

THE INTERNATIONAL ENCYCLOPEDIA OF
REVOLUTION AND PROTEST

1500 to the Present

A-C | VOLUME 1

The International
Encyclopedia of Revolution and Protest

1500 to the Present

Volume I

Edited by Immanuel Ness

 WILEY-BLACKWELL

A John Wiley & Sons, Ltd., Publication

The International Encyclopedia of Revolution and Protest

The International
Encyclopedia of Revolution and Protest

1500 to the Present

Volume I

Edited by Immanuel Ness

 WILEY-BLACKWELL

A John Wiley & Sons, Ltd., Publication

This edition first published 2009

© 2009 Blackwell Publishing Ltd

Blackwell Publishing was acquired by John Wiley & Sons in February 2007. Blackwell's publishing program has been merged with Wiley's global Scientific, Technical, and Medical business to form Wiley-Blackwell.

Registered Office

John Wiley & Sons Ltd, The Atrium, Southern Gate, Chichester, West Sussex, PO19 8SQ, United Kingdom

Editorial Offices

350 Main Street, Malden, MA 02148-5020, USA

9600 Garsington Road, Oxford, OX4 2DQ, UK

The Atrium, Southern Gate, Chichester, West Sussex, PO19 8SQ, UK

For details of our global editorial offices, for customer services, and for information about how to apply for permission to reuse the copyright material in this book please see our website at www.wiley.com/wiley-blackwell.

The right of Immanuel Ness to be identified as the author of the editorial material in this work has been asserted in accordance with the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988.

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise, except as permitted by the UK Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988, without the prior permission of the publisher.

Wiley also publishes its books in a variety of electronic formats. Some content that appears in print may not be available in electronic books.

Designations used by companies to distinguish their products are often claimed as trademarks. All brand names and product names used in this book are trade names, service marks, trademarks or registered trademarks of their respective owners. The publisher is not associated with any product or vendor mentioned in this book. This publication is designed to provide accurate and authoritative information in regard to the subject matter covered. It is sold on the understanding that the publisher is not engaged in rendering professional services. If professional advice or other expert assistance is required, the services of a competent professional should be sought.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

The international encyclopedia of revolution and protest: 1500 to the present / edited by Immanuel Ness.
v. <1> cm.

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 978-1-4051-8464-9 (hardcover: alk. paper)

1. Revolutions—History—Encyclopedias. 2. Protest movements—History—Encyclopedias.

I. Ness, Immanuel.

JC491.I58 2009

303.6'403—dc22

2008049806

A catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library.

Set in 9.5/11pt Ehrhardt by Graphicraft Limited, Hong Kong

Printed in Singapore by Markono Print Media Pte Ltd

Contents

Notes on the Editors (volume I only)	vi
About the General Editor	vi
Board of Editors	vi
Board of Associate and Advisory Editors	viii
Notes on Contributors (volume I only)	xiv
Introduction (volume I only)	lxix
Acknowledgments (volume I only)	lxxiv
Chronology of Significant Events in Revolution and Protest (volume I only)	lxxvi
Lexicon (volume I only)	xciv
Maps (volumes I–VII)	cl
Volume I: Abalone Alliance – Blanqui, Louis Auguste (1805–1881)	1
Volume II: Bloch, Marc (1886–1944) – Davis, Angela (b. 1944)	405
Volume III: Davitt, Michael (1846–1906) – Haiti, resistance to US occupation	967
Volume IV: Haiti, revolutionary revolts, 1790s – Lempira (d. 1537)	1525
Volume V: Lenin, Vladimir Ilyich (1870–1924) – People’s Liberation Front of Sri Lanka (JVP)	2081
Volume VI: Peoples’ Global Action Network – Sturm und Drang	2635
Volume VII: Sudan, Aba Island Rebellion, 1970 – Zwingli, Huldrych (1484–1531)	3191
Volume VIII: Index	3751

Notes on the Editors

About the General Editor

Immanuel Ness is professor of political science at Brooklyn College of the City University of New York, United States. He is also the director of the Graduate Political Science Program at the Brooklyn College Graduate Center for Worker Education in New York City, and has taught at the University of Massachusetts, Amherst, Union Leadership Program, and Cornell University Institute for Labor Relations. His current research examines the working class and labor unions from a historical-comparative perspective in a regional, national, and global context.

Ness is the author of numerous scholarly articles, chapters, review essays, and books on labor organizing, trade unions, migration, and unemployment, including Immigrants, Unions, and the New US Labor Market (2005) and Chains of Migration (forthcoming), and (as editor) the Encyclopedia of American Social Movements, recipient of an American Library Association Best Reference Award in 2005.

Since 1999, Ness has been editor of Working USA: The Journal of Labor and Society (Wiley-Blackwell), a peer-review quarterly social science journal on labor and class. He is founder of the Lower East Side Community Labor Coalition, which received a Proclamation from the City Council of New York in 2001 for advancing labor standards in low-wage occupations.

Ness lectures widely at universities and research institutes in the United States, Caribbean, Europe, and in East and South Asia.

Board of Editors

Dario Azzellini is a PhD candidate at the Johann Wolfgang Goethe University in Frankfurt, Germany, where his dissertation is on "Participatory and Protagonistic Democracy in Venezuela." A political scientist, social investigator, author, and artist, he collaborates with research institutes and foundations in Germany, Italy, Bolivia, Colombia, Venezuela, and Mexico. He has written several books and numerous essays, and has produced various documentaries about Colombia, Italy, Nicaragua, Mexico, Venezuela, migration and racism, war, and post-Fordism (for more information, consult www.azzellini.net). For this encyclopedia, Azzellini served as editor for Latin America, the Spanish-speaking Caribbean, and the new left in Italy.

Marcelline Block is currently a PhD candidate at Princeton University, USA, where she was a recipient of a four-year Jacob Javits Fellowship. She has received two Graduate Certificates from Princeton, in the study of women, gender, and sexuality and in media and modernity. Since 2003, Block has taught in numerous departments at Princeton: French, comparative literature, English, politics, the program in visual arts, and the program in the study of women and gender. She is co-editor of Critical Matrix: The Princeton Journal of Women, Gender and Culture and text editor of LINE. She has published articles in American and European journals including Excavatio, La Revue Française de Harvard, and Vingtième siècle. She is currently editing an anthology of essays about feminist film theory, to be published in England in 2008.

Jesse Cohn is associate professor of English at Purdue University North Central, USA. He is the author of Anarchism and the Crisis of Representation: Hermeneutics, Aesthetics, Politics (2007).

Clifford D. Conner is a historian of science. He is the author of A People's History of Science (2005) and of two biographies of revolutionaries: Jean-Paul Marat: Scientist and Revolutionary (1997) and Colonel Despard: The Life and Times of an Anglo-Irish Rebel (2000). He has taught history at John Jay College, City University of New York, USA, and is at present working on a biography of the Irish revolutionary Arthur O'Connor. A long-time partisan of the anti-war and labor movements, he is currently a member of the United Auto Workers local 1981/AFL-CIO (the National Writers' Union).

Rowena Griem is a catalog librarian for Germanic languages at Yale University, USA. She catalogs library materials in a variety of formats, using MARC 21 (MACHine Readable Cataloging), controlled vocabularies, and national cataloging standards. These bibliographic records are contributed to the international database OCLC, allowing scholars to access the materials worldwide. Her academic background is in history (BA from Franklin & Marshall College), comparative literature (MA from the University of Maryland, College Park), and library science (MS from Simmons Graduate School), including semesters in Mainz, Germany, and Vienna, Austria.

Paul Le Blanc is professor of history at La Roche College, USA. He has worked as a teacher, autoworker, shipyard worker, healthcare worker, social caseworker, dishwasher, and agricultural worker. Among his publications are Revolution, Democracy and Socialism: Selected Writings of Vladimir Ilyich Lenin (2008), Marx, Lenin, and the Revolutionary Experience (2006), Black Liberation and the American Dream (2003), A Short History of the US Working Class (1999), Rosa Luxemburg: Reflections and Writings (1999), From Marx to Gramsci (1996), Lenin and the Revolutionary Party (1990), and Permanent Revolution in Nicaragua (1984).

Amy Linch is a visiting instructor in comparative politics at Lehigh University, USA and a PhD candidate in political science at Rutgers University in New Brunswick, NJ. Her research focuses on transitions to democracy through social movements and the role of religion in liberal political thought.

Soma Marik is a reader in history at Ramakrishna Sarada Mission Vivekananda Vidyabhavan, India and has degrees in European history and in women's history. Her publications include Reinterrogating the Classical Marxist Discourses of Revolutionary Democracy (2008), Women Under the Left Front Rule: Expectations Betrayed (with Mira Roy, 2006, 2007), and Garbhaghati Gujarat (co-edited with Maitreyee Chattopadhyay, 2002, 2004). She has done research work on class and gender relationships and on Indian and international socialist and communist movements, and has published around a dozen articles. She has also been a Guest Faculty member in the Department of History, Jadavpur University, as well as the School of Women's Studies, Jadavpur University, India.

Ayokunle Olumuyiwa Omobowale is a lecturer in sociology at the University of Ibadan, Nigeria, where he also received his doctorate degree in sociology. His thesis was entitled "Political Clientelism and Rural Development in Selected Communities in Ibadan, Nigeria." He won the University of Ibadan Postgraduate School Award for scholarly publication in 2007. He was a lecturer at the University of Lagos, Nigeria, from April 2007 to May 2008 and has published numerous articles in journals and edited volumes.

Pierre Rousset is the founding director (1982–1992) and currently Fellow of the International Institute for Research and Education, Amsterdam, the Netherlands. As an activist of the French May '68 generation, he engaged in international solidarity activities and traveled extensively in Asia. Author of Communisme et Nationalisme Vietnamiens (1978), he contributed articles to several books and numerous magazines on Asian revolutions, national and social movements, and on ecology and the global justice movement. He edits a website (www.europe-solidaire.org) in French and English for the association Europe solidaire sans frontières (ESSF).

Beverly Tomek is a specialist in anti-slavery and race relations in the United States. She has published peer-reviewed articles in American Nineteenth-Century History and Pennsylvania History: A Journal of Mid-Atlantic Studies, and is completing a book on the anti-slavery and colonization movement in Pennsylvania. She also contributed to and edited the "Anti-Slavery/Abolition" section of the Encyclopedia of American Social Movements. She has been awarded fellowships by the Pew-Younger Foundation, the Library Company of Philadelphia, and the Historical Society of Pennsylvania.

Ben Trott is a PhD candidate at the Free University of Berlin, Germany. His work focuses on class composition and struggle in post-Fordism, along with questions of political organization. He co-edited Shut Them Down! The G8, Gleneagles 2005 and the Movement of Movements (2005) and a special issue of ephemera: theory and politics in organization (Issue 7.1) on immaterial and affective labor. Additionally, he worked as a co-editor on the German edition of We Are Everywhere: The Irresistible Rise of Global Anti-Capitalism (2003), published as Wir Sind Ueberall: Weltweit. Unwiderstehlich. Antikapitalistisch (2007).

Board of Associate and Advisory Editors

Debdas Banerjee is professor of economics at the Institute of Development Studies at Calcutta University, Kolkata, West Bengal, India. He is author of numerous books and articles on Indian and global labor markets, labor standards, privatization, and corporations. His books include Globalization, Industrial Restructuring and Labour Standards: Where India Meets the World (2005) and (as co-editor) Labor, Globalization and the State: Workers, Women and Migrants Confront Neoliberalism (2007).

Walden Bello is a senior analyst at Focus on the Global South, a program of Chulalongkorn University's Social Research Institute, Bangkok, Thailand. In 2003 he received the Right Livelihood Award, also known as the Alternative Nobel Prize, for his efforts to educate civil society about the effects of and alternatives to corporate globalization. An academic as well as an activist, Bello has been a full professor at the University of the Philippines at Diliman since 1997, and has served as visiting professor at the University of California, USA. He has authored numerous books on Asian issues and globalization, including Dilemmas of Domination: The Unmaking of the American Empire (2005), The Anti-Development State: The Political Economy of Permanent Crisis in the Philippines (2004), and Deglobalization: Ideas for a New World Economy (2004). He is currently a columnist for the Philippine Daily Inquirer and Foreign Policy in Focus.

Elaine Bernard is executive director of the Labor and Worklife Program at Harvard Law School and the Harvard Trade Union Program,

USA. Bernard has conducted courses on a wide variety of topics for unions, community groups, universities, and government departments. Her research and teaching interests are in the areas of international comparative labor movements and the role of unions in promoting civil society, democracy, and economic growth.

Robert Brenner is director of the Center for Social Theory and professor of comparative history at the University of California, Los Angeles, USA. His recent interests include early modern European history, economic, social, and religious history, agrarian history, social theory/Marxism, and Tudor–Stuart England. His publications include The Economics of Global Turbulence (2006) and The Boom and the Bubble: The US in the World Economy (2002) as well as numerous other books and articles on the history of modern capitalism.

Stephen Eric Bronner is currently professor (II) of political science at Rutgers University, USA. Senior editor of Logos, an interdisciplinary Internet journal, he is also chair of the executive committee of US Academics for Peace and a member of the advisory board of Conscience International. Bronner's works have been translated into a dozen languages and include: Socialism Unbound (2001), A Rumor about the Jews: Anti-Semitism, Conspiracy, and the "Protocols of Zion" (2003), Reclaiming the Enlightenment: Toward a Politics of Radical Engagement (2004), Blood in the Sand: Imperial Fantasies, Rightwing Ambitions, and the Erosion of American Democracy (2005), and Peace Out of Reach: Middle Eastern Travels and the Search for Reconciliation (2007).

Dennis Brutus is a poet and activist, as well as a Fellow at the Center for Civil Society, University of KwaZulu, Natal, South Africa. Brutus was awarded the Langston Hughes Medallion from City University of New York in 1986 and the Paul Robeson Award for Artistic Excellence, Political Consciousness, and Integrity in 1989. Publications since 1984 include Salutes and Censures (1984), Airs and Tributes (1988), and Still the Sirens (1993).

Paul Buhle is founder and former editor of the new left journal Radical America, and later founder of the Oral History of the American Left archive, New York University, USA. He has written or edited 34 books, mostly on the history of radicalism, most recently in comic art format.

Verity Burgmann is professor of political science at the University of Melbourne, Australia. A veteran of the protest movements of the 1970s, she has remained active in left-wing campaigns over the past three decades. She is a leading Australian academic authority on labor history and politics, environmental politics, anti-corporate radicalism, and other contemporary protest movements. She has published extensively in these areas and is a Fellow of the Academy of the Social Sciences in Australia.

Dimitrios K. Dalakoglou is a PhD candidate in anthropology at University College London, UK, focusing on the anthropology of politics. He studies cross-border infrastructure, the material culture of migration, and ethnic relationships and post-socialist urban topography in Albania. His doctoral dissertation is titled “An Anthropology of the Road” and he has conducted ethnographic research in Albania, Greece, and the Netherlands.

Lawrence Davidson is a professor of history at West Chester University, USA. His specialization is in the history of American relations with the Middle East. He is the author of America's Palestine: Popular and Official Perceptions from Balfour to Israeli Statehood (2001) and Islamic Fundamentalism (2003). Presently, he is working on a book entitled Privatizing American Foreign Policy. He has also written numerous articles on US perceptions of and policies toward the Middle East. Over the last 20 years Davidson has sought to heighten public awareness of the nature and consequences of US policies in the Middle East.

Geoffroy de Laforcade is an associate professor of Latin American and Caribbean history at Norfolk State University, USA. A former civil rights activist, international journalist, and translator in Europe, he holds a PhD from Yale University, USA and has developed new world-historical curricula in several colleges and universities. His research focuses on labor history, diasporic movements, the transnational articulation of protest and revolution in the Atlantic world, and anarchosyndicalist and socialist traditions in the Southern Americas.

Herbert Docena is research associate with Focus on the Global South, an international policy research and advocacy organization which is affiliated with the Chulalongkorn University Social Research Institute in Bangkok, Thailand. He has written several scholarly journal articles on the reconstruction and political transition in Iraq. Docena is co-editor with Walden Bello and Marissa de Guzman of The Anti-Development State: The Political Economy of Permanent Crisis in the Philippines (2005).

Chris Ealham teaches history at St. Louis University, Madrid, and is professor of history at Lancaster University. He is author of Class, Culture and Conflict in Barcelona, 1898–1937 (2005), among other works on Spanish history. Ealham's research to date has focused on the social, political, and cultural dimensions of the four decades of crisis that preceded the Spanish Civil War and the Revolution of 1936–7. He is especially interested in left-wing and revolutionary movements, particularly Spain's mass anarchist and anarchosyndicalist movements, and the way that space and memory affect social protest. He is currently working on a social history of Spanish migrants in the United States of America, ca. 1855–1945.

Bill Fletcher, Jr. is co-founder of the Center for Labor Renewal, an educator, columnist, and longtime activist. He served as president of TransAfrica Forum and was formerly the education director and later assistant to the president of the AFL-CIO. He is co-author with Fernando Gapasin of Solidarity Divided: The Crisis in Organized Labor and a New Path Toward Social Justice (2008) and author of The Indispensable Ally: Black Workers and the Formation of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, 1934–1943 (2000).

Adolfo Gilly is professor of history at the National Autonomous University of Mexico (UNAM) and is a longtime participant-observer of Latin American revolution. He is the author of numerous books on history and politics, including the classic The Mexican Revolution: A People's History (2006 [1971]). Most recently Gilly has written on Chiapas, and on leading contemporary philosophers and historians, including Walter Benjamin, Karl Polanyi, Antonio Gramsci, Edward P. Thompson, Ranajit Guha, and Guillermo Bonafil Batalla.

Michael Goldfield, a former labor organizer and agitator, is currently professor of industrial relations and human resources in the Political Science Department at Wayne State University, USA. He specializes in the study of labor, race, Marxist theory, and issues of globalization. He is the author of hundreds of articles and monographs, and of numerous books, including The Decline of Organized Labor in the United States (1987), The Color of Politics: Race and the Mainsprings of American Politics (1997), and most recently (with Debdas Banerjee) Labor, Globalization, and the State: Workers, Women, and Migrants Confront Neo-liberalism (2007).

George Gona has taught African history at the Department of History and Archaeology at the University of Nairobi, Kenya, for the last 18 years. In the past four years he has also taught in the Masters in Armed Conflict and Peace Studies Program, which he coordinates. He is currently editing a book entitled Mizizi: Essays in Honour of Prof. G. Muriuki. For this encyclopedia, Gona served as the associate editor for Eastern Africa.

Mike Gonzalez is professor of Latin American studies at the University of Glasgow, UK and until recently was head of Hispanic studies there. Gonzalez has written widely on issues in Latin American culture, literature, and politics. He is the author of Che Guevara and the Cuban Revolution (2005), and his analysis of recent social movements in Latin America appeared in 2008. He co-edited the Routledge Encyclopedias of Contemporary Latin American and Caribbean Culture (2000) and Contemporary Caribbean and Latin American Literature (with Daniel Balderston) in 2004.

Lawrence Goodwyn is Professor Emeritus of History at Duke University, USA. Goodwyn was a former field reporter for the Texas Observer. He specializes in the historical study of comparative social movements, populism, and the American South. He is the author of The Populist Moment: A Short History of Agrarian Revolt in America (1978) and Breaking the Barrier: The Rise of Solidarity in Poland (1991).

J. Megan Greene is associate professor of modern Chinese history at the University of Kansas, USA. Her publications include The Origins of the Developmental State in Taiwan:

Science Policy and the Quest for Modernization (2008), a co-edited volume with Robert Ash titled Taiwan in the 21st Century: Aspects and Limitations of a Development Model (2007), and Imperialism in the Modern World: Sources and Interpretations, co-edited with William D. Bowman and Frank M. Chiteji (2007).

J. Laurence Hare is assistant professor of history at Emory & Henry College, USA. He earned his PhD in modern European history in 2007 from the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. His dissertation, "Claiming Valhalla: Archaeology and National Identity in the German–Danish Borderland, 1830–1950," traces the emergence of archaeology in Schleswig–Holstein and Sønderjylland in order to explore the ways Germans and Danes claimed and contested the distant past as part of the process of building their respective national identities.

Daniel Hémerly, now retired, taught East Asian history at the Paris VII/Denis Diderot University, France. He is the author of Indochina: An Ambiguous Colonization, 1858–1954 (with P. Brocheux, 2008), Ho Chi Minh de l'Indochine au Vietnam (1990), and Révolutionnaires Vietnamiens et Pouvoir Colonial en Indochine (1975). He has contributed to or edited several other books, including Pour une Histoire du Développement: Etats, sociétés, développement (with C. Coquery-Vidrovitch and J. Piel, 2000) and In the Servitude of Power: Energy and Civilization through the Ages (with Jean-Claude Debeir and J.-P. Deléage, 1991).

Gerald Horne is John and Rebecca Moores Professor of History at the University of Houston, USA. His areas of expertise are US history and African and Afro-American studies. Horne's recent publications include The Deepest South: The United States, Brazil and the African Slave Trade (2007), Cold War in a Hot Zone: The United States Confronts Labor and Independence Struggles in the British West Indies (2007), Race Woman: The Lives of Shirley Graham Du Bois (2000), Class Struggle in Hollywood: Moguls, Mobsters, Stars, Reds and Trade Unionists, 1930–1950 (2001), and From the Barrel of a Gun: The US and the War Against Zimbabwe, 1965–1980 (2001).

Masao Inoue is professor of labor studies at the College of Economics at Rikkyo University, Japan. His recent publications include “Small Business in Japan: An Overview of its Structure and Functions,” in Small and Medium-Scale Industry in India and the Model of Japan (ed. K. Odaka and Y. Kiyokawa, 2008), The Struggle for Culture: Labor Dispute at Toho Studio 1946–1948 (2007), and “What has Research into Japanese Industrial Relations Elucidated over 20 years?” in Asian Business and Management 4, 2 (June 2005).

Boris Kanzleiter is currently a PhD student in history at the Free University of Berlin, Germany, studying the student movement of 1968 in Yugoslavia with the help of a scholarship from the Hans Böckler Stiftung of the German Trade Union Federation DGB. He studied history and literature at the Free University Berlin and at the National School of Anthropology and History in Mexico City. He has experience as a journalist and editor, and in adult political education.

Robin D. G. Kelley is professor of history and American studies and ethnicity at the University of Southern California, USA. His research topics include the history of black radical movements in the United States, the African Diaspora, and Africa (notably South Africa); black intellectuals; music; visual culture; imperialism; and organized labor. Recently Kelley’s work has focused on culture and the politics of art, primarily with regard to the history of jazz and related musical forms. He is currently completing books on Thelonious Monk, jazz and modern Africa in the age of decolonialization, and a general narrative of African American history in a global context.

Jason M. Kelly is an assistant professor of British history at Indiana University-Purdue University at Indianapolis, USA. He has authored The Society of Dilettanti: Archaeology and Identity in the British Enlightenment (forthcoming, 2009). His current research is a comparative history of civic responsibility and the political meanings of abolition in modern Britain and the United States. Kelly serves on the Council of the North American Conference on British Studies and is co-editor of H-Albion.

Margaret Levi is the Jere L. Bacharach Professor of International Studies, Department of Political Science, University of Washington, Seattle, USA. She is director of the CHAOS (Comparative Historical Analysis of Organizations and States) Center and formerly the Harry Bridges Chair and Director, the Harry Bridges Center for Labor Studies. Levi is the author of three books, Consent, Dissent, and Patriotism (1997), Of Rule and Revenue (1988), and Bureaucratic Insurgency: The Case of Police Unions (1977). Concurrently, she is working on a range of issues having to do with labor unions and with global justice campaigns. Some of the work builds on the WTO History Project, which she co-directed.

Au Loong Yu is a reporter with Globalization Monitor. He is an activist from Hong Kong who has written extensively on new nationalism in China and the emergence of the “new left.” He is a member of the editorial board of Globalization Monitor, a non-profit organization based in Hong Kong that was founded shortly before the World Trade Organization protests in Seattle in 1999. It has been the chief organization in Hong Kong dedicated to promoting awareness of the negative effects of globalization.

Michael Löwy is research director emeritus at the CNRS (National Center for Scientific Research), Paris, France. His major publications are Georg Lukács: From Romanticism to Bolshevism (1981), On Changing the World: Essays in Political Philosophy, from Karl Marx to Walter Benjamin (1993), Romanticism against the Current of Modernity (with Robert Sayre, 2001), The Theory of Revolution in the Young Marx (2003), and Fire Alarm: Reading Walter Benjamin’s “On the Concept of History” (2005).

Manning Marable is professor of history and political science and founding director of the African American Studies Program, Columbia University, USA. His published works include What Black America Thinks (2002), Dispatches from the Ebony Tower: Intellectuals Confront the African American Experience (2001), and How Capitalism Underdeveloped Black America (2000). He is completing a comprehensive biography of African American leader Malcolm X entitled Malcolm X: A Life of Reinvention.

Bryan D. Palmer is the Canada Research Chair in Canadian Studies at Trent University, Peterborough, Canada. He is the author of numerous books and articles on labor history and the revolutionary left and he edits the journal Labour/Le Travail. Palmer is author of many books, including James P. Cannon and the Origins of the American Revolutionary Left, 1890–1928 (2007) and E. P. Thompson: Objections and Oppositions (1994).

Diogo L. Pinheiro is currently a PhD candidate at Emory University, USA and in 2009 plans to complete his dissertation entitled “Risky Business: The Social Construction of Country Risk Ratings.” His work deals with the intersection of culture and economy.

Frances Fox Piven is distinguished professor of political science and sociology at the City University of New York Graduate Center, USA. She is co-author with Richard Cloward of two landmark historical works, Regulating the Poor (1993) and Poor People’s Movements (1978), and has authored numerous other works. Piven’s accomplishments as a scholar are intertwined with her political activism in the welfare rights movement. She is past president of the American Sociological Association.

Gerardo Rénique is an associate professor of history at the City College of the City University of New York, USA, and member of the board of the Brecht Forum/New York Marxist School. His recent works include “Strategic Challenges for Latin America’s Anti-Neoliberal Insurgency,” in Dispatches from Latin America (ed. Vijay Prashad and Teo Ballvé, 2006). He is a co-producer of the video documentary Land, Rain and Fire: Report from Oaxaca, and is also the author of “People’s War, Dirty War: Cold War Legacy and the End of History in Post-War Peru,” in A Century of Revolution (ed. Greg Grandin and Gilbert Joseph, forthcoming) and “Race, Region and Nation: Sonora’s Anti-Chinese Racism and Mexico’s Post-Revolutionary Nationalism,” in Race and Nation in Modern Latin America (ed. Nancy P. Appelbaum, 2003).

Heidi M. Rimke teaches in the Department of Sociology at the University of Winnipeg, Canada. She specializes in the areas of classical and contemporary social and political theory, historical and political sociology, law, criminology, and the history of the human sciences. Her publications examine the role of popular psychology in neoliberalism, the medicalization of morality in western society, and the history of the doctrine of moral insanity. She is currently researching the psychiatrization of anarchism in addition to a project that examines contemporary biogenic discourses on crime and criminality.

Magda Romanska is an assistant professor and the head of theater studies at Emerson College, USA and a research associate at Harvard University’s Davis Center for Russian and Eurasian Studies, USA. Her articles have appeared in TDR: The Drama Review, Performance Research: A Journal of the Performing Arts, Toronto Slavic Quarterly, Women’s Studies Journal, and The Columbia Encyclopedia of Modern Drama (2007). Her work has also been published in Ghosts, Stories, Histories: Ghost Stories and Alternative Historie (ed. Sladja Blazan, 2007) and The Cultural Politics of Heiner Muller (ed. Dan Friedman, 2007).

Paul Rubinson recently completed his PhD thesis in US history at the University of Texas at Austin, USA. His dissertation, “Containing Science: The US National Security State and Scientists’ Challenge to Nuclear Weapons during the Cold War,” investigates the conflicts over nuclear weapons policy between scientists and the US government during the Cold War. For 2007–8 he received a Smith Richardson Fellowship at Yale University International Security Studies.

Sean Scalmer teaches history at the University of Melbourne, Australia. He is the author or co-author of three books on labor and social movements: Dissent Events (2002), Activist Wisdom (2006), and The Little History of Australian Unionism (2006).

Guillermina S. Seri is assistant professor in the Department of Political Science at Union College, USA, where she teaches courses in Latin American politics and political theory. Seri’s research focuses on the rhetorics and practices of governance embedded in policing, especially in the exercise of discretionary prerogative power by those in charge of policing. Before coming to Union College, Seri was a postdoctoral fellow and a visiting assistant professor in the Program of Peace and Conflict at Colgate University, USA, and she has taught at different universities in Argentina.

Matthew J. Smith is a lecturer in the Department of History and Archaeology at the University of the West Indies, Mona. His area of research includes Haitian political history, with a focus on radicalism and popular movements in the twentieth century. He is the author of Red and Black in Haiti: Radicalism, Conflict, and Political Change, 1934–1957 (forthcoming).

Mauro Stampacchia is a researcher at the Department of Political Science, University of Pisa, Italy, and has taught courses in contemporary history, labor history, and political thought. He has published widely on the subjects of Italian fascism, labor history, and World War II history. He is a contributor to Class in America: An Encyclopedia (2007) and is now translating, editing, and introducing Charles Klopp's Sentences: The Memoirs and Letters of Italian Political Prisoners from Benvenuto Cellini to Aldo Moro.

Michael J. Thompson is a professor of political science at William J. Paterson University, USA. His areas of expertise include German idealism, western Marxism, critical theory, and classical Greek political philosophy and ethical theory. His recent books include The Politics of Inequality: A Political History of the Idea of Economic Inequality in America (2007) and Confronting the New Conservatism: The Rise of the Right in America (2007). He is author of numerous scholarly articles and is the founder and editor of Logos: A Journal of Modern Society and Culture.

Edson I. Urano is lecturer at Sophia University, Faculty of Foreign Studies, Department of Portuguese Language and Luso-Brazilian Studies, Japan. His work focuses on the sociology of work, industrial relations, and international migration. He holds a PhD in economics, and has been researching the migratory process of Latin Americans to Japan and the transnational dynamics of this phenomenon. Additionally, he has analyzed community unionism in Japan as an alternative way to organize peripheral workers in that country, and the meaning of this movement in the context of global social movements.

Lucien van der Walt teaches sociology at the University of Witwatersrand in Johannesburg, South Africa. His research interests lie in the historical sociology of Southern African labor, the study of anarchism and syndicalism, and in political economy, with a focus on neoliberalism. He has published widely on these issues in journals, newspapers, and bulletins, and has been active in unions, social movements, and labor service organizations. Van der Walt is presently completing a two-volume study of the social theory and global history of anarchism and syndicalism over the last 150 years.

Antonios Vradis is a PhD candidate in the Geography Department of the London School of Economics and Political Science, UK. He co-edits Voices of Resistance from Occupied London, an occasional journal looking at all things urban from an anarchist perspective.

Joseph Wilson, professor of political science, Brooklyn College, USA, is the director of the Graduate Center for Worker Education and founding director of the Center for Diversity and Multicultural Studies. A labor scholar and union activist, his works focus on the convergence of class and race. He is author of Tearing Down the Color Bar: A Documentary History and Analysis of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters (1989) and The Re-Education of the American Working Class (1990) as well as contributing editor to The Encyclopedia of American Social Movements (2004) and Race and Labor Matters (2006).

Won Young-su was actively involved in the student movement at Seoul National University, Korea in the early 1980s. After being dismissed for leading a student protest, he was employed as a blue-collar worker organizing laborers for two years. He worked in different social movement organizations, but returned to the labor movement as an activist and researcher. He joined the anti-globalization movement and has been active in international solidarity work. He is author of many articles dealing with issues surrounding the labor and anti-globalization movements.

Notes on Contributors

Animasawun Gbemisola Abdul-Jelil is special assistant on religion and culture to the deputy governor of Ogun State, Abeokuta, Nigeria. He is the author of an Introduction to Conflict Transformation. His doctoral thesis was on methods for sustainable peace between the Hausa and Yoruba of Nigeria, and his current research is on “Godfatherism and Nigeria’s Fourth Republic: Violence and Political Insecurity in Ibadan,” a project sponsored by the Institute for French Research in Africa (IFRA), Nigeria.

Collin Rajasingham Abraham is a social development consultant at the Malaysian Agency for Skills Development. He has a background in the sociology of development, which he studied at the University of Wisconsin, Madison, USA. He helped set up the Sociology Program at Science University in 1970, and has continued to be active in teaching and research since retiring from Science University. He was selected to undertake research in Malaysia for the United Nations Development Program in 2003. More recently, Abraham has published Speaking Out Loud for National Unity and Integration: Social Change and Nation-Building in Contemporary Malaysia (2008).

Kenneth Wayne Ackerson is currently an associate professor of history at his alma mater, Salisbury University in Maryland, USA, where he teaches courses on British imperial, African, and Indian history. He is the author of The African Institution (1807–1827) and the Antislavery Movement in Great Britain (2005).

Barry D. Adam is University Professor of Sociology at the University of Windsor, Ontario, Canada and senior scientist and director of prevention research at Ontario HIV Treatment Network in Toronto. He is author of The Survival of Domination (1978) and The Rise of a Gay and Lesbian Movement (1995), and co-author of Experiencing HIV (1996) and The Global Emergence of Gay and Lesbian Politics (1999). He has also published articles on new social movement theory, on Nicaragua, and on HIV prevention and social aspects of AIDS.

Julius O. Adekunle is an associate professor of African history and culture at Monmouth University, West Long Branch, New Jersey, USA. He has published many articles and book chapters on African politics and culture. He is the author of Politics and Society in Nigeria’s Middle Belt: Borgu and the Emergence of a Political Identity (2004) and Culture and Customs of Rwanda (2007). He is currently working on an edited volume titled Religion in Politics in Modern Nigeria.

Adebusuyi I. Adeniran is a lecturer in sociology at Obafemi Awolowo University, Ile-Ife, Nigeria. His areas of research and teaching include comparative/development studies, African social thought, and political sociology. He is currently pursuing his doctoral degree in development sociology at the University of Lagos, Nigeria. Adeniran’s academic awards include the Unilag Teaching Assistantship and Graduate Fellowship Awards.

Mohamed Adhikari teaches in the Department of Historical Studies, University of Cape Town, South Africa. He has published extensively on the history and politics of colored identity in nineteenth- and twentieth-century South Africa. His publications include (as editor) Straatpraatjes: Language, Politics and Popular Culture in Cape Town, 1909–1922 (1997) and (as co-editor with Les Switzer) South Africa’s Resistance Press: Dissident Voices in the Last Generation of Apartheid (2000) and Not White Enough, Not Black Enough: Racial Identity in the South African Coloured Community (2005). He now works in the field of genocide studies.

Lucille A. Adkins teaches women’s studies and US history at La Roche College, USA. She received her BA in anthropology and her MA in US history at the University of Pittsburgh, where she also did her doctoral work in US social history and women’s studies.

Chris John Agee is adjunct lecturer at the City University of New York and a PhD student in political science at the CUNY Graduate Center, USA. Agee first worked at the Center for Constitutional Rights as a paralegal on domestic civil rights litigation and international human rights cases. He went on to organize undocumented immigrants, first through the Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers' Union and then as education director at the Lower East Side Workers' Center. He also founded the Center for Non-Profit Technology. Agee serves on the editorial board for the Journal of the Research Group on Socialism and Democracy.

Joshua Kwesi Aikins is a PhD candidate in history and sociology at the University of Bielefeld, Germany. He obtained his Master's in political science at the University of Ghana and the Free University of Berlin. His dissertation examines the reshaping of the politics of development through the interaction of indigenous and western-style political institutions in Ghana. Aikins has published on co-wives in Africa, the politics of memory, and "The Everyday Presence of the Colonial Past" in Germany, as well as on black cultural expression between appropriation and resistance.

Olayinka Akanle is a graduate student of the University of Ibadan, Nigeria. He has successfully completed a Master of Science (MSc) degree in sociology and began doctoral studies in September 2008. His research interests include social theory, social development, diaspora studies, group dynamics, and conflict.

Kristian Patrick Alexander is a PhD candidate in political science at the University of Utah, Salt Lake City, USA. He has lived in Lebanon for many years and has traveled widely in the Middle East. His research focuses on social movements in the Levant and the Arabian Peninsula.

Tariq Ali is a novelist, historian, filmmaker, and an editor of the New Left Review.

Eitan Y. Alimi is an assistant professor of political science at Hebrew University, Israel. His research interests include contentious politics, radicalization and political terrorism, and conflict resolution, with special reference to the Israeli political system and the Middle East. Recent publications include articles in Political Studies, the British Journal of Political Science, Mobilization, International Political Science Review, Sociological Forum, and a book entitled Israeli Politics and the First Palestinian Intifada (2006).

Barbara C. Allen is an assistant professor of history at La Salle University, USA. She received her PhD from Indiana University, Bloomington, USA, where her doctoral dissertation was a partial biography of Alexander Shlyapnikov. She has published articles in the journals Jahrbücher für Geschichte Osteuropas, Revolutionary Russia, and The NEP Era: Soviet Russia 1921–1928. Presently, she is revising her dissertation for publication as a full biography of Shlyapnikov.

María Ximena Alvarez Martínez is a PhD candidate in history at the Free University of Berlin, Germany, studying German-speaking exiles in South America and their cultural struggle in the years 1939–49. Originally from Uruguay, Alvarez obtained a Master's in political history at Paraná State University (UFPR) in 2006.

Ernest A. Amador is the testing coordinator at the University of Houston-Victoria, USA. Before earning his Bachelor's degree from UHV in 2007, he served in the Marine Corps. He is currently pursuing his Master's degree from UHV.

Zulma Amador is a social researcher and educator pursuing a PhD in social science at the Center for Research and Higher Studies in Social Anthropology (CIESAS) in Guadalajara, Mexico. She has been dedicated to the training of educators (teachers, activists, agents of social intervention) in Latin America, from the perspective of popular education. Her doctoral thesis discusses the formation of critical consciousness in the Landless Movement of Brazil.

Maria Anastasopoulou is a scholar of comparative literature who taught at the University of Athens, Greece for 22 years. She has published numerous articles on Anglo-American and Greek literature in several literary journals in the USA, Europe, and Australia. She is a founding member of the Greek Association of Comparative Literature. Currently, she is working on an English version of her book on Greek educator Callirrhoe Parren, originally published in Greek, and is editing Parren's novels for publication.

Benjamín Anaya González is a musician, photographer, essayist, translator, and professor, whose work in various media has been performed, published, and exhibited internationally. Since 1987 he has been a professor at the Mexican Dance Academy of the Mexican National Fine Arts Institute (INBA), and from 1994 to 1996 he was the sub-academic director of the National Conservatory of Music. Anaya is currently working on a novel, a book of essays on music criticism, and an anthology on the poets of Mexican rock music.

Alan Angell is Emeritus Fellow of St. Antony's College, Oxford, UK and a former director of the Latin American Center of Oxford University. He has written extensively on aspects of Latin American politics, and especially the politics of Chile, the politics of the left, and social policy. His first book was on the Chilean labor movement, Politics and the Labour Movement in Chile (1972), and his most recent is Democracy after Pinochet: Politics, Parties and Elections in Chile (2007).

Allan Antliff holds the Canada Research Chair in Modern Art at the University of Victoria, Canada. He is author of Anarchist Modernism: Art, Politics and the First American Avant-Garde (2001) and Anarchy and Art: From the Paris Commune to the Fall of the Berlin Wall (2007), and editor of Only a Beginning: An Anarchist Anthology (2004).

Maurizio Antonioli is a professor of contemporary history at the University of Milan, Italy. He has written many books on trade unionism, revolutionary syndicalism, and anarchism. He is among the editors of The Biographical Dictionary of Italian Anarchists (2003, 2004).

Rita Arditti, originally from Argentina, holds a doctoral degree in biological sciences from Università di Roma, Italy. Arditti has researched and taught at Brandeis University, Harvard Medical School, Boston University, and Union Institute and University. She has co-edited two books, Science and Liberation (1980) and Test-Tube Women: What Future for Motherhood? (1980), and authored Searching for Life: The Grandmothers of Plaza de Mayo and the Disappeared Children of Argentina, published in English in 1999, and in Spanish in 2000. She has received several awards for her work on women, peace, and justice.

Victoria Arnold is studying for a doctoral degree at the University of Kent at Canterbury, UK, specializing in early nineteenth-century British political history.

Fernando Artavia Araya is a PhD student in Latin American studies at the Free University of Berlin, Germany, where he is studying neoliberal reforms in Costa Rica. Since 2004 he has worked as a professor in the Department of Sociology, and also as a researcher with the Institute of Social Research, both at the University of Costa Rica.

Felipe Arturo Ávila Espinosa is a sociologist and Mexican historian. He is a professor in the School of Arts and Philosophy, as well as a researcher at the Institute of Historical Investigations, both at the National Autonomous University of Mexico (UNAM). He has authored books on the origins of the Zapatista movement, as well as on the interim government of Francisco León de la Barra.

David Bacon is a California-based photojournalist and former labor organizer. His books include The Children of NAFTA (2004), Communities Without Borders (2006), and Illegal People: How Globalization Creates Migration and Criminalizes Immigrants (2008).

James Baer is the assistant dean for history at Northern Virginia Community College, USA. He is the co-editor of Cities of Hope: People, Protests and Progress in Urbanizing Latin America 1870–1930 with Ronn Pineo, and has published articles in the Journal of Urban History, The Americas, and the Latin American Research Review. He received sabbatical support through a Fellowship for College Teachers from the National Endowment for the Humanities and has completed a book manuscript on Spanish anarchists in Argentina who returned to Spain.

Melanie A. Bailey is assistant professor of history at Centenary College of Louisiana, USA.

János M. Bak is Professor Emeritus of the Department of Medieval Studies in the Central European University of Hungary. He graduated from Budapest and Göttingen universities and has taught at universities in the USA, Canada, and Hungary.

Sruti Bala is assistant professor of theatre studies at the University of Amsterdam, the Netherlands. Her doctoral research was on the performativity of non-violent protest in South Asia, with a detailed study of the Pashtun movement Khuda-i Khidmatgar, amongst others. She is currently researching performance practices in zones of violent conflict. She is also a theatre practitioner with a focus on participatory methods.

Jordan J. Ballor is associate editor of the Journal of Markets and Morality, published by the Acton

Institute for the Study of Religion and Liberty. He is also a PhD candidate in historical theology at Calvin Theological Seminary in Grand Rapids, Michigan, USA, and a doctoral student in Reformation history at the University of Zurich. His dissertation research is on the theology of Wolfgang Musculus.

Constance Bantman completed a PhD in 2007 on the connections between French and British anarchist movements from 1880 to 1914. Her previous publications include comparative analyses of the anarchist and syndicalist movements in France and Britain, studies on William Morris and anarchism, and on the French anarchist exiles in Britain.

Franco Barchiesi is an assistant professor in the Department of African American and African Studies at Ohio State University, USA. From 1996 to 2002 he taught in the Department of Sociology at the University of the Witwatersrand, Johannesburg, South Africa, where he received his PhD. He is the editor (with Tom Bramble) of Rethinking the Labour Movement in the "New South Africa" (2003).

Geoffrey Barei is a lecturer in the History Department at the University of Botswana.

James R. Barrett, professor of history and African American studies at the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign, USA, is the author of Work and Community in the Jungle: Chicago's Packing House Workers, 1894–1922 (1987) and William Z. Foster and the Tragedy of American Radicalism (1999), and co-editor of the book series The Working Class in American History. He is currently writing a book about the interactions among Irish Americans, New Immigrants, and peoples of color in American cities during the early twentieth century.

Yannick Beaulieu is a member of the editorial board of Dissidences, an online journal for the study of revolutionary movements. He received his PhD in 2006 from the History and Civilization Department of the European University Institute in Florence, Italy. His dissertation, "Judiciary and Political Power in Italy, 1918–1943: Sociohistorical Analysis of Ordinary Judges and their Relationships with Politics," is forthcoming from Einaudi, Turin (2009).

Marc Becker teaches Latin American history at Truman State University, USA. His research focuses on constructions of race, class, and gender within popular movements in the South American Andes. He is the author of Mariátegui and Latin American Marxist Theory (1993) and Indians and Leftists in the Making of Ecuador's Modern Indigenous Movements (2008).

Anne Beggs-Sunter is an Australian historian who specializes in nineteenth-century Australian history within the context of the British empire. She is a lecturer in history and heritage in the School of Behavioral and Social Sciences and Humanities at the University of Ballarat. Her special research interest is the significance of the Eureka Stockade in Australian history, and the representation of historical events in museums.

Peter Beilharz co-founded the journal Thesis Eleven in 1980, and has directed the Thesis Eleven Center since its establishment in 2002 at La Trobe University in Melbourne. He has written or edited 23 books on socialism, labor, and culture, including work on Bernard Smith and Zygmunt Bauman, 130 papers, and many reviews and commentaries. He was professor of Australian studies at Harvard 1999–2000, and is a fellow of the Cultural Sociology Center at Yale. He is presently beginning a major project on Australian rock music.

Jon Bekken is presently associate professor of communications at Albright College, USA and a member of the editorial boards of the Anarcho-Syndicalist Review and Journalism History. A former general secretary-treasurer of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) and editor of the union's newspaper, the Industrial Worker, he has also co-authored The Industrial Workers of the World: Its First 100 Years (2006), and written several scholarly articles on the labor and immigrant press.

Mary Benjamin currently serves as an associate staff analyst in the New York City Department of Homeless services. Benjamin studied German literature at the Graduate School of the City University of New York, USA, and served as an assistant professor in the German Department of the Faculty of Education, Ain Shams University, Cairo, Egypt. She has received two scholarships from the German Academic Exchange services (DAAD) to study German linguistics at the University of Essen, Westphalia.

Hans Bennett is an independent multimedia journalist, and a co-founder of the website and newspaper Journalists for Mumia. He has worked with AWOL Magazine, the Defenestrator Newspaper, Philadelphia IMC, and INSUBORDINATION magazine. While mostly focusing on the movement to free Mumia Abu-Jamal, the MOVE 9, and all political prisoners, he has also used his journalism to support radical movements including media justice, anti-militarism, environmental justice, and anti-racism (see insubordination.blogspot.com).

Terri Bennett is a doctoral student in earth and environmental sciences at the Graduate Center of the City University of New York, USA. Her research interests include political ecology, participatory development, feminist political theory, and social movements. In 2006 and 2007 she conducted ethnographic research in Northeastern Thailand where she examined grassroots responses to technocratic development projects and the effects of economic development on democratic processes. She has been a contributor to the award-winning Common Language Project magazine and is currently organizing a CUNY-wide Social Forum.

David L. Bent is a PhD candidate in Canadian history at the University of New Brunswick in Fredericton, Canada. His research focuses on rural Nova Scotia in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, particularly on the impact of the economic, technological, and social tenets of liberalism and modernity on the organization and function of the province's agricultural economy and rural society.

Franco Bertolucci is the director of the Franco Serantini Library, an archive and resource center for social and contemporary history located in Pisa, Italy. He studied contemporary history at the University of Pisa. His main research interests are anarchism and the history of leftist movements.

Nandini Bhattacharya teaches history in Calcutta Girls' College, Kolkata, India. She is the author of the book Dueling Isms: Soviet and Regional Identity in Central Asia (2008). Her publications on Soviet Central Asia have appeared in journals and she has also contributed book chapters to several edited volumes.

Amit Bhattacharyya is a professor of history at Jadavpur University, India and teaches courses on modern China, the economic history of modern India, and ancient India. His major publications include Swadeshi Enterprise in Bengal 1900–1920 (1986), Swadeshi Enterprise in Bengal 1921–47 (1995), The Profile of a National Enterprise in Bengal: P. M. Bagchi & Co. 1883–1947, Transformation of China 1840–1980, and A Short History of the Chinese Civilization (2007).

Brenda Biddle is a PhD candidate in anthropology at the Graduate Center of the City University of New York, USA. She is writing a book based on recent research with Via Campesina activists in Europe, which will be an account of their struggle to bring forth their vision for food sovereignty on the local, regional, and global levels.

Vicki L. Birchfield is associate professor in the School of International Affairs at the Georgia Institute of Technology, USA. Her research and teaching interests include comparative politics, international political economy and European integration, social movements, and the politics of globalization. Her book, Institutions, Values and Income Inequality in Capitalist Democracies, is forthcoming and she is presently working on a new book manuscript entitled The Transatlantic Values Debate and the Quest for Global Leadership. She also directs Georgia Tech's European Summer Program and has been a visiting professor at French universities.

Richard J. M. Blackett is Andrew Jackson Professor of History at Vanderbilt University, USA.

Robert H. Blackman is Elliott Associate Professor of History at Hampden-Sydney College, USA. He took his PhD in history under the direction of Timothy Tackett at the University of California, Irvine.

David Bleakney is the National Education Representative (Anglophone) of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers. He has been delivering popular education courses on capitalism, neoliberalism, health and safety, oppression and resistance since 1993. He is active in a variety of local and international struggles and his writings have been published in Briarpatch Magazine and ZNet.

Filip Bloem is a PhD student in the History Department at Leiden University, the Netherlands.

Helen Bluemel is a PhD student at Cardiff University, Wales, where she is completing her doctoral thesis on German cultural history in the 1940s and its wider implications in the framework of the beginning of the Cold War. Her fields of expertise are modern German and European history, with a focus on cultural history in particular. Her research combines aspects of cultural and political history to broaden perspectives on the past.

Iain A. Boal is a social historian who teaches at the University of California, USA. He is associated with the Bay Area collective Retort, and is a co-author of Afflicted Powers: Capital and Spectacle in a New Age of War (2005). A forthcoming work of his, The Green Machine, is a global history of human-powered vehicles based on research as a Guggenheim Fellow in Science and Technology.

Jolan Bogdan is a researcher in visual cultures at Goldsmiths, University of London, UK and a visiting lecturer at the University of Birmingham, UK. His current research involves an exploration into how the contemporary viewer approaches images. This research questions how the history of imagery has influenced the present-day impact of television, explores the ramifications of relying on images to tell the story of political unrest, and ultimately investigates the ethics of image production and the claimed authenticity of media images.

Manuela Bojadžijev currently works at Goldsmiths, University of London, UK. She is a member of the Sound Art group Ultra-red. Her research interests include the history and presence of migrant social struggles, the transforming notion and institution of the border, citizenship and the nation-state in contemporary Europe, and migration movements. Her recent publications include Die windige Internationale: Rassismus und Kämpfe der Migration (2008) and Forschungsgruppe TRANSIT MIGRATION: Turbulente Ränder. Neue Perspektiven auf Migration an den Grenzen Europas (2007).

John Bokina is professor of political science at the University of Texas-Pan American, USA, and he has also taught at the University of Detroit. He has published two books, Marcuse: From the New Left to the Next Left (1994) and Opera and Politics: From Monteverdi to Henze (1997). He is currently completing another on the portrayals of Spartacus in different eras and media, and he is on the editorial board of the journal New Political Science.

Pablo Augusto Bonavena is an assistant professor in the Department of Sociology of the University of Buenos Aires (UBA) and the National University of La Plata, Argentina. His research at the Gino Germani Institute of the School of Social Sciences (UBA) involves conflict and social change.

Patrick Bond is professor at the University of KwaZulu-Natal School of Development Studies, South Africa, where since 2004 he has directed the Center for Civil Society. He has longstanding research interests and applied work in global governance and national policy debates, in urban communities, and with global justice movements in several countries. His research focuses on political economy, environment (energy, water, and climate change), social policy and geopolitics, with publications covering South Africa, Zimbabwe, the African continent, and global-scale processes.

Sally A. Boniece is an associate professor of history and the coordinator of international studies at Frostburg State University, USA. She is currently completing a biography of Mariia Spiridonova.

Yarimar Bonilla is assistant professor of anthropology at the University of Virginia, USA. She has conducted ethnographic research on racial politics, political identity, and historical memory in the Spanish- and French-speaking Caribbean. She is currently completing her first book manuscript about labor movements and the politics of history in the French West Indies.

Yury V. Bosin is a professor of history and Central Asian studies at Moscow State University, Russia. His research has been sponsored by the Fulbright Program, the Carnegie Corporation of New York, the Russian Academy of Sciences, and the International Foundation for Election Systems. Bosin is the author of Afghanistan: Multiethnic Society and State Power in Historical Context (in Russian, 2002) and “Afghan Experience with International Assistance,” in Beyond Reconstruction in Afghanistan: Lessons from Development Experience (ed. John D. Montgomery and Dennis A. Rondinelli, 2004).

Jennifer Westmoreland Bouchard is pursuing advanced doctoral work in French and Francophone studies. Her work on immigration and Francophone literatures can be found in the Journal of Pan-African Studies, the Journal of African Literature and Culture, and Migrations and Identities. Bouchard has also contributed to The Greenwood Encyclopedia of Children's Issues Worldwide, The Greenwood Encyclopedia of LGBT Issues Worldwide, and The Greenwood Encyclopedia of Blacks in European Civilization. She has presented her research at conferences throughout the United States and Europe.

Christos Boukalas is a research assistant in the Department of Sociology of Lancaster University, UK. His Master's dissertation is on the anarchists' position within the anti-globalization movement (2001), and his PhD thesis is entitled "Empire and Reich: War on Terrorism and the Political Metalaxis of the US" (2007; supervised by Bob Jessop). He has a long international history of political activism.

Ron Bourgeault is lecturer in sociology at the University of Regina, Canada, where his focus is on the political economy of Aboriginal peoples and Canada. He has been active in Aboriginal struggles for many years, both as a researcher and as a labor organizer. Currently, he is completing a PhD in sociology (Carleton University) on Aboriginal labor and Métis political struggles in the mercantile fur trade.

Robyn Bourgeois is a PhD candidate at the University of Toronto, Canada. Her activism and academic work centers on violence against Canadian Aboriginal women. Her other interests include social violence, Aboriginal women's writings, anti-colonial pedagogy, and squaw mythologies.

Marilyn J. Boxer is Professor Emerita of History at San Francisco State University, USA. She is author of When Women Ask the Questions: Creating Women's Studies in America (1998, 2001), co-author with Jean H. Quataert of Connecting Spheres: European Women in a Globalizing World, 1500 to the Present (2nd ed., 2000), and co-editor with Quataert of Socialist Women: European Socialist Feminism in the Nineteenth and Early Twentieth Centuries (1978). Her most recent publication is "Rethinking the Socialist Construction and International Career of the Concept 'Bourgeois Feminism,'" American Historical Review 112, 1 (2007): 131–58.

András Bozóki, former minister of culture of Hungary (2005–6), is a professor of political science at the Central European University, Budapest, Hungary. He has published both books and shorter pieces in periodicals and collected volumes in several languages and countries on subjects including post-communist transition, comparative democratization, anarchist ideas and movements, transformation of political elites, and intellectuals in politics. He has taught at universities throughout Europe, as well as in the United States.

Ulrich Brand is a professor of international politics at Vienna University, Austria. He has taught at Rutgers University and has done research in Argentina, Mexico, and Canada. His research focuses on international political economy and global governance, the critique of globalization, social movements and non-governmental organizations, as well as international environmental politics, with a regional focus on Latin America.

Edward T. Brett is a professor of history at La Roche College, USA. He has published several books including The US Catholic Press on Central America: From Cold War Anticommunism to Social Justice (2003) and Murdered in Central America: The Stories of Eleven US Missionaries (co-authored with Donna Whitson Brett, 1988), which received a Christopher Award. He has also published over 20 scholarly articles and book chapters.

Holger Briel is a professor of media and communication studies at the Management Center Innsbruck, Austria. He has published widely on German literature, cultural studies, manga, and anime, and his publications include German Culture and Society: A Glossary (2002) and Adorno und Derrida, Oder Wo Liegt das Ende der Moderne? (1993). His research interests include intercultural studies, visual media, and the politics of the digital world.

Bradford C. Brown is assistant professor of history at Bradley University, Peoria, Illinois, USA.

Susan Love Brown is currently associate professor of anthropology at Florida Atlantic University, USA, where she also directs the Public Intellectuals Program and is interim director of the PhD in comparative studies. Her research interests include the origin of ideologies, intentional communities, American individualist anarchism, and political and psychological anthropology. She has done research on national identity in the Bahamas and on New Age religion in the United States. She is the editor of Intentional Community: An Anthropological Perspective (2002).

Steeve O. Buckridge is currently an associate professor of African and Caribbean history at Grand Valley State University, USA. His areas of interest are precolonial and colonial Africa, early colonial Caribbean, women/gender, sexuality, and material culture. He was based at the University of the West Indies as a Ford Fellow, and has lectured in South Africa and Ghana. His book, The Language of Dress: Resistance and Accommodation in Jamaica, 1760–1890, was published in 2004.

Meredith Burgmann is a former NSW president of the Academics' Union and a co-founder of the National Pay Equity Coalition. In 1991 she was elected to Australia's State Parliament and from 1999 was the president of the Legislative Council. In 1993 she inaugurated the annual Ernie Awards for Sexist Remarks. She has co-authored Green Bans, Red Union: Environmental Activism and the NSW Builders' Labourers' Federation (1998) and The Ernies Book: 1,000 Terrible Things Australian Men Have Said About Women (2007).

Olga Burkert is a freelance author and journalist in Berlin. She has studied Latin American studies, sociology, and political science in Berlin, Barcelona, and Buenos Aires. Burkert is an editorial staff member of the monthly journal Lateinamerika Nachrichten (News from Latin America). Her fields of research include the politics of memory and identity, as well as the transition from military regimes to democracy in the Southern Cone.

William E. Burns is an independent scholar.

Beatrice Burton is a PhD candidate at the University of Georgia, USA.

Orville Vernon Burton is Burroughs Chair of Southern History at Coastal Carolina University, USA and director of the Institute for Computing in Humanities, Arts, and Social Science at the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign, USA, where he is Emeritus University Distinguished Teacher/Scholar and Professor of History, African American Studies, and Sociology. His most recent book, The Age of Lincoln (2007), was the recipient of the Chicago Tribune's 2007 Heartland Literary Award for non-fiction and a selection for Book of the Month Club, History Book Club, and Military Book Club.

Melanie E. L. Bush is currently assistant professor of sociology at Adelphi University, USA. She is the author of Breaking the Code of Good Intentions: Everyday Forms of Whiteness (2004) and co-author of a forthcoming book entitled Tensions in the American Dream: The Imperial Nation Confronts the Liberation of Nations (with R. D. Bush), and has written numerous articles in scholarly journals. She has been active for many years in struggles for equality and justice.

Roderick Bush is an associate professor of sociology at St. John's University, USA. In 1984 he edited The New Black Vote: Politics and Power in Four American Cities. His most recent book, We Are Not What We Seem: Black Nationalism and Class Struggle in the American Century, was published in 1999. Bush is currently finishing a new book entitled The End of White World Supremacy: Black Internationalism and the Problem of the Color Line.

Richard Butterwick is senior lecturer in Polish history at University College London, UK. He has also been lecturer in modern European history at the Queen's University of Belfast. The author of Poland's Last King and English Culture: Stanislaw August Poniatowski 1732–1798 (1998) and other works on the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, as well as on the Enlightenment and its Polish critics, he is now preparing for publication a major study of the Polish Revolution of 1788–92 and the Catholic Church.

Emanuel Buttigieg is currently a PhD student at the University of Cambridge, UK. The holder of a first-class honors degree in history from the University of Malta, he was awarded a Cambridge (Commonwealth) Scholarship to do a one-year MPhil degree at the University of Cambridge. His academic interests are now focused on his doctoral thesis entitled "A Study of the Knights of Malta, with reference to Nobility, Faith and Gender: 1580–1700."

Amy Buzby is a PhD student in political science at Rutgers University, USA. Her research focuses on psychoanalysis and its relevance to and influence on the development of political theory.

Tristan Cabello is a PhD candidate at Northwestern University, USA and a historian of postwar America. His research focuses on sexuality, race, and urban history. He is currently completing his first monograph provisionally entitled Queer Bronzeville: Race, Sexuality and the Making of Urban Boundaries (1930–1980).

Gabriel Cabrera M. works as a teacher in the Mision Sucre, which provides free and ongoing graduate- and undergraduate-level education for Venezuelan citizens. He is also active in training Caracas citizens in community involvement. Cabrera also works at the José Carlos Mariátegui Center for Social Studies, Caracas, Venezuela. His research focuses on Peruvian agrarian structure and Andean folk music, and he also has an abiding interest in the political history of Peru and Latin America.

Daniel Cairns is an English instructor at Beihang University in Beijing, China, and is a member of the Beijing Anarchist Study Group. He is an independent writer and has contributed pieces on contemporary China to the Seattle Times. His historical research focuses on early twentieth-century China, labor, and anarchism. Ongoing projects of his include a history of anarchism in Western Washington, a study of May Fourth periodicals, and a biography of the Italian American anarchist printer, Eugene Travaglio.

Kevin J. Callahan is associate professor of history at Saint Joseph College, USA. His publications include articles in the International Review of Social History (2000) and Peace and Change (2004). He is co-editor of the book Views from the Margins: Creating Identities in Modern France (2008). He is currently working on book projects on gender, war, and peace and a cultural history of international socialism.

Luli Callinicos is a historian and heritage consultant. In 1988 she received the Noma Award for Publishing in Africa for Working Life: Factories, Townships and Popular Culture (1987), her second book in the trilogy A People's History of South Africa. Council member and first chairperson of the National Heritage Council, she also serves on other heritage and research boards. Of Hellenic descent, Callinicos was awarded the Order of the Phoenix by the Democracy of Greece in 1997. She is the author of The World that Made Mandela (2000) and Oliver Tambo: Beyond the Engeli Mountains (2004).

Leonel Sahagón Campero is affiliated with the National Autonomous University of Mexico (UNAM), Mexico.

Julie Carlier is currently working as a research fellow of the Research Foundation, Flanders at the Department of Modern and Contemporary History of Ghent University, Belgium, where she is preparing a PhD thesis under the supervision of Professor Dr. Gita Deneckere entitled “(Trans)national Networks, Political Identities and Individual Trajectories: A Social History of Belgian First-Wave Feminism (ca. 1890–1918).”

Chris Carlsson, executive director of the multi-media history project Shaping San Francisco, is a writer, publisher, editor, and community organizer. He was one of the founders of the ground-breaking San Francisco magazine Processed World. He also helped launch the monthly bike-ins known as Critical Mass that have spread to five continents and over 300 cities. He has edited four books, most recently The Political Edge (2004). He published his first novel in 2004, and his latest work, Nomtopia, was published in May 2008.

Amy Beth Carney is a PhD candidate in the Department of History at Florida State University, USA. Her primary field of study is modern Germany, with minor fields in twentieth-century Europe, the history of science, and the Atlantic world. She is currently working on her dissertation, which focuses on how the Nazi leadership tried to convince its elite members, the men of the SS, to father many children and how this attempt was a form of positive eugenics.

Peter N. Carroll is Chair of the Board of Governors of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade Archives, and teaches history at Stanford University, USA. He is the author or editor of 16 books, including The Odyssey of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade (1994), War is Beautiful: An American Ambulance Driver in the Spanish Civil War (with Peter Glazer, 2008), The Free and the Unfree (with David W. Noble, 1977), and Riverborne: A Mississippi Requiem (2008).

William K. Carroll is professor of sociology at the University of Victoria, Canada. His research interests are in the areas of social movements and social change, the political economy of corporate capitalism, and critical social theory and method. Some of his major publications include Remaking Media (with Bob Hackett, 2006), Organizing Dissent (1997), Challenges and Perils: Social Democracy in Neo-Liberal Times (with Bob Ratner, 2005), Corporate Power in a Globalizing World (2004), and Critical Strategies for Social Research (2004).

R. O'Brian Carter teaches modern European history at the University of Georgia, USA and specializes in the study of modern French culture. With the academic journal Historical Reflections/Réflexions Historiques, he has published an article that examines American jazz in 1920s France.

Irina Ceric is a PhD candidate at Osgoode Hall Law School of York University in Toronto, Canada, and holds a Canada Graduate Scholarship from the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council. Prior to pursuing graduate studies, she practiced criminal law and is a long-time social justice activist.

Debi Chatterjee is a professor in the Department of International Relations at Jadavpur University, Kolkata, India. Her main areas of academic interest are Indian society and social problems, politics, political thought, Dalit and gender issues, and human rights movements. She has written extensively in both English and Bengali, and has co-edited several volumes. Her books include Marxist Thought in India (1985), Sociology of National Integration (1993), and Ideas and Movements Against Caste in India: Ancient to Modern Times (1998).

Shibashis Chatterjee, reader at the Department of International Relations, Jadavpur University, Kolkata, India, specializes in international relations theory. He is the author of Nuclear Non-Proliferation and the Problem of Threshold States (1999) and co-editor of Global Politics: Issues and Trends (2005) and Anatomy of Fear (2005). He has recently completed two projects for the University of Pennsylvania Institute for Advanced Studies on India (UPIASI) on the application of international relations theory to South Asian affairs.

Kunal Chattopadhyay is currently professor of history at Jadavpur University, Kolkata, India, where he is also coordinator of the Center for European Studies and a member of the Academic Committee of the School of Women's Studies. His most important recent books include The Marxism of Leon Trotsky (2006) and Bampanthi Andolaner Naya Bitarka: Braziler Lula Sarkar (A New Debate in Left Politics: Lula's Government in Brazil, 2005). His recent work has focused on environmental activism and socialism in India, including a study of the Narmada Bachao Andolan.

Joaquín M. Chávez is a doctoral candidate in the Latin American and Caribbean History Program at New York University, USA.

Hongming Cheng is an assistant professor in sociology at the University of Saskatchewan, Canada. Dr. Cheng previously taught at Shanghai Jiao Tong University and St. Thomas University, and served as a public prosecutor in Shanghai. Dr. Cheng's research interests are in the areas of sociolegal studies, white-collar crime, international and comparative criminal justice, criminal law, corporations, securities regulation, and Chinese law and society.

Donatella Cherubini, professor of contemporary history, teaches history of journalism at the Political Sciences Faculty of the University of Siena, Italy. She has written and edited monographs and essays on political and electoral history, the history of journalism, and the history of pacifism, including Giuseppe Emanuele Modigliani: Un riformista nell'Italia liberale (1990), Alle origini dei partiti: La Federazione socialista toscana (1893–1900) (1997), Les Etats-Unis d'Europe (2004), and Pour la Paix en Europe (co-edited with Marta Petricioli, 2007).

Shari Childers is a PhD candidate in humanities at the University of Texas at Dallas, USA. She focuses her research primarily on the confluence of literature, the environment, and women's studies. Her current project investigates women's visions and voices in American ecoliteratures since 1850.

Samantha M. R. Christiansen is a world historian who focuses on student movements and youth revolt. With particular attention to South Asia, her work seeks to demonstrate the supernational components of student identity and action in the mid- to late twentieth century.

Alexandre J. M. E. Christoyannopoulos is currently completing his PhD on Christian anarchist theory at the University of Kent at Canterbury, UK, where he has also been employed as a sessional teacher for the past three years. He has presented and convened workshops at several national and international conferences, and has recently published two articles on Tolstoy, one in Anarchist Studies (Spring 2008), the other in Politics and Religion (April 2008).

Michael H. C. Chun is currently a PhD candidate at the Faculty of Asian Studies, Australian National University. His research interests are Chinese nationalism and Hong Kong history. His doctoral thesis examines the relationship between colonialism, "China complex," and the politics of Chinese nationalism in colonial Hong Kong.

Joaquin Cienfuegos is a member of Cop Watch LA (Guerrilla Chapter, which he helped build) and the Revolutionary Autonomous Communities. Cienfuegos also helped create the Southern California Anarchist Federation – Los Angeles Chapter and Revolutionary Autonomous Communities, a revolutionary federation of community councils helping build a grassroots popular movement, with autonomy, self-determination, self-organization, and an infrastructure for the self-defense of oppressed people and oppressed communities.

Elvio Ciferri is a permanent professor of history and Italian literature at the Leopoldo and Alice Franchetti Institute of Città di Castello, Italy. He is the author of six books and several articles in historical journals. He has contributed to many encyclopedias.

Rick Clapton teaches several courses about war, the home front, and resultant social movements at the University of British Columbia, Okanagan, Canada. The impact of war, he argues, irrevocably changes public consciousness, society, and the place and purpose of the individual within that realm. Currently he is working on Feigning Madness: The Life, Trials and Incarceration of Chief Constable David Murdoch, a book about policing, the criminal justice system, and criminal insane asylums in Western Canada.

John Clarke works as organizer with the Ontario Coalition Against Poverty (OCAP). He came to Canada from London, England in 1976, where he had previously been active in high school student organizing and in several trade unions. He took a job at the Westinghouse plant in London, Ontario and played an active role in the United Electrical Workers' Union as a shop steward. In 1982 he helped form the London Union of Unemployed Workers (LUUW).

Dorothea J. Coiffe is an assistant professor at the City University of New York's Borough of Manhattan Community College Library, USA. She has extensive experience in protein biochemistry and worked in a Nobel Prize winner's laboratory at Rockefeller University. Besides holding a Master's degree in library and information science, Coiffe holds degrees in biology and liberal studies, and is published in both fields.

Carrie Collenberg is a PhD candidate at the University of Minnesota, USA and is writing a dissertation on the aesthetics of terrorism in Germany and the United States.

Tom Collins is a PhD candidate in American studies at the University of Iowa, USA. His essays on American popular culture appear in The Columbia History of Post-World War II America and The Handbook to Life in America: The Roaring Twenties. He is the co-author of Day by Day: 1920s.

Chiara Colombini is a researcher and collaborator with the Institute for the History of Resistance in Turin, Italy and is now investigating the clandestine networks of Giustizia e Libertà during the time of Italy's fascist regime. She published Diario di Teresio Ferrero (1943) (2003) and Vindice Cavallera: una Lunga Battaglia contro il Fascismo (1931–1945) (2006). She has been the organizer, with Professor De Luna, of the Annual Conference “Giellismo e Azionismo: Cantieri aperti” (2005–08).

Sebastián Cominiello obtained his BA in sociology at the University of Buenos Aires (UBA). He has published many articles about class struggles in Argentina and has written articles about international labor costs and employment conditions.

Matthew B. Conn is a PhD candidate (ABD) in the Department of History at the University of Iowa, USA. His dissertation, “Corporeal Rhetorics,” examines the interconnections between the history of forensic medicine, sexual science, and gender politics in Germany, Austria, and Czechoslovakia, 1880–1938.

Justin Corfield has been teaching history and international relations at Geelong Grammar School, Australia, since 1993. He is the author of several books on Australian history, genealogy, and aspects of colonial history, especially for Southeast Asia. He is also a co-author of The Eureka Encyclopedia, which was awarded the Victorian Community History Award in 2004.

John M. Cox is assistant professor of European history at Florida Gulf Coast University, USA where he chairs the Center for Judaic, Holocaust, and Human Rights Studies. He is currently revising his dissertation, which examines German-Jewish resistance to Nazism, for publication. He also serves on the editorial board of the Journal of Jewish Identities.

Richard Francis Crane, professor of history at Greensboro College, USA, is a historian of modern France, with a specialization in the era of World War II and the Holocaust. He is the author of two books, A French Conscience in Prague: Louis Eugène Faucher and the Abandonment of Czechoslovakia (1996) and Passion of Israel: Jacques Maritain, Catholic Conscience, and the Holocaust (forthcoming), as well as numerous articles, essays, and book reviews.

Ronald Creagh is Professor Emeritus in Sociology of the University of Montpellier, France. He is currently the co-editor of the online journals Réfractations (refractions.plusloin.org) and Divergences (divergences.be). He is also in charge of the “Research on Anarchism” website (raforum.info). His latest books include L'Imagination dérobée (2004), L’Affaire Sacco et Vanzetti (2004), and the forthcoming Laboratoires de l’utopie: Les Communes libertaires aux Etats-Unis de 1800 à nos jours (2009).

Mark J. Crowley is a PhD researcher at the Center for Contemporary British History, Institute of Historical Research, London, UK. His research interests are in women’s history and trade unionism in twentieth-century Britain.

Carol Klimick Cyganowski is an associate professor in the English Department at DePaul University, USA, where she has also served as director of the Women’s Studies Program and the American Studies Program.

Christine Cynn was the associate director of Africana studies and is now a Mellon Postdoctoral Fellow in Women’s Studies at Barnard College, USA. From 2005 to 2006 she was a lecturer/researcher at the University of Cocody, Abidjan, Côte d’Ivoire. She is currently working on a book project on the US President’s Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief (PEPFAR) in Sub-Saharan Africa.

Evan Matthew Daniel is a PhD candidate (ABD) in the Departments of History and Political Science at the New School for Social Research and instructor of history at St. Francis College, Brooklyn, USA. He previously worked as an archivist at the Tamiment Library/Robert F. Wagner Labor Archives, New York University and as a researcher at the Emma Goldman History Papers, University of California at Berkeley. His dissertation (in progress) explores the transnational ideology and work culture of nineteenth-century Cuban cigar makers in Havana, South Florida, and New York City.

Nupur Dasgupta teaches in the History Department at Jadavpur University, Kolkata, India.

J. M. F. Daudeij is affiliated with Erasmus University of Rotterdam, the Netherlands.

Belinda Davis is an associate professor of history at Rutgers University, USA. She is author of Home Fires Burning: Food, Politics, and Everyday Life in World War I Berlin (2000), and co-editor of Changing the World, Changing Oneself: Political Protest and Collective Identities in the 1960s/70s West Germany and US (forthcoming) and Eigen-Sinn, Alltag, und Erfahrung (forthcoming). She is currently completing The Internal Life of Politics: The “New Left” in West Germany, 1962–1983.

Laurence Davis is lecturer in politics in the Department of Sociology of the National University of Ireland, Maynooth. He has previously taught political and social theory at Oxford University, Ruskin College, and University Colleges Galway and Dublin. A founding member of the Anarchist Studies Network, he is the editor (with Peter Stillman) of The New Utopian Politics of Ursula K. Le Guin’s The Dispossessed (2005) and (with Ruth Kinna) of Anarchism and Utopianism (forthcoming, 2009).

Michael T. Davis has published widely on British political and cultural history, including as editor of Radicalism and Reform in Britain, 1775–1848 (2000), a six-volume collection on the London Corresponding Society (2002), Newgate in Revolution (with Iain McCalman and Christina Parolin, 2005), Unrespectable Radicals? Popular Politics in the Age of Reform (with Paul Pickering, 2008), and Terror: From Tyrannicide to Terrorism in Europe, 1605 to the Future (with Brett Bowden, 2008).

Simone C. Cezanne De Santiago Ramos is currently a PhD student in the Department of History at the University of North Texas, USA. Her primary field of research is modern European history with a concentration on Germany from 1871 to the present. Her research areas include agrarian and food policies, the welfare state, and Nazi Germany’s migration and resettlement practices and the implications for everyday life.

Marco de Waard is a lecturer in English literature at the University of Amsterdam, the Netherlands. He wrote his doctoral thesis on “John Morley and the Liberal Imagination: The Uses of History in English Liberal Culture, 1867–1914.”

Michel De Waele is affiliated with Laval University, Canada.

Alicia C. Decker is an assistant professor of history and women’s studies at Purdue University, USA. She is currently working on a manuscript about gender, power, and militarism in Idi Amin’s Uganda. Her research interests include postcolonial African history, gender and militarization, feminism and nationalism, and global feminist movements.

Tilman Dederich is a senior lecturer in the Department of History at the University of South Africa. He is author of Hate the Old and Follow the New: Khoekhoe and Missionaries in Early Nineteenth-Century Namibia (1997). He has also published a number of articles on Namibia, on South African history, and on global history.

Lynnette M. Deem is a PhD candidate at Temple University, USA. Her doctoral dissertation focuses on the organizational and institutional aspects of propaganda companies that operated within the Wehrmacht, specifically those operating during the Scandinavian and Balkan campaigns. She has held teaching positions at Temple University, Rider University, UNC-Charlotte, and Wingate University, teaching such courses as Ancient and Modern World, Western Civilization, and War and Society.

Abraham P. DeLeon is an assistant professor at the University of Rochester, USA, in the Margaret Warner Graduate School of Education and Human Development. His research interests include social studies education, cultural studies, anarchist theory, and critical pedagogy. DeLeon's research interests are grounded in critical theories, and these have led him to explore how social studies education and radical theory can be combined to equip students with the knowledge and understanding of how ideology is reproduced.

Dennis John Deletant is professor of Romanian studies at the School of Slavonic and East European Studies, University College London, UK and at the University of Amsterdam, the Netherlands (on secondment). He is the author of several monographs and volumes of studies on the recent history of Romania, including Communist Terror in Romania: Gheorghiu-Dej and the Police State, 1948–1965 (1999). His most recent book is Ion Antonescu: Hitler's Forgotten Ally (2006). He has also co-edited, with Ottmar Traşca, German Documents on the Holocaust in Romania (2007).

Walter Delrio is affiliated with the University of Buenos Aires, Argentina.

Patricia DeMarco is affiliated with the Rachel Carson Homestead Association, USA.

Khatchik DerGhougassian is a professor of international relations and a researcher at the Universidad de San Andrés in Buenos Aires, Argentina. His field of expertise is security studies, and he has held positions in South Africa, Argentina, and the United States in both academic and advisory roles. The recipient of numerous grants and fellowships, DerGhougassian has published over 30 book chapters, monographs, essays, articles, and papers in Spanish, English, and Armenian with a focus on security issues, including terrorism, arms transfer, and organized crime.

Liliana Deyanova is professor of sociology at St. Kliment Ohridski Sofia University, Bulgaria, and a member of the Institute for Critical Social Studies, Sofia and Plovdiv University Paisii Hilendarski. Her publications are in the field of the theory and method of sociology, the history of the social sciences and the public sphere, the historical sociology of communism and post-communism, "micro-history," collective memory, and social temporalities.

Sushovan Dhar is an associate of the research and study center, Vikas Adhyayan Kendra, in Mumbai, India. He heads a regional study on "Democracy and Governance in South Asia" and is a frequent contributor on neoliberal economic reforms and their impacts in the South Asian region. He has completed research on the history of the World Bank's intervention in India (unpublished) and monitors the impact of the projects of international financial institutions in India and in the South Asian region.

Pietro Di Paola is lecturer in history at the University of Lincoln, UK. His main interests are the history of anarchism, political migration, and social movements, and he is currently concluding a book entitled A Short History of Anarchism.

Naminata Diabate, Fulbright Alumna from the Ivory Coast, is a PhD candidate in the Program in Comparative Literature at the University of Texas at Austin, USA. Her academic interests focus on twentieth-century Francophone and Anglophone West African women writers, twentieth-century African American and Afro-Hispanic women writers, feminist theories, and postcolonial theories. Her dissertation explores the fear of the female body and the body as site of resistance in West African fictions.

H. T. Dickinson was Richard Lodge Professor of British History, 1980–2006, and is now an Emeritus Professor at Edinburgh, UK. His publications include, as author, Bolingbroke (1970), Walpole and the Whig Supremacy (1973), Liberty and Property: Political Ideology in Eighteenth-Century Britain (1973), and The Politics of the People in Eighteenth-Century Britain (1995), and, as editor, Britain and the American Revolution (1998), Britain and the French Revolution 1789–1815 (1989), and eight volumes of British Pamphlets on the American Revolution.

Angela D. Dillard is an associate professor of Afro-American and African studies at the University of Michigan, USA. She specializes in American and African American intellectual history, religious studies, and conservative thought. She is currently writing a biography of James Meredith.

Nhlanhla Dlamini is lecturer in the Department of History at the University of Swaziland, Swaziland.

Fred Donnelly teaches British history at the Saint John Campus of the University of New Brunswick, Canada. His area of research interest is the radical and reform movements of Great Britain from 1760 to 1840. A former departmental chairperson and associate dean of graduate studies, he has recently developed a second career as a travel writer.

Andrew Dowling is a historian working in the Hispanic Studies Department within the School of European Studies, Cardiff University, UK. His research has centered on Catalan history in the twentieth century, and in particular the political articulation of Catalan nationalism under the Franco dictatorship and in democratic Spain. He has published in a number of journals and is the author of Reconstructing the Nation: Catalonia since the Spanish Civil War (2008).

Emma Dowling is a PhD candidate at the School of Politics and Sociology, Birkbeck, University of London, UK. Her doctoral thesis looks at the role of social activism in the crisis of legitimacy in G8-centered global governance and neoliberalism to understand the relationship between resistance and power. She has recently published on G8 summit protests, the European and World Social Forums, and immaterial and affective labor.

Timothy Dean Draper is an assistant professor of history at Waubensee Community College, USA. He has published in the Journal of the Illinois State Historical Society and Chicago History and is editor of H-Illinois.

Allison Drew teaches politics at the University of York, UK. Her research examines social and political movements in twentieth-century Africa, and she has published extensively on the struggle for democracy in South Africa. Her major works include Between Empire and Revolution: A Life of Sidney Bunting, 1873–1936 (2007), Discordant Comrades: Identities and Loyalties on the South African Left (2000, 2002), and South Africa's Radical Tradition:

A Documentary History (2 vols., 1996–7). She is currently working on a comparative study of communism and nationalism in Algeria and South Africa.

Paulo Drinot teaches history at the University of Manchester, UK. He is co-editor of Más allá de la dominación y la resistencia: Estudios de historia peruana (Beyond Domination and Resistance: Studies in Peruvian History) and is the author of various articles on the social, economic, and cultural history of twentieth-century Peru. He is completing a book on labor, race, and state formation in Peru and an edited volume titled Che's América: The Making of the Revolutionary in 1950s Latin America.

Sven Dubie teaches courses in United States history at John Carroll University, USA. His doctoral dissertation was a study of the evolution of the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division in the mid-twentieth century. He is currently working on a book on the early years of the Civil Rights Division.

Laurent Dubois, a specialist in the history and culture of France and the Caribbean, is a professor of history and Romance studies at Duke University, USA. He is the author of Avengers of the New World (2006) and A Colony of Citizens: Revolution and Slave Emancipation in the French Caribbean, 1787–1804 (2005), which won four book prizes, including the Frederick Douglass Prize. With Richard Turits, he is currently working on a history of the Caribbean. He is also writing a history of the banjo and a book of essays about football, race, and the legacies of empire in contemporary France.

Andrew Durgan has lived and worked in Spain for over 25 years. He has published in various languages on different aspects of modern Spanish history, in particular relating to the Civil War, its origins, and the labor movement. His work includes BOC: El Bloque Obrero y Campesino 1930–1936 (1996) and The Spanish Civil War (2007). He was historical advisor for the award-winning Ken Loach film Land and Freedom (1996) and a founding member of the Fundació Andreu Nin (Andreu Nin Foundation) in 1988.

Michael Eade works as a translator and freelance contributor to British and Spanish papers. He is author of Catalonia: A Cultural History (2007), Barcelona, the City that Reinvented Itself (2007), and Triumph at Midnight in the Century (2008), a critical biography of the socialist writer Arturo Barea.

Marc Edelman is professor of anthropology at Hunter College and the Graduate Center of the City University of New York, USA. His books include The Logic of the Latifundio (1992) and Peasants Against Globalization (1999), as well as the co-authored Social Democracy in the Global Periphery (2006) and two co-edited volumes, The Anthropology of Development and Globalization (Blackwell, 2005) and Transnational Agrarian Movements Confronting Globalization (Blackwell, 2008).

Thomas Edge has taught at the University of Massachusetts, Trinity College, and Elms College. He has presented papers at local and national meetings of the Association for the Study of African American Life and History (ASALH) on the career of Mordecai Johnson and the history of the Crossroads Theatre Company. Edge has also published an article on the role of black female abolitionists in The Black Experience in America (2006).

Michael Egan is an assistant professor in the Department of History at McMaster University, Canada. His research focuses on the history of science, technology, and the environment. He is the author of Barry Commoner and the Science of Survival: The Remaking of American Environmentalism (2007).

Douglas R. Egerton is a professor of history at Le Moyne College, USA. His publications include Death or Liberty: African Americans and Revolutionary America (2008), The Atlantic World: A History (with Alison Games, Kris Lane, and Donald R. Wright, 2007), He Shall Go Out Free: The Lives of Denmark Vesey (1999), and Gabriel's Rebellion: The Virginia Slave Conspiracies of 1800 and 1802 (1993).

Deniz Ekici is currently a PhD student at the University of Exeter, Center for Kurdish Studies, UK. He earned his MA degree in political science from Brooklyn College, USA. His Master's thesis was titled "The Role and the Importance of the PKK in Kurdish National Struggle." He is the author of the Kurmanji Kurdish Reader (2007).

Sylvia Ellis is reader in history and director of the Governance and Security research academy at Northumbria University, UK. She is a specialist in international history, focusing on post-1945 British and American social and political history. Her major publications include Britain, America, and the Vietnam War (2004) and journal articles on British opposition to the war. She is a Fellow of the Royal Historical Society.

Charles Wesley Ervin is an independent scholar who specializes in the history of the Trotskyist movement in South Asia. His books include Tomorrow is Ours: The Trotskyist Movement in India and Ceylon 1935–48 (2006), Philip Gunawardena: The Making of a Revolutionary (2001), and Pilip Gunawardhana: Viplavavadiyakuge Hadagasma (2005).

Sophie Sarah Esch is studying Latin American studies, North American studies, and political science at the Free University of Berlin, Germany. She is currently writing her Master's thesis on "Canal Ghosts, Border and the Poet at the River: The Constitution of Space in Rio San Juan (Nicaragua, Costa Rica) through Literature." She has studied at the National Autonomous University of Mexico (UNAM) and the College of Mexico, where she worked on water and human rights issues.

Leticia Pacheco Espejel is completing postgraduate studies in political science at the University of Hamburg, Germany. Her Master's thesis was titled "The Internet in Mexico as an Alternative Channel for Communication." Her publications include "Career Changer: CEOs in the Branch of New Economy," in Gender and Career in the New Economy (ed. Ralph Schmidt).

Kerstin Ewald is a freelance print and radio journalist and has published with Neues Deutschland, Deutschlandfunk, and RBB, among others. She has a degree in sociology, and her main research is in international division of labor as well as approaches to trade union organization and self-organization. She has performed long-term research in El Salvador, Romania, and the Republic of Moldova. Her publications include "Workers' Voices: The Situation of Women in the Eastern European and Turkish Garment Industries" (2005).

Roger Farr teaches contemporary literature, creative writing, and literary theory at Capilano College in Vancouver, Canada. His critical work on radical social movements and avant-garde literature has appeared or is forthcoming in Anarchist Studies, Fifth Estate, Perspectives on Anarchist Theory, The Rain Review of Books, West Coast Line, and XCP: Cross-Cultural Poetics. The author of a book of poetry, Surplus (2006), he also edits the anarchist literary journal Parser: New Poetry and Poetics.

Vera Leigh Fennell is an associate professor of political science and global studies at Lehigh University, USA. She has worked for the Ford Foundation in Beijing and participated in the NGO Forum of the United Nations Fourth Conference on the World's Women, held in Beijing in 1995. She was a postdoctoral research fellow in the Program for the Study of Race, Gender, and Public Policy at the Hubert H. Humphrey Institute for Public Affairs at the University of Minnesota, USA.

Newton Ferreira da Silva is a Master's student in social studies at the State University of São Paulo (UNESP), campus Marília, Brazil. His research and dissertation concern Che Guevara's thought and trajectory. He is also a member of the Brazilian Institute for Contemporary Studies (www.ibec-estudos.org.br).

Rachel Finley-Bowman is an associate professor of education at Elizabethtown College, USA, with specializations in social studies and history education. She previously served as an associate professor of history, chair of the Department of Secondary Education, and co-director of the DVC Honors Program at Delaware Valley College, USA. Her research interests include women's political activism in Ulster, teaching women's history at the secondary level, and the political association of Irish women in Pennsylvania.

Vinzia Fiorino is affiliated with the University of Pisa, Italy.

Cory Fischer-Hoffman is an organizer with the Student Farmworker Alliance. She completed her MA thesis with the University of Kansas, USA, titled "Misión Madres del Barrio: A Bolivarian Social Program Recognizing Housework and Creating a Caring Economy in Venezuela." She has published on women's organizing in Venezuela in Zmagazine, UpsidedownWorld, and Venezuelanalysis.

Claire Fitzpatrick teaches at the University of Plymouth, UK. Her focus is modern Irish history, with a particular emphasis on the Irish labor movement and the development of the modern Irish state. Fitzpatrick has published articles on the Irish labor movement and is currently working on attitudes of the Irish Free State to radical dissent. She is also interested in the history of cricket and imperialism.

Madalina Florescu is affiliated with the University of London, UK.

Gary Foley is senior lecturer in history and indigenous studies at Victoria University, Australia and is completing a PhD in history at the Australian Center at the University of Melbourne. A native of northern New South Wales of Gumbainggir descent, Foley has been active in political protests and demonstrations since the late 1960s. He set up the first Aboriginal Information Center in London, and in Australia has been a director of the Aboriginal Health Service, the Aboriginal Arts Board, and the Aboriginal Medical Service Redfern.

Paulo Fontes is an assistant professor at the Getulio Vargas Center for the Research and Documentation of the Contemporary History of Brazil (CPDOC/FGV) in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil. He was visiting professor at Duke University, USA (2004) and Princeton University, USA (2006–7). He is the author of several books and articles on Brazilian labor history, including Um Nordeste em São Paulo. Trabalhadores migrantes em São Miguel Paulista: 1945–1966 (2008).

Michael Forman, associate professor of social and political theory at the University of Washington, USA, is affiliated with the University of Washington's Human Rights Network and the Harry Bridges Center for Labor Studies. His current research focuses on the evolution of ideals in contemporary political and social thought. His first book, Nationalism and the International Labor Movement: The Idea of the Nation in Socialist and Anarchist Theory, received the Michael Harrington Award of the American Political Science Association (1999).

Alex Foti is a Milanese activist who works on precarity, urban ecology, and radical Europe. Since 2004 he has promoted a Europe-wide May Day protesting generational precarity and the persecution of migrants (www.euromayday.org). He co-authored the Middlesex Declaration of Europe's Precariat and the Act 4 Radical Europe manifesto. His essays include "Euro Flex Workers: Time to Get a Move On!," "Demoradical vs. Demoliberal Regulation," and "The Grid & the Fork: Critical Dynamics of Advanced Capitalism."

Catherine Cymone Fourshey is associate professor of history and director of international studies at Susquehanna University, USA. Her research focuses on precolonial Tanzania, with special interests in the topics of agriculture, hospitality, migration, and the intersections of environment, economy, and politics. Her current project in progress is a book tentatively titled Strangers, Immigrants, and the Established: Hospitality as State-Building Mechanism in Southwest Tanzania, 300–1900 CE.

Kyle E. Frackman received his PhD in German and Scandinavian studies from the University of Massachusetts, Amherst, USA in 2008. In his research and teaching, he is interested in examining the deployment of gender, sexuality, race, and various forms of Otherness in German-, Swedish-, and Finnish-language literature and film. His dissertation is a study of the development of these forms of Otherness in processes of abjection.

Christopher Frank is an assistant professor of British history at the University of Manitoba, Canada. He is a specialist in nineteenth-century British popular movements, labor, and the law. He has published articles in the Journal of British Studies and Historical Studies in Industrial Relations and was a contributor to Douglas Hay and Paul Craven's Masters, Servants and Magistrates in Britain and Empire, 1562–1955 (2004). He is currently at work on a study of truck wages and working-class consumption in Britain.

Benjamin Franks is lecturer in social and political philosophy at the University of Glasgow, Dumfries, UK. He is the author of Rebel Alliances: The Means and Ends of Contemporary British Anarchisms (2006).

Johan Franzén is a scholar of modern Middle East history and politics. His research areas are Iraqi and Palestinian political history, the Arab East (Mashreq), and the Middle East; his doctoral thesis was a study of the intellectual history of the Iraqi Communist Party. He has also done extensive work on the consequences of imperialism in the Middle East and the various expressions of resistance to which it gave rise, which has appeared in journals such as the Journal of Palestine Studies and the International Journal of Contemporary Iraqi Studies.

Harris Freeman is a member of the faculty at Western New England College School of Law and at the Labor Relations and Research Center at the University of Massachusetts, Amherst, USA. He is also an associate editor of Working USA: The Journal of Labor and Society (Wiley-Blackwell). He is a cooperating attorney with the Massachusetts office of the America Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) and an executive board member of the Massachusetts Society of Professors, University of Massachusetts, Amherst.

Luke Freeman gained his PhD in anthropology at the London School of Economics and Political Science, UK. His research focuses on matters of education, political communication, and cattle trading in Madagascar.

Annette Freyberg-Inan researches and teaches international relations and European politics at the University of Amsterdam, the Netherlands. Her main fields of interest are international political economy, the contestation of neoliberal globalization, democratization, and the enlargement and foreign policies of the European Union. Previous publications related to the ATTAC movement appeared in Globalizations Journal 1, 2 (2004), in Critical Theories, World Politics and the "Anti-Globalization Movement" (ed. Catherine Eschle and Bice Maiguashca, 2005), and in Global Cooperation: Challenges and Opportunities in the Twenty-First Century (ed. Sai Felicia Krishna-Hensel, 2006).

Nicole Frisone is currently a first-year graduate student in the Library Science Department at Rutgers University, USA. Her research interests include university administrators of the 1960s, the Beatles, and American suburbs.

Henry J. Frundt has taught at Ramapo College, USA for more than 35 years. He has served as a UN NGO Commissioner for Disarmament and Peace Education, and has received awards from the Organization of American States, the Fulbright Association, and the Middle Atlantic Council of Latin American Studies. Frundt's publications include the award-winning Trade Conditions and Labor Rights: US Initiatives, Dominican and Central American Responses (1998). His study Fair Bananas! Farmers, Workers and Consumers Strive to Change an Industry will be released in 2009.

Andrea Fumagalli is affiliated with the University of Pavia, Italy.

Keisuke Fuse is an executive committee member of Zenroren, National Confederation of Trade Unions, Japan, which is an organization in charge of international solidarity activities. As an officer of progressive trade unions in Japan, he works to build and connect grassroots class-oriented trade union struggles around the world. He is also experienced in student movements and leads one of the strongest Japanese campaigns for nuclear abolition.

Javier A. Galván teaches history and Spanish at Santa Ana College, USA. He focuses on the history of Latin America, including the European heritage of Spain and Portugal. His favorite period of research is the Colonial period because it offers an interesting perspective on the blend of European, indigenous, and African legacies in Latin America.

Cayo Gamber is an assistant professor of writing at George Washington University, USA. Her research questions how popular culture icons, such as the Barbie doll and Nancy Drew, encode uncontested conceptions of mass production and consumption, and how they also encode alterity as these icons are subverted, redefined, and personalized by individual consumers. She also studies the way in which representations of the Holocaust are codified by personal, political, collective, or national cultures of remembrance and commemoration.

Francesca Gamber is a doctoral candidate in history at Southern Illinois University at Carbondale, USA. She is completing a dissertation on interracial intimacy and the African American civil rights struggle from 1833 to 2000.

C. Andrés Gamboa is a historian dedicated to the study of sexual attitudes and behaviors in Chile in the nineteenth century. He has also worked on the theory of historiography and presented an article titled “Construcción de una Perspectiva Liberal y Santiaguina de la Matanza de la Escuela Santa María” at the Second Meeting of Historians in 2007. He is currently working on a book about the process of building homosexual representation in Chile.

Larry Gambone is an independent scholar from Vancouver Island. He joined the peace movement and the new left in 1965 and graduated from Simon Fraser University in 1970 with a degree in sociology. He then discovered the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) and anarchism, was involved in aiding US Vietnam War resisters, and joined what would later be called the social ecology movement. In the early 1980s he was a member of the Open Road collective as well as the IWW. He has published a short history of anarchism.

Robin Ganey is a professor of British history at the University of Regina, Canada. Her research interests include social and cultural history, the history of the ballad, rural history, the history of popular protest and popular culture, the relationship between history and literature, and national identity in Britain. Her book, Songs of Protest, Songs of Love: Ballads in Eighteenth-Century Britain, was published in 2008.

Pedro García Guirao is an independent researcher who currently teaches at the Instituto Cervantes in Prague, Czech Republic. He is working on his PhD dissertation about the first Spanish anarchist minister, Federica Montseny, in the context of the Spanish Civil War. His work, which includes reviews, translations, and articles about Spanish anarchism and international politics, can be found in journals including Res Publica, Daimon, and Espinosa.

Christian Garland is an independent scholar with an MA in social and political thought from the University of Sussex, UK. His research interests include the Frankfurt School, heterodox Marxism(s), and the autonomist and anarchist movements, on which he has published papers and review essays.

Evan M. Gaughan is currently a Master's student in British history at Indiana University/Purdue University, Indianapolis, USA.

Charlie Geoghegan-Clements is an independent scholar. His research focuses on the cultural artifacts of anarchist history, as well as the revolutionary potential to be found in trauma, play, memory, and sadness.

Christina Gerhardt is a visiting scholar at Harvard University's Center for European Studies, USA, finishing her study of representations of terrorism in literature, art, and film from 1970 to 2005, which has been generously funded by the DAAD, Fulbright, Free University of Berlin, and UC-Berkeley, where she taught in the Department of German from 2000 to 2006. Gerhardt has published extensively on the Frankfurt School and Theodor W. Adorno. She is editor of Adorno and Ethics, special issue of New German Critique 97 (2006) and author of the entry on Adorno in the Johns Hopkins Guide to Literary Theory and Criticism (2004).

Kieran German is currently completing his PhD at the University of Aberdeen, UK. His research interests are Scottish Jacobitism and Scots episcopacy.

César Germana is a professor in the Sociology Department of the National University of San Marcos (UNMSM), Peru and has also been dean of the Social Science Faculty at UNMSM. He has published numerous articles and several books on the history of political ideas in Peru, including El Problema de la Racionalidad en las Ciencias Sociales (2002). He is the winner of the UNESCO-sponsored International Essay Competition organized by the José Carlos Mariátegui Centennial Celebration National Commission, and was awarded an honorary professorship at Universidad San Antonio Abad, Peru.

Andrew Kiiru Gichuru is affiliated with the City University of New York, USA.

Carolyn DeSwarte Gifford is the editor of “Writing Out My Heart”: Selections from the Journal of Frances E. Willard, 1855–1896 (1995), and co-editor of Gender and the Social Gospel (2003) and “Let Something Good Be Said”: Speeches and Writings of Frances E. Willard (2007). She has also written numerous articles and encyclopedia entries in the area of nineteenth-century American women’s religious experience and social reform activity.

Christos Giovanopoulos is currently visiting lecturer at the University of Westminster, London, UK, where he also pursues his doctoral research on the representation and relation between youth and national movements and identities in Greek films. He worked as a journalist for five years before his return to postgraduate studies in film and media. He has also edited the book Cinema and '68: Loaded Cameras (2008).

Karen C. Glenn currently teaches world history and AP European history at Charlotte Latin School in North Carolina, USA. She earned an MA in American history from University of North Carolina at Greensboro.

Richard Goff is a lecturer in history at Chatham University and a PhD candidate at the University of Pittsburgh, USA. He teaches American history, utopian thought, and labor history.

Asher Goldman is a Jewish anarchist-communist author and filmmaker from New Zealand. He has a special interest in reading and writing about Jewish anarchist history, the Israeli–Palestinian conflict, and the intersection between class and ecological politics. His writing has been in publications such as the Earth First! Journal, New Zealand Jewish Chronicle, and ZNet. Goldman is currently working on his first book and an associated film, on Israeli Jews involved in anti-occupation struggles.

Reena N. Goldthree is a PhD candidate in the Departments of History and African and African American Studies at Duke University, USA. Her research explores the gendered and racialized nature of Caribbean nationalism in the early twentieth century and the complex relationship among transnational migration, national loyalty, and racial identity. She is currently completing a project on the social and political impact of World War I in Jamaica and Trinidad and Tobago.

Luis A. Gómez is a Mexican journalist. He has worked for various media outlets covering the Bolivian social movements and struggles that have changed the face of history since 2000. He is the author of El Alto de pie, una insurrección aymara en Bolivia, a chronicle of the September and October 2003 Bolivian Gas War. He considers it a privilege to have reported and thought alongside many of the country’s social movements and their leaders, particularly the indigenous. He is the editor of the online newspaper Ukhampacha Bolivia.

Mauricio González Arenas is a researcher and assistant professor in history and social sciences at the University of Art and Social Sciences (ARCIS) in Santiago, Chile, as well as a teacher at the Fermin Vivaceta School in Santiago. He has studied history, social sciences, and geography at ARCIS.

Robert Goodrich is an associate professor of history at Northern Michigan University, USA. His major research interests lie in modern German history with a broad, integrative approach to the various subfields. Most recently, he has begun investigating the interplay of consumption and religion as part of the experience of modern consciousness. His research into religion and identity stresses a comparative view of European and American experiences.

Uri Gordon is an Israeli activist and academic who teaches environmental politics and ethics at the Arava Institute for Environmental Studies, Israel. Gordon has organized with community initiatives and anti-capitalist networks including Dissent!, Indymedia, and Anarchists Against the Wall. His research continues to focus on grassroots sustainability, radical peacemaking, and anarchist politics. He is also active as a facilitator, trainer, and translator. He is the author of Anarchy Alive! Anti-Authoritarian Politics from Practice to Theory (2007).

Elliot Gorn is chair of the American Civilization Department and professor of American civilization and history at Brown University, USA. He specializes in the social and cultural history of the United States during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. He is author of numerous books and articles, including Mother Jones: The Most Dangerous Woman in America (2001), among other works on working-class life, masculinity and the history of violence, and sports.

Richard Gorrie is the manager of Learning Technologies and Courseware Innovation at the University of Guelph, Canada and a long-time editor of H-Albion. He researches and writes about early modern Britain, focusing on theatre riots in London during the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. He also studies mediated history: the ways in which history is integrated into our culture and our lives at all levels, from education to entertainment and points in between.

Danielle Gougon has a PhD in political science from Rutgers University, USA. Her research interests include women and politics, interest groups, social movements, and feminist theory.

Helen Graham teaches modern European history at Royal Holloway, University of London, UK. She is the author of numerous books and articles on the Spanish Civil War and its long aftermath, most recently The Spanish Civil War: A Very Short Introduction (2005). She also co-edited (with Jo Labanyi) Spanish Cultural Studies (1995). She is currently working on a book about Franco's prisons and also on a hybrid "biographical" project about radical moderns in the wake of the Republican defeat in Spain.

Obika Gray is professor of political science at the University of Wisconsin-Eau Claire, USA. He has written widely on Caribbean politics and social movements in Jamaica, emphasizing the nexus of power and culture. Gray's published works include Demeaned but Empowered: The Social Power of the Urban Poor in Jamaica (2004) and Radicalism and Social Change in Jamaica, 1960–1972 (1991). His current research is on the new civic politics in Jamaica, the politics of the Workers' Party of Jamaica, and intellectuals and politics in Jamaica after 1950.

Christina Suszynski Green is a teacher of English literature with the New York City Department of Education. She holds a Master of Arts degree from Brooklyn College and an Education Master's from Harvard University. Her particular field of inquiry is in interdisciplinary education, incorporating performing and visual art with a political conscience into the language arts curriculum.

Stella Grenat is a professor at the University of Buenos Aires, Argentina. She is working on her doctoral thesis on the Revolutionary Workers' Party-People's Revolutionary Army (PRT-ERP). She is on the editorial board of the journal Razón y Revolución, and she directs the research group on class struggle in the 1970s at the Center for the Study and Investigation of Social Sciences (CEICS). She is the author of Una Espada sin cabeza. Las FAL y la construcción del partido revolucionario en los '70, as well as numerous articles on the history of the Argentinian left.

Rabbi Yehiel Grenimann, a Conservative/Masorti Rabbi, currently coordinates activities for Rabbis for Human Rights. He completed a Master's in Contemporary Jewry at the Hebrew University, Jerusalem, majoring in Holocaust studies, where his supervisors were Professor Yehuda Bauer and Professor Yisrael Guttman. He subsequently spent ten years in Holocaust education at various Israeli institutions including Yad Vashem, and the Massuah Institute for the Study of the Holocaust. His work focuses on teaching teenagers, young adults, and educators about Jewish Resistance during the period of World War II.

Michael F. Gretz is a doctoral candidate in political science and historical studies at the New School for Social Research in New York, USA. His dissertation research focuses on the history of left-wing communism in Europe following World War I. Gretz previously served as an editor for the journal International Labor and Working-Class History and has served as a political and research consultant for academic institutions, labor unions, and political campaigns.

Carl J. Griffin is a historical geographer at the Queen's University of Belfast, UK. Recently, his research has developed to embrace an agenda that, while still focusing upon conflict, examines all relations of transformation, whether between the poor and their employers, the local and the state, or humans and the non-human. Current foci include examinations of the proto-insurrectionary Swing Riots of 1830–1, the decline of food rioting as a mode of popular opprobrium, and the human/non-human ecologies of forests and chases.

Christian A. Griggs is an assistant professor of history at Minnesota State University, Mankato, USA. His research focuses on politics and religion in late Stuart England, specifically the involvement of High Churchmen in English politics after the Revolution of 1688–9.

Andrej Grubic is a lecturer at the ZMedia Institute and University of San Francisco, USA. Grubic is founding member of the Global Balkans network of the Balkan anti-capitalist diaspora, the Yugoslav Initiative for Economic Democracy, Kontrapunkt magazine, and ZBalkans. He has been an anarchist organizer in networks such as Planetary Alternatives Network, Peoples' Global Action, and the World Social Forum, and a program director for the Global Commons. His works include books, chapters, and numerous articles related to the history and utopian present of the Balkans.

Héctor Guerra Hernández is a PhD student in social anthropology at the State University of Campinas, Brazil. He has research experience in anthropology, sociology, and history, with an emphasis in urban anthropology and a focus on postcolonialism, post-socialism, ideology and culture, international migration, social conflicts, cultural identity, and historical memory. He has been involved as a human rights activist in the Documentation and Research Center for Chile–Latin America in Berlin (FDCL).

Lisa Guinn teaches at Ferris State University, USA. Guinn specializes in nineteenth-century United States history with an emphasis in social history and women's history. Her current scholarship deals with social reform organizations in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Her dissertation was titled: "‘Building Useful Women’ from the Depths of Poverty: A Social History of the Girls Industrial Home and School in St. Louis, Missouri, 1853–1935."

Dwight R. Hahn is an assistant professor of political science at John Carroll University, USA, where he teaches Latin American politics and has served as coordinator of the JCU Latin American Studies Concentration. He is also an associate editor of Latin American Perspectives and author of a monograph on twentieth-century Bolivian politics, The Divided World of the Bolivian Andes (1992).

Rigels Halili is affiliated with University College London, UK.

Anthony J. Hall has taught and published widely in the fields of Native American studies, North American history, and constitutional and international law. In 2003 he founded the Globalization Studies Initiative at the University of Lethbridge, Canada (www.globalizationstudies.ca). Currently his major publishing project is The Bowl With One Spoon, a two-volume work comprising The American Empire and the Fourth World (2005) and Earth into Property: Aboriginal History and the Making of Global Capitalism (2009).

Nada Halloway is currently an assistant professor of English at Manhattanville College, USA. Her fields of interest include Arab and African women writers at home and in the Diaspora, and she has written on Assia Djebar and Simin Daneshvar.

Carrie Hamilton teaches history at Roehampton University, London, UK. Her research focuses on the gender and sexual politics of activism and conflict in Spain and Latin America. Her study of women and political violence in the Basque country is entitled Women and ETA: The Gender Politics of Radical Basque Nationalism (2007). She is currently writing a book on sexuality and revolution in Cuba.

Mike Hamlin is a labor and human rights activist and a founding member of the Dodge Revolutionary Union Movement (DRUM), the Black Workers' Congress, and the League of Revolutionary Black Workers.

Jin H. Han teaches Old Testament and Biblical Hebrew at New York Theological Seminary, USA. He is a clergyperson of the Presbyterian Church (USA) and has spoken at many conferences and scholarly meetings around the world. He is the author of Daniel's Spiel: Apocalyptic Literacy in the Book of Daniel (2007) as well as numerous articles.

Jason Hannan is a PhD candidate in communication at Carleton University, Canada. His research interests concern cross-cultural moral discourse and Islam in the modern world. He is a past recipient of the Van Horne Prize, the award given for the best graduate student paper at the annual meeting of the Canadian Communication Association.

Nicole B. Hansen is president and founder of Glyphdoctors.com, offering the world's only online course in ancient Egyptian hieroglyphs. She received her PhD in Egyptology from the University of Chicago, with a dissertation on connections between ancient and modern Egyptian concepts and practices related to human fertility and childbirth. Hansen is interested in the history of ancient and modern Luxor and she has published several articles on the continuity of ancient Egyptian culture in modern Egypt.

Peter Hardstaff is head of policy for the World Development Movement (WDM). His background is in advocacy and campaigning. Before joining WDM in 2002, he previously worked on trade policy issues for the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds and on biodiversity issues for Friends of the Earth England, Wales, and Northern Ireland.

Michael Hardt teaches in the Literature Program at Duke University, USA. He is co-author of the books Empire (2000) and Multitude (2004).

Casey Harison has taught courses in modern European and world history for more than 20 years. His area of research is nineteenth-century French social history, with an emphasis on the Parisian working class, and his articles have appeared in French Historical Studies, Journal of Social History, The History Teacher, and History and Memory. His book on The Stonemasons of Creuse in Nineteenth-Century Paris was published in 2008.

Camila Piñeiro Harnecker graduated from the Latin American Studies Master's Program at the University of California, Berkeley. Her thesis project was a study of Venezuelan cooperatives, looking at the relationship between workplace democracy and social consciousness. Her articles have been published in Cooperatives in the 21st Century: The Road Ahead (2007) and journals such as Monthly Review, Socialism and Democracy, and Temas.

Bruce T. Harpham is currently a Master's student at the Faculty of Information at the University of Toronto, Canada, where he participates in the Collaborative Program in Book History and Print Culture at Massey College. His MA work included original research on the history of the Manchester Public Library. His historical research interests include nineteenth-century Europe, the history of communications, and cultural history.

Christopher W. Harwood is lecturer in Czech at Columbia University, USA. His main professional interests are nineteenth-, twentieth-, and twenty-first-century Czech literature, Czech theatre and cinema, twentieth-century Russian literature, and Czech language pedagogy. He is currently writing a book on the semantics of garbage in contemporary Czech literature.

Amy Hatmaker is a PhD student at Texas A&M University-Corpus Christi, USA, where she is researching the role of women in education during the Reconstruction era and early twentieth century. She earned her BA at the University of Houston-Victoria and works at the UH-V Academic Center as well as at the Reading and Writing Center of the Victoria College.

Colin Haydon is reader in early modern history at the University of Winchester, UK. He is the author of Anti-Catholicism in Eighteenth-Century England c.1714–80 (1994) and John Henry Williams (1747–1829), "Political Clergyman": War, the French Revolution, and the Church of England (2007). He co-edited, with John Walsh and Stephen Taylor, The Church of England c.1689–c.1833: From Toleration to Tractarianism (1993) and, with William Doyle, Robespierre (1999).

Nick Heath is an independent scholar and lifelong political activist. He has been involved in anarchist groups including the Brighton Anarchist Group, the Anarchist Syndicalist Alliance, Big Flame, and the Union des Travailleurs Communistes Libertaires in France. He was involved in the founding of the Anarchist Communist Federation, now the Anarchist Federation. He has authored a number of articles on anarchism.

Stephen Heathorn is a British historian and a member of the editorial team responsible for the ongoing Collected Papers of Bertrand Russell (36 vols.). He has published widely on a variety of twentieth-century British history issues, including the social and political thought of Russell.

Larry W. Heiman is a librarian with an MLS from Pratt Institute, USA. He has worked in various academic and research institutions, including the New York Public Library, New York University, and the University of California, Irvine. He is currently a catalog librarian at Yale University Library, specializing in philosophy, religion, and literatures in English.

Aline Helg is a professor of history at the University of Geneva, Switzerland. Her books include Liberty and Equality in Caribbean Colombia, 1770–1835 (2004) and Our Rightful Share: The Afro-Cuban Struggle for Equality, 1886–1912 (1995), both winners of prizes from the American Historical Association, and La educación en

Colombia, 1918–1957: Una historia social, económica y política (1987, reprint, 2001). She has also published several articles and book chapters on Cuba, Colombia, comparative race relations in the Americas, black mobilization, independence, and racial ideas in Latin America.

Max Henninger works as a freelance translator in Berlin, Germany. He received his PhD from the City University of New York Graduate Center, USA. He has published on Italy's post-1945 political movements and translated Italian novelist Nanni Balestrini into German.

John R. Henris is a PhD candidate at the University of Akron, USA. His research interests explore the interactions of agriculture, environment, and social ferment in the United States during the first half of the nineteenth century.

Berenice Hernández is a PhD student in sociology at the Free University of Berlin, Germany, where her thesis focuses on the migration of women from Latin America to Berlin. Originally from Mexico, she was involved with the Mexican feminist movement as one of the founding members of Las Brujas and Lunatika. She is responsible for the German sections of TRESEGY and YouMap, two European Union-funded international projects about second-generation youth in Europe.

Walter R. Herscher has a PhD from Marquette University, USA. His dissertation topic was "Evoking the Eagle: The July Monarchy's Use of Napoleonic Imagery." He co-authored World History: Focus on Economics (2005), received the NCSS Outstanding Service Award, and chaired the NCSS Instruction Committee. He has served as president and executive director for internal affairs for the Wisconsin Council for Social Studies, and is a former Keizai Koho Fellow.

Kristina Hinds Harrison lectures in political science and integration studies at the University of the West Indies, Cave Hill Campus. Her current research interests include civil society activism in Caribbean regionalism and Caribbean international affairs, and the political economy of Caribbean international trade and financial relations. Hinds Harrison is also interested in advancing gender-sensitive approaches to scholarship in Caribbean political science and international relations.

Sam Hitchmough teaches US history in the American Studies Department at Canterbury Christ

Church University, UK. His doctoral thesis explored the civil rights movement and its immediate aftermath in Chicago from 1963 to 1976. He specializes in African American and American Indian history and culture, has taught at Keele and Manchester Metropolitan universities, and has presented papers in the UK and US.

Radim Hladík is a PhD student of sociology at the Charles University, Czech Republic. His current research focuses on post-communist visual culture, and his other academic interests include Marxism, cultural studies, narratology, and social change. He has been actively involved with several progressive grassroots initiatives in Prague, including the IMF and World Bank protests in 2000.

Christian Høgsbjerg is currently undertaking doctoral research at the University of York, UK on "C. L. R. James in Imperial Britain, 1932–38," and has written articles on James for International Socialism, Revolutionary History, and Socialist History Journal.

John Holloway is professor in the School of Social Studies and Humanities of the Autonomous University of Puebla, Mexico. He has written widely on Marxist theory and anti-capitalist struggle. His latest book in English is Change the World Without Taking Power (2002). He is currently preparing a book titled Cracking Capitalism.

Alejandro Horowicz is a sociology professor at the University of Buenos Aires, Argentina, where he directs the Sociology Department and Postgraduate Journalism Program in the School of Social Sciences. He is the author of Los cuatro peronismos (2007), Diálogo sobre la globalización, la multitud y la experiencia argentina (with Toni Negri, 2003), and of the two-part El país que estalló. Antecedentes para una historia argentina (1806–1820) (2004, 2005). He is also an editor of the Project for the Critical History of Argentine Literature, headed by Noe Jitrik, which has seven published volumes.

Peter Hudis has written widely on Hegelian and Marxian theory and is co-editor (with Kevin B. Anderson) of The Power of Negativity: Selected Writings on the Dialectic in Hegel and Marx, by Raya Dunayevskaya (2001) and The Rosa Luxemburg Reader (2004).

Pang Yang Huei is a history doctoral candidate and tutor at the National University of Singapore. His research areas include contemporary US–Asia relations, the People’s Republic of China’s political economy, and World War II Southeast Asia social developments. He has contributed to Small Wars and Insurgencies, Journal of Contemporary Asia, Biographical Dictionary of the People’s Republic of China (forthcoming), and an oral history anthology, Reflections and Interpretations.

Dongyoun Hwang is associate professor of Asian studies at Soka University of America, USA. He has written articles in both English and Korean, mostly on Chinese wartime collaboration during the Sino-Japanese War of 1936–45 and on Korean anarchism and East Asian radicalism. His current research is focused on East Asian radicals and their networks of relationships in East Asia.

Takashi Ikeda is a PhD candidate of philosophy from Tokyo, Japan. While his academic study specializes in phenomenology and ontology in general, his greatest interest is in Martin Heidegger. He is currently working on a dissertation about contemporary interpretations of Heidegger and translating two volumes of Heidegger’s collected works for the publication of the Japanese edition.

Steven Isaac is an associate professor of history at Longwood University, USA. A specialist in the High Middle Ages, Isaac also pursues research in the history of Islam and its regional expressions up through the contemporary period. He has especially been interested in how culture and religion influence each other, both internally within traditional Islamic lands and with regard to the West. In his teaching he endeavors to immerse students in the richness of the Islamic heritage. He has also reviewed scholarly texts on Islamic/western interchanges.

Ambre Ivöl is a lecturer in American studies in Paris presently completing a PhD at the Sorbonne about the life and work of Howard Zinn. She has conducted personal interviews with Professor Zinn and has access to his personal archives at Boston University. Publications include “‘New Left’ Thinking Reconsidered: A Comparative Study of Historians William A. Williams and Howard Zinn, 1950–1980,” in US Foreign Policy in the 20th Century: The Influence of Domestic Determinants, and “USA, nouvelle gauche,” in La France des années 1968.

Cathérine Jacques is affiliated with the Free University of Brussels, Belgium.

Pia K. Jakobsson is a PhD candidate at the University of Texas at Dallas, USA. Her teaching and research focus is on the cultural and intellectual history of early modern Europe. Her dissertation topic deals with the public voices of eighteenth-century British women intellectuals. Other publications include an article on Catharine Macaulay and a textbook chapter on “Women in the American Revolution,” both forthcoming.

Bob James is an independent researcher, specializing in fraternalism and fraternal societies such as freemasons, friendly societies, trade unions, the Loyal Orange Institute, and others. He completed a Master’s thesis at La Trobe University, Australia in 1984 from which his book, Anarchism and State Violence in Sydney and Melbourne, 1886–1896 (1986), is adapted. He then completed his PhD at Newcastle University, Australia, on “Carnival and Labour History” in 1994.

O. H. Jang-Whan is affiliated with the National Culture Research Institute, Seoul, Korea.

Jason Jewell is chair of the Department of Humanities at Faulkner University, USA. He received a PhD in humanities at Florida State University in 2004 under the direction of Professor Richard Greaves.

S. Sándor John teaches Latin American history at the City University of New York, USA and is the author of the forthcoming Permanent Revolution on the Altiplano: The History of Bolivian Trotskyism.

Eric F. Johnson is currently an assistant professor of history at Kutztown University of Pennsylvania, USA. His doctoral dissertation was about the changing political uses of religious rituals and imagery in Avignon during the French Revolution. His research interests include popular religious culture in the eighteenth century and secularization. His work has been published in a number of historical journals and edited compilations.

Rhayn Garrick Jooste is a player, composer, and pedagogue interested in musical spontaneity and improvisation in a variety of genres. He holds a BTEC National Diploma in popular music, a post-graduate diploma in performance from the Royal Welsh College, UK, and a Master’s in music, culture, and politics from Cardiff University, UK. His research area is Cuban music and history, but he also studies wider Caribbean issues as well as the guitar and its unique place in history as an instrument that transcends all musical boundaries.

John Jordan's work merges the imagination of art and the radical engagement of activism. He has co-directed the social art group Platform and worked in the direct action collective Reclaim the Streets. He co-edited the book We Are Everywhere: The Irresistible Rise of Global Anti-Capitalism (2003), filmed "The Take" with Naomi Klein, and formed the Clandestine Insurgent Rebel Clown Army. He is presently co-writing a book and film project about utopian communities in Europe and co-organizing the UK Climate Camp.

Marina Kabat teaches Argentinian history at the University of Buenos Aires, Argentina, where she coordinates the Working-Class Studies Workshop at the Center for the Study and Investigation of Social Sciences (CEICS). She specializes in economic and labor subjects, and has studied labor process organization and labor conflicts. She has published several articles and a book entitled From the Workshop to the Factory: Industry Labor Process and the Working Class in Shoe Production (Buenos Aires, 1870–1940).

Ackson M. Kanduza currently teaches at the University of Botswana. Originally from Zambia, he has taught at the University of Zambia and the University of Swaziland. He held a Senior Fulbright Visiting Fellowship at the University of California, Los Angeles from 1985 to 1986. He has researched and published widely on the social, political, and economic history of Zambia, Swaziland, and Southern Africa, and on HIV/AIDS, as well as on social movements.

Slobodan Karamanić is a PhD candidate in the Anthropology of Everyday Life at the Institutum Studiorum Humanitatis, Ljubljana Graduate School of Humanities, Slovenia. He is a researcher in the fields of political theory, ideology, and psychoanalysis. Karamanić is a founder and editor of Prelom (Break) – Journal for Images and Politics (Belgrade).

Jens Kastner is a research associate at the Institute for Art and Cultural Theory at the Academy of Fine Arts, Vienna, Austria. A sociologist and historian, he has been associate professor at the Institute for Sociology at the University of Münster, at the Center for Latin American Studies (CELA) at the University of Münster, and at the Vienna Art School. He contributes to several newspapers and magazines and is the coordinating editor of Bildpunkt. Zeitschrift der IG Bildende Kunst (Magazine of the Austrian Fine Artists' Union).

Kimmo Katajala is a professor with the Department of History, University of Joensuu, Finland. He won the Science Book of the Year prize in 2002 and was chair of the Finnish Historical Society in 2005–7. His research areas and interests include European peasant revolts and social conflicts, the history of borders, the social and economic history of eastern Finland, and the methodology of historical research.

Marie Martine Maguetcham-Ruche Kaya is presently a teacher associate at Cornell University, USA, where she teaches French language while completing a PhD in French and Francophone literature. With a background in African cultural anthropology, her current research topics include sexuality and gender in French and Francophone fairytales and feminism in the cinema of Sembène Ousmane.

Anthony E. Kaye teaches history at Pennsylvania State University, University Park, USA. He is a former assistant editor at the Freedmen and Southern Society Project at the University of Maryland, College Park, and author of Joining Places: Slave Neighborhoods in the Old South (2007). He is currently at work on a book about the Nat Turner revolt.

Chris Keefer is a medical student and community radio journalist based in Hamilton, Ontario, Canada. His interests lie in the politics of health, particularly the health outcomes of globalization and neoliberalism. He is a frequent contributor to the National Community Radio Association and the World Association of Community Radio Broadcasters.

Tom Keefer is an editor of the anti-capitalist journal Upping the Anti (www.uppingtheanti.org).

Lisa Keller is associate professor of history at Purchase College, State University of New York, USA. She is the author of Triumph of Order: Democracy and Public Spaces in New York and London (2008).

A. Kemp-Welch teaches at the University of East Anglia, UK and is the author of six books, most recently Poland under Communism: A Cold War History (2008).

William Kenefick is a lecturer in Scottish and British social history at the University of Dundee, Scotland. He has published widely on Scottish maritime and labor history, the impact of World War I and the Russian Revolution on the Scottish working class, Irish and Jewish relations in Scotland from ca. 1870, and the impact of Scottish radicals on the trade union and labor movement. His latest book is Red Scotland! The Rise and Fall of the Radical Left, c.1872 to 1932 (2007).

Holly M. Kent is a doctoral candidate in the Department of History at Lehigh University, USA. Chief co-editor of thirdspace: a journal of feminist theory and culture, Kent has published her work in Lilith: A Feminist History Journal and Limina: A Journal of Cultural and Historical Studies. She has received fellowships and grants from the Massachusetts Historical Society and the Sophia Smith Collection for her dissertation, which focuses on women's anti-slavery fiction in the early republic and antebellum United States.

Susan Kingsley Kent is professor of history at the University of Colorado, Boulder, USA. She is the author of Sex and Suffrage in Britain, 1860–1914 (1987), Making Peace: The Reconstruction of Gender in Interwar Britain (1993), Gender and Power in Britain, 1640–1990 (1999), and Aftershocks: Politics and Trauma in Britain, 1918–1931 (2008). Her co-authored book on the Igbo Women's War of 1929 is forthcoming.

Daire Keogh, a senior lecturer in St. Patrick's College, Dublin City University, Ireland, is currently a Government of Ireland, IRCHSS, Senior Research Fellow.

Deborah Kepple-Mamros is affiliated with Graceland University, USA.

Zarina Rahman Khan is affiliated with the University of Dhaka, Bangladesh.

Alexander King is the parliamentary assistant of MP Heike Hänsel in the German Bundestag (spokeswoman of The Left parliamentary group on economic cooperation and development). His doctoral dissertation explored spatial mobility in Haiti in the context of globalization. He has been researching Haiti since 1996, with an emphasis on the impact of globalization on Haitian society. From 2002 to 2005 he served as consultant to the Party of Democratic Socialism's party executive on local policies.

Cheryl L. A. King currently works in the Drew University Library, USA. She is the author of Michael Manley and Democratic Socialism (2003), and co-editor of Search for Identity: Essays on St. Vincent and the Grenadines (2006), Quest for Caribbean Unity: Beyond Colonialism (2006), and Home Sweet Home: Musings on Hairoun (2007).

James M. King is a research assistant at the University of Texas at Dallas, USA. As an intellectual historian, he has several research interests in both early modern and modern Europe. His most recent work concerns the presence of the German concept of Bildung and its foundational role in the thought of the political thinker Hannah Arendt.

Nathan King currently serves as an assistant to the American Book Review at the University of Houston-Victoria (UHV), USA. He earned his Bachelor of Arts in Humanities and Master of Arts in Interdisciplinary Studies at UHV. His areas of research and interest include early United States, Native American, and intellectual history.

Stewart R. King is now professor at the Mount Angel Seminary, USA. He served in the United States Peace Corps and diplomatic service from 1983 to 1991, serving in Togo, Haiti, and Guinea. He received a PhD from Johns Hopkins University, specializing in the colonial Caribbean. He has written extensively on free people of color in the Americas, and has taught in several institutions.

Gary Kinsman teaches sociology at Laurentian University, Canada. He is the author of The Regulation of Desire: Homo and Hetero Sexualities (1996), an editor of Whose National Security? Canadian State Surveillance and the Creation of Enemies (2000) and Mine Mill Fights Back, Sociology for Changing the World: Social Movements/Social Research (2007), and co-author of the forthcoming The Canadian War on "Queers": National Security as Sexual Regulation.

Frank M. Kirkland is chairperson of the Philosophy Department at Hunter College, USA and teaches in the PhD Program in Philosophy at the CUNY Graduate Center. He is editor of the volume Phenomenology: East and West, and co-editor with Bill Lawson of the volume Frederick Douglass: A Critical Reader (1999). He is author of numerous articles on Kant, Hegel, and Husserl as well as on the theme of modernity and African American intellectual life. He is currently at work on two book projects provisionally entitled Hegel and Husserl: Idealist Meditations and Modernisms in Black.

Gal Kirn is a PhD student in philosophy at the Scientific Research Center, Slovenian Academy of Sciences and Arts, Ljubljana. He has been editor-in-chief of the Agregat journal, and a jury member of the international festival for radical communication Memefest, in the category Sociology. He has also been a member of the programming committee at the Workers' Punk University, Peace Institute, Ljubljana, and has worked with the Autonomous Tribune (a student movement) and the Anti-NATO movement.

Stanislav J. Kirschbaum teaches at York University, Canada. He specializes in communist and post-communist politics, especially Slovak politics, and security studies. He has published A History of Slovakia: The Struggle for Survival in 1995 (2nd ed., 2005) and Historical Dictionary of Slovakia in 1999 (2nd ed., 2007) in addition to 12 books on Central Europe and security and 78 scholarly articles on Slovak politics and international relations. Since 1980 he has been secretary of the International Council for Central and East European Studies and, since 1995, co-président of the Association franco-canadienne d'études stratégiques.

Michael Kline is Edel Professor of Humanities Emeritus at Dickinson College, USA. His work includes literary and film criticism and cultural analysis of nineteenth- and twentieth-century French events. He is a Chevalier dans l'Ordre des Palmes Académiques.

Louise W. Knight is currently an adjunct professor of communication studies at Northwestern University, USA, where she teaches the history of rhetoric. Her independent research has been funded by a fellowship from the National Endowment for the Humanities and grants from the Spencer Foundation, the Lilly Endowment, and the Ludwig Vogelstein Foundation. She has reviewed books for the New York Times Book Review and the Women's Review of Books.

Loudovikos Kotsonopoulos is currently undertaking PhD research, funded by the Greek State Scholarship's Foundation, in welfare state theory at the University of Panteion, Greece. He has contributed articles to three edited conference volumes concerning the Greek political party system, the socialist movement of the early twentieth century, and the political theory of Antonio Gramsci. His main research interests lie in political theory, welfare state, and Greek politics.

Giorgos Koukoules is affiliated with the Panteion University of Political and Social Sciences, Greece.

Jan Kubik teaches political science at Rutgers University, USA. He works mostly on post-communist transformations in Eastern Europe, the relationship between culture and politics, civil society, and contentious politics. His publications include Rebellious Civil Society: Popular Protest and Democratic Consolidation in Poland, 1989–1993 (with Grzegorz Ekiert, 1999) and The Power of Symbols against the Symbols of Power: The Rise of Solidarity and the Fall of State Socialism in Poland (1994). In 2006–7 he served as the Distinguished Fulbright Chair in East European Studies, Warsaw University, Poland.

Hülya Küçük is associate professor of the history of Sufism at Selçuk University, Konya, Turkey. She is the author of The Roles of the Bektashis in Turkey's National Struggle (2002), Kurtuluş Savaşında Bektaşiler (2003), Tasavvuf Tarihine Giriş (2nd ed., 2004), and Sultan Veled Ve Maarif'i. Kitâbu'l-Hikemiyye adlı Maârif Tercüme ve Şerhi (2005). Her current research focuses on the history of Sufism in classical times and today.

Gabriel Kuhn holds a PhD in philosophy and works as an independent author and translator. He has published widely on historical and contemporary anarchism.

Michael O. N. Kunnuji teaches in the Department of Sociology at the University of Lagos, Nigeria. His research interests cut across population studies, human sexuality, and technology and society, inter alia.

Andrew Kurt currently teaches at Grand Valley State University, USA, and has also taught at the University of Wisconsin-Green Bay, USA. He specializes in medieval European and Islamic history and his research interests include Christian-Muslim relations, liturgy, and monetary history, with emphasis on Spain in the Middle Ages. He has also published on late medieval northern African empires.

Geoffrey Kurtz teaches political science at the Borough of Manhattan Community College, CUNY, USA. His book on the political thought of Jean Jaurès is forthcoming.

Aileen Kwa is an independent consultant based in Geneva, Switzerland. Her main activities include research, writing, training, and providing advice on trade and alternative economic policies. Kwa, formerly a senior analyst at Focus on the Global South, is best known for her commentaries and analysis of World Trade Organization negotiations, as author of Power Politics in the WTO (2002) and co-author of Behind the Scenes at the WTO (2003, 2005). Her more recent work includes Rethinking the Trading System, published in 2007.

Dan La Botz is an independent scholar based in Cincinnati, Ohio, USA. He is the author of several books on labor unions and politics in the United States, Mexico, and Indonesia. He writes frequently for Against the Current, Labor Notes, Monthly Review, and Counterpunch and is a member of the editorial board of New Politics. He is the editor of Mexican Labor News and Analysis. He is currently writing a history of the African American community of Cincinnati, provisionally titled Struggle for Justice.

Yves Laberge is an independent scholar and sociologist, who has recently been visiting professor at the Université de Provence in Aix-en-Provence, France. Among some 150 publications and peer-reviewed articles, he has contributed some 20 chapters and entries for reference books including The Encyclopedia of Rape (2004), Men and Masculinities: A Social, Cultural, and Historical Encyclopedia (2004), France and the Americas: Culture, Politics, History (2005), and The Routledge Encyclopedia of the World's Minorities (2005). He has also served on the advisory board for The Encyclopedia of the Blues (2006).

Ferenc Laczó, a historian, is currently working on his dissertation at the Center for Metropolitan Studies, Berlin–New York, a comparative study of the political cultures and reception history of urban/national revolutions in Berlin and Budapest in the twentieth century. He has published over ten articles in English, Hungarian, and Turkish, and is the project manager of and regular contributor to an online historiographical review database (www.ece.ccu.hu).

Jukka Laitinen is a student researching Paul Goodman's anarchist philosophy at the University of Joensuu, Finland. He is one of the editors of Väärinajattelija, a Finnish-language anarchist journal.

Marilyn Lake holds a Personal Chair in History and ARC Professorial Research Fellowship at LaTrobe University, Australia. Between 2001 and 2002, she held the Chair in Australian Studies at Harvard University, USA. She has published widely internationally on the history of feminism and citizenship, nationalism, and anti-racism. Her most recent books include Getting Equal: The History of Australian Feminism (1999), FAITH: Faith Bandler Gentle Activist (2002), and (with Henry Reynolds) Drawing the Global Color Line: White Men's Countries and the International Challenge of Racial Equality (2008).

Tobias Lambert is a freelance author and journalist in Berlin, Germany. He has studied political science in Bonn and Berlin. A specialist in Bolivarian processes in Venezuela and regional integration in Latin America, he has made several research visits to Latin America.

Fintan Lane is an independent scholar and a former editor of Saothar, the journal of Irish labor history. His publications include The Origins of Modern Irish Socialism (1997) and (as editor) Politics and the Irish Working Class, 1830–1945 (2005) and Essays in Irish Labour History (2008).

Max Lane is a writer and translator who has guest lectured, taught, and been a research fellow in several universities in Australia, Indonesia, Singapore, and the United States. He is currently a visiting fellow in the Department of Malay Studies, National University of Singapore. He has translated five novels and one non-fiction work by Indonesian novelist Pramoedya Ananta Toer, and has written on Indonesia, East Timor, and Southeast Asia. His recent publications include Unfinished Nation: Indonesia before and after Suharto (2008).

Miles Larmer is lecturer in international history at the University of Sheffield, UK. He has written widely on Zambian political and labor history and on social movements in Southern Africa. He is the author of Mineworkers in Zambia: Labor and Political Change in Post-Colonial Africa, 1964–1997 (2007).

Giuseppina Larocca is a PhD student at the University of Pisa, Department of Linguistics, Faculty of Modern Languages, Italy. She graduated in Russian literature with a thesis on "The Female World in the Literary Production of Andrei Platonov (1899–1951)." She also studies the women's movement of Russia during the October Revolution and is co-author of the article "Plasmare la storia: la manualistica russa dalla rivoluzione d'Ottobre all'era post-sovietica" ("Shaping History in Russian Books: From the October Revolution to the Post-Soviet Era"), Zapruder 15 (February 2008), Rome.

Mark A. Lause is a professor of history at the University of Cincinnati, USA. His research focuses on nineteenth-century labor and social history, particularly in the Civil War period, and race and class on the western frontier of the Civil War, addressing the interaction of abolitionists and other radicals with the recruitment and leadership of black and Indian soldiers. He is author of Young America: Land, Labor, and the Republican Community (2005). His research projects include émigré activism on the eve of the Civil War, spiritualism, and wartime labor movements.

Stephen Leberstein recently retired as the long-time executive director of the Center for Worker Education at City College, USA, which he helped found and where he taught history. He now teaches part-time on race, labor, radicalism, and abolitionism at Brooklyn College's Graduate Center for Worker Education, and occasionally at Cornell University's School of Industrial and Labor Relations. A member of the editorial board of Working USA: The Journal of Labor and Society (Wiley-Blackwell), he has written on French syndicalism at the turn of the twentieth century and on political repression of the labor left in the US.

Summer D. Leibensperger is the coordinator of the writing center at the University of Houston-Victoria, USA. She has a Bachelor's degree in humanities from UHV and a Master's degree in technical communication from Texas Tech University, USA.

Carl Levy is a reader in European politics at Goldsmiths, University of London, UK. He was previously head of department, from 2002 to 2006. He has been a visiting fellow at the Institute for Advanced Studies, Princeton, USA, Magdalen College, University of Oxford, UK, and LUISS, Italy. He is the author of six edited and single-authored books. He is presently completing a biography of Errico Malatesta entitled The Rooted Cosmopolitan: The Life and Times of Errico Malatesta.

Joel A. Lewis is affiliated with Saginaw Valley State University, USA.

Mary Dewhurst Lewis is John L. Loeb Associate Professor of the Social Sciences at Harvard University, USA, where she teaches in the History Department. Her book, The Boundaries of the Republic: Migrant Rights and the Limits of Universalism in France, 1918–1940 (2007), was named co-winner of the 2008 J. Willard Hurst Prize, awarded by the Law and Society Association for the best book in sociolegal history published in 2007. She is currently researching a book on the relationship between everyday life and international relations in the French protectorate of Tunisia during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries.

Simon L. Lewis is a research fellow at the School of Geography, University of Leeds, UK. His main academic work is in natural sciences, specifically the interactions of tropical forests and environmental changes, for example climate change. He has also been actively involved in the alter-globalization movement, including attending the first Peoples' Global Action conference, and participation in their first global day of action.

Lars T. Lih is an independent scholar who holds a PhD in politics from Princeton University, USA. He worked for six years in the office of US Representative Ron Dellums (1971–6). He is the author of Bread and Authority in Russia, 1914–1921 (1990) and Lenin Rediscovered (2006, 2008), and was the American editor for Stalin's Letters to Molotov (1995). He is now working on a biography of Lenin.

Marisa Linton is a senior lecturer in history at Kingston University, UK. Her first book was The Politics of Virtue in Enlightenment France (2001). She edited Conspiracy in the French Revolution (2007), and has written numerous articles and chapters on the French Revolution and on the political culture of eighteenth-century France, including "Robespierre's Political Principles," "Ideas of the Future in the French Revolution," and "Women and the Politics of Virtue in Eighteenth-Century France." She is writing a book on Virtue and Terror in the French Revolution.

