.

O'Connor, Arthur (1763–1852)

Clifford D. Conner

Arthur O'Connor is the most important Irish revolutionary most people have never heard of. As one of the central leaders of the United Irishmen at the time of the 1798 Rebellion, he played a significant role in the origins of Irish republicanism and Irish nationalism. But for an accident of weather – a storm preventing a French army led by General Lazare Hoche from landing at Bantry Bay in December 1796 – English domination of Ireland would have received a severe challenge from a liberation army commanded by General Arthur O'Connor. Today, however, his name and reputation are not nearly as well remembered as are those of Theobald Wolfe Tone, Lord Edward Fitzgerald, Robert Emmet, and several others of his United Irish colleagues.

Hoche's attempted French invasion of Ireland was the pivotal event leading up to the Rebellion of 1798. Although Wolfe Tone has traditionally received the credit for negotiating that expedition, Tone's own memoirs reveal that he was not taken seriously by the French government, the Directory. The invasion plans became a reality only when O'Connor and Fitzgerald joined the discussions. It can be fairly said that Wolfe Tone initiated United Irish diplomacy with France, but O'Connor and Fitzgerald – with O'Connor in the lead – transformed it and gave it substance.

Although the attempted invasion was a failure, it had powerful consequences. In Ireland the rebellious population, far from being discouraged, was invigorated by the expectation that its powerful military ally would surely return soon for another try. But as the spirit of revolution rose among the people, so did the determination of the authorities to crush that spirit with all the repressive means at their disposal.

The United Irishmen

An analogous assessment can be made regarding the respective roles of Wolfe Tone, Fitzgerald, and O'Connor in the creation of the United Irishmen. In 1791 Tone was the guiding spirit behind the founding of the United Irish Society in Belfast. The original United Irish Society of 1791 was not, however, the United Irish Society that was to provide the organizational framework of the Rebellion of 1798. From a small propaganda group devoted to the goal of reforming the Irish parliament by peaceful and legal means, the United Irishmen became a mass underground army dedicated to overthrowing the Irish government and breaking the connection with England by military force.

O'Connor and Fitzgerald joined the movement in 1795, bringing a large measure of credibility to it. Gaining these two highly influential figures as leaders greatly enhanced the prestige of the United Irish and gave it an appearance of authenticity and social breadth that it had previously lacked. By 1796 the United Irish Society had superimposed a military organization onto its civilian structure and was training its troops in clandestine nocturnal drilling sessions throughout the country. In February 1798 a United Irish assessment of its own troop strength counted 279,698 men in arms in three of Ireland's four provinces.

Fitzgerald possessed personal charisma of legendary magnitude, but O'Connor was considerably more gifted in the essential qualities of political leadership. He was a powerful orator, an accomplished writer, an able political organizer, and a diligent student of military strategy and tactics. As the most philosophically inclined of the United Irish leaders and arguably the most intellectually gifted, O'Connor became the movement's leading theoretician. (See The State of Ireland for a good example of his theoretical writing.) Fitzgerald was attracted to O'Connor as someone who could articulate his own political feelings better than anyone else. At the crucial moment of the United Irishmen's transformation into a mass revolutionary organization, it was Arthur O'Connor who was playing the primary leadership role.

O'Connor was born on July 4, 1763, to a wealthy landowning family in County Cork, Ireland. He first came to public notice as a member of the Irish parliament, to which he had been admitted in 1790. The culmination of his parliamentary career was a passionate speech he made on the floor of the Irish House of Commons on May 4, 1795, calling for Catholic emancipation – full political rights for everyone regardless of their religion. He utilized the occasion as a forum to address the nation and present a case for resolving Ireland's social ills by revolutionary means. That speech ended any possibility of advancement in a conventional political career, but laid the basis for a revolutionary political career. Although O'Connor (like Wolfe Tone, Fitzgerald, and most of the other United Irish leaders) was of the Protestant persuasion, he rapidly became internationally renowned as a champion of the downtrodden Irish Catholics.

Imprisonment

On February 2, 1797, O'Connor – by then public enemy number one in the eyes of the British and Irish governments – was arrested and imprisoned in Ireland on charges of high treason. An effective international protest campaign on his behalf, however, pressured the Irish authorities into releasing him at the end of July. Once out of prison, O'Connor planned a renewed attempt to negotiate a French invasion of Ireland, but on February 28, 1798, in England en route to Paris, he was arrested by the British authorities and once again charged with high treason.

When the Rebellion erupted in Ireland in the following months, O'Connor was incarcerated and thereby denied the opportunity of being put to the ultimate test of revolutionary leadership. The outcome of the Rebellion was largely determined by the fact that he and most of the other top leaders of the United Irishmen had been removed from the scene of action by a successful campaign of government repression.

The Pitt ministry's determination to hang O'Connor was thwarted by the wholehearted support he received from his many friends among the Foxite parliamentary opposition, especially from Charles James Fox himself. The list of powerful men who took the stand at his trial to swear that they knew O'Connor well, and that they knew him to be completely incapable of any treasonous act or intent, could hardly have been more impressive: Fox, Richard Brinsley Sheridan, Thomas Erskine, the Earl of Suffolk, the Earl of Moira, the Earl of Thanet, the Earl of Oxford, the Duke of Norfolk, Henry Grattan, Michael Angelo Taylor, Lord John Russell, and Samuel Whitbread. The parade of important men had the desired effect: the jurors were awed and the judge sufficiently intimidated to assure O'Connor's acquittal.

But Pitt had anticipated the possibility that O'Connor might be acquitted and had taken steps to block his release. O'Connor was immediately rearrested and scheduled for extradition to Ireland to stand trial there on yet another charge of high treason. Pandemonium erupted in the courtroom. After several minutes of bedlam, however, the uproar subsided and O'Connor was sent back to jail to await being transported to Ireland. By the end of May 1798 when he arrived in Dublin in chains, the Rebellion had been defeated and his comrade-in-arms, Fitzgerald, had been killed in the struggle.

One of the most remarkable facts about O'Connor's life is that it did not end in 1798. With the insurrection crushed, an estimated 30,000 rebels already dead, and the surviving insurrectionists disarmed, local authorities throughout Ireland were carrying out wholesale executions of their vanquished foes with little pretense of adhering to the rule of law. The Protestant ultras were thirsting for vengeance, and O'Connor, their most hated enemy, was apparently at their mercy. In Dublin, however, the imprisoned leaders of the United Irishmen were in an international spotlight that required the government to at least pay token respect to legal formalities before hanging them.

The new lord lieutenant and military commander-in-chief of Ireland, Cornwallis, was sufficiently politically astute to understand that gratuitous brutality against the now disarmed and defenseless populace and their imprisoned leaders would only breed a new generation of rebels, which would perpetually undermine Britain's governance of Ireland. That O'Connor was eventually exiled rather than executed was the result of the Kilmainham pact, an agreement he and other imprisoned leaders made with the British government. Although the deal required substantial political concessions on their part, they maintained that it entailed no betrayal of principle.

French Exile

One reason O'Connor's part in the revolutionary events of 1798 has remained in relative obscurity is that although Irish nationalists have traditionally done a splendid job of keeping the names of martyrs to their cause alive, O'Connor – unlike Wolfe Tone, Fitzgerald, and Robert Emmet – did not die a martyr's death. He survived the Rebellion and lived for more than a half-century after 1798. After being released from prison in 1802, he spent the rest of his long life in comfortable exile in France.

In exile, O'Connor did not abandon the quest to free Ireland from English rule. On August 31, 1803, Napoleon Bonaparte decreed the formation of an Irish legion as a military force for the liberation of Ireland, and O'Connor was given its highest rank: lieutenant general. For more than a decade O'Connor continued preparations to lead a French invasion of Ireland under Bonaparte's auspices. Although the emperor was undoubtedly serious about launching such an expedition, none of his plans ever reached fruition, and General O'Connor was thus left perpetually on the sidelines, never to smell powder in real military action.

O'Connor's half-century in French exile amounted to considerably more than half of his lifetime. His marriage to the daughter of the renowned philosophe Condorcet gave him entrée into leading French social and intellectual circles. As hopes of a French expedition to Ireland faded, he turned to more private pursuits. He devoted a great deal of literary effort to defending the legacy of the United Irishmen as he understood it, which often brought him into conflict with radicals of the younger generation – most notably his own nephew, the Chartist leader Feargus O'Connor – and with reformers such as Daniel O'Connell.

O'Connor's Legacy

Arthur O'Connor died on April 25, 1852, a few months short of his eighty-ninth birthday. G. D. H. Cole, in Chartist Portraits, described the English revolutionary Ernest Jones as “by all ordinary standards, an unsuccessful man.” The same could be said of Arthur O'Connor. He was educated to become a lawyer but never practiced law. He was a parliamentarian whose career was cut short by his inability to tolerate the corruption it entailed. He was a central leader of an Irish revolution that failed to take power. He was Bonaparte's anointed king-in-waiting whose coronation never came to pass. And for half a century he was a general who never saw battle.

Nonetheless, like Ernest Jones, Arthur O'Connor led a remarkable life of considerable historical significance. He did not succeed in his primary objective of liberating Ireland from British domination, but the movement he helped to create and lead – the United Irishmen – had a powerful impact on his own era and left an important legacy of revolutionary precedent for subsequent generations of Irish republicans and nationalists.

SEE ALSO: Emmet, Robert (1778–1803) and Emmet's Rebellion; Fitzgerald, Lord Edward (1763–1798); Fox, Charles James (1749–1806); Ireland, Age of Revolutions 1775–1803; Ireland, Great Rebellion, 1798; Irish Nationalism; O'Connor, Feargus (1796–1855); Sheridan, Richard Brinsley (1751–1816); Tone, Theobald Wolfe (1763–1798); United Irishmen

References and Suggested Readings

- Cole, G. D. H. (1989) Chartist Portraits. London: Cassell.
- Curtin, N. J. (1985) The Transformation of the United Irishmen into a Mass-Based Revolutionary Organization, 1794–6. Irish Historical Studies 24: 463–92.
- Elliott, M. (1982) Partners in Revolution: The United Irishmen and France. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Hames, J. H. (2001) Arthur O'Connor, United Irishman. Cork: Collins.
- MacDermot, F. (1966) Arthur O'Connor. Irish Historical Studies 15: 48–69.
- Madden, R. R. (1916) Lives and Times of the United Irishmen. Ed. V. F. O'Reilly. New York: Catholic Publication Society of America.
- O'Connor, A. (1798/1998) The State of Ireland. Ed. J. Livesey. Dublin: Lilliput Press.
- Packenham, T. (1972) The Year of Liberty: The Great Irish Rebellion of 1798. London: Granada.

O'Connor, Feargus (1796–1855)

Clifford D. Conner

Thomas Carlyle remarked that writing a biography of Cromwell required first of all removing a mountain of “dead dogs” that hostile writers had heaped upon his memory. The same is true of many of history's controversial revolutionaries, and Chartism's principal leader, Feargus O'Connor, is certainly among them. Most of the early historians of Chartism denounced O'Connor as an unprincipled demagogue, but more recent studies have produced a much more positive assessment of the quality of his leadership.

The powerful mass working-class movement known as Chartism gave rise to a number of competent radical political leaders, but Feargus O'Connor was by far the best known and most important of them. When assailed as a demagogue by his contemporary political rivals and enemies, he met the charge head on: “I say, I am a Demagogue,” he wrote. “The word is derived from the Greek words, ‘demos, populos,’ the people; and ‘ago, duco,’ to lead; and means a leader of the people.”

Demagoguery was a natural accusation to hurl against a leader who rose to public attention on the strength of powerful platform oratory and immense charisma. A contemporary observer described “the melodious voice, the musical cadences, the astonishing volubility, the imposing self-confidence of the man, and the gallant air of bold defiance with which he assailed all oppression and tyranny,” all of which combined to produce an electrifying effect on the crowds he addressed. Add to that O'Connor's unerring feel for the concerns of working-class audiences – his ability to give voice to their grievances – and his overwhelming popularity needs no further explanation. But O'Connor's contributions to the creation of the historically unprecedented Chartist movement went far beyond his oratorical talent.

Widespread working-class radicalism was not new to England in the 1830s, but it had always previously been localized and fragmented, consisting of innumerable isolated groups of activists organizing around many different causes. What made Chartism different and unprecedented was its character as a unified national working-class movement aiming to take political power. O'Connor's popularity was itself a unifying factor as he became a symbolic focus of nationwide protests. During the critical period of Chartism's rise he energetically crossed and recrossed the country on a nonstop speaking tour, leaving behind at every stop, like a radical Johnny Appleseed, new local groups that were to become the organizational framework of Chartism. O'Connor's unwavering focus on a single issue – extension of the right to vote to the working class – helped consolidate the disparate forces of working-class politics into the massive movement to confront parliament with a “People’s Charter” demanding universal manhood suffrage.

The Northern Star: Communication, Agitation, Education

O'Connor must also be credited with creating the indispensable unifying element of the Chartist movement: its national newspaper, the Northern Star. The weekly publication provided the necessary means of communication to connect the revolutionary-minded activists throughout England, Scotland, and Wales, making concerted action possible. One of its important functions was to report the news from a working-class perspective – to break the monopoly and counter the “spin” of the establishment press. Its pages served as the main textbook of the workers’ political education. The Northern Star’s most significant role, however, was as the primary organizing tool of the Chartist movement. It had the geographical scope and the authority necessary to mobilize the ranks of the movement and call them to action.

The Northern Star laid the groundwork for the Chartist movement. Its first issue was dated November 18, 1837, almost a year before the official proclamation of the People’s Charter at a massive demonstration in Birmingham on August 6, 1838. Previously, it had been assumed that leadership of a national working-class movement would necessarily be centered in the country’s populous capital, London. But the faction-ridden atmosphere of radical politics in the metropolis made it highly unlikely that organizational unity would ever be possible there. O'Connor challenged the “Londoncentric” presumption by publishing his revolutionary organ in Leeds, in the industrialized north of England. By calling it the Northern Star he was making the point that radical activists all over the country should look to the militant workers of the north for leadership.

Earlier attempts had been made to launch a national working-class press, but the Northern Star was the first to succeed in any meaningful sense.

That the journal was successful in attracting the working population to its banner is evidenced by its circulation figures. Its original press run of 3,000 was soon raised to 10,000, a phenomenal number for an anti-establishment newspaper. By mid-1839 as many as 50,000 a week were being sold. But the numbers of copies printed only begin to suggest the extent of the Northern Star’s influence. Every copy, on average, reached as many as eight to ten readers as they were passed around in coffee houses, taverns, and workplaces. In 1838 the journal claimed a readership of 100,000; a year later, 400,000.

After only a month in operation, the newspaper began to return a profit to O'Connor, who then plowed the surplus funds back into extending the paper’s coverage and influence. His paid reporters functioned not only as news-gatherers and journalists but also as movement organizers in localities throughout the country. The significance of O'Connor’s ownership of the Northern Star in consolidating his leadership of the Chartist movement is obvious.

Hostile historians have charged that O'Connor ran the paper undemocratically, used it to promote his views alone, and excluded those of his opponents within the movement. The injustice of those accusations, however, is easily revealed by a perusal of the Northern Star’s pages, wherein O'Connor’s positions were routinely challenged and debated. Indeed, the paper’s broad appeal was largely due to its nonsectarian nature. Friedrich Engels, although critical of O'Connor, described the Northern Star as “the only sheet which reports all the movements of the proletariat,” and Karl Marx shared his positive appreciation of the paper. Engels himself served as a foreign correspondent for the Northern Star on occasion.

Political Origins

Feargus O'Connor was born on July 18, 1796, into a highly radicalized political environment. His father, Roger O'Connor, was a fervent partisan of the Irish struggle for national independence and his uncle, Arthur O'Connor, had been one of Ireland’s foremost revolutionary leaders. In 1822, at the age of 26, Feargus chose the name of his uncle’s best-known book, The State of Ireland, as the title of his own first radical political publication. In 1832, running as a member of Daniel O’Connell’s party, he scored a stunning upset victory in winning election to the British parliament as the representative of Cork, Ireland's largest county. Daniel O'Connell's son later wrote of Feargus's election: "Without money and without previous influence, personal or political, an unknown and not overwealthy squire of an obscure part of the country, set out to attack and overturn the influence and sway of the most powerful and richest landed aristocracy in Ireland, and, thanks to his indomitable energy and audacity . . . he succeeded."

Although Feargus would continue to support Daniel O'Connell's crusade for Irish independence, he would not long remain in the fold of the Liberator's party. O'Connell's conservatism with regard to working-class issues – above all his antipathy toward trade unionism and his staunch support of free-market economics – made a split inevitable between him and the radical movement in England. Upon his arrival in London in 1833, Feargus had immediately gravitated toward the radical workers and soon emerged as their most prominent spokesman. In autumn of 1836 the split came into the open when O'Connell launched a public political attack against O'Connor. By then, however, Feargus had been ejected from parliament.

As a tribune of the people in the parliamentary arena, Feargus had gained popularity in both Ireland and England. He easily won reelection at the beginning of 1835, but in June of that year a Tory challenge resulted in his disqualification on a technicality. The involuntary interruption of his parliamentary tenure allowed him to concentrate his energies on extraparliamentary organizing efforts that had already been under way.

In September 1835, 3,000 radicals attended a public meeting in London chaired by O'Connor and formed the Great Marylebone Radical Association – an important initial step, in O'Connor's estimation, toward an independent political party of the working class. English politics had traditionally taken the form of a two-sided struggle between reactionary Tories and progressive Whigs, but O'Connor and like-minded radicals believed that the pro-capitalist Whigs, no less than the aristocratic Tories, had proven themselves the enemies of the working class. A reporter for the Bolton Free Press, describing a public speech by O'Connor in February 1838, wrote that "he divided society just into two classes – the rich oppressors and the poor oppressed. The whole question resolved itself into the battle between labour and capital." O'Connor therefore devoted his efforts to building an independent working-class movement that could wrest political power from both the traditional aristocratic landowning class and the newly dominant "middle class" of industrial capitalists.

The movement spread rapidly. In the nine months following the founding of the Marylebone group at least eight more Radical Associations (RAs) sprang up in various parts of the metropolis, with a Central Committee and occasional all-London meetings to coordinate their activities. Meanwhile O'Connor also met with success in organizing RAs in other parts of England and Scotland. In December 1835 he embarked on an energetic three-week speaking tour of the industrial north that produced new RAs in at least a dozen cities and towns, including Manchester, Leeds, and Sheffield. A year later another tour brought forth new RAs in Nottingham, Newcastle, Glasgow, Edinburgh, and elsewhere. His efforts to fuse the RAs into a unified party temporarily faltered as the radicalization declined in 1836, but economic depression in 1837 sparked a revival. Eventually the local groups that O'Connor helped bring into being would coalesce into the nationwide Chartist movement.

Reformist or Revolutionary?

O'Connor's focus on the demand for universal manhood suffrage does not mean that he was essentially a reformist rather than a revolutionary. The demand that parliament extend the franchise to the working class was one of simple justice that O'Connor believed the overwhelming majority of the population would be willing to fight for. The workers were not particularly interested in the abstract right to vote, but it was widely believed that gaining the franchise would lead to redressing their economic grievances. Winning control of parliament, and therefore the machinery of the legislative process, would, they thought, put an end to their brutal exploitation by the factory owners and thereby allow them to rise out of their wretched poverty.

But neither O'Connor nor most of the other Chartist leaders thought that working-class power could actually be achieved via the ballot. They expected parliament to reject the Charter out of hand. To back their petition with political muscle, the Chartists planned to call a National Convention which, in emulation of the French Revolution, would establish an organ of political power to rival that of parliament and lead to a revolutionary showdown. The Convention would present the Chartist petition to parliament, and unless the government surrendered without a fight, the next step would be a general strike, which would probably compel the workers to use “physical force” in self-defense against military attacks. Radical activists throughout the country were therefore preparing for armed struggle.

When the showdown came, however, the political and social stability of the British capitalist order in the mid-nineteenth century proved sufficient to withstand the massive popular challenge, and it was O'Connor and the Chartists who ultimately backed down. O'Connor's critics among the historians have blamed that retreat – and the ultimate decline and fall of Chartism – on his leadership, but a more fair-minded assessment would recognize that the Chartists' struggle had been unwinnable no matter what O'Connor had done. That he did not issue a call to arms and lead the workers into a bloodbath should perhaps be attributed to good sense rather than to cowardice.

Despite the strategic retreat, in late 1839 the workers' frustrations boiled over into widespread riots and risings that required military force to suppress. A wave of arrests of Chartist leaders and rank-and-file members ensued, sparking more abortive local risings. O'Connor was imprisoned from May 1840 to late August 1841, but the Northern Star kept his voice before the public, and the “martyred patriot,” as he portrayed himself, emerged from his cell with his control over the Chartist movement intact and his following stronger than ever.

The Land Scheme

But when the petitions, the counter-parliaments, the general strikes, and the armed struggle all proved incapable of accomplishing the Chartists' objectives, the obvious question confronting the movement was: What do we do now? O'Connor's unfortunate answer was a turn to agrarian utopianism. He believed it would be possible to create a means whereby the workers could leave their factories, return to the land, and prosper as independent farmers. It was an echo of Robert Owen's utopian socialism, but minus the socialism. Whereas Owen hoped to build a socialist civilization on the basis of cooperative societies, O'Connor tried to turn the workers into individual peasant proprietors.

In 1845 he founded a company, the Chartist Cooperative Land Society, that was to accumulate money donated in small weekly amounts by poor workers, each of whom, when their total contribution reached a specified amount, would own a share in the company. The money would be used to purchase large estates that would then be divided into one- to four-acre parcels and distributed to the shareholders, who would prosper through the practice of intensive agriculture. O'Connor had even co-authored a book entitled Practical Work on the Management of Small Farms.

The idea that the misery of the English working class could be ameliorated by converting factory workers and miners into happy, healthy peasants did not seem as ludicrous in the 1840s as it does today. It is understandable that the oppressed “industrial slaves,” only a generation removed from the land, would have been receptive to O'Connor's Land Scheme. Due to the great authority he had earned as the movement's foremost leader, O'Connor succeeded in convincing a substantial section of the radicalized workers to give his proposals a try. In 1847 his Land Society purchased its first estate and populated it with pioneering settlers. Five more estates were added soon thereafter and a few hundred shareholders began farming their small plots.

Even if it had not been an essentially backward-looking project, O'Connor's Land Scheme was doomed from the start. As the movement gathered momentum it encountered growing hostility from the authorities, who promptly used their legal powers to derail it. In August 1848 it was officially declared illegal and although the individual proprietors were allowed to continue farming their small plots, the Chartist Land Scheme as a whole ended in bankruptcy. O'Connor had been accused by political foes of somehow using the Land Scheme to enrich himself, but the official inquiry proved the opposite: that he had gone deeply into personal debt in a futile effort to keep it afloat.

The Tragic Ending

The great revolutionary wave that swept across the European continent and crested in 1848 was felt in England as well. The radicalization was reflected in O'Connor once again being elected to parliament, representing Nottingham, in July 1847. The British state, however, ultimately proved stable enough to weather the storm, and the Chartist movement entered a phase of inevitable decline. O'Connor's personal decline was unfortunately accelerated by mental illness.

He may have been afflicted by a congenital condition; his father had also apparently descended into insanity at the end of his life. In 1852 Feargus's increasingly bizarre behavior culminated in a tumultuous incident in the House of Lords that led to his being committed to a mental institution, where he remained until shortly before his death in August 1855. An estimated 50,000 mourners attended his funeral, an echo of the love and admiration he had formerly inspired among working people.

SEE ALSO: Chartists; European Revolutions of 1848; Newport Rising, Wales, 1839; O'Connell, Daniel (1775–1847); O'Connor, Arthur (1763–1852); Owen, Robert (1771–1858)

References and Suggested Readings

- Cole, G. D. H. (1989) Chartist Portraits. London: Cassell.
- Epstein, J. (1982) The Lion of Freedom: Feargus O'Connor and the Chartist Movement, 1832–1842. London and Sydney: Croom Helm.
- Thompson, D. (1984) The Chartists: Popular Politics in the Industrial Revolution. New York: Pantheon.

Ogé's Revolt, 1790

Stewart R. King

The 1790 rebellion of the free people of color of the northern province of Saint-Domingue (the modern Haiti) was the first organized outbreak of violence in what became the Haitian Revolution. The rebels were led by Vincent Ogé, a prominent free person of mixed race, living in Cap Français, Saint-Domingue, before the outbreak of the war. He was a merchant and landowner. Another important rebel leader was Jean-Baptiste Chavannes, a free mixed-race planter from the nearby canton of Sainte-Suzanne.

Ogé was the son of a white man, a small planter, and his mixed-race wife. Ogé was educated in France and trained as a goldsmith, but became a merchant and urban land developer.

By 1790 he was the most prominent free colored merchant in the city of Cap Français and one of the foremost merchants of any color.

Cap Français had a fairly large population of free people of color. Many of these people were free blacks or, if mixed-race, without many white relatives or friends. They formed a tight-knit community, tied together by shared suffering under discriminatory laws. Many of the men of this community served in the colonial militia or as rural constables, giving them contact with white officers as possible patrons but also reinforcing their separation from the wealthier mixed-race free planters, since the units were segregated by race. Ogé, though a city dweller, was closer to the wealthy planter class from which he sprang. He had many white relatives and friends, as well as business associates. He lived in a wealthy neighborhood with mostly white neighbors.

For American readers, one shocking feature of the lives of wealthy free people of color in the Americas is the relationship they had with slavery. Ogé is a remarkable example: he and his family owned more than two dozen slaves, some of whom worked in the coffee groves under difficult circumstances. In 1783 he gave his free colored housekeeper a 12-year-old girl slave, newly imported from what is now Guinea or Sierra Leone in Africa, in lieu of cash payment of two years' salary owed her. The following year he gave her a 28-year-old woman from today's Togo or Benin and her 3-year-old daughter to pay the next two years' salary. He was a merchant who participated in transatlantic trade as well as owning ships trading between ports in the Americas. Though his ships were not slave ships in the sense of carrying hundreds of slaves from African ports to the Americas, it would not be unreasonable to assume that slaves occasionally traveled on his ships from one port in the islands to another to be sold. His ships also carried the products of slave labor to North American and European markets, closing the third side of the infamous triangle trade. He was deeply involved in the economy of Saint-Domingue, a slave society. It would have been impossible for anyone of his social status and wealth not to be involved in slavery in some way. He did not appear to have any moral or ethical concerns about slavery.

Chavannes' parents were free people of mixed-race. The Chavannes family was large, as was common with free coloreds in Saint-Domingue; Jean-Baptiste had at least three brothers and one sister who survived to adulthood. As the oldest son, after his father's death sometime between 1777 and 1783, he managed the family plantation. It was big enough to provide small but respectable farms for each of the younger children upon their marriages and have enough left over to rent for 15,000 livres a year in 1786, the equivalent of $375,000 in today's terms. Chavannes does not appear to have been a very successful planter; the rental in 1786 was apparently forced on him by his creditors. The plantation had slaves, naturally – about thirty in 1786. Unlike many free colored planters, Chavannes had good relations with poorer free blacks. He often was a godfather for newly freed people or the children of poor blacks in his neighborhood. He was also a militia sergeant and built relationships both with the largely black militia non-commissioned officer corps and also with the white militia officers, one of whom rescued him when he got in financial difficulty in 1786. His militia comrades supported him in his rebellion and many of them went on to support the larger rebellion led by Toussaint Louverture.

Chavannes volunteered for the French army in 1779, persuaded by the charismatic French Admiral Count D'Estaing, who was organizing an expedition to Georgia. D'Estaing recruited more than 1,000 free colored men from the north province. Many of them were relatively poor free blacks, some with unclear titles of liberty. Few of the wealthy planter class signed up for the expedition, but Jean-Baptiste was an exception. He fought in the Savannah campaign of 1779, distinguishing himself during the free colored regiment's only major battle, covering the French retreat from the English fortifications. He returned to the colony in 1783. He and his comrades were very disappointed by the lack of response by white society to their service. They and D'Estaing had hoped that military service would help overcome prejudice against free coloreds. Neither the government nor white public opinion responded. Free people of color had experienced increasing racial prejudice since the 1760s and this would only get worse as the revolution approached. In fact, as the political situation heated up in France, Ogé, Chavannes, and his fellow wealthy free coloreds saw an opportunity not to overthrow a system based on racial slavery, but to find a place at the top of that system for themselves. Ogé went to France to try to resolve a legal dispute related to his family's plantation as the Estates General, an ancient parliament, was being elected in 1788. The meeting of the Estates General became the spark that ignited the French Revolution, and Ogé could see that the revolutionary climate offered a chance to improve the lot of wealthy free coloreds. He thought of the free people of color, along with native-born whites, as the natural citizens of the colony. He hoped that a revolution that was calling for more democracy and the end of inherited privilege and unequal treatment of people might allow him and his class more freedom than the royal government was prepared to give them.

Ogé first approached the Club Massiac, a group of white planters living in France who had been elected to the parliament. He hoped to forge an alliance among the wealthy native-born citizens of the colony that might lead to greater autonomy and a race-neutral society. The planters rejected the plan, and Ogé turned to the Société des Amis des Noirs, an anti-slavery group. The Amis des Noirs included several parliament members who agreed to introduce a proposed law that would give voting rights to wealthy free coloreds. The proposed law was not passed, but civil rights for free people of color became the central colonial issue debated in the parliament and the French press in 1790. The rules for the election of colonial assemblies that were passed by the parliament did not mention race, specifying instead that all male citizens who paid a certain amount in taxes and were over a certain age were to be permitted to vote. That was enough for Ogé, who returned to the colony in October 1790.

Ogé had never served in the militia, as wealthy planters were able to evade service or send substitutes. However, while living in Paris he had been very much impressed by the fervor of the Parisian revolutionary National Guard. He had befriended the Marquis de Lafayette, their commander, and even obtained a commission as colonel in the guard. Upon his return to Saint-Domingue, Ogé began wearing his colonel's uniform and connected with Chavannes and other free colored militiamen. They made an attempt to put the demand for free colored voting rights before the government, sending a letter to the governor on October 21, 1790.

However, they also began to gather armed free colored men around them on a camp established in a plantation in the remote region of Grande-Rivière, in the mountains near the Spanish border. Other free colored militiamen across the colony expressed similar demands on hearing of Ogé's actions, though there was no immediate fighting anywhere else. The police, who were free people of color, would not do anything to stop the movement.

On October 27, 1790 an attempt was made by regular troops from the Cap Français garrison to arrest Ogé and Chavannes. The soldiers, who numbered only a few dozen, retreated without confronting the hundreds of armed free people of color in the camp. The next day, Ogé and his men went to all the neighboring plantations and collected their weapons, handing them out to their supporters. On October 30 a force of about 800 soldiers, militiamen, and constables from Cap Français, probably at least half free coloreds, confronted Ogé's 400 free coloreds in a battle that lasted most of the morning. The government troops were forced to withdraw to the town.

Ogé's men celebrated, but their leaders knew that the next attack would be even more powerful. They built field fortifications at the camp. The other rebel leaders, including Chavannes, encouraged Ogé to enroll slaves in his army, promising them their liberty in return for their services. Chavannes even brought 30 male slaves from his own plantation, it is said, though it is doubtful he actually owned that many slaves at the time; they may have been runaways or else the numbers have been exaggerated. Ogé refused to enroll slaves, though, even with the permission of their masters. He did not want the movement for free colored civil rights to lead to a hugely disruptive slave rebellion, though he had accepted the idea of gradual, compensated emancipation of slaves in discussions with the Amis des Noirs and the Club Massiac in Paris the year before.

When the colonial governor came in person the next day with 3,000 men and artillery, the small force at Ogé's command could not resist them. They fled into the hills, with many returning to their homes. Ogé and 24 of his closest supporters, including his four brothers, Chavannes and two of his brothers, and two free black militia sergeants, fled across the border to the Spanish side of the island. In the past, the Spanish had sheltered runaway slaves, and in later years they would provide refuge for Toussaint Louverture's slave rebel army, but in 1790 they were trying to remain on good terms with the French and so they extradited Ogé and his men to Cap Français. Ogé was questioned by the colonial government, tried, and sentenced to death on February 21, 1791. The sentence was carried out the following day. Both leaders suffered terribly, and Ogé's cries gained the sympathy of the onlookers, including the well-known lawyer and Enlightenment figure Moreau de St.-Méry.

When the execution became known in France it provoked outrage there. The supposed crimes of Ogé and Chavannes did not seem so terrible in retrospect, as by 1792 the slaves had burned most of the sugar plantations in the north province and slaughtered hundreds of planters (and hundreds of slaves had been slaughtered in their turn). Ogé's movement did not lead to a colony-wide uprising either by free coloreds or slaves, at least not immediately. The care they took not to involve slaves appealed to moderates. The French parliament responded by passing a law on April 4, 1792 that gave equal citizenship to free people of color. The revolutionary commissioner Léger-Félicité Sonthonax was sent to the island to enforce this decree, and it was he who ultimately declared the abolition of slavery and recruited Toussaint Louverture to lead the colony's armies.

After the end of the Haitian Revolution, both Ogé and Chavannes were recognized as heroes of Haiti's struggle for independence. Ogé was a figure much more popular among the new nation's wealthy mixed-race population than among the black descendants of the slaves he refused to permit to join his movement. His movement is seen today as marking a division in Haiti's ruling class that offered the slaves an opening for successful rebellion. Chavannes is a less ambiguous figure, both because of his close relations with blacks before the war and his desire to include slaves in the movement. A prominent Haitian peasant activist has adopted his name in tribute. The experience of the pair also showed other free people of color that they had little to hope for from the white ruling class. In the end, most of the colony's free people of color supported the revolutionary forces rather than the French.

SEE ALSO: Haiti, Protest and Rebellion, 19th Century; Haiti, Revolutionary Revolts, 1790s; Haiti,

Saint-Domingue Revolution, 1789–1804, Aftermath; Haiti, Saint-Domingue and Revolutionary France; Haitian Revolution and Independence, 1801–1804

References and Suggested Readings

- DuBois, L. (2005) Avengers of the New World: The Story of the Haitian Revolution. New York: Belknap.
- King, S. (2001) Blue Coat or Powdered Wig: Free Coloreds in Colonial Saint-Domingue. Athens: University of Georgia Press.

O'Higgins, Bernardo Riquelme (1778–1842)

C. Andrés Gamboa

Bernardo Riquelme O'Higgins was a leading figure in the Chilean independence movement. He is known as the “father of the fatherland” for his contribution to the establishment of the newly constituted free republic. Along with other American patriots, such as José de San Martín and Simón Bolívar, O'Higgins is considered a liberator of America.

Bernardo O'Higgins was born in 1778, an illegitimate son of the governor of Chile and posterior viceroy of Peru, Ambrosio O'Higgins, and the Chilean Isabel Riquelme. His father took care of his education and he studied at a Franciscan school and then at San Carlos College in Lima before completing his education in London and Cadiz. Previously known as Bernardo Riquelme, he began to use the name “O'Higgins” after his return from Europe in 1802, a year after his father's death, through the intervention of the courts. Back in Chile, he took possession of his inheritance, the hacienda Las Canteras. Once installed there, he was appointed mayor (1804) and then Maestre de Campo (1806), a gubernatorial title of the Spanish crown, just below captain general.

His commitment to freeing America from Spanish rule was tightly connected with his education in London. There he came to know Francisco Miranda, an active promoter of the emancipation movement financed by the British Empire, who introduced him to the idea of independence as an American issue and not just a local concern for each province of the New World. However, before the arrival of Bernardo from the Old World, a pan-American emancipation movement was already beginning to form.

In September 1810 the first National Board of government was formed. The objective of this council was to govern Chile in the name of the king and keep his authority while he was a prisoner of Napoleon. O'Higgins offered his services to the board and was appointed as one of its deputies in 1811, replacing Juan Martínez de Rozas.

In 1812, José Miguel Carrera, a member of the local aristocracy, through a coup d'état came to be chief of a new government marked by separatist intentions, which contrasted with the previous government of the National Board which was still loyal to the king. Carrera broke with Spanish authority and began an autonomist government that lasted until a second coup d'état and the patriots' defeat in the battle of Rancagua, which in 1814 reinstated the Spanish Empire with the arrival of a new governor. In Rancagua, O'Higgins and his soldiers resisted bravely, but the superiority of the monarchical forces was enough to decide the battle on behalf of the king's followers.

The triumph of the royalists forced the patriots to escape and cross the Andes to Argentina, where they formed the “liberator army.” They obtained the support of José de San Martín who planned to liberate Chile first and then march to Peru.

More than two years later, O'Higgins came back as leader of the liberator army and defeated the monarchical forces in Chacabuco on February 2, 1817. Only two days later, he and San Martín entered the capital city of Santiago in triumph. The final hour of the colonial dominion of Spain in Chile was near. The definitive encounter was on the plains of Maipú on April 5, 1818. San Martín assumed command of the troops. O'Higgins then arrived on the battlefield and once the victory was achieved they embraced each other as a signal of union in the fight against tyranny.

As supreme director of the newly proclaimed republic, appointed the day after the battle of Chacabuco, O'Higgins governed for six years. He was inclined toward military dictatorship, seeing it as a way of educating and preparing citizens to enjoy their rights and reach full emancipation. Unlike San Martín, O'Higgins was not a partisan of monarchy, and he forbade the use of shields of arms and abolished nobility titles. He also created the first Chilean navy and the Military School.

The opposition of the aristocracy to his regime and the hostility of the Catholic Church forced him out of power in 1823, and he went into exile. He went to Peru and lived in Lima until his death in 1842.

SEE ALSO: Bolívar, Simón (1783–1830); Chile, People's Power; Latin America, Catholic Church and Liberation, 16th Century to Present; Venezuelan War of Independence

References and Suggested Readings

- Amunátegui, M. L. (1853) La Dictadura de O'Higgins. Santiago: Imprenta de Julio Belin y Cía.
- Collier, S. (1967) Ideas and Politics of Chilean Independence, 1808–1833. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Eyzaguirre, J. (1973) Ideario y ruta de la emancipación chilena, 4th ed. Santiago: Editorial Universitaria.
- Eyzaguirre, J. (1989) Historia de las instituciones políticas y sociales de Chile, 9th ed. Santiago: Editorial Universitaria.
- Martínez, M. (1848) Memoria histórica sobre la revolución de Chile. Valparaíso: Imprenta Europea.
- Vicuña, B. (1860) El ostracismo del Jeneral don Bernardo O'Higgins. Valparaíso: Imprenta y Librería del Mercurio.
- Villalobos, S. et al. (1974) Historia de Chile, Vol. 3. Santiago: Editorial.

Oka crisis

Robyn Bourgeois

In the summer of 1990 the police and Canadian military clashed with indigenous protestors at a blockade outside of Oka, Quebec. The standoff, which lasted 78 days and resulted in the death of a police officer, brought national and international attention to indigenous land claims in Canada. As a colonial nation, Canada has a long history of conflict with indigenous peoples over land ownership. Through land claims and treaties, federal and provincial governments have attempted to negotiate settlements with many of Canada's indigenous tribes. However, many land claims remain unresolved (particularly in British Columbia), the result of which is that indigenous and non-indigenous communities often find themselves in conflict over parcels of land.

The Mohawks of Kanesatake reserve have a history of contestation over land use in and around Oka, Quebec; however, it was the proposed expansion of a golf course that directly

Tensions between the Quebec town of Oka and the nearby Mohawks of the Kahnésatake Indian settlement erupted on July 11, 1990 over land rights. On September 1 the Canadian military moved into the settlement and surrounded the Indians. Here one of the last Mohawk warriors to hold out stares down a Canadian soldier after telling him "You're going to die today." The crisis ended on September 26 and led to the development of Canada's First Nations Policing Policy. (AFP/Getty Images) precipitated the Oka crisis of 1990. In 1961 building began on a nine-hole golf club on land the Mohawks believed belonged to them (including a burial ground and a grove of sacred pine trees). A legal protest was launched, but by the time the case was heard, much of the land had been cleared and the golf course built. In 1977 the Kanesatake tribe filed an official land claim with the federal government for this land. After nine years and additional research, the land claim was rejected for failing to meet key criteria.

In the summer of 1989 the mayor of Oka, Jean Ouellette, announced plans to clear the sacred pine grove to expand the golf course and construct luxury condominiums. After some protests by the Mohawks, the federal government and the municipality of Oka agreed to undertake negotiations with the Kanesatake tribe. With talks going nowhere, the Mohawks established a barricade blocking access to the golf course on March 11, 1990. Throughout the spring, the three parties continued negotiations, but the municipality headed to court to obtain an order to remove the blockade. On June 29, 1990 an injunction was issued for the blockade to be removed. The Mohawks ignored the injunction and the barricade remained in place.

On July 11, 1990 Mayor Ouelette asked the Sûreté de Québec (the provincial police) to intervene. After some failed discussion, the police fired tear gas and flash bang grenades at the blockade. Though it is unclear who shot first, a gun battle began, which resulted in the death of a police officer. Unable to control the violence, the police abandoned their position and retreated.

Natives from across Canada and the US began to join the Kanesatake protest, and additional blockades were established around Quebec, most notably the Kahnawake blockade of the Mercier Bridge in Montreal. Indeed, a special assembly of 100 chiefs from across Canada was held at Kahnawake, and they agreed to support the Kanesatake in their protest.

Negotiations continued during the standoff. On July 15 a tentative deal was reached, with the federal government agreeing to give the land to the Kanesatake reserve, withdraw the police, and hold a public inquiry into the crisis; however, the deal fell through on a technicality. Tensions rose as the standoff continued. The Mohawks and the police played games of intimidation with one another. Media coverage and frustration over road blockades fueled racial prejudices, with non-indigenous residents facing off against indigenous protesters. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police were brought in to assist, but like the provincial police, they were soon overwhelmed by the situation.

On August 14 Quebec premier Robert Bourassa, believing that the police had lost control of the situation, asked the federal government for the assistance of the Canadian military in ending the blockade. Though Prime Minister Brian Mulroney was hesitant to deploy troops, it was the right of Premier Bourassa to ask for the assistance. On the morning of August 20, 33 Canadian troops were deployed to Oka. Three of the smaller blockades leading to the major blockade quickly fell to the military. Trip lines and razor wire were set up around the major blockade site to contain the Mohawks, and helicopters performed surveillance of the blockade site.

Despite increasing tensions and the presence of the military, negotiations continued. In late August the federal government agreed to purchase the contested land and hand it over to the Kanesatake reserve as soon as the blockades ended. On August 29 the Kahnawake ended their sister blockade in Montreal. Negotiations continued with the Kanesatake, who ended their blockade on September 26. With a ceremony, the Mohawk laid their weapons down and agreed to end the hostilities.

The Oka crisis resulted in a number of changes for all those involved. Internal conflict among the Mohawk during the crisis resulted in changes to tribal governance, including democratic election of governing members. Non-indigenous owned land within the Kanesatake reserve was bought up to solidify the Mohawk land base. For the media, who had flocked to Oka to document the crisis, the events clearly demonstrated the power of media to impact the destiny of an event. Indeed, media coverage of the Oka crisis has been hotly debated by journalists, academics, and others. The crisis led the federal government to produce the First Nations Policing Policy. In response to the failure of policing at Oka, this policy laid out culturally appropriate practices to improve relations between policing agencies and indigenous communities throughout Canada.

With many land claims yet to be resolved, Aboriginal communities across Canada have used Oka-type blockades to draw attention to land issues. Various tribes throughout British Columbia have used blockades around popular ski resorts to draw attention to their land claims. In Caledonia, Ontario, the Mohawks of Six Nations have maintained a blockade of a proposed subdivision development since February 2006. Recently, Mohawk activist Shawn Brant from the Tyendinaga reserve (near the Bay of Quinte, Ontario) was arrested and charged for his role in leading blockades of the Canadian national railway.

SEE ALSO: Canada, Indigenous Resistance; Riel, Louis (1844–1885)

References and Suggested Readings

Goodleaf, D. (1995) Entering the Warzone: A Mohawk Perspective on Resisting Invasions. Penticton: Theytus Books.

- Grenier, M. (1994) Native Indians in the English-Language Press: The Case of the Oka Crisis. Media, Culture and Society 16, 2 (April): 313–36.
- Obomsawin, A. (1993) Kanehsatake: 270 Years of Resistance. Toronto: National Film Board of Canada.
- Westra, L. (1999) Environmental Racism and the First Nations of Canada: Terrorism at Oka. Journal of Social Philosophy 30, 1: 103–24.
- York, G. (1999) People of the Pines: The Warriors and the Legacy of Oka. Toronto: McArthur.

Oke-Ogun Uprising

Mofeyisra Olumatoyin Ojoawo

Prior to the advent of colonial rule, the system of government prevailing among contemporary Yoruba of southwestern Nigeria was rooted in reciprocity between rulers and subjects. A standard system of accepted forms of checks and balances prevailed. Within this system, many towns in the Yoruba kingdoms were considered superior politically and received homage from lesser villages. Colonialism set the normative system of stratification into disarray, bringing into the system several changes which were alien and not accepted by the people of the region. The introduction of indirect rule and the institution of a new court system after the amalgamation of Nigeria, denying and marginalizing some chiefs, resulted in the uprising of Oke-Ogun (especially at Okeho and Iseyin) between 1916 and 1917. The uprising was brutally suppressed.

Before colonialism in Yorubaland it was clear that each Yoruba town was in a way a kingdom, though many of these kingdoms still acknowledged their subservience to other powerful kingdoms and paid regular tribute to them. Many towns in Yorubaland acknowledged the sovereignty of the Oyo kingdom, but this did not prevent them from being in control of their own communities. They were at liberty to a large extent and they also maintained their authority. However, the advent and spread of colonial administration toward the end of the nineteenth century and the subsequent amalgamations of Nigeria by Lugard in 1914 meant that many of these chiefs and/or kingdoms were divested of their powers, while the Alaafin of Oyo was over-empowered by the colonial administration, to the dissatisfaction of the people. This deprivation amounted to cutting away the chiefs' sources of livelihood. They were therefore at loggerheads with the new socioeconomic and political structures and rebelled against the system that had belittled them and led them into poverty. This was one of the causes of the 1916 Oke-Ogun Uprising.

Another cause stems from the Alaafin's imposition of Red Cross Funds on the people, which was misunderstood as a tax. The Alaafin of Oyo enjoyed special privileges and was seen as a puppet overlord whose office was used to relegate Oke-Ogun chiefs and exploit the people. The uprising broke out in Okeho, a large settlement in the Oke-Ogun area, in October 1916 and led to the killing of the Onjo (the king) of Okeho and his household by Okeho Baloguns (warrior class) due to his supposed support for the Alaafin. His palace was also subsequently burnt. It is important to note that the king was rather unpopular and the chiefs and townsmen had repeatedly asked for his removal since 1909. They were oftentimes repressed by the British administration in Nigeria. After the brutal killing of the Onjo, the furious warlords also descended on African clerks, who fled but were eventually caught and killed. Government property, including court rooms, telegraph offices, and rest houses in the district, were also destroyed. The revolting warlords also attempted to blow up the bridge leading to Oyo but were unsuccessful. The revolt subsequently spread to Iseyin, another Oke-Ogun town, where a chief and some native officials were also killed on October 21, 1916.

The backbone of the rebels was broken when government troops mercilessly suppressed the rebellion and finally gained victory by killing significant numbers of war chiefs, who represented a set of people held in awe and high esteem in Yoruba folklore. Many followers of these chiefs were disorganized, and by the beginning of November 1916 the rebellion had been crushed after the killing of over 200 men. Thereafter, a number of arrests were made in a raid jointly carried out by the Alaafin's men, British officials, and soldiers. Ring leaders, chiefs, and commoners including the Aseyin (the king of Iseyin) were arrested, tried by a court martial, and sentenced to death. One of the shocking results of the uprising was the order given by Lord Lugard that the sentences be carried out publicly to serve as a warning to other rebels, without any consideration for Yoruba culture, which forbade the king being killed in such manner. In addition, delegates were invited from all over Oyo province to witness the killing, to put fear into them.

The uprising resulted from the indirect rule and draconian style of administration of the colonial rulers and the Alaafin, which set him against his own people. The scars of the rebellion still linger even in contemporary Yorubaland, as the Oke-Ogun area in present-day Oyo state is still marginalized in sociopolitical terms, with a rundown infrastructure in spite of its status as the food-basket of Oyo state and surrounding areas. Furthermore, Oke-Ogun kings and chiefs remain subservient to the Alaafin of Oyo, who hold consenting authority over them and therefore remain the overlords of Oke-Ogun.

SEE ALSO: Agbekoya Peasant Uprising and Rebellion, 1968–1969; Ife-Modakeke Conflict; Nigeria, Protest and Revolution, 20th Century; Revolution, Dialectics of; Yoruba Wars, 19th Century

References and Suggested Readings

- Adediran, B. (1998) Ibadan Imperialism. In G. O. Ogunremi (Ed.), Ibadan: A Historical, Cultural and Socioeconomic Study of an African City. Lagos: Oluyole Club Lagos, pp. 37–53.
- Fadipe, N. A. (1970) The Sociology of the Yoruba. Ibadan: Ibadan University Press.
- Johnson, S. (1921) The History of the Yorubas. Lagos: CSS Bookshops.
- Osuntokun, A. (1971) Disaffection and Revolt in Nigeria During the First World War, 1914–1918. Canadian Journal of African Studies 2: 171–92.
- Raji, A. O. & Danmole, H. O. (2004) Traditional Government. In N. S. Lawal, N. N. O. Sadiku, & P. A. Dopamu (Eds.), Understanding Yoruba Life and Culture. Trenton: Africa World Press, pp. 259–70.

Oneida Perfectionist Utopians

Richard Goff

One of the more fascinating utopian experiments of the nineteenth century was the Oneida Community of New York. The “Perfectionist” religious group, organized along the teachings of John Humphrey Noyes, intrigued observers and scholars with their practice of complex marriage and communal living. Founded in 1848, the Oneida Community’s membership peaked at 300 in 1878 before dissolving in 1881, eventually becoming Oneida Limited, a popular flatware manufacturer.

The Oneida experiment was the brainchild of John Humphrey Noyes, son of Vermont congressman John Noyes. During the peak of the Second Great Awakening, John Humphrey experienced conversion, coming to the conclusion that God demanded true spiritual perfection rather than good works. Noyes’s Perfectionism prompted him to reexamine all aspects of his life and the world around him. Of particular interest to Noyes was the issue of sex. Noyes viewed pregnancy and childbearing to be the greatest burden that women endured, and an unfair one. Nevertheless, procreation was necessary and the sex act enjoyable. Noyes concluded that one’s attitude towards sex was more important than the act itself and that sexual impulses were essentially good, when channeled correctly. Noyes publicly argued for the creation of a holy Christian community based on spiritual love, sexual expression, and communal values.

Noyes and his followers experimented with what would become the tenets of the Oneida community in the early 1840s before establishing the community in 1848. Central to the community’s beliefs was the practice of male continence. In this way, couples could enjoy sexual activity to a degree, but the complications of having children were avoided. Noyes thought that children should be a conscious choice of the individuals involved, not an inevitable outcome of sexual intercourse. In order to avoid selfish love, monogamous marriage was eliminated in favor of “complex marriage,” where individuals were free to pursue sexual relationships with anyone in the community. Therefore, sexual activity and “free love” could liberate women and provide greater equality between the genders.

The second component of the Oneida community was called mutual criticism. In groups of ten to fifteen, individuals would freely discuss each other’s faults and characteristics. The purpose was to build a sense of community and to establish social norms. Noyes also hoped that mutual criticism would diffuse tension and allow for personal growth, ensuring the long-term viability of the community.

Noyes’s perfectionism was based on his particular interpretation of the Bible and Christian teachings. Noyes believed that Christ had returned in AD 70 and thus humankind was free of the worldly moral prescriptions of the Bible. Noyes hoped to replicate a “Heaven on Earth” in preparation for the Lord’s final return. Following Jesus’ assertion that there is no marriage in heaven (Matthew 22:30), Noyes believed “complex marriage” to be the closest worldly institution to Christ’s mandate. Noyes saw this as restoring a divine relationship between the sexes. Although Noyes still maintained that women were inferior to men, they were generally free to participate in all aspects of the community and functioned equally with men. Children were raised communally by both men and women and all members were encouraged to develop their particular capacities to the fullest extent possible.

Additionally, Noyes used apostolic communism to establish the proper economic and social relations in the community. Social life took place at the Mansion House, which was comprised of lawns, trees, a library, and communal sitting and sleeping rooms. Initially, the group attempted to sustain itself through collective farming. They soon expanded into sawmilling, blacksmithing, furniture production, and the manufacturing of silk and animal traps, the latter becoming the economic backbone of the community. A complex layer of committees administered all aspects of life. Also, in contrast to many Christian communes, members were allowed, and encouraged, to engage in a wide variety of recreational activities.

Like many utopian communities, Oneida depended heavily upon the leadership and teachings of its professed leader, which contributed to its undoing. The charismatic and spiritual leadership of Noyes had always been central to the group’s cohesion, but as Noyes aged, no leader with similar qualities surfaced. As the Perfectionist fervor of the founding cohort was not felt by the younger generation, more members came to question the practices of the community. Also, the community began to experiment with selective breeding, in theory to produce children with the best qualities, but which generated hard feelings among many of the members who were not selected to procreate. And finally, public outcry against the unconventional sex practices of the community eventually forced Noyes to flee to Canada to avoid criminal prosecution. The community disbanded in 1881, forming the joint-stock company Oneida Limited.

The Oneida community continues to fascinate primarily due to their unconventional sex practices. This should not overshadow the relative success of the community and its interesting attempts to reconcile the desire for practical communal living with sexual enjoyment. Whereas communities like the Shakers and Rappites solved the problem of jealousy and “selfish love” by doing away with sex, Oneida went in the opposite direction, embracing sex, but doing away with marriage.

SEE ALSO: Amana Inspirationist Utopians; Cooperative Commonwealth; Father Rapp (1757–1847) and Harmony; Icaria Utopian Community; New Harmony; Owen, Robert (1771–1858); Shakers Utopian Community; Utopian Communities, United States; Utopian Intentional Communities; Wright, Frances “Fanny” (1795–1852)

References and Suggested Readings

- Foster, L. (1981) Religion and Sexuality: Three American Communal Experiments of the Nineteenth Century. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Hayden, D. (1976) Seven American Utopias: The Architecture of Communitarian Socialism, 1790–1975. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press.
- Jacoby, R. (1999) The End of Utopia. New York: Basic Books.
- Klaw, S. (1993) Without Sin: The Life and Death of the Oneida Community. New York: Penguin.

Ontario Coalition Against Poverty (OCAP)

John Clarke

From the late 1980s through the first decade of the twentieth century, the Ontario Coalition Against Poverty (OCAP) has mobilized communities suffering under neoliberal policies of the Canadian and provincial government. The organization’s work is dominated by two major political factors – countering the aggressive agenda of corporate capital in dismantling the social infrastructure and the growth in poverty. OCAP sees itself as filling a decisive lack of opposition to the neoliberal attack in view of the ineffective challenge mounted by labor and older social movements rooted in earlier forms of compromise.

Initial protests were held against the Ontario Liberal government of David Peterson, the province’s premier in 1989, who responded slowly in expanding social entitlement during a period of economic crisis. Economic restructuring had undermined the industrial sector, unemployment insurance had been eroded, and more people were forced onto welfare. The Peterson government viewed the mounting cost of provincial income support with alarm, but was equally concerned about the implications of forcing so many into a system of legislated poverty.

Peterson's response was to establish a show-piece public inquiry, the Social Assistance Review Committee. It was a stalling tactic but it created public debate and raised expectations. Its report called for reforms and increases in welfare rates. Unions of unemployed workers in Toronto and London, Ontario were demanding a 25 percent increase in social assistance rates and began to call for major action to press for serious improvements for those on welfare. A range of social organizations, trade unions, and the Provincial Caucus of the left-leaning New Democratic Party (NDP) joined to organize a March Against Poverty.

In the spring of 1989, three groups of marchers traveled over a two-week period from Ottawa, Sudbury, and Windsor to converge on the Ontario legislature in Toronto. The march drew large-scale support along its routes and a crowd of some 4,000 to the culminating rally at Queen's Park in Toronto. The level of support influenced the government in increasing welfare rates by approximately 9 percent. Many who had participated felt that a long-term anti-poverty coalition was necessary and possible.

The new organization had to make an immediate choice about the direction it would take. Two models were advanced at the founding conference in November 1990. On the one hand, some wanted a "concerned citizens" organization to recruit people across the social spectrum to educate the public and lobby governments. The opposing idea was a militant organization of the poor to mobilize resistance in low-income communities. The debate was extremely sharp, but the notion of a poor people's organization won over the majority and OCAP came into being.

As OCAP was formed, the first NDP government in Ontario took office. Bob Rae and his Agenda for People were voted in following an election marked by social mobilization against the Liberals. The NDP spent a short while vacillating and then veered sharply to the right, creating a difficult environment for organizing as people had placed great hopes in the new government and were demoralized by its betrayal. Slowly, OCAP sought to challenge this backsliding regime as it abandoned promises, leading to a new movement.

The NDP moved from its pledge to "end the need for food banks" to freezing welfare rates, hiring dozens of investigators to crack down on welfare recipients. OCAP held demonstrations to confront government leaders and took over a public meeting called by the social services minister to promote "welfare cops." After the minister fled, OCAP led the meeting instead. OCAP began to focus on mobilizing to defend individuals and families facing attack. Mass delegations were brought to welfare offices. Landlords were picketed, immigration offices were invaded to defend people facing deportation, and OCAP engaged in what it called "direct action casework."

The election of the Mike Harris Tory regime in 1995 marked a turning point. A hard-right government now held power, imposing a "Common Sense Revolution" on the poor with particular fierceness. One million people on welfare had their benefits cut by 21.6 percent, social housing construction was terminated, the minimum wage was frozen, and tenants' rights were eliminated as homelessness and poverty soared. OCAP began mobilizing, marching on Queen's Park and from Toronto's poor community of Regent Park to the mansion of the lieutenant governor of Ontario in affluent Rosedale, who was about to sign the order to slash welfare rates.

After some hesitation, a movement against Harris emerged. Unions and social movements combined for the Ontario Days of Action. Citywide strikes and protests were held that showed the power of workers and the anger of communities. However, the bureaucracy remained in control, and the Days of Action did not become a province-wide challenge. Harris rode them out, knowing that the Labor leaders feared serious social mobilization more than they disliked his government.

When the Days of Action ended, OCAP continued fighting, resisting the attacks on the homeless with two mass delegations to the federal parliament that helped increase spending on emergency shelters and prevent closures of homeless hostels. OCAP occupied a downtown park to demand provision for the homeless and an end to police harassment. For four days OCAP held the park until a massive police mobilization broke it up. The level of support in the homeless community, however, was expanded by this action, including a huge feast provided by allies from the Mohawks of the Bay of Quinte.

On June 15, 2000, OCAP brought 1,500 people to the Ontario legislature to demand that it receive a delegation of the homeless. The police used horses and riot police to clear the grounds and a pitched battle followed in which dozens on both sides were injured. Dozens of arrests followed and serious charges were laid. The media denounced the “Queen’s Park Riot,” but support continued to increase in poor communities.

OCAP continued to organize a fight against the Tories that culminated on October 16, 2001, when 2,500 people marched into Toronto’s financial district and disrupted its operations in defiance of a massive police mobilization. Harris stepped down and his replacement would lead the Tories into a defeat in the 2003 election by a Liberal regime, under Dalton McGuinty, dedicated to reducing the political temperature while quietly consolidating the work of the Tories.

By the time McGuinty took office, welfare rates had lost some 40 percent of their spending power. OCAP held several actions to demand an increase, including a raid on an upscale grocery store, removing food and distributing it in a poor neighborhood, and then took the bill to McGuinty’s office.

OCAP used a provision within the welfare regulations called the “Special Diet,” under which a medical provider could fill in a form giving a person on assistance up to $250 a month for food deemed medically necessary. This provision was largely unknown and, in any case, welfare offices would simply reject applications. OCAP disseminated information about the benefit and organized medical clinics to enable people to obtain it. In 2005, a huge campaign got underway that saw thousands pass through clinics and a sustained mobilization to challenge welfare offices that blocked the applications. Some 8,000 attended OCAP clinics and other organizations held their own. Word of mouth in poor communities, however, took the situation much further. In 2005, spending on the Special Diet doubled and an additional $40 million went to low-income households.

At the end of the year, the Liberals brought out a new form that limited the Special Diet, but OCAP continued to hold clinics to provide benefits to poor families. OCAP mobilized specifically low-income and immigrant communities, including the Somali community. Support was strong enough to form a body called OCAP

Women of Etobicoke led by Somali women, which continues to stand against racism and poverty confronting that community.

The agenda of social cutbacks has combined in Toronto with a process of upscale redevelopment that sharpens the attack considerably. By the end of the first decade of the 2000s, OCAP continued mobilizing the homeless to confront a drive to force them from the central area of the city through failing to provide basic repairs for public housing in Toronto.

OCAP has sought to go beyond the role of an “activist” organization, building a Toronto poor people’s movement rooted in the communities under attack and redefining the notion of resistance to neoliberal capitalism, which has worsened poverty in Ontario.

SEE ALSO: Canada, Law and Public Protest: History; On-to-Ottawa Trek

References and Suggested Readings

- Piven, F. F. & Cloward, R. (1978) Poor People’s Movements: Why They Succeed, How they Fail. New York: Vintage.
- Shantz, J. (2003) Fighting to Win: The Ontario Coalition Against Poverty. In Notes from Nowhere (Ed.), We Are Everywhere: The Irresistible Rise of Global Anticapitalism. London: Verso, pp. 134–9.

On-to-Ottawa Trek

Molly Pulver Ungar

The On-to-Ottawa Trek began on June 3, 1935 and ended with the Regina Riot on July 1. It was one of the flashpoints of social discontent in Canada at the height of the economic and unemployment crisis during the Great Depression of 1929–39. Although the participants in the trek did not achieve their specific goals, this event is considered an important factor in the defeat of the Conservatives in the election of 1935. The legacy of the trek is also linked to the subsequent closing of federal relief camps and amendments to the Criminal Code. The experience of the trek heightened labor and left-wing solidarity while showing that the most effective avenue for social action in the future would be representation in government.

Over 1,300 unemployed men, most of them inmates of government-run relief camps in British Columbia, boarded east-bound freight trains in Vancouver with the intention of traveling to Ottawa. The men had gone on strike two months earlier, refusing to participate in a federal program of make-work projects for 20 cents per day plus meagre room and board. Organized by the communist-inspired Workers' Unity Party and led by Arthur "Slim" Evans, the strikers wanted to explain their grievances to Conservative Prime Minister W. B. Bennett in the nation's capital, and to present their demands for improved conditions in the camps, work for fair wages, and increased funds for relief.

Initially, the federal government promised not to intervene, but soon it became involved in disputes with municipal and provincial authorities over the issue of who would bear responsibility for feeding and sheltering the men. As the freight train made its way through Alberta and toward Saskatchewan, more men joined, and the trek attracted supporters from the public and organized groups. The government's anxiety grew, and representatives increasingly expressed the conviction that the trek was a communist-led revolutionary movement meant to overthrow the country's legally elected authorities. By June 11, the federal government decided that the trek would be forcibly halted in Regina with the aid of local police and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP); the railway companies immediately agreed not to carry trekkers past Regina.

When the 50-car freight arrived in Regina, it carried about 2,000 men who were greeted by thousands of well-wishers and sympathizers, but who were barred from proceeding further. After fruitless negotiations with two federal cabinet ministers, the trekkers agreed to send a delegation of eight men to Ottawa for a face-to-face meeting with the prime minister. This acrimonious, one-hour encounter solved nothing and strengthened the positions of each side: the federal government remained adamant that the men should return to relief camps, and the trekkers continued in their assumption that they would proceed to Ottawa.

The week that followed the June 26 return of the trekker delegation to Regina was filled with uncertainty and confusion. Many possibilities were discussed as options became fewer; rallies and demonstrations were held to raise money for food, and the trek leadership offered to end the journey if they were allowed to leave Regina. However, the RCMP insisted that the men first go to a holding camp outside the city. Arthur Evans and a small party in private vehicles even attempted to cross the border into Manitoba, but were turned back.

On the evening of July 1, a national holiday, the trekkers organized a fundraising rally in Market Square, drawing between 1,500 and 2,000 city residents as well as the unemployed marchers. As the first speaker began his address, a whistle blew and about 500 RCMP and Regina police armed with baseball bats and truncheons rushed to arrest four of the trek's leaders. A five-hour battle resulted as trekkers fought police with rocks and bricks in Market Square and adjoining city streets. Police used tear gas and finally firearms to end the confrontation. There were 120 arrests, and an equal number sent to hospital with injuries; one plain-clothes detective died, beaten to death. Authorities as well as trekkers recoiled from the violence and four days later the federal government allowed the unemployed to leave Regina on passenger trains, at the government's expense. During the trials that followed, mass protests in favor of the trekkers were held in cities across Canada, and perhaps contributed to the relative leniency of the sentencing: eight of those arrested received prison sentences of up to 14 months. At the completion of the trials, the provincially appointed Regina Riot Inquiry Commission began investigations, and released its findings in May of 1936.

The Commission's report established the first interpretation of the meaning and significance of the events of July 1. It concluded that the actions of the federal government, the RCMP, and the Regina police were justifiable and without blame, while Arthur Evans and the trekkers were accused of instigating the riot with the help of communist agitators, and of plotting to overthrow the Canadian government. About 40 years passed before scholars began to reexamine the trek and the Regina Riot, in light of emerging first-hand accounts and increasing interest in labor and left-wing history. New interpretations of the events of the summer of 1935 point to an authoritative, intransigent Canadian state, unwilling to consider the welfare of citizens caught in hard times. Contemporary scholars have argued that if the contempt of the police toward the unemployed had been restrained, or their eagerness for confrontation had been discouraged, the riot could have been avoided. The image of the Regina Riot has therefore changed from a trekker riot to a police riot.

SEE ALSO: Canada, Labor Protests; Canada, Law and Public Protest: History; Ontario Coalition Against Poverty (OCAP); Regina Riot; Unemployed Protests

References and Suggested Readings

- Bright, D. (1997) The State, the Unemployed and the Communist Party in Calgary, 1930–5. Canadian Historical Review 78 (4): 537–65.
- Brown, L. (1987) When Freedom Was Lost: The Unemployed, the Agitator and the State. Montreal: Black Rose Books.
- Howard, V. (1985) “We Were the Salt of the Earth”: The On-to-Ottawa Trek and the Regina Riot. Regina: Canadian Plains Research Center.
- Liversedge, R. (1973) Recollections of the On-to-Ottawa Trek. Ed. V. Howard. Toronto: McClelland & Stewart.
- Waiser, B. (2003) All Hell Can't Stop Us: The On-to-Ottawa Trek and Regina Riot. Calgary: Fifth House.

Ortega, Daniel (b. 1945)

Robert Sierakowski

Daniel Ortega Saavedra was a guerilla comandante of the Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN) who served as the president of Nicaragua on two occasions, most recently being elected in 2006. Born in La Libertad, Ortega was the son of a former collaborator of Augusto César Sandino, the nationalist guerilla leader who fought against the US occupation of Nicaragua. Ortega attended the best private schools in Managua, where he and his younger brothers were involved with Christian organizing and Bible lessons in slums. From his teenage years, Ortega was involved with political organizing against the Somoza regime, finding himself arrested on numerous occasions. He entered the law program at the University of Central America, only to drop out to focus on anti-regime activities and join the FSLN, a leftist guerilla organization that modeled itself upon the example of the Cuban Revolution.

In 1967 he played a role in the assassination of Gonzalo Lacayo, the infamous regime torturer, and was captured and jailed for seven years. In December 1974, a Sandinista commando team took a large number of Somoza allies hostage, and Ortega was freed in the prisoner exchange. With the Sandinistas split along tactical lines, he and his brother Humberto became the leaders of the Tercerista (the “Third Way,” the insurrectionist faction of the FSLN). His younger brother Camilo was killed in the 1978 rebellion in Monimbó, while during the Final Offensive of 1979, Ortega served as a comandante in the northern front.

When the revolutionaries came to power on July 19, 1979, Ortega became the most public face of the new government, serving on both the Junta of National Reconstruction and the National Directorate of the FSLN. His brother Humberto headed up the Sandinista Popular Army at the same time. In 1984, Daniel became the presidential candidate for the Sandinistas, winning 65 percent of the vote. In his role as president of Nicaragua, Ortega was forced to confront the US government of Ronald Reagan, which attempted through military, political, and economic means to overthrow the Revolution. With spiraling inflation and an incredibly unpopular military draft blamed on Ortega, he lost a 1990 presidential election to Violeta Barrios de Chamorro, whose candidacy was backed by the US.

Ortega ran again for the presidency, unsuccessfully, in 1996 and 2001, before winning again in 2006. His stepdaughter's allegations of two decades of sexual abuse further damaged support for Ortega among Sandinistas. His control over the FSLN political party and willingness to form pacts with the right have raised many eyebrows. As he returned to office in 2007, there was widespread skepticism that the revolutionary spark of Daniel Ortega had long ago been extinguished.

SEE ALSO: Fonseca, Carlos (1936–1976); Martí, Farabundo (1893–1932); Nicaraguan Revolution, 1970s–1980s; Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN); Sandino, Augusto César (1895–1934)

References and Suggested Readings

- Arias, P. (1980) Nicaragua: Revolución. Relatos de combatientes del Frente Sandinista. Mexico City: Editores Siglo XXI.
- Borge, T. et al. (1982) Sandinistas Speak: Speeches, Writings, and Interviews with the Leaders of Nicaragua's Revolution. New York: Pathfinder Press.
- Ortega Saavedra, H. (2004) La epopeya de la insurrección. Managua: LEA Grupo Ed.

Ortiz, Fernando (1881–1969)

Rhawn Garrick Jooste

Fernando Ortiz was a Cuban musicologist, lawyer, ethnologist, philosopher, and writer considered the third discoverer of Cuba, due to his research into Cuba's African heritage, and the disseminator of a transcultural Cuban identity. His work centers on Afro-Cuban folklore and music. He founded the Sociedad del Folklore Cubano (1923) and the Sociedad de Estudios Afrocubanos (1937), as well as periodicals such as Revista de Administración Teórica y Práctica del Estado, la Provincia y el Municipio (1912), Archivos del Folklore (1924), Surco (1930), and Ultra (1936). However, his main repute stems from his publications engaging with both religious and non-religious Afro-Cuban musicology, sociology, law, and folklore. His work ranges from critiques and jurisprudence to ethnology and linguistics.

Ortiz escaped the Ten Year War in Cuba with his family, moving to the Balearic Island of Menorca. He relocated to Spain, where he earned a BA from the University of Barcelona (1895) and completed his studies in penal law at the University of Havana (1895–9). HE returned to Barcelona for his law degree (1900) and finally achieved a doctorate in law at Madrid University (1901). He returned to Havana and received the title of Doctor of Civil and Public Law (1902). He was in the Cuban diplomatic service from 1903 to 1906. From 1906 he was district attorney for Havana and assistant professor at the School of Public Law at Havana University. He exerted influence over Cuban cultural events as a member of the Grupo Minorista.

His interest in musicology originated in his student days; he was a self-taught musician and an authority on Cuban folklore. Initially, he specialized in racial positivism of penal law. His research furthered the recognition of the influence of transculturation, a cultural change induced by foreign cultural elements, within the formation of the Cuban identity, as described in his book Contrapunteo cubano del tabaco y del azúcar (1940).

Ortiz taught summer courses at Havana University covering political science, law, and Cuban ethnography. During these lectures the next generation of ethnologists – such as Argeliers León, María Teresa Linares, and Isaac Barreal – were introduced to his ideas that informed their work. He created his own cultural language clarifying Cuban identity. These neologisms denote a vernacular language elucidating Cuba in a Cuban way. This identity was not insular but a sensation of belonging to the land, Cubanidad – a part of the state – which Ortiz transforms into Cubania, a state of mind, and a will to belong to what is available for all.

Ortiz's first book, Hampa Cuba: Los Negros bruños, dealt with the underworld of Cuba, and is considered a milestone in Afro-Cuban cultural studies. He developed a theory calling for the incarceration of all “black” criminals for their primitivism and advocated the banning of their religion. From this early beginning, arguing for racial positivism, Ortiz reached the conclusion in his 1945 essay The Fraud of Race that race itself constituted a xenophobic terminology. Thereafter, he argued in opposition to racial discrimination. He finally championed the African distinctiveness in Cuba and is the originator of the term Afrocubano.

SEE ALSO: Cuba, Anti-Racist Movement and the Partido Independiente de Color; Cuba, Struggle for Independence from Spain, 1868–1898; Cuban Revolution, 1953–1959; Martí, José (1853–1895) and the Partido Revolucionario Cubano

References and Suggested Readings

- Font Mauricio, A. & Quiroz, A. W. (Eds.) (2004) Cuban Counterpoints: The Legacy of Fernando Ortiz. Lanham, MD: Lexington Books.
- Perez, L. A. (1999) On Becoming Cuban: Identity, Nationality, and Culture. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Rodriguez-Mangual, E. M. (Ed.) (2004) Lydia Cabrera and the Construction of an Afro-Cuban Cultural Identity (Envisioning Cuba). Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

Ōsugi Sakae (1885–1923)

David G. Nelson

Ōsugi Sakae, Japanese anarchist intellectual leader, was a prolific writer and translator of the works of anarchists including Kropotkin, Bakunin, and Goldman. Born in Shikoku, Ōsugi attended

Nagoya Cadet School until his expulsion for disorderly conduct in 1901. Thereafter he moved to Tokyo to attend middle school, where he buried himself in his studies and embarked on a spiritual journey, ultimately turning to anarchism after his mother's death. Anarchist Kōtoku Shūsui discovered Ōsugi and recruited him as a contributor for Kōtoku's paper, the Heimin shimbun. Ōsugi eventually became central to the Japanese anarchist movement as an ardent, vocal activist.

The years 1906 to 1910 were formative; Ōsugi spent much of this time imprisoned for press law violations and participation in demonstrations. Ōsugi served two years after the 1908 Red Flag Incident, in which he was arrested for arguing with police over the display of red flags inscribed with anarchist slogans. In prison he learned several European languages and became well-read in sciences and political thought. In addition, Ōsugi avoided implication in the 1910 High Treason Incident when a foiled plot to assassinate Emperor Meiji served as pretext for the execution of 12 anarchists, including Kōtoku and his ex-wife Kanno Suga. After this tragic event, Ōsugi foreswore the use of violent tactics in his attacks on Japan's sociopolitical system. Through his writing, Ōsugi assumed a leading role in the anarchist movement. Police efforts to silence him were futile; when they shut down one of a series of periodicals, Ōsugi merely published another, keeping the movement in the forefront of public awareness.

Ōsugi's translations of western anarchist literature shaped not only the anarchist movement in Japan, but also his personal life. Enamored with egoism and free love embedded in the literature he translated, the married Ōsugi carried on an affair with anarchist Kamichika Ichiko. In 1916, he also moved in with feminist anarchist writer Itō Noe. While Itō shared Ōsugi's views on free love, the other two women did not – his wife divorced him and Kamichika attempted to kill him.

Through correspondence and his continued translation work, Ōsugi kept the Japanese anarchist movement in close contact with larger world events. Invited to participate in the 1923 IWA meeting in Berlin, he smuggled himself out of Japan in order to attend. In transit, however, he attended a May Day rally in France where authorities arrested and subsequently deported him. Two months later, Ōsugi's career came to a tragic end. Using the ensuing turmoil of the 1923 Tokyo earthquake as justification, police arrested several political activists, including Ōsugi and Itō. Likely under orders from government superiors, police strangled Ōsugi and Itō in their cells.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism and Gender; Anarchism, Japan; Bakunin, Mikhail Alexandrovich (1814–1876); Goldman, Emma (1869–1940); Itō Noe; (1895–1923); Kropotkin, Peter (1842–1921)

References and Suggested Readings

- Garcia, V. (2000) Three Japanese Anarchists: Kotoku, Osugi, and Yamaga. London: Kate Sharpley Library.
- Ōsugi, S. (1992) The Autobiography of Ōsugi Sakae. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Stanley, T. A. (1982) Ōsugi Sakae, Anarchist in Taishō Japan: The Creativity of the Ego. Cambridge: Council on East Asian Studies, Harvard University.

Owen, Robert (1771–1858)

Christian A. Griggs

Robert Owen was a nineteenth-century reformer, spiritualist, and utopian socialist who believed a person's character was the product of their environment. Known as the founder of socialist ideals in Britain, throughout his life he strived to improve the condition of the working class during the earliest stages of the Industrial Revolution.

Owen was born in Newtown, Montgomeryshire in Wales to parents of humble origins and experienced a happy childhood in his large family. He excelled in school, showing a love of reading, but his formal instruction ended prematurely when sent to work at age nine. He found employment in the cloth industry, initially as the apprentice of a draper in Stamford, Lincolnshire before taking jobs in London and then Manchester. Owen was educated in industry and business and showed potential, in 1792 taking a position as factory manager for Peter Drinkwater in Manchester, overseeing 500 employees at a salary of £300 per year. The factory prospered under his guidance, known for the quality of its thread and efficiency of its workers. By 1796 Owen was an established businessman and joined the Manchester Board of Health and the Literary and Philosophical Society, placing him in contact with humanitarians helping him to develop ideas for reform.

In 1798 Owen traveled to the mill of New Lanark in Glasgow and met with the owner, David Dale. The next year, he and a group of partners purchased the factory for £60,000 and Owen married Dale's daughter, Caroline. It was at New Lanark that Owen would establish his reputation as a socialist. Owen began managing the factory on January 1, 1800 and immediately introduced a system of reform. His years toiling and then managing industry gave Owen awareness of working-class misery, and he thought he could rescue workers from their wretched conditions through changing their surroundings. He introduced an improved working environment, reducing reliance on child labor, decreasing hours, and rewarding worker achievement. He then sought to improve workers' lives outside the factory through establishing schools, constructing habitable housing, making available quality food at lower prices, and assessing fines for immoral behavior. The reforms improved worker lives and the factory remained profitable. By 1816 New Lanark gained a reputation throughout Europe as a viable socialist utopian community under capitalism.

Using the recognition and profits from New Lanark, Owen sought wider reform throughout Britain and began disseminating his message worldwide. Hoping to replicate the success of New Lanark he met with leaders of church and state in Britain, presenting his ideas on ending poverty in the country and seeking parliamentary passage of a factory reform bill. Owen visited the United States in 1824, and after meeting with leading American politicians he established the Community of Equality at New Harmony, Indiana in 1825, another utopian community. New Harmony failed within two years, as the inhabitants never accepted the Owenite philosophy. Although New Harmony's failure tarnished Owen's reputation, throughout his lifetime he continued to publicize the philosophy on visits to Mexico, the West Indies, Ireland, continental Europe, and on his return trips to the US. In the 1830s Owen joined the British trades union movement, eventually becoming grand master of the Grand National Consolidated Trades Union. However, in 1834, the union disbanded without unifying British workers throughout the nation. Soon thereafter, Owen formed the Rational Society to propagate his socialist ideas through publications and lectures through 1844. Owen's final years were spent traveling to promote his vision of utopian socialism and turning to spiritualism in 1853 before his death in Newtown in November 1858.

Owen was considered a radical and revolutionary in Britain during an era of rapid industrialization. He sought to transform the lives of workers through rationally improving the workplace and local communities. Owen's ideas were influential in reforming government policies on labor, education, and care for the poor through his core belief that environment shaped individual character. By the 1820s he was among the first advocates to openly espouse socialist ideals in Britain. But Owen's socialism, disparagingly labeled utopian socialism, did not demand a violent revolution as did the scientific socialism of Marx. Instead, it sought to share the profits of industrial capitalism with those whose labor made the system work. While Owen's socialism was soon overshadowed by Marxist notions that capitalist society was inherently malevolent and unalterable, his practice was crucial in advancing intellectual knowledge of utopian communities.

SEE ALSO: Britain, Trade Union Movement; Cooperative Commonwealth; Engels, Friedrich (1820–1895); Father Rapp (1757–1847) and Harmony; Icaria Utopian Community; Marx, Karl (1818–1883); Oneida Perfectionist Utopians; Shakers Utopian Community; Socialism, Britain; Utopian Communities, United States; Utopian Intentional Communities; Wright, Frances "Fanny" (1795–1852)

References and Suggested Readings

- Claeys, G. (2004) Owen, Robert. In H. Matthew and B. Harrison (Eds.), The Oxford Dictionary of National Biography. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Cole, G. (1966) The Life of Robert Owen. Hamden: Archon Books.
- Owen, R. (1857–8/1967) The Life of Robert Owen Written by Himself, 2 vols. New York: August M. Kelley.
- Pollard, S. & Salt, J. (Eds.) (1971) Robert Owen: Prophet to the Poor. Lewisburg: Bucknell University Press.

P

Padilla, Juan de (ca. 1490–1521)

Sean T. Perrone

Juan de Padilla was an important military leader in the Comunero Revolt (1520–1) in Castile. He was born in 1490 to a prominent hidalgo (lower nobility) family in the city of Toledo. By the late 1510s Padilla was disgruntled, feeling slighted after the new king passed him over for public office. In 1519 he used his position on the city council of Toledo to rally opposition to Charles V's policies and to initiate a petition among the cities demanding that Charles not leave Spain or appoint foreigners to public offices, or use Castilian revenues in his bid to become Holy Roman Emperor.

In April 1520 Padilla and his supporters seized control of Toledo, proclaiming a Comunidad (autonomous city). In June the city of Toledo convened a Cortes (parliament) and most cities slowly rallied to the Comunero cause, except for those in the south, while many nobles were initially ambivalent. In August 1520 Juan de Padilla secured Tordesillas, residence of Queen Juana (Charles's mother), and assembled a junta to govern Castile in her name. In a political move to bind the nobility to the movement, the junta removed Padilla from military command and appointed the nobleman Pedro Girón captain-general in October. This move offended Padilla, who returned to Toledo with his troops. It also marked a turning point in the movement, which gradually began to splinter between moderate and radical elements.

By December the Comuneros were on the defensive, having lost Tordesillas and witnessing Girón's defection. So the junta summoned Padilla from Toledo to lead the military again. Under his command the Comuneros won several victories, most notably capturing the castle at Torrelobatón on February 28, 1521. Padilla's victory, however, was short-lived. He had to withdraw from Torrelobatón in April before a royalist advance, and his troops were overtaken during their retreat. At the Battle of Villalar (April 23, 1521), royalist forces crushed his militia. Padilla and the Segovian leader Juan Bravo were executed the next day (April 24).

Padilla's defeat at Villalar has long been seen as turning point in Castilian history, bringing an end to the liberty and independence of the Castilian municipalities and ushering in royal absolutism. Yet many of the Comuneros' demands were incorporated into royal policy after the Cortes of 1523, and the cities continued to hold sway on issues of taxation. More interestingly, the rhetoric of the Comunero revolt, emphasizing the common good, continued to play a central role in early modern Castilian political and legal thought and to shape the political action of urban elites.

SEE ALSO: Comunero Movement

References and Suggested Readings

- Haliczer, S. (1981) The Comuneros of Castile: The Forging of a Revolution 1475–1521. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.
- Owens, J. B. (2005) "By My Absolute Royal Authority": Justice and the Castilian Commonwealth at the Beginning of the First Global Age. Rochester: University of Rochester Press.
- Seaver, H. L. (1928) The Great Revolt in Castile: A Study of the Comunero Movement of 1520–1521. Boston: Houghton Mifflin.

Paine, Thomas (1737–1809)

Stacy Warner Maddern

Writing of "the times that try men's souls" in his essay The Crisis, Thomas Paine issued the battle-cry of the American Revolution. Paine communicated ideas of revolution to peasants and intellectuals alike, creating prose that would both inspire passion and receive tremendous ridicule. Paine would incite revolution in America, Britain, and France, addressing every class of people without discrimination, envisioning a society that was free of slavery, advocating world peace, and demanding security for both poor and elderly.

Born in England in 1737, the son of a Quaker corset maker, Paine's empathy for the poor came from childhood observations of suffering and violence at the hands of the state. These experiences would leave deep scars on Paine, manifesting distaste for excessive wealth and compassion for the poor. By the time he came to America, Paine had discovered a distinct relationship between affluence and distress. On January 10, 1776 he published anonymously a pamphlet entitled Common Sense that made a persuasive argument for the American colonies to separate, politically and economically, from Britain. He began by defining the "origin and design of government" in order to show Americans that they were a people with exceptional purpose and promise. In drawing a line between society and government he claimed "society in every state is a blessing, but government, even in its best state, is but a necessary evil." Paine's flare for words created prose that every common farmer could comprehend and established a new form of political grammar for hundreds of thousands of Americans. Common Sense initially issued in 150,000 copies, but by the end of the American Revolution nearly half a million had been printed. Declaring that "a government of our own is our natural right," Paine sought to open eyes and empower ambition in the young country.

He succeeded in pushing colonial leaders toward revolution, but he also aroused fears of anarchy and democratic tyranny. John Adams, emerging as Paine's primary rival, was suspicious and fearful of any call for revolution. Initially, Adams supported the call for independence and republicanism, but was distrustful of anyone who questioned too closely the English Constitution. The confrontation of ideas between Adams and Paine illustrates the larger ideological battles of American political culture, as one side tried to limit democracy while the other consistently sought to expand it. Adams' apprehension of Paine grew from a fear among political elites that radical democracy inspired working classes. By the spring of 1776 local councils and provincial assemblies began passing resolutions that adopted the principles contained in Paine's pamphlet, pressuring delegates in Philadelphia to follow suit and call for independence from, rather than reform within, the English government. Between 1776 and 1783 Paine continued his support of the revolutionary cause by issuing 16 American Crisis papers. Through these pages he reaffirmed those patriotic arguments he began in Common Sense, reinvigorating Americans in time of war and recharging their patriotic spirit with messages of destiny and sacrifice.

Paine's writings extended beyond America, inspiring a rising generation of European radicals. After the war Paine returned to England in 1787, only to be confronted with the outbreak of revolution in France. He again supported the revolutionary cause, claiming it to be a continuation of events that had begun in America. He viewed the system of government throughout Europe as outdated, now facing movements that were grounded in rationality and moral fortitude.

When Britain's leading statesman, Edmund Burke, published Reflections on the Revolution in France, Paine was appalled. Burke denounced the revolution in France by elevating Britain's political system over the popular politics that led not to progress, but to chaos, violence, and tyranny. Burke's attack infuriated Paine, who responded by writing his own defense of the French Revolution with the Rights of Man. At the heart of Rights of Man lay Paine's belief that a sensibly run society would eliminate misfortune and that revolution was a justifiable means to establishing such a rational order. He challenged Burke's thesis on the evolution of society and its inability to improve on a rational basis. He also challenged the legitimacy of the authority of government, arguing that natural rights existed prior to civil society and on this basis legitimate societies were the product of such. By the same course, illegitimate societies could be reformed according to independent measures seeking to correct the violation of these rights. Paine held that equality was a natural state and as such any civil right that violated equality was held accountable to natural right. This argument served an important function in proving the inefficiency of hereditary monarchies. Paine's assertion for a republican form of government eliminated a tyrannical monarch since the administration of government, set to the task of flourishing society, was to be elected by the people. This, for Paine, was their natural right, as was the ability to remove from office those administrators who proved incompetent in the task at hand. Rights of Man also advocated measures beyond Burke. He called for free education, old age pensions, welfare benefits, and child allowances in order to show the poor and working classes that a better life was possible and certainly attainable.

The response in England was overwhelming among the working classes, who were willing to scratch together whatever means they had to buy the book. Beginning as what might be considered a radical manifesto, Rights of Man was an instant sensation even after it became a crime to possess it. Paine maintained that America had “made a stand, not for herself only, but for all the world,” and it was now up to others to advance the cause. “If universal peace, civilization, and commerce, are ever to be the happy lot of man,” he wrote, “it cannot be accomplished but by a revolution in the system of governments.”

Throughout his life Paine had witnessed monarchial regimes taxing the productive classes, transferring wealth to parasitic royals and aristocrats, and punishing working people and the poor. Because of this he had come to view non-democratic governments, not markets, as the fundamental cause of social inequality and oppression. Consequently, he proposed the liberation of the market and expansion of commercial activity. He stood by revolution as a means of acquiring change. Paine held government accountable to ensure that the “poor are happy; neither ignorance or distress is to be found among them; my jails are empty of prisoners, my streets of beggars; the aged are not in want, the taxes are not oppressive; the rational world is my friend because I am a friend of happiness.” When these things could be said, “then may that country boast of its government and constitution.” Such words elevated his reputation as a revolutionary and continue to echo around the shores of the Atlantic world.

In 1793 Paine was imprisoned in France because he opposed the execution of King Louis XVI. During his imprisonment he wrote The Age of Reason, which praised the Enlightenment and scorned organized religion. The book was not well received in America, as critics accused him of being an atheist, but in 1803 he returned to America by invitation from Thomas Jefferson. Three years later in 1809 he died in New York City. One newspaper reported, “He had lived long, did some good and much harm.”

SEE ALSO: American Revolution of 1776

References and Suggested Readings

- Foner, E. (2005) Tom Paine and Revolutionary America. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Fruchtman, J. (1994) Thomas Paine: Apostle of Freedom. New York: Four Walls Eight Windows.
- Kaye, H. (2005) Thomas Paine and the Promise of America. New York: Hill & Wang.
- Paine, T. (1995) Common Sense. New York: Fall River Press.
- Paine, T. (1999) The Rights of Man. Mineola, NY: Dover Publications.

Paisley, Ian (b. 1926) and Unionism, Northern Ireland

Kathleen Ruppert

Ian Richard Kyle Paisley is a fundamentalist preacher and an extremist right-wing politician in Northern Ireland. He won a large following among the majority Protestant population by demagogically appealing to its fear of being subjugated by the Catholic majority of the rest of Ireland. His oratorical and organizational skills thus brought him to the fore of the Unionist movement, which is devoted to preserving Northern Ireland’s union with Great Britain and resisting compromise with the Republic of Ireland. He utilized anti-Catholic bigotry – he famously declared that Catholics “breed like rabbits and multiply like vermin” – to create and lead a mass movement that waged strikes, street demonstrations, and other forms of militant protest, as well as paramilitary action, on behalf of the Unionist cause. The great influence he gained as a mass leader eventually elevated him above his more moderate rivals within the Unionist movement to the highest levels of political power in Northern Ireland.

In the late 1960s when a civil rights movement emerged in Northern Ireland – in emulation of the American civil rights movement – to defend the rights of the Catholic minority, Paisley was its most vociferous opponent. The organizations he created, the Ulster Constitution Defense Committee (UCDC) and the Protestant Volunteers, took the lead in staging counterdemonstrations against civil rights marches. The analogy with the social situation of blacks and whites in the American South is not inappropriate. The Protestants of Northern Ireland constitute a relatively privileged community, whereas the Catholics are socially, politically, and economically disadvantaged. The turbulent mass movement that looks to Paisley for leadership is devoted to maintaining the Protestants' privileged position, and like their American counterparts the Paisleyites have frequently had recourse to mob violence to keep the Catholics "in their place." Provocation is one of the hallmarks of Paisley's leadership style; he has frequently staged triumphalist "parades" through Catholic neighborhoods as a means of intimidating the minority community.

Although union with Great Britain has always been a cornerstone of Paisley's strategy for maintaining Protestant privilege, his ultraconservatism has frequently led him to bitterly oppose certain British social policies. Following the British parliament's partial decriminalization of homosexual acts in 1967, for example, he mobilized a homophobic "Save Ulster from Sodomy" movement to resist the extension of the British legislation to Northern Ireland. (Northern Ireland calls itself Ulster, although three of the nine Irish counties that constituted the historic province of Ulster are not part of it.)

Paisley was born in County Armagh, one of the North's six counties, in 1926. Shortly after his birth, Paisley's family moved to Ballymena, County Antrim, where his father became pastor of a Baptist church. Paisley received religious training at the South Wales Bible College and the Reformed Presbyterian Theological College in Belfast, and was ordained to the Baptist ministry in 1946. He became pastor of the Ravenhill Evangelical Mission Church in Belfast, but left to help form the Free Presbyterian Church of Ulster in 1951. As a leading spokesman of the new conservative evangelical denomination, Paisley launched a vociferous campaign against religious liberalism, modernism, and ecumenism. He was charged with disturbing the peace on more than one occasion in the late 1950s in connection with his militant anti-Catholicism and anti-modernism.

Paisley first attracted widespread public attention over an issue that for him had both religious and constitutional significance. When Pope John XXIII died in June 1963, Northern Ireland's prime minister, Captain Terence O'Neill, sent a message of condolence, and the Lord Mayor of Belfast lowered the Union Jack at City Hall to half-mast. Claiming that any recognition of the papal authority represented a threat to Protestant civil liberties, Paisley organized a raucous protest march and rally in response. He was arrested and fined for his part in the demonstration, but an anonymous donor paid his fine.

The following year, Paisley once again challenged authorities by threatening to remove the tricolor, the flag of the Irish Republic, from the window of the West Belfast office of Sinn Féin, an Irish republican political party. Paisley warned that if the Ulster police (the Royal Ulster Constabulary) (RUC) would not get rid of the offensive flag, he would do so himself. When the RUC moved in to seize the flag, their actions triggered some of the worst rioting in Belfast's history.

In the mid-1960s Paisley became an even more vociferous opponent of the more moderate Unionist political establishment, and particularly of Prime Minister O'Neill. Paisley accused O'Neill of betraying Protestant interests in his efforts to appease Catholic nationalist opinion. When O'Neill invited the Taoiseach (prime minister of the Republic of Ireland), Séan Lemass, to Stormont in January 1965, Paisley launched an "O'Neill must go" campaign to protest O'Neill's liberal reformist policies.

Amid mounting sectarian tensions in Northern Ireland, Paisley won a seat in the Stormont parliament at the Bannside by-election of April 1970. In general elections to the British parliament two months later, he won the North Antrim seat, which he has continued to hold for more than three decades.

Paisley joined with other Unionist dissidents in October 1971 to form a new party, the Democratic Unionist Party (DUP), which he has led since 1973. Following the suspension of the Stormont parliament in March 1972, Paisley and the DUP opposed direct rule from London and rejected all power-sharing alternatives, including the Sunningdale Agreement of December 1973. Paisley played an active role in the Ulster Workers' Council strike that toppled the power-sharing Northern Ireland Executive in 1974. In 1977 he attempted to replicate that success when he and Ernest Baird, leader of the Democratic Unionist Movement, organized a general strike under the auspices of the United Unionist Action Council. Known to the public as "Paisley's strike," the protest had as its main goals a return to majority-rule government at Stormont and the introduction of more stringent security measures against the Irish Republican Army. The strike itself was a failure, but the DUP gained considerable strength in the district council elections that immediately followed.

The DUP continued to grow in electoral strength throughout the 1970s. In June 1979 Paisley was elected on a strong popular vote to the European parliament, a seat he would hold until voluntarily relinquishing it in 2003. In the early 1980s Paisley and his followers vied with the Ulster Unionist Party (UUP) for control of the Unionist vote. He boosted his standing within the Unionist movement by leading a massive protest campaign against talks between British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher and the Republic of Ireland's Taoiseach, Charles Haughey.

Paisley's DUP and its main Unionist rival, the UUP, temporarily put aside their differences in order to protest the Anglo-Irish Agreement of 1985, which set up cross-border cooperation in security matters and gave the Republic of Ireland a consultative role in Northern Ireland's affairs. Relations between the two parties began to deteriorate, however, with the emergence of the peace process in the early 1990s. When Paisley walked out of all-party talks in 1997 the breakdown of the Unionist front was complete. Since April 1998, when the Anglo-Irish Agreement was supplanted by the Good Friday Agreement, Paisley has been at the forefront of opposition to the latter accord as well. In 2005 the DUP surpassed the UUP and emerged as the largest of the Unionist political parties, and on May 8, 2007 Paisley was elected First Minister of Northern Ireland.

SEE ALSO: Ireland, the Troubles; Irish Republican Army (IRA); Northern Ireland Peace Movement; Sinn Féin

References and Suggested Readings

Boyce, D. G. & O'Day, A. (Eds.) (2001) Defenders of the Union: A Survey of British and Irish Unionism since 1801. New York: Routledge.

Bruce, S. (1989) God Save Ulster! The Religion and Politics of Paisleyism. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Cooke, D. (1996) Persecuting Zeal: A Portrait of Ian Paisley. Dingle: Brandon/Mount Eagle.

The extent and content of Ian Paisley's anti-Catholic message is on full display at the website of his European Institute of Protestant Studies: www.IanPaisley.com

Pakistan, Bengali nationalist struggles

Muntassir Mamoon and Zarina Rahman Khan

Movement against Partition of Bengal (1905–1911)

From 1900 to 1947 there were various types of movements in the Indian subcontinent, some local and others national. Two political parties became prominent: the Congress and the Muslim League. These two political parties became the symbol of hopes and aspirations of the ordinary people, particularly the Hindu and the Muslim middle class. The Communist Party of India (CPI) also flourished in this period and became strong in the 1930s and 1940s. In particular the CPI organized the movement of the peasants and workers.

The influence of the national movements also affected eastern Bengal or Bangladesh. Prominent among these movements were the Swadeshi, which emphasized production and consumption of indigenous goods and rejection of British goods, Non-cooperation, the Khilafat, and the Pakistan movement. Many of the armed resistance or "terrorist" movements starting from 1900 to 1930 took place in East Bengal. Perhaps the most dramatic was the struggle over the partition of Bengal (1905–11).

Prior to 1905 Bengal meant a large part of India. The area of present Bangladesh or East Bengal, and several states of present India, Orissa, Bihar, Jharkhand, Assam, and West Bengal, were all within the territory of the Bengal Presidency. The size of this unit of land became a hindrance to proper administration. Plans for limiting the area of Bengal started with the creation of the post of lieutenant-governor of Bengal in 1854. Also, during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, Bengal became an important center of the anti-British movement. The initiative to divide Bengal into two provinces, separating the Bengali people in order to end the political cohesion among them, was given close attention in the beginning of the twentieth century. One reason for this was that East Bengal was a Muslim-predominant region. The home secretary to the government of British India, H. H. Risley, stated that Bengal united is a power. So its division would pull in several different ways.

There were strong movements both in support of and against the partition scheme, with the people divided into two camps. A Kolkata-based movement grew in opposition to the bangabhanga plan. Poets and writers joined this. In fact, an independent style of patriotic songs emerged and flourished on this movement. It was during this period that Rabindranath Tagore wrote Amar shonar bangla ami tomae bhalobashi (O my golden Bengal, I love you), which was adopted later as the national anthem of Bangladesh. Between December 1903 and October 1905 several thousand people participated in nearly 3,000 meetings all over Bengal to protest the British move to partition the country. Early Congress leaders like Surendranath Bandopadhyay and Bipin Chandra Pal provided leadership in these initiatives and a number of Muslims were also associated with them. The majority of the common people in East Bengal, however, did not support this urban middle-class movement.

The movement in favor of a divided Bengal was given leadership by the Nawab of Dhaka, Salimullah, and supported by the British. Almost 90 percent of the Hindu peasantry also supported the bangabhanga, as did most Muslims. Some other religious communities supported the Divide Bengal Plan as well. The new province of East Bengal was created in 1905, and the anti-British sentiment that was created during the movement against the partition started to surface in different ways, so that in 1911 the whole project had to be reversed by the British. And with this move the capital of India was shifted from Kolkata to Delhi.

The Swadeshi, or movement to boycott British goods and use local products, started almost parallel to the bangabhanga movement. It spread quickly, not only in Bengal but also outside its territory. However, with the trend in religion influencing politics since 1905, public opinion in India started to divide along these lines. Muslim participation was relatively low in this movement for two reasons. First, the relatively higher cost of indigenous goods meant that for poor Muslim cultivators it became an imposition that they did not like. Second, the growth of Hindu cultural nationalism, with its use of Hindu icons and symbols, alienated many Muslims.

Tebhaga Movement (1946–1950)

The peasant movement in Bangladesh expanded and reached its maturity in 1946–50. At this time it was estimated that in 19 districts over 6,000,000 peasants joined the movement called the tebhaga (three-parts). The districts were Dinajpur, Rangpur, Pabna, Dhaka, Mymensingh, Khulna, Jessore, Faridpur, Bogra, Chittagong in present Bangladesh and in West Bengal, Medinipur, 24 Parganas, Howrah, Hooghli, Nadia, Bankura, Birbhum, Malda, and Jalpaiguri. There was solid unity between Hindus, Muslims, or Adivasis (“tribal” people) involved in the movement.

The zamindars, or landlords, established their proprietary rights with the Permanent Settlement Act of 1793. The peasants paid taxes to cultivate the land, and gradually their conditions worsened. During the late nineteenth century the provision of security to tenure-holders created one more layer of well-to-do sub-proprietors, the jotedars. Formally, they were tenants of zamindars, but they did not cultivate land. Instead, they let it out to poor or landless peasants who became sharecroppers under unregulated agreements with various names, but generally called barga.

World War II, economic depression, and famine made the conditions of the peasants intolerable. The price of crops fell and the peasants lived in hunger. In 1940 the government constituted the Floud Commission to report on the peasants’ situation. It reported that in Bengal 3,000,000 out of 7,500,000 peasant families had no rights on land. Peasants labored as sharecroppers to cultivate land controlled by jotedars. To pay taxes many had to take loans at very high interest rates from moneylenders known as mahajans. Zamindars also collected abwabs from them, and most peasants had to leave behind their share of the crop as abwab after the harvest. For sharecropping, the condition was 50 percent to the cultivator, but the Floud Commission recommended that it should be divided into three shares, with two going to the cultivators and one to the landlord. This was known as the tebhaga, and the movement that supported it was called the Tebhaga movement.

Political parties also worked among the peasants, but the initiative to lead the movement was organized by the Peasant Front of the CPI, the Bangiyo Pradeshik Krishak Sabha (Bengal Provincial Peasant Association). Under the slogan "Land to the Tiller" (or "Land to the Owner of the Plough"), peasants demanded that the cultivator retain rights to the land that he tilled. They also insisted that the crop after harvest go only to the silos of the cultivator and not to the jotedar. They wanted two shares of the crop to go to the cultivator and one to the jotedar and for the lending rate of the jotedar or mahajan to be reduced to 12.5 percent. They also wanted the levying of abwab abolished and for the cultivator to be entitled to a receipt from the owner on delivery of the crop.

The first stage of the movement continued from 1946 to 1947. The peasants started to organize from 1946 and resolved to resist attempts to prevent taking their share of the crop to the courtyard of the jotedar. In some areas peasant leaders requested that every family contribute one young man, a bamboo stick, and a rupee to the movement. The peasants responded to this enthusiastically. Outside the traditional bases of the Peasant Association it was popular pressure – not imposition by party from above – that created a groundswell. About 4,000,000 peasants fought directly against the stick-wielding lathiyals of the jotedars and the police.

At the beginning of 1947 the cultivators harvested paddy in their own regions and took it to their own silos. Naturally the jotedars, lathiyals, and police tried to prevent this. The first clash with the police occurred in the village of Khanpur in Dinajpur district on February 20, 1947. In one incident, the police fired 131 bullets, killing 22 persons. The movement spread to about nineteen districts, taking the form of an organized uprising. Forty peasants were killed in Dinajpur, one in Rangpur, two in Khulna, and four in Mymensingh. Of these, four were women. According to the Peasant Association, 68 were killed in the Tebhaga movement of 1948–9. The number of wounded was 10,000, and 1,200 were arrested. Haji Muhammad Danesh, Altaf Ali, Abdul Kader, Nur Jalal, Kamparam Singh, Rupnarayan Ray, Lalit Sarkar, and others led the Tebhaga movement in what was then known as East Pakistan.

As a result of this movement many of the jotedars ran away from their own land. In many regions, especially in Dinajpur, the peasants declared the locations as "liberated" or Tebgha areas. However, this movement was suppressed brutally in Jalpaiguri and the 24 Parganas. Many peasants and their leaders were arrested. Despite this, the movement was successful in many of the regions. Many jotedars were compelled to give two shares of the crops to nearly 40 percent of the sharecroppers. Abwab was abolished.

The second phase of protest was from 1948 to 1950. The center shifted to the predominantly indigenous area of Nachol in Chapainawabganj in Rajshahi. At this time the Muslim League was in power in Pakistan. Ramendranath Mitra, son of a Nachol jotedar, was a member of the Communist Party of East Pakistan. He and his wife Ila Mitra, respectfully called Rani Ma (Queen Mother) by the Santals, started to motivate the peasants to take up the Tebhaga system. The movement began to jell towards the end of 1949 as the peasants started to demand seven ari (a measurement unit of weight) of paddy. They received three ari-worth of paddy for cutting and trashing 20 ari. In addition, they demanded two shares of crop. The movement began to get organized. The zamindar of Mahipur acceded to the Tebhaga demand, but on January 5, 1950 news circulated that the police were coming to the village to confiscate the paddy from the peasants. In fact, only three policemen came to inquire about tebhaga. Agitating peasants besieged and beat them to death. On receiving this information, one whole platoon of police and ansars (a semi-governmental force) surrounded the area. The fight continued for at least seven days. The santals used bows and arrows and sticks. The police used firearms. Many santals fled to India to save their lives, and 195 were arrested. Ila Mitra was arrested and brutally tortured. Consequently, she became a legendary figure in the history of the peasant uprising in Bengal. After her release from jail she left for India.

Because of this movement, the East Pakistan government was compelled to pass the Land Acquisition Act of 1950. With this Act the zamindari system created by the Permanent Settlement was abolished in East Pakistan. This established the right of the peasants to their land.

Nankar Protest Movement (1922–1950)

In Urdu nan means bread. In this context a person working in return for food only was known as a nankar and the system as the nankar system. It is very likely that this system was in vogue since Mughal times. A nankar had to give compulsory labor for food only. It was known as hod begari. The term begari is derived from the Persian word begar meaning “servant without salary.” In 1947 there were about 4,000,000 nankars, which was one-tenth of the entire population of Sylhet, the northeast part of Bengal bordering Assam. The slightest protest by the nankars would result in severe punishment from landowners.

In the subcontinent changes were becoming evident in land relations after World War I. In this context the nankars rose in spontaneous protest in different regions of Sylhet. Noteworthy among these are the Sukhair uprising (1922–3), the Kulaura uprising (1931–2), and the Vanu Bil uprising (1933–5). All these were suppressed by the zamindars with the help of the government. After this the CPI initiated an organized movement under the aegis of the Krishak Sabha (Peasant Association). In 13 regions of Sylhet the nankars stopped hod begari, inspired by the initiative of the Krishak Sabha. This continued from 1937 to 1940. Although they were successful, in some areas the oppressive system could not be stopped totally. Under the changed circumstances after World War II and inspired by the Tebhaga movement, the Nankars rose in Saleshwar, Mohakal, and Lauta-Bahadur in 1946–7. The system of Hod Begari was discontinued in these regions.

Since this system was not abolished totally, nankars’ dissatisfaction remained and spontaneous protest movements continued in different areas of Sylhet. The Muslim League government supported the landowners. There were repeated clashes in different areas, and by 1950 it became evident that the system would not prevail. In this context the government was forced to abolish the nankar system.

Tanka Uprising (1937–1950)

In the valley of the Garo Hills in Mymensingh a movement against a system whereby cultivators had to pay tax in the form of crop, known as the Tanka system, continued from 1937 to 1949. Through this system landowners could easily exploit the peasants, so the peasants wanted to pay in cash and not in crop. Communist leader Moni Singh, a member of the Susanga zamindar family, led this movement. He was arrested in 1930 but was released in 1935 and went to Susanga, where he came into contact with the Tanka peasants and witnessed their conditions. In Susanga the rate of tax was 7–15 maunds of paddy per one and quarter acre. If this was in cash the peasants could save 11–17 rupees, a substantial amount for them.

Moni Singh started to organize the peasants from 1937. He exempted the Tanka payments for his land and decreed that no one should pay Tanka. However, there was no uprising because the government reformed the system slightly without abolishing it. In the All India Peasant Conference, held in Netrokona in Mymensingh in 1945, a resolution was passed for the abolition of the Tanka system.

The second phase of the movement was initiated by a public meeting called at the Hajong-dominated area of Susanga-Durgapur in December 1946. Those attending the meeting were confronted by the police but still proceeded to resolve to abolish Tanka. In the meantime police forces camped in different areas. Boherotoli is a village in Birishiri (in Susanga-Durgapur) where the Hajongs and the Garos are predominant. On December 31, 1946 five policemen came to this village to search some Hajong houses. Enraged at this, the Hajongs chased away the police. After the incident a magistrate came back with 25 police. In the clash that ensued, Surendranath was killed. The government took to a policy of extreme repression and filed against the leaders, forcing Moni Singh underground. The hearing of the case started in 1948 after the creation of Pakistan, but was dismissed because no witnesses could be found.

In 1948 the CPI again took the initiative to start a movement. On January 15, 1949 the third phase of the movement started. It ultimately turned into a guerrilla war and continued for one and a half years. There were casualties on both sides. Government repression and arrests continued. Ultimately, in 1950, the government was forced to abolish the Tanka system along with the nankar system of Sylhet.

Language Movement (1948–1952)

India was divided in two on August 14, 1947. Pakistan was formed in the territories with a Muslim majority. The Muslim League under the leadership of Muhammad Ali Jinnah was successful in mobilizing huge public opinion among the Muslims in favor of Pakistan. The eastern part of Pakistan was known as East Bengal, which later became East Pakistan. Its capital was in Dhaka. Nearly 1,200 miles of Indian territories lay between East and West Pakistan. Although Pakistan was a Muslim-majority country, people of diverse languages and cultures comprised the population. There was homogeneity in the eastern wing where the language and culture of both Hindus and Muslims were the same. Over 56 percent of the population of Pakistan resided in this part, and their common language was Bangla (Bengali).

The federal capital, Karachi, was in West Pakistan and the majority of the central administration was non-Bangalis. From the beginning, the West Pakistanis looked at the eastern part as a hinterland and a colony. Later, the parliamentary form of government was replaced by military rule (1958–71). As a result, protests against the Muslim League and West Pakistan started to form among the Bangalis from the very outset. From 1958 to 1971 movements on language, education, economy, and autonomy developed the concept of Bangali nationalism. This culminated in the liberation war of 1971. Movements affiliated with this drive were the language movement, the movement for national autonomy, and the people's movement of 1969.

A long debate in Pakistan on the question of the national language of the Bangalis began in 1947. The majority of the population of Pakistan was Muslim, and a tendency had developed to equate Urdu and Arabic with the Muslims. From ancient times in India the official language was different from the language of the people. Sanskrit, Persian, and English had respectively been official languages in different eras. But Bangla, the language of the ordinary people, gathered importance and was revitalized in the course of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Ziauddin Ahmed, vice chancellor of Aligarh University, proposed that Urdu be accepted as the state language of Pakistan. Dr. Muhammad Shahidullah, the renowned Bangali linguist, like many scholars before him, opposed this and proposed that Bangla be adopted since the majority of the people of Pakistan spoke this language. Regardless of the debate, the Pakistan government started to use Urdu and English as the state languages without any official declaration.

Urdu was the mother tongue of only 3.27 percent of the population of Pakistan, so Dhirendranath Dutta of the Pakistan National Congress party brought an amendment proposal in the parliament on February 23, 1948 in which he stated that since Bangla is the language of the majority of the population of Pakistan it should be adopted as the state language. The Muslim League and the central leaders of Pakistan smelled conspiracy in this proposal, as Dhiren Dutta was a Hindu. They considered Bangla a Hindu language and perceived Bengalis as Hindu-minded. Dutta's proposal was rejected.

At this point Dhaka University students formed the State Language Movement Council and started mobilizing public opinion about Bangla as the legitimate state language. Muhammad Ali Jinnah, the "Father of Pakistan," visited Dhaka and in a public meeting held on March 19, 1948 declared emphatically that "Urdu and Urdu alone shall be the language of Pakistan." The movement in favor of Bangla intensified with the death of Jinnah in 1948, and from 1950 Urdu was once again proposed as the state language in parliament. Students and ordinary people vehemently resisted. The Council for State-Language Movement was formed in Dhaka University in 1951 under the leadership of Abdul Matin.

In a public meeting in Dhaka, held on January 27, 1952, Pakistani Prime Minister Khwaja Najimuddin made a declaration for Urdu as the state language. In response the Council for State-Language Movement called for a strike on January 30. This started a new phase of the language movement.

Bangalis felt violated not only by the language issue but by other issues as well. Different political and civil society organizations started to express their resentment against the repression meted out by the Muslim League. All this culminated in huge resentment against the central government. The student and other organizations continued a vigorous agitation from January 30 to February 20, 1952. And the government responded with relentless repression. On February 21, 1952, when police opened fire on a protest procession of students and ordinary people, a college student, Rafiquddin, and a university student, Abul Barkat, government employees Shafiur Rahman and Abdus Salam, a tailor Abdul Jabbar, and a nine-year-old child, Azizulla, were killed. Many more were killed but only six casualties were officially recorded because other dead bodies were quickly disposed of. The movement spread all over East Bengal, but the language issue was not resolved yet.

The Muslim League was completely defeated in the 1954 Provincial Elections. In its place the Jukta (United Front) came to power. It was the United Front which was formed by a coalition of many political parties following the popular protest that started from 1952. The new government adopted proposals to declare February 21 national Martyr's Day, build a Martyr's Monument in the spot where Abul Barkat, a martyr for the Bengali Language Movement, had been shot and killed in 1952, and to establish Bangla as the principal state language. The Bangla Academy was established for the development of Bangla language and Bangla literature. On May 9, 1954 Bangla was given recognition as a national language.

The Language Movement of 1952 had a long-term effect on Bangladesh because there were political, economic, and constitutional issues involved. People of all professions supported this movement, and the leaders succeeded in strengthening a secular politics by replacing the communal politics of the Muslim League. Perhaps most importantly, Bangali nationalism developed and attracted large numbers of students. Indeed, it is held that the Language Movement inspired the liberation war of Bangladesh. When the Constitution of Sovereign Bangladesh was adopted in 1972 it was declared that Bangla should be the state language of the republic. In 1999 this language received international recognition when UNESCO declared February 21 as the International Language Day, which is now observed worldwide.

Mass Uprising of 1969

The language movement of 1948, which started as a protest against state repression and exploitation of the Bangalis as a nation since the creation of Pakistan, gradually culminated in the mass uprising of 1969. This started with the student movement against the autocratic rule of the military dictator President Ayub Khan in 1968.

Around the same time the Six Point Demand of the Awami League (a nationalist party established in February 1950, with Huseyn Shaheed Suhrawardi as its leader) was discussed in the Annual Council session of the party. These demands, proposed by Sheikh Mujibur Rahman, the most important leader of the Awami League, in 1966, emphasized the need for a federal constitution with a great degree of autonomy for East Pakistan. Consequently the student wings of these two parties; the East Pakistan Students League and the East Pakistan Student Union (Motia Group) jointly started the anti-Ayub student movement. From October 6–29, 1968 different political parties organized general strikes and shutdowns known as hartals and gherao (besiege) programs. On December 8 almost all political parties called a countrywide hartal.

On January 4, 1969 the East Pakistan Student League and the two factions of the East Pakistan Student Union (Motia Group and the Menon Group) set up the Student Struggle Council and declared the Eleven Point Demand. This included the Six Point Demand as well as issues concerning students, teachers, and workers. The Dhaka University Central Students Union (DUCSU) and the Student Struggle Council joined the Eleven Point Movement. The political parties also joined the movement.

To thwart the movement Ayub Khan started the Agartala Conspiracy Case in 1968, naming Sheikh Mujib as the principal accused. Several Bangali civil and military officials and politicians were arrested. The central government accused Sheikh Mujib of going to Agartala (capital of Tripura, India) and conspiring with the Indian authorities to dislodge the central government and create an independent state. At one point the release of Sheikh Mujib and the withdrawal of the Agartala Conspiracy Case became the central issue of the movement.

The movement was not restricted to Dhaka, but spread to remote corners of East Pakistan. Students and teachers of schools, colleges, and universities declared their solidarity. Most of the local government representatives resigned at the call of the student leaders. Some of them were killed by angry masses. A few of the opposition members of the National Assembly resigned. On January 20, 1969, when a leading student leader, Asaduzzaman Asad, was killed by police firing on a protest procession, the ongoing movement turned into a massive people's uproar.

On January 28, when Motiur Rahman, another student, was killed by the police, the situation in Dhaka went virtually out of control of the government. Even imposing a curfew and arresting important political leaders could not restore peace and order. On February 15 Sergeant Zahurul Huq, an accused in the Agartala Conspiracy Case, was killed by the army firing in Dhaka Cantonment where he was held in custody.

The anti-Ayub mass movement took a serious turn when a professor of Rajshahi University, Shamsuzzoha, succumbed to a bayonet injury received from Pakistani forces on February 18. To restore order, President Ayub was compelled to declare that he would not contest the next election. Ayub Khan also withdrew the Agartala Conspiracy Case on February 22, and released Sheikh Mujib and all others accused in the case. Sheikh Mujib's release instilled a new spirit into the movement. On February 23 Sheikh Mujib was given a gala reception in Dhaka, where he was given the title of Bongobondhu ("Friend of Bengal") on the proposal of a noted teacher and folklorist, Tofail Ahmed. The slogan of Joi Bangla (Long Live Bengal) was also coined in this reception program and became the call to arms for an independent Bangladesh during the Liberation War.

With the objective of settling the issues through discussion, Ayub Khan called a Round Table Conference in Lahore after the release of Sheikh Mujib. Sheikh Mujib attended the Round Table but Moulana Bhasani, a leader of the National Awami Party (formed in 1957 by the left-wing dissidents of the Awami League led by Moulana Bhasani, the Pakistan National Party of West Pakistan, and the Communists from both parts of Pakistan) boycotted it. In the conference Sheikh Mujib proposed the implementation of the Awami League's Six Point and the students' Eleven Point Demands, but both were rejected. Consequently, Sheikh Mujib started an all-out movement against Ayub Khan. On the other hand, the right-wing parties accepted two of the reforms proposed by Ayub Khan, namely, a federal system of democracy and adult franchise.

The people supported the decision of Sheikh Mujib and turned the anti-Ayub Movement into a mass uprising. The uprising even started to spread in West Pakistan and forced Ayub Khan to resign on March 25, 1969 and hand over power to the army chief General Yahya Khan. Martial law was once again declared in the country. However, Yahya Khan promised a parliamentary system of government by elections on the basis of adult franchise.

The 1969 mass movement came to a halt with the imposition of martial law, but as a result the struggle for independence of Bangladesh had moved one step ahead. The demand for Bangali nationalism was strengthened by the mass movement of 1969, and the aspiration among the Bangalis for the establishment of an independent, sovereign state was created.

SEE ALSO: Bangladesh, Struggle for Liberation, 1971; Bengal, Popular Uprisings and Movements in the Colonial Era; India, Civil Disobedience Movement and Demand for Independence; Jinnah, Muhammad Ali (1876–1948)

References and Suggested Readings

- Anonymous (1999) Bangladesh Documents. Dhaka: University Press.
- Hussain, S. A. & Mammoon, M. (Eds.) (1986) Bangladeshe Shosotra Protirodh Andolon (Armed Resistance Movement in Bangladesh). Dhaka: Bangladesh Asiatic Society.
- Islam, S. (Ed.) (1992) History of Bangladesh, Vol. 1. Dhaka: Asiatic Society of Bangladesh.
- Kamal, M. & Chakraborti, E. (2006) Nacholer Krishak Bidroho, Somokalin Rajniti O Ila Mitra (Peasant Revolt of Nachol, Contemporary Politics and Ila Mitra). Kolkata: Progressive.
- Khan, M. A. (1984) History of Fara'idi Movement. Dhaka: Islamic Foundation.
- Rahman, M. (1998) Bangladesher Itihas (History of Bangladesh). Dhaka: Somoy.
- Ray, J. K. & Mammoon, M. (1996) Civil Society in Bangladesh. Kolkata: Firma KLM.
- Ray, S. (1972) Bharater Krishak Bidroh O Ganatantrik Sangram (Peasant Revolt and Democratic Movement in India). Kolkata: DNBA Brothers.
- Roy, D. (Ed.) (2000) Tebhaga Andolon (Tebhaga Movement). Kolkata: Ananda Publishers.
- Sengupta, K. K. (1974) Pabna Disturbances and the Politics of Rent. New Delhi: Peoples' Publishing House.
- Umar, B. (1980) Purbabanger Bhasa Andolon O Tatkalin Rajniti (Language Movement of East Bengal and Contemporary Politics). Dhaka: Mowla Brothers.

Pakistan, protest and rebellion

Farooq Sulehria

Pakistan was declared independent on August 14, 1947. Its first government was sworn in on August 15. A constituent assembly, elected on the basis of general elections in British India in 1946, became the parliament of the new country. At that time, Pakistan consisted of two wings: East Pakistan (now Bangladesh) and West Pakistan (present-day Pakistan). Political power was concentrated in West Pakistan, while East Pakistan had 60 percent of the total population.

The new state was predominantly agrarian, with agriculture accounting for 60 percent of total output and 70 percent of total employment (industry accounted for 6 percent of total output and 10 percent of total employment). Pakistan inherited from British India only 1,414 of 14,677 registered factories (only 9.6 percent of the total). West Pakistan inherited only 2.6 percent of undivided Indian industry and 6.5 percent of the workforce. In 2002 the population of Pakistan was estimated at 145.96 million, with a labor force of 41.84 million. Out of that, 18.54 million (48.42 percent) are employed in the agricultural sector, where workers have no legal means to form unions and are largely unorganized. In 1951 there were 209 registered trade unions with 393,137 members. In 2001 the number of trade unions had gone up to 7,204 with over 1 million members. Despite this phenomenal rise in membership, organized workers comprise only 3 percent of the labor force. Only 1,905 unions have collective bargaining agent (CBA) status. The CBA unions have a membership of 478,698, while non-CBA unions have a membership of 1,040,303 – thus only one-third of union members enjoy CBA status.

During the Cold War, Pakistan entered into military pacts with the United States. Because the ruling elite, mostly from Punjab, feared Bangali (Bengali) domination, it avoided holding general elections. In 1958 inflation on essential goods coincided with crop failures. Strikes became the order of the day. Police repression and private armies of thugs were employed to break these strikes. Peasants had also been mobilized under the left-wing banner of the Kissan Committee and thousands of peasants marched on the roads of Lahore as a token of solidarity. On May 8 police attacked Lundo, a village of Sindh, because peasants were defying local landlords. On June 20 police shot dead six workers in Lyallpur and injured another 21 as workers tried to take over a factory. These worker-peasant protests were largely due to the absence of political representation and resulted in the government announcing the first general elections, to be held in March 1959. However, those elections were later postponed until November 1959. To make matters worse, on October 7, 1958 General Ayub Khan imposed the first martial law.

The political temperature began to rise in Pakistan as a growing democratic movement was inspired by the popularity of the left-wing National Awami Party (NAP). Leftist politics in Pakistan can be traced to Indian origins, with the Communist Party of Pakistan (CPP) as an offshoot of the Communist Party of India (CPI). The CPI, at its Second Congress held in Calcutta in February 1948, decided to divide the party in two – CPI and CPP.

In 1948 the All Pakistan People's Party (PPP) was founded on the premise of making Pakistan a union of free socialist republics. Khan Abdul Ghaffar Khan was elected its first president and G. M. Sayyid its general secretary. Ghaffar Khan was a prominent nationalist leader from the Frontier province who adhered to Gandhi's principles of non-violence – he was popularly known as Frontier Gandhi. Khan and his son, Abdul Wali, were arrested along with other PPP members such as Qazi Ata Allah Khan and Abd al-Samad Achakzai in June 1948. A month later Khan's Khuda-i-Khidmatgars (Red Shirts), a volunteer force organized by him, were banned by the government. On August 12 police opened fire at a Red Shirts meeting in the village Babra in Charsada district, leaving many dead. After these events the PPP disbanded.

Punjab province would later find radical expression in the Azad (Independent) Pakistan Party (APP) in November 1950. The party was founded by Mian Iftikhar-ud-Din, a parliamentarian known for his Marxist views. He was a strong opponent of government policies and was expelled from the Muslim League for five years in 1950. In its manifesto the APP demanded abolition of the feudal system, fresh elections on the basis of an adult franchise, and a "people's revolution in Kashmir." However, the APP failed to establish itself beyond Punjab and won only a single seat in the provincial parliament in 1951. In 1956 the APP would merge with a new left party, the Pakistan National Party (PNP).

The PNP was a combination of radical nationalist and Marxist forces, including remnants of the Kalat National Party, Asthman Gal of Prince Aga Abdul Karim, Wrore Pakhtoon (Pakhtoon Brotherhood) of Abd al-Samad Achakzai, the Red Shirts of Abdul Ghaffar Khan (NWFP), Sindh Awami Mahaz of G. M. Sayyid, the Sind Hari Committee of Haider Bux Jataoi, and the Azad Pakistan Party of Mian Iftikhar-ud-Din. The CPP had been banned following the 1951 Rawalpindi Conspiracy Case, which resulted in the arrest of Secretary General Sajjad Zaheer and Central Committee (CC) member Sibte Hasan. Later, all the CC members, a number of army officers, and famous left leaders such as the poet Faiz Ahmad Faiz were arrested for conspiring a coup d'état in association, allegedly, with General Akbar Khan. The intent of the case was seriously to damage the Communist Party. In 1954 other organizations affiliated with the CPP were banned as well, including the Pakistan Trade Union Federation, the Democratic Students Federation, the Association of Democratic Women, and the Progressive Writers Association.

At the time of the ban the membership of the CPP in West Pakistan was 200, which was determined by the Partition of India, as the Punjab and the rest of West Pakistan were never a stronghold for the CPI. Most CPI members in Punjab who migrated to India after division in 1947 were either Hindu or Sikh. But the low membership in no way reflects the influence communists had on students and the trade union movement. In 1947 the left gained an additional advantage with the establishment of Progressive Papers Limited (PPL) by Mian Iftikhar ud Din. The PPL published an English daily newspaper, Pakistan Times, an Urdu daily, Amroz, and later a weekly, Lail o Nehar. All three soon became the largest circulating newspapers in West Pakistan.

In East Pakistan the Communist Party of East Pakistan (CPEP) was more connected to the CPI than it was with the CPP. After Indian communists followed an ultra-left line of insurrectionism noted at the conference of the Communist Information Bureau in September 1947, launching an armed struggle just after achieving independence, the CPEP followed suit. Though they managed to seize a few police stations in East Pakistan, they were soon effectively isolated and crushed. Between 1948 and 1954 there were around 3,000 political prisoners in East Pakistan, the majority of whom were communists.

Soon, ideological debates started unfolding within the CPI and the CPEP, with Moscow intervening to settle disputes. The Muslim East Pakistani communists were instructed to "enter" the Awami Muslim League, which had split from the Muslim League in 1949, while non-Muslim communists were asked to work in front organizations. The election results for the East Pakistan parliament in 1954 speak of the communists' success: 22 communists were elected, 18 as Awami League members (in 1955 the word Muslim was dropped from the name of the party), and four as independents. Following the ban on the CPP, the CPEP went underground and advised its cadre to work inside radical organizations.

CPEP members became active in the Awami League in East Pakistan, while in West Pakistan, CPP members entered the ranks of the APP, followed by members from both parties entering the National Awami Party (NAP). The formation of the NAP came into being when a radical faction of the Awami League, led by Maulana Bhashani, split with the party and joined hands with the PNP to form the NAP. Founded on July 25, 1957 at a Workers' Convention held in Dacca, NAP was the first ever radical formation that represented East as well as West Pakistan.

General Ayub Khan, the first Pakistani commander-in-chief of the Pakistani army, had helped Iskandar Mirza to declare martial law in 1958. In that year, using his military powers, he ousted Mirza in a bloodless coup and became president of Pakistan, after which he set to the task of modernizing the country by introducing land reforms, progressive family laws, and a constitution in 1962. While Khan was responsible for secularizing the country into a republic instead of an Islamic republic, he ruthlessly curbed trade union activity, banned political parties and peasant organizations, and took over a chain of newspapers run by the PPL. In addition, Hassan Nasir, a left-wing student leader, was tortured to death at the Lahore Fort. While the PPL takeover symbolized press censorship, the brutal murder of Hassan Nasir became a symbol of state repression and resistance in the 1960s.

In 1963 Khan allowed some political freedoms and lifted the ban on political parties, although the NAP took another year to become public. However, when the NAP did reemerge in public its new manifesto declared socialism as its aim. It was later reorganized at its National Council meeting in 1965 when Maulana Bhashani was elected president and Mahmud ul Haq Uthmani general secretary. NAP split into separate groups, one pro-Moscow and the other pro-Beijing. The formal split occurred in December 1967 when the pro-Moscow faction set up a separate NAP in East Pakistan under the leadership of Professor Muzaffar Ahmed. In April 1968, at a national meeting, NAP elected Khan Abdul Wali Khan as its all-Pakistan president. By 1968 the CPEP had also split in two with a pro-Moscow faction led by Moni Singh and a pro-Beijing faction led by Toha.

The two NAP factions were also divided on the question of support to General Ayub's military dictatorship. While the pro-Moscow faction was opposed to Ayub, the pro-Beijing faction was lending support to the president in line with Beijing's cordial relations with the Pakistani government. In 1965 Ayub's misadventure in attempting to capture Kashmir resulted in his downfall. Moreover, the gulf between rich and poor had increased dramatically, as wealth had become concentrated in the hands of 22 families who owned 66 percent of industrial capital.

On November 7, 1968 an anti-Ayub movement began and lasted for five months. The movement started with student unrest and was joined by industrial workers and professionals. It spread across Pakistan and united the masses in two wings for the first and last time. The movement had begun as a protest against a hike in sugar prices. Students joined the protest in Rawalpindi, where a Rawalpindi Polytechnic College student, Abdul Hameed, was shot dead. In November 1968 there were four deaths and over 1,000 arrests. December 1968 saw 11 deaths and 1,530 arrests. In January 1969 there were 57 deaths and 4,710 arrests. February saw 47 deaths and 100 arrests. In March 1969 the figures rose to 90 deaths and 356 arrests. By the time industrial workers joined the movement it was out of control. In the industrial district of Faisalabad, the district administration had to seek permission from local labor leader Mukhtar Rana for the supply of goods by truck. All censorship had failed. Trains were carrying the revolutionary messages across the country. Workers had invented new methods of communication. It was indeed a new phenomenon. Industrialization, exploitation, and oppression that widened the gulf between rich and poor had brought about the protest.

In 1967 railway workers were the first to take action by going on strike. This was important for three reasons. First, their official union had opposed the strike. Second, the unofficial union controlled by communists had also opposed it, since they were supporting "anti-imperialist" Ayub Khan. Third, the railway workers formed workers' committees to take action on their own. The government resorted to all kinds of repression, but it had to accept some of the demands before the strike could be called off. On March 26, 1969 Ayub resigned, but instead of handing power to the speaker of the national assembly, as required by his own constitution, he instead named General Yahya Khan as the new military ruler.

On March 30, 1970 Yahya issued a Legal Framework Order (LFO) that called for a national assembly with 313 seats, of which 13 were reserved for women. The left during this period was following the line of popular frontism, aligning with working-class parties to combat fascist rule or military dictatorship. When this began in 1968-9, Pakistan swept away the Ayub dictatorship and the Pakistan People's Party began to rise. Formed on September 1, 1967, the PPP had a radical socialist program. Its charismatic leader, Zulfikar Ali Bhutto, once a minister in Ayub's cabinet, appeared in the political arena to challenge the Ayub dictatorship. Bhutto, an intelligent bourgeois politician, introduced socialism and joined hands with some leftists to form the PPP.

When the Ayub dictatorship started targeting Bhutto, he became a symbol of resistance, strengthening his popularity and his grip on the party. Also, the popularity enjoyed by the PPP was a sequel to the 1968-9 revolutionary movements. A new layer of radicalized labor leaders joined this party. In 1970 the major players in the general elections were the right-wing Muslim League, fundamentalists Jamaat Islami, Jamiat Ulema Pakistan, and Jamiat Ulema Islam (JUI), the left-wing National Awami Party, the PPP, and the Awami League led by Shaikh Mujibur Rahman, demanding autonomy for East Pakistan. The Awami League had a clean sweep of East Pakistan, while the PPP emerged as the largest party in West Pakistan, but had no support in Balochistan where the left-wing NAP and fundamentalist JUI had won most seats. The Awami League had won 160 out of 300 seats. The PPP won 81 seats.

The results meant the Awami League, which entirely represented Bangalis, would form the government. This was not acceptable to the military-led ruling class, since East Pakistan was systematically discriminated against. Yahya decided to ban the Awami League and fill the vacated seats by means of new elections. However, he met resistance from East Pakistani people and Bengali paramilitary forces. In September a government in exile was set up in India as a Revolutionary Council consisting of four representatives of the Awami League and one each from the Bangladesh National Conference, NAP(W), NAP(B), and the Communist Party. A large number of East Pakistanis, particularly Hindus, fled to East Bengal in India. India would later claim 9 million refugees in its territories.

In panic, Yahya attacked India on the West Pakistan front, causing India to send its army to East Pakistan where, in alliance with the Mukti Bahini, it was given a savior's welcome. Yahya's forces were humiliated on the western front and on December 16 surrendered to East Pakistan. In this process East and West Pakistan would separate again, with East Pakistan becoming Bangladesh. Bhutto was now called on to act as civil martial law administrator. Upon assuming power he claimed to have done more to combat communism in Asia than the Americans in spite of all the resources and the money they had piled into that part of the world. Before he was formally elected he believed that Pakistan was in a position to choose between communism and capitalism. At the same time, he continued to claim that he was a socialist of the Willy Brandt variety.

In 1971 a faction of the left declared that Bhutto was a social fascist. Of the notable communists who joined the Bhutto government there was the former president of the National Students Federation, Meraj Muhammad Khan. The Bhutto period offered both the best and worst of Pakistan's trade union movement. Its peak was reached when a record number of unions were registered, membership witnessed an upsurge, a number of industrial actions took place, and some pro-trade union reforms were introduced. However, at the same time, Bhutto unleashed a reign of terror against trade union leadership and workers.

Bhutto also undermined the influence of big feudal lords through land reforms and reduced the economic power of big industrialists through his nationalization of 31 industrial concerns in 10 basic industries. His regime deliberately used its pricing policy as an instrument of urban pacification. Bhutto, as a minister in the Ayub government, had learned that as long as economic growth was accompanied by stable prices there would be no social unrest. Inflation and the substantial fall in real wages that followed the Indo-Pakistan war of 1965 had meant the Ayub regime had to face urban unrest and was eventually overthrown. Bhutto, on the other hand, was not merely faced with inflation resulting from the war in 1971, but also a steep currency devaluation of about 139 percent in May 1972. In the same month the working class took to the streets in Karachi, demanding better wages and payments. The government decided to crush the movement by firing at protesters on June 7-8, 1972, leaving a dozen dead. This angered the communists who had joined the government. Some of them resigned in protest, including Bhutto's minister Meraj Muhammad Khan, who went on to form the Qaumi Mahaz e Azadi (National Liberation Front) in 1974.

In Kot Lakhpat, the industrial area in Lahore, industrial workers were so well organized that it had become a state within a state, known as the Chicago of Lahore. There, workers' organizations administered justice, maintained law and order, and had rendered the police relatively ineffective. Strikes, factory takeovers, and violence continued in a sporadic fashion throughout 1973-5 across Pakistan. On April 30, 1975 labor leader Abdul Rehman was shot dead. Factional infighting was considered a possible reason behind the murder. On May 1 there was a mammoth demonstration, prompting Bhutto to post his infamous Federal Security Force throughout Lahore.

Following the division of Pakistan, with East Pakistan achieving its independence to become Bangladesh, the NAP Bhashani in West Pakistan reorganized itself as the Socialist Party. The Socialist Party was founded in Karachi on March 23, 1971, at the first Socialist Workers' Conference. In 1986 it split into two factions, one led by Abid Hassan Manto forming the Workers' Party, which later merged with Qaumi Inqilabi Party (QIP or National Revolutionary Party), and the other was the Qaumi Mahaz e Azadi in 1992, later to become the Awami Jamhoori Party (People's Democratic Party). In 1999 the Awami Jamhoori Party and the Socialist Party merged again, along with a faction of the PNP, to form the National Workers' Party (NWP).

The federal government headed by Bhutto's Pakistan People's Party (PPP) dissolved the NAP government in Balochistan, causing the NWFP government to resign in protest. The NAP was banned in 1975, only to reemerge as the National Democratic Party (NDP). The NDP refused to accept the communists in its fold, hence the Communist Party (still underground despite the Bhutto government's promise to lift the ban) formed the Progressive National Democratic Party as its mass political front at a convention held in Peshawar on December 7, 1975. The Progressive National Party was renamed the National Progressive Party, appointing prominent communist leader Aizaz Nazir as the president and Afrasiab Khattak as secretary general.

With the consumer price index soaring throughout 1972–5, Bhutto devised a system of wage-price packages in an attempt to link prices with wages. For instance, in 1975, increases in the price of wheat, vegetable ghee (clarified butter), and sugar were accompanied by an adjustment in wages. Almost 60 percent of state subsidies were offered on essential goods like wheat. This was a huge factor in Bhutto being reelected in 1977's general elections. However, shortly afterward he was overthrown by his protégé General Zia ul Haque, who imposed a third martial law on July 5, 1977.

The workers and masses did not welcome the military takeover, which proved to be the most repressive in Pakistan's history. In January 1978 Zia's police fired at the workers of Colony Textile Mills in Multan, which according to some accounts left 900 dead in the largest massacre of workers in Pakistan's history. Following this, on April 4, Bhutto was hanged. Zia remained in power for another 11 years, as he was able to gain the support of the United States, whose diplomatic efforts needed Pakistan to fight the Soviet Union in Afghanistan. The United States provided $3.2 billion in aid over six years, with an additional $25 billion in overseas remittances.

From 1977–8 to 1985–6 Pakistan's per capita income increased by 34 percent and continued to rise, while US-supported and Pakistan-based Afghan Islamic fundamentalists fought the secular pro-Moscow regime in Afghanistan. It was also a period when the masses made heroic sacrifices for democracy with the establishment of the Movement for the Restoration of Democracy (MRD, an alliance of opposition parties), which forced Zia to make some concessions. In 1985 general elections were held on a non-party basis to keep the PPP out of the election process, which the MRD boycotted.

On August 17, 1988 Zia died in a mysterious plane crash. His military successors decided to stay away from the presidency and allow democracy a chance to rule. The chairman of the Senate, Ghulam Ishaq Khan, as provided by the constitution, became Pakistan's next and interim president. Fresh elections were held and the PPP emerged as the largest party. Benazir Bhutto, the daughter of Zulfikar Ali Bhutto, became prime minister in 1988, only to be deposed 20 months later by the president.

The Pakistan Muslim League, led by industrialist Nawaz Sharif, came to power. In 1993 Bhutto's PPP again emerged as the leading party; once again, after she formed a government, the president, Farooq Leghari, dismissed it on charges of corruption, using the controversial Eighth Amendment, which gave the president the right to dissolve the national assembly if he believed that government could not be carried out according to the constitution. Bhutto was again succeeded by Muslim League leader Nawaz Sharif. Then, in 1999, General Pervez Musharraf deposed Nawaz Sharif and imposed the fourth martial law on October 12.

Prior to the death of General Zia several new developments occurred on the Pakistani left. In 1986 the NDP, PNP, Awami Tehreek (People's Movement), and the Mazdoor Kissan Party (Workers Peasants Party) (MKP) merged to form the Awami National Party (ANP). The MKP, PNP, and Awami Tehreek would later split with the ANP and in fact a major PNP faction did not join at all. In 1989 the CPP had its Third Congress that led to a split, with the minority forming Pakhtoonkhwa QIP, while the majority, led by Imam Nazish, merged with the MKP in 1994 to form the Communist Workers Peasants Party (CMKP). The CMKP split in 1999, and a faction led by Qazi Imdad and Maula Bux Khaskhaili formed the Communist Party.

Also in 1986 a new group called the Struggle Group, comprising activists who supported the monthly Mazdoor Jeddoujhd (Workers' Struggle), was established. The Struggle Group was working inside the PPP as an entryist group affiliated with the Trotskyist Committee for a Workers International (CWI), which later split in 1990–1, followed by the splitting of the Struggle Group over the question of continued entryist work inside the PPP. One faction continues to follow the entryist policy inside the PPP and is organized around the fortnightly Class Struggle. One of its members, Chaudhury Manzoor Ahmad, was elected to the national parliament on a PPP platform. The other Struggle Group faction, led by Farooq Tariq, ended the entryist policy in view of its analysis that the working class would leave the PPP if there were other alternatives. To build an alternative party it launched Jeddohud Inqilabi Tehrik (Struggle Revolutionary Movement) in 1993. In 1997 it formed the Labor Party of Pakistan, incorporating the Struggle Revolutionary Movement.

Pakistan's trade union movement was influenced by the movement in British India that comprised the All India Trade Union Congress – attached to the Communist Party of India – and the reformist Indian Federation of Labor. Both were reorganized in Pakistan as the Pakistan Trade Union Federation (PTUF) and the Pakistan Labor Federation, which later became the All Pakistan Federation of Labor (APFOL). The former, affiliated to the Communist Party of Pakistan, had 38 affiliated unions with 20,000 members, mainly concentrated in railways. APFOL had 95,000 members in its 49 affiliated unions, with a strong presence among port workers. The PTUF's communist nexus and its relations with the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU) led to much suspicion by the Pakistani government.

In 1996 class struggle returned to the political map in Pakistan as the tenants of the Okara Military Farms were threatened with evictions. Of these tenants, thousands were peasants who started a movement against possible evictions by the Pakistan army. Under the banner of Anjuman-i-Muzaireen Punjab (Punjab Tenants Organization), the tenants held sit-ins and other peaceful demonstrations. In response, military violence left a half-dozen dead. The tenants' demand to own the land remains unresolved, however, while military management has not been able to implement new legislation to evict the tenants.

In June 2005 workers at Pakistan Telecommunication Corporation Limited (PTCL) made headlines all across the world with their struggle against privatization and an occupation of headquarters and weeklong strike that compelled an indefinite postponement of privatization. The PTCL, employing 65,000 workers, is the third largest state enterprise in Pakistan after the railways and the Water and Power Development Authority (WAPDA). As soon as the government announced the date to sell 26 percent of PTCL shares on June 10, nine major PTCL unions formed an Action Committee and announced a strike. A shocked military government announced a postponement of the plan and accepted all 28 Action Committee demands, which included a pay rise.

During the PTCL protest more than a thousand workers were arrested and charged under draconian anti-terrorism laws. In a form of state kidnapping, police and security forces seized the relatives of some union officials and militant workers who evaded arrest. The PTCL management also fired at least 28 union leaders and threatened to dismiss thousands of workers on short-term contracts if they did not break ranks with the strike. In response, two Action Committee leaders came on state television and called off the strike. They were later accused of "selling-out" by the rest of the Action Committee. The government added additional measures through a vicious propaganda campaign launched against the striking workers that seemingly made matters worse. Further strike actions scheduled for June 15 were postponed until June 18, but this strike did not succeed as the government was able to sell 26 percent of PTCL to a Dubai-based company and netted $1.5 billion.

In 2003 doctors and teachers formed the Joint Action Committee in Punjab province against privatization, forcing the government to give up on its policy of privatizing colleges and hospitals. This reemergence of class politics and social movements was further seen in late March, 2006 when 40,000 delegates thronged the arena of the World Social Forum held at Karachi to form the Awami Jamhoori Tehreek (People's Democratic Movement) (AJT). The AJT is comprised of the National Workers' Party (NWP), the Labor Party Pakistan (LPP), Awami Tehreek (AT People's Movement), the Pakistan Mazdoor Kissan Party (PMKP), the Pakistan Mazdoor Mehaz (Workers' Front) (PMM), and the Meraj Mohammed Khan Group (MMKG). After the murder of Benazir Bhutto and the crackdown by President Musharraf, the AJT called for a boycott of the January 2008 elections.

SEE ALSO: Faiz Ahmed Faiz (1911–1984); Ibrahim, Mirza (ca. 1906–2000); Iqbal, Muhammad (1877–1938); Jalib, Habib (1928–1993); Nasir, Hassan (1928–1960)

References and Suggested Readings

Afzal, M. R. (2001) Pakistan: History and Politics 1947–71. Karachi: Oxford University Press.

- Afzal, M. R. (2002) Political Parties in Pakistan 1947–1958. Karachi: Oxford University Press.
- Ali, T. (1991) Can Pakistan Survive? London: Verso.
- Anonymous (1984) Pakistan National Party. Democratic Organization Series No. 3. New York: Pakistan Democratic Forum.
- Anonymous (n.d.) Janabi Asia Main Mazdoor Tehreek. Karachi: PILER.
- Anonymous (n.d.) Pakistan Main Bain Bazo ki Jeddojuhdi or Kirdar (The Struggle of Leftists in Pakistan). Lahore: Jeddojuhdi Publications.
- Anonymous (n.d.) Pakistan Main Socialist Tehreek ka Mukhtasar Jaiza (A Review of the Socialist Movement in Pakistan). Lahore: Socialist Party.
- Sayyed, K. B. (1980) Politics in Pakistan: The Nature and Direction of Change. New York: Praeger.
- Talbot, I. (1999) Pakistan: A Modern History. London: Palgrave Macmillan.

Palmares slave revolts, 1602–1603

Gregory R. Smulewicz-Zucker

Palmares was a quilombo (in English, a “maroon society”) or settlement founded by runaway slaves in Pernambuco, a state in northeast Brazil. At the height of its power, it consisted of a vast network of villages, ruled by a king in Macaco, the quilombo’s capital. Because the king was elected and his power was checked by a council of elders, Palmares is often labeled a republic, but one with distinctively traditional African features. Its name derives from what the Portuguese called the generally uncharted and largely uncolonized interior of Pernambuco, filled with palm trees and marked by inhospitable mountain ranges beyond the official Portuguese coastal settlements. The quilombo of Palmares existed for close to a century, during which time it resisted assaults led by both the Portuguese and Dutch regimes in Pernambuco’s capital, Recife. Because of its longevity, Palmares has fascinated scholars of slave resistance and come to symbolize resistance to oppression for peoples of African descent.

At the outset, the murkiness of facts about the origin of the quilombo and the nature of life there must be appreciated. The success of Palmares was an embarrassment for colonial authorities and most records were destroyed in an effort to suppress its memory. The records that do survive primarily give the Portuguese or Dutch side of the story. Until recently, the year of Palmares’ establishment was contested, with estimates ranging decades apart. Only since the seminal research of R. K. Kent in the 1960s do scholars agree that Palmares was established around 1605–6, if not slightly earlier – the time that the earliest records exist of Portuguese settlers complaining of raids on their farms by the Palmarinos (inhabitants of Palmares). It was most likely founded by a core group of approximately 40 escaped slaves originally from the broad part of Africa that was called Guinea, which at that time could have referred to nearly all of West Africa. The earliest slaves who came to Palmares were Bantu-speakers from around the modern Angola region, but as the society evolved and the population grew, it eventually consisted of Africans with diverse ethnic and geographic origins. There is also evidence suggesting that indigenous peoples and poor Portuguese farmers also lived in the quilombo. It is perhaps one of Palmares’ most remarkable qualities that Africans who came from different tribes and ethnic groups and spoke different languages were able to live together, let alone with indigenous Brazilians and poor European settlers, relatively as equals.

The first enslaved Africans were brought to Brazil by the Portuguese in the 1530s to work on the sugar plantations. Sugar production in the states of Bahia and Pernambuco supplied nearly one-half of the world’s sugar. There was a lower mortality rate among slaves during the sea voyage from Africa to Brazil than there was during voyages from Africa to the Caribbean, making the entire enterprise in Brazil cheaper. Because transporting slaves was relatively inexpensive, slave owners often worked slaves to death in their effort to answer the world market’s growing demand for sugar. They would simply buy new slaves rather than incur the greater cost of keeping a slave alive. By the mid-seventeenth century, somewhere around 4,000 slaves were arriving per year in Pernambuco alone. From the outset, enslavement and the brutality of slave owners bred resistance among the Africans. Slaves who escaped the plantation moved into the uncolonized interior of Brazil and founded their first quilombos.

Palmares was among the earliest of the quilombos and certainly among the most successful. Abundant natural resources fed and housed the quilombo’s inhabitants while the mountainous terrain provided natural defenses against the Portuguese authorities. Word of Palmares' thriving society spread to the plantations, encouraging enslaved Africans to escape plantation life and attracting freed slaves. While Palmares probably began as a scattered and disorganized array of small village communities or mocambos (derived from a word meaning "hideout" in Ambundu – a Bantu language spoken by the Ovimbundu people of Angola) with weak ties to each other, by the 1640s it had evolved into a republic with power centralized in the capital. It is interesting to note that throughout Palmares' existence, the Portuguese never referred to it as a quilombo but always called it a mocambo, perhaps because the latter referred to smaller-sized fugitive slave communities and seemed less threatening.

As best they could, the escaped slaves recreated the West African forms of government into which they had been born and from which they were stolen away. A complex societal structure emerged: the republic was divided into mocambos, each of which was ruled by a chief to whom the citizens could voice their grievances. The chief was responsible for upholding laws that punished murder, theft, adultery, and desertion. The chief, in turn, answered to the king in the capital mocambo, Macaco. Regular meetings of all the chiefs were held before the king in Macaco to discuss issues pertaining to the general interest of Palmares, such as the ongoing war with the Portuguese. The king's legitimacy was probably derived from royal African ancestry, but, following the model of many West African societies, he ruled with the advice and sanctions of a council. As in most West African models of government, the council probably retained the right to depose kings whose rule was seen as tyrannical. Thus, there was a system of checks and balances on power. In stark contrast to life on the plantation, the escaped slaves living in Palmares were subject to rulers whom they recognized as legitimate and who recognized them as their subjects.

Life in Palmares was not a complete replica of life in an African kingdom. The escaped slaves had assimilated some of the culture and religion that they encountered under Portuguese rule. Particularly in the case of religion, they adopted some aspects of Catholicism and reinvented them by mixing them with the religious practices and beliefs of their homelands. The citizens appealed to Catholic saints for help, but these saints were identified with the traditional African gods, goddesses, and spirits who performed similar roles. Thus, traditional African and Christian religious figures and rituals were syncretized. Portuguese and Dutch reports also suggest that there was a chapel in Macaco and that the inhabitants of Palmares wore European-style dress.

The population in the capital of Macaco was large even by colonial European standards. Estimates by colonial authorities vary from 5,000 to 15,000 inhabitants in Macaco, with a possible total of 30,000 inhabitants if all of the other mocambos were to be included. From the capital, the king governed over the villages which extended for somewhere around 100 miles. The success and growth of the republic was due in no small way to the able efforts of its farmers, who worked a land that was fertile and could satisfy the needs of its inhabitants. The farmers built stores of food for the winter and in preparation for wartime.

The citizens of Palmares were extremely capable warriors. They led regular raids on neighboring plantations and farms for supplies. These raids helped contribute to the growth of the republic's population as people were often captured and taken back to the republic. Yet the status of African slaves captured during these raids helps shed light on class structure in Palmares. Only those escaped slaves who made their way to Palmares by their own means were considered free within the republic. Those slaves who were captured by citizens of Palmares during raids on the plantations remained slaves within the republic. Thus, there was a distinction between the slave class and free class in Palmares. However, the form of slavery that these twice-enslaved persons were subjected to in Palmares was certainly less brutal and more familiar to them, even acceptable by traditional African standards, than that which they faced on Portuguese plantations.

For almost the entire first half of the seventeenth century, Palmares was an accepted reality of life for its nearby neighbors. Many of the indigenous people living near Palmares recognized its strength and chose to make treaties with the republic. Poor white farmers living nearby also chose to cooperate with the republic rather than aid the Portuguese in their failed attempts to destroy it. This relatively peaceful and quiet status quo was interrupted by the Dutch takeover of Pernambuco in 1637. At first, the fighting between the Portuguese and the Dutch only helped the population grow. The fight for Pernambuco gave slaves greater opportunities to run away and become citizens of Palmares. Once the Dutch solidified their control over Pernambuco, their new governor, Johan Moritz van Nassau, began ordering attacks on Palmares. Throughout the 1640s the citizens of Palmares faced Dutch invaders, but the Dutch offensives were unable to overtake the republic. Eventually, the Dutch had to focus their military resources on the Portuguese who were attempting to regain control of their lucrative colony. The Portuguese ultimately succeeded and in 1654 Pernambuco was restored to Portuguese domination.

Upon their return to power in Pernambuco, the Portuguese government in the capital of Recife once again had to deal with the existence of Palmares. Official reports express Portuguese frustration at being able to oust the Dutch, but not being able to defeat Palmares. As long as Palmares existed, it threatened Portuguese interests in Pernambuco. Word of its prosperity could only spread among slaves, engendering acts of rebellion. In 1678, the then king of Palmares, Ganga Zumba, sued for peace and the Portuguese responded with a proposal for a peace treaty. Ganga Zumba had just fended off a devastating attack led by the Portuguese commander Fernão Carrilho. At the time of the Portuguese proposal, it seems that both Pernambuco's new governor, Aires de Souza Castro, and King Ganga Zumba had grown weary of the ongoing war. The Portuguese would recognize Ganga Zumba's sovereignty on the condition that he return all captured slaves to the Portuguese and move the republic to the Cucaú Valley. Ganga Zumba accepted the peace terms. Disagreement with the terms of the peace agreement and speculation that the Portuguese offer was disingenuous prompted the creation of a rival faction under the leadership of the military leader Zumbi (Ganga Zumba's nephew). Ganga Zumba was ultimately overthrown by Zumbi and his followers. Ganga Zumba died soon after his return from the Cucaú Valley. Legends abound about the circumstances of his death, some of which suggest that he was killed by Zumbi while others suggest that he may have taken poison as a patriotic gesture in order to further enflame the Palmarinos against the Portuguese.

Under Zumbi's leadership, the war between Palmares and the governing authority in Pernambuco resumed. From 1680 to 1693, Palmares faced a reinvigorated, but largely unsuccessful, Portuguese offensive. In 1693, the Portuguese finally sought assistance from a group of bandeirantes, or frontiersmen, led by Domingos Jorge Velho. As shown in a 1693 agreement, the governor granted Velho and his forces land in Palmares for settlement. The agreement also stipulated that the governor would not grant pardons nor show mercy to any of the captured Palmarinos. Velho's forces were more accustomed to fighting on the harsh mountain terrain, but it took months to defeat the large network of villages that were ruled from the capital. The siege on the capital took over a month and required 3,000 Portuguese soldiers in addition to the bandeirante forces. In February 1694, Velho and his forces broke through the heavily fortified walls of Macaco. When it finally became clear that the city was lost to Velho and the Portuguese, hundreds of Palmarinos chose suicide over re-enslavement, many of them jumping off nearby cliffs. Zumbi was taken alive. He was decapitated on November 20, 1695 and his head was put on display to discourage future slave uprisings.

The Portuguese effort to banish Palmares and Zumbi from historical memory failed. Word of Palmares continued to inspire slaves throughout South America and the Caribbean to escape plantations and found "maroon societies." In Brazil, the date of Zumbi's execution is celebrated as Black Consciousness Day. Even today, Palmares has left its mark on Afro-Brazilian intellectual life as the Unipalmares University in São Paulo bears the name of the famed republic. The quilombo and its final leader, Zumbi, have also been the subject of two films by the noteworthy Brazilian film director Carlos Diegues and songs written by the internationally renowned Brazilian musician Gilberto Gil.

SEE ALSO: Zumbi (ca. 1655–1695)

References and Suggested Readings

- Anderson, R. N. (1996) The Quilombo of Palmares: A New Overview of a Maroon State in Seventeenth-Century Brazil. Journal of Latin American Studies 28, 3, Brazil: History and Society (October): 545–66.
- Chapman, C. E. (1918) Palmares: The Negro Numantia. Journal of Negro History 3, 1 (January): 29–32.
- Curtin, P. D. (1990) The Rise and Fall of the Plantation Complex: Essays in Atlantic History. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Diggs, I. (1953) Zumbi and the Republic of Os Palmares. Phylon 14, 1 (1st Qtr.): 62–70.

- Fausto, B. (1999) A Concise History of Brazil. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Genovese, E. D. (1979) From Rebellion to Revolution: Afro-American Slave Revolts in the Making of the Modern World. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.
- Kent, R. K. (1965) Palmares: An African State in Brazil. Journal of African History 6 (2): 161–75.
- Levine, R. M. & Crocitti, J. J. (Eds.) (1999) The Brazil Reader: History, Culture and Politics. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Robinson, C. J. (2000) Black Marxism: The Making of the Black Radical Tradition. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

Palmer raids

Tom Collins

Between November 1919 and February 1920, the US Department of Justice carried out raids against suspected radical organizations, rounding up more than 6,000 “alien agitators” with the intention of deporting them. Many were arrested without warrants, denied legal counsel, and detained for months. Ultimately around 800 individuals, identified as communists or anarchists, were expelled from the United States.

A. Mitchell Palmer, the politically ambitious attorney general in the Woodrow Wilson administration, oversaw the raids. He was spurred by public alarm about a perceived “red threat” following the Bolshevik Revolution in Russia and violent domestic incidents such as the bombing by radicals of Palmer’s own home in June 1919. Palmer drew upon the Immigration Act of 1918 as his mechanism to launch the raids. This Act stipulated that aliens were subject to deportation if they belonged to an organization that espoused political violence. Under the immigration laws, deportation was regarded as an administrative function, in which the alien had no constitutional protections. The Justice Department could thereby target radical aliens without needing to prove their criminality through court proceedings.

In November 1919, Palmer acted against members of the Union of Russian Workers. The headquarters in New York City operated primarily to provide basic social services for workingmen, most of whom had no knowledge of the organization’s radical goals. With orchestrated precision, a riot squad descended on the building, catching the workers unawares, beating them with clubs, smashing typewriters, and carting off “several tons” of literature. All but 39 of the 650 workers arrested were eventually released for lack of evidence. In December, 249 alien radicals, including Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman, were deported on a ship derided in the press as the “Soviet Ark.” In January 1920 the Justice Department undertook a dramatic series of raids in 33 cities, netting more than 4,000 suspects, including most of the country’s communist leadership. Palmer described his prisoners with language that reflected prevailing anti-immigrant prejudices: “Out of the sly and crafty eyes of many of them leap cupidity, cruelty, insanity, and crime; from their lopsided faces, sloping brows, and misshapen features may be recognized the unmistakable criminal type” (quoted in Murray 1955: 219). Most of the American public lauded his efforts, but historians view the Palmer raids as one of the most egregious violations of civil liberties in the nation’s history.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism in the United States to 1945; Anarchism in the United States, 1946–Present; Berkman, Alexander (1870–1936); Communist Party of the United States of America (CPUSA); Goldman, Emma (1869–1940)

References and Suggested Readings

- Coben, S. (1963) A. Mitchell Palmer: Politician. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Murray, R. K. (1955) Red Scare: A Study in National Hysteria, 1919–1929. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Theoharis, A. G. & Cox, J. S. (1988) The Boss: J. Edgar Hoover and the Great American Inquisition. Philadelphia: Temple University Press.

Pamphleteering and political protest, Dutch Republic, 1672

J. M. F. Daudeij

The political pamphlet gives us an insight into seventeenth-century ideas about the relation between citizens and their government in the Dutch Republic and the use of language in political protest. Although the relationship was like that of master over servant, inhabitants of the towns who were able to obtain formal citizenship were more than just subjects. Citizenship, to quote Charles Tilly, may be defined as the “continuing series of transactions between persons and agents of a given state in which each has enforceable rights and obligations” (1995: 8). Besides paying taxes, citizens had duties such as defending the town or restoring order as members of the militia. This gave them a certain power because the regents who governed the cities relied on their loyalty. In return, those in power had to protect the rights of the citizens and foster their interests. A citizen also had access to a guild, an institution that offered protection against the uncertainties of the capitalizing society.

The most important function of late medieval institutions like the guilds, the militia, and the restricted form of citizenship was that in times of protest, citizens could claim to have certain legal rights, including influence in the election of regents (van Zanden & Prak 2006). Protesters saw themselves not as a rebellious mob, but as defenders of their legal rights against tyrannous oligarchic regents. Relations between citizen and regent were usually peaceful, and there were only a few occasions when citizens actively participated in the political process by protesting. One such instance was in 1672, when protesters succeeded in obtaining a change within the government. To understand why this happened, it is important to take a closer look at the political structure of the Dutch Republic.

The Dutch Republic consisted of seven autonomous provinces, Holland, Zeeland, Utrecht, Brabant, Gelderland, Groningen, and Friesland. At the local level, the balance of power between the nobility, the cities, and the provincial councils differed slightly by province. In the more agrarian provinces the nobility had the strongest voice, but in Holland and Zeeland, which were more urbanized, it had almost no power. In these provinces the regenten were the power-holders. Their primary job was to defend the interests and historical rights and privileges of the cities. In theory every respectable legal citizen could be elected as a regent, but in practice only members of families belonging to the aristocratic elite of extremely wealthy merchants and regenten were chosen. This meant that a successful political career in the republic depended on the power of one’s family. If a regent was sent as a deputy to one of the provincial or national councils, his primary obligation was not to the province or the republic but to his own town. This fragmented sovereignty may be compared to the type of government system that operated in Flanders, Northern Italy, and in some parts of Germany. This decentralization and the strong connection between aristocratic families and rich merchants was one of the main causes of the city-states’ economic power (Price 1994). However, these elites became increasingly oligarchic. The only outsider able to influence the election of new regents was the stadhouder, which was why the regenten of the rich merchant towns of Holland decided to abandon this function in 1666 (Israel 1995).

The seven provinces organized themselves on a national level and built a strong military force. Administrative functions were undertaken by the Staten-Generaal and the Raad van Staten. Officially, every province was equal and decisions in the Staten-Generaal had to be carried unanimously, but this occurred only once in the history of the republic, and most of the time a majority was sufficient. As the richest province, Holland paid 53 percent of the total cost of the army. Its interests lay in the merchant activities of the cities and differed from those of the inland provinces. Holland could only be overruled when a majority of the provinces was able to form a faction that included some of the cities of Holland and the stadhouder against it. In 1672, the term oligarchy (staatsgezinden) specifically referred to those regenten of Holland and Zeeland who were in favor of a less powerful stadhouder.

The function of stadhouder was a strange monarchical element in the republic. When it was ruled by the Hapsburg empire, every monarch had a representative to govern the Low Countries and to mediate in conflicts between rival cities. As the representative of the sovereign, he had the power to elect the regenten. Although the Seven Provinces had rejected Philip II as their sovereign, the function of stadhouder remained as part of the Staten-Generaal. This led to the strange situation whereby the stadhouder, being able to elect regenten, indirectly chose his own principals. Having the right to sit in the Staten-Generaal and to command the army meant that he was very powerful. Occasionally the stadhouder could profit from ongoing rivalries between the provinces’ individual towns or facties, especially when Holland and the other provinces were in conflict. The stadhouder could, and did, make a difference in these situations (Prak 2005). Because the function of stadhouder was closely related to the House of Orange, the people and regents who were in favor of him were known as orangisten. Those in favor of a less powerful stadhouder, the oligarchy, were called the staatsgezinden. These labels developed from the textual framework of the pamphlets.

Compared to countries such as France, England, or Germany, the government seemed more reluctant to use harsh restrictions to control the content of print. This was not so much due to a belief in the freedom of speech as it was an unintended effect of the high degree of decentralization. Because of the independence of the provinces and towns, restrictions on certain books or pamphlets were imposed in a very random fashion. Some unfortunate writers suffered time in prison, while other radical political writers and printers went unpunished. The republic became a safe haven for many radical writers from all over Europe (Israel 1995). One genre in particular that flourished because of the loose censorship was the pamphlet. Pamphlets were easy to produce, cheap to buy, and always offered readers a sensational reading experience. They did not print the latest news but gave readers a witty reflection on current events. Because of the high degree of literacy in the towns, pamphlets attracted a broad audience. Pamphleteers often used an entertaining approach and endeavored to sell as many copies as possible. Only 10 percent of pamphlets were sold at official bookstores; the rest were sold by poor people at market or door-to-door. For unemployed people it was an easy way to earn money (Harline 1987). The content was often offensive to the government and frequently labeled as filth. However, neither the orangisten nor the staatsgezinden took them seriously enough to hire pamphleteers to try to win the public's favor. Most of the political pamphlets in the seventeenth-century Dutch Republic focused on the conflict between the staatsgezinden and the orangisten. These writings not only shaped political thought in the Republic, they were also involved in serious acts of protest.

In 1672, the combination of a hate campaign conducted through the radical pamphlets and several civic disturbances led to one of the most traumatic events in the history of the Dutch Republic. On August 6, citizens of The Hague murdered two of the leading figures of the ruling oligarchy, Johan and Cornelis de Witt. After killing them they mutilated the corpses, cut off the fingers, and roasted and ate some other body parts. The militia, who were present and should have restored order, were clearly on the side of the protesters and did nothing to prevent the murder.

The immediate cause of the hate campaign and the violent climax was the successful invasion by France, England, and Münster, who captured several provinces of the Republic in less than three months. The oligarchy had failed dismally to defend the private property of those they governed – clear evidence of their incompetence for the pamphleteers who already opposed them and who sought to have them replaced. Many citizens thought William III should become stadhouder, as his father had been. After William II's death in 1652, William III was too young to govern and the republic was ruled by regenten in his stead. Because his father had tried to solve an internal conflict by sending the republic's army to attack the city of Amsterdam, the regenten of Holland decided in 1666 that their province would never again have a stadhouder. After the invasion by France, England, and Münster, those in favor of William III became more vocal, but the oligarchy refused to grant him any office of substance.

Many pamphleteers claimed that the oligarchy's leaders were selling the republic to the French king. An overwhelming majority of them believed that the republic could only be saved by installing William III as stadhouder and giving him supreme command of the army. Very few pamphleteers supported the oligarchy. The success of the conspiracy theory concerning the oligarchy's treason, especially that of Johan and Cornelis de Witt, arose through a process known as plotting. Certain topics or popular stories were reprinted or copied by other writers, with the result that rumors became the truth (Raymond 2003). At the same time, some of the pamphleteers demanded that citizens should have more influence in the election of the regents. Every town that was taken by the French caused greater social unrest in the other towns. Soon after the killing of other regents, William III was acknowledged as stadhouder. After his installation, he restored the hierarchical distance between citizen and regent.

The fact that it was not only the mob but also middle-class citizens who protested against their governors over more than two decades reveals clearly that the ruling oligarchy had lost its legitimacy. The murder of Johan and Cornelis de Witt marked the rise of William III as the stadhouder. The man whom the oligarchy was determined should not be allowed the political power of his famous ancestors ultimately became one of the most powerful figures of the Dutch Republic. In none of the pamphlets was there a direct order to kill Johan or Cornelis de Witt. However, the majority of pamphlets, filled with arguments based on the ideology of citizenship and combined with accusations against the oligarchy, did have their effect on public opinion. These events show that premodern print could play an important role in the battle between opposing factions. There is still much research to be done on the role of print in the Dutch Republic. However, recent interest in the role of print in the process of state-making and the emphasis on the concept of citizenship in Dutch historiography will deepen our knowledge in the years ahead.

SEE ALSO: Dutch Revolt, 1568–1648

References and Suggested Readings

- Bickle, P. (Ed.) (1997) The Origins of the Modern State in Europe: Resistance, Representation, and Community. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Dekker, R. (1989) Some Remarks about Collective Action and Collective Violence in the History of the Netherlands. Tijdschrift voor Sociale geschiedenis 15: 335–65.
- Frijhoff, W. & Spies, M. (Eds.) (2004) 1650: Hard-Won Unity. Assen: Royal van Gorcum.
- Harline, C. E. (1987) Pamphlets, Printing and Political Culture in the Early Dutch Republic. Dordrecht: Martinus Nijhoff.
- Israel, J. I. (1995) The Dutch Republic: Its Rise, Greatness, and Fall, 1477–1806. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Prak, M. R. (2005) The Dutch Republic in the Seventeenth Century: The Golden Age. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Price, J. L. (1994) Holland and the Dutch Republic in the Seventeenth Century: The Politics of Particularism. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Raymond, J. (2003) Pamphlets and Pamphleteering in Early Modern Britain. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Sawyer, J. K. (1990) Printed Poison: Pamphlet Propaganda, Faction Politics and the Public Sphere in Early Seventeenth-Century France. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Tilly, C. (1995) Citizenship, Identity, and Social History. International Review of Social History 40 (Suppl. 3): 1–19.
- Van Zanden, J. L. & Prak, M. (2006) Towards an Economic Interpretation of Citizenship: The Dutch Republic between Medieval Communes and Modern Nation-States. European Review of Economic History 10: 111–45.

Zaret, D. (2000) Origins of Democratic Culture: Printing, Petitions, and the Public Sphere in Early-Modern England. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Panama, Cemaco's anti-colonial resistance, 1510–1512

Inga Töller

Cemaco was an indigenous leader in Darien Province in sixteenth-century Panama who led his men in the struggle against the Spanish colonialists under the leadership of Vasco Nuñez de Balboa. In 1510 Cemaco and around 500 of his men clashed with the Spanish in an attempt to defend their territory. In this violent battle Cemaco lost a lot of his men and had to abandon his main town, which the Spaniard Vasco Nuñez de Balboa then called Santa María La Antigua, and which became the first Spanish town on the American mainland. Cemaco's first defeat was to mark the beginning of continuous battles by one of the most important Darien caciques (headchiefs) who, to defend the land against the Spanish, allied himself with other regional caciques such as Abenamaque, Abibeiba, Abraiba, Dabaiba, Eclava, and Zururiaga. On several occasions Cemaco and his allies attacked colonial expeditions in the area, who were on the search for gold.

There are three larger battles recounted in the chronicles in which Cemaco and 400 fighters attacked colonial expeditions. In one, Francisco Pizarro was injured, and on another occasion in 1512 Cemaco organized his allies in the area of Río Negro to ambush the colonialists and attack them so violently that they retreated to La Antigua.

Cemaco's last documented attempt to reconquer his capital, at night by sea and land with 5,000 fighters, was in 1512. They installed their camp in Tichirí, from where they planned to recapture the city. For strategic reasons Cemaco had sent 40 of his men to live in the town conquered by Nuñez de Balboa, as Cemaco wanted him to imagine himself safe. They were supposed to kill Nuñez de Balboa, but as this was not successful, Cemaco decided to overrun the town and the conqueror. The night before the action, a vassal of Cemaco informed his sister, who was living in the town and who was in a relationship with Nuñez de Balboa. It is said that she told Nuñez de Balboa about Cemaco's plans, and her brother was caught and had to lead the colonialists to Tichirí. But Cemaco was already informed and saved himself. There is no record that he was captured, enslaved, or tortured by the Spanish crown, though King Ferdinand urged Cemaco's enslavement.

There is very little information available on Cemaco, besides the chronicles of Fernández de Oviedo and Fray Bartolomé de las Casas and the letters of Vasco Nuñez de Balboa, all from the perspective of the Spanish. Cemaco is not considered a national hero in the official Panamanian history books, and is only noted in the margins, but one district in Darien Province in Panama bears his name.

SEE ALSO: Agüeybaná I (d. 1510) and Agüeybaná II (d. 1511); Aracaré (d. 1542); Caonabo (d. 1496); Guauhtémoc (1502–1525); Hatuey (ca. 1400s–1512); Jumandí (d. 1578); Lautaro (d. 1557); Lempira (d. 1537); Rumiñahui (d. 1535); Sepé Tiarajú (1722/3–1756); Tisquesuzá (d. 1537); Túpac Amaru (ca. 1540–1572)

References and Suggested Readings

- Anderson, C. L. G. (1970) Life and Letters of Vasco Nuñez de Balboa. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.
De Coll, J. O. (1980) La resistencia indígena ante la conquista. Mexico City: Siglo veintiuno editores.

Panama, nationalism and popular mobilization, 1947–2000

María Ximena Álvarez Martínez

Panama's twentieth-century history is scarred by US intervention and aggression against the country's sovereignty. On November 18, 1903, only 15 days after its independence from Colombia, the Treaty of Hay-Bunau Varilla with the US was signed. This treaty granted the Americans the right to construct an inter-oceanic canal, military occupation of the zone, and the prerogative to grant its independence, an element used to justify US interventions in Panama's internal affairs. In 1941 a new constitutional article was approved that removed its authority for military intervention, but this was generally ignored.

Hoping to maintain military bases outside the Canal Zone, in December 1947 the US sought approval of the Treaty of Defense Sites in the Panamanian National Assembly that would have extended a war measure passed in 1942. In spite of the frustrated efforts of President Enrique A Jimenes to convince the population that the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance (TIAR, September 1947) would give the country the advantage of security, the people's opposition was quickly demonstrated. Members of Panama's Students' Federation (FEP), the Youth Patriotic Front, and other organizations took to the streets on December 12 to protest the treaty, which was seen as an insult to the country's already vulnerable sovereignty. This social upheaval with nationalistic undertones forced the National Assembly to reject the project.

The American flag fluttering in the Canal Zone became for many the grotesque visualization of US occupation, so on May 12, 1958, students of the University's Students' Union (UEU) planted 75 Panamanian flags along the canal. This movement, known as the "Sowing of Flags," was followed by more violent actions, ending in a major confrontation on January 9, 1964. A new protest with flags took place on the day of the commemoration of the country's independence on November 3, 1958, when politicians and intellectuals, such as Deputy Aquilino Boyd, joined with students and other social organizations. Violent repression by the police and the US Army ended the event and several people were injured. The National Assembly expressed protest and stated it would not rest until the Panamanian flag was raised over the Canal Zone. In 1960, US President Dwight Eisenhower determined that to avoid further protests, both flags would be raised in the zone.

A new popular manifestation took place in October 1962 at the inauguration of the bridge that crosses the Pacific entrance to the canal. On this occasion Maurice Thatcher, an American member of the Isthmian Canal Commission and civil governor of the Canal Zone from 1910 to 1913, was prevented from delivering his speech. At the same time, the bridge's name was changed from the provocative Thatcher Ferry Bridge to the more Latin American Bridge of the Americas.

The conflict reached its peak on January 9, 1964, setting a milestone for nationalistic Panamanian movements against the United States. On that day, due to US students' failure to comply with the measure to raise both flags, students of the National Institute attempted to raise the national flag while singing the national anthem. This students' confrontation was used by the police and the US Army to launch a display of violence with machine guns and tanks against the Panamanian population, who faced them with sticks, stones, and hunting rifles. In spite of the Panamanian government's request to cease fire and the breaking off of diplomatic relations with the US, the violence did not end until January 11. Official sources stated that 25 people were killed and 500 injured. Through the Organization of American States (OEA), diplomatic relations between the countries were re-established only three months after the incident.

The 1960s were characterized by constant protests, strikes, and mobilizations among broad social sectors who were unhappy with the government's economic policy and the abuse of power by their unpopular president, Marcos Robles (1964–8), nicknamed Marcos Rifle in an allusion to the repression he had instigated. A new "Three to One" treaty designed to regulate the United States' relations to the canal was widely rejected by the population in 1968, as with the Treaty of Defense Sites in 1947.

The popular mobilizations were neutralized by a coup d'état in 1968. General Omar Torrijos Herrera became head of the military government in 1969 and began his "modernist revolution," signing a new treaty with US President Jimmy Carter (the Torrijos–Carter Treaty) that established the return of the Canal Zone to Panama on December 31, 1999, in exchange for permanent neutrality. This left the door open for a US military intervention if its safety was threatened, but the success of having achieved Panama's sovereignty over the Canal Zone was presented by the government as a continuation of the martyrs' struggle of January 1964, and any demonstration of opposition was forbidden.

Like an ill-fated prophecy, the US invaded Panama on December 20, 1989, with the pretext of overthrowing Panamanian president and former CIA official Manuel Noriega. Intending to keep troops there until after 2000, US President George Bush sent military troops against a population that offered no resistance. Thousands of people, especially in Panama City's shantytowns, were killed. An investigation into how many Panamians died because of the invasion was obstructed by the new Panamanian president, Guillermo Endara, and the United States Southern Command, and the existence of common graves was never admitted. The United States Conference of Catholics Bishops declared that there were about 3,000 victims; other sources report a total of over 4,000.

Operation Just Cause, as the invasion was called, led to a deep economic and social crisis in Panama. It is remembered every December 20 by the population of Chorrillo, one of the communities along the water's edge in Panama City. Small wooden houses are built, filled with explosives and black flags tied to pieces of meat, and then set on fire in remembrance of the the victims whose bodies were burned on the night of the invasion. The place had been built for workers on the canal and overnight was set on fire, leaving it unrecognizable.

In 1992 during President Bush's visit to the country, anti-American protests filled the city. Despite the efforts of Mayor Omayra "Mayín" Correa, who organized the event known as the "Meeting with Friends," the president was booed, called a murderer, and forced to dodge stones and coconuts on Porras Square in the city of Panama. He was finally evacuated by security forces. The protesters – students, popular organizations, business organizations belonging to the National Council of Private Enterprise (CONEP), and some politicians – were denounced by the US embassy as a minority of Noriega supporters and relatives, who resented the loss of their property because of the invasion.

When the zone was returned to Panamanian control on December 31, 1999, neither US President Bill Clinton, Vice-President Al Gore, nor Secretary of State Madeleine Albright attended. The day that was called "the biggest day in Panama's history" was promoted as the end of the US occupation and the beginning of absolute sovereignty, but US military "safeguarding" of the canal continues according to the stipulations of the Treaty of Neutrality of 1977. Nevertheless, it has been underlined by many Panamanians that Panama is the only country in the twentieth century to have peacefully expelled the world's most powerful army from its territory. This act has a strong symbolic value for the whole of Latin America.

SEE ALSO: Arbenz, Jacobo Guzmán (1913–1971); Hawaii, Resistance to US Invasion and Occupation; Mossadegh, Mohammad (1881–1967); Philippines, Protest during the US Era; Torrijos, General Omar (1929–1981)

References and Suggested Readings

- Arosemaena, J. et al. (2003) En el centenario de la Segunda República. Panamá: ARTICSA.
- Azcárate, F. (2006) Panamá, su andar en el tiempo. Panamá: ARTICSA.
- Comisión Universitaria del Centenario de la República (2004) Panamá cien años de República. Panamá.
- Montiel Guevara, M. & Tack, J. A. (1998) Hitos históricos de la lucha generacional por la consolidación y perfeccionamiento de la nación y el estado panameño. Panamá: Imprenta Universitaria.
- Perigault Sánchez, B. (1998) Cronología comparada del Canal de Panamá. Panamá: Editorial Universitaria.
- Ramírez, L. E. (2002) Panamá y su Historia. Panamá: ARTICSA.

Pankhurst, Emmeline (1858–1928), Christabel (1880–1958), and Sylvia (1882–1960)

June Purvis

The Pankhurst women, suffragettes and social reformers, are the most important feminist family in British history. Emmeline Goulden, the spirited eldest daughter of a cotton manufacturer, was born in Manchester, England, where she met and married Richard Marsden Pankhurst, a well-known radical barrister. Their three daughters – Christabel Harriette Pankhurst, Estelle Sylvia Pankhurst, and Adela Constantia Mary Pankhurst (1885–1961) – were brought up in a household where their parents supported advanced causes of the day, especially women’s suffrage and socialism. From an early age, the girls were taken to political meetings and encouraged to work for the good of the people.

The death of Richard in 1898 was a devastating blow. When Emmeline heard that the hall built in her husband’s memory was to be used by a branch of the Independent Labour Party (ILP) that would not admit women she was so indignant that she formed the Women’s Social and Political Union (WSPU) in 1903 to campaign for the parliamentary vote for women. The

Known for public displays and radical efforts to gain the vote for women in Britain, suffragettes often found themselves at odds with the police. In June 1914, Emmeline Pankhurst is taken away by authorities after leading fellow suffragettes in an effort to deliver a petition to the king. (© Bettmann/CORBIS)

WSPU, with the motto “Deeds, not words,” limited its membership to women and engaged in daring and courageous tactics that became newsworthy.

For the next 11 years the charismatic Emmeline Pankhurst and the charming, witty Christabel, her favorite daughter, led the so-called “militant” campaign. Emmeline, whose oratory could move an audience to tears, was its inspirational yet notorious figurehead. Her courage and resolute determination became legendary as she endured 13 imprisonments in an attempt to wrest the vote from an obdurate Liberal government. Christabel, the WSPU’s chief organizer as well as its key strategist, believed that militant action was necessary for women to gain dignity in a society that regarded them as inferior and subordinate beings. She emphasized the importance of women working together in sisterhood, irrespective of social class or political affiliation.

Initially, the WSPU engaged in peaceful forms of civil disobedience such as heckling MPs and deputations to Parliament. But gradually these forms of protest were extended to include destruction of property, especially from 1912 when mass window-smashing of shops in London's West End took place, empty buildings were set on fire, pillar boxes vandalized, and art treasures attacked. The aim was always to damage property, never to endanger life.

Throughout these years, Sylvia and Adela were active in the WSPU too but, as socialist feminists, became increasingly unhappy with the direction of policy. Sylvia in particular was deeply upset when, in 1907, Emmeline and Christabel resigned their membership of the ILP and sought to recruit middle-class women. Seeking to fuse her socialism and feminism she eventually founded a grouping among the working classes in London's East End. Although formally affiliated to the WSPU, the East London Federation of the Suffragettes followed its own independent line in that, contrary to WSPU policy, it would not attack the Labour Party, advocated mass rather than individual protest, and included men as well as women members. The differences in policy led Emmeline and Christabel to expel Sylvia from the WSPU in January 1914. Later that month, Emmeline sent the unsettled Adela to Australia, since she believed that she might join forces with Sylvia to form a rival grouping to the WSPU.

World War I heightened the political and personal tensions between the Pankhurst women. Emmeline and Christabel called a halt to militant action and became patriotic feminists, supporting the war effort and encouraging women to enter war work as a way to earn their enfranchisement. Sylvia and Adela became pacifists, supporting non-conscription, strike action among trade unionists, the Bolshevik Revolution in Russia, and internationalism. Anticipating the franchise reform of 1918, when certain categories of women over the age of 30 would be granted the parliamentary vote, the elder Pankhursts re-launched the WSPU as the Women's Party in 1917. The following years, Christabel stood unsuccessfully for Parliament on a Women's Party ticket. She converted to Second Adventism, eventually settling in the United States where she became a successful writer and preacher of the Second Coming of Christ. She was awarded a DBE in 1936.

Emmeline Pankhurst too went to North America in the 1920s, eventually settling in Toronto where she became a lecturer on social hygiene. After a failed attempt (together with Christabel and Mabel Tuke) to run a tea-shop on the French Riviera, she returned to England in 1925 and offered to stand as a parliamentary candidate for the Conservative Party. When campaigning in April 1928 she heard news that had been carefully kept from her: Sylvia had given birth out of wedlock. The shock hastened the failing Emmeline's death two months later, a few weeks before women were finally granted the parliamentary vote on equal terms with men.

During the 1920s both Sylvia and Adela had moved further and further to the left, each becoming founder members of the Communist Party in Britain and Australia, respectively. Although Sylvia was expelled from the Party, she was never reconciled with her mother, unlike Adela, who had come to reject trade unionism and socialism and, many years later, would convert to Roman Catholicism.

SEE ALSO: Britain, Women's Suffrage Campaign; Women's Movement, Britain

References and Suggested Readings

- Coleman, V. (1996) Adela Coleman: The Wayward Suffragette 1885–1961. Melbourne: Melbourne University Press.
- Harrison, S. (2001) Sylvia Pankhurst: A Crusading Life 1882–1960. London: Aurum Press.
- Mitchell, D. (1977) Queen Christabel: A Biography of Christabel Pankhurst. London: MacDonal & Jane's.
- Pugh, M. (2001) The Pankhursts. London: Penguin.
- Purvis, J. (2002) Emmeline Pankhurst: A Biography. London: Routledge.
- Purvis, J. (2007) The Pankhursts and the Great War. In A. S. Fell & I. Sharp (Eds.), The Women's Movement in Wartime: International Perspectives, 1914–19. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.

Paraguay, Archive of Terror

Christina Turner[†]

General Alfredo Stroessner took control of Paraguay in 1954. He and the Colorado Party ran the country until 1989, when the Movimiento del 2 de Febrero, led by General Andrés Rodríguez, ousted Stroessner. During his 35 years in power, Stroessner consolidated and maintained his position through arrests, torture, and intimidation of his enemies and awards for his allies. Despite the regime change, the Colorado Party remained in power under the leadership of Rodríguez, who called for a move to democracy and open elections.

In 1992 the government of Rodríguez elected a National Constitutional Assembly that promulgated a new Constitution. Article 135 of the new Constitution allows citizens the right of habeas data to access state information about themselves. A former political prisoner, Dr. Martín Almada, secured a writ of habeas data to search for information about his own incarceration and torture during the Stroessner regime. He had been imprisoned from 1974 to 1977 and later exiled from Paraguay. Acting on behalf of Almada, a judicial team led by judges of the Second and Third Criminal Courts, José Agustín Fernández and Luíz María Benítez Riera, surrounded the Departamento de Producciones de la Policía in Lambaré, a suburb 4 kilometers from the capital of Asunción on December 22, 1992. The judges were acting under the habeas data provisions of the Constitution looking for documents pertaining to Almada, but they found much more. There were stacks of documents from the secret archives of the political police, the Departamento de Investigaciones de la Policía de la Capital (DIPC). The judges alerted the media (as witnesses) and began the movement of the confiscated documents to the eighth floor of the headquarters of Paraguay's judicial branch, the Palacio de Justicia in Asunción.

During the next several weeks there were more habeas data raids on police stations resulting in additional papers from the police's Departamento Judicial. This department was responsible for the repression of the Christian Agrarian Leagues in the 1960s and 1970s. Along with documents concerning the Agrarian Leagues, there was information about the case of the longest-held political prisoner of the Stroessner period, Captain Napoleón Ortigoza, accused of conspiracy against the government and murdering an army cadet to cover up the plot. He confessed under torture, but later retracted his confession.

Judge Benítez Riera directed another team to surround the Dirección Nacional de Asuntos Técnicos, better known as La Técnica. The United States helped fund La Técnica as a means to fight communism in Latin America after the Cuban Revolution. Many of the documents found were confiscated political tracts or books considered subversive. Some of the documents found indicated that the work of seeking subversives continued after the fall of Stroessner. Unfortunately, after uncovering the first archives, the directors of the agency, Antonio Campos Alúm and Felipe Nery Zaldívar, destroyed some incriminating evidence before absconding.

On March 26, 1993 the Paraguayan Supreme Court passed Resolution No. 81 that officially created the Center of Documentation and Archives for the Defense of Human Rights with the charge of preserving the discovered documents, ordering them, and making them available as resources for magistrates, journalists, students, and the general public in search of information. Effectively, the archive has two primary divisions. One part of the archive contains documents that pertain to the pre-Stroessner era dating back to the 1930s. The remaining documents form the major part of the archive. These documents cover the Stroessner years from 1954 to 1989.

Alfredo Boccia, Myrian González, and Rosa Palau helped document and classify the documents found. They report 700,000 pages of documents, 8,000 prison records, 1,800 identity cards and passports, and over 10,000 photographs. There are arrest records, release records, and transcripts of interrogations of prisoners. The archive includes volumes of internal documents of the DIPC. There are letters from real and presumed communists, letters from informers denouncing individuals, and letters from concerned international citizens about human rights abuse. There are official memos from the United States government noting the movements of people and indicating knowledge of tactics against subversives. The archives also include books, newspapers, and pamphlets considered to be of interest due to their content. Police records indicate how the search for the assassins of exiled Nicaraguan dictator Anastasio Somoza Debayle in the 1980s proceeded, as well as the tracking of known or suspected communists and other political dissidents.

Despite the fact that many important documents have since disappeared, including a CIA document, "How to Keep Torture Victims Alive," the archives are helping investigators document and prosecute human rights abuses not only in Paraguay, but also throughout the Southern Cone countries of Uruguay, Argentina, Chile, Bolivia, and Brazil. These countries were in a compact known as Operation Condor, a secret agreement between the respective military regimes to cooperate in the arrest and exchange of individuals across national boundaries by the secret police. The United States government was aware of Condor and many of the military officers involved trained at the School of the Americas.

The archive is open to the Paraguayan public and international scholars. In 1996 the Paraguayan Congress passed a Law of Reparation of Victims of the Dictatorship (Law 838) to pay indemnification for people unlawfully imprisoned and tortured by the police during the Stroessner period. This law has suffered some difficulty in implementation, but it spurred a concentrated effort to document names with events to use as evidence before the Ombudsman (Defensor del Pueblo).

In 2002 a new “archive of terror” was uncovered in the Sixth Precinct by Ombudsman Manuel María Páez Monges and Adjunct Ombudsman Raúl Marín. The Sixth Precinct is located near the Mburuvicha Roga or Presidential Residence. The two ombudsmen sealed ten packets of documents in plastic and left them in charge of the precinct chief while they sought legal access to them. Judge Jorge Bogarín certified the action. On February 15 officials of both the Ombudsman’s office and of the judiciary, along with the original archives discoverer Almada, recovered the sealed bags and searched several other municipal police stations and discovered hordes of brittle and yellowing papers, further documenting the repression during the Stroessner years. In the papers were reports, archives of people persecuted by the regime, and photographic albums of presumed terrorists. They also found tape recordings of Almada’s torture sessions in the 1970s. The newly discovered documents were sent to the Centro de Documentación del Poder Judicial, to be classified and added to the original Archive of Terror. Although not all the documents are catalogued, some newly discovered documents indicate that suspected opponents of the current Colorado Party regime are still being monitored. These include politicians, journalists, and activist priests.

These discoveries brought to light what the victims and their families had known, but which they had been unable to investigate. Thousands of documents that tell of violations and persons responsible for those actions, as well as others that relate the everyday life of citizens in the most intimate detail, illustrate what the Stroessner regime was capable of in order to maintain control. Today, documents are available that show evidence of how Operation Condor with its key strategic concept of national security beyond national frontiers was implemented, producing thousands of victims throughout Latin America.

Due to the richness of the information, the archive spurred the hope of bringing former government officials to justice for the perpetration of human rights crimes committed in Paraguay. There were calls for Stroessner, who fled to Brazil, to be brought to justice and tried for human rights violations. Several organizations worked together to initiate the process to constitute a Truth and Justice Commission in Paraguay. To this end, on February 3, 2004 the National Assembly enacted legislation known as Law 2225.

Another result of the discovery of the Archive of Terror was the planning of a memorial museum in the building where La Técnica operated. Ironically, the opening of the Museum of Memory, the Dictatorship and Democracy coincided with the death of Stroessner in Brazil on Wednesday, August 16, 2006 at the age of 93.

SEE ALSO: Paraguay, Protest in the Post-Stroessner Era; Paraguay, Protest and Revolt, 1954–1989

References and Suggested Readings

- Boccia, A., González, M., & Palau, R. (1994) Es mi informe: los archivos secretos de la policía de Stroessner. Asunción: Centro de Documentación y Estudios.
- Centro de Documentación y Archivo and UNESCO (2006) Centro de documentación y archivo para la defensa de los derechos humanos, Corte Suprema de Justicia de Paraguay, Asunción. Available at: www.unesco.org/webworld/paraguay/index.html. Accessed August 26, 2007.
- Nickson, R. A. (1995) Paraguay’s archive del terror. Latin American Research Review 30, 1: 125–9.
- Zoglin, K. (2001) Paraguay’s Archive of Terror: International Cooperation and Operation Condor. University of Miami Inter-American Law Review 32, 1: 57–82.

Paraguay, popular resistance to the rise of the military (1936–1954)

Brian Turner and Christina Turner[†]

The Chaco War (between Paraguay and Bolivia) lasted from 1932 to 1935. Mobilization for the war and conscription of troops strengthened the national state at the expense of patron–client ties in both the rural and urban sectors. This experience with protracted modern warfare led by professional soldiers unleashed revolutionary forces in both Bolivia and Paraguay. In February 1936, liberal president Eusebio Ayala, elected in 1932, was overthrown by elements within the nationalist military and the Association of Ex–Combatants and replaced by war hero Colonel Rafael Franco. This is known as the Febrerista Revolution.

There were several intellectual currents evident within the Franco regime which consisted of scholars as well as military men. The Febrerista regime lasted 18 months. During that time the reformist elements initiated a land redistribution program, expropriating some 68,325 hectares, including 20,000 from La Industria Paraguaya. The state's role in regulation of the economy increased. The reformist elements were sympathetic with organized labor and although there was very little labor action during the Chaco War, the Febrerista Revolution gave rise to popular pressure for social reform and fueled labor militancy after the war. Tactical differences between socialists and anarchists diminished, and together they formed a new unified labor confederation, the National Workers' Confederation (CNT). The first significant labor legislation and the first national labor department were created under Franco. Unions organized strikes in the yerba forests and in the tannin factories, provoking pressure on the government from private foreign investment and some in the military with sympathies for the fascist governments in Europe. Franco responded to these reactionary forces with his anti-union Decree Law 152 of March 1936. Labor support for Franco diminished and later in that year the army attacked CNT headquarters and arrested many trade unionists.

A Liberal Party–military alliance overthrew Franco in a 1937 counter-coup. The Liberal Party was restored to office but the military was now in power. The commander of the armed forces during and after the Chaco War, General José Félix Estigarribia, was elected president in 1939 on the Liberal Party ticket in an uncontested election. Estigarribia declared the definite end of the liberal period by proclaiming a new constitution in 1940, which dramatically expanded presidential power. Estigarribia, however, died in an airplane accident later that year and was replaced by his minister of defense, a former chief of staff of the army and anti-political, Higinio Morínigo.

During the previous decade, communists had infiltrated the trade unions, and by 1940 the union leadership was largely communist. The CNT changed its name to the Workers' Confederation of Paraguay (CPT). Morínigo made every effort to repress the unions during his early years in office, and then moved to co-opt them as World War II came to a close and pressure from the United States for political liberalization of the dictatorship increased; however, his efforts to create a Labor Party were met with fierce resistance from within the military. In 1946, Morínigo reorganized his government and formed a new cabinet with representation for the Colorado and Febrerista parties and from the armed forces. This allowed some breathing room for the labor movement, especially for unions affiliated with the Febreristas, who controlled the Department of Labor. The Communist Party met openly and an anarchosyndicalist group was revived. There were several successful strikes that garnered a shorter workday for printing–trade workers and higher pay for some hospital workers. This period of relative liberty of action was short-lived. By 1947 Morínigo was forced by his Colorado Party allies to purge the Febreristas from the government. The president imposed a state of siege and drove the Communist Party underground.

Febreristas, communists, and liberals began planning an invasion to overthrow the Morínigo regime. A military–civilian revolt erupted in March 1947, known as the bloody “Revolution of '47.” This civil war was caused by the politicization of the military into different partisan camps since the Febrerista Revolution of 1936. Factions of the army under the command of Colonel Alfredo Stroessner and the Colorado Party supported Morínigo, while the factions of the army that responded to Colonel Franco and the liberals, Febreristas, and communists led the insurrection. The rather minor involvement of the Paraguayan Communist Party was sufficient for Morínigo to retain the support of the United States government.

From the beginning of the revolt there was an intellectual schism between the military and civilian insurrectionists. The military leaders were career soldiers who were opposed to the increasing influence of the Colorado Party over the military. However, they were not interested in seeing a different political party replacing the Colorado Party, so cooperation was limited with the civilians representing the Liberal and Febrerista parties. Because of this, the military failed to take advantage of potential civilian volunteers, even though some had fought in the Chaco War. This is not a mistake made by the government forces, which relied on the civilian militias of the Colorado Party. These militias were made up largely of peasants, called py nandi (barefoot ones), who managed to defeat a major portion of the armed forces. Doing so was not easy, though; losses are estimated at 50,000 dead. This event was the gravest internal clash in the post-independence history of Paraguay and laid the groundwork for political dominance by the Colorado Party for the rest of the twentieth and into the twenty-first centuries.

The forces of the government held, and in April 1947 Morínigo emerged victorious, although he held a tiger by the tail in the Colorado Party. The government set about purging the country of opponents. It arrested some 200 union members, students, and political opponents of every persuasion. As many as 400,000 Paraguayans fled the country, mostly to Argentina, especially trade union militants. Repression in the countryside by Colorado militias continued for many months, displacing thousands of families from their home communities.

Following their victory in the Revolution of '47, the Colorados strengthened their control over the trade union movement through the party-dominated Organization of Republican Workers (ORO), replacing the power of the communists, many of whom, because of their positions as trade union leaders, had been killed or exiled. The Ministry of Justice and Labor was created in 1948 in order to strengthen state control over labor affairs.

On February 15, 1948, Morínigo's preferred Colorado candidate, the nationalist ideologue Natalicio González, was elected in a one-candidate election. Despite the support, González's civilian and military allies removed Morínigo from office on June 3, 1948, placing Dr. Juan Manuel Frutos as the caretaker president, because they did not trust him to transfer power on the national holiday of August 15. González was duly sworn in but was overthrown on January 30, 1949 by an opposing coalition of Colorado civilians and military. Once again, as in 1912 and 1922, party factions found allies in the armed forces to resolve internal tensions through a coup d'état. Instability would continue throughout 1949. Two more presidents, Raimundo Rolón and Felipe Molas López, were installed and removed before the year was out. Finally, civilian Federico Cháves maneuvered to replace Molas López as president.

President Cháves was a liberalizing force in Paraguay, not only allowing but actually encouraging the expansion of the unions. Various unions across the country reorganized and began fighting to win wage increases, especially because of increasing inflation. In 1950 the ORO demanded a 50 percent wage increase for all workers. The ORO was supported in this demand by the Governing Junta of the Colorado Party (the party's leadership body) and eventually Cháves's government followed through with a 40 percent increase. In 1951 the ORO called a Second Labor Congress of Paraguay. During that meeting the organization renamed itself the Paraguayan Confederation of Workers (CPT). At the Third Labor Congress in 1953 there were approximately 119 unions participating. Membership was expanding beyond Colorado Party members. One of the most important union attendees was the Catholic Labor Youth (JOC), whose 30 to 40 delegates took an active part. By the time of the next Labor Congress in 1955, membership increased by affiliations from various labor and youth groups not only in Asunción but from throughout the countryside as well. For the first time, both factory and agricultural workers in the interior of the country affiliated in significant numbers with the national union confederation.

SEE ALSO: Paraguay, Archive of Terror; Paraguay, Protest in the Post-Stroessner Era; Paraguay, Protest and Revolt, 1954–1989; Paraguay, Protests in the Liberal Era and the Triple Alliance

References and Suggested Readings

- Alexander, R. J. & Parker, E. M. (2005) A History of Organized Labor in Uruguay and Paraguay. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.
- Bray, D. (1991) "Defiance" and the Search for Sustainable Small Farmer Organizations: A Paraguayan Case Study and a Research Agenda. Human Organization 50: 125–35.
- Flecha, V.-J. & Martini, C. (1994) Historia de la Transición: Pasado y Futuro de la Democracia en el Paraguay. Asunción: Última Hora.
- Lambert, P. & Nickson, R. A. (Eds.) (1997) The Transition to Democracy in Paraguay. New York: St. Martin's Press.
- Nagel, B. (1999) "Unleashing the Fury": The Cultural Discourse of Rural Violence and Land Rights in Paraguay. Comparative Studies in Society and History 41 (1): 148–81.
- Nickson, R. A. (1993) Historical Dictionary of Paraguay. Metuchen: Scarecrow Press.
- Paredes, R. (2002a) El sindicalismo después de Stroessner. Asunción: Diseño y Arte: Juan Flores.
- Paredes, R. (2002b) La lucha de clases en el Paraguay (1989–2002). Asunción: Diseño y Arte: Juan Flores.
- Turner, B. (1993) Community Politics and Peasant–State Relations in Paraguay. Lanham: University Press of America.

Paraguay, protest in the post-Stroessner era

Brian Turner and Christina Turner[†]

Even though the Colorado Party continued in power in Paraguay, the overthrow of General Alfredo Stroessner opened up the political system dramatically. Many MOPOCO members became advisors to the new Rodríguez government, most prominent among them Miguel Ángel González Casabianca and Waldino Lovera, although Rodríguez artfully exploited divisions within the party to maintain his power, and MOPOCO soon disappeared as a movement within the party. Rodríguez was elected president in May 1989 with almost 74 percent of the vote, to complete the term until 1993. The National Accord dissolved into its constituent parts to contest these elections, although the opposition was at an extreme disadvantage after many years of repression. Domingo Laíno finished second in these elections with 18 percent of the vote. Laíno would run second again in 1993 and 1998.

Elections to a constitutional convention were held in 1991 and a new democratic constitution was promulgated in 1992. In 1993 Colorado Party politician Juan Carlos Wasmosy was elected to serve as the first civilian in the presidency since Federico Chaves was overthrown almost forty years earlier. The election was marred by fraud, but it did produce the first truly pluralistic Congress in Paraguay's history. Civil and political liberties were largely respected, although excessive use of force in confronting social protest, judicial incompetence and corruption, and private use of intimidation against social movements and journalists limited Paraguay's democratization. These are still problems today.

While the Rodríguez government worked to establish a new political arrangement for the defense of elite power, society exploded with pent-up demands for redress of long-festered social problems. In 1989, 402 new unions were recognized after the coup, representing over 75,000 workers. An independent and combative national labor organization, the United Center of Workers (CUT), was established in 1989 after the coup. Within a year its affiliated unions represented 37,422 workers, compared to the 24,459 represented by the CPT, which had been entirely coopted during the Stroessner regime. By one count there were 44 strikes and 1,100 workers fired for union activity just in 1989. Some 4,000 workers at Yacyretá, a second huge hydroelectric project on the Paraná border with Argentina, affiliated with the CUT and went on a successful 84-day strike in March 1989. This strike is considered one of the most important in Paraguay's trade union history. Filizzola, a CUT leader, raised his public profile with his work on behalf of these workers. However, divisions within the labor movement itself, the weakness of the Paraguayan economy (per capita annual growth rate for the 1990s was minus 5.4 percent), and the fact that only 3 percent of the workforce is unionized undermined the effectiveness of labor mobilizations over the last decade of the twentieth century.

Students also mobilized for greater freedom on the country's two major campuses, the National University of Asunción and the Catholic University. The Federation of University Students of Paraguay (FEUP) organized in 1987 to contest the regime-controlled University Federation of Paraguay (FUP). FEUP activists cut their teeth a year earlier during the mobilizations in support of the Hospital de Clínicas staff. After the coup, FEUP activists seized FUP headquarters at the National University. The FUP was dissolved shortly thereafter.

Paraguay's indigenous population, which represents approximately 1.5 percent of the total population, had been the subject of paternalist control, impoverishment, and genocidal policies during the Stroessner era. Indigenous groups and their allies joined the protest environment after February 3, 1989, with encampments in Asunción.

The largest social movement after 1989 came from the landless peasantry. In spite of land colonization and resettlement programs in place since 1963, corruption, poor planning, and lack of integrated assistance left hundreds of thousands of peasant families without secure access to land. Land invasions at Tavapy II in Alto Paraná beginning in 1983 before the fall of Stroessner foreshadowed the land conflicts that were to come. Some 73 land invasions took place in 1989, mostly in the eastern and northern departments of Alto Paraná, Itapúa, Caaguazú, Concepción, and San Pedro. Invaders were often removed by military force, with leaders taken to local prisons. By 1991 the government organized the Special Operations Police trained to remove peasant invaders from the land they were seeking. After a forced removal and imprisonment of leaders, peasants would then mobilize in protest at the prisons until their leaders were released, while their families remained encamped along public right-of-ways near the lands they sought. The first lands invaded were those granted illegally to regime allies, but soon many tracts of forest owned by foreigners and Paraguayans were also invaded.

Peasants reorganized regionally and nationally in the 1980s after the repression in the 1970s. The Paraguayan Peasant Movement (MCP) was joined by other efforts to create a national organization. The National Coordination of Agricultural Producers (CONAPA), established in 1985, was formed out of a variety of regional organizations, including the Association of Agriculturalists of Alto Paraná (ASAGRAPA). These organizations mobilized land invasions and protest marches to push the government to resolve the problems of the countryside. The MCP and CONAPA affiliated with the CUT, forming the rural wing of a broad movement for justice for workers. Other groups, often supported by the church, mobilized using less confrontational tactics, and gained considerable public sympathy. A march on Asunción, beginning with 300 peasants in the southern department of Misiones, took place in November 1990. Several thousand peasants entered the city later that month to favorable news accounts. However, the demands of the peasants from Misiones were not met by the government.

The Rodríguez government and the subsequent civilian governments never produced a comprehensive policy to address the problem of landlessness in the countryside. Over the next decade, some peasant groups were successful in resisting forced removals, murder of leaders, and judicial orders against them and were able ultimately to lay claim to significant lands. Others were removed but given land in still more remote parts of the country, repeating the cycle of marginalization and landlessness begun in the colonization policies of the 1960s. Still others were ultimately defeated in their efforts to obtain land.

After 1989 the Plaza of Congress became the symbolic center of protest in Paraguay. Marches on the Plaza, and rallies in and occupations of the Plaza, are central tactics of many movements, including peasants, students, workers, and even occasionally Colorado Party hardliners. The government requires permits for groups to use this space for protests, but many groups challenge this requirement, especially when permits are denied. The Cathedral of Asunción faces the Plaza and its verandas provide an alternative space for protest. In the early 1990s these verandas were almost permanently occupied by peasant and indigenous groups, occasionally engaging in hunger strikes. Workers tend to congregate at the Plaza Italia, up the hill from the Congress building, for marches on the Plaza of Congress.

The Plaza of Congress was the scene of two major mobilizations to defend democracy in the 1990s. In April 1996 President Wasmosy attempted to remove the ambitious commander of the army, General Lino Oviedo. Oviedo was one of the key allies of Rodríguez in the overthrow of Stroessner and had been instrumental in the (illegal) use of military resources to see to Wasmosy's election in 1993. Oviedo refused Wasmosy's request that he resign and threatened to attack the presidential palace. Wasmosy took refuge in the residence of the US ambassador and even submitted a statement to Oviedo that the president would request a “leave of absence” from the Congress. Oviedo rejected this, and Wasmosy found a bit more nerve and resolved to remain in office. On the morning of April 23, 1996 the Plaza filled with thousands of citizens, especially students, in support of the president. Wasmosy now sought to pacify Oviedo by offering him the Defense portfolio, which Oviedo reportedly accepted. Now the students in the Plaza mobilized in protest against Wasmosy’s betrayal of democratic progress. Wasmosy was forced to renege on his offer to Oviedo after Oviedo had already resigned as army commander. The military court subsequently indicted Oviedo for insubordination.

Oviedo ran for and won the nomination for president from the Colorado Party in 1997, defeating Luis María Argaña. President Wasmosy engineered Oviedo’s conviction on charges related to 1996 in military court, and the electoral courts subsequently ruled Oviedo ineligible for the 1998 elections. Oviedo’s running mate, Raúl Cubas Grau, was declared the Colorado candidate for president, and Argaña was named the vice presidential candidate. The Colorados managed to win the 1998 elections against the united opposition ticket of Domingo Laíno and Carlos Filizzola. Cubas Grau ordered a pardon of Oviedo, and refused to abide by a Supreme Court decision declaring the pardon unconstitutional. As Congress was beginning impeachment proceedings against Cubas Grau, Vice President Argaña was assassinated on the morning of March 23 in a bloody attack on his vehicle on Asunción’s streets. The Plaza of Congress, already occupied by some 25,000 protesting peasants, filled with “Young People for Democracy” and many other citizens in protest against Oviedo and Cubas and in defense of democracy. Supporters of Oviedo attempted to retake the Plaza by force, and the peasants and students resisted with “human barricades against bullets.” Seven protesters were killed over the next six days, but they held the Plaza until both Oviedo and Cubas fled the country.

In the early twenty-first century rural protest has increasingly focused on the negative impact peasant communities suffer from the expansion of soy fields, often owned by Brazilians. Due to the sometimes indiscriminate use of pesticides and the massive deforestation in the soy fields, and the foreign ownership of these fields, the peasant movement has become more ecological and nationalistic. Access to land is still the central focus for peasants. Peasant protesters have increasingly used the tactic of road blocks, especially since the explosion of social protest in Argentina in 2001. Excessive use of force against rural protests continues to be a human rights problem reported by Amnesty International and the US Department of State.

In a pattern well known in Paraguay’s history, struggles among political elites lead to open conflict. Supporters of Lino Oviedo, who returned to Paraguay in 2004 and was placed in a military prison, periodically mobilize at the Supreme Court building or near the military prison demanding Oviedo’s release. Duarte Frutos purged the Supreme Court in 2003 and placed allies on the bench who have ruled favorably on some of his constitutionally questionable political maneuvers, such as standing for election to the presidency of the Colorado Party in 2006. Opposition leaders, important leaders in the Catholic Church, and ordinary citizens mobilized in March 2006 in large demonstrations in defense of the constitution. The role of citizen protest is the newest innovation in a wide repertoire Paraguayans have used to protest over the last century.

SEE ALSO: Paraguay, Archive of Terror; Paraguay, Protest and Revolt, 1954–1989

References and Suggested Readings

- Flecha, V. & Martini, C. (1995) Historia de la Transición: Pasado y Futuro de la Democracia en el Paraguay. Asunción: Última Hora.
- Lambert, P. & Nickson, A. (Eds.) (1997) The Transition to Democracy in Paraguay. New York: St. Martin’s Press.
- Paredes, R. (2002) El sindicalismo después de Stroessner. Asunción: Diseño y Arte Juan Flores.

Paraguay, protest and revolt, 1954–1989

Christina Turner[†] and Brian Turner

The forces unleashed by the Chaco War, the professionalization of the military, and modest industrial growth culminated in the long period of rule in Paraguay by General Alfredo Stroessner. The stronato, as it was called, eventually achieved the pacification of the elite factions within the ruling Colorado Party, but periodic episodes of rural and urban protest and armed insurrection were met in turn with brutal repression.

Federico Chaves' government was overthrown on May 6, 1954 by the recently installed commander of the army, General Stroessner. Within a month and against no opposition, Stroessner was elected president, a position he would retain for almost 35 years. Initially, Stroessner appeared sympathetic to continuing labor reforms. The month before he was elected president he approved another general 40 percent raise. However, inflation continued unabated and the government was forced to work out a stabilization plan with the International Monetary Fund, which in turn led to a rapid loss in income in 1955. Stroessner shifted his support to a 10 percent raise in salaries, much less than was requested by labor. An additional 10 percent general raise did not assuage labor as inflation was increasing much more rapidly.

Tension mounted between the government and labor leaders in the next few years. The tension was exacerbated by a new schism in the government between the traditional civilian leaders in the party, led by Epifanio Méndez Fleitas, aligned with the Colorado leaders of the CPT, against the Colorado members of the armed forces, their allies, and President Stroessner. This political and economic showdown came to a head in 1958. That year the CPT called for a general pay raise of 50 percent. The government stonewalled the petition. Labor leaders were exiled or killed and union members harassed. In response, the CPT called for a general strike and selected a four-man strike committee. The government countered with an offer of a 15 percent general increase in wages that the CPT rejected, even after a personal meeting with President Stroessner. The CPT moved forward with the strike but encountered resistance almost immediately from the police. The police and military surrounded the CPT headquarters and began to arrest anyone who attempted to enter. Once again labor leaders were forced to flee the country to avoid arrest. Those arrested were accused of being "communists." The Stroessner government organized a new leadership for the CPT, in effect taking over the labor movement in Paraguay. The labor leaders who escaped the country established their own CPT in Exile based in Montevideo, Uruguay.

The crushing of the strike and the purging of dissident factions in the Colorado Party led to a new era in Paraguayan history. The regime was now based on the "granite-like unity" between the armed forces, whose officers were required to be members of the party, the civilian elites in the Colorado Party, and the dictator Stroessner, who intervened decisively to resolve squabbles within the elite. The glue for the regime became Stroessner's control over patronage, financed by impressive levels of corruption. To control those left outside of this arrangement, Stroessner declared a state of siege, beginning in 1954 and dutifully renewed every three months by the rubber-stamp Congress. The state of siege was only lifted on election day every five years, as Stroessner was reelected president in 1958, 1963, 1968, 1973, 1978, 1983, and 1988. Under the state of siege, Stroessner organized his cadres of military police, separate from the army, and began to arrest political dissenters and hold them indefinitely and without charge. Stroessner developed an extensive web of informants, called py ragüe or hairy feet, to search out those dissidents. This created a pervasive atmosphere of fear and suspicion in the country, as no one knew who might be an informer or who might be arrested next. Key tools for the regime were the laws Defense of Public Order and Liberty of Persons, passed in 1955, and Defense of Democracy, passed in 1970. These laws restricted free expression, the rights to assembly, and petition for demands, and criminalized much opposition activity as "communist."

Stroessner effectively domesticated the unions and kept them under the strict control of the Colorado Party. The new secretary general of the CPT, Rodolfo Echeverría, was the chief of police of the town of San Bernadino. His executive committee was nicknamed the "seven policemen" due to its composition. For the next 20 years union control was constant and consistent. Wages remained stagnant and during one seven-year period, 1964–70, did not change at all.

In 1959 a guerilla movement, the 14th of May movement, attempted to overthrow the Stroessner regime. It was formed by competing groups, one faction of the Liberal Party and one faction of the Febrerista Party. This led to conflict in leadership that weakened the movement. Inspired by the success of the Cuban Revolution, the United National Liberation Front (FULNA) hoped to provoke a peasant uprising. The first invasion attempt was foiled by intelligence penetration of the movement's plans by security forces. A second invasion attempt several months later was also unsuccessful. In June 1960 the movement suffered a serious loss when the military's counterinsurgency campaign attacked the main body of the movement at Tavaí in the department of Caazapá. There was a third attempt on Asunción that was abandoned in process due to lack of tactical support. The peasant uprising never materialized. Captured prisoners were tortured and killed and thrown in the Paraná River to discourage potential future insurgents. Colorado leaders in the interior unleashed a wave of repression against Liberals, settling old scores and enforcing Stroessner's power through terror.

Also in 1959, Stroessner faced opposition from within his own party, known as the Colorado Popular Movement (MOPOCO). This movement began in response to Stroessner's suspension of Congress and dissolution of the Government Junta in retaliation to a motion of censure on the part of the Chamber of Deputies condemning police repression against student protesters. Many opposition Colorado members had to flee into exile or face imprisonment. MOPOCO was founded in Clorinda, Argentina on September 11 and it continued a campaign against Stroessner for the next two decades. Like other Paraguayan organizations, this association suffered from internal divisions which seriously undermined its effectiveness.

A comprehensive labor code was enacted in 1961. Like all of Stroessner's actions, this was meant to increase his control of the unions. The labor code permitted only unions officially recognized by the ministry of justice and labor and made it difficult for the recognized unions to actually go on strike. Non-recognized unions were not legal and government employees were prohibited from striking.

During this period independent trade unionism was controlled through the CPT by three state institutions. The ministry of justice and labor served as a gatekeeper to vet union membership. It also recognized fictitious unions manned by Colorado loyalists in order to control elections to the CPT governing board. Dissident unionists were dealt with in a manner similar to the treatment meted out to political dissidents; they were arrested and sometimes tortured by the Labor Affairs section of Stroessner's new Investigations Department of the police. In addition, the Labor Affairs section of the Colorado Party used patronage and cronyism to maintain control of the CPT board.

The CPT in Exile (CPTE) moved its regional headquarters to Posadas, Argentina, across the Paraná River from the Paraguayan town of Encarnación. The CPTE remained active throughout the Stroessner years, affiliating itself with international labor congresses and with the Colorado Party in Exile and Resistance, led by Méndez Fleitas.

During this period of the stronato the only strong union alternative to the Colorado-controlled CPT was the independent Christian Confederation of Workers (CCT), an outgrowth of the JOC after Vatican II and the rise of liberation theology throughout Latin America. The CCT organized the first Congress of the Christian Peasants Federation (FCC) in 1968. The FCC organized Christian Agrarian Leagues (LACs). A more radical rural movement, also called the Christian Agrarian Leagues and organized into the National Federation of Christian Agrarian Leagues (FENALAC), was founded in the 1960s by progressive Jesuit and Franciscan missionaries. The roughly 10,000 families organized into the LAC by 1970 were evenly divided between the FCC and the FENALAC.

The reformist elements in the Catholic Church were largely outside the control of Stroessner, and the church was often in conflict with the regime, especially in those areas where the FENALAC and the FCC were active. The CCT had its biggest impact in the countryside where, starting in the 1960s and throughout the 1970s, the agrarian leagues mobilized peasants to start cooperatives, establish education programs inspired by the writings of Brazilian educator and activist Paulo Freire, and develop various types of social services, all outside of government or party channels. This was the first time that subsistence farmers led their own independent political movements, a fact that did not remain unnoticed. There was a marked deterioration in relations between Stroessner and the Catholic Church by 1969 and increased repression in the countryside. Agrarian league peasants were arrested and sometimes tortured. The grassroots communities were harassed and the Catholic clergy purged and deported, especially the foreign priests who were most likely to preach self-help and grassroots development. There was a national media campaign, especially over the important medium of radio on the Voice of Coloradism station, linking progressive clergy and agrarian leagues with communism.

In response to repression, the FCC and FENALAC joined together in a national organization, the National Coordination of Christian Grassroots Farmers (KOGA). The regime responded with increased hostility. Not only were the agrarian leagues outside of the control of the Colorado Party and growing, but they were draining the traditional support from the party, support the Colorado regime needed to survive. Repression intensified and some groups began to meet secretly at night. In areas where the numbers were strong, groups could still meet in public and sometimes could secure release for arrested members by congregating at the local church and protesting. However, the repression continued to escalate and in 1975 the armed forces destroyed the experimental base community at Jejuí in the department of San Pedro. As in 1960, there were reports of league members being taken and thrown out of airplanes over the Yvytyruzu Mountains.

Most parish priests, and many bishops, were in fact allies of the regime. In many cases the church served to demobilize peasant organizations by coopting them while providing some possibility for the redress of grievances from the government. In other cases, parish priests collaborated willingly with the local Colorado bosses in the manipulation of peasant organizations. Such divisions within the church allowed the government to differentiate between “good Christians” and those inspired by alien, Marxist ideologies.

The government accused the agrarian leagues members of being part of a terrorist movement called the March 1st Organization (OPM). Radical students at Catholic University and National University formed the OPM in the early 1970s and Stroessner claimed it had links with Argentine guerilla organizations. The OPM was infiltrated by both Paraguayan and US security forces (Central Intelligence Agency) and never actually initiated any guerilla actions. The OPM and the agrarian leagues were both crushed by mid-1976 with the arrest of 2,000 peasants, 200 students, and the expulsion of seven foreign Jesuit priests. Twenty members of the OPM, including two of its leaders, died while in prison. The agrarian leagues were dissolved after an organized meeting of the surviving leaders of both the FENALAC and FCC at Ypacaraí in late 1977. The police raided the meeting and arrested 19 league leaders.

Supposedly acting with Argentine guerilla organizations, MOPOCO was accused of fomenting an assassination plot against Stroessner. Because of a secret agreement between the military governments of the Southern Cone known as Operation Condor, MOPOCO members could be arrested across borders and so they had to flee from their Argentine exile for safety. One leader was arrested in Posadas, Argentina by Paraguayan police. He later died under torture. In 1977 after a further split in the MOPOCO ideology, a portion of the group joined the National Accord opposition front in Paraguay and was allowed to return from exile. These returnees nevertheless continued to be monitored and harassed until the downfall of Stroessner.

The National Accord was a loosely knit association of four opposition parties: the Christian Democrat Party, the Febrerista Revolutionary Party, the Authentic Radical Liberal Party (PLRA), and the splinter MOPOCO, which formed in 1978. The PLRA, the true heir of the traditional Liberal Party, was the largest component of the National Accord, and the PLRA leader Domingo Laíno was the most prominent opponent of the Stroessner regime at this time. The National Accord issued a 14-point declaration calling for the lifting of the state of siege, open elections, the release of political prisoners, and an independent judiciary. The National Accord clearly benefited from the change in the international environment with the election in 1976 of Jimmy Carter as president of the United States.

The labor situation and the human rights situation in general improved somewhat in Paraguay during the Carter presidency. Carter’s strong stand in support of human rights and his willingness to withhold military funding from Latin American countries that regularly abused human rights had a definite effect on Stroessner and events occurring in Paraguay. During Carter’s term many political prisoners were released and the regime was forced to permit opposition political activity without resorting to the well-known pattern of harsh retribution.

Former members of the Agrarian Leagues who probably were feeling the opening political winds founded the Paraguayan Peasant Movement (MCP) on December 25, 1980. The MCP reinvigorated the landless farmers in the eastern border region with Brazil. It developed a 13-point program calling for dramatic social and political changes to benefit the landless masses of the country. These proposals included land reform and repatriation of land in the hands of foreign owners.

One of the first actions of the MCP was to commandeer a bus near Puerto Presidente Stroessner on the eastern border to travel to the capital to protest army involvement in removing squatters in land disputes. An army patrol randomly stopped the bus near Caaguazú but the protesters managed to escape without harm coming to the passengers. Now alerted to the protest and armed with the evidence of the crime of hijacking, the government launched 2,000 troops to hunt down the hijackers who were hiding in the countryside. Over 300 people were initially arrested and 13 of those were tried in the incident. Tragically, 12 of the hijackers who surrendered to the police were shot on the spot and buried at San Antonio-mí, 17 kilometers from Caaguazú. This incident helped structure the future of the MCP. The organization decided against further belligerent confrontations in preference for non-violent mass mobilizations. In 1985 a group of 5,000 peasants met in Caaguazú to celebrate the reemergence of the rural voice ten years after the repression of the agrarian leagues. The organization was 11,000 strong at the fall of Stroessner in 1989.

Stroessner's power was at its zenith in the late 1970s. Political opponents had mostly been eliminated, and the Carter administration's support of the initiatives by the National Accord was counterbalanced by cooperation and support from military governments in all of the neighboring states. Indeed, the security forces of these states collaborated in Operation Condor to investigate, torture, and assassinate the regimes' opponents. Paraguay's economy was enjoying a "miracle" of sustained high growth rates, with GDP per capita growing at an average annual rate of 5.07 percent between 1971 and 1981. When the favorable regional political and economic environment turned sour in the 1980s, protest against the regime increased.

The two sectors accounting for the economic boom in the 1970s were agriculture and energy production. Cotton became the single most important agricultural product. By 1978 cotton accounted for 38.9 percent of Paraguay's export earnings, making Paraguay the most cotton-dependent country in Latin America. World cotton prices were high, and the huge expansion of cotton production, mostly in the hands of peasants, meant that cash income was expanding through much of the countryside. However, the government maintained a dual exchange-rate policy that allowed it to keep farm-gate prices for cotton artificially low while agro-exporters could sell cotton on the international market at high prices. When international cotton prices dipped in the 1980s, the regime's ability to depend on peasant support waned.

Construction on the Itaipú Dam, located on the Paraná River that forms the border between Paraguay and Brazil, began in 1975. The dam is the world's largest-capacity hydroelectric plant, although China's Three Gorges Dam will produce more energy once all of its generators come on line. Massive investments, primarily from Brazil, during the construction of the dam fueled economic growth in Paraguay's relatively small economy. Major civil works were concluded in 1981, contributing to poor macro-economic performance across the 1980s. Average annual GDP growth per capita was -0.66 percent, and resources for patronage and corruption began to dry up.

The stagnant economy promoted opposition protest and dissension from those inside the regime who were being squeezed out of their previously comfortable position. In 1986 the medical staff of the public Hospital de Clínicas, led by Dr. Carlos Filizzola, struck against poor pay and working conditions at the facility. The protest had larger political overtones and received much popular support. Filizzola would go on to win election as mayor of Asunción in 1991 and to run unsuccessfully for vice president in 1988.

Stroessner was forced to purge the Colorado Party and the military in the late 1980s, as opposition to his continuance in power and to the possible succession of his son Gustavo to the presidency increased. On August 1, 1987 the "militant" faction of the party made up of Stroessner's closest allies removed the "traditionalist" faction, those with roots in the party independent of Stroessner, from control of the Governing Junta. The militant faction encouraged the retirement of various high-ranking officers in the armed forces to consolidate their power.

General Andrés Rodríguez, commander of the First Army Corps and the father-in-law of Stroessner's son Hugo, allied with civilian "traditionalists" such as Luis María Argaña, who would become foreign minister in the new government, and other high-ranking officers to overthrow Stroessner on the night of February 2, 1989. The violent coup killed at least 100 soldiers. In the immediate aftermath of the coup the Colorado Party was reunited with the military in power and only the narrow circle of militants and Stroessner family members were either arrested or sent into exile. Stroessner himself spent the rest of his life in exile in Brasilia until his death in 2006.

SEE ALSO: Anarchosyndicalism; Paraguay, Archive of Terror; Paraguay, Protest in the Post-Stroessner Era

References and Suggested Readings

- Alexander, R. J. & Parker, E. M. (2005) A History of Organized Labor in Uruguay and Paraguay. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.
- Flecha, V.-J. & Martini, C. (1994) Historia de la Transición: Pasado y Futuro de la Democracia en el Paraguay. Asunción: Última Hora.
- Lambert, P. & Nickson, A. (Eds.) (1997) The Transition to Democracy in Paraguay. New York: St. Martin's Press.
- Nagel, B. (1999) "Unleashing the Fury: The Cultural Discourse of Rural Violence and Land Rights in Paraguay." Comparative Studies in Society and History 41, 1: 148–81.
- Paredes, R. (2002) La Lucha de Clases en el Paraguay (1989–2002). Asunción: Diseño y Arte: Juan Flores.

Paraguay, protests in the liberal era and the Triple Alliance

Brian Turner and Christina Turner[†]

Paraguay gained independence from Spain in 1811 under the leadership of Dr. José Gaspar Rodríguez de Francia. Francia ruled the country from 1814 to 1840. During this period Francia closed the borders and isolated Paraguay from its neighbors and the world. The economy shifted fundamentally from colonial elite control to state control, opening land for farming by the campesino class.

After the death of Francia in 1840, Carlos Antonio López became dictator from 1844 until 1862. López opened the country to trade and economic development. One of the first railroads in Latin America was built in Paraguay during this period and several new industries were encouraged to develop, including a new steel industry. His son, Francisco Solano López, who ushered in a disastrous period in Paraguayan history, succeeded López at his death.

The younger López had international aspirations, visiting Europe and bringing home an Irish mistress whom he met in Paris. In 1864 López initiated war against Brazil in an effort to defend the losing faction in a civil war in Uruguay. This was followed in 1865 by a declaration of war against Argentina. The War of the Triple Alliance against the combined armies of Brazil, Argentina, and Uruguay lasted five years. López refused to admit defeat until he himself was killed in battle at Cerro Corá in 1870. The war crippled the economy and left a nation of women to repopulate the country. Many of the rail ties were destroyed. Social and economic recovery was slow. Various immigrant groups from Europe and Australia were invited to repopulate the country, but few did. Small numbers of Italian immigrants did arrive by way of Argentina, as well as some people from Germany, Spain, France, England, and Australia.

Paraguay's two traditional political parties – the National Republican Association-Colorado Party (ANR-Partido Colorado) and the Liberal Party – emerged after the war. The Colorado Party held power from 1878 until 1904, when the Liberal Party seized control of the government. This important political revolt occurred when the president of the Liberal Party, Benigno Ferreira, and his party allies Adolfo Soler and Cecilio Báez, organized an invasion by a newly reunited Liberal Party. The Paraguayan merchant elites with partial funding from La Industrial Paraguaya, a company owned by Argentine and Paraguayan investors which held vast tracts of yerba mate forests in the eastern part of the country, supported the invasion.

Although the first labor union in the country was founded in 1886, labor confederations emerged in the first decade of the twentieth century. Anarchist ideas brought by the new immigrants spread among labor activists during the early liberal period. The Liberal elites encouraged increased foreign investment, especially Argentine investment, and the concomitant increase in the size of the working class helped spread anarchist ideas from the skilled artisans in Asunción's cottage industries to the new industrial workers in the railroad sector, slaughterhouses, and tannin factories. Despite the new industrial sector, Paraguay remained primarily rural as the main exports were tannin, wood, yerba mate, and sugar. A Spanish anarchist, Rafael Barrett, was instrumental in the formation of the first trade union confederation in 1906, the Federación Obrera Regional Paraguaya (FORP). The confederation initiated the first May Day celebration in Paraguay with the launching of its newspaper, El Despertar.

Divisions among factions of the Liberal Party reemerged almost as soon as the party took power. Intensified rivalries led to a violent armed uprising known as the Revolution of 1912, aided by armed revolt led by sectors of the armed forces. It marked the end of four years of political intrigue within the party. Benigno Ferreira, who led the successful takeover of the government in 1904, was the leader of the moderate faction, known as the civicos. He was elected president in 1906. The other faction, the radicales, returned to power after Ferreira was overthrown in 1908 after a revolt led by Colonel Albino Jara. The vice president, Emilio González Navero, favored by the radicales, took over the presidency until he too was turned out in favor of radical Manuel Gondra in 1910.

In a pattern similar to events in the 1940s and 1990s, Colonel Jara turned on Gondra and made himself president in a coup in 1911. Jara lasted barely six months until he was removed in a palace coup. After another year of intrigues involving shifting alliances between the factions of the Liberal Party with the Colorado Party and Jara, Jara was killed in fighting. This led to the relative pacification of the country and the election of Eduardo Schaerer, civilian leader of the radicales, to the presidency in August 1912. Schaerer managed to keep factional struggles within the Liberal Party peaceful until the next explosion of elite warfare in the Civil War of 1922–3. This period allowed for a revitalization of commercial activity that had suffered throughout the previous eight years.

The Civil War of 1922–3 marked the most serious political conflict of a party riven with political conflicts. The divisions had shifted from the earlier civicos versus radicales to competing elements of traditionalism versus modernization. Eusebio Ayala came to the presidency as a compromise candidate with the support of the army, pending elections scheduled for 1922. Ayala thought that the military leader who had supported him, Colonel Adolfo Chirife, might align with the Colorado Party and the traditional forces. Because of this, Ayala cancelled the elections. Chirife responded by launching a military uprising that led to the Civil War despite the re-institution of the call for elections. The war lasted 14 months and devastated the entire country. Eusebio Ayala resigned in 1923 and Eligio Ayala (Eusebio's cousin) became provisional president. A final failed invasion of the capital by the traditionalists on July 9, 1923 brought an end to the conflict. The Civil War marked the beginning of the professionalization of the armed forces as well as increasing the deep divisions within the Liberal Party.

World War I spurred an increase in labor movement activity because of the increased global demand for Paraguayan products. In the late 1920s social unrest caused socialist ideas to begin to challenge the anarchosyndicalist roots of the workers' movement. This is reflected with the constitution of both the National Independent League and the Paraguayan Communist Party in 1928.

SEE ALSO: Anarchosyndicalism; Paraguay, Protest and Revolt, 1954–1989;

References and Suggested Readings

- Alexander, R. J. & Parker, E. M. (2005) A History of Organized Labor in Uruguay and Paraguay. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.
- Bray, D. (1991) "Defiance" and the Search for Sustainable Small Farmer Organizations: A Paraguayan Case Study and a Research Agenda. Human Organization 50 (1991): 125–35.
- Flecha, V.-J. & Martini, C. (1994) Historia de la Transición: Pasado y Futuro de la Democracia en el Paraguay. Asunción: Última Hora.
- Lambert, P. & Nickson, A. (Eds.) (1997) The Transition to Democracy in Paraguay. New York: St. Martin's Press.
- Nagel, B. (1999) "Unleashing the Fury": The Cultural Discourse of Rural Violence and Land Rights in Paraguay. Comparative Studies in Society and History 41, 1 (1999): 148–81.
- Nickson, R. A. (1993) Historical Dictionary of Paraguay. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press.
- Paredes, R. (2002a) El sindicalismo después de Stroessner. Asunción: Diseño y Arte: Juan Flores.
- Paredes, R. (2002b) La Lucha de Clases en el Paraguay (1989–2002). Asunción: Diseño y Arte: Juan Flores.

Turner, B. (1993) Community Politics and Peasant-State Relations in Paraguay. Lanham: University Press of America.

Paris Commune, 1871

Michael Kline and Micheline Nilsen

The ten weeks of the Paris Commune of 1871 resonate beyond its brief life. For some historians, it marks the end of the cycle of French revolutionary activity begun with the Revolution in 1789, while for others it was the event that guaranteed the survival of France as a republic. Its detractors saw it as a menacing uprising fomented by the worst and most radical elements in Parisian society. Its supporters saw it as a heroic high point in the struggle for democracy and workers' rights. Today, the Commune remains a touchstone event in French history that has entered the collective consciousness of the nation, particularly revered by the political left in France and in many other countries.

Born in War

The immediate antecedent to the Commune was the disastrous French defeat at the hands of the Prussians on September 2, 1870, when Emperor Napoléon III and his army were surrounded at Sedan. The glittering Second Empire, founded by Louis-Napoléon Bonaparte (a nephew of the great Napoléon I Bonaparte) in a coup d'état in 1851, came to a crashing halt in a war that Prussian Chancellor Otto von Bismarck had engineered. The once proud French army, quickly and ignominiously beaten by the larger and better-organized Prussian forces, had represented the nation's nationalistic impulses and the emperor's desire to be a dominant force in Europe.

On September 4, 1870 deputies of the French legislative body declared a republic, the third since the French Revolution of 1789. By mid-September the Prussians had begun to encircle Paris, preferring to lay siege to the capital rather than try to force its formidable defenses. France was now in the hands of a provisional administration, the Government of National Defense, headed by men who were constitutional republicans, but not of the revolutionary left. After elections for a National Assembly on February 8, 1870, royalists returned in far greater numbers than republicans did. Adolphe Thiers, a conservative republican, became the chief executive of the government.

In November 1870, 60,000 men tried to break out of Paris in order to end the Prussian siege. Another attempt was made in January 1871, again unsuccessful and costly in terms of casualties. By the end of January the Thiers government announced an armistice and began negotiations to end the war with Prussia. France signed a preliminary peace treaty on February 26, 1871, ceding most of the provinces of Alsace and Lorraine in eastern France. France would also pay 5 billion francs in war indemnities.

The new government had agreed to increase the National Guard of Paris and to pay each man one and a half francs per day, an important means of livelihood during the siege. The ranks of the Parisian National Guard soon swelled to 340,000 armed men. The news of the peace treaty was not taken well in Paris, because it offended many who wanted to continue the war by calling upon the revolutionary, patriotic fervor that had saved the country from invasion during the French Revolution in 1792. Determined to continue to resist the Prussians, the Paris Guard seized 200 cannons that had been paid for by popular subscription.

The National Assembly, originally convened in Bordeaux during the war, decided to move to Versailles, outside of Paris, because it feared disruption if it reconvened in the capital, given the unpopularity of the peace settlement among many republican Parisians and the Assembly's royalist predilections. Fearing an insurrection in the capital, Thiers sent troops of the remaining regular army into Paris to recapture the cannons on March 18, 1871. Discovered in the early morning, the troops were dissuaded from their mission, often fraternizing with the Parisian crowds. Nonetheless, two regular army generals, Thomas and Claude Martin Lecompte, were seized and executed by the crowd. It is from this date that the Commune began.

Rise and Fall of the Commune

Determined to return later in strength to better deal with the insubordinate Parisians, Thiers ordered the remaining members of the government and regular army troops to remove to Versailles. On March 3 elections for a Central Committee of the Republican Federation of the Paris National Guard sat 11 of 12 new members from the radical republican left. This committee coordinated actions of the National Guard battalions, whose popular name, Fédérés, evoked the independent federations of volunteers who rose up against the forces of the crowned enemies of the French Revolution.

On March 20 the National Assembly arrived in Versailles from Bordeaux. The majority was intent on a restoration of the monarchy. The elections on March 26 in Paris for a new city council ended any chance of reconciliation with the monarchist-dominated National Assembly at Versailles because the newly elected mayors of the 20 Paris arrondissements mainly represented the revolutionary left. Two days later the new city council took the title Commune de Paris, recalling the independent, insurrectional Paris Commune of 1792 during the French Revolution. Thiers and the national government could not abide the local autonomy and self-governance of its latter-day namesake.

On April 3, 1871 Fédérés mounted an abortive attack on Versailles, signaling the beginning of civil war in earnest. Versailles troops began to bombard Paris on April 6. Both sides began to seize hostages. As the Versailles continued to edge their positions closer to Paris, a Committee of Public Safety took the reins of governance within the Commune. Fearful of the precedent established by the Committee of Public Safety that ran the Terror in 1793, the Commune leaders split over its creation. On May 10 Thiers signed the formal peace treaty with Prussia. On May 21 the first Versailles troops breached the southwestern defenses of the city. Soon over 130,000 soldiers were sweeping from southwest to northeast within Paris. Communards began frantically to build barricades on the city streets, but the renovations to the old city that had been part of Louis-Napoléon's modernization projects allowed the Versailles army to outflank them. Many Communards – men, women, and children – died on the barricades, but the real savagery was to follow during what became known as the Bloody Week (La Semaine sanglante). Many Versailles were outraged by the execution of hostages, including the archbishop of Paris, Monsignor Darboy, although the Commune leaders did not order it. Under orders to mop up quickly and to sweep up the Parisian “rabble,” soldiers began a massacre of the defenders, shooting Communards and suspected Communards on sight. By May 28 the fighting fizzled out, but not without leaving an estimated 10,000–25,000 Communards dead, many of whom were herded together, shot, and dumped into common graves. Courts hastily convicted over 4,000 of the survivors, who were deported to the penal colony in New Caledonia. It was only in 1880, when republicans gained control of the National Assembly, that an amnesty was granted to them.

The Commune's Program

The names of leading Communards are not well known today, and although they represented different variations on a theme, people like Benoît Malon, Félix Pyat, Léo Fränkel, Edouard Vaillant, Charles Delescluze, and Louise Michel all stood for a regeneration of society in search of the uncompleted agenda of liberty, equality, and fraternity promised by the French Revolution. Communards were at odds with a propertied bourgeoisie that had grown conservative with its wealth, and with a rural, provincial population suspicious of Parisian autonomy and extremism. The main supporters of the Commune were not proletarian, unskilled workers from industry. They were skilled workers and artisans of the Parisian craft industries, who believed that social progress and economic justice could be achieved by revolutionary activity. They were responding to the conditions that had moved the bourgeoisie and the working classes to opposite ends of the political, economic, and social spectrum.

Communard ideology centered on the free association of individuals whose sovereignty would regulate their interests. Their answer to France's authoritarian, centralized regimes was decentralization, federation, and workers' control. In this, the Commune was not communistic because it did not promote state ownership. It reopened the Paris stock exchange and refused to pillage the resources of the Bank of France. Within its loose, general structure, the Commune legislated during its short life to create more just political institutions intended to promote economic and social justice. One of its first acts on April 2, 1871 was to declare the separation of church and state (church-state separation was made permanent in 1905). Separation carried over into education, where clergy were removed from teaching, reflecting the principle that religion perpetuated ignorance and authoritarianism. The Commune sought to relieve the burdens on Paris's working classes by extending payment of debts (but not abolishing them), establishing rent control, abolishing military conscription (replacing it with "voluntary" participation in the National Guard), and prohibiting sale of pawned objects, particularly tools needed for work. The Commune members capped their own salaries, raised teachers' salaries to include equality in pay for both male and female teachers, and created workshops for women that would pay a decent wage. Given the Commune's short duration and the pressures it faced in conducting a war, as well as in providing everyday services to the city, many of the reforms were not carried out.

Much has been said about the participation of women in the Commune. Many women volunteered as ammunition and food bearers (les cantinières) during the siege and on the barricades. Some, like Louise Michel, known as the Red Virgin, adopted the armed struggle and fought with the men. Others, like Elizabeth Dimitrieff, founder of the Union des Femmes, sought reforms concerning long hours of work, equal pay for equal working hours, and an end to discrimination in the workplace. Léodile Bréa Champseix, who took the pen name André Léo, was the Commune's most notable female voice. In her journalism she vociferated against the conceptions of work and marriage of the time as nothing more than slavery for women. Historians differ in their interpretations of the Commune's receptivity to female emancipation, but the participation of women in the Commune upset bourgeois notions regarding the stability of the social order. Unfounded rumors spread among those hostile to the Commune concerning the role of the pétroleuse, or female incendiary bomber, particularly during the Commune's last days, when a number of buildings were set on fire due to fighting, or to cover a retreat.

Marx and Engels on the Paris Commune

The Paris Commune was formed in March 1871, when Adolphe Thiers, head of the French government following the Franco-Prussian War (1870–1), ordered the evacuation of Paris and removed executive functions to Versailles. A socialist government known as the Commune was established to rule the city on March 26. Despite divergent ideologies and rivalries between factions, the Commune attempted to create an egalitarian government. It was unable to levy a military challenge against Thiers and the Versailles forces took back the city between May 21 and 28, progressing eastward against strong resistance during the Bloody Week. The Commune remains an enduring symbol of heroic revolutionary action.

Karl Marx's The Civil War in France, 1871 collects three addresses of the International Working Men's Association (IWMA) pertaining to the events of the Paris Commune. The first two, dated from London on July 23, 1870, and September 9, 1870, deal with the Franco-Prussian War. The third and lengthier, "Address of the General Council of the IWMA on the Civil War in France, 1871," is dated London, May 30, 1871.

The Civil War in France claimed that class conflict had produced the Commune. Although he later tempered his views on the Commune's socialism, for Marx, the Commune foretold proletarian activism and social democracy, which explained for him the hostility and repression by bourgeois forces. Dissemination of these documents created a complex genealogy of publications and translations. Friedrich Engels, an influential social theorist and frequent collaborator with Marx, translated the third address into German for publication in July 1871. He also wrote a substantial introduction dated March 18, 1891 on the twentieth anniversary of the Paris Commune for the third German edition published in 1891. This introduction is usually included in subsequent publications of The Civil War in France, 1871.

In the first two addresses, Marx exhorted workers to retain a spirit of international solidarity by refusing to participate in the capitalist Franco-Prussian War. The third address, written right after the end of the Paris Commune, gave an account of events from the institution of a republic in Paris on September 4, 1870 to the end of the Commune. Marx related the abuses of the Thiers forces and hailed the fallen Communards as heroes. He refuted allegations of subversive activities by the IWMA within individual countries and reaffirmed the workers' international solidarity, which placed them at the forefront of class struggle. Marx's contacts with the members of the Paris International before and during the Commune escape scrutiny. Extant communications show Marx consistently discouraging premature revolutionary activity by advocating international solidarity and stressing the foolishness of challenging the new French government within the context of the Franco-Prussian War. However, once revolutionary action had broken out, Marx did lend full support.

Engels' introduction summarized the political implications of Marx's addresses in Europe and highlighted all revolutionary actions in Paris since the French Revolution as proletarian. He also reasserted the message of international solidarity by lauding the Prussian forces who allowed fugitive Communards to pass through their lines. As a result of the Commune, Marxism supplanted the divisive socialist factions (Blanquist and Prudhonist) which had vied for power during the Commune. The short-lived equalitarian government of the Paris Commune continues to provide a model for a "dictatorship of the proletariat" or government by and for the working class. The Commune also demonstrates to many activists the possibility of building a more democratic and egalitarian society.

Nearly fifty years later, Russian revolutionaries Vladimir Lenin and Leon Trotsky demonstrated that the Commune was representative of working-class power. They felt that it failed because, if anything, it was too moderate in its attempt to build bridges across social classes. The Soviet Union for years honored the Commune as a revolutionary forerunner. Contemporary historians have adopted varying stances with regard to the Commune. Many are sympathetic to its republican, democratic, popular program, and in the neoliberal era a growing number of scholars espouse the class conflict view of its intents and purposes. Today, it remains a model for many of patriotic fervor, courageous action and fraternal solidarity, and working-class power.

SEE ALSO: Bonaparte, Louis-Napoleon (1808–1873); Dictatorship of the Proletariat; Engels, Friedrich (1820–1895); Marx, Karl (1818–1883)

References and Suggested Readings

- Boime, A. (1995) Art and the French Commune: Imagining Paris after War and Revolution. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Draper, H. (Ed.) (1971) Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels: Writings on the Paris Commune. New York: Monthly Review Press.
- Gullickson, G. L. (1996) Unruly Women of Paris: Images of the Commune. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.

Horne, A. (1966) The Fall of Paris: The Siege and the Commune, 1870–1871. New York: St. Martin's Press.

Lissagaray, P. (1976) History of the Paris Commune of 1871. Trans. E. Marx. London: New Park Publications.

Marx, K. (1934) The Paris Commune. Intro. F. Engels. New York: New York Labor News.

Shafer, D. A. (2005) The Paris Commune. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.

Tombs, R. (1999) The Paris Commune, 1871. New York: Longman.

Parks, Rosa (1913–2005) and the Montgomery Bus Boycott

Susan Love Brown

Rosa Parks became a national symbol of the civil rights movement when on Thursday, December 1, 1955 she refused to give up her bus seat to a white passenger in Montgomery, Alabama. Her subsequent arrest sparked the beginning of the Montgomery Bus Boycott, which is widely considered to be the beginning of the modern civil rights movement. The boycott, originally meant to last only a day, continued for more than a year and resulted in a Supreme Court decision outlawing segregated seating on public buses.

Background of the Boycott

The segregated bus system had been a source of humiliation for the black citizens of Montgomery for some time. The Montgomery City Code, Section 10, "Separation of the Races – Required," specified that the bus companies had to provide separate seating for blacks and whites. The exception was made for blacks who took care of white children or elderly white persons. Section 11 of the City Code also specified: "Any employee in charge of a bus operated in the city shall have the powers of a police officer of the city while in actual charge of any bus."

In obedience to these laws, it was customary for black people to pay at the front of the bus, get off, walk to the back, and board from the back door. As white passengers boarded and filled up the front seats, if they filled the white section, the black passengers in the front of that section were expected to give up their seats and move back. Blacks and whites could not sit in the same row, not even across the aisle from each other. When Parks refused to yield her seat to a white male passenger, the bus driver, J. P. Blake, summoned the police, and two officers arrested Parks. A trial date was set for December 5, 1955.

Parks was born on February 4, 1913, in Tuskegee, Alabama, to James McCauley, a carpenter, and Leona Edwards, a teacher. However, she grew up on her maternal grandparents' farm outside of Montgomery. Although she attended both the Industrial School for Girls and the lab school at Alabama State Teachers' College for Negroes, Parks did not finish high school until she was an adult at the suggestion of her husband, Raymond Parks, a barber whom she married in 1932. She worked at a number of different jobs, including domestic work and sewing, and volunteered as the secretary to E. D. Nixon, president of the local National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) branch, which she had joined in 1943. At the time of her arrest, she had been working as a seamstress at the Montgomery Fair Department store. It was Nixon and attorney Clifford Durr who arranged her release from jail on bail.

In spite of the key role she was to play, Rosa Parks was not the first person to refuse to give up her seat. Several others before her had done so, only to face arrest and fines. But Parks was a deeply respected member of the black community, a 42-year-old woman with no prior run-ins with the law, making her a good test case.

The Women's Political Council (WPC), a black community organization that had often negotiated with the bus company and city officials, decided to plan a boycott for that day. On December 2, Jo Ann Robinson spread the word through mimeographed leaflets delivered to schools and other locations. The WPC then approached the black clergy, and an organizing meeting was held at the Dexter Avenue Baptist Church, where the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., had begun to preach just three months earlier.

On Monday, December 5, the day of the boycott, the Montgomery buses were 90 percent empty. That evening 6,000 people attended a mass meeting at the Holt Street Baptist Church for worship services and inspirational speeches, and the decision was made to continue the boycott. The Montgomery Improvement Association (MIA) was formed at that point, with Martin Luther King, Jr. as president.

Since black passengers in Montgomery made up 75 percent of the business, their absence meant that the bus company was losing money. Since it was the Christmas shopping season as well, downtown merchants also began to endure losses. Once the bus company and city officials agreed to meet with the representatives of the boycotters, the boycotters asked for only three things: that the bus drivers be more courteous, that blacks "sit from the rear toward the front and whites from the front toward the rear until all seats were taken, with no one having to surrender a seat once taken, and no one having to stand over an empty seat, and that black drivers be hired." All three requests were denied. The bus company also canceled bus services in some black neighborhoods. The refusal of the city officials and the bus company to meet what were rather modest proposals only forced the black community to make the decision to hold out for total desegregation of the bus system.

The MIA then proceeded to organize free transportation to help people get to work. In addition to walking and using taxi cabs (which were forced to stop offering their services at a discount to boycott members when city officials penalized them), the MIA organized carpools in which people with cars drove others to their jobs and picked them up. According to Robinson (1987), the carpool system was organized with 325 private cars picking up passengers from 43 dispatch stations and 42 pickup stations every day. Drivers were given gasoline at black-owned stations, and the stations were reimbursed from monies collected by the MIA on a weekly basis.

The Boycott Continues and Violence Begins

In reaction to the boycott, Montgomery whites made great efforts to expand the White Citizens' Council in order to maintain segregation on the buses. Enthusiasm for the boycott among blacks was beginning to wane, but it was renewed when on January 6, 1956, it was announced that the police commissioner had joined the White Citizens' Council. This organization of white, middle-class men who were against desegregation was then joined by the mayor and the third city commissioner on January 24. This move, meant to intimidate the black citizens of Montgomery, had the opposite effect. Angry and drawing inspiration from their nightly church rallies, blacks decided to continue the boycott and settle for nothing less than total integration of the bus system.

Violence against blacks in Montgomery was inevitable as the boycott continued. On January 26, Martin Luther King, Jr. was arrested on a charge of speeding. On January 30, his house was bombed. Two days later, the home of E. D. Nixon was bombed. On February 21, Rosa Parks and 92 other blacks participating in the boycott were indicted for violating Alabama's anti-boycott law and arrested. Violence and intimidation were also used against any whites who appeared sympathetic to the cause of integration.

Although there had been some attempts at negotiation, these came to an end when the mayor refused to meet with blacks. City officials, invoking a "get tough" policy, endorsed police actions against loitering, and police began to harass black drivers by charging them with traffic violations that never occurred. Some boycotters were actually physically assaulted. The mayor encouraged business owners to fire employees thought to be complicit with the NAACP. Groups of young whites drove through black neighborhoods, accosting anyone on the streets with water balloons, urine, rotten eggs, and even bricks. Others kept up telephone harassments against the boycott leaders, and crosses were burned on front lawns.

The Legal Battle Begins and the Boycott Ends

Because of the violent conditions in Montgomery and the failure of negotiation, the MIA decided to file suit against the city of Montgomery to integrate the bus system. Using five women – Aurelia Browder, Claudette Colvin, Susie McDonald, Jeannetta Reese, and Mary Louise Smith – as the plaintiffs, Attorney Fred Gray, with the assistance of attorneys Clifford Durr and Charles Langford, filed a civil suit against Mayor W. A. Gayle, police commissioner Clyde Sellers, and Commissioner Frank Parks, the chief of police, the bus company, and the bus drivers who had been involved in the cases of the plaintiffs. The case, Browder v. Gayle, was filed in Federal District Court. On June 5, 1956, the court held that segregation on Montgomery's buses was unconstitutional. The City appealed this decision to the Supreme Court.

On November 13, 1956, the City of Montgomery obtained a temporary injunction against the carpools that had supported the boycotters. The car service was never restored, but this became moot when on December 20, 1956, more than a year after Rosa Parks had refused to give up her seat, the Supreme Court order was delivered. On December 21, Rosa Parks and other members of the boycott returned to ride the buses, taking the seats that had previously been denied to them.

Results of the Boycott

The Montgomery Bus Boycott served as the inspiration for other civil rights actions that were to take place for two more decades, but in its immediate aftermath, violence against blacks in Montgomery continued. In 1956, the state of Alabama banned the NAACP. On January 10, 1957, six bombings of houses and churches took place. Even though men were arrested and tried, they were all found not guilty by an all-white jury. Other violence, such as accosting blacks who rode the buses and random shootings, also occurred. Nevertheless, the bus system was permanently integrated, and the move to desegregate bus systems spread from one city to the next.

In a more positive light, the boycott had united the black community of Montgomery across class lines, and it had also united the various religious sects within the black community. Many new leaders, including Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., emerged on the national scene. The boycott proved that blacks could effect change through peaceful and lawful means and that non-violence as a strategy was extremely effective in the segregated South. Since the boycott had nearly bankrupted the bus company and resulted in a major loss of sales to white merchants, it also demonstrated that black economic power was an effective tool in the process of desegregation. The Montgomery Bus Boycott was only the beginning of more than a decade of struggle to desegregate the South, obtain voting rights, and achieve full citizenship.

Rosa Parks participated in the voting rights march from Selma to Montgomery in 1965 but eventually moved to Detroit, Michigan, with her husband and mother to be near relatives. She resumed work as a seamstress but eventually became a secretary in the office of Congressman John Conyers, retiring in 1988. Later in life, Parks received much recognition and many awards, including the NAACP Spingarn Medal (1979), the Presidential Medal of Freedom, and the Congressional Gold Medal, which referred to her as “The Mother of the Modern Civil Rights Movement.”

Parks died on October 24, 2005 at the age of 92. She was the first woman to lie in state in the Capitol Rotunda in Washington, DC, and buses in both Montgomery, Alabama, and Detroit, Michigan, marked front seats with black drapes in her honor. She was buried at Woodlawn cemetery in Detroit, Michigan, and flags were flown at half-mast in the US and abroad on the day of her funeral, which thousands of people attended.

SEE ALSO: Civil Rights Movement, United States, 1960–1965; Civil Rights, United States: Overview; Freedom Rides; Freedom Summer; King, Martin Luther, Jr. (1929–1968) and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC); Non-Violent Movements: Struggles for Rights, Justice, and Identities

References and Suggested Readings

- Abernathy, R. D. (1989) And the Walls Came Tumbling Down: An Autobiography. New York: Harper & Row.
- Brinkley, D. (2000) Mine Eyes Have Seen the Glory: The Life of Rosa Parks. London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson.
- Burns, S. (Ed.) (1997) Daybreak of Freedom: The Montgomery Bus Boycott. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Garrow, D. J. (Ed.) (1989) The Walking City: The Montgomery Bus Boycott, 1955–1956. New York: Carlson.
- Kohl, H. (2005) She Would Not Be Moved: How We Tell the Story of Rosa Parks and the Montgomery Bus Boycott. New York: New Press.
- Parks, R. & Reed, G. J. (1994) Quiet Strength: The Faith, the Hope, and the Heart of a Woman Who Changed a Nation. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan.
- Robinson, J. A. G. (1987) The Montgomery Bus Boycott and the Women Who Started It: The Memoir of Jo Ann Gibson Robinson. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press.
- Walker, R. J. (2007) Let My People Go! The Miracle of the Montgomery Bus Boycott. Lanham, MD: Hamilton Books/Rowman & Littlefield.

Parnell, Charles Stewart (1846–1891)

William H. Mulligan, Jr.

Charles Stewart Parnell, known as the “uncrowned king” of Ireland, was an Irish nationalist leader who gained great popularity among Irish patriots in both Ireland and America. He was instrumental in developing the Irish National Land League, which waged a protracted campaign for land reform known as the Irish Land War. Parnell also emerged as the leader of the Irish Parliamentary Party, actively agitating for home rule.

Parnell was born at Rathdrum, Avondale, County Wicklow, on June 27, 1846. The Parnells were an established Anglo-Irish gentry family into which his mother, who was from New Jersey, had married. His grandfather, William Parnell (1780–1821), had been a member of the Irish parliament and an opponent of its abolition by the Act of Union in 1800. The Parnells were known as nationalists and as good landlords who were friendly to Catholics and the Roman Catholic religion. In all of this, they were not at all typical of their class.

Parnell attended Cambridge University, but left without taking a degree. He was expelled for punching a train conductor who had mocked his Irish accent. Such conduct was considered unbecoming of a gentleman, who was expected to ignore the behavior of his social inferiors.

In 1875 Parnell was elected to the British parliament from County Meath and joined a faction led by Isaac Butt that was committed to home rule for Ireland. Butt was a veteran of Irish politics, having debated Daniel O’Connell and (in his capacity as a barrister) defended William Smith O’Brien after the 1848 Rebellion. In 1870, he had founded the Home Rule Association (initially the Home Government Association) following organizational precedents set by Daniel O’Connell, with an associate membership of a shilling a year. Butt was not an aggressive leader, however, and the Irish parliamentary faction lacked discipline and direction. Butt’s rival was Joseph Biggar, a former member of the Fenian organization, the Irish Republican Brotherhood, who had been elected to parliament in 1874. While Butt sought to work within the system, Biggar advocated obstructionism – bogging parliament down in procedural maneuvers with the aim of thus aggravating it into granting Ireland home rule. Pressure built within the Association for more aggressive action.

Parnell allied himself with Biggar, but was reluctant to challenge Butt for leadership of the Home Rule Association. Parnell, however, was viewed as potentially a more effective leader than Biggar, and he was approached by the Fenian organization in the United States, Clann na Gael, about an alliance, if he would promise to aggressively pursue land reforms and home rule. Clann na Gael was very influential in the United States and had substantial financial resources, but it was strongly opposed by the Irish Catholic hierarchy because of its links to the Fenians' violence of the late 1860s. Parnell dealt cautiously with Clann na Gael, and refused to challenge Butt even after the latter was censured by the Home Rule Association convention in 1879 for lax leadership. Parnell's path was cleared, however, by Butt's death in May 1879.

Parnell allied himself with Michael Davitt and the two formed the Irish National Land League in 1879. The Land League had three goals, which were expressed in an alliterative slogan: fair rent, fixed tenure, and freedom of sale. The organization was prepared to use aggressive tactics, primarily ostracism and boycott of those who failed to accept their demands. (The word "boycott" entered the English language as a result of an 1880 Land League campaign against a landlord's agent named Captain Charles Boycott.) While Davitt remained in Ireland to organize, Parnell went to the United States to negotiate with Clann na Gael and to raise money for the Land League.

On April 26, 1880, Parnell was elected leader of the Irish Parliamentary Party, which he managed to transform into a disciplined bloc. Parnell would become the most popular political leader in Ireland and the Irish diaspora for the next decade – hence his sobriquet as "uncrowned king" of Ireland.

The Land League's aggressive tactics caused the period of Irish history from 1879 to 1903 to become known as the Land War. Ostracism – refusing to speak or interact with those who took up land from which members had been evicted – and the boycott – refusing to work for landlords who evicted tenants – sometimes led to violence. Using that violence as justification, parliament passed a Coercion Bill in 1881 making it illegal to boycott an English landlord in Ireland. Parnell vigorously opposed the bill, as did the Land League's paper, United Ireland. The government suppressed the Land League, and Parnell was imprisoned in Kilmainham Gaol. Outrage in Ireland, and increased obstructionism by Parnell's party in parliament, forced the government to negotiate with Parnell and resulted in the Treaty of Kilmainham.

The Treaty of Kilmainham confirmed Parnell's position as Ireland's most influential political leader and pledged the government to address

Land League concerns. The Land Act that resulted enacted the Land League's main demands into law. Parnell, who was released from prison on May 2, 1882, agreed to try to restrain agrarian violence, which subsequently did indeed decline. A process of returning the land of Ireland to the Irish people and ending landlordism had begun, but it would take another 28 years to complete.

On May 6, 1882, just four days after Parnell's release from Kilmainham Gaol, a Fenian splinter group succeeded in assassinating the newly arrived chief secretary for Ireland, Lord Cavendish, and his undersecretary, T. H. Burke, in Dublin's Phoenix Park. The government responded by passing a Crimes Act that threatened the entire reform movement. When Parnell opposed the repressive legislation he was accused of supporting terrorism, but his political star nonetheless continued to rise.

In the 1885 elections, Parnell's Irish Party won every Irish seat except for eastern Ulster and the University of Dublin, giving him enough votes to hold the balance of power at Westminster. When the Liberal Gladstone government pushed for renewal of the Crimes Act in Ireland, Parnell and the Irish Party joined with the Tories and brought the government down. The 1886 election led to a reinstatement of the alliance between the Liberal Party and the Irish Party, and the price for the alliance was home rule for Ireland. When Gladstone's own party deserted him on the issue, the government fell again. It was clear that Parnell had a powerful position within parliament and that the demand for home rule would have to be met if there was to be a stable government.

Before a second Home Rule Bill could be brought forward, however, The Times of London in 1887 published a series of sensational articles accusing Parnell of complicity in murder and other acts of violence related to the Land War, as well as condoning the Phoenix Park murders. The articles were based on documentary evidence provided by a self-styled Irish nationalist named Richard Piggott. The uproar against Parnell that ensued seemed to ensure that home rule would be a lost cause. An official inquiry was launched, however, resulting in an admission by Piggott that he had forged the letters allegedly signed by Parnell that The Times articles had cited. Piggott committed suicide and Parnell was vindicated. A subsequent surge of sympathy for Parnell extended to the home rule issue as well. British public opinion had come to view home rule for Ireland as a moral imperative, and Gladstone was prepared to use his considerable political skill and moral gravitas to affect it. The century-long struggle to repeal the Act of Union seemed on the verge of success.

But alas, before a bill could be brought forward, in late 1889 one of Parnell's allies, Captain William O'Shea, filed for divorce on the grounds of adultery. Parnell was named as the co-respondent and did not contest the charge. Katherine (Kitty) O'Shea and Parnell had enjoyed a ten-year relationship and he was the father of several of her children. Parnell vigorously denied having acted dishonorably, but the Catholic bishops denounced him and the scandal made him a pariah. His party was thrown into disarray; when he refused to step down as its leader, it split and became ineffective for a decade. Gladstone quickly dropped the home rule issue and it was not to be revived for 20 years.

Parnell married Katherine O'Shea in June 1891, but his health was broken. He died at Brighton, England, on October 6, 1891. His funeral attracted a huge crowd of 150,000 and he was buried in Glasnevin Cemetery in Dublin, not far from O'Connell's grave. His memory is honored annually in Ireland with Ivy Day, a commemoration of the day he died.

SEE ALSO: Davitt, Michael (1846–1906); Fenian Movement; Irish Nationalism; O'Connell, Daniel (1775–1847); Young Ireland

References and Suggested Readings

- Bew, P. (1980) C. S. Parnell. Dublin: Gill & Macmillan.
 Boyce, D. G. & O'Day, A. (Eds.) (1991) Parnell in Perspective. London: Routledge.
 Foster, R. F. (1976) Charles Stewart Parnell and His Family. Atlantic Highlands, NJ: Humanities Press.
 Hurst, M. (1968) Parnell and Irish Nationalism. Toronto: University of Toronto Press.
 Lyons, F. S. L. (1977) Charles Stewart Parnell. New York: Oxford University Press.
 O'Brien, C. C. (1957) Parnell and His Party. Oxford: Clarendon Press.

Parrot, Jean-Claude (b. 1936)

David Bleakney

Jean-Claude Parrot had a marked and influential history as a trade union leader. For 21 years he was a national officer of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers (CUPW) during a period of labor disputes and wildcat strikes. For 15 of those years (1977–92) he was the national president. He spent 18 years as a chief negotiator, winning a series of improvements for his membership that influenced the entire labor movement and society at large. The most notable was the achievement of paid maternity leave in 1981, the result of a 42-day strike. Today, most working Canadians are entitled to paid parental leave.

The oldest of four children, Parrot was born in Montreal, Quebec to Gilles Parrot and Marie-Anne Boucher on July 24, 1936. Spending his youth in Montreal, he dropped out of school in the 10th grade, attended business college, and worked in a bank. He began working at the post office on July 24, 1954.

In the early 1960s the Canadian post office was a place of paternalism, nepotism, discrimination, poor working conditions, and a top-down military approach to labor relations. Almost all (97 percent) of full-time jobs were held by men, and 97 percent of part-time jobs were held by women. Intimidation and harassment were rampant, and seniority was not given much consideration. Management had visual observation galleries from where they would monitor workers, even when they went to the washroom. When in 1965 postal workers defied the government and their own postal association to win full collective bargaining rights for the federal public sector, Parrot was a strike organizer. By 1977 Parrot was national president.

Parrot believed in a democratic organization with workers often filling elected positions normally reserved for appointed experts and hired staff. He was keenly involved with the evolution of the union structure. This made the CUPW somewhat unique in the Canadian labor movement, consolidating its reputation as a militant and democratic organization of 55,000 members based all over Canada and Quebec. The preamble of the CUPW constitution notes that the CUPW actively commits itself to the objective of transforming the present social and economic order, and rejects all forms of trade unionism that fail to pose the basic division between the interests of workers and the interest of the employer, while pursuing the class interests of its members.

Parrot was a vocal proponent of the right to free collective bargaining and expressed regular frustration and anger over interference by governments that imposed back-to-work legislation. He believed that employers had very little incentive to negotiate in good faith under such circumstances. Parrot was sent to jail for defying an act of parliament to return postal workers to work during the 1978 strike, believing the government never had any intention of negotiation and had prepared the legislation in advance. He served two months of a three-month sentence. He was a formidable and unpredictable strategist and tactician who employed various strategies – from rotating strikes to direct action – to keep the employers and governments off guard. Because of this, Parrot was frequently criticized by the news media, politicians, and occasionally other labor leaders for being too radical and giving trade unions a bad name.

In order to reduce political interference in labor relations Parrot successfully advocated that the post office become an independent publicly owned corporation rather than a branch of the federal government beholden to the whims of the minister of the day. He believed that it was the labor of workers that paid for new technology in the workplace, and so the workers were entitled to the benefits of job security and a shorter work week. Other major initiatives included the conversion of part-time and casual work into full-time and permanent employment, as well as the inclusion of women both in the workplace as equals and in positions of influence in the union structure. The proportion of female workers rose from 6 percent in 1965 to 42 percent 20 years later. Parrot was elected vice president of the Canadian Labor Congress in June, 1992, the same body that had publicly criticized him years earlier. He retired in 2002.

SEE ALSO: Anarchosyndicalism; Canada, Labor Protests; Winnipeg General Strike of 1919

References and Suggested Readings

- Parrot, J. C. (2005) My Union, My Life: Jean-Claude Parrot and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers. Halifax: Fernwood Publishing.
- White, J. (1990) Mail and Female: Women and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers. Toronto: Thompson Educational Publishing.

Participatory democracy, history of

Michael Menser

Participatory democracy (PD) is that view of politics which calls for the creation and proliferation of practices and institutions that enable individuals and groups to better determine the conditions in which they act and relate to others. Because it stresses the role of individuals as agents, PD is often contrasted with liberal democratic models of governance because of the latter's reliance on representation. In both theory and practice, the application of PD is not limited to the political sphere but potentially encompasses all areas of human activity, including the public and private, the sociocultural and economic – again in contrast to liberal democratic models. Although a minor tradition within political philosophy and democratic theory, PD has enjoyed a resurgence in both practice and theory since the 1990s, especially with the emergence of the Zapatistas in 1994, but also due to the successes of an array of municipality-based projects in Latin America and India, and more broadly the innovations made by actors that identify with the global justice movement and/or participate in the World Social Forums. In the current period, PD approaches are most frequently found amongst anarchist, indigenous, feminist, ecological, and “solidarity economy” movements.

History

The phrase “participatory democracy” gained currency in 1962 after Students for a Democratic Society (SDS) issued their groundbreaking Port Huron statement, which, among other things, laid out a conception of democracy that called for citizens to seize their collective political fates by reclaiming the public sphere as self-determining agents. (University of Michigan professor Arnold Kaufman coined the phrase in his “Human Nature and Participatory Democracy,” and his student, SDS member Tom Hayden, drafted the Port Huron statement.) However the concept of participatory democracy, especially as self-governance, is much older. Inklings of such an approach can be found in Aristotle's Politics and more robustly in the egalitarianism of Jean-Jacques Rousseau. Both stress the importance of collective deliberation for three reasons. First, it cultivates the production of the emotional bonds that form the basis of a political community. Second, it better enables the pursuit of justice. And, third, it advances individual and collective citizen capability. But PD approaches usually go beyond debate, deliberation, and policymaking to include forms of collective ownership and co-management. A key concept in this regard is the notion of the “commons” as applied to everything from land, surplus value (for example, worker cooperatives), and software on the World Wide Web (such as the open source movement).

As for the practice of PD – as numerous anthropological studies have shown – not only are hierarchical and authoritarian societies to be found amidst a diverse array of periods and locales, so too are traditions espousing much more egalitarian and democratic practices of self-governance. Well-known historical examples of PD include indigenous societies such as the Haudenosaunee (or Iroquois Confederacy), medieval European cities, and town hall meetings in New England from the eighteenth century to the present. A key figure who discusses PD in such various venues was the nineteenth-century Russian anarchist Peter Kropotkin, especially in his work Mutual Aid. Indeed, it was not until the rise of Utopian socialism and Marxism that political philosophers and movements forwarded the claim that “the people” themselves should control the institutions and mechanisms of governance. Proponents of such a view included anarchists, anarchosyndicalists, council communists, and guild socialists.

Building upon these earlier views, contemporary proponents of participatory democracy argue that any sphere of human activity could and should be made more “participatory,” not just the formally political (legislatures, courts, bureaucratic departments), but the social and economic realms as well (families, neighborhoods, communities, schools, associations, firms). The academic locus classicus for this current phase is Carole Pateman’s participation and democratic theory, although the municipality-focused “social ecology” of anarchist Murray Bookchin was influential especially for many activists. According to George Katsiaficas’s study The Imagination of the New Left: A Global Analysis of 1968, PD as “self-management” was crucial for many 1960s radicals, especially feminists, both in the United States and in Europe.

Types of Participatory Democracy

Although a wide range of efforts may be classified as PD, there are strong differences of opinion among theorists and practitioners with respect to the relationship between PD and the state and PD and capitalism. Some argue that the state is a necessary but insufficient part of the PD project. Others claim that the state is essentially hierarchical and coercive and thus must be dismantled or bypassed altogether. Since the late 1990s, however, more theorists and practitioners are opting for complex and even seemingly contradictory mixes of the first two positions. This is in part due to the failure of liberal democracy and the changing nature of the state under neoliberal globalization.

The first group aims to “reclaim the state” so as to bring it more under the control of communities and/or associations. The state then plays a crucial role in fostering PD even if it is not the central political actor – as it had been for liberal democrats and state socialists. Instead, government is used to foster broad-based participation with respect to policymaking and/or the administration of services. Of the more influential contemporary proponents of this view are associationists. Associationists Joshua Cohen and Joel Rogers (1995) argue that the state must more actively integrate multiple groups in policymaking, especially those that are underserved or discriminated against for reasons of both efficacy and fairness. In his Associative Democracy, Paul Hirst builds upon the guild socialism of G. D. H. Cole and argues that the state should actually devolve many of its functions – especially social welfare agencies – to citizen-based groups in order to improve service delivery, develop citizen capabilities, and increase freedom. Other associationists, like guild socialists before them, stress the importance of democratizing the economy. Here an array of views, sometimes antagonistic to one another, abound from the “economic democracy” of David Schweikart, to Hugo Chávez’s Venezuela, to the more bottom-up anti-market views of Michael Albert’s Participatory Economics. (During the Cold War, Yugoslavia was often studied as such an alternative to authoritarian state socialism and inequality-fomenting capitalist liberal democracy.)

The second group considers the state to be essentially (and historically) hierarchical and coercive and thus stresses the importance of forming self-governing communities that are outside of or against the state. Many anarchists hold such a view, but so do a number of peasant and indigenous groups, as can be seen in the Chipko movement in India, the Zapatistas in Mexico, and a multiplicity of movements in Bolivia. John Holloway’s How to Change the World Without Taking Power is one of the more influential articulations of this view, but there are others that depart from his ontology.

In the last decade, a third grouping has offered an array of hybrid models that stress the centrality of civil society or the “social,” but these groups relate to the state in more instrumental and contradictory ways. Here, the focus is on democratizing a wide array of existing institutions such as the family, household, neighborhood, workplace, schools, and arts and media. Examples of such practices include intentional communities, polyamory, affinity groups, collective households, community-sponsored agriculture, worker and consumer cooperatives, credit unions, free schools, indymedia outlets, and the “theater of the oppressed.” A municipal version of this framework is the well-studied case of “participatory budgeting,” which allows for community control of a city’s budget and operates within a redistributive social justice framework. Participatory budgeting started in Porto Alegre, Brazil in 1989 and has spread to more than 1,000 cities globally. Many of these mixed models integrate PD with ecological, feminist, or labor movements, and some are dedicated to subverting hierarchies such as patriarchy, racism, imperialism, and capitalism. Increasingly, many of these intimately local efforts are interlinking with other groups and practices in order to “scale up.” One increasingly popular rubric for this interconnection of participatory economic alternatives is called “solidarity economy,” which according to Allard, Davidson, and Matthaëi’s Solidarity Economy, aims to interconnect these diverse local efforts. Among the most innovative and robust global expressions of this view is La Vía Campesina, a transnational association of small farmers made up of more than 130 organizations in 60 countries now counting more than 200 million members.

Frequent criticisms of PD include: such efforts tend to be short-lived, are not adequate for large-scale, technologically complex societies, and/or are too communitarian and not inclusive enough. However, since the early 1990s, as D. L. Sheth argues in his “Micro-Movements in India” (in Santos 2005), many PD perspectives and efforts have created an array of innovations to grapple with these difficulties, especially as the state form and political parties have, for many, lost their monopoly on what counts as efficacious politics. Also, venues such as the World Social Forum increase the possibility of articulating PD approaches from the local to the global.

SEE ALSO: Anarchosindicalism; Chipko Movement; Global Justice Movement and Resistance; Grassroots Resistance to Corporate Globalization; Indymedia Global Justice Campaign, 2000s; Kropotkin, Peter (1842–1921); Marxism; Multitude; Shiva, Vandana (b. 1952); Students for a Democratic Society (SDS); Via Campesina and Peasant Struggles; World Social Forums; Zapatistas, EZLN, and the Chiapas Uprising

References and Suggested Readings

- Albert, M. (1991) The Political Economy of Participatory Economics. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Allard, J., Davidson, C., & Matthaëi, J. (Eds.) (2008) Solidarity Economy: Building Alternatives for People and Planet. Papers and Reports from the 2007 US Social Forum. n.p.: ChangeMaker Publications.
- Bookchin, M. (1995) From Urbanization to Cities: Towards a New Politics of Citizenship. New York: Cassell.
- Cohen, J. & Rogers, J. (1995) Secondary Associations and Democratic Governance. In J. Cohen & J. Rogers (Eds.), Associations and Democracy. London: Verso, pp. 7–98.
- Fung, A. & Wright, E. O. (Eds.) (2003) Deepening Democracy: Institutional Innovations in Empowered Participatory Governance. New York: Verso.
- Hirst, P. (1993) Associative Democracy. Cambridge: Polity.
- Holloway, J. (2002) Change the World Without Taking Power: The Meaning of Revolution Today. London: Pluto Press.
- Menser, M. (2005) The Global Social Forum Movement, Porto Alegre’s “Participatory Budget,” and the Maximization of Democracy. Situations: A Journal of the Radical Imagination 1, 1 (Fall): 87–108.
- Santos, B. de Sousa (Ed.) (2005) Democratizing Democracy: Beyond the Liberal Democratic Canon. New York: Verso.
- Shiva, V. (1993) Monocultures of the Mind: Perspectives on Biodiversity and Biotechnology. London: Zed Books.
- Wainwright, H. (2008) The Commons, the State, and Transformative Politics. Red Pepper, January 3.

Partito di Unità Proletaria-Democrazia Proletaria

Attilio Manganò

Partito d’Unità Proletaria (Proletarian Unity Party, PdUP) and Democrazia Proletaria (Proletarian Democracy, DP) were two party organizations created in the 1970s in Italy as part of the process of transforming Italian new left movements into political organizations that sought to create a stable political space in the political system.

In 1975, Democrazia Proletaria was the name originally given to an electoral alliance that aligned the organizations Avanguardia Operaia (Workers' Vanguard, AO) and Partito di Unità Proletaria per il Comunismo (Proletarian Unity Party for Communism), with support from Lotta Continua and other Italian new left groups. In the 1976 general elections, the alliance won 1.5 percent of the electoral vote and elected six deputies, the first members of the new left to hold seats in the Italian parliament. The electoral showing was diminished by the Italian Communist Party (PCI) competition for votes from the far left and internecine political dissension among organizations in the coalition. The alliance was comprised of AO, a political current rooted in the factories of northern Italy that split from Trotskyism and sponsored rank-and-file worker committees (comitati unitari di base); PdUP, the result of a merger of the socialist left (Partito Socialista Italiano di Unità Proletaria, PSIUP) led by Vittorio Foa, a Catholic leftist; Movimento Politico dei Lavoratori (Workers' Political Movement), led by Livio Labor; and the Manifesto group. Lotta Continua, under Adriano Sofri's leadership, was the most prominent of the movement-oriented organizations to emerge from the 1968–9 protest era. Lotta Continua was an extra-parliamentary organization that abstained from the electoral arena and remained dedicated to stimulating and sustaining progressive social conflict. However, while it did not take part in the alliance, Lotta Continua supported it.

The PdUP's history is a complex pattern of shifting political alliances and splits, which to a degree reflect the internal divisions of the Italian left. In 1974 PdUP aligned with the Manifesto group under the banner "PdUP per il comunismo" ("PdUP for communism"). The purpose of founding a party to the left of the PCI was to create a new working-class organization that would unify all the "revolutionary" political groups. But the result of this unification process paradoxically created significant political splits along different perspectives in the party's position toward the PCI.

Tactically, PdUP was split between organizations seeking a critical alliance with the PCI and others opposing any cooperation with the PCI's "regime" and its alliance with the Christian Democrats. Soon after its formation, the effort to forge and consolidate a new party out of the emergent social movements of the late 1960s with a revolutionary strategy took a critical turn. The explosion of renewed radicalism represented by the movement of 1977 was critical of new left parties that stressed movement politics (sometimes in concurrence with armed struggle politics), and contributed to even greater tensions within the party and its constituent organizations. Lotta Continua disbanded and dissolved.

On April 13, 1978, Democrazia Proletaria decided to form a new party, with the merger of many fractions among leftists, labor unionists, activists, and communists. But in the 1979 general elections the new electoral alliance, Nuova Sinistra Unità (New Left Unity), polled just 0.8 percent of the vote and no deputies were elected to parliament. Two weeks later Mario Capanna was elected to the European parliament and emerged as leader of Democrazia Proletaria. In 1984 he was elected secretary of the party, and Democrazia Proletaria consolidated its position with representatives in parliament, regional councils, and many local municipalities. Although it was able to conduct mass campaigns, it remained a small party and could not substantially increase its electoral presence. The other new left party, the PdUP, once highly critical of the PCI, merged with it in 1984.

In the 1980s Democrazia Proletaria was the only independent party of the Italian new left. In 1987 Capanna resigned as secretary and was replaced by Giovanni Russo Spina. Two years later he, along with Edo Ronchi, promoted a split to form a Green–Rainbow alliance. Although this did not influence Democrazia Proletaria's presence in the political arena, the party suffered from internal conflicts between Russo Spina's eco-pacifism and Luigi Vinci's strictly class struggle stance.

In 1991 Democrazia Proletaria merged into the new Partito della Rifondazione Comunista (Communist Refoundation Party), led by Armando Cossutta, which brought together all those who did not support the new communist secretary Achille Occhetto's dissolution of the PCI to establish a Partito Democratico della Sinistra (Democratic Party of the Left). In the Rifondazione party most of Democrazia Proletaria's militants and leaders continued their political activity, some in positions of leadership or political visibility. Eventually the Rifondazione party became a meeting point for political leaders of PdUP, for former communists under Cossutta's leadership, and for some Trotskyists.

SEE ALSO: Italian Communist Party; Italian Socialist Party; Italy, from the New Left to the Great Repression (1962–1981); Manifesto, II

References and Suggested Readings

- Degli Incerti, D. (Ed.) (1977) La sinistra rivoluzionaria in Italia. Rome: Savelli.
- Di Scala, S. (1988) Renewing Socialism: Nenni to Craxi. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Garzia, A. (1985) Da Natta a Natta. Storia del Manifesto e del PdUP. Bari: Dedalo.
- Hine, D. & Vassallo, S. (2000) Italian Politics: The Return of Politics. Oxford: Berghahn Books.
- Mangano, A. (1978) Autocritica e politica di classe. Milan: Ottaviano.
- Protti, D. (1979) Cronache di nuova sinistra. Dal PSIUP a DP. Milan: Gammalibri.
- Weinberg, L. (1995) The Transformation of Italian Communism. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction.

Paterson Silk Strike of 1913

Anne F. Mattina

On January 27, 1913, four men were fired by the Doherty Silk Mill in Paterson, New Jersey for asking management for a meeting to discuss the increase of their responsibilities from two looms to four. Eight hundred of their fellow workers walked off the job in protest, leading to a massive strike in which 24,000 workers went out and nearly 300 mills were idled for 6 months. National organizers from the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), fresh from a victory among woolen workers in Lawrence, Massachusetts, immediately entered the fray. Despite a massive effort by local organizers and strikers, the workers were unsuccessful in their attempt to affect change in their working conditions.

As the mills emptied, the city of Paterson acted swiftly in closing down public spaces to the strikers. The police and private security hired by the mill owners were called into action to enforce laws against loitering, effectively shutting down parades and driving the workers off of city streets. Nightly meetings helped rally the strike force. The IWW's "Big Bill" Haywood and Elizabeth Gurley Flynn spoke constantly to workers urging them to remain true to the cause. In addition, Gurley Flynn held weekly meetings with the women throughout the strike. These gatherings empowered the women, creating an atmosphere for female strike leaders to emerge. Gurley Flynn served as an inspiration to the women, both strikers and strikers' wives, a group she specifically sought out as she felt that they were essential to success.

The strike continued throughout the spring, the workers remaining steadfast in their conviction. Pressure from the manufacturers caused the police and the private security forces to increase their aggressiveness with the strikers. On April 17, during an altercation between strikers, "scabs," and a private security force engaged to protect the mills, Valentino Modestino, a bystander, was hit by a bullet fired by the security force. He died three days later. Sensing an opportunity for generating public sympathy, strike leaders organized a massive funeral. Thousands of strikers formed a silent parade of mourners, led by Bill Haywood, through the streets of Paterson. Strikers demonstrated solidarity by wearing red carnations and waving red flags. There was little change in the mill owners' response.

Starving and recalcitrant, the workers continued to press their case but manufacturers were not desperate for their return, as they had the option to send the work over state lines into Pennsylvania. Owners did, however, want to maintain control over their workforce and did so by any means necessary. Violent, repressive measures resulted in mass jailing of the strike force, as workers jammed city cells and courts. The deadlock compelled the strikers to become more creative in their protests.

A series of Sunday meetings was held at the home of Pietro and Maria Botto in nearby Haledon, New Jersey, a town governed by a sympathetic socialist mayor. Speakers addressed the crowds in a multitude of languages from the balcony of the Bottos' second floor. These rallies were enormously important to the solidarity of the strikers. The crowds grew weekly as the strike dragged on in Paterson. The Sundays at Haledon drew many curious observers as well, including reporter John Reed, who brought word of the events to radical comrades in Greenwich Village.

"The Strike Pageant" was an idea born of frustration and starvation. Desperate for publicity for the strikers, Reed, Haywood, and others decided to mount a huge pageant, a dramatic retelling of the events of the strike using the strikers themselves as “actors.” On June 7, a crowd of nearly 15,000 people thronged to Madison Square Garden to witness the spectacle. One thousand workers took part in the show, chronicling the events of the previous months in Paterson – including the murder and funeral of Modestino. The pageant did not turn a profit, and some historians have pointed to it as the reason why the strike ultimately failed. However, work by Stephen Golin (1988) argues convincingly that conventional wisdom on the lack of financial success of the pageant fails to identify what did happen for the strikers: political transformation. By creating and participating in the telling of their own story, he asserts, they “transformed the telling into a political action” (178). The physical reenactment combined with the public spectacle of the pageant provided yet another outlet for dissent. The strike fund, however, was no richer for the effort and solidarity began to fray.

Additional resistance would need sustenance. Food was becoming an increasingly scarce commodity and though the organizers worked desperately to sustain the workers, they could not. By the end of June the strike was beginning to fall apart, and by early August, it was over. The workers had gained nothing from the mill owners, but they had empowered themselves to fight again, another day.

SEE ALSO: Anarchosyndicalism; Flynn, Elizabeth Gurley (1890–1964); Haywood, Big Bill (1869–1928); Industrial Workers of the World (IWW); Reed, John (1887–1920)

References and Suggested Readings

- Bird, S., Georgakas, D., & Shaffer D. (1995) Solidarity Forever: An Oral History of the IWW. Chicago: Lakeview Press.
- Dubofsky, M. (1969) We Shall Be All: A History of the Industrial Workers of the World. Chicago: Quadrangle Books.
- Foner, P. S. (1965) History of the Labor Movement in the United States: The Industrial Workers of the World, 1905–1917. New York: International Publishers.
- Golin, S. (1988) The Fragile Bridge: Paterson Silk Strike, 1913. Philadelphia: Temple University Press.
- Osborne, J. D. (1978) Italian Immigrants and the Working Class in Paterson: The Strike of 1913 in Ethnic Perspective. In P. Stellhorn (Ed.), New Jersey's Ethnic Heritage. Trenton: New Jersey Historical Commission.

Tripp, A. H. (1987) The IWW and the Paterson Silk Strike. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.

Paul, Alice (1885–1977)

Carol Klimick Cyganowski

Alice Paul brought to the US woman suffrage movement many radical tactics of the British movement: marches, outdoor public meetings, disruption, picketing, refusal to pay fines to avoid jail terms, prison disobedience, hunger strikes, and holding responsible the party in power. Acting to influence US circumstances, Paul developed prototype strategies for civil rights protest: non-violent demonstrations, passive resistance, picketing the White House and Congress, using media coverage to provoke public opinion over assaults against demonstrators and brutality against prisoners. Thanks partly to this awakening, public outrage repeatedly pushed forward the Nineteenth Amendment. After suffrage, Paul's National Woman's Party (NWP) pursued women's equality through federal and state laws. She authored and fought for the first US Equal Rights Amendment (ERA) and worked for women's rights internationally.

Born into an affluent Quaker family committed to social good, gender equality, and education, Paul was raised by a mother who was a member of the largest national suffrage association (NAWSA). Her grandfather was a founder of co-educational Swarthmore College, which Paul attended, graduating in 1905. She went on to the University of Pennsylvania for an MA in sociology (1907), joining NAWSA but intending to pursue change through social work. Paul began professional life as a child of her class, trained in a model of assimilating immigrant working-class clients to the values of upper-class social workers. In postgraduate work in England she was far more engaged by further graduate study at the (then young and socialist) London School of Economics. Moved from remedial action to political action for social change, Paul began to see oppression on a wider scale.

Paul joined the WSPU, the radical woman's suffrage organization of Emmeline Pankhurst. As the organization moved to more civil disobedience and property destruction, Paul took an active part and was jailed along with other WSPU militants. Demanding classification as political prisoners and being refused, WSPU members refused to cooperate, starved themselves in hunger strikes, froze rather than wear prison garb, and destroyed property whenever they could. Their intransigence was a badge of honor, a refusal to be complicit with a system that denied them a hearing.

Returning to the US in 1910 with her suffragist reputation, Paul was quickly integrated into NAWSA, even as she completed a PhD in sociology. Paul cut out her own position as head of the Congressional Committee, focusing on Washington and a federal constitutional amendment. Along with Lucy Burns, Paul wrested attention to women's demands with public demonstrations, beginning with elaborate pageants and a parade during Woodrow Wilson's inauguration. Press coverage of marchers attacked by bystanders, seemingly condoned by the police, created strategic martyrdom. Public interest and outcry moved suffrage activism into mainstream consciousness and brought the first favorable report from a Senate committee.

As NAWSA failed to exploit the new energy, staying with a state-based campaign and supporting the Democratic Party, Paul, Burns, and others formed the Congressional Union (CU). CU later became the National Woman's Party (NWP), the longest-lasting US woman's rights organization. The inaugural parade had served notice on Wilson, and as he refused support, NWP organized auto and train tours of suffrage speakers, used limited woman suffrage in western states to press on the party, developed a sophisticated lobby database (card file), demonstrated, and bore silent witness in front of the White House with increasingly provocative banners. The pickets were tolerated until World War I. As they compared Wilson with European tyrants and pointed to lack of suffrage as lack of democracy, NWP banner holders were met with mob violence and arrest. Refusing to pay fines, conform to prison rules, or eat prison food, the suffrage prisoners were brutally treated and forcibly fed. Again, public protest rallied the cause, and former prisoners toured the country in prison garb to promote suffrage.

After passage of the Nineteenth Amendment (1920), Paul returned to the Seneca Falls resolution for the next step in the fight for equality under the law, the Equal Rights Amendment. Paul obtained three law degrees during the ERA fight. Unlike ERA stalwart Ethel M. Smith, who focused on working women and unions, Paul engaged professional women, challenging gender roles and the economic effects of legal inequality. Along with the ERA, the NWP worked for justice on matters ranging from citizenship through child custody, property, and divorce. Paul herself moved to international women's issues, starting the World Woman's Party (WWP) which brought about a gender equity provision in the UN Charter and the UN Commission on the Status of Women. In the US Paul helped to assure that Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act prohibited discrimination on account of sex. She lived to see the 1970s US women's movement reintroduce the ERA. The NWP lasted through 1999; it is memorialized through the Sewall-Beimont House and Museum and leadership development programs of the Alice Paul Institute.

SEE ALSO: Britain, Women's Suffrage Campaign; Non-Violent Movements: Struggles for Rights, Justice, and Identities, Pankhurst, Emmeline (1858–1928), Christabel (1880–1958), and Sylvia (1882–1960); Seneca Falls Convention; Women's Movement, United States, 19th Century; Women's Movement, United States, 20th Century

References and Suggested Readings

- Alice Paul Institute*. www.alicepaul.org (downloaded February 2, 2008).
- Butler, A. (2002) Two Paths to Equality: Alice Paul and Ethel M. Smith in the ERA Debate, 1921–1929. Albany: State University of New York Press.
- Ford, L. (1991) Iron-Jawed Angels: The Suffrage Militancy of the National Woman's Party, 1912–1920. Lanham: University Press of America.
- Lunardini, C. (1986) From Equal Suffrage to Equal Rights: Alice Paul and the National Woman's Party, 1912–1928. New York: New York University Press.

Paulus, Petrus Jacobus "Arrie" (b. 1930)

Wessel P. Visser

Petrus Paulus was a renowned leader of the segregationist South African Mineworkers' Union (SAMWU), and the personification of the union in apartheid South Africa during the 1970s and early 1980s. Born in 1930 in Pretoria, he completed his high school education at Hercules High, in a white working-class Pretoria suburb. After his studies, he worked as a clerk at the Hercules Municipality, and thereafter for seven years at ISCOR, the state steel company.

In 1954, Paulus enrolled at the West Rand Mining School as a learner miner. A year and a half later, he started work underground at the West Rand Consolidated gold mine as a stoper, and later as a developer. He also worked at the Luipaardsvlei and Libanon gold mines and the Rustenburg platinum mine. As a rock breaker, he earned a large salary due to the incentive system applied at the time to white workers and foremen.

In 1964, Paulus came to prominence as secretary of an Action Committee formed within the ranks of the SAMWU. The Action Committee was formed to oppose an experiment in work restructuring that would improve the incomes of white miners, but also entail the substitution of certain categories of white underground supervisors by Africans. A period of bitter instability and infighting ensued in SAMWU ranks, which almost caused the collapse of the union. However, Paulus's group, which took its stand on SAMWU's traditional support for the job color bar, was victorious, and he became the union's general secretary in 1967.

Unlike his predecessors Charles Harris and Daan Ellis, Paulus's administration was free of charges of maladministration and corruption. His tenure lasted 20 years – the longest of any SAMWU general secretary – and the union flourished. Paulus was a staunch advocate and defender of the rights and privileges of white employees on the mines: he favored a controlled capitalism compatible with the traditional racial hierarchy.

Paulus took an uncompromising stand against any attempts to introduce racially mixed unions, or to scrap job reservation. He was also revered by SAMWU members for using brinkmanship tactics to enforce job reservation – even in the nominally independent African homelands – and managed to negotiate considerable increases in the incomes of SAMWU members.

When the National Party began to reform the industrial relations system after 1977, the cordial and longstanding relationship between the apartheid government and SAMWU began to break down. There were bitter exchanges between Paulus and the minister of labor, Fanie Botha. In 1979, Paulus forced a showdown with the government by calling a national strike by SAMWU members in defense of job reservation. The strike failed when the Chamber of Mines threatened summary retrenchment and the loss of fringe benefits. The failure tarnished Paulus's image, and put SAMWU in a weak position.

As relations with the government deteriorated, Paulus began to associate increasingly with the white right wing, attacking the reforms and liberalization of the late apartheid government from the platforms of the Conservative Party (KP) and the Herstigte Nasionale Party (Reconstituted National Party). In 1987, Paulus resigned his union post. Successfully contesting the mining constituency of Carletonville for the KP in the general election, he became the first SAMWU general secretary elected for parliament. Regarded in some circles as an uncompromising racist, Paulus was nonetheless a formidable union leader. Currently retired in Krugersdorp, Paulus is not involved with the SAMWU's successor, the union federation Solidarity.

SEE ALSO: Ellis, Daniel Edward “Daan” (1904–1963); Harris, Charles (1896–1939)

References and Suggested Readings

- Barnard, A. H. J. (1991) Die Rol van die Mynwerkersunie in die Suid-Afrikaanse Politiek, 1978–1982. Master's thesis, Randse Afrikaanse Universiteit.
- Coetzee, J. A. (1976) Industrial Relations in South Africa. Cape Town: Juta.
- Cooper, C. (1979) The Mineworkers' Strike. South African Labour Bulletin 5 (3): 4–11.
- Friedman, S. (1987) Building Tomorrow Today: African Workers in Trade Unions, 1970–84. Johannesburg: Ravan Press.
- Hamilton, D. F. (1977) The Role of the Mine Workers' Union in the Gold Mining Industry (A Present and Future Perspective). MBL thesis, University of South Africa.
- Lang, J. (1986) Bullion Johannesburg: Men, Mines and the Challenge of Conflict. Johannesburg: Jonathan Ball.
- Leach, G. (1989) The Afrikaners: Their Last Trek. Johannesburg: Southern Book Publishers.
- O'Meara, D. (1996) Forty Lost Years: The Apartheid State and the Politics of the National Party, 1948–1994. Randburg: Ravan Press.
- Ries, A. & Dommissie, E. (1982) Broedertwis: die verhaal van die 1982-skeuring in die Nasionale Party. Cape Town: Tafelberg-Uitgewers.

Pearse, Patrick (Pádraig) (1879–1916)

William H. Mulligan, Jr.

Patrick Pearse, also remembered by the Irish form of his name, Pádraig, was the most visible of the leaders of the 1916 Easter Rising. His mystical sense of Irish nationality, his literary skill in articulating it, and his willingness to embrace martyrdom have made him a central figure in the Irish republican tradition.

Pearse was born in Dublin on November 10, 1879. His father, James, was an English stonemason who had emigrated to Ireland because of the boom in church construction there; he converted to Catholicism in 1870. James married Patrick's mother, Margaret Brady, his second wife, in 1877. Patrick's mother's family included a number of native Irish speakers from County Meath. That influence, and his education by the Christian Brothers, developed a love for Irish language, culture, and history early in his life. In 1896 he joined the Gaelic League and became editor of its newspaper, An Claidheamh Soluis (The Sword of Light), in 1903. Pearse, like many in the Gaelic League, believed that the Irish language was essential to the preservation of Ireland's distinctive culture and nationality.

Pearse earned a degree in modern languages and law in 1901 and was called to the bar, but his heart was not in it. His father's death in 1900 provided an inheritance that allowed him to pursue his interests in Irish language and culture rather than practice law.

In 1908 he founded a bilingual school, St. Enda's, at Ranelagh, County Dublin, to put his ideas into practice by offering an alternative to what he saw as an English-dominated educational system that was raising young Irish men to be culturally English, or at least submissive to English rule of Ireland. Pearse also helped establish a similar school for girls, St. Ita's. In 1910, he moved St. Enda's to Rathfarnham, County Dublin, in large part because of the site's connection to the Gaelic past. St. Enda's curriculum was based on the Irish language and Irish culture and incorporated Pearse's cultural nationalist views. He went to the United States in 1914 to raise funds for St. Enda's, and there he met John Devoy, among other Irish American leaders.

By 1913 he had joined the Irish Volunteers, organized to counter paramilitary organizations formed in Northern Ireland to oppose Home Rule, and the Irish Republican Brotherhood (IRB). He rose rapidly in both organizations and was the highest-ranking Irish Volunteer in the IRB, and part of its Supreme Council by 1915. He also played a major role in the IRB's gaining control of the Volunteers and was a central member of the military council that planned the 1916 rising. Thomas Clarke, the principal leader of the IRB, chose Pearse to draft formal statements and serve as spokesman because of his writing and speaking skills. Pearse's 1915 oration at the grave of the Fenian leader Jeremiah O'Donovan Rossa had attracted considerable national attention for its eloquence and passion, as had his writings on nationalism. Thus it was Pearse rather than Clarke or another of the more senior leaders who on Easter Monday (April 24), 1916, stepped outside the General Post Office (GPO) in Dublin as president of the provisional government and read the Proclamation of the Irish Republic, in Irish and in English, to those gathered outside.

Pearse's nationalism was based on an almost mystical sense of the Irish people and nation and embraced sacrifice and martyrdom to raise the consciousness of the Irish people and inspire them to seek freedom and independence. The repression of the 1916 Rising and the execution of its leaders galvanized support for independence and Sinn Féin, and was followed by an increased level of public support for complete separation from Great Britain.

Pearse was taken into custody when IRB forces at the GPO surrendered, and he was convicted of treason by a military tribunal that perceived him as the leader of the rebellion. He was executed on May 3, 1916, at Kilmainham Gaol and buried with other leaders in a common grave at Arbour Hill. His younger brother Willie, although not among the Rising's leaders, was executed the following day.

SEE ALSO: Collins, Michael (1890–1922); Easter Rising and the Irish Civil War; Fenian Movement; Irish Nationalism; Irish Republican Army (IRA); Sinn Féin

References and Suggested Readings

- Carty, X. (1978) In Bloody Protest: The Tragedy of Patrick Pearse. Dublin: Able Press.
- Edwards, R. D. (1990) Patrick Pearse: The Triumph of Failure. London: Faber & Faber.
- Moran, S. F. (1994) Patrick Pearse and the Politics of Redemption: The Mind of the Easter Rising, 1916. Washington: Catholic University of America Press.
- Murphy, B. P. (1991) Patrick Pearse and the Lost Republican Ideal. Dublin: James Duffy.
- Pearse, P. (1979) The Literary Writings of Patrick Pearse: Writings in English. Ed. S. O. Buachalla. Dublin: Mercier Press.

Walsh, S. P. (1979) Free and Gaelic: Pearse's Idea of a National Culture. Dublin: Coiste Chomórach an Phiarsaigh.

Pelloutier, Fernand (1867–1901) and the Bourses du Travail

Jean-Philippe Zanco

Fernand-Léonce-Emile Pelloutier was born to a middle-class, Christian, monarchist family in Nantes. While he was still a pupil at the seminary of Saint-Nazaire, in 1885, he began writing for a radical newspaper, La Démocratie de l'Ouest. He became the editor in 1892. In the same year, he joined the French Parti Ouvrier (Worker's Party) founded by Jules Guesde, and he helped create the Bourse du Travail of Saint-Nazaire. In September he was made a representative for the Bourse of Saint-Nazaire to the General Congress of Tours, where he called for the general strike. Because of this clearly revolutionary conception, he broke with parliamentary socialism and was classified as a "dangerous revolutionary" by the sub-prefect of Saint-Nazaire. Leaving for Paris, Pelloutier quickly made contact with anarchists such as Paul Delesalle, Pierre Monatte, and Jean Grave, editor of the anarchist paper Les Temps Nouveaux, and soon was personally engaged in action: in July 1894 he stood against the police with militant workers defending the Bourse du Travail of Paris against a government closure order. Because of his youth and enthusiasm, he soon gained influence throughout the syndicalist world: in June 1895 he became the secretary of the Fédération des Bourses du Travail.

Pelloutier was a Proudhonian: he believed that the workers' goal is not to rule the state, but to build up a self-governing, federal organization of production. For that purpose, Pelloutier believed in direct action. Moreover, he understood that society, to be changed, had to be studied. Distrusting sociologists, "who generally feed more on books than on observation," he tried to gather the workers' testimonies, contributions from physicians and economists, and official reports to build up a general inventory of the laborers' conditions of life (Pelloutier 1921). With his brother Maurice, he published the results as La Vie ouvrière en France (Working-Class Life In France) in 1900.

After creating the revolutionary syndicalist Confédération Générale du Travail in 1895 and popularizing anarchist ideas within all labor unions, Pelloutier tried to unify the laborers in a single organization. However, he died at age 33 and thus did not live to see this work.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism, France; Bourses du Travail; Confédération Générale du Travail and Syndicaliste Révolutionnaire; Proudhon, Pierre Joseph (1809–1865)

References and Suggested Readings

- Dubief, H. (1969) Le Syndicalisme révolutionnaire. Paris: Armand Colin.
- Jennings, J. R. (1990) Fernand Pelloutier and Revolutionary Syndicalism. In Syndicalism in France: A Study of Ideas. London: Macmillan. Available online at www.fondation-besnard.org/article.php3?id_article=124.
- Julliard, J. (1971) Fernand Pelloutier et les origines du syndicalisme d'action directe. Paris: Le Seuil.
- Pelloutier, F. (1895) Qu'est-ce que la grève générale? Paris: Librairie socialiste.
- Pelloutier, F. (1895/2005) Anarchism and the Workers' Union. In D. Guérin (Ed.), No Gods No Masters: An Anthology of Anarchism. Edinburgh: AK Press.
- Pelloutier, F. (1921) Histoire des Bourses du Travail: origine, institutions, avenir. Paris: Alfred Costes.

Peltier, Leonard (b. 1944)

Heather Squire

Leonard Peltier is an American Indian Movement (AIM) activist who was sentenced to two consecutive life sentences for the alleged murder of two FBI agents in 1975. During and since the trial, a number of inconsistencies in testimony and evidence have come to light; however, Leonard Peltier remains in prison as of 2008. Peltier is considered a political prisoner by Amnesty International, the National Congress of American Indians, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, and other national and international groups.

Peltier was born in Grand Forks, North Dakota in September 1944. When he was 4 he went to live on Turtle Mountain Reservation in Belcourt, North Dakota with his grandparents. He spent his early years at Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA) schools and attended his first political meeting in 1958 regarding the BIA's plans to "terminate" Turtle Mountain Reservation. Inspired by the Alcatraz occupation and other actions, Peltier continued to become more politicized about the plight of Native Americans in the US, and finally joined AIM in 1972. Peltier went on to join AIM's "Trail of Broken Treaties" caravan to Washington, DC, and would end up spending five months in jail soon after for alleged attempted murder after an altercation with police. Those charges were dropped in 1978.

After the 1973 Wounded Knee siege that was planned by fellow AIM activists, a paramilitary group at Pine Ridge that called itself the Guardians of the Ogala Nations (GOONs) began its "Reign of Terror" against local Indian traditionalists and AIM members. At the same time, a large number of FBI agents were dispatched to South Dakota to quiet any Indian unrest. A large number of unexplained and uninvestigated Indian deaths resulted, which caused the Lakota elders of Pine Ridge Reservation to enlist the help of AIM.

Peltier and 17 other AIM activists went to Pine Ridge and set up an encampment on a secluded end of the reservation with the hope of warding off any further GOON violence. On June 26, 1975, two plainclothes FBI agents entered the reservation, allegedly chasing a thief in a red truck. Soon after, a host of FBI agents, BIA officials, and GOONs converged and a firefight erupted. Two FBI officers were shot to death in the mêlée. Peltier was indicted, tried, and convicted of the murders in Fargo, North Dakota in 1977. There is a great deal of controversy surrounding the case, including but not limited to: specious claims that a recovered A-15 rifle belonging to Peltier killed the FBI agents (although the shell casings found at the scene did not match that gun and there was no evidence that Peltier owned the gun); the murder of Anna Mae Aquash, an AIM activist who was slated to testify on behalf of Peltier; the false testimony (later recanted) under duress of Myrtle Poor Bear, alleging she was Peltier's girlfriend and saw him shoot the FBI agents; testimony from the original prosecutor, 15 years later, that the government still does not know who really killed the FBI agents; and the acquittal of all others indicted with Peltier, in spite of an "aiding and abetting" charge. The campaign to free Leonard Peltier continues, and new evidence continues to surface in his favor; however, he remains in prison without parole.

SEE ALSO: Alcatraz Uprising and the American Indian Movement; Native American Protest, 20th Century

References and Suggested Readings

- Churchill, W. & Vander Wall, J. (1988) Agents of Repression: The FBI's Secret War Against the Black Panther Party and the American Indian Movement. Boston: South End Press.
- Matthiessen, P. (1992) In the Spirit of Crazy Horse: The Story of Leonard Peltier and the FBI's War on the American Indian Movement. New York: Penguin.
- Peltier, L. (1999) Prison Writings: My Life is My Sun Dance. New York: St. Martin's Press.
- Peltier, L. (2007) When the Truth Doesn't Matter. Counterpunch. January 9, 2007. Available at www.counterpunch.org/peltier01092007.html (downloaded April 20, 2008).

Peng Dehuai (1898–1974)

Paul Le Blanc

Peng Dehuai or P'eng Teh-huai was, along with Zhu De and Lin Biao, one of the foremost military leaders in the Chinese communist movement in the 1930s and 1940s. A prominent figure in the People's Republic of China after the revolutionary victory, he was also one of the first Chinese communist leaders to openly challenge the authority of Mao Zedong, in 1959.

Evolution of a Revolutionary Fighter

Born in humble conditions, as a child Peng rebelled openly against oppressive, opium-ridden realities in his own home of well-to-do peasants, from which he was consequently banished at the age of 9. He worked variously, for six years, as a cowherd, a coal miner, and a shoemaker's apprentice, finally being taken into the home of a rich uncle. Soon he had to flee once more when – in the midst of a terrible famine – he led hungry crowds in the invasion of the home of a wealthy merchant who was hoarding rice. Finding refuge in the army, he was swept up in the nationalist revolution of 1911 and became active in the radical wing of Sun Yat-sen's Nationalist Party (the Guomindang).

As he rose in the ranks of the Nationalist military, becoming a battalion commander, he wrestled with the question of "what could we do to give purpose to our struggles and bring about permanent change." After a flirtation with anarchism, he turned to Marxism – reading such works as Marx and Engels's Communist Manifesto, Kautsky's The Class Struggle, and Bukharin's The ABC of Communism. "After reading the Communist Manifesto," he later recalled, "I dropped my pessimism and began working with a new conviction that society could be changed." The Chinese Nationalists and communists had been allies in the great Northern Expedition to free their country from the fragmentation and violence imposed by a variety of warlords. Nonetheless, in 1927, Peng chose to switch his allegiance from the Nationalists to the Communist Party – just as Nationalist military forces under their new leader Chiang Kai-shek turned murderously against their communist allies.

In 1928, Peng brought his considerable military forces into the new Red Army that was crystallizing at the rural base where the bulk of the Chinese communists were regrouping and building support among peasantry. While his inclination to be blunt and argumentative contributed to conflicts among the communist military leaders, Peng's abilities as a military leader resulted in his rise to the position of deputy commander-in-chief of the Red Army in the 1930s, and he was instrumental in the organization of the First and Second Field Armies, becoming the commander of the latter. In 1935, under the impact of a concerted Nationalist onslaught headed by Chiang Kai-shek, he along with all the other Red forces carried out the long and brutal retreat known as the Long March. The remnants of the communist forces ended up in Yanan, from where they conducted resistance against the Nationalists and (after 1937) the invasion of Imperial Japan. No less than Mao, Peng was instrumental in developing the far-reaching tactics of guerrilla warfare.

World War II brought an alliance between Chinese communists and Nationalists against the Japanese invaders, but soon after the war's end, the civil war resumed, culminating in the Chinese communist victory in the declaration of the People's Republic of China in 1949. A year later, when the Korean War (1950–3) erupted and the US military offensive swept up through northern Korea toward China, the Chinese counterattacked. Peng served as the supreme commander of the People's Volunteer Army that drove back the offensive and stalemated US forces. In the same period he was defense minister of the People's Republic of China, and also a member of the ruling Politburo of the Communist Party. In 1955, Peng was made a marshal of the People's Liberation Army.

Evolution and Fate of an Oppositionist

In the period after the Korean conflict, Peng became increasingly critical of the personality cult being built up around Mao Zedong. He also opposed certain policies that Mao was formulating and pushing through – particularly the so-called Great Leap Forward, 1958–60 (designed to utilize extreme political enthusiasm to mobilize masses for the purpose of making dramatic economic breakthroughs in agriculture and industry).

At the beginning of a two-month meeting of the top communist leadership at Lushan in 1959, Peng initiated an angry and uncompromising attack on the Great Leap – denouncing it as "petty-bourgeois fanaticism," and that the notion of "putting politics in command" was generating "a fever on the brain" that violated the laws of economics and science, generated waste and illusions, and would do terrible damage to China. A number of others joined Peng in this critique, also pressing for greater internal democracy in the party, accusing Mao of being "despotic and dictatorial" along the lines of Joseph Stalin, who had recently been criticized by the new leadership of the USSR. Peng was also critical of Mao's orientation to break with the Soviet Union, whose assistance he saw as crucial in terms of both the country's economic development and military defense.

Mao counterattacked vigorously and effectively. According to knowledgeable sources, he "threatened that if his policies were overthrown he would return to the hills to mobilize a new peasant army to fight those in power." Able to muster a majority, he was able to defeat the oppositionists and even force them to recant. Even so, Peng was stripped of his top positions and denounced for leading an "anti-party clique."

He was replaced as defense minister and leader of the People's Liberation Army by a longtime rival of Peng's, Lin Biao, who was very closely aligned with Mao. Nonetheless, it is clear that there was significant dissatisfaction among a number of Chinese communists over Peng's treatment – particularly after it became clear, and was generally acknowledged, that the policies of the Great Leap Forward had been as disastrous as he had indicated. For some he became the symbol of an alternative to Mao's policies, and there were stirrings in influential quarters to return him to his positions in the Communist Party.

When Mao, with the assistance of Lin Biao, initiated the Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution in 1966 in order to attack and destroy those in the Communist Party who differed with him, Peng's defenders were special targets of the pro-Mao Red Guards that were unleashed against so-called "counterrevolutionaries." Peng himself was the object of attack and abuse. He was characteristically honest and defiant when a group of Red Guards arrested him in 1966: "I was no executioner of the masses. I was half-right and half-wrong. I made mistakes, but I rendered meritorious service as well." Disappearing from sight in 1967, he died in 1974.

In 1978, two years after Mao's death, the Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party reexamined Peng's case, exonerating him of all charges and reaffirming his contributions to the Chinese Revolution.

SEE ALSO: Chinese Communist Revolution, 1925–1949; Chinese Nationalist Revolution, 1911; Communist Manifesto; Lin Biao (1907–1971); Mao Zedong (1893–1976); Zhu De (1886–1976)

References and Suggested Readings

- Harrison, J. P. (1972) The Long March to Power: A History of the Chinese Communist Party, 1921–72. New York: Praeger.
- Karnow, S. (1972) Mao and China, From Revolution to Revolution. New York: Viking.
- Milton, D. & Milton, N. (1976) The Wind Will Not Subside: Years in Revolutionary China, 1964–1969. New York: Pantheon.
- Milton, D., Milton, N., & Schurmann, F. (Eds.) (1974) People's China, 1966 through 1972. New York: Vintage.
- Snow, E. (1968) Red Star Over China, rev. and enlarged ed. New York: Grove.
- Snow, H. F. (1979) Inside Red China. New York: Da Capo Press.

People's Liberation Front of Sri Lanka (JVP)

Balasingham Skanthakumar

Origins

The Janatha Vimukthi Peramuna (People's Liberation Front) (JVP), Sri Lanka's largest self-defined left party and third largest parliamentary bloc, led two armed insurrections of Sinhala youth in 1971 and 1987–9. Both uprisings were brutally crushed with enormous loss of life, but the JVP has been described as "phoenix-like" and "hydra-headed" for its astonishing capacity to regenerate itself thereafter. Its origins lie in the schism within the Ceylon Communist Party in 1963 provoked by the Sino-Soviet dispute as well as tensions over the parliamentary road to socialism and accommodation to the "national-bourgeois" Sri Lanka Freedom Party (SLFP).

Rohana Wijeweera, drawn to Maoism while studying in the Soviet Union, joined the Communist Party (Peking wing – CP) of Sri Lanka in 1964 and quickly became leader of its youth front. Wijeweera's criticism of the CP of Sri Lanka's orthodox leadership and conceptions of revolution and class put him at odds with party leaders. He was expelled in 1965 after organizing an independent faction within the party.

Until 1970 Wijeweera and co-thinkers, swelled by smaller groups of Maoists, conducted clandestine educational classes particularly among school-leavers, university students, and naval ratings of rural origin. The "five lessons" as they became known were analyses of the social and political order; Indian hegemony over Sri Lanka; the reformist left and coalition politics with the SLFP and parliamentary road to socialism. Training in the handling of shotguns and manufacture of explosive devices was also carried out. Their objective was the revolutionary seizure of state power and socialist transformation of society, though by design they were still nameless and without public identity. Internal democratic processes were absent; Wijeweera handpicked the leadership and party conferences were unknown until 1980. Aside from the strategy of armed struggle, the nascent organization differed from the "Old Left" in Sri Lanka in attributing revolutionary agency to the poor and oppressed of rural origin; animosity towards Up-Country Tamil plantation workers who were regarded as fifth-columnists for Indian expansionism or hegemony because of their recent Indian origin; opposition to coalitionism (popular-front politics) with the SLFP; and unembarrassed Sinhala Buddhist nationalism.

In the 1970 general election the Janatha Vimukthi Peramuna, as it now revealed itself, campaigned for "progressive" candidates in the United Front coalition that grouped the SLFP with the Lanka Sama Samaja Party (LSSP) and CP (Moscow). A wave of rising expectations for radical social and political reforms, solutions to the employment crisis, and access to higher education, land reform, and trade union rights, lifted the coalition to government. The worldwide radicalization of youth inspired by anti-imperialist struggles in Indo-China, the Cuban Revolution, and critiques of Stalinism and official communist parties exerted their influence.

Once the United Front took office, frustration at the slow pace of reform and fear of a right-wing military coup that would decimate the left as in Indonesia, gathered pace among broad sections of youth eager for rapid, radical, and decisive measures towards socialism.

1971 Insurrection

The 1971 insurrection was the most significant protest movement in post-colonial Sri Lanka since the August 1953 Hartal (General Strike). It was to be a "one-day revolution" loosely modeled on that in Zanzibar in 1964, involving a few hundred armed men and executed over a few hours. The participants were almost exclusively Sinhala youth, of Buddhist faith, and mainly male, drawn in Marxist parlance from the rural petit-bourgeoisie. Women cadres had an auxiliary role of tending to injured male comrades. Locally described as Che Guevarists, there is little evidence of familiarity with Guevara's theoretical contributions and political practice beyond the romance of his life and tragic death and path of armed struggle. Oppressed castes such as the Vahumpura and Batgama were over-represented in their ranks, but so too were the elite Govigama, and the JVP leadership (including Wijeweera) was predominantly from the prosperous Karava caste. Though caste undertones were always present, the JVP has never overtly mobilized on caste lines.

Commencing on April 5, 93 police stations mainly in the southeast were attacked by insurgents with the aim of seizing weapons and ammunition. There was an abortive attempt to kidnap and possibly assassinate Prime Minister Sirimavo Bandaranaike. An attempted jail break to free Wijeweera, who had earlier been incarcerated in Jaffna, was unsuccessful. Colombo was virtually cut off from the rest of the country.

Poor planning and even worse implementation enabled the government to swiftly apprehend JVP leaders and physically eliminate members and supporters. However, in some "liberated" areas it took security forces several months to regain full control. Military and political support for the government came from Britain and the United States, India and Pakistan, the Soviet Union and Yugoslavia, and most painfully to the insurgents, from China.

The government officially admitted 1,200 killings, but the true number is believed to be between 6,000 and 10,000. Anywhere between 14,000 and 18,000 more were arrested and detained, including leftists unconnected to the JVP but critical of the government, such as CP (Maoist) General Secretary N. Shanmugathasan and LSSP parliamentarian Vasudeva Nanayakkara.

By-passing the normal courts of law, and to legitimize the counterinsurgency campaign, an extraordinary Criminal Justice Commission (CJC) was created to indict the JVP leadership: 365 prisoners received criminal convictions ranging from 2 to 12 years of rigorous imprisonment, while remaining detainees were progressively released over five years. The state of emergency declared on the eve of the insurrection in March 1971 was maintained long after, strengthening the repressive powers of government.

In his legal defense Wijeweera was assisted by Bala Tampoe from the Lanka Sama Samaja Party (R) – LSSP(R) – a left-wing split from the LSSP affiliated to the Trotskyist Fourth International, which spearheaded an international campaign for the amnesty. Other JVP leaders were directly defended by lawyers working for the Ceylon Mercantile Industrial and General Workers Union (CMU) that was politically influenced by the LSSP(R).

Legalization and Backlash

In the 1977 general elections the right-wing United National Party (UNP) was elected while the United Front coalition split and was resoundingly defeated. "Open Economy" policies favoring the private sector, foreign direct investment, and market-led mechanisms were introduced. The UNP government released all political prisoners and lifted the ban on the JVP, which swiftly adopted open and mass work.

Imprisonment provided opportunities for political interaction and debate among JVP leaders, to study Marxism, and to acquaint themselves with the rising militancy of Northeastern Tamil youth. Thus, after 1977, the JVP defined Sri Lanka as a multinational state. For a while, it defended in principle the Tamil nation's right to self-determination up to and including secession, although in practice it opposed the movement for an independent Tamil Eelam (homeland).

The JVP's estrangement from the mainstream left intensified in this period following its abstention from participation in the 1980 strike movement, leading to a split with the Ceylon Teachers Union led by H. N. Fernando. The strike was defeated and 40,000 workers – mainly branch leaders and militants – were sacked: trade unions have since never recovered.

The left was divided too in the 1982 presidential election campaign. Rohana Wijeweera, the JVP candidate, outpolled his rivals on the left and received the third highest number of votes. Nevertheless disappointment at the modest tally, 273,428, relative to expectations of between 800,000 and 1 million votes, combined with the shrinking democratic space and increasing political authoritarianism, hardened opinion within the JVP against electoral strategies.

Communal riots against the Tamil minority in July 1983 were the bloodiest ethnic pogrom since independence and plunged Sri Lanka into an ongoing war. Although state-sponsored, the violence was blamed on the CP (Moscow), the Trotskyist Nava Sama Samaja Party, and the JVP, all of whom were proscribed. And the ban was never lifted on the JVP. Once again an underground organization, the JVP began preparing itself for armed revolution. Its ideology mutated too, from Marxist inflected nationalism to unbridled Sinhala chauvinism. Some leaders, including general secretary Lionel Bopage, resigned in protest.

By the mid-1980s the JVP had grown in influence and numerical support especially among university and school students, the rural and urban lower middle class, low-ranking police and military personnel, Buddhist monks, and to some extent among the public service and state corporation employees. Its greater appreciation for the working class stemmed from realization that without industrial action and pressure in strategic economic sectors it would be unable to cripple the government. To a significant degree the leadership void at workplace level caused by the government's mass sacking during the 1980 strike was filled by the JVP. Through 1986 and 1987 the JVP conducted bank robberies and raids on police stations and army camps as it accumulated funds and weapons to overthrow the UNP.

1987–1989 Insurrection

The Indo-Lanka (July 1987) Accord seeking to end the war through addressing some Tamil grievances and offering devolution of power through provincial councils was bitterly opposed by the JVP as a strategic alliance between "Indian expansionism" and "[Tamil] Eelamist separatism." In this tinder-box conjuncture the JVP successfully mobilized anti-government feeling, patriotism, and anti-Tamil sentiment among rural youth aggrieved by unemployment, widening income inequalities, landlessness, and rising levels of poverty. JVP strategy was to undermine confidence in the government through assassinations of senior politicians and UNP supporters, acts of sabotage, "mini-hartals," "curfews," and administration of "justice" to petty criminals. Many of these actions were in the name of its military wing, the Deshapremi Janatha Vyaparaya (Patriotic People's Movement). Nevertheless, it never militarily engaged the Indian Peace Keeping Force or Tamil militant groups and it has never been implicated in racist violence against Tamil civilians. Terror was also used by the JVP to force boycotts of presidential and parliamentary elections in December 1988 and February 1989, respectively, that returned the UNP to power. Leftists, whom the JVP despised as traitors for supporting the Indo-Lanka Accord, were among its estimated 2,500 victims, including the actor turned politician Vijaya Kumaranatunga.

The state responded with greater violence through paramilitaries, through "disappearances," and extra-judicial killings of 60,000 JVP activists, including women and schoolchildren. These paramilitaries were either army or police personnel in camouflage and in other cases hired assassins and criminals. Their victims were tortured and bodies burned either on the roadside or thrown into rivers as a public warning. The tide turned against the JVP in August 1989 when it rashly issued death threats to families of service personnel and began killing them. By November the top leadership of the JVP, including Rohana Wijeweera, had been detained and summarily executed. Leaderless, fueled by fear and mindless rage, and bereft of popular support, the insurgency petered out by 1990. Only one member of its politburo survived through escape to India. Somawansa Amarasinghe has since returned to Sri Lanka and is now its paramount leader.

Resurrection

Defeated and underground, the surviving cadre and sympathizers had their own internal debates on this second tragedy but in a transformed geopolitical situation. Some abandoned the JVP for postmodernism, others for environmentalism and Sinhala Buddhist nationalism, but the JVP began resurrecting itself. Still illegal, the JVP took advantage of political liberalization, following President Ranasinghe Premadasa's assassination by the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE) in May 1993, to contest the August 1994 parliamentary elections on the platform of the Progressive Front. One candidate was elected from its southern stronghold in Hambantota district. Since then its political fortunes have soared in the form of increasing seats in parliamentary elections between 2000 and 2004, with four Cabinet-level ministerial portfolios in 2004–5. Apart from governing Tissamaharama local authority, the JVP occupies several local government and provincial council seats.

While remaining overwhelmingly Sinhala in composition, with no representation of minorities or women in its politburo and meager representation elsewhere, three of the JVP's 38 parliamentarians are from minority communities including one of only two Muslim women in the 225-member legislature. Though the party unequivocally supports Tamil estate workers' restoration of citizenship it denies the option of self-government to Tamil-speaking areas. It offers instead equality for all communities with residual issues deferred to after attainment of socialism. Outside parliament, the JVP has used a broader alliance known as the Patriotic National Movement as a vehicle for its militant struggle against foreign governments, United Nations agencies, and international and local NGOs, all of whom are perceived to be sympathetic towards the LTTE and federal reconstitution of Sri Lanka.

Its leftist identity is projected symbolically by the red flag with the hammer and sickle, positive references to Marx, Engels, and Lenin, criticism of neoliberalism and imperialism, and fraternal relations with several communist parties, including Cuba. Its front organizations of workers, peasants, women, university students, and Buddhist monks are visible during its annual May Day procession. The JVP is contemptuous of feminism as a western ideology and conformist on traditional gender roles. It underlines its Buddhist affinities through regular meetings with senior prelates and performance of religious rites. Internal democracy is undeveloped and delegate conferences resemble rallies with unanimous approval of resolutions.

SEE ALSO: Lanka Sama Samaja Party (LSSP) and Sri Lankan Radicalism; Tamil Nationalist Struggle for Eelam; Wijeweera, Rohana (1943–1989)

References and Suggested Readings

- Alles, A. C. (1990) THE J. V. P. 1969–1989. Colombo: Lake House Investments.
- Chandraprema, C. A. (1991) Sri Lanka – The Years of Terror: The JVP Insurrection 1987–1989. Colombo: Lake House Investments.
- Gunaratna, R. (1990) Sri Lanka – A Lost Revolution? The Inside Story of the JVP. Kandy: Institute of Fundamental Studies.
- Halliday, F. (1971) The Ceylonese Insurrection. New Left Review 1, 69 (September–October): 55–91.
- Moore, M. (1993) Thoroughly Modern Revolutionaries: The JVP in Sri Lanka. Modern Asian Studies 27, 3: 593–642.
- Rampton, D. (2003) Sri Lanka's "Many-Headed Hydra": The JVP, Nationalism and the Politics of Poverty. In CEPA, IMCAP, SLAAS (Eds.), Poverty Issues in Sri Lanka: Towards New Empirical Insights. Colombo: Centre for Poverty Analysis.
- Senaratne, J. (1997) Political Violence in Sri Lanka 1977–1990: Riots, Insurrections, Counterinsurgencies, Foreign Intervention. Amsterdam: VU University Press.

Peoples' Global Action Network

Simon L. Lewis

Peoples' Global Action Network (PGA) is a global-scale network of grassroots groups, social movements, and trade unions. It was formed in 1998 to oppose neoliberal policies and institutions such as the World Trade Organization (WTO) using extraparliamentary action. Estimates are that 1,500 organizations have participated in PGA-inspired days of action and conferences (Wood 2002). The participants are mostly large peasant/farmer organizations and indigenous peoples' movements from income-poor countries, and autonomous, environmental, and direct action-oriented groups from income-rich countries.

PGA was instrumental in the upsurge of critique and protest around economic globalization and institutions of global governance, such as the WTO and the Group of Eight leading industrialized nations (G8), which were accompanied by large-scale civil unrest in Seattle (November 1999) and Genoa (July 2001), respectively. PGA provided a framework of communication and coordination for radical groups against globalization on capitalist terms. However, by the middle of the first decade of the twenty-first century, many of the innovations and aspirations of the network were being fulfilled elsewhere.

History

The emergence of PGA can be traced to August 1996 and the rainforests of southern Mexico. The Zapatista Army of National Liberation (EZLN) called an international meeting of groups and social movements to discuss common problems and alternatives to neoliberal capitalism. From these 3,000 people emerged a call for a second similar "encounter," in Spain in August 1997. Some of those attending stressed that a more focused campaign against a specific key institution of neoliberalism was necessary. Thus, activists from ten of the world's most innovative social movements, including Nigeria's Movement for the Survival of the Ogoni People, Brazil's Movimento Sem Terra, and India's Karnataka State Farmers' Association, formed Peoples' Global Action against the World Trade Organization and "Free" Trade (note: Peoples' Global Action, i.e., global action of many peoples, not People's Global Action, i.e., global action of the people).

Peoples' Global Action was born in February 1998, with a conference in Geneva, Switzerland attended by approximately 300 delegates from 71 countries. Those present included Mozambican farmers, the Canadian Postal Workers' Union, and Bangladeshi fisherfolk. The conference was designed to build a global network of grassroots groups and movements to delegitimize the WTO and work toward alternatives to neoliberal capitalism. This network of "coordination and communication" was envisioned to work similarly to the Internet, which was then revolutionizing communication among the world's radical movements. Just as the Internet has protocols to allow computers to connect with one another, so PGA operated analogously, and participation in the network required agreement with five hallmarks:

1. A very clear rejection of the WTO and other trade liberalization agreements (such as APEC, the EU, NAFTA) as active promoters of socially and environmentally destructive globalization (altered in September 2001 to: "A very clear rejection of capitalism, imperialism, and feudalism; all trade agreements, institutions, and governments that promote destructive globalization").
2. A rejection of all forms and systems of domination and discrimination including, but not limited to, patriarchy, racism, and religious fundamentalism of all creeds.
3. A confrontational attitude, since members did not think that lobbying could have a major impact in such biased and undemocratic institutions in which transnational capital was the only real policymaker.
4. A call to non-violent civil disobedience and the construction of local alternatives by local people, as answers to the action of governments and corporations (altered in September 2001 to: "A call to direct action and civil disobedience, support for social movements' struggles, advocating forms of resistance which maximize respect for life and oppressed peoples' rights, as well as the construction of local alternatives to global capitalism").
5. An organizational philosophy based on decentralization and autonomy.

The earliest public form of expression of the network was to call for participation in decentralized global days of action against the WTO and other transnational bodies of governance. The first was to coincide with the second ministerial meeting of the WTO in Geneva from May 18 to 20, 1998, and the G8 meeting in Birmingham, UK, a few days earlier. This call to action resulted in protests and demonstrations in 25 countries, including major riots in Geneva, 200,000 people on the streets of Hyderabad, India, and 50,000 people in Brasilia. Thousands more took part in Reclaim the Streets events – blocking traffic, taking over city streets and transforming them into carnivalesque protest zones – in 29 cities, including Birmingham, whilst the G8 were meeting.

Inspired by the success of this first global day of action, a second was called for June 18, 1999. On this day, protest focused on financial centers and coincided with the G8 Summit in Cologne, Germany. Protests occurred in 26 countries, including a siege of London's financial center by over 10,000 people. Six months later, the third WTO ministerial meeting in Seattle was paralyzed by over 50,000 activists whilst anti-WTO events were held in a further 70 countries. These major events inspired many others across the world, often only loosely connected to PGA or movements within the network, to confront the political and economic elite wherever they met. Protests flourished from as far north as Quebec City, Canada (against the Free Trade Area of the Americas talks, in April 2001) to as far south as Melbourne, Australia (against the World Economic Forum, September 2000), via Chiang Mai, Thailand (against the Asian Development Bank annual meeting, March 2001) and Cancun, Mexico (against the fifth WTO ministerial meeting, September 2003).

Politics and Organization

The PGA hallmarks have been utilized in a number of ways. Initially, they were regarded by most as simply describing the properties of the PGA network itself. In other words, whilst the PGA network rejected lobbying in favor of civil disobedience and direct action, this was not necessarily the case with all its constituent parts. And whilst the network was to have an organizational philosophy based on autonomy and decentralization, participating groups were free to decide upon their own organizational forms and structures.

However, a number of groups, predominantly in high-income countries, would later come to use the hallmarks as a means of excluding groups from participating in PGA-inspired networks. This was done primarily by parts of the counterglobalization movement whose political ethics were closest to those of the hallmarks. They tended to argue, for example, that those with more “traditional” (i.e., hierarchical or centralized) structures should not be allowed to participate in the network because they failed to espouse the hallmarks as “core values” in their everyday political practice. The adoption of the PGA hallmarks by the Dissent! Network in the UK, who were organizing against the 2005 G8 Summit in Scotland, was an explicit attempt to prevent hierarchically arranged organizations and those planning on lobbying the G8 from participating.

Beyond the hallmarks, there are two other official PGA documents, the “Organizational Principles” (OPs) and a longer document, the PGA Manifesto. The OPs explain the organizational structures of PGA, which, set out in 11 short statements, are minimal. Essentially, PGA's goal is coordination. It is not an organization (OP #1), it has no membership (OP #3), and nobody can officially represent it (OP #4). It has never had paid staff, offices, or a bank account, nor does it have any legal standing (OP #8). All actions are taken by participating groups or movements (rather than the entire network), often using the phrase “inspired by Peoples' Global Action.”

The adoption of this model can be viewed in three ways. Firstly, the OPs code the political ideals of maximum respect for autonomy, diversity, and voluntary cooperation. Secondly, for some they expressed a desire for collective organization and action without invoking “representational politics.” Thirdly, for others this was largely pragmatic, with the structure specifically designed to avoid a common problem with international networks: the fact that those with resources dominate. Often with international or global campaigns this has involved (more radical) low-income-country social movements bowing to the demands of (less radical) high-income-country non-governmental organizations.

Coordination is provided by global conferences (OP #5). These occurred in Geneva, Switzerland (February 1998), Bangalore, India (August 1999), and Cochabamba, Bolivia (September 2001).

Since 2001, no network-wide global meetings have taken place, although other meetings have occurred (for example, PGA International Consultation Meeting, India, 2005; Europe-wide PGA conference, France 2006). Decisions about when and where to hold global conferences, and other necessary interim decisions, such as endorsing specific calls to action, are made by a Convenors' Committee. This committee is composed of groups involved in the network – between one and three per continent – who must stand down at each new global meeting. In addition to the Convenors' Committee, a Support Group assists with the logistics of organizing conferences.

The PGA Manifesto, written in 1998 and updated in 2001, begins with two quotes. The first is from Eduardo Galeano: "We cannot take communion from the altars of a dominant culture which confuses price with value and converts people and countries into merchandise." The second is from an unnamed Aboriginal woman: "If you come only to help me, you can go back home. But if you consider my struggle as part of your struggle for survival, then maybe we can work together." Both capture the spirit of the document: economic globalization is causing more of life to be subject to the discipline of the market, and coordinated grassroots resistance is the best form of attack.

The Manifesto continues with a preamble on capitalism and economic globalization, followed by 11 sections on specific themes: economic globalization, power, and the "race to the bottom"; exploitation, labor, and livelihoods; gender oppression; indigenous peoples' fight for survival; oppressed ethnic groups; onslaught on nature and agriculture; culture; knowledge and technology; education and youth; militarism; and migration. These sections deal succinctly with the impacts of globalization, place current problems in a historical context, and assert political stances. For example, the section on onslaught on nature and agriculture states: "Climate change is a result of capitalist resource exploitation. It reinforces existing global inequalities initiated by colonialism. As the climate warms, essential resources will further become the privilege of the elite, who will use increasingly military force to acquire them." However, the Manifesto does not suggest any solutions to the problems posed. It is designed to be a "living document," reappraised at each global conference to maintain a changing "global consensus" on the manifestations and solutions to economic globalization in particular and capitalism more generally.

Beyond Global Days of Action

Alongside promoting decentralized days of action, PGA was also used to organize "Intercontinental Caravans," the idea being to bring those at the forefront of resisting free-trade agreements to the governments, institutions, and transnational corporations that design and implement these policies. The most ambitious of these was the arrival in Europe of almost 500 peasant farmers, mostly from India, for a one-month, nine-country, mass protest tour (May–June 1999). However, the logistical size of such an operation, time and money investment, and cultural conflicts meant that Caravans did not become the widely copied replicable model for action that decentralized actions coinciding with summits became.

More recently, PGA has attempted to move from global days of action to a series of sustained campaigns based around the following issues:

1. state militarism and paramilitarism;
2. self-determination and land sovereignty;
3. against privatization;
4. construction of alternatives.

However, these sustained campaigns have largely failed to progress from a theoretical contemplation as to how to move beyond the limits of single-day protests or events.

PGA has acknowledged a number of difficult problems relating to the vast resource gap between participants from income-rich and income-poor countries, differing cultures, and expectations and experiences of involvement in international networks. Many of these are obvious: people from Europe and North America can generally more easily attend conferences than those from Africa or Asia. This was addressed by allowing only 30 percent of the total attendance at the 2001 global conference in Bolivia to be from income-rich countries.

Between 2002 and 2008 there have been no network-wide global conferences. This is likely due to a combination of three factors. Firstly, the small number of individuals who had formed the Support Group had previously provided indispensable logistical support. With few of these individuals willing or able to commit to organizing another conference, a huge challenge was presented to the network. Secondly, the 2001 conference emphasized further decentralization, proposing a focus on organizing continental as opposed to global activities in the near future. Finally, by 2003 when the next PGA conference had been tentatively scheduled, many of the functions the network had earlier fulfilled were now taking place elsewhere. The World Social Forum – which has attracted up to 150,000 participants – had become the central location where the alter-globalization movement discussed strategy, tactics, and action plans. Similarly, the PGA news bulletins, which had been instrumental in circulating information and inspiration for action in the early days of the network, had been superseded by the global Indymedia network of alternative, radical news producers (www.indymedia.org). So whilst some (in parts of Latin America, Europe, and South Asia in particular) concentrated upon building continental networks, others utilized the World Social Forum and similar events as a replacement for PGA global conferences.

By linking resistance movements on all continents and across many sectors, from the environment-focused to trade unions and landless farmers' organizations, PGA has arguably been more influential than any other network in the contemporary rise of alter-globalization and anti-capitalist politics. However, the importance of PGA is often understated because its sole purpose was to promote increased communication and coordinated action amongst the world's radical social movements, rather than the innovations and successes of PGA itself.

SEE ALSO: G8 Protests, Genoa, 2001; Global Day of Action Against Capitalism, June 18 (J18), 1999; Global Justice Movement and Resistance; Indymedia Global Justice Campaign, 2000s; Reclaim the Streets; World Trade Organization (WTO) Protests, Seattle, 1999; World Social Forums; Zapatistas, EZLN, and the Chiapas Uprising

References and Suggested Readings

- Notes from Nowhere (Eds.) (2003) We Are Everywhere: The Irresistible Rise of Global Anticapitalism. London and New York: Verso.
- Peoples' Global Action, www.agp.org.
- Turbulence Collective (Eds.) (2007) What Would it Mean to Win? 14 Essays from the Movement of Movements. Available at www.turbulence.org.uk.
- Wall, D. (2005) Babylon and Beyond: The Economics of Anti-Capitalist, Anti-Globalist and Radical Green Movements. London: Pluto Press.

Welsh, I. & Chesters, G. (2006) Complexity and Social Movements: Protest at the Edge of Chaos. London: Routledge.

Wood, L. J. (2002) Bridging the Divide: The Case of Peoples' Global Action. Available at www.agpna.revolt.org/ljwood.html.

Peronist resistance

Ernesto Salas

The term resistencia peronista refers to the actions carried out by thousands of Peronist sympathizers in the five years following the 1955 coup d'état that aimed to achieve the return of President Juan Domingo Perón. On June 16, 1955, military planes bombed the Casa Rosada, the Argentinian government headquarters, and its surrounding area in the Plaza de Mayo with the purpose of killing Perón. The uprising failed, but the bombing, witnessed by the city in the middle of the day during work hours, left a death toll of 300. Three months later, a new coup attempt that had the support of the political opposition and the Catholic Church succeeded. A military government, known as the Revolución Libertadora, displaced the democratic government. Thus began a period of 18 years during which Peronism was proscribed.

After a brief initial period, General Pedro Eugenio Aramburu was designated president in November 1955. The navy kept the vice-presidency in the person of Admiral Isaac Rojas. The new government's policies reflected the demands of its social base. The General Confederation of Labor (Confederación General del Trabajo de la República Argentina, CGT) was banned from politics and every organization linked to the Peronist Party was made illegal. Through Decree 4.161/56, anyone mentioning Perón or his late wife Eva, carrying any Peronist symbol, or singing Peronist songs was threatened with prison. The Alzaga Unzué palace, the former residence of Perón and Eva, was demolished. Public works that had begun under Perón were interrupted. Eva Perón's corpse was stolen from the CGT headquarters and hidden by army intelligence agents for 17 years.

The military dictatorship judged the control of unions to be a priority. During the September 1955 coup, army and navy forces surrounded many union buildings to prevent workers' mobilization. Unions close to Perón were attacked by civilian commandos supportive of the golpista military. Banning individual unions as well as their central organization, the CGT, Aramburu managed to control organized labor while isolating its leaders from their bases: 11,000 union leaders at all levels were proscribed. The void was filled by military auditors as well as by some socialist and radical union leaders close to the government. In the meantime, a multifaceted resistance was being organized in neighborhoods and factories.

On September 16, 1955, President Juan Perón of Argentina is overthrown by a nationalist Catholic group in a coup d'état commonly referred to as the "Liberating Revolution." After the successful coup, a group of activists in Buenos Aires burn Peronist propaganda. (Cornell Capa/Magnum Photos)

Resistencia in the Neighborhoods

The first resistencia commandos were organized by neighbors and co-workers with no necessary previous political experience and with a high risk of being detected. At the beginning they met in private homes, creating local networks and adopting different names to accompany the term commando. This took place in most of Argentina, especially in the cities. Some known groups were: Comandos Coronel Perón in the Buenos Aires province; Comando Nacional Peronista, which coordinated several other commandos in the city of Buenos Aires; the Frente Emancipador in the Santa Fe province; and the Comando 17 de Octubre, in the provinces of Tucumán and Santiago del Estero (Salas 2003). Commandos disseminated clandestine propaganda using rudimentary methods that were later perfected. Most of them also carried out a number of urban attacks using homemade bombs constructed from pieces of tube, filled with gunpowder and incorporating a basic timing device. Bombs were placed in the houses of political leaders who were complicit with the military coup, in public offices and private companies. Members of the government were also targeted. In the years following Perón's overthrow, there were no fewer than five attacks a day using caños ("tubes"). In parallel, there was a continuous increase in factory sabotage and deliberate fires abounded in rural areas.

On June 9, 1956, a pro-Peronist coup attempt was led by General Juan José Valle and was supported by a number of commandos. Aramburu's dictatorship knew about it in advance and the rebellion was crushed. The government decreed the death penalty for 27 people, including Valle and the other leaders. On the night of the uprising, a group of neighbors were detained by the police and taken to an empty plot, where five activists were illegally executed by being shot in the back; others were murdered behind a police station after being subjected to irregular summary trials. Those in the military were subjected to a court martial and executed in prison, despite their families' requests for clemency (Ferla 1983).

While in exile, Perón had chosen John William Cooke, a lawyer with strong nationalist and anti-imperialist views, as the tactical chief of the movement and his personal heir in the event of his death. Cooke, who had been in prison in the south since the end of 1955, was only able to assume his new responsibilities in April 1957, after escaping with other Peronist leaders and settling in Chile. By then, the general order to resist launched by Perón at the end of 1956 (Perón & Cooke 2007) had been implemented through an inorganic network of resistencia commandos and union grassroots, since the Peronist Party structure had not survived the coup and Perón's exile.

Resistencia in Factories

Confident that the Peronists had been displaced, from the end of 1956 the navy auditor in charge of the CGT allowed salary negotiations and union-controlled elections. Against all expectations, by 1958 a new generation of Peronists had been elected to lead most industrial labor organizations. Strikes and conflicts rose sevenfold in comparison to 1955, and continued escalating in the three following years. Workers went on strike to demand salary rises and oppose the productivity clauses that companies tried to incorporate in collective bargaining agreements (James 1981). In the industrial sector, most strikes and similar measures were decided against the pro-military administrators in charge of the unions and were strongly supported by the workers. Toward the end of 1956, a strike of metal workers that lasted for more than 60 days was suppressed by army tanks going around the neighborhoods calling workers to work.

In 1957, a strike of trash collectors in the city of Buenos Aires lasted for more than 30 days, despite the decision of the socialist auditor to lift it. Finally, after many conflicts, the military government realized that strikes could only be lifted by negotiating with parallel organizations (Salas 1994). Toward mid-1957, some younger Peronist activists elected as union leaders allied with communist peers to form a Comisión Inter-sindical (Inter-Union Commission). In August the auditor of CGT called a summit, confident that by manipulating the system of assigning seats the government could control the majority of representatives. However, the alliance between independents, communists, and Peronists frustrated the dictatorship's plan in the summit and the CGT remained banned.

Toward the end of the year, the Córdoba branch of the CGT, led by Atilio López, called a meeting of normalized unions and Peronist grassroots organizations. The outcome was the Programa de La Falda, which had a strong nationalist, combative, and revolutionary content. The program called for "liquidating foreign export and import monopolies," achieving "state control of foreign trade," nationalizing "foreign meat-packing plants," for "worker control of production," and for strengthening the popular state "to destroy anti-national oligarchic groups and their foreign allies." According to the document, the working class was "the only Argentine force whose interests represent the wishes of the country itself" (Baschetti 1987).

That same year, Argentinians voted in elections for a Constituent Assembly to replace the 1949 Peronist Constitution. All Peronist candidacies were banned. After confronting hardcore sectors promoting abstention, Perón ordered his followers to vote blank. The result, even though far from the numbers obtained in previous elections, gave Perón victory with a majority of blank votes. However, in view of the presidential elections called for 1958, Perón decided to ally with the Intransigent Radical Civic Union (Unión Cívica Radical Intransigente), a breakaway group from the Radical Civic Union (Unión Cívica Radical). Thanks to this support, Arturo Frondizi was elected president on February 23, 1958. With this political change the Peronist resistencia movement experienced less severe repression, gaining access to legal forms of participation in unions and holding off the prospect of armed insurrection to promote Perón's return. Nevertheless, many clandestine commandos, resolute in their insurreccional positions, disobeyed Perón's orders to vote for Frondizi.

Frondizi's policies toward unions exposed divisions between union leaders who accepted the government's integrationist position and those who placed their struggle in the strategic perspective of Perón's return. The president's proposal in regard to union leadership was embodied in a law regulating labor organizations according to the Peronist model. In the view of such leaders, the only alternative to Frondizi's government in the short term was a new military government. Thus, when President Frondizi announced a law authorizing foreign capital to extract oil, contradicting his initially nationalist position, the Peronist union leadership disapproved a strike by Mendoza workers protesting the passing of the law.

The situation changed toward the end of 1958 when Frondizi implemented a stabilization plan recommended by the International Monetary Fund (IMF). The immediate consequence was a strong economic adjustment experienced by waged labor in the first three months of 1959. Massive dismissals were accompanied by a 30 percent decrease in salary purchasing power. Annual inflation reached 13.69 percent in a year. In mid-1959, tensions between the government and the larger Peronist unions increased when Frondizi ordered the use of force to expel 9,000 workers who had occupied the meatpacking plant that supplied meat to the city.

The Seizure of Lisandro de la Torre Meatpacking Plant

At the beginning of 1959, Congress began to debate a new law that would allow the privatization of the city of Buenos Aires' meatpacking plant, which livestock producers were interested in buying. At the time many in the Mataderos neighborhood, where both farmyards and the meatpacking plant were located, either worked at the plant or had relatives employed there. The plant had just voted in favor of a new combative Peronist leadership with close ties to the area's commandos.

Hearing the news, workers led by union leader Sebastián Borro protested en masse in front of Congress against the law. According to Borro, the president of the lower chamber of deputies had promised a response for the next day. But during the night, both legislative chambers approved the sale of the meatpacking plant to the Argentine Corporation of Producers. In the afternoon of the following day, after the news had spread across the factory, the union leadership called an assembly, which decided by a large majority to occupy the meatpacking plant until further notice.

The following day, Borro and the rest of the leadership asked President Frondizi to veto the law. In response, just before leaving on an official visit to the United States, Frondizi designated the chief of police as mediator in the conflict. On Friday at midnight, the ministry of labor declared the strike illegal and called on occupants to vacate the building before Saturday at 3 a.m. Repression began an hour later.

During the early hours of January 17, a force of 2,000 policemen, supported by assault vehicles, army trucks, soldiers carrying machine guns, and four tanks, surrounded the meatpacking plant, which still had most of the workers inside. At the time, Borro and other leaders were in a meeting with representatives of other Peronist unions to ask for their support. At 4 a.m., a tank smashed through the plant's front door and policemen through tear gas entered the central patio.

A group of workers reached the patio, turned back, and in front of the tank began singing the national anthem while others caused the livestock to stampe. After that people scattered in all directions. Most of the workers abandoned the plant, jumping over the surrounding walls, but a small group resisted on the fourth floor until 7 a.m. The police recaptured the building and arrested 95 workers, several of them injured. That night, learning what had happened, the leaders of the large Peronist unions, under pressure from the combative group including Borro, decided to call an indefinite general strike (Salas 2006).

To stop the insurrection the government resorted to repressive measures. During the first two days of the strike more than 400 union and political Peronist leaders were arrested, including Cooke, who had been displaced from the movement's leadership a month earlier by Perón. The areas of La Plata, Berisso, and Ensenada, the main enclave of foreign meatpacking plants and the cradle of Peronism, were declared a military zone under the custody of army and navy troops occupying the city distillery.

In response, resistencia commandos from the city of Buenos Aires, greater Buenos Aires, and the city of La Plata carried out hundreds of attacks with explosives to show not only that their operative capacity was intact but also that their power had grown from the early days of the caño to the acquisition of explosives such as trotyl. The government threatened to implement the Conintes (Conmoción Interna del Estado) Plan, which allowed the trial of civilians by military tribunals.

The general strike was declared illegal on its first day while the "military mobilization" of transportation workers was ordered. That night, some non-Peronist as well as Peronist union bus drivers abandoned the struggle, thus weakening the power of the strike. The next day, Tuesday, communists also left, as did the group of 62 Peronist organizations, alleging that they did not want to encourage a new military coup. In this way, the so-called revolutionary general strike, called for an indefinite period, was dissolved in 72 hours.

In Mataderos, however, neighbors and workers continued to resist. After the police occupied the meatpacking plant, the struggle moved to the neighborhood. Every day columns of protesters occupied the center of the neighborhood and confronted the police, stopping and burning streetcars or building barricades out of paving stones. During the night, neighbors cut down public lighting and threw stones at police patrol cars. It was a week of street fights, with a general strike and attacks in the background. The recently created Peronist Youth also participated. Despite the end of the general strike, the strike of the meatpacking plant workers continued. For several months it was difficult to assemble the personnel necessary for dealing with the daily needs of the meat industry. Finally, the meatpacking plant was sold to CAP in 1960. Half of the 9,000 workers were fired and did not find new jobs (Salas 2006).

During 1959, the reaction of Peronist unions encouraged by their hardcore groups inspired worker organizations to defend themselves from the offensive launched by Frondizi's government. In the city of Buenos Aires alone, 1,400,000 workers went on strike. In Argentina as a whole, 10 million labor days were lost, the highest number in the decade. Five national strikes were held that year. On April 14, a long strike of white-collar bank employees began, eventually leading to thousands of dismissals. In July, a sugar cane worker strike affected the Tucumán province. Long columns of protesters marched to the city through the sugar cane plantations; in a violent reaction, police killed two sugar cane workers. Nevertheless, sugar cane workers were the only group whose strike ended in victory. Metal workers went on strike from August 25 to October 7. In most conflicts protesters engaged in fights with the police in city centers.

In October 1959, in Tucumán, the Comando 17 de Octubre sent an armed group into the mountains, the Peronist Liberation Movement-Army of National Liberation (Movimiento Peronista de Liberación-Ejército de Liberación Nacional), known as Uturuncos (Tiger-Men), which held out until the police dismantled the guerilla settlement in June of the following year. During Christmas 1959, 21 Tucumano and Santiagueño guerillas attacked police headquarters in the city of Frías, taking arms and uniforms back to the jungle in southern Tucumán.

In the first months of 1960 a wave of resistencia attacks demonstrated that commandos had both the capacity and the resources to carry out large actions even in military neighborhoods. On February 15, a Peronist commando blew up the oil tanks of Shell-Mex in Córdoba city, burning four million liters of gas and killing 13 people. On March 11, a powerful trotyl bomb destroyed the home of Army Mayor David Cabrera, a member of the state intelligence service SIDE. Even though Cabrera and his wife were not hurt, the attack claimed the life of their 3-year-old daughter. Army commander General Toranzo Montero declared his intention to "execute anybody discovered in flagrante" and persuaded Frondizi to implement a counterinsurgency plan – CONINTES – to halt subversion.

On March 13 an army corporal, Manuel Medina, was detained in a police station and thrown from a window for cheering for Perón. The army and police searched thousands of homes throughout the country, shutting down all Peronist and Communist Party offices. Thousands of people were arrested under the CONINTES plan and were brought to military courts. More than 2,000 activists were sent to prison and became known as "CONINTES prisoners" (Salas 2003).

Violent repression and the government's refusal to negotiate with strikers caused popular resistance to disintegrate. Some Peronist union leaders accepted the alliance offered by Frondizi. Access to legality, which had been insinuated in 1958, became tangible in the "integrationist" proposal of the desarrollista (economic development-oriented) government. Leaders from larger Peronist unions understood themselves as necessary spokesmen in an effective post-Peronist political order. The persistence of a Peronist political identity transformed labor power into political power every time they were called to negotiate with the state and the business sector in their dual labor and political capacities.

Some commandos tried to form guerilla organizations, the majority of which ceased operations toward the end of 1960. The last attempt at a civic-military coup was led by General Iñiguez on November 30, 1960, when military groups and commandos attacked several regiments around the city of Rosario. No social mobilization accompanied this last Peronist uprising. Learning about the defeat of the movement, Iñiguez and other leaders fled the country.

In 1960 there was a decline in workers' struggles, and strikes reached their lowest point in five years. A new generation of activists were fired from the factories, blacklisted, and were unable to return to work. According to Secretary of Labor Galileo Puente speaking in May 1960, the time when "those who had to obey commanded" was over, and the "arbitrariness of factory internal commissions" could no longer be admitted since "businessmen must retake command of the factories" (Salas 2006).

SEE ALSO: Anarchism, Argentina; Argentina, Armed Struggle and Guerilla Organizations, 1960s–1970s; Argentina, Worker Actions, October 17, 1945

References and Suggested Readings

- Baschetti, R. (1987) Documentos de la Resistencia Peronista 1955–1970. Buenos Aires: Puntosur Editores.
- Ferla, S. (1983) Mártires y verdugos, 4th ed. Buenos Aires: Peña Lillo.
- Galasso, N. (1997) Cooke: de Perón al Che. Una biografía política. Rosario: Homo Sapiens.
- James, D. (1981) Racionalización y respuesta de la clase obrera: contexto y limitaciones de la actividad gremial en la Argentina. Desarrollo Económico 83, 21 (October–December): 321–49.
- Perón, J. D. & Cooke, J. W. (2007) Correspondencia Perón–Cooke, 2 vols. Buenos Aires: Ed. Colihue.
- Salas, E. (1994) Institucionalización, legalidad y límite de la democracia obrera en Argentina (1957). In P. Berrotarán & P. Pozzi (Comp.), Estudios inconformistas sobre la clase obrera argentina 1955–1989. Buenos Aires: Letra Buena.
- Salas, E. (2003) Uturuncos. El origen de la guerrilla peronista. Buenos Aires: Ed. Biblos.
- Salas, E. (2006) La Resistencia Peronista. La toma del frigorífico Lisandro de la Torre. Buenos Aires: Ed. Retórica/Altamira.
- Walsh, R. (1972) Operación Masacre. Buenos Aires: De la Flor.

Peru, armed insurgency and the Dirty War, 1980–1990

Summer D. Leibensperger

Beginning in 1980 and lasting into the 1990s, the Partido Comunista del Perú en el Sendero Luminoso de Mariátegui (PCP-SL or the Communist Party for Peru for the Shining Path of Mariátegui) engaged in guerilla warfare against Peru's central government. Guided by Maoist ideology, PCP-SL planned to overthrow the Peruvian state, replacing it with a New Democracy, leading the way to a socialist society. PCP-SL engaged in thousands of rebel attacks in the 1980s against possible collaborators of all social backgrounds. The government's response was brutal. First it ignored PCP-SL and the factors that led to its rise, which PCP-SL exploited to gain territory and followers, and then responded by inflicting indiscriminate violence both on PCP-SL members and peasants.

President Fujimori is credited with capturing the leader of PCP-SL, which incapacitated the organization, but at a terrible price: repeated violations of human rights. His military is charged with committing massacres and extrajudicial executions, raping women, and affecting disappearances. Fujimori, convicted of abuse of power in December 2007, was indicted as a war criminal for human rights violations during his presidency, for which he came to trial in 2008.