Leonore Loft is a professor of French at the State University of New York, Fredonia, USA. She is the author of Passion, Politics, and Philosophie: Rediscovering J.-P. Brissot (2001) and a number of articles on Brissot. Currently, she is working in the area of eighteenth-century history of animal medicine and intellectual history.

Nancy LoPatin-Lummis is professor of modern British history at University of Wisconsin-Stevens Point, USA. She has published Political Unions, Popular Politics and the Great Reform Act of 1832

(1999), is co-general editor of the Lives of Victorian Political Figures series, and has published articles on parliamentary and popular political history in the Journal of British Studies, Parliamentary History, Journal of Victorian Culture, and Midland History.

Leonard H. Lubitz is a political scientist currently pursuing his PhD at the City University of New York, USA. He has performed extensive research and fieldwork in both the Middle East and Far East. His academic achievements include being a recipient of the Belle Zeller Scholar Award.

Arnaud Lucien is a teaching and research fellow with the University of Toulon, France. He is also a part-time lecturer at the University of Essex, UK. Affiliated with the French high-level research center Information, Milieux, Médias, Médiations (Toulon-Nice), he is involved in several research activities dealing with communications, identity, and culture in relation to the Mediterranean area, especially Tunisia.

Martina G. Lüke is a PhD candidate (ABD) in the Modern and Classical Languages Department at the University of Connecticut, USA. She received her first and second Staatsexamen (2000, 2002) as well as her Doctor of Philosophy from the University of Hamburg, Germany. Her teaching and research interests are in the field of Romanticism, German and comparative modernism, and modern history.

Howard Lupovitch is the Pulver Family Associate Professor of Jewish Studies at Colby College, USA. He is the author of Jews at the Crossroads: Tradition and Accommodation during the Golden Age of the Hungarian Nobility (2007) and the forthcoming Jews and Judaism in World History. He is currently completing a history of the Jews of Budapest.

Janet E. McClellan is currently a professor with the Justice Department at the University of Alaska Fairbanks, USA. She has extensive experience in public service as a police officer, police chief, corrections manager, and warden of the Kansas Violent Sexual Predator Maximum Security Facility. Her graduate and undergraduate education includes history, American political science, and public administration and fostered her avid interest in various areas of world history.

John McCormick is professor of political science at the Indianapolis campus of Indiana University, USA. He is the author of multiple books and articles on British politics, the politics of the European Union, and environmental policy.

Chris McCoy is a teacher, director, choreographer, and scholar whose work focuses on the intersection of politics and performance. He has worked in residence as a teaching-artist for Seattle Children's Theatre, Atlanta's Alliance Theatre, the Denver Center Theatre Company, Saint Louis Opera Theatre, San Diego Opera, and Austin Lyric Opera. McCoy is currently pursuing his PhD in theatre studies.

Michael F. McCullough is an adjunct assistant professor in the Brooklyn College Political Science Department, USA. He teaches at the Graduate Center for Worker Education in New York City. He has a Master's degree in Latin American studies from Stanford University, USA and a doctoral degree in political science from the City University of New York Graduate Center, USA.

Shellie K. McCullough is pursuing her PhD in Jewish studies at the University of Texas at Dallas, USA, specializing in the ethical representation of Holocaust testimonies by examining them through the lens of Jacques Derrida's brand of deconstruction. She is a member of the Modern Language Association, the American Literary Translators Association, and currently works as an assistant to the curator for the Modern Art collection at the Rachofsky House in Dallas, Texas.

Rogério Fernandes Macedo is affiliated with Paulista State University, Brazil.

James R. McIntyre is affiliated with Moraine Valley Community College, USA.

Michael McKee is a freelance writer and lecturer at the University of the Arts, USA, where he teaches freshmen research writing and about post-World War II youth subcultures. McKee has been active in independent music since 1992, touring the United States, Australia, and Europe, organizing all-ages benefit concerts and releasing albums of local artists. He is currently working on a book documenting the 1990s activist punk scene in the United States.

Dale T. McKinley is an independent researcher, editor, lecturer, writer, and political activist. Politically active with the South African Communist Party throughout the 1990s, he is the author of a book on the history of the ANC's liberation struggle, as well as many research reports, chapters, and articles on various aspects of South African and international political, social, and economic issues and struggles.

Dolly MacKinnon is lecturer and research fellow in the School of Historical Studies and in the Faculty of Music at the University of Melbourne, Australia. She is the author of Revealing the Early Modern Landscape: Earls Colne, Essex (forthcoming). Her interdisciplinary work is published in international edited collections, journals, historical guides, and web resources. She co-edited “Madness” in Australia (2003) with Catharine Coleborne, and the special issue of the journal Health and History: Histories of Psychiatry after Deinstitutionalisation 5, 2 (2003). MacKinnon also co-edited Hearing Places (2007) with Ros Bandt and Michelle Duffy.

Paul McLaughlin is a research fellow at the University of Tartu, Estonia. His research interests are in political philosophy, environmental philosophy, and the philosophy of education. He is the author of Anarchism and Authority: A Philosophical Introduction to Classical Anarchism (2007) and Mikhail Bakunin: The Philosophical Basis of His Anarchism (2002). He is currently working on a study of Murray Bookchin’s thought.

Matthew McMurray is a history instructor at New Jersey City University, USA. His doctoral dissertation, “The British Union of Fascists, 1932–1940,” explored the domestic and international policies of the largest party on the far right in Britain in the interwar era. His articles on European history have appeared in scholarly publications, including the Journal of British Studies and The History Teacher.

Colleen K. McQuillen is an assistant professor at the University of Illinois at Chicago, USA. Her primary research interests include modernist poetry and prose, cultural history, and experimental drama and theatre. She has published on Adam Mickiewicz in Polish Review and her professional translations of Anna Frajlich’s poetry have appeared in World Literature Today and in the anthology Contemporary Writers of Poland (2005).

John McQuilton is currently Associate Dean (Undergraduate Studies) at the University of Wollongong, Australia. His primary research interests lie in the intersection between policies developed by central governments and their adaptation (as opposed to acceptance) by regional communities. Adaptation implies accommodation as well as resistance. He has explored these themes in publications across two continents, including work on crime and outlawry, national mythologies, comparative frontier studies, the Boer War, the Great War, and (currently) the American Civil War.

Stacy Warner Maddern is a graduate research fellow at Brooklyn College Graduate Center for Worker Education of the City University of New York and the Labor Policy Institute, USA. He is an established filmmaker, currently completing a documentary on Upton Sinclair’s 1934 campaign for governor of California.

Wendy Maier is an associate professor of history at Oakton Community College, USA, where she teaches American history, western civilization since 1600, and women’s history surveys. She specializes in European history, specifically Nazi Germany and the Holocaust, including the role of female perpetrators.

Mary Lou Malig is a research associate of Focus on the Global South. She coordinates the Focus trade campaign. Malig is co-author of The Anti-Developmental State: The Political Economy of Permanent Crisis in the Philippines (2006) and has also written several articles on the World Trade Organization (WTO) and free trade agreements (FTAs).

Muntassir Mamoon is a professor in the Department of History, Dhaka University, Bangladesh. He has published almost 200 books on history and in the different branches of literature. He is a recipient of many awards, including president’s awards and the Bangla Academy award. His most important research works are Newspapers and Periodicals in 19th-Century Bangladesh, Printing and Publishing in Dhaka in the 19th Century, Festivals of Bangladesh, and Essays on Politics and Governance (co-author). He has also edited The Encyclopedia of the Libertarian War.

David Mandel is a professor of political science at the University of Quebec, Montreal, Canada, and an author of books and articles on Russia/USSR/post-Soviet states, with a special interest in labor. He is active in the labor and socialist movements in Canada and is co-founder of the School for Worker Democracy in Russia, Ukraine, and Belarus, which organizes educational activities with rank-and-file trade unionists and other social activists.

Attilio Mangano is a contemporary historian, a former professor, and author of Le culture del 68: Gli anni sessanta, le riviste, il movimento (1989). He also edited the journal Per il '68 (1991–8) and is author of a blog, Duemila ragioni (duemilragioni.myblog.it).

George Margaritis is a professor of contemporary history in the Department of Political Sciences in the Aristoteleion University of Thessaloniki, Greece. He mainly studies Resistance movements during World War II and social history. His previous publications include Thirty-Three Days in Athens: The Combat for Athens, December 1944 (2008), Undesirable Fellow-Citizens: Elements on the Destruction of the Minorities in Greece (Jews, Chams, 1941–1944) (2005), History of the Greek Civil War, 1946–1949 (2 vols., 2000–1), and From Defeat to Revolt, Greece, 1941–1942 (1993).

Craig Marin is an independent scholar who recently received his PhD from the University of Pittsburgh, USA. His research interests include labor relations in eighteenth-century Atlantic port cities and the intersections of race and class in the waterfront environment. He is currently working on a book manuscript based on his dissertation, “Coercion, Cooperation, and Conflict Along the Charleston Waterfront, 1739–1785: Navigating the Social Waters of an Atlantic Port City,” for future publication.

Perry Mars is currently professor in the Department of Africana Studies at Wayne State University, USA. He is the author of Ideology and Change: The Transformation of the Caribbean Left (1998), and co-editor (with the late Alma H. Young) of Caribbean Labor and Politics: Legacies of Cheddi Jagan and Michael Manley (2004). He has also authored numerous journal articles on the issues of race, class, and political conflicts in the Caribbean and other developing areas.

María N. Marsilli is an associate professor of history at John Carroll University. Originally from Chile, she obtained her MA from the University of California at Davis, and her PhD from Emory University. She specializes in colonial Peru and colonial Chile.

Nathan James Martin is a PhD candidate in history at the University of Nebraska, Lincoln, USA. His main research area is Elizabethan foreign policy, and his dissertation research area is Anglo-Swedish foreign relations during the reign of Queen Elizabeth. His work has appeared in the Sixteenth Century Journal and he has presented papers at several international conferences.

Eric Martone is instructor of history in the School of Professional Development at Stony Brook University and a history teacher in Connecticut for Waterbury Public Schools, USA. He is currently a doctoral candidate in the Department of History at Stony Brook University. He has published articles on European history in peer-reviewed journals, essays on teaching methods, and numerous articles for historical reference works. He is currently editing an encyclopedia on blacks in European history and culture.

Nicole Martone is a professor of English at Naugatuck Valley Community College in Waterbury, Connecticut, USA and teaches genre as well as world literature at John F. Kennedy High School in Waterbury. Her interests are British literature and the study of ancient Greco-Roman culture.

Edyta V. Materka completed degrees in women’s and gender studies and political science at Rutgers University, USA, and is continuing her research at the London School of Economics, UK. She is researching property transformation in northwestern Poland (1946–present), where she conducted the first ethnographic study ever in the rural village of Debnica Kaszubska. Materka has presented her published work on land rights disputes in post-tsunami Thailand at international conferences. She is also a grammatical and technical editor for Global Scholarly Publications in New York City.

Anne F. Mattina is an associate professor of communication at Stonehill College, USA. Publications include “‘Don’t Let Them Step on You’: Gender, Ethnicity and Class in the Great Strikes, 1909–1913,” in Who Says? Working-Class Rhetoric, Class Consciousness and Community (ed. William DeGenaro, 2007) and “‘Corporation Tools & Time-Serving Slaves’: Class and Gender in the Rhetoric of Antebellum Labor Reform,” in the Howard Journal of Communications. She is currently working on a book on the rhetorical construction of womanhood in Progressive-era labor organizations.

Alexander Maxwell teaches at Victoria University, Australia and directs the Antipodean East European Study Group. A historian of East-Central Europe, he has published on linguistic nationalism and contingency in Slovakia, everyday nationalism in Hungary, and the emergence of particularist nationalism in Macedonia. He worked in Wales, Germany, Nevada, and Romania before settling in Wellington, New Zealand.

Brian Meeks is professor of social and political change at the University of the West Indies (UWI), Mona. He is the director of the Center for Caribbean Thought at UWI Mona and a former chair of the Michael Manley Foundation. He has authored or edited seven books and many articles, including Caribbean Revolutions and Revolutionary Theory: An Assessment of Cuba, Nicaragua and Grenada (2001) and Narratives of Resistance: Jamaica, Trinidad, the Caribbean (2000). He chaired the committee responsible for assessing the People's National Party's performance in the 2007 Jamaican general elections.

Michael Menser is assistant professor of philosophy at Brooklyn College (BC), USA, and is on the executive boards of the Environmental Studies Program at BC, the Center for the Study of Place, Culture, and Politics at the City University of New York Graduate School, and the US Solidarity Economy Network. He has published essays on architecture, technoscience, participatory democracy, local and global social movements, and agroecology.

Tibor T. Meszmann is a PhD candidate in political science at the Central European University, Hungary. His current research interests include post-socialist transformations, the institutional role and history of trade unions and organized labor in socialism and after, ethnic policies, and post-socialist state formation. He has worked as an activist and project coordinator in various non-governmental organizations, has been a translator, journal editor and columnist, an independent researcher, and an evaluator of programs on minorities.

Petros Metafas is a PhD candidate at the University of Patras, Greece. His research interests concern Michel Foucault's thought, genealogical analysis as a form of critique, power/knowledge relations, the import and influence of Nietzsche, similarity and difference between Foucault's work and Althusserian Marxist analysis, and the dialogue between poststructuralists and the tradition of critical social theory.

Sandro Mezzadra works as an associate professor of the history of political thought at the University of Bologna, Italy. He is currently an eminent research fellow at the Center for Cultural Research at the University of Western Sydney, Australia. His publications include Diritto di fuga. Migrazioni, cittadinanza, globalizzazione (The Right to Escape: Migration, Citizenship, Globalization, 2006), and La condizione postcoloniale. Storia e politica nel mondo globale (The Postcolonial Condition: History and Politics in the Global Present, 2008).

Jennifer A. Miller is assistant professor of German history at Southern Illinois University, Edwardsville, USA. She holds degrees in German from Davidson College, women's and gender studies, and modern European history. Miller is currently working on a book manuscript titled Postwar Negotiations: The First Generation of Turkish "Guest Workers" in Germany, 1961–1973.

Timothy Miller is professor of religious studies at the University of Kansas, USA and past president of the International Communal Studies Association. He is the author of several books and articles on intentional communities, including The Quest for Utopia in Twentieth-Century America (1998), The 60s Communes (1999), and American Communes, 1860–1960: A Bibliography (1990).

Lalo Watanabe Minto is currently a researcher at the Brazilian Institute for Contemporary Studies (IBEC) and a PhD student in education at the University of Campinas (Unicamp), Brazil. His Master's thesis is titled "The Public and Private in Brazilian Higher Education Reforms: From 1964's Coup to the 1990s," and he is also the author of As reformas do ensino superior no Brasil (Higher Education Reforms in Brazil, 2006) as well as other works on higher education, the history of education, and Brazilian history.

José Molina Bravo is a professor in the School of History and Social Sciences and the School of Social Work at the University of Art and Social Sciences (ARCIS) in Santiago, Chile, where he is completing postgraduate work. He currently researches biopolitics and social movements, state policies directed toward youth, and social intervention in impoverished areas.

Nicola Montagna is currently a research fellow at Middlesex University, UK. His main research interests are youth and urban movements, social movements and globalization, civil society and the third sector, and international migration. His recent publications on social movements and protest include Social Movements: A Reader (2008), La globalizzazione dei Movimenti (2007), and “The Decommodification of Urban Space and the Occupied Social Centres in Italy” (2006).

Tathiana Montaña Mestizo is an academic coordinator with the Indepaz Foundation, a Colombian non-governmental organization. She has a Master’s in political science from the University of the Andes in Bogotá, Colombia, and her research interests are international cooperation and peace movements.

Andrew Moore teaches Australian history at the University of Western Sydney, Australia, where he has taught for 23 years. He has written four books, most recently Francis De Groot: Irish Fascist Australian Legend (2005), as well as more than 60 scholarly articles, principally on the subjects of right-wing politics in Australia, the social history of sport, and Irish-Australian history. With the support of an ARC Discovery Grant he is currently researching the “little people” of interwar fascism in Australia.

Wazha Gilbert Morapedi teaches history at the University of Botswana. His research interests are in labor, migration, and agrarian histories. Morapedi holds degrees in English, education, and comparative studies. In 1990 he joined the History Department of the University of Botswana as a staff development fellow.

Steffan Morgan is currently a documentary filmmaker at ITV in the UK. He has lectured at the universities of Cardiff and Glamorgan and has published numerous articles about the South Wales coalfield and industrial relations. His book on masculinity and the British miners’ strike of 1984–5 will be published in 2010.

Samantha A. Morgan-Curtis is an associate professor of English and women’s studies at Tennessee State University, USA. She has contributed to The Greenwood Encyclopedia of Love, Courtship, and Sexuality (2007) and The Routledge Encyclopedia of Men and Masculinities (2007) and has presented at numerous national and international conferences on early modern women writers. Having won teaching awards, she focuses on continually integrating and developing her pedagogy and scholarship.

Ian Morley is a former postgraduate student of Leicester University and Sheffield University, UK, where he studied British urban history at the Center for Urban History and School of Architectural Studies. With work experience in England, Spain, France, Taiwan, and Hong Kong, Morley has taught various aspects of urban history. His present-day teaching extends into aspects of Asian as well as European history. Also interested in architectural criticism, Morley has taken part in a documentary for the Discovery Channel about the Taipei 101 Tower.

Chuck Morse is an independent scholar and translator specializing in the history of the anarchist movement.

Antonio Moscato is professor of contemporary history and labor history at Lecce University, Italy. He is the author of many books, most of which are dedicated to the crisis of the Soviet bloc (Intelletuali e potere in URSS, 1917 [1991]; Bilancio di una crisi [1995]) and to the Cuba model (Che Guevara. Storia e leggenda [1996], published also in Cuba and the Czech Republic; Breve storia di Cuba [2006]).

Chelsea Mozen is an independent scholar.

Beata Mtyingizana is affiliated with the University of Witwatersrand, South Africa.

Thomas Muhr is a PhD student, funded by the Economic and Social Research Council (ESRC), in the Center for Globalization, Education, and Societies, University of Bristol, UK. Currently, Muhr is researching different aspects of contemporary Latin American revolutionary processes, with a focus on Venezuela’s Higher Education For All, social justice, and human rights within the democratic socialist development model and its regionalization and globalization under the Bolivarian Alternative for the Peoples of our America (ALBA).

Frank I. Müller is currently working as copublisher for a book about the US–Mexican border in which he also presents an essay. He graduated from Humboldt University, Berlin, Germany, in 2008 with an MA degree in philosophy and Latin American studies. His main academic interests concern the philosophy of the body, border, and space as well as geopolitical relations of slavery, colonialism, and state-building.

Tadzio Müller teaches international relations and international political economy at Kassel University, Germany, and is also involved in the emerging global climate change movement. His current research addresses the ways in which global capital(s) and authorities are seeking to productively internalize the climate crisis as the driving engine for a new round of accumulation, and how movements can intervene in this process. More generally, he focuses on global political economy, radical social theory, and social movements. In Gothenburg, he was involved in organizing the ill-fated White Overalls action.

William H. Mulligan, Jr. is professor of history at Murray State University, USA, where he has taught since 1993. He is currently working on a book on migration from copper-mining areas in Ireland to the Michigan Copper Country.

Emma G. Murphy is currently the Australian news and analysis editor for Green Left Weekly. She spent three years living and working in remote indigenous communities in the Western Desert in Central Australia, assisting with archiving cultural and linguistic heritage. She was a consultant linguist for the Yankunytjatjara Picture Dictionary project. Throughout her linguistics work, Murphy has involved herself in indigenous rights and environmental justice campaigns. She has published various articles and reviews.

Timothy S. Murphy, currently associate professor of English at the University of Oklahoma, USA, is the author of Wising Up the Marks: The Amodern William Burroughs (1997), editor of The Philosophy of Antonio Negri (vols. 1, 2, 2005, 2007), and translator of Antonio Negri's Subversive Spinoza (2004) and Books for Burning (2005). He is also the general editor of the scholarly journal Genre: Forms of Discourse and Culture.

Sam A. Mustafa is associate professor of history at Ramapo College of New Jersey, USA. He is the author of Merchants and Migrations: Germans and Americans in Connection, 1776–1835 (2001). A frequent participant in the Consortium on the Revolutionary Era, his articles have appeared in German History, Journal of Central European History, The Yearbook of German-American Studies, Internationale Schulbuchforschung, and elsewhere.

Natalie Mutlak is currently a PhD student at the University of Bremen, Germany, where she is studying water supply and its social impact in the Ramallah governorate. She has studied environmental engineering in Berlin and has focused her research and work on environmental economics, water management, and gender studies, with a regional focus on Latin America and the Middle East.

Ichio Muto is a writer on political and social affairs and an activist engaged in the anti-war movement, international solidarity movement, and other social movements. He founded the English magazine AMPO in 1969, the Pacific-Asia Resource Center in 1973, organized the People's Plan 21 program, and founded the People's Plan Study Group (PPSG) in Tokyo in 1998. He is co-editor of PPSG's English journal, Japonesia Review. He has written many books in Japanese and numerous articles in English for AMPO, Japonesia Review, Inter-Asia Cultural Studies, Multitudes, and other international journals.

A. May-Oo Mutraw is affiliated with Indiana University, USA.

Gwinyai P. Muzorewa is currently a second-year PhD student of history at Morgan State University, USA. He holds degrees in black studies and African American studies.

Mary Ciambaka Mwiandi is a lecturer in the Department of History, University of Nairobi, Kenya. She is an educator, teacher, researcher, and writer with a special research interest in the history and development of education in Kenya and East Africa and its relevance to social development. She is currently undertaking research on the role of research universities in the social development of the Nile Basin at the University of Bergen, Norway.

Henri Myrntinen is currently a PhD candidate at the University of KwaZulu-Natal, South Africa, writing his doctoral thesis on masculinities and violence in Timor Leste. He has worked extensively on gender and conflict issues in Indonesia and Timor Leste, both as a researcher and as an activist.

Koji Nakakita is professor of Japanese political history in the Faculty of Law and Politics at Rikkyo University in Tokyo, Japan. His major works include The Politics of Economic Reconstruction in Postwar Japan (1998), The Establishment of the 1955 System in Japanese Politics (2002), and "Incorporating Japanese Labor into the Free World: Cold War Diplomacy and Economic Interdependence, 1949–1964," Labor History 49, 2 (2008).

Jürgen Nautz is a professor of economic history in the Department of Economics at the University of Vienna, Austria. He has been a speaker of the interdisciplinary working group "Civil Society in Austria" of the Austrian Research Association (with Ambassador Emil Brix). His recent publications include Taxes, Civil Society and the State (edited with E. Brix, 2006), Conflict Potentials in Monetary Unions (with Lars Jonung, 2007), State and Civil Society (edited with E. Brix, 2008), and Frauenhandel: Diskurse und Praktiken (with Birgit Sauer, 2008).

Atoy M. Navarro is a professor at the University of the Philippines. He serves as national board member of Bahay-Saliksikan sa Kasaysayan (BAKAS/Research House in History) and is a member of AKBAYAN Citizens' Action Party (AKBAYAN!) and Solidarity To Oppose Wars (STOP the War!) Coalition, Philippines. He has presented papers in international and regional conferences and has published numerous articles and books on history, the humanities, and social sciences, including publications on the Philippine Revolution.

James Naylor teaches at Brandon University in Manitoba, Canada. He is the author of New Democracy: Challenging the Social Order in Industrial Ontario, 1914–1925 (1991), and is currently writing a history of Canadian radicalism in the 1930s and 1940s.

Sabelo J. Ndlovu-Gatssheni is a lecturer in African studies at the Ferguson Center for African and Asian Studies at the Open University, UK. Ndlovu-Gatssheni is also affiliated with the Department of History at the same institution. He has published extensively on the history and politics of Southern Africa, particularly on nationalism, identity, and governance.

Daniel Tannehill Neely is the director of the New York Music Index and Archive at the ARChive of Contemporary Music in downtown New York, USA. His research interests include ice-cream truck music and Irish identity in punk rock. His writing has appeared in Caribbean Quarterly, Esopus, Nieuwe West-Indische Gids, Ethnomusicology, and The Yearbook for Traditional Music.

Timothy M. Neeno is currently a teacher at the Lighthouse School in North Bend, Oregon, USA. He has taught in Bolivia, Taiwan, Kuwait, Brazil, and the Navajo Reservation in Arizona.

Paolo Nello is professor of contemporary history at the Faculty of Political Science of the University of Pisa, Italy. He also teaches European history at the California State University International Program in Florence. He is a founding member of the scientific committee of the journal Nuova Storia Contemporanea. He is a scholar of Italian fascism and neo-fascism, and has published several books, including a history of the MSI (Italian Social Movement) and a biography of Dino Grandi, Mussolini's minister for foreign affairs.

David G. Nelson is assistant professor of history at Austin Peay State University, USA. He specializes in medieval and early modern Japanese cultural and institutional history. His current research focuses on violent crime and its punishment in seventeenth-century Kanazawa, a castle town located on the Japan Sea.

Robert Nemes teaches history at Colgate University, USA, where his research focuses on Central and Eastern Europe. He has published The Once and Future Budapest (2005), and is currently working on a study of religion, violence, nationalism, and everyday life in the Hungarian provinces between 1848 and World War I.

Caryn E. Neumann is assistant professor of history at Miami University of Ohio at Middletown, USA. She is a specialist in political history.

Paul Douglas Newman is professor of early American history at the University of Pittsburgh at Johnstown, USA, editor of Pennsylvania History: A Journal of Mid-Atlantic Studies, and author of Fries's Rebellion: The Enduring Struggle for the American Revolution (2004).

Benjamin P. Nickels is affiliated with Maryland Institute College of Art, USA.

Micheline Nilsen is an urban historian studying the impact of evolutionary forces on cities. She is assistant professor at the Ernestine M. Raclin School of the Arts at Indiana University, South Bend, USA. She has recently published a book about the impact of railway on European capitals.

Henrique Tahan Novaes is a PhD student at the State University of Campinas (Unicamp), Brazil, where he is studying the relationship between universities and social movements in Latin America. He earned his Master's degree at Unicamp, studying recovered factories in Latin America and the history of self-management. He is member of the Brazilian Institute for Contemporary Studies (IBEC: www.ibec-estudos.org.br). In 2007 he published the book The Fetish of Technology: The Recovered Factories Experience.

1 Notes on Contributors

Yusuf Nuruddin is currently an independent scholar. He has taught in the African American Studies Departments at the University of Toledo, Seton Hall University, and John Jay College (CUNY), USA. He is on the editorial board of Socialism and Democracy (www.sdonline.org) and serves as managing editor of the forthcoming journal Timbuktu Review (www.timbuktureview.org). A veteran activist, he has worked with Pacifica Radio Network, the Brecht Forum/New York Marxist School, the Black Radical Congress, Black Left Unity, and the National Reparations Congress.

Jill M. Nussel is currently the interim director of women's studies and visiting assistant professor of history at Indiana University-Purdue University Fort Wayne, USA, where she teaches Asian history. Nussel's research focuses on women and the immigration experience, especially concerning the preservation of ethnic identities through the dissemination of foodways.

Balam Nyeko is associate professor of history at the University of Swaziland. He has previously taught at the National University of Lesotho, the University of Zambia, and Makerere University in Uganda.

Donnacha Ó Beacháin is associate professor of political science at the Kazakhstan Institute of Management, Economics, and Strategic Research. He was previously a Civic Education Project Visiting Fellow in Georgia, Uzbekistan, and Kazakhstan.

Stephen O'Brien, an Australia-based librarian, has worked as an information manager in Australia, East Timor, and Nicaragua. He is interested in the politics and ideology of liberation movements and political posters.

Karen Offen is a historian and independent scholar affiliated as a Senior Scholar with the Michelle R. Clayman Institute for Gender Research, Stanford University, USA. She is a founder and former secretary-treasurer of the International Federation for Research in Women's History. Her most recent book is European Feminisms, 1700–1950: A Political History (2000). She is currently completing a book on the “woman question” debate in modern France and is editing a collection on global feminisms before 1945.

Mofeyisra Oluwatoyin Ojoawo holds a Master's degree in anthropology and is currently preparing to start a PhD program. Her interests are in medical anthropology, cultural studies, and gender studies.

Olusanya Olumide is an assistant lecturer in the Department of Sociological Studies at the Tai Solarin University of Education, Ijebu-Ode, Ogun State, Nigeria. He is currently pursuing his PhD at the University of Ibadan, Nigeria.

Seun Molatokubo Olutayo is affiliated with Olabisi Onabanjo University, Nigeria.

Vincent O'Malley is a New Zealand historian who has written extensively on the history of Maori responses to colonization. He is the author of two books and a number of shorter works and articles on various aspects of Maori history. He is currently a partner in HistoryWorks, a Wellington-based research consultancy, and is actively involved in researching historical Maori land claims.

Gert J. Oostindie is director of the KITLV/Royal Institute of Linguistics and Anthropology in Leiden and professor of Caribbean history at the History Department of Leiden University, Netherlands. He has published extensively on the colonial history and decolonization of the Dutch Caribbean; on history, ethnicity, and migration in the Caribbean and Latin America in general; and on the significance of colonial history to Dutch national identity. He has been awarded a large number of grants and subsidies, and served on many international editorial, scholarly, and governmental committees.

Gerard Oram is a social, cultural, and legal historian who has published widely on various aspects of military law, discipline, and morale, including their impact on civilians and society. His books include Military Executions during World War One (2003).

Scott D. Orr is an assistant professor at Texas Lutheran University, USA. He does research on the relationship between ethnic, national, and regional identities and democracy, especially in Eastern Europe, and his work draws on both social psychology and rational choice. Recently, he has become interested in bridging the disjunctures between empirical knowledge about identity and democracy and normative political theory on the subject.

Raúl Ortiz Contreras is currently a PhD student and a member of the Indigenous Ethnology Research Center (CPEI) at the State University of Campinas, Brazil. He has experience in the fields of indigenous ethnology and ethnohistory, researching historical processes of territorialization among the Mapuche in Central-Southern Chile and the Kaiowá-Guaraní in Southern Brazil. His doctoral studies concern the recent stages of indigenismo in Brazil and Argentina.

Kevin Ostoyich is an assistant professor of history at Valparaiso University, USA and previously taught at the University of Montana. He is a former Erasmus Fellow of Notre Dame and Research Associate of the Harvard Business School. His publications include The German Society of Pennsylvania: A Guide to Its Book and Manuscript Collections (2006).

Michael E. O'Sullivan is assistant professor of history at Marist College, USA. His current research project is "Lived Catholicism in Germany: Gender, Reform, and Religious Miracles, 1918–1965." He has published in Catholic Historical Review.

Andrés Otálvaro H. is an assistant professor at the University of the Rosary in Bogotá, Colombia. He also works as a researcher at the Center for International and Political Studies (CEPI). His research focuses on the history and development of the Venezuelan political system, the Bolivarian revolution, and political theory.

Alexander V. Pantsov is professor of history at Capital University, USA. He has published ten books and numerous articles on Chinese and Russian communism, including The Bolsheviks and the Chinese Revolution 1919–1927 (2000), Karl Radek on China: Documents and Materials (2005), Mao Zedong (2007), Mao Zedong, Autobiography: Poems (2008), "The Great Helmsman" and His Epoch (2 vols., 2009), and Mao Zedong: Complete Poems (2009).

Vasil Paraskevov is an assistant professor of modern Bulgarian history at Konstantin Preslavsky University, Shumen, Bulgaria. His doctoral thesis, "The Bulgarian Agrarian National Union 'Nikola Petkov,' 1945–1947," presented the attitude of the most popular opposition party in Bulgaria toward Communist Party policy in the initial postwar years. He is currently doing postdoctoral research devoted to British–Bulgarian relations during the Cold War.

Valentino Parlato is a journalist in Italy.

Lena Partzsch is currently doing postdoctoral research at the Helmholtz Center for Environmental Research (UFZ) in Leipzig, Germany, and is a graduate fellow of the Wuppertal Institute. Her research focuses on new forms of governance, social movements, and private sector participation.

Silvina Pascucci teaches courses in theories of social conflict and class struggle at the University of Buenos Aires, Argentina. Her professional research training took place at the Center for the Study and Investigation of Social Sciences (CEICS). She is a member of the editorial board of the journal Razón y Revolución, and is writing her doctoral thesis, with a grant given by CONICET, at the Gino Germani Investigation Institute. She has published several articles and a book entitled Seamstresses, Nuns and Anarchists: Women's Work, Religion and Class Struggle in the Clothing Industry (Buenos Aires, 1890–1940).

Raj Patel is a researcher in the School of Development Studies at the University of KwaZulu-Natal, Durban, South Africa, and a visiting scholar at the Center for African Studies at the University of California at Berkeley, USA. He is the author of Stuffed and Starved: Markets, Power and the Hidden Battle for the World Food System (2007).

Zarina Patel, a physiotherapist by profession, has studied social sciences at Harvard and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, USA. In 1991 she spearheaded the struggle to save Jeevanjee Gardens, which led to her first biography, Challenge to Colonialism: The Struggle of Alibhai Mulla Jeevanjee for Equal Rights in Kenya (2002). She is the foremost authority on Kenyan South Asian history and is the managing editor of AmaaZ. Her second book, Unquiet: The Life and Times of Makhan Singh (2006), is an in-depth study of the founder of the trade union movement in Kenya.

Benjamin J. Pauli is a graduate student in political science at Rutgers University, USA. His chief interests are political theory, religion, and politics. As an activist, he has been involved in anti-war, Latin America solidarity, fair trade, and counterrecruitment activities.

Claudio Pavone, having left his career at the Italian Archives administration, is now professor of contemporary history at Pisa and Rome University, Italy. He has published extensively on Italian history and his Una guerra civile: Saggio storico sulla moralità nella Resistenza (1995) is a groundbreaking work on the Italian Resistance. His latest book is Prima lezione di Storia Contemporanea (2007).

Jaroslav Pažout works at the Institute for Contemporary History of the Academy of Science and at the Institute for the Study of Totalitarian Regimes, Czech Republic. A student of history and archive studies, his doctoral dissertation was on the “Czechoslovak and West European Student Movement in the 1960s.” His interests include Czechoslovakian history between 1960 and 1980 and related international history. He is currently a leader of the project Committee for the Defense of the Unjustly Persecuted, 1978–1989.

G. K. Peatling is lecturer in modern British and European history at the University of Plymouth, UK, and is the author of books and articles on the modern history of Britain, Ireland, and the British empire. Most recently his research has been concerned with the intellectual foundations of British policy in India.

Shana Penn is affiliated with the Graduate Theological Union, Berkeley, California, USA.

Gordon N. Pentland lectured at the University of York before becoming lecturer in British history at the University of Edinburgh, UK. His principal research has focused on two themes: the arguments, strategies, and organizations of both parliamentary and popular politics, and national identities in modern Britain. His interest in Britain in the “Age of Revolutions” between 1776 and 1832 has resulted in a number of articles. His first book is an exploration of parliamentary and popular politics in Scotland between the “Radical War” of 1820 and the Reform Act of 1832.

Rubina Perroomian is currently a research associate at the University of California, Los Angeles, USA. Her publications in English and Armenian include Literary Responses to Catastrophe: A Comparison of the Armenian and the Jewish Experience (1993), The Role of Literature in the Armenian Liberation Movement, A Struggle to Comprehend the Catastrophe and Survive, and The Teaching of the Armenian Genocide in Armenian Schools as well as several research articles.

Sean T. Perrone is currently associate professor of history at Saint Anselm College, USA.

Luke Perry is an assistant professor of political science at Southern Utah University, USA. His current research interests include democratic development and the former Soviet Union, religious rhetoric in the War on Terror, and the teaching of American politics across subcultures. Recent professional activities include serving as a three-time resident scholar in Ukraine and working as part of the Rural People, Rural Policy Program for the Kellogg Foundation.

Nora Martin Peterson is currently a PhD student in the Department of Comparative Literature at Brown University, USA. A native speaker of German and English, she works on the early modern period, with interests ranging from signs and confessions of the body to the querelle des femmes in French, German, and English literature.

Paolo Pezzino is a professor at the University of Pisa, Italy and currently teaches contemporary history at the Faculty of Letters and Philosophy. His fields of study are the history of the Italian Mezzogiorno, the Mafia, and the massacres of civilians during World War II. He is currently working on a major study of the politics of retribution after World War II. He has served on the editorial advisory committee of the journal Modern Italy: Journal of the Association for the Study of Modern Italy since its inception.

Mark Anthony Phelps is currently finishing a PhD in ancient Mediterranean history at the University of Arkansas, USA. He has taught in seven disciplines at five different institutions. His research interests encompass history as well as linguistics, religion, cultural anthropology, historical geography, and archaeology.

Paul A. Pickering is Senior Fellow and Director of Graduate Studies in the Research School of Humanities, the Australian National University.

Christopher Pieper is a doctoral candidate in sociology at the University of Texas at Austin, USA. His research interests include political sociology, religion, theory, and cultural sociology. Pieper’s dissertation is a comparative-historical analysis of Christian social movements in the US during the twentieth century.

Pamela Pilbeam is Professor Emerita of French History, Royal Holloway, University of London, UK and a Leverhulme Emerita Fellow 2007–9. She has published extensively on nineteenth-century European history. Her recent books include Madame Tussaud and the History of Waxworks (2006) and French Socialists before Marx: Workers, Women and the Social Question in France (2000). Her other books include The Constitutional Monarchy in France, 1814–48 (1999) and Themes in Modern European History, 1780–1830 (1995). She is currently writing The Saint-Simonians in Nineteenth-Century France.

Steven Pincus is professor of history and international and area studies at Yale University, USA, specializing in early modern European history. He has just completed a major study reinterpreting the Glorious Revolution as the first modern revolution.

Abel Polese is a Marie Curie Research Fellow at the Hannah Arendt Institute, Dresden, Germany. Prior to this placement, he taught in several universities in Odessa and Kiev (Ukraine). He is co-editor, with Donnacha Ó Beacháin, of the special issue on the color revolution of the journal Totalitarianism and Democracy. Currently he and Ó Beacháin are editing Mapping the (Color) Revolutions: The March of Civic Activism and Political Change from Europe to Asia.

Emin Poljarevic is a PhD student affiliated with the Department of Political and Social Sciences at the European University Institute, Italy. His thesis draws on social movement theories while explaining non-violent Islamist activism in two repressive states, Egypt and Uzbekistan. The dynamics of mobilization and contentious politics in these states are the subject of an extensive investigation on the micro level through which he hopes to explain reasons for increased Islamist social mobilization and its perseverance in non-violent strategies. Previously he has published several works on Islam in Latvia and civil conflicts in Somalia and Bosnia.

Joshua E. Polster teaches theatre history and dramatic theory and criticism. His articles have appeared in Law and Literature, The Arthur Miller Journal, Texas Theatre Journal, and Theatre Tours. He earned a Modern Language Quarterly grant and the Michael Quinn Prize. Polster recently completed his manuscript Rethinking Arthur Miller: Symbol and Structure. Polster has also directed critically acclaimed plays in London and Chicago and his positions have included assistant artistic administrator at the Goodman Theatre, and artistic director of the Steep Theatre Company in Chicago, USA.

Paula Rodrigues Pontes received her BA in economics from the Federal University of Minas Gerais (UFMG), Brazil and her MA and PhD from the University of Georgia, USA. Her main areas of interest are the literature, language, and culture of the Portuguese- and Spanish-speaking world. Her publications include works on literary production under the Brazilian dictatorship, and Brazilian and Lusophone African authors.

Andrea Geddes Poole currently teaches modern British history at Trent University in Peterborough, Ontario, Canada. Her book, Stewards of Culture, on the trustees of London's great cultural institutions, is forthcoming. She is currently researching the joint philanthropic works of Lady Frederick Cavendish and Emma Cons.

Steve Poole is principal lecturer in history at the University of the West of England (UWE), Bristol, and director of UWE's Regional History Center. His research focuses on southwest England, and on eighteenth- and nineteenth-century English popular politics. He has published The Politics of Regicide in England, 1760–1850: Troublesome Subjects (2000), John Thelwall: Radical Romantic and Acquitted Felon (2009), and various essays on plebeian protest and culture in the southwest. He is currently researching problems of governance, jurisdiction, and authority in eighteenth-century English garrison towns.

Alex Prichard is currently a postdoctoral research officer on European Union conflict prevention and peace-building at the University of Bath, UK. He gained his PhD from Loughborough University, UK, where his work brought to light Proudhon's international political theory.

Thomas Purcell is a PhD candidate at the University of Manchester, UK. Working within a critical materialist tradition informed by heterodox Marxism, his thesis focuses upon state power and endogenous development in Venezuela's Bolivarian Revolution. Empirically, his research investigates new innovative forms of production, such as cooperatives and socialist production companies, that fall under what the state terms "socialism for the twenty-first century."

June Purvis is professor of women's and gender history, University of Portsmouth, UK. She is the founding and managing editor of the international journal Women's History Review and also the editor of a Women's and Gender History book series. Purvis has published extensively on women's education in nineteenth-century England, and on the suffragette movement in Edwardian Britain. Her many publications include her acclaimed Emmeline Pankhurst: A Biography (2002). Other suffrage publications include Votes for Women (edited with Sandra Holton, 2000).

Emilio Quadrelli is a researcher in the Department of Anthropological Science at the University of Genoa, Italy. He is currently studying war and “strategic thought.” His publications include Autonomia operaia: Scienza della politica e arte della guerra dal '68 ai movimenti globali (2008), Evasioni e rivolte: Migranti, CPT, Resistenze (2007), and Gabbie metropolitane: Modelli disciplinari e strategie di resistenza (2005).

Victor R. Quñones Guerra is a faculty member at the College of New Rochelle, USA, and is currently an advanced doctoral student in the International Educational Development Program specializing in bilingual and bicultural studies with a concentration in Latin America and the Caribbean. His dissertation research focuses on language policy and national development. His other areas of research include sociolinguistics, language education, education policy, migrant/immigrant studies, urban and minority education, and social-cultural studies.

Hélène Bowen Raddeker is a senior lecturer in the School of History and Philosophy at the University of New South Wales in Sydney, Australia. A historian of Japan, she is the author of several works about early twentieth-century Japanese women who were associated with anarchism: Kanno Suga, Kaneko Fumiko, and Itō Noe. Her first major work, Treacherous Women of Imperial Japan: Patriarchal Fictions, Patricidal Fantasies (1997), was concerned with Kanno and Kaneko who, in two separate high treason incidents, were each found guilty of conspiring to assassinate Japanese emperors.

Charan Rainford is a researcher attached to the International Center for Ethnic Studies, Colombo, Sri Lanka. He specializes in politics of the state and questions of Diaspora, with relation in particular to the conflict in Sri Lanka. He is the co-author of the forthcoming book Mistaking Politics for Governance: The Politics of Interim Arrangements in Sri Lanka 2002–2005. He has also contributed a book chapter on the challenges of nation-building in Sri Lanka, as well as conference and policy papers on issues related to the Sri Lankan conflict, nationalism, and the Diaspora.

Zahid Rajan is a founding member of the Coalition of National Convention, the precursor to the present process of constitutional review in Kenya. A printer and graphic designer by profession, he is the executive editor of AmaaZ, a journal devoted to Kenyan South Asian history and culture, which has recorded the histories of notable South Asian personalities in East Africa. His company Zand Graphics Ltd. has published four books on Kenyan South Asian history. He is also presently involved in advocacy work on the Mau Mau reparation suit filed by the Kenya Human Rights Commission.

Adrian Randall is professor of English social history at the University of Birmingham, UK and has published extensively on the subjects of urban and rural popular protest, labor organization, and technological change in England during the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. He is the author of Riotous Assemblies: Popular Protest in Hanoverian England (2006), which includes an in-depth study of the Luddite disturbances in England between 1811 and 1812.

Peter Ranis is Professor Emeritus in the PhD Program of Political Science at the Graduate Center, City University of New York, USA. Ranis's research interests include the political economy and labor studies in Argentina, Latin America, and the United States. He has over 70 publications in various areas of Western Hemisphere social science. He has published four books including Clases, Democracia y Trabajo en la Argentina Contemporanea (1997) and Argentine Workers: Peronism and Contemporary Class Consciousness (1992). His articles have appeared in numerous scholarly journals.

Jonah Raskin teaches communication law, memoir writing, and journalism at Sonoma State University, USA. He is the author or editor of a dozen books, including The Radical Jack London (2008), For the Hell of It (1998), American Scream (2004), and The Mythology of Imperialism (1971). He has also been a Fulbright Professor in Belgium, where he taught American literature.

Kimberly A. Redding is an associate professor of history and director of the European Studies Program at Carroll University, USA. A revised version of her doctoral dissertation, titled Growing Up in Hitler's Shadow: Remembering Youth in Postwar Berlin, was published in 2004. Her current research explores the construction of collective memory in postwar Europe.

Adam Reinherz is currently a graduate student at the University of Iowa, USA. His writings focus on jurisprudence and Renaissance Hebraica. He received his Juris Doctorate from Loyola University Chicago School of Law and was a graduate student at the University of Chicago.

Blake W. Remington is a PhD student at the University of Texas at Dallas, USA, where he focuses on modern European Jewish cultural and intellectual history, with an emphasis on Germany. His primary research interests include the literary and artistic representations of the Holocaust and the history of anti-Semitism.

Glen Richards currently lectures at the Department of History, University of the West Indies, Mona Campus. A native of Antigua, he has researched and been a resident of St. Kitts island in the West Indies.

Annette Richardson is a historian who teaches in the Educational Policy Studies Department at the University of Alberta, Canada. Richardson has published numerous articles in scholarly journals, edited a number of books, and has written over 200 encyclopedia articles. Her major research focus concerns the effect of war on children. She is a member and former president of Delta Kappa Gamma Society International, Alpha Chapter and Phi Delta Kappa, University of Alberta Chapter. Richardson is the founder and chair of the International Cultural Research Network.

Daniel Ritter is a PhD candidate in sociology at the University of Texas at Austin, USA. His research interests include political sociology, comparative-historical methods, and non-violent social change. Ritter's dissertation examines the emergence of non-violent revolutions in the late twentieth century.

Silvia Rivera Cusicanqui is a professor of sociology at La Paz's University of San Andres, Bolivia. Of Aymara descent, she founded the Workshop on Andean Oral History in 1983 with other indigenous intellectuals. She is the author of several books, including Oppressed But Not Defeated: Peasant Struggles Among the Aymara and Quechua in Bolivia, 1900–1980 (1984, translated into English and Japanese), and Los Artesanos Libertarios y la Ética del Trabajo (an oral history of the La Paz anarchist movement). As an activist, she works with Bolivian indigenous movements, such as the Katarista and coca growers' movements.

Fabiana de Cássia Rodrigues is currently enrolled in the PhD Program in Education History at the College of Education at the State University of Campinas (Unicamp), Brazil, with a research focus on the agrarian question and social movements in Brazil.

Rosana López Rodríguez is a PhD student at the University of Buenos Aires, Argentina, where her doctoral thesis is on "Love and Capitalism in Yrigoyen's Argentina." She is a researcher at the Center for the Study and Investigation of Social Sciences (CEICS), and she has published several articles in international journals on popular literature and contemporary cultural criticism and a collection of short stories called La Herencia: Cuentos Piqueteros. She is currently preparing an edition of the complete poetic Works of Roberto Santoro, a disappeared Argentinian poet.

Edmund Rogers is a PhD candidate at the University of Cambridge, UK, where his thesis looks at the impact of the English-speaking New World on economic debates in Britain from the late nineteenth century to World War I. He specializes in late nineteenth- and twentieth-century British economic history. He has published primarily on the debate over free trade and protection in Britain, including in Cambridge's Historical Journal; is a contributor to the History & Policy website; and won the British Australian Studies Association essay prize in 2007.

Gigi Roggero is a researcher at the University of Bologna, Italy. As an activist, he is involved in the "Atelier Occupato Esc" in Rome (www.escatelier.net), the journal Posse (www.posseweb.net), and the transnational project "edu-factory" (www.edu-factory.org), and is a collaborator in the newspaper Il Manifesto. He is co-author of several books, including Futuro anteriore. Dai "Quaderni rossi" ai movimenti globali: ricchezze e limiti dell'operaiismo italiano (2002) and Precariopoli: Parole e pratiche delle nuove lotte sul lavoro (2005). He is author of Intelligenze fuggitive: Movimenti contro l'università-azienda (2005).

Rady Roldan-Figueroa received his ThD degree from Boston University, USA, and his MDiv from New Brunswick Theological Seminary, USA. He completed his undergraduate work at the University of Puerto Rico, where he majored in political science with a concentration on Latin American studies. He is interested in the political theology of radical and progressive thinkers in Spain and Latin America.

Albert Rolls received his PhD from the National University of Ireland, Galway, and has published work on Renaissance notions of kingship and Shakespeare. His interests, however, are varied; he has edited essay collections on the new media and international perspectives in education, edited biographical reference works, and written a biography of Stephen King.

Peter Roman is professor in the Political Science Doctoral Program at the Graduate Center of the City University of New York, USA. His recent publications include “Electing Cuba’s National Assembly Deputies: Proposals, Selections, Nominations, and Campaigns,” in European Review of Latin American and Caribbean Studies (2007), and “The Lawmaking Process in Cuba: Debating the Bill on Agricultural Cooperatives,” in Socialism and Democracy 38 (2005). He also serves on the editorial board of Socialism and Democracy.

Eduardo Romanos received his PhD in social and political sciences at the European University Institute in Florence, Italy. His main research interests are in the areas of social movements and political ideologies. He has published on the history of the Spanish anarchist movement, particularly during the Francoist dictatorship. He is currently working on the alternative left in Europe between World War II and May ’68.

Peter Rosenbaum teaches at Trinity College, USA, and at the Free University of Berlin, Germany. In addition to twentieth- and twenty-first-century German literature and aesthetics, his research is centered on the history of commemorative traditions. He has published on the subjects of Holocaust memorials and contemporary German authors.

April Rosenblum is a writer and educator whose work producing activist teaching tools on anti-Semitism earned her recognition by the Jewish Forward as one of the 50 most influential Jews in the US in 2007. She has written for Bridges, New Voices, and Righteous Indignation: A Jewish Call for Justice and has been active for over a decade in grassroots activism on race, criminal justice, and other issues. Her pamphlet, “The Past Didn’t Go Anywhere: Making Resistance to Anti-Semitism Part of All of Our Movements,” has been called “funny, articulate, and shockingly inclusive.”

Catherine Ross studies political science, economics, and reflexive social psychology at the Ludwig-Maximilians University, Munich. In addition to spending six months studying in Puebla, Mexico, she has traveled extensively around South America visiting Ecuador, Argentina, Colombia, and Venezuela. She is involved in several projects around Germany organizing educational events on South America and has written a number of papers on South American history, political development, and current social issues.

Michael Rossi is affiliated with Rutgers University, USA.

Trevor Rowe is an independent scholar in Barbados.

Hermann Ruiz is a political scientist originally from Bogotá, Colombia, who has worked in academic and political fields on issues related to human, ethnic, civil, and political rights. He has worked for the executive branch in ethnic conflict mediation and for the United Nations in the protection of the rights of internally displaced people, both in Colombia. His academic work is based in psychoanalytical theory (Lacan/Žižek), discourse analysis (Laclau/Mouffe), and liberal political theory and its critics.

Kathleen Ruppert holds a Master’s degree in modern European history from the Catholic University of America, USA. Her major fields of study include modern Britain and Ireland, modern European intellectual history, and early modern Europe.

Jeff Rutherford is a lecturer in history at the University of Texas at Austin, USA. In addition to teaching classes in Modern European history, he is currently working on a manuscript entitled “Soldiers into Nazis? The German Infantry’s War in Northwest Russia, 1941–1944.”

Michael Rutz is associate professor of history at the University of Wisconsin-Oshkosh, USA. He has published articles in Parliamentary History and the Journal of Church and State. His book concerning politics and dissenting missionaries in the early nineteenth-century British empire is currently under contract.

Peter Ryan is the founder and principal of Tinicum Arts and Science, a Buddhist high school in Pennsylvania. He teaches Italian and American history and is pursuing a PhD in psychology at Chestnut Hill College, USA.

Thierry Saintine is currently pursuing an MFA in creative writing while working at Brooklyn College as a counselor and administrative coordinator for Eris/BMI. He is a graduate from City College Theatre and Speech Department, USA.

Yohichi Sakai was an activist in the Japanese Fourth International group from 1959 to the 1990s. He edited Revolutionary Controversies of the Second International (1973) and was the general editor of the Japanese Writings of Leon Trotsky.

Ernesto José Salas received his BA in history from the School of Arts and Sciences at the University of Buenos Aires, Argentina. His publications include La Resistencia Peronista: La toma del frigorífico Lisandro de la Torre (1991), "Cuando John William Cooke fue acusado de traicionar la revolución," in Cooke, de vuelta (1999), and Uturuncos: Los orígenes de la guerrilla peronista (2003).

Grace L. B. Sanders is a doctoral student in the History and Women's Studies Joint PhD Program at the University of Michigan, USA. Her research interests include Haitian women's activism, transnational feminisms, and migration and circulation in the twentieth-century Caribbean and Latin America.

Agustín Santella is currently finishing his PhD thesis at the University of Buenos Aires (UBA), Argentina, on labor conflicts in Argentina's automotive sector. He also teaches sociology and the history of the workers' movement at UBA and works as a researcher at the Gino Germani Institute. He has published articles and books on social and labor movements, and his research has been financed by UBA, the Mexican government, and CONICET.

Diana Espirito Santo is a PhD student in anthropology at University College London, UK. Her ethnographic research is on spirit mediums and Afro-Cuban religious experience in Havana, focusing more specifically on personhood, creativity, and concepts of knowledge. Future research projects in Cuba will explore the relationship between science, socialism, and religious processes, both in their historical and contemporary dimensions.

Joseph C. Santora is dean of the School of Business and Management at Thomas Edison State College, USA. He has published numerous articles in leading academic journals.

Eduardo Sartelli is completing his doctoral thesis at the University of Buenos Aires (UBA), Argentina, on "Capitalism and Class Struggle in the Agriculture of the Argentinean Pampa." He is a full professor in Argentinian history at UBA and has lectured at several institutes, labor unions, and popular organizations. He is the director of the Center for the Study and Investigation of Social Sciences (CEICS) and the author of several books, including The Square is Ours, The Unhappy Meal, and The Salt of the Earth. He has also published dozens of articles in Argentina and abroad.

Stephen W. Sawyer is currently assistant professor of history at the American University of Paris, France. His research focuses on French and American urban political history. Recent publications include "Locating the Center: Confining and Defining the Capital through the Parisian Fortifications," Nottingham French Studies (2005) and "A Question of Life or Death: Administrative Bodies and Administrating Bodies in Nineteenth-Century Paris," in Fields of Expertise: A Comparative History of Expert Procedures in Paris and London, 1600 to Present (2007). He is currently preparing a book on the history of the Parisian municipality from 1789 to 1880.

Timothy Scarnecchia is an assistant professor of African history at Kent State University in Kent, Ohio. He is the author of The Urban Roots of Democracy and Political Violence in Zimbabwe: Harare and Highfield, 1940–1964 (2008) and continues to research on topics of trade unions, nationalism, and urban consciousness in Zimbabwe.

Richard Schaefer is an assistant professor of history at the State University of New York at Plattsburgh, USA. Trained in modern European history, his research currently focuses on the European Catholic revival in the nineteenth century.

Albert Scharenberg teaches political science at the John F. Kennedy Institute for North American Studies at the Free University of Berlin, Germany. He also works as a staff journalist at the German monthly Blätter für deutsche und internationale Politik (Journal for German and International Politics). Scharenberg has published work on US history and politics, with a focus on African Americans, racism, the labor movement, and social inequality, as well as on globalization, urban politics, and German history and politics. He is currently preparing a book about Martin Luther King.

Bernard Schmid works as a lawyer in a non-governmental organization fighting racism against both undocumented and legal immigrants. He holds a PhD in law (with a specialization in labor law). He is the author of several books on the topics of Algerian history, the Lebanon war in 2006, and the political far right in France. He has also made scholarly contributions to a volume concerning trade unionism.

Ingo Schmidt teaches labor relations at Athabasca University, Canada. He wrote his PhD thesis on trade unions and Keynesianism in Germany and has held positions at a number of universities in Canada and Germany. He has also worked for the German metal workers' union, IG Metall, and is active as a labor educator and writer for various progressive newspapers and journals.

Roxanne Schroeder-Arce serves as assistant professor of theatre education at Emerson College, USA. She has also served as artistic and education director of Teatro Humanidad in Austin, and taught high school theatre in Texas for six years. Schroeder-Arce's current artistic and scholarly work focuses on bilingual theatre for young audiences. She is actively engaged with Theatre for Young Audiences/USA (TYA/USA) and the American Alliance for Theatre and Education.

T. M. (Tomás) Scruggs is an ethnomusicologist at the University of Iowa, USA. He has taught at the Central American University, Nicaragua, Florida International University, USA, and the University of the Andes, Venezuela. His research primarily focuses on the use of music to construct social identity in the Americas. He has published on Central American music and dance in audio, video, and print format. He received the Society of Ethnomusicology's Jaap Kunst Prize for the most significant article published in 2005.

Shatarupa Sen Gupta is a research scholar at Jadavpur University, India, where she majored in history. At present she is working on the media representation of the Naxalite movement over the period 1967–72.

Jean-Jacques N. Sène is assistant professor of history, cultural studies, conflict resolution, and peace studies at Chatham University, USA. He also coordinates the Global Focus program. In the late 1980s, he spearheaded a number of community development initiatives with the regional bureaus of UNICEF and UNESCO in West Africa. Sène is currently researching the survival patterns of ancient myths and rituals in postcolonial Africa, and how they can help establish the matrix of a new, pan-African social consciousness to meet contemporary global challenges.

Vittorio Sergi is an independent scholar from Genoa, Italy who holds doctoral degrees in both political philosophy and sociology. His research focuses on the Zapatista movement in Mexico and on the political, social, and military forms of contemporary social conflicts. In Italy, he studied the detention center's regime for migrants and currently studies grassroots migrant movements.

Jeff Shantz is a community organizer and activist. He has published numerous articles in anarchist publications as well as many academic journals. He is a member of the Ontario Coalition Against Poverty (OCAP), and has been host of the OCAP radio show. He was also involved in the Who's Emma? info-shop and Anarchist Free Space and Free Skool. Currently he teaches at Kwantlen Polytechnic University in Vancouver, Canada.

Lisa B. Sharlach is an assistant professor at the University of Alabama, Birmingham, USA. Her fields are comparative politics (with a regional emphasis on Africa), international relations, and women's studies. The focus of her research is the intersection of ethnicity, gender, and political violence.

Michael Orlando Sharpe is assistant professor of political science in the Department of Behavioral Sciences at York College of the City University, New York, USA. His research involves the relationship between the Netherlands Antilles, Aruba, and the Netherlands as well as the politics of migration, immigrant political incorporation, and political transnationalism in the Netherlands, Japan, and around the world.

Seema Shekhawat is currently associated with the Center for African Studies, University of Mumbai, India. She holds a doctoral degree in political science from the University of Jammu, India. Her areas of interest include conflict, human rights, and gender. She has written extensively on these issues in national and international journals, magazines, and newspapers besides authoring three books (two co-authored). Her most recent publication is Afro-Asian Conflicts: Changing Contours, Costs and Consequences (2008).

Mimi Sheller is visiting associate professor in the Department of Sociology and Anthropology at Swarthmore College, USA, senior research fellow in the Center for Mobilities Research at Lancaster University, UK, and a research fellow at the Shelby Cullom Davis Center for Historical Studies at Princeton University, USA. She is co-editor of the journal Mobilities, author of Democracy After Slavery (2000) and Consuming the Caribbean (2003), and co-editor of Uprootings/Regroundings (2003), Tourism Mobilities (2004), and Mobile Technologies of the City (2006).

Benjamin Shepard is an assistant professor of human service at New York College of Technology/City University of New York, USA. He is the author/editor of five books, including White Nights and Ascending Shadows: An Oral History of the San Francisco AIDS Epidemic (1997) and From ACT UP to the WTO: Urban Protest and Community Building in the Era of Globalization (2002). His forthcoming works include Queer Political Performance and Protest, Play, Creativity, and the New Community Organizing, and Community Projects as Social Activism.

Nichole Shippen is a PhD candidate in political science at Rutgers University, USA, and is currently a visiting assistant professor at Ohio University, USA, in the Women's and Gender Studies Program. Her research focuses on labor, work, and the fight for time.

Eliakim Sibanda is affiliated with the University of Winnipeg, Canada.

Robert Sierakowski is a PhD student in Latin American history at the University of California, Los Angeles, USA. He has carried out original research in Chile, El Salvador, and Nicaragua focusing on issues of political violence, state formation, and revolutionary movements.

Jill Silos teaches graduate courses in American history at the University of New Hampshire, USA. A specialist in modern US history, with an emphasis on cultural, intellectual, and political history, she is the recipient of the 2005 Paul L. Murphy Award from the American Society for Legal History for her research on civil rights and civil liberties. Her forthcoming book is entitled Everybody Get Together: The Politics of the Counterculture.

Fernando T. Silva is a professor in the Department of History at the State University of Campinas in São Paulo, Brazil. A specialist in social labor history, he has written two books about the history of workers in the city of Santos (São Paulo) during the twentieth century, A carga e a culpa: Os operários das Docas de Santos, 1937–1968 (The Burden and the Guilt: The Port Workers in Santos: Rights and Culture of Solidarity, 1937–1968, 1995) and Operários sem patrões: Os trabalhadores da cidade de Santos no Entreguerras (Without Bosses: Workers in the City of Santos Between the Wars, 2003).

Steven E. Silvern is a political geographer specializing in the study of Native American geographies. His research focuses upon political conflicts over sovereignty, territory, and natural resources between Indian tribes and federal and state governments. He has published in a number of journals, including Cultural Geographies, Political Geography, American Indian Culture and Research Journal, and Historical Geography. Currently, he is researching the impact of 9/11 on the discourse of the anti-Indian movement in the United States as well as the politics of Native American history at sites, museums, and commemorations.

Terry Simmons is a geographer and lawyer in private practice in Nevada and California as well as a mediator and arbitrator. He is active in creative environmental problem-solving in the US and in Western Canada. He is also president of the Center for Global Policy Studies. Simmons was a co-founder of Greenpeace in 1969. He sailed to Amchitka Island in 1971 aboard the original Greenpeace protest vessels: the Greenpeace and the Greenpeace II.

Anna Simone is a researcher and teaching assistant at the University of Bari, Italy, where she completed her PhD program in "Theories of Language and Signs" with a dissertation entitled "Migration and Control: Socio-Anthropological Signs of the Changing Metropolis." Her publications include Divenire Sans papiers: Sociologia dei dissensi metropolitani (2001) and Lessico di biopolitica (2006). Currently, her interests concern European and American feminist theories.

Yvonne D. Sims is assistant professor of American studies at Pennsylvania State University, Harrisburg, USA. Her publications include Women of Blaxploitation: How the Action Heroine Changed American Popular Culture (2006), The Week Chicago Died: How the 1968 Chicago Riots Changed the Democratic Party's Landscape (2008), and several encyclopedia entries on race and gender. She is working on a manuscript entitled Divas of the Silver Screen: The Lives and Careers of Early African American Actresses in Hollywood.

Marina Sitrin is a writer, teacher, student, militant, and lawyer. She published Horizontalism: Voices of Popular Power in Argentina (2006) and a Spanish version of the same book, Horizontalidad (2005). She is currently based in Havana, Cuba, where she is working on a new book addressing the questions of revolution and subjectivity.

Giannis (Jean-Marie) Skalidakis is currently working on his doctorate thesis on the subject of the Political Committee of National Liberation (PEEA) in occupied Greece in 1944 at the Aristotle University Law School of Thessaloniki, Greece. He has a Master's degree in history and civilizations from the Department of Modern Hellenic Studies in the Ecole des Hautes Etudes en Sciences Sociales (EHESS) in France and has published a number of articles in historical reviews.

Balasingham Skanthakumar works for the Law and Society Trust, a non-profit human rights organization in Colombo, Sri Lanka. He has previously taught in the Law and Development Studies Departments at the University of London, UK. His research interests include the labor and left movements, political economy, women and law, and minority rights in Sri Lanka.

David Michael Smith is professor of government at the College of the Mainland, USA. His writings have appeared in Peace Review, Journal for the Study of Peace and Conflict, Socialism and Democracy, Nature, Society, and Thought, and other publications. He is presently writing a book on the global protest movement against the war in Iraq.

Harold L. Smith is professor of history at the University of Houston-Victoria, USA, and a Fellow of the Royal Historical Society of Great Britain. He is the author or co-author of six books, including The British Women's Suffrage Campaign 1866–1928 (2007), Minnie Fisher Cunningham: A Suffragist's Life in Politics (with Judith N. McArthur, 2003), Britain in the Second World War: A Social History (1996), and British Feminism in the Twentieth Century (1990).

Gregory R. Smulewicz-Zucker is in the graduate program in history at King's College, University of Cambridge, UK. He is currently editing two books, Forging Cosmopolitan Dialogue: The Logos Interviews Reader and The Idea of African Independence. He has published in magazines and journals and is the managing editor of Logos: A Journal of Modern Society and Culture.

Le'Ann L. Solmonson has been an educator for 25 years, serving as a classroom teacher, school counselor, administrator, and counselor educator. In addition she has numerous years of experience working in a clinical setting and private practice. Dr. Solmonson is passionate about empowering individuals to use their democratic rights and privileges to enact social change, advocate for educational reform, and engage in professional advocacy.

Karen Sonnelitter is currently a PhD candidate in history at Purdue University, USA, focusing on social reform movements in early modern Ireland. She completed an MA in history from the University of Connecticut, USA and received an MA in Irish studies from Queen's University Belfast, Ireland.

André Spicer is an associate professor of organization studies at the University of Warwick, UK. He is interested in the political dynamics of organizations. He is author of Contesting the Corporation (with Peter Fleming, 2007). Recently he completed a large-scale study of alternative media organizations.

Elizabeth Spoden is a graduate student at Indiana University-Purdue University, Indianapolis, USA. Her research concerns gender and identity in the British Navy during the Napoleonic Wars.

R. Scott Spurlock is now a teaching fellow in Scottish history at the University of Aberdeen, UK. He has studied religion at George Fox University, USA and theology and ecclesiastical history at the University of Edinburgh (MTh, MSc, PhD). He has held a postdoctoral fellowship at the Institute for Advanced Studies in the Humanities, University of Edinburgh, UK.

Heather Squire is currently an organizer with the CUNY student movement and an activist with The Right to the City Coalition. She holds a BA in sociology from Brooklyn College, USA. She has been a restaurant worker for 15 years, an activist for ten years, and an intermittent college student over the last seven years. Her main research and life interests include social movements, non-dominant paradigm economics, urban displacement, and gentrification.

Michael Staudenmaier is an independent historian living in Chicago, USA. His writings have been published in a variety of anarchist and radical journals, including The Northeastern Anarchist, Upping the Anti-, Arsenal, and Fifth Estate. He is currently writing a projected book-length history of the Sojourner Truth Organization.

Manfred B. Steger is professor of global studies, director of the Globalism Institute at the Royal Melbourne Institute of Technology, Australia, and a senior research fellow at the Globalization Research Center at the University of Hawai'i-Manoa, USA. His most recent publications include Judging Nonviolence: The Dispute Between Realists and Idealists (2003), Globalization (2003), and Gandhi's Dilemma: Nonviolent Principles and Nationalist Power (2000). He is currently working on a book manuscript titled Ideology in the Global Age: Transforming the National Imaginary.

James Steinberg is an associate professor of sociology at Wright State University, Lake Campus, USA. He regularly teaches courses on China after the founding of the People's Republic of China and the social changes that have ensued since its establishment. He is also interested in the social climate of Tibet and teaches courses in criminology.

Bruce E. Stewart is an assistant professor of history at Appalachian State University, USA. He has contributed articles to the Journal of Southern History, Appalachian Journal, North Carolina Historical Review, and Georgia Historical Quarterly. He is also the editor of King of the Moonshiners: Lewis R. Redmond in Fact and Fiction (2008).

Pamela J. Stewart is a lecturer in the Department of History at Arizona State University, USA. Her research focuses on the significance of working women's participation during the revolutionary 1871 Paris Commune. She also works comparatively, analyzing the role of women and gendered violence during political upheaval, civil war, revolution, warfare in general, and the aftermath of those events. Dr. Stewart publishes on these topics and has received significant teaching awards and research fellowships. Her working book manuscript is titled "Women Made the Revolution": A Social Cartography of the 1871 Paris Commune.

Suzanne Stewart-Steinberg is associate professor of Italian studies and comparative literature at Brown University, USA. Her research focuses on the Italian nineteenth and twentieth centuries, gender and sexuality studies, and the theory and history of psychoanalysis. She is the author of Sublime Surrender: Male Masochism at the Fin-de-Siècle (1998) and The Pimocchio Effect: On Making Italians 1860–1920 (2007).

Robin Stock has studied political science in Berlin, Germany, with a focus on Latin America.

Isabel Ströhle currently works as a researcher on a project on conflict management in the Balkans (funded by the Berghof Foundation for Conflict Studies) at Munich University, Germany. She studied political science, Albanian studies, and East European history at Munich University and holds an MA in Central and Southeast European studies from University College London, UK.

Lars Stubbe is currently a PhD candidate in Kassel (Germany) and Puebla (Mexico) working on the theoretical and political implications of the Zapatista rebellion and the piquetero uprising. He is a nursing professional, translator (of, amongst other works, John Holloway's How to Change the World without Taking Power), and an interpreter.

Masuro Sugai is affiliated with the United Nations University, Japan.

Farooq Sulehria is a journalist. He has worked in various positions at mainstream Lahore-based dailies including Frontier Post, Pakistan, and The Nation. In 2001, Sulehria moved to Sweden and has been working with Weekly Internationalen. He also contributes to Pakistan's leading daily, The News, as an op-ed. He has written and translated half a dozen books, including translations of Tariq Ali's Clash of Fundamentalisms and Bush in Babylon. He is author of the forthcoming A Letter to Osama.

Kenneth R. Sullivan is a filmmaker, journalist, and political historian. He specializes in US history, labor, and race. He is completing a graduate degree at the City University of New York, USA.

Srividhya Swaminathan is an assistant professor of English at Long Island University, Brooklyn Campus, USA. She has published several articles examining the rhetoric of the debates to abolish the slave trade that took place in Great Britain during the late eighteenth century. She has also completed a book-length study of these debates and their contribution to the construction of national identity. Her newest project is an examination of the early arguments for slavery and how they developed in the period before the first abolitionist movement in Britain.

Fadwa Taha is an associate professor of modern, contemporary, and diplomatic history at the University of Khartoum, Sudan. She has held fellowships in the United States, United Kingdom, Italy, and Norway. She is an author of several books and articles. Her research encompasses work in the areas of Sudanese independence, the Condominium period, the Sudanese nationalist movement, and Anglo-Egyptian relations regarding Sudan. She is editor of the Journal of the Faculty of Arts, University of Khartoum.

Junko Takeda is assistant professor in Syracuse University's Department of History, USA. Her book manuscript, State-Building and Civic Identity in Marseille: Navigating France and the Levant in the Age of Mercantilism, 1660–1720, explores the connections and tensions among absolutism, civic fashioning, and international trade from a transnational perspective. Her research and teaching interests include early modern and modern France, eighteenth-century intellectual and cultural history, the history of medicine and disease, and gender and race in the age of the Enlightenment.

Aiko Takeuchi is a PhD candidate in the Department of American Civilization at Brown University, USA. She is currently working on her dissertation research on the transnational birth control movement and eugenics in the context of US–Japan relations from the 1920s to the 1950s.

Horacio Tarcus is a professor and researcher at the University of Buenos Aires, Argentina. In 2003 he received a Guggenheim Fellowship to write The Biographical Dictionary of the Argentine Left: From the Anarchists to the "New Left." He is the author of El marxismo olvidado en la Argentina: Silvio Frondizi y Milcíades Peña (1996), Mariátegui en la Argentina (2002), and Marx en la Argentina: Sus primeros lectores obreros, intelectuales y científicos (2007). He is a founder and director of CeDInCI (Center for Documentation and Research on Leftist Culture), and is currently working on The Biographical Dictionary of the Latin American Left.

Eric Robert Taylor is a freelance television producer in Los Angeles, California, USA. He holds a PhD in history from the University of California, Los Angeles and is the author of If We Must Die: Shipboard Insurrections in the Era of the Atlantic Slave Trade (2006).

Jerome Teelucksingh is a lecturer in the Department of History at the University of the West Indies, Trinidad. He has also served as a part-time lecturer at the Cipriani College of Labor and Cooperative Studies and at the University of Trinidad and Tobago. He was the first recipient of the Eric Williams Memorial Scholarship for post-graduate research. His articles have been published in journals such as Peace Review and Slavery and Abolition.

Aaron Tesfaye is an assistant professor in the Department of Political Science at William Paterson University of New Jersey, USA. He specializes in international political economy, comparative politics of Africa, Latin America, and Asia, comparative public policy, and hydrogeopolitics of international river basins. His recent publications include Political Power and Ethnic Federalism: The Struggle for Democracy in Ethiopia (2002) and The Political Economy of the Nile Waters Regime (forthcoming, 2009).

Stefan Thimmel is a freelance journalist and consultant in developmental politics in Berlin, Germany. He works for many different political magazines in Germany and Latin America that focus on Latin America, social movements, participation, youth policies, and urban development. In Germany, he is coordinating the Scientific Council of Attac–Germany. He is also editor of several books about Latin America and political alternatives. His latest publication, with Ulrich Brand and Bettina Lösch, is ABC der Alternativen (2007).

Yann Tholoniati is currently associate professor at the University of Strasbourg 2 (Marc Bloch), France. He has written a doctoral thesis on Robert Browning (2003) and a number of articles on Robert Burns, Thomas De Quincey, Robert Browning, and Joseph Conrad. He is also the webmaster of several websites for academic bodies and research societies, such as that of the French Society of Victorian and Edwardian Studies (www.sfeve.org).

Vincent Tirelli currently teaches American politics and political theory at Brooklyn College, USA. His doctoral dissertation is titled "The Invisible Faculty Fight Back: Contingent Academic Labor and the Political Economy of the Corporate University." He is a founder of the Coalition of Contingent Academic Labor (COCAL), a trinational association that seeks to address the issues engendered by the growth of contingent academic labor. He is also a former member of the executive council of the Professional Staff Congress, AFT Local 2334.

Todor Todorov is affiliated with Sofia University, St. Kliment Ohridski, Bulgaria.

Inga Töller is studying Latin American studies, sociology, and Japanese studies at the Free University of Berlin, Germany, where she is writing her Master's thesis on "Constructions of Identity in the Work of Kafu Banton (a Panamanian artist).” She lived in Panama for several years, where she did an internship and studied literature at the National University of Panama.

Simon Tormey is professor and head of the School of Social and Political Sciences at the University of Sydney, Australia. His research encompasses the interconnections between continental thought, normative political theory, and radical political practice. He is author of numerous books and articles including Agnes Heller: Socialism, Autonomy and the Postmodern (2001), Anti-Capitalism (2004), and Key Thinkers from Critical Theory to Post-Marxism (2006). He has published articles in journals such as Radical Philosophy, Thesis Eleven, and the Journal of Political Ideologies. He is editor of “Reappraising the Political,” a monograph series, and associate editor of Contemporary Political Theory.

Jorge Torre Santos is a historian and author whose work specializes in labor unions and the working class in Italy.

Iván Torres Apablaza serves as a human rights psychologist for victims of political repression by the military dictatorship. His most recent research is linked to the development of subjectivity in political prisoners from revolutionary organizations arrested under the Chilean democracy and imprisoned in a high-security compound. He also researches issues related to psychoanalysis, political philosophy, and critical theory, especially those linked to new forms of subjectivity development, and devices for domination in post-Fordist society.

Michael F. Toussaint is lecturer in the Department of Humanities and Education at the University of the West Indies, St. Augustine, where he currently teaches West Indian and African Diaspora history. He is the author of several publications on political developments in Trinidad and Tobago and Trinidad–Venezuela relations in the nineteenth century. He has done pioneering research on West Indian migration to South America.

Eric F. Trump is a PhD candidate at New York University’s German Department and a research associate of the Trauma and Violence Interdisciplinary Studies Program, USA. He has served as the associate editor of the Hastings Center Report, a bioethics journal, and has written about science and medicine policy for various journals and magazines. He is currently writing about German expellees and the politics of belonging in postwar Germany.

John Trumbour is research director for the Labor and Worklife Program at Harvard Law School, USA, and author of Selling Hollywood to the World: US and European Struggles for Mastery of the Global Film Industry, 1920–1950 (2002). He served as guest editor for the special issue of the Comparative Labor Law and Policy Journal (Winter 2007) on “The Crisis in Workplace Governance.”

Teruyuki Tsuji is a visiting professor in the Division of Social and Behavioral Sciences at Nova Southeastern University, USA. His research has focused on transnational identity construction and its relations with religious practices in the contexts of the Caribbean and West Indian migrant communities in South Florida. He has published journal articles, presented papers at academic conferences, and contributed essays to various encyclopedias concerning race and ethnicity, immigration, and the Caribbean.

Özlem Tur is affiliated with the Middle East Technical University, Turkey.

Brian Turner is professor of political science at Randolph-Macon College, USA. He is author of Community Politics and Peasant–State Relations in Paraguay (1993) and has written articles on the politics and culture of Paraguay published in Ethnohistory, MACLAS Latin American Essays, and various edited volumes and encyclopedias. He is contributing editor on the politics of Argentina, Uruguay, and Paraguay for the Library of Congress’s Handbook of Latin American Studies. He has served as president of the Middle Atlantic Council of Latin American Studies (MACLAS) and the Virginia Conference of the American Association of University Professors (AAUP).

Christina Turner (d. 2008) was associate professor of anthropology at Virginia Commonwealth University, USA. Her research on Paraguay, published in Ethnohistory, Human Organization, and various edited volumes and encyclopedias, included work on ethnohistory and identity in peasant communities, linguistics, human rights, and textile traditions. Her work on the “Archive of Terror” was cited by UNESCO. She served as managing editor of MACLAS Latin American Essays, as treasurer of the Middle Atlantic Council of Latin American Studies (MACLAS), and as president of the Virginia Conference of the American Association of University Professors (AAUP).

Christoph Twickel is a German journalist and author. He has traveled in Latin America since 1988, working as a freelance correspondent for German newspapers and magazines. In 2006 he published the book Hugo Chávez: Eine Biographie, which is, to date, the best-selling book on Venezuela's Bolivarian Revolution. In 2007, together with Tina Petersen, he published a book-length interview with former Red Army Faction guerrillero Karlheinz Dellwo, Das Projektil sind wir. He also works as a German theatre playwright and has a weekly radio show named "Tropeninstitut" on the web radio station www.byte.fm.

Jan Ullrich is a student of political science at the Free University of Berlin, Germany. He focuses on development studies and social movements in Latin America and has worked on different research projects in Venezuela, Costa Rica, and Nicaragua.

Nicole Ulrich is a PhD fellow based at the Wits Institute of Social and Economic Research, University of the Witwatersrand, South Africa. She has been involved in worker heritage initiatives, such as the Workers' Library and Museum (Johannesburg), and research and teacher training projects at the History Workshop (University of the Witwatersrand). Nicole Ulrich's academic publications focus on South African trade unions during the 1970s and the use of oral history in the classroom. Her PhD concerns transnational influences on popular protest and imaginations of freedom in the eighteenth-century Cape colony.

Molly Pulver Ungar teaches at the University of the Fraser Valley, Canada. Her area of specialization is Quebec, with an interest in cultural and intellectual history. Her doctoral thesis dealt with culture and modernism in Montreal during the 1930s. Her publications include numerous entries in the Dictionary of Canadian Biography. She is presently conducting research on the 1939 Royal Visit to Canada and the US, as well as St. Jean Baptiste Parades in Montreal.

Brian Unger is an independent scholar, writer, and PhD candidate in English and American literature at the Graduate Center of the City University of New York, USA. His special interests are post-World War II American poetry and poetics, and British Romantic poetry, including especially the poet John Clare. He is editor of the literary journal Zen Monster.

Viviana Uriona is currently teaching in the Economic and Social Department of Rostock University, Germany, and is preparing a PhD dissertation. She studied political science, philosophy, and the history of Iberoamerica and Latin America at Cologne University, and political science at the Free University of Berlin. She is a member of the DVPW (German Association of Political Science) and BdWi (Confederation of Democratic Scientists).

Brett M. Van Hoesen is assistant professor of modern and contemporary art history at the University of Nevada, Reno, USA. She is currently preparing a book manuscript on the lingering legacy of Germany's colonial history in the visual culture of the Weimar Republic. Additional areas of research include the arts and human rights, interwar period politics in Europe, Berlin Dada, Weimar-period popular press publications and documentary photography, women in the arts, museum studies, and aspects of contemporary digital culture studies.

Miroslav Vaněk is a director of the Center of Oral History at the Institute of Contemporary History, a president of the Czech Oral History Association, and a senior researcher at the Institute of Contemporary History at the Czech Academy of Science in Prague, Czech Republic. He teaches at the Charles University, Prague in the Philosophical Faculty and the Faculty of Humanities. His scholarly focus is on Czech modern history, mainly the so-called "Normalization" period (1969–89), the young generation under socialism, including student and ecological movements, and the method of oral history.

Ion Bogdan Vasi holds a PhD in sociology from Cornell University, USA. His research interests are in the areas of political sociology and social movements, organizations, and social psychology. In addition to his work on Romanian miners' protests, he has conducted research on the diffusion of various environmental practices and municipal resolutions in the United States, and on the environmental movement's influence on the global development of the wind energy industry.

Nicolas Verschueren is affiliated with the Free University of Brussels, Belgium.

Pavla Vesela teaches at the Department of English and American Studies, Charles University, Prague, Czech Republic. The focus of her work has been modern American and Russian literature (especially utopias and science fiction), as well as literary and feminist theory. Her work can be found in Litteraria Pragensia, NWSA Journal, and most recently, the forthcoming collection Realism's Others. She also contributed to several encyclopedias and co-edited a collection of essays, Feminism in Central and Eastern European Countries (1997).

Brian Vetruba is the German studies librarian at Washington University in St. Louis, USA. His distinctions include being elected as secretary of the Western European Studies Section of the Association of College and Research Libraries (2008), awarded the Ontario Library Association Anniversary Prize (2001), and selected as a Bundestag (German Parliament) Internship Fellow (1991–2).

Paolo Virno is affiliated with the University of Cosenza, Argentina.

Wessel P. Visser is a senior lecturer in the Department of History at the University of Stellenbosch, South Africa. His research interests are South African labor and socialist, communist, and trade union history, on which he has published a number of articles in academic journals. He has also contributed chapters to books on strike comparisons and on African urban spaces. His research project on the history of the South African Mine Workers' Union was published in 2008.

Raphaela von Weichs is an associate member of the Institute of African Studies at the University of Cologne, Germany. She is currently finishing her PhD thesis on political culture, modernity, and the return of kingship to Uganda. Her focus lies in the Kingdom of Bunyoro-Kitara, where she conducted extensive fieldwork. She holds degrees in both anthropology and African area studies.

Uta Wagenmann is affiliated with the University of Bielefeld, Germany.

Matthew H. Wahlert is currently working on his PhD in political science at Miami University, Ohio, USA. He has contributed pieces to several works on security and international relations, including chapters in Homeland Security: Protecting America's Targets (2006) and Countering Terrorism in the 21st Century (forthcoming), as well as a number of entries in encyclopedias of international politics. His research interests include issues of foreign policy, terrorism, and security.

Derek Wall is affiliated with Goldsmiths, University of London, UK.

Ian Wallace is Emeritus Professor of German at the University of Bath, UK. He was previously professor of modern languages at the University of Loughborough, UK and also taught at the Universities of Maine, USA and Dundee, UK. In 1979 he founded German Monitor (previously GDR Monitor). He has been president of the International Feuchtwanger Society since 2001. His published research focuses mainly on GDR literature and the literature of exile.

Torbjörn Wandel is associate professor of history at Truman State University, USA. He has published in the areas of nineteenth-century French cultural history and historical theory. His current work is on the emergence of the historical profession in the late Second Empire and early Third Republic.

Andrew J. Waskey is professor of social science at Dalton State College, USA. He teaches government, philosophy, logic, and world religions. He has authored over 600 scholarly works on anthropology, law, military history, philosophy, politics, poverty, public administration, religion, and science. He is an ordained Presbyterian (PCUSA) minister. After the terrorist attack of September 11, 2001, he taught on Islam and terrorism in churches for the FBI and law enforcement agencies in Georgia, Alabama, and Missouri.

Todd Webb is assistant professor of history at Laurentian University, Canada. He is currently working on a thematic biography of the Upper Canadian politician Robert Baldwin, provisionally entitled Robert Baldwin's World: A Nineteenth-Century Politician in Context. He is also in the process of transforming his doctoral dissertation into a book entitled The Religious Atlantic: British Wesleyanism and the Formation of an Evangelical Culture in Nineteenth-Century Ontario and Quebec.

Homme Wedman teaches at the University of Groningen, the Netherlands, in the Departments of Contemporary History and Journalism. He studied history and Yiddish at the Universities of Groningen and Amsterdam. His MA thesis was on the Yiddish anarchist press around 1900. He has written articles on anarchism, syndicalism, social democracy, and Jewish history. He edited the memoirs of Christiaan Cornelissen and described his archives, discovered in 1992. He is currently writing Cornelissen's biography.

Bill Weinberg is editor of the online journal World War 4 Report and a producer at New York's WBAI radio. He is author of Homage to Chiapas: The New Indigenous Struggles in Mexico (2000). He is currently at work on a book on indigenous movements in the Andean nations.

Karolin Weinzierl is an independent scholar and translator. She holds an MA in political science and has conducted field research on community political participation in Venezuela. She served as a guide and translator for a German trade union youth delegation to Nicaragua and Venezuela. She has also been director of the political education programs on Latin America for the Confederation of German Trade Unions.

Jean Weisman is a higher education official at the City College of New York Center for Worker Education, USA. She has taught courses in labor studies at Rutgers University, Empire State College, City College, and John Jay College. She co-directed (with Belkis Vega) a video about transformations in the lives of former domestic workers in Cuba and writes extensively on Cuban women. Weisman's publications include "The Continuing Revolution" in Cuban Socialism in a New Century: Adversity, Survival and Renewal (2004).

Simon Wendt is assistant professor of history at the University of Heidelberg, Germany. He is the author of The Spirit and the Shotgun: Armed Resistance and the Struggle for Civil Rights (2007).

Niall Whelehan is a PhD candidate at the European University Institute, Italy. His research deals broadly with the phenomena of political violence among revolutionary movements in the nineteenth century and exchanges that occurred across borders and between countries. He has published in the fields of Irish republicanism, colonialism, and anarchism. His dissertation topic deals with European revolutionaries in exile in New York ca. 1870–1900, with specific focus on Irish republicans.

Robert W. White is a professor of sociology and former dean of the School of Liberal Arts at Indiana University–Purdue University, Indianapolis, USA. His research addresses the causes and consequences of small-group political violence, with a special emphasis on conflict in Ireland. He is the author of Provisional Irish Republicans: An Oral and Interpretive History (1993) and Ruairi Ó Brádaigh, The Life and Politics of an Irish Revolutionary (2006), and co-editor of Self, Identity, and Social Movements (with Sheldon Stryker and Timothy J. Owens, 2000).

Anne Whitehead is an independent historian based in Sydney, Australia. She has published Paradise Misland: In Search of the Australian Tribe of Paraguay (1997), winner of the 1998 NSW Premier's Australian History Award, and Bluestocking in Patagonia: Mary Gilmore's Quest for Love and Utopia at the World's End (2003), a finalist for the 2004 national Magarey Biography Prize. Her book in progress on an Australian connection with Napoleon Bonaparte is supported by an Australian Arts Council Fellowship.

Jennifer Whitney is a political organizer and freelance writer from New Orleans, USA. She is a member of the Notes from Nowhere collective, which produced the book We Are Everywhere: The Irresistible Rise of Global Anticapitalism (2003), and spent several years traveling to organize and/or document mass political actions and uprisings in Europe and throughout the Americas. When the levees broke and flooded New Orleans after Hurricane Katrina, she returned home and started the Latino Health Outreach Project, providing mobile health clinics and education for Latino immigrant workers. She is currently working on a book about international and cross-cultural solidarity.

Graham Willett is a senior lecturer in Australian studies at the University of Melbourne, Australia. He is president of the Australian Lesbian and Gay Archives and author of several publications on various aspects of Australian gay and lesbian history and politics, including Living Out Loud (2000). He has a particular interest in the comparative and transnational aspects of Australian sexual politics.

Howell Williams is currently serving as an instructor at an independent high school in Louisville, Kentucky, USA. Her research interests include contemporary social and religious history with a special interest in gender and sexuality. She has taught at Indiana University Southeast and Western Kentucky University.

Kieran Williams is the author of The Prague Spring and its Aftermath (1997) and co-author of Security Intelligence Services in New Democracies (2000) and Embodying Democracy: Electoral System Design in Post-Communist Europe (2002).

Yohuru Williams is associate professor of history at Fairfield University, USA and the vice-president for history education at the American Institute for History Education. Dr. Williams is author of Black Politics/ White Power: Civil Rights, Black Power and Black Panthers in New Haven (Blackwell, 2006) and Teaching beyond the Textbook: Six Investigative Strategies (2008). He also served as general editor for The Souls of Black Folk: Centennial Reflections (2003). He is presently finishing his book entitled Six Degrees of Segregation: Lynching, Capital Punishment and Jim Crow Justice 1865–1930.

Swithin Wilmot is dean of the Faculty of Humanities and Education, and senior lecturer in history at the University of the West Indies, Mona Campus. His main research interests are post-emancipation politics and society in Jamaica. Among his several publications are Plantation Economy, Land Reform and the Peasantry in Historical Perspective: Jamaica 1838–1980 (co-edited with Claus Fullberg-Stolberg, 1992) and Before and After 1865: Education, Politics and Regionalism in the Caribbean (co-edited with Brian Moore, 1999).

Gregory Wilpert is a German American sociologist who holds a PhD from Brandeis University, USA. In 2000 he received a Fulbright Scholar grant to teach and research in Venezuela, where he launched the website Venezuelanalysis.com, which he edits. He has also written a book on the Chávez presidency, Changing Venezuela by Taking Power: The Policies of the Chávez Government (2007).

Inga T. Winkler is a doctoral candidate in public international law at the University of Düsseldorf, Germany. Her doctoral thesis focuses on the human right to water and she has written several articles on different aspects of the topic. Her research is supported by the Heinrich-Böll-Foundation. She was a visiting researcher at the University of Stellenbosch, South Africa and has been involved with work for the UNDP Water Governance Program, the Right to Water Program of the Center on Housing Rights and Evictions, and the German section of Amnesty International.

Yanis Yanoulopoulos taught at Panteion University, Greece until his retirement in 2006. He also worked as a research officer at Birkbeck College, University of London (UCL), UK and as a research fellow at the Department of Byzantine and Modern Greek Studies of King's College, University of London. He previously taught at the University of Crete, Greece.

Anastasia Yianguou is a PhD candidate at the Institute of Commonwealth Studies, School of Advanced Study, University of London, UK. Her research focuses on British rule in Cyprus with special reference to World War II and British decolonization in the Eastern Mediterranean.

Christopher Young is a DAAD graduate scholar and an associate visiting researcher with the Zentrum für transdisziplinäre Geschlechter-studien at Humboldt University, Germany. Young graduated cum laude from Boston College with degrees in German studies and English. During his final year, he was named a Scholar of the College and awarded the McCarthy Prize for thesis of the year for his research on the evolution of self- and societal perceptions of homosexuality in Germany. Young is currently pursuing a Master's degree in gender studies at the Humboldt University.

Darij Zadnikar is a professor of philosophy at the University of Ljubljana, Slovenia, an editor, a publicist, and a political activist. The main topics of his theoretical interest are political philosophy, neo-Marxism, philosophy of education, and the theories of social rebellions. His political activism extends from alter-globalist movements, anti-militarism, and solidarity with Latin American emancipatory movements to other social forms of repudiation of neoliberalism.

Jean-Philippe Zanco presently teaches economics and social sciences in a high school near Orléans, France and researches legal, administrative, and military history of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. He holds degrees in legal history, criminology, and political sciences. Zanco was a researcher at the University of Toulouse, France and received a grant from the French Ministry of Defense for his research on the Ministry of the Navy under the Second Empire.

Michael Zeitler is associate professor of English at Texas Southern University, USA. He has published on both Victorian and African American literature. He is the author of Representations of Culture: Thomas Hardy's Wessex and Victorian Anthropology (2007).

Raul Zibechi is a professor and researcher of social movements at the Franciscan Multiversity of Latin America in Montevideo, Uruguay. He is the author of seven books on movements, the most recent being Autonomías y emancipaciones. América Latina en movimiento (2007). He is an international analyst with the weekly Brecha, and he won the José Martí Award for Journalism in 2003.

Raina Zimmering is the director of the Department of Political and Development Research in the Institute of Sociology at Johannes Kepler University, Austria. She is also a member of the Civil International Commission of Human Rights (CCIODH), with which she has traveled several times to Mexico to observe the situation on human rights and compose reports for the United Nations and European Union. She has taught in Germany, Colombia, Austria, Mexico, Argentina, and the United States.

Cyrus Ernesto Zirakzadeh teaches at the University of Connecticut, USA. He has published extensively on social movements in Europe, Latin America, and North America. He has also published essays on contemporary democratic theory and political thought in literature. His research has appeared in numerous journals, including Polity, Journal of Theoretical Politics, The Review of Politics, and Comparative Studies in Society and History. Zirakzadeh's Social Movements in Politics: A Comparative Perspective received a 1998 Choice Outstanding Academic Book award.

Dima Zito is a social pedagogue and trauma therapist currently completing her PhD in pedagogy at the University of Wuppertal, Germany. Her research focuses on child soldiers living as refugees in Germany. She has worked on several projects in Central America and has also worked at the information office of Nicaragua in Wuppertal.

Alex Zukas is a professor of history at National University, USA. Zukas's areas of specialization are modern European social and environmental history as well as early modern European cartographic history. He has written on unemployment and unemployed protests in twentieth-century Germany, worker stereotypes in nineteenth- and twentieth-century Britain and Germany, the history of European cartography and colonialism since 1450, the history of poverty, revolutionaries, revolutions and revolutionary movements, and teaching history using the Internet.

Lorna Lueker Zukas is associate professor of sociology and director of the Center for Cultural and Ethnic Studies at National University, USA. Her publications focus on human rights, gender in economic development, and gender and information technology in Sub-Saharan Africa. Her first book, Women, War, and Social Change: The Challenge to Independence in Zimbabwe (forthcoming), addresses the tensions between tradition and modernity in the face of colonialism and revolution. Her latest project involves the rise of socialism and the reconfiguration of political landscapes in Sub-Saharan Africa.

Introduction

Immanuel Ness

This encyclopedia encompasses the most comprehensive examination of modern-era revolutions, uprisings, and protest movements. It chronicles the ideas, ideologies, and activists that propelled these movements, tracing their roots, goals, tactics, successes, and failures. While numerous manifestos, analytic perspectives, explanatory works, and compelling larger collections have been assembled previously, this sweeping work elucidates the impressive and path-breaking action of the subjugated, disenfranchised, and ideologically motivated in inciting social change throughout the world, from 1500 to the present era.

This project also examines how different revolutions, uprisings, and protest movements have influenced one another and how they compare politically, economically, socially, and culturally. Accordingly, it introduces readers to the historiography and conceptual debates such manifestations have provoked, suggesting new, critical paths of inquiry into their legacies. This project elevates the study of revolution and protest, comprising a review of actual human behavior and organizational practice, motivated and directed toward expanding historical and social science research on the subject. It seeks to be a definitive account of the actions of human beings that transformed their material and social conditions – actions that frequently transformed the world in the process.

Project Methods

The primary goal of this project was to produce the most definitive exploration of protest and revolution to reflect the state of historical, political, and social science research, providing a reference for what can be called revolutionary studies. To attain historical objectivity and rigor, we assembled an extensive team of scholarly editors from every continent. Accordingly, this project includes an international panel of 60 editorial board members specializing in regional and thematic subfields of revolution and protest, who in turn enlisted hundreds of writers possessing the expertise and thematic specialization to frame sociohistorical conflicts; this involved recruiting scholars from every region of the world, all of whom were motivated by the goals and objectives of the project and subscribed to our effort to achieve a rigorous analysis in every entry in this undertaking.

We assigned contributions through an advisory board, rating each topic to build a general consensus of significance, searching for equivalent quality in each entry, and specifying inclusion of both historical rigor and relevance. Each entry passed through a process of peer review consisting of evaluations by at least two specialists in their respective geographic and thematic fields in addition to the general editor. All essays were meticulously reviewed and appraised for accuracy and compelling approaches. Fewer than half of invited submissions were accepted for publication on the basis of topical significance, original scholarship, and academic rigor, irrespective of ideological proclivity. The board called on contributors to apply historiographic balance and methodological precision in their analysis.

A central feature of this work, the first major project of its kind, is an examination of the interplay of history, modernization, economic conditions, politics, and social development through the lens of revolution, protest, and social movements. To achieve the goals of intellectual inclusiveness and historical significance the contributors to this work represent a broad range of disciplines: history, political science, sociology, area studies, anthropology, political economy, philosophy, the arts, languages, and journalism, among other fields of inquiry.

We endeavored to eliminate western or imperialist bias, commonly inherent in works of this kind, and brought together a global community of scholars, many writing on regions where they live and work, and thereby connecting regional perspectives and expertise to broader socialhistorical realities. We further sought balance and nuance in the approaches by selecting writers with an array of sometimes conflicting analytic perspectives. We searched out experts from specific regions of the world to write about the revolutions and protests, utilizing their distinctive regional and disciplinary contexts. Our intent was to provide a cross-referential frame of analysis, including specialists in the global North covering revolution and protest in the global South, and those in the global South covering the global North.

Significance of this Project

Profound world-historical transformations have reshaped the way contemporary historians map the past, chronologically and thematically. One of the major qualitative leaps in scholarship of the past few decades has been the emergence of world history as a field, in the context of a productive dialogue between disciplines, regions, and continents. Theoretical, methodological, conceptual, and pedagogical concerns have irrigated a rich body of comparative research that is in the process of redrawing the way we look at historical change.

Even as such heuristic devices as nationalism, class formation, ethnicity, gender, and regionalism are reexamined, however, revolutionary movements and counterhegemonic protests are often dismissed as localized, outdated phenomena, or else crises incidental to the forward march of market- and technology-driven modernization and transnational economic integration. Yet revolution and protest have altered human civilization in every region of the world. They have played central roles in the emergence and transformation of polities and societies, in war and peace, in the unfolding of knowledge production and spiritual traditions, and in representations of the past. They constitute a universal passageway of human history, one that has ushered in profound epochal changes, defined eras and civilizations, drawn and redrawn boundaries and galvanized peoples.

Revolutions and protest also shape our historical understanding of power and progress, law and justice, freedom and emancipation. Many of humanity's greatest ideas, such as democracy, equality, civil rights, cooperation, peace, and ecology, have been forged in the crucible of revolution and protest. It is impossible to understand the development of philosophy, economics, government, labor, social relations, and ecology without understanding the role that revolutions and protest have played in shaping them.

Not all protests and revolutions have proven beneficent; however, most of the progressive social change achieved over the past 500 years was brought about less by the benevolence of rulers than by the direct result of protest by the ruled. Were this not the case, then the world of throne and altar of the sixteenth century would likely still be in power. Human action, outside the sphere of the state, has always been a principal vehicle of social transformation.

The ideas and practices of revolution and protest are almost always viewed by social scientists and historians as extraordinary, unusual, and frequently shocking events that interrupt the familiar institutional social regulation of human everyday life. But the contributions in this work definitively, and sometimes counterintuitively, demonstrate that among the more surprising elements of revolution and protest is the regularity of volatile and explosive conflicts commonly revealed during waves of protest. We thus examine a past that has a sustained, if staccato, record and a broadly foreseeable trajectory highly contingent on the unfolding of events rooted in social conflict and resistance. This work brings together contributors who, in the aggregate, demonstrate the fact that revolution and protest are not just important moments in history but concurrently are integral to an accurate and comprehensive understanding of modern history and social science.

Defining Revolution and Social Protest

Revolution and social protest destabilize and overturn predictable everyday patterns of social behavior and traditional practices that the powerful expect to continue in perpetuity to advance their entrenched socioeconomic interests. While revolutions and social protest are the dynamic forces churning and tearing the fabric of modern history, neither has an obvious and apparent definition that is universally accepted. There are many definitions of revolution, and each revolution attempts to define itself in the heat of conflict.

The justification and necessity for revolution and social protest are embedded in specific political ideology and normative values of justice. Since the sixteenth century, with antecedents rooted in the earliest recorded history, the ethical basis for popular protest and resistance against authority is located in the articulated human struggle for justice, equality, and individual rights.

The ideology of protest extends across the spectrum from the political right to the left. During the bourgeois revolutions of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, liberal ideals were espoused to defend the private property rights of the bourgeoisie and then expanded to encompass the wider objective of extending popular collective ownership over all property, thereby fostering greater and genuinely universal equality. As capitalism grew more rapacious in the nineteenth century, socialists launched a critique of the grave consequences of private ownership that dispossessed popular majorities of their capability to survive with dignity. The condemnation of capitalism by a range of opponents, from anarchists, liberals, and socialists, to communists of all ideological proclivities, justified efforts to achieve a broader objective of establishing a more egalitarian and just society through revolution and popular protest. The emancipatory ideals of socialism were immediately and forcefully challenged by an expansive counterattack from capitalists who sought to resist efforts to create redistributive justice. Resistance to socialism typically was grounded in the individual right to own private property as a universal ideal without accounting for those denied and dispossessed of property or those deprived of the ability to survive, harnessed to unbridled capitalism.

This work also examines protests that follow the installation of governments based on unrealized lofty principles that appeared in the twentieth century. In many cases, protests are a consequence of the inherent lack of democracy within so-called egalitarian systems that have become bureaucratic, corrupt dictatorships, engaged in severe repression against opponents who not only question the systems but also potentially challenge the leaders, as in Stalin's Soviet Union and post-revolutionary Communist China.

Certainly, popular protest for justice extends well beyond the revolutionary challenges to achieve social equality. This project documents the array of movements to achieve rights and equality for those oppressed on the basis of their original or ascribed identity, including race, gender, religion, ethnic and national status, sexuality, and political beliefs.

The contributions in this work also examine the practical actions of resistance. Revolutionary and protest movements materialize and are expressed through peaceful and violent means. Among the peaceful forms of civil disobedience in the host of entries are: hunger strikes, establishing alternative communities and lifestyles, leafleting, mass meetings, marches and parades, demonstrations, boycotts, slowdowns, strikes, sit-ins and occupations, displaying flags, banners, distinctive objects, and attire that reveal opposition to oppressive norms, music that mobilizes popular forces to act, conscientious literature, philosophy, and art that is critical of power structures.

Indeed historically, popular recourse to force is typically only used after all forms of non-violent means have been exhausted, or in reaction to the use of force by those in power. In some cases force and violence erupt without organizational support through popular uprisings, often referred to as riots. Specific forms of violent resistance included in this work are popular rebellions, insurrections, revolts, guerilla warfare, armed struggle, liberation armies, and more centralized military coups and interventions.

Organization of this Work

Organized in an alphabetic A–Z format, this project draws together histories and themes of revolution and protest in a broad historical and geographic frame. To guide readers, this work includes a lexicon that draws together the histories and themes that are organized alphabetically throughout this encyclopedia.

Concurrently, each entry includes cross-references to the countries, regions, people, and themes with which these contributions entwine. As such, cross-referencing serves as a seamless guide to reading the alphabetic historical and thematic entries. We decided on an alphabetic presentation as the most comprehensive means of organization, given the overlapping nature of many of the entries. The references to related books and readings serve as a guide to exploring in greater depth the histories and interpretations of events, subjects, and themes. Thus readers will gain access to a detailed historical analysis and to the most significant literature of the field, which in some cases, on certain subjects, particularly in the global South, are documented scarcely, if at all.

Geographic Organization

Geographically, this work encompasses every populated continent from the sixteenth century to the present. The objective is to comprise and characterize the major social and political struggles in the modern era. In this context the criteria for selection have been influence and qualitative significance in the unfolding of history. Thus, the coverage of protest and revolution is representative rather than exhaustive, and absorbs those forces that are most influential, especially transcendent events, movements, and personalities. This project includes every inhabited continent and region of the world: North Africa, Central Africa, Southern Africa, North America, the Caribbean, Latin America, Eastern and Western Europe, Southwest Asia, South Asia, Central Asia, the Far East, Southeast Asia, and Oceania. As many social struggles are interconnected from the 1970s to the early twenty-first century, the project covers important global justice movements.

We sought to be geographically inclusive and endeavored to ensure representation of the most significant protests and movements. We have also sought to reveal the global character of revolution that spans every region of the world. In this context, we have underscored those popular movements specific to regions during particular eras. Thus, nationalist movements for independence range from the American Revolution to the early twenty-first-century struggles for independence in the global South. The independence movements selected for inclusion are based on representation and importance. We draw attention to independence movements where colonialism and imperialism in the last 500 years were most extensive and lasting, for example Africa, Asia, and Eastern Europe. In evaluating anti-colonialism, we also asked contributors to consider those movements which advanced multiple ideas of popular liberation beyond simple independence: including racial equality, indigenous struggles, peasant movements, labor and working class, women's rights, student movements, and the religious, ethnic, and ideological thrusts that propelled them forward.

Temporal Organization

The International Encyclopedia of Revolution and Protest: 1500 to the Present examines world history from the sixteenth to the early twenty-first centuries. The only thing that is true of all protests and revolutions is that they have no universal blueprint but are highly contingent on the peculiarities of specific historical eras and geographic areas. The entries demonstrate that while specific protests are almost always uneven and sporadic on a global scale, revolution and protest have persistent and unremitting roots that are never a consequence of a single original historic episode, but spring from multifarious events and social forces, revealing themselves as intensely and historically ingrained arcs of revolt. The timeline provides comprehensive documentation of the central historical events over the past five centuries and serves as a helpful contextualizing tool for readers.

These arcs of historical protest are considered both thematically and regionally. We examine the sixteenth-century struggles of peasants and indigenous peoples, fighting against racial, religious, and monarchic oppression, and explore how these uprisings and revolts continue and also evolve over the centuries into globally and socially diverse expressions of anti-authoritarianism, democracy, liberalism, and anti-imperialism. In surveying the history of revolution and protest beyond its traditional regional and temporal boundaries, we are able to investigate the intricate connections that link these movements across time and space. The nineteenth century, for example, marks the rise and expansion of ideological social struggles for material justice across the globe, including the socialist, anarchist, and communist movements, movements which continue to develop in philosophy and momentum to this day. With the emergence of the global justice movement in the late twentieth century, protest and revolution have redefined themselves as powerful tools of the global collective, extending beyond territorial borders to petition for human rights and social justice for all, regardless of ethnicity, gender, religion, or social class.

Through a temporal examination of the modern era from 1500 to the present, revolutions and protest movements seldom have a discernible specific origin or a sudden ending, and in fact frequently spill over on a regional and global scale. The origins of revolutions are nuanced and complicated, as are the other stages of social revolution which defy one-dimensional explanation, historical turning points and watershed moments notwithstanding. Virtually all revolutions in the last 500 years have enduring consequences that, in evolving form, have remained moral forces to this day. Accordingly, we have provided multiple scholarly explanations and ideological perspectives to explain the phenomenon.

Thematic Organization

The thematic coverage includes environment and ecology, gender and sexuality, religion, utopianism, non-violent protest, labor, peace and anti-war, indigenous, student and youth, abolitionism and civil rights, the philosophy and theory of protest and revolution, anarchism, socialism, communism, liberalism, democracy, nationalism and anti-imperialism, peasant and agrarian, anti-fascism, anti-taxation, urban uprisings, human rights, global justice, and beyond.

In addition to the thematic essays, we included biographies of leading artistic and cultural figures on the basis of their intersection with popular protests and revolutions. Assessments for inclusion were not based on artistic innovation but the degree to which the genre or artist was a force in specific protests and revolutionary movements. As such, this project includes numerous biographies of influential social actors and theorists who helped shape the theory and practice of revolution and protest.

Conclusion

The academic rigor and editorial expertise that have shaped this project have resulted in a truly definitive and comprehensive work. The encyclopedia is the product of a community of diverse scholars, whose compelling ideas about and analysis of human behavior were motivated by a need to expand historical and social science research on the subject beyond its traditional boundaries, exploring the interplay of history, politics, economics, and social development through the lens of revolution and protest. As the general editor of this project, I am confident that this work adds clarity and nuance to the massive and disparate corpus of research and scholarship on the subject of revolution and protest.

The “End of History” was proclaimed by many following the collapse of the Soviet Union beginning in 1989. This laid the foundation for what could become a disparagement of revolution and protest. It was believed that a new age had dawned in which popular uprisings would no longer challenge either existing power structures or the global dominance of free markets or liberal “bourgeois” democracy. But improbably, this entire discourse sidestepped the major questions of the past 200 years: whether “another world was possible” that could alleviate the grinding misery that remains pervasive throughout the world. It has become apparent that a new global movement dedicated to social justice and human rights has sprung from the ashes of the sociopolitical and cultural experiments of the twentieth century. This work, we hope, will serve as a contribution to that struggle.

Acknowledgments

It has been my great pleasure to work with an international team of editors and scholars during the course of this book, and it gives me even greater pleasure now to thank all of them for their enormous efforts. Many people have contributed in countless ways to make The International Encyclopedia of Revolution and Protest the most comprehensive and definitive work on the subject. To turn the objective into reality required conscientiousness, attention to detail, and sustained drive from numerous people with specific academic and editing expertise. Ultimately, the success of this project depended on the skill, intellect, and determination of editors and scholars from throughout the world who contributed at various stages of the project.

First and foremost, Deirdre Ilkson, project manager for this encyclopedia and development editor at Wiley-Blackwell, recognized the importance of the work from the start and oversaw every detail, down to the very last stages of preparing the book for the printer. Deirdre's contribution, carried out with cheerful confidence, intelligence, and dedication, extends to every facet of the project, and infuses the entire work. She was responsible for day-to-day management and the broader long-term demands of the project. Deirdre synchronized all aspects, from formulating a plan to complete this work to coordinating contributions, authors, correspondence, copyediting, illustrations, and production, as well as assembling the myriad pieces of the front matter.

I especially thank Peter Coveney, executive editor for history at Wiley-Blackwell, who decisively visualized this project in formation and orchestrated a comprehensive plan for completing perhaps the most important scholarly work of its kind.

From the beginning, this expansive encyclopedia sought to ensure comprehensive coverage of the significant histories and themes of revolution and protest. I am beholden to the two boards of editors, comprising a team of 60 authorities with special expertise in the range of disciplines comprising this work. The editorial boards identified the entries within each subject area of specialization, identified authors, and peer-reviewed manuscripts on the basis of their areas of specialization.

The contribution of members of the board of editors and board of associate and advisory editors was both considerable and unique, and extends beyond academic scholarship to a dedication and enthusiasm for the subject of revolution and popular movements. Board members devoted an enormous amount of their time and intellectual energy over the past three years to this effort.

To bring this ambitious project to fruition required relentless intellectual rigor that also challenged the stamina of the editors. I am grateful to all the editors and advisors whose contributions were essential to the success of this project. Every editor served a crucial role, both in their scholarship and in their endurance in transforming the idea of a major work on revolution and protest into the reality of a comprehensive eight-volume encyclopedia. Among those editors, several have been mainstays who kept us on track to completion.

From the outset Beverly Tomek recognized the scale of this project and kept her promise to help shepherd it to completion. I was lucky to have Beverly's keen editing assistance and availed myself of her academic rigor, attention to detail, and specialized knowledge of historical social movements. Dario Azzellini contributed equally his abundant scholarship, knowledge of social movements, self-assurance, and determination, and remarkable skills at identifying and persuading authors to contribute to this work.

From the inception of this project Paul Le Blanc was always there to offer wise advice in guiding this project to completion, and consistently contributed his deep and expansive historical knowledge of revolutionary movements and social protest. From the beginning, Pierre Rousset maintained his strong commitment to the project and its goals, applying both his editorial skills, global contacts, and unceasing dedication to humanity to this work. This project also benefited enormously from Cliff Conner's contribution as section editor for Britain and France and his valuable advice on details, large and small. Soma Marik's scholarship, commitment to the project, and dedication remained strong from beginning to end. Jesse Cohn's contribution to this work as section editor for anarchism reached far beyond what was expected.

A team of editors and major contributors deserve credit and distinction for their substantial editing, contributions, and dedication to meticulous scholarship: Marcelline Block, Verity Burgmann, Dimitrios K. Dalakoglou, Chris Ealham, Megan Greene, Rowena Griem, Herbert Docena, Mike Gonzalez, Daniel Hémerly, Jason Kelly, Max Lane, Amy Linch, Michael Löwy, Ayokunle Omobowale, Diogo Pinheiro, Sean Scalmer, Guillermina Seri, Matthew J. Smith, Ben Trott, Antonios Vradis, and Lucien van der Walt, among many others who uniquely contributed to bring this important work to fruition. Steve Bronner, Bill Fletcher, Steve Leberstein, and Frances Piven provided crucial advice and assistance through decisive phases of this project.

The project benefited from many editorial assistants, but in particular, congratulations must go to the students of the City University of New York and Brooklyn College who shared a commitment to scholarship, and excellence, and provided tangible support for this project. I would like to thank all the editorial assistants serving on this project, notably Heather Squire for bringing to it her scholarship and sense of intellectual honesty. I also thank graduate students Terri Bennett, Stacy Warner Maddern, and Leonard Lubitz for their important contributions. I thank the Graduate Center for Worker Education for its crucial support and assistance. Special thanks also go to the contribution of Ernest Amador, Amy Hatmaker, and Summer Leibensperger.

The dedicated professionals at Wiley-Blackwell were crucial to this project's successful completion and success. Liz Cremona was responsible for managing and coordinating the production of the book, text design, and typesetters; Brigitte Lee Messenger coordinated the copyediting and proofreading process. The encyclopedia greatly benefited from copyeditors Jack Messenger and Sarah Pearsall and proofreaders Helen Kemp, Pandora Kerr-Frost, Marie Lorimer, Caroline Morris, and Clare Zon. In addition, I thank Zeb Korycinska, the indexer, and Leanda Shrimpton and Helen Nash, the picture researchers. Thanks also to Jenny Howell, divisional marketing manager, Katherine Ward, associate product manager, and Matt Bennett, associate director of marketing, who were responsible for promoting this project. Both Julia Kirk and Emily Howard were responsible for liaising with contributors, and Igor Novakovic, product development manager, coordinated building the website for the online edition. I was fortunate to have Sam Stoloff of the Frances Goldin Literary Agency, who recognized the importance of this project and provided sage advice.

All too often, historical and political works gloss over the essential part popular movements play in making and remaking history. The historians and social scientists who have contributed to The International Encyclopedia of Revolution and Protest accomplished the goals we set out to collectively achieve in substantially advancing scholarship on the significance of social movements in shaping the modern world.

Immanuel Ness

Chronology of Significant Events in Revolution and Protest

1444–95	Portuguese charting and colonization, Cape Verde
1466–1536	Erasmus of Rotterdam
1469–1527	Macchiavelli, Niccolò
1478–1535	More, Thomas
1483–1546	Luther, Martin
1484–1531	Zwingli, Huldrych; leader (with Luther) of Protestant Reformation
1491–1556	Ignatius of Loyola
1492	Columbus discovers West Indies
1509–67	Calvin, John
1510	first slaves into Caribbean
1513	Ponce de León establishes St. Augustine (first colony in America)
1513	Balboa discovers Pacific
1513	Macchiavelli's The Prince
1514	Copernicus' heliocentric theory
1516	Ottomans conquer Syria and Egypt
1516	Comunero movement (Comuneros' Revolt); first and last major uprising against the Hapsburgs in kingdom of Castile
1517	Ottomans conquer Mecca and Medina
1517	Luther's 95 Theses begins Reformation
1519–21	Aztec capital Teotihuacán captured by Cortes; Aztec empire conquered
1520–2	Magellan (d. 1521) completes first circumnavigation of the earth
1520–66	Suleyman "The Magnificent"
1521	Suleyman captures Belgrade
1525	German Peasant Rebellion
1525	Anabaptist movement begins, Switzerland
1527	second sack of Rome
1532	Pizarro captures Atahualpa, defeating Incas
1534	Henry VIII establishes Church of England
1534	Cartier charts Gulf of St. Lawrence River
1536–9	dissolution of English monasteries
1540	Ignatius Loyola forms Jesuits
1541	Coronado reaches Kansas
1545–63	Council of Trent starts Counterreformation
1550s	peak of Ottoman invasion of Europe
1553	Negro Miguel rebellion (Venezuela); first revolt by Africans enslaved by Spain
1553–8	Mary Tudor restores Catholicism
1554	British slave trade begins with four slaves brought back to England
1555	Mary begins persecuting Protestants
1558–1603	Elizabeth I of England, daughter of Henry VIII (Protestant)
1560	Puritans (English Calvinists)
1562–98	Wars of Religion (France)
1565	St. Augustine is the first permanent settlement in North America
1568–1648	Dutch Revolt

1571–2	Túpac Amaru and Incas rebel against the Spanish (Peru)
1572	St. Bartholomew's Day massacre, France (August–October); Catholics kill Protestants
1577–80	Drake circles globe
1581	Cossacks retake Russia from Mongols
1583–1649	Arundel, Lady Blanche
1587	Mary Queen of Scots executed
1588	Spanish Armada defeated by England
1588–1679	Hobbes, Thomas
1596–1650	Descartes, René
1598	Edict of Nantes (tolerance for Protestants) ends Wars of Religion
1599–1658	Cromwell, Oliver
1602–3	Palmares slave revolts (Brazil)
1603–1868	Edo (or Tokugawa) period, Japan
1605	radical Catholic Guy Fawkes fails in plan to blow up parliament in Gunpowder Plot
1606–7	Bolotnikov's Rebellion, first of four peasant rebellions in Russia
1607	Jamestown is first permanent British colony in North America
1618	revolt in Bohemia begins Thirty Years' War
1619	first North American slaves at Jamestown
1620	Mayflower and Pilgrims arrive in North America
1624	Dutch settle New Amsterdam (US)
1625	Huguenot revolt, France
1628	first slaves in New York City
1629	Christians expelled or executed in Japan
1629	dissolution of parliament, Britain
1632–77	Spinoza, Baruch
1637–9	Shimabara Rebellion, Japan; Catholic Christian samurai and peasants rebel
1638–1715	Louis XIV of France
1638–51	British civil wars
1648–53	The Fronde revolts, France
1649	Charles I executed
1649–60	Reign of Oliver Cromwell (and son Richard for the last two years)
1651	Leviathan by Thomas Hobbes
1653	Swiss Peasants' War
1664/1665	English seize New Amsterdam and New Jersey from Dutch
1670–1	Razin's Rebellion, Russia
1675	Bacon's Rebellion (US)
1675	King Philip's War (Metacomet)
1682–1725	Peter the Great of Russia
1682	La Salle claims all land drained by Mississippi River for France
1683	Turks defeated at Battle of Vienna
1684/1686	Leibnitz differential and integral calculus
1687	Newton's Principia Mathematica
1687	Newton's The Calculus
1687	Yamassee Indian revolt in Florida
1688	James II flees to France
1688	English or "Glorious" Revolution
1690	Two Treatises on Government by Locke
1692	Glencoe massacre
1694–1778	Voltaire; foremost proponent of Enlightenment
?–ca. 1741	Queen Nanny; leader of Windward Maroons (Jamaica)
1703–91	Wesley, John
1707	Union of Scotland and England
1707–8	Bulavin's Rebellion, Russia

1712–78	Rousseau, Jean-Jacques
1712	New York slave revolt
1713–84	Diderot, Denis
ca. 1730–80	historical period of Enlightenment
1730–1840	Industrial Revolution; begins in England
1737–1809	Paine, Thomas
1739	Stono Rebellion (South Carolina)
1741	slave revolt, New York City
1743–93	Marat, Jean-Paul
1743–94	Condorcet, Marquis de
1743–1803	Louverture, Toussaint; leader of Haitian Revolution
1745–97	Equiano, Olaudah
1751–77	publication of French Encyclopédie , edited by Diderot and d’Alembert
1754	Some Considerations on the Keeping of Negroes by John Woolman (US)
1754–63	French and Indian War in North America
1755	Great Lisbon Earthquake kills thousands
1755	Discourse on the Origin and Bases of Inequality among Men by Rousseau
1756–63	Seven Years’ War in Europe; Britain, Prussia vs. France, Austria, Russia
1756–1836	Godwin, William
1758–94	Robespierre, Maximilien de
1758–1806	Dessalines, Jean-Jacques
1759–94	Danton, Georges Jacques
1759–97	Wollstonecraft, Mary
1759–1833	Wilberforce, William
1759	Candide by Voltaire
1760–97	Babeuf, François-Noël
1760–1825	Saint-Simon, Comte de
1761–1837	Buonarroti, Philippe
1762	The Social Contract by Rousseau
1763–98	Tone, Theobald Wolfe
1763–1835	Cobbett, William
1769–1821	Bonaparte, Napoleon
1770–1831	Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich
1770	Boston Massacre
1771–1858	Owen, Robert
1772–1837	Fourier, Charles François Marie
1773	Boston Tea Party
1773–5	Pugachev’s Rebellion, Russia
1774	Shakers arrive in US from England
1775–1847	O’Connell, Daniel; Catholic lawyer, emancipation activist
1776	US Declaration of Independence
1776	one-fifth of the US population are slaves
1776	The Wealth of Nations by Adam Smith
1776–83	American Revolution
1778	first Catholic Relief Act (UK)
1780–1	Indian revolt led by Túpac Amaru II in Upper Peru
1781	British surrender at Yorktown
1781–8	Confessions by Rousseau
1783	Treaty of Paris ends American Revolution
1783–1830	Bolívar, Simón
1785–1830	Walker, David
1786–7	Shays’ rebellion (Massachusetts, US)
1787	Committee for the Abolition of the Slave Trade (UK)

- ca. 1787–1828 Shaka Zulu, Southern Africa
- 1788 Australia first settled by British as penal colony
- 1789 storming of the Bastille (July 14)
- 1789 Publication of The Interesting Narrative of the Life of Olaudah Equiano creates sensation in London and contributes to abolishing British slave trade
- 1789–94 French Revolution
- 1789–97 George Washington first US president
- 1790 Reflections on the Revolution in France by Edmund Burke
- 1791 US Bill of Rights ratified
- 1791 Rights of Man by Thomas Paine
- 1791–1804 Haitian Revolution; slave revolt leads to independence
- 1792 Publication of Wollstonecraft's A Vindication of the Rights of Woman; foundation of modern feminism
- 1793–1880 Mott, Lucretia Coffin; Quaker minister, abolitionist, social reformer, proponent of women's rights
- 1793–1883 Sojourner Truth (Isabella Baumfree); abolitionist
- 1794 Whiskey Rebellion (US)
- 1795 execution of Louis XVI, France
- 1795–1856 Sáenz, Manuela; Central American independence leader
- 1796–1855 O'Connor, Feargus
- 1797–1857 Comte, Auguste
- 1797 Spithead and Nore mutinies (Britain); protesting working conditions
- 1798 Great Rebellion, Ireland
- 1799–1815 Napoleonic Wars
- 1801–9 Thomas Jefferson US president
- 1801–25 reign of Alexander I, Russia
- 1802–85 Hugo, Victor
- 1802–87 Dix, Dorothea (US); reformer on behalf of prisoners, the indigent, and mentally ill
- 1803 Louisiana Purchase
- 1805 Harmony Society, utopian group, founded in Pennsylvania (US)
- 1805–79 Garrison, William Lloyd; American abolitionist
- 1806–72 Juárez, Benito; president of Mexico (1858–71)
- 1807 Britain and America abolish slave trade
- 1810 Creoles establish ruling juntas in Caracas, Santiago, Buenos Aires
- 1810 Mexico begins war of independence from Spain
- 1811 Venezuela and Paraguay declare independence from Spain
- 1812 Napoleon invades Russia
- 1812–14 War of 1812
- 1814 Napoleon abdicates
- 1814–76 Bakunin, Mikhail Alexandrovich
- 1815–1902 Stanton, Elizabeth Cady; US feminist
- 1815 Jackson defeats British at Battle of New Orleans
- 1815 Napoleon's 100 days and Battle of Waterloo
- 1816 Argentina declares independence
- 1818–83 Marx, Karl
- 1818–95 Douglass, Frederick
- 1818 Chile declares independence
- 1819 Peterloo massacre, Manchester (England)
- 1819 Colombian and Venezuelan independence
- 1820–95 Engels, Friedrich; with collaborator Karl Marx articulated theory of communism in the Communist Manifesto (1848)
- 1820–1906 Anthony, Susan B.
- 1820 Glasgow general strike (Scotland)

1821	Mexican independence
1821–9	Greek War of Independence vs. Turks
1822	King Pedro declares Brazil independent from Portugal
1822	Vesey's rebellion; Denmark Vesey organizes perhaps largest slave conspiracy in North American history, in Charleston, South Carolina
1823	Monroe Doctrine warns Europe against the recolonization of the newly independent Spanish American republics
1823	Wilberforce forms British Anti-Slavery Society
1824	Peasant Revolt, Egypt
1825	Bolivia declares independence
1829	An Appeal to the Colored Citizens of the World by David Walker (US)
1830	July Revolution, France; overthrow of Charles X
1830	Swing riots (England)
1830	November Uprising, Poland
1830–1	Cholera riots, Russia
1830–1905	Michel, Louise; Paris Commune
1831	Nat Turner's rebellion (Virginia, US)
1831–90	Sitting Bull, American Indian leader
1832	Reform Acts, Britain and Ireland
1832	Treaty of Constantinople secures Greece's independence from Ottomans
1833	Slavery Abolition Act is passed in British parliament
1833	William Lloyd Garrison, editor of abolitionist newspaper, The Liberator , helps form American Anti-Slavery Society
1836	Texas declares independence from Mexico; begins war; Santa Anna defeated by Texans
1837–8	Canada Rebellion
1837–78	Most intense period of the Yoruba Wars, Nigeria
1837–1930	Mother Jones (Mary Harris); Socialist Party and union activist (US)
1838	Underground railroad aids flight of slaves to the North (US)
1838–1927	Woodhull, Victoria
1839	Newport rising (Wales); unsuccessful Chartist revolt
1839	Amistad incident
1839	British capture the port of Aden (Yemen); rule as part of British India until 1937
1840–1902	Zola, Emile
1840	first World Anti-Slavery Society meeting, London
1840	Britain annexes New Zealand
1841	Brook Farm founded in Massachusetts (US)
1842–1921	Kropotkin, Peter
1844	Morse's telegraph used for first time
1845	The Condition of the Working Class in England by Friedrich Engels
1845	A Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass, an American Slave
1845–50	Irish potato famine – estimated 1 million die
1846–8	US war with Mexico
1846–91	Parnell, Charles Stewart
1847–8	Maya Indians rebel against plantation owners in Yucatán, Mexico (the Caste War)
1848	Communist Manifesto by Marx and Engels
1848	June Days rebellion, Paris
1848	European revolutions (France, Italy, Prussia, Austria, Hungary) over working-class reforms
1848	Seneca Falls Convention (NY, US)
1848–79	Oneida Community (US)
1849–77	Crazy Horse, American Indian leader
1849	Russia helps Austria defeat Hungarian Revolt
1851	Ain't I a Woman? speech by Sojourner Truth at the Ohio Women's Rights Convention

1851–64	Taiping Rebellion, Qing dynasty, China
1852	Irrawaddy delta region of Burma (Myanmar) annexed by Britain
1854	Treaty of Kanagawa; opening of Japan to West
1854–6	Crimean War; Britain defeats Russia
1855–1926	Debs, Eugene
1855	Santal rebellion (India)
1855	My Bondage and My Freedom by Frederick Douglass
1856–1918	Plekhanov, Georgi
1857	Sepoy Revolt, India
1858–1928	Pankhurst, Emmeline
1858–1943	Webb, Beatrice
1858	Irish Republican Brotherhood founded in Ireland by James Stephens; as Fenian Brotherhood in US by John O'Mahony
1859–1914	Jaurès, Jean
1859–1947	Webb, Sidney; social reformer
1859	abolitionist John Brown raids Harper's Ferry, is tried and executed
1859	oil discovered in Pennsylvania
1859	On Liberty by John Stuart Mill
1859	On the Origin of Species by Charles Darwin
1860–1904	Herzl, Theodore; founder of Zionism
1860–1935	Addams, Jane
1861	Emancipation Edict in Russia frees serfs
1861–5	American Civil War
1861–5	Abraham Lincoln US president
1862–1931	Wells, Ida B.; anti-lynching reformer
1862	Les Misérables by Victor Hugo
1863	US Emancipation Proclamation frees slaves
1863	Draft Riots, US
1864–76	First International
1865	assassination of Lincoln
1865–9	Ku Klux Klan is organized (US)
1866–1925	Sun Yat-Sen
1867	US purchases Alaska
1867–94	Das Kapital by Karl Marx (3 vols.)
1868–78	Independence movements in Cuba and Puerto Rico lead to the 'Ten Years' War in Cuba
1868–1963	Du Bois, W. E. B.
1869–1940	Goldman, Emma; anarchist and labor organizer
1869–1948	Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand
1870–1919	Luxemburg, Rosa
1870–1924	Lenin, Vladimir Ilyich
1870–1936	Berkman, Alexander
1870	Tianjin Massacre, China; largest single anti-western protest prior to Boxer Uprising
1870	Franco-Prussian War
1871–1915	Chilembwe, John; key figure in early resistance in Nyasaland (now Malawi); revered protest figure in Southern Africa
1871	Paris Commune
1872–1940	Abdurahman, Abdullah; popular South African political leader
1872–1970	Russell, Bertrand
1873–80	Dutch war on Aceh; Indonesia (Batavia)
1874–1965	Churchill, Winston S.
1876–1916	London, Jack; author of tales of romance and adventure, and of The Iron Heel (1908)
1876–1948	Jinnah, Muhammad Ali; founder of Pakistan

- 1876–1956 Ishikawa Sanshirō; Japanese anarchist
- 1876 Alexander Graham Bell, telephone
- 1876 Battle of Little Bighorn (US); Sitting Bull and Crazy Horse defeat Custer
- 1877 Great Railroad Strike (US)
- ca. 1878–1923 Villa, Pancho
- 1878–1968 Sinclair, Upton
- 1878–9 Kanak uprising against French colonialism, New Caledonia
- 1879–1916 Pearse, Patrick; a leader of Easter Rising, Dublin; convicted of treason and executed
- 1879–1919 Zapata, Emiliano
- 1879–1940 Trotsky, Leon
- 1879–1942 Chen Duxiu; one of the founders of Chinese Communist Party and earliest leader
- 1879–1953 Stalin, Joseph
- 1879–1966 Sanger, Margaret; socialist and advocate for women’s right to birth control
- 1880s–1890s Hawaiian rebellion against US occupation and annexation
- 1880s–1920s Jadid movement; Islamic reformists (Central Asia)
- 1881–1938 Atatürk, Mustafa Kemal; Turkish leader
- 1882–1975 De Valera, Eamon; leader in Irish political life from 1916 to 1959
- 1882 Britain occupies Egypt
- 1883–99 Mahdist revolution in the Sudan
- 1884 Cooperative Commonwealth by Lawrence Gronlund
- 1885–1967 Muste, A. J.; socialist, activist, pacifist involved in labor movement and US civil rights movement
- 1885–1971 Lukács, Georg
- 1885–1977 Paul, Alice
- 1885 British General Gordon killed by followers of the Mahdi at Khartoum in the Sudan
- 1886–1934 Hatta Shūzō; Japanese anarchist
- 1886–1944 Bloch, Marc
- 1886–1973 Ben-Gurion, David; first prime minister of Israel
- 1886 Haymarket riot, Chicago (US)
- 1886 Formation of American Federation of Labor (AFL)
- 1887–1920 Reed, John
- 1887–1940 Garvey, Marcus
- 1887 Bloody Sunday demonstration (London)
- 1888–1938 Bukharin, Nikolai Ivanovich
- 1888 Looking Backward by Edward Bellamy
- 1888 Abolition of slavery in Brazil
- 1889–1964 Nehru, Jawaharlal; first prime minister of India
- 1889 Brazil becomes a republic
- 1890–1922 Collins, Michael; Irish republican military and political leader
- 1890–1964 Flynn, Elizabeth Gurley
- 1890–1969 Hô Chi Minh (Nguyen Tat Thanh)
- 1890 Massacre at Wounded Knee (US)
- 1891–1937 Gramsci, Antonio
- 1892–1940 Benjamin, Walter
- 1892–1980 Tito, Josip Broz
- 1892 Homestead strike (Pennsylvania)
- 1893–1964 Togliatti, Palmiro
- 1893–1976 Mao Zedong
- 1893–1978 Kenyatta, Jomo
- 1894–1941 Babel, Isaac
- 1894–5 Sino-Japanese War
- 1895–1970 Cárdenas, Lázaro; president of Mexico, 1934–40
- 1895–1974 Perón, Juan; three-time president of Argentina

- 1896 Plessy v. Ferguson decision by US Supreme Court legitimizes Jim Crow laws
- 1896–7 Chimurenga; first struggle against British colonialism in Rhodesia/Zimbabwe
- 1897–1980 Day, Dorothy; writer, activist, and matriarch of the Catholic Worker movement
- 1897 birth of Zionist movement; First Zionist Congress in Basle, Switzerland
- 1898–1948 Eisenstein, Sergei
- 1898–1948 Jorge Eliécer Gaitán; Colombian populist leader
- 1898–1976 Zhou Enlai, leading figure in the Chinese Communist Party and Revolution of 1949
- 1898–1979 Marcuse, Herbert
- 1898–1902 Spanish–American War; US annexes Cuba, Puerto Rico, Guam, Philippines
- 1899–1901 Philippines insurrection
- 1899–1902 Boer War, South Africa
- 1900–1 Boxer Rebellion in China
- 1901–70 Sukarno; first president of Indonesia; active in struggle for independence from Dutch colonial rule
- 1901–89 James, C. L. R.
- 1901 Socialist Revolutionary Party founded, Russia
- 1901 Socialist Party of America founded
- 1901 discovery of Iranian oil
- 1902 What Is To Be Done? by Lenin
- 1902 Australian women are first in world to win full political rights, to vote, to stand for election to national parliament
- 1903–79 Barzani, Mulla Mustafa al-
- 1903 Russian Social Democratic Party splits into Mensheviks and Bolsheviks
- 1903 Wright Brothers' first flight at Kittyhawk, North Carolina (US)
- 1903 The Souls of Black Folk by W. E. B. Du Bois
- 1904–73 Neruda, Pablo; Chilean poet, activist, communist, and diplomat
- 1904–86 Douglas, Tommy; Canadian prime minister
- 1904–97 Deng Xiaoping
- 1904–5 Russo-Japanese War
- 1904–7 Herero Wars; resistance to German colonial encroachment results in widespread massacre, South West Africa (Namibia)
- 1904–14 building of the Panama Canal
- 1905–80 Sartre, Jean-Paul; French novelist, existentialist philosopher, literary critic; awarded Nobel Prize for literature in 1964 (declined)
- 1905 Einstein publishes Special Theory of Relativity, $e = mc^2$
- 1905 Russian Revolution of 1905; Tsar Nicholas grants constitution
- 1905 Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) founded, Chicago
- 1905 Sinn Féin organized (Dublin)
- 1905–7 Maji-Maji revolt (Tanzania)
- 1906–75 Arendt, Hannah
- 1906–2001 Senghor, Léopold Sédar; first president of Senegal and one of the founders of the Négritude movement (La Négritude)
- 1906 Young Turk movement in Ottoman empire
- 1906 First Russian parliament (Duma)
- 1906 Young Men's Buddhist Association (YMBA) movement, Burma
- 1906 The Jungle by Upton Sinclair
- 1907–64 Carson, Rachel
- 1907–67 Deutscher, Isaac
- 1907–89 De Silva, Colvin Reginald
- 1908–74 Schindler, Oskar
- 1908–86 Beauvoir, Simone de
- 1908 Model T Ford
- 1908 oil discovered by the British in Khuzestan (modern Iraq)