Additionally, in the mid-1980s, the Movimiento Revolucionario Túpac Amaru (MRTA or Túpac Amaru Revolutionary Movement) began an attack on the central government while simultaneously battling PCP-SL for territory in the countryside. While the impact of this group was never as great as PCP-SL, it is noteworthy as another group that was engaged in armed insurgency in the 1980s and 1990s.

Factors Leading to Armed Insurgency and Dirty War

In the years leading up to the insurgency, the Andes Mountains could be considered a visual marker of a great social and economic divide in Peru: on one side, Lima, the rich capital city near the coast; on the other, small villages with unrelenting poverty. Lima contained most of the wealth and population (largely of European ancestry) of the country; by comparison, the southern highlands contained widespread poverty and a high percentage of indigenous Indians who often faced discrimination and prejudice. Highland residents had been neglected by Peru's central government and were without basic services. Very few residents of Ayacucho, for example, had running water and electricity, and there were few paved roads. Malnutrition and infant mortality rates were high.

Peru was under military rule from 1968 to 1980. As civilian rule returned, members of the southern highlands hoped that leftist political parties (whose power rose with the return to civilian rule) would develop reforms that would help them, but reform measures in the 1960s and 1970s might have left them wary. Economic reform, specifically agrarian reform, was attempted by Fernando Belaúnde Terry (elected in 1963), Juan Velasco Alvarado (who led a coup d'état in 1968 and ruled for seven years), and General Francisco Morales Bermúdez Cerutti (who oversaw a five-year transition back to civilian rule). Few of the benefits of reform efforts reached the rural areas, especially Ayacucho.

In the early 1960s the hacienda system was still in place, though in decline since the 1930s, in many rural areas. Alvarado's government expropriated land from hacienda owners in 1968, but peasants in rural areas did not see immediate changes in land ownership. Indeed, more than five years later, the only action peasants had seen were hacienda owners exploiting the situation by selling assets. Cooperatives were formed in the early 1970s, but seemed designed to fail – few funds were provided and the effort was disorganized. Ultimately, poorer areas were low on the government's list of priorities and received little in terms of resources and assistance, further increasing peasant resentment.

At the same time that rural peasants were dealing with failed government reform efforts, other changes were occurring among the leftist political parties. In 1964 the Peruvian Communist Party split between the pro-Chinese and pro-Soviet factions. The pro-Soviet faction had the majority support, but the pro-Chinese faction was devoted to armed struggle. The members of the pro-Chinese faction in Ayacucho found a leader in Abimael Guzmán Reymoso, who, in early 1970, formed PCP-SL.

Also in the 1960s and 1970s, the Movimiento de la Izquierda Revolucionaria (or Revolutionary Left Movement) was undergoing changes, splitting into multiple factions, one of which merged with the Partido Socialista Revolucionario (or Revolutionary Socialist Party) in 1982 to form the Movimiento Revolucionario Túpac Aman.

PCP-SL

The PCP-SL's decade-long campaign of terror began in the rural Andean highlands as a radical guerilla movement that was guided by Maoist principles of rural class struggle expounded by the intelligentsia.

Abimael Guzmán Reymoso was a philosophy professor at the National University of San Cristóbal de Huamanga. He arrived in Ayacucho in 1962, but within six years he and his followers had gained control of the university. Most first-year courses were taught by Guzmán's followers (Senderistas), and when those followers taught Marxism, they taught PCP-SL's version of it. Guzmán and his followers had a five-step program that intended to end in the siege and collapse of the state. His program began with establishing rural bases and support to prepare for guerilla war. The rural bases would then expand, encircling the city. Guzmán anticipated that the "People's War" would take at least fifty years. In 1978 PCP-SL went underground (perhaps because Guzmán lost power at the university), and on May 17, 1980 it attacked a polling station in Chuschi, an Andean village, in a demonstration of anti-democratic sentiment.

PCP-SL was initially successful in gaining peasant recruits by exploiting to its advantage the area's poverty, government's neglect, and peasants' disappointed hopes in failed government reforms. PCP-SL activities in the early 1980s included those that helped the poor: PCP-SL members would target members of the bourgeoisie (or petit bourgeoisie) and threaten them; those who didn't leave were often murdered. PCP-SL would then distribute their land and resources. These actions seemed more reasonable to peasants when compared to police actions; police were often indiscriminate in their violence, in part because they had difficulty distinguishing between PCP-SL members, PCP-SL sympathizers, and other peasants. Researchers also speculate that, for a price, PCP-SL helped protect the coca-growing peasants from government officials who aimed to end the drug trade. Many of these coca-growing peasants chose to grow coca because it was more productive than other crops grown in the Upper Huallaga Valley. So, when officials tried to end the drug trade, these peasants saw the government as trying to take away their livelihood, and PCP-SL as trying to protect it.

Essentially, PCP-SL worked to eliminate the government's relationship with peasants (e.g., burning ballots, killing police, intimidating elected government officials), and some villages were left without government and police representatives, enabling PCP-SL to expand its territory. As PCP-SL started enforcing harsher measures on peasants (e.g., establishing growing restrictions on food in order to limit the amount sold to larger cities, closing local markets in an anti-capitalist measure, and killing respected local leaders), it began to lose peasant support, and, indeed, some peasants were among the first to organize an attempt to fight PCP-SL (generally using rondas campesinas, peasant patrols).

Ultimately, in the 1980s and early 1990s, PCP-SL was responsible for thousands of terrorist attacks. At first, its acts were limited to Ayacucho, but they eventually spread across the country and into Lima. PCP-SL destroyed rural cooperatives and closed local markets, slaughtered or sold livestock that belonged to peasants, bombed buildings (both public and private), disturbed (or skewed) municipal elections, and caused blackouts in both rural areas and Lima. At various points in its decade of terrorism, PCP-SL attacked transportation, communications, and energy facilities. PCP-SL members also tortured and murdered peasants (especially rich peasants, who they believed were informing on their activities, or who attempted to fight PCP-SL in rondas campesinas), government officials or local public figures, and members of the local police and armed forces. Several massacres have been attributed to PCP-SL, including one in Lucanamarca where 69 peasants were killed. Notably, PCP-SL rejected conventional human rights standards, seeing such standards as a bourgeois method to obstruct inevitable class struggle.

Guzmán and key leaders were captured on September 12, 1992 in Lima, after which the group steadily declined.

Movimiento Revolucionario Túpac Amaru

The MRTA's ideology is founded in Marxism and Leninism. Leaders criticized imperialist influences in Peru and wanted to establish a communist state. The movement was led initially by Victor Polay Campos, and the group clashed violently with PCP-SL over territory. After 1994 the MRTA engaged in bank robberies and kidnappings, carried out assassinations, and attacked embassies in Lima, the military, and police. Its last major action (and best known) was the 1997 Japanese ambassadorial hostage crisis. MRTA members held 72 hostages for four months at the ambassador's home. In April 1997 Peruvian forces raided the building and ended the crisis. The government (under President Fujimori) was condemned for executing MRTA leaders after they surrendered. MRTA's impact is not comparable to PCP-SL's; its membership was estimated to be only in the hundreds.

Government and Military Reaction

The central government did not begin counter-insurgency efforts until December 1982 when it declared seven provinces a Military Emergency Zone. By 1984 the zone had expanded to 13 provinces and in 1995 to 26. In early 1986 Lima itself was declared a state of emergency as PCP-SL violence hit the city in a series of bombings. Prior to the declaration of emergency military zones, the battle against PCP-SL was fought by the ill-equipped Guardia Civil (one of Peru's three police agencies); the police had little training in counterinsurgency methods and was divided from the rural population, in culture and language. Further, it was also battling an enemy without a defined front (and in the early 1980s, an enemy with peasant support), which meant it was often on the defensive. Police had difficulty identifying members of PCP-SL (in part because members were able to disappear into the supportive peasantry) and were at times indiscriminate in their violence, not distinguishing between peasants and armed insurgents. Hundreds of police officers were killed by PCP-SL, and the police's ineffectiveness allowed PCP-SL to occupy larger and larger areas.

The armed forces were hesitant to step in, seeing the insurgency as a matter for the police, and in the 1970s most of Peru's military purchases were intended to prepare against border wars with Chile and Ecuador, not internal insurgencies. After the provinces were declared military emergency zones, however, the military stepped in, and the period that later became known as the Dirty War began. The military's tactics surpassed the cruelty of PCP-SL. Suspected members of PCP-SL, peasants, journalists, and political prisoners were tortured and executed. Women were sexually assaulted. Several massacres have been attributed to the military, including the 1985 massacre of 74 men, women, and children in Accomarca.

Improved intelligence and counterinsurgency initiatives were brought about by President Fujimori in the early 1990s. Fujimori is credited with successfully dealing with the terrorist threat (Guzmán was captured, after all, and the 1997 embassy crisis ended with minimal loss of life of the hostages), but his government has been charged with corruption and with violating human rights. Many of these charges relate to Fujimori's head of intelligence, Vladimiro Montesinos, who threatened political opponents, bribed government officials, embezzled government funds, accepted payment from drug traffickers, and controlled Peru's television stations. Many believe that Montesinos and Fujimori established Grupo Colina, a death squad, to which at least three massacres are attributed. One of these is the 1991 execution of 15 people (including an eight-year-old child) who were sharing a meal in Lima's Barrios Altos neighborhood. The death squad was attempting to target a PCP-SL meeting. Additionally, in 1992, nine students and one professor from Lima's La Cantuta University were abducted, tortured, and executed. Grupo Colina believed they were linked to a PCP-SL bombing. In the latter case, some members of Grupo Colina were later sentenced to prison, but Fujimori's 1995 Amnesty Law enabled the release of members of the police and military who were convicted of or charged with crimes fighting the terrorist threat. (The law was repealed in 2000, after Fujimori's government fell.)

Fujimori also granted the military broad powers in the emergency zones: military courts were established in which judges wore hoods to protect their identity (and some argued, to prevent them from becoming targets), but suspected PCP-SL members were tried in these courts with few legal rights.

Conclusions

The toll on human life was extreme. The Peruvian Truth and Reconciliation Commission, in a 2003 report, found that in the 1980s and 1990s nearly 70,000 people died as a result of the insurgency and the resulting Dirty War. Moreover, the events shed light on several unpleasant aspects of Peruvian society, including the dramatic social, economic, and political divides between the capital city and the rest of the country. These divides enabled Fujimori (and other leaders) and the military to conduct a counterinsurgency that put down the PCP-SL, but they simply did not care about the peasants who got in the way. PCP-SL's desire to change the bitter plight of peasants may have been laudable, but its actions were repressive. In the end, PCP-SL demonstrated little more understanding of the group it wanted to save than the government it was trying to save it from.

Fujimori's legacy is complex and paradoxical. On the one hand, he improved Peru's economy and put down an insurgency. On the other, he committed terrible violations of human rights and perpetuated an environment of corruption. It may be telling that in 2001, when Fujimori (having fled to Japan) attempted to resign, his Congress would not accept the resignation; instead, it voted to remove him from office on the grounds he was "morally disabled."

Perhaps the most positive result of these terrible events is the improvement in the way human rights were viewed by politicians and the military. However, in the early twenty-first century, abject poverty remained pervasive in rural areas and the class divide was widening.

SEE ALSO: China, Maoism and Popular Power, 1949–1969; Mao Zedong (1893–1976); Mariátegui, José Carlos (1894–1930); Marxism; MRTA (Movimiento Revolucionario Túpac Amaru); Peru, Neoliberalism and Social Mobilization, 1990s–2000s; Peru, "People's War," Counterinsurgency, and the Popular Movement; Velasco Alvarado, Juan Francisco (1910–1977)

References and Suggested Readings

- Cameron, M. A. (1997) The Peruvian Labyrinth: Polity, Society, and Economy. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press.
- Comisión de la Verdad y Reconciliación (n.d.) Final Report. General Conclusions. Available at www.cverdad.org.pe/ingles/ifinal/conclusiones.php. Accessed July 18, 2008.
- Conaghan, C. M. (2005) Fujimori's Peru: Deception in the Public Sphere. Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press.
- Gorriti Ellenbogen, G. (1999) The Shining Path: A History of the Millenarian War in Peru. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Masterson, D. M. (1991) Militarism and Politics in Latin America: Peru from Sanchez Cerro to Sendero Luminoso. New York: Greenwood Press.
- Palmer, D. S. (1992) Peru, the Drug Business, and Shining Path: Between Scylla and Charybdis? Journal of Interamerican Studies and World Affairs 34, 3: 65–88.
- Ron, J. (2001) Ideology in Context: Explaining Sendero Luminoso's Tactical Escalation. Journal of Peace Research 38, 5: 569–92.
- Stern, S. J. (Ed.) (1998) Shining and Other Paths: War and Society in Peru, 1980–1995. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Taylor, L. (2006) Shining Path: Guerrilla War in Peru's Northern Highlands, 1980–1997. Liverpool: Liverpool University Press.

Peru, labor and peasant mobilizations, 1900–1950

Paulo Drinot

Labor and peasant mobilization in Peru in the first half of the twentieth century was shaped by, and helped shape, the country's insertion into the world economy as an exporter of largely unprocessed primary products such as sugar, cotton, wool, rubber, metals, and petroleum. This varied export quantum, fueled by a combination of national and transnational capital, reflected the development of regional economies geared toward the export of commodities that produced distinctive labor arrangements. Labor and peasant mobilization responded to various forces in this context, some bottom-up, but many top-down. In addition to the emergence of political parties and elite organizations purporting to represent, lead, and – in the case of the Andean indigenous peasantry – redeem workers and peasants, the first half of the twentieth century saw the formation of a state apparatus that sought to shape labor and the peasantry through social policy. Labor and peasant mobilization in Peru, as this suggests, was the outcome of a dynamic interplay of various forces.

Peru's laboring peoples were largely concentrated in the export economy. In sugar and metal mining, on the northern coast and in the central highlands, respectively, a system of debt peonage gradually gave way to a settled proletarian workforce. In cotton, in the valleys north and south of Lima, a combination of tenant farmers, sharecroppers, and a rural proletariat made up an ethnically diverse workforce (Chinese, Japanese, Afro-Peruvian, Andean, and European). In the southern highlands the expansion of the wool economy was based largely on Andean peasant family labor performed both by indigenous communities and peons tied to haciendas. In a system sometimes likened to feudalism, Andean wool producers came under the increasing control of wool merchants through a relationship often characterized by deceit and violence. Violence was even more integral to the labor relations that developed in the Peruvian Amazon, where indigenous peoples were forced into what we could call without exaggeration a cultural economy of terror based around rubber. In the small oil fields of Peru's far northern deserts, a largely proletarian workforce dominated.

Although outnumbered by export workers, a diversified urban workforce had begun to emerge in the early decades of the twentieth century. It was concentrated in Lima, but other cities such as Arequipa and Cuzco also witnessed the growth of urban labor. It was not primarily an industrial workforce, although textile mills and food processing industries concentrated the largest numbers of workers. Most urban workers, however, worked not in factories but rather in small workshops or in their homes. Arguably, the "typical" worker was not an overall-wearing, spanner-wielding, machine operator but rather a seamstress or a female domestic worker. Some males were employed in relatively skilled artisanal occupations as bakers, carpenters, or printers, but most of the male urban workforce toiled in construction. Similarly, industrial workers were numerically outstripped by white-collar workers, or empleados, who manned offices and retail establishments. In fact, there were considerably more workers employed in various transport activities, such as train workers, bus and taxi drivers, and sailors and port workers, than in properly industrial establishments.

Artisans seeking protection from free trade policies, the rise of "dishonorable trades," and incipient industrialization organized the first mutual aid societies as early as the 1860s. The hardships brought about by the War of the Pacific (1879–84) boosted mutual aid membership and by the late 1880s there were mutual aid societies throughout the country. In 1911 there were 62 societies in Lima alone, with an average membership of 200. They ranged from those that restricted their membership to a specific trade, to umbrella organizations like the Universal Union Artisan Confederation or the Assembly of United Societies. Mutual aid societies established close ties with elite politicians, particularly the oligarchic Partido Civil, and some artisans joined the party. Some benefits accrued from these relationships, including limited labor legislation as well as patronage and financial support for some mutual aid organizations. The 1911 Worker Accident Law, for example, was the culmination of a long process of negotiation in congress in which worker-deputies played an important role.

Despite the gains, many workers came to see the ties between the mutual aid societies and elite politicians as benefiting only the politicians and the leadership of the mutual aid societies. A wave of strikes in the 1890s and early 1900s suggested that confrontation, as opposed to accommodation, could produce results. Anarchists were both the staunchest critics of the mutual aid leadership and the staunchest proponents of confrontation. The spread of anarchism in Peru has often been seen as a teleological process that culminated in the general strikes of 1919. Certainly, anarchist workers led both the 1919 8-hour day movement and the Committee for the Cheaping of Subsistence Goods, which sought to address price inflation. However, anarchism's overall influence on the working class was limited. Both repression and the presence of political leaders such as President Guillermo Billinghurst (1912–14) and President Augusto B. Leguía (1919–30), who wooed working-class support by providing improvements in workers' living conditions and basic social legislation, undermined support for the anarchists' proposals. The 8-hour day law of 1919, for example, was shaped as much by elite ideas about the links between modernity, industrialization, and social policy as to labor agitation, as it was by anarchist mobilization.

In the early 1920s urban workers took advantage of new labor laws and the political opening of the early phase of the Leguía regime to organize collectively. Countless unions and federations were set up in quick succession, including the Regional Workers Federation of Peru (FORP), the labor confederation which provided the organizational template for many other unions and labor federations. By the end of the 1920s Peru had acquired an organized labor "movement," with as many as 20,000 "organized" workers. However, the early years of labor organization were far from smooth. Labor was deeply divided. In addition to conservative mutual aid organizations, three ideological currents split radical labor: anarchism, revolutionary syndicalism, and socialism. The conflicts between these groups reflected real divisions over the ideological orientation and type of organization the labor movement should adopt. The First Workers' Congress, held in 1921, debated whether to adopt anarchism as its ideological orientation. Though anarchists controlled the top positions at the congress the debate was postponed to a later congress as no agreement could be reached – evidence, some suggest, of anarchism's waning influence. Following the congress, the FORP was reorganized into two local labor federations, the Local Workers Federation of Lima (FOLL) and the Local Workers Federation of Callao (FOLC).

The debate over the González Prada Popular Universities (UPGP) confirmed the anarchists' increasing isolation from the mainstream labor movement. The UPGPs were an outgrowth of the brief student-worker alliance established during the 8-hour day movement in which Victor Raúl Haya de la Torre (1895–1979), the later leader of the American Popular Revolutionary Alliance (APRA), played a decisive role. The UPGPs took on a political role when they led the opposition to Leguía's plan to consecrate the nation to the Sacred Heart of Jesus in 1923. The protests mobilized much of Lima's labor movement. Repression was swift and clinical: Haya de la Torre, the UPGPs' dean, was exiled and the UPGPs closed down. In early 1924 the government allowed the UPGPs to reopen, perhaps in the belief that, with Haya de la Torre in exile, the UPGPs were no longer a threat. Anarchists began a campaign against the UPGPs, claiming that the schools were little more than a vehicle for Haya de la Torre's ambitions and amounted to an unsolicited meddling of intellectuals in working-class affairs. In this context many workers came to see the anarchists' methods as counterproductive, and, in light of the Russian Revolution, at odds with the labor movement that was beginning to flower elsewhere.

The formation of an organized labor movement in urban contexts and in the export industries was not matched by an equal level of organization among Peru's largely indigenous peasantry. Subject to similar pressures resulting from Peru's growing insertion into the global economy, in the first few decades of the twentieth century Peru's indigenous peoples were increasingly the focus of state attention and intellectual debate. Most contemporary observers agreed that Indians were culturally backward and morally and biologically degenerate, a pale semblance of the great Inca Empire to which the increasingly nationalistic Peruvian elite chose to trace the country's origins. However, there was significant disagreement regarding to extent to which the indigenous populations of Peru could usefully contribute to the country's march towards progress. Some, the so-called indigenistas, came to view indigenous culture as capable of regeneration and the Indian as amenable to cultural redemption. Organizations such as the Pro-Indigenous Association (Asociación Pro-Indígena) were created by intellectuals with such goals in mind.

As pressure over grazing land increased in the south as a consequence of favorable prices for wool and alpaca fiber, indigenous communities and haciendas clashed over what were becoming increasingly valuable resources. Some historians view in such clashes the makings of peasant “rebellion” and, in some cases, of a millenarian political project. Others have argued that landowners seeking the intervention of a repressive state force were interested in framing peasant protest as rebellion. In the early 1920s peasant unrest was increasingly channeled by an organization that, in contrast to many indigenista organizations, was run by non-indigenous Peruvians, but was largely indigenous in its composition. The Committee for the Rights of the Indigenous (Comité Pro-Derecho Indígena) took advantage of the moderately favorable political climate of the early years of the Leguía administration to mobilize the peasantry in various parts of the country. Such efforts were short lived. By the mid-1920s the Leguía dictatorship began to repress severely, if selectively, both urban and rural social movements. State-backed indigenista organizations, such as the Indian Affairs Bureau of the Ministry of Development and the Patronage of the Indian Race, did little to address the problems faced by Peru’s Andean peasantry.

In 1919 early attempts to build a socialist party had failed in the face of strong opposition from anarchist leaders. By the mid-1920s, however, socialist ideas began to make inroads in the labor movement. Socialists rejected the apolitical line dictated by syndicalists (who favored negotiation with the state) and anarchists (who did not). In 1927 the Second Workers’ Congress was dominated by a discussion over the ideological orientation that a new labor central should take. A number of workers pointed to the limits of syndicalism and argued that it was time for the labor movement to adopt a political role. Some even proposed the creation of a political party to promote class consciousness among workers. The syndicalists argued that it was necessary to separate discussion on the “methods of struggle” from the “ideology” of the proposed central. The debate was cut short when, under the pretext that a communist plot was being hatched, Leguía closed down the congress, banned the FOLL, and exiled many labor leaders. Significantly, the repression of the FOLL leadership paved the way for the growth of socialism and particularly of José Carlos Mariátegui’s (1894–1930) influence within the labor movement.

Upon his return from exile in Europe, Mariátegui became a lecturer at the UPGP and editor of Claridad, the newspaper of the student federation, which he turned into the organ of the FOLL. Mariátegui used both positions to establish strong links with labor leaders and to disseminate socialist ideas. Later, through periodicals such as Amauta and particularly Labor, Mariátegui was able to reach a small but influential working-class audience. In 1928, along with a small group of intellectuals and white and blue-collar workers, Mariátegui founded the Peruvian Socialist Party and set about organizing a new labor central: the General Confederation of the Workers of Peru (CGTP). Mariátegui tried to free labor from what he perceived to be its dominant apolitical ethos. Though he took special care to situate the struggle of the Peruvian working class in a global and theoretical context, Mariátegui placed socialism firmly within the historical development of the Peruvian working class and labor movement. Labor served as a tribune for new ideas on syndicalism, socialism, and revolutionary events abroad. The CGTP and its member unions would seek to work within legality in the short term, but, crucially, labor towards a revolution in the longer term.

The 1930s were marked by an acute political polarization and the rise of various political forces claiming to represent the interests of organized labor. On the right, the Revolutionary Union mobilized urban lower-class groups and was successful in the 1931 elections. On the left, three political organizations – the Peruvian Communist Party, the Socialist Party, and APRA – sought to represent and mobilize urban labor, and to a lesser extent, the Andean peasantry. Of the three, APRA was most successful, possibly because at least initially it approached urban labor as an ally in a front of intellectual and manual laborers. For many workers, including Arturo Sabroso – a textile worker, a key worker cadre in APRA, and a former advocate of apolitical syndicalism – such an arrangement guaranteed a degree of union autonomy vis-à-vis the party. The socialists proved successful in gaining the allegiance of the oil workers in the far north of the country. The communists, responding to the ultra-leftism of the Third International, found few supporters among organized labor, despite gaining control of the CGTP, and focused their energies on moving labor and the Andean peasantry, quite unsuccessfully, towards an insurrectionary strategy.

The links between labor and the new political forces of the left (and indeed the right) were shaped by a climate of political repression throughout the 1930s that forced many political leaders and many labor leaders into exile or into prison. For the most part repression was selective, but in some cases, as in the central highlands in 1930 and in Trujillo in 1932, it resulted in massacres of workers and peasants. Union activities were severely curtailed. In this climate unions saw many of the gains obtained through collective work contracts in the early 1920s rolled back by employers. Still, organized labor, particularly the larger unions such as railway workers and textile workers, proved adept at using whatever mechanisms were available to resist such attacks. More generally, urban labor benefited from a “corporatist” turn during the administration of General Oscar Benavides (1933–9). Motivated both by an attempt to neutralize the left’s appeal and by a belief that the social and moral “improvement” of labor was necessary to the nation’s progress, Benavides initiated a series of public works and created institutions aimed at labor, including worker housing, worker restaurants, and a worker social security law. These did little to address the problems faced by urban labor, but they helped to place labor at the center of state policy.

The governments of the 1930s gave far less attention to the countryside, and yet it was there that the most important change was occurring. During the 1930s and particularly the 1940s demographic pressure and the increasing mobility that resulted from state road-building projects led to the beginnings of a process of rural to urban migration that would radically alter the character of Peruvian society from the 1950s onwards. The 1940s saw a degree of political aperture, first during the Manuel Prado administration (1939–45) and particularly during the Manuel Bustamante y Rivero government (1945–8), which allowed APRA to finally shape government policy. The creation of a new labor central, the Confederation of the Workers of Peru (CTP), largely controlled by APRA, gave the party increasing influence over organized labor, which experienced significant growth and consolidation. But the Bustamante government, undermined by postwar inflation and the political tensions within the ruling coalition, was short lived. In 1948 Manuel Odría’s coup brought to an end one of Peru’s few democratic governments in the twentieth century, and a period of significant labor mobilization.

SEE ALSO: Haya de la Torre, Víctor Raúl (1895–1979); Mariátegui, José Carlos (1894–1930)

References and Suggested Readings

- Blanchard, P. (1982) The Origins of the Peruvian Labor Movement, 1883–1919. Pittsburgh: Pittsburgh University Press.
- Burga, M. & Flores Galindo, A. (1994) Apogeo y crisis de la República Aristocrática. In A. Flores Galindo, Obras Completas II. Lima: SUR.
- Jacobsen, N. (1993) Mirages of Transition: The Peruvian Altiplano, 1780–1930. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Stein, S. (1980) Populism in Peru: The Emergence of the Masses and the Politics of Social Control. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.
- Sulmont, D. (1975) El movimiento obrero en el Perú 1900–1956. Lima: Pontificia Universidad Católica del Perú.
- Tejada, L. (1988) La cuestión del pan: El anarcosindicalismo en el Perú 1880–1919. Lima: Instituto Nacional de Cultura.

Peru: neoliberalism and social mobilization, 1990s–2000s

Gerardo Rénique

On May 19, 1987, ten years after the historical 1977 stoppage that opened the door to the return of the military to their barracks after 12 years of dictatorial government, Peru was once again paralyzed by a massive general strike spearheaded by the General Workers’ Confederation of Peru (CGTP). Supported by a large number of popular organizations, including two peasant federations, shantytown associations, the recently created regional Popular Defense Fronts (FDIPs) and the left-wing parties coordinated under the umbrella of the United Left (IU), the strike surpassed the sphere of organized labor. Road blockades, marches, and demonstrations took place in cities in each of the 24 departments in the country. In the southern department of Puno more than 200 indigenous communities took over almost 990,000 acres of land from several associative enterprises under the control of state functionaries to be reorganized as communal democratic enterprises.

Staged at a moment of a deepening economic crisis with most of the country under a state of emergency and Lima and many other cities under a strict curfew, the May 1987 strike represented a serious challenge to President Alan Garcia's (1985–90) unpopular and anti-democratic policies. Elected as a center-left candidate espousing vaguely social democratic positions and vowing to reject International Monetary Fund (IMF) policies, during his first 18 months in office Garcia's conciliatory policies toward industrialists and workers managed to take the economy out of the recessionary cycle. Lacking a sound economic strategy, however, by the end of 1986 his erratic economic policies and caudillo style eventually undermined his initial relative success and led to a fast depletion of the country's economic reserves, a hiking inflation, and rising unemployment. His heavy-handed counterinsurgency policies, military massacres of peasants and Communist Party of Peru–Shining Path (Partido Comunista del Perú–Sendero Luminoso, PCP-SL) prisoners, anti-labor policies, and the involvement of his Alianza Popular Revolucionaria Americana (APRA) party with paramilitary groups targeting both popular leaders and supporters of the PCP-SL added to Garcia's unpopularity. The demands of the popular movement in the May 1987 strike represented a contrasting democratic alternative to both Garcia's unclear perspectives and the market democracy and increased repressive state favored by the right.

The political success of the strike deepened the crisis of Garcia's government and gave to the left and the popular movement the political momentum needed to emerge as the most important oppositional force. The IU demanded the resignation of Garcia's cabinet and the end of his economic policy favoring monopolies and militaristic and authoritarian strategies. The success of the left, however, was extremely short-lived. Garcia's popularity plummeted further while the economy continued to deteriorate. Facing a staggering yearly accumulated inflation of over 1,700 percent in September 1988, Garcia resorted to orthodox shock treatment. The Peruvian currency was sharply devalued; consumer prices doubled, or in some cases tripled, overnight; and wage increases were kept proportionately lower than the rising cost of living. The measures were greeted with outrage and widespread rioting and looting in Lima and other cities.

The shock treatment, however, was unable to contain hyperinflation. Further adjustment measures and the lifting of price controls on basic foodstuffs deepened the misery of the large majority of the population. By 1989 the annual inflation rate hit a numbing 2,776 percent and the GNP contracted by 12 percent. As a result, real income for the same year dropped to 1960s levels. By 1990, 70 percent of the labor force was either unemployed or underemployed. By the end of the decade, union membership dropped dramatically to represent barely 12 percent of the labor force while Lima's informal sector represented almost half of the economically active population. Under these dire circumstances, facing the uncertainties of escalating violence and repression, and fearful of losing their jobs or sacrificing a day's wages, workers and the poor gave a tepid response to the October and December 1989 general strikes called by the CGTP. The retrenchment of the popular movement, however, cannot be attributed exclusively to the deteriorating material and social conditions of the popular classes. It was due also to the unraveling of their relationship with the left and the rapidly evolving political landscape overdetermined by the escalating cycle of insurgency–counterinsurgency, the collapse of “really existing socialism,” and the ideological neoliberal offensive of global capitalism.

The IU was caught between its institutionalization as the most important parliamentary oppositional force and the demands of a mobilized and increasingly militant popular movement. The first national congress in January 1989 was unprecedented both in the number of participants and in the procedure of selecting delegates through democratic elections. With more than 3,500 participants, the congress also included 2,000 delegates elected nationwide through secret ballots. The congress decided to elect both the municipal and presidential slates for the upcoming electoral process through primary elections with the participation of all IU militants. But the IU leadership did not respect the results of the primaries.

Assassinations and extrajudicial executions of popular leaders, by both the armed forces and the PCP-SL, also had a devastating impact on the popular organization. To counter the expanding PCP-SL actions, the armed forces launched a new campaign of selective elimination, targeting its broader network of supporters. In the regions where it was unable to compete with the organizational strength of the peasant federations, the PCP-SL resorted to a campaign of bombings and murders against the left, the church, and the non-governmental organizations (NGOs) that supported the peasant movement.

In 1989, in the midst of the PCP-SL campaign, the powerful Federation of Mining, Metallurgical, and Steel Workers (FNTMMSP) came under fire from various quarters. Faced with a general strike in the large central highlands mining towns of Morococha, Casapalca, La Oroya, and Cerro de Pasco, mine managers, government functionaries, and the right-wing press launched a campaign accusing union leaders and the FNTMMSP rank and file of terrorism. In one of its first actions, in February 1989 a right-wing paramilitary assassinated Saul Cantoral, the FNTMMSP general secretary, and Consuelo Garcia, a women's organizer, in the mining camps. Over the following four months the PCP-SL followed suit with the murder of three prominent union leaders. Several other union activists and organizers of miners' wives also received death threats. Before a July regional congress of miners in Morococha to plan their upcoming strike, the PCP-SL destroyed machinery and installations and threatened union leaders. Amidst accusations of terrorism, the military intervened during the miners' strike, arresting workers and raiding union offices. Military presence in the mining towns in the central highland provinces – and elsewhere in the country – became almost permanent during the next years.

Lima's industrial corridors and shantytowns also became an important theater of operations for the escalating urban offensive sanctioned by the first PCP-SL congress in early 1988 to be carried through "armed strikes." For the PCP-SL, communal work parties, food assistance programs, cooperative workshops, and self-management enterprises were all part of the "revisionist" strategy. The IU local elected officials that controlled almost every single municipal government in Lima's poor and working-class neighborhoods.

The oppositional and militant stance of the left and the popular movement was also undermined by the right-wing ideological and political offensive spearheaded by Peruvian novelist Mario Vargas Llosa in response to Garcia's July 1987 plan to nationalize the banks. With the participation of prominent members of Lima's elites, Vargas Llosa founded a "new freedom movement" (Libertad) with the intended goal of replacing Peru's decrepit right-wing parties. Over the following months demonstrations against Garcia's ill-fated nationalization policy resuscitated the right and launched Vargas Llosa as one of Latin America's leading advocates of a "neoliberal revolution."

Unlike the elitist disdain toward the popular classes, Libertad hoped to win the support of an expanding informal sector of micro-entrepreneurs and the self-employed. In courting this sector, the Libertad movement resorted to the romantic fable of "popular capitalism" promoted by Peru's leading neoliberal intellectual, Hernando de Soto. In his vision Peru's poor are poor because they have been constrained by bureaucratic paperwork, price controls, wage stabilization, and consumer subsidies.

Facing the upcoming elections, Libertad joined the Christian Popular Party to create the Democratic Front (FREDEMO) with Vargas Llosa as its presidential candidate. A previously apathetic upper class took to the streets in support of Vargas Llosa's "neoliberal revolution." Upper-class youth and women went to the poor neighborhoods to do social and charity work, contesting the left on its own terrain. The Institute for Legal Defense (Instituto de Defensa Legal, IDL) and Libertad also launched an aggressive propaganda campaign in defense of neoliberalism through publications, public meetings, and seminars.

In the worst performance of their brief electoral history, the divided slates of the Socialist Left (IS) and the IU obtained a meager 4.3 and 6.8 percent respectively. Vargas Llosa obtained 35.1 percent – far less than the 50 percent required to take the presidency in the first round. Despite the stigma of Garcia's disastrous administration, APRA won 14.8 percent. Alberto Fujimori of Cambio 90, the dark horse in the race, won a surprising 26.9 percent of the vote. Formed as a non-partisan electoral movement, Cambio 90 mobilized the emerging non-criollo elite of micro-entrepreneurs, small businesspeople, technicians, and professionals. Fujimori's electoral message differed both from the harsh shock measures of FREDEMO and the party-centered traditions of APRA and the left.

Vowing to be free of partisan and ideological agendas, Fujimori instead promised an honest, technical, and efficient administration. He also pledged to end violence and eliminate poverty and lack of opportunities. Finally, he proposed to confront narcotics production through local alternative development programs and crop substitution. As economic advisors Fujimori called professionals and academics known for their stance against the IMF strategies of structural adjustment. With the backing of the left and APRA, Fujimori won clear majorities in the traditional left-voting southern departments and Lima's popular neighborhoods, and in APRA's northern department stronghold.

During his visits to the US and Japan as president-elect, Fujimori took a radical turn to the very policies he had campaigned against. Convinced of the necessity of toeing the IMF line, upon his return he reaffirmed the need of drastic economic readjustment. He put together a cabinet made up of former ministers and technocrats well connected to international banks and multilateral lending agencies. Surprisingly, two prominent economists from the IS and a scholar and educator from IU accepted positions in Fujimori's cabinet, adding to the crisis and discrediting the parliamentary left.

Fujimori's stabilization program, urged by the IMF as a precondition for Peru's "reinsertion" into the international financial community, unfolded in two stages. A severe austerity program, known as "Fujishock," announced in early August 1990, eliminated price subsidies and social spending and drastically raised interest rates and taxes. Overnight food prices rose 500 percent and gasoline prices 3,000 percent. Early next year real wages were worth only a third of what they had been six months before, and the industrial recession continued unabated. A majority of Peruvians were thrown into absolute poverty, and only 8 percent of the adult population was fully employed. The second step of Fujimori's neoliberalization entailed the liberalization of all forms of economic, financial, and labor regulation, the drastic reduction of public sector programs and services, and the privatization of the state-controlled sector and public resources.

The social costs of structural adjustment were horrendous. Malnutrition and child labor to supplement dwindling family income were responsible for the 50 percent drop in school attendance by the end of the 1991 academic year, and 10,000 schoolteachers left teaching due to salary constraints imposed by budget cuts. Following a three-month failed strike of public health workers 3,500 out of 5,000 trained public sector nurses left the country to accept work offers abroad. Furthermore, new legislation enabled employers to fire striking workers, eliminated job security, and curtailed collective bargaining. Land reform was overturned, paving the way for new large landholdings. A new banking law deregulated interest rates, opened banking to foreign investment, and eliminated development banks such as the Agrarian Bank. State-owned mining and oil companies, ports, railroads, and public airlines were slated for privatization. The scrapping of national development banks, together with hiking interest rates, caused widespread bankruptcy of businesses and unemployment, as well as a severe cut in food production. With no alternative sources of credit, farmers in the northeastern tropical valleys turned from rice and corn to growing coca for the expanding foreign demand for narcotics. Fujimori's May 1991 anti-narcotics agreement with the US, drafted by Hernando de Soto on the basis of a Heritage Foundation report, expanded the conflict into areas of coca cultivation for traditional use.

Beginning in January 1991 the economic measures were confronted by a wave of strikes and demonstrations. In Lima the 9,000 Milk Committees took over City Hall demanding increased funding and direct autonomous management for the food assistance program. The Interunion Confederation of State Workers (CITE) and workers in state enterprises protested payroll cuts and the privatizations in energy, oil, and mining. Strong opposition came also from the provinces, frustrated by Fujimori's reneging on his electoral promise to promote decentralization and autonomous regional development. Regional strikes in different parts of the country linked local demands with a broader political challenge to Fujimori's neoliberal strategy. Mounting discontent climaxed in early June with a Civic Day of Struggle in support of prolonged strikes by health workers and teachers, against the neoliberal transformations, and in opposition to the controversial anti-narcotics agreement with the United States. The marches and strikes met with violence from the security forces and won only symbolic concessions. Several people were killed and hundreds imprisoned during the unrest, while some peasant leaders and teachers' union representatives were disappeared by the army. When the government did agree to talks with the protest movements, it made vague promises it later refused to honor. Faced with the new anti-strike legislation and increased repression and frustration at the government's unwillingness to consider even minimal demands, the popular movement began to lose momentum.

The popular movement retrenchment coincided with one of the worst moments in the internal war. While the PCP-SL tried at all costs to increase its actions in urban settings, particularly in Lima, the armed forces increased their selective actions against PCP-SL supporters, leftists, and popular activists. After the defeat of its supporters in several union and shantytown communal elections in Lima and surrounding areas, the PCP-SL increased its attacks on popular organizations. During the "armed strike" of February 14, 1992, the PCP-SL murdered Maria Elena Moyano, a women's organizer and elected official of the Urban Self-Managed Community of Villa El Salvador (CUAVES). By the end of 1989 PCP-SL annihilation squads had murdered 21 plant managers and more than 50 union leaders. Most of the PCP-SL's victims, however, were peasants and peasants' leaders, particularly those affiliated with Peru's Peasant Confederation (CCP). In 1990 alone, over 60 percent of the PCP-SL's 1,249 recorded victims were peasants. Nearly 27 percent were slum dwellers. Fewer than 5 percent were police or military personnel. The armed forces, on the other hand, conducted a campaign of selective killings and disappearances. In June 1991, 35 university students in the University of Huancayo were executed and/or disappeared by paramilitaries. In this highly adverse climate, when a national strike was called by the CGTP in July 1991, it failed to take hold.

Emboldened by the popular opposition, temporary retreat, and collapse of the institutional left, Congress granted Fujimori extraordinary legislative powers. More than 70 decrees relating to economic reform eliminated all barriers to foreign investment, dismantled the entire state sector, and privatized all public and social services. All restrictions on exports of capital and profits by foreign companies and multinationals were removed, as were such basic rights as the eight-hour working day and job security. All international development aid and NGOs were placed under direct government control.

Unwilling to accept even minor modifications to his decrees, and angry with the investigations on human rights abuses and government corruption launched by the legislature, on April 5, 1992, with the support of the armed forces, Fujimori launched an auto-golpe (self-inflicted coup). In his televised message to the nation he announced the dissolution of Congress, the reorganization of the judiciary, the disbanding of the 12 regional governments, and the suspension of all articles of the constitution "not compatible with the government goals." The product of a political project of the armed forces, worked out between 1987 and 1990, the new regime had as its ultimate intention to replicate the Pinochet dictatorship in Chile. Fujimori centralized all the intelligence services under the National Intelligence Service (SIN), a new structure under the control of his henchman, Vladimiro Montesinos, and responsible only to the authority of the president himself. The role of the SIN, however, was not restricted to controlling the left and the popular movement but extended to the whole of society through a network of informants and agents among both popular and elite organizations and associations, universities, government officials, high-ranking members of the military, Congress, and even the church. It also financed the publication of popular newspapers and magazines, and through bribery and extortion recruited journalists, newscasters, and entertainers to act as operatives of the psychological propaganda operations devised by SIN. Acting as the political arm of the high command of the military and the technocracy, SIN not only kept close control of the population and the opposition but also maintained a tight oversight of parliament, the judiciary, the electoral authority, and the cabinet. The 1993 Constitution, approved with the votes of Fujimori's followers and FREDEMO, gave legal status to the president's hardline strategies and ultra-liberal policies.

During the rest of the decade, thanks to the support of the US, the waning of the PCP-SL, and the absence of an organized popular resistance, the Fujimori regime consolidated its despotic nature as a military-technocratic dictatorship disguised under the covers of a liberal state and economy. His fraudulent bid for reelection for a third consecutive period in 2000, however, galvanized the social discontent of wide sectors of the population – workers and peasants, the most severely hit by unemployment, impoverishment, and social polarization; urban middle sectors and professionals who in ten years had suffered a dramatic drop in their incomes and opportunities; and entrepreneurs who had suffered the severe contraction of the internal market. Elected opposition members of Congress pushed for a government in which they could have a voice. Representatives of the country's political and economic elites converged to put pressure on the Organization of American States (OAS), the US, and other international observers.

The popular sectors were indeed the first to react against Fujimori's decision in December 1999 to launch his campaign for a third (unconstitutional) term. On January 6, after almost a decade of rather spontaneous and unarticulated mobilizations, workers' unions, peasant federations, students' organizations, retirees, war veterans of the 1995 conflict with Ecuador, regional movements, and left-wing organizations carried on a national day of protest. Over 30,000 persons gathered in a central plaza of Lima in three columns and marched in the downtown area. Elsewhere in the country, similar marches and demonstrations, regional strikes, and road blockades punctuated an unprecedented mobilization under the slogan "The Fear is Over!" Two months later the recently formed Coordinadora Nacional de Frentes Regionales, with the support of labor and popular organizations, prepared a two-day national protest on March 12 and 13. This event again drew large numbers of people into the streets. When the three major opposition candidates failed to agree on a single unity candidate, the popular movement increased its pressure against Fujimori's reelection through a successful civic strike (paro cívico) on March 23. On May 18 the peasantry of Andahuaylas (department of Apurímac) called an agrarian strike (paro agrario). The week-long strike, which was supported by the Apurímac Regional Front, demanded better prices for their crops, regulation against imported agricultural products, and an effective government agrarian policy. Led by the CCP and the National Agrarian Confederation (CNA), the peasants carried on regional strikes, highway blockades, and marches.

Together with these more familiar forms of protest, new types of organizations were formed. These women's organizations, human rights groups, artists, intellectuals, and (especially) youth developed creative forms of participatory protest in the main plazas and public spaces of Lima and provincial cities. Human rights organizations carried on national campaigns against impunity laws and for full revelation of the human rights violations that had occurred during the 1980s counterinsurgency war. Civic or citizen organizations, such as the Democratic Forum, Transparency, and the Peace Council, served as advocates for democratic and constitutional rights, freedom of the press, and fair elections. Finally, ad hoc collectives made up of professionals, artists, youth, intellectuals, and students organized periodic public and highly symbolic piecemeal actions whose defiance and irreverence played an important role in eroding the aura of invincibility and omnipresence so cautiously cultivated by the unprecedented intelligence and surveillance apparatus backing Fujimori.

In this increasingly contentious atmosphere, the proclamation of a Fujimori victory the evening of the April 6 election – against both predictions of the exit polls and the official counting of the electoral board – was met with a massive and spontaneous demonstration in Lima's downtown attended by approximately 50,000 people. During the next three days, with the participation of students and youth, the country witnessed the largest demonstrations against Fujimori up to that moment. Similar actions were also staged in different parts of the country during the Independence Day holiday from July 26 to 28, as President Fujimori's loyal followers geared up for his highly contested third inauguration. Throughout the week leading up to his "auto-inauguration" on July 28, a series of demonstrations took place in Lima. Particularly impressive were the two large women's marches against the fraudulent reelection, one of which was brutally repressed by the national police. On the evening before Fujimori was scheduled to renew his mandate, a huge march drew more than 100,000 people from all over Peru to Lima's central plazas, while numerous simultaneous marches and rallies were held in provincial cities and towns for those who were not able to travel to Lima. Called by the CGTP and the regional fronts and with the participation of a number of other popular organizations, the march was also joined by the civic and citizens' organizations and non-leftist oppositional parties.

Following the inauguration, public attention focused on the OAS-sponsored negotiations between government and opposition representatives. In contrast to the popular movement's demand for the immediate resignation of the president – a demand that was supported in all opinion polls – the parliamentary opposition maintained its support for a negotiated transition. As negotiations dragged on, the mobilizations momentarily calmed down until mid-September, when new disclosures of direct government involvement in the electoral fraud and bribing of oppositional congressmen to switch sides pushed popular organizations once again to the streets. Riding a wave of almost daily spontaneous mobilizations in different parts of the country, the CGTP demanded the immediate resignation of the corralled president, the creation of a national emergency government, and new general and regional elections. Its demands also included punishment of corrupt functionaries and the establishment of a new economic strategy focused on job creation and living wages. On the basis of this platform, popular organizations coalesced in a new wave of protest that included a national day of struggle in October with demonstrations and marches in Lima, regional strikes in ten departments, and a two-day peasant strike. As the Fujimori regime unraveled the country witnessed, within a few days, the resignation of Fujimori's vice-president, the desertion of a number of his supporters in Congress, and a rebellion by a small military garrison in the southern region of Peru. The spontaneous outpouring of popular support acted as a deterrent for an already morally weakened and unpopular army. Further desertions allowed the opposition to replace the Congress president – one of Fujimori's staunchest supporters. Finally, on November 13, Fujimori left the country, purportedly to attend the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) conference in Brunei. In his absence popular organizations staged another successful day of national protest followed by a 72-hour peasant strike. They also announced a general strike to be started November 25, which was to last until the fall of Fujimori. On November 19, Fujimori announced his resignation from Tokyo.

SEE ALSO: Peru, Armed Insurgency and the Dirty War, 1980–1990; Peru, "People's War," Counterinsurgency, and the Popular Movement

References and Suggested Readings

- Comisión de la Verdad y Reconciliación (2004) Informe Final, Perú: 1980–2000. Lima: UNMSM/PUCP.
- Crabtree, J. & Thomas, J. (Eds.) (1988) Fujimori's Peru: Deception in the Public Sphere. London: Institute of Latin American Studies.
- Haworth, N. (1993) Radicalization and the Left in Peru, 1976–1991. In B. Carr & S. Ellner (Eds.), The Latin American Left: From the Fall of Allende to Perestroika. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.
- Poole, D. & Rénique, G. (1992) Peru Time of Fear. London: Latin America Bureau.
- Poole, D. & Rénique, G. (2000) Popular Movements, the Legacy of the Left and the Fall of Fujimori. Socialism and Democracy 14 (2): 53–74.
- Poole, D. & Rénique, G. (2003) Terror and the Privatized State: A Peruvian Parable. Radical History 85: 150–63.
- Quijano, A. (2000) Fujimorism, the OAS, and Peru. Socialism and Democracy 14 (2): 41–51.
- Taylor, L. (1990) One Step Forward, Two Steps Back: The Peruvian Izquierda Unida 1980–1990. Journal of Communist Studies 6 (3): 108–19.

Peru, "people's war," counterinsurgency, and the popular movement

Gerardo Rénique

By any reckoning, the 1980–92 war between the Partido Comunista del Perú-Sendero Luminoso (PCP-SL) and the armed forces marked a radical transformation in the country's political landscape. Set against the transition to an electoral democratic regime after 12 years of military government, the rapid urbanization of the country and rising popular expectations favored the expansion of the left. By the mid-1980s the left-wing coalition of the Izquierda Unida (United Left, IU) was the second largest electoral force. Labor unions, peasant federations, shantytown dwellers' associations, women's collectives, and students' organizations gave life to a powerful and expanding grassroots movement. The parallel escalation of the armed conflict at the same time created the conditions for the normalization and incorporation of counterinsurgency principles and mechanisms into the new governance demanded by the neoliberal reconfiguration of the Peruvian state and society in course during that same decade. A perverse combination of counterinsurgency doctrine, coastal criollo racism, and disdain for human rights characterized the escalating militarization of Peruvian society during this fateful decade. Starting with the administration of Fernando Belaunde de Terry (1980–5) – the first president after 12 years of military government – each of the next democratically elected presidents gave an increasingly free rein to the Peruvian military.

Among the most remarkable and disturbing aspects of this changing political scenario were the new levels of violence displayed by both the armed forces and the PCP-SL against civilians, and the new relationship between violence and state power. During the 1980s the state use of arbitrary detentions, occasional killings in mass actions, torture, exile, and deportation of opposition leaders was displaced by harsh and widespread forms of exemplary and punitive violence aimed against men, women, and children in the civilian population, popular organizations, and grassroots and left-wing parties. In a perverse and curious resemblance to other Latin American "dirty wars" in rural areas, military "death caravans" carried out rape, torture, and execution; college professors and students disappeared from dormitories; peasant villagers were corralled into strategic hamlets; thousands of citizens suffered daily police harassment and arbitrary detentions; journalists, lawyers, and relatives of alleged subversives were executed, arrested, or disappeared. According to estimates from the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (CVR) between 1980 and 2000, at least 69,280 persons had been killed or disappeared as a consequence of the conflict.

As the PCP-SL intensified its activity in different parts of the country, the conflictive zones were declared as emergency zones where basic constitutional rights were suspended and the military displaced democratically elected authorities. New legislation defined terrorism as a special crime subject to military jurisdiction. Any perceived act of "apology or support" for terrorism was prosecutable as terrorism. Those accused of terrorism were subject to relaxed rules of evidence and received summary trials in front of masked military judges. Grassroots leaders and elected officials from the United Left coalition were charged as sympathizers or terrorists. Anti-terrorist legislation also provided justification for rounding up all the dark-skinned cholos and indios whom the state perceived as the "natural" allies of Sendero Luminoso.

By January 1989, 56 out of a total of 185 provinces, including the capital city of Lima, were under military rule. More than half the Peruvian people were denied their constitutional rights. Between 1989 and 1990, one-third of Lima's population, or 2.5 million people, were subjected to forced searches by police or military; 9,000 people in Lima were detained under Peru's sweeping anti-terrorist laws. Migrants from the Andean highlands, street vendors, students, and any dark-skinned or Indian-looking people were specially subjected to such abuses.

On the other hand, the PCP-SL also exceeded the tradition of class-based vindictive violence that had characterized earlier left-wing forms of revolutionary violence. In a radical shift from the armed propaganda, bank "expropriations," sabotage against infrastructure, and occasional military engagements previously employed by Peruvian revolutionary organizations, the PCP-SL also turned its violence against leaders of popular organizations, elected officials, priests and nuns, NGO members, and state functionaries associated with left-wing parties or the government; in short, they targeted all those who did not pledge allegiance to the PCP-SL "people's war." On April 3, 1983, for example, a force of 100 members of the PCP-SL staged "people's trials" in the Ayacucho towns of Huancasancos and Lucanamarca, charging the townspeople with having resisted their presence on several previous occasions. They ended the trials by executing 45 peasants in Lucanamarca and 35 in Huancasancos. During the following two weeks the PCP-SL killed 50 more peasants in punitive actions against the villagers in the neighboring province of Cangallo. PCP-SL combatants also carried out random bombings and shootings of passers-by and bus and cab drivers to enforce the party's "armed strikes." In one of its bloodiest actions, the PCP-SL set off a powerful car bomb in July 1992, destroying apartment buildings in a residential middle-class neighborhood in Lima and killing over 20 people. Leaders and organizers identified with the most militant sector of the United Left and the popular movement like Aymara peasant leader Porfirio Suni, Enrique Castilla, general secretary of the textile workers' federation, and Maria Elena Moyano, a popular leader from the Urban Self-Managed Community of Villa El Salvador, were among dozens executed by the PCP-SL "annihilation squads."

Founded in the early 1970s, the PCP-SL had its origins in one of the splinter Communist Party groups that emerged in the aftermath of the schism between Moscow and Beijing followers. The PCP-SL was established as a militarized cadre organization, which rejected electoral politics and any form of legal struggle as "parliamentary cretinism" and "pacifism." Both were considered to have their origins in the "revisionism" that Abimael Guzmán saw as dominating the rest of the Peruvian left. While Maoism has always concerned itself with ideological purity, Guzmán took this discourse to an extreme. He described the party as a body that had to be cleansed and purified of the "cancer" and "filth" of revisionism, or of any influence questioning the inevitability of the armed struggle. His metaphors of disease and purification conveyed an ideology whose simplicity proved extremely compelling for the predominantly young and provincial followers who supported the PCP-SL's armed struggle. As a worldview that divided everything neatly into absolute good or absolute evil, it provided simple answers to the problems of Peru and its largely futureless youth. For Guzmán and his followers, the armed struggle represented a purging mechanism for the attainment of absolute purity, perfection, and truth. As such, violence constituted a means to intervene in the cosmological battle between good and evil. This Olympian struggle was to be fought at all levels of existence, from the universe to the individual soul. "The problem," asserted Guzmán, "is the presence in each soul of two flags, one black and one red. We are [the] left, let us make a holocaust with the black flag; it is easy for each to do it; if not, the rest of us will do it for them."

Since Guzmán believed the opposition between the red and black poles to be irreconcilable, the "black" or impure pole required total annihilation, leaving no remains. It was the mission of the PCP-SL and its leadership to carry out this task of excising the impure through a process Guzmán referred to repeatedly as "sweeping" or "burning." Led by its revolutionary party, the people then had to eradicate all physical trace of the "revisionists" so that the "cancer" would not once again reproduce itself. "The people," wrote Guzmán, "will tear the reactionaries' flesh, convert it to shreds and sink the black scraps of meat into the slimy mud; what remains, [they] will burn and scatter to the winds of the earth so that nothing remains except the evil memory of that which must never return because it cannot and must not return."

This black-and-white vision of political struggle derives from Guzmán's idiosyncratic understanding of the Maoist and Marxist concept of contradiction. According to Marx, contradiction manifests itself through the struggle between opposing classes in society. In capitalist society, the principal contradictions are those between wage labor and capital, and between money and the commodity form. They are fundamentally and characteristically dialectic because both terms of each contradiction presuppose the other. As such, social contradictions imply a form of inclusive opposition that must be worked out through the concrete actions and struggles of human beings. It is this human agency and struggle that is, for Marx, the motor of history. All ensuing Marxist tradition follows Marx's interpretation of contradiction as a unity of opposites.

Drawing in part on his studies of Kant, Guzmán rejected the basic Marxist principle of the unity of opposites. He instead constructed his theory of contradiction to parallel Kant's concept of real or exclusive oppositions, resolvable only through the intervention of a supra-human agency (the divine). For Guzmán this meant that the two poles of a contradiction remain in essence different from and external to each other, rather than being viewed, as in the Marxist dialectic, as two aspects of one and the same force. Guzmán concluded that the necessary and only resolution of the antagonism or contradiction between such irreconcilable (because exclusive) poles would be through the eradication of one of them. It is this conclusion that leads to his conception of the "armed struggle" as a universal purging mechanism – the supra-human force – that would rid both society and the party of all traces of the evil pole of "revisionism" and the "reaction." The inevitable outcome of this process would be a society purged of all antagonism, contradiction, and difference – what Guzmán called the "society of great harmony."

Guzmán also presented the PCP-SL's struggle as an act of destiny because of its inevitability. Building on Kant's theory of causal necessity, Guzmán saw the party and its armed struggle as the necessary consequence of all past events leading up to this moment. For him, the party had the supreme task of systematizing the force of violence in Peru into the "people's war" that would end the third stage of contemporary Peruvian history, or the "general crisis of bureaucratic capitalism." Bureaucratic capitalism, wrote Guzmán, "is born sick, rotten, tied to feudalism, and subjected to imperialism." Its destruction was therefore both inevitable and a goal of an armed struggle that would unfold – with the help of Guzmán's party – in three predetermined stages. The first entailed the development of guerilla warfare and the establishment of bases of support among the peasantry. For Guzmán the PCP successfully carried on this stage during the first 11 years of its struggle. The second stage involved the deployment of larger military units in frontal engagement with the enemy forces and the establishment of a "strategic equilibrium" between Sendero and the armed forces. The bombings of energy pylons, executions of popular leaders in the strategic shantytowns surrounding the capital city, and intensification of actions of armed propaganda in Lima during May 1991 were all designed to mark the beginnings of the final state of the people's war. This third stage – the "strategic counteroffensive" – was to be followed by a general urban insurrection, the retreat of the enemy, the final victory, and the establishment of the "New Democracy."

What made Guzmán's vision of history-as-armed-struggle compelling was precisely its combination of cosmic inevitability and armed agency. By participating in the PCP-SL's armed struggle, its cadre believed to be participating in a cosmological unfolding of world history. Such a metaphysical view of history made inquiries into causes or historical processes irrelevant. Thus, for Guzmán and his followers, there was no need to look back into history and question why, or what if – to look for reasons that might provide a moral justification for violence. Rather, morality, like history, was simply not an issue. "The done is done," Guzmán taught his followers. "It cannot be reopened. Are we to revoke written time, the fact engraved in matter? How can the grains detain the millstone? They will be reduced to dust." As in other fundamentalist ideologies (e.g., religious, nationalist, fascist), individual agency and life were similarly dismissed as irrelevant to the sweeping course of history.

"One [person] is worth nothing, the masses are everything. If we are to be something it will be as part of the masses." Thus deprived of human agency, morality, or will, the historical movement toward the armed struggle was graphically depicted in Guzmán's fiery rhetoric as a "storm," "bonfire," or "earthquake" – as natural forces impossible for the individual to resist.

For Senderistas then, violence represented the irresistible force moving history forward. Guzmán taught his followers that violence constituted a natural and universal fact that needed to be elevated into the guiding principle for political action, revolutionary praxis, and the reorganization of a "new society." "We reaffirm ourselves in revolutionary violence as the universal law to take power and as the essence for substituting one class for another," proclaimed Guzmán. "We will attain communism only with revolutionary violence and while there remains a place on earth in which exploitation exists, we will finish it off with revolutionary violence." For this reason, Guzmán continued, "we communists must empower ourselves ideologically, politically, and organically to assume [violence] properly."

The majority of the left, on the other hand, took the democratic transition as a challenge to its political gains and expansion during the previous decade. Since the early 1980s the most important left-wing parties, social movements, and popular organizations had coalesced under the banners of the United Left. Established as a "revolutionary mass front," by the late 1980s it became the second largest electoral force. Paradoxically, this electoral success also marked the beginning of the IU's then unforeseen rapid decline. Under the challenge posed by the growing PCP-SL armed struggle and an increasingly militant popular movement – prodded by a deepening economic crisis – the IU struggled to find a balance between its avowed role as a "revolutionary mass front" and its parliamentary activities. Set against the collapse of "really existing socialism" and a mounting neoliberal ideological offensive, the crisis of the Peruvian left was deepened by an increasing divide between the political parties and the popular organizations, leaders and militants, and between those favoring a more centrist and conciliatory political strategy and those inclined toward a more radical one. Sectarianism, opportunism, and anti-democratic practices – problems that the IU had pledged to overcome – resurfaced among its ranks, engulfing the front in the infighting that led to its disintegration.

Another relevant political force acting during the 1980s and 1990s was the Movimiento Revolucionario Túpac Amaru (Túpac Amaru Revolutionary Movement, MRTA), formed in 1984 as an armed organization and conceived as part of a front in which popular organizations, unions, and parties would combine political, electoral, and armed actions with mass mobilizations. Because it viewed itself as part of the national left and popular movement, the MRTA supported the efforts of popular organizations and the IU parties. In line with its politics, the MRTA aimed its armed actions at police and military installations, banks, and US interests. MRTA members also "expropriated" food and clothing for redistribution to poor shantytown dwellers. While in its early actions the MRTA for the most part avoided execution and indiscriminate use of force, it was less scrupulous in dealing with internal differences. Several dissident members were executed and the MRTA was also troubled by conflicts between factions in the leadership. In a widely condemned action, in late December 1989 MRTA members executed an Ashaninka indigenous leader whom they accused of collaboration with the army in the death of an MIR (Revolutionary Left Movement) guerilla in 1965. In the ensuing backlash by the Ashaninka, the MRTA was expelled from the Gran Pajonal Region and lost important support from the Ashaninka. Later the MRTA was also engaged in hostage taking and kidnapping for ransom of senior army officers and businessmen.

From Guzmán's perspective, the MRTA like the IU constituted expressions of "revisionism," the ideological deviation that questioned the PCP-SL's idiosyncratic armed struggle. For Sendero the United Left (as well as the armed insurgency of the MRTA) was but another class enemy to be eliminated. Thus, because of its political alliance with the United Left, the large majority of grassroots and social movements were also considered as "enemies of the people."

Its disdain for the culture of Quechua- and Aymara-speaking peasants deemed as an archaic survival of a feudal past that had to be eliminated in the construction of the party's envisioned "New Democracy" also constituted a galvanizing factor of the PCP-SL's anti-popular stance. In many towns the PCP-SL banned the celebration of religious fiestas and rituals regarded as

"archaic superstitions." It also attempted to disband the traditional political-religious indigenous authorities and replace them with party-sanctioned governing bodies called "Popular Committees." According to a PCP-SL spokesperson at the time, Andean religious practices were "irrationalities which continue to have influence over the most backward inhabitants of Peru. This [Andean] cultural tradition has nothing to do with the war and the revolutionary struggle." Intellectual or political programs that took account of Andean indigenous traditions were similarly disparaged by the pro-PCP-SL newspaper El Diario as "magical whining nationalisms" that were condemned to extinction as "the residue of a moribund bourgeois ideology."

In September 1992, the capture of Abimael Guzmán marked the beginning of the end of the PCP-SL's insurgency. As police operatives burst into his safe house in a middle-class neighborhood in Lima, the much-feared "Fourth Sword of Marxism" waited calmly. On confronting his captors, he is said to have told the commanding officer: "Sometimes you win; sometimes you lose. This time it's my turn to lose." The most important loser, however, was the popular movement, undermined as much by the repressive "anti-terrorist" legislation as by the bullets of the PCP-SL "annihilation squads" which, together with extrajudicial executions carried out by the armed forces and the police, ended the lives of many prominent popular leaders and organizers.

SEE ALSO: MRTA (Movimiento Revolucionario Túpac Amaru); Peru, Armed Insurgency and the Dirty War, 1980–1990; Peru, Neoliberalism and Social Mobilization, 1990s–2000s

References and Suggested Readings

- El Diario* (1988) IU con la Perestroika y la Utopia Andina: Residuos de la Moribunda Ideología Burguesa. In Cresta Roja, Suplemento Dominical. Lima, Año II, No. 62 (July).
- Fokkema, A. (1990–1) Interview with Luis Arce Borja. NACLA Report on the Americas 24 (4).
- Guzmán, A. (1989a) Por la Nueva Bandera. In L. Arce Borja (Ed.), Guerra popular en el Perú: El pensamiento Gonzalo. Brussels: Borja, p. 145 (author's translation).
- Guzmán, A. (1989b) Somos los iniciadores. In L. Arce Borja (Ed.), Guerra popular en el Perú: El pensamiento Gonzalo. Brussels: Borja, p. 145 (author's translation).

- Poole, D. & Rénique, G. (1991) The New Chroniclers of Peru: US Scholars and their "Shining Path" of Peasant Rebellion. Bulletin of Latin American Research 10 (2): 133–91.
- Poole, D. & Rénique, G. (1992) Peru, Time of Fear. London: LAB.
- Stern, S. (Ed.) (1998) Shining and Other Paths: War and Society, 1980–1995. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.

Peterloo Massacre, 1819

Christian A. Griggs

The Peterloo Massacre occurred on August 16, 1819 in Manchester, England. A group of approximately 60,000 workers gathered in a peaceful political protest and the local magistrates, fearing a riot, sent cavalry into the crowd to disband them, causing chaos and leading to the massacre.

Since the French Revolution in 1789 the British government had been uneasy about the presence of radical political movements in the country. Parliament passed repressive laws to limit the rights and influence of radical groups, though they continued to grow in size and number. The great fear was that Britain would have its own violent revolution and overturn the state. Britain at the time was in the midst of an industrial revolution, causing substantial social and economic change and creating a volatile political environment where radical ideas often found a welcoming audience. By 1815 the urban working class faced many hardships: food prices were high, labor was harsh, wages were low, and the workers had no political power. They began to turn to protest to effect reform, feeding the fears of the conservative British government. The response was not reform but further repression. Seditious meetings were outlawed, habeas corpus was suspended, and the government increasingly used informers and spies to root out radicals. The protests and gatherings continued, though they were held more cautiously.

In this context a protest was organized by the Patriotic Union Society of Manchester to be held in the city at St. Peter's Field in August 1819. In early July Joseph Johnson, the secretary of the society, invited "Orator" Henry Hunt to be the chief speaker at the gathering. Hunt was known throughout England for his radical ideas and, in agreeing to come to Manchester, he expressed the desire to make the meeting especially impressive in order to attract national attention to the cause. As preparations moved ahead it became evident that the protest at St. Peter's would be impressive in size. Word spread to the local magistrates and they became concerned that the meeting might become violent. The magistrates, including William Hulton and Charles Ethelston, were loyal High Tories who supported the repressive measures of the government. They were certain that the protesters would come armed and prepared to fight, leading the magistrates to attempt to stop the meeting completely. Communications regarding the proposed protest were opened between the British Home Office in London and the magistrates in Manchester. Though both groups believed the radicals were planning a revolution, it became evident that there was no legal foundation to prevent the gathering. Once the meeting began, however, the magistrates could disperse it immediately if they believed it posed a danger.

The Peterloo Massacre, also known as the Battle of Peterloo, occurred in Manchester, England, on August 16, 1819 when between 60,000 and 80,000 people assembled at St. Peter's Field to demand parliamentary reform and representation. Eleven people were killed and about 400 were injured after yeomanry were ordered to disperse the crowd. Unidentified artist. (Mary Evans Picture Library)

The day of the protest, August 16, arrived, and the crowd began to amass on St. Peter's Field around 9 a.m. Hunt urged them to come armed with only a "self-approving conscience" and not with weapons, advice which was followed. The protesters flocked to Manchester from outlying regions such as Royton, Oldham, and Middleton. As they marched they carried with them banners that proclaimed their cause: "Parliaments Annual," "Liberty and Fraternity," and "Suffrage Universal." The people also wanted political representation in the industrial towns of northern England and relief from the artificially high price of corn. By the time the meeting began around 1 p.m., the crowd numbered approximately 60,000. But the reformers were not the only ones who had gathered in Manchester; the magistrates had brought in a substantial military force. A total of seven cavalry troops and seven companies of infantry were in the city under the direction of Lieutenant Colonel Guy L'Estrange, with additional troops stationed in nearby towns.

Almost immediately after Hunt began to address the crowd, the magistrates decided to disband the gathering and arrest the leaders. The cavalry was sent in to assist in the arrests, with the Manchester Yeomanry the first group to arrive. This was a poorly trained and inexperienced volunteer cavalry force. The Yeomanry charged the crowd, building speed as they moved through the masses. Chaos ensued as the people scrambled to get out of the way. The arrests were made, after which the Yeomanry turned on the protesters. In an attempt to clear the field, they began waving their swords as they marched through the fleeing crowd, assisted at this point by four experienced cavalry regiments from the British army. After ten minutes the field was cleared and the massacre was over. Eleven people were killed and more than 400 injured, primarily from crushing.

In the immediate aftermath of the massacre the British government gave full support to the magistrates' actions. In December, parliament passed the Six Acts to further limit radical influence in the country. The leaders who had been arrested at Peterloo were put on trial the following year and most were incarcerated, weakening the radical working-class movement. But the implications of Peterloo were not entirely negative. The story of the massacre spread across Britain in the newspapers and there was widespread shock at the violence used against the workers. Numerous meetings were arranged to protest the massacre, and members of the middle and upper classes attended. Despite the Six Acts, Britain in the 1820s was a more liberal country and the 1830s brought significant reform. The Peterloo Massacre is viewed as a significant step in the process of reform because it helped publicize and build sympathy for the reform movement. It can also be considered an early example of class warfare, with the middle-class yeomanry attacking the working-class protesters. As such, the massacre helped in the formation of class identity in early industrial society.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Corn Law Agitation, Britain, 19th Century; Chartists

References and Suggested Readings

- Marlow, J. (1969) The Peterloo Massacre. London: Rapp & Whiting.
 Read, D. (1958) Peterloo: The "Massacre" and its Background. Manchester: Manchester University Press.
 Reid, R. (1989) The Peterloo Massacre. London: Heinemann.

Pham Van Dong (1906–2000)

Justin Corfield

Pham Van Dong was a senior member of the Vietnamese Communist Party and prime minister of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam (North Vietnam) from 1955 until 1976. Following the defeat of the US and South Vietnamese, in 1974, Pham Van Dong was chairman of the Council of Ministers of a unified Vietnam until retiring in 1987.

Pham Van Dong was born on March 1, 1906, in Duc Tan village, Mo Duc district of Quang Ngai province in central Vietnam. His father was chief secretary to the Vietnamese Emperor Duy Tan. Pham Van Dong attended the National Academy in Hue, and when he was 18 he joined a demonstration organized at the school to mourn the death of Phan Chu Trinh, the eminent anti-colonial scholar. He then went to the University of Hanoi. In 1926 he traveled to Guangzhou (Canton), China, to join the Revolutionary Youth League (RYL) and enrolled in the Whampoa Military Academy for training in the Chinese Nationalist army, then in coalition with the Chinese communists. Soon after, Pham Van Dong returned to Vietnam and served as a member of the RYL's regional committee in the south of the country. In 1931 Pham Van Dong was arrested by French colonial authorities in Vietnam. He was jailed on Poulo Condore Island, and was not freed until the election of the Popular Front government in France in 1936, which gave amnesty to political prisoners.

During the late 1930s Pham Van Dong formed ties with Vietnamese communists in southern China, using the alias Lam Ba Kiet (Lin Paichieh), and serving under Hô Chi Minh during World War II. In 1946, he was named minister of finance of the newly formed Democratic Republic of Vietnam (DRV) and, in 1951, member of the Politburo of the Vietnamese Communist Party. He was appointed minister of foreign affairs and vice-premier in 1954, leading the Vietnamese communist delegation to the Geneva Peace Talks in 1954. He became prime minister on September 20, 1955 at the fifth session of the First National Congress of the DRV.

Throughout the Second Indochinese War (US military invasion and occupation) Pham Van Dong remained administrator, reconciling the often conflicting interests of the Vietnamese Communist Party and the North Vietnamese government. He participated in the peace talks with US presidents Lyndon B. Johnson and Richard M. Nixon and was engaged in foreign policy and Vietnam's gradual alliance with the Soviet Union. On July 2, 1976, following reunification of North Vietnam and South Vietnam, Pham Van Dong was appointed as chairman of the Council of Ministers, a position he held until June 18, 1987.

Pham Van Dong governed Vietnam during the invasion of Cambodia in December 1978. He was interviewed by Stanley Karnow for the television series Vietnam: A Television History in 1981, during which he put forward the Vietnamese communist case persuasively and concisely.

Pham Van Dong resigned from the Politburo of the Vietnamese Communist Party at the Sixth Party Congress in December 1986 owing to "advanced age and ill health." With 32 years as prime minister, he was one of the longest-serving leaders in the world at his retirement. He died at the age of 94 on April 29, 2000, the day before the 25th anniversary of the end of the Vietnam War.

SEE ALSO: Hô Chi Minh (Nguyen Tat Thanh) (1890–1969); Vietnam, Anti-Colonial, Nationalist, and Communist Movements, 1900–1939; Vietnam, First Indochina War, 1945–1954; Vietnam, Protest and Second Indochina War, 1960–1974

References and Suggested Readings

- Karnow, S. (1984) Vietnam: A History. Harmondsworth: Penguin.
 Turner, R. F. (1975) Vietnamese Communism: Its Origins and Development. Stanford: Hoover Institution Press.

Phan Boi Chau (1867–1940)

Justin Corfield

One of the major figures in the Vietnamese anti-colonial and nationalist struggle, Phan Boi Chau was born on December 26, 1867, in a village in the north-central province of Nghe An. His father was from a family of scholars who had long since fallen on hard times, and Phan Boi Chau was brought up in some poverty. However, his father was able to teach him the Confucian ethics and the Analects. As a boy, Phan Boi Chau saw the emergence of French colonial control that compelled the Vietnamese emperor, Tu Duc, to sign a treaty supporting their commercial concession. He watched the defeat of the Can Vuong movement against the French, with the emperor, Ham Nghi, forced to flee the Imperial Palace and settle in Nghe An. Phan Boi Chau met him there and became active in the fight against the French.

With the French sending soldiers into the region, Phan Boi Chau decided to sink into obscurity and try to look after his aging father. However, he continued his studies and, in 1900, passed the examinations to become a government employee. Four years later he formed the Vietnam Duy Tan Hoi (Vietnam Modernization Association) and became its general secretary, with another nationalist, Cuong De, as president. Seeing the great hope for the anti-colonial struggle in Tokyo, Phan Boi Chau went there to seek help in fighting the French. Phan was also keen to start training Vietnamese in the revolutionary struggle. The French put pressure on the Japanese, and in 1909 they finally decided to expel Phan Boi Chau. From Japan he went to Hong Kong where he continued to work with Cuong De, and the two of them moved to Siam (Thailand). Seeing himself as part of a movement like that of Sun Yat-sen, he was in Thailand when he heard news of the outbreak of the rebellion led by Hoang Ha Tam in Vietnam. Although anxious to help, he was unable to do so.

The 1911 Revolution in China encouraged the Vietnamese nationalists, and Phan was soon surrounded by many anti-colonial leaders who had moved to Thailand to associate with him. This led to the formation of the Vietnam Restoration League in 1912. Going to China to study the revolution there, Phan was arrested and jailed until 1917. By this time he was writing prolifically on the independence struggle, producing a number of works such as one entitled “France–Vietnamese Harmony,” which urged some compromise with the French.

When traveling through the French concession in Shanghai in 1925, Phan Boi Chau was arrested by French agents and brought back to Vietnam, where he was tried for treason and convicted. Because he was in ill health, he lived out his life sentence under house arrest, and died on October 29, 1940.

SEE ALSO: Sun Yat-Sen (1866–1925); Vietnam, Anti-Colonial, Nationalist, and Communist Movements, 1900–1939; Vietnam, First Indochina War, 1945–1954; Vietnam, Protest against Colonialism, 1858–1896; Vietnam, Protest and Second Indochina War, 1960–1974

References and Suggested Readings

- Marr, D. G. (1970) Vietnamese Anticolonialism 1885–1925. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Vinh Sinh (1988) Phan Boi Chau and the Dong Du Movement. New Haven: Yale Center for International and Area Studies.
- Vinh Sinh & Wickenden, N. (Eds.) (1999) Overturned Chariot: The Autobiography of Phan Boi Chau. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press.

Philippines, colonial protests during the Spanish era

Pierre Rousset

At the end of the nineteenth century, the Philippines was the first country in Asia to be liberated from colonial power. The first anti-colonial revolt against Spanish rule occurred from 1896 to 1898, further extended by the resistance to the American conquest. Ultimately, at the turn of the twentieth century, the US replaced a defeated Spain, initiating a new colonial cycle.

The Philippines is comprised of an archipelago composed of 7,107 islands, the vast majority of whose population lives on 20 islands. The geographic dispersion of the Philippines has greatly influenced the history of popular struggles in the country. But one unparalleled historical factor explains the distinctiveness of the Philippines in Asia: an early and prolonged character of direct colonial domination.

Colonialism in the Philippines began in the sixteenth century, as in Latin America – 300 years earlier than most Asian countries. The process of formal decolonization was not complete until the aftermath of World War II, as in most of the rest of Asia, but 100 years later than in Latin America. Thus, the Philippines’ colonial era lasted an exceptionally long four centuries. Another particularity of the country was that Spain reigned as the dominating colonial power before the archipelago became one of the few direct colonies of the United States, a unique succession for Asia.

Colonial powers of the archipelago were not confronted with a mature pre-capitalist state, as in China, Vietnam, Cambodia, or Thailand. Although the Philippines ultimately did not become a colony of settlement, colonization facilitated western cultural penetration and drastic societal change. The country became the primary Christian territory in the region – in many ways, the Philippines today remains Latin Asia.

Ferdinand Magellan disembarked in 1521 on an island which later became the Philippines, but it was only after the expedition of Miguel Lopez of Legazpi in 1565 that the process of colonization seriously began. At the time, the archipelago’s population was less than one million, composed of various linguistic groups. The basic social unit, usually the barangay (village), was small in size.

Magellan was not the first to “discover” the territory. Before the arrival of Christian Europeans, communities living along the coast and the rivers were already in contact with Chinese, Indian, and Arab merchants. In the south, Islamization of the archipelago was well underway and the sultanates were established.

This portrait of the Battle of Paeo in Manila depicts Philippine rebels struggling to create an independent republic. The battle took place on February 4–5, 1899 against United States forces. While Filipino nationalists declared independence on June 12, 1898, following the end of the Spanish–American War in 1899, the country was recolonized by the US and did not receive formal independence until June 4, 1946. (Courtesy of the Library of Congress)

Apart from the Islamized regions of the south, social differentiation and institutional representations were poorly developed at the time of Spain's arrival. It was Spain that introduced private ownership of land, previously considered common property. The polarization of classes was only asserted with the onset of the colonial framework. For two centuries Spain did not attempt to "develop" the archipelago, remaining content to use the port of Manila in the galleon trade between China and Mexico. The Spanish hoped to use the Philippines as a rear base in the conquest of China, and the archipelago became a religious and military post of the empire. Administered through Mexico, Spain's presence in the Philippines helped control its global commercial route against the English, Portuguese, and Dutch, who were often at war in the European Continent.

The country was not only Christianized through colonization. The friars became central politically, and the church was a source of economic power. The Spanish empire was built in the name of "two majesties" – God (or rather the pope) and the king. The friars, who received salaries from the king of Spain, maintained a direct relationship with the crown as well as serving as the representatives of Rome. They were present everywhere except in the Muslim south, knew the country, spoke the local dialect, organized people around the church, and remained in the archipelago when civil servants returned to Spain. The clergy was the first beneficiary of the privatization of land, becoming the Philippines' largest landowner. It invested in international and local trade and controlled banks and insurance companies by means of foundations.

The friars constituted the most important power network in the entire archipelago. On an economic level, they were challenged by private capitalist competition quite late in the empire. The church's political influence was significant because friars became agents and guarantors of pacification, with religion legitimating the colonial order. The union of church and state afforded friars considerable administrative responsibility. Friars incarnated spiritual and temporal powers, but when the regime entered a crisis, they were enmeshed in the social and political tensions as principal channels of colonial exploitation and appropriation.

Social Stratification and Regional Differentiation

For a long time the Spanish, Chinese, and indigenous economies intermingled. Feudal practices and institutions were imported from Spain, but European feudalism, as such, did not develop in the Philippines. The impact of commercial capitalism was felt rapidly; under the influence of the world market and of Chinese trade, the precolonial relationships of production were gradually dissolved. With the increase in mixed marriages, the influence of Chinese mestizos increased. As a result of privileges granted traditional dignitaries, a class of propertied Filipinos, called the principales, was formed in association with the colonial power.

The colonial era gave birth to a peculiar social hierarchy, dominated from top to bottom by Spaniards, the mestizos (particularly Sino-Filipinos, as Hispano-Filipino was less common), the indigenous principales, and finally the people. Private appropriation of land resulted in new social polarization between landlords and tenants, and friars often became absentee landlords. The clergy competed with the Chinese for the control of local trade and, in the villages, with ecomenderos, Filipinos given the status of subjects of the Spanish crown. In light of the theopolitical characteristic of Spanish colonialism, tensions often turned violent between the clerical hierarchy and civil servants.

The social, economic, political, and linguistic unification of the country was never completed by the administrative and religious structures of the colonial power. With the decline of the Spanish empire and rise of Britain in the seventeenth century, the British and Chinese played an important role in developing and integrating the Philippines into the global market. While the archipelago's social formation remained deeply marked by the Hispanic clerico-commercial order, Chinese immigration proved more widespread and durable than that of the Spanish. At the onset of the seventeenth century, more than 20,000 Chinese lived in Manila and the surrounding areas and played an increasingly important role in commercial activity.

The Philippines' complex historical heritage is combined with the particular geography of the country. In the archipelago maritime and land communication is often difficult; the ocean separates the islands and the mountain chains isolate the plains from one another. These factors strengthened considerably the forces of regional differentiation in the country and bear witness to its linguistic diversity. Tagalog, which obtained the status of the national language, is the mother tongue of only 30 percent of the population and is spoken primarily in the capital of Manila. Other languages and dialects are spoken in the rest of the archipelago. For many Filipinos, Tagalog remains a second language, the diffusion of which was promoted in the late twentieth century by television.

Political life too remained regional, with large provincial families exerting remarkably important influence. The deep-rootedness of the church, the shaping of social class through a colonial framework, the strength of regionalism, the presence of a non-Hispanic population in the south and in the mountain ranges of the archipelago were factors weighing strongly upon the birth of a national conscience and social struggles. These factors also shaped the degree of identification of Filipinos with their Asian region. In the Philippines, more westernized than its neighbors and mostly Christianized, the sentiment of belonging to a Southeast Asia of Islamic, Buddhist, and Confucian cultures is not instinctive.

Early Resistance

Colonial expeditions were confronted with armed resistance, like that carried out by Lapu-lapu which cost Ferdinand Magellan his life, or that of Lakandula and Soliman against Legazpi. In 1587, many traditional chiefs were condemned to death for instigating a revolt in Manila. Many uprisings were later carried out against exploitation imposed by the friars, such as those in Samar Island in 1649.

Abolition of the tribute, a collection that led to many brutalities, and the end of forced labor and conscription, often keeping villagers from fully harvesting their crop, were the most widespread demands during Spanish rule. In the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries, rebellion often took the form of native upheaval against Christianity and its representatives. But Catholic rituals also sometimes combined with traditional beliefs as proof of the early ideological domination of colonial rule. In the center of Luzon, where social structures were most developed, as early as 1660 resistance was less religious, non-native, and more directly political.

Certain regional upheavals acquired large mass bases and long resisted military expeditions sent to crush them. This was the case of the struggle initiated in the Province of Bohol by Francisco Dagohoy, lasting 85 years from 1744 to 1829. Deep-rooted socially, this struggle continued in spite of the death of Dagohoy. The popular upheaval first took advantage of the conflict between Spain and the Netherlands, then of the world decline in Hispanic power and the repercussions of the Seven Years' War in Europe: the British even occupied Manila in 1762 and the center of Luzon Island became the scene of numerous struggles in the following years.

Resistance: Late 18th to Late 19th Centuries

The process of the 1896–8 revolution was deeply influenced by the amplitude of sociopolitical transformation engaged in from the middle of the eighteenth century. The weal and co-optation of the elite sharpened class polarization within the Philippine communities. A direct commercial route was opened toward Spain, and trade diversified to Europe and Asia. With a higher degree of integration into the world market, cash crop production intensified.

With the creation in 1781 of the monopoly on tobacco (abandoned in 1883), then in 1785 of the Royal Philippine Company (abolished in 1834), the colony gained financial and commercial independence from Mexico. Trade liberalization, pursued with the end of the galleon trade in 1813, stimulated the development of the monetary economy of the Philippines. Banking houses were created, foreign companies (especially British but also American) were authorized to operate in the Manila region, and competition between Chinese–British and Spanish firms became fierce.

In the mid-nineteenth century, the social pyramid still followed the ethnic constitution of the country with, from top to bottom, the peninsulares (Spanish holding positions in the Philippines), the insulares or creoles (Spanish born in the archipelago and considering themselves real Filipinos), the mestizo Spanish, the mestizo Chinese, the natives, and the Chinese. Chinese immigration was mostly male and the number of Sino-Filipinos increased considerably; it gained importance especially after the eviction of the non-Catholic Chinese in 1755. Among a population of four million, 250,000 were Chinese mestizos, 20,000 Spanish mestizos, and 10,000 Chinese.

In 1850, the Philippines again opened up to Chinese immigration. The Chinese subsequently regained their position in trade and finance as Sino-Filipinos switched to agriculture, becoming more Filipino than Chinese and often adopting Philippine names. Sino-Filipinos integrated into large provincial families and into what was to become the national elite. Land concentration progressed rapidly throughout the second half of the nineteenth century, giving birth to the hacienda system, which combined an active integration in the world capitalist market with quasi-feudal forms of exploitation inherited from the church.

The national market was consolidated – although without abolishing regional powers – and new elites emerged who were sensitive to the ideals of the Enlightenment and who sent their children to study in Spain. The elites faced limitations imposed by colonial rule and strong social resentment. The Cadiz Constitution, proclaimed in Spain in 1812 and the following year in the Philippines, resonated with people's aspirations for equality. The quick abrogation of the constitution in 1814, with the advent of the absolutist regime in the colonial metropolis, sparked the 1815 revolt of Sarrat during which the cailianes, or common people, attacked the principales, or rich Filipinos. Class antagonisms proved stronger at this time than during opposition to colonial rule.

As rice production declined and competition grew fiercer from foreign textile producers, the socioeconomic situation of many Filipinos deteriorated due to foreign control over the import–export market. Many contradictions undermined the established order: between rich and poor, peasants and landlords, within the elite, between the principales and creoles, but also between the peninsulares and creoles, considered akin to the rebels in Latin America. Within the church, an equality movement was formed as native priests demanded that Filipinos join the clergy long dominated by the Spaniards. The authoritarian tightening of colonial administration provoked a brief mutiny in Cavite in 1872, after which three Filipino priests, Fathers José Burgos, Mariano Gomez, and Jacinto Zamora, were executed. The brutality with which a resulting minor revolt was crushed unified various components of the Philippine society, all the more so because one priest who had three-fourths Spanish blood was nevertheless considered an indio by the authorities.

The term “Filipino” was originally reserved for creoles or Spaniards born and residing in the Philippines, but its usage came to denote the social elite, including Chinese mestizos and the culturally Hispanicized urbanized natives.

Culture, Class, and Nation

The constitution of the international market, the evolution of the Philippine social formation, and the growing rejection of the colonial order fostered the assertion of a national conscience and a modern conception of a nation in the second half of the nineteenth century. The ilustrados, influenced by European liberalism and the ideals of the French Revolution, shaped its ideological formulation. Consequently, the dominant conception of the nation reflected their social status, not simply the cultural identity of the country. The paternalistic contempt for the people legitimized the domination of a class, but it also implied that the archipelago was not yet ready for independence. It announced many future compromises with the more “advanced” western powers.

The country's cultural identity was more profoundly marked by its colonial heritage than is usually the case in Asia, at least partly because of the lengthy colonial domination. The dances, songs, poems, and popular legends of the Philippines reflect a Hispanic influence. An “imaginary” memory was established in which the history of the Spanish royalty intermingled with indigenous themes. The church contributed to this by translating into vernacular languages an edifying metropolitan literature. This mythical history fed on the stories of the European wars against the Moors, which had consequences on the relationship of Christianized Filipinos with the Muslims in the south.

This process of cultural integration permitted the creation of an original culture combining oriental and western (Spanish, then American – but also Arab) traditions. The “authentic” Filipino is the fruit of these successive blends.

The Revolution of 1896–1898

The revolution of 1896–8 resulted from the convergence of movements against colonial administration and against large landlords; thus it targeted the Spanish Catholic Church. The revolution simultaneously addressed the questions of independence, the republic, social justice, and the emergence of an indigenous church – within and without Catholicism.

The ilustrados, both in Spain and in the Philippines, launched in 1889 a magazine called La Solidaridad, through which the new propaganda movement made itself known. The latter did not question the colonial framework but fought for democratization. On July 2, 1892, La Liga Filipina was formed to enlarge the social base of the movement, demanding reforms. Four days later, José Rizal, the most well known among the founders of the Liga, was arrested and deported to Dapitan in the south of the archipelago. The Liga was dissolved, but gave birth to two organizations: the Cuerpo de Compromisarios with the affluent ilustrados supporting La Solidaridad on one side, and, on the other side, the Katipunan, which was a secret society established by militants, admittedly educated but from more modest origins, like Andres Bonifacio, a figurehead of the association. The members of the new intelligentsia were not necessarily rich. Marcelo H. del Pilar, who wrote in Tagalog and whose ideas, more radical than those of Rizal, influenced Bonifacio, died in a state of poverty in Spain in 1896.

The Katipunan fought for separation from Spain and not for a deeper assimilation. It promoted peaceful agitation as well as armed revolution. It embodied the radicalization of a socially intermediary sector, exercising generally skilled or liberal professions, but peripheral to the elite. The Katipunan was sensitive to the indignity of the colonial condition and reacted against the opportunism of the wealthy and the class polarizations at work within the greater Philippine society itself.

The revolutionary movement focused its attention on eight Tagalog provinces of Luzon where the urban influence on the countryside was the strongest, and where the commercialization of agriculture and the concentration of land in the hands of the church were most advanced.

In August 1896, the colonial administration, which had learned of the existence of the Katipunan, launched a wave of arrests, which triggered the start of the revolt. The governor-general proclaimed a state of war, ordering the execution of detainees, including José Rizal, in spite of the fact that he had, from detention, repudiated the revolution. Rizal exemplified the reformist ilustrados, opposing the rationality of the Enlightenment in favor of the superstition of the people. He was nevertheless much respected before his death and considered a healer in the Tagalog regions. His assassination after a mock trial plunged the reformist policies of the elite into a dead end. The popular milieu, for their part, likened the execution to the martyrdom of Christ. The armed struggle spread rapidly to provinces throughout Luzon Island and some other islands.

Political and personal conflicts soon appeared within the revolutionary cadres. The influence of Andreas Bonifacio declined because of successive military defeats against colonial forces. The influence of Emilio Aguinaldo, son of an affluent Chinese mestizo family, was reinforced. Regionalism and provincialism contributed to the weakening of the revolutionary movement. The turning point came in early 1897. A government was established; led by Aguinaldo, it was composed of provincial dignitaries. Bonifacio, who refused to recognize it, was arrested, summarily tried, and executed. The leadership of the revolution fell under the control of the elites.

The Aguinaldo government led without glory. After new military defeats, he signed an agreement with the colonial powers denouncing as bandits those who had pursued the armed struggle. Later, Aguinaldo and his followers went into exile in Hong Kong, where they pocketed 400,000 pesos as “indemnity” given by the Spanish government; 200,000 more pesos were given to the leaders of the Republic of Biakna-bato, which remained in the archipelago.

From One Enemy to Another

In spite of the assassination of Bonifacio, the crisis of Katipunan, and many self-proclaimed leaders’ desertions, the popular rebellion was revived in Luzon and other islands like Cebu and Panay. But the emergence of the United States as a new world power and the 1898 Spanish–American War radically changed the framework of the struggles.

In May of that year, American Marines destroyed a Spanish fleet in Manila Bay. Washington had already negotiated with the Hong Kong-based Filipino exiles who, on May 9, returned under their protection to Cavite. Five days later, Aguinaldo formed a new government and on June 12 proclaimed independence from Spain, placing the country under the protective umbrella of the United States. Through this proclamation, he succeeded in rallying local leaders of the resistance and presenting himself again as president.

The Philippine revolutionary forces easily won over the Spanish. The US immediately took control of the capital, with more than 10,000 expeditionary corps. Meanwhile, the Filipinos won battles in the Visayas, in the center of the archipelago, and in the Negros region Hispanophile landlords turned against their masters. On January 23, 1899, the first Republic of the Philippines was proclaimed. Still, two developments raised uncertainty over the success of the revolution. On social issues, the elite ascertained its control over the new regime: the land of the friars was seized – but was to be distributed to dignitaries and landowners rather than to the peasants who supported the war efforts. On the international front, secret negotiations between Madrid and Washington plotted the annexation of the country by the new imperialist power.

At the time of the Treaty of Paris, signed on December 10, 1898, Spain controlled only isolated positions in the Philippines – this fact did not keep it from selling a country that it no longer possessed. On December 21, President McKinley issued a proclamation of Benevolent Assimilation, commanding the expeditionary corps to conquer the whole of the archipelago. In a move largely unexpected by the Philippine nationalist movement, Aguinaldo gave ambiguous instructions – to take up once more the struggle for independence, but prepare to accept an American protectorate or annexation if this objective seemed out of reach. The US opened hostilities on February 4, 1899. After two years of fighting, on March 23, 1901 its forces captured Aguinaldo, who on April 19 called an end to the armed resistance. The rallying of ilustrados for the new occupying forces increased, although the popular resistance continued. Those who were opposed to conciliation, like Apolinario Mabini – a former prime minister in the Philippine government – were cast aside, if not assassinated. Such was the destiny of General Antonio Luna, considered the best military leader of the revolution.

A Battle of Memory

Independence from Spain gave way to a new colonial order. It was defeat within victory. The first major revolutionary experience of the modern Philippines presents characteristics that will be again found in the future, every time such struggles gain ground. The central questions of degree of independence, who shall hold power, and who shall benefit from reforms, are interconnected. The class cleavage affirmed itself again and again within the anti-colonial movement. The propertied elites tended to compromise with the foreign power, particularly with the United States. The economic and military superiority of the US does not alone explain the outcome of the war. The divisions within the nationalist movement itself also played an important role.

History is written by the conqueror. In the pantheon of leaders of the anti-colonial movement, it is José Rizal who has officially been named the national hero. Surely, he was the subject of a truly popular cult. But he was also an emblematic figure acceptable to the propertied elite as well as to the new dominant power. For their part, the left and the labor movement celebrate Bonifacio Day every year on November 30. A century after, the revolution of 1896–8 and the war that followed remain the focus of a never-ending battle of memory.

SEE ALSO: Bonifacio, Andres (1863–1897); Huk Rebellion, 1946–1954; Philippines, Protest during the

US Era; Philippines, Protests, 1950s–1970s; Philippines, Protests, 1980s–Present; Rizal, José (1861–1896)

References and Suggested Readings

- Agoncillo, T. A. & Guerrero, M. (1973) History of the Filipino People, 4th ed. Quezon City: R. P. Garcia.
- Ahmad, A. (2000) Class and Colony in Mindanao. In K. Gaerlan & M. Stankovitch (Eds.), Rebels, Warlords, and Ulama: A Reader on Muslim Separatism and the War in Southern Philippines. Quezon City: Institute for Popular Democracy.
- Constantino, R. (1975) History of the Philippines: From the Spanish Colonization to the Second World War. New York: Monthly Review Press.
- Fast, F. & Richardson, J. (1979) Roots of Dependency: Political and Economic Revolution in 19th-Century Philippines. Quezon City: Foundation for Nationalist Studies.
- Ileto, R. C. (1998) Filipinos and their Revolution: Event, Discourse, and Historiography. Manila: Ateneo de Manila University Press.
- Rizal, J. (1887/1961) Noli me tangere. Trans. L. Ma Guerrero. London: Longman.
- Schirmer, D. B. & Shalom, S. R. (1987) The Philippines Reader: A History of Colonialism, Dictatorship, and Resistance. Boston: South End Press.
- Scott, W. H. (1974) The Discovery of the Igorots: Spanish Contacts with the Pagans of Northern Luzon, rev. ed. Quezon City: New Day.

Philippines, protest during the US era

Pierre Rousset

The United States ruled the Philippines for nearly 50 years from 1898 to 1946, one of the few American colonies. At the inception of the colonial era, for the US as for Spain, control of the Philippines was geographically and strategically linked to access to China and to the maritime commercial routes in the Pacific and Indian oceans. As the colonial status of the Philippine archipelago developed importance, the US government found itself in the contradictory position of responding to domestic economic interests seeking to open the region for capital investment and other economic sectors within the colony seeking protection from global markets. To consolidate control over the Philippines, the US engaged in military suppression of popular resistance, co-optation of social elites, and upon independence, providing ideological legitimacy for the new regime.

The US goal never sought to build a classical colonial empire but to create a new form of imperialism through modern economic and geopolitical domination. To ensure maintenance of the system, reformist elites in the Philippines and US found common ground for an orderly transition to independence instead of autonomy driven through national liberation. In December 1935, the US granted the Philippines commonwealth status, creating an institutional framework for granting full independence 11 years later in 1946: a process that radically influenced the course of national and social struggle in the archipelago.

Lasting less than 50 years, the American colonial period was a fraction of the more than 330 years of Spanish imperial control from 1565 to 1868, but it left a particularly profound and durable stigma on the Philippines.

The early twentieth century was dramatically different than the Spanish conquest, as American colonization was already confronted with a society of entrenched class inequality and class domination that it could subordinate to its political and economic needs. The US colonial government co-opted the traditional elites in the Philippines, even at the cost of perpetuating pre-capitalist, “feudal” forms of overexploitation of the popular majority. Concomitantly, the US opened the Philippines to the capitalist world market through modernizing the agricultural sectors on the southern island group of Mindanao for agribusiness and cash crops, radically transforming the status of much of the peasantry into a rural working class.

Under American control, the Philippines economy was restructured through replacing Spanish–European firms with their own corporations, creating a system of severe economic dependency on the US. As the plantation of cash crops expanded, the new “Manila-Americans” gained greater domination over agriculture and trade with the US, though not in manufacturing. In 1934, the US accounted for 65 percent of imports and 80 percent of exports. The Philippines became a major source of sugar, tobacco, hemp, coconut oil, and other agricultural goods and natural resources. Restrictions and quotas were imposed on Philippines commodities to protect American producers, but local production became dependent on the import of US manufactured goods and marginalized local production.

Under Spanish rule, the Catholic Church had been the principal factor in the pacification of Filipino society. Under US rule, the public school served as the most influential force in Americanizing the population, especially through English-language instruction. Spoken in public and official discourse, English eventually emerged as the primary language, facilitating the penetration of the new US colonial culture and displacing the memory of the Spanish past. Since English became the medium in education, business, and institutions, mastery of the language was necessary to advance in society. In 1911, English was adopted as the official language in courts of law.

Within the revolutionary and protest movements, the linguistic split was not easy to overcome between progressive intellectuals and the popular stratum.

Under American colonization, the separation of church and state became official and Protestantism penetrated the Philippines. However, Catholicism remained dominant, comprising 84 percent of all religious adherents in the early twentieth century, followed by other Protestant, Anglican, or independent Christian churches at 10 percent, Muslims at 5 percent, and animists at 1 percent.

To preserve itself from revolution, the Philippines Catholic Church actively intervened in support of the US conquest of the archipelago and in opposition to independence. In the 1930s, its most conservative sectors contributed to the foundation of the fascist movement of the Phalanges, composed mainly of Spaniards, Spanish mestizos, and members of the religious orders. Despite the official separation of church from state, religious institutions retained important political influence in Filipino society.

In 1916, the US replaced the Philippine Assembly with an American-style House of Representatives and Senate, elected through limited suffrage. While the democratic electoral tradition in the Philippines is deeply rooted, the system operates on the basis of formalisms that limit electoral participation to the elite, dominated by leading family clans. Far from reflecting genuine programmatic differences, party alliances and affiliations shift on the basis of power relationships and popular participation.

The American occupation forces opened the way to a triple process of colonization in the Muslim south: political and cultural subordination, appropriation of local agriculture and natural resources, and mass migration of Christian peasants from the northern and central island groups of the archipelago. With support from the US and the Philippine regime, Mindanao became an "internal" colony of settlement. The government used emigration to Mindanao as a means to reduce the agrarian economic crises in Luzon (northern) or the Visayas (central), making the Moro Muslim population a minority in their own region, outnumbered by Christian settlers and their descendants. The indigenous Lumad population now comprised a small minority of the population concentrated in the mountainous region of southern Mindanao. In the US colonial era, the conquerors and upper classes created a situation in which each of the three communities were forced to compete for control of territories and economic resources, creating the conditions of the conflict in the 1970s that culminated in mass bloodshed in the south of the archipelago.

The Emergence of New Popular Movements

No popular movements formed following the end of the Philippine–American War from 1899 to 1902 until the emergence of a diverse opposition in the 1920s. The movements of the 1920s revealed themselves through mystic secret societies and more open peasant associations and labor unions. While the desire for independence continued, the overriding mobilization emerged through efforts to improve conditions of life and work. Social movements directed their opposition against exploiters in peasant communities or industry, typically Filipino, rather than against US imperialism more generally. Through the formation of new left political parties, a link was established between social emancipation and national liberation.

In 1938, an estimated 3.5 million of approximately 4 million people were employed in the agricultural sector. Subsistence agriculture continued to decline and rice production fell, while sugar cane, coconut products, tobacco, abacá, and other export sectors grew dramatically. The process of land concentration continued in favor of haciendas and absentee landlords. In a growing number of plantations, paternalist forms of protection by landlords were less capable of mitigating relations of exploitation. Even independent peasants became sharecroppers or agricultural laborers, trends that continued into the 1940s and 1950s, but which as early as the 1920s provoked a new wave of struggle in rural areas.

In many provinces, among the urban and rural poor, secret Colorum religious organizations influenced by syncretism, unifying Catholicism and local superstitious beliefs, became powerful forces of radical protest. For example, the Colorum revived the cult of José Rizal and Apo Ipe Salvador. Revolts broke out in 1923–4 at Surigao, Samar, Leyte, Agusan, Nueva Ecija, and elsewhere, and again in 1927 revolts spread to the Visayas. As many as 10,000 to 25,000 protesters joined the religious uprisings, but due to violent repression most movements did not survive the arrest or death of their charismatic leaders.

Protest movements were most politicized in Central Luzon, where the rate of tenancy was exceptionally high and proximity to Manila permitted numerous contacts with urban workers. Mutual aid societies were created but, because of the influence of political clientelism, peasant movements frequently split among supporters of the Nacionalista and Democrata parties.

The first Tenant Congress was held in the capital in 1922, marking the foundation of the National Confederation of Tenants and Farm Laborers of the Philippines (Katipunan ng mga Manggagawa sa Pilipinas). The second Tenant Congress, held in 1924, issued a call to the American progressive forces to assist the independence struggle. Jacinto Manahan was its president and Juan Felco vice-president. Manahan met Chinese communist leaders in Shanghai in 1927. A year later, the organization took the name of the National Confederation of Peasants of the Philippines (Katipunan Pambansa ng mga Magbubukid ng Pilipinas, KPMP), affiliated with the Christentern or Peasant International. However, in 1930 the main organization remained the National Peasants' Union (Pambansang Kaisahan ng mga Magbubukid, PKM). The PKM assisted members in obtaining bank credits to purchase plantation land to sell back plots at low prices to tenants. This organization sought to "humanize" the relationships between owners and tenants of the land.

Labor Unions

The first non-religious labor unions were founded by the ilustrados to pursue the nationalist propaganda of reforming capital–labor relationships, promoting mutual assistance, and fulfilling tasks of civic education. In 1902 Isabelo de los Reyes, which soon changed its name to Union Obrera Democratica (UOD), then Union del Trabajo de Filipina, pursued a course of class accommodation before dissolving in 1907, making way for organizations that were influenced by European socialist and anarchist currents.

The class character of militant unions strengthened progressively in the early twentieth century. In 1906 the Union of Ipresores de Filipinas (a split-off from the UOD) adopted the slogan: "The emancipation of the workers shall be realized by the workers themselves." Felipe Mendoza was president and Cristo Evangelista secretary general. In 1907 the unions prohibited employers from being members. But independence did not yet assume a political nature, and union leaders continued to support one of the major large Filipino clientelist parties.

During World War I, as industrial production advanced, unions gained a degree of power. In 1913, the Congress Obrero de Filipina (COF) was established and May 1 was officially celebrated for the first time. COF demanded legislation for the eight-hour workday, protection of women and children, and employers' liability for injuries. In 1917, the union was split again over support for Nationalists or Democrats.

While the broader labor movement was divided, tethered to the major parties and often corrupt, a left tendency nevertheless asserted itself. Cristo Evangelista, a unionist since 1906, founder of COF, and a middle-ranking cadre in the Nacionalista Party, was radicalized after a trip to Washington, DC in 1919 on the occasion of an independence mission. In 1924, Evangelista created the Workers' Party of the Philippines (Partido Obrero de Filipinas) with Cirilo Bognot. In 1927 COF affiliated with the Red International of Labor Unions in Moscow. During the return trip, Evangelista and Bognot met the Chinese communist leader Zhou Enlai in Shanghai.

In 1929, Evangelista split with COF, founding the Congreso Obrero de Filipinas (Proletariat), known also as KAP (Katipunan ng mga Anak-Pawis ng Filipinas). Under Evangelista as first executive secretary and Jacinto Manahan as vice-president, KAP sought to unify urban and rural workers, advance social progress, national independence, internationalism, and a government of the people, and establish a Soviet system in the Philippines.

Birth of the Communist Movement and Social Struggles

The communist movement of the Philippines was not an artificial creation, although it was not widespread in the country. Communists were rooted in the authentic radicalization of popular forces. By 1924, Marxist influences were already prominent in the Workers' Party of the Philippines, a precursor of the Communist Party of the Philippines (PKP). The PKP was officially proclaimed on November 7, 1930. Most officers of the KAP became central committee members. KAP quickly faced repression, especially following a wave of strikes in Negros Occidental and Iloilo. One of the leaders, Antonio Ora, died in a car accident after being arrested in dubious circumstances. More than 10,000 people demonstrated in protest on January 25, 1931. In February the members of KAP were victimized by a new wave of arrests and condemnations for sedition, and subsequently the party was declared illegal. The majority of communist leaders were liberated in December 1936 and PKP began again to function legally in October 1937, running two candidates for election.

The Socialist Party (PS) was also founded in 1929 by Pedro Abad Santos, son of a landowner from Central Luzon. Santos participated in the resistance against the American conquest, was arrested, and was liberated in 1902. In 1917 Santos was elected to the Philippine Assembly. Santos was quite popular in the peasantry through his blend of radical and realist traditions. In 1938, when the Socialist Party merged with PKP, Santos became vice-chairman. At the end of 1940, he led or influenced around 40 militant workers and peasant organizations, including the General Workers' Union (AMT), Philippine Confederation of Peasants (KPMP), and KAP, totaling no fewer than 200,000 members. Rooted essentially in Central Luzon and the capital, it was still far from reaching a national scale. On an organizational level, the merger between PS and PKP allied two very different traditions.

Other progressive political currents had a larger influence in the 1930s than the communists, in particular the Sakdalistes of Benigno Ramos, with a radical anti-colonial program that was critical of the educational system and opposed to US military bases and US control of the Philippines economy. Sakdalistes won important electoral victories, politicizing popular peasant and working-class sentiment. But Ramos eventually broke with his radical base and the movement was short-lived. However, the PKP is historically the most significant revolutionary movement of the 1930s.

Popular struggles developed during the years that followed the world economic crisis of 1929. On May 1, 1935, 30,000 workers demonstrated for the Republic of Soviets. However, these struggles were often led by semi-religious and messianic movements, or otherwise led on a purely economic program. The crushing of strikes could provoke cases of armed resistance, with urban cadres having to flee into the mountains, as Teodoro Asedillo had done; he was killed in 1935. Growing sectors of the peasantry were demanding the distribution of land, and the organization of agricultural workers spread in the plantations.

The Philippine president, Manuel Quezon, responded to social agitation by adopting a Social Justice Program, with reference to the American New Deal of Roosevelt, leading to greater freedom of association for labor unions. Otherwise, as in the past, the powerful provincial families blocked the implementation of progressive laws. The landlords had independent private armies and links within the police and judiciary. Conflicts led sometimes, as in 1940 in Central Luzon, to triangular tension between the socialist-communist left, political forces favorable to Quezon, and the hard-line right-wing sectors of the church, Phalanges, and wealthy members of the dominant classes.

World War II

During World War II, Philippine progressive organizations tested the limits of the diverse national liberation movement for independence. Although incapable of protecting the archipelago, the prestige of the US, and in particular General Douglas MacArthur, was enhanced by Japanese occupation. In the Philippine national movement as a whole, the position of those passively waiting for independence to be granted (in 1946) was strengthened. The communist movement was forced to respond to the radicalism of the social struggles in its Central Luzon strongholds as it simultaneously sought to implement a United Front policy with Moscow.

The Philippine pre-war government was allied to the US, but after the defeat at the hands of Japan, many dignitaries of the Commonwealth and members of the elite sided with the Japanese administration for tactical or more complicated reasons. The Catholic Church did not oppose Tokyo, with whom the Vatican was on friendly terms, while the Protestant churches of American origin were suppressed. Japan was thus positioned to rapidly create a Philippine Executive Commission and proclaim the Republic in October 1943. Japan favored the development of Tagalog literature and secondary education.

Even before the Pacific War broke out, the Spanish embassy played the role of agent for the Axis forces, in liaison with Philippine Phalangists. Thus the extreme right, including its (semi-)fascist wing, had roots in the archipelago, and as in other Asian countries, some nationalists turned to Tokyo. However, as a whole, the population rejected Japanese occupation and its violence, repression, exploitation, and cultural shock. Most Filipinos sympathized more with the US, considering themselves superior to the Japanese, and resisted the Pan-Asian nationalist ideologies.

The Japanese invasion of December 1941, the Battle of Bataan, and the Death March that followed provoked a strong emotional identification of Filipinos with Americans. In many Asian countries, the western defeats against the Japanese (since 1905) weakened the prestige of the imperialist metropolis, reinforcing revolutionary nationalisms. Despite strong nationalist sentiment in the Philippines, World War II refocused attention away from restoration of a radical national conscience.

In 1941, the merged Communist and Socialist parties (PKP-SP) formed a popular front with trade unions and left peasant organizations, the Aglipayan Church (independent Catholics), and professionals. Moscow was then allied with the US. Consequently, the PKP projected a policy of a larger anti-fascist front. In December 1941, it issued a declaration claiming its loyalty toward the Commonwealth and Washington in the name of anti-Japanese national union. But simultaneously it announced the will to organize its own guerilla forces and its liberated zones.

In fact, the policy of anti-Japanese national union could never become concrete. The American command, which had the upper hand against the Philippine resistance, never considered the Communist Party and its networks as allies. No other significant guerilla force cooperated politically with those of the PKP.

The Birth of the Huks

The main leaders of the merged party, Evangelista and Abad Santos, were arrested by the Japanese in January 1942. The former was executed and the latter died in a guerilla zone in 1943, soon after his liberation. That did not stop the creation of the People's Anti-Japanese Army in Central Luzon, the Hukbo ng bayan Laban sa Hapon, better known under the acronym Hukbalahap or Huks for short. The Huks were officially formed on March 29, 1942 from armed groups operating in the provinces of Pampanga, Bulacan, and Nueva Ecija. Its military committee was composed of Luis Tarac (chairman), Casto Alejandro (vice-chairman), Felipa Culala (Dayang-Dayang), Bernado Poblete (Banal) as members, with Mateo del Catillo as political advisor.

Two main documents were embraced: "The Fundamental Spirit" (guiding principles) and "The Iron Discipline" (duties and privileges of a Huk soldier). Equality between officers and soldiers was proclaimed, and the link with and respect of the population were considered absolutely compulsory. The implementation of such principles was not automatic – Felipa Culala (Dayang-Dayang) was executed for corruption and robbery, and recruitment was sometimes too rapid to assure the quality of members. The Huks published a clandestine weekly called Katubusan ng Bayan (Redemption of the People), and theatrical groups helped build political consciousness. Self-defense units, local government bodies (in the villages, the town, and up to the provincial level), and a judiciary system were established. The Chinese Communist Party was a model for the Huks (one of their military units was composed of Chinese living in the Philippines).

The problem remained how to reconcile class struggles in Central Luzon's countryside and the policy of a united front against Japan. According to the official line, it meant attacking landlords collaborating with Japan while proposing an alliance with the others. Likewise, the Huks renounced the creation of a central popular government, but preserved their independence of action in the regions under their control. The pressure of a radical trend was felt in Central Luzon's strongholds, where peasants and local military units often refused to renounce their social objectives in the name of national union. However, the situation remained much less tense in most other regions. As long as the occupation persisted, the leadership of PKP and the Huks kept these contradictions under control. However, it did not prepare itself politically for the new conflicts that emerged after victory, and which were in fact already shaping in early 1945: clashes became frequent between the Huks and the guerilla units linked to the command of MacArthur, which wanted to take control right away of “communist” territories.

Aftermath of the War

The Hukbalahap movement was an exception as a protest movement in the archipelago and Filipino resistance to Japanese occupation was mostly passive. Except for rare cases, the other guerilla groups linked to MacArthur’s command entered effectively into action only at the time of the American reconquest: the US forces landed on the island of Leyte in October 1944 and triumphantly entered Manila on February 3, 1945, in an atmosphere of exaltation and rejoicing, even in Central Luzon.

It seems that then the PKP leadership really hoped that the Hukbalahap and the party would be integrated into the political life of the country. It adopted a program that was radically anti-fascist and anti-collaborationist, but otherwise moderate. It presented itself as a popular pressure group. To manifest its goodwill, it handed over to the US command a list of guerilla members. Faced with the intransigence of MacArthur, it placed its hopes on Roosevelt. Nothing happened. In the name of the “communist danger,” a huge bloc of established interests opposed the PKP, including the American military services, the upper classes of Luzon, the police constabulary and guerilla forces, former collaborators, and the elites that Washington wanted to spare to prepare independence.

In January 1945, Huk units, having accepted disarmament after the arrival of Americans in their region, were massacred. National leaders like Luis Taruc were arrested and detained several times. The PKP retorted by organizing mass demonstrations, then by creating a Democratic Alliance with other small groups. But the repression in Central Luzon intensified, and civil war erupted in 1946.

Independence

While the US administration refused any compromise with the Hukbalahap and the PKP, it was quick to support Filipino elites who collaborated with Japan. Thus MacArthur chose Manuel Roxas, a former minister in Salvador Laurel’s pro-Japan government, as first president of an independent Philippines. Washington preferred restoration to revolution and primarily sought an indefectible ally to negotiate conditions of independence. The Bell Trade Act guaranteed the maintenance of quotas protecting the agricultural sector in the US, fixed a favorable exchange rate between the peso and the dollar, and granted US citizens and firms equal rights as Filipinos in the exploitation of natural resources. The Military Base Agreement gave the US the freedom to use 23 sites for its military for 99 years.

With the support of MacArthur, Roxas won the legislative elections of April 28, 1946 and became president, with the proclamation of independence on July 4. He knew how to show his gratitude. In a speech at the American National Congress he declared that Filipinos were not “from the East apart from geography. We belong to the Western World by reason of culture, of religion, of ideology, and of economy. Although the color of our skin is brown, the temperament of our spirit and hearts are nearly identical to yours. . . . You have within us a partner of your political and economic system – a radio station broadcasting Americanism.”

Is it possible to imagine a Thai prime minister or an Indonesian general making a declaration so degrading for the national identity? This speaks volumes for the degree of “Americanization” of the Philippine elites.

SEE ALSO: Bonifacio, Andres (1863–1897); Huk Rebellion, 1946–1954; Philippines, Colonial Protests during the Spanish Era; Philippines, Protests, 1950s–1970s; Philippines, Protests, 1980s–Present; Rizal, José (1861–1896)

References and Suggested Readings

- Abaya, H. J. (1970) Betrayal in the Philippines. New York: A. A. Wyn.
- Agoncillo, T. A. & Guerrero, M. (1973) History of the Filipino People, 4th ed. Quezon City: R. P. Garcia.
- Ahmad, A. (2000) Class and Colony in Mindanao. In K. Gaerlan & M. Stankovitch (Eds.), Rebels, Warlords, and Ulama: A Reader on Muslim Separatism and the War in Southern Philippines. Quezon City: Institute for Popular Democracy.

- Aluit, A. J. (1995) By Sword and Fire: The Destruction of Manila in World War II, 3 February–3 March 1945. Makati (Metro Manila): Bookmark.
- Constantino, R. (1975) History of the Philippines: From the Spanish Colonization to the Second World War. New York: Monthly Review Press.
- Constantino, R. (1978) Neocolonial Identity and Counter Consciousness: Essays on Cultural Decolonization. London: Merlin Press.
- George, T. J. S. (1980) Revolt in Mindanao: The Rise of Islam in Philippine Politics. Kuala Lumpur: Oxford University Press.
- Go, J. & Foster, A. L. (Eds.) (2003) The American Colonial State in the Philippines: Global Perspectives. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Gowing, P. G. (1983) Mandae in Moroland: The American Government of Muslim Filipinos 1899–1920. Quezon City: New Day Publisher.
- Ileto, R. C. (1998) Filipinos and their Revolution: Event, Discourse, and Historiography. Manila: Ateneo de Manila University Press.
- McCoy, A. (Ed.) (1994) An Anarchy of Families: State and Family in the Philippines. Manila: Ateneo de Manila University Press.
- San Juan, Jr., E. (1988) Only by Struggle. Quezon City: Kalikasan Press.
- Schirmer, D. B. & Shalom, S. R. (1987) The Philippines Reader: A History of Colonialism, Dictatorship, and Resistance. Boston: South End Press.
- Yu, R. & Bolasco, M. (1981) Church–State Relations. Manila: St. Scholastica's College.

Philippines, protests, 1950s–1970s

Pierre Rousset

After the defeat of the Huk's revolutionary struggle in the Philippines, progressive politics focused on the moderate nationalism of Claro M. Recto. However, in the late 1960s, with a new wave of youth radicalization, communist groups took back the political initiative, before they split sharply over the Sino-Soviet conflict.

Nationalism of Claro M. Recto

In the 1950s a moderate, unstructured, nationalist movement formed around the lawyer Carlo M. Recto and progressively radicalized. He introduced a critical vision of the subordination of the Philippines vis-à-vis the United States beyond the groups traditionally influenced by the left. He adopted the theme cherished by Indian prime minister Jawaharlal Nehru – “Asia for the Asians” – identifying internationally with the non-aligned camp. Recto entered into conflict with the Catholic Church when he urged that the works of Jose Rizal (which contained attacks against the friars) be part of the compulsory syllabus of universities and colleges.

In a time of repression, Recto helped create a space within which social resistance could be expressed. Nevertheless, radical unions such as the Congress of Labor Organizations (CLO) suffered when conditions were created to favor a unionism of class collaboration with the adoption of the Minimum Wage Act in 1951, the Industrial Peace Act in 1954, and procedures of collective bargaining centered on enterprise. A Jesuit, Father Walter Hogan, initiated the constitution of the Federation of Free Workers (FFW) in 1950 and the Federation of Free Farmers (FFF) in 1953. With the help of American institutions, the Asian Labor Education Center (University of the Philippines) was founded in 1954, and later the Institute of Social Order (Ateneo de Manila University).

In September 1954 the Southeast Asia Collective Defense Treaty was signed in Manila. The Philippines and Thailand were the only founding members from the region of SEATO. Recto abstained on this issue in the Senate. He opposed sending troops to Vietnam and denounced, in the Philippines, the extraterritorial de facto right benefiting the Americans.

During the presidency of Carlo P. Garcia (elected in 1957 after the accidental death of Magsaysay), the Philippine capital was able to consolidate in various sectors like pharmacy, food, and wood. However, in 1961, Diosdado Macapagal became president. He attacked the nationalist legacy of Recto and Garcia. He announced the restoration of free enterprise, reestablished good relations with the United States, and ended protectionist measures. It was the start of “dependant industrialization” under the tutelage of the IMF and World Bank. At the same time, in order to reduce social tensions, Macapagal launched an agrarian reform program: it included progressive measures, but also many exemptions, legal loopholes, and lack of financing, which considerably reduced its significance. The political impact of this program was nevertheless felt. Without a sufficiently solid popular base, the nationalist current of Claro M. Recto was unable to pass the test.

Birth of New Militant Organizations

The American hold over the Philippines, the social upheavals provoked by capitalist development, and the direct implication of the country in the Indochina war gave way to a new wave of radicalism with a strong anti-imperialist character. Beginning in the 1960s, new militant organizations emerged in all the main social sectors: wage earners, peasants, and youth (not only student youth). They denounced American imperialism. They closely linked national and social issues. They combined cultural nationalism (the difficult search for Philippine identity), political nationalism (against foreign interference), and popular nationalism (mass struggles were considered a prerequisite to the creation of a relationship of forces favorable to liberation). Revolutionary nationalism was seen as a field where unity between movements and sectors could be achieved.

With the revival of communist influence, an intense political conflict developed within the left around three emblematic personalities: Jose Lava (who was freed from jail in 1970) of the PKP (Filipino Communist Party), Luis Taruc (freed in 1968) – who then identified with social Christianity – and a young newcomer, Jose Maria Sison, who was born in 1939 and quickly appeared as one of the main figures of the 1960s militant generation. The adoption by Luis Taruc, and later by Jose Lava, of the “peaceful” or “parliamentary” road was initially a tactical answer to the decline and defeat of armed struggle. The evolution of the international situation helped give a more general ideological content to this political choice. The bloody repression in 1965–6 of the Indonesian Communist Party and of all progressive movements had a deep impact in the Philippine left, not only because of the geographical proximity of the two archipelagos, but also because the PKI had been a key reference for the militants. The Indonesian bloodbath contributed to the demoralization of former PKP leaders, while it convinced many revolted youngsters of the absurdity of peaceful means.

Significant developments occurred in the labor and peasant movements. However, contrary to the political passivity of students in the 1950s, youth were a key element of the radicalization of the 1960s and early 1970s. Mobilizations began in the University of the Philippines (UP) on the occasion of a nationalist and anti-clerical campaign. New militant organizations were created during this whole decade. At first, they often embodied all the components of the Philippine left, which was then in contact with its radical counterpart in Europe and the United States. More than in the past, it was a pluralist left, with the presence of anti-Stalinist Marxists or Christian socialists.

The PKP – the “old” Communist Party – was hoping to take advantage of this militant revival to reorganize itself, but part of its youth sector, led by Jose Maria Sison, split off. The principal confrontation was then the Kabataan Makabayan (KM, Patriotic Youth) of Sison and the Samahan ng Demokratikong Kabataan (SDK, Union of Democratic Youth) of Sixto Carlos on one side, and the Malayang Pagkakaisa ng Kabataang Pilipino (MPKP, Free Association of Filipino Youth) and the Bertrand Russell Foundation (Philippine Council), with Francisco Nemenzo Jr. as chairman, on the other.

Ideological confrontation was progressively framed by the Sino-Soviet conflict: the PKP eventually joined the pro-Moscow camp, while Jose Maria Sison won over the radical left to Maoism. In 1968 his new party was officially founded on Mao Zedong’s birthday (December 26). Its full name was Communist Party of the Philippines Marxist-Leninist Mao Tsetung Thought (CPP-MLMTT). To differentiate it from the “former” Communist Party – PKP in Tagalog – it is known under the English initials of CPP. Beginning in 1969, Bernabe Buscayno brought to the CPP a group of young Huks of the second generation.

From FQS to Martial Law

Two years after the French May ’68 events and the uprisings on US and Mexican campuses, the student struggle took a radical turn in the Philippines. A rally was brutally suppressed on January 26, 1970. On January 30 four students were killed and many more wounded during a demonstration: the Battle of Mendiola (from the name of the bridge leading to Malacanang Palace, the presidential palace) initiated three months of occupation of campuses and repeated demonstrations with tens of thousands of militants – three months of intense mobilization known in the history of the archipelago as the First Quarter Storm (FQS).

The student struggles knew other high points, like the Diliman Commune, a one-week occupation of the campus of the University of Philippines in Quezon City, in February 1971. The KM attracted student radicalism, but it also oriented it outside the university. It enjoined students to go to the masses, to learn from them and to prepare for a rural armed struggle. This did not constitute an option for the student movement as a whole. The FQS was thus followed by a period of stagnation during which the radical left lost numerous positions in university elections. The movement represented by Sison was on the rise, but political space still remained open to other trends on the left.

Everything changed on September 21, 1972. Already elected twice, Ferdinand Marcos should have given way to another presidential candidate: the Philippine constitution did not allow a president to present himself for a third consecutive mandate. To stay in power, he chose to impose martial law. Thus, he opened a new chapter in the history of the country and of the popular struggles.

SEE ALSO: Huk Rebellion, 1946–1954; Mao Zedong (1893–1976); Philippines, Colonial Protests during the Spanish Era; Philippines, Protest during the US Era

References and Suggested Readings

- Agoncillo, T. A. & Guerrero, M. (1973) History of the Filipino People. Quezon City: R. P. Garcia.
- Constantin, R. (1965) The Recto Reader: Excerpts from the Speeches of Claro M. Recto. Manila: Recto Memorial Foundation.
- Constantin, R. & Constantino, L. R. (1978) The Philippines: The Continuing Past. Quezon City: Foundation for Nationalist Studies.
- Lacaba, J. F. (1986) Days of Disquiet, Nights of Rage: The First Quarter Storm and Related Events. Manila: Asphodel Books.
- McCoy, A. W. & De Jesus, E. C. (Eds.) (1982) Philippine Social History: Global Trade and Local Transformations. ASAA Southeast Asia Publication Series. Manila: Ateneo de Manila University Press.
- San Juan, E., Jr. (1988) Only by Struggle. Quezon City: Kalikasan Press.
- Schirmer, D. B. & Shalom, S. R. (1987) The Philippines Reader. A History of Colonialism, Dictatorship, and Resistance. Boston: South End Press.

Philippines, protests, 1980s–present

Pierre Rousset

Martial Law Regime

The imposition of martial law in the Philippines on September 21, 1972 had very deep consequences quite different from those foreseen by its promoters. Far from being a one-off measure, it was lifted formally only in 1981 – and only after the 1986 February Revolution brought to an end more than 13 years of what opponents called the “Marcos dictatorship.”

The purpose of martial law was not initially to implement a policy of counterinsurgency. No revolutionary movement seriously threatened the established order. It aimed at more specific goals: to stop social radicalization and prevent the left from reorganizing after the failure of the Huks, to ensure that no disturbances interfered with the renegotiation of the agreement for US military bases on the archipelago. Washington was particularly concerned that nationalist pressure was making itself felt in institutions, far beyond anti-imperialist circles. Senator José Diokno was leading an investigation into the operations of oil multinationals and the Supreme Court was facing up to the American business lobby. Everything had to be done to ensure that the Philippines remained one of the main pillars of the US security system in Asia.

In the longer term, the US wanted the martial law regime to create a strong, centralized state as a means to “modernize” the country – to end the fragmentation of power between the state and provincial political families and their private armies. The duly reinforced government army was one of the key elements of this policy of “nation building.” Ferdinand Marcos seemed to Washington to be the man for the job. Already elected president in 1965 with support from Washington and reelected in 1969 in a violent and fraudulent election, he was no longer eligible to run for the presidency, since the constitution only allowed two successive terms. Under martial law, Marcos could remain in power and the suspension of civil liberties would give him a free hand.

However, the US strategy of “modernization” of the Philippines was flawed from the outset, relying as it did on the Marcos clan which, during a seven-year presidency, had developed an efficient clientelist network. With the proclamation of martial law, Marcos was quick to privatize the public treasury and the national state to his and his cronies' advantage. By way of modernization, Ferdinand Marcos and his wife Imelda imposed a "conjugal dictatorship," perhaps the most corrupt and nepotistic regime ever in the Philippines.

The imposition of martial law represented a major turning point for the archipelago, placing the army at the heart of the political regime. Within the social elite, martial law upset relationships among oligarchic families, while conditions for leftist activity were radically altered. Minority populations were prompted into armed resistance. All sectors of the opposition were affected by a wave of repression. Thousands of opponents and activists were arrested and torture against detainees was widespread. Congress was closed, the media were censored, and judges were forced to hand over undated letters of resignation to the president.

War in the South

The south of the archipelago, inhabited by the Moros (Muslims), was considered by the government in Manila as an economic frontier to be taken over. The Philippine state had never recognized the Moros' or Lumads' (non-Muslim hill tribes) ancestral domains. Marcos issued a ruling that almost 90 percent of property in the south was "public," and therefore could be allocated as he saw fit. The internal colonization of Mindanao by mostly Christian peasants was encouraged to reduce the agrarian crisis in the center and north of the country while marginalizing the Moros, who ultimately found themselves a minority in their own land. Powerful Philippine families and US or Japanese multinationals created vast fruit plantations, developed mining activities, or freely logged forests.

Richly endowed with natural resources, Mindanao provided an increasing share of exports, including fruit, coconut, and wood. But the local population had not benefited from this economic boom. Poor peasants who settled in the promised land of Mindanao generally remained poor, while rich Filipinos and foreigners investing in the island became richer. However, the policy of internal colonization gave an interconfessional and intercommunity twist to the many agrarian and territorial conflicts. The Philippine establishment denigrated Moro culture, while Christian missionaries became active. Moros and Lumads were oppressed and exploited, enduring extreme poverty, illiteracy, lack of health care, and shortened life expectancy and facing numerous armed attacks to drive them from their lands.

Territorial dispossession and cultural or religious oppression sparked a revival of armed resistance, and in the late 1960s Moro nationalism began to assert itself. The Moro National Liberation Front (MNLF) was formed in 1972, the year Marcos declared martial law, receiving international support in Malaysia and Libya among other Muslim countries. The MNLF managed to recruit up to 30,000 combatants. The bulk of the Philippine army was mobilized against it and war raged from 1972 to 1976, with later periods of negotiations interspersed with fighting.

The Left: Baptism of Fire

The martial law regime ruthlessly suppressed the left, including the Philippine Communist Party (PKP). The dictatorship physically eliminated PKP cadres that opposed the government, while few members within academia retained influence in theoretical debates. While the PKP maintained international links with the pro-Moscow communist parties worldwide, in the Philippines it ceased to be an active component of the left.

Leaders of the PKP, like Francisco Nemenzo, and rural units of the party (in Central Luzon) that refused to surrender were unable to rebuild a significant organization. This was also true for Christian Socialists and independent Marxist intellectuals. Many leftist organizations disintegrated, including a small Trotskyist group, or were paralyzed, while the social democrats (SDs) in the Philippines remained bound to the Jesuits.

National Democratic Movement

The national democratic movement was politically in a better position. Structured by the Communist Party of the Philippines (CPP), from the start it sought to initiate armed struggle.

Only 14 delegates participated in the CPP Congress, which had only 20 or so founding members and some 75 close sympathizers. The New People's Army (NPA) was formally established in March 1969 with about 65 members, equipped with 35 firearms (including only nine automatic rifles). But the new party was a promising starting point. The chairman, José Maria "Joma" Sison, alias Amado Guerrero, was a figurehead for radicalized youth who identified with Maoism in the late 1960s. He was joined by Sixto Carlos (from the Union of Democratic Youth, SDK) and Rodolpho "Rudy" Salas (aka Bilog).

To a large extent the CPP was the product of a fusion between José Maria Sison and the insurgency organizations of Bernabe Buscayno (Kumander Dante), who had headed an armed group in the peasant uprising of the 1940s and 1950s and then a group of second-generation Huks who had severed links with the PKP – the "old" Communist Party. Buscayno offered the new party military experience and roots in rural Central Luzon. He became commander in chief of the NPA, while Sison was head of the party military commission. In 1970, a group of young army officers led by Victor Corpuz rallied the movement. Four years after its inception in 1972, the "new" Communist Party had 2,000 underground activists, often living in slums and villages.

The National Democratic Front (NDF) was established in April 1973, using the shock of martial law to convince various organizations and personalities to join the movement. In 1977, Horacio "Boy" Morales, the executive vice-president of the Development Academy of the Philippines, made front page news when he announced that he had joined the underground.

Christians for National Liberation

Father Ed de la Torre favored a theology of struggle and in February 1972 founded Christians for National Liberation (CNL). CNL members were essential participants in the national democratic movement, both in public life and underground. Philippines communism included secular, atheist, and anti-clerical tendencies. Before martial law, Sison's Kabataang Makabayan (Nationalist Youth) had fought in the universities against the Catholic student movement led by Christian Social Democrats. However, in their mass activism – among workers, villagers, and poor urban communities – communists worked with priests, seminarians, and religious activists who rejected the dictatorship. By linking with religious groups, the CPP strengthened its roots and recruited new cadres.

CNL's relationship with the NDF was, however, ambivalent. From the outset CNL provided the NDF with a broader basis than either the CPP or the NPA. Pushed underground by the dictatorship, CNL was logistically dependent on the Communist Party, which never allowed the Front to develop an independent national structure.

Failure of the Philippine "Yan'an"

Less than four years after its foundation, the CPP needed to expand under a harsh dictatorial regime, an arduous task. From the late 1960s to the early 1970s, the CPP took the momentous decision to concentrate on building up a few stable NPA base areas in Central and Northern Luzon, most significantly in the provinces of Tarlac, Isabela, and Bicol. These isolated revolutionary groups were brutally suppressed by the government army and most of the NPA survivors sought refuge in the cities.

The CPP wanted to create a Philippine "Yan'an," referring to the base area where Mao's Red Army had settled after the legendary Long March. It was a misinterpretation of the Chinese experience: the Red Army had been born out of mass revolutionary uprisings and the Long March was a forced retreat rather than a free choice. Joma Sison had unsuccessfully sought to reproduce a strategic Chinese model in the Philippines. His response to this failure was Specific Characteristics of Our People's War (1974), which took into account the peculiarities of the Philippines experience. Focusing mainly on geographic data (the fact that the Philippines was a mountainous archipelago) and the fact that it was dominated by US imperialism, he concluded that the armed struggle had to begin simultaneously in various parts of the territory to disperse enemy forces from the beginning. The updating of the CPP's strategy continued with the adoption by its Central Committee of a resolution, Our Urgent Tasks (1976), stressing the need to undertake mass action in all popular sectors and give greater importance to semi-legal and urban activities.

The reorientation of the mid-1970s was only partial as the party's ideology remained a version of Maoism from the period of the Chinese Cultural Revolution. Joma Sison adhered to a simplified vision of the history of the Chinese Communist Party, often far removed from reality. He did not seek to assimilate the experience of other liberation struggles (in Vietnam, Cuba, or elsewhere) and blurred the originality of the Philippines social formation by defining it as “semi-feudal” or “semi-colonial” without using the word “capitalist.” Sison’s 1970 book Philippine Society and Revolution remained the party’s Bible, which stressed the primacy of rural work and the armed struggle.

However, the mid-1970s reorientation (and the great courage of the national democratic activists) was sufficient for the CPP to regain the initiative. Its timing was appropriate. After several years of inactivity, social struggles resumed while the bulk of the government army remained entrenched against the MNLF in the south of the archipelago. In October 1975, a strike by 5,000 workers at La Tondeña distillery in Manila opened a brief period of workers’ struggles.

Armed Struggle and Social Resistance

The early years of martial law proved difficult for the Communist Party. After the destruction of the initial guerilla units, the bulk of the leadership was arrested in 1976–7, including José Maria Sison, his wife Juliet, and Bernabe Buscayno. Nevertheless, the party redeployed its forces, expanding its social base and creating guerilla fronts in a growing number of islands. In 1980 social protests erupted again in factories and slums, which helped the CPP to strengthen its semi-legal networks, its trade union influence, and its community organizing among the urban poor fighting eviction, such as in the giant slum Zone One Tondo (ZOTO). Thus the CPP was able to promote the creation of new sectoral popular organizations, sometimes national in scope.

The Philippine agrarian structure remained highly diverse. In the mid-1980s about 10 million people were employed in agriculture, of whom 15 percent had a land title, 15 percent tilled public sector land and did not have a land title, 20 percent rented their land from landowners, and 50 percent were permanent or seasonal agricultural workers. While unreliable, these statistics give an idea of the nature of rural labor, although they conceal the complexity of the relationships of domination. For example, a small farmer under contract to a multinational company might be in a state of dependence worthy of a landless peasant, while a farm worker subjected to exploitation and hunger might aspire to become a farmer. The situation was different where the capitalist market had grown widely, as in Luzon, and where, as in the particularly poor island of Samar, agricultural self-sufficiency and traditional village structures were still important.

The peasantry was usually directly organized by the NPA around a gradual land reform program. In large plantations, however, the CPP supported the creation of unions. Thus, in the same region and in the same economic sector, producers could be organized differently. For example in Negros, small sugar cane producers living on the mountain slopes were under the NPA while workers in large plantations were organized by the National Federation of Sugar Workers (NFSW).

The Communist Party adapted to local conditions. The perspective of overthrowing the Marcos dictatorship through armed struggle gave a common purpose to urban and rural organizing in the various social sectors and islands. Because of the primacy of armed struggle, the CPP sometimes radicalized workers’ strikes to the point that union activists had to go into hiding to escape repression. By joining the NPA, the CPP contributed, in the words of the party, to the “proletarianization” of the guerillas. The CPP’s policy provoked tensions among trade unionists seeking to consolidate their social base in the factories. However, the May First Movement (Kilusang Mayo Uno, KMU) was founded in 1980 to defend class struggle unionism against the official Philippine labor confederation, the TUCP, which collaborated with the dictatorship although it was recognized internationally by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU).

The legal component of the national democratic movement grew considerably during the first half of 1980. The women’s umbrella organization GABRIELA was created in 1984, and in 1985 the Peasant Movement of the Philippines (Kilusang Magbubukid ng Pilipinas, KMP). The multi-sectoral coalition Bagong Alyansang Makabayan (New Patriotic Alliance) – Bayan for short (a Tagalog word meaning both nation and people) – brought together all the organizations identified with the national democratic bloc, as well as a few others, including the League of Filipino Students (LFS), the Medical Action Group (MAG), and the Alliance for Concerned Teachers (ACT).

The underground component of the movement also strengthened significantly. According to the CPP publication Ang Bayan, the party had 10,000 members in 1980 and around 30,000 in 1983. The number of military fronts increased from 28 to 45, the number of rifles from 4,000 to 10,000, the number of full- and part-time NPAs from 8,000 to 20,000, and the number of provinces where guerrillas operated from 43 to 53.

The Decisive Years: 1983–1987

In the early 1980s, the dictatorship was clearly in crisis. In the aftermath of World War II, the Philippines had been seen as the best-placed Southeast Asian country in the race for development. It was now the poor man of the region – and the only one where a communist guerilla was growing. The Marcos dictatorship was not the only culprit in this failure: the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and World Bank were clearly implicated as well. The authority of the regime and of the international financial institutions declined, while contradictions within the ruling class became more acute.

It was at this point that Benigno “Ninoy” Aquino decided to return to the Philippines. A key figure of the moderate bourgeois opposition, he represented a major clan that had been excluded from power by the dictatorship. He was murdered on August 21, 1983 on the tarmac of Manila international airport, which now bears his name. For all sectors of the opposition, this assassination represented a declaration of war, signaling that the Marcos regime was not ready for any concessions.

Mobilizations against the dictatorship rose rapidly. The urban middle classes took to the streets in their thousands. Sectors of the Philippine left that had been marginalized as a result of martial law found a new political space. Contacts were established between a Christian Socialist movement represented by Ronald Llamas (which had some popular roots in poor urban districts), cadres who had previously broken away from the PKP (among them Francisco Nemenzo), and independent Marxist intellectuals (such as Randolph David). These contacts led in 1986 to the creation of Bisig, an independent socialist organization.

The manner in which the Marcos regime descended into crisis did not correspond with the CPP blueprint. Its leadership’s vision was for a “gradualist” strategy, in which a military stalemate had to be reached before the question of power could be raised. This was far from being the case in the mid-1980s. Thus, a decisive section of CPP’s leadership failed to recognize the depth of the regime’s crisis, which was developing under unanticipated conditions with mass mobilization in the cities at its center rather than rural armed struggle.

The political experience of the CPP and the national democratic movement was much richer than the official program would suggest. But it was no longer sufficient to “adapt” the line to regional conditions, as several territorial or sector leaderships had already done. The emphasis had to be shifted to the national level, which could not be achieved without the agreement of the executive committee.

The issue of united front policies and alliances was posed in new terms with the revival of pluralism on the left. Underground, the NDF began opening up, proposing to include political organizations independent of the CPP. But in 1982 the movement was dealt several serious blows: the murder of the highly regarded Edgar Jopson by the military, and the arrests of Isagani Serrano, a member of the party’s executive secretariat, Boy Morales, chairman of the NDF, and Ed de la Torre, the founder of CNL. The transformation of the NDF did not occur.

Similar developments occurred above ground. Broad ad hoc coalitions were created, and some party members wanted the umbrella organization Bayan to include a wide range of non-CPP-led movements. But, although it was the largest coalition of popular movements ever in the Philippines, politically Bayan was the narrowest of all those formed after 1983. Almost all the groups were not part of the national democratic bloc – with the notable exception of former senator Lorenzo Tañada.

The political situation quickly evolved when Marcos, eager for legitimacy, called snap elections in February 1986. Corazon “Cory” Aquino, the widow of Benigno, and Salvador Laurel (from the classical right) ran against Marcos in the presidential race. Most of the democratic movement supported Cory Aquino. Sharp divisions appeared in the Communist Party. Traditionally, the CPP boycotted elections but many wanted to engage in the electoral battle this time, or at least did not want to oppose participation. Nevertheless, the executive committee voted for an active boycott by a very tight margin: 3 in favor of a boycott and 2 against. The party was placed in a very awkward position in the face of the anti-dictatorial upsurge.

February Revolution, 1986

Ferdinand Marcos was sure he would once again control the elections, as did the majority of the Communist Party leadership. They were both wrong. Within the US administration, many wanted the dictatorship to reform itself, but it was too late. The powerful anti-dictatorial mass movement upset predetermined scenarios. Under its pressure, all the regime's contradictions reached breaking point. The Catholic hierarchy withdrew its support for the presidential couple, as did business and many provincial oligarchic families, giving notice to Washington to choose its allies. The army was divided, with a small fraction preparing a coup d'état.

The election campaign took on a strong extra-institutional flavor, with a "parliament of the street" imposing its legitimacy against a rump National Assembly. When Marcos declared himself reelected, rebel soldiers occupied their barracks, led by two "repentant" members of the military: Defense Secretary Juan Ponce Enrile and Acting Chief of Staff Fidel V. Ramos (two of the key architects of martial law). The church called on the population to protect them. A huge crowd blocked the approach of loyalist regiments. The military rebellion should have been easily crushed, but the mobilization of millions of people in the capital and the provinces made all the difference. On February 26, 1986, the presidential couple fled into exile in Hawaii: it was the victory of "People Power" and the "EDSA uprising" (from the acronym of a major thoroughfare, Epifanio de los Santos Avenue, which runs alongside the rebel army barracks near the gathering of demonstrators).

A remarkable alliance had thus occurred between a fraction of the army, the Catholic hierarchy, sectors of the bourgeoisie and the traditional oligarchy, the urban middle classes, popular sectors, and the organized left. But the weight of the latter was considerably weakened by the paralysis of the Communist Party. The CPP and the national democratic movement had played a key role in bringing the Marcos regime to crisis (together with the MNLF in the Bangsamoro land). But at the decisive moment, when millions of protesters invaded the streets and demanded the departure of the dictator, the Communist Party was busy preparing guerrilla camps for an offensive that it expected to launch after the presumed reelection of Marcos. Many of its activists undoubtedly participated in the mobilizations (and did not boycott the election), but the national democratic movement was unable to significantly influence the course of events.

The February Revolution was a composite affair. Above all, it was anti-dictatorial (despite the presence of a military faction planning a coup d'état). Populist, religious, and Marxist ideas were represented. The expression of anti-imperialism proved marginal, although US President Reagan was booed for his support of Marcos, and there was evidently an element of restored national pride: the overthrow of the dictatorship had been carried out by the people and not granted by Washington, as had been the case for independence. On yellow T-shirts (the color of the Aquino supporters), "People Power" was written on one side and "I am proud to be Filipino" on the other.

In the aftermath of the February Revolution, the balance of power was still unstable. The forces ousting the dictator had sharp political differences. The government included individuals from the repressive right (Juan Ponce Enrile) and others from the left, such as lawyer José Diokno, who had been a stalwart in fighting martial law. The balance between civil administration and military power also remained uncertain. February 1986 began a period of transition that lasted for about two years.

Given the marginalization of the national democratic current, the elites were able to resolve the crisis in their best interests. The accession to power of Aquino, herself a member of the oligarchy and very close to Archbishop Sin, fostered a virulent ideological offensive against the CPP and the Marxist left by the Catholic hierarchy and the apostles of economic liberalism. In 1988, the Aquino regime finally took shape and the coalition government became narrower. The extreme rightist elements (Enrile, Vice-President Salvador Laurel) joined the opposition. However, after the death of José Diokno and the departure of many figures of the left, the center of gravity of Aquino's cabinet shifted rightwards, to the delight of Washington. A precarious agreement was negotiated with the armed forces, stabilizing the country, and economic growth resumed after several years of recession and stagnation.

Nevertheless, the structural crisis of the Philippines regime was not overcome. The return to democracy meant above all the return of political provincial families and the resurgence of the elitist and clientelist system of the 1960s. There was one notable difference, however: under Marcos, the army had entered politics. The attempted coup d'état in December 1989 demonstrated that the military was not content to return to the barracks. In 1992, retired General Fidel Ramos succeeded Aquino as president. Military factions are now part of the Philippines political landscape.

Developments on the Left

Political prisoners were freed after the fall of the dictatorship and took part in the lively post-February 1986 debates. Ed de la Torre and Boy Morales distanced themselves from the official Communist Party line, launching the Popular Democratic (PD) current. Other activists from the national democratic tradition joined the newly constituted socialist organization Bisig. Both PD and Bisig presented a much more democratic vision of socialism than that offered by the CPP.

The national democratic movement itself seemed ready to innovate. Former detainees, including José Maria Sison, constituted a legal political party in 1986, the Partido ng Bayan (People's Party, PnB), which ran in the elections. Within the CPP, substantive discussions took place, including publicly in the journal Praktika, on a wide range of issues.

Post-February 1986 Debates

In May 1986 the communist leadership criticized itself publicly over its decision to actively boycott the elections. However, questions remained over how an executive committee of five could have taken such a decision without referring to the political bureau and the central committee, against the advice of many cadres. The February Revolution cast new light on already existing ideological differences and raised other issues.

Seen from outside, the CPP appeared to be an ideological monolith. But there was real diversity in its political practice and conceptions. In 1978, the CPP in the capital had participated in elections in spite of the official boycott policy; the experiment was a failure and the regional leadership was sanctioned. During the 1980s, in Mindanao, the CPP had incorporated the notion of a general territorial strike (welgang bayan) in its overall perspectives. The tumultuous events of 1983–6 confirmed that the strategic blueprint elaborated in 1968–70 was far too rigid. Cadres such as Nathan Quimpo (aka Marti Villalobos) proposed drawing lessons from Latin American revolutionary experiences and from the flexibility of Vietnamese practice, arguing that success depended on the practical ways of combining forms of struggle depending on particular circumstances.

Cadres involved in mass organizing did not systematically subordinate themselves to the armed struggle and sought to address the immediate needs of their social base in more practical ways – what others denounced as reformism. These divergent approaches ultimately led to a sharp disagreement on how to use (or refuse) the official land reform program to advance the peasants' struggle.

While these issues – and many others – were debated in much wider activist circles than before, members of the CPP gradually discovered that paranoid purges were taking place within their own party.

Militarization and Purges

Under martial law, human rights deteriorated in the Philippines as the use of torture became routine. Above ground, activists were abducted and summarily executed by paramilitary groups, including death squads, “vigilante” civilians armed for counterinsurgency, anti-communist religious sects (particularly Protestant), and landowners' and bosses goons. The civil war sometimes took horrific forms, as in the Davao region, where the army “cleaned up” the Agdao slum using religious fanatics against guerillas. Terrible acts were committed, such as the disemboweling of pregnant women, the mutilation of corpses, and torture.

Militarization affected all sectors of society. Paramilitary groups did not cease operating after the fall of the Marcos dictatorship and leaders of legal organizations were not spared. In 1987, death squads assassinated Rolando Olalia (KMU chairman) and Lean Alejandro (head of Bayan), among others.

Controlling the violence became a problem even in the NPA, as evidenced by the Digos incident. In this remote Mindanao village, a Protestant sect created an anti-communist militia. On June 25, 1989, during fighting with the guerillas, 37 villagers were killed. Medical care was given by the victorious NPA to the wounded – but two corpses were beheaded. The NDF set up an inquiry commission requesting the indictment of the NPA unit and two guerillas for beheading the corpses.

Within the Communist Party, the situation dramatically deteriorated. In the 1980s, a succession of secret purges was launched to eliminate agents who had supposedly infiltrated the revolutionary movement. In some places only a few members of the leadership were killed. But in other provinces hundreds of activists were sentenced to death and the mass base of the party was decimated. Several thousand CPP members were murdered, but it was uncertain whether there were any military agents among them.

Torture was used systematically to force suspects to admit to crimes they had never committed. Innocent people confessed and gave the names of nonexistent accomplices: with the infernal logic of torture, purges became rampant in many provinces. The bonds of trust between the CPP-NPA and the population were severed. The 1980s purges raised serious questions, such as how such violations could have been committed by the revolutionary movement, which for so long had won the moral high ground, and how it could have used the same methods as the dictatorship it so vigorously denounced. These and other questions were addressed in the book To Suffer Thy Comrades by Robert Francis “Bobby” Garcia, a survivor of the purges who had been tortured in Southern Tagalog NPA camps.

1992–1996 Splits

After 20 years of struggles, the failure of its boycott policy, and the traumatic experience of its paranoid purges, in the context of a changing national and international climate, the Communist Party was forced to take stock and call for a congress, only the second since its foundation in 1968.

Any reassessment of the CPP line had to take a critical look at the legacy of José Maria Sison. He was the only CPP leader whose writings are authoritative and published (apart from the official resolutions). In this the CPP is quite different from most other revolutionary parties in Asia. This peculiarity is all the more notable because Sison was jailed from 1977 to 1986 (during which time the movement expanded most rapidly), and since 1987 has been living in Utrecht, subject to major restrictions on his movement.

Joma Sison and his allies within the leadership (Benito and Wilma Tiamzon) refused any questioning of the party’s original orientation. The debate therefore set the Reaffirmists against the Rejectionists: those who “reaffirmed” the validity of the 1968–70 documents against those who “rejected” them. In addition, the paranoid purges became a posteriori part of the factional fights, Sison blaming his opponents for the disaster, while in reality the whole party was responsible. In this context, the holding of a congress was refused.

A split in the party was unavoidable. In 1992–3, important leaders, territorial units, and commissions left the CPP or were expelled: Ricardo “Ric” Reyes (Politburo and Mindanao Commission member), Romulo “Rolly” Kintanar (head of the NPA), the United Front Commission, the Peasant Department, the International Desk (Home Bureau), the Manila-Rizal (Capital) Regional Committee with Felimon “Popoy” Lagman, part of the Visayas Commission with Arturo Tabara, and the Central Mindanao Region, among others. The General Command of the NPA and the National Organizing Commission were also officially disbanded. Because the complete name of the party was the Communist Party of the Philippines–Mao Zedong Thought (CPP-MLMTT), many Rejectionists deleted the MTT (Maoist) reference, retaining the ML, which is why in the Philippines, unlike most other countries, Marxist-Leninist is not Maoist.

Rejectionists were not the only victims of the factional fights. Rudy Salas was expelled while he was CPP Chairman in 1977–86 – during the time Sison was in jail. In 1997–8, another split/expulsion occurred in Central Luzon in spite of the fact that this regional leadership had reaffirmed its Maoist reference. A whole generation of activists had been organized in the struggle against martial law by the national democratic movement. This great Philippine revolutionary tradition was now split, but its legacy could still be felt in a range of varied political and social organizations.

The Future of the Philippine Left

Many members of the national democratic movement ceased their activism on account of the 1980s purges and the 1990s CPP crisis. Some organizations disintegrated, such as the PD, and a number of left leaders joined mainstream political parties. Nevertheless, the Philippine left remains the strongest in Southeast Asia.

Among the left, the CPP remains the largest underground organization and, most importantly, the best armed. New communist parties were constituted, initially rooted in one or a few regions only, but later becoming more widespread: the Revolutionary Workers' Party-Mindanao (RPM-M) from Central Mindanao; the Revolutionary Workers' Party-Philippines (RPM-P), mostly from the Visayas; the Workers' Party of the Philippines (PMP), mostly from Manila-Rizal; and the Marxist-Leninist Party of the Philippines (MLMPP) from Central Luzon. Akbayan (Citizen's Action Party) was established as a broad political party of the left. The socialist organization Bisig, a small left social democratic organization, and a number of former CPP members participated in its foundation.

Mass organizations have been influenced by the political upheavals. Out of the KMU a new union center, the Solidarity of Filipino Workers (BMP), was created in the Manila-Rizal region. The Alliance of Progressive Labor (APL) was founded in 1996 and Akbayan was closely related with this national labor center. The peasant movement KMP split, giving way to the Democratic-KMP (DKMP). Many women's organizations distanced themselves from GABRIELA and new organizations, such as Sanlakas, appeared alongside Bayan. There are many independent NGOs and associations, especially peasant associations, in the Philippines, but the most important progressive social movements are usually either part of the Reaffirmist bloc or the Rejectionist bloc, and/or are linked to Akbayan.

New Directions

Elections to the Philippine National Assembly (Congress) are mostly controlled by elite political clans. But new legislation gave a limited number of seats to "party lists" representing popular sectors. Various components of the Philippine left took the opportunity to run, with some success. The Reaffirmist bloc launched several lists (including Bayan Muna, GABRIELA, and Anakpawis) and was the most successful, thanks to CPP backing. Among the Rejectionists, AMIN in Mindanao (with the backing of the RPM-M) and the Workers' Party (PM) – mostly in Manila-Rizal – won seats. Akbayan benefited from a national network and won one to three representatives in each election. Gradually, however, that democratic space has been commandeered by political fronts linked to the elite (against the spirit of the legislation) and it is unclear how long it remains open to the militant left.

The renewal of left activities and ideologies concerned many fields of activities, three of which are discussed here.

Indigenous Peoples

Minority populations live in strategic areas for a guerilla group like the NPA: mountain ranges where military bases can be established and from where it is possible to operate in several provinces. Indigenous peoples in the Philippines are often warring tribes and many NPA fighters were recruited from among them.

Various hill tribes were allied with the CPP-NPA against the Marcos dictatorship to protect their habitat from mining, logging, and major infrastructure works; for example, Igorots (Kalinga and Bontoc tribes) from Northern Luzon struggled against the World Bank-funded construction of dams on the Chico River.

The Communist Party incorporated these areas of struggle into its national strategy, but it refused to recognize the self-governance of the tribes in their ancestral domains: the right of self-determination was to be exercised only after victory. This issue probably explains, at least in part, the April 1986 split within the NPA, when Conrado Balweg founded the People's Liberation Army of the Cordillera (CPLA).

During the 1990s, some Rejectionists adopted a new approach. The RPM-M operates in areas populated by Lumads (indigenous peoples of the island). It felt it necessary to recognize the right to self-determination of the minority populations, respecting their decisions concerning the struggles to be carried out. This is all the more important because, in part of Mindanao, some Lumad ancestral domains are located within the perimeter of other ancestral domains claimed by Moro tribes. Thus the peace movement, which is very much alive in the south of the archipelago, has to find a way for two combined rights of self-determination to be respected in order to overcome the war situation there.

Feminist Networks

On issues of morality, the CPP is traditionally conservative. It issued strict rules prohibiting sex before marriage (although some leaders had more freedom than members). In addition to the authoritarian Puritanism shared by many Asian Maoist movements, the influence of religious members (especially priests) was notable. The CPP monitors courtships, marries its members, and serves as marriage counselor, thus combining the roles of the family, the church, and the state.

Since the 1980s feminist networks have grown and diversified. But they face the influence of the churches in the archipelago. Legislation does not permit divorce or abortion, and campaigns for birth control face many obstacles. The political left is reluctant to confront the churches in this area because it depends on the religious authorities to protect them from repression. Thus, defending the rights of women is often not considered an immediate priority.

Participation in the Movement for Global Justice

Thanks to its Christian organizations and the presence of Filipino political exiles in many countries, including the US, the Netherlands, and Australia, the national democratic movement has established an extensive network of international solidarity and funding. The NDF opened an international office in Utrecht.

Other components of the Philippine left have played an active role in the global justice movement, with key personalities such as Walden Bello from Focus on the Global South and Lidy Nacpil from the Freedom From Debt Coalition (a member of Jubilee South). Philippine social movements are also internationally active through other broad networks, including Stop the War Coalition and Stop the New Round Coalition (against the World Trade Organization). The role of migrants – and especially women migrants – is also important. At least 8 million Filipinos (10 percent of the population) work abroad. The Philippine social fabric would crumble without the $US14.5 billion they send home each year.

Pluralism

Over the last 15 years, the Philippine left has evolved in two opposite directions on the important issue of pluralism.

The Transformation of the CPP

At the time of the 1992–3 splits, the CPP leadership pronounced a death sentence on the main figures of the opposition. For a time, only middle-ranking cadres of other underground organizations were silently targeted by the NPA. In January 2003, however, Romulo Kintanar was shot dead in a Manila restaurant by his former comrades. For the first time, a well-known personality had been executed in the capital city, with maximum publicity.

The CPP justifies such killings by claiming that the victims are in fact “enemy agents” or “criminals.” But in its official organ Ang Bayan, it denounced as “counterrevolutionary” all other organizations of the progressive and radical left, and many left personalities. Any “counterrevolutionary” may one day be sentenced to death. Dozens of activists have already been executed (sometimes after being tortured) by units of the NPA. In some provinces, such as in Bondoc peninsula, the situation is dire: peasant cadres related to Akbayan have fallen victim to both landowners’ goons and the NPA. In January 2005, many organizations participating in the Porto Alegre World Social Forum issued a “Letter of Concern,” urging the CPP to renounce its policy of threat and assassination against other components of the Philippine left.

A Plural Left

Much of the Philippine left has followed the opposite trajectory to the sectarian development of the CPP, recognizing the legitimacy of pluralism in the people’s movements and the need for unity. This question of pluralism (and democracy) has become most central for the Philippine progressive and revolutionary left. Unification of the various Rejectionist organizations formed after the 1992–3 CPP split proved difficult. But they have engaged in many broad networks with Akbayan and other organizations, giving rise to a new political coalition: Laban ng Masa (Struggle of the Masses).

Despite remaining one of the most vibrant in Southeast Asia, the Philippine left has been unable to regain the political initiative. Every time the regime enters a crisis, it is still the elite that imposes a solution – as when President Joseph “Erap” Estrada was overthrown in January 2001 under the pressure of street demonstrations. Philippine military factions are still in the political game. The situation is nonetheless challenging. Social movements face the consequences of capitalist globalization and government neglect, while the closure of many factories has weakened militant unions.

The various peace negotiations between the government and the CPP-NDF, the RPM-M, and the Moro Islamic Liberation Front (MILF, which replaced the MNLF) have been inconclusive. The US was forced to abandon its military bases in 1991 under pressure from the anti-war movement and after a nationalist vote in the Senate (helped, it must be said, by the eruption of the Pinatubo volcano, which heavily damaged some of the bases). But the US military are back thanks to agreements allowing the deployment of their forces throughout the archipelago.

Under the presidency of Gloria Macapagal-Arroyo, corruption is draining public resources and the human rights situation has deteriorated considerably. In 2007, death squads murdered hundreds of lawyers, journalists, and activists (from the Reaffirmist bloc as well as from other organizations). As the situation in the Philippines goes from bad to worse, the struggle of the left has lost none of its relevance.

SEE ALSO: Huk Rebellion, 1946–1954; Moro National Liberation; Philippines, Colonial Protests during the Spanish Era; Philippines, Protest during the US Era; Philippines, Protests, 1950s–1970s

References and Suggested Readings

- Abinales, P. (2001) Fellow Traveler: Essays on Filipino Communism. Quezon City: University of the Philippines Press.
- Abinales, P. (2004) Love, Sex and the Filipino Communist. Manila: Anvil.
- Abinales, P. (2005) State and Society in the Philippines. Manila: Anvil.
- Abuilar, D. (1998) Toward a Nationalist Feminism. Quezon City: Giraffe Books.
- Anderson, B. (1988) Cacique Democracy in the Philippines: Origins and Dreams. New Left Review 1, 169 (May–June).
- Bello, W., Docena, H., De Guzman, M., & Malig, M. (2005) The Anti-Development State: The Political Economy of the Permanent Crisis in the Philippines. Quezon City: Department of Sociology, College of Social Sciences and Philosophy, University of the Philippines.
- Bonner, R. (1987) Waltzing with a Dictator: The Marcoses and the Making of American Policy. New York: Times Books.
- David, R. (2001) Reflections on Sociology and Philippine Society. Quezon City: University of the Philippines Press.
- De la Torre, E. (1986) Touching Ground, Taking Roots: Reflection on Theology and Struggles in the Philippines. Quezon City: Pastoral Institute.
- Estrada-Claudios, S. & Santos, A. (n.d.) The Women's Movement(s) and Social Movements: Conjunctionures

- and Divergences. Available at www.europe-solidaire.org/spip.php?page=auteur&id_auteur=302.
- Garcia, R. F. (2001) To Suffer Thy Comrades: How the Revolution Decimated its Own. Manila: Anvil.
- Jones, G. R. (1989) Red Revolution: Inside the Philippines Guerrilla Movement. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.
- Morales, H., Jr. & Putzel, J. (Eds.) (2001) Power in the Village: Agrarian Reform, Rural Politics, Institutional Change and Globalization. Quezon City: Project Development Institute and University of the Philippines Press.
- Permanent People's Tribunal Session on the Philippines (1981) Philippines: Repression and Resistance. Utrecht: KSP.
- Pimentel, B. (2006) U.G. – An Underground Tale: The Journey of Edgar Jopson and the First Quarter Storm Generation. Manila: Anvil.
- Rocamora, J. (1994) Breaking Through: The Struggle within the Communist Party of the Philippines. Manila: Anvil.
- San Juan, E., Jr. (1994) Allegories of Resistance: The Philippines at the Threshold of the Twenty-First Century. Quezon City: University of the Philippines Press.
- Scipes, K. (1996) KMU: Building Genuine Trade Unionism in the Philippines, 1980–1994. Quezon City: New Day Publishers.
- Sison, J. M. (1989) The Philippine Revolution: The Leader's View. Washington DC: Crane Russak.
- Third World Studies Center (Ed.) (1983) Political Economy of Philippine Commodities. Quezon City: University of the Philippines Press.
- Third World Studies Center (Ed.) (1984) Marxism in the Philippines: Marx Centennial Lectures. Quezon City: University of the Philippines Press.
- Third World Studies Center (Ed.) (1988) Marxism in the Philippines, second series. Quezon City: University of the Philippines Press.
- Weekley, K. (2001) The Communist Party of the Philippines 1968–1993: A Story of its Theory and Practice. Quezon City: University of the Philippines Press.

Pilsudski, Józef (1867–1935)

Amy Linch

A leader of Polish revolutionary activity against tsarist Russia in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, Pilsudski was almost single-handedly responsible for the reunification of Poland after its 123 years of partition. He began his career as a socialist and was a leader of the national insurrection in 1905, during which he trained and directed the combat forces of the Polish Socialist Party (PPS). In the wake of the failed attempt to liberate Poland from Russian domination, he developed an army of revolutionaries that was 10,000 strong by the outbreak of World War I. His political and military maneuvering during the war set the stage for Poland's recognition as an independent state. He was chief of state (1918–22) and commander of the armed forces (1919–21) of Poland's Second Republic. He withdrew from politics in 1923 in the face of political opposition, only to return to power in a coup d'état two years later (1926–35). Throughout his career as an activist and statesman he sought to break up the Russian empire and achieve independence for all captive Central and Eastern European nations.

Pilsudski was born in Żulów (Zalavas, Lithuania) to an impoverished Polonized Lithuanian noble family (szlachta) during the period of intense Russification and military occupation that followed the failed national insurrection of 1863–4. As a child he was captivated by the romantic poetry of Slowack and Mickiewicz and the forbidden history of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth that his mother read to him in secret. His resentment of the complete suppression of his culture grew while he was in secondary school in Wilno (Vilnius), and he became involved in the underground resistance movement in his late teens. In 1887 he was implicated in a plot to assassinate Alexander III (which also involved Lenin's older brother) and sentenced to five years in Siberia.

While living in Siberia, Pilsudski studied Marx and Engels as well as Russian populists Mikhailovsky and Pisarev. He met exiles who had been involved in 1863–4 and witnessed the breadth and diversity of the Russian empire in the 4,000-mile journey from his home. He returned to Wilno in 1892 with the conviction that socialism was a potent force for economic and political liberation of the oppressed nationalities of the "tsarist prison of nations." Cooperation between proletariat parties and radical democratic groups across the empire could promote its dissolution; the fate of any one nation was tied to the whole.

Pilsudski joined the incipient PPS and became the editor of its clandestine newspaper, Robotnik (Worker). He published articles in various socialist journals appealing for collaboration between Polish and Lithuanian socialists and endorsing unconditional national self-determination. In 1900 the discovery of Robotnik by Russian authorities led to his arrest and imprisonment, but he managed to escape by feigning mental illness. At the start of the Russo-Japanese War in 1904 he traveled to Tokyo, where he solicited Japanese support for a Polish uprising against the Russians. He failed to achieve the alliance for which he had hoped, but managed to get ammunition, which he employed in the guerilla warfare he directed over the ensuing two years.

Pilsudski's political and military activities were guided by the conviction that the proletariat must be disciplined and organized in order to profit from the revolutionary opportunities availed them by historical events. The workers' uprisings that occurred during the 1905 Revolution were effective in seizing power, but without a trained military to preserve and direct that power success would be ephemeral at best. His emphasis on strategic operations, including raids on trains and government concessions to secure the resources to enhance the movement's military capacity, were opposed by younger socialists who favored wide-scale social disruption to provoke the collapse of the Russian state. The conflict between the younger "left" socialists and older "right" led by Pilsudski resulted in a split within the party in 1907. Pilsudski organized one last train raid in 1908 – the only one in which he actually participated – and used the over 200,000 rubles acquired in the heist to build what he regarded as the nascent Polish army. He anticipated a war that would envelop Europe, generating chaos that would create an opportunity for reconstructing an independent Poland.

Pilsudski saw the Austro-Hungarian empire as the likely victor in its war against Russia and an ally in achieving his objective of bringing about Russia's demise. His cadres of "Sharpshooters" joined World War I under the Austro-Hungarian flag. The unit he led maintained a national character in uniform and manner of address and was imbued with a radical democratic spirit. Equal pay was given to all officers and many of the soldiers came from leftist political groups. Pilsudski organized rudimentary elements of a Polish state to be ready when the war ended with the collapse of the Central Powers, which had declared an independent Polish state in 1916. Pilsudski and many of his troops were arrested in 1917 for refusing to take an oath of loyalty to the German and Austrian authorities. He spent the rest of the war in a German prison camp.

Upon his return to Poland after the war Pilsudski resumed control over the military, and the Regency Council – the puppet government established by the Central Powers – dissolved itself and handed him control over civilian affairs. He was reappointed as both head of state and commander of the military by the newly elected Sejm (parliament) and led a coalition government until 1922. He implemented an essentially socialist program including an eight-hour workday, free education, and women's suffrage. In international affairs he sought to establish a multinational federation that encompassed the territory of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth. His proposed federation was rejected by both prospective member states and Allied powers. The independence of Central and East European nationalities guided his often risky and unorthodox foreign policy decisions.

The reduced power of the president under the Polish Constitution of 1921 made the office unattractive to Pilsudski and he did not run for reelection. He remained within the government as Chief of General Staff until the assassination of the elected president by a member of the right wing whose original target had been Pilsudski. Disillusioned with democracy, he retired from politics. Conditions of hyperinflation, mounting unemployment, and economic crisis plagued subsequent governments and Pilsudski's supporters encouraged him to return to political life. He took control of the government in May 1926 in a coup d'état supported by the PPS, Liberation, Peasant, and Polish Communist Parties. The Sejm elected him president but he refused the office for its too limited powers. As de facto dictator he initially used propaganda to advance his agenda, but in 1930 he imprisoned his political opponents on the eve of the elections. The Brest Trials that followed, and his establishment of prisons for political prisoners in the early 1930s, brought international condemnation. He greatly feared the rise of Nazi Germany and is said to have proposed a joint invasion of Germany to France in 1935.

SEE ALSO: Engels, Friedrich (1820–1895); Luxemburg, Rosa (1870–1919); Marx, Karl (1818–1883); Poland, Revolutions, 1846–1863; Polish Revolution, 1905–1907; Russia, Revolution of 1905–1907; Russia, Revolution of February/March 1917; Russia, Revolution of October/November 1917

References and Suggested Readings

- Dziewanowski, M. K. (1969) Joseph Pilsudski: A European Federalist, 1918–1922. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.
- Jędrzejewicz, W. (1982) Pilsudski: A Life for Poland. New York: Hippocrene Books.
- Pilsudski, J. (1937–8) Pisma zbiorowe (Collected Writings), 10 vols. Warsaw.
- Plach, E. (2006) The Clash of Moral Nations: Cultural Politics in Pilsudski's Poland, 1926–1935. Athens: Ohio University Press.
- Rothschild, J. (1967) Pilsudski's Coup d'Etat. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Wandycz, P. (1974) The Lands of Partitioned Poland 1795–1918. Seattle: University of Washington Press.

Pinto, Pio Gama (1927–1965)

Zahid Rajan

Pio Gama Pinto was independent Kenya's first martyr. Journalist, freedom fighter, and political activist, he was a socialist who dedicated his life to liberation and justice for the Kenyan people. He was assassinated on February 24, 1965.

Born in 1927 in Nairobi, Kenya, Pinto completed his education in India where he took an active interest in sports and joined the fight for freedom in Goa against the Portuguese. On his return to Kenya, he joined the East African Indian Congress, the Kenya African Union, and the trade union movement. He became actively involved in the Land and Freedom Army, better known as the "Mau Mau," which engaged in armed struggle against the colonialists. He supplied the freedom fighters with weapons, funds, and information and cared for the families of those killed or arrested by the British colonial forces. He helped to set up a Mau Mau War Council in Nairobi and played a key role in sending out information to, and sourcing support from, foreign countries, especially India.

Because of his activities, Pinto was detained from 1954 to 1959, just five months after he got married. During this time his father, who had served the colonial government loyally, passed away. Pinto was not allowed to visit his father on his deathbed nor attend the funeral.

Upon his release he worked ceaselessly for the Kenya African National Union and its electoral victory in 1961. In 1963 he was elected as member of the Central Legislative Assembly, and the following year he was appointed as specially elected member of the House of Representatives in the Kenya parliament.

In 1964 he worked late hours to establish the Lumumba Institute where cadres would be trained. He kept in close touch with African liberation movements and worked to “decolonize” the Portuguese-orientated Goans in Kenya. With funding from India he set up the Pan-African Press, which published Sauti Ya Afrika, Pan Africa, and Nyanza Times. He also helped to form the Kenya African Workers’ Congress, a trade union organization that was independent of the US-dominated International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. This move led the imperialists to classify Pinto as a “leftist firebrand” and “a man to be watched very closely.”

It was the parliamentary coup that he masterminded which proved to be the last straw for the government. Tom Mboya had prepared Sessional Paper No. 10 on African socialism. Pinto and his group of progressive leaders had written up their own blueprint on African socialism in which they demanded a ceiling on land ownership, a more equitable distribution of wealth, and just rewards for the Mau Mau freedom fighters. These demands were anathema to the ruling class.

Pio Gama Pinto was the man who came closest to organizing a real political revolution in Kenya. He was Jaramogi’s foremost tactical advisor and link-man with eastern embassies. A prolific writer and tireless worker, he was known to keep appointments at 5.00 a.m. after working till 2.00 a.m. “Decent, straightforward, fearless, and honest” are just some of the epithets accorded to this remarkable patriot who devoted his mind, his body, and his soul to Kenya. Though gunned down at the young age of 38, Pinto inspired, and continues to inspire, many Kenyans who yearn for a socialist Africa where justice and democracy will prevail.

SEE ALSO: Kenya, National Protests for Independence; Mboya, Tom (1930–1969) and the Kenya Labor Movement

References and Suggested Readings

- Kaise, P. J., Ohumu, F. W., & Kaiser, P. J. (2004) Democratic Transitions in East Africa. London: Ashgate.
- Nugent, P. (2004) Africa Since Independence: A Comparative History. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.

Press, R. M. (2006) Peaceful Resistance: Advancing Human Rights and Democratic Freedoms. London: Ashgate.

Pisacane, Carlo (1818–1857)

Niall Whelehan

One of a few Risorgimento Democrats whose views were genuinely socialistic, Italian patriot Carlo Pisacane unreservedly advocated fundamental change in the relationship between the lower and privileged classes in Italy. Max Nettlau has labeled Pisacane one of the “great libertarians,” and he certainly was one of the most advanced thinkers in the Risorgimento, yet Pisacane left no movement behind him, and historians are still divided on his role in the genesis of the Italian left.

Born into a fallen noble family in Naples, Pisacane was chosen for a military career that he soon found incompatible with his worldview. After spending time in Paris and London, he returned to Italy in 1848. After fighting in the Veneto and Lombardy, he played a role in the 1849 Roman Republic ending in arrest, imprisonment, and then exile. The disappointments of 1848 led Pisacane to publish, in the 1850s, La Guerra combattuta in Italia negli anni 1848–49, Saggi storici, politici, militari sull’Italia, and the Testamento politico. Although Proudhon influenced these works, Pisacane downplayed French socialist doctrines, insisting that only a program developing organically in response to specific Italian grievances would encourage the serious work of reconstruction needed to solve gross inequalities. Central to his work was a criticism of Mazzini, who he believed had blundered by sacrificing the social question in the name of national unification.

Pisacane believed Italian independence should be won through an army of the masses, rather than the regular Pietmontese army: revolutionaries had only to provide a spark and peasants would then continue the revolution of their own volition, creating “the only just and secure form of government: the anarchy of Proudhon.” These convictions led to the ill-fated expedition of 1857. Determined to provoke a rising in the Italian South, Pisacane and two dozen poorly armed volunteers liberated prisoners on the island of Ponza and sailed to Sapri, Campania. The expected uprising failed and Pisacane died, apparently committing suicide.

Pisacane is often credited with being the originator of the “propaganda by the deed” approach to revolution. While he believed ideas came from action, not vice versa, and called revolutionary theorizing a “chimera,” this should not be viewed as an open endorsement of guerrilla warfare or assassination. Pisacane believed such tactics were only effective in “sparking” revolt: guerrilla warfare was dangerous, as it could lead to a cult of leadership in different regions. Only a popular army, he asserted, can create and sustain a revolution.

The early Italian anarchist movement of the 1870s is widely viewed as a continuation of the Risorgimento: in this context, Pisacane was Italy’s first anarchist. He viewed government as unnecessary, and there is little doubt that he helped create an environment congenial to the arrival of Bakunin. Among those who worked with Bakunin in Naples, Giuseppe Fanelli, Atanasio Dramis, and Carlo and Raffaele Mileti had been Pisacane’s collaborators. It is difficult to pinpoint Pisacane’s direct impact on early Italian anarchism, as his works were not circulating between 1866 and 1875; however, by 1877 the influence of his Testamento politico on the writings of Errico Malatesta and Carlo Cafiero was unmistakable.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism, Italy; Fanelli, Giuseppe (1826–1877); Italian Risorgimento

References and Suggested Readings

- Pisacane, C. (1942) Testamento Politico. Turin: Einaudi.
 Pisacane, C. (2005) On Revolution. In R. Graham (Ed.), Anarchism: A Documentary History of Libertarian Ideas, Vol. 1: From Anarchy to Anarchism (300 CE to 1939). Montréal: Black Rose Books.
 Rosselli, N. (1977) Carlo Pisacane nel Risorgimento italiano. Turin: Einaudi.
 Russi, L. (1994) Carlo Pisacane: vita e pensiero di un rivoluzionario senza rivoluzione. Milan: Il saggiatore.

Place, Francis (1771–1854)

Victoria Arnold

Francis Place, known as “the radical tailor of Charing Cross,” was a radical reformer whose impressive organizational skill placed him at the center of political and social reform movements of the nineteenth century.

Place was born in Vinegar Yard, London, in November 1771, the son of Simon Place, a bailiff, and Mary Gray. Despite a difficult childhood, Place was educated from the age of 4, although he himself admitted that he learned little before the age of 11. Between the ages of 13 and 17, Place was apprenticed to a leather breeches-maker but also continued his education, teaching himself many subjects, including French and algebra. In 1790 Place married Elizabeth Chadd, with whom he had 15 children, five of whom died in infancy.