- 1909–72 Alinsky, Saul
- 1909–72 Nkrumah, Kwame; African socialist leader and president of Ghana
- 1909 National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) founded
- 1909–33 US Marines occupy Nicaragua, Haiti, and Dominican Republic
- 1910 Union of South Africa
- 1910 International Women’s Congress, Buenos Aires, Argentina; Chilean, Uruguayan, and Paraguayan women discuss international laws, matrimonial issues, and wage inequality
- 1910–21 Mexican Revolution
- 1911–95 Djilas, Milovan
- 1911– Vo Nguyen Giap; Vietnamese general renowned for involvement in the Vietnamese communist war against the French, defeat of the United States, and invasion of Cambodia that overthrew Pol Pot’s Khmer Rouge
- 1911 Triangle Shirtwaist fire (New York City); deaths of 146 young immigrant women workers spark waves of protest
- 1911 Chinese Nationalist Revolution; third revolutionary tide in modern history of China, following Taiping Rebellion and Boxer Uprising
- 1913–2005 Parks, Rosa
- 1913–2008 Césaire, Aimé
- 1913 Paterson silk strike (US)
- 1913 Dublin General Strike
- 1914–18 World War I
- 1915–47 Aung San
- 1915–2003 Aptheker, Herbert
- 1915 Armenian massacres under Young Turk government (April–August)
- 1916 Irish uprising
- 1916 Margaret Sanger opens first birth control clinic in Brooklyn (US)
- 1916 Arab revolt against Ottoman empire
- 1916 Dadaist movement founded in Zurich by young artists opposed to World War I
- 1916 Imperialism: The Highest Stage of Capitalism by Lenin
- 1917–80 Romero, Óscar; archbishop and advocate of liberation theology (El Salvador)
- 1917–93 Tambo, Oliver
- 1917–94 Chakravartty, Renu
- 1917– Commoner, Barry
- 1917 US declares war on Germany; enters World War I
- 1917 Russian Revolution
- 1917 Puerto Ricans become US citizens
- 1917–20 Red Scare (US)
- 1917–23 Russian civil war
- 1918–70 Nasser, Gamal Abdel
- 1918– Mandela, Nelson
- 1918 National Feminist Union is formed (Latin America); promulgates civil and political emancipation of women, access to education, and wage equality
- 1918 Tsar Nicholas II (b. 1868) and family killed by Bolsheviks at Ekaterinberg
- 1918 collapse of Austro-Hungarian empire
- 1918 State and Revolution by Lenin
- 1918–24 V. I. Lenin in power
- 1919 Bread and Roses strike, Lowell, Massachusetts
- 1919 Formation of International Labor Organization (ILO)
- 1919 Gandhi is leader of Indian National Congress
- 1919 Amritsar massacre
- 1919 Founding of Communist International
- 1919 General strike, Argentina

- 1919 General strike, Barcelona
1919 Kemal Atatürk is leader of Turkish national movement
1919 Palmer raids (US)
1919 large-scale student demonstration, Beijing (May 4)
1919 League of Nations is formed as part of signing of Treaty of Versailles; first meets 1920
1919 Red Summer; race riots and lynchings across US
1919 Winnipeg general strike (Canada)
1919 General strike, Seattle
1919–23 Turkish struggle against Allied Powers following World War I (“The Liberation War”)
1920–2006 Friedan, Betty
1920 General strike, Turin (Italy)
1920 founding of American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU)
1920 founding of National Socialist (Nazi) Party, Germany
1920 passage of 19th Amendment ensures US women’s suffrage 1920 Iraq Revolt fails to establish independence from British, who install “indigenous” monarchy
1920–1 Arab anti-Jewish riots, Palestine
1921–92 Dubček, Alexander
1921–97 Freire, Paulo
1921 Kronstadt Mutiny (USSR)
1921 Tulsa race riot (US)
1922–87 Lévesque, René
1922–97 Castoriadis, Cornelius; political philosopher
1922–99 Nyerere, Julius; Tanzanian socialist; president, Tanganyika African National Union
(TANU)
1922– Sihanouk, Norodom; variously ruler or prime minister of Cambodia, 1941–70
1922 Mussolini becomes dictator of Italy
1922 Rand revolt (South Africa); labor revolt
1922 Britain declares Egypt independent 1923 Turkey declared a republic; Kemal Atatürk first president; westernizes Turkish dress, government, and alphabet
1923 failure of Hitler’s Beer Hall Putsch in Munich
1924–73 Cabral, Amílcar
1924–93 Thompson, Edward Palmer (E. P.); historian, dissident communist, peace activist 1924– Mugabe, Robert; first prime minister of Zimbabwe
1924 death of Lenin 1924 Australian Aboriginal Progressive Association (AAPA) established by Aboriginal wharfies (members of Maritime Union of Australia)
1925–61 Lumumba, Patrice
1925–61 Fanon, Frantz; radical psychologist and revolutionary writer
1925–65 Little, Malcolm (Malcolm X)
1925–96 Williams, Robert F.; African American civil rights activist
1925– Cardenal, Ernesto
1925 first television transmission
1925–49 Chinese Communist Revolution
1926 general strike, Britain (May)
1927–93 Chávez, César; United Farm Workers leader
1927 Lindbergh flies Atlantic solo
1927 Execution of Sacco and Vanzetti
1927–53 Joseph Stalin in power, Russia
1928– Chomsky, Noam; US political theorist, activist, and professor of linguistics 1928– Gutiérrez, Gustavo; Peruvian priest and founder of liberation theology movement

- 1928 Chinese Nationalists in control of China
- 1928 Britain passes Equal Suffrage Act
- 1928 The History of Intellectual Movements in Islam by Palestinian Bandali Jawzi
- 1929–68 King, Martin Luther, Jr.
- 1929–2004 Arafat, Yasser (PLO founder)
- 1929 Igbo “Women’s War” (Nigeria)
- 1929 Khuda-i Khidmatgar founded by Pashtuns; aims to oppose British rule through non-violent resistance
- 1929 Formation of the Communist Party, USA (CPUSA)
- 1929–33 Stock Market collapse (October 1929) followed by global Depression
- 1930– Huerta, Dolores
- 1930 anti-salt tax movement, India
- 1930 Nation of Islam founded (US)
- 1930 unemployed and labor movements across US
- 1931–94 Debord, Guy
- 1931 Japanese invasion of Manchuria
- 1932 Bonus Army marches on Washington
- 1932 Antonio Salazar becomes virtual dictator of Portugal
- 1932–5 Chaco War (between Paraguay and Bolivia)
- 1933– Meredith, James; first African American to enroll at University of Mississippi (1962)
- 1933 Catholic Worker founded in New York City by Dorothy Day and Peter Maurin
- 1933 Nazi Party rules Germany
- 1933–45 Franklin D. Roosevelt US president
- 1933–45 Adolf Hitler is Chancellor of Germany
- 1934– Baraka, Amiri (Leroi Jones)
- 1934– Steinem, Gloria
- 1934 Asturias uprising, Spain (October)
- 1934 Toledo Autolite strike (US)
- 1934 Diego Rivera’s mural Man at the Crossroads in lobby of Rockefeller Center, New York, deemed anti-capitalist propaganda and demolished
- 1934 Women gain the right to vote in Cuba
- 1934–5 Chinese Long March
- 1935 Harlem race riots (April)
- 1935 Congress passes Social Security Act
- 1935 Birth of Négritude movement
- 1936– Havel, Václav
- 1936–7 Flint sit-down strike (US)
- 1936–9 Spanish Revolution; civil war; Franco takes over
- 1937–45 Sino-Japanese War
- 1938 Kristallnacht, Germany
- 1938 Muslim League for independent state of Pakistan
- 1938 Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) is created
- 1938 Germany occupies Czech Sudetenland (October)
- 1938 Day of Mourning and Protest commemorating 150 years of “theft and genocide” against indigenous aboriginals, Australia
- 1939 signing of Molotov–Ribbentrop pact
- 1939 Germany invades Czechoslovakia (September 1), marking the start of World War II
- 1939 start of Saudi Arabian oil production
- 1939–45 World War II
- 1940 Battle of Britain (July–September)
- 1940–1 Japanese conquest of Indochina
- 1941–95 Saro-Wiwa, Ken; Nigerian human rights activist
- 1941–98 Carmichael, Stokely/Kwame Turé

- 1941– Jackson, Jesse; leading US civil rights activist and leader, human rights sponsor, international mediator, and populist presidential candidate
- 1941 Germany invades Russia (June)
- 1941 Japan bombs US naval base at Pearl Harbor (December 7)
- 1942 White Rose (Weiße Rose) founded (Germany); anti-Nazi group
- 1942 Formation of Congress of Racial Equality (CORE)
- 1943– Walesa (Walsa), Lech; co-founder and leader of the Independent Self-Governing Trade Union “Solidarity” (Poland)
- 1943 Warsaw Ghetto Uprising; largest single revolt by the Jews during the Holocaust
- 1943 Race riots in Detroit (June) and Harlem (August)
- 1944–83 Bishop, Maurice (Grenada)
- 1944–88 Mendes, Chico; Amazonian rainforest protest and resistance leader
- 1944 Guatemalan revolution overthrows Jorge Ubico
- 1944 Glorious May Revolution, Ecuador
- 1944 D-Day; Allied invasion of Europe at Normandy beaches (June 6)
- 1944 attempted plot to kill Hitler fails (July 20)
- 1945– Cohn-Bendit, Daniel
- 1945– Silva, Luiz Inácio Lula da; leader Workers’ Party (Partido dos Trabalhadores), Brazil
- 1945 German surrender (May)
- 1945 death of FDR
- 1945 Guomindang (GMD) takes over island of Taiwan
- 1945 formation of Arab League
- 1945 partition of Korea
- 1945 United Nations founded
- 1945 US drops atom bombs on Hiroshima and Nagasaki, Japan (August 6 and 9)
- 1945 Japan surrenders (September)
- 1945 Marshall Plan to restore war-ravaged Europe
- 1945 Hô Chi Minh proclaims the first Democratic Republic of Vietnam (September 2)
- 1945–54 First Indochina War, Vietnam
- 1946 Sudanese Women’s League founded by women members of Sudanese Communist Party
- 1946 Menachem Begin and the Irgun attack and destroy the King David Hotel, Jerusalem
- 1946 Philippine independence
- 1946–9 Pilbara strike of aboriginal stock workers, Australia
- 1946–9 civil war in China
- 1946–9 Greek civil war
- 1946–9 Dutch colonial war in East Indies
- 1946–54 Huk Rebellion, Philippines
- 1946–2008 Protest against US occupation, Okinawa (Japan)
- 1947 India and Pakistan become independent states
- 1947–77 Biko, Steven; South African black leader
- 1948–69 Hampton, Fred; leader of Chicago Chapter, Black Panther Party
- 1948 Nationalist Party in South Africa begins apartheid
- 1948 Union of Burma; independent republic outside British Commonwealth of Nations
- 1948 al-Wathbah – “the Awakening”– anti-British protest begins in Iraq
- 1948 Gandhi assassinated
- 1948 formation of Union des Populations du Cameroun; period of active nationalism commences
- 1948 Israel gains independence from Britain
- 1948–9 first Arab–Israeli War
- 1949 Germany divided into East and West Germany
- 1949 People’s Republic of China proclaimed (October 1); Chinese Communist Party (CCP) in power; Mao Zedong becomes premier

- 1950– Foley, Gary; indigenous Australian leader
- 1950 formation of Vietnam, Cambodia, and Laos
- 1950 Chinese conquest of Tibet
- 1950 Sukarno first president of Indonesian republic
- 1950–3 Korean War
- 1951 decolonization of Africa begins with Libya declaring independence
- 1952 bloodless coup in Egypt; King Farouk overthrown, marking the end of direct British influence in state affairs; Nasser assumes power
- 1952–9 Mau-Mau rebellion, Kenya
- 1953–61 Dwight D. Eisenhower US president
- 1953 failure of Mossadegh coup in Iran; US-backed Shah rules for next 25 years
- 1953–9 Cuban Revolution; beginning of Castro regime (1959)
- 1954–81 Sands, Bobby; member of Irish Republican Army (IRA), elected to British parliament
- 1954 Brown v. Board of Education ruling; segregation illegal in US
- 1954 Viet Minh conquer French fortress at Dien Bien Phu (May 7)
- 1954–62 Algerian National Revolution
- 1955 Ngo Dinh Diem proclaims Republic of Vietnam with himself as president (October 26)
- 1955 murder of Emmett Till and subsequent trial verdict highlight racism in US South
- 1955 Montgomery Bus Boycott; protest against segregation on public transit (US)
- 1955–62 French war in Algeria
- 1956 Republic of Tunisia achieves independence from France (March 20)
- 1956 Hungarian Revolution; suppressed by Soviets
- 1956 Nasser’s nationalization of Suez Canal prompts Suez crisis (Egypt)
- 1956 Sudan receives independence from Britain
- 1957 Ghana becomes first Sub-Saharan African country to receive independence (Gold Coast)
- 1957 European Economic Community (EEC; known as “Common Market” in UK)
- 1957–71 Tibetan revolt
- 1958 Things Fall Apart by Chinua Achebe; seminal African novel in English
- 1958 Mao’s “Great Leap Forward”
- 1958 Notting Hill riots, Britain
- 1958 Revolution of 1958, Iraq
- 1959 Dalai Lama flees to India
- 1960 creation of Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC)
- 1960 four North Carolina AT&T College students stage lunch counter sit-in at Woolworth store in Greensboro
- 1960 Congo gains independence from Belgium (Zaire)
- 1960 April Revolution (Korea); topples corrupt regime of Rhee Syng-man
- 1960 Ivory Coast gains independence from France
- 1960 Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) founded in US
- 1960 Nigeria gains independence from Britain (October 1)
- 1960 Sharpeville protest and massacre, South Africa
- 1960–3 civil war in Zaire
- 1960–74 Second Indochina War, Vietnam
- 1960s–1970s Communist Party and People’s War, Thailand
- 1960s–1990s Moro National Liberation Movement, Philippines
- 1961 Congo leader Patrice Lumumba assassinated
- 1961 The Wretched of the Earth by Frantz Fanon
- 1961 first Freedom Rides in US, organized by Congress of Racial Equality (CORE)
- 1961–3 John F. Kennedy US president
- 1961–89 Berlin Wall
- 1961–90 Imprisonment of Nelson Mandela

- 1962 major buildup of US military forces in South Vietnam begins
- 1962 Algeria gains independence from France after 12-year struggle
- 1962 Trinidad and Tobago become independent and join British Commonwealth
- 1962 Cuban missile crisis
- 1962 Publication of Rachel Carson's Silent Spring ignites environmental movement
- 1962–74 anti-colonial struggle and revolution, Mozambique
- 1963 Betty Friedan's The Feminine Mystique launches second-wave feminism in US
- 1963 Revolutionary Action Movement (RAM) founded in Philadelphia; first black organization in US to call for Marxist revolution
- 1963 Ngo Dinh Diem and his brother assassinated, South Vietnam
- 1963 JFK assassinated, Dallas, Texas
- 1963 Civil Rights March on Washington
- 1963 The Making of the English Working Class by E. P. Thompson
- 1963 Zanzibar gains independence from Britain
- 1964 Zanzibar revolution
- 1964 Civil rights legislation in US
- 1964 creation of Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) by Arab League
- 1964 Free Speech Movement (FSM), University of California, Berkeley; serves as catalyst for student demonstrations around the world
- 1965 three Selma-to-Montgomery (Alabama) marches to secure voting rights (March)
- 1965 Students for a Democratic Society (SDS) hold anti-war rally, Washington, DC (April)
- 1965 Voting Rights Act (US) signed by LBJ
- 1965 Watts riots, Los Angeles (US)
- 1965 Suharto seizes power in Indonesia
- 1965 anti-war protests in 40 American cities (October 15–16)
- 1965 aboriginal student in Australia leads bus tour on "1965 Freedom Ride," inspired by activists in US civil rights movement
- 1965 Malcolm X shot and killed during speech at Audubon Ballroom (New York City)
- 1965 Mobutu ascends to power in Congo following coup
- 1965 first US troops to Vietnam
- 1966 Stokely Carmichael inaugurates Black Power movement
- 1966 Black Panther Party for Self-Defense (BPP) founded in Oakland, California
- 1966 formation of National Organization for Women (NOW)
- 1966–76 Cultural Revolution, China
- 1967 beginning of long protest against building of Narita Airport outside Tokyo
- 1967 Israeli–Arab Six-Day War, Middle East
- 1967 Ernesto "Che" Guevara killed in Bolivia attempting to spark revolutionary uprising
- 1967–70 Biafra civil war, Nigeria
- 1967–72 Naxalite movement, India
- 1968 Tet Offensive begins, Vietnam (January 30)
- 1968 My Lai massacre (March)
- 1968 Martin Luther King, Jr., assassinated in Memphis, Tennessee (April); urban disturbances in more than 100 cities across US
- 1968 Vietnam peace talks open in Paris (May 12)
- 1968 Robert F. Kennedy, presidential candidate, assassinated in Los Angeles, California (June)
- 1968 Latin American Bishops' Conference in Medellín (Colombia) affirms rights of the poor and asserts that industrialized nations are enriching themselves at expense of Third World
- 1968 American Indian Movement (AIM) created in Minneapolis
- 1968 Student protests, US
- 1968 Protests, Europe (May '68)
- 1968 Russia invades Czechoslovakia

- 1968 Baathist Party in control of Iraq (until 2003)
- 1968–9 Agbekoya Peasant Revolt, Nigeria
- 1969 Cordobazo and Rosariazo uprising, Argentina
- 1969 Stonewall Riots, Greenwich Village (New York City)
- 1969 first moon walk, Apollo 11 astronauts
- 1969 Colonel Muammar al-Qaddafi comes to power (September 1) after coup d'état in Libya
- 1969–71 “Indians of All Tribes” occupy Alcatraz, effectively inaugurating Red Power movement
- 1970 founding of Tamil Students Federation (Sri Lanka), later the Tamil New Tigers
- 1970 Salvador Allende becomes first democratically elected socialist to take power in Latin America
- 1970 US invasion of Cambodia (April–June)
- 1970 Kent State student uprising and shooting (May 4)
- 1970 Australian feminist Germaine Greer’s The Female Eunuch becomes international bestseller
- 1971 East Pakistan becomes the sovereign state of Bangladesh (December 16)
- 1971 Janatha Vimukthi Peramuna (People’s Liberation Front) uprising, Sri Lanka
- 1972 Bloody Sunday, Derry, Northern Ireland (January 30); civil rights protesters shot by British soldiers
- 1972 President Nixon visits Beijing seeking détente with People’s Republic of China (February)
- 1972 Aboriginal “Embassy” action on grounds of Australian parliament leads to demise of McMahon government
- 1972 The Pedagogy of the Oppressed by Paulo Freire
- 1972 Nuclear arms treaty (SALT I)
- 1972 martial law is imposed in the Philippines (September 21) by Marcos regime
- 1973 Vietnam War ends for US with signing of Paris peace accords (January 27); all direct American military operations end in Indochina (August 14)
- 1973 Wounded Knee, South Dakota (US); AIM protest
- 1973 Roe v. Wade; US Supreme Court ruling overturns all state and federal laws outlawing or restricting abortion
- 1973 Israeli–Arab War
- 1973 oil crisis and global recession
- 1973 Chile falls under rule of Pinochet military dictatorship (September 11)
- 1973 Ezeiza protest and massacre, Argentina
- 1974 Carnation Revolution, Portugal
- 1974 Watergate scandal forces Richard M. Nixon (elected 1969) to resign as US president
- 1974–7 Ethiopian Revolution
- 1975 Green March into Western Sahara, Morocco (November 6)
- 1975 Helsinki Accords on human rights signed
- 1975 International Women’s Day observed worldwide (March 8)
- 1975 general strike, Argentina (June–July)
- 1975 Cambodia falls to Khmer Rouge (April 17); in ensuing four years of Pol Pot regime, an estimated 20 percent of Cambodian population is killed
- 1975 North Vietnam captures Saigon; Vietnam War ends (April 30)
- 1975 Pathet Lao comes to power in Laos and proclaims Popular Lao Republic (December 4)
- 1975–90 Lebanese civil war
- 1977 Madres de la Plaza de Mayo, Buenos Aires, Argentina
- 1978 Camp David Accords signed; lead to Israel–Egypt Peace Treaty following year
- 1978 Islamic Revolution in Afghanistan
- 1978–9 “Winter of Discontent,” Britain
- 1979 Soviet Union invades Afghanistan
- 1979 Islamic Revolution in Iran

- 1979 Three Mile Island nuclear accident in US (March) stimulates global movement against nuclear power
- 1979 Saddam Hussein and Baathists in power in Iraq until overthrown by US in 2003
- 1979 Nicaraguan Revolution
- 1980 Kwangju student uprising (Korea)
- 1980 Zimbabwe, formerly Southern Rhodesia, becomes independent; Mugabe prime minister
- 1980 Earth First! founded to halt exploitation and destruction of nature by the industrial West
- 1980 Shining Path (Sendero Luminoso) guerilla warfare starts in Peru
- 1980–2 Solidarity movement in Poland
- 1980–91 Salvadoran civil war
- 1981 AIDS identified
- 1981 Brixton riots, London (April)
- 1981 Nuclear-Free New Zealand
- 1981–9 Ronald Reagan US president
- 1983 revolution in landlocked West African country of Burkina Faso
- 1984 assassination of Indian leader Indira Gandhi
- 1984 Bhopal chemical disaster kills thousands, India
- 1985 Mexico City earthquake; 9,000 killed, 30,000 injured, 100,000 left homeless
- 1985–6 British miners' strike
- 1985–91 Mikhail Gorbachev Soviet leader
- 1986 Chernobyl nuclear plant in Ukraine explodes; radioactive contamination spreads to Belarus, Russia, Europe, and beyond
- 1987 anti-AIDS group ACT UP formed, New York City
- 1987 Hamas founded, Gaza Strip
- 1987 Bougainville Secession movement against Papua New Guinea
- 1987–93 first Intifada in Middle East
- 1988 popular uprisings in Burma to demand democracy
- 1988 Benazir Bhutto becomes prime minister of Pakistan for 20 months
- 1988–9 USSR leaves Afghanistan
- 1989 Kashmir Muslims revolt against India
- 1989 Tiananmen Square protests – known in China as the June Fourth Movement
- 1989 fall of Berlin Wall; Germany reunified following year
- 1989 Velvet Revolution brings about collapse of communist regime of Czechoslovak Socialist Republic
- 1989 collapse of communist regimes in Eastern Europe
- 1989 World Wide Web developed at CERN, Switzerland, by Tim Berners-Lee
- 1990 Namibia is last colony on African continent to gain national independence
- 1990 Nelson Mandela freed from South African jail
- 1990 Oka crisis (Quebec)
- 1990–1 student movement (Greece)
- 1990–2000s indigenous uprisings, Ecuador
- 1990–2000s Assam armed struggle against India
- 1990s–2000s Aceh struggle against Indonesia
- 1991 Baltic republics (Latvia, Lithuania, Estonia) gain independence from Soviet Union
- 1991 USSR collapses
- 1991 Jean-Bertrand Aristide takes power in Haiti
- 1991 breakup of Yugoslavia leads to nationalist wars and ethnic cleansing in 1990s
- 1991 Bangladesh cyclone kills 138,000 and leaves 10 million homeless (April)
- 1991 Nobel Peace Prize awarded to Aung San Suu Kyi of Burma (Myanmar)
- 1991 First Gulf War; US forces chase Iraqi troops out of Kuwait
- 1992 Nobel Peace Prize awarded to Rigoberta Menchú for advocacy of indigenous rights, Guatemala

- 1992 Ayodhya Temple destroyed by Hindu nationalists, India
- 1992 Riots in south central Los Angeles following verdict in Rodney King trial (US)
- 1992 Maastricht Treaty (formally, Treaty on European Union, TEU) signed, the Netherlands; creates European Union and leads to creation of the euro
- 1993 European Union (EU) created; EEC transformed into the European Community, one of EU's three parts
- 1993 Via Campesina (Peasant Road) founded in Belgium; transnational social movement
- 1993 Nobel Peace Prize awarded jointly to Nelson Mandela and F. W. de Klerk (South Africa)
- 1993 Oslo Accords signed in Washington, DC, between PLO and Israel, ending first Intifada
- 1994 Zapatista movement rises up in Chiapas (Mexico)
- 1994 African National Congress (ANC) party wins first democratic elections in South Africa; Nelson Mandela is president
- 1994 US, Mexico, and Canada form NAFTA (North American Free Trade Agreement)
- 1994 massacre of Tutsi people in Rwanda
- 1996–7 South Korea labor uprisings and general strike
- 1997 Asian financial crisis
- 1997 Kyoto Accords; Kyoto Protocol created to reduce greenhouse gas emissions by 2012; ratified by 140 nations (excluding US and Australia)
- 1998 Peoples' Global Action (PGA) Network formed
- 1998 Taliban rebels conquer Afghanistan
- 1999 11 European States (except UK) adopt euro
- 1999 Hugo Chávez becomes president of Venezuela, planning socialist economy
- 1999 World Trade Organization (WTO) protests, Seattle
- 1999 Canal Zone returned to Panamanian control (December 31) after 96 years of US occupation
- 2000 second (Al-Aqsa) Intifada begins, led by Hamas (Middle East)
- 2000 Augusto Pinochet arrested in London; first application of principle of universal jurisdiction by European judges
- 2000 global warming confirmed by UN Conference on Climate Change
- 2000 Serbian revolution; downfall of Slobodan Milošević; first in a series of movements across Eastern and Southeastern Europe
- 2001 World Social Forum founded in Brazil (January) as forum for groups resisting globalization
- 2001 terrorist attacks on World Trade Center (New York), Pentagon (September 11)
- 2001 Patani Thai national liberation
- 2002 Gujarat communal uprisings
- 2002 US invades Afghanistan to eliminate Taliban
- 2003 Rose Revolution, Georgia
- 2003 over 8 million people in more than 800 cities in 60 countries join in largest synchronized global anti-war non-violent protest in history (February 15)
- 2003 US invades Iraq (Second Iraq War) (March 20)
- 2004 Massachusetts becomes first state to legalize gay marriage
- 2004 European Union has 23 member states
- 2004 earthquake triggers tsunamis that cause destruction across 11 countries, killing more than 225,000 people, mainly in India, Thailand, Sri Lanka, and Indonesia (December)
- 2004–5 Orange Revolution, Ukraine
- 2005 Tulip Revolution, Kyrgyzstan (March)
- 2005 immigrant uprisings, France
- 2005 Hurricane Katrina devastates New Orleans and Gulf Coast; costliest natural disaster in US history (August)
- 2006 Oaxaca uprising (Mexico)

- 2006 Evo Morales becomes first indigenous leader in Bolivia in 470 years since Spanish conquest
- 2006 immigration protests (US)
- 2006 mass protests in Haiti over vote count manipulation by right-wing parties
- 2006 April Revolution, Nepal
- 2007 Tuareg uprising, Niger
- 2007 assassination of Benazir Bhutto, Pakistan
- 2008 Fidel Castro retires
- 2008 Supreme Court of California overturns state's ban on same-sex marriage (May 15)
- 2008 Illinois Senator Barack Obama becomes first African American to be elected as US president

Lexicon

This lexicon aims to provide readers with a map to the content of the encyclopedia. The list of entries under each subject heading, be it chronological, geographic, or thematic, is not exhaustive. Each list is a representative selection of significant entries intended to help readers begin their exploration into that specific area of revolutionary studies.

Chronological

16th Century

Agüeybaná (d. 1510) and Agüeybaná II (d. 1511)
Anabaptist movement
Aracaré (d. 1542)
Britain, peasant uprisings, 16th century
Britain, Renaissance-era conflict
Calvin, John (1509–1564)
Caonabo (d. 1496)
Comunero movement
Cuauhtémoc (1502–1525)
Denmark, insurrection and revolt
Diriangén (1496 or 1497–1530s)
Dutch Revolt, 1568–1648
Edict of Nantes
English Reformation
Enriquillo and the Taíno revolt (1519–1533)
Ethnic and nationalist revolts in the Hapsburg Empire, 1500–1848
German Peasant Rebellion, 1525
German Reformation
Guaicaipuro (ca. 1530–1568)
Guatemala, popular rebellion and civil war
Gustav Rebellions
Hatuey (ca. 1400s–1512)
Irish revolts, 1400–1790
Jumandi (d. 1578)
La Boétie, Etienne de (1530–1563)
Lautaro (d. 1557)
Lemba, Sebastian (d. 1547)
Lempira (d. 1537)
Luther, Martin (1483–1546)

Moscow fire and protest, 1547
Müntzer, Thomas (ca. 1489–1525)
Nordic revolts and popular protests, 1500–present
Padilla, Juan de (ca. 1490–1521)
Panama, Cemaco's anti-colonial resistance, 1510–1512
Philippines, colonial protests during the Spanish era
Reformation
Rumiñahui (d. 1535)
St. Bartholomew's Day Massacre
Scottish Reformation
Tecún Umán (d. 1524)
Tisquesuza (d. 1537)
Túpac Amaru (1540–1572)
Urracá, Cacique of Veraguas (d. 1516)
Venezuela, Negro Miguel Rebellion, 1552
Women's movement, United States, 16th–18th centuries
Zwingli, Huldrych (1484–1531)

17th Century

Arundel, Lady Blanche (1583–1649)
Bacon's Rebellion
Barbados and the Windward Islands, protest and revolt
Bolotnikov's Rebellion, 1606–1607
China, peasant revolts in the empire
Cromwell, Oliver (1599–1658)
Denmark, insurrection and revolt
Dutch Revolt, 1568–1648
English Revolution, 17th century
English Revolution, radical sects
English Revolution, women and Fawkes, Guy (1570–1606) and the Gunpowder Plot
Fell, Margaret (1614–1702)
Fifth Monarchist women
Fox, George (1624–1691)
French Caribbean in the Age of Revolution

- French Guiana, indigenous rebellions
 Fronde, France, 1648–1653
 Glencoe Massacre, 1692
 Glorious Revolution, Britain, 1688
 Guatemala, popular rebellion
 and civil war
 Haiti, Saint-Domingue and revolutionary France
 Hobbes, Thomas (1588–1679)
 Hutchinson, Anne (1591–1643)
 Irish revolts, 1400–1790
 Italy, 17th-century revolts in the south
 Khmelnytsky Uprising
 Lilburne, John (1615–1657)
 Locke, John (1632–1704)
 Malta, protest and revolution
 Ming Rebellions, 1600s
 Netherlands, protests, 1650–1800
 Nordic revolts and popular protests,
 1500–present
 Palmares Slave Revolts, 1602–1603
 Pamphleteering and political protest,
 Dutch Republic, 1672
 Philippines, colonial protests during the Spanish era
 Ranters
 Razin's Rebellion, 1670–1671
 Roshaniya movement and Khan Rebellion
 Scottish Reformation
 Spinoza, Baruch (1632–1677)
 Swift, Jonathan (1667–1745)
 Swiss Peasants' War of 1653
 Winstanley, Gerrard (1609–1676)
 Women's movement, Haiti
 Women's movement, Southern Africa
 Women's movement, Spain
 Women's movement, United States, 16th–18th centuries
 Women's movement, Venezuela
 Zumbi (ca. 1655–1695)
- 18th Century
 American Revolution of 1776
 American slave rebellions
 Andresote and the Revolt against the
 Guipuzcoana (1731–1733)
 Anti-monarchy protests, Portugal
 Anti-slavery movement, Britain
 Anti-slavery movement, United States,
 1700–1870
 Atlantic port seaman resistance,
 American Revolutionary era
- Babeuf, François-Noël (1760–1797)
 and the Conspiracy of Equals
 Barbados and the Windward Islands,
 protest and revolt
 Bengal, popular uprisings and movements in the colonial era
 Bonaparte, Napoleon (1769–1821)
 Brazil, rebellions from independence
 to the republic (1700s–1889)
 Brissot, Jacques Pierre (1754–1793)
 Britain, anti-war movement, 1775–1783
 Burdett, Sir Francis (1770–1844)
 Catholic emancipation
 Corsican independence movement
 Counterrevolution, France, 1789–1830
 Cuffe, Paul (1759–1817)
 Danton, Georges Jacques (1759–1794)
 Denmark, insurrection and revolt
 Despard, Colonel Edward
 Marcus (1751–1803) and the Despard Conspiracy
 Dessalines, Jean-Jacques (1758–1806)
 Diderot, Denis (1713–1784)
 Directory, France, 1795–1799
 Durrani empire, popular protests, 1747–1823
 Eighteenth Brumaire
 Emmet, Robert (1778–1803)
 and Emmet's Rebellion
 Enlightenment, France, 18th century
 Equiano, Olaudah (1745–1797)
 Estates General, France
 Ethnic and nationalist revolts in
 the Hapsburg Empire, 1500–1848
 Father Rapp (1757–1847) and Harmony
 Fitzgerald, Lord Edward (1763–1798)
 French Guiana, indigenous rebellions
 French Polynesia, protest movements
 French Revolution, 1789–1794
 French Revolution, historians' interpretations
 French Revolution, radical factions and organizations
 French Revolution, women and
 French revolutionary theater
 Godwin, William (1756–1836)
 Gordon "No Popery" Riots,
 Britain, 1780
 Haiti, revolutionary revolts, 1790s
 Haiti, revolutionary struggles
 Haiti, Saint-Domingue and revolutionary France
 Horne Tooke, John (1736–1812)

Ireland, Age of Revolutions, 1775–1803
 Ireland, Great Rebellion, 1798
 Irish revolts, 1400–1790
 Jacobite risings, Britain, 1715 and 1745
 Jamaica, rebellion and resistance, 1760–1834
 Labor revolutionary currents, United States, 1775–1900
 Lesbian, gay, transsexual, bisexual movements, Germany
 London Corresponding Society
 Luxembourg, protest and revolution
 Marat, Jean-Paul (1743–1793)
 Mirabeau, Comte de (1749–1791)
 Muhammad ‘Ali (1769–1849)
 Netherlands, protests, 1650–1800
 Nordic revolts and popular protests, 1500–present
 O’Connor, Arthur (1763–1852)
 Oge’s Revolt, 1790
 Paine, Thomas (1737–1809)
 Philippines, colonial protests during the Spanish era
 Polish Revolution (Sejm), 1788–1792
 Pugachev’s Rebellion, 1773–1775
 Queen Nanny and Maroon resistance
 Robespierre, Maximilien de (1758–1794)
 Rochambeau, Comte de (1725–1807)
 Romania, protests and revolts, 18th and 19th centuries
 Rousseau, Jean-Jacques (1712–1778)
 Saint-Just, Louis Antoine (1767–1794)
 Saint-Simon, Comte de (1760–1825)
Sans-culottes
 Schill, Ferdinand Baptista von (1776–1809)
 Sepé Tiarajú (1722/3–1756)
 Sharp, Granville (1735–1813)
 Shays’ Rebellion
 Sheridan, Richard Brinsley (1751–1816)
 Shipboard insurrections in the Atlantic slave trade
 Sieyès, Abbé (1748–1836)
 Smith, Adam (1723–1790)
 Spence, Thomas (1750–1814)
 Spithead and Nore mutinies, Britain, 1797
 Sturm und Drang
 Swift, Jonathan (1667–1745)
 Tennis Court Oath, France, 1789
 Thelwall, John (1764–1834)

Thistlewood, Arthur (1774–1820) and the Cato Street Conspiracy
 Tone, Theobald Wolfe (1763–1798)
 Trinidad, anti-colonial movement
 Tunisia, protests under Ottoman (Bey) rule to 1881
 Túpac Amaru Rebellion II and the Last Inca Revolt, 1780–1783
 Túpac Katari (ca. 1750–1781)
 United Englishmen/United Britons
 United Irishmen
 United Scotsmen
 Utopian intentional communities
 Voltaire (1694–1778)
 Washington, George (1732–1799)
 Wesley, John (1703–1791), Methodism, and social reform
 Whiskey Rebellion
 Wilberforce, William (1759–1833)
 Wilkes, John (1725–1797) and the “Wilkes and Liberty” movement
 Wollstonecraft, Mary (1759–1797)
 Women’s movement, Haiti
 Women’s movement, Southern Africa
 Women’s movement, United States, 16th–18th centuries
 Women’s movement, Venezuela

19th Century

Addams, Jane (1860–1935)
 Albanian nationalism
 Amana Inspirationist Utopians
 American Civil War (1861–1864)
 American Civil War draft riots
 American Civil War and slavery
 American slave rebellions
 Anarchism, Argentina
 Anarchism, Australia
 Anarchism, Spain
 Anarchism in the United States to 1945
 Anthony, Susan B. (1820–1906)
 Anti-Corn Law agitation, Britain, 19th century
 Anti-monarchy protests, Portugal
 Anti-slavery movement, Britain
 Anti-slavery movement, British, and the black response to colonization
 Anti-slavery movement, British, and the founding of Sierra Leone
 Anti-slavery movement, United States, 1700–1870

- Arab left and socialist movements, 1861–1930
- Argentina, labor strikes of 1890 and 1902
- Australian labor movement
- Bakunin, Mikhail Alexandrovich (1814–1876)
- Barbados and the Windward Islands, protest and revolt
- Bengal, popular uprisings and movements in the colonial era
- Bernstein, Eduard (1850–1932)
- Black nationalism, 19th and 20th centuries
- Blanqui, Louis Auguste (1805–1881)
- Bolívar, Simón (1783–1830)
- Bolivia, War of the Pacific to the National Revolution, 1879–1952
- Bonaparte, Napoleon (1769–1821)
- Bourses du Travail
- Brazil, rebellions from independence to the republic (1700s–1889)
- Britain, trade union movement
- Britain, women’s suffrage campaign
- Brown, John (1800–1859)
- Burdett, Sir Francis (1770–1844)
- Bussa (d. 1816) and the Barbados slave insurrection
- Cabanagem of Grão-Pará, Brazil, 1835–1840
- Cambodia, anti-colonial protests, 1863–1945
- Canada, indigenous resistance
- Canada, labor protests
- Canada, law and public protest: history
- Canada, Rebellion of 1837–1838
- Canudos, religion and rebellion in 19th-century Brazil
- Catholic emancipation
- Central Asian protest movements
- Chartists
- Chile, social and political struggles, 1850–1970
- Chilembwe, John (1871–1915)
- Chimurenga armed struggles
- China, protest and revolution, 1800–1911
- Colombia, Afro-Colombian movements and anti-racist protests
- Connolly, James (1868–1916)
- Corsican independence movement
- Côte d’Ivoire, pre-independence protest and liberation
- Counterrevolution, France, 1789–1830
- Crazy Horse (1849–1877), Sitting Bull (1831–1890), and Native American resistance at the Battle of Little Bighorn
- Cuba, anti-racist movement and the Partido Independiente de Color
- Cuba, struggle for independence from Spain, 1868–1898
- Cyprus, protest and revolt
- Dalit liberation struggles
- Debs, Eugene (1855–1926)
- Decembrists to the rise of Russian Marxism
- Demerara Slave Rebellion, 1823
- Denmark, insurrection and revolt
- Dominican Republic, protests 1844–1915
- Douglass, Frederick (1817–1895)
- Dutch Caribbean, protest and revolution, 1815–2000
- Ecuador, protest and revolution
- Egypt, Peasant Rebellion of 1824
- Enclosure movement, protests against
- Engels, Friedrich (1820–1895)
- Environmental protest, United States, 19th century
- Ethnic and nationalist revolts in the Hapsburg Empire, 1500–1848
- Eureka Stockade
- European revolutions of 1848
- Fenian movement
- Fourier, Charles François Marie (1772–1837) and the Phalanx Utopians
- France, 1830 Revolution
- France, June Days, 1848
- France, Revolution of 1848
- French Guiana, indigenous rebellions
- French Polynesia, protest movements
- Fries’s Rebellion
- Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand (1869–1948)
- Garibaldi, Giuseppe (1807–1882)
- Garrison, William Lloyd (1805–1879)
- Godwin, William (1756–1836)
- Greece, socialism, communism and the left, 1850–1974
- Greek nationalism
- Guatemala, popular rebellion and civil war
- Haiti, protest and rebellion, 19th century
- Haiti, Saint-Domingue Revolution, 1789–1804, aftermath
- Haitian Revolution and independence, 1801–1804

- Hawaii, resistance to US invasion and occupation
 Haymarket tragedy
 Haywood, Big Bill (1869–1928)
 Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich (1770–1831)
 Hidalgo y Costilla, Miguel (1753–1811)
 Hugo, Victor (1802–1885)
 Hungary, protests, 1815–1920
 Hungary, Revolution of 1848
 Hungary, women radicals, 1848–1849
 India, Great Rebellion of 1857 (the Sepoy Revolt)
 Indian national liberation
 Indonesia, colonial protests, 16th century to 1900
 Iran, political and cultural protests, 1844–1914
 Jamaica, peasant uprisings, 19th century
 Jamaica, rebellion and resistance, 1760–1834
 Japan, protest and revolt, 1800–1945
 Jewish Bund
 Jews and revolution in Europe, 1789–1919
 Kautsky, Karl (1854–1938)
 Kelly, Edward “Ned” (1855–1880) and the Kelly Gang
 Korea, popular rebellions and uprisings, 1492–1910
 Kropotkin, Peter (1842–1921)
 Labor revolutionary currents, United States, 1775–1900
 Lafayette, Marquis de (1757–1834)
 Laos, protest and revolution, 19th and 20th centuries
 Lebanon, 19th-century revolts
 Leeward Islands, labor protests
 Lesbian, gay, transsexual, bisexual movements, Germany
 Lincoln, Abraham (1809–1865) and African Americans
 Luddism and machine breaking
 Luddite riots in Nottingham
 Magón, Ricardo Flores (1874–1922) and the Magonistas
 Mahdist Revolt
 Malatesta, Errico (1853–1932)
 Malaysia, protest and revolt
 Maori indigenous resistance
 Marcuse, Herbert (1898–1979)
 Marx, Karl (1818–1883)
 Mazzini, Giuseppe (1805–1872)
 Michel, Louise (1830–1905)
 Moro national liberation
 Mozambique, worker protests
 Namibia, struggle for independence
 Nat Turner Rebellion
 Nepal, protest movements, 19th and 20th centuries
 Netherlands, protests, 1800–2000
 New Australia movement
 New Caledonia, protest and revolt
 Nietzsche, Friedrich (1844–1900)
 Nordic revolts and popular protests, 1500–present
 O’Connell, Daniel (1775–1847)
 O’Connor, Arthur (1763–1852)
 O’Connor, Feargus (1796–1855)
 Paris Commune, 1871
 Parnell, Charles Stewart (1846–1891)
 Philippines, colonial protests during the Spanish era
 Poland, revolutions, 1846–1863
 Polish Revolution of 1830
 Popelin, Marie (1846–1913) and Belgian League for Women’s Rights
 Proudhon, Pierre Joseph (1809–1865)
 Radical Reconstruction, United States, promise and failure of Reclus, Elisée (1830–1905)
 Red Scotland and the Scottish radical left, 1880–1932
 Reform Acts, Britain and Ireland, 1832
 Romania, protests and revolts, 18th and 19th centuries
 Schleswig-Holstein uprisings
 Seneca Falls convention
 South Africa, labor movement
 Spartacus, historical and modern era
 Student movements, Europe
 Student movements, global South
 Sudanese protest in the Turko-Egyptian era
 Swedish Revolution of 1809
 Swing Riots
 Sylvis, William H. (1829–1869) and the National Labor Union
 Syndicalism, France
 Taiping Rebellion, 1851–1864
 Taiwan, anti-imperialism and nationalism
 Togliatti, Palmiro (1893–1964)
 Trinidad, anti-colonial movement
 Trotsky, Leon (1879–1940)
 Turkey, protest and revolution, 1800s–1923

- Utopian intentional communities
 Venezuelan War of Independence
 Vietnam, protest against colonialism,
 1858–1896
 Vinegar Hill/Castle Hill Rebellion, 1804
 Wales, nationalist protest, 19th century
 Wilberforce, William (1759–1833)
 Woman’s Christian Temperance Union
 Women in the 1848 Revolution, Poland
 Women’s movement, Australia
 Women’s movement, Britain
 Women’s movement, Greece, formation of
 Women’s movement, Southern Africa
 Women’s movements, Eastern Europe
 World Anti-Slavery Convention, London
 Wright, Frances “Fanny” (1795–1852)
 Yaa Asantewaa (ca. 1840–1921)
 Yi Ho Tuan (Boxer) Rebellion
 Yoruba Wars, 19th century
 Young Ireland
 Zapata, Emiliano (1879–1919)
 and the Comuna Morelense
 Zola, Emile (1840–1902)
- 20th Century–Present
 Afghanistan, 1978 Revolution and Islamic Civil War
 African American resistance,
 Jim Crow era
 Agbekoya Peasant Uprising and Rebellion, 1968–1969
 Albania, socialism
 Alcatraz Uprising and the American
 Indian Movement
 Algerian National Revolution, 1954–1962
 Anarchism
 Anarchism in the United States,
 1946–present
 Anti-apartheid movement, South Africa
 Anti-nuclear movement, Japan
 Anti-Vietnam War movement,
 United States
 Arafat, Yasser (1929–2004), Fatah, and the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO)
 Argentina, human rights movement
 Armenian resistance, 1915
 ATTAC (Association for the Taxation of Financial Transactions for the Aid of Citizens)
 Australian aboriginal protests
 Bangladesh, struggle for liberation, 1971
 Ben-Gurion, David (1866–1973)
 and the Haganah
 Biennio Rosso (1919–1920)
 Black nationalism, 19th and 20th centuries
 Bolivia, War of the Pacific to the
 National Revolution, 1879–1952
 Botswana, protest and nationalism
 Burma, national movement against British colonial rule Cambodia, communist protests
 and revolution
 Canada, indigenous resistance
 Caribbean protest music
 Carson, Rachel (1907–1964)
 Castro, Fidel (b. 1926)
 Chávez, César (1927–1993) and the United Farm Workers
 Chávez, Hugo and the Bolivarian
 Revolution, 1998–present
 Chile, social and political struggles,
 1850–1970
 China, protest and revolution, 1800–1911
 Chinese Communist Revolution,
 1925–1949
 Civil rights movement, United States,
 1960–1965
 Colombia, armed insurgency, peasant self-defense, and radical popular movements, 1970s–1990s
 Color revolutions
 Congo Crisis, 1960–1965
 Cordobazo and Rosariazo Uprising, 1969
 Côte d’Ivoire, pre-independence
 protest and liberation
 Cuban Revolution, 1953–1959
 Cyprus, protest and revolt
 Dalit liberation struggles
 Dominican Republic, protest and resistance to US imperialism
 Dutch Caribbean, protest and
 revolution, 1815–2000
 East Timor, anti-colonial struggle,
 1974 to independence
 Easter Rising and the Irish Civil War
 Ecological protest movements
 Ecuador, protest and revolution
 Fascism, protest and revolution
 Fiji, parliamentary insurrection
 France, post-World War II labor protests
 Francophone Africa, protest
 and independence
 G8 protests, Genoa, 2001
 German Democratic Republic protests, 1945–1989

c Lexicon

- Germany, resistance to Nazism
Global Day of Action Against Capitalism,
June 18 (J18), 1999
Global justice movement and resistance Greece, socialism, communism, and the left, 1974–2008
Greenpeace
Grenadian Revolution, 1979–1983
Guadeloupe, labor protest
Guatemala, Democratic Spring, 1944–1954
Guatemala, worker struggles and the labor movement, 1960s–1990s
Guevara, Ernesto “Che” (1928–1967)
Guyana, protests and revolts
Hindu nationalism, Hindutva, and women
Hô Chi Minh (Nguyen Tat Thanh)
(1890–1969)
Hong Kong democracy protests
Huk Rebellion, 1946–1954
Hungary, Revolution of 1956
Immigrant protests, United States, 2000s
Immigrant and social conflict, France
India, armed struggle in the independence movement
India, Great Rebellion of 1857
(the Sepoy Revolt)
Indochina, World War II and liberation in Iran, political and cultural protests,
1844–1914
Iraq, Revolution of 1958
Islamic political currents
Israeli peace movement
Italy, from the new left to the great repression (1962–1981)
Jamaica, independence movement,
1950–present
Japan, resistance to construction of Narita airport
Jewish Bund
Kenya, national protests for independence
Khmer Rouge and Pol Pot
Khomeini, Ayatollah Sayyid Ruhollah
Mussau (1902–1989) and the Shi’ite Islamic Revolution
King, Martin Luther, Jr. (1929–1968)
and the Southern Christian
Leadership Conference (SCLC)
Korea, labor movement, 20th century
Kurdistan nationalist movement and the PKK (Kurdistan Workers’ Party)
La Matanza 1932 Peasant Revolt
Labor revolutionary currents,
United States, 20th century
Lanka Sama Samaja Party (LSSP) and Sri Lankan radicalism Lesbian, gay, transsexual, bisexual movements
Malawi national liberation
Malaysia, protest and revolt
Malta, protest and revolution
Mandela, Nelson (b. 1918)
Mao Zedong (1893–1976)
Maori indigenous resistance
Mau Mau Rebellion, 1952–1959
Mendes, Chico (1944–1988)
and Amazonian rainforest
protest and resistance
Mexico, indigenous and peasant
struggles, 1980s–present
Micronesia, nationalist and labor protests
Movement of Recuperated
Factories, Argentina
Mozambique, worker protests
Music, songs, and protest, France
Mussolini, Benito (1883–1945)
Namibia, struggle for independence
Native American protest, 20th century
Naxalite movement, 1967–1972
Nicaraguan Revolution, 1970s–1980s
Nigeria, protest and revolution,
20th century
Non-violent revolutions
Nordic revolts and popular protests,
1500–present
Pakistan, protest and rebellion
Paraguay, protest and revolt, 1954–1989
Peru, “people’s war,” counterinsurgency,
and the popular movement
Philippines, protests, 1980s–present
Portugal, protest and revolution,
20th century
Prague Spring
Puerto Rican independence movement,
1898–present
Punk movement
Québécois nationalism and
Lévesque, René (1922–1987)
Quit India movement
Reclaim the Streets
Red Brigades
Red Summer, United States, 1919
Romania, protest and revolution,
20th century
Russia, Revolution of October/
November 1917
Salvadoran Civil War, 1980–1991

Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN)
 Saud, Abd al-Aziz ibn (ca. 1880–1953) and the founding of modern Saudi Arabia
 Saya San (Hsaya San) movement of the 1930s
 Serbia, anti-bureaucratic revolution, 1987–1989
 Sexuality and revolution
 Sierra Leone, protest and revolution
 Slovakia, 1944 Uprising
 Solomon Islands, protest and uprisings
 South Africa, labor movement
 Soviet Union, fall of
 Spanish Revolution
 Stalin, Joseph (1879–1953) and “Revolution from Above”
 Student movements, global South
 Sudanese protest under Anglo-Egyptian rule
 Swaziland, nationalist and economic protests
 Syria and Iraq, Baathists
 Taiwan, anti-imperialism and nationalism
 Tajikistan, protests and revolts
 Tamil nationalist struggle for Eelam
 Tanzania, protest and independence
 Thailand, popular movements, 1980s–present
 Tiananmen Square protests, 1989
 Tibet Uprising and resistance
 Trinidad, anti-colonial movement
 Tulip Revolution, Kyrgyzstan
 Turkish republic protests, 1923–1946
 Turkmenistan, protest and revolt
 Uganda, protests against British colonialism and occupation
 Unemployed protests
 Urban rebellions, United States
 Uruguay, left-wing politics from the Tupamaros to the Frente Amplio
 Utopian intentional communities
 Uzbekistan, national movement and protests
 Venezuela, MBR-200 and the military uprisings of 1992
 Vietnam, protest and Second Indochina War, 1960–1974
 Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, 1943
 Women and national liberation in Africa
 Women’s movement, Cuba
 Women’s movement, Latin America

Workers’ self-management, Yugoslavia
 World Social Forums
 World Trade Organization (WTO) protests, Seattle, 1999
 Yugoslavia, anti-fascist “People’s Liberation War” and revolution, 1941–1945
 Zambian nationalism and protests
 Zapatistas, EZLN, and the Chiapas uprising
 Zimbabwe, national liberation movement
 Zionism

Geographic

Global

Anti-war movement, Iraq
 ATTAC (Association for the Taxation of Financial Transactions for the Aid of Citizens)
 Critical Mass
 Eco-anarchism
 Ecological protest movements
 Food Not Bombs, United States
 Food riots
 Garvey, Marcus (1887–1940) and Garveyism
 Global Day of Action Against Capitalism, June 18 (J18), 1999
 Global justice movement and resistance
 Grassroots resistance to corporate globalization
 Green Bans Movement, Australia
 Greenpeace
 Imperialism and capitalist development
 Imperialism, historical evolution
 Imperialism, modernization to globalization
 Indymedia global justice campaign, 2000s
 Infoshops
 International Women’s Day
 International Workers of the World, marine transport workers
 Islamic political currents
 Lesbian, gay, transsexual, bisexual movements
 Marxism
 May 1968 French uprisings
 May Day
 Migration struggles and the global justice movement
 Non-violent movements: foundations and early expressions

- Non-violent movements: struggles for rights, justice, and identities
- Non-violent revolutions
- Peoples' Global Action Network
- Postcolonial feminism and protest
in the global South
- Sexuality and revolution
- Socialism
- Spartacus, historical and modern era
- Student movements
- Student movements, global South
- Unemployed protests
- Vegetarian protests and movements
- Via Campesina and peasant struggles
- World Social Forums
- World Trade Organization
(WTO) protests, Cancun, 2003
- World Trade Organization
(WTO) protests, Doha, 2001
- World Trade Organization
(WTO) protests, Hong Kong, 2005
- World Trade Organization
(WTO) protests, Quebec City, 2001
- World Trade Organization
(WTO) protests, Seattle, 1999
- Young Communist International
- Yugoslavia, formation of the non-aligned movement
- Africa
- Abdurahman, Abdullah (1872–1940)
- Agbekoya Peasant Uprising and Rebellion, 1968–1969
- Aggett, Neil (1954–1982)
- Algerian Islamic Salvation Front
- Algerian National Revolution,
1954–1962
- Anarchism and syndicalism,
Southern Africa
- Angolan national liberation, 1961–1974
- Anti-apartheid movement, South Africa
- Bain, J. T. (1860–1919)
- Barayi, Elijah (1930–1994)
- Ben Bella, Ahmad (b. 1918)
- Botswana, protest and nationalism
- Burkina Faso, Revolution, 1983
- Cabral, Amilcar (1924–1973)
- Cameroon, popular anti-colonial protest
- Cape Verde, independence struggle
- Chilembwe, John (1871–1915)
- Chiluba, Frederick (b. 1943)
- Chimurenga armed struggles
- Chissano, Juaquim (b. 1939)
- Communist Party of South Africa, 1921–1950
- Congo armed insurgency,
Mobutu decamps
- Congo, Brazzaville protest and revolt
- Congo Crisis, 1960–1965
- Congo, Kinshasa protest and revolt
- Congo, protest and uprisings, 1998–2002
- COSATU (Congress of South African Trade Unions)
- Côte d'Ivoire, post-independence protest
- Côte d'Ivoire, pre-independence
protest and liberation
- Dahomey Women's Army
- Dunbar, Andrew (1879–1964)
- Egypt and Arab socialism
- Egypt, Peasant Rebellion of 1824
- Egypt, Revolution of 1952
- Ellis, Daniel Edward "Daan" (1904–1963)
- Ethiopia, Revolution of 1974
- Francophone Africa, protest
and independence
- FRELIMO (Frente de Libertação de Moçambique)
- Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand
(1869–1948)
- Ghana, nationalism and socialist transition
- Gomas, Johnny (1901–1979)
- Guinea-Bissau, nationalist movement
- Hani, Chris (1942–1993)
- Harris, Charles (1896–1939)
- Hasan al-Banna (1906–1949)
and the Muslim Brotherhood
- Ibrahim, Saad Eddin (b. 1938)
- Ife-Modakeke conflict
- James, C. L. R. (1901–1989)
- Kabyl resistance to government
- Kaunda, Kenneth (b. 1924)
- Kenya, national protests for independence
- Kenyatta, Jomo (1893–1978)
- Khama, Seretse (1921–1980)
and Botswana nationalism
- Lesotho, popular protest and resistance
- Liberia, protest and revolution in the modern era
- Lumumba, Patrice (1925–1961)
- Machel, Samora (1933–1986)
- Madagascar, protests and revolts,
19th and 20th centuries
- Mahdist Revolt
- Malawi national liberation
- Mali, protests and uprisings, 1850s–2005
- Mandela, Nelson (b. 1918)

- Maripe, Knight (1927–2006)
 Marks, J. B. (1903–1972)
 Mau Mau Rebellion, 1952–1959
 Mayekiso, Moses (b. 1948)
 Mboya, Tom (1930–1969) and the
 Kenya labor movement
 Mondlane, Eduardo Chivambo
 (1920–1969)
 Morocco, protests, 1600s–1990s
 Mozambique, worker protests
 Mpho, Motsamai (b. 1921)
 MPLA (Movimento Popular de Libertação de Angola)
 Mugabe, Robert (b. 1924)
 Muhammad ‘Ali (1769–1849)
 Mzingeli, Charles (1905–1980)
 Namibia, struggle for independence
 Nasser, Gamal Abdel (1918–1970)
 Négritude movement
 Neto, Augustinho (1922–1979)
 Niger Delta, protest movements
 Nigeria, 1993 political and electoral protest and conflict
 Nigeria, protest and revolution,
 20th century
 Nigeria, separatist agitation, contemporary
 Nkrumah, Kwame (1909–1972)
 Nujoma, Sam (b. 1929)
 Nyerere, Julius (1922–1999)
 Oke-Ogun Uprising
 Paulus, Petrus Jacobus “Arrie” (b. 1930)
 Pinto, Pio Gama (1927–1965)
 Qaddafi, Muammar al- (b. 1942)
 Raditsela, Andries (1956–1985)
 Sachs, Solly (1900–1976)
 Samkange, Stanlake John William
 Thompson (1922–1988)
 São Tomé e Príncipe, labor/nationalists
 Saro-Wiwa, Ken (1941–1995)
 Sembène, Ousmane (1923–2007)
 Senegal, anti-neoliberal protests
 Senghor, Léopold (1906–2001)
 Sierra Leone, protest and revolution
 Sigamoney, Bernard L. E. (1888–1963)
 Simons, Ray Alexander (1913–2004)
 Singh, Makhan (1913–1973)
 Slovo, Joe (1926–1995)
 South Africa, African nationalism and the ANC
 South Africa, labor movement
 South Africa, water struggles
 South African Communist Party,
 1953–present
 Southern Africa, popular resistance to neoliberalism, 1982–2007
 Sudan, Aba Island Rebellion, 1970
 Sudanese protest under Anglo-Egyptian rule
 Sudanese protest in the Turko-Egyptian era
 Sudanese Women’s League
 SWAPO (South West African People’s Organization)
 Swaziland, nationalist and economic protests
 Tambo, Oliver (1917–1993)
 Tanzania, protest and independence
 Toivo ya Toivo, Andimba (b. 1924)
 Treatment Action Campaign (TAC)
 Tunisia, protests under Ottoman
 (Bey) rule to 1881
 Tunisian independence movement Uganda, protests against British colonialism and occupation
Ujamaa villages
 Urabi movement
 Witbooi, Hendrik (ca. 1825–1905)
 Women and national liberation in Africa
 Women’s movement, Southern Africa
 Women’s War of 1929
 Yaa Asantewaa (ca. 1840–1921)
 Yoruba Wars, 19th century
 Zambian nationalism and protests
 Zanzibar Revolution
 Zimbabwe, labor movement and politics, 1980–2007
 Zimbabwe, labor movement, 1890–1980
 Zimbabwe, national liberation
 movement
 Zimbabwe People’s Army (ZIPA)
 Zwane, Ambrose Phesheya (1922–1998)
- Asia
 Ambedkar, B. R. (1891–1956)
 Anarchism, China
 Anarchism, Japan
 Anarchism, Korea
 Anti-nuclear movement, Japan
 April Revolution, Nepal, 2006
 Aung San (1915–1947)
 Bangladesh, struggle for liberation, 1971
 Bengal, popular uprisings and
 movements in the colonial era
 Bose, Subhas Chandra (1897–1945)
 Burma, national movement against
 British colonial rule

- Cambodia, anti-colonial protests, 1863–1945
- Cambodia, communist protests and revolution
- Central Asian protest movements
- Chen Duxiu (1879–1942)
- China, Maoism and popular power, 1949–1969
- China, protest and revolution, 1800–1911
- China, student protests, 20th century
- Chinese Communist Revolution, 1925–1949
- Chinese Nationalist Revolution, 1911
- Dalit liberation struggles
- Deng Xiaoping (1904–1997)
- East Timor, anti-colonial struggle, 1974 to independence
- Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand (1869–1948)
- Gunawardena, Don Philip Rupasinghe (1901–1972)
- Hindu nationalism, Hindutva, and women
- Hô Chi Minh (Nguyen Tat Thanh) (1890–1969)
- Hong Kong democracy protests
- Huk Rebellion, 1946–1954
- India, armed struggle in the independence movement
- India, civil disobedience movement and demand for independence
- India, Great Rebellion of 1857 (the Sepoy Revolt)
- India, Hindutva and fascist mobilizations, 1989–2002
- India, nationalism, extremist
- India, non-violent non-cooperation movement, 1918–1929
- Indian national liberation
- Indigo Rebellion
- Indochina, World War II and liberation in
- Indonesia, colonial protests, 16th century to 1900
- Indonesian revolution and counterrevolution
- Iqbal, Muhammad (1877–1938)
- Japan, labor protest, 1945–present
- Japan, pacifist movement, 1945–present
- Japan, post-World War II protest movements
- Japan, protest and revolt, 1800–1945
- Japan, resistance to construction of Narita airport
- Jinnah, Muhammad Ali (1876–1948)
- Kashmir, under India
- Khmer Rouge and Pol Pot
- Khuda-i Khidmatgar: Pashtun non-violent resistance force (1929–1948)
- Korea, labor movement, 20th century
- Korea, popular rebellions and uprisings, 1492–1910
- Korea, post-World War II popular movements for democracy
- Kwangju student uprising
- Lanka Sama Samaja Party (LSSP) and Sri Lankan radicalism
- Laos, protest and revolution, 19th and 20th centuries
- Liu Shaoqi (1898–1969)
- Lu Xun (1881–1936)
- Malaysia, protest and revolt
- Mao Zedong (1893–1976)
- Meilidao protests, 1978
- Ming Rebellions, 1600s
- Moplah Revolts
- Moro national liberation
- Narayan, Jayaprakash (1902–1979)
- Naxalite movement, 1967–1972
- Nehru, Jawaharlal (1889–1964)
- Nepal, Maoists' rise
- Nepal, people's war and Maoists
- Nepal, protest movements, 19th and 20th centuries
- Peng Dehuai (1898–1974)
- People's Liberation Front of Sri Lanka (JVP)
- Philippines, colonial protests during the Spanish era
- Philippines, protest during the US era
- Philippines, protests, 1980s–present
- Qu Qiubai (1899–1935)
- Quit India movement
- Rampa rebellions in Andhra Pradesh
- Roy, Manabendra Nath (1887–1954)
- Santal Rebellion
- Saya San (Hsaya San) movement of the 1930s
- Sihanouk, Norodom (b. 1922)
- Singh, Bhagat (1907–1931)
- Sohyo
- Student movements, Korea
- Sun Yat-Sen (1866–1925)
- Taiping Rebellion, 1851–1864
- Taiwan, anti-imperialism and nationalism
- Taiwan, land reform
- Taiwan, 2-28 protests, 1947
- Tajikistan, protests and revolts

- Tamil nationalist struggle for Eelam
 Thai Communist Party
 Thailand, Patani Malay nationalism
 Thailand, popular movements, 1980s–present
 Tiananmen Square protests, 1989
 Tianjin Massacre, 1870
 Tibet Uprising and resistance
 Tulip Revolution, Kyrgyzstan
 Turkmenistan, protest and revolt
 Uzbekistan, national movement and protests
 Vietnam, anti-colonial, nationalist, and communist movements, 1900–1939
 Vietnam, First Indochina War, 1945–1954
 Vietnam, protest against colonialism, 1858–1896
 Vietnam, protest and Second Indochina War, 1960–1974
 Vietnam, protests, 1975–1993
 Vo Nguyen Giap (b. 1911)
 Wang Ming (1904–1974)
 Women’s movement, India
 Women’s movement, Japan
 World Trade Organization (WTO) protests, Hong Kong, 2005
 Yi Ho Tuan (Boxer) Rebellion
 Zenroren Labor Federation
 Zhang Guotao (1897–1979)
 Zhou Enlai (1898–1976)
 Zhu De (1886–1976)
- Eastern and Central Europe
 Albania, socialism
 Albanian nationalism
 Anabaptist movement
 Anarchism, Hungary
 Anarchism, Russia
 Anti-fascist People’s Front
 Armenia, mass protest and popular mobilization, 1980s to present
 Austria, 20th-century protests
 Bakunin, Mikhail Alexandrovich (1814–1876)
 Balkan socialist confederation, 1910–1948
 Baltic protests in the 20th century
 Benjamin, Walter (1892–1940)
 Bolsheviks
 Brecht, Bertolt (1899–1956)
 Bukharin, Nikolai Ivanovich (1888–1938)
 Bulgaria, anti-Soviet movements
 Bulgaria, 20th-century leftist and workers’ movements
 Castoriadis, Cornelius (1922–1997)
 Color revolutions
 Communist Party, Germany
 Cyprus, protest and revolt
 Czechoslovakia, resistance to Soviet political and economic rule
 Decembrists to the rise of Russian Marxism
 Dubček, Alexander (1921–1992)
 Dutschke, Rudi (1940–1979)
 Eisenstein, Sergei (1898–1948)
 Engels, Friedrich (1820–1895)
 Ethnic and nationalist revolts in the Hapsburg Empire, 1500–1848
 European revolutions of 1848
 Feuchtwanger, Lion (1884–1958)
 Frankfurt School (Jewish émigrés)
 G8 protests, Heiligendamm, June 2007
 German Democratic Republic protests, 1945–1989
 German Peasant Rebellion, 1525
 German Revolution, 1918–1923
 Germany, socialism and nationalism
 Global Day of Action Against the IMF and World Bank, Prague, September 26 (S26), 2000
 Gorbachev, Mikhail (b. 1931)
 Grass, Gunter (b. 1927)
 Greece, anti-dictatorship protests
 Greece, partisan resistance
 Greece, socialism, communism, and the left, 1850–1974
 Greek nationalism
 Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich (1770–1831)
 Hitler, Adolf (1889–1945) and German Nazism
 Hungary, protests, 1815–1920
 Hungary, Revolution of 1848
 Hungary, Revolution of 1956
 Jabotinsky, Vladimir (Ze’ev) (1880–1940) and revisionist Zionism
 Jewish Bund
 Jewish resistance to Nazism
 Jews and revolution in Europe, 1789–1919
 Kautsky, Karl (1854–1938)
 Kollontai, Alexandra (1872–1952)
 Kosovo, civil and armed resistance, 1990s
 Kronstadt Mutiny of 1921
 Kropotkin, Peter (1842–1921)

- Kurdistan nationalist movement and the PKK (Kurdistan Workers' Party)
 Landauer, Gustav (1870–1919)
 Lenin, Vladimir Ilyich (1870–1924)
 Lesbian, gay, transsexual, bisexual movements, Germany
 Liebknecht, Karl (1871–1919)
 Luther, Martin (1483–1546)
 Luxemburg, Rosa (1870–1919)
 Makhno, Nestor (1889–1934)
 Marx, Karl (1818–1883)
 Masaryk, Tomas (1850–1937)
Mein Kampf
 Michnik, Adam (b. 1946)
 Milosz, Czeslaw (1911–2004)
 Müntzer, Thomas (ca. 1489–1525)
 Nagy, Imre (1896–1957)
 Nietzsche, Friedrich (1844–1900)
 Pilsudski, Józef (1867–1935)
 Poland, Committee for Workers (KOR)
 Poland, 1956 Uprising
 Poland, revolutions, 1846–1863
 Poland, trade unions and protest, 1988–1993
 Polish Revolution (Sejm), 1788–1792
 Polish Revolution, 1905–1907
 Poulantzas, Nicos (1936–1979)
 Prague Spring
 Pugachev's Rebellion, 1773–1775
 Romania, protest and revolution, 20th century
 Romania, protests and revolts, 18th and 19th centuries
 Russia, cholera riots of 1830–1831
 Russia, Revolution of 1905–1907
 Russia, Revolution of February/March 1917
 Russia, Revolution of October/November 1917
 Russia, Revolutions: sources and contexts
 Russian Civil War, 1918–1924
 Russian revolutionary labor upsurge, 1912–1914
 Serbia, anti-bureaucratic revolution, 1987–1989
 Shlyapnikov, Alexander Gavrilovich (1885–1937)
 Silesian Uprisings
 Slovakia, 1944 Uprising
 Solidarność (Solidarity)
 Soviet Union, fall of
 Spiridonova, Maria (1884–1941)
 Stalin, Joseph (1879–1953) and "Revolution from Above"
 Student movement, Greece, 1990–1991
 Student movements, Czechoslovakia, 1960s
 Student movements, Europe
 Sturm und Drang
 Syndicalism, Greece
 Tito, Josip Broz (1892–1980)
 Trotsky, Leon (1879–1940)
 Turkey, anti-secular protest, 1980–present
 Turkey, protest and revolution, 1800s–1923
 Turkey, working-class protest, 1960–1980
 Turkish rebellions, 1918–1925
 Turkish republic protests, 1923–1946
 Ukraine Orange Revolution, 2004–2005
 Union for Women's Equality
 Velvet Revolution, 1989
 Walesa, Lech (b. 1943)
 War communism and the rise of the Soviet Union
 Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, 1943
 West German "new left"
 White Rose (Weiße Rose)
 Women in the 1848 Revolution, Poland
 Women in the Russian Revolution
 Women in the Solidarity movement, Polish underground
 Women's movement, Germany
 Women's movement, Greece, formation of
 Women's movement, Soviet Union
 Women's movements, Eastern Europe
 Workers' self-management, Yugoslavia
 Yugoslavia, anti-fascist "People's Liberation War" and revolution, 1941–1945
 Yugoslavia, anti-privatization struggles
 Zasulich, Vera (1849–1919)
 Zetkin, Clara (1857–1933)
 Žižek, Slavoj (b. 1949)
- Latin America and the Caribbean
 Agüeybaná (d. 1510) and Agüeybaná II (d. 1511)
 Alves, Margarida Maria (1943–1983)
 Anarchism, Argentina
 Anarchism, Chile
 Andresote and the Revolt against the Guipuzcoana (1731–1733)

- Arbenz, Jacobo Guzmán (1913–1971)
 Argentina, armed struggle and guerilla organizations, 1960s–1970s
 Argentina, general strike (Semana Trágica), 1919
 Argentina, human rights movement
 Argentina, indigenous popular protests
 Argentina, labor strikes of 1890 and 1902
 Argentina, labor unions and protests of the unemployed, 1990s
 Argentina, Semana Roja, 1909
 Argentina, social and political protest, 2001–2007
 Argentina, socialist and communist workers' movement
 Aristide, Jean-Bertrand (b. 1953)
 Banana Plantation Worker Rebellion, 1928
 Barbados and the Windward Islands, protest and revolt
 Belize, national independence movement
Bogotazo and La Violencia
 Bolivarianism, Venezuela
 Bolivia, protest and repression, 1964–2000
 Bolivia, War of the Pacific to the National Revolution, 1879–1952
 Bolivian neoliberalism, social mobilization, and revolution from below, 2003 and 2005
 Brazil, guerilla movements, 20th century
 Brazil, labor struggles
 Brazil, peasant movements and liberation theology
 Brazil, rebellions from independence to the republic (1700s–1889)
 Brazil, workers and the left: Partido dos Trabalhadores and Central Única dos Trabalhadores
 Cabanagem of Grão-Pará, Brazil, 1835–1840
 Canudos, religion and rebellion in 19th-century Brazil
Caracazo, 1989
 Caribbean protest music
 Carney, James Francis “Guadalupe” (1925–1983?)
 Casa del Obrero Mundial
 Castro, Fidel (b. 1926)
 Central America, music and resistance
 Chávez, César (1927–1993) and the United Farm Workers
 Chávez, Hugo (b. 1954)
 Chile and the peaceful road to socialism
 Chile, people's power
 Chile, popular resistance against Pinochet
 Chile, social and political struggles, 1850–1970
Cocaleros peasant uprising
 Cochabamba Water Wars
 Colombia, armed insurgency, peasant self-defense, and radical popular movements, 1960s–1970s
 Colombia, armed insurgency, peasant self-defense, and radical popular movements, 1970s–1990s
 Colombia, indigenous mobilization
 Colombia, Thousand Days' War, 1899–1902
 Colombia, unions, strikes, and anti-neoliberal opposition, 1990–2005
 Cordobazo and Rosariazo Uprising, 1969
 Costa Rican Civil War and Uprising, 1948
 Cristero uprising, Mexico, 1928
 Cuauhtémoc (1502–1525)
 Cuba, anti-racist movement and the Partido Independiente de Color
 Cuba, struggle for independence from Spain, 1868–1898
 Cuban post-revolutionary protests
 Cuban Revolution, 1953–1959
 Cuban revolutionary government
 Daquilema, Fernando (d. 1872) and the 1871 Uprising, Ecuador
 Demerara Slave Rebellion, 1823
 Dessalines, Jean-Jacques (1758–1806)
 Dominican Republic, protest and resistance to US imperialism, 1916–1962
 Dominican Republic, protests, 1844–1915
 Dominican Republic, resistance to military and US invasion, 1963–1965
 Dutch Caribbean, protest and revolution, 1815–2000
 Ecuador, protest and revolution
 Ejército de Liberación Nacional, Colombia
El Argentinaazo: December 19 and 20, 2001
 EPR (Ejército Popular Revolucionario)
 Ezeiza Protest and Massacre, 1973
 Farabundo Martí National Liberation Front (FMLN)
 FARC (Revolutionary Armed Forces and Popular Liberation Army)
 FPMR (Frente Patriótico Manuel Rodríguez)
 Freire, Paulo (1921–1997)
 French Caribbean in the Age of Revolution

- French Guiana, ecological movements against the Guiana
 Space Center in Kourou
- French Guiana, political movements
 against departmentalization
- Gaitán, Jorge Eliécer (1898–1948),
 UNIR, and revolutionary
 populism in Colombia
- Grandmothers of the Plaza de Mayo
- Grenadian Revolution, 1979–1983
- Grove Vallejo, Marmaduke (1879–1954)
- Guadeloupe, labor protest
- Guaicaipuro (ca. 1530–1568)
- Guatemala, popular rebellion and civil war
- Guatemala, worker struggles and the labor movement, 1960s–1990s
- Guevara, Ernesto “Che” (1928–1967)
- Guyana, protests and revolts
- Haiti, democratic uprising, 1980s–1991
- Haiti, resistance to US occupation
- Haiti, revolutionary revolts, 1790s
- Haiti, revolutionary struggles
- Haiti, Saint-Domingue and revolutionary France
- Haitian Revolution and independence,
 1801–1804
- Haya de la Torre, Victor Raúl (1895–1979)
- Hidalgo y Costilla, Miguel (1753–1811)
- HIJOS movement, Children of the Disappeared
- Jamaica, independence movement,
 1950–present
- Jamaica, peasant uprisings, 19th century
- Jamaica, rebellion and resistance, 1760–1834
- Juan Santos Atahualpa Rebellion
- Katarismo and indigenous popular mobilization, Bolivia, 1970s–present
- La Ceiba Uprising of 1924
- Latin America, Catholic Church and liberation, 16th century to present
- Latin American punk rock and protest
- Machado, popular Cuban anti-government struggle, 1930s
- Madres de la Plaza de Mayo
- Magón, Ricardo Flores (1874–1922) and the Magonistas
- Manley, Michael (1924–1997)
- Mariátegui, José Carlos (1894–1930)
- Marighella, Carlos (1911–1969) and the Brazilian urban guerilla movement
- Mármol, Miguel (1905–1993)
- Martí, Farabundo (1893–1932)
- Mendes, Chico (1944–1988)
 and Amazonian rainforest protest and resistance
- Mexican Revolution of 1910–1921
- Mexico, indigenous and peasant
 struggles, 1980s–present
- Mexico, labor movement and protests, 1980–2005
- Movement of Recuperated
 Factories, Argentina
- Movimento Sem Terra (MST)
- MRTA (Movimiento Revolucionario
 Túpac Amaru)
- Muralista movement
- Music and protest, Latin America
- Nicaraguan Revolution, 1970s–1980s
- Oaxaca uprising, 2006
- Obregón, Alvaro (1880–1928) and
 the Sonoran generation
- Ogé’s Revolt, 1790
- Palmares Slave Revolts, 1602–1603
- Paraguay, popular resistance to the rise of the military (1936–1954)
- Paraguay, protest in the post-Stroessner era
- Paraguay, protest and revolt, 1954–1989
- Peronist resistance
- Peru, neoliberalism and social mobilization, 1990s–2000s
- Peru, “people’s war,” counterinsurgency,
 and the popular movement
- Prestes, Luís Carlos (1898–1990)
 and Prestes, Olga Benário (1908–1942)
- Puerto Rican independence movement,
 1898–present
- Queen Nanny and Maroon resistance
- Salvadoran Civil War, 1980–1991
- Silva, Luiz Inácio Lula da (b. 1945)
- Toussaint Louverture and the Haitian
 Revolution, 1796–1799
- Trinidad, anti-colonial movement
- Túpac Amaru (1540–1572)
- Uruguay, labor and populist movements, 1965–present
- Uruguay, left-wing politics from the Tupamaros to the Frente Amplio
- Velasco Alvarado, Juan Francisco
 (1910–1977)
- Venezuela, exclusionary democracy
 and resistance, 1958–1998
- Venezuela, guerilla movements,
 1960s–1980s

- Venezuela, MAS and Causa Radical
 Venezuela, MBR-200 and the military uprisings of 1992
 Venezuela, solidarity economy, social property, co-management, and workers' control
 Venezuelan War of Independence
 Via Campesina and peasant struggles
 Villa, Pancho (ca. 1878–1923) and the division of the North
 Williams, Eric (1911–1981)
 Women's movement, Anglophone Caribbean
 Women's movement, Cuba
 Women's movement, French Windward Islands
 Women's movement, Haiti
 Women's movement, Latin America
 Women's movement, Venezuela
 World Trade Organization (WTO) protests, Cancun, 2003
 Zamora, Ezequiel (1817–1860)
 Zapata, Emiliano (1879–1919) and the Comuna Morelense
 Zapatistas, EZLN, and the Chiapas uprising
 Zumbi (ca. 1655–1695)
- Middle East
 Afghanistan, 1978 Revolution and Islamic Civil War
 Afghanistan, resistance to 19th-century British invasion
 al-Sanusi, Muhammad ibn Ali (ca. 1787–1859)
 Arab left and socialist movements, 1861–1930
 Arafat, Yasser (1929–2004), Fatah, and the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO)
 Bacha-i Sakkao's movement
 Barzani, Mulla Mustafa al- (1903–1979)
 Begin, Menachem (1913–1992) and the Irgun
 Ben-Gurion, David (1866–1973) and the Haganah
 Bin Laden, Osama (b. 1957) and al-Qaeda
 Black September
 Cedar Revolution, Lebanon
 Durrani empire, popular protests, 1747–1823
 Fahd, Yusuf Salman Yusuf (1901–1949)
 Faiz Ahmed Faiz (1911–1984)
 Hamas: origins and development
 Hezbollah: organization and uprisings
 Intifada I and Intifada II
 Iran, Kurdish national autonomy movement
 Iran, the Mossadegh era: democratic socialists and the US-backed coup
 Iran, political and cultural protests, 1844–1914
 Iranian Revolution, 1979
 Iraq, anti-British nationalists
 Iraq, protest, rebellion, and revolution: overview
 Iraq, Revolt of 1920
 Iraq, Revolution of 1958
 Iraqi resistance, 1991–2007
 Israeli peace movement
 Israeli settlers movement
 Jalib, Habib (1928–1993)
 Khomeini, Ayatollah Sayyid Ruhollah Mussaui (1902–1989) and the Shi'ite Islamic Revolution
 Lebanese insurrection of 1958
 Lebanon, civil war, 1975–1990
 Lebanon, 19th-century revolts
 Mossadegh, Mohammad (1881–1967)
 Nasir, Hassan (1928–1960)
 Nasrallah, Sayed Hassan (b. 1960)
 Pakistan, Bengali nationalist struggles
 Pakistan, protest and rebellion
 Roshaniya movement and the Khan Rebellion
 Salam 'Adel (1924–1963) and the Communist Party, Iraq
 Saud, Abd al-Aziz ibn (ca. 1880–1953) and the founding of modern Saudi Arabia
 Syria and Iraq, Baathists
 Taliban, 1996–2007
Wathbah of 1948
 World Trade Organization (WTO) protests, Doha, 2001
 Yemen Socialist Revolution of 1962
- North America
 Abalone Alliance
 Abu Jamal, Mumia (b. 1954)
 ACT UP
 Addams, Jane (1860–1935)
 African American resistance, Jim Crow era
 African American resistance, Reconstruction era
 African Blood Brotherhood

- Alcatraz Uprising and the American Indian Movement
- Alinsky, Saul (1909–1972) and the Industrial Areas Foundation
- Amana Inspirationist Utopians
- American Civil War (1861–1864)
- American left and Howard Zinn (b. 1922)
- American Revolution of 1776
- American slave rebellions
- Anarchism, Canada
- Anarchism in the United States to 1945
- Anarchism in the United States,
1946–present
- Anthony, Susan B. (1820–1906)
- Anti-slavery movement, United States, 1700–1870
- Anti-Vietnam War movement,
United States
- Aptheker, Herbert (1915–1903)
- Atlantic port seaman resistance,
American Revolutionary era
- Berkeley Free Speech Movement
- Black Panthers
- Bonus Army Unemployed
Movement, 1932
- Boston Tea Party
- Bread and Puppet Theater
- Bread and Roses Strike
- Brown, H. Rap (b. 1943)
- Brown, John (1800–1859)
- Canada, indigenous resistance
- Canada, labor protests
- Canada, law and public protest: history
- Canada, Rebellion of 1837–1838
- Carmichael, Stokely/Kwame Turé
(1941–1998)
- Carson, Rachel (1907–1964)
- Catholic Worker movement
- Chomsky, Noam (b. 1928)
- Civil rights, United States: overview
- Clayoquot Sound
- Commoner, Barry (b. 1917)
- Communist Party of the United States of America (CPUSA)
- Concordia University student protests
- Cooperative Commonwealth
- Cop Watch Los Angeles
- CORE (Congress of Racial Equality)
- Crazy Horse (1849–1877), Sitting Bull
(1831–1890), and Native American resistance at the Battle of Little Bighorn
- Cuffe, Paul (1759–1817)
- Davis, Angela (b. 1944)
- Day, Dorothy (1897–1980)
- Debs, Eugene (1855–1926)
- Dix, Dorothea (1802–1887)
- Douglass, Frederick (1817–1895)
- Du Bois, W. E. B. (1868–1963)
- Environmental protest, United States, 19th century
- Evers, Medgar (1925–1963)
- Farm Labor Organizing Committee
- Flynn, Elizabeth Gurley (1890–1964)
- Fox, George (1624–1691)
- Freedom Rides
- Freedom Summer
- Friedan, Betty (1921–2006)
- Galleani, Luigi (1861–1931)
- Garrison, William Lloyd (1805–1879)
- Goldman, Emma (1869–1940)
- Greencorn Rebellion, Oklahoma, 1917
- Grimké, Angelina (1805–1879)
and Sarah (1792–1873)
- Harlem Renaissance
- Hawaii, resistance to US invasion
and occupation
- Haymarket tragedy
- Haywood, Big Bill (1869–1928)
- Hollywood Ten
- Hutchinson, Anne (1591–1643)
- Immigrant protests, United States, 2000s
- Industrial Workers of the World (IWW)
- Jackson, Jesse (b. 1941)
- Kent State student uprising
- King, Martin Luther, Jr. (1929–1968)
and the Southern Christian
Leadership Conference (SCLC)
- Knights of Labor and Terence
Powderly (1849–1924)
- Labor revolutionary currents,
United States, 1775–1900
- Labor revolutionary currents,
United States, 20th century
- La Matanza* 1932 Peasant Revolt
- League of Revolutionary Black Workers
- Lesbian, gay, transsexual, bisexual
movements, United States
- Lincoln, Abraham (1809–1865)
and African Americans
- London, Jack (1876–1916)
- Lowell Female Labor Reform Association
- Malcolm X (1925–1965)
- Masses, The*
- Mother Jones (1837–1930)
- Nat Turner Rebellion

- National Organization for Women (NOW)
 Native American protest, 20th century
 Non-interventionists, 1914–1945
 Oka crisis
 Ontario Coalition Against Poverty (OCAP)
 On-to-Ottawa Trek
 Paine, Thomas (1737–1809)
 Palmer Raids
 Parks, Rosa (1913–2005) and the Montgomery Bus Boycott
 Paul, Alice (1885–1977)
 Prince Edward Island protests, 1830s
 Québécois nationalism and Lévesque, René (1922–1987)
 Radical Reconstruction, United States, promise and failure of Randolph, A. Phillip (1889–1979)
 Red Summer, United States, 1919
 Regina Riot
 Revolutionary Action Movement
 Robeson, Paul (1898–1976)
 Sacco and Vanzetti case
 Sanger, Margaret (1879–1966) and the American birth control movement
 Saskatchewan socialist movement
 Scottsboro Resistance
 Seneca Falls convention
 Shakers Utopian Community
 Sharp, Gene (b. 1928)
 Shays' Rebellion
 Slave rescues and the Underground Railroad, United States
 Socialist Party, United States
 Sojourner Truth Organization
 Stanton, Elizabeth Cady (1815–1902)
 Steinem, Gloria (b. 1934)
 Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC)
 Students for a Democratic Society (SDS)
 Sylvis, William H. (1829–1869) and the National Labor Union
 Triangle Shirtwaist fire protests
 Tubman, Harriet (ca. 1819–1913)
 Uhuru movement
 Urban rebellions, United States
 US labor rebellions and the rise of the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO)
 Utopian communities, United States
 Vesey's Rebellion
 Washington, George (1732–1799)
 Wells, Ida B. (1862–1931) and the anti-lynching campaign
 Whiskey Rebellion
 Woman's Christian Temperance Union
 Women's movement, United States, 16th–18th centuries
 Women's movement, United States, 19th century
 Women's movement, United States, 20th century
 Woodhull, Victoria (1838–1927)
 World Anti-Slavery Convention, London
 World Trade Organization (WTO) protests, Quebec City, 2001
 World Trade Organization (WTO) protests, Seattle, 1999
 Wright, Frances "Fanny" (1795–1852)
- Oceania
 Aboriginal/left struggle for land rights
 Anarchism, Australia
 Anarchism, New Zealand
 Australia, anti-war movement
 Australia, new social movements
 Australian aboriginal protests
 Australian labor movement
 Australian left
 Communist Party of Australia
 Communist Party NZ and the New Zealand revolutionary left
 Eureka Stockade
 Fiji, parliamentary insurrection
 French Polynesia, protest movements
 Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), Australia
 Kelly, Edward "Ned" (1855–1880) and the Kelly Gang
 Labor's Volunteer Army
 Lalor, Peter (1827–1889)
 Lesbian, gay, transsexual, bisexual movements, Australia
 Maori indigenous resistance
 Micronesia, nationalist and labor protests
 Munday, Jack (b. 1929)
 New Australia movement
 New Caledonia, protest and revolt
 Nuclear-Free New Zealand, 1987
 Solomon Islands, protest and uprisings
 Springbok rugby tour protests, 1981
 Vanuatu, land reform protests
 Vinegar Hill/Castle Hill Rebellion, 1804
 Women's movement, Australia

Western Europe and Nordic Countries

- Abraham Lincoln Brigade
- Adorno, Theodor W. (1903–1969)
- Anarchism, Britain
- Anarchism, France
- Anarchism, Italy
- Anarchism, Spain
- Anti-Corn Law agitation, Britain, 19th century
- Anti-fascist People's Front
- Anti-Franco worker struggles, 1939–1975
- Anti-monarchy protests, Portugal
- Anti-slavery movement, Britain
- Anti-war movement, France, 20th century
- Asturias Uprising, October 1934
- Babeuf, François-Noël (1760–1797) and the Conspiracy of Equals
- Belgium, 20th-century political conflict
- Berlinguer, Enrico (1922–1984)
- Biennio Rosso (1919–1920)
- Blanqui, Louis Auguste (1805–1881)
- Bonaparte, Louis-Napoleon (1808–1873)
- Bonaparte, Napoleon (1769–1821)
- Bordiga, Amadeo (1889–1970) and the Italian Communist Party
- Bourses du Travail
- Bread Riots, Britain, 1795
- Brissot, Jacques Pierre (1754–1793)
- Britain, Renaissance-era conflict
- Britain, trade union movement
- Britain, women's suffrage campaign
- Catalan protests against centralism
- Catholic emancipation
- Chartists
- Confederación Nacional del Trabajo (CNT)
- Confédération Générale du Travail and Syndicaliste Révolutionnaire
- Corsican independence movement
- Counterrevolution, France, 1789–1830
- Cromwell, Oliver (1599–1658)
- Debord, Guy (1931–1994) and the Spectacle
- Denmark, insurrection and revolt
- De Valera, Eamon (1882–1975)
- Diderot, Denis (1713–1784)
- Disobbedienti/Tute Bianche
- Earth First!
- Easter Rising and the Irish Civil War
- Eighteenth Brumaire
- English Revolution, radical sects
- Enlightenment, France, 18th century
- European revolutions of 1848
- European Union Summit protests, Gothenburg, 2001
- Federación Anarquista Ibérica (FAI)
- Fifth Monarchist women
- France, 1830 Revolution
- France, post-World War II labor protests
- France, resistance to Nazism
- France, Revolution of 1848
- French Revolution, 1789–1794
- Fronde, France, 1648–1653
- G8 protests, Genoa, 2001
- Glorious Revolution, Britain, 1688
- Godwin, William (1756–1836)
- Gramsci, Antonio (1891–1937)
- Gustav Rebellions
- Immigrant and social conflict, France
- Ireland, Age of Revolutions, 1775–1803
- Irish nationalism
- Irish revolts, 1400–1790
- Italian labor movement
- Italian Risorgimento
- Italy, from the anti-fascist resistance to the new left (1945–1960)
- Italy, from the new left to the great repression (1962–1981)
- Italy, operaism and post-operaism
- Jacobite risings, Britain, 1715 and 1745
- Jewish resistance to Nazism
- Lafayette, Marquis de (1757–1834)
- Lilburne, John (1615–1657)
- Malatesta, Errico (1853–1932)
- Malta, protest and revolution
- Marat, Jean-Paul (1743–1793)
- Marcuse, Herbert (1898–1979)
- May 1968 French uprisings
- Mazzini, Giuseppe (1805–1872)
- Michel, Louise (1830–1905)
- Morris, William (1834–1896)
- Mujeres Libres
- Music, songs, and protest, France
- Mussolini, Benito (1883–1945)
- Netherlands, protests, 1800–2000
- Newport rising, Wales, 1839
- Nin, Andreu (1892–1937)
- Nordic revolts and popular protests, 1500–present
- Norway, protest and revolution
- O'Connell, Daniel (1775–1847)
- O'Connor, Arthur (1763–1852)
- Owen, Robert (1771–1858)
- Paisley, Ian (b. 1926) and Unionism, Northern Ireland

Pamphleteering and political protest,
 Dutch Republic, 1672
 Paris Commune, 1871
 Parnell, Charles Stewart (1846–1891)
 Portugal, protest and revolution,
 20th century
 POUM (Workers' Party of Marxist Unification)
 Proudhon, Pierre Joseph (1809–1865)
 Reclus, Elisée (1830–1905)
 Red Brigades
 Red Scotland and the Scottish radical left, 1880–1932
 Reform Acts, Britain and Ireland, 1832
 Reformation
 Resistenza
 Robespierre, Maximilien de (1758–1794)
 Rousseau, Jean-Jacques (1712–1778)
 Sánchez Saornil, Lucía (1895–1970)
 Sands, Bobby (1954–1981)
 Serrati, Giacinto Menotti (1872–1926)
 Settimana Rossa
 Sieyès, Abbé (1748–1836)
 Sinn Féin
 Smith, Adam (1723–1790)
 Socialism, Britain
 Spanish Revolution
 Student movements, Europe
 Swing Riots
 Syndicalism, France
 Thistlewood, Arthur (1774–1820)
 and the Cato Street Conspiracy
 Thompson, Edward Palmer (E. P.)
 (1924–1993)
 Togliatti, Palmiro (1893–1964)
 Voltaire (1694–1778)
 Wales, nationalist protest, 19th century
 Wesley, John (1703–1791), Methodism,
 and social reform
 Wilberforce, William (1759–1833)
 Wilkes, John (1725–1797) and the “Wilkes and Liberty” movement
 Wollstonecraft, Mary (1759–1797)
 Women's movement, Britain
 Women's movement, France
 Women's movement, Italy
 Women's movement, Spain
 World Anti-Slavery Convention, London
 Yorkshire Rising, 1820
 Young Ireland
 Zola, Emile (1840–1902)
 Zwingli, Huldrych (1484–1531)

Thematic

Abolitionism and Civil Rights, Global
 Ambedkar, B. R. (1891–1956)
 Amo, Anton Wilhelm (1703–1759)
 and Afro-Germans
 Andresote and the Revolt against the
 Guipuzcoana (1731–1733)
 Anti-apartheid movement, South Africa
 Anti-slavery movement, Britain
 Anti-slavery movement, British, and the black response to colonization Anti-slavery movement, British, and the founding of Sierra Leone
 Argentina, human rights movement
 Barbados and the Windward Islands,
 protest and revolt
 Benezet, Anthony (1713–1784)
 Bishop, Maurice (1944–1983)
 Black Panthers
Bogotazo and La Violencia
 Bolivia, War of the Pacific to the National
 Revolution, 1879–1952
 Brazil, peasant movements and liberation theology
 Bread and Roses Strike
 Brissot, Jacques Pierre (1754–1793)
 Britain, post-World War II political protest
 Brixton Riots, 1981
 Bussa (d. 1816) and the Barbados slave insurrection
 Cabanagem of Grão-Pará, Brazil, 1835–1840
 Chirinos, José Leonardo (d. 1796)
 Clarkson, Thomas (1760–1846)
 Colombia, Afro-Colombian movements and anti-racist protests
 Cuba, anti-racist movement and the Partido Independiente de Color
 Cuba, struggle for independence
 from Spain, 1868–1898
 Curaçao, 1969 uprising
 Dalit liberation struggles
 Demerara Slave Rebellion, 1823
 Dessalines, Jean-Jacques (1758–1806)
 Dominican Republic, protests, 1844–1915
 English Revolution, radical sects
 Enlightenment, France, 18th century
 Equiano, Olaudah (1745–1797)
 Fox, Charles James (1749–1806)
 France, Revolution of 1848
 French Caribbean in the Age of Revolution
 French Guiana, indigenous rebellions

Garvey, Marcus (1887–1940)
 and Garveyism
 Gouges, Olympe de (1745–1793)
 Haiti, revolutionary revolts, 1790s
 Haiti, revolutionary struggles
 Haiti, Saint-Domingue and revolutionary France
 Haitian Revolution and independence,
 1801–1804
 Hyde, Evan Anthony (b. 1947)
 Jamaica, independence movement,
 1950–present
 Jamaica, peasant uprisings, 19th century
 Jamaica, rebellion and resistance,
 1760–1834
 Leeward Islands, labor protests
 Mackandal, François (d. 1758)
 Morant Bay Rebellion: overview and assessment
 Négritude movement
 Notting Hill Riots, 1958
 Ogé’s Revolt, 1790
 Ontario Coalition Against Poverty (OCAP)
 Palmares Slave Revolts, 1602–1603
 Queen Nanny and Maroon resistance
 Rodney, Walter (1942–1980)
 Sharp, Granville (1735–1813)
 Shipboard insurrections in the Atlantic slave trade
 Spartacus, historical and modern era
 Student movements, global South
 Toussaint Louverture and the Haitian
 Revolution, 1796–1799
 Trinidad, anti-colonial movement
 Venezuela, MBR–200 and the military uprisings of 1992
 Venezuela, Negro Miguel
 Rebellion, 1552
 Venezuelan War of Independence
 Wesley, John (1703–1791), Methodism,
 and social reform
 Wilberforce, William (1759–1833)
 Women’s movement, French
 Windward Islands
 Women’s movement, Haiti
 Women’s movement, Southern Africa
 World Anti-Slavery
 Convention, London
 Yugoslavia, formation of the non-aligned movement
 Zimbabwe, national liberation movement
 Zumbi (ca. 1655–1695)

Abolitionism and the Civil Rights Movement, United States

Abdurahman, Abdullah (1872–1940)
 Abu Jamal, Mumia (b. 1954)
 Addams, Jane (1860–1935)
 African American resistance,
 Jim Crow era
 African American resistance,
 Reconstruction era
 African Blood Brotherhood
 American Civil War (1861–1864)
 American Civil War and slavery
 American left and Howard Zinn
 (b. 1922)
 American slave rebellions
 Anthony, Susan B. (1820–1906)
 Anti-Racist Action (ARA)
 Anti-slavery movement, Britain
 Anti-slavery movement, United States, 1700–1870
 Anti-Vietnam War movement,
 United States
 Aptheker, Herbert (1915–1903)
 Baker, Ella Josephine (1903–1986)
 Baraka, Imanu Amiri (b. 1934)
 Benezet, Anthony (1713–1784)
 Black nationalism, 19th and 20th centuries
 Black Panthers
 Brown, H. Rap (b. 1943)
 Brown, John (1800–1859)
 Carmichael, Stokely/Kwame
 Turé (1941–1998)
 Catholic Worker movement
 Civil rights movement, United States,
 1960–1965
 Civil rights, United States, Black
 Power and backlash, 1965–1978
 Civil rights, United States: overview
 Columbia University civil rights protests
 Communist Party of the United States of America (CPUSA)
 CORE (Congress of Racial Equality)
 Cuffe, Paul (1759–1817)
 Davis, Angela (b. 1944)
 Douglass, Frederick (1817–1895)
 Du Bois, W. E. B. (1868–1963)
 Dunayevskaya, Raya (1910–1987)
 Evers, Medgar (1925–1963)
 Freedom Rides
 Freedom Summer
 Gabriel’s Rebellion
 Garrison, William Lloyd (1805–1879)

Grimké, Angelina (1805–1879)
and Sarah (1792–1873)
Hampton, Fred (1948–1969)
Harlem Renaissance
House, Callie (1861–1928)
Jackson, Jesse (b. 1941)
King, Martin Luther, Jr. (1929–1968)
and the Southern Christian
Leadership Conference (SCLC)
League of Revolutionary Black Workers
Lincoln, Abraham (1809–1865)
and African Americans
Malcolm X (1925–1965)
Meredith, James (b. 1933)
Nat Turner Rebellion
Paine, Thomas (1737–1809)
Parks, Rosa (1913–2005) and the Montgomery Bus Boycott
Paul, Alice (1885–1977)
Radical Reconstruction, United States, promise and failure of Randolph, A. Phillip (1889–1979)
Red Summer, United States, 1919
Revolutionary Action Movement
Robeson, Paul (1898–1976)
Scottsboro Resistance
Seneca Falls convention
Shipboard insurrections in the Atlantic slave trade
Slave rescues and the Underground
Railroad, United States
Spartacus, historical and modern era
Student Non-Violent Coordinating
Committee (SNCC)
Sylvis, William H. (1829–1869) and the National Labor Union
Truth, Sojourner (ca. 1797–1893)
Tubman, Harriet (ca. 1819–1913)
Uhuru movement
Urban rebellions, United States
Vesey's Rebellion
Walker, David (ca. 1796–1830)
Washington, George (1732–1799)
Wells, Ida B. (1862–1931) and the anti-lynching campaign
Williams, Robert F. (1925–1996)
Women's movement, United States,
19th century
Women's movement, United States,
20th century
World Anti-Slavery
Convention, London
Wright, Frances "Fanny" (1795–1852)

Anarchism

Abalone Alliance
Anarchism
Anarchism, Argentina
Anarchism, Australia
Anarchism, Britain
Anarchism, Canada
Anarchism, Chile
Anarchism, China
Anarchism and culture, 1840–1939
Anarchism and education
Anarchism, Finland
Anarchism, France
Anarchism and gender
Anarchism, Greece
Anarchism, Hungary
Anarchism, Italy
Anarchism, Japan
Anarchism, Korea
Anarchism, Mexico
Anarchism, New Zealand
Anarchism, Poland
Anarchism, Puerto Rico
Anarchism, Russia
Anarchism and sabotage
Anarchism, Spain
Anarchism and syndicalism,
Southern Africa
Anarchism in the United States to 1945
Anarchism in the United States, 1946–present
Anarchocommunism
Anarchosyndicalism
Anti-Racist Action (ARA)
Argentina, Grito de Alcorta
Peasant Rebellion, 1912
Bakunin, Mikhail Alexandrovich
(1814–1876)
Berkman, Alexander (1870–1936)
Biennio Rosso (1919–1920)
Brand, Adolf (1874–1945)
Casa del Obrero Mundial
Catalan protests against centralism
Chile, social and political struggles,
1850–1970
Chomsky, Noam (b. 1928)
Colombia, anti-war movements,
1990–2008
Confederación Nacional del
Trabajo (CNT)
Confédération Générale du Travail and
Syndicaliste Révolutionnaire

Cornelissen, Christianus Gerardus (1864–1942)
 Durruti, Buenaventura (1896–1936)
 Eco-anarchism
 Escuela Moderna movement (The Modern School)
 Fanelli, Giuseppe (1826–1877)
 Federación Anarquista Ibérica (FAI)
 Galleani, Luigi (1861–1931)
 Godwin, William (1756–1836)
 Goldman, Emma (1869–1940)
 Gori, Pietro (1865–1911)
 Hatta Shūzō (1886–1934)
 Haymarket tragedy
 Hoy, Senna (1882–1914)
 Infoshops
 Internationals
 Ishikawa Sanshirō (1876–1956)
 Itō Noe (1895–1923)
 Kim Joa-jin (1889–1930)
 Kropotkin, Peter (1842–1921)
 Labor revolutionary currents, United States, 20th century
 Landauer, Gustav (1870–1919)
 MacKay, John Henry (1864–1933)
 Magón, Ricardo Flores (1874–1922) and the Magonistas
 Makhno, Nestor (1889–1934)
 Malatesta, Errico (1853–1932)
 Malato, Charles (1857–1938)
 Michel, Louise (1830–1905)
 Mujeres Libres
 Nechaev, Sergei (1847–1882)
 Ōsugi Sakae (1885–1923)
 Pisacane, Carlo (1818–1857)
 Proudhon, Pierre Joseph (1809–1865)
 Puig Antich, Salvador (1948–1974)
 Reclus, Elisée (1830–1905)
 Sacco and Vanzetti case
 Sánchez Saornil, Lucía (1895–1970)
 Serge, Victor (1880–1947)
 Settimana Rossa
 Solidarity Federation
 Souchy, Augustin (1892–1984)
 Szabó, Ervin (1877–1918)
 Tolstoy, Leo N. (1828–1910)
 Vaneigem, Raoul (b. 1934)
 Zapatismo
 Zapatistas, EZLN, and the Chiapas uprising

Anti-Apartheid
 Aggett, Neil (1954–1982)
 Anti-apartheid movement, South Africa

Barayi, Elijah (1930–1994)
 Communist Party of South Africa, 1921–1950
 COSATU (Congress of South African Trade Unions)
 Hani, Chris (1942–1993)
 Khama, Seretse (1921–1980) and Botswana nationalism
 Mandela, Nelson (b. 1918)
 Namibia, struggle for independence
 Nujoma, Sam (b. 1929)
 Sachs, Solly (1900–1976)
 Simons, Ray Alexander (1913–2004)
 Slovo, Joe (1926–1995)
 South Africa, African nationalism and the ANC
 South Africa, labor movement
 South Africa, water struggles
 South African Communist Party, 1953–present
 Southern Africa, popular resistance to neoliberalism, 1982–2007
 Springbok rugby tour protests, 1981
 Student movements, global South
 Tambo, Oliver (1917–1993)

Arts and Culture
 ACT UP
 Adorno, Theodor W. (1903–1969)
 Agitprop
 American left and Howard Zinn (b. 1922)
 Anarchism, Argentina
 Anarchism and culture, 1840–1939
 Anarchism, Mexico
 Anarchism, Poland
 Anti-Napoleonic Wars of Liberation (1813–1815)
 Anti-Vietnam War movement, Britain
 Anti-Vietnam War movement, United States
 Arab left and socialist movements, 1861–1930
 Argentina, piquetero movement
 Ayim, May (1960–1996)
 Babel, Isaac (1894–1941)
 Beauvoir, Simone de (1908–1986)
 Beethoven, Ludwig van (1770–1827)
 Biermann, Wolf (b. 1936)
 Blake, William (1757–1827)
 Boal, Augusto (b. 1931)
 Brand, Adolf (1874–1945)
 Bread and Puppet Theater
 Brecht, Bertolt (1899–1956)
 Cabral, Amílcar (1924–1973)

- Camus, Albert (1913–1960)
 Cardenal, Ernesto (b. 1925)
 Caribbean protest music
 Central America, music and resistance
 Césaire, Aimé (1913–2008)
 Chernyshevsky, Nikolai G. (1828–1889)
 China, May 4th movement
 Courbet, Gustave (1819–1877)
 Cuban post-revolutionary protests
 Czechoslovakia, resistance to Soviet political and economic rule
 DADA Debord, Guy (1931–1994) and the Spectacle
 Deleuze, Gilles (1925–1995),
 Guattari, Félix (1930–1992),
 and the global justice movement
 Democracy Wall movement, 1979
 Dominican Republic, protest and resistance to US imperialism,
 1916–1962
 Du Bois, W. E. B. (1868–1963)
 Eisenstein, Sergei (1898–1948)
 Faiz Ahmed Faiz (1911–1984)
 Feminist performance
 Feuchtwanger, Lion (1884–1958)
 Fo, Dario (b. 1926)
 French revolutionary theater
 Grass, Gunter (b. 1927)
 Guerilla theater
 Guerrilla Girls
 Harlem Renaissance
 Hauptmann, Gerhart (1862–1946)
 Havel, Václav (b. 1936)
 Hollywood Ten
 Hugo, Victor (1802–1885)
 Hyde, Evan Anthony (b. 1947)
 Indonesian protests against Suharto dictatorship
 Indonesian revolution and
 counterrevolution
 Indymedia global justice campaign, 2000s
 Iqbal, Muhammad (1877–1938)
 Irish nationalism
 Italy, from the new left to the great repression (1962–1981)
 Jalib, Habib (1928–1993)
 Jamaica, independence movement,
 1950–present
 Jamaica, rebellion and resistance,
 1760–1834
 Jara, Víctor (1932–1973)
 Khuda-i Khidmatgar: Pashtun non-violent resistance force (1929–1948)
 Latin American punk rock and protest
 Lesbian, gay, transsexual, bisexual
 movements, Germany
 London, Jack (1876–1916)
 Lu Xun (1881–1936)
 Lukács, Georg (1885–1971)
 MacKay, John Henry (1864–1933)
 Marianne, French revolutionary icon
 Martí, José (1853–1895) and the Partido
 Revolucionario Cubano
Masses, The
 Michel, Louise (1830–1905)
 Milosz, Czesław (1911–2004)
 Modernismo
 Morris, William (1834–1896)
 Muralista movement
 Music and protest, Latin America
 Music, songs, and protest, France
 Négritude movement
 Neruda, Pablo (1904–1973)
 Nicaraguan Revolution, 1970s–1980s
 Ortiz, Fernando (1881–1969)
 Pakistan, Bengali nationalist struggles
 Prague Spring
 Primera, Alí (1942–1985)
 Punk movement
 Reclaim the Streets
 Riot Grrl
 Robeson, Paul (1898–1976)
 Rodríguez, Silvio (b. 1946)
 Roumain, Jacques (1907–1944)
 Sánchez Saornil, Lucía (1895–1970)
 Sartre, Jean-Paul (1905–1980)
 Sembène, Ousmane (1923–2007)
 Senghor, Léopold (1906–2001)
 Situationists
 Slovakia, Štúr generation
 Spartacus, historical and modern era
 Student movements,
 Czechoslovakia, 1960s
 Student movements,
 Czechoslovakia, 1980s
 Sturm und Drang
 Sudanese protest under Anglo-
 Egyptian rule
 Swift, Jonathan (1667–1745)
 Taiping Rebellion, 1851–1864
 Taiwan, anti-imperialism and nationalism
 Tolstoy, Leo N. (1828–1910)
 Vaneigem, Raoul (b. 1934)
 Voltaire (1694–1778)
 Williams, Raymond Henry (1921–1988)
 Women's movement, France

Women's movement, Greece, formation of
 Women's movement, Japan
 Women's movement, Spain
 Women's movement, United States, 16th–18th centuries
 Women's movement, United States, 20th century
 World Trade Organization (WTO) protests, Hong Kong, 2005
 Žižek, Slavoj (b. 1949)

Democracy
 Anti-nuclear movement, Japan
 April Revolution, Nepal, 2006
 Arbenz, Jacobo Guzmán (1913–1971)
 Argentina, armed struggle and guerilla organizations, 1960s–1970s
 Argentina, Semana Roja, 1909
 Argentina, University Reform, 1918
 Aristide, Jean-Bertrand (b. 1953)
 Australia, new social movements
 Austria, 20th-century protests
 Berkeley Free Speech Movement
 Biermann, Wolf (b. 1936)
 Bloch, Marc (1886–1944)
 Brissot, Jacques Pierre (1754–1793)
 Burkina Faso, Revolution, 1983
 Burma, democracy movement
 Burma, national movement against British colonial rule
 Cambodia, rebellion against France
 Chávez, Hugo and the Bolivarian Revolution, 1998–present
 Chernyshevsky, Nikolai G. (1828–1889)
 Chile, popular resistance against Pinochet
 China, May 4th movement
 Colombia, anti-war movements, 1990–2008
 Color revolutions
 Congo armed insurgency, Mobutu decamps
 Costa, Afonso Augusta da (1871–1937)
 Cuba, anti-racist movement and the Partido Independiente de Color
 Democracy Wall movement, 1979
 Dictatorship of the proletariat
 Dubček, Alexander (1921–1992)
El Argentino: December 19 and 20, 2001
 English Revolution, radical sects
 Enlightenment, France, 18th century
 Eureka Stockade

Farabundo Martí National Liberation Front (FMLN)
 France, 1830 Revolution
 France, Revolution of 1848
 French Revolution, 1789–1794
 German Revolution, 1918–1923
 Giustizia e Libertà, Partito d'Azione
 Greece, anti-dictatorship protests
 Guatemala, Democratic Spring, 1944–1954
 Haiti, democratic uprising, 1980s–1991
 Haiti, protest and rebellion, 20th century
 Hong Kong democracy protests
 Hungary, anti-communist protests, 1945–1989
 Ibrahim, Saad Eddin (b. 1938)
 Indonesian pro-democracy protests
 Indonesian protests against Suharto dictatorship
 Indonesian revolution and counterrevolution
 Iran, the Mossadegh era: democratic socialists and the US-backed coup
 Ireland, Great Rebellion, 1798
 Jalib, Habib (1928–1993)
 Kashmir, popular struggles to 1947
 Kenya, national protests for independence
 Korea, post-World War II popular movements for democracy
 Kronstadt Mutiny of 1921
 Kwangju student uprising
 Lesotho, popular protest and resistance
 Lilburne, John (1615–1657)
 Mandela, Nelson (b. 1918)
 Marat, Jean-Paul (1743–1793)
 Marianne, French revolutionary icon
 Marighella, Carlos (1911–1969) and the Brazilian urban guerilla movement
 Marx, Karl (1818–1883)
 Marxism
 Masaryk, Tomas (1850–1937)
 Mazzini, Giuseppe (1805–1872)
 Meilidao protests, 1978
 Mexico, labor movement and protests, 1980–2005
 Michnik, Adam (b. 1946)
 Muir, Thomas (1765–1799)
 Nepal, protest movements, 19th and 20th centuries
 Netherlands, protests, 1650–1800
 New Jewel movement

Nigeria, 1993 political and electoral protest and conflict
 Obrador, Andrés Manuel López (b. 1953) and the PRD
 Paraguay, protest in the post-Stroessner era
 Participatory democracy, history of
 Poland, Committee for Workers (KOR)
 Polish Revolution, 1905–1907
 Portugal, Carnation Revolution, 1974
 Prague Spring
 Prestes, Luís Carlos (1898–1990) and Prestes, Olga Benário (1908–1942)
 Russia, Revolution of 1905–1907
 Russia, Revolution of February/March 1917
 Salvadoran Civil War, 1980–1991
 Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN)
 Serbian Revolution of October 2000
 Sharp, Gene (b. 1928)
 Solidarność (Solidarity)
 South Africa, African nationalism and the ANC
 Southern Africa, popular resistance to neoliberalism, 1982–2007
 Spanish Revolution
 Student movements, Europe
 Students for a Democratic Society (SDS)
 Sun Yat-Sen (1866–1925)
 Swaziland, nationalist and economic protests
 Thailand, popular movements, 1980s–present
 Thelwall, John (1764–1834)
 Tiananmen Square protests, 1989
 Turkmenistan, protest and revolt
 Velasco Alvarado, Juan Francisco (1910–1977)
 Velvet Revolution, 1989
 Venezuela, exclusionary democracy and resistance, 1958–1998
 Venezuela, MBR-200 and the military uprisings of 1992
 Venezuela, solidarity economy, social property, co-management, and workers’ control
 Voltaire (1694–1778)
 Walesa, Lech (b. 1943)
 Wei Jingsheng (b. 1950)
 West German “new left”

Women in the Russian Revolution
 Women in the Solidarity movement, Polish underground
 Yugoslavia, anti-fascist “People’s Liberation War” and revolution, 1941–1945
 Zionism

Environment and Ecology
 Abalone Alliance
 Anarchism, Finland
 Anti-nuclear campaign, Britain
 Anti-nuclear movement, Japan
 Anti-nuclear protest movements
 Anti-nuclear protests, Marshall Islands
 Britain, post-World War II political protest
 Carson, Rachel (1907–1964)
 Chipko movement
 Clayoquot Sound
 Cohn-Bendit, Daniel (b. 1945)
 Colombia, indigenous mobilization
 Commoner, Barry (b. 1917)
 Critical Mass
 Earth First!
 Eco-anarchism
 Ecological protest movements
 Environmental protest, United States, 19th century
 French Guiana, ecological movements against the Guiana Space Center in Kourou
 French Polynesia, protest movements
 Fromm, Erich (1900–1980)
 G8 protests, Gleneagles, 2005
 Germany, Green movement
 Green bans movement, Australia
 Greenpeace
 Japan, resistance to construction of Narita airport
 Kelly, Petra (1947–1992)
 Mendes, Chico (1944–1988) and Amazonian rainforest protest and resistance
 Micronesia, nationalist and labor protests
 Munday, Jack (b. 1929)
 Native American protest, 20th century
 Nuclear-Free New Zealand, 1987
 Peoples’ Global Action Network
 Reclaim the Streets
 Saro-Wiwa, Ken (1941–1995)
 Shiva, Vandana (b. 1952)
 Sofia demonstrations, 1989
 South Africa, water struggles

Southern Africa, popular resistance to neoliberalism, 1982–2007
 Student movements, Europe
 Turkey, anti-secular protest, 1980–present
 Vegetarian protests and movements
 Vía Campesina and peasant struggles
 Vieques
 Women’s movement, India

Fascism and Anti-Fascism

Anti-fascist People’s Front
 Anti-Racist Action (ARA)
 Arendt, Hannah (1906–1975)
 Begin, Menachem (1913–1992) and the Irgun
 Bloch, Marc (1886–1944)
 Bulgaria, World War II resistance and rise of communism
 Camus, Albert (1913–1960)
 Communist Party, Germany
 Djilas, Milovan (1911–1995)
 Dutschke, Rudi (1940–1979)
 Fascism, protest and revolution
 France, resistance to Nazism
 Germany, Red Army Faction (Baader-Meinhof Group)
 Germany, resistance to Nazism
 Germany, socialism and nationalism
 Giustizia e Libertà, Partito d’Azione
 Grass, Gunter (b. 1927)
 Hindu nationalism, Hindutva, and women
 Hitler, Adolf (1889–1945) and German Nazism
 India, Hindutva and fascist mobilizations, 1989–2002
 Italy, from the anti-fascist resistance to the new left (1945–1960)
 Jewish resistance to Nazism
 Luxembourg, protest and revolution
 Maitan, Livio (1923–2004)
Mein Kampf
 Milosz, Czeslaw (1911–2004)
 Mussolini, Benito (1883–1945)
 Netherlands, protests, 1800–2000
 Resistenza
 Rossanda, Rossana (b. 1924)
 Rosselli, Carlo (1899–1937)
 Salvemini, Gaetano (1873–1957)
 Slovenian National Liberation Front (Osvobodilna Fronta), 1941–1944
 Social Democratic Party, Germany

Socialist Workers’ Party of Germany (Sozialistische Arbeiterpartei Deutschlands)
 Souchy, Augustin (1892–1984)
 Spanish Revolution
 Tagore, Saumyendranath (1901–1974)
 Tito, Josip Broz (1892–1980)
 Trotsky, Leon (1879–1940)
 Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, 1943
 White Rose (Weiße Rose)
 Workers’ self-management, Yugoslavia
 Young Communist International
 Yugoslavia, resistance to Cominform, 1948
 Zasluch, Vera (1849–1919)
 Zhang Guotao (1897–1979)
 Zhang Wentian (1900–1976)
 Zhou Enlai (1898–1976)
 Zhu De (1886–1976)

Foreign Intervention

Afghanistan, 1978 Revolution and Islamic Civil War
 Arbenz, Jacobo Guzmán (1913–1971)
 Aristide, Jean-Bertrand (b. 1953)
 Barzani, Mulla Mustafa al- (1903–1979)
 Begin, Menachem (1913–1992) and the Irgun
 Bin Laden, Osama (b. 1957) and al-Qaeda
 Bolivia, protest and repression, 1964–2000
 Bulgaria, independence movement, 1830–1835
 Cabanagem of Grão-Pará, Brazil, 1835–1840
 Cambodia, communist protests and revolution
 Cambodia, rebellion against France
 Castro, Fidel (b. 1926)
 Cedar Revolution, Lebanon
 Chile, protests and military coup, 1973
 China, May 4th movement
 China, protest and revolution, 1800–1911
 China, student protests, 20th century
 Chinese Communist Revolution, 1925–1949
 Colombia, armed insurgency, peasant self-defense, and radical popular movements, 1960s–1970s
 Colombia, armed insurgency, peasant self-defense, and radical popular movements, 1970s–1990s

- Colombia, unions, strikes, and anti-neoliberal opposition, 1990–2005
 Congo armed insurgency, Mobutu decamps
 Congo Crisis, 1960–1965
 Congo, protest and uprisings, 1998–2002
 Counterrevolution, France, 1789–1830
 Cuba, anti-racist movement and the Partido Independiente de Color
 Cuba, struggle for independence from Spain, 1868–1898
 Cuban post-revolutionary protests
 Cuban Revolution, 1953–1959
 Dominican Republic, protest and resistance to US imperialism, 1916–1962
 Dominican Republic, protests 1844–1915
 Dominican Republic, resistance to military and US invasion, 1963–1965
 East Timor, anti-colonial struggle, 1974 to independence
 Ecuador, left and popular movements, 1940s to present
 Ejército de Liberación Nacional, Colombia
 Farabundo Martí National Liberation Front (FMLN)
 Foreign intervention and revolution
 Guevara, Ernesto “Che” (1928–1967)
 Haiti, democratic uprising, 1980s–1991
 Haiti, foreign-led insurgency, 2004
 Haiti, protest and rebellion, 20th century
 Haiti, resistance to US occupation
 Huk Rebellion, 1946–1954
 Intifada I and Intifada II
 Iran, the Mossadegh era: democratic socialists and the US-backed coup
 Iraqi resistance, 1991–2007
 Ireland, Great Rebellion, 1798
 Japan, pacifist movement, 1945–present
 Kosovo, civil and armed resistance, 1990s
 Kwangju student uprising
 La Ceiba Uprising of 1924
 Lebanese insurrection of 1958
 Lebanon, civil war, 1975–1990
 Machado, popular Cuban anti-government struggle, 1930s
 Micronesia, nationalist and labor protests
 Mossadegh, Mohammad (1881–1967)
 Nicaraguan Revolution, 1970s–1980s
 Niger Delta, protest movements
 Non-interventionists, 1914–1945
 Panama, nationalism and popular mobilization, 1947–2000
 Salvadoran Civil War, 1980–1991
 Sandino, Augusto César (1895–1934)
 Solomon Islands, protest and uprisings
 Spanish Revolution
 Taiping Rebellion, 1851–1864
 Taliban, 1996–2007
 Tamil nationalist struggle for Eelam
 Tibet Uprising and resistance
 Urabi movement
 Vietnam, First Indochina War, 1945–1954
 Vietnam, protest and Second Indochina War, 1960–1974
 Zimbabwe, national liberation movement
 Zimbabwe People’s Army (ZIPA)
- Gender and Sexuality
 ACT UP
 Addams, Jane (1860–1935)
 Alves, Margarida Maria (1943–1983)
 Anarchism and gender
 Anthony, Susan B. (1820–1906)
 Anti-Racist Action (ARA)
 April Revolution, Nepal, 2006
 Argentina, human rights movement
 Arundel, Lady Blanche (1583–1649)
 Beauvoir, Simone de (1908–1986)
 Brand, Adolf (1874–1945)
 Britain, post-World War II political protest
 Britain, women’s suffrage campaign
 Chakravartty, Renu (1917–1994)
 Chartists
 China, Maoism and popular power, 1949–1969
 Cuban post-revolutionary protests
 Dahomey Women’s Army
 Dalit liberation struggles
 Davis, Angela (b. 1944)
 Dix, Dorothea (1802–1887)
 Dominican Republic, protest and resistance to US imperialism, 1916–1962
 Douglass, Frederick (1817–1895)
 Dunayevskaya, Raya (1910–1987)
 Eastman, Max (1883–1969)
 English Revolution, radical sects
 English Revolution, women and Enlightenment, France, 18th century
 Feminist performance

- Fifth Monarchist women
 Foucault, Michel (1926–1984)
 French Revolution, women and
 Friedan, Betty (1921–2006)
 Friedländer, Benedikt (1866–1908)
 Fuller, Margaret (1810–1850)
 Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand
 (1869–1948)
 Garrison, William Lloyd (1805–1879)
 Goldman, Emma (1869–1940)
 Gonne, Maud (1866–1953)
 Gouges, Olympe de (1745–1793)
 Grandmothers of the Plaza de Mayo
 Grimké, Angelina (1805–1879) and Sarah (1792–1873)
 Hindu nationalism, Hindutva, and women
 Hirschfeld, Magnus (1868–1935)
 Hoy, Senna (1882–1914)
 Huerta, Dolores (b. 1930)
 Hungary, women radicals, 1848–1849
 India, armed struggle in the independence
 movement
 International Congress of Women at The Hague
 International Women’s Day
 Iran, political and cultural protests,
 1844–1914
 Israeli peace movement
 Kollontai, Alexandra (1872–1952)
 Korea, labor movement, 20th century
 Kuliscioff, Anna (1853/1857?–1925)
 Lesbian, gay, transsexual, bisexual movements
 Lesbian, gay, transsexual, bisexual
 movements, Australia
 Lesbian, gay, transsexual, bisexual
 movements, Canada
 Lesbian, gay, transsexual, bisexual
 movements, Germany
 Lesbian, gay, transsexual, bisexual
 movements, United States
 Lowell Female Labor Reform Association
 MacKay, John Henry (1864–1933)
 Madagascar, protests and revolts,
 19th and 20th centuries
 Madres de la Plaza de Mayo
 Mau Mau Rebellion, 1952–1959
 May 1968 French uprisings
 Mexico, labor movement and protests,
 1980–2005
 Michel, Louise (1830–1905)
 Montessori, Maria (1870–1952)
 Mother Jones (1837–1930)
 Mujeres Libres
 Naidu, Sarojini (1879–1949)
 National Organization for Women
 (NOW)
 Northern Ireland peace movement
 Norway, protest and revolution
 Pankhurst, Emmeline (1858–1928),
 Christabel (1880–1958), and Sylvia (1882–1960)
 Paris Commune, 1871
 Paul, Alice (1885–1977)
 Popelin, Marie (1846–1913) and the Belgian League for Women’s Rights
 Postcolonial feminism and protest
 in the global South
 Qiu Jin (1875–1907)
 Queen Nanny and Maroon resistance
 Raditsela, Andries (1956–1985)
 Riot Grrrl
 Sánchez Saornil, Lucía (1895–1970)
 Sanger, Margaret (1879–1966) and the American birth control movement
 Seneca Falls convention
 Sexuality and revolution
 Shipboard insurrections in the Atlantic slave trade
 Shiva, Vandana (b. 1952)
 Simons, Ray Alexander (1913–2004)
 Society for Cheap Lodgings
 Stanton, Elizabeth Cady (1815–1902)
 Steinem, Gloria (b. 1934)
 Sudanese Women’s League
 Sylvis, William H. (1829–1869) and the National Labor Union
 Taiping Rebellion, 1851–1864
 Tajikistan, protests and revolts
 Thailand, popular movements,
 1980s–present
 Treatment Action Campaign (TAC)
 Triangle Shirtwaist fire protests
 Trotsky, Leon (1879–1940)
 Truth, Sojourner (ca. 1797–1893)
 Turkey, anti-secular protest,
 1980–present
 Turkey, protest and revolution,
 1800s–1923
 Turkmenistan, protest and revolt
 Union for Women’s Equality
 Vegetarian protests and movements
 Walentynowicz, Anna (b. 1929)
 Wells, Ida B. (1862–1931) and the anti-lynching campaign
 Wollstonecraft, Mary (1759–1797)

- Woman's Christian Temperance Union
 Women in the 1848 Revolution, Poland
 Women and national liberation in Africa
 Women in the Russian Revolution
 Women in the Solidarity movement,
 Polish underground
 Women's movement, Australia
 Women's movement, French Windward Islands
 Women's movement, United States,
 16th–18th centuries
 Women's movement, United States,
 19th century
 Women's movement, United States,
 20th century
 Women's movement, Anglophone Caribbean
 Women's movement, Britain
 Women's movement, Cuba
 Women's movement, France
 Women's movement, Germany
 Women's movement, Greece,
 formation of
 Women's movement, Haiti
 Women's movement, India
 Women's movement, Italy
 Women's movement, Japan
 Women's movement, Latin America
 Women's movement, Southern Africa
 Women's movement, Soviet Union
 Women's movement, Spain
 Women's movement, Venezuela
 Women's movements, Eastern Europe
 Women's War of 1929
 Woodhull, Victoria (1838–1927)
 World Anti-Slavery Convention, London
 World Trade Organization (WTO)
 protests, Cancun, 2003
 Wright, Frances "Fanny" (1795–1852)
 Yaa Asantewaa (ca. 1840–1921)
 Yugoslavia, anti-privatization struggles
 Zapatistas, EZLN, and the Chiapas uprising
 Zetkin, Clara (1857–1933)
- Global Justice and Globalization
 Anarchism, Finland
 Anarchism, Greece
 Assembly of the Poor
 ATTAC (Association for the Taxation of Financial Transactions for the Aid of Citizens)
 Bread and Puppet Theater
- Deleuze, Gilles (1925–1995), Guattari, Félix (1930–1992), and the global justice movement
 Disobbedienti/Tute Bianche
 EuroMayDay
 European Union Summit protests,
 Gothenburg, 2001
 Food Not Bombs, United States
 G8 protests, Genoa, 2001
 G8 protests, Gleneagles, 2005
 G8 protests, Heiligendamm, June 2007
 Global Day of Action Against Capitalism, June 18 (J18), 1999
 Global Day of Action Against the IMF and World Bank, Prague,
 September 26 (S26), 2000
 Global justice movement and resistance
 Grassroots resistance to corporate globalization
 Greece, socialism, communism,
 and the left, 1974–2008
 Indymedia global justice campaign, 2000s
 Internationals
 Italy, anti-racist movement
 Korea, peasant and farmers' movement
 Korea, protest against neoliberal globalization
 Maitan, Livio (1923–2004)
 Migration struggles and the global justice movement
 Multitude
 Negri, Antonio (b. 1933)
 Peoples' Global Action Network
 Reclaim the Streets
 South Africa, water struggles
 Via Campesina and peasant struggles
 World Social Forums
 World Trade Organization (WTO)
 protests, Cancun, 2003
 World Trade Organization (WTO)
 protests, Doha, 2001
 World Trade Organization (WTO)
 protests, Hong Kong, 2005
 World Trade Organization (WTO)
 protests, Quebec City, 2001
 World Trade Organization (WTO)
 protests, Seattle, 1999
- Guerilla tactics
 Anti-Franco worker struggles, 1939–1975
 Argentina, armed struggle and guerilla organizations, 1960s–1970s

- Bolivia, protest and repression, 1964–2000
- Cuban Revolution, 1953–1959
- Ecuador, left and popular movements, 1940s to present
- Farabundo Martí National Liberation Front (FMLN)
- FARC (Revolutionary Armed Forces and Popular Liberation Army)
- Fonseca, Carlos (1936–1976)
- France, resistance to Nazism
- Francophone Africa, protest and independence
- Germany, Red Army Faction (Baader–Meinhof Group)
- Guatemala, popular rebellion and civil war
- Guatemala, worker struggles and the labor movement, 1960s–1990s
- Guevara, Ernesto “Che” (1928–1967)
- Guillén, Abraham (1913–1993)
- Huk Rebellion, 1946–1954
- India, armed struggle in the independence movement
- Indonesian revolution and counterrevolution
- Irish Republican Army (IRA)
- Kosovo, civil and armed resistance, 1990s
- Kurdistan nationalist movement and the PKK (Kurdistan Workers’ Party)
- Lemba, Sebastian (d. 1547)
- M-19 of Colombia
- Madera Uprising, Chihuahua, 1965
- Marcos, Subcomandante (b. ?)
- Marighella, Carlos (1911–1969) and the Brazilian urban guerilla movement
- Mazumdar, Charu (1918–1972)
- Mazzini, Giuseppe (1805–1872)
- Mexico, armed political movements, 1960s–present
- Mexico, indigenous and peasant struggles, 1980s–present
- Mexico, labor movement and protests, 1980–2005
- MRTA (Movimiento Revolucionario Túpac Amaru)
- NAP (Nuclei Armati Proletari)
- Naxalite movement, 1967–1972
- Nepal, Maoists’ rise
- Nepal, people’s war and Maoists
- Nicaraguan Revolution, 1970s–1980s
- Ortega, Daniel (b. 1945)
- Paraguay, protest and revolt, 1954–1989
- Peru, armed insurgency and the Dirty War, 1980–1990
- Peru, “people’s war,” counterinsurgency, and the popular movement
- Poland, revolutions, 1846–1863
- Queen Nanny and Maroon resistance
- Quintín Lame, 1980s
- Rampa rebellions in Andhra Pradesh
- Salvadoran Civil War, 1980–1991
- Sandino, Augusto César (1895–1934)
- Sendic, Raúl (1926–1989)
- Slovakia, 1944 Uprising
- Soe, Thakin (1906–1989)
- South Africa, African nationalism and the ANC
- SWAPO (South West African People’s Organization)
- Tamil nationalist struggle for Eelam
- Tibet Uprising and resistance
- Tupamaros
- Uruguay, labor and populist movements, 1965–present
- Uzbekistan, national movement and protests
- Vázquez, Genaro (1931–1972)
- Venezuela, guerilla movements, 1960s–1980s
- Vietnam, First Indochina War, 1945–1954
- Vietnam, protest and Second Indochina War, 1960–1974
- Human Rights
- Argentina, human rights movement
- Armenian resistance, 1915
- Assembly of the Poor
- Bread and Roses Strike
- Caracazo*, 1989
- Carney, James Francis “Guadalupe” (1925–1983?)
- Casement, Roger (1864–1916)
- Charter 77
- Chávez, Hugo and the Bolivarian Revolution, 1998–present
- Chile, protests and military coup, 1973
- Colombia, Afro-Colombian movements and anti-racist protests
- Colombia, armed insurgency, peasant self-defense, and radical popular movements, 1970s–1990s
- Colombia, unions, strikes, and anti-neoliberal opposition, 1990–2005
- Congo, Brazzaville protest and revolt
- Cyprus, protest and revolt

- Dalit liberation struggles
 Dix, Dorothea (1802–1887)
 Dreyfus Affair
 Dutschke, Rudi (1940–1979)
 East Timor, anti-colonial struggle,
 1974 to independence
 Edict of Nantes
 EPR (Ejército Popular Revolucionario)
 G8 protests, Gleneagles, 2005
 Grandmothers of the Plaza de Mayo
 Havel, Václav (b. 1936)
 HIJOS movement, Children of the Disappeared
 Hugo, Victor (1802–1885)
 Ibrahim, Saad Eddin (b. 1938)
 International Women's Day
 Italy, anti-racist movement
 Jackson, Jesse (b. 1941)
 Jalib, Habib (1928–1993)
 Korea, labor movement, 20th century
 Latin America, Catholic Church and liberation, 16th century to present
 Madres de la Plaza de Mayo
 Meilidao protests, 1978
 Menchú, Rigoberta (b. 1959)
 Paraguay, Archive of Terror
 Poland, Committee for Workers (KOR)
 Romania, protests and revolts,
 18th and 19th centuries
 Salvadoran Civil War, 1980–1991
 Saro-Wiwa, Ken (1941–1995)
 Schindler, Oskar (1908–1974)
 Sofia demonstrations, 1989
 South Africa, water struggles
 Southern Africa, popular resistance to neoliberalism, 1982–2007
 Thompson, Edward Palmer (E. P.)
 (1924–1993)
 Treatment Action Campaign (TAC)
 Uruguay, labor and populist movements,
 1965–present
 Via Campesina and peasant struggles
 Voltaire (1694–1778)
 Wei Jingsheng (b. 1950)
 Women's movement, Latin America
 World Trade Organization (WTO)
 protests, Seattle, 1999
- Indigenous
 Aboriginal/left struggle for land rights
 Agüeybaná (d. 1510) and Agüeybaná II
 (d. 1511)
 Alcatraz Uprising and the American Indian Movement
- Anarchism, Canada
 Aracaré (d. 1542)
 Argentina, indigenous popular protests
 Australian aboriginal protests
 Bacon's Rebellion
 Barbados and the Windward Islands,
 protest and revolt
 Bolivia, War of the Pacific to the National Revolution, 1879–1952
 Cabanagem of Grão-Pará,
 Brazil, 1835–1840
 Canada, indigenous resistance
 Caonabo (d. 1496)
 Caste war of Yucatan (Guerra de castas en Yucatan)
 Clayoquot Sound
Cocaleros Peasant Uprising
 Colombia, anti-war movements,
 1990–2008
 Colombia, indigenous mobilization
 Crazy Horse (1849–1877), Sitting Bull
 (1831–1890), and Native American resistance at the Battle of Little Bighorn
 Cuauhtémoc (1502–1525)
 Daquilema, Fernando (d. 1872)
 and the 1871 Uprising, Ecuador
 Diriangén (1496 or 1497–1530s)
 Durrani empire, popular
 protests, 1747–1823
 Ecuador, indigenous and popular struggles
 Ecuador, popular and indigenous uprisings under the Correa government
 Ecuador, protest and revolution
 Enriquillo and the Taíno revolt (1519–1533)
 Francophone Africa, protest
 and independence
 French Guiana, indigenous rebellions
 French Polynesia, protest movements
 Guaicaipuro (ca. 1530–1568)
 Guatemala, Democratic
 Spring, 1944–1954
 Guatemala, popular rebellion
 and civil war
 Guatemala, worker struggles and the labor movement, 1960s–1990s
 Hatuey (ca. 1400s–1512)
 Hawaii, resistance to US invasion
 and occupation
 Juan Santos Atahualpa Rebellion
 Jumandi (d. 1578)

Katarismo and indigenous popular mobilization, Bolivia, 1970s–present
La Matanza 1932 Peasant Revolt
 Lame, Manuel Quintín (1880–1967), Indian/peasant organization, and the struggle for land in Colombia, 1920s–1930s
 Lautaro (d. 1557)
 Lemba, Sebastian (d. 1547)
 Lempira (d. 1537)
 Malawi national liberation
 Malaysia, protest and revolt
 Maori indigenous resistance
 Mapuche Indian resistance
 Marcos, Subcomandante (b. ?)
 Menchú, Rigoberta (b. 1959)
 Mendes, Chico (1944–1988) and Amazonian rainforest protest and resistance
 Mexico, armed political movements, 1960s–present
 Mexico, indigenous and peasant struggles, 1980s–present
 Morales, Evo (b. 1959)
 Moro national liberation
 Munda, Birsa (ca. 1872–1900)
 Namibia, struggle for independence
 Native American protest, 20th century
 New Caledonia, protest and revolt
 Niger Delta, protest movements
 Oka crisis
 Panama, Cemaco’s anti-colonial resistance, 1510–1512
 Peltier, Leonard (b. 1944)
 Peoples’ Global Action Network
 Philippines, colonial protests during the Spanish era
 Quintín Lame, 1980s
 Rampa rebellions in Andhra Pradesh
 Riel, Louis (1844–1885)
 Rumiñahui (d. 1535)
 Santal Rebellion
 Sepé Tiarajú (1722/3–1756)
 Solomon Islands, protest and uprisings
 Taiwan, anti-imperialism and nationalism
 Tecún Umán (d. 1524)
 Tisquesuza (d. 1537)
 Túpac Amaru (1540–1572)
 Túpac Amaru Rebellion II and the Last Inca Revolt, 1780–1783
 Túpac Katari (ca. 1750–1781)
 Urracá, Cacique of Veraguas (d. 1516)

Vanuatu, land reform protests
 Women’s movement, Haiti
 Women’s movement, Latin America
 Women’s movement, Southern Africa
 Women’s movement, Venezuela
 Zapata, Emiliano (1879–1919) and the Comuna Morelense
 Zapatistas, EZLN, and the Chiapas uprising