Place first involved himself in political action in 1793 when he took a leading role in a strike of his fellow breeches-makers. The endeavor left him unemployed for eight months, during which time he read Hume, Locke, Adam Smith, Paine, and Godwin. He turned his back on religion, becoming an agnostic, and in June 1794 joined the London Corresponding Society (LCS), quickly rising through its ranks and becoming chairman in September 1795. However, by 1797 Place had resigned his membership, disapproving of the increasingly radical direction the LCS was taking.

Between 1799 and 1806 Place took a step back from politics and focused on building up his tailoring business, opening his own shop in April 1801. In 1807 Place returned to the political arena, playing an important role in organizing the campaign to elect a radical candidate, Sir Francis Burdett, to Westminster. Over the following years the library above Place’s shop in Charing Cross became a meeting place for London’s reformers.

By 1817 the success of Place’s business had allowed him to retire, leaving him free to devote his time to political and social reform. He was dedicated to improving the lives of working men, campaigning for improvements in working conditions, and playing a leading role in the repeal of the Combination Acts in 1824. Place believed that educating the people was an essential part of the parliamentary reform process; he therefore helped to establish the London Mechanics Institute in 1823 and the London University in 1826. Place also supported the Lancastrian Association, which was designed to provide cheap elementary education.

Place played a major role in the reform agitations of the 1830s, managing public meetings, lobbying for parliamentary support, and helping to organize reform societies. He regarded the 1832 Reform Act as a step on the road to more extensive reform. In the 1830s Place became an active member of the Chartist movement, helping to draft its famous “People’s Charter.” He was also active in the Anti-Corn Law League of the 1840s and became manager of its London branch.

Place spent much of the last decade of his life in poor health and in financial straits; he suffered a debilitating stroke in 1844 and died in 1854. Throughout his political life, Place remained in the background of the reform movement. He never sought publicity and refused to stand as a parliamentary candidate. As a thoroughly moderate reformer, he steadfastly opposed the revolutionary or “physical force” currents that cropped up in the movements he was associated with. Although radicals thus frequently perceived him as a retarding influence, the positive significance of Francis Place’s contribution to the organization and direction of those movements is undeniable.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Corn Law Agitation, Britain, 19th Century; Burdett, Sir Francis (1770–1844); Chartists; Combination Laws and Revolutionary Trade Unionism; London Corresponding Society; Reform Acts, Britain and Ireland, 1832

References and Suggested Readings

- Miles, D. (1988) Francis Place 1771–1854: The Life of a Remarkable Radical. Sussex: Harvester Press.
- Thale, M. (Ed.) (1972) The Autobiography of Francis Place (1771–1854). Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Thompson, E. P. (1963) The Making of the English Working Class. New York: Vintage.
- Wallas, G. (1898) The Life of Francis Place, 1771–1854. London: Allen & Unwin.

Plekhanov, Georgi (1856–1918)

Pavla Vesela

Plekhanov began his revolutionary career as a populist, but emerged as the first major theoretician of the early Marxist movement in Russia, responsible for introducing the country to important western Marxist texts and participating in political activism. Plekhanov’s own voluminous works address such diverse fields as politics, sociology, history, epistemology, ethics, aesthetics, and the natural sciences.

Georgi Valentinovich Plekhanov was born on November 29, 1856 in Gudalovka, about 275 miles southeast of Moscow, into a military family loyal to the tsar. Plekhanov enrolled in 1873 in St. Petersburg’s Konstantinovskoe Military School, but soon transferred to the Mining Institute. He was radicalized by the cosmopolitan, university atmosphere, and young Plekhanov joined the populist movement. He gradually abandoned his studies and became an enthusiastic activist in the organization Land and Freedom, writing for its periodical, organized factory workers, and participated in strikes and demonstrations. During this period Plekhanov was drawn to the works of Marx and believed – along with other populists – that in the predominantly agrarian Russia the revolution would be brought about by the peasants. Bypassing the capitalist stage, the newly emergent society, Plekhanov imagined, would be a decentralized federation of peasant communes.

In the late 1870s, in response to the failure to throw the tsarist system into turmoil, Land and Freedom engaged in terrorism against the system. When the organization dissolved in 1879, Plekhanov emerged as leader of the anti-terroristic faction, Black Repartition, in opposition to the terroristic wing, the People’s Will. Populism, however, was significantly weakened.

The waning of Russian populism in the 1880s contributed to Plekhanov’s intellectual transformation toward Marxism. In addition, his belief in the revolutionary character of the peasant commune was shaken by the inability to transform traditional forms of land tenure. In exile, where he lived from 1880, Plekhanov studied Karl Marx’s work in greater depth and established contacts with several major international Marxists, gradually abandoning populism for Marxism. He was founder of the Emancipation of Labor Group in 1883 and later, in 1898, played a central role in the formation of the Russian Social Democratic Labor Party (RSDLP). He also began to write prolifically. In two major works, Socialism and the Political Struggle (1883) and Our Differences (1885), Plekhanov repeatedly argued against populism’s revolutionary potential, emphasizing that Russia did not constitute a unique case in history and therefore, in order to achieve socialism, the country had to first develop an urban proletariat and pass through the bourgeois stage – which became the basis of intellectual exchange with the young Marxist theoretician Vladimir Ilyich Lenin. While Lenin considered Plekhanov's work crucial to an understanding of communism, he regarded the peasantry as an integral part of the Russian revolutionary working class. During the 1890s, in such works as On the Development of the Monistic Conception of History (1895) or Essays on the History of Materialism (1896), Plekhanov continued to defend orthodox Marxism against populism, economism, and revisionism.

In 1900, together with other Russian Marxists such as Lenin, Julius Martov, and Alexander Potresov, Plekhanov launched the newspaper Iskra. The close cooperation of the editorial board members, however, was short-lived, as RSDLP split at the Second Party Congress in 1903 into the Bolsheviks and the Mensheviks. Although Plekhanov held a centrist position and until the outbreak of World War I strove to unite the two factions, he eventually drifted toward the Mensheviks. Following the February Revolution of 1917, he returned from exile, considering the events the long-awaited bourgeois revolution. When the Bolsheviks seized power during the October Revolution, Plekhanov was highly critical of what he viewed as a premature step. He retired to Finland, where he died several months later on May 17, 1918.

Plekhanov's major works in his later years include Fundamental Problems of Marxism (1908) and a crucial Marxist text on art and literature, Art and Social Life (1912), where he analyzed social conditions responsible for the conflict between “art for art's sake” on the one side and utilitarian attitudes toward art on the other. In 1909 Plekhanov also started the monumental History of Russian Thought, which by the year of his death reached only the eighteenth century. There, among other things, he argued that Russia was torn between the West and the East – at times leaning towards European culture and at other times falling into Eastern despotism and autocracy.

According to some critics, such as Plekhanov's biographer Samuel Baron, Plekhanov was excluded from the mainstream as a result of his faithful – albeit rigidly orthodox – Marxism, critical of both the revisionist and Bolshevik alternatives. Others, for example the historian Stanislaw Tiutiukin, contend that Plekhanov became an armchair scholar for whom Menshevism was a comfortable choice. Plekhanov's authoritarian, stubborn, and compulsive personality alienated him from people and contributed to the unpopularity of his philosophical thought. While he failed to remain within the center of events, his contribution to the emergence of Russian Marxism is undeniable, and therefore Plekhanov is remembered as the Father of Russian Marxism.

SEE ALSO: Bolsheviks; Decembrists to the Rise of Russian Marxism; Lenin, Vladimir Ilyich (1870–1924); Leninist Philosophy; Martov, Julius (1873–1923); Marx, Karl (1818–1883); Russia, Revolution of February/March 1917

References and Suggested Readings

- Baron, S. (1963) Plekhanov: The Father of Russian Marxism. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Geifman, A. (Ed.) (1999) Russia Under the Last Tsar: Opposition and Subversion, 1894–1917. Oxford: Blackwell.
- Mayer, R. (1997) Plekhanov, Lenin and Working-Class Consciousness. Studies in East European Thought 49: 159–85.

Poland, Committee for Workers (KOR)

Amy Linch

From 1976 until the legalization of Solidarność (Solidarity) in 1981 the Committee for Workers (Komitet Obrony Robotników) (KOR) inspired and nurtured oppositional politics within Poland. Although its actual membership was relatively small, and initially drawn exclusively from the Warsaw intelligentsia, KOR became a focal point and organizing force for social resources across class and milieu. Its philosophy and practice of opposition challenged totalitarian rule by promoting social solidarity and creating realms of independent social action. It sought to transform social values and liberate public space by reclaiming the language and ideals of community appropriated by what Lipinski called “this socialism of mismanagement and inefficiency . . . this socialism of prisons, censorship and police” (Celt & Sabbat 1981: 2). Over its five years of existence KOR propagated a disciplined, cohesive, non-violent oppositional practice that was critical to the formation and success of the Solidarity movement. As Anna Walentynowicz, one of the leaders of Solidarity, asserted in March 1981, “without KOR there would be no Solidarity in Poland” (Celt & Sabbat 1981: 6).

KOR’s members saw the material and conceptual centrality of the state as an obstacle to the development of opposition in Poland. Fear, inertia, and individual opportunism were further challenges to generating the sort of collective action that could effectively undermine the power of the communist system. KOR sought to demonstrate by example the power of individual ethical action and mutual support. Its work began in response to the brutal suppression of striking workers in 1976. Members and fellow activists distributed assistance to workers and their families, publicly decried their treatment, and exposed the crimes of the state to the larger population. As they institutionalized their reform efforts, the structure of the organization self-consciously reflected the members’ theory of opposition. Their activities and membership were deliberately public, thereby asserting the social right to organize and petition the government. The members took full responsibility for the actions of the group; they justified its existence in legal terms drawing on domestic law and international treaties to which Poland was a signatory, and ran its internal affairs with the norms of equality and transparency that they sought to realize in the larger society.

Prehistory

KOR reflected the experience of dissident intellectuals and (formerly) revisionist Marxists over nearly three decades of communist rule. The majority of the committee’s older members had been activists in the prewar Socialist Party (PPS) and/or soldiers in the underground Home Army (AK). Many of KOR’s members had struggled to come to terms with the gap between the socialist ideals to which they were committed and the travesty of their implementation. Reform-oriented discussion groups in Warsaw, such as the Crooked Circle Club (1956–62) and the Club of the Seekers of Contradiction, provided forums for intergenerational exchange of ideas and promoted critical analysis of the regime. The Kolakowski lecture series, organized by Adam Michnik, who became a member of KOR, was also an important factor in developing the theory of opposition that KOR sought to actualize. The failed student protests in 1968 and brutal suppression of workers in 1970 led many students and leading intellectuals to abandon hope that reform was possible within the communist system. Jacek Kuroń and Michnik in particular argued that previous challenges to the regime had failed because they relied upon change at the top; real change within a totalitarian system could only come through pressure from below. Society must organize itself to undermine the hegemonic position of the party. By acting in accordance with the norms of a free society, Polish citizens could create one.

Precipitating Events

In December 1970 Polish workers in the industrial centers on the Baltic coast responded to drastic increases in the price of basic food items with mass demonstrations, strikes, and attacks on the communist centers of power. The ruling Polish United Workers’ Party (PUWP) had maintained food prices at a disproportionately low level with respect to other commodities as the legitimacy of the “people’s republic” was based on the economic quality of life it availed citizens. But in the face of looming economic crisis these prices were no longer tenable. The sudden and apparently arbitrary price increases severely compromised the standard of living of most people. The government responded to the mass demonstrations and work stoppages with armed repression. Police opened fire on crowds, while tanks and machine guns were brought into the cities to disperse the protesters. Official sources pronounced 1,165 people wounded and 45 killed in the protests, but the actual numbers are likely to have been greater. Recognizing the threat of a full-scale workers’ revolt, the regime rescinded the price increases, raised wages, and undertook reforms to modernize industry and increase the availability of consumer goods. Gierek, who replaced Gomulka as first secretary of the Polish United Workers’ Party, met with unions and promised political renewal.

Fearing further worker mobilization, Gierek’s regime maintained a price freeze for the next five years. In June 1976 another round of increases raised basic food costs 30–100 percent, 70 percent on meat and 100 percent on sugar. People throughout the country expressed their anger and frustration with strikes and street demonstrations. In the industrial center of Radom, where the largest protests occurred, police responded with exceptional brutality, indiscriminately assaulting and arresting workers. The police refrained from the use of firearms to avoid the escalation of 1970, but wielded wire-covered rubber clubs against the crowd: 2,000 people were detained, many of whom were tortured at the police station. In Ursus workers removed sections of rail line to ensure that news of the strike would reach other areas of Poland. They stopped a food train and distributed the goods among the crowd. Police watched from helicopters overhead but did not intervene until the protesters began to disperse after a speech by the prime minister revoking the price increases. Unions cooperated with the police in helping them to identify participants in the hold up of the train from aerial photographs. The repressive measures enacted in Radom were repeated in Ursus, with many suffering brutal treatment at the hands of the police. In the wake of the protests the police continued to maintain a military-like occupation of the cities, harassing workers on their way to and from work, searching homes, and interrogating family members. The party meanwhile initiated a public relations campaign to cast the protesters as hooligans committed to wanton destruction of the Polish state.

Although the strikes and protests in 1970 had been larger than those in 1976, the scale of the police crackdown and prosecution of participants during the latter was unprecedented. The utter lawlessness of the police inspired a group of students and intellectuals to extend support to the workers and their families in an initiative that developed into one of the most significant independent civil society organization in the Soviet bloc: KOR. Recognizing that division between the workers and the intelligentsia served the interests of the Communist Party by making it easier to contain the discontent of either group – evident in the abortive student uprisings of 1968 in which the workers did not support the students and in the easy coopting of the workers post-1970 – several prominent intellectuals organized financial, medical, and legal assistance for detainees and their families, and publicized their plight.

Founding of KOR

Jacek Kuroń and Antoni Macierewicz were leaders of the collective initiative to assist the workers. They began by attending the Ursus trials where Małgorzata Łukasiewiczówna's expression of sympathy to the families opened communication between the two groups. Jan Józef Lipski provided the initial funds for legal assistance from money he had received from a church organization. Scouts from Black Troop No. 1 provided child-care for families while they attended the court proceedings. Medical care was arranged for those who needed it, a critical intervention as many suffered health problems due to police brutality, but lost their state insurance when they were fired from their positions for participating in the protests. The volunteers, primarily scouts and affiliates of the Club of the Catholic Intelligentsia (KIK), arranged legal counsel for the workers facing prosecution and used the funds secured by Lipski to pay their fees.

In September the relief effort was extended to Radom, where the strikes and riots had been larger and repression was even more severe. Reprisals against relief workers by the security forces, already present in Ursus, grew more intense. Young volunteers were harassed and occasionally arrested and detained. A formal committee was proposed in order to protect the volunteers by putting them within the aegis of a larger social authority, including that of the Catholic Church, which was a major visible source of support.

KOR was formally established in September 1976 with 14 official members, largely drawn from Warsaw's intelligentsia. Nine others who had been involved in the work of the committee since its beginning officially joined later that year or early the next. The organization's first communiqué, issued on September 29, 1976, provided information about its work in Radom and Ursus and the police reprisals it had suffered. The names and telephone numbers of the members were clearly listed. Over the next several months KOR sent open letters of protest to the communist government and issued a newsletter, Komunikat, that kept the public informed of the workers' situations and its own activities. KOR members also edited Biuletyn Informacyjny (Information Bulletin), which played an important role in chronicling the relief effort and promoting public life, but unlike Komunikat was not the official voice of KOR. Its purpose was to break the information monopoly held by the party-state and foster independent critical thinking about political and economic reform. This initially primitive publication developed into the first periodical of the movement, and a powerful networking tool.

Transformation to the Committee for Self-Defense

On February 3, 1977 the Council of State recommended an “act of clemency” that reduced or rescinded the sentences of most of the protesters. With the practical realization of their stated objective many associate organizations felt that KOR should disband. But in the face of continued harassment of those who were originally arrested and intensified reprisals against KOR and its associates, KOR opted to expand the tasks of the committee to encompass a broad campaign against political oppression and support for its victims. Several months later, the (undoubtedly) state-sponsored murder of student and KOR activist Stanislaw Pyjas, who was gathering evidence for a report about police brutality, propelled KOR to become a full-scale opposition movement.

Students responded to Pyjas’s death with spontaneous street protests and organized memorials. Undeterred by the potential of arrest and detention, thousands of people participated in masses and public marches in his memory. Students distributed obituaries and demanded to know who was responsible for his death. KOR’s active role in these protests and public ceremonies resulted in arrests, beatings, and searches of members’ apartments later that month. Many committee members and several important activists were arrested and charged with harming the interests of the Polish People’s Republic by disseminating false information. The organization responded by publicizing the arrests both domestically and abroad, issuing a statement of collective responsibility for the actions of KOR, and demanding the individuals’ release. In cooperation with the Catholic Church and other non-KOR activists they coordinated protests, including a collective fast, and issued an open letter to the government with over a thousand signatures.

The imprisoned KOR members and activists were finally granted amnesty in July 1977, along with five workers who were still being held from the 1976 protests. In his comprehensive treatment of KOR’s development in The Origins of Democratization in Poland (1993), Bernhard marks this as a watershed moment of internal recognition of the strength of the movement generated by KOR, and the real possibilities of resistance. The committee had survived in the face of repression and attempts at isolation by the party-state and new parts of society had become more practiced in self-organization and advocacy. KOR members reorganized to promote this emergent capacity for “social self-defense” against the communist regime and develop the position it had come to occupy as the focal point for political opposition.

In line with its commitment to practicing the ideals that it sought to actualize – in this case transparency and accountability in public organizations – KOR subjected its finances and activities to review by a citizens’ committee before deciding how to best fulfill the social role its actions had generated. It changed its name to the Social Self-Defense Committee (Komitet Samoobrony Społecznej), but retained KOR in the title. The reorganized KSS-“KOR” resolved to struggle against repression on the basis of politics, race, religion, or worldview and support victims of such repression; to struggle against violation of the rule of law and work to institutionalize civil rights and freedoms; and to support and defend all social initiatives aimed at realizing human and civil rights. The organization asserted a positive program of action in the “Declaration of the Democratic Movement” in which it identified the entwinement of state and society as the key problem to address in achieving their objectives. Extension of basic freedoms was the solution. They asserted co-responsibility for the future of Poland, calling on citizens to take initiative in promoting reforms, and on the authorities to observe the international human rights treaties to which they were signatories.

KSS-“KOR” provided training in organizing and advocacy to workers. It facilitated the creation of peasant and artisan cooperatives and helped to coordinate the reform initiatives of various organizations from all aspects of society. From 1977 until its voluntary dissolution in 1981, organized opposition in Poland grew to a size unprecedented in the Soviet bloc. The dynamic redefinition of public life during this period extended to groups and organizations well beyond the Warsaw intellectual milieu that first gave rise to KOR. The organization helped to create independent groups of worker activists with tools to demand democratic representation and institutional guarantees of the rights they were claiming through organized collective action.

One of the critical functions of KSS-“KOR” was information distribution. Its Intervention Bureau collected and publicized information on human rights violations. KSS-“KOR” supported the publication of Robotnik (Worker), which specifically addressed the concerns of workers, as well as the Komunikat and Biuletyn Informacyjny. Some of its members published the journal Głos (The Voice), edited by Macierewicz, although over time this group increasingly prioritized nationalism and independence over human and civic rights. KSS-“KOR” presented the first rigorous analysis of the economic situation in Poland, produced by professional economists and distributed as a booklet in the spring of 1978. It conducted a campaign against censorship, arguing that a secret dossier on the operations of the censor’s office demonstrated its harmfulness to both the public and the state. In August 1979 the underground press published the “Charter of Workers’ Rights” developed by the nascent labor movement under the auspices of KOR, which was the basis of the demands presented to the Polish government by the Interfactory Strike Committee in Gdansk a year later.

KSS-“KOR” also organized financial support for people who suffered for speaking out against the regime. The Social Self-Defense Fund provided assistance to those who had lost their jobs because of affiliation with KOR, while another fund provided financial support for students who were denied study grants for their political activities. Many KSS-“KOR” members were also active in organizing and providing courses for the Flying University. They established contacts with members of the democratic opposition in other countries – notably Andrei Sakharov of the Soviet Union, Václav Havel and other representatives of Charter 77 from Czechoslovakia, and prominent Hungarian dissidents – and facilitated international cooperation in challenging state socialism. When the strikes began in Gdansk in 1980 KSS-“KOR” immediately established itself as a strike information agency. It became a contact center for strike committees and many of its members served as expert advisors to the strike leaders. KSS-“KOR” publications played a critical role in connecting Poland during this period, so effectively raising popular awareness of the events on the Baltic coast that the government press could no longer ignore the fact that labor unrest had engulfed Poland.

KSS-“KOR” voluntarily disbanded at the Solidarity Congress in Gdansk in 1981, nearly five years to the day after its inception. With the creation of Solidarność the previous year many of the activists and members increasingly directed their energy toward the union. The alliance between workers and intellectuals cultivated by KOR laid the foundation of Solidarność, which had grown to a country-wide social movement, 10 million strong. In Kuron’s words at the moment of KOR’s dissolution, “With Solidarity on the scene, it became superfluous” (Celt & Sabbat 1981: 2). The workers, who were now well trained in self-organization and advocacy, would take the helm over the next decade of struggle.

SEE ALSO: Kuroń, Jacek (1934–2004); Michnik, Adam (b. 1946); Poland, 1956 Uprising; Poland, Student Movement, 1968; Poland, Trade Unions and Protest, 1988–1993; Solidarność (Solidarity); Walentynowicz, Anna (b. 1929); Walesa, Lech (b. 1943); Women in the Solidarity Movement, Polish Underground

References and Suggested Readings

- Bernhard, M. (1993) The Origins of Democratization in Poland: Workers, Intellectuals and Opposition Politics, 1976–1980. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Celt, E. & Sabbat, A. (1981) KSS-“KOR” Disbands: Five Years in Retrospect. RAD Background Report 284, Poland. Open Society Archives. www.files.osa.ceu.hu/holdings/300/8/3/text/46-2-11.shtml (includes a full list of KOR members and their biographies).
- Lipski, J. J. (1985) KOR: A History of the Workers’ Defense Committee in Poland 1976–1981. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Zuzowski, R. (1992) Political Dissent and Opposition in Poland. London: Praeger.

Poland, 1956 Uprising

A. Kemp-Welch

Poland first rose up against communist rule in 1956, when popular pressures obliged the authorities to reform the discredited Stalinist system. These forced concessions helped to stabilize the mono-party system for another decade.

Khrushchev’s “secret speech” denouncing Stalin at a closed session of the Twentieth Soviet Party Congress (February 1956) soon leaked out. It divided the communist movement into different roads to socialism, named by the Italian Togliatti "polycentrism." Within particular countries, notably Poland, it caused a collision between the friends and foes of change. Poland's leader Boleslaw Bierut died in Moscow shortly after the Congress. The surviving Polish Stalinists found themselves challenged by a revisionist faction which sought to open political debate to a wider public. Polish communists, uniquely in the bloc, published Khrushchev's revelations in full. They were read to mass meetings of both party and non-party members up and down the country. In the ensuing discussions, which sometimes lasted into the early morning, audiences raised thousands of questions about communist rule. The public's agenda soon moved from issues of Soviet history to ones of current Polish politics. Workers criticized the over-centralized and mismanaged economy; farmers called for the return of their confiscated land. All demanded a more equal relationship between Poland and the Soviet Union. Alarmed by the mass response, the party leadership tried to rein in the debate, but it was too late.

The industrial city of Poznan erupted on June 28. Workers at the giant Stalin Factory (ZiSPO) declared a general strike. Thousands formed up outside the gates and marched into town to present their material grievances to local party officials. They were joined by housewives and school children en route. As the column passed the cathedral its leaders knelt down to receive blessings from priests on the steps. At this stage, the atmosphere was relaxed. The mood soon changed when it became clear that local officials were unwilling or unable to meet the demonstrators' demands. Faced with this impasse, the economic agenda widened. In a few hours it became a national uprising against Polish communists seen as little more than lackeys of a foreign power. The protest became an insurrection. The insurgents considered themselves to be "the Nation" and began to assume that the rest of the country was rising up with them. In response, the Soviet-trained minister of defense, Marshal Rokossovsky, was given a free hand to suppress "adventurists who attack state institutions." His deployment of 400 tanks and armored vehicles left 73 dead and many hundreds seriously wounded. Seven soldiers were also killed.

De-Stalinization in the Soviet Union was halted immediately afterwards. Moscow declared that the United States had instigated the "disturbances" in Poznan. In reality, policy-makers in Washington had recently concluded that the Soviet bloc was stabilized by ten years of Sovietization. It was surprised by the Poznan rising. But the Polish public was unconvinced by the official newsreel calling the event an isolated instance of vandalism against public property by now-repentant hooligans. Public opinion was enflamed and assumed that, after the summer vacation, protests would resume.

While the Polish party elite hid its factional struggles behind a façade of unanimity, there was uproar from its rank and file. The lower echelons now sought a real input into decision-making. They sent thousands of resolutions to Warsaw. A new demand now appeared: the return of former party leader Gomulka, who had headed the first stage of socialist rule (1944–8) before being removed, on Moscow's orders, as a "right-nationalist deviator." By early October Gomulka was restored to the Politburo. Criticizing the repression of Poznan, he argued that the party should reconnect with the working class and the wider nation through radical measures. Central government should be cut and the much-hated Soviet "advisors" in key ministries be sent home. He added that Poland's relations with the Soviet Union had become too subservient and should be placed on a more equal footing. The response of Marshal Rokossovsky was to order three Soviet armored columns, stationed in the north and west of Poland, to begin a march on Warsaw. Soviet warships took up positions in the bay of Gdansk. Rokossovsky put trusted units on alert to seize strategic buildings in the capital, without informing the Politburo. But some Polish leaders, notably the Warsaw city party leader Staszewski, considered counter-measures.

At the height of this very tense stand-off, two Soviet planes arrived in Polish airspace, requesting permission to land. They contained key members of the Politburo, led by Khrushchev. In crisis talks, Khrushchev threatened to "intervene brutally" in Poland to defend Soviet interests. Gomulka remained calm and managed to persuade the visitors of his unshakeable loyalty both to the fundamentals of the Soviet system, above all mono-party rule, and to the Warsaw Pact. In return, he was reinstated as party leader and given a free hand to calm the public down.

Gomulka's famous oration to 300,000 citizens in front of Warsaw's Palace of Culture is mainly remembered for his sensational announcement that Soviet troops had halted their advance on Warsaw and would return to barracks. He promised a new version of socialism, based on a greater enterprise autonomy and worker self-management. He invited Polish Catholics to take a patriotic part in rebuilding the economy and social life. Finally, he told the crowd that the time for demonstrations was over: they should now return to work for the good of the socialist state.

In the confused aftermath, sporadic demonstrations continued. The Polish public showed what solidarity they could with their Hungarian “brothers,” whose own violent uprising against communist rule was being bloodily suppressed. As anti-Russian demonstrations took place in Poland, Gomulka flew to Moscow. Bilateral talks resulted in the withdrawal of many Soviet “advisors,” above all Rokossovsky who was pensioned off, and agreement of rules regularizing the stationing of Soviet troops on Polish soil. Within the country, the balance sheet was mixed: 1956 brought most benefit to private farmers. Spontaneous de-collectivization emptied the state and collective farms; 90 percent had disbanded by Christmas. In accordance with his promise, Gomulka restored the Catholic Church to a legitimate though restricted role in public life. In return for eschewing high politics the church was allowed to resume its cultural and pastoral duties. For intellectuals, however, the promise of much greater openness glimpsed in the Polish October was disappointed. Censorship, which had lifted, was soon reimposed and independent discussion clubs were closed down. They did not recur until the later 1960s. Above all, the working class, which had done most to press for political change, was let down. The promise of greater input in factory management soon evaporated and the economy settled into a decade of stagnation. The renewal of working-class protests in 1970 finally toppled Gomulka.

No adequate histories of 1956 appeared during the communist period. All focused on narrow factional struggles within the ruling elite. Once archives were opened, Pawel Machcewicz produced a magnificent study of the period “from below.” Using declassified Ministry of Interior reports, he shows that 1956 was a popular uprising, strongly nationalist and anti-Russian. This changed in subsequent protests. Learning from the repression of Poznan that open demonstrations are an easy target, in 1970 shipyard workers on the Baltic Coast preferred occupational strikes.

SEE ALSO: Poland, Student Movement, 1968

References and Suggested Readings

- Kemp-Welch, A. (2008) Poland under Communism: A Cold War History. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Machcewicz, P. (1993) Polski Rok 1956. Warsaw: Mowia wieki.
- Persak, K. (2008) The Polish-Soviet Confrontation in 1956. In T. Cox (Ed.), Challenging Communism in Europe: 1956 and its Legacy. London: Routledge.
- Toranska, T. (1987) Oni: Stalin's Polish Puppets. London: Collins Harvill.

Poland, Revolutions, 1846–1863

Amy Linch

The failure of the November Uprising in Congress Poland (1830–1) was by no means the end of Polish ambitions to unify the territories of the former Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, partitioned among Russia, Prussia, and Austria-Hungary at the turn of the nineteenth century. Russia's brutal reprisal in the wake of the 1830 Revolution resulted in a large émigré community – concentrated in Paris – that plotted from afar to recapture the partitioned territories through diplomatic, military, and conspiratorial action. Among the Polish democrats the previous revolt was widely regarded as having failed, not because of Russia's greater military power, but because the Poles did not free the serfs and thus lacked their support in the military campaign. Social reform therefore came to be seen as critical to the struggle for national independence.

The émigré community was divided into two camps. The conservatives, who followed Adam Czartoryski, the military leader of 1830, anticipated liberating Poland through a military defeat of Russia with the help of Britain and France. The more broadly representative Polish Democratic Society (PDS) envisioned the abolition of class privilege and overthrow of the monarchy through mass insurrection. Initially conservatives sought an independent constitutional monarchy and eschewed radical social reform, but by the 1840s they came to endorse emancipation as well, recognizing both the strategic importance of the peasants and the popular appeal of PDS's program.

Krakow Revolution, 1846

The PDS and secret revolutionary organizations planned a series of uprisings in every territory of Partitioned Poland beginning February 1846. The campaign would commence in Poznań and Galicia and then progress eastward to seize control of Congress Poland, eventually restoring the pre-partition boundaries. A local landowner in Poznań foiled the plan by betraying the conspirators to the Prussian authorities. Austrian troops invaded the Republic of Krakow to prevent the outbreak of revolution there and arrested several conspirators, but peasants and miners rose up against the Austrian troops and drove them from the region. Fighting broke out in the city of Krakow as well, largely driven by urban workers and artisans intent upon eliminating local aristocrats and the wealthy bourgeoisie as well as the Austrians. The insurgents seized power and proclaimed the National Government of the Polish Republic. They issued the Manifest do Narodu Polskiego (A Manifesto to the Polish Nation), calling on Poles in all of the territories to rise up in support of Polish independence. The Manifesto promised enfranchisement of peasants, abolition of serfdom without compensation to landlords, and distribution of land to peasants who participated in the revolt. It further promised protection for the poor, national workshops, and complete equality with Christians for Jews.

The National Government drew support from the urban and rural working classes and a large section of the Jewish community. Within three days over 6,000 people had joined the revolutionary forces. Jan Józef Tyssowski dissolved the government after several days and declared himself dictator. He refused to conscript all of the volunteers and pursued a compromise with the local conservative nobility. Edward Dembowski led a group of miners into Krakow and managed to revive the revolution by taking control as Tyssowski's secretary. He formed a revolutionary club and promised in Tyssowski's name the establishment of national workshops with high wages, an end to taxes on basic items, and harsh measures for any who delayed emancipation.

Dembowski tried to extend the revolution to Western Galicia, to little avail. Peasants lived under harsh conditions of servitude and were mistrustful of the local elites who sought their support against Austria. Poverty was widespread as a result of the agrarian crisis in Europe and much-needed reforms had been stymied for some time by conflict between the Austrian and Polish reformers (Hahn 2001: 172). Austrian forces fomented opposition to the democrats among the peasantry with promises of reform and incentives for capturing or killing seditious landlords. Austrian efforts to direct peasant antagonism against Polish nationalist landowners resulted in a brutal peasant uprising against the local nobility. Peasants attacked manor houses, indiscriminately murdering, looting, and burning them to the ground. In Tarnow nearly 90 percent of the nobles and gentry were killed and their homes destroyed. An estimated 2,000 aristocrats died in the peasant uprising, most of whom had nothing to do with the revolution (Wandycz 1974: 135).

With the assistance of the peasants Austrian troops defeated the insurgents in Galicia within a few days. Prussian authorities disarmed Tyssowski and more than a thousand revolutionaries as they fled Krakow without a fight. On March 4, 1846, Russian and Austrian forces occupied Krakow. The Krakow Republic was dissolved and annexed by Austria in November of that year. Austrian institutions replaced Polish ones, with German established as the language of education and public affairs. An ensuing economic crisis resulted in an increase in poverty and further peasant unrest, and the Austrian authorities harshly suppressed peasant efforts to eliminate feudal obligations. The independence conspiracy continued but it was severely weakened by the failure of 1846. Emigré leaders lost influence among Poles within the territories, international support for Polish independence was not forthcoming, and the democrats' romantic image of the peasants as the soul of the nation had been shattered.

Despite its ignominious defeat at the hands of Galician peasants, the Krakow revolution was honored by the European left for its placement of social reform at the core of the struggle for national independence. The mass trial of 254 conspirators held in Berlin provided seven months of publicity for the Polish revolutionary goals and linked the Polish struggle to the German Revolution of 1848 (Wandycz 1974: 137). Marx and Engels declared that German freedom was only possible with the liberation of Poland. The eight sentences of death and 97 of imprisonment were never executed due to the outbreak of the March Revolution in 1848.

Poznań Uprising, 1848

Polish patriots in the Grand Duchy of Poznań seized the opportunity created by the 1848 Revolution in Berlin to advance their goal of national independence for the Polish section of the province. As news of the revolution reached the region, the Poznań National Committee was formed to organize a delegation to petition the king for Polonization of public affairs and the creation of a Polish army. The king granted the request under the condition that law and order prevail during national reorganization. Meanwhile, under the leadership of Walenty Stefanski and newly freed conspirators of 1846, including Ludwik Mieroslawski, the committee began organizing a volunteer militia as the basis of a Polish national army. It established Polish administration in the provinces, abolished feudal obligations, and granted full equality to the Jews. The Prussian forces tried to rouse local German people to resist the Polish assumption of power and in some places provoked open conflict between the two groups.

Initially most Germans supported the Polish cause, particularly German democrats. However, as clashes between the two communities increased and the threat of a Russian invasion did not materialize, German national interest trumped solidarity under liberal ideals. Frederick Wilhelm IV secretly ordered his army to suppress the Poles (Wandycz 1974: 140) and curtailed the promised autonomy to areas that were “purely Polish.” The “Polish” region ultimately excluded nearly 75 percent of Poznań region and the city itself. In the face of such pronounced injustice, armed resistance by the Poles seemed unavoidable.

Mieroslawski and much of the Polish leadership preferred a negotiated route to Polish independence and were loath to employ their 6,000–7,000 troops in battle against the Prussians. Their plan had been to support a war against Russia, not to engage in partisan warfare, which they thought suicidal for their poorly armed volunteers. The more radical wing of the leadership, however, wanted to continue the struggle for independence and social reform through guerilla warfare. Fearing the Poles’ consolidation of power, the Prussian authorities declared martial law on April 4, 1848. They intended to dissolve the administrative committees but were restrained by orders from Berlin to await the arrival of General Wilhelm von Willisen, who was sent to mediate the conflict. Despite being a supporter of both the Poles and the war against Russia, Willisen ordered the dissolution of the Polish armed forces in exchange for autonomy – which he knew to be disingenuous. A convention at Jaroslawiec on April 11 reduced the army to several hundred troops consolidated into four units. The National Committee signed the agreement reluctantly, to the chagrin of the soldiers, who regarded their compliance as betrayal of the revolutionary cause.

After Willisen left the region the Prussian authorities violated the agreement, dissolving the local administrative committees and sanctioning brutal treatment of the insurgents. To quell the rebellious spirit still alive among many Poles, the conservative-dominated National Committee ordered the remaining troops to disband. They refused and elected Mieroslawski to remain their commander in chief. On April 25 the Prussian authorities restricted the scope of Polish autonomy more dramatically and unleashed a campaign of terror against the Polish population. The National Committee issued a public statement to beware the treachery of the Prussians and dissolved itself. Volunteer troops led by Mieroslawski defeated the Prussians in two battles but sustained heavy losses. The insurgent forces gradually dwindled, in part because the gentry officers refused to continue fighting. By the beginning of May the remaining troops had formed guerilla units but were soon defeated by the Prussian forces. They formally capitulated on May 9, 1848 with a guarantee of amnesty for those involved from the Prussian authorities. The agreement was soon broken, however. Over 1,500 insurgents were arrested and imprisoned; where prisons were overcrowded, peasants were branded on the ears and hands and released.

The defeat of the Poznań uprising was the first success in the counterrevolution against the “Spring of Nations” in 1848. The uprising was the first conflict between the German and Polish nationalities in Poznań. It undermined confidence in the Prussian authorities and awakened national consciousness among the Poles. The failed revolution further deepened divisions between the émigrés and local Polish leaders who were resentful of the émigrés' attempts to control the revolution. In the face of grim prospects for independence, many Poles in the Poznań region focused on economic and cultural advancement rather than armed struggle. The ensuing period of "organic work" saw the development of the Polish League and efforts to promote economic rationalism and a Polish national identity among peasants.

1863 Uprising: The January Insurrection

The mass insurrection envisioned by Polish conspirators in 1846 came to fruition nearly two decades later in the Russian sector of Partitioned Poland. Also known as the January Insurrection, the 1863 uprising in the Congress Kingdom, Lithuania, Belarus, and parts of Latvia and Ukraine was the largest and most consequential of the armed struggles for Polish independence. Over 200,000 peasants, workers, and landowners united in guerilla warfare against the Russian army for more than a year, provoking profound socio-economic transformation of the region (Wandycz 1974: 179). Peasant emancipation, decreed by Alexander II in 1861, became a practical reality during the struggle, and the brutal Russian reprisal against the aristocracy hastened the decline of the feudal social structure. But the devastating consequences of the revolution's failure, in death, dispossession, and mass exile, led many Poles to abandon the idea of liberating their country through armed resistance.

Russia responded to the exposure of the 1846 conspiracy in Partitioned Poland by fortifying the regions under its control with additional troops to prevent the outbreak of revolution. Conspiratorial networks remained active but resistance was kept underground by intense tsarist suppression of civic life. In the late 1850s, with Russia economically and politically weakened by the Crimean War and the beginning of liberalization under Alexander II, Polish independence once again became the subject of open political debate.

Warsaw was infused with new intellectual energy as political prisoners from 1831 were allowed to return from exile, and students came to study in universities newly established under Alexander II's more relaxed policies. Students and young people inspired by both the heroes of 1831 and leftist intellectuals such as Herzen, Marx, Engels, and Bakunin began organizing patriotic protests; the School of Fine Arts and the Medical-Surgical Academy in Warsaw became centers of conspiratorial activity. Landowners, organized under the leadership of Andrzej Zamoyski as the Agricultural Society in 1857 to promote agricultural innovation and reform, also turned to the question of Polish independence. A "moral revolution" was well under way within the larger society by 1861, involving resistance to Russian authority, new associations at all levels of society, and interfaith and inter-class fraternization. The tsar's willingness to entertain reforms to avert a peasant uprising did not extend to full liberation of Poland, however, and divisions arose both among the landowners and across social classes as to the best means to realize growing patriotic ambitions.

In 1861 clashes between the police and demonstrators intensified as people demanded liberation of the serfs and Polish autonomy. When Russian forces opened fire on a crowd of demonstrators in February, killing five people, a delegation of representatives from every class and faith in Warsaw petitioned the viceroy for relief. In the face of this united Polish front, Viceroy Gorchakov withdrew the troops from the streets and sought an alliance with Polish liberals in maintaining peace. The liberal camp was divided between Zamoyski, leader of the Agricultural Society who feared social revolution but was unwilling to collaborate with the Russians, and Wielopolski, who embraced Russia as a partner in real reforms. Wielopolski successfully negotiated the revival of local self-government along with badly needed educational, religious, and land reforms, but his statist approach was hostile to the church hierarchy and the Agricultural Society as leaders in social revival and resulted in alienation of public opinion. His April 6 dissolution of the Agricultural Society and the City Delegation that had responded to the first deaths at the hands of Russian troops resulted in huge crowds of protesters in front of the viceroy's residence two days later. Despite his efforts to stop the massacre of over 100 protesters by Russian troops, the event branded him a traitor in the public eye, especially among left-leaning students and workers.

With the dissolution of the Agricultural Society the churches became a major center of the "moral revolution." National hymns were sung at special masses that became patriotic ceremonies open to all faiths (Wandycz 1974: 166). The movement spread to Lithuania and Volhynia where singing protesters clashed with Russian troops. In October a Russian attack on two churches in Warsaw resulted in the arrest and imprisonment of thousands of people. Russia declared martial law and summoned Wielopolski, who resigned from his position as head of Poland's Civil Administration, to Moscow.

Polish society was divided into two major groups: the "Reds," comprised of left-leaning petty nobles, students, and workers, and the "Whites," who were largely liberal-minded landed nobles and gentry. By the end of 1861 and early 1862 the divisions between the two groups began to soften. Wielopolski's return from Moscow with approval of a separate Polish administration won the support of some Whites, but the feeble gestures toward land reform raised the ire of the Reds. His order of the public hanging of three young Reds for attempting to assassinate Grand Duke Constantine upon his arrival in Warsaw as viceroy further eroded public confidence in him and created martyrs for the revolution. Zamoyski moved the Whites closer to the Reds by refusing to collaborate with the Russians in the absence of a Polish army, a constitution, and restoration of the former eastern territories of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth. By the end of 1862 the Reds' newly organized National Central Committee had the financial support of much of the gentry and lower clergy in its preparations for insurrection. The Committee, which presented itself as a de facto national government, demanded national independence for Poland, equal rights for men regardless of class or religion, transfer of land ownership to the peasants who cultivated it with compensation to landlords from state funds, and abolition of compulsory labor.

The Reds regarded their revolutionary goals as part of a larger struggle for social emancipation anticipated in Russia where abolition of serfdom had not alleviated the plight of the peasants. They intended to await the outbreak of insurgency in Russia before initiating their own revolution, but as the Russian conspiracy appeared increasingly incapable of waging military action, Wielopolski moved to neutralize the Reds through selective conscription into the army. He excluded landowners and farm workers from the draft in favor of the urban youth who were the core of the Red organization. The National Central Committee declared that the draft would be resisted with force, and against the judgment of several committee members Zygmunt Padlewski began the insurrection, without preparation or a concrete military plan, in the middle of winter.

The Committee issued a manifesto declaring its political goals and calling for support from the nations under Russian control. Priests and leaders of the insurrection read a declaration of the end of serfdom to the peasants and appeals were issued to the Jews and Ukrainians to gain their support. Thousands volunteered and in the first month managed to drive out three-quarters of the occupying Russian troops, despite being outnumbered 20 to 1. But they lacked strategy and command.

Napoleon III's indication that he supported the revolution gave the White leadership the pretext they needed to join the insurrection in April 1863. They contributed financial resources as well as military and political experience to the cause, and quickly gained substantial influence over both the insurgency and the government. Throughout 1863 the Reds and Whites cooperated in running a full-fledged shadow state centered in Warsaw. The Reds mobilized peasants in Lithuania and Belarus and the revolution developed a broad social base of support in these regions. The National Government was less successful in extending the revolution to Ukraine, where peasants regarded the insurgent leaders with suspicion. Poles in Prussia and Galicia also lent financial and military support, and many volunteers from other European nations fought and died for the ideal of social equality represented by the Polish struggle.

The insurgents were far outnumbered by the Russian forces and were ultimately able to do little more than disrupt the Russians' efforts to regain control of the region while waiting for assistance from the European powers. The expected aid from France was not forthcoming, and diplomatic intervention from Sweden merely emboldened Russia in stamping out the revolution. Romuald Traugutt temporarily revived the revolutionary spirit and worked aggressively to engage the peasants when he took control of the insurgency in October 1863. In February and March 1864, however, Alexander II issued emancipation decrees, ending feudal obligations and granting peasants ownership of the land they cultivated. By co-opting the reforms instituted by the National Government the Russians neutralized peasant support for the revolution. The arrest and execution of Traugutt and four other members of the Polish government in August 1864 precipitated the collapse of the resistance later that year.

Russia imposed harsh reprisals in the wake of the uprising. Over 70,000 people were arrested and imprisoned or deported and the government confiscated over 3,000 estates between Poland and Lithuania. Church lands were appropriated and monasteries and convents were abolished. Former government functionaries were banned from government positions and Polish autonomy was completely reversed. An intense policy of Russification was imposed in schools and public administration. The vision of national independence that had been sustained over three decades in the partitioned territories and Polish diaspora was abandoned as Poles focused on cultural and economic survival under intense Russian repression. Historians regard the failure of the January Uprising as a critical turning point in the development of “Warsaw positivism,” which emphasized identity and structure over agency in the construction of the nation. As Brian Porter describes, the nation became society rather than a cause, constituted by the laws of nature rather than the actions of revolutionary patriots (2000: 44).

SEE ALSO: Bakunin, Mikhail Alexandrovich (1814–1876); Engels, Friedrich (1820–1895); European Revolutions of 1848; Marx, Karl (1818–1883); Polish Revolution (Sejm), 1788–1792; Polish Revolution of 1830; Polish Revolution, 1905–1907; Women in the 1848 Revolution, Poland

References and Suggested Readings

- Hahn, H. H. (2001) The Polish Nation in the Revolution of 1846–49. In D. Dowe et al., Europe in 1848: Revolution and Reform. New York: Berghahn Books.
- Kisluk, E. J. (2005) Brothers from the North: The Polish Democratic Society and the European Revolutions of 1848–1849. Boulder, CO: East European Monographs.
- Kramer, L. S. (1988) Threshold of a New World: Intellectuals and the Exile Experience in Paris, 1830–1848. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Kutolowski, J. F. (2000) The West and Poland: Essays on Governmental and Public Responses to the Polish National Movement, 1861–1864. Boulder, CO: East European Monographs.
- Porter, B. (2000) When Nationalism Began to Hate: Imagining Modern Politics in Nineteenth-Century Poland. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Wandycz, P. (1974) The Lands of Partitioned Poland, 1779–1918. Seattle: University of Washington Press.

Poland, student movement, 1968

A. Kemp-Welch

Activist Adam Michnik, veteran of 1968, later reflected to a fellow-radical, Daniel Cohn-Bendit, that “the late sixties were interesting because a few friends and I managed to function as a legal opposition group within a system that didn’t admit the existence of a legal opposition. It’s thanks to the University [of Warsaw] that we were able to exist.” Students debated and argued at the Club of Seekers after Contradictions and sang songs of the Russian “dissidents” Galich and Okudzava. Sometimes they sallied forth to ask difficult and embarrassing questions at meetings of their elders: about the Ribbentrop–Molotov Pact or the fate of Polish soldiers at Katyń. As the Prague Spring emerged, they chanted: “Poland demands its own Dubček.”

Imprisoned activists Jacek Kuroń and Karol Modzelewski were role models for these youthful rebels and many actions were attempted in their defense. Michnik sent copies of Kuroń and Modzelewski’s 1964 “Open Letter to the Party” to Paris, where it was widely circulated by students occupying Paris universities in May 1968. Soon after the authors’ release from prison, a new issue presented itself in which the twin themes of national independence and cultural freedom were neatly entwined.

Mickiewicz’s classical drama Dziady (Forefathers) was staged at the National Theater to mark the fiftieth anniversary of the Russian Revolution. It is not clear why its subject, Poland’s struggle for freedom under the Russian partition, was thought suitable by the theatrical censorship, but performances began on November 25, 1967, and high dignitaries of the party and state attended. During the play’s run, audiences grew increasingly responsive to the anti-Russian passages. This alarmed the authorities, who banned the play on January 30, 1968, which happened to coincide with a favorable review in Pravda. The last performance was packed and the audience frequently expressed its enthusiastic support. As the curtain fell, Modzelewski called from the gallery: “Independence without Censorship!" Afterwards, about 300 members of the audience marched out to the nearby Mickiewicz statue, festooning it with flowers and banners, demanding more performances. This first street demonstration in more than a decade shocked the party leadership.

In the next few days, Warsaw University students collected signatures for a two-sentence petition to the Sejm (parliament): "We, Warsaw youth, protest against the decision to ban performances of Adam Mickiewicz's Dziady at the National Theater in Warsaw. We protest against a policy cutting us off from the progressive traditions of the Polish nation." There was strong support throughout the university, particularly in the departments of philosophy, history, and political economy and in residence halls. By February 5 the students had gathered 400 signatures; by the time the petition was presented to parliament on February 16, they had 3,000 signatures. The students' demand became an international issue when two of the "commandos," Michnik and Henryk Szlajfer, were interviewed for Le Monde by Bernard Margueritte. Their account of current events was widely reported abroad and broadcast back to Poland on Radio Free Europe.

Some students managed to travel, despite a banning edict at train and bus stations and even road blocks. Warsaw student Jan Gross reached Kraków on March 10 where his organizing meetings were monitored by the secret police. The first posters went up early that morning: "Help Warsaw" and "Down with Censorship." Five hundred Kraków students were demonstrating at the Mickiewicz statue by midday. One thousand attended a mass meeting and passed a resolution in support of Warsaw students. The rector's appeal for calm discussion of the matter in hand was initially well received. He withdrew his offer to negotiate, however, when the students presented a much more extensive reform agenda. The students put forth five demands: adherence to the constitution; release of the detained students and researchers; full public disclosure with respect to the course of events; a special commission to establish the facts which would proceed in public; and autonomy for higher education in Poland. They called for publication of the above within 48 hours.

The initially mild reaction by the Kraków authorities was later ascribed to the comparative liberalism of the local leaders, who did not wish to inflame tensions. But it is also attributable to the sheer speed of events, which took the secret police and militia by surprise. The authorities had not experienced such protests since 1956 and were thus slow to respond. This did not deter them from considerable brutality thereafter, however. A "pacification" operation took place over four days, during which raids with gas and water were conducted on the university campus and 128 students were arrested.

The next revolt was in Lublin, home both to the Catholic University (KUL) and the state university named after Maria Skłodowska-Curie. Having heard the Radio Free Europe broadcast, students circulated fliers "in solidarity with the young students of Warsaw." According to official estimates, about 1,000 young people (including schoolchildren) assembled on March 11. Their behavior, deemed "aggressive" by official propaganda, was countered by a 300-strong group of workers backed by militia with batons: 43 demonstrators were arrested, including 20 students from KUL. Thereafter, student protests became nationwide.

Two hundred students met in the Łódź University Library to choose a delegation to the rector. The rector responded merely by closing the building. In Gliwice, some 200 students from the Silesian Polytechnical University sang patriotic anthems, the Internationale, and laid flowers at the Mickiewicz statue. Four hundred students from Poznań's Adam Mickiewicz University demonstrated peacefully at his statue. Four and a half thousand students from all higher education institutions in Wrocław declared a 48-hour occupation strike. They issued an 11-point resolution, including the establishment of a Sejm Commission to review their demands, and appealed for solidarity from the working class. Their slogans stated: "Workers, we are with you," "Workers, support our interests," "Workers, we're your children," "Workers and peasants!!! We are waiting for your support!"

Official placards responded: "Students Back to their Studies," a sentiment widely echoed in Western Europe during student protests later in the year. Massive counter-rallies were held by the authorities. Their size and organization far outnumbered anything the students could muster. One such event in Kraków passed 80 resolutions, all unanimous in their support of the party and its leadership. Student leaders were portrayed by the party as the "golden youth," living at home, feeding on bananas (an unobtainable luxury), and smoking American cigarettes. In addition to abusing free higher education, they were sponging off their parents, many of whom had retired from or still occupied high positions. How could their parents have brought up such “parasites”? And then came a more insidious charge. Building on the thesis that the “commandos” were mainly Jewish, the students were accused of using Mickiewicz to disguise their true, Zionist, interests.

The public had yet to hear from party leader Gomulka. His 11-day silence was broken on March 19 with an address to 3,000 party activists in the Congress Hall of the Palace of Culture that was broadcast live throughout the country. Gomulka stated that the student protests had not been spontaneous, but rather had been incited by writers and academics in the humanistic faculties of Warsaw University, such as Professors Brus, Baczek, Morawski, and Bauman, long known within the party for their revisionist views. He then presented a more sinister charge: “An active part in the events was played by young academics of Jewish origin.” Jews, he argued, fell into three categories: Zionist, cosmopolitan, and those loyalists “who regard Poland as their only fatherland.”

Shortly after Gomulka’s speech the rector of Warsaw University announced the abolition of the faculties of economics, philosophy, sociology, and psychology; the third year of mathematics and physics was also disbanded. Some 1,616 students were dismissed from their studies in Warsaw alone, and the purge extended to other university cities. In Wrocław Technical University, 1,553 students were expelled from three departments. An even more dramatic purge – of alleged Zionists – took place in the high offices of state. Between March and May 1968, 483 senior officials were summarily sacked, including four ministers, 14 vice-ministers, seven director-generals, and 51 departmental heads. These measures were replicated with greater severity outside the capital. The reasons for dismissal were charges of “pro-Zionist” views, Jewish origin, or both. As a result of these purges, Poland lost about 15,000 citizens through emigration.

Though quickly suppressed, the student rising of 1968 had long-term consequences. Gomulka’s rule received its first serious challenge: he was overthrown by a workers’ uprising two years later. A large cohort of dispossessed students struggling to complete their studies part-time or in distant locations, including Michnik, became permanent oppositionists. They helped create the political movement in the 1970s that led to the birth of Solidarność (Solidarity).

SEE ALSO: Dubček, Alexander (1921–1992); Kuroń, Jacek (1934–2004); Michnik, Adam (b. 1946); Poland, 1956 Uprising; Prague Spring; Solidarność (Solidarity); May 1968 French Uprisings; Student Movements

References and Suggested Readings

- Eisler, J. (1991) Marzec 1968: Geneza, przebieg, konsekwencje (March 1968: Origins, Course, Consequences). Warsaw: Państwowe Wydawnictwo Naukowe.
- Michnik, A. (1998) Letters from Freedom: Post-Cold War Realities and Perspectives. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.
- Raina, P. (1978) Political Opposition in Poland, 1954–1977. London: Poets & Painters Press.
- Suri, J. (2003) Power and Protest: Global Revolution and the Rise of Détente. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Poland, trade unions and protest, 1988–1993

Tibor T. Mezzmann

In contrast to other communist states behind the former Iron Curtain, trade unions in Poland were central actors both during the events preceding the fall of communism in 1989 and during the first transition years to the promising world of market democracy. Trade unions’ political involvement between 1989 and 1993 rested on a legacy of workers’ protests and union activism during communism, most importantly the much-celebrated “self-limiting revolution” (Staniszki 1984) of the Solidarity trade union in 1980–1. The particularly active and rebellious nature of Polish society during the transition was largely due to trade union involvement (Ekiert & Kubik 1999; Ost 2002). Union involvement expressed both hope and rising social expectations and, amid great economic hardships, social apathy and defensive employee protest.

At once a trade union and a broad-based democratic social and political movement, Solidarity was the dominant union from 1988 to 1993. It spawned new political parties and was the main social force behind the first post-communist government in Poland. Its all-encompassing role was compared to that of the Catholic Church and the former Polish Communist Party. Solidarity attracted activists with strict trade unionist orientations as well as those interested in wider political activism, opportunities for career advancement, or the betterment of the country. At a minimum, worker protest and activism through trade unions played a foundational role in the constitution of many new social and political identities and institutions in late communist and early post-communist Poland.

The political and economic process of leaving communism behind started in Poland with worker strikes in May and August 1988. The strikes resulted in a widely watched TV duel in November 1988 between two competing trade union leaders: the chairman of the then-illegal Solidarity, Nobel laureate Lech Walesa, and Alfred Miodowicz, chairman of the freshly consolidated pro-communist trade union federation OPZZ. The duel led to the historic Round Table negotiations, involving representatives of the communist government, OPZZ, and Solidarity as both political opposition and as a trade union. Agreements were reached on all-encompassing economic reforms and democratization, as well as the re-legalization of Solidarity as a trade union in April 1989.

The trade union scene was divided ideologically, geographically, and economically into two rival camps: those stemming from the original Solidarity (from 1980–1) and those linked to the reformed (post-)communist OPZZ, a loose federation of economic branch-based unions. The Solidarity camp included several more radically anti-communist organizations, including Fighting Solidarity, Solidarity 80, and the worker movement led by Andrzej Gwiżdża. In addition to differing attitudes towards communism and the government, a crucial point of disagreement among unions was their approach to economic reforms. In the late 1980s there was a consensus among economists that Poland needed radical economic reforms and restructuring. Only the pace of reforms – whether to implement them by shock therapy or more gradually – was up for debate. As industrial workers would bear the brunt of the reforms, the main challenge for trade unions was reconciling responsibilities towards their members in state-owned enterprises facing restructuring with state demands that unions be patriotic, socially responsible, and reform-legitimizing organizations. Severe economic recession and rapidly rising unemployment in the early 1990s triggered a large number of workers' protests and strikes, putting further pressure on trade unions.

Strikes in 1988 and 1989 were largely political, their main goal being Solidarity's re-legalization. After 1990 workers initiated strikes to demand more equitable distribution of state funds and amelioration of the impact of restructuring on particular sectors of the workforce. The strikers initially came from the privileged sectors of the economy that were losing monopolistic positions: railway/transit workers and miners. By the end of 1991 the collapse of the Soviet market and decrease in the competitiveness of industrial exports due to institutionalization of strong monetarist policies had taken a significant toll on the economy. A broad base of industrial workers was mobilized in response to the deteriorating economic situation. In the beginning of 1992 teachers began organizing coordinated strike actions, followed by workers in the aerospace and military industries. With renewed strikes by railway workers, the cycle began again. At the peak of industrial conflict, in December 1992, there was an 18-day strike in the Silesian coal mines involving 300,000 miners in 65 mines (Kramer 1995: 102). The following spring there was a general strike in the light industry sector and a massive nationwide protest by public sector employees.

Although they were the most visible and best organized form of protest, strikes represented only about 10 percent of industrial conflicts (Kloc 1992: 139). The Law on Trade Unions and Collective Bargaining passed in May 1991 eased restrictions on organizing relative to those in place during communism but nonetheless imposed burdensome conditions on industrial action and did not protect workers in the private sector. The new law coincided with the nadir of economic recession, and workers responded by embracing new modes of protest. From the second half of 1991 non-institutionalized forms of protest intensified. Among these were hunger strikes, sit-ins, road blockades, occupation of public buildings, long-term rotational strikes, and nationwide protests organized by the two leading, national-level organizations, Solidarity and OPZZ.

While struggling to adjust their complex organizations to the new environment, Polish trade unions positioned themselves differently vis-à-vis reforms and the manner of protest and industrial action. The reformed post-communist OPZZ defined itself strictly as a trade union, accepting general social responsibility for reforms but attacking specific economic measures. The smaller trade unions that had split off from Solidarity refused to legitimize the Round Table political agreement or accept economic reforms. Solidarity 80 became especially prominent in organizing militant workers' actions. The OPZZ was less militant, but had access to negotiations with key decision-makers. Continuing its strategy of working within the establishment from the late 1980s, OPZZ gained seats in the Polish parliament in the 1991 and 1993 parliamentary elections in coalition with the reformed post-communist party. Solidarity followed suit and ran independently, winning some seats, but only in 1991, and developing ties with liberal and right-wing parties as well as those that had grown out of Solidarity in the first place.

At the point of its re-legalization, Solidarity was in a weak and fragmented state. Trade union activism was hampered by economic conditions: skilled workers and activists were leaving or had already left industrial jobs for the private sector, weakening the movement's base in the factories. The old territorial organizing principle was inadequate for optimal representation and reconciliation of differing interests among the workforce. From its re-legalization up until early 1991, the union's development was uneven, differing across regions and sectors of the economy. The regional distribution of membership was skewed with a much larger number of members and activists in 6 of 38 regions. This unsynchronized organizational development coincided with disputes and conflicts within the leadership.

Solidarity was initially a protective umbrella against the shock therapy reforms of 1990, but its viability as a real political alternative quickly declined. After 1990 Solidarity had no unified position or straightforward answer to the reforms, nor did it have an accepted and well-defined program. At Solidarity's Second Congress organizational reforms were sidelined in favor of discussions about the union's identity and its political strategies. Walesa was reelected as the chairman. In May 1990 Walesa's "war at the top" for political pluralism caused another serious split within the union and the movement: the liberal wing and those more supportive of the government were pitted against those favoring greater union autonomy and a more pronounced anti-communist ideology. The friction was severe, and many veteran activists left the union either because of conflict with the chairman or to become involved in party politics or government service. After Walesa became the president of Poland at the end of 1990, steps were taken to democratize decision-making and professionalize the union, but the central authority and cohesive force of the trade union were weak. The union was plagued by a steady departure of its most talented leaders.

After 1991–2 Solidarity continued to act as a buffer between the government and the workers, albeit with increasingly non-transparent and non-coordinated strategies. Solidarity was often characterized as an ungovernable organization, and its lack of organizational discipline undermined its political efficacy within the parliament and as a civil society actor alike. Parliamentary representatives were originally expected to monitor the authorities and influence legislation without taking part in the government, yet some deputies acted as representatives rather than delegates, claiming to be independent of the central leadership. Such behavior resulted in open conflict among the delegates themselves, and with union headquarters. At the plant level, through pressures from the rank and file, union leaders increased their autonomy from the center and conducted independent strikes, ultimately forming a parallel structure. The leadership's attempts to moderate these fragmenting "anarchic" tendencies were only partly successful.

Retrospectively, the success of such deep democratic and economic reforms in Poland is hardly imaginable without the intense involvement of trade unions. However, trade unions paid a high price for their active role. The main weakness of the Polish workers' movement was that they had neither a programmatic vision of the role of trade unions after transition, nor a strategy to cope with a privatized economy. Furthermore, the attempt to compensate for the structural vulnerabilities of trade unionism in a liberalizing economy by engaging party politics in fact backfired. Thus, contemporary trade union membership fell to the lowest levels in post-communist Central Europe. Although trade unions have now grown into professionalized and responsive organizations, some observers have proclaimed the death of worker solidarity in Poland.

SEE ALSO: Kuroń, Jacek (1934–2004); Michnik, Adam (b. 1946); Poland, Committee for Workers (KOR); Solidarność (Solidarity); Walesa, Lech (b. 1943)

References and Suggested Readings

- Adamski, W. W. (1993) Conflict in Trade Union Affiliation: Continuity and Change. In W. W. Adamski (Ed.), Societal Conflict and Systemic Change: The Case of Poland. Warsaw: IFiS.
- Ekiert, G. & Kubik, J. (1999) Rebellious Civil Society: Popular Protest and Democratic Consolidation in Poland, 1989–1993. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.
- Grabowska, M. (2006) Jako błyskawica: problemy z polityczną instytucjonalizacją ruchu Solidarności (Like Lightning: Problems of Political Institutionalization of Solidarity). In Solidarność: wydarzenie, konsekwencje i pamięć (Solidarity: Emergence, Consequences, Memories). Warsaw: IFiS PAN.
- Hausner, J. (1996) Models of the System of Interest Representation in Post-Communist Societies: The Case of Poland. In A. Ágh & G. Ilonszky (Eds.), The Second Steps: Parliaments and Organized Interests. Budapest: Hungarian Center for Democracy Studies Foundation.
- Jackiewicz, I. (1994) Solidarity in a Double Role: Political Representation and Pressure Groups 1991–1994. Working Paper 120. Budapest: Hungarian Center for Democracy Studies Foundation.
- Kloc, K. (1992) Polish Labor in Transition (1990–92). Telos 92: 139–48.
- Kramer M. (1995) Polish Workers and the Post-Communist Transition, 1989–1993. Communist and Post-Communist Studies 28 (1): 97–8.
- Marciniak, P. (1992) Polish Labor Unions: Can They Find A Way Out? Telos 92: 149–57.
- Ost, D. (2002) The Weakness of Strong Social Movements: Models of Unionism in the East European Context. European Journal of Industrial Relations 8 (1): 33–51.
- Staniszki, J. (1984) Poland's Self Limiting Revolution. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Ujadowski, K. M. & Rafał, M. (1993) Równi i Równiejsi. Rzecz o Związku Zawodowych w Polsce (The Equal and the More Equal: On Trade Unions in Poland). Warsaw: Oficyna Wydawnicza Rytm.

Polish Revolution (Sejm), 1788–1792

Richard Butterwick

The “Polish Revolution,” also known as the Four Years’ Sejm (Diet or parliament), refers to the period between October 1788 and May 1792 during which the Sejm transformed Poland’s institutions of central and local government. The Constitution of May 3, 1791 was the first modern constitution in Europe and the second in the world, coming between the American and French constitutions. The accompanying ferment in political culture affected metropolis and provinces, nobles and burghers, laity and clergy. The first “revolutionary” act of the Four Years’ Sejm was to cast off Russian tutelage. The Sejm then governed the Commonwealth as the embodiment of its sovereignty until a Russian invasion installed a counterrevolutionary regime in the summer of 1792.

The Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth (founded by the Union of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in 1569, by the eighteenth century generally referred to as “Poland”) had been one of Europe’s great powers. However, it was debilitated by decades of warfare on its own soil after 1648. Its form of government, delicately balanced between the noble citizens’ liberties and the considerable influence that remained to the elective monarchs, was completely paralyzed by the mid-eighteenth century. Behind “republican” slogans, politics was essentially rivalry between magnate coterie for the fruits of royal patronage and dominance of the law courts. From about 1720, the Commonwealth was part of the Russian sphere of influence. After Catherine the Great arranged the election to the throne of her ex-lover, Stanisław Poniatowski, in 1764, the degree of Russian control on Polish affairs intensified. It deepened again after the First Partition of 1772. The Russian ambassador in 1772–90, Otto von Stackelberg, was compared by Frederick the Great to an ancient Roman proconsul.

Russia’s switch of allies from Prussia to Austria in 1780–1 heralded further attacks on the Ottoman empire, following the victories and conquests of 1768–74. In the spring of 1787 King Stanisław August Poniatowski traversed Poland to meet Catherine as she sailed down the Dnieper River to inspect her new provinces. He proposed a military alliance between Poland and Russia in advance of the expected war with the Turks. This would entail an increase in the Commonwealth’s risibly small army of 18,000 men to 45,000 men, as well as the necessary taxes. The king counted on the support of noblemen of middling means. Catherine denied him an immediate answer, but her dismissive treatment of the opposition magnates who paid their own court to her led some of them to seek a new protector in Berlin.

As the months passed without an answer to his proposal for an alliance, Stanisław August was increasingly troubled by what he called a “ferment of minds” among the nobility. In part this was the outcome of his own policies in education and the arts, which promoted an “enlightened,” reformist patriotism, but it was also the effect of a cultural sea-change which produced nostalgia for a glorious and virtuous past. Among the nobility there was little appetite for war with the Ottoman empire, and resentment at Russian hegemony, expressed in the “guarantee” of the Commonwealth’s form of government that was written into the partition treaties.

The “ferment” was voiced in the instructions issued by the local assemblies of the nobility – the sejmiks – which elected envoys to the Sejm in August 1788. But they were not much affected by the Enlightenment. The proposal to expand the army was immensely popular – one factor was the rise in the noble population and the need to find employment for impoverished, idle young men. But the nobles were reluctant to tax themselves, and calls upon the clergy to pay for the army were often accompanied by demands that monks should make themselves useful by educating youth traditionally in Latin (for legal and rhetorical purposes). Suspicion of irreligious metropolitan manners was reflected in demands to ban travel abroad and to make the wearing of national costume compulsory. The opposition called for neutrality in the Russo-Turkish war and was critical of the Permanent Council (the limited central government imposed by Russia in 1775). A significant number of opposition candidates were elected, although the king was still expected to have a majority when the Sejm met.

Too late, Catherine II consented to a scaled-down military alliance. The Sejm opened on October 7, 1788, and promptly “confederated” itself. This was crucial, as under the aegis of a confederacy (a time-hallowed form of legalized insurrection) the Sejm could dispense with the usual requirement of unanimity and take decisions by majority vote. The alliance was scuppered by a note from the king of Prussia, read out to the Sejm on October 13. His offer to help Poland maintain its independence, liberty, and security, couched in the respectful tone of a concerned friend, convinced the members of the Sejm that they were now masters of their own destiny. A week later, they joyously acclaimed an army of 100,000 men, with little thought of how the troops were to be recruited, equipped, and paid. Republicans traditionally feared a standing army in the hands of a monarch, so the question of command also had to be resolved.

The opposition turned on the military department of the Permanent Council, and in a series of tumultuous debates the royal majority evaporated. The dependence of the court party on patronage was exposed by the Sejm’s decision in secret voting to abolish the military department and replace it with a military commission elected by and directly subordinated to the Sejm. The king warned against angering Russia by abrogating the form of government stipulated by the treaty. But to many excited minds, his caution seemed like cowardice, and was ignored.

At this critical juncture, Stanisław August refused Stackelberg’s advice to leave Warsaw and form a counter-confederacy against the Sejm, rightly fearing that such a step would provoke the opposition to invite in Prussian troops. Prussia would then be able to demand Polish territory – either from the Poles or from the Russians. Frederick William II had to wait longer, before cashing in his growing pile of chips. The opposition again attacked the Permanent Council and in a decisive vote on January 19, 1789 it was abolished. Having prolonged itself indefinitely (the usual term for a Sejm being six weeks), the Sejm was now effectively a “ruling Sejm,” and the king little more than a cipher.

This first stage of the Polish Revolution – the overthrow of the system in which the king and his party managed Russian hegemony – was linked to a revolution in political culture. A profusion of mostly anonymous pamphlets and treatises discussed what should be done. Apart from ideas for raising revenue, some put forward programs for an overhaul of the system of government, and in a few cases (notably the works of Reverend Hugo Kołłątaj) even redefined the idea of the “nation” to include all inhabitants of the Commonwealth, with propertied nobles and burghers as the active participants in the body politic. Politically charged sermons, often printed “at the demand of the public,” were an effective way of reaching provincial audiences.

Aristocratic ladies fêted the leading orators of the opposition at balls and parties. Ladies took the lead, too, in the cheering and jeering from the Sejm's public gallery, which spurred on the opposition and demoralized the royalists. The Sejm's procedural rules (until the reform of March 1791) permitted the introduction of new material at almost any point in proceedings, and required that all proposals be considered and decided clause by clause. No speaker could be halted in mid-flow. These conditions indulged windbags, but they also provided endless opportunities intentionally to bog down deliberations.

The wing of the opposition led by Franciszek Ksawery Branicki was increasingly suspected of doing just that. Branicki's predecessors as Grand Hetman of the Polish crown had enjoyed extensive powers prior to 1776 and he was determined to get them back. Branicki's wife Aleksandra was the favorite niece of Grigorii Potemkin and his morganatic wife, Catherine II. For years Branicki and his allies had been the channel through which Russia had stunted Stanisław August's ideas of reform, although they had never been trusted by the empress to exercise power themselves. It escaped no one's notice that Branicki's supporters took the lead in denouncing Russia. Branicki explained to his "dear uncle" Potemkin that he could not be seen to resist the clamor, if he was "one day to be able to be useful to Russia as a good Pole."

Not only royalists but Branicki and his clients as well were lampooned in the verses and riddles that circulated in Warsaw's streets, squares, gardens, taverns, and salons (the city's population grew in these four years from about 90,000 to 115,000). In the spring of 1789 Branicki was suspected of exploiting fears that the peasants of the Ukraine, allegedly incited by Potemkin's emissaries, would again rise and slaughter the nobles and Jews. Branicki would then rally nobles to the colors and extinguish the rebellions. Having made himself master of the Commonwealth, he would return it to the Russian sphere of influence. So ran the theory. One cannot be certain.

The "Ukrainian rebellions" came to nothing, but the alarm focused attention on the eastern reaches of the Commonwealth, where a social and religious chasm separated peasants from their masters. The Sejm moved slowly to defuse confessional grievances: in July 1790 it bolstered the status of the Uniate Church by admitting the Uniate metropolitan to the senate, and in May 1792, despite opposition from Rome, it agreed to a fully fledged Orthodox hierarchy, independent of the Orthodox Church in Russia. Protestantism, strongest among the burghers, did not present the same political dangers. A self-consciously "enlightened" policy of toleration for all faiths, without challenging the dominance of Roman Catholicism, caused relatively little controversy.

It was the Roman Catholic Church that felt the brunt of the Sejm's search for revenue and insistence on exercising sovereignty. In March and April 1789, the bishops were bullied into "offering" twice the 10 percent per annum that was volunteered from noble estates. That was in addition to the clergy's existing subsidium charitativum. In July 1789, following what the papal nuncio called "intrigues and simonies" regarding the vacant bishopric of Cracow, the Sejm seized the revenues of the Commonwealth's richest see for the army, leaving the future bishop a salary of 100,000 zlotys. Following this step, unprecedented for a Catholic state in peacetime, schism with the Holy See loomed. The tactful diplomacy of the nuncio, and the good sense of the deputation appointed by the Sejm to turn the resolution into a reform, allowed a face-saving compromise to be reached. Bishops would each draw their 100,000 zlotys from landed estates in their possession. Even Branicki played a part in easing the passage of the measure through the Sejm. Despite the prominence of calls for a root and branch reform of clerical incomes and duties, appetite for radical change was limited, without an overwhelming political or fiscal motive.

In the summer of 1789 the king's fortunes reached their nadir. His closest ally and younger brother, Michał Poniatowski, the primate of Poland, who had hoped to retain the administration of the bishopric of Cracow, left the country in dismay. Yet in the aftermath of the Cracow debacle tentative feelers were put out between the king and the more enlightened part of the opposition, led by the Czartoryskis and the junior branch of the Potocki clan. They were suspicious of Branicki's intentions, and feared that he would prevent their vision of an "enlightened" Commonwealth from becoming reality. Due to mistrust between them and the king, cooperation did not begin in earnest until the end of 1790.

The first obstacle was cleared when the king accepted the Prussian alliance, which was ratified in March 1790. Then the opposition became bogged down in drawing up a "republican" form of government. When the Project of the Form of Government, largely drafted by Ignacy Potocki, was discussed in September 1790, royalist envoys mounted a devastating attack on “magnates” and “aristocrats” as the oppressors of ordinary nobles, casting the king as their natural defender. The royal prerogative to nominate members of the senate, lost in 1775, was duly restored. Finally, the sejmiks of November 1790 – needed to elect a second complement of envoys to sit alongside the original ones – chose many royalists. The sejmiks also drew up instructions still more “unenlightened” than those of 1788. Ignacy Potocki, who had served for years with conviction and energy on the Commission for National Education, was appalled. He now believed that in the short term, a “limited monarchy” was the only way forward. In December 1790 he handed the king the initiative in drafting the new constitution.

Before the constitution was sprung on the Sejm, the question of the burghers’ place in the Commonwealth was resolved. In the autumn of 1789, the chief “royal towns” (as opposed to towns owned by nobles or the Catholic Church) came together to present their demands to the king and the Sejm. Their delegates’ “black procession” to the Royal Castle in December 1789 provoked fears that the burghers might follow the lead of the Third Estate in France. In fact their priorities were fuller self-government and personal liberties like the noble privilege of immunity from arrest without trial. It was Reverend Kollataj who encouraged them to petition for representation in the Sejm.

The work of the deputation appointed by the Sejm to look into the burghers’ grievances stalled in 1790, while an anti-Jewish riot in Warsaw set back their cause. As in many royal towns, Jews were normally prohibited from living within the city limits, but in Warsaw they were allowed in during the Sejm, for the nobles’ convenience. But most Sejms lasted weeks, not years. Tension boiled over in May 1790, although without fatalities. The burghers’ foes in the Sejm (some of whom were engaged in industrial enterprises) used these disturbances to contrast their arrogance with the modesty and docility of the Jews. A deputation was established by the Sejm to consider the reform of Polish Jewry, but the problems of devising and getting agreement to a reform which could successfully integrate Jews into municipal life proved intractable.

The law which the Sejm eventually passed on April 18, 1791 gave royal towns – henceforth “free towns of the Commonwealth” – 21 (later 24) plenipotentiaries with a merely advisory role in the Sejm. On the other hand, it opened the doors to some of the Commonwealth’s executive and judicial bodies, and gave the burghers all they wanted in terms of personal liberties and self-government, liquidating noble, ecclesiastical, and Jewish exceptions to municipal jurisdiction. Careers in the army, Catholic Church, and administration were opened to them, and ennoblement was greatly facilitated. It was enough for the burghers to celebrate gratefully. For their part, nobles could now engage in all trades without losing noble status, and the last year of the Polish Revolution saw many displays of fraternization between nobles and burghers.

On May 3, 1791 the people of Warsaw thronged the streets in anticipation. The new constitution, called the Law on Government, was to be passed straight after the Easter recess, when most of its likely opponents would still be away from Warsaw. Following the reading out of diplomatic despatches, carefully edited to create a sense of threat, it was announced that salvation was at hand. The proposed constitution was read out, but too many protests were heard for it to be acclaimed at once. Only toward evening, after many passionate speeches, did the pressure become overwhelming. The king swore an oath to the new constitution, and almost all present followed his example in the neighboring church. To fortify the dubious legality of the procedure, two days later the Sejm adopted a unanimous resolution endorsing the Constitution of May 3, declaring that attempts to subvert it were rebellion, and ordaining national thanksgiving.

The constitution provoked strong feelings among traditionally minded republicans. The sacred cow of royal election was sacrificed, and the elector of Saxony was invited to found a new dynasty. Perhaps even more shockingly, “executive power” was consigned to the king in the Custodial Council, called a “Guard of the Laws.” In the Council the monarch’s wishes were to “prevail.” The primate was set to return home and join the Council as “head of the clergy” and chairman of the educational commission. Envoys to the Sejm were declared “representatives of the entire nation,” in British fashion, and so unbound by instructions from the sejmiks. Why then, most convincingly of all at the sejmiks held in February 1792, did a critical mass of the nobility endorse the constitution? These same nobles had passed the unenlightened instructions of 1788 and 1790.

In the first place, the tone and much of the contents of the constitution were reassuringly conservative. While toleration was assured to all, apostasy from the dominant Catholic religion remained forbidden. Noble privileges were expressly confirmed. The Law on Towns, incorporated into the constitution, formally preserved the noble monopoly on lawmaking. The peasants were granted little more than verbal recognition of their place in the “nation”; no noble would be compelled to emancipate his serfs. The senate, nominated by the king but confined to a suspensive veto, was far weaker than the chamber of envoys. Although a Montesquieuvian division of powers was endorsed, so was a Rousseauvian supremacy of the “will of the nation.” Ministers were responsible to the Sejm for their countersignatures of the Council’s resolutions.

Second, the reams of subsequent legislation, filling out the gaps in the constitution, made it clear that no further move toward monarchism or centralization was intended. The Sejm could interfere in the work of the central commissions of police, the military, the treasury, and education, whose members it elected. The Sejm would vote by qualified majorities, rising to a requirement of three-quarters for new taxes. Fears for the separate status of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania were assuaged by the “Mutual Assurance of the Two Nations,” passed in October 1791, which guaranteed the Lithuanian representation in the central commissions and accorded every third Sejm to the Grand Duchy.

Third, nobles, after so many depressing decades, could bask in an aura of success. The festivities were certainly orchestrated in form, with a strong ecclesiastical contribution and an emphasis on the favor of Divine Providence. But through the template of the press reports emerges evidence of local initiatives and spontaneous enthusiasm. A key factor here was the participation of thousands of local worthies in the “civil-military commissions of the peace,” established in November 1789. This was among the most successful of the Sejm’s reforms. The commissions received the Sejm’s proclamations and resolutions, and were charged with implementing many of them. In a real sense they linked the center with the provinces, and constituted the most effective local government the Commonwealth had known.

Fourth, the emancipation of middling nobles from aristocratic patrons was largely completed by the restriction of active participation at sejmiks to propertied nobles of the district. This measure has been condemned by many historians as anti-democratic, but previously magnates had often carted in inebriated rabbles of landless (and mostly illiterate) nobles in order to intimidate their opponents. The discourse of “ordered liberty” articulated by the Revolution’s propagandists was practiced in the unusually orderly conduct of the February 1792 sejmiks. Finally, the nobility had come to trust Stanisław August, whose slogan, “the king with the nation, the nation with the king,” expressed a deeply felt national mood.

The downside of this euphoria was that it blinded most supporters of the Revolution, from the king downwards, to the realities of the international situation. War between Austria and Prussia had been averted by the Convention of Reichenbach in July 1790. Leopold II admired the constitution but was preoccupied with holding the Hapsburg monarchy together, and by events in France. Prussia, having been denied the coveted cities of Danzig (Gdańsk) and Thorn (Toruń) by the Sejm in 1790, no longer had any interest in aiding its Polish ally. The Saxon succession was a non-starter, because the elector would not accept the offer without Russian permission. Russia had concluded peace with Sweden in August 1790, seen off British threats in the spring of 1791, and was on the verge of bringing its war against the Ottoman empire to a victorious conclusion.

There was no question of Catherine accepting the constitution, even when the throne was desperately offered to her grandson Constantine. She invited the principal Polish-Lithuanian malcontents to St. Petersburg and dictated their program of restoring the ancient “liberty” overthrown by the “revolutionary” Sejm. On May 14, 1792, the counterrevolutionary confederates crossed into Poland and Lithuania in the baggage trains of two Russian armies, totaling 100,000 men. The Polish forces, not more than 45,000 in the field, managed a creditable fighting retreat. However, the king, like most of the leadership, did not believe in the possibility of military victory. He capitulated on July 24, in the hope he might yet save something from the wreckage. It was not to be. The confederates' slogans of faith and liberty were contradicted by widespread intimidation and plunder. Faced with the confederates' failure to restore stability to the Commonwealth, and the need to keep Prussia fighting revolutionary France, Catherine offered Frederick William II a new partition in January 1793. By the end of 1795, the Commonwealth was but a memory.

May 3 has since been celebrated as a national holiday whenever Poland has enjoyed independence. When national sovereignty was denied, the day often sparked protests against occupying and collaborating regimes. Targowica, the place to which the formation of the Polish confederacy of 1792 was postdated, has become an enduring symbol of treason.

The Four Years' Sejm has rarely been called the "Polish Revolution" by historians, but the term was often used by contemporaries. Initially, it was a "revolution" in an older sense of the word: the sudden replacement of one "system" in international affairs by another. Poland jumped out of the Russian frying pan into a fire stoked by Prussia, blazed with a brilliance that astounded the enlightened world, only to be forcibly returned in a charred and diminished condition to that frying pan in 1792–3. The next attempt to leap from the pan, led by Tadeusz Kościuszko in 1794, resulted in complete incineration in 1795. If a revolution must include social upheaval and popular violence, then the 1794 insurrection seems a better candidate. But we speak of cultural revolutions, sexual revolutions, administrative revolutions, financial revolutions, and so on. A revolution brings change which is both substantial and swift. Contemporaries saw not only the Constitution of May 3, 1791 but also the Four Years' Sejm as a whole as "revolutionary." Its opponents meant that in a derogatory, "Jacobinical" sense. Most of its defenders and admirers, including Edmund Burke, contrasted the mildness of the "Polish Revolution" with the violence of the French Revolution.

The Four Years' Sejm passed laws which amounted to roughly a tenth of all the statute law of the Kingdom of Poland and the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, issued over four and a half centuries. Other candidates for the "Polish Revolution," with the signal exception of Solidarność (Solidarity) in 1980–1, were primarily risings for national independence.

Although the Four Years' Sejm ended with a lost war for independence, it had first brought about revolutionary changes, which would give the lie to the partitioning powers' claims that the Commonwealth was an irremediably anarchic failure.

SEE ALSO: Poland, Revolutions, 1846–1863; Polish Revolution of 1830; Polish Revolution, 1905–1907; Solidarność (Solidarity)

References and Suggested Readings

- Butterwick, R. (1998) Poland's Last King and English Culture: Stanislaw August Poniatowski, 1732–1798. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Butterwick, R. (2005) Political Discourses of the Polish Revolution, 1788–1792. English Historical Review 120 (487): 696–731.
- Fizman, S. (Ed.) (1997) Constitution and Reform in Eighteenth-Century Poland: The Constitution of 3 May 1791. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Gierowski, J. A. (1996) The Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth in the XVIIIth Century: From Anarchy to Well-Organised State. Cracow: Polska Akademia Umiejętności.
- Lord, R. H. (1915) The Second Partition of Poland: A Study in Diplomatic History. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Lukowski, J. (1991) Liberty's Folly: The Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth in the Eighteenth Century. London: Routledge.
- Lukowski, J. (1994) Recasting Utopia: Montesquieu, Rousseau and the Polish Constitution of 3 May 1791. Historical Journal 37 (1): 65–87.
- Lukowski, J. (1999) The Partitions of Poland: 1772, 1793, 1795. Harlow: Longman.
- Stone, D. (1991) Jews and the Urban Question in Late Eighteenth-Century Poland. Slavic Review 50 (2): 531–41.
- Zamoyski, A. A. (1992) Last King of Poland. London: Jonathan Cape.

Polish Revolution of 1830

Amy Linch

Also known as the November Insurrection, or the Cadet Revolution, a conspiracy to depose an unpopular agent of the tsar generated a year-long campaign to restore Poland's independence. The uprising began with a group of cadets from the Imperial Russian military academy in Warsaw under the leadership of Piotr Wysocki, and quickly drew the support of all aspects of society. The Poles were ultimately defeated by the Russian forces, resulting in mass migration of political elites from the Polish territories.

The Polish territories under Russian rule in 1830 constituted the Congress Kingdom of Poland, established at the Congress of Vienna in 1815. Under Tsar Alexander I, the Congress Kingdom was originally semi-autonomous, with its own parliament, constitution, and military. By the time Tsar Nicholas I took the throne in 1825 much of the kingdom's independence was already compromised in practice but repression intensified under his rule. In 1830, the constitution of 1815 was a dead letter, secret police were everywhere, and censorship was severe. Polish organizations were persecuted and Russians had largely replaced Poles in administrative positions.

The tense situation in the kingdom was ignited by Russia's mobilization of the Polish army to suppress revolutionary uprisings in France and Belgium. On the night of November 29, 1830, the cadets attacked the residence of Grand Duke Konstantin Pavlovich, the governor general of Poland appointed by Alexander I. Their goal was to capture and kill the hated Russian aristocrat and head of the Polish army. The attack on the castle was a failure but with the help of Polish civilians the conspirators seized the arsenal and drove the Russian troops out of Warsaw by the following day.

The cadets had no plan for how to deal with the uprising's success. Executive power rested in the hands of the Administrative Council, the members of which opposed any military action. The citizens of Warsaw and the leaders of the uprising forced the Council to dismiss itself and a temporary government was formed. The new government, opposed to the uprising, allowed Russian troops and Prince Konstantin to leave Poland and began negotiations with Tsar Nicholas I. The tsar was not interested in talks, however, seeing the uprising as a good excuse to completely abridge the Congress Kingdom.

On December 18, the parliament (Sejm) declared a "national uprising" and troops of the Congress Kingdom prepared for war against Russia. In January Nicholas I and the Romanov dynasty were dethroned. A new government formed by Czartoryski on January 30 began an international diplomatic campaign to seek help. The government hoped for Prussian neutrality, Austrian support, and material assistance from the western countries. Yet aside from expressions of solidarity in France, the German states, Hungary, and Belgium, support was not forthcoming. Poles were left alone in their struggle against Russia. On the domestic front the government's failure to free the peasants – who were still serfs – automatically excluded a large section of the population as a potential resource in the war effort.

In February Russian Field Marshal Dybicz crossed into the Congress Kingdom with an army 115,000 strong and 348 cannons to face 56,000 well-trained Polish soldiers with 140 cannons. A regular war ensued. Polish troops won initial victories, at Stoczek on February 14 and at Dobre and Wawer a few days later. Five days later Russian troops had suffered heavy losses and failed to take Warsaw. Polish troops won the battles of Wawer (March 31), Dębe Wielkie (March 31), and Iganie (April 10). The uprising spread to Lithuania, soon covering most of its territory with partisan warfare. The end of April and beginning of May saw a change of fortune for Poland: General Dwernicki's army ran out of supplies and had to leave the Polish territories for Austria, where they were disarmed. On May 5 Polish troops suffered a heavy defeat at the battle of Ostrołęka.

During the spring and summer of 1831 Polish generals refused to attack Russian troops, even when they were well positioned militarily. Commanders were replaced several times, and some generals were accused of betraying the uprising. In mid-August a Warsaw mob seized several commanders and lynched them from street lamps. General Krukowiecki attempted to regain order but the military situation continued to worsen. On September 6 Russian troops attacked Warsaw with three times the manpower and twice the artillery of the Poles. Thousands of Warsaw civilians participated in the defense of their city, but to no avail.

Russia captured Warsaw after two days of bloody struggle. The remnants of the Polish forces headed toward Modlin, where additional Polish troops were based. At the end of September about 70,000 Polish troops remained scattered throughout the territory but the Polish military commanders assessed the cause as futile. On October 5 about 20,000 Polish soldiers crossed the Prussian border and were disarmed. Modlin and Zamość, the last strongholds of Polish control, capitulated to the Russians on October 9 and 21 respectively. The uprising was over.

Almost 9,000 Poles emigrated from the Polish territories in the wake of the uprising. The majority went to France, England, or the German states, but many went to the United States and Turkey as well. The émigrés were largely nobles, whose return to the Congress Kingdom was ill advised under the extreme repression of the tsar. Especially in France, the émigré community formed a vibrant center of opposition and protest (A. Czartoryski's Hotel Lambert in Paris), coordinating various anti-Russian actions in the Polish territories and in the Balkans.

The November uprising of 1830 facilitated the success of the insurgency in Belgium as the Russian troops could not be used to suppress it. After the uprising Nicholas severely curtailed the autonomy of the Congress Kingdom; he liquidated the Polish army, confiscated the property of the participants, and exiled them to Siberia.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Napoleonic Wars of Liberation (1813–1815); France, 1830 Revolution; Poland, Revolutions, 1846–1863; Polish Revolution (Sejm), 1788–1792

References and Suggested Readings

- Kisluk, E. J. (2005) Brothers from the North: The Polish Democratic Society and the European Revolutions of 1848–1849. Boulder, CO: East European Monographs.
- Leslie, R. F. (1969) Polish Politics and the Revolution of November 1839. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.
- Plenkos, A. (1987) The Imperfect Autocrat: Grand Duke Constantine Pavlovich and the Polish Congress Kingdom. Boulder, CO: East European Monographs.
- Porter, B. (2002) When Nationalism Began to Hate. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Thackeray, F. (1980) Antecedents of the Revolution: Alexander I and the Polish Kingdom, 1815–1825. Boulder, CO: East European Monographs.

Polish Revolution, 1905–1907

Amy Linch

By the turn of the twentieth century opposition to tsarist domination of Congress Poland had consolidated into two camps: the National Democrats and the Polish Socialist Party (PPS). The National Democratic Party had its roots in the Polish League, a secret society formed in 1886 to resist Russification and build a united Poland based on liberal principles. The League was reorganized in 1891 by Roman Dmowski into the National League, which rejected liberalism in favor of national autonomy through whatever means were necessary. By 1905 the League was established as the National Democratic Party. Among the various factions that formed the broad coalition of socialists represented in the other camp, many originally rejected nationalism in favor of anarchist cosmopolitanism. As the PPS was consolidated under the leadership of Boleslaw Limanowski, however, many among the socialist leadership were persuaded toward support for Polish independence. Marx and Engels's anti-tsarist views and prescription of the necessity of an independent Poland were more compelling than their economic ideas for many socialists. Initially there were strong sympathies between the two factions given the shared ideal of national independence and socialist leanings among several of the National Democratic leadership. The National Democrats ultimately represented the middle classes, however, while the PPS drew its base from among the workers. The outbreak of the Russo-Japanese War in 1904 exacerbated these differences and the two groups worked at cross purposes during the ensuing period of revolutionary action.

The PPS saw the war as an opportunity to exploit Russian weakness and immediately issued an anti-war appeal in all of the Polish territories. It organized mass strikes and partisan activities against the Russian state, causing a diversion of 300,000 troops to Congress Poland to suppress the rebellion. Józef Piłsudski, who would become the ruler of Poland's Second Republic after World War I, traveled to Tokyo to negotiate an alliance between Japan and Poland against Russia. He argued that the Poles, among many oppressed nationalities in Russia, were experienced in rebelling against Russia and could be of great use to Japan by fomenting unrest – they only sought assurance of support from Tokyo. Dmowski, the leader of the National Democratic Party, also went to Tokyo to present the opposite case. In the end Japan only provided the PPS with limited ammunition, rather than the backing for which it had hoped.

The PPS had an active militia by the fall of 1904, which engaged in armed demonstrations throughout Warsaw that soon spread to other cities. They used the ammunition from the Japanese to damage bridges and otherwise sabotage Russian interests. The image of armed Poles resisting the tsarist forces after many decades of passivity bolstered support for PPS, whose membership grew to over 55,000 by 1906.

Membership within other socialist groups, notably the Jewish Bund and the Social Democratic Movement of the Kingdom of Poland and Lithuania (SDKPiL), also increased during this period. The SDKPiL grew from a few hundred members in the late 1890s to approximately 40,000 in 1906, while the Bund represented about 8,000 in Congress Poland alone (Wandycz 1974: 311). Both organizations were ideologically committed to internationalism and considered themselves in common cause with the Russian Social Democratic Labor Party after its inception in 1898. The SDKPiL was influenced by the leadership of Rosa Luxemburg, who had opposed the PPS motion at the London Congress asserting the necessity of national independence for Poles as well as the international proletariat. Luxemburg argued that the Polish bourgeoisie benefited from incorporation into Russia, and that Polish independence ran counter to the logic of capitalist development. An independent Poland could at best be a poor capitalist state, with maximum worker oppression. Only a socialist revolution could relieve the plight of workers. While a compromise position of loosely worded broad support for national self-determination was eventually agreed upon, the split between socialists who sought a Polish homeland and those who wanted to transcend national boundaries in establishing a socialist homeland grew more pronounced as the socialist resistance within Russia gained ground.

The massacre of Russian protesters in front of the royal palace in Moscow on January 22, 1905 that came to be known as “Bloody Sunday” had profound reverberations in Congress Poland. Józef Kwiatek, head of the Warsaw organization of PPS, regarded the event as the beginning of revolution in Russia and, in conjunction with SDKPiL, announced a general strike that grew to 400,000 people and lasted over a month. Strikers emphasized political as well as economic demands, carrying placards declaring, “Down with autocracy! Down with the war!” and demanding an eight-hour workday and a 16 percent increase in wages (Ascher 1994). The Polish Union of Socialist Youth (ZMS) declared a school strike in Warsaw that was soon joined by the National Democratic Youth and teachers’ associations. They boycotted high schools and universities and demanded elementary school education in Polish. Over the next two years, 1.3 million Poles were involved in nearly 7,000 strikes demanding better working conditions, civil and political freedoms, and the right to conduct public life in Polish (Davies 2005).

On May Day 1905 there were demonstrations against the authorities in nearly every town and city. Economic activity was completely shut down and public order began to disintegrate. The PPS leadership undertook formal organization of the militia in June 1905, creating cadres of instructors and studying revolutionary tactics to bring order to the guerilla warfare that was underway and ensure that violence was strategically directed. Piłsudski was chosen to oversee training of the fighting squads and coordinate their activity. The Combat Organization waged attacks on gendarmes and on tsarist spies and officials, and conducted raids on government monopoly stores and payroll trains to fund the revolutionary struggle. By the fall of 1905 they were operating in secret, essentially independent of oversight by PPS.

Renewal of the general strike in Łódź, a major industrial center and socialist stronghold, resulted in a mass violent uprising when Russian police opened fire on a crowd of protesting workers. Clashes between angry demonstrators and Russian cavalry at the workers’ funerals on June 20–1, 1905 escalated into several days of spontaneous insurrection. The PPS supported the protests in Łódź but it had little influence on their course. The tsar instituted martial law and the Russian military largely regained control of the city by June 25, but clashes between the police and insurgents continued episodically throughout the summer.

Tsar Nicholas II made several concessions to the nationalist demands but they did nothing to quell the revolutionary spirit unleashed among the workers. Private teaching of Polish and Lithuanian was permitted and the use of Polish was authorized in some public capacities. Limited local self-government institutions were introduced in Congress Poland. The workers nonetheless persisted in striking and demonstrating. The socialist leadership, which shared the objective of overthrowing the tsarist regime despite its disagreements about the best strategy, continued to press its advantage in the face of Russian political and economic chaos.

Fear of a socialist-led revolution and growing perception that Germany was their real enemy led Dmowski and the National Democrats to adopt a conciliatory position toward Russia. Dmowski argued that even if political and economic unrest advanced Polish independence in the short term, revolutionary policies in Congress Poland were suicidal (Wandycz 1974). The National Democrats sought to influence workers by forming the National Workers' Union. The Workers' Union, which grew to 16,000 members during 1905, opposed strikes and mass demonstrations and echoed the softened demands of the National Democrats in seeking Polish autonomy within the Russian empire rather than an independent Polish state.

A railway strike in October 1905 developed into a general strike demanding a constitution in Warsaw and St. Petersburg. Armed conflict occurred between the National Workers' Union and the combined forces of the PPS, which sought a representative assembly in Warsaw, and the SDKPiL, which wished to integrate the Polish struggle into the larger Russian socialist revolution. Russian Premier Witte issued Tsar Nicholas II's "October Manifesto" declaring Russia a constitutional monarchy and promising a parliament and extension of political liberties.

With a meeting between Nicholas II and Wilhelm II raising the specter of a German–Russian rapprochement, Dmowski offered to cooperate with Witte in suppressing the socialists – arguing (unsuccessfully) that only an autonomous kingdom could manage to restore order.

The Polish socialists boycotted the elections to the Duma, regarding participation as an affirmation of Russia's right to rule Poland. Dmowski also felt that Polish participation contravened his party's goal of independence, but he regarded it as a tactical necessity. The PPS, on the other hand, called for a general struggle against the Russian authorities and continued to organize both mass action and selective strikes on government officials. The Combat Organization conducted raids on payroll trains and government concessions to secure funds to further organize revolutionary forces. On "Bloody Wednesday" in August 1906 they assassinated or wounded 80 tsarist officials and conspirators in a one-day action across 20 cities. Several hundred agents of the Russian government were assassinated during 1906, and in Ostrowiec a "people's republic" was established for a short period.

Divided sympathies among the socialists ultimately led to a split in the PPS. The older members, led by Pilsudski, wanted an organized and disciplined revolutionary force that engaged in violence only to the degree that it advanced their political goals. The younger members were more interested in bringing about an international revolution and supported mass terror and spontaneous disruptive action. A train raid near Rogów in November 1906 brought the condemnation of the primarily "young" Central Committee of the PPS, who accused the Combat Organization of ignoring orders. At the Ninth Party Congress in Vienna a few weeks later, members voted to expel the members responsible for the raid, resulting in a split between the younger "left" and the older "right" led by Pilsudski. Pilsudski's faction was a minority of the membership but represented most of the Combat Organization and the party's primary vehicle of communication, the newspaper Robotnik (Worker).

National Democrats attempted to advance Polish interests by creating a bloc within the Duma. The Stolypin crackdown on political dissidents and the Duma's lack of real political power led to dissatisfaction with this conciliatory strategy, leading to division within the movement. A new populist group that emerged in 1907 with clear commitments to both national and socialist ideals attracted the support of the peasantry, who were disillusioned with the National Democrats.

The events in Congress Poland were echoed in many of the other Polish territories but differences in infrastructure and economic development influenced the intensity of nationalist uprisings and degree of support for the socialist movement. In Prussian Poland spontaneous school strikes opposing religious education in German drew support from across the socioeconomic spectrum. Galicia was host to both the PPS Combat Organization training facility – in Kraków – and party conferences, and had a vibrant socialist movement. Socialists in Galicia responded to the activities in Congress Poland during 1905 with strikes, an increase in trade unions, and political debates in the Polish press. Galician Poles also participated in strikes sponsored by the Austrian Social Democrats demanding universal suffrage.

The Russian military ultimately regained control over Congress Poland through force.

The young faction of the PPS, renamed “PPS Left,” was incorporated into the Russian Socialist Party. In its first party congress in 1907, Pilsudski’s faction adopted a program of pursuing an independent Polish republic while maintaining unity with the proletarian revolution. Pilsudski declared the revolution of 1905 a failure, reflecting: “one cannot make uprisings, which depend on circumstances which we are unable to create, but it is necessary that the proletariat and indeed all working people profit from these circumstances” (Wandycz 1974: 321). Henceforth he devoted his energy to ensuring that a trained military would be ready to seize the opportunity when such circumstances arose again.

SEE ALSO: Engels, Friedrich (1820–1895); Jewish Bund; Luxemburg, Rosa (1870–1919); Marx, Karl (1818–1883); Pilsudski, Józef (1867–1935); Russia, Revolution of 1905–1907

References and Suggested Readings

- Ascher, A. (1994) The Revolution of 1905: Russia in Disarray. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Blobaum, R. (1988) The Revolution of 1905–1907 and the Crisis of Polish Catholicism. Slavic Review 47, 4 (Winter): 667–86.
- Davies, N. (2005) God’s Playground: A History of Poland, Vol. 2. New York: Columbia University Press, pp. 273–8.
- Wandycz, P. (1974) The Lands of Partitioned Poland 1795–1918. Seattle: University of Washington Press.

Poor Law, Britain, 1834

Carl J. Griffin

Dramatic reform of the Old Poor Law (ca. 1598–1834) had been on the philosophical and political agenda since at least the 1780s. The collapse of the English rural economy in the aftermath of the cessation of hostilities in continental Europe in 1815 and the central role played by the Poor Laws in motivating activists in the Swing Riots of 1830 raised such calls to a fever pitch. The result was the Poor Law Amendment Act, or New Poor Law (NPL) of 1834, which arranged all parishes into workhouse-focused unions answerable to the London-based Poor Law Commission (PLC). The NPL thereby broke with over 300 years of parochial independence in the provision of statutory welfare. The Act also intended to enforce the principle of “less eligibility” – that the workhouse should be less desirable than the conditions experienced by the poorest laborer – and attempted to forbid relief to those who refused to enter the workhouse.

The first NPL union was founded at Wallingford, Berkshire, on January 1, 1835. By the 1839 publication of the Fifth Annual Report of the Poor Law Commission, 95 percent of all English and Welsh parishes had been placed into 583 functioning unions. The PLC encountered considerable opposition from the local authorities in their attempts to found unions. In the south, this mainly came from urban incorporations that refused to dissolve – Brighton and Exeter, for instance, never did – and from Gilbert’s Unions – created under the enabling Gilbert’s Act of 1782 – who similarly refused to disband until forced to do so by parliament in 1869.

In the north, the first unions were not created until 1837. Organizational opposition here was driven by structural factors in the industrial labor market. Infamously, John and Joseph Fielden, owners of a large textile mill at Todmorden, Yorkshire, threw all their employees out of work as soon as the Act was imposed to show that the workhouse system would not cope with seasonal and trade-cycle fluxes in unemployment.

Southern and northern opponents alike were given considerable support – and publicity – by the London-based Times. Editor Thomas Barnes used his position as, according to Lord Lyndhurst, “the most powerful man in the country” in reporting opposition to the NPL and in exposing inconsistencies and inhumanities in NPL unions. Barnes’s successor, John Delane, continued in a similar vein, famously giving unprecedented blanket coverage to the unfurling of the bone-crushing scandal in the Andover Union which ultimately led to the replacement of the PLC with the Poor Law Board in 1847.

Popular opposition to the NPL was particularly vehement and sustained in the north, something driven by the coalition between radicals, Chartists, industrialists, some magistrates, and anti-centralizing Tories. Such was the success of this Anti-Poor Law movement that most northern workhouses were not built until the 1850s and 1860s. As such, the less eligibility test could not be applied there. Popular opposition in the south was more fractured and certainly less successful in preventing the operation of the Act. However, as Wells (1997) has suggested, the combination of initial mass mobilizations followed by a sustained resort to the weapons of covert protest made sure that the Act operated under something like a cloud of terror well into the late nineteenth century.

Ultimately though, it was opposition from Liberal social reformers that led to the collapse of the NPL. Notwithstanding continual innovations and concessions toward comfort in the workhouse and the provision of more tailored facilities for the vulnerable outside of the workhouse, on March 31, 1930 all Poor Law Unions were disbanded. Responsibility for the provision of welfare passed to the newly established local authority-controlled Public Assistance Committees.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Corn Law Agitation, Britain, 19th Century; Chartists; East Anglian Wheat County Riots, 1816; Newport Rising, Wales, 1839; Swing Riots

References and Suggested Readings

Knott, J. (1986) Popular Opposition to the 1834 Poor Law. London: Croom Helm.

Wells, R. (1997) Resistance to the New Poor Law in the Rural South. In J. Rule & R. Wells, Crime, Protest and Popular Politics in Southern England 1740–1850. London: Hambledon.

Popelin, Marie (1846–1913) and the Belgian League for Women’s Rights

Julie Carlier and Cathérine Jacques

Marie Popelin, the first Belgian woman doctor of law, was the “founding mother” of Belgian feminism. The “Popelin Affair” – the Belgian courts’ denial of her request to be called to the bar in 1888 and 1889 – was the catalyst that triggered the transition from an educational proto-feminism to an organized women’s movement. By 1892, Popelin and her lawyer, Louis Frank (1864–1917), had founded the first Belgian feminist organization, the Belgian League for Women’s Rights (Ligue belge du droit des femmes), which would remain the engine of the Belgian women’s movement until World War I.

Belgium was the first country on the European continent to industrialize during the nineteenth century but one of the last to introduce compulsory education and social laws. A large part of the industrial workforce was made up of women, whose legal position was dictated by the Belgian civil code, which was based on the Code Napoléon (1804). Marital authority was not abolished until 1958. Women were granted the vote for communal elections in 1920, but had to wait until 1948 for parliamentary suffrage.

From the 1860s onwards, early Belgian feminists had focused upon women’s access to education, but by the end of the 1880s the refusal to allow Marie Popelin, LL.D., to exercise the profession of lawyer painfully showed the need for feminist organizing to press for legal reform. In the formative years between 1888 and 1892, Popelin and her allies entered into contact with leading foreign feminists, particularly Wilhelmina Drucker (1847–1925) from the Netherlands and Léon Richer (1824–1911) in France. As a result of the “Popelin Affair” and the political transfers through Drucker and Richer, the Belgian League for Women’s Rights was founded in 1892.

The League was made up of men as well as women from the capital’s French-speaking progressive intellectual elite, social reformers coming from the anti-prostitution movement, free-thinkers’ associations, freemasonry, and pacifism. It was a politically neutral, non-militant study and lobby group, whose preferred means were media campaigns, petitions, and the drafting of bills, often introduced in parliament by socialist representatives supporting women’s rights. Following a moderate political strategy, the League privileged the demand for civil equality over suffragism. Prioritizing marriage law reform and access for women to all professions and the civil service, the Belgian League for Women’s Rights could claim several successes by the eve of World War I, such as limited married women’s property rights.

Marie Popelin, initially head of the legal section, became secretary general by 1896 and remained so until close to her death in June 1913. During this time she was able to establish a firm international reputation for herself and the League as the main representative of the movement for women’s rights in Belgium. As early as 1893 she was appointed honorary vice-president of the International Council of Women, designated to found a Belgian affiliation. From 1902 onwards, she set out to unite the independent and socialist women’s associations, as well as a new small group of Catholic feminists. In a political climate of growing denominationalism, which would dominate Belgian society well into the twentieth century, this proved no sinecure. When the Belgian National Council of Women was finally founded in 1905, socialist and Christian feminists refused to join. Under the presidency of Popelin the Council's activities blended with those of the League for Women's Rights.

Popelin never witnessed the admittance of women to the bar (1922), but she did live to see the foundation of the Belgian Federation for Women's Suffrage (Fédération belge pour le suffrage des femmes) in February 1913. During World War I, this coalition between Catholic and independent/liberal feminists was continued in the Patriotic Union of Belgian Women (Union patriotique des femmes belges, 1915), which developed relief efforts directed toward women. The activists of the Belgian League for Women's Rights played a leading part in the Patriotic Union, but the war marked the end of an era. After 1918, the prewar feminist associations stagnated and new organizations came to the fore.

SEE ALSO: Belgium, 20th-Century Political Conflict; Britain, Women's Suffrage Campaign; International Congress of Women at The Hague

References and Suggested Readings

- Aerts, M. (2005) Feminism from Amsterdam to Brussels in 1891: Political Transfer as Transformation. European Review of History 12 (2): 367–82.
- Aerts, M. & Everard, M. (1999) Forgotten Intersections: Wilhemina Drucker, Early Feminism and the Dutch–Belgian Connection. Revue Belge de Philologie et d'Histoire 77 (2): 440–72.
- De Bueger-Van Lierde, F. (1972) A l'origine du mouvement féministe en Belgique. L'Affaire Popelin. Revue Belge de Philologie et d'Histoire 50: 1128–37.
- Gubin, E. (1993) Signification, modernité et limites du féminisme en Belgique avant 1914. Sextant. Revue du Groupe Interdisciplinaire d'Etudes sur les Femmes 1: 39–56.
- Gubin, E. (1999) Du politique au politique. Parcours du féminisme belge (1830–1914). Revue Belge de Philologie et d'Histoire 77 (2): 370–82.
- Gubin, E., Jacques, C., & Piette, V. (1997) Les féminismes belges et français de 1830 à 1914. Une approche comparée. Le Mouvement Social 178: 36–68.
- Jacques, C. (forthcoming, 2009) La Ligue belge du droit des femmes. In E. Gubin, C. Jacques, V. Piette, &

J. Puissant (Eds.), Encyclopédie de l'histoire des femmes en Belgique. Brussels: Racine.

Nandrin, J.-P. (2006) Marie Popelin. In E. Gubin, C. Jacques, V. Piette, & J. Puissant (Eds.), Dictionnaire des femmes belges XIX^e et XX^e siècles. Brussels: Racine.

Populism

Lawrence Goodmyn

The Populist Revolt in late nineteenth-century America was the connecting link between two huge organizing achievements – the Farmers' Alliance and Industrial Union and the People's Party. These two organizing feats broadly test conventional ideas about how independent political action can be an instrument of social change in modern societies. It is a test many have not managed to pass: populism stands as one of the least understood political movements in American history. As for the movement, so for the word itself: in its modern usage, "populism" is one of those vague terms of description that can be easily molded into whatever partisan shape its user may wish it to have. A fair measure of explanation is required to sort through this maze.

Historical Context

One begins with a brief review of the economic grievances the agrarian movement endeavored to address. A series of self-help economic experiments created experiences that over time generated a number of political proposals. In finding a way to place these political ideas before the nation, the farmers painstakingly constructed the populist agenda.

What was to become the National Farmers' Alliance first came into existence in the late 1870s as a rural cooperative. Located on the southern fringe of the western farming frontier that stretched from Canada to the Gulf of Mexico, it arose in Texas at a time when the era of industrialization and transcontinental railroad building had created a national market economy in America. Farmers found themselves caught in elaborate structures of exploitation – by banks and other lending institutions that charged high interest on chattel mortgages and by rural credit merchants who exacted usurious rates on food and supplies advanced to farmers during the growing season. The merchants held liens on the farmers' crops in what was called, straightforwardly enough, "the crop lien system." After the Civil War, the crop lien became the dominant commercial arrangement for southern cotton production, while the chattel mortgage proliferated in the western granary from Kansas and Iowa to the Canadian border. Both the crop lien and the chattel mortgage proved to be highly profitable for lending institutions: the fruits of the labor of western and southern farmers were harvested not by farmers but by the institutions financing agricultural production. In a phrase popularized by agrarian organizers, creditors were "farming the farmers." The social result was massive debt peonage that slowly engulfed agricultural America in the 1870s and 1880s. Hundreds of thousands and eventually millions descended into landless tenancy.

This catastrophe was not restricted to those advanced societies where capitalism was fully emerging in the late nineteenth century. Rather, among disparate human communities around the globe, peonage has existed in one form or another since pre-Roman times. Whatever the degree of exploitation inherent in each "form," the practice itself became the means through which capital to build cities was extracted from rural people who had no means to feed themselves during the long growing seasons that necessarily preceded income-yielding harvests. As is now becoming somewhat better understood, the culture of capital accumulation that developed in the United States in the late nineteenth century rationalized widespread exploitation of workers and farmers as a given, whether it occurred on the land or within the emerging factory system. Under these circumstances, the continuing interest in American populism is fueled by the vivid example it provides of sustained self-activity on the part of the victims. American farmers did not go quietly into peonage.

Yet it would be a mistake to see populism as some sort of spontaneous act of mass defiance, or even as a kind of naked expression of the kind of politics that surfaced because "times were hard." Rather, the People's Party was a product of patient organizing that activated upward of two million rank-and-file American farmers. Coming to terms with populism requires a sustained focus on these organizing experiences, for they explain how a broad popular movement materialized in America.

Agrarian Organizing Resistance Movement

After some fruitless experiments from 1878 and 1884 in small-scale cash cooperatives along the lines pioneered by the earlier Grange movement, Alliance organizers slowly shaped a recruiting tool that was so massively appealing to debt-ridden farmers through offering the prospect of transforming the American countryside. The idea was a broad-gauged credit cooperative. It was a concept that took into account the economic weakness of debt-ridden small farmers and landless tenants. In 1885, organized farmers successfully pioneered what they called the "bulking" of cotton, pooling their product in a cooperative marketing plan designed to produce harvest-time sales direct to British and East Coast American cotton buyers. Mass sales of this kind succeeded in attracting competing buyers, a circumstance that soon brought marginally higher returns to cotton producers. The euphoria was immediate: some celebrating farmers flew blue flags from their wagons as they went home, and word spread throughout rural districts that the Alliance was "doing something" for the dirt farmer. In little more than six months during the fall and winter of 1886, the Alliance credit cooperative attracted 250,000 Texas farmers desperate to escape the clutches of the crop lien system.

Confident in their now-proven organizing capabilities, advocates of cooperatives fashioned elaborate plans for a multistate organizing campaign throughout the South and West in 1887–8. The objective was to create structures for cooperative purchasing as well as cooperative marketing. Alliance organizers had learned how to create large-scale co-ops, and they had learned how to explain it: wherever Americans grew cotton, corn, or wheat, membership in the Alliance soared – from Florida to the Dakotas. Inevitably, the newly organized cooperatives were to be opposed by the financial and commercial institutions that had benefited from exploiting farmers. These ranged from Chicago Livestock Commission houses, trunk-line railroads, and hundreds of country banks in the West to the manufacturers of jute bagging for cotton bales as well as thousands of credit merchants throughout the South. But while the propagandists of commercial America might regale the population about the virtues of self-reliance, self-help farmer cooperatives were perceived as impolite attacks on corporate profits. The resulting tensions that developed between big business and the activities of Alliance co-ops gave organized farmers a first-hand view of how the economy of the late nineteenth century had changed for small farmers. The system was rigged against them.

American populism did not emerge via “rising consciousness,” but through education and shared experiences. The “education” gained by large-scale credit cooperatives emerged very early in the founding alliances in Texas and then was repeated as the cooperative movement spread throughout the western granary and the southern cotton belt. Farmers learned who their commercial enemies were. The experiences generated within the Alliance cooperative politicized the farmers it had recruited. For example, in 1885 when the fledgling alliances were first experimenting in mass cotton sales, the state organization designated an “Alliance Purchasing Agent” to contact agricultural equipment manufacturers and offer a mass market in exchange for lower prices for plows and other agricultural necessities. The agent, an energetic organizer named William Lamb, was outraged to discover that officials of America’s leading farm equipment companies treated him with disdain and contempt. They told him to go back and tell his members to place their orders through the company’s nearest retailers. There would be no discounts. William Lamb pondered the long-term implications of this attitude and decided to make a few plans of his own.

The nation’s fledgling labor movement provided Lamb and other cooperative advocates with the kind of opportunity they were looking for. After some difficult organizing experiences in the West, Knights of Labor officials won what they considered to be a breakthrough victory over Jay Gould’s Missouri-Pacific Railroad. In 1885–6 they employed the slogan, “We made Jay Gould recognize us,” to pyramid national membership from 100,000 to 700,000. In the spring of 1886, however, Gould moved to crush the union by instigating a conflict. The railroad abruptly fired an employee for missing work while attending a union meeting – after having been given permission to do so. The union’s members, their very right to existence challenged, rallied to defend their organization.

From beginning to end, the Great Southwest Strike was a series of minor and major battles between armed workers and armed deputies and militiamen, interspersed with commando-like raids on company equipment by bands of workers. In Texas, Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, and Kansas, thousands were indicted, hundreds were jailed, and many died. Major newspapers denounced the workers, said their grievances were imaginary, praised the railroad’s “magnanimity,” and repeatedly predicted the imminent return of the men to their jobs. It was within such emotional currents that the political awareness of the early Farmers’ Alliances began to take root.

In the West, it was hard to distinguish farmers from workers; they dressed alike, attended the same churches, read the same newspapers, and often hailed from the same families. To William Lamb, the relevant fact was that farmers and workers were held in equal contempt by commercial America. They worked hard and had nothing to show for it. Both groups realized it was time they could work together. As president of the Montague County Farmers’ Alliance, Lamb issued a boycott in support of the Knights of Labor in order, he said, to “secure their help in the future.” This act produced an internal conflict in the Alliance to define the meaning of the farmer movement, provoking a struggle that would be repeated with slight variations as the Alliance swept across the South and West in the next half-dozen years. The Alliance state president, Andrew Dunlap, denounced Lamb’s boycott, declared it “null and void,” and officially denied that the Alliance “had anything to do” with the spreading boycott. The editor of the young order’s official newspaper warned against “busy bodies in other men’s business.”

Something else happened: Alliance organizers referred to as “lecturers” were changed by the opposition they encountered – by their daily duties in building the cooperative movement. Day after day, the local lecturers traveled through the remote farmlands. The stories of personal tragedy they heard in their country meetings could be repeated at the next meeting a few miles down the road where, in an atmosphere of shared experience, they drew nods of instant understanding. If the Alliance was changing farmers by offering a new kind of tangible hope, the farmers were changing the lecturers who were, in effect, seeing too much and learning too much. The very duties of an Alliance lecturer, like the duties of its state purchasing agent, William Lamb, were driving home the need to “do something.” Repeated often enough – and inside the Alliance cooperative lectures were routinely repeated again and again – these experiences had a powerful emotional effect: a nucleus of deeply committed activists was created from the daily experiences found in the cooperative movement.

The self-assured organizers were convinced that they grasped the grassroots temper of the movement better than their own high-ranking Alliance functionaries did. When Alliance President Dunlap denounced William Lamb’s “unblushing impudence” and was supported by the journal editor who charged the boycott was “putting burdens on the farmers that they cannot bear,” Lamb quietly outlined the specifics of monopolistic practices being “waged against us.” A farmer–labor coalition was more than an idea: it was a way to act. With lofty confidence Lamb remarked, “I feel satisfied I know more about what is going on against us than the state president or our editor either.”

Cooperative Movement

After the Great Southwest Strike ended in demoralizing defeat for the Knights of Labor, the significant growth in the organization’s membership that appeared in 1885 declined, never to regain its strength in numbers. For its part, however, the Alliance underwent an internal revolution in which its lecturer–organizers moved into positions of leadership at every level of the organization, replacing, among others, the state president and its journal editor. The order’s new flagship journal became the Southern Mercury, an aggressive advocate of farmer–labor coalitions as well as a supporter of a new, more democratic theory for organizing the monetary system.

In the summer of 1886, the Alliance issued a provocative manifesto titled the Cleburne Demands. In notable anticipation of the Populist platform of 1892, the Cleburne document called for the recognition of trade unions and co-ops and proclaimed the need to alter the basic rules of trade through the creation of a new federally administered national banking system based on the creation of a flexible currency. In the spring of 1887, the Texas Alliance launched a national organizing campaign by dispatching over 100 lecturers to organize in the South and West. The effort proved remarkably successful. Within two years, the National Farmers’ Alliance counted over a million members and cooperative experiments in both marketing and purchasing began to proliferate across the continent.

The lessons of the cooperative movement generated two levels of political understanding within the Alliance. From the western plains to the Carolina coast, local, county, and regional lecturers became transformed by their continuous association with the demeaning poverty they found as a pervasive feature of rural life. In short, their attention was directed inward in a new way. Secondly, the attention of the Alliance’s marketing and purchasing agents was directed outward – as a function of their institutional contacts with the commercial world. As was the earlier case with William Lamb, the cooperative experience caused people to think more critically about the existing structure of the American economy and their own exploited condition within it.

Although these dynamics worked everywhere that the Alliance movement was able to put down sustaining roots, this awareness necessarily appeared first where the movement was most grounded in experience. In 1888, even as the cooperative movement was first getting organized in new states, the Texas Alliance started a bold venture in large-scale cooperation. The objective was nothing less than to market the entire cotton crop of the state through a single centralized State Cooperative Exchange. The plan of the Alliamcemen was the most creative in the annals of American agricultural organizations and led directly to the one pathbreaking political concept of the agrarian revolt – a new democratic national banking system called the Sub-Treasury Land and Loan System. It also led to the formation of the People’s Party.

The marketing and purchasing plan, necessarily a bit complicated, turned on a simple discovery: the underlying problem hurting individual farmers – lack of access to low-interest credit – was also the problem haunting the Alliance cooperative itself. The attempted remedy was called the “joint-note plan.” Landowning farmers were asked to place their individual holdings at the disposal of the group, including their tenants. Smallholding farmers and tenants alike would collectively purchase their supplies for the year – on credit – through the centralized State Exchange, the landowners signing the joint note. For collateral, they would put up their land and attempt to protect themselves against loss by taking mortgages on the crops of the tenants.

Alliancemen would sink or swim together; the landless would begin the process of escaping the crop lien, too, or none of them would. As the joint notes flooded into the State Exchange in Dallas, the cooperative planners moved to sell the notes through bank loans. After exhaustive efforts, however, they were forced to report to the sub-alliances that "those who controlled the moneyed institutions of the state either did not choose to do business with us or feared the ill will of a certain class of businessmen who considered their interests antagonistic to those of our order." The effort to borrow money in sufficient quantity failed.

The Exchange was suddenly in serious trouble. In response, the Alliance mobilized all of its collective resources and knowledge gained from five years of cooperation. In probably the most dramatic single day in the course of the entire agrarian revolt, county alliances convened in some 200 Texas courthouses on June 9, 1888 in a desperate effort to raise additional funds to keep alive the cooperative dream.

Awed townspeople were astonished at the turnout: more than 200,000 farmers flooded the courthouses of the state. Observers were also startled by the passionate discussions that went on for hours in the summer heat. The Alliance had asked each farmer at the outset to contribute $2 to the joint-note undertaking, and this appeal was a centerpiece of the June 9 mobilization. A letter to the Southern Mercury had earlier portended the outcome of the effort: "We voted the $2.00 assessment for the exchange, and as soon as we are able, will pay it, but we are not able to do so at present." The dignity with which the admission was made, and the willingness of the Mercury to print it without comment, indicates that everyone recognized the prevailing poverty among many people participating in the Alliance movement. The implications for the movement were serious: the co-ops had precisely the credit problem that individual farmers did. Throughout the South and West where the Alliance movement had spread, farmers held their breath while the Texas Exchange collected funds, collected even more pledges, and, in so doing, fought for its life. For the moment, the Texans sent an ominous signal: the Exchange announced it was moving to a temporary cash-only relationship with its members.

The Alliance had a more promising outcome defending itself in the South against a bona fide national "trust." In 1888, a newly constructed combine of jute manufacturers announced that the price of jute bagging used for cotton bales would rise from 7 cents a yard to 12 and even 14 cents, levying "a tribute of some $2,000,000" that the nation's cotton farmers were forced to pay under duress. Alliance leaders from six cotton-producing states hurriedly met in Birmingham, Alabama, fashioned arrangements with a dozen cotton mills to manufacture cotton bagging, and, thus armed, announced a boycott of jute bagging. After a tense period, the combine, suddenly awash in its own jute, was forced to concede that the price-rigging scheme had failed.

Despite such encouraging defensive successes, broad-scale co-op plans continued to run headlong into concentrated corporate power. An ambitious livestock marketing arrangement fashioned by Kansans and cooperatively extended to Missouri and Nebraska farmers challenged corporations that dominated livestock marketing in the region. The farmers called their co-op the American Livestock Commission Company. Within a six-month period in 1889, the co-op had amassed over $40,000 in profits to distribute to members. But as the businessmen who operated the Chicago Livestock Commission, a commodities exchange, began to realize what the success of co-ops could mean, they abruptly terminated all marketing relations on the grounds that the farmer co-op "violated the anti-rebate rule" of the Chicago Commission. That proved to be the end of cooperative marketing of livestock in America.

Meanwhile, in Texas the State Alliance Exchange eventually was able to raise $80,000 to underwrite the expenses of the elaborate joint-note plan, but it was not enough to cover the credit crisis. In the summer of 1889, the Texas State Alliance Exchange went under, unable to market its joint notes in banking circles, and therefore unable to respond to insistent payment demands from its creditors. The tantalizing prospect of freeing everyone from the clutches of Texas merchants in one dramatic season danced out of reach.

Opposition to the Sub-Treasury System

Into this situation stepped one of the most creative and enigmatic personalities brought forward by the agrarian revolt – Charles Macune. Born in Wisconsin and orphaned at 10, Macune roamed the West and arrived on the Texas frontier in 1870 at the age of 19. In the custom of the era, he “read” for the professions and in time came to practice both medicine and law. Macune, however, had untapped talents as a lucid writer, as a sonorous, authoritative public speaker, and as a movement diplomat. A strikingly handsome man, he also possessed a subtle eye for the strategic demands of organizing. He put all these gifts to good use during the tensions that surrounded the Cleburne Demands of 1886 and succeeded Andrew Dunlap as state president prior to the great organizational expansion of the following year. Above all, Charles Macune was a creative monetary theorist. He participated actively in each evolving stage of the joint-note plan of 1887–8, pondered the implications of the cooperative crisis in 1888, and in 1889 conceived of an ingenious and sweeping new national monetary structure called the sub-treasury system.

Macune’s proposal carried the agrarian agenda to a new level of advocacy. The federal government would underwrite the cooperatives by issuing greenbacks (paper money) to provide credit for the farmers’ crops at the moment they were harvested and marketed. In the process, this influx of funds would create the basis of a flexible national currency. The necessary marketing and purchasing facilities would be achieved through government-owned warehouses, or “sub-treasuries,” and through federal sub-treasury certificates paid to the farmer for his produce. In short, the sub-treasury system formed the instrument of credit that would remove furnishing merchants, commercial banks, and chattel mortgage companies from American agriculture. The sub-treasury certificates would be government-issued greenback money – “full legal tender for all debts, public and private,” in the words of Alliance platforms in the years to come.

The structural implications of Macune’s sub-treasury system were large: in the first instance, the plan financially backed the centralized Alliance marketing and purchasing co-op. In sustaining the co-ops, the sub-treasury sustained the popular movement. Beyond this critical democratic achievement, however, the greenback dollars that made possible America’s annual agricultural harvest also formed the workable basis for a new and flexible national currency outside the exclusive control of eastern commercial bankers. It also provided the US Treasury with broad new options in giving private citizens access to reasonable credit. The line of nineteenth-century advocates of a flexible currency – one that included such businessmen as Edward Kellogg in the 1830s and such labor partisans as Andrew Cameron in the 1860s – culminated in the 1890s in the farmer advocate, Macune.

As Macune foresaw, the agrarian-greenbackism underlying the sub-treasury system united southern and western farmers. As he did not foresee, it also provided political cohesion for a radical third party. Within three years of the appearance of Macune’s sub-treasury plan, the People’s Party was to begin waging a frantic campaign to try to take over control of the American monetary system from the nation’s commercial bankers and restore it, “in the name of the whole people,” to the US Treasury. It was a campaign that was never to be waged again.

Organizing vs. Speechmaking

Nineteenth-century Alliance populism is worth studying because it starkly illustrates the total lack of impact of speechmaking on popular social consciousness. The historical value of the agrarian revolt lies not in rhetorical display but in the substantial alternative evidence of how social experiences of farmers participating in their own cooperative organizations shaped the way they perceived their plight and framed a new political worldview.

For example, populism was viewed in Kansas as building on the foundation of so many early Kansas settlers’ abolitionist ideas. Orators such as “Sockless Jerry” Simpson and Mary Elizabeth Lease testify to how quickly colorful language can find a prominent place in historical accounts and in later newspaper stories, but the egalitarian heritage animated the much more central role of Henry and Cuthbert Vincent in introducing and explaining the cooperative marketing system in the farming regions of Kansas. Although Henry Vincent came to be one of the most articulate populist editors in the nation, he fully understood that it was the social experiences gained from working with the Alliance cooperative – far more than the driving language of his own deeply involved newspaper – that altered the politics of Kansas farmers between 1888 and 1892.

Similarly, Evan Jones, the popular and modestly influential president of the National Alliance in 1889, could catch journalistic attention with his vivid critique of price-gouging railroad freight haulers: "These iron rails are binding us in iron chains." But he, like Vincent, knew that the social bonds of the movement came from the cooperative bonds forged between farmers rather than in evocative language. Jones also knew that the long-term unity of populism depended upon finding some way to keep the co-ops going. That is why he, along with other informed agrarian radicals, became such an energetic defender of the sub-treasury system.

Although social experience was critical in shaping the populist movement, this is not to say that words and language are necessarily irrelevant to the evolution of insurgent democratic movements. Of course ideas dramatically spoken can be important – but only if an audience has previously been recruited to hear the ideas. Significant insurgent political movements happen when they are organized. They can happen no other way. Thus, the cooperative crusade of the Alliance was the cornerstone of American populism because it not only recruited people but also brought them together into shared activities for common goals in the future. Such, of course, is the operative meaning of the phrase "political consciousness." The concrete lessons farmers learned from their cooperative experiences taught them to see the economic realities defining their relationship with commercial America. Indeed, it was precisely those economic and cultural insights that produced the political language that would eventually become known as "populism."

The most important reform proposed by the populists was the fundamental redesign of the nation's monetary system. The goal was to change the way money was created, thus reducing the excessive power of creditors over debtors. Had it ever been enacted into law, a democratic system of money and credit would have created a substantial increase in economic growth as an enduring feature of a fundamentally reformed economy in America. As such, the populist sub-treasury system would have materially benefited working Americans in factories as well as farmers. Needless to say, the reorganization of the monetary system would not have foreclosed the need for industrial workers to organize collectively and form trade unions to improve their conditions. These ideas, however, were not only heretical to the economic notions of industrializing America; they were crisply at odds with the self-interested assumptions among bankers that prevail to the present day. The so-called "sound money" theories prevailing in both major parties in the late nineteenth century significantly impeded economic growth in America. Not only working Americans but also the economy as a whole – informed modern economists now concede – would have been far better off in the twentieth century had the sub-treasury system been enacted.

Accordingly, when Macune appeared before the House Ways and Means Committee in 1890 to explain the sub-treasury system, the New York Times took it upon itself to offer the thought that Macune's plan was "one of the wildest and most fantastic projects ever seriously proposed by [a] sober man." Democratic and Republican congressmen on the committee responded to the Alliance spokesman with something less than respectful attention.

Clearly, the democratic dream of a national farmer-labor party was grounded solely in the practical task of organizing. Therefore, managing this task was the core challenge of the agrarian revolt.

SEE ALSO: Chávez, César (1927–1993) and the United Farm Workers; Knights of Labor and Terence Powderly (1849–1924); Labor Revolutionary Currents, United States, 1775–1900; Sylvis, William H. (1829–1869) and the National Labor Union

References and Suggested Readings

- Goodwyn, L. (1976) Democratic Promise: The Populist Movement in America. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Kuzminski, A. (2008) Fixing the System: A History of Populism, Ancient and Modern. New York: Continuum.
- Nugent, W. T. K. (1963) The Tolerant Populists. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Palmer, B. (1980) Men Over Money: The Southern Populist Critique of American Capitalism. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

Portugal, Carnation Revolution, 1974

Andrew J. Waskey

The Carnation Revolution (Revolução dos Cravos) is a popular name for the almost peaceful revolution that began on April 25, 1974. It was the first step in transforming Portugal from a dictatorship to a democratic country.

In the 1960s and early 1970s Portugal was engaged in costly battles in Africa and elsewhere to maintain its colonial possessions. The drain on Portugal's resources was high and inhibited internal development. The military, as well as civil society, was divided on whether to continue to strive to maintain the colonies or to abandon them. In 1973 unrest led to the formation of a secret military organization called the Movement of the Armed Forces (Movimento das Forças Armadas) (MFA). Most of the members of MFA were younger officers who were veterans of the African wars. On December 1, 1973, 86 delegates from across the spectrum of military units met at Obidos. Their discussions were centered on how to overthrow the authoritarian regime that had ruled for over forty years. When the Portuguese minister of defense learned of the meeting he was stunned; however, paralyzed by uncertainty, he did nothing. The MFA discovered an ally in General Francisco da Costa Gomes, chief of the general staff. His influence was increased when General Antonio de Spínola was appointed his deputy. General Spínola was the former governor of Guinea. He published Portugal and the Future (1974) almost immediately. He argued in the book that the colonial wars could not be won except through a political solution. Soon thereafter Prime Minister Marcelo Caetano dismissed both Costa Gomes and Spínola. He replaced them with a hard-line veteran of fighting in Angola, General Joaquim da Luz Cunha. A number of MFA officers were arrested or transferred.

In March a group of soldiers from the garrison at Caldas de Rainha attempted a brief revolt in armored cars. When they arrived in Lisbon they were soon arrested without a shot being fired. This incited the leaders of the MFA to urgency. Early in the morning of April 25, 1974 a signal was broadcast for the revolution to begin when a disk jockey at a Lisbon radio station played Grandola, vila morena. The coup had been planned by Major Otelo Saraiva de Carvalho. The key installations were soon in MFA hands. The main opposition came from the secret police headquarters (Directorate General of Security); when four people were killed, the headquarters soon surrendered. The president and prime minister were taken into custody and exiled to Brazil a month later.

When the news of the revolution spread, the Portuguese people were euphoric. Red carnations were distributed to the troops in the revolution. Soon so many people wanted a red carnation to wear that the Portuguese supply ran out and thousands more had to be imported from the Netherlands.

In the aftermath of the Carnation Revolution many supporters of the old regime were dismissed from the government. The oligarchic families that had held most of the wealth of the country had their monopolies abolished. As politically inexperienced military officers tried to govern life with the three "Ds" – Democratization, Decolonialism, and Development – land was redistributed and other changes made to the old order. On April 25, 1975 democratic elections were held and a new civilian government was installed soon afterward.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Monarchy Protests, Portugal; Portugal, Protest and Revolution, 20th Century

References and Suggested Readings

- Graham, L. S. & Wheeler, D. L. (1983) In Search of Modern Portugal: The Revolution and Its Consequences. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.
- Mailer, P. (1977) Portugal: The Impossible Revolution. New York: Free Life Editions.
- Sobel, L. (1976) Portuguese Revolution 1974–76. New York: Facts on File.

Portugal, protest and revolution, 20th century

Javier A. Galván

Portugal experienced three main forces of protest and revolution in the twentieth century. First, the general population forced the king to abdicate in 1910. However, the first attempt to establish a republic failed rather quickly, and an authoritarian government took over in 1928. Second, following a long dictatorship of almost 50 years, the Portuguese led by a workers' movement toppled fascism with a massive populist revolution. Third, one of the largest sources of economic and political tension for Portugal in the late 1900s was the overseas colonies in Africa and Asia, which it formally retained longer than other major European imperialist states. The constant revolts in the colonies contributed to the coup d'état that deposed the dictatorship in 1974.

Portugal began the twentieth century with a revolution that deposed its king in 1910. In 1908, revolutionaries had killed King Carlos I and his son in Lisbon to put an end to the power of the abusive monarchy in the nation. The king's youngest son, Manuel II, took over the throne, but he was overthrown by revolutionary movements in 1910. The main drive to remove the king was a general feeling of economic stagnation, the deterioration of the infrastructure, and overall lack of opportunities in Portugal. The result was a new government in the form of a republic in which people could elect their leaders. However, the new political system of government did not necessarily solve the nation's economic problems.

A conservative ideology emerged after the start of World War I in 1914. Conservative proponents supported religious-based values, despising liberal social, economic, and political ideals. The right-wing movement became known as the Integralismo Lusitano (Lusitanian or Portuguese Integralism), which developed a strong nationalistic ethic among the masses, especially among the youth. The Integralism movement metamorphosed into Portuguese fascism following examples offered by the legacy of Italy and Spain. By the late 1920s, fascism became increasingly popular among the middle and upper classes and intellectuals. Portugal's first experience of democracy failed as political leaders faced numerous minor revolts, both within civil society and among military officers.

The decades of the 1920s and 1930s were dominated by the actions of Antonio de Oliveira Salazar, the Portuguese politician and dictator. A military coup in 1926 overthrew the civilian government and brought Salazar into political leadership posts, including minister of finance. He served in different political positions and was elected premier in 1932. He quickly developed the Constitution of 1933, establishing a powerful federal government and creating the foundations for the longest dictatorship in Europe. Salazar called his authoritative politics the "New State," in which he proposed a strong alliance with the goal of national identity. The new government favored the wealthy class, with the tangible result that poverty increased during his dictatorship.

Salazar strengthened the executive powers and ventured into systematic repression of social and political freedom. The new totalitarian government abolished all political parties and workers' unions, claiming that they created a divisive force within the nation. It also approved oppressive censorship of all forms of public media and individual writers. It tightly controlled the radio waves, television programming, and all newspaper and magazine content. Yet Salazar claimed that this was all being done on behalf of the "national interest." Thus, in 1933, he approved the creation of the Estatuto do Trabalho Nacional (National Labor Statute), which controlled the organization of all workers at the industrial and agricultural levels. The government defined this as being like a national union for the benefit of all Portuguese workers. For almost 40 years, this structure developed a system in which workers became increasingly dependent on the state, and consequently sustained the need for the military dictatorship in Portugal. To control dissenters, the state created a secret police force in charge of coordinating what was called "order on the streets." However, the average Portuguese citizen did not initially suspect that peace could only be achieved by opening civilian prisons, concentration camps, and clandestine operations of systematic torture and intimidation of the general population.

The New State had inherited a financial crisis when it assumed power in 1928, a state of affairs that continued for nearly 20 years. Remaining neutral during World War II, Portugal benefited financially and could sell exports to every nation in Europe following the war. Salazar used the revenue to retain political power and pacify the public. The 1940s brought economic prosperity and the 1950s were also extremely profitable during Europe's economic reconstruction. Using its newfound wealth, Portugal supported huge public infrastructure programs, including bridges, roads, railroads, port facilities, tourism, and factories for machinery production. However, the education of the masses remained a distant priority.

The prosperity experienced in Portugal in the 1940s did not lead to transparent government or social benefits. The 1950s provided the initial stages for rebellion in Portugal against the dictatorship as the general population experienced signs of economic progress, and the government ideology shifted. Several high-ranking officials postulating a more liberal agenda formed a coalition against Salazar in 1949. The struggle for more liberal government policies erupted in 1959 when student protests became common on the streets and around university centers. A group of liberal Catholics also organized a rebellion in Lisbon in March of 1959, arguing that the church openly supported the masses against government abuses. Salazar responded with another wave of repression, targeting students, college professors, communists, and liberal Catholics. Almost 400 people were arrested, tortured, and summarily convicted. Several leftist public employees were fired from jobs in schools or city management. While the rebellion was controlled, public sentiment for more freedom remained.

During the early 1960s the Portuguese government faced an additional challenge: revolts in its remaining overseas colonies in Asia and Africa. These possessions were actually called overseas provinces after 1951 to make them sound less like colonies being exploited by a European power. Nevertheless, rebellions occurred in Portuguese Guinea in 1963, Mozambique in 1964, and Macao in 1966. Indian troops also forced Portugal to give up its possessions in India in 1961. All these colonies were challenging Portuguese domination of these lands at a time when most countries around the world were already independent of European colonizing nations.

During the 1960s, the numbers of white Portuguese migrants moving to the colonies in Africa and Asia increased, since greater freedoms and a more privileged position were offered abroad than at home. Since the Portuguese government could not attract enough volunteers to conscript for military service to bring the colonies under control, Salazar imposed a military draft, which created further public resentment and discontent. Declining living standards among the working class also posed a potential threat to Salazar's dictatorship, and he sought to repress labor organizing activities.

But workers continued to fight the government by creating clandestine labor unions to improve their own economic conditions. By the late 1960s, Portugal spent about 35 percent of its annual budget on military forces to contain rising anti-colonial protests and revolts in Africa. The independence movements led to thousands of deaths among Africans and Portuguese as economic conditions declined further. To fund the war, Portugal cut social services, and inequality grew increasingly disproportionately.

Salazar suffered an incapacitating stroke in 1968 and died two years later, to be quickly replaced by Marcello Caetano as premier of Portugal. Caetano initially created a façade of concern for the masses and reduced the intimidation and oppression tactics used by the previous regime. But Caetano maintained the general conservative ideology, leading to growing mass agitation. Demonstrations broke out throughout Portugal, labor strikes were common, and political gatherings attracted hundreds of thousands.

Young working people were the primary force behind overt acts of civil disobedience. This was a remarkable achievement, especially considering that Portugal did not have a tradition of cohesive labor unions, and yet they created impromptu unions to organize themselves. Student protesters with a socialist ideology gained widespread support from the public which spread to a large number of military officers as well, prompting the leadership to increase government repression.

The Revolution of 1974 (Carnation Revolution) took place over just one day: April 25, 1974. Almost 50 years of dictatorship were overturned in less than 12 hours. Overall, the revolt was organized by military officers with the purpose of ending the dictatorship that had been in power since the 1930s. Even though the revolution was known as the Armed Forces Movement (AFM), soldiers actually walked together with the workers in their massive protests. The military in revolt secured key installations throughout the country, including military barracks, airports, and government offices, and all ministers were arrested. The AFM took immediate steps to dismantle the secret police, and opened the way for the creation of political parties.

The AFM created a temporary government called the Junta de Salvação Nacional (Junta of National Salvation), and General Spínola and Costa Gomes were appointed to govern. The new government declared itself pro-working class and supportive of the underprivileged. The people poured out by the thousands into most city squares to celebrate the end of the totalitarian fascist government. They were all involved in this revolutionary fervor, even though the new government had not yet offered any concrete proposals about how to run the nation. Consumed by their emotions, people handed out red carnations on the streets, which became the symbol of this successful and bloodless revolution. The revolution eventually became known as the “Revolution of Flowers,” or Carnation Revolution. The overthrown leader, Marcello Caetano, was exiled to the Madeira Islands and was eventually granted asylum by the military dictatorship in Brazil.

However, Portugal continued to face the crisis in its colonies. Since maintaining troops in its colonies was an immense economic drain, the new government promised to withdraw troops from Portugal’s territorial possessions. From 1974 to 1976, Angola, Mozambique, Cape Verde, and Sao Tomé were all granted independence, and East Timor was seized militarily by Indonesia. The only remaining colony was Macao, near Hong Kong, which Portugal administered with little opposition until handing it over to China in 1999.

The temporary government run by the military stepped aside after a year, and Portugal finally held its first open and free elections on April 25, 1975, exactly one year after the revolution. This was the second attempt to establish a republic. The voters turned out in a massive showing, with almost 90 percent of registered voters actually exercising their renewed right to vote. All political parties participated in this new process of democracy, even though most parties were not too liberal. The Communist Party, for example, attempted to force the national rhetoric to the extreme left, but it did not have enough members to create a meaningful impact at the national level. The first joint task of all the political parties was to create a new constitution, which eventually granted its citizens freedom of speech, religion, and the press. As a result, voters over 18 years of age can now select a parliament and vote for a president. There is also a prime minister, usually the leader of the political group that dominates the parliament. Most political parties have found it necessary to join forces and create coalitions to control a large number of seats in parliament.

The period following the overthrow of the dictatorship was not necessarily peaceful in Portugal. Social and economic unrest developed into a potential social disaster following leftist ideals. A massive agrarian reform took place almost immediately in 1974 after the revolution. Most banks were nationalized. University students refused to participate in entrance exams in the belief that they should not have to be dominated by repressive authorities. People without homes simply took over empty and abandoned properties. Workers on the railroads, in subways, and in textile industries went on strike demanding higher wages. This all happened at a time when the new government had inherited an economic crisis from its predecessors. Some issues were slowly resolved with smaller gains than expected by the general population. Eventually, between 1976 and 1980, a group of moderate and centralist political parties emerged into the national political environment.

In the early twenty-first century Portugal had many registered political parties. While the military forces ushered in the new era of democracy, they gave up their advisory role in 1982 and currently no longer have control over any aspects of political life. Today, the two most powerful parties are the Portuguese Socialist Party and the Social Democratic Party. In 1986, the Social Democratic Party won presidential elections under the leadership of Anibal Cavaço Silva. This was a political party with a centrist ideology that was beneficial in establishing a balance in the nation. In addition, 1986 was also the year in which Portugal was accepted into the European Union. Portugal revised its constitution in 1989 to favor political stability and to encourage economic reforms aimed at attracting foreign investment and a more suitable business environment. The standard of living had also increased to levels higher than before the revolution, and the nation has matured politically into a better manager of economic and social needs. Since the Revolution of 1974, the new republic has changed hands many times among different political parties, showcasing the triumph of democracy in Portugal.

SEE ALSO: Angolan National Liberation, 1961–1974; Cape Verde, Independence Struggle; Costa, Afonso Augusta da (1871–1937); FRELIMO (Frente de Libertação de Moçambique); Portugal, Carnation Revolution, 1974

References and Suggested Readings

- Anderson, J. M. (2000) The History of Portugal. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.
- Birmingham, D. (1993) A Concise History of Portugal. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- De Figueiredo, A. (1976) Portugal: Fifty Years of Dictatorship. New York: Holmes & Meier.
- Marques, A. H. de Oliveira (1976) History of Portugal. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Sobel, L. A. (Ed.) (1976) Portuguese Revolution, 1974–1976. New York: Facts of Life.

Postcolonial feminism and protest in the global South

Lorna Lueker Zukas

Postcolonial feminism is a theoretical and activist project for societal transformation. Through analysis of entrenched power structures in formerly colonized nations, postcolonial feminism explains how economic and political institutions and social practices in those nations often oppress and marginalize women. In addition, it demonstrates how women around the globe struggle for equality and independence for themselves, their families, and their nations. The terms postcolonial and feminism are not universally accepted.

Feminism is criticized by many postcolonial writers as a western ideology too narrow to incorporate the concerns or activism of women worldwide. The term has been given anti-family and anti-male connotations, causing some activists to reject the label and argue that while women resist, rebel, and protest, there is no essence of woman, and sisterhood is not a global phenomenon. Postcolonial is criticized by many social theorists and activists as a term saturated with multiple, ahistorical, and sometimes incoherent meanings. Despite criticism of its constituent terms, postcolonial feminism engages important discussions around hierarchies of knowledge, assumed universalistic categories, and the impact of race, class, ethnicity, religion, and sexuality on women's well-being. Postcolonial feminists are not a coherent group. Nevertheless, their work exposes the long-term and far-reaching nature of women's struggles to live sustainable lives, to overcome adversity, to protect the environment, to save their families, and to end the harmful effects of globalization, the damaging exploitation of the South by the North.

In the two decades from 1975 to 1995, women's conditions captured global attention and a series of international conferences focused on women's issues ensued. The United Nations' conferences in Mexico City (1975), Copenhagen (1980), Nairobi (1985), and Beijing (1995) were watersheds in the development of feminism in general and postcolonial feminism in particular. Looking at these developments, Chandra Talpade Mohanty published her now famous essay, "Under Western Eyes: Feminist Scholarship and Colonial Discourses" (1986), to demonstrate how some western feminist writing was self-serving and collapsed all women in the "third world" into "a singular monolithic subject," an "Other" without contextualization, history, personality, or spirit. Postcolonial feminists rebelled against this brand of western feminism, against the ideal of universal womanhood, and have since 1986 produced a body of work in which women from the global South analyze their own circumstances and critique the West for racist, gendered, neocolonial policies and the subjugation, subordination, and exoticization of people and places non-western.

In the global South, primarily, but not wholly countries lying between the Tropic of Cancer and the Tropic of Capricorn, a postcolonial feminist agenda emerged in opposition to neocolonial and patriarchal hegemonies which often marginalized women. Postcolonial feminism highlighted the struggles of women who sought political, economic, and social inclusion in their societies and actively worked to eliminate conditions that subordinated women to men in both the public and private spheres. The fact that postcolonial feminism arose as a result of anti-colonial and postcolonial struggles is not surprising. As anti-colonial struggles were won nationalist leaders rejected the ideologies of the first world and the socialist world and defined themselves as the third world, claiming a non-aligned and independent status. With the same spirit of originality and independence postcolonial feminists attempted to create new spaces for women. Their struggles ranged from rewriting national constitutions to developing laws bestowing on women a legal age of majority, the right to work, equal pay for equal work, family leave-time, rights to education, domestic violence safeguards, and anti-rape protections. These feminists also sought to protect their traditional spaces from neocolonial abuse, fighting for land-use rights and environmental protections. In a deliberate epistemological move, postcolonial feminists provincialized western perspectives, illuminating micro-experiences, female subjectivity, and struggles while explaining macro-global economic issues and political systems with indigenous voices. Their retelling of US and European histories detailing the consequences of imperialism, capitalism, and globalization on local places decried the Eurocentric production of knowledge, the universalizing of women's experiences, and past and present dominations. By highlighting women's experiences, postcolonial feminists created an arena for discussion of women's activism in a global context.

Since the late twentieth century, postcolonial feminist protest in the global South has strengthened the women's movement on a global scale. Vandana Shiva is among the leading postcolonial feminists in India. Her work focuses on women as food producers, healers, and guardians of biodiversity in society. She argues that small-scale female farmers provide food security for most countries in the South, yet they are invisible as their work is outside the market-driven, export-led businesses that dominate the global economy. As unseen producers, women's value is not acknowledged and their means of production are often expropriated, polluted, or made inaccessible through international trade agreements. Shiva founded the Navdanya movement and the eco-feminist movement Diverse Women for Diversity to undo the harm of globalization and the Green Revolution, to advocate against monocropping, to protect the biodiversity of crops for food security, to defend local knowledge from transnational corporate bio-piracy, and to establish ecologically sustainable agriculture in which food security and health and safety of the people outweigh corporate profits. Postcolonial feminists involved in these movements maintain that corporations and the people who run them, as well as the shareholders who profit from them, have a responsibility to the communities in which they operate and cannot ruin the land and destroy people's livelihood with impunity.

Also protesting land pollution and corporate greed, a coalition of 600 Nigerian women occupied a Chevron-Texaco export terminal and flow station in 2002–3, shutting down the 450,000 barrels per day production facility. Utilizing a long tradition of women's power and protest in Nigeria, and reminiscent of the Women's War of 1929, women put their lives on the line in an effort to save their community and improve their lives. This postcolonial feminist protest motivated over 1,000 other women to occupy six additional Chevron-Texaco facilities throughout Nigeria, sparked labor strikes by men, and engendered anti-oil protests on all seven continents. Women demanded an end to the land pollution and poverty in their communities generated by the political economy of multinational oil business.

In writing about the postcolonial feminist movement in the Bahamas, Jacqui Alexander demonstrates the efforts of feminists within a larger Caribbean movement to articulate the connection between the public and private sphere. During the 1980s and 1990s, Bahamian postcolonial feminists showed that women's problems were societal problems and created a mass-based movement for social change, working to protect the family by ending violence against girls and women. The movement fostered an understanding of colonial and postcolonial nationalist practices that inscribed women as subordinate to men and enabled pervasive sexualized violence, including rape and incest of wives and daughters, and other forms of domestic violence. Women upheld the sanctity of the family and the safety of the home, and maintained that the ongoing violence put the future of the family at risk. In this case, the postcolonial state supported the postcolonial feminist movement, but instead of protecting women from domestic violence developed a weak law that did nothing to stop the brutality. Alexander shows that feminist movements need government intervention to create macro-level societal changes, but this action must be accompanied by micro-level ideological changes that insist women are not property and sexual abuse of any individual is intolerable.

By the early twenty-first century, rapid globalization shifted the discourse of postcolonial feminism; some Northern women moved South and some women from the South created lives and careers in the North, enabling ongoing cross-cultural dialogue. Recognizing and experiencing this shift, Mohanty revisited her landmark article "Under Western Eyes" in 2003 and asked all feminists to embrace a transnational feminism that acknowledges their differences but builds coalitions and develops solidarities across borders. With an internationalist vision she encourages women around the world to continue to struggle to improve their life conditions and their communities. She contends that by comprehending the points of contestation, by understanding the terrains on which the battles are fought, and by knowing what approaches create successful outcomes and which are co-opted by larger political forces, feminists can build a network of solidarity to support people's struggles.

Transnational feminism is concerned not only with women's development and gender and racial equality, but also with challenging how transnational corporations and multilateral institutions have restructured lives, destroyed environments, and marginalized and silenced communities of people. This transnational feminism inspires solidarity between the peoples of the North and the South, rebukes capitalism's excesses, refuses to be co-opted by development funding, and charts an anti-globalization course to protect family, community, and local self-determination, and ensure freedom from exploitation by ending discrimination. Transnational feminism challenges prevailing social structures, militarization, religious fundamentalism, classism, sexism, and racism that privilege some over others. These feminists support local struggles and continue to challenge nation-states and the role of multilateral agencies whose agenda is the creation of a uniform capitalistic world order.

SEE ALSO: Fanon, Frantz (1925–1961); Shiva, Vandana (b. 1952); Women and National Liberation in Africa; Women's Movement, Anglophone Caribbean; Women's Movement, India; Women's Movement, Latin America; Women's Movement, Southern Africa; Women's War of 1929

References and Suggested Readings

- Alexander, M. J. (2005) Pedagogies of Crossing. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Alexander, M. J. & Mohanty, C. T. (1997) Feminist Genealogies, Colonial Legacies, Democratic Futures. New York: Routledge.
- Basu, A. (Ed.) (1995) The Challenge of Local Feminisms: Women's Movements in Global Perspective. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.
- Ferree, M. M. & Tripp, A. M. (2006) Global Feminism: Transnational Women's Activism, Organizing, and Human Rights. New York: New York University Press.
- Hawkesworth, M. E. (2006) Globalization and Feminist Activism. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Mann, H. S. (1995) Women's Rights versus Feminism? Postcolonial Perspectives. In G. Rajan (Ed.), Postcolonial Discourse and Changing Cultural Contexts: Theory and Criticism. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.
- Mills, S. (1998) Post-Colonial Feminist Theory. In S. Jackson & J. Jones (Eds.), Contemporary Feminist Theories. New York: New York University Press.
- Moghadam, V. M. (2005) Globalizing Women: Transnational Feminist Networks. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.
- Mohanty, C. T. (2003) Feminism Without Borders: Decolonizing Theory, Practicing Solidarity. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Rajan, G. (Ed.) (1995) Postcolonial Discourse and Changing Cultural Contexts: Theory and Criticism. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.
- Ramdas, K. N. (2006) Nothing Short of a Revolution: Reflections on the Global Women's Movement. Conscious Magazine, Washington, DC.
- Ricciutelli, L., Miles, A., & McFadden, M. H. (2004) Feminist Politics, Activism, and Vision: Local and Global Challenges. London: Zed Books.
- Smith, B. G. (Ed.) (2000) Global Feminisms Since 1945: Rewriting Histories. New York: Routledge.
- Stachel, L. A., Kofman, E., & Peake, L. (2004) Mapping Women, Making Politics: Feminist Perspectives on Political Geography. New York: Routledge.
- Suleri, S. (1994) Woman Skin Deep: Feminism and the Postcolonial Condition. In P. Williams & L. Chrisman (Eds.), Colonial Discourse and Post-Colonial Theory: A Reader. New York: Columbia University Press.

Poulantzas, Nicos (1936–1979)

Christos Boukalas

Born in Athens, Greece in 1936, Nicos Poulantzas, sociology professor at Vincennes University, is considered as one of the most original post-war Marxist thinkers, and was an outstanding contributor to the theory of the state and socio-political struggles, theoretical areas crucial for revolutionary practice. His work provides indispensable means for the analysis of sociopolitical dynamics, and the development of revolutionary strategy.

While Karl Marx, Vladimir Lenin, and Antonio Gramsci are constant influences in his work, his first book, Political Power and Social Classes (PPSC), is heavily informed by the structuralism of the French Marxist philosopher Louis Althusser. In PPSC Poulantzas attempts to establish politics and the state as a distinctive field of study while insisting that the state does not "have" power of its own but is a crucial mediator of class relations/dynamics. Thus, state functions are determined by class struggle and, in the context of the capitalist state, tend to systemically reproduce capitalist hegemony.

PPSC offers an elaborate set of notions (e.g., "type of state," "state form," "type of regime") that are henceforth essential for state-theoretical analysis (and historical materialism more generally), while the notion of the power bloc, is crucial for articulating class interests with state power. Nonetheless, because of its structuralist emphasis in establishing the state as a separate subject of analysis, PPSC ultimately fails to inscribe class struggle in the formation and operation of state apparatuses, which is also a failure to inscribe the impact of state power on class struggle.

At this stage Poulantzas engaged in a debate with British state theorist Ralph Miliband. As the latter was postulating the capitalist character of the state from the class origin of top political personnel, Poulantzas counter-argued that capitalist bias is inscribed at the very structure of the state, making indifferent who occupies its summit.

Underlying Poulantzas's theoretical output was his political commitment. He was a communist militant, active in several parties and organizations in France and Greece. This is evident in his approach, choice of subjects, and in a deep methodological premise to construct theory so that it is able to accommodate political phenomena, rather than "deriving" the latter through pre-established theoretical formulas. Accordingly, he would seek to reframe his theoretical approach in the light of political developments. Thus, as May 1968 came soon after the publication of PPSC, Poulantzas perceived structuralism as a hindrance in accounting for social dynamics.

His second book, Fascism and Dictatorship (FD), focused mainly on class dynamics, hence privileging Gramscian categories over structuralism. Studying the rise of fascist states in 1930s Italy and Germany, FD sought to help develop a popular strategy against the military dictatorship in Greece. It is concerned with exceptional forms of the capitalist type of state. Fascist states are exceptional because representation of class interests does not occur through the channels (e.g., parliamentarism) or within a framework (e.g., rule of law) pertinent to normal forms of capitalist state. They are nonetheless forms of capitalist state inasmuch as the economy is instituted as a separate field, and the state is charged with reproducing the capitalist relations of production. This account contradicts the dominant conceptualization of fascist/totalitarian states as the opposite of capitalist/pluralist ones.

FD describes in detail the complex interplay of class dynamics (strategies, alliances, movements) that concluded in the rise of fascist parties to power. Furthermore, given that exceptional forms imply a radical break with institutional normality, FD shows class dynamics as determining not only state power and functions, but also the very structure of the state.

In the same line, Social Classes in Contemporary Capitalism (SCCC) develops a sophisticated set of categories for class typology, and produces an account of the complicated, antagonistic process through which specific class strategies are promoted by the state, and define the modality and orientation of state power. It discusses normal contemporary state forms, and is concerned with the development of left strategies for resisting monopoly capitalism and imperialism.

The Crisis of Dictatorships (CD) was prompted by a strategic surprise: the Greek junta did not fall as a direct result of popular struggles. Poulantzas's conclusion was that popular struggles impact the state even when carried out at a distance from it, and, being unable to accommodate them, exceptional state forms are inherently fragile. Furthermore, the Portuguese revolution against the dictatorship was an actual opportunity to develop a democratic/socialist strategy. In its context, Poulantzas moves from a Leninist "dual power" position to a newly defined "eurocommunist" one, where popular pressure to the state from the "outside" is combined with intensification of struggles inside the state. This implies a reviewed perception of the state, not as monolithic, but as riven with internal contradictions and antagonisms.

Poulantzas's last book, State, Power, Socialism (SPS), brings his previous achievements together in a study of normal state forms, under renewed theoretical impetus deriving from an uncomfortable relationship with Foucault's theory of power. Poulantzas criticized Foucault for producing mere metaphysics of power, since for him power was not grounded in any social relation other than itself, would not combine to any general direction, and would be exercised always, everywhere, and at random. Nonetheless, under the influence of Foucault, SPS questions the fundamental premise that the capitalist state would always and necessarily serve capitalist interests, and privileges a conjuncture-specific analysis of the dynamic articulation between classes, strategies, state mechanisms, and state power. The outcome is an account of the state as a complex, internally contradictory institutional matrix, whose powers are mobilized by different strategies of classes/fractions occupying different state mechanisms. Whether a relatively coherent general line of power can be developed is uncertain.

When it does, it is the result of a certain class-fraction's hegemony in the power bloc, and a subsequent predominance of the mechanism occupied by the hegemonic fraction among state mechanisms. Thus, the state is defined as a material condensation of a relationship of social forces. Duplicating Marx's definition of capital, Poulantzas declares the state to be a social relation – in contrast to hitherto prevailing approaches that conceptualized it either as an “actor” informed by its own interests and exercising power to their pursuit, or as an “object,” a neutral power container to be used by any social force occupying it.

In this framework, Poulantzas examined contemporary Western European state forms. He argued that, to counter political and economic crisis resulting from acute popular struggles, the state was acquiring a new form: “authoritarian statism.” Its key feature is augmented statal control over all aspects of social life, combined with exclusion of the population from political control. Specific expressions include concentration of power to the summits of the executive; reversal of the parties' role; inflation of the political importance of state bureaucracy; disruption of the rule of law; development of a draconian policing arsenal to deal with acute expressions of popular resistance; and augmentation of a parallel network of interests' representation in the state that bypasses the normal parliamentary channels of bourgeois democracy. Poulantzas emphasizes that authoritarian statism is not an exceptional (fascist) form, but a normal form of capitalist state, which nonetheless organically incorporates authoritarian elements into the institutional framework of the bourgeois republic – hence rendering them permanent.

His untimely death in Paris by suicide in 1979 prevented Poulantzas from developing the outlook of SPS any further. Nonetheless, the relational approach constitutes a watershed regarding perceptions of the state; and the hardening of state power in the early twenty-first century resulted in renewed interest in authoritarian statism as a basis for political analysis. In all, Poulantzas's theoretical contribution is essential for the strategic orientation of democratic, revolutionary forces.

SEE ALSO: Eurocommunism; Foucault, Michel (1926–1984); Gramsci, Antonio (1891–1937); Greece, Anti-Dictatorship Protests; Marxism

References and Suggested Readings

- Jessop, B. (1985) Nicos Poulantzas: Marxist Theory and Political Strategy. London: Macmillan.
- Martin, J. (Ed.) (2008) The Poulantzas Reader. London: Verso.
- Poulantzas, N. (1973) Political Power and Social Classes. London: New Left Books.
- Poulantzas, N. (1974) Fascism and Dictatorship. London: New Left Books.
- Poulantzas, N. (1975) Social Classes in Contemporary Capitalism. London: New Left Books.
- Poulantzas, N. (1976) Crisis of the Dictatorships. London: New Left Books.
- Poulantzas, N. (1978) State, Power, Socialism. London: New Left Books.

POUM (Workers' Party of Marxist Unification)

Andrew Durgan

The Spanish Partido Obrero de Unificación Marxista (Workers' Party of Marxist Unification) (POUM) was the most important of the dissident communist groupings that emerged internationally in the 1930s in opposition to Stalinism. It played a leading role in the Spanish Revolution of 1936–7 before becoming victim of the Soviet government's first intervention against a foreign revolution

The POUM was founded in September 1935 with the fusion of the Bloque Obrero y Campesino (Workers' and Peasants' Bloc) (BOC) and the Izquierda Comunista de España (Communist Left of Spain) (ICE). The origins of the BOC lay in the pro-communist faction of the CNT led by Joaquín Maurín. This group formed the nucleus of the Spanish Communist Party's Catalan Federation which in 1930 broke with the party in opposition to its ultra-leftism and its increasingly bureaucratic methods. In March 1931 the Catalan Federation united with another dissident communist grouping which had emerged from sectors of left Catalan nationalism in 1928, the Partit Comunista Català, to form the BOC.

The BOC was the largest workers' party in Catalonia, with some 5,000 members by 1935. It also had branches in the Valencia region and elsewhere. Politically and socially it was squeezed between the mass anarchosindicalist movement, the CNT, and the left nationalist party, Esquerra Republicana de Catalunya. Its main base was in the Catalan provinces, particularly among peasants in Lleida and Girona, in smaller industrial centers and, in Barcelona, among white collar workers. The BOC championed the necessity for workers' unity and helped establish various trade union united fronts in Catalonia and the Workers' Alliances, which would have a decisive role in the rebellion of 1934. The BOC argued the forthcoming revolution in Spain would be "socialist-democratic," whereby an alliance of the peasantry, national liberation movements (Catalonia, the Basque Country, etc.), and the working class, under the hegemony of the latter, would both carry through the "unfinished" democratic revolution, which the petty bourgeoisie was incapable of carrying out, and move directly onto the socialist stage. The inability of the Republic (1931–6) to satisfy either demands for social justice or deal with the growing threat of the extreme right appeared to confirm the BOC's prognosis.

The ICE was formed in 1930 as the Spanish section of the International Left Opposition (Trotskyists). Like the BOC, it included in its ranks many founding cadres of Spanish communism, in particular Juan Andrade and Andreu Nin. With 800 members, the ICE's most important nuclei were in Madrid, Seville, Extremadura, and the North. The Trotskyists' theoretical level compared favorably with the paucity of much of Spanish Marxism. Initially, the ICE was very critical of what it saw as the confused politics of the BOC.

The BOC were never followers of Bukharin as has often been asserted. In fact, by 1933, Maurín's organization had adopted a critique of Stalinism closer to Trotskyism. The ICE, in turn, had distanced itself from the international Trotskyist movement, in particular rejecting the turn towards "entrism" in the socialist parties in 1934. This evolution in the two organizations, combined with working closely together in the Workers Alliances and the general clamor for unity following the defeat of the October 1934 uprising, led to the convergence of the BOC and ICE.

The new party represented a synthesis of the programs of the two organizations rather than just an extension of the BOC as has been claimed. Both adversaries and historians alike usually label the POUM as Trotskyist, but this was never the case. The POUM shared with Trotskyism its critique of the theory of socialism in one country, its defense of working-class and party democracy, and its internationalism. However, the POUM's decision to sign the Popular Front pact led to a breakdown of the tenuous relationship that still existed between the former ICE members and the international Trotskyist movement. The POUM, in fact, denounced the Popular Front both before and after the elections as class collaboration and defended their decision to participate in the electoral pact in order to "defeat the Right at the polls" and assure an amnesty for the thousands imprisoned after October 1934.

The POUM participated actively in opposing the military uprising in July 1936 in Barcelona and elsewhere. In Catalonia its influence grew significantly, and it played an important role in many of the local revolutionary committees and in the first militia columns to leave for the Aragon front. However, the POUM was plainly in a minority in a revolutionary movement dominated by the CNT.

The party grew from some 6,000 members on the eve of the war to a claimed 40,000 by the spring of 1937, the majority in Catalonia. During the first ten months of the war it published five daily and numerous weekly newspapers, as well as having radio stations in Barcelona and Madrid. It organized over 6,000 militia in the Lenin (later 29th) Division on the Aragon front, mainly around Huesca, the experience of which was described in George Orwell's classic Homage to Catalonia and depicted in Ken Loach's film Land and Freedom. The party also had battalions on the Madrid and Teruel fronts.

The POUM argued the war and revolution were inseparable; that the urban and rural working class were not fighting just to defend republican democracy but to carry through the social revolution that had erupted in July 1936. Andreu Nin, who had become the party's central leader in the absence of Maurín, would claim that the working class had "solved" in five days what the Republic had been unable to do in five years: the distribution of the land, the destruction of clerical power, and a profound socioeconomic transformation in benefit of the working class. By subordinating both the military and social struggle to winning middle-class support, the POUM argued, the Republic would be defeated. Nevertheless, unlike the anarchists and many left socialists, the POUM did not dismiss the need, at least, to neutralize petty bourgeois hostility towards the social revolution.

Thus the party opposed forced collectivization and arbitrary measures against small businessmen and shopkeepers.

Basing itself on the experience of the Russian Revolution, the POUM defended the need for the establishment of a new proletarian power: a Workers' and Peasants' Government elected by an assembly of delegates from workers', peasants', and fighters' committees. Such a government would in turn organize a unified revolutionary army, the Red Army under Trotsky being the model, and centralize the collectivization of industry and the land.

Without the CNT, the POUM was incapable of imposing a new revolutionary power, but the anarchosyndicalists were opposed in principle to the building of any new form of state structure. Having failed to persuade the CNT to take power through the Catalan Militia Committee, the POUM felt it had little choice but to follow the anarchosyndicalists into the newly reorganized Catalan government (Generalitat) in late September 1936. The new regional government served to both "legalize" the revolution and to eventually undermine it. The dissolution of the revolutionary committees in favor of municipal councils meant both the POUM and CNT lost much of their power base at a local level. Trotsky and his followers would severely criticize the POUM for participating in a Popular Front government and accuse the party of having betrayed the revolution. The POUM itself was divided internally over this and other questions.

The reconstruction of the republican state and the undermining of the revolution were paralleled with the rapid growth in influence of the communists. Stalinist methods and demonology soon became a central part of the republican counterrevolution. The POUM were identified as Trotskyist and thus by extension as fascist. The fact that the POUM denounced the Moscow Trials and reclaimed the mantle of the Bolsheviks was particularly irksome for the communists. Moreover, as the weaker sector of the revolutionary left, the POUM was a far easier target than the CNT.

The CNT initially refused to take sides in the growing divisions between the POUM and the communists, seeing it as a "family" affair between Marxists. Worse still, for the POUM, the anarchosyndicalists were prepared to enter a pact with their trade union rivals the socialist UGT, which was firmly under Stalinist control in Catalonia, on the basis that this was a sindical and not political-based collaboration. The POUM itself had lost its trade union base during the summer of 1936. Faced with the Generalitat's decree making trade union membership obligatory and the growing polarization between the anarchist CNT and the "Marxist" UGT, the dissident communists decided to join the latter. The POUM had organized its own union federation in May 1936, the Federación Obrera de Unidad Sindical (FOUS), as the first step towards trade union unity. With around 50,000 members the FOUS had briefly challenged the hegemony of the Catalan CNT in the weeks leading up to the war. Given the relative weakness of the local UGT and the difficulties of working inside the CNT since the BOC-led unions had been expelled in 1932-3, the POUM thought they could use the socialist union as a platform from which to argue for unity with the anarchosyndicalists. Instead, the massive and rapid growth of the Catalan Stalinist party, the Partit Socialista Unificat de Catalunya (PSUC), which united local communists and socialists, meant the UGT provided an important mass base for the POUM's adversaries.

The Stalinist campaign against the POUM began in earnest first in Madrid, where the party was weaker. In October 1936 members of the unified Communist-Socialist Youth, the Juventud Socialista Unificada, assaulted the headquarters of the POUM's youth organization, the Juventud Comunista Ibérica. Under pressure from the Soviet ambassador the POUM was denied representation on the Madrid Defense Junta and its press in the capital was heavily censored and eventually suppressed altogether. Its troops, which had been decimated at the front during the battle for Madrid, denied arms and supplies, were absorbed into the CNT-led 38th Mixed Brigade in January 1937 to avoid complete obliteration. Meanwhile in Catalonia, also a result of direct Soviet interference, the POUM was ejected from the Catalan government in December 1936. By early 1937 verbal and, increasingly, physical attacks on the POUM by the communists were intensifying. Calls were repeatedly now made for the POUM as a "fascist" organization to be repressed. Excluded from the UGT and with its militia denied arms on the Aragon front, the POUM tried desperately to persuade the CNT to take a stand against the counterrevolution.

An exception to the lack of unity on the revolutionary left was the formation of the Frente de la Juventud Trabajadora Revolucionaria (Revolutionary Young Workers' Front) by the POUM and CNT youth organizations in February 1937, which mobilized thousands of young workers to demonstrate in defense of the "conquests of the revolution." But this experience was short-lived, as the CNT soon blocked this collaboration with a "political" organization.

The attempts to undermine the revolution finally provoked an armed uprising of CNT activists in Barcelona in May 1937. The POUM had sided with the workers on the barricades, but rather than see this insurrection as an opportunity to seize power, the party saw it as a way of halting the assaults on "the gains of July 1936." Having failed to persuade the CNT leadership to bring the entire city under their control, the POUM felt it had little option but to follow the anarchosindicalists when they abandoned the streets for the sake of maintaining anti-fascist unity. Accused of having organized an insurrection against the Republic, the POUM was made illegal on June 16, 1937. For the communists, the May events were the definitive proof of the fascist character of the POUM and they called for its arrested leaders to be shot. Andreu Nin was abducted and murdered by Soviet agents. Several hundred POUM members were imprisoned and dozens more murdered. The party continued to operate clandestinely, bringing out its press and its members fighting at the front in units usually controlled by the CNT. At the trial of the POUM leadership in November 1938, unable to prove the Stalinist accusation that the party was a fascist spy organization, the defendants were instead sentenced to long prison sentences for having aimed to overthrow the Republic. The international outcry over the murder of Nin guaranteed, in part, that a Moscow-style show trial could not be mounted in republican territory.

In the late 1940s the POUM was reorganized clandestinely in Catalonia and played an active role in the anti-Francoist movement. The advent of the Cold War, the indifference of the democracies and subsequent consolidation of Franco's regime soon undermined most of this opposition. The POUM was undermined by a split in 1945 which led to the founding of the social democratic Moviment Socialista de Catalunya. By the early 1950s the POUM had become principally an exile organization based in France and Latin America. With the democratization of Spain in the 1970s the remnants of the POUM attempted to reorganize in Spain. It attracted some new younger members but a failed attempt to unify with other small revolutionary groups really marked the end of the party. The last issue of the POUM's by now bi-monthly paper, La Batalla, came out in May 1980.

SEE ALSO: Asturias Uprising, October 1934; Bolsheviks; Confederación Nacional del Trabajo (CNT); Leninist Philosophy; Maurin, Joaquín (1896–1973); Nin, Andreu (1892–1937); Spanish Revolution

References and Suggested Readings

- Alba, V. (Ed.) (1977) La revolución española en la práctica. Documentos del POUM. Gijón: Ediciones Júcar.
- Alba, V. & Schwartz, S. (1988) Spanish Marxism versus Soviet Communism: A History of the POUM. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Books.
- Bolloten, B. (1991) The Spanish Civil War: Revolution and Counterrevolution. Hemel Hempstead: Harvester/Wheatsheaf.
- Broué, P. & Témime, E. (1972) The Revolution and Civil War in Spain. London: Faber & Faber.
- Durgan, A. (1996) B.O.C. El Bloque Obrero y Campesino 1930–1936. Barcelona: Laertes.
- Durgan, A. (2006) Marxism, War and Revolution: Trotsky and the POUM. Stalinism, Revolution and Counter-Revolution: Revolutionary History 9, 2: 27–65.
- Durgan, A. et al. (1992) The Spanish Civil War: The View from the Left. Revolutionary History 4, 1/2.
- Iglesias, I. (2003) Experiencias de la revolución. El POUM, Trotsky y la intervención soviética. Barcelona: Laertes.
- Orwell, G. (2001) Orwell in Spain. London: Penguin.
- Pagès, P. (1978) El movimiento trotskista en España (1930–1935). Barcelona: Ediciones Península.
- Solano, W. (1999) El POUM en la historia. Madrid: Los Libros de la Catarata.
- Trotsky, L. (1973) The Spanish Revolution (1931–1939). New York: Pathfinder Press.

Prabhakaran, Velupillai (b. 1954)

Charan Rainford

Velupillai Prabhakaran is the leader of the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, the foremost rebel organization seeking Eelam or an independent homeland for the Sri Lankan Tamils. He was born on November 26, 1954 in Jaffna, Sri Lanka as the fourth child to T. Velupillai and V. Parvathi, a well-respected family in the coastal village of Velvettiturai. Velupillai was a clerk and district land officer. By dint of his father's occupation, Prabhakaran's early schooling was in the Eastern town of Batticaloa, and later in Jaffna. He was said to be a studious boy and a loner by nature. In 1958, during the first major anti-Tamil riots, he witnessed a Hindu temple priest caught and burnt to death by a rampaging Sinhalese mob.

These events are said to have had a strong impact on Prabhakaran, who was of a generation that did not witness pre-colonial Sri Lanka. He veered away from a quiet childhood and became more politically aware and radically inclined in his mid-teens. While he was influenced by India's struggle for freedom, it was not by non-violence but by Subhas Chandra Bose, whom he described as his "special hero". Prabhakaran began to take to violence in the early 1970s, forcing him to stay away from home so as to prevent guilt falling on his family, but it was in 1975 that he undertook his first major killing. Leading a group of eight youths, Prabhakaran shot dead former Jaffna mayor and chief organizer for the governing party, Alfred Duraiappah, as he headed to temple.