Labor and Unemployment

Aboriginal/left struggle for land rights
 Addams, Jane (1860–1935)
 African Blood Brotherhood
 Agbekoya Peasant Uprising and Rebellion, 1968–1969
 Alinsky, Saul (1909–1972) and the Industrial Areas Foundation
 American left and Howard Zinn (b. 1922)
 Anarchism and syndicalism, Southern Africa
 Anarchosyndicalism
 Anti-Franco worker struggles, 1939–1975
 April Revolution, Nepal, 2006
 Argentina, general strike (Semana Trágica), 1919
 Argentina, general strike, 1975
 Argentina, grassroots workers’ movement: Villa Constitución, 1975
 Argentina, labor strikes of 1890 and 1902
 Argentina, labor unions and protests of the unemployed, 1990s
 Argentina, piquetero movement
 Argentina, Semana Roja, 1909
 Asturias Uprising, October 1934
 Australian labor movement
 Austria, 20th-century protests
 Belgium, Strike of the Century, 1960–1961
 Belize, general strikes, 1952
 Bolivia, protest and repression, 1964–2000
 Botswana, protest and nationalism
 Bourses du Travail
 Brazil, labor struggles
 Brazil, workers and the left: Partido dos Trabalhadores and Central Única dos Trabalhadores
 Britain, post-World War I army mutinies and revolutionary threats
 Britain, trade union movement
 Bulgaria, 20th-century leftist and workers’ movements
 Canada, labor protests

- Caribbean islands, protests against IMF
 Chartists
 Chávez, Cesar (1927–1993) and the United Farm Workers
 Chávez, Hugo and the Bolivarian Revolution, 1998–present
 Chile, social and political struggles, 1850–1970
 Chiluba, Frederick (b. 1943)
 China, Maoism and popular power, 1949–1969
 China, student protests, 20th century
 Chinese Communist Revolution, 1925–1949
 Colombia, unions, strikes, and anti-neoliberal opposition, 1990–2005
 Communist Party of South Africa, 1921–1950
 Communist Party of the United States of America (CPUSA)
 Communist Party, Germany
 Confederación Nacional del Trabajo (CNT)
 Confédération Générale du Travail and Syndicaliste Révolutionnaire
 Connolly, James (1868–1916)
 Cordobazo and Rosariazo Uprising, 1969
 COSATU (Congress of South African Trade Unions)
 Cuba, general strikes under Batista regime, 1952–1958
 Debs, Eugene (1855–1926)
 Denmark, insurrection and revolt
 Di Vittorio, Giuseppe (1892–1957)
 Dimitrov, Georgi (1882–1949)
 Disobbedienti/Tute Bianche
 Dublin General Strike, 1913
 Dutch Caribbean, protest and revolution, 1815–2000
 Ellis, Daniel Edward “Daan” (1904–1963)
 ETA Liberation Front (Euzkadi ta Askatasuna) and Basque nationalism
 Eureka Stockade
 European revolutions of 1848
 Faiz Ahmed Faiz (1911–1984)
 France, post-World War II labor protests
 French Polynesia, protest movements
 German nationalism and workers’ movements, 19th century
 German Revolution, 1918–1923
 Glasgow general strike, 1820
 Green bans movement, Australia
 Guadeloupe, labor protest
 Guatemala, worker struggles and the labor movement, 1960s–1990s
 Guyana, protests and revolts
 Haymarket tragedy
 Haywood, Big Bill (1869–1928)
 Immigrant and social conflict, France
 Industrial Workers of the World (IWW)
 Iraq, Revolution of 1958
 Italian labor movement
 Italy, operaism and post-operaism
 Jamaica, 1938 labor riots
 Japan, community labor union movement
 Japan, labor protest, 1945–present
 Jewish Bund
 Knights of Labor and Terence Powderly (1849–1924)
 Korea, migrant workers’ struggle
 Labor revolutionary currents, United States, 1775–1900
 Labor’s Volunteer Army
 Lanka Sama Samaja Party (LSSP) and Sri Lankan radicalism
 League of Revolutionary Black Workers
 Leeward Islands, labor protests
 Lowell Female Labor Reform Association
 Luddism and machine breaking
 Machado, popular Cuban anti-government struggle, 1930s
 Manley, Michael (1924–1997)
 Marxism
 May Day
 Mboya, Tom (1930–1969) and the Kenya labor movement
 Mexico, worker struggles and labor unions, 1950s–1970s
 Mother Jones (1837–1930)
 Movement of Recuperated Factories, Argentina
 Mozambique, worker protests
 Munday, Jack (b. 1929)
 Mzingeli, Charles (1905–1980)
 Newport rising, Wales, 1839
 Nordic revolts and popular protests, 1500–present
 O’Connor, Feargus (1796–1855)
 On-to-Ottawa Trek
 Pakistan, protest and rebellion
 Paraguay, popular resistance to the rise of the military (1936–1954)
 Peoples’ Global Action Network
 Peronist resistance

Peru, labor and peasant mobilizations, 1900–1950
 Philippines, protest during the US era
 Poland, Committee for Workers (KOR)
 Poor Law, Britain, 1834
 Red Scotland and the Scottish radical left, 1880–1932
 Reform Bills, Britain, 1867 and 1884
 Romania, mineworker protests, 20th century
 Russia, Revolution of 1905–1907
 Russian revolutionary labor upsurge, 1912–1914
 Sachs, Solly (1900–1976)
 Socialism, Britain
 South Africa, African nationalism and the ANC
 South Africa, labor movement
 South African Communist Party, 1953–present
 Spanish Revolution
 Sudanese protest under Anglo-Egyptian rule
 SWAPO (South West African People’s Organization)
 Swaziland, nationalist and economic protests
 Sylvis, William H. (1829–1869) and the National Labor Union
 Syndicalism, France
 Thailand, popular movements, 1980s–present
 Triangle Shirtwaist fire protests
 Trinidad, labor protests
 Turkey, working-class protest, 1960–1980
 Unemployed protests
 Uruguay, left-wing politics from the Tupamaros to the Frente Amplio
 US labor rebellions and the rise of the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO)
 Venezuela, solidarity economy, social property, co-management, and workers’ control
 Walesa, Lech (b. 1943)
 War communism and the rise of the Soviet Union
 Winnipeg General Strike of 1919
 Women’s movement, Anglophone Caribbean
 Women’s movement, Australia
 Women’s movement, United States, 20th century

Workers’ self-management, Yugoslavia
 World Trade Organization (WTO) protests, Hong Kong, 2005
 Yorkshire Rising, 1820
 Yugoslavia, anti-privatization struggles
 Zambian nationalism and protests
 Zenroren Labor Federation
 Zimbabwe, labor movement, 1890–1980

Military Involvement and Armed Uprisings

American Civil War (1861–1864)
 Asturias Uprising, October 1934
 Bolivia, protest and repression, 1964–2000
 Bolivia, War of the Pacific to the National Revolution, 1879–1952
 Chile, protests and military coup, 1973
 Chinese Communist Revolution, 1925–1949
 Cordobazo and Rosariazo Uprising, 1969
 Cuban Revolution, 1953–1959
 Dominican Republic, protests, 1844–1915
 English Revolution, 17th century
 Ethiopia, Revolution of 1974
 Fiji, parliamentary insurrection
 FPMR (Frente Patrioco Manuel Rodriguez)
 French Caribbean in the Age of Revolution
 German Revolution, 1918–1923
 Greece, partisan resistance
 Haiti, democratic uprising, 1980s–1991
 Haiti, foreign-led insurgency, 2004
 Haiti, resistance to US occupation
 Haitian Revolution and Independence, 1801–1804
 Hungary, Revolution of 1956
 India, armed struggle in the independence movement
 India, Great Rebellion of 1857 (the Sepoy Revolt)
 India, post-World War II upsurge
 Intifada I and Intifada II
 Iran, the Mossadegh era: democratic socialists and the US-backed coup
 Iranian Revolution, 1979
 Iraq, Revolution of 1958
 Ireland, Great Rebellion, 1798
 Ireland, the Troubles
 Irish Republican Army resistance campaign
 Japan, pacifist movement, 1945–present

- Juan Santos Atahualpa Rebellion
 Kashmir, under India
 Khmer Rouge and Pol Pot
 Kwangju student uprising
 La Ceiba Uprising of 1924
 Labor's Volunteer Army
 Lebanon, civil war, 1975–1990
 Lebanon, 19th-century revolts
 Lin Biao (1907–1971)
 Luxembourg, protest and revolution
 Machado, popular Cuban anti-government struggle, 1930s
 Machel, Samora (1933–1986)
 Malaysia, protest and revolt
 Mao Zedong (1893–1976)
 Mau Mau Rebellion, 1952–1959
 Mexican Revolution of 1910–1921
 Micronesia, nationalist and labor protests
 Morocco, protests, 1600s–1990s
 Niger Delta, protest movements
 Paraguay, popular resistance to the rise of the military (1936–1954)
 Paraguay, protest and revolt,
 1954–1989
 Pilsudski, Józef (1867–1935)
 Polish Revolution of 1830
 Portugal, Carnation Revolution, 1974
 Rumiñahui (d. 1535)
 Russia, Revolution of 1905–1907
 Russia, Revolution of October/
 November 1917
 Russian Civil War, 1918–1924
 Salvadoran Civil War, 1980–1991
 Santal Rebellion
 São Tomé e Príncipe, labor/nationalists
 Sierra Leone, protest and revolution
 Spanish Revolution
 Spithead and Nore mutinies,
 Britain, 1797
 Sudan, Aba Island Rebellion, 1970
 Syria and Iraq, Baathists
 Taiping Rebellion, 1851–1864
 Thai Communist Party
 Tiananmen Square protests, 1989
 Torrijos, General Omar (1929–1981)
 Toussaint Louverture and the Haitian
 Revolution, 1796–1799
 Turkey, working-class protest,
 1960–1980
 Venezuela, exclusionary democracy
 and resistance, 1958–1998
 Venezuela, guerilla movements,
 1960s–1980s
 Venezuela, MBR-200 and the military
 uprisings of 1992
 Venezuela, military uprisings, 1960–1962
 Vietnam, protest and Second
 Indochina War, 1960–1974
- Nationalism and Anti-Imperialism
 African Blood Brotherhood
 Agüeybaná (d. 1510) and Agüeybaná II
 (d. 1511)
 Albanian nationalism
 Algerian National Revolution, 1954–1962
 American Revolution of 1776
 Anarchism, Italy
 Anarchism, Korea
 Andresote and the Revolt against the
 Guipuzcoana (1731–1733)
 Angolan national liberation, 1961–1974
 Anti-apartheid movement, South Africa
 Anti-monarchy protests, Portugal
 Arafat, Yasser (1929–2004), Fatah, and the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO)
 Armenia, mass protest and popular mobilization, 1980s to present
 Aung San (1915–1947)
 Baltic protests in the 20th century
 Bangladesh, struggle for liberation, 1971
 Begin, Menachem (1913–1992)
 and the Irgun
 Belize, national independence movement
 Bengal, popular uprisings and movements in the colonial era
 Ben-Gurion, David (1866–1973)
 and the Haganah
 Black nationalism, 19th and 20th centuries
 Bolivia, struggle for independence,
 1809–1825
 Bose, Subhas Chandra (1897–1945)
 Botswana, protest and nationalism
 Brazil, rebellions from independence
 to the republic (1700s–1889)
 Bulgaria, independence movement,
 1830–1835
 Burkina Faso, Revolution, 1983
 Burma, democracy movement
 Burma, national movement against
 British colonial rule
 Cambodia, anti-colonial protests,
 1863–1945
 Cambodia, rebellion against France
 Canudos, religion and rebellion
 in 19th-century Brazil

- Cape Verde, independence struggle
 Castro, Fidel (b. 1926)
 Central Asian protest movements
 Chávez, Hugo (b. 1954)
 Chilembwe, John (1871–1915)
 Chimurenga armed struggles
 China, student protests, 20th century
 Chinese Nationalist Revolution, 1911
 Collins, Michael (1890–1922)
 Comunero movement
 Congo Crisis, 1960–1965
 Connolly, James (1868–1916)
 Corsican independence movement
 Côte d’Ivoire, pre-independence
 protest and liberation
 Cuauhtémoc (1502–1525)
 Cuba, struggle for independence
 from Spain, 1868–1898
 Cuban Revolution, 1953–1959
 Cyprus, protest and revolt
 Dessalines, Jean-Jacques (1758–1806)
 De Valera, Eamon (1882–1975)
 Dominican Republic, protest and resistance to US imperialism,
 1916–1962
 Dominican Republic, protests,
 1844–1915
 Dutch Caribbean, protest and
 revolution, 1815–2000
 Dutch Revolt, 1568–1648
 East Timor, anti-colonial struggle,
 1974 to independence
 Easter Rising and the Irish Civil War
 Ecuador, protest and revolution
 Egypt, Revolution of 1952
 Emmet, Robert (1778–1803) and Emmet’s Rebellion
 English Revolution, 17th century
 ETA Liberation Front (Euzkadi ta Askatasuna) and Basque nationalism
 Ethiopia, Revolution of 1974
 Ethnic and nationalist revolts in the Hapsburg Empire, 1500–1848
 European revolutions of 1848
 Finland, civil war and revolution,
 1914–1918
 Food sovereignty and protest
 Francophone Africa, protest and independence
 FRELIMO (Frente de Libertação de Moçambique)
 French Caribbean in the Age of Revolution
 French Guiana, political movements
 against departmentalization
 French Polynesia, protest movements
 Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand
 (1869–1948)
 Garibaldi, Giuseppe (1807–1882)
 German nationalism and workers’ movements, 19th century
 Germany, socialism and nationalism
 Gonne, Maud (1866–1953)
 Greek nationalism
 Guadeloupe, labor protest
 Guinea-Bissau, nationalist movement
 Guyana, protests and revolts
 Haiti, revolutionary revolts, 1790s
 Haitian Revolution and independence,
 1801–1804
 Hidalgo y Costilla, Miguel (1753–1811)
 Hitler, Adolf (1889–1945) and
 German Nazism
 Hô Chi Minh (Nguyen Tat Thanh)
 (1890–1969)
 Hungary, protests, 1815–1920
 India, armed struggle in the independence movement
 India, civil disobedience movement and demand for independence
 India, Great Rebellion of 1857
 (the Sepoy Revolt)
 Indochina, World War II and liberation in Indonesia, colonial protests,
 16th century to 1900
 Indonesian revolution and
 counterrevolution
 Iran, Kurdish national autonomy movement
 Iran, the Mossadegh era:
 democratic socialists and the US-backed coup
 Iraq, Revolution of 1958
 Ireland, Great Rebellion, 1798
 Irish nationalism
 Irish revolts, 1400–1790
 Italian Risorgimento
 Jagan, Cheddi (1918–1997)
 Jamaica, independence movement,
 1950–present
 Kashmir, under India
 Kaunda, Kenneth (b. 1924)
 Kenyatta, Jomo (1893–1978)
 Khama, Seretse (1921–1980)
 and Botswana nationalism

- Kosovo, civil and armed resistance, 1990s
 Kurdistan nationalist movement and the PKK (Kurdistan Workers' Party)
 Lanka Sama Samaja Party (LSSP) and Sri Lankan radicalism
 Lebanon, civil war, 1975–1990
 Lesotho, popular protest and resistance
 Lumumba, Patrice (1925–1961)
 Malawi national liberation
 Malaysia, protest and revolt
 Mali, protests and uprisings, 1850s–2005
 Malta, protest and revolution
 Martí, José (1853–1895) and the Partido Revolucionario Cubano
 Mau Mau Rebellion, 1952–1959
 Micronesia, nationalist and labor protests
 Moro national liberation
 Mugabe, Robert (b. 1924)
 Namibia, struggle for independence
 Négritude movement
 Nehru, Jawaharlal (1889–1964)
 Nkrumah, Kwame (1909–1972)
 O'Connell, Daniel (1775–1847)
 Pakistan, Bengali nationalist struggles
 Panama, nationalism, and popular mobilization, 1947–2000
 Parnell, Charles Stewart (1846–1891)
 Philippines, colonial protests during the Spanish era
 Pilsudski, Józef (1867–1935)
 Polish Revolution (Sejm), 1788–1792
 Puerto Rican independence movement, 1898–present
 Qadafi, Muammar al- (b. 1942)
 Québécois nationalism and Lévesque, René (1922–1987)
 Ríos, Filiberto Ojeda (1933–2005)
 Saya San (Hsaya San) movement of the 1930s
 Silesian Uprisings
 South Africa, African nationalism and the ANC
 Student movements, Europe
 Sudanese protest under Anglo-Egyptian rule
 Sun Yat-Sen (1866–1925)
 SWAPO (South West African People's Organization)
 Swaziland, nationalist and economic protests
 Taiping Rebellion, 1851–1864
 Taiwan, anti-imperialism and nationalism
 Taiwan, 2-28 protests, 1947
 Tajikistan, protests and revolts
 Taliban, 1996–2007
 Tamil nationalist struggle for Eelam
 Tanzania, protest and independence
 Thailand, Patani Malay nationalism
 Toussaint Louverture and the Haitian Revolution, 1796–1799
 Trinidad, anti-colonial movement
 Turkish rebellions, 1918–1925
 Turkmenistan, protest and revolt
 Uganda, protests against British colonialism and occupation
 Velasco Alvarado, Juan Francisco (1910–1977)
 Venezuelan War of Independence
 Vieques
 Vietnam, anti-colonial, nationalist, and communist movements, 1900–1939
 Washington, George (1732–1799)
 Women in the 1848 Revolution, Poland
 Women and national liberation in Africa
 Women's movement, Haiti
 Women's movement, Southern Africa
 Yugoslavia, formation of the non-aligned movement
 Zambian nationalism and protests
- Non-Violence
 Abalone Alliance
 Addams, Jane (1860–1935)
 Berkeley Free Speech Movement
 Catholic Worker movement
 Cedar Revolution, Lebanon
 Chipko movement
 Civil Rights movement, United States, 1960–1965
 Clayoquot Sound
 Color revolutions
 Cordobazo and Rosariazo Uprising, 1969
 CORE (Congress of Racial Equality)
 Debs, Eugene (1855–1926)
 Food Not Bombs, United States
 Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand (1869–1948)
 Greenpeace
 India, civil disobedience movement and demand for independence
 India, non-violent non-cooperation movement, 1918–1929
 Indian national liberation
 Khuda-i Khidmatgar: Pashtun non-violent resistance force (1929–1948)

King, Martin Luther, Jr. (1929–1968)
 and the Southern Christian
 Leadership Conference (SCLC)
 Kosovo, civil and armed resistance,
 1990s
 La Boétie, Etienne de (1530–1563)
 Madagascar, protests and revolts,
 19th and 20th centuries
 Madres de la Plaza de Mayo
 Mendes, Chico (1944–1988) and Amazonian rainforest protest and resistance
 Non-violent movements: foundations and early expressions
 Non-violent movements: struggles
 for rights, justice, and identities
 Non-violent revolutions
 Northern Ireland peace movement
 Norway, protest and revolution
 O’Connell, Daniel (1775–1847)
 Oaxaca uprising, 2006
 Parks, Rosa (1913–2005) and the
 Montgomery Bus Boycott
 Paul, Alice (1885–1977)
 Peterloo Massacre, 1819
 Sharp, Gene (b. 1928)
 Student Non-Violent Coordinating
 Committee (SNCC)
 Taiwan, land reform
 Ukraine Orange Revolution, 2004–2005
 Velvet Revolution, 1989
 Winstanley, Gerrard (1609–1676)
 Women and national liberation in Africa
 World Trade Organization (WTO) protests,
 Seattle, 1999
 Zambian nationalism and protests

Peace and Anti-War

Addams, Jane (1860–1935)
 American left and Howard Zinn (b. 1922)
 Anti-nuclear protest movements
 Anti-Vietnam War movement, Britain
 Anti-Vietnam War movement,
 United States
 Anti-war activism, Yugoslavia, 1990s
 Anti-war movement, France,
 20th century
 Anti-war movement, Iraq
 Aptheker, Herbert (1915–1903)
 Australia, anti-war movement
 Britain, anti-war movement, 1775–1783
 Cannon, James P. (1890–1974)
 and American Trotskyism
 Catholic Worker movement

Civil rights, United States, Black
 Power and backlash, 1965–1978
 Colombia, anti-war movements,
 1990–2008
 Counterrecruitment
 Day, Dorothy (1897–1980)
 Debs, Eugene (1855–1926)
 Food Not Bombs, United States
 Fox, George (1624–1691)
 G8 protests, Gleneagles, 2005
 G8 protests, Heiligendamm, June 2007
 Germany, Green movement
 Germany, Red Army Faction
 (Baader-Meinhof Group)
 International Congress of Women at The Hague
 Israeli peace movement
 Italy, anti-war movement, 1980–2005
 Japan, pacifist movement, 1945–present
 Jaures, Jean (1859–1914)
 Kelly, Petra (1947–1992)
 Kent State student uprising
 King, Martin Luther, Jr. (1929–1968)
 and the Southern Christian
 Leadership Conference (SCLC)
 May 1968 French uprisings
 Music, songs, and protest, France
 Non-interventionists, 1914–1945
 Northern Ireland peace movement
 Paine, Thomas (1737–1809)
 Russell, Bertrand (1872–1970)
 Student movements,
 Czechoslovakia, 1980s
 Student movements, Europe
 Students for a Democratic Society (SDS)
 Thompson, Edward Palmer (E. P.)
 (1924–1993)
 Yugoslavia, formation of the non-aligned movement
 Yugoslavia, Marxist humanism,
Praxis group, and the Korčula
 Summer School, 1964–1974
 Zenroren Labor Federation

Peasant, Agrarian, and Rural Agbekoya Peasant Uprising and
 Rebellion, 1968–1969
 Andresote and the Revolt against the
 Guipuzcoana (1731–1733)
 Anti-Corn Law agitation, Britain,
 19th century
 Aptheker, Herbert (1915–1903)
 Arch, Joseph (1826–1919)

- Argentina, Grito de Alcorta Peasant Rebellion, 1912
 Assembly of the Poor
 Bacon's Rebellion
 Banana Plantation Worker Rebellion, 1928
 Bengal, popular uprisings and movements in the colonial era
 Bezerra, Gregório (1900–1983)
 Bolivia, War of the Pacific to the National Revolution, 1879–1952
 Bolotnikov's Rebellion, 1606–1607
 Brazil, peasant movements and liberation theology
 Bread Riots, Britain, 1795
 Britain, peasant uprisings, 16th century
 Bukharin, Nikolai Ivanovich (1888–1938)
 Bulavin's Rebellion, 1707–1708
 Cabanagem of Grão-Pará, Brazil, 1835–1840
 Cárdenas, Lázaro (1895–1970)
 Carney, James Francis "Guadalupe" (1925–1983?)
 Chávez, César (1927–1993) and the United Farm Workers
 Chernov, Victor (1873–1952)
 Chile, people's power
 China, Maoism and popular power, 1949–1969
 China, peasant revolts in the empire
 Chinese Communist Revolution, 1925–1949
 Chipko movement
 Colombia, armed insurgency, peasant self-defense, and radical popular movements, 1960s–1970s
 Colombia, armed insurgency, peasant self-defense, and radical popular movements, 1970s–1990s
 Colombia, labor insurrection and the Socialist Revolutionary Party, 1920s–1930s
 Cuban Revolution, 1953–1959
 Davitt, Michael (1846–1906)
 Denmark, insurrection and revolt
 Díaz Soto y Gama, Antonio (1880–1967)
 Dominican Republic, protest and resistance to US imperialism, 1916–1962
 East Anglian Wheat County Riots, 1816
 Ecuador, indigenous and popular struggles
 Ecuador, protest and revolution
 Egypt, Peasant Rebellion of 1824
 Enclosure movement, protests against
 English Revolution, radical sects
 European revolutions of 1848
 Farabundo Martí National Liberation Front (FMLN)
 Farm Labor Organizing Committee
 German Peasant Rebellion, 1525
 Greencorn Rebellion, Oklahoma, 1917
 Guatemala, popular rebellion and civil war
 Guatemala, worker struggles and the labor movement, 1960s–1990s
 Guevara, Ernesto "Che" (1928–1967)
 Gustav Rebellions
 Haiti, revolutionary struggles
 Huerta, Dolores (b. 1930)
 Huk Rebellion, 1946–1954
 India, civil disobedience movement and demand for independence
 India, Great Rebellion of 1857 (the Sepoy Revolt)
 India, post-World War II upsurge
 Indigo Rebellion
 Ireland, Great Rebellion, 1798
 Italy, peasant movements, 19th–20th centuries
 Jamaica, peasant uprisings, 19th century
 Japan, post-World War II protest movements
 Japan, protest and revolt, 1800–1945
 Japan, resistance to construction of Narita airport
 Katarismo and indigenous popular mobilization, Bolivia, 1970s–present
 Khmelnytsky Uprising
 Korea, peasant and farmers' movement
 Korea, popular rebellions and uprisings, 1492–1910
La Matanza 1932 Peasant Revolt
 Lebanon, 19th-century revolts
 Ligas Camponesas
 Lorenzo Zelaya Popular Revolutionary Forces
 Luxembourg, protest and revolution
 Madagascar, protests and revolts, 19th and 20th centuries
 Madera Uprising, Chihuahua, 1965
 Magón, Ricardo Flores (1874–1922) and the Magonistas
 Malta, protest and revolution
 Martí, Farabundo (1893–1932)
 Mazumdar, Charu (1918–1972)

Mendes, Chico (1944–1988)
 and Amazonian rainforest
 protest and resistance
 Mexican Revolution of 1910–1921
 Mexico, armed political movements,
 1960s–present
 Mexico, indigenous and peasant
 struggles, 1980s–present
 Moplah Revolts
 Morais, Clodomir de (b. 1928)
 Movimento Sem Terra (MST)
 Müntzer, Thomas (ca. 1489–1525)
 Naxalite movement, 1967–1972
 Nordic revolts and popular protests,
 1500–present
 Norway, protest and revolution
 Pakistan, Bengali nationalist struggles
 Paraguay, protest and revolt, 1954–1989
 Paraguay, protest in the post-Stroessner era
 Peru, labor and peasant
 mobilizations, 1900–1950
 Philippines, protest during the US era
 Populism
 Pugachev’s Rebellion, 1773–1775
 Reformation
 Romania, protest and revolution,
 20th century
 Romania, protests and revolts,
 18th and 19th centuries
 Russia, Revolution of 1905–1907
 Russia, Revolution of October/
 November 1917
 Russian revolutionary labor upsurge,
 1912–1914
 Saya San (Hsaya San) movement of the 1930s
 Shays’ Rebellion
 Silva, Lyndolpho (b. 1924)
 Sun Yat-Sen (1866–1925)
 Swing Riots
 Swiss Peasants’ War of 1653
 Taiping Rebellion, 1851–1864
 Taiwan, land reform
 Tanzania, protest and independence
 Thailand, popular movements,
 1980s–present
 Torres Restrepo, Camilo (1929–1966)
 Turkish republic protests, 1923–1946
 União dos Lavradores e Trabalhadores
 Agrícolas do Brasil (ULTAB-Brazil)
 Uruguay, labor and populist movements,
 1965–present

Velasco Alvarado, Juan Francisco
 (1910–1977)
 Via Campesina and peasant struggles
 Vietnam, anti-colonial, nationalist, and communist movements, 1900–1939
 Wales, nationalist protest, 19th century
 War communism and the rise of the Soviet Union
 Women’s movement, Cuba
 Women’s movement, Greece,
 formation of
 Women’s movement, Haiti
 Women’s movement, Latin America
 Women’s War of 1929
 Yaa Asantewaa (ca. 1840–1921)
 Yemen Socialist Revolution of 1962
 Yi Ho Tuan (Boxer) Rebellion
 Young Ireland
 Zambian nationalism and protests
 Zanzibar Revolution
 Zimbabwe, labor movement, 1890–1980
 Zimbabwe, national liberation movement
 Zimbabwe People’s Army (ZIPA)

Philosophy and Theory

Adorno, Theodor W. (1903–1969)
 Anarchism
 Anarchocommunist
 Anarchosyndicalism
 Arendt, Hannah (1906–1975)
 Autonomism
 Bauer, Otto (1881–1938)
 Benjamin, Walter (1892–1940)
 Bernstein, Eduard (1850–1932)
 Boal, Augusto (b. 1931)
 Bolívar, Simón (1783–1830)
 Bolivarianism, Venezuela
 Bolsheviks
 Bukharin, Nikolai Ivanovich (1888–1938)
 Camus, Albert (1913–1960)
 Castoriadis, Cornelius (1922–1997)
 Césaire, Aimé (1913–2008)
 Charismatic leadership and revolution
 Chernyshevsky, Nikolai G. (1828–1889)
 Chomsky, Noam (b. 1928)
 Class identity and protest
 Class, poverty, and revolution
 Class struggle
 Color revolutions
 Commoner, Barry (b. 1917)
Communist Manifesto
 Comte, Auguste (1798–1857)
 Condorcet, Marquis de (1743–1794)

- Cornelissen, Christianus Gerardus (1864–1942)
 Counterrevolution
 Critical theory
 Debord, Guy (1931–1994) and the Spectacle
 Deleuze, Gilles (1925–1995), Guattari, Félix (1930–1992), and the global justice movement
 Dictatorship of the proletariat
 Diderot, Denis (1713–1784)
 Du Bois, W. E. B. (1868–1963)
 Dunayevskaya, Raya (1910–1987)
 Eco-anarchism
 Engels, Friedrich (1820–1895)
 Enlightenment, France, 18th century
 Eurocommunism
 Fanon, Frantz (1925–1961)
 Fascism, protest and revolution
 Foreign intervention and revolution
 Fourier, Charles François Marie (1772–1837) and the Phalanx Utopians
 Frankfurt School (Jewish émigrés)
 Freire, Paulo (1921–1997)
 French Revolution, historians' interpretations
 Fuller, Margaret (1810–1850)
 Garvey, Marcus (1887–1940) and Garveyism
 Global justice movement and resistance
 Godwin, William (1756–1836)
 Goldman, Emma (1869–1940)
 Gouges, Olympe de (1745–1793)
 Gramsci, Antonio (1891–1937)
 Guillén, Abraham (1913–1993)
 Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich (1770–1831)
 Hirschfeld, Magnus (1868–1935)
 Hobbes, Thomas (1588–1679)
 Holbach, Baron d' (1723–1789)
 Imperialism and capitalist development
 Imperialism, historical evolution
 Imperialism, modernization to globalization
 International socialism: mass politics
 Islamic political currents
 Italy, operaism and post-operaism
 Jabotinsky, Vladimir (Ze'ev) (1880–1940) and revisionist Zionism
 James, C. L. R. (1901–1989)
 Khuda-i Khidmatgar: Pashtun non-violent resistance force (1929–1948)
 King, Martin Luther, Jr. (1929–1968) and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC)
 Kollontai, Alexandra (1872–1952)
 Kropotkin, Peter (1842–1921)
 La Boétie, Etienne de (1530–1563)
 Landauer, Gustav (1870–1919)
 Latin America, Catholic Church and liberation, 16th century to present
 Latin American punk rock and protest
 Lenin, Vladimir Ilyich (1870–1924)
 Leninist philosophy
 Lesbian, gay, transsexual, bisexual movements
 Liebknecht, Karl (1871–1919)
 Lilburne, John (1615–1657)
 Locke, John (1632–1704)
 Lukács, Georg (1885–1971)
 Luther, Martin (1483–1546)
 Luxemburg, Rosa (1870–1919)
 Malatesta, Errico (1853–1932)
 Mandel, Ernest (1923–1995)
 Mao Zedong (1893–1976)
 Marat, Jean-Paul (1743–1793)
 Marcuse, Herbert (1898–1979)
 Marianne, French revolutionary icon
 Marx, Karl (1818–1883)
 Marxism
 Mazzini, Giuseppe (1805–1872)
Mein Kampf
 Migration struggles and the global justice movement
 Montesquieu, Baron de (1689–1755)
 Multitude
 Négritude movement
 Nehru, Jawaharlal (1889–1964)
 Neoliberalism and protest
 Nietzsche, Friedrich (1844–1900)
 Non-violent movements: foundations and early expressions
 Non-violent revolutions
 Nyerere, Julius (1922–1999)
 Owen, Robert (1771–1858)
 Paine, Thomas (1737–1809)
 Participatory democracy, history of Plekhanov, Georgi (1856–1918)
 Populism
 Postcolonial feminism and protest in the global South
 Poulantzas, Nicos (1936–1979)
 Printing press and protest
 Protest and revolution, stages in Proudhon, Pierre Joseph (1809–1865)

- Punk movement
 - Reclus, Elisée (1830–1905)
 - Reformation
 - Revolution, dialectics of
 - Rousseau, Jean-Jacques (1712–1778)
 - Russell, Bertrand (1872–1970)
 - Saint-Simon, Comte de (1760–1825)
 - Sartre, Jean-Paul (1905–1980)
 - Science and revolution
 - Sexuality and revolution
 - Shakers Utopian Community
 - Sharp, Gene (b. 1928)
 - Shiva, Vandana (b. 1952)
 - Sieyès, Abbé (1748–1836)
 - Situationists
 - Smith, Adam (1723–1790)
 - Socialism
 - Spartacus, historical and modern era
 - Spence, Thomas (1750–1814)
 - Spinoza, Baruch (1632–1677)
 - Sturm und Drang
 - Tolstoy, Leo N. (1828–1910)
 - Trotsky, Leon (1879–1940)
 - Ujamaa* villages
 - Utopian communities, United States
 - Vaneigem, Raoul (b.1934)
 - Vanguard Party
 - Vegetarian protests and movements
 - Voltaire (1694–1778)
 - Walker, David (ca. 1796–1830)
 - Webb, Sidney (1859–1947) and Beatrice (1858–1943)
 - Williams, Eric (1911–1981)
 - Williams, Raymond Henry (1921–1988)
 - Wollstonecraft, Mary (1759–1797)
 - Women’s movement, France
 - Women’s movement, Germany
 - Young Hegelians
 - Yugoslavia, Marxist humanism, Praxis group, and the Korčula Summer School, 1964–1974
 - Zapatismo
 - Zionism
 - Žižek, Slavoj (b. 1949)
- Political Movements, Uprisings, and Parties
- Algerian Islamic Salvation Front
 - Alianza Popular Revolucionaria Americana
 - American left and Howard Zinn (b. 1922)
 - Anti-fascist People’s Front
 - Arafat, Yasser (1929–2004), Fatah, and the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO)
 - Argentina, piquetero movement
 - Argentina, social and political protest, 2001–2007
 - ATTAC (Association for the Taxation of Financial Transactions for the Aid of Citizens)
 - Australia, new social movements
 - Babeuf, François-Noël (1760–1797) and the Conspiracy of Equals
 - Begin, Menachem (1913–1992) and the Irgun
 - Belgium, 20th-century political conflict
 - Berkeley Free Speech Movement
 - Bin Laden, Osama (b. 1957) and al-Qaeda
 - Black nationalism, 19th and 20th centuries
 - Black September
 - Bogotazo* and La Violencia
 - Bolivarianism, Venezuela
 - Brandreth, Jeremiah (1790–1817) and the Pentrich Rising
 - Brazil, guerilla movements, 20th century
 - Bristol Riots, 1831
 - Britain, peasant uprisings, 16th century
 - Bulgaria, anti-Soviet movements
 - Burma, democracy movement
 - Canada, law and public protest: history
 - Canada, Rebellion of 1837–1838
 - Cannon, James P. (1890–1974) and American Trotskyism
 - Caracazo*, 1989
 - Catalan protests against centralism
 - Cedar Revolution, Lebanon
 - Chartists
 - Chávez, Hugo and the Bolivarian Revolution, 1998–present
 - Chile, people’s power
 - Chile, protests and military coup, 1973
 - China, Maoism and popular power, 1949–1969
 - China, protest and revolution, 1800–1911
 - Cocaleros* Peasant Uprising
 - Cochabamba Water Wars
 - Colombia, Thousand Days’ War, 1899–1902
 - Colombia, unions, strikes, and anti-neoliberal opposition, 1990–2005
 - Color revolutions
 - Communist Party of Australia
 - Communist Party, France
 - Communist Party, Germany

- Communist Party NZ and the
 New Zealand revolutionary left
 Communist Party of South Africa,
 1921–1950
 Communist Party of the United States of America (CPUSA)
 Comunero movement
 Condorcet, Marquis de (1743–1794)
 Confederación Nacional del
 Trabajo (CNT)
 Confédération Générale du Travail and Syndicaliste Révolutionnaire
 Congo armed insurgency,
 Mobutu decamps
 Congo Crisis, 1960–1965
 Cordobazo and Rosariazo Uprising, 1969
 COSATU (Congress of South
 African Trade Unions)
 Costa Rican Civil War and Uprising, 1948
 Côte d'Ivoire, post-independence protest
 Counterrevolution, France, 1789–1830
 Cromwell, Oliver (1599–1658)
 Cuba, anti-racist movement and the Partido Independiente de Color
 Cuban post-revolutionary protests
 Cuban Revolution, 1953–1959
 Cuban revolutionary government
 Cyprus, protest and revolt
 Czechoslovakia, resistance to
 Soviet political and economic rule
 Directory, France, 1795–1799
 Dominican Republic, protest and resistance to US imperialism,
 1916–1962
 Ecuador, protest and revolution
 Egypt, Revolution of 1952
 Eighteenth Brumaire
 Ejército de Liberación Nacional,
 Colombia
El Argentinazo: December 19 and 20, 2001
 English Revolution, 17th century
 Enlightenment, France, 18th century
 EPL Maoist guerilla movement
 EPR (Ejército Popular Revolucionario)
 Escuela Moderna movement
 (The Modern School)
 Estates General, France
 ETA Liberation Front (Euzkadi ta Askatasuna) and Basque nationalism Ethnic and nationalist revolts in
 the Hapsburg Empire, 1500–1848
 European revolutions of 1848
 Ezeiza Protest and Massacre, 1973
 Farabundo Martí National Liberation
 Front (FMLN)
 FARC (Revolutionary Armed Forces and Popular Liberation Army)
 Federación Anarquista Ibérica (FAI)
 Federation of Salvadoran Workers
 (FENASTRAS)
 Fiji, parliamentary insurrection
 FPMR (Frente Patrioco Manuel Rodriguez)
 France, 1830 Revolution
 FRELIMO (Frente de Libertação de Moçambique)
 French Revolution, 1789–1794
 Gaitán, Jorge Eliécer (1898–1948),
 UNIR, and revolutionary
 populism in Colombia
 Germany, Green movement
 Germany, socialism and nationalism
 Glorious Revolution, Britain, 1688
 Gorbachev, Mikhail (b. 1931)
 Green bans movement, Australia
 Grenadian Revolution, 1979–1983
 Gunawardena, Don Philip Rupasinghe
 (1901–1972)
 Guyana, protests and revolts
 Haiti, protest and rebellion, 20th century
 Hamas: origins and development
 Hasan al-Banna (1906–1949) and
 the Muslim Brotherhood
 Haya de la Torre, Victor Raúl
 (1895–1979)
 Hezbollah: organization and uprisings
 Hungary, protests, 1815–1920
 Hungary, Revolution of 1956
 India, Hindutva and fascist mobilizations,
 1989–2002
 India, non-violent non-cooperation
 movement, 1918–1929
 Indonesian revolution and
 counterrevolution
 Industrial Workers of the World (IWW)
 Internationals
 Intifada I and Intifada II
 Iran, political and cultural
 protests, 1844–1914
 Iranian Revolution, 1979
 Irish Republican Army (IRA)
 Islamic political currents
 Italian Communist Party
 Italian Risorgimento

- Italian Socialist Party
 Jacobite risings, Britain, 1715 and 1745
 Japan Socialist Party (JSP)
 Japanese Communist Party
 Katarismo and indigenous popular mobilization, Bolivia, 1970s–present
 Kaunda, Kenneth (b. 1924)
 Kautsky, Karl (1854–1938)
 Kelly, Edward “Ned” (1855–1880) and the Kelly Gang
 Kenyatta, Jomo (1893–1978)
 Khama, Seretse (1921–1980) and Botswana nationalism
 Khmer Rouge and Pol Pot
 Khuda-i Khidmatgar: Pashtun non-violent resistance force (1929–1948)
 Korea, popular rebellions and uprisings, 1492–1910
 Kosovo, civil and armed resistance, 1990s
 Kurdistan nationalist movement and the PKK (Kurdistan Workers’ Party)
 Labour Party, Britain
 Lanka Sama Samaja Party (LSSP) and Sri Lankan radicalism
 Liberia, protest and revolution in the modern era
 M-19 of Colombia
 Machado, popular Cuban anti-government struggle, 1930s
 Magón, Ricardo Flores (1874–1922) and the Magonistas
 Movimento Sem Terra (MST)
 MPLA (Movimento Popular de Libertação de Angola)
 MRTA (Movimiento Revolucionario Túpac Amaru)
 Nepal, people’s war and Maoists
 New Australia movement
 New Jewel movement
 Nigeria, 1993 political and electoral protest and conflict
 Nigeria, protest and revolution, 20th century
 Oaxaca uprising, 2006
 Obregón, Alvaro (1880–1928) and the Sonoran generation
 Ontario Coalition Against Poverty (OCAP)
 Paraguay, protests in the liberal era and the Triple Alliance
 Partito di Unità Proletaria–Democrazia Proletaria
 People’s Liberation Front of Sri Lanka (JVP)
 Philippines, protests, 1980s–present
 Poland, Committee for Workers (KOR)
 Polish Revolution (Sejm), 1788–1792
 Polish Revolution, 1905–1907
 POUM (Workers’ Party of Marxist Unification)
 Reform Acts, Britain and Ireland, 1832
 Robespierre, Maximilien de (1758–1794)
 Russian Civil War, 1918–1924
 Salvadoran Civil War, 1980–1991
 Serbia, anti-bureaucratic revolution, 1987–1989
 Sinn Féin
 Slovenian National Liberation Front (Osvobodilna Fronta), 1941–1944
 Social Democratic Party, Germany
 Socialist Party, United States
 Socialist Workers’ Party of Germany (Sozialistische Arbeiterpartei Deutschlands)
 Sojourner Truth Organization
 Solidarność (Solidarity)
 South Africa, African nationalism and the ANC
 South African Communist Party, 1953–present
 Soviet Union, fall of
 Spanish Revolution
 SWAPO (South West African People’s Organization)
 Swedish Revolution of 1809
 Thai Communist Party
 Tibet Uprising and resistance
 Trinidad, parliamentary crisis
 Tulip Revolution, Kyrgyzstan
 Turkey, protest and revolution, 1800s–1923
 Turkish republic protests, 1923–1946
 Ukraine Orange Revolution, 2004–2005
 Unión Patriótica
 United Englishmen/United Britons
 United Irishmen
 United Scotsmen
 Venezuela, exclusionary democracy and resistance, 1958–1998
 Venezuela, MAS and Causa Radical
 Venezuela, MBR–200 and the military uprisings of 1992
 Vinegar Hill/Castle Hill Rebellion, 1804
 Zapatistas, EZLN, and the Chiapas uprising

Religion

- Algerian Islamic Salvation Front
 al-Sanusi, Muhammad ibn Ali
 (ca. 1787–1859)
 Amana Inspirationist Utopians
 Anabaptist movement
 Aristide, Jean-Bertrand (b. 1953)
 Arundel, Lady Blanche (1583–1649)
 Bacha-i Sakkao's movement
 Begin, Menachem (1913–1992)
 and the Irgun
 Bengal, popular uprisings and movements in the colonial era
 Ben-Gurion, David (1866–1973)
 and the Haganah
 Bin Laden, Osama (b. 1957)
 and al-Qaeda
 Böhm, Hans (also Hans Behem)
 (1458?–1476)
 Brazil, peasant movements and liberation theology
 Britain, peasant uprisings, 16th century
 Britain, Renaissance-era conflict
 Burdett, Sir Francis (1770–1844)
 Burma, national movement against
 British colonial rule
 Cabañas, Lucio (1938–1974)
 Calvin, John (1509–1564)
 Canudos, religion and rebellion
 in 19th-century Brazil
 Cardenal, Ernesto (b. 1925)
 Carney, James Francis “Guadalupe”
 (1925–1983?)
 Caste war of Yucatan (Guerra
 de castas en Yucatan)
 Catalan protests against centralism
 Catholic emancipation
 Catholic Worker movement
 Central Asian protest movements
 Chakravartty, Renu (1917–1994)
 China, protest and revolution, 1800–1911
 Counterrevolution, France, 1789–1830
 Cristero uprising, Mexico, 1928
 Cromwell, Oliver (1599–1658)
 Cuban post-revolutionary protests
 Dalit liberation struggles
 Daquilema, Fernando (d. 1872)
 and the 1871 Uprising, Ecuador
 Day, Dorothy (1897–1980)
 Demerara Slave Rebellion, 1823
 Denmark, insurrection and revolt
 Diderot, Denis (1713–1784)
 Dreyfus Affair
 Dutch Caribbean, protest and
 revolution, 1815–2000
 Dutch Revolt, 1568–1648
 Easter Rising and the Irish Civil War
 Edict of Nantes
 English Reformation
 English Revolution, 17th century
 English Revolution, radical sects
 Enlightenment, France, 18th century
 Father Rapp (1757–1847) and Harmony
 Fawkes, Guy (1570–1606) and
 the Gunpowder Plot
 Fell, Margaret (1614–1702)
 Fifth Monarchist women
 Fox, George (1624–1691)
 German Democratic Republic
 protests, 1945–1989
 German Peasant Rebellion, 1525
 German Reformation
 Gordon “No Popery” Riots, Britain, 1780
 Gutiérrez, Gustavo (b. 1928)
 Haiti, democratic uprising, 1980s–1991
 Hamas: origins and development
 Hasan al-Banna (1906–1949) and
 the Muslim Brotherhood
 Hezbollah: organization and uprisings
 Hindu nationalism, Hindutva, and women
 Hutchinson, Anne (1591–1643)
 Hutterites
 Immigrant and social conflict, France
 India, Hindutva and fascist
 mobilizations, 1989–2002
 India, nationalism, extremist
 Intifada I and Intifada II
 Iran, political and cultural protests, 1844–1914
 Iranian Revolution, 1979
 Ireland, Age of Revolutions, 1775–1803
 Ireland, the Troubles
 Irish revolts, 1400–1790
 Islamic political currents
 Israeli peace movement
 Jabotinsky, Vladimir (Ze'ev)
 (1880–1940) and revisionist Zionism
 Jewish resistance to Nazism
 Jews and revolution in Europe,
 1789–1919
 Kashmir, under India
 Khomeini, Ayatollah Sayyid
 Ruhollah Mussaui (1902–1989)
 and the Shi'ite Islamic Revolution
 Khuda-i Khidmatgar: Pashtun non-violent resistance force (1929–1948)

- Latin America, Catholic Church and liberation, 16th century to present
 Lebanese insurrection of 1958
 Lebanon, civil war, 1975–1990
 Lebanon, 19th-century revolts
 Lugo, Fernando (b. 1951)
 Luther, Martin (1483–1546)
 Madagascar, protests and revolts, 19th and 20th centuries
 Mahdist Revolt
 Malta, protest and revolution
 Moplah Revolts
 Moravian Brothers
 Moro national liberation
 Müntzer, Thomas (ca. 1489–1525)
 Nasrallah, Sayed Hassan (b. 1960)
 Nicaraguan Revolution, 1970s–1980s
 Nietzsche, Friedrich (1844–1900)
 Oneida Perfectionist Utopians
 Paisley, Ian (b. 1926) and Unionism, Northern Ireland
 Philippines, colonial protests during the Spanish era
 Ranters
 Reformation
 Romania, protest and revolution, 20th century
 Romero, Óscar (1917–1980), Archbishop
 St. Bartholomew’s Day Massacre
 Salvadoran Civil War, 1980–1991
 Saud, Abd al-Aziz ibn (ca. 1880–1953) and the founding of modern Saudi Arabia
 Scottish Reformation
 Shakers Utopian Community
 Slovakia, dissidence in the 1970s
 Spinoza, Baruch (1632–1677)
 Sudan, Aba Island Rebellion, 1970
 Sudanese protest under Anglo-Egyptian rule
 Sudanese protest in the Turko-Egyptian era
 Taiping Rebellion, 1851–1864
 Tajikistan, protests and revolts
 Taliban, 1996–2007
 Thailand, Patani Malay nationalism
 Tianjin Massacre, 1870
 Tibet Uprising and resistance
 Tolstoy, Leo N. (1828–1910)
 Turkey, anti-secular protest, 1980 to present
 Turkey, protest and revolution, 1800s–1923
 Turkish rebellions, 1918–1925
 Turkish republic protests, 1923–1946
 Turkmenistan, protest and revolt
 United Irishmen
 Utopian intentional communities
 Uzbekistan, national movement and protests
 Venezuela, Negro Miguel Rebellion, 1552
 Vietnam, anti-colonial, nationalist, and communist movements, 1900–1939
 Voltaire (1694–1778)
 Wales, nationalist protest, 19th century
 Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, 1943
 Wesley, John (1703–1791), Methodism, and social reform
 Woman’s Christian Temperance Union
 Women’s movement, France
 Women’s movement, United States, 16th–18th centuries
 Women’s movement, United States, 20th century
 Yi Ho Tuan (Boxer) Rebellion
 Young Ireland
 Zambian nationalism and protests
 Zionism
 Zwingli, Huldrych (1484–1531)
- Socialism and Communism
 Aboriginal/left struggle for land rights
 Afghanistan, 1978 Revolution and Islamic Civil War
 Albania, socialism
 Allende Gossens, Salvador (1908–1973)
 Anarchism, China
 Anarchism, France
 Anarchism, Hungary
 Anarchism, Japan
 Anarchism, Russia
 Anarchocommunist
 Anti-fascist People’s Front
 Anti-war movement, France, 20th century
 Arab left and socialist movements, 1861–1930
 Argentina, armed struggle and guerilla organizations, 1960s–1970s
 Argentina, general strike, 1975
 Argentina, socialist and communist workers’ movement
 Asturias Uprising, October 1934
 Australian left

- Babeuf, François-Noël (1760–1797)
and the Conspiracy of Equals
- Bakunin, Mikhail Alexandrovich
(1814–1876)
- Balkan socialist confederation, 1910–1948
- Benjamin, Walter (1892–1940)
- Berlinguer, Enrico (1922–1984)
- Bernstein, Eduard (1850–1932)
- Blanqui, Louis Auguste (1805–1881)
- Bolsheviks
- Brazil, guerilla movements, 20th century
- Brazil, workers and the left: Partido dos
Trabalhadores and Central Única dos Trabalhadores
- Britain, post-World War I army
mutinies and revolutionary threats
- Bukharin, Nikolai Ivanovich (1888–1938)
- Bulgaria, 20th-century leftist and workers' movements
- Bulgaria, anti-Soviet movements
- Bulgaria, World War II resistance and rise of communism
- Cambodia, communist protests
and revolution
- Cannon, James P. (1890–1974)
and American Trotskyism
- Castoriadis, Cornelius (1922–1997)
- Castro, Fidel (b. 1926)
- Catalan protests against centralism
- Chávez, Hugo (b. 1954)
- Chen Duxiu (1879–1942)
- Chernyshevsky, Nikolai G. (1828–1889)
- Chile and the peaceful road to socialism
- Chile, people's power
- Chile, social and political struggles, 1850–1970
- China, Maoism and popular power, 1949–1969
- Chinese Communist
Revolution, 1925–1949
- Class identity and protest
- Class, poverty, and revolution
- Class struggle
- Communist Manifesto*
- Communist Party of Australia
- Communist Party, France
- Communist Party, Germany
- Communist Party NZ and the
New Zealand revolutionary left
- Communist Party of South
Africa, 1921–1950
- Communist Party of the United States of America (CPUSA)
- Confederación Nacional del
Trabajo (CNT)
- Confédération Générale du Travail and
Syndicaliste Révolutionnaire
- Connolly, James (1868–1916)
- Cuba, transition to socialism and government
- Cuban Revolution, 1953–1959
- Cuban revolutionary government
- Czechoslovakia, resistance to Soviet political and economic rule
- Davis, Angela (b. 1944)
- Debs, Eugene (1855–1926)
- Decembrists to the rise of Russian Marxism
- Deng Xiaoping (1904–1997)
- Dictatorship of the proletariat
- Dimitrov, Georgi (1882–1949)
- Djilas, Milovan (1911–1995)
- Dutschke, Rudi (1940–1979)
- Ecuador, left and popular movements,
1940s to present
- Egypt and Arab socialism
- Engels, Friedrich (1820–1895)
- English Revolution, radical sects
- EPL Maoist guerilla movement
- EPR (Ejército Popular Revolucionario)
- Ethiopia, Revolution of 1974
- Eurocommunism
- FARC (Revolutionary Armed Forces
and Popular Liberation Army)
- Finland, civil war and revolution, 1914–1918
- Fourier, Charles François Marie
(1772–1837) and the Phalanx Utopians
- FPMR (Frente Patriótico Manuel Rodríguez)
- Francophone Africa, protest and independence
- Frankfurt School (Jewish émigrés)
- French Guiana, political movements
against departmentalization
- G8 protests, Genoa, 2001
- German Democratic Republic
protests, 1945–1989
- Germany, Green movement
- Germany, resistance to Nazism
- Germany, socialism and nationalism
- Ghana, nationalism and socialist transition
- Gramsci, Antonio (1891–1937)
- Greece, partisan resistance
- Greece, socialism, communism,
and the left, 1850–1974

- Greece, socialism, communism, and the left, 1974–2008
- Guatemala, popular rebellion and civil war
- Guevara, Ernesto “Che” (1928–1967)
- Gunawardena, Don Philip Rupasinghe (1901–1972)
- Hô Chi Minh (Nguyen Tat Thanh) (1890–1969)
- Hollywood Ten
- Huk Rebellion, 1946–1954
- Hungary, Revolution of 1956
- Indochina, World War II and liberation in
- Indonesian revolution and counterrevolution
- International socialism: mass politics
- Internationals
- Iraq, Revolution of 1958
- Italian Communist Party
- Italian labor movement
- Italian Socialist Party
- Italy, from the anti-fascist resistance to the new left (1945–1960)
- Italy, from the new left to the great repression (1962–1981)
- Italy, operaism and post-operaism
- James, C. L. R. (1901–1989)
- Japan Socialist Party (JSP)
- Japanese Communist Party
- Jaurès, Jean (1859–1914)
- Kautsky, Karl (1854–1938)
- Khmer Rouge and Pol Pot
- Kollontai, Alexandra (1872–1952)
- Labor revolutionary currents, United States, 1775–1900
- Labor revolutionary currents, United States, 20th century
- Labour Party, Britain
- Lanka Sama Samaja Party (LSSP) and Sri Lankan radicalism
- Lenin, Vladimir Ilyich (1870–1924)
- Leninist philosophy
- Liebknecht, Karl (1871–1919)
- Liu Shaoqi (1898–1969)
- Luxemburg, Rosa (1870–1919)
- Mandel, Ernest (1923–1995)
- Mao Zedong (1893–1976)
- Mariátegui, José Carlos (1894–1930)
- Mármol, Miguel (1905–1993)
- Martí, Farabundo (1893–1932)
- Marx, Karl (1818–1883)
- Marxism
- Mexico, labor movement and protests, 1980–2005
- Michnik, Adam (b. 1946)
- Morris, William (1834–1896)
- Mother Jones (1837–1930)
- MRTA (Movimiento Revolucionario Túpac Amaru)
- Nasser, Gamal Abdel (1918–1970)
- Naxalite movement, 1967–1972
- Nepal, Maoists’ rise
- Nepal, people’s war and Maoists
- Netherlands, protests, 1800–2000
- New Australia movement
- Nicaraguan Revolution, 1970s–1980s
- Owen, Robert (1771–1858)
- Paris Commune, 1871
- Peng Dehuai (1898–1974)
- People’s Liberation Front of Sri Lanka (JVP)
- Peru, armed insurgency and the Dirty War, 1980–1990
- Peru, “people’s war,” counterinsurgency, and the popular movement
- Philippines, protest during the US era
- Polish Revolution, 1905–1907
- Poulantzas, Nicos (1936–1979)
- POUM (Workers’ Party of Marxist Unification)
- Québécois nationalism and Lévesque, René (1922–1987)
- Quit India movement
- Red Brigades
- Red Scotland and the Scottish radical left, 1880–1932
- Romania, protest and revolution, 20th century
- Roy, Manabendra Nath (1887–1954)
- Russia, Revolution of 1905–1907
- Russia, Revolution of February/ March 1917
- Russia, Revolution of October/ November 1917
- Russian Civil War, 1918–1924
- Saint-Simon, Comte de (1760–1825)
- Salam ‘Adel (1924–1963) and the Communist Party, Iraq
- Saskatchewan socialist movement
- Serrati, Giacinto Menotti (1872–1926)
- Settimana Rossa
- Situationists
- Slovakia, 1944 Uprising
- Social Democratic Party, Germany
- Socialism

- Socialism, Britain
 Socialisme ou Barbarie
 Socialist Party, United States
 Socialist Workers' Party of Germany (Sozialistische Arbeiterpartei Deutschlands)
 Solidarność (Solidarity)
 South African Communist Party,
 1953–present
 Spanish Revolution
 Spartacus, historical and modern era
 Spiridonova, Maria (1884–1941)
 Stalin, Joseph (1879–1953) and
 “Revolution from Above”
 Syria and Iraq, Baathists
 Thai Communist Party
 Thompson, Edward Palmer (E. P.)
 (1924–1993)
 Tito, Josip Broz (1892–1980)
 Togliatti, Palmiro (1893–1964)
 Trotsky, Leon (1879–1940)
 Tupamaros
 Uruguay, left-wing politics from the
 Tupamaros to the Frente Amplio
 Uzbekistan, national movement and protests
 Venezuela, guerilla movements,
 1960s–1980s
 Venezuela, MAS and Causa Radical
 Venezuela, solidarity economy, social property, co-management,
 and workers' control
 Vietnam, anti-colonial, nationalist, and communist movements, 1900–1939
 Vietnam, First Indochina War,
 1945–1954
 Vietnam, protest and Second Indochina
 War, 1960–1974
 War communism and the rise of the Soviet Union
 Winstanley, Gerrard (1609–1676)
 Women's movement, Spain
 Yugoslavia, Marxist humanism, Praxis group, and the Korčula Summer School, 1964–1974
 Zionism
- Student, Youth, and Education
 Adorno, Theodor W. (1903–1969)
 Alcatraz Uprising and the American
 Indian Movement
 American left and Howard Zinn (b. 1922)
 Anarchism, Greece
 Anti-Vietnam War movement, Britain
 Anti-Vietnam War movement,
 United States
 Argentina, University Reform, 1918
 Austro-Marxism
 Berkeley Free Speech Movement
 Bolivia, protest and repression, 1964–2000
 Britain, post-World War II political protest
 Brixton Riots, 1981
 Burma, democracy movement
 Burma, national movement against
 British colonial rule
Burschenschaften
 Cambodia, communist protests and revolution
Caracazo, 1989
 Cedar Revolution, Lebanon
 Charusathira, Prapas (1912–1997)
 Chile, people's power
 Chile, popular resistance against Pinochet
 China, Maoism and popular power, 1949–1969
 China, May 4th movement
 China, student protests, 20th century
 Chinese Nationalist Revolution, 1911
 Chissano, Joaquim (b. 1939)
 Civil rights movement, United States,
 1960–1965
 Cohn-Bendit, Daniel (b. 1945)
 Color revolutions
 Columbia University civil rights protests
 Concordia University student protests
 Cordobazo and Rosariazo Uprising, 1969
 Côte d'Ivoire, post-independence protest
 Czechoslovakia, resistance to Soviet political and economic rule
 Davis, Angela (b. 1944)
 Dominican Republic, protest and resistance to US imperialism,
 1916–1962
 Dunayevskaya, Raya (1910–1987)
 Dutschke, Rudi (1940–1979)
 Ecuador, left and popular movements,
 1940s to present
 EPL Maoist guerilla movement
 Escuela Moderna movement
 (The Modern School)
 Ethiopia, Revolution of 1974
 European revolutions of 1848
 Farabundo Martí National Liberation
 Front (FMLN)

- Finland, civil war and revolution, 1914–1918
 Fonseca, Carlos (1936–1976)
 France, post-World War II labor protests
 Freire, Paulo (1921–1997)
 German Democratic Republic protests, 1945–1989
 Germany, Red Army Faction (Baader-Meinhof Group)
 Greece, anti-dictatorship protests
 Hong Kong democracy protests
 Hungary, anti-communist protests, 1945–1989
 Hungary, Revolution of 1956
 India, post-World War II upsurge
 Indonesian protests against Suharto dictatorship
 Israeli peace movement
 Italy, from the new left to the great repression (1962–1981)
 Kent State student uprising
 Khuda-i Khidmatgar: Pashtun non-violent resistance force (1929–1948)
 King, Martin Luther, Jr. (1929–1968) and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC)
 Korea, labor movement, 20th century
 Korea, post-World War II popular movements for democracy
 Kwangju student uprising
 Lesbian, gay, transsexual, bisexual movements, United States
 Lovett, William (1800–1877)
 May 1968 French uprisings
 Mexico, labor movement and protests, 1980–2005
 Michnik, Adam (b. 1946)
 Montessori, Maria (1870–1952)
 Nasir, Hassan (1928–1960)
 Naxalite movement, 1967–1972
 Netherlands, protests, 1800–2000
 Nicaraguan Revolution, 1970s–1980s
 Oaxaca uprising, 2006
 People’s Liberation Front of Sri Lanka (JVP)
 Philippines, protests, 1950s–1970s
 Poland, student movement, 1968
 Prague Spring
 Prasertkul, Seksan (b. 1949)
 Romania, student and worker protests, 1956
 Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN)
 Serbian Revolution of October 2000
 Slovakia, Štúr generation
 Student movement, Greece, 1990–1991
 Student movements
 Student movements, Czechoslovakia, 1960s
 Student movements, Czechoslovakia, 1980s
 Student movements, Europe
 Student movements, global South
 Student movements, Korea
 Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC)
 Students for a Democratic Society (SDS)
 Sudanese protest under Anglo-Egyptian rule
 Syria and Iraq, Baathists
 Tajikistan, protests and revolts
 Tamil nationalist struggle for Eelam
 Tiananmen Square protests, 1989
 Tlatelolco 1968 and Mexico student movement
 UNAM Strike, 2000, and Mexican student movement
 Uruguay, labor and populist movements, 1965–present
 Uruguay, left-wing politics from the Tupamaros to the Frente Amplio
 Velvet Revolution, 1989
 Venezuela, exclusionary democracy and resistance, 1958–1998
 Venezuela, guerilla movements, 1960s–1980s
 Vietnam, anti-colonial, nationalist, and communist movements, 1900–1939
Wathbah of 1948
 West German “new left”
 White Rose (Weiße Rose)
 World Trade Organization (WTO) protests, Cancun, 2003
 Young Communist International
 Yugoslavia, Marxist humanism, Praxis group, and the Korčula Summer School, 1964–1974
 Yugoslavia, student protests, 1966–1974
 Zimbabwe People’s Army (ZIPA)
- Taxation
 Agbekoya Peasant Uprising and Rebellion, 1968–1969
 American Revolution of 1776
 Anti-Corn Law agitation, Britain, 19th century

Bengal, popular uprisings and movements in the colonial era
 Bolivian neoliberalism, social mobilization, and revolution from below, 2003 and 2005
 Boston Tea Party
 Bread Riots, Britain, 1795
 Caribbean islands, protests against IMF
 Chinese Nationalist Revolution, 1911
 Daquilema, Fernando (d. 1872) and the 1871 Uprising, Ecuador
 Durrani empire, popular protests, 1747–1823
 Egypt, Peasant Rebellion of 1824
 Eureka Stockade
 European revolutions of 1848
 Fries's Rebellion
 German Peasant Rebellion, 1525
 Gustav Rebellions
 India, civil disobedience movement and demand for independence
 Japan, protest and revolt, 1800–1945
 Lebanon, 19th-century revolts
 Luxembourg, protest and revolution
 Mau Mau Rebellion, 1952–1959
 Nordic revolts and popular protests, 1500–present
 Pakistan, Bengali nationalist struggles
 Rampa rebellions in Andhra Pradesh
 Saya San (Hsaya San) movement of the 1930s
 Shays' Rebellion
 Swaziland, nationalist and economic protests
 Swiss Peasants' War of 1653
 Whiskey Rebellion
 World Trade Organization (WTO) protests, Cancun, 2003
 World Trade Organization (WTO) protests, Hong Kong, 2005
 Zambian nationalism and protests
 Zamora, Ezequiel (1817–1860)
 Zapata, Emiliano (1879–1919) and the Comuna Morelense
 Zapatistas, EZLN, and the Chiapas uprising

Utopianism

Amana Inspirationist Utopians
 Benezet, Anthony (1713–1784)
 Cooperative Commonwealth
 English Revolution, radical sects
 Father Rapp (1757–1847) and Harmony

Fourier, Charles François Marie (1772–1837) and the Phalanx Utopians
 Fox, George (1624–1691)
 Godwin, William (1756–1836)
 Hutterites
 Icaria Utopian Community
 New Australia movement
 New Harmony
 Oneida Perfectionist Utopians
 Owen, Robert (1771–1858)
 Ranters
 Shakers Utopian Community
 Taiping Rebellion, 1851–1864
 Truth, Sojourner (ca. 1797–1893)
 Utopian communities, United States
 Utopian intentional communities
 Wright, Frances "Fanny" (1795–1852)

Urban uprisings

Abu Jamal, Mumia (b. 1954)
 Addams, Jane (1860–1935)
 Alinsky, Saul (1909–1972) and the Industrial Areas Foundation
 Assembly of the Poor
 Baker, Ella Josephine (1903–1986)
 Bloody Sunday Demonstration, 1887
 Bristol Riots, 1831
 Britain, post-World War II political protest
 Brixton Riots, 1981
Caracazo, 1989
 Catalan protests against centralism
 Chartists
 China, Maoism and popular power, 1949–1969
 Civil rights, United States, Black Power and backlash, 1965–1978
 Cop Watch Los Angeles
 Cordobazo and Rosariazo Uprising, 1969
 Côte d'Ivoire, post-independence protest
 Critical Mass
 Ejército de Liberación Nacional, Colombia
El Argentinazo: December 19 and 20, 2001
 Food Riots
 France, June Days, 1848
 G8 protests, Genoa, 2001
 Guatemala, popular rebellion and civil war
 Haymarket tragedy
 Iranian Revolution, 1979
 Italy, Centri Sociali

Italy from the anti-fascist resistance to the new left (1945–1960)
 Italy, from the new left to the great repression (1962–1981)
 Jamaica, independence movement, 1950–present
 Kelly, Edward “Ned” (1855–1880) and the Kelly Gang
 Korea, movement of urban poor
 League of Revolutionary Black Workers
 May 1968 French uprisings
 Mexico, labor movement and protests, 1980–2005
 Moplah Revolts
 Oaxaca uprising, 2006
 Oka crisis
 On-to-Ottawa Trek
 Peru, armed insurgency and the Dirty War, 1980–1990
 Quit India movement
 Red Summer, United States, 1919
 Regina Riot
 Urban rebellions, United States
 US labor rebellions and the rise of the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO)
 Venezuela, exclusionary democracy and resistance, 1958–1998

Biographies of Key Figures

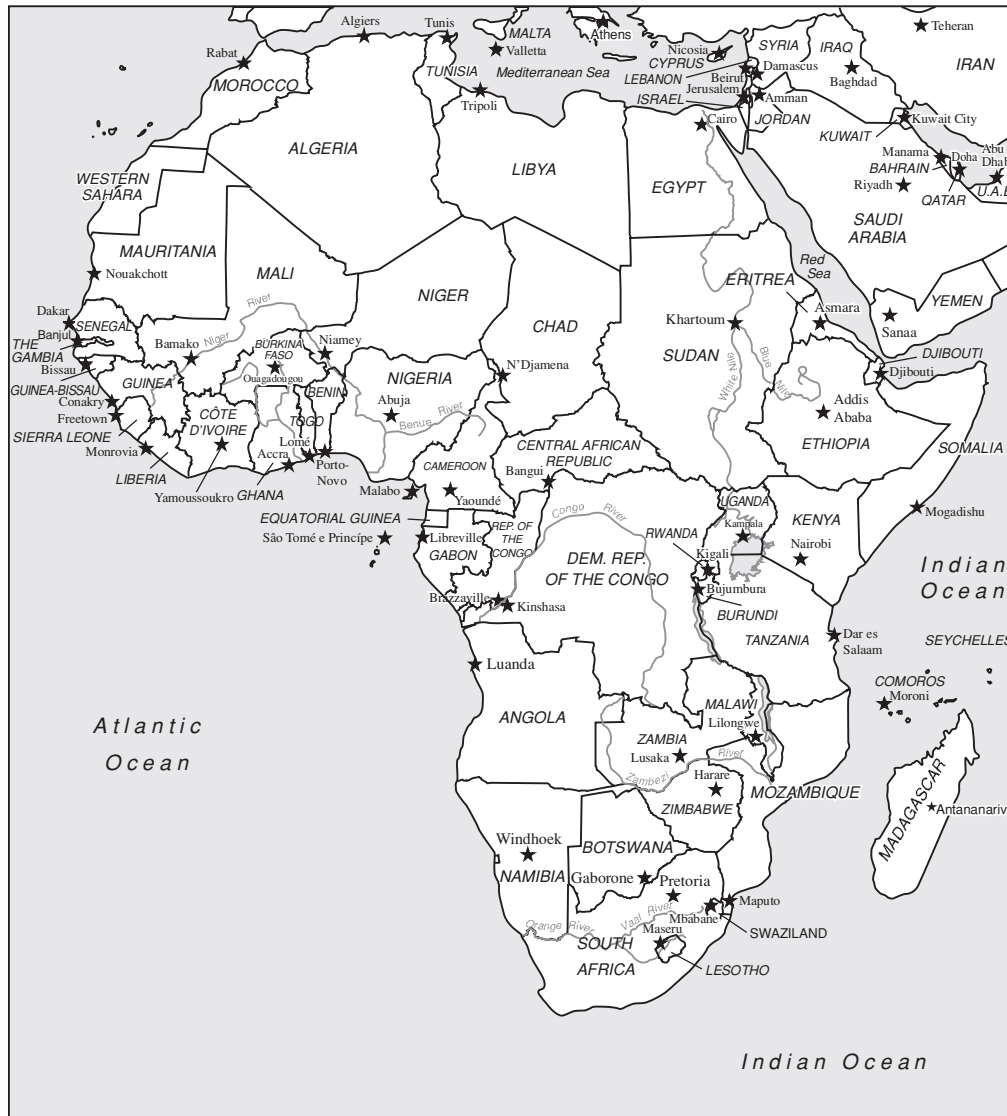

Addams, Jane (1860–1935)
 Adorno, Theodor W. (1903–1969)
 Alinsky, Saul (1909–1972) and the Industrial Areas Foundation
 Allende Gossens, Salvador (1908–1973)
 al-Sanusi, Muhammad ibn Ali (ca. 1787–1859)
 Ambedkar, B. R. (1891–1956)
 Andresote and the Revolt against the Guipuzcoana (1731–1733)
 Anthony, Susan B. (1820–1906)
 Arafat, Yasser (1929–2004), Fatah, and the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO)
 Arendt, Hannah (1906–1975)
 Atatürk, Mustafa Kemal (1881–1938)
 Aung San (1915–1947)
 Babeuf, François-Noël (1760–1797) and the Conspiracy of Equals
 Bakunin, Mikhail Alexandrovich (1814–1876)
 Beauvoir, Simone de (1908–1986)

Begin, Menachem (1913–1992) and the Irgun
 Ben Bella, Ahmad (b. 1918)
 Ben-Gurion, David (1866–1973) and the Haganah
 Benjamin, Walter (1892–1940)
 Berlinguer, Enrico (1922–1984)
 Biermann, Wolf (b. 1936)
 Bin Laden, Osama (b. 1957) and al-Qaeda
 Blanqui, Louis Auguste (1805–1881)
 Bolívar, Simón (1783–1830)
 Bonaparte, Napoleon (1769–1821)
 Bonifacio, Andres (1863–1897)
 Bordiga, Amadeo (1889–1970) and the Italian Communist Party
 Bose, Subhas Chandra (1897–1945)
 Brecht, Bertolt (1899–1956)
 Brissot, Jacques Pierre (1754–1793)
 Brown, John (1800–1859)
 Bukharin, Nikolai Ivanovich (1888–1938)
 Burdett, Sir Francis (1770–1844)
 Cabral, Amílcar (1924–1973)
 Calvin, John (1509–1564)
 Camus, Albert (1913–1960)
 Cannon, James P. (1890–1974) and American Trotskyism
 Carson, Rachel (1907–1964)
 Castoriadis, Cornelius (1922–1997)
 Castro, Fidel (b. 1926)
 Chávez, César (1927–1993) and the United Farm Workers
 Chávez, Hugo (b. 1954)
 Chen Duxiu (1879–1942)
 Chilembwe, John (1871–1915)
 Chiluba, Frederick (b. 1943)
 Collins, Michael (1890–1922)
 Cromwell, Oliver (1599–1658)
 Cuauhtémoc (1502–1525)
 Davis, Angela (b. 1944)
 Debord, Guy (1931–1994) and the Spectacle
 Debs, Eugene (1855–1926)
 Deleuze, Gilles (1925–1995), Guattari, Félix (1930–1992), and the global justice movement
 Deng Xiaoping (1904–1997)
 Dessalines, Jean-Jacques (1758–1806)
 De Valera, Eamon (1882–1975)
 Diderot, Denis (1713–1784)
 Dimitrov, Georgi (1882–1949)
 Diriangén (1496 or 1497–1530s)
 Di Vittorio, Giuseppe (1892–1957)

- Douglass, Frederick (1817–1895)
 Du Bois, W. E. B. (1868–1963)
 Dubček, Alexander (1921–1992)
 Dunayevskaya, Raya (1910–1987)
 Eisenstein, Sergei (1898–1948)
 Ellis, Daniel Edward “Daan”
 (1904–1963)
 Engels, Friedrich (1820–1895)
 Equiano, Olaudah (1745–1797)
 Faiz Ahmed Faiz (1911–1984)
 Fanon, Frantz (1925–1961)
 Father Rapp (1757–1847) and Harmony
 Fawkes, Guy (1570–1606) and
 the Gunpowder Plot
 Fell, Margaret (1614–1702)
 Fonseca, Carlos (1936–1976)
 Foucault, Michel (1926–1984)
 Fourier, Charles François Marie
 (1772–1837) and the Phalanx Utopians
 Fox, Charles James (1749–1806)
 Fox, George (1624–1691)
 Freire, Paulo (1921–1997)
 Friedan, Betty (1921–2006)
 Fuller, Margaret (1810–1850)
 Gaitán, Jorge Eliécer (1898–1948),
 UNIR, and revolutionary
 populism in Colombia
 Galleani, Luigi (1861–1931)
 Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand
 (1869–1948)
 Garibaldi, Giuseppe (1807–1882)
 Garrison, William Lloyd (1805–1879)
 Garvey, Marcus (1887–1940) and Garveyism
 Godwin, William (1756–1836)
 Goldman, Emma (1869–1940)
 Gonne, Maud (1866–1953)
 Gorbachev, Mikhail (b. 1931)
 Gouges, Olympe de (1745–1793)
 Gramsci, Antonio (1891–1937)
 Grass, Gunter (b. 1927)
 Guaicaipuro (ca. 1530–1568)
 Guevara, Ernesto “Che” (1928–1967)
 Gunawardena, Don Philip Rupasinghe
 (1901–1972)
 Hasan al-Banna (1906–1949) and
 the Muslim Brotherhood
 Hatuey (ca. 1400s–1512)
 Hauptmann, Gerhart (1862–1946)
 Havel, Václav (b. 1936)
 Haya de la Torre, Victor Raúl
 (1895–1979)
 Haywood, Big Bill (1869–1928)
 Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich
 (1770–1831)
 Hidalgo y Costilla, Miguel (1753–1811)
 Hilferding, Rudolf (1877–1941)
 Hirschfeld, Magnus (1868–1935)
 Hitler, Adolf (1889–1945) and
 German Nazism
 Hlinka, Andrej (1864–1938) and the Slovak People’s Party
 Hô Chi Minh (Nguyen Tat Thanh)
 (1890–1969)
 Hugo, Victor (1802–1885)
 Hunt, Henry “Orator” (1773–1835)
 Hutchinson, Anne (1591–1643)
 Ibrahim, Mirza (ca. 1906–2000)
 Iqbal, Muhammad (1877–1938)
 Jabotinsky, Vladimir (Ze’ev) (1880–1940)
 and revisionist Zionism
 Jackson, Jesse (b. 1941)
 Jagan, Cheddi (1918–1997)
 Jalib, Habib (1928–1993)
 James, C. L. R. (1901–1989)
 Jaurès, Jean (1859–1914)
 Jinnah, Muhammad Ali (1876–1948)
 Jumandi (d. 1578)
 Kaunda, Kenneth (b. 1924)
 Kautsky, Karl (1854–1938)
 Kelly, Edward “Ned” (1855–1880)
 and the Kelly Gang
 Kenyatta, Jomo (1893–1978)
 Khama, Seretse (1921–1980) and Botswana nationalism
 Khomeini, Ayatollah Sayyid
 Ruhollah Mussau (1902–1989)
 and the Shi’ite Islamic Revolution
 King, Martin Luther, Jr. (1929–1968)
 and the Southern Christian
 Leadership Conference (SCLC)
 Kollontai, Alexandra (1872–1952)
 Kropotkin, Peter (1842–1921)
 Lafayette, Marquis de (1757–1834)
 Landauer, Gustav (1870–1919)
 Lenin, Vladimir Ilyich (1870–1924)
 Li Lisan (1899–1967)
 Liebknecht, Karl (1871–1919)
 Lilburne, John (1615–1657)
 Lincoln, Abraham (1809–1865)
 and African Americans
 Liu Shaoqi (1898–1969)
 Locke, John (1632–1704)
 Lu Xun (1881–1936)
 Lukács, Georg (1885–1971)

- Lumumba, Patrice (1925–1961)
 Luther, Martin (1483–1546)
 Luxemburg, Rosa (1870–1919)
 Magón, Ricardo Flores (1874–1922)
 and the Magonistas
 Makhno, Nestor (1889–1934)
 Malatesta, Errico (1853–1932)
 Malcolm X (1925–1965)
 Mandel, Ernest (1923–1995)
 Mandela, Nelson (b. 1918)
 Manley, Michael (1924–1997)
 Mao Zedong (1893–1976)
 Marat, Jean-Paul (1743–1793)
 Marcuse, Herbert (1898–1979)
 Mariátegui, José Carlos (1894–1930)
 Maripe, Knight (1927–2006)
 Mármol, Miguel (1905–1993)
 Martí, Farabundo (1893–1932)
 Martí, José (1853–1895) and the Partido
 Revolucionario Cubano
 Marx, Karl (1818–1883)
 Mazzini, Giuseppe (1805–1872)
 Mboya, Tom (1930–1969) and the
 Kenya labor movement
 Mendes, Chico (1944–1988) and Amazonian rainforest protest
 and resistance
 Michel, Louise (1830–1905)
 Michnik, Adam (b. 1946)
 Mirabeau, Comte de (1749–1791)
 Morris, William (1834–1896)
 Mossadegh, Mohammad (1881–1967)
 Mother Jones (1837–1930)
 Mpho, Motsamai (b. 1921)
 Mugabe, Robert (b. 1924)
 Munday, Jack (b. 1929)
 Mussolini, Benito (1883–1945)
 Naidu, Sarojini (1879–1949)
 Nasser, Gamal Abdel (1918–1970)
 Nehru, Jawaharlal (1889–1964)
 Nietzsche, Friedrich (1844–1900)
 Nin, Andreu (1892–1937)
 Nkrumah, Kwame (1909–1972)
 Nujoma, Sam (b. 1929)
 Obregón, Alvaro (1880–1928) and
 the Sonoran generation
 O’Connell, Daniel (1775–1847)
 O’Connor, Arthur (1763–1852)
 O’Connor, Feargus (1796–1855)
 Paine, Thomas (1737–1809)
 Paisley, Ian (b. 1926) and Unionism,
 Northern Ireland
 Pankhurst, Emmeline (1858–1928),
 Christabel (1880–1958), and
 Sylvia (1882–1960)
 Parks, Rosa (1913–2005) and the
 Montgomery Bus Boycott
 Parnell, Charles Stewart (1846–1891)
 Peng Dehuai (1898–1974)
 Pilsudski, Józef (1867–1935)
 Popelin, Marie (1846–1913) and Belgian
 League for Women’s Rights
 Poulantzas, Nicos (1936–1979)
 Prestes, Luís Carlos (1898–1990) and Prestes, Olga Benário (1908–1942)
 Proudhon, Pierre Joseph (1809–1865)
 Qu Qiubai (1899–1935)
 Queen Nanny and Maroon resistance
 Reclus, Elisée (1830–1905)
 Robespierre, Maximilien de (1758–1794)
 Romero, Óscar (1917–1980),
 Archbishop
 Rousseau, Jean-Jacques (1712–1778)
 Roy, Manabendra Nath (1887–1954)
 Saint-Simon, Comte de (1760–1825)
 Salam ‘Adel (1924–1963) and the Communist Party, Iraq
 Sánchez Saornil, Lucía (1895–1970)
 Sandino, Augusto César (1895–1934)
 Sands, Bobby (1954–1981)
 Sanger, Margaret (1879–1966) and the
 American birth control movement
 Sartre, Jean-Paul (1905–1980)
 Senghor, Léopold (1906–2001)
 Serrati, Giacinto Menotti (1872–1926)
 Sharp, Gene (b. 1928)
 Shlyapnikov, Alexander Gavrilovich
 (1885–1937)
 Sieyès, Abbé (1748–1836)
 Sihanouk, Norodom (b. 1922)
 Silva, Luiz Inácio Lula da (b. 1945)
 Smith, Adam (1723–1790)
 Stalin, Joseph (1879–1953) and
 “Revolution from Above”
 Steinem, Gloria (b. 1934)
 Sun Yat-Sen (1866–1925)
 Sylvis, William H. (1829–1869) and the National Labor Union
 Tambo, Oliver (1917–1993)
 Thompson, Edward Palmer (E. P.)
 (1924–1993)
 Tito, Josip Broz (1892–1980)
 Togliatti, Palmiro (1893–1964)

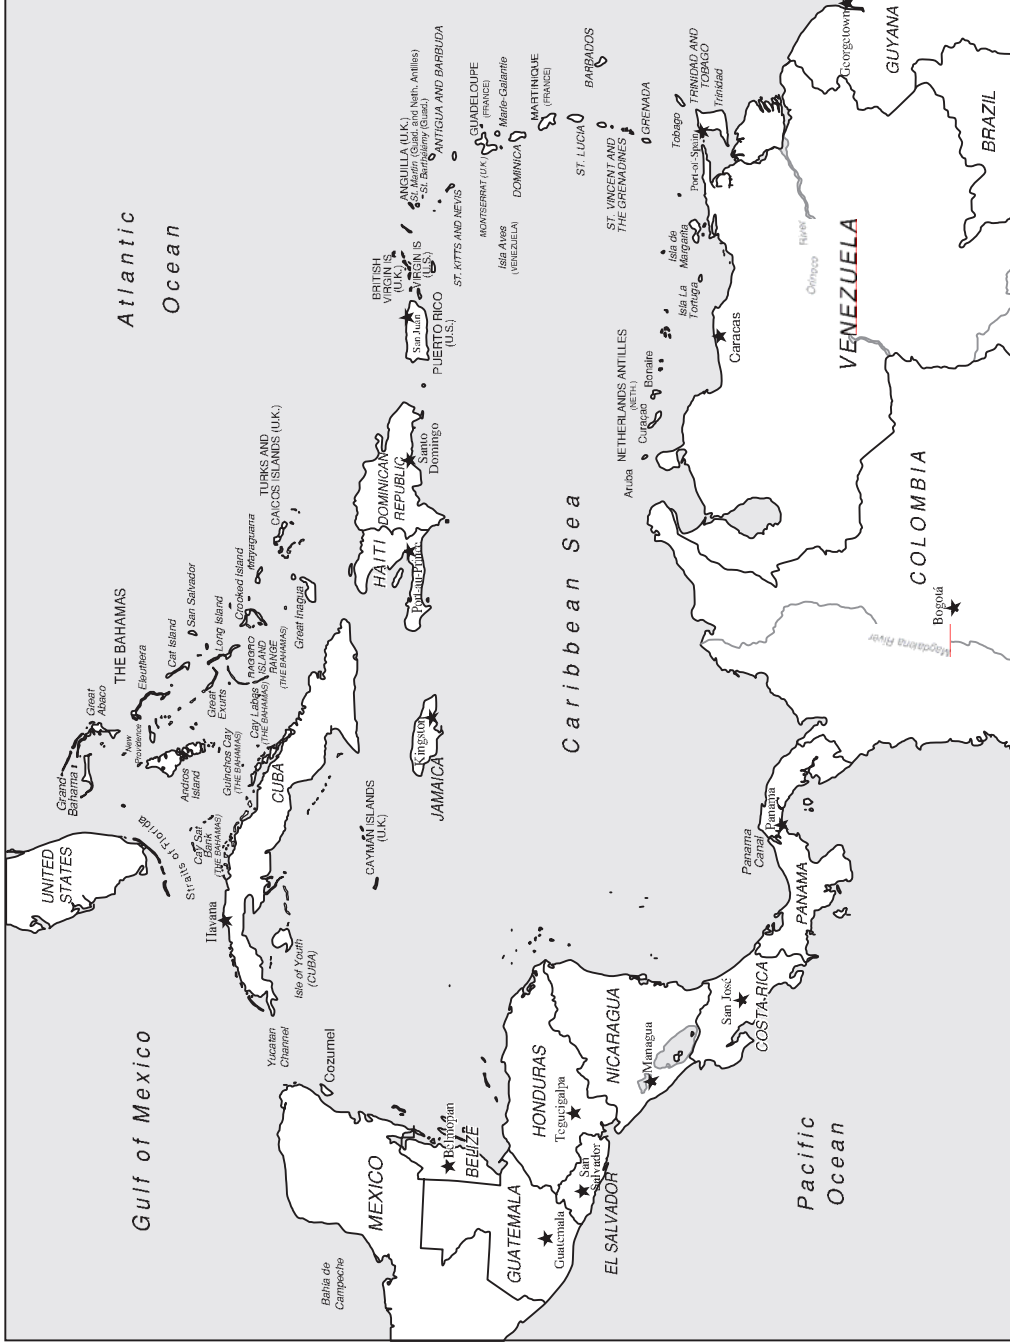

- Toussaint Louverture and the Haitian Revolution, 1796–1799
Trotsky, Leon (1879–1940)
Túpac Amaru (1540–1572)
Velasco Alvarado, Juan Francisco (1910–1977)
Villa, Pancho (ca. 1878–1923) and the division of the North
Voltaire (1694–1778)
Walesa, Lech (b. 1943)
Wang Ming (1904–1974)
Washington, George (1732–1799)
Wesley, John (1703–1791), Methodism, and social reform
Wilberforce, William (1759–1833)
Wilkes, John (1725–1797) and the “Wilkes and Liberty” movement
Williams, Eric (1911–1981)
Winstanley, Gerrard (1609–1676)
Wollstonecraft, Mary (1759–1797)
Wright, Frances “Fanny” (1795–1852)
Yaa Asantewaa (ca. 1840–1921)
Zapata, Emiliano (1879–1919) and the Comuna Morelense
Zhang Guotao (1897–1979)
Zhou Enlai (1898–1976)
Zhu De (1886–1976)
Zumbi (ca. 1655–1695)
Zwane, Ambrose Pheseyha (1922–1998)

Map 1 Africa

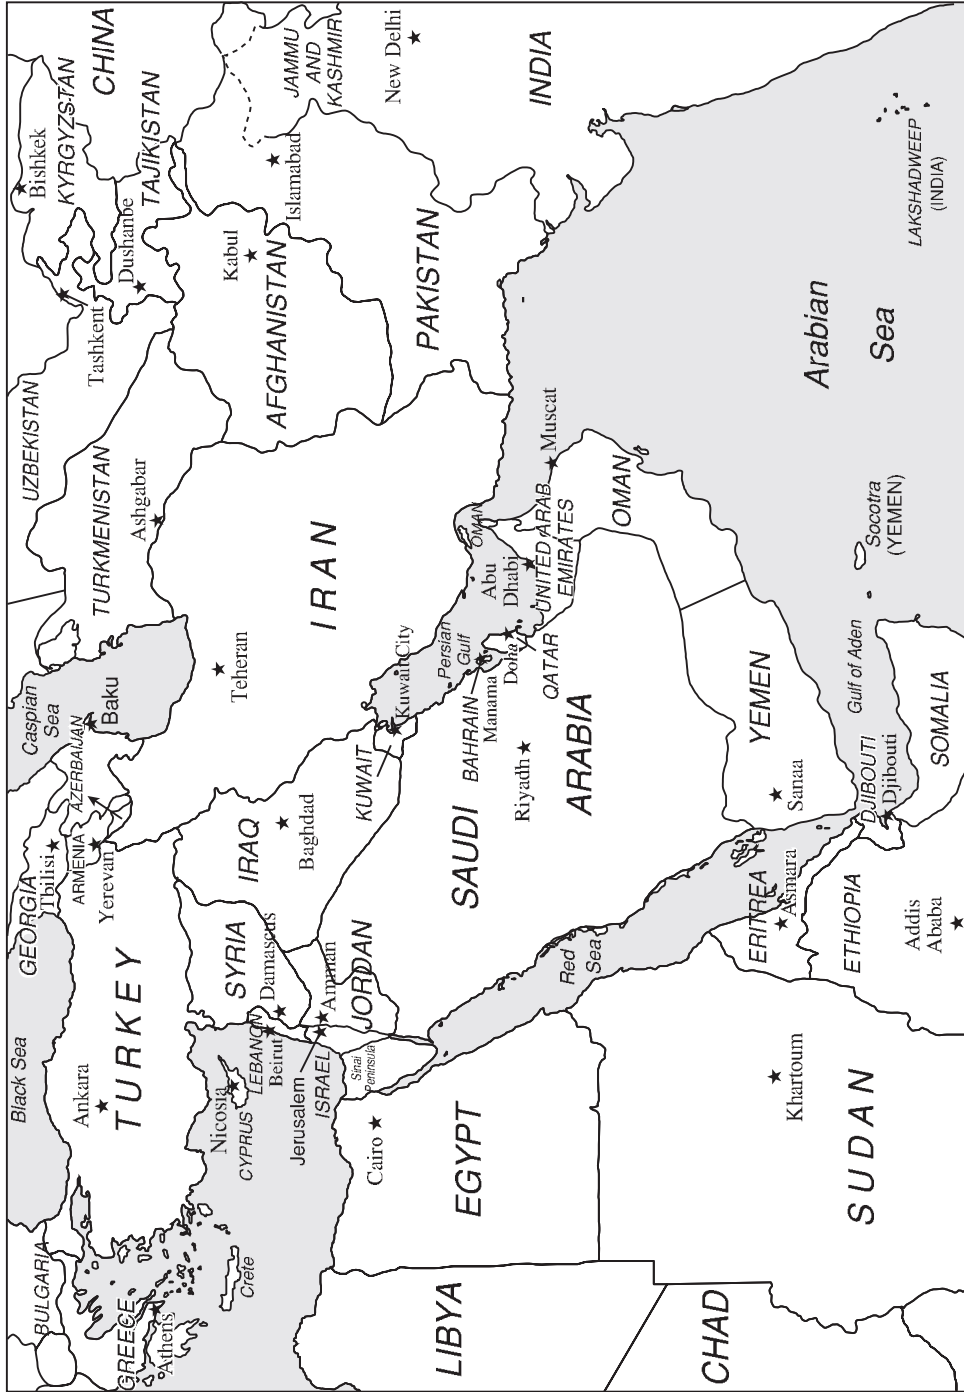

Map 2 Asia

Map 3 Central America and the Caribbean

Map 4 Europe

Map 5 The Middle East

Map 6 North America

Map 7 Oceania

803053AI (R02108) 3-04

Map 8 South America

Abalone Alliance

Laurence Davis

Along with the Clamshell Alliance, the Abalone Alliance was one of the pioneering organizations of the non-violent direct action movement in the United States in the 1970s and 1980s. Established in 1977 to stop the operation of the Pacific Gas and Electric Company's Diablo Canyon nuclear power plant in California, the Abalone Alliance exercised a profound influence on the protest politics of its time, primarily by means of its successful example of anarchist-inspired prefigurative utopian politics. By the time it disbanded in 1985, the Abalone Alliance had drawn thousands of people into the movement against nuclear power and alerted a wider public to its dangers, trained a generation of activists in consensus decision making procedures and mass civil disobedience, spawned affinity based organizational networks that served as a basis for future movements, and demonstrated the revolutionary potentials of anarchy-feminism, non-violent direct action, and vision-oriented community building.

While the ideological roots of the Abalone Alliance lie deep in the American counterculture, the immediate spur for its formation was the PG&E's construction of a nuclear power plant near the town of San Luis Obispo on the central Californian coast. The site chosen for the plant was one of the two remaining wilderness areas in the state, had some of the largest and oldest oak trees on the West Coast of the United States, was a sacred burial ground for the Chumash Indian tribe almost exterminated by colonial settlement, stood only 2.2 miles from an offshore seismic fault, and was home to the largest concentration of wild abalone in California. None of these factors deterred the businessmen of PG&E, who pressed ahead with their construction plans in the late 1960s and early 1970s in the face of legal challenges and vocal public opposition.

In March 1974, PG&E conducted its first hot test of the plant, resulting in the death of tens of thousands of abalone in Diablo Cove. The Abalone Alliance, formed in May 1977 at a statewide conference of 70 anti-nuclear activists, took its name from this incident. Its stated aims were to "wage a non-violent direct action campaign" to "stop construction and operation of all nuclear reactors in California"; to "promote the realistic alternatives of safe, clean and renewable sources of energy"; to "encourage responsible community control of energy production and use"; to "support efforts to eliminate nuclear weapons"; and to "build a more loving and responsible world for ourselves, our children and future generations of all living things on this planet" (Abalone Alliance Archival Site 2008).

True to its word, the Alliance waged a vigorous campaign of non-violent direct action against the Diablo plant over an eight year period. In August 1977 it staged a civil disobedience action at the gates of Diablo Canyon at which 47 people were arrested while 1,500 others showed their support. In August 1978, 5,000 people attended a rally at the gates, and 487 were arrested for blocking access to the plant. In April 1979, following the Pennsylvania Three Mile Island nuclear reactor partial meltdown in late March, 25,000 people attended an Abalone-organized anti-nuclear rally in San Francisco. In June, 40,000 people came to San Luis Obispo for the largest anti-nuclear rally ever held in United States history. Most notably of all, on September 15, 1981, the Abalone Alliance commenced a blockade of Diablo Canyon that lasted for two weeks. Nearly 20,000 people rallied in support, and over 1,900 blockaders were arrested in a series of dramatic civil disobedience actions. According to many of the backcountry blockaders who managed to camp out for several days before being arrested, the experience of intense mutualistic community and attachment to the land generated by this action seemed like a model of a utopian society. For some, and not only the anarcha-feminists who played such a prominent role in organizing it, this experience of vision-oriented prefigurative community was what Diablo was fundamentally about.

While the Abalone Alliance ultimately failed in its immediate aim of shutting down the Diablo Canyon nuclear power plant, it succeeded in the larger aim of stopping the construction of new nuclear plants, not only in California but throughout the United States. In the wake of the publicity generated by the protests, then-pending plans to build nuclear reactors in the US were cancelled, and no licenses for new ones have been granted in the more than 25 years since. It also succeeded in promoting widespread interest in alternative, clean and renewable sources of energy. Beyond this, it left a creative legacy of non-violent direct action and feminist-inspired cultural revolution that has been emulated and developed further by subsequent generations of protesters and revolutionaries.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism; Anarchism and Gender; Anarchism, United States; Anti-Nuclear Protest Movements; Eco-Anarchism; Ecological Protest Movements

References and Suggested Readings

- Abalone Alliance Archival Site (2008) Available at www.energy-net.org (downloaded February 27, 2008).
- Epstein, B. (1991) Political Protest and Cultural Revolution: Nonviolent Direct Action in the 1970s and 1980s. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Wills, J. (2006) Conservation Fallout: Nuclear Protest at Diablo Canyon. Reno: University of Nevada Press.

Abdurahman, Abdullah (1872–1940)

Mohamed Adhikari

Dr. Abdullah Abdurahman was the most influential and popular political leader within the Colored community of South Africa for three and a half decades before his death in February 1940 and won widespread respect within the white establishment.

Abdurahman was born in Wellington, South Africa on December 12, 1872. A descendant of grandparents granted manumission from slavery, his graduation as a medical doctor from the University of Glasgow in 1893 was a signal achievement. Abdurahman entered public life in 1904, becoming the first black person elected to the Cape Town City Council, representing Wards 6 and 7 for the rest of his life. Abdurahman exerted substantial influence on local government due to his exceptional popularity among Colored voters and energetic chairing of several council committees. In 1914 Abdurahman became the first Colored person elected to the Cape Provincial Council, holding the Castle Division to 1940.

Abdurahman's most important political contribution was as president of the African Political Organization (APO), to which he was elected in 1905 and completely dominated the leadership for 35 years. Under his direction the APO grew from an insignificant, faction-ridden body into an organization of several thousand members with a national network of branches by 1910, comprising the country's largest black political organization of that time. Through the APO Abdurahman waged a futile struggle to stem the erosion of Colored civil rights and coordinated wide-ranging efforts for the socio-economic upliftment of the Colored people, especially in education and public health. Abdurahman left an enduring legacy in helping to found the Teachers' League of South Africa in 1913, and several high schools, including Trafalgar High School in 1911, the Rahmaniye Institute in 1913, and Livingstone High School in 1934.

Although he focused on advancing Colored interests, Abdurahman recognized the need to foster interracial cooperation. He thus participated in the 1909 South African Native and Colored People's Delegation to Britain that protested the color bar in the Union constitution and jointly convened four Non-European Conferences with D. D. T. Jabavu between 1927 and 1934 to mobilize opposition to South African Prime Minister Hertzog's segregationist policies. Although Abdurahman was not of Indian descent, the South African Indian Congress asked him to lead their delegation to request the Indian government intervene in anti-Asian legislation. Abdurahman was the only black member of the Wilcox Commission appointed in 1934 to enquire into the socioeconomic condition of Colored people. With a minority of liberal commissioners, Abdurahman consistently opposed the segregationist recommendations, including proposals for the outlawing of sexual intercourse between Coloreds and whites, implementation of residential segregation of Colored people, and establishment of a separate university for Coloreds.

The mercurial Abdurahman was a gifted orator and a charismatic leader. His popularity among the Colored electorate emanated from the eloquence and vigor with which he articulated their political desires and as a representation of accomplishment through his personal achievements that embodied their highest social ambitions. He had an unaffected, amicable manner and related to his community, especially the less privileged, with ease and respect.

In one of his last official acts, in June 1999 President Nelson Mandela posthumously awarded Abdurhaman the Order for Meritorious Service: Class I (Gold) for his contribution to the struggle for a non-racial, democratic South Africa.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Apartheid Movement, South Africa; Mandela, Nelson (b. 1918)

References and Suggested Readings

- Adhikari, M. (2005) Not White Enough, Not Black Enough: Racial Identity in South Africa's Coloured Community. Athens: Ohio State University Press.
- Lewis, G. (1987) Between the Wire and the Wall: A History of South African 'Coloured' Politics. Cape Town: David Philip.
- van der Ross, R. (1990) 'Say It Out Loud': The APO Presidential Addresses and other Major Political Speeches, 1906-1940, of Dr. Abdullah Abdurahman. Bellville: University of the Western Cape Institute for Historical Research.

Aboriginal/left struggle for land rights

Emma G. Murphy

The modern Australian land rights movement has seen many successful political collaborations between indigenous people, trade unionists, communists, and environmentalists. The legacy of these political relationships emerging in the early decades of the twentieth century, largely due to collaboration between the Communist Party of Australia (CPA) and indigenous people entering the workforce, served to strengthen land rights struggles from the 1960s to the present.

Gurindji Struggle

In 1966 the Gurindji people of the Northern Territory (NT) went on strike, citing racially discriminatory pay and working conditions on cattle stations. However, it quickly became a struggle for land when the striking Gurindji people moved to their traditional lands of Dagu Ragu (Wattie Creek) in what was, according to white law, an illegal occupation. They demanded 500 square miles of their country to be given back to them. The strike lasted for nine years, and the demand was ultimately met, although the area handed back was smaller than the original claim. In 1975, Prime Minister Gough Whitlam granted the Gurindji people leasehold rights, and in 1986 this was converted to freehold lease.

The struggle won broad support from unionists and activists across the country. The CPA campaigned within the unions in which it held influence, mobilizing financial, material, and political support that was to be critical to the campaign. The struggle coincided with the 1967 referendum, in which over 90 percent of the population voted to give the federal government the power to legislate for indigenous people, thus overriding state laws. The overwhelming success of the referendum indicated the level of national support for indigenous rights within the community, largely due to years of campaigning by a "black-red alliance," predominantly comprising the (indigenous-only) Australian Aboriginal Fellowship and the (combined) Federal Council for the Advancement of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islanders. Many indigenous activists in the campaign were also members of the CPA.

Tent Embassy

On January 25, 1972, Liberal (conservative) Prime Minister William McMahon announced that his government would not recognize land rights, but rather would offer indigenous people 50-year general purpose leases. The response was immediate. The next morning, January 26, Australia Day, indigenous activists established a protest camp on the lawns of Parliament

House in Canberra, proclaiming it the Aboriginal Embassy.

The Aboriginal Tent Embassy went on to become one of the most powerful protests staged by the indigenous rights movement. The politics of the embassy were influenced by Black Power groups from Victoria and New South Wales. This new layer of indigenous leadership had begun to emerge in the late 1960s, and was exposed to a broad range of influences such as Malcolm X, the Black Panthers, and the African National Congress. The tent embassy was closed down but subsequently reopened in 1992. It celebrated its thirtieth anniversary in 2002.

Land Rights Act (NT)

The 1972 election of Gough Whitlam's Labor government saw the abandonment of assimilation – which had been official policy since 1937 – in favor of self-determination. A Land Rights Commission was established to investigate mechanisms for recognizing land rights in the NT (which, unlike the states, is under legislative control of the federal government).

The government's response to the Commission's findings was the 1976 Land Rights Act (NT). It was a significant step forward for indigenous land rights, allowing, for the first time, indigenous groups to claim collective freehold title over their traditional land. However, government amendments did weaken the Commission's original recommendations: land could not be claimed on the basis of "need" alone, and the onus of proof of attachment to land fell on the indigenous people, placing those already dispossessed at a great disadvantage.

Mining

The Land Rights Commission's report noted that "to deny Aborigines the right to prevent mining on their land is to deny the reality of land rights" (Vachon & Toyne, in Peterson & Langton 1983: 320). However, in making its recommendations, the Commission neglected this finding, allowing that the federal government should have the power to veto any indigenous groups' block to mining if the mining was deemed to be in the interest of the nation.

The struggle against mining interests has seen successful collaboration between indigenous and non-indigenous activists. For indigenous people, the campaigns have not always been against mining but for the right to directly negotiate with mining companies that seek to mine their land, as well as the right to veto mining proposals and/or be guaranteed economic benefit of commercial activities on their land.

A key contemporary struggle against mining interests was the 1998 campaign against the Jabiluka uranium mine on land over which the Mirrar people were recognized as traditional owners. Environmentalists from around Australia responded to the Mirrar's calls for support by establishing a blockade at the site of the proposed mine in the Northern Territory. The blockade lasted eight months, and coincided with a national campaign, lobbying, and court cases. The project was unable to proceed beyond the entrance to the mine being dug, and the 2005 Jabiluka Long-Term Care and Maintenance Agreement, signed by the government and the Mirrar people, gave the traditional owners of the land veto rights over any future mining proposals.

In 1988, the bicentenary of the European invasion of the continent became a focus for activists seeking to keep land rights on the agenda. Under increasing pressure – and facing growing anger that, although elected with a promise of action on land rights, the Labor government had failed to deliver – in 1991 Prime Minister Paul Keating introduced the Council for Reconciliation Bill. While the reconciliation process, which was to last a decade, was rich with symbolism, there was no mention of land rights.

Mabo

Eddie Mabo, a Merriam man from the Murray Islands in the Torres Strait, was encouraged by legal and academic supporters to launch a case in the High Court after the Protector of Aborigines in Queensland denied him the right to return home. In the 1970s, movement between indigenous reserves in that state was still controlled by the Protector. The case was launched in 1982, and in 1992 it was ruled that the Merriam people did have native title over their country when Australia was colonized and, furthermore, those rights had not been extinguished by European settlement. The judges' findings also indicated that the ruling could have implications for some indigenous people on the mainland.

The Mabo case was heralded by some as a huge advance for land rights, as it overturned the legal doctrine of terra nullius (uninhabited land), which had existed until that point. However, many were frustrated with its limitations, and the further limitations of the Native Title Act, the federal government's response to Mabo. Indigenous people who had moved or been driven off their land were discriminated against, in that native title would only be granted where "traditional," uninterrupted connection with the land could be proved. Economic, social, and political needs were not recognized as valid reasons to launch claims. Additionally, land which the government had alienated could not be claimed, which again discriminated against groups whose tribal country fell within what were now towns, cities, or private property. In other words, most native title across the continent had been extinguished, simply through the forced acquisition of land by the crown.

Private property and mining interests were not threatened by Mabo. However, the mining industry and other interests launched a campaign focused on the threat of urban backyards and parks being lost to native title claimants. This propaganda backlash against Mabo served to mobilize indigenous people and their supporters. Rallies and meetings took place across the country defending the concept of land rights, countering the spread of misinformation, but also pointing out the shortcomings of the proposed legislation. On September 26, 1993, following a conference in Canberra of 600 indigenous people who discussed how to respond to Mabo, a rally at Parliament House burned a copy of the draft Land Rights Bill. Nonetheless, in December 1993, it was passed by the House of Representatives.

Wik

In 1996 the conservative Liberal/National coalition of Prime Minister John Howard was elected. The land rights campaign up until that point had shifted a significant amount of public opinion in indigenous people's favor. However, under Howard the debate became much more divisive.

In December 1996, the Wik People vs. Queensland High Court case was required to examine whether native title in Far North Queensland had been extinguished by the granting of pastoral leases. The ruling found that this was not the case: indigenous native title and pastoral interests could coexist; however, where there was conflict, the pastoralist rights would override the native title.

Like Mabo, the implications of the Wik ruling posed no direct challenge to pastoral or mining interests. However, indigenous people again faced a backlash of opinion against them. The government prepared its legislative response to Wik in an environment of claims and counterclaims as to the extent to which the ruling threatened current and future mining and pastoral industry. The government's response to Wik, the Native Title Amendment Act 1998, was a further restriction on the already limited rights of native title holders.

The End of "Self-Determination"?

The Liberal and Labor parties' backlash against the policy of self-determination, which had begun prior to Howard's election and increased in intensity throughout the late 1990s, was reflected in the increasing political and media attention to social and economic problems in indigenous Australia – especially in the remote indigenous communities of central and northern Australia. Reports of 100 percent unemployment, substance abuse, and violence within these communities were used to justify the argument that self-management had failed.

Altman (2007) points out that connected to these attacks on self-determination was the question of land and land ownership. Problems in remote communities were blamed on the failed notion of collective ownership, and the government, along with more conservative indigenous leaders, began to point to the need for these communities to enter the "real economy," and the "right" of indigenous people to enjoy private home ownership.

Northern Territory Intervention

In June 2007, the federal government announced an emergency intervention into indigenous communities in the NT. The intervention was in response to the recent report released by the NT Board of Inquiry into the Protection of Aboriginal Children from Sexual Abuse. However, as more details of the plan became available, and especially when the relevant enabling legislation was tabled in federal parliament in August, indigenous people, civil libertarians, and activists raised concern that the measures contained within the legislation had apparently little to do with protecting children.

The legislation required the suspension of the Racial Discrimination Act (1975). Amongst its provisions were the right of the government to acquire townships on indigenous land and convert them to five-year leases, the removal of indigenous people's right to control who enters their land (a right which had been protected through a permit system), and welfare reforms which saw all indigenous recipients be issued "store cards" in place of a percentage of their welfare payments.

The NT intervention received widespread condemnation, including from the authors of the report on which the government justified its actions. Across the country, a series of protests and public meetings occurred in response to the intervention. Indigenous people and their supporters were quick to recognize that the legislation constituted a direct attack on land rights, and indeed the government did not attempt to explain how changes to land tenure and the permit system would assist in the protection of children.

The NT intervention became a focus for a national campaign. An indigenous-only National Aboriginal Alliance was convened and, drawing on the left's history of indigenous and non-indigenous collaboration, a broad Aboriginal Rights Coalition emerged. Fears that elements of the intervention might be extended to other parts of indigenous Australia were realized after the Labor Party came to office in the 2007 federal election. With Indigenous Affairs once more under the government and media spotlight, the need for a national, coordinated response to the latest attacks saw a new layer of leadership step forward to continue the struggle that, in one form or another, has been taking place since 1788.

SEE ALSO: Australian Aboriginal Protests; Australian Left; Canada, Indigenous Resistance; Communist Party of Australia

References and Suggested Readings

- Altman, J. (2007) In the Name of the Market? In J. Altman & M. Hinkson (Eds.), Coercive Reconciliation. North Carlton: Arena Publications Association.
- Broome, R. (1982) Aboriginal Australians. Sydney: Allen & Unwin.

- Foley, G. (1999) Whiteness and Blackness in the Koori Struggle for Self-Determination. Koori History Website. Available at www.kooriweb.org/foley/essays/essay_9.html (downloaded May 20, 2008).
- Foley, G. (2001) Black Power in Redfern 1968–1972. Koori History Website. Available at www.kooriweb.org/foley/essays/essay_1.html (downloaded May 20, 2008).
- Goodall, H. (1996) Invasion to Embassy: Land in Aboriginal Politics in New South Wales, 1770–1972. St. Leonards, NSW: Allen & Unwin.
- Lippmann, L. (1981) Generations of Resistance: The Aboriginal Struggle for Justice. Melbourne: Longman Cheshire.
- Peterson, N. & Langton, M. (Eds.) (1983) Aboriginal Land and Land Rights. Canberra: Australian Institute of Aboriginal Studies.
- Ross, D. (2007) Permits Protect. In J. Altman & M. Hinkson (Eds.), Coercive Reconciliation. North Carlton: Arena Publications Association.
- Townsend, T. (2008) The National Question, the Australian Left and the Aboriginal Struggle. Sydney: Resistance Books.

Abraham Lincoln Brigade

Peter N. Carroll

The Abraham Lincoln Brigade refers to approximately 2,800 US men and women who volunteered to defend the elected government of Spain against a military rebellion led by General Francisco Franco during the Spanish Civil War (1936–9). The American volunteers served in various units, including the Abraham Lincoln, George Washington, and MacKenzie-Papineau battalions, as well as the Regiment de Tren (transportation), John Brown Artillery Unit, and the American Medical Bureau. Together with 35,000 volunteers from over 50 countries, these units formed the International Brigades; most US volunteers served in the 15th International Brigade.

When the Spanish Civil War began in July 1936, the US government adopted a policy of neutrality or non-intervention. To discourage civilian participation, US passports were stamped after January 1937 "not valid for travel in Spain." Most volunteers enlisted in violation of such laws, though it was legal for medical and humanitarian aid workers to serve in Spain. The US Communist Party secretly organized their recruitment and travel. Approximately 70 percent of the American volunteers were members of the US Communist Party, though many non-communists merely used membership as a way of reaching Spain.

The volunteers came from a cross-section of society, but most were from large cities. The Brigade consisted of diverse ethnic and nationality groups. African Americans served at all levels of command.

The first 86 volunteers departed from New York on December 26, 1936, landed in France, and traveled to Spain by rail. When travel restrictions were subsequently imposed, volunteers climbed the Pyrenees Mountains at night or sailed illegally from France. Americans first saw action on the Jarama front in February 1937, receiving heavy casualties but succeeded in blocking Franco's troops from seizing the key Madrid–Valencia road. They remained in the trenches until June, visited occasionally by journalists such as Ernest Hemingway and Martha Gellhorn. In July 1937, the Lincoln and Washington battalions fought at Brunete, but suffered so many casualties that the two battalions had to be merged, hereafter called the Lincoln-Washington battalion.

New recruits subsequently formed the MacKenzie-Papineau battalion (named for two nineteenth-century Canadian patriots). Both battalions saw action on the Aragon front at Belchite, Quinto, and Fuentes des Ebro in September–October 1937. In December, the Americans participated in the battles around Teruel. By February 1938, Franco's forces counterattacked and crushed the Republican armies. Many Americans were captured and executed; some were taken prisoner and not released until the war was over. A few hundred retreated across the Ebro River.

The remnants, reinforced by Spanish soldiers, launched a surprise attack across the Ebro in July 1938 but soon confronted Franco's superior armies in the Sierra Pandols. In September, the Spanish Republic attempted a political victory by ordering the withdrawal of all foreign troops, hoping that gesture would pressure Franco to reject German and Italian military assistance. By December, most Americans were home, except for nearly 800 who were buried in Spain. Of them Hemingway wrote, “no men entered earth more honorably than those who died in Spain.”

SEE ALSO: Communist Party of the United States of America (CPUSA); Spanish Revolution

References and Suggested Readings

- Abraham Lincoln Brigade Archives website, www.alba-valb.org.
- Bessie, A. (1939) Men in Battle. New York: Scribner's.
- Carroll, P. N. (1994) The Odyssey of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade: Americans in the Spanish Civil War. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Carroll, P. N. & Fernandez, J. D. (Eds.) (2007) Facing Fascism: New York and the Spanish Civil War. New York: New York University Press/Museum of the City of New York.
- Carroll, P. N., Small, M., & Nash, M. (Eds.) (2006) The Good Fight Continues: World War II Letters from the Abraham Lincoln Brigade. New York: New York University Press.
- Nelson, C. & Henricks, J. (Eds.) (1997) Madrid 1937: Letters of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade from the Spanish Civil War. New York: Routledge.

Abu-Jamal, Mumia (b. 1954)

Hans Bennett

Born Wesley Cook on April 24, 1954, and raised in the North Philadelphia housing projects, Mumia Abu-Jamal was a founding member of the Philadelphia chapter of the Black Panther Party (BPP). The chapter's lieutenant of information at age 15, he also worked on the national BPP newspaper in Oakland, California. Abu-Jamal was later a prominent radio personality and president of the Philadelphia Association of Black Journalists; he was known as “The Voice of the Voiceless” for his radical journalism spotlighting the plight of the oppressed and covering the revolutionary MOVE organization's conflict with city authorities.

While moonlighting as a taxi driver, Abu-Jamal carried a legally registered .38 caliber Charter Arms revolver with him after being robbed several times on the job. In his taxi on December 9, 1981, he saw his brother, William Cook, in an altercation with police officer Daniel Faulkner, and approached the scene. Minutes later, Faulkner was shot dead, and Abu-Jamal was shot in the chest. The district attorney would later claim that (1) Abu-Jamal shot Faulkner in the back at close range; (2) while falling backwards, Faulkner responded by shooting Abu-Jamal; and (3) Abu-Jamal then shot down at Faulkner and killed him, while missing two to three times.

While the bullet in Abu-Jamal was officially from Faulkner's gun, police ballisticsian Anthony Paul testified that the bullet in Faulkner could only be tied to "multiples of millions" of .38 caliber guns, including those not made by Charter Arms. Suspiciously, police did not officially perform a routine "smell" test on his gun, or a "wipe" test checking for gunpowder residue on his hands.

Abu-Jamal has always maintained his innocence, and while neither he nor his brother testified at the 1982 trial, they both released sworn affidavits in 2001. Abu-Jamal says that he was shot while approaching the scene, blacked out, and awoke to a vicious police beating. William Cook pointed to his friend Kenneth Freeman, a passenger in his car, as the actual shooter. Recently, authors Michael Schiffmann and J. Patrick O'Connor have argued that Freeman shot and killed Faulkner after Abu-Jamal was shot, and ran away before other police arrived. Freeman was mysteriously found dead in a parking lot (reportedly naked, gagged, handcuffed, and with a drug needle in his arm) the day after the infamous May 13, 1985 police bombing of MOVE, which Schiffmann and O'Connor argue was likely an act of police vengeance against Faulkner's actual shooter.

Abu-Jamal was sentenced to death in 1982. Amnesty International concluded that the trial was unfair, criticizing the bias of Judge Albert Sabo, a likely fabricated "hospital confession" that was not reported for two months, altered testimony from key prosecution witnesses Cynthia White and Robert Chobert, and more. Journalist Linn Washington, Jr. argues that appeals courts have repeatedly disregarded court precedent to deny him a new trial, what he calls the "Mumia Exception."

In 2006, Michael Schiffmann discovered crime scene photos by freelancer Pedro Polakoff that showed (1) Faulkner's hat moved for police photos; (2) the absence of Robert Chobert's taxi cab; (3) officer James Forbes destroying potential fingerprint evidence by holding Abu-Jamal's and Faulkner's guns in one bare hand; and (4) an absence of large bullet divots, which Schiffmann argues should be visible in the pavement near Faulkner's body, if the DA scenario was accurate. Polakoff says that he offered the photos to the DA in 1982 and 1995 but was ignored, meaning that the DA illegally suppressed this photo evidence.

Arguably the world's most famous death-row prisoner, Abu-Jamal has written five books and records weekly radio essays. Supporters of a new trial have included Nelson Mandela, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), the US Congressional Black Caucus, European Parliament, and Japanese Diet. In 2003 he was named an honorary citizen of Paris, France, and in 2006, Paris suburb St. Denis named a street after him.

SEE ALSO: Black Nationalism, 19th and 20th Centuries; Black Panthers; League of Revolutionary Black Workers; Uhuru Movement; Williams, Robert F. (1925–1996)

References and Suggested Readings

- Amnesty International (2000) The Case of Mumia Abu-Jamal: A Life in Balance. New York: Seven Stories Press.
- Bisson, T. (2000) On A Move: The Story of Mumia Abu-Jamal. Farmington, PA: Litmus Books.
- Lindorff, D. (2003) Killing Time: An Investigation into the Case of Mumia Abu-Jamal. Monroe, ME: Common Courage Press.
- O'Connor, J. P. (2008) The Framing of Mumia Abu-Jamal. Chicago: Lawrence Hill.
- Schiffmann, M. (2006) Race Against Death. Mumia Abu-Jamal: A Black Revolutionary in White America. Germany: Promedia.

ACT UP

Benjamin Shepard

The AIDS Coalition to Unleash Power (ACT UP) formed in New York City in 1987, challenging the ineffective response to the HIV-AIDS crisis. Beyond the physical disease, the group fought against stereotypes of the disease founded on sexuality, race, and the counter-culture. On its 20th anniversary, in March 2007, Larry Kramer, playwright and founder of ACT

UP, declared the organization “the greatest grassroots group in history.”

“No matter how you look at it, you’re being pushed!” gay activist Vito Russo told 700 demonstrators as the bathhouse closures were taking hold in New York City. “And I don’t want you to jump out of the windows. I want you to push back.” The night was November 14, 1985. New York State Governor Mario Cuomo had just signed legislation prohibiting “high risk” behaviors in commercial establishments such as baths and tearooms.

ACT UP was formed under the rubric “Silence = Death” – condemning the vacuum of opposition to the societal condemnation of those with HIV/AIDS. The appellation Silence = Death asserts that passivity to discrimination against gay people and people of color intensified the AIDS crisis. ACT UP members saw the public passivity as eroding the progress of the gay liberation movement of the 1970s. Thus, at its inception, ACT UP successfully linked the message of the need to seriously address the AIDS crisis to the fierce anti-homophobic agenda first outlined by the gay liberation movement. At its peak in early 1991, ACT UP chapters thrived in 54 US and 10 cities abroad. From 1987 to 1992 the group found a balance between anger and political engagement, between rage and despair, while introducing political theater into its activism. The approach was sustained through ACT UP’s roots in the queer aesthetics of the gay liberation movement, and use of civil rights era non-violent civil disobedience. Thus, vigorous and expressive public displays were directed to policy outcomes, organized within a wide range of activist tactics and strategies.

ACT UP used creative and innovative forms of protest, including a range of public theatrical displays such as sit-ins, die-ins, and kiss-ins, street demonstrations and actions reminiscent of those of the gay liberation era. The organization used smart, glossy advertising posters, research, and frank, sometimes sarcastic posters held aloft by HIV-positive demonstrators with little to lose. The group’s range of media-grabbing, sometimes playful, frequently dramatic stunts helped counter demeaning public perceptions of sexual minorities, intravenous drug users, sex workers, and others stigmatized by AIDS pushed to the margins of society. Through its well-honed understanding of mass media, ACT

UP advanced a storyline that AIDS was a public health issue worthy of the highest levels of government attention, opposing the silence characterizing the response to AIDS during the presidency of Ronald Reagan.

ACT UP used a wide range of social and cultural counter-narratives. The concept that “Sexuality = Life” was a foundation of AIDS activism as a means to overturn the prevailing moral narrative that homosexuality caused the epidemic. Legal and medical discourses advanced this negative message by utilizing science to stigmatize people with AIDS as deviants. Storylines were drafted in black-and-white terms: hetero or homo, natural or immoral, clean or dirty, pure or impure. Through a series of direct-action techniques and pranks, ACT UP sought to reverse the notion that those with HIV were pariahs in society. Vito Russo, a leader in the Gay Activists Alliance, included an appreciation for camp, pleasure, and movies and flair for the dramatic to transform public negative stereotypes and perceptions.

At an ACT UP demonstration at the Department of Health and Human Services in Washington, DC on October 10, 1988, Russo saw activism promoting those with AIDS as a historic struggle: “When future generations ask what we did in this crisis, we’re going to have to tell them that we were out here today.” Russo, who had AIDS, told the demonstrators to consider how future generations will view the efforts of ACT UP members:

Someday the AIDS crisis will be over. Remember that. And when that day comes – when that day has come and gone, there’ll be people alive on this earth . . . who will hear the story that there was once this terrible disease in this country and all over the world – and that a brave group of people stood up and fought, in some cases gave their lives, so that other people might live and be free. (Russo 1988)

Russo’s speech at the Washington demonstration opened a vast social agenda for ACT UP. Opposition to the AIDS pandemic translated into fighting institutional racism, sexism, and the class system, as well as homophobia.

Throughout its first 20 years, ACT UP and its affinity groups worked on a range of issues, from access to treatment, to housing and the media. By the mid-1990s ACT UP could boast a list of accomplishments that included forcing expedited US government approval for new medications, pressuring pharmaceutical companies to reduce the price for the HIV-inhibitor AZT, highlighting the need for healthcare reform, and pressuring the government to increase spending on research.

To a certain extent, ACT UP helped spur the founding of housing for HIV-positive people, advanced tolerance of gays and lesbians and HIV-positive persons, and educated the public that science, theology, and the state were influenced by cultural bias. Over its first 20 years, ACT UP activism and education helped millions in the US and throughout the world to know that all people have a right to equal treatment, irrespective of sexuality or medical condition.

SEE ALSO: Lesbian, Gay, Transsexual, Bisexual Movements; Lesbian, Gay, Transsexual, Bisexual Movements, United States

References and Suggested Readings

- Crimp, D. (2002) Melancholia and Moralism: Essays on AIDS and Queer Politics. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press.
- Epstein, S. (1996) Impure Science – AIDS, Activism, and the Politics of Knowledge. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Halperin, D. M. (1995) Saint Foucault: Towards a Gay Hagiography. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Marcus, E. (1992) Making History: The Struggle for Gay and Lesbian Civil Rights 1945–1990. New York: Harper Collins.
- Russo, V. (1988) Why We Fight. Speech delivered during a demonstration, October 10, in front of the Department of Health and Human Services building in Washington, DC. www.actupny.org/documents/whfight.html (accessed 1 November, 2005).

Addams, Jane (1860–1935)

Louise W. Knight

Jane Addams spent much of her life working to achieve a revolutionary vision that government should support the development of its citizens' full potential. She also fought to protect freedom of speech as a form of protest essential to the advance of social justice.

Addams grew up in Cedarville, Illinois. Her father, a successful agribusinessman and politician, was one of the wealthiest men in the region. Addams's stepmother (her own mother died when she was two and a half) was a socially ambitious, cultured woman. Jane Addams earned a college degree from nearby Rockford Female Seminary, at a time when very few women did so. Though raised in an evangelical Protestant household and a graduate of an evangelical Protestant college, she rejected the conviction that Christ was her savior. She did, however, absorb fully the evangelical fire for transformational change, known as social Christianity. As a teen reading her stepmother's Atlantic Monthly magazine, she was fascinated to learn about the radical reform visions promoted by abolitionist John Brown and economic and social utopian Robert Owen. She also had an early, passionate belief that women should be free to shape their lives.

By her twenties, Addams was caught in a contradiction – like her hero John Brown, she was impatient to “make something happen” but, unlike Brown, she felt severely constrained by societal expectations of her as a member of the upper-middle class and as a woman. She read Giuseppe Mazzini's popular Duties of Man (1860), which argued that men should put their duty to humanity before their duty to their nation or their family, and she combined this message with that of John Stuart Mill's The Subjection of Women (1869), which argued that the limitations placed on women's freedom were the mere byproduct of narrow and rebuttable cultural assumptions. Together, these works convinced her to reject her family's expectation that she marry her stepbrother and commit her life to caring for her stepmother. Using the wealth she had inherited following her father's death in 1881, she moved to Chicago and, with her friend Ellen Gates Starr, co-founded the nation's first settlement house, an urban community based organization intended to aid mankind.

Addams's co-founding of the settlement house, Hull House, was bold in several ways. For one thing, the idea of a settlement house was new in the United States. Conceived and founded by Samuel and Henrietta Barnett to address the dangerously widening social distrust between prosperous and working people that resulted from urban industrialization, the world's first settlement house, Toynbee Hall, opened its doors in the East End of London in 1886. Its purpose was to mingle working-class people and university men socially, to form friendships across class lines. Addams and Starr added two innovations: to locate their settlement house in a mostly immigrant neighborhood and to welcome women and men to live there.

At first the work of Hull House was uncontroversial. Starr and Addams welcomed children and adults to social gatherings, clubs, and classes. They visited the ill, and made friends in the neighborhood. Their goal was to create a warmly human community among immigrant and native Chicagoans of all races, ethnicities, and classes. But they soon found that economic conditions could not be ignored. As thousands of Americans and Europeans flocked to Chicago in the 1880s, poverty, the byproduct of low wages, created ghettos in the burgeoning city. Labor unions fought for recognition in order to improve pay and working conditions in factories. On the heavily industrialized near West Side where Hull House was located, unions needed places to meet, and Addams offered Hull House. Thus began Jane Addams's education into the economic struggles of working-class people.

Because Addams had been raised in upper-middle-class comfort, she had no grasp when she arrived in Chicago of the physically and spiritually debilitating consequences of poverty. She also held the notion common to her class that anyone could avoid poverty if he or she was willing to work hard and make sacrifices. Many conversations with workers and union organizers taught her otherwise, but the two searing experiences that left her convinced much poverty was created by the absence of good government policy were the Depression of 1893–7 and the 1894 Pullman Strike. Seeing friends and acquaintances lose jobs and face eviction and starvation through no fault of their own left her badly shaken. The lessons she learned about the need for government action – from providing jobs for the unemployed to supporting mediation between unions and companies – spurred in her a new-found passion for legislative reform.

Perhaps most radical from the point of view of her contemporaries was her support for unions and her support of the free exchange of ideas. In 1903 she co-founded the National Women's Trade Union League, a cross-class organization whose mission was to support the issues facing union women. While never a Marxist, she read Marx's Capital and considered herself a socialist in one of the senses that the word conveyed in the 1890s – a supporter of government policies that would equalize resources to balance injustices. She also welcomed many radical lecturers in Hull House, including Eugene Debs, Henry Demarest Lloyd, Henry George, George Herron, and Emma Goldman.

While Addams's methods of reform – lobbying, public speaking, grassroots organizing, writing, and organized marches – were always non-violent, and while her language was generally designed to create sympathy rather than anger, some of her speeches revealed passion. In an 1895 speech on the Pullman Strike, she argued: “The aroused conscience of men [requires] the complete participation of the working classes in the spiritual, intellectual and material inheritance of the human race.” That same year her anger over the restricting powers barring women's freedom deepened. She explained in a commencement speech at Rockford College that women had not participated in politics or business corporations because “they have been chained down by a military code whose penalty [for violation] is worse than the court martial.” It was this anger that helped fuel her first public endorsement of the campaign for women's suffrage in 1897.

Addams's response to the problem of racism was also increasingly assertive over the years. Troubled since the 1880s by the cruel reality of social segregation, she never let it be practiced at Hull House, and in 1895 she was one of two sponsors for the membership of Fannie Barrier Williams, a prominent African American Chicago woman, to the all-white Chicago Woman's Club. In 1900, at Ida B. Wells's request, Addams organized a meeting with the editors of the Chicago Tribune to protest their editorial endorsement of the idea of segregated schools in Chicago and succeeded in causing them to abandon that view. In 1912, as a member of the platform committee of the newly organized Progressive Party, she fought, but failed, to persuade the party to seat the African American delegates from several southern states. When US Marines occupied Haiti in 1916, Addams joined others to call for the restoration of self-government. She was a co-founder of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and a member of the board of the Chicago Urban League.

The protest that caused the Federal Bureau of Investigation, among others, to call Addams “the most dangerous woman in America,” however, was against war. Committed to non-violence as an ideal since reading Leo Tolstoy’s Christian writings in the 1880s, Addams was first involved with the peace movement in 1893, when she chaired the organizing committee for the American Peace Society Congress at the world’s fair. She spoke out against the Spanish-American War in 1899. In 1904 she was a delegate to the International Peace Congress, but she began to lose popularity and to be vilified in the press after she spoke out against World War I.

Her opposition to the war did not turn her into an openly hostile critic of her government, but she stood her ground as an identified pacifist during the war and defended other pacifists as patriots when they were jailed as traitors. She supported the right of free speech, visited imprisoned conscientious objectors, lobbied the government to exempt conscientious objectors from the Espionage and Conscription Acts, and served on the executive boards of the controversial Fellowship of Reconciliation and the American Union against Militarism, which would evolve, in 1920, into the American Civil Liberties Union. After the war, Addams’s work on peace, mainly through the Women’s International League of Peace and Freedom, which was founded in 1919 and which she served as president of until her death in 1935, was inherently revolutionary. She was honored for that work when she became the first American woman awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1931.

SEE ALSO: Brown, John (1800–1859); Debs, Eugene (1855–1926); Goldman, Emma (1869–1940); Mazzini, Giuseppe (1805–1872); Marxism; Owen, Robert (1771–1858)

References and Suggested Readings

Davis, A. (1973) American Heroine: The Life and Legend of Jane Addams. New York: Oxford University Press.

Knight, L. (2005) Citizen: Jane Addams and the Struggle for Democracy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Linn, J. (1935) Jane Addams. New York: D. Appleton-Century.

Adorno, Theodor W. (1903–1969)

Christina Gerhardt

Theodor W. Adorno began his intellectual career in Frankfurt and Vienna in the 1920s, continued his work in American exile during Germany’s fascist era, and returned to West Germany after World War II to reconstitute with Max Horkheimer the Institute for Social Research, better known as the Frankfurt School. Adorno’s writings span a broad range of disciplines, including philosophy and sociology, psychology and aesthetics, as well as literary and music criticism. While Adorno has often been cast as the most philosophical and least political of the Frankfurt School theorists, in his estimation the two are not mutually exclusive, as demonstrated by his central works: Dialectic of Enlightenment, co-authored with Max Horkheimer; Negative Dialectics; and Aesthetic Theory.

Facing increased criticism from a student protest that his writings had in part inspired, Adorno stated as much in the late 1960s. On June 2, 1967, during a demonstration in Berlin against the Shah of Iran’s visit, a police officer shot and killed Benno Ohnesorg, a student protestor. To many, the date marks the radicalization of the student movement in Germany. Afterwards, German Students for a Democratic Society (SDS) activist Rudi Dutschke declared that the most important task facing members of the Frankfurt School was to describe a concrete utopia towards which the student movement could agitate and organize. Further increasing disaffection between himself and the student movement, Adorno had police clear a group of students from the halls of the Frankfurt School in 1969, mistakenly assuming they had come with the intent to occupy the building. Soon after, he granted the German news magazine Der Spiegel an interview to address the uprisings and tensions and, in his own fashion, to respond to Dutschke’s call for concrete action. Taking up the alleged antithesis between aesthetics and politics, between theory and praxis, Adorno argues that theory informs praxis, that the rhetorical structure of arguments is political and, moreover, has political consequences.

Following Hegel, Adorno frequently uses a dialectical model that examines antagonisms, be they historical, philosophical, political, or rhetorical. He parts ways with Hegel, however, in focusing on the suppressed or negative element of the dialectic. Thus, in Dialectic of Enlightenment, for example, Adorno and Horkheimer argue that the Enlightenment betrayed its own original liberating impulse by reverting to myth in the domination of nature, which is conceived – as in Marx’s writings – as both outer and inner nature and combined with the Weberian motif of rationalization and disenchantment of the world. In order to avoid a less than enlightened consequence of idealist thinking (the historical backdrop is the Holocaust), Adorno and Horkheimer propose that nature – be it an animalistic nature within or the nature around us – not be suppressed. In Adorno’s estimation, suppression or instrumentalization is harmful both to the entity suppressed and to the entity suppressing. Connecting philosophical models to political critiques in Negative Dialectics, Adorno (1973) argues: “A new categorical imperative has been imposed by Hitler upon unfree mankind: to arrange their thoughts and actions so that Auschwitz will not repeat itself, so that nothing similar will happen again.”

SEE ALSO: Frankfurt School (Jewish Emigrés); Fromm, Erich (1900–1980); Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich (1770–1831); Lukács, Georg (1885–1971); Marcuse, Herbert (1898–1979); Marx, Karl (1818–1883); Marxism

References and Suggested Readings

- Adorno, T. W. (1973) Negative Dialectics. New York: Seabury.
- Jameson, F. (1990) Late Marxism: Adorno, or, The Persistence of the Dialectics. London: Verso.
- Jarvis, S. (1998) Adorno: A Critical Introduction. New York: Routledge.
- Jay, M. (1984) Adorno. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Rose, G. (1978) The Melancholy Science: An Introduction to the Thought of Theodor W. Adorno. London: Macmillan.

Afghanistan, 1978 Revolution and Islamic Civil War

Yury V. Bosin

The first Afghan left party, the People’s Democratic Party of Afghanistan (PDPA), was founded in 1965 by urban intellectuals who sought to modernize the country and deter foreign intervention. The leftists supported the overthrow of the monarchy in 1973 and were granted four ministerial posts in Muhammad Doud’s republican government. In the next few years, however, Muhammad Doud’s authoritarian trend led to the formation of his absolutist regime, leaving no democratic freedoms. PDPA was banned and leading leftists went into exile.

In the late 1970s, political tensions escalated with the economic stagnation brought about by the drastic shrinkage of foreign development assistance. Afghan–US relations soured over Doud’s support for Pashtun activists waging a longstanding autonomy struggle with Pakistan. The Baluchistan region of Pakistan extends into Afghanistan, and the people of the region have sought to create an independent state. In response to Doud’s support for the Pashtun autonomy movement, the US halted development projects in Afghanistan. Soviet aid was not enough to sustain the Afghan economy and pervasive poverty strengthened public support for communist and Islamist radical movements.

Due to growing impoverishment, spontaneous uprisings flared up in the provinces, and the Afghan government’s effort to repress mounting dissent created even greater public opposition. The assassination of Mir Akbar Khyber, a popular PDPA leader, on April 17, 1978, ignited mass discontent and a surge of protests in Kabul. Most Afghan leftists blamed the Muhammad Doud regime for Khyber’s death. But Doud’s government repressed the PDPA and imprisoned leading activists in the party. The rebellion spread into the army where the leftist sentiment was traditionally high. On April 27, 1978, army units surrounded the Presidential Palace, and following a skirmish, Mohammad Doud and members of his family were found dead. A new government was formed by PDPA leaders who were released from prison by the military, during what became known as the April Revolution.

Islamic Resistance and Civil War (1978–1996)

The April Revolution established PDPA rule in Kabul, which articulated a commitment to egalitarianism, equality, and social justice. But the new government could not focus on social reform, due to considerable opposition, and was forced to concentrate efforts on suppressing challenges from political antagonists. The doctrinaire radical wing of PDPA – Khalk (People) – which assumed power over the government pursued a policy of wiping out any source of dissent in the capital and in the provinces. Massive arrests, purges, and extrajudicial executions angered many traditional leaders, who unified popular resistance against the PDPA regime. In the summer of 1979 armed rebellions took place in Khazarajat, Nuristan, and ethnically disparate areas in eastern Afghanistan, and the PDPA government lost control over significant parts of the national territory. During the 1980s and 1990s, the war contributed to the collapse of the economy and means of subsistence in the countryside, particularly in the Pashtun region, a region where the Taliban emerged.

To control the uprising from overthrowing the government, and to regain control over the territory, the PDPA requested military assistance from the Soviet Union. Appealing to Marxist solidarity, PDPA leaders asked the Soviet Union for military aid, and in December 1979 the Soviet Union dispatched an army of 120,000 soldiers to Afghanistan in support of the PDPA. The Soviet troops assisted the PDPA in securing control over major towns and transportation routes but the countryside remained under the control of insurgents and opponents of the government. The Soviet army presence became yet another catalyst fueling the anti-PDPA rebellion and an arena for Cold War competition between the USSR and the US. PDPA leaders were stigmatized by opponents as betraying the Afghan people, as Soviet puppets, and as infidels threatening to destroy Islam in the country. The coming to power of a moderate PDPA faction – Parcham (The Banner) – did little to alleviate popular resentments.

The major opposition to PDPA leadership was led by Islamic fundamentalists who became known as Mujahedeen (holy warriors). The Islamic Party of Afghanistan and the Islamic Society of Afghanistan (Jamaat-i-Islami) spearheaded the war against PDPA and the Soviet army, with the help of dozens of smaller religious organizations. As a major site of Cold War competition, the US bankrolled Islamic opposition through covert channels with logistical support from Pakistani intelligence services. During the 1980s a low-intensity military struggle escalated into a large-scale civil war, with numerous atrocities committed by both sides. Attempts to initiate a dialogue and reconciliation between PDPA and Islamists were unsuccessful and stymied by a deadlock.

In 1985, Mikhail Gorbachev's rise to general secretary of the Soviet Communist Party rapidly accelerated political and economic reforms in the USSR, leading to a decision to withdraw troops from Afghanistan. By 1989, the Soviet army pulled out all its troops from Afghanistan, yet the PDPA survived in power for three years without Soviet support. In 1992, when the Soviet Union severed all weapons and fuel supply to the PDPA army, the US-backed Islamic opposition won the final victory and seized power in Kabul.

The civil war did not end with the removal of the PDPA from power as Islamic parties contended for power, furthering political chaos and economic disarray. Following a purge and execution of PDPA leaders, Burhanuddin Rabbani, leader of the Islamic Society of Afghanistan, returned from exile to become president of Afghanistan in 1992. But Rabbani's government was not recognized by Islamic opposition leaders, and the leadership could not secure power outside of Kabul. From 1992 to 1996, virtually all of Afghanistan was governed by local warlords: Abdurrashid Dostum in the northern stronghold surrounding Mazar-i-Sharif; Ahmad Shah Masoud in the Panjsher valley; in western Herat Province, Ismail Khan, a Shia warlord; and Golbeddin Hekmatiar in the east, a major political and military force behind the rise of the Taliban. Relentless and open warfare as well as political chaos helped shape deep popular discontent for the pillage and violence and gave rise to the emergence of the Taliban movement in 1996.

SEE ALSO: Afghanistan, Resistance to 19th-Century British Invasion; Bacha-i Sakkao's Movement; Bin Laden, Osama (b. 1957) and al-Qaeda; Durrani Empire, Popular Protests, 1747–1823; Taliban, 1996–2007

References and Suggested Readings

- Briant, P. (2002) From Cyrus to Alexander: A History of the Persian Empire. Trans. P. T. Daniels. Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns.
- Dupree, L. (1979) Red Flag Over Hindu Kush. Hanover, NH: American Universities Field Staff.
- Dupree, L. (1980) Afghanistan. Hanover, NH: American Universities Field Staff.
- Gregorian, V. (1969) The Emergence of Modern Afghanistan: Politics of Reform and Modernization, 1880–1946. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Marsden, P. (2002) The Taliban: War and Religion in Afghanistan. New York: Palgrave.
- Masson, V. & Romodon, V. (1964) A History of Afghanistan, Vols. 1–2. Moscow: Nauka (in Russian).
- Montgomery, J. D. & Rondinelli, D. A. (Eds.) (2004) Beyond Reconstruction in Afghanistan: Lessons from Development Experience. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Poullada, L. (1973) Reform and Rebellion in Afghanistan, 1919–1929: King Amanullah's Failure to Modernize a Tribal Society. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Rubin, B. (2002) The Fragmentation of Afghanistan: State Formation and Collapse in the International System. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Sykes, P. (1940) A History of Afghanistan. London: Macmillan.

Afghanistan, resistance to 19th-century British invasion

Yury V. Bosin

The British empire invaded Afghanistan twice – in 1838–42 and in 1878–81. In both cases the goal of the invasion was to deflect Russian influence and to prevent it from establishing a foothold in the strategic region. In response to each invasion, the Afghan population revolted against their occupiers.

In 1838 Shah Dost Muhammad Khan, the ruler of Afghanistan, failed to organize significant resistance and soon surrendered. The British army occupied Ghazni, Kabul, and Jalalabad almost effortlessly. The British promoted a puppet emir, Shah Shujah, who agreed to cede to British hegemony.

The majority of the Afghans, however, despised Shah Shujah for his political betrayal and initiated a rebellion against the British, whose army consumed essential food and supplies that raised local prices so high the local population in the capital of Kabul became impoverished. In turn, the Islamic mullahs began calling for a jihad – a holy war against non-believers, or infidels. On November 1, 1842, a popular uprising against the occupation attacked the British garrison in Kabul, killing hundreds of British troops. British commanders decided to withdraw from Kabul and on January 1, 1842, a regiment of 20,000 departed to the nearby cities of Jalalabad and Gandamak. The persistence of raids and ambushes by local militia during a harsh winter turned the retreat into a rout. Fewer than 2,000 reached Jalalabad on January 12, and only 350 of them were lucky to find refuge in Gandamak. Shah Shujah was murdered.

The fate of the Kabul garrison shocked British colonial officials in Calcutta and London, and British garrisons in Ghazni and Jalalabad were ordered to occupy Kabul and to retaliate against the insurgents. The garrison left Kabul in ruins and killed thousands of civilians, but the British recognized that they could occupy Afghanistan only at their own peril. In October 1842, all British troops returned to India.

The second British invasion in 1879 followed a similar scenario. Initially, the British army expedition encountered minimal local resistance, and by January 1879 the Afghan cities of Jalalabad and Qandahar were under military control. On February 20, 1879, Afghan emir Sher Ali Khan died. His son and heir Yakub capitulated by signing the Treaty of Gandamak with British colonial powers, marking the end of Afghan independence. The British mission was established in Kabul.

The military catastrophe during its first invasion of Afghanistan was not instructive to the British, who in the second invasion also ignored swelling popular resentment and animosity all through the country. In September 1879, an uprising in Kabul caught the colonial occupiers by surprise as protesters ravaged British residences, and Louis Cavagnari, the head of the British mission, was killed. The British recaptured Kabul in October 1879, but even brutal reprisals against opponents did not restrain what was then also referred to as a jihad, as growing numbers of Pushtun and Tajik guerillas attacked the colonial army. There was, however, no single leader to unite the insurgents. Abdurrahman Khan, the grandson of emir Dost Muhammad, appeared in the north of Afghanistan after 11 years of exile in Russian Turkestan, threatening to push the British out of Kabul. His challenger, Ayub Khan, an influential ruler of the western province of Herat, launched an offensive on Qandahar and inflicted a complete defeat on the British near the Afghan village of Maywand in July 1880. Though the British fared better in subsequent military engagements with the Afghan insurgents, the popular uprising was not quelled by the British. In effect, through mobilizing military opposition, both khans seized the popular wave of anti-British sentiment to win the Afghan crown after it became clear that the British were unable to fight the guerilla war in Afghanistan. In 1881, British Queen Victoria officially recognized Abdurrahman Khan as emir of Kabul and withdrew British forces to India, while Ayub Khan went into exile after a series of military defeats. Although the British installed a patron in 1881, both British military interventions in Afghanistan suffered a similar fate, defeated by grassroots guerilla resistance rather than regular armies.

SEE ALSO: Afghanistan, 1978 Revolution and Islamic Civil War; Bacha-i Sakkao's Movement; Bin Laden, Osama (b. 1957) and al-Qaeda; Durrani Empire, Popular Protests, 1747–1823; Taliban, 1996–2007

References and Suggested Readings

- Briant, P. (2002) From Cyrus to Alexander: A History of the Persian Empire. Trans. P. T. Daniels. Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns.
- Gregorian, V. (1969) The Emergence of Modern Afghanistan: Politics of Reform and Modernization, 1880–1946. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Masson, V. & Romodon, V. (1964) A History of Afghanistan, Vols. 1–2. Moscow: Nauka (in Russian).
- Sykes, P. (1940) A History of Afghanistan. London: Macmillan.

African American resistance, Jim Crow era

Simon Wendt

Black militant resistance played a significant role throughout the Jim Crow era. Prior to the 1950s and 1960s, however, those African Americans who used armed force to protect themselves or their communities against white aggression generally faced overwhelming odds and swift retaliation.

The protective efforts of self-defense groups that operated during the Southern civil rights struggle were more successful than the militant resistance of their precursors, but racist violence continued to rage virtually unchecked in Dixie until the late 1960s. During the Black Power era, the function of armed black resistance changed, serving primarily as a militant symbol of defiance that instilled pride in many male activists.

In the aftermath of the Civil War, former slaves gained the right to bear arms, and a considerable number of them used their newly acquired guns to fight the Ku Klux Klan and other terrorist groups. But black militant resistance during Reconstruction, which conjured up deep-seated fears of armed black insurrection among white Southerners, could not prevent the advent of segregation and disfranchisement in the Jim Crow era. Racist violence also continued. During the 1880s and 1890s, lynching emerged as a new form of racial terror to confine African Americans to a status of politically impotent second-class citizens. Official statistics put the number of black victims at 3,786 in the period 1889 to 1945, although the real numbers are likely to be higher. Lynch mobs frequently tortured and mutilated their black victims, arguing that such ghastly crimes were a justified means to protect white women from alleged black rapists. Outspoken black intellectuals such as Ida B. Wells, Thomas Fortune, or W. E. B. Du Bois refuted such arguments and called for manly self-defense to confront white lynch mobs.

When African Americans joined together, they were sometimes able to repel white mobs. In 1899, for example, during what came to be known as the Darrien Insurrection, a small army of armed black men in McIntosh County, Georgia, thwarted the attempts of a white mob to seize a black prisoner accused of raping a white woman. Seven years later, blacks in Wiggins, Mississippi, traded more than 500 shots with a white mob that had vowed to lynch a member of the black community.

More often, however, black militant resistance provoked rather than deterred racist aggression. Armed blacks who confronted exploitative employers, white lynch mobs, or abusive police officers frequently faced swift retaliation against themselves and their communities. Despite numerous appeals from African Americans to prosecute lynchings and other forms of racist violence, the federal government did nothing to stop the brutal reign of white supremacy.

In the first two decades of the twentieth century a number of black radicals practiced and publicly advocated armed self-defense against racist terrorism. In the aftermath of World War I, when race riots broke out in Houston, Chicago, Washington, DC, and numerous other American cities, a number of combat-experienced black veterans organized the protection of black neighborhoods. Black nationalist leaders such as Marcus Garvey and Cyril Briggs applauded such examples of black militancy and urged their followers to confront white aggression in the same manner. During the 1920s many African American intellectuals hailed the advent of what they called a New Negro, a black man who refused to be intimidated by racist terrorism. As in the case of resistance to lynching, however, self-defense could also trigger anti-black violence. In 1921 in Tulsa, Oklahoma, for instance, blacks' attempt to protect a young African American from a lynch mob led to the invasion and complete destruction of the city's black neighborhood.

Despite such setbacks, black militant resistance continued in the 1930s and 1940s. During the Great Depression, black sharecroppers and tenants relied on armed protection to safeguard the meetings of a nascent union movement in Alabama. World War II further politicized and radicalized African Americans, many of whom refused to acquiesce to white violence. Black soldiers frequently rose up against their mistreatment. Black civilians fought back when attacked by whites during urban race riots. Between 1941 and 1943, hundreds of racial clashes erupted in cities across the United States. As in the case of slave rebellions in antebellum America, black unrest fueled rumors among white Southerners that blacks were planning an armed uprising after the war as a consequence of black militancy. Such revolts never occurred, but numerous black veterans used their guns to defend themselves when confronted by racist attackers upon their return to the United States. In 1946, in Columbia, Tennessee, several hundred black veterans guarded the city's black neighborhood against a rumored white attack. Yet armed resistance to white violence continued to be risky, especially in the Deep South, where Jim Crow remained firmly in place. In Columbia, white policemen overwhelmed the black defenders, destroying black homes and businesses and arresting hundreds of African Americans. Only with the help of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), whose publicity campaigns also contributed to the decline of lynchings in the 1930s, did the indicted defenders of black Columbia eventually gain their freedom.

During the Southern civil rights struggle of the 1950s and 1960s, white supremacists again launched a reign of terror to stop the black quest for equality, but organized black self-defense sparked less brutal repercussions than in the past and frequently helped local civil rights campaigns survive in the face of white violence. Even Martin Luther King Jr., who later became the most ardent advocate of non-violence, accepted armed protection in the early days of the famous Montgomery Bus Boycott, which successfully desegregated the city's bus lines in 1956. After a bomb destroyed parts of King's home, armed sentries made sure that the young pastor remained unharmed. NAACP activist Robert F. Williams emerged as an early proponent of what he called "armed self-reliance." In 1957, the black military veteran founded a black self-defense organization in Monroe, North Carolina, to protect the local freedom movement against the revived Ku Klux Klan. That same year blacks in Birmingham, Alabama, founded the Civil Rights Guards to prevent dynamite attacks against the church of local civil rights leader Rev. Fred Shuttlesworth, while armed men in Little Rock, Arkansas, formed a "volunteer guard committee" to protect the home of Daisy Bates, a NAACP leader who had supported the desegregation of the city's Central High School.

More sophisticated black self-defense groups emerged in the 1960s, when civil rights activists launched massive non-violent demonstrations and voter registration drives in the Deep South. Highly visible protest campaigns such as the sit-ins, the Freedom Ride, and the Birmingham and Selma campaigns of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) demonstrated the power of non-violent direct action, but activists who organized voter registration drives in the rural areas of the Deep South quickly learned that non-violence had its limitations. Confronted with the federal government's reluctance to provide protection against the Ku Klux Klan, abusive police officers, and recalcitrant local and state authorities, numerous African Americans resolved to rely on their own protection. Non-violence remained the driving force behind the civil rights movement, but it was frequently complemented by self-defense. In the summer of 1964, for example, black military veterans in Tuscaloosa, Alabama, organized a highly sophisticated defense squad, which guarded African American activists and their white allies. During the Freedom Summer project of 1964, a number of black Mississippians formed similar groups to repel segregationist attacks. That same year, blacks in Jonesboro, Louisiana formed the Deacons for Defense and Justice (DDJ), which patrolled black neighborhoods with guns, provided armed escorts for white and black activists, and guarded the offices of the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE). In 1965 African American activists formed another DDJ group in Bogalusa, Louisiana, achieving nationwide notoriety after several shootouts with the Ku Klux Klan.

The armed actions of the Deacons and other black self-defense groups in the 1960s helped local freedom movements survive in the face of white violence, bolstered the morale of civil rights activists, instilled pride in black protectors, and sometimes served as an additional means of coercion in the fight against Jim Crow. They also generated frequent and heated debates about their legitimacy among non-violent activists, but most of the black and white civil rights organizers who worked in the Deep South eventually came to accept black self-defense as a pragmatic necessity.

By the late 1960s, when federal authorities finally began to take seriously their responsibility to protect African American citizens, most Southern self-defense groups had disbanded. For the emerging Black Power movement, however, armed resistance became a vital pillar of its multi-layered program. The new militants' focus on self-defense owed much to the long-held skepticism toward non-violence among African American militants. As early as 1961, black nationalist leader Malcolm X lambasted Martin Luther King's non-violent philosophy as unmanly. As the spokesman of Elijah Muhammad's Nation of Islam, the militant Muslim preached the sect's gospel of black pride, moral uplift, and economic self-reliance. In addition, he insisted on blacks' right to self-defense and called upon them to form self-defense groups to repel racist attacks. Malcolm's militant message, which focused not only on armed resistance but also stressed the importance of black pride and Pan-Africanism, had an immense impact on black militants across the United States. Among his earliest devotees were Maxwell Stanford and Donald Freeman, who in 1962 founded the Revolutionary Action Movement (RAM), a radical organization that sought to use mass action and armed resistance to foster a revolutionary black movement. In the following years the combination of Malcolm's ideas and unrelenting white violence in the South resolved many African American activists to renounce peaceful protest and to embrace self-defense. In the aftermath of the James Meredith March of 1966, during which SNCC activist Stokely Carmichael first voiced the slogan Black Power, traditionally non-violent organizations such as SNCC and CORE officially embraced the militant tactic.

During the Black Power era, however, self-defense came to play a fundamentally different role and underwent a process of radical reinterpretation. In contrast to their Southern peers, Black Power militants rarely engaged in armed confrontations with the Ku Klux Klan or other racist groups. Black self-defense became a militant symbol of black defiance, which served primarily as a means to affirm and nurture black manhood.

The most prominent advocate of this new type of militant resistance was the Black Panther Party for Self-Defense (BPP). Founded in Oakland, California in 1966, the BPP initially regarded its armed patrols in urban black communities as a way to confront police brutality, but the group's self-defense stance functioned mostly on a symbolic level, helping the organization to boost its male members' self-esteem, to gain publicity, and to recruit new members. Ultimately, the Panthers and other black nationalist groups such as Ron Karenga's US or the Republic of New Africa reinterpreted traditional concepts of self-defense. Using the ideas of Malcolm X, anti-colonial theorist Frantz Fanon, and revolutionaries such as Che Guevara and Mao Tse Tung, they argued that race riots and revolutionary violence constituted a legitimate form of self-defense to resist white oppression. In reality, self-defense played only a minor role in the violent upheavals that rocked hundreds of American cities between 1964 and 1968. African Americans rarely repelled white attacks but rather protested against white neglect of their neighborhoods and police brutality by burning white property and sometimes battling police officers and National Guardsmen who sought to quell the violence. Some of the most destructive upheavals took place after the assassination of Martin Luther King on April 4, 1968, when 230 riots broke out in 125 cities across the country.

Despite the largely symbolic nature of Black Power militancy, the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) considered the new militants a threat to the nation's security. Beginning in 1967, it used the highly sophisticated counter-intelligence program COINTELPRO to disrupt and destroy the Black Panther Party and other revolutionary groups that advocated self-defense. FBI agents infiltrated black militant organizations and attempted to fan animosities within black nationalist circles. On several occasions the FBI orchestrated deliberate assassinations of BPP members or aided the police to imprison party leaders on fabricated charges. In the following years, militant groups such as the Panthers either succumbed to the FBI's destructive tactics or toned down their provocative rhetoric. A few black militants, among them the Black Liberation Army, continued clandestine guerilla warfare against the white police, but most activists had abandoned their plans for armed revolution by 1972, focusing on political organizing instead. Nevertheless, the Black Power movement's reinterpretation of black self-defense as part of a protracted struggle for liberation remains one of the most visible forms of black militant resistance in the twentieth century.

SEE ALSO: CORE (Congress of Racial Equality); Du Bois, W. E. B. (1868–1963); Malcolm X (1925–1965); King, Martin Luther, Jr. (1929–1968) and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC); Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC); Wells, Ida B. (1862–1931) and the Anti-Lynching Campaign

References and Suggested Readings

- Brundage, W. F. (Ed.) (1997) Under the Sentence of Death: Lynching in the South. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Feagin, J. R. (1973) Ghetto Revolts: The Politics of Violence in American Cities. New York: Macmillan.
- Mumford, K. (2007) Newark: A History of Race, Rights and Riots in America. New York: New York University Press.
- O'Brien, G. W. (1999) The Color of the Law: Race, Violence, and Justice in the Post-World War II South. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Shapiro, H. (1988) White Violence and Black Response: From Reconstruction to Montgomery. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press.
- Tyson, T. B. (1999) Radio Free Dixie: Robert F. Williams and the Roots of Black Power. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

Wendt, S. (2007) The Spirit and the Shotgun: Armed Resistance and the Struggle for Civil Rights. Gainesville: University Press of Florida.

African American resistance, Reconstruction era

Simon Wendt

Faced with an upsurge of anti-black violence after the end of slavery, blacks in the American South frequently resorted to armed force to protect themselves and their communities. Compared with similar efforts by militant slaves prior to the Civil War, black defensive efforts during Reconstruction were more widespread and more successful. However, white numerical and military superiority as well as the reluctance of the federal government to come to the aid of embattled African Americans made black resistance a dangerous venture that tended to result in brutal retaliation and failed to halt the advent of segregation and disfranchisement.

As a consequence of the Union's victory in 1865, a wave of racial violence swept across the South in the months and years after the war. White Southerners beat and murdered black men, raped black women, and terrorized black communities. One of the most violent anti-black organizations was the Ku Klux Klan, a secret fraternal society that was founded by former Confederate soldiers in 1866 in Pulaski, Tennessee. Together with the Knights of the White Camelia and other white supremacist groups, the Klan was most active in areas where blacks constituted a large minority, since their votes for the Republican Party could have considerable political weight. From 1868 to 1877, the year that marked the end of Reconstruction, every Southern election was accompanied by white violence. But even before the first elections were held, blacks had to fear for their lives. In 1866, whites killed dozens of African Americans who sought to organize politically during race riots in New Orleans and Memphis. Two years later, violence once more erupted in New Orleans, and similar riots occurred in the 1870s in South Carolina and Alabama.

Congressional Reconstruction exacerbated racial tensions. The sight of black voters and office holders infuriated ex-Confederates, who stepped up their violent efforts to “redeem” the South. Neither the small contingent of Union troops that was stationed in the South nor the Freedmen’s Bureau – an institution designed to ease blacks’ transition from slavery to freedom – was able or willing to stop the white counter-revolution. In the early 1870s the federal government prosecuted a number of Klansmen for their crimes, but many of them were acquitted, and the small number of convictions did little to stop the violence. Since the federal government refused to intervene in the region, Southern states continued to eliminate black political power with impunity. In 1873, in one of the bloodiest incidents of the Reconstruction era, a large army of white supremacists slaughtered more than one hundred black militiamen in Colfax, Louisiana. Two years later, Mississippi initiated the so-called Shotgun Policy, which led to more mass killings and prompted many black Republicans to leave the state. The Hamburg Massacre of 1876, during which Confederate veterans murdered a group of surrounded black militiamen in cold blood, marked the brutal acme of a reign of terror that had returned white Democrats to power in almost all of the Southern states by 1877.

Yet many African Americans refused to remain passive in the face of white terror, using their newly acquired weapons to resist collectively or on an individual basis. Indeed, the end of the Civil War marked a watershed in the history of black militant resistance in the United States. Slaves had been prohibited from owning weapons, which made militant slave resistance and rebellion extremely difficult. After the war, the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution not only ended slavery and made African Americans citizens of the United States, but also allowed them to carry weapons. Across the South, African Americans purchased rifles, shotguns, and pistols, sending shudders up the spines of white planters. Soon after the Union’s victory conservative newspapers in rural areas of Louisiana complained about the practice of blacks carrying concealed weapons even when working in the fields. For black men in particular, the right to bear arms became an important symbol of their new freedom. The ability of freedmen to protect themselves and their families from former masters was the source of an important psychological transformation. For them, the meaning of citizenship went beyond the right to vote and the ability to work their own land. It also meant the right to own guns and their ability to become the patriarchal provider and protector of their families.

Black Civil War veterans in particular were also determined to fight back. In many parts of the South, former black Union soldiers formed paramilitary organizations to defend their communities against the Ku Klux Klan and other terrorist groups. Black militias were unable to stop entirely the reign of terror that whites launched in the aftermath of the war, and as in the case of the massacres in Colfax and Hamburg, militant resistance frequently meant death for black defenders. But on several occasions black militiamen successfully drove back white vigilantes with force. In 1876, for instance, a black militia successfully repelled an attack by Klansmen near Laurens, South Carolina.

Informal networks that welded post-Civil War black communities together facilitated spontaneous acts of resistance. Sometimes, armed freedmen came to the aid of black Republican politicians who were threatened by racist Democrats. On other occasions they protected members of the black community from the Ku Klux Klan. In 1871, for example, the hooded order attempted to raid a jail in Danville, Kentucky, to seize two black inmates. When the Klansmen arrived, they were confronted by a group of armed black men who fended off the attack with gunfire. Such forms of resistance were most effective in those areas of the South where African Americans were in the majority. In low-country South Carolina, for instance, large black communities were well organized and could easily repel white attackers.

Among white Southerners, such episodes of black self-defense conjured up deep-seated fears of violent black insurrections, echoing fears of slave rebellions before the Civil War. The so-called Black Codes that many Southern state legislatures passed after the war were one attempt to eliminate this perceived threat. While these laws were primarily intended to maintain a cheap black labor force on white plantations, they also restricted African Americans’ ability to defend themselves. The Louisiana code of 1866 prohibited blacks from carrying firearms without the written permission of their employer. Mississippi’s code went even further, barring blacks entirely from owning weapons. Some scholars have suggested that former Confederate states sought to continue such restrictions after the repeal of the black codes in 1867 by passing concealed weapons laws. Yet the implementation of such regulations proved difficult. Since legal restrictions on blacks' ability to bear arms tended to be unsuccessful, most white Southerners continued to rely on extra-legal violence to suppress black militancy. As during the aftermath of slave revolts and conspiracies, rumors of resistance were frequently sufficient reason for self-proclaimed white vigilantes to indiscriminately search the homes of African Americans and to take away their weapons. Despite former slaveholders' fears that slaves would slaughter thousands of whites once they gained their freedom, very few blacks called for retaliation. In 1876 a few Charleston blacks attacked white men on the street in retaliation for the Hamburg Massacre, and some blacks threatened retribution if white aggression continued. By and large, however, black militant resistance during Reconstruction remained defensive.

SEE ALSO: African American Resistance, Jim Crow Era; Radical Reconstruction, United States, Promise and Failure of

References and Suggested Readings

- Cottrol, R. J. & Diamond, R. T. (1995) "Never Intended to Be Applied to the White Population": Firearms, Regulation, and Racial Disparity – The Redeemed South's Legacy to National Jurisprudence. Chicago-Kent Law Review 70, 3: 1307–35.
- Foner, E. (1988) Reconstruction: America's Unfinished Journey, 1863–1877. New York: Harper & Row.
- Hollandsworth, J. G. (2001) An Absolute Massacre: The New Orleans Race Riot of July 30, 1866. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.
- Lane, C. (2008) The Day Freedom Died: The Colfax Massacre, the Supreme Court, and the Betrayal of Reconstruction. New York: Henry Holt.
- Shapiro, H. (1988) White Violence and Black Response: From Reconstruction to Montgomery. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press.
- Wright, G. C. (1990) Racial Violence in Kentucky, 1865–1940. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.

African Blood Brotherhood

Roderick Bush

W. E. B. Du Bois's Darkwater (1920) and Lothrop Stoddard's Rising Tide of Color Against White World-Supremacy (1921) reflected a growing worldwide political opposition between an increasingly vocal global whiteness and the rise of the dark world, now joined by a new global black anti-colonialism. The migration of blacks from the South and the Caribbean fostered the emergence of the New Negro radicalism of Garvey's Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA), Hubert Harrison's Liberty League, A. Philip Randolph and Chandler Owen's Messenger, and Cyril Briggs's African Blood Brotherhood.

Historian Hubert Harrison, considered the father of New Negro radicalism, contended that the new radicalism of the Negro in 1920 was based on their observation of international events. These observations did not consist of the exploitation of laborers by capitalists, as the Socialist Party maintained, "but the social, political, and economic subjection of colored peoples by white. It is not the Class Line, but the Color Line, which is the incorrect but accepted expression of the Dead Line of racial inferiority." Harrison was a socialist but held that the American ideology of Race First required the Negro to respond with his own defensive race consciousness. Harrison's experience with the Socialist Party had soured him on coalitions with the white left, but his fellow advocate of Race First nationalism, Cyril Briggs, would evolve a different approach.

The African Blood Brotherhood (ABB) was a semi-secret organization founded by Briggs, an immigrant from Nevis, educated in St. Kitts. It had its headquarters in New York and chapters in various other cities in the United States and the Caribbean. According to its founders, the ABB was the first secret organization to be formed in the western world having as its purpose "the liberation of Africa and the redemption of the Negro race." In 1920 (less than nine months after the call in Briggs's Crusader for blacks to join the ABB), the organization was described as numbering over 1,000 men, in the US, the West Indies, Central and South America, and West Africa.

The ABB program called for the creation of a worldwide federation of black organizations for which it would provide the revolutionary cadre. In the colonies this federation would build a great Pan-African Army. In the United States the ABB proposed that blacks organize within the trade unions, build cooperatively owned businesses, and create paramilitary self-defense organizations to protect the black community. In addition the program of the ABB called for a liberated race; absolute race equality – political, economic, and social; the fostering of race pride; solidarity with people of color around the world and with class-conscious white workers; higher wages and lower rents for black workers; and a black united front.

While the ABB pledged to fight for the liberation of Africa from the colonial powers, the organization took pains to make clear that it had no plans to set itself above the “chiefs and kings” of Africa. In this it differed from the Garvey movement, which was perceived as a threat by the government of Liberia.

The general line of the ABB was close to the line of the UNIA, but there were significant differences which ABB leadership believed would strengthen the hand of the UNIA and the workers’ movement as a whole in the US and internationally.

The year 1919 had been a tumultuous one, featuring a Red Summer in which white mobs rioted against blacks in 26 US cities but were confronted with blacks fighting back. Further, the Bolshevik revolution was followed by revolutions in Germany, Austria, Hungary, and Bulgaria. Titanic strikes swept Great Britain, France, Italy, the United States, and Japan. The growth of the New Negro movement and its involvement in socialist politics was accompanied by the growing solidarity of labor, the growth of industrial unionism, the growing radicalism of the US working class, and the general strike in Seattle. Protagonists envisioned that the new utopian, racially just and egalitarian society would come about in the near future.

The Founding Congress of the Communist International announced that “The epoch of the final, decisive struggle has come later than the apostles of the socialist revolution [Marx and Engels] expected and hoped. But it has come.” The American Communist Party (CPUSA) argued that “Europe is in revolt. The masses of Asia are stirring uneasily. Capitalism is in collapse. The workers of the world are seeing a new life and securing new courage.” The uncompromising rhetoric of anti-colonialism, anti-imperialism, and about the right of nations to self-determination within the Communist International emboldened the ABB to embrace the revolutionary socialist path of the Bolsheviks. Thus when members of the leadership of the ABB joined the Workers’ Party of America, this was the only means by which they could join the Communist International, which was their primary allegiance. They felt that even if the white members of the Workers’ Party were hypocrites with feet of clay, the Comintern would force them to follow the right policy.

In 1921 Briggs sent a letter to Garvey making a formal proposal to affiliate the ABB with the UNIA and asking the UNIA to issue a broad call to all Negro organizations outside of the UNIA to send delegates to the UNIA convention. Such a grouping would reflect the heterogeneity of the black world and would provide for a process for validating the leadership of this most important organization. Garvey appreciated Briggs’s support and invited him to the convention, but did not address the larger question in Briggs’s proposal.

Given the stakes the ABB took the radical step of taking its proposal to the floor of the 1921 UNIA convention, leafleting delegates with the ABB program so as to distinguish the organization from moderate socialists such as Du Bois, Randolph, and Chandler. It also had Rose Pastor Stokes, a white member of the CPUSA, address the convention, requesting an alliance with the world communist movement.

Given the intensity of the state’s attack on the left during this period, Garvey decided to oust the ABB, declaring that they were dangerous “Bolsheviks.” From the time of this rupture the ABB set out to topple Garvey from the leadership of the UNIA. Briggs began to probe the legality of Garvey’s operation, particularly his use of the mail to solicit purchases for the Black Star Steamship line’s stock. This provided the line of investigation which led eventually to the prosecution of Garvey.

An enduring controversy in the historiography of the ABB is the role of the CPUSA in its formation. While Robert Hill who collected the facsimile of the Crusader argues that the ABB was a black auxiliary organization of the CPUSA, Susan Campbell points out that the ABB had been formed at least six months prior to the September 1919 founding of the Communist Party of America (CPA) and the smaller Communist Labor Party (CLP). Cyril Briggs indicates as much in correspondence with Theodore Draper.

McKay’s statement about his own efforts to develop class consciousness within the Garvey movement seems to apply to the ABB as well. McKay, as an “international socialist,” believed that for “subject peoples” nationalism was the road to international socialism. As the road to justice and equality for black people appeared to narrow, it seemed that the Soviet-led world communist movement offered options not otherwise available.

SEE ALSO: Black Nationalism, 19th and 20th Centuries; Bolsheviks; Communist Party of the United States of America (CPUSA); Du Bois, W. E. B. (1868–1963) Garvey, Marcus (1887–1940) and Garveyism; Internationals; Red Summer, United States, 1919

References and Suggested Readings

- Briggs, C. (1958) Letter to Theodore Draper in New York from Cyril Briggs in Los Angeles, March 17, 1958 (long extract). Theodore Draper Papers, Hoover Institute Archives, Box 31.
- Bush, R. (1999) We Are Not What We Seem: Black Nationalism and Class Struggle in the American Century. New York: New York University Press.
- Campbell, S. (1994) Black Bolsheviks and Recognition of African-America's Right to Self-Determination by the Communist Party USA. Science and Society 58, 4 (Winter): 440–70.
- Du Bois, W. E. B. (1920/1999) Darkwater: Voices From Within the Veil. Mineola, NY: Dover.
- Griffler, K. (1993) The Black Radical Intellectual and the Black Worker: The Emergence of a Program for Black Labor, 1918–1938. PhD dissertation, Ohio State University.
- Harrison, H. (1997) When Africa Awakes. Baltimore: Black Classics Press.
- Hawkins, C. (2000) "Race First versus Class First": An Intellectual History of Afro-American Radicalism, 1911–1928. Doctoral dissertation, University of California, Davis.
- Hill, R. (1987) The Crusader, Vols. 1–3. Los Angeles: UCLA Press.
- James, W. (1998) Holding Aloft the Banner of Ethiopia: Caribbean Radicalism in Early Twentieth-Century America. New York: Verso.
- Makalani, M. (2004) The African Blood Brotherhood and the Rise of Black Radicalism during the New Negro Movement. Doctoral dissertation, University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign.
- Stephens, M. (1999) Black Empire: The Making of Black Transnationalism by West Indians in the United States. Doctoral dissertation, Yale University.
- Stoddard, L. (1921) The Rising Tide of Color Against White World-Supremacy. New York: Charles Scribner & Sons.
- Turner, J. M. (2005) Caribbean Crusaders and the Harlem Renaissance. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.
- Vincent, T. (1971) Black Power and the Garvey Movement. San Francisco: Ramparts Press.

Agbekoya Peasant Uprising and Rebellion, 1968–1969

Julius O. Adekunle

Located in southwestern Nigeria, the Yoruba constitute one of the major ethnic groups in the country. Since Frederick Lord Lugard, the British colonial governor-general of Nigeria, amalgamated the Northern and Southern Protectorates in 1914, the Yoruba have played a leading role in politics by providing nationalist leaders and by participating in the British colonial administration. The Western Region, created by the Richard's Constitution of 1946, was not only the intellectual center of Nigeria, it was also the site of major social and political uprisings.

The foremost political leader of the Yoruba was Obafemi Awolowo, who served in many capacities, but most notably as premier of the Western Region from 1954 to 1959, and later as the opposition leader in the Federal House of Representatives. One of Awolowo's important contributions to the political advancement of the Yoruba was the formation of the Egbe Omo Oduduwa (Association of the Descendants of Oduduwa), which transformed into the Action Group (AG) political party. AG's stronghold was among Yoruba farmers, evident in its palm tree symbol. During Awolowo's tenure as premier, cocoa farmers enjoyed a boom period in production and revenue, facilitating the construction of the Cocoa House, one of the tallest buildings in Ibadan, which demonstrated the importance of the crop. Encouraged by the British colonial government, cocoa production was produced widely in the Western Region. As a primary center of cocoa production, Ibadan was also the focal point of the politicization of farmers and where the Agbekoya Rebellion broke out in 1968.

Origin of the Rebellion

From 1945 to 1957 cocoa farmers suffered significant economic loss due to an outbreak of "swollen shoot" disease in the plants, leading to the first outbreak of unrest in the Western Region. To keep the disease from spreading the colonial government sought to cut down infected cocoa trees – a drastic action for farmers who relied on the crop for survival and sought other options, or at least compensation for their loss. The government refused to compensate the farmers adequately, which galvanized anger, despair, tension, and ultimately political action. Refusing the farmers' demand for 10 shillings and 6 pence per tree, the Nigeria Cocoa Marketing Board agreed to pay 1 shilling and 6 pence per tree as compensation. The first protests were organized by the Mayegun Society (meaning the society "to straighten the world") when farmers attacked government laborers assigned to cut down cocoa trees. In the wake of power politics in Ibadan, the society soon lost its power of resistance, eventually splitting into two groups – the Mayegun Society and the Mayegun League. Despite the fact that farmers formed numerous societies to protest the policies of the colonial government, their demands went largely unheeded. But the Mayegun Protests from 1962 to 1965 were a contributing factor in unrest that evolved into a national political crisis, culminating in military intervention in 1966.

Following independence, the Western Region, renamed the Western State in 1967, remained politically volatile. The ensuing political instability was compounded by the outbreak of the Nigerian Civil War (1967–70), when the Ibo, under Colonel Odumegwu Ojukwu, sought to secede from Nigeria through the formation of an independent Biafra state, composed mainly of the oil-rich Eastern Region. To maintain a unified country the federal government ultimately defeated the Biafra military forces. During the war, calls for creation of more states in order to prevent future secessionist plans increased dramatically. General Yakubu Gowon, the head of state, did not oppose efforts to create more political units to maintain a balance of power in Nigeria. Many people wanted a Yoruba Central State to be carved out of the Western State. Issues regarding war and the creation of additional states were in progress in 1968, the advent of the Agbekoya Revolt in Nigeria's Western State.

The Agbekoya was a pressure group formed by cocoa farmers that organized violent protests in opposition to the government's decision to increase taxation on development, marketing, and transportation, increases in water rates, and overbearing and domineering sanitary and town planning officers. The Agbekoya claimed that farmers were suffering excessively from government policies. Literally translated, Agbekoya means "farmers who reject injustice." The Agbekoya were joined in their protests by the Mekunnu Parapo (Association of Poor People) and Olorunkoya (Society Against Injustice). Given their common interests, all peasant farming societies collaborated to oppose increased taxation. With a recent history of resistance through the Mayegun Society behind them, farmers requested the government to reduce taxes due to the poor harvest in 1968. Instead, the state government raised taxes by 75 percent.

Negotiations and Protests

In accordance with Yoruba culture, farmers protested the new taxes at the palace of the traditional ruler, Olubadan of Ibadan. On November 6, 1968 approximately 2,000 armed farmers gathered at the palace singing war songs and carrying charms for protection. They demanded that the government rescind the new taxes due to heavy rains that adversely affected cocoa production and resulted in a poor harvest. In particular, they claimed the poorest peasants bore the brunt of the tax increase. The Olubadan urged the farmers to eschew violence and remain calm, assuring them that the government would review their situation. The next day, on November 7, the number of peasants surrounding Olubadan Palace swelled to 3,000.

Western State military governor Brigadier Adeyinka Adebayo tried to persuade the peasants to pay taxes without resorting to violence, assuring the farmers that the government would ameliorate their conditions. But the movement spread widely throughout the Western State as many cocoa farmers joined with farmers of other cash crops in revolts that took the form of an agrarian populist movement. Instead of considering the economic plight of farmers, the government viewed the Agbekoya movement as manipulated by ambitious anti-government politicians and lawyers seeking the formation of a Yoruba Central State.

Protesting farmers disassociated themselves from the ongoing agitation by some Ibadan politicians for such a state. Tafa Adeoye, the Agbekoya leader, refuted the claim that the society was manipulated by outsiders, stating emphatically that farmers were not seeking a new state, a matter of official government prerogative, but the welfare of peasant farmers seeking to survive. The Agbekoya was not a political party, but a loosely organized anti-tax organization of farmers seeking economic relief, improved living standards, release of detained tax defaulters from prison, and prosecution of corrupt government officials.

The Uprising

With the collapse of negotiations a battle line was drawn between peasants and government. In December 1968 an insurrection began at Akanran, a village near Ibadan that was a center of the Mayegun revolt, following government efforts to arrest tax defaulters. The Agbekoya farmers in Akanran led by Tafa Adeoye resisted government tax agents, who they complained were corrupt and rapacious. From Akanran, uprisings spread to Ibadan and quickly engulfed the cocoa producing areas. Government houses were destroyed and many died in the battles. In the wake of bloody encounters between anti-tax farmers and police, Akanran was completely deserted.

Peasants stormed the Agodi federal prisons setting free about 400 tax defaulters and those arrested in the rebellions. By October 1968, after the government rescinded its decision to raise taxes and to reduce the flat rate to £2, and agreed to release all participants in the uprisings, the revolts came to a provisional end. But the protests did not end after Agbekoya movement leaders were criticized by rank-and-file members for failing to gain greater concessions from the government.

The revolt assumed a popular form and rapidly spread from Akanran in Ibadan to many parts of the Western State where cocoa farmers lived and were joined by other farmers in opposition to tax increases. Aside from the villages surrounding Ibadan, the revolt spread very quickly to Oyo, Ishara, Ede, Ogbomoso, Abeokuta, and Ijebu Ode. In Abeokuta many people were killed and the government arrested and detained more than 2,000 tax agitators. In Ishara the king's palace and property were burned. At Ila-Orangun tax-agitators assassinated the traditional ruler and vandalized the police station. The wave of the insurrection reached Ogbomoso in July 1969 when the king and members of his family were murdered by rioters. Farmers in the Oke-Ogun region of the Western State also participated in the protests. Fighting police bearing rifles, most peasants carried charms, clubs, guns, and machetes without access to modern weaponry.

Government Actions and Reactions

The Agbekoya Rebellion formed as the Nigerian federal government's attention was focused on the civil war. While taxation was a fundamental issue for peasants during a period of high inflation, the government saw the unrest as a localized problem of the Western State that would not distract it from the civil war. As a federal minister, Awolowo condemned the rebellion as a distraction from the military operation against Ojukwu and his Biafra State. Similarly, the governor declared that the Western State would not tolerate lawlessness and brigandage under any pretext and warned that all protests would be crushed. Considering the seriousness of the continuing riots in Western State, Awolowo, as a respected leader of the Yoruba, participated in a 10-mile "trek for peace" to meet the aggrieved farmers in Ibadan. Awolowo's meeting and discussion with Tafa Adeoye pleased the farmers.

The state government imposed a curfew and ordered the collection of taxes to stop. The Ayoola Commission was established to investigate causes of the widespread riots and to make recommendations to the government as to the appropriate course of action. Based on the commission's report that the riots were engendered by high taxation, the government dropped the idea of the tax increase, but the acts of violence continued because the demand for tax reduction and public welfare had not been fully addressed. Again, the governor met with the leaders of the Agbekoya, but nothing further was gained from the meeting. The governor adopted the policy of divide and conquer by successfully splitting the leaders of the farmers to break their resistance.

Aftermath of the Rebellion

The Agbekoya revolt was eventually crushed, but the government was forced to make some reforms. On October 15, 1969 the military governor announced the reduction in tax from £3.5s to £2 for the 1969/1970 tax year in addition to the probing of government officers who had been accused of corruption. Along with the tax reduction the state government released the anti-tax riot detainees and certain other new taxes were either reduced or eliminated. Sanitary inspectors, market-masters, and major motor park officers were withdrawn from rural areas. In addition, the Western State Marketing Board announced an increase in the price of cocoa for the year 1969/1970. For example, grade one cocoa was to sell for £150 instead of £135.

The Agbekoya Rebellion achieved more than financial gains. The farmers proved that the Yoruba were capable of claiming their rights and were able to fight against oppression and injustice. While the rebellion was not directed toward the further creation of states, it prompted the federal government to affirm its interest in establishing them.

The Agbekoya rebellion provides a distinctive example of a popular revolt whose foundations were based on political and economic issues in Western Nigeria. Since the government did not pay adequate attention to the interests and welfare of peasants and small-scale farmers, and efforts to organize strong unions failed, the uprisings were an instrument of redress. All farmers sought improved economic status and with the mobilization of farmers from other parts of the state the rebellion moved outside Ibadan and became a popular revolt, which the government had to put down. To fight their cause the farmers used acts of violence, intimidation, and charms. Government workers who were assigned to arrest tax evaders were brutally attacked.

The government succeeded in crushing the rebellion and in proscribing the movement, while the farmers gained concessions. The Agbekoya Rebellion, which lasted nine months from November 1968 to July 1969, threatened the peace and political stability of the Western State, but surprisingly there remained calm after the government arrested and seriously dealt with the leaders, especially Tafa Adeoye.

SEE ALSO: Ife–Modakeke Conflict; Niger Delta, Protest Movements; Nigeria, Protest and Revolution, 20th Century; Nigeria, Separatist Agitation, Contemporary

References and Suggested Readings

- Beer, C. (1976) The Politics of Peasant Groups in Western Nigeria. Ibadan: Ibadan University Press.
- Beer, C. F. & Williams, G. P. (1976) The Politics of the Ibadan Peasantry. In G. P. Williams (Ed.), Nigeria: Economy and Society. London: Rex Collins.
- Berry, S. S. (1975) Cocoa, Custom and Socio-Economic Change in Rural Western Nigeria. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Lloyd, P. C. (1974) Power and Independence. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul.

Aggett, Neil (1953–1982)

Nicole Ulrich

Neil Aggett was born in 1953 in the district of Nanyuki in Kenya, and moved to South Africa with his family at the age of 10. He attended a private school at Kingswood College in Grahamstown, and went on to study medicine at the University of Cape Town. Increasingly radicalized, he disapproved of the apartheid society in which he was raised, and rejected the privileges that came with being white and middle class. As a medical student, Aggett lived in a laborer's cottage without any electricity or hot water, and served his internship at black public hospitals in Umtata and Tembisa. Once he completed his studies in 1977, he worked at the Baragwanath Hospital in Soweto.

Aggett believed the ill health of those he treated was rooted in the oppressive social and economic conditions that African workers had to endure, and became increasingly involved in the growing African workers' movement of the 1970s. He initially volunteered at the Industrial Aid Society, a workers support center, and assisted with the establishment of the center's Workmen's Compensation section, which dealt with workers injured at work.

From 1978 onwards, Aggett actively assisted the African Food and Canning Workers' Union (AFCWU), which was linked to the Food Canning Workers' Union, an independent registered union. The AFCWU was unable to pay Aggett a full salary, so he continued to work part-time as a doctor. He was not only a dedicated unionist, but also an effective one, and played an important role in setting up the key AFCWU branch at the Fattis and Monis factory in Johannesburg. The 1980s witnessed the formation of growing popular resistance to apartheid, and the politicization of the trade union movement became a source of great concern for the state. The security police were used to weed out trade unionists with supposed connections to the African National Congress (ANC) underground. On November 27, 1981 a score of trade unionists, including Aggett, were arrested and detained. Seventy days later, Neil Aggett was found dead in a cell at the notorious John Vorster Square police headquarters. Authorities claimed he had committed suicide.

Aggett was the fifty-first person to die in detention since a 90-day detention without trial law was passed in 1963. His death was seen as a direct attack on interracial and African unions, and the AFCWU issued a call for a half-hour work stoppage on February 11, 1982 to mourn his death. It has been estimated that 100,000 workers responded to the call.

SEE ALSO: South Africa, African Nationalism and the ANC; South Africa, Labor Movement

References and Suggested Readings

- Baskin, J. (1991) Striking Back: A History of COSATU. Johannesburg: Ravan Press.
- Bizos, G. (1998) No One to Blame: In Pursuit of Justice in South Africa. Bellville: Mayibuye Books.
- Food and Canning Workers Union (1982) Obituary: Neil Aggett 1953–1982. South African Labour Bulletin 7 (4 & 5): 118.
- Friedman, S. (1987) Building Tomorrow Today: African Workers in Trade Unions, 1970–1984. Johannesburg: Ravan Press.

Agitprop

Joshua E. Polster

Agitprop theater consisted of short stage-pieces for leftist political agitation and propaganda. It emerged as an artistic response to the turbulent Russian sociopolitical climate of the late nineteenth century and the Russian Revolutions of 1905 and 1917. Agitprop theater also was found in the Soviet Proletkult Theaters and the Workers' Theater movements in Europe and the United States in the early twentieth century.

Agitprop theater was created out of the need for a new kind of working-class theater that portrayed proletarian issues concerning economic and social problems. It was a theater that emphasized Marxist ideology over theatrical aesthetics, and was used as a weapon to agitate minds, emotions, and revolutionary actions. Agitprop performances were crafted to indoctrinate or reinforce communist principles – as opposed to capitalist principles – by illustrating Marxist doctrine to proletarians in abstract stylized productions with revolutionary themes, episodic cabaret-like scenes, stereotyped characters (the workers and ruling class), and direct actor-audience interactions. Performances included skits, dialogues, verses, monologues, and declarative speeches on current topics, as well as songs, music, dances, miming, acrobatics, and gymnastics.

Most early agitprop performances were a blend of chanted dialogue and uniformed mass movement to demonstrate the proletarian collective action needed to overthrow the ruling class. The theater organizations consisted of both amateurs and professionals. Productions were often low budget (homemade props and clothing) and mobile, capable of being performed both indoors (factories and workers' clubs) and outdoors (street corners and farmland) to take the Marxist propaganda straight to the workers' own environments. According to the agitprop group Workers Laboratory Theater, "This [kind of theater] must be organized in such a manner that dramatic troupes may be evolved, ready one day to go to strike meetings to cheer up the strikers, just as ready another day to accompany a demonstration to inspire the workers; it must be a theater where the worker may be inspired to fight for his liberation; a theater of the class struggle – a theater of the workers, by the workers, for the workers" (Anonymous 1931b: 31–2). Notable agitprop groups were the Russian Blue Blouse Troupe, the German Red Rockets, the English Red Players, and the American Prolet-Buehne. Some agitprop productions were as brief as 30 seconds (plotless but passionate chants from proletarian choruses), while others were more developed for an entire evening of performances. The Blue Blouse Troupe, for example, had performances that lasted up to two hours and consisted of the following events: (1) Parade, (2) Oratorio, (3) International Survey, (4) Feuilleton, (5) Satirical Sketch, (6) Living Poster, (7) Dialogue-Duet, (8) Speech/Story, (9) Folk Verse, (10) Local Theme, (11) Finale-March (Drain 1995: 182–3). Agitprop troupes peaked during the belligerent Third Period era of international communism when Stalin declared, shortly before the Wall Street Crash of 1929, that capitalism would reach its final phase and communism would triumph. The agitprop performances of this time were passionate and engaging. For instance, during the US production of Art is a Weapon (1931) the audience was incited to participate in a mass recitation:

Hello comrades. We greet you comrades:
 We raise our fists to the fight.
 Workers of the nation, build our federation,
 For victory comes with might.
 The bosses' onslaught is steady
 And we are bearing the brunt.
 PROLETARIANS, Let's get ready!
 RED FRONT! RED FRONT!
 (Anonymous 1931a: 15–17)

The European and American agitprop troupes were closely influenced by the oscillating foreign policies of the Soviet government. In 1935, for example, there was a growing concern in Russia about the rising threat of fascism. As a result, a new Communist Party policy termed the Popular Front was introduced, which set aside revolutionary objectives and advocated cooperation with the liberal bourgeoisie. This drastic turn in policy changed the artistic direction of the workers' theaters as well, for there was dissatisfaction with the schematic form of agitprop plays for the new non-revolutionary audience. The Communist Party's chief cultural administrator said that all plays had to be in the style of socialist realism, so that the proletarian audience could more clearly understand the messages from the didactic plays. There was a new emphasis on the playwright – instead of non-literary agitprop – and more easily recognizable and accessible characters and plots.

After the Popular Front, agitprop theater went on to influence numerous theatrical forms and artists, such as the Political Theater of Erwin Piscator and Sergei Eisenstein, the Epic Theater of Bertolt Brecht, the Living Newspapers of the Federal Theater Project, and the Actos of Luis Valdez.

Agitprop theater declined during the realist-dominated productions of the 1930s Popular Front period, when communists sought a more general and accessible theatrical medium as they allied with capitalists and socialists against the growing threat of fascism. Though original agitprop artists viewed the stage as a didactic medium to convey Marxist ideology and incite proletarian audiences to collective revolutionary action against foes such as capitalists and, at times, socialists, the theatrical form came to be used for various kinds and degrees of leftist causes.

SEE ALSO: Boal, Augusto (b. 1931); Brecht, Bertolt (1898–1956); Eisenstein, Sergei (1898–1948); Industrial Workers of the World (IWW); Russia, Revolutions: Sources and Contexts

References and Suggested Readings

- Anonymous (1931a) Art is a Weapon. Workers Theatre (June): 15–17.
 Anonymous (1931b) Dedication. Workers Theatre (April): 3.
 Blake, B. (1935) The Awakening of the American Theater. New York: Tomorrow.

- Bodek, R. (1997) Proletarian Performance in Weimar Berlin: Agitprop, Chorus, and Brecht. Columbia, SC: Camden House.
 Drain, R. (1995) Twentieth-Century Theatre: A Sourcebook. London: Routledge.
 Goldstein, M. (1974) The Political Stage. New York: Oxford University Press.
 Himelstein, M. (1963) Drama Was a Weapon. Rahway: Rutgers University Press.
 Levine, I. (1985) Left-Wing Dramatic Theory in the American Theater. Ann Arbor: UMI Research Press.
 Samuel, R., MacColl, E., & Cosgrove, S. (1985) Theatres of the Left, 1880–1935: Workers' Theatre Movements in Britain and America. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul.

Agüeybaná I (d. 1510) and Agüeybaná II (d. 1511)

Viviana Uriona

When the conquistador Juan Ponce de León came to the island called Borinquen (today Puerto Rico), he met the Taíno tribe and its chieftains (caciques), Agüeybaná I and Agüeybaná II (Agüeybaná means “big sun”). All other caciques were subordinate to these two.

Agüeybaná I was convinced from the beginning that the conquerors were gods. Thus they were well received and Agüeybaná I and Ponce de León became friends; according to the tradition, their wives got to know each other. De León baptized the chief's mother, and the caciques accompanied de León in exploring the island. Then they visited the island of Hispaniola, where Governor Nicolás de Ovando ruled brutally over the Taínos.

Agüeybaná's hospitality and peaceful treatment of the Spaniards facilitated the Spanish conquest of the island as well as the enslavement of the Taínos. The conquerors forced them to work in the gold mines of the island and in establishing forts. Many Taínos died in the process.

Agüeybaná's brother, Agüeybaná II, doubted the divinity of the Spaniards and developed a plan to check their status. Together with Urayoán, the cacique of Añasco, he sent some of their tribal members to lure a Spaniard named Diego Salcedo into the river in order to drown him there. They examined Salcedo's corpse to ensure that he was dead. His death convinced the Taínos that the Spaniards were no gods.

Agüeybaná I, shocked by the news, organized a revolt and under his leadership the Taínos attacked many Spanish settlements. But Agüeybaná's people, who were armed only with spears, bows, and arrows, stood no chance against the better-armed Spanish forces. In 1510, Agüeybaná was shot by the army of his former "friend," de León. The revolt failed and many Taínos either committed suicide or left the island. Most Indians who stayed soon died due to cruel treatment or to a smallpox epidemic. De León was later badly injured by an arrow and died in the newly founded city of Havana in Cuba.

Many other revolts undertaken until the end of the sixteenth century failed, mainly for two reasons. First, the Spaniards were better armed. Even more importantly, they brought new diseases to the continent that were especially deadly for the Indians.

SEE ALSO: Colombia, Indigenous Mobilization; Cuauhtémoc (1502–1525)

References and Suggested Readings

Cassá, R. (1974) Los Taínos de la Española. Santo Domingo: Editora de la Universidad Autónoma de Santo Domingo.

La rebelión del cacique Agueybana II. Available at www.pcmle.org/EM/article.php3?id_article=258 (accessed May 28, 2008).

Albania, socialism

Dimitrios K. Dalakoglou and Rigels Halili

Rebellions

Socialism appeared in Albania in the 1920s. By 1921 the first strikes had already occurred in Korça and Gjirokastër. In 1922 Avni Rustemi founded the organization Bashkimi (Unity) which, despite the variety of its political influences, was mainly democratic and socialist. Some socialists participated in the anti-dictatorship rebellion against the coup of Ahmet Zog that took place in June 1924. Following their defeat most of these rebels left Albania. Some socialist activists were politically active in exile; those in France published the newspaper Populli (People), while others founded the Revolutionary National Committee in Vienna (1925) and the Albanian Communist Group in Moscow (1928). These two latter groups became involved in the Balkan section of Comintern.

Inside Albania, two of the country's largest towns, Korça and Shkodra, became centers for socialist activity. Besides their growing post-feudal economic activity these two towns hosted forms of cultural activity (e.g., schools and press) which had a role in the development of the socialist movement there. Their geographical position was also important, as Shkodra had links with Yugoslavia and Korça with Greece and the respective communist groups there. Under these circumstances the communist groups of the two cities did not entirely subscribe to the "orthodoxy" of the Comintern. For example, the Communist Group of Korça (formed in 1928) was mostly influenced by Thessaloniki archeo-Marxists and anarchists. As a result of these "deviances" the Comintern sent some of the Albanians who had been trained in Moscow back home to organize the mainstream Communist Party and to enforce the Moscow line. The most prominent among them was Ali Kelmendi, who returned to Albania in 1930 and soon thereafter found himself in an open conflict with well-known activists such as Niko Xoxi. Eventually, he managed to change the prevailing ideological tendencies from Trotskyist and anarchist to Leninist and Stalinist, however causing hostility within the movement. In the meantime (1934–5) other communist organizations were set up in Tiranë, Gjirokastër, Fier, Vlorë, and Elbasan. This period was characterized by constant fragmentation and disputes among the various groups who had adopted a diverse range of communist ideologies. Some communists, including the Korça group, participated in the anti-Zogist and pro-democracy rebellion of Fier (1935). The major communist magazine in Albania at the time was Bota e Re (New World), published in Korça. Apart from ideological and personal disputes the rhetoric of Albanian communists was confined to social protests and critique against Zog's regime. Yet they still faced censorship and persecutions: for example, in 1939 Ali Kelmendi was jailed in Gjirokastër, and almost all members of the Shkodra communist group were imprisoned, even though they were released soon thereafter.

Except for the resistance from some gendarmerie units and several officers led by Abaz Kupa in Durrës, the Italian occupation of Albania (1939) went undisturbed. A new quisling regime was soon established and the crown of Albania was offered to the Italian king Victor Emanuel III. In most cases intellectual and political elites initially collaborated with the Italian administration, with some even welcoming it, not least due to the public and construction works undertaken by the new regime. However, the war waged by Italians against Greece, and the subsequent transformation of South Albania into a battlefield, severely damaged their image. The first demonstrations against Italians, on Albanian Flag Day of November 28, 1940, were organized in Tirana and Shkodra, where a few of the arrested demonstrators declared that they were communists. These events signified the association between communism and a certain type of socialist nationalism, within which the liberation of the nation from foreign occupiers was combined with the demand for social democratization. The most audacious act of resistance was the attempt of Vasil Laçi to assassinate Victor Emanuel III when he visited the country on May 17, 1941.

In the meantime armed bands were forming in different regions of the country, the better known of which were the groups led by Abaz Kupa in Kruja and that led by Muslim Peza and operating in the Peza region. The communists were still a minor force in the spectrum of these scattered resistance forces. One of the places where communists would meet in Tirana was a tobacco shop run by a member of the Korça Group named Enver Hoxha. A former student in France and member of the French Communist Party, he had returned to Albania in 1936 and had started teaching in the French Lycée of Korça. After being fired for his political activity, Hoxha moved to Tirana in order to organize the actions of the local communist group. At this time nothing revealed the principal role he was to play in Albanian communism during the next forty years and that he would lead the country from various government positions between 1944 and 1983.

The turning point for the development of the communist movement was the Nazi invasion of the Soviet Union. The earlier contacts of the Shkodra Group with Yugoslav communists and the directives of the Comintern influenced significantly the future of socialism in Albania. By the autumn of 1941 two Yugoslav envoys, Dušan Mugosha and Miladin Popović, reached Tirana. Their presence strengthened earlier contacts between the communist groups and on November 8, 1941 the Albanian Communist Party (ACP) was founded, making it the youngest communist party in the Balkans. Later, in 1948, it was renamed the Party of Labor of Albania (PPSh).

Gradually, communists organized their groups and the resistance against the Italians. They contacted the Peza guerilla band and a conference was held there in 1942, when the founding of the National Liberation Front was declared and armed resistance grew in towns and rural areas. Repression by the Italians only fueled support for the communists. Initially, contacts were made with the nationalist organization Balli Kombëtar (National Front) and pro-Zog groups, whose resistance efforts involved more talk than action. As the war continued, and especially after the capitulation of Italy (September 1943), it became clear that this was as much a national liberation struggle as it was a battle for power in postwar Albania. Soon the situation in Albania under German occupation began to resemble civil war. Eventually, the communist-led resistance gained support among the peasantry, as well as backing from the British military mission, leading to a communist victory. But simultaneously most of Balli Kombëtar's members openly collaborated with German forces in a common effort to annihilate the communist resistance, organizing two massive operations in the winter of 1943–4 and in June 1944. This was perceived as an open act of treachery and communist propaganda made use of it to discredit their opponents. Although severely damaged by the Germans, the communists soon regrouped their forces and following the German retreat from Albania they organized a general offensive. By the end of November 1944 they had liberated the country. Albanian partisan forces, in accordance with the Yugoslav communist authorities, entered the Yugoslav territory towards Kosovo and Montenegro and continued their fight against the German army up to the town of Višegrad (Bosnia).

Socialism in Power

In the first months hundreds anti-communists who did not manage to escape from Albania were soon arrested and sentenced by the newly established people's courts, either to death or long-term imprisonment. Nationalist and pro-Zog forces, which were still active in northern parts of the country, were hunted down and eliminated during the next few years. Nationalization of land and property began immediately after the war and heavy taxation was imposed on the wealthiest landlords and urban bourgeois. On the other hand, the new regime launched a large campaign in order to reconstruct the country. Making use of revolutionary and indeed democratic rhetoric, the Communist Party's propaganda was able to mobilize large masses of people and despite the hard economic situation infrastructures were soon rebuilt. Land taken from former landlords was distributed to the peasants. Such moves secured the new regime the desired support from the largest social stratum in the country, namely peasants. Additionally, a campaign was launched to reduce high illiteracy rates in the country, estimated at 85 percent among the overall population and almost 97 percent among women.

During the war the partisan forces had been assisted by a mission of British officers, who abandoned the nationalist forces and shifted their support towards the communists as the latter were openly fighting the German army. However, with the division into two conflicting political and military blocs – West and East – conditions changed. The British and American missions were soon expelled from the country and Albanian authorities refused to obtain help from the UNRRA and Marshall Plan. Lacking the support of the USA, Great Britain, and France during the Paris Peace Conference, Albania initially faced the fate of defeated fascist countries following accusations by the Greek government, which blamed Albania for acting together with fascist Italy in the invasion of Greece (1940). Only thanks to Yugoslav and Soviet support was Albania (represented by the new communist leadership) recognized as part of the anti-fascist coalition. Regardless, the recompenses due to Albania from Italy and Germany were held by the British government following the incident on the Corfu Channel (1946) when British ships struck mines in Albanian waters.

Until 1948 Albania was politically and economically linked with communist Yugoslavia. Such cooperation dated back to the war and was also in accordance with the directives coming from the Soviet Union, which gave Yugoslavia a primary role in the Balkans. Talks were undertaken between Tito and Georgi Dimitrov in order to create a Balkan Federation of Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, Albania, and possibly Greece. In accordance with these plans economic cooperation between Albania and Yugoslavia was to be followed by the customary unification and eventual addition of Albania as the seventh republic of Federal Yugoslavia. These plans were thwarted when the result of the Greek civil war eventually came to favor nationalist-monarchist forces and as Stalin started to feel threatened by the increasingly leading role played by Tito, not only in the Balkans but in the entire communist bloc. In the break that followed between Stalin and Tito, Enver Hoxha sided with Stalin. This was a move not driven by ideological motives as much as it was an effort to strengthen his own position against adversaries within the high levels of the Albanian Communist Party, such as the powerful minister of the interior Koçi Xoxe, who was openly supported by the Yugoslav leadership. The purge that followed saw Xoxe and his followers stand trial and eventually be executed. A monument in honor of Stalin was erected in the main square of Tirana and the Russian language replaced Serbo-Croatian as one of the foreign languages in Albanian schools.

Soviet-Stalinist patterns soon started appearing in the economic, political, social, and cultural life of the country. The beginning of the 1950s was marked by the more radical collectivization of land and creation of cooperatives, analogous to the Soviet kolkhozes. An attempt at widespread industrialization of the country was launched with the initiation of five-year economic plans. An intensification of urbanization followed, highly controlled by the central state. Every type of private ownership over means of production vanished. The politics of terror intensified and the ever-present Sigurimi (Albanian Secret Service) was able directly to control most social activity. Another means of control were the diverse party-managed organizations that established hegemony over everyday life. Examples include the Pioneers (children-students), the Communist Youth, the Democratic Fronts and People's Councils (regional groups), and various professional unions. In contrast to other countries (e.g., Poland and Yugoslavia), membership in the Albanian Communist Party was treated in an elitist manner and one had to pass through a long period of "examination" before joining the communist ranks.

In 1956 another severe purge took place within the PPSH and Soviet-Albanian relations started to weaken. A final breakup followed after Hoxha's critique against Khrushchev for revisionism and opportunism during the Moscow conference of 81 communist parties (November 1960). Soon the two countries ended all relations – economic, military, and diplomatic. Western hopes that Albania (like Yugoslavia) would approach western countries were in vain. As soon as the break with the Soviet Union took place it became evident that Albania had secured another strong foreign ally: the People's Republic of China.

The 1960s saw the increasing influence of Maoist rule in Albania. A type of Cultural Revolution started to take shape with the most evident result being the banning of every religious activity (1967); Albania was declared the first atheist country in the world. Industrialization continued in many ways, although economically the period influenced by China's example failed to address the needs of the population and proved anti-productive in the long term. However, this partly could be attributed to internal problems such as the distance of Tirana officials from everyday reality, increasing bureaucracy, and radical measures such as the collectivization of even the smallest domestic production.

The Albanian government firmly opposed the aggression of the Red Army against Czechoslovakia in 1968 and abandoned the Warsaw Treaty as a result. This event heralded the beginning of the so-called bunkerization of the country. Creating an atmosphere of fear of foreign aggression (be it from Yugoslavia, Greece, or the Soviet Union), the regime constructed some 100,000 bunkers, nowadays one of the most recognizable features in the Albanian landscape. This emphasis on defense severely damaged the financial resources of the country and gradually led to the notorious isolationism of Albania. Two large purges followed in 1972 and 1974, one against the liberalization of cultural life and the other against high-ranking army officers, which saw two former ministers executed for high treason. However, by the mid-1970s, following the death of Mao and the changes undertaken by Zhou Enlai in China, Hoxha began to diverge from the new Chinese leadership. Again, fearing opposition within the party, he undertook another significant break with his foreign allies in 1978.

Commencing a policy of economic autarchy, Albanian high-ranking officials embarked on a disastrous policy blind to the everyday lives of the general population. Throughout the 1980s Albania faced constant economic crisis, reflected in the lack of even basic goods. After a few years of international isolationism Albania improved relations with neighboring countries. Nonetheless, this era of reconciliation with Yugoslavia, which started in the mid-1970s, abruptly ended following the demonstrations of spring 1981 in Kosovo. The connection of these events with the last purge in the high ranks of the PPSH remains a matter of dispute. In December 1981 Mehmet Shehu, then prime minister, committed suicide (or, according to other sources, was murdered) and his wife and the ministers of his circle, including those of Interior and Defense, were arrested and executed. A period of rapprochement with Greece followed: in 1987 the first border checkpoint was opened.

Enver Hoxha died in April 1985. His successor, Ramiz Alia, initially promised to continue the policies of his predecessor, but the events in Poland and eventually all of Eastern Europe also changed the situation in Albania. The beginning of the 1990s was marked by a liberalization of political and economic life. The key point in the political and social life of Albania was summer 1990, when some five thousand people clashed with the police and entered the foreign embassies in Tirana demanding provision of passports and the right to migrate abroad – since migration was fundamentally forbidden. In 1990 people were eventually allowed to leave the country and the first passport in fifty years was issued. The privatization of property and political pluralism soon followed. Despite these major adjustments, during the first multi-party elections (1991) it was the successor of the PPSH, the Socialist Party (PS), that won and Ramiz Alia was nominated the first president of post-communist Albania. Not long afterwards the profound effects of the huge economic crisis, associated with a massive migration to Greece and Italy, forced the socialist government to resign. Another government was formed and the elections that took place on March 30, 1992 saw the victory of the biggest opposition party, the anti-communist Democratic Party (PD). Its leader, Sali Berisha, was soon chosen to be the president of the Republic, officially signaling the end of communism in Albania.

Post-Socialism

The post-communist transition period has been marked by continuous social discord which reflects the lack of parliamentary democratic ethics and the influence of communist-period government models. Indeed, every political organization in Albania could trace its origin to the ranks of the PPSH; for instance, prime minister Sali Berisha – a self-proclaimed anti-communist – was a member of the PPSH for 17 years. The reforms undertaken by the PD government aimed at eliminating its political adversaries rather than meeting the needs of the country. Most civil servants, including army officers, policemen, and jurists, were sacked and replaced with badly instructed or entirely untrained supporters of the PD. The immediate result was a weakening of the public sector and state control, followed by savage privatization, explosive urbanization, corruption, environmental crisis, a rise in criminal activity, and economic stagnation. Despite this turmoil, these effects did not impact too heavily on many Albanians, who were increasingly reliant upon income from migrant remittances.

However, when Berisha started openly displaying autocratic ambitions and especially after the fall of the notorious pyramid pseudo-banks (1997), which saw the loss of almost $2 billion of citizens' savings, social protests erupted throughout the country. The situation was heavily mismanaged by the government and wisely manipulated by the opposition PS and former PPSH. An armed revolt broke out in the town of Vlora, an action that eventually spread to most of the country. People looted weapons from barracks and police departments, while most of the armed forces joined the rebellion. Soon, most of the official state structures ceased to exist in the country. In many areas the population formed committees similar to those of the communist period, frequently including former PPSH officials who had been members of the party-managed local committees in the past, or army officers who had been sacked by the PD. These committees undertook political functions and formed security against the PD-controlled forces. Eventually, following international intervention and a decision by all parliamentary parties, the rebellion ended; elections were organized and the turmoil ceased while central Albanian authorities gradually regained control of the country – even if the looted weapons remain uncollected to date.

Despite the formal presence of some socialist organizations, there has been little socialist or syndicalist activity in Albania since 1997. This is partly due to rhetoric emphasizing the negative and authoritative elements of communism. This reflects a broader situation in which widespread corruption among political elites (PD-Right or PS-Left) has brought about a loss of faith in politics, especially since both the two largest parties have strikingly similar neoliberal economic programs. Another cause of the stagnation in Albanian political life is migration, as almost one third of the Albanian population resides abroad and is therefore not involved in the political life of the home country, even if sometimes they continue to vote. Conversely, there are Albanian migrants in Italy and Greece who are becoming increasingly involved in both left-wing and anarchist groups in these countries, as these political groups were the first to demand the democratization of discriminative migratory policies.

SEE ALSO: Albanian Nationalism; Greece, Partisan Resistance; Greece, Socialism, Communism, and the Left, 1850–1974; Greece, Socialism, Communism, and the Left, 1974–2008; Yugoslavia, Anti-Fascist “People’s Liberation War” and Revolution, 1941–1945; Yugoslavia, Resistance to Cominform, 1948

References and Suggested Readings

- Anonymous (1982) History of the Party of Labour of Albania. Tirana: Institute of Marxist-Leninist Studies at the Central Committee of the Party of Labour of Albania 8 Nëntori.
- Fischer J. B. (1999) Albania at War, 1939–1945. West Lafayette: Purdue University Press.
- Halliday, J. (Ed.) (1986) The Artful Albanian: Memoirs of Enver Hoxha. London: Chatto & Windus.
- Marmullaku, R. (1975) Albanian and Albanians. London: Hurst.
- Pearson, O. (2006) Albania in the Twentieth Century. 3 Vols. London: I. B. Tauris.
- Pipa, A. (1990) Albanian Stalinism: Ideo-Political Aspects. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Pollo, S. & Puto, A. (1981) History of Albania. London: Routledge.
- Schwandner-Sievers, S. & Fischer, J. B. (Eds.) (2002) Albanian Identities. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Vickers, M. (2001) The Albanians: A Modern History. London: I. B. Tauris.
- Vickers, M. & Pettifer, J. (2007) The Albanian Question. London: I. B. Tauris.

Albanian nationalism

Dimitrios K. Dalakoglou and Rigels Halili

Proto-Nationalism (1837–1878)

Arbëresh intellectuals introduced the ideas of European Romanticism and Enlightenment into the Albanian-speaking world, including nationalism during the nineteenth century. The Arbëresh were an Albanian-speaking diaspora that moved from the Balkans to southern Italy and Sicily during the fifteenth century, following the occupation of the Balkan territories by the Ottoman army. During the nineteenth century their circles shaped a linguistic-cultural movement based upon their Albanian mother tongue. This was the beginning of the so-called Albanian Rilindje Kombëtare. This term is generally translated as National Awakening; however, Rilindje literally means rebirth, a common term used by Balkan nationalist movements. At this stage the early Albanian nationalist circles of Italy had little or no impact on the Balkans.

The Albanians of the Balkans adopted mainstream modern nationalism after the mid-nineteenth century, partly inspired from the Greek war of independence (1821) and by the earlier separatist aspirations of local Albanian despots. The main reason for this relative delay was the Islamic affiliation of the majority of the Empire's Albanians, among which a large number belonged to the most politically dominant Ottoman classes. The population of the Ottoman Empire was divided administratively and politically according to the millet system, where people were categorized according to their religious affiliation. Moreover, the millet system divided the Albanian-speaking populations of the Empire into three different millets/groups: Muslim, Rum (Christian Orthodox), and Latin (Christian Catholics). Hence it took a significant time to overcome these religious divisions and articulate their common language into standard national identification. Even in contemporary Albania this religious diversity continues to generate internal disagreements. Furthermore, another important division was the linguistic one between Tosk (South) and Geg (North) Albanian dialect speakers. Albanian-speaking inhabitants of the Empire were divided administratively into four distinct prefectures (vilajet), but most significantly of all they were divided into even smaller groups according to their tribal and clan affiliations.

The parallel development of a cultural nationalism among Albanians of all three different religious categories had a decisive role. That activity was initially concentrated in the South of the country, especially among members of the Bektashi Sufi order who were based within the Bektashi centers (teke) (e.g., the teke of Frasheri). During the same period, Naim Veqilharxhi, a Christian Orthodox, originally from South Albania, devised an Albanian alphabet in 1845. His attempt was severely condemned by the Greek Orthodox hierarchy that administered the Orthodox Christians of Albania. In the case of the North Albanian Christian Catholics, nationalist ideas spread out among the local intelligentsia following their contact with Austria-Hungary and Italy, but also through the activity of Franciscans and Jesuit orders who controlled the schools where the first generation of the so-called Catholic Cultural Circle of Shkodra received their education.

However, until 1885 there were no schools operating in the Albanian language, whereas in the areas where Albanians were living schools would use the Greek, Turkish, Romanian, or Slavic language.

Nationalist Rebellions and the Foundation of Albania (1878–1913)

The sociopolitical relevance of these cultural activities was limited due to the general illiteracy of the population and the divisions among them. It was during the Eastern Crisis that Albanian nationalism made its first appearance as a political and military movement. Following the defeat of the Ottomans in the Russo-Turkish War, the Congress of Berlin and the Treaty of San Stefano (1878) decided that the Albanian-inhabited lands of the Ottoman Empire were to be accorded to Serbia, Montenegro, and partly to Greece.

Albanian religious and clan leaders, along with Ottoman politicians of Albanian origin (mainly from the Northern regions) who faced potential territorial losses and feared for their authority, gathered in the city of Prizren in Kosovo on June 10, 1878. There they formed the Albanian League of Prizren, which was initially supported by the Ottoman authorities, and acquired the power to impose taxes and raise an army. Ottomans perceived it as a means to help defend the imperial territories. Yet later the influence of Abdyl Frashëri, a politician and former member of the first Ottoman parliament, radicalized the league towards a pro-Albanian identification. Although the league remained a network of local armed groups and political gatherings rather than an institution with a central organization, it achieved its main aim to prevent territorial losses. Simultaneously, it dealt a blow to the Albanian nationalist movement by raising the demand for creation of a semi-autonomous Ottoman administrative unit that would unite the Albanian-inhabited territories of the Balkans to be ruled by mainly Albanian officials. That demand was refused by both the Great Powers and the Ottoman Empire.

As the Ottomans lacked the necessary military power in the Balkans they benefited from the arming of Albanian chiefs. When the official Ottoman army left what were once Ottoman territories (and before they were awarded to Montenegro) local Albanian armed groups under the auspices of Istanbul took over. However, it was not very clear if they acted as Albanians or as Ottomans. The league's resistance forced the Great Powers to change the Congress of Berlin's decision to return the disputed territories of Gusinje and Plav to the Ottoman Empire. However, Albanian armed groups refused to give the coastal city of Ulcinj to Montenegro, causing the central Ottoman government to send an army to control the Albanians. Eventually, the Ottoman army, with the support of loyal Albanian leaders, occupied Prizren and Ulcinj and the league was suppressed in 1881.

Despite political and military mobilization, nationalism had not been as popular among the rest of Albanian society as it was among its elites. During that period Albanian intellectuals in Istanbul led by Sami Frashëri turned their attention towards cultural activity. They were conscious of the lack of education in the Albanian language and of the large-scale illiteracy of Albanian-speaking villagers. In 1879 the Society for the Printing of Albanian Writing was founded in the Ottoman capital. Nationalist literature was produced and circulated, but a standardized literary norm did not exist. Nor was there agreement over which alphabet (Latin, Cyrillic, Arabic, or Greek) was to be used, implying conflicting national orientations. Nevertheless, a large number of publications began to flow into Albanian-inhabited lands, spreading nationalist ideas. However, after the suppression of the League of Prizren, Ottoman authorities turned against Albanian nationalism and began to prosecute its advocates. A second attempt to form anew the League of Prizren and a related Albanian rebellion in Kosovo was suppressed in 1897 and its leader was assassinated, while Albanian publications were banned.

At the beginning of the twentieth century within the Ottoman state the Young Turks movement was emerging, demanding radical reforms. Albanian politicians joined the movement, expecting recognition of their national aspirations. In 1908 in Bitola the Latin alphabet was established as the standard one for Albanian, as the ban upon Albanian publications had been lifted within the new regime. However, not long after this the Young Turks regime organized a policy of Ottomanization of Albanians. This focused on those of the Islamic faith, promoting Arabic as the standard alphabet and repressing nationalists, while arguing that an Albanian nation did not exist and acting accordingly. This repression led to an armed rebellion in Kosovo and North Albania in 1910, also repressed.

Yet in 1911 a rebellion started in the mountains of North Albania. A plethora of North Albanian highlanders remained relatively isolated throughout the centuries of Ottoman rule. This deviance of the highlanders proved decisive, as their otherness was articulated into a distinguishable local identity. Their rebellion was supported by Montenegro, which perceived it as an opportunity to seize some of the disputed Ottoman territories. The most important battle was that of Deçiq on April 6, 1911, where the Turks were defeated.

The Balkan Wars (1912–13) radically changed the situation. Territories inhabited both partially and entirely by Albanians were occupied by Serbian, Montenegrin, and Greek armies in an attempt to realize their own nation-state's programs. Under such conditions Albanian representatives gathered in Vlorë city and proclaimed the independence of Albania on November 12, 1912, but this proclamation did not change the actual situation, since most of the territories of the newly emerging state were under occupation and its borders loosely defined. Additionally, the majority of Albanian villagers were not eager to become involved in armed conflict and the Vlorë government did not have the means to force them into a war as the governments of the neighboring states had done with their own populations.

The question of the recognition of Albania and the establishing of its territorial shape were the subjects of the Conference of London (1913). Eventually, Albania was recognized as a nation-state. Almost half the territories considered to be Albanian were left out of this newly founded nation-state, including Kosovo, laying the ground for turbulence in the future. Most of the foreign armies in 1913 were reluctant to surrender the occupied cities which were awarded to the new state, while neighboring states had territorial aspirations within the lands of the new state and collaborated with the various ethnic and religious minorities while plotting rebellions. The Greek Christian minority of South Albania, for example, revolted and proclaimed its own independent state in South Albania, while Montenegro mobilized the Catholic Albanian groups of the North against the central Albanian authorities. Alongside this, internal fights for the power of the new state took place, such as that between the Vlorë assembly and Essad Pasha Toptani. While some of the local Muslim chiefs expressed loyalty to Turkish authorities, other tribal leaders and feudal landlords found no reason to recognize a new authority above them.

World War I aggravated the situation as foreign armies occupied anew Albanian territories while a secret London Treaty of April 1915 promised most of the new state's territories to neighboring countries for their participation in the war on the side of the Triple Entente. However, from the end of the war until today, Albania kept most of the territories given to it by the London Conference of 1913. After the war the Italian army refused to withdraw from Albania and fundamentally Italians were expelled from Albania only in 1920, when the government of the new state had the power to mobilize locals, who revolted, semi-armed, against the Italians in Vlorë. The Italian government was not able to send additional troops to Albania as Italian labor unions threatened general strikes if they tried to do so. In 1920 Albania was admitted into the League of Nations.

The population of these territories was a problematic issue, as the new state excluded large Albanian populations in Kosovo, Macedonia, and Greece and included a Greek minority within Albania. The issue of the Albanian Muslims of Greece (Chams) was resolved dramatically after World War II when the Greek state and the nationalist armed bands of Napoleon Zervas expelled Muslim Albanians to Albania. Although that deportation was explained as a reaction to the collaboration of some Albanian nationalist elites with Nazi occupiers, this was no more than an excuse, as many right-wing Greek elites also collaborated with the Nazis.

Albanian Nation-State and Kosovo (1913–2008)

The emergence of the new Albanian nation-state marked the beginning of a new phase in the development of Albanian nationalism. Within the country, after World War II, it evolved into a regular state-run socialist version of nationalism; meanwhile, outside Albania, and especially in Kosovo, a feeling of irredentism was developing.

The Albanian socialist regime (1944–91), which combined socialist and nationalist doctrines, was the most successful Albanian regime in imposing a unique type of homogeneous national identity upon its population and overcoming the various regional, religious, and tribal divisions via an extensive plan of economic and social modernization. The new regime enforced a highly ideological version of history and an extensive program of centrally run education where it imposed a new standardized version of the Albanian language. It also controlled population mobility, attributed party and state affiliations to people, set up forced labor programs, compulsory education, and military training for every citizen, and along with a subsequent ban of religion it overcame previous identifications to merge them into a new one, so-called Albanianism. This Albanianism was understood through the prism of Leninism, Stalinism, and (for a while) Maoism, until the period of Albanian isolationism (1970s), which remained as the leading ideology behind the international relationships of the country until the late 1980s. Although after 1990 this isolationism ended, these nationalist homogenization techniques have not changed much, except for their removal of socialist nuances and the introduction of religious affiliations. The basic doctrines remain the same and include an idea of Albanian commonality emphasizing language and underestimating religious diversity, a scheme of long historical continuity of the “Albanian nation” in the area and an emphasis upon the anti-Ottoman struggle of the fifteenth century and the consequent emergence of Skanderbeg as a national hero. In the post-socialist period it became evident that the socialist regime had applied a peaceful nationalism within Albania, and rather protective policies for minorities, when compared to the aggressive nationalism displayed by some of its democratic successors. This is especially true in the case of the Greek minority, which is often confronted with repression in response to the parallel aggression and violence of the Greek state against Albanian migrants.

Between 1945 and 1990, in spite of relative tranquillity in the region, fundamentally nationalisms continued to operate, including Albanian nationalism among the Albanian majority of Kosovo. This was a semi-independent region within Serbia, which was in turn part of federal Yugoslavia; larger autonomy was gradually awarded to Kosovo and in 1974 even more powers were ascribed providing it with a near-status of a federal republic, yet remaining part of the republic of Serbia. At that time schools and universities teaching in the Albanian language were encouraged. An Albanian majority controlled most of the governmental and party positions in Kosovo and some local politicians did not hide their nationalist orientations. In 1981 students of the Albanian-speaking University of Pristine protested over practical university issues. Those protests ended in riots in the largest cities of the province; people demanded governmental reforms and the status of a full federal republic for Kosovo. Yugoslavian authorities sent in the police and violently repressed the riots, killing and jailing protesters. More student protests broke out during the 1980s, expressing general disobedience against authorities often articulated as nationalist, autonomist, or anti-state demands. Again, the federal authorities took punitive action against both Albanian and Serbian nationalists in Kosovo, and from the mid-1980s an anti-Albanian tendency emerged among some Belgrade politicians.

During the 1990s Yugoslavia dissolved and Kosovo became a province of Serbia. The Serbian authorities under Slobodan Milošević violently repressed and reduced Kosovan political autonomy. A regime of anti-Albanian policies was established by the Milošević semi-dictatorial government, effectively radicalizing Albanian nationalism. Albanians were driven out of their jobs; Serbian policemen replaced Albanian ones; the Albanian press and language were censored and repressed. Anti-Belgrade struggles initially began as civilian disobedience, protests, and an internal political antagonism between the Albanians and Serbians of Kosovo. In 1990 an illegal Kosovo parliament proclaimed the independence of Kosovo from Serbia. Two distinct nationalist lines emerged: both aimed at Kosovo independence, yet the one led by author Ibrahim Rugova argued for peaceful disobedience against Belgrade rule, while the other called in arms.

In 1993 Albanian nationalists organized a guerrilla organization, the Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA/AL: UÇK), which in the late 1990s received notable assistance from Albanians of the diaspora and probably from the US government. At the same time a large number of young Albanians joined the KLA. In response to this empowerment of the KLA, in 1998 Serbian forces conducted atrocities not only against the KLA but also against civilians, escalating their activities during 1998 and 1999, causing a major refugee crisis as Albanian civilians fled Kosovo to neighboring countries. KLA counteroffensives begun in the summer 1998; this caused a further increase in violence against civilians by Serbian forces, and atrocities against unarmed citizens were committed by the KLA as well. Diplomatic negotiations were taking place simultaneously with battles and a refugee crisis. The UNHCR later estimated that more than 800,000 Albanians had left their homes, in what seemed as an effort by the Serbian nationalist government to expel Albanians from Kosovo.

In 1999 NATO used the pretext of the dramatic refugee crisis to intervene in support of the KLA, while aiming to get rid of the non-collaborative Milošević government and to solidify US influence in the region. There is no agreement on the number of refugees, nor the number of deaths caused by the war; however, combining the various sources, and taking into account related political interests, one could estimate that more than 12,000 people were killed by Serbian forces, the KLA, and the 78-day NATO air-strikes during the Albanian uprising in Kosovo. The majority were civilians. NATO bombardments also caused extensive infrastructure damage in Kosovo and Serbia, which resulted in large profits for the firms involved in later reconstruction. NATO eventually forced the Serbian government to abandon Kosovo in 1999.

UN Security Council Resolution 1244 (1999) established a new administration in the province following the peace agreement. However, this chaotic and disturbed period saw not only the withdrawal of Serbian forces from Kosovo and the return of Albanian refugees to almost entirely destroyed villages and towns, but also a large parallel exodus of the Serbian population. The estimated number of these refugees varies from 100,000 (NATO) to 250,000 (Serbian authorities). During UN rule in Kosovo there were numerous cases of mistreatment and harassment of Serbs living within several enclaves by the Albanian population. Such ethnic tensions reached their peak in March 2004 during riots which saw parts of the Serbian cultural heritage in Kosovo destroyed and some 5,000 Serbs displaced. A negotiation process started in 2006 between Albanian representatives and Serbian authorities, but there was a lack of general agreement over the independence of the province. As a result, and cherishing the support of the US and main Western European countries, Kosovo's parliament declared the Republic of Kosovo independent on February 17, 2008. This event signified a milder period for Albanian nationalism in the Balkans.

SEE ALSO: Albania, Socialism; Greece, Socialism, Communism, and the Left, 1850–1974; Greek Nationalism; Young Turks

References and Suggested Readings

- Jelavich, C. (1977) The Establishment of the Balkan National States: 1804–1920. Seattle: University of Washington Press.
- Malcolm N. (1998) Kosovo: A Short History. New York: New York University Press.
- Marmulaku, R. (1975) Albania and the Albanians. London: Hurst.
- Pettifer, J. & Vickers, M. (2007) The Albanian Question. London: Tauris.
- Pipa, A. & Repishti, S. (1984) Studies on Kosova. New York: Columbia University Press East European Monographs.
- Pollo, S. & Puto, A. (1981) History of Albania London: Routledge.
- Puto, A. (1982) The Albanian Independence and the Diplomacy of Great Powers: 1912–1914. Tirana: 8 Nëntori (in French and in Albanian).
- Schwandner-Sievers, S. & Fischer, J. (Eds.) (2002) Albanian Identities. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

Skendi, S. (1967) The Albanian National Awakening 1878–1912. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Albizu Campos, Pedro (1891–1965)

Michael Staudenmaier

Pedro Albizu Campos was the most important figure in the Puerto Rican independence movement during the twentieth century. As leader of the Puerto Rican Nationalist Party for more than four decades, he was responsible for a dramatic overhaul in the character of the movement, challenging its respectability and politeness and encouraging the restoration of militant and even armed struggle to a prominent place in its arsenal. He was a gifted theoretician, a skillful organizer, and a renowned orator. In his most famous effort, Albizu Campos coordinated the abortive 1950 insurrection known as the Grito de Jayuya (Cry of Jayuya).

Albizu Campos was born into a poor, African-descended (mulatto) family, but his early showing of intellectual promise resulted in a scholarship to attend school in the United States. Between 1913 and 1920 he spent several years at Harvard University, although his time there was broken up by service in an African American battalion of the US army during World War I. While at Harvard he worked closely with Irish republicans, including Eamon de Valera. The multi-faceted struggle for Irish independence, involving armed struggle and legal negotiations, provided inspiration to Albizu Campos in his later efforts in Puerto Rico. Having obtained his law degree from Harvard, he returned to the island, where he initially pursued independence through proposals for a constitutional convention that was to be sanctioned by the United States. Embarrassed by the willingness of other independence activists to capitulate to US demands, Albizu Campos shifted his approach to the struggle. He joined the recently founded Nationalist Party, acting as an international representative for the party throughout Latin America, later becoming its president.

Once in charge of the Nationalist Party Albizu Campos put his militant strategy into practice. He rejected the legitimacy of US rule, while romanticizing the previous era of Spanish domination. He lauded a Puerto Rican identity built on Spanish heritage and Catholicism. At the same time, he organized across racial and class barriers that had limited the effectiveness of previous independence efforts. He provided support to striking sugar cane workers, while heightening the conflict with the North American-led police force. He also systematically promoted women into leadership roles within the Nationalist Party. By 1935 the party had explicitly affirmed the legitimacy of armed struggle, while pledging to boycott an electoral framework it viewed as inherently colonial.

The next several years saw an escalation of violence between party members and US forces, resulting in Albizu Campos' first prison term in the United States. After serving ten years he returned to the island and immediately began plotting a major uprising for independence. Due to increasing police surveillance and repression the insurrection was rushed into action at the end of October 1950 and was quickly put down. Albizu Campos was again imprisoned and he spent all but a few months of the rest of his life behind bars. While incarcerated he claimed that he was being subjected to radiation experiments, an assertion that was ridiculed by US authorities. He did indeed die of cancer a few months after having been released from prison for humanitarian reasons. Decades later, the US government acknowledged that federal prisoners had been subjected to involuntary radiation experiments during the period of Albizu Campos' incarceration, but his participation in such experiments has never been confirmed.

In death, Albizu Campos has become a reference point for much of the Puerto Rican independence movement, although his methods remain controversial to this day outside radical circles. His legacy includes both the broad affirmation of Puerto Rican identity and the validation of the legitimacy of armed struggle as an option for the independence movement.

SEE ALSO: De Valera, Eamon (1882–1975); Imperialism, Historical Evolution; Irish Nationalism; Puerto Rican Independence Movement, 1898–Present

References and Suggested Readings

- Ayala, C. J. & Bernabe, R. (2007) Puerto Rico in the American Century: A History Since 1898. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Fernandez, R. (1992) The Disenchanted Island: Puerto Rico and the United States in the Twentieth Century. New York: Praeger.

Rosado, M. (1992) Las llamas de la aurora: acercamiento a una biografía de Pedro Albizu Campos. Santo Domingo: Corripio.

Wagenheim, K. & Jimenez de Wagenheim, O. (1994) The Puerto Ricans: A Documentary History. Princeton: Markus Wiener.

Alcatraz Uprising and the American Indian Movement

Stacy Warner Maddern

From November 20, 1969 to June 11, 1971 a small mix of college activists and urbanites, disenchanted with the US government's economic, social, and political neglect of American Indians, occupied and held Alcatraz Island in San Francisco, California. This event led the American Indian Movement (AIM) to prominence as a revolutionary force for Native American rights. Alcatraz was an ideal place for protesting US disregard for treaties and tribal sovereignty due to the long history of wrongful imprisonment of American Indians there.

After the Civil War, when thousands of emigrants began flooding the West into lands designated for American Indians, conflicts arose and the Indian Wars of the late 1800s began. In order to quell these disputes the US government convicted several American Indians of mutiny and other fabricated crimes, sending them to Alcatraz with some of the worst criminals in the West. In January 1895 the largest group of American Indians, 19 members of the Hopi tribe, was sent to Alcatraz from northern Arizona. Already involved in land disputes with the US government, they had refused to comply with mandatory education programs for their children.

The occupation of Alcatraz was an effort to expose the mistreatment of American Indians during the height of the civil rights era. On November 9, 1969 Richard Oakes, a Mohawk activist, organized a group of American Indian supporters, mostly students he recruited from UCLA, to claim the island as property for "Indians of all Tribes." Oakes, who earlier had played an integral part in developing the American Indian Studies curriculum at San Francisco State University (the first of its kind in the US), believed that American Indians deserved justice and respect and had a right to the land.

On November 20 the protesters landed on the abandoned island and set up housing, a school, and a health clinic in old federal buildings. Soon after, KPFA 94.1 FM, a local listener-supported “free speech radio” station in Berkeley, began broadcasting a feed from the island. The broadcasts could be heard in the San Francisco Bay area and within a year drew mainstream media attention.

The choice of Alcatraz was both strategic and symbolic. Being situated on the site of America’s most infamous prison guaranteed national attention. Alcatraz also served as a symbol of the reservations Indians had been sent to for generations. Like the reservations, Alcatraz was isolated from modern facilities, without adequate means of transportation, and the island had no fresh running water or adequate sanitation facilities, no economic or industrial base, and was designed for a prison population dependent on others.

The occupation of Alcatraz revealed to AIM the power of seizing federal facilities as a means of demonstrating their grievances. In 1970 members seized the Mayflower II in Plymouth, Massachusetts and in 1971 occupied the Bureau of Indian Affairs’ offices in Washington. Former Alcatraz “warriors” participated in the Trail of Broken Treaties in 1972 and the infamous “standoff” with FBI officers at Wounded Knee on the Pine Ridge Reservation in 1973.

By the end of the 1970s AIM had garnered the tag of the Red Power movement. Serving as a means of protest over injustices to American Indians, Red Power demanded redress across the country and continued to capture attention in the print and broadcast media throughout the decade, but no single event was more significant than the occupation of Alcatraz in serving to seize the nation’s attention.

SEE ALSO: Native American Protest, 20th Century; Peltier, Leonard (b. 1944)

References and Suggested Readings

- Johnson, T. (1996) The Occupation of Alcatraz Island: Self-Determination and the Rise of Indian Activism. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.
- Johnson, T., Nagel, J., & Champagne, D. (Eds.) (1997) American Indian Activism: Alcatraz to the Longest Walk. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.
- Smith, P. C. & Warrior, R. A. (1996) Like a Hurricane: The Indian Movement from Alcatraz to Wounded Knee. New York: New Press.

Algerian Islamic Salvation Front

Immanuel Ness

The Islamic Salvation Front (FIS) is a national political organization that waged a ten-year civil war from 1992 to 2002 against the secular Algerian government, after it was prevented from taking political power through democratic means.

Algeria, the largest country in North Africa, situated on Africa’s northern coast, known as the Maghreb, gained independence from France in 1962 after a 12-year revolutionary liberation struggle. After victory the National Liberation Front (FNL) consolidated power against all other insurgent groups and ruled the country with the support of the military through the 1990s. The economic backdrop to the formation of the FIS and the Algerian Civil War is the imposition of liberal economic reforms that undermined the economy and the emergence of democratic reforms that permitted religious party competition to secular central states. The political shape of liberal democracy in Algeria emerges from the independence era foundation and dominance of the National Liberation Front in national politics and the creation of a secular one-party state. The reforms imposed on Algeria, along with the decline in global oil prices, pushed more working and poor Algerians into poverty. In the late 1980s support for an Islamic fundamentalist party heightened among disillusioned poor and working-class citizens. The FIS emerged as the leading force to challenge the FNL, similar to other countries in North Africa and the Middle East. As prospects for a religious fundamentalist government became stronger in the early 1990s, secular forces and the military annulled religious party participation in elections, leading the way to a decade-long civil war that took the lives of 150,000.

Rise of Islamic Fundamentalism in Algerian Politics

Popular support for the FIS, a fundamental Islamist political party, advanced rapidly in the late 1980s and early 1990s. In December 1991 FIS won the first round of a national election. The civil war began when the military annulled the election and outlawed religious fundamentalists from participating in the government. The FIS formed a guerilla army that conducted a protracted civil war against the secular government until its military defeat in 2002. In the early 1990s the Islamist guerilla forces targeted police and government installations. But in 1994, following the failure of peace talks, the war intensified as the fighting was increasingly directed against secular and fundamentalist Algerian civilians. Increasingly, the military protagonists massacred the residents of entire communities and villages where oppositional sentiment was suspected.

In all, the civil war took the lives of an estimated 150,000 people, the vast majority civilians. As the civil war raged, the Islamist forces fragmented into several factional guerilla wings: the Armed Islamic Movement (MIA), consolidating into the FIS-dominated Islamic Salvation Army (AIS). The leading fundamentalist military opponent to the AIS was the Armed Islamic Group (GIA), itself divided on the question of taking the lives of civilians. In the late 1990s, as the FIS and the AIS were losing militarily to the Algerian military, they intensified the war against civilians. Both the government and the guerillas were implicated as civilians living in the FIS strongholds of Rais and Bentalha in southern Algiers were brutally massacred by guerilla forces. The FIS leadership suggested that the military did not intervene to stop the gruesome mass execution, which drew international condemnation and national popular outrage.

The election of Abdelaziz Bouteflika as president of Algeria in 1999 on the platform of ending the civil war was a major turning point in the conflict. Bouteflika won a subsequent referendum by a landslide majority of the general electorate. Though he had the support of the military, Bouteflika was recognized as a leading figure in the Algerian independence movement and the FNL and was considered to have greater independence from the army than his predecessors. In the next three years Bouteflika urged the guerillas to surrender and established the foundation for peace – a general amnesty for all members of the FIS and AIS guerillas who were charged with committing war crimes. He won over popular sentiment that the war was driving down an economy already shattered by reforms demanded by multilateral economic agencies, lower oil prices, and opening up to foreign competition. To secure greater peace and stability, Bouteflika established the Charter for Peace and National Reconciliation where aggrieved parties would have the opportunity to convey publicly the brutal atrocities committed by guerillas and soldiers.

The underlying causes of the rise of militant religious fundamentalism in Algeria can be traced directly to the draconian economic reforms imposed on the nation by international economic agencies that created more poverty and hopelessness among the working class and poor. The FIS galvanized widespread opposition to build a party promising to take an autonomous route rather than follow the dictates of global agencies. Ultimately, the failure of the military-backed FNL government to alleviate growing unemployment and the decline in public services drove more Algerians to the FIS.

SEE ALSO: Algerian National Revolution, 1954–1962

References and Suggested Readings

- Entelis, J. P. (2000) The Algerian Civil War. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Fanon, F. (1963) The Wretched of the Earth. New York: Grove Press.
- Malley, R. (1996) Call from Algeria: Third Worldism, Revolution, and the Call to Islam. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Quandt, W. B. (1998) Between Ballots and Bullets: Algeria's Transition from Authoritarianism. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution Press.
- Stora, B. (2004) Algeria, 1830–2000: A Short History. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Willis, M. (1996) The Islamist Challenge in Algeria: A Political History. New York: New York University Press.

Algerian National Revolution, 1954–1962

Bernard Schmid

Starting in November 1954, Algeria's independence war, mainly known as the Liberation War (French: guerre de liberation or Arabic: harb at-tahrir), ended in July 1962. It ended after having killed almost 1 million people, most of them Algerian, and the massive utilization of torture by the French army and authorities. The huge number of Algerian victims has to be compared to the figures on the French side where, according to official sources of the French government, some 27,000 soldiers and around 3,000 civilians

Barricades Week during the Battle of Algiers in 1958 in which French military forces sought to defeat the National Liberation Front (FLN). In the liberation war, the FLN struggled to liberate Algeria from French colonialism and establish an independent state. The intensity of French hostility to Algerian independence is depicted here as French citizens display a banner proclaiming “Vive Massu” in support of French Brigadier General Jacques Massu. (© E.C.P.A.D./ France) died (or disappeared). The relation between Algerian and French (European) victims is about 1 to 30 – and a large majority of the Algerian people wounded or killed in this “dirty war” (sale guerre, according to the name its French opponents gave to it) did not wear a uniform.

The result of this war was national independence in combination with an army-based regime whose main aim was national economic development. Since it resulted in independence from French colonial rule, it is also known as the Algerian Revolution. In fact, mass participation in the struggle for independence and the wish for deep social change after the end of colonialism played a very important role on the way to Algeria’s liberation from colonialism – and in that sense, it is correct to name it a revolution. At the same time, the Algerian National Liberation Army (Armée de libération nationale) (ALN) had developed classical military structures and an army-like hierarchy long before it took power in 1962 and formed the base of a regime that became less and less revolutionary and more and more conservative during the following 25 years. So we could say that one part of the Algerian independence war was fought more as a traditional war (but with very unequal forces) than as a real social revolution, even if it is totally undeniable that the masses’ support for the fight for national independence took an absolutely decisive part into the course of the war.

Before the Outbreak of the Liberation War

The situation in French Algeria before the independence war can be described as a colonial apartheid system, working in a specific way and based on religious criteria. In contrast to the neighboring countries of Morocco and Tunisia, which were considered protectorates and which enjoyed a certain autonomy in their “interior affairs,” Algeria was officially neither a colony nor a protectorate. Instead, it was considered an integral part of the French “mother country” and divided into three French territorial departments: Oran, Algiers, and Constantine. Thus, theoretically, the inhabitants of the whole territory should have been French citizens from the law’s point of view, but the reality was different.

Civil rights were recognized for different ethnic groups under this political system according to their religious belonging. Such rights barely existed for the “lowest” and largest group living in French Algeria – the Muslim Arab and Berber population. The “Christian” group, formed originally by French people but also by other Europeans who had emigrated from Spain, Italy, or Malta, possessed complete civil and political rights, as well as social privileges. It numbered about 1 million people (out of 9 million inhabitants) at the end of the French colonial period, from 1830 to 1962. The second group was Jewish, which consisted of about 140,000 persons by the end of French rule. Many of them were not European immigrants, but were descended from ancestors who had lived in northern Africa. Some were the original inhabitants of the continent (there were Jewish tribes in what became Algeria some 2,500 years ago, and the famous Berber queen Kahina, who fought against the Arab invasion some 1,300 years ago, was probably Jewish), or arrived as refugees to northern Africa after the Catholic Reconquista in Spain, which ended in 1492. The French considered the Jews as indigenous to the region, but looked upon the Arab and Berber people as barbarians. They tried to integrate the Jewish population into the structures of European society. In September 1870 the Décret Crémieux – an order of the new republican government that followed the regime of “Emperor” Napoleon III – accorded full citizenship rights to the Algerian Jews, at least at the political level. Social discrimination, however, remained for some decades. In the 1890s, in particular, a violent anti-Semitic, anti-Jewish mass movement took place among the European voters and citizens settling in Algeria, led by the Liges (Leagues, Unions) whose only goal was to obtain discrimination against Jews. This movement was linked to the contemporary anti-Jewish movement in France. It was only in the middle of the 1920s that some social barriers, like the right to be a student in Algiers’ state university, were abolished for Jews.

The majority of Arabs and Berbers – about 8 million of the 9 million people living in Algeria around 1950 – were Muslim. Between 1881 and 1944 these Musulmans français d’Algérie were submitted to a special law called the Code de l’indigénat, defining the rights and duties of “indigenous” people. Among these rights and obligations was forced labor. There was also a principle of “collective responsibility” (principe de responsabilité collective), according to which every member of the “indigenous” group could be punished for a crime committed by another member of this population. Some special “crimes” existed only for Muslim or indigenous people, such as the crime of “making trouble in markets or public places.” In 1944 this “indigenous people’s law” was abolished under the influence of Charles de Gaulle and the National Council of the [French] Resistance, which came to power in France after liberation from occupation. Some Gaullist politicians understood that Algeria could not be stabilized as long as the Arab and Berber majority continued to be so oppressed. Hundreds of thousands of Algerian people had fought in the French army to liberate the mother country from the Nazis and would expect the liberation of their own country in return. In practice, discriminatory rules continued to plague “indigenous” people even after their legal abolition.

The only way for Muslims of Arab or Berber origin to escape their inferior status and become “ordinary citizens” in their own country was to obtain French citizenship. The possibility of becoming “naturalized” was linked to the obligation to “renounce” Islamic civil law, which was officially used by colonial authorities to govern the personal and family circumstances of all Muslims. This obligation was seen as a sign of “integration” into French, “civilized” society. At the same time, this “naturalization” was only awarded to a small minority of “indigenous” people (primarily those with a high standard of education, such as teachers and pharmacists): perhaps some 60,000 persons in total. Very few Muslims could gain access to a good education via the public school system: when the independence war started, there were about 4,000 European students learning in Algiers’ university, but only some 100 “indigenous.” The school system generally oriented “indigenous” pupils to “hand work” (instead of “mind work”) professions, preparing them only for unskilled work in agriculture.

At first, this group had no right to vote, and when a so-called right of vote was granted to them, Arabs and Berbers had to elect their representatives in a separate voters’ group for “indigenous” people (collège électoral indigène). In the 1920s and 1930s this second voters’ group only had the right to elect a minority of local representatives, and the right to vote was only recognized for members of this special voters’ group on a local level – they not could participate in elections for the governor of Alger, for example. Later, beginning in the mid-1940s, theoretically the two voters’ groups had the same collective rights, and each of them could elect the same number of representatives; however, their numbers were very unequal, with “indigenous” or “Muslim” voters comprising the great majority. “Indigenous” people could then also have one part of Algeria’s representatives in the French national parliament. Even these limited rights, however, were not respected by the French colonial lobby and the local administration, which represented much more the interests of European settlers than those of the whole population. In 1951 the results of local elections were strongly manipulated, preventing the political representatives of the Algerian national or independence movement – and even its “most moderate” wing – from choosing the “institutional way” to work for their goals. The result was a radicalization that led to the independence movement.

Independence Movement

The Algerian independence movement started in 1936–7 with the creation first of the North African Star (Etoile nord-africaine) (ENA), a movement born in French emigration, and one year later the Algerian People's Party (Parti du peuple algérien) (PPA) under the direction of Messali Hadj. The ENA movement had grown up in the milieu of the French Communist Party (Parti communiste français) (PCF). The PCF had been a radically anti-colonial party, especially between 1924 and 1934, when it supported the Moroccan Abdelkrim uprising against French and Spanish colonialism and denounced the "Colonial Exposition" in Paris in 1931. However, in the mid-1930s the PCF distanced itself from the search for independence under pressure from its social base in the "white" European working class within Algerian colonial society, and also because of its new alliance with the Social Democratic Party in the Popular Front which came to power in May 1936. As a result of this new PCF orientation, the leaders of the Algerian national movement kept their own distance from the French left and labor movement. At the same time, the Algerian Communist Party (Parti Communiste Algérien) (PCA), founded in 1936 as a formally independent party but under the control of the French PCF, remained for a long time a colonial party of the white working class. Until the end of the 1940s it was rather hostile toward the aims of the anti-colonial and independence movement and tried to incorporate the social problems the anti-colonialists denounced (those of the "indigenous" population) into a general class struggle – led by white communist and trade union leaders.

The PPA, founded in 1937, adopted a "populist" vision (according to the analysis of Mohammed Harbi, an Algerian historian who was also a leader of the Algerian national movement) and aspired to be the sole legitimate representative of the whole Algerian people. This was founded on the idea that all Algerians were suffering from colonial oppression and that this was much stronger than the tensions between social classes. One part of the Algerian national movement wanted to use the idea of Islam (of which it had a rather vague conception, since there was no real teaching of Islamic theology or the Arab language in Algerian colonial society) to unify Algerians. As the Arabs and Berbers were the most oppressed, and as they were at the same time officially defined by the system as Muslims, the link between the struggle for justice and Islam seemed quite natural in the eyes of some leaders.

Others in the PPA had ideas about the struggle for justice and independence much nearer to a traditional socialist or communist class-based concept, but in application to the specific situation of a colonial society.

In the late 1940s the PPA (illegal under French authority) founded two satellite organizations in order to follow different strategic aims. The Movement for the Victory of Democratic Rights (Mouvement pour le triomphe des libertés démocratiques) (MTLD), born in 1947, was created as the legal front organization for the illegal PPA, in order to enable the party to run candidates in elections. The Special Organization (Organisation spéciale) (OS), founded in 1948–9, would serve to prepare for armed struggle. These organizations coexisted for some months, but the OS was finally discovered and destroyed by the French colonial police force. The electoral way was also closed to the anti-colonial movement when the local elections of 1951 were openly manipulated by the colonial lobby. This took away from the legalist wing of the MTLD its hopes of institutionalization by denying it the seats it had won in local assemblies.

In 1953–4 the international situation seemed to push the anti-colonialists into action. Political troubles took place in Morocco and Tunisia, occupying the forces of the French colonial state for some months. More importantly, the French colonial war in Indochina (the future Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia) was coming to its end – the French army was definitively defeated in Dien-Bien-Phu in May 1954. For some of the anti-colonial activists, the time to react was now or never: the French state was weakened by its defeat in Southeast Asia, but soon it would bring home the troops remaining in Indochina and send them to North Africa, whereupon it might be too late to start a successful action.

The PPA's direction imploded into several political groups following different strategies and orientations. Its main leader, Messali Hadj, asked for greater power to be concentrated into his hands. The party's Central Committee was divided about this. When the whole party seemed paralyzed by the internal conflict, a small group of young activists started to prepare itself for action. The group, which began with 33 members, gave itself a new name in an assembly held on October 23, 1954: the National Liberation Front (Front de libération nationale) (FLN). It also created a military wing, the National Liberation Army (Armée de libération nationale) (ALN). In the beginning it consisted of guerilla fighters, nine leaders (three of whom lived in exile in Cairo), some fantasy uniforms, and only 349 guns. Still, it was with this very small instrument that the Algerian anti-colonialist movement started its independence war on the night of November 1, 1954.

Liberation War

On a strictly military level, the events of November 1, 1954 were not all that important. Direct military confrontation with the French colonial state remained rather limited. However, the political and psychological impact was much bigger. Under cover of darkness, attacks against public buildings (such as the radio station and the oil and gas factory of Algiers), military barracks and police stations, and bridges and central traffic points were organized in 30 different locations. The civil population did not constitute a target for the rebels and generally remained unconcerned, but in an attack on a bus near the town of Lakhdaria a married couple of French teachers was accidentally hit by stray bullets and the woman died.

After the first wave of attacks, when the night dubbed Red All-Holy (la Toussaint rouge) by French magazines was over, the French decided to negotiate and find some kind of compromise with the Algerian anti-colonial forces. Compromise or not, they wanted to see the ALN banned as “terrorists.” Thus, they needed to isolate it from other political forces, so the French government in Paris agreed to under-take some reforms. Without minor concessions, the French realized, the colonial system would be condemned, and the masses would sooner or later join the rebels, or at least support their struggle.

The French government replaced the governor of Algiers, Roger Léonard, with the more liberal Jacques Soustelle. On March 28, 1955 the new governor of Algeria met with a delegation representing different Algerian movements, mainly the Union for the Algerian Manifesto (UDMA) around the pharmacist Ferhat Abbas. This group represented the well-educated Algerian elite, who were willing to accept reforms and a legal way to get out of colonialism. Also at the meeting was the Ulema, made up mostly of the conservative Muslim priesthood. The meeting, however, was unsuccessful. A reactionary settlers’ lobby, speaking in the name of European populations established in Algeria, but especially of big farmers and landowners, blocked all efforts at compromise. Then, on April 3, the French parliament in Paris adopted a new Emergency Law permitting massive repressive measures and violations of human rights in the name of preserving public order. The way was open to bitter confrontation.

On August 20 a peasants’ revolt provoked by the FLN and its army took place in the Nord-Constantinois, the region between north-eastern Algeria’s main city Constantine and the Mediterranean Sea. Thousands of peasants armed with very old weapons and simple wooden sticks, crying for revenge after decades of humiliation, exploitation, and marginalization, attacked public buildings and European settlers and their farms. About seventy civilians from the European population were killed. The French reaction to the revolt was harsh. Within a few days about 12,000 Algerian civilians were killed in massive bombing attacks by the French army. After a week of bloody and extremely brutal repression, any compromise had become impossible, and all other Algerian anti-colonialist forces started to join the FLN as the most radical opposition force against colonial power.

In March 1956 Algerian Communist Party combatants joined the ALN in the underground. Before that date, the party had its own armed force, the Fighters of Liberation (Combattants de la libération) (CDL), but it was entirely destroyed by the French army. After that date, members of the party serving with the French army went over to the ALN, bringing trucks and munitions with them. On July 1 the rest of the CDL was officially integrated into the ALN. In the same period, members of the Ulema started to support or to join the ALN. Before that time, they had accepted French rule on a political level but claimed “cultural autonomy” on domestic religious affairs. Now, they explained that the colonial system was no longer acceptable, and some started to describe the struggle of the FLN/ALN as a kind of holy war. The reformist current around the UDMA of Ferhat Abbas, until now a partisan of the legal way to get out of the colonial system, also joined the struggle of the FLN/ALN after the summer of 1956. Abbas’s nephew had been assassinated by the FLN in Constantine, in order to “warn” Abbas, but what brought him into the alliance was actually the political polarization between the colonial power and the FLN/ALN. He chose the FLN within which to begin a political career. In 1962 he would become the first parliamentary president in independent Algeria, under the FLN regime.

In October and November 1956, in the valley of the Summam River, in the heart of the Kabylie (Algeria's main Berber region), there took place the first real congress of the FLN. It confirmed the participation of a wide range of political forces, from the communists to the Ulema, in the new FLN. The congress also confirmed the Front's aspiration to be a single party as the only force able to claim to be the legitimate representative of the whole Algerian people. The congress also affirmed that, once national independence was won, there would be a place for free competition between different political forces, as well as political and social pluralism. The congress adopted a progressive social program (even if ideas about the role of Algerian woman remained rather traditionalist), in large part written by former communists. One result of the congress was that the FLN accepted the principle of political control by civilians.

In the winter of 1956–7 the FLN started the Battle of Algiers (la bataille d'Alger) by destroying the French colonial power's capital. This included an appeal to mass action like strikes, but also the use of terrorist methods such as bombs detonated in public places frequented by European civilians. The FLN's aim in using such methods was to end the war as quickly as possible by creating panic within the European population. The result was quite the opposite: the FLN was basically destroyed in Algeria's main region as a result of repression and its own strategic mistakes. This created a kind of panic within the military hierarchy of the NLA, which decided to "purify" its organization of "spies and suspect elements." An atmosphere of paranoia was created and spread by the French colonial army's psychological service, which made believe to the FLN that it was massively infiltrated by French agents (which was not true). At that time, the process of real militarization of the FLN/ALN began. The civilian population still supported (probably more than ever) the national liberation forces as their only salvation, but in terms of its interior structures the FLN/ALN had become more and more a movement similar to a classical army.

Around 1960 the liberation army fighting the French colonial power was in large part dismantled. There still remained some guerilla forces, especially in Kabylie, but the principal organization of the FLN/ALN had become the Frontiers Army (Armée des frontières), the part of the ALN that remained at the borders of Morocco and Tunisia and was composed of Algerian refugees living in camps in those two countries. The Frontiers Army was much more organized as a classical army, consisting mainly of Algerians who were former officers in the French colonial armed forces. Some joined the rebel forces out of conviction, but others, though successful in the French army, believed that in an independent Algeria they would be able to occupy much higher places than they ever could in France.

Interior guerilla forces, however, were much more improvised. One non-traditional tactic was the recruitment of women combatants, a new thing in Algerian society. Some 2,000 girls and women joined these forces, if not serving in combat, at least working as nurses or doctors. They were supplied with arms mainly to ensure their own protection. This was a very important step toward the liberation of Algerian women.

By the time of Algeria's liberation, interior guerilla forces had some 5,000 to 10,000 combatants, and the Frontiers Army had some 35,000 to 40,000 soldiers. It never really did fight the French army on the battlefield, partly because France had placed mines and electric fences on the borders between Algeria and Morocco and Tunisia in order to prevent all passage of combatants to Algerian territory. This made it very difficult to cross the border, even after the late 1950s.

The French colonial power did not lose the war on the battlefield but on a political level. It was impossible to win the hearts and minds of the Algerian people. There was also international pressure on France. The US, just like the USSR, did not tolerate the maintenance of traditional colonial powers like France and Britain in its quest for world power. The international competition of the Cold War placed France (and Britain) under the "friendly pressure" of its own allies, at the same time that its brutal methods were condemned in UN assemblies. Last but not least, there was real opposition within French society, especially from the left, against the pursuit of the war. Though its resistance was tepid at first, the French Communist Party eventually adopted forthright opposition to the war, even if it never clearly supported the independence fighters. Radical opposition to the war was also supported by some progressive forces: anarchists and “anti-authoritarian communists” (communists libertaires), Trotskyists, and the Unified Socialist Party (PSU), created in the late 1950s by dissidents of the communist and socialist parties. There were also left-wing Christians who were very active in denouncing the use of torture and racism in French colonized North Africa, grouped around the magazine Témoignage Chrétien (Christian Witness). A majority of the UNEF, France’s students’ union, also supported the Algerian independence struggle.

The National Liberation Front (FLN) was the leading anti-colonial socialist political party in Algeria during the independence struggle against France. Here female members of the FLN gather at a rally on June 27, 1962. The FLN waged a revolutionary war with France and was seen as an archetype of anti-colonial resistance against imperialism around the world from the 1950s to the 1970s. (Getty Images)

De Gaulle made a political calculation: it would be better to sacrifice European settlers’ and landowners’ interests in North Africa and accept Algeria’s independence, in exchange for access to Algerian petrol and gas reserves. France also expected to be able to continue its nuclear and chemical weapons tests in the Algerian Sahara – and those tests continued until 1972. However, control of Algerian petrol and gas reserves did not materialize, and on February 8, 1971 Algeria decided to nationalize those reserves.

On March 19, 1962, after the Evian Agreements (Accords d’Evian), a ceasefire was begun.

July 5, 1962 became the day of Algeria’s independence – 132 years after the French conquest of Algiers on July 5, 1830.

SEE ALSO: Francophone Africa, Protest and Independence; Morocco, Protests, 1600s–1990s

References and Suggested Readings

- Fanon, F. (2001) L’An V de la Révolution Algérienne. Paris: La Découverte.
- Harbi, M. (1975) Aux origines du FLN: Le populisme révolutionnaire en Algérie. Paris: Bourgois.
- Harbi, M. (1980) Le F.L.N., mirage et réalité. Des origines à la prise du pouvoir (1945–1962). Paris: Éditions Jeune Afrique.
- Harbi, M. & Meynier, G. (2004) Le FLN, documents et histoire 1954–1962. Paris: Fayard.
- Jackson, H. F. (1977) The FLN in Algeria: Party Development in a Revolutionary Society. Westport, CT: Greenwood Publishing.
- McDougall, J. (2006) History and the Culture of Nationalism in Algeria. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Meynier, G. (2002) Histoire intérieure du FLN (1954–1962). Paris: Fayard.
- Naylor, P. (2000) France and Algeria: A History of Decolonization and Transformation. Gainesville: University of Florida Press.
- Pattieu, S. (2002) Les Camarades des frères. Trotskyistes et libertaires dans la guerre d’Algérie. Paris: Editions Syllepse.
- Schmid, B. (2006) Das koloniale Algerien. Münster: Unrast.
- Sivan, E. (1976) Communisme et nationalisme en Algérie (1920–1962). Paris: FNSP.
- Stora, B. (1993) Histoire de la guerre d’Algérie (1954–1962). Paris: La Découverte.
- Vidal-Naquet, P. (1972). La Torture dans la république. Paris: La Découverte.

Alianza Popular Revolucionaria Americana

Gabriel Cabrera M.

The Alianza Popular Revolucionaria Americana (APRA) was originally a continent-wide political front that worked to unify all the oppressed social sectors in Latin America that fought against imperialist domination, and thus to advance their liberation and political and economic union. It was founded in May 1924 by Victor Raul Haya de la Torre, a Peruvian politician and student leader. A few years after its foundation, APRA converted from a front to a party organization, becoming the Partido Aprista Peruano (Peruvian Aprista Party), although it continued to be known as APRA. Even though initially the Aprista Party had revolutionary tendencies, it gradually came to be defined as social democratic and in practice adopted a liberal approach.

Born in the northern Peruvian city of Trujillo, Haya de la Torre worked to unite student, labor, and peasants' movements in his region and throughout the country. As a result of his organizing activity, he was exiled in 1923. His subsequent journeys through several countries affirmed his anti-imperialist and anti-oligarchic viewpoints. In May 1924, he and other exiles founded APRA in Mexico City during a public act with leaders of the Students' Federation of Mexico. APRA was defined as a Unique International Front of manual and intellectual workers and adopted a common program of political action, based on five fundamental principles: political action against imperialism, political and economic union in Latin America, progressive nationalization of lands and industries, internationalization of the Panama Canal, and solidarity with all oppressed peoples and classes of the world.

APRA had a strong influence in many trade unions and political and popular organizations over the continent, especially in Central America and the Caribbean. Nevertheless, in 1928, Haya de la Torre decided from Paris to convert the alliance into a party – without consulting APRA members. He initially formed the Partido Nacionalista Libertador (Nationalist Liberation Party), then the Peruvian Aprista Party. This led political leaders like José Carlos Mariátegui, who had been part of APRA while it was a broad front, to leave the organization.

Through the Aprista Party, Haya de la Torre presented his political theories. He proposed an understanding of the Latin American reality according to a “historical space-time” theory, which according to its particular economic and social development was different from the European experience. He maintained that the most pressing task was to fight imperialism, the main cause of Latin American countries' oppression, and to subordinate other social contradictions such as class antagonisms within each nation. For this purpose an “anti-imperialist state” had to be constructed by means of a multi-class party in which the middle class led the new state, followed by the workers and peasants. This approach thus distanced APRA from Marxist socialism in Peru and abroad. To illustrate its differential stance, the group adopted the slogan “Neither with Washington nor with Moscow.”

APRA attempted to attain power, but was electorally proscribed or persecuted by the political sectors representing the oligarchy. The rank and file of the party conducted significant popular uprisings, such as a 1932 revolt in Trujillo or the 1948 uprising in Callao Port. The group's leaders, however, veered toward more moderate positions and finally assumed rightist attitudes, even approaching the US government during the periods 1956–62, 1963–8, and during its opposition to the Velasco regime (1968–75). In these periods the Aprista Party built an alliance and connived with its former enemies, even obstructing attempts by other political actors to proceed with the reforms Apristas had originally fought for.

In 1985, after the death of Haya, APRA acceded to the presidency for the first time through its young leader, Alan García Pérez. Even though the Aprista government initially attempted some moderate reforms to generate a less dependent economy, it soon turned to right-wing politics. On the other hand, with the guerilla war intensifying, García opted to intensify the state's dirty war, inherited from the previous government, leading to thousands of deaths. In 2006, after the collapse of the Fujimori dictatorship (1992–2000), García was reelected president through an alliance with the right. In this period APRA adopted the neoliberal model that Fujimori had initiated.

SEE ALSO: Haya de la Torre, Victor Raúl (1895–1979); Mariátegui, José Carlos (1894–1930); Peru, Armed Insurgency and the Dirty War, 1980–1990; Peru, Neoliberalism and Social Mobilization, 1990s–2000s; Peru, “People's War,” Counterinsurgency, and the Popular Movement

References and Suggested Readings

- Cotler, J. (1978) Leguía: consolidación de la dominación imperialista y emergencia de las fuerzas populares antioligárquicas. In Clases, estado y nación en el Perú, 4th ed. Lima: IEP Press, pp. 185–226.
- Cragnolino, S. (1984) Haya de la Torre el indoamericanismo en América Latina. Buenos Aires: Centro Editor de América Latina.
- Haya de la Torre, V. (1982) El antiimperialismo y el APRA. Lima: Chan Chan Press. Available at www.antimperialismo.tripod.com/id28.html.

Jiménez, C. (2008) El Estado aprista y el Estado Revolucionario. Los límites del proyecto nacionalista burgués. Cuadernos para la Emancipación 32 (March): 29–32. Caracas: Fundación Emancipación por la Unidad de América Latina y el Caribe.

Alinsky, Saul (1909–1972) and the Industrial Areas Foundation

Benjamin J. Pauli

Born in Chicago to Russian Jewish immigrants, Saul Alinsky was the leading tactician of community organizing in his day. As a student in the University of Chicago's cutting-edge sociology department in the early 1930s, Alinsky's fieldwork brought him into close contact with the crime and poverty of the inner city, and he began to develop an understanding of the influence of the environment on individual behavior. The anti-delinquency projects of the Institute for Juvenile Research provided him with a jumping-off point for a career as an organizer that would span more than three decades. Alinsky began his activist career by successfully laboring to forge the Back of the Yards Neighborhood Council, a very unlikely alliance of the local union, the church, and the community, in the Chicago slum infamously portrayed by Upton Sinclair in The Jungle. In 1940 he founded the Industrial Areas Foundation (IAF), an umbrella organization to oversee the inception of new campaigns across the country. Alinsky's other notable victories would include the organization of the African American ghetto Woodlawn in South Chicago in 1959, and a high-profile battle in the mid-1960s with the Eastman Kodak company in Rochester, New York that pioneered the tactic of stockholder activism. In 1969 Alinsky and his right-hand man Ed Chambers established a training institute for organizers, which versed up-and-coming activists in Alinsky's unique philosophy of social engagement.

Alinsky's self-professed radicalism was primarily tactical, as laid out in two books at the beginning and end of his career, respectively: Reveille for Radicals and Rules for Radicals. Heavily influenced by John L. Lewis and the strategies he observed among Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) organizers, he embraced conflict and controversy as necessary means to social change, repudiating the conciliatory and moralistic approach of moderate liberals, which ultimately depended on the charity of the oppressor, in favor of realistic power politics. He believed that organizers should enter a community only upon request and stay only as long as was necessary to establish community organizations and provide the locals with the tools to maintain them. Employing a wide array of confrontational and often flamboyant methods, Alinsky always attempted to reveal to people the fruits that could be gained by the power of collective action, beginning with low-level, winnable victories and using the momentum to initiate more taxing, sustained efforts.

Though he was sometimes labeled by detractors as such, Alinsky was never a socialist. To the end of his life he remained eminently pragmatic and focused on helping the underprivileged to get what they wanted, whatever that happened to be. His methods were, however, linked to a broader belief in the potential of American democracy and an emphasis on the need for action on the part of ordinary citizens who could, with a little coaxing from experienced organizers, take their destiny into their own hands. Indeed, Alinsky envisioned himself as one in a long line of American radicals leading back to Tom Paine. Alinsky died suddenly of a heart attack in 1972, leaving the IAF under the guidance of Ed Chambers.

SEE ALSO: Sinclair, Upton (1878–1968); US Labor Rebellions and the Rise of the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO)

References and Suggested Readings

- Alinsky, S. (1989) Reveille for Radicals. New York: Vintage.
 Alinsky, S. (1989) Rules for Radicals. New York: Vintage.
 Finks, P. D. (1984) The Radical Vision of Saul Alinsky. New York: Paulist Press.
 Horwitt, S. D. (1992) Let Them Call Me Rebel: Saul Alinsky – His Life and Legacy. New York: Vintage.

Allende Gossens, Salvador (1908–1973)

Héctor Guerra Hernández

Salvador Allende Gossens was president of Chile from 1970 until the putsch led by General Augusto Pinochet on September 11, 1973. Allende died that day in the “Palacio de la Moneda,” which was bombed by the rebels.

From an early age, Allende recognized the contradictions of the times. During his adolescence he studied anarchist thought and was a friend of Juan Demarchi, a carpenter of Italian origin who instructed him in the Chilean social question. He participated in the Socialist Republic of Marmaduke Grove in 1932 and acted as a co-founder of the Socialist Party of Chile in 1933. A medical student of middle-class origins, he was a member of groups with left tendencies during his college years.

He began his political career by participating in the parliamentary election of 1937 and being chosen deputy by Valparaiso. He then served as minister of health in the cabinet of Pedro Aguirre Cerdá between 1939 and 1942. From that point he became the unquestionable leader of the socialist party. In 1952, 1958, and 1962 he presented himself for the presidential elections. On the first occasion he was temporarily expelled from the party due to the fact that he accepted communist support after the party was outlawed. He won on his fourth attempt. In 1958, with socialist and communist support, he was elected second after Jorge Alessandri.

In 1964 Eduardo Frei Montalva advocated a program of “revolution in freedom” and defeated Allende with 56.9 percent of the vote to Allende’s 38.9 percent. The new program, an attempt to modify the fundamental structures of the country in a frame of democracy while respecting the institutional order, included agrarian reform, a program seeking to advance participation of the middle classes, Chilenization of copper by state control of mining benefits, and educational reform. The parliamentary elections of 1969 showed the new political situation of the country by defining the so-called “unreconciled third,” highlighting the diminution of support for the political center and the strengthening of the right and left options. This situation was to be reflected with even greater clarity in the presidential elections of 1970, marked by the opposition of competing projects for society that were impossible to reconcile. Through those projects, a victorious coalition called the Popular Unit emerged, headed by Allende, with 36.3 percent of the vote. The group won because of the narrow margin between the votes received by the other two candidates, Jorge Alessandri on the right and Radomiro Tomic of the Christian Democratic Party. Allende’s election had to be ratified by the congress, where he met with strong opposition, but finally, on October 24, 1970, after obtaining the support of the Christian Democratic Party by signing a Statute of Democratic Guarantees, Allende was proclaimed president.

Allende was a man of his word. A staunch defender of the working class, he believed that socialism had to be constructed to conform to Chilean reality, not modeled according to a pre-established foreign framework. For these reasons he disagreed with the Cuba of Fidel Castro and the positions of the Chilean Movement of the Revolutionary Left (Movimiento de la Izquierda Revolucionaria, MIR), which was waiting for an opportune moment to arm the population and begin social transformations outside of its respected institutions. During his three years of government, however, Allende never doubted the correctness of his agenda, and his consistency led even his strongest opponents, on both the left and the right, to show him respect.

SEE ALSO: Chile and the Peaceful Road to Socialism; Chile, Popular Resistance against Pinochet; Chile, Protests and Military Coup, 1973

References and Suggested Readings

- Angell, A. (1993) Chile de Alessandri a Pinochet: en busca de la utopía. Santiago: Editorial Andrés Bello.
- Dinamarca, M. (1987) La República Socialista Chilena: orígenes legítimos del Partido Socialista. Santiago: Ediciones Documentas.
- Goldenberg, G. (1990) La Muerte del presidente Allende. Santiago: Ediciones Domicilio Conocido.
- Puccio, O. (1985) Un Cuarto de siglo con Allende: recuerdos de su mayordomo privado. Santiago: Editorial Antártica.
- Rivas, M. & Merino, R. (1997) Qué hacía yo el 11 de septiembre? Santiago: Ediciones LOM.
- Rocha, J. G. (2001) Allende, masón: la visión de un profano. Santiago: Editorial Sudamericana.
- Torres, I. (1974) Chile, de Allende a la Junta Militar. Caracas: Editorial Síntesis Dos Mil.

al-Sanusi, Muhammad ibn Ali (ca. 1787–1859)

Andrew J. Waskey

The al-Sanusi (Senussi), called sanusyyia in Arabic, is a Sufi order founded by Muhammad ibn Ali al-Sanusi, who was born near Mustaghanim in Algeria. The Sanusyyia movement was an Islamic reform movement like the Wahhabi of Arabia and the Mahdist movement of Sudan. Organized into a brotherhood (tariqa), the Sanusyyia method of reform sought to renew devotion to Islam by emphasis upon spiritual experiences. The call for renewal of an Islamic life became a militant mystical movement that was also a call to oppose western colonialism. The expansion of the French into North Africa was resisted by several elements. These included many desert tribes, traditional rulers, and the al-Sanusi.

In 1837 al-Sanusi founded the Sanusyyia at Mt. Abu Qubais near Mecca. Six years later he returned to North Africa, settling in Jabal Akhdar in Cyrenaica. In the mountainous fastness of the area he founded a center of operations at al-Beida in 1843 with the organization of the al-Sanusi Sufi lodge and built the Zawiya al-Baida (White Monastery).

Leadership of the al-Sanusi passed to Muhammad al-Mahdi upon al-Sanusi's death in 1859. As the Grand Sanusi, Muhammad al-Mahdi expanded the brotherhood along the Saharan caravan routes. In 1895 the al-Sanusi moved their main lodge to the oasis of Kufra and afterward to the oasis of Qiru in the central Sahara in 1899. These oases were located along Saharan caravan routes. By 1900 the al-Sanusi movement had spread out of eastern Libya across thousands of miles of the Sahara Desert to many oases and desert towns. The trained Sufi brothers that the al-Sanusi lodges sent out were welcomed as men who were learned in Islamic law and could teach and be judges in disputes.

Prior to the outbreak of World War I the nominal rulers of North Africa were the Ottoman Sultans. However, the al-Sanusi brothers were able by their spiritual influence to be an independent force in the Sahara. The al-Sanusi brotherhood, leaders of the lodges, and their followers among the tribal warriors constituted a significant military force that would fight in a jihad with the hope of martyrdom against great odds. In 1911 the al-Sanusi joined the Turks in their war against the Italian attempt to colonize Tunisia and Libya. The Italo-Turkish War (1911–12) was fought by the al-Sanusi and other traditional tribal leaders. Successful in a number of actions, they were able to increase their supply of war materiel. To aid the al-Sanusi the Ottoman Empire sent officers who provided modern military training in order to increase al-Sanusi combat effectiveness. One of the officers was Nuri Pasha, half-brother of Enver Pasha. Another was Ottoman-Iraqi General Ja'afar al Askari. This helped them to resist the Italians, so much so that while by 1914 most of western North Africa was controlled by the French and Italians, Cyrenaica was still not colonized.

The Italians were handed a serious defeat on August 26, 1914 when a supply column was captured. Thousands of rifles and ammunition were captured. Several larger guns as well as other supplies were also taken. Most of the Italians in the supply train were killed. Now well armed and organized, the al-Sanusi invaded Egypt in November 1915, probably at the behest of the Turks, but the exact reason is not known. The move was a disaster. On February 26, 1916 they were defeated at Aqqaqir. The British, using armored cars and massed firepower, drove the al-Sanusi from the field. At a critical moment in the battle General Ja'afar was wounded and captured. The surviving al-Sanusi fighters were driven back into Libya where they continued to harass the Italians and French until the end of the war.

In Darfur in 1916 Sultan 'Ali Dinar, who was influenced by the al-Sanusi, joined them in resisting the British. His Fur army was defeated at the Battle of Beringia (May 1916) and he was killed at Juba (Giubu) on November 6, 1916 in a final action. Although defeated militarily, al-Sanusi influence continued. When Libya gained its independence Sayyid Muhammad Idris bin Sayyid Muhammad al-Mahdi al-Sanusi, the grandson of Muhammad ibn Ali al-Sanusi and head of the Sanusi Sufi lodge, was crowned king.

SEE ALSO: Mahdist Revolt; Qadaffi, Muammar al- (b. 1942); Sudanese Protest Under Anglo-Egyptian Rule

References and Suggested Readings

- Abbott, G. F. (1986) The Holy War in Tripoli. London: Darf.
- Childs, T. W. (1990) Italo-Turkish Diplomacy and the War Over Libya, 1911–1912. New York: E. J. Brill.
- Vikor, K. S. (1995) Sufi and Scholar on the Desert Edge: Muhammad b. 'Ali al-Sanusi and his Brotherhood. Evanston: Northwestern University Press.

Alves, Margarida Maria (1943–1983)

Fabiana de Cássia Rodrigues

Margarida Maria Alves was born in Alagoa Grande in the state of Paraíba, Brazil. From a rural area, she battled for workers' and women's rights. In 1973, she was elected the first woman president of Alagoa Grande trade union and served in this position for ten years. During this period, she took owners of sugar factories and big landholders to court over labor rights, fighting for such things as an eight-hour workday and legal vacations. At that time, in the 1980s, a National Agrarian Reform Plan was created, and violence in the countryside increased. In this context, a masked gunman murdered Alves on August 12, 1983, in front of her house, in the presence of her husband and children. The assailant escaped, and the crime remains unpunished. Alves has been nationally recognized as a symbol in the struggle for agrarian reform and women's rights. A human rights foundation has been named for her, and her motto is well known: "Better to die fighting than starving."

SEE ALSO: Brazil, Labor Struggles; Brazil, Workers and the Left: Partido dos Trabalhadores and Central Única dos Trabalhadores

References and Suggested Readings

Comissão Pastoral da Terra (2008) As mártires da Terra. Available at www.cptnac.com.br/?system=news&eid=16 (downloaded April 20, 2008).