In May 1976 Prabhakaran formed the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE) in succession to the Tamil New Tigers. From 1979 through the early 1980s Prabhakaran and his senior colleagues based themselves in Madras, where they also met for the first time with Anton Balasingham, who would provide the group with an ideological background via socialism, though it is fair to say that the LTTE is essentially driven by nationalism and pragmatism, reflecting Prabhakaran's own mindset. In May 1982 Prabhakaran and a colleague were arrested by the Indian police after their involvement in a fight with a rival leader and ex-colleague. Even as the authorities prepared to deport him to Sri Lanka, the Indian government, under pressure from Tamil Nadu politicians and also for its own strategic reasons, chose to release them to live in custody in Tamil Nadu. On November 27, 1982 Shankar became the first LTTE guerrilla to die in action, an event since commemorated annually by Prabhakaran with his Heroes Day speech. The following month, Prabhakaran escaped and returned to Jaffna.

The riots of July 1983 would set Prabhakaran firmly on the quest for a separate state, an ideological goal that he has never renounced. In 1984 he would accede to the LTTE's cadres being trained covertly by the Indian government, and offer his first press interview, one of many granted to the Indian journalist Anita Pratap. In October Prabhakaran married Mathivathani with whom he would have three children. The period from 1985 to 1991 was a critical period in Prabhakaran's life, as it led from negotiations mediated by India to open conflict with the Indian Peacekeeping Force (IPKF). In July 1989 the Indian newspaper The Hindu prematurely pronounced that Prabhakaran had been killed. Again, in 2005, a persistent rumor that he had perished was given credence by government pronouncements. He came close to capture when the IPKF belatedly stormed his jungle hideout. The episode with the IPKF ultimately led Prabhakaran to order the successful assassination of former Indian Premier Rajiv Gandhi in 1991. The repercussions of the assassination still reverberate, with an outstanding warrant for his extradition.

In April 2002, during a peace process with the government, Prabhakaran gave his first international press conference. While affirming his commitment to Eelam, he acknowledged that another solution was possible if the fundamental Tamil demands of homeland, nation, and self-determination were met.

Prabhakaran is viewed as a master military strategist and regarded as the supreme Tamil leader by a large proportion of the Tamil population. This also reflects the tight central control with which he leads the LTTE, something that has drawn strong criticism from moderates and opponents alike. Prabhakaran remains condemned for his resort to terrorism, suicide bombings, and child recruitment and even while he continues the struggle for Eelam, he is wanted by Interpol and the Sri Lankan government.

SEE ALSO: Bose, Subhas Chandra (1897–1945); Tamil Nationalist Struggle for Eelam

References and Suggested Readings

- Narayan Swamy, M. R. (1994) Tigers of Lanka: From Boys to Guerrillas. New Delhi: Konark.
- Narayan Swamy, M. R. (2003) Inside an Elusive Mind: Prabhakaran – The First Profile of the World's Most Ruthless Guerrilla Leader. New Delhi: Konark.
- Pratap, A. (2001) Island of Blood. New Delhi: Penguin.

Prague Spring

Kieran Williams

The upheaval in Czechoslovakia in the second half of the 1960s conventionally referred to as the Prague Spring was one of the greatest challenges to the Soviet model of political economy and social control. The centerpiece of this challenge was an effort by the ruling Communist Party (Komunistická strana Československa, KSČ) to combat growing disaffection by relaxing the limits on speech and association, curtailing surveillance by the secret police, introducing market elements into the planned economy, federalizing the unitary state to put relations between the two constituent nations (the Czechs and the less numerous Slovaks) on a more equal footing, and preparing the KSČ for semi-competitive elections. Alongside the official efforts, ferment in universities, trade unions, and intellectual circles exceeded the bounds set by the KSČ and greatly alarmed the Soviet Union, which led an invasion in August 1968 to restore Leninist orthodoxy. The ensuing week of non-violent civil resistance to that invasion is also an important part of this episode.

Although the Prague Spring is normally associated with 1968, it neither began nor ended in that year. Its first stirrings can be found five years earlier, when economic recession coincided with a new round of revelations about political crimes committed after the KSČ seized power in 1948; it ended in August 1969 when protests to mark the first anniversary of the Soviet-led invasion were brutally suppressed by the Czechoslovak police and army. Apart from federalization, which Slovaks managed to push onto the agenda in 1968, most of the necessary conceptual breakthroughs concerning the state, the representation of social groups, the balancing of interests, and the role of the market had already occurred between 1963 and 1967 (Golan 1971; Kusin 1971). At that time artists, philosophers, and jurists, who were the backbone of the socialist establishment, transcended both the Stalinism of their youth and the searingly self-critical impulses of early de-Stalinization. They were shifting toward a view of humankind that was much more subjective and contingent, expressed in “a language that effectively reconfigured Marxism as existential and moral philosophy, a language made up more of questions than of answers” (Shore 1998: 439).

Many strands of the “polysemic” Prague Spring (Rubès 1999) were woven into the Action Program, the KSČ’s reform manifesto announced in April 1968 (for a translation of the text, see Remington 1969). At once audacious and contradictory, it was the product of input from dozens of institutions, inquiries, and commissions, and drafted over three months by many hands, some more conservative than others. It can be read as potentially revolutionary in its implications, envisioning a leap to a novel political and economic arrangement with a family resemblance to contemporaneous corporatist experiments in Yugoslavia or to ones advocated by West European communist parties. At almost every step, however, the program curbs its ambition by insisting on the supremacy of the KSČ as guarantor of socialist fundamentals. Like the KSČ leader at the time, Alexander Dubček, the Action Program embodies the fuzzy boundaries of the Prague Spring reforms that made them an exceptionally exciting project, but for the Soviets a deeply worrying one.

Dubček, a Slovak with a long record of loyal service to the party and to the Soviet Union, favored a controlled, centrist liberalization of the Leninist system, and as 1968 passed he grew uneasy. The collapse of censorship in March, owing more to party neglect than conscious decision, had permitted public space for a much broader discussion of the political system than was intended or desired; the playwright Václav Havel, for example, had gone well beyond the Action Program in arguing for a competitive opposition party (Remington 1969: 64–71). Havel and dozens of other intellectuals were setting up discussion clubs beyond the party’s control, and were planning to revive the liberal daily newspaper of the interwar republic, Lidové noviny (The People’s Paper), in October. When Soviet leaders alerted Dubček to their displeasure at these and other developments, he rarely disagreed. He differed, however, in his belief that the best approach would be to let the KSČ hold a special congress in September 1968, at which new people would be elected to its topmost institutions. In private, Dubček assured Moscow that the congress would be the moment when the party elite could shed both its Stalinist holdovers and its more radical elements; the resulting leadership would be more united and authoritative and thus better able to keep the next stage of reform under effective control.

Unconvinced that Dubček was either sincere in his pledges or skilful enough to manage the congress, on August 17 the Soviet leadership decided to invade Czechoslovakia three days later with the assistance of other socialist states that shared their alarm – East Germany, Poland, Hungary, and Bulgaria. Although commonly referred to as a Warsaw Pact invasion, it technically took place outside the framework of the communist military alliance; Romania, a member of the pact, was considered unreliable and was not invited to participate. In the first wave, starting late on the night of August 20, around 165,000 soldiers and 4,600 tanks crossed Czechoslovakia's borders; within a few days the numbers had swelled to around 500,000 soldiers and 6,000 tanks. The overwhelmed Czechoslovak army was ordered by the defense minister not to resist.

The purpose of the invasion was not to install a government of foreign military occupation, but to deter or squash any armed resistance to a takeover of party and state institutions by Czechoslovak collaborators. Many officials who had started out at Dubček's side had decided to break with him and signal to Moscow their willingness to reverse the reforms in the ways preferred by the Soviets. Working with the Soviet embassy in Prague and consulate in Bratislava, these conspirators hastily plotted a coup d'état by forcing, on the night of August 20, a vote in the KSC leadership on a motion to declare the country to be in crisis, request outside military assistance, and sideline the best-known reformers. Instead, two secondary but nonetheless necessary conspirators balked at the last minute, sided with the reformers, and voted to condemn the invasion. The text of that condemnation was then telephoned to the central radio studio, from which it was broadcast before the collaborators there were in full control. The original plan fast unraveling, the Soviets had to improvise. Before dawn Dubček and other reformers were arrested and eventually taken to the Soviet Union. On August 23 talks began in Moscow between the Soviets and their captives, resulting in the reformers' safe return to Czechoslovakia four days later.

During the week following the invasion the people of Czechoslovakia were almost unanimous in their opposition to it. Initial reactions were confrontational, as youths pelted tanks with rocks and bottles, used buses to erect barricades, congregated in squares near historical monuments, and sometimes formed human chains. In several instances, invading military units panicked and opened fire, killing dozens of civilians (17 were killed in front of the main radio studio on the morning of August 21). As days passed and little news trickled out of the negotiations in Moscow, there were hints of public readiness to move to methods reminiscent of partisan warfare against German occupation during World War II if the Czechoslovak delegation did not return soon (or at all). Bolder members of the party's municipal committee for Prague wanted to push for an indefinite general strike and perhaps an armed rising at a clandestine meeting of delegates to the KSC congress on August 22. Recent historical scholarship demonstrates several instances of army units caching weapons before they could be confiscated by the Soviets, and that an embryonic partisan command post was set up at the military academy in Brno, the third largest city. There were also many civilians with access to weapons not under the control of the neutralized army: the party's paramilitary wing, the People's Militia, had 78,283 members, based in more than 2,000 workplaces, and the civil-defense and hunters' societies had thousands of recreational shooters.

Cooler heads prevailed and the country engaged instead in what became a textbook example of non-violent civil resistance. Outrage was channeled into graffiti, placards, petitions, jokes, songs, and poems, the composition of which was often coordinated at local "slogan centers" staffed by students, educators, artists, and actors. Journalists and their editors, displaced from their primary workplaces on August 21, quickly regrouped in auxiliary outposts or apartments, from which they printed and circulated newspapers, and managed to resume radio broadcasts after only two hours of dead air. By August 24, to allow exhausted radio staff time to rest, a relay system had been set up, coordinated from the western Czech city of Plzeň, whereby regional studios took turns managing the broadcasts. Army units put mobile transmitters at their disposal, while sympathizers in the interior ministry thwarted Soviet efforts to jam the frequencies. The widespread presence of loudspeakers in factories, originally installed for indoctrination, also came in handy, since workers could stay on the job (working extra "Dubček shifts" on Sunday, August 25, to offset some of the economic damage caused by the invasion) but still hear underground broadcasts. State television was likewise kept on the air by staff hiding in 72 secondary workplaces in Prague alone, but with fewer reserve transmitters at its disposal, it was more prone than radio to localized interruptions.

Much of the content of these broadcasts comprised the reading of resolutions adopted by countless chapters and branches of every legal organization, declaring their refusal to recognize a KSC or government led by anyone other than the reformers whom the Soviets had abducted. The media also guided citizens on how to interact with the invading forces. In the first 48 hours after the invasion began, citizens had spontaneously fraternized with the soldiers to undermine their belief that a counterrevolution was taking place, and to reduce their willingness to fire on civilians. In subsequent days the media advised the public simply to ignore the soldiers and go about daily life as normally as possible; when the invading armies' supply lines broke down, Czechs and Slovaks withheld food and water. As rumors spread of foreign intelligence officers arriving to arrest prominent reformers still at large, radio directed residents to take down street signs, house numbers, and any plaques that could identify a government building. Finally, the media helped bring the country to a standstill during brief general strikes (for two minutes on August 21, for one hour on August 22, and again for one hour on August 23).

When the country's leaders returned from Moscow on August 27, with Dubček still at the helm of the party, the people felt that they had won. Most were therefore devastated by what followed. While in captivity some leaders put their names to a secret protocol supporting rollbacks Dubček had privately promised before the invasion, such as restoration of censorship, banning of new organizations, and removal of prominent radicals from high office. In October the Czechoslovak government signed a treaty consenting to the stationing of 60,000 Soviet soldiers in the country "temporarily" (they remained until 1991). Bewildered by the elite's refusal to capitalize on the authority vested in them by the civil resistance, the great majority of citizens retreated into the subdued, dutiful compliance that Dubček and his colleagues were tirelessly requesting; a small minority, however, pushed back.

The resistance to what was known euphemistically as "normalization" moved in three phases, each with a defining method. The first was street protests, for which the major autumnal anniversaries – Independence Day on October 28, the Bolshevik Revolution on November 7 – provided ample opportunity. Crowds in Prague and other cities swelled to several thousand on these occasions, and were dispersed violently by the police with help from the Czechoslovak army and the party's militia; hundreds of students and young workers were arrested, and one died of his injuries. To avoid further casualties the second phase moved the protests indoors, as university students launched a nationwide sit-in strike around International Students' Day (November 17) to demand resumption of the reforms and respect for civil and political rights.

The third phase, starting at the end of 1968, united the students and trade unions. The latter had been quietly establishing their independence, in that KSC cells within the unions were defunct by the autumn and unable to influence the enormous turnover taking place in the unions' personnel. Almost 900 local union committees signaled their sympathy for the students and their demands in November by organizing 15-minute strikes in workplaces. The highpoint of worker-student solidarity came in December, when rumors spread that Josef Smrkovský, the popular (and populist) chairman of the national legislature, was to be unseated as part of the impending reorganization of the unicameral assembly into two chambers to reflect the federalization of the state. The students' national union sealed a pact with the metalworkers' union (KOVO) to call a general strike should Smrkovský fall. The Soviets had told Dubček that Smrkovský had to go, but rather than confront the matter head-on, Dubček characteristically let the situation deteriorate to the point where Smrkovský offered to settle for a deputy speaker's post in order to prevent a social explosion.

Smrkovský's self-relegation allowed the metalworkers to stand down without seeming to have reneged on a commitment. Doing so bought the embattled and internally divided KSC leadership only a few days of peace, as it was quickly followed on January 16, 1969 by the self-immolation of a student, Jan Palach, on a busy square in central Prague. Palach subjected himself to the agony of a slow death from severe burns in a bid to jolt the country back into the forms of resistance practiced in August. His deed, however, inspired horror and veneration, not action; fellow students organized a well-attended commemoration and funeral procession, and a few individuals emulated Palach's method of suicide in the coming weeks. The grand outcome, however, was the intensification of conflict inside the party elite. A faction that had originally opposed the Soviet-led invasion, or at least had not been involved in the conspiracy to take power during it, now emerged as a "realist" alternative to the ill, irresolute Dubček. This faction's intrigues, which included consultation with Soviet leaders, resulted in the replacement of Dubček by fellow Slovak and arch-realist Gustáv Husák in April 1969.

Soon thereafter the party targeted the students and the trade unions for reconquest. The unions had held a landmark congress in March 1969, only weeks before Dubček's downfall, at which a seemingly bold coordinating council was freely elected without party supervision. The congress conceded that the party exercised a "leading role" in society, but that it would be respected only if reforms continued. As a first test of the trade unions' resolve, the KSČ leadership under Husák decided in May 1969 to ban the university students' union and begin building up a new, complaisant one by recruiting cadets in military academies. The students got wind of this and tried to fight back by invoking their pact with the metalworkers' union, KOVO. On June 23 KOVO members at a vital engineering works in Prague agreed that they would call a general strike if they were not given a satisfactory reason for the abolition of the students' union. At this point the limits of the union leaders' radicalism were exposed; under relentless pressure from the party and Soviet counterparts, they were undergoing the same conversion to "realism" as had many reformers in the Dubček team. They found procedural excuses to avoid a general strike, and the wildcat stoppages that did occur lacked official blessing. A meeting of the KOVO central council on July 2 bitterly denounced the party's new policies and reiterated past demands for the withdrawal of Soviet troops and for guarantees of union independence, but again stopped short of coming to the rescue of the students. One week later, the revived party cell attached to the coordinating council of the trade unions held its first meeting, a sign that a significant number of leaders were willing to submit to the party's tutelage.

The last hurrah of the Prague Spring came on the first anniversary of the Soviet-led invasion, when millions of Czechs and Slovaks reenacted many of the forms of civil resistance of the year before. Thousands also assembled in the main towns and cities to protest the country's drift away from reform socialism, whereas in August 1968 the media had urged people to avoid large concentrations as they might invite violent dispersal by jittery foreign soldiers. In August 1969 Soviet units stayed in their new garrisons, while the tasks of crowd control and suppression were handled by Czechoslovak army and police forces. Thousands were arrested, dozens injured, and five killed in a security operation coordinated by the very prime minister, Oldřich Černík, who had stood by Dubček throughout 1968, had been abducted to Moscow a year before, and had since evolved from reformer into "realist."

The consequences of the defeat of the Prague Spring were enormous. First, it soured many Czechs and Slovaks (and socialists elsewhere) on the possible reclamation of the party and Marxism-Leninism, although most were not yet committed to the liberal capitalism that would be pursued after the end of communist rule in 1989. Second, it destroyed or eroded Slavophil sentiments long felt in Czech and Slovak society, and led to a steady reconstruction of national identity as firmly "Western" and "European." Third, it froze the country in Soviet-style federalism, the only significant formal change to come out of 1968, albeit much amended in 1970 to be very centralized in practice. Once the KSČ disappeared as its essential glue, the tangled skein of institutions and procedures proved unworkable in a multiparty democracy, and the country was dissolved at the end of 1992. A critical juncture that framed the union in terms that left Slovaks very dissatisfied, the Prague Spring was as much the beginning of the end of Czechoslovakia as it was of socialism.

The Prague Spring is one of the most extensively documented and analyzed moments in postwar European politics. As one of its first and finest observers, Vladimir Kusin (1999: 76) has noted that scholarship on the Prague Spring can be divided into three generations. The first, in which Czech and Slovak émigrés figured heavily, simply tried in the years immediately after 1968–9 to record as fully as possible what had happened. These accounts comprised straight political narratives and wider-ranging group analyses, detailing the changes and turmoil in Czechoslovakia's social strata and economic sectors. Golan's two volumes (1971, 1973) and Skilling's (1976) encyclopedic study made the most comprehensive use of the material available at the time, and remain invaluable. The second generation, from the late 1970s into the mid-1980s, tried to find new ways to interpret the material that the first generation had accumulated and to integrate the subject into mainstream political science. Explanation of Soviet decision-making in 1968 remained a high priority, especially in view of the invasion of Afghanistan in 1979 and reluctance to intervene in Poland during the Solidarity trade-union crisis of 1980–1. Dawisha (1984) produced the best possible reconstruction of the Soviet response to the Prague Spring, while Eidlin (1980) published a sophisticated analysis of the Czechoslovak response to the invasion.

The third generation of scholarship has benefited from the end of communist rule in 1989 and the resulting declassifying of documents. The Czechoslovak and Slovak governments quickly set up teams of historians to work through the domestic archives, negotiate the release of relevant files from Moscow and other East European capitals, and produce summaries of their findings. Drawing on the documents those teams obtained and on ones he uncovered himself, Mark Kramer published two pathmarking articles on the Soviet decision to invade in the Cold War International History Project Bulletin in 1992 and 1993, followed by monographs by Pauer (1995) and Williams (1997). Several surviving participants of the events, including Dubček, published their memoirs, while others could now be properly interviewed by journalists or questioned by prosecutors exploring treason charges for collaboration with the invasion. These new sources have steered recent research to political narrative, elite decision-making, and diplomacy, but also contain ample material on wider developments in Czechoslovak society as recorded by the party and the secret police.

SEE ALSO: Czechoslovakia, Resistance to Soviet Political and Economic Rule; Dubček, Alexander (1921–1992); Hável, Vaclav (b. 1936); Solidarność (Solidarity); Yugoslavia, Marxist Humanism, Praxis Group, and Korčula Summer School, 1964–1974

References and Suggested Readings

Dawisha, K. (1984) The Kremlin and the Prague Spring. Berkeley: University of California Press.

- Eidlin, F. (1980) The Logic of "Normalization": The Soviet Intervention in Czechoslovakia of 21 August 1968 and the Czechoslovak Response. Boulder, CO: East European Monographs.
- Golan, G. (1971) The Czechoslovak Reform Movement: Communism in Crisis, 1962–1968. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Golan, G. (1973). Reform Rule in Czechoslovakia: The Dubček Era, 1968–1969. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Kusin, V. V. (1971) The Intellectual Origins of the Prague Spring: The Development of Reformist Ideas in Czechoslovakia, 1956–1967. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Kusin, V. V. (1999) Review of the Prague Spring and its Aftermath. Slavonica 5, 1: 76–7.
- Pauer, J. (1995) Prag 1968. Der Einmarsch des Warschauer Paktes. Hintergründe, Planung, Durchführung (Prague 1968: The Warsaw Pact Invasion. Background, Planning, Execution). Bremen: Temmen.
- Remington, R. A. (Ed.) (1969) Winter in Prague: Documents on Czechoslovak Communism in Crisis. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press.
- Rubès, J. (1999) La Polysémie du Printemps de Prague. In F. Fejtö & J. Rupnik (Eds.), Le Printemps tchécoslovaque 1968. Brussels: Éditions Complexe.
- Shore, M. (1998) Engineering in the Age of Innocence: A Genealogy of Discourse Inside the Czechoslovak Writers' Union, 1949–1967. East European Societies and Politics 12, 3: 397–441.
- Skilling, H. G. (1976) Czechoslovakia's Interrupted Revolution. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Williams, K. (1997) The Prague Spring and Its Aftermath: Czechoslovak Politics 1968–1970. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Williams, K. (2006) The Prague Spring: From Elite Liberalization to Mass Movement. In K. McDermott & M. Stibbe (Eds.), Revolution and Resistance in Eastern Europe. Oxford: Berg.

Prasertkul, Seksan (b. 1949)

Pierre Rousset

Seksan Prasertkun (or Prasertkul) was among the most visible student leaders in the demonstrations of October 1973 that toppled the Thai military regime. He was also among the first groups who joined the fighters of the Communist Party of Thailand when it became clear that a new coup d'état was underway. He was one of the militants who actively opposed CPT leadership support for the People's Republic of China and the Khmer Rouge during the Sino Indochinese conflict of 1978–9. After losing this ideological campaign in the Thai communist movement, Seksan permanently returned to civilian life. Marcel Barang, who translated many of Seksan's writings, summarized his exceptional journey in one sentence: "Child of the poor, great student speaker, outcast underground fighter, highly quoted professor, renowned writer, witness and actor of his century." In this way he became an emblematic figure of the radical generation of the 1970s.

Seksan Prasertkun had a poor childhood. Son of a technician of small trawlers and a fruit and vegetable vendor, he became an excellent student in a monk school of his village of fishermen, at the mouth of Bang Pakong, on the Gulf of Thailand. In 1967, at the age of 18 years, Seksan had the fifteenth highest score at the national university entrance examination, opening the doors of the prestigious Thammasat University in Bangkok. Seksan received a scholarship to travel to the US to learn English in 1968 at the time when mobilizations against the war in Vietnam were at their height, and returned to Thailand politicized.

In the late 1960s the military regimes of Field Marshals Thanom and Praphas were highly unpopular and nationalist and democratic demands expanded dramatically. In 1972 the National Center for Student Action (NSCT) launched a campaign to boycott Japanese products. Seksan became known by his university and polemical writings. On October 6, 1973, when student "leaders" were arrested by the police, Seksan avoided arrest. A talented speaker with charisma, Seksan led mass demonstrations to demand the release of students and a national constitution. From October 13–14, Thai armed forces fired on demonstrators, killing more than 1,500 democracy protesters. The civilian demonstration and military crackdown forced King Bhumibol to order the dismissal of the field marshals.

Seksan founded the Federation of Independent Students of Thailand (FIST), one of the principal components of the radical wing of the movement. Faced with the deadly rise of violence of the extreme right, he decided, earlier than most others, to join the fighters of the Communist Party. He left the country in 1975 with three student activists for France, China, Vietnam, and Laos (where he obtained political and military training).

In October 1976, when the army seized power in a bloody coup, Seksan joined the People's Liberation Army of Thailand (PLAT) to fight in the Rongkla mountain range in Northern Thailand until the beginning of 1978. Seksan returned to Thai Communist Party outposts in Northern Laos at a time when the triangular conflict between communist China, Vietnam, and Khmer Rouge-led Cambodia worsened. The CPT leadership sided with the Chinese and the Khmer Rouge over Vietnam, a position Seksan vehemently opposed. In 1979 Seksan left for Laos to a base in the province of Phayao where his first son, Chang, was born in July.

Despite Seksan's criticism of the CPT position, the party refused his request to leave the movement, and he and his family were sent to the Burmese border, in the district of Umphang, where they were in political quarantine. But Seksan clashed with the provincial leadership of the party, in the framework of the preparation of the fourth congress of the CPT. He was opposed to the mode of authoritarian designation of delegates, declaring later in Bangkok: "We had to fight for democracy all over again in the jungle." Now in opposition to the CPT, many former students were demoralized and averse to pursue the internal battle under exceptionally difficult conditions. At the end of 1980 Seksan and other dissidents in the party were finally permitted to leave the jungle. In his writings he wrote about his difficult journey.

Like many students who "came back from the jungle" Seksan resumed his studies. He received a doctorate degree in political science from Cornell University in the US; his thesis was on the evolution of the state and Thai economy. He embarked on a new lifestyle as a professor, rising from 1993 to 1995 to dean of the political science faculty at Thammasat University. From 1984 to 1993 Seksan authored numerous articles highly critical of upper-class privilege and repressive Thai society, including an autobiographic screenplay for the film Moonhunter (2001).

Seksan Prasertkun is a generous man, whose self-assurance and frankness meant he always had his say in a culture where ignorance of societal inequality was a virtue. No less than that of the student generation, his own history reflects the radicalization of a university circle socially transformed by the arrival of a number of working-class students, shocked by the corruption of the regime and the Indochinese war, and in contact with campuses beyond the Pacific. Engaged fully in the struggle for a fair society, such students were profoundly disillusioned by the Thai Communist Party. The difficulty lay in pursuing this initial engagement after the end of the armed struggle in a country without a militant tradition or alternative to the CPT.

SEE ALSO: Thai Communist Party

References and Suggested Readings

- Prasertkul, S. (2001) 14 October, People's Fight. Screenplay for film Moonhunter.
- Zimmerman, R. F. (1974) Student "Revolution" in Thailand: The End of the Thai Bureaucratic Polity? Asian Survey, 14, 6: 509–29.

Prestes, Luís Carlos (1898–1990) and Prestes, Olga Benário (1908–1942)

Paula Rodrigues Pontes and Diogo L. Pinheiro

Luís Carlos Prestes was a Brazilian communist and leader in the movement for democratic reform. Born in Porto Alegre, Brazil on January 3, 1898, Prestes was a central figure in the Tenentismo (lieutenants' movement) demanding greater electoral democracy in Brazil during the first half of the twentieth century. He was married to Olga Benário Prestes, a German revolutionary born Olga Gutmann Benário in Munich on February 12, 1908.

Prestes came from a poor family. His father, Antônio Pereira Prestes, was an army captain, and his mother, Leocádia Felizardo Prestes, was a schoolteacher. In 1904, Prestes and his family moved to Rio due to his father's failing health. After his father's death in 1908, the family was driven into poverty. Prestes was home schooled until 1909, when he joined the military school and started his career in the armed forces. In 1920, he graduated from military school with a degree in engineering and the rank of second lieutenant.

Soon after graduating, Prestes was promoted to first lieutenant and started working in the Companhia Ferroviária (Railroad Company). It was during this period that he became acquainted with the Tenentista movement. Tenentismo did not follow any particular ideology, focusing instead on demanding the implementation of certain democratic measures, such as secret voting and educational reforms. In 1921, newspapers published letters by the then presidential candidate Arthur Bernardes that were offensive to the military. This led to the Revolt of the Copacabana Fort 18, the first revolt of that movement. Prestes did not participate in this revolt, as he was ill with typhus at the time, but because he was sympathetic to the movement he was transferred as a punishment to his home state of Rio Grande do Sul. Despite governmental repression, the Tenentista movement grew in strength, and in 1924 a series of revolts erupted around the country. While these revolts were initially successful, and the rebel troops were able to control some important cities and towns, troops loyal to the central government quickly suppressed them.

Prestes, then a captain, led a revolt in the small town of Santo Angêlo. He led rebel troops north from Rio Grande do Sul, meeting with other rebels in Foz do Iguaçu, Paraná, creating the Coluna Prestes (Prestes Column). The Prestes Column, comprising about 1,500 men, held together for two years and five months, marching throughout the Brazilian hinterlands. Because of his leadership role in this movement, Prestes gained an international reputation, and in Brazil he earned the nickname O Cavaleiro da Esperança (The Knight of Hope). By 1927, Prestes had lost about half of the men who had set out on the journey, most of them dying of cholera. Loyal troops, together with troops assembled by rich farmers, drove the surviving members of the column, including Prestes, into exile in Bolivia.

During his period in exile Prestes became acquainted with communism. In 1928 Prestes relocated to Buenos Aires. There he met with notable Argentinian communists such as Rodolfo Ghioldi and Abraham Guralski, members of the Comintern who had a significant impact on his thinking, and in 1930 he wrote his first manifesto in favor of communism.

In 1930 Prestes returned to Brazil. That same year, the more conservative element of the Tenentista movement decided to align itself with Getúlio Vargas's bid for power. Despite being invited to lead the military movement in favor of Vargas, Prestes and his group strongly opposed his dictatorship, and the Tenentista movement split. In 1931, Prestes was invited by the Soviet Union to move to Moscow, an offer he accepted. He remained there until 1934, working as an engineer. It was in Moscow that he met his wife, Olga Benário Prestes.

Olga Benário Prestes's father was a social democrat lawyer and her mother a member of the Bavarian elite. At age 15, she joined the Communist Youth International. Soon afterwards she moved to Berlin with her then boyfriend, Otto Braun. Active in the communist movement, both were arrested. After planning Braun's escape from prison, they moved to Moscow in 1928, where she attended the Lenin School of the Comintern and became an instructor for the Communist Youth International. Olga and Otto Braun parted ways in 1931.

In 1934, Prestes was elected member of the executive commission of the Comintern. Through Moscow's pressure, he was finally accepted by the Brazilian Communist Party. In Moscow, plans were drafted for a communist insurgency in Brazil, with Prestes as its leader. Olga was assigned to help him with this mission, and by the time they reached Brazil in 1935, they were already married. In Brazil, Prestes assumed a leadership position in the newly formed Aliança Nacional Libertadora, a left-wing popular front that opposed the Vargas government. It sought to promote democratic and national reforms, not to establish communism outright, as it believed that communism could only be achieved after a bourgeois revolution that would free the nation from imperialistic exploitation.

When the Prestes returned to Brazil, preparations for the insurgency intensified, and in November a military rebellion broke out. Various groups, led by non-commissioned officers, rebelled in Natal and Recife in the northeast, and in Rio de Janeiro. While the rebellion in Rio was crushed within a few hours, those in the northeast were more successful, managing to take over Natal and establish a temporary government. However, after a few days they too were put down, having failed to gain the support of the general population. These uprisings gave Vargas the opportunity to intensify his repression of communist organizations, and in 1936 the Prestes were arrested. Luís was stripped of his military rank and jailed for nine years. Olga, pregnant, was turned over to the Gestapo. She spent the next six years of her life in a number of different labor and concentration camps, before dying in a gas chamber in the Ravensbrück concentration camp in 1942. Their daughter, Anita, was handed over to his family after intense international pressure.

Prestes was released from jail in 1945, with the end of the Vargas dictatorship. He was elected senator that year, a position he held until 1948, when once again the Brazilian Communist Party was considered illegal. With the 1964 military coup, Prestes lived clandestinely in Brazil until 1971, when he once again returned to the Soviet Union. In 1979, he received amnesty from the military dictatorship and returned to Brazil. He was expelled from the Brazilian Communist Party in 1980, as the surviving members of the party considered his beliefs "archaic." He then joined the Partido Democrático Trabalhista and supported Leonel Brizola, a friend of Vargas, for president in 1989. Prestes died on March 7, 1990, in Rio de Janeiro.

SEE ALSO: Brazil, Guerilla Movements, 20th Century; Brazil, Rebellions from Independence to the Republic (1700s–1889); Leninist Philosophy; Marxism

References and Suggested Readings

- Löwy, M. (Ed.) (1992) Marxism in Latin America from 1909 to the Present. Atlantic Highlands, NJ: Humanities Press.
- Morais, F. (1990) Olga: Revolutionary and Martyr. New York: Grove.
- Prestes, L. C. (1992) Manifesto, May 1930. Reprinted in R. Levine (Ed.), The Brazil Reader: History, Culture, Politics. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.

Prima Linea

Emilio Quadrelli

Prima Linea was formed in autumn 1976 by former members of the extraparliamentary group Lotta Continua and by activists from the organization Workers' Power. In total, the Italian government convicted 923 people for active membership in Prima Linea. For more than a year, the organization used at least ten different names, the most common of which were: Armed Struggle for Communism, Fighting Workers' Squads, and Proletarian Armed Patrols. Prima Linea was a leading organization of the Italian revolutionary movement, and was dominant during 1977.

In its 1977 declaration of “total antagonism between the system of needs,” the organization presented the theoretical and organizational aspects of its program. Prima Linea’s major objective was to provide an organized answer to the call for power expressed by large parts of the metropolitan proletarian classes, a goal it attained with a great deal of success. Prima Linea had an unorthodox Leninist approach: that a hierarchical organization was necessary to unify the working class in preparation for an armed proletarian revolution.

The organization sought to gain acceptance of all segments of the metropolitan proletariat with special attention to factories. On July 29, 1979, Prima Linea guerillas assassinated Emilio Alessandrini, a public prosecutor who dedicated his legal career to cases of “terrorism,” ostensibly in retaliation for his prosecutorial role and for what they considered a betrayal of the causes of workers as a member of the institutional left. In the same year, responding to a debate arising from its “Alessandrini operation,” Prima Linea stated that it was “organizing in a revolutionary army the advanced workers’ sectors and the communist proletarians” and “building the party for a long-lasting civil war.”

Shortly thereafter, within little more than a year, language on arming workers for a long civil war disappeared from the organization’s documents, to be replaced by a theoretical-analytical apparatus apparently inspired by French philosopher Gilles Deleuze, or, to be more precise, by an unscrupulous use of his concepts. Prima Linea soon discovered that the transformations affecting society as a whole had not only shattered class and its dominant figure, but had also created a model of society in which the role of the revolutionary was no longer possible in view of the disparate identities beyond social class that included issues of race, gender, and beyond. A meticulous definition of the working class was therefore impossible.

Prima Linea ideologists thus adopted the theorization of the end of finalizations, a perspective that no final identification or condition exists among humans as the self is constantly fluctuating without a specific situational end or status. The idea itself of a minority that constantly aims to become the majority is dismissed by Prima Linea, in favor of “being lesser,” not aiming to become the state but continuously deconstructuralizing state territories or spheres. Hence, two typical concepts of Deleuze – nomadism and war machine – became part of Prima Linea’s discourse. In other words, guerilla struggle for Prima Linea became a sort of exercise in becoming, the place of the between, the line of flight, always able to produce a constant process of de- and reterritorialization, thus permanently destroying the assets of the state’s machine.

Not much later the war machines disappeared, postulating the continuation of the struggle on different grounds, from which the instrument of war was definitively banned. This shift was shared almost by the entire organization in its last declaration: “You must have a damned wall in your head,” written in the Turin prison of Le Vallette in 1983. After this statement Prima Linea decided to dissolve, focusing on the juridical fight for the passage of a law on “dissociation,” which was intended to reduce sentences for former combatants who gave up armed struggle without collaborating with police and courts.

SEE ALSO: Italy, from the Anti-Fascist Resistance to the New Left (1945–1960); Italy, from the New Left to the Great Repression (1962–1981); NAP (Nuclei Armati Proletari); Negri, Antonio (b. 1933); Red Brigades

References and Suggested Readings

- Boraso, G. (2006) The Wild Bunch: Rise, Apotheosis and Fall of the Organization Prima Linea. Rome: Castelvecchi.
- Segio, S. (2005) Short Fuse: A Story About Prima Linea. Rome: Derive Approdi.
- Segio, S. (2006) A Life Spent in Prima Linea. Milan: Rizzoli.
- Various Authors (1996) The Memory Project: Written Words. Rome: Sensibili alle foglie, pp. 263–81.

Primera, Ali (1942–1985)

T. M. Scruggs

Ali Rafael Primera Rosell was born October 31, 1942 in Coro, Falcón State, Venezuela, and died in Caracas, November 16, 1985. Despite his untimely demise at the age of 43, Ali Primera remains the foremost singer-songwriter of music with social comment in Venezuela in the last quarter of the twentieth century and one of the most prominent and influential in Latin America.

The broad appeal of his music and lyrics and his non-sectarian politics helped propel Primera as a symbol of uncompromising struggle that was embraced throughout the Venezuelan left and sympathetic social movements. His indefatigable energy and tremendous talent stimulated a politically oriented musical movement whose dependence on his leadership became clear when it essentially dissipated after his death. Ali Primera's music, however, has achieved a remarkable renaissance of interest and popularity in recent years due to the growth of popular movements linked to the election of Hugo Chávez Frías in 1998.

Primera's class and national consciousness grew early both from his family's humble economic condition and radical political orientation and the stark social inequities of his native impoverished Falcón peninsula. He abandoned his chemistry studies at the Central University of Venezuela in Caracas when his powerful, direct lyric message and the musical quality of his songs combined with a dynamic presentation on stage to vault him to the position as the primary singer at political events. His growing national reputation earned him the title El Cantor del Pueblo (The People's Singer). In 1969 he began a sojourn through both Western and Eastern Europe, returning to Venezuela permanently in 1973.

While the Nueva Canción or New Song movement of both Chile and Cuba clearly initially inspired much of his lyrical approach, even early in his career Primera never attempted to musically replicate or even substantially borrow stylistically from other socially committed musical movements. His musical aesthetic consistently fell between the general pan-Latin American ballad style so common even today to much of New Song, and the wealth of Venezuelan folk traditions. Venezuela's impressive diversity of folk and folk-rooted musical styles results from regional variants of European, African, and indigenous cultural resources and offered Primera and others a wide choice of stylistic directions. He gradually moved from guitar to the consistent accompaniment of himself with the Venezuelan cuatro, a small four-stringed guitar often hailed as the "national instrument," to create both an aural and visual marker of his dedication to a Venezuelan identity.

Primera's broad appeal, especially among the popular classes and university milieu, came despite extreme censorship during the "democratic" regimes of the 1970s and 1980s: he was totally banned from television and almost totally banned from radio. He cultivated personal relationships with some disc jockeys to achieve some sparse radio exposure, but he was forced to create his own label, Cigarrón (Big Cigar). Primera released 13 LPs on this label, together with a handful of titles by other musicians. Despite the growing popularity of the musical movement that Primera almost single-handedly created, dubbed El Canto Necesario (Necessary Song), the monopolized music industry denied Cigarrón significant distribution, a deficiency Primera tried to balance with near constant performance tours. Cassette duplication helped make his music well known in and outside Venezuela (for example, he was very popular among the Farabundo Martí National Liberation Front in El Salvador), and he performed to great acclaim at the New Song festivals throughout the 1980s. Several of his songs were popularized by the Caracas quartet Los Guaraguaos, and their version of "Los Techos (or Casas) de Cartón" (Roofs [or Houses] of Cardboard) became a major continental commercial hit in the mid-1970s, since covered by many other Latin American groups.

Primera's output can be divided into: songs written as homages to regions within Venezuela; odes to specific personages; international solidarity; his many denunciations of injustice and calls for action; and a remarkable and increasingly appreciated group of love songs and lyrics of personal attachment. His success can be measured by the several attempts on his and his family's life in the early 1980s by government operatives, and he perished in a possibly suspicious car accident.

The tremendous upsurge of the leftist popular movement in recent years has propelled Ali Primera's music to a possibly higher level of popularity than it ever enjoyed during his lifetime. Hugo Chávez aided this reemergence through his repeated references to Primera's legacy, often singing fragments of his songs in speeches and media broadcasts. Currently Ali Primera's repertoire is a major source of music for the over 300 new community radio stations founded since 2004, and his face has taken on an iconic power within Venezuela not dissimilar to that of Che Guevara.

SEE ALSO: Chávez, Hugo (b. 1954); Music and Protest, Latin America

References and Suggested Readings

- Martin, G. (1998) El Perfume de una Época (The Aura of an Epoch). Caracas: Alfadil Ediciones.
- Musku, Z. & Vásquez, J. (2004) Los Personajes en las Canciones de Ali Primera (The People in the Songs of Ali Primera). Varela: Fondo Editorial Arturo Cardozo.
- Primera, A. (1992) Que Mi Canto No Se Pierda (So That My Song Will Not Be Lost). Caracas: Euroamericana de Ediciones.

Prince Edward Island protests, 1830s

David L. Bent

In the 1830s the tiny British colony of Prince Edward Island (PEI) was racked by protest. This protest, known as the Escheat movement, was dedicated to overhauling the colony's system of land ownership in favor of Island residents. The threat of armed rebellion hovered over the movement, but it was primarily a political protest. While it enjoyed strong support at the ballot box, it failed to realize its goals, although it provided PEI with an enduring culture of popular protest.

Protest against PEI's landlord system began with British settlement. Britain gained sovereignty over the Island through the Treaty of Paris of 1763, and, not wishing to resettle it on the public purse, opted to privatize its settlement. Thus large tracts of land were awarded to worthy Britons on the condition that they encouraged settlement, provided for the settlers' needs in tools and implements, and paid the Crown annual rents. The settlers, for their part, were bound to clear and improve the land they settled upon and pay their landlords an annual rent. In this vein 1.4 million acres of the Island were divided into 67 lots of roughly 20,000 acres each, and given to around 100 landlords.

However, this system did not provide the desired results. By the 1790s only a handful of the landlords had made attempts to fulfill the conditions of their grants, and even these came up short. As a result, the landlords' claims came to have a questionable legal basis. The system also left the settlers it did provide deeply in debt. PEI gained a settler population despite this, as following the American Revolution thousands of United Empire Loyalists migrated to the Island. The Loyalists, coming from lands where freehold tenure was the norm in property laws, were reluctant to settle under the landlord scheme, but often they had little choice. Calls quickly emerged for the landlords' claims to be escheated, a process by which property awarded by the Crown reverted to public ownership due to its grantees' failure to live up to the conditions of their grant. Those calling for escheat hoped that the landlords' former property could be resold to permanent Island residents. Such arguments colored early Island politics. The Island's elected politicians largely favored escheat, but the appointed imperial officials and their local elite allies, grown hostile to calls for populist reforms in an age of revolutions, favored the status quo. Escheat had become moribund politically by the turn of the nineteenth century, but it persisted as an electoral issue, reappearing in nearly every election for the Island's House of Assembly in Charlottetown.

By the 1830s escheat had developed into a powerful, Island-wide rural protest movement. Apart from the persisting sentiments of injustice surrounding the land system, this can partially be attributed to a recent influx of Scottish and Irish immigrants (both being lands that had suffered under similar landowning systems), and the achievement of Catholic emancipation in 1829 which gave many of these newcomers the vote. The reform drive, now known as the Escheat movement, found a leader in William Cooper, an English immigrant whose time working as an agent for a PEI landlord made him appreciate the grievances of the Island's farmers. Like previous escheat advocates Cooper believed that those who worked the land had greater claim to its ownership than those who simply held its title. He argued that an escheat would end the system of rents and dues imposed on Islanders and thus encourage economic development in a depressed colony. Cooper's rhetoric was similar to that of other reformers in the Atlantic world of the 1830s pushing for reform against the entrenched interests they deemed repressive. These included the leaders of the rebellions in Upper and Lower Canada, and those of the Chartist movement in Great Britain.

Cooper published his positions in several Island newspapers, setting the stage for mass popular organization around the issue. The Island's burgeoning newspaper medium played a key role in the popular agitation of the 1830s as it allowed the arguments of Escheat leaders to reach a wider audience, and for greater discussion and organization around the issue than had previously been possible. The popularity of the Escheat Party was manifested in public meetings, speeches, pamphlets, squatting, and petition campaigns that centered on the issue. This trend culminated in a grand open-air meeting in November 1837 in eastern PEI that counted over 2,000 spectators, making it the Island's largest mass demonstration to that date. Several spectators at that meeting were also armed, reflecting another growing theme of the Escheat movement: the formation of community "agreements" to resist their rent payments, violently if necessary. Groups of farmers frequently used violence and intimidation to prevent law officials from collecting rents or seizing property in the 1830s, but despite extensive use of mild violence, no deaths were reported. But by 1837 rebellion was raging in Canada, and the authorities worried that similar action would take place on PEI. The Island government strongly considered using the militia to restore order to an increasingly unruly countryside. However, the Escheat leaders, fearing the consequences of armed insurrection, managed to contain the passions of their followers, and the government resisted the temptation to use force, knowing that PEI's lack of ice-free ports could leave them isolated from help for half a year.

Escheat's strength was revealed in the election 1838 when its party won a majority of seats in the House of Assembly. Cooper's government worked extensively for land reform, but its experience revealed the limitations of PEI's democracy. All real power lay with the imperial government, whose disdain for reform politics had only been strengthened by the Canadian revolt and the Chartist riots in Britain. Cooper traveled to London and appealed to the Colonial Office, but to no avail. By 1842 his movement had lost the House and its momentum, but the campaign for land reform continued. Despite its failure, the Escheat movement left a legacy, an ideological framework of grievance and protest that future reformers used in their struggles for land reform. The challenge to the legitimacy of the landlords' claims shaped how Islanders viewed their politics and their history. When the landlord system was finally abolished in 1875, it was largely due to the ideas of the Escheat movement.

SEE ALSO: Canada, Law and Public Protest: History; Canada, Rebellion of 1837–1838; Chartists

References and Suggested Readings

- Bittermann, R. (2006) Rural Protest on Prince Edward Island: From British Colonization to the Escheat Movement. Toronto: University of Toronto Press.
- Bumsted, J. M. (1987) Land, Settlement, and Politics on Eighteenth-Century Prince Edward Island. Montreal-Kingston: McGill-Queen's University Press.

Printing press and protest

Stacy Warner Maddern

Well into the mid-fifteenth century, books remained printed by hand, and were thus harder to obtain. Exposure to books was predominantly a privilege of the wealthy, that is until Johannes Gutenberg invented the printing press. Gutenberg was a German metalworker, who had begun the process in the 1440s of making movable type to replace handwritten letters. At the time, Europe began to enter a new age of exploration and scientific discovery in addition to political and religious changes. Gutenberg's invention would certainly revolutionize western culture in ways that would help shape the Renaissance, spread political and ideological change, and encourage revolution. A new and important epoch would be marked by the end of scribes and the dawn of mass printing.

Just by an increase in quantity, the average sixteenth-century reader would be able to consume at least three times that of his or her fourteenth-century counterpart. As the printing press impacted the culture of technology, so did it provide an indelible voice in the exchange and development of ideologies challenging the status quo. From this perspective the printing press can be viewed as an elemental tool that would change the course of protest and revolution.

Certainly, in Europe, the advent of movable type helped to insure that ideas, technologies, and beliefs could reach a wider audience. In addition, the limited educational centers and the restrictions of few libraries, universities, and monasteries hampered the spread of knowledge until the invention of the printing press. By the end of the eighteenth century, explosions in publishing throughout Europe would make impressions on all classes of people as the power of knowledge was no longer filtered through government agencies. Along these lines, the printing press not only recorded but also helped to shape revolutionary events as public opinion began to contribute to a new democratic political culture.

The print revolution coincided and possibly introduced the modern era of Europe as it made ancient and medieval texts available to a broader audience. This would impact the existing conditions of communication with vast qualitative improvements. Herein, the transition from oral tradition to the written word allowed for a phenomenon that has been growing ever since: the introduction of formal scholarly works. The enhanced form of scholarship was made possible exclusively by the printing press in that it opened up the availability of source material. Previously, in the scribal culture of the Middle Ages, dependence on a grueling and time-consuming process of copying manuscripts prevented any large-scale duplication and, considering the feudal social structure, made it impossible for those texts to be made available to mass culture.

The period from 1448 to around 1968 – what might be referred to as from the Gutenberg Revolution to just before the rise of television – is a period Régis Debray considers to be the “age of reason and of the book, of the newspaper and political party.” As such, writing is utilized as a collectivization of memory and reading as that which individualizes collective memory. This exchange allows individuals to claim their own understanding of history through interpretations, thought, and attitudes that they have gained from the present.

In considering the role of revolutionaries like Che Guevara, Thomas Paine, Malcolm X, and countless others, it is vital to mention that all were compulsive readers. Their devotion to books and printed materials was what eventually shaped their thought and consciousness. Their Hegelian approach is relative to a prescription of reading as it leads to critical detachment in order to understand the past by rehearsing the future. The creators of modern thought are only able to gain perspective by integrating an understanding of the past, thus recycling past events, lineage, and previous revolution. Christopher Columbus was able to discover America by studying arcane texts and geographic sketching. Thomas Paine was influenced by reading Voltaire and Rousseau, Che Guevara by Albert Camus, Franz Kafka, and Karl Marx.

The printing press is also the invention that allowed for the preservation of history through the simple measure of archives. Every revolutionary occurrence, whether it be communism, utopianism, war, or peace, has been the work of archivists. History is the record of archives that can only flourish because of our ability to store the written word. Only by such preservation can ideas, sometimes far ahead of their time, remain and exist for another period where they may serve their original intentions. There is no greater example of this than the Communist Manifesto. First published in German in 1848, its impact hardly elicited excitement. Later it would become a mild curiosity amongst certain scholarly circles in Europe. However, in 1872, some 24 years after its initial publication, it was translated into French by Marx’s daughter, Laura Lafargue, and by 1885 began to achieve historical success.

In the colonial period, before the establishment of the United States, Americans began to inform others about the notion of independence by going to the local printer and getting these ideas printed in pamphlets. Pamphlets were the easiest way to get one’s point across as they could be handed out, read aloud, or nailed to the town bulletin board. It was after independence and the creation of the United States Constitution that the first amendment was written specifically to protect the voice of the “pamphleteers.” Thomas Paine, the most well known of the American pamphlet writers, would bring his revolutionary prose back to Europe in order to spread the cause of revolution throughout France, where again the pamphlet communicated new ideas and a means of direct action.

Regarding formal means of protest, the printing press should be considered not only as an invention that enhanced the spread of ideas to a wider audience, but also as a technological advancement in the archiving of influence. Certainly, it gave new movements a means by which to get their arguments across. Without the printing press, ideological changes may have been restricted to geographic locales. With the advent of the Gutenberg Revolution, the impact of socialism, anarchism, utopianism, and countless other underground movements was communicated around the world.

SEE ALSO: Catholic Worker Movement; Communist Manifesto; Debord, Guy (1931–1994) and the Spectacle;

French Revolution, 1789–1794; Manifesto, II; Masses, The; Paine, Thomas (1737–1809); Pamphleteering and Political Protest, Dutch Republic, 1672

References and Suggested Readings

- Chappell, W. & Bringhurst, R. (2000) A Short History of the Printed Word. Vancouver: Hartley & Marks.
- Childress, D. (2007) Johannes Gutenberg and the Printing Press. Minneapolis: 21st Century Books.
- Debray, R. (2007) Socialism: A Life Cycle. New Left Review 46.
- Eisenstein, E. (1980) The Printing Press as an Agent of Change. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Eisenstein, E. (2005) The Printing Revolution in Early Modern Europe. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Proal, Herón (1881–?) and Red Revolutionary Tenants

Frank I. Müller

Herón Proal was a founder of the Veracruz Revolutionary Syndicate of Tenants. Born in Tulacingo, Hidalgo, on October 17, 1881, Proal joined the Mexican Communist Party and co-organized rent strikes during the early post-revolutionary period. His agitation fused the tenants' direct actions into a movement that demanded radical housing reform.

Proal's political career began when he was elected to the executive committee of the Preliminary Workers' Congress. In the Libertarian Torch (Antorcha Libertaria) reading club, Proal and other radicals discussed the libertarian and communist theories of thinkers such as Mikhail Bakunin, Pierre Joseph Proudhon, and Peter Kropotkin. The plight of tenants soon gained their attention.

At that time, those who could not afford homes rented single rooms that shared a common courtyard, a patio de vecindad. Between 1910 and 1922, the rent for a single room had risen from 10 to 35 pesos. Deteriorating conditions and abuse by landlords created a conflict situation in the major cities of the state of Veracruz. Inadequate water and electricity supplies in the city's poorest area, the port, contradicted the attempts at modernization made by planners in other parts of the city. Harassment of tenants who were unable or unwilling to pay became a common practice of rent collectors. In this atmosphere, tenants developed a set of demands that included the cleaning of patios by landlords, the substitution of individual contracts by agreements mediated by the union, and the limitation of rents to a maximum of 2 percent of the estate's cadastral value. Proal helped articulate these demands at a meeting on February 3, 1922. At the same meeting he declared the founding of the Veracruz Revolutionary Syndicate of Tenants. That spring, resistance spread throughout Mexico.

In Veracruz, the movement incited events such as sex workers' direct actions against landlords. After a speech Proal gave to a female audience on February 27, they attacked their most hated rent collector. A group of women around Maria Marín initiated a general alarm that would be sounded as soon as any tenant was attacked by a landlord. Organizing a blockade of the city's markets by female workers and inciting the burning of rented furniture in the streets of the port neighborhood on March 3, Marín mobilized a collective commitment to Proal's union. By the end of May, 40,000 tenants, or two-thirds of Veracruz's population, had stopped paying rent.

Within a month of a general strike initiated by outraged dock workers, federal security forces injured, killed, and arrested hundreds of tenant union members, including Marín and Proal. The two leaders were released from jail in May 1923, but the street fights continued and there were more arrests. When Proal refused to remove from his door the forbidden red banner that symbolized the syndicate's fight, he was expelled from the state on January 12, 1926.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism; Anarchism, Mexico; Bakunin, Mikhail Alexandrovich (1814–1876); Food Sovereignty and Protest; Kropotkin, Peter (1842–1921); Mexican Revolution of 1910–1921; Proudhon, Pierre Joseph (1809–1865)

References and Suggested Readings

- Mora, R. de la (2002) Sociedad en crisis: Veracruz 1922. Xalapa: Universidad Veracruzana.
- Mundo, O. G. (1976) El movimiento inquilinario de Veracruz, 1922. Mexico City: Sepsetentas.
- Trejo, A. B. (1959) La rebelión de mujeres: Versión histórica de la revolución inquilinaria de Veracruz. Veracruz: Editorial "Kada."
- Wood, A. G. (2001) Revolution in the Street: Women, Workers, and Urban Protest in Veracruz. Wilmington: Scholarly Resources.

Protest and revolution, stages in

Paul Rubinson

Amid the passionate throes of a revolution, it may not appear to a revolutionary that he or she passed through a distinct set of stages in order to arrive at this moment. Indeed, a systematic analysis of stages and struggles leading to protest and revolution threatens to rob the events of their romantic appeal. Thus only relatively recently – as compared to the long history of protest and revolution – have scholars attempted to outline a coherent process that protests and revolutions go through. The first scholars to investigate collective action theorized that a mere accumulation of sufficient grievances would spur protest, thus oversimplifying the arduous process of collective action. Those closer to the ground, on the other hand, have long recognized that – even for the most moderate change – letting grievances naturally take their course rarely, if ever, works.

In the late twentieth century, scholars began to treat protest and revolutions as more sophisticated events. Many scholars (most notably Piven & Cloward 1979) have recognized that disruptive protest is frequently a last resort at creating social change, while revolution is an even rarer and exceedingly difficult method of collective action. Still, protests and revolutions succeed just often enough to prove their feasibility. Since revolutions are difficult to achieve, it stands to reason that their success depends upon several factors. And since modern revolutions generally seek the same end (a change in leadership), it also stands to reason that there can be numerous stages and struggles that generally apply in each case.

There exists, however, no definitive list of stages or struggles that inevitably lead to protest in the sense of providing a blueprint that builds – or treasure map that leads to – a successful revolution. At any time, a disruptive protest movement can seem poised for dramatic social change, and then suddenly dissipate into the void. At best, scholars have identified a number of factors that in combination can lead to revolution.

The main achievement of scholars has been the descriptions of various stages and struggles of protest and revolutions. The identified stages are indicators that conditions for action are favorable, and not instructions for success. For example, one of the more crucial stages involves opportunity, which is often a mistake by the state, rather than one created by a movement. The stages described are not goals in themselves, but states the movements attain in their evolutionary progression. Scholars' ability to identify stages and struggles common to most protest movements and revolutions indicates that although movements differ, their interaction with society and politics often repeats itself.

Stages and Struggles of Protest Movements

In some sense, revolutions are simply large-scale protest movements, or protest movements that culminate in the ultimate ending. Though they do have a lot in common with protest movements, this essay covers them separately. The following section roughly outlines the various stages and transitions that present movements with crucial choices that shape their trajectory.

Opportunity

Most scholars agree that grievances such as deprivation are always high, but protest occurs only rarely. This indicates that a movement needs an opportunity before it can act on the deprivation. Opportunities can be thought of broadly as changes in political factors that create incentives to collective action by increasing activists' expectations of success. Although out of activists' control, opportunity serves as the first stage of a movement.

Tarrow (1998) identifies five different ways in which opportunities can arise. First, protest is more likely when access to political institutions increases, especially when access is already low. The entrance of new actors into the political arena often forces political elites to respond, consequently creating further opportunities. Second, electoral instability can result in shifting political alignments. Piven and Cloward (1979) point to the Great Depression as an example. The economic turmoil of the crash reshuffled political loyalties, meaning that the entire electorate was essentially up for grabs. During his campaign, Franklin D. Roosevelt made "promises to everyone who would listen," and his victory marked the establishment of the New Deal coalition of workers, African Americans, farmers, intellectuals, and liberals who held power until the 1970s. The eruption of political protest during the Great Depression, combined with electoral and economic instability, dissolved traditional party loyalties. Political uncertainty creates opportunity by encouraging challengers, forcing political elites to appeal to previously untapped groups to gain or maintain power, and alerting other protesters to the new opportunity.

Third, Tarrow writes that the division of elites encourages normally oppressed or quiescent groups to begin collective action. In this instance, elites seeking to gain or maintain power often take up the people's cause, again in the hopes of tapping a new source of electoral power. Fourth, allies can create opportunity. Allies among the elite classes can side with challengers, lowering the cost of collective action. At the same time, allies among other movements can offer aid and encouragement. Finally, the state (as long as it holds power) can decide at any time to repress dissent or facilitate a movement. Repression raises the costs of collective action, while a refusal to repress creates a huge opportunity. Tarrow points to Mikhail Gorbachev's announcement that the Soviet Union would not use military force to suppress dissent in the eastern bloc. Some theorists argue that severe repression also encourages radical dissent and activism, though recent years have shown scant evidence of this. The common factor in all opportunities is, far from a buildup of grievances, a change in the state's social, economic, and political well-being.

Opportunities do not necessarily create change, according to Tarrow. Instead, they provide movements with information about the odds of success of collective action. The above factors indicate that collective action would have a better chance of succeeding. At the same time, a raise in the costs of inaction can spur protest as well. Charles Tilly (1978) has argued that threats can serve as stimuli to collective action, as both elites and subalterns mobilize in defense of their interests when threatened.

Because opportunities do not last long, protest movements need to seize them quickly. Of course, opportunities can go unexploited, but protesters and would-be rebels who take advantage of opportunities, Tarrow argues, can be catalysts for larger movements (and sometimes revolutions). Opportunities explain how the potential for mobilization transforms into action. Again, Tarrow points to the USSR in the late 1980s, when the government began to implement reform. When the USSR stopped repressing dissent, people seized the opportunity to organize. Collective action by some groups spurred further protest by other groups, and collective action served as a model for other groups and the Soviet regime soon crumbled. At the same time, collective action can create opportunities for opponents and countermovements.

Development of Tactics

As a movement seizes an opportunity, it must decide which tactics to adopt. Tarrow identifies three types of tactics that protest movements use: violent, disruptive, and conventional. The easiest method is violence, which can be conducted by small groups with a minimum of organization and resources. Violence makes for an ineffective tactic, however, as it frightens away would-be allies and practically begs for repression from the state. The growing acceptance of non-violence, as practiced by most movements in democratic nations, has largely phased out the use of violence. Less extreme than violence is the simple threat of violence or instability embodied by disruption. Disruption, including non-violent resistance such as marches and sit-ins, allows protesters to demonstrate solidarity and righteousness, invites allies, and often forces a confrontation with authority. Disruption has often proved powerful but unstable and hard to sustain, as authorities learn to adapt to and neutralize such tactics. Finally, protesters often choose conventional actions, such as strikes and petitions.

These stages of tactical development need not occur sequentially, but some movements pass through each type. The new left of the 1960s evolved from teach-ins to building occupation to bombings favored by the Weathermen. Some movements use all three at once, as when the US civil rights revolution encompassed lawsuits, marches, sit-ins, boycotts, urban riots, black nationalism, and the armed resistance of the Black Panthers. On the other hand, as Piven and Cloward point out, many groups have little or no choice what tactics they use. They explain the prevalence of black urban riots in the 1960s as the only way poor African Americans had to create disruption in the oppressive ghetto environment. Piven and Cloward see disruption as the most effective tactic, as it interrupts the functioning of the economy or politics, thus drawing the attention of elites. But poor African Americans, unemployed and stuck in ghettos, could not strike or boycott (for example), meaning the normal disruptive and conventional tactics could not be applied. Thus violent disruption was their only option.

Tarrow also identifies a process where movements alter their repertory. Movements find the disruptive phase of a movement hard to sustain because police learn to control it. The costs of trying to sustain disruption eventually split a movement, usually into a minority faction that prefers violence, and a majority that prefers conventional tactics. The conventional faction often turns to negotiation and compromise and settles for conventional change, perhaps becoming a political party or interest group. According to Tarrow, only the discovery of new forms of protest spurs a new round of contention.

The Process of Mobilization

Opportunities and tactics explain when and how protest occurs. The process of mobilization entails its own stages and struggles. Different scholars explain mobilization in different ways, emphasizing different factors and models. The continual evolution of the study of individual mobilization reflects its complex nature.

The Free-Rider Problem

First elaborated upon by Mancur Olson in 1965, the free-rider problem is perhaps the biggest struggle that movements face. The free-rider problem arises when a movement pursues a public good that, if achieved, would be shared by everyone regardless of whether they participated in the movement. A clean air campaign serves as the most common example: since everyone breathes, there would be no way to limit the clean air only to movement participants. Free riders, then, enjoy a benefit without contributing any costs. Almost paradoxically, however, theorists have struggled to explain how movements occur – as they indisputably do – despite the free-rider problem. McCarthy argues that “conscience constituents” feel compelled to donate to movements, even though they do not stand to directly benefit, while McAdam observes that movements provide members with selective incentives to overcome the free-rider problem.

Micromobilization

Other theorists have examined “micromobilization” to explain how movements overcome the free-rider problem. The examination of micromobilization processes shows how people devote themselves to a cause by illuminating the way movements mobilize people on an individual level. Frame alignment theory, as propounded by Snow et al. (1986), explains how movements overcome the free-rider problem by making people want to participate. The theory builds on Erving Goffman’s concept of frames as interpretive devices through which people see the world. The alignment of frames simplifies the “outside world” by emphasizing certain factors and excluding others. For example, successful frame alignment can redefine a previously tolerable situation as immoral or unjust. With frame alignment, movements harmonize individual interests, values, and beliefs with the movement’s activities, goals, and ideologies.

Snow et al. identify four types of alignment processes. The first, frame bridging, links two or more unconnected frames to a specific issue or problem. Frame bridging draws a connection between two unrelated but complementary issues, for example when a peace group solicits members from a liberal magazine subscription list. Second is frame amplification, the clarification or invigoration of a frame relating to a specific problem or issue. Amplification can relate to a value frame (by appealing to a specific value, such as justice or equality) or a belief frame (connecting two things, such as policy A is to blame for group B’s oppression). This step helps overcome apathy and makes change seem possible. The third process is frame extension, where a movement extends its boundaries to include new points of view in order to appeal to new potential adherents. This explains the adoption of seemingly tangential issues, such as when anti-nuclear groups mobilized against the Vietnam War. The final type is frame transformation, where new values replace old ones and an individual’s point of view is reframed and experienced in a new way. Often, a previously tolerable situation now becomes intolerable. Through the shared process of struggle, frame alignment helps movement participants learn shared values, and obscures their differences.

Political Process

In his political process model, McAdam describes a slightly different model. McAdam sees a social movement as a fluid process from generation to decline, rather than a linear journey through discrete stages. Nevertheless, the ways in which individuals become adherents of a movement involve specific changes. Participants, according to McAdam, undergo a “subjective transformation of consciousness.” As with Tarrow, this process begins with opportunity. Activists and insurgents act upon an opportunity, some sort of change in the political system, to reduce the power discrepancy between them and their opponents. Once the insurgents have more power, the costs of repression are raised for the state. Next, organizations have “indigenous” strength – that is, four resources that aid their efforts: members, incentives (that help overcome the free-rider problem), a communication network, and leaders. Finally, adherents experience “cognitive liberation,” when people realize that they can take action. Thus consciousness is transformed.

Organizations

All movements have at least some semblance of organization. Organization marks one of the earliest stages of movement evolution. But debate exists over the merit of organization, especially formal organization of a bureaucratic type. Marx believed that the revolutionary power of the proletariat lay in the way capitalism had organized society into distinct classes. The formation of working-class political parties, in his view, was an essential step in the empowerment of the proletariat. Many Marxists believe that without organizations, protest movements remain primitive. Accordingly, many scholars of various theoretical schools argue that organizations are essential to movements. McCarthy and Zald’s (1977) resource mobilization theory, for example, placed organizations at the center of social movement research. On the other hand, Piven and Cloward argue that organizations stifle movements. In their view, movements are most powerful as spontaneous and disruptive forces. Formal organizations, on the other hand, are more concerned with perpetuating the organization rather than furthering the movement. The organization stage, they argue, is to be looked upon ruefully. Tarrow bridges the gap by arguing that the most effective type of organization is autonomous local units connected to and coordinated by formal organizations. He points to the US abolition, temperance, suffrage, and populist movements as examples of umbrella organizations coordinating, but not internalizing, grassroots constituents.

Cycles of Protest

Tarrow’s model of movement cycles comes closest to detailing the lifespan of a movement.

To succeed, Tarrow argues, contention must broaden into a cycle. Widespread challenge forces the state to respond, and produces change. The cycle, as Tarrow envisions it, begins with the mobilization phase, when “early risers” take advantage of opportunities. If these claims resonate with others and coalitions are formed, the challenge can create instability among elites. If the state rejects the claim, as usually happens, the claims can spread to others. Such claim making demonstrates that the time is right for a challenge, awakens other contenders, and provides master frames for other challengers to use. The second phase of the cycle consists of the diffusion of collective action into less mobilized areas, leading to an increase of conflict, as contention spreads into new areas of demographics. The third phase sees the transformation of repertoires and frames, as activists create new tactics and form new frames for collective action. The fourth stage consists of the growth of new organizations and the adaptation of old ones. Finally, the cycle creates increased information and interaction between challengers and authorities. In this phase, new alliances can form, strengthening the challengers.

The cycle inevitably culminates in movement decline – the demobilization phase, in Tarrow’s words. A cycle’s decline begins as the costs of activism catch up with the challengers, often resulting in exhaustion. A split between moderate and radical movement factions can polarize the movement, hastening its decline. Movements that split, Tarrow argues, often divide over tactics, especially the use of violent as opposed to conventional means. A disruptive movement is hard to sustain, often causing its followers to split into a minority that favors violence, and a majority that chooses conventional tactics. The civil rights movement underwent such a split in the late 1960s. As young activists became increasingly disaffected with non-violent resistance, they adopted the combative rhetoric of “Black Power” and embraced the militant self-defense tactics of Malcolm X and the Black Panthers. Finally, the state’s response also determines a movement’s lifespan, through either the granting of claims or the repression of challengers.

Stages and Struggles of Revolutions

A revolutionary struggle can be long and brutal, such as the decades-long Chinese Revolution, or fairly swift, as with Fidel Castro's Cuban Revolution. Despite the vast differences in the shape of revolutions, scholars have identified similarities in the revolutionary process. Like protest movements in general, revolutionary movements do not erupt spontaneously or naturally. Instead, they progress through various stages and endure numerous struggles. As scholars have studied revolutions, they have found that the stages of a revolution depend as much on the political context of the revolution itself as on the efforts of revolutionaries. This section summarizes significant theories and syntheses that explain the relationship between the development of revolutions and political, social, and economic structures.

Marx

Karl Marx, convinced of the inevitability of revolution, provided one of the first modern outlines of the revolutionary process. Indeed, his Communist Manifesto (written with Friedrich Engels) was an exhortation of the highest quality, written to inspire revolution across Europe. The idea that revolutions need encouragement indicates (somewhat contradictorily) that revolutions are far from inevitable, however.

Indeed Marx himself points out that revolutions are the result of constant class struggle. The proletariat, from the moment of its creation at the dawn of industrialization, struggles incessantly with the bourgeoisie. The Manifesto predicts that the struggle begins on an individual level, spreading in turn to workers at an individual factory, in one specific trade, and in one specific geographic area. The struggle Marx and Engels describe is a literal one – workers begin by destroying the very machines of production that robbed them of their labor. At this stage, Marx and Engels write, the working class resembles an “incoherent mass.”

The Manifesto continues to outline the growing struggle of the proletariat. Industrial capitalism reduces all workers to doing similar work for similar wages. Facing obsolescence because of machines, workers form trade unions and workers' associations, who take part in political organization as well as the occasional riot. Soon after unionization occurs, workers become a class and a political party with political influence. Through their struggle, the proletariat achieve the stage of class consciousness, as they recognize themselves as a distinct class with common interests.

The triumph of the proletariat, Marx and Engels write, is inevitable in part because of the workers' ability to overcome internal divisions. “This organization of the proletarians into a class, and consequently into a political party,” they write, “is continually being upset again by the competition of the workers themselves. But it ever rises up again, stronger, firmer, mightier.”

The organization of the working class by its very nature threatens the ruling power of the bourgeoisie, since the bourgeoisie weaken themselves through internal struggle as well as against foreign bourgeoisie. Consequently, when faced with the proletariat's power, the bourgeoisie divide. Inevitably, part of the bourgeois allies with the proletariat against the ruling classes, and revolution sweeps the country – a model derived from Marx's study of the French Revolution. Although revolution often threatened the ruling order of Europe, especially in 1848, the Manifesto's prediction of working-class rule did not come to pass. Such a failure did not wholly discredit Marx's theories, but rather led scholars of later years to revise the study of revolutions.

Revolutionary Situations and Revolutionary Outcomes

From an analytical viewpoint, near-revolutions, such as the eruptions of 1848, bear a great resemblance to true revolutions, such as Russia in 1917, in most ways but the eventual outcome. Since both successful and unsuccessful revolutions share similar processes, scholars now make a distinction between revolutionary situations and revolutionary outcomes. Tilly's model and Tarrow's synthesis of the late twentieth century offered a new way to understand the development of revolutions.

Tarrow defines a revolutionary situation as a fragmentation in state power – essentially a serious challenge to the ruling power. A revolutionary outcome, on the other hand, is the transfer of state power to new actors. A “revolution” occurs when a revolutionary outcome consolidates the upheaval created by the revolutionary situation. If multiple groups vie for power, a revolution then takes place in sequence: a situation followed by an outcome, a new situation followed by a new outcome, and so on, until one challenger fends off other challengers to maintain power.

Like protest movements, Tarrow argues, a revolutionary movement begins with opportunity. In this case, the state loses its ability to maintain essential functions, and at least two contenders struggle for control – Tarrow offers Russia in 1917 as an example. A revolutionary challenge follows essentially the same path as a protest cycle, though with a goal of regime change rather than reform. An initial challenge advertises to others that the state is vulnerable, provides a model for others to follow, identifies allies, changes power relations in society, and mobilizes other challengers.

In a revolutionary situation, the state's refusal to offer concessions and willingness to use harsh repression encourages the solidarity and halts the polarization of the challengers. Repression often convinces challenging movements to embrace radical views and tactics, and weakens conciliatory movement factions. Furthermore, any defection of elites to the movement exacerbates a revolutionary situation. A revolutionary situation becomes a revolutionary outcome simply if the challengers gain power and hold off new challengers.

Tilly offers a slightly different model of revolutions. According to Tilly, revolutionary situations might be thought of as rebellions, only elevated to the status of revolutions once they succeed. Tilly builds upon Leon Trotsky's idea that revolutionary potential begins with divided sovereignty – that is, when two blocs exercise control over a part of the state. Instead of just two blocs, however, Tilly argues that a revolutionary situation begins with multiple sovereignty, when any number of blocs, or polities, struggle for power.

Tilly explains that multiple sovereignty can occur in four ways. One polity might try to subdue a weaker polity, or a subordinate polity might attempt to assert greater sovereignty. Outsiders might win control over a portion of government, or the ruling polity might fragment into different power segments. Regardless of how multiple sovereignty begins, it takes place in three stages. First, challengers offer alternatives to the existing polity. These alternatives become revolutionary either by being inherently revolutionary (as radicals, reactionaries, and anarchists are), or by turning contenders to new, revolutionary objectives – for example, Marx's idea that class consciousness would encourage workers to overthrow capitalist oppression. This change draws new challengers and refocuses old ones. Second, more groups begin to accept the challengers' claims. This process takes place as existing challengers are further mobilized or as other groups accept the alternative claims. This second method most often occurs when the state fails to meet its obligations to the people, failing to provide welfare, jobs, and justice, or making unexpected demands for the people's resources, such as a tax increase. At these times people are most likely to listen to alternatives to the ruling polity. Finally, the state's inability or reluctance to silence challengers can bring on multiple sovereignty.

The revolutionary situation which begins with multiple sovereignty can only end with single sovereignty, or in Tilly's words, "the displacement of one set of power holders by another." Either the revolution fails and is aborted (becoming a mere rebellion in the nation's memory), or successfully creates a revolutionary outcome. Tilly identifies three causes of revolutionary outcomes. First, a high degree of severity in the revolutionary situation increases the likelihood of a revolutionary outcome. Second, coalitions between challengers and members of the ruling polity influence the chances of success. Any penetration of, or alliance with, a member of the ruling polity can achieve this coalition. A coalition can then give the challengers power and influence. If the coalition is too heavily tied to the ruling polity, however, the new alignment will basically replicate the status quo. Finally, the control of violence often determines the winner in a revolutionary situation. If the state retains control of the military, a revolution cannot win.

Tilly offers a revolutionary sequence that outlines the steps of a revolution. Revolutionary mobilization starts with contenders making claims unacceptable to the state. Momentum builds as the numbers of people accepting the contenders' claims increase. The state then fails to repress alternate claims and coalitions of challengers. Then, Tilly writes, "the revolutionary moment arrives when previously acquiescent members of that population find themselves confronted with strictly incompatible demands from the government, and form an alternative body claiming control over the government, or claiming to be the government . . . and those previously acquiescent people obey the alternative body." In the fourth stage, an alternative coalition gets control over a portion of government, and struggles to maintain control of the government. Next, a single polity is constructed. This could be the victory or defeat of rebels, a truce between revolutionaries and reactionaries, or the breakup of the revolutionary coalition. Finally, governmental control is established, by either a new or old regime.

Goldstone and the Confluence of Events

Building off of his study of revolutions in the pre-modern era, political scientist Jack Goldstone (1991) argues that the confluence of three events creates a revolution. Like many scholars of revolution, Goldstone focuses on the ruling elites rather than the challengers themselves. The first event that signals the beginning of state breakdown is a decline of state resources. Most often, an economic crisis forces the state to find new areas of funding. If the state's commitments to its citizens are not met, elite classes could abandon the state. The second event occurs when the elites divide over various interests. Elite paralysis over the direction of the state can encourage a revolutionary situation. The final factor is the eruption of mass mobilization. Challengers need to overcome rivals in the state and military by mobilizing allies in different classes and geographic areas. Although each of these events can occur on its own, Goldstone argues that only the simultaneous occurrence of these three combines to create a revolution.

Conclusion

No movement, reform-oriented or revolutionary, can take hold without an opportunity. Since the state by definition dominates power relations through its control of the means of violence, only the state directly or the socioeconomic system indirectly can create an opportunity. The opportunity stage, then, is the primary and most crucial stage – without which protest and revolution will never occur. Because the state creates – or fails to prevent – opportunity, no study of protest and revolution can ignore the state. Movements also undergo an organization stage. The choices made at this stage often determine its trajectory. Will the organization be formal or unstructured? Will its ideology be radical or conciliatory? Will it attract allies or alienate adherents? After organizing, a movement shifts into the tactical phase, where it determines what sort of methods it will use. Disruptive tactics are effective but difficult to sustain, while conventional tactics have broad appeal but create little change. Of course, if a movement seeks revolution, violence is all but inevitable. The stages of protest and revolution do not lead inevitably to change, but rather lead a movement to a crossroads, where the choices made can mean successful social change.

Scholars have shown that social movements and revolutions are products of the political and economic environment in which they erupt. Yet social movements have a special tie to democracies, creating something of a ubiquitous presence in democratic societies. Ideas such as the consent of the governed and ideals of freedom and equality encourage a particular type of reform movement in democracies; today many western movements model themselves on the non-violent American civil rights movement. The adoption of marches, rallies, petitions, and other non-violent methods has spread across all old and nascent democracies, and these movements face similar stages, struggles, and lifespans.

Revolutions, on the other hand, are an idea as old as the stratification of people into rulers and ruled. Yet they too are dependent on and products of the socioeconomic system in which they take place. Industrialization, capitalism, fascism, socialism, communism, and monarchy – each system creates a different situation for rebels. For example, Castro's method of launching sporadic guerilla attacks from the Sierra Maestre worked against the corrupt puppet government of Fulgencia Batista, but one would envision a different method would be needed to overthrow Castro's authoritative state that replaced it. Another example, the 1917 Russian Revolution, brought on by the retrograde monarchy, the chaos of World War I, and the Bolshevik movement, differed greatly from the peaceful movements that broke apart the Soviet Union in 1991.

At the same time, scholars have identified commonalities across revolutions of different eras. As with protest movements, scholars stress the importance of opportunity, a weakening of the state, the state's use of violence and repression, and allies. Each revolution thus fights its own battle, yet at the same time undergoes the same process experienced by revolutions of the past and future.

SEE ALSO: Black Panthers; Bolsheviks; Chinese Communist Revolution, 1925–1949; Chinese Nationalist Revolution, 1911; Civil Rights Movement, United States, 1960–1965; Civil Rights, United States, Black Power and Backlash, 1965–1978; Communist Manifesto;

Cuban Revolution, 1953–1959; European Revolutions of 1848; French Revolution, 1789–1794; Marx, Karl (1818–1883); Marxism; Revolution, Dialectics of; Russia, Revolution of February/March 1917; Russia, Revolution of October/November 1917; Soviet Union, Fall of; Trotsky, Leon (1879–1940)

References and Suggested Readings

- Goldstone, J. A. (Ed.) (1986) Revolutions: Theoretical, Comparative, and Historical Studies. San Diego: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich.
- Goldstone, J. A. (1991) Revolution and Rebellion in the Early Modern World. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- McAdam, D. (1982) Political Process and the Development of Black Insurgency. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- McCarthy, J. D. & Zald, M. N. (1977) Resource Mobilization and Social Movements: A Partial Theory. American Journal of Sociology 82, 6 (May): 1212–41.
- Marx, K. & Engels, F. (1998) The Communist Manifesto: A Modern Edition. London: Verso.
- Olson, M. (1965) The Logic of Collective Action: Public Goods and the Theory of Groups. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Piven, F. F. & Cloward, R. A. (1979) Poor People's Movements: Why They Succeed, How They Fail. New York: Pantheon.
- Snow, D. A., Rochford, E. B., Jr., Worden, S. K., & Benford, R. D. (1986) Frame Alignment Processes, Micromobilization, and Movement Participation. American Sociological Review 51 (August): 464–81.
- Tarrow, S. G. (1998) Power in Movement: Social Movements and Contentious Politics, 2nd ed. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Tilly, C. (1978) From Mobilization to Revolution. Reading, MA: Addison Wesley.

Proudhon, Pierre Joseph (1809–1865)

Alex Prichard

The influence of the anarchist writer and political philosopher Pierre Joseph Proudhon on his times, and his importance within and for understanding the two centuries since his birth, has been the subject of major controversy, due to three main features of his life and writings. First, Proudhon was the first to openly declare himself as an anarchist and to articulate precisely what he meant by this. Second, Proudhon's own descriptions and opinions changed and evolved. Third, the sheer novelty of his thinking may have made him difficult to understand. As Alexander Herzen, one of the most preeminent Russian revolutionaries of the late nineteenth century and a comrade of Proudhon's, once wrote: "The French seek experimental solutions in him, and, finding no plans for the phalanstery nor for the Icarian community, shrug their shoulders and lay the book aside . . . Proudhon is the first of a new set of thinkers. His work marks a transition period, not only in the history of socialism, but also in the history of French logic."

Proudhon's Anarchism

In his first and perhaps most notorious extended monograph, What is Property? (1840), Proudhon made two famous proclamations. The first was that "property is theft" and the second was "I am an anarchist!" With regard to the first proposition, he argued against natural law theories of property as legitimate in favor of a labor theory of property, holding that private property was "impossible" because of the collective nature of its production. Any system based on private ownership of land, labor, or machinery is inevitably exploitative precisely because it expropriates the surplus created by collective effort and remunerates on an individual basis. Labor, the producer of value, is undercut by the capitalist, producing a conflict between labor and property. The young Marx, utterly unknown at the time, remarked that this was one of the first scientific treatments of the question of property – and a huge success at that. However, Proudhon's anarchism, the second aspect of his early philosophy, would forever separate him from other traditions of the newly emerging left.

Proudhon refused all brands of socialism that sought to set down blueprints for society assuming natural or inevitable hierarchies between peoples and groups with intellectual or political elites at the forefront of history. He refused the Icarian communism of Etienne Cabet, the communalist Phalanstries of the Fourierists, and the Jacobin or statist communism of Louis Blanc. When Marx reached out to Proudhon for support for his own brand of communism, Proudhon offered Marx his help on the condition that Marx turned away from setting down new dogmas of politics and economics, and opened up working-class possibilities while respecting working-class and peasant traditions. It is telling that Marx's next publication was a polemical tract that criticized Proudhon's political economy not on its own terms – terms which Marx now believed were flawed anyway – but in terms of Marx's historical materialist dialectics. This schism on the left may be significant for our own times, but at the time it drew no published retort from Proudhon, nor did Proudhon ever engage with Marx's works, despite commenting on nearly every other social theorist of the century.

Proudhon's anarchism rejected dogmas, appeals to "natural orders," social hierarchy, and property relations that were anything other than fully consensual. Proudhon realized that attaining this consensus in a political system in which the freedom of speech was radically curtailed, where the state executed or exiled political opponents, and in which the dogmas and power of the church weighed heavily on the conscience of the people, would be near impossible. He thus had to show two things. The first was where contemporary society came from, and based on this analysis, how we might move towards something better. Having stated anarchism as his solution, and outlined cogently a key element of the problem, Proudhon spent the rest of his life developing his ideas and taking them in new and original directions.

Intellectual Development

Proudhon often argued that his intellectual development was shaped by his provincial background, but it was also inevitably shaped by some of the key philosophical and political theories of his time. Proudhon was born in Besançon, on the eastern border of France and Switzerland. The city had a fiercely regionalist and independent spirit, not becoming part of modern France until after Napoleon's siege of the city in 1813. Proudhon's ancestors, critics and active opponents of a centralizing France, had a mythical status in the family. Proudhon's brother also died under suspicious circumstances during non-active military service, which, he claimed, made him "an irreconcilable enemy of the status quo." His father was an unsuccessful cooper who refused to profit from his customers and regularly struggled to make ends meet. This contradiction between moral conscience and the material workings of capitalism is said to have vexed him throughout his life. His mother, a cook and housewife with a proud peasant background, exercised a strong and moralistic role in the Proudhon household. Growing up in relative poverty, without shoes or books for school, herding cattle in the hills of the Jura during vacations, Proudhon nevertheless acquired considerable learning and intellectual influence.

Proudhon's first education was, unavoidably, in the dogmas of Catholicism. Despite lapsing in adolescence, it remained a strong moral compass throughout his life. In later life, armed with the humanistic theories of Feuerbach, Proudhon argued that in fact Catholicism or Christianity more broadly was simply the transhistorical manifestation of our own sublime human natures. Armed with the tools of Auguste Comte's new sociological positivism, Proudhon felt better able to argue that society had itself changed over time and that therefore core tenets of the Catholic faith had long lost their social utility. For example, it was no longer necessary to believe in God, the religious hierarchies, or the religious view of history. Nevertheless, since the Bible was a manifestation of the human, some of its teachings would inevitably endure. What were needed in the positive, scientific age were moral precepts derived not from an asocial reason or from the word of God, but from human experience and the discoveries of science.

The discoveries of science were, of course, not always welcome. The discoveries of science led to industrialization and to technocratic social ordering based on abstract principles. These twin processes continually clashed with French tradition. France had as yet seen little of the industrialization experienced by England in the early part of the nineteenth century; it was not until after the coup d'état of Napoleon III in 1851 that the consolidation of mines and railways by industrialists and the state, and national building projects such as that undertaken by Haussmann in Paris, that "modernization" took hold. Thus traditional, artisanal, and agricultural ways of life in France were overturned at the same time as the building of the absolutist and imperial nation-state and the rise of capitalism. It was thus natural for workers to look to Proudhon, the foremost critic of the state and capitalism in France, and one of the few from a working-class background.

From the revolution of 1848 to his death in 1865, Proudhon's fame and infamy grew and grew. It was not until 1865, however, that Proudhon's anarchist political philosophy became enmeshed with a proletarian movement. Indeed, prior to this date, no such self-conscious movement existed in France, explaining the failure of Marxism to take hold here until much later. In 1863 a group of workers headed by Henri Tolain, soon to become the president of the first International Workingmen's Association, approached Proudhon for his opinion on the desirability of working-class representation in the French Assembly. In his last work, De la Capacité Politique des Classes Ouvrières (On the Political Capacity of the Working Classes), Proudhon restated quite unequivocally what he had been arguing now for some twenty years: namely, that the workers ought to self-organize and run their own affairs, retaining and redistributing surplus as they see fit and delegating representatives rather than electing legislators. Politics ought to be a bottom-up process rather than a centralized and top-down one.

To return to his reasons for this advice, Proudhon argued, as did most revolutionaries, that the French Revolution had promised much but delivered little to the workers of France, and by implication, the world. From Robespierre's deliberate policy of Terror to cajole a recalcitrant non-Jacobin France into line, through to the entrenchment of the bourgeoisie as the new power-holders in France, the state had failed to deliver emancipation to the working classes. This was repeated after the 1848 revolution, where Louis Blanc's Luxembourg Commission, designed almost entirely on Blanc's state communist principles, failed to deliver on its promise of a right to work (a ludicrous ambition anyway, to Proudhon's mind), and produced nothing more than systematic alms to the indigent. Moreover, Proudhon argued that the championing of nationalism as a force for working-class emancipation was simply leading workers to the slaughterhouse and relegitimizing the state as the bearer of national identity when in fact state boundaries and ethnic identities rarely matched. From the French Revolution itself, through to the Crimean War and the Italian Risorgimento, from the "Polish question" to the issue of French colonies, and France's disputed rights to Alsace and Lorraine, Nice and Savoy, the Papal States and Northern Italy, what the trumpeting of national identity actually produced was imperialism.

Proudhon did not propose chaos, although it is common for many to confuse chaos with anarchy. If order is the genus, as Proudhon himself put it, anarchy is a species. What Proudhon argued for was a removal of all claims to permanent or transcendental authority, derived either from law, power, and property, the manipulation of superstition and false information, or from ignorance. Anarchy, as he noted, simply implies "no leader." The reasons for why we have come to have so many can be found in human history, in the emergence of systems of power and social organization that are justified in such a way that is convincing to the populace. Where it is not, brute force is used and there, at this point, is where we see how unnatural the social order is.

Proudhon argued that lamenting the place of force in society was futile. Force has important (if historically specific) roles to play. No one would deny the right of force against fascism, for example. What Proudhon wanted was to recalibrate social forces so that they would balance one another harmoniously, and the only way he could see this coming about was from the discoveries of the real origins of force, which meant a critique of the prevailing views which were either rationalist, religious, or statist.

For Proudhon, forces originate with humans, becoming embedded in and sustained by institutions, legitimized by moral norms and legal edicts, and none can exist alone for very long. His was a relational ontology which sought to understand how the material and the ideational forces that sustain society emerge and collapse over time. War, he argued, was a key vehicle of change, while order was far harder to isolate.

Proudhon believed the central feature of any stable order was justice. Justice, in his view, was a contingent and temporary balance of forces in society – one on which all could agree. When this balance breaks down because someone sees it as unjust, the process of recalibration begins anew. Proudhon believed that the best way to ensure that this inevitable process continued benignly was to ensure that working-class force was calibrated properly in society, which meant socializing property and making the wishes of all heard and acted on – which meant radical and participatory democracy. Thus, he argued that all the "natural groups" of society – be they towns, regions, workshops, industries, reading groups, or states (not to be confused with society) – ought to federate into a number of autonomous but overlapping international confederations. These would rise and fall as needed, but crucially, would do so with the active, participatory consent of those involved.

Proudhon believed it was utopian to deduce historical trajectories from first principles or seek to establish utopian communities somehow “outside” society. He also believed and argued passionately for human “self-government” and the principles of “respect” that ought to underpin it.

Criticisms

Much has been made of Proudhon’s anti-Semitism since World War II. Much less has been made of his anti-feminism, though the latter far outstrips the former. Proudhon’s anti-Semitism is something of a myth, virulent and often disgusting statements against the Jewish people in his unpublished notebooks notwithstanding, propagated in large part by those desiring to tie socialism to fascism, such as Georges Sorel. Proudhon’s anti-feminism, on the other hand, was an intrinsic aspect of his thought, and it is impossible to take account of Proudhon’s anarchism without understanding the subversive and extra-political and largely extra-social role he ascribed to half the world’s population. Proudhon’s view of women has been variously attributed to his “repressed homosexuality” by Daniel Guérin, to his provincial background by others, and to his defense of the patriarchal family by Celestin Bouglé. Proudhon’s anti-feminism, however, was largely a political response to the sensualist pantheism of the Utopian socialists, the destruction of the family implied in their critique of marriage, and the widespread if not quite endemic prostitution in France. Each of these forces had one origin for Proudhon: feminism. It ought also to be recalled that quite unlike in our own period, the most prominent feminists in nineteenth-century France were men, who had a vested sexual and material interest in emancipating women from the shackles of bourgeois marriage contracts. Proudhon was almost devoutly provincial in his approach to the family and his attitude to women overall is far from misogynistic. He was devoted to his mother and his wife (despite having her painted out of Courbet’s family portrait of the Proudhons) and his daughters. He nevertheless asserted that women were three times less than a man, physically, intellectually, and morally.

Proudhon’s thought is often criticized for being contradictory, confusing, and polemical. However, commentators such as Steven Vincent argued that Proudhon articulated “a consistent vision of society and its needs, a vision which is preeminently moral, and which revolves around his desire to install a federal arrangement of workers’ associations and to instill a public regard for republican virtue.”

SEE ALSO: Anarchism, France; Anarchism and Gender; Anarchocommunism; Anarchosyndicalism; Blanc, Louis (1811–1882); Fourier, Charles François Marie (1772–1837) and the Phalanx Utopians

References and Suggested Readings

- Guérin, D. (1978) Proudhon oui & non. Paris: Gallimard.
- Hauptmann, P. (1980) La Philosophie sociale de P.-J. Proudhon. Grenoble: Presses Universitaires de Grenoble.
- Hauptmann, P. (1987) Pierre-Joseph Proudhon, sa vie et sa pensée 1849–1865. Paris: Relié.
- Jackson, J. H. (1957) Marx, Proudhon and European Socialism. London: English Universities Press.
- Noland, A. (1968) History and Humanity: The Proudhonian Vision. In H. White (Ed.), The Uses of History: Essays in Intellectual and Social History. Detroit: Wayne State University Press.
- Proudhon, P. J. (1840/1994) What Is Property? Or, an Inquiry into the Principle of Right and of Government. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Proudhon, P. J. (1846/1996) System of Economical Contradictions: Or, the Philosophy of Misery. Charlottesville: University of Virginia Library.
- Proudhon, P. J. (1863/1979) The Principle of Federation. Toronto: University of Toronto Press.
- Proudhon, P. J. (1969) Selected Writings of Pierre-Joseph Proudhon. Garden City, NY: Anchor Books.
- Proudhon, P. J. (1989) General Idea of the Revolution in the Nineteenth Century. London: Pluto Press.
- Thomas, P. (1980) Karl Marx and the Anarchists. London: Routledge.
- Vincent, K. S. (1984) Pierre-Joseph Proudhon and the Rise of French Republican Socialism. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Puerto Rican independence movement, 1898–present

Michael Staudenmaier

For more than a century the movement for independence from the United States has been a prominent feature of political life among Puerto Ricans. The uniqueness of the movement relative to other nationalist efforts lies partly in the way Puerto Rico straddles North America and Latin America: it is a Caribbean island sharing common historical and cultural roots with the former colonies that make up the vast territory of Spanish-speaking Latin America, but those paths diverged after the Treaty of Paris in 1898 ceded control of the island from Spain to the United States. The subsequent diaspora, which eventually resulted in a situation where half of all Puerto Ricans live in the US, has only added to the complexity. As a result, the Puerto Rican independence movement has long synthesized a set of disparate elements more commonly associated with protest struggles in the United States or with revolutionary efforts in Latin America.

The historical antecedents of the independence movement lie in the struggle against Spanish rule, especially during the last half of the nineteenth century. Resistance to colonialism was continuous among the indigenous Taino population from the earliest arrival of the conquistadors, and the introduction of African slaves only increased the necessity and opportunity for struggle, particularly through the creation of maroon communities in the mountainous center of the island. But a specifically Puerto Rican identity did not develop until sometime during the late eighteenth or early nineteenth century, following the general pattern among Spain's new world colonies described by Anderson (2006). This emerging national identity produced a movement for independence fraught with all the contradictions that plagued parallel – if more successful – movements throughout Latin America. The drive for bourgeois home-rule coexisted uneasily with broad demands for freedom and equality. The most prominent early advocate for the latter option in Puerto Rico was Ramon Emeterio Betances, who led the unsuccessful 1868 uprising against Spanish rule known as the Grito de Lares. More than two decades later, sections of the local bourgeoisie successfully negotiated substantial autonomy from Madrid, only to see this short-lived experiment nullified by the Spanish–American War and the subsequent handover to the US.

1898–1920: Rise and Fall of the Early Bourgeois Independence Movement

Puerto Rico at the end of the nineteenth century was contested terrain in multiple ways. On one level, the war resulted in a new colonial power and a military occupation. This was opposed by some sectors of the local population, although as Pico (2004) notes, reports of armed resistance to US occupation seem to have been exaggerated. Some of the strongest challenges to the incoming regime came from among the leading intellectuals and industrialists of the time, because this segment of the population faced the most immediate risk when autonomy under Spanish rule gave way to direct military occupation by the United States. The US quickly outlawed Spanish for use in official business and imposed English as the language of instruction in schools. In a society where literacy rates hovered below 10 percent, the small literary community produced most of the early pro-independence sentiment, often dramatizing its position with vivid depictions of oppression and the assault on Puerto Rican cultural identity. At the same time, however, there was necessarily a striking disconnection between the well-documented political and literary agitation of the educated classes and the limited record of the activities of the great bulk of the population, which is much more difficult to reconstruct.

The intentions of the US government in regards to Puerto Rico were ambiguous from the time of the war until the passage of the Jones Act in 1917, which mandated citizenship for all Puerto Ricans and signaled official intent to retain permanent possession of the island. One result of this temporary uncertainty was a cautiously experimental approach to politics within the elite spheres of Puerto Rican society during the first two decades of US rule, with some sectors advocating “annexation” as a state within the US, others arguing for an “autonomist” vision of home rule, and smaller numbers demanding full independence. Unifying these diverse proposals was a willingness to work within the limitations imposed by the new colonial reality.

At the same time, class struggle was no stranger to the island at the turn of the century. The largest labor union of the time, the Free Workers Federation (FLT), routinely positioned itself in opposition to the perspectives of the bourgeois political class, but often did so from the right rather than the left. Since the FLT was strongest among skilled craft workers like typesetters and bricklayers, and weakest among the much more numerous sugarcane workers, it was unable to capitalize on the contradiction between the bourgeois proposals and the aspirations of the Puerto Rican working class. After aligning itself with the American Federation of Labor in 1901, the FLT took a militant but increasingly conservative approach to labor struggle. For example, it supported the Jones Act, which the nascent independence movement opposed, as did most other factions of the local bourgeoisie. When citizenship was mandated by the US Congress in 1917, the failure of the early bourgeois independence movement was as obvious as the complicity of the labor leadership with US rule, and both movements fell into decline.

1920–1960: Rising Nationalist Sentiment

The eclipse of these movements cleared the stage for the emergence of a new political force, Puerto Rican nationalism. Embodied by (but not limited to) the Nationalist Party, nationalism combined militant struggle for full independence with the promotion of a specifically Puerto Rican national identity that was intended to unify popular sentiment around separation from the United States. The result was a distinctive revolutionary ideology that forever changed the Puerto Rican political landscape. An unintended but similarly important consequence was the intense repression visited upon the movement by the US government, which used Puerto Rico as a proving ground for later repressive efforts both within the US and throughout Latin America.

The Nationalist Party began as a modest effort, focused largely on the same cautious and deferential approach that also marked the other bourgeois parties of the era. Beginning in 1930, however, under the leadership of Pedro Albizu Campos, the party shifted gears and began to emphasize the importance of self-determination by the Puerto Rican people, as opposed to the endless effort to persuade the US government to grant polite requests. Given Albizu Campos' encounters with Irish republicanism in the United States, the extensive parallels between the two movements are unsurprising: both emphasized the cultural distinctiveness of their island societies and the moral grounding offered by Catholicism, both encouraged militant struggle and sponsored the formation of paramilitary formations within the movement, and both embraced an ethic of self-sacrifice on behalf of the struggle, up to and including martyrdom. Of course, there were significant differences, not the least of which was the well-established character of the Irish movement as contrasted with the novelty of the nationalist approach within the Puerto Rican context. Furthermore, the rise of the US and the decline of the British state on the world stage in the early twentieth century created a profoundly different set of circumstances, and the nationalists were fully aware of the uniqueness of the Puerto Rican situation.

During the 1930's the Nationalist Party developed a theory of retraiamiento (non-collaboration), rejecting electoral participation and embracing armed struggle as a right of all peoples pursuing self-determination. The party engaged in an escalating series of confrontations with the US government and US-based business interests, including support for militant strikes by sugarcane workers and longshoremen, as well as gun battles with the police, and even assassinations. These activities generated sympathy and support for the nationalists from broad sectors of the Puerto Rican population, both on the island and in the ever-growing diaspora. The most high-profile victim of assassination was E. Francis Riggs, an unpopular police commissioner. The US response included not only the summary execution of Riggs' killers, but also the broad repression of the nationalist movement. Albizu Campos and several others were arrested, charged, and convicted of conspiring to overthrow the government of the United States. Mass gatherings and marches of nationalists were suppressed, and on March 21, 1937 an unarmed march of several hundred nationalists, including dozens of women and children, was attacked by police in the southern city of Ponce. Twenty people were killed and as many as 200 were injured in what became instantly known as the Ponce Massacre. As the cycles of violence continued, nationalist sentiment gained in popularity even as government repression limited the ability of the Nationalist Party to function with much of its leadership in prison.

At the same time, the party attempted to sharpen the focus of the developing national consciousness. It romanticized the pre-1898 era of Spanish control, highlighting the autonomy agreement reached in 1897 and deemphasizing the undeniable brutality of the Spanish regime. It promoted an idealized notion of Puerto Rican culture as Spanish-speaking, Roman Catholic, and, above all, European, while obscuring not only the indigenous influence on Puerto Rican music, food, and language (among other cultural forms) but also the successive waves of immigration that brought French, Italian, Irish, and especially African influences into the equation. This conservative cultural nationalism, along with the paramilitary aspect of the Nationalist Party, have led commentators such as Lewis (1963) to describe the party as fascist, but this categorization is false. Not only was the party internally anti-racist (a significant portion of the membership, including Albizu Campos himself, was black) and heavily oriented toward the working class, it was also broadly internationalist in outlook, sympathizing with anti-imperialist struggles from Algeria and Ethiopia to India and China. Further, the party's cultural conservatism was complicated by the leadership roles assigned to women, and by its advocacy of an activist Catholicism that in retrospect is more reminiscent of later developments in liberation theology than of the reactionary clericalism then prominent in Spain. Again, as Ayala and Bernabe (2007) argue, the model for the Nationalist Party was not fascism but Irish republicanism. Nonetheless, a substantial cult of personality did develop within the party around Albizu Campos as a consequence of his charisma and the repression visited upon him personally.

Other political formations influenced by nationalism included the Puerto Rican Communist Party and the Puerto Rican Independence Party (PIP). The communists built a strong organization with members both in New York and on the island, but were limited by their strict adherence to the dictates of Stalin's Third International. The PIP was founded in the 1940s with a mandate to achieve its stated goal legally and peacefully. While adopting the cultural approach promoted by the nationalists, it rejected retramiento as an organizing principle and participated in island-wide elections. At the same time, the stark colonial repression and economic depression of the 1930s had given way to postwar economic growth and the expanded home rule arrangement known as the Freely Associated State (ELA), backed by the newly created Popular Democratic Party (PPD) under the leadership of former independence activist Luis Munoz Marin.

After a relative lull in activity during World War II the party began to formulate a precise strategy for independence when Albizu Campos returned to Puerto Rico after serving his first sentence. Perhaps drawing upon the Irish experience of the Easter Rising, the nationalists prepared for an armed insurrection against US rule. The goal was to create both a domestic crisis for the newly inaugurated Puerto Rican government and an international embarrassment for the United States. But with the Ponce Massacre a receding memory, much popular support shifted from the nationalists to the PPD, and the Nationalist Party was left to plan its uprising in a context where support for independence on the island was falling rather than rising, and where pro-independence sentiment was now divided between the nationalists and the PIP.

What had been a long-term strategy for a multi-faceted insurrection became an emergency plan in October 1950, when the party leadership became convinced that mass arrests of independence activists were imminent. On October 30 nationalist militias attacked police stations in several smaller communities, as well as the governor's mansion in the island capital of San Juan. Party members in New York traveled to Washington, DC and unsuccessfully attempted to assassinate President Harry Truman. Only in the small mountain town of Jayuya did the combatants have any success, fighting on for four days, after which it was clear that the uprising had not gained popular support. In the interim, party militants in Jayuya had declared the establishment of an independent republic in Puerto Rico, the second time (after the Grito de Lares) that independence had been publicly proclaimed in the island's history. The insurrection as a whole has become known within the independence movement as the Grito de Jayuya (Cry of Jayuya).

In the aftermath the entire repressive apparatus of the US government was brought to bear on the independence movement generally and the Nationalist Party in particular. The leadership of the party was again incarcerated, with Albizu Campos destined to spend all but a few months of the rest of his life in prison. The US government's Counter Intelligence Program (COINTELPRO), later to be made infamous in the context of domestic surveillance and disruption of the US left, was initially devised by FBI agents in Puerto Rico in order to cripple the Nationalist Party structure. The party was thus unable to respond to the massive changes then sweeping Puerto Rico: the new ELA status, the major influx of US business interests under the development plan named Operation Bootstrap, and the consequent explosion of outmigration from the island to industrial cities like New York and Chicago.

In 1954 members of the Nationalist Party fired shots at the ceiling of the US Capitol while the House of Representatives was in session. No one was injured, and the nationalists responsible claimed that their goal was to call public attention to the many party members languishing in prison four years after Jayuya. Ironically, the four shooters, Lolita Lebron, Andres Figueroa Cordero, Andres Flores, and Rafael Cancel Miranda, would themselves spend the next 25 years in prison, joining the surviving would-be assassin of President Truman, Oscar Collazo, as longtime political prisoners whose continued incarceration would help inspire a future generation of independence activists in the 1970s. But at the time of Albizu Campos' death in 1965 the Nationalist Party was a shell of its former self, and the plight of "the Five," as Lebron and her comrades were later known, was largely forgotten by Puerto Ricans both inside and outside the independence movement.

1960–1990: Independence and Socialism for Puerto Rico

The Nationalist Party never identified with any precise class struggle ideology, although it had cordial relations with a variety of socialists and communists, including several who were at times key members of the party. One of these was Juan Antonio Corretjer, who was convicted with Albizu Campos in 1936 and later became an ardent if unorthodox Leninist. Corretjer and others like him throughout the independence movement were profoundly influenced by the Cuban Revolution at the end of the 1950s. The success of the revolution seemed to validate the possibility of armed struggle in the Caribbean, despite the obvious differences between mass opposition to the despotic rule of Bautista in Cuba and the broad popularity of Munoz Marin in Puerto Rico. More important, however, was Fidel Castro's public embrace of Marxism-Leninism, and his broad support for anti-imperialist and anti-capitalist revolution in all corners of the developing world. In Puerto Rico, with its direct historical and cultural ties to Cuba, a new generation of activists was drawn toward the twin goals of independence and socialism that would guide the most militant sectors of the movement for decades to come.

The most prominent group to emerge during this period was the Movement for Independence (MPI), which grew rapidly during the second half of the 1960s, embracing a socialist and eventually Marxist-Leninist approach to struggle. In the early 1970s the MPI transformed itself into the Puerto Rican Socialist Party (PSP), which became a major force on the Puerto Rican left for the next decade. Heavily involved in both student and union organizing, the MPI/PSP also published the newspaper Claridad (Clarity). Following the tradition of the Nationalist Party, it rejected electoral participation, but emphasized the necessity for mass struggle that had been neglected by the nationalists in later years. The growth of the MPI/PSP was facilitated by an upsurge of labor activity beginning at the end of the 1960s, and by the stagnation of Puerto Rico's economy in the aftermath of Operation Bootstrap.

The rise of the New Left in the United States, along with the rapid growth in the Puerto Rican population on the mainland during the 1950s, also contributed to the unique character of the independence movement during the 1960s and 1970s. Puerto Rican radicals living in New York, Chicago, and elsewhere were witness to the emergence of the black civil rights movement in the US, and to the expansion of student and anti-war struggles. As these movements became increasingly radical in outlook, independence activists in the diaspora adopted a similar trajectory. Thus, the Young Lords Organization, initially a Puerto Rican street gang in Chicago, adopted a militant community organizing framework inspired by the Black Panther Party in the late 1960s. This attracted a number of Puerto Rican student radicals in New York City, who merged with the Chicago grouping under the name Young Lords Party (another nod to the Panthers). The Chicago grouping was eventually expelled for political reasons, and the New York branch declined into sectarian obscurity, but the effect on the movement both in the mainland and on the island was significant.

As long as the broader movements of the 1960s maintained their vitality, the PSP and other groups continued to thrive. But the mass organization aspect of the PSP's politics left the question of armed struggle unresolved. Some activists within the PSP wished to distance themselves from what they viewed as the adventurist legacy of the Nationalist Party, while others began highlighting the plight of the five nationalist prisoners as an organizing tool within the Puerto Rican community. Around the same time, the question of armed struggle ceased to be merely historical as several small clandestine organizations initiated armed campaigns for independence. The most prominent of these were the Armed Forces of National Liberation (FALN), which operated primarily on the mainland from the mid-1970s to the early 1980s, and the Macheteros (literally, the machete wielders), which was active largely on the island from the late 1970s until the late 1980s. The notoriety of the FALN in the mid-1970s forced a discussion of armed struggle within the independence movement, especially in the diaspora, leading to the creation of the Movement for National Liberation (MLN), which was strongest in Chicago but included sections in New York and other cities. The MLN also incorporated a unique dual nationalism that tied the struggle for Puerto Rican independence to the radical Chicano demand for “socialist reunification” of Mexico on the basis of the border prior to the Mexican-American War of 1848, when California and several other southwestern states had been part of Mexico. The MLN was always small compared to the PSP, but the group’s legacy within the diaspora was in many ways out of proportion to its limited size.

The MLN’s respect for the Nationalist Party was only augmented when it also came under intense government repression on the basis of its vocal support for the FALN. Within a year of the MLN’s founding, its entire leadership was incarcerated for failure to testify before a federal grand jury investigating the activities of the FALN. The grand jury resistance campaign became one of the main organizing areas for the MLN, along with public support for the release of the five nationalist prisoners. This effort bore fruit in the late 1970s, as broad sectors of Puerto Rican society embraced the campaign for their release on humanitarian grounds. President Jimmy Carter first released Andres Figueroa, who was dying of cancer, in 1978, and subsequently pardoned the remaining four prisoners in 1979. During this period the MLN and other groups were also invited to testify before the United Nations Decolonization Committee on the colonial status of Puerto Rico. This was a major breakthrough because the island’s ELA status had previously satisfied much of the international community that Puerto Rico was no longer a colony. As the 1970s progressed, it became increasingly clear that the colonial status persisted.

The FALN was especially active in the latter half of the decade, claiming responsibility for more than 100 bombings of government and corporate offices. The Macheteros group did not limit itself to bombings, engaging in assassinations and armed expropriations as well, including a major armored car robbery in Connecticut in 1983. The two groups, and the other assorted armed organizations of the same era, had political differences with one another, but they did occasionally collaborate on armed actions, and they agreed on the legitimacy of armed struggle in general. While the armed groups lacked a broad base of mass support, they did have sizable peripheries they could call upon for support, as indicated by Fernandez (1987). In this sense it is wrong to equate the Puerto Rican armed struggle with the actions of white clandestine armed organizations in the United States, such as the Weather Underground, which were far more marginal. The communiqués of the armed organizations indicate a two-pronged strategy: embolden the Puerto Rican people with a sense of their untapped potential for radical action, and create a crisis of control that could force the US government to rethink its colonial policies. There is little evidence that either outcome was achieved, although the armed struggle can be thought of as a productive error, insofar as it advanced discussion among Puerto Rican revolutionaries and helped inspire several lasting social movements on the island and in the diaspora.

The MLN developed relationships with island-based groups as well. Smaller organizations dotted the left landscape outside the orbit of the PSP, and one of these was the Puerto Rican Socialist League (LSP) founded by Corretjer. The LSP supported many of the same mass struggles as the PSP, but it viewed the latter’s equivocation on the question of armed struggle as a fatal flaw in strategizing for revolution. Corretjer wrote an influential essay entitled “Problems of People’s War in Puerto Rico,” which situated the island’s independence within the broader context of the revolutionary upsurge then sweeping Latin America. The pamphlet included a favorable introduction by the Spanish/Argentine anarchist Abraham Guillen, an advocate for the urban guerrilla movement in the southern cone of South America. The LSP was strongly supportive of the emergence of the FALN on the mainland and as a result came into contact with the MLN. The groups established a formal fraternal relationship, with the LSP operating on the island and the MLN working within the diaspora communities. Both organizations were involved in the campaign against forced sterilization of Puerto Rican women, an ongoing crisis abetted directly by the US government.

The LSP gained its greatest notoriety during protests on Vieques, a small island off the eastern coast of the main island that is considered part of Puerto Rico. For decades, the vast majority of Vieques was occupied by the US navy, which used it as a training ground for aerial and amphibious combat. Local residents had opposed the occupation from the beginning, but in the mid-1970s the movement gained some traction within the broader Puerto Rican left and the independence movement in particular. The LSP was one of the organizations most heavily involved in pushing for militant direct action to actively disrupt the training activities, and when a group of protesters was arrested in 1979 for trespassing on navy property, one of those convicted was Angel Rodriguez Cristobal, a young militant of the LSP. Rodriguez was subsequently killed in a federal prison in Florida while serving his sentence. This came on the heels of the cold-blooded murder by police in 1978 of two young independence activists who were lured to a mountaintop, and the two events again shocked the mainstream of Puerto Rican society into awareness of the repression visited upon the independence movement.

During the 1980s, however, the strain of repression and of internal divisions in the movement began to show and the organized independence movement began a significant decline. The PSP split over the question of electoral participation and alliance with one of the larger parties; by 1985 it was a shell of its former self. The Puerto Rican Independence Party remained what it had always been, a relatively large but still marginal political party committed to avoiding confrontation. Groups like the MLN and LSP survived for a time, but as the broader social movements of the 1970s shrank, so did the ability of such smaller groups to influence them. The armed movement suffered significant losses, including the capture of more than a dozen combatants each from the FALN and the Macheteros, and by the end of the 1980s both organizations had effectively ceased to exist. One major legacy of this period, however, was the cause of the prisoners, all of whom identified themselves as prisoners of war or as political prisoners. Just as the five nationalist prisoners had created a link between the independence movements of the 1950s and the 1970s, so did the plight of the new set of prisoners beginning in the early 1980s eventually inspire a generation of activists a decade later.

1990–Present: New Directions

In the aftermath of the 1980s the independence movement regrouped both on the island and in the diaspora. Instead of prioritizing the reconstruction of the organizations of the previous era, many independence activists focused their energy directly on involvement in the rising social movements of the time, of which three stand out: the rising anti-privatization movement, the campaign to free the political prisoners and prisoners of war, and the struggle around the navy's continued use of Vieques.

In 1992 the pro-statehood party gained control of the island government, promising to push for Puerto Rico's admission as the 51st state. One important aspect of this effort was the imposition of neoliberal economic measures designed to move the island rapidly toward parity with the mainland. These changes were actually more reflective of the neoliberal craze then sweeping the rest of Latin America than they were of any economic policies in place within the United States at the time. Nonetheless, in a context where President Bill Clinton was dismantling welfare programs domestically and enacting free trade agreements internationally, it was politically savvy for statehood advocates to privatize as quickly as possible the massive public sector in Puerto Rico. While these maneuvers may have been popular in Washington, they prompted massive resistance among Puerto Ricans.

The battles around privatization came to a head in 1997 and 1998, in a struggle over the sale of the Puerto Rican Telephone Company. Resistance came from a variety of sectors, including unions, student groups, the independence movement, environmentalists, and more, who collaborated in staging strikes and protests aimed at stopping the sale. The guiding slogan of this campaign, “Puerto Rico no se vende,” had strong pro-independence implications, since it translated as both “Puerto Rico is not for sale” and “Puerto Rico doesn’t sell out.” But while the independence movement devoted considerable resources to the struggle, the real backbone of the resistance was organized labor, which did not take a formal position on independence. The campaign culminated in a massive general strike in the summer of 1998, but when disagreements emerged among the unions involved, the effort floundered. In the end the phone company was privatized as planned, and the independence movement was not strong enough to change the outcome.

A more successful arena for the movement in the 1990s was the campaign to free the remaining political prisoners and prisoners of war from the FALN and the Macheteros. This campaign was spearheaded almost entirely by radical independence activists, and once again Puerto Ricans in the diaspora were centrally involved. The prisoners had received outrageously long sentences, in some cases as much as 100 years, although none of their convictions had been for crimes of violence. Seizing on the human rights aspect of their continuing incarceration, the campaign to free the prisoners gained momentum as the decade progressed, drawing support from religious organizations and professional associations both on the mainland and in Puerto Rico. The seditious conspiracy charge, which produced the bulk of the prison sentences meted out to the prisoners, had been used exclusively against Puerto Ricans during the twentieth century, beginning with Albizu Campos himself. This only heightened the sense that the prisoners were being punished for loving their homeland, which in turn broadened support for their release among all sectors of Puerto Rican society.

Building upon this expanding popular mobilization, the campaign to free the prisoners petitioned the Clinton administration to release them unconditionally. In doing so, they deliberately downplayed the armed struggle aspect of the prisoners’ history, focusing instead upon the humanitarian issues raised by their continued incarceration and the non-violent nature of the crimes for which they were convicted. This narrative was difficult to sustain in discussions with the same US government that had declared the prisoners “terrorists” when they were first captured, but the growing support for the campaign from religious, legal, and humanitarian groups made it possible. In the end, President Clinton approved the release of most of the prisoners in the summer of 1999. This constituted a massive victory for the independence movement, although it was clear that the road to success required jettisoning, at least temporarily, the more militant forms of rhetoric and action that had been traditionally associated with the movement.

A few months before the release of the prisoners, the small island of Vieques again became a flashpoint for social struggle in Puerto Rico, when, during combat training for the US navy, a bomb accidentally killed a Puerto Rican civilian named David Sanes. The independence movement, having been involved consistently in the struggle against the navy, was well positioned to respond to the sudden and broad-based public outrage. But once again there were other contributors to the struggle: environmental activists opposed the ecological devastation visited on Vieques, while pacifists and anti-militarists campaigned against combat training as a precursor to wars abroad. But community control was the dominant discourse of the movement, and in this arena the independence movement’s demand for self-determination throughout Puerto Rico drew increasing support from others involved in the struggle.

Immediately after Sanes’ death the navy shut down the training grounds while it investigated the situation. Protestors from throughout Puerto Rico subsequently occupied the naval property, establishing dozens of squatter encampments designed to prevent the resumption of activity by the navy. Some of the squatters were independence activists, but others came from student and environmental movements well-steeped in the tactics of militant direct action. These same movements helped coordinate a rally in San Juan in 2000 demanding the immediate departure of the navy from Vieques; with an estimated 150,000 people, it was one of the largest demonstrations in the history of Puerto Rico. With virtually the entire island siding against the navy, the US government eventually agreed to withdraw from Vieques within four years, while insisting that combat training would continue during that time. This extended timetable satisfied no one, and direct action and civil disobedience continued until the final cessation of training in 2003. Once again, the independence movement was integral to the victory, this time in large part due to its embrace of direct action.

Throughout these various campaigns the independence movement was also involved in a variety of other struggles, from anti-gentrification efforts in diaspora communities such as Chicago and New York, to environmental and community struggles in various parts of Puerto Rico. The preservation of historical awareness was also a continuing concern, and the movement coordinated annual commemorations of events like the Grito de Lares, the Ponce Massacre, and the Grito de Jayuya. On September 23, 2005, while many independence activists were attending activities in Lares, the FBI killed Filiberto Ojeda Rios, a leading Machetero and a longtime fugitive, at his home in western Puerto Rico. As had happened several times before, the repression of the independence movement by the US government stimulated an outpouring of sympathy for the movement among broader sectors of Puerto Rican society. The murder of Ojeda Rios refocused the attention of Puerto Ricans on the historical legacy of the independence movement, while inspiring the movement itself to regroup and move forward in the twenty-first century.

Conclusion

The independence movement in Puerto Rico has contributed significantly to a broad range of social struggles both in Puerto Rico and in the United States over the past 110 years. This legacy has been addressed by historians from a variety of perspectives, although no comprehensive history of the movement exists in English or in Spanish. Many general histories of Puerto Rico engage such major figures as Albizu Campos, within the context of broader trends. The recent work of Ayala and Bernabe (2007) represents the most sophisticated contextualized analysis of the independence movement's historical trajectory currently available in English. Other works in English address thematic or chronological aspects of the movement, either in the diaspora or on the island itself, including Quintero-Rivera (1976), Flores (1993), Fernandez (1994), Ramos-Zayas (2003), Rivera (2003), and Pico (2004), among many others.

The future of the independence movement is uncertain. The longer colonial status continues, the less likely full independence seems from a geopolitical perspective. But the fortunes of the movement as such are more likely to be tied to the ebb and flow of the broader social movements of the coming years, as has been the case historically. If and when these movements resurge, the demand for independence from the United States will almost certainly gain support. But the political content of the independence argument, which in the past has evolved from bourgeois home rule to populist nationalism to revolutionary socialism, will determine the ability of the movement to surpass the limits of previous incarnations.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism, Puerto Rico; Cuban Revolution, 1953–1959; Easter Rising and the Irish Civil War; Imperialism, Historical Evolution; Irish Nationalism; Student Movements, Global South; Vieques; Women's Movement, Latin America

References and Suggested Readings

- Anderson, B. (2006) Imagined Communities: Reflections on the Origins and Spread of Nationalism. New York: Verso.
- Ayala, C. J. & Bernabe, R. (2007) Puerto Rico in the American Century: A History Since 1898. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Fernandez, R. (1987) Los Macheteros: The Wells Fargo Robbery and the Violent Struggle for Puerto Rican Independence. New York: Prentice-Hall.
- Fernandez, R. (1994) Prisoners of Colonialism: The Struggle for Justice in Puerto Rico. Monroe, ME: Common Courage Press.
- Flores, J. (1993) Divided Borders: Essays on Puerto Rican Identity. Houston: Arte Publico Press.
- Lewis, G. K. (1963) Puerto Rico: Freedom and Power in the Caribbean. New York: Monthly Review Press.
- Pico, F. (2004) Puerto Rico 1898: The War After the War. Princeton: Markus Wiener.
- Quintero-Rivera, A. (1976) Workers' Struggle in Puerto Rico: A Documentary History. New York: Monthly Review Press.
- Ramos-Zayas, A. Y. (2003) National Performances: The Politics of Class, Race, and Space in Puerto Rican Chicago. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Rivera, R. Z. (2003) New York Ricans From the Hip-Hop Zone. New York: Palgrave-Macmillan.
- Various Authors (1979) Toward People's War for Independence and Socialism in Puerto Rico: In Defense of Armed Struggle: Documents and Communiques from the Revolutionary Public Independence Movement and the Armed Clandestine Movement. Chicago: Committee in Solidarity with Puerto Rican Independence.
- Wagenheim, K. & Jimenez de Wagenheim, O. (1994) The Puerto Ricans: A Documentary History. Princeton: Markus Wiener.

Pugachev's Rebellion, 1773–1775

Yury V. Bosin

Under the rule of Catherine the Great, Russia was rapidly modernizing as the Russian elite embraced western technological advances, fashions, food, and art, at great financial cost to the entire country. Landowners increased the tax burdens on their serfs to counterbalance their expensive standard of living. Peasants in turn engaged in mass protests and rebellions through escaping, rioting, and engaging in insurrections against the aristocracy. From 1762 to 1772, some 160 popular uprisings were recorded in the Russian empire, but the profligate ruling classes were not prepared for the fierce rise in peasant discontent that ignited Pugachev's Rebellion from 1773 to 1775. The peasant uprising was sparked by a rumor that Peter III, the grandson of Peter the Great, had escaped assassination in 1763 and was living in hiding among the Cossacks on the Yaik River, renamed the Ural River in the aftermath of the rebellion.

The rumor alleged that Catherine II sought revenge against Peter III who was seeking to emancipate peasants from serfdom. In reality, Emilian Pugachev, a Cossack born in the village of Zimoveyskaya where, a century earlier, Stepan Razin was born, was the self-proclaimed Tsar Peter. After joining the military at age 17, Pugachev fought in the Prussian and Russo-Turkish Wars of the 1760s and was promoted to the lower officer rank of khорунжий. Soon after, Pugachev deserted the Russian military, spending several years wandering along the Don, Yaik, and Volga rivers and associating with "Old Believers" from the early Russian Orthodox Church who were said to have advised him to embrace the legend of Peter III, who was revered for his religious tolerance. Although Pugachev, an athletic, dark-faced man with a black beard, bore little physical resemblance to Peter III, Cossacks, Old Believers, serfs, and factory workers were drawn to his charismatic leadership. He gained personal popularity among non-Russian populations of the Volga steppes, who enlisted in his rebel army in large numbers. Pugachev's rebel army was comprised mostly of Tatars, Bashkirs, and Kalmyks who suffered economic deprivation and resented Catherine Claiming to be Tsar Peter III, Emilian Ivanovich Pugachev (1742–75) led the last Cossack rebellion in Russia in 1773. In what is considered by historians as the most significant peasant rebellion in Russian history, Pugachev encouraged peasants to join the revolt by promising to free serfs from their lords and redistribute the land. This engraving of him in prison is from an unknown eighteenth-century artist. (akg-images)

II's demand for mandatory conversion to Christianity. Pugachev opposed the order and, promising religious freedom, gained even greater popularity.

Pugachev's initial insurgency encountered no resistance among residents on the banks of the Yaik River, and townspeople greeted the rebels by ringing bells. At the beginning of 1773, Pugachev's army besieged Orenburg, the major population center on the Volga River in southern Russia. In October 1773 when news of the rebellion reached Saint Petersburg, Catherine appointed Major General Vasily Kar to intervene on behalf of Imperial Russia. However, Kar, primarily seeking to disperse the insurgents rather than engage them in battle, critically underestimated the size and tenacity of Pugachev's forces. As a result, Pugachev soundly defeated General Kar's expedition, and the rebellion gained unparalleled power, posing a significant threat to the stability of the Russian throne.

While Pugachev's Rebel Army consolidated power near Orenburg through March 1774, the Russian government made serious preparations to launch a new attack. The Russians dispatched an army under the command of General Alexander Bibikov, who forced Pugachev's armed detachments to lift the siege on Orenburg and retreat from the city. However, the Russian troops could not quell the uprising, which was already spilling over into nearby provinces. Following military losses, Pugachev's army rapidly recovered and by July 1774 approached Kazan, a large town at the confluence of the Volga and Kazanka rivers. The insurgents took the town after a fierce clash, but six hours later Colonel Ivan Ivanovich Mikhelson pushed them out with a large cavalry squadron of hussars. The defeat forced Pugachev to flee with a handful of Cossacks to the right bank of the Volga as Mikhelson pursued the remnants of his army with indefatigable tenacity. But it was not until late August 1774 that government troops cornered Pugachev's rebels near Tsraitsin in the Ukraine, inflicting a decisive final defeat on the rebel insurrection. While Pugachev escaped capture, he was arrested by Cossacks and turned over to the Russian authorities. On January 10, 1775, he was executed in Moscow before a large assembly of Russians.

To wipe out the memory of the rebellion, in 1775 Catherine the Great ordered Pugachev's birthplace Zimoveyskaya to be renamed Potemkinskaya, and the Yaik River henceforth was identified as the Ural River.

SEE ALSO: Bulavin's Rebellion, 1707–1708; Decembrists to the Rise of Russian Marxism; Razin's Rebellion, 1670–1671

References and Suggested Readings

- Avrich, P. (1976) Russian Rebels, 1600–1800: Four Great Rebellions Which Shook the Russian State in the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries. New York: W. W. Norton.
- Buganov, V. I. (1986) Moscow Chronicles: Popular Uprisings in the 11–18th Centuries. Moscow (in Russian).
- Gessen, S. Y. (1961–70) Peasants' War in Russia in 1773–1775: Pugachev's Rebellion, Vols. 1–3. Leningrad (in Russian).
- Peasants' Wars in Russia in the 17–18th Centuries* (1966) Moscow and Leningrad (in Russian).

Puig Antich, Salvador (1948–1974)

Yannick Beaulieu and Pedro García Guirao

Catalan anarchist Salvador Puig Antich was part of the military branch of a small revolutionary organization called the Movimento Ibérico de Liberación/Grupos autónomos de combate (Iberian Liberation Movement/Autonomous Combat Groups) (MIL/GAC). He participated in bank robberies (“expropriations”) meant to finance clandestine propaganda and support striking workers. After a series of such robberies, in September 1973 Puig Antich and comrade Xavier Garriga were ambushed by police; in the melee, Puig Antich was injured and deputy inspector Francisco Anguas Barragán was shot to death. There are still different explanations of what happened at that time; independent researchers suggest the policeman died from shots fired both by his own colleagues and by Puig Antich. Before the tribunal took place, however, the prime minister was assassinated by Basque ETA (Euzkadi Ta Askatasuna) separatists, and subsequent desire for revenge on the part of the authorities, together with a summary military trial, full of irregularities, produced two death sentences. Despite an international solidarity movement against Puig Antich's death penalty, he was executed by garrote on March 2, 1974, setting off protests and strikes in Barcelona, foreshadowing the end of the Franco dictatorship in 1975.

A 2006 biographical film, Salvador, and a 2007 decision by Spain's Supreme Court not to review Puig Antich's conviction have reopened controversy over his death and its meaning, which constitutes just part of Spain's ongoing “memory wars.”

SEE ALSO: Anarchism, Spain; Anti-Franco Worker Struggles, 1939–1975; Catalan Protests Against Centralism; ETA Liberation Front (Euzkadi ta Askatasuna) and Basque Nationalism; Spanish Revolution

References and Suggested Readings

- Anonymous (2006) The Great Swindle: “This Is Not the Tale of Salvador Puig Antich.” Bulletin of the Kate Sharpley Library 46–7: 1–2.

- Anonymous (2007) Spanish Court Rejects Appeal to Review Anarchist's Trial. Agence France Presse.
- Duhourcq, J.-C. & Madrigal, A. (2007) Mouvement Ibérique de Libération. Mémoires de rebelles. Toulouse: Editions CRAS.
- Escribano, F. (2001) Cuenta atrás: la historia de Salvador Puig Antich. Barcelona: Ediciones Península.
- Gutiérrez, J. (2004) Salvador (Puig Antich). Viento Sur 88: 124.
- Sanz, C. (2004) Reflexiones 30 años después del asesinato de Salvador Puig Antich. Solidaridad Obrera-Cuadernos de Pensamiento 3 (Winter): 1–4.
- Tajuelo, T. (1977) El Movimiento Ibérico de Liberación, Salvador Puig Antich y los Gari: Teoría y Práctica, 1969–1976. París: Ruedo Ibérico.
- Tellez Solà, A. (1994) El MIL y Puig Antich. Barcelona: Virus.

Punk movement

Stacy Warner Maddern

The punk movement cannot be relegated to just a genre of music or dismissed as simply a passing fad. Punk gave a generation an ideology that was meaningfully their own, one that represented a counterculture to the counterculture. For those who began to come of age in the dwindling era of non-violent cooperation, representative of the 1960s hippie culture, punk was fast, bizarre, and often outrageous. By the late 1960s, revolutionary changes in music were bringing Nico and the Velvet Underground, the New York Dolls, and Television to the forefront of pop culture. Iggy Pop and the Stooges began to communicate the violent contortions of a population that had been raised in a materialistic and violent society. Attitudes amongst the younger generation, mostly working class, no longer represented an interest in peaceful protest. In New York City, as the 1970s arrived, the Ramones, MC5, Television, and Patti Smith began to pave a new path and a new philosophy.

By the mid-1970s, punk found even more traction among London's working-class youth, where poor social conditions invoked feelings of anger and frustration. The movement would be further amplified by the emergence of the Sex Pistols and The Clash, whose music cranked out lyrics of hatred and despair, advocating nonconformity. Questioning existing modes of mainstream thought soon became a motivating characteristic behind punk attitude. Challenging the elements of work, sex, race, government, politics, rules, and laws that were never questioned by mainstream culture became for punks the process by which they defined themselves as different and through it created a reality that was their own.

With a staple of anti-authoritarian posture as their badge of honor, punks maintained a creed that only those inside the mainstream obeyed the dictates of authority figures. However, as they deemed themselves individualists, mainstream culture regarded them as deviant and, as such, criminal. As the Dadaists before them, punks were looked down on and regarded as crude, uneducated, and dangerous. Like Dada, punk rejected the aesthetic and structural values of mainstream culture. Punk musicians were far from classically trained, and in some respects were without any formal training at all: anyone who could play more than one chord on a guitar was probably in a punk band. They broke the societal norms of performance by vomiting on stage, spitting at the audience, and mutilating themselves with broken bottles, knives, and hooks. By the same standard their audience would likely participate by throwing blunt objects at them. The “mosh pit” below the stage where “slamdancing” or “moshing” occurred was a physically altercating style of dancing where fists and leg kicks were thrown to inflict bodily harm. These actions were not so much in the name of hatred or even violence as a means of breaking convention. A punk show was a deviation from the norm and as far away from the mainstream as one could get.

As an ideological movement, the political philosophy of punk is most closely related with anarchism. Most punk activism supports anarchist goals. While not all punks claim to be anarchists, most share a discontent with their respective government. Too often the political activism of punks is described as progressive or leftist; however, nothing could be farther from the truth as most are disenchanted with the organizational efforts of liberalism and conservatism. Their mode of protest is direct action, particularly the use of sabotage. More radical punks have been involved in gas station bombings and the destruction of animal research laboratories. Vandalism is a popular form of protest amongst punks, mostly the altering of billboards into political messages. As a group that holds materialism in disdain, punks generally deem the destruction of private property a powerful way of conveying their message without hurting people.

The punk movement has embraced several subsequent causes, such as animal rights, anti-war, and anti-globalization. On these particular stands punks generally take alternative views than what exists inside the mainstream. Punks generally do not trust elected representatives or government agencies to do anything to further their cause. For example, during protests against the 1990 Gulf War, punks were explicit in their refusal to support the troops, believing it a contradiction to support militarism in an effort to promote peace. During the “war on terror,” punks have led the anti-war movement and participated in counterrecruitment drives to keep recruiters out of the public schools. Punks insist on what they consider a do-it-yourself (DIY) philosophy, something that began in the early 1980s and continues to this day.

This is especially true on the music scene with a number of bands refusing to sign or record with companies that are immersed in corporate culture. The same applies to most punk magazines and publications maintaining a preference to operate on an independent basis. What is evident in the DIY ethic is a consistent value amongst punks to go against the grain of what is normally accepted in mainstream culture.

Increasingly, throughout the 1980s and continuing in the present, punk culture, especially the music, has drifted into a faster pace, what some may consider “hardcore.” However, what remains is a lyrical commitment to challenge the status quo. Beginning with 1970s bands like MC5 to the 1980s sounds of The Dead Kennedys, Black Flag, and Suicidal Tendencies to the present Anti-Flag, the lyrical content of punk music has grown in its message to endorse a political agenda that denounces established government. On this basis the DIY ethic applies to all things relating to change.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism, Britain; Anarchism and Sabotage; Anarchism in the United States, 1946–Present; Counterrecruitment; Dada; Latin American Punk Rock and Protest; Situationists

References and Suggested Readings

- Colegrave, S. & Sullivan, C. (2001) Punk: The Definite Record of a Revolution. London: Da Capo Press.
- Dorling Kindersley (2006) Punk: The Whole Story. London: DK Publishing.
- McNeil, L. & McCain, G. (1996) Please Kill Me: The Uncensored Oral History of Punk. New York: Penguin.
- O'Hara, C. (1999) Philosophy of Punk: More Than Noise. Oakland, CA: AK Press.
- Savage, J. (1991) England's Dreaming: Anarchy, Sex Pistols, Punk Rock and Beyond. New York: St. Martin's Press.

Q

Qaddafi, Muammar al- (b. 1942)

Benjamin P. Nickels

Colonel Muammar al-Qaddafi (variously spelled) has ruled Libya since coming to power in the September 1, 1969 coup d'état that deposed Libya's King Idris I. He retired from public office in 1979, but continues to rule under the ceremonial title "leader of the revolution."

Born to Bedouin nomads in a tent in the Sirte Desert, as Axis and Allies battled over North Africa, Qaddafi began his formal education at age nine in 1951, the year Libya attained independence under a pro-western monarchy. At age 14 Qaddafi saw his idol, Gamal Abdel Nasser (1918–1970), nationalize the Suez Canal in neighboring Egypt, and the teenager was expelled for leading anti-colonial demonstrations that same year. Qaddafi enrolled in university and military academy in 1963 and secretly organized a group of student revolutionaries. His return from studying communications in England coincided with the Arab defeat in the 1967 June War. Two years later, the 27-year-old sublieutenant announced his coup over Libyan radio. Qaddafi hoped Nasser would incorporate Libya and confront Israel after reviving Arab unity, which was lagging following the failed Egypt–Syria merger as the United Arab Republic (1958–61). The ascent of Qaddafi heralded a regional trend toward durable nationalist dictators, with Syria's Hafiz al-Asad and Iraq's Saddam Hussein emerging soon after.

Qaddafi banished foreign residents, closed foreign military bases, and nationalized foreign assets before Nasser's 1970 death, which initiated the decline of Arab nationalism. As Arab unity projects degenerated into minor wars and subversive intrigues, Qaddafi advocated for his unique Islamic Jamahiriyah ("state of the masses"), which included popular authority through people's congresses, socialism funded by petrol profits, and social harmony via a "Third Universal Theory" (neither western capitalism nor eastern communism). He laid out this revolutionary political philosophy in The Green Book (1975). The title's allusions to Islam (green) and China (Mao Zedong's 1966 Little Red Book) symbolize the decision to trade Arabism for a wide-ranging neo-Third Worldism, and throughout the 1980s Qaddafi supported resistance to western governments in far-flung Ireland, Palestine, the Philippines, South Africa, Nicaragua, and Argentina. Qaddafi increased internal repression as western powers combined covert plots with overt attacks, notably the US's 1982 trade embargo and 1986 air strike assassination attempt that killed Qaddafi's adopted daughter. In 1992 the UN imposed sanctions because Qaddafi sheltered suspects from the 1988 airline bombing over Lockerbie, Scotland.

Diplomatically isolated, economically crippled, and domestically challenged by Islamist rivals, Libya recently swung toward conciliation, with an aging Qaddafi surrendering the Lockerbie suspects in 1999 (and compensating Lockerbie families), cooperating in the US-led War on Terror since 2001, renouncing terrorism, and abandoning weapons of mass destruction (WMDs) in 2003 once the Iraq War began. In 2003 the UN lifted sanctions and the US began progressively normalizing relations.

SEE ALSO: Egypt and Arab Socialism; Nasser, Gamal Abdel (1918–1970); Mao Zedong (1893–1976)

References and Suggested Readings

- El-Kikhia, M. (1997) Libya's Qaddafi: The Politics of Contradiction. Gainesville: University of Florida Press.
- Gadafi, M. & Jouve, E. (2005) My Vision: Conversations and Frank Exchanges of Views with Edmond Jouve. London: John Blake.
- Tremlett, G. (1993) Gadafi: The Desert Mystic. New York: Carroll & Graf.

Qin Bangxian (1907–1946)

Alexander V. Pantsov

Qin Bangxian was an important early leader of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP). He was born on June 24, 1907 in the city of Wuxi, Jiangsu. He studied at the Suzhou Special Industrial School and was chairman of the Suzhou student union. In 1925 he was one of the publishers of the patriotic magazine Wuxi pinglun (Wuxi Review). That same year he joined the CCP.

In December 1926 Qin went to Moscow to study at Sun Yat-Sen University of the Toilers of China (UTK). He graduated in the fall of 1930 and in December returned to China where he became head of the Communist Youth League of China (CCYL) Propaganda Department. In April 1931 Qin Bangxian was concurrently appointed as CCYL secretary. In September he was recruited into the party's Central Committee (CCP CC) and became a member and executive head of the CCP CC Provisional Politburo. In January 1934 Qin was elected general secretary of the CCP CC. The next month he was elected to membership on the Second Central Executive Committee (CEC) of the Chinese Soviet Republic and to the Presidium of the Soviet Government. During the Long March he was blamed for the Communist defeat in Eastern China, and in February 1935 he was forced to yield his post to Zhang Wentian.

At the Seventh World Congress of the Comintern in August 1935, Qin Bangxian was elected in absentia as an alternate member of the Comintern's Executive Committee (ECCI). In December 1936 he was appointed head of the Organization Department of the CCP CC. In August 1937 he became secretary of the CCP CC's Southern Bureau, and in December of that year he was appointed head of the Organization Department of the newly organized Changjiang (Yangzi) Bureau. In 1941 he was transferred to the CCP CC headquarters in Yan'an to lead the editorial board and the publishing house of the CCP CC newspaper Jiefang ribao (Liberation Daily) and the information agency Xinhua (New China).

In May 1945 Qin was elected a full member of the CCP CC. He participated in peace negotiations with Chiang Kai-Shek's Guomindang forces in February 1946 in Chongqing. Returning to Yan'an by plane, he was killed in an air crash in Shaanxi on April 8, 1946.

SEE ALSO: China, Maoism and Popular Power, 1949–1969; China, May 4th Movement; Mao Zedong (1893–1976); Sun Yat-Sen (1866–1925); Zhang Wentian (1900–1976)

References and Suggested Readings

Deng Liqun (Ed.) (1994) Zhonggong dangshi renmu zhuan (Biographies of the Chinese Communist Party History Activists), Vol. 53. Xian: Shanxi renmin chubanshe.

Pantsov, A. (1982) The Life Given to the Struggle for Freedom: On the Seventy-Fifth Anniversary of the Birth of Bo Gu. Problemy Dal'nego Vostoka (Far Eastern Affairs) 4: 35–8.

Qiu Jin (1875–1907)

J. Megan Greene

Qiu Jin is the best-known woman revolutionary of the late Qing period in China. The last several decades of the Qing, from the 1870s to 1911, were a period in which China's weakness vis-à-vis foreign powers became increasingly evident, and in response many young Chinese began looking for ways to strengthen the nation. Born in 1875 in Fujian province, Qiu Jin grew up during this tumultuous time in Zhejiang province, not far from the growing cosmopolitan city of Shanghai. She was married young in an arranged marriage and had two children, but in 1904, having, like many other young Chinese, developed a strong feeling of Chinese nationalism in response to the Boxer Uprising, she abandoned her husband and children and traveled to Japan to study.

In Japan, Qiu Jin enrolled in the Practical Women's School, a vocational school for girls with a curriculum that was especially designed to serve Chinese women students. There she was educated in practical domestic virtues and given basic instruction in pedagogy so that she would be equipped to teach upon her return to China. At the same time, like many of her peers, she interacted with other young revolutionary-minded Chinese students and became a political and feminist activist. She wrote numerous speeches and essays that were critical of the Chinese practices of foot binding, arranged marriage, and the cult of chaste widowhood. She also developed her skills as a public speaker and in 1904 founded a public speaking training society in Tokyo. In that same year she became the head of the Humanitarian Association for Practical Action, a society that called upon Chinese women to travel to Japan to study and become involved in anti-Qing revolutionary activities. While in Japan, Qiu Jin also developed the habit of dressing in men's clothing, learned how to make bombs, and established contacts with Sun Yat-sen's anti-Qing political group, the Revolutionary Alliance (Tongmenghui).

Qiu Jin returned to China in 1906 to teach Japanese language, hygiene, and science at the Xunqi Girls' School in Zhejiang province, one of a small number of new girls' schools that had been established in the previous few years. In Shanghai she helped to found the women's magazine Chinese Women's Journal (Zhongguo nu bao), which sought to unite women on behalf of the feminist cause. She felt that an essential step toward the construction of a strong China was the liberation of women, and the journal was dedicated to this end. As men had failed to lead the nation well, women, Qiu Jin argued, should take over that leading role and guide China toward a better future. In 1907 she took further steps toward the goal of preparing young women for this new role by founding her own physical education school for girls. In July of that same year, however, she attempted to start an uprising against the Manchu Qing Dynasty, for which she was rapidly arrested and beheaded.

SEE ALSO: China, Protest and Revolution, 1800–1911; Yi Ho Tuan (Boxer) Rebellion

References and Suggested Readings

Judge, J. (2001) Talent, Virtue, and the Nation: Chinese Nationalisms and Female Subjectivities in the Early Twentieth Century. American Historical Review 106, 3 (June): 765–803.

Qu Qiubai (1899–1935)

Alexander V. Pantsov

Qu Qiubai, whose real name was Qu Shuang, was one of the most prominent leaders of the first generation of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP). Qu was born in the town of Changzhou, Jiangsu Province, on June 18, 1899. In 1916 he entered a special Russian-language school in Beijing. He soon became a cofounder of the patriotic magazines Xin shehui (New Society) and Rendao (Human Path). He went to Moscow in January 1921 as a correspondent for the Beijing newspaper Chenbao (Morning), and in that capacity attended the Third World Congress of the Comintern in June–July 1921.

While in Moscow Qu enrolled in the Communist University of the Toilers of the East (KUTV) and served as a student-translator and an assistant in the Social Studies Department. He joined the CCP in Moscow in 1922. In November–December of that year he attended the Fourth World Congress of the Comintern as an interpreter for the Chinese delegation. He returned to China in the spring of 1923. In June 1923 he attended the Third CCP Congress in Canton and afterwards became editor-in-chief of the CCP Central Executive Committee (CEC) magazine Xin qingnian (New Youth) and a new journal, Qianfeng (Vanguard). Beginning in January 1925 he was a member of the Central Committee of the CCP (CCP CC). He was one of the organizers of the labor movement in Shanghai, and in 1925 he founded the CCP CC newspaper Rexue ribao (Hot Blood Daily). In April 1927 he became head of the Propaganda Department of the CCP CC. In May 1927 he was elected to the CCP CC's Politburo.

After the Communist defeat by Chiang Kai-shek's Guomindang forces in 1927, Qu Qiubai was elected head of the CCP CC Provisional Politburo at the August 7th Party Leadership Conference. At the same time he served as head of the CCP CC Propaganda Department, secretary of the Peasant Movement Committee, and editor-in-chief of the CCP CC magazine Buersaiweike (The Bolshevik). In June 1928 he went to Moscow for the second time to attend the Sixth Congress of the CCP at which he was reelected to the Politburo. He remained in Moscow after the congress as head of the newly organized CCP delegation to the Executive Committee of the Comintern (ECCI), and he represented the CCP in the ECCI along with Zhang Guotao. In July–September 1928 he attended the Sixth World Congress of the Comintern with full voting rights, and served as a member of the Program Commission. He was elected to the congress Presidium and also to the ECCI. The ECCI Plenum in turn elevated him to membership on the ECCI Presidium. On September 3, 1928 he was also elected full member of the Political Secretariat of the Comintern – the first Chinese to join this highest organ of the world communist movement. In July 1929 he attended the Tenth Plenum of the ECCI and was again elected to the Presidium of the Plenum. Between 1928 and 1930 he also taught at the International Lenin School (MLSh) and the Communist University of the Toilers of China (KUTK). In the beginning of 1929 he became a member of the editorial board of Problemy Kitaya (Problems of China), a publication of the Institute on China at KUTK.

In May 1929 Qu Qiubai took part in the discussion on so-called Chen Duxiuism organized by the Comintern (Chen Duxiu had begun to reflect Leon Trotsky's criticisms of Stalin's positions with regard to China). In the fall of 1929 along with Huang Li, Qu visited Paris, where he attended a Congress of the Anti-Imperialist League. The next summer he traveled to Berlin and participated in a demonstration by unemployed Berliners. During his stay in the Soviet Union he actively participated in the process of exposing and severely repressing the clandestine Chinese Trotskyist organization within the Soviet international schools. He also supported Stalin's position in the struggle against Bukharin's line. In this connection, he closely cooperated with Stalin's secret police and the International Control Commission of the Comintern.

At the same time he became involved in the factional battles at Sun Yat-Sen University where one group of Chinese students struggled against the dictatorial leadership that Wang Ming, supported by the university rector Pavel Mif, exercised over the student community. Along with most other members of the CCP delegation to the ECCI, Qu Qiubai backed the students opposed to Wang Ming. In late 1929 and early 1930, during the ECCI purge of foreign communists resident in the Soviet Union, Pavel Mif accused Qu of being a "supporter" of the Trotskyists. A meeting of the CCP delegation to the ECCI took place in the spring of 1930 during which the ECCI technical secretary Bodzinsky accused Qu Qiubai of supporting Liu Renjing's plan to visit the exiled Leon Trotsky at Prinkipo in Turkey. In the spring of 1930 the ECCI Political Secretariat adopted a secret resolution concerning the "mistakes" of the CCP delegation, as a result of which Qu was removed from his position as delegation head. In July he participated in the Comintern discussion on the Chinese question that focused on the extreme-leftist "Li Lisan line."

In the summer of 1930, along with Zhou Enlai, he returned to China and led the Third Plenum of the CCP CC in exposing Li Lisan's "mistakes." This plenum ended in a compromise that balanced criticism of Li Lisan with the latter's promotion to full membership on the Politburo. In December 1930 the ECCI Presidium severely criticized Qu Qiubai for "collaborationism." In the beginning of 1931 he was removed from the Comintern Political Secretariat and replaced by Huang Ping. In February 1931, following the Fourth Plenum of the CCP CC that promoted Wang Ming to the leading party position, Qu was criticized in a CCP resolution concerning the activity of the CCP delegation to the ECCI, and removed from the CCP CC Politburo. Shortly after that, on March 25, Qu was dismissed from the Presidium of the Communist International. Nonetheless, he remained a member of the ECCI until his death.

Between 1931 and 1933 Qu worked in the left-wing Writers' Association. While in Shanghai in November 1931 he was elected in absentia to membership in the First CEC of the Chinese Soviet Republic and appointed People's Commissar of Popular Education. In 1933, as leftists in Shanghai were targeted by the White Terror, he moved to the Central Soviet Region. After the beginning of the Long March in October 1934 he remained in Eastern China as one of the leaders of the local communist movement. In February 1935 he was taken prisoner by the Guomindang and executed shortly thereafter.

SEE ALSO: China, Maoism and Popular Power, 1949–1969; Chinese Nationalist Revolution, 1911; Sun Yat-Sen (1866–1925)

References and Suggested Readings

- Xiang Qing (1985) Gongchan goji yu Zhongguo geming guanxi lunwenji (Collection of Articles on the Relationship between the Comintern and the Chinese Revolution). Shanghai: Shanghai renmin chubanshe.
- Pantsov, A. (1994) From Students to Dissidents: The Chinese Trotskyists in Soviet Russia (Part 1). Issues & Studies 3: 113.
- Yu Jundao (1986) Zhongguo gemingzhongde gongchan guoji renmu (Comintern Activists in the Chinese Revolution). Chengdu: Sichuan chubanshe.

Québécois nationalism and Lévesque, René (1922–1987)

Bryan D. Palmer

Quebec, Canada's French-speaking, largely Catholic province, had not, in the long post-Confederation history of the country, exhibited much in the way of revolutionary ferment. It harbored radicals, of course, among them members of the Communist Party of Canada and the social democratic Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. Anarchists were as evident in Montreal as they were in other metropolitan Canadian centers, but they were by no means a major political force. The province had long been governed by fairly conventional and often quite conservative political forces; Maurice Duplessis and his Union Nationale Party in the 1930s and 1940s are indicative of the ways in which the Quebec state, aligned with the clergy, brokered an arrangement within Canadian federalism. This ceded to the Ottawa-based centralized federal government the power to charter national economic policy, while the local Quebec state controlled the hegemonic institutions of everyday life, among them those bodies that ordered educational, legal, cultural, and religious activities. As a consequence Quebec remained, into the 1950s, a bastion of traditionalism, with church and state linked and the influence of the countryside and its parishes evident in ways that would have seemed quite antiquated elsewhere in Canada.

Quiet Revolution

This began to change in the late 1940s and 1950s as Quebec experienced a wave of secularization. An opening salvo in what would come to be known as the Quiet Revolution was fired in 1949 at a strike in the mining community of Asbestos. Trade unionists, an emerging reform-minded intelligentsia, and journalists came together to oppose Duplessis's anti-labor regime and corporations whose bosses spoke English but whose language of the workplace was overwhelmingly French. Among those who championed the civil rights of the Asbestos workers was a young Pierre Elliott Trudeau. Like others who cut their teeth on the 1949 picket lines, Trudeau found himself in Montreal in the 1950s, where he espoused reform in a journal named Cité Libre. By the end of the decade those clamoring for change were in a position to unleash the forces of modernization in Quebec. They were given their opportunity in 1959–60 as Duplessis's death left his old party, the Union Nationale, demoralized and Jean Lesage's Liberals swept to an electoral victory. The resulting years of 1960–5 rattapage, or catching up, saw Quebec leapfrog ahead of the rest of Canada in its spending on education, health, and welfare, and the nationalization of key economic sectors, which led to the creation of "crown corporations" such as Hydro-Quebec.

The Quiet Revolution restructured Quebec's political economy, but it also opened the floodgates of increasingly radical social criticism. French-speaking residents of the province, known as Québécois, had lived for generations within Canada as an oppressed nation. That oppression registered in many ways: franco-phones controlled less than 20 percent of Quebec's economy; with 27 percent of Canada's population, the predominantly French province nevertheless had 40 percent of the nation's unemployed; French Quebecers' average income was 35 percent lower than that of English-speaking Canadians; in terms of ethnic groups and their annual income, Québécois ranked 12th of 14 identifiable categories, with only Native peoples and Italian Canadians poorer. Rural poverty was widespread, while in urban settings such as Montreal as many as one-third of families lived in dwellings that lacked basic necessities, many of them judged uninhabitable. It was for all of these reasons that Pierre Vallières entitled his manifesto of Québécois revolutionary nationalism, published in French and English in 1968, White Niggers of America.

To be sure the Quiet Revolution alleviated much of the economic malaise that had been suffocating French Canada for decades. In doing so it perhaps encouraged rising expectations among the poor. And no longer were they so rigidly constrained by the Catholic Church which, while it survived as the major religious influence within Quebec, certainly lost much of its authority among the masses of poor and working-class Québécois. The result was that the push for a revolutionary nationalism soon challenged the reform-oriented forces led by Trudeau, who championed taking the ideas of the Quiet Revolution out of Quebec and translating them into the corridors of federal power, where the Liberal Party afforded non-nationalist francophones a platform to promote a new accord between Quebec and Ottawa based on bilingualism and multiculturalism. Trudeau's success, which would see him catapult into national prominence in the 1965–8 years, winning election to Parliament, becoming the minister of justice, and then riding the wave of Trudeaumania into the prime minister's office, would be countered by a revolutionary nationalist movement in Quebec that argued for national independence and socialism. This latter mobilization, vehemently opposed by Trudeau and many in English Canada and Quebec, would culminate in the terrorism of the Front de Libération du Québec (FLQ). Always a subterranean, clandestine body of discrete cells, the FLQ, as much myth as it was substantive political organization, nevertheless galvanized thousands and by the late 1960s was as well known in global revolutionary circles as the Irish Republican Army or the Black Panther Party, both of which provided it with inspiration.

Founder of the Parti Québécois and the province's twenty-third premier, René Lévesque is known for his efforts to help secure Quebec's autonomy and independence from Canada. Here he addresses supporters on October 29, 1973, provincial election night, at the Paul Sauvé arena. (Duncan Cameron/Library and Archives Canada/PA-115039)

Rise of Québécois Separatism

By the early 1960s radical views on the Quiet Revolution's limitations were surfacing among discontented Québécois. Socialists such as the poet Gaston Miron and the ex-Communist Party editor of La Revue Socialiste, Raoul Roy, began promoting the necessity of Quebec achieving independence and socialism at the same time. Bodies such as the Rassemblement pour l'Indépendance Nationale (RIN) publicly endorsed what now came to be known as separatism, while smaller, more radical organizations such as Action Socialiste provided a milieu for a small, if growing, corps of revolutionaries. The growing anti-colonialist movement of these years, which resonated directly in Quebec through coverage of the Algerian struggle for independence, meant that francophone militants read the works of Frantz Fanon and compared their own situations to those of national liberation advocates in Asia, Africa, Latin America, and parts of Europe, such as the Basque country. They also studied Quebec's history, regarding the Patriot rebellions of 1837–8, waged against British colonial domination, as particularly worthy of emulation.

It was in this climate that a secret underground of FLQ cells formed in 1962–3. Recruits to the cause were, for the most part, young males in their twenties, but one of the leading figures was a Belgian, Georges Schoeters, who, as a teenager, had joined the anti-Nazi resistance. These clandestine groups regarded the RIN as the legal, above-ground movement, but saw the FLQ as a direct-action wing of independence agitators. They planted explosive devices at various symbolic sites of Quebec's subordination to English Canada, including military recruiting centers, large Anglo-capitalist enterprises being struck by workers, federal tax buildings, mailboxes in the well-to-do English neighborhood of Westmount, and historical monuments commemorating the English presence in French Canada. One such bombing resulted in the accidental death of a night watchman, Vincent Wilfrid O'Neill, and it led to a vigorous police repression. Exposed by an informant, the FLQ cells were soon raided and 23 arrests resulted in 11 independence advocates receiving jail time totaling 68 years.

New recruits to the cause of the FLQ soon reproduced the underground cells. This time they formed an army of liberation, established training camps, and put out a propaganda bulletin entitled The Axe. Supplementing such developments was the rise of a legal cultural publication, Parti Pris, that, although not affiliated with the FLQ, was defiant in its promotion of independence, socialism, and secularism.

First published in 1963, and edited by Pierre Matheu, this left-wing monthly was soon complemented by Revolution Québécois, which united a new corps of revolutionary advocates drawn from a fragmenting milieu of left political organizations that included communists, Trotskyists, and social democrats. Developments like this, in conjunction with major strikes at mainstream newspapers such as Montreal's La Presse, brought figures such as Vallières and his close friend and political ally Charles Gagnon into the movement for revolutionary independence. By 1965, with the repression of the revolutionary ranks by the police ongoing (the offices of Revolution Québécois were raided in June and Vallières was fired from his job at La Presse), Vallières and Gagnon had joined the FLQ underground and were writing for The Axe.

As the FLQ underground developed ties with the Black Power movement in the United States, and as the general climate of protest in Quebec heated up with anti-Vietnam War mobilizations and interest in youth radicalization (evident in the growth of Students for a Democratic Society), countersubversive forces on both sides of the 49th parallel linked the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and municipal anti-terrorist squads together in targeting the rising revolutionary nationalist forces in Quebec. With preparations for Expo '67, a World's Fair that coincided with the Canadian Centennial, the FLQ, increasingly influenced by Vallières and Gagnon, directed much of its oppositional violence at work sites immobilized by strikes. Bombs exploded at the Montreal Lagrenade shoe factory, at the Dominion Textile plant in Drummondville, and during strikes of construction workers and longshoremen. In the spring and summer of 1966 two deaths resulted, as a 64-year-old secretary at the Lagrenade factory, Thérèse Morin, and a young Felquiste courier, Jean Corbo, were fatally injured by FLQ explosives. As the police moved decisively against the FLQ underground, charging Vallières and Gagnon in the Morin and Corbo deaths, the clandestine movement was clearly under siege. Arrests abounded, with Vallières and Gagnon evading the dragnet and surfacing in New York City, where they protested the political repression in Quebec by launching a hunger strike and picketing the United Nations. After an interview with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation the duo were promptly arrested by New York police and transported to the Manhattan House of Detention, colloquially known as the Tombs.

It was there that Vallières wrote White Niggers of America, an inflammatory Molotov cocktail of a book that was part autobiography, part manifesto, part lament, part history, and part philosophy. Published in French and English, as well as in other languages in West Germany, Italy, and Mexico, the book made the case for Quebec's independence, not by arguing that Québécois society was different, but by suggesting that it was impaled on the same capitalist contradictions that produced exploitation and oppression everywhere in the modern world. Demanding the overthrow of the established order, Vallières posed the issue of the organization of the oppressed in terms that extolled the virtues of revolutionary violence. No party, no union, no technology, and no program could free Quebec's workers and oppressed masses. Rather, White Niggers of America promoted the view that "Revolutionaries . . . organize the people's violence into a conscious and independent force."

Such views sealed the defeat of the FLQ. They also insured that Vallières and Gagnon would find the justice meted out to them in 1967–8 rather rough. Successful in their legal battle to avoid extradition, the two prominent Felquistes were released from the Tombs in mid-January, after having been confined for almost four months. No sooner were they freed, however, than United States Immigration officials illegally kidnapped them, put the dissident duo on a plane to Montreal, and delivered the two into the hands of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Slapped in handcuffs, Vallières and Gagnon were hauled before a judge on charges of murder, bombing attacks, and hold-ups. They would each spend more than three years in jail before they were eventually acquitted.

The FLQ seemed, predictably, demoralized by these developments, and the underground appeared to be in a state of collapse. The Axe no longer published, and radicals in all walks of life found their movements monitored by a wide-ranging network of spies and informers; such meetings and clandestine cells that remained were constantly on guard against the presence of agents provocateurs.

Yet the powerful idea of the FLQ could not quite be killed. A committee to defend Vallières and Gagnon was formed. Charles de Gaulle's-cry of “Vive le Québec Libre!” seemed to resonate in more and more Québécois ears. By May of 1968, with the world erupting in youthful revolt, Québec seemed to be flowing with the global historic tide of left insurgency. As a more mainstream sovereigntist movement emerged, led by former Liberal Party figures such as René Lévesque, revolutionary nationalist groups and organizations mushroomed. Trade unions in Quebec moved decidedly to the left, embracing anti-imperialist opposition to the Vietnam War and calling for a broad coalition of revolutionary forces to unite in struggle to overcome racism, poverty, and exploitation. A militant Mouvement de libération du taxi, founded in September 1968, was immediately precipitated into a violent confrontation with the Murray Hill Company, which monopolized transporting passengers to the Montreal airport. Thousands demonstrated, 250 cabs surrounded one airport and brought traffic to a snarling stop, and a bus was destroyed. A year later, Murray Hill was assailed again, with Molotov cocktails tossed under buses, gunshots fired, and vehicles seized and driven into concrete walls. When the smoke cleared, an undercover police officer lay dead. Students at universities and colleges linked arms with striking workers and underground Felquistes. Arrests of course continued. A November 1968 Hemispheric Conference to End the War in Vietnam attracted 2,000 militantly anti-war activists to Montreal, and delegates from the Vietnamese National Liberation Front, the Latin American Solidarity Organization, the Black Panther Party, the Cuban government of Fidel Castro, and the Palestinian Resistance movement linked arms with Quebec’s increasingly radical indépendantiste advocates. After a dramatic bombing of the Montreal Stock Exchange in February 1969 that injured 30 people and caused over a million dollars in property damage, Pierre-Paul Geoffroy was charged with 129 criminal counts relating to 31 separate explosions; he received an extraordinarily punitive 124 life sentences. “Terrorists didn’t create violence,” thundered a fiery leader of Montreal’s Central Council of National Trade Unions (CNTU), Michel Chartand, “it created them. . . . We must destroy the capitalist system and reorganize the economy to meet the needs of the people.” Chartand called for a united front of all “demonstrators, protestors, and revolutionaries whose aims are the same as ours.”

By 1969, Montreal’s two English-speaking universities, Sir George Williams and McGill, faced unprecedented student uprisings. At Sir George Williams racism was the match that lit protest conflagration, with black students occupying the university computer center. When police barricaded doors and looked to be preparing an assault on the sit-in, the students trashed the space and tossed computer files out of the windows. McGill, a bastion of anglophone power in Montreal, was rocked by a movement to make the institution French-speaking. Stan Gray, a leader of McGill Français, was eventually fired from his teaching post. He soon occupied a post of prominence in the Front du libération populaire, developing ties to the Black Panthers and cultivating revolutionary ideas in proletarian neighborhoods such as St. Henri, where a radical newspaper, Worker’s Power, circulated widely.

Once again secret collectives of FLQ advocates formed. Some cells bankrolled their activities by robberies. At the Université du Québec à Montréal, an FLQ communications nucleus gathered around a 25-year-old professor, Robert Comeau. A common front of workers was advocated, urged to wage terror against “the violence of the existing system.” Countering the mild social democratic politics of Lévesque’s Parti Québécois, these underground forces demanded both socialism and national liberation. Workers under attack were “supported” with bombs. The Lapalme mail truck drivers who lost their jobs because of the federal government’s restructuring of work relations in the postal sector were particularly favored as symbols of the exploitation of the working class and the oppression of the French-speaking. It was in this period and context that the FLQ underground, aware of how kidnappings were increasingly utilized as a means of protest in Latin America and Europe, began to advocate hostage-taking as a way of pressuring the state to release political prisoners. All told, there were not likely more than 50 Felquistes underground, but their support networks and those advocating their cause encompassed thousands.

October Crisis

Late in the summer of 1970 an underground FLQ cell headed by Paul Rose and Jacques Lanctôt fractured in two over disagreement about the need to launch an aggressive new initiative. Lanctôt pressed for immediate action, and he and his allies concocted Operation Libération, which would culminate in the October 5, 1970 kidnapping of James Richard Cross, the commercial attachée on the staff of the British high commissioner. The Cross kidnapping, the first of its kind in North America, was followed by the public release of an FLQ manifesto. It demanded the release of 23 political prisoners, the rehiring of les gars de Lapalme, air transport of the kidnapers to Cuba, and a $500,000 tax to be used to aid Quebec's struggle for national liberation. Further, all Québécois "terrorized slaves" were called on to join "the Quebec Revolution."

Governing authority in the municipality of Montreal, the province of Quebec, and the seat of federal power in Ottawa was never decisively of one mind as to how to respond to the Cross kidnapping. Trudeau maintained an absolute refusal to concede anything to the FLQ members engaged in hostage-taking except safe passage to another country. This spurred Paul Rose, his brother Jacques, and others in what was now known as the Chernier cell to target Pierre Laporte, acting premier of Quebec and a cabinet minister. He was seized outside his home on October 10, 1970, and the promise was made that he would be executed if the Libération cell's prior demands were not met.

At this point two counterposed developments unfolded. First, the state, led by Trudeau but backed by Montreal Mayor Jean Drapeau's Combined Anti-Terrorist Squad, dug in its heels of refusal to countenance kidnapping and political blackmail. Second, the silent forces of sympathy for the FLQ were galvanized by the realization that however repugnant the acts of the underground, commitment to making Quebec an independent state unquestionably demanded support. Thousands rallied to the banner of the FLQ. Three thousand people crammed the Paul Sauvé Arena to hear Vallières and Gagnon, now out of jail; Michel Chartrand and FLQ lawyer-negotiator Robert Lemieux there defended socialist independence and denounced the state of siege marshaled by governing authority. As Vallières captured the growing mythology of the FLQ by thundering from the podium, "The FLQ is each of you. It is every Québécois who stands up," the crowd chanted in unison, "FLQ! FLQ! FLQ!"

All of this changed at 4:00 a.m. on the morning of October 16, 1970. Trudeau's governing Liberal Party, with support from a broad array of political quarters (as well as staunch opposition), proclaimed the War Measures Act, a World War I-era bylaw that permitted the government to arrest and search people without a warrant, and to detain such suspects for up to 21 days without providing any reason. The War Measures Act thus suspended the Canadian Declaration of Rights and Freedoms and dispensed with the legal rights of Canada's citizens. This was done, ostensibly, because Canada and Quebec were in a state of "apprehended insurrection." Within hours of the declaration of the War Measures Act, some 500 individuals were rounded up, and 31,000 searches were conducted by police forces and the army, almost 5,000 of which ended in the seizure of property of some kind. Vallières and Gagnon, of course, were among the incarcerated.

As the state upped the ante, so too did the FLQ with tragic consequences. Laporte's body was found one week after his kidnapping, strangled and stuffed in the trunk of an abandoned car near an air base. The politician's death, one week after his kidnapping and one day after the proclamation of the War Measures Act, sealed the fate of the FLQ. General condemnation ensued, sympathy for the underground cause waned, and advocates of law and order gained the upper hand. The tone of political and sociocultural life in Quebec changed as the mythology of the FLQ succumbed, and the cause of socialism and national independence was collapsed into the more moderate sovereignty association campaigns of Lévesque and the Parti Québécois. The 1960s, a decade of tumultuous and creatively challenging dissent, wound down as Quebec, and those who demanded its independence, entered a new decade.

In the aftermath of Laporte's execution, James Cross was eventually released after spending 59 days as an FLQ hostage. His captors were allowed to flee to Cuba. Paul and Jacques Rose, along with almost twenty others, received prison sentences ranging from six months to life. Agents provocateurs now riddled the FLQ underground. The War Measures Act, and a subsequent piece of public order legislation, hung over Quebec and Canada until the end of April 1971. Once-implacable advocates of the FLQ's program of revolutionary violence, such as Pierre Vallières, packed up their incendiary politics and traded them in for advocacy of the Parti Québécois.

Gagnon went on to play a leadership role in a Quebec Maoist grouping, continuing his commitment to a revolutionary transformation of society.

Something of the politics of challenge survived into the 1970s, however, as Quebec became in the period 1971–2 a center of syndicalist, working-class upheaval in North America. A momentous 1971 strike at the newspaper La Presse culminated in a 15,000-strong rally that was attacked by Drapeau's police. Hundreds were injured and a young female student, Michele Gauthier, killed. A Common Front of Quebec unionists organized in the CNTU, the Quebec Teachers Corporation, and the Quebec Federation of Labor, jelled over the winter months of 1972. A General Strike of public sector workers galvanized the province in March–April–May 1972. With the forces of state repression in high gear, union leaders were faced with injunctions, fines, and other forms of intimidation and discipline. Legislation was passed that ultimately broke the back of the workers' revolt, and three militant workers' leaders were jailed. Yet before the uprising had been quelled, workers had occupied factories and hospitals, seized community radio stations, blockaded roads, and produced a series of manifestos advocating socialism and independence.

Quebec's Quiet Revolution, in the making since the 1940s and before, thus gave way, in the 1960s, to not-so-quiet demands for revolutionary change. Revolutionary terrorism proved a resilient, but ineffective, vehicle of socialist and nationalist aspiration in the years from 1963 to 1970. Its inability to mobilize a mass movement in support of the socioeconomic transformation of Quebec notwithstanding, the FLQ nevertheless for a time captured the imaginations and support of thousands of Québécois. The values they espoused took new forms in the aftermath of 1970, but they continue to this day to be raised anew in struggles for equality, social justice, and political change.

SEE ALSO: Canada, Law and Public Protest: History; Canada, Rebellion of 1837–1838; World Trade Organization (WTO) Protests, Quebec City, 2001

References and Suggested Readings

- Bergeron, L. (1971) The History of Quebec: A Patriote's Handbook. Toronto: NC Press.
- Black Rose Collective (1972) Quebec Labour: The Confederation of National Trade Unions Yesterday and Today. Montreal: Black Rose.

- Cardin, J. F. (1990) Comprendre Octobre 1970: Le FLQ, La Crise et Le Syndicalisme. Montréal: Meridien.
- Chodos, R. & Auf der Maur, N. (Eds.) (1972) Quebec; A Chronicle, 1968–1972. Toronto: James Lewis & Samuel.
- Coleman, W. (1984) The Independence Movement in Quebec, 1945–1980. Toronto: University of Toronto Press.
- Drache, D. (Ed.) (1972) Quebec: Only the Beginning – The Manifestoes of the Common Front. Toronto: New Press.
- Fournier, L. (1984) FLQ: The Anatomy of an Underground Movement. Toronto: NC Press.
- Godin, P. (1991a) La Fin de la grande noirceur: la révolution tranquille, Vol. 1. Montréal: Boréal.
- Godin, P. (1991b) La Difficile recherche de l'égalité: la révolution tranquille, Vol. 2. Montréal: Boréal.
- Hodgins Milner, S. & Milner, H. (1973) The Decolonization of Quebec: An Analysis of Left-Wing Nationalism. Toronto: McClelland & Stewart.
- Morf, G. (1970) Terror in Quebec: Case Studies of the FLQ. Toronto: Clarke, Irwin.
- Reid, M. (1972) The Shouting Signpainters: A Literary and Political Account of Quebec Revolutionary Nationalism. Toronto: McClelland & Stewart.
- Roussopoulos, D. (Ed.) (1974) Quebec and Radical Social Change. Montreal: Black Rose Books.
- Savoie, C. (1963) La véritable histoire due FLQ. Montréal: Editions du Jour.
- Smith, B. (1963) Les résistants du FLQ. Montréal: Les Editions Actualité.
- Trudeau, P. E. (Ed.) (1956) La Grève d'amiante. Montréal: Editions Cité Libre.
- Trudeau, P. E. (1968) Federalism and the French Canadians. Toronto: Macmillan.
- Vallières, P. (1971) White Niggers of America. Toronto: McClelland & Stewart.
- Vallières, P. (1977) The Assassination of Pierre Laporte: Behind the October '70 Scenario. Toronto: James Lorimer.
- de Vault, C. & Johnson, W. (1982) The Informer: Confessions of an Ex Terrorist. Toronto: Fleet Books.

Queen Nanny and Maroon resistance

Joshua Kwesi Aikins

Queen Nanny (birth unknown, died post-1741) was the political and military leader of the Windward Maroons in Jamaica, a group of runaway enslaved Africans who fled the plantations and established independent communities, modeled on West African polities, in Jamaica's mountainous interior. Their relentless 85-year-long resistance could not be crushed by the British Empire, which eventually signed peace treaties with them. Jamaican Maroon communities have retained an autonomous status as well as their unique cultural identity to this day.

Nanny of the Maroons (also called Granny Nanny or Queen Nanny) and her brothers Johnny, Kojo (sometimes spelled in its anglicized version Cudjoe) Accompong, Cuffy, and Quao were themselves enslaved Africans who were able to flee from the plantation and decided to found and lead different Maroon communities. Their origin is made evident through their names, which are common in the Twi language, itself part of the larger Akan group of languages and cultures which are shared by different peoples in what is today Ghana. People of Asante and Fante origin were enslaved and gathered in a coastal town called Koromantee before being deported to the Caribbean. In Jamaica the term “Koromantee” to this day denotes both the culture and language of Maroon communities, who were able to keep and defend much of their Akan heritage.

Almost all Jamaican slave rebellions from 1650 to 1830 had leaders of Akan descent. They gained such notoriety that the French banned slaves of Akan origin from their colonies in the Caribbean. Akan culture thus provided a very effective basis for Maroons in organizing sustained resistance, and as a matrilineal culture it also conferred authority on women. The political and military system Queen Nanny presided over was fashioned after the Akan political system, in which a queen mother played a crucial role as female co-leader who, together with her male counterpart, exercised joint authority and responsibility in all state affairs. This dual line of authority was accentuated by the fact that queen mothers were older than their male co-rulers. The cultural distinction and authority of seniority created a duty to seek the queen mother’s advice in all matters of importance to the community.

Nanny’s name indicates that she had such a position of authority in her community, for “Nanny” is most likely derived from “Nana,” a chieftaincy title given to male and female authorities in Akan cultures. Asante Queen Mother Nana Yaa Asantewaa provides a historical example of female anti-colonial leadership in West Africa with many similarities to her Jamaican counterpart: Queen Nanny and Nana Yaa Asantewaa presided over similarly structured societies and displayed political and military leadership

Queen Nanny was a well-known leader of the Jamaican Maroons, runaway slaves who fought the British during the eighteenth century. Most of what is known about Queen Nanny has been passed down through oral tradition, but it is believed that she and her family escaped and went on to organize other Maroon communities. (National Library of Jamaica) in their fight against the British Empire. This diasporan continuity of Akan political and value systems is in itself a great achievement and a resounding act of defiance against a dehumanizing plantation system that sought systematically to strip enslaved Africans of their culture.

Another important source of Queen Nanny’s authority was her knowledge in the spiritual system of “obeah” or “myal” which enabled privileged communication with the ancestors, affording insights into past, present, and future. This knowledge in the realm of the spiritual, an analogy to the concept of personified wisdom, played a large part in granting Asante queen mothers a central role in decision-making. It is on the basis of these conceptions of authority that Queen Nanny was able to provide leadership to her community for over fifty years.

Situated in the Blue Mountains, Jamaica’s highest peaks, the terrain was used very effectively for guerrilla tactics. Using their knowledge of the rainy forest for traps, camouflage, and ambushes, the Maroons were able to hold their position against a much greater, much better equipped and better supplied British army. During the 1730s, the period of most intense fighting, only about a hundred Maroons were recorded as killed. The British lost thousands of lives in the same period of time. The power that the Windward Maroons exerted can be gathered from archival sources which state that in 1734, a total of 27 plantations had been abandoned on the Windward side of Jamaica. The threat they posed to the plantation slavery system is also evident in a petition by the colonial government to the king for assistance against the threat Maroons posed to the sustainability of slavery in Jamaica:

Their success has had such influence on our other slaves that they are continually deserting to them in great numbers and the insolent behavior of others gives us but too much cause to fear a general defection, which without your Majestie's gracious aid and assistance must render us a prey to them. (Gottlieb 2000)

The only battle which recorded Maroons suffering significant losses occurred in Nanny Town in 1734, when soldiers led by British Captain Studdart were able to reach and open fire upon the town. Nanny and the majority of the community escaped and founded a new settlement, Moore Town, in close proximity to the old location.

Eventually, the emissaries of the largest colonial empire in history had to sign a treaty with the Maroon communities whose guerrilla tactics they could not defeat. In skillful negotiations, which she led through emissaries, Nanny was able to secure the autonomy of her community. Contracts dated to 1739 and 1741, respectively, secured the Maroons' autonomy from British colonial authorities and granted them land rights. The self-perception of the Maroons as victors, not vanquished, is evident in the way they dealt with payments for the land rights that the British demanded in the treaties. In accordance with a view that their land and their freedom had been earned through resistance and could not be conferred on them by their adversaries, the land was never paid. The mutual non-aggression treaty also included an obligation to send away or return runaway slaves to the plantations, a clause that decreased the number of Maroons despite the fact it was not always adhered to.

The treaties were meant to appease, but they were not the end to Maroon resistance in Jamaica. Other Maroon communities also entered into treaties with the British to transform the stalemate of continuous guerrilla warfare into a state of peace with guaranteed freedom and autonomy of their communities. But instances like the Second Maroon War (1795) and the Akan-led Tacky Rebellion of 1760, which is seen as the bloodiest slave uprising in Jamaican history, illustrate that resistance against slavery continued unabashed. Maroon communities provided an important symbol of the real possibility to resist, escape, and lead a life of self-determination. Queen Nanny's leadership also provided an important symbol of female authority that signified the continuity of a matrilineal Akan conception of authority and leadership, in defiance of the patriarchal structures of the European plantation system.

For the Maroon community that has been able to retain its autonomy from the Jamaican government and its land rights based on the treaties negotiated by Queen Nanny, she is to be considered the symbolic, ancestral "Mother of the Maroons." But she is commemorated in wider society as well: Queen Nanny has been named one of the national heroes of Jamaica, and her portrait is on the Jamaican $500 bill, the most valuable note of the currency. Her leadership and the extraordinary achievements of the Jamaican Maroons serve as symbols of resistance against slavery and the unbroken will of Africans for cultural and political self-determination, for a life in communities governed by their own value systems.

SEE ALSO: Jamaica, Rebellion and Resistance, 1760–1834

References and Suggested Readings

- Gottlieb, K. (2000) The Mother of Us All: A History of Queen Nanny, Leader of the Windward Jamaican Maroons. Trenton, NJ: Africa World Press.
- Harris, C. L. G. (1992) Maroon Cultures in the Americas. Catalog of the 1992 Festival of American Folklife, Center for Folklife and Cultural Heritage of the Smithsonian Institution. Available at www.folklife.si.edu/resources/maroon/tour/visit/e2.htm.
- Zips, W. (1999) An Alternative Historical Outline of Akan-Related Chieftaincy in Jamaican Maroon Societies. In Van Rouveroy van Nieuwaal, E. A. B. & van Dijk, R. (Eds.), African Chieftaincy in a New Socio-Political Landscape. Hamburg: LIT.

Quintín Lame, 1980s

Tathiana Montaña Mestizo

In 1974 in the south of Colombia, an indigenous peasant group known as Quintín Lame (CQL) emerged. This group, which received military training from the Marxist-Leninist Communist Party (PC-ML), was formed after the killing of regional indigenous leaders in Cauca by repressive forces of the state and large landowners. The CQL was thus constituted as a military self-defense group. Thanks to an organization created years earlier by the indigenous leader Manuel Quintín Lame (1880–1967), the group had the support of many indigenous communities in the region of the Valle del Cauca, Huila, Tolima, and parts of the departments of Meta and Caquetá.

The founders of the Quintín Lame armed group distinguished themselves from other armed groups of the time by their multicultural approach. The group included mestizos such as Gustavo Mejía, Pedro León Rodríguez, and Edgar Londoño; foreigners such as the Hungarian Pablo Tattay, Gabriel Soler from Argentina, and Teresa Tomish from Chile; and indigenous people from different ethnic communities in the south of the country. Until the early 1980s the CQL acted in self-defense of traditional territories and only used arms when territorial and political autonomy was threatened.

The group's first military offensive took place in 1984 with an assault on Castilla, a small town in the Cauca department, and the takeover of the village of Santander de Quilichao, during which the CQL made its manifesto public: "The Quintín Lame is a force organized in the service of the indigenous communities of Cauca, for support during conflicts, and to defend their rights and combat their enemies." The group also planned operations of armed propaganda in rural and urban areas, working together with other guerilla organizations such as M-19 and forming an offshoot, the Quintín Lame Armed Movement (MAQL). The MAQL joined the Guerilla Coordination Simón Bolívar (CGSB), created in 1987 to bring together armed insurgent organizations in Colombia such as the Popular Liberation Army (EPL), the National Liberation Army (ELN), the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC), and M-19, a militant group founded primarily by students.

In 1990, with the consolidation of the National Constituent Assembly process, the MAQL initiated negotiations with the government of President Virgilio Barco. By May 31, 1991, final disarmament was complete. The demobilized representative of the MAQL, Alfonso Peña Chepe, was elected to the Assembly as spokesperson for the ideals of the indigenous struggle: respect for the earth, punishment of those who commit crimes against the indigenous population, and the struggle for the liberation of the country.

From this moment on the Quintín Lame Indigenous Movement (MIQL) supported and worked to consolidate civic movements with the Regional Indigenous Council of Cauca (CRIC), the Regional Indigenous Council of Tolima (CRIT), the Regional Organization of Embera Waunan of Chocó (OREWA), and the Indigenous Organization of Antioquia (OIA). These and other organizations constituted the political movement known as the Indigenous Social Alliance (ASI).

SEE ALSO: EPL Maoist Guerilla Movement; FARC (Revolutionary Armed Forces and Popular Liberation Army); Lame, Manuel Quintín (1880–1967), Indian/Peasant Organization, and the Struggle for Land in Colombia, 1920s–1930s; M-19 of Colombia

References and Suggested Readings

- Caviedes, M. (2002) Antropología y movimiento indígena. Bogotá: Universidad Nacional de Colombia, Departamento de Ciencias Humanas.
- Espinosa Arango, M. (2003) El indio lobo. Manuel Quintín Lame en la Colombia moderna. Revista Colombiana de Antropología 39. Bogotá.
- Gamboa, J. C. (1999) Manuel Quintín Lame y los guerreros de Juan Tama. Santafé de Bogotá: Madre Tierra.
- Herrera Ángel, M. (2004) Manuel Quintín Lame. Bogotá: Biblioteca Virtual del Banco de la República.

Quit India movement

Kunal Chattopadhyay

War, Congress, and Indian Politics

In 1935 the Government of India Act was promulgated by Britain and elections were held in 1937. The Indian National Congress, the dominant nationalist party, won a majority of provinces. The Congress victory emboldened the masses, who fought militantly for greater equality and redistribution of resources. But the Congress right wing, linked closely to Indian capitalists, quickly established dominance in the organization and the governments. The left-wing leader Subhas Chandra Bose was eventually pushed out of the party and formed the Forward Bloc (FB), a small political organization. In view of Congress's compromise with the British colonialists to restrain struggles, and its periodic complicity in repressive policies, the party's popularity began to fall, its membership declining from 4.5 million in 1938–9 to 1.4 million in 1940–1.

On September 3, 1939 Viceroy Linlithgow unilaterally associated India with Britain's declaration of war on Germany without consulting the provincial ministries or any Indian leaders. Congress leaders made offers of cooperation in the war effort subject to certain conditions like the promise of a postwar constituent assembly to determine the political structure of a free India and the immediate formation of a responsible national government at the center. The viceroy's offer fell far short of this, leading to the resignation of the Congress ministries and the compromises opposed by the masses. The leftists were in favor of militant struggles, but their power by now was much reduced. A Defense of India Ordinance restricting civil liberties was decreed the day war was declared. In Britain a National Coalition Cabinet was formed in May 1940, dominated by arch-imperialist Winston Churchill as prime minister and Clement Attlee and Labor Party leaders, promising an Indian constituent assembly. British wartime imperialist strategy encouraged the Muslim League to split with Congress and demand concessions on behalf of religious adherents.

During the early war years Gandhi and the right wing were opposed to any all-out struggle against imperialism. Wartime demand initially cut off imports and expanded the profitability of Indian industry. There was a small rise in agricultural prices, welcome to the mass of peasants after a decade of depression. The left, by contrast, was pressing for action on independence, with only the small group around M. N. Roy calling for support to Britain against fascism. The Ramgarh Congress's (March 1940) decision for individual civil disobedience (volunteers personally chosen by Gandhi) created a token movement which neither presented the government with difficulties nor gave Viceroy Linlithgow pretext for a crackdown. Gandhi's aim was to tame the movement to forestall radical struggles, and he lamented the appeal of communism to Indian youth. By June 1941 about 20,000 communists were jailed.

Two changes came about from 1941. The German invasion of the USSR compelled a reluctant Stalin to turn against Hitler, and the Communist Party of India (CPI) to call for full support to the anti-fascist "people's war." When Trotskyists argued that only by overthrowing the imperialists could the Indian working class really aid independently the Soviet workers' state, the CPI general secretary P. C. Joshi told party members that Trotskyists were "traitors" to be driven out of political life and "exterminated." The other change was Japanese invasion and rapid military victories in Southeast Asia. Singapore fell on February 15, 1942 and Rangoon on March 8. Indian public opinion was turning hostile due to a scarcity crisis and awareness of growing racism. Racism was displayed most crudely when, in the wake of Japanese victories, Indians in Southeast Asia were left to fend for themselves, often forced to return to India under terrible conditions. A "denial policy" resulted in damage to boats, the main transport of East Bengal. American troop arrivals were followed by complaints of rape and racist harassment.

In response to the growing resentment, in March 1942 the War Cabinet agreed to a draft declaration promising postwar dominion status for India with right of secession and a constitutional body to which the princely states would be invited to send representatives and to which provinces might have the right not to join. Sir Stafford Cripps, a leftist British Labor Party leader, went to India to negotiate. Within the Congress, Jawaharlal Nehru and other leftists supported the war effort to oppose the Nazi war on the Soviet Union. But no agreement was reached in the negotiations, partly because of lack of interest among Congress leaders, but mainly because of machinations by Churchill and Linlithgow.

Quit India

The failure of the Cripps Mission brought about realignment in the Congress. Nehru and the CPI found themselves in the same camp as Bhulabhai Desai and C. Rajagopalachari, the extreme moderates. Rajagopalachari and the CPI both argued in favor of an accommodation with the Muslim League through recognition of the right of the Muslim majority provinces to secede through plebiscite after independence had been achieved. Gandhi and the right, aligned with the Congress Socialist Party (CSP), called for a more militant struggle. Gandhi contended that if the British withdrew from India, the Japanese could invade and conquer the country. He also stressed that Indians should tackle their own problems. Gandhi's hard line was accepted at a Congress Working Committee (CWC) session of April-May 1942. The Wardha CWC (July 1942) resolution introduced a previously absent note of social radicalism when it stated that princes, jagirdars, zamindars (varieties of landlords), and the propertied classes derive their wealth and property from workers in fields and factories, to whom power and authority must eventually belong.

The All India Congress Committee on August 8, 1942, meeting in Bombay, adopted the famous Quit India resolution calling for non-violent mass struggles on the widest scale, leaving Gandhi to decide when to launch the struggle. The call was enough to invite repression, which freed Congress leadership from responsibility for protests. Indeed, Congress leaders stated that if they were arrested, every Indian was to be their own guide. Surprisingly, for the only time, Gandhi was willing to sanction the general strike and on this occasion delivered his famous "Do or Die" speech, proclaiming the final battle was at hand. The CPI members of the CWC opposed the resolution. Trotskyists of the Bolshevik Leninist Party of India (BLPI), by contrast, distributed leaflets calling for all-out participation in any anti-imperialist struggle, while warning that Gandhi would compromise.

The subsequent arrest of Gandhi and the entire top leadership on August 9 was followed by a mass upsurge which overwhelmingly surpassed calculations made either by the British colonial powers or Congress. Over the previous decades diverse forms of radicalism had produced a litany of critiques of Gandhian non-violence. Leftists of various shades, the CSP, the CPI at other times, the AITUC (All India Trade Union Congress), the All India Kishan Sabha (peasant organization) (AIKS), all had campaigned for militancy. Gandhi and the Congress enjoyed a symbolic legitimacy, but diverse movements formed and protested in ways that they could not control. Gandhi's speeches suggest he did not provide any clear direction for protests. Just a few days earlier, he had said adoption of the Quit India resolution would necessitate all-out struggle and sent a letter to the viceroy awaiting a reply to avoid recrimination for the violent struggles to come. The British tried to paint the entire struggle as a "fifth-columnist" act, as did the CPI, firmly opposing the upheaval. The British repeatedly attributed a pro-Axis sympathy to Congress to gain world anti-fascist support for the brutal repression of the popular rebellion. But Congress had a record of supporting anti-fascist causes, including Spanish republicans, and Congress sent a mission to China during the Japanese invasion.

The Quit India resolution was intended more as a bargaining chip than a call for social revolution. A confidential report of the Andhra Provincial Congress Committee, dated July 29, 1942, told Congress members to be ready, but by no means act, until Gandhi decided. The most radical official Congress documents only discussed stopping trains, traveling without tickets, and no-tax as the last stage.

In the initial phase of the Quit India movement urban revolts broke out in Bombay and spread to numerous cities throughout the country with different intensities. As the news of the Congress leadership arrests spread, crowds gathered in Bombay. Police were pelted with stones and bottles and buses were forced to halt. Government buildings were set on fire, compelling authorities to call out the army. CSP leaders met secretly in Bombay and decided to go underground, and with the high command jailed, leadership was now in their hands. But they deliberately decided to dissolve their own party and carry out the struggle simply in the name of the "underground Congress." Usha Mehta ran a clandestine radio station. In Patna on August 11 a mass upsurge developed. In Jamshedpur and Dalmianagar working-class strikes broke out.

The CPI sought to restore order and end strikes and submitted secret reports to Sir Reginald Maxwell (home member, viceroy's executive council) documenting efforts to prevent strikes and hartals (shut-downs) in Kanpur, Bombay, Jamshedpur, Calicut, Lahore, and Madras. As a reward, the party was allowed to hold pro-war rallies openly in Bombay, as reported with satisfaction by People's War, the CPI weekly. The BLPI, by contrast, issued a series of leaflets stressing the compromising nature of Congress, sought to build a revolutionary organization, and called on soldiers not to fire on demonstrators. The BLPI sought to unify revolutionary organizations and a leaflet of August 7 called for no-tax and no-rent campaigns in the countryside and general strikes in urban areas. The director of the Intelligence Bureau wrote that traces of Fourth International Trotskyists were discernable in many illegal Congress bulletins and pamphlets. In the General Motors factory, a vital war industries unit, Bombay Trotskyists and the CSP carried out sustained organizing activities.

The Quit India movement was concentrated in a wide area across northern India, stretching from Bombay, Satara, and Ahmedabad in the west, through the United Provinces (UP) and Bihar in the north, to Bengal and Orissa in the east and Karnataka in the south. After the initial urban upsurge was beaten back, struggles shifted to the countryside where peasants rose up, destroyed railway tracks and stations, telegraph wires and poles, looted treasury buildings, and killed a number of European officers. Isolated police stations were taken over and destroyed, followed by the formation of Jatiyo Sarkar or Prati Sarkar (national or parallel governments). They ruthlessly repressed the rural movement by burning down entire villages. The next phase was the creation of underground structures and struggles, divided into three major streams: (1) a Gandhian stream led by Sucheta Kripalani, (2) urban militants under Aruna Asaf Ali mobilizing sabotage activities, and (3) a guerrilla group organized by Jayaprakash Narayan in the State of Bihar.

The Quit India movement gained support from many regions and groups, but was not sustained throughout India. In Ballia (Eastern UP) for a few days, and in Satara (Maharashtra) and Midnapore (Bengal) for a longer period, parallel governments continued functioning. In Satara a new generation of non-Brahmin (Hindu priestly caste) leaders, close to the CSP, emerged. Madras, by contrast, was relatively quiet, in part due to opposition from Rajagopalachari and other Congress leaders. In Kerala the CPI opposed the movement. In the princely states, where Congress had always been wary of launching movements, confrontation was sporadic. The Punjab and the Muslim areas of northwestern India mainly remained silent. The Quit India movement revealed that Muslims shifted from the Congress position even in regions of mass upsurge. Regions dominated by Hindu communalists remained quiescent. The "untouchables" or dalits and classes of poorer peasants and landless laborers were hesitant to join affluent peasants, landlords, and students from prosperous families who were the driving force of the uprising.

Despite the war, the British used 57 army battalions to crush the uprisings. By the end of 1943 the official statistics report 91,836 arrested, 332 railway stations and 945 post offices destroyed or severely damaged, 664 bomb explosions, and the storming of 208 police stations. Some 216 policemen defected to the rebels. As early as August 15, 1942 Linlithgow ordered the use of machine-guns from the air against crowds in the states of Bihar, Bengal, and Orissa.

With the CPI categorically against Quit India, BLPI was the only communist organization supporting the movement. In Calcutta, BLPI joined a United Socialist People's Front including the RSP, the FB, and the CSP in distributing tens of thousands of leaflets. Within the bloc the BLPI opposed burning trams as tactically adventurist but called for agitation in industrial areas and the army. The British arrested and imprisoned key BLPI leaders and Trotskyists for long periods. Murray Gow Purdy, a South African Trotskyist living in India, was arrested and sentenced to ten years "rigorous imprisonment" by a special jury, after being found not guilty by an ordinary jury. Interestingly, Purdy's fate foretold how the Congress would look upon the Quit India movement once it ended. Purdy, among the last Quit India prisoners, was released and deported to South Africa by the Congress government in December 1947.

Aftermath of Revolt

Formally, the British had quelled the Quit India movement, but at a high price. For the first time since 1857 the struggle was led by leaders who were opposed to compromises with imperialism. However, this was a relatively heterogeneous and scattered leadership, unable to wrest hegemony away from the Congress. The CSP, despite providing a measure of national leadership, was committed to the principle that the Congress and Gandhi would lead. As a result, while the Congress and its symbols would be appropriated during the struggles, once the Congress repudiated the struggles there was a crisis. The Congress leaders sought on the one hand to claim the revolt as their own and thereby to appropriate the credit that flowed from it, especially during elections in 1946 and 1952. On the other hand, they sought to distance the Congress from “excesses” and “non-Gandhian” tactics. The British recognized that only wartime special powers and the use of the army had suppressed the revolt, and this was a major reason why during the postwar upsurge of 1945–6 they sought a means of negotiated transfer of power, to stave off a more militant revolution. Meanwhile, a CWC resolution of September 14, 1945 congratulated the nation for the courage and endurance with which it withstood the onslaught of British power, but then went on to register sorrow at the fact that in some places people had abandoned the path of non-violence. In his Discovery of India, written in 1946, Nehru talked of a “frenzy of the mob.” This language, usually found in the writings of colonialists, indicates that the Congress was now on the way to becoming the Raj (state power), rather than fighting the Raj. In January 1947 right-wing Congress leader Sardar Patel wrote to G. B. Pant, premier of UP, that Pant should not have inaugurated a Congress exhibition in Benaras that showed pictures of police atrocities in 1942. Patel, who would be the first home minister of independent India, told Pant categorically that this was likely to affect the morale of the police force.

SEE ALSO: Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand (1869–1948); Narayan, Jayaprakash (1902–1979); Nehru, Jawaharlal (1889–1964)

References and Suggested Readings

- Bandyopadhyay, S. (2004) From Plassey to Partition. New Delhi: Orient Longman.
- Chakrabarty, B. (1997) Local Politics and Indian Nationalism: Midnapur, 1919–1944. New Delhi: Manohar.
- Erwin, C. E. (1989) Le trotskysme en Indépendant la guerre. Cahiers Léon Trotsky 39 (September): 77–111.
- Gupta, P. S. (1997) Towards Freedom: Documents on the Movement for Independence in India, 1943–44. 2 vols. Delhi: Oxford University Press.
- Hutchins, F. G. (1973) India's Revolution: Gandhi and the Quit India Movement. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Pandey, G. (Ed.) (1988) The Indian Nation in 1942. Calcutta: K. P. Bagchi.
- Sarkar, S. (1983) Modern India, 1885–1947. New Delhi: Macmillan.

R

Rabuka, Sitiveni Ligamamada (b. 1948)

Justin Corfield

Lieutenant Colonel Rabuka, the Fijian military commander who led the May 14, 1987 effort which brought down the government of Dr. Timoci Bavadra, staged a second coup on September 25, 1987, resulting in Fiji becoming a republic the following year.

Sitiveni Ligamamada Rabuka was born September 13, 1948, at Nakobo, on the island of Vanua Levi, Fiji, the son of Kolinio Epeli Vanuacicila Rabuka and Salote Lomaloma. He was educated at Provincial School Northern, Queen Victoria School in New Zealand, and New Zealand army schools, and completed postgraduate work at the Indian Defence Services Staff College until 1979, and the Australian Joint Services Staff College until 1982. He then joined the Fijian military. He served with the United Nations peacekeeping forces in Lebanon (UNIFIL) where he was Senior Operational Plans Officer from 1980 to 1981. Returning to Fiji in July 1981, he was appointed chief of staff, a position he held for several months. He was then SO1 for operations and training from 1982 to 1983, and again from 1985 to 1987, spending the intervening period as commander of the Fiji Battalion in Sinai.

Rabuka was clearly angered by the election in April 1987 of the coalition government of Dr. Timoci Bavadra. This led him to stage the coup on May 14, overthrowing the Bavadra government. His coup d'état was well-planned and bloodless. He then started running Fiji, championing the rights of the ethnic Fijians. This new administration saw many members of the Alliance Party's government, who had lost the April 1987 elections, returning to power with Rabuka as a military member of the council of ministers, holding the position as advisor on home affairs and head of security. This move was supported by the Great Council of Chiefs, although it was criticized by much of the world, including the British Commonwealth.

There were many discussions about how to go about holding fresh elections, but the Taukei movement, which had the support of ethnic Fijian nationalists, opposed any compromise on the Indians being able to vote in elections. What followed were a series of violent protests. Rabuka handed over power to the governor-general Ratu Sir Penaia Ganilau, whom he had expected to support the interests of ethnic Fijians. However, this did not happen, and on September 25, 1987 Rabuka led a second coup d'état, imposing martial law, and on October 7 he declared Fiji a republic, with himself as head of the interim military government. He held that position until December 5. Retaining the position of minister of home affairs, in charge of security and the armed forces, he finally resigned from the Cabinet in 1990. In the following year he was deputy prime minister and minister of home affairs. In the May 1992 legislative elections, Rabuka led the Fijian Political Party, which won an overwhelming victory. Rabuka became prime minister on June 2, 1992 and continued until May 19, 1999, when he lost the election to Mahendra Chaudry, the first Indian to become prime minister. Rabuka was then elected chairman of the Great Council of Chiefs.

Rabuka was clearly not happy with Chaudry becoming prime minister, and his involvement in the George Speight coup of May 2000 has long been rumored but never proven. Rabuka has strongly denied the link, although the former attorney-general Sir Vijay Singh said that Rabuka had admitted involvement in the coup, but that the target was not Chaudry but the president, Sir Ratu Mara. In the wake of the coup, Rabuka became chairman of the Cakaudrove Provincial Council from May 24, 2001, and was reelected to that position on April 13, 2005 for a third term.

On May 11, 2006 Rabuka was arrested and charged with having incited Lieutenant Colonel Viliame Seruvakula to commit a military mutiny on November 2, 2000, after Speight seized power. Owing to the seriousness of the charges, the trial was moved to the Fiji High Court, but on December 11, 2006 Rabuka was found not guilty on the two counts of inciting a mutiny. The assessors in the court were split, with the judge giving his casting vote for Rabuka. Sitiveni Rabuka continues to be a powerful figure in Fijian politics.

SEE ALSO: Fiji, Parliamentary Insurrection; New Caledonia, Protest and Revolt

References and Suggested Readings

- Bain, K. (1989) Treason at 10: Fiji at the Crossroads. London: Hodder & Stoughton.
- Dean, E. & Ritova, S. (1988) Rabuka: No Other Way. Sydney: Doubleday.
- Sharpham, J. R. (2000) Rabuka of Fiji: The Authorized Biography of Major-General Sitiveni Rabuka. Rockhampton: Central Queensland University Press.

Radical Reconstruction, United States, promise and failure of

Orville Vernon Burton

The story of Reconstruction has been told ably and often, but historians have basically bookended American history with the Civil War, ignoring the fact that Reconstruction cannot be separated from the war any more than Sectional Conflict can. Reconstruction is part and parcel of the whole era. In South Carolina, men who were too young to fight in the Civil War but who fought in terrorist paramilitary groups to overthrow and then maintain white Democratic Party control in 1876 and 1878 even applied for the state's Confederate War pension. Clearly, they believed Reconstruction was part of the Civil War. While most textbooks date the end of Reconstruction with the 1876 presidential election, or the withdrawal of federal troops stationed in the South, in the lives of those at the time, Reconstruction did not end and should not be considered over until 1896 with Plessy v. Ferguson and the adoption of former Confederate State constitutions legally disfranchising and segregating African Americans. Put in this frame, Reconstruction can be understood more accurately as part of "the long Civil War."

In recounting it here, a point historians have ignored deserves special notice. The essential character of Reconstruction was profoundly conservative, with parties on all sides concerned less with defining vague and abstract freedoms than with establishing local systems of workable order in their own communities, according to their own notions of justice and fair play. As with the antebellum conflict between enslaved and master, abolitionist and planter, free soiler and slaveholder, the conservative drive to resolve practical problems at the local level in Reconstruction generated tremendous, unforeseen conflicts which propelled events along a startlingly revolutionary course. This interplay of conservatism and revolution, this interweaving of concerns with order and freedom, define Reconstruction in its achievements and failures both. At Reconstruction's start, only one certainty prevailed: there were thousands with reason to optimistically anticipate its advent and thousands with reason to dread it, and the former had more cause for hope than the latter.

Most optimistic of all was the political course hundreds of thousands of African Americans took in the years after slavery ended. Abraham Lincoln's conservative republicanism was taken up anew by freed people at the local level across the South. It is fitting that in the years after 1865 those most newly arrived on freedom's doorstep held the clearest sense of its precepts, as they saw them. The freedoms they fought for grounded citizenship in self-mastery and independent property. From Plato to Thomas Jefferson, from James Harrington to Abraham Lincoln, republican theorists had emphasized that the political duties and opportunities of citizenship were founded on the conservative basis of property ownership. Emancipation marked not only the birth of African American freedom. It sparked an African American rebirth of republicanism, argued and defended more cogently and fervently than at any time in American history. Reconstruction is the story of the emergence and the destruction of that promise.

No one knew what the end of bondage might bring in its wake. Slavery's death did not automatically confer any positive rights upon African Americans. It only liberated them from the control of the master, eliminating at the same time the latter's motive for self-interested benevolence, which enslaved blacks had tried to use to their benefit under bondage. Between the captivity they had known and the freedom they dreamed of, African Americans found themselves suspended in a limbo of social and political uncertainty. While the president and Congress worked to reconcile states within the Union after Appomattox, on the local level former slaves and rebels could do little except feel their way forward tentatively, staking claims to new ways or old habits in their own communities, defending their choices on a daily basis against those they ran up against in the course of the experience of labor and community life. In this way, ordinary Americans reconstructed their nation according to their own uncertain, conflicted ideas in the course of daily practice. The passage of new laws played a central role in shaping the contours of that struggle, but Reconstruction was a far more diverse, all-pervasive process than legislation alone. The effects of the tensions it created crept into all aspects of everyday life, and persist in common behaviors and social values down to the present day.

The tasks which confronted the nation after the war were enormous and multi-faceted. Reconstruction was political: rebellious states required loyal governments and representatives deemed fit to serve in Congress. Congressmen thought the problem of postbellum Southern race relations was how to integrate the former slaves into freedom and citizenship; they totally missed the actual problem – how to integrate the former Confederates into a new nation with freedom and justice for all. Reconstruction was economic: with the destruction of chattel bondage, former masters and former slaves alike would have to undertake new ways of wage labor, and a mode of production laid waste by four years of war would somehow have to be set in motion and made profitable again. Reconstruction was religious: granted the freedom to worship as they wished for the first time, African Americans would have to decide whether to kneel before God in prayer alongside their former enslavers or to establish their own churches. Defeated whites would have to ponder whether to turn the other cheek or to pray for deliverance and smite their oppressors when the chance presented itself. Reconstruction was legal: as thousands of African Americans troubled themselves to record marriages long since consummated, or paid taxes, or set their mark on a labor contract, or simply called the sheriff in time of trouble, they asserted their right to live in peace among their fellows, under the shade of the Constitution and all subsequent acts of legislation. They were not chattels or dependents, interlopers or charity-seekers; they claimed rights, endured responsibilities, enjoyed freedoms guaranteed by the power of “the people.” If the Civil War was the period in which American freedom was expanded for African Americans, it was the Reconstruction era which established institutions and bureaucracies that determined or undermined this freedom.

Most of all Reconstruction was indeterminate. Reconstruction was a blank slate to be drawn on by federal resolve, African American self-determination, and the toxic stew of emasculated masters and embittered white yeomen. The world had been turned upside down, and would continue topsy turvey at least twice the number of years the Union and Confederacy had fought and killed one another during the official Civil War.

In the most practical, confounding, head-scratching sense, Reconstruction was a social process, a daily working-out, white or black, male or female, rich or poor, with how they ought to treat each other in these changed times. In some cases these social dramas played themselves out over old ties sundered or renewed – or reversed, as when freed people brought food to “old massa,” now steeped in poverty. In others, they were enacted through new behaviors: a white man hauled before a black judge, African Americans defending their homes with rifles, a black militia instead of a white slave patrol, interracial crowds of “Union League” supporters whooping it up on Independence Day. Other changes were smaller: when a former slave held his former master's gaze a second too long, when a freedman rode by in a newly bought buggy, when a poor black or white child learned to scratch out his ABCs on a dearly bought slate. Of such seemingly insignificant things mighty revolutions are made; against such dreaded changes the forces of reaction will launch their strongest battalions. So it was in the Reconstruction South.

From the moment of liberation, most former slaves saw freedom in conservative terms: they focused, with careful self-regard, on building strong families, obtaining property, and accumulating wealth. They expressed the republican virtues of the Founding Fathers themselves as they set out to balance self-interest with the well-being of local communities. African Americans realized immediately that political rights were essential for their economic and social health. In the summer and fall of 1865 African Americans called conventions to discuss how to make ideals of liberty their own.

At the end of 1865, when President Andrew Johnson announced that the Union was restored, the 39th Congress disagreed. Stating that it alone had the power to seat delegates, Congress refused to seat officials elected from the former Confederate states, Democrats and secessionists as they were. The Civil Rights Act of 1866 defined citizenship and included African Americans, now legally allowed the “full and equal” benefit of law enjoyed by white citizens. With Southern legislatures recalcitrant, and bloody race riots perpetrated against black communities, Congress took stronger steps.

The Reconstruction Act of 1867 divided the South into five military districts. The United States government supervised voter registration, and 1868 saw mighty changes throughout the states of the former Confederacy as overwhelming numbers of former slaves voted, passed new constitutions, instituted republican education, and some rights for women. A thriving interracial democracy took hold at the local level in many locales, where new grassroots alliances flourished. Southern states were developing an open and progressive political process where law applied equally, all male citizens had access to due process, and the courts were open to blacks as well as whites. However small and conflicted, changes promised to liberate Southern white consciousness from the chains of racism itself.

Despite difficulties and challenges, African American voters across the South joined with enough white voters to form majority coalitions and elect Republican-dominated legislatures. Thus, one of the major promises of Reconstruction was fulfilled. Between 1867 and 1877 about 2,000 freedmen held federal, state, and local office. They won elections and served in various appointments as cabinet officers, superintendents of education, justices of the peace, city council members, sheriffs, judges, and numerous other posts. Fourteen African Americans won election to the US House of Representatives. Two African Americans from Mississippi won election to the US Senate.

To continue to secure the right to vote nationwide, congressional leadership mobilized members of Congress to propose a Fifteenth Amendment to the Constitution, providing that “the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.” While the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments to the Constitution provided another fulfilled promise of Reconstruction, the period also had two fatal failures. Federal and state Republican administrations truly failed on the question of land. Economic disparity in land distribution was a major flaw of Reconstruction strategy. No issue was of more profound concern to former slaves and masters alike, and across the board the results for African Americans were deeply disappointing. While it was not preordained – the potential for meaningful change existed – freedmen came out of Reconstruction as they went in: landless and poverty stricken. Almost uniformly, specific programs to foster land ownership failed dismally, and taxation policies which aimed to transfer acreage into the hands of poorer whites and blacks only succeeded in arousing racial animosity. As white Southerners were permitted to enact a variety of measures that prevented blacks from owning land and from leaving agricultural areas to seek jobs in towns, the majority of freed people continued to live in rural districts and engage in agricultural day labor. Few former slaves confused wage labor with freedom. Real freedom, as republican ideology understood it and religious expectation framed it, required autonomy. In an agricultural economy that meant living off one’s own land, or at least working with the expectation of acquiring property.

Although most agents of the understaffed Freedmen’s Bureau attempted to establish fair terms of contract between white landowners and black labor for the 1866 crop year, collusion, violence, and their own prejudices subverted equity. Ultimately, the Freedmen’s Bureau coaxed and bullied most former slaves into pitiful wage labor contracts. These contracts, sanctioned by law, assured landowners that workers would be in the fields. The Freedmen’s Bureau was short-lived, but it set the precedent of contract wage labor that became the social order of the rural New South.

Another flaw of Radical Reconstruction was the government’s inability to quell the insurgent violence. For white conservatives, changes made the South seem almost unrecognizable, and increasingly they determined to turn back the clock. Throughout the South, as blacks and whites negotiated new political, social, and labor arrangements in the postwar period, rage and violence could flare up at any moment. Terror became more methodical in the early summer of 1866, when Nathan Bedford Forrest, infamous for his massacre in 1864 of African American soldiers under a white flag at Fort Pillow, became the Grand Wizard of a new organization, the Ku Klux Klan.

At certain times throughout history the public gets concerned about political corruption and other times it appears to ignore it. While hardly unique or even more widespread than after Reconstruction, corruption during Reconstruction received extensive press. And yet the destruction of black voting rights, the only weapon former slaves had to protect themselves from white supremacists, attracted comparatively little attention, except in one respect. As corrupt government became a symbol of Reconstruction, interracial democracy and black voting rights became implicated in the public's perception of widespread political malfeasance.

Eventually, the Southern white conservatives regained political control and worked to undo what Reconstruction had established. Those in power at the end of the nineteenth century slowly stripped away the rights of African Americans, and the federal government would not enforce the Reconstruction Amendments in the South for nearly another century. Yet it was the very success of Reconstruction that drove white Democrats and their vigilante lieutenants to acts of terrorism.

SEE ALSO: American Civil War (1861–1864); American Civil War and Slavery

References and Suggested Readings

- Blight, D. (2001) Race and Reunion: The Civil War in American Memory. Boston: Belknap Press.
- Burton, O. V. (2007) Age of Lincoln. New York: Hill & Wang.
- Foner, E. (2002) Reconstruction: America's Unfinished Revolution, 1863–1877. New York: Harper Perennial Modern Classics.
- McPherson, J. M. & Hogue, J. (2000) Ordeal by Fire: The Civil War and Reconstruction. New York: McGraw-Hill Humanities.
- Stampp, K. M. (1967) The Era of Reconstruction, 1865–1877. New York: Vintage.

Raditsela, Andries (1956–1985)

Nicole Ulrich

Andries Raditsela's early life, including his place of birth, is not well documented. He became an active member of the Chemical Workers' Industrial Union (CWIU), an affiliate of the Federation of South African Trade Unions (FOSATU), in 1982. At this time he was working for the Dunlop factory in Benoni on the eastern Witwatersrand.

Raditsela was elected a shop steward in 1983 and, soon after, a senior shop steward at the Dunlop plant, where he led a number of battles around wages and working conditions. Raditsela strove to improve the position of women workers, and was involved in a campaign against sexual harassment, in which he exposed a practice in which women traded sex for jobs. He also participated in negotiations for a maternity agreement.

Raditsela held a number of positions in the CWIU and FOSATU. He was elected chairperson of the national CWIU Dunlop Shop Stewards Council, and played a key role in coordinating the 1984 Dunlop strike at the Benoni, Ladysmith, and Durban plants. He served in the branch executive of the CWIU, of which he was elected vice-chairman in 1984, and also served on the national executive of the union. The FOSATU Transvaal Region relied on his leadership, and he was elected chairperson of the region in 1984, then vice-chairperson in the following year. Raditsela also served on FOSATU's executive committee and central committee.

On the morning of May 4, 1985, police arrested Raditsela in Tsakane Township. He was held in police custody under section 50 of the Internal Security Act, which allowed for 48 hours' detention without trial. On the Saturday night, Raditsela was admitted to hospital, and he died the next afternoon of severe injuries to his head. Thousands of workers attended Raditsela's funeral, some carrying banners and placards stating "Kill Apartheid, Not Detainees" and "Army and Police Out of the Townships." In other parts of the country up to 100,000 workers held stoppages at their factories to mourn his death. Raditsela was a major martyr of the growing African and interracial union movement.

SEE ALSO: South Africa, Labor Movement

References and Suggested Readings

- Death of a Militant: Andries Raditsela 1956–1985 (1985) South African Labour Bulletin 10, 7 (June): 1–2.
 Detained by Police – Dead 3 Days Later (1985) FOS-ATU Worker News 38 (June).
 Over 100,000 Mourn the Death of Raditsela (1985) FOSATU Worker News 38 (June).

Rampa rebellions in Andhra Pradesh

Kunal Chattopadhyay

Andhra Pradesh is a large state in south India. In colonial times it was divided between the princely state of Hyderabad and the Madras Presidency ruled by the British. The Agency Area of Andhra Pradesh included the districts of Srikakulam, Visakhapatnam, East and West Godavari, Khammam, Adilabad, Warangal, and Mahaboobnagar. In 1961 there were 4,346 adivasi (tribal) villages. In all, adivasis formed a small part of the population, but were historically the most exploited. Major groups among them, both in the Agency Area and in the plains, included Gonds, Koyas, Hill Reddis, Savaras, Valmiki, Yerukalas, and Yanadis. Over half the adivasi population consist of Koyas, Gonds, Yanadis, and Yerukalas.

Rebellions by adivasis in Andhra have broken out repeatedly, mostly in Srikakulam, Visakhapatnam, and East and West Godavari. At the time of the permanent settlement in 1802–3, the Rampa country was ignored, and subsequently the mansabdar Rambhupati contested the authority of the British. This has sometimes been considered the first revolt. As a result of the eventual settlement in 1813, villages he had taken over were given to him free of tax provided he maintained peace there. He leased the land to muttadars (petty tribal chiefs), for an annual payment of Rs. 8,750. On his death his daughter and son clashed over who would inherit the villages, and ultimately the son succeeded. The muttadars accepted him on condition that he reduce the rent to Rs. 1,000. After first agreeing to do so, the son began rack-renting and imposing new taxes, including a tax on drawing toddy (fermented palm juice) from palm trees, the use of property foreclosure for a small amount of non-payment of debt (so that eight Muttas were added to his own domains), and several other hitherto unknown taxes. To this were added the British impositions, in the form of Forest Acts that took away the tribal right to use common land in the forests. Finally, law courts and their use by traders to cheat the hill people also contributed to a growing hatred of British rule. These factors drove the adivasis to revolt in 1879.

The second revolt occurred in March 1879, when the adivasis captured six policemen under the leadership of Thammandora near Boduluru, kept them in custody for several days, then took them to Kodigandi, where a head constable and a constable were kept tied under a tamarind tree. Thammandora cut off their heads as a sacrifice to a goddess in the presence of 200 tribesmen. The protesters then attacked the Chodavaram police station and burned down the station at Addatigala. The movement spread to Golugonda hills in Visakhapatnam in April and Rekapalli country in Bhadrachalam in July. Here the immediate cause of the revolt was the Madras Government's sudden threefold increase in the assessment of Podu (shifting cultivation) lands, which had been only four annas (a quarter of a rupee) an acre previously. The adivasis waged guerilla warfare, and the government had to send six regiments of the Madras infantry, two companies of sappers and miners, a squadron of cavalry, and several hundred policemen. The war lasted till November 1880 and was put down with tremendous brutality.

The Madras Forest Act of 1882 was formulated to further deprive the adivasis of their natural rights. It placed restrictions on their free movement in forest areas, and prevented shifting cultivation and the felling and tapping of trees for firewood and toddy. In addition, British contractors exploited and oppressed the tribal communities. In Visakhapatnam district, a young man named Alluri Seetha Rama Raju took up their struggles in 1921, when forced labor was being exacted without payment in order to construct a highway from Narsipatnam to Chintapalli. His struggle against the contractors eventually brought him into conflict with the police. This culminated in the third Rampa rebellion.

Seetha Rama Raju's campaigns were conducted in East Godavari and Visakhapatnam districts. He began by advising the peasants to follow Gandhian methods of non-cooperation, which they accepted; but the brutality of the rulers convinced him that armed resistance was necessary. The phase of armed struggle began from August 1922. Many police stations were raided in and around Chintapalli, Krishnadevipeta, and Rajavommangi, and guns and powder were snatched. The government retaliated by posting Keene, Dawson, Saunders, and Coward at different points. Raju's forces continued their attacks and several British army officers were killed. Interestingly, Raju gave instructions that Indians were not to be killed. Between August and October 1922, his forces attacked several police stations including Rampa-Chodavaram, Rajahmundry, and Addatigala. Eventually, the British deployed a large contingent of the Assam Rifles. Raju, assisted by Mallu Dora and Gantam Dora, continued the resistance, and the forests and hilly tracts enabled them to conduct successful guerilla warfare. On September 23, 1923, Raju raided the Annaram police outpost. Subsequently, Mallu Dora was arrested and, by late 1923, Raju's campaigns had petered out. Seeing the demoralization among his followers, Raju thought that giving himself up would improve their conditions. But after his surrender the British rulers shot him dead without trial, on March 7, 1924.

SEE ALSO: Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand (1869–1948); India, Non-Violent Non-Cooperation Movement, 1918–1929; Santal Rebellion

References and Suggested Readings

- Arnold, D. (1982) Rebellious Hillmen: The Gudem-Rampa Risings, 1839–1924. In R. Guha. (Ed.), Subaltern Studies 1: Writings on South Asian History and Society. New Delhi: Oxford University Press.
- Arnold, D. (1985) Sitarama Raju's Rebellion: A Response. Social Scientist 13, 4 (April): 44–50.
- Atlury, M. (1984) Alluri Sitaram Raju and the Manyam Rebellion of 1922–24. Social Scientist 12, 4 (April): 3–33.
- Atlury, M. (1985) Manyam Rebellion: A Rejoinder. Social Scientist 13, 4 (April): 51–6.
- Raghavaiah, V. R. (1979a) Unrest in Andhra Pradesh. In A. R. Desai (Ed.), Peasant Struggles in India. New Delhi: Oxford University Press.
- Raghavaiah, V. R. (1979b) Sreerama Raju's Uprising – 1922–24. In A. R. Desai (Ed.), Peasant Struggles in India. New Delhi: Oxford University Press.

Randolph, A. Philip (1889–1979)

Joseph Wilson

A. Philip Randolph was the most influential African American labor leader in the twentieth century. He was the founding president of the all-black Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters (BSCP) industrial union, established in 1925 after years of organizing efforts.

The BSCP was America's first national African American industrial union; it organized black service workers, particularly the sleeping car porters, who tended white passengers on the Pullman sleeping car trains. The porters faced deplorable working conditions and organized along racial lines because they were excluded from joining the racially segregated, all-white railway brotherhoods. Randolph and the porters faced the wrath of the powerful Pullman Company, which used thugs and firings as forms of anti-union intimidation.

The young Randolph, son of a Methodist minister, was a fiery orator and militant organizer influenced by and attracted to Marxism, socialism, the Pan-African movement, and the anti-colonial struggles of the twentieth century. Randolph rejected the narrow nationalism of Marcus Garvey during the first third of the century and was more sympathetic to the politics of W. E. B. Du Bois.

Randolph became an important leader in the AFL-CIO, the nation's labor federation, where, for decades, he was the most visible advocate of racial equality within the American trade union movement. As the highest ranking black leader in organized labor, Randolph consistently put forward racially conscious policies and resolutions at the AFL-CIO's national conventions.

With the labor movement as his base of operation, particularly the BSCP which grew to 18,000 members at its height, Randolph rose to become one of the main leaders of the civil rights movement. He organized the 1941 march on Washington, resulting in the emergence of the Fair Employment Practices Committee, which was instrumental in breaking down segregation in government and industrial employment. Along with Martin Luther King Jr., Bayard Rustin, and a few others, he played a crucial role in organizing the historic 1963 march on Washington, made famous by Dr. King's "I have a dream" speech, at which King was flanked by Randolph on the dais. The march and underlying social movement led to passage of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, along with various voting rights acts, and eventually led to affirmative action policies under President Lyndon B. Johnson.

As a young intellectual and later as union president (1925–68), Randolph created his own path of politics and social activism. For over 50 years at the helm of the BSCP, Randolph articulated the concerns and defended the rights of black workers nationwide. He skillfully confronted racial segregation inside the house of labor and eliminated the legal barriers to African American union membership. In the 1930s he was labeled as “the most dangerous radical in America.”

As the elder statesman of the once powerful American labor and civil rights movements, Randolph’s critics felt he had lost his youthful militancy and represented more conservative tendencies within the activist community. He evolved from a young man who penned articles for radial newspapers, including the Communist Party’s Daily Worker, and became an opponent of the Soviet Union and communism in the late stages of his career. Ironically, even as Randolph was heralded as a peaceful, trusted labor leader, bestowed with the Medal of Freedom by President Lyndon Johnson in 1964, the FBI was actively targeting Randolph and his associates with wiretapping and subterfuge, to derail the civil rights agenda and to prevent integration and progressive politics within the AFL-CIO.

Militant leaders in the Black Power movement, such as Stokely Carmichael of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) and H. Rap Brown of the Black Panthers, publicly clashed with Randolph, who appeared on radio and television as the “voice of reason” calling for calm, after outbreaks of civil unrest and urban rebellions that swept the US in the late 1960s and early 1970s. Significantly, he refused large sums of money offered by industrialists to sell out the workers’ struggles. He died without any accumulated wealth.

Randolph’s legacy is closely associated with the linking of black union and workers’ struggles to a larger civil rights agenda. A museum in Chicago and a high school in New York City have been named in his honor. His statue is exhibited in Washington, DC’s Union Station, a once important hub of the Brotherhood’s activism.

SEE ALSO: Brown, H. Rap (b. 1943); Carmichael, Stokely/Kwame Turé (1941–1998); Civil Rights Movement, United States, 1960–1965; Civil Rights, United States, Black Power and Backlash, 1965–1978; Du Bois, W. E. B. (1868–1963); Garvey, Marcus (1887–1940) and Garveyism; Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC)

References and Suggested Readings

- Anderson, J. (1973) A. Philip Randolph: A Biographical Portrait. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich.
- Bates, B. (2001) Pullman Porters and the Rise of Protest Politics in America. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Kersten, A. E. (2006) A. Philip Randolph: A Life in the Vanguard. New York: Rowan & Littlefield.
- Wilson, J. (1986) Tearing Down the Color Bar: A Documentary History and Analysis of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters. New York: Columbia University Press.

Ranters

Ian Morley

The Ranters were a fervently religious radical utopian organization in England from the 1640s to the mid-1650s drawn together by a common revulsion for the dominant puritanical values of the country. At their peak the Ranters had several thousand commoners scattered throughout urban and rural England. Unlike other utopian movements where members collectively work toward a common objective within a rigidly organized structure, the Ranters comprised numerous people unified by a common passion of aversion to the dominant society.

The group reached its pinnacle following the English Revolution at the midpoint of the Interregnum, from 1649 to 1660, after the monarchy was overthrown and the parliament and military controlled government administration. The Ranters’ faith was rooted in a pantheistic belief that God lives within every living person and creature. Casting aside popular English ideas and values, the Ranters clashed with the ideological and political ruling classes. The Ranters maintained unorthodox and litigious religious values, including a denial of the authority of scripture, the view that heaven and hell did not exist, and antinomianism – the belief that exempts individuals from the obligations of moral law, a doctrine commonly perceived as heretical. Credited with making a significant contribution to the propagation of radical religion in Britain, Baptists and Quakers depicted Ranters as immoral deviants who surrendered to seventeenth-century propaganda and myth-making and whose behavior threatened social order.

Historian J. C. Davis suggests that the Ranters were disparaged by rival religious groups who sought to establish acceptable boundaries of behavior for their own followers and society as a whole. The Ranters represented a threat to the conservative imagination bent on sanctioning traditional values and suppressing radicalism. As a loosely knit group founded in England, when the Ranters' popularity waned in England in the early 1670s some adherents were still gathering in the US, according to records of their meetings. The strength of the Ranters is evident in the opposition to the movement. The passage of the Adultery Act and the Blasphemy Act in 1650 was used to imprison and punish adherents. To stem militant thought and action, the government burned the tongue of Ranter Jacob Bauthumley, a former military preacher, after the publication of his book, The Light and Dark Sides of God, and imprisoned Abiezer Coppe, a preacher who used curse-filled tirades.

SEE ALSO: Cromwell, Oliver (1599–1658); English Revolution, 17th Century; English Revolution, Radical Sects

References and Suggested Readings

- Corns, T. N. (1992) Uncloistered Virtue: English Political Literature, 1640–1660. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Davis, J. C. (1986) Fear, Myth and History: The Ranters and Their Historians. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Ellens, G. F. S. (1971) The Ranters Ranting: Reflections on a Ranting Counterculture. Church History 40, 1 (March): 91–107.

Raspail, François-Vincent (1794–1878)

Melanie A. Bailey

Although known as much for his contributions to natural science and medicine as for his revolutionary political activities, François-Vincent Raspail determinedly sought to establish and consolidate a republican regime in France. Despite suffering poor health and reduced economic circumstances due to time spent in jail for opposing non-republican regimes, Raspail continued to pursue the betterment of living conditions for his fellow citizens into the final years of his life.

Born in Carpentras in the Vaucluse, Raspail benefited from the tutelage of a priest who enthusiastically supported the Revolution and the Republic. The Jansenist leanings of this first teacher and mentor disposed Raspail to oppose established religion and the political influence of the Jesuits. Although he discovered in late adolescence that he could not sustain the religious faith required for ordination as a priest, his activism was nonetheless inspired by many of the principles shared by social Christianity.

Having gained notoriety for a speech praising the domestic policies of Napoleon with regard to the relationship of church and state and the institution of equality before the law, Raspail suffered reprisals from royalists after 1815. Upon arriving in Paris to pursue his interest in natural science and to seek a living outside of the church, he became involved in agitations against the Bourbon monarchy of the Restoration. As a freemason, as a member of the Carbonari, and as a leader of various “secret” organizations, Raspail sought to reestablish a democratic republic in France.

More akin to a twentieth-century social democrat than Auguste Blanqui, he nonetheless collaborated with him during the 1830s. Unlike Blanqui, Raspail rejected conspiracy or coups d'état if the regime acknowledged popular sovereignty; instead, he preferred to rely upon the spread of propaganda and improvements in public education. To that end, he founded newspapers such as the Réformateur (The Reformer) (mid-1830s) and the Ami du Peuple (Friend of the People) (1848). Given its desire to control the press and its fears of revolution, the government of Louis-Philippe arrested Raspail several times on charges of conspiracy or sedition and he was sentenced to periods in jail during the 1830s. Not surprisingly, perhaps, prison reform appeared prominently on his political agenda.

Having been a supporter of the Second Republic and having garnered thousands of votes as a candidate for president, Raspail again found himself in prison and then in exile during the early years of Napoleon III's reign. An elderly man at the time of the Franco-Prussian War, he opposed at once the ineptness of the Communards and the violence used by the government to suppress the Paris Commune in 1871. He spent yet another year in prison after writing in favor of amnesty for the Communards.

Raspail ended his political career as a legislator under the Third Republic, where he continued to advocate improvements in education, public health, and the penal system in France. What had once been cast as revolutionary agitation had become legal and even mainstream in France by the end of the nineteenth century.

SEE ALSO: Blanqui, Louis Auguste (1805–1881); Paris Commune, 1871

References and Suggested Readings

- Duveau, G. (1948) Raspail. Paris: Presses Universitaires de France.
- Lemoine, Y. & Lenoel, P. (1984) Les Avenues de la République: Souvenirs de F.-V. Raspail sur sa vie et sur son siècle, 1794–1878 (Avenues of the Republic: Memories of F.-V. Raspail of his Life and Century). Paris: Hachette.
- Ligou, D. (1968) Raspail ou le bon usage des prisons (Raspail, or the Appropriate Use of Prisons). Paris: Martineau.
- Weiner, D. B. (1968) Raspail: Scientist and Reformer. New York: Columbia University Press.

Razin's Rebellion, 1670–1671

Yury V. Bosin

Razin's Rebellion occurred in 1670–1 along the lower Don River in southern Russia in a heterogeneous community dominated by Cossacks, but also including runaway serfs who were considered fugitives. The Cossacks did not practice agriculture but lived off tribute levied on merchants passing along the Volga. The Russian government was interested in the Cossacks as a military force to guard the southern frontier, tolerating their freedom and de facto independence in the Don River region and even providing economic assistance and financial allowances.

From 1650 to 1660 during the Russian wars with Poland and Sweden, the rise in epidemics and crop failures led to the impoverishment of the Russian masses, and serfs fled in large numbers to the Don region. When the Russian government insisted on searching for and returning the serfs to their masters, the Cossacks resisted, provoking a major conflict. When the government cut food supplies and allowances, the Cossacks as professional warriors organized a fierce opposition that threatened to spill beyond the Don boundaries.

Stepan (Stenka) Razin was a 40-year-old Cossack from an upper-class family whose godfather was Kornila Yakovlev, the ataman, or high commander, of the Don regional army. A tall imposing man, Razin traveled extensively with the Cossack diplomatic mission throughout Russia, visiting Moscow, Astrakhan, and other Russian towns. Due to his popular influence in the Don region, in 1667 Razin successfully organized a regiment of 800 Cossacks to counter the embargo imposed by the Russians. In mid-May, Razin and his army ambushed and pillaged a merchant caravan in the Volga region that belonged in part to the tsar and Patriarch Nikon. Incensed by Razin's daring robbery, the Russian Duma in Moscow denounced him as a criminal. Since Razin did not intend to engage in a battle with the government, he looted Persian settlements along the Caspian shore instead. By the fall of 1669, when Razin returned to the Don, his popularity became legendary, and he organized 7,000 rebels to advance the rights of peasants throughout Russia. Razin was determined to attack Moscow to "eliminate nobles and officials who obstructed common people." Some argue that Razin sought revenge for the killing of his elder brother Ivan, who was executed by the Russian government in 1665.

In May 1669, Razin seized Tsaritsin and Astrakhan, two large urban centers on the Volga River. In both cases townspeople opened the gates and Russian officials, noblemen, and officers were killed in the ensuing attack. After their initial success, Razin's forces moved to Simbirsk, where Cossacks entered the town but could not take the Kremlin (the local fortress). Meanwhile, popular uprisings of some 200,000 people spread the rebellion throughout the vast southern and southeastern Russian territories. Peasants formed bands and attacked landowners and government officials.

Tsar Alexey appointed Duke Baryatinskiy, a ruthless military commander, to suppress the rebellion, and by early October he defeated the Cossack rebels near Simbirsk, where Razin was wounded but escaped by boat on the Volga River. Baryatinskiy's victory was followed by bloody government reprisals against peasants, including mass executions in the Nizhniy Novgorod region, some 250 miles east of Moscow; in all, more than 100,000 insurgents were killed. By early 1671 the uprising was suppressed. Razin was captured on April 14 and executed by quartering in front of St. Basil's Cathedral in Moscow on July 6, 1671.

Razin remains a symbol of a free and courageous spirit and his life and acts are invoked in Russian folklore, songs, and legends.

SEE ALSO: Bulavin's Rebellion, 1707–1708; Decembrists to the Rise of Russian Marxism; Pugachev's Rebellion, 1773–1775

References and Suggested Readings

- Avrich, P. (1976) Russian Rebels, 1600–1800: Four Great Rebellions Which Shook the Russian State in the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries. New York: W. W. Norton.
- Field, C. (1947) The Great Cossack: The Rebellion of Sten'ka Razin against Alexis Michaelovitch, Tsar of all the Russias. London: H. Jenkins.
- Lebedev, V. I. (1955) S. T. Razin's Rebellion (1667–1671). Moscow (in Russian).
- Peasants' Wars in Russia in the 17–18th Centuries* (1966) Moscow and Leningrad (in Russian).

Reclaim the Streets

John Jordan

Merging the radical ecology of Britain's powerful anti-road-building movement and the carnivalesque nature of the countercultural rave scene of the early 1990s, Reclaim the Streets (RTS) became a catalyst for the global anti-capitalist movements that came to light during the Seattle World Trade Organization (WTO) protests of 1999. Combining a radical ecological and social critique with creative forms of direct action and a dedication to non-hierarchical organization, the group's innovative tactics inspired a new generation of radical activists in the global North.

The Anti-Roads Movements: A Prehistory

As part of Britain's brutal neoliberal restructuring, Margaret Thatcher dismantled public transport and launched a colossal road-building program, claiming that nothing must obstruct "the great car economy." As new road schemes spread across the country, a small group of individuals got together in 1991 and set up RTS, which claimed on its flyers that it was "FOR walking, cycling, and cheap, or free, public transport, and AGAINST cars, roads, and the system that pushes them." Beginning with the capitalized "FOR" was a clear declaration from a group that would go on to build forms of politics that prioritized creating visions of the world they wanted over protest and confrontation. An exemplary action became the guerilla, nighttime painting of cycle lanes on the city's roads.

The group temporarily dissolved as its participants became immersed in the anti-roads movement, which first emerged with the protests against the M3 motorway extension at Twyford Down, Hampshire (1992–3). Protesters disrupted the road building by non-violently blockading the bulldozers with their bodies and setting up camps in the way of the contractors. This experience of mass direct action was then taken to the campaign against the M11 link road in East London (1993–4), which was due to destroy 350 houses and several ancient woodlands. The campaign became a laboratory of direct action. Imaginative tactics were developed to delay the contractors and increase their financial costs – including building tree houses and digging tunnels which literally embedded the activists in the earth they were protecting.

A key event that was to heavily influence the later tactics of RTS was the squatting of an entire street of 35 houses, Claremont Road, due for demolition. Claremont Road became known as a "Festival of Resistance," and the occupied street was traffic free for six months. A series of imaginative barricades was created to stop the inevitable eviction by the Department of Transport. These ranged from carcasses of cars filled with flower beds to a 100 ft scaffolding tower rising from the roofs with a sound system on top of it. At the time, the eviction was the longest and most costly in British history, at over £2 million and involving 700 riot police and 700 bailiffs. But this temporary reappropriation and transformation of public space, the meeting of different political cultures, and merging of art and activism, party and protest, were to become hallmarks of RTS.

In 1994, the Conservative UK government introduced a piece of legislation known as the Criminal Justice Act. This made the unlicensed playing of rave music to more than ten people in a public place illegal and many direct action protests, which previously had been covered under civil law, became criminal offenses. It restricted the right to silence upon arrest, increased police stop and search powers, and made the selling on of football match tickets an offense. Primarily aimed at destroying the UK's countercultures with their DIY (do-it-yourself) philosophy, the legislation targeted a wide range of people from so-called New Age travelers to fox hunt saboteurs and anti-nuclear campaigners. It catalyzed a diverse movement of opposition, which peaked during the London Hyde Park riot of October 1994, out of which sprang many of the new relationships that would form the basis of the relaunched RTS.

RTS Reemerges with the Street Party Form

Following the demolition of Claremont Road in December 1994, RTS was reformed. Realizing that the struggle against new roads had succeeded (between 1994 and 1996 the roads program was axed from £24 billion to £1.5 billion), it sought to recreate the experience of a liberated car-free street, but this time as a proactive act rather than one of reaction and protest. The tactic of the street party was developed as a subversion of the traditional British events that were historically used to mark establishment celebrations such as royal weddings.

On Sunday May 14, 1995, the first street party took place on Camden High Street, North London. Using tactics learned from rave culture, the actual location was kept secret until the last moment and participants were led from a public meeting point through the Underground to emerge at the street party location before the police had time to gather forces. The event began with an exquisite piece of theater involving two cars crashing into each other at the top of the street. As the drivers jumped out in mock road rage and began to destroy one another's cars with hammers, 500 people emerged from the Underground station into the traffic-free street which the crashed cars had blocked.

So began the first street party. Free food was handed out, a children's climbing frame set up in the crossroads, and people danced all day. Reclaiming the street from the privatization of the car and commerce and transforming it into public space for people and pleasure, RTS had developed what was to become an irresistible new form of protest.

With political and philosophical influence drawn from social ecologists such as Murray Bookchin, as well as "situationist" theory (primarily developed in France around 1968 by theorists such as Raoul Vaneigem and Guy Debord), RTS wanted to infuse protest with pleasure, to create events that were politically effective in terms of civil disobedience as well as effective in creating adventures that were both convivial and deeply attractive to participants. The other key principle was that of prefigurative politics. The street party was not simply a protest against cars but the creation of a vision of what city streets could be like in a system that prioritized people over profit and ecology over the economy.

The next street party took place on July 23, 1995, on Upper Street in Islington, London. It saw 3,000 people dancing, this time to a large sound system hidden inside an armored personnel carrier. Several tons of sand were dumped in the middle of the street, creating a sandpit for children to play in, and "tripods" blocked the traffic. Made from three pieces of scaffolding joined at the top and erected in the middle of the street with someone sitting on top, these "intelligent" barricades blocked the street from cars and yet opened it for pedestrians. The police were unable to move them without risking serious injury to the climbers.

The autumn and winter of 1995 saw street parties spread across the UK, with local groups organizing autonomously in numerous towns including Birmingham, Brighton, Manchester, Leeds, Bristol, and Leicester. Despite organizing street parties, none of the groups called themselves RTS: the London group name had simply become a verb, a form of action.

Recognizing the value of audacity to inspire social movements, London RTS decided to up the ante in the summer of 1996 and to have a street party on a motorway. On a hot July afternoon, on the M41 near Shepherds Bush, West London, an enormous street party erupted. Over 8,000 people swarmed through police lines to reclaim the baking tarmac. Giant banners that combined political messages, party decoration, and swings for children stretched across the six lanes. Huge carnival figures, 25 ft high women with hooped skirts, were pushed up and down the road. Underneath the skirts, hidden from view, activists were drilling into the tarmac with jack hammers and planting saplings, saved from the route of the M11 link road, into the motorway. This act of sublime imagination symbolically turned the motorway into a forest.

The M41 also saw the distribution of RTS's first propaganda, a beautiful pink and black poster that folded down into numerous different panels. A key passage pointed toward the group's future anti-capitalist position: "We are about taking back public space from the enclosed private arena. At its simplest this is an attack on cars as a principal agent of enclosure. It's about reclaiming the streets as public inclusive space from the private exclusive use of the car. But we believe in this as a broader principle, taking back those things which have been enclosed within capitalist circulation and returning them to collective use as a commons."

The Network Widens and Clarifies its Anti-Capitalist Spirit

The story of the trees being planted in the tarmac reached the ears of the Liverpool dockers, whose dismissal for refusing to cross a picket line led to a global solidarity movement and a two-and-a-half-year strike. Inspired, they suggested working together, and in autumn 1996 an event entitled Reclaim the Future took place in Liverpool. Despite severe police repression, members of RTS together with the Liverpool dockers were able to occupy the docks, cranes, and company headquarters triggering a 24-hour strike by tugboat captains. No vessels entered or left the docks.

The bringing together of working-class struggle, anarchism, radical ecology, and rave culture had enormous potential. A March for Social Justice was co-organized in London on April 12, 1997, with 10,000 people from a spectrum of traditional political leftist movements partying with the new generation of direct activists. This combination clearly proved threatening to the state. RTS's propaganda, 25,000 spoof copies of London's notoriously right-wing Evening Standard newspaper, entitled Evading Standards, was seized by the police and organizers preemptively arrested. One thousand police were mobilized and the day ended in confrontations in Trafalgar Square.

The summer of 1997 saw the evolution of the street party into a global phenomenon, with Australia and Finland taking the lead. Meanwhile, a delegate from RTS participated in the Second Encuentro (Spain, July–August), a Zapatista-instigated gathering bringing together 3,000 activists from 50 countries to weave a global network of resistance against neoliberalism. Out of the Encuentro emerged the idea of developing a concrete campaign against the WTO, which was to become the Peoples' Global Action (PGA) Network. RTS would play a key role in PGA as their first European convenors.

The RTS delegate returned from the Encuentro inspired, and convinced the London group that its anti-capitalist tendencies should become more explicit and that it could become a key player in the rising global movements, especially given the increasing use of the Internet as an activist tool. A global street party, part of a PGA Global Day of Action Against Capitalism, was called for in May 1998 to coincide with the meeting of the G8 (Group of Eight, most industrialized states) in Birmingham, UK, and ahead of the WTO's Second Ministerial Conference in Geneva, Switzerland. Under the banner "Our Resistance is as Transnational as Capital," a call was sent out and parties and actions took place in 70 cities in the first globally coordinated actions against these multilateral institutions by grassroots groups demanding their abolition rather than their reform.

Buoyed by the success of the first Global Day of Action, a call for an "International Day of Protest, Action, and Carnival Aimed at the Heart of the Global Economy: The Financial Centers and Banking Districts" was sent out by RTS and the PGA networks. Coinciding with the G8 meetings in Cologne, Germany, on Friday June 18, 1999, the event became known as "J18." From Nigeria to Uruguay, Seoul to Melbourne, Belarus to Dhaka, simultaneous actions took place. London RTS organized a Carnival against Capital, bringing 10,000 people into London's financial district. Eight thousand carnival masks were distributed, doubling up as propaganda and tools for choreographing large crowd movements using colored flags. To the surprise of the authorities, the crowd split into four different groups that made their separate ways to the London International Financial Futures Exchange (Liffe). Whilst live bands played and people danced to samba, hackers were trying to enter the Liffe computers and traders fought off attempts to physically occupy the building.

Live reports from around the globe were uploaded to the Internet using a system that was later to become the global Indymedia network. In a report following the London action, which caused £2 million damage, the police admitted that their communication system failed to cope

Demonstrators plant a garden in Parliament Square (London, UK) during May Day 2000 Guerilla Gardening actions by Reclaim the Streets (RTS). A shared ideal of community ownership of public spaces by RTS activists inspired this and other direct action events by the group. Corporate globalization, private property, and the various negative aspects of car culture (pollution, highway construction, alienation) are the most common targets of RTS. (© Gideon Mendel/CORBIS) with what they said was one of the most highly organized actions they had ever experienced. The front page of the Financial Times declared: "City of London Besieged by Anti-Capitalists." Meanwhile, activists from RTS traveled to Seattle to help train members of the Direct Action Network, encouraged by the audacity of J18, who were busy organizing for the WTO blockades.

The Final Months of RTS

With the November 1999 Seattle actions blasting the movements into the global spotlight, RTS found it had lost its momentum. An action to coincide with the Seattle protests failed to mobilize numbers. Heavy police intimidation and increasingly hysterical British media coverage created strains within the group.

Organizing London's May Day protests as part of the third Global Day of Action Against Capitalism the following year, RTS tried to redirect itself and called for a mass guerilla gardening action with a leaflet claiming, "This is not a protest." The aim was to turn Parliament Square into an urban vegetable allotment. On the eve of the event, the Evening Standard front page claimed "Army on Standby for May Day Riot," and the police planned their largest mobilization in 30 years. Three thousand people turned up to garden and, despite 14,500 police, a McDonald's restaurant was left suspiciously unguarded. Inevitably, the media reported its broken windows rather than the thousands of planted vegetables and flowers.

RTS disbanded but many participants went on to become key participants in the global anti-capitalist summit convergences and organizers of numerous groups including the Genetic Engineering Network, the Wombles, Dissent!, the Rising Tide Network, the Clandestine Insurgent Rebel Clown Army, and the Climate Camp.

During May Day 2000, a stunning subversion of Winston Churchill's statue took place. A strip of green turf placed on his bald head transformed him into a Mohican-coiffed punk. An iconic image that was perhaps an appropriate epitaph to a movement whose cheek and creativity helped sow the seeds for a new form of global grassroots politics which celebrated autonomy and direct action, and never wanted to take power but to break it into little pieces for all to share.

SEE ALSO: Debord, Guy (1931–1994) and the Spectacle; Earth First!; Global Day of Action Against Capitalism, June 18 (J18), 1999; Global Justice Movement and Resistance; Indymedia Global Justice Campaign, 2000s; May 1968 French Uprisings; Peoples' Global Action Network; Situationists; Vaneigem, Raoul (b. 1934); World Trade Organization (WTO) Protests, Seattle, 1999; Zapatismo; Zapatistas, EZLN, and the Chiapas Uprising

References and Suggested Readings

- Anonymous (1997) Reclaim the Streets. Do or Die: Voices from Earth First! 6: 1–14. Available at www.eco-action.org/dod/no6/index.html (downloaded September 24, 2007).
- Hamm, M. (n.d.) Reclaim the Streets: Global Protest, Local Space. Available at www.republicart.net/disc/hybridresistance/hamm01_en.htm (downloaded September 21, 2007).

- Klein, N. (2000) Reclaim the Streets. In No Logo: Taking Aim at the Brand Bullies. New York: Picador, pp. 311–23.
- Mckay, G. (Ed.) (1998) DIY Culture: Party and Protest in Nineties Britain. London and New York: Verso.
- Notes From Nowhere (Ed.) (2003) We Are Everywhere: The Irresistible Rise of Global Anticapitalism. London and New York: Verso.

Reclus, Elisée (1830–1905)

Benjamin J. Pauli

Perhaps the most important figure in French anarchism after Proudhon, Elisée Reclus made significant contributions to anarchist theory and practice in the latter part of the nineteenth century. Reclus was born in 1830 in the village of Sainte-Foy-la-Grande in southwest France. As the son of a pastor, he received a Protestant education and upbringing, and the Christian values he was imbued with at an early age colored his thinking for the rest of his life. Reclus went to school in Sainte-Foy and Montauban in France and attended a Moravian school in Neuwied, Germany, where he also taught. Nominally a theology student, Reclus in fact gravitated toward the sciences. During his term at the University of Berlin in 1851 he attended lectures given by the renowned geographer Carl Ritter, which sparked what would become a lifelong passion for geography.

It was as a student that Reclus began to develop his radical political ideas; his objections to Napoleon III's coup of 1851 forced him to flee France with his brother Elie. After working as a teacher and a farm laborer in England and Ireland, Reclus spent several years traveling through North and South America. Not only did the trip have a major impact on his geographic sensibilities, it helped to shape his political sentiments as well. His hatred of slavery was emboldened during his employment as a tutor for a slaveholding family in Louisiana, and he tried his hand at establishing a cooperative agricultural community in present-day Colombia. After the failure of the latter venture, Reclus returned to France in 1857, where he began to build his reputation as a geographer and where his political involvement began in earnest.

Throughout the 1860s, he and Elie were involved in numerous activities associated with the cooperative movement. They helped to direct a cooperative credit society from 1863 to 1868, helped to found the first Rochdale-type cooperative in Paris in 1864, and published the cooperativist journal L'Association. Elisée, more than his brother, had mixed feelings about the viability of this strategy of social reform, though he would not come to repudiate cooperativism until later. The brothers also came into contact with Bakunin during this time; they are reputed to have been involved with his secret International Alliance of Social Democracy. They also participated in the International Workingmen's Association and in Bakunin's efforts to radicalize the League of Peace and Freedom.

Perhaps the most significant political event of Reclus's life, as was the case for a generation of radicals, was the brief existence of the Paris Commune (though his personal contribution was somewhat limited and he later downplayed his role). During the Franco-Prussian War, he joined the National Guard in defense of Paris, fearing that the destruction of the French Republic would hinder his more radical goals for society. Reclus served in the balloon corps, under the direction of the famous photographer and balloonist Nadar. In the elections of February 1871, he even went so far as to run as a candidate, despite his anarchist sympathies. Reclus's column was captured in April 1871 by Versailles troops, and he was sentenced to transportation for life. After almost a year in prison, however, Reclus's sentence was commuted and he was released, thanks to international pressure stemming largely from his reputation as a scientist of considerable renown. Upon leaving prison in 1872, Reclus promptly fled to Switzerland, where he would spend the next two decades of his life.

It was only after the experience of the Commune that Reclus definitively rejected reconciliation with the parliamentary political process and fully fleshed out his anarchist philosophy. Reclus gradually became involved with the flourishing anarchist movement in Switzerland, the ranks of which were filled with political exiles from the Commune and around the world. He became a prominent member of the Jura Federation and contributed substantially to fellow exile Peter Kropotkin's journals Le Révolté and La Révolte. Reclus was one of the earliest advocates of what came to be known as anarchocommunism, and his efforts helped to secure its official acceptance by the Swiss anarchists. During these years, Reclus occasionally found himself embroiled in controversy. The decidedly untraditional joint marriage of his two daughters in 1882, fully supported (and in fact presided over) by Reclus, caused a considerable storm, including demands that he be expelled from Switzerland (though Reclus would remain in the country for another eight years). In Switzerland, and after his return to France in 1890, Reclus also continued his geographic work, composing his two principal contributions to the field, La Nouvelle Géographie universelle, la terre et les hommes, 19 volumes (1875–94), and L'Homme et la Terre (completed shortly before his death). During the last ten years of his life, Reclus worked as a professor of comparative geography at the Université Nouvelle in Brussels, dying of heart disease in 1905.

In its emphasis on science and progress, Reclus's thought is clearly a product of its time. He portrays science as a liberating force, sweeping aside the cobwebs of ignorance and superstition that have historically plagued humanity and ushering in a new era in which humankind is able to understand its environment and consciously manipulate it. The course of history, as he saw it, pointed toward a future in which archaic forms of authority are dissolved, individual freedom and initiative are liberated from all constraints, and centralized political and economic organization is overcome by advancements in productive capacity and grassroots solidarity. Mentally, Reclus believed that the modern man, conditioned by the freedom of thought necessary for the scientific enterprise, was eminently receptive to anarchism's radical social critique. Materially, Reclus believed that technological development made it possible to increase production to such an extent that scarcity could be overcome and the utopian society once thought to be a dream could be concretely attained. The measuring stick of human progress for Reclus was not, however, merely technological or economic, but consisted more importantly of individual self-realization and spiritual fulfillment: in his vision of the ideal society, every individual is able to fulfill his or her potentiality through the natural unfolding of innate capabilities.

The trajectory of progress, Reclus suggested, consists of alternating periods of evolution and revolution, in which evolutionary changes produce an ever-increasing build-up of pressure that eventually bursts forth in the form of drastic, revolutionary change. Despite his optimism that the general course of history would ultimately culminate in an anarchist society, Reclus's conception of progress was not overly simplistic. Historical movement is not, he realized, a matter of straightforward evolution: progression in some areas is accompanied by regression in others, and self-conscious historical subjects are faced with the task of encouraging the progressive trends and discouraging the regressive. Evident historical trends suggested to Reclus that the coming anarchist society was inevitable, but he saw it as something that would only be realized in the distant future, especially later in life after he had witnessed the disheartening inefficacy of the anarchist movement in the 1890s.

While Reclus always stressed the unique significance of human self-consciousness, he saw profound continuities between the human and the natural world, and located human beings within a natural order regulated by natural laws that transcend the man-made laws of society. While he saw submission to the ordinances of the state as a kind of enslavement, Reclus believed that submission to natural law was compatible with human freedom. Reclus visualized the natural order as characterized by a profound organic unity. Accordingly, situating human beings within their natural context helps to reveal the vast network of interdependencies within which individual initiative is operative.

Reclus drew important connections between his scientific work as a geographer and his radical political philosophy. His thought is colored by an overriding concern with the implications of the relationship between human beings and their natural environment for human organization. He saw the territorial boundaries established by states as artificial impositions that fail to accurately demarcate the natural settings of human association, thus impinging upon the innate tendencies toward cooperation that are strengthened by shared conditions. Emphasizing the perpetual interactions between human beings and their natural environment helps to reveal the ways in which the well-being of the former is bound up with the well-being of the latter. Reclus laments the destruction of the natural world in the name of "progress," and attempts to expand the sphere of human concern and respect beyond a narrowly anthropocentric worldview, while at the same time emphasizing the consequences of environmental destruction for humans themselves. Particularly in his later work, Reclus envisions humans working to modify the environment to suit their needs, while preserving and even amplifying its beauty rather than conquering and destroying it.

Reclus's concern with the subjection of nature is one aspect of his effort to expand the critique of domination to new dimensions. Reclus condemned racism for its undermining of human solidarity and equality, arguing against the contemporary inclusion of race as a factor in historical development, and maintaining that differences between groups of people are primarily the cause of their environmental setting. He also opposed the oppression of women, challenging the patriarchal model of the family, championing sexual equality, and advocating extralegal "free unions" that would be entered into voluntarily and on the basis of mutual affection. Furthermore, Reclus believed that animals, too, were entitled to the utmost development of which they are capable, and opposed their use for meat and scientific testing. He even went so far as to condemn the constrictions imposed by clothing, praising nudity and the beauty of the natural body. For Reclus, ushering in a free society meant challenging domination on every level, and effecting a transformation of everyday life.

Despite his radicalism in these areas, Reclus's thought evidences values that are striking in their traditionalism, which may be seen as legacies of his Christian upbringing. Distinguishing religious values from institutionalized religion – which he bitterly opposed – Reclus believed that anarchism could better fulfill the ideals of Christianity than the religion itself. Central to this endeavor was the linking of individual self-realization to a commitment to love and care for others. Liberty and individuality, Reclus argued, must be seen as inextricably intertwined with community and solidarity. He cautioned against regarding liberty as an end-in-itself, arguing that it was but a means of securing the ultimate ends: love and universal brotherhood. Emphasizing love, Reclus felt, would help to avoid the egoism likely to spring from an overemphasis on liberty. Reclus greatly valued diversity but wanted all of humanity to see itself as involved in a grand collective project. He based his ethics on the primacy of the individual conscience, which he believed gravitated naturally to the consideration of the interests of others, as manifest in human beings' innate tendency toward mutual aid. Rejection of a codified moral law was not, for Reclus, commensurate with amorality or nihilism – in fact, he saw the ability to cultivate feelings of genuine responsibility toward others as dependent upon moral autonomy. When morality is presented in the form of commands which we are bound to obey, it fails to assimilate itself into our very manner of being. God was absent from Reclus's worldview, but the moral order over which He once presided was largely integrated into Reclus's naturalistic understanding of instinctive human proclivities.

The specific vision of anarchism which Reclus saw as embodying his various concerns was, as it came to be known during the 1870s, anarcho-communism. The doctrine was adopted by the Congress of the Jura Federation in 1880 and Reclus, along with Peter Kropotkin, was one of its principal exponents. Anarchocommunism differed from Proudhon's mutualism and Bakunin's collectivism by maintaining that distribution should be managed in accordance with need, rather than the extent to which an individual is able to contribute to society. Reclus, however, preferred to describe the arrangement as distribution according to solidarity rather than need, for this better captured the interrelations between the individual and the whole and the context in which individual needs had to be evaluated.

The proper way of bringing such a social order about was a subject of much dispute during Reclus's time, and he counted himself among the most enthusiastic advocates of "propaganda by the deed." Though he never personally engaged in acts of violence, Reclus believed that a measure of violence was a regrettable necessity in any effort to overhaul the social order, and tended to emphasize the inevitability and nobility of intent that underlay exemplary actions of terrorism rather than their occasionally unsavory consequences. Reclus also urged the expropriation of the products of human labor, holding that this was "restoration" rather than theft – a controversial argument at the time. As these positions suggest, in Reclus's view revolutionary activity had to be directed against the existing order. After his experiences with the cooperative movement, he came to see efforts to construct alternative communities as counter-revolutionary diversions. The targets of Reclus's revolutionary activity were both the state and the socioeconomic order; he did not believe that the abolition of the former was sufficient to effect a conversion of the latter. The preeminent form of resistance in which Reclus himself engaged was the development of consciousness through the dissemination of revolutionary propaganda, which he thought would incite the workers and peasants to rebellion.

Reclus was well known for putting his anarchist beliefs into practice in his personal life. To his ethical objection to the slaughter of animals he joined a lifelong vegetarianism; his opposition to racism was illustrated by his marriage to a woman who was half Senegalese; his rejection of patriarchy was evidenced by his entrance into "free unions" with two women and the extension of such a right to his daughters; and his belief in the existence of a natural morality and the importance of ethical, cooperative behavior is reflected in his reputation for being a consistently generous and kind person. Given his international stature in the scientific world and the high regard in which his personal qualities were held, Reclus, like his friend Kropotkin, helped bring to anarchism a measure of respectability. He helped to ground anarchism scientifically and philosophically, offering a complex and ambitious vision of a profoundly holistic universalism, in which self-realization necessarily encompassed consideration of other human beings, animals, and the natural world, in which instincts of solidarity and love took primacy as the cornerstones of the social order, and in which technological development and expanded critical consciousness provided human beings with both the ability and will to combat domination in all of its many manifestations.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism, France; Anarchocommunist, Bakunin, Mikhail Alexandrovich (1814–1876); Kropotkin, Peter (1842–1921); Paris Commune, 1871; Proudhon, Pierre Joseph (1809–1865)

References and Suggested Readings

- Clark, J. P. & Martin, C. (Eds.) (2004) Anarchy, Geography, Modernity: The Radical Social Thought of Elisée Reclus. Lanham, MD Lexington.
- Dunbar, G. S. (1978) Elisée Reclus: Historian of Nature. Hamden, CT: Archon Books.
- Fleming, M. (1988) The Geography of Freedom: The Odyssey of Elisée Reclus, 2nd ed. Montreal: Black Rose Books.
- Ishill, J. (1927) Elisée and Elie Reclus: In Memoriam. Berkeley Heights, NJ: Oriole Press.

Red Brigades

Dario Azzellini

Brigate Rosse (BR) or Red Brigades, founded in Milan in 1970, were an Italian armed communist organization. The BR formed out of neighborhood collectives and committees at the Pirelli, Sit-Siemens, and Michelin factories in the Milan region at the end of a mass labor upsurge from 1968 to 1969. In 1969 the committees joined together under the coordination of the Metropolitan Political Collective (CPM). In the aftermath of the December 12, 1969 bombing in Milan, which killed 16 civilians in what many considered a state-sanctioned action, the popular movements concluded that conventional forms of dissent were ineffective in reversing state repression, and decided that armed struggle was necessary in response to the class war declared by the ruling class. For many Italian movements, the presumption that the state was unresponsive to popular non-violent protest created a sense of anguish and despondency, especially since the partisans had defeated the fascists in World War II, only to be once again repressed in the postwar political compact, for all practical purposes, invalidating legal means to advance working-class power.

In September 1970 the Sinistra Proletaria (SP; Proletarian Left), an offshoot of the CPM, dissolved as an organization of lawful dissent and political struggle and in November 1970 militant ex-members reconstituted themselves as the first Red Brigade in Pirelli. The founders of the BR concluded that armed actions and political-military struggle were a requirement "to show the way to take over power and install the dictatorship of the proletariat." The organizers considered Italian Fascism and Nazi occupation during World War II were substituted in the postwar era by an imperialist state operating in the interest of multinational corporations. On a global scale they saw themselves as organizationally committed to Marxism-Leninism and proletarian Cultural Revolution analogous to corresponding urban guerrillas such as the Tupamaros of Uruguay, Black Panthers in the US, and Rote Armee Fraktion (RAF; Red Army Faction) of West Germany. At their inception, the BR found sympathy among workers and a wide range of leftists, despite considerable ideological differences. While many leftists were opposed to the Italian Communist Party (PCI), the BR saw PCI as a broad progressive party with a bureaucratic leadership that betrayed the ideals of the anti-fascist communist partisans. In turn, PCI condemned the BR as fascist, calling on workers to report recognized members of the armed front to the police. It was not until 1979 that a BR militant denounced by a PCI member was arrested.

Armed Propaganda

Among the founding members of BR were Renato Curcio, Maria Cagol, Alberto Franceschini, and Prospero Gallinari. In 1971 Mario Moretti, a Sit-Siemens industrial worker, joined the BR, later becoming a notable leader of the organization. As a result, BR expanded a political presence at Sit-Siemens and proletarian neighborhoods of Milan. They supported worker struggles with small attacks on automobiles, factory department foremen, and members and adherents of fascist organizations and causes. The BR had significant support in factories and two proletarian neighborhoods. On April 25, 1971 and 1972, the anniversary of the victory over Italian Fascism (1945), the residents of the communities raised more than 200 self-made BR flags on their roofs in celebration. Militant action was viewed as a means to advance specific industrial struggles. In March 1972 the BR kidnapping and interrogation of a high-level Siemens engineer for a few hours was intended to comprehend how the company's plans to restructure a factory would deleteriously affect workers. From 1970 to 1975 the BR attacks did not include intentional killings or injury.

Following the Uruguayan Tupamaros urban guerrilla model in 1973, the BR expanded its presence and organized into two columns in Milan and Turin, each with several brigades operating in factories and neighborhoods. In late 1973 the work of the columns was subdivided into three sectors, or fronts: (1) organizing large factories, (2) struggle against counterrevolution, and (3) logistical and strategic planning. In Turin BR recruited new members at the Fiat automotive plant and other factories. In December 1973 BR kidnapped Fiat staff director Ettore Amerio for nine days. In early 1974 the BR took the strategic decision to slow down the activities in factories and direct attacks against leading politicians and representatives in Italian government.

The first national action was carried out on April 18, 1974, kidnapping Judge Mario Sossi in Genoa. The BR demanded the courts reexamine the evidence against militants of the armed organization Gruppo XXII Ottobre, on trial in Genoa. Sossi was released on May 23 after authorities agreed to their demands. The new direction toward political action led to reorganization of the BR structure. The large factory and anti-counterrevolution fronts were refashioned to coordinate activities on a national level. In 1973 and 1974 BR expanded with the founding of new columns in the Veneto region, organizing workers from the Breda shipyards and petrochemical industries in Mestre; and construction of BR columns in the Liguria and Marche regions. In the summer of 1974 a logistic front was built. Curcio and Franceschini were arrested. On June 17, 1974 two people were killed when the BR stormed a section of the fascist party Movimento Sociale Italiano (MSI) in Padua. The killing, even if not intentional, was claimed as militant anti-fascism. On May 15, 1975 the BR carried out their first intentional armed attack on a person by shooting a local representative of the ruling Christian Democracy (DC) in the legs. A column in Rome was built and the first kidnapping for financing was carried out. On June 5 Maria Cagol and a member of the military police (Carabinieri) were killed in a shooting.

The first intentional killing carried out by the BR was of public prosecutor Francesco Coco, who broke the agreement that put an end to the kidnapping of Sossi. Coco and two bodyguards were killed on June 8, 1976. The same year the front of the big factories was integrated into the front against counterrevolution and the whole organization concentrated on the attack at the heart of the state. In December 1976 the Milan BR militant Walter Alasia and two policemen were killed in a shooting, and the Milan column adopted his name. On February 2, 1977 the Roman column in its first action wounded a high exponent of the ministry of justice as part of a campaign to impede the first big trial against BR militants in Turin. On April 28 the BR killed the president of the Turin lawyers association. The trial was suspended several times until 1978. In June 1977 the BR started a campaign against "counterrevolutionary" journalists, wounding and killing various of them in the forthcoming months. In 1978 they started a campaign against the penal system that had turned more repressive with the opening of high security prisons in July 1977 and killed

Aldo Moro, twice prime minister of Italy, was kidnapped by the Red Brigades on March 16, 1978 to protest the compromise of the Italian Communist Party with the Christian Democrats. In exchange for Moro's release, the Red Brigades demanded the government free imprisoned members. This photograph was taken on April 20, 1978 during Moro's captivity. After the Italian government refused to release jailed Red Brigade members, Moro was found dead on May 9, 1978. (AP/PA Photos) four employees and representatives of the penal system.

On March 16, 1978 the BR kidnapped the DC chairman Aldo Moro, who was the central figure for an opening of the government towards the PCI (the historic compromise). Five of his bodyguards were killed. The BR asked for the liberation of 13 prisoners. Many government representatives shared an interest in avoiding the historical compromise. For the first time the state refused to negotiate and Moro was killed 55 days later by the BR. In 1978 the BR started a campaign against the anti-terror units in answer to their shoot-to-kill policies, killing 12 agents up to 1980. The BR made numerous attacks at large factories. In this context on January 24, 1979 they unintentionally shot and killed a PCI member and labor unionist who had been responsible for the arrest of a BR militant. While the police repression led many people from the movements and other armed organizations to join the BR, with the killing of Moro and the trade unionist and the high level of state militarization, BR popular support waned.

Disintegration and Division

In July 1979 the collective leadership of BR prisoners at the high security jail on Asinara Island near Sardinia sent a 120-page document to the BR strategic director detailing their view of a new politics to follow. The document proposed steps to initiate a popular war. The director disagreed with the position of the inmates without specifying his reasons, and in October the prisoners demanded his resignation.

Renato Curcio and Mario Moretti, two leading members of BR, offered assessments of the era. Curcio (Curcio & Scialoja 1993), among the Asinara inmates, later said the director recognized the political weakness of the BR that had to be overcome by a general debate and process of convergence with other armed groups. Moretti, at that time part of the directory, argues in a look back at the time (Rossanda, Moretti, & Mosca 1994) that given the isolation of the inmates, the proposal was too remote from the reality of life in Italy. Moreover, he said, the inmates were upset because they had asked the BR to organize escapes, but the BR failed, due to lack of organizational capacity. While the kidnapping of Aldo Moro created an impression of a strong military organization, in reality the BR had limited armed capacity for major actions, and as a consequence members were rapidly arrested and captured. Moretti also notes that other armed organizations and the movement as a whole were significantly less extensive than imagined by prison inmates.

On October 2 the Asinara inmates decided to destroy the prison. After a night of fighting with firearms, bombs, and direct confrontations, the prison was in ruins. The Milan column also asked the director to cease criticism of the lack of factory politics. On January 19, 1980 the BR killed the vice director of the petrochemical industries in Mestre as a last attack in the factory context.

The arrest on February 21 and later collaboration of the BR militant Patrizio Peci led to hundreds of arrests. Several deadly BR attacks on representatives of the judiciary and the penal system followed. A new BR column in Naples started to act. But the BR was unable to respond to the restructuring of Fiat at the end of 1980 which led to a total defeat of the labor movement. On November 12 the Milan column Walter Alasia carried out a deadly attack, signing as his own organization BR-WA. All initiatives to reconcile positions failed. On December 12 the BR kidnapped the director of the penal division of the ministry of justice and liberated him on January 15, 1981 after the Asinara prison was closed.

The political differences among the columns and fronts of the BR became irreconcilable in April 1981. The Naples column and the prison front started to operate together on their own. And while the kidnapping of the director of the petrochemical industries in Mestre (May 20 to July 5) was still signed as BR, some militants of the Veneto column, responsible for the operation, split off and formed a group disbanded a few months later. In October 1981 the BR strategic director decided on the kidnapping of US General James Lee Dozier and to operate further on as BR-Partito Comunista Combattente (PCC; Communist Combatant Party). The BR as such ceased to exist. Beside the BR-PCC and the BR-WA, the BR-Partito della Guerriglia (PG; Party of the Guerrilla) also emerged.

Between 1973 and 1988 a total of 911 people faced charges as members of the BR. In January 1987 many prisoners from different BR organizations, including Curcio and Moretti, declared collectively that the historical experience of the BR had ended and the new struggle was to reach a political solution of the conflict, liberation of all prisoners, and return of those exiled. However, the Italian government did not respond to the initiative.

BR-Walter Alasia

After one year of dissent with the BR the Milan column decided to act autonomously and killed the director of staff of the Magneti Marelli factory on November 12, 1980. On November 28 they killed the technical director of Falk, which led to their official expulsion from the BR. The BR-WA were supporting a strategic intervention in factories and social services (they had a hospital brigade) to fight capitalist restructuring. Until 1982 the BR-WA carried out a series of deadly attacks, kidnappings, and other activities in factories. From December 1980 to 1982 five militants were killed during police operations, many were arrested, and the BR-WA ceased to exist in January 1983. Between 1982 and 1985, 113 members of BR-WA faced charges.

BR-Partito della Guerriglia

The BR-PG emerged primarily out of the prison front and the Naples column and split from the BR in 1981. They carried out the kidnapping of Christian Democratic politician Ciro Cirillo on April 27, 1981, killing one bodyguard and driver, releasing him on July 24 in exchange for money. On June 10 they kidnapped former BR militant Roberto Peci (brother of Patrizio), a collaborator with the police in 1976 and 1979 whose information led to many arrests. Peci was interrogated, sentenced to death, and killed on August 3.

The BR-PG became known on December 1981 when the organization published its founding thesis that Italian society was destined for civil war requiring revolutionary forces and confrontation. In January 1982 numerous militants and leaders of the BR-PG were arrested, after which the organization carried out several deadly attacks and armed robberies. On October 21, 1982, during a bank robbery in Turin, the BR-PG killed two unarmed guards, which focused more attention on their declaration. Most BR prisoners cut relations with the BR-PG, and the organization was disbanded following further arrests in November and December of 1982. Between 1982 and 1985, 147 members of the BR-PG faced criminal charges.

BR-Partito Comunista Combattente

On December 17, 1981 the BR-PCC kidnapped US General James Lee Dozier, who was freed on January 28, 1982 by Special Forces of the police after a member collaborated with the police. The government arrested suspects and was accused of torturing militants, which led to confessions and hundreds of arrests. In May 1982 the BR-PCC debated the possibility of strategic retreat but continued to carry out one deadly attack a year up to 1988. They participated with French Action Directe (AD), the Belgian Cellules Communistes Combattantes (CCC; Communist Combatant Cells), and the RAF in "buildup of an anti-imperialistic front in Western Europe.” On February 15, 1984 the broad front killed US diplomat Leamon Hunt in Rome. In October 1985 the BR-PCC split, with the formation of the independent BR-Unione dei Comunisti Combattenti (UCC; Union of Combatant Communists). Many BR-PCC prisoners joined a debate on a political solution in June 1987. Militants opposing this view were responsible for a deadly attack on an Italian general in April 1988. In September/October 1988 most active militants were arrested and the BR-PCC disappeared. Between 1982 and 1989, 93 members of the BR-PCC faced criminal charges.

BR-Unione Comunisti Combattenti

BR-UCC criticized the BR for not developing strong internal leadership after 1978. Thus, “the foundation of a new political group became necessary that orientates itself in Marxism-Leninism.” They saw their main task to place the BR-UCC “at the top of the proletariat and fight its struggle till takeover of power.” In their first attack on February 21, 1986 the BR-UCC killed the head of the economic department of the presidency of the council, an attack in which one member of the organization was also killed. In Rome on March 20, 1987 the BR-UCC committed their second and last attack, killing air force General Licio Giorgeri. After numerous arrests in May and June 1987 the organization disbanded. Between 1986 and 1988, 73 members of the BR-UCC faced charges.

(New) BR-per la costruzione del Partito Comunista Combattente

As an instrument to reinitiate armed struggle the BR-PCC sponsored the Nuclei Comunisti Combattenti (NCC; Communist Combatant Cores). In the early 1990s the NCC claimed responsibility for two relatively small bomb attacks, but after several arrests the organization disappeared and assumed the name BR in 1999. On May 20, 1999 Massimo D’Antona, consultant of the ministry of labor, was shot dead by the new BR-PCC. In February 2000 they declared that “with reassuming the revolutionary attack the fighting avant-gardes took over the strategic task to raise the level of confrontation in the context of a long-lasting class war.”

On March 19, 2002 the new BR-PCC killed Marco Biagi, economic advisor of the Berlusconi government and an architect of a labor law dismantling workers’ rights. On March 3, 2003 two militants of the new BR-PCC were involved in a train shooting in which a railway policeman and one of the gunmen were killed. The discovery of information related to the organization led to a new round of arrests in October. One of those arrested collaborated with police, who then arrested several BR-PCC militants who were later sentenced to life imprisonment. The court established that there were no organic links between the old and new BR-PCC, and from 2003 to 2007 no BR-PCC actions have been documented.

SEE ALSO: Fascism, Protest and Revolution; Germany, Red Army Faction (Baader-Meinhof Group); Italian Communist Party; Marxism; Mussolini, Benito (1883–1945); NAP (Nuclei Armati Proletari)

References and Suggested Readings

- Curcio, R. & Scialoja, M. (1993) A viso aperto. Milan: Arnoldo Mondadori.
- Progetto Memoria (Eds.) (1994) La mappa perduta. Rome: Sensibili alle foglie.
- Progetto Memoria (Eds.) (1996) Le parole scritte. Rome: Sensibili alle foglie.
- Red Notes (Eds.) (1978) Italy 1977–78: Living With An Earthquake. London: Red Notes.
- Rossanda, R., Moretti, M., & Mosca, C. (1994) Brigate Rosse. Una storia italiana. Milan: Arnoldo Mondadori.
- Tarrow, S. (1989) Democracy and Disorder: Protest and Politics in Italy 1965–75. Oxford: Clarendon Press.

Red Scotland and the Scottish radical left, 1880–1932

William Kenefick

In January 1880, in a lecture presented by the Statistical Society in London on “The Strikes of the Last Ten Years,” it was stated there had been some 2,352 strikes across Britain in that year, and that 473 strikes took place in Scotland. Indeed, Glasgow topped the league of the “Top-Ten Strike Towns” in Britain, with Edinburgh/Leith and Dundee in fourth and eighth position, respectively. The report stated that wage demands were “in ninety percent of cases” the major source of dispute, but that north of the border other forces were at work, with labor leaders in Scotland fostering a “constant spirit of opposition” in the collieries and mines.

The report gave no detail as to the cause of this “spirit of opposition,” but it nonetheless demonstrates willingness on the part of Scottish workers to campaign on wider political issues rather than just economic ones. This period also coincides with the foundation of socialism in Scotland, although it was not widespread. But the absence of socialism does not preclude the influence of other forms of political action on trade union formation. The radical campaign to overturn elements of the Criminal Law Amendment Act – introduced in tandem with the 1871 Trade Union Act (which made picketing illegal, rendering a strike almost impossible to enforce) – and a growing “distrust of middle-class Liberal politics” politicized many workers and trade unionists across Scotland.

This political impulse clearly derived from radical liberalism and emerged from within the ranks of the skilled artisans or “labor aristocracy.” During the 1870s the Scottish labor movement was small and somewhat isolated from the majority of working men and women. By the following decade, however, it broke free from this isolation at the same time that international socialism was undergoing a renaissance. Socialism had taken root in France and many other areas in Europe from the 1860s and 1870s onward, but only emerged in England in the early 1880s with the formation of the Marxist Social Democratic Federation (SDF).

The appearance of socialism in Scotland had a similar provenance, but its influences were rather less Marxist than in England. It was derived mainly from “ethical socialism” and in particular the theories of American land reformer Henry George. George published Poverty and Progress in Britain in the early 1880s and widely toured Scotland lecturing on the issue of land reform. At a simple level, he proposed a land tax on the rich and propertied class and this financial burden could only be reduced through the redistributing of property. In Scotland land reform became closely associated with the issue of home rule, and together they impacted Scottish politics greatly in the 1880s, pushing the Scots to the forefront of international socialism.

Henry George became an important influence on the nascent socialist movement in Scotland, and his theories helped reestablish an older historic link with a radical “anti-landlord” tradition that stretched back to the days of Chartism. Thoughts of socialism may rarely have troubled the average workingman in Scotland, but support for land reform and home rule was popular and widespread, and through the agitations of the labor movement, “nationalist and internationalist sentiments” – so clearly articulated by Scottish-born Irish nationalist James Connolly as depending one on the other – “developed hand-in-hand.” This was clearly seen at the time of the Battle of the Braes in Skye in 1882, when the Scottish highland peasants took on the might of the British landowning class. Copying the tactics of the Irish Land League, the crofters initiated and extended the use of rent strikes and the occupation of sheep farms. They also destroyed fences and mutilated livestock. It was a sophisticated political movement and an important turning point in the struggle over the land question in Scotland.

The immediate short-term result was the establishment of the parliamentary inquiry into the “Conditions of Crofters and Cottars in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland” in 1883, and it created an atmosphere profoundly sympathetic to the crofters’ cause and roused great hostility toward the landlords. According to Richards (2002), the Crofters’ War was clearly “a great triumph for popular protest,” producing “a revolution in land tenure and social condition in the Highlands” and leading to “the creation of the first independent ‘labour’ party in the British parliament, the Crofters’ party.” The resulting Crofters Act of 1886 “was a decisive and unambiguous piece of class legislation on behalf of the common people: it was specifically designed to prevent clearance.”

The crofters’ “popular protest” inspired other groups, particularly Scottish highland migrants and Irish emigrants who worked cheek by jowl in Glasgow and urban and industrial west Scotland. This was evident at the time of the formation of the National Union of Dock Labourers (NUDL) in Glasgow in February 1889 – the first mass union of general dock workers in Britain. The Catholic Irish-dominated dock workers in western Scotland and Protestant Scottish highlanders formed the next biggest group (about 60 percent and 20 percent respectively). They coalesced around the issue of land reform and Irish and Scottish home rule in the 1880s and were led by two prominent Irish-born land reformers, trade unionists, and early socialists, Edward McHugh and Richard McGhee. They took a lead from the activities of the Irish Land League in pioneering the use of the rural boycott as a new industrial strategy (whereby the union cut off the supply of labor to an employer or shipping line). They also used the “go-slow” (known as Ca-canny – where dockers worked at the same rate as strike breakers or “scab labor”). With the assistance of Charles Kennedy and Hugh Johnson, two other prominent Irishmen in Glasgow, the NUDL went on to organize the entire west of Scotland and leading east coast ports, the western English seaboard, much of eastern Ireland including Belfast, Derry, and Dublin, and Cork in the southwest.

This movement gathered pace just under two years after Michael Davitt, leader of the Irish Land League, visited Skye in May 1887 to commemorate the passing of the Crofters’ Holding Act the year before. Indeed, the Irish Land League helped unite rural Ireland and consolidate Irish opinion across industrial Scotland, and when linked to the crofters’ agitations a strong bond of unity was established between the Scottish highlanders, Ireland and the Irish in Scotland, and a broad swathe of workers across industrial Scotland.

In the meantime, the independent labor movement was beginning to grow and socialism was taking root in Scotland. The SDF first formed a branch in Edinburgh in 1884, and the breakaway anti-parliamentary Socialist League (SL) was formed shortly afterwards. All these groups became firmly established across many areas of Scotland and their early influences were the English Marxist William Morris, American land reformer Henry George, Austrian socialist Andreas Scheu, ex-Paris Communist Leo Melliet, and the Rev. John Glasse of Edinburgh. But the Scots also acted independently when they formed the Scottish Land and Labour League (SLLL) in 1884, and the Scottish Labour Party and the Scottish Socialist League in 1888. The Rev. Glasse was deeply influential within the SDF and later organized the SLLL in Scotland. Along with James Keir Hardie and J. Bruce Glasier, he helped establish the Independent Labour Party (ILP) in Scotland after its formation in 1894 in Glasgow.

Scotland and Scots were receptive to many cosmopolitan influences, but they also asserted their independence of spirit on many occasions, for example, the split from the SDF in 1903 to form the Scottish-led and Edinburgh-based Socialist Labour Party (SLP), and their rejection of political action in favor of industrial action as advocated by American Marxist Daniel De Leon. Scottish members of the SDF were involved in gun-running in support of Russian revolutionaries between 1905 and 1906, and contacts with class-conscious Russian, Lithuanian, and Irish workers in Scotland maintained close links between the Scottish and the international socialist movement.

As dawn broke on the new century, a sharp economic downturn plunged industrial capital into crisis, leading to high unemployment, lower wages, deskilling, and a considerable degree of poverty. From 1909 economic conditions improved, however, and over the next four years, and despite facing a formidable employer class, there was a rapid upsurge in unionism. Fueled by socialist and syndicalist ideas, a widespread and intensive period of industrial and social unrest began. World War I brought the unrest to an end, but the experience of war on the home front played a critical role in further incubating workers’ grievances and reawakening the prewar spirit of rebellion that ushered in the era of Red Clydeside. The Scots responded gallantly to the call to arms, but a dedicated minority opposed the war and the resulting military and civil conscription, and in doing so established Scotland as the main center of the anti-war movement in Britain. The events of the October Revolution in Russia 1917 also fueled the fires of class consciousness and further inspired a growing band of industrial radicals, socialists, and revolutionaries to convert Glasgow into the Petrograd of the North – regarded as a revolutionary storm center second to none.

There was a clear transformation in the Scottish working class, as more workers than ever before – and disproportionately so among the lesser skilled – flocked to join trade unions. There was a palpable and growing class consciousness among Scottish workers, and this drew them away from the politics of the Liberal Party toward the radical left in Scotland. Scottish Labour and the ILP were to be the main political beneficiaries, and between 1922 and 1929 the political map of Scotland was redrawn. The period signaled the rise of Scottish Labour and the decline of Liberalism; while the Communist Party had much less electoral impact, it was strong in the mining areas of Lanarkshire, Fife, and Stirlingshire, and was well represented in Aberdeen, Dundee, Greenock, and the Vale of Leven.

While many of Scotland's war resisters were deeply involved with the troubles on the Clyde, others worked tirelessly in Dundee and Aberdeen to proclaim the anti-war message and give the people of Scotland the opportunity to consider a critique of the war at a time when few dissenting voices were heard. International socialism failed when war was declared in 1914, but the actions of Scotland's war resisters did provide a stirring example for the left in Scotland. There were clearly other nerve centers of discontent forming beyond the west of Scotland in such places as Aberdeen, Dundee, Edinburgh, and the mining districts of Fife.

The example of Scottish war resisters clearly demonstrates that they were politically active across much of Scotland, and that the impact of the Russian Revolution only added an impetus and further momentum to the development of the radical left throughout the country. Dundee was to become the main center of the anti-war activities of the No-Conscription Fellowship and the ILP during the war. It was also a stronghold of communism in the 1920s and 1930s. There was a pacifist majority on Aberdeen Trades Council's executive committee by 1918, and in relation to its size and population Aberdeen was considered "More Red Than Glasgow" by the early 1920s (Kenefick 2000). In Edinburgh, the "Hands off Russia" campaign united political radicals across the capital and drew the Trades Council into closer contact with left radicals. In January 1918, Willie Stewart, ILP activist and editor of the ILP propaganda organ Forward, argued that if a revolution were to occur in Scotland, it was as likely "to start on Tayside or the North East Coast as on the banks of the Clyde." Stewart clearly saw the bigger picture: it was not simply about the Clyde, it was about the country as a whole. It was about Red Scotland (Kenefick 2007).

The 1920s would prove to be a difficult decade for Scottish workers and the trade union and labor movement in Scotland generally. It began in hopeful mood, but as the economy slipped into depression and returning soldiers and sailors swelled the growing ranks of the unemployed, hope turned to desperation. Trade union membership swelled massively between 1910 and 1920 but thereafter declined rapidly.

Levels of industrial militancy declined, and the failure of the Triple Industrial Alliance in April 1921, and the General Strike in May 1926, severely weakened the trade union movement and workers' confidence. The Communist Party of Great Britain was formed in 1920, and for a time was closely allied to the ILP. But from 1921 this relationship soured and continued to deteriorate thereafter. The ILP was also caught up in an ideological struggle with the Labour Party, which came to a head after the fall of the Labour government in August 1931. Scottish Labour won half of Scotland's 74 parliamentary seats in 1929, but the party was left with only seven in 1931.

The 1930s would prove to be a difficult time for the Scottish working class, and the demise of the ILP, its brand of community-based activism, and its infectious enthusiasm for socialism could not have come at a worse time. The ILP was to fall into political decline and, as its influence waned, grassroots activism diminished and membership of Scottish Labour fell away. Indeed, it presaged the decline of a left radical and socialist tradition in Scotland that could trace its roots to the closing decades of the nineteenth century.

Given the extent of the Scottish diaspora between 1860 and 1930, when in excess of two million Scots left their homeland, the Scots arguably made a significant contribution in promoting international socialism, syndicalism, communism, and anti-imperialism across the globe, and not simply at home. This is clearly a matter for further investigation. In the final analysis, however, some of the more important aspects of Scottish political radicalism may be better revealed in the context of how well left radical ideas were received by the imperial working class.

SEE ALSO: Chartists; Connolly, James (1868–1916); Glasgow General Strike, 1820; Labour Party, Britain; Socialism; Socialism, Britain

References and Suggested Readings

- Devine, T. M. (1994) Clanship to Crofters' War: The Social Transformation of the Scottish Highlands. Manchester: Manchester University Press.
- Gall, G. (2005) The Political Economy of Scotland: Red Scotland? Radical Scotland?. Cardiff: Welsh Academic Press.
- Kenefick, W. (2000) Rebellious and Contrary: The Glasgow Dockers, 1853–1932. East Linton: Tuckwell Press.

- Kenefick, W. (2007) Red Scotland! The Rise and Fall of the Radical Left, c.1872 to 1932. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.
- Kenefick, W. & McIvor, A. (Eds.) (1996) Roots of Red Clydeside 1910–1914: Labour Unrest and Industrial Relations in West Scotland. Edinburgh: John Donald.
- Knox, W. (1999) Industrial Nation: Work, Culture and Society in Scotland, 1800–Present. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.
- Richards, E. (2002) The Highland Clearances: The People, Landlords and Rural Turmoil. Edinburgh: Birlinn.

Red Summer, United States, 1919

Timothy M. Neeno

In the summer and fall of 1919, mass rioting broke out in 26 US cities, including Chicago, Illinois (July 27–August 2), Omaha, Nebraska (September 28), and Longview, Texas (July 10–18). Serious rioting also occurred that year in Washington, DC; Norfolk, Virginia; Knoxville, Tennessee; and Elaine, Arkansas. James Weldon Johnson dubbed the violence, which included at least 76 lynchings and 25 race riots, “Red Summer” for the blood that was shed by African Americans who were attacked throughout the country. This rioting must be seen in context of the growing tensions brought on by the “Great Migration” of Southern blacks to Northern cities, the rising expectations and disappointments of the World War I years, and the birth of the more assertive “New Negro.”

Causes of the Violence

During World War I, war industries began hiring on a massive scale, while immigration from Europe slowed to a trickle. The lure of employment, better wages, and an escape from segregation and discrimination led thousands of African Americans to leave the rural South for Northern cities, in what became known as the Great Migration. Between 1916 and 1919 nearly half a million African Americans moved north or west, increasing the black population in Detroit by 611 percent, Cleveland by 308 percent, Chicago by 114 percent, and New York by 66 percent. This meant 65,500 new black residents in Chicago and 61,400 in New York (Painter 2007: 191–2). These new residents moved north for wartime jobs and hopes for more opportunity and less racism. Still, though Northern cities did not have legal segregation, de facto or unwritten segregation was prevalent in housing, schools, and jobs. In some cases this fostered resentment, but in others members of the black community preferred to live and work together, seeing safety and security in numbers.

At the same time, some 380,000 African Americans served in the military in World War I. When the United States first entered the war, African Americans were divided in sentiment. Many wondered why they should fight for a country that had shown them nothing but discrimination, segregation, and lynching. Others, however, saw the war as a chance to prove their patriotism and earn respect as Americans and as men. After fighting in this war to “make the world safe for democracy,” they came back ready to challenge existing racial discrimination. Writers reporting on this change spoke of the assertive “New Negro” who was unwilling to accept segregation and second-class status and more likely to fight for his or her rights as a US citizen.

In the face of these changes, 1919 brought economic troubles on a number of fronts. As millions of men were demobilized, unemployment rose, just as war industries began laying off workers. By mid-January, Chicago had 75,000 unemployed. Pent-up consumer spending, kept in check by rationing during the war, now fueled inflation. Strikes increased. Fear of socialism was widespread in the “Red Scare” of that year. For farmers, World War I brought prosperity, but after the war recovering European nations moved to protect their own farmers by imposing tariffs on American farm products. Farm prices fell, even as the trend toward the mechanization of agriculture continued. Small farmers found themselves squeezed out by big farm operations that could afford the increased capital investment. It was in the period of 1910–19 that the balance between urban and rural populations permanently shifted. By the end of the decade, for the first time more Americans lived in cities and towns than on farms. Rural communities saw their income and their way of life slipping away.

Finally, this period was the heyday of overt racism. In 1915 the Ku Klux Klan was reestablished and spread rapidly across the South and Midwest. In that same year, D. W. Griffith’s feature-length movie, Birth of a Nation, was released. Widely popular (President Woodrow Wilson even showed it in the White House), it extolled the virtues of the "Old South" and made night-riding Klan terrorists its heroes. In this climate, black veterans returning in their military uniforms often met resistance, rage, and violence at the hands of white supremacists.

Chicago

The worst violence of Red Summer occurred in Chicago. African Americans were crowded into a long, narrow strip running south from the downtown Loop district, known as the "Black Belt." In the sweltering July heat of 1919, thousands of Chicagoans sought relief at the city beaches on Lake Michigan. An unwritten line separated the "white" 29th Street Beach from the "colored" 26th Street Beach just to the north. Hate crimes by white "athletic clubs" against lone African Americans had been on the rise since the spring. In June, two lone African Americans were murdered by white gangs.

On the afternoon of Sunday, July 27, 1919, a group of African Americans tried to enter the 29th Street Beach and were driven off by a rock-throwing mob after a see-sawing brawl. Later that day, an African American youth, Eugene Williams, was playing on a railroad tie with his friends at the 26th Street Beach when the undertow carried Williams south toward the "white" beach. Whites began pelting Williams with rocks and bottles. A rock struck Williams in the head, and he slipped from the railroad tie and drowned. A crowd of African Americans advanced to the 29th Street Beach, but the white police officer present refused to arrest the man identified as the rock thrower and tried to arrest an African American instead. A mêlée erupted and turned into a general riot across the South Side that lasted well into the night.

The next day began quietly, as people went off to work Monday morning. But as African American workers left the Union Stockyards in the afternoon, they were attacked by white mobs and stoned, dragged from streetcars, and beaten bloody. Mobs broke windows, tore street cars loose from their electric trolleys, and set fire to African American homes in mixed neighborhoods. African Americans retaliated as word of the attacks spread. As night fell, chaos exploded in mass rioting. Gangs of whites drove down State Street in automobiles, shooting at African Americans at random. African Americans sniped from the rooftops, cut phone lines, or pelted cars with rocks and bottles. The police lost all control. That evening, Mayor William Hale Thompson asked for assistance of the Illinois National Guard but refused to deploy them from their armories onto the streets.

All through Wednesday the fighting raged. Violence spread to the downtown Loop as mobs of whites, including soldiers and sailors, attacked African Americans. In that one day 65 fires were reported, 40 in a 4-square-mile area of the South Side. At 10.30 that night, the mayor finally sent in 6,000 National Guard troops. By dawn on the 31st, order was restored. But in the early hours of August 2 a fire swept the Lithuanian portion of the Back of the Yards neighborhood, destroying 49 buildings and leaving nearly 1,000 people homeless. Blame was never set, but a grand jury pointed to a white arsonist. In all 15 whites and 23 African Americans were killed in the rioting. At least 537 were injured, and thousands were left homeless in the worst race riots in Chicago's history.

Omaha

The violence in Omaha resulted from a familiar theme that had been made popular in the Reconstruction South. On September 24, 1919, a 19-year-old white woman in Omaha, Nebraska claimed to have been attacked by an African American male. Police arrested Will Brown, a 40-year-old African American who lived with a white woman. After one failed lynching attempt, a mob of youths assembled at a south Omaha school on September 28 and marched on the Douglas County Courthouse, where Brown was awaiting trial. By 4 p.m. a mob surrounded the courthouse but then seemed to calm, so the police chief sent 50 reserve police home. An hour later, however, the crowd swelled again and 4,000 people attempted to storm the courthouse. Police trained fire hoses on the mob, but the rioting only worsened. Rioters then cut fire hoses and swarmed inside the building, driving the police and sheriff's deputies back. Mobs also looted pawnshops and hardware stores, seizing guns and ammunition, and by evening a mob of 5,000 swarmed outside the courthouse.

By 8 p.m. the military at Ft. Omaha had been notified, but bureaucratic delay prevented their deployment. At roughly the same time, the mob set the courthouse on fire, trapping the police, sheriff's deputies, and 121 prisoners inside. When the mayor tried to negotiate with the rioters, he was swarmed on, dragged to a street corner, and only narrowly saved by city detectives from being lynched. The police were trapped on the roof as flames engulfed the courthouse, and rioters scaled the roof with ladders to get to Brown, who was handed over to them. The mob lynched, burned, and mutilated Brown's body, dragging it behind a car through the streets in triumph.

Shortly afterward troops from Ft. Omaha finally arrived and took control of the center of the city, the vanguard of some 1,300 federal troops sent by Secretary of War Newton D. Baker. Over the next three days the military arrested 100 people for arson, murder, and other crimes.

Longview, Texas

Not all of the Red Summer violence occurred in the North, however. In the agricultural areas of the South a number of tensions were exacerbated by crop failures, brought on largely by boll weevils. This was the case in Longview, a town of 5,700 people in northeastern Texas. Tensions had risen when African American leaders called on black cotton farmers to sell their crops directly to cotton brokers in Galveston, bypassing local white brokers. On June 17, 1919 an African American was handed over to a mob by the Gregg County sheriff and lynched. A local black teacher reported the lynching to the Chicago Defender, a prominent African American newspaper, which printed an article on the incident. On Thursday, July 10, two white men attacked the teacher. Later that night, a mob attacked the teacher's house, but was driven off by gunfire. The rioters rang a fire bell to summon help, broke into stores to seize guns, and attacked the African American community. It wasn't until Sunday, July 13, that 250 Texas National Guardsmen, backed by Texas Rangers, were able to disarm the mobs and restore order.

Connections

The rioting shared a number of commonalities. Throughout Red Summer, the worst mob violence was committed by whites. Also, when violence erupted, local authorities were unable or unwilling to control it. After the Chicago riots, for example, a Commission on Race Relations concluded that police often sided with the white rioters and that twice as many African Americans as whites were arrested. Chicago police were also afraid to arrest politically connected white gang members, especially since a number of the most violent "athletic clubs," such as the Hamburg Club (Richard J. Daley, later mayor, was a member) and Ragen's Colts, were sponsored by prominent local politicians. Indeed, members of Ragen's Colts bragged that police tipped them off before arrests were to be made. In a similar vein, the violence only stopped in Longview when the National Guard and Texas Rangers disarmed everyone, including the local police. Another similarity involved the age of the rioters. In Omaha a 16-year-old youth was identified as a leader of the mob, and in Chicago most of the rioters were ages 16–21. Finally, the media played a key role throughout the summer. Mass-circulation newspapers stoked rage and spread hysteria by grossly exaggerating the number and extent of violent acts during the rioting.

Results and Conclusions

After the Omaha riots, de facto racial segregation developed in housing that persists to an extent to this day. In Chicago, the riots reinforced the deep racial divide on the South Side. African Americans formed their own gangs in the city. The fundamental grievances of African Americans were not resolved, while the fear in the white community continued to fester and fed the rise of the Ku Klux Klan in the 1920s.

SEE ALSO: Urban Rebellions, United States

References and Suggested Readings

- Adero, M. (Ed.) (1993) Up South: Stories, Studies, and Letters of This Century's Black Migrations. New York: New Press.
- Painter, N. (1987) Standing at Armageddon: The United States, 1877–1919. New York: W. W. Norton.
- Painter, N. (2007) Creating Black Americans: African-American History and its Meanings, 1619 to the Present. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Tuttle, W. M. (1996) Race Riot: Chicago in the Red Summer of 1919. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.

Reed, John (1887–1920)

Timothy Dean Draper

American-born communist writer and journalist John "Jack" Silas Reed took part in several principal, international radical events of the early twentieth century. Reed is perhaps best remembered for his works on the Mexican and Russian Revolutions, including the widely popular account of the Bolshevik Revolution, Ten Days that Shook the World, published in 1919. He was the subject of the award-winning 1981 film Reds, which revitalized interest in his life and career. As a journalist and writer, Reed circulated and befriended leading socialites, artists, poets, and radicals, including Mabel Dodge Luhan, Eugene O'Neill, Max Eastman, and Bill Haywood. He also became a close friend of Vladimir Ilyich Lenin.

Born on October 22, 1887 into a privileged upper-class family in Portland, Oregon, Reed was educated in boarding school and then Harvard University, where he studied literature and was active in leftist organizations. During his years at Harvard, Reed developed contempt for upper-class and elitist social standards and organizations. While attending Socialist Club meetings at Harvard, he developed a friendship with Walter Lippman (1889–1974), the American social critic. Graduating in 1910, Reed visited Europe before moving to New York City in 1911.

Although interested in poetry, Reed's greater successes came in journalism. The Masses editor Max Eastman (1883–1969) asked Reed to join in 1913. His most notable article of that time, "War on Patterson," detailed the New Jersey mill strike. The events he covered there radicalized him, and he concluded that socialists and labor were more interested in electoral politics than the class struggle. Later that year, Jack Reed traveled to Mexico to cover the Revolution for Metropolitan Magazine. Reed's coverage of the Mexican Revolution, particularly Pancho Villa's operations, culminated in the publication of Insurgent Mexico in 1914.

After wartime travels in Europe, Reed returned to the United States and married writer Louise Bryant; he found himself disaffected with the strong pro-war sentiment of many Americans in 1917, and traveled to Russia. It was during this period that he collected the materials that would result in his short history of the Bolshevik Revolution, Ten Days that Shook the World, and fully embraced left-wing politics. During the next few years he used journalism as a means of advancing his leftist political convictions, participating both in the Russian revolutionary institutions and in the nascent American communist movement. After being expelled from the Nationalist Socialist Convention in 1919, Reed and other radicals formed the Communist Labor Party (CLP).

Facing criminal indictment and hoping to strengthen CLP ties with Moscow, Reed returned to Russia in late 1919, where he continued his political activity. Despite some conflicts with Russian officials and rumors of disillusionment with some Bolshevik policies, Reed was given a hero's funeral and buried beside the Kremlin wall in October 1920, after his death from typhus.

SEE ALSO: Bolsheviks; Eastman, Max (1883–1969); Masses, The; Russia, Revolution of February/March 1917; Russia, Revolution of October/November 1917

References and Suggested Readings

- Hicks, G. (1968) John Reed: The Making of a Revolutionary. New York: Benjamin Blom.
- Homberger, E. & Biggart, J. (Eds.) (1992) John Reed and the Russian Revolution. New York: St. Martin's Press.
- Reed, J. (1922) Ten Days that Shook the World. New York: Boni & Liveright.
- Rosenstone, R. A. (1975) Romantic Revolutionary: A Biography of John Reed. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.

Reform Acts, Britain and Ireland, 1832

Gordon N. Pentland

Three Reform Acts (for England and Wales; Ireland; and Scotland) were passed between June and August 1832 and made fundamental changes to the structure of the political system in the United Kingdom by altering both the distribution of parliamentary seats and the qualifications for voting in parliamentary elections. They were only passed after a long parliamentary struggle and a sustained extraparliamentary agitation for reform. Debate has tended largely to focus on both the causes and the consequences of the legislation.

From the second half of the eighteenth century there had been intermittent efforts to secure measures of parliamentary reform from individuals and groups both inside and outside of parliament. The explanation for the Reform Acts should be rooted firmly in a short-term constitutional crisis, which involved both the internal dynamics of parliamentary politics and their interaction with extraparliamentary events and movements.

The political crisis began when Lord Liverpool, who had been prime minister since 1812, suffered a debilitating stroke in 1827 and threw party politics into flux. His ministry was followed in quick succession by those of George Canning and then Viscount Goderich before the Duke of Wellington took the reins of power. His ministry unwittingly initiated a constitutional crisis by supervising the enactment of the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts (1828), which had been intended to preserve a monopoly on office for members of the Church of England, and, more seriously, Catholic emancipation (1829).

This legislation had a crucial bearing on the question of parliamentary reform. First, by repealing or altering fundamental facets of the revolutionary settlements of the late seventeenth century, a prime ideological resource of opponents of parliamentary reform – that parliament should not attempt to amend Britain’s “perfect” constitution – was overturned. Secondly, by riding over the objections of vociferous “high” or “ultra” Tories, the passage of Catholic emancipation split the Pittite regime that had been in power for over 40 years and elicited the first substantial reform motion of the crisis from the ultra-Tory Marquis of Blandford in February 1830.

Alongside this dynamic political situation other events were creating an environment that would prove conducive to the passage of some measure of parliamentary reform. First, the relative economic prosperity of the 1820s came to an abrupt halt in 1829, and 1830 witnessed a period of severe and, at times, violent agricultural unrest, known as the “Swing” disturbances, which caused dismay and alarm among landowners and members of parliament. Second, the death of George IV brought both the assurance of a general election and a successor in William IV who, if he was not a reformer, was certainly less implacably hostile to reform than his predecessors. The general election saw Wellington’s ministry under severe pressure in those constituencies where contests were held and where the electorate was large enough to act as a barometer of public opinion. Finally, during this election, another revolution occurred in France. The revolution of 1830, while it contained notable revolutionary violence, was a more moderate affair than its predecessor and demonstrated for many in Britain that constitutional reform and bloody social revolution were not synonymous.

These parliamentary and extraparliamentary factors combined to bring to power a Whig-dominated coalition ministry, headed by Earl Grey (an aristocratic Whig and veteran parliamentary reformer), which was pledged to bring in a measure of parliamentary reform. It brought in its bill in March 1830 and proposed a measure far more substantial than many had expected and which was designed, as far as Earl Grey was concerned, to act as a final settlement of the reform question.

There was a long and complicated process before the measures were enacted. The bill passed its second reading by a single vote (302 to 301), which ensured that it would be defeated by amendments and ultimately that the ministry would have to ask the king to call a general election. After the election, the House of Commons contained a pro-reform majority, but the continued opposition of the House of Lords and its rejection of reform bills in October 1831 and April 1832 created fraught political situations throughout the UK. There was serious rioting in Derby, Bristol, and Nottingham in October 1831. Political unions, the first of which had been formed in Birmingham in January 1830, were established in many places and continued to agitate for reform. In the crisis following the House of Lords’ second rejection of reform and the resignation of Grey’s ministry, known as the Days of May, the political unions reached the height of their power and influence: there were discussions about arming, an attempt to orchestrate a run on the Bank of England, and what, to contemporaries and some subsequent commentators, appeared to be a revolutionary situation.

In the face of civil disorder the king had to call Grey’s ministry back to power and to promise to make enough peers to force the measure through the House of Lords. While there were very significant regional and national variations within the final legislation, it established the £10 household qualification for voting in parliamentary elections (so that approximately 1 in 5 adult males qualified for a vote in England; 1 in 8 in Scotland; and 1 in 20 in Ireland) and redistributed parliamentary seats from boroughs with small electorates to counties and urban constituencies.

The Reform Acts have spawned a range of interpretations. To Whig historians (the dominant historical mode in England in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries) the Reform Acts were a far-sighted act of statesmanship, which brought the urban middle classes within the pale of the constitution and became a watershed in Britain's evolutionary and progressive path toward parliamentary democracy. A similar interpretation was pushed by Chartists and some later historians, who argued that the middle classes had indeed been the beneficiaries of reform but had used the working classes to extort these concessions before betraying them and opposing further reform thereafter. Recent accounts have been less concerned with examining class conflict and focused instead on the importance of the reform debates in enshrining the idea of a middle class in political debate. Other revisionist approaches interpreted the legislation as essentially conservative in intention and effect. By these interpretations, reform was intended to and succeeded in prolonging aristocratic dominance of the political system. While this may certainly be true of the intentions of many of the parliamentary architects and sponsors of reform, other work has continued to emphasize the impact of reform on subsequent politics, the importance and scale of the popular mobilization for reform, and the extent to which it was revolutionary.

SEE ALSO: Chartists; Cobbett, William (1763–1835); France, 1830 Revolution; Glorious Revolution, Britain, 1688; O'Connell, Daniel (1775–1847); Place, Francis (1771–1854); Swing Riots

References and Suggested Readings

- Brock, M. (1973) The Great Reform Act. London: Hutchinson.
- Cannon, J. (1972) Parliamentary Reform 1640–1832. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Evans, E. J. (1994) The Great Reform Act of 1832, 2nd ed. London: Routledge.
- Hamburger, J. (1963) James Mill and the Art of Revolution. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- LoPatin, N. D. (1999) Political Unions, Popular Politics, and the Great Reform Act of 1832. Basingstoke: Macmillan.
- Moore, D. C. (1966) Concession or Cure: The Sociological Premises of the First Reform Act. Historical Journal 9: 39–59.
- Thomis, M. I. & Holt, P. (1977) Threats of Revolution in Britain 1789–1848. London: Macmillan.
- Trevelyan, G. M. (1920) Lord Grey of the Reform Bill. London: Longmans.
- Wahrman, D. (1995) Imagining the Middle Class: The Political Representation of Class in Britain, c.1780–1840. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Reform Bills, Britain, 1867 and 1884

Michael Rutz

The British Reform Bills of 1867 and 1884 continued the expansion of the parliamentary franchise begun with the Great Reform Bill of 1832. Neither bill passed as a result of extensive social or political unrest; rather, they were the result of parliamentary leaders' measured responses to the changing social and political climate of the mid- to late Victorian periods.

The decline of the Chartist movement and the conservative nature of Prime Minister (Henry John Temple) Lord Palmerston's views on political reform had stalled, driving further agitation for changes to the electoral system. Palmerston's death in 1865, however, presented a new opportunity for radicals and reformers to take up the issue. The leader in parliament was John Bright, a Quaker and free trader who encouraged the new prime minister, William Gladstone, to introduce a new reform bill in 1866.

A number of organizations with trade union and middle-class support, among them the National Reform League, the National Reform Union, and the Northern Reform Union, organized meetings and rallies featuring Bright and other speakers. A march on Hyde Park in July drew an estimated 200,000 protesters, who stormed the park entrances that had been blocked by the police. The threat of social unrest posed by economic troubles and rising unemployment led some leading politicians to conclude that some measure of parliamentary reform was required.

The bill introduced by Gladstone and Lord John Russell proposed to extend the franchise to all borough residents occupying homes worth seven pounds per year in rent, creating about 300,000 new urban, working-class voters. While Gladstone argued that workingmen had proven themselves morally entitled to political participation, many within his party still feared the consequences of extending the vote to the ill-educated. Thus, the bill only narrowly passed the House of Commons and immediately became tied up in committee.

Russell's resignation in June of 1866 seemed to ensure the failure of the reform initiative. However, seeing an opportunity to enhance their party's popular appeal, the leaders of the new

Tory administration, Lord Derby and Benjamin Disraeli, introduced a reform initiative of their own. Disraeli's 1867 bill sought to balance democratization with efforts to preserve the influence of the middle and upper classes. While extending the vote to all urban ratepayers, it also gave additional votes to university graduates, professionals, and the like. Extensive debate and amendments stripped away most of the complexity of Disraeli's scheme and produced a final result far more democratic than either of the previous versions. The bill created a simple household franchise that increased the total electorate from 1.4 to 2.4 million registered voters.

Despite its democratic nature, the consequences of the Reform Bill of 1867 were far from revolutionary. While the bill greatly expanded the urban franchise, the relatively minor changes to the distribution of seats preserved much of the influence of rural areas. Workingmen did not begin to vote for the Tories in significant numbers as Disraeli had hoped, and they did not, at first, organize their own political party. The bill did, however, instigate a series of additional social and political reforms, the most significant being the introduction of the secret ballot in 1872.

The Reform Bill of 1884 was the most significant achievement of Gladstone's second ministry. The bill itself produced very little ideological debate. Even those who remained skeptical of the desirability of democracy recognized the political impracticality of opposing reform. The primary achievement of the bill was to extend the franchise to the rural working class, which had been excluded from the reform of 1867. As a result, the number of county voters tripled, and the total electorate increased from 3.2 to 5.7 million.

In 1885, a bipartisan committee produced a second bill to redistribute seats that approximated the Chartist demand for equal electoral districts. The modern single-member district largely replaced the old two-member county and borough constituencies. Together, the reform bills of the mid-Victorian era resulted in the establishment of near universal male suffrage in Britain by 1884.

SEE ALSO: Chartists; Reform Acts, Britain and Ireland, 1832

References and Suggested Readings

Cowling, M. (2005) 1867: Disraeli, Gladstone, and Revolution: The Passing of the Second Reform Bill. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Finn, M. C. (2004) After Chartism: Class and Nation in English Radical Politics, 1848–1874. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Smith, F. B. (1993) The Making of the Second Reform Bill. London: Ashgate.

Reformation

Rady Roldan-Figueroa

The Reformation of the sixteenth century can be seen as a series of localized and yet interdependent reactions to major shifts that marked the end of late medieval society. Among these the emergence of modern nation-states, the rise of vernacular languages, and the reemergence and spread of urban centers are but a few of the best-known markers of the early modern period. But the Reformation also signaled the demise of a powerful construct that dominated the minds of many in the higher rungs of medieval society. The medieval notion of the corpus christianum presupposed the existence of a seamless overlap between church and society. To be sure, it was never a stable construct. In fact, it was subject to a rather tenuous balance of power between the two most important institutions of medieval Europe, namely the papacy and the medieval monarchy, especially the Holy Roman Empire.

Historical Background

The theological foundations for this cultural representation of medieval society were laid in the course of the fourth and fifth centuries with the advent of the Constantinian era. From Constantine I (r. 324–37) to Theodosius I (r. 392–5), with a brief interlude under Emperor Julian the Apostate (r. 361–3), Christianity experienced a major shift in its position within the Roman Empire. It moved from the position of a marginal and persecuted religion to that of the sanctioned religion of the Empire. A glorious portrait of rising Christianity was collectively crafted by scores of historians and theologians. Of singular importance in this regard was the historian Eusebius of Caesarea (fl. fourth century). In his Ecclesiastical History (312–24) he concocted the image of a triumphant Christianity which, guided by the providential intervention of God, ascended to a position of power and prestige in the Empire. The sack of Rome by the Visigoths in 410 alerted Augustine of Hippo (354–430) about the frailty of the lofty vision of the previous century. In his De civitate Dei (413–426/27) he provided a reformulation of the Constantinian ideal; one in which the moral ordering of society according to the principles of the heavenly city of God assumed paramount importance.

After the collapse of the western half of the Roman Empire in 476, the Constantinian ideal was revived by the Carolingians. The crowning of Charlemagne (r. 800–14) as emperor of the Romans on Christmas Day 800 represents a milestone in the history of the West, as it marks the beginning of the Holy Roman Empire. The so-called Carolingian Renaissance consisted of an unprecedented level of administrative standardization never before seen in the West since the fall of the Roman Empire. In the ecclesiastical sphere, Carolingian theologians embraced the triumphant view of Christianity that characterized the theology of the fourth century. Alcuin (ca. 732–804), the architect of the Carolingian Renaissance, was emblematic of the political theology of the day. According to Alcuin, Charlemagne's monarchical role included the functions of royal leadership and priestly teaching (praedicatio) that he associated with the biblical figure of King David.

The death of Charlemagne precipitated a period of political instability in the lands of the empire. It was not until the Treaty of Verdun of 843 that a significant level of political stability was achieved for the lands of Central Europe. The old ideals of the Constantinian era were once more revived by the Ottonians in the course of the tenth and eleventh centuries. Otto I, or Otto the Great (r. 962–73), was crowned by Pope John XII (r. 955–64) as emperor of the Romans in 962. In 963 the Privilegium Ottonianum of 962 was redrawn. This time it included a provision requiring newly elected popes to take an oath before imperial legates, undermining in this way the claims of the Roman pontiff to be the supreme head of the church.

The pretensions of the Ottonians over the church engendered in its due time a highly successful reaction in Rome that is today better remembered as the Gregorian Reform, after its most ardent advocate, Pope Gregory VII (r. 1073–85). Already in 1059 the papacy asserted its independence from the emperor by adopting the papal election decree. The decree instituted the election of the pope by means of the College of Cardinals. Gregory VII himself was behind the infamous Dictatus Papae of 1075, advocating the absolute rule of the papacy over secular rulers. The papalist offensive began by the Gregorians reached its high point early in the fourteenth century, as Pope Boniface VIII (r. 1294–1303) promulgated in 1302 his bull Unam Sanctam. According to Boniface, “submission on the part of every man to the bishop of Rome is altogether necessary for his salvation.” It should be noted that Boniface included the emperor and all secular rulers within the purview of his declaration.

No major challenges to the imperial or papal constructions of the societal ideal of the Constantinian era emerged until the fifteenth century. In fact, the only major theological and military challenge to the Constantinian ideal materialized in the medieval kingdom of Bohemia (modern-day Czech Republic), among the followers of Jan Hus (aka John Huss, ca. 1369–1415). Hus was deeply influenced by the Oxford-trained theologian John Wycliffe (ca. 1330–84). Wycliffe, who in his political theory tended to favor secular power, argued in works like De dominio divino and De civili dominio (1375–6) that ecclesiastical authority was a gift from God and that it was conditional upon worthiness and merit. Accordingly, the church hierarchy could be disendowed and secular power had the obligation to take such corrective actions.

Hus came in contact with the writings of Wycliffe in 1401. At the time he was dean of the faculty of philosophy at the University of Prague and preacher at Bethlehem Chapel. Through his preaching he became an important leader of an ecclesiastical reform movement that denounced the abuses of the higher clergy which controlled roughly half of the land throughout the kingdom of Bohemia. On account of his teaching and preaching activity he was eventually declared a heretic and finally burned at the stake in July 1415 while attending the Council of Constance (1414–18).

By 1420 the Hussites were in open conflict with King Sigismund, who inherited the kingdom of Bohemia in 1419 after the death of his half-brother, King Wenceslas IV (r. 1363–1419). Sigismund, who was largely responsible for the burning of Hus, obtained a bull from Pope Martin V (r. 1417–31) declaring a crusade against the Hussites. The Hussites were able to overcome important theological and political differences among themselves and successfully repelled Sigismund's successive military campaigns until 1433. In that year the Council of Basel sided with the aristocratic faction of the Hussites, the Utraquists – who derived their name from the practice of serving communion in both bread and wine (sub utraque specie). The radical Hussite faction known as the Taborites were defeated in 1434 at the Battle of Lipan by a joint army of Catholic and Utraquist forces. The Taborites had articulated an anti-feudal program of revolutionary proportions. Their communalism, however, reemerged in the pacifistic Unitas Fratrum (United Brethren), a utopian religious body largely influenced by the thought of Petr Chelčickýca (1390–1460).

Martin Luther and Peasants' War

Religious fervor and social unrest in the course of the sixteenth century made medieval conceptions of social order no longer tenable as alternative projects emerged with a radically different view of society. In 1517 the Augustinian monk Martin Luther (1483–1546) drafted his legendary Ninety-five Theses against the selling of indulgences. In the next few years he gave more coherent expression to his reform program until he was finally excommunicated in 1521 by Pope Leo X (r. 1513–21). By then, however, his theological ideas and stern criticism of Rome had spread throughout the Holy Roman Empire, setting it ablaze with religious strife and dissent.

Among those who welcomed the religious ideas of Luther was the German peasantry. Peasants began replacing parish clergy in their villages with preachers of the new gospel, committed to the theology of Luther and ready to preach from the scriptures. The first uprisings took place in 1524 in Forchheim (Franconia) and the Black Forest. Soon, peasants throughout southern Germany were up in arms carrying out their own revolution in the Peasants' War (1524–6). At its height the Peasants' War encompassed several regions including the Black Forest, Franconia, Swabia, Allgau, Thuringia, Alsace, and Tyrol. Peasants came together in their own military organizations such as the Christian Union of the Allgau formed in March 1525, and several other local bands. They gathered under the symbol of the Bundschuh, the laced peasant boot. The most popular peasant program is best known as the Twelve Articles of the Upper Swabian Peasants (February–March 1525). It was drafted by Sebastian Lotzer, a tanner, and Christoph Schappeler, an evangelical pastor, in the city of Memmingen. The Swabian peasants argued against taxes paid on the yield of grain, refused to pay taxes on animals, abolished serfdom, refused to pay lords a compensation for their dead “serfs,” and reclaimed the right democratically to elect their clergy.

Martin Luther reacted to these developments by withdrawing his support and even condemning the peasants. In his Admonition to Peace of March/April 1525, Luther adopted a conciliatory position, acknowledging that the claims of the peasants were just and calling the nobility to moderate their demands. Around a month later, however, in his Against the Robbing and Murdering Hordes of Peasants, he was stern in his condemnation of the peasants and even assured that whoever died suppressing the rebellion would have a martyr's death. The peasants were successively defeated in the months of May and June; at Frankenhäusen on May 15, at Zabern on May 17, and at Ingolstadt on June 4. It is estimated that around 75,000 peasants were killed.

Thomas Müntzer

Thomas Müntzer (d. 1525) was among those who fought for the cause of the peasants at Frankenhäusen. He survived the battle only to be summarily executed by beheading on May 27, 1525. His death was the tragic conclusion of his increasing involvement with miners and peasants. He arrived at Wittenberg in 1518/19, attracted by the evangelical teaching of Luther and his fellow faculty at the university. But his theology quickly developed in a radical direction. In 1521, while apparently residing in Prague, he composed his Prague Protest. It was not incidental that in the first lines he invoked the memory of Jan Hus. In his Protest he condemned the clergy and the church hierarchy for their exploitation of the common people. He concluded his manifesto by announcing the emergence of the new apostolic church after a violent uprising under his leadership. In 1524, while he was still pastor in Allstedt, Müntzer preached his sermon on the second chapter of the book of Daniel, or the Sermon to the Princes. Müntzer admonished the nobility to use the power of the sword to reform the corrupted church, full of hypocrites who denied the Holy Spirit. Otherwise, God would take the sword away from them and hand it to the new Daniel (i.e., Müntzer himself). He would then execute the needed purification of the clergy. Almost a full year later Müntzer was leading the peasants in the fateful Battle of Frankenhausen.

Anabaptists

Finally, the next major episode of revolutionary proportions in the history of the German Reformation took place in the city of Münster in Westphalia. The left wing of the Reformation consisted of a diversity of anti-Trinitarian, spiritualist, chiliastic, and Anabaptist groups. Anabaptists were best known for their rejection of the baptism of infants and their belief that only adult believers should be baptized. Rebaptism was condemned throughout the Empire with the death penalty. Such harsh punishment was first adopted by Emperor Valentinian I (r. 364–75) in an edict of February 20, 373. Recent scholarship has tended to distinguish three branches of Anabaptists: Swiss Anabaptism, South German/Austrian Anabaptism, and North German/Dutch Anabaptism.

Developments in the city of Münster fall within the history of the latter branch of Anabaptism. The most influential leader of the North German/Dutch Anabaptists was Melchior Hoffman (1495/1500–1543). However, it was one of his followers, Jan Matthijs (d. 1534), who took control of the city and proclaimed it the New Jerusalem. The city was besieged by Catholic and Protestant forces for 16 months, from February 27, 1534 until June 25, 1535. Upon Matthijs' death in April 1534, Jan van Leyden (d. 1536) assumed control of the city. He introduced the community of goods and polygamy. The siege proved to be ineffective, in spite of the many deaths on account of hunger and illnesses. However, the New Jerusalem was betrayed by two of its citizens. The ensuing bloodbath lasted for two days, with only the women and children spared.

SEE ALSO: Anabaptist Movement; English Reformation; German Peasant Rebellion, 1525; German Reformation; Luther, Martin (1483–1546); Moravian Brothers; Müntzer, Thomas (ca. 1489–1525)

References and Suggested Readings

- Baylor, M. G. (Ed.) (1991) The Radical Reformation. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
 Blicke, P. (1981) The Revolution of 1525. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.
 Canning, J. (1996) A History of Medieval Political Thought (300–1450). London: Routledge.

Hillerbrand, H. J. (2007) The Division of Christendom: Christianity in the Sixteenth Century. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.

Snyder, C. A. (1995) Anabaptist History and Theology. Kitchener: Pandora Press.

Regina Riot

David L. Bent

The Regina Riot took place in the capital city of Saskatchewan on Dominion Day, July 1, 1935. The confrontation between striking relief camp workers and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) was the culmination of the On-to-Ottawa Trek, a protest that was intended to travel from Vancouver to Ottawa to carry the grievances of the unemployment relief camp workers to the federal government.

The Great Depression made unemployment an acute economic and social problem in Canada. Because they were not usually eligible for local relief, many single men became drifters looking for work, putting considerable strain on existing relief programs. One of the solutions proposed for dealing with this problem was a system of state-run, non-compulsory relief camps that would provide unemployed men with work until the economy recovered. It was also hoped that these camps would reduce urban unrest and lessen the influence of the outlawed Communist Party of Canada (CPC) among the unemployed. The Conservative government of R. B. Bennett authorized the establishment of the relief camps in October 1932, under the administration of the Department of National Defense. Camps were opened across Canada and more than 170,000 men were accommodated in them over the course of their short history.

Workers were given food and shelter and a token wage of 20 cents a day. The camps were mainly located in relatively remote locations, where workers cleared land and prepared sites for the construction of airfields, military bases, and roads. However, the meagre wages, hard labor, isolation, and military discipline of camp life and continuing lack of non-camp employment caused considerable worker discontent. Grumbings and protests were seen in many camps, but the situation in British Columbia was exacerbated by patronage scandals in camp management, poor camp conditions, and the exploitation of workers by private lumber interests. The problems in BC came to a head in April 1935 when the Relief Camp Workers Union, an illegal body under CPC influence, called for the province's camp workers to leave the camps and gather in Vancouver to go on strike for better conditions. But after two months of striking in Vancouver it was becoming apparent that the strike was not having its desired effect. Strike leadership, particularly veteran union organizer Arthur "Slim" Evans, then decided to escalate the strike by taking their demands to the seat of the Dominion government in Ottawa.

The On-to-Ottawa Trek started in early June, when strikers boarded boxcars heading east, gathering greater numbers of fellow camp workers as they went and numbering about 2,000 men by the time they reached Regina. Bennett was alarmed by this, fearing that it represented the beginnings of a communist revolution. Worried that large numbers would potentially join the Trek in Winnipeg, he ordered that the trekkers be stopped in Regina, where there was a large RCMP contingent. While the trekkers were camped in Regina's Exhibition Grounds, he invited strike leaders to Ottawa for discussions. However, the meeting in Ottawa produced no results as Bennett was not willing to concede to the strikers' demands for a guaranteed minimum wage, union recognition, and unemployment insurance. He also accused Evans and his fellows of being CPC agents who were more interested in stirring up unrest than in securing employment or improved conditions for their followers.

The strike leaders then returned to Regina, where tensions were rising. The anticipated confrontation with the RCMP took place at a public meeting on Market Square on the evening of 1 July when the police blocked exits from the square and waded into the crowd in order to arrest the Trek leaders. This event triggered fierce street fighting that continued for several hours and soon reached the Exhibition Grounds, where most of the trekkers were still housed. The police were mounted and armed with weapons and teargas, while the strikers had only rocks and their fists and anything else that came to hand. The violence was brought under control by midnight, but it cost two lives, including city detective Charles Miller and a trekker, Nick Schaack, who died from his injuries in August. Hundreds of others were injured, 120 people were arrested, and Regina's downtown was severely damaged. In the following days the provincial government agreed to disperse the trekkers back to their camps or their homes.

Although short, the riot was the most violent event of the Canadian Great Depression and had both an immediate and a lasting impact. It was one of the many issues that brought down Bennett's government in the fall election of 1935. Among the first actions of the new Liberal government of W. L. Mackenzie King was the abolition of the relief camp system. The wider influence of the riot was on public opinion. The trekkers had enjoyed considerable public support, and their plight galvanized many to press for unemployment insurance and union legality, both of which would become foundations of Canada's postwar social policy.

SEE ALSO: Canada, Labor Protests; Canada, Law and Public Protest: History; Cooperative Commonwealth; Ontario Coalition Against Poverty (OCAP); On-to-Ottawa Trek

References and Suggested Readings

- Horn, M. (Ed.) (1988) The Depression in Canada: Responses to Economic Crisis. Toronto: Copp Clark Pitman.
- Howard, V. (1985) "We Were the Salt of the Earth!" A Narrative of the On-to-Ottawa Trek and the Regina Riot. Regina: Canadian Plains Research Center, University of Regina.
- Liversedge, R. (1973) Recollections of the On to Ottawa Trek. Toronto: McClelland & Stewart.
- Waiser, W. A. (2003) All Hell Can't Stop Us: The On-to-Ottawa Trek and Regina Riot. Calgary: Fifth House.

Reichstag Fire of 1933

Ingo Schmidt

On January 30, 1933 Adolf Hitler was appointed as chancellor of the Weimar Republic. On February 27, 1933, in the midst of an election campaign, the German parliament building, the Reichstag, went up in flames. The next day, a decree on the Protection of the People and the State declared a state of emergency that suspended most civil rights (Kühnl 1987: 193–4). By the end of March, the Enabling Act (Kühnl 1987: 196) transferred all decision-making power from parliament to the government. In July the National Socialist German Workers' Party (NSDAP) was declared the only legal party in Germany (Kühnl 1987: 200–1). Within a few months, the Weimar Republic had given way to the Third Reich. The Reichstag Fire was a turning point in the transformation of a representative democracy into a terrorist dictatorship.

Just three months before Hitler was appointed chancellor by the president of the German Reich, Paul von Hindenburg, the NSDAP had suffered an electoral setback. Its share of the total vote in the election of November 3, 1932 went down to 33.1 percent from 37.4 percent in the previous election. Conversely, the communist KPD had gone up from 14.5 to 16.9 percent, while the social democratic SPD lost slightly from 21.6 to 20.4 percent (Winkler 1990: 774). To many in the ruling class, these elections indicated a strengthening and radicalization of the labor movement.

When General Kurt von Schleicher failed to cobble together a stable bourgeois majority for his government, Hitler was seen as the one person who could overcome the stalemate among the bourgeois parties and put labor on the defensive. However, Hitler's government was as weak as its predecessors had been under von Schleicher and Franz von Papen. To consolidate his power, Hitler announced another election with the aim of winning enough votes for the NSDAP to legally transfer power from an inefficient parliament, denounced by the Nazis as Schwatzbude (Chatter House), to the determined leadership of the NSDAP government. To attain the desired election results, the Nazis terrorized working-class neighborhoods and labor organizations. They also banned KPD and SPD newspapers.

The Reichstag Fire was presented as the beginning of a communist-led coup and used as the pretext to intensify the terror campaign against labor, particularly KPD members. False accusations and terror against the communists stirred up fear among the propertied class, and thus built support for the Nazis as the self-acclaimed defenders of the capitalist order, leading SPD and trade union leaders to stress the constitutional order and law abidance. Insinuating communist involvement in the Reichstag Fire was, given the animosity between communists and social democrats, just another roadblock toward a united labor front, which might have been able to stop the emergence of the Nazi dictatorship.

Despite aggravated Nazi terror and splits within the labor movement, the results of the March 5 elections were dissatisfying for the NSDAP. With 43.9 percent it failed to win the absolute majority it wanted to use to suspend the rights of parliament. Moreover, KPD and SPD still won 12.3 and 18.3 percent of the vote, respectively. The Enabling Act could only be passed because the KPD seats were denied and all bourgeois parties voted with the NSDAP.

The Reichstag Fire led to charges against one individual, Marius van der Lubbe, who had no open political affiliations, and three communists, most prominently among them Georgi Dimitrov. During the trial, which took place from September 21 to 23, 1933 and was accompanied by a massive international propaganda campaign by the communists, Dimitrov exposed lies and contradictions in the charges against him and his comrades. After it had become obvious that no communists were involved in the Reichstag Fire, charges against them were dropped, largely because Nazi leaders were still nervous about reactions from other countries at that time. However, van der Lubbe was sentenced to death and executed. The communists had turned the charges against them around and claimed that van der Lubbe was a Nazi puppet. Until today this is a controversial issue among historians. There is no doubt, however, that the Nazis used the Reichstag Fire to install their regime of terror in the name of the defense of property, law, and order.

SEE ALSO: Hitler, Adolf (1889–1945) and German Nazism

References and Suggested Readings

- Kühnl, R. (1987) Der deutsche Faschismus in Quellen und Dokumenten. Cologne: Pahl-Rugenstein.
- Petzold, J. (1984) Faschismus – Regime des Verbrechens. Frankfurt am Main: Röderberg.
- Schneider, M. (1999) Unterm Hakenkreuz – Arbeiter und Arbeiterbewegung 1933–1939. Bonn: J. H. W. Dietz Nachf.
- Von Freyberg, J. & Hebel-Kunze, B. (1977) Die deutsche Sozialdemokratie in der Zeit des Faschismus. In J. Von Freyberg et al., Geschichte der deutschen Sozialdemokratie 1863–1975. Cologne: Pahl-Rugenstein, pp. 180–241.
- Wehler, H.-U. (2003) Deutsche Gesellschaftsgeschichte 1914–1949. Munich: C. H. Beck.
- Winkler, H. A. (1990) Der Weg in die Katastrophe – Arbeiter und Arbeiterbewegung 1930–1933. Bonn: J. H. W. Dietz Nachf.
- Winkler, H. A. (2002) Der lange Weg nach Westen – Deutsche Geschichte, Vol. II. Munich: C. H. Beck.

Resistenza

Claudio Pavone

In the European countries occupied by Nazi Germany during World War II, resistance movements arose that were characterized, to different degrees, by four essential factors: (1) a patriotic war against the occupying forces; (2) a civil war against local fascists or collaborators; (3) a class war against capitalists, aimed at social renewal; and (4) unarmed civil resistance. The common objective of all these factors was to drive fascism from Europe.

All four of these factors were present in Italy, which holds a central position for two main reasons. First, Italy had been the birthplace of fascism and was under fascist rule from 1922 to 1943. During those years an anti-fascist minority was active in the underground, in prisons, or in exile. Second, Italy had fought the first part of the war (from June 1940 to September 1943) as an ally of Nazi Germany, occupying parts of France, Greece, and the southern Balkans (Yugoslavia). After its military defeat the fascist government was overthrown by the kingdom and the military. The new executive, led by Marshall Pietro Badoglio, signed an armistice with the Anglo-Americans, who already occupied Sicily and had landed on mainland Italy, which was made public on September 8, 1943. German troops reacted harshly, occupying all of Italy north of Salerno, where on the same day Allied forces attempted a new landing. The entire Italian army dissolved and Germans in Italy and other occupied territories captured more than 600,000 men and deported them to Germany.

In each country occupied by fascists, a minority of the population joined the resistance. Acqui Division, a garrison of thousands on the Greek island of Cefalonia which had attempted to resist, was completely exterminated by German troops. In Italy, the king and Badoglio's executive fled to the south, which was under Allied rule, and on October 13 declared war on Germany. Mussolini, freed by German troops, formed a new fascist government under their protection called the Italian Social Republic (Repubblica Sociale Italiana), with Salò on Lake Garda as its capital. Italy was thus divided in two. In the part that remained under fascist and Nazi control, resistance arose in fierce opposition. In Naples just before the arrival of the Anglo-Americans, four days of insurgency lasted from September 28 to October 1.

The resistance fought both Germans and fascists of the Salò Republic. Partisan groups were formed by young people who revolted against Nazi and fascist rule and sought to prevent forced enlistment of Italians who were self-proclaimed anti-fascists. Resistance groups grew in number and strength and were transformed into brigades, which operated in the Alps and the Apennines, while in the cities the Patriotic Action Groups (Gruppi di Azione Patriottica, GAP) remained active in opposing the fascists. Both in cities and in the countryside, the organized resistance received significant popular support and solidarity as it carried out major economic and political actions.

The civil war in Italy was considerably more bitter than other civil wars in Europe. There were several scores remaining to be settled that stemmed from the years immediately following World War I (1918–22), when violent fascist squads (squadristi) attacked and destroyed the seats of popular organizations with impunity, encountering little resistance from popular forces or the old ruling classes, who mostly colluded with fascism. The Italian civil war was radical in character, and some among the working and agricultural laboring class considered it a class war, sharing the Third International's view that fascism was a creation of capitalism.

However, patriotism was also an important motivation in resistance participation, as was liberation from the Germans, who had been a traditional "enemy" since the time of the Italian Risorgimento. Many Italians who had heroically refused to participate in the fascist regime were deported to Germany. When offered the opportunity to return to Italy to join the army being organized by Mussolini, some refused, motivated by faithfulness to the motherland or (especially amongst officials) to the oath sworn to the kingdom.

The political consciousness of the Italian masses reflected the influence of a wide range of social forces in society, from the far right to the far left. Italy's civil society largely supported the armed resistance, which numbered about 220,000 and itself formed a small minority of the population. Like the resistance fighters, doctrinaire fascists were also a minority of the population. Less dogmatic fascists occasionally undermined their superiors and provided assistance to members of the resistance. But the Italian state apparatus remained mostly under fascist control, reflecting the presence of a long-term passive collaboration.

The resistance brought together diverse groups: old anti-fascists from prison and exile, anti-fascists who had remained silent during the 20 years of fascist rule and who retained personal memories of the outrages committed at that time, young people of the new generation who were born and educated under fascism – who had often been soldiers in fascist wars and were now revolting against their class milieu, discovering new horizons of liberty.

The resistance organized itself politically and militarily. The National Liberation Committees (Comitati di Liberazione Nazionale, CLN) reunited the main anti-fascist parties: the Communist Party, the Socialist Party (now called the PSIUP), the Partito d'Azione (Action Party, a republican liberal party), Democrazia del Lavoro (Workers' Democracy), the Christian Democratic Party, and the Liberal Party. There was a CLN Central Committee in Rome and a Committee of National Liberation of Upper Italy (CLNAI) based in Milan in northern Italy.

Communists had been the most active among the underground anti-fascists and were better prepared for the renewed period of political struggle. The Socialist Party, which had been disbanded with its members operating underground and in exile, reconstituted itself and clandestinely set about educating a new rank-and-file contingent of activists. The new Partito d'Azione was established along with other movements of a liberal socialist persuasion, including Giustizia e Libertà (Justice and Liberty), a movement founded in France by leading political theorist Carlo Rosselli, who was murdered with his brother Nello by Mussolini's agents. Christian Democracy was the party of Italian Catholics. In late 1943 it brought together former members of the Partito Popolare (Popular Party), which had been dismantled by fascism, and university students who were members of Azione Cattolica (Catholic Action), a young militant organization. Democrazia del Lavoro was a small group that was present only in Rome and the south, while the Liberal Party contained former members of the pre-fascist-era liberal ruling class.

Despite their differing ideals and programs, the parties came to a suitable agreement, deciding to postpone until after the end of the war elections to a future Constituent Assembly that would debate and resolve the essential problems of building a new democratic country.

Militarily, partisan groups formed spontaneously or on behalf of parties and continued to grow in number. They united into a Freedom Volunteers Corps (Corpo Volontari della Libertà, CVL), which was established on June 9, 1944. However, each party retained strong links with the partisan brigades it had helped to form. The stronger Garibaldi Brigades and Giustizia e Libertà Brigades were linked respectively to the communists and to the Partito d'Azione. Only a handful of partisan groups, some monarchists, and a few members of the extreme left remained outside the CLN and the CVL.

In some liberated zones of the Alps and Appennines a few "partisan republics" were formed. They were short-lived, due to the disproportionate military force of the Italian fascists and Germans, but set an important example of the capacity of Italians to establish forms of self-government.

With the collaboration of Italian fascists, the Nazis carried out merciless repression. Villages were destroyed, people were deported, hostages were shot, and corpses were publicly exposed or hung on butchers' hooks. Reprisals such as that at Fosse Ardeatine in Rome on March 24, 1944, when 335 victims were murdered in retaliation for a partisan attack, and massacres such as those in Sant'Anna di Stazzema or Marzabotto demonstrated a ferocity that may be properly referred to as a "war on civilians."

Jews were deported by Germans on the basis of lists prepared in Italy after the 1938 race laws and subsequently updated, and on the basis of arrests made by Italian police. On October 16, 1943, 1,022 Jews in the Rome ghetto were sent to Auschwitz; only 17 returned.

Resistance was conditioned by the slow advances made by the Allied forces. In the winter of 1943 and 1944, the front line stopped at the Garigliano River south of Rome, and in the following winter it halted at the Appennines north of Florence. The Allies were not expecting resistance of this sort in an enemy country and seriously underestimated its strength. Incredulity turned into growing acknowledgment as the resistance grew in force and prestige, but there was also increasing concern for the political relevance it was assuming. This concern was shared by the monarchist government formed in the south, which was transferred to Rome after the city's liberation on June 4, 1944. These problems were dealt with in a series of agreements between leading bodies of the resistance, Allied Headquarters, and the executive in Rome.

In the last days of April 1945 a national insurrection broke out in northern Italy and in many cases cities were liberated by partisans before the Allies arrived. Mussolini, sentenced to death by the CLNAI, was executed by partisans. The legacy of the resistance was to constitute the basis of the new Italian constitution on January 1, 1948. It remains a powerful source of inspiration among Italians into the twenty-first century.

SEE ALSO: Fascism, Protest and Revolution; Giustizia e Libertà, Partito d'Azione; Italian Communist Party; Italian Risorgimento; Italian Socialist Party; Mussolini, Benito (1883–1945); Rosselli, Carlo (1899–1937)

References and Suggested Readings

- Cooke, P. (1998) The Italian Resistance: An Anthology. Manchester: Manchester University Press.
- Peli, S. (2004) La Resistenza in Italia: storia e critica. Turin: Einaudi.
- Pugliese, S. G. (2003) Fascism, Anti-Fascism, and the Resistance in Italy: 1919 to the Present. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Quazza, G. (1982) Resistenza e storia d'Italia. Problemi e ipotesi di ricerca. Milan: Feltrinelli.

Revolution, dialectics of

Peter Hudis

Since the mid-nineteenth century, numerous political theorists and activists have considered dialectical philosophy to be “the algebra of revolution.” The efforts on the part of social struggles to overcome external and internal barriers to liberation have led many thinkers and activists to view dialectics as the expression of the immanent rhythm and self-movement of revolution itself.

Although the concept of “the dialectics of revolution” arose in association with modern political developments, “dialectics” has its origin in ancient Greek thought. The ancient Greeks viewed dialectics as the critical examination of an opinion through a process of mutual dialogue and questioning. They held that through the “dialectical” clash of contrasting views it became possible to discover a higher, transcendent truth. According to Aristotle (in Sophist, a lost work quoted by ancient writers), the dialectical method was invented by Zeno of Elea and systematically developed by Plato in his Socratic dialogues. Plato and Aristotle's view of dialectics as the method of proper reasoning and the way to grasp “the nature of things themselves” held great sway in the ancient and medieval world, impacting both the history of philosophy and the development of Christianity and Islam. In the European Middle Ages dialectics become equated with logic, and as one of the seven liberal arts it was a required course of study for generations of students and scholars.

Dialectics took on an altered meaning in the modern world, beginning with Immanuel Kant. Kant viewed dialectics as the study of categories that are internally contradictory and do not admit of synthesis or resolution (referred to by him as “antimonies”). Since Kant viewed these antimonies as a priori categories that ground the possibility of experience, he gave dialectics an objective foundation – in contrast to the earlier view of dialectics as the subjective exchange of differing views and standpoints. G. W. F. Hegel, following Kant, also viewed dialectics as ontologically grounded in human experience, but he differed from Kant in affirming the possibility of such contradictions leading to synthesis and transcendence. Hegel's concept that freedom is achieved through the dialectical transcendence of contradictory and apparently mutually exclusive realities and ideas greatly influenced a number of later nineteenth- and twentieth-century thinkers.

Hegel was strongly impacted by the French Revolution of 1789. It led him to conceive of conflict and dialogue as occurring within and between social forces and cultural formations. This is especially evident in the section on the “master/slave dialectic” in his Phenomenology of Mind (1807). Hegel argued that although slavery undermines the slave's sense of self, the fact that the slave performs labor, while the master enjoys a mere life of leisure at its expense, leads to a situation wherein the slave develops a higher, independent consciousness by negating its conditions of oppression. The Phenomenology as a whole presents a “journey of discovery” from consciousness to self-consciousness to reason, and from spirit to religion to “absolute knowledge.” These stages of thought correspond to specific historical and cultural formations. The movement from one stage to another consists of a development through contradiction in which barriers to the realization of freedom are overcome at the time as the accomplishments of each preceding stage are absorbed. However, the resulting transcendence of alienation is not achieved simply by negating external obstacles to self-development. Negation, Hegel noted, is dependent upon the object of its critique; the act of negating external obstacles still leaves one beholden to them in some way. The full transcendence of alienation, he argued, is achieved by negating the initial act of negation itself – what he called “the negation of the negation.” In presenting a movement that advances beyond “bare” or “first negation” to second or “absolute” negation, the subject achieves not only a destruction of the old but also the creation of the new. As Hegel wrote in the Science of Logic, “in all this, care must be taken to distinguish between the first negation as negation in general, and the second negation, the negation of the negation: the latter is concrete, absolute negativity, just as the former on the contrary is only abstract negativity” (Hegel 1967: 115–16).

Although in a number of writings Hegel critiqued the nature of labor in the modern factory system, he never called into question the existence of capitalism. Nevertheless, his linking of dialectical concepts with specific stages of human social and cultural history greatly influenced later radical figures, from Herzen, Bakunin, and Proudhon to Marx, Lenin, and Lukács.

Marx took the concept of dialectical contradiction into the terrain of political economy, centering it in the process of social change engendered by class struggle. In so doing he adopted Hegel’s notion that the transcendence of alienation occurs through “the negation of the negation.” His Economic and Philosophic Manuscripts of 1844 critiqued not only existing society but also “crude communism” for presuming that the abolition of private property and the “free” market suffices to abolish capitalism. Marx held that the negation of private property was a necessary but insufficient condition for liberation, since it is still dependent upon the object of its critique. For Marx, replacing private property with collective property does not liberate humanity from the idea that ownership or having is the defining principle of society; it just reaffirms it on another level: “How little this annulment of private property is really an appropriation is in fact proved by the abstract negation of the entire world of culture and civilization, the regression to the unnatural simplicity of the poor and crude man who has few needs” (Marx 1975b: 295). Marx held that genuine communism (which he also called “humanism”) could be reached only if the negation of private property is followed by a second negation that abolishes alienated labor. He wrote: “Communism is the position as the negation of the negation, and is hence the actual phase necessary for the next stage of historical development in the process of human emancipation and rehabilitation” (306). On this basis Marx transformed Hegel’s dialectical philosophy into a dialectical concept of revolution.

Marx was critical of Hegel for centering the dialectic upon the self-movement of concepts instead of upon the actual human subjects striving for liberation. He wrote in 1843: “Hegel makes the Idea into the subject, whilst the genuine real subject . . . is turned into the predicate” (Marx 1975a: 11). A similar critique appears in the Postface to the second edition of Capital, where he wrote that Hegel “even transforms into an independent subject” the “life process of the human brain.” However, Marx never disavowed his debt to Hegel. In Capital and elsewhere he referred to himself “as the pupil of that mighty thinker . . . The mystification which dialectic suffers in Hegel’s hands, by no means prevents him from being the first to present its general form of working in a comprehensive and conscious manner” (Marx 1976: 102–203). Marx’s continued debt to Hegel is reflected in the closing pages of Capital, where he made use of the concept of “the negation of the negation” in discussing the abolition of capitalism. The expropriation of the English peasantry during the birth of capitalism, he held, is “the first negation of private property”; subsequently, through the creation of a revolutionary working class, capitalism “begets its own negation.” “This,” he wrote, “is the negation of the negation” (929–30).

Following Marx’s death, Friedrich Engels in Ludwig Feuerbach and the End of Classical German Philosophy (1886) developed a perspective on dialectics that continues to be embraced by orthodox currents in Marxism. Engels argued that while Hegel’s philosophic system is conservative and reactionary, his dialectical method is progressive and revolutionary. Engels also sought to apply dialectics to nature, viewing dialectical method as a conceptual tool for unlocking the dynamic character of natural and historical phenomena. This greatly influenced the work of Georgi Plekhanov, a founder of Russian Marxism, who coined the phrase “dialectical materialism” (the phrase nowhere appears in Marx’s work). Plekhanov argued that dialectics consists of an immanent progressive movement in nature and history that is independent of human will and volition. In his “The Meaning of Hegel” (1891) he wrote: “Marx drove idealism out of this, its last refuge. Like Hegel, he viewed the history of humanity as a lawful process, independent of human will . . . he tried to trace to a single universal source all acting and mutually interacting forces in social life” (Plekhanov 1949: 155). This perspective reflected the tendency of those in and around the Second International to comport “dialectics” with the evolutionist and determinist outlook of European positivism. Such a reduction of dialectics to the expression of fixed laws of nature tended to detach dialectical thought from the process of actual revolution and revolutionary forces.

There were exceptions to the tendency of many radical thinkers in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries to separate dialectics from actual revolutionary processes, as seen in the work of Antonio Labriola and Rosa Luxemburg. Arguing against Bernstein’s reformism in Reform or Revolution (1899), Luxemburg held that Marx’s use of the dialectical method enabled him to decipher the nature of capitalist value production. However, she did not enter into a direct study of dialectics. A rebirth of interest in the dialectics of revolution did not show itself until the collapse of established Marxism at the outbreak of World War I in 1914 and the Russian Revolution of 1917.

In 1914–15 Lenin engaged in a direct study of Hegel’s Science of Logic. In his “Abstract of Hegel’s Science of Logic” Lenin separated himself from the photocopy theory of knowledge of his earlier Materialism and Empirio-Criticism (1890), writing, “cognition not only reflects the objective world, but creates it” (Lenin 1961: 212). He also modified some aspects of the dominant form of dialectical materialism, as in critiquing Plekhanov: “Plekhanov criticizes Kantianism (and agnosticism in general) more from the vulgar materialist than the dialectic materialist point of view” (179) and “Plekhanov probably wrote nearly 1,000 pages . . . on philosophy. There is in them nil about the Larger Logic, its thoughts (i.e., dialectics proper, as a philosophic science) nil!” (277). Lenin also questioned making a rigid separation between idealism and materialism. Several studies have argued that Lenin’s 1914–15 embrace of such Hegelian concepts as “transformation into opposite” and “dialectical self-movement” proved of critical importance in his preparation for the 1917 Russian Revolution and its aftermath.

Georg Lukács independently sought to connect dialectical thought to the dialectics of revolution in his History and Class Consciousness (1923). He sharply critiqued the prevailing “dialectic materialism” for neglecting the role of revolutionary subjectivity. He wrote of Engels: “But he does not even mention the most vital interaction, namely, the dialectical relation between subject and object in the historical process” (Lukács 1971: 3) Lukács later wrote of the impact of History and Class Consciousness: “the revival of Hegel’s dialectics struck a hard blow at the revisionist tradition. . . . For anyone wishing to return to the revolutionary traditions of Marxism the revival of the Hegelian traditions was obligatory” (xxi). In 1923, Karl Korsch critiqued established Marxism along similar lines in Marxism and Philosophy.

The publication of Marx’s Economic and Philosophic Manuscripts of 1844 in German in 1932 (a Russian edition appeared in 1927) as well as the Grundrisse in 1939 led to an outburst of interest in the relation between the Hegelian dialectics and revolutionary transformation. Herbert Marcuse of the Frankfurt School published Reason and Revolution in 1941, the first English-language study of the Hegel–Marx relation to appear since the publication of the 1844 Manuscripts. This was followed by the appearance of Raya Dunayevskaya’s Marxism and Freedom (1958) and Erich Fromm’s Marx’s Concept of Man (1961). Both argued for a return to dialectics in light of revolutionary struggles emerging in the post-World War II period. Their work also took issue with the prevailing view of “dialectical materialism” propagated by Stalin and his followers, who denied that the “negation of the negation” was a principle of dialectics.

The emergence of workers’ revolts and revolutions against the single-party dictatorships in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union, especially in Hungary 1956 and in Czechoslovakia 1968, led to new efforts to explore the relation between dialectics and revolution. Marx's 1844 critique of the insufficiencies of stopping at the "communist" abolition of private property seemed especially relevant to many thinkers in Eastern Europe in the post-World War II era, as seen in the work of Karel Kosik in Czechoslovakia, the early work of Leszek Kolakowski in Poland, and Gajo Petrovic of the Praxis school in Yugoslavia. The issue of dialectics and alienation was also of much concern in Maoist and post-Maoist China, leading to intense debates during and after the Cultural Revolution. In the 1980s, the Chinese philosopher Wang Ruoshui explored Marx's 1844 Manuscripts and Hegelian dialectics in light of China's claim to have created a socialist society freed from class oppression and alienated labor. He concluded that alienated labor and human relations, as discussed in Marx's works, still prevailed in "Communist" China. As a result, he was expelled from the Chinese Communist Party.

Latin American thinkers such as Silvio Frondizi, Rodolfo Mondolfo, and Adolpho Sanchez-Vasquez, as well as European philosophers such as Antonio Gramsci, Jean-Paul Sartre, and Maurice Merleau-Ponty, also sought to connect dialectics issues of alienation and human subjectivity. In the Caribbean and Africa, Frantz Fanon focused on Hegel's dialectic in relation to the problems of race and colonialism in Black Skin, White Masks (1952) and The Wretched of the Earth (1961). Black Skin, White Masks explored Hegel's master/slave dialectic in light of racism, arguing that the "additive of color" produced a profound quest for a revolutionary consciousness of self that had been underestimated by many European thinkers. Fanon's work greatly influenced many political movements on the African continent (including in South Africa in the 1980s); his work is also the basis of postcolonial studies. C. L. R. James, also of Caribbean origin, developed a concept of dialectics centered on a notion of a multiple revolutionary subjectivities including but not limited to the traditional working class. James and others (such as the French independent Marxist group Socialisme ou Barbarie, led by Cornelius Castoriadis) argued that the focal point of class struggles was no longer the unequal distribution of the products of labor but rather the effort to overcome the alienated character of work itself

— a matter that was of central concern to Marx in his 1844 Manuscripts and Capital. On similar grounds, tendencies such as the French Situationists argued that the dialectics of revolution centers on a transformation in the conditions of everyday life, both inside and outside of the factory.

The modern women's liberation movement has provided an especially important perspective on the dialectics of revolution. A resurgence of interest of the role of women in revolutionary struggles has been a major feature of the past several decades. One reflection of this is the continued interest in the work of Rosa Luxemburg, as seen from recent conferences on her work in Brazil, Japan, South Africa, and China. Raya Dunayevskaya related Hegel's concept of "absolute negativity" to contemporary feminism, arguing that the rise of the modern women's liberation movement from out of a critique of the male chauvinism of the left gives new life to Hegel and Marx's notion that forward movement proceeds through "the negation of the negation." The discovery over the past three decades of many of Marx's unknown writings on the peasantry, Native Americans, and "Third World" societies from 1875 to 1883 has also sparked new interest in the relation of dialectics to issues of gender and multiculturalism.

Despite the widespread assertion that "there is no alternative" to capitalism, the dialectics of revolution remains a major component of today's political and ideological debates. As Bertell Ollman, among others, has emphasized, dialectics does not consist only of a negative critique of the present; it also consists of a positive anticipation of an emancipatory future. The effort to breathe new life into the concept of revolution in the twenty-first century may therefore lead to yet another rebirth of interest in dialectical philosophy.

SEE ALSO: Dunayevskaya, Raya (1910–1987); Engels, Friedrich (1820–1895); Fanon, Frantz (1925–1961); Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich (1770–1831); James, C. L. R. (1901–1989); Lukács, Georg (1885–1971); Luxemburg, Rosa (1870–1919); Marx, Karl (1818–1883); Marxism; Plekhanov, Georgi (1856–1918); Situationists; Socialisme ou Barbarie

References and Suggested Readings

Anderson, K. (1995) Lenin, Hegel, and Western Marxism: A Critical Study. Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press.

- Dunayevskaya, R. (1958) Marxism and Freedom. New York: Delacorte.
- Dunayevskaya, R. (2001) Rosa Luxemburg, Women's Liberation, and Marx's Philosophy of Revolution. Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press.
- Dunayevskaya, R. (2002) The Power of Negativity. Ed. P. Hudis & K. B. Anderson. Lanham, MD: Lexington Books.
- Fanon, F. (1961/1973) The Wretched of the Earth. New York: Grove.
- Fanon, F. (1952/1979) Black Skin, White Masks. New York: Grove.
- Fromm, E. (1961) Marx's Concept of Man. New York: Ungar.
- Hegel, G. W. F. (1967) Phenomenology of Mind. New York: Harper.
- Hegel, G. W. F. (1969) Science of Logic. London: Allen & Unwin.
- James, C. L. R. (1980) Notes on Dialectics: Hegel, Marx, Lenin. Westport, CT: Lawrence & Hill.
- Lenin, V. I. (1961) Philosophical Notebooks. In Collected Works, Vol. 38. Moscow: Progress Publishers.
- Lukács, G. (1923/1971) History and Class Consciousness. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press.
- Luxemburg, R. (2004) The Rosa Luxemburg Reader. Ed. P. Hudis & K. B. Anderson. New York: Monthly Review Press.
- Marcuse, H. (1941) Reason and Revolution. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Marx, K. (1975a) Contribution to the Critique of Hegel's Philosophy of Law. In Collected Works, Vol. 3. New York: International Publishers.
- Marx, K. (1975b) Economic and Philosophic Manuscripts of 1844. In Collected Works, Vol. 3. New York: International Publishers.
- Marx, K. (1976) Capital, Vol. 1. New York: Penguin.
- Plekhanov, G. (1891/1949) The Meaning of Hegel. Fourth International 10, 4, 5 (April, May): 119–25 and 152–7.
- Rees, J. (1999) The Algebra of Revolution: The Dialectic and the Classical Marxist Tradition. London: Routledge.

Revolutionary Action Movement

Ernest A. Amador

Disgruntled by the ineffectiveness of the peaceful strategy of the early civil rights movement, black college students formed the Revolutionary Action Movement (RAM) in 1963 in Philadelphia. RAM, the first black organization in the United States to call for a Marxist revolution, initiated a seven-year militant campaign against what it identified as the African American's uncompromising, "incurable" enemy: a white-dominated capitalist society. By 1967, the Federal Bureau of Investigation's COINTELPRO program and state law agencies incarcerated RAM's leadership, oftentimes unlawfully, which encouraged disunity. RAM dissolved in 1968.

In an effort to combat police brutality, high black unemployment, and racist practices still rampant in the early 1960s, Max Stanford, who later changed his name to Muhammad Ahmad, helped form the Revolutionary Action Movement in Philadelphia and was named the national field chairman. His group pushed for a revolutionary black nationalist movement as it tried to convert, by infiltration, the pacifist civil rights movement organizations, such as the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) and the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC). Malcolm X, after breaking away from the Nation of Islam, became the spokesperson of RAM's "freedom by any means necessary" message. Although RAM's footwork was carried out by its secret political chapters, its cry to overthrow the capitalist white-dominated government was spread through its periodicals RAM Speaks and Black America. RAM's membership was comprised of expelled or disgruntled students, members of the poor black working class, and even street gangs, but it also focused on recruiting black youth to carry out its revolutionary goal by creating a department specially designed for younger members called the Black Guards.

RAM's ideology was revolutionary for its time. It adopted Malcolm X's encouragement of self-determination and Robert F. Williams's endorsement of armed self-defense and urban guerilla warfare (Williams was also named international chairman, even while he was exiled in Cuba and China); it also asserted that a successful black socialist revolution could be obtained only by operating underground (as opposed to the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and SNCC, which relied on their high visibility to gain momentum).