Amana Inspirationist Utopians

Richard Goff

One of the more enduring utopian communities is the Community of True Inspiration. Comparable to the Shakers and Hutterites in longevity, their teachings have existed for nearly 300 years, their communal society existed 85 years, and their legacy continues in the form of the Amana Church and Amana Society, Inc. (Amana Refrigeration). Akin to the Rappites, the Community of True Inspiration traces its origins to eighteenth-century Pietism. In the 1840s, Christian Metz, a Pietist leader, motivated by divine prophecy, resolved to migrate to America. Metz, along with approximately 700 others, settled near Buffalo, New York, and called their new home Ebenezer.

Upon their settlement, the congregation chose to adopt a communal economic organization. The decision in some respects was pragmatic. Fearful of persecution, creating a large unified community made sense. Additionally, knowledge of English was severely limited, so living with other German speakers seemed practical. Theological considerations were also important. Modeling themselves after the apostolic community was consistent with their Christian and Pietist beliefs.

The community in Ebenezer developed quickly, blending agriculture and industry. Within a few years they had four villages, each with communal kitchens, residences, churches, workshops, and farms. Additionally, the group had woolen mills, a calico print mill, two grist mills, and an oil mill. Many of the citizens practiced highly skilled trades, including carpentry, masonry, watchmaking, and tanning. The sudden growth spurt combined with the expansion of nearby Buffalo prompted leaders to reevaluate their location. In 1864 the community picked up stakes and moved their 1,300 members just west of Iowa City, renaming their community Amana. The new community was modeled after Ebenezer. They established seven villages, each with residential units, a store, a school, communal kitchens, and shops, and with each specializing in different trades, including farming, woolen production, flour milling, and sawmilling.

Although property was owned communally, the society functioned in an almost corporate fashion, emphasizing efficiency. Economic and social affairs were governed by a Great Council elected by voting members (men over 21, women over 30). Daily operations and decisions were made by managers and smaller councils appointed by the Great Council. Education ended at the 8th grade for most, but in some cases continued for those seeking specialized jobs. Job opportunities for women were relatively limited, confined to domestic work. Job rotation was unusual and sons typically followed their fathers into trades. Daily life was governed by numerous regulations regarding dress, dining habits, and general behavior. Sexual restraint was a central value and intercourse was only to exist within the confines of marriage. Even marriage was viewed solemnly, as newlyweds suffered demotion within the community and couples with large families were viewed negatively.

The relatively strict rules and apparent double-standards generated discontent in the early 1900s. With increased economic development and the availability of new consumer items, certain professionals and some elders received material privileges such as “fancy” clothes and automobiles based on their supposed necessity. These factors, along with the limited educational and job opportunities, contributed to members’ growing apostasy.

Faced with a declining population and economic problems due to the Great Depression, Amana’s Great Council offered all members the chance to “reorganize” the community in 1931. As a result of the vote, the Council severed the church from the business operations and created a joint-stock corporation in place of the communal ownership. Both organizations continue to exist and Amana remains a thriving community.

SEE ALSO: Cooperative Commonwealth; Father Rapp (1757–1847) and Harmony; Icaria Utopian Community; New Harmony; Oneida Perfectionist Utopians; Owen, Robert (1771–1858); Shakers Utopian Community; Utopian Communities, United States; Utopian Intentional Communities; Wright, Frances “Fanny” (1795–1852)

References and Suggested Readings

- Foster, L. (1981) Religion and Sexuality: Three American Communal Experiments of the Nineteenth Century. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Oved, Y. (1988) Two Hundred Years of American Communes. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction.
- Sutton, R. P. (2004) Communal Utopias and the American Experience. Westport, CT: Praeger.

Ambedkar, B. R. (1891–1956)

Debi Chatterjee

Bhimrao Ramji Ambedkar, a defender of civil rights social justice for the lowest-caste Dalit (Untouchables) in India, was born on April 14, 1891, at the Military Headquarters of War near Indore. A son of Subedar Ramji Sakpal and Bhimabai, he hailed from a Hindu, untouchable Mahar family. As such, from an early age Ambedkar had experienced much of the social hazards which go with untouchability. Bhimrao married Ramabai at the age of 17.

Education and Influences

Through financial assistance received from the Maharaja of Baroda, Ambedkar was able to graduate from Elphinstone College (1905–12), spend three years at Columbia University (1913–16), and one year at the London School of Economics (1916–17). He was awarded an M.Sc. degree in 1921 for his thesis “Provincial Decentralization of Imperial Finance in British India.” In 1922 he submitted another dissertation, “The Problem of the Rupee,” for which he later managed to get a D.Sc degree from London University. He was called to the Bar in 1923.

Ambedkar’s father was a follower of Sant Kabir, a ruthless critic of the Hindu Brahminical order. At the same time he had great reverence for the traditional Hindu texts such as the Ramayana and Mahabharata. Ambedkar was early exposed to these diverse influences. He also had an early exposure to the teachings of Buddha. The western impact, particularly that of John Dewey, Edwin Robert Anderson Seligman, Goldenweiser, and Edwin Cannan, on Ambedkar in later years was equally significant. Even as he relied heavily on the western liberal tradition, the influence of the Soviet Union in the molding of his economic thought could be noticed.

Articulating the Interests of the Untouchables

Ambedkar entered India’s political scene in 1919 through his testimony before the Southborough Committee on Franchise, where he urged that the untouchables should be given community based representation in view of the fact that untouchability constitutes a definite set of interests which the untouchables alone can speak for. When the Simon Commission took up the Depressed Classes issue in 1928, Ambedkar focused mainly on two points: (1) that the Depressed Classes be treated as a minority, distinct and separate from the Hindu community; (2) that the former required far greater political protection than any other minority in the country. At the Round Table Conferences held at London between 1930 and 1932, Ambedkar, along with Rao Bahadur Srinivasan, represented the Depressed Classes, championing strongly in favor of separate electorates for the Depressed Classes.

Ambedkar fundamentally disagreed with Gandhi on matters regarding Indian society and social problems, particularly on the question of the Depressed Classes and their emancipation. Sharp differences surfaced at the time of the Round Table Conferences. Opposing the British government’s announcement on the Communal Award giving the Depressed Classes separate electorates, Gandhi undertook a fast-unto-death program following which Ambedkar was compelled to soften his own stand in favor of separate electorates and accept a compromise formula of reserved seats and common electorate in what is widely known as the Poona Pact of 1932. Ambedkar wrote a scathing critique of Gandhi under the title What Congress and Gandhi Have Done to the Untouchables (1945).

Organizing Movements

Alongside political struggles, Ambedkar launched several struggles on the social plane to combat the ill-treatment of the untouchables by the caste Hindus. Notable among the movements was the Mahad Satyagraha (1927) conducted to gain the right of access of the untouchables to the water tank of Mahad. Burning of the Manusmriti (The Law of Manu) (1927) and the Kala Ram Mandir Satyagraha (1930) were other landmark movements. While in the early years he attempted to awaken the good sense of the caste Hindus and reform Hinduism, his skepticism increased over the years.

Ambedkar had made three attempts to mobilize his followers through the formation of political parties – these parties were the Independent Labour Party (1936), the Scheduled Castes Federation (1942), and the Republican Party (1956). The Independent Labour Party won a number of seats in the 1937 elections to the Bombay Legislative Assembly.

Ambedkar's struggle for social justice was multi-pronged – focusing on social, economic, political, and religious aspects. He strongly believed in the power of the political weapon and aimed at bringing about fundamental social changes through the instrument of law. Through sustained political mobilization and hard bargaining he succeeded in establishing the Scheduled Castes as a politically relevant category and made future generations of the downtrodden people conscious of their legal rights and the political weapons for carrying forward their struggles. Years after his death, Ambedkar continues to remain an icon to the Scheduled Castes.

Constitution and Lawmaking

Ambedkar was elected as a member of the Constituent Assembly in 1946 from Bengal. Later, he became the chairman of the Drafting Committee of the Assembly, which was assigned the task of drafting the constitution of independent India. His professed purpose in going to the Constituent Assembly was to safeguard the interests of the untouchables. In the Constituent Assembly he revealed both his expertise in jurisprudence and commitment to the cause of the untouchables. As such, he is referred to as the father of the Indian constitution.

In August 1947 Ambedkar became law minister in the first Cabinet of independent India. As law minister, one of the major initiatives taken by him towards reforming the Hindu social order was in the form of drafting the Hindu Code Bill which inter alia was aimed at enhancing gender equality in Hindu society. The Bill sought to introduce several new points in the existing laws, namely, (1) abolition of the doctrine of rights by birth, (2) absolute rights over property given to women, (3) a share of property given to the daughter, and (4) provisions for divorce. However, in the face of stiff orthodox resistance the bill was abandoned, following which Ambedkar resigned from the ministry in 1951.

Fed up with majoritarian caste Hindu arrogance, Ambedkar gave up his attempt at reforming Hinduism. Subsequently, he became more and more skeptical and began speaking of conversion. The final step towards conversion came on October 14, 1956. Accompanied by thousands of followers, Ambedkar, shortly before his death, broke his relations with Hinduism and converted to Buddhism at a ceremony in Nagpur. He died on December 6, 1956 at New Delhi. In the voluminous work The Buddha and his Dhamma, published after his death, Ambedkar elaborately argued in favor of the decision to convert to Buddhism.

A Prolific Writer

In 1920 Ambedkar launched a Marathi journal, Mook Nayak (Leader of the Dumb), to champion the cause of the untouchables. The journal, however, was short-lived. In 1927 he made another attempt and started a fortnightly Bahishkrit Bharat (The Outcaste India), which also failed to survive for long. Ambedkar's major writings include Annihilation of Caste, Who Were the Sudras, The Untouchables, Mr Gandhi and the Emancipation of the Untouchables, States And Minorities, and Thoughts On Pakistan.

SEE ALSO: Black Panthers; Dalit Liberation Struggles; Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand (1869–1948); India, Civil Disobedience Movement and Demand for Independence

References and Suggested Readings

- Jaffrelot, C. (2005) Dr. Ambedkar and Untouchability: Fighting the Caste System. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Kadam, K. N. (1991) Dr Babasaheb Ambedkar and the Significance of His Movement: A Chronology. Bombay: Popular Prakashan.
- Kuber, W. N. (1973) Dr Ambedkar: A Critical Study. New Delhi: Peoples Publishing House.
- Moon, V. (1995) Dr. Babasaheb Ambedkar. New Delhi: National Book Trust.
- Omvedt, G. (1994) Dalits and the Democratic Revolution: Dr Ambedkar and the Dalit Movement in Colonial India. New Delhi: Sage.
- Zelliot, E. (1998) From Untouchable to Dalit: Essays on the Ambedkar Movement. New Delhi: Manohar.

American Civil War (1861–1864)

Mark A. Lause

The American Civil War has long been one of the most popular subjects in US history. Its frequent treatment as a military narrative, framed by political considerations and commentary, often obscures the social and economic tensions that underlie the political protests that erupted in what has often been described as the Second American Revolution.

Most directly, the Civil War finished several tasks left incomplete by the original American Revolution. The Anglo-American states had cooperated to win independence and establish a common national government, but states in both the North and South periodically claimed authority to nullify federal laws they did not want to enforce, and both sections had threatened at different times to secede from the Union. The Civil War put a rest to these threats by establishing the supremacy of the nation. Then, too, the Revolutionary generation had eliminated human slavery in half the states and agreed to exclude it from what became the Midwest, but it took the Civil War to abolish the institution entirely and constitutionally ban unequal treatment of former slaves and their descendants. Such fundamental changes reflected a basic revolution in who ruled the United States.

The Crisis of the Old Order

The Rise of Sectionalism

Antebellum politics pit Democrats against Whigs, with the former as the nationally dominant party, and the Southern cotton interests as the prevailing faction within the party. Democratic leadership promulgated the US War with Mexico (1846–8), and crushed the efforts of Pennsylvania Congressman David Wilmot to exclude slavery from any territory acquired from the war. Afterwards, politics became quickly sectionalized.

The dominance of the South and slavery had become increasingly anomalous. Of the 31.4 million Americans in 1860, fewer than 394,000 whites owned the 4 million slaves in the 15 states that sanctioned the institution. Then, too, of the 40 largest cities, the dominant slaveholding states accounted for only nine, of which five were actually in border states. Similar statistics on population, immigration, commerce, and industry demonstrate the relatively quicker growth of the non-slaveholding states.

This reflected society more congenial to innovation in every aspect of life. Over the generation leading to war, social movements, ranging from dress reform and vegetarianism to spiritualism and the abolition of capitalism, swept the North. Many entrepreneurs, farmers, and the large free working class of the non-slaveholding states shared the rhetoric of a “producer ideology” espousing the value of “free labor.” The political movement to equalize land ownership inspired the largest national petition drives to date in American history. While this openness characterized the North, slaveholding communities, with few exceptions, remained disinterested or overtly hostile.

With Americans generally believing that the West would shape the nation’s future, rival concerns over the extensive tracts taken from Mexico made slavery a national question with frequently sectional answers. In 1848 some Northern Democrats launched a Free Soil Party for federal limitation on slavery. Others advocated “popular sovereignty,” whereby settlers in each territory would get to vote on the measure, something that raised the possibility of slavery in areas from which it had been excluded. The division contributed to a rare national victory for the Whigs, but it did not prevent a Compromise of 1850 that incorporated “popular sovereignty.”

Members of an honor guard of black troops at Port Hudson, Louisiana, hold rifles with bayonets attached. Due to racial prejudice, most black soldiers were initially not permitted to partake in combat missions. However, black regiments served with distinction in a number of battles, namely at Milliken's Bend, Louisiana, Port Hudson, Louisiana, Petersburg, Virginia, and most famously, the assault on Fort Wagner, South Carolina, in July 1863. (© CORBIS)

Southern Rights Innovations

Through the 1850s, “Southern Rights” Democrats fueled Northern fear of a “Slave Power Conspiracy.” While denying federal power to exclude slavery anywhere, the Southern Rights men asserted the universal and equal right of the owners of any property, including slaves, to exercise ownership anywhere, and insisted that the national authorities impose enforcement of the Fugitive Slave Act on state and local authorities that did not accord slavery any legal existence. The US Supreme Court ruled in Dred Scott v. Sandford (1857) that, anywhere in the country, an African American “had no rights which the white man was bound to respect; and that the negro might justly and lawfully be reduced to slavery for his benefit.”

Slaveholders’ aspirations to control a “golden circle” around the Caribbean inspired Southern Democrats in power to ignore diplomacy, the standards of international conduct, and US Neutrality Acts. They launched a series of American “filibustero” interventions into the Yucatan (1847–55), Mexico (1851, 1852, 1854, 1853–4, 1857), Cuba (1849, 1850, 1851), Nicaragua (1855–7, 1857), Honduras (1860), and as far away as Ecuador.

The old political structure could not moderate these innovations. The remnants of the Whig Party sought to avoid these questions of slavery and expansion from 1854 by reorganizing as an “American Party” around hostility to immigrants. The party combined Whig politics with a suspicion of the German, Irish, Catholics, and other newcomers, which won some local elections from New York to New Orleans, but never overcame local peculiarities to become a coherent national force.

Some of the most prominent Northern Democrats, like Senator Stephen A. Douglas of Illinois, believed the only viable alternative to be “popular sovereignty,” which supposedly left the decision over slavery to the qualified voters in each territory and offered Southern leaders a means to bring slavery into a part of the West from which it had previously been excluded. To provide that this would work, the Congress passed a Kansas-Nebraska Act (May 30, 1854) to pave the way for the admission of the territory to the union.

The Republican Alternative

Opposition to the Kansas-Nebraska Act created the Republican Party. The Free Democrats – those Free Soilers who had remained independent after 1848 – had established some real power across the Northern tier of states, calling for a new “Republican” party to defeat imperial and pro-slavery policies. State conventions in Michigan, Wisconsin, and other states launched parties overtly hostile to the extension of slavery into the territories. Eventually, the national party adopted this stance.

Nevertheless, the Republicans always included some very conservative elements. Some had equivocated on a general hostility to slavery in the territories and wanted to focus exclusively on Kansas. New York’s state organization voted for simple fusion with the remnants of the Whigs and assimilated the politics of that older party. In response, some militants in 1855 launched a multiracial Radical Abolitionist Party that called for the elimination of slavery and racial discrimination everywhere and urged direct action to achieve its goals. Its presence meant the Republicans could not drift so far as to repudiate opposition to slavery in the territories without losing anti-slavery voters.

Even as the Republicans waged their first national campaign, low intensity warfare rumbled through “Bleeding Kansas.” Often with undisguised Southern Democratic sponsorship and filibustering experience, armed bands stuffed ballot boxes and terrorized residents from non-slaveholding states. This strategy drove Northerners uninterested in slavery to become overtly hostile to it, pushed those already anti-slavery towards abolitionism, and forced abolitionists either to leave Kansas or to take up arms.

The determination of Democratic administrations to demonstrate the value of “popular sovereignty” to the Southern Rights faction backfired. As the settlers from the more populous North began clearly outpolling the pro-slavery residents of Kansas, it became clear that the South would not support the leading contender for the nomination, Senator Douglas. Meanwhile, the success of armed resistance in Kansas inspired John Brown to launch an ill-fated attempt to arm the slaves by seizing the Federal Arsenal at Harper’s Ferry, Virginia (October 17–18, 1859).

Revolution by Default

The 1860 Election

The country entered the 1860 elections with its politics sectionalized. The remnants of the old Whig organization ran John Bell on the Constitutional Union ticket, while the Democratic nomination of Stephen A. Douglas led to a bolt by the Southern Rights faction who nominated John C. Breckenridge. The former third party Republican movement settled on Abraham Lincoln.

A backwoods storyteller, Lincoln actually had been born in a log cabin and split rails in his youth before reading law and seeking public office as a Whig. Particularly after his participation in the Black Hawk War against the Indians, he disparaged militarism and mocked imperial ambitions, asking the Young Men’s Lyceum at Springfield in 1838, “Shall we expect some transatlantic military giant, to step the Ocean, and crush us at a blow? Never! All the armies of Europe, Asia and Africa combined . . . could not by force, take a drink from the Ohio, or make a track on the Blue Ridge, in a trial of a thousand years.” Serving a single term in the US Congress, he had lost the seat for opposing the Mexican War. Nevertheless, the 1860 national elections delivered the Republicans a sufficiently distributed plurality of the popular vote to carry the Electoral College and win the presidency.

The Southern Rights faction faced an incoming Lincoln presidency with the weakest mandate of any ever elected to the office, and chose not to cede the power they had held for a generation. The South Carolina legislature called a state convention that voted on December 20, 1860 to secede from the United States. This severely hurt the prospects of those who favored united action by the slave states within the Union, and every subsequent secession further weakened their position. Partly because of this, six more states of the Deep South followed South Carolina, specifically Mississippi (January 9), Florida (January 10), Alabama (January 11), Georgia (January 19), Louisiana (January 26), and Texas (February 1). A convention of transplanted Texans at Mesilla also voted (March 16) to remove the Arizona Territory (present New Mexico and Arizona).

Rebellion from the Top Down

Representatives of the seceded states convened at Montgomery, Alabama to found the Confederate States of America. Despite the “states’ rights” rhetoric of the secessionists, it adopted a Constitution that differed from that of the US primarily in that it centralized more powers in the hands of the president who got a single six-year term and a line-item veto over the Congress. They selected as president and vice president, Jefferson Davis of Mississippi and Alexander Hamilton Stephens of Georgia. Relatively a moderate, Stephens explicitly said of the new government that “its foundations are laid, its corner-stone rests, upon the great truth that the negro is not equal to the white man; that slavery – subordination to the superior race – is his natural and normal condition.”

Northern suspicions that a relatively small but powerful group fostered secession seemed confirmed when eight slave states declined to join the seven that had seceded. Further evidence came with the coordinated attack on some federal installations by state officials before their states had even seceded, specifically the operations of Georgia against Fort Pulaski (January 3); Louisiana against the US Arsenal at Baton Rouge, as well as Forts Jackson and St. Philips (January 10), the US Marine Hospital (January 11), and Fort Pike (January 14) at New Orleans; Florida against Fort Barrancas (January 8) at Pensacola, Fort Marion (January 17) at St. Augustine, and Apalachicola (January 16); Alabama against Forts Gaines and Morgan (January 5) near Mobile; Arkansas against US munitions (February 12) at Napoleon; and Missouri against the US Arsenal (April 19) at Liberty.

The fate of such federal installations in the South sparked open warfare. Secessionist officials moved on national assets at Pensacola, Ship Island, Augusta, and New Orleans. By oversight or luck, federal troops retained control of a number of installations from Fort Taylor at Key West to frontier bases like Fort Filmore and Fort Bliss near El Paso, as well as naval bases like Fort Monroe and the adjacent Gosport Navy Yard at Norfolk. Most importantly, the Confederate forces demanded the Unionist withdrawal in Charleston Harbor, South Carolina from Fort Sumter (April 10), then fired on the fort, compelling its surrender (April 12–13).

Fort Sumter left the Lincoln administration no choice but to ask the states to provide three-month volunteers to suppress the rebellion. In Southern states that had not seceded, officials proved unwilling to help subjugate those that had. The governments of Virginia (April 17), Arkansas (May 6), Tennessee (May 7), and North Carolina (May 20) joined the Confederacy, which moved its capital to Richmond, Virginia, roughly only a hundred miles from the Federal capital at Washington. Other slave state governors simply defied the call for troops.

Unwilling Rebels and Reluctant Revolutionaries

Notwithstanding the wave of volunteerism that came with the outbreak of the war, popular support for secession proved elusive. Southern officials allowed citizens to vote on secession only in Texas (February 23), Virginia (May 23), and Tennessee (June 8). Despite intimidation, death threats, and gross irregularities, over 90,000 citizens of these states voted against secession. Despite war, Unionist majorities persisted in Missouri, Kentucky, western Virginia, northwestern Arkansas, eastern Tennessee, and western North Carolina, as well as parts of Louisiana and the Deep South.

The secessionist authorities in Unionist areas required residents to take oaths of allegiance to the Confederacy or leave, the latter course forfeiting any claim on the Confederate protection of their property or lives. Unionists faced murder, physical assault, and being driven from their homes. As with the Federal installations, formal secession was not necessary for state authorities in places like Missouri to permit the brutalization of Unionist citizens, launching the first rounds of a war of reprisal that lasted years. Not surprisingly, the greatest imposition of secession on Southerners came to the people of the Indian Territory (present Oklahoma). Although the Indians planned to remain neutral, the Confederate combination of diplomacy, duplicity, and military force secured treaties that generally obligated every adult male to military service at the executive order of the Confederate president.

Neither Lincoln nor his cabinet were revolutionaries by intention, but secession both removed the greatest obstacle to change and created circumstances that demanded innovation. For example, since the war would be fought almost entirely in the South and secession left most Southerners – whites, as well as Indians and blacks – no opportunity to vote on the subject, except with their feet, the war created an increasingly large refugee problem and required the Union authorities to address it. Lincoln later expressed his pragmatic approach to the Congress: “The dogmas of the quiet past are inadequate to the stormy present. . . . As our case is new, so we must think anew and act anew. We must disenthrall ourselves, and then we shall save our country.”

War for Union

The Onset of the Fighting

Pragmatism served Lincoln well in securing the border states. Military occupation, the suspension of habeas corpus, and the arrest of legislators secured Maryland, without which the national capital itself would be vulnerable. Both sides temporarily accepted Kentucky’s declaration of neutrality (May 10). However, the Federal authorities sanctioned insurrections against the state authorities in western Virginia and Missouri, where the first real military clashes took place.

As the three-month enlistments neared their end, both sides tested their hopes that a short war would settle the question. The Union army raised to protect Washington inexpertly flanked a Confederate force in Virginia, along Bull Run creek near Manassas (July 21), and drove them from the field, until rebel reinforcements arrived, routing the Federals. A few weeks later, Unionists in Missouri disastrously attacked a much larger combined force of secessionist state militia and Confederates along Wilson’s Creek (August 10), near Springfield. Contrary to secessionist expectations, Unionists brushed off these disheartening defeats, as three-year volunteers replaced the troops being discharged.

These early battles often turned on confusion over uniforms and flags. Some Federal units had worn militia gray and some Confederates wore blue, and, in the fog of battle, the secessionist Stars and Bars looked much like the Stars and Stripes. Both sides began to standardize uniforms and the Confederates adopted the far more famous battle flag with 13 stars on a blue X-shaped cross. As that flag indicates, in addition to the 11 states noted, the Confederacy admitted to membership two additional states. Secessionist members of the state government voted Missouri out of the Union (October 28, 31), and their counterparts in Kentucky followed suit (November 18). Often unacknowledged in textbooks, the admission of these states into the Confederacy speaks volumes more about the underlying secessionist unconcern with public opinion or the niceties of political legitimacy.

So, too, the Civil War did not really become a “total war,” but was one from the beginning whenever it touched on matters of race. In the Indian Territory, most of the Creeks and Seminoles simply refused to cooperate with the Confederate authorities and thousands, together with hundreds of black residents of the territory, converged on Creek lands. Treating this encampment of civilians and mostly noncombatants as a hostile force, Confederates attacked it at Round Mountain (November 19), Chusto-Talashah or Caving Banks (December 9), and finally at Chustenahlah (December 26). In the last, the rebels killed hundreds, including many who tried to surrender, re-enslaved blacks, and sent thousands of Indians on a corpse-strewn route through a winter of exposure, starvation, and disease into the refugee camps of Kansas and Missouri.

So, too, war made slavery an unavoidable issue. The Union declared a blockade of Southern ports and set about building the kind of navy necessary to enforce it, while the Confederacy built small, fast blockade runners to race past the Federal ships. In the interests of the blockade, the Union forces captured Hatteras Inlet (August 28–29) in North Carolina, resisted an attack at Fort Pickens on Santa Rosa Island (October 9) near Pensacola, and captured Port Royal (November 7) and the Sea Islands of South Carolina. Almost immediately, local Federal authorities on these beachheads, and around Fortress Monroe, became overwhelmed by the numbers of runaways fleeing nearby plantations and initially protected them as “contraband of war” rather than returning them to their owners.

The Politics of War, 1861–1862

Despite early defeats, Union forces won stunning successes in the West. When the Confederates moved north, violating Kentucky’s neutrality, both sides poured troops into the state. Towards the southeast end of the state, a large Federal column pushed the rebels back at Mill Springs near Logan’s Crossroads, along Fishing Creek (January 19). Meanwhile, General Ulysses S. Grant combined military forces with an inland river fleet towards the southwest part of the state. His step-by-step operations forced the Confederates to abandon position after position, until his army approached the Kentucky–Tennessee state line. Bombarding the earthen Confederate fortifications on the Tennessee River, Grant received the surrender of Fort Henry (February 6), and repositioned his army to threaten rebel positions on the Cumberland River 10 miles away.

Grant won the first major Union victory of the war when, after several assaults, his men took Fort Donelson (February 14–16), offering as his only terms “Unconditional Surrender” and taking some 15,000 prisoners. This opened the two major waterways between the Appalachians and the Mississippi River for a Union movement on Corinth, Mississippi, where the Confederacy’s east–west rail connections crossed with the north–south rail link from the Ohio River to the Gulf coast. The wheels of the Federal bureaucracy creaked to arrange cooperation between Grant’s force and a second Union army, operating out of different departmental headquarters, which had moved into central Tennessee, capturing Nashville (February 25).

Realizing this, the Confederates amassed an army of about 45,000 at Corinth, Mississippi to destroy Grant’s forces along the Tennessee River before the second Union army could join it. In the battle of Shiloh (April 6–7), some 24,000 of the 110,000 men became casualties. Neither Federal, state, nor local authorities expected battlefield injuries on this scale. In the end, the rebels failed to destroy Grant’s army and lost Corinth to a creepingly cautious Federal campaign (April 29–June 10).

More importantly, the indirect costs of stripping Confederate defenses to make that attack at Shiloh had long-reaching effects. The Union division left to defend Nashville, recognizing that the Confederates had removed the troops immediately to their south, advanced into northern Alabama, seizing Huntsville (April 11), which actually severed that east–west Southern rail link between Corinth and Chattanooga. This threatened an even more important north–side line running through Chattanooga into Georgia. A small group of volunteers earned the first Congressional Medals of Honor for stealing a train near Atlanta and trying to destroy the railroad bridges between there and Chattanooga on April 12.

Developments on both ends of the Mississippi River proved even more devastating. The Confederates fell back from their northern defenses at Columbus, Kentucky to a seemingly more defensible “S”-curve on the Missouri–Tennessee line, but fewer rebels permitted a Federal landing on the Tennessee side, cutting off and forcing the surrender of 3,000 now-isolated defenders of Island Number Ten (April 7), which pushed Confederate defenses back to near Memphis. At the mouth of the river, the largest and most important city in the Confederacy fell into Union hands without a fight, after the Union navy ran the batteries at Forts Jackson and St. Philip (April 16–28) and moved upriver to seize New Orleans (April 25–May 1, 1862). By early summer, Union forces captured Memphis (June 6) and their gunboats steamed before the high bluffs of Vicksburg, Mississippi.

More Confederate reversals took place elsewhere. In Arkansas a Confederate army attacked a smaller southbound Union army that prevailed at Pea Ridge (March 6–8). In the distant New Mexico Territory, Union volunteers from the western territories fought near Santa Fe at Glorietta Pass (March 26–28), forcing the defeated Confederates to make a long, hungry, often lethal march back to the safety of central Texas. On the Atlantic seaboard below Savannah, Federal artillery breached one of the country’s most imposing masonry military structures, Fort Pulaski (April 10–11, 1862).

Such victories contrasted to General George McClellan’s inaction at Washington, even in defiance of direct orders from the commander-in-chief to take the field. McClellan feared the impact of another under-prepared campaign, but he also exaggerated Confederate strength in Virginia. When pressed, he proposed transporting his army to the coast of the Virginia “peninsula” between the James and York rivers and marching on Richmond from the sea. This was possible after the Federals countered the appearance of the Confederate armored ironclad, the CSS Virginia, with a more radically designed ironclad of their own, the USS Monitor, which exchanged indecisive shots for several hours at Hampton Roads (March 9), but the draw denied a Confederate opportunity to challenge Federal control of the waters.

McClellan’s movements brought the largest American army ever raised over poor roads through marshy terrain, and his caution lost any element of surprise. His army bogged down before weak Confederate defenses at Yorktown (April 5–May 4), which bought the rebels time to build stronger defenses and concentrate greater numbers until they had to fight a pitched battle at Seven Pines or Fair Oaks (May 31–June 1), which left McClellan’s army close enough to hear the church bells of Richmond.

As McClellan bombarded Washington with requests for reinforcements, Federal officials grew less likely to send them. Thomas J. “Stonewall” Jackson commanded a small Confederate army of “foot cavalry” that made its initial fight at Kernstown (March 23). As McClellan moved on Richmond, Jackson’s force marched from one end of the valley to the other, meeting small Union armies at McDowell (May 8), Front Royal (May 23) and Winchester (May 25), Cross Keys (June 8) and Port Republic (June 9), effectively rolling the Federals out of the Shenandoah Valley. This forced Washington to build another large Union army to protect Washington, even as Jackson’s little army received orders to hurry to the defense of Richmond.

With their former commander wounded at Seven Pines, the Confederates at Richmond got a new general, Robert E. Lee, who had done poorly in West Virginia and thus seemed a questionable choice. However, under his leadership, the new “Army of Northern Virginia” would fight the larger and better equipped Federal “Army of the Potomac” to a standstill for nearly three more years.

Lee’s almost legendary generalship began by recognizing McClellan’s weakness and using it to his advantage. The Union general, Lee understood, responded to attacks, whether successful or not, by withdrawing to seemingly more defensible positions. Therefore, Lee’s army hit the Federals hard every day over “the Seven Days’

Battles” of Oak Grove (June 25), Beaver Dam Creek or Mechanicsville (June 26), Gaines’ Mill or First Cold Harbor (June 26), Garnett’s Farm or Golding’s Farm (June 27–28), Savage’s Station (June 29), White Oak Swamp or Frayser’s Farm (June 30), and Malvern Hill (July 1). There were about 36,000 casualties out of some 190,000 troops involved. In almost every case, the Federals got the better of the Confederates, but McClellan ordered them to fall back, and ultimately withdrew them from the Richmond area and returned to Washington.

The battles of 1862 were lasting days rather than a few hours, as they had the previous year. The horrific casualty levels reflected the inability of the trained military to adjust to the new technology of war. They built the field tactics and troop evolutions of these close-rank armies around the smoothbores, but the introduction of soft lead “Minié balls” allowed the projectile to expand, making effective rifling of muskets possible. This extended their range three or four times what it had been, but without an accompanying change of tactics.

War as Revolution

Radicalization of the Union War Effort, 1862–1863

The Confederate response to all of these reversals and the manpower drains of unexpectedly bloody battles like Shiloh was to enact conscription (April 16). By the summer, new recruits were no longer volunteers, and desertion became an increasing problem. Although the Federal government later instituted a draft, it was never as numerically large or substantively vital to the war effort as in the South. Each month of the conflict would thereafter bear more crushingly on Southern households and create a mass desertion problem.

The Union response was very different. The scale of slave flight to Federal lines grew with every Union foray into Confederate territory. From the beginning, Union soldiers balked at complying with orders to return runaway slaves to their legal owners. Local commanders like Benjamin Butler had gotten around the problem by declaring slave property to be “contraband of war,” and refusing. In places, blacks and American Indians were volunteering for Union military service.

There exists impressive evidence that Lincoln had always hated the institution of slavery, but he held pragmatic anti-slavery rather than abolitionist views. He had been elected and inaugurated upon a mandate only to prevent the extension of slavery into the western territory. With the unexpected toll of the war, he informed his cabinet (July 22) that he had decided to issue a Preliminary Emancipation Proclamation that would end slavery in those areas in rebellion against the Union as of the end of the year. Willing to take the responsibility for expanding the war goals to include emancipation, Lincoln also wanted to get the issue before the voters in the fall of 1862, so that emancipation would also become the expressed will of the nation. His cabinet convinced him to withhold the announcement until Federal arms won a major victory.

As McClellan’s Federal army moved back towards Washington, “Stonewall” Jackson’s corps hurried back to meet that second Federal army raised to protect Washington, which had started overland towards Richmond. This slowed the advance until the rest of Lee’s Army of Northern Virginia arrived, meeting the Union forces a second time at the old battlefield of Bull Run (August 28–30) in a battle that cost another 22,000 casualties.

This provided the Confederate military with an opportunity to influence the Federal elections through concerted counter-offensives along a thousand-mile front. In the east, Robert E. Lee’s Army of Northern Virginia crossed the Potomac into Maryland, though one part of it invested Harpers Ferry (September 12–15), capturing over 12,000 Union soldiers. Meanwhile, the bulk of the Federal forces, now combined into the Army of the Potomac and under McClellan, moved slowly to locate Lee near Sharpsburg, Maryland and assemble its own units for a concerted attack. The battle of Antietam (September 16–18) cost 23,000 casualties and included the bloodiest single day of the war.

Counter-offensives beyond the mountains also sought to roll back Union gains. Two Confederate armies poured north into Kentucky, overrunning Federal garrisons and threatening Cincinnati on the Ohio River before turning back south, hastened along the way by a major battle at Perryville (October 8). Another counter-offensive sought to dislodge the Federals in northern Mississippi, hitting them at Iuka (September 19), Corinth (October 3–4), and Hatchie’s Bridge or Matamora (October 5). After a summer of Confederate recruitment behind Union lines in Missouri, regular troops moved back into the state, concentrating and thwarting the Federals at Newtonia (September 30) before retreating.

Lincoln issued the Emancipation Proclamation on September 22, and it became the most important issue voters faced in the elections of November 1862. Despite Democratic gains in the House, the administration innovation prevailed.

In the field, Union armies tried to build upon the defeat of the Confederate fall counter-offensives. The Army of the Potomac, under new leadership, failed miserably to push Lee's army aside at Fredericksburg (December 11–15), with a series of assaults that accounted for most of the nearly 13,000 Union casualties, and the Confederates had less than half those losses. In the west, Federal attempts to press the rebels ended at Stones River (December 31, 1862–January 2, 1863), which inflicted 23,500 casualties on the 54,000 participants and at Chickasaw Bayou (December 26–29), where William Tecumseh Sherman, Grant's lieutenant, made the first unsuccessful Federal attempt to storm the defenses of Vicksburg. Beyond the river, Federals turned back a series Confederate drives, ending at Prairie Grove (December 7).

Revolutionizing the Country

The war demanded larger armies and radically increased the logistical problems of recruiting, feeding, equipping, moving, and keeping healthy numbers that eclipsed all but the largest cities on the continent. The implications of this managerial revolution transformed the nation. Before the war, optimistic railroad promoters predicted finishing a line from St. Louis to the Pacific coast in only a few years, but they got less than 40 miles. During the war the government coordinated the repair and replacement of the railroads through central Kentucky and Tennessee because it was necessary to move troops. These changes made the transcontinental railroad realistic.

Financing the war required an unprecedented government debt. This also stimulated an unprecedented economic boom that pulled the country from the depressed conditions that had started with the Panic of 1857 and lasted initially until the Panic of 1873. The greatest beneficiaries, however, likely became the banking institutions, which now had an unprecedented connection with the political authorities.

The impact on industry was transformative. The earliest efforts to build an inland navy on the western rivers, for example, built large factories, forges, and shipyards dramatically creating new industrial neighborhoods at Cincinnati, St. Louis, Louisville, Pittsburg, and other river cities. Brooklyn Navy Yard employed several thousand workers to meet the needs of the war, while those at Boston, Washington, Portsmouth, and elsewhere also began to approach virtually modern industrial sites.

Accelerated industrialization also stimulated a great technological boom, the effects of which would continue beyond the war. Ironclads, rifled muskets, repeating rifles and sidearms, primitive machine guns, balloon reconnaissance, and submarines required rapid and intense research, often under the direct supervision of government authorities. With far fewer resources, the Confederate government even established its own research institution at Augusta.

War created a modern working class. Earlier trade unions largely collapsed when the war came. The largest and most stable, the National Typographical Union, lost about a third of its membership to the military, including its vice president and president (the latter becoming one of three NTU members to win the Medal of Honor). With such vast numbers of workingmen in the field and the demand for labor at home increasing at just that point, the wives, sisters, daughters, and mothers found themselves without male assistance and facing poverty or the job market. Women entered industrial work in unprecedented numbers. They made uniforms, prepared rations, and organized for better conditions and higher pay.

Wartime labor struggles moved all parts of the workforce – from the old crafts through the new industrial shipyards to the working women. The nature of war production and the central role of government in setting the length of the workday established the seed for a politicized labor reform movement. The military sometimes threatened intervention against strikers, and sometimes did so, but the president and his administration, aware of extensive profiteering by the government contractors who employed the workers, sometimes gave tacit encouragement to labor rebelliousness.

Early Republicanism represented a coalition, some components of which still had high expectations. The Lincoln administration promulgated a series of notable innovations, each of which represented a radical innovation justified at the time by the exigencies of the war. These included slave emancipation; the recruitment of non-white soldiers; the order to commission non-whites as officers (ignored in terms of African Americans until late in the war); the beginnings of black suffrage; plans for reforming Indian policy; a Federal Homestead Act, part of the old land reform demands; a Southern Homestead Act, which seemed to presage land redistribution in the South; the government printing of paper currency; and the adoption of a progressive income tax. Many of these innovations were halted or even reversed after the war's end, as the postwar Republican Party experienced a general turnover in its leadership.

The complexities of that coalition created a genuine ambivalence among wartime Federal authorities as to how to deal with Southern Unionism. Almost at the onset of the war, the Lincoln administration recognized the establishment of rival Unionist governments in Missouri, Kentucky, and Virginia, the last of these later giving permission to the western counties to separate and form West Virginia. Moves to establish loyal Unionist governments also took place in Tennessee, Louisiana, North Carolina, Arkansas, and other states. Republicans concerned about fostering disorder balked at encouraging dual power, but so did radicals, who feared the reconstitution of white Southern governments that would exclude the former slaves.

A similar complexity moved the Republican Party groups in the Republican coalition in response to military manpower issues. The demands of the field exhausted the available volunteers early, and the incentive of bounties had limited use in sustaining enlistments. Making up the difference seemed to require a mix of black recruitment and conscription. The more racially conservative Unionists balked at the former, but the alternative was certain to exacerbate class tensions, particularly as those conscripted could avoid going by payment of a commutation fee or hiring a substitute.

Indeed, the promulgation of the first draft in the summer of 1863 inspired escalating anti-Republican, anti-black rhetoric by Democratic politicians, and coincided with staggeringly heavy casualties. Riots, primarily by the more recently arrived Irish underclass in New York City, challenged the limited political will of the civil authorities and the numbers of the local police. There were instances of interracial cooperation against the rioters, but troops had to be rushed to the city to restore order. In the end, though, the authorities drew almost 250,000 names, of whom only about 6 percent served.

In contrast, conscripts quickly came to constitute, conservatively, as much as a third of the forces east of the Mississippi. As the threat of conscription loomed much larger in the South, much greater numbers there than in the North would have joined under the threat of conscription. Such reasons explain the debilitating effect of desertions on Confederate arms, particularly after the war turned dramatically against the prospects of secession in the summer of 1863.

War for Slave Liberation

The Turning Points, 1863

Along the Mississippi River, Grant concentrated an impressive force before the impregnable fortified Confederate works on the river bluffs at Vicksburg, Mississippi. Using his armored gunboats to run these batteries, Grant marched his army downriver on the Louisiana side, planning to cross east to the Mississippi side, abandon his line of supply, and “live off the land.” Confederate batteries thwarted a crossing at Grand Gulf (April 29), but the Federals landed at Bruinsburg and pushed passed the rebels at Port Gibson (May 1). Marching west, Grant defeated the Confederates at Raymond (May 12) and drove a second Confederate army from Mississippi's state capital, Jackson (May 14), after which he marched back towards the river, veering north to drive the Confederates from Champion Hill (May 16) and Big Black River Bridge (May 17) into Vicksburg. Now approaching the bluffs from the interior of the state, Grant reconnected with his supply line and settled down to a siege of Vicksburg (May 18–July 4). The Federals tightened their hold on what became a starving city, turning back a Confederate attack on their supply line upriver at Milliken's Bend (June 7). Simultaneously, the Union forces besieged Port Hudson (May 21–July 9), essentially making the Confederate loss of the entire Mississippi River a question of time.

The “turning point” of the Civil War in the East began with yet another Federal defeat. Lee's success in turning back a much larger Union offensive is generally seen as the most brilliant tactical victory of the war. Attempting to circumvent the Confederate defenses at Fredericksburg on the Rappahannock River, Union troops crossed upriver, hoping to pass through the overgrown and largely unfarmed “Wilderness” for their fourth attempt to march on Richmond. In the face of this larger army, Lee audaciously divided his army, contesting the Federal advance at Chancellorsville (April 30–May 6), while leaving a portion of his force to contest the Union forces at Fredericksburg and turn them back at Salem Church (May 3–4). With the size of his force hidden in the Wilderness and the Federals displaying their usual caution, Lee divided his much smaller army a second time, sending “Stonewall” Jackson on a long flanking march (May 1–2) that successfully rolled up the Union left and ended with Jackson’s mortal wounding by the “friendly fire” of his own picket line. Roughly 30,000 of the 195,000 participants became casualties.

Eastern Confederate successes created a mistaken faith in their ability to forestall indefinitely the impact of numbers and industrial know-how with a mistaken sense that they could overcome them. Southern superiority in the use of cavalry, particularly in Virginia, had been virtually unquestioned, though it came to an abrupt end near Culpepper, at Brandy Station (June 9), where Union horsemen caught the rebels unprepared and noted the absence of infantry support. The Federals realized that Lee’s army had again shifted west into the Shenandoah Valley for a second invasion of the North. Under still another Union commander, the Army of the Potomac countermarched through northern Virginia into Maryland in search of Lee’s army.

Federal cavalry clashed with part of Lee’s infantry, and both sides hurried reinforcements into battle around the crossroads country town of Gettysburg (July 1–3). The first day saw the Federals driven from the field, but with sufficient delays as to permit the establishment of a strong defensive line on the high ground running south of the town. The Confederates tried and failed to take the flanks on the second day. The third saw what many have called the “high-water mark” of the Confederacy in the doomed rebel assault over the open fields before the Union center. As this last day’s fighting demonstrated, all else being equal, victory went to the side with the most, the largest, and the best-supplied artillery.

The losses were overwhelming. Of the 158,000 who fought there, at least 51,000 became casualties. With a few exceptions from places like Antietam, Gettysburg provided the grimmest statistics of unit losses. The recently deployed Twenty-fourth Michigan took 496 into the field and, at the day’s end, only a few dozen men with a single remaining officer answered the roll. The already depleted First Minnesota took 262 men into the battle and lost 215 as casualties. An entire North Carolina company was lost in the fighting. A stunned government arranged for the establishment of a National Cemetery, dedicated with a short address by Lincoln on November 19.

Moreover, within days, the competent management of better resources forced the surrenders along the Mississippi at Vicksburg (July 4) and Port Hudson (July 9), taking 37,000 Confederates prisoner. The Union would replace their losses, but the Confederacy had few reserves left on which to draw.

Beyond the Mississippi River, the Confederates faced other reversals. An attempt to retake bluffs over the river failed miserably at Helena (July 4), and a contingent of Indian, black, and white Unionists defeated a larger Confederate army at Honey Springs (July 17) in the Indian Territory. By the end of the summer, hundreds of draftees who had deserted the Confederates voluntarily turned up to extend the Union line unfolding against the rebel positions at Devil’s Backbone (September 1) near Fort Smith. With such support, Unionists also occupied the state capitol at Little Rock (September 10) and established a nominal control over the area north of the Arkansas River.

The final turning point of the year came in Tennessee. Federal troops there had backed the Confederates out of central Tennessee and pursued what they assumed to be an intact but demoralized army into Georgia. Reinforced by an entire corps from Lee’s army, the Confederates counter-attacked at Chickamauga (September 19–20), which made casualties of nearly 35,000 of the 124,500 soldiers, driving the Union army to Chattanooga, in a bend of the Tennessee River, with the Confederates occupying most of the high ground around them. Grant personally arrived with reinforcements from Vicksburg, and the Union military rebuilt much of the railroads south from Ohio to rush reinforcements from the Army of the Potomac, fresh from its victory at Gettysburg. West of Chattanooga, the reinforcements seized Brown's Ferry and Wauhatchie (October 28–29), opening a "cracker line" to supply the army by river. In succession, the Unionists pushed the Confederates from Orchard Knob (November 23), Lookout Mountain (November 24), and Missionary Ridge (November 25), which ended in a virtual rout of the rebel army. In a related success, the Federals, aided by strong local Unionist sentiment, survived Confederate attacks at Campbell's Station (November 16) and Fort Sanders, also called Fort Loudon (November 29).

Race and the Noncombatants

Progress proved slower in the Union efforts to reach beyond their beachheads on the coasts. Near Charlestown, the newly mustered Fifty-fourth Massachusetts, a regiment of black soldiers officered by whites, made an unsuccessful but heroic assault on Fort Wagner (July 18) in an effort to neutralize Fort Sumter's defenses, but Confederates eventually abandoned Fort Wagner and Battery Gregg (September 6–7). The general reversals of the summer and fall of 1863 confirmed the new emancipationist war goals and were so significant that the Confederacy no longer had any chance to win the war without major Federal mistakes.

Confederate cavalry sought to bring the war north, crossing into Indiana, seizing the old capital at Corydon (July 9) and riding across southern Indiana and Ohio before being forced to surrender at Buffington Island (July 19) on the Ohio River. Farther west, in Kansas, rebel guerrillas in Union uniforms began concentrating in very larger numbers, converging on the old anti-slavery town of Lawrence (August 21). They then ambushed a racially mixed force at Baxter Springs (October 6), in keeping with their formal position that blacks would not be treated as soldiers, but as slaves in rebellion subject to capture and resale or summary execution. White officers were to be treated as instigators of slave rebellion and fit subjects for the fate of John Brown. Nevertheless, blacks began to have a major impact on the course of the war in early 1864. A Union column struck into the interior of Florida in an attempt to sever Confederate supply lines, but the rebels counter-attacked successfully at Olustee (February 20, 1864)

A similarly ill-fated Union campaign west of the Mississippi tried to get to Shreveport, the Trans-Mississippi headquarters of the rebellion. A combined operation moved up the Red River but confronted determined defenders at Mansfield (April 8), inspiring a concentrated force that beat the rebels at Pleasant Hill (April 9) and reached their nearest point to Shreveport the next day. Thereafter, though, concerns about the growing Confederate numbers and the falling waters of the river led the Federals to retreat to Natchitoches and begin moving back down the river. With their ships running aground by mid-May, the Federals raised the water level at Pineville with a hastily constructed dam.

The Camden expedition, moving on Shreveport through Arkansas, faced repeated reversals. This ended in a Union retreat punctuated by Confederate attacks on black soldiers covering the supply trains. The execution of the wounded and prisoners characterized the fights at Poison Spring (April 18), Mark's Mill (April 25), and Jenkin's Ferry (April 30).

The most famous atrocity was ascribed to the troops of Confederate General Nathan Bedford Forrest, a former slave dealer and later Grand Wizard of the postwar Ku Klux Klan. His cavalry had thwarted a Federal offensive into Mississippi at Okolona (February 22), but became more famous for his daring raids against Union supply depots like Paducah (March 25), after which they overran a Union garrison at Fort Pillow (April 12), massacring many of the black soldiers and the white Tennesseans fighting for the Union.

From the onset of the conflict, distinctions between soldiers and civilians and formal standards mandating the humane treatment of prisoners became conditional, particularly in the minds of the weaker, more desperate Confederate forces. White Southerners indifferent or hostile to secession were discouraged by any means the authorities chose to try, and the early Confederate campaigns against the Indians demonstrated that the introduction of race would set aside all considerations of soldierly conduct. By 1864, the introduction of non-white troops into the conflict east of the Mississippi spread this suspension of standards.

The Federal Offensives, 1864

Grant planned a series of offensive campaigns to begin in May. Federal General Benjamin F. Butler moved a racially mixed Army of the James up that river, following McClellan's course of two years before. It crossed the James to get between Richmond and Petersburg and wound up bottled in the “Bermuda Hundred.” However, it would not long be isolated.

Grant’s “overland campaign” proved far more successful than Butler’s but left an entire army of dead Unionists in its wake. Moving by way of Chancellorsville, the 100,000-man Army of the Potomac encountered the 61,000 of Lee’s Army of Northern Virginia in the Wilderness (May 5–6), losing 30,000 casualties before Federal flanking to the left resulted in a battle before Spotsylvania Court House (May 8–21) and another 30,000 casualties. Again moving by the flank, the Federals fought their way across the North Anna River (May 23–26) to assault well entrenched Confederates at Cold Harbor (May 31–June 12), resulting in about 15,500 casualties. Again, Grant shifted the bulk of his army around the Confederates, but, rather than strike at Richmond as Lee expected, Grant sent them about 25 miles farther south, to cross the James River and turn up at Petersburg, threatening to cut off Richmond from the rest of the South. Together, both sides lost about 11,400 casualties in the initial Union assaults on Petersburg (June 15–18). Union casualties over the campaign probably approached 70,000 men, but continued reinforcements left Grant with almost as many at the end of the campaign as he had at the start, while Lee’s lesser losses, perhaps as few as a third of those of the Federals, were irreplaceable. From this point onward, the Army of Northern Virginia would continue to shrink, even with the addition of old men and boys.

Grant’s unrelenting pressure accomplished what no previous Federal leadership in Virginia had. For two years, the Army of Northern Virginia had enjoyed a tactical freedom of movement that permitted it to preoccupy the Federals, but the presence of a Federal army before the capital at Richmond and its link to the rest of the South through Petersburg left Lee no alternative but the attrition of trench warfare. Moreover, as both sides entrenched around Petersburg, the Federals continually reinforced and resupplied. They pushed their line west towards the Jerusalem Plank Road and the Weldon Railroad (June 21–24), ultimately cutting that rail link after Globe Tavern (August 18–21). They also had Pennsylvania coal miners dig a long shaft under the Confederate lines and detonate an explosion at the Crater (July 30).

Losses in the western offensive were probably not as severe, but the outcome was much the same. At about the time Grant launched his offensive into Virginia, General William Tecumseh Sherman led Union forces into Georgia from Chattanooga. The Union forces fought and flanked the Confederates at Rocky Face Ridge (May 7–13), forcing them south towards Atlanta, ridge by ridge and road by road, at Resaca (May 13–15), Adairsville (May 17), New Hope Church (May 25–26), and Dallas (May 26–June 1), culminating in maneuvers around Marietta (June 9–July 3) which included a disastrous attack by the rebels at Kolb’s Farm (June 22) and by the Federals at Kennesaw Mountain (June 27). The Union army began extending a long looping line that eventually threatened to encircle Atlanta. In a mere eight days, aggressive Confederate attacks at Peachtree Creek (July 20), southeast of Atlanta (July 22), and Ezra Church (July 28), caused nearly 23,000 casualties. Additional fighting at Dalton (August 14–15), Lovejoy’s Station (August 20), and Jonesborough (August 31–September 1) ended with the Confederates torching their stores and railroad equipment and abandoning Atlanta to Sherman’s Federals.

Such successes eluded the Union Army before Richmond and Petersburg. However, it became capable of coordinated attacks at both ends of the Confederate line, that is, the railroad and road system southwest and west of Petersburg and the opposite end to the north protecting Richmond. They took the outer defenses of Richmond at New Market Heights and Chaffin’s Farm (September 29–30) while attacking southwest of Petersburg at Peeble’s Farm (September 30). The following month, they hit Fair Oaks (October 27–28) and Boydton Plank Road or Hatcher’s Run (October 27–28).

The Popular Mandate for Emancipation

Lincoln’s bid for reelection overshadowed everything in the last half of 1864. Hoping to skirt the major issues of “the Second American Revolution,” the Democrats adopted a platform opposed to the war and nominated a presidential candidate, General George B. McClellan, who favored the war but not emancipation. Lincoln also faced some initially serious dissent in his own party, largely because of his veto of the Wade-Davis Bill, which imposed conditions for the readmission of the Southern states. Confederate strategists knew that the reelection of Lincoln's persistently aggressive administration would make defeat merely a matter of time.

That summer, a small Confederate column supplied itself through the Shenandoah Valley and moved towards Washington. It brushed aside a Federal force at Monocacy (July 9) and clashed with Union troops on the outskirts of the capital at Fort Stevens (July 11–12) before being driven back into Virginia by the Federals who began destroying the resources of the valley to prevent further another such raid. The two smaller armies clashed repeatedly until fighting at Opequon (September 19), Fisher's Hill (September 21–22), and Cedar Creek (October 19) drove the Confederates out of the Shenandoah.

Renewed combined operations against Charleston, Savannah, and Mobile met success only in the last case, when the Union fleet ran the batteries at Forts Gaines and Morgan and entered Mobile Bay (August 5), capturing Fort Morgan (August 23). In a direct attempt to influence the November elections, a Confederate invasion rampaged through Missouri before being defeated at Westport (October 23) and virtually routed at Mine Creek (October 25), but its political impact ensured the victory not only of the Republicans, but of the most radical factions in Missouri and Kansas.

Defeated before Atlanta, the Confederates in Georgia threatened the railroad link of the Federals at Allatoona (October 5) and unsuccessfully attempted a crossing of the Tennessee River near Decatur (October 26–29). Although delayed, the rebels reached central Tennessee, where their assaults on entrenched Unionists at Franklin (November 30) left nearly 6,300 Confederate casualties, including 65 field officers and 15 generals. Unequipped to survive the winter, they moved onto the heights over the state capital, until the Federals took advantage of a break in the weather to shatter the second largest Confederate army in the field at Nashville (December 15–16).

Sherman's Union army left Atlanta on November 15 for its "March to the Sea" that became the most cited demonstration of "total war." Living off the land, they destroyed not only railroads and public property, but any private property that might be of use to sustaining the rebellion. Its three major columns cut a swath of destruction 60 miles wide and 300 miles to the sea. The Unionists easily overcame their one-sided encounters with the local militia or small groups of Confederate cavalry before seizing Fort McAllister (December 13), near Savannah, and reestablishing contact through the Federal fleet with the government.

After the reversals of 1863, a few desperate Confederate generals had advocated following the Federal example of arming blacks, offering manumission for military service. In the closing hungry weeks of the war, Robert E. Lee persuaded the Confederate government to adopt this measure, and two companies of black Confederates marched through Richmond as those they were defending pelted them with garbage. (Later state governments gave pensions for Confederate service to large numbers of teamsters, cooks, and laborers who had assisted the army, giving rise to a postwar myth that Richmond authorities had armed large numbers of "black Confederates.")

Lincoln's Second Inaugural (March 4) promised "malice towards none and charity for all," but under a restored Union. In an attempt to challenge Grant's stranglehold on Richmond, the Confederates attacked Fort Stedman (March 25). Union cavalry then hit on Five Forks (April 1), which closed all but one escape route from the Confederate capital. The subsequent capture of Petersburg (April 2) forced the rebel evacuation and Federal occupation of Richmond (April 3). Losing a quarter of his army at Saylor's Creek (April 6), Lee found his dwindling Army of Northern Virginia hopelessly cornered near where Lee surrendered it, at Appomattox Court House (April 9). Shortly after, a pro-Confederate group in Washington attacked several Federal officials, assassinating President Lincoln (April 14).

Elsewhere, the war wound down. Sherman's Union army had started through the Carolinas in February and took the surrender in North Carolina of the western rebel army near Durham Station (April 26). At Mobile, the Federals successfully forced the surrenders of Spanish Fort (March 27–April 8) and Fort Blakely (April 2–9), the latter taken by a costly assault in which black soldiers were major participants. Nearby, those remaining Confederates east of the Mississippi surrendered at Citronelle (May 4). Transmississippi Confederates protected the escape routes into Mexico with one last battle at Palmito Ranch (May 12–13) before capitulating at New Orleans (May 26).

The Possibilities and Limits of the Second American Revolution

Resolution of the conflict had required a “total war” that mobilized its respective societies, blurring the distinctions of soldier and civilian. Of an estimated 5.6 million Americans of military age, as many as 3.5 million served in some capacity, with the proportions higher as one went south. Over 623,000 died and as many emerged from the war maimed or in broken health. The roughly 200,000 African Americans in units of “United States Colored Troops” had won the sometimes grudging respect of whites on both sides.

Nevertheless, securing Union victory turned on civic will rather than military power. Radical new thinking came with the exigencies of war and Lincoln’s pragmatism, but both were gone. The new president, Andrew Johnson, saw his tasks simply as the rebuilding of state governments in the South under US authority, while the “Radical Republican” perspective dominated Congress, arguing for a sweeping social reconstruction to eliminate the planter class and foster the development of an educated, economically independent middle class.

Voters in 1866 returned an even more radical Congress, and its tension with the White House resulted in the first attempt to impeach a president. They largely shaped the “Reconstruction Amendments,” additions to the US Constitution to ensure rights to the former slaves. These were: the Thirteenth Amendment (December 6, 1865) eliminating slavery, the Fourteenth (July 28, 1868) assuring due process and equal protection to all; and the Fifteenth (February 3, 1870) assuring voting rights without reference to “race, color, or previous condition of servitude.”

Although frequently seen in sectional terms, Northern business interests eager to return to their pursuits came to favor Johnson’s approach, while the real impulse towards radicalism was the experience of Southerners with secession. In hindsight, Radical Republicanism turned on black suffrage backed by an economic independence, most accessible through radical land reform. Some Radicals argued for such large-scale expropriation of the planter class on the grounds that the landed wealth of the South had been built by the labor of slaves, free blacks, and landless poor whites.

Naturally enough, the capitalism fostered by the war saw the national logic of the Radical argument and already had influence in government fully sufficient to turn policy into other channels. Not surprisingly, what presaged this shift was the reversal of the wartime defense of official Indian loyalty to declare the nations of the Indian Territory disloyal, and their sovereignty and lands forfeited, and making the restoration of good relations contingent on cooperation with railroad and other interests.

Reflecting the postwar hegemony of business concerns, the Republicans elected General U. S. Grant to serve as president from 1869 through 1877. Although unflinchingly loyal and unquestionably anti-slavery, Grant had shared the antebellum conservatism of other West Pointers, voted Democratic in 1860, and was not among the more eager to recruit and use black soldiers. Personally honest to a fault, he headed an administration characterized by massive financial corruption and scandals. After a contested election in 1876, the Democrats ceded the White House to the Republicans, who then withdrew the last of the troops from the South and ended Reconstruction. Almost immediately, white “Redeemer governments” returned to power, disenfranchising many black voters and imposing Jim Crow segregation in the 1890s.

Completing the tasks of Reconstruction after the “Second American Revolution” would take a “Second Reconstruction” by the civil rights movements that coincided with the centennial years of Civil War.

SEE ALSO: American Civil War and Slavery; American Civil War Draft Riots; Anti-Slavery Movement, United States, 1700–1870

References and Suggested Readings

- The Annals of the War, Written by Leading Participants North and South* (1878) Philadelphia: Philadelphia Weekly Times. Reprinted as The Annals of the Civil War. New York: DeCapo Press, 1994.
- Foner, E. (1970) Free Soil, Free Labor, Free Men: The Ideology of the Republican Party Before the Civil War. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Foner, E. (1988) Reconstruction: America’s Unfinished Revolution, 1863–1877. New York: Harper & Row.
- Long, E. B. (1971) The Civil War Day by Day: An Almanac. New York: Da Capo Press.
- McPherson, J. M. (1988) Battle Cry of Freedom: The Civil War Era. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Nevins, A. (1947) Ordeal of the Union, 2 vols. New York: Scribner’s Sons.
- Nevins, A. (1950) The Emergence of Lincoln, 2 vols. New York: Scribner.

- Nevins, A. (1959–71) The War for the Union, 4 vols. New York: Scribner.
- Paludan, P. S. (1988) A People's Contest. New York: Harper & Row.
- The Rebellion Record* (1861–8) 11 vols. Ed. Frank Moore. New York: G. P. Putnam.

American Civil War draft riots

Stacy Warner Maddern

On July 13, 1863, an angry mob of New York's working people began moving uptown from lower Manhattan, gathering workers from workshops and factories along the way. The protest was an expression of collective outrage over the National Conscription Act passed in March 1863, which made all single men aged 20–45 and married men up to 35 subject to a draft lottery. What was particularly offensive to working people was that the Act allowed deferred conscription to anyone able to pay the government a $300 exemption fee.

The white working people of New York City were largely Irish immigrants. Some were skilled laborers, but the vast majority were unskilled and competed directly with the city's African American workers. Such competition created an atmosphere of racial tension and violence in the years before the war, and during the draft riots black citizens became the most identifiable targets for the rioters' rage, resulting in the brutal murder and mutilation of hundreds of African American men. Rioters also attacked white New Yorkers who provided shelter for African Americans, sacking and burning their homes.

In lower Manhattan, Horace Greeley's New York Daily Tribune was set on fire because of its pro-Republican position. The rioters also attacked wealthy citizens, white and black, who they presumed to be Republicans. Because the crowd outnumbered the Metropolitan police force, efforts to contain the rioting were unsuccessful. Furthermore, because the police were a state agency, with political affiliation to the Republican Party, they were subject to attacks as well.

Upon reaching the Provost Marshall's office, the scene of the first draft lottery, the crowd attacked the building, setting it on fire. By evening, the militant protest grew larger and violent attacks were waged on a number of human and institutional targets. City merchants and mercantile establishments became targets of looting and destruction. Because Brooks Brothers was under contract to the federal government to supply clothing to the Union army and had been involved in a labor dispute with 400 of its tailors, it was seen as an anti-labor symbol of the city's wealthiest class and one of the stores was destroyed on the second day of the riots.

On the evening of July 14, Democratic and Republican leaders met to discuss ways of quelling the violence. Republicans urged a declaration of martial law, while Democrats wanted to take less drastic measures. Mayor George Opdyke's refusal to request federal intervention or declare martial law led to sharp political divisions and intense debates among the city's political leaders. What emerged were two very different prescriptions for resolution. Tammany Hall and state Democrats tended to view the riots as viable working-class political protests, while those who had been targets of the rioters – Republican businessmen, merchants, journalists, and politicians – were of the opinion that a full-scale insurrection was underway and could only be suppressed by direct federal action. However, both sides agreed that these were very real tensions of social and economic classes, races, city, and nation that must be addressed.

On July 15, Mayor Opdyke wired Edwin Stanton, Secretary of War, to request federal troops, but refused to declare martial law, an action that would give the federal government control of the city. The mayor wanted a local solution to the protests. Tammany Democrats, meanwhile, were drafting a proposal to pay $2.5 million to cover the $300 draft exemption fees for every New York City conscript in order "to relieve the City of New York from unequal operation of conscription and to encourage volunteering." However, the rioters did not respond positively to the proposal as violence spread into Staten Island and Brooklyn.

On July 16, over 4,000 federal troops arrived in New York City to quell the rioters. By the early morning of July 17, the draft riots would be put down for good after lasting five days. In terms of loss of human life, the "official" death toll was listed at 119. However, speculation suggests that more than 1,000 people may have been killed.

In late August, 1863, the federal draft resumed in New York City, accompanied by 10,000 federal troops stationed there to insure peaceful proceedings. The city's Common Council, largely made up of Tammany Democrats, was able to approve a $3 million exemption fund that was eventually vetoed by Mayor Opdyke. However, the mayor could do nothing to prevent the Board of Supervisors from establishing its own Exemption Committee to pay for replacements, a decision that would guarantee any New Yorker not wanting to fight for the Union to avoid being drafted.

SEE ALSO: American Civil War (1861–1864); American Civil War and Slavery; Anti-Vietnam War Movement, United States

References and Suggested Readings

- Bernstein, I. (1991) The New York City Draft Riots: Their Significance for American Society and Politics in the Age of the Civil War. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Schechter, B. (2007) The Devil's Own Work: The Civil War Draft Riots and the Fight to Reconstruct America. New York: Walker.

American Civil War and slavery

Orville Vernon Burton and Beatrice Burton

In many respects the American Civil War was the largest – and most successful – slave rebellion in the United States. Through African Americans' actions, the Civil War proved successful for the Union, leading to the ratification of the Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution, which protects all citizens from enslavement. The number of fugitive slaves played a pivotal role in the Civil War's success. As early as Abraham Lincoln's election in 1860, many slaves thought the fact that the Republican had been elected president meant that slavery had come to an end. To celebrate Lincoln's inauguration, for example, 17 slaves in Petersburg, Virginia declared their freedom and left their owner's plantation. The number of runaway slaves increased dramatically with the onset of the Civil War.

Runaway slaves usually fled to the Union army camps. Slave owners wanted their slaves returned to them; one owner from a seceding state ironically invoked the federal Fugitive Slave

Law to claim his "property." And the Union troops did not have the infrastructure or supplies to support the large number of refugees. Still, Union officers recognized returning fugitive slaves would only strengthen the Confederacy because slave labor undergirded the Southern economy and allowed whites to focus on the rebellion. The 1857 Dred Scott Supreme Court case had ruled that slaves were property, not people. So early in the war, in May 1861, Union General Benjamin F. Butler offered an ironic twist on the decision, declaring that fugitive slaves were "contraband of war" and so the Union could use them against the South.

That August, Congress legitimized this order by passing the First Confiscation Act. The following March, Congress forbade the military from sending fugitive slaves back to their owners in the Article of War Act, and in April 1862 Lincoln emancipated the District of Columbia slaves and compensated their owners. Congress passed the Second Confiscation Act in July 1862, which declared that slaves from rebellious owners were a military asset to the Union army and so "shall be forever free." In this way, the federal government increasingly took steps toward encouraging enslaved labor in the rebelling states to abandon the plantations.

In the fall of 1862 President Abraham Lincoln gave the Confederacy an ultimatum: either return to the Union with slavery intact, or on January 1, 1863 all slaves in the Confederate states would be freed. Lincoln announced this decision on September 22, but the South refused to rejoin the Union. So, 100 days later, on January 1, 1863, Lincoln issued the Emancipation Proclamation.

The Proclamation, often credited with freeing all slaves, actually had a much narrower scope. A military maneuver, Lincoln's Proclamation freed only the slaves in areas of the Confederacy still in rebellion, not in slaveholding states that had not seceded or in areas under federal control, such as Louisiana. He declared that "all persons held as slaves within any State or designated part of a State, the people whereof shall then be in rebellion against the United States, shall be then, thenceforward, and forever free." He promised that the federal government and Union military would recognize and protect their freedom. This, naturally, led to complications because the Confederacy did not see Lincoln as their president, so his Emancipation Proclamation was moot in states not in control of the Union army, and if the Union army was in control, the slaves were not free. Still, in some cases, slaves learned of the Proclamation, and the African Americans informed the whites of the order. Even before Lincoln issued the Emancipation Proclamation, many slaves took it upon themselves to leave their plantations and emancipate themselves based on news of Lincoln's ultimatum.

Despite its technically limited reach, the Proclamation altered the meaning of the Civil War. Slavery, of course, was the cause of and had always been at the center of the Civil War. The Southern politicians – the white elite slaveholders – wanted to be sure the peculiar institution would not come under attack. Without the threat of a Republican president and fear of abolitionism, white Southerners would not have had cause to leave the Union. The Emancipation Proclamation made the cause of the war more apparent. The war no longer was merely about the preservation of the nation, but now the Union also held a high moral ground, fighting to fulfill the United States' promise of democracy.

When the Civil War first began, the prominent African American leader Frederick Douglass wrote a series of editorials in the Pittsburgh Gazette. His editorial from April 18, 1861 stated clearly there is but one . . . effectual way to suppress and put down the desolating war which the slaveholders and their rebel minions are now waging against the American Government and its loyal citizens. Fire must be met with water, darkness with light, and war for destruction of liberty must be met with war for the destruction of slavery. “The simple way, then, to put an end to the savage and desolating war now waged by the slaveholders, is to strike down slavery itself.”

Now that emancipation was coming to fruition, white Southerners felt most threatened by the part of the Proclamation that sanctioned slave rebellion by stating that governmental authority “will do no act or acts to repress such person, or any of them, in any efforts they may make for their actual freedom.” The document recommended that the people continue peacefully to work for wages and that they “abstain from all violence,” but – previously unheard of in race relations – that admonition against violence did not include “necessary self-defense.”

Along with the new moral stance and the condoning of rebellion and violence, the Emancipation Proclamation also opened the doors to the formation of African American military troops. Before, as a way of keeping slaveholding states in the Union, the military had refused to have fugitive slaves in their lines. Only after the Emancipation Proclamation did the Union officially enlist African Americans; most came from slaveholding states, and especially from Confederate states. In the Emancipation Proclamation, Lincoln encouraged freedmen to join the military. He stated: “And I further declare and make known that such persons of suitable condition, will be received into the armed service of the United States to garrison forts, positions, stations, and other places, and to man vessels of all sorts in said service.” Douglass, whose two sons enlisted, also called on African Americans to join the army. He declared: “A war undertaken and brazenly carried on for the perpetual enslavement of colored men, calls logically and loudly for colored men to help suppress it.” Equating the Civil War with past slave rebellion, he called on his fellow African Americans to “Remember Denmark Vesey of Charleston; remember Nathaniel Turner of Southampton; remember Shields Green and Copeland, who followed noble John Brown, and fell as glorious martyrs for the cause of the slave.”

And African Americans heeded Douglass' call. With the Emancipation Proclamation, new soldiers flooded into the Union army. Despite pay discrimination, thousands of African Americans enlisted in the army. Estimates run from 140,000 to 200,000 African American soldiers fighting in the Civil War. Regardless of the exact numbers, a significant number of African Americans joined the army following the Emancipation Proclamation, renewing Union strength at the same time that the South lost its labor system.

SEE ALSO: Brown, John (1800–1859); Lincoln, Abraham (1809–1865) and African Americans; Nat Turner Rebellion; Vesey's Rebellion

References and Suggested Readings

- Burton, O. V. (2007) Age of Lincoln. New York: Hill & Wang.
- Franklin, J. (1965) The Emancipation Proclamation. Garden City, NY: Anchor Books.
- Hahn, S. (2003) A Nation Under Our Feet: Black Political Struggles in the Rural South, From Slavery

to the Great Migration. Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press.

McPherson, J. (1965) The Negro's Civil War: How American Negroes Felt and Acted During the War for the Union. New York: Pantheon Books.

American left and Howard Zinn (b. 1922)

Ambre Ivol

Howard Zinn came to national prominence with the publication of his bestseller A People's History of the United States from 1492 to the Present (1980). The success of the book is first and foremost a testimony to the social transformations of the 1960s, and the intellectual revisions which ensued. Though anchored in the last century, Zinn remains a political essayist (The Progressive and The Nation magazines) and has supported the global justice movements against neoliberalism triggered by the famous Battle of Seattle in December 1999. He has become an outspoken critic of the War on Terrorism, and at 86 years of age is one of the most famous anti-war intellectuals in the country.

Zinn's view of history came out of half a century of involvement in social movements. Historians have either cast him as a member of the New Left or of the Old Left, thus revealing the ambivalence of his intellectual trajectory. Couched in a language both generational and political, the distinction between the "old" and the "new" hints at the gap – and thus perhaps at the impossibility – of belonging to both eras.

But Zinn's life and work suggest a different story. Most prominent have been his writings about the southern civil rights movement and against the war in Vietnam, which led him to argue against detached scholarship in times of war and social movements. But as important was his activism inside the labor movement as a union organizer for unskilled workers (himself an apprentice) in the Brooklyn Navy Yards in the late 1930s and early 1940s, and as a member of the American Veterans Committee (AVC), a radical alternative to the more conservative American Legion, in the late 1940s. He was a fellow traveler to the American Communist Party but never formally joined, remaining skeptical about its allegiance to the Soviet Union.

Born to a Jewish immigrant working-class family in New York City, Zinn's Weltanschauung was shaped by the hopes of international communism, the Great Depression, and European fascism. His worldview was enriched by the analytical tools of Marxism and the cultural hegemony of Popular Front communism. A volunteer bombardier in World War II from 1941 to 1945, he participated in the last bombing missions over Europe. Though he never questioned the Good War, discussions with a fellow bombardier (a Trotskyist who tried to organize US soldiers), as well as the bombing of the French town of Royan (involving the use of napalm) in the last weeks of the war in Europe, led him to question the morality of militarism.

Moreover, the working-class life he returned to after the war only deepened his commitment to radical politics. He left the navy yards but continued union organizing and was involved in a wildcat strike as a truck-loader working night-shifts. But the spirit of the 1940s was short-lived because of the brutal reconfigurations of national culture during the McCarthy era. Zinn himself was saved from the repressive atmosphere which weakened the labor movement thanks to the GI Bill, which allowed him to go to college. While working toward his PhD in US history at Columbia University, he took up his first full-time teaching position at Spelman College in Atlanta and moved south as the black liberation movement was gathering momentum in 1956.

Though a radical activist for over a decade, he actually came of age as an intellectual as an adult advisor for the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) from 1962 to 1965, sharing the role with longtime activist Ella Baker. Fired from Spelman for insubordination in 1963, he became a freelance historian-participant for the movement until he was hired by Boston University in 1964, where he taught in the political science department for the next twenty years. He soon became an outspoken critic of the war in Vietnam, and was among the first scholars to call for immediate withdrawal of US troops as early as 1967.

Zinn's life illustrates a trend of continuity among generations of political activists and contradicts the generational opposition prevalent in the historiography of the US left. His trajectory reinforces a historical continuity more visible in the black liberation movement and which is embodied in the lives of women activists Rosa Parks (1913–2005) and Ella Baker (1903–86) and unionists A. Philip Randolph (1899–1979) and E. D. Nixon (1899–1987), as well as black internationalist Malcolm X (1925–65) and influential novelist James Baldwin (1924–87). Hence the presence of Zinn as a middle-aged white male in the southern movement (later a supporter of Black Power) further complicates the generational dynamics of the new social movements of the 1960s. Moreover, Zinn then saw the black struggle (and the SNCC especially) as the driving force for a new radical agenda capable of reconfiguring the whole left. Moving away from white-centered politics, his analyses differ from the disparate identity politics which has come to be the collective heritage of the 1960s. Indeed, discrepancies along race, gender, and class lines were to be combined instead of opposed to each other. Moreover, Zinn's early disillusionment with Stalinism (since the Hitler-Stalin Pact of 1939, and then during the Cold War) in the repressive context of the Red Scare (he was interrogated twice by the FBI in the early 1950s) also complicates the generally simplistic view of old leftists idealizing the Soviet Union.

In order to understand the ambivalence of Zinn's political identity, one should recast him as a member of the forgotten "Good War generation." Though remembered as the patriotic generation par excellence (with the major exception of the experiences of African Americans and other minorities), Zinn's story suggests it was in fact quite politically aware, holding the memory of a national culture informed by the popular uprisings of the New Deal era and marked by the contradictions of the war, such as racial discrimination in the US armed forces, the bombing of civilians in Europe and Asia, and the use of two atomic bombs by the United States. Historian Ellen Schrecker (1998) has shown how the "mental contours" of the country were reshaped by the Red Scare and how the "social-democratic consensus" of the late 1940s was aborted, remapping national culture for decades to come. Zinn's life serves as a vivid reminder of this forgotten moment of the late 1940s.

The historical amnesia which then set in would be partly overcome during the 1960s. The left was then organizationally weakened, as class issues had become taboo and the labor movement seemed to have been coopted thanks both to a booming economy and union leaders who accepted the Cold War agenda. But new social movements opened up a space for older activists who had been deprived of networks of activism by the Red Scare. Zinn encountered activists of his generation through the black liberation movement. Civil rights leaders such as World War II veterans Whitney Young (1921–71), Medgar Evers (1925–63), and Amzie Moore (1911–82) became prominent organizers for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and worked with the SNCC. Zinn also became acutely aware of the role of older women in the movement, such as Ella Baker and Fannie Lou Hamer (1917–77). Also, leading pacifist figures of the Vietnam anti-war movement, such as World War II conscientious objector David Dellinger (1915–2004) and Catholic leftists Daniel (b. 1921) and Philip Berrigan (1923–2002), served as important bridges between generations. For older leftists, the 1960s helped to recover from the trauma of the Red Scare. Indeed, the two major organizations of the new left, the SNCC and Students for a Democratic Society, decided to reject the anti-communist consensus and thus signaled, together with growing opposition to the House of Un-American Activities hearings, a readiness to rethink radical politics.

Zinn thus has a double heritage: he is an old left radical who became a new left public intellectual. His class consciousness is embedded in his personal experience of poverty and his union activism. But his race and gender consciousness were shaped by the black liberation movement. Interestingly, his views about war came out of both eras. He revisited the trauma of World War II during trips to North Vietnam as a representative of the US peace movement (with Father Dan Berrigan) and to France in the 1960s. Hence the movement against the war in Vietnam helped older veterans to process their war experiences, and in Zinn's case to draw on it to develop an analysis of US imperialism in his book Postwar America, 1945–1971 (1973). The Good War generation produced novelists Norman Mailer and Kurt Vonnegut who both wrote about their war experiences, and both intellectually came of age in the 1960s. Historian William Appleman Williams became a leading theorist of Cold War revisionism, himself also a World War II veteran. And Zinn's trajectory is a telling example of how McCarthyism prevented a whole generation from coming of age in the 1950s, thus exacerbating a generational approach to leftist politics as new movements arose in the 1960s. Hence, perhaps the very concepts of “old” and “new” lefts are a heritage of the Cold War.

Novelist and political essayist Gore Vidal (b. 1925), himself a member of the Good War generation, has criticized what he calls the “United States of Amnesia” in his book Imperial America (2004). Zinn has tried to restore a sense of continuity in US history. A People’s History is his most popular attempt to bring to life generations of dissenters by drawing on generations of scholars, activists, and artists who recorded this history of resistance. And successive generations of young people have been attracted to his narrative, indeed a powerful antidote against historical amnesia – and generational gaps – in US history.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Vietnam War Movement, United States; Baker, Ella Josephine (1903–1986); Civil Rights Movement, United States, 1960–1965; Civil Rights, United States, Black Power and Backlash, 1965–1978; Civil Rights, United States: Overview; Communist Party of the United States of America (CPUSA); Evers, Medgar (1925–1963); Marxism; Parks, Rosa (1913–2005) and the Montgomery Bus Boycott; Student Movements; Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC); Students for a Democratic Society (SDS)

References and Suggested Readings

- Buhle, P., Buhle, M. J., & Georgakas, D. (1998) Encyclopedia of the American Left. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Carson, C. (1981) In Struggle: SNCC and the Black Awakening of the 1960s. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Dittmer, J. (1994) Local People: The Struggle for Civil Rights in Mississippi. Chicago: University of Illinois Press.
- Long, P. (Ed.) (1969) The New Left: A Collection of Essays. Boston: Porter Sargent.
- Schiffirin, A. (Ed.) (1997) The Cold War and the University: Towards an Intellectual History of the Postwar Years. New York: New Press.
- Schrecker, E. (1998) Many Are the Crimes: McCarthyism in America. Boston: Little, Brown.
- Zinn, H. (1965) SNCC: The New Abolitionists. Boston: Beacon Press.
- Zinn, H. (1967) Vietnam, the Logic of Withdrawal. Boston: Beacon Press.
- Zinn, H. (1997) The Zinn Reader: Writings on Disobedience and Democracy. Boston: Seven Stories Press.

American Revolution of 1776

Mark A. Lause

The power struggle between major European powers in North America created the preconditions for the American Revolution. The term refers primarily to the successful struggle of British colonists for independence and secondarily to the internal social and political upheavals within the colonies. Religious and national rivalries between Catholic Spain and France and the Protestant Netherlands and England framed their transatlantic extension of Western civilization into the Americas.

By the eighteenth century, Britain emerged as the dominant colonizing power on the Atlantic seaboard of North America, though French based in Canada explored and claimed much of the vast interior to the Mississippi River, and the Spanish had a tenuous hold on most of the rest. After a first failed attempt at Roanoke (1585), the English established Jamestown, the inception of Virginia (1607), the plantations of which extended north with Maryland, even as Puritan dissenters from the Church of England, settling at Plymouth (1620), Boston, and other communities later subsumed into Massachusetts. The preoccupations of the English Civil Wars (1642–51) and their aftermath postponed aggressive colonization until the Restoration (1660) of the monarchy, after which it added or reorganized Connecticut, North Carolina, New York, New Jersey, Rhode Island, South Carolina, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, and Delaware. After the establishment of Georgia (1732), 13 adjacent English colonies shared more with each other than with England.

The Crisis of the Old Order

Western Civilization in the New World

Several decisive and overriding differences rendered impossible the replication of European societies in the New World. Native populations in the Americas faced exposure to epidemic diseases to which they had no immunity, and the “Great Dying” took an estimated 80–95 percent of the population often before it had any direct contact with the Europeans. In contrast to Latin America, English settlers displaced the Indians in North America, partly through intensely violent, if localized, conflicts like King Philip's War (1675–6) in New England or the Tuscarora War (1711–13) and the Stono Rebellion (1739) in South Carolina. In central New York, the Iroquois declared wisely, if impossibly, that they would remain neutral in any future colonial wars (1701).

Anglo-America offered tremendous untapped resources and possibilities without having a labor force to realize those possibilities. After experiments with the Indians proved unpromising, the English introduced indentured servants who, in return for passage to America, signed themselves into service for seven years, the system recruiting large numbers of Irish and German peasants rather than English freemen. Those who survived the five-year "seasoning" to regain freedom either returned to Europe or exacerbated the shortage by becoming competitors in the search for cheap labor.

As Virginia turned to tobacco, they imported the first African servants to Jamestown (1619). Thirty years later, contractors brought large numbers of blacks into the Chesapeake. The adoption of comprehensive Slave Codes in Maryland (1661), then in Virginia (1670) and elsewhere, formulated the legal underpinnings of slavery as a lifelong, inherited, and racially defined labor system.

The nascent global imperial system integrated the colonies. The "triangular trade" between North America, the West Indies, and Africa involved the transportation of rum to Africa, slaves to the Indies, and molasses to New England. Most trade within the colonies remained maritime and coastal, although roads linked some of the more important towns. Colonists also manufactured some goods (like beaver pelt hats) for a broader market.

The social formation followed the hierarchic pattern of the old country. Merchants in the seaboard city and the gentlemen-planters on the vast commercial farmlands formed the colonial elites, while the "lower orders" included slaves, indentured servants, day laborers, unskilled workers, farm labor, and a growing group of skilled craftsmen unable to achieve self-employment in their own shops. A significant portion of white men constituted what contemporaries called the "middling sort," mostly small-scale family farmers, professionals, and artisans. Colonial doctors, lawyers, and scientists shared English attainments, and groups like the American Philosophical Society (1743) reflected their interests. Artisans and craftsmen – usually referred to as "mechanicks" – often shared this standing.

Local records indicate that the balance of these groups varied considerably with climate, geography, and levels of settlement. Society became increasingly stratified as one moved from the "frontier" through subsistence farming areas to commercial agriculture. In the last category, wealth concentrated in relatively few hands and required a large propertyless laboring class. The commercial farming society of the Mid-Atlantic "bread basket" colonies with its day labor and indentured servants clearly differed from the plantations of the Chesapeake, where slaves performed the work.

Finally, the nature of urban life meant that the vast majority of city dwellers could not have afforded the cost of even the small amount of land for home ownership, while the elite there did business globally. Only Philadelphia had nearly 70,000 and New York roughly 40,000. These, with Boston, Charleston, and Newport, were the only cities with more than 8,000, although an additional fifteen towns – a total of twenty – had more than 3,000.

English Values in the American Setting

Colonists shared the taste for political debate that had defined the conflict, protest, and upheaval back in England. In royal colonies, governors appointed by the king clashed with assemblies elected by those white males meeting the proper religious and property requirements. These bodies tended to be "bicameral" (two-chambered), with a more broadly elected lower house and an upper chamber (a council or senate) representing a more exclusive franchise. Assembly deliberations often reflected the tensions between the more settled tidewater and the underdeveloped back country. These conflicts erupted in popular upheavals like Virginia's Bacon's Rebellion (July–October 1676), New York's Leisler's Rebellion (May 31, 1689–March 19, 1691), and other risings against local officials of King James II in Maryland and New England during the "Glorious Revolution" (1688) which overthrew James back home.

The late seventeenth-century British experience codified ideas that would be essential to the American Revolution. Thomas Hobbes described monarchy as less a divinely ordained order than a rational social contract necessary to order. Writing after 1688, John Locke enumerated conditions that justified setting aside that contract, specifically emphasizing the centrality of individual liberty.

Despite the English terms of the argument, many of the 3,000,000 colonists had no particular allegiance to Britain. Next to the English, Africans constituted the largest group in the colonies, but several hundred thousand Germans and Scotch-Irish resided there, as did locally significant numbers of Huguenots (French Protestants) in New York, Virginia, South Carolina, and Massachusetts; Jews at Newport, New York, and Charleston; and Dutch or Swedes, who remained in, respectively, New York and Delaware.

Moreover, English settlers did not represent a cross-section of the society at home, where the elite lacked an incentive to migrate and the poor the means to do so. Therefore, the human materials used in the construction of an essentially English hierarchy in the colonies would be the “middling sort” who would essentially reproduce the Old World hierarchies. This filling in of a British social pyramid created an elite that had disproportionately risen in the world, and a lower class of families that had actually experienced a relative decline and often returned to the old country. The former shaped the cultural and social self-perceptions, while the latter became largely unnoticeable. Too, ordinary colonists, if actually free, experienced higher wages because of the labor shortage, greater success due to the expanding economy, and a higher level of literacy and learning.

Among white men, an ideology of secular success emerged, personified by Benjamin Franklin, a printer, who became a major power in the colonies. His annually published Poor Richard's Almanac (1732–57) gained great popularity for interspersing the usual data found in such works with aphorisms and sayings, such as “Early to bed and early to rise, makes a man healthy, wealthy, and wise.” Franklin himself personified this drive for upward mobility through industry and ambition.

This emphasis on individualism drew strength from the dislocations from the faith of their forebears – and the crisis of Puritanism in a yet unpurified world. These inspired non-denominational revivals called the Great Awakening (1739) that appealed to the emotions, emphasized lay preaching, and carried Protestantism still further from the Catholic idea of salvation through ritual sacraments among a community of believers towards the idea of individual redemption.

That kind of self-reliance inspired protests over the checking of their elected assemblies by the appointed royal governors, the royal vetoes of colonial laws and revoking of colonial charters, the British imposition of Writs of Assistance to search for smuggled goods, and the quartering of redcoats in the colonies. In Boston, James Otis argued in a 5-hour oration at the State House (1761) that the writs represented a violation of the natural rights of the colonists that contemporaries saw as an argument for resistance.

Most fundamentally, these values among the colonists strained at their colonial status. Codified in a series of Navigation Acts and Acts of Trade, British policies reflected “mercantilism,” measures European powers established to shape colonial commerce in ways compatible with that of the mother country. Goods going to and from the British colonies were to be carried on British ships and properly taxed. Its colonies were to provide raw materials and purchase manufactures from Britain. With English authorities preoccupied at home, colonial merchants and artisans found their own way around the system, essentially an exaggeration of how Britons behaved at home. The royal authorities called ignoring the law “smuggling,” but were in no position to stop, regulate, or tax it.

The colonists moreover participated loyally alongside British soldiers in fighting King William's War (1689–97), Queen Anne's War (1702–13), and King George's War (1744–8), after which the New World itself became the focus of mid-century tensions between England and France. Conflicting claims to the Ohio valley brought explorers, soldiers, and surveyors into the disputed territory. One of the latter, the 22-year-old George Washington, heard rumors of a combined French and Indian ambush and led the British militia with Indian allies of their own against the French at what became Jumonville Glen (May 28, 1754), an event that sparked what became known as the French and Indian War, or the Seven Years' War in Europe. After the defeat of a British force at Monongahela (July 9, 1755), Washington took command and saved the column. Having also played a vital role in the Hudson Valley and Canada, colonists expected to enjoy its benefits. The Treaty of Paris (February 10, 1763) ceded to the British almost everything east of the Mississippi River.

Prerevolutionary Crisis, 1763–1774

Unwilling to accept this division of territory, the Indian leader Pontiac built a broad alliance of native peoples to prevent the British occupation of the area. After destroying a series of forts, Pontiac surrendered at Detroit on October 31, leaving the fate of his people in British hands. To placate his now more numerous Indian subjects, the authorities issued the Proclamation of 1763, pledging to prevent settlement of the West beyond a certain point.

A succession of British measures sought to address the problems. They also began asserting more control over the more immediate functioning of the colonial economy with the American Revenue Act or “Sugar Act” (April 5, 1764) attempting to collect those taxes on molasses and sugar by reducing the amount owed, and the Currency Act (September 1), controlling the use of paper money by colonists. Finally, hoping to recover some of the costs of the war, Parliament passed the Stamp Act (March 22, 1765), requiring an impressed seal on legal documents, permits, contracts, and printed matter like newspapers, tracts, and playing cards, and authorizing appointment of specially appointed stampmasters to oversee its actual enforcement.

Although colonial assemblies prepared to make their protests, Samuel Adams and others in Boston opted to organize to prevent enforcement of the Stamp Act by forcing the resignation of the stampmasters. Directed by an amorphous “Sons of Liberty,” this resistance had small and secretive local leadership, the “Loyal Nine” in Boston. However, these leaders relied directly upon “mob” actions, which required street leaders like Ebenezer Macintosh, the Boston shoemaker, and John Webber, a Newport sailor, to agitate and manage the crowds of common seamen and mechanics. The August demonstrations in New England generated a great deal more violence and destruction of property than expected, although the “Liberty Boys” held more orderly protests elsewhere. The radical strategy worked, forcing the resignation of the stampmasters.

The gathering of representatives of Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, and South Carolina in the Stamp Act Congress (October 7–25, 1765) voted its resolutions of protest (October 19). While Parliament did repeal the Stamp Act, it passed a Declaratory Act

(March 18, 1766) asserting its authority to levy such taxes. Legislators then sought to establish the precedent with the Townshend Revenue Act (June 15–July 2, 1767). This set up a Board of Customs Commissioners to collect the duties on the imported lead, glass, paint, oil, tea, and paper. With an eye to the Stamp Act Riots, colonial leaders opted for a strategy of “non-importation” – or “boycott” – of British goods. Local committees of correspondence coordinated these efforts.

The strategy both had an impact on Britain and kept the conflict off the streets. However, it also polarized merchants who made their living directly through commerce and “mechanicks,” who benefited from having to make the items not imported. As time went on, the division found reflection in the formation of distinct mechanics’ parties and associations, committed to more militant action.

From Resistance to Revolution: Establishing Dual Power

Moreover, there were dramatic and sometimes violent encounters with the authorities. The British seized John Hancock’s ship Liberty (June 10, 1768), and sent troops to maintain order in Boston. As these occupation troops sought part-time work in the city, tensions flared, most notably in the Boston Massacre (March 5, 1770), where soldiers who had earlier rioted at the ropewalks opened fire on a crowd that included individuals with whom they had earlier brawled. Clashes over a liberty pole raised outside a public house led to New York’s “Battle” of Golden Hill (January 19, 1771). Royal authorities in North Carolina closed the local “War of the Regulation” with back country farmers with the battle of Alamance Creek (May 16, 1771), and Rhode Island radicals attacked and destroyed the British ship Gaspee (June 9, 1772).

By making the duties a dead letter, the colonists encouraged the parliamentary repeal of all but the tax on tea. To save the East India Company, the government bought massive amounts of tea and the Tea Act (April 27–May 10, 1773) authorized moving it to the colonies, where it would be sold at a reduced rate, even with the addition of a tax, to the colonists. Seeing this as a precedent for levying the internal tax, the Boston city fathers protested the measure, and looked the other way when the Sons of Liberty boarded the ships and threw the cargo overboard in the Boston Tea Party (December 16, 1773).

British authorities responded with what the colonists called “the Intolerable Acts.” Parliament’s four “Coercive Acts” aimed at forcing restitution for the destruction of the tea through the Boston Port Act (March 31, 1774) closing the harbor until the community paid for the destruction of property; the Administration of Justice Act and the Massachusetts Government Act (May 20) effectively suspended the colonial government and subjected colonists accused of political crimes to royal justice; and a Quartering Act of 1774 (June 2) making the city responsible for the sheltering and feeding of occupation troops in private homes. The colonists grouped these with a fifth, the Quebec Act (June 22), which placed administration of the western territory west of the Alleghenies and north of the Ohio River under the administration of the King’s Catholic but still orderly subjects in Quebec.

The leadership of other colonies realized that the British assertion of this kind of authority over any colony involved a precedent that had implications beyond Massachusetts. Representatives of 12 of the 13 colonies (all but Georgia) gathered at that point in a general Continental Congress on September 5–October 26, 1774. This First Continental Congress responded to the Coercive Acts with a Colonial Declaration of Rights and Grievances (October 14), demanding the repeal of over a dozen acts of Parliament and agreeing to a Continental Association that would do no business with Britain until the matter was resolved. Britain responded with the New England Restraining Act (March 30, 1775) which barred those colonies from trade with the rest of the empire and from the North Atlantic fisheries. In April the royal officials extended the restrictions to Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Virginia, Maryland, and South Carolina. The British outlawing of colonial assemblies did not abolish those governments but placed their functioning beyond the imperial constitutional structure. This establishment of rival governments sewed the real seeds of independence.

The Outbreak of the War: The New England Phase, 1775–1776

General Thomas Gage, commanding the British military occupation of Boston, had to act against a Massachusetts assembly that just refused to dissolve itself. When the British confiscated munitions and equipment near Boston, the Powder Alarm (September 1, 1774) created a reliable mechanism for watching and communicating about British activities. Town leaders in the area agreed to organize a third of the local militia into special companies of “minutemen.” The system bloodlessly thwarted a British attempt to seize munitions at Salem (February 27, 1775). When the Boston resistance realized that the British were sending a column of about 800 west from the city to seize colonial supplies, Dr. Joseph Warren sent Paul Revere, William Dawes, and others to ride an alert to the Massachusetts officials. When rebels in the Old North Church flashed a prearranged signal, the messengers began their Midnight Ride (April 18–19).

As the English moved west from the city, less than eighty local militia turned out under arms at sunrise to meet the advance of this massive column of regulars at Lexington (April 19, 1775). Their captain was said to have told the men “if they mean to have a war, let it begin here.” The advance companies of the British column wheeled into place against them. When they refused to disperse, shooting began and 18 militia fell as the rest scattered. The later rationalization was that they had bought time for the militia further west to mobilize, but the “first blood” of the war was less a battle than a protest gone terribly wrong. The British reached their goal, where the militia cautiously withdrew across the Old North Bridge to a hill overlooking town. There several hundred militia drove about 115 regulars back into the town.

As the rebel force grew to nearly 2,000, the British regulars abandoned the town and began counter-marching towards Lexington. There, at about 2:30 pm, a reinforcing brigade from Boston brought the British total to about 2,000. By then, about twice as many militias were converging on the road back to Boston, skirmishing and sniping all along the way. Some of the British who returned to Boston had marched 40 miles in 21 hours, 8 under fire, but many never made it back.

Ethan Allen and other settlers from Connecticut had moved north into the New Hampshire Grants, west of land claimed by both that state and New York. Led by radicals like Dr. Thomas Young, settlers adopted the name Vermont and declared their independence simultaneously from Britain and the two states that claimed them. It sought admission to the emerging US but was essentially barred by the two states that still claimed the land. When Vermont also adopted the radical constitution of Pennsylvania, it found itself further isolated.

Rebel leaders, in turn, had their own plans to get at the British artillery and stores at Fort Ticonderoga, a “Gibraltar” built to protect the route up the Hudson River towards Lake Champlain and Canada. Ethan Allen, the Connecticut leader of settlers on the New Hampshire Grants, raised one force, and Benedict Arnold organized a group in Massachusetts. The two combined and elected Allen to lead them. A detachment took the small garrison at Crown Point, while the main force managed, without a shot being fired, to seize Fort Ticonderoga on May 10. Gage’s forces found themselves bottled in Boston by a militia force from Massachusetts and neighboring colonies that grew to 8,000 or more. General William Howe brought 4,000 British reinforcements on May 15, after which they planned an aggressive attempt to break what there was of a siege.

Fearing British plans to cross the Charles River and fortify the Charlestown peninsula, about 1,400 to 1,500 militia, including a number of African Americans, hurried there to dig some defenses, which they mistakenly dug on Breed’s Hill (June 16). In the heat of the next day, it took some 6 hours for the 2,600 redcoats with their wool uniforms and 60-pound field packs to move against the rebels on what most on both sides thought to be Bunker Hill (June 17). The militia lacked discipline, and some began to slip away through the course of the fighting. One officer, variously identified, advised them, “don’t fire until you see the whites of their eyes,” and the ill-trained defenders held against two assaults. British reserves came up for the third attempt, but the defenders had already run out of ammunition, and most had no bayonets with which to turn back the assault.

In the end, the Americans broke and ran, but only after having stood up to some of the best troops in the world for as long as they had powder. British naval fire consumed Charlestown and militia casualties ran to 450, but the British lost 1,054, disproportionately officers, who had been prominent in leading their men forward. Open warfare followed. The British government replaced Gage with Howe, who remained ever cautious after Bunker Hill, and a British naval expedition from Boston burned Falmouth (near present Portland) on October 18, 1775.

The arrival of General George Washington, sent by the Continental Congress, transformed the militia into a Continental Army. After that, Washington occupied Dorchester Heights (March 4, 1776). Although fearing another Bunker Hill, Howe moved into position for an attack, but a late snowstorm gave his officers the opportunity to dissuade him. In the end, he informed the Continentals of his change of plans and, warning that he would burn Boston should the rebels try to interfere, evacuated Boston for Nova Scotia (March 17).

Beyond New England

Virginia, the most populous of the colonies, mobilized and drove from power the royal governor. The determined and coherent assembly convinced the governor, Lord Dunmore, to withdraw with his supporters from the capital at Williamsburg to fall back to the coast near Norfolk. From there, they pillaged the plantations and farms of the rebels, offering freedom to slaves who would run away. The Tories won a skirmish at Kemp’s Landing and then moved south to protect the approach to Norfolk from the Carolinas. There, the British encountered a large Continental force at Great Bridge in early December, which resulted in the withdrawal of Dunmore, the British, and many Tories from the colony. Virginia issued its own Declaration of Rights on June 12, 1776.

A combined Continental naval and military expedition captured New Providence Island in the Bahamas on March 3, 1776, but American naval strategy rested upon privateers (private ships licensed for war duty) under John Barry and John Paul Jones, among others, who inflicted great damage upon British commerce and prestige. Jones, aboard the Bonhomme Richard, captured the British man-of-war Serapis near the English coast at Flamborough Head on September 23, 1779. In the course of the encounter, Jones replied to a call for his surrender, “I have not yet begun to fight.” Although so damaged that it would sink later that day, the Bonhomme Richard continued to fight until the British surrendered and allowed the Americans to board the Serapis.

A Continental move into Canada grew directly out of the experience of these colonists who had helped Britain take the area from France. General Richard Montgomery led about 1,700 Continentals north towards Montreal, and Arnold took 750 towards Quebec. Montgomery's column quickly besieged about 300 enemy infantry at Fort St. Jean (August 21–November 3) on the Richelieu River at the north end of Lake Champlain. The British won but refused to compromise the security of Quebec by moving forward any of its 2000-man force at Montreal.

During the siege, Ethan Allen led a detachment of about 200 of Montgomery's men towards Montreal, where they met about 260 of the enemy on the banks of the St. Lawrence at Longue-Pointe (September 24). The Americans were turned back and Allen himself captured, but the intransigence of the British command in bringing forward its large force at Montreal led to a disintegration of much of the militia. With the surrender of Fort St. Jean, the Continentals occupied Montreal (November 13).

By this point, Arnold had 600 men poised above Quebec on the Plains of Abraham, while Montgomery was supposed to be moving 300 of his force against the lower town, protected by only 100 British regulars supplemented by hundreds of militia. In the attack on Quebec (December 31), Montgomery was killed and Arnold badly wounded. Having failed miserably to take the city by storm, Arnold held the tattered remains of his expedition together through the winter, and American reinforcements arrived in March 1776, bringing the total to 2,000. These had to retreat to New York when 8,000 British arrived in May.

The reinforced British moved quickly, driving the Continentals back up the St. Lawrence. They captured over 500 Americans at Les Cèdres (May 15–16, 1776), though about 2,500 Americans tried a strong counter-attack on 3,000 British pursuers at Trois-Rivières (June 8) about half-way to Montreal. Arnold abandoned Montreal on June 15.

The US Navy claims to have fought its first engagement at Valcour Bay or Valcour Island (October 11–13). Although defeated, Arnold had delayed the British sufficiently to where winter would immobilize them until the spring.

War for Independence: Toward a New Nation

By 1776 what had begun as an armed protest was beginning to turn into a revolution. The British government, claiming to be suppressing a rebellion of Englishmen, contracted to hire Hessian troops for use against them. Meanwhile, the colonists formed a Second Continental Congress on May 10, 1775 at Philadelphia. While offering its Olive Branch Petition to Britain, it appointed Washington the commander of a unified Continental Army and issued its Declaration of the Causes and Necessity of Taking up Arms on July 6, 1775. Thomas Paine's Common Sense appeared in January of 1776 and urged that the colonies embrace independence not only as a practical necessity under the circumstances, but as an opportunity to transform the New World into a new kind of civilization. This pamphlet eventually became a published work second in readership only to the Bible.

Because most of the old proprietary government of Pennsylvania clung to the imperial regime, its overthrow became essential to American independence. The radicals favorable to independence clashed with the conservatives over assembly elections, but this failed amid charges of widespread vote fraud and large-scale exclusion of Germans. The Continental Congress subsequently passed a resolution authorizing colonists to establish new institutions where "no government sufficient to the exigencies of their affairs has been hitherto established." Some 4,000 Philadelphians then demonstrated outside the State House for both American Independence and a new constitution. The Committee of Privates, based in the militia, then organized elections for a constitutional convention at Carpenters' Hall.

Richard Henry Lee proposed independence on June 7, and the Congress appointed a committee of five to write a declaration in justification of the move. The committee, in turn, left the initial draft to Thomas Jefferson. The Congress voted for independence on July 2 and sent the declaration to be signed at the printer's on July 4. The declaration not only protested the specific acts of George III, but began with a concise statement of basic Enlightenment assumptions about government and human rights that remain essential, if selectively ignored, to the modern world:

We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness. – That to secure these rights, Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed, – That whenever any Form of Government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the Right of the People to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new Government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their Safety and Happiness.

The vagaries of these assertions reflect the ambiguities implicit in the coalition that had resisted the British, read Common Sense, and wanted independence.

The Mid-Atlantic War: New York to Philadelphia, 1776–1778

Despite the earlier expulsion of the British from Virginia, fighting continued to take place in the South. North Carolina Patriots mobilized to block a march by Loyalists to a rendezvous with the British north of Wilmington, routing them at Moore's Creek on February 27, 1776. In Charleston Harbor, the Continentals used palmetto trunks to protect against the unsuccessful British barrage on the Sullivan's Island emplacements that later became Fort Moultrie.

Still, after the British evacuation of Boston, it was clear that they would need a major seaport from which to manage and supply the subjugation of the colonies. The best target, for a myriad of reasons, would be New York. The British enjoyed an unchallenged and unchallengeable naval superiority and July brought into the harbor Howe's massive army that vastly outnumbered the Continentals. Washington saw no viable plan for defending the vast islands and inlets of New York or for reinforcing or evacuating any part of the area. Nobody could have stopped the British from landing in the area, and it was virtually unimaginable to slow or stop them. However, it would have been politically impossible to abandon the area to the British without a fight, so Washington took an untried revolutionary army and entered into a failing campaign.

The British landed at Staten Island and bided time until they had sufficient force to sweep the Americans from the area. After six weeks, they began transporting what became over 20,000 men across the narrows to Brooklyn. Half of the Continentals waited on Manhattan, while the other half took defensive positions around Flatbush, meeting the British in the battle of Long Island from August 27–30. British General Henry Clinton then led a night march that seized Jamaica Pass, turning the Continentals' left flank, and the subsequent fighting proved very one-sided. The battle ended with a remarkably fortunate night evacuation of some 9,000 Continentals.

The experience on Long Island underscored the problems of defending Manhattan with a small force that could not possibly block all possible points of landing. A few weeks after the fighting in Brooklyn, Howe landed some 4,000 British troops at Kip's Bay on Manhattan (near present 34th Street). With reinforcements landing throughout the day, they easily maneuvered the rebels out of New York City on September 15. Some 2,000 Continentals then took positions in the rugged terrain of the island north of the city (present Morningside Heights and west Harlem), where they met a British force that eventually grew to about 5,000. The fighting at Harlem Heights on September 16 ended when Lord Charles Cornwallis arrived with fresh British troops.

This dismal period gave rise to some of the great legends of the Revolution. In New York, the Connecticut schoolteacher-turned-spy Nathan Hale faced his British executioners on September 22 with "I only regret that I have but one life to lose for my country." Thomas Paine, participating in the dismal retreat across New Jersey, wrote the first of his Crisis papers: "These are the times that try men's souls: The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will, in this crisis, shrink from the service of his country; but he that stands it now, deserves the love and thanks of man and woman." Continentals could draw little inspiration from their rear guard actions at Pell's Point (October 18) in the Bronx, and at White Plains (October 28).

What the British did while they controlled New York provided a standing argument against an American acquiescence to the reestablishment of royal authority in the New World. In the aftermath of the battle, the city lost 400 to 500 buildings in the great fire of New York (September 21–22), which each side blamed on the other. The city provided the base for devastating raids that destroyed Danbury (April 25–26), Fairfield (July 8), Norwalk (July 10), and other Connecticut communities. The British hold on New York made it a special nightmare for legions of American prisoners, some 11,000 of whom died of malnutrition, exposure, mistreatment, and disease in the overcrowded prison ships moored on the Brooklyn side of the East River at Wallabout Bay.

Based at Philadelphia, the Continental government struggled to survive and desperately sought some demonstration of the continued viability of the Revolution while Washington gambled on an unexpected counter-attack, crossing the Delaware and capturing nearly a thousand Hessians at Trenton (December 26). Expecting a strong British drive from Princeton towards his position, Washington held the British at a Second Battle of Trenton (January 2) before slipping away. Rather than retreat across the Delaware into Pennsylvania, though, Washington took his army by back roads to strike the British successfully at Princeton (January 3, 1777) before going into winter quarters at Morristown (January 6–May 28). In the spring, the British marched from New Brunswick and routed a small part of the Continental Army at Bound Brook (April 13), but then counter-marched back toward New York.

Howe assembled and transported about 17,000 men to the upper Chesapeake (August 25) and then began moving north toward Philadelphia, the seat of the rebel government. Washington had fewer than 11,000 to stop him. After several days of preliminary harassment, the Continentals met Howe's British advance at Cooch's Bridge on September 3, 1777 in Delaware, but the redcoats pressed on, inflicting a major defeat on the Continentals at Brandywine Creek (September 10).

In the aftermath of the defeat, disasters compounded each other. Washington's attempt to counter-attack the British was rained out in the Battle of the Clouds on September 16. The British occupied Philadelphia (September 26), putting the Continental government to flight, and Washington's counter-attack at Germantown on October 4 failed miserably. The British failed to capture Fort Mercer (October 22) but captured Fort Mifflin (November 16). When Howe heard that Washington was moving off for the winter, he made a final attempt to lure the Continental Army into a position in which it could be destroyed, but several days of inconclusive skirmishing at White Marsh (December 5–8) ended with Howe's withdrawal to Philadelphia.

The Turning Point

The previous year, American resistance on Lake Champlain, though ending in defeat (October 11, 1776), had put an end to British ambitions to invade the Hudson Valley. The operation, under General John Burgoyne, looked simple on a map. He was to push south from Canada, while Howe kept the bulk of the Continental forces pre-occupied to around New York City. In fact, the French had tried the same thing in the Seven Years' War and the poor roads and logistical problems had dissipated their efforts.

Initially, Burgoyne did quite well, moving three columns south through New York. His forces captured Fort Ticonderoga (July 5–6, 1777) and attacked the Continentals' rear guard at Hubbardton (July 7). However, the column charged with moving through the Mohawk Valley failed to reduce Fort Schuyler (old Fort Stanwix) on August 3, and an American relief column struck the redcoats at Oriskany on August 6. Then, a detachment of Hessians met disaster at Bennington on August 16. The farther south the expedition pressed, the more distant they were from their line of supply and the more Continental militia they faced.

The American occupation of strong defensive positions on Bemis Heights over the Hudson River blocked Burgoyne's way south. About 9 miles south of Saratoga, he concentrated his army on the west side of the Hudson and tried to sweep the Continentals from the high ground in the battle of Freeman's Farm, or Saratoga (September 19). This ended with both sides unable to gain ground. Burgoyne realized that his force was down to 6,000 with no reinforcements and dwindling supplies, while the Continentals had a total of about 7,000 and growing.

The British made a second attempt at Bemis Heights, or Second Saratoga, on October 7, but the Continentals held their ground, largely due to the personal leadership of Benedict Arnold. By the end, Burgoyne had lost enough to where he was outnumbered and his army pulled back several miles to the north. In the end, Burgoyne and 5,791 of his men surrendered (October 17).

Meanwhile, the British at New York City did little to relieve the pressure on Burgoyne. They engaged the Continentals at Fort Clinton and Fort Montgomery (October 6, 1777) near Bear Mountain.

Soon after, Washington's Continental Army went into another desperate winter at Valley Forge (December 19, 1777–June 19, 1778). However, the arrival of Frederick William Rudolph Gerald Augustus von Steuben, Baron von Steuben, brought the best European battlefield tactics to the rebels and used the hiatus to begin the serious training and drill of the Continentals. More importantly, the French recognized the US and concluded a military alliance on February 6, 1778, landing troops in Rhode Island by the following August.

The British sought to improve their performance from the top down, replacing Howe with General Henry Clinton on March 7, 1778. As Washington bestirred his army, a small force under Lafayette, sent to screen his movements, clashed with the British at Barren Hill (May 20).

As Clinton began withdrawing toward New York, Washington attacked his rear guard at Monmouth on June 28. Both sides had a bit over 13,000 men, and the horrific heat, which probably topped 100 degrees, kept the fight inconclusive, but it was the largest pitched battle of the war, and the Continentals well demonstrated that they could stand up to the best of the British, which they could not have done earlier. Indeed, they displayed a persistence and combativeness that unnerved British strategists. "Mad" Anthony Wayne defeated and captured most of the British garrison of 700 at Stony Point (July 15–16, 1779) and "Light Horse" Harry Lee made a bold night attack on British Paulus Hook (August 19) in New Jersey.

Republican Liberties and Imperial Rivalries: Whose Revolution?

In the wake of the French, Spain agreed to enter the war on April 12, 1779. The united Provinces of the Netherlands then decided to join the alliance, and England declared war on Holland on December 20, 1780. Thus, the war reached global proportions.

A number of internal tensions surfaced among the revolutionary forces. Some of the newly independent states, such as New Hampshire, kept many of the same officials, while others, notably Pennsylvania, experienced an almost complete turnover in the government of the state. More important was the structure of government itself. Since the colonists had overthrown their existing governments, closed courts, and drove British agents and governors from their homes, they needed to establish a new framework within which they could govern themselves. Some simply kept their colonial charters, deleting the references to the king. Others sought a far more thorough transformation.

The course of Pennsylvania reflected some of the arguments of Common Sense that went beyond mere independence. Paine had argued for a structure of government that, in effect, would supersede professional office holding by vesting power exclusively in the hands of a single representative assembly, the members of which would serve for a year and not succeed themselves in office. Executive power, in the hands of a presiding officer, would be directly dependent on the representatives and any process of judicial review would be in the hands of a committee of censors chosen from the assembly. Other tracts like The People the Best Governors expressed similarly egalitarian and republican views. Farmers and artisans generally supported Pennsylvania's new constitution that lowered the property requirement for voting to almost nothing, and established a unicameral legislature, but the elite resisted the functioning of the most radically representative government in the former colonies.

The resident Continental government tolerated such republicanism, but did not share the arguments of Common Sense. In response, John Adams penned his far less popular but much more influential Thoughts on Government. Adams rejected purely representative institutions for a "mixed" government, which he, like contemporaries, saw embodied in the British system. Adams hoped to incorporate into his system the alleged virtues of monarchy in a fully independent executive branch with extensive authorities to appoint officials and the power to veto legislative enactments. He also hoped to preserve the bicameral system with a co-equal, deliberately non-representative upper house. Significant property requirements for voting would also confine citizenship to those with wealth at stake in the deliberations of government.

These differences largely reflected the extent to which the previously disenfranchised were capable of influencing events. Massachusetts and New York adopted largely conservative structures, partly because the artisans of Boston and New York City had either scattered or were excluded by the British occupation. In contrast, Pennsylvania's radical course reflected a mobilized artisan base in Philadelphia, and officials in other states waged a persistent struggle against it, until the state adopted a similarly bicameral and hierarchic structure in 1790.

As all these events strangled commerce, urban prices exploded and radicals began mobilizing against profiteering. “Joyce Junior,” a figure who had mobilized Boston crowds against the Stamp Act, now led mixed “mobs” of workingmen and market women against merchants believed to be gouging prices. Sanctioned by their radical government, Philadelphians formed price-fixing committees and confronted local businessmen in a series of meetings and demonstrations, culminating in the Fort Wilson Riot on October 4, 1779, in which armed Americans confronted each other.

The mixed nature of the American Revolution and its impact is more evident when looking to the rural folk, who had less contact with and hostility towards the British. Particularly outside of New England, they remained more ambivalent. Tenants of rebel landlords in New York or more recent immigrants in the Carolinas would have been as likely as not to have seen the Revolution as a hypocritical disordering force and remained loyal to Britain. Where they sided with the Revolution, as did the settlers on the New Hampshire Grants, they could be very independent. Their “fourteenth” state, Vermont, not only declared its independence from New Hampshire and New York, but adopted Pennsylvania’s radical constitution. It would not be admitted to the US until well after the Revolution.

Social tensions also strained the Continental Army. One of the more conservative American leaders, General Benedict Arnold, had a long history of hostility to the radicals in Pennsylvania. Despairing of the future of the Revolution, he made arrangements to cede West Point to the British (September 21–25, 1780). Discontent with officers, non-payment of the paltry wages due the soldiers, payment in grossly inflated paper script, and similar grievances became worse towards the end of the war, when soldiers were held in service beyond their term of enlistment. After a series of mass desertions and mutinies, the entire Pennsylvania Line rose up and marched on the government (January 1–7, 1781), demanding their discharge with the option of reenlistment. A similar mutiny by the New Jersey Line (January 20–27, 1781) was put down in blood.

The Revolution certainly improved some features of the position of women, though that varied so widely depending on circumstances. Not only did some women such as Abigail Adams and Mercy Otis Warren emerge as individuals from the sources, but the Revolution also offered glimpses of some women in far less social prominence, such as the elusive “Molly Pitcher,” one of the many women who brought water to the men in the midst of battle and, in the case of the battle of Monmouth, replaced a wounded soldier at his post at a battery of artillery. They participated in crowd activities and returned to spinning and weaving to make the boycotted materials. In the end, some women gained additional rights. Divorce became easier in some states, and some propertied women got the right to vote in parts of Connecticut and New Jersey.

The Revolution did change the circumstances of many African Americans. Thousands joined the Continental Army, though the British sometimes positioned themselves as supporters of slave liberation against the hypocritical slaveholding Continentals. Most Revolutionary leaders believed that Independence would put slavery on the road to extinction, ended the transatlantic slave trade, and ultimately eliminated slavery in half the state.

The indigenous peoples would be the great losers of the American Revolution, as the colonists brushed aside the Proclamation of 1763. Insofar as Native Americans became involved, they wisely sided with the British. South of the Ohio River, Daniel Boone led the first white settlers into what became Kentucky (1775), clashing repeatedly with Indian allies of the British. In New York, Continentals after Oriskany entered the river valleys of the Iroquois Confederacy and began the “Burning of the Valleys” to drive potential allies of the British from the area. A Virginia expedition under George Rogers Clark crossed the mountains and descended the Ohio River, beaching their boats at abandoned Fort Massac in present Illinois. They walked overland to surprise and capture Kaskaskia (July 4, 1778), and, with support of local French inhabitants, secured Fort Sackville and the trading village of Vincennes (present Indiana). British Governor Henry Hamilton, however, led a force that personally retook these posts. In February, Clark led 172 volunteers on a desperate trek through over 200 miles of “drowned country” to retake it. Convincing the British that he had more than three times as many men as he did, he threatened to storm the garrison, giving no quarter, driving home this threat by personally tomahawking Indian prisoners. The British surrendered Fort Vincennes on February 25.

The Continentals never managed to mount a force to seize the British base at Detroit. However, the British could never seriously challenge the allies in their control over the interior of the continent. Indeed, although vastly outnumbered, the Spanish turned back a British-organized Indian attack on the tiny settlement of St. Louis (May 26, 1780). By then, the British pinned their hopes for success on the South, in part because of the high proportion of Loyalists among the planter elite there.

War in the South: The Final Phase 1778–1781

The different styles of warfare also inspired a series of Continental charges of British atrocities. These included the Paoli Massacre (September 21, 1777); the Wyoming Valley Massacre (July 3, 1778); the Baylor Massacre (present River Vale, NJ) (September 27, 1778); and the Tappan Massacre (September 28, 1779). Most of these seem to have largely reflected the fondness of some redcoats for the bayonet, a weapon to which the Continentals never warmed.

The British occupied Savannah, Georgia on December 29, 1778. As the winter permitted, they attempted to expand their holdings along the coast at Beaufort or Port Royal Island (February 3, 1779), and they began recruiting Loyalists. The Americans caught 340 of them encamped at Kettle Creek (February 14), however, and inflicted a defeat sufficiently humiliating to dampen enthusiasm for actively joining the Crown's cause. After another raid on Charleston, the Continentals made an all night march to attack the British, who sought to establish a garrison on New Cut Church Flats, covering Stono Ferry. They suffered heavy losses, made worse by the heat and exhaustion.

A joint Franco-American force of 5,000 then besieged the 3,200 British in Savannah (September 16–October 18). The effort included a major assault on October 9, which mortally wounded Count Kazimierz Pulaski among the Continentals. Several hundred free blacks from Saint-Domingue also fought among the French allies.

The arrival of Clinton and 14,000 British in South Carolina besieged and forced the surrender of Charleston on May 12, 1780 with its 5,000 defenders. Thereafter, Clinton returned to New York, leaving Lord Charles Cornwallis with instructions to finish the subjugation of South Carolina and continue into North Carolina. American reinforcements on their way south counter-marched, but Banastre Tarleton's "British Legion," composed of local Loyalists, caught up with – and overran – the Continentals near the border with North Carolina, at Waxhaw Creek on May 29. American accounts indicate that some 113 of the 350 soldiers attacked and were killed, allegedly after trying to surrender. Rebels later used this in justifying incidents in which Tories were given "Tarleton's Quarter."

In general, the British won victories in the field but made little headway in the overall war. Americans responded in large part by a guerilla war conducted by leaders like Francis Marion, a veteran Indian fighter and planter on the Santee River who used local knowledge of the terrain and excellent intelligence to execute hit-and-run guerilla tactics against the occupation. (Tarleton referred to him as the Swamp Fox.) With such tactics, Americans routed a British force at Ramseur's Mill (June 20) in North Carolina and at Hanging Rock (August 6) in South Carolina. Most importantly, the Continentals raised a new force. General Horatio Gates quickly marched over 4,000 southward, encountering a British force of roughly 2,200 under Lord Cornwallis just north of Camden (August 16).

Cornwallis entered North Carolina in September. A loyalist contingent under independent command near the border with South Carolina warned locals that they would "lay waste to their country with fire and sword" should resistance continue. Various independent units of frontier militia converged on the British at King's Mountain (October 7). Using tactics learned from the Indians, the Continentals kept moving and under cover, taking little longer than an hour to force the surrender of the loyalists, though some of the rebels apparently shot some trying to surrender.

Soon after, Washington assigned Nathanael Greene (October 14) to take charge of the rebel forces in the South. That winter, the Americans also turned back a careless pursuit by Tarleton's 1,100 Loyalists near the cattle-grazing site of the Cowpens on January 17, 1781, from which a mere 260 British escaped. The spring would end British illusions that they had actually gained anything in the South.

Cornwallis moved decisively to destroy Greene's troublesome little army in North Carolina, but Greene turned on the British at Guilford Court House (March 15). The British attacks broke on a succession of American lines, leaving a battle reduced into bitter hand-to-hand fighting. To resolve this, Cornwallis ordered his artillery to fire indiscriminately into the contested part of the field, after which the Continentals quickly fell back, but the British had lost a third of their men and still faced a Continental Army. Convinced that they could not retain territory, the British decided to concentrate their forces in Virginia and, that May, Cornwallis disembarked from Wilmington for Virginia.

Rather than follow Cornwallis, though, Greene took his forces back into South Carolina. Despite defeats like Hobkirk's Hill (April 25) near Camden, or the two attacks around Eutaw Springs at Fort Ninety-Six (May 22, September 8), the Continentals began gradually retaking everything the British had seized earlier beyond Charleston and Savannah.

Once landed in Virginia, Cornwallis effectively established a base for his 7,000 to 8,000 men on part of the old Virginia Peninsula, the site of the original British settlements in the New World. His forces drove back the Continentals near Green Springs Farm on July 6, 1781, but faced enough serious opposition that they settled near Yorktown to await a juncture with more British forces. From here, everything went wrong. A French fleet under Admiral François Joseph Paul, Marquis de Grasse, thwarted the attempt of the Royal Navy to reach Cornwallis, defeating it at the mouth of the Chesapeake (September 5). American and French land forces under Washington and Jean-Baptiste Donatien de Vimeur, Comte de Rochambeau, backed Cornwallis to Yorktown (October 6–19), where he awaited help from the navy until Admiral de Grasse showed up with the French fleet. After a remarkable joint night operation where the French and Americans respectively captured two redoubts overlooking the York River (October 14), Cornwallis surrendered his army (October 19). As the imperial troops filed out of their positions, the British bands played "The World Turned Upside Down," a tune from the English Revolution.

Whose Victory?

By the time of the surrender, the US had already emerged from the war. After the Congressional writing of the Articles of Confederation (November 15, 1777), enough of the rebellious colonies had adopted it for ratification (March 2, 1781) to secure a unified national authority.

News of Yorktown prompted Parliament to abandon plans for military subjugation, and Lord North resigned as British prime minister (March 20, 1782). By default, then, the mother country ceded the US its existence. Thereafter, the British evacuated Savannah (July 11, 1782), Charleston (December 14, 1782), and New York (November 25, 1783).

However, the War for American Independence continued for almost two years after Yorktown, as great empires strove to shift the balances of power among themselves. American alliances made the Revolution. Not surprisingly, the naval war became intense in the West Indies where the French threatened the British sugar plantations. The French seized and held Saint Vincent Cape (1779–83), although the Royal Navy defeated the French at Les Saintes (April 12, 1782).

Fighting also took place across European waters. British and French ships fought twice in the waters near Ushant (July 27, 1778, December 12, 1781), the second clearly reaffirming the superiority of British naval power. The British fleet also reaffirmed its superiority over Spanish naval power at Cape Saint Vincent (January 16, 1780) off the coast of Portugal. A combined French and Spanish force retook Minorca (February 5, 1782), one of the Balearic Islands in the Mediterranean, and a combined fleet also threatened British supply lines to Gibraltar until the battle at Cape Spartel (October 20, 1782). The entry into the war of the Netherlands became the Fourth Anglo-Dutch War (1780–4), although the engagement at Dogger Bank (August 5, 1781) largely bottled the Dutch fleet in its harbors. A French naval expedition surprised and disabled a British squadron at Porto Praya (April 16, 1781) in the Cape Verde Islands, off west Africa, and then continued on into the Indian Ocean, where it campaigned against the British with the help of the Mysore leader, Hyder Ali, and some Dutch bases in Sri Lanka. The British had captured from the Dutch Negapatam on the Indian coast near Cuddalore and Trincomalee (January 8, 1782) in Sri Lanka. The French ships struck a squadron at Sadras, just south of Madras (February 17), then threatened the British hold on Trincomalee, moving on nearby Providien (April 12).

In India the French clashed with the British at Negapatam (July 6), then recaptured Cuddalore. A few weeks later they attacked the small British garrison at Trincomalee (August 25–31, 1782), thwarting a British naval attempt to relieve it (September 3). The British also made one final effort to retake Cuddalore (June 13–20, 1783), but the timely arrival of French naval forces helped end the effort.

Restoring the balance of imperial power preoccupied the negotiations France hosted. The result was the Second Treaty of Paris (September 3, 1783). The major powers denied each other any further claims to most of the territory west of the Alleghenies and east of the Mississippi River, and the US adopted a series of Land Ordinances (April 23, 1784, May 20, 1785), culminating in the Northwest Ordinance (July 13, 1787). These were based on the Treaty of Fort McIntosh (January 21, 1785) with native peoples.

Washington resigned as Commander of the Continental Army (December 23, 1783), voluntarily submitting military authority to the civilian government. This did not diminish the importance of war and conquest. Almost immediately, settlers clashed with Indians in Kentucky and northern Ohio, leading to the Northwest Indian War (1785–95).

The war saddled the new nation with massive debts to its foreign allies, to the states, and to individuals holding promissory notes issued during the war, many of the latter having been sold out of desperation by the soldiers, merchants, and farmers who got them at a fraction of the price. The US began owing speculators and investors, and the drive to establish a new, more powerful central authority capable of meeting its obligations pressed. These clashed repeatedly with American debtors, such as the participants in Shay's Rebellion (1786–7), which began when rural folk closed the western Massachusetts courts.

Adams' "mixed government" not only emerged as a wartime alternative to Paineite republicanism, but it also became the postwar model for ensuring "domestic tranquility." Representatives of the states eager for a stronger central government gathered for the Annapolis Convention (September 11–14, 1786), which adjourned to reassemble in Philadelphia (May 25–September 17, 1787), proposing a new Constitution to take effect after its ratification by 11 states. The old government under the Articles of Confederation acknowledged ratification of the Constitution on September 13, 1788, and the new government formed with the inauguration of George Washington on April 30, 1789.

Foundation of State

At the close of the war, Dr. Benjamin Rush wisely advised against confusing American Independence with "the American Revolution," which, he wrote, had just begun. The US sought to govern itself through a system of checks and balances. Positive action required a general agreement between different and theoretically competing executive, legislative, and judicial branches, with the legislative embedding a bicameral tension between a lower house representing enfranchised voters and an upper house representing all states equally. This placed many problems – most obviously slavery – beyond the realm of national government. However, the almost immediate ratification of ten amendments, the Bill of Rights (December 15, 1791), restrained the government from restrictions on freedoms of speech, religious worship, assembly, the press, and other rights. Almost immediately, Americans sought to claim their acknowledged right "to alter or to abolish" governments that fail to assure the "inalienable rights" of the people to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

The same argument had always had international ramifications. Even as the US formed, the economies of its former allies collapsed and the French Revolution began (1789). The anti-imperial assertion of the right of nations to self-determination has plagued the US not only in terms of its relations with native peoples but with countries around the world.

SEE ALSO: French Revolution, 1789–1794; Paine, Thomas (1737–1809); Shays' Rebellion; Whiskey Rebellion

References and Suggested Readings

- Barnes, I. (2000) The Historical Atlas of the American Revolution. New York: Routledge.
- Commager, H. S. & Morris, R. B. (Eds.) (1958) The Spirit of Seventy-Six: The Story of the American Revolution as Told by Participants. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill.
- Countryman, E. (1981) A People in Revolution: The American Revolution and Political Society in New York, 1760–1790. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.
- Douglass, E. P. (1955) Rebels and Democrats: The Struggle for Equal Political Rights and Majority Rule During the American Revolution. Chicago: Quadrangle Paperbacks.
- Harvey, R. (2002) "A Few Bloody Noses": The Realities and Mythologies of the American Revolution. Woodstock: Overlook Press.

- Mays, T. M. (2005) Historical Dictionary of Revolutionary America. Lanham: Scarecrow Press.
- Middlekauff, R. (2005) The Glorious Cause: The American Revolution, 1763–1789. Revd. ed. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Weintraub, S. (2005) Iron Tears: America's Battle for Freedom, Britain's Quagmire, 1775–1783. New York: Free Press.

American slave rebellions

Simon Wendt

Slaves who resorted to militant resistance in North America initially sought to win little more than their freedom. In the wake of the American and French Revolutions, however, an increasing number of slave rebels became determined not only to liberate themselves but to overthrow the institution of slavery itself. Compared with slave revolts in Brazil and the Caribbean, slave revolts in the United States were relatively rare, small, and generally unsuccessful. Yet militant slave resistance was of significant symbolic value, fueling the abolitionist movement that contributed to the end of slavery in 1865.

Slave resistance began as early as the first African men, women, and children were forced onto slave ships bound for North America. On several occasions, Africans unsuccessfully attempted to overpower the white ship crews that sought to sell them into slavery in the New World. Others refused to eat or drowned themselves during the Middle Passage across the Atlantic to escape bondage. Once in the British colonies, many enslaved men and women showed their opposition through subtle forms of subversion, such as breaking tools or feigning illness. But the most common form of resistance was running away. Until the late eighteenth century, Africans in North America frequently made collective efforts to escape. Some of them formed so-called maroon communities – maroon deriving from the Spanish word cimarrón, which meant “fierce” or “wild.” These small settlements were in inaccessible regions such as the swamps of southern Virginia or the Carolina lowlands.

Compared with similar efforts in Brazil and the Caribbean, however, American maroon communities were small and rarely survived more than a few years, with the exception of Florida, a Spanish colony that remained a refuge for runaways until the 1820s. Unlike Brazil, whose vast mountainous interior offered numerous opportunities to elude white captors, the British colonies in North America offered few of those inaccessible areas, and by the eve of the American Revolution, white settlers and farmers had destroyed most of such natural refuges. In Jamaica, where similar safe havens continued to exist throughout the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, some of the island’s maroon communities were so powerful that the British colonial government negotiated treaties with their leaders.

Conspiracies and rebellions were the most militant form of slave resistance in British North America. Prior to the late eighteenth century, however, the small number of slave rebels that resorted to such militant actions only sought to secure their freedom, not to overthrow the institution of slavery. In New York and the Chesapeake area, several insurrectionary plots, developed mostly by recent arrivals from Africa, were discovered in the periods 1710 to 1722 and 1729 to 1741. The two largest rebellions were the New York City insurrection of 1712 and the Stono Rebellion of 1739, which took place near Charleston, South Carolina. In New York City 27 Africans put fire to an outbuilding and killed or wounded 15 white men. During the Stono Rebellion, about 20 slaves secured guns and ammunition, rallied 80 other bondsmen, and raided several plantations. By the time they stopped to celebrate their victory, they had killed more than 30 whites. Despite the initial success of some rebellions, most conspiracies were discovered before slaves were able to put their plans into action, and white retaliation was swift and brutal. In New York City, for instance, 21 slave rebels were executed. In Charleston, white planters eventually confronted the small slave army and killed 44 insurgents. In the aftermath of revolts and conspiracies, white authorities put tight security measures into place to discourage further unrest.

The American and French Revolutions marked a major turning point in the history of slave rebellions in the Americas. The ideas that revolutionaries used to justify their opposition to traditional hierarchies of power in Great Britain and France – chief among them notions of natural human rights and universal liberty – influenced generations of slave rebels in North America and the Caribbean, who seized on those concepts to seek not just their freedom but an end to the institution of slavery itself. In 1791 in the French colony of Saint Domingue (modern Haiti), the French Revolution inspired the only successful insurrection in the history of slavery, leading to the founding of a black nation-state and becoming a symbol of freedom for enslaved men and women across the Atlantic world. Led by black rebel leader Toussaint L'Ouverture, almost 100,000 Haitian slaves and their free black allies defeated the large and well-trained armies of Spain, Britain, and France in a bloody struggle that lasted until 1804, when Haiti gained its independence. What came to be known as the Haitian Revolution was a fearful reminder for white planters in North America and the Caribbean that their slaves were neither content with their fate nor hesitant to use force to fight for their freedom.

Most of the slave revolts and conspiracies that took place in the United States in the nineteenth century were similarly inspired by the ideals of the Revolutionary Era. Many black militants viewed the events in Haiti as an additional encouragement to take militant action. In 1800, enslaved blacksmith Gabriel Prosser planned a massive revolt in Richmond, Virginia, hoping to rally other slaves to take control of the state. But shortly before the rebellion was to begin, fellow slaves revealed the plan to white authorities. Gabriel, his followers, and other suspects were quickly rounded up and executed. Eleven years later, almost two hundred slave rebels under the leadership of Haiti native Charles Deslondes rose up near New Orleans, Louisiana. The small army raided and burned several plantations but killed only three people. A large contingent of white militiamen, slaveholders, and US soldiers eventually quelled the revolt, killing 66 rebels and capturing Deslondes and 20 of his followers. Quickly tried and found guilty of rebellion, the survivors were executed, and their severed heads were publicly displayed to intimidate the slave population. Like the Haitian Revolution, the conspiracies of Gabriel and Deslondes terrified Southern white slaveholders, who sought to protect themselves by further restricting the ability of slaves and free blacks to associate with each other and by increasing the number of slave patrols.

Denmark Vesey, a free black carpenter, who in 1822 was discovered to have planned a large slave revolt in Charleston, South Carolina, was also influenced by the revolutions of the late nineteenth century. Vesey planned to lead a slave army on Charleston on July 14, the same day on which French Revolutionaries had stormed the Bastille in 1789. Vesey had also visited Haiti when working as a sailor and hoped that the newly independent nation would support his attempt to overthrow slavery in South Carolina. As in the case of other conspiracies, however, a house servant alerted his master before the revolution could take place. Local authorities quickly detained Gabriel and seized more than one hundred suspects in the following weeks. During public trials, 71 slaves were found guilty. Thirty-five rebels, including Gabriel, were put to death.

But not all of the slave rebellions in the United States aimed to spark an anti-slavery revolution. The 1831 rebellion of Nat Turner in Southampton County, Virginia, was the most violent one in US history, killing 59 people, including women and children, but it was inspired by its leader's religious convictions rather than by notions of human rights and universal liberty. Turner, who was a privileged and literate slave, became a lay preacher in the 1820s and became convinced that God expected him to lead his people to freedom through violence. As in the past, however, white militiamen quickly put down the revolt. In the following weeks, fearful white planters murdered more than one hundred black suspects. After a public trial, white authorities executed Turner, who had eluded his captors for more than two months, and almost twenty of his followers.

In 1839, in two separate maritime slave revolts, a few slave insurgents finally managed to gain their freedom. A group of Africans that had been recaptured by US authorities in June 1839 after bringing the Spanish slave ship Amistad under their control was eventually freed by the US Supreme Court. A similar revolt took place a few weeks later on the American slave ship Creole. A group of 135 slaves subdued the white crew and managed to sail to the British Bahamas, where they gained their freedom under British law. Although rumors of slave conspiracies continued to swirl among Southern planters in the following decades, the Turner revolt remained the last major slave rebellion in North America.

Compared with other slave societies, the United States experienced few and relatively small slave revolts in the nineteenth century. By contrast, numerous massive slave revolts erupted during this period in Cuba, Barbados, Jamaica, and Brazil. In 1812, thousands of Cuban slaves and their free black allies joined together in the massive Aponte uprising that was intended to end slavery and bring about Cuban independence. As in the United States, however, swift retaliation and subsequent security measures silenced slave opposition until 1844, when another large-scale conspiracy was discovered. Four years after the Aponte conspiracy, a large slave revolt enveloped the island of Barbados, where hundreds of cane fields went up in flames before militias defeated the insurgents. In late 1831 almost 60,000 slaves rose up in Jamaica, burning hundreds of plantations and battling militias and British troops for several weeks before their revolt was brutally crushed. Between 1807 and 1835 Brazil also experienced waves of conspiracies and revolts. The largest rebellion took place in 1835 in the city of Salvador, where Muslim Africans led an unsuccessful attack against white city authorities to secure their freedom.

There are several reasons for the comparatively small number of slave rebellions in the United States. Caribbean and Brazilian slaves greatly outnumbered the white population and lived on large plantations with little supervision. By contrast, American slaves tended to be a minority and lived on smaller estates that were closely watched and managed by their vigilant owners. Similarly important, the end of the slave trade in the United States in 1809 halted the importation of single African men, who were at the forefront of almost all slave rebellions in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. US-born slaves with families tended to be less militant than native Africans, since they had more to lose than single bondsmen. The lack of large natural refuges further diminished chances of success for slave rebels in the United States.

Though generally unsuccessful, slave rebellions in the United States became important symbols of heroic militancy for many African Americans and contributed to the radicalization of the Abolitionist movement. Until the 1830s, most black and white abolitionists called for gradual abolition, were committed to non-violence, and sought to use moral suasion to convince Americans of the sinfulness of slavery. But the persistent refusal of white Southerners to consider emancipation, waves of anti-abolitionist violence in the North, and the slave revolts of the 1820s and 1830s led a growing number of anti-slavery activists such as William Lloyd Garrison and Frederick Douglass to support both immediate abolition and more forceful action to make it a reality. Most of them sought to encourage slaves to run away, supporting the activities of the Underground Railroad, a secret network of activists that helped slaves to escape to the northern United States or to Canada. A few, like black abolitionist David Walker in his 1829 pamphlet An Appeal to the Colored Citizens of the World, called for the violent overthrow of the Southern slave regime. In 1859, white abolitionist John Brown and a small band of 17 armed black and white men heeded Walker's appeal, raiding a federal arsenal at Harpers Ferry, Virginia, to initiate a massive slave revolt across the South. But the poorly planned attack was nipped in the bud by white authorities. During the battle with US marines that ensued after the invaders were discovered, Brown was captured and several of his comrades were killed. Virginia tried Brown for treason and executed him in December 1859. Brown's attack exacerbated the tensions between the North and the South, culminating in the American Civil War and eventually leading to the end of slavery after the defeat of the Southern Confederacy in 1865.

SEE ALSO: Gabriel's Rebellion; Haiti, Revolutionary Revolts, 1790s; Nat Turner Rebellion; Vesey's Rebellion

References and Suggested Readings

- Aptheker, H. (1943) American Negro Slave Revolts. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Bergad, L. W. (2007) The Comparative Histories of Slavery in Brazil, Cuba, and the United States. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Dillon, M. L. (1990) Slavery Attacked: Southern Slaves and Their Allies, 1619–1865. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.
- Genovese, E. D. (1979) From Rebellion to Revolution: Afro-American Slave Revolts in the Making of the Modern World. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.
- Price, R. (Ed.) (1979) Maroon Societies: Rebel Slave Communities in the Americas. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.
- Rucker, W. C. (2006) The River Flows On: Black Resistance, Culture, and Identity Formation in Early America. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.

Amo, Anton Wilhelm (1703–1759) and Afro-Germans

Joshua Kwesi Aikins

Anton Wilhelm Amo (sometimes referred to by the anglicized name Anton William Amo), one of the first Africans to study and teach at European universities, was a philosopher from the West African region now known as Ghana. He lectured at the German universities of Halle, Wittenberg, and Jena. He published on a variety of issues, ranging from black people's rights in eighteenth-century Europe, to medicine, epistemology, and psychology. His academic career, his stance for black people's rights, his affirmation of his African identity, as well as his decision to return home to find his family, are outstanding achievements at a time when many other West Africans – including his own brother, who was deported to Suriname – were stripped of their rights, denied their humanity, and enslaved in European colonies.

Born in Axim, in today's Ghana, at around 1703, he was presented as a "gift" to the Dukes August Wilhelm and Ludwig Rudolf von Wolfenbüttel by the Dutch West India Company in 1707. He was named after Anton Ulrich von Wolfenbüttel and his first son, Wilhelm August. The name Amo is Ghanaian, suggesting that Amo was old enough to remember his name when he arrived in Germany.

The practice of presenting enslaved Africans as "gifts" was common among European nobility at the time. Africans were used as exotic servants and symbols of status, power, and affluence. Amo could thus have served his whole life as one of many Hofmohren kept as enslaved servants by German nobility. But the Duke, influenced by early Enlightenment thought and his cousin, the Tsar of Russia, whose African servant Piotr Petrov Petrovitch (alias Abram Hannibal, grandfather of renowned Russian writer Pushkin) received a university education and excelled as an outstanding Russian engineer, decided to emulate the Tsar by granting Amo an education and sending him to university.

Amo began his studies in 1727 at the University of Halle, where he was taught by Christian Thomasius, a central figure in early Enlightenment philosophy. In Amo's view, Thomasius had elevated philosophy by allowing it to permeate other disciplines and to be used in a practical way. It was during these years of intense debates between the conservative Pietists and the early Enlightenment scholars, with whom he sided, that Amo wrote his Inauguraldissertation, "The Rights of an African in Eighteenth Century Europe." Unlike some of his later writings, such as "The Apathy of the Human Mind," and his treatise on mathematics, this key early work has not been preserved. But insights into its content and political purpose can be gleaned from contemporary sources which describe Amo as "one of the courageous men, who have supported . . . the Black cause either in their writing or through speeches at political gatherings where they stood up for the abolition of slavery and the liberation of slaves" (Hountondji 1983: 130).

Only months after the dissertation, Amo left Halle for reasons that have not yet been established. While there is an amount of mystery surrounding Amo's Inauguraldissertation, the effect it had on his posture and consciousness is clear: from then on, every further publication or writing of Amo bore in addition to his signature the words "Amo Guinea-Africanus," a clear positioning as an African from Guinea, the contemporary name for the West African coast and hinterlands.

In September 1730 he took up a position at the University of Wittenberg, where his studies focused on rhetoric, psychology, and medicine. In 1734 he defended his second dissertation, after having gained the title of "Magister of Philosophy and Free Arts." Jena was the third renowned university where Amo gave lectures on topics such as "The Rightful Areas of Philosophy" and "The Refutation of Superstition."

By the late 1730s, fortunes began to turn against Amo as his supporters became embroiled in the Prussian–Austrian war and distanced themselves from Enlightenment ideas, to which Amo was still committed. Ultimately, they withdrew their support at a time when Amo had to face increasing racist hostilities. By 1752 he had returned to his native town of Axim in today's Ghana where he is reported to have worked as a goldsmith. The fact that he indeed was able to return to his family is attested to by Galandet, a Swiss physician in Dutch service, who describes meeting Amo in 1752. This is the last recorded reference to Anton Wilhelm Amo, and the exact date of his death is unknown.

As a philosopher in the tradition of the early Enlightenment, Amo challenged established philosophical theories, exposing their inconsistencies by an ironic use of their disputable core tenets. Beninese philosopher Hountondji points out that, his innovative use of a methodical irony notwithstanding, Amo's style of philosophic inquiry has to be placed solely in a Western paradigm. But far from diminishing Amo's achievement this assertion actually highlights Amo's ability to develop and articulate a critical position in his discipline at a time when Germans, like other Europeans, engaged in slave trading, justified by a racist ideology that constructed Africans as inferior beings. His achievement is a manifestation of protest that proves wrong the very assumption of African incapacity for intellectual excellence. To this day, he serves as an inspiration for African scholars and indeed everyone committed to speaking out against the accepted injustices of the day.

SEE ALSO: Enlightenment, France, 18th Century; German Reformation

References and Suggested Readings

- Abraham, W. (1964) The Life and Times of Wilhelm Anton Amo. Transactions of the Historical Society of Ghana 7: 60–81.
- Amo, A. W. & Nwala, T. U. (1990) Anton William Amo's Treatise on the Art of Philosophising Soberly and Accurately (with Commentaries). Nigeria: William Amo Centre for African Philosophy, University of Nigeria.
- Brentjes, B. (1975) Anton Wilhelm Amo, First African Philosopher in European Universities. Current Anthropology 16 (3): 443–4.
- Hountondji, J. P. (1983) African Philosophy: Myth and Reality. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Sephocle, M. (1992) Anton Wilhelm Amo. Journal of Black Studies 23 (2): 182–7.

Anabaptist movement

Soma Marik

The Reformation had several strands, including the “Radical Reformation,” which refers to all individuals and groups who rejected both the Roman Catholic tradition and the mainstream Protestant alternatives. Many radicals and their leaders, mostly literate ex-clergy, rejected any connection with the state and any state church. They appealed to the same audience and used some of the same anti-Roman or anti-clerical arguments as did the preachers of the mainstream Reformation, but they had a more popular social base. Often called Anabaptists, or “rebaptizers” by their contemporary Catholic and Protestant enemies, they advocated adult rather than infant baptism and saw the church as a body of saints in which membership was voluntary, and the most severe form of discipline was banning or shunning. In their separation from the temporal domain, many Anabaptist groups refused to serve the state as magistrates or soldiers, and some even refused to pay war taxes.

Main Currents

In Switzerland, Anabaptism developed from Conrad Grebel's circle and priests from the outlying areas of Zurich. Seeing the Bible as an alternative authority to Rome, these “Swiss Brethren” sought to purify the city's religion of Catholic elements like the mass and establish self-governing people's churches in the rural communities. They opposed tithes, or the payment of one-tenth of produce as tax to the church. In 1525 their meetings were forbidden, and parents were ordered to have their infants baptized within eight days or face expulsion from the city. In response, on January 21, Conrad Grebel, a layman often called the “first Anabaptist,” baptized George Blaurock, an ordained priest. The movement spread rapidly. The Brethren began evangelizing the surrounding territories with great success, converting and baptizing many. Leaders were arrested and rebaptism was banned by the council on March 7, 1526. The penalty for disobedience was death by drowning. In December Blaurock, who was not a citizen of Zurich, was tried and was whipped and banished. Felix Manz was executed by drowning on January 5, 1527, thereby becoming the first Anabaptist martyr. The attempt to emerge as a mass movement failed, and there emerged instead the idea of the church of a separated minority. By 1527, Swiss Anabaptists were being unified through the Schleitheim Confession. Drafted by Michael Sattler, this document attempted to separate congregations of Anabaptist followers from non-believers.

Radical reforming zeal and peasant radicalism also combined in southern Germany. The “Zwickau Prophets,” Thomas Dreschel, Nicolas Storch, and Mark Thomas Stübner, claimed to be directly commanded by the Holy Spirit and rejected infant baptism and any authority other than the spiritual command of God. They in turn influenced Thomas Müntzer, a priest who became acquainted with Martin Luther around 1519. During the Peasant Rebellion in 1524–5, Müntzer supported the peasants' cause. Seeing the events of 1525 as resistance to godless tyranny and God's instrument to purify Christendom, he placed his considerable talents at the disposal of the great uprising of the peasants and "common man." Although not its instigator, he became one of its theologically most articulate defenders, ultimately being tortured and beheaded for the cause.

Other German Anabaptists included Hans Hut, who disagreed with the need to form separatist communities, and Balthasar Hubmaier, who believed that the state was ordained by God, envisaged the possibility of a Christian magistrate, and sanctioned capital punishment and just wars. Hut's more radical followers called for common ownership of goods and denied that Christians could use the sword in self-defense, serve as magistrates, or pay taxes.

Another radical faction from Austerlitz, which followed Jacob Hutter and was known as Hutterites, was the first Anabaptist community to form a completely communistic society administered by elected officials. They believed that if all things were held in common, selfishness could be overcome and the true imitation of Christ attained. Eventually, Ferdinand I succeeded in getting the Hutterites expelled from Moravia. Hutter was arrested by the Austrian authorities in Tyrol, and burned to death on February 25, 1536. Subsequently, Hutterites moved back to Moravia and were given protection by some nobles. Periods of persecution and relaxation followed. By 1572 they had built up flourishing and hard-working communities, but the death of their protector and unrelenting persecution destroyed the communities in Moravia.

The Münster Rebellion

Another major Anabaptist movement developed in Münster through the influence of Melchior Hofmann, who died after ten years' imprisonment in Strasbourg. Two lines developed to continue and transform his legacy. Soon after learning about Hofmann's arrest, the Haarlem baker Jan Matthys, in the presence of Low Country

Melchiorites, professed to be driven by the Spirit, and claimed to be the second witness of the apocalypse. Meanwhile, in the city of Münster in Westphalia, Bernhard Rothmann, influenced by the Melchiorites, moved to a more radical position, and his followers won the town council, declaring property communal and adopting such biblical practices as polygamy. Adopting a strongly patriarchal line, Rothmann demanded complete obedience of the wife to the husband. All Lutherans and Catholics who refused to join the movement were expelled by early March 1534, but eventually the bishop of Münster, aided by both Catholic and Protestant rulers, captured the city on June 25, 1535. Many of the inhabitants negotiated surrender, only to be executed after they had laid down their weapons.

The survival of Anabaptism after the suppression of the Münster Rebellion was largely the work of Menno Simons, who from 1536 to 1543 worked first in the Netherlands and then in North Germany to reorganize and consolidate the scattered Anabaptist communities. Due to his role in creating a structured network, many Anabaptists came to be called Mennonites.

SEE ALSO: English Revolution, Radical Sects; German Peasant Rebellion, 1525; German Reformation; Hutterites; Müntzer, Thomas (ca. 1489–1525); Reformation

References and Suggested Readings

- Bender, H. S. (1944) The Anabaptist Vision. Church History (March) 13: 3–24.
- Stayer, J. M. (1991) The German Peasants' War and Anabaptist Community of Goods. Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press.
- Williams, G. H. (2000) The Radical Reformation. Kirksville: Truman State University Press.

Anarchism

Jesse Cohn

In common parlance "anarchy" refers to a state of chaos or violent disorder and "anarchism" to the rebellious or merely perverse pursuit of this state. Indeed, the word "anarchist" was first used in the seventeenth century as an epithet against the defeated Levellers in the English Civil War. While the ideas and practices that would become known as anarchism were distinctly foreshadowed by movements such as the Diggers and the Ranters in the seventeenth century as well as by eighteenth-century thinkers such as William Godwin (and arguably by far more ancient schools of thought, from the Cynics of the fifth century BCE to the Taoists of a century later), it was not until Pierre-Joseph Proudhon turned this epithet into a positive self-description that we can speak of anarchism per se, as a historical entity. Historically speaking, however, anarchism is the name for a movement, originating in mid-nineteenth-century Europe, characterized by its vision of a society of generalized self-management, its opposition to all forms of hierarchy and domination, and its particular emphasis on means of transformative action that prefigure the desired ends. The word also serves to name the goal of the movement – substantive and universal freedom, sometimes called “anarchy” – elements of which may be found in every society that has ever existed, particularly among peoples living without private property and the state.

Principles and Practices

Popular misunderstandings concerning anarchism, fed by more than a century and a half of sensationalistic media representations, are widespread – and, unfortunately, many scholarly accounts of anarchism do little to correct these distortions. The association of anarchy with chaos and senseless violence, while owing something to a certain phase in anarchist history (that of “propaganda by the deed”), is readily dispelled by even a cursory reading of works by actual self-described anarchists: “Anarchism . . . is not bombs, disorder, or chaos,” writes Alexander Berkman (1870–1936). “It is not a war of each against all. It is not a return to barbarism . . . Anarchism is the very opposite of all that” (Berkman 2003: xv). Similarly, Emma Goldman (1869–1940) defines anarchism as “the philosophy of a new social order based on liberty unrestricted by man-made law; the theory that all forms of government rest on violence, and are therefore wrong and harmful, as well as unnecessary” (1910: 56). The entry on anarchism that Peter Kropotkin (1842–1921) wrote for the 1910 Encyclopedia Britannica defined it as “a principle or theory of life and conduct under which society is conceived without government” (2002: 284). These three explanations of anarchism – it would be difficult to find any more widely accepted by anarchists – show that anarchism is a form of social order rather than mere disorder or absence of organization; the form of social order anarchism represents is intended to maximize freedom, and to do so without recourse to the kinds of coercive institutions that are typically assumed to be necessary, variously called “government,” “law,” or “authority”; and in place of these institutions, anarchists propose to produce social order through a system of “free agreements” to meet individuals’ “needs.”

This much is easily established. What is less tractable, even when informed by these explanations, is the common perception that what is being so explained is an “ideal” – possibly a noble ideal, albeit probably impracticable, and in any case, one that has never been put into practice anywhere. This misunderstanding is reinforced by academic treatments of anarchism as an abstract set of beliefs, the history of which is primarily a history of theorists or believers. The same quotations will furnish evidence for this interpretation: Goldman and Kropotkin, for instance, speak of anarchism as a “philosophy,” a “theory,” and a “principle.” This set of beliefs is generally taken to include the notion that there is something called “human nature,” and that this nature is inherently virtuous and rational – after all, if anarchists intend to do away with “man-made laws,” it must be that they rely on “natural” laws to produce order. This would seem to place anarchism within a history of ideas about “human nature” and “natural law”; in particular, it links anarchism to the more idealistic pronouncements of philosophers such as Jean-Jacques Rousseau, for whom the “state of nature” alone represents true freedom, “civilization” representing compromise and corruption. All that is left is to apply the test of reality: if the belief in a good human nature matched up with the way things are, anarchism would be a valid belief, but since it obviously does not – history seems amply to testify that when people are freed from coercive institutions, they are selfish and violent – anarchism is purely utopian, an image of the perfect life that could never find realization in an imperfect world.

In fact, this conclusion, so apparently self-evident, only finds what it assumes at the start: that anarchism is a theory without a practice. This assumption not only requires that we overlook everything that anarchist writings have to say about anarchist practices (for example, the establishment of “free agreements” among “various groups”); it also requires that we ignore the concrete, material history of anarchism as a movement. To read the history of the anarchist movement is not to discover a disembodied idea floating in the heads of a few privileged thinkers. On the contrary: practices are everywhere.

The question, for instance, of how agreements are to be established between groups without subordinating them to the will of privileged decision-makers (“representatives”) is not answered by abstract speculations about natural law, but by the institutionalization of very specific kinds of tactics and norms. Here is how José Lluñas Pujols (1855–1905), a Catalan worker and anarchist, describes them: “delegates,” he observes, are to be “instructed in advance on how to proceed” by members of a group meeting in general assembly, and are “subject at any time to replacement or recall by the permanent suffrage of those who had given them their mandate” so that they “can never establish themselves as dictators” (quoted in Nettlau 1996: 187–8). Note that the assumption built into this practice is that delegates who are not given specific instructions, who cannot be held to account and recalled by the collectivity, may indeed be expected to seek and accumulate power. Indeed, far from assuming the best about “human nature,” it often appears that anarchist practices prepare against the worst: in the words of Mikhail Bakunin (1814–76), anarchists assume that “absence of opposition and control and of continuous vigilance inevitably becomes a source of depravity for all individuals vested with social power” (2002: 245).

Anarchism consists, then, not so much in the elaboration of a “theory” in the abstract which is then to be applied to “practice” from the outside – indeed, this is a model anarchists reject as implicitly authoritarian – but in a “mode of being” (Colson 2004: 14). Indeed, as David Graeber observes, anarchism was never a political philosophy on the model of other political philosophies, speculating about the essence of humanity or offering prescriptions for the perfect society; rather, it has been “primarily an ethics of practice,” the elaboration of practices that embody certain principles (2007: 305). Thus, when Goldman or Kropotkin speaks of anarchism as a “principle,” this is in the sense of an ethical norm, a principle-in-action that can be extrapolated from what it is that human beings already do. For example, in his emphasis on mutualism, Kropotkin rooted his anarchism in “the countless acts of mutual support and devotion which every one of us knows from his own experience” (1989: 116). That is, anarchists proposed neither to destroy society in favor of untrammelled human nature nor to invent a new society ex nihilo (in the manner of classical utopias like Plato’s Republic), but to extrapolate and codify certain principles already implicit within ordinary human behavior.

All of the most important formulators of anarchist theory dispensed with notions of instinctual goodness right along with the doctrine of Original Sin, rejecting Jean-Jacques Rousseau’s notion of the state of nature as the idyllic home of the “noble savage” as well as Thomas Hobbes’s conception of the state of nature as a “war of all against all.” Rather than begin from any such imaginary starting point, they took for granted the fairly uncontroversial observation that human beings are capable of altruistic as well as egoistic behavior. To the extent that anarchist theory appealed to “natural laws” as the basis for a new social structure, these “laws” consisted largely of other such commonplaces, such as the recognition that concentrated power corrupts those entrusted with it, or that communities lacking a sense of solidarity and trust tend to require and solicit coercive authority. The point is neither to affirm nor to deny speculations such as Hobbes’s that “man is a wolf to man,” but actively to construct the social conditions under which human beings may be humane: as Paul Goodman remarks, “the moral question is not whether men [and women] are ‘good enough’ for a type of social organization, but whether the type of organization is useful to develop the potentialities of intelligence, grace, and freedom in [women and] men” (1968: 19).

Socialism and the Anarchist Movement

While existing practices – from the survival of convivial social customs to the emergence of modern workers’ associations – supplied Proudhon’s formulation of anarchist theory with its content, historians tend to see an anarchist movement as such emerging gradually within the First International (1864–72), where Proudhonian ideas gained popularity, and within which Mikhail Bakunin exerted an increasing influence until the final split and dissolution of the organization.

Sharing the outlook reflected in the founding document written by Marx, which declared that “the emancipation of the toilers can be the work only of the toilers themselves,” Bakunin argued that this self-emancipation was incompatible with the methods of struggle Marx advocated, which aimed at the capture of state power, and which depended, in view of this goal, on the formation of workers’ parties that would reproduce all the features of the state (or, indeed, the church) within themselves: ideology, hierarchy, and discipline. Anarchism thus gained its identity as a movement from its relation to a broader working-class socialist movement of which it formed the anti-authoritarian wing; in the next generation, Peter Kropotkin would refer to it as “the no-government system of socialism,” and from the 1890s on, the term “libertarian socialism” has entered common use as a synonym for anarchism.

A second distinction that became apparent in the controversies that tore apart the First International would prove just as significant for the future of the anarchist movement. Bakunin objected to Marx’s identification of the socialist movement exclusively with the urban industrial proletariat – the particular segment of the working classes which, from the standpoint of Marx’s conception of history, represented the future, beside which every other class, however underprivileged, necessarily represented the past. For Bakunin, the exclusion from the ranks of potential revolutionaries not only of the petit bourgeoisie (self-employed shopkeepers and small business proprietors) but of the peasantry (small farmers and farm workers) and even the “lumpenproletariat” (the unemployed, criminals, and others living on the margins of the capitalist system), is unacceptable. Since, for the anarchists, revolution was not merely the inevitable outcome of a deterministic historical process but a moral obligation, all of the oppressed – in city or country, in factories or on farms, employed or unemployed, male or female – could participate. By the same token, anarchists refused to limit this revolution to a unique event or a single goal: Proudhon had spoken of “the revolution” as an ongoing process, a “permanent revolution,” the scope of which could be extended indefinitely by “analogy,” so that church, state, and capital appeared as so many different modes of domination. This lateral extension of the potential sites of anarchist resistance gave it a tactical and theoretical flexibility often lacking in Marxism (which would be slow to embrace forms of revolt that resisted reduction to its economic schemas and class categories), and would give anarchism relevance to political groupings that Proudhon himself had never countenanced, including women, migrant workers, homosexuals, environmentalists, ethnic minorities, and colonized peoples. In Goldman’s (1910: 56) words, anarchists took “every phase of life” as a potential terrain of struggle, from education to sexuality, from art and music to diet and dress.

Migrations

Perhaps just as fundamental to the historical development of anarchism as the transmission of anarchist ideas by people in motion is the fact of motion itself, the unsettling of settled ways and the creation of a “nomadic” working class in ceaseless exchanges (Colson 2001: 140–1). People on the move, “transitional classes,” seem to have constituted one of the great anarchist constituencies: not only immigrants, diasporic peoples, refugees, and exiles, but also migrant workers, hoboes, and peasants and artisans newly arrived in urban factory jobs. Indeed, Benedict Anderson suggests that the history of anarchism is fatefully intertwined with the development of the kinds of transportation and communications technologies – steamships, railways, telegraphs, etc. – that facilitated “early globalization” (2005: 2–3). Thus, anarchism spread to the Americas, Asia, Australia, and parts of Africa, largely in the luggage of immigrants. Italian immigrants, imported as cheap labor to Brazil and to Argentina, brought the anarchist idea with them, joined by Jewish anarchists fleeing pogromist Russia; Russian Jewish immigrants such as the young Emma Goldman, arriving in New York, picked it up from German immigrant anarchists like Johann Most, and her counterparts in London formed a movement around the leadership of another German anarchist émigré, Rudolf Rocker. The American anarchosyndicalist Industrial Workers of the World union exported ideas concerning direct action and extra-parliamentary politics to destinations as far away as Japan and Chile. Chinese anarchists, a number of whom absorbed the ideas of Bakunin and Kropotkin while studying in Paris, became emissaries of anarchism to the rest of East Asia, as Italian anarchists did to the eastern Mediterranean, as did Eastern Europeans to Central Asia.

What is stranger and more difficult to narrate is the way in which these political missionaries generally found the idea to be in some sense “already there.” Thus, as a conventionally Eurocentric history would have it, the seeds of the Mexican anarchist movement were sown in the 1860s by an itinerant Greek disciple of Proudhon, Plotino C. Rhodakanaty (1828–ca. 1885). At the same time, Rhodakanaty found in the Huichol tradition of the calpulli (a form of communal property) a native model of Proudhonian mutualism. Arriving in Spain in 1868, Bakunin’s emissary, Giuseppe Fanelli (1826–77), found that his inability to speak Spanish hardly handicapped him; it seemed that the workers who gathered to listen were ready to hear him – having been prepared, perhaps, by Spain’s relatively early reception of Proudhon’s federalist ideas, popularized as early as 1854 via Francisco Pi y Margall (1824–1901) and demonized even earlier than that by the Catholic conservative Juan Donoso Cortés – and Spain’s anarchist movement quickly became one of the most vigorous in the world. Exiled to the prison colony of New Caledonia for their participation in the Paris Commune of 1871, anarchists such as Louise Michel and Maxime Lisbonne encountered the Kanak people struggling against French colonialism, and on their return to Paris, brought a distinctly anti-colonial élan to the movement there. Rebels from distant corners of the decaying Spanish Empire, encountering Spanish anarchists, adapted their ideas to their own circumstances. Chinese radicals sojourning in Tokyo in 1907 interpreted the reports of Kotoku Shusui (1871–1911) on American anarchosyndicalism in terms of the anti-authoritarian concepts implicit in their own Taoist, Buddhist, and peasant-communalist heritage.

Divisions Within Anarchism

While adherence to the principles of opposition to domination in all forms, self-management, and means-ends coherence have generally stood as the minimal requirements for inclusion in the anarchist movement, anarchists have diverged in their interpretations of them. Divisions emerged fairly quickly, as anarchists questioned what they saw as Proudhon’s inconsistent application of his own insights. Thus, Joseph Déjacque (1822–65) reproached Proudhon not only for his defense of the patriarchal family, but for his overreliance on an economic system of contracts as a replacement for the state. On the subject of gender, Déjacque’s egalitarianism rapidly became the standard for the entire movement.

On the subject of economy, however, no such consensus was forthcoming. Three distinct positions emerged. One position was Proudhonian “mutualism,” which described an exchange economy minus several of the defining characteristics of capitalism, such as rent, profit, interest, and absentee ownership of land, and bearing several defining characteristics of socialism, such as producer-consumer cooperatives, free credit, and a labor-time currency. Another position was “communism” (also called “anarchist communism,” “anarchocommunism,” or “libertarian communism”), which rejected the wage system entirely in favor of distribution according to need. Finally, there was “collectivism,” a modification of the mutualist system which further emphasized collective ownership of the means of production, but which retained the principle that workers should be rewarded proportionately to their contribution in labor.

Several further developments complicated this division. The combination of anti-statism and laissez-faire capitalism that is currently called “libertarianism” in the United States – a term that, until the mid-twentieth century, was synonymous with “anarchism” per se – evolved from an extreme individualist offshoot from the mutualist school, which shed so many of its socialist and anti-capitalist qualities as to become all but unrecognizable. The result, sometimes called “anarcho-capitalism,” is almost universally regarded by anarchists as mere capitalist ideology, an extreme version of the neoliberal doctrine now enshrined in institutions such as the World Trade Organization, no longer a form of anarchism. Nonetheless, varieties of “individualist anarchism,” most ably represented by writers such as E. Armand (1872–1963) in France and Benjamin Tucker (1854–1939) in the United States, enjoyed considerable popularity, inspired partly by the posthumous popularization and translation of the “egoist” writings of Max Stirner (a.k.a. Johann Caspar Schmidt, 1806–56). While these have generally been seen by anarchists as marginal to the movement, the mainstream of which has always been socialist in orientation, they have generally been seen as remaining within the anarchist orbit.

The collectivist position became associated, for a time, with strategies that integrated anarchism into the trade union movement, what became known as “anarchosyndicalism.” Anarchocommunists often criticized anarchosyndicalists both for including some form of the wage system in their vision of a post-revolutionary society, calling this merely a “mitigated individualism,” and for struggling for better wages and conditions within the capitalist system, a strategy that courted the danger of cooptation and degeneration into mere self-interested reformism. Anarchosyndicalists retorted that to remain aloof from the trade union movement would be to isolate anarchism in the name of ideological purity – and indeed, anarchocommunists from Spain to Japan often called their position “pure anarchism.” Where anarchosyndicalists, like other labor radicals, saw the workplace as the primary site of exploitation and therefore as the primary battleground, individualist anarchists and anarchocommunists insisted that the emancipatory struggle was equally to be located in unwaged time and space, such as in the personal realm and domestic life, where oppression was largely a matter of informal customs and traditional institutions, often reinforced by the state, for example through the apparatuses of law, public education, and medicine.

In long-term strategy, too, the individualist anarchists, anarchosyndicalists, and anarchocommunists diverged. Thus, where the Proudhonian strategy had been to avoid revolutionary “shocks” by building up popular alternatives to capitalism and the state (such as cooperatives and credit unions) so as to gradually supplant them, anarchosyndicalists assigned the task of “forming the structure of the new society within the shell of the old” to the labor union, which, on the eve of the last great general strike, would then serve as a ready-made organ for the self-management of society, a federation of workers coordinating production for use in the absence of capital and the state (Industrial Workers of the World 1908: 1). This conception of the union as the “embryo” of anarchy, strikingly similar to the notion of the soviets or “workers’ councils” in the libertarian Marxism of Rosa Luxemburg (1870–1919) and others, seemed overly reductive and rigid to anarchocommunists, for whom the proper unit of society was not the workplace but the community. It is argued that the commune is not only the most appropriate form for the expressions of all sides of the human person (rather than reducing the person to mere producer), but also more suited to the ecological vision of human beings as organisms inhabiting an environment.

Numerous attempts have been made to reconcile these schools of anarchism. As early as 1889, Fernando Tarrida del Marmol (1861–1915) sought to calm tensions in the Spanish anarchist movement by an appeal to “anarchism without adjectives.” As revolutionary unions gained ground in the early twentieth century, the animosity and distrust between anarchosyndicalists and anarchocommunists faded, with prominent representatives of both camps, such as Peter Kropotkin and Victor Griffuelhes, making significant concessions to one another, and ultimately, the most powerful anarchosyndicalist union, the Spanish Confederacion Nacional del Trabajo (CNT), formally adopted “libertarian communism” as part of its official program in 1936. In the 1920s pragmatists like Errico Malatesta (1853–1932) argued that the differences between communist and individualist “schools of thought” could be resolved in practice, while Voline (a.k.a. Vsevolod Mikhailovitch Eichenbaum, 1882–1945) and Sebastien Faure (1858–1942) proposed an “anarchist synthesis” that included elements of all three schools. Meanwhile, from another direction, a group of anarchists including Nestor Makhno (1888–1934) and Peter Arshinov (1887–1937) proposed to reconstruct the anarchist movement around a kind of constitution, a “program” setting forth “hard and fast positions” on matters of theory, tactics, and organization, dubbed The Organizational Platform of the General Union of Anarchists. Not only was this controversy not resolved, but other disagreements about means and ends have proliferated.

Another serious dispute concerned the question of organization. “Anti-organizationalists” such as Luigi Galleani (1861–1931), anticipating the advent of what would become known as “insurrectionary anarchism” a century later, saw formal organizations as perpetually in danger of becoming rigid, gradually reproducing all the salient features of the state; “organizationalists” countered, with Malatesta, that “the less organized we have been, the more prone are we to be imposed on by a few individuals” (Galleani 2006: 3; Malatesta 1993: 86).

Anarchopacifists such as Gustav Landauer (1870–1919) have charged that violent means are radically incoherent with anarchist ends – an argument that has been rejected by a majority of anarchists, who have judged that this is to hold the oppressed, who are always in a legitimate state of self-defense, to an impossible standard. Nonetheless, there was a general shift in opinion, particularly after the spectacular violence and reprisals of the early 1890s, against individual acts of violence against persons – e.g., assassinations (attentats) and bombings (“propaganda by the deed”) – and toward modes of action, such as labor organizing, cultural resistance, and education, that could be pursued more openly and peacefully even under capitalist and statist conditions.

As early as the 1890s, anarchists such as Henry Zisly (1872–1945), calling themselves “naturistes” “naturianistes,” or “naturiens,” declared machines, science, and “civilization” as such to be oppressive and destructive of both the natural environment and human freedom, declaring themselves in favor of a “return to a more natural life” on the model of primitive peoples. Since the 1970s, John Zerzan (b. 1943) and others have revived this critique of technology and modernity, in forms strongly influenced by the Marxist theory of the Frankfurt School, under the name of “primitivism.” Where the naturiens were largely ignored or ridiculed by the leading anarchists of their day, who generally embraced scientific and technological progress as sources of revolutionary hope, the dire military and ecological trends of the mid-to-late twentieth century have made it more difficult to dismiss the charge that science and technology may both presuppose and reinforce domination and ecocide, and that it is naïve to think that we can use them for other purposes. Nonetheless, a number of “eco-anarchists” such as Bookchin insist that certain sciences and technologies are presently useful and necessary, and that they may be made both humane and ecologically sound; conversely, it is argued, it is primitivism which has been naïve in returning to Rousseau’s “noble savage” mythology (Bookchin 1971: 41–84; 1995: 36–51).

Despite the strongly anti-clerical thrust of anarchism as developed by Proudhon and Bakunin, who dedicated entire books to attacks on the church, and by anarchist educators such as Francisco Ferrer y Guardia (1859–1909), whose aim was to provide a rational, scientific, materialist alternative to religiously sanctioned pedagogy, a number of anarchists from the nineteenth century on, especially those influenced by the writings of Leo Tolstoy (1828–1910), have argued for the compatibility of some varieties of religion with anarchism. Indeed, a number of important precursors to modern anarchism stem from religious traditions such as Taoism or the radical Protestantism of Gerrard Winstanley (1609–76). While representing a minority tendency within the movement, religious anarchism has exerted for some a strong enough appeal.

The popularity of nationalism has posed a similar problem for anarchist theory and practice. For instance, while the overwhelming majority of Jewish anarchists were atheists and internationalists, enough were attracted by the project of Palestinian settlement in the early twentieth century for the term “anarcho-Zionism” to come into use. Committed to internationalism in principle, anarchists such as Bakunin and Kropotkin nonetheless sympathized with oppressed peoples engaging in nationalist movements, particularly when these were articulated as forms of rebellion against colonial regimes such as those exercised by Russia over Poland. For many, this extended naturally to the struggles of “stateless” peoples such as the Jews against oppression in diaspora. Moreover, anarcho-Zionists such as Bernard Lazare (1865–1903) were careful to differentiate their aspirations from the desire for a state of any kind. Nonetheless, anarchists from Proudhon to Fredy Perlman (1934–85) have warned against support for nationalist aspirations of any kind for any reason, arguing that they always create new forms of oppression.

The tension between anarchism as a particular movement and its universalist aims has never ceased to raise questions. Indeed, the decision of the Spanish CNT union to join other left-wing factions in a Popular Front government in order to resist the fascists – for many then and since, a clear violation of principles – was defended in part by the argument that anarchists were too small a faction to dictate to others what course to take. In more recent decades this tension has manifested itself in connection with solidarity work of various kinds – for instance, of white American anarchists in support of African American movements or the Zapatista revolt in Mexico. For some anarchists, this kind of support work, reaching across sometimes substantial differences in goals and tactics, often means an unacceptable compromise; it is argued that to abandon, defer, or disguise anarchist goals in order to serve others is either to manipulate them or to be manipulated by them, and that anarchists should instead embrace their specificity, organizing their own movements and arguing openly for their ideas, finding allies where they can. On the other hand, anarchists inspired by the Zapatista principle of mandar obedeciendo (“leading by obeying”) as well as by the anarchist tradition of mistrust for Leninist-style vanguardism argue that rather than presuming to “lead” social movements of the oppressed, anarchists should attempt to help existing movements to self-organize, even when not all goals are shared.

Finally, the very fact of living within the state poses routine moral and tactical problems for anarchists, particularly in so far as states adopt some of the characteristics of democracy and socialism. Proudhon himself, in the revolutionary moment of 1848, sought election to the French parliament as a platform for his economic proposals, albeit without success and to his rapid regret. Then and now, each election renews the question of whether it is appropriate or useful for anarchists to vote in defense of civil rights and social welfare. For many anarchists (and perhaps most), this question is always to be answered in the negative, on principle: even when there is something to be gained by voting or lost by abstaining, voting fails the test of means-ends consistency. Moreover, it is argued, such engagement with the system always risks legitimizing it, diluting radical energies; reforms and welfare initiatives stifle discontent and coopt potential revolutionary actors, and even voting defensively against fascists means becoming the tool of political rivals. However, a number of anarchists, from Saverio Merlino (1856–1930) to Noam Chomsky (b. 1928), have objected to hardline abstentionism, which can seem to sacrifice the direct interests of the oppressed in the present for the sake of a principle located in the future.

Decline and Renaissance

While it is extremely difficult to estimate the size of the anarchist movement at any point in its history with any real certainty, it may nonetheless be possible to date the height of its global scope and power to the years just before and after 1917, the year of the Russian Revolution. However, the triumph of the Bolsheviks in Russia, at first taken as a sign of hope, was to prove disastrous for the anarchist movement on several counts. First, the Soviet state itself became one of the most powerful enemies of anarchist movements within its own territories (crushing the Makhnovist revolt in the Ukraine and the uprising at Kronstadt, jailing and exiling anarchist dissidents) and in Spain, where Stalin’s machinations were instrumental in securing the collapse of resistance to the fascist coup. Waves of anti-communist reaction in the United States and elsewhere pushed workers away from anarchism, serving meanwhile as the pretext for another round of repressive state measures. Perhaps more fatally, Bolshevism became established as the model par excellence of revolutionary action and post-revolutionary organization, copied all over the globe by emergent socialist and nationalist movements, reversing the terms of the old rivalry.

Many histories of anarchism written from the standpoint of the end of the twentieth century ring the curtain down after the end of the Spanish Civil War in 1939, concluding that while anarchism persisted as an idea among scattered groups and isolated intellectuals, it never again enjoyed the close link it once had to active mass movements. Even the worldwide rebellions of the 1960s and 1970s, after the fact, appeared to have been a radical hiccup in a world-system otherwise stably split between finance capitalism and bureaucratic socialism, giving way in its turn to a monopolar world dominated by multinational capital and American military power.

From the standpoint of the last decade, this assessment seems to have been premature: indeed, quite suddenly, in the wake of the Seattle protests of 1999, observers of the nascent global justice movement noted that anarchism seemed to be “the radical ideology that prevails among its core activists” (Epstein 2001: 13). Over the same period – notably in regions hit hardest by neoliberal doctrines, such as Argentina after the economic collapse of 2001 and New Orleans after Hurricane Katrina – anarchist practices of mutual aid and direct action were spontaneously reinvented as means of survival.

The “new anarchism” is in many ways discontinuous with the old, both institutionally and ideologically. Many of the new anarchists have nothing to do with the surviving anarchist unions and federations, have little expectation of an imminent revolution, and theorize in terms strongly inflected both by the “New Social Movements” of the 1960s and 1970s (particularly ecology and feminism) and by the post-Marxist and postmodern philosophies that emerged from that era as alternatives to the varieties of Marxist discourse still dominant in the New Left. The continuities, however, are arguably profound – both in terms of the unresolved problems and the unexhausted possibilities.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism and Culture, 1840–1939; Anarchism and Education; Anarchism and Gender; Anarchocommunism; Anarchosyndicalism; Infoshops

References and Suggested Readings

- Anderson, B. R. O. (2005) Under Three Flags: Anarchism and the Anti-Colonial Imagination. London: Verso.
- Bakunin, M. (2002) Bakunin on Anarchism. Montréal: Black Rose Books.
- Barclay, H. B. (1990) People Without Government: An Anthropology of Anarchy. London: Kahn & Averill.
- Berkman, A. (1929/2003) What Is Anarchism? Oakland: AK Press.
- Black, B. (1997) Anarchy After Leftism. Columbia: CAL Press.
- Bookchin, M. (1971/2004) Post-Scarcity Anarchism. Oakland: AK Press.
- Bookchin, M. (1995) Social Anarchism or Lifestyle Anarchism: An Unbridgeable Chasm. Oakland: AK Press.
- Cahm, C. (1989) Kropotkin and the Rise of Revolutionary Anarchism, 1872–1886. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Colson, D. (2001) Petit lexique philosophique de l'anarchisme de Proudhon à Deleuze. Paris: Librairie Générale Française.
- Colson, D. (2004) Trois essais de philosophie anarchiste: Islam, Histoire, Monadologie. Paris: Éditions Léo Scheer.
- Déjacque, J. (1857/2005) On Being Human. In Robert Graham (Ed.), Anarchism: A Documentary History of Libertarian Ideas, Vol. 1: From Anarchy to Anarchism (300 CE to 1939). Montréal: Black Rose Books.
- Dirlik, A. (1991) Anarchism in the Chinese Revolution. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Dolgoft, S. (1970/2002) The Relevance of Anarchism to Modern Society. Johannesburg: Zabalaza Books.
- Epstein, B. (2001) Anarchism and the Anti-Globalization Movement. Monthly Review 53, 4 (September): 1–14.
- Galleani, L. (1927/2006) The Principle of Organization in the Light of Anarchism. Cascadia: Pirate Press Portland.
- Goldman, E. (1910) Anarchism and Other Essays. New York: Mother Earth Publishing Association.
- Goodman, P. (1968) People or Personnel: Decentralizing and the Mixed Systems and Like a Conquered Province: The Moral Ambiguity of America. New York: Vintage Books.
- Graeber, D. (2001) Fragments of an Anarchist Anthropology. Chicago: Prickly Paradigm Press.
- Graeber, D. (2007) Possibilities: Essays on Hierarchy, Rebellion, and Desire. Oakland: AK Press.
- Guérin, D. (2005) No Gods, No Masters: An Anthology of Anarchism. Edinburgh: AK Press.
- Industrial Workers of the World (1908) Preamble and Constitution of the Industrial Workers of the World. Chicago: IWW.
- Krebs, E. (1998) Shifu, Soul of Chinese Anarchism. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Kropotkin, P. A. (1902/1989) Mutual Aid: A Factor of Evolution. Montréal: Black Rose Books.
- Kropotkin, P. A. (1927/2002) Anarchism: A Collection of Revolutionary Writings. New York: Dover Publications.
- Malatesta, E. (1993) Life and Ideas. London: Freedom Press.
- Nettlau, M. (1996) A Short History of Anarchism. London: Freedom Press.
- Proudhon, P.-J. (1840/1994) What Is Property? Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Proudhon, P.-J. (1851/1989) General Idea of the Revolution in the Nineteenth Century. London: Pluto Press.
- Purchase, G. (1997) Anarchism and Ecology. Montréal: Black Rose Books.
- Reclus, E., Clark, J. P., & Martin, C. (2004) Anarchy, Geography, Modernity: The Radical Social Thought of Elisée Reclus. Lanham, MD: Lexington Books.
- Rocker, R. (1938/2004) Anarcho-Syndicalism: Theory and Practice. Oakland: AK Press.
- Skirda, A. (2002) Facing the Enemy: A History of Anarchist Organization from Proudhon to May 1968. Edinburgh: AK Press.
- Voline (1924/2005) Anarchist Synthesis. In Robert Graham (Ed.), Anarchism: A Documentary History of Libertarian Ideas, Vol. 1: From Anarchy to Anarchism (300 CE to 1939). Montréal: Black Rose Books.
- Woodcock, G. (2004) Anarchism: A History of Libertarian Ideas and Movements. Peterborough: Broadview Press.

Anarchism, Argentina

Chuck Morse

Argentine anarchists built one of the largest, most dynamic anarchist movements in the world and played a pivotal role in that country's history from the 1890s to the 1930s. Though their numbers are greatly reduced today, traces of the movement's heyday are evident in the Argentine state's corporatist commitments and in a highly egalitarian counterculture.

High Point

The first anarchist groups formed in Argentina in the 1870s, galvanized by refugees from the Paris Commune and the arrival of anarchist literature from Spain, Italy, France, and other countries. French immigrants founded a section of the First International in Buenos Aires in 1872, and Italian and Spanish sections appeared shortly thereafter. Reflecting factional struggles that would split the organization internationally, the French section embraced Marx's views, whereas the Spaniards and Italians identified with Bakunin; the latter dominated among Argentine anarchists after 1876.

Anarchist ranks soon experienced substantial growth, thanks to the waves of European immigrants who began landing on Argentine soil in the 1880s and did not stop for nearly three decades. The majority were Italian, the second largest group was Spanish (from Galicia, in particular), and the third was French. Some had experience in the European anarchist movement and virtually all came to escape political repression and poverty. Instead of finding prosperity and liberty, most encountered crushing economic deprivations and a government that responded to them primarily through repression. This, in the context of a society undergoing massive economic and industrial growth, provided fertile ground for anarchists' revolutionary aspirations.

Initially, anarchist groups focused on discussion and education and stood aloof from larger social struggles; however, this countercultural posture grew increasingly untenable as a debate unfolded among anarchists about the relative merits of intervention in the labor movement. Some believed that such a course would dilute anarchist aims, whereas others saw it as the most effective path to revolution. Advocates of the latter perspective were triumphant, thanks especially to three Italian anarchists: Errico Malatesta, Héctor Mattei, and Pietro Gori. This victory set the stage for the emergence of a mass anarchist movement.

Anarchists were instrumental in creating Argentina's earliest workers' organizations. In 1901 a coalition of anarchists and socialists founded Argentina's first labor federation, the Argentine Workers' Federation (Federación Obrera Argentina) (FOA). The socialists departed soon after, and founded the General Workers Union (Unión General de Trabajadores), leaving the FOA in anarchist hands. The FOA was an explicitly revolutionary body committed to direct action, boycott, sabotage, and class warfare in general. In 1904 the FOA changed its name to the Regional Worker's Federation of Argentina (Federación Obrera Regional Argentina) (FORA). At the FORA's 5th congress in 1905 it made a commitment to anarchocommunist part of organizational statutes.

Anarchists had greater penetration among workers than militants from any other tendency, and their unions won many important victories, such as wage increases, reductions in the length of the working day, and various rights of association. They led the port workers, ground transport workers, and seamen's unions, and were also heavily represented among bakers, metal workers, construction workers, and ship workers. Control of these unions, particularly those operating on the ports and in the ground transport industry, put them in a position to paralyze Argentina's economy. Anarchists did, in fact, disrupt economic normalcy on numerous occasions and in some cases brought the country to a standstill. They led six general strikes in the first decade of the century and many more that were partial, though still significant. Their goal was to organize a revolutionary general strike that would cause the capitalist economy and the political structure to collapse, leading ultimately to complete workers' self-management; however, anarchists believed that confronting and defeating capitalism required more than just battles on the shop floor and along the picket line: it also demanded that workers feel a strong sense of class solidarity and have an enlightened, progressive perspective on social affairs.

Anarchists set out to nurture this through myriad cultural activities. They were extremely active publishers, putting out two dozen periodicals between 1890 and 1904, sometimes as many as twenty at one time, including eight in Italian and three in French. La Protesta Humana, which was founded in 1897, became a daily, and sometimes twice daily, publication after 1904. A general-interest anarchist newspaper, it reached a very wide audience. For example, more than 10,000 copies were circulated weekly in 1907, even though it was banned at the time. Another anarchist daily, La Batalla (The Battle), was founded in 1910. It published a morning as well as evening edition. Additional publications of note were La Liberté, La Question Sociale, El Oprimido, El Perseguido, L'Avvenire, and El Rebelde.

Theater and poetry were also important. Influential wordsmiths included poet and playwright Alberto Ghirardo, Uruguayan-born dramatist Florencio Sánchez, and the novelist Roberto Arlt; as well as Félix Basterra, González Pacheco, Armando Discépolo, Alejandro Sux, and José de Maturana. Drawn to forms that seemed amenable to mainstream literary circles, they scarcely wrote philosophy and never produced anarchist theory of consequence.

Anarchists did not limit their radicalism to the written word. They were pivotal in the development of the tango, the quintessential expression of Argentine working-class culture before World War II. Anarchist dissidence even impacted language: lunfardo, the Argentine argot (slang) born of the prisons and ghetto streets, was closely linked to the tango and was part of the anarchist counterculture. Pageantry, in the form of parades and marches, was an integral component of their cultural apparatus. Their annual May Day marches often drew tens of thousands, demonstrating anarchist strength and, by forcing a revolutionary holiday upon the public, punctuating their assertion of a counternarrative to Argentina's historical development. Anarchists also created their own pantheon of heroes and martyrs, often foreign-born (as well as Argentine) revolutionary militants. Anarchists institutionalized their cultural interventions in social centers, theaters, adult and children's schools, popular libraries, and discussion circles. Linked to the unions and seeded throughout proletarian districts, these bodies were a vital dimension of the revolutionary movement, and easily mobilized during times of crisis.

Anarchists' commitment to leveling social hierarchies prompted them to advance a generous social radicalism. For instance, challenges to patriarchy and support for women's self-organization were common elements of anarchist discourse. There was a higher percentage of female activists among anarchists than among other radical tendencies, and an anarcha-feminist paper appeared as early as 1896 (La Voz de la Mujer), under the slogan "No god, no boss, no husband." One prominent anarchist, Virginia Bolten, led what was probably the first strike by women in Argentina. Anarchists also participated in many actions that involved large numbers of females by necessity, such as rent strikes and consumer boycotts.

The government understood that anarchists had the potential to shatter the economic, political, and cultural foundations upon which Argentina lay, and responded with a wide spectrum of measures designed to raise the cost of revolutionary activism. Petty police harassment – humiliating and inconvenient searches and gratuitous demands for identification – was a familiar experience for militants. The outlawing of radical publications, the suppression of the right to public assembly, and mass arrests were also common; martial law was declared for a total of 18 months between 1902 and 1910. There were also legislative attempts to undermine the anarchist movement, specifically the Ley de Residencia (1902) and the Ley de Defensa Social (1910). The former granted the government the right to deport foreigners that it deemed undesirable, whereas the latter levied a series of penalties against anarchist activity specifically.

The state resorted to outright violence as well, which it exercised through the police, the army, and other formal forces, in addition to thugs, acting on its behalf. For instance, police opened fire on the anarchists' May Day march in 1909, killing several people as a result. There was also mass police repression in 1910 during events surrounding the centenary of Argentine national independence. Nine years later, anarchists would be scarred by incidents that took place during the semana trágica (tragic week) that transpired between January 7 and January 14, 1919. The turmoil began when several workers were killed during a conflict between striking metal workers and strike breakers. This led to a general strike that crippled the entire country and pushed Buenos Aires into a state of chaos for several days. It took the combined efforts of the police and gangs of hooligans to finally subdue the rebellion. Historians estimate that 700 were killed and 4,000 were injured during the confrontations.

Not all the repression occurred in urban areas. Beginning in 1920, anarchists led a year-long rebellion by agricultural workers in the Patagonia region. The army responded with a crackdown that sent 1,500 to their death before firing squads. A German anarchist named Kurt Wilkens later responded to these aggressions by assassinating Colonel Héctor Varela, who had directed the army's actions.

Anarchists were also subject to pressure from elements within the workers' movement that wanted them to adulterate their revolutionary convictions. This achieved its most decisive result in 1915, at the FORA's 9th congress, when there was a split between syndicalists, who sought to rescind the federation's commitment to anarcho-communism, and anarchists, who defended it. Both tendencies departed from the congress claiming the FORA's name: syndicalists came to be known as the FORA of the 9th Congress and anarchists as the FORA of the 5th Congress.

Changes in the state (prompted in part by anarchist efforts) also rendered anarchists' anti-statism more tenuous. For instance, the Saenz Peña Law (1912) made (male) voting secret and obligatory. This helped clean up the electoral process, thus enhancing its legitimacy, while also making anarchist abstentionism illegal, thus narrowing the space available to anti-statist social action.

The accumulated impact of government repression, sectarian battles, and social changes meant that the 1920s would be a decade of retreat and internecine conflict for anarchists. Robberies and bombings carried out by Severino di Giovanni (1901–31), an Italian immigrant, propagandist, and partisan of revolutionary violence, were a central catalyst. In addition to other actions, he bombed the American embassy to protest the execution of Sacco and Vanzetti, and the Italian consulate to protest Italian Fascism (killing 9 and injuring 34). His actions specifically, and the issue of "anarcho-banditry" generally, ignited a passionate debate among anarchists. This played out in the pages of the anarchist press, particularly in La Anthoncha (which defended di Giovanni) and in La Protesta (which attacked him). Historians now attribute the assassination of Emilio López Arango (1894–1929), a La Protesta editor and one of di Giovanni's fiercest critics, to di Giovanni himself, who was arrested and executed in 1931.

Decline

The 1930 coup led by General José Félix Uriburu dealt the final blow to anarchism's existence as a mass movement, due primarily to the imposition of martial law and the assertion of a strong corporatist perspective within the state. Although anarchists continued to organize and disseminate their views, they slowly returned to the counter-cultural posture that was characteristic of their efforts in the 1880s.

Anarchists founded the Argentine Anarcho-Communist Federation (Federación Anarco Comunista Argentina) in 1935, which became the Argentine Libertarian Federation (Federación Libertaria Argentina) in 1955. This group, however, never acquired a mass base. Also in 1935, a coalition of socialists and anarchists started the Biblioteca Popular José Ingenieros, a library and social center. The socialists departed shortly after its founding, leaving the project in anarchist control. Anarchists led the solidarity campaigns organized to aid anti-fascists in the Spanish Civil War, and many traveled to Europe to fight among anarchist forces there.

The rise of Argentine President Juan Domingo Perón was paradoxical for anarchists. Although his populism was strongly linked to working-class mobilization and his government provided unprecedented benefits to workers, anarchists rejected Peronism as a jingoistic state-centered project that operated through networks of caciques instead of genuine proletarian democracy.

From the New Left to the Dictatorship

A portion of the many Argentine youth radicalized during the 1960s and 1970s turned to anarchism, although they were largely unable to work cooperatively with the older generation of anarchists. This was a consequence of cultural as well as political differences, particularly the younger militants' identification with the anti-imperialist currents that were then sweeping the globe. This divide caused a bitter wound in Argentina's multi-generational anarchist legacy, although it also prompted the more youthful militants to define their views with a degree of specificity not found among anarchists in countries that avoided such intramural conflicts.

Resistencia Libertaria (RL) was the most significant anarchist group to emerge during this period. Clandestine and cellular in structure, it aimed to spark mass resistance and, ultimately, a prolonged popular war. It agitated in the neighborhood, labor, and student movements, and also had a small armed wing, which it used for the purposes of defense and expropriation.

Though formally a national organization, it operated primarily in La Plata, Córdoba, and Buenos Aires. A significant percentage of RL activists were disappeared in the mid-1970s, and many more after the 1976 military coup, as Argentine society grew increasingly polarized. RL continued to be active under the dictatorship until 1978, when police conducted simultaneous raids throughout the country and seized most of its remaining members. Approximately 80 percent of RL militants spent time in the dictatorship's concentration camps, where all were tortured and most were executed.

From the Return to Constitutional Rule to the Present

Novel and relatively anti-authoritarian social actors emerged during the final years of the dictatorship and immediately after the 1983 reinstallation of civil government. The Madres de la Plaza de Mayo, a group of mothers organizing on behalf of people disappeared under the military government, are the best known, although there were also ecologists, feminists, and others. This reflected a turn away from the state as the focus of the left's efforts, and an inclination toward a more decentralist politics. This phenomenon encouraged a renewed interest in anarchism, but not a significant increase in the ranks of the old anarchist groups. Punk rock also played an important role in cultivating interest in anarchism.

Argentina's 2001 economic crisis prompted the appearance of even more confrontational and more anarchistic social actors, such as militant neighborhood assemblies, factory occupations, and aggressive street protests. Their actions, combined with generalized public anger at the government, threw the country into a state of disorder and led successive Argentine presidents to resign. Though anarchists participated actively in these movements, they did not play a central role in defining their goals, and the size and number of anarchist groups did not expand dramatically.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism and Culture, 1840–1939; Argentina, Armed Struggle and Guerilla Organizations, 1960s–1970s; Argentina, General Strike (Semana Trágica), 1919; Argentina, Social and Political Protest, 2001–2007; Argentina, Worker Strikes in Patagonia, 1920–1921

References and Suggested Readings

- Alexander, R. (2003) A History of Organized Labor in Argentina. Westport, CT: Praeger.
- Bayer, O. (1986) Anarchism and Violence: Severino di Giovanni in Argentina, 1923–1931. London: Elephant Editions.
- Lopez, F. & Diz, V. (2007) Resistencia Libertaria. Buenos Aires: Madreselva.
- Munck, R. (1987) Argentina: From Anarchism to Peronism: Workers, Unions and Politics, 1855–1985. London: Zed Books.
- Oved, I. (1978) El anarquismo y el movimiento obrero en Argentina. Mexico: Siglo Veintiuno.
- Suriano, J. (2001) Anarquistas: cultura y política libertaria en Buenos Aires, 1890–1910. Buenos Aires: Manantial.
- Zibechi, R. (2003) Genealogía de la revuelta: Argentina, la sociedad en movimiento. Montevideo: Nordan Comunidad.

Anarchism, Australia

Bob James

At least as early as the 1840s (“Australia” having only been settled by white Europeans in 1788), the term “anarchist” was used as a slander by conservatives against their political opponents; for example, by W. C. Wentworth against Henry Parkes and J. D. Lang for speaking in favor of Australian independence from Britain. This opportunistic blackening of reputations has continued to the present day. What has also continued is that Australian attempts to express the philosophy positively have reflected other countries' concerns or global rather than local issues.

For example, the first positive public expression of the philosophy was the Melbourne Anarchist Club (MAC) which, established in 1886, consciously reflected the Boston Anarchist Club's approach to strategy and philosophy, having a secretary, a chairperson, speakers' rules, and prepared papers which the public were invited to hear. The club was also a response to the 1884 call by the Federation of Organized Trades and Labor Unions of the US and Canada for a celebration of May 1, 1886 as an expression of working-class solidarity. The first MAC meeting was held on that day at the instigation of Fred Upham from Rhode Island, the two Australian-born Andrade brothers, David and William, and three other discontented members of the Australasian Secular Association (ASA) based in Melbourne.

Australian labor activists had been involved in Eight Hour Day agitations since 1871 and in deliberately associating themselves with the overseas movement for May Day the MAC organizers exposed their lack of involvement in local labor politics and their vulnerability to the rise or fall of distant agendas. Their first meeting, of course, almost coincided with the Haymarket explosion in Chicago, and the longer and more colorfully that tragedy and its aftermath held world attention, the more difficult it was for less sensational views to be put.

In the absence of more detailed and considered research, it also seems reasonable to argue that the infamous arrests, mistrial, and execution of self-proclaimed anarchists for the explosion set the scene for the next century. Not only did short-term conflict between supporters of local Eight Hour Days and those in favor of the more international May Day approach bedevil labor politics for some years, but, in the long term, libertarianism of all forms has been greatly handicapped and on the defensive ever since. This comment can probably be made about much anarchist endeavor around the world, but the close identification of the MAC with “the Haymarket” has possibly had a longer-lasting and deeper negative impact. This is despite the fact that it was, during our own “Reign of Terror,” a focal point for local agitators: “With one possible exception, the trial of the eight Chicago anarchists is the most dramatic in all labour history” (Lane 1939: 16).

In what was a period of great social upheaval, many well-known union leaders and labor spokespeople actually declared their support in the decade, 1886–96. But they had to do so from behind pseudonyms or in private. Years later they could publically acknowledge having being influenced by propagandists from the MAC, in particular by Jack Andrews, a major figure, who, among other things, believed he was the first anywhere to articulate a theory of communist-anarchism.

One of the earliest members of the MAC, Andrews had to overcome a severe stutter and depression brought on by a tormented childhood, an above-average intelligence, and a fragmented cultural background. He developed skills as an inventor, a poet, and a linguist, and was prepared to push his beliefs to the extremes of sleeping rough, refusing payment for work, and living off the land. Renouncing respectability, such as the yoke of collar and tie, and devoting himself entirely to “the cause,” he impressed his comrades with his learning and sincerity, but was easily picked off by the authorities on trumped up charges when the police failed to involve him in sham dynamite plots. He gave up mass agitational work in 1895, but continued writing, including for overseas journals such as Freedom and Revolt, and moving in labor circles, becoming editor of Tocsin in 1901. He died of consumption in 1903.

Under internal and external pressures, the MAC had by 1890 already fractured into “voluntary-communist,” communist-anarchist, and individualist anarchist factions, the last specifically following Benjamin Tucker and other US writers.

Writer and publicist David Andrade, who wrote the club’s constitution, developed what would be later called lifestyle anarchism. In the 1890s this meant vegetarianism and hydrotherapy and agitation against organized religion and medical interventions such as vaccination and fluoride. He left Melbourne for Gippsland, where he attempted self-sufficiency along the lines of a scheme he’d set out in his book The Melbourne Riots (1892). In 1895 his family lost everything in a bushfire. Andrade succumbed to the loss and was institutionalized, where he died in 1929.

Perhaps the best known of all labor organizers in the period when the Australian Labor Party was born, 1890–5, William Lane, brother of Ernie, came to Australia from England in the 1880s. He quickly established himself as a journalist, and as editor of the Brisbane Worker, “John Miller,” he espoused libertarian communism under the guise of “mateship” and “cooperation.” Disillusioned with labor politics and convinced useful gains could not be made, he left the paper in 1892. After producing a documentary novel Working Man’s Paradise, he helped galvanize a mass emigration of hundreds of labor stalwarts in 1893 to Paraguay. “New Australia” foundered on a lack of preparation and over his leadership, which was veering to the authoritarian. In the early twentieth century he edited a conservative newspaper in New Zealand in which he opposed all labor-based initiatives.

John “Chummy” Fleming was a local agitator attracted to the MAC but never seduced by it. He initiated the first May Day procession in Melbourne, in 1892, and in later years felt that it was his, even when the organizers, political laborites, told him he was not wanted. With a cow bell and his black flag he would start well ahead, slowing down gradually until it appeared he was leading the march. Among Emma Goldman's correspondents, he continued to speak, rain, hail, or shine, in public parks until his death in the 1950s.

Its international focus and the conservative, even authoritarian nature of Australian society has meant that between that "revolutionary" period and the 1970s "youth movements" anarchism has been kept alive only by individuals or small scattered groups, a number of whom have been part of the continued emigration flow from Europe. Few have been researched in detail – a selection follows:

- A Spanish-language bulletin produced in Innisfail, Queensland by cane cutters and described as "the best anarchist newspaper produced at the time anywhere in the world" deserves mention here, with an Italian-language anti-fascist newspaper, Il Risveglio, produced in 1927 in Sydney.
- A school, "Koorngong," which flourished from 1939 to 1948 is just one of numerous examples of efforts for libertarian education.
- The Kleber-Claux family, from France, who energized the nudist movement in Sydney and elsewhere in the 1930s and 1940s and established one of the first communes in north Queensland.
- Harvey Buttonshaw, from Victoria, went to Spain to fight with the Syndicalists in 1936, and told George Orwell to pull his head in, or he'd get shot, just before exactly that happened. He is among the group shown on the front cover of Orwell's Homage to Catalonia.
- K. J. Kenafick campaigned for world peace largely on his own in the 1940s and 1950s, but did not live long enough to meet John Zube who articulated a theory he called Panarchy, or anarchism for peace, in the 1960s through to the 1990s.
- English gay man and anti-fascist refugee from Nazi retribution, John Olday developed a cabaret, "Immortal Clown," for his Café La Bohème in 1959 Sydney. His LP record "Roses and Gallows" might have been picked up by the Sydney Libertarians who made a splash from the late 1950s into the 1960s, but they were more interested in free love, personal freedom, and betting systems.

- Australia also provided a haven for Bulgarian, Spanish, Italian, and other European anarchists after World War II, Bulgaria being one of the few places where an anarchist government held office for a period between the retreating Nazis and the Soviets. Some of these were instrumental in setting up the long-running Jura Bookshop in Sydney in the 1970s, from which Red Fern Black Rose was a subsequent breakaway. Again, the split was largely between syndicalist and "lifestyle" anarchisms.

The Sydney Libertarians, or The Push as they were locally known, were survived by Germaine Greer, Clive James, Wendy Bacon, and Frank Moorhouse among others, who went on to establish themselves in the "alternative" 1970s and beyond.

In the mid-1970s, Alternative Canberra, instigated by Bob James, helped organize "Confests" (a combination of conference and festival) after Graeme Dunstan and others 'liberated' Nimbin on the north coast of New South Wales. The Anarcho-Surrealist Insurrectionary Feminists (ASIF) was a South Australian group which developed political street theater to insist that theoretical gender equivalence among anarchists was not good enough; Pio and his sister Thalia were Greek-born performance poets; Vince Ruiz was involved with Melbourne's Free Legal Service and the Free Store movement; Digger, Living Daylights, and Nation Review were important magazines to emerge from the ferment.

With the major events of the 1960s and 1970s so heavily influenced by overseas anarchists, local libertarians, in addition to those mentioned, were able to generate sufficient strength "down under" to again attempt broad-scale, formal organization. In particular, Andrew Giles-Peters, an academic at La Trobe University (Melbourne) fought to have local anarchists come to serious grips with Bakunin and Marxist politics within a Federation of Australian Anarchists format which produced a series of documents. Annual conferences that he, Brian Laver, Drew Hutton, and others organized in the early 1970s were sometimes disrupted by Spontaneists, including Peter McGregor, who went on to become a one-man team stirring many national and international issues.

Community Radio was an important libertarian channel for numerous grouplets and individuals as feminism and green thinking in all their forms took hold. The not-so-green Libertarian Workers group in Melbourne, led by medico Joe Toscano, has since been a major force. He was instrumental in attempting exorcism of the “Haymarket effect” in May 1986 with the Australian Anarchist Centenary Celebrations. Held over four days and nights, it brought locals and international visitors together but failed in its long-term purposes, perhaps for the same reasons that William Lane failed.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism; Anarchosyndicalism; Haymarket Tragedy

References and Suggested Readings

- James, B. (Ed.) (1979) A Reader of Australian Anarchism. Canberra: Bob James.
- James, B. (Ed.) (1983) What is Communism? And Other Essays by JA Andrews. Prahran, Victoria: Libertarian Resources/Backyard Press.
- James, B. (Ed.) (1986) Anarchism in Australia – An Anthology. Prepared for the Australian Anarchist Centennial Celebration, Melbourne, May 1–4, in a limited edition. Melbourne: Bob James.
- James, B. (1986) Anarchism and State Violence in Sydney and Melbourne, 1886–1896. Melbourne: Bob James.
- Lane, E. (Jack Cade) (1939) Dawn to Dusk. N. P. William Brooks.
- Lane, W. (J. Miller) (1891/1980) Working Mans' Paradise. Sydney: Sydney University Press.

Anarchism, Britain

Benjamin Franks

As far back as the nineteenth century there was a significant division between class struggle, social anarchism, and the alternative, individualist version of libertarianism. In the UK context this latter branch of anarchism was associated with Henry Seymour, a “disciple” of Benjamin Tucker. Seymour, who some claim edited the first anarchist newspaper in Britain, The Anarchist (1885), briefly collaborated with Peter Kropotkin, but their partnership soon folded because of philosophical differences (individualism vs. mainstream socialist versions of anarchism). Kropotkin departed to set up his own anti-capitalist anarchist paper, Freedom.

Kropotkin's Freedom group also supported the radical organization of largely Jewish immigrants, based around Der Arbeiter Frainit (The Workers' Friend) newspaper, which was originally a non-aligned socialist periodical but increasingly identified itself as anarchist. With the assistance of the anarchosyndicalist Rudolf Rocker, the group helped to form unions of Jewish immigrant textile workers, and by 1912 organized a successful mass strike of thousands of tailors from across London's communities.

The first decades of the twentieth century saw a considerable increase in agitation within British industry. By 1907 the growth was such that Freedom was producing its own syndicalist journal, The Voice of Labor, edited by the shop steward John Turner, a former colleague of William Morris. This intensified militancy did not originate from anarchosyndicalists, but did confirm the relevance of such tactics. The extent of syndicalist thinking in the more mainstream workers' movement was demonstrated by the document produced by members of the unofficial rank-and-file committee of the Miners' Federation of Britain (a forerunner of the National Union of Mineworkers). This plan, The Miners' Next Step, was a lucid proposal of federal organization in order to wage effective class warfare. Even after the rise of Leninism in the Welsh coalfields, Albert Meltzer, a later class struggle anarchist, noted with pleasure that a small pocket of syndicalism continued there for decades.

After the Bolshevik Revolution, however, state communism began to dominate the non-social democratic wings of the British labor movement at the expense of more heterodox forms of socialism. The apparent vindication of Lenin's centralized and “disciplined” methods in the October Revolution, along with the use of Russia's financial reserves to provide a competitive advantage to revolutionaries who conformed to Lenin's strategy, marginalized alternative radical movements. As Leninism and Stalinism dominated, the discourse of Marxism came to be associated with the increasingly odious rationalizations for totalitarian governance.

Despite the hegemony of Leninism over the use of Marxist terminology, there was a consistent, recognizable section of British anarchists that retained an insistence on identifying with the economically oppressed class. From World War II until the 1980s these tended to be, but were not exclusively, from syndicalist or quasi-syndicalist sections of anarchism, which, as a result, placed priority on radical action at the point of production. This syndicalist strand can be traced from the 1940s' Anarchist Federation of Britain and Syndicalist Workers Federation, to Black Flag in the 1960s, the Direct Action Movement of the late 1970s and 1980s, to the present-day Solidarity Federation and the anarchist-influenced Industrial Workers of the World. There were (and are) other class struggle groups whose orientation was not confined to the syndicalist strategy of developing structures for waging industrial warfare at the point of production. Among the longest running of these were Solidarity (1960–92), Class War (1983–), and the Anarchist Communist Federation, now known simply as the Anarchist Federation (1986–).

By the mid-1960s the rift between class struggle anarchists and the increasingly liberal anarchist movement became more apparent. This liberal turn was identified with Freedom, a paper which lay claim to being the linear successor to Kropotkin, and produced an edition celebrating the “first century”; however, between 1932 and 1944 there was a break in publication. The new Freedom and Colin Ward's influential 1960s magazine Anarchy took anarchist ideas and revised and reapplied them to a host of concerns not previously covered by libertarian publications. With the rise of the counterculture, these publications took a more liberal, less class-oriented approach, aiming to influence policy-makers and white-collar employees rather than foment revolutionary change.

The division between the counterculture and class-based politics was permeable, as the squatting movements of the 1960s and 1970s and later punk-inspired milieus were to demonstrate. Nonetheless, the apparent shift away from class-based action was opposed by militants such as Stuart Christie; he sought more direct engagement with working-class opposition, and was famously caught smuggling explosives to the anti-Franco resistance. From the 1960s onwards other concerns that were not directly related to the extraction of surplus labor came to the political fore, such as campaigns against colonialism, promotion of environmental concerns including animal rights, and advocacy of feminism and sexual liberation. Some of these issues and forms of organizing sat uncomfortably with a more programmatic, class-based approach.

By the time of the Miners' Strike in 1984, anarchism had minimal influence on – and in – working-class structures of resistance. The experience of the Miners' Strike, shortly followed by the intense print workers dispute, however, played an influential role in resurrecting class-struggle anarchism in Britain. The main anarchist groups, as a result of the engagement in the strike (and its subsequent defeat), developed a more robust and coherent conception of the agency for libertarian social change, and helped to create social structures more consistent with the anti-hierarchical principles of anarchism. Whilst class oppression was not always the sole or main structure of subjugation, in many contexts (if not all) it was increasingly recognized as having a substantial role.

The various categories of British anarchism have shared a remarkable consistency in iconography, targets, and critical discourse: they have rejected the state, used the language of “resistance” and “liberation,” promoted self-activity, engaged in direct action, and used and adapted long-established symbols of revolt. More recently, however, degrees of convergence have come to the fore. Class-based anarchists have recognized that not all forms of oppression are reducible to class alone, while those involved in issue-centered campaigns (such as the environmental movement) have recognized the class feature inherent in many of these issues. Networks of solidarity between disparate groups became a prominent characteristic of anarchist organization and were a significant feature of the global justice movement (also referred to as the anti-capitalist and anti-globalization movement).

SEE ALSO: Anarchism; Anarchocommunist; Anarchosyndicalism; Britain, Trade Union Movement; Britain, Post-World War II Political Protest; British Miners' Strike, 1984–1985; Class Identity and Protest; Class Struggle

References and Suggested Readings

- Aufheben (1998) The Politics of Anti-Road Struggle and the Struggles of Anti-Road Politics: The Case of the No M11 Link Road Campaign. In G. McKay (Ed.), DIY Culture: Party and Protest in Nineties Britain. London: Verso.
- Christie, S. (1980) The Christie File. Sanday: Cienfuegos Press.
- Communist Party (1957) Inner Party Democracy. London: Communist Party.
- Dangerfield, G. (1997) The Strange Death of Liberal England. London: Serif.
- Gordon, U. (2005) Anarchism and Political Theory: Contemporary Problems. Doctoral thesis, Mansfield College, Oxford University.

Kendall, W. (1969) The Revolutionary Movement in Britain. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson.

Woodcock, G. (1975) Anarchism. London: Penguin.

Anarchism, Canada

Allan Antliff

The history of European-influenced anarchism in Canada begins in the late nineteenth century as the process of colonial state-building reached its apogee. Two US-based French-language anarchist-communist journals, La Torpille and Le Réveil des masses (produced by exiled Paris Communards), circulated in Quebec during this period, but their readership remains elusive. Just before World War I, anarchist groups are documented in urban centers such as Montreal, Winnipeg, Calgary, and Toronto and in the newly established western province of British Columbia. The anarchist-syndicalist Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) was mobilizing unskilled and racially oppressed workers (Chinese immigrants, for example) in the thousands. The IWW also circulated a bilingual French/English newspaper, Travailleur/The Worker, in Quebec and Ontario. Responding to government repression during World War I, a competing organization, the One Big Union (OBU), was formed in the spring of 1919 by former IWW activists and members of the Canadian Socialist Party. Co-opting IWW organizational tactics, it rejected anti-state syndicalism in favor of reformism. Within months of its founding, the OBU was organizing general strikes in Calgary, Winnipeg, and Edmonton, but the tenor of militancy quickly fell away. Weakened by defections to the OBU, the IWW's last large-scale organizing drive swept the logging camps of British Columbia in 1924. Thereafter the union declined so precipitously that by the 1930s it was "little more than a debating society."

In the 1920s and 1930s, the anarchist movement survived among emigrant populations, primarily within Jewish communities. When Emma Goldman resided in Canada in 1926–8 and again in 1933–5 and 1939–40, she drew support from such groups in Montreal, London, Toronto, Winnipeg, and Edmonton. In the 1930s anti-fascist activists from Italy, Spain, and Germany brought renewed energy to the movement, and before her death in 1940, Goldman campaigned (successfully) to save an Italian militant, Attilio Bortolotti, from deportation. Bortolotti and other exceptionally committed émigrés (notably Spanish Canadian Federico Arcos) kept anarchism alive during the 1940s and 1950s, when many more grew discouraged and fell away. At this juncture, anarchism's most significant impact was in the arts. On August 9, 1948, Paul-Émile Borduas, Jean-Paul Riopelle, and Françoise Sullivan and 13 other French-speaking writers, painters, and sculptors issued a manifesto of social revolt through anarchism in art – Global Refusal – which scandalized Quebec's cultural and political establishment. The "Automatists" are now a celebrated movement in the history of modernism.

After a period of hiatus, the upsurge of the Vietnam era generated a new wave of anarchists who, in the course of the 1970s and 1980s, transformed the face of radicalism in Canada. Anarchists were involved in the feminist movement, ecological protests, indigenous solidarity work, prison support work, the punk movement, and local community initiatives including housing cooperatives, back to the land communes, and info shops. A plethora of journals came out in the 1980s and 1990s – Demolition Derby, Rebelles, La Nuit, Bulldozer/Prison News Service, Endless Struggle, Reality Now, No Picnic, Anarchives, Démanarchie, Open Road, Kick it Over, Resistance, and BOA form a partial list. At this juncture, armed struggle also enters the picture. In 1982 the Vancouver-based Wimmin's Fire Brigade firebombed a chain of video stores marketing violent pornography. That same year a second underground group, Direct Action, ended the Canadian production of guidance systems for nuclear-armed cruise missiles by bombing Toronto's Litton Systems plant. Previously, the group had disrupted industrial expansion on Vancouver Island by destroying a hydro substation. Both actions inflicted massive property damage, leading to an intense manhunt that ended with the arrest of all five members on January 20, 1983.

As the 1990s drew to a close, the anarchist movement in Canada was growing exponentially. Anarchist-run bookstores, cooperatives, and social centers had spread across the country and cities in Quebec, Ontario, Saskatchewan, and British Columbia, and annual anarchist book fairs were hosted. Anarchists spearheaded militant anti-globalization protests beginning in 1997 with demonstrations against the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation Summit in Vancouver and culminating in April 2001 with “Carnival Against Capitalism” actions targeting 34 heads of state convening to discuss a Free Trade Agreement of the Americas in Quebec City. Anarchism also made inroads in academe. Sociologist Richard Day’s influential study, Gramsci is Dead: Anarchist Currents in the Newest Social Movements (2005), is but one example of recent scholarly contributions to the movement.

When considering the nation-state called “Canada,” we must never forget it is a colonial project imposed on indigenous peoples whose homelands were forcibly seized by European colonizers. Indigenous peoples continue to struggle against colonial occupation to this day, and vast swaths of “Canada” are in fact unceded lands, illegally occupied and administered by the colonizing state. Under these circumstances, anarchist solidarity with indigenous struggles has been complemented by the growth of anarchist theory and practice in an indigenous context. Kanienkeha (Mohawk) scholar Taiaiake Alfred has played a leading role in this regard. Theorizing “anarcho-indigenism” as a path to the revitalization and renewal of indigenous peoples, Alfred is transforming anarchism yet again, as befits a movement that regards diversity as integral to its realization.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism and Gender; Anarcho-communism; Anarchosyndicalism; Canada, Indigenous Resistance; Canada, Labor Protests; Global Justice Movement and Resistance; Goldman, Emma (1869–1940); Industrial Workers of the World (IWW); Winnipeg General Strike of 1919; World Trade Organization (WTO) Protests, Quebec City, 2001

References and Suggested Readings

- Alfred, T. (2005) Wasáse, Indigenous Pathways of Action and Freedom. Peterborough: Broadview Press.
- Antliff, A. (Ed.) (2004) Only A Beginning: An Anarchist Anthology. Vancouver: Arsenal Pulp Press.
- Borduas, P.-E. (1978) Ecrits/Writings, 1942–1958. Halifax: Nova Scotia School of Art and Design.
- Cyr, M.-A. (2006) La Presse anarchiste au Québec (1976–2001). Mascouche, Quebec: Editions Rouge et Noir.
- Day, R. J.-F. (2005) Gramsci is Dead: Anarchist Currents in the Newest Social Movements. London: Pluto Press.
- Leier, M. (1990) Where the Fraser River Flows: The Industrial Workers of the World in British Columbia. Vancouver: New Star Books.

Moritz, T. & Moritz, A. (2001) The World’s Most Dangerous Woman: A New Biography of Emma Goldman. Vancouver: Subway Books.

Woodsworth, A. (1972) The Alternative Press in Canada. Toronto: University of Toronto Press.

Anarchism, Chile

Larry Gambone

The first Chilean anarchists were mutualists. Francisco Bilbao and Santiago Arcos visited Paris during the revolution of 1848 and were influenced by the mutualist anarchism of Pierre Proudhon and the Christian socialism of Felicité de Lamennais. Returning to Chile in 1850, they formed La Sociedad de la Igualdad (Equality Society) (SI) Within a year the group was suppressed by the authorities, but not before the La Serena branch enrolled 100 artisans in the first functioning mutual aid society. Other mutualist societies were formed in the late 1850s, but it was not until 1862, with the founding of La Union in Santiago, that mutualism became influential among artisans. La Union branches spread to more than a dozen cities, providing medical services as well as a workshop for the unemployed.

The mutualists created an alternate culture, a microcosm of a workers’ republic. They believed capitalism could be transformed peacefully through the practical application of the principals of liberty, mutuality, solidarity, and self-education. In 1894 the Chilean mutualists formed the Federacion de Trabajadores de Chile (Workers Confederation) (FTCh), the first national federation. The confederation fought for social reform, as well as the usual activities of education and health insurance. By 1925 it had more than 100,000 members.

Revolutionary anarchism came to Chile in the 1890s through a Bakuninist Spaniard, Manuel Chinchilla. Carlos Jorquera, the first Chilean revolutionary anarchist, was influenced by Chinchilla and in 1892 they formed the Centro de Estudios Sociales, and published a paper, El Oprimido. Jorquera also organized a maritime union. Revolutionaries within the Mutualist Confederation produced the journal El Grito del Pueblo in 1896. Most of the early revolutionary anarchists were skilled workers who came out of the Mutualist Confederation.

From 1900 to 1910 anarchists were the best organized of all the radical groups, strong in printing, baking, shoe making, and the docks. The first Resistance Society was formed in 1898 by railway workers, but they also founded a Resistance Society among carpenters, which played a major role in the Santiago General Strike of 1907. The Resistance Societies were anarchist-inspired and influenced by Argentine anarchism. They were decentralized, rotated leadership, and locally autonomous. The movement was concentrated in central Chile, chiefly among industrial workers, and by 1900 there were 30 societies. This mushroomed to 433 by 1910, with a total membership of 55,000.

The mancomunales (brotherhoods) developed from the mutualist movement and were simultaneously mutual aid societies and trade unions. First organized in 1900 in Iquique by anarchists, they soon had 6,000 members – the majority of the nitrate and maritime workers in the North, and all the major strikes in that region were organized by mancomunales. The movement favored direct action and a much greater level of organization and solidarity than the Resistance Societies. While the Resistance Societies were local, the Brotherhoods were organized on a territorial basis, uniting different trades, first on a city-wide, then a provincial, and finally at a national level. The mancomunales federated in 1904 as the Gran Mancomunal de Obreras, uniting 20,000 members. The movement almost died after the 1907 depression and military repression, the worst instance of which was the Santa Maria Massacre in Iquique, where 3,000 miners were killed by machine gun fire.

The Brotherhoods revived in 1916–18 and created the Federación de Obreros de Chile (Chilean Workers Federation) (FOCh). This organization was an umbrella group containing all tendencies – mutualist, populist, anarchist, and socialist – and was the first national labor federation. As militancy increased, the FOCh radicalized. In 1919 the union adopted anarchosyndicalist principles and a federal structure. Most trade unions remaining outside of FOCh in the period 1917–22 were also anarchosyndicalist. During this period and for several years after, anarchism was more influential among workers than Marxism. The syndicalist FOCh was short lived, however, and in a few years it was taken over by the communists.

Many young intellectuals were attracted to anarchism, especially after World War I. University and college students organized the Federación de Estudiantes de Chile (Federation of Chilean Students) (FECh) as an anarchist union. Some important anarchist leaders of the postwar period were Manuel Rojas, a novelist who was later in the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), and the writer Eugenio Gonzalez-Rojas. Pablo Neruda was close to the anarchists at this time as well.

The Chilean IWW was officially launched in 1919 at a national convention, and soon expanded to 19 cities. Total membership stood at about 10,000 at this period. In 1925 Colonel Carlos Ibanez took power in a coup, and in 1927 formally abolished the labor movement. Union offices were raided, the IWW and anarchist groups disbanded, and all their journals shut down. The anarchists and the IWW never fully recovered from the coup. Even though more influential than the communists, they had lost their leadership role among the workers.

In 1950 anarchists formed the Movement for Workers' Unity to combine all labor unions in one central body. Thus was born the Central Unitaria de Trabajadores (Chile's United Labor Center) (CUT) in 1953, uniting most of Chile's unions, including the CGT. The CUT executive had four anarchist members, and anarchists controlled the shoe workers, printers, and maritime unions. After the failure of the 1955 General Strike called by CUT, most anarchosyndicalists withdrew from the federation. By 1960 anarchists had little influence in the union movement.

During the Popular Unity government of President Salvador Allende, anarchists were too few to be of any great influence. Nonetheless, there were developments similar in spirit to anarchosyndicalism. These occurred spontaneously, such as the Cordones Industriales (a form of workers' councils), and the Comandos Comunes (self-governing neighborhoods). Six years after the 1973 coup, the libertarian left began to reorganize. An umbrella group, Socialist Ideas and Action (PAS), was formed, bringing together anarchists and libertarian-leaning members of the former Popular Unity coalition. Anarchists were involved in struggles against the dictatorship in the 1980s. With the return of "democracy" in the 1990s, many anarchist groups formed, disappeared, and regrouped.

SEE ALSO: Allende Gossens, Salvador (1908–1973); Anarchism, Argentina; Anarchosyndicalism; Industrial Workers of the World (IWW).

References and Suggested Readings

- Angel, A. (1972) Politics and the Labour Movement in Chile. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- DeShazo, P. (1983) Urban Workers and Labor Unions in Chile, 1902–1927. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.
- Illanes, M. A. (1990) La Revolucion Solidaria – Historias de las Sociedades Obrerades Socorros Mutuos, Chile 1840–1920. Santiago: SEDEJ.
- Simon, F. (1946) Anarchism and Anarcho-Syndicalism in Latin America. Hispanic American Review 26: 38–59.
- Skidmore, T. and Smith, P. (1984) Chile, Democracy, Socialism, and Repression in Modern Latin America. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Troncoso, M. P. (1960) Rise of the Latin American Labor Movement. New York: Bookman.

Anarchism, China

Daniel Cairns

Anarchism is a significant though neglected trend in Chinese history. Proto-anarchist ideals that developed during the Warring States Period in works such as the Zhuangzi and the writing of Bao Jingyan became integral to traditional Chinese philosophy, followed later by a modernist anarchism that thrived as a set of social, political, and ethical ideas during the revolutionary period. Despite the proto-anarchist legacy, most studies of Chinese anarchism limit their scope to the early twentieth century, focusing on the movement's peak, from 1907 to 1919 – when anarchism was the most influential radical socialist trend in China – and on its marginalization from 1920 to 1949. Post-1949 history is without explicitly anarchist activity, yet because of its earlier influence, anarchism's history is a helpful tool with which to analyze both the communist regime and the post-Mao economic reforms.

The Chinese anarchist movement emerged when it became clear that the Qing dynasty was struggling to adjust to the pressures of foreign imperialism and domestic instability. At that time, intellectuals were actively seeking out and digesting foreign concepts that could ease the transition to modern nationhood. The ideas of mutual aid, voluntary cooperation, and personal liberty that anarchism professed emerged as integral elements of Chinese social and political discourse in this context. Anarchism resonated with elements of traditional thought and a distinctly anarchist sensibility was articulated in the writings of some Buddhists, Confucians, and Daoists.

Anarchism emphasized political reorganization and social transformation. Specifically, anarchists believed that foreign science and philosophy should be studied, traditions were pernicious myths that must be dispelled, the family was deleterious to the individual's autonomy, patriarchy was harmful and illegitimate, imperialism should be halted, authority over others is degrading, and the state is unnecessary. Anarchists were also the first to advocate a peasant-based revolution in China, a theory later championed by Mao Zedong. In fact, in their commitment to bringing new ideas into revolutionary discourse, anarchists were instrumental in introducing Marxism and other forms of socialism to China. Consequently, while anarchism has its own history, it is often difficult to separate it from the broader revolutionary milieu. Especially in the early years, 1903–6, revolutionaries ignored the minor distinctions in ideology and so many strands of socialism were conflated; anarchism was seen as synonymous with nihilism and populism.

The first explicitly anarchist activity among Chinese citizens began in 1906–7. Almost simultaneously, expatriates in Paris and Tokyo founded anarchist organizations: the New World Society and the Society for the Study of Socialism, respectively. Members traveled to study foreign ideas and methods, but while abroad discovered various radical tendencies that impacted their thinking. Before long, both societies were publishing their own papers. In Paris the New Era spread anarchist political analysis and social theory; likewise, the Tokyo group printed Natural Justice, which focused on scholarly issues, feminism, and rural communism. The groups shared news and opinions through these organs, but these publications also reveal their contrasts. The Tokyo anarchists were agrarian collectivists, inspired by Tolstoy, while the society in Paris was progressive, placing an emphasis on science, reason, and education.

The second wave of anarchism in China, occurring between the fall of the Qing and the founding of the communist part of China, is marked by an increase in domestic activity. The Society of the Cock Crowing in the Dark, led by Shifu, was the first domestic anarchist group. It was founded in 1911, the year the Qing fell. Shifu was a dynamic personality, both energetic and intellectual. He participated in the founding of multiple anarchist collectives, unions, and publishing ventures. After his death in 1915, the energy of the anarchist movement shifted towards what would become the May 4th movement.

Between 1919 and 1920 the May 4th movement coalesced around ideals of free expression and personal liberties. Anarchism, sharing similar values, flourished in this climate. It had a radicalizing effect on May 4th thinking, moving it beyond aesthetics and culture to economic, political, and social realms. While May 4th is primarily seen as an intellectual movement, anarchists believed that intellectual and manual work were needlessly divided; they suggested that one must both study in the schools and labor in the fields. This ethos pervaded many educational experiments of the time, from the Work-Study movement to the National Labor University, and was even reinterpreted during the Cultural Revolution.

The next phase of anarchist activity in China was shaped by its relationship to the nascent communist movement. The Communist Party of China was founded in 1921, though Comintern agents started actively recruiting activists into Marxist study circles a year prior. These groups initially drew many anarchists to them. The non-anarchists in attendance often came because they were interested in anarchism. Though there were commonalities between anarchists and communists, the CCP soon purged out many anarchists for the sake of ideological unity. Still, aspects of anarchism were not totally absent from official doctrine: Li Dazhao, China's first Marxist, was greatly influenced by Kropotkin's doctrine of mutual aid; Mao Zedong admitted to being influenced by anarchism; Chen Duxiu's sons were both anarchists before converting to Marxism.

Shortly after the founding of the CCP, the anarchists who did not join the party distanced themselves from the communist movement. They disagreed over the doctrine of the dictatorship of the proletariat, anarchists holding that a transformation out of class-based society would come once the general populace became sufficiently conscious. Debates held in the revolutionary press proved the CCP to be better rhetorically equipped.

Sensing pressure to organize against the communists, some anarchists joined the Guomindang. Indeed, for years there was an affinity between anarchists and the GMD – Sun Yat-Sen actually claimed that the ultimate aim of the GMD was anarchism and communism. The GMD also supported unions and striking workers and helped anarchists establish the National Labor University, a syndicalist training school. The Revolutionary Alliance, the precursor to the GMD, also counted many prominent anarchists as members. Anarchists Liu Shipei, Zhang Ji, and Zhang Binglin even hosted lectures by Japanese anarchists through the RA. Ultimately, however, anarchists proved to be little more to the GMD than ideological weapons against the communists. By 1927 the anarchist movement was atrophying; the last arena of its influence was among sections of workers in Shanghai and southern China, where anarchists were active until the 1940s.

There are two main analyses of anarchism in Chinese history. One emphasizes its anti-traditionalism, stressing the influence of foreign ideas such as socialism and humanism. This view asserts that while Chinese anarchism was born as an ideology of rejection of China's emergent modernity, Chinese anarchists adopted elements of Western thought even as they negated Western modernity. The second analysis suggests that anarchism is not necessarily imported. This view points to the long tradition of proto-anarchist thought in China, encompassing Daoists but also including Buddhists and Utopians. The truth lies somewhere in between: anarchists like Liu Shipei were unquestionably interested in Chinese national heritage, while Li Shizeng was thoroughly European in outlook.

Anarchists demanded absolute social revolution, that is, a bottom-up transformation of quotidian life. Therefore, they disagreed with the nationalist and communist revolutionary groups who believed change could be instituted through policy, from above. Similarly, anarchists were anti-nationalist. Some historians posit that anarchists, unwilling to pander to patriotic sentiments, effectively forfeited ground to groups like the GMD and CCP who based their platform on preserving the Chinese nation-state.

Historians sometimes question the importance of anarchism in China's revolutionary history because it was an ideology that did not achieve success on a nationwide level. Anarchist groups in China never coalesced into a political party, or even a unified network. Anarchist activity was scattered and their platform was inconsistent. However, reflecting on the role that anarchism played in radicalizing communist and nationalist leaders, bringing new ideas to China, and demanding a social revolution, clearly anarchism was an integral and ubiquitous part of the revolution.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism, France; Anarchism, Japan; Bakunin, Mikhail Alexandrovich (1814–1876); China, May 4th Movement; China, Protest and Revolution, 1800–1911; Chinese Nationalist Revolution, 1911; Dictatorship of the Proletariat; Kropotkin, Peter (1842–1921); Mao Zedong (1893–1976); Sun Yat-Sen (1866–1925); Tolstoy, Leo N. (1828–1910)

References and Suggested Readings

- Bernal, M. (1968) The Triumph of Anarchism over Marxism, 1906–1907. In M. C. Wright (Ed.), China in Revolution: The First Phase, 1900–1913. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Dirlik, A. (1989) Origins of Chinese Communism. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Dirlik, A. (1993) Anarchism in the Chinese Revolution. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Gaaster, M. (1969) The Anarchists. In Chinese Intellectuals and the Revolution of 1911. Seattle: University of Washington Press.
- Gao J., Wang G., & Yang, S. (Eds.) (1984) Wu zhengfu zhuyi zai zhongguo [Anarchism in China]. Changsha: Hunan renmin chubanshe.
- Ge, M. et al. (Eds.) (1984) Wuzhengfuzhuyi sixiang ziliao-xuan. Beijing: Beijing daxue chubanshe.
- Ming, C. K. & Dirlik, A. (1992) Schools into Fields and Factories: Anarchists, the Guomindang, and the Labor University in Shanghai, 1927–1932. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Pickowicz, P. G. (1990) The Chinese Anarchist Critique of Marxism-Leninism. Modern China 16 (4): 450–67.
- Rapp, J. A. (1998) Daoism and Anarchism Reconsidered. Anarchist Studies 6 (2): 123–51.
- Scalapino, R. A. & Yu, G. T. (1961) The Chinese Anarchist Movement. Berkeley: Center for Chinese Studies.
- Zarrow, P. G. (1990) Anarchism and Chinese Political Culture. New York: Columbia University Press.

Anarchism and culture, 1840–1939

Jesse Cohn

Anarchism has traditionally laid great emphasis on the construction of a “counterculture” – a sphere of imagery, symbolism, and sensory experience imbued with its own emancipatory values. In this respect, it does not differ essentially from other social movements with vastly different aims. More unique is the tendency of anarchist culture to blur distinctions between the creation and reception of culture as well as between the ideal and the real in representation.

These tendencies are present from the first phase of the modern anarchist movement, when Pierre Joseph Proudhon argued for the abolition of distinctions between artistic industrial creation. This meant refusing the romantic notion of the artist as solitary genius, apart from and above society. At the same time, Proudhon wanted an art that would refuse to accommodate itself to the social status quo either in the manner of religious art, which averted its eyes from injustice in the world to contemplate divine ideals, or in the manner of a superficial realism that does not look beyond the misery of the present. A revolutionary art, Proudhon argued, would evoke the processes of movement and transformation inherent to life, suggesting the potential for the ideal that is dormant within the real. Conversely, this art would undercut the claim of “the real” to be the entire “truth.” One face of anarchist art, thus, was constructive, utopian, gesturing from the real toward the ideal; the other was deconstructive and iconoclastic. The visual art produced by anarchists from the late nineteenth through the early twentieth centuries bears traces of both impulses.

Anarchist literary styles developed similarly. In France, writers such as Jules Vallès, Émile Pouget, and Henry Poulaille developed “proletarian” forms of writing that blurred genres, travestied norms of polite discourse, and emphasized the energy and directness of speech, while novelists like Octave Mirbeau made the “decadent” style into a powerful critique of capitalism, the state, and religion. In Spain, meanwhile, Federica Montseny pioneered forms of mass literature – two large, successful series, La Novela Ideal and La Novela Libre – aimed at incarnating anarchist ideals in “exemplary” working-class heroes and heroines, inviting readers to imagine the possibility of their own self-liberation. Chinese anarchists such as Shifu, in association with the broader New Culture movement, promoted the social novel, as exemplified by Ba Jin’s famous Torrent trilogy (1931–40), emphasizing moral comment (xungu xue) and logic (lunli xue) as well as style (zishi xue). Meanwhile, American anarchist poets such as the Italian American Arturo Giovanniti, French American Voltairine de Cleyre, Irish-born Lola Ridge, and Russian-Jewish David Edelstadt championed an overtly committed poetry, written in a way that was accessible to every worker. This ideal of proletarian poetry reached perhaps its greatest extension during the Spanish Civil War, when an estimated 15–20,000 poems were published, over half of the approximately 5,000 authors of which were anarchists.

It was drama that best spread radical thought. Indeed, so strong was the work of Henrik Ibsen (1828–1906) on anarchist culture worldwide that for a time “Ibsenism” was synonymous with anarchist drama. In Germany the working-class subjects of Gerhard Hauptmann’s plays found favor among some anarchists, but Gustav Landauer, among others, was critical of their tendency to make the miseries of capitalism seem natural and inevitable, obscuring the potential for the ideal by excessive fidelity to the real. Institutions such as the Neue Freie Volksbühne of Berlin performed politically charged drama by playwrights such as Ernst Toller, Erich Mühsam, and Georg Kaiser. Italian immigrant anarchists in Argentina and Brazil around the beginning of the twentieth century established popular theater as a means of “consciousness-raising” and “contestation,” a tradition continued by Chilean anarchists through the 1930s. In the United States, where German immigrants flocked to productions of August Spies’ agitational play Die Nihilisten as early as 1882, the Wobblies also developed the stage as a means of agitation in such productions as the Paterson Strike Pageant in 1913. Before their suppression by the communist government, Moscow’s anarchist clubs hosted theaters as well as libraries and poetry circles. In Spain anarchist theater companies began presenting works by Teresa Claramunt and Felipe Cortiella alongside Ibsen’s and Mirbeau’s in the 1890s, and during the Spanish Civil War troops were regaled by traveling “anarchist vaudeville” shows.

Anarchists had fewer opportunities in cinema, a more expensive art form, which they regarded as especially prone to capitalist exploitation. However, as early as 1913 anarchists in Paris created a cooperative for film production and distribution, the Cinéma du Peuple. One of its first filmmakers, the Catalan anarchist Armand Guerra (aka José Maria Estivalis Calvo), went on to produce films under the aegis of the Spanish anarchist movement. The journalist Mateo Santos produced numerous documentaries, while directors such as Antonio Sau, Valentín R. González, and Fernando Mignoni made fictional melodramas, comedies, and musicals.

Alongside these attempts to form a proletarian counterculture, the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries saw numerous engagements between the anarchist movement and the avant-garde of the art world. By the time of World War I almost every avant-garde movement had embraced anarchist ideas: Expressionism, Symbolism, Cubism, Dada, Futurism, and Constructivism reflected anarchist influence, and artists as disparate as Wassily Kandinsky, Oscar Wilde, Ezra Pound, Dziga Vertov, Pio Baroja, José Martínez Ruiz (“Azorín”), Man Ray, Franz Kafka, Jean Cocteau, Antonin Artaud, Luis Buñuel, Ramon Sender, and Alexander Rodchenko expressed affinity with the anarchist movements of the time. Nor was this fusion confined to Europe and America: in early 1920s Japan, for instance, a Futurist-influenced group of artists calling itself Mavo embraced anarchist ideas and experimented with subversive strategies, some anticipating the shock effects of contemporary performance art, others aiming at the aestheticization of everyday life.

If this confluence of anarchism with the avant-gardes was fruitful, it was not always harmonious. While fascinated with the writings of Bakunin, Kropotkin, and Landauer, Hugo Ball expressed skepticism toward their ideals, and others resisted demands for a “committed” art, insisting on the autonomy of the artist from audience demands. For their part, anarchists such as Bernard Lazare excoriated what they saw as the egoistic excesses of “decadent” art, regarding it as irrelevant to working-class concerns. Where most anarchists favored the “social art” aesthetics of Proudhon, Kropotkin, and Tolstoy, avant-gardists tended to favor Max Stirner’s individualism, as reflected in the title given by Dora Marsden to the American modernist journal, The Egoist.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism and Education; Dada; Guerilla Theater; Landauer, Gustav (1870–1919); Proudhon, Pierre Joseph (1809–1865)

References and Suggested Readings

- Antliff, A. (2007) Anarchy and Art: From the Paris Commune to the Fall of the Berlin Wall. Vancouver: Arsenal Pulp Press.
- Beach, C. (2005) Staging Politics and Gender: French Women’s Drama, 1880–1923. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Cohn, J. (2007) Breaking the Frame: Anarchist Comics and Visual Culture. Belphegor: Littérature Populaire et

- Culture Média*tique 6, 2. www.etc.dal.ca/belphegor/vol6_no2/articles/06_02_cohn_comics_fr.html.
- Goldman, E. (1910) The Drama: A Powerful Disseminator of Radical Thought." In Anarchism and Other Essays. New York: Mother Earth Publishing Association.
- Krebs, E. S. (1998) Shifu, Soul of Chinese Anarchism. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Pereira Poza, S. (2005) Antología crítica de la dramaturgia anarquista en Chile. Santiago de Chile: Editorial Universidad de Santiago.
- Proudhon, P.-J. (1927) Du Principe de l'art et de sa destination sociale. Paris: Rivière.
- Resina, J. R. (1998) Historical Discourse and the Propaganda Film: Reporting the Revolution in Barcelona. New Literary History 29, 1: 67–84.
- Shaffer, K. R. (2005) Anarchism and Countercultural Politics in Early Twentieth-Century Cuba. Gainesville: University Press of Florida.
- Wikler, R. J. (2001) Popular Army, Popular Theater: Spanish Agitprop During the Civil War, 1936–1939. Theater 31, 1: 79–91.

Anarchism and education

Abraham P. DeLeon

Although many activists have embraced anarchist theory, anarchism has been present in a variety of different academic areas as well. Anarchist sociology has been argued for (Purkis 2004), as well as the beginning sketches of an anarchist anthropology (Graeber 2004). But, often overlooked is the field of education, which has had an interesting relationship with anarchism and other radical theories of liberation. Anarchist theory is absent in educational literature and this gap exists in even more radical theories of education.

Anarchist theory in the context of education has influenced several key areas, such as organizational structure, political action for teachers, and rethinking the institution of schooling and the purposes that it serves. Anarchism for education means embracing some key factors about schooling. Anarchists contend that the various institutions of schooling help to reproduce racial, class, sexual orientation, and gender divisions sustaining classist practices that weaken working class and poor students. Paul Goodman, in his famous 1964 tract on Compulsory Miseducation, argued that schools benefit the rich and powerful and serve to indoctrinate students into an ideological system rather than serving as places of enlightenment and critical dialogue. Anarchists contend that teachers and students should be co-creators of knowledge and the divisions between “teacher,” “student,” and “principal” should be restructured.

Anarchist theory in education seeks to build schools that are not organized around rigid hierarchies and that each school should be as free and open as possible, allowing individuals to explore their identities, free their desires from historically oppressive social norms, and each school should be autonomous so that it better meets the needs of the community. Schools and the communities that they are located in should be in a symbiotic relationship based on mutual aid, community building, and non-coercive practices. Anarchists have played a historic role in education and educational theory, even if a limited one. They have created schools that resemble anarchist conceptions and critiqued the institution of schooling itself. Francisco Ferrer, for example, instituted a “modern school” in Spain that incorporated vastly different ideological frameworks than schools of the time. Children were not exposed to a dogmatic curriculum or a slew of standardized tests that we now find in US schools; instead, the curriculum and the guiding philosophy that Ferrer argued for was the freedom of the individual child to pursue her/his intellectual interests in a non-hierarchical environment. Ferrer argued that schools had to be restructured in completely different ways to escape the colonizing and oppressive role that schools play in indoctrinating students into the status quo. Ferrer wanted teachers to have complete autonomy from state mechanisms so that they could encourage students to pursue educational interests of their choosing.

Other non-authoritarian and democratic schooling projects have existed that have been guided by some of the values and ideas expressed by Ferrer. A. S. Neill, one of the best-known proponents of alternative schooling, created Summerhill, a school that stressed educational growth based solely on the child’s interests. At Summerhill “lessons” arise from the students themselves and children are encouraged to explore their own interests. Although Neill’s ideas have been adopted and reformulated from their original inception, they continue to influence schools that wish to create educational experiences that allow the child an open, free, and non-coercive learning environment. Although not technically “anarchist,” Neill structured Summerhill without a rigid curriculum or a formal timetable for learning. He recognized the freedom of the individual child, and he rejected traditional teacher authority (Suissa 2006: 93). Other schools have been influenced by Neill's ideas. In Albany, New York, the Albany Free School allows students to explore their own interests in a non-hierarchical way by including guest speakers and teachers in accordance with the students' interests. At Albany, the students are an integral part of the community around them, while the school serves as a center for learning and community action. Students learn to manage their own learning experiences and participate in the school community.

Although many "free schools" do not directly attribute anarchist theory to their ideological mission, they are comparable to what anarchists argue is necessary for building community and inculcating the natural spirit of learning that is non-coercive. Unlike traditional public education, "free schools" allow students the freedom to control their learning experiences and shape their educational goals. In traditional education schools, curriculum, activities, and learning experiences have been scripted, giving students limited choices in shaping their goals and objectives. These schools are structured in a rigid and hierarchical manner. "Free schools," on the other hand, are the polar opposite as they tend not to have a school-wide curriculum. They promote a community based philosophy reflecting individual experience. Attendance is not always mandatory and classes often emerge organically through the inquiry and interests of the students. Student and teacher collaborate in order to pursue individualized academic and intellectual interests.

Besides just building on the concerns of the individual students, anarchist conceptions of schooling view community building as an integral role in the development of children. Students must feel part of a school community to further engage their creative and intellectual pursuits. The main point is that the education of students should rest in the hands of the individual, with the schools guiding that process by providing activities and instruction which meet the goals of the students and the community.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism; Escuela Moderna Movement (The Modern School); Goldman, Emma (1869–1940)

References and Suggested Readings

Antliff, A. (2007) Breaking Free: Anarchist Pedagogy. In M. Coté, R. Day, & G. de Peuter (Eds.), Utopian

- Pedagogy: Radical Experiments Against Neoliberal Globalization*. Toronto: University of Toronto Press.
- Chomsky, N. & Macedo, D. (2000) Chomsky on Mis-education. Lanham: Rowman & Littlefield.
- DeLeon, A. (2006) The Time for Action is Now! Anarchist Theory, Critical Pedagogy, and Radical Possibilities. Journal of Critical Education Policy Studies 4, 2 (November).
- Goodman, P. (1971) Children Should Be Anarchists. New Schools Exchange Newsletter 58: 5.
- Graeber, D. (2004) Fragments of an Anarchist Anthropology. Chicago: Prickly Paradigm Press.
- Illich, I. (1983) Deschooling Society. New York: Harper & Row.
- Purkis, J. (2004) Towards an Anarchist Sociology. In J. Purkis & J. Bowen (Eds.), Changing Anarchism: Anarchist Theory and Practice in a Global Age. Manchester: Manchester University Press.
- Sheehan, S. (2003) Anarchism. London: Reaktion Books.
- Spring, J. (1998) A Primer of Libertarian Education. Montreal: Black Rose Books.
- Suissa, J. (2006) Anarchism and Education: A Philosophical Perspective. London: Routledge

Anarchism, Finland

Jukka Laitinen

Anarchist views and practices became popular in Finland in the radical grassroots activism of the 1990s. This new wave of social protest on such issues as racism, the power of corporations, or the exploitation of animals etched the term "activist" indelibly in Finnish public discourse.

The organizational form of the social movements among the 1990s activists was usually a small, autonomous and leaderless group, even when a group was considered as a local section of a wider network, such as Suomen Anarkistiliitto (SAL, Finnish Anarchist Federation) or Oikeutta Eläimille (Justice for Animals). This anarchic organization was in many ways a direct challenge to the Finnish establishment. Some Finnish authorities considered these anti-hierarchical organizational habits and activists' new methods of direct action as a conspiracy led by "foreign anarchist leaders." They demanded more power for police forces and harsh sentences for those activists who were performing illegal actions such as animal liberation.

Anarchists launched annual "happenings" and demonstrations, which received nationwide publicity, often because of wrangles between police and activists. Kuokkavierasjuhlat (Party of Gatecrashers, 1996–2003) was first organized by an anarcho-syndicalist federation, Solidaarisuus (Solidarity). This was a happening against the power elite and for social justice. Emphasizing the antagonist attitude of its organizers, it took place next to the Finnish President's Palace in Helsinki, during the official ceremonials of independence. Mustavihreät päivät (Black and Green Days, 1998–2002) in Tampere marked the shift toward more ecological themes in the Finnish anarchist movement.

In the history of Finland, social and political protests have been mostly tied to centralist organizations, official statuses, and to the state. Even rebellious sixties radicals were quickly assimilated into official institutions and state structures. Against this, most of the 1990s activists and self-styled anarchists were consciously against party politics and against the idea of working “within the system.” Yet, anarchist ideas waned and most local anarchist groups dissolved by the turn of the millennium. Some former anarchists adopted autonomist Marxist views and some even joined political parties. After the big international demonstrations against global capitalism, anarchism in Finland was at its nadir. However, in recent years anarchism in Finland has been slowly growing among a new generation of activists and dissidents.

Finnish anarchism did not spring up from nowhere in the 1990s. In the 1960s there were some small anarchist groups and publications, since when different anarchist views have existed within the larger alternative scene and counterculture. There have been individual anarchists among feminists and environmental activists, among underground artists and labor activists, among lifestyle experimenters, punks, and conscientious objectors. In the early twentieth century, Finnish proponents of the work of Tolstoy became a culturally effective movement. Arvid Järnefelt, who is sometimes called the Tolstoy of Finland, held strict anarchist positions against state institutions. Besides Leo Tolstoy, Peter Kropotkin was another Russian anarchist whose writings had a lasting impact on some Finnish intellectuals and workers. In the United States, Finnish immigrants joined the syndicalist Industrial Workers of the World (IWW). Their daily newspaper, published in Finnish, had a circulation of 13,500 at its peak. But in Finnish historiography, particularly in the history of the labor movement, “anarchist” has usually been a name given for a violent activist, whatever ideology he or she represents. While 1990s activism received a lot of academic interest, the history of anarchism in Finland remains unwritten.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism, Russia; Anarchosyndicalism; Eco-anarchism; Finland, Civil War and Revolution, 1914–1918; Industrial Workers of the World (IWW); Kropotkin, Peter (1842–1921); Tolstoy, Leo N. (1828–1910)

References and Suggested Readings

- Häkli, P. (1955) Arvid Järnefelt ja hänen lähimaailmansa [Arvid Järnefelt and His Inner Circle]. Porvoo: WSOY.
- Juppi, P., Peltokoski, J., & Pyykkönen, M. (Eds.) (2003) Liike-elämää. Vastakulttuurinen radikalismi vuosikymmenen vaihteessa [Movement Life: Counter-Cultural Radicalism at the Turn of the Millennium]. Jyväskylä: Kopijyvä.
- Konttinen, E. & Peltokoski, J. (2004) Ympäristöprotestin neljäs aalto. Eläinoikeusliike ja uuden sukupolven ympäristöradikalismi 1990-luvulla [Fourth Wave of an Environmental Protest: Animal Rights Movement and the New Generation of Environmental Radicalism in the 1990s]. Jyväskylä: Minerva.
- Lindfors, J. & Salo, M. (1988) Ensimmäinen aalto. Helsingin Underground 1967–1970 [The First Wave: Helsinki Underground 1967–1970]. Helsinki: Odeon.
- Nokkala, A. (1958) Tolstoilaisuus Suomessa. Aatehistoriallinen tutkimus [Tolstoyism in Finland: A Study in the History of Ideas]. Helsinki: Tammi.

Anarchism, France

Evan Matthew Daniel and Nick Heath

Foundations of French Anarchism

From the 1840s to the 1920s an upturn in the number of anarchists in France had an important impact on the development of anarchist thought. In its most basic formulation, anarchism meant the absence of government, not the absence of organizational structures; however, different ideas about how society should be organized legally and economically engendered theoretical evolution and synthesis. Various anarchist tendencies evolved and emerged at this time, both internationally and from within France, such as collectivism, anarchosyndicalism, and anarchocommunism.

Early in the nineteenth century the precursor to full-fledged anarchism – mutualism – emerged and quickly spread throughout France. Mutualism was championed by Pierre-Joseph Proudhon (1809–65), who perceived it as an alternative to both capitalism and socialism. Unlike the socialists, who advocated economic distribution “from each according to ability, to each according to need,” or the “every man for himself” philosophy of the laissez-faire capitalists, the mutualists posited “from each according to ability, to each according to deed.” In 1864 French mutualists, anarchists, and workers actively participated in the creation of the International Workers’ Association (the First International) in London. The anarchists who participated placed emphasis on spontaneous action, voluntarism, and federalism, informed by an overarching ouvrierisme (suspicion of non-working-class people). This put them in direct opposition to the Marxist platform: nationalization of industry, electoral activity, and the centralization of both the International and the state. Based in French-Switzerland, the Jura Federation, an anti-authoritarian anarchist group that participated in the First International, was influenced greatly by Proudhon’s anti-statist, federalist, and mutualist ideas. The bulk of delegates from the French section, which came to be the largest national section in the First International, were Proudhonists who supported workers’ activity in the economic realm through the formation of unions, cooperatives, and mutual banks (rather than party activity). Interaction with an increasingly militant working class radicalized Proudhon and many of his supporters, however, causing a distinct shift away from mutualism toward collectivism.

The violent government repression of the 1871 Paris Commune destroyed confidence in the Proudhonist notion that emancipation would occur through peaceful evolution. Subsequently, the anarchist movement engaged in terrorist tactics that would beget increased government surveillance and repression of anarchists. Known as “propaganda of the deed,” this concept was accepted by anarchists in France, Spain, Italy, and other countries who sought to murder industrialists and heads of state. Exponents of propaganda by the deed included François Claudius Koenigstein (known as Ravachol), Auguste Vaillant, and Émile Henry. Repression following the terrorist period greatly damaged the anarchist movement.

From the 1890s to the 1920s a distinctive group of social movements, known variously as revolutionary syndicalist and anarchosyndicalist, developed in many parts of Europe. In contradistinction to the craft unionism prevalent in the United States and England, syndicalism was a form of labor unionism that aimed to overthrow capitalism through revolutionary, industrial class struggle, and to build a utopian social order, free from economic or political oppression.

Twentieth-Century French Anarchism

By the turn of the century there was a clear orientation toward the labor movement and the development of anarchosyndicalism. Peter Kropotkin (1842–1921), who had himself been a supporter of propaganda by the deed, now argued that anarchist communists must turn away from individual action to mass agitation and education. Among those anarchists who orientated themselves towards syndicalism were Fernand Pelloutier (1867–1901), Paul Delesalle (1870–1948), and Pierre Monatte (1881–1960). Emile Pouget (1860–1931) and his paper La Sociale supported this trend, as did to a lesser extent Jean Grave (1854–1939) and his paper Les Temps Nouveaux. Sebastien Faure (1858–1942) and his paper Le Libertaire were opposed to the syndicalist tactic until 1899. This was reinforced with the departure of the individualists in 1905, who set up their own weekly paper, L’Anarchie. Whatever the differences, the French labor movement was dominated by anarchism from 1894. The Confédération Générale du Travail (CGT) was both led by anarchists and infused with its ideas.

In addition, the new tendency known as revolutionary syndicalism emerged. This was developed by predominantly militants who had been anarchists who now wanted to break with intellectualism and individualism. This new current gradually took on a life of its own separate from anarchism and many within it saw it as a synthesis between Marxism and anarchism, rejecting the parliamentarism of the former and the small group mentality of the latter.

Impatience among some with the lack of organization led some anarchist communists to found the Fédération Communiste Révolutionnaire Anarchiste in 1913. The individualists were expelled from this conference, sparked by their general obstructive behavior and the reaction to the exploits of the Bonnot Gang, a group of anarchists known for criminal activity.

World War I led to a split in the movement, with a minority, including Grave and Charles Malato (1857–1938), backing Kropotkin's support for the Allies. The surrender of the CGT to the wave of patriotism also had a demoralizing effect. The outbreak of war could not have come at a worse time for the proponents of organization, who after years of striving had finally set up a national organization. The majority who opposed the war as internationalists saw their papers closed down, and many militants were conscripted or imprisoned. The outbreak of the Russian Revolution saw an initial enthusiasm for Bolshevism. In fact the first – and short-lived – Parti Communiste, founded in 1919, was made up almost entirely of anarchists. Anarchist communists made another effort to organize, setting up the Fédération Anarchiste, which became the Union Anarchiste (UA) in 1920. By that point, there was a distancing from Bolshevism, and in 1924, following an armed attack by communists on anarchists, this became an irreconcilable rift.

With the controversy over the Organizational Platform, the UA saw itself transformed into the Union Anarchiste Communiste Révolutionnaire and the departure of some, including Faure, to found the Association des Fédéralistes Anarchistes. However, the platformists lost control, leading to the return of most of the AFA and a return to the original name. Meanwhile, the anarchosindicalists had organized their own union, the CGT-Syndicaliste – Révolutionnaire. During the Popular Front there was a growth in numbers, but another split occurred with the setting up of the Fédération Anarchiste de Langue Française, which judged the UA too centralist. This remained outside the UA until World War II.

The war paralyzed the movement. It started reforming toward 1943 and was able to reestablish a public appearance by 1944. The Fédération Anarchiste was founded in 1945, but was already plagued by differences. The FA was to have a certain influence in the Renault strike (1947) and saw its paper Le Libertaire reach a print run of 100,000.

The anarchosindicalists organized themselves within the CNT-France, though this remained a minute body. In 1950 a group around Georges Fontenis and Serge Ninn began organizing a secret group within the FA to counter the individualists. This culminated in the transformation of the FA into the Fédération Communiste Libertaire and the expulsion or departure of many. Many of these regrouped in a new FA set up in 1953, which united different tendencies. Another group that emerged in this period was the Groupes Anarchistes d'Action Révolutionnaires (GAAR) which had left the Fontenis grouping and published a magazine, Noir et Rouge, which was to become an influential instrument of theoretical clarification and had a certain influence on the events of 1968. The magazine took on a life of its own when a majority of the GAAR went into the FA.

Certainly, anarchist influence could be seen in the demonstrations in the student committees and in some of the workplace occupations during 1968, but the movement failed to take full advantage. This in part led to the emergence of a tendency within the FA, the Organisation Révolutionnaire Anarchiste (ORA), which became an independent body in 1971. The ORA organized over 100 circles of sympathizers in the 1970s, but by 1976 this had split between the Organisation Communiste Libertaire and the Union des Travailleurs Communistes Libertaires (now Alternative Libertaire).

Today, the movement remains divided into a number of different organizations and groups, but has a certain implantation it has not had for a long time. The FA has a radio station, a weekly paper, and a network of bookshops and is more clearly aligned with social anarchism, while Alternative Libertaire appears to be small but vivacious and growing. The French CNT has experienced a number of splits over the years, with one fragment bearing this name and enjoying a certain growth. Nevertheless, the movement remains divided, despite various unitary initiatives.

Fontenis, Georges (b. 1920)

The son and grandson of militant socialists, Georges Fontenis played an important role in the twentieth-century French anarchist movement. He made contact with the movement through Spanish solidarity work in 1936, joining a group of young militants. In 1944 he joined the underground CGT and as a member of a teachers' union took part in commissions to root out Vichyists (Nazi sympathizers) in national education in 1945. He participated in the reconstruction of the anarchist movement in 1945 and the founding of the Fédération Anarchiste. He was general secretary of the FA in 1946–8 and 1950–3 and director of the FA weekly newspaper Le Libertaire.

In 1950 Fontenis helped found the Organisation Pensée Bataille (OPB), a secret group within the FA which gained control over some regions and many leading posts. In 1953 the OPB forced the expulsion of the individualists and turned the FA into the Fédération Communiste Libertaire (FCL). It adopted the Manifesto of Libertarian Communism, written by Fontenis. In 1951 Fontenis took part in an assassination attempt on Francisco Franco, with Spanish anarchist exiles. The FCL was involved in support for the anti-colonialist struggle in Algeria, resulting in fines, raids, and jailings. Fontenis was imprisoned in 1957. That same year the FCL took part in a disastrous election campaign, leading to the departure of some of its militants. These events led to the collapse of the FCL. In 1968–9 Fontenis, together with Daniel Guérin, founded the Mouvement Communiste Libertaire and was a member of its successor organization, the first Organisation Communiste Libertaire. In 1979 he joined the Union des Travailleurs Communistes Libertaires. He is a member of its successor organization, Alternative Libertaire. He wrote L'Autre communisme, his view of the events of the 1950s.

SEE ALSO: Kropotkin, Peter (1842–1921); Paris Commune, 1871; Proudhon, Pierre Joseph (1809–1865)

References and Suggested Readings

- Berry, D. (2002) A History of the French Anarchist Movement, 1917–1945. New York: Greenwood Press.
- Biard, R. (1976) Histoire du mouvement anarchiste 1945–1975. Paris: Editions Gaililée.
- Hyams, E. (1971) Pierre-Joseph Proudhon: His Revolutionary Life, Mind and Works. London: John Murray.
- Joyeux, M. (1988) Sous les plis du drapeaux noir. Paris: Editions du Monde Libertaire.
- Mitchell, B. (1987) The Practical Revolutionaries: A New Interpretation of the French Anarchosyndicalists. New York: Greenwood Press.
- Stearns, P. N. (1971) Revolutionary Syndicalism and French Labor: A Cause Without Rebels. New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press.

Anarchism and gender

Jesse Cohn

Pierre Joseph Proudhon (1809–65), the first to write the words “I am an anarchist” in 1840, was at the same time a convinced anti-feminist, regarding women as intellectual and moral inferiors and dedicating an entire book to attacking feminism as a form of modern decadence or “pornocracy” (1858, 1875). These arguments led feminist radical Jenny d’Héricourt (1809–75) to reply not only that his accounts of women were contradicted by historical and scientific fact, but that “you contradict your own principles” (1864: 117). Joseph Déjacque went further, admonishing Proudhon either to “speak out against man’s exploitation of woman” or “do not describe yourself as an anarchist” (1857/2005: 71); he went on to denounce the patriarchal family, “a pyramid with the boss at its head and children, woman and servants at its base.” The inference made by both – that the egalitarian and anti-authoritarian principles which Proudhon opposed to the domination of church, state, and capital must also be consistently applied to relations between men and women – did, in fact, become the preeminent interpretation of anarchism vis-à-vis gender, in theory if not always in practice, from the late nineteenth century on.

Precursors

Well before Proudhon, proto-anarchist thinkers such as Gerrard Winstanley (1609–76) laid down some notable precedents for anarchist feminism. A radical Christian, Winstanley suggested that God’s “universall law of equity” required not only the abolition of inequities of wealth and power, but also the establishment of egalitarian relations between men and women. From a secular perspective, William Godwin (1756–1836), later the partner (and then husband) of pioneer feminist Mary Wollstonecraft (1759–97), included in his Enquiry Concerning Political Justice a reconsideration of “the institution of marriage” in light of the value of “independence.” Nonetheless, Godwin was unable to imagine an egalitarian system of childrearing; even in the absence of possessive bonds, “the personal cares which the helpless state of an infant requires . . . will probably devolve upon the mother.”

A “Grand Domestic Revolution”?

Even before Proudhon’s death, leadership of the nascent anarchist movement in Europe had been taken up by men such as Mikhail Bakunin and James Guillaume, whose views on marriage, family, and gender roles in general were distinctly feminist. In 1866, Bakunin declared “absolute equality of political rights for all men and women” to be a revolutionary goal – and, more concretely, specified that “adult men and women have the right to unite and separate as they please, nor has society the right to hinder their union or to force them to maintain it.” Moreover, the ability of women to retain or reclaim their independence from men was to be ensured by concrete economic guarantees, such as community support for pregnant and nursing women, as well as some collective structures of responsibility for childcare and education. Likewise, Guillaume looked forward to the abolition of “paternal authority” within the family, arguing that “a free egalitarian society should obliterate what still remains of this authority and replace it with relations of simple affection.”

From the late nineteenth through the early twentieth centuries, a growing number of women were attracted to the anarchists’ rejection of “universal suffrage” as a goal, seeking instead a radical transformation of social relations that could be prefigured here and now. They and their male counterparts imagined and created concrete, material alternatives to the traditional family. In close association with pioneering feminist Victoria Woodhull, individualist anarchist Stephen Pearl Andrews applied his liberal principles to the condition of women and family structures. For Andrews, this meant not only “abolition of the institution of Marriage as a legal tie to be maintained and perpetuated by force,” but also the creation of alternative arrangements for cohabitation, housekeeping, and childcare – a “grand Domestic Revolution” (see Hayden 1981: 93–5). Similarly, Déjacque’s utopian tract, L’Humanisphère (1858/1898), had described life in a built environment that allowed women, men, and children a range of voluntary relationships, from independence to interdependence, while dissolving the nuclear family, the cornerstone of patriarchy and capitalism, into “the great family” of humanity (124). The anarcho-communist Peter Kropotkin, while apparently unable to imagine men cooking, anticipated that housewives might choose from a range of options concerning housework, from the private to the communal – implicitly treating “women’s work” as part of the general continuum of labor.

Attempts to practice non-authoritarian family life and cohabitation, in anarchist colonies or milieux libres from the end of the nineteenth century on, as well as in the personal lives of individual anarchist men and women, were not infrequent. In the course of her own experiments in non-possessive love, Emma Goldman (1869–1940) encountered Mary and Abraham Isaak, advocates of “sex equality” in The Firebrand, and was struck by “the consistency of their lives, the harmony between the ideas they professed and their application . . . ‘If you can’t establish freedom in your own home,’ [Abraham] Isaak often said, ‘how can you expect to help the world to it?’” (1931/1970: 1.224).

“The Capacity of Women”

“The capacity of women to bear arms,” noted the editors of the feminist Woodhull & Claflin’s Weekly in 1871, “was fully tested in Paris during the late reign of the Communists” – alluding to the Paris Commune that had been crushed just months earlier, during which women such as Louise Michel (1830–1905) and André Léo (a.k.a. Victoire Léodile Béra, 1824–1900) had indeed taken an active and at times aggressive role, coming to embrace anarchist identities as a result. Indeed, for Léo, the direct participation of women in armed struggle for their rights, as demonstrated by Michel, was of greater importance than participation in the ephemeral or irrelevant “government” of the Commune. The female Communes set perhaps the most direct precedent for the entry of women into the militias of the Mexican Revolution and the Spanish Civil War – and, at the same time, for the establishment of the Agrupación Mujeres Libres (the “Group of Free Women”) as an autonomous organization of anarchist women fighting for its own revolutionary objectives. After the Commune, a generation of working-class female anarchist leaders and intelligentsia sprang up, quite often achieving real prominence as organizers: Lucy Parsons (1853–1942) in the US, Charlotte Wilson (1854–1944) in England, Teresa Claramunt (1862–1932) and Soledad Gustavo (a.k.a. Teresa Montseny Mañé, 1865–1939) in Spain. A second generation would prove to be as influential in the early twentieth century, particularly in the nations of the colonial periphery, where appeared such luminaries as Luisa Capetillo (1879–1922) in Puerto Rico, Juana Belén Gutiérrez de Mendoza (1875–1942) in Mexico, Virginia Bolten (ca. 1870–ca. 1960) in Argentina and Uruguay, and Belén de Sárraga in Uruguay and Chile (1873–1951), but also in the metropolitan centers, where Federica Montseny (1905–94) and Emma Goldman rose to prominence.

The resistance which these women and their cohorts met in every context – working-class, intellectual, bourgeois, and anarchist alike – was instructive, and the lessons were not encouraging for the project of class-based social transformation. Rather than supporting the demands of their female counterparts out of solidarity in oppression, as their ostensible ideals would seem to demand of them, in practice many male workers and anarchists seemed all too happy to have someone to be superior to. The response anarchist women made – creating autonomous associations of their own, such as the Gruppo Femminile Luisa Michel (formed in the mining community of Spring Valley, Illinois in 1901), while continuing to protest and struggle against sexist tendencies within the male-dominated movements – was itself a model of direct action.

From Tendency to Movement

Anarchist feminism existed as a tendency, even a conscious movement within the anarchist movement, with its own associations (e.g., Las Hijas de Anáhuac, or Anáhuac's Daughters, in Mexico, ca. 1907–8) and publications (e.g., La Voz de la Mujer: Periódico comunista-anárquico, or Woman's Voice: A Communist-Anarchist Journal, Argentina, 1896–7) before the “first wave” of the women's movement won suffrage rights (US, 1920; Spain, 1931; France, 1944; Japan, 1945) and before the anarchist movement was eclipsed by the Bolshevik and fascist victories of 1917–39. However, it appears not to have attained the status of an ideology until well after. In the 1960s and 1970s, “second-wave” feminists in the US, UK, and Canada reinvented and rediscovered – often in that order – libertarian ethics and tactics, subsequently giving themselves the name “anarcha-feminists.” Spreading to Western Europe by way of translations, anarcha-feminist discourses acquired the strength of a movement within the movement, and in 1982 and 1984, at anarchist congresses in Norway and Italy respectively, an “Anarkofeministiske Manifest” (“Anarcha-feminist Manifesto”) was endorsed.

“No God, No Boss, No Husband”

At the same time as their anarchist counterparts, various organizations of the authoritarian left sponsored women's organizations and fielded militawomen during the Spanish Civil War; libertarian Marxists like Alexandra Kollontai and Clara Zetkin challenged the patriarchal biases of male Communist Party leadership; Marxist theorists from Friedrich Engels (The Origin of the Family, the State, and Private Property, 1884/1909) and August Bebel (Woman Under Socialism, 1891/1904) to Catharine MacKinnon (Toward a Feminist Theory of the State, 1989) and Teresa Ebert (Ludic Feminism and After: Post-modernism, Desire, and Labor in Late Capitalism, 1996) have long argued for a Marxist feminism. Where the differences lie between anarchist feminism and other feminisms is in the logic – both theoretical and practical – that serves to link struggles.

Whereas, from the perspective of Marxist theory, the consciousness of the exploited must be deduced from a theory of history and society as a whole, anarchism has traditionally affirmed that members of any oppressed group can organize on their own. This is the anarchist paradigm of “direct action.” Nor, for anarchists, is there such a thing as a political center. For Marxists, the center of power is capitalism; for radical feminists, it is patriarchy; for anarchists and anarcha-feminists, even to ask where power is located, as if it were “a thing” rather than a relationship, is to fall into an error. Thus, instead of reducing revolution to a single event aimed at a single goal, anarchists see revolution as plural and perpetual.

The logic linking one struggle against dominant power to another, then, could be called “affinitary.” That is, instead of referring each particular struggle to a central category, such as placing housewives in relation to wage-workers by conceptualizing women as a “vertical class” or housework as part of a “social factory,” it operates by making direct “analogies” between situations and experiences. Thus, Bakunin's slogan “no gods, no masters!” could become, in the phrase of a correspondent in La Voz de la Mujer, “No God, No Boss, No Husband” (Molyneux 2001: 24).

Eco-Feminism and “Virile” Anarchism

Resemblances, affinities, and analogies, of course, work both ways, and feminists’ spontaneous reconstruction of anarchist practices raised the question of whether anarchism might not “resemble” feminism. Indeed, male anarchists had frequently been stigmatized as feminine – as when Marx ridiculed Bakunin as “Hermaphrodite Man” and “Madame Bakunin,” or in the rape of Ben Reitman by a gang of patriots (Stevens n.d.; Goldman 1931/1970: 1.500–1). Might not anarchism, as a practice, be something like a feminine ethics? Conversely, might not hierarchy be an essentially masculine conception of order? In feminist communities of the 1970s and 1980s, increasingly popular arguments that patriarchy had served as the historic prototype for other forms of domination, including the domination of nature, encouraged a confluence of feminism not only with anarchism but also with the ecology and peace movements. “Eco-feminism,” a term coined in 1974 by Françoise d’Eaubonne (1920–2005), daughter of a Christian anarchist and comrade of Daniel Guérin, was from the first imbued with a libertarian spirit, influencing actions from the anti-nuclear campaign of the Clamshell Alliance (1976–9) to the Greenham Common Women’s Peace Camp (1981–2000) as well as the formation of the German Greens (1980). Speculations of this sort drew criticism not only from “third-wave” feminists, wary of any talk of “essences,” but from other eco-anarchists and anarchist feminists.

Meanwhile, where the male leadership of the eco-anarchist Earth First! movement had demonstrated a macho “cowboy” style, feminists such as Judy Bari were making inroads, uniting eco-anarchism not only with feminism but also with revolutionary syndicalism. Women had traditionally been somewhat marginal to anarchosyndicalism, in part because of the gender politics of wage labor in general. While female wage-workers did find their way into anarchist movements from Mexico to Germany, producing activists such as Milly Witkop-Rocker and “Rebel Girl” Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, leadership was overwhelmingly male, and at best cautious with respect to feminism, while the culture of revolutionary unionism frequently appealed to images of “virility.”

The problem of “virile” anarchism continues. Despite the history of anarchist women’s involvement in armed struggle, a masculinist emphasis on violent confrontation has at times seemed to alienate women otherwise drawn to anarchism. Accordingly, just as their forebears in late nineteenth-century Spain sought alternative routes to women’s involvement in the anarchist movement, contemporary anarchist feminists have invented forms of activism such as the Radical Cheerleaders, which allow them to voice feminist concerns within the confrontational milieu of anarchist protest – a playful alternative to the imagery of an intransigent, mainly male “black bloc.”

SEE ALSO: Anarchism and Education; Anarchosyndicalism; Bakunin, Mikhail Alexandrovich (1814–1876); Day, Dorothy (1897–1980); Flynn, Elizabeth Gurley (1890–1964); Godwin, William (1756–1836); Goldman, Emma (1869–1940); Kollontai, Alexandra (1872–1952); Kropotkin, Peter (1842–1921); Michel, Louise (1830–1905); Mujeres Libres; Paris Commune, 1871; Proudhon, Pierre Joseph (1809–1865); Winstanley, Gerrard (1609–1676); Wollstonecraft, Mary (1759–1797); Woodhull, Victoria (1838–1927); Zasulich, Vera (1849–1919); Zetkin, Clara (1857–1933)

References and Suggested Readings

- Biehl, J. (1991) Rethinking Ecofeminist Politics. Boston: South End Press.
- Cochrane, R. (2002) (Eco)Feminism as a “Temporary Autonomous Zone”? Women and Environments International Magazine 56–7: 24–6.
- Déjacque J. (1857/2005) On Being Human. In R. Graham (Ed.), Anarchism: A Documentary History of Libertarian Ideas, Vol. 1: From Anarchy to Anarchism (300 CE–1939). Montreal: Black Rose Books.
- d’Héricourt, J. (1864) A Woman’s Philosophy of Woman: Or, Woman Affranchised: An Answer to Michelet, Proudhon, Girardin, Legouvé, Comte, and Other Modern Innovators. New York: Carleton.
- Farrow, L. (1974/2002) Feminism as Anarchism. In Dark Star Collective (Eds.), Quiet Rumours: An Anarcha-Feminist Reader. Edinburgh and San Francisco: AK Press/Dark Star.
- Goldman, E. (1931/1970) Living My Life. New York: Dover.
- Hayden, D. (1981) The Grand Domestic Revolution: A History of Feminist Designs for American Homes, Neighborhoods, and Cities. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press.
- Kornegger, P. (1975/1996) Anarchism: The Feminist Connection. In H. J. Ehrlich (Ed.), Reinventing Anarchy, Again. Edinburgh: AK Press.
- Merithew, C. W. (2002) Anarchist Motherhood: Toward the Making of a Revolutionary Proletariat

- in Illinois Coal Towns. In D. R. Gabaccia & F. Iacovetta (Eds.), Women, Gender, and Transnational Lives: Italian Workers of the World. Toronto: University of Toronto Press.
- Molyneux, M. (2001) No God, No Boss, No Husband: Anarchist Feminism in Nineteenth-Century Argentina. In Women's Movements in International Perspective: Latin America and Beyond. New York: Palgrave.
- Nutter, A. (2002) Make Your Own Tea: Women's Realm and Other Recipes and Patterns. In Dark Star Collective (Eds.), Quiet Rumours: An Anarcha-Feminist Reader. Edinburgh and San Francisco: AK Press/Dark Star.
- Proudhon, P. J. (1875) La Pornocratie: ou, Les femmes dans les temps modernes. Paris: A. Lacroix.
- Shor, F. (1999) "Virile Syndicalism" in Comparative Perspective: A Gender Analysis of the IWW in the United States and Australia. International Labor and Working-Class History 56: 65–77.
- Shulman, A. K. (1991) Dances With Feminists. Women's Review of Books 9 (3): 1–3.
- Stevens, J. (n.d.) On the Class Question. In C. di Stefano (Ed.), Feminist Interpretations of Karl Marx. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, forthcoming 2008.
- Vaccaro, J. (2004) Give Me An F: Radical Cheer-leading and Feminist Performance. E-Misférica 1 (1). Available at www.hemi.nyu.edu/journal/1_1/cheerleaders_print.pdf.

Anarchism, Greece

Antonios Vradis and Dimitrios K.

Dalakoglou

Greek anarchy stands among the largest and most active contemporary movements of its kind in the world. The first organized anarchist group in the country appeared as early as 1876. Near-complete lack of anarchist activity between World War II and the military dictatorship (1967–74) effectively divides the history of Greek anarchism into two distinct phases, 1876–1944 and 1967–present.

1876–1944

Individual anarchists were politically active from the early 1860s (Emanouil Dadaoglou, Amilcare Cipriani, Mikelis Avlihos), while the first organized anarchist group, the Democratic Club of Patras, appeared in 1876. In the same year, the club became affiliated to the Jura Federation – the anarchist/anti-authoritarian section of the First International. The club was also quick to help form a – primarily regional – federation (Democratic League of the People) and to publish the first anarchist newspaper in the country (Hellenic Democracy, 1877). A few months after the foundation of the Patras group an anarchist working club was formed on the island of Syros. This club played an instrumental role in the island's 1879 tannery and shipyard strikes.

In 1898 a group named the Boatmen of Thessaloniki was formed and acted in the spirit of propaganda by the deed: the group's members, of Bulgarian origin, carried out deadly attacks against targets including the city's Ottoman bank, hotels, a theater, and light and gas pipes. Nearly all of the group's members were executed. In 1913, again in Thessaloniki, anarchosyndicalist Alexandros Schinas assassinated King George I.

In the early twentieth century organized groups faded and Greek anarchism centered around the political activity of individuals. In August 1916 anarchosyndicalist Konstantinos Speras (1893–1943) helped organize the historic miners' strike on the island of Serifos, where four workers were killed by the royalist gendarmes. Speras also participated in the fermentation which led to the foundation of the Greek General Confederation of Labor.

The example of Serifos was followed repeatedly for the next 20 years with strikes around the country. The strike of Kalamata (1934) culminated in three days of unrest and ended with a full-scale riot and seven workers killed by the army. Two years later, in 1936, Thessaloniki saw one of the largest pre-World War II strikes, counting 12 dead workers. Cobbler Yiannis Tamtakos participated in the strike and was sentenced as one of its instigators. Tamtakos (1908–2008) was an active anarchist throughout the final decades of his life.

1967–Present

In its most recent phase anarchism in Greece has largely broken away from its anarchosyndicalist origins, now organized around small direct action-based groups and hence much closer to the insurrectionary current. The country's main urban centers (Athens, Thessaloniki, and Patras) host nuclei of intense anarchist activity, while anarchism's popularity among university students has meant that smaller cities with higher education institutions have also seen a growth of such activity.

During and immediately after the country's military dictatorship (1967–74) the anarchist movement resurged – largely thanks to popular resistance to the regime and widening political polarization within the country. Anti-dictatorship resistance reached its peak with the Technical University of Athens student uprising of November 17, 1973. While the outlawed left-wing parties largely failed to influence the uprising to any significant extent, some of the slogans – “Down with Authority” and “People Revolt” – had anarchist connotations.

Following the collapse of the dictatorship, parliamentary democracy inherited most of the authoritarian state apparatus intact. This fact is exemplified by the police assassination of demonstrators Iakovos Koumis and Stamatina Kanelopoulou in Athens in 1980 and the assassination of anarchist Michalis Kaltezas in 1985.

The anarchist movement reached a peak of activity between 1989 and 1995, partially boosted by widespread disillusionment with the country's mainstream political scene. The 1990s began and ended with high school students and teachers rebelling against proposed conservative educational reform bills (1990–1, 1998–2000). Left-wing and anarchist groups played an instrumental role within these struggles. Students occupied the majority of schools across the country and organized demonstrations, often ending in police violence and riots. On November, 18, 1995 more than 500 anarchists were arrested following riots at the National Technical University of Athens. Most were convicted; a similar wave of arrests after the November 17 commemoration in 1998 cost the movement dearly and it subsequently entered a short period of decline.

The turning point for contemporary anarchism in Greece was the movement against globalization. Greek anarchists had a strong presence at Genoa's anti-G8 mobilizations in 2001. Two years later the 2003 European Union Leader Summit in Thessaloniki was greeted by a 3,000-strong black bloc, while a 5,000-strong anarchist demonstration marched through the city to express their solidarity with migrants, who comprised one of the most heavily exploited and repressed social groups in the country.

Recent years have seen an intensification of state repression against an ever-growing anarchist movement. In January 2008 more than ten anarchists were either in prison, awaiting trial, and/or absconding from justice as the state convulsed in reaction to a movement becoming more influential, holding an increasingly active role in recent struggles in the country, focusing – among others – on education, ecology, employment, state repression, and migration. Most recently, police have again fired against demonstrators, for example at the higher education students' demonstration of March 1, 2007.

State violence and repression acted – to some extent – as a greenhouse for anarchism, increasing its influence. Since the 1980s Athens boasts two anarchist publishing houses (Free Press and International Library) and numerous regularly published magazines at any given time, along with hundreds of brochures and poster campaigns every year. Squats have emerged and anarchist collectives have appeared all across the country. In parallel to a mass anarchist movement, Greece witnesses the emergence of clandestine anarchist activity, primarily arson and casualty free explosions of symbolic targets. In January 2008 alone the country saw more than ten actions of this kind.

SEE ALSO: Anarchosyndicalism; G8 Protests, Genoa, 2001; Global Justice Movement and Resistance; Greece, Anti-Dictatorship Protests

References and Suggested Readings

- Kottis, L. (2006) Konstantinos Speras: The Life and Activities of a Greek Anarcho-Syndicalist. London: Kate Sharpley Library.
- Megas, Y. (1994) The Boatmen of Thessaloniki: The Anarchist Bulgarian Group and the Bombing Actions of 1903. Athens: Trochalia (in Greek).
- Pomonis, P. (Ed.) (2004) The Early Days of Greek Anarchism: The Democratic Club of Patras & Social Radicalism in Greece. London: Kate Sharpley Library.
- Sotros, J. (2004) The Greek Speaking Anarchist and Revolutionary Movement (1830–1940): Writings for a History. Melbourne: No God-No Masters.

Anarchism, Hungary

András Bozóki

The anarchist tradition in Hungary survived for almost 40 years from the 1880s to 1919, represented by four different waves. The first involved an anarchist-influenced radical socialist group led by Ármin Práger and András Szalay, from 1881 to 1884. These radicals were well acquainted with the principles, revolutionary rhetoric, and cultivation of the propaganda of the deed associated with Johann Most, a social democrat who became an anarchist. The banning of socialist organizations by Germany's "exceptional legislation" in 1878 had a direct influence on Hungarian radicals as a significant number of German socialists and anarchists settled in Austria and Hungary. By their intermediation, the radical revolutionary point of view could then recruit many adherents. The "radical-socialist" group did not reject violent means of struggle against the system, but it was quickly crushed by the firm intervention of the government in 1884.

By contrast, the later waves of Hungarian anarchism rejected the use of terrorism. In the 1890s, the non-violent ideal anarchism represented the second wave. Philosopher Jenő Henrik Schmitt was convinced that verbal persuasion and true Christian moral example were the means to achieve social transformation. He propagated this approach in his newspapers – Állam Nélkül (Without State) and Erőszaknélküliség (Non-Violence) – but failed to influence wider urban circles. However, it did have an impact on the peasant-based Independent Socialist Party (ISP) led by István Várkonyi, which later influenced the agrarian-socialist movements of the late 1890s. The ISP would go on to accept a program of abolition of rule and state with an ideal of non-violence, but it did not always abide by this anarchistic principle. Jenő Henrik Schmitt would be remembered more as a philosopher and prophetic preacher than as an anarchistic ideologue. He later withdrew from politics and entered the intellectual world of Gnosticism. Ideal anarchism would remain politically marginalized, surviving only in religious, messianistic peasants' sects until government intervention suppressed harvest strikes and eventually arrested Várkonyi.

The third wave of anarchism in Hungary came through the rationalist, solidarity approach of Ervin Batthyány. As the twentieth century began, Batthyány advocated the labor movement's theory of class war and anarchosyndicalism. He edited anarchist newspapers such as Testvériség (Fraternity) and Társadalmi Forradalom (Social Revolution) in which he tried to unite anti-systemic forces along anarchist and anarchosyndicalist ideas. Batthyány also took the idea of revolutionary education seriously and, in 1905, he founded a school to nurture critical thinking.

Batthyány and Schmitt were the two most significant figures in the history of anarchism in Hungary. Both were able to achieve an intellectual consciousness within a western intellectual tradition. While Batthyány hailed from English rationalism and Schmitt from German metaphysics, they were able to share basic principles that were opposed to rule and politics. Both theorized that the creation of the new moral world order was not a political question. However, the realities of their respective movements forced both into active politics and into a schizophrenic position of theoretical conviction and revolutionary practice. Both were forced to abandon pure theory through a series of compromises. Between 1897 and 1899, Schmitt drew near to peasant socialism and Batthyány, between 1906 and 1908, sought association with anarchosyndicalism.

The particular features of Hungarian political life, the high salience of the franchise question, the attacks of the Social Democratic Party, and the party's institutional appeal all contributed to the difficulty of founding an anarchist or anarchosyndicalist movement in Hungary at the start of the twentieth century. However, in 1919, the Budapest Anarchist Group emerged around Károly Krausz to become the fourth wave of Hungarian anarchism. These anarchists, operating legally under the short-lived Hungarian Soviet Republic between March and July 1919, advocated three distinct paths – critical, revolutionary, and cultural. The Budapest anarchists' efforts were anti-parliamentarism, anti-militarism, direct actions, and the practical questions of the general strike. Because of limited time and rapid-change politics, the Budapest anarchists were prevented from developing a theoretical generalization of their criticism on the contradictory relationship between anarchism and the dictatorship of the proletariat.

The pattern of Hungarian anarchism was that it could flourish for relatively short periods of time. The first wave, having split in the Hungarian social democratic movement, was linked to the divide within the German and Austrian movements between 1881 and 1884. In the second wave, social democracy was incapable of covering the political space of the emerging radical agrarian movement (1897–8). In the third wave, Batthyány's efforts were multiplied by his material sacrifices and the appeal of French anarchosyndicalism from 1904 to 1910. Finally, in the fourth case, while the Bolshevik state left a brief opportunity for the small group of theoretical anarchists, they were unable to find a social base in 1919.

These short periods proved to be exceptional in Hungary as a strong institutional organization of social democracy. Unfortunately, state repression removed radical socialists in 1884, suppressed the agrarian movement in 1897–8, and transferred power to the Horthy regime in 1919, stifling every anarchist initiative in Hungary. The various European anarchist ideas and movements were confronted with a variety of geographic, historical, and cultural challenges. In areas such as Western Europe, where democratic struggles had been established, anarchist movements were able to find a social base. This was equally possible in regions where democracy and anarchism were distant from reality and appeared only on a utopian horizon, as in Russia. Central Europe, in its transitional flux, seemed only to have democracy within its grasp. Thus, its immediacy made it difficult for both pre-democratic and post-democratic anarchism to gain strength. Essentially, the region imagined a solution that combined the advantages of anarchy and democracy without the disadvantages of either. While it craved for the people to hold power, it could not resolve its own disgust with power itself.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism, Russia; Hungary, Revolution of 1848; Kropotkin, Peter (1842–1921); Socialism

References and Suggested Readings

- Andersen, A. (1976) Hungary '56. Detroit: Black & Red.
- Bak, J. (1991) Liberty and Socialism: Writings of Libertarian Socialists in Hungary, 1884–1919 Series. States and Societies in East-Central Europe: Contributions to Political Thought. Lanham: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Bozoki, A. & Sukosd, M. (2005) Anarchism in Hungary: Theory, History, Legacies. Boulder: East European Monographs.

Anarchism, Italy

Vittorio Sergi

Anarchism in Italy has its origins in the second half of the nineteenth century in the context of the political radicalism of intellectuals and popular leaders who struggled for national liberation and a republican government, such as Giuseppe Garibaldi (1807–1882) and Carlo Pisacane (1818–

1857). From 1864 on, the influence of Mikhail Bakunin was decisive in the creation of a radical and autonomous political doctrine. Together with initial industrialization in the urban centers of the center and north of the country, there was an important growth in workers' associations (società operaie), often organized by profession, in which anarchism found supporters. In the south of the country, the majority of workers were landless peasants who, led by an enlightened elite, had engaged in several failed insurrections. This activity was soon channeled into continuous guerilla actions often mixing brigandage with social protest. In 1869, under the influence of Bakunin, Carlo Gambuzzi and Stefano Caporosso founded the first anarchist journal, Eguaglianza (Equality), in Naples, edited by Michelangelo Statuti. The first Italian anarchist organizations, such as the Federazione Operaia Napoletana (1874), emerged in the south. There, Bakunin found important supporters and natural leaders such as Carlo Cafiero (1846–1892) and Errico Malatesta (1853–1932). When anarchist tendencies spread to the north, from Rome to the eastern region of Marche and Romagna, Tuscany, and the industrial centers of Milan, Turin, and Genoa, they gained supporters among the working class, artisans, and the urban underclasses. Italian anarchist organizations and groups were part of the First International Workingmen's Association, and at the first meeting of the Italian section of the International, held in Rimini from August 4 to 6, 1872, Cafiero and Andrea Costa (1851–1910) supported the anarchist position against the Marxist currents that would soon drive the anarchists out of the International.

From 1870 to 1880, Italian anarchism defined itself as autonomous from socialism and republicanism, and with the leadership of Costa and Malatesta, tried to find a common organization as a revolutionary party. Anarchists supported and participated in several popular revolts until their important insurrectionary plans were frustrated by the police: in August 1874 near Bologna and Castel del Monte in the southeast, and in 1877 in the northwest of Campania in the Matese region, where after several guerilla actions the rebels were defeated. The crisis of a common organizing project and harsh repression by the state provoked by individualist terrorist practices escalated across Europe, as acts of "propaganda by the deed" were often performed by the hands of Italian anarchists. In 1887, the Italian anarchist

Michele Angiolillo (1871–97) killed the prime minister of Spain, Antonio Canovas; in 1894, Sante Caserio (1873–94) stabbed French president Sadi Carnot to death; and in 1898, Luigi Luccheni (1873–1910) stabbed and killed Princess Elisabeth of Austria. Malatesta criticized this individualist tendency and promoted instead participation in popular organizations and trade unions. An anarchist-led, nationwide protest for “food and work” started in Ancona in January 1898, ending with barricades and bloody military repression in Milan in May. The repression was also enforced by an international anti-anarchist conference of European police forces in Rome from November 24 to December 21 of that year. In this context, Gaetano Bresci (1869–1901), an Italian immigrant to the United States, shot and killed King Umberto I in Monza on July 29, 1900 as a revenge for the victims of the military repression of 1898.

From the Rise of Syndicalism to the Rise of Fascism

At the turn of the century, Costa broke with Malatesta and joined the Italian Socialist Party together with a section of the trade union movement that chose the liberal democratic political terrain opened up by the introduction of universal suffrage. Anarchism in this period was characterized by intense activity among workers, leading to the formation in 1912 of the Italian Syndicalist Union (Unione Sindacale Italiana, USI) as a branch of the International Workingmen’s Association (Associazione Internazionale dei Lavoratori, AIT/IWA). Meanwhile, anarchists participated in the General Chamber of Labor (Camera Generale del Lavoro, CGDL), today the Italian General Confederation of Labor (Confederazione Generale Italiana del Lavoro, CGIL), with the aim of gaining positions within the working-class organizations. Beginning in 1912, protests against Italy’s colonial war in Libya led to nationwide strikes and to generalized standoffs, with a revival of individualist attacks against military personnel and politicians.

In 1914, conditions of low wages and high prices were exacerbated by heavy police repression. A political meeting attended by Malatesta in the city of Ancona was attacked by the police, and the ensuing protests culminated in riots which soon spread to the major urban centers of the country, as well as to regions where anarchists had strong bases, such as Romagna and Marche. Riots, strikes, and acts of sabotage broke out all over Italy, often led by anarchists. The majority of republican, socialist, and anarchist leaders chose not to push the popular unrest into a general insurrection, and the state regained control through another round of repression that sent many anarchists to jail and Malatesta into exile. In the same year, anarchist newspapers and activists led a campaign against the possible participation of Italy in the war. When Italy attacked Austria and Germany in 1915, many anarchists chose to respond by acts of individual and collective desertion and sabotage. After the war, in 1919, the Union of Italian Communist Anarchists (Unione Comunista Anarchica Italiana, UCAI) was founded in Florence. One year later it approved Malatesta’s “Anarchist Program” (Malatesta & Richards 1993: 182–98) and became the Italian Anarchist Union (Unione Anarchica Italiana, UAI), publishing its own newspaper, Umanità Nova (New Humanity).

When, in 1920, there was another nationwide protest following on from a revolt of military conscripts in Ancona that had popular support, anarchists such as Pietro Ferrero (1892–1922) and Maurizio Gorino joined the radical socialists and the collective of Antonio Gramsci’s Ordine Nuovo (New Order) in promoting the occupation of factories and the takeover of the production of essential goods and services. The movement was strong, especially in the main industrial districts of Turin and Milan. This revolutionary movement was defeated in 1921 by the rising violent reaction emerging from the newborn fascist organization. In response, many anarchists joined the Arditi del Popolo, a paramilitary organization formed by ex-soldiers and political militants that practiced armed struggle against fascists until 1924.

Italian Anarchists Abroad

From the second half of the nineteenth century through the 1920s, Italians had migrated to the Americas by the millions. The Italian anarchist presence in the United States, Argentina, and Brazil was significant enough to sponsor newspapers and initiatives, as well as to provide economic support to prisoners and organizations, all of which had a strong impact in Italy itself. Two of the most important Italian anarchist newspapers were founded in New York: Il Martello (The Hammer) in 1918 by Carlo Tresca, which was an organ of revolutionary syndicalism, and L'Adunata dei Refrattari (The Call of the Refractory Ones), an organ of the anti-organizational and individualist tendency founded in 1922 by Armando Borghi. In Buenos Aires, Italian anarchism had a strong influence within the labor movement and gained a reputation for its violent and open resistance to repression, notably with the group around Severino di Giovanni (1901–31). La Battaglia (Battle) and Guerra Sociale (Social War), among many other journals, were edited in Brazil. Giovanni Rossi founded the experimental colony of Cecilia in the province of Paraná (1890–4), and one of his associates, Gigi (Luigi) Damiani, became an important union leader during the strikes of 1917–19 in São Paulo. In addition, individual anarchists, including such luminaries as Malatesta, Galleani, and Luigi Fabbri (1877–1935), also made journeys around the Mediterranean, establishing small groups, educational projects, and publications in Algeria, Egypt, Lebanon, Tunisia, and Turkey (Khuri-Makdisi 2003; Gorman 2005).

The rise of the fascist regime in Italy in 1926 forced many anarchists into exile or underground. Various anarchist groups went to Spain to participate in the anti-fascist resistance there on the side of the anarcho-syndicalist Confederación Nacional del Trabajo-Federación Anarquista Ibérica (CNT-FAI), most notably in the enlistment of anarchists from the UAI with the republican organization Giustizia e Libertà (Justice and Liberty), part of the Italian Ascaso Column led by the anarchist Camillo Berneri (1897–1937), later assassinated by Stalinist agents.

Recovery of the Movement and New Crises

After years of underground activity, exile, and detention, witnessing the crisis of the fascist regime, anarchists confined in the island of Ventotene held a clandestine congress in 1942 in which they planned for the fall of fascism and a new revolutionary project. In 1943, the Federation of Italian Anarchist Communists (Federazione dei Comunisti Anarchici Italiani, FCAI) was founded. Anarchists often fought in the popular armed resistance with the republican partisan groups of Giustizia e Libertà, the communist Garibaldi brigades, or autonomous anarchist fighting groups such as the Michele Schirru battalion in Tuscany, or the Malatesta and Bruzzi battalions in Milan and Genoa. On September 19, 1945, the Italian Anarchist Federation (Federazione Anarchica Italiana, FAI) was founded in Carrara in an attempt to rebuild anarchist unity. The directive committee of the federation refused to support the National Liberation Committee (Comitato di Liberazione Nazionale, CLN), which would be instrumental in the constitution of the new republic. This position, together with the strong hegemony of the Italian Communist Party, closed spaces for the anarchist initiative and its presence among the working class.

In the 1950s, anarchism entered a deep crisis. At the beginning of the 1960s, the formal unity of FAI began to splinter into the three main organizations and tendencies that have continued to the present time. One breakaway group, claiming the heritage of the “anarchist party” projected by Malatesta, gave birth to the Federation of Anarchist Communists (Federazione dei Comunisti Anarchici, FDCA). Local autonomous groups belonging to the anti-organizational and individualist tendency left the FAI in 1965 and founded the Anarchist Initiative Groups (Gruppi di Iniziativa Anarchica, GIA), and then in 1967 the Federated Anarchist Groups (Gruppi Anarchici Federati, GAF), which became the Italian section of the Anarchist Black Cross (an international prisoner-support organization) and the hegemonic group in the country.

Anarchist Struggles and the “Strategy of Tension”

During the movements of 1967–79, anarchists were often attacked and used by the security forces for provocation and infiltration, as part of a “strategy of tension” aimed at arousing public hysteria toward the Italian left (Censor 1975/1997; Sanguinetti 1979/1982). Nevertheless, many anarchists participated actively in local organizations and collectives, and several were imprisoned or killed, such as Giuseppe Pinelli, killed in police custody in 1969 in Milan (the subject of Dario Fo’s famous play, Accidental Death of an Anarchist), or Franco Serantini, killed by the police in Pisa in 1973. When armed struggle was on the rise, anarchists Gianfranco Faina and Salvatore Cinieri formed their own armed initiative with the small affinity group-based organization Azione Rivoluzionaria (1976–80). In the 1980s, a part of the movement took on board the discourses and practices of radical ecology, experimented with the creation of autonomous local communities, or practiced individual forms of expropriation.

The 1990s were characterized by a strong repressive turn against anarchists that followed the hegemony of the insurrectionary and anti-organizational tendency. On November 16, 1995, the police launched a major operation involving hundreds of activists. Alfredo Maria Bonanno (b. 1937) and 53 others were accused by the public prosecutor Antonio Marini of many offenses, including forming a terrorist organization. Many were convicted, but their tendency was not defeated and it experienced a strong revival with the start of the anti-globalization movement. In 1998, due to several acts of sabotage against the high-speed train (TAV) project in Piemonte, a number of anarchists were arrested, two of whom, Edoardo Massari and Maria Soledad Rosa, committed suicide in custody. While the FAI and USI maintained a national presence, they did not play a major role in the anti-globalization movement, and by the end of the 1990s neither had a strong influence among the youth who organized mostly in informal groups and Centri Sociali (volunteer-run community spaces, often in squatted premises). Anarchists participated actively in the protests against the G8 meeting in Genoa in 2001 as the so-called “black bloc.” From 1999 to the present, various collectives have joined their anti-organizational and individualist strategies and started campaigns of armed propaganda with sabotage, explosive attacks, and arson. Since 2003, ten acronyms have claimed to be part of an Informal Anarchist Federation (Federazione Anarchica Informale, also sharing the acronym FAI) and have claimed responsibility for more than 30 low-intensity bombings aimed at European Commission president Romano Prodi, military and police stations, detention centers, and tribunals. Responsibility for several other acts of sabotage against productive infrastructure was not directly claimed. It has been suggested that this group may be provocateurs, the initials FAI chosen for their similarity to those of the Federazione Anarchica Italiana.

Anarchists are today present nationwide and are involved in all the principal social and political conflicts, with more than 60 active spaces and an articulated presence on the Internet and in the militant press. Centri Sociali, libraries, and USI union sections are divided into the two main historical tendencies: unions and federated associations maintain open, public activity, while the anti-organizational and individualist tendency refuses any kind of formalization, stressing the importance of direct action and underground organizing.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism, Argentina; Anarchism, Spain; Anarchism in the United States to 1945; Anarchosyndicalism; Autonomism; Bakunin, Mikhail Alexandrovich (1814–1876); Fanelli, Giuseppe (1826–1877); Fascism, Protest and Revolution; G8 Protests, Genoa, 2001; Galleani, Luigi (1861–1931); Gori, Pietro (1865–1911); Gramsci, Antonio (1891–1937); Infoshops; Internationals; Italian Labor Movement; Italy, Centri Sociali; Italy, from the Anti-Fascist Resistance to the New Left (1945–1960); Italy, from the New Left to the Great Depression (1962–1981); Malatesta, Errico (1853–1932); Pisacane, Carlo (1818–1857)

References and Suggested Readings

- Anon. (2005) The Marini Trial: Italian State Repression of Anarchist Revolt and Anarchist Responses. Sacramento: Black Powder Press.
- Antonioni, M. (1990) Azione diretta e organizzazione operaia: sindacalismo rivoluzionario e anarchismo tra la fine dell'Ottocento e il fascismo. Manduria: P. Lacaita.
- Bayer, O. (1986) Anarchism and Violence: Severino Di Giovanni in Argentina, 1923–1931. London: Elephant Editions.
- Berti, G. (2003) Errico Malatesta e il movimento anarchico italiano e internazionale 1872–1932. Milan: Franco Angeli.
- Bianconi, P. (1988) Gli anarchici italiani nella lotta contro il fascismo. Pistoia: Archivio famiglia Berneri.
- Bonanno, A. M. (1998) Armed Joy. London: Elephant Editions.
- Censor [Sanguinetti, G.] (1975/1997) The Real Report on the Last Chance to Save Capitalism in Italy. Fort Bragg: Flatland Books.
- Gabaccia, D. R. & Iacovetta, F. (Eds.) (2002) Women, Gender, and Transnational Lives: Italian Workers of the World. Toronto: University of Toronto Press.
- Gabaccia, D. R. & Ottanelli, F. M. (2001) Italian Workers of the World: Labor Migration and the Formation of Multiethnic States. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.
- Dada, A. (1984) L'anarchismo in Italia fra movimento e partito. Milan: Teti.
- Di Lembo, L. (2001) Guerra di classe e lotta umana: l'anarchismo in Italia dal biennio rosso alla guerra di Spagna (1919–1939). Pisa: BFS.
- Gorman, A. (2005) Anarchists in Education: The Free Popular University in Egypt (1901). Middle Eastern Studies 41 (3): 303–20.

- Khuri-Makdisi, I. (2003) Levantine Trajectories: The Formulation and Dissemination of Radical Ideas in and between Beirut, Cairo, and Alexandria, 1860–1914. PhD thesis, Harvard University.
- Levy, C. (1989) Italian Anarchism, 1870–1926. In D. Goodway (Ed.), For Anarchism: History, Theory and Practice. London: Routledge.
- Levy, C. (1999) Gramsci and the Anarchists. Oxford: Berg.
- Malatesta, E. & Richards, V. (1993) Errico Malatesta: His Life and Ideas. London: Freedom Press.
- Manfredonia, G. et al. (2005) La resistenza sconosciuta. Gli anarchici e la lotta contro il fascismo. Milan: Zero in condotta.
- Pernicone, N. (1993) Italian Anarchism, 1864–1892. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Ravindranathan, T. R. (1988) Bakunin and the Italians. Kingston: McGill-Queen's University Press.
- Sanguinetti, G. (1979/1982) On Terrorism and the State: The Theory and Practice of Terrorism Divulged For the First Time. London: B. M. Chronos.

Anarchism, Japan

Hélène Bowen Raddeker

Japan has unique traditions of what may be termed “anarchism” rooted in the cultural distinctiveness of the society. Some early twentieth-century anarchists pointed to the horizontal features of village communalism in Japan’s Tokugawa era (1600–1867), while others claim Andō Shōeki, an eighteenth-century doctor, as an anarchist forbear. For Andō, all traditional thought in Japan was mere ideology, an excuse to rob the people. Though he was himself a samurai, Andō saw the samurai ruling class as parasites living off the proverbial sweat of peasant labor and felt that all should engage in “direct cultivation,” coupled with what we might call mutual aid. He contested the antimony of high and low in traditional thinking that had informed “unnatural” and oppressive social relations, including hierarchical relationships between the sexes.

It was fitting, then, that in 1908 the early socialist paper Nihon Heimin Shimbun (Japan Commoners’ News) described Andō as a Japanese “anarchist.” This followed what historians refer to as the beginning of Japan’s anarchist movement – setting up of a “direct action” faction in 1907 after a speech given to the Commoners’ Society by Kōtoku Shūsui (1871–1911). The speech was concerned with “The Change in [his] Thought” – to anarchist communism. While visiting comrades in the United States, Kōtoku had written to leading theorist Peter Kropotkin, who willingly gave him permission to translate some of his works into Japanese.

In prewar Japan the anarchist movement went in cycles. It was predominantly anarchocommunist at first, then increasingly syndicalist through the teens to the mid-twenties. Under the leadership of Hatta Shūzō (1886–1934) and Iwasa Sakutarō (1879–1967), there was then a swing back to “pure” anarchism (anarchocommunist) which, unlike syndicalism, was seen to be unadulterated by Marxism. The pure anarchists were suspicious of the leading revolutionary role accorded the industrial proletariat by Marxists and syndicalists and saw the practice of “class struggle” in labor unions as essentially capitalist.

Membership figures for the anarchist and Bolshevik labor federations throw doubt on the common assumption of historians that anarchism’s influence on radical movements was eclipsed by that of Marxism-Leninism in the mid-1920s. The anarchists opposed what they saw to be authoritarian centralism in both social democratic and Bolshevik organization and demanded local union autonomy. Hence, an “ana-boru” split came to a head in 1925, at which time the Bolshevik labor council (Hyōgikai) had 12,500 members in 32 unions compared to the anarchists’ 25 in 1926, though one anarchist source gives a figure of 29 anarchist unions by 1928. In 1928, when there was a split in the anarchist federation and 3,000 anarchosyndicalists withdrew, the now anarchocommunist federation claimed 16,300 members.

The anarchist wing of the peasant and arts movements was led by the Nōmin Jichi Kai (Peasants’ Self-Governing League), which claimed 243 branches and 6,300 members in 1927. In addition, 26 anarchist authors established their own “Literary Front” after being removed from the Marxist-Leninist “proletarian” literary federation in 1926. Amongst the women associated with it was the anarchocommunist Takamura Itsue (1894–1964). Two magazines were produced by anarchist women between 1928 and 1931, Nyonin Geijutsu (Women’s Arts) and Fujin Sensen (Women’s Front), to which some Marxists also contributed.

Of course, not all Japanese anarchists identified with only one stream of anarchist thought. By the 1920s some were expressing sympathy for “nihilism” or “egoism,” which was partly indebted to individualistic anarchism. Nietzsche was popular; Max Stirner's The Ego and Its Own had also been translated into Japanese. The latter's influence can be seen in the writings of the leading anarchosyndicalist Ōsugi Sakae (1885–1923). Also a fan of Stirner was Itō Noe (1895–1923), a former Bluestocking editor and anarcho-feminist publicist who by then was Ōsugi's partner. Kaneko Fumiko (1903–26) was another woman who embraced “self-assertion” (egoism) and the “ideology of negation.”

Kaneko and her Korean partner Pak Yōl (d. 1974) were the defendants in the second of two infamous high treason cases involving prewar anarchists. Arrested after the great Kantō earthquake of 1923, the two were later found guilty in 1926 of conspiring to import bombs to use on the imperial family. Originally sentenced to die, both their sentences were later commuted to life imprisonment. It seems that Kaneko exaggerated her own guilt in order to receive the same sentence as Pak; and she got her way. Nevertheless, her testimonies leave little doubt that she took her own life in her cell just a few months later. Pak was released from prison at the close of the war.

The year 1923 was a pivotal one for prewar anarchism. Ōsugi and Itō were among several radical activists murdered by police amidst the chaos following an earthquake. After Ōsugi's death his syndicalist followers were left in disarray as some turned to revenge-motivated political violence. Legal or extralegal repression was a regular feature among Japanese radicals even in response to activities such as publishing, public meetings, or demonstrations. Meiji repression had culminated in a similar high treason trial that resulted in the execution of 12 anarchists and Marxists in January 1911 and life imprisonment for 12 more. Yet, the one woman amongst the first 12, Kanno Suga (1881–1911), was amongst those who testified that only a handful of the total 28 charged (including herself) had had any involvement with a “conspiracy” to rise in a rebellion that would include an attempt on the Meiji emperor's life. Japanese authorities were determined to rid themselves of anarchist theorist Kōtoku, who had apparently lost interest in the group's plans before his arrest, and as many other “anarchists” as possible.

Anarchists would suffer mounting repression after 1925 when a revised and more stringent “peace preservation” law was passed designed to combat the “twin evils” of bolshevism and anarchism. Activism became near impossible after the Manchurian Incident of 1931. While the Japanese Communist Party (JCP) was severely weakened by a flood of recantations in 1932, it disbanded in 1935. Anarchists continued to resist the rising militarism for a few more years, while syndicalists and “pure” anarchists reunited and even participated in a short-lived “anti-fascist” front in 1933 with social democrats and Marxists. However, in 1935 at least 700 anarchists were rounded up after a “public order” law against anarchism was promulgated in 1936. The last group to survive, though not beyond 1938, was the anarchosyndicalist Tokyo Printers' Union.

After the Fifteen Years' War (1931–45), in 1946, an anarchist federation was reestablished but was weakened once again by splits and finally disbanded in 1968. Anarchists were represented in various postwar struggles including the production control movement during the Allied Occupation, vehement opposition in 1960 to the US–Japan Security Treaty, the treaty with South Korea five years later, the militant student movement of the 1960s (Zengakuren), the fight of peasants and supporters to halt the construction of a new airport at Narita (1968), and anti-war agitation during both the Korean and Vietnamese wars. However, the new left in Japan was dominated by the socialist and communist parties and affiliated youth groups, and anarchists never regained the strong foothold they had secured in prewar social movements, especially in the industrial and peasant unions.

Some stalwarts, such as prewar anarchist leaders Ishikawa Sanshirō (a Christian anarchist: 1876–1956) and Iwasa Sakutarō, were influential again after the war. Another who survived Japanese militarism and the attendant repression of any dissent was the anarchocommunist Ōshima Eizaburō, who was long an inspiration to younger comrades while also providing an invaluable service to researchers of Japanese anarchism after 1970. Amongst the many works reproduced by his publishing house in Tokyo, Kokushoku Sensensha (Black Battle Front), are weighty volumes of original trial documents, including the Kaneko–Pak treason trial.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism; Japan, Community Labor Union Movement; Japan, Labor Protest, 1945–Present; Japan, Pacifist Movement, 1945–Present; Japan, Post-World War II Protest Movements; Japan,

Resistance to Construction of Narita Airport; Japanese Communist Party; Kropotkin, Peter (1842–1921); Ōsugi Sakae (1885–1923); Zenroren Labor Federation

References and Suggested Readings

- Anonymous (n.d.) Anarchism in Japan. Anarchy Magazine (London), 2nd ser., 1 (5): 2–30.
- Bowen Raddeker, H. (1997) Treacherous Women of Imperial Japan: Patriarchal Fictions, Patricidal Fantasies. London and New York: Routledge.
- Bowen Raddeker, H. (2001) Anarcho-Feminist Discourse in Prewar Japan: Itō Noe's Autobiographical Social Criticism. Anarchist Studies (UK) 9: 97–125.
- Bowen Raddeker, H. (2002) Resistance to Difference: Sexual Equality and its Law-ful and Out-Law (Anarchist) Advocates in Imperial Japan. Intersections (e-journal, Murdoch University, Western Australia) 7 (March): 1–11.
- Crump, J. (1983) The Origins of Socialist Thought in Japan. New York: St. Martin's Press.
- Crump, J. (1992) Anarchist Opposition to Japanese Militarism, 1926–1937. Japan Forum 4 (1): 73–9.
- Crump, J. (1993) Hatta Shūzō and Pure Anarchism in Interwar Japan. New York: St. Martin's Press.
- Crump, J. (n.d.) The Anarchist Movement in Japan. London: Kate Sharpley Library.
- Hagiwara, S. (1969) Nihon Anakizumu Rōdō Undōshi (A History of Japan's Anarchist Labour Movement). Tokyo: Gendai Shichō.
- Kokushoku, S. (1977) Kaneko Fumiko, Pak Yōl Saiban Kiroku (. . . Trial Records). Tokyo: Kokushoku Sensensha.
- Mackie, V. (2003) Feminism in Modern Japan. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Maruyama, M. (1974) Studies in the Intellectual History of Tokugawa Japan. Tokyo: University of Tokyo Press.
- Matsuda, M. (Ed.) (1963) Gendai Nihon Shisō Taikai, 16: Anakizumu (An Outline of Modern Japanese Thought, Vol. 16: Anarchism). Tokyo: Chikuma Shobō.
- Ooms, H. (1985) Tokugawa Ideology: Early Constructs, 1570–1680. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Tsuzuki, C. (1971) Anarchism in Japan. In D. E. Apter & J. Joll (Eds.), Anarchism Today. London and Basingstoke: Macmillan.

Anarchism, Korea

Dongyoun Hwang

Anarchism, accepted by Korean radicals in the early 1920s as an idea for independence from Japanese colonial rule since 1910, was one of the most important currents in the Korean independence movement. While their immediate goal was to “retake” independence through direct action, motivated by national consciousness, the ultimate goal of Korean anarchists was to achieve a social revolution bent on anarchist principles. Anarchism offered them an alternative to Bolshevism and social Darwinism with its promise of human progress through mutual aid, and hope for a new society with its universal messages of freedom, no compulsory power, and spontaneous alliance.

The circulations of anarchist ideas as well as anarchists themselves in East Asia were of significance in the rise of Korean anarchism in the 1920s, in the sense that it was basically a product of interactions among anarchists in the area, through which Korean anarchists were imbued with national consciousness and shared transnational concerns with other anarchists as a result of mutual influence and inspiration. Transnationalism, like nationalism, was a main force in the rise of Korean anarchism, which may explain why Korean anarchists preferred political independence to social revolution, without which, they believed, no significant political changes could even be made (Hwang 2007).

After 1920 anarchist groups and organizations appeared first among Korean exiles and/or study-abroad students in China and Japan, and then in Korea. In early 1920s China the Beijing Branch of the Black Youth Alliance and the Korean Anarchist Federation in China were successively established. The inaugural editorial of the latter's organ, The Conquest (talhman), published in 1928, clearly expressed its advocacy of social revolution for “the oppressed class,” while Shin Chaeho's 1923 “Declaration of the Korean Revolution” justified mass violence against Japanese colonial government (Graham 2005: 373–6, 381–3). Of importance in the Korean reception of anarchism was support from Chinese anarchists and the role of Vasilij Eroshenko, a blind Russian poet and anarchist, who propagated in early 1920s China cosmopolitanism and anti-Bolshevism (Bak 2005: 26; Hwang 2007). Many Korean anarchists participated in such anarchist projects as the opening of the National Shanghai Labor University (1928), the Movement for Self-Defensive Rural Communities (1927–8) in Quanzhou, and educational experiments (1929–early 1930s) also in Quanzhou. After 1931 many engaged in armed struggles against Japan, in collaboration with some Chinese anarchists. Their goal, however, was still social revolution rather than political independence, as exemplified in the platform and declaration of the Alliance of Korean Youths in South China (Bak 2005: 161–8).

In Japan the first anarchism-oriented Black Wave Society appeared in 1921, but a group of Korean anarchists withdrew from it to establish the Black Friend Society and published Fat Korean (Hutoi senjin). Park Yeol was a leading figure in the organizations and journal until 1923, when he and his Japanese comrade Kaneko Fumiko were arrested for their alleged conspiracy to assassinate the Japanese emperor. Fat Korean and its successor, The Contemporary Society (Gen shakai), both published in 1923, made clear their national and transnational goals under the shackles of capitalism and colonialism (Hwang 2007). Park's arrest was a setback to the Japan-based Korean anarchist movement which was revived briefly with the organization in 1926 of the Black Movement Society, which became a member of the Japanese Black Youth League. Obviously, many Japan-based Korean anarchists partook in the various publications and organizational activities of their Japanese counterparts, which was conducive to their survival under Japanese surveillance. Their activities used to be supported and even sponsored by Japanese anarchists such as Ōsugi Sakae, Hatta Shūzō, and Iwasa Sakutarō.

The Korean anarchist groups in Japan manifested their criticism of capitalism, colonialism, and the nationalist movement, and made poignant attacks on Bolsheviks as a “new privileged class.” Their movement, however, began to decline after 1930 due to tight control of “dangerous thoughts” in Japan after its invasion of China. One exception to this was the Black Newspaper (Heuksaek sinmun), published from 1930 until 1935 with funding from Korean anarchist unions and organizations in Japan, which interspersed a wide range of local, national, and global news of anarchist activities and propagated social revolution, cosmopolitan ideas, and intense interactions among all anarchists and the masses across boundaries, along with criticism of nationalism and patriotism in the independence camps (Hwang 2007).

The ups and downs of the anarchist movement in Korea were closely tied to the situation of Korean anarchists in Japan and China. Any attempts to set up an anarchist organization in Korea, however, always met with swift and brutal suppression from the Japanese colonial government. Attempts to establish the Black Flag Federation (1924), the Real Friend Federation (1925), and Choi Gabryong's scheme to establish the Korean Anarcho-Communist Federation (1929) were all immediately crushed. Nevertheless, various anarchist groups and organizations continued to appear until the mid-1930s, albeit all short-lived. In the 1930s and 1940s anarchists in Korea were either arrested or forced underground to survive. Similar to their counterparts in China and Japan, their goal was not so much Korea's independence as the realization of an anarchism-oriented society (Mujeongbu jueui undongsa pyeonchan wiweonhoi 1989: 189–274, 394–400).

In the 1930s the Korean anarchist movement began to be at the ebb both at home and abroad, from which it never recovered. The notion and idea of social revolution, however, was sustained at least until 1945, coexisting with its national goal of independence (Yi 1974: 11). It is in this sense that anarchism in Korea was accepted not just to be “utilized” only for independence, but rather with reference to a society free of the “social problems” prevalent under capitalism. Anarchism still seems alive in South Korea as an idea for “freedom for the twenty-first century” (Bak 1999).

SEE ALSO: Anarchism; Anarchism, China; Anarchism, Japan; Hatta Shūzō (1886–1934); Ōsugi Sakae (1885–1923)

References and Suggested Readings

- Bak, H. (2005) Sikminji sidae hanin anakijeum undongsa [A History of Korean Anarchism During the Colonial Period]. Seoul: Seonin.
- Bak, Y. (1999) 21segi jayu, anakijeum! [Anarchism! Freedom for the Twenty-First Century]. Hankoreh21 279 (October 21). Available at www.hani.co.kr/h21/data/L991011/1paqab02.html (downloaded October 21, 1999).
- Graham, R. (Ed.) (2005) Anarchism: A Documentary History of Libertarian Ideas. Vol. 1: From Anarchy to Anarchism (300 CE to 1939). Montreal: Black Rose Books.
- Hwang, D. (2007) Beyond Independence: The Korean Anarchist Press in China and Japan in the 1920s–1930s. Asian Studies Review 31, 1 (March): 3–23.
- Mujeongbu jueui undongsa pyeonchan wiweonhoi (Ed.) (1989) Han'guk anakijeum undongsa [A History of the Korean Anarchist Movement]. Seoul: Hyeongseol Chulpansa.
- Oh, J. (1998) Han'guk anakijeum undongsa [A History of the Korean Anarchist Movement]. Seoul: Gukak jaryoweon.

- Yi, C. (1974) Ugwan munjon [Collected Works of Li Chung-kyu]. Seoul: Samhwa insoe.
- Yi, H. (2001) Hanguk eui anakijeum – sasang pyeon [Anarchism in Korea: Its Ideas]. Seoul: Jisik saneobsa.

Anarchism, Mexico

Chuck Morse

Anarchist roots in Mexico date back to the 1860s, when a small group of radical intellectuals embraced the doctrine. Greek immigrant Plotino Rhodakanaty, often considered the father of Mexican anarchism, was particularly important to the initial spread of the ideology, as was the Gran Círculo de Obreros de México, a workers' association founded in the Federal District in 1870. Fanned by escalating labor unrest, and a radicalization in the liberal opposition to the government, anarchists helped to lay the organizational and intellectual foundations of Mexico's growing revolutionary movement.

Ricardo Flores Magón was the most prominent anarchist during the first decade of the twentieth century. He, together with his Liberal Party of Mexico (Partido Liberal Mexicano, PLM), mounted the only serious opposition to Porfirio Díaz's government at the time. Organized in a network of Liberal Party "clubs" that were distributed throughout Mexico and in parts of the United States, the Magonists contested the legitimacy of the dominant regime, mobilized workers to challenge its economic foundations, and tried desperately to ignite the revolution.

A dedicated journalist, playwright, and publisher, Magón railed against the government's authoritarianism and hypocrisy in a prodigious stream of texts. His newspapers, El Hijo del Ahuizote and Regeneración, were major instruments in his battle against the state and had genuine mass appeal: for instance, the former had a circulation of 24,000 in 1904 and the latter reached 30,000 readers in 1906, despite being officially banned. These publications were one source of his repeated incarcerations as well as his 1903 flight to the United States, where he remained for the rest of his life.

On the economic terrain, the PLM organized strikes in vital parts of the national economy, such as in the copper mines in Cananea and in the textile industry in Puebla, Veracruz, Tlaxcala, Querétaro, Jalisco, and the Federal District.

These strikes cultivated working-class militancy and made exploitation a matter of public debate. The Cananea strike was remarkable for its anti-imperialist content: the mines were American-owned and, as a result, the strike forced Díaz to choose between yielding to the workers' demands or acting against them on behalf of an American capitalist. He chose the latter, which inflamed doubts about his fidelity to the fatherland.

The PLM also launched multiple insurrections against the regime. In 1906, when a leading Magonist, Práxedes Guerrero (1882–1910), had 46 guerilla units under his command, they participated in uprisings in Coahuila, Tamaulipas, and Veracruz. In 1908, they staged armed revolts in Viesca (Coahuila), Las Vacas (today Ciudad Acuña, Coahuila), and Casas Grandes and Palomas (Chihuahua). In 1911, Magonists seized Tijuana, which they declared a socialist republic before being routed.

An ambiguity about PLM goals compromised its chances of success. The party's 1906 "Program" was a liberal document that called for constitutional reforms, such as limiting the president's term to four years; the institution of an eight-hour working day; improvements in education; and other, non-revolutionary demands. However, the PLM also had a radical wing, led by Magón himself. Magón, who had grown increasingly – though privately – dedicated to anarchism, hoped to galvanize and lead the resistance to the government and turn the Mexican Revolution into an anarchist revolution. The contradictions between these two positions created discord within the PLM and some public confusion. Commenting on the matter, one scholar observed that the "Magonists took their public discourse from liberalism, and their strategy from anarchism" (Esperanza Valdez 2000: 182).

The PLM attempted to rectify this in 1911 by publishing its "Manifesto," an explicitly anarchist text that superseded the "Program" as the main statement of the party's goals. However, the Magonists had lost their presence in national affairs by this time and thus their clarification had little public impact. Indeed, although Magón continued agitating until his 1922 death in Leavenworth Penitentiary, the years of struggle, and the many unforeseen events linked to the outbreak of the Revolution, had exhausted his capacity to marshal a compelling alternative. Neither he nor the PLM would again occupy a central place in Mexican political life.

During the Mexican Revolution, anarchists would significantly affect the urban labor movement in general and the Casa del Mundo Obrero (House of the World Worker) in particular. The Casa, formed in Mexico City in 1912 by militants who had intended to start an anarchist school, quickly became the anchor of the country's radical workers' movement. In addition to providing a loose confederal structure for the many workers' organizations then operating, it also sponsored myriad cultural activities designed to foster revolutionary consciousness among the country's laborers. It published newspapers, sponsored educational programs, and put on plays and poetry readings, among other initiatives. It was strongly committed to the use of direct action and the general strike in battles with employers and as a mechanism for realizing its long-term, revolutionary aspirations. The Casa had deep roots in the working class and launched major mobilizations, including multiple general strikes.

However, navigating revolutionary Mexico's shifting political landscape, with its multiple contenders for state power, proved difficult. Though Casa anarchists rejected the state in principle, they also realized that alliances with one political force or another could yield tangible benefits. Thus, bowing to the demands of expediency, they formed an alliance with the Constitutionals, which led to the creation of the Casa's "Red Battalions," armed units sent into battle against Pancho Villa and Zapata's forces. This alliance lasted until 1916, when the Constitutionals – troubled by the presence of armed workers – felt powerful enough to dissolve the Casa.

The suppression of the Casa was part of a broader – and successful – government crackdown on worker militancy that took place in the latter part of the century's second decade. Although this campaign, and the passage of the 1917 Constitution, handed a decisive defeat to the Mexican Revolution's most radical tendencies, anarchists continued to resist the consolidation of the post-revolutionary order.

Regrouping after the repression, they challenged the legitimacy of the state in their voluminous writings and through diverse cultural events crafted to reaffirm popular revolutionary aspirations. The Grupo Luz, for instance, circulated its newspapers widely and sponsored frequent public gatherings. Numerous anarchist groups were organized in Mexico City and throughout the country.

Anarchists were instrumental to the 1921 foundation of the General Confederation of Workers (Confederación General de Trabajadores, CGT), a labor federation formed in opposition to the pro-government, Mexican Workers' Regional Confederation (Confederación Regional Obrera Mexicana). The CGT embraced anarchist principles such as direct action, class struggle, and libertarian communism. It also fought vigorously against government-sanctioned unionism and, increasingly, members of the Communist Party.

Anarchists were central to a 1922 rent strike that shook Veracruz, a hub for militant workers and anarchists. An anarchist tailor by the name of Herón Proal led this dramatic and bloody confrontation.

It was in the 1930s that anarchists finally lost their mass influence, as the post-revolutionary state assumed a more mature institutional form and established more efficient mechanisms for regulating and repressing dissent. The 1931 passage of the Ley del Trabajo, a labor code augmenting the government's role in the mediation of class conflicts, was pivotal.

Nonetheless, anarchist contributions from this period live on in Mexico's political culture. Magón is revered as a revolutionary hero and parts of the 1917 Constitution have roots in the PLM's 1906 "Program." Likewise, echoes of the Casa's worker mobilizations are perceptible, at least indirectly, in the Mexican government's strong corporatist commitments.

Many Spanish anarchists fled to Mexico after Franco's 1939 victory in Spain. The most famous was former CNT-FAI leader Juan García Oliver (1901–80). Another émigré, Ricardo Mestre (1906–97), helped found the Biblioteca Social Reconstruir (Library for Social Reconstruction), an anarchist library and meeting place in Mexico City that exists to this day.

The Mexican Anarchist Federation, founded in 1941, was the only group with even remote links to the movement's heyday to survive into the post-World War II period, although it never became more than a small publishing circle. Anarchists had no organized impact on Mexico's new left, despite the presence of strong anti-authoritarian sensibilities.

There was a renewal of interest in anarchism in the 1980s, thanks primarily to the impact of punk rock and cultural ties to countries such as Spain and the United States, in which anarchism also experienced a revival. Anarchists politicized at this time have built a vibrant counterculture linked together by social centers, newspapers, conferences, gatherings, websites, and email lists. The 1994 Zapatista uprising gave a boost to anarchists, who were quick to participate in Zapatista support groups. Anarchists are presently well represented among ideologically defined, left-wing youth, although they have been unable to articulate a compelling program for social change, which has undermined their efforts to rebuild anarchism's mass base.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism and Culture, 1840–1939; Anarchism in the United States to 1945; Anarchism in the United States, 1946–Present; Anarchosyndicalism; Magon, Ricardo Flores (1874–1922) and the Magonistas; Mexican Revolution of 1910–1921; Mexico, Worker Struggles and Labor Unions, 1950s–1970s; Spanish Revolution; Zapata, Emiliano (1879–1919) and the Comuna Morelense; Zapatistas, EZLN, and the Chiapas Uprising

References and Suggested Readings

- Albro, W. (1992) Always a Rebel: Ricardo Flores Magon and the Mexican Revolution. Fort Worth: Texas Christian University Press.
- Albro, W. (1996) To Die on Your Feet: The Life, Times, and Writings of Praxedis G. Guerrero. Fort Worth: Texas Christian University Press.
- Esperanza Valdez, R. C. (2000) El fenómeno magonista en México y en Estados Unidos, 1905–1908. Zacatecas: Universidad Autónoma de Zacatecas.
- Gandy, R. & Hodges, D. (2002) Mexico under Siege: Popular Resistance to Presidential Despotism. London: Zed Books.
- Hart, J. M. (1987) Anarchism and the Mexican Working Class. Austin: University of Texas Press.
- Hodges, D. C. (1995) Mexican Anarchism After the Revolution. Austin: University of Texas Press.
- Lear, J. (2001) Workers, Neighbors, and Citizens: The Revolution in Mexico City. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press.
- Wood, A. (2001) Revolution in the Street: Women, Workers, and Urban Protest in Veracruz, 1870–1927. Wilmington, DE: Scholarly Resources.

Anarchism, New Zealand

Asher Goldman

As in much of the world, anarchists and sympathizers played a large role in the formation of syndicalist-leaning unions in New Zealand in the early 1900s. World War I, the 1917 Russian Revolution, and the formation of the Labor Party combined to almost completely decimate the movement until the late 1950s, when it reformed as part of the New Left. Later, the influence of punk and then the anti-globalization movement would help grow anarchism's popularity, although it has still not begun to approach the level of influence it held in the early twentieth century.

Perhaps the first to call themselves anarchists in New Zealand were several activists in the New Zealand Socialist Party, formed in 1901. Within the party, Wellington became the center for a group of anti-parliamentary socialists. In 1908 a 3,000 member Socialist Party held a conference at which parliamentary action was condemned by a two to one majority. In 1913 anarchists in Wellington formed the Freedom Group, which was New Zealand's first recorded explicitly anarchist grouping. First formed in Chicago, USA, in 1905, the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) had branches in several centers across New Zealand, starting with Wellington in 1908. Membership included many anarchists. This revolutionary union had significant impact on the 1912 strike in the gold mining town of Waihi.

Anarchism would not rear its head again in New Zealand until the late 1950s, when anarchists became involved in protest movements and socialist discussion groups. By the late 1960s the new left Progressive Youth Movement had branches in many centers. The Wellington and Christchurch branches especially had a high number of anarchists involved. The early 1970s saw Resistance bookshops formed in the three main cities as centers for activism, the longest of which lasted only seven years. Punk anarchists began to get active in the early 1980s, and in one of New Zealand's few political bombings, a punk blew himself up (possibly purposefully) while attempting to attack the Wanganui Police computer.

In 1987 Auckland anarchists founded State Adversary magazine, which covered anarchist news and views from around the country until 2000. The year 1995 saw the opening of the Freedom Shop, a Wellington anarchist info-shop, the longest running in New Zealand history (it remains open in 2008). In the wake of anti-globalization protests in Seattle, Prague, and other cities, anarchism in New Zealand welcomed an influx of new adherents, and regular protest activity increased for a period in the main centers. In October 2007 anarchists were among 16 arrested in the first nationwide anti-terrorism raids, although terror charges were ultimately not laid, with the 16 facing firearms charges instead.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism; Anarchism, Australia; Communist Party NZ and the New Zealand Revolutionary Left; Industrial Workers of the World (IWW)

References and Suggested Readings

- Boraman, T. (2002) The New Left in New Zealand. In P. Moloney & K. Taylor (Eds.), On the Left: Essays on Socialism in New Zealand. Dunedin: Otago University Press.
- Boraman, T. (2007) Rabble Rousers and Merry Pranksters: A History of Anarchism in Aotearoa/New Zealand from the Mid-1950s to the Early 1980s. Christchurch: Katipo Books and Irrecoverable Press.
- Buchanan, S. (1999) Anarchy: The Transmogrification of Everyday Life. Wellington: Committee for the Establishment of Civilization.
- Prebble, F. (1995) Trouble Makers: Anarchism and Syndicalism, the Early Years of the Libertarian Movement in Aotearoa/New Zealand. Christchurch: Libertarian Press.
- Steiner, P. (2007) The History of the IWW in New Zealand. In P. Steiner & F. Hanlon, Industrial Unionism. Wellington: Rebel Press.

Anarchism, Poland

Magda Romanska

From 1772 until 1918 Poland as such did not exist; the country was partitioned by Russia, Prussia, and Austria. The anarchism movement thus sprang from the emancipatory impulses of various nineteenth-century underground groups that fought to reestablish the Polish state. The area occupied by Tsarist Russia experienced the bloodiest persecutions. The first anarchist group, consisting mostly of young Poles of Jewish descent, was organized in 1903 in Białystok. In the following years, the group's activities spread to other cities: Warsaw, Łódź, Kielce, Siedlce, and others. The goal of these groups was to disrupt the civil order set by the occupants. They often engaged in acts of terror: robberies, assaults on the police, bombings, and so forth. At the same time, some anarchist groups began to be interested in anarchosyndicalism, which rejected terrorism and focused on organizing revolutionary trade unions and engaging in various propaganda activities.

Polish anarchism thrived among socialist philosophers. Edward Abramowski (1868–1918, author of Socialism and the State and A Public Collusion against Government) advocated, as an alternative to the state, voluntary unions based on principles of common interest and collaboration. Influenced by Leo Tolstoy, Abramowski suggested that unions provide a foundation for individual freedom, while safeguarding justice and social order.

Jan Waclaw Machajski (1866–1926) began his political career as a member of the Polish Socialist Party, but soon rejected its bureaucracy and intellectual elite and believed the state should be destroyed by the working class. From 1920 to 1939, a short period of Polish independence, Abramowski and Machajski's anarchosyndicalist ideas influenced the Union of Trade-Unions (Związek Związków Zawodowych) (ZZZ), a 130,000-member organization from 1931 to 1939. After World War II began, anarchist ideas influenced Poland's subsequent struggles, opposing the Nazis during the war and Russian rule from 1946 to 1989. During World War II, members of ZZZ created Związek Syndykalistów Polskich (Union of Polish Syndicalists), participating in many resistance activities, including the Warsaw Ghetto uprising.

In the 1980s, anarchist ideas reappeared, with the Movement of Alternative Society. Shortly thereafter, small anarchist groups emerged in various cities across Poland in opposing the communist regime. These groups resorted to what Peter Sloterdijk calls kynicism, the recourse to irony and humor to undermine repressive regimes, organizing street happenings, performances, and impromptu performance events. These groups included Pomarańczowa Alternatywa (The Orange Alternative), Klub Sigma (Club Sigma), and Miedzyniastówka Anarchistyczna (Anarchy International). In the 1980s the anarchosyndicalist section of the Anarchist Federation published the newspaper Kombinat (The Factory), and the Anarchist Workers' Initiative (Anarchistyczna Inicjatywa Robotnicza) (AIR) published the newspaper Direct Action. Although initially founded on anarchist organization, in 1989 Solidarność (Solidarity) emerged as an official political party.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism; Solidarność (Solidarity)

References and Suggested Readings

- Nagorski, R. (1924/1977) History of the Anarchist Movement in Poland. Cienfuegos Press Anarchist Review 2: 20–2.
- Osa, M. (2003) Solidarity and Contention: Networks of Polish Opposition. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Tyszka, J. (1998) The Orange Alternative: Street Happenings as Social Performance in Poland Under Martial Law. New Theatre Quarterly 14, 56: 311.

Anarchism, Puerto Rico

Chuck Morse

Anarchists had a profound influence on the revolutionary workers' movement that existed in Puerto Rico during the first and second decades of the twentieth century. Although they never built an island-wide, specifically anarchist organization and for the most part cooperated with activists from other ideological tendencies, they left a unique and lasting imprint on the history and politics of the island.

As champions of workers' self-organization, anarchists were instrumental in the formation of the Regional Workers' Federation, Puerto Rico's first labor federation, established on October 23, 1898, shortly after the island became an American colony, and modeled on the anarchist-dominated Spanish Regional Federation. Anarchists also helped found the Free Workers' Federation, which emerged from a split within the Regional Workers' Federation between those leaning toward the Republican Party and those demanding independence from all "bourgeois parties." The Free Workers' Federation was the principal labor organization on the island for many years and led major strikes among sugarcane, cigar, and tobacco workers.

Cultural ventures were integral to anarchists' overall revolutionary strategy, as a means to foster working-class solidarity and prepare them to govern society after the anticipated collapse of capitalism. Anarchists published newspapers, books, and pamphlets, organized reading rooms and workers' centers, and sponsored theatrical groups, among other endeavors. The ubiquitous poverty and illiteracy among their intended audience prompted anarchists to communicate their ideals in innovative ways. For instance, radical workers often selected and paid other workers to be "readers," reading revolutionary literature to them while laboring in factories.

These initiatives spread the anarchist message throughout the island, nurturing a strong anti-capitalist and anti-political sentiment among many workers. Anarchists also opened the world of ideas to men and women who would have likely been excluded otherwise, in turn transforming Puerto Rican culture. In this regard, anarchist-feminist organizer, playwright, and occasional "reader" Luisa Capetillo is among the most distinguished militants.

Anarchists lost influence in the labor movement in the second decade of the century, never to regain it since, due to state repression and factional struggles within the Free Workers' Federation. In addition, anarchists were unable to take a strong position on the island's colonial status, which became the central issue in Puerto Rican political life. As revolutionary internationalists and anti-statists, anarchists argued that it mattered little whether native or foreign elites ruled the island if capitalist domination remained intact.

Paradoxically, anarchism's rejection of the dominant terms of political debate in Puerto Rico provides an enduring appeal for those drawn to radical social alternatives. For example, anarchism is an ideological point of reference for participants in the island's punk rock movement.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism and Culture, 1840–1939; Anarchism in the United States to 1945; Anarchism in the United States, 1946–Present; Anarchism, Spain; Anarchosindicalism

References and Suggested Readings

- Ayala, C. & Bernabe, R. (2007) Puerto Rico in the American Century: A History since 1898. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Davila Santiago, R. (1988) El Derribo de las Murallas (Knocking Down the Walls). Río Piedras: Editorial Cultural.
- Findlay, E. (1999) Imposing Decency: The Politics of Sexuality and Race in Puerto Rico, 1870–1920. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.

Anarchism, Russia

Nick Heath

Despite the fact that two of the most important theoreticians of anarchism, Mikhail Bakunin and Peter Kropotkin, were Russian, anarchism in that country never really developed as a movement until after the beginning of the twentieth century. Whilst Bakunin made strenuous efforts to recruit among Russian exiles, no credible organization modeled on his ideas emerged in the home country during his lifetime.

Zemfir C. Ralli-Arbore (aka Z. K. Ralli, 1848–1933), a young Romanian born in Bessarabia within the Russian empire and an associate of Bakunin, set up a small group in Geneva, the Revolutionary Commune of Russian Anarchists, in 1873, but it was not until 1892 that Armenian doctor Alexander Atabekian (1868–ca. 1940), an associate of Kropotkin, established a group called the Anarchist Library. This group smuggled literature into Russia with very few short-term results. At the end of the 1890s, the Geneva Group of Anarchists took up this work again.

Unrest within the Russian empire in 1903 led to the establishment of the first viable anarchist grouping in Bialystok. This group, Bor'ba (Struggle), was composed of mainly Jewish young workers and students, disillusioned with what they saw as the gradualism of the Bund, the Jewish Social Democratic grouping, the Socialist Revolutionaries, and the Polish Socialist Party. Meanwhile, young associates of Kropotkin established the paper Khleb I Volia (Bread and Freedom) in Geneva, and it was smuggled across the borders into the empire. Yiddish anarchist papers from London also began to circulate in the Jewish Pale.

One of the principal architects of the nascent movement was Nikolai Rogdaev (ca. 1880–1932), who constructed groups in Briansk, Nezhin, and Ekaterinoslav and acted as a coordinator between many groups in Russia and the Ukraine. In 1903, there were 12 organizations in 11 towns; in 1904, 29 groups in 27 centers of the northwest, southwest, and south; in 1905, 125 groups and federations in 110 towns; in 1906, 221 in 155 towns; and in 1907, at the height of the movement, there were 255 groups in 180 localities. The most important centers of the movement were in Bialystok, Odessa, and Ekaterinoslav, but anarchist activity could be found in three-quarters of the empire.

Anarchists turned quickly to armed attacks, not just against the servants of tsarist autocracy but also against factory owners and their managers involved in lockouts and severe repression of workers. Heavily involved in the events of 1904–5, they were the most committed fighters on the barricades during the Moscow uprising of December 1905. Many hundreds of anarchists died in the fighting or were hanged or died in prison in the aftermath.

A new current, rejecting expropriations and individual terror, and arguing for mass agitation among the workers and the organization of revolutionary unions, began to develop. The principal theorist of this anarchosyndicalist current was Daniil Novomirskii (aka Iakov Kirillovskii, 1882–after 1936), whose South Russian Group of Anarchosyndicalists had some success among workers in Odessa and Ekaterinoslav between 1905 and 1907.

While there were still 108 groups within the empire in 1908, by 1914, only seven remained. Many anarchists were forced into exile. A number of unitary conferences took place, the first in Geneva in 1908 where the groups around the papers Khleb I Volia and Burevestnik (Storm Petrel) fused and formed the Union of Anarchist Communists. At one of the last of these conferences (London, December 1913) the decision was taken to form a Federation of Anarchist-Communist Groups in Exile with its own paper. These moves were thwarted by the outbreak of war and the acrimonious splits that resulted from the decision of Kropotkin and others to support the Allies. Nonetheless, by 1915, the movement at home had begun to grow again to around 250–300, mostly in Moscow, St. Petersburg, and other urban centers, composed mostly of workers and a few students.

The February Revolution of 1917 led to the freeing of many hundreds of anarchists from prison, soon reinforced by many others returning from exile. While this further galvanized a movement that had already started growing as a result of the war, February was a great disappointment to the anarchists, who now were moving into a loose working relationship with their main rival, the Bolsheviks, to overthrow Kerensky's provisional government. In Moscow, anarchists expropriated many mansions of the rich and published two daily papers with 60 affiliated groups. There was a similarly strong following in Petrograd, where the anarchists were a moving force in the July Days, an abortive attempt to overthrow the provisional government. Both the anarchocommunists and anarchosyndicalists engaged in intense propaganda.

The Treaty of Brest-Litovsk and the consolidation of Bolshevik power in 1918 soon brought the anarchists into confrontation with their erstwhile allies. The Bolsheviks launched armed attacks on anarchists in Moscow, closing down anarchist papers. This wave of repression continued through the next two years.

In the Ukraine, the anarchist Nestor Makhno had begun organizing a peasant insurrection, first against the Austro-Germans, then against the Whites. Some anarchists from the urban centers began to join this movement, in part because of Bolshevik repression there. The Nabat Confederation of Anarchists was founded, working alongside Makhno's insurrectional army. To the east, in Siberia, anarchists began to organize armed bands against the Whites. Both these movements soon clashed with Bolshevism, leading to their repression. The culminating point was the Kronstadt Revolt of 1921. Kropotkin's funeral was to be the last main manifestation of anarchism in Russia for many years.

Those who did not become Soviet anarchists (either outright embracing of the Communist Party or fellow-traveling) were driven into exile. Many did not have this choice and were either murdered by the Bolsheviks or suffered many years in prisons or camps. As the French anarchist Louis Mercier Vega (1914–77) noted: "In most of the eyewitness accounts of the prisons and camps the anarchists feature, intractable, attached to their convictions, hard like pebbles polished by cruelty and bad treatment." There appears to have been some anarchist involvement in the uprising at the Siberian slave labor camp of Vorkuta in 1953, with the black flag flying.

In exile, some anarchists like Makhno and Arshinov began to argue that the failure of anarchism in Russia was due to chronic disorganization. Whilst anarchism had widespread sympathy there, it had failed to take advantage of this and had succumbed to its Bolshevik rival. There was heated and acrimonious debate over this in exile circles.

Anarchist groups began to appear in the 1980s and 1989 saw the establishment of the Confederation of Anarchosyndicalists (KAS), with groups across Russia. Today, several small and divided anarchist groupings exist in Russia: KRAS (the Russian section of the International Workingmen's Association, IWA), Autonomous Action (AD), and the Association of Anarchist Movements (ADA). Putin's Russia has not been a favorable environment for the growth of anarchism, and there is much ideological confusion within anarchist ranks.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism, Poland; Anarchocommunism; Anarchosyndicalism; Bakunin, Mikhail Alexandrovich (1814–1876); Bolsheviks; Kronstadt Mutiny of 1921; Kropotkin, Peter (1842–1921); Makhno, Nestor (1889–1935); Nechaev, Sergei (1847–1882); Russia, Revolution of 1905–1907; Russia, Revolution of February/March 1917; Russia, Revolution of October/November 1917; Soviet Union, Fall of

References and Suggested Readings

- Avrich, P. (Ed.) (1973) The Anarchists in the Russian Revolution. London: Thames & Hudson.
- Avrich, P. (2005) The Russian Anarchists. Edinburgh: AK Press.
- Maksimov, G. P. (1999) Syndicalists in the Russian Revolution. Los Angeles: ICC.
- Rabinowitch, A. (1991) Prelude to Revolution. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Skirda, A. (2000) Les Anarchistes russes, les soviets et la révolution de 1917. Paris: Editions de Paris.

Anarchism and sabotage

Benjamin Franks

Anarchists have tended to view the tactic of sabotage more favorably than orthodox Marxists. This category of political behavior is usually associated, as the sociologist Pierre Dubois (1979: 21) describes, with three types of industrial action: the deliberate destruction of the machinery of production; the disruption of the labor process; or the cessation of productive labor. It consequently takes many forms, from arson and vandalism, through to go-slows and working without enthusiasm, to strikes and occupations. For the former radical syndicalist Elizabeth Gurley Flynn (1993), it is any action in which the worker deliberately attempts to reduce the economic efficiency of their labor.

Flynn's more libertarian definition of sabotage is wider than that associated with Friedrich Engels. It is Engels' more critical appraisal of sabotage that has influenced orthodox Marxism, and forms the basis of the division between them and anarchists on this issue. Engels, in The Condition of the Working Class in England, associates sabotage primarily with just one part – machine breaking – and this is more commonly associated with the Luddites (Thompson 1991: 604). The Luddites were largely artisans opposed to the destruction of their livelihoods and communities as a result of the introduction of mechanical manufacture of textiles. For Engels, sabotage is at the lower end of a hierarchy of proletarian action, just above criminal activity and well short of disciplined revolutionary political organization. The historian E. P. Thompson rejects the characterization of the Luddites and their tactics as merely a disorganized attempt by a few malcontents engaged in a futile attempt to roll back progress. Thompson instead suggests that the Luddites' actions were highly creative, well-organized, and targeted assaults at pivotal sites of capitalist development, which also fed into other forms of social protest (1991: 605–7, 629–30).

The division between orthodox Marxists on the one side and revolutionary syndicalists, libertarian socialists, and anarchists on the other, has continued to shape attitudes to sabotage. The latter have regarded sabotage as an often legitimate and creative set of tactics for workers to meet their desires at the expense of hierarchical power (see Convington et al. 2006: 189), while the former consider such methods to be infantile and destructive to longer-term interests of the class (Challinor 1977: 96). Such a difference in part reflects the distinct views on agency. Orthodox Marxism privileges the proletariat acting in unison under the guiding hand of the revolutionary party, while anarchists tend to support wider sets of unmediated responses by a larger set of oppressed subjects, which includes Thompson's artisans.

The distinction in responses to sabotage is also indicative of the division between orthodox Marxists and anarchists on their post-revolutionary vision. For Leninists, the upcoming revolution involved the proletariat seizing control of the means of production and managing it so that production would meet collective needs rather than individual profit; consequently, there was fear that sabotage would destroy the means of production that would provide the post-revolutionary infrastructure. For anarchists, sabotage meant fundamentally altering the means of production such that all productive activity was fulfilling, not merely waiting for a new type of "socialist" management.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism; Anarchosyndicalism; Engels, Friedrich (1820–1895); Flynn, Elizabeth Gurley (1890–1964); Leninist Philosophy; Luddism and Machine

Breaking; Marxism; Thompson, Edward Palmer (E. P.) (1924–1993)

References and Suggested Readings

- Challinor, R. (1977) The Origins of British Bolshevism. London: Croom Helm.
- Convington, B. et al. (1966/2006) Freedom: The Only Cause Worth Serving. In F. Rosemont & C. Radcliffe (Eds.), Dancin' in the Streets!: Anarchists, IWWs, Surrealists, Situationists and Provos in the 1960s as Recorded in the Pages of "The Rebel Worker." Chicago: Charles H. Kerr.
- Dubois, P. (1979) Sabotage in Industry. Harmondsworth: Penguin.
- Flynn, E. Gurley (1915/1993) Sabotage: The Conscious Withdrawal of the Workers' Efficiency. London: Pentagon. Also available online at Industrial Workers of the World, www.iww.org/culture/library/sabotage/ (last accessed December 11, 2007).
- Thompson, E. P. (1991) The Making of the English Working Class. Harmondsworth: Penguin.

Anarchism, Spain

Pedro García Guirao

It is commonly accepted that the history of Spanish anarchism started in the early nineteenth century with the economist and social reformer Ramón de la Sagra (1798–1871). In 1845, he launched the first anarchist periodical, El Porvenir, which introduced to Spain the ideas of Proudhon, Fourier, and Saint-Simon. Between 1848 and 1849, de la Sagra and Proudhon founded the Banco Popular. Despite this, the Spanish anarchist movement did not properly get underway until after the International Workingmen's Association (IWA) meeting in London in 1864, when the supporters of Bakunin sent the Italian Giuseppe Fanelli to Spain. His mission was to establish the Spanish section of the First International (Sección Española de la Primera Internacional), which occurred in 1869. The triumph of Bakunin's anarchosyndicalist theories was so great that when Pablo Lafargue arrived in Madrid in 1871 with the intention of founding a workers' political party, he was told by the Catalan statesman Francisco Pi y Margall that a Marxist political party would never succeed in Spain.

Francisco Pi y Margall (1824–1901) was one of the most influential thinkers who contributed to the popularization of anarchism in Spain. After emigrating to France in 1866, he came into direct contact with the theories of Proudhon, which he translated and analyzed in various books. He defended the principle of federalism against centralism and achieved wide popularity among anarchists. After the declaration of the First Spanish Republic in 1873 he became president, but resigned his position after just a week.

After the restoration of the monarchy in 1874, IWA sympathizers were suppressed and workers' organizations were proscribed. In around 1882, an apparently secret anarchist organization, La Mano Negra (The Black Hand), dedicated to committing murder and robbery, was persecuted in Andalucía. However, the principal anarchist organization of that time, the Federación de Trabajadores de la Región Española (FTRE), denied any connection with it, claiming that the organization did not exist and was simply an invention of police and landowners who needed an excuse to pursue a repressive campaign against peasant associations.

In 1892 in Cádiz, an insurrection took place at Jerez de la Frontera which led to the split of anarchism into two groups: the Andaluz fraction, characterized by primitivism, ruralism, violence, and individualism, and the organized, syndicalist, and urban anarchism of Cataluña, led by Rafael Farga Pellicer and José Lluas (founder of the anarchist satirical periodical La Tramontana).

Following the assassination of ten people in the Corpus Christi procession in Barcelona in 1896, during which another 24 were injured, on May 4, 1897, 28 people were sentenced to death. During the so-called Montjuic trial, the government of Cánovas del Castillo persecuted and tortured the presumed leaders of the attack. They included Tàrrida del Màrmol, Pere Corominas, Ramón Sempau, Teresa Mañé i Miravet (known as Soledad Gustavo), and Joan Montseny (known as Federico Urales). In August 1897, the Italian anarchist Michele Angiolillo assassinated Cánovas in revenge for those murdered and tortured in Montjuic.

On August 3, 1907, the labor federation Solidaridad Obrera (Workers' Solidarity) was created in Barcelona with the intention of uniting all Spanish social-anarchist movements that refused to join the General Workers' Union (Unión General de Trabajadores, UGT), founded in 1888 under the political control of the Spanish Socialist Workers' Party (Partido Socialista Obrero Español, PSOE). Solidaridad

Obrera had a profound influence on anarcho-syndicalism in Spain, especially through its periodical, Solidaridad Obrera, which disseminated propaganda during strikes. The organization also played a significant role in the Semana Trágica in Barcelona from July 25 to August 1, 1909, which led to the execution of the anarchist pedagogue Francisco Ferrer y Guardia, the founder of the Escuela Moderna (Modern School), on October 13, 1909. Finally, at its 1910 congress, Solidaridad Obrera created the National Confederation of Labor (Confederación Nacional del Trabajo, CNT).

At the beginning of February 1919, a strike began in Barcelona at the La Canadiense company. The appointment of Governor Martínez Anido and his chief of police Arlegui initiated an epoch during which anarchists and trade unionists were severely persecuted, and pistolero ("gunfighterism") ruled Barcelona for several years. Using the chaos of the era as a pretext, King Alfonso XIII allowed General José Antonio Primo de Rivera to form a government that repressed the proletariat and anarchist unions. During the dictatorship of Primo de Rivera (1923–30), all CNT activities were prohibited, although the organization continued to exist illegally.

In 1927, an underground organization of Spanish and Portuguese anarchists, called the Iberian Anarchist Federation (Federación Anarquista Ibérica, FAI), emerged. FAI coordinated violent actions aimed at the elimination of the dictatorship and the king. However, violence was not necessary: on January 28, 1930, the dictator resigned and the elections of April 12, 1931, which resulted in the proclamation of the Second Republic, sent the king into exile. Three months later, Angel Pestana, Juan Peiró, Horacio M. Prieto, and a large number of CNT members signed the famous "Manifesto of the 30: To All Anarchists," in which they proposed that anarchism should play a part in professional politics. In opposition to the FAI, which advocated the immediate introduction of libertarian communism, the signatories believed in the necessity of a transitional phase between capitalism and anarchist society. They wanted to create anarchist political parties: the Partido Sindicalista, Partido Libertario, and Sindicalismo Político. However, they were eventually expelled from the CNT, which opened up a rift between trade unionists and the FAI-ists. Those who distanced themselves from reformist anarchism created the Iberian Federation of Libertarian Youth (FIJL) in 1932, and Mujeres Libres in 1936.

During its early days, the Second Republic was euphorically considered by many to be a panacea powerful enough to resolve the four great problems that had dragged Spain down for over a century: latifundism, religiosity of the state, exploitation of the proletariat, and centralism. It soon became clear that the Republic was nothing more than a reformist political regime perpetuating the same problems. A good illustration of the gap that existed between the government and the people is the crime that occurred in the village of Casas Viejas (Cádiz) in January 1933, when 25 people, including coal merchant Francisco Cruz, known as “Seisdedos,” were burned alive by the republican Civil Guards. The motive for the attack was the proclamation of libertarian communism in Andalucía. The Civil Guards produced an effect contrary to the one they had desired: rather than silencing the anarchists, they elevated the humble peasants to the status of martyrs, ignited libertarianism in a number of areas (mostly in Asturias, Aragón, Barcelona, and Levante), and aroused radical discontent toward the Second Republic.

On November 19, 1933, the elections were won by an alliance of religious political parties sympathizing with Italian and German fascism, the Spanish Confederation of the Autonomous Right (Confederación Española de Derechas Autónomas, CEDA), who proceeded to paralyze all progressive reforms and projects that had been started. During the elections, the CNT issued the slogan: “Do not vote, get ready for social revolution. If the right wins, decisive struggles will have to be carried out in the street.” The organization kept its word and ignited uprisings in Aragón and Asturias, which resulted in 3,000 dead, 7,000 wounded, and around 30,000 arrested, almost all of whom were anarchosyndicalists.

During the next elections in 1936, the fear that the right might win again led to the creation of the Popular Front coalition consisting of a number of political parties and trade unions, including the Republican Left (Izquierda Republicana), the Workers’ Party of Marxist Unification (Partido Obrero de Unificación Marxista, POUM), and the Republican Left of Catalonia (Esquerra Republicana de Catalunya, ERC). The CNT, with over 1,500,000 members, decided not to boycott the Popular Front, since it promised amnesty for all political prisoners. The coalition won and the amnesty occurred.

The unstable coalition fell apart, however, as each group began to follow its own interests. The CNT tried to establish the libertarian communism that it had defended since its congress in 1936 in Zaragoza. In this volatile situation, a part of the army rebelled in July against the Republic. The CNT declared a general strike in response and started to implement revolutionary urban guerilla tactics. These events marked the beginnings of the Spanish Civil War. The anarcho-syndicalists controlled the main Spanish cities, including Barcelona – “the capital of Spanish anarchism” – and collectivized factories, transport, and the health system.

During the Civil War, the revolution was secondary: the priority was the creation of a united front against fascism. Trade unionist Francisco Largo Caballero hoped that with such political burdens, the anarchists would abandon spontaneous struggles in the streets and follow the discipline required to be given weapons. This implied the dissolution of anarchist militias so that they could join the professional army, which the CNT eventually refused to do. In May 1937, the communists betrayed the revolution in Barcelona by directly attacking the libertarian movement, assassinating their own comrades, and assaulting the Telefónica building in which the anarchists had barricaded themselves.

The victory of Franco resulted in a dictatorship that lasted from 1939 until his death on November 20, 1975. Anarchism during this period was characterized by illegality, exile, and decline. Nevertheless, anarchist guerillas known as Maquis lived hidden in the mountains, boycotting and sabotaging everything they could in the Francoist regime. Due to both external repression and internal conflicts, however, the CNT continued to deteriorate. History repeated itself: on the one hand were the orthodox defenders of revolutionary syndicalism, direct action, and libertarian communism, on the other were those who believed in ideological change and considered political syndicalism, closer to socialism. The CNT unified in 1961, but the unification was short-lived and the subsequent separation was so severe that the anarchist movement practically disappeared.

On March 2, 1974, as Franco was nearing death, the young anarchist Salvador Puig Antich was executed by garrote. As a member of the anti-capitalist Iberian Liberation Movement (Movimiento Ibérico de Liberación, MIL), he had contacts with the French anarchist movement and Spanish exiles living in Toulouse. His death was another example of the atrocities carried out by the Francoist regime, recognized by western democracies.

Even after Franco's death, however, anarchism did not regain its former popularity. Democratizing projects, while recognizing communists, did not take anarchists into account, and neither did anarchists want to repeat the mistake of participating in professional politics. At the beginning of the twenty-first century, Spanish anarchism has experienced a resurgence, primarily in two ways. The first is through the recovery of historical memory. A number of foundations dedicated to research have been founded, including the Fundación de Estudios Libertarios Anselmo Lorenzo, Ateneo Virtual, Fundación Andreu Nin, Ateneu Enciclopèdic Popular, Centre d'Estudis Llibertaris Federica Montseny, and the Fundación Casas Viejas 1933. The second is through practical anarchism, in the context of which the CNT accommodates such divergent movements and activities as libertarian syndicalism, feminism, anti-globalization protests, environmentalism, the defense of homosexual rights, free love, urban punks and squatters, and centers of free education. This is a reminder that nowhere else in the world has anarchism been so extensively assimilated into the masses as in Spain, where the echoes of the decades-old slogan – Uníos Hermanos Proletarios: Proletarian Brothers Unite – can still be heard.

SEE ALSO: Anarchosyndicalism; Bakunin, Mikhail Alexandrovich (1814–1876); Barcelona General Strike, 1919; Confederación Nacional del Trabajo (CNT); Escuela Moderna Movement (The Modern School); Federación Anarquista Ibérica (FAI); Mujeres Libres; POUM (Workers' Party of Marxist Unification); Puig Antich, Salvador (1948–1974); Spanish Revolution

References and Suggested Readings

- Álvarez, J. (1991) La ideología política del anarquismo español (1868–1910). Madrid: Siglo XXI.
- Herrerín, A. (2004) La CNT durante el franquismo. Clandestinidad y exilio (1939–1975). Madrid: Siglo XXI.
- Kaplan, T. (1977) Anarchists of Andalusia (1868–1903). Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Lorenzo, C. M. (1972) Los anarquistas españoles y el poder (1868–1969). Paris: Ruedo Ibérico.

Orwell, G. (2003) Homage to Catalonia. London: Penguin.

Peirats, J. (1988) La CNT y la Revolución Española, Vol. 3. Madrid: La Cuchilla.

Termes, J. (2000) Anarquismo y sindicalismo en España (1864–1881). Barcelona: Crítica.

Anarchism and syndicalism, Southern Africa

Lucien van der Walt

Anarchism, and particularly its syndicalist variant, played an important role in early labor and socialist politics in Southern Africa. Emerging in South Africa in the 1880s, and in Mozambique in the early twentieth century, it reached its apogee in the 1910s. Movements influenced by syndicalism continued in the 1920s, and spread to Southwest Africa (now Namibia), Northern Rhodesia (Zambia), and Southern Rhodesia (Zimbabwe) by the 1930s. The history of anarchism and syndicalism in Southern Africa, largely confined to a minority of the working class, provides a case of how this internationalist movement developed in the context of British and Portuguese colonialism and a racially divided working class.

Capitalism and Imperialism

The region that became South Africa was marginal to the world economy before the 1860s, mainly significant for the port at the Cape of Good Hope and agricultural exports from Western Cape farms. Port Elizabeth emerged in the east, mainly an export point. Both were part of Britain's Cape Colony, the farms worked by Colored workers (descended from slaves and servants), and Africans. The neighboring Natal Colony had an important port, Durban, whose hinterland had sugar plantations, worked largely by indentured Indians. The interior was a patchwork of agrarian African kingdoms and Afrikaner republics (notably the Orange Free State and Transvaal).

Diamond discoveries at Kimberley in 1867 saw an economic boom, with Cape Town, linked by rail, a particular beneficiary. This was followed by the discovery of underground gold deposits at the Witwatersrand in the Transvaal in 1886.

As at Kimberley, gold mining was rapidly centralized in powerful companies: the Wernher-Beit and Eckstein conglomerate dominated diamonds, gold mining, and landownership, and soon employed more people than the railways and harbors of British colonies and Afrikaner republics combined. Towns grew along the Witwatersrand, notably Johannesburg, which quickly overtook Cape Town (and Pretoria, the Transvaal capital) in population and economic importance. The mining revolution was accompanied by the expansion of Cape Town and Durban (Port Elizabeth was marginalized), as well as some secondary industry and capitalist farming. By 1913 Johannesburg had grown to a city of 250,000, and South Africa produced 40 percent of the world's gold.

Growing imperial interest saw a wave of British wars on Africans and Afrikaners from the 1870s onwards, culminating in the Anglo-Boer War (1899–1902) and the creation of the Union of South Africa, a self-governing white dominion, in 1910, surrounded by British protectorates like Swaziland, and colonies like Northern and Southern Rhodesia and Nyasaland (now Malawi). Germany's Southwest Africa was placed under South African mandate in 1920. In Mozambique, controlled by Portugal, the port of Lourenço Marques expanded rapidly through South African investment and trade, with a railway link to the Witwatersrand from 1895, growing to around 25,000 people in 1915 (Cappela 1981). A large part of the territory's African population became migrant laborers in South Africa.

The Working Class, Anarchism, and Syndicalism

Africans supplied the bulk of mine labor, providing migrant male workers who returned to the countryside after their contracts: they were segregated, subject to coercive labor laws and an internal passport system, and drawn from conquered peoples across Southern Africa. In 1920, David Yudelman and Alan Jeeves (1986) noted, 49 percent of African miners on the Witwatersrand came from other countries, 36 percent from Mozambique alone. White workers immigrated from across the British empire, dominating skilled work. In 1913, according to Hobart-Houghton (1964), there were 195,000 Africans on the Witwatersrand mines, a further 37,000 domestic workers, and 6,000 employed elsewhere, and 38,500 white workers, 22,000 in mining. Besides the division between free skilled white workers and unfree, nominally unskilled Africans, the working class included intermediate layers of impoverished, unskilled Afrikaners, Coloreds and Indians, and urbanized Africans. In Cape Town, Coloreds were the majority, and Africans marginal, and in Durban, Indians were a large and important group.

Initially based amongst white immigrants, anarchism and syndicalism developed a base amongst Jews, Africans, Coloreds, and Indians in the 1910s. The movement was always faced with a divided working class, fractured by racial as well as ethnic divisions. White workers, afraid of replacement by cheaper workers of color, typically demanded segregation, and formed unions and the South African Labor Party (SALP) on this platform, while unions amongst workers of color developed independently.

Early Anarchists in South Africa

Port Elizabeth's Henry Glasse (1847–unknown), an Indian-born anarchist linked to the Freedom group in London founded by Peter Kropotkin in 1886, pioneered local anarchism. He distributed Freedom Press materials and formed a Socialist Club at the turn of the century. The anarchist Wilfred H. Harrison formed the Social Democratic Federation (SDF) in Cape Town in 1904 and the Pretoria Socialist Society in 1911. Both groups included socialists with a wide variety of views. Born in England in 1871, Harrison was part of the SDF's substantial anarchist section, a famed orator who expounded Kropotkin to Colored and white audiences, launched an interracial General Workers' Union in 1906, and organized interracial demonstrations of the city's unemployed. Riots broke out during the demonstrations, and two SDF members – one an anarchist, Levinson – were arrested in the first prosecution of socialists in the country.

Henry Glasse and Harrison opposed armed propaganda by the deed, unlike John Sepoul and Henry Larsen, two workers deported from the Transvaal in 1904 for an alleged plot to assassinate the British governor, Lord Milner. Insurrectionism was never an important local current. It was syndicalism that took center stage. The radical weekly Voice of Labour was founded in Johannesburg in 1908 by the Scottish fitter Archie Crawford and Mary Fitzgerald from Ireland; both were basically radical state socialists, but the paper nonetheless provided an open platform for other radical correspondents, including Henry Glasse and Harrison. The network that developed around the paper stressed interracial working-class unity, Henry Glasse writing that “For a white worker in this South Africa to pretend he can successfully fight his battle independent of the coloured wage slaves – the vast majority – is, to my mind, simply idiocy” (Voice of Labour, January 26, 1912).

By 1910, a syndicalist current had coalesced around the paper, which was further boosted by the tour of British syndicalist Tom Mann in February. Crawford was replaced as editor by “Proletarian,” an unidentified supporter of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), based in Cape Town. “Proletarian” advocated One Big Union in the Voice of Labour, with “a universal general strike preparatory to seizing and running the interests of South Africa” (Voice of Labour, October 27, 1911).

In June 1910, a South African IWW was formed in Johannesburg, which organized spectacular strikes by white tramway workers in 1911, formed groups in Durban and Pretoria, and linked up with the IWW in Chicago. Its key figures were Andrew Dunbar, a blacksmith and strike leader from Scotland, and Tom Glynn of Ireland, a former policeman and now tramway worker. A Socialist Labor Party was also formed in Johannesburg that year, advocating Daniel De Leon’s syndicalism. Including in its membership the Afrikaner Philip R. Roux, the Jewish radical Israel Israelstam, and the Scotsman J. M. Gibson, it was mainly a propaganda group and held meetings on the Johannesburg Market Square, as did the IWW.

Despite disagreements on many issues, both groups concurred on the need for an interracial, revolutionary One Big Union, so breaking with the traditions of mainstream white labor. While the local IWW does not seem to have had much success organizing across the color line, it was the only union at the time in South Africa with no racial restrictions on membership, and probably the first such in Britain’s African empire. Both the local IWW and Socialist Labor Party represented a strand in local anarchism and syndicalism that, while notable for its principled internationalism, tended to ignore the specific problems, the civil and political disabilities of workers of color: this helps explain their lack of success in organizing on interracial lines.

There were, however, even at this early stage, developments that pointed to the emergence of a more sophisticated approach that aimed to combine the struggles against national oppression and class domination. Henry Glasse was acutely sensitive to Africans’ situation, Harrison made strides toward interracial unity with his union work, and “Proletarian” argued in the Voice of Labour that a “native rising,” which would be a “wholly justified” response to “the cruel exploitation of South African natives by farmers, mining magnates and factory owners,” and should receive the “sympathy and support of every white wage-slave” (Voice of Labour, December 1, 1911).

The New Radicals

From 1912 onwards, syndicalist activism ebbed. Glynn left South Africa, later becoming a key figure in the Australian IWW; Crawford took control of the IWW, expelling Dunbar; the SDF, Socialist Labor Party, and other groups united at Crawford’s urging into a United Socialist Party, which soon collapsed into its constituent parts; and the Voice of Labour ceased publication in early 1913.

That year a general strike broke out amongst white workers on the Witwatersrand, a militant episode controlled by unofficial strike committees, with gun battles and riots resulting in many deaths and strikers in control of much of Johannesburg. There were syndicalist sentiments amongst a section of strikers, with Crawford and Fitzgerald shifting their views somewhat, as did more white unionists like J. T. Bain, however briefly, but there was no organized syndicalist nucleus. The government nonetheless insisted the strike was due to a “Syndicalist Conspiracy,” and crushed a second general strike in early 1914 with martial law. Crawford and eight others were deported to Britain, and Mann again toured South Africa. On his return Crawford was a changed man, becoming the moderate secretary of the conservative South African Industrial Federation (SAIF).

The 1913 strike had radicalized a layer of trade unionists like British-born George W. Mason of the Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners, and J. Forrester Brown of the South African Mineworkers’ Union (SAMWU), who hailed from Australia, as well as a section of the SALP, most notably S. P. Bunting, W. H. Andrews, and David Ivon Jones. Bunting, born in London to an upper-class family, was an SALP representative in the Transvaal Provincial Council, Andrews, born in Suffolk, was a leading trade unionist and head of the SALP's parliamentary caucus, and Ivon Jones, born in Wales, was SALP general secretary. The outbreak of World War I polarized the SALP, and the SALP radicals, joined by veterans of the IWW and Socialist Labor Party like Dunbar, Gibson, and Roux, formed a War-on-War League. The SALP split in August 1915, the anti-war group forming the International Socialist League, which published the weekly International.

The International Socialist League quickly moved toward syndicalism, with the ideas of De Leon and the IWW central. Its first annual conference in January (International, January 7, 1916) stated "That we encourage the organization of the workers on industrial or class lines, irrespective of race, colour or creed, as the most effective means of providing the necessary force for the emancipation of the workers." The International called for One Big Union "organized on the broad lines of no colour bar" to "inaugurate the Co-operative Commonwealth" (February 23, 1916).

Branches were established on the Witwatersrand in Benoni, Germiston, Krugersdorp, and Johannesburg, and also in Durban, Kimberley, Pietermaritzburg (the Natal capital), and Pretoria. Initially mainly based amongst radical British immigrants, it soon attracted many immigrant Jews, concentrated in the multiracial slums of Johannesburg, who formed a Yiddish-speaking branch. From 1916 onwards, it also recruited a growing number of African, Colored, and Indian members. One of the first recruits was T. W. Thibedi, a brilliant African schoolteacher from Johannesburg. In Cape Town, close ties were formed with Harrison and the SDF, which (after a fierce internal struggle) had also adopted a radical anti-militarist position.

National Liberation and Class Struggle

The International Socialist League was probably never larger than several hundred members at any one time, but this should not detract from its importance. It was the International Socialist League that played the key role in developing the view that One Big Union was the means of both fighting national oppression and overthrowing capitalism and the state machinery. It adopted a specific "Native programme" that called for the removal of the civil and political disabilities imposed upon Africans, argued for the unity of workers across the lines of craft, color, and creed, and opposed segregation and color bars.

The International argued that "Socialism can only be brought about by all the workers coming together on the industrial field to take the machinery of production into their own hands and working it for the good of all" (June 16, 1916). National oppression divided the working class and increased profits, for "cheap, helpless and unorganized" African labor provided "employers generally and particularly industrial employers, that most coveted plum of modern Imperialism, plentiful cheap labour" (International, February 18, 1916). White workers had to choose between becoming a "closed guild," doomed to defeat, or joining the revolutionary movement for the "control and administration of industry" (International, February 16, 1917; March 2, 1917). As for discriminatory laws, the International called for direct industrial action: "Organize industrially, they become worth no more than the paper rags they are written on" (October 19, 1917).

White Workers and Works Committees

The militancy of all sections of workers rose throughout 1917, with a strike wave building that would last into 1922, and times seemed ideal for the project of uniting all workers into One Big Union. The International Socialist League made ongoing attempts to organize a bloc within the white unions, organizing a short-lived (and interracial) Solidarity Committee in 1917 to work within the SAIF. The Building Workers' Industrial Union, formed in 1916 and headed by the International Socialist League's C. B. "Charlie" Tyler, joined by Mason, was one of the few successes.

Andrews, sent abroad in 1917 to attend the abortive socialist peace conference in Stockholm, visited Britain, where he was deeply impressed by the Socialist Labour Party and Workers' Committee and Shop Stewards' movement. On returning to South Africa, he was employed by the International Socialist League as a full-time organizer, the League hoping to form a Witwatersrand Shop Stewards' Council as a step toward the One Big Union.

While Andrews helped establish independent shop stewards' organizations in engineering, on the mines (known as works committees), and on the railways, most had no links to syndicalists, with one very important exception. A section of the mine works committees was deeply influenced by syndicalism. This group, largely independent of the International Socialist League, was centered on Percy Fisher, a miner born in England in 1891. Fisher and his associate, Harry Spendiff, were involved in organizing a series of unofficial strikes, unsanctioned by SAMWU or the SAIF.

Despite opposition from Crawford and others, Fisher was elected secretary of SAMWU in 1920, but later forced to resign. An unofficial strike in January 1921 led to Fisher, Spendiff, and others being suspended from SAMWU and fined. Rejecting the rulings, the dissidents established the Council of Action in July 1921, issuing a manifesto, reprinted in the Workers' Dreadnought, calling for "rank and file control" of the unions and "Industrial Unionism" with "the avowed object of wresting the economic power out of the hands of the capitalist class" (February 18, 1922).

Syndicalism and Workers of Color

At the same time as these initiatives were taking place, the International Socialist League took steps to organize Africans, Coloreds, and Indians into syndicalist unions. In March 1917, Gordon Lee of the International Socialist League's Durban branch helped launch the Indian Workers' Industrial Union, an umbrella body organizing in catering, the docks, laundries, printing, and the growing tobacco industry. One of the very first unions amongst Indians, its size is unclear, but it was probably several hundred strong.

The International Socialist League encouraged the Indian workers to take charge of the union and several Indian activists became prominent militants, such as Bernard L. E. Sigamoney and R. K. Moodley. Born in Durban to Indian immigrants, Sigamoney was a schoolteacher and cricket enthusiast who moved to the left in World War I. Along with other Indian union members, Sigamoney joined the International Socialist League. The union held several strikes, during which the Indian Workers' Choir entertained workers with the Red Flag, the Internationale, and IWW songs. It also held study classes, emphasizing the works of De Leon. In 1920 and 1921, independent Indian unions in tobacco and furniture workers struck in Durban, and Andrews, Ivon Jones, Sigamoney, and others were actively involved in solidarity work.

In the meantime, the International Socialist League established a night school for Africans at its Johannesburg headquarters. Starting in July 1917, the school mainly recruited urbanized Africans from the downtown slums and townships of Johannesburg, although a few mineworkers, mainly from nearby mines, also joined. After months of classes run by Bunting, Dunbar, and others, the school launched a syndicalist union, the Industrial Workers of Africa, at the end of September.

Modeled on the IWW, the Industrial Workers of Africa was the first union for African workers in South Africa and (in all likelihood) Britain's African empire. It was a general union, rather than an industrial union, the forerunner of the number of African general unions that sprang up in the next few years, and was headed by an all-African committee, with Reuben (Alfred) Cetiwe and Hamilton Kraai the key figures. Born and educated at Qumbu in the Eastern Cape, Cetiwe worked in Johannesburg as a picture framer's assistant. His views, recorded in police reports, were uncompromising: "We are here for Organization, so that as soon as all of your fellow workers are organized, then we can see what we can do to abolish the Capitalist-System." Kraai, also from the Eastern Cape, worked as a foreman and deliveryman in Johannesburg. Both men joined the International Socialist League.

From 1915, the International Socialist League was also developing connections with sections of the emerging, and rather mild, nationalist movements amongst Africans and Coloreds, like the African Political Organization and the Transvaal Native Congress, which was the provincial section of the South African Native National Congress. The formation of the Industrial Workers of Africa increased nationalist sympathy for syndicalists, and Cetiwe, Kraai, and Thibedi also participated in the Transvaal Native Congress. In 1918 the International Socialist League organized South Africa's first May Day rally directed at Africans and Coloreds in Johannesburg. R. Talbot-Williams of the African Political Organization, and Thibedi, were amongst the speakers.

Developments in June 1918 gave the Industrial Workers of Africa national prominence. That month saw 152 African municipal workers in Johannesburg jailed for striking, a sentence condemned by the International, and evoking a wave of anger amongst the city's African population. A protest rally, called by the Transvaal Native Congress, saw the crowd take its lead from Industrial Workers of Africa activists, who called for a general strike. A joint planning committee of left-leaning nationalists and syndicalists was established. The strike was called off at the last minute, although several thousand African mine-workers struck nonetheless, and eight people (six members of syndicalist bodies, and two sympathetic Congress activists) were arrested for incitement to public violence, the first time Africans and whites in South Africa were jointly prosecuted in a common cause.

By this stage a syndicalist bloc had developed in the Transvaal Native Congress, centered on Cetiwe and Kraai. Dubbed the "black Bolsheviks of Johannesburg" by Solomon Plaatje, a leading African conservative from Kimberley, it was aided by sympathetic nationalists. The syndicalists and left-leaning nationalists tried, unsuccessfully, to get the South African Native National Congress at its August 1918 congress to focus on labor, and were prominent in the Witwatersrand campaign against the pass controls that started in March 1919. Congress moderates and conservatives then managed to wrest control of the Transvaal Native Congress, and called off the campaign. There had been over 700 arrests by May 1919, however, and Bunting acted as counsel for many of the accused, during which he was assaulted by a group of white workers outside the courthouse.

Syndicalism in the Cape

In the meantime, there had been important developments in the Cape Province. The International Socialist League's Kimberley section established two syndicalist unions in that declining town in 1919. These were the Clothing Workers' Industrial Union (which later spread to Durban and Johannesburg) and the Horse Drivers' Union, both of which held successful strikes. The unions were based amongst Colored workers, and 27 enrolled in the International Socialist League, most notably Johnny Gomas, an apprentice tailor from Cape Town.

Radical members of the SDF, frustrated with its loose politics, broke away in 1918 to form the Industrial Socialist League in Cape Town.

Like the International Socialist League, the Cape group was deeply influenced by the IWW. It was initially based amongst white immigrants, such as the Portuguese brothers Manuel and F. Lopes, Jews like A. Z. Berman, a teacher educated in Russia and Germany, and British workers like C. Frank Glass, born in Birmingham in 1901. The elderly Henry Glasse also corresponded with the group.

Like the International Socialist League, the Industrial Socialist League was active in the mainstream unions, but with rather more success. Berman was elected treasurer of the Cape Federation of Labor (formed in 1913), F. Lopes was president of the Tramway Workers' Union, and Frank Glass was active in the Tailors' Union. At the second conference of the Cape Federation of Labor, held in 1920, the Cape syndicalists successfully passed resolutions for the socialization of the means of production, distribution, and exchange, and the restructuring of the Federation into industrial unions. At the third conference of the Cape Federation of Trade Unions in 1921, Berman had the Federation resolve to join the Communist International and abstain from parliamentary action. These resolutions were not, however, carried out.

The group made strenuous efforts to organize amongst African and Colored workers. It established a hall in the predominantly Colored District Six area, recruited a number of Colored activists to its work, and established a syndicalist Sweet and Jam Workers' Industrial Union amongst Colored factory workers. Cetiwe and Kraai arrived in Cape Town in 1919 to form a branch of the Industrial Workers of Africa, and were supported by the Industrial Socialist League. The Industrial Workers of Africa branch, based amongst African dockworkers, claimed 800 members (Hirson 2005). Living in Ndabeni Township, Cetiwe and Kraai also became active in the Cape Native Congress, and reappeared at the May 1920 conference of the South African Native National Congress where they tried, again unsuccessfully, to commit the larger body to a general strike policy. Thibedi, meanwhile, had taken over the Industrial Workers of Africa in Johannesburg.

In December 1919 the Industrial Workers of Africa organized a joint strike with another union on the docks, the recently formed Industrial and Commercial Workers' Union (ICU), headed by the charismatic Clements Kadalie, a highly educated immigrant from Nyasaland. The strike was not a success, and the two unions had a falling out. In June 1920, however, both attended a labor conference at Bloemfontein in the Orange Free State, which aimed to unite the African and Colored general unions that had emerged in Bloemfontein, Cape Town, and Port Elizabeth. There were some syndicalist influences at the Bloemfontein meeting, which described its goal, Peter Wickens (1973) notes, as “one great union of skilled and unskilled workers of South Africa, south of the Zambesi.” The unions, including the Cape section of the Industrial Workers of Africa, merged into the ICU, which came under the control of Kadalie and showed some syndicalist influences in the succeeding years.

The Case of Mozambique

A small anarchist and syndicalist current emerged in Lourenço Marques from the early twentieth century. It was largely isolated from the South African movement, but developed in a similar context: a racially divided working class, with unequal civil and political rights. It started among Portuguese immigrants and political prisoners deported under anti-anarchist laws passed in the 1890s, and was influenced by the rapid growth of anarchist and syndicalist currents in Portugal’s National Labor Union and its successor, the General Confederation of Labor. The Mozambican movement was a minority current, as the local unions generally did not admit people of color.

Local anarchists and syndicalists attracted a series of hostile articles in O Progresso, a republican paper printed in Lourenço Marques from 1905. In 1910, the anarchist printer José Estevam, released from prison after the Republic was established, formed the Revolutionary League in Lourenço Marques. Groups like the Revolutionary League and the Libertarian Group Francisco Ferrer promoted anarchist ideas, were noticeable at May Day demonstrations, and wrote in the republican and labor press.

O Incondicional, which appeared from November 1910, had an editorial board of anarchists and republicans. Anarchists and syndicalists similarly wrote for O Emancipador, newspaper of the Port and Railway Employees’ Association (the city’s main union), published from 1920, and also distributed A Batalha, published by Portugal’s General Confederation of Labor. In 1919, Ivon Jones was prosecuted in Pietermaritzburg for distributing seditious literature: he subsequently stayed for a while in Mozambique, where he encountered the O Emancipador group, and organized for the International to be sold by a local newsagent.

There was a lively cosmopolitan café culture in Lourenço Marques, which drew in a number of Africans, including members of the assimilado elite (Africans exempted from the discriminatory legal code applied to people of color), and anarchosyndicalist ideas also circulated in this milieu. João Dos Santos Albasini, the city’s most prominent intellectual and assimilado, and editor of O Africano (distributed in South Africa as well as Mozambique), was somewhat influenced by syndicalism. His articles criticized the racial policies of the Mozambican unions, and periodically echoed the radical pieces in O Emancipador. From 1917 to 1921, the Port and Railway Employees’ Association led a strike wave at Lourenço Marques and on the railways, in which individual anarchists and syndicalists were prominent, but the strikes were crushed with martial law.

The 1920s and 1930s

The South African syndicalists initially regarded the Russian Revolution as a confirmation of their most deeply held syndicalist views: indeed, the monthly paper of the Industrial Socialist League was called the Bolshevik. From 1920 to 1921 there were moves to form a local Communist Party, and real Bolshevik ideas became better known. After a series of splits, including the formation of a syndicalist Communist Party by Dunbar and others in 1920, the Communist Party of South Africa (CPSA), affiliate of the Communist International, was launched in July 1921. It incorporated most existing left-wing groups, with the notable exception of the syndicalist unions amongst workers of color. Battered by the onset of recession, and alienated by the CPSA’s focus from 1921 to 1924 on affiliating to the SALP, few activists from these unions joined the CPSA before 1925. A significant number of CPSA members remained influenced by syndicalism, and Dunbar headed an organized syndicalist faction linked to the Workers’ Dreadnought group in Britain.

The 1922 Rand Revolt, a general strike over the replacement of white miners by Africans that developed into an armed insurrection, was supported by the CPSA, which condemned the racial violence that developed during the struggle. The Council of Action (now joined by Andrews) played a more important role. It was, above all, Fisher who pushed the strike into an insurrection. The revolt was crushed with the use of airplanes and troops, with hundreds killed or arrested: Fisher and Spendiff committed suicide at the insurrection's headquarters in Fordsburg, Johannesburg.

The ICU, joined in 1920 by Cetiwe and Kraai, and subsequently by Gomas and Thibedi, grew rapidly in the 1920s, and syndicalist influences became quite pronounced, the union adopting a constitution based on that of the IWW in 1925. However, ICU ideology was a complex and unstable mixture, where the ideas of the IWW jostled alongside those of Marcus Garvey, as well as liberalism, Marxism, and moderate unionism. Other than a failed attempt to call a general strike in 1926, the ICU did not undertake much in the way of industrial organization or action. Unlike the syndicalists of the 1910s, it found its greatest strength not with the workers of the cities, but amongst African and Colored farm workers and tenant farmers, also recruiting heavily amongst the African elite, and claimed 100,000 members by 1927 (Wickens 1973).

Just as white immigration had helped bring syndicalism to South Africa, African and Colored migrancy spread the ICU across Southern Africa, with sections established in Southwest Africa in 1920, Southern Rhodesia in 1927, and into Northern Rhodesia in 1931. However, corruption, infighting, weak structures, the lack of a clear strategy, members' frustration, and repression saw the ICU fragment rapidly after 1927. The movement virtually collapsed everywhere in the early 1930s, although it was revived in Southern Rhodesia in the 1940s.

The end of the Council of Action and the ICU provided two nails in the coffin of local anarchism and syndicalism in Southern Africa. More followed. In Mozambique, martial law inflicted a massive defeat on the unions during a railway strike in 1925–6, and the Portuguese dictatorships of 1926 and 1932 suppressed the radical press, independent unions, and the café culture of Lourenço Marques.

A final nail was provided by changes in the CPSA. In 1928, the CPSA adopted the "Native Republic" thesis on the instructions of the Communist International, which stipulated that capitalist democracy must be attained before socialism could be considered. This break with the older tradition of combining class struggle with national liberation was coupled to the onset of the "New Line" period, designed to Bolshevize the communist parties. The great majority of veterans of the pre-CPSA period, including Andrews, Bunting, Frank Glass, Harrison, and Thibedi, were expelled. Some later rejoined the CPSA as orthodox members, like Andrews, others moved to Trotskyism, like Frank Glass and Thibedi, and some left politics entirely, like Harrison.

In Conclusion

Anarchism and syndicalism played an important role in Southern Africa from the 1880s onwards, a role often obscured by the ongoing influence of a substantial communist historiography. Migration was a key factor in spreading these ideas into South Africa and Mozambique, and subsequently into Southwest Africa and the Rhodesias. An important minority current, anarchism and syndicalism always battled against the segregationist politics of white labor and the influence of African nationalism, but nonetheless had an important influence on sectors of the wider working class. This history shows that the international rise of anarchism and syndicalism from the 1880s to the 1920s also took place in Southern Africa, and that Bakunin's heirs developed a strategy that saw the One Big Union as the vehicle of both class struggle and national liberation, and the nucleus of a libertarian socialist society.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism; Bain, J. T. (1860–1919); Bolsheviks; Communist Party of South Africa, 1921–1950; Dunbar, Andrew (1879–1964); Garvey, Marcus (1887–1940) and Garveyism; Industrial Workers of the World (IWW); Kropotkin, Peter (1842–1921); Marx, Karl (1818–1883); Sigamoney, Bernard L. E. (1888–1963); South Africa, African Nationalism and the ANC; South Africa, Labor Movement; South African Communist Party, 1953–Present

References and Suggested Readings

- Cappela, J. (1981) O Movimento Operário em Lourenço Marques, 1898–1927. Porto: Edic es Afrontamento.
 Cope, R. K. (n.d. [?1943]) Comrade Bill: The Life and Times of W. H. Andrews, Workers' Leader. Cape Town: Stewart Printing.
 Department of Justice (2001) The ISL and Coloured Workers. Pretoria: National Archives.

- Freire, J. (2001) Freedom Fighters: Anarchist Intellectuals, Workers, and Soldiers in Portugal's History. Montreal: Black Rose Books.
- Harrison, W. H. (n.d. [?1947]) Memoirs of a Socialist in South Africa 1903–47. Cape Town: Stewart Printing.
- Hirson, B. (2005) The History of the Left in South Africa: Writings of Baruch Hirson. Ed. Y. Hirson. London: I. B. Tauris.
- Hobart-Houghton, D. (1964) The South African Economy. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Hyslop, J. (2004) The Notorious Syndicalist: J. T. Bain: A Scottish Rebel in Colonial South Africa. Johannesburg: Jacana Media.
- Krikler, J. (2005) Rand Revolt: The 1922 Insurrection and Racial Killings in South Africa. Cape Town: Jonathon Ball.
- Mantzaris, E. A. (1995) Labour Struggles in South Africa: The Forgotten Pages, 1903–1921. Namibia: Collective Resources.
- Pate, F. W. & McDermid, A. (1922) Manifesto of the Mineworkers. Workers' Dreadnought, February 18.
- Penvenne, J. M. (1996) João Dos Santos Albasini (1876–1922): The Contradictions of Politics and Identity in Colonial Mozambique. Journal of African History 37: 419–464.
- Raftopolous, B. & Phimister, I. (Eds.) (1997) Keep on Knocking: A History of the Labour Movement in Zimbabwe, 1900–97. Harare: Baobab Books for the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions and the Friedrich Ebert Stiftung.
- Van der Walt, L. (1999) “The Industrial Union is the Embryo of the Socialist Commonwealth”: The International Socialist League and Revolutionary Syndicalism in South Africa, 1915–1920. Comparative Studies of South Asia, Africa and the Middle East 19: 1.
- Van der Walt, L. (2001) Revolutionärer Syndikalismus, Rasse und Klasse in Südafrika: Die “International Socialist League” und die “Industrial Workers of Africa” 1915 bis 1920. Archiv für die Geschichte des Widerstandes und der Arbeit 16.
- Van der Walt, L. (2004) Bakunin's Heirs in South Africa: Race and Revolutionary Syndicalism from the IWW to the International Socialist League, 1910–21. Politikon 31 (1).
- Van der Walt, L. (2006) Anarchism and Syndicalism in South Africa, 1904–1921: Rethinking the History of Labour and the Left. PhD thesis, University of the Witwatersrand.
- Wickens, P. L. (1973) The Industrial and Commercial Workers' Union of Africa. PhD thesis, University of Cape Town.
- Willan, B. (Ed.) (1996) Sol Plaatje: Selected Writings. Johannesburg: Witwatersrand University Press.
- Yudelman, D. & Jeeves, A. (1986) New Labour Frontiers for Old: Black Migrants to the South African Gold Mines, 1920–85. Journal of Southern African Studies 13 (1).

Anarchism in the United States to 1945

Ronald Creagh

Historians have adopted two approaches in their study of anarchism in the United States. Some narratives concentrate on individuals and grassroots movements with relatively well-defined connections to a historical anarchist movement. Others seek traces of anarchism in a broader sense, in fields such as art or philosophy or in some independent group or personality. There is indeed no single “essence” of anarchism but a wealth of perspectives as well as unexpected rebirths.

Both approaches require specific narratives. Elements of anarchism in the broad sense of rebellions against the state or other established authorities appear during the colonial period and up to the Civil War, while after the 1870s, it is mostly absorbed by emergent anarchist organizations. Both currents will fade after World War I due to a variety of causes: mass culture and repression progressively corrode working-class institutions, union leaders are integrated into the establishment, and the Russian Revolution and the New Deal promote participation in political parties as the sole avenue to social change. Before World War II, protest movements rarely dissent with “the system,” but on the contrary call for state recognition of their requests.

Anarchism at Large

Early colonial dissent offers evidence of anti-statism, originating from the religious and socio-economic radicalism developed by lower-class spokespersons at the time of the English Civil War. Antinomianism opposed inner inspiration to political laws, and in the New England controversy of 1636–8, John Wheelwright went so far as to make a principled condemnation of all legislation. His sister-in-law, Anne Hutchinson, opened in her house a group for free discussion of ministers' sermons, to the great displeasure of the orators. Exiled to Rhode Island, the antinomian mystics rejected all civil authority, with one William Harris claiming that the people should shortly cry out, “No lords, no masters.” The Pennsylvania Quakers had anarchistic patterns of decision-making, and although they voted, they refused to be sworn in and could not run for office; they also rejected many components of public administration such as army, police, and bureaucracy. The frontier spirit called for decentralization, community self-organization, a distrust of hierarchies, and a form of individualism quite different from the European bourgeois posture: one had to count on one's own resources, learn community life, and make decisions without relying on opinion or prejudice. All through colonial history and even afterwards, a number of riots and rebellions could better be described as insurrections. These uprisings appeared at a time when the state's hold over society was somewhat fragile and collectivities felt deprived of their rights. Such was the case of early movements like Shays' Rebellion and other revolts, including those of black slaves, and at the end of the nineteenth century, the Filipino independence struggle.

The American Revolution offered lessons for the future. After all, the Boston Tea Party was an example of direct action and the war against the British was an insurrection. The American anarchist contestation of state authority could find a justification in the Declaration of Independence which asserted the rights of people "to dissolve the political bonds which have connected them with one another" and abolish governments "which have become destructive." In spite of the Constitution, the Insurrection Act of 1807, the Civil War, and the rampant proliferation of state powers, a large number of dissident movements framed their own Declarations of Independence. Anarchism now was at the very core of the nation's imagination. Even if the word could be insulting, anarchists were rarely marginal people. They were marginalized by the establishment, but rarely by their co-workers. Indeed, anti-statism was an American tradition, though far from the only one.

Communal Experiments

Egalitarian associations appeared with the much-publicized experiment in New Harmony, Indiana, promoted by Robert Owen. The founder's communistic ideas inspired three important trends: a condemnation of capitalism as the defense of private interests; an egalitarianism embracing men and women alike; and the notion that the social environment conditions individuals. Individual reform was therefore insufficient: the whole economic system had to be changed. In 1826, the Kendal commune of Ohio condemned "the system of individual and private interests," declaring: "it is reasonable and justifiable to change the whole system as soon as it can be done prudently, and with safety to the community at large" (Fox 1911/1979: 178). The Owenite movement incited Josiah Warren to start his rural experiments which, in reaction to "socialism" and "communism," advocated individualism. Intentional communities flourished up to the Civil War; they believed that changing the system was a desirable goal, immediately attainable and imitable all over the world.

The 1848 Revolutions

The Paris insurrection of February, and the 1848 revolutions in Europe, introduced in the United States a number of political refugees and spread the spirit of the Junges Deutschland and free thought through German papers. In New York, the French Joseph Déjacque invented the word "libertaire" (source of the English word "libertarian," originally synonymous with "anarchist"), castigated Proudhon for his anti-feminism, and wrote the first anarchist utopia, L'Humanisphère.

Prelude to the Civil War

Josiah Warren initiated the famous "Modern Times" colony in Long Island, and later made deeper contacts with the working class, particularly the Sovereigns of Industry. A number of people circled around him, particularly William B. Greene, who defended working women's interests in Massachusetts, and Stephen P. Andrews, who founded the Unitary Home in New York and participated actively in what we could call today "Free Universities." He also debated free love with Henry James Sr., whose son, William James, would also express some anarchistic sentiments.

The protest against slavery engendered illegal and anti-statist actions as the Underground Railroad or the abolitionist movement, with the New England Non-Resistance Society of William Lloyd Garrison. One of the most outspoken leaders was John Humphrey Noyes, while Henry David Thoreau adopted a strong ethical anti-statism. Signs of distrust and occasional refusals of allegiance to human governments multiplied (Allen 1930: 694–7). John Brown, who in some ways had been anticipated by Lysander Spooner, became a hero. However, in spite of their condemnation of the institution, many anarchists condemned federal state interference.

Referring to these traditions, early postwar “anarchists” defined themselves as abolitionists – they asked for the abolition of the state.

The International Workingmen’s Association

In the US, the rising working class created its own institutions and, before the age of the penny press, published its own papers, defending its particular aspirations. Cooperativist and mutualist ideas were in the air. Anarchist papers increasingly addressed all social issues, rather than restricting themselves to labor questions, and worked out new concepts of social action.

The foundation of the International Workingmen’s Association (IWMA) in the US brought together people with different convictions, including a fair number of Proudhonians in the American and French sections as well as a strong autonomist current that would not submit to Marx or anyone else. After the eviction of anarchists at The Hague Congress in 1872, most American and French sections decided to maintain their autonomy; some associated with the Swiss Jura Federation, which developed anarchism as a positive conception of social organization.

The dissolution in 1876 of the IWMA, its merging with the Workingmen’s Party of the United States, and later the disastrous electoral experience in Chicago curtailed working-class expectations about political action. Some leaders now embarked on a radical quest for a society in which the worker would no longer be “deprived of the fruits of his labor.”

The Social Revolutionaries

The year 1881 would inspire new actions all over the nation. From Russia came the news of Sophia Perovskaya’s assassination attempt on Alexander II and her execution. She became a revolutionary model and revived the old tradition of tyrannicide. Could the murder of symbolic figures of the establishment spark off an insurrection of the oppressed classes? Not in the United States, said Benjamin R. Tucker, whose Liberty, the organ of individualist anarchism, debated for several decades on workers’ rights, economic theory, and other topics. But as it shifted from Proudhonism to radical Spencerism to Stirnerite egoism, this caused dismay to a number of readers for whom anarchism was first and foremost an ethical issue.

In London, the 1881 Social Revolutionary Congress set the framework for a proactive movement. Delegates represented Boston, Philadelphia, New York, the young Icarian branch of French Americans, and the Mexican Federation. This nodal event was followed by two Congresses in Chicago (1881) and Pittsburgh (1883), where delegates endorsed a strategy of unionization as a means to revolution. Anarchist structures were being embedded in the working class across the country. Clubs spread in many cities and in metropolitan areas many neighborhoods and immigrant communities had their meeting place. Newspapers, pamphlets, and booklets multiplied. In Chicago, the Alarm claimed 3,000 readers, while the Germans had their daily and the Bohemians their weekly. In New York, Johann Most’s Freiheit enjoyed an international readership while other newcomers subscribed to anarchist periodicals from the old country. Labor papers expressed popular discontent and unrest but also described the workers’ condition, advocated woman’s emancipation, free speech, free love, and many other causes.

The Haymarket bombing of 1886, followed by the death sentence for innocent anarchists after a mock trial, did not signal the end of the movement, but induced a number of Chicagoans to settle elsewhere and propagate their ideas. Many cities like Chicago, Detroit, or Philadelphia maintained their key figures like Lucy Parsons, Jo Labadie, or Voltairine de Cleyre.

The birth of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) introduced spontaneity. They melted into the working-class culture and enlivened it; they also worked out new ideas such as the rank-and-file organization, the general strike, and the sit-in strike.

Immigrant Circles

As anarchism dwindled within old German communities, new anarchist networks appeared in the immigration of French-speaking miners in Pennsylvania, Italians in the Paterson silk industry, and other groups like the Mexican Americans and the Russian exiles. The best structured movement was Jewish American, particularly in the clothing industry. Everywhere issues were vehemently discussed, particularly within the Jewish community, which was also confronted with Zionism. Effervescence contributed to promote public figures such as Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman, and, on a lesser scale, lecture tours by foreign visitors and organizers such as Peter Kropotkin, Errico Malatesta, Luigi Galleani, Camillo Berneri, or Joseph Tortelier. A sparkling array of newspapers, particularly Mother Earth, with a readership of several thousands, and the Freie Arbeiter Stimme, a Yiddish daily, covered the country. Anarchist events were now visible on the American scene, including among artists and a few intellectuals.

After the Palmer raids, the movement faded, notwithstanding the arrival in 1931 of another influential couple, Rudolf Rocker and Milly Witkop, and Carlo Tresca's labor agitation. Nonetheless, the cross-fertilization of international relations helped the movement to survive.

The International Impact

American anarchists were associated with the Magón brothers' revolutionary efforts in Mexico. They inspired the Sikh Lala Har Dayal, the Chinese Ba Jin, and the Japanese Kotoku Shusui. May Day celebrations around the world memorialized the Haymarket martyrs. The IWW developed in the US and spread to other countries. In spite of repression, anarchists aroused a world protest against the infamous trial of Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti in the 1920s. The protesters later established international anti-fascist organizations. The 1936–9 Spanish Civil War impressed radicals and was a turning point for some. When World War II broke out, it was a recent convert, Dwight Macdonald, who now carried the pacifist torch with fellow writers such as Paul Goodman.

SEE ALSO: American Revolution of 1776; Anarchism; Anarchism and Culture, 1840–1939; Anarchism in the United States, 1946–Present; Anarchosyndicalism; Berkman, Alexander (1870–1936); Boston Tea Party; European Revolutions of 1848; Flynn, Elizabeth Gurley (1890–1964); Garrison, William Lloyd (1805–1879);

Goldman, Emma (1869–1940); Haymarket Tragedy; Haywood, Big Bill (1869–1928); Hutchinson, Anne (1591–1643); Industrial Workers of the World (IWW); Magón, Ricardo Flores (1874–1922) and the Magonistas; New Harmony; Owen, Robert (1771–1858); Palmer Raids; Proudhon, Pierre Joseph (1809–1865); Sacco and Vanzetti Case; Shays' Rebellion; Slave Rescues and the Underground Railroad, United States; Spanish Revolution; Utopian Communities, United States

References and Suggested Readings

- Allen, D. (1930) Non-Resistance Society: Declaration of Principles, 1838. In The Fight for Peace. New York: Macmillan, pp. 694–7.
- Avrich, P. (1984) The Haymarket Tragedy. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Avrich, P. (1995) Anarchist Voices: An Oral History of Anarchism in America. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Chomsky, N. (2005) Chomsky on Anarchism. Oakland, CA: AK Press.
- Creagh, R. (2004) L'Affaire Sacco et Vanzetti. Paris: Editions de Paris.
- Dolgoft, S. (1986) Fragments: A Memoir. Cambridge: Refract.
- Fox, W. F. (Ed.) (1911/1979) Constitution of the Friendly Association for Mutual Interests. In H. J. Ehrlich et al. (Eds.), Reinventing Anarchy: What Are Anarchists Thinking These Days? Boston: Routledge & Kegan Paul.
- Goodman, P. (1977) Drawing the Line: Political Essays. Ed. T. Stoehr. New York: Free Life Editions.
- Lynd, S. (1968) The Intellectual Origins of American Radicalism. New York: Pantheon.
- Martin, J. J. (1970) Men Against the State: The Expositors of Individualist Anarchism in America, 1827–1908. Colorado Springs: Ralph Miles.
- Perry, L. (1973) Radical Abolitionism: Anarchy and the Government of God in Antislavery Thought. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.

Anarchism in the United States, 1946–present

Gabriel Kuhn and Jesse Cohn

In the first decades after World War II, anarchism did not play a significant role in US politics. One notable organization emerging in the 1950s was the Libertarian League (dissolved in the late 1960s) around anarchosyndicalist Sam Dolgoft (aka Sam Weiner, 1902–90), but the immigrant communities that anarchists like Dolgoff came from were rapidly integrating, leaving African Americans as the largest pariah group – a community in which anarchists had almost no presence. The pacifism espoused by some anarchists during World War II, in contrast to communists' support for the war after the German invasion of the Soviet Union, further marginalized the movement, though endearing them to a segment of bohemia on both coasts. In this countercultural milieu, the writings of Paul Goodman (1911–72) proved influential.

Partial Revival of Anarchism in the 1960s and 1970s

Anarchism, although rarely in an ideologically pure or traditional form, regained popularity in the late 1960s in the context of the decade's social protest movements. Anarchist elements were present amongst the Yippies, or in Situationist groups like San Francisco's Point Blank or New York's Black Mask, and Students for a Democratic Society (SDS) harbored a number of anarchists. It was one of these, decrying the seduction of SDS by authoritarian and vanguardist tendencies, who would come to have the strongest impact on the US anarchist movement and its development: Murray Bookchin (1921–2006).

The emergence of radical feminism, with its anti-hierarchical ethos, afforded another opportunity for the rediscovery of anarchism. Throughout the 1970s, Peggy Kornegger and others contributed to a growing body of anarcho-feminist theory. Meanwhile, although black radicals tended to take Third World Marxist movements as their model, some looked back to anarchism; the Black Panthers reprinted Nechaev's Catechism of the Revolutionary, and in 1979, a former Panther disenchanted with communism, Lorenzo Komboa Ervin (b. 1947), published his seminal pamphlet, Anarchism and the Black Revolution, introducing the concept of a "Black Anarchism" to radical debate. Another ex-Panther, Ashanti Alston Omowali (b. 1954), began publishing a zine titled Anarchist Panther in 1999.

The anarchist press was also recovering. In Tucson, Fred Woodworth founded the oldest still publishing anarchist journal in the US, The Match!, in 1969. In 1975, the underground journal Fifth Estate, founded 1965 in Detroit, turned into an influential anarchist journal. In 1980, the individualistic Anarchy: A Journal of Desire Armed was founded in Columbia, Missouri. One of the most influential anarchist books of the 1980s was Fredy Perlman's (1934–85) Against His-story, Against Leviathan! (1983), which is widely regarded as a precursor to the anarcho-primitivist movement that developed in the 1990s. Several books published between 1978 and 1995 by historian Paul Avrich (1931–2006) provided essential contributions to the study of anarchist history in the US.

Other forms of anarchist movement infrastructure were slower to emerge. In 1971, Bookchin founded the Institute of Social Ecology, an important center for the development of anarchist thought in the US for the next three decades. Activists involved in the Clamshell Alliance, wedding anti-authoritarian organization to the newly emerged anti-nuclear movement in the late 1970s, inspired the creation of Food Not Bombs. None of these institutions drew much participation from blue-collar workers or communities of color, however, and the cultural identification of anarchism with youth and whiteness would be reinforced by the emergence of the predominantly young and white punk subculture at the end of the 1970s.

Second Revival: The 1980s and 1990s

Punk, while politically ambiguous, espoused an anti-authoritarian, "Do-It-Yourself" ethos that fostered a renewed interest in the anarchist tradition among the young, and by the 1980s punks were anarchism's most visible representatives. In Minneapolis, the Profane Existence collective, founded in 1989, functioned as a focus for the anarcho-punk movement. Meanwhile, links between anarchism and the radical segments of the environmentalist movement continued to deepen, as groups like Earth First! turned to anarchist direct action tactics such as eco-sabotage, while Bookchin's philosophy influenced the emerging Green movement.

Various developments characterized the anarchist movement in the 1990s. While anarcho-syndicalist Noam Chomsky (b. 1928) became US anarchism's most prominent author, Hakim Bey's 1991 essay collection, T.A.Z.: The Temporary Autonomous Zone, propounding a non-ideological, artistic, and spiritual understanding of anarchy, was also highly influential. In the same year, the Love & Rage Federation was founded as a North American anarchist organization. It split in 1999 over disagreements about principles of organization. An anarcho-primitivist movement emerged around author John Zerzan (b. 1943), whose popular essay collection Future Primitive (1994) featured radical anti-technology and anti-civilization sentiments. Murray Bookchin caused much debate with his booklet Social Anarchism or Lifestyle Anarchism: An Unbridgeable Chasm (1995), a critique of what he condemned as individualistic “lifestylist” tendencies within the anarchist scene. The booklet proved divisive in anarchist circles and marked the end of Bookchin’s dominant influence on anarchist discourse. The reaction against Bookchin peaked in Bob Black’s polemic Anarchy After Leftism (1997), a text that also marked the beginning of the post-anarchy movement, most prominently advocated by Anarchy: A Journal of Desire Armed, editor Jason McQuinn (b. 1952). In 2002, Bookchin announced his “break” with anarchism.

The opening of a US branch of British-founded AK Press in 1994 and the foundation of the Institute of Anarchist Studies as a forum for theoretical debate and research in 1996 were both major contributions to the country’s anarchist infrastructure. Throughout the decade, the Animal Liberation Front (ALF) and Earth Liberation Front (ELF), both with strong anarchist leanings and support, conducted sabotage actions against alleged perpetrators of animal exploitation and environmental destruction.

Anarchists were strongly involved in the 1999 anti-World Trade Organization (WTO) protests in Seattle, receiving media attention unknown in decades. A rapid growth of the anarchist movement followed, and numerous anarchist collectives, journals, and projects emerged. While a lot of the media attention after Seattle focused on the militant anarcho-primitivist movement centered in Eugene, Oregon, contemporary US anarchism is remarkably diverse and includes projects like the CrimethInc. Ex-Workers’ Collective, organizations like the Northeastern Federation of Anarcho-Communists (NEFAC), networks like Anarchist People of Color, and a revitalized Industrial Workers of the World (IWW). Moreover, anarchism’s influence now extends well beyond explicitly anarchist groups, as anti-authoritarian organizing methods have become widely adopted by radicals of all stripes.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism; Anarchism and Sabotage; Anarchism in the United States to 1945; Anarchosyndicalism; Earth First!; Food Not Bombs, United States; Industrial Workers of the World (IWW); Nechaev, Sergei (1847–1882); Punk Movement; Students for a Democratic Society (SDS)

References and Suggested Readings

- Apter, D. E. & Joll, J. (Eds.) (1971) Anarchism Today. Garden City, NY: Doubleday.
- Avrich, P. (1984) The Haymarket Tragedy. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Avrich, P. (1995) Anarchist Voices: An Oral History of Anarchism in America. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Chomsky, N. (2005) Chomsky on Anarchism. Oakland, CA: AK Press.
- Dark Star Collective (Ed.) (2002) Quiet Rumours: An Anarcha-Feminist Reader. Oakland, CA: AK Press.
- Day, R. (2005) Gramsci is Dead: Anarchist Currents in the Newest Social Movements. Ann Arbor: Pluto Press.
- Dolgoft, S. (1986) Fragments: A Memoir. Cambridge: Refract.
- Filippo, R. S. (Ed.) (2002) A New World in Our Hearts: 8 Years of Writing from the Love and Rage Revolutionary Anarchist Federation. Oakland, CA: AK Press.
- Goodman, P. (1977) Drawing the Line: Political Essays. Ed. T. Stoehr. New York: Free Life Editions.
- Lynd, S. (1968) The Intellectual Origins of American Radicalism. New York: Pantheon.
- Martin, J. J. (1970) Men Against the State: The Expositors of Individualist Anarchism in America, 1827–1908. Colorado Springs: Ralph Miles.
- Perry, L. (1973) Radical Abolitionism: Anarchy and the Government of God in Antislavery Thought. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.

Anarchocommunism

Jesse Cohn

Anarchocommunism, sometimes also called “anarchist communism” or “libertarian communism,” is the tendency within anarchism advocating the abolition both of the state and the system of wages and prices. Under “the communism of the free,” as Peter Kropotkin (1842–1921) called it, the communist distributive ethic – “from each according to ability, to each according to need” – would constitute the extension of individual freedom into the economic realm, permitting each to take and to give at will, in keeping with the dictates of his or her conscience (1892/1995: 36).

Pierre-Joseph Proudhon (1809–1865) and Mikhail Bakunin (1814–1876) were both opponents of “communism” in this sense, wary of the potential for “free riders” to take advantage of the system, effectively living off the labor of others, hence becoming exploiters in their turn. Against this, theorists such as Kropotkin and Alexander Berkman (1870–1936) suggested that informal social pressures, new cultural norms, and a sense of solidarity would be sufficient to ensure a balance between production and consumption, with the social sanction of expulsion from the community reserved for the inevitable handful of intransigents. Buoyed by such arguments, anarchocommunism became, by the end of the nineteenth century, the most widely embraced ideological framework in the international anarchist movement, from Argentina to China, largely supplanting the “collectivist” position – favoring the continuation of a wage/price system with “collective ownership of the instruments of work” – that had predominated during the era of Bakunin’s leadership.

Ultimately, anarchocommunism would exercise influence over radical thinkers ranging from Nicaraguan revolutionary Augusto César Sandino (1895–1934) to American social ecologist Murray Bookchin (1921–2006). The Dutch Provos’ “White Bicycle Plan” (1965), the San Francisco Diggers’ “Free City” project (1967–8), Food Not Bombs (1980–), and the Free Software Movement (1985–) can be considered examples of an anarchocommunist system of free distribution in action.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism; Bakunin, Mikhail Alexandrovich (1814–1876); Berkman, Alexander (1870–1936); Food Not Bombs, United States; Galleani, Luigi (1861–1931); Goldman, Emma (1869–1940); Kim Joa-jin (1889–1930); Kropotkin, Peter (1842–1921); Malatesta, Errico (1853–1932); Proudhon, Pierre Joseph (1809–1865); Reclus, Elisée (1830–1905); Sandino, Augusto César (1895–1934)

References and Suggested Readings

- Aldred, G. A. (1907) The Possibility and Philosophy of Anarchist Communism. London: Bakunin Press.
- Berkman, A. (1929/1972) What Is Communist Anarchism? New York: Dover.
- Cafiero, C. (1880/2005) Anarchy and Communism. In R. Graham (Ed.), Anarchism: A Documentary History, Vol. 1: From Anarchy to Anarchism (300CE–1939). Montreal: Black Rose.

Kropotkin, P. (1887/2002) Anarchist Communism: Its Basis and Principles. In Anarchism: A Collection of Revolutionary Writings. Mineola: Dover.

Kropotkin, P. (1892/1995) The Conquest of Bread and Other Writings. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Malatesta, E. (1993) Errico Malatesta: His Life and Ideas. London: Freedom Press.

Pengam, A. (1987) Anarcho-Communism. In M. Rubel & J. Crump (