The combination of RAM's secretive operations, its leadership's growing momentum, and its radical objectives (which sanctioned the use of violence) prompted federal and state law agencies to conduct surveillance of the organization. Under the direction of the FBI's illegal COINTELPRO operation, many RAM leaders – including Malcolm X, Stanford, and Williams (upon his return from exile) – were jailed on fraudulent charges, effectively silencing them. With RAM's leaders distanced from the organization, internal conflicts regarding the direction and future headship of the organization soon followed. RAM, the first black militant revolutionary organization, disbanded in 1968.

SEE ALSO: Black Panthers; Civil Rights, United States, Black Power and Backlash, 1965–1978; Communist Party of the United States of America (CPUSA); CORE (Congress of Racial Equality); Malcolm X (1925–1965); Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC); Uhuru Movement; Williams, Robert F. (1925–1996)

References and Suggested Readings

- Lazerow, J. & Williams, Y. (Eds.) (2006) In Search of the Black Panther Party. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- O'Reilly, K. (1989) Racial Matters: The FBI's Secret Files on Black America. New York: Free Press.
- Stanford, M. C. (1986) Revolutionary Action Movement (RAM): A Case Study of an Urban Revolutionary Movement in Western Capitalist Society. Atlanta University. Available at www.ulib.csuohio.edu/research/portals/blackpower/stanford.pdf.

Riel, Louis (1844–1885)

Ron Bourgeault

Louis Riel played a central role in the Red River (1869–70) and Northwest (1885) Rebellions and founded the province of Manitoba in 1870. He was born on October 22, 1844 at St. Boniface, Red River colony, and was executed for high treason on November 16, 1885 at Regina, Northwest Territories. A much maligned figure in Canadian history, Riel has been often categorized as a religious mystic and political fanatic. A political leader, visionary, and poet, Riel was a nineteenth-century radical liberal democrat, though also influenced by Roman Catholicism and Marxism. Educated first by the missionary Oblates at St. Boniface, in 1858 Riel was sent to Quebec to study for the priesthood at the Collège de Montréal (1858–64).

While in Quebec Riel was exposed to two opposing ideological views of the social and political world. The Collège de Montréal was strongly influenced by Ultramontanism, which was anti-Enlightenment and opposed to the rising secular ideas and politics in Quebec, advocating instead a theocratic state. In 1864, upon the death of his father, a central figure in the Red River colony's political struggles against British colonialism, he left the college to study law with Rodolphe Laflamme (1864–8).

It was with Laflamme that Riel was introduced to the radical liberal politics of the Parti Rouge. The Rouge, ideologically opposed to the Ultramontane Church, demanded the separation of church and state, popular democracy, land reform, citizenship for Indians, and opposition to the inferiority of Quebec in the confederation of British North America (1867). Influenced by the radical liberal ideas of the Rouges, in 1868 Riel returned to the Red River colony and the anticipated annexation of Rupert's Land (Western Canada) to Canada.

What emerged as the Rebellion of 1869–70 was a culmination of many previous political struggles and nationalism in the Red River colony against British colonialism going back to the 1830s. It was the view of Riel and his followers that the wealth derived from the exploitation of lands in the West would be directed primarily toward banking and railroad interests in Canada, with little or no benefits to the poorer Métis and Indian classes. If there was to be fundamental political and economic change, it could only come about with responsible democracy and the creation of a state and territory over which they held power.

On December 8, 1869, Riel and his supporters overthrew the colonial governing authority, and in its place established a provisional government. The strategy was to establish an interim of colonial independence, nationalize the Northwest Territories under the political control of the provisional government, and then negotiate the terms and conditions for the entry of the colony and the Northwest Territories into Canada with the status of a province.

Fearful of radical nationalists in alliance with poorer classes who held control over a provincial state (Manitoba) and its vast lands and resources, Ottawa dispatched military troops to displace the provisional government and cease control of the territory. In turn, Riel, fearing for his safety, fled into exile in the United States. Once Riel and the provisional government were politically neutralized, Ottawa set about gaining control over Manitoba as a province and opening the lands to commercial speculation. The exodus of landless, disenfranchised, poorer Métis classes into the Northwest Territories took place, which, along with Indian treaties and reservation system in Manitoba, constituted a form of ethnic cleansing. Banished into exile in the US, Riel found his way to Chicago and met with Quebec Rouges and exiles from the Paris Commune, then snuck quietly into Quebec where apparently he suffered a nervous breakdown and was hospitalized (1876–8). Upon his release Riel migrated to Montana, taught school, joined the Republican Party, and became an American citizen in 1883.

The marginalization of Métis and Indians that Riel foresaw 15 years earlier in Manitoba had unfolded in the Northwest Territories. Issues of access to land as a means of production against corporate interests, responsible government, and policies toward the Indian peoples to whom the Métis were intimately connected all combined to create an insurrection against the federal government. In 1884 Riel was called from Montana to help address these issues. In March 1885, open rebellion took place at Batoche against the federal government, fought out as a blood putsch knowing they could not win. Their purpose was to establish resistance for the future.

The struggle of the Métis and Indians with Riel in 1869–70 and 1885 was similar to that of the mestizos, mulattos, and Indians with Simón Bolívar in Latin America at the turn of the century. They were national democratic struggles, the culmination of many previous rebellions against colonialism, and were as much an internal civil war as they were external, anti-colonial conflicts.

It is unfortunate that Riel has been maligned as a religious mystic and political fanatic. Riel was first and foremost a nineteenth-century radical liberal democrat and a modernist in the tradition of nineteenth-century liberalism. As a modernist he understood the inevitability of the encroaching economic system and tried to incorporate Métis and Indian interests into it for their betterment. His differences with Roman Catholicism were a struggle to reconcile outdated, ultra-conservative religious dogma with current liberal democratic ideals. His demand for equitable inclusion into capitalism and liberal democracy, together with his religious beliefs, made him an early liberation theologian. For his beliefs and actions he was killed on November 16, 1885.

SEE ALSO: Bolívar, Simón (1783–1830); Canada, Indigenous Resistance

References and Suggested Readings

- Bowsfield, H. (1971) Louis Riel: The Rebel and the Hero. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Braz, A. (2003) The False Traitor: Louis Riel in Canadian Culture. Toronto: University of Toronto Press.

Right-to-work protests, France, 1848

Pamela Pilbeam

The organization of work and the right to work became major issues after the Revolution of 1848 in France, but the notion that the state had some responsibility for the workless was no socialist “Trojan horse” as some conservatives suggested. Since the time of Jean-Baptiste Colbert, Louis XIV’s minister in the mid-seventeenth century, municipalities and the state, the latter a major employer of labor on civil engineering projects, were accustomed to finding extra navvying and other rough work for the unemployed in ad hoc ateliers de charité in times of crisis. When he was intendant in Limoges and comptroller-general in Paris in the 1770s, Turgot, referring to past practice, had established public workshops to employ the jobless in road and canal building and other projects.

During the Great French Revolution, 15 million livres were allocated in 1790 as emergency funding for workshops. Both the Girondin and Jacobin draft constitutions of 1793 affirmed, for the first time, that the state had a legal and constitutional obligation to the poor. Reformers quoted the Jacobin constitution in 1848. Article 21 stated that “Public assistance is a sacred debt” and that society should provide for its poor, “either in obtaining them work, or in ensuring a means of existence for those who are out of work.” Thus, a social obligation had been transformed into a constitutional imperative. A duty had become a right.

Neither Napoleon (1799–1814), nor the two constitutional monarchies (1814–48) gave credence to such notions, and municipalities and the state continued the traditional practice of temporary emergency help. However, every ten years or so, harvest, banking, and commercial failures led to repeated serious food and work shortages. Socialists suggested a variety of associative methods to “organize” work. Charles Fourier and Étienne Cabet dreamed of ideal communities, while others suggested autonomous or state-financed worker cooperatives. Victor Considérant, the Fourierist leader, closely followed by Louis Blanc, also demanded the “right” to work. By 1848 there was conflict between those, mainly socialists, who sought radical cooperative solutions to unemployment and those well represented by the Journal des Économistes who were determined to maintain laissez-faire “freedom of industry.”

On February 28, 1848, following pressure from Louis Blanc, the provisional government decreed that their most pressing problem was how to guarantee the people the legitimate product of their labor and the right for all to work. Blanc was made head of a “Parliament of Industry” consisting of workers’ and employers’ representatives meeting at the Luxembourg Palace to advise the Provisional government on unemployment. Meanwhile, in Paris, the government set up “national workshops” and other towns followed suit. Despite their name and socialist hopes, these proved to be traditional charity workshops. Only navvying work was found, and most of the over 100,000 unemployed in Paris merely received a dole of 3 francs, later reduced to 1 franc a day.

In May 1848 the newly elected Constituent Assembly established a work committee, which included Considérant, but not Blanc, to draft clauses about the organization of work. The Parliament of Industry was dissolved, as were the national workshops. Unemployed artisans who had joined the workshops were appalled; many had dreamed that socialist ideas about work would be included in the new constitution. In June 1848 barricades went up in worker quarters and the predominantly conservative Constituent Assembly sent army units to repress the uprising.

Although the Assembly debated the organization and right to work at length in the autumn of 1848, most of the speeches were hostile and the final constitution published on November 4, 1848 talked of the importance of work, but not the right to work. Article IV stated that the basis of the republic was family, work, property, and public order. Article VII laid out a universal duty to work, save for the future and help others, while Article VIII summarized what was left of the state’s obligation and what the individual could expect as a right. Only the freedom to work and not the right to work was guaranteed. The state promised fraternal help to the needy, either by finding work for them, within the constraints of their budget, or succor to those who could not work: “Society will encourage work through free primary education and professional training, good relationships between workers and employers, savings and credit institutions, voluntary association and public works programs to help the unemployed.”

For a few more months some worker associations were subsidized, but the hopes of socialists such as Charles Proudhon that worker cooperatives might replace laissez-faire capitalism were soon dashed. It was left to employers to “organize” work to their best advantage.

SEE ALSO: Blanc, Louis (1811–1882); Bonaparte, Napoleon (1769–1821); France, June Days, 1848; France, Revolution of 1848; French Revolution, 1789–1794; French Revolution, Radical Factions and Organizations

References and Suggested Readings

- Blanc, L. (1911) Organization of Work. Cincinnati: University of Cincinnati Press.
- Forrest, A. (1981) The French Revolution and the Poor. New York: St. Martin’s Press.
- McKay, D. (1965) The National Workshops: A Study in the French Revolution of 1848. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Pilbeam, P. (2001) French Socialists Before Marx: Workers, Women, and the Social Question in France. Montreal: McGill-Queens University Press.
- Sewell, W. H. (1980) Work and Revolution in France: The Language of Labor from the Old Regime to 1848. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Woloch, I. (1994) The New Regime: Transformations of the French Civic Order, 1789–1820. New York: W. W. Norton.

Ríos, Filiberto Ojeda (1933–2005)

Fernando Artavia Araya

Puerto Rican nationalist and pro-independence leader Filiberto Ojeda Ríos was born in Naguabo in 1933. He spent his adolescence between Puerto Rico and New York and showed a special talent for music. During the 1950s Ojeda combined his studies and work in New York factories with political activism, joining the Cuban 26th of July Movement (Movimiento 26 de Julio) and the Puerto Rican Liberation Movement (Movimiento Libertador de Puerto Rico), which exposed him to the political and social history of US colonial rule over the island.

In 1961 he moved with his family to Cuba, where he studied political science at La Havana University and continued his political activism, joining organizations like the Pro-Independence Movement of Puerto Rico (Movimiento Pro Independencia de Puerto Rico), the Organization in Solidarity with the People of Asia, Africa, and Latin America, and the Association of Puerto Rican Residents in Cuba.

After his return to Puerto Rico in 1969, Ojeda took part in several revolutionary activities and organizations, such as the Armed Revolutionary Independence Movement (Movimiento Independentista Revolucionario en Armas) and the Armed Forces for National Liberation (Fuerzas Armadas para la Liberación Nacional). For this he was persecuted by the local police and the FBI and was forced to go underground for the rest of his life.

In 1976 Ojeda founded and became commander in chief of Los Macheteros (The Machete Wielders), a pro-independence organization composed of an armed section, the Boricua Popular Army (Ejército Popular Boricua), and a political section, the Puerto Rican Workers' Revolutionary Party (Partido Revolucionario de los Trabajadores Puertorriqueños). In 1985 the organization divided, but Ojeda continued as commander in chief of the clandestine Boricua Popular Army-Macheteros (EPB-M). During the 1970s and 1980s, both Ojeda and the EPB-M were linked with dozens of bomb attacks against US commercial, industrial, military, and government targets, including the destruction of nine airplanes of the National Air Guard in Puerto Rico. In September 1983, they were also involved in the $7.1 million assault of a Wells Fargo truck in West Hartford, Connecticut.

In 1985, after a major operation in which hundreds of FBI officers broke into the residences of Puerto Rican pro-independence supporters, Ojeda and many others were arrested and incarcerated in different local and US prisons until 1989. In August of that year, Ojeda was released on condition he wore an electronic fetter, but he removed it and returned to his clandestine condition, becoming one of the FBI's Most Wanted Fugitives. On September 23, 2005, the day of the Grito de Lares when Puerto Ricans commemorated a rebellion that occurred in 1868 against the Spanish crown, Ojeda spoke out for Puerto Rican independence. He was killed that night by the FBI in his residence in Hormigueros. Those identified with the independence movement saw the killing as "political murder," especially given the great significance of the day chosen by the FBI to kill the Macheteros leader.

SEE ALSO: Puerto Rican Independence Movement, 1898–Present

References and Suggested Readings

- Fernández, R. (1993) Los Macheteros: El Robo a la Wells Fargo y la Lucha Armada por la Independencia de Puerto Rico. Rio Piedras: Editorial Gil.
- Fernández, R. (1994) Prisoners of Colonialism: The Struggle for Justice in Puerto Rico. Monroe, ME: Common Courage Press.
- González, M. (2006) Nacionalismo revolucionario puertorriqueño: la lucha armada, intelectuales y prisioneros políticos y de guerra. San Juan/Santo Domingo: Isla Negra Editores.

Riot Grrl

Michael McKee

Originating in the Pacific Northwest and Washington, DC in the early 1990s, the Riot Grrl (or Riot Grrrl) movement centered around a radical feminism and do-it-yourself ethic, drawing on the cultural traditions of the punk rock and independent underground while challenging the sexism and homophobia entrenched within those subcultures. Despite a swift ascendance and distortion in the mainstream media, Riot Grrl embraced a multitude of varying, and sometimes conflicting, voices via bands such as Bikini Kill, Bratmobile, Team Dresch, Heavens to Betsy, Excuse 17, and Huggybear, as well as fanzines like Girl Germs, Jigsaw, Gunk, and Chainsaw. The name Riot Grrl (or Grrrl) can be attributed to Red Rover zinester Jen Smith, who reacted to race riots in the Mt. Pleasant neighborhood of Washington, DC in 1991 by calling for a "girl riot" in the coming summer. Her wording was eventually fused with a phrase culled from Jigsaw fanzine (published out of Olympia, Washington, by Tobi Vail), "angry grrls," to name the nascent movement.

Uncensored and direct, Riot Grrl zine editors wrote about their own experiences with day-to-day sexism, body image, sexual abuse and assault, gender dynamics, and sisterhood. While many of Riot Grrl's early communiqués came chiefly from a handful of women-produced zines from the Pacific Northwest and the nation's capital, consciousness-raising networking through these publications quickly crystallized calls for "Revolution, Girl Style, Now" and "Encouragement in the Face of Insecurity" into a non-hierarchical, regional chapter-based movement across the United States and Britain.

The International Pop Underground Festival held in Olympia, Washington, in the summer of 1991 served as a meeting ground for many early organizers. Although more established alternative groups such as Fugazi, Nation of Ulysses, L7, and the Spinanes performed at the festival, the first night featured an intentional all-female bill, with bands and artists such as Bratmobile, 7 Year Bitch, Nikki McClure, Lois Maffeo, and Suture, featuring vocalist Kathleen Hanna who would soon front one of the movement's most prominent bands, Bikini Kill.

Regular meetings of autonomous Riot Grrl chapters began in Washington, DC shortly thereafter, attracting many women who would become active musicians in bands such as Slant 6, Bikini Kill, Helium, Quix*o*tic, Casual Dots, and Cold Cold Hearts. The city hosted one of the first Riot Grrl conventions in the summer of 1992, with other regional conferences gathering in cities such as Philadelphia throughout the next two years. Although both groups vehemently deny any leadership status, Bikini Kill and Bratmobile served as two of the most prominent bands in the mainstream media's coverage of the movement.

Riot Grrl concerts were at odds with the popular grunge fad of the early and mid-1990s, often deliberately confrontational, designed to challenge punk's default norms. Sympathetic bands frequently invited female members of the audience up to the front of the stage, disrupting slamdancing and aggressive "moshing." Some concert organizers insisted on an inflated admission price for males, emphasizing their events as women-oriented spaces. Heckling, intimidation, and threats were common from some male-dominated crowds.

By 1996, the movement had lost steam, due in part to personal conflicts, media misrepresentation, and a shift toward new strategies in art and activism on the part of the early organizers.

Riot Grrl's legacy directly informs the landscape of third-wave feminism as well as phenomena such as the Ladyfest musical festival and activist groups such as Bands Against Bush. Several high-profile participants of the movement have since gained notoriety as musicians and artists, as in the case of Corin Tucker and Carrie Brownstein of Sleater Kinney, Kathleen Hanna's electro-punk band Le Tigre, and film director Miranda July.

SEE ALSO: Latin American Punk Rock and Protest; Punk Movement

References and Suggested Readings

- Anderson, M. & Jenkins, M. (2001) Dance of Days: Two Decades of Punk in the Nation's Capital. New York: Soft Skull Press.
- Koch, K. (Dir). (2005) Don't Need You: The Herstory of Riot Grrl. New York: Urban Cowgirl.
- Raha, M. (2004) Cinderella's Big Score. Berkeley: Seal Press.

Rizal, José (1861–1896)

Atoy M. Navarro

José Protacio Rizal Mercado y Alonzo Realonda was a Filipino patriot, physician, and polymath, considered the most prominent propagandist and reformist in the Philippines during the Spanish colonial era. He is recognized as one of the martyrs of the Philippine Revolution and the anniversary of his death is commemorated as a national holiday called Rizal Day.

Rizal was born to a middle-class family in Calamba, Laguna, Philippines, on June 19, 1861. His father, Francisco Engracio Rizal Mercado, was a prosperous landowner and sugar planter of Filipino-Chinese descent from Laguna, while his mother, Teodora Morales Alonzo Realonda, was a well-educated woman from Manila. Rizal was the seventh of 11 children. His only brother, Paciano Rizal Mercado, and a number of his sisters also participated in the Filipino revolutionary movement.

After earning a Bachelor of Arts degree in 1877 at the Ateneo Municipal de Manila, Rizal continued his education there and finished a land surveyor's degree. He enrolled in medical school at the Universidad de Santo Tomás but did not finish due to Spanish discrimination against Filipino students. In 1882, he traveled to Madrid where he studied medicine and took art courses at the Universidad Central de Madrid.

While studying in Madrid, he became the most prominent member of the Circulo Hispano-Filipino, a small community of Filipino students in Spain who campaigned for social reforms in the Philippines. Rizal obtained a Licentiate in Medicine from the Universidad Central de Madrid in 1884. The following year, he finished the graduate courses for a Doctor in Medicine degree and obtained a Licentiate in Philosophy and Letters from the same university. Rizal continued his studies, specializing in ophthalmology under Dr. Louis de Weckert in Paris, and later working under Dr. Otto Becker in Heidelberg. In Berlin, he was inducted as a member of the Berlin Ethnological Society and the Berlin Anthropological Society under the patronage of Dr. Rudolf Virchow.

Rizal was an anthropologist, architect, artist, educator, ethnologist, farmer, historian, linguist, ophthalmologist, psychologist, scientist, sociologist, sportsman, theologian, and writer. Having traveled extensively in Asia, Europe, and North America, he was a polyglot conversant in Tagalog, Spanish, French, German, English, Dutch, Greek, and Latin, and was knowledgeable in 14 other languages.

Aside from contributions to these various fields, Rizal was best known as a propagandist and reformist who wrote two famous novels, Noli Me Tangere (Berlin, 1887) and El Filibusterismo (Ghent, 1891), which depicted the injustices committed by Spanish authorities against Filipinos. He also annotated Antonio de Morga's Sucesos de las Islas Filipinas (Paris, 1890) and contributed articles to the newspaper La Solidaridad (Barcelona, 1889–90). These works inspired both reformists and revolutionaries in the Philippines while making Rizal a prime target for the Spanish authorities there.

When he returned to the Philippines in 1892, Rizal founded La Liga Filipina, a socio-civic organization that advocated social reforms through legal means. The group was immediately disbanded by the Spanish authorities, and Rizal, considered an enemy of the state, was deported to Dapitan, Zamboanga del Norte, Philippines. While a political exile, Rizal built a boys' school and conducted classes in English and Spanish. He also maintained a hospital and installed a water supply system, as well as going into business, farming, and fishing.

On June 21, 1896, an emissary of Andres Bonifacio, leader of the secret society Katipunan, visited Rizal and informed him of the society's plan to launch a revolution. Rizal objected to this plan, since he deemed a revolution premature, although he suggested ways to prepare for its possible outbreak. Although he was not part of the Katipunan, the Spanish authorities linked him with the Philippine Revolution that began on August 24, 1896. They charged him before a court martial for rebellion, sedition, and conspiracy. Rizal refused a Katipunan offer to help him escape. After a mock trial, he was convicted and sentenced to death. On December 30, 1896, he was executed in Bagumbayan, Manila. With the end of Spanish rule in the Philippines, subsequent American and Filipino governments regarded Rizal as a national hero.

SEE ALSO: Philippines, Colonial Protests during the Spanish Era

References and Suggested Readings

- Coates, A. (1968) Rizal: Philippine Nationalist and Martyr. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Guerrero, L. M. (1963) The First Filipino. Manila: National Historical Commission.
- Guerrero, M. & Schumacher, J. (1998) Kasaysayan: The Story of the Filipino People, Vol. 5: Reform and Revolution. Hong Kong: Asia Publishing Company.
- Ocampo, A. (1995) Rizal Without the Overcoat, 2nd ed. Pasig City: Anvil.

Robeson, Paul (1898–1976)

Michael Zeitler

As much as anyone in the decades following World War I, Paul Robeson helped to redefine black male identity in America and throughout the world. Born in Princeton, New Jersey, on April 9, 1898, the son of an ex-slave minister father and school teacher mother, Robeson's career achievements seem the raw material of legend. As an actor, he starred on Broadway in Eugene O'Neill's All God's Chillun Got Wings and The Emperor Jones, Shakespeare's Othello, and Jerome Kern's Showboat. On screen, he pioneered the way for black actors in films like Song of Freedom (1937) and The Proud Valley (1940), and fought against the dehumanizing black stereotypes commonly portrayed in American films. As an athlete, he won 15 sport letters and All American recognition at Rutgers University and excelled in the early days of professional football. As a singer and recording artist, he was equally at home performing classical arias, African American spirituals, and folk songs, and his renditions of “Old Man River” and “The Ballad for Americans” remain icons of American popular culture. As a linguist and scholar, Robeson spoke multiple languages, earned Phi Beta Kappa status and Rutgers valedictorian honors, and graduated from the Columbia University School of Law.

Yet Robeson’s most enduring legacy was not as an artist but as a political activist and social thinker. He realized early in his career that the role of the artist must transcend the stage, screen, or concert hall to engage contemporary political and economic conditions. Robeson had always fought for civil rights in America, speaking out against lynching and refusing to perform before segregated audiences. By the early 1930s, however, his international film career brought him in contact with young Pan-African student leaders like Jomo Kenyatta and Kwame Nkrumah, connecting for him the domestic struggle for social justice to the international struggle against colonialism. In 1934 a trip to the Soviet Union further radicalized Robeson, increasing his interest in Marxism and socialist political and economic theory. Throughout the 1930s Robeson committed himself to the fight against fascism; he spoke and performed at fundraising rallies for the Spanish Republic and sang at the front for the troops in the International Abraham Lincoln Brigade.

During the Cold War, Robeson’s defense of the Soviet Union, together with his attacks on European colonialism, American racial injustice, and McCarthyism, made him a prime target for conservatives, both in and out of government. Right-wing groups violently interrupted his concerts and organized boycotts of his recordings, and the US government revoked his passport by executive order, although he was never charged with any crime. His professional career at a standstill, he continued to speak out against injustice and published his autobiography, Here I Stand, in 1958. After the restoration of his passport that same year, he began a triumphant three-year world concert tour. By 1963, illness forced his retirement, and he spent his remaining years largely in seclusion, living with family in Philadelphia. He died on January 23, 1976. In Harlem, 5,000 mourners attended his funeral.

SEE ALSO: Abraham Lincoln Brigade; African American Resistance, Jim Crow Era; Civil Rights, United States: Overview; Harlem Renaissance; Kenyatta, Jomo (1893–1978); Nkrumah, Kwame (1909–1972)

References and Suggested Readings

- Duberman, M. B. (1988) Paul Robeson. New York: Knopf.
- Foner, P. S. (1978) Paul Robeson Speaks: Writings, Speeches, Interviews 1918–1974. New York: Brunner/Mazel Publishers.
- Robeson, P. (1988) Here I Stand. Boston: Beacon Press.
- Robeson, P., Jr. (2001) The Undiscovered Paul Robeson: An Artist’s Journey, 1898–1939. New York: Wiley.
- Wright, C. (1975) Robeson: Labor’s Forgotten Champion. Detroit: Balamp.

Robespierre, Maximilien de (1758–1794)

Soma Marik

Maximilien Robespierre was the most important leader of the French Revolution during its most radical phase, and therefore arguably the most important historical figure of the Revolution in its entirety. As the principal organizer of the political party that dominated the Convention and created the Jacobin Republic in 1793–4, his was the guiding hand in the Revolution’s most deeply transformative events. For the most part, however, his historical reputation has not been that of a revered revolutionary hero. The conservative Thermidorians who overthrew him condemned him as a dictatorial tyrant, and successfully transmitted that image of Robespierre to later generations. One positive aspect of his reputation survived, however. Robespierre had been widely known as “the Incorruptible” and even the Thermidorians were unable to refute that characterization.

Robespierre was born on May 6, 1758, in Arras, a town in the province of Artois in northern France. He became a lawyer and a talented writer, and though relatively poor and without an aristocratic patron, he was elected in April 1789 to the Estates General as a representative of the Third Estate from Artois. As a passionate admirer of the Enlightenment philosophe Jean-Jacques Rousseau, Robespierre made democratic principles the cornerstone of his political outlook.

The Revolution rapidly transformed the Third Estate from its originally intended role as a mere advisory body to the monarchy to a center of political power in its own right. Robespierre also became a member of a successor legislative body, the Constituent Assembly, which took up the challenge of drafting a constitution for France. Not all of the Assembly's members wanted a constitution, but those who did formed a political organization called the Society of the Friends of the Constitution, popularly known as the Jacobin Club. Robespierre led a left-wing minority within the Jacobins and appealed to the growing radicalized sector of the Parisian population as a base of support.

During the debates over the constitution Robespierre opposed the provision that would have allowed for a royal veto and criticized the idea of creating a two-tiered definition of citizenship that divided citizens into more-privileged "active" and less-privileged "passive" categories. He opposed decrees restricting the freedom of action of grassroots political societies, supported the abolition of slavery in Saint Domingue, championed the inclusion of full equality of blacks in the Declaration of the Rights of Man and the Citizen, and argued against the death penalty.

In June 1791 the king and his family secretly fled Paris to join an émigré army that aimed at defeating the Revolution and restoring the monarchy to full power. Although the attempt was foiled, it greatly deepened the political divisions in the country. The ensuing departure of moderates from the Jacobin Club strengthened Robespierre's position within it.

As the Constituent Assembly prepared to dissolve and turn the reins of power over to a successor Legislative Assembly, Robespierre supported a "self-denying ordinance" that prohibited members of the Constituent Assembly from sitting in the Legislative Assembly. The measure passed, and although it made Robespierre himself ineligible for election, it meant that the composition of the new legislative body would be less aristocratic and more bourgeois, and therefore more likely to give radical Jacobin proposals a hearing. Robespierre's political energy during this period was devoted to developing the Jacobins' influence within the Legislative Assembly.

The monarchs of Austria and Prussia, worried that the rising tide of democracy might spill over into their domains, were threatening to wage war on France in order to crush the Revolution. Jacques Pierre Brissot, a prominent Jacobin, led a section of the radical bourgeois forces within the Assembly in calling for "revolutionary war," that is, for a preemptive strike against the counter-revolutionary forces. Brissot formulated his call to war in ultraradical terms, as a revolutionary crusade of liberation to overthrow the crowned heads of Europe.

Robespierre was one of two major figures among the revolutionaries who opposed the call to revolutionary war. The other was Jean-Paul Marat, who added his voice to Robespierre's through his influential periodical L'Ami du Peuple. Marat saw the call to war as a trap the counterrevolutionary forces were setting and warned that it would surely end in disaster for the revolutionary armies. Robespierre added that even in the unlikely event that the revolutionary forces were victorious, it would awaken militarism and lead to a dictatorship of the generals. He and Marat both believed that dangerous counterrevolutionaries at home, in their midst, were using the external threat to divert attention from their own nefarious activities.

The call for revolutionary war was extremely popular among the Parisian radicals, however, which meant that Robespierre became increasingly isolated at the Jacobin Club. Revolutionary France did indeed declare war on Austria on April 20. Robespierre resigned the post of public prosecutor at the tribunal of Paris and started a journal, Le Défenseur de la Constitution, to promote his own political positions.

On July 25 Prussia declared war on France and on August 1 news reached Paris that the Duke of Brunswick, commander of the coalition armies arrayed against France, had issued a manifesto explicitly threatening to raze Paris and massacre its inhabitants. In response, the Paris Commune (city government) called the populace to insurrection on August 10. The discredited Legislative Assembly was swept aside and replaced by a more democratically representative body, the National Convention, which when it met a few weeks later immediately abolished the monarchy and proclaimed the first French Republic.

Although Robespierre did not play a major role in the insurrection, the upsurge in radicalization had raised his popularity higher than ever and restored his influence within the Jacobin Club. When he took a seat in the reconstituted Paris Commune, most of its leaders welcomed him as an ally, but he soon found himself locked in political combat with the relatively moderate Girondin faction led by Brissot.

The Convention: Early Battles and the Execution of the King

Robespierre was elected to the National Convention as the first deputy for Paris, and 20 of the 24 Parisian seats were won by Jacobins, including Marat, George Jacques Danton, and Camille Desmoulins. Robespierre and his allies in the Convention occupied the higher tiers of seats at the back of the Convention hall and therefore came to be known as the Montagnards (Men of the Mountain). In a speech on November 5, 1792, Robespierre sharply denounced the Girondins' attempts to promote a "federalism" that would pit more conservative parts of France against revolutionary Paris.

In December 1792 Robespierre called for the execution of the erstwhile king as a traitor, and argued that the Girondin proposal for a referendum on the issue was a ruse to gather sympathy for the ex-monarch. It was the voices of Robespierre, Louis Antoine Saint-Just, and the other Montagnard leaders that swayed the Convention. The Girondins' call for a referendum was defeated by 141 votes and on January 21, 1793, the man formerly known as Louis XVI was guillotined.

The Reign of Terror

Robespierre is often portrayed as the creator of the "Reign of Terror," but a study of the interplay of relations between the Parisian masses and the various state and party institutions reveals a more complex picture, with considerable autonomy and initiative possessed by the sans-culottes, who were not simply creatures of the Jacobins.

After the king's execution, Montagnard influence increased at the expense of the Girondins. The official ministers of state had been rendered less powerful through the creation of two new governmental bodies, the Committee of Public Safety and the Committee of General Security, which were established to defend the Revolution against its powerful internal and external enemies. The struggle within the Convention came to a head when its acting president, a Girondin deputy named Isnard, unwisely threatened Paris with destruction if the Paris Commune made a move against the provincial deputies. That set the stage for another great insurrection in Paris, May 31–June 2, 1793, which resulted in the destruction of the Girondins and the elevation of Robespierre and the Jacobins to full governmental power.

Robespierre wielded his power as a member of the Committee of Public Safety, which he joined in July 1793. The Jacobins' inability, or unwillingness, to meet the most radical sans-culotte demands quickly resulted in protests organized by extreme left wingers who identified themselves as Enragés (Madmen). Appealing to the need for absolute social unity in the face of the wartime emergency, the Jacobins brutally suppressed the Enragés' protests and jailed and executed their leaders. The independent popular societies of the sans-culottes were forcibly disbanded.

By executing the Girondins and the Enragés, the Jacobins eliminated the political rivals who attacked them from both left and right, but then similar struggles erupted within the Jacobin party itself. Robespierre was challenged from the right by a moderate faction led by Danton, and from the left by a radical faction led by Jacques René Hébert. Robespierre allied himself with Danton to defeat the Hébertistes, but after Hébert and his principal followers were guillotined on March 24, 1794, he immediately turned against the Danton faction and defeated it as well. Danton was arrested, tried, and executed less than two weeks later.

From Personal Dictatorship to Decline and Fall

In June the Convention passed the infamous law of Prairial 22, year II (June 10, 1794), which in the name of streamlining revolutionary justice denied accused persons any effective right to legal defense and eliminated all sentences other than acquittal or death. The period of the Great Terror had begun. From then until Robespierre's fall from power, 1,285 victims were guillotined in Paris. Distrusting anyone who opposed him, Robespierre's rule increasingly took on the appearance of a personal dictatorship.

Robespierre's desire for revolutionary change extended well beyond the ordinary sphere of politics. On May 7, 1794, he had the Convention pass a decree institutionalizing a religion of his invention, the Cult of the Supreme Being, which was publicly inaugurated by a massive, state-sponsored celebration on June 8. Robespierre, as president of the Convention, addressed the celebration to explain the theology of the new religion. The Supreme Being, he said, is a radical democrat who did not create kings and priests but who decreed liberty for the people. However well intentioned this effort of Robespierre's may have been, it backfired and mainly created resentment among people who did not want a new creed imposed upon them.

Even at its height, Robespierre's power was far from absolute. It depended on his ability to carry the votes of the Convention majority, which he was able to do only as long as the external military threat remained imminent. The French victory in the Battle of Fleurus, June 26, 1794, ended the threat of Austrian troops on French soil. When the wartime emergency eased, the numerous personal enemies Robespierre's harsh and high-handed methods had earned him succeeded in turning the Convention against him. The bourgeois majority of the Convention's deputies longed above all for a return to peace and normalcy, and they were happy to abandon Robespierre's austere regime at the earliest opportunity.

On July 26 Robespierre took the rostrum to denounce an unnamed group as traitors hatching "a conspiracy against liberty." In the context of the Terror, it is understandable that many of the Convention deputies perceived this as a threat to their own lives. In any event, Robespierre's opponents were able to rally a majority of deputies against him, and the following day – the 9th of Thermidor on the French revolutionary calendar – one after another of the deputies rose to speak against him. Robespierre and his closest allies were arrested and imprisoned. Troops loyal to the Paris Commune rescued them from prison and took them to the Hôtel de Ville (city hall), but the Convention met again and declared him and his defenders to be outlaws. National Guard troops were sent to the Hôtel de Ville to arrest them. In the ensuing mêlée, Robespierre sustained a serious gunshot wound to the jaw. It has generally been believed that this was a botched suicide attempt, but the evidence is inconclusive. In any event, he was retaken into custody and the following day, July 28, 1794, was guillotined without trial on the Place de la Révolution. His supporters attempted to rally the sans-culottes in yet another Parisian insurrection to save his life and restore him to power, but the response was feeble. Ironically, Robespierre's own policies, including the guillotining of the Enragés and the Hébertistes, had demoralized the mass movement that might otherwise have come to his defense.

Robespierre's fall – known as Thermidor after the month in which it occurred – marked a decisive turning point in the history of the Revolution. Because his successors, the Thermidorians, demagogically used ultraradical language to disguise their intentions to reverse the revolutionary process, it was not immediately obvious that the Revolution had ended, but it had. The identification of Robespierre as the most important individual leader of the French Revolution is further strengthened by the fact that the revolutionary tide receded immediately following his fall.

Confirming the familiar dictum that history is written by the victors, the Thermidorians succeeded in turning Robespierre into a villain, and that portrayal has by and large persisted through the centuries. A more judicious evaluation, however, would recognize him as one of humanity's greatest benefactors for his crucial role in the historic transformation of France – and by extension Europe and the world.

SEE ALSO: Brissot, Jacques Pierre (1754–1793); Counterrevolution, France, 1789–1830; Danton, Georges Jacques (1759–1794); Estates General, France; French Revolution, 1789–1794; French Revolution, Historians' Interpretations; French Revolution, Radical Factions and Organizations; Marat, Jean-Paul (1743–1793); Rousseau, Jean-Jacques (1712–1778); Saint-Just, Louis Antoine (1767–1794); Sans-Culottes; Sieyès, Abbé (1748–1836)

References and Suggested Readings

- Hampson, N. (1974) The Life and Opinions of Maximilien Robespierre. Oxford: Blackwell.
- Jordan, D. P. (1989) The Revolutionary Career of Maximilien Robespierre. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Mathiez, A. (1928) The French Revolution. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.
- Mathiez, A. (1931) After Robespierre: The Thermidorian Reaction. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.

- Schama, S. (1989) Citizens: A Chronicle of the French Revolution. New York: Alfred A Knopf.
- Soboul, A. (1964) The Parisian Sans-Culottes and the French Revolution, 1793–94. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Tackett, T. (1996) Becoming a Revolutionary: The Deputies of the French National Assembly and the Emergence of a Revolutionary Culture (1789–1790). Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Rochambeau, Comte de (1725–1807)

Eric Martone

Jean Baptiste Donatien de Vimeur, Comte de Rochambeau, was a French aristocrat, a military leader, and a Marshall of France who participated in the American and French Revolutions. Leading his own French troops in the early 1780s, Rochambeau joined forces with General George Washington in support of American independence. During the French Revolution in the 1790s, however, Rochambeau defended the royal government of King Louis XVI in France.

Rochambeau was born in Vendôme, Loir-et-Cher, on July 1, 1725. Originally destined for a career in the Church, Rochambeau enlisted in a cavalry regiment following the death of his elder brother. He served with distinction in regions throughout Central Europe, including Bavaria and Bohemia, during the War of the Austrian Succession (1740–8).

In 1743 Rochambeau was promoted to captain and moved to court, where his mother became lady-in-waiting to the Duchesse d'Orléans. Rochambeau became the aide of her husband, the Duc d'Orléans, whom he accompanied into battle in Flanders in 1746. He was promoted to colonel in 1747 and participated gallantly in the 1748 siege of Maastricht. In 1749, Rochambeau married Jeanne Thérèse Tellez d'Acosta, daughter of a wealthy merchant, and became governor of Vendôme.

During the Seven Years' War between France and England (1756–63), Rochambeau was promoted to major-general following his performance in the 1756 battle of Minorca. He fought most of the war stationed in Central Europe, where he distinguished himself as a commander and was wounded several times, notably in the 1760 battle of Clostercamp. In 1761, Rochambeau became brigadier-general and inspector of the cavalry, positions that established him as an expert on technical matters of warfare. Following the 1763 peace treaty that ended the Seven Years' War, Rochambeau introduced military reforms to improve the functioning and training of the French army. He did his best to avoid court intrigue and received the Grand Cross of the Order of St. Louis in 1771.

By 1776, Rochambeau had become governor of Villedieu-en-France and collaborated with another general, the Comte de Vaux, to prepare an army for an invasion of England. These plans were cancelled, however, and in 1780 Louis XVI promoted Rochambeau to lieutenant-general and assigned him French troops to assist George Washington in America against the British during the American War of Independence. Rochambeau landed in Newport, Rhode Island, on July 10, 1780, with more than 5,000 men. He refused to abandon the French fleet blockaded by the British in Narragansett Bay and, consequently, was detained in Newport for about a year. Rochambeau and Washington met in a series of conferences at various locations to discuss strategy. In June 1781, Rochambeau and his men embarked on a march through Connecticut to join Washington on the Hudson River. Rochambeau placed himself at Washington's disposal and commanded his French troops as part of the American Continental Army. In September, Washington and Rochambeau met up with the French forces of the Marquis de Lafayette and Admiral de Grasse. These combined Franco-American forces laid siege to Yorktown, eventually forcing the British commander, Cornwallis, to surrender on October 19.

The United States Congress presented Rochambeau and his men with two cannons seized from the British. The cannons were brought to Vendôme, where they were requisitioned in 1792 during the French Revolution. On Rochambeau's return to France in 1783, Louis XVI awarded him the Cordon Bleu of the Order of the Saint Esprit and appointed him commander of the Northern District.

Rochambeau was stationed in Alsace in northeastern France, where he witnessed mass rioting following news of the July 1789 storming of the Bastille in Paris. During the early days of the French Revolution, he commanded the Northern Army in defense of the royal government, and in 1791 was appointed Marshal of France, the last person to receive that high honor under the ancien régime. He resigned the post in 1792 when such honorifics were under sharp attack.

Rochambeau returned to Vendôme where he found his property ravaged and many of his friends killed. In 1794 he was arrested during the Reign of Terror and was scheduled to be guillotined, but was granted a stay of execution due to poor health. The overthrow of the Terror's architect, Robespierre, just days before Rochambeau's rescheduled execution date, saved his life. In 1801, Rochambeau met Napoleon Bonaparte, who granted him the Legion of Honor in 1804.

Rochambeau died in Thoré-la-Rochette in 1807. His memoirs were published posthumously in 1809. In 1902, France presented the United States with a statue of Rochambeau, which was unveiled in Lafayette Square in Washington, DC.

SEE ALSO: American Revolution of 1776; Bonaparte, Napoleon (1769–1821); French Revolution, 1789–1794; Lafayette, Marquis de (1757–1834); Robespierre, Maximilien de (1758–1794); Washington, George (1732–1799)

References and Suggested Readings

- Davidson, M. (1984) The Landing of Rochambeau. Providence: Burning Deck.
- Lomask, M. (1965) Rochambeau and Our French Allies. New York: P. J. Kenedy.
- Rice, H. C. & Brown, A. S. K. (Eds.) (1972) The American Campaigns of Rochambeau's Army. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Selig, R. A. & Donahoe, M. M. (2004) En Avant with our French Allies: Connecticut Sites, Markers, and Monuments Honoring Comte de Rochambeau's French Troops for Contributions to American Independence, 1780–1782. Hartford: Connecticut Commission on Culture and Tourism.
- Weelen, J. E. (1936) Rochambeau, Father and Son. New York: Henry Holt.
- Whitridge, A. (1965) Rochambeau: America's Neglected Founding Father. New York: Macmillan.

Rodney, Walter (1942–1980)

Roderick Bush

Walter Rodney grew up in Guyana in the wake of the labor uprisings of the late 1930s when national independence via constitutional decolonization was on the agenda and political parties and trade unions were organizing the Indo-Caribbean and Afro-Caribbean masses. As a child of working-class activists in the leftist People's Progressive Party in Guyana, the young Rodney's involvement in distributing party literature gave him a sense of the dawn of a new historical force. Rodney then was part of a new generation which, by the 1960s, would come to question the attitudes of the post-independence governments toward the plight of the Afro-Caribbean and Indo-Caribbean working classes. Caribbean political novelist George Lamming lamented the manner in which the world division of labor, complicated by colonialism, has created an educated group that is contemptuous of the ordinary people of the Caribbean's adherence to non-western cultural forms, despite their otherwise anti-colonial stance (Bogues 2003: 127–8). While studying at the University of London, Rodney had been a member of a Marxist study group led by C. L. R. and Selma James. From the Jameses, Rodney took the urgent necessity to pay attention to the concrete historical context and its nuances, and the need to grapple with human creativity in the political domain (Bogues 2003: 129).

After graduating from the University of the West Indies (UWI) in 1963, Rodney entered the School of Oriental and African Studies at the University of London to study for his PhD, which he obtained in 1966. After a year teaching in Tanzania, Rodney returned to take a faculty position at UWI. Viewing the Rastafari as the leading expression of black consciousness in the Caribbean, Rodney thought it imperative to attach his own intellectual and political work to this force. He identified himself with them as a man of the working class who was using the education that he had obtained from "Babylon" for the good of the ordinary man, who should know about Mother Africa and who should reject the cultural imperialism of the white world. "Bro Wally," as he was known among the Rastafari during the 1960s, engaged in a process of "grounding" with the working class and underprivileged in Jamaica, and was banned by the governing Jamaican Labor Party in 1968, who viewed this activity as a threat. This set off what have come to be called the Black Power Riots in Jamaica in October 1968 (Bogues 2003: 130).

Rodney returned to Tanzania where he remained from 1968 to 1974. One year after his banishment from Jamaica, Rodney published The Grounding with My Brothers in which he assails the black elite in Jamaica as agents of neocolonial control and criticizes the patronizing attitudes of the black middle class toward the lower strata of Jamaican society, while hailing the role of these lower strata in the production of knowledge and culture. For Rodney, the masses did not need a political party of radical intellectuals to assist them, as in the Gramscian conception; rather, the radical intellectuals needed to attach themselves to the masses in motion. While in Tanzania, Rodney published A History of the Upper Guinea Coast (1970) and How Europe Underdeveloped Africa (1972).

Rodney ultimately was called upon to return to Guyana in 1974, where he wrote The History of the Guyanese Working People, 1881–1905 (1981). In this work, Rodney points out how capitalists sought to use African and Indian workers against one another. As a member of the newly formed Working People's Alliance, he sought to oppose this strategy. It was for his activism within this organization that the government rescinded his faculty appointment at the University of Guyana, and that Rodney was assassinated in Georgetown on June 13, 1980.

SEE ALSO: Black Nationalism, 19th and 20th Centuries; Class Identity and Protest; Class, Poverty, and Revolution; Class Struggle; Guyana, Protests and Revolts; Imperialism and Capitalist Development; James, C. L. R. (1901–1989)

References and Suggested Readings

- Bogues, A. (2003) Black Heretics, Black Prophets: Radical Political Intellectuals. New York: Routledge.
- Campbell, H. (1987) Rasta and Resistance: From Marcus Garvey to Walter Rodney. Trenton: Africa World Press.
- Rodney, W. (1975) The Grounding with My Brothers. London: Bogle-L'Ouverture Publications.
- Rodney, W. (1980) A History of the Upper Guinea Coast, 1545 to 1800. New York: Monthly Review Press.
- Rodney, W. (1982) How Europe Underdeveloped Africa. Washington, DC: Howard University Press.
- Rodney, W. (1990) Walter Rodney Speaks: The Making of an African Intellectual. Trenton: Africa World Press.
- Wallerstein, I. (1986) Walter Rodney: The Historian as Spokesman for Historical Forces. American Ethnologist 13, 2 (May): 330–7.

Rodríguez, Silvio (b. 1946)

Benjamín Anaya González

The most influential songwriter of the Nueva Trova Cubana (Cuban New Song), Silvio Rodríguez Domínguez was born November 26, 1946 in San Antonio de Los Baños, Cuba. The triumph of the Cuban Revolution (1959) led to improvements in arts and education, and Rodríguez, who had served in the military from 1964 to 1967, played an important role after being invited by Mario Romeu, former director of the Cuban Institute of Broadcasting, to appear in the popular TV program Música y Estrellas (Music and Stars). As he sailed around the Atlantic and Africa in 1969, he composed 62 songs, among them “Playa Girón” and “Ojalá.”

When he returned to Cuba, he became a member of the Group of Sound Experimentation (GESI) at the Institute of Cuban Cinema, where he contacted composers such as Leo Brouwer and guest lecturers such as Fred Smith. The GESI brought him into contact with other composers and songwriters and allowed him to experiment further in his music. His friendship with Vicente Feliú, Noel Nicola, and especially Pablo Milanés exposed him to new ideas about Cuban music, the role of the composer in society, the future of popular music, and social change. This prompted the group to start the Nueva Trova Cubana movement, which combined social concerns with the use of romantic verses about love. Rodríguez has since then traveled around the world, playing to crowded stadiums and in public plazas. His success, however, has more to do with the development of social struggles in Latin America and Europe than with broadcasting companies' promotional activities. Despite considering himself as a critical voice within the Revolution, his support for the Cuban Communist Party (PCC) has been remarkable. He has made over 80 recordings.

SEE ALSO: Music and Protest, Latin America

References and Suggested Readings

- Casaus, V. & Noguerras, L. R. (1993) Silvio: Que levante la mano la guitarra. Havana: Letras Cubanas.

Rodríguez, Simón (1769–1854)

Karolin Weinzierl

Simón Rodríguez was a philosopher and pedagogue who advocated progressive education. He is perhaps best known as the mentor of Simón Bolívar and author of a revolutionary concept of education for postcolonial Latin America.

Rodríguez grew up as a founding in the family of a priest named Simón Carreño Rodríguez. In 1791 he became a teacher in a primary school in Caracas, where Bolívar was one of his students. Impressed by Jean-Jacques Rousseau's ideas, he developed a thesis that education forms one of the few central elements of political emancipation. This led him to demand the opening of schools for all boys, not just white boys. As a teacher, his goal was to educate, not to instruct. Thus he used not only books but also less traditional methodology such as play and experimentation. In 1797 he was suspected of participating in the insurrection of Gual y España and was forced to leave Venezuela, never to return.

While in exile, first in Jamaica and then in the US and France, he changed his name to Samuel Robinson and met up with Bolívar again in 1804. He spent time with his former student, who credited him with forming his appreciation for justice and liberty, as they traveled through France and Italy, attending the coronation of Napoléon Bonaparte as king of Italy. In Rome on the Monte Sacro, Bolívar swore to Rodríguez that he would dedicate his life to the liberation of Latin America. Rodríguez continued his pilgrimage alone in Prussia, Polonia, and Russia, spending a total of more than 20 years in Europe.

Returning to Latin America he founded the first school-workshop in 1824 and, called upon by Bolívar, became the director of public education. In 1826 in Chuquisaca he founded the second school-workshop, which closed soon after due to political pressure.

Rodríguez died in 1853 while on a journey with his son. After years of being portrayed as nearly crazy, 100 years after his death his remains were transferred to the pantheon of his native city. Though he was once reduced to his role as an important teacher of Bolívar, he came to be seen as an important figure in Latin American education of liberation of the 1980s. Under Chávez he became one of the most important national heroes, besides Bolívar and Ezequiel Zamora.

SEE ALSO: Bolívar, Simón (1783–1830); Bolivarianism, Venezuela; Chávez, Hugo and the Bolivarian Revolution, 1998–Present; Freire, Paulo (1921–1997); Rousseau, Jean-Jacques (1712–1778); Saint-Simon, Comte de (1760–1825); Venezuelan War of Independence; Zamora, Ezequiel (1817–1860)

References and Suggested Readings

- Rodríguez, S. (1840) Sociedades americanas en 1828: Primera parte: Luces y virtudes sociales. Valparaiso: Imprenta del Mercurio. Facsimile in HTML available at www.mipagina.cantv.net/t6435bm/SA_Valp/index.html. Accessed May 30, 2008.
- Rodríguez, S. (1842) Sociedades americanas. Lima: Imprenta del Comercio. Facsimile in HTML available at www.mipagina.cantv.net/t6435bm/SA_Valp/index.html. Accessed May 30, 2008.
- Rodríguez, S. (1975) Obras completas. Caracas: Universidad Simón Rodríguez.
- Rodríguez Rojas, P. (n.d.) Simón Rodríguez y la educación: Enlas (sic) nuevas repúblicas americanas. Available at www.monografias.com/trabajos40/bolivar-y-rodriguez/bolivar-y-rodriguez2.shtml. Accessed May 30, 2008.
- Rumazo González, A. (1976) Simón Rodríguez, maestro de América. Caracas: Universidad Simón Rodríguez.
- Twickel, C. (2006) Hugo Chávez: Eine Biografie. Hamburg: Nautilus.

Romania, mineworker protests, 20th century

Ion Bogdan Vasi

Jiu Valley miners of Romania have participated in among Eastern Europe's most powerful labor strikes throughout the twentieth century. Labor strife has appeared under both private ownership and state control. The first major conflict began when the mines were under private control in the summer of 1929, when workers from Lupeni went on strike demanding shorter workdays and higher salaries. A radical group of miners occupied the power station controlling the mines' pumping machinery, threatening to flood the mines. The authorities sent in troops to restart the power station and break the strike; in the ensuing confrontation between the soldiers and the miners, approximately 22 miners were killed and 58 wounded by government forces.

After World War II, when the Communist Party took political power over Romania, the mines were nationalized and transformed into joint Soviet–Romanian companies (Sovroms). After 1965, the mines were intensively exploited as a means of paying off the country's foreign debt. Under the rule of Nicolae Ceaușescu, while the Jiu Valley region underwent dramatic industrialization and development, miners' working conditions remained harsh and strenuous. Protesting conditions and eroding wages, in August 1977 miners in the Jiu Valley staged a major strike. More than 30,000 miners gathered in the main yard of the Lupeni mine protesting a state decree raising the retirement age and reducing miner pensions. After miners had taken the prime minister hostage, President Ceaușescu reluctantly acquiesced to their demand that he visit the mines in the Jiu Valley and inspect the working and living conditions. Upon concluding the visit, Ceaușescu agreed to the workers' demands.

After the 1977 strike, fearing Jiu Valley miner militancy, the Communist Party relocated about 4,000 workers out of the region while transferring large numbers of workers into the region. Most of the strike leaders were imprisoned or disappeared, while large numbers of plainclothes security police were hired as workers in the mines as a means to contain and limit mineworker organizing. The Romanian government sought to suppress information of the miners' strike and it was largely unknown beyond the Jiu Valley.

In December 1989, after the fall of the Ceaușescu regime, approximately 200,000 people lived in the Jiu Valley and nearly 80 percent of all workers were employed by the mining industry. In the first decade after the collapse of Ceaușescu's eccentric leadership, miners mobilized six major protests, known in Romania as mineriade, or the miners' epopeia.

The first three miners' protests occurred in 1990. In January 1990, more than 5,000 miners came for the first time to Romania's capital, Bucharest, following televised communiqués from Ion Iliescu, the new leader of the first post-socialist governing party called the National Salvation Front (FSN). Their declared mission was to "protect the fragile newborn Romanian democracy" and end the conflict between the FSN and the political opposition, which organized protests against the greater democracy and free-market economic policies favorable to the West. The miners returned a month later to "rescue" the government from anti-communist demonstrators. Though the police had already dispersed the street demonstrators, approximately 4,000 miners expressed support for the new government. On June 13, a few thousand miners from the Jiu Valley returned again to help the police "clean up" the University Square, occupied by students and anti-communist demonstrators. As a result of their violent actions, 560 people were hospitalized, six died, and more than 1,000 anti-communist demonstrators were arrested.

In 1991, the miners returned again to the capital to protest their wages and working conditions. In September 1991, Miron Cozma, head of the mineworker union, led thousands of miners from the Jiu Valley to the capital to overthrow the government that refused to meet their demands to increase wages. After two days of street fights in Bucharest resulting in hundreds of injured and three deaths, the miners occupied the national deputies' meeting room and successfully demanded the resignation of the prime minister.

In 1997 and 1999, the miners engaged in two final strikes, or mineriade, before the end of the twentieth century. In 1997, more than 10,000 miners from Jiu Valley staged a peaceful strike. In January 1999 Jiu Valley miners went on strike again, traveling to Bucharest on buses owned by the miners' union or on foot. After clashes with the police, more than 15,000 miners, supported by hundreds of local citizens, took nearly 2,000 police hostage to restrain further government armed action. The government conceded to negotiate with the miners, who reached agreement with Radu Vasile, Romania's prime minister.

The government has sought to restrict the power of mineworkers through the legal system. In February 1999, the government sentenced mineworker leader Cozma to 18 years in prison for leading subversive anti-state demonstrations in 1991. Cozma, supported by the leaders of the Jiu Valley miners' union, condemned the verdict as politically motivated and started new protests. While more than 4,000 miners sought to reach Bucharest by bus, they were stopped by special police forces. During these violent clashes, more than 100 people were injured and one miner was killed, while many workers were arrested. Cozma remained incarcerated from 1999 to December 2007.

A number of factors have contributed to the potent force of Jiu Valley miners' protests in the post-socialist period. In the Jiu Valley, worker organizing benefits from the dense social networks that unify mines and neighborhoods and accentuates workplace and community activism. Miner leaders are also experienced organizers with significant resources to mobilize a few hundred dedicated followers to act as a “praetorian guard” to prevent government infiltration. Under the Ceaușescu regime, the Romanian Communist Party created a network of informants and collaborators in an effort to control the miners. However, miners sought to oppose this through forming bonds of solidarity to counteract government efforts to spy on the workers. Finally, the miners strongly believed that their actions were legitimized because they were fighting against opponents labeled by their leaders and political allies as “corrupted officials” or “traditional class enemies,” and they shared the participant identity of “the fist of the working class.”

SEE ALSO: Romania, Protest and Revolution, 20th Century

References and Suggested Readings

- City of Lupeni website, www.jiuvalley.com/eng/cities/lupeni/subcat.asp?categ=27&subcateg=46 (accessed December 2007).
- Crowley, S. & Ost, D. (2001) Workers after Workers' States: Labor and Politics in Postcommunist Eastern Europe. Lanham: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Vasi, I. B. (2004) The Fist of the Working Class: The Social Movements of Jiu Valley Miners in Post-Socialist Romania. East European Politics and Societies 18 (1): 132–57.

Romania, protest and revolution, 20th century

Jolan Bogdan

Modern-day Romania was established in 1858 by the joining of Moldavia and Wallachia and recognized as an independent state in 1878 by the Treaty of Berlin. Romania began as a monarchy, under the reign of German Prince Carol of Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen, who became King Carol I in 1881 following the short reign of Alexandru Cusa, a reformist who quickly lost support among the wealthy after introducing land reform.

During World War I, Romania fought on the side of the Entente and the US, receiving a sizable reward after the war in the form of substantial territories with Romanian populations, namely Transylvania, Bessarabia, and Bukovina. Romanians in those regions, already engaged in the struggle for independence from their respective rulers, finally achieved unity with the newly formed Romanian nation. However, Bessarabia and Bukovina would eventually be returned. Transylvania, the largest of the three, was alone in remaining a Romanian territory, signaling an end to centuries of struggle. The Romanian national holiday, Unification Day, marked the date of December 1, 1918, celebrating Transylvania's unification with Romania.

Peasant Uprising of 1907

A large peasant revolt swept through Moldavia and Wallachia in 1907, protesting unfair land ownership and distribution. While peasants comprised over 80 percent of the population, more than half owned no land. Wealthy landowners, living in towns rather than villages, left managers called arendasi to supervise the peasantry. The conflict began when Mochi Fisher, from an Austrian Jewish family who managed a substantial part of Moldavian land, refused to enter into an agreement with the local peasants in the village of Flamanzi. The people panicked, fearing they would remain without resources to support their families if Fisher did not provide them with work. In turn, they attacked Fisher, who managed to escape to a neighboring village. The peasants, still without work, revolted and discontent quickly spread throughout the region, leading to the killing of many local arendasi. The mostly Romanian peasantry clashed with the predominantly Jewish arendasi, resulting in suspicions of ethnically motivated violence. The government soon declared a state of emergency, and mobilized well over 100,000 men to suppress the uprising by opening fire on the peasants. King Carol I, of Germanic origin, ordered evidence of the number of casualties. While the precise number of deaths remains unknown, the figure of 11,000 is most often cited.

Iron Guard, Antonescu, and World War II

The Iron Guard, an anti-Semitic and ultranationalist group active in Romania between the late 1920s and early 1940s, is also sometimes known as the Legion of the Archangel Michael, and occasionally as the Greenshirts. Founded by Corneliu Zelea Codreanu, the group differed from other fascists due to its strong religious leanings and popularity among peasants and students. The legacy of the Romanian propaganda machine may have its roots in the Iron Guard, who were adept at organizing nationalistic campaigns, demonstrations, and gatherings. In response to consistent aggression, Prime Minister Ion Dunca banned the anti-liberal group in 1933, a move that he paid for with his life shortly thereafter. King Carol II assumed the role of royal dictator in February 1938, arrested Codreanu the following April, and ordered his execution in November. A new government formed in early 1939, but the Iron Guard assassinated the newly appointed prime minister in September.

At the onset of World War II, King Carol II attempted to remain neutral, but Romania's neighbors forced a lean toward the Axis alliance. France and Britain, too weak and far away, could not offer substantial support to Romania, while Soviet territorial interests made them a dubious ally. Hoira Sima, the new leader of the Iron Guard, formed an alliance with the military figure Ion Antonescu, establishing a joint government that forced the abdication of King Carol II in 1940. The king's son Mihai replaced him, but Antonescu wielded all the power effectively as dictator. Under Antonescu's authority, the Iron Guard launched a series of pogroms and executions, rivaling the atrocities committed by the Nazis in Germany. However, Antonescu repeatedly refused to grant the Iron Guard any real political power, and instead continued to use the organization as eager anti-Semitic pawns in his military campaign.

Antonescu served as prime minister and Conducător of Romania from 1940 to 1944, forming an official alliance with Nazi Germany in 1941. Through this connection, the dictator hoped to regain Northern Transylvania, Bessarabia, and Bukovina. According to the 2004 special investigative commission led by Elie Wiesel, Holocaust survivor and Nobel laureate, Antonescu bore direct responsibility for the deaths of between 280,000 and 380,000 Jews and 25,000 Roma. In 1944, recognizing a possible Russian victory, King Mihai ordered Antonescu arrested after the general refused to surrender. In 1946, as communist power in Romania emerged dominant, Antonescu was sentenced and executed and King Mihai was forced to abdicate in 1947, being replaced with a new communist dictatorship.

Communism and Resistance

In 1947, in response to the collectivization of land, small pockets of resistance emerged from landowners and as many as 80,000 were jailed for refusing to sign over their land. A few small groups armed themselves and fled to the mountains. With their land collectivized and their status as anti-patriotic fugitives, the army, police, and Securitate (the communist government's secret police) pursued and captured most rebel landholders. News of the last survivor's arrest surfaced in the late 1970s.

Poorly armed and few in number, the resistance posed little threat to the communist government, although authorities viewed opponents of collectivization as damaging to the unity and popular support they were attempting to construct. Since the 1989 revolution, the government has focused more attention on rebels, in part to revise the perception of limited resistance to the communist regime. In contrast to other eastern bloc countries, for example Poland and Hungary, Romanian resistance is viewed as fairly limited, perhaps due to the larger police state apparatus.

The Protests of 1956

The 1956 uprising in Hungary again ignited the spirit of protest in Romania, not least among the Hungarian minority in Transylvania. More research is emerging concerning the impact of the 1956 revolution and its effect on Romania, though a lack of clear synthesis between the two ethnic groups remains, pointing to persistent tensions in the region. Research sponsored by ethnic Hungarians or Romanians neglects the involvement of the other, but when compared side by side, an image emerges that both were actively engaged in opposition to the Gheorghiu-Dej and Ceaușescu government.

One Hungarian historian indicates that in the 1970s the Romanian government was prosecuting former university students in Timișoara and Cluj who were involved in the 1956 uprising. The events in Cluj are becoming known, partially due to the involvement of the students of Babes-Bolyai University, the only Hungarian University in Romania, subsequently closed by the communist government during the 1970s. According to historian Sandor Pal Antal, in the Tirgu Mures region, which has a large ethnic Hungarian population, over 11,000 were arrested between 1956 and 1965, and over 800 of the detainees were sentenced to prison. In predominantly Romanian regions, 1956 student and worker demonstrations in Cluj, Timișoara, Iași, and Bucharest opposed compulsory teaching of Russian in schools and universities, while both workers and students demanded better food supplies and a higher standard of living. The revolutionary anti-Russian events in Hungary that year undoubtedly stirred protests among Romania's population, and the government dealt with the protesters swiftly and brutally, as it had done with the anti-collectivization movement a decade earlier.

Ceaușescu during the 1960s

The 1960s saw the death of the first communist dictator Gheorghe Gheorghiu-Dej and the rise of Nicolae Ceaușescu, who strategically cast himself as a pro-western and anti-Soviet benevolent communist dictator. Western powers, eager to form alliances with a rogue eastern bloc state, provided Ceaușescu with international credibility and some respect and admiration among Romanians. Perhaps this brief period of optimism heralding the beginning of Ceaușescu's regime explains the lack of protests during that decade. However, Ceaușescu's questionable economic decision-making lowered the country's economic production, while increasing foreign debt. The dictator gradually began to implement increasingly drastic consumption restrictions on food, heating, and use of electricity in the home. By the late 1970s, the dire conditions contributed to worker mobilizations in mining and other sectors.

Miners of the Jiu Valley

The most significant threat to the communist regime came from groups of organized miners, whose long history of popular protest had consistently challenged the powers of the ruling class since the 1920s, distinguishing them from other special interest groups and securing their place in the Romanian history of protest. Jiu Valley's mines opened in the 1840s, under private ownership, and have undergone a myriad of economic and political transformations over the past 150 years. Following the communist takeover of 1947, the state-appropriated mines and their resources were shared with Russia in an attempt to make retribution for the World War II German alliance. After Ceaușescu took power, Soviet–Romanian economic partnerships ceased, and for a brief period the miners felt the economic benefits of their labor.

Proletarian unrest in the region began as early as the 1890s, with the first violent clash occurring during the Lupeni strike in August of 1929, following severe pay cuts and joblessness in the region. The police responded to the strikes with violence and opened fire on the crowd of demonstrators, killing over 30. This unprecedented hostility against the miners would carry over into future regimes, as would the workers' commitment to defending their labor rights. It is a little known fact that Ceaușescu spent time in the mines of the Jiu Valley, and even attempted to instigate a strike in 1941. The story of his subsequent arrest at the hands of the (actual) fascist police would later serve him well in establishing the myth of his status as oppressed proletariat hero extraordinaire.

No documented popular protests occurred under communist rule after the 1956 uprising until the miners' strike of 1977, in the southwestern region of the Jiu Valley, which was the first major public demonstration to take place during Ceaușescu's career. The miners protested ever-declining working conditions and benefits, and demanded a meeting with Ceaușescu, perhaps feeling justified in this request due to the leader's personal connection to the region. Ceaușescu attempted to assuage the workers, but showed a reluctance to make a personal appearance. Only after the miners brutalized his representatives did the dictator himself emerge on the scene.

His defensiveness further agitated the miners, who teetered on the edge of a full-scale riot. But Ceaușescu's advisor managed to calm both parties, and the dictator finally agreed to meet some of the workers' demands, which included the retirement age to remain at 50, better pay and working conditions, shorter workdays and workweeks, a trained medical professional on site, and more opportunities for miners' wives and daughters who, not working in the mines, had few employment prospects in the region. However, after Ceaușescu returned to Bucharest, he immediately withdrew all his offers and instead dispatched the Securitate to flush out and deal with the organizers of the strike. Within a few days, following interrogations and intimidation of the miners, the Securitate identified key activists and relocated them to distant parts of the country. Of the 35,000 miners present at the protest, 4,000 were transferred. Informants, some of whom went on to assume roles of leadership within the mining community, replaced a number of these displaced miners.

Following this incident, miners have gone on to compose an enigmatic part of Romania's political landscape. Various other strikes occurred through the 1980s, including miners in the Maramures region in Transylvania in 1983, factory workers in Braşov in 1987, and substantial miners' strikes even as recently as 1999. Workers in heavy industry have repeatedly served as serious threats to the government. However, in the 1990s they took on a particularly intriguing role, acting alternately in defense of and in opposition to the new government. Amidst the heavy anti-communist protests of 1990 against the new post-Ceauşescu (but not necessarily post-communist) government, President Ion Iliescu appealed to miners to go to Bucharest and defend the capital against the so-called fascist invasion. Iliescu used the miners as a policing body to carry out the will of the state in matters where official involvement would appear unacceptable in a democratic nation, such as the suppression of a popular protest. Yet, despite their illicit involvement in questionable government operations, the miners' uprisings constituted a real, consistent, and organized threat to the government over the past 170 years. Their current position, with a strike in 1999 boasting the involvement of 15,000 miners, is further complicated by the modernization and transformation of the industry itself, which is becoming increasingly superfluous to the Romanian economy, and even an economic burden.

Romanian Revolution, December 1989

The western city of Timişoara, near the Hungarian and Yugoslav borders is recognized as a diverse and ethnically peaceful city, with a long history as a center of tolerance and progressive politics. Germans, Serbians, Croats, Hungarians, and Romanians have lived peacefully side by side in Timişoara for centuries, unlike other ethnically diverse regions of Transylvania. Due to their geographic distance from Bucharest, Ceauşescu's political oppression did not shape the lives of residents as elsewhere in the country. With greater access to foreign media, western influences infiltrated the closed Romanian system and provided crucial information during the late 1980s as Eastern European communist regimes were collapsing.

Press coverage during December of 1989 would prove crucial after the fall of the Berlin Wall in November, as all over the region countries were undergoing non-violent revolutions and overthrowing their previous communist regimes. Despite drastic transformations in the region, Ceauşescu continued to cling to power.

Laszlo Toekes, a priest of the Timişoara Reformed Church since 1986, openly criticized Ceauşescu and the communist regime during the 1980s. Unlike the bishops of the Reformed Church, boasting over 700,000 parishioners (all of them Hungarian), Toekes openly criticized the government in his sermons. On May 1, 1989, Toekes received notice of his transfer from Timişoara to a small village in a non-Hungarian region. The date of his eviction, set for December 15, prompted congregants to rally around his residence supporting his refusal to relocate.

The first clash between police and protesters occurred on the eve of December 15, when police attempted to arrest one demonstrator. More than 1,000 people participated in the protest as the other residents of the city gradually outnumbered the original congregation members. The following day, the mayor, trying to disperse the crowd, persuaded only a few to leave, assuring that Toekes would be permitted to stay. By then, the gathering had grown beyond the scope of its original intent.

On Saturday December 16, large numbers of students from the local universities joined in, and many marched toward the city center in opposition to the communist government. To quell the uprising, government reinforcements arrived with fire trucks to spray demonstrators with water and prevent the march on the town center. However, the forces could not stop approximately 5,000 protesters from reaching the downtown area and vandalizing the Communist Party headquarters. The protesters attempted to pursue non-violence in opposition to the army, and no firearms were used nor deaths reported while the demonstration grew in number.

The next day, Toekes was beaten by the Securitate at his home and arrested. Despite the imposing military presence, protesters continued gathering in large numbers, requesting a meeting with authorities. The army again sprayed them with water as they headed back to the Communist Party building, but protesters managed to take over several of the army's vehicles, and many troops fled. The crowd continued to advance, occupied the building, and displayed the now-famous flag without the communist coat of arms. A demonstrator waved the flag from the balcony to the delight of the crowd gathered below. Soon groups of armed soldiers arrived with rifles and bayonets and attacked the crowd indiscriminately, killing some women and children.

In Bucharest, the government called a meeting to address the situation. Ceaușescu, furious that the army had not taken greater action against the demonstrators, was convinced of foreign involvement, repeatedly citing the West's desire to overthrow Romania and other socialist nations. In a rage, Ceaușescu threatened to resign, but concluded the meeting with the order for the army and the police to kill protesters without hesitation.

In Timișoara the army opened fire on unarmed demonstrators, killing and wounding protesters and dispersing the crowd. Many troops shot into the air or at the ground, presenting a reluctance to follow orders. Moreover, despite the shooting, the crowds refused to disperse permanently, regrouping and calling for non-violence. The army continued to open fire on the unarmed groups. On December 18, the government disabled civilian communication and assembled a greater number of police. Many protesters were detained and tortured, and dead bodies were even stolen by the Securitate in an attempt to conceal the death count, which varied in its estimates in the months following the protests. Ceaușescu, reluctant to cancel previous plans for a state visit to Iran, went ahead with his schedule and flew to Teheran on December 18. By the time he returned, the army had joined the people of Timișoara and the demonstrations had spread throughout Romania.

Bucharest

Ceaușescu returned from Iran on December 20 and addressed the nation via the country's sole national television station, condemning the actions of the "hooligans" in Timișoara while implicating Hungary, and asking Romanians to defend the territorial sovereignty of the nation. He also called for a rally in Bucharest, which would become the final catalyst in the revolution. On the afternoon of December 21, the people of Bucharest gathered in Palace Square, below the balcony of the Central Committee building, as they had so many times before, to hear Ceaușescu address the nation. However, on this occasion, the streets contained a heavier than usual police presence, with residents of Bucharest well aware of the protests throughout the nation. When Ceaușescu addressed the crowd, loud shouts and commotion interrupted the usual cheers, and some even yelled out the name "Timișoara," indicating solidarity with the residents of that city. The dictator and his wife Elena, looking visibly disturbed, eventually left the balcony, events that were broadcast live throughout the country.

As people began to leave the square, some of the crowd regrouped a few blocks away, then vandalized government propaganda on the streets and chanted anti-communist slogans. The military quickly intervened to intimidate the protesters. While the army gathered reinforcements and strategically positioned itself, the popular assembly formed an even larger non-violent demonstration. By nightfall, the army began pressuring demonstrators through intimidation tactics, assaults, arrests, and occasional shots into the air. Fire trucks again sprayed water on demonstrators, seeking to subdue them. Nevertheless, the crowds remained, and the people responded by building a barricade to protect themselves against the army. Tanks entered the city after midnight, summoned to break through the barricade, and opened fire on the people; some demonstrators were killed and many more arrested, causing the crowd to eventually disband.

On the morning of December 22, the residents of Bucharest awoke to a state of emergency and the announcement that Minister of Defense Vasile Milea had committed suicide. The previous day Milea had disobeyed orders, refusing to instruct his troops to fire into the crowd. Consequently, some viewed the circumstances of Milea's death with skepticism and once again regrouped in large numbers to demand Ceaușescu's resignation. When the dictator appeared on the balcony again to address the people, they chanted anti-government slogans and began to infiltrate the Central Committee building. At that point, the Ceaușescus headed for the roof, where a military helicopter awaited them. The crowd below watched as the helicopter took flight, signaling the end of the regime.

To the Television Studios

After Ceaușescu fled the city, political chaos ensued in the capital, with hoards of individuals and special interest groups vying for power. Speaker after speaker addressed the crowd below the Central Committee building, seeking to fill the power vacuum left behind by the former leader. The television channel, renamed Free Romanian Television, broadcast many of these events live to the nation.

Among the speakers on the newly liberated media was popular dissident poet Mircea Dinescu, an open critic of Ceaușescu's regime who was trusted by many Romanians. Appearing before the cameras with a group of activists occupying the television station, Dinescu declared victory for the Romanian nation. This broadcast marked the beginning of several consecutive days of continuous coverage that many, both inside and outside Romania, would call the first truly televised revolution. Of course, the coverage began after much of the violence had ended, both in Timișoara and in Bucharest, and after Ceaușescu had fled. Nevertheless, the Bucharest television studio became the political focal point where the powers-to-be converged and decided the fate of the nation. Demonstrators occupying the station asked Ion Iliescu, who would become president the following year, to make his way to the television station. When he arrived, the others present spoke to him with a great amount of deference. Though few members of the television audience knew him, Iliescu was viewed as a popular figure on live television during the broadcasts in the final days of the revolution.

The political maneuvers inside the television station, while maintaining the rhetoric of the revolution, lost the clarity of the initial goals. The decisions and motives of those occupying the building became anything but transparent. Gradually, nationalist rhetoric replaced the revolutionary impetus of the original demonstrations.

One particularly murky development involved the continued fighting with supposed terrorists. After the army joined the people, a new and mysterious enemy emerged, whose identity remains in question. Nor have any of the governments that came to power following Ceaușescu attempted to investigate the matter. All reports state merely that for several days following Ceaușescu's departure, an invisible enemy attacked the nation, destroying buildings and killing hundreds of people. Speculation as to the identity of these attackers varies from any number of foreign nationals, from Russian to Iranian to Hungarian, to members of the Securitate itself, or perhaps another elite security force under Ceaușescu's command. No Romanian government has thus far conducted an investigation to determine the nature of those responsible for the attacks.

Aftermath

Given the brutal political climate in Romania prior to the revolution of 1989, it is perhaps understandable that political officials would have inevitably been connected to Ceaușescu and the Romanian Communist Party. Iliescu, in particular, was not just a member of the party, but a leading activist. The new government contained many such figures. That politicians could not distance themselves from Ceaușescu is understandable. But were communists reelected because they too remained steadfast believers in the system, or because no viable non-communist candidates were available? The answer is not clear. Iliescu was elected by an overwhelming majority, but then fiercely opposed as a communist. His liberal successor, Emil Constantinescu, was vehemently opposed for his rapid market-driven agenda of reform, and proved that a non-traditional approach was equally problematic. At the close of the twentieth century, the tension between traditionalist and reformist governance stood at an impasse.

SEE ALSO: Hungary, Revolution of 1956; Romania, Mineworker Protests, 20th Century; Romania, Protests and Revolts, 18th and 19th Centuries; Romania, Student and Worker Protests, 1956

References and Suggested Readings

- Deletant, D. (1995) Ceaușescu and the Securitate: Coercion and Dissent in Romania, 1965–1989. Armonk: M. E. Sharpe.
- Friedman, J. R. (2005) Furtive Selves: Proletarian Contradictions, Self-Presentation, and the Party in 1950s Romania. Available at www.journals.cambridge.org/production/action/cjoGetFulltext?fulltextid=360120.
- Gallagher, T. (2005) Theft of a Nation: Romania Since Communism. London: Hurst.
- McDermott, K. & Stibbe, M. (Eds.) (2007) Revolution and Resistance in Eastern Europe: Challenges to Communist Rule. New York: Berg.

- Ratesh, N. (1991) Romania, the Entangled Revolution: The Washington Papers. Washington, DC: Center for Strategic and International Studies.
- Roper, S. D. (2004) Romania: The Unfinished Revolution. London: Routledge.
- Roustel, D. (1999) Bitter Victory for Romanian Miners. Le Monde diplomatique. Available at www.hartford-hwp.com/archives/62/462.html.
- Verdery, K. (1991) National Ideology Under Socialism: Identity and Cultural Politics in Ceausescu's Romania. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Romania, protests and revolts, 18th and 19th centuries

Jolan Bogdan

Romania's turbulent history of struggle and revolution dates back as far as the first century. The legacy of recent history, however, begins in the eighteenth century, when Romanians, swept up in the waves of nationalism and ambitions of self-rule washing over Europe, began their struggle for establishing an independent Romanian state, free from foreign interference. The nationalist goal was to unite under one rule the three principalities in the Balkan region, which contained the majority of Romanians; they were Moldavia, Wallachia, and Transylvania. The Romanians in these three regions each labored under a different foreign ruler. Even in the early twenty-first century, Romania is mired in territorial disputes. Transylvania, the most contested region, receives special attention due to its vocal Hungarian minority. The Romanians in independent Moldavia, on the other hand, seek unification with Romania. These territorial disputes, along with worker struggles, constitute much of Romania's history.

Transylvanian Protest in the 18th Century

Moldavia and Wallachia, vassal states to the Russian and Ottoman empires respectively, housed the native Romanian elite known as the boyar class, namely wealthy landowners, but the peasantry constituted the majority of the population. Transylvania, on the other hand, belonged at the time to Hungary, which was united with Austria under Hapsburg rule and free from Turkish influence. The Austrian Hapsburg dynasty ruled over numerous people of Central Europe at points along its long history, and the kingdom of Hungary was a welcome addition. The formerly powerful kingdom containing Transylvania, with its own tradition of multiethnic rule, served as merely another like-minded foe to vanquish and appropriate into the Hapsburg empire, along with the likes of Lombardy and Bohemia. However, while Western European influences moved closer to Hungary and Transylvania, the Ottoman empire entered its long decline and the Romanian lands ruled by the Turks remained undeveloped relative to the diversity of Transylvania. For the Hapsburgs, Transylvania served a purpose primarily because of its military advantages, the Carpathian Mountains acting as a natural barrier against the Turks and Russians. Economically, it remained small and underdeveloped compared to the western regions of the empire.

The ethnic constitution of Transylvania through history stirs much debate, specifically between differing accounts of Hungarian and Romanian national lore, and different interpretations have occasionally led to ethnic clashes. Much of the debate is not yet settled. However, both sides agree that by the middle of the eighteenth century Romanians comprised over 60 percent of the population. At that time the ruling three nations of Transylvania were the Hungarians known as Magyar, the Hungarians known as Szekely, combining to form approximately 25–30 percent of the population, and the German Saxons, who approximated to 10–15 percent. A far greater percentage of the Romanian population lived as serfs than other ethnicities. These disproportions during the Ottoman era resulted in the rise of ethnic tensions in the age of nationalism.

Transylvania was a diverse land and it responded dynamically to the stimulus of becoming part of Western Europe via the Hapsburgs. Its large Romanian population complemented an even larger mass of nationals living in Moldavia and Wallachia under Ottoman and Russian influence, where many Romanians looked to Transylvania as a place of prospects and prosperity. A fair degree of economic and cultural cross-pollination occurred between the Romanians living in the three lands. Regarding the growing national sentiment and newly developing political ideas and yearnings, Transylvania inevitably took on the leadership role due to its higher rate of development, the result of the historically western political orientation of the Hungarian rulers of Transylvania. Many Romanians from the Ottoman regions came to Transylvania for a better life, and some returned to Moldavia and Wallachia with new ideas of Romanian progress and unity.

Peasant Uprisings

Historically, revolts and uprisings were ignited by struggles against the feudal system. But in the new age of nationalism, ethnic identities started entering the fray. The large peasant revolt in the mainly Romanian-populated southwestern Transylvania led by Horea, Closca, and Crisan in 1784 had a feudal grounding and reflected the concerns of the rights of serfs, but its participants and leaders happened to be Romanians. The Austrian military arm responsible for security in that region of the empire, aided by some local Transylvanian Hungarians, eventually crushed this widespread and relatively significant peasant revolt and publicly tortured and executed its leaders. For many Romanians, the revolt marked a moment of national pride, indicating an increasing willingness to rise up, aided by a growing and able leadership, some of whom were themselves liberated serfs. The fight for the “liberation” of serfs entailed an incremental struggle for more rights regarding labor, land-ownership, pay, education, and other freedoms and general life options for the peasant classes, though the actual revolt itself broke out over the entangled issue of military conscription. In the months and years leading up to the breakout of violence, Horea and Closca took their case all the way to Vienna, lobbying the governing powers for various increased legal rights, some of which had already begun developing, albeit at a slow pace. While the revolt was primarily a peasant revolt, it was also partly a Romanian uprising, for it took on elements of ethnic conflict with the peasants attacking the mostly Hungarian nobility and government officials as well as Hungarian villages. Conversely, some of the powerful Hungarian nobility took it upon themselves to organize resistance to the uprising without waiting for the Austrian military units, and so in some areas of Transylvania local Hungarians and soldiers fought the Romanian peasants.

In 1790–1, the Transylvanian Diet convened to discuss the political issues most pressing to the ruling three nations, still considered as the two groups of Hungarians and the Saxons, and not including the Romanian majority. As a significant addition, however, it also witnessed the introduction of a Romanian document reflecting the concerns of the majority population, the unrecognized fourth nation with the fewest economic, political, and religious rights. The Supplex Libellus Vallachorum became the single most important political document affecting the fate of Transylvanian Romanians through the nineteenth century. It demanded political and religious rights equal to the other nations, partly inspired by the French Declaration of the Rights of Man. Even the Hapsburg emperor received a copy of the document and its demands for greater rights. Unfortunately, since the ruling Hungarians and Saxons harbored no desire to share their institutions, lands, and political power in any meaningful way with the Romanians, they rejected the petition in all quarters. The Hungarians and Saxons ascribed the relative backwardness of the Romanian population to the incompetence of their priestly class, and dismissed the major demands for reform.

Cultural Developments in the 19th Century

At this time, the growing cultural awareness and participation of Transylvanian Romanian elites developed essentially in Hungarian Catholic and Protestant schools in Transylvania. Basic Romanian-language education also spread across the region. Through the early 1800s, Buda (not yet unified into Budapest) became an important center for Romanian development and literature, publishing the first Romanian periodical along with numerous books advancing the Romanian national cause and detailing the history of the nation. The Transylvanian School of Romanian intellectuals set for itself the goals of freeing the Romanian Orthodox Church from Serbian Orthodox domination, Moldavia and Wallachia from Ottoman domination, and Transylvania from Austro-Hungarian domination. The famous Daco-Roman historical theory, hypothesizing the continuity of Romanian cultural presence in the three Romanian lands (but especially Transylvania) from the time of the Roman colonies, spread considerably and grew to serve as a popular and useful political justification for demanding increased rights and eventual self-determination. Its actual historical merit continues to spark debate, but it answered questions of national origins in a way that satisfied common sense and greatly helped to empower the national aspirations of educated Romanians.

Through the 1830s, reform-minded Hungarians moved toward the growing liberal democratic trends of the West, formulating plans and desires for their own expansion of freedoms within the Austrian empire as well as expressing concern about the existence of the ethnic minorities ruled by the Hungarian crown. These minorities comprised a majority within the total population of the Hungarian political units for which the Hungarian ruling class was responsible. Eventually, the Hungarians would gain official co-rulership status with the Austrians, but even before the granting of that privilege the Hungarian elite essentially ruled numerous peoples, such as the significant populations of Slovaks, Romanians, Croatians, and others within the traditional boundaries of the Hungarian kingdom. Concern about these minorities grew as the progress of liberal trends advanced through this age of nationalism. Each of the minorities grew ever more aware of their second-class-citizen status, and resented being ruled by an emerging Hungarian nation. As people all over Europe evolved and coalesced into that distinct and powerful cultural and psychological state of national awareness, they expressed desires of a singular nature: self-determination within a nation-state based on their ethnic identity. Fulfilling this impossible wish would require genocide, ethnic cleansing, massive population shifts, forced assimilation, or at the least voluntary assimilation. Providing an ethnic minority with full and equal protection of legal rights provided a more direct path toward peaceful, voluntary assimilation than any other, yet this option clashed most with the newly developed idea of national self-determination. The long tradition of European militarism, however, sympathized with these trends of nationalist feeling, as Napoleon demonstrated when he harnessed the great emotional power of this new age to spectacularly glorify France, and himself, and served as an example for many nations wishing to do the same, including the emerging Romanians.

Romanian Resistance Against the Ottomans

At the beginning of the nineteenth century, Moldavian and Wallachian Romanians witnessed firsthand the decline of the Ottomans and the growth of Russian aspirations over the Balkans and other traditionally Ottoman territories. The year 1821 saw one of the seminal events of Romanian revolutionary history, known as the Wallachian Uprising. Led by a member of the steadily emerging Romanian middle class named Tudor Vladimirescu, native Romanian boyars rose in protest against the Greek-led administrative system of the Ottoman empire. Vladimirescu spent the years leading up to the rebellion liaising with almost every major power in the Balkans (Greeks, Russians, Ottomans, as well as the native boyars) and by 1820 had convinced each of them of his loyalty against the others. The death of the Ottoman regent in 1821 brought the short-lived window of opportunity Vladimirescu had waited for. With the help of his boyar compatriots, he raised a small army and occupied Bucharest before Istanbul could designate a successor to the Wallachian throne. He used this brief moment of power to betray each of the interest groups he had manipulated, and thus to create a small space for Romanian self-rule by introducing drastic tax and land reforms. While the Greek landowners (who divided evenly into Ottoman-appointed administrators and wealthy ultranationalist revolutionaries), the Russian armies of the Holy Alliance, and the Ottoman authorities each scrambled to respond to the situation in Bucharest, the Romanian boyars themselves rejected and ultimately undermined Vladimirescu's reformist demands. After being forced to compromise with the Ottomans, Vladimirescu's own Greek allies arrested, tortured, and executed him, while his radical reformist program was for the most part quickly dismantled under the renewed, and now heavily garrisoned, Ottoman administration. The Wallachian Uprising is perhaps the clearest example of the "nexus effect" recurrent in Romanian history. Revolutionary, nationalist, and anti-imperialist struggles in Romania usually seem to progress by a balancing act wherein the major powers of Southeastern Europe temporarily deflect each other's influence for long enough to allow for an increase in Romanian autonomy. Vladimirescu seems to be the first to have adopted and actively cultivated this geopolitical strategy in the name of the Romanian people. Though he met with limited success in his own time, his example was massively influential in later struggles.

Romanian Resistance Against the Hungarians

Hungary preferred the method of forced assimilation as an answer to the questions of non-Hungarians about the future of the Hungarian nation, and so Romanians, along with other minorities, grew ever more resentful, resilient, and resistant to assimilation and continuous minority status. Transylvanian Romanians, particularly humiliated, continued their status as an unrecognized (merely tolerated) nation. When the Hungarians staged their own national revolt in 1848, they envisioned a Danubian Confederacy which maintained the Hungarian kingdom as a democratic ruler, a system which was desirable for Hungarians since they were by far the largest nation within the kingdom, though overall a minority in each of the outlying regions. For the other nations, this arrangement seemed less preferable to their own conception of a future in which they ruled themselves. The issue of minority language, its limits and freedoms in matters official and educational, provided a major focus for national concerns. The language of a nation acted as the carrier of its nationhood, the historical and cultural heritage that defined nationhood. The ethnicities attempting to hold on to territory did so by holding on to language. One method of assimilating an ethnic group therefore manifested in attempts to severely curtail its language rights, including place-names and personal names. Forcing a group to exchange its language for another would result in exchanging national identities as well.

In the years leading up to the 1848 revolts the Romanian elite were increasingly working to lay the foundations of uniting the indisputably Romanian Moldavia and Wallachia into a viable nation-state, and adding Transylvania as a crowning bonus. The Vladimirescu revolt gave their cause hope, in addition to aggravating the serious problems the Ottomans were having with Russian expansionism. From their position as Ottoman vassals, Romanians preferred their fellow Eastern Orthodox Russians to help them as much as possible, but many realistically knew that to truly guarantee their security in the neighborhood of warlike behemoths, they needed to look to liberal western powers. Therefore, they turned to popular and powerful France, their fellow Latins, for aid. With the help of the diplomatic influence of Napoleon III, along with the fortuitous expulsion of Russian forces from Romania during the Crimean War, none of the great powers of Southeastern Europe was strong enough to block the path of the Romanian people toward nationhood.

SEE ALSO: Romania, Mineworker Protests, 20th Century; Romania, Protest and Revolution, 20th Century

References and Suggested Readings

- Giurescu, C. C. (1969) Transylvania in the History of Romania: An Historical Outline. London: Garnstone Press.
- Rady, M. C. (1992) Romania in Turmoil: A Contemporary History. London: I. B. Tauris.
- Sowards, S. W. (2004) Lecture 8: National Revival in Romania, 1848–1866. In “Twenty-Five Lectures on Modern Balkan History: The Balkans in the Age of Nationalism,” Michigan State University, November 16. Available at www.lib.msu.edu/sowards/balkan/.

Romania, student and worker protests, 1956

Dennis John Deletant

The Hungarian uprising of October 23, 1956 allowed the Romanian leadership to amply demonstrate its fidelity to the Soviet Union. Its repercussions were quickly felt in Romania. Convergence of interest with the Soviet Union and not just slavish obedience determined the stance adopted by the Romanian Communist Party leader Gheorghe Gheorghiu-Dej and his colleagues. They had two main concerns: a successful revolt in Budapest against communist rule might spread to the 2-million strong Hungarian community in Transylvania, thus sparking an anti-communist rising in Romania; and a non-communist Hungary might lay claim to parts of Transylvania, which had been restored in its entirety to Romanian rule by Stalin in March 1945.

On October 24 some 300 students from the Romanian Babeş and the Hungarian Bolyai universities in Cluj, spurred on by the events in Hungary, gathered at the Institute of Fine Arts to protest at the demanding timetable of classes, compulsory attendance at lectures, and criteria for awarding student bursaries. The leaders of the protest were arrested on the following day. Two students, Baláys Imre and Aristid Târnovan, were accused of the crime of public agitation and sentenced by a military tribunal to five years' imprisonment. In Timișoara a group of polytechnic students, Caius Muțiu, Teodor Stanca, Aurel Baghiu, and Ladislau Nagy, backed by Gheorghe Pop, a professor, held a secret meeting on October 28, 1956 at which they decided to convene a general assembly of students from all the educational establishments in the city to discuss the meagreness of food in the student canteens and shortcomings in the teaching. The meeting was arranged over the heads of the polytechnic administration and the Party organization and took place at the faculty of mechanical engineering on October 30. Some estimates put the number of students present at around 3,000. It was attended by senior Party officials, headed by Petre Lupu and Ilie Verdeț, who heard criticism of the presence of Soviet troops in Romania and calls for the abolition of compulsory classes in Russian. The Party officials promised to convey the students' complaints to Bucharest but immediately after their departure army units were called in to seal off the polytechnic campus and more than 2,000 arrests were made. Of these, 30 were sent for trial, where they were given sentences ranging from three months to eight years imprisonment.

Gheorghiu-Dej and a Romanian delegation cut short a visit to Yugoslavia on October 28 to address the crisis. Some foreign correspondents reported that on October 29 railwaymen at the Grivița yards in Bucharest held a protest meeting calling for improved conditions of work, while in Iași there were street demonstrations in support of better food supplies. Two medical students, Alexandru Ivasiuc and Mihai Victor Serdaru, tried to organize a protest in Bucharest's University Square on November 5 by distributing leaflets calling for the removal of Russian and Marxism-Leninism from the university curriculum, but the authorities swooped to arrest the ringleaders, thus stifling the protest.

The anti-Soviet protests in Romania in 1956 were driven largely by students who had a predominantly – but not exclusively – student agenda; there is little evidence of workers rallying to their support. This lack of solidarity between students and workers enabled the regime to suppress any opposition rapidly and remove any threat to its stability. Khrushchev himself alluded to the student protests in an address to the Moscow Komsomol on November 8, 1956 when he said that there were “some unhealthy moods” among students “in one of the educational establishments in Romania” and he congratulated the RCP on having dealt with them quickly and effectively (Ionescu 1964). On October 30 the Timișoara, Oradea, and Iași regions were placed under military rule as Soviet troops were brought in across the Romanian border in the East and concentrated on the frontier with Hungary in the West. To placate the workers the government announced on October 29 that the minimum wage would be raised, and on November 2 Politburo member Gheorghe Apostol addressed a railwaymen's meeting and promised help in the form of free travel for them.

One day earlier, Khrushchev and Malenkov paid a secret visit to Bucharest to discuss the Hungarian crisis with Romanian, Bulgarian, and Czechoslovak leaders and, according to some Western reports, Khrushchev demanded that Romanian troops be used to crush the Budapest revolt. Gheorghiu-Dej allegedly replied that, owing to a large Hungarian minority in the Romanian army and general sympathy for Hungary, the army could not be relied upon for such an operation. Romanian reluctance to play a direct military role could also have been attributed to the fear of irreparably antagonizing the Hungarian minority in Romania, but such a stance is contradicted by the memoirs of Khrushchev, who claimed to have received offers of military assistance from the Romanian and Bulgarian leaders (Verona 1992).

One thing is clear. Gheorghiu-Dej pushed for firm military intervention against Imre Nagy's government and the Soviet troops based in Romania had been among the first to cross the Hungarian border on October 26 to reinforce the Soviet presence. A key figure in the Romanian Party's support for Soviet intervention in Hungary was Emil Bodnăraș. During the Hungarian uprising, he was appointed minister of transport and communications and in this capacity he supervised the widening of roads of strategic importance to Soviet troops for their transit through Romania. He was probably instrumental in making arrangements for the detention of Imre Nagy in Romania, for on November 21 he and Gheorghiu-Dej paid a visit to Janos Kadar, the new first secretary of the Hungarian Communist Party, and on the following day Nagy was abducted by KGB officers and flown to Bucharest, where he was granted what the Romanian foreign minister Grigore Preoteasa termed “asylum.” In fact, he was held, along with other members of his government, in a Securitate (Romanian secret police) safe house in a locality just north of Bucharest, where their interrogation was coordinated by Boris Shumilin, chief KGB adviser “for counterrevolutionary affairs,” and not allowed visits from UN officials promised by Preoteasa to prove that he was not under duress (Andrew & Gordievsky 1991). Shumilin permitted Valter Roman, a senior RCP member, to question Nagy’s associates. Many other prominent supporters of Nagy were interrogated in Romania, among them the Marxist critic Georg Lukács.

Gheorghiu-Dej’s concern over the reaction of the Hungarian minority in Transylvania to the uprising led him to pursue a policy of integration and his first step was to dilute the provision for Hungarian-language teaching in schools, making it more difficult to receive a Hungarian-language education up to university level in Romania. After 1956, Hungarian-language instruction began to be moved from single-language to dual-language schools.

Romania was the Soviet Union’s most active ally during the Hungarian crisis. Its support of the Soviet Union went beyond the political arena into the domain of practical assistance and open encouragement. Gheorghiu-Dej and Bodnăraș were the first foreign leaders to visit Budapest after the Soviet invasion and in their official communiqué they opined that the Soviet action “was necessary and correct” (Verona 1992). The Romanian government echoed Soviet propaganda, denouncing the “counterrevolution” as the work of “reactionary Fascists” provoked by “Western imperialists.” Additional bases were provided on Romanian soil to the Soviet forces, roads were widened, and railway traffic interrupted to carry military transport. Soviet satisfaction with Romania’s role during October and November 1956 stood to the country’s advantage two years later when Khrushchev decided to withdraw Soviet troops.

SEE ALSO: Hungary, Revolution of 1956; Romania, Protest and Revolution, 20th Century

References and Suggested Readings

Andrew, C. & Gordievsky, O. (1991) KGB: The Inside Story of its Foreign Operations from Lenin to Gorbachev. London: Sceptre Books.

- Bottoni, S. (2007) Transilvania rossa. Il comunismo romeno e la questione nazionale (1944–1965). Rome: Carocci editore.
- Deletant, D. (1999) Communist Terror in Romania: Gheorghiu-Dej and the Police State, 1948–65. New York: St. Martin’s Press.
- Ionescu, G. (1964) Communism in Romania, 1944–1962. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Tismăneanu, V. (2003) Stalinism for All Seasons: A Political History of Romanian Communism. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Tismăneanu, V., Dobrinu, D., & Vasile, C. (Eds.) (2007) Comisia prezidențială pentru analiza dictaturii comuniste din România. Raport final. Bucharest: Humanitas.
- Verona, S. (1992) Military Occupation and Diplomacy: Soviet Troops in Romania 1944–1958. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.

Romero, Óscar (1917–1980), Archbishop

Edward T. Brett

Óscar Arnulfo Romero y Galdámez, born on August 15, 1917 in the remote town of Ciudad Barrios in the Department of San Miguel, El Salvador, in the 1970s became a leading figure in the Catholic clerical movement for an end to dictatorship in El Salvador and an advocate for the ideals of liberation theology, founded on principles of eliminating poverty through equalization of wealth. At the age of 13 he entered the minor seminary in San Miguel, and in 1937 graduated to the National Seminary in San Salvador. He evidently showed promise, because after only a few months the local bishop sent him to Rome to study at the Gregorian University, where he earned his licentiate degree in theology cum laude in 1941 and was ordained a priest on April 4, 1942. He remained in Rome to work toward a doctorate in ascetical theology, but in August 1943 was required to return to his native country before completing his degree due to complications resulting from World War II.

After a few months in a rural parish, he was transferred to the diocesan see of San Miguel, where he was named pastor of the cathedral parish and diocesan secretary, a position he retained for 23 years. During this time he developed a reputation as a gifted preacher, but also as a theological traditionalist and a staunch conservative on sociopolitical matters.

In 1966 he was appointed secretary of the Episcopal Conference for El Salvador, a post that required his transfer to the capital city. In 1970 he was made auxiliary bishop of San Salvador, a position that was also held by the more progressive Arturo Rivera y Damas. He became editor of the archdiocesan weekly, Orientación, in 1971. Under his tutelage the paper took on a more conservative bent; he used it to attack the policies of Bishop Rivera, as well as the Jesuits who ran the seminary, Catholic University, and most prestigious high school in the capital.

In 1975 Romero was named bishop of Santiago de María, where he served for three years. It was during this time that he began to realize that social oppression in El Salvador was widespread. He wrote articles in the diocesan weekly, El Apóstol, criticizing the local coffee oligarchy for refusing to pay just wages to their employees. He also allowed seasonal coffee workers to use church buildings for shelter and provided them with food. Nevertheless, he retained his suspicion of activist priests and after his appointment in 1975 to the Pontifical Commission for Latin America, used his newly acquired influence with the Vatican to criticize the “Marxist tendencies” of the Jesuits.

Although Archbishop Luis Chávez y González, upon his retirement in 1977, recommended that Rivera succeed him, Vatican officials ignored his request and instead chose the more conservative Romero. A pivotal step in the new archbishop’s radical transformation occurred, however, almost immediately after his episcopal installation. It was then that he went to Aguilares to preside at the funeral of Rutilio Grande, a Jesuit who had been working with sugar cane laborers since 1972. Grande’s Jesuit team had supported the Aguilares peasants who were striking against the local sugar refinery and as a result he was assassinated along with two peasant companions. Although Chávez and Rivera had encouraged Grande’s work, Romero had felt that the Jesuit endeavors in Aguilares were too political and were fanning the flames of discord. He had said as much in Rome at a meeting of the Pontifical Commission for Latin America.

After returning from the funeral, Romero asked government officials to investigate the Aguilares killings. When no action was taken, the new archbishop took to the pulpit at his Sunday masses and began castigating the government and military for their perpetration of violence and injustice. His homilies were broadcast over the archdiocesan radio station and soon they became the most listened to radio program in El Salvador. Romero’s support came primarily from the poor and oppressed people of his country and from the Salvadoran clergy, who dubbed him “the voice of the voiceless.” His fellow bishops, however, denounced him to the Vatican, calling him a naïve tool of Marxist revolutionaries. Indeed, during his three-year tenure as archbishop, Bishop Rivera was the only Salvadoran prelate to stand with him in his fight for social justice.

By 1978 Romero had become internationally known for his prophetic voice. He received honorary degrees from Catholic universities in both the United States and Europe, and in 1979 was even nominated for the Nobel Peace Prize. Such fame came with a price, however, and by mid-1979 six of his priests had been assassinated by right-wing death squads; many others were jailed, tortured, or expelled from the country. When Romero wrote an open letter to President Jimmy Carter asking him not to increase US military aid to the Salvadoran government, his fate was sealed. A few days after delivering a Sunday homily, in which he implored Salvadoran soldiers to obey God’s higher law rather than the violent commands of their military superiors, he was assassinated while saying mass. The date of his death was March 24, 1980. Years later, a 1993 United Nations investigation would confirm what all had long suspected, when it identified army major Roberto D’Aubuisson as the mastermind behind Romero’s assassination. Even though his murder caused international outrage, the newly installed Reagan administration decided to greatly increase US military aid to the Salvadoran government. Consequently, over the next decade, Salvadoran security forces and government-sponsored death squads killed about 70,000 Salvadorans. Included were several priests and nuns, but the overwhelming majority were impoverished Salvadoran peasants.

SEE ALSO: Federation of Salvadoran Workers (FENASTRAS); Latin America, Catholic Church and Liberation, 16th Century to Present; Salvadoran Civil War, 1980–1991

References and Suggested Readings

Brockman, J. R. (1989) Romero: A Life. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books.

- Erdozain, P. (1991) Archbishop Romero: Martyr of Salvador. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books.
- Sobrino, J. (1990) Archbishop Romero: Memories and Reflections. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books.

Roshaniya movement and the Khan Rebellion

Yury V. Bosin

The Roshaniya, or “enlightened,” was a populist nonsectarian movement that arose among Afghan tribes in the mid-sixteenth century. Roshaniya was founded by Bayazid Ansari, who challenged inequality and social injustice practiced by the ruling powers. The Roshaniya promulgated egalitarian codes and tenets within Islam.

Born to an orthodox Muslim family, Ansari educated and instructed Afghans’ religious practices through a new radical teaching that questioned basic Islamic canons and propagated egalitarian and even communist principles. Ostracized by his family, Ansari spent several years wandering through the hills of Afghanistan disseminating this egalitarian ideology. In the ensuing years, Ansari’s teachings resonated among the Afghan tribes of Afridi, Orakzai, Khalil, Mohmand, and Bangash.

The ideology of egalitarianism broadly expanded the power of Ansari, who became widely known throughout Afghanistan as Pir-i Roshan (apostle of light), and his growing followers called themselves Roshaniya (enlightened). The rapid expansion of the Roshaniya movement alarmed Muslim clergy and the Moghul authorities. This official opposition deepened as Ansari’s influence expanded. He inveighed against the Moghul empire and mobilized partisans for armed struggle against the empire. Roshaniya defeated the Moghul army in a series of engagements in the mid- to late fifteenth century, establishing control over key cities and regions including Nangarhar, Ghazni, and Kabul. Adherents of the sect gained control of the Khyber Pass, which they blocked. While the Moghuls eventually defeated the Roshaniya movement militarily, pockets of resistance continued through the seventeenth century. In 1638, with the killing of Karimdad, Ansari’s grandson, the Roshaniya were defeated.

Khushhal Khan’s Rebellion against the Moghuls

Political and military instability continued to fester into the 1600s under the leadership of Khushhal Khan (1613–89), chief of the Khattak tribe and ruler of the Akora principality, which was a protectorate of the Great Moghuls’ empire. The Khattaks maintained strategic control over the vital transportation network in the Peshawar region and a high status in the Moghuls’ hierarchy. Their loyalty to the Moghuls was, however, volatile and the tribal settlements around Peshawar were always a source of turbulence. Suspected in the anti-Moghul activity, Khushhal Khan was arrested in 1664 and spent four years incarcerated in a Moghul fortress. Upon his release he began fervently rallying against the Moghuls. Using his eloquence and poetic gifts, he soon mobilized his tribesmen to start a guerilla war against Moghul rule. By 1675 he had more than 300,000 active supporters and won a series of skirmishes against the Moghul army. The Moghul emperor, Aurangzeb, pursued a strategy of sticks and carrots to foment tribal feuds and to split the rebellion. After some prominent chiefs left the movement, it gradually ebbed. Khushhal Khan died in 1689. His grandson Afzal, who inherited the Akora throne, recognized Moghul supremacy, although the Moghul influence in Khattak territory shrank and was merely nominal.

A prolific poet, Khushhal Khan is famous for his contribution to Pashtu literature and is one of the most revered figures in the Afghan cultural heritage.

SEE ALSO: Afghanistan, 1978 Revolution and Islamic Civil War; Afghanistan, Resistance to 19th-Century British Invasion; Bacha-i Sakkao’s Movement; Bin Laden, Osama (b. 1957) and al-Qaeda; Durrani Empire, Popular Protests, 1747–1823; Taliban, 1996–2007

References and Suggested Readings

- Briant, P. (2002) From Cyrus to Alexander: A History of the Persian Empire. Trans. P. T. Daniels. Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns.
- Masson, V. & Romodon, V. (1964) A History of Afghanistan, Vols. 1–2. Moscow: Nauka (in Russian).
- Sykes, P. (1940) A History of Afghanistan. London: Macmillan.

Rossanda, Rossana (b. 1924)

Anna Simone

A key figure in the political and cultural debate of the Italian left, Rossana Rossanda was born in Pula in Istria (now Croatia) in 1924. A few years later she moved to Venice where she spent most of her childhood. Her family gave her a lay education. In the early 1940s she attended the University in Milan, where she met Antonio Banfi, an anti-fascist activist and professor of history of philosophy and aesthetics. Attending his courses, she engaged in studies and researches on Karl Marx's works, read through the lens of Italian "historicism." In the same period, the impending World War II led her to embrace the cause of militant anti-fascism and the Italian Resistance, together with her university professor. After the Italian liberation from fascism in 1945, she joined the Italian Communist Party (PCI) and was later put in charge of its cultural department. In 1963 she was elected deputy to the Italian parliament. In 1968 she wrote her first successful book, L'anno degli studenti (The Students' Year), but in the summer of that year, following the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia, she developed a critical position toward the imperialist policies of the USSR and tried to shift her attention to the forms of class struggle in the West. In June 1969 she founded and, with Lucio Magri, became co-editor of the political review Il Manifesto, which was then in opposition to the ideas of the PCI. More specifically, the review criticized the Soviet model of real socialism and its imperialist policies over Prague. Together with Aldo Natoli and Luigi Pintor, who also worked for the review, Rossanda was expelled from the PCI for joining its critical left wing. In 1971 Il Manifesto became a daily paper, the only independent paper of the Italian left. Rossana Rossanda was its editor only for a short period, but through its columns and several important books such as Appuntamenti di fine secolo (Issues of the End of the Century, written with Pietro Ingrao and others) and Brigate Rosse: Una Storia Italiana (The Red Brigades: An Italian History) she sparked off and animated the political and cultural debate in the Italian left. For many years she has been a keen observer of Chinese communism as well as of Italian and French political and cultural processes. A friend of important intellectual figures such as Simone de Beauvoir, Jean-Paul Sartre, and others, Rossanda has always taken a critical stance on justicialist policies in opposition to representatives of the Italian movement of the 1970s (such as Antonio Negri, Franco Piperno, and others). Her positions, however, have always differed from those of Italian workerism and autonomism in general. Together with the Il Manifesto group, she attempted to combine the new subjectivities of the movement, emerging all over the world in the 1970s, with the tradition of the workers' movement connected with the PCI. In recent years Rossanda has been at the forefront of the Italian political debate thanks to the publication of her first autobiography, La ragazza del secolo scorso (The Girl from Last Century), which quickly became a bestseller. In it she describes her communist history, arguing that it is the only possible history of the twentieth century.

SEE ALSO: Autonomism; Italian Communist Party; Italy, from the Anti-Fascist Resistance to the New Left (1945–1960); Italy, from the New Left to the Great Repression (1962–1981); Marxism; Negri, Antonio (b. 1933); Red Brigades

References and Suggested Readings

- Rossanda, R. (1968) L'anno degli studenti. Bari: De Donato.
 Rossanda, R. (2005) La ragazza del secolo scorso. Turin: Einaudi.
 Rossanda, R. & Ingrao, P. (Eds.) (1995) Appuntamenti di fine secolo. Rome: Manifestolibri.
 Rossanda, R. & Mosca, C. (2001) Brigate Rosse: Una storia italiana. Milan: Baldini e Castoldi.

Rosselli, Carlo (1899–1937)

Donatella Cherubini

An Italian intellectual, economist, journalist, and political leader, Carlo Rosselli was committed to the anti-fascist struggle in Italy and in the Spanish Civil War. A leading political theorist of liberal socialism, Rosselli was killed by fascist assassins.

Rosselli was born in 1899 in Rome to a wealthy Tuscan Jewish family and moved to Florence during his childhood. He was strongly influenced by his mother, Amelia Pincherle, who diffused to the family the republican tradition of Giuseppe Mazzini during the process of Italian unification (Risorgimento). Rosselli supported Italy's entrance into World War I as a means of democratic rebirth and joined the Italian armed forces fighting in the Alpine campaign. Despite the pacifist positions of the Italian Socialist Party (Partito Socialista Italiano, PSI) in the postwar era, Rosselli supported its gradual (reformist) component. He received university degrees in the social sciences at Florence and law at Siena and began a university career in economics, establishing ties with, among others, the liberal Luigi Einaudi and the young socialist liberal Piero Gobetti, who was killed in a fascist assault.

Rosselli's political formation and ideals led to his early opposition to fascism, and he joined young intellectuals in Florence who rallied around the historian Gaetano Salvemini. Active in the protest following the assassination on June 10, 1924 of Giacomo Matteotti, the young secretary of the new reformist United Socialist Party, Rosselli continued in his opposition to fascism. In 1926, Rosselli joined forces with Pietro Nenni, socialist and future leader of the PSI, founding the review Quarto Stato, a publication banned a few months later. In 1926, Rosselli organized the escape to France of Filippo Turati, the prestigious reformist socialist leader, but was himself captured and sentenced to confinement on the island of Lipari, off Sicily.

While in prison, Rosselli began elaborating a new political theory of liberal socialism, based on non-Marxist socialism of liberal ascendancy, overcoming class struggle and embracing the experience of British labor unionism – a perspective influenced by Mazzini's political and social ideals and principles. In 1929 Rosselli escaped to France, where he promoted the Giustizia e Libertà (Justice and Liberty) movement, inspired by liberal socialist principles, and participated in the Concentrazione di Azioni Antifascista, a federation of non-communist political groups of Italian emigrants in Paris. The movement sought to establish the conditions for Italian anti-fascist revolution through the creation of a qualified, modern, and what it considered a realizable model for advanced democracy, based on ideals inherited from the Risorgimento that would overcome the old liberal order and promote social justice.

Rosselli was particularly disappointed by Italian socialism's inability to arrest the rise of fascism, as witnessed by his political activity and writings. Actively committed to underlining the dangers of fascism, which was spreading throughout Europe by the mid-1930s, Rosselli proposed a federal Europe and was convinced that only a democratic war could defeat fascism.

Rosselli considered the Spanish Revolution and the subsequent civil war following Francisco Franco's pro-fascist/monarchical coup against the republican Popular Front government as an important test bench for the future of socialism. He was actively involved in the organization of anti-fascist and republican forces and was critical of the political neutrality of democratic France and Great Britain, especially because Benito Mussolini's Italy and Adolf Hitler's Germany were sending arms and soldiers to support Francoism.

Together with the Giustizia e Libertà movement, Rosselli organized volunteer brigades to fight on the side of the Spanish Republic, heading in person the Battaglione Matteotti composed of Italian anarchists, liberals, socialists, and communists. In a talk on Radio Barcelona during this campaign, Rosselli articulated the famous slogan evoking the democratic war against fascist regimes throughout Europe: "Today Spain, tomorrow Italy [Oggi in Spagna, domani in Italia]." Rosselli returned to Paris severely ill, but continued to fight fascism and was even receptive to hypotheses for popular fronts with communist participation, albeit remaining critical of Stalinism and Soviet communism. His steadfast anti-fascist commitment made him one of the principal targets of fascism in Europe, even when the Spanish Republic was declining and republican volunteers were withdrawing.

In June 1937, while on holiday in Bagnoles-de-l'Orne in France, Rosselli was assassinated with his brother Nello by cagoullards, militants of the French fascist group Cagoule, who were probably emissaries of the Italian fascist regime.

SEE ALSO: Fascism, Protest and Revolution; Italian Risorgimento; Mazzini, Giuseppe (1805–1872); Mussolini, Benito (1883–1945); Salvemini, Gaetano (1873–1957); Spanish Revolution; Turati, Filippo (1857–1932)

References and Suggested Readings

- Di Scala, S. (Ed.) (1996) Italian Socialism between Politics and History. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press.
- Garosci, A. (1945/1973) Vita di Carlo Rosselli, 2 vols. Florence: Vallecchi.

Roumain, Jacques (1907–1944)

Matthew J. Smith

Jacques Roumain was born in Port-au-Prince, Haiti, on June 4, 1907. One of the Caribbean's foremost novelists, radical thinkers, and poets, Roumain achieved a great deal in a remarkably short life. His best-known and final work, the evocative Les Gouverneurs de la rosée (Masters of the Dew), remains a landmark in Caribbean literature.

After an elite upbringing in Haiti's capital, Roumain left for Europe, where he spent his formative years studying in Belgium, Spain, and Switzerland, before returning to US-occupied Haiti in the 1920s. Barely in his twenties, Roumain was absorbed by the revolutionary nationalism of the period. He channeled his protest against the occupation in his writings. Inspired by his contemporaries, in particular Jean Price-Mars, as well as by the Négritude movement and the Harlem Renaissance, Roumain helped found the indigenous movement, which privileged native Haitian aesthetics and folklore over European traditions.

Although best known for his literary achievements, Roumain was also a fervent Marxist, political organizer, and distinguished statesman. He participated in the 1929 student strike against the US Marines in Haiti. In 1934 he formally organized the Haitian Communist Party (Parti Communiste Haïtien, PCH) with his associate, Christian Beaulieu. The PCH represented the culmination of two years of immersion in Marxist theory. At a time when most elite radicals distanced themselves from communism for fear of state reprisals, Roumain, disenchanted with the nationalist movement, bravely embraced the doctrine. In the party manifesto, L'Analyse Schématique, Roumain critiqued bourgeois control of the Haitian state and argued that Marxism offered the best solution to the country's economic problems and recurrent dictatorships.

This position made him a target of President Sténio Vincent. Roumain was arrested at least twice in the 1930s. An international outcry from colleagues in the United States, among them Langston Hughes and the Friends of Jacques Roumain society in New York, led to his release and eventual exile from Haiti in the late 1930s.

Roumain spent much of this time in the United States, devoting his attention to studies at Columbia University.

With a change in the Haitian government in the spring of 1941, Roumain returned to Haiti with the intention of reforming the PCH. Once again the party was unable to find an urban base and faced strict censure from the new president, Élie Lescot. Although Roumain gave up hope of rebuilding the party, he remained strong in his Marxist beliefs. He accepted an invitation by Lescot to be the director of the newly formed Bureau d'Ethnologie, where he oversaw several important projects on the collection of Haitian artifacts. In 1943 he became Haitian chargé d'affaires in Mexico, where he wrote Masters of the Dew. Roumain never lived to see the book published, or return to his beloved country, dying from cirrhosis on August 18, 1944.

SEE ALSO: Haiti, Resistance to US Occupation

References and Suggested Readings

- Fowler, C. (1980) A Knot in the Thread: The Life and Work of Jacques Roumain. Washington: Howard University Press.
- Trouillot, H. (1981) Dimensions et limites de Jacques Roumain. Port-au-Prince: Editions Fardin.

Rousseau, Jean-Jacques (1712–1778)

Annette Richardson

Jean-Jacques Rousseau was an Enlightenment philosopher whose revolutionary ideas had a great impact on the French Revolution. His ideas also influenced the development of socialist theory and nationalism. Rousseau's outlook was based on the notion of the "noble savage" – that humankind was naturally good, but became corrupted by the development of society, which gave rise to property, inequality, slavery, and poverty.

Rousseau was born in Geneva on June 28, 1712, to a clockmaker and his wife, who died from childbirth complications. Rousseau was raised by his father, who taught him to read classical literature. In 1722 his father abandoned him and he went to live with an aunt and uncle. Rousseau obtained an apprenticeship with a notary, who later dismissed him, and then with an engraver, whom he disliked and left. Throughout his life, Rousseau would have serious difficulties with authority figures.

He left Geneva and moved to Savoy in 1728, where he met the Baroness Louise de Warens and became her student. Although she was 12 years his senior, they also became lovers. His education improved under her guidance and she persuaded him to convert to Catholicism, resulting in the loss of his Genevan citizenship. He worked as a music teacher and tutor to support himself, eventually moving to Paris in 1742 hoping to earn his livelihood as a composer.

In 1745, he met Thérèse Levasseur, an uneducated chambermaid who, though scarcely literate, was to become the great man of letters' life companion. They had a number of children – five, according to Rousseau – but all were placed in an orphanage upon birth. When Rousseau later propounded theories about how children should be raised, his rivals and enemies cited his abandonment of his own children to discredit him. Nonetheless, the educational innovations he proposed in a work of fiction entitled Emile have been credited with greatly influencing modern educational methods.

In 1749, he met Etienne Condillac and Denis Diderot, who were to become prominent philosophes of the Enlightenment. Diderot, one of the principal creators of the Encyclopédie, invited Rousseau to contribute articles to it, which he did. Relations between them soon became tense, however, which often happened in any relationship involving the psychologically complicated Rousseau.

In 1750, Rousseau entered an essay contest on the subject of “morals” sponsored by the Academy of Dijon. Rousseau's prize-winning entry was his Discourse on the Arts and Sciences, in which he first put forward the proposition that humankind is good in its natural state, but has been corrupted by society. His bold thesis sparked controversy and earned him a reputation as an important thinker. He would continue throughout his life to develop the theory that humankind was happy, free, and healthy before society emerged, and that vices and immorality only arose following the imposition of a false social contract based on inequality.

Rousseau returned to Geneva in 1754, where he renounced Roman Catholicism, reconverted to the Protestantism of his youth, and reclaimed his Genevan citizenship. In 1761, he published the popular novel Julie, or the New Heloise, which strongly influenced the emerging Romantic movement. As a leading progenitor of Romanticism, and due to his bitter rivalry with Voltaire, Rousseau is sometimes said to have initiated a “counter-Enlightenment,” but it is probably more useful to think of him as representing a tendency within the Enlightenment offering a corrective to the sterile notion that human behavior can be reduced to pure rationality.

In The Social Contract, published in April 1762, Rousseau famously declared, “Man is born free, and everywhere he is in chains.” His theories of civil society based on political liberty and the people's “general will” rather than on submission to the arbitrary authority of individuals inspired the generation of revolutionaries that included Maximilien Robespierre and Jean-Paul Marat. Rousseau was also one of the first modern writers to attack the institution of private property, foreshadowing the development of socialist and communist ideology.

In May 1762, he published Emile, or On Education, which argued for the cultivation of a student's natural tendencies. His treatment of organized religion as a hindrance to the development of genuine morality created an uproar both in Paris and in Geneva, prompting him to move to Britain, where he was the guest of the Scottish philosopher David Hume. He lived with Hume for a year and a half, but they eventually had a falling out, apparently caused by a persecution complex on Rousseau's part. It was later suspected that his growing paranoia had been fed by years of opium use.

Rousseau returned to Paris in 1770, but was restricted from publishing his works, which were deemed subversive. From 1771 to 1788 he worked on his autobiography, The Confessions, which was posthumously published. Although Hume, among others, felt that no one knew Rousseau less well than Rousseau himself, his autobiography was remarkable for its apparent frankness with regard to his own failings and character defects, and has thus been hailed as a milestone in the development of modern autobiography.

Throughout his life, Rousseau had great difficulty with relationships. He seemingly quarreled with everyone, especially those who did their utmost to help him in his various struggles. Toward the end of his life, Rousseau was staying at the country home of the Marquis de Girardin at Ermenonville, just outside of Paris.

By this time, his mental condition had severely deteriorated. While out for a walk, Rousseau suffered a hemorrhage and died on July 2, 1778. He was buried on the Ile de Peupliers, and in 1794 his remains were reburied in the Pantheon in Paris.

SEE ALSO: Diderot, Denis (1713–1784); Enlightenment, France, 18th Century; French Revolution, 1789–1794; Marat, Jean-Paul (1743–1793); Robespierre, Maximilien de (1758–1794); Voltaire (1694–1778)

References and Suggested Readings

- Cooper, L. (1999) Rousseau and Nature: The Problem of the Good Life. University Park: Pennsylvania University Press.
- Cranston, M. (1991a) Jean-Jacques: The Early Life and Work of Jean-Jacques Rousseau 1712–1754. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Cranston, M. (1991b) The Noble Savage: Jean-Jacques Rousseau 1754–1762. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Cranston, M. (1999) The Solitary Self: Jean-Jacques Rousseau in Exile and Adversity. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Dent, N. J. H. (2005) Rousseau. London: Routledge.
- Melzer, A. (1990) The Natural Goodness of Man: On the System of Rousseau's Thoughts. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Rousseau, J.-J. (2000) Confessions. Trans. A. Scholar. New York: Oxford University Press.

Roy, Manabendra Nath (1887–1954)

Kunal Chattopadhyay

Manabendra Nath Roy was an Indian revolutionary nationalist, communist, and radical humanist, born Narendranath Bhattacharyya, on March 21, 1887. Influenced by the Anti-Bengal Partition Movement, he joined the struggle for national liberation, entering the militant wing, and attempting to organize an armed uprising against British rule in India. He became a follower of the legendary Jatindranath Mukherjee or Bagha Jatin (“tiger” Jatin). The duo were arrested and kept imprisoned for a year during the Howrah-Sibpur Conspiracy Case in 1910–11. They planned for an all-India uprising and contacts abroad.

During World War I Bagha Jatin and other revolutionaries, taking advantage of the small number of European soldiers posted in India, planned to organize an armed uprising. Bhat-tacharyya, using the pseudonym of Charles A. Martin, left India, first for Batavia, and then Shanghai, seeking German help for procuring arms. Though the effort failed, he traveled to the Philippines, the US, and Mexico, hoping to procure arms for Indian revolutionaries. In Manila he learned of the death of his leader Bagha Jatin in an armed encounter in 1915, in a botched delivery of arms.

Naren Bhattacharyya arrived in the US amid newspaper articles declaring him a dangerous Hindu revolutionary. He sought help from Professor Dhanagopal Mukherjee of Stanford University, brother of a fellow revolutionary. The latter changed his name to Manabendra Nath Roy, and introduced him to Dr. David Jordan, progressive president of the university, where he also met Evelyn Trent, who he later married in New York, where he was steeped in Marxism studying in the New York Public Library. When the US declared war on Germany in April 1917, Indian revolutionaries were arrested as alleged enemy spies. Roy fled to Mexico, helped by Dr. Jordan, and became friendly with Mexican President Carranza, joined the Socialist Party, and eventually became its general secretary. He came in contact with the Russian communist Mikhail Borodin and the two became instrumental in the formation of the Mexican Communist Party. In 1920 he attended the Second Congress of the Communist International as a leader and representative of the Mexicans. One of the items on the agenda of this Congress was a discussion on the National and Colonial Question. Roy presented supplementary theses, and debated with Lenin. The Lenin-Roy debate was very important, for it also made Lenin acknowledge that there was a need to differentiate between revolutionary nationalists and bourgeois reformists in the more developed colonies, such as China or India. Roy’s theses were also adopted by the Comintern Congress after a number of important modifications introduced in them by Lenin. After the Congress, Roy became an important figure in the Asian Bureau of the Comintern.

On October 17, 1920 Roy, Evelyn, and five others founded the émigré Communist Party of India in Tashkent. From this time, he attempted to influence Indian politics through two channels. On one hand, using his old nationalist credentials, he tried to recruit younger socialistically inclined radicals to communism. For this, he published

Bengali political theorist, communist, and radical humanist Manabendra Nath Roy is considered, along with Gandhi, as one of the two most influential Indian political philosophers of the twentieth century. Roy was an Indian delegate to the fifth Comintern Congress in Moscow and member of the Presidium, July 1924. Disillusioned with the Soviet-dominated Communist Party, Roy embraced radical humanist philosophy and in 1948 founded the Radical Humanist Association. (Getty Images) a stream of books, pamphlets, and for many years, from 1922 to 1928, a journal, first named the Vanguard of Indian Independence and subsequently Advance Guard and Masses. He also sent communist emissaries to India, like Gopen Chakraborty and Nalini Gupta. On the other hand, he also tried to make contacts with the Indian National Congress, following the line developed by the Communist International. He wrote important books and pamphlets like One Year of Non-Cooperation, The Aftermath of Non-Cooperation, The Future of Indian Politics, and most important, in collaboration with another revolutionary nationalist turned communist, Abani Mukherjee, the study India in Transition (1922), the first attempt in the twentieth century, from a Marxist standpoint, to analyze the evolution of India under colonial rule.

Roy also played an important role in the Communist International. He became a candidate member to the Executive Committee of the Comintern at the Fourth Congress in 1922, becoming its full member and a candidate member to the Presidium at its Fifth Congress in 1924. In 1926 he was elected as a full member of the Presidium. He was one of the chief representatives of the Comintern to China, and stood, though quite ineffectually, to the left of Borodin. He sided with the Comintern leadership during its purge of left-wing oppositionists. Broadly speaking, at this point he was aligned with the Bukharinists, though then and later he had great respect for Stalin. In 1929, as a result of opposing the political line of the Sixth Congress of the Comintern (1928), Roy was expelled from the organization, while in Germany.

Roy returned to India in 1930, hiding under the pseudonym of Dr. Mahmud. In July 1931 he was arrested, tried in Kanpur on the charge of sedition, and sentenced to transportation for 12 years, subsequently reduced on appeal to six years' imprisonment. While in prison he wrote a massive manuscript provisionally entitled The Philosophical Consequence of Modern Science. Out of his prison writings emerged a number of books between 1937 and 1945, including Materialism, The Historical Role of Islam, Heresies of the Twentieth Century, Science and Philosophy, Science and Superstition, and The Philosophy of Fascism.

He also tried to organize his political followers, many of whom were to emerge as important trade unionists and left-wing political activists. He joined the Indian National Congress and was a recognized leader of a part of the left-wing currents. The Royists, along with the Congress Socialist Party, the Communist Party, and the supporters of Subhas Chandra Bose, joined forces in 1939 to elect Bose as Congress president in the teeth of opposition from Gandhi and the Congress right wing. Roy had hopes that Bose would invite him to join the Congress Working Committee, but the Congress right wing hit back. First, most members of the old Working Committee resigned, including Jawaharlal Nehru. Then, in the Tripuri, Govind Ballav Pant brought a resolution which affirmed Congress loyalty to Gandhian politics and told Bose to nominate his new Working Committee in accordance with the wishes of Gandhi. Gandhi challenged Bose to nominate a Working Committee of his own choice, but Bose backed down. While Bose was subsequently hounded out of the Congress, Roy and his supporters also left, and they formed the Radical Democratic Party in 1940. His differences with the Congress leadership were substantially over the issue of supporting Britain during the war. At the beginning of World War II he advocated collaboration with British imperialism in order to defeat fascism. Throughout the war he supported the Allied Powers with the argument that declining imperialism was a lesser evil compared to fascism. During the period 1940–6 he published a number of books, including INA and the August Revolution and the Draft Constitution of Free India. In 1946 he advocated elections to a constituent assembly on a non-party basis, and called for a federal constitution and guarantees for minority communities and regions. He also advocated significant decentralization of power.

In 1947–8 he revised his conceptions about Marxism formally. This involved writing a number of books, like The Russian Revolution, Beyond Marxism, and New Humanism. In 1948 he argued that what independent India needed was not another political party, but a social movement for humanism. He therefore disbanded the Radical Democratic Party (though one current continued, first as the Democratic Vanguard and then as the Workers' Party, a small Stalinist formation). Roy formed the Radical Humanist Association in 1948 and founded the Indian Renaissance Institute. He was also the editor of the quarterly journal Humanist Way. On January 24–25 (midnight), 1954 Roy died of a massive attack of coronary thrombosis. He was, along with Gandhi, one of the two most original and significant political thinkers of India in the twentieth century, but while Gandhi has been officially iconized, Roy has been a fairly marginal figure outside the circle of specialists, particularly of communism. Roy's study of medieval Islam as a progressive force, his strong arguments for secular rationalism, and his commitment to liberty, remain valuable in an era when in his own country, communalism, obscurantism, and attacks on civil liberties were on the rise.

SEE ALSO: Bose, Subhas Chandra (1897–1945); Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand (1869–1948); India, Nationalism, Extremist; Indian National Liberation; Internationals; Lenin, Vladimir Ilyich (1870–1924)

References and Suggested Readings

Haithcox, J. P. (1971) Communism and Nationalism in India: M. N. Roy and Comintern Policy 1920–1939. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

- Ray, S. (1998–2007) In Freedom's Quest: Life of M. N. Roy. 4 vols. Calcutta: Minerva Associates.
- Ray, S. (Ed.) (2000) Selected Works of M. N. Roy. 3 vols. New Delhi: Oxford University Press.
- Roy, M. N. (1964) M. N. Roy's Memoirs. New Delhi: Allied Publishers.
- Roy, M. N. & Spratt, P. (1946) New Orientation. Calcutta: Renaissance Publishers.
- Roy, S. (1970) The Restless Brahmin: Early Life of M. N. Roy. New Delhi: Allied Publishers.
- Roy, S. (1986) The Twice Born Heretic: M. N. Roy and the Comintern. Calcutta: Firma KLM Private.
- Roy, S. (1997) M. N. Roy: A Political Biography. New Delhi: Orient Longman.

Rumiñahui (d. 1535)

Viviana Uriona

Rumiñahui (in Kichwa language “stone face” or “stone eyes”) was an Inca military leader and one of the most important chieftains under Atahualpa (the last sovereign emperor of the Inca Empire). After Atahualpa's execution by the Spanish conquistadores, Rumiñahui put up resistance in the north of the Inca Empire. He was also involved in the fratricidal war between Atahualpa and Huascars on the side of Atahualpa (1527–32).

In the first half of 1532, Quizquiz, Caracuchima, and Rumiñahui pacified the Tahuantinsuyo (the Inca Empire) and moved to Cuzco. After Francisco Pizarro executed Atahualpa in Cajamarca on July 26, 1533, Rumiñahui withdrew to the north of the Inca Empire (today the Andean region of Ecuador) and organized resistance against the Spaniards. He tried, without success, to stop the advance of conquistador Sebastian Moyano de Benalcázar (also known as Belalcázar or Belaicázar) and his 200-man army, reinforced by the Cañari (the Indian people in the Ecuadorian province of Cañar) auxiliary forces residing in Quito.

Between 1534 and 1535 he undertook sporadic attacks on the now-Spanish Quito, which had been reestablished by Benalcázar. Benalcázar won an internal battle among Spaniards, namely between Benalcázar, Diego de Almagro, and Pedro de Alvarado, and had 800 soldiers under his command. This allowed him to divide the troops and facilitate the search for Rumiñahui.

Rumiñahui was finally arrested in mid-1535 and sentenced to death. Some references say that he was killed immediately, while others argue that he was tortured for a long time because the Spanish wanted to know where his people were hiding the treasures the Spaniards sought. What is certain is that he hampered the Spanish conquest considerably.

SEE ALSO: Agüeybaná I (d. 1510) and Agüeybaná II (d. 1511); Aracaré (d. 1542); Caonabo (d. 1496); Cuahtémoc (1502–1525); Hatuey (ca. 1400s–1512); Jumandi (d. 1578); Lautaro (d. 1557); Lempira (d. 1537); Sepé Tiarajú (1722/3–1756); Tisquesuza (d. 1537); Túpac Amaru (ca. 1540–1572)

References and Suggested Readings

- Chacón Izurieta, G. (2004) Rumiñahui. Ecuador: Comisión Nacional Permanente de Conmemoraciones Cívicas Editorial Pedro Jorge Vera.
- Hemming, J. (1970) The Conquest of the Incas. London: Pan.
- Miño, R. (1990) Rumiñahui, defensor de Quito. Quito: Confederación de Trabajadores del Ecuador.

Russell, Bertrand (1872–1970)

Stephen Heathorn

Bertrand Russell, distinguished British philosopher and public intellectual, devoted the greater part of his life to peace activism. Born into an aristocratic family, until 1914 Russell largely concerned himself with his academic career at Cambridge. However, his opposition to British entry into World War I, and then against the policy of conscription, cost him his academic career and pushed him into a life of protest. During the war he was twice prosecuted for sedition; the second offense earned him a six-month prison term.

By the end of the war Russell had embraced a libertarian form of socialism. Although he denounced the Bolsheviks after visiting the Soviet Union in 1920, his bohemian lifestyle and advanced views on science, education, and marriage made him popular with the progressive left and a gadfly to the establishment. He became the third Earl Russell in 1931, yet continued his attacks on conventional morality, militarism, nationalism, and unrestrained capitalism, which he regarded as significant threats to western civilization. Indeed, for most of his life Russell advocated for some form of world authority to take civilization-threatening weapons out of the hands of national governments. The advent of nuclear weapons only strengthened this belief.

Although never an absolute pacifist, in the 1930s Russell rejected armed opposition to the rise of fascism, a position he regretted and renounced in 1940. After World War II, Russell's prestige as a public intellectual was at its height, capped by winning the Noble Prize for Literature in 1950. However, Russell's peace activism was also reinvigorated by the escalation of the nuclear arms race. His 1954 radio broadcast, "Man's Peril," resounded with the emerging anti-nuclear movement, and he was thrust into its leadership. Russell was instrumental in arranging the anti-nuclear Russell–Einstein Manifesto in 1955 and the Pugwash Conference of Concerned Scientists in 1957. He became the first president of the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament in 1958, but subsequently formed the Committee of 100, which used the tactic of strict non-violent civil disobedience – mostly mass sit-down protests – to push forward the unilateralist "ban the bomb" cause. In 1961, in advance of one of these demonstrations, Russell was preemptively arrested and jailed for a month. He was 89. During the remainder of the 1960s Russell lent his name and pen to a large number of protest causes, most particularly against the Vietnam War through the International War Crimes Tribunal in 1967. He died three years later at age 97.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Nuclear Campaign, Britain; Anti-Vietnam War Movement, Britain

References and Suggested Readings

- Bone, A. (Ed.) (2003) The Collected Papers of Bertrand Russell, Vol. 28: Man's Peril, 1954–55. London: Routledge.
- Clark, R. (1975) The Life of Bertrand Russell. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.
- Monk, R. (2001) Bertrand Russell: The Ghost of Madness, 1921–1970. London: Vintage.
- Rempel, R. et al. (Eds.) (1995) The Collected Papers of Bertrand Russell, Vol. 15: Pacifism and Revolution, 1916–18. London: Routledge.
- Ryan, A. (1988) Bertrand Russell: A Political Life. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Russia, cholera riots of 1830–1831

Yury V. Bosin

The Russian cholera epidemic of 1829–31 was the cause of widespread popular unrest that developed in response to government checkpoints to prevent its spread and the perception that poor peasants and workers disproportionately suffered from the disease. Cholera reached Russia for the first time in September 1823 but soon ebbed due to the winter frosts. Six years later, in 1829, cholera reappeared in the southern cities of Astrakhan and Orenburg. According to official historic accounts, the disease was brought to Russia by Kyrghyz nomads. But in the fall of 1830 cholera spread even more extensively into the Russian heartland, reaching the edges of St. Petersburg, then Russia's capital. In response the government set up numerous quarantines, but it could not contain the epidemic. Subsequently the government set up checkpoints stopping merchant caravans, which in itself caused popular antagonism and disarray as the severity of the disease intensified among all social classes. Those who fell victim to the disease included upper classes, dukes, duchesses, generals, and the tsar's brother, Prince Konstantin. The death toll among the lower classes reached epidemic proportions, taking the lives of some 100,000 people.

Despair and popular resentment toward the government quarantine and checkpoint enforcement broke out into a vast popular protest. Once again, rumors that the aristocracy and upper classes were responsible for the plague set off insurrections, as those who were poorest were least able to ward off the disease. The rumor that doctors poisoned the wells sparked a wave of bloody riots throughout Russia, with large crowds sacking affluent households, smashing quarantines, and killing medical personnel.

The epidemic peaked in mid-1831 as about 600 people a day in the capital fell victim to the disease. Government offices, schools, businesses, and theaters were closed. Incited by the rumors that the disease was a result of deliberate contamination, insurgents destroyed ambulance carriages and sacked hospitals. On June 22, 1831, demonstrators in St. Petersburg gathered at the main cholera hospital located on Sennaya Square and went on to ransack the building, murdering several doctors. The arrival of two regiments with cannons halted the crowd's progress. Emperor Nicholas I personally addressed the insurgents and convinced them to leave, ending the riot considered by Alexander Pushkin as "senseless and merciless."

SEE ALSO: Bulavin's Rebellion, 1707–1708; Decembrists to the Rise of Russian Marxism; Moscow Fire and Protest, 1547; Pugachev's Rebellion, 1773–1775

References and Suggested Readings

- Bazilevich, K. V. (1936) Urban Uprisings in Moscow State in the 17th Century. Moscow and Leningrad (in Russian).
- Buganov, V. I. (1986) Moscow Chronicles: Popular Uprisings in the 11th–18th Centuries. Moscow (in Russian).
- Gessen, S. Y. (1932) Cholera Riots (1830–2). Moscow (in Russian).
- McGrew, R. E. (1965) Russia and the Cholera: 1823–1832. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.

Russia, Revolution of 1905–1907

David Mandel

The Revolution of 1905 was the first to occur in Europe since the Paris Commune of 1871, when the workers and other "little people" of the French capital rose up to establish a popular, grassroots democracy in that city. The Revolution of 1905, which came on the heels of three decades of rapid growth of the trade union and socialist movements in the industrialized world, opened what would turn out to be the most revolutionary century in the history of humanity. This is something rarely recalled today, when capitalism in its brutal, neoliberal form is once again triumphant across the world.

Lenin referred to the revolution that began in 1905 and was fully suppressed only in 1907 as the "dress rehearsal" for the revolutions of 1917. It was a period of intensely active political life that greatly accelerated the political education of all classes of society. Thanks to this concrete experience, they were able to shed the illusions they held about each other's interests and intentions and understand more clearly who were their real allies and enemies. Without 1905, there would not have been a socialist revolution in October 1917. The lack of this kind of revolutionary experience in the West was one of the reasons why the postwar labor upsurge there failed to realize its revolutionary potential. In Germany and Austria, in particular, the postwar revolutions did not go beyond capitalism.

On the Eve

In 1901 and 1902 student revolutionaries assassinated the ministers of education and the interior respectively, marking a revival of the student movement after the major strikes and demonstrations of 1899. In 1902 peasant disorders broke out anew in the central Volga region and in the Ukraine. Meanwhile, the workers' movement was also gaining momentum. In the summer of 1903 a strike wave of unprecedented proportions, in which social democratic committees played an active role, swept the southern part of the empire, provoking regional governors to call in an unparalleled number of troops – 160,000 in all. The strikers addressed both economic demands to their employers and political demands to the state. So great was the unrest, which also affected the national minorities, mostly the Poles and Finns, that by 1904–5 the greater part of the Russian empire was under some form of martial law.

It was in this turbulent context that war broke out between Russia and Japan in January 1904. Not long before that, V. von Plehve, the arch-reactionary minister of the interior, had suggested to the commander-in-chief of the armed forces that “in order to hold back the revolution, we need a small victorious war.” But when war became imminent, he apparently changed his mind. And rightly so. The disastrous military campaign, quite unexpected in that Russia was viewed in the world as a great white European power opposing a mere Asiatic upstart (a Russian slogan at the start of the war was “All we have to do is throw our hats at them”), only intensified the domestic crisis. For the defeats brought no change in the government's repressive, reactionary domestic course. As a result, even some liberals began to favor defeat in the war, hoping it would spur internal reform. As for von Plehve himself, he was killed by a Socialist Revolutionary (SR) bomb in mid-July 1904.

Von Plehve's assassination, which was greeted with semi-public rejoicing, caused a certain change of heart in the tsar, who appointed in his place the moderate aristocrat Svyatopolk-Mirsky. This opened a period of relative political liberalism, known as “the spring in the fall.” Among the measures introduced were a partial amnesty, abolition of corporal punishment, and cancellation of certain peasant dues. Meanwhile, while workers continued to demonstrate and strike and terrorists threw bombs, the urban liberals, mostly professional people, took a leaf from their French counterparts in 1848 and organized banquets, which they use as forums semi-publicly to express their opposition to the regime and call for democratic reform. The rural liberals, professionals, and members of the gentry involved in

This satirical depiction of Tsar Nicholas II lampoons the Russian leader's lack of understanding of domestic and international developments during his reign. As the Russian Revolution of 1905 unfolded, shaped by the events of the Russo-Japanese War and Bloody Sunday, Nicholas's reaction was to remain aloof, as expressed by this cartoon. (David King Collection) the zemstva, organs of local self-government, held a national conference in November 1904 that called for democratic freedoms but stopped short of demanding a democratic government. None of this, however, moved the tsar.

Bloody Sunday

The revolution was set off by the massacre of workers in St. Petersburg on Sunday January 9. Along with their spouses and children, workers marched 200,000 strong to the Winter Palace to present the tsar with a petition for economic and democratic reforms. At the head of the procession was a priest, Georgi Gapon, who had been involved in missionary work among the capital's workers when the police enlisted him, seeking to direct workers away from politics to a path of purely economic reform. In 1904, the authorities even allowed him to organize an Assembly of Factory Workers of St. Petersburg, a combination mutual aid society and trade union that established units in most of the larger plants.

But matters got out of hand when four members of the Assembly, workers at the giant Putilov Works (which employed 13,000 people), were fired and management refused Gapon's request to reinstate them. The priest then organized a strike which by January 3 shut down the entire plant. The strikers' initial demands, besides the reinstatement of their dismissed comrades, were economic, but they soon called for democracy too. The strike spread quickly to other factories, and by January 8, 111,000 workers in the capital had downed tools. Gapon then drew up a petition, an incongruous mixture of humble pleading to the "good tsar" led astray by his bad officials and radical social and democratic demands, but based on a sober portrayal of the workers' situation. Gapon informed the tsar of the impending march and of its peaceful intentions. But the tsar's only reply was to call troops into battle readiness and station them at key points around the city. On Sunday January 9, 1905, starting out from different districts of the city, the workers were cut down without warning by the sabers of Cossack cavalymen (an ethnic minority closely related to the Russians, Cossacks served as the tsar's political shock troops) and repeated infantry volleys. More than a thousand people were killed or wounded.

This single bloody act of repression dispelled any lingering legitimacy the tsar had still enjoyed among the workers and it alienated to varying degrees much of the rest of society. As Lenin remarked, "The revolutionary education of the proletariat made more progress in one day than it could have made in months and years of drab, humdrum, wretched existence." It was also from that moment that strong links between the workers and the socialist parties began to be forged.

From the capital the strike movement spread across the empire, drawing in workers from non-industrial sectors that had never taken collective action before. For more than two years, Russia would be rocked by strikes, demonstrations, pitched battles that opposed barricaded workers to the forces of order, peasant uprisings, military mutinies, student riots, and, of course, terrorist assassinations.

The tsar very reluctantly came to the conclusion that he could no longer avoid concessions. Yet what he proposed was exceedingly modest. He authorized the election of delegates from the factories to a commission to make proposals for improving the workers' situation. But most of the elected delegates turned out to be social democrats or workers leaning in that direction and they demanded freedom of speech and assembly and the release of the delegates who had already been arrested. When this was rejected, they boycotted the commission and called on the workers to continue the fight for the eight-hour workday, health insurance, democracy, and an end to the war. The next day, the government dissolved the commission, putting an end to the autocracy's only attempt to establish contact with the workers' movement. Later, in February, the tsar indicated some willingness to allow representatives of the people to participate in drafting laws, but nothing came of that either.

The peasants did not react immediately to Bloody Sunday, partly because of their isolation and partly because they were waiting to see just how much the government's repressive capacity had been weakened. But by the summer, almost 500 disturbances, mostly labor and rent strikes and illegal timber-cutting and cattle-pasturing, were recorded, along with some cases of arson. The pillaging of estates and seizure of land were yet to come. In July a recently formed Peasant Union held its national conference, attended by delegates from 22 provinces. It resolved that the land should be the common property of all the people and called for the election of a constituent assembly. This was the first time the peasants had ever acted as an organized political force on the national level.

The liberals also underwent radicalization. In May 1905, various professional and national groupings formed the Union of Unions, which now called for establishing democracy by any means, even terrorism. The rural liberals also shifted, calling now for a constituent assembly, though one that would share power with the tsar.

Even the industrialists, shaken by the regime's inability to contain the strike movement and to maintain civil order, became disillusioned with police repression as the answer and urged the government to seek conciliation with the workers in order to avoid a popular revolution. They called for a constitutional regime, but stopped short of demanding democratic government.

In response to this opposition from almost all quarters of society, the tsar issued a decree in August 1905 establishing a Duma, a consultative body to participate in the preparation of laws and to monitor the state's finances. It was to be elected by unequal suffrage and exclude people who owned neither house nor other property, in other words, the greater part of the urban and rural proletariat and even much of the intelligentsia. Moreover, the Duma could be summoned and dismissed on the sole decision of the tsar.

This very limited concession, which came as peace was being concluded with Japan (among other things, the end of the war freed new troops for domestic repression) and during a lull in the strike movement, had an impact on the mood of the industrial bourgeoisie, which showed signs of returning to its traditional support for the regime. It even caused some wavering among the liberals, who were divided over whether to reject the decree outright or to cooperate with the tsar with a view to extracting more concessions. At bottom, this wavering was rooted in a deep-seated fear of popular revolution, which would put too much political power in the hands of mobilized, victorious workers and peasants. To the extent that the industrialists desired political change, it was in order more effectively to maintain order, to protect their assets and profits, and to strengthen their own political influence. Although the liberals aspired to more radical reforms than the industrialists, they also shared fear of the "unbridled masses" and also sought to take power for themselves.

The October Manifesto and the "Days of Freedom": Deepening Class Divisions

But a month later, a new wave of labor protest swept Russia and seemed to reverse this incipient split within the ranks of the opposition. Indeed, the immediate effect of the new labor upsurge was more than ever to unite the politically active elements of society against the autocracy. But not for long.

On September 19, 1905, Moscow's printers went on strike. Police repression soon provoked other sectors of Moscow's working class to join. In St. Petersburg, the printers declared a sympathy strike and were joined by workers of a number of other industrial enterprises. Just as this strike wave seemed to be dying down, a railroad strike began on October 7 that soon paralyzed virtually all train traffic in the empire. From the railways, the strike movement spread to workers in all sectors of the economy, drawing in also students and professional people. Political, democratic demands were now in the forefront, economic concerns taking a second place. The strikers sought arms, built barricades, engaged in pitched battles with the forces of order. But the logical next step, which could only have been armed insurrection, did not happen.

The initial impact of this new popular upsurge was to further radicalize the liberals and the industrialists. The Kadet Party proclaimed its complete solidarity with the strikers at its founding congress held at that time. And the Union of Unions helped to organize participation of the intelligentsia in the strike movement. As for the industrialists, they opened their factories to the striking workers for meetings and they even continued to pay wages while the workers were on strike.

The scope and force of the movement paralyzed the regime. It had to choose between repression, whose outcome was uncertain and risked provoking a full-scale insurrection, or further concessions. The tsar very reluctantly chose the latter, and on October 17, 1905 he published a manifesto granting political freedoms, extending the franchise to groups previously excluded, and transforming the Duma from a consultative to a legislative body. His government also declared an amnesty, canceled the peasants' redemption dues, and liberalized the press laws.

These concessions, however, were merely tactical. The tsar was determined to retract them at the first opportunity. Almost simultaneously with the publication of the manifesto, the government instigated, organized, or otherwise tolerated a vast wave of anti-Jewish pogroms (riots), which were accompanied by the cry "Hit the Kikes: Save Russia!" The idea was to deflect popular dissatisfaction from the state onto a powerless minority. The pogroms, which usually began with a patriotic procession led by clergy and overseen by the police, resulted in the murder of several thousand people and the wounding of many thousands more in the cities and towns across the Pale of Settlement, the outskirts of the empire, to which the regime had restricted most Jews. At the time, the tsar wrote to his wife that "the impertinence of the socialists and revolutionaries has angered the people once more; and since nine-tenths of the trouble-makers are Jews, the people's anger turned against them." The pogroms were a signal to the most reactionary elements of society, which had remained relatively silent until then, to start organizing. In the fall of 1905, under semi-official patronage, they formed the Union of the Russian People, a proto-fascist organization.

But the regime was still in no position to mount a genuine counteroffensive. This standoff between the forces of revolution and reaction, which lasted into December 1905, produced what became known as the “Days of Freedom.” For the first time in the history of the modern Russian state, people could freely assemble, form organizations, and write and speak out publicly.

The new concessions reopened and deepened the divisions within the opposition forces. The workers were clearly not appeased, though their strike movement did somewhat abate temporarily. They still aimed at nothing short of full political liberties and a democratic republic based on universal and equal suffrage, the eight-hour day, and land reform for the peasants. The peasants, too, would not be satisfied with less than the free distribution of the landed estates. On the other hand, the concessions had an impact on the industrialists. A new Octobrist Party, with links to the industrial bourgeoisie, was founded in November on a platform that in essence was satisfied with the concessions granted by the October Manifesto. Many among the liberal gentry were now also disengaging themselves from the opposition, demanding firm action from the state against peasant violence. As for the Kadets, they still called for a democratic government, but to achieve it through the Duma, not by revolution. And they took their distance from the workers’ strike movement.

It was during this period that workers’ soviets (councils) first appeared. Their origins were in the strike committees elected in the factories. Since these were mass strikes embracing many enterprises, even entire towns and cities, the workers felt the need for broader coordination. They therefore elected deputies from their enterprises to city-wide soviets, usually on the ratio of one deputy per 500 workers. The most important soviet, which served as a model for the 40 to 50 other workers’ soviets, but also for soviets of peasant and soldiers’ deputies, was that of St. Petersburg. It met first on October 13, 1905, on the initiative of the Mensheviks, to prepare the general political strike.

But the soviets, which did not disband after the strikes had ended, were more than strike committees. Any workers’ organization that aspires to represent the entire class, as opposed to only a section of it (such as an individual enterprise, a single profession or industrial sector, or only unionized workers), is by its very nature political. Over the course of the history of the labor movement, general strikes have often given rise to representative bodies that act as alternatives to the official authorities, since the workers, once they withdraw their labor, take de facto control of the economy. It is the strike committee that gives authorization for the production and delivery of essential goods and services. In St. Petersburg, for example, the soviet ordered printers not to print newspapers that submitted their copy to the censors. It gave permission to an engraver to make a seal for the Union of Post and Telegraph Workers although the union was illegal. It intervened in labor disputes. Petitioners and plaintiffs of all sorts visited it daily. In many cities, worker and student militias under soviet supervision patrolled the streets to keep civil order. Both workers and the reactionary press referred to the St. Petersburg soviet as the “workers’ government.” Lenin, among others, saw in the soviets, to which he hoped the soldiers, peasants, and intelligentsia would eventually also send deputies, the future provisional revolutionary government.

In its highly democratic, if not much formalized, functioning, the soviets resembled the Paris Commune of 1871, whose deputies were subject to immediate recall by their electors. (In the Russian case, these were the general assembly of the different factories.) Deputies reported back often to their electorate, and in the heated political atmosphere of the period, the workers followed closely the soviet’s activities, quite often recalling deputies that no longer reflected their positions and electing others in their place. This ensured strong democratic control of the soviet, whose positions evolved closely with those of the workers.

And the workers’ revolutionary temper was approaching its apogee. Strikes were now overwhelmingly political; they spread quickly and tended to become general. They were often called in solidarity with other strikers or in support of groups who were being subjected to repression. Armed clashes with the authorities became increasingly frequent during strikes. Everywhere workers sought arms, both for self-defense and to prepare for the armed rising they judged inevitable.

The regime's retreat during the "Days of Freedom" also gave a further impulse to the peasant movement, which now turned to full-scale rebellion in south-central Russia, including looting and burning of manor houses – actions accompanied by the cry "the red rooster is crowing!" – and the expulsion or murder of landowners. In contrast to the last large-scale peasant revolt, the Pugachev Rebellion of 1773–5, this one was characterized by a significant degree of organization; it bore some elements of a political ideology; and it was directly linked to a revolutionary movement in the cities. The Second Congress of the Peasant Union in early November rejected the October Manifesto. The majority of delegates still opposed violent methods but continued to demand the immediate transfer of the estates without compensation to the communal property of the entire people, to be used only by those who worked it themselves. However, if this was not forthcoming, the Peasant Union declared that it would organize a general peasant strike that would be decided "by agreement with the working class." This situated the Peasant Union on the far left of the mostly liberal Union of Unions. Thus, while the liberals were taking their distance from the workers' movement, the Peasant Union was moving increasingly closer to the workers' soviets.

The "Days of Freedom" also saw a marked increase of agitation in the armed forces. On October 26, a mutiny broke in the island fortress of Kronstadt in the Gulf of Finland near St. Petersburg in response to the arrest of sailors for insubordination. It took two days for forces brought in from the outside to put it down. Mutinies also occurred at the Baltic naval bases of Sveaborg and Reval, in Sevastopol on the Black Sea, and Vladivostok on the Pacific coast. Although the navy was the most affected, unrest also grew in the army, which saw 26 mutinies in November alone.

Not far behind were the nationalist movements in the Caucasus, Poland, the three Baltic provinces, and Finland (in addition to, and sometimes combined with, militant worker and peasant movements). These demanded self-rule and, in some cases, outright independence. In Finland, the struggle assumed particularly violent forms, forcing the tsar to restore rights he had suppressed seven years before when he undertook his Russification campaign.

Shift in the Balance of Forces

The revolution seemed on the upswing. But despite the calls for insurrection, despite the efforts of the socialist parties and soviets to form armed units and the mutinies in the armed forces, the regime, in particular its repressive apparatus, though weakened, was still largely intact. And its leaders were busy planning a vicious counteroffensive. They were temporarily held back only by the strength of the popular movement and the related fear that repression would provoke an insurrection and the regime's overthrow.

The major shift in the political balance of forces in favor of the government occurred not as a result of an armed confrontation but as a consequence of action taken by St. Petersburg's industrial employers, who locked out their workers. Workers were naturally eager to translate their political victories into economic gains. In one of the capital's districts, the workers decided to enforce the eight-hour workday on their own without waiting for a law to be adopted. The eight-hour day had been a longstanding demand of the Russian and international labor movements and was considered an integral part of the democratic revolution by workers. Taking up this local initiative, the St. Petersburg soviet voted overwhelmingly on October 29 to call on all workers to follow the example. In response, some employers made partial concessions, but most resisted, some by docking pay, others by threatening to shut their plants. But their mood was uncertain, and their responses uncoordinated.

In the midst of this campaign on November 2, the soviet called a general strike to prevent the execution of the participants of the Kronstadt mutiny and the introduction of martial law in Poland. This was a magnificent display of worker solidarity, a measure of the workers' intense politicization and revolutionary spirit. Participation in the strike, which lasted five days, was massive, even stronger than after the massacre on Bloody Sunday. The government was forced to retreat on both issues. This was a significant victory for the revolutionary forces, but one of their last.

The employers were very alarmed by the eight-hour campaign. Unlike the strikes of October–November that had been directed against the autocracy, this action was aimed at their profits and managerial prerogatives and – who knew?

– maybe ultimately at their property. For who could predict, they asked themselves, where this increasingly radical workers' movement would take the country? On the other hand, the industrialists were quite satisfied with the concessions granted by the October Manifesto, which gave them increased political influence while leaving the tsar's repressive capacity intact to deal with the "unbridled masses," if they got out of hand.

And so on the heels of the November general strike, the St. Petersburg industrialists organized a general lockout of the workers which they conducted in close coordination with the government, which was the first to close the state-owned factories, showing the way to the private sector. Tens of thousands of workers were thrown into the street without any means of livelihood. This was a major blow to the morale in the capital, especially since the workers were unable to find a response to this challenge. To open the plants on their own would have been tantamount to a socialist revolution, something that was far from their practical thinking at that time. And even if they did open the plants, lacking the support of a revolutionary state, they would not be able to keep them functioning for long. At a dramatic meeting of the soviet on November 12 lasting four hours, a majority of the deputies reluctantly voted for a "temporary" retreat.

But the lessons were not lost on the workers. One of them was that insurrection and state power were ultimately the only answer. But an even more important lesson for the longer term was that in the struggle for democracy, they would find the bourgeoisie on the other side of the barricades.

Meanwhile, the government, sensing the time ripe, shifted its repressive apparatus into high gear. Its initial thrust was directed against the rural rebellion, since repression against scattered peasant villages posed the least risk. "Pacification" campaigns by military units, led by generals with quasi-dictatorial powers, were unleashed against the six main provinces of the peasant uprising. Moving from village to village, they meted out summary, public, and often brutal punishment, meeting only occasional resistance. But the most savage expeditions took place in the Baltic provinces, where the rebellion against the landlords, aristocrats of German origin, had been extremely intense. Here alone, more than 2,000 peasants were executed. (This helps to explain why the Lettish sharpshooters became the most stalwart unit of the future Red Army during the Civil War of 1918–21.) By the beginning of 1906, the government had gained the upper hand in the countryside.

In the cities, however, it had to proceed in a more cautious, probing manner. Increasingly, the police dispersed meetings in an effort to demoralize the workers. On November 14, they arrested the leading members of the Peasant Union in Moscow. On November 25, in the midst of their national strike, the leadership of the Congress of Post and Telegraph employees was taken. The next day it was the turn of the chairman of the St. Petersburg soviet.

The soviet's immediate response was only to declare that preparations for armed insurrection were continuing. Then on December 2, in conjunction with an initiative by the Peasant Union, it declared "financial war" against government, calling on the population to stop paying taxes, to refuse to accept paper money and to demand gold for all but minor transactions, and to withdraw deposits from government banks. This move, which eventually did hurt the near bankrupt government, immediately prompted the arrest en masse of the soviet on December 3, some 250 people in all, including most of its executive. The members of the executive still at large, supported by the representatives of the socialist parties in the soviet, called for a nationwide political strike to begin on December 8.

At this point the initiative shifted to Moscow, where the mood was firmer. Moscow's workers had not experienced the massacre of January 9 or the lockout of November. Another difference was that St. Petersburg had an enormous garrison, with loyal elite guard regiments as its backbone. Therefore, the mood in St. Petersburg was more cautious – the workers wanted to see if the rest of the country would join an insurrection before acting themselves. But the Moscow soviet decided to begin the strike on December 7 and to do everything to transform it into an armed rising. The strike in St. Petersburg began the next day but was far less unanimous even among the factory workers. It began to collapse after the 12th.

In Moscow, by contrast, the strike enjoyed the support of virtually the entire society and did transform itself into an insurrection. Barricades appeared, and by the third day, bloody clashes erupted between armed workers and the army, which brought into action machine guns and artillery. By December 14, loyal troops, despite their superior numbers, were refusing to fight an enemy that seemed constantly to escape their grasp. Their commander, Admiral Dubasov, appealed desperately to St. Petersburg for reinforcements, and the next day the Semyonovsky guards regiment arrived – the capital’s workers had been unable to cut the railway line, which had been occupied by troops. With hope of a quick victory gone, revolutionary morale in Moscow weakened. But the working-class district of Presnya, submitted to merciless, unceasing artillery, fought on until January 17.

The insurrection in Moscow had lasted nine days. The revolutionaries probably counted no more than a few thousand armed fighters, but they enjoyed the support of the rest of the workers, the intelligentsia, and the petty bourgeoisie. Armed resistance continued elsewhere for days, sometimes weeks. In the Siberian towns of Chita and Krasnoyarsk, the workers’ and soldiers’ soviets actually took power and held out for many weeks.

With the uprising broken, punitive expeditions took over. Trotsky, second chairman of the St. Petersburg soviet, cited figures to the effect that the government killed over 14,000 people between January 9, 1905 and April 17, 1906 (the opening of the first State Duma), wounded more than 20,000 (many of whom later died), and arrested, exiled, and imprisoned 70,000. These figures, however, were a gross underestimate. As the St. Petersburg soviet had stated in its “Financial Manifesto,” the government was acting toward its people as a conqueror in a foreign land.

Everywhere workers were disarmed, soviet deputies and strike leaders arrested, local administrations purged of revolutionary sympathizers, newspapers closed, revolutionary meetings and outdoor assemblies of any kind banned. In this repressive activity, the authorities enjoyed the active support of employers, who hit the capital’s workers with a second concerted lockout in December. Many factories did not reopen for weeks, and when they did the “troublemakers,” the most active, committed workers, were not rehired.

The Triumph of Reaction

The December rising was not the last word of the revolution, neither in the cities nor in the countryside. In the capital, for example, workers thrown onto the streets by the lockouts organized a Soviet of the Unemployed, to which employed workers in the factories made monetary contributions and also sent delegates. This was another impressive manifestation of worker initiative and solidarity, all the more so as it was opposed by the socialist parties (though Lenin personally supported it), who feared the soviet would become the target of new arrests of the workers’ leaders. But this new soviet so frightened the municipal government that it allocated large sums for public works, some of which the soviet used to support strikes. It also provided cover for illegal party activities.

But though the revolutionary flame flickered on into 1907 and occasionally flared up, the forces of revolution never regained the initiative, and the balance of power continued to shift against them. The number of strikers in 1906 was only a third of that of 1905, and in 1907 it was less than a sixth. The decline of strike activity was only partially the result of intensified repression. A recession set in in 1906, and accompanying unemployment and economic insecurity also undermined workers’ willingness to take strike action.

When the laws were finally published, the new State Duma that had been announced by the October Manifesto turned out to be a legislative body with limited powers and still under the supreme authority of the tsar. Suffrage had been extended, but 90,000 workers still had the same representation as 2,000 landowners, that is, one deputy for each group. The electoral law, and indeed the entire political system, served to reinforce class consciousness among workers. For in tsarist Russia one was not a citizen with formal political rights equal to those of all other citizens but rather a member of a class-based estate with separately defined rights and limitations.

The opening of the first State Duma on April 27, 1906 again revealed the rift that separated the workers, who met the event with indifference, from the liberal elements of society, who were jubilant. The capital’s workers even refused the employers’ offer to pay wages for the day off. On May 1, too, when working-class St. Petersburg went on strike and some of the more liberal employers again offered to pay wages, the workers refused. By this remarkable display of class dignity and independence they announced that they desired no bourgeois participation in their holiday of international solidarity. As historian N. Mikhailov noted in his Soviet bezrabortnykh (Soviet of the Unemployed, 1998), “the two political holidays celebrated by the Petersburg opposition, liberals and workers, with an interval of only three days between them, clearly demonstrated that the abyss separating people into two hostile camps, both opposed to autocracy but not together, was so deep that even their celebrations could not find common ground.”

The composition of the first Duma, despite the gross underrepresentation of workers and peasants and its boycott on the part of the socialist parties, proved no comfort to the tsar. Of 497 deputies, only 45 belonged to the right, and 340 were patently of the opposition (though overwhelmingly non-revolutionary), including 180 Kadets, the largest party. The others were mainly peasants who adhered to no party but often voted with the opposition. Already in mid-May, the government decided to dissolve the Duma, awaiting only a suitable occasion. This arose over the land question: while the Duma discussed the forced alienation of private lands, the government would hear nothing of it. The Duma's dissolution on July 9, 1906 provoked no visible popular reaction.

The successful dissolution of the Duma, the suppression of a series of naval mutinies in the Baltic area and of an attempted strike in St. Petersburg, opened the way for a more thoroughgoing policy of repression under the leadership of the prime minister, Petr Stolypin, a man already infamous for his cruelty in putting down the peasant movement in the Volga region. New legislation provided for summary courts martial of civilians in any region under martial law with no possibility of appeal and with immediate execution of sentence. Between August 1906 and April 1907, field courts martial executed more than a thousand people. But ordinary courts martial were also active, executing 2,319 people between 1905 and 1908. This bloody repression was met by a rise in revolutionary terror, one of whose victims was the hated Stolypin himself. The first attempt was made at his residence in August 1906 and failed, forcing him to move into the tsar's Winter Palace for security. He was finally killed at the opera in 1911, which the tsar and his daughters were also attending.

Despite government interference in the elections, the political composition of the second Duma that convened in February 1907 was even more radical than the first. Having abandoned their boycott, the socialist and allied parties now formed the largest group of deputies with 200 (65 social democrats, each one of which had experienced arrest, prison, or exile; 37 SRs; and 98 unattached peasants and intellectuals of the more moderate Trudovik faction). The right wing was also stronger now, growing from 32 in the first Duma to 94. Meanwhile, the liberal center, the Kadets, had shrunk from 184 to 99. Lenin remarked on this deepening political polarization that the most reactionary electoral law in the most backward country of Europe had yielded the most revolutionary popular representative body.

The tsar dissolved this Duma, too, on June 3, 1907. This was a veritable coup d'état, as it was followed by a radical revision of the electoral law that skewed representation in the third Duma, convened on November 1, 1907, even more in favor of the propertied classes. The revolution was over.

Drawing Lessons from the Defeat

The various classes and parties all drew their own, quite different, conclusions from the revolutionary experience. The nobility situated itself firmly in the camp of reaction, its liberal wing now seriously weakened. The industrialists, too, were again closely allied with the regime. And the liberal opposition definitively abandoned its flirtation with revolution. In the dark period of reaction that followed the revolution, most of the liberal intelligentsia retreated into private concerns.

Similar processes were at work among the socialist intelligentsia. In his study of the SR Party, The Sickle under the Hammer (1963), Oliver Radkey observes “a metamorphosis of . . . the populist intelligentsia from insurrectionists in 1905 to jaded democrats in the period between the revolutions and then to . . . devotees of the cult of the state in the coming war. They clung to the old SR label even though the faith was gone, aside from the residue of interest in political liberation.” Menshevik observers also note a wholesale withdrawal from politics and social concerns among the radical intelligentsia, which recoiled from the underground struggle. Bolshevik workers complained of the shortage of intellectual support. The retreating radical students and professionals were gradually replaced, though not entirely, with “worker-intellectuals,” people with calloused hands, a developed intellect, and continuous ties with the workers.

Within the revolutionary parties, the social democrats in particular drew conclusions from the defeat. (Theory was never a particular concern of the populists.) Three distinct positions emerged. The central issue was revolutionary strategy and, specifically, what combination of social forces would make the revolution when the opportunity next arose. It was only now that the issues separating the Bolsheviks and the Mensheviks, still officially fractions of a single party, became clear.

As noted earlier, both currents assumed that the coming revolution in Russia could only be liberal democratic. Indeed, not only would the revolution leave capitalist property relations intact, but by sweeping away the vestiges of feudalism it would open the way for the full development of capitalism. Russia had to pass through this stage before the conditions for socialism would be ripe, since socialism in a poor, overwhelmingly peasant country was impossible, according to the Marxist analysis. What divided the two currents was rather the role that the liberals, representing at least the progressive wing of the bourgeoisie, if not the entire class, would play in the democratic revolution.

As far as the Bolsheviks were concerned, the experience of 1905–7 had not only confirmed the fundamentally reactionary nature of the bourgeoisie. They considered its tiny liberal wing of no political significance. Moreover, the revolution had shown that the liberals themselves feared revolution to such an extent that, if it threatened again, they would seek accommodation with the autocracy. The Bolsheviks, therefore, called for an alliance of workers and peasants, a “revolutionary dictatorship of the peasantry and working class,” to carry through the revolution, even against the opposition of the bourgeoisie and the liberals.

The Mensheviks, for their part, felt that the leadership role of the liberals, as representing the bourgeoisie, was essential to the success of the democratic revolution. It would fail, as it had in 1905, if the bourgeoisie turned against it. The revolution needed the support and participation of at least the progressive part of the bourgeoisie. And Mensheviks believed that the liberal elements of the bourgeoisie and the intelligentsia, despite their wavering, could be nudged along the path of revolution. As for the peasants, with whom the Bolsheviks proposed a revolutionary alliance, the Mensheviks did not believe them capable of becoming a conscious, organized, revolutionary force. They could serve as a kind of revolutionary battering ram against the autocracy if led by another class. But that class could not be the workers, as the Bolsheviks proposed. For if a workers’ party found itself at the head of a revolutionary government, it would be driven by its supporters to take radical, collectivist measures that would prove utopian in the context of Russia’s backwardness. Socialist measures would alienate not only the bourgeoisie but also the peasants, who wanted land reform but were wedded to the free market and private enterprise. Politically isolated, the workers would be crushed along with the revolution. It was, therefore, imperative that the revolution bring the liberals to power, as the representatives of the progressive bourgeoisie. But for that to happen, the workers had to “show tact,” as Menshevik theorist Georgi Plekhanov put it. They had to restrain their economic demands so as not to frighten the bourgeoisie into the arms of reaction.

There was also a third position that differed from both the Mensheviks and Bolsheviks. It argued that the coming revolution, to be victorious, could not remain within a capitalist-democratic framework but would have to transform itself into a socialist revolution, overthrowing the bourgeoisie and private enterprise along with the tsar. These “maximalist” views (from the “maximum” or long-term program of the socialist parties) were especially prevalent among certain sections of the SR Party, which were not encumbered by the Marxist analysis according to which political institutions, to be viable, had to correspond at least roughly to the existing level of socioeconomic development. But Bolshevik and even Menshevik party members were not immune to “maximalist” views either, despite their parties’ official position.

These views were given a boost by the lockouts of the end of 1905, when the industrialists, followed shortly by the liberal intelligentsia, turned against the revolution. During a discussion in the summer of 1906, a Bolshevik worker shocked the assembled social democratic intellectuals when he asked: “Are we really going to shed our blood two times – once for the victory of the bourgeois revolution and another for the victory of our workers’ socialist revolution? No, comrades, whatever the party program says, if we are going to shed our blood, it will be at once for freedom and for socialism.”

But it was Trotsky, a social democrat who belonged to neither fraction, who provided the analysis to support this position. Building on the insights of A. Parvus, a Russian-born member of the German Social Democratic Party, Trotsky found major contradictions in the analyses of both the Bolsheviks and Mensheviks. He fully agreed with the Bolsheviks' assessment of the liberals: they would not be allies but adversaries in the revolution. But he considered the Bolsheviks' alternative of a "revolutionary dictatorship of workers and peasants" equally unrealistic. In this, he agreed with the Mensheviks: the peasants were incapable of becoming an independent, organized political force on the national stage; they could be a revolutionary force but only when led by another class. History, and not least the history of Russia, had amply demonstrated the political limits of the peasants as a class. And so, revolutionary leadership would necessarily fall to the working class, which in 1905–7 had shown what it was capable of as the most powerful, determined, and cohesive democratic force, whose radicalism had been able to draw the peasantry behind it.

But the problem was – and here Trotsky again agreed with the Mensheviks – that a workers' party at the head of a revolutionary government would be forced to take measures that undermined capitalism. He cited, as an example, the struggle for the eight-hour day, a social reform that workers considered part and parcel of the democratic revolution. What if the industrialists reacted, as they had in November and December 1905, with a lockout? Mobilized by the revolution and holding political power in their hands, the workers would certainly not stand by idly, as they had in 1905, if locked out. They would open the factories and force their government to support them. And since it was workers who were opening the factories, they would naturally run them on a collective basis. The same thing would happen if the economy went into recession, throwing masses of workers onto the street. Once again, the workers would force their government to open the closed factories and run them collectively.

In sum, the democratic revolution in Russia could win only under the political leadership of the working class, but a democratic revolution under working-class leadership would necessarily go beyond the limits of the private enterprise system, transforming itself into a socialist revolution. However, as all Marxists, Trotsky recognized that Russia lacked the conditions for socialism. He argued that even before the government's socialist measures stumbled over the technical backwardness of Russia, the revolutionary regime would come up against insurmountable political obstacles. For the peasants, having already obtained the land they coveted, would not support the workers in collectivization measures. They would turn against them. Once the workers' government was thus isolated, it would either be crushed from the inside by the forces of domestic counterrevolution, supported by the peasants, or from the outside by the intervention of the capitalist powers, who would perceive the revolution as a mortal threat.

According to this analysis, the revolution in Russia seemed doomed. But that was only if the analysis remained confined to Russia itself. If, however, it was extended to the international level, the situation appeared differently. By the end of the nineteenth century, capitalism had become a highly integrated, interdependent world system, one, moreover, that was racked by explosive contradictions. The most serious was the intense imperialist competition among the great industrial powers. But war was merely one of the more probable scenarios that could unleash pent-up revolutionary forces in the West. There were others. Indeed, the very example of revolution in Russia could spark revolutionary conflagrations abroad, especially in the countries of Central Europe that, like Russia, were still dominated by semi-feudal monarchies.

This is how Trotsky saw the way out of Russia's dilemma – in the support of revolutions in more developed capitalist countries. These would come to the aid of the Russian revolution, enabling a workers' government to find an accommodation with the peasantry and quickly to overcome Russia's economic backwardness. In his pamphlet Results and Prospects (1906), Trotsky concludes: "Left to its own resources, the working class of Russia will inevitably be crushed by the counter-revolution the moment the peasantry turns its back on it. It will have no alternative but to link the fate of its political rule, and, hence, the fate of the whole Russian revolution, with the fate of the socialist revolution in Europe. It will cast onto the scales of the class struggle of the entire capitalist world the colossal state-political power given it by the temporary conjuncture of circumstances in the Russian bourgeois [liberal democratic] revolution. With state power in its hands, with counterrevolution behind it and European reaction in front of it, it will send forth to its comrades the world over the old rallying cry, which this time will be a call for the last attack: 'Workers of all lands, unite!'

As a revolutionary Marxist, Trotsky was by nature optimistic. Subsequent history was not as kind to the Russian revolution as Trotsky had hoped. Nevertheless, his analysis captured with remarkable insight the underlying dynamic of the future revolution and, indeed, of the international class struggle at the end of World War I, a struggle in which the Russian revolution would indeed play a central role.

SEE ALSO: Bakunin, Mikhail Alexandrovich (1814–1876); Bolsheviks; Decembrists to the Rise of Russian Marxism; Kropotkin, Peter (1842–1921); Lenin, Vladimir Ilyich (1870–1924); Marxism; Paris Commune, 1871; Plekhanov, Georgi (1856–1918); Pugachev's Rebellion, 1773–1775; Russia, Revolution of February/March 1917; Russia, Revolution of October/November 1917; Russia, Revolutions: Sources and Contexts; Russian Civil War, 1918–1924; Russian Revolutionary Labor Upsurge, 1912–1914; Soviet Union, Fall of; Trotsky, Leon (1879–1940); War Communism and the Rise of the Soviet Union

References and Suggested Readings

- Kochan, L. (1978) Russia in Revolution, 1890–1918. London: Grenada.
- Harcave, S. (1970) The Russian Revolution of 1905. London: Collier Macmillan.
- Radkey, O. H. (1963) The Sickle under the Hammer: The Russian Socialist Revolutionaries in the Early Months of Soviet Rule. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Smele, J. & Haywood, A. (Eds.) (2005) The Russian Revolution of 1905: Centenary Perspectives. New York: Routledge.
- Treadgold, D. (1955) Lenin and His Rivals. New York: Praeger.
- Trotsky, L. (1970) The Permanent Revolution and Results and Prospects. New York: Pathfinder Press.
- Trotsky, L. (1981) 1905. New York: Vintage.

Russia, Revolution of February/March 1917

David Mandel

The February Revolution overthrew the absolute monarchy of Tsar Nicolas I. (The Julian calendar then used in Russia was 13 days behind the Gregorian calendar used in most other countries. By the Gregorian calendar, which the Soviet government later adopted on January 31, 1918, the revolution occurred in March. All dates here follow the Julian calendar.) It was followed only eight months later by another revolution that led to the overthrow of capitalism.

Both revolutions of 1917 had deep roots in the history and social and political structures of Russia. But they must also be understood in the context of World War I (1914–18). Whatever the immediate cause of this war, the most horrible mass slaughter in history until that time, it was the logical outcome of a quarter-century of intense military buildup and imperialist rivalry on the part of the major capitalist powers, pursuing a combination of goals that included territorial aggrandizement and colonial conquest, acquisition and defense of spheres of influence, control of sources of raw materials and markets, and geopolitical advantage.

The Second International founded in 1889 and which included the major socialist and workers' parties of Europe had been very much aware of the danger. A resolution adopted unanimously by its congress in 1907, to the accompaniment of lengthy, tumultuous, and repeated applause, ended with the following paragraph: "If a war threatens to break out, it is the duty of the working classes and their parliamentary representatives in the countries involved . . . to exert every effort in order to prevent the outbreak of war by the means they consider most effective. . . . In case war should break out anywhere, it is their duty to intervene in favor of its speedy termination, and with all their powers to utilize the economic and political crisis created by the war to rouse the masses and thereby hasten the downfall of capitalist rule." This paragraph had been proposed as an amendment by Rosa Luxemburg, Lenin, and Julius Martov, three left social democrats who had all participated in the Revolution of 1905–7. They, therefore, had first-hand knowledge of the role that war could play as a catalyst to revolution.

Among the tsar's advisors, opinion was divided, however, as to the impact a war would have on the internal situation. In an interview in 1912, General Krivoshein, minister of agriculture, told a journalist that certain people were telling the tsar that war would bring revolution, a view he rejected: "On the contrary, it is peace at any price that, in my opinion, can bring on revolution." And while the moderate right in the Duma favored the alliance with France and Britain (the Triple Entente) against Germany and Austro-Hungary (the Central Powers), P. Durnovo, the minister of the interior who had overseen the bloody repression of the 1905 Revolution, was opposed to a war. He argued, with some foresight, that no matter who won, "there must inevitably break out in the defeated country a social revolution, which, by the very nature of things, will spread to the country of the victory." This view was also shared by the extreme right in the Duma, which, in addition to fearing the internal consequences of a war, did not like the idea of Russia fighting alongside liberal democracies and against semi-feudal monarchies like itself.

Be that as it may, the tsar was finally won over to war, and not least by the argument that the internal political situation dictated it. As two of his grand dukes explained to him, "Russia, if it did not mobilize, would face the greatest dangers, and peace bought with cowardice would unleash revolution at home."

At first, the war did have a calming effect on the internal situation. The mobilization, the severe repression, the threat of losing one's military deferral and being sent to the front, put an abrupt halt to the workers' agitation. But the upsurge of patriotic feeling that swept the propertied classes, the intelligentsia, and to some extent the peasantry, had little effect on workers, for whom there seemed little difference between the Russian autocracy and a regime of foreign occupation. In at least one case, 17,000 textile workers in the central industrial region who were already on strike when the war began stayed out until mid-September despite the intensified repression.

Russia along with Italy and Serbia were the only warring countries in which the socialist deputies in parliament did not vote to jettison their previous internationalist commitments and vote for war credits in the name of "national defense." From his exile in Zurich, Lenin's first reaction was to think that the newspaper reports of these betrayals were forgeries, a plot by the bourgeois press to disorient Europe's workers.

The other deputies in Russia's Duma, unlike the socialists, unanimously proclaimed their readiness "at the summons of their sovereign, to stand up in defense of their country, its honor and its possessions." Only a small group of socialist "defensists," including Georgi Plekhanov, one of the founders of Russian social democracy, and the anarchist patriarch Prince Kropotkin supported the war.

Resurgent Worker Protest

It did not take long – a matter of months – for government mismanagement, bureaucratic confusion, corruption (Rasputin's influence over government affairs was at its height), and military incompetence to revive active opposition to the regime. By February 1917, there was not a single group of any significance in Russian society that was prepared to come to the defense of the autocracy. And it fell like an overripe fruit with a minimum of violence.

Besides the regime's weaknesses, Russia entered the war with serious economic and geographical handicaps. Its relative industrial backwardness meant that its economy could not fully equip its army on its own. For example, domestic industry could supply only one in three rifles needed. But the empire was easily blockaded by German control of the Baltic and by Turkey's closing access to the Black Sea through the Dardanelles. Only ports on the Arctic and the Pacific Oceans remained available, but their use contributed to overloading an already inadequate rail system. Along with manpower shortages due to conscription, this put an increasingly heavy strain on Russia's industrial capacity. Agriculture, too, suffered, since peasants could not obtain common tools and fertilizers. As a result, the army was seriously underequipped, and in the later stages of the war the cities suffered increasingly from food shortages, aggravated by the flood of refugees from the western provinces fallen under German occupation.

By the end of 1914, 6.5 million men were under arms, and by the time of the October Revolution in 1917, 15 million had been called up. Of these, between 7.2 and 8.5 million, 45–55 percent, were killed, reported missing (both categories amounted to 2.3 million men), or wounded. Even from a purely military point of view, this unspeakable slaughter was in vain, since despite some local victories, the major campaigns were catastrophic failures. But these defeats were not the sole responsibility of Russia's military command, since Russia's strategy was subordinated to that of its western allies: major Russian offenses were undertaken to take pressure off the Allied forces on the western fronts, with little consideration given to Russia's real capacity. However, the Russian government did not have much choice, in view of its heavy financial and material dependence on the allies.

Despite the sacrifices that the war demanded from society, especially from the laboring classes, the government displayed no willingness to reach an accommodation with it. While governments in England, France, and even Germany made concessions to their labor movements and gave at least token recognition to the workers' sacrifices in return for the collaboration of their leaders in the war effort, Russia's autocracy merely stepped up the repression, which was directed first of all against the Bolsheviks, who were calling the workers to transform the imperialist war into a civil war. At the end of 1914, the five Bolshevik Duma deputies were sentenced to Siberian exile for anti-war agitation. So efficient was police repression that worker activists could count on no more than a few months of underground activity before being arrested. Meetings were banned, trade unions and the labor press suspended, strikes outlawed, movement from one factory to another restricted.

Meanwhile, material conditions continued to deteriorate, martial law was extended to most large factories, overtime was unlimited, and laws protecting female and child labor were abrogated. Freed of all restraint and enjoying the state's active backing, management responded to workers' complaints with the very real threat of sending them to the front, jail, or Siberia. This intensified repression was only partially counterbalanced by the shortage of labor – the industrial workforce of Petrograd (the capital's name was Russified from the too German-sounding "St. Petersburg") swelled by almost 60 percent between 1914 and 1917 – a factor that favored worker militancy. As the war dragged on and inflation rose, real wages declined. From 1916, long lines in front of bakeries and food shops became a usual sight.

Unlike preceding years, 1915 witnessed no demonstrations or strikes on the anniversary of Bloody Sunday 1905 or on May 1. But strike activity resumed in the spring and summer of 1915, mostly to press economic demands. In the town of Ivanovo-Voznesensk, 33,500 textile workers went on strike in May for economic demands and to win liberation of two workers who had been arrested. (This town would experience two more general strikes here before the February Revolution.) In June, the workers of the linen mills of nearby Kostroma went out on an economic strike that ended in barricades and pitched battles with the police. Several dozen workers were killed or wounded. Thirty thousand workers in the capital struck to protest the massacre, demanding at the same time the release of the exiled Bolshevik Duma deputies, freedom of the press, and withdrawal of the Cossacks from their factories. Political unrest was further sparked by the premature closing of the Duma in September and by arrests among workers of the Putilov factory. If, in the first year of the war, less than a third of the worker-days lost in the capital were in political strikes, in the second year, a full half of the 596,000 days lost were in political stoppages. In Russia as a whole, only 170,000 working days were lost in the first six months of the war. But in 1915, that number increased tenfold. In 1916, it reached 4.7 million.

The anniversary of Bloody Sunday drew 100,000 strikers in Petrograd in 1916 and 145,000 in 1917. In February 1916, the Putilov factory workers struck for economic demands but soon added the "three whales" of the social democratic minimum program: a democratic republic, land reform, and the eight-hour day. Over 100,000 others struck in solidarity with them. In the fall of 1916, 120,000 struck to protest the court martial of Baltic sailors, accused of belonging to an underground Bolshevik organization. Locked out, the workers responded with yet another strike.

Liberal Opposition: Parallel but Opposed to the Opposition "from Below"

Growing labor unrest, the government's inability successfully to prosecute the war, and the tsar's extreme reluctance to tolerate any independent organization of society to aid in the war effort (he relented on this as the military situation deteriorated) could not help but revive opposition among the liberal intelligentsia and the propertied classes. In mid-1915, the opposition parties in the Duma formed a Progressive Bloc that rallied a majority of the deputies, including the Kadets, Octobrists, and the moderate Nationalists (the right), behind the demand for a ministry "enjoying confidence of the public." While this bloc firmly supported the war, it called for measures of political liberalization to gain popular support, including certain collective rights for national minorities, political amnesty, equal rights for peasants, trade union rights, and a labor press for the workers.

The demand for a "government of public confidence" was a far cry from the liberals' program in 1905, when they called for a government responsible to an elected parliament. This was an indication of how far the Kadets had shifted to the right in the meantime. In practice, the Progressive Bloc did not go much farther than purely verbal opposition to the regime. It was paralyzed by fear of harming the war effort and, even more, by fear of revolution. Its members knew that a serious struggle for power on their part would inevitably draw in the masses, and the last thing the liberals, let alone the elements more to the right, wanted was a popular revolution.

In September 1915, not only did the bloc passively acquiesce to closure of the Duma, but Moscow's mayor, himself a Kadet, denounced the workers who struck to protest the tsar's action. D. Sazonov, the minister of foreign affairs, took full measure of the liberals' pusillanimity when he told his fellow ministers that if the Kadets were offered a loophole, they would be the first to reconcile themselves with the government. "Milyukov [leader of the Kadets] is the greatest bourgeois of them all and fears a social revolution more than anything else. Yes, and the majority of Kadets are trembling for their investments."

Some liberals who were more to the left than Milyukov, including some industrialists, reproached the Kadet leadership its fear of the popular democratic forces. They opposed the liberal alliance with the Duma right in the Progressive Bloc and argued for an alliance to the left, with the Mensheviks and Trudoviks (moderate populists). But they were a small minority among the liberals and even a smaller one within the business class. Milyukov accused them of playing with fire when they suggested taking the anti-government struggle outside of the Duma and into the streets. Right-wing Kadet V. Maklakov summed up the liberals' dilemma in a famous article entitled "A Tragic Situation." He compared Russia to a car moving along a mountain road. The driver was incompetent, endangering the passengers and the car itself. But the passengers who knew how to drive could not decide to seize the wheel from him for fear that the car would plunge into the abyss in the course of the struggle. The abyss, of course, was the popular revolution.

Socialist Positions

One of the goals that the Progressive Bloc did achieve was the creation in the summer of 1915 of a special council of national defense, which included representatives of the government, of the Duma, and of trade and industry. At a lower level, the Congress of Representatives of Trade and Industry created war industry committees, and liberal industrialists convinced the tsar to let the workers elect their representatives to "workers' groups" that would be attached to these committees. These elections, which proceeded in two stages, offered workers their only legal opportunity since the start of the war to discuss publicly the government's domestic and foreign policies.

The Bolsheviks and the left Socialist Revolutionaries (SRs) opposed worker participation in the committees, since it would mean support for the government and the war. But they nevertheless decided to take part in the first stage of the elections in order to exploit the legal opportunity for anti-war and revolutionary agitation. The Menshevik-Internationalists (the left majority of the Menshevik Party that opposed the war) favored participation in the committees, but only to use them as tools for organizing the anti-government forces and improving the workers' conditions. Finally, the Menshevik-defensists, who recognized the imperialist character of the war, nevertheless supported the defense effort while at the same time calling for the overthrow of the autocracy, which they viewed as the main obstacle to successful defense.

The first stage of the elections in Petrograd gave the Bolsheviks a majority of 90 out of 171, a significant indicator of the strength of the workers' hostility to the regime and the war, since to vote for the Bolsheviks meant giving up the unique opportunity for at least some form of legal worker organization. The debates at the meeting of the workers' electors brought out the political differences between the Mensheviks and the Bolsheviks. As always, they revolved around their respective evaluation of the liberals and the bourgeoisie.

A Menshevik-defensist worker from the Petrograd Pipe Factory defended participation in the committees with the following arguments: “We disagree with our opponents in their evaluation of the active forces: they put all their faith in their own forces for the revolution; we strive to rally all those strata of Russian society that are able to aspire to democratization of the public order and that want to fight. . . . Our opponents say that we betray the cause of the revolution and they say so chiefly because of our evaluation of the bourgeoisie. Our bourgeoisie cannot reconcile itself to the rule of autocracy and it strives for power, but it does so in a slavish and cowardly manner. We shall criticize and push it towards a decisive battle with the obsolete regime. In the final battle [for socialism], we must depend on our own forces. But in the struggle for political freedom, we must proceed in contact with the bourgeoisie.”

To this a Bolshevik worker replied: “The Military-Industry Committees are an institution of the liberal bourgeoisie – so say our opponents. We can march arm-in-arm with them. It follows that Guchkov [an industrialist, leader of the Octobrists in the Duma and chairman of the Central War Industry Committee] will march arm-in-arm with us against the contemporary Stolypins, this same Guchkov, who together with the deceased Stolypin, hanged our comrades. . . . Female and child labor is now being widely used. Who sought the abrogation of the miserable rights of women and children? The aristocracy? No, it was the Guchkovs, Konovalovs and Ryabushinskiis [liberal businessmen]. The factory owners pressed the buttons, and the workers’ rights were suppressed. . . . Where are our comrades from the Lessner, Phoenix and other factories? They were sent by messieurs the liberal factory owners to the front and to the jails. This is the honored company, with whose help you want to organize the working class. Our opponents say we rely on our own forces, while they desire to struggle in concert with all revolutionary forces. Fine. Where, then, did you seek allies? Did you go to the peasantry? . . . No, you went to the Military-Industry Committee and acted in the backyard of a bourgeois organization. This is where you seek allies for yourselves, in the organization of the bosses, who organized lockouts before the war and who are now stuffing their pockets on war orders.”

According to the noted diarist N. Sukhanov in his Russian Revolution 1917: A Personal Record (1984), the “[Workers’] Group [of the War Industry Committee] enjoyed no popularity among the worker masses. The overwhelming majority of the conscious proletariat of the capital and also in the provinces took a staunchly anti-defensist position and were strongly opposed to the cooperation of the small group of Social Democrats with the plutocracy.”

Not even those right-wing Mensheviks who favored collaboration with the bourgeoisie in the war effort could deny the antagonistic interests that opposed the workers to that bourgeoisie. In a letter to the workers of Petrograd two months before the February Revolution, the leaders of the Workers’ Group wrote: “The propertied classes have always feared the people, but now, having lost faith in their own forces, they are turning to the popular movement and especially to action by the working class. Of course, they would like this intervention to take place on their own terms, for their own interests – to obtain the most for themselves and to give as little democracy as possible to the workers. But the working class is conscious enough not to let that happen. The bourgeoisie wants political reform, a liberal regime; we will secure our goal of the maximum democratization of the country. The bourgeoisie wants a government responsible to the Duma; we – a provisional government based not on the Duma but on the organized people. The bourgeoisie will try to maintain the current forms of cruel exploitation; the working class will demand a series of social reforms that will facilitate their struggle against exploitation and exploiters. The bourgeoisie wants to give freedom to its annexationist appetites; the proletariat and democracy [i.e., the peasants and socialist intelligentsia] will protest decisively against all military coercion and strive for a peace acceptable to the workers of all countries.”

Lenin Changes His Mind about the Revolution

All the main socialist currents in Russia were still thinking in terms of a liberal democratic revolution, one that would not threaten capitalism. But the war prompted Lenin to move closer to Trotsky’s “maximalist” position. Lenin now argued that the revolution, despite Russia’s backwardness, would be socialist, not merely liberal democratic. Along with other Marxists, he argued that armed imperialist rivalry was the inevitable expression of capitalism at its contemporary (he felt it was the “highest”) stage, marked by the concentration of enterprises into monopolistic trusts. National boundaries had become too narrow for these huge capitalist associations, which now roamed the earth in search of new profitable fields of investment, sources of raw materials, and markets. In these efforts, they were supported by their respective states. The problem was that different countries developed at different paces. By the time countries like Germany and Japan had finally industrialized and become economic powers toward the end of the nineteenth century, they found the world was already divided into spheres of influence among the existing empires, like France and Britain, which had developed earlier. This called for a new division of the world that would reflect the current relative strength of the different powers. But such a new division could be achieved only by force of arms.

The current war was, therefore, an imperialist war, a war of pillage and enslavement, on the part of all the belligerent states, and it did not matter who started it. All the participants were equally guilty. They had all long been preparing for war and were pursuing imperialist goals. None of them could claim legitimate defense. Hence the Bolshevik slogan: “Transform the imperialist war [among nations] into a civil war [between classes].” War and imperialism could only be stopped by revolutionary means, by the overthrow of capitalism. And this included Russia, too, despite its economic backwardness.

This is where Lenin linked up with Trotsky. He argued that the war was creating a revolutionary situation – that is, a situation in which revolution was becoming an objective possibility, if not an inevitability. He offered what is considered a classic definition of a revolutionary situation: when the ruling classes find they can no longer dominate society with the old form of government; and when the subordinate classes, subjected to unusual levels of oppression and suffering, become active and refuse to tolerate the old forms of domination. The two crises, the one of the elites and the other of the masses, must occur simultaneously to make revolution possible. And the imperialist war was creating such a situation in all the warring countries. The generalized revolutionary crisis meant that a socialist revolution in Russia would be able to count on the economic and political support of more developed socialist states.

Lenin further argued that because Russia was backward, because it was still ruled by a semifeudal monarchy, it was the “weakest link” in the imperialist chain, the place where it could mostly easily be broken. Russian society had accumulated more explosive, revolutionary material than the more advanced countries. The outbreak of revolution would therefore be easier in Russia, which could begin and provide the spark for the others, the example of how to end the imperialist horror. But Russia would be able to consolidate her revolution, to bring it to fruition, only with the support of socialist revolutions in the West. In Lenin’s estimation this was a realistic scenario, and, in any case, the only way to avoid new mass slaughters.

The slogan “transform the imperialist war into a civil war!” was adopted by the entire Bolshevik Party. But Lenin’s idea of a socialist revolution in Russia, which he developed in exile in the course of 1915, was not widely known in Russia. No doubt some workers and even some intellectuals, in both the Bolshevik and left SR parties, had been thinking independently along such “maximalist” lines, even as far back as 1906. But theirs was now a minority position, largely unspoken even among the Bolsheviks. Trotsky himself (also in exile) belonged to a small independent social democratic fraction that stood aloof from both the Mensheviks and Bolsheviks until after the February Revolution, when his group merged with the Bolsheviks.

The Insurrection

In January 1917, Lenin ended a lecture to young workers in Zurich on the Revolution of 1905 with the prediction that the coming year in Europe, because of the war, would see uprisings led by the working class against the power of capital. These upheavals, he said, could not end otherwise than with the expropriation of the bourgeoisie, the victory of socialism. He added, however, that “we of the older generation may not live to see the decisive battles of this coming revolution.” This last sentence is often cited as evidence that Lenin did not foresee revolution in Russia. In fact, anyone with even limited political awareness understood that revolution was not far off, though no one seems to have expected it to break out specifically at the end of February. In January 1917, the Bolsheviks’ Petersburg Committee, taking note of the massive participation in the strike to mark Bloody Sunday – between 200,000 and 300,000 by various estimates, the biggest strike of the war – reported that “the mood in the factories is very buoyant and politicized; this opens up broad revolutionary possibilities.” In the six months preceding the February Revolution, over a million worker-days were lost to strikes in the capital, three-quarters of these political. In Russia as a whole, 676,000 workers took part in strikes in the two months preceding the revolution. But the Petersburg Bolshevik organization, decimated by repression, was thinking more in terms of a May 1 strike to trigger the revolution.

The peasants, in contrast to the workers, were still largely calm. The scarcity of labor had created advantageous terms for renting additional land from the big owners and the military mobilization had removed much of the surplus labor from the countryside. The rising price of food put more money in the pockets of those peasants able to produce a surplus, though there were fewer and fewer manufactured goods that they could buy with this money.

On the other hand, the sons of the peasants, the most literate and socially active part of the peasantry who formed the great mass of the army, were showing disquieting signs in the winter of 1916–17. The minister of the interior reported receiving “horrrifying” reports of troop morale. Generals reported that new reserves reaching the front at the end of the summer of 1916 “were, from the point of view of morale, far worse than all their predecessors,” that their minds had been “poisoned by propaganda.” Nevertheless, discipline was still generally good; there were few cases of refusal to obey orders. The revolution would not start from the army, where a failed mutiny in wartime meant the firing squad.

Meanwhile, among the propertied classes, disaffection from the regime was also reaching its height. The British military commander Sir Henry Wilson, who visited Petrograd in early February, found that “everyone – officers, merchants, ladies – talked openly of the necessity of doing away with them [the emperor and the empress].” Russian General Krymov told a meeting of Duma deputies that the army would welcome “the news of a coup d’état.” Milyukov openly denounced the government in November 1916 from the tribune of the Duma. Still, the Octobrists and the Kadets continued to insist on legal, parliamentary means of struggle. Only the left fringe of the liberals, the Progressives, called for “action on the part of society.” But they did not know what action. The only really concrete political action was undertaken, in fact, by members of the royal family who assassinated Rasputin, the news of whose death caused great jubilation in polite society. (Legend has it that Rasputin had to be poisoned, shot four times, and then drowned in the icy Neva River before finally expiring.)

It was again the workers who led. The general strike that resulted in the overthrow of autocracy grew out of two distinct actions. On February 17, one of the shops of the Putilov factory struck for higher wages and to obtain the return of dismissed activists. They were soon joined by workers of other shops, and when the administration locked the strikers out on February 22, the entire 36,000-person workforce declared a strike. They elected a strike committee and dispatched delegations to the other factories to solicit support. One worker who spoke to Alexander Kerensky, a Trudovik Duma deputy, suggested that this could be the beginning of a big political offensive. But no one guessed quite just how big.

The other action was undertaken by women textile workers to mark International Women’s Day (March 8 by the Julian calendar), which fell on February 23. None of the socialist parties had planned action for that day, but the women were in militant mood, angered by the high prices, the long lines in front of the food shops, and the recent disappearance of bread from several bakeries. In a series of textile mills of the Vyborg district, a center of machine building which had become the radical heart of the labor movement during the upsurge in 1912–14, the women held meetings and decided to strike. They then gathered in the streets outside the neighboring metalworking factories. “On the morning of February 23,” recalled a worker of one of those factories, “you could hear women’s voices in the lane: ‘Down with the war! Down with the high prices! Down with hunger! Bread for the workers!’ Several workers ran to the window. When the women saw them, they began to wave and shout: ‘Come out! Stop work!’ Snowballs flew through the window. We decided to join. . . . We held a brief meeting outside the main office near the gates, and then we poured into the street. . . . The women grabbed the comrades who were in front by the arm, shouting ‘Hurray!’ And we set off with them down Bol'shoi Sampsion'evskii Prospekt [the main local thoroughfare].”

That day the strikers concentrated their efforts on drawing in the rest of the working class. On their way, they disabled trams and attacked isolated policemen. Their ultimate goal was Nevskii Prospekt, the main avenue running down the center of the city, location of the government institutions and well-to-do dwellings. To reach it from the surrounding industrial districts the workers had to cross the river, and as usual during such “disturbances,” the authorities raised the bridges to stop them. But it was February, and the Neva River was frozen. That day 87,500 struck.

On the morning of February 24, the workers appeared at work as usual but after brief meetings again downed tools and took to the streets. The strikers now numbered 200,000. Anti-war and anti-government slogans began to take predominance over yesterday's calls for bread. Some of the army units and Cossacks – the 170,000-man garrison had recently been reinforced with new, supposedly reliable troops and police – behaved in a friendly manner to the strikers.

On February 25 the strike became general. The police were on the run, moving only in groups. White-collar workers, members of the intelligentsia, and artisans joined the strike, creating an atmosphere of general sympathy that spurred on the workers, who had by now taken over Nevskii Prospekt, shouting anti-war slogans and demanding a democratic republic and the eight-hour day. It was on that day that the workers became convinced that this was a revolution and that it would be victorious. Their sense of certainty soon infected the garrison, helping the soldiers to make the perilous decision to mutiny. Although they still hesitated, patrolling army units in several districts did not bother the crowds and in some cases they prevented the police from taking action against them. But the shooting and the casualties that did occur did not deter the workers. They scattered only to regroup at once.

February 26 fell on Sunday. That day sacking and burning of police stations began (a primary goal was to destroy archives containing information on activists). Isolated cases of mutiny occurred in the garrison. February 27 marked the revolution's victory. Virtually the entire working class was in the streets. From the morning, crowds of workers went to the barracks to persuade the soldiers to join them. By the afternoon, the mutiny was a mass phenomenon. The rest of the day was spent destroying police stations and liberating political prisoners. That night the tsar abdicated. From the capital, the revolution traveled by telegraph to the rest of Russia. In the industrial centers, the workers, upon receiving the news, went on strike and, on their own or together with representatives of propertied classes, bloodlessly pushed aside the tsarist authorities. The peasants, too, easily dislodged the local representatives of the autocracy and the local self-governments dominated by the big landowners.

Dual Power

On February 26, the day the military mutinies began, the tsar dissolved the Duma. That is how he responded to pleading by the Duma's chairman to form a “government of public confidence.” After some hesitation, the majority of the Duma decided to meet anyway, but only in “private session,” since the tsar had dissolved the Duma and even at this late date they were still reluctant to defy the autocrat. They made one last effort to persuade the tsar's brother, Michael, to impose a military dictatorship and to demand the tsar appoint a responsible ministry. But when that too failed, they were left with no choice: either they tried to take power themselves or else they would be swept aside by the popular revolution. Even so, Milyukov admitted that he would have much preferred to receive power “not from below, but from above.” To this end, the leaders of the non-socialist parties of the Duma formed a Provisional Committee of the State Duma.

Meanwhile in another section of the same building, the Tauride Palace, the two Menshevik deputies who had not been arrested met with the Menshevik leaders of the “workers' groups” of the War Industry Committee (who had just been freed from arrest) and several independent social democratic intellectuals. This group took the initiative in forming a Provisional Executive Committee of the Soviet, inviting the workers and soldiers to elect delegates to form a soviet. (As early as February 25 workers in some factories had already discussed the creation of a soviet.) The norm was one delegate for every 1,000 workers and one from factories with fewer than 1,000, and one delegate per military company, regardless of size, a rule that resulted in strong overrepresentation of the soldiers.

A similar model was followed in the rest of Russia, reaching eventually down to the villages. Deputies were everywhere chosen by direct election, mostly at places of work or in the military units, and they were subject to immediate recall. And recall occurred frequently as the situation and attitudes evolved. Until the First All-Russian Conference of Soviets at the beginning of April elected a Central Executive Committee, the Petrograd soviet served as the supreme authority of all worker and soldier soviets.

On the night of February 28–March 1, the soviet's Provisional Executive, speaking for the workers and soldiers (the latter being overwhelmingly peasants in uniform), and the Duma Committee, speaking for the propertied classes, agreed on the formation of a provisional government consisting exclusively of liberal Duma deputies. The Duma Committee, for its part, accepted the socialists' conditions: full political freedoms, political amnesty, immediate measures for the convocation of a constituent assembly, a people's militia to replace the police, and no victimization of troops that had mutinied. On March 2, the Petrograd soviet met in full session and resolved by a vote of 400 to 19 to support the provisional government. However, it qualified its support with the condition that the government faithfully carry out the soviet's program. And to make sure of that, it set up a "monitoring committee" to keep an eye on the government.

That committee was not the idea of the moderate socialists of the soviet leadership. The formula of conditional support for the provisional government, that is, to support it "inasmuch" as it respected the soviet's program, was proposed from "below" and reflected the workers' mistrust of the liberals. Indeed, even now Milyukov, through the tsar's brother, was making a last-ditch attempt to save the monarchy. The soviet, however, would hear nothing of it. On the whole, however, Milyukov was quite surprised and gratified by the soviet's accommodating position on power. After all, the soviet could have formed the government itself.

Milyukov should not have been so satisfied. For what had been created was "dual power," an inherently unstable political arrangement. Real power, control of the means of violence, was in the hands of the soviet, since the soldiers' loyalty went to it alone, not to the provisional government. And the soviet's "Order Number 1," issued on March 1, freed soldiers from political control by their officers, thus greatly reducing the danger that the army might be used against the popular classes. That order instructed soldiers to elect committees from their ranks to control all arms, which should under no circumstances be given to the officers. In all non-military, political actions, the soldiers were to be guided only by the soviet and by their own elected committees. Off duty, soldiers enjoyed all civil rights, and officers were to address them at all times in the polite second-person plural.

Milyukov, of course, knew that the liberals did not enjoy support among the popular classes. That is why he tried to persuade members of the soviet's executive committee to participate in the provisional government. They, however, refused, fearing they would be compromised. Failing that, Milyukov insisted that they at least obtain a public expression of support for the government from the soviet. This, as we have seen, they did, though that support was conditional.

If, in the eyes of the workers and soldiers, the role of the provisional government was merely to carry out the will of their soviet, why did they agree to the formation of a liberal provisional government in the first place, rather than have the soviet itself form the government? This is even more surprising on the workers' part, when one recalls their recent bitter experience with the industrialists' close collaboration with the autocracy against them. Before the revolution the workers had rejected the Menshevik strategy of a worker alliance with the liberals, lending their support to the Bolsheviks.

Several factors explain popular support for the dual power arrangement in February. For one thing, soldiers, not workers, predominated in the Petrograd and in most other soviets. In addition, there were many newcomers to industry among the workers, people drawn to the factories by the wartime expansion. (In the capital, the industrial working class had grown from 242,000 to 385,000. The total industrial working class of Russia in 1917 was 3.6 million.) The newcomers had limited experience or understanding of political struggle. And finally, the Bolsheviks, the party that rejected any alliance with the liberals, had been more hurt by the repression than the Mensheviks and SRs, many of whom, especially among the intelligentsia, now resumed political activity.

But, in fact, all those factors are of secondary importance in explaining popular support for dual power. For even most of the Bolshevik deputies in the Petrograd soviet, who were few in early March, voted together with the majority to give conditional support to the provisional government. The Bolshevik Petersburg Committee was only slightly more guarded in its support for the government. Its resolution called "not to oppose" (rather than to support) the provisional government "inasmuch."

The main reason for the support for dual power was that the February Revolution appeared to have vindicated the Menshevik strategy: the bourgeoisie had after all been pushed by the workers into supporting the democratic revolution. As Alexander Shlyapnikov, a Petrograd metalworker and member of the Bolshevik Central Committee, observed, "What had begun as a proletarian movement had taken on an all-national character." This was shown not only by the adherence, however reluctant, to the revolution of the Duma parties but also by the genuine sympathy that members of "respectable society," who were sporting red ribbons in their lapels and on their hats, showed for the workers and soldiers in the streets. As the left SR paper noted, "the events of February made people forget what only a few days earlier had been their irreconcilable differences with the landowners and capitalists. It seems like all were united."

The victory over the autocracy, achieved with relatively little bloodshed, had an intoxicating effect on workers that can hardly be exaggerated. This was the holiday of the oppressed and the exploited, which had finally risen up, thrown off their chains, and wrested power from the centuries-old autocracy. People who had always been the object of the will of others now suddenly wielded power themselves, having taken their collective destiny into their own hands. It was a time to celebrate the incredible victory, the new, free life that was opening. No one wanted to think that terrible struggles still lay ahead.

Yet, that is what the soviet's direct assumption of state power would have meant: it would have pushed into the camp of the counterrevolution the bourgeoisie and its supporters, including most of the educated elements of society, those who knew how to run the economy and the state machinery. Could workers run the country without them? This was a frightening prospect for people who had spent all their lives on the receiving end of orders from management and state officials. Besides, Petrograd was not all of Russia. One had to consider the provinces and the army: would they follow the capital's workers?

In the euphoric atmosphere of the victorious revolution, workers did not want to contemplate these dangers, especially since there seemed no need to, as the bourgeoisie, perhaps unwillingly, but all the same, had rallied to the democratic revolution. There was no reason to disturb this new national unity, especially since the soviet held real power and was monitoring the provisional government to make sure it did not deviate from the program of the revolution.

These attitudes were shared by workers in most of Russia. Everywhere they elected soviets, but nowhere did the soviets try to take power. In Moscow and in much of the provinces, the soviets willingly participated in "committees of public organizations" that assumed power and were dominated by representatives of the bourgeoisie. This was true even in the Ivanovo-Voznesensk area, long a Bolshevik stronghold. There was apparently some opposition to that position, as there was in Petrograd, but it was minor. The paper of the Kostroma soviet wrote in early March that "In a number of places, including Kostroma, protests are heard against participation in those organizations that have taken power with representatives of the zemstva [nobility-dominated rural self-government] and the city [government, dominated by the bourgeoisie]. . . . If we push them away, they will go against us. Maybe that is not so frightening, but all the same it will cause severe complications in the struggle for our ideals. We need to use our time not for struggle but for organization. There will be enough struggle in the future."

The principal exception to this view was the Vyborg district of the capital, where workers' meetings expressed extreme hostility to the Duma Committee and called on the soviet to declare itself the provisional revolutionary government. The Bolshevik organization of the Vyborg district (500–600 members in March) was the only one in Petrograd to adopt that stand. The Petersburg Committee had to ban the distribution of the Vyborg district's leaflet calling for a soviet government. It is possible that some workers outside the Vyborg district also supported that position but that they refrained from expressing it in view of the almost unanimous popular support for dual power. No one apparently knew that Lenin, still in his Swiss exile, shared the position of the Vyborg workers. Within six months, practically the entire Russian working class would be won over to that position.

The peasants, no less than the workers and most of the rest of society, welcomed the February Revolution. A Duma report on the provinces noted that the “widespread conviction that the Russian muzhik [peasant] is attached to the tsar, cannot live without the tsar, was clearly refuted by the unanimous joy, the sigh of relief, with which they learned that they will henceforth be living without the one without whom they [supposedly] could not live.” But, for the most part, the villages remained calm in the first weeks. Only a small number of districts reported disorders, mostly small incidents.

However, the peasants wasted no time in replacing the old organs of rural self-government, dominated by the nobility with elected peasant committees, which they sometimes called soviets, but more often simply “provisional executive committees.” The provisional government and all the parties, with the exception of the Bolsheviks, opposed the class (that is, exclusively peasant) composition of these committees. (In this, the peasant committees resembled the urban soviets, which were also class organizations – the propertied classes were not represented in them.) But the peasants ignored that and in many places tried to exclude even wealthy peasant farmers, the kulaks (Russian for “fist” – farmers who used hired labor) and other peasants who had left the communes to take private possession of their land.

The peasants made no move as yet to expropriate the large estates. But the committees were soon forcing the big landowners to rent land to the poor and middle peasants – though not the kulaks – on advantageous terms. They often took measures to prevent the big landowners from working their land, for example, by forcing away their hired laborers and requisitioning their inventory. The land would then be handed over to the peasants to work under the pretext that the landowners had not sown in time.

All this was opposed by the provisional government, which insisted that nothing could be changed until a constituent assembly adopted a land reform. Meanwhile, the provisional government was in no rush to call elections to that assembly. One of the reasons was that it knew that peasants’ deputies would form the majority and would vote for the peasants’ version of land reform. On this there could be no doubt: all the district and regional peasant congresses in the weeks and months following the February Revolution called for expropriation without compensation of state, church, and noble lands. Most of the congresses even included in the list of land to be expropriated that owned by the kulaks.

The Revolution in the Factories

The workers, like the peasants, were also not willing to wait for a constituent assembly to legislate changes in their relations with management. These included the eight-hour day (without loss of pay), a decent wage “as befits free citizens,” and the right to elect delegates to represent them collectively in the factories and to limit managerial despotism. All of these changes were seen by the workers as integral parts of the democratic revolution. None of them were intended to threaten, or, in fact, did threaten, private property and the capitalist system. Whatever workers thought of the bourgeoisie, even in the Vyborg district, they saw the February Revolution as “bourgeois democratic.” The ultimate goal was socialism, but that was for a more or less distant future.

On March 5, the Petrograd soviet discussed the question of terminating the general strike that had begun on February 25. The debate was very heated. The soviet’s chairman, N. Chkheidze, a Menshevik, spoke for an immediate return to work, promising that the soviet would begin work immediately on improving the workers’ economic situation once production resumed. But worker deputies argued that they could not call their comrades to end the strike without having won the eight-hour day and better work conditions. The soldiers, on the other hand, were worried about war production and supported Chkheidze. The vote was 1,170 to 30 to resume work on March 7, but the soviet committed itself to present economic demands at once to the employers.

This decision proved very unpopular among the capital’s workers. For one thing, they protested against its undemocratic character, since there had been no preliminary discussion. The workers’ idea of democracy was based upon them giving their deputies obligatory (imperative) mandates on all major issues. This conception of democracy contrasted with the more or less blank check that representatives in liberal democracies typically enjoy. But apart from the way it was taken, the decision itself was unacceptable. One of the soviet's spokesmen who was sent to explain the decision to workers recalled: "I felt in my heart that we could not do this: the workers cannot win freedom and not use it to ease the burdens of their labor, to fight capital." Of 111 factories reporting to the Petrograd Society of Factory Owners, only 28 had resumed work on March 7, and those workers explained that they were doing so only out of consideration for the soldiers and the need to maintain unity among the popular revolutionary forces. Most of the other factories resumed work soon after, but only once the workers had introduced the eight-hour day on their own without waiting for the soviet to reach an agreement with the owners or for the government to legislate: they simply stopped working after eight hours.

It will be recalled that when the capital's workers had tried to do this in the fall of 1905, the employers responded with a lockout that dealt a severe blow to the revolution. Now, however, the correlation of class forces was such that the employers could not even contemplate such a move out of fear of provoking the workers. And so, on March 10, the soviet and the Petrograd Society of Factory Owners reached an agreement on the eight-hour day without loss of pay (effectively an hourly pay raise of 20–8 percent). Overtime (at double pay) in certain sectors was allowed with the consent of the workers' elected committees. However, a week later at a meeting with the employers, Minister of Trade and Industry A. Konovalov, a left liberal and a big industrialist, agreed with the assembled businessmen that the measure was only a temporary concession that would be rescinded at the first opportunity.

Outside of the capital, employers' opposition was often more vigorous. In Moscow, for example, the employers' organization flatly rejected the eight-hour day. However, most gave in after the Moscow soviet, reacting to struggles already occurring in the factories, finally called on the workers on March 18 not to wait for an agreement but to end work on their own after eight hours. In the provinces, similar scenarios played themselves out into April. The workers in small factories and workshops, where the correlation of forces is always more strongly in the owners' favor, were less successful. Those workers needed a law, but the provisional government, attentive to the interests of the employers, refused to legislate the eight-hour day.

Having won freedom, the workers were naturally determined to use it to obtain better wages. Even before the war wages had been meager and they had since been further eroded by inflation. Returning to work, the workers immediately presented wage demands. On March 20, a delegate from the Putilov factory, whose economic strike a month earlier had triggered the events leading to the revolution, told the soviet: "Now that we workers have awoken from our sleep of toil, we demand a just wage and put forth our demands, while the entrepreneurs cry: 'Help, they're robbing us!' Comrades, I am sure you don't share their horror." Appeals from the moderate socialists for restraint had little impact. Wages had been held back by the combined repressive efforts of the employers and the tsarist police; the workers had made the revolution; it was now up to the employers to show good faith, especially since they had been making huge profits from the war. On the matter of wages, too, the employers had no choice but to yield, although the workers found that the increases were soon eaten by inflation.

Having been forced to make these concessions, the owners counterattacked indirectly through the non-socialist ("bourgeois") press, which in mid-March began a concerted campaign against the workers, accusing them of pursuing narrow, egoistical interests at the expense of the war effort. The "honeymoon" period of national unity had indeed been short-lived! The aim of the press campaign was to exert pressure on the workers through the soldiers, who were naturally concerned about military supplies. But the workers easily saw what was at stake: "The enemies of democracy spread discord among us, since they fear the united strength of the workers and soldiers in the soviet," declared one factory meeting. And they took measures to reassure the soldiers, inviting delegations from the garrisons and from the front to visit their factories and see for themselves that they were prepared to work as much as was needed and that their wages were not excessive.

In reality, productivity rose in many factories in the weeks following the revolution. Where it declined, it was due to supply problems, since the transport system was overburdened. N. Kutler, a leading industrialist and Kadet, even noted a certain "enthusiasm for work" following the revolution. In the end the press campaign backfired on the employers, reinforcing solidarity between workers and soldiers against the propertied classes. By the middle of April, the press dropped the campaign.

The workers' conception of the democratic revolution also included the right to elected representation in the factories. Russian management style under the autocracy had been especially arbitrary, despotic, and degrading. In addition, management had worked hand in glove with the tsarist police to repress union and party activists. It will be recalled that the 1912 convention of the St. Petersburg Society of Factory Owners specifically rejected elected representation of the workers in the enterprises. Now they had to yield on this too, however reluctantly. Their March 10 agreement with the soviet provided for elected factory committees whose function was to represent workers in relations with management as well as with government and public organizations.

In most cases, this merely formalized what the workers had already done of their own accord to end "autocracy in the factories," as one of their resolutions put it. In many cases, the first thing they did, even before resuming work, was to throw out the most tyrannical of the managerial staff, sometimes riding them out of the gates in wheelbarrows with sacks over their heads, a mark of disgrace. They also elected factory committees to which they entrusted the task of "overseeing the internal life of the enterprise," which included matters such as the length of the workday, the system of pay, hiring and firing, resolution of conflicts, enterprise security, and work discipline, which included abolition of the hated system of fines.

The workers thus gained a significant amount of power but not more than trade unions have wielded at different times in other capitalist countries. The workers' intention was to correct the worst abuses of the past, not to run the factories. And they did not in practice interfere with the administration's right to run the technical and economic dimensions of production.

Only in some state-owned enterprises did the workers go further and claim the right to manage. This was often a reaction to the disappearance during the revolution of the higher managerial personnel who were army officers. But these workers soon gave up these claims and retreated to mere monitoring of the administration, declaring that workers' management of the factories was for socialism sometime in the future.

But even if the workers were not thinking in terms of self-management and socialism, there were already signs of how things might develop. Workers had not forgotten that lockouts had been a favorite weapon of the employers. The older workers and the more politically aware youth knew of the mass lockouts of November and December 1905 in St. Petersburg. As early as March 1917, the minister of industry observed that workers in Petrograd "suspect management of holding up the production of defense goods" as part of a campaign to turn the soldiers against them. At the soviet's meeting on March 20, some worker deputies called for an investigation into the reasons for unused productive capacity and into the claimed shortages of raw materials in certain plants. They wondered out loud if the difficulties might not be politically motivated. In some factories, the elected workers' committees themselves decided to investigate the causes of stoppages.

These were, in fact, the first, still rare, moves toward "workers' control." They occurred where workers suspected production problems might have their source in the ill-will of management. As such, they were defensive reactions to a perceived threat to the enterprise, to jobs, and so to the revolution, since mass unemployment would weaken the working class, as it had in the Revolution of 1905–7. Only in the state enterprises did workers assert the right to control (in the sense of oversight, surveillance) as a matter of course. Their thinking was that these plants belonged to the state and so, after the democratic revolution, their management should be democratized like the rest of the state apparatus.

What the above does make clear is that the workers were not going to sit by idly, as they had in 1905, if faced with an overt or covert lockout. The difference was that now the workers held real political power through their soviets. The scene was thus set for a radicalization of the revolution, as Trotsky had predicted back in 1906 on the basis of his analysis of the defeat of the Revolution of 1905.

SEE ALSO: Bolsheviks; Decembrists to the Rise of Russian Marxism; Internationals; Kropotkin, Peter (1842–1921); Lenin, Vladimir Ilyich (1870–1924); Luxemburg, Rosa (1870–1919); Martov, Julius (1873–1923); Marxism; Plekhanov, Georgi (1856–1918);

Russia, Revolution of 1905–1907; Russia, Revolution of October/November 1917; Russia, Revolutions: Sources and Contexts; Russian Civil War, 1918–1924; Russian Revolutionary Labor Upsurge, 1912–1914; Soviet Union, Fall of; Trotsky, Leon (1879–1940); War Communism and the Rise of the Soviet Union

References and Suggested Readings

- Burdzhalov, E. N. (1987) Russia's Second Revolution: The February Uprising in Petrograd. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Chamberlin, W. H. (1935/1965) The Russian Revolution, 2 vols. New York: Grosset & Dunlap.
- Frankel, E. R. et al. (1992) Revolution in Russia: Reassessments of 1917. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Gill, G. (1979) Peasants and Government in the Russian Revolution. London: Macmillan.
- Kaiser, D. (1987) The Workers' Revolution in Russia. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Kochan, L. (1978) Russia in Revolution, 1890–1918. London: Grenada.
- Lih, L. (1990) Bread and Authority in Russia, 1914–21. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Mandel, D. (1983) The Petrograd Workers and the Fall of the Old Regime. London: Macmillan.
- Miliukov, P. (1962) Russia and Its Crisis. New York: Collier.
- Mstislavskii, S. (1988) Five Days Which Transformed Russia. London: Hutchinson.
- Shlyapnikov, A. (1982) On the Eve of 1917. London: Allison & Busby.
- Sukhanov, N. N. (1984) The Russian Revolution 1917: A Personal Record. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Trotsky, L. (1967) History of the Russian Revolution, 3 vols. London: Sphere Books.

Russia, Revolution of October/November 1917

David Mandel

The Russian Revolution of October 1917 is arguably the most influential event of the twentieth century. The revolution occurred only eight months after the February Revolution, as a workers' insurrection in the capital, supported by the garrison, overthrew the absolute monarchy with the objective of establishing a democratic republic.

In the course of the February Revolution the workers and soldiers (who were mostly peasants) elected deputies to city-wide soviets (councils).

These soviets held real power, since they alone could command armed force, the soldiers having pledged their allegiance to them. But since the liberal politicians who had come to represent the propertied classes after much hesitation finally rallied to the revolution that had already become an accomplished fact, the Petrograd soviet, which assumed national leadership, decided temporarily to entrust the running of the government to them, until a constituent assembly could be convened.

Nevertheless, mindful of the past antagonism of the propertied classes to the aspirations of the workers and peasants, the soviet made its support for the provisional government conditional upon the latter's adherence to the soviet's program: convocation of a constituent assembly to establish a democratic republic, land reform to distribute the large estates to the peasantry without compensation, the eight-hour workday, and an energetic diplomacy aimed at concluding a speedy, democratic peace without annexations or reparations.

Thus was dual power established, a situation by its very nature unstable. Yet it was supported by all the socialist parties, including most Bolsheviks, the more radical wing of Russian Marxism, who in the first months after February were only a minority in the soviets, which were dominated by the more moderate socialists, the Mensheviks and Socialist Revolutionaries (SRs).

Lenin's Return: The April Theses

On April 3, Lenin arrived together with 32 other political exiles at Petrograd's Finland Station in a train provided by the German authorities, who thus hoped to contribute to undermining the Russian war effort. The next day Lenin summarized his political position in his famous "April Theses," which placed him at odds with the policy his party had been pursuing since February.

Lenin argued that the February Revolution had not changed the nature of the war on Russia's part. "Revolutionary defensism," that is, support for the war in the name of defending the revolution against the Central Powers, although popular among the people, had to be rejected. The war could not be defensive as long as the liberals were in power because the liberals, who represented the bourgeoisie, continued to pursue imperialist goals. For that reason, the Bolsheviks could not support the provisional government.

The October Revolution of 1917 began with a labor uprising and armed insurrection in Petrograd, now St. Petersburg, which later overthrew the Russian provincial government. Here a Bolshevik organizer hands out newspapers to the crowd, spreading the message of creating a revolutionary government led by the working class. (David King Collection)

However, given the conditions of freedom reigning in Russia – Lenin observed that Russia was the freest of all the countries then at war – the party’s task was to win over majorities in the soviets by patient persuasion to the necessity of taking power themselves. The war had put socialist revolution on Russia’s agenda. This meant, not a liberal, parliamentary republic, but the complete dismantling of the state apparatus inherited from tsarism – the army, the police, the bureaucracy – and their replacement by a genuine popular democracy, a soviet republic of workers’ and peasant’s deputies, based on the egalitarian, participatory principles of the Paris Commune of 1871.

As for the program of the soviet government, considering Russia’s level of economic development, the task could not be the immediate introduction of socialism, but rather regulation of the economy by the soviet state. To this end, Lenin called for amalgamation of the banks into a single institution to be placed under government control. He also called for nationalization of the land, to be distributed to the peasants by the peasant soviets. This was, in essence, the peasants’ own program, traditionally promoted by the SR Party. Lenin only added to it the creation of model farms on part of the land of the large estates to be managed by soviets of poor peasants who would be most interested in cooperative production.

Finally, in view of the revolutionary situation maturing abroad, Lenin called for a decisive break with the socialists who supported the war and their governments. He later proposed that revolutionary socialists abandon the discredited name “social democrats” in favor of “communists,” a term used by Marx and Engels.

Lenin’s theses were rejected by the party leadership in both Petrograd and Moscow. This was a measure of the party’s democratic nature at that time. Lenin was, in fact, proposing a break with the position the party had defended for years concerning the nature of Russia’s revolution. His opponents argued his position would isolate the party from the mass of workers, who supported “revolutionary defensism” and, at least conditionally, the provisional government too. But events would soon show that Lenin, though he had spent the last decade abroad, had a better grasp of the internal dynamics of the revolution than most party leaders in Russia.

The War and the “April Days”

According to Sukhanov, a left Menshevik who had participated in putting together the agreement between the soviets and the liberals at the end of February on the formation of a provisional government, both sides consciously sidestepped the question of the war, knowing it would lead to a collision. That is also one of the reasons why the moderate socialists refused the invitation to participate in the government: they feared they would be discredited by its war policy. That fear was justified. The bourgeoisie and the liberals, now the main party of the bourgeoisie, fully supported the Entente’s imperialist aims, which were spelled out in treaties kept secret from the public. These secret treaties promised to Russia, in the event of victory, that it could annex the Dardanelles, Constantinople, Galicia, Armenia, and take back that part of Poland that the Central Powers had occupied during the war. Meanwhile, France would get Alsace-Lorraine, parts of western Germany, Syria, and parts of Asia Minor, and Britain would take Germany’s African colonies as well as Mesopotamia. Italy would annex the Tyrol and Trentino and territories in the Balkans. Even had the Russian liberals not wanted to pursue these goals, to renounce the imperialist war aims, as the Russian people demanded, would have signified a break with the Entente allies to whom Russia was deeply indebted and from whom the liberals hoped to obtain further credits. The allies, on their part, exerted intense financial and diplomatic pressure on the provisional government to carry out the tsar's promise to launch an offensive in the East in 1917 to coincide with their planned offensive in the West, this despite reports from the Russian command of poor morale and supply problems.

But there was a much more cogent domestic internal reason for the liberals' continued support for the war. As the moderate SR leader Viktor Chernov (who supported the provisional government and later served in it) explained: "The propertied classes regarded a military victory and the accompanying chauvinism [it would arouse] as the only way to avoid radicalization of the social revolution." Sukhanov put it most bluntly in his diary: "If the revolution did not finish the war, then the war would strangle the revolution."

As for the workers and soldiers, they were prepared to support the war if that was necessary to defend their revolution against the armies of the Central Powers. But they took for granted that the soviet would force the government to renounce the tsar's imperialist war aims. After all, the Petrograd soviet on March 14 unanimously issued an appeal to the peoples of the world to "take into their own hands the resolution of the question of war and peace" and urged the people of the Central Powers, in particular, to follow Russia's revolutionary example. For this reason, in the early weeks of the revolution the workers were unable to understand the Bolsheviks' call for an end to the war. For it was inconsistent with the party's conditional support for the provisional government. Workers felt they had something to defend. And, in fact, when Stalin and other exiled leaders returned from their Siberian exile in mid-March, they changed Pravda's editorial line from "down with the war" to "revolutionary defensism," the same position as the moderate socialists.

But the limits to the workers' "revolutionary defensism" were already demonstrated in early April when they rebuked the moderate socialist majorities in the Petrograd and Moscow soviets for endorsing the government's "Liberty Loan." Factory meetings condemned the loan, demanding instead a special tax on the capital and on the war profits of the bourgeoisie who had instigated the war. At the same time, they demanded that the provisional government exert pressure on the allies to renounce their imperialist aims.

This was the first occasion on which workers recalled deputies they had elected to the soviets, replacing moderate socialists with Bolsheviks or Bolshevik sympathizers. The Bolsheviks, unlike the moderate socialists, opposed the Liberty Loan.

But in response to popular pressure, the soviet pressed the provisional government to renounce the tsarist war aims. This was fiercely resisted by the liberal leader Milyukov, minister of external affairs. But on March 28 his government finally published a compromise document that declared that Russia sought no domination, annexation, or occupation, only peace based on the self-determination of peoples. At the same time, however, the government reaffirmed its intention to carry out "all obligations assumed toward our allies." As if this ambiguity were not enough, Milyukov sent a secret note to the allies on April 18, affirming Russia's determination to pursue the war to a victorious conclusion and to fulfill all treaty obligations.

The note became public through the press on April 20 and provoked a spontaneous explosion of indignation among the workers and soldiers of the capital, Moscow, and some other industrial centers. This took the form of meetings and street demonstrations that demanded Milyukov's resignation. Calls for the soviets to take power from the provisional government were still rare. Meanwhile, Milyukov's Kadet (Constitutional Democratic) Party organized counterdemonstrations in the capital and in Moscow in his support. The Menshevik paper reported on the situation in Petrograd: "Everywhere, in the streets and in the trams, passionate, heated arguments over the war. The caps and kerchiefs are for peace; the derbies and bonnets – for war." According to one eyewitness, "On April 21, the women of these [three textile mills] moved with the demonstrators on the odd-numbered side of Nevskii Prospekt. The other crowd moved in parallel fashion on the even side – well-dressed women, officers, merchants, lawyers, and the like. Their slogans were 'Long live the Provisional Government!' 'Long live Milyukov!' 'Arrest Lenin!' At Sadovaya, a clash occurred. A hail of curses descended on our workers: 'Whores! Illiterate rabble! Filthy scum!' Romanova couldn't control herself: 'The hats you're wearing are made from our blood!' A fist fight broke out. The bearer of the mill's banner was knocked off her feet and the banner torn. . . . In response, our workers tore off the fancy hats and scratched the faces of the bourgeois women. At that moment a detachment of sailors approached, led by an orchestra, and the Kadet demonstration retreated."

Not all the clashes ended so well. Provocateurs, firing from the midst of the "proper public," killed several workers and soldiers. This was the first blood spilled since the February Revolution, a foretaste of the civil war to come. It left a deep impression on the capital's workers. "That day opened everyone's eyes," recalled one of them. "The repressed hatred toward the bourgeoisie intensified." This violence was a major spur to the workers to seek arms and create their own red guards, despite the opposition of the moderate leaders of the soviet.

These events also helped to swing the Bolshevik Party behind Lenin's position. At a national party conference at the end of April, the overwhelming majority of the 149 delegates, representing 79,000 members (as compared to 20,000 at the time of the February Revolution), condemned the provisional government and demanded the speedy transfer of power to the soviets.

Formation of a Coalition Government

The liberals' reaction to the crisis was to try to broaden support for the provisional government by persuading the leaders of the soviet to join a coalition. The soviet's executive committee rejected this proposal by a narrow majority. But the sudden resignation of Milyukov as minister of war convinced the Menshevik and moderate SR leaders of the soviet that they had to prop up the liberals, whose continued support for the revolution they considered crucial for its survival and for avoiding civil war. The Bolsheviks, Menshevik-Internationalists, and the left SRs opposed this move, but they constituted a minority of only 10 against 44 moderates in the executive committee who favored the coalition. On May 5, five prominent socialists (six including Kerensky, who had already joined the government in February without the soviet's approval), entered a coalition government. As a concession to popular opinion, Milyukov was ousted from the government, over the protests of his party's central committee. On May 13, the Petrograd soviet expressed overwhelmingly its confidence in the new government. Trotsky's resolution opposing the coalition government gathered few votes.

Most workers thus accepted the new arrangement. They were moved by the argument that they were thus avoiding civil war, something they obviously did not want. But more than that, they believed that now, with the soviet's own people inside the government, popular control over the liberals would be more effective. Trotsky, who had recently returned from exile abroad, saw it quite the other way around: the formation of a coalition government marked the "capture of the soviet by the bourgeoisie."

Again, the main center of rejection of the coalition government was the Vyborg district, whose workers called for the soviet to take power. They were now less isolated than in February. Analogous positions were put forward by the Tailors' and Upholsterers' Unions, and by a few factories in other districts, as well as in Moscow and the provinces. On April 24, the soviet of the textile town of Teikovo in the central industrial region denounced the government as "imperialist, tied hand and foot to Anglo-French and Russian capital," and demanded the transfer of state power to the soviets. The soviet of the nearby city of Ivanovo-Voznesensk, also a textile center, followed suit a couple of weeks later, declaring that the provisional government, "given its bourgeois essence," could not keep its promises. On May 13, the soviet of workers' and soldiers' deputies of the Kronstadt naval base outside of Petrograd went so far as to declare itself the sole power on the island.

But these voices constituted a minority. The moderate socialists seemed still to have the mass of workers and soldiers behind them. However, this apparent unity hid profound differences. The workers and soldiers believed the soviets' representatives were entering the government to ensure it carried out the popular will; the moderate socialists were, in fact, concerned first and foremost to keep the liberals in power, and that at any cost. This effectively made them prisoners of the liberals, as Trotsky had observed, not the other way around, as the workers and soldiers believed.

It did not take long for most workers to see their mistake. The soldiers and the unskilled workers with ties to their villages of origin took somewhat longer. The peasants would formally come around only after the October Revolution, though on the ground they had long since been in opposition to the government. In Petrograd, after most workers had recalled the moderate delegates and elected Bolsheviks in their place, the Workers' Section of the soviet already on July 3 demanded the transfer of power to the soviets. By the end of September, most workers' and soldiers' soviets in Russia had adopted that position.

The provisional government's policy on the war was only one factor in this radicalization. The other issues were the government's refusal to act decisively to halt and reverse the deepening economic crisis and its inactivity on land reform. To make matters worse, when the workers and peasants took matters into their own hands, the government did its best to block their efforts. But the overarching factor was the growing threat of counterrevolution. The provisional government was not only perceived as doing nothing to oppose it, it was considered to be facilitating its realization.

The Economic Crisis and Workers' Control

In early May, the Menshevik-Internationalist paper wrote: "Of late, one observes cutbacks in production at a whole series of enterprises. So far this has shown up only in small and medium ones, but all the same it is starting to alarm the worker masses. The advanced workers are beginning to ask if there might be a relationship between their new economic gains and the curtailment of production that follows." Even the right-wing Menshevik paper, which supported the provisional government, observed in mid-May that the industrialists' fear in the initial period of the revolution, which had made them make concessions to the workers, had worn off. "They have now decisively passed over to the defensive and are rapidly making ready to shift to the offensive." But the working class was still too menacing a force to be assaulted frontally. Rather, the employers were attacking from the rear. "Of late, more and more often one hears of an 'Italian [slowdown] strike' here and there by the entrepreneurs. Factories are not being repaired, worn-out parts are not being replaced, production is being managed in a slipshod manner. . . . In other cases, they cut back on production, lay off workers under the pretext of lacking metal, fuel, orders, or because of the competition of imports. We have before us a different means of struggle – the hidden lockout. In the soviet's Labor Department we daily come across facts that confirm the existence of a definite plan on the part of the industrialists."

Even before the February Revolution, serious supply problems had arisen. But at that time the employers blamed them on the war and on the government's incompetence. Now, however, businessmen like N. Kutler, a Kadet leader, decided that it was the workers' fault. They were making "inordinate demands" that were "rendering the management of the enterprises impossible." Commenting on Kutler's speech, the Kadet newspaper predicted in mid-May that "two or three weeks will pass, and factories will start closing one after the other."

Meanwhile, because of strong opposition from the employers, the provisional government took no serious measures of economic regulation, a policy adopted by all the other warring countries. The liberal banker Ryabushinskii explained that such a policy was not suitable for Russia because "our government itself continues to be in a position of being controlled." He was alluding to the power of the soviets. If the government were allowed to intervene in the economy under conditions where the soviets had such influence, the regulation that resulted might hurt industrialists' interests. Two days after the soviet executive committee approved a plan of broad economic regulation, Konovalov, a leading liberal industrialist, resigned as minister of trade and industry, explaining that state regulation was only possible if the government exercised full authority – another allusion to the power of the soviets. At a congress of industrialists a few days later, he warned that "if in the near future there is not a sobering of minds, we will witness the closing of tens and hundreds of factories." The All-Russian Congress of Representatives of Trade and Industry in early June decisively rejected any form of state regulation of the economy.

It is not surprising, then, that one of the first important workers' organizations to demand the transfer of state power to the soviets was the Petrograd Conference of Factory Committees that met at the end of May. For the factory committees were the front line of the workers' fight to save their jobs. The conference's resolution on measures to fight economic disorganization and forestall the looming crisis, which gathered two-thirds of the 568 votes (really three-quarters, if one includes the anarchists, who would not vote for any resolution that mentioned the state), concluded that "the coordinated and successful execution of the above measures is possible only on condition of the transfer of power to the Soviet of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies." On June 12, the founding conference of the Textile Workers' Union of the Ivanovo-Voznesensk region voted by an overwhelming majority for the transfer of power to the soviets as the only hope of avoiding "the [economic] catastrophe of unprecedented proportions" that was approaching.

In the meanwhile, however, the workers, through their factory committees, did what they could to defend their jobs. At this point they did not aspire to take over management. That was not part of their idea of the democratic revolution. But, on the other hand, they were not going to give management a free hand to cut production and lay off workers, if they suspected bad faith. And both past and present experience pointed in that direction. It is difficult to judge how often the production problems were really objective in nature and how much they were a result of conscious sabotage or negligence by the owners and their managements. But the workers' suspicions proved justified in a sufficient number of cases to raise doubts whenever problems arose. An inquiry in the spring by a business newspaper found that of the 75 (mostly small and medium) plant closures that had occurred in the capital, 54 had been motivated by the owners' desire to break the workers' collective pressure and 21 by supply problems. In Ivanovo-Voznesensk after the Easter holiday a number of textile mills did not reopen, the owners citing lack of fuel or raw materials. But when the soviet decided that the owners would have to pay the workers full wages anyway and when it set up a control commission to oversee the industry, the owners suddenly resumed production. The soviet observed that the owners were not making efforts to obtain the fuel that was available and that their desire to close was directed at starving the workers in order to take back the freedom they had won.

It was this situation in the spring and early summer of 1917 that gave rise to the demand for "workers' control," a term that in Russian means "monitoring" or "oversight," not management, something that the workers connected with socialism. In fact, the factory committees explicitly rejected responsibility for management of their enterprises under a capitalist system. Very rarely did they try to take over their plants, and then only when it was the only alternative to closure. And even then, they turned to the state for support, demanding that it sequester the factory. "Workers' control" meant the right to investigate the reasons for production problems, including access to company stocks, documents, and financial records. Workers' control was essentially a defensive response on the part of workers to threats to their jobs and so ultimately to their revolution itself.

Because of its defensive nature, workers' control developed unevenly. As a rule, workers did not try to establish control where they did not perceive any threat. And in the face of the owners' resistance, those that tried to establish control were usually able at best to achieve only partial results before the October Revolution. The committee activists understood only too well the limits of what could be done without state support when layoffs or closure threatened. That is why they were among the first to demand soviet power. They also understood that the war had seriously disrupted the economy and that this called for economic regulation on the national level, something that only a state could do. In the meanwhile, however, they made heroic efforts, with the support of the Central Council of Factory Committees that their conference elected, to maintain production and defend jobs. To this end, they were willing to cooperate with management in seeking supplies of fuel, raw materials, orders, even financing, but only if they were convinced of the management's good will.

It should be clear, therefore, that the movement for workers' control was not a blind revolt of workers against any and all authority, as the owners and their supporters claimed. Nor was it inspired by anarchist ideals, as historians have often argued. The demand for workers' control was new to the labor movement. It was the workers' practical response to a real problem they faced, a problem they had already faced in 1905 but to which they were then unable to find a response. Like the soviets in 1905, workers' control in 1917 arose "from below." It had not figured in the program of any of the parties. But the Bolsheviks took it up enthusiastically, and Bolshevik workers were soon elected to most of the committees.

The moderate socialists, on the other hand, condemned workers' control as an anarchistic infringement on property rights that had no place under capitalism. They called instead for state regulation of the economy. The problem was that the provisional government, which the moderate socialists supported, rejected state regulation. On the other hand, the government managed to incense the capital's workers with a plan to "unload" the city of its industry, to evacuate the factories to the provinces, where, it was claimed, they would be closer to supplies. Even the moderate socialists considered that this plan lacked any economic justification. For one thing, it would have taken months before the evacuated factories resumed production. Meanwhile, the government was calling the workers to show restraint in the name of the war effort. The workers immediately saw in this a politically motivated design to scatter the vanguard of the revolution. On May 31, the Workers' Section of the Petrograd soviet adopted a resolution declaring that what was needed was not to ship out the capital's industry, but to end the war and mount a genuine struggle against the looming economic collapse. But the latter was "possible only through regulation and control of all production by state power in the hands of the Soviet of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies." Under intense popular criticism, the government discreetly shelved the plan, for the time being.

The Peasant Revolution

The workers' leadership in overthrowing the autocracy made possible the peasant revolution. But without the peasants on their side, the workers, regardless of their political prowess and their strategic geographic and economic locations, would inevitably have been crushed. But the provisional government's failure to take action on the issues of peace, to which we shall return presently, and land ensured the workers the peasants' at least passive support.

Under pressure from the Kadets, the socialists in the coalition government – the SR leader V. Chernov was minister of agriculture – failed to adopt measures that might have reassured the peasantry. The Kadets insisted that any changes in property relations in the countryside had to await the constituent assembly, while they did everything in their power to postpone the convocation of that assembly. After several delays, elections were finally set for November 12 (the Kadets tried for December but failed). But by then, however, the provisional government had been overthrown.

The peasants continued to identify with the SRs, the traditional peasant party, whose program corresponded to their aspirations, despite the fact that the party's leaders were betraying it. The party itself was increasingly divided between its right and left wings. The left wing was close to the Bolsheviks' positions but was reluctant to break with the party. The Bolsheviks, as Marxists, considered the SR land program to be utopian. It called for "socialization" of the land and its egalitarian distribution to the peasants, who were to work the land without using hired labor but still on an essentially individualistic, free market basis. Such an arrangement could only rather quickly lead to the opposite of the egalitarian dream that inspired it: the land would inevitably become a commodity that would be bought, sold, and rented, and the peasants would become differentiated into a class of wealthy farmers, on the one hand, and landless rural laborers, on the other. Lenin felt that the peasants did not share the SRs' utopia. Rather, in calling for "socialization" or "nationalization" of the land, they really wanted to clear away the remnants of feudalism from property relations and begin capitalist relations in agriculture from zero. Their program was bourgeois democratic, not anti-capitalist. Yet in Russia's conditions it was revolutionary.

As noted, the Bolsheviks' agrarian program in 1917 read very much like that of the SRs. The major difference was that the Bolsheviks took it seriously, urging the peasants to act immediately on their own to put the land under the control of their democratically elected soviets without waiting for the constituent assembly. The law would result from their revolutionary initiative. If they waited, they would get neither a law nor the land. Although most peasants had never seen a Bolshevik, they were, in fact, increasingly acting along the lines the Bolsheviks were recommending, especially once they realized they could do so with impunity, since the government lacked the force to repress them. Indeed, it was often soldiers returning from the front who stirred things up in the villages. According to incomplete data, 34 districts were affected by disorders in March, 174 in April, 236 in May, 280 in June, and 325 in July.

The All-Russian Soviet (or Congress) of Peasant Deputies that met in May, with an equal number of delegates from the villages and from the army, was a significant milestone in the peasant revolution. On purely political issues, such as support for the provisional government or the war, a majority still followed the lead of the moderate SRs, although, as one of the SR leaders admitted, "the congress more than once suffered from acute bouts of Bolshevik attitude," which the SR leaders managed to liquidate only with the greatest difficulty. But on the land question, the delegates who represented the soldiers and the peasant poor (the vast majority of peasants) demanded that the soviet immediately transfer all the land to the peasantry. A constituent assembly could formalize that later in law. They reacted with hostility to any suggestion of the need to oppose land seizures and they said they could not understand why the land could not be declared national property at once, especially as that would have a calming effect on the peasants and help to discourage land seizures. But the only response that Chernov and other SR leaders provided was that these matters were the exclusive prerogative of the constituent assembly.

In the end, a compromise was reached. The left SRs yielded on their demand for immediate nationalization of the land and its transfer to the peasants, and the right SRs agreed to a resolution stating that all land should be placed under the control of the land committees, which should have the right to decide how the land would be worked. (The land committees had been established by the provisional government but with a mandate only to collect statistical information.) They should also have the right to requisition inventory for collective use, to regulate rental relations, the harvesting and storing of grain, and to ensure that no property transactions in land occur before the constituent assembly met. (The latter measure was aimed at stopping big landowners from making fictitious sales and transfers of land in the hope of avoiding expropriation.)

This resolution was adopted almost unanimously. But once again, while the peasants took it seriously, as a done deed, a guide to practical action, the SR leaders, always looking over their shoulder at the liberals, tried to interpret it as merely an expression of the peasants' wishes for government legislative action. But that was action the government would not take. All of Chernov's attempts to change the legal status quo in land relations met with a sharp rebuff from the Kadet ministers. But, in fact, Chernov did not insist too much. According to the Kadet minister F. Kokoshkin, he "very quickly made concessions and was, in general, harmless." Whatever changes Chernov was able to push through, such as prohibiting the legal registration of any changes to ownership and supporting the land committees in reducing rents, taking over unused land, and removing prisoner-of-war labor, it was far less than what the peasants wanted and was what they were already doing anyway.

A typical report from Simbirsk province in central Russia in the weeks following the Peasant Congress stated that it had become "completely impossible" to fight against the movement for seizure of the land "as all the peasants, basing themselves on the words of the peasant delegates [to the Peasant Soviet], know that the resolutions . . . were worked out with the participation of the Minister of Agriculture V. M. Chernov. At present, a large part of the privately owned land has, in one form or another, come under the control of the peasants." K. Lunev, a member of the executive committee of the All-Russian Soviet of Peasant Deputies who visited several provinces after the congress, reported that "the Bolshevik idea of transferring the land to the peasantry without awaiting the constituent assembly was finding growing sympathy among the peasants." Peasant soviets, which sprang up everywhere after the Congress had called for their election, insistently demanded that the provisional government immediately adopt a law transferring control of the land to them. Summarizing the rural situation between March and July, the minister of justice noted that "the agrarian movement is assuming an organized, conscious character. But it would be wrong to think that it corresponds to the government's own plans." In June and July, he continued, 46 percent of the peasant actions had an organized character, thanks to the influence of the local peasant soviets, which were directing the peasants to solve the agrarian question without waiting for the constituent assembly.

By the summer of 1917 there was no significant region of rural Russia that was not in a state of upheaval. As before, the peasants, through various means, concentrated on taking control of privately owned land and property (as opposed to land belonging to the peasant communes). Before September, there was little incidence of terror, sacking of estates, incendiary activity, or murder, although lesser forms of violence occurred. Meanwhile, the SR Party was already in the process of formally splitting in a number of provinces. The right SRs, however, maintained control of the Central Executive Committee (CEC) of Peasant Soviets. This was an indication of the difficulty peasants had in finding their way in national politics and in exercising effective control over their elected representatives. In these matters, the workers showed their political superiority.

The July Days and the Specter of Counterrevolution

A virtual ceasefire had prevailed on the eastern front since the February Revolution. This, of course, corresponded to German interests, since it enabled the German army to concentrate efforts on the western front. But the Russian soldiers – nine million men were under arms – although still willing to defend the revolution if it was threatened by a German offensive, had no interest in ending the de facto armistice.

The western allies, on the other hand, did have such an interest and exerted unrelenting pressure on the Russians for a new offensive. But even apart from allied pressure, the moderate socialists in the coalition government favored an offensive as the only way to stop the incipient disintegration of the army, which consisted mainly of young peasants increasingly under the influence of Bolshevik ideas and obsessed with the idea of getting home to take part in the land reform. From February to May, 86,000 desertions were registered; everywhere soldiers elected their committees, and a chasm of mistrust emerged with the officers.

As for the liberals and the generals, they counted on a successful offensive to put a stop to the radicalization of the popular classes and perhaps even to help defeat the revolution. And, of course, they still supported the imperialist war aims. At the Kadet Party congress in May, Milyukov was given a standing ovation when he declared that “possession of the Straits [the Dardanelles – exit from the Black Sea to the Mediterranean] is the most essential and vital necessity for our country.”

Preparation for reactivating the southwestern and Romanian fronts began in mid-May. The offensive was launched on June 18. That same day a demonstration in Petrograd, called by the moderate socialist leaders of the soviet who hoped to obtain a show of popular support for their policies, turned into a massive demonstration of workers and soldiers – between 300,000 and 400,000 participated – against the provisional government and for the transfer of state power to the soviets. This occurred on the background of growing food supply problems and conflicts over wages, which had been eroded by inflation. But most alarming to the workers was the growing threat of counterrevolution, of which the June 18 offensive was seen as an integral part, in addition to their suspicions of a planned hidden lockout by the employers supported by the government.

In the midst of all this, well-known representatives of the propertied classes were speaking out with increasing boldness against the soviets. Their principal refrain was that the government was prisoner of a pernicious force, the soviets, from which it had to be liberated. Translated into plain language, this meant that the revolution had put too much power in the hands of the popular classes, the vast majority of the population. This had to be corrected, and the workers and peasants disciplined. Especially provocative were the “private” meetings of the State Duma and State Council that began right after the April Days. Not only did these discredited tsarist institutions have no right to continue to exist in the workers’ eyes, but they were being used as a public tribune to denounce the soviets. And these denunciations evoked rapturous applause from those assembled. “Keep yourselves at the ready,” urged M. Rodzyanko, a big landowner, leader of the Octobrists and chairman of the last State Duma, “for soon the time will come for your intervention into the life of the country.”

The workers of Petrograd were becoming increasingly impatient with the moderate socialists at the head of the CEC of Soviets of Workers’ and Peasants’ Deputies elected at the All-Russian Congress of Soviets in June. They wanted action. When the Bolsheviks discussed the results of the June 18 demonstration, they concluded that, despite the massive protest, nothing changed. Some called to abandon peaceful tactics, but others objected to this call as a potential precursor to using force against their own comrades who still supported the “conciliationist” politics of the moderate socialists. The task was still to win over the workers and soldiers who still supported the “conciliators,” to convince them of the need for soviet power. Only then could the working class join battle with the bourgeoisie. They decided to refrain from further demonstrations but to use the growing pressure coming from below for action to press the soviet leadership to take power.

The Bolsheviks, however, did not control the situation. It was soldiers who began. In addition to feeling betrayed by the offensive, various units in the garrison had learned that they were to be disbanded and shipped to the front. On July 3, these soldiers went around to the factories to call out the workers. The latter needed little coaxing. The CEC's prohibition on demonstrations had no effect. The Bolsheviks opposed the demonstration, but as they were unable to prevent it, they tried, rather unsuccessfully, to provide it with some leadership. Lenin feared, rightly as it turned out, that it would give a boost to the reactionary forces.

That night a huge column, led by armed soldiers, arrived at the Tauride Palace, seat of the CEC of Soviets. The demonstrators declared they would stay until the CEC took power. After being told that they would receive a reply the next day, they went home late at night. After considerable hesitation, the Bolsheviks called to continue the demonstration the next day, stressing that it should be peaceful. With women and children in the crowds, the workers' only intention was to exert moral pressure on the CEC to take power. The essence of the movement was summed up by a worker inside the Tauride Palace, who shook his fist at Chernov, shouting: "Take power, you son of a bitch, when it is given to you!"

The CEC leadership, however, insisted that the workers and soldiers asking it to take power were, in fact, counterrevolutionaries. "It is strange," explained a worker, delegated from 54 factories, "to read the CEC's appeal: it calls workers and soldiers counterrevolutionaries. But you see what is written on our placards. These are decisions adopted by the workers. . . . We are threatened with hunger. . . . We trust the soviet but not those whom the soviet trusts. Our comrade socialist ministers have taken the road of conciliation with the capitalists . . . our blood enemies. We demand that all the land be seized at once; that control over production be established immediately. We demand a struggle against the hunger that is threatening us."

Since no one was thinking of using force against the CEC, the movement ended on its own on the night of July 4. But during the two days of demonstrations, some 400 people had been killed or wounded, victims of clashes between provocateurs and demonstrators. It was that night that the correlation of forces suddenly shifted against the workers. They were not prepared to use force against the CEC, but the CEC was prepared to use force against them. That night, troops loyal to the CEC and the government arrived. They had been influenced in part by forged documents, conveniently leaked to the press by the Kadet minister of justice, purporting to show that Lenin was a German agent working for a separate peace with Germany. The troops proceeded to ransack the premises of the Bolshevik Central and Petersburg Committees, demolishing their print shop. In the ensuing days, Bolshevik activists and leaders, including Trotsky – Lenin went underground – were arrested. The whole top leadership of the party was put out of action. Angry crowds beat up, sometimes even killed, workers they found on the streets. The Menshevik-Internationalist paper, itself about to be shut down by the provisional government, remarked on July 11: "The counter-revolution is making great strides. . . . Searches, arrests – and what arrests! – even the tsarist police did not allow itself the kind of insolence that the bourgeois youth and Cossack officers have lately been displaying in Petrograd in their efforts to 'restore order'."

The Kadet ministers had resigned from the government on July 2, ending the first coalition. On July 7, a new, second coalition was formed. This time it had a socialist majority, including a socialist prime minister, Kerensky. But rather than signifying a shift to the left, this was a move to the right: as a condition for their participation in the government, the Kadets demanded and obtained a veto on "all basic reforms" pending the constituent assembly. The new coalition now openly declared its intention to pursue the war to the end. It assumed powers to suppress publications, prohibit demonstrations, close meetings, and arrest and detain without trial. It tried (but failed) to disband and arrest the very radical Central Committee of the Baltic Fleet for having refused to send ships to Petrograd against the demonstrators on July 3–4. It dissolved the Finnish parliament, whose social democratic majority had voted for Finland's autonomy. It reintroduced the death penalty, abolished by the February Revolution, for soldiers at the front. It forbade the workers' elected factory committees from meeting during work hours in an attempt to paralyze their activity and denied them any say in decisions on hiring and firing. It revived the plan to “unload” Petrograd of its industry. And it tried, but largely failed for lack of willing troops, to repress peasant land seizures.

But less important than the physical effects of the repression was its psychological impact. On the one hand, the confrontation between moderate leadership of the CEC of Soviets and the most active and politically conscious segment of the popular classes, the Petrograd workers, encouraged the propertied classes in their desire to recoup the losses they had suffered in the first months of the revolution. But even more, for the Petrograd workers, the violence of the July Days and the repression that followed changed everything. The CEC's participation in repression against workers seemed to render meaningless the demand for soviet power. But on the other hand, to abandon the soviets as the future organs of popular power in favor of some other organization, such as the factory committees, and to prepare for insurrection against the provisional government as well as the CEC, as Lenin now proposed, threatened the workers with political isolation from the mass of peasants who still followed the CEC. This raised the specter of civil war within the ranks of the popular classes.

The July Days had given the workers a foretaste of civil war, and they were not eager for it. They had previously been thinking in terms of a peaceful assumption of power by the soviets that enjoyed the support of the soldiers. Unable to find a way forward, the workers retreated to defensive positions to mull things over. Some observers noted a certain withdrawal from politics. Within the Bolshevik Party itself, Lenin's position – to abandon the soviets and prepare for insurrection – was rejected in favor of a compromise that recognized that a peaceful transition of power was no longer possible, but retained, albeit in slightly modified form, its old slogan, calling for the transfer of “all power to the revolutionary soviets of workers' and peasants' deputies.”

Despite the slander campaign and the repression, there was no mass desertion from the Bolsheviks. On the contrary, Bolshevik support, after a slight pause, continued to grow. By the end of July, party membership had reached 200,000, with 36,000 in Petrograd alone. As before, the Bolsheviks were strongest in the main industrial centers – Petrograd, the Urals, Moscow, the central industrial region, the Donets basin of the Ukraine, the Baku oilfields. It would not be long before a majority of the soviets rallied to the Bolsheviks, resolving the problem of seeking alternative organs of popular power.

As for the provisional government's military offensive, despite some initial local successes, it was a disaster that dealt the final blow to the Russian army as a fighting organization. The provisional government and bourgeoisie had lost their wager. Not only did the offensive fail to stabilize the domestic situation, stopping and reversing the popular radicalization, it ensured that the army could not be used against the people, as the events were soon to show.

Failed Counterrevolution: General Kornilov's Attempted Coup

After the July Days, orators at the “private” meetings of the State Duma abandoned all restraint. They described the CEC of Soviets as “a band of crazy fanatic impostors and traitors” and openly called for suppression of the soviets, for a coup d'état, a bourgeois dictatorship, and insisted that no constituent assembly could possibly be convened in wartime. A sign of the times was the reemergence from his self-imposed seclusion of the monarchist anti-Semite V. Purishkevich, who now added his voice to the reactionary chorus calling for suppression of the soviets.

On August 3, at the All-Russian Congress of Commerce and Industry, Ryabushinskii, the liberal banker, explained that the soviets and other popular organizations were holding the government prisoner and driving the country to an abyss. At the same time, he flatly rejected any state intervention into the economy. The revolution was “bourgeois,” he declared, and those at the helm of the state should act in a “bourgeois manner.” “Unfortunately,” he continued, “the long bony hand of hunger and national impoverishment will have to seize those false friends of the people by the throat, the members of the various soviets and committees, before they come to their senses.” When he finished, the hall erupted in a “thunder of applause.” The assembled businessmen sprang to their feet and hailed the orator. But in working-class circles, the speech at once became infamous. It was read as an open admission by the employers that they were conducting a masked lockout.

Ryabushinskii became the personification of the kapitalist-lokoutchik. "Thanks for the truth," commented the Bolshevik paper Proletarii. "The conscious workers and peasants can only thank Ryabushinskii. The only question remains: whose hand will grasp whom by the throat?"

Meanwhile, the government still took no action to avert the approaching economic catastrophe. There was a general sense that the dam was about to burst. Bolshevik economist V. Milyutin told a conference of factory committees in August that "Russia has already entered a period of real catastrophe, because the economic breakdown and the food crisis have reached extreme limits. We already feel an acute shortage of grain, and the specter of real hunger looms before us in all its immensity." Until August, only 43 plants, mostly small and medium, had closed down in the capital. This affected relatively few workers. But in August, the Petrograd Metalworkers' Union reported that 25 more factories had announced their imminent closure, and 137 were cutting back production, including some of the largest factories. "The storm has now broken over everyone's head," a representative of the Central Soviet of Factory Committees told the conference. For the first time since the war, industrial employment in the capital declined in July, a trend that would accelerate in later months and not stop until the end of the civil war three years later.

If, nevertheless, most of Petrograd's working class remained employed in the factories until the October Revolution, this was in large part thanks to the efforts of factory committees and their Central Soviet. But the employers, even while they blocked any move toward state regulation, blamed the meddling of the factory committees for the crisis. With the government's backing – the minister of labor was a Menshevik – they stiffened their resistance to the factory committees. They also hardened their stand on wages, which had been seriously eroded by inflation. According to one estimate, the cost of living rose by 75 percent in July and August 1917 alone.

The counterrevolution now for the first time took on the more concrete form of a military dictatorship. Speaking to the State Duma, Milyukov did not mince words: "We feel it absolutely necessary that the prime minister [Kerensky] either cede his place or, in any case, take as aides authoritative military men, and that these authoritative military men act with the necessary independence and initiative." On July 22, Cossack General L. Kornilov, touted by the non-socialist press as the "strong man" who would save Russia – his biography was being distributed in great numbers – was appointed supreme commander by Kerensky. In accepting the appointment, the general announced that he considered himself responsible only to his "own conscience and to the entire people." Kornilov was already known to the capital's workers. As commander of the garrison during the "April Days," he had ordered artillery fire against the demonstrating workers and soldiers. A massacre was averted only because the gunners refused to obey his order without the soviet's countersignature.

As the counterrevolutionary mood among the propertied classes solidified, so too did Bolshevik support among the workers. It was during this period that Moscow's working class, less concentrated in large plants than Petrograd's, less skilled (textiles predominated over machine building), and more closely linked to its peasant origins, shifted its support en masse to the Bolsheviks. Moscow had the reputation of being less militant than Petrograd. Yet even as late as the start of July, the factory committees in Moscow were still dominated by moderate socialists.

Moscow's reputation for moderation is why the provisional government chose it in August as the site for its state conference, an ersatz constituent assembly with skewed representation and no power that was convened to obtain an expression of broad public support for the coalition government. But Moscow's workers, defying the leaders of their own soviet, still led by moderate socialists, organized a nearly unanimous general strike to protest the conference's opening.

The vast majority of workers in Russia by now supported the Bolsheviks. A minority, mostly on the basis of their continued links to the land, preferred the left SRs. Like the Menshevik-Internationalists, the left SRs opposed the coalition government but did not support the Bolsheviks' call for soviet power, considering the soviets would provide too narrow a political base for a revolutionary government. To the average worker, this position made no sense, and even workers who belonged to the left SR tended, in fact, to support the Bolshevik position. As for the Mensheviks, they were quickly losing support even among the printers, who had long been their stronghold.

This was the context in which General Kornilov made his move. Using the fall of Riga and the threat it posed to Petrograd as a pretext (it was widely believed he engineered Riga's fall), he transferred Cossack units to the capital. On August 26, martial law was declared, and troops were positioned in the working-class districts. The next day, the Kadet ministers resigned from the provisional government. On August 30, when the coup's failure had already become evident, the Kadets' newspaper appeared with a blank front page where the editorial should have been. The missing editorial was later published in the socialist press. It stated that "Kornilov's aims are identical to those we feel are necessary for the country's salvation. We adhere to his formulation. . . . Yes, it is a conspiracy, but it is not counter-revolutionary."

News of Kornilov's march on Petrograd electrified the capital's workers. But there was no panic. On the contrary, the mood was one of enthusiasm, self-sacrifice, even liberation. For Kornilov had provided them with a way out of the impasse created by the July Days: they could now strike a decisive blow against the counter-revolution in unison with the popular forces that still supported the moderate leadership of the CEC. Kornilov threatened everyone, and his coup seemed to have restored unity among the popular classes, thus removing the danger of a civil war within their ranks.

Everywhere workers formed red guards. They inundated the CEC with demands for arms. As it turned out, they did not have to join battle with Kornilov's troops. For the latter's troops melted away en route to the capital. Much of the credit belonged to the Petrograd workers who infiltrated Kornilov's echelons, explaining to the soldiers their commander's real aims. Railway workers also did their part by dispersing the troop trains and sabotaging the lines.

Since the moderate socialist majority of the CEC seemed to have shifted to the left and was now taking an active stand against the counter-revolution, Lenin offered it a compromise: take power, form a soviet government, and the Bolsheviks would act as a loyal opposition. For a brief period after the Kornilov Affair, the Bolshevik Party dropped its post-July position on the need for an insurrection to save the revolution. However, the CEC's leftward shift proved short-lived.

Toward the October Insurrection

The immediate effect of the Kornilov rising was conclusively to swing the mass of soldiers away from the moderate socialists and to the Bolsheviks and left SRs. As a result, by the end of September the soviets in the vast majority of towns with any significant industry or a garrison were demanding the transfer of state power to the soviets. (The shift in many urban soviets had been delayed by the overrepresentation in them of the garrisons.) In some predominantly industrial towns, like Ivanovo-Voznesensk, the Bolsheviks already won majorities in general municipal elections, and local soviets were in practice exercising power there.

Given the Kadets' complicity in the Kornilov uprising, the moderate socialists at the head of the CEC of Soviets finally rejected their further participation in the provisional government. Yet they could not bring themselves to support the idea of a government responsible to the soviets, even those representing the great mass of the population. They felt that the revolution would be doomed if it was supported only by the workers, soldiers, and peasants. The liberals, as representatives of the bourgeoisie, had to participate in the government. The problem – and no small one – was that the liberals were by now openly counterrevolutionary and completely discredited.

Had the moderate socialists been the democrats they later claimed to be when they opposed the Soviet government and the Bolsheviks, the CEC of Soviets, elected back in May, would have convened a new soviet congress to decide the matter of state power. Indeed, according to the statutes, a new congress was due in mid-September, since three months had elapsed since the last one. But the Mensheviks and SRs at the head of the CEC knew they would be in a minority at a new congress, which would very likely decide to take power from the provisional government. And so they decided instead to convene a "Democratic Conference," to which they gave the task of deciding the question of a new government. And to ensure it decided the way they wanted, they skewed the representation to favor organizations they dominated. Thus, while the soviets were allotted only 300 delegates, the cooperatives, dominated by wealthy peasants and really representing no one but themselves, were given 500, more than a third of the total seats.

But even this manipulation backfired. The assembly voted by a slim majority of 766 to 688 (38 abstentions) for a new coalition government with liberals. But it also adopted by a vote of 595 to 493 (72 abstentions) an amendment that stated that there should be no Kadets in the coalition. The Kadets, however, were the only party that could claim to represent the liberal bourgeoisie and intelligentsia. Since the amended resolution was obviously meaningful, it was rejected by a vote of 813 to 183 (80 abstentions). Undaunted, the CEC leaders then proposed to expand the conference presidium, but the body voted 60 to 50 against allowing representatives of the propertied classes into a coalition government.

In the end, Kerensky merely ignored the conference and the CEC and formed a new coalition government that included SRs, Mensheviks, prominent Kadets, and some businessmen, including the industrialist V. Smirnov, who had just locked out 3,000 striking workers at his textile mill in the village of Likino near Moscow. And despite all this, the CEC gave the new coalition government its support. In return, Kerensky agreed to convene a “pre-parliament,” another ersatz constituent assembly with no power. It would be made up of 15 percent of the delegates to the Democratic Conference and another 156 representatives of the propertied classes.

The Democratic Conference, which the workers had met with total indifference, only confirmed their worst fears: nothing remained of the CEC’s leftward shift during the Kornilov Affair. But under pressure from the Bolsheviks, the CEC was finally forced to set a date for a Congress of Soviets – October 25, which went down in history as the date of the October Revolution.

From the moment the date was set for a new soviet congress, it became the focal point of the workers’ hopes for saving the revolution. As the Menshevik-Internationalist paper wrote: “To the broad masses, it seems self-evident . . . The Democratic Conference disappointed because it was rigged. The soviets are the true representatives. Let the Congress meet and take power.”

The Bolshevik leaders, themselves under strong pressure from their own rank and file and from Lenin, still in hiding to avoid arrest, demonstratively walked out of the “pre-parliament.” This move was greeted by the capital’s workers, who watched with growing desperation as the threats of economic collapse and counterrevolution loomed ever larger. The Petrograd soviet also approved the boycott of the “pre-parliament” by a huge majority. At the same session, on the suggestion of the Mensheviks, it voted to establish a “revolutionary defense committee” to defend the capital from the Germans (who had just captured an archipelago in the mouth of the Gulf of Finland – Petrograd was located at the east end of the gulf), to arm the workers, and to defend the capital against new counterrevolutionary attempts. In just a little over two weeks, that committee, renamed the Military Revolutionary Committee, would overthrow the provisional government.

Meanwhile, the poorly supplied, undernourished army was disintegrating. There were two million estimated deserters. A report from the northern front at the end of September found “a complete lack of confidence in the officers. . . . The influence of Bolshevik ideas is spreading very rapidly. To this must be added a general weariness, irritability, and a desire for peace at any price.” On the western front “intense defeatist agitation has developed, accompanied by refusal to carry out orders, threats to the commanding personnel, and attempts to fraternize with the Germans.” On the southwestern front “the Bolshevik wave is growing steadily. . . . The dominant theme . . . is peace at any price, under any conditions. Every order, no matter what its source, is met with hostility.” In Helsinki sailors murdered officers whom they suspected of having participated in the Kornilov Affair. They were incensed that Kornilov and his co-conspirators had been treated so leniently, having merely been placed under arrest (the conspirators fled south after the October Revolution to organize one of the first centers of the civil war), while the provisional government had reintroduced the death penalty for ordinary soldiers.

A certain lull had descended over the villages between the end of July and the beginning of September. There was the harvest and the autumn sowing to do, and also the fact that the peasants had already achieved the first phase of their demands: seizure of the meadows and pastureland, withdrawal of prisoner-of-war labor from the landed estates, reduction of rents. There had been some land seizures, but overall there was still hope the land might be acquired legally. But patience finally grew thin. From September, the land seizures multiplied, and so did the destruction of manor houses and other property. This destruction was aimed at driving off the landowners, according to the adage "Destroy the nest, and the bird won't return." As before, the movement was strongest in the central agricultural and Volga provinces, and also the western provinces.

In the factories, the committees were increasingly under pressure from the workers to take action to stop the decline in production. The factory committees had been established to monitor management, not take it over. But what if management was not interested in maintaining production? "We are told that we must control," complained a worker at a factory committee conference in August. "But what will we control if we have nothing left but walls, bare walls?" V. Levin, a left SR member of the Central Soviet of Factory Committees, warned the same conference that "it is very likely that we stand before a general strike of capitalists and industrialists. We have to be prepared to take the enterprises into our hands to render harmless the hunger that the bourgeoisie is so heavily counting upon as a counterrevolutionary force."

The factory committee activists were reluctant to assume direct responsibility for running the plants, understanding only too well the complexities of the task in conditions of economic breakdown and without the support of a friendly state. They also felt that the owners were egging them on in order to discredit them or to have an excuse to abandon their factories. N. Skrypnik, a Bolshevik member of the Central Soviet of Factory Committees, reported to his party that "it is felt that the leaders [of the committees] do not entirely express the mood of the masses. The former are more conservative." Faced with these pressures, committees whose factories were under direct threat were moving beyond control, in the sense of monitoring management's activity, and directly assuming managerial functions, even against their own better judgment.

But all agreed: the only solution was a soviet government. At a conference of factory committees on the eve of the October Revolution, a Putilov worker explained: "This conference can give us valuable direction. But let's not fool ourselves into thinking that it can get us out of the dead-end. Both private and state administrations are sabotaging production, and [when we try to intervene] they refer us to the [rules adopted by] the Society of Factory Owners. They are still strong. The conference must first of all point out the obstacles that prevent people of action from saving the country. They are put before us by the bourgeois government. Only the reorganization of state power will allow us to develop our activity."

Debates Within the Bolshevik Party

It was on September 13, during the Democratic Conference which conclusively demonstrated the refusal of the CEC to break with the liberals and take power on its own, that Lenin first insisted that an insurrection at the first opportune moment was the Bolshevik Party's immediate task. In passionate letters to the Central Committee from his hiding place, he pointed out that the Bolsheviks held majorities in the soviets of both Petrograd and Moscow. The soldiers would wait no longer. The peasant insurrection was a fact. And despite its biased representation, the majority of peasant delegates to the Democratic Conference had voted against a coalition with the Kadets. That meant that despite their attachment to the SRs, the peasants would follow the workers if they took power in the capitals. "The crisis is ripe. The whole future of the international workers' revolution for socialism is at stake. The crisis is ripe."

But Lenin, along with Trotsky who supported him, held a minority position in the party's Central Committee. The majority wanted to participate in the "pre-parliament" and even went so far as to burn one of Lenin's letters. They wanted to wait for the constituent assembly. However, the party's lower ranks and the mass of workers were in agreement with Lenin and Trotsky. Lenin even threatened to resign from the party leadership in order to be free to explain his position to the rank and file and mobilize them in its support. He sent copies of his letters to the Petersburg, Moscow, Vyborg district, and other local party organizations, appealing to the membership to exert pressure on the leaders, where "unfortunately, one can observe wavering, as if there is 'fear' of the struggle for power, a tendency to replace it with resolutions and protests." Local party conferences held in October, notably in Moscow and Petrograd, rebuked the leadership: "A defensive policy is incorrect. An offensive is needed immediately to root out the seeds of the counterrevolutionary government," declared the conference of Bolsheviks of the Northern Region that included Moscow and Petrograd. It was only on October 10 that the Central Committee finally adopted the decision on insurrection.

In view of the widespread, but erroneous, view of the authoritarian, highly disciplined, and hierarchical “Leninist party,” it is worth emphasizing here that had the Bolshevik Party indeed been such in 1917, there would have been no October Revolution, since the majority of the leadership was opposed to it. (What the party became afterwards is another matter.) It was only because the party was democratic and linked organically to the mass of workers that Lenin was able to prevail – he prevailed in October because his position was shared by the party rank and its intermediary leadership, and beyond them by the broad masses of workers, soldiers, and peasants. Had the Bolshevik Party not taken the leadership in October to overthrow the provisional government, the workers’ and peasants’ revolutionary energy would, in all likelihood, have been squandered in a series of uncoordinated, spontaneous explosions that would have opened the way for a right-wing military, or even fascist-type, dictatorship of the type that ruled most of Europe during the inter-war period. (In Italy fascism followed rapidly on the heels of the Socialist Party’s refusal to act as the Bolsheviks did in a very similar situation. In Germany and Austria the rise of fascism was delayed by a decade.)

Lenin was not inclined to link the insurrection to formal democratic considerations. He felt that once the laboring classes had shown their support for a new revolution, the organization and timing of the insurrection ceased to be a political question and became a technical one. Indeed, he felt it would be criminal to risk success of the insurrection on formalistic considerations. The experience of December 1905 had taught him that if the high point of the revolutionary wave was allowed to pass without an insurrection, there would be no second chances. He also feared that the delegates to the Soviet Congress might hesitate before so enormous a decision as assuming responsibility for state power, a huge leap into the unknown that instilled fear, even if the present situation demanded it. Moreover, if the Bolsheviks waited for the Soviet Congress formally to take the decision, it would be a sitting duck for the provisional government to arrest it in one swoop. For these reasons, Lenin argued for an insurrection before the Congress: he wanted to outmaneuver the forces of counterrevolution and at the same time present the Congress with a fait accompli that the delegates would and could not reject. Trotsky, on the other hand, who was at liberty and in closer contact with the workers and soldiers, felt it was important that the insurrection bear the stamp of legitimacy of the Soviet Congress. Otherwise, it might seem a party affair. This was especially important for the soldiers, who supported the Bolshevik Party’s policies, but did not have the workers’ organic links with the party. A compromise was reached: the Petrograd soviet would carry out the insurrection, which would be made to appear a defensive operation. And it would be in time for the opening of the Congress.

The October Revolution

October 22 was the “Day of the Petrograd Soviet.” It was called by the soviet as a peaceful show of forces. Eyewitness accounts concur that the response was overwhelming. Sukhanov, who opposed the transfer of power to the soviets, recalled the meeting that took place in the People’s House, which was filled to overflowing with 30,000 people: “Around me was a mood close to ecstasy. I felt as though the crowd would rise up on its own and sing some religious hymn. Trotsky formulated some brief resolution, something to the effect that ‘we will stand for the cause of the workers and peasants to the last drop of blood.’ All, as one person, raised their hands. I saw these raised hands and the burning eyes of the men, women and youths, workers and soldiers. . . . With an unusually heavy heart I watched this truly majestic scene. . . . And it was the same all over Petrograd. Everywhere final reviews and final oaths. Strictly speaking, this was already the insurrection. It had already begun.”

It began on the morning of October 23, technically in response to government moves against the Bolsheviks and the Petrograd soviet’s Military Revolutionary Committee (MRC), which had put the city’s garrison under its direct command. That night the government shut down the Bolshevik papers, ordered the arrest of Bolsheviks who were agitating against the government (in fact, all Bolsheviks), and opened criminal proceedings against the MRC. Kerensky called in troops to the capital, posted officer cadets at strategic points, raised the bridges, cut the telephone line to the Smolnyi Institute, seat of the Petrograd soviet, and also to the Bolshevik Party headquarters.

The MRC immediately went into action and by the afternoon of October 25 it held the entire city, except for the Winter Palace, where the provisional government was located. A Menshevik-Internationalist delegate to the Soviet Congress who had just arrived from the Crimea recalled the meeting of the Petrograd soviet on that day: "When Trotsky informed the Soviet that 'power had passed to the people,' there followed a storm of applause. Then Lenin and Zinoviev spoke. Such a triumph. Trotsky's speech especially carved itself into my mind. . . . Each word burned the soul . . . and I saw that many of the people were clenching their fists, that an unshakeable determination was forming in them to struggle to the end."

Lenin spoke in public to the soviet for the first time since the July Days: "The workers' and peasants' revolution, the necessity for which the Bolsheviks have been speaking all this time, has been accomplished. . . . We will have a soviet government, our own organ of power with no participation whatsoever of the bourgeoisie. . . . The Third Russian Revolution must, in the end, bring about the victory of socialism. . . . To end this war . . . we must defeat capital itself. In this we will have the aid of the world labor movement, already starting to pick up speed in Italy, Germany, France [in the form of strikes and mutinies]. . . . We must immediately publish the secret treaties. . . . We will win the trust of the peasants by a single decree destroying landlord property. . . . We will establish genuine workers' control of production. . . . Long live the worldwide socialist revolution!" That meeting of the Petrograd soviet voted its "full support for the workers' and peasants' revolution."

After a siege of the Winter Palace lasting into the night, the ministers of the provisional government were arrested, except for Kerensky who escaped to rally loyal troops. That evening, while the siege of the Winter Palace was playing itself out, the Congress of Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies opened. Shortly after it opened, the moderate socialist delegates – about a sixth of the total – walked out in protest against the insurrection that had been carried out "behind the back of the Congress." They formed a Committee of Salvation of the Revolution with the outgoing CEC, with members of the municipal Duma (government), the CEC of Peasant Soviets, and some others.

Many histories of the October Revolution refer to it as a "military coup" or "Bolshevik coup," thus denying it any sort of historical legitimacy. The insurrection did take place before the Congress decided to take power. But the moderate socialists were hardly credible when they explained their walkout as a protest against the violation of democratic norms, as they had shown scant concern for it themselves when they controlled the CEC. They had done their best to postpone the Congress, convening instead the Democratic Conference, which they packed with their supporters. They then ignored that conference's decision not to allow Kadets into a new coalition government. Moreover, the moderate socialists had already walked out of the Congress of Soviets of the Northern Region after it voted quite democratically for soviet power, and there had been no issue of democracy, since the insurrection was yet to occur. They walked out, in fact, not to defend democracy but because they were opposed to the democratic will of the soviets, which overwhelmingly wanted a soviet government.

Of the 650 delegates at the Congress of Soviets, 390 were Bolsheviks, 90 were left SRs, and there were an unknown number of Menshevik-Internationalists, some of whom also walked out later. That night, within the space of a few brief minutes, the Congress passed two decrees that the provisional government during its eight months in power had refused to adopt, despite the will of the vast majority of the people of Russia. The "Decree on Peace" proposed an immediate, democratic peace to all governments, while at the same time summoning the world's workers to action against their imperialist governments. The Entente's secret treaties were abrogated and published soon after. The "Decree on Land" abolished landed private property and gave it to the exclusive use of those who worked it. Later that night, Lenin wrote up a Draft Law on Workers' Control that gave the factory committees access to all documents and factory supplies and made their decisions binding on management, subject to repeal only by the trade unions or by city-wide conferences of factory committees.

The Congress also elected a new government, the Council of People's Commissars, responsible to it alone. The government consisted exclusively of Bolsheviks, with Lenin as chairman. The left SRs and Menshevik-Internationalists refused to participate in the government without the moderate socialists, while the latter would have nothing to do with a government in which Bolsheviks participated. This should make clear that October was not a “Bolshevik coup” but, in fact, a soviet, that is, a workers’ and peasants’ revolution (the soldiers being the most politicized and active part of the peasantry). To call it a “Bolshevik coup” is to read backward into history developments that took place later under different circumstances. Whatever Lenin himself may have wanted – and that can be debated – a single party regime was not the goal of the majority of the Bolshevik Party leadership or of the party rank and file.

Many writers, hostile to the October Revolution, cite the fact that the insurrection lacked the outer trappings of a popular revolution: no crowds milling in the streets, no scenes of mass jubilation, no barricades or street fighting, no general strike. October was indeed different from the February Revolution, which had all the above things. It was a military-like operation. But not often mentioned is the fact that the insurrection’s leaders themselves urged the workers to stay at work and off the streets. Trotsky, for one, knew that Petrograd’s workers had not recovered from the bloodshed of the July Days and he wanted to avoid a repeat that might have repulsed them. The Russian workers (though not the soldiers) were still far from the ferocity and cruelty that emerged during the civil war. The arrested ministers of the provisional government were well treated. Cossack General Krasnov, who attempted to lead his troops against the capital in October and was thwarted by red guards, was released by the latter on his word of honor, despite his own soldiers’ wish to lynch him on the spot. (Krasnov then went south to organize a counterrevolutionary army.)

Sukhanov, who mercilessly lambasted the new soviet government in his editorials in the Menshevik-Internationalist paper Novaya-zhizn, noted that the moderate socialists for months afterwards comforted themselves with the thought that October had been a military conspiracy, not a popular insurrection. But he pointed out that the masses “had nothing to do on the streets. . . . This was an especially happy circumstance of our October Revolution, for which it is slandered as a military rising or palace coup. Why not ask: Did the Petrograd Proletariat sympathize or not with the organizers of the insurrection? . . . Were they on the side of the accomplished insurrection, neutral or opposed? There can be no two answers: yes the Bolsheviks acted on the mandate of the Petrograd workers and soldiers. And they carried out the insurrection throwing into it as many (very little!) forces as were necessary. No, excuse me. Through carelessness and clumsiness, they threw in much more than was necessary.”

Elsewhere in northern and central Russia, the transfer of power went quite smoothly. Only in Moscow did the soviet encounter serious, sustained, and bloody resistance. That was in large part due to the local Bolsheviks’ hesitation – against which Lenin had specifically warned – since not one regular regiment of the garrison came out in support of the provisional government. The Moscow soviet began preparations for the insurrection late, and at one point in the fighting its forces inside the Kremlin agreed to a truce. This resulted in the cold-blooded massacre of some 300 red guards as they were leaving the fortress. It took another week of fierce combat to defeat the anti-soviet forces, mostly officers and officer cadets. When they learned of the fighting in Moscow, armed workers from the industrial towns of the central industrial region rushed to its aid in trains and helped to turn the tide.

The revolution in the central industrial region itself was bloodless and easy. The same is generally true of the towns of the Urals and Siberia to the east. In the non-industrial towns of Saratov and Kazan on the Volga, there were brief skirmishes, but the soviets prevailed. In some other non-industrial centers, soviet power was not clearly established until December. This was, in general, a period of considerable confusion, when the Central Soviet government’s influence was extremely weak in the provinces. But the stream of soldiers returning from the front was usually enough to crush any serious armed resistance. The SRs tried to use the army’s General Staff as a base against the soviets, but the new government was able to take it over without serious difficulty. All attempts to send troops against Petrograd from the various fronts proved fruitless. The old army soon just melted away.

In Central Asia, the main city of Tashkent became a red oasis, surrounded by hostile Cossacks and Asiatic tribesmen. In the Caucasus, the Baku soviet took power quite easily. However, the Mensheviks predominated in Georgia (the only region where they had a peasant base), awaiting the constituent assembly. In Kiev, although the soviet decided to take power, it was defeated by nationalist forces linked to the SRs, who declared Ukraine's independence and immediately entered into contact with the German army. But the influence of their government was, in fact, restricted to the nationalist region in the west. In the more industrial and Russian-speaking east, a soviet regime took shape. Apart from the Ukraine, the Cossack regions of the Don and Kuban became anti-soviet centers in which counterrevolutionary officers, politicians, and members of the propertied classes gathered, establishing the so-called Volunteer Army that became known as the "Whites."

Nevertheless, by February 1918, the Soviet regime had extended itself into almost all these main centers of early opposition in the Ukraine and the Cossack regions. For a brief moment, Lenin thought the civil war was over and peaceful construction could begin. In fact, the civil war had barely begun.

SEE ALSO: Bolsheviks; Decembrists to the Rise of Russian Marxism; Lenin, Vladimir Ilyich (1870–1924); Marxism; Paris Commune, 1871; Russia, Revolution of 1905–1907; Russia, Revolution of February/March 1917; Russia, Revolutions: Sources and Contexts; Russian Civil War, 1918–1924; Russian Revolutionary Labor Upsurge, 1912–1914; Soviet Union, Fall of; Trotsky, Leon (1879–1940); War Communism and the Rise of the Soviet Union

References and Suggested Readings

- Carr, E. H. (2004) The Russian Revolution: From Lenin to Stalin (1917–1929). New York: Palgrave.
- Carrère d'Encausse, H. (1981) Lenin. New York: Longman.
- Chamberlin, W. H. (1935/1965) The Russian Revolution, 2 vols. New York: Grosset & Dunlap.
- Deutscher, I. (1965) The Prophet Armed, Trotsky: 1879–1921. New York: Vintage.
- Deutscher, I. (1967) The Unfinished Revolution. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Ferro, M. (1980) October 1917: A Social History of the Russian Revolution. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul.
- Frankel, E. R. et al. (1992) Revolution in Russia: Reassessments of 1917. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Gill, G. (1979) Peasants and Government in the Russian Revolution. London: Macmillan.
- Kaiser, D. (1987) The Workers' Revolution in Russia. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Kochan, L. (1978) Russia in Revolution, 1890–1918. London: Grenada.
- Liebman, M. (1980) Leninism under Lenin. London: Merlin Press.
- Lih, L. (1990) Bread and Authority in Russia, 1914–21. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Mandel, D. (1984) The Petrograd Workers and the Soviet Seizure of Power. London: Macmillan.
- Reed, J. (1960) Ten Days that Shook the World. New York: Vintage.
- Serge, V. (1967) Birth of Our Power. New York: Doubleday.
- Shukman, H. (Ed.) (1994) The Blackwell Encyclopedia of the Russian Revolution. Oxford: Blackwell.
- Sukhanov, N. N. (1984) The Russian Revolution 1917: A Personal Record. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Trotsky, L. (1967) History of the Russian Revolution, 3 vols. London: Sphere Books.

Russia, Revolutions: sources and contexts

David Mandel

In the early part of the twentieth century Russia lived through three revolutions in the course of 12 years. The workers and peasants who made these revolutions initially conceived of their goals as a liberal (capitalist) democracy to replace the absolute monarchy and agrarian reform to distribute the vast estates of the nobility among the land-hungry peasants.

As such, the tasks of the revolution in Russia resembled those carried out by the great French Revolution of 1789–94. But the problem was that both Russia and the world were very different places in 1917 from France and its world in 1789. In the intervening 125 years capitalism had developed rapidly, creating large-scale industry and a large propertyless working class that depended on the sale of its labor to live. And although Russia lagged behind the West in these developments, it had nevertheless also undergone significant change.

Because of this, the revolution in Russia was able ultimately to win only by assuming a more radical character than that in France. It would overthrow not only the monarchy but capitalism too. The roots of this radical transformation lay deep in the country's history and social and political structures. An understanding of Russia's revolutions must begin with an analysis of the nature of the tsarist state, its relation to the social classes that made up Russian society, and the various interests that flowed from the respective social and economic situations of these classes.

The State at the Turn of the Twentieth Century

The Russian state was an autocracy, in which all power was ultimately concentrated in the hands of the monarch, the tsar. Article I of the Fundamental Laws of the Russian Empire read: "The emperor of all the Russians is an autocratic and unlimited monarch. God himself commands that this supreme power be obeyed out of conscience and fear." While popular unrest in the years preceding the February Revolution of 1917 that overthrew the monarchy forced some grudging and limited concessions from Nicholas II, he remained determined until the very end to accept no significant limits to his absolute power, to answer to no one. In the very midst of the popular insurrection of February 1917 he made the following response to the British ambassador's urging that he make some concessions to the people in order to bolster his support: "Do you mean that I am to regain the confidence of my people or that they are to regain my confidence?"

Nicholas was a stubborn man of mediocre intelligence, open to the mystical and superstitious influences of his wife. He kept aloof from the profound changes that industrialization was bringing to Russian society. Cruel, with a proclivity for violent repression, he was nicknamed by the people "Nicholas the Bloody." Historian L. Kochan in Russia in Revolution (1978) also notes the profound racism (the Russian term is "Great-Russian chauvinism") of this ruler of a multinational empire. He nurtured a particular hatred for Jews, whom he made scapegoats for the revolutionary ferment that challenged his power, and was a patron of the proto-fascist organization the Union of Russian People (known also as the "Black Hundreds"), which the state subsidized. (It says much about present-day Russia that the Russian Church made Nicholas II a saint after the communist regime fell.)

Rural Society and Peasant Ferment

The tsarist state's main support was the landed aristocracy, whose members traditionally staffed the higher echelons of the public administration and military. Until the emancipation of the serfs in 1861, the aristocracy, together with the state, owned all the land as well as the peasants who worked it. The emancipation was undertaken by Alexander II in part to forestall an apprehended peasant revolt. (Russia had seen four great peasant risings in previous centuries.) But another reason was Russia's recent defeat by the British and French in the Crimean War (1855–6), a defeat that was due in large part to Russia's economic backwardness: Russia still lacked railroads to bring its troops to the theater of action in the south. Serfdom came to be seen by the tsar and his officials as a brake on Russia's economic development, threatening Russia's great power status.

But since the landed aristocracy was the state's principal social base, the emancipation turned out to be a compromise that left much of the land, often the best parts, in the hands of the aristocracy (some peasants actually ended up with less land than they had farmed before the emancipation). Moreover, the peasants were saddled with debt, payment for the land the aristocracy gave up. Nor were the peasants completely free, as they were tied to their village communes and collectively responsible for taxes and the redemption payments. Rural government continued to be dominated by the local nobility, which continued to exercise vast arbitrary power over the peasants' lives.

The peasants never accepted the partial nature of the emancipation. They firmly held onto the conviction that the land belonged to those who worked it. Under feudalism (which in Russia's case resembled slavery, since serfs could be bought and sold, together with or separately from the rest of their families), the peasants had a saying: "We are yours (the nobility's), but the land is God's." The peasant communes' practice of periodic redistribution of the land according to the number of "mouths" in the households was itself, in its own manner, a rejection of private property of the land.

All the same, the emancipation reform did bring real improvement to the peasants' lives and so inaugurated several decades of relative calm in the countryside. When in the 1870s young, educated, urban revolutionaries "went to the people" to arouse it against the regime, they met little response. The passivity of the peasantry, the overwhelming majority of Russia's population (in 1897, 87.6 percent of the population was rural; in 1913, 82 percent), was one of the reasons the peasant-oriented, populist movement concentrated its efforts in this early period on terrorism, directed against hated state officials. (Alexander II himself fell to a terrorist bomb in 1881.)

However, by the 1890s, rapid population growth and the limited employment opportunities in the cities led to severe rural overpopulation, intensifying the peasants' land hunger. Together with the communal restraints on peasant freedom, the low technical level of peasant agriculture, annual redemption fees, heavy taxation of basic consumer goods, high rent for additional land, and a system of protective tariffs that kept the price of manufactured goods artificially high (all these were policies aimed at fostering rapid industrialization) created a situation in which much of the peasantry was permanently only a step away from famine, since most were too poor to lay aside reserves. The poor harvests of 1891 and 1898 caused widespread famine, during which the government, which proved incapable of organizing relief itself, reluctantly allowed the educated and well-to-do elements of urban society to organize themselves for this purpose. Other factors that contributed to the peasant awakening were rising educational levels (by 1897 half of male peasants less than 20 years of age could read) and the gradual breakdown of rural isolation due to intensive railway construction and the migration of peasant youth to the towns in search of work. This youth had never lived under serfdom and so was relatively free of the servile mentality it fostered and more open to new ideas.

By the beginning of the twentieth century, the mood in the villages had clearly changed. Peasant disorders grew in number and severity, especially in the areas that suffered most from land shortage. These took the form of refusals to pay rent to the large landowners, seizures of their grain and cattle, cutting their timber, and, in extreme cases, organized armed attacks on estates, during which the manor houses were burned down and the land divided among the villagers.

It should, therefore, be obvious why the aristocracy – except for a relatively small liberal fringe that dwindled in size after its experience with the Revolution of 1905 – was the main support of the autocracy and strongly opposed to democratic change. Democracy would have given power to the peasant majority of the population to carry out land reform, expropriating the aristocracy and terminating its social existence as the dominant class.

Russia's last great peasant uprising, the Pugachev rebellion of 1773–5, occurred just 15 years before the French Revolution. Both Russia and France at that time were overwhelmingly peasant societies and both revolts were directed against an absolute monarchy and the aristocracy upon which it rested. But the Russian uprising failed, while the French Revolution succeeded because the French peasants found allies in the cities – the bourgeoisie and the sans-culottes (the “small people” – artisans, small merchants, members of the liberal professions, wage-laborers). These urban classes provided the revolution with a striking force at the very heart of political power, the capital city and the other major urban centers, with a program for remaking the state and society, and with a degree of centralized organization that the peasants, scattered about the countryside, could not have achieved on their own.

In contrast, the Russian peasants that rose up in 1773–5 found no allies in the cities, because the rare cities that existed were mainly administrative centers and garrisons rather than vital centers of industry, commerce, and culture, as in Western Europe. Russia's artisanal industries were located in the villages. As late as the mid-nineteenth century, western observers were struck by the rural appearance of the towns. Without allies in the cities and a clear program for remaking the state, the Pugachev rebellion proved no match for the centralized power of the autocracy.

Urban Society and Working-Class Ferment

The political weakness of Russian urban society, due to economic backwardness, helps to explain why the absolute monarchy was able to hold on for so long in Russia. But the impetus for change came, ironically, from the state itself when it began to promote industrialization in the second half of the nineteenth century, mainly for military reasons. In doing so, it brought into existence the social force that would ultimately be its undoing. That force would not be the bourgeoisie, as in France of 1789, but a class that in 1789 had not yet existed – the working class, and in particular its industrial cohort.

Two new urban classes came into being in Russia almost simultaneously in the second half, and especially last quarter, of the nineteenth century: the bourgeoisie, owners of the large factories, mines, banks, construction, transport, and commercial enterprises; and the working class, people who owned none of those things and so to survive had to sell their labor-power to the owners of those enterprises in return for wages.

The Russian bourgeoisie was both economically and politically dependent on the autocracy and so not eager for democratic change. Because the domestic market for manufactured goods was weak, due to the poverty of the mass of the population, the industrialists' fortunes depended heavily on state policies that promoted industrialization: the state was the main source of factory orders for heavy industrial goods (especially for railway construction and armaments); it maintained high tariff barriers to protect Russian industry from foreign competition; it guaranteed foreign loans and itself subsidized Russian enterprises; its highly regressive tax policy placed the major burden of public finances on the laboring classes (the workers and peasants). And last but certainly not least, it kept wages low and the workers in line through severe repression of any attempts to organize unions or syndicalist organizations and to take collective action.

Although the bourgeoisie did not itself wield political power and did not strongly aspire to it, its members nevertheless enjoyed considerable influence with the state. Tsarist officials dominated gatherings of the industrial magnates (until the 1905 Revolution the state allowed no truly independent sociopolitical organizations), but, on the other hand, the industrialists knew they could count on a sympathetic hearing from state officials. Except for a very small liberal fringe among the textile mill owners – textiles were one of the few sectors that developed without state support in response to popular consumer demand – the bourgeoisie did not manifest any serious opposition to the autocracy, except for a very brief period during the 1905 Revolution, and even then its aim was not to overthrow the monarchy but to avoid popular revolution.

A related cause of the lack of enthusiasm for democratic change among the bourgeoisie was the militancy of Russia's workers: the employers did not relish the prospect of facing this restive class without the backing of the tsar's repressive apparatus, its police force and army. In 1913 wage-laborers employed in the various economic sectors, both urban and rural, numbered almost 18 million (not including family members) in a total population of about 159 million. The militant core of the working class, those engaged in manual trades in large-scale industry and mining, numbered 3.35 million, to which one could add the 800,000 employees of the railroads.

But these numbers do not reflect the workers' real social and political strength. From the late 1890s onward, the industrial workers showed themselves to be the most formidable opponents of the autocracy. And soon they took the lead in the struggle for democracy. Several factors account for this. In the first place, they were highly exploited – only skilled workers earned enough to be able to rent a room or an apartment and to raise a family. The rest lived together, sharing “corners” of rooms in overcrowded tenements in the cities' outskirts. At work, they put in long hours (up to 11 and even 12 hours a day, six days a week, though this was partially mitigated by the large number of public religious holidays), often in unsanitary and dangerous conditions. And they were subject to the arbitrary, degrading despotism of foremen and higher administrative personnel, including the widespread practice of fines (docking of wages for violation of rules or defective output) and even physical abuse.

At the same time, workers had no legal avenue of collective defense against their employers. Nor could they count on the state to intercede on their behalf, since the authorities, except in the most flagrant cases of abuse, took the side of the employers. Besides, in return for the state's inadequate protection (a weak labor law was introduced in 1886 in response to a particularly ferocious strike), workers were told to abandon all claim to freedom of association, including the right to form trade unions, let alone political parties.

However, misery does not of itself provoke revolt. It can just as often foster acquiescence, depending on the context. Revolt requires a sense of human dignity and the confidence that collective action can bring positive change. Writing in the 1840s about England, Friedrich Engels noted that only through struggle could English workers avoid being reduced to the state of dumb beasts. That would explain why the vanguard of the Russian labor movement, those who drew the great mass of workers behind them, were the more skilled workers, mostly concentrated in the metalworking industry. Although often born in the countryside, these were the most urbanized contingent of the working class, having shed traditional peasant meekness along with their ties to the countryside. These workers were literate; they manifested pride in their profession; and they could aspire to half-decent living conditions. Yet they had no rights, either at work or outside of it, where they were treated as pariahs by “polite society.” For all these reasons, St. Petersburg, Russia’s capital, which had the highest concentration of large metalworking factories, became the radical center of the labor movement and the locomotive of the revolution.

The very large size of Russian factories was one of the factors that favored militant class consciousness and organization. These plants gathered together thousands, in a number of cases more than ten thousand, workers in a single site. The high level of concentration of the workforce was a result of Russia’s late industrialization, which allowed its industry to adopt the latest production methods from the West, skipping the stage of small-scale, artisan production. Another consequence of Russia’s late industrialization was that the ideological outlook of the labor movement, virtually from the start, was influenced by Marxism, a theory and worldview that crystallized the experience of a century of labor struggles in the West.

The spread of Marxist influence, thanks to the efforts of the radical intelligentsia, was facilitated by the weak hold of liberal ideology on Russian society, even on the bourgeoisie. This meant that as the official semi-feudal ideology – “Autocracy, Orthodoxy, and Nationality” – lost its grip on workers’ minds, as they increasingly came up against violent state repression, Marxism encountered no competing ideology. Karl Kautsky, leading theoretician of the German Social Democratic Party and later an opponent of the October Revolution, observed that nowhere else had Marxism sunk such deep roots into the workers’ consciousness.

The concentration of industrial workers in the capital and other major urban centers, their capacity to paralyze the economy by collectively withdrawing their labor, the absence of any legal recourse for grievances, the ideological openness to the Marxist analysis of the antagonistic interests that opposed labor to capital and to the state – all this contributed to making the Russian working class into the most formidable opponent of both the autocracy and the bourgeoisie.

One of the first displays of the workers’ political potential was the general strike of 1896–7 in the textile mills of St. Petersburg. It began in May 1896 over non-payment for the days off during the coronation of Nicholas II. But the workers’ main demand soon changed to the reduction of the workday from 13 to ten and a half hours. This strike displayed several new features: it was a concerted, disciplined action involving 20,000 workers in many mills; in each mill the workers elected strike committees and also representatives to maintain contact among the striking plants; and workers in other sectors gave financial support to the strikers. In addition, a small group of Marxist workers and intellectuals, including Lenin, were active, writing and distributing leaflets. After three weeks the strike ended in failure, but it erupted anew in January 1897, finally forcing the tsar to concede a maximum 11-and-a-half-hour working day. This was the first time that the organized pressure of any popular elements in society had forced the tsar to make concessions from his autocratic principles and directly to outside pressure from society.

The Intelligentsia

There is some dispute about the origins of the term “intelligentsia,” but the view is widespread that the expression originated in nineteenth-century Russia. Objectively, “intelligentsia” represents those drawn from various classes, occupying positions requiring advanced education or learning, members of the liberal professions, engineers, journalists, scientists and technical experts, academics, teachers, and students. But in Russia the term “intelligentsia” also included the moral concern with “accursed questions”: the fate of Russia, and a dedication to its people’s freedom and welfare.

That a large part of the intelligentsia, whose numbers increased rapidly with industrialization, opposed the autocracy is not surprising, given the latter’s reactionary, obscurantist character and its unyielding opposition to any public initiative or autonomous organization on the intelligentsia’s part. Most of its members were attracted to liberalism, which, except for a brief period in 1905, eschewed revolutionary methods of social and political change. A minority, however, adhered to various socialist currents that looked to the revolutionary overthrow of absolutism and, in return, suffered severe persecution.

While the liberal movement remained an affair of the intelligentsia, toward the beginning of the twentieth century the socialist minority of the intelligentsia eventually established contact with the workers and peasants. The clandestine socialist parties that were formed served as schools for the eventual emergence of a worker and, to some degree, also a peasant "intelligentsia." It was during and especially after the Revolution of 1905–7 that the different socialist parties were able to establish strong, unwavering influence among the laboring classes.

The Nationalities

Russia was a multinational empire, in which ethnic Russians constituted only 44 percent of the population, according to the 1897 census. The Ukrainians, a related Slav people, made up 18 percent; the various Turkic-speaking peoples (mostly nomadic and Muslim), 11 percent; Poles, 7 percent; Byelorussians, 5 percent; Jews, 4 percent; and Finns, 2.7 percent. There were also numerous smaller ethnic groups or nationalities, as they were called in Russia. Most of these lived relatively compactly in regions on the periphery of the empire. The central part of the empire was predominantly Russian, as were most cities.

Socialists referred to the Russian empire as the "prison of peoples" because of tsarism's refusal of any measure of autonomy to the minorities and because of its policies of ethnic and religious discrimination and persecution, including enforced Russification and conversion to the Greek Orthodox religion. Since most of the national minorities, even more than the Russians, were predominantly peasants and lived a quite isolated life, the main political aspiration of their popular classes was land reform, not national autonomy or independence. The bearers of the nationalist movements were the urban intelligentsia and the petty bourgeoisie. But where class and national antagonism overlapped, for example in Latvia, where the landlords were aristocrats of German origin and the peasants Latvian, the result tended to be especially explosive. For similar reasons, the labor movement in the Polish part of the Russian empire also displayed particular militancy.

The national movements were not, in and of themselves, a major moving force in Russia's revolutions. But the disproportionate number of members of the non-Russian minorities that belonged to the various revolutionary parties clearly shows that national oppression made a significant contribution to the revolutions. A survey conducted among students in 1910 found that 80 percent of those of Jewish origin and of the various Caucasian people (mainly Georgians and Armenians) belonged to left-wing parties.

The Political Parties

Russia's parties can roughly be divided into two groups: those that looked to revolution for democratic change, essentially the socialist parties, which drew their support from the popular classes and from the leftist minority of the intelligentsia, and the non-socialist parties, which rejected revolution (most also rejected democracy) and drew their support from the propertied classes and the majority of the intelligentsia. The clear class divide that separated the socialist and the non-socialist parties was a striking feature of Russian society. Only the intelligentsia straddled this divide, but its majority nevertheless supported the non-socialist parties and identified with the propertied classes.

Since political parties were illegal in Russia until the Revolution of 1905, the non-revolutionary parties were not formed until that year, although an informal predecessor of the main liberal party, the Constitutional Democrats (Kadets), had been established clandestinely in 1902. The Kadet Party was suspended in a sociopolitical void between the basically reactionary propertied classes, on one hand, and the revolutionary laboring classes, on the other. For example, on the all-important question of land reform, it called for fair compensation of aristocratic landowners who were to be expropriated, a position that could satisfy neither the landowners, for whom the loss of their land was tantamount to social death as the dominant class, nor the peasants, who believed that all the land should be in the hands of those who worked it themselves. Only for a brief period during the 1905 Revolution did the Kadets contemplate revolutionary action as a means of obtaining democratic change.

Farther to the right were the Octobrists, named after the tsar's Manifesto of October 1905, which granted civil liberties and created a legislature with limited powers and system of representation highly skewed in favor of the propertied classes.

That was as far toward democracy as the Octobrist Party, which was close to the industrial bourgeoisie, was prepared to go, though on the eve of the world war it did temporarily refuse to support the government. On the extreme right was the Union of Russian People (Black Hundreds), a reactionary monarchist party which, as noted, enjoyed the tsar's patronage.

There were two main socialist currents, both of which looked to revolution for achieving democracy. The populists drew their main support from the peasantry, although they were also active among urban workers; the Marxists, on the other hand, had their social base almost exclusively among urban workers.

The main populist party, the Social Revolutionaries (SRs), lacked a coherent organization and ideology, but its members looked to the peasants as the leading force in a revolution to establish a democratic republic, socialize the land, making it available to the peasants according to need, and introduce the eight-hour workday. The development of collective forms of control over the rural and urban economy would eventually pave the way for socialism. However, the left (maximalist) wing of the SR Party believed that socialism should be the immediate goal of the revolution.

Besides their basically peasant orientation, the SRs were distinguished by their espousal of terrorism, mainly the assassination of odious government officials. The role of terrorism, assigned to an independent combat group within the party, was to disorganize the enemy, educate the people by undermining the regime's prestige, and defend the party against its enemies. At the height of the Revolution of 1905, between November 1905 and October 1906, a total of 3,611 government officials of various ranks were killed or wounded, many, if not most, at the hands of SRs. Several attempts were made on the life of the hated prime minister, Peter Stolypin, responsible for the vicious suppression of that revolution, until he was finally killed in 1911.

Russia's social democrats, who sought their base in the urban working class, envisioned the coming revolution as liberal democratic, not socialist. As Marxists, they believed socialism was impossible in a poor country, since egalitarianism in the context of generalized poverty would inevitably reproduce the inequality in new forms. Moreover, workers, the class that was objectively interested in collective management of the economy (because they had no property of their own to defend), constituted only a minority of the society. As for the peasants, despite collectivistic village traditions, they aspired to individual working of the land, if not outright private ownership.

Despite their shared orientation, the social democrats split early on into two factions and eventually parties, the Mensheviks and Bolsheviks. The initial division occurred at the Second Congress of the Russian Social Democratic Workers' Party in 1903, ostensibly over organizational differences. But as often occurs in political life, the true nature of the split, which was over revolutionary strategy, became clear only later, after the defeat of the Revolution of 1905. Despite a widely held misconception among historians, the organizational differences that separated Mensheviks and Bolsheviks were not serious. The widespread image of the Bolsheviks as a highly disciplined organization of mostly intellectual, professional (full-time) revolutionaries does not correspond to historical reality. It is true that in conditions of harsh repression, when a party activist could expect to remain free for only a few months before being arrested, the party emphasized conspiracy and discipline, and membership was limited to dedicated revolutionaries – though most of these were workers. But in the periods of relative freedom opened by the revolutionary struggle (1905–7, 1912–14, and 1917), the party functioned in an open, democratic manner with much room for debate and local initiative, certainly no less so than did the Mensheviks. Rather than an elitist group of professional revolutionaries, the Bolshevik Party before the October Revolution should be viewed as an integral part of the working class. That was its real source of strength.

Although Russia gave the world two leading anarchist figures (both aristocrats), Mikhail Bakunin and Peter Kropotkin, anarchism, which is characterized by deep mistrust of the state in any form and by the rejection of party organization and electoral activity in favor of direct action, especially the general strike and insurrection, found only limited support among industrial workers. It was rather more successful among sailors and peasants, especially during the Civil War of 1918–21.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism, Russia; Bakunin, Mikhail Alexandrovich (1814–1876); Bolsheviks; Decembrists to the Rise of Russian Marxism; French Revolution,

1789–1794; Kautsky, Karl (1854–1938); Kropotkin, Peter (1842–1921); Lenin, Vladimir Ilyich (1870–1924); Marxism; Pugachev's Rebellion, 1773–1775; Russia, Revolution of 1905–1907; Russia, Revolution of February/March 1917; Russia, Revolution of October/November 1917; Russian Civil War, 1918–1924; Russian Revolutionary Labor Upsurge, 1912–1914; Soviet Union, Fall of; Trotsky, Leon (1879–1940); War Communism and the Rise of the Soviet Union

References and Suggested Readings

- Haimson, L. (1955) The Russian Marxists and the Origins of Bolshevism. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Kochan, L. (1978) Russia in Revolution, 1890–1918. London: Grenada.
- Manning, R. (1982) The Crisis of the Old Order in Russia: Gentry and Government. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Shukman, H. (Ed.) (1994) The Blackwell Encyclopedia of the Russian Revolution. Oxford: Blackwell.
- Wood, A. (2003) The Origins of the Russian Revolution 1861–1917. New York: Routledge.

Russia, temperance movement, 1858–1860

Yury V. Bosin

Before 1712, the Russian alcohol market operated under state monopoly for the benefit of large agricultural interests. Peter the Great annulled the state monopoly and alcohol concessions became an exclusive mechanism of alcohol supply and retail for more than 150 years to 1863.

Every four years, the government arranged alcohol auctions. Concessionaires bid for the rights to retail alcohol, charging the price that not only covered their investment but also made them a quick fortune. Economically, concessions were very effective, contributing to almost 40 percent of the Russian budget. For consumers, the concession system was a burden and meant economic hardship. Vodka, consumed more than any other alcohol product, was considered out of the price range of average peasants, and in many cases it was adulterated. Despite the rise in prices and concern as to its authenticity, liquor retailing was ubiquitous and taverns mushroomed, reaching 77,386 by 1860. Alcoholism plagued Russia, causing massive poverty and degradation.

The Crimean War from 1853 to 1856 depleted Russian finances and in order to raise revenues, the government increased the auction price of alcohol by 40 million rubles. In a chain reaction, concessionaires raised retail prices by nearly three times – from 3.5 rubles to 8 to 10 rubles for a bucket of vodka. In turn, mass anger led to the formation of the temperance movement. The movement emerged in Russia's western provinces as entire villages ruled to abstain from drinking while picketing liquor establishments. By 1859, temperance committees spread across 32 Russian provinces.

As alcohol sales plummeted, retail prices dropped to 0.5 rubles a bucket, and in some localities retailers offered vodka free. But protests nonetheless gained momentum as 220 drinking shops were destroyed during the summer of 1859. The government arrested 780 people in an attempt to prevent the movement from expanding. However, because of widespread opposition, it was forced to replace its alcohol concessions with an excise tax on January 1, 1863.

SEE ALSO: Bulavin's Rebellion, 1707–1708; Decembrists to the Rise of Russian Marxism; Pugachev's Rebellion, 1773–1775

References and Suggested Readings

- Avrich, P. (1976) Russian Rebels, 1600–1800: Four Great Rebellions Which Shook the Russian State in the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries. New York: W. W. Norton.
- Bazilevich, K. V. (1936) Urban Uprisings in Moscow State in the 17th Century. Moscow and Leningrad (in Russian).
- Bogoiavlensky, S. K. (1941) Khovansky's Rebellion in Historical Notes, Vol. 10. Moscow (in Russian).
- Buganov, V. I. (1964) Moscow Riot of 1662. Moscow (in Russian).
- Buganov, V. I. (1986) Moscow Chronicles: Popular Uprisings in the 11th–18th Centuries. Moscow (in Russian).
- Field, C. (1947) The Great Cossack: The Rebellion of Sten'ka Razin against Alexis Michaelovitch, Tsar of all the Russias. London: H. Jenkins.
- Fyodorov, V. A. (1962) The Peasants' Temperance Movement of 1858–61 in the Revolutionary Situation in Russia in 1959–1961. Moscow (in Russian).
- Gessen, S. Y. (1932) Cholera Riots (1830–2). Moscow (in Russian).
- Gessen, S. Y. (1961–70) The Peasants' War in Russia in 1773–1775: Pugachev's Rebellion, Vols. 1–3. Leningrad (in Russian).
- Lebedev, V. I. (1955) S. T. Razin's Rebellion (1667–1671). Moscow (in Russian).
- Peasants' Wars in Russia in the 17th–18th Centuries* (1966) Moscow and Leningrad (in Russian).

- Pod'yapolskaya, E. P. (1962) Bulavin's Rebellion of 1707–1706. Moscow (in Russian).
- McGrew, R. E. (1965) Russia and the Cholera: 1823–1832. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.
- Smirnov, I. I. (1951) Bolotnikov's Rebellion of 1606–1607. Moscow (in Russian).
- Tikhomirov, M. N. (1955) Peasant and Urban Riots in Russia in the 11th–13th Centuries. Moscow (in Russian).

Russian Civil War, 1918–1924

David Mandel

A Bolshevik Government or an All-Socialist Coalition?

Historians often attribute the formation of a one-party regime after the October Revolution to the Bolsheviks' thirst for power. But an examination of the actual developments shows that this is another case of reading history backwards. The Soviet state did eventually come to be ruled by a one-party regime. But does that prove that the Bolsheviks began with that intention?

The workers welcomed the October Revolution overwhelmingly positively with a mixture of relief and hope. However, among the left-leaning intelligentsia – technical and administrative employees (in the private and public sectors), journalists, engineers, a large part of the teachers and students – who mostly supported the moderate socialists, there was considerable opposition to the soviets' seizure of power. A Menshevik-Internationalist (left Menshevik – the Mensheviks were the moderate wing of Russian Marxism) observer noted that “until recently, the predominant type of intelligent was the intelligent-populist, sighing sympathetically over the lot of our ‘smaller brethren.’ Now, alas, this is an anachronism. In his place appears the malevolent intelligent, hostile to the muzhik [peasant], the workers, the entire benighted toiling mass. . . . And it is neither the excesses of the October Days nor the madness of Bolshevism that have caused this. The leave-taking of the intelligentsia began long ago, almost on the morrow of the [February] Revolution.”

Among workers themselves, the most serious opposition came from the executive committee of the Railroad Union, where Menshevik-

Internationalists held the majority. The railway union leadership demanded the formation of a “homogeneous socialist government,” that is, a coalition of all the socialist parties. It backed up the demand on October 28 with a strike threat. The left Socialist Revolutionaries (SRs – a peasant-oriented, populist party) also supported this demand and threatened to follow the Menshevik-Internationalists in boycotting the new Central Executive Committee (CEC) of Soviets, elected at the Second Congress of Soviets on October 25, 1917. (The Julian calendar, used in Russia until January 21, 1918, was 13 days behind the Gregorian calendar, in use in most other countries.)

The mass of workers, their organizations (the Central Soviet of Factory Committees, the Petrograd soviet, the Trade Union Council – all led by Bolsheviks) and also a majority of the Bolshevik Party leadership itself also favored the formation of a coalition government of the socialist parties. Everyone recognized the danger of isolation of the workers from the soldiers and peasantry, who mostly supported Bolshevik positions but not necessarily the Bolshevik Party itself. But the danger of isolation of the masses from the left intelligentsia also loomed large. Workers understood that they sorely needed the help of educated elements of society to run the state and the economy effectively. Fear of isolation was a dominant theme of speakers at the conferences of workers' organizations both before and after October. Finally, socialist unity was seen as a guarantee against civil war among the popular classes themselves.

On the question of a socialist coalition government, Lenin and Trotsky found themselves in a minority within their own party's Central Committee. They argued that the presence of the moderate socialists, who continued to insist on the inclusion of liberals in the government, would only paralyze the government at a time when decisive action was most needed. But almost everyone else wanted a socialist coalition government.

The problem was, however, that the basis for such a coalition was lacking. The Bolsheviks and the vast majority of workers were adamant that the government be responsible solely to the Congress of Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies that had voted to take power in October. The Menshevik-Internationalists, for their part, rejected this, arguing that a government responsible only to the soviets was too narrow a political base for the revolutionary government. (It was not too clear whom else they wanted to include, as the Congress represented the workers, soldiers, and eventually peasants.)

During the Russian Civil War (1918–24), the Red Army successfully defended the newly formed Bolshevik government against interventionist anti-Bolshevik forces. Images and texts from that era often cast the revolutionary struggle in terms of good and evil. This portrait from 1919 entitled “The Struggle of the Red Knight against the Dark Force” explicitly refers to the “dark forces” that commonly denote devils and other evil spirits in Russian folklore. (David King Collection)

As for the moderate socialists, they wanted nothing less than to annul the October insurrection that had transferred power from the provisional government, a coalition of liberals and moderate socialists, to the soviets. They demanded a government responsible to a revamped version of the “pre-parliament,” that is, an unrepresentative assembly that had been convened in September 1917 by the provisional government to avoid calling the constituent assembly and that included liberals, representatives of the propertied classes. Meanwhile, representatives of the newly elected CEC of Soviets, in which the Bolsheviks held a majority, would be only a minority in their proposed coalition government. They also demanded the liberation of the ministers of the provisional government and the cadet officers who had fought against the soviet forces in the October insurrection, the reopening of the bourgeois press that had been closed for subversion after October (following the earlier example of the provisional government, which had closed the left socialist press), and that the capital’s armed forces be placed under command of Petrograd’s municipal government.

When these unbridgeable differences finally became clear in the course of the negotiations sponsored by the Railroad Union, support for a “homogeneous socialist government” within the Bolshevik Party and among the workers evaporated. This was further aided by the fact that the threat to Petrograd from General Krasnov’s troops and the fighting between soviet and bourgeois forces in Moscow had ended in victory for the soviets, alleviating fears of civil war. Nevertheless, a minority of the Bolshevik Central Committee, including some members of the new government, resigned in protest over the termination of the negotiations.

The left SRs, on the other hand, realized, as one of their leaders stated, that “even if we had achieved a ‘homogeneous government,’ it would really have been a coalition with the most radical part of the bourgeoisie [he meant the moderate socialists]. . . . Once both sides realized their error – and the defensists [moderate socialists] realized it first, adopting from the start an irreconcilable position – any agreement fell away of its own.”

The Menshevik-Internationalists also dropped their boycott of the CEC, though they still refused to participate in a government responsible solely to the soviets. But in early December the left SRs decided to enter a coalition soviet government with the Bolsheviks, occupying the posts of Commissars for Agriculture, Justice, and Post and Telegraph. This was preceded by an Extraordinary Congress of Peasant Deputies (“extraordinary” because not all peasant soviets had sent delegates) on November 10–25. Against the wishes of the outgoing Peasant Executive Committee, the delegates to the congress had been elected from the district level and so reflected more faithfully the mood in the villages, as opposed to delegates who would have been elected by provincial assemblies. As a result this congress had many more ordinary, poorer peasant delegates than the previous one in May 1917, which had been dominated by better-off peasants and SR intellectuals. One hundred and ten of the 255 delegates were left SRs; the moderate SRs had 50 delegates, the Bolsheviks 55, and 40 delegates had no party affiliation. The moderate SRs just walked out of the congress almost as soon as it opened.

On November 15, 1917, the Peasant Congress endorsed the platform of the Second Congress of Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies (of October 25–6) and decided to merge its newly elected Executive Committee with the CEC of the Congress of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies. Accompanied by an honor guard and an orchestra, the peasant deputies marched en masse to the Smolnyi Institute for a joint session with the workers' and soldiers' CEC. "The atmosphere was exalted, joyous," wrote the left SR paper. The workers, who feared political isolation and the danger of civil war, greeted this union with enthusiasm and relief. The Second Peasant Congress in December, with full representation of the villages, later confirmed the decisions of this extraordinary congress.

This was unity from below of the workers and peasants. Missing were the vast majority of the left-leaning intelligentsia. "At the moment when the old bourgeois chains of the state are being smashed by the people," wrote a left SR member of the Central Soviet of Factory Committees, "we see that the intelligentsia is deserting it. People who have had the good fortune to receive a scientific education are abandoning the toiling people who carried them on their exhausted, lacerated shoulders. As if that were not enough, in departing, they are mocking the people's helplessness, its illiteracy, its inability to carry out painlessly the great transformations." Some of the intelligentsia, left-leaning and otherwise, that opposed the October Revolution would eventually return to serve the Soviet regime – there would be little alternative, save emigration. But when they did, it was cap in hand, as they had abandoned the people in their time of greatest need.

The Constituent Assembly

Russian society after October thus irretrievably split, with the popular classes, who supported soviet power, a government of the toiling classes, on one side, and the propertied classes (bourgeoisie, aristocracy, and the intelligentsia sympathetic to them), who wanted to impose their own dictatorship on the toiling classes, on the other. The February Revolution had briefly papered over these class divisions, which had very deep roots in Russia's social structure and history. It had taken a mere eight months for the social contradictions to manifest themselves again with all their force, paving the way for the October Revolution. In the popular mind the October Revolution was seen as an act of defense of the goals of the February Revolution, which were essentially liberal democratic and not socialist. This act of defense was now directed, however, against the propertied classes and the liberals (political representatives of the propertied classes) who had amply demonstrated their hostility to those goals in the intervening months. A constituent assembly, elected by equal and universal suffrage and assigned the task of proclaiming a democratic republic, had always been a central element of the popular conception of the revolution. Its repeated postponement by the provisional government was seen by the people as yet another indication of its counterrevolutionary nature. The soviet government organized the elections as scheduled on November 12–14, 1917. The Bolsheviks won 24 percent of the vote, mostly from the workers as well as from soldiers in the urban garrisons and at the fronts nearest to the capital, where they had been in contact with workers. Forty-one percent of the vote went to the SRs. In fact, if one includes the various related national parties, the SRs obtained an absolute majority. The Mensheviks, a strictly urban party, were reduced to only 3 percent of the vote, much of it from Georgia, the only region where they had peasant support. The Kadets (Constitutional Democrats – liberals, the main party of the propertied classes) and parties further to the right obtained only slightly over 8 percent, mostly from Moscow and Petrograd, where they were greatly outdistanced by the Bolsheviks.

The election results showed that most of the peasants remained loyal to their traditional party, the SRs, despite the fact that the party's leaders, who had participated in the provisional government, had refused to carry out land reform, the central element of the party's program, nor had they sought peace or held the promised elections to the constituent assembly. Because of their isolated way of life and their contradictory aspirations (at once egalitarian but also favoring individual farming and the free market), peasants have generally had great difficulty orienting themselves in national politics.

At the same time, it should be noted that most peasants in November 1917 supported the positions espoused by the left SRs, as shown by the Extraordinary Peasant Congress. Already in August 1917, 40 percent of the delegates to the SR Party Congress were supporters of the left wing. But since the left SRs had decided only in the fall to split from the moderates, it was too late for them to run a separate slate in the constituent assembly elections. And the leaders of the SR Party, in putting together the still united list, did not respect the relative weight of the two wings. The peasants were therefore unable to clearly express their preference for the SRs who supported soviet power as opposed to those who wanted to restore a coalition government with liberals. Nevertheless, it is reasonable to assume that at least half and probably considerably more of the votes cast for the SR list of candidates were, in fact, intended for its left wing.

The Bolsheviks and the left SRs, the two parties supporting soviet power, together won a majority of votes to the constituent assembly. Ignoring this fact, historians consistently exaggerate the strength of the moderates in the constituent assembly, whose dispersal by the soviet government is widely considered the regime's original sin. The decision to disperse the assembly was taken because the majority of deputies were moderate socialists opposed to a government responsible to the soviets and who wanted to restore a coalition government with liberal participation.

In practice, this meant annulment of the October Revolution, something neither the Bolsheviks nor the workers were prepared to contemplate. The workers had taken part in the elections to the constituent assembly, a longstanding demand of the Russian labor movement, with a view to obtaining its confirmation of soviet power, a sort of all-class approval of a government exclusively of the toiling classes. (The constituent assembly was elected by universal suffrage, while the propertied classes had no representation in the soviets.) The following resolution of a meeting of the workers of the Treugol'nik Rubber Factory, adopted before the constituent assembly convened, reflected the thinking of the vast majority of workers: "The constituent assembly must be one that expresses the genuine will of the toiling masses, and the only guarantee of that and of the defense of all the gains of the revolution is the preservation and further consolidation of the workers', soldiers' and peasants' power. And, therefore: Long live the power of the Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies!" As for the peasants, they had already put into practice the Soviet Congress's Decree on Land. One can, therefore, assume that they shared the workers' position, as later events would confirm.

When it became clear that the constituent assembly would not endorse soviet power, most popular support for it evaporated. The Bolshevik and left SR press openly stated that the assembly would be shut down if it opposed soviet power. The SRs and some dissident Mensheviks tried to organize demonstrations in its support, but the response was quite weak, both in the cities and in the countryside. The Menshevik-Internationalist newspaper remarked that there were few workers in the January 5 demonstration for the constituent assembly in Petrograd, although many students and white-collar employees took part.

The popular reaction to the dissolution of the constituent assembly was likewise weak. But even though the Kadets and SRs had repeatedly postponed elections to the constituent assembly when they were in power after the February Revolution, that did not prevent them from subsequently making it their rallying cry for armed struggle against soviet power. The Menshevik Party, in which the left (internationalist) wing dominated after the October Revolution, decided to end its boycott of the CEC of Soviets. But it still refused to participate in the soviet government and, like the SRs, demanded that the constituent assembly be reconvened and that it replace the soviets as the basis of the government.

Was the constituent assembly a viable alternative to soviet power? Many historians argue that the constituent assembly was Russia's last chance for democracy and to avoid civil war. But to defend that position is to entrust the constituent assembly with some sort of magical powers to heal profound class divisions in Russian society, divisions that did not begin with the October Revolution or with the dispersal of the constituent assembly, but which were, in fact, the underlying cause of those events and also of the failure to form an all-socialist coalition government.

And the class antagonisms would only deepen. Workers were deeply embittered by strikes that state, municipal, bank employees, even doctors and teachers organized against soviet power on the morrow of the October Revolution. They had never struck under the tsarist regime. Then on January 1, 1918, a car in which Lenin was riding was fired upon. This led to calls for red terror against the opponents of the soviet regime. The Kadet Party was banned, and its leaders made subject to arrest. The January 5 demonstration in support of the constituent assembly resulted in 21 dead, mostly among the demonstrators, who were fired upon by red guards. In the thickening atmosphere of mutual class hatred, there was little room for a government of the “center” that could reunite society around some kind of compromise policy. During the civil war that raged from the spring of 1918 to the spring of 1921, the moderate SRs were nowhere able to establish liberal democratic regimes in those areas where they took power. Instead, their governments unleashed terror against the pro-soviet elements of the population.

Those who argue that the constituent assembly represented a real alternative to soviet power and civil war note that during its one day of deliberations, the assembly adopted a decree on land reform similar to that of the Soviet Congress and that it approved the ceasefire negotiated by the soviet government. These were policies that the mass of the population supported. But this begs the question as to why the moderate socialists had refused to do this when they held power in the provisional government. The reason they did it now was clearly the October Revolution: the soviet government was now breathing down their necks. Without that threat, their insistence on accommodation with the liberals would have continued to paralyze their capacity to respond to the popular will.

The real, not imagined, alternative to a soviet government was not the constituent assembly but right-wing dictatorship based on the propertied classes. Such a regime would have wreaked a terrible vengeance on the slaves and drudges who had dared to rise up against their masters, as history has regularly demonstrated. Russian workers and peasants did not have far to look to see what the alternative to soviet power would be. In neighboring Finland, whose independence from Russia the soviet government recognized on December 5, 1918, a workers’ and peasants’ soviet revolution was crushed with the aid of German troops in April 1918. This was followed by massive, brutal repression of the popular classes. When the city of Tampere fell, the majority of the captured 11,000 red guards were executed on the spot; 80,000 workers and peasants, including women and children, were interned in concentrations camps. Of these, 12,000 died of starvation and typhus, not counting those executed. The rest were eventually freed conditionally. (To put these figures in perspective, it should be noted that Finland at the time had a population of less than three million.)

“The alternative to Bolshevism, had it failed to survive the ordeal of civil war,” wrote the American historian W. Chamberlin in his classic work The Russian Revolution (1935), “would not have been Chernov [leader of the SRs] opening a Constituent Assembly, elected according to the most modern rules of equal suffrage and proportional representation, but a military dictator, a Kolchak or Denikin, riding into Moscow on a white horse to the accompaniment of the clanging of the bells of the old capital’s hundreds of churches.”

The “Obscene Peace” of Brest-Litovsk

Following the dissolution of the constituent assembly, the central issue was peace. Despite repeated soviet offers for peace talks, the only reaction from the Entente was US President Wilson’s “Fourteen Points.” Coming only on the heels of the October Revolution, they were clearly intended to counteract its anti-imperialist appeal. (Wilson’s points were largely ignored after the war when the victorious allies imposed a punitive victors’ peace and made good their secret imperialist treaties.) On the other hand, the Central Powers agreed readily to a ceasefire and accepted soviet conditions not to transfer troops from the east to the western front and to allow fraternization among their respective troops. These soviet conditions reflected the Bolsheviks’ concern to show that they were not seeking a separate peace, which would have objectively been siding with German imperialism against the Entente.

The soviet government’s goal was to win time to allow the revolutionary situation to ripen in the West. The Bolsheviks remained convinced that the fate of their revolution depended on that international support. The soviet government devoted significant resources to revolutionary propaganda, opening a special department to train propagandists from among the prisoners of war and publishing papers in all the languages of the Central Powers. Immediately upon signing the ceasefire, Trotsky, commissar of foreign affairs, issued an appeal “to the toiling, oppressed, and exhausted peoples of Europe,” in which he explained the soviet government’s goals and summoned them to rise up against their governments: “The workers and soldiers must wrest the business of peace from the criminal hands of the bourgeoisie. . . . We have the right to demand this of you, because this is what we have done in our own country.”

Meanwhile, Germany pressed for the peace talks to begin. These took place in the border town of Brest-Litovsk. The soviets dragged them out, using them as a platform for international revolutionary propaganda. That propaganda fell on fertile ground, especially in Germany and Austria, where the mood of the workers was turning increasingly radical. The Central Powers themselves gave a boost to the soviet efforts when they demanded, as the price for peace, their annexation or quasi-annexation of Russia’s Baltic territories from Finland to Lithuania, as well as the Russian part of Poland, the Ukraine and the Caucasus, and three billion rubles in war reparations.

News of these imperialist demands set off a wave of mass political strikes in the industrial regions of Austria in January 1918, spreading as far as Budapest and provoking mutinies in the fleet. At mass meetings imbued with genuine revolutionary fervor and solidarity with the Russian Revolution, the workers elected their first councils on the soviet model. They sent a delegation to their government, which was in the process of bringing troops from the Russian front to put down the strikes, and obtained a false pledge not to make territorial demands and to recognize the right of peoples to self-determination. Despite heated resistance from the rank-and-file workers, the Austrian social democratic leaders decided to call off the strike rather than to test its revolutionary potential.

Encouraged by the Austrians, German workers began a wave of strikes at the end of January that soon engulfed the entire country, involving over a million people. In Berlin, 400,000 took part in a general strike led by revolutionary shop stewards in the name of “workers’ councils.” They demanded peace without annexations and democracy for Germany. The government responded by declaring martial law, closing down the trade unions, and making mass arrests. The strike lasted a whole week, but as in Austria, the troops were not yet ready to come over to the side of workers, and the leaders of the Social Democratic Party were anything but revolutionary. Indeed, they were staunch supporters of the war. As in Austria, the German revolution would break out only ten months later, and the social democratic leadership would do everything in its power, including sending proto-fascist troops to repress the workers and their councils, to keep the revolution within bounds acceptable to the propertied classes.

France had already witnessed mutinies and political strikes in 1917. In December, the left wing became a majority in the Socialist Party and withdrew its ministers from the war cabinet. In January 1918, responding to the soviet appeal to French, British, and Italian workers, a general strike erupted in Lyons, spread to the factories of Saint-Etienne and the Loire, and finally reached Paris. A conference of workers’ councils demanded immediate peace “without victors or vanquished.” But the revolutionary potential of the French workers’ movement would only manifest itself once the war ended. The same was true of Italy, where the impact of the October Revolution was strongest of all the countries at war. The response to the October Revolution was generally weaker in the Anglo-Saxon countries, but nevertheless very tangible.

The protest movement in the countries of the Central Powers greatly encouraged the soviets. But when the Germans presented an ultimatum, threatening to launch a military offensive, the soviet government finally had to take a decision. Except for sailors and some strongly pro-Bolshevik Latvian troops, the old army was useless and fast melting away. The workers, as opposed to the soldiers, were more prepared to fight, but their untrained and poorly armed red guards did not count for much against the seasoned German army.

Lenin favored acceptance of the German terms. He argued that the soviets had done everything they possibly could to accelerate the outbreak of revolution in the West. That revolution would surely come, but no one could predict when. The peace that Germany was offering was indeed “obscene,” but the soviet government was not signing it willingly – the Germans were holding a knife to the throat of the revolution. The soviets had proved their internationalist commitment and they would continue to fulfill it after the peace treaty was signed. It would contribute nothing to sacrifice the Russian foothold of the world revolution on the altar of an abstract principle. The working classes in the West would understand.

But Lenin again found himself in a minority in his party's Central Committee. The majority continued to see a separate peace as a betrayal of internationalist principles as well as of the revolutions in the Baltic region, Finland, and the Ukraine, which the Germans would certainly crush. They called for a revolutionary war against the German imperialists. The Petrograd Bolshevik organization also supported this position. In the end, a compromise, proposed by Trotsky, was adopted. Trotsky agreed with Lenin that Russia simply did not have the forces to wage war with Germany. Instead he proposed that the soviets unilaterally declare the war ended, allowing the Germans to launch their offensive. The hope was that this criminal act would finally provoke revolutions in the Central countries.

But the revolutions did not begin. Meanwhile, the Germans had hardened their demands, and their offensive, launched on February 17, 1918, met with little resistance and soon threatened Petrograd itself. (The capital was hastily transferred to Moscow.) This immediate threat brought the majority of the Central Committee around to accepting a separate peace. (Trotsky himself abstained.) This position was ratified at the Fourth Congress of Soviets on March 15 by a vote of 784 to 261 (115 abstentions). Lenin told the Congress that the treaty was only a “breathing space,” a temporary respite that would allow the revolution to consolidate itself in Russia while the revolution in the West matured.

The Mensheviks and the left SRs opposed the peace treaty. The left SRs resigned from the government, leaving the Bolsheviks again as the sole governing party. The left SRs remained active, however, in the CEC of Soviets and in various governmental bodies, including the Red Army and the Cheka, the All-Russian Commission for Struggle Against Counterrevolution and Sabotage (the political police). The left SR position was not, however, supported by the mass of peasants and it cost them much support in the villages. M. Natanson, one of the left SR leaders, told a party congress in April 1918 that the opposition to the peace and the resignation from the government had been nothing more than a “beautiful pose” and were “deeply wrong” policies. “The people wanted to save at least something, so that they could begin to realize the gains of the revolution in that part of Russia.”

Nationalization of Industry and the “Food Dictatorship”

The Bolsheviks, like the workers, had shifted between February and October 1917 from their initial conception of the revolution as liberal democratic to the idea of soviet power, a government from which the propertied classes were excluded. But the economic program of October Revolution was not clear. While it was hoped that the October Revolution would spark socialist revolutions in the developed West, it was also recognized that Russia, still a quite backward, mostly peasant society, lacked the conditions for a collectivist, democratically managed, socialist economy.

For the interim, Lenin proposed what he termed “state capitalism.” By this he meant the establishment of state regulation of the economy, which would remain capitalist. This kind of state regulation of the economy was being practiced by all the warring countries. The difference in Russia would be that a workers’ and peasants’ government would be doing the regulating in the interests of the people, not the bourgeoisie.

A key concern was to prevent the bourgeoisie from sabotaging the economy or simply fleeing with its capital. The Decree on Workers’ Control went to meet this concern by extending the rights of the workers’ committees to intervene in management, but not calling to remove the private administrations or nationalize the factories. The banks, a key lever for economic control, were, however, nationalized at the end of 1917. The government also repudiated the foreign debt contracted by the previous governments. Private ownership of large houses was abolished, as was payment of dividends, transactions involving stocks, and private ownership of gold.

But pressure for more radical measures was coming from the workers themselves, desperate to save their jobs and livelihoods. As supply problems grew worse – by the start of 1918, only half of Russia’s locomotives were still functioning – and the owners increasingly lost interest in running their factories, the workers pressured their factory committees to take over management completely. The committees, realizing the enormity of the problems they faced, in turn pressured the government to nationalize the enterprises. Already in January 1918, the soviet of the town of Shuya in the central industrial region, which had been desperately struggling to keep its textile mills open, demanded nationalization of the textile industry. The Petrograd Conference of Factory Committees also demanded nationalization of industry.

By the time the Decree on Nationalization was issued in June 1918, many factories had already passed into state hands as a result of their abandonment by the owners. But the greater part of Russian industry was already no longer functioning. The number of employed industrial workers in Petrograd in September 1918 had been reduced to less than a third of that at the start of 1917. At the same time, because of the desperate shortage of fuel and raw materials and the priority of supplying the Red Army with the little that was still being produced, management of industry became increasingly centralized in the hands of central state economic organs, pushing aside the factory committees with their local perspectives.

Meanwhile, the food shortage became critical in the spring and summer of 1918, directly threatening the survival of the soviet regime, which was entering its worst crisis of the civil war. Hunger fostered opposition even among the workers. Just how desperate the situation had become can be judged by Lenin's telegram of May 11, addressed to all soviets and food committees, pleading and demanding they send food at once to save the "red capital . . . on the verge of perishing." And matters only grew worse in the course of the summer. But the poor peasants – 10.5 million households out of 15 million – were also hit hard, since they were net consumers of grain. They had received land, though not always enough. Moreover, they lacked the resources – seed, horses, inventory – to work it, and the state, though it tried, was unable to supply what was needed. But an even more urgent problem was that of feeding the Red Army, then in the process of formation.

The grain problem had several sources: the breakdown of transport; the equalization of land holdings (the soviet government did not enforce the Bolsheviks' idea of creating large state farms on part of the confiscated estates), which reduced the amount of grain produced for the market; and the preference of the better-off peasants for selling their grain at speculative, free market prices rather than delivering it to the state at lower fixed prices.

Formally, a state grain monopoly had already been established in March 1917 by the liberal provisional government with the support of the moderate socialists and of the rural cooperatives that they dominated. This meant, in principle, the prohibition of free trade in grain, which had to be sold to the state at fixed prices. But the government, under pressure from the merchants and wealthier farmers, had been unable or unwilling to put the monopoly into effect. Now, the Mensheviks, SRs, and the cooperatives were attacking the soviet government for its efforts to impose this same monopoly. They called for a return to free trade. This demand was supported by the wealthy and middle peasants, who were often able to abolish or circumvent the grain monopoly in their villages and regions. But the government felt it had no choice but to enforce the monopoly centrally and to apply as much force as it could to make it respected. To this end, it organized armed detachments of workers and committees of the peasant poor to seize the surplus from the wealthier peasants. This, in effect, unleashed class war in the villages, with all the accompanying cruelty and excesses on both sides, provoking localized peasant risings.

Like the nationalization of industry, historians often attribute the Bolsheviks' grain policy to ideological fanaticism. There was undoubtedly much that was not well thought out in the soviet grain policy. But these historians pass much too lightly over the utterly desperate circumstances of a very large part of Russia's population and of the government itself, which faced an extreme military emergency and the collapse of industry and transport. They also forget that the last provisional government, which had been anything but Marxist, had itself attempted to use the army to enforce the grain monopoly and that the democratically elected Soviet and Food Committee Congress in early 1918 also demanded enforcement of the grain monopoly. Moreover, it is not clear what the alternative might have been. In villages and districts where the local soviets allowed free trade, the supply of grain did not increase. But wealthy peasants who had surpluses were in a position to dictate their will to the soviets and even to disperse those they did not like.

The left SRs did not oppose the grain monopoly as such, but criticized the centralization and the use of force to extract the grain. They argued that it should be left to the local rural soviets to fight the kulaks, though the local soviets could ask for help from the center. The problem was that in conditions of famine, the kulaks, with a surplus of grain, were often able to control the local soviets, pushing aside the poor peasants and abolishing the food monopoly. In this they were usually supported by the middle peasants, who in the net grain-consuming regions produced little surplus themselves but still had enough means to engage in lucrative private trade in grain. Eventually, the Bolsheviks themselves, in an effort to attract the middle peasants, relaxed their policy, disbanding the “committees of the poor,” raising the state purchasing price, and increasing the amount of grain that producers were allowed to keep. But the centralized, coercive grain monopoly remained in effect until the end of the civil war.

The centralized management of nationalized industry and the abolition of the free market in grain, and eventually in all basic consumer goods, along with the spread of rationing and the fall into disuse of money, were all part of what was given the name of “war communism” after the civil war. These measures, at least in the extreme form they took, had not figured in the Bolshevik program in October. They were first and foremost practical responses to the collapse of industry, famine, and the military threat. It is doubtful that they would have been undertaken had full-scale civil war not erupted in the spring of 1918 and raged on for almost three more desperate years. This is supported by the fact that the government returned to something resembling its initial idea of “state capitalism” – a mixed economy with the state retaining the controlling levers – as soon as the civil war ended.

Nevertheless, many historians have insisted that “war communism” was driven by the Bolsheviks’ ideology. There is no evidence – and much to the contrary – to indicate that the Bolshevik leaders saw these measures, based on mass coercion and absolute scarcity, as “building socialism.” At most one can say that they made a virtue out of necessity, presenting the measures as necessary elements of a revolutionary struggle and that they expressed no regret about them. The Bolsheviks’ actions were also influenced by the hope, which had a basis in reality in 1918–20, that revolutions in the West would come quickly, allowing the Russian Revolution to resolve its contradictions. That this international factor influenced the thinking of socialists is supported by the impact that the revolutions in Germany and Austro-Hungary in the fall of 1918 had on Menshevik policy, when the party changed its attitude to soviet power, recognizing it “as a fact of reality” and dropping the call for a constituent assembly.

Foreign Intervention

Until the spring of 1918, the soviets’ armed forces, weak though they were, had been capable of dealing with the hostile domestic forces arrayed against them. As for the German troops, they seemed satisfied with the vast territories already under their control and showed no inclination to move against the soviet government.

All this changed with the intervention of the Entente at the end of May. This took the form of 30,000 Czechoslovak troops, formerly Russian prisoners of war (the territory of the future Czechoslovakia was part of the Austro-Hungarian empire), who were making their way by rail across Russia toward the Pacific Ocean, from there to join the Entente armies fighting in France. The SRs, who had been planning an armed uprising against the soviets, were looking to just such an outside force to crystallize domestic opposition. They had been in contact with the Czechoslovak officers for this purpose. The soviet government’s attempt to disarm the Czechoslovak troops sparked the uprising, which soon overthrew the soviets in the towns all along the rail lines from the middle Volga to the Pacific.

This uprising had the blessing of the Entente powers. It was followed in August 1918 by the arrival of Japanese, British, American, and French troops at the Pacific port of Vladivostok. The same month, a British naval force landed in Arkhangelsk on the White Sea to coincide with an anti-soviet uprising there, depriving the soviet government of its last port. A small British force also temporarily occupied the oil center of Baku. French and British forces later intervened in the Black Sea area in the south.

The dire military situation, together with the food crisis, made this the lowest point of the civil war for the soviet regime, whose existence was hanging on a thread. The Soviet Republic was reduced to roughly the same territory as the fifteenth-century principality of Muscovy, from which the Russian empire had begun.

At various times during the civil war, Polish, Canadian, Romanian, and Greek forces also participated in the intervention. But direct foreign military intervention was relatively limited (for reasons to be examined later), though it did give important moral encouragement to the Whites.

On the other hand, material support from the capitalist powers played a much greater role. Together with the economic and diplomatic blockade of Soviet Russia, it undoubtedly helped to prolong the civil war far beyond the period it would have lasted had the Whites fought with their own resources alone. Foreign intervention also played an important role in keeping the revolution confined to Russia, preventing or defeating soviet revolutions in neighboring Finland, Latvia, Estonia, Lithuania, Poland, and Hungary, where popular ferment was very strong.

The Party Dictatorship

The crisis of the spring and summer of 1918 was the context of the soviet state's transformation into a one-party regime, though Mensheviks and to some extent SRs continued to participate at different levels in the soviets until the end of the civil war, subject to varying degrees of repression. As with "war communism," most historians view the transformation of the soviet state as integral to the unfolding logic of "bolshivism," though they are hard pressed to find anything in the pre-1918 writings of Lenin or any prominent Bolshevik supporting a one-party dictatorship. On the other hand, historians tend to play down the influence of objective circumstances on the development of the dictatorship and they studiously avoid discussion of the realism and probable consequences of the alternatives.

This said, the Bolsheviks did centralize state power as best they could – not very well, in fact, given the prevailing conditions of semi-anarchy – and they were ruthless not only toward counterrevolutionary forces linked to the domestic and foreign propertied classes, but also toward opposition that did not collaborate with the Whites, including Mensheviks and peasant insurgents. Sometimes even neutral citizens who refused to collaborate with the war effort fell victim to government repression. Thus, during the great transport crisis of February 1919, the soviet authorities threatened to shoot peasant hostages unless the rail lines were cleared of snow by the villagers. The Bolsheviks expressed no regret about these measures, which they regarded as a normal part of the revolutionary process.

The political regime quickly evolved in two parallel directions. The first was the shift of power within the soviets from the general assemblies of delegates to the executive committees and full-time staff. This was accompanied by measures of centralization that restricted the autonomy of the local soviets in favor of the provincial soviets and the national government.

The second direction was the establishment of the Bolshevik monopoly in the soviets. Both Mensheviks and SRs (as opposed to the left SRs) continued to reject the soviet power in favor of the constituent assembly. Until their formal split in August 1918, there were two factions in the Menshevik Party. The left majority continued to argue that the soviets were too narrow a base for a viable government and believed an all-socialist coalition was possible. The additional forces that this would bring into the government would not be the propertied classes, whom they rejected, but the intelligentsia and the wealthier peasants. At the same time, they rejected the use of violent methods against the soviet government and called on party members to participate in the soviets, though not in the government, with the aim of helping the workers to shed their illusions. The right Mensheviks, on the other hand, opposed participation in the soviets, and favored an alliance with the bourgeoisie and the use of force to overthrow the government and to establish a "bourgeois democracy." Despite these serious divergences, the party remained unified until August 1918, when the right Mensheviks were expelled for joining with SRs and Kadets in an organization aimed at the armed overthrow of the soviet government.

The SRs were close in their positions to the right Mensheviks, but, given their terrorist heritage, they were much more ready to resort to arms. A week before the Czechoslovak rising, the SR Party Council adopted a policy of armed overthrow of the soviet government and resurrection of the constituent assembly. It gave its approval to the negotiations that the party's Central Committee was conducting with Entente representatives in preparing the uprising. Party leader V. Chernov later claimed the party had played an instrumental role in linking up the Czechoslovak command with local counterrevolutionary forces in the Urals and Volga region. The SRs were also very active in anti-soviet movements in the Ukraine.

Meanwhile, on the background of the industrial collapse and famine, the Mensheviks and SRs were making headway among the workers, at least those still employed in the factories. Of all the major cities, the situation was worst in Petrograd. In the first six months of 1918 it received only one-third of the grain of the corresponding period of 1917. The workers' ration did not cover even basic physical needs, and the illegal, free market price of bread was beyond their reach. However, the growth of discontent among these workers was based more on their suffering and disillusionment than on any faith that the constituent assembly offered a solution. Workers, on the whole, were not prepared actively to oppose the soviet government. This was shown by the weak response to the Mensheviks' call for a political strike on July 2, 1918.

The failure of that strike was in part due to arrests made among the organizers in the days leading up to it. But the Mensheviks' paper itself had to admit that "the organizers . . . undoubtedly overestimated the dissatisfaction of the ordinary people, they showed insufficient understanding of the psychology of the working class, did not take into account all the threads, that despite everything, still tie the masses to the regime." Most workers remained wedded, as in October, to soviet power. And the Bolsheviks, along with the left SRs, were the only parties defending it, however much government practice diverged from initial soviet democracy. The Bolsheviks pointed out to the workers that the Kadets and tsarist generals were organizing their counterrevolution under the banner of the constituent assembly, too. They could also point to the fate of the Ukraine, where the overthrow of the soviets by a nationalist SR uprising resulted not in liberal democracy but in the right-wing dictatorship of General Skoropadskii, who was being propped up by German troops. Despite the suffering, the dashed hopes for immediate improvement of their situation, and the repressive measures against the opposition, the Bolshevik argument that the choice was "soviet power or Skoropadskii" carried weight. In the end, the Bolsheviks' call to "summon every last ounce of strength or surrender" prevailed. As noted earlier, even the majority of Mensheviks abandoned their support for the constituent assembly and recognized soviet power at the end of December 1918, adding, however, that they saw it as a "fact of reality" and were not in agreement on the principle.

In this context of combined economic, internal political, and military crises, the CEC of Soviets decided on June 14, 1918 to expel the SRs and Mensheviks and instructed local soviets to do the same. Formally, these parties were not outlawed. But most of their papers were shut down and they were subject to varying levels of persecution.

This left the Bolsheviks and left SRs. Besides their opposition to the peasant "committees of the poor," the left SRs also wanted to tear up the peace treaty with Germany. To this end, they organized the assassination of the German ambassador in Moscow on July 6, 1918 and prepared a rather confused plan for armed defense against the Bolsheviks' inevitable response. This defense looked a lot like an insurrection, during which the left SRs occupied strategic points in the capital. After this revolt was crushed, the left SRs suffered the same fate as the Mensheviks and the SRs. Many left SR members took their distance from the party leadership and continued to work with the soviet government, fighting and dying alongside the communists. (The Bolsheviks had thus renamed themselves to emphasize their break with the discredited social democratic parties that supported the war.)

The situation became even worse for the SRs and Mensheviks when on August 30, 1918, at the most desperate point of the civil war, an SR terrorist shot and seriously wounded Lenin in Moscow. The same day, a White officer assassinated M. Uritskii, head of the Petrograd Cheka. In response, all the socialist parties, except the Bolsheviks, were formally outlawed. Even worse, this was followed by a ferocious outburst of "red terror," that is, mass and, to a significant degree, arbitrary repression. In Petrograd, more than 500 people were shot, including four former tsarist ministers; in Moscow more than 100 were summarily executed, and so it went. Among the victims were also members of the socialist parties.

There are no reliable figures for the deaths from "red terror" during the civil war. One estimate puts them as 50,000, not including people killed without government sanction by mobs and soldiers. "White terror" was certainly no less widely practiced. The "red terror" reached its height in August–September 1918 and relaxed soon after, when the anti-Bolshevik front on the Volga collapsed and the revolution in Germany ended the occupation of Ukraine. In November 1918, Menshevik and SR papers were again allowed to publish, a political amnesty was declared, and hostages released. The Cheka was deprived of its power to sentence offenders, except in areas under martial law. However, the Menshevik and SR press was closed down once again when the White armies of Kolchak in Siberia and Denikin in southern Russia posed an immediate, mortal threat in the spring and summer of 1919. Their defeat led to a new relaxation of repression, but that too ended when the Poles invaded and conquered most of the Ukraine in the spring of 1920, before being repulsed by the Red Army.

These oscillations in the level of repression support the view that repression was a response to perceived emergency, not an ideological project of the Bolsheviks. But here again, the Bolsheviks expressed no regrets about what they saw as an integral part of the revolutionary process. This ruthlessness was a far cry from the initial tolerant attitude of the period of the October Revolution, when Trotsky was careful to avoid bloodshed and when Petrograd workers released General Krasnov on his word of honor. Civil wars are the most brutal of wars. And the Russian civil war came on the heels of three and a half years of an unspeakable imperialist slaughter in a country that had been ruled for centuries by the most barbarous regime of Europe.

Who is to Blame?

Among most historians both in the West and in contemporary Russia, the Bolsheviks are blamed for the civil war and its terrible consequences. But was the October Revolution the cause of the civil war? And was it itself, as is so often implied, an arbitrary act of the Bolsheviks, or even of Lenin himself?

Without entering into a full-blown discussion of these questions, one can at least point to a few relatively undisputed facts. The first is that there would have been no October Revolution had the liberals and moderate socialists in the provisional government not refused to do what the peasants, workers, and soldiers, the great majority of the population, insistently demanded: to summon the constituent assembly immediately after the February Revolution; to carry out the land reform; to denounce the imperialist war aims in favor of an active, democratic peace policy; to legislate the eight-hour day; and to regulate economic activity in order to halt the economic dislocation and prevent collapse. These demands were not exorbitant. They corresponded to any basic conception of justice and democracy. Yet, the provisional government rejected them because they threatened the interests of the propertied classes, a small minority of the population. In attributing responsibility for the civil war, surely this must be considered.

Secondly, one must ask if the October Revolution was really the result of an arbitrary decision by Bolshevik leaders. To argue that is to imply that there were more acceptable alternatives that would have allowed Russia to avoid civil war. But for the workers the alternative to the soviet (not “Bolshevik,” as most histories write) seizure of power in October was a victorious counterrevolution, a right-wing military dictatorship, and a terrible bloodletting that would surely have followed. There is much to support the workers’ view. We have argued that the October Revolution for the laboring classes was first and foremost an act of defense of the democratic revolution of February, not a mindless, headlong rush to utopia.

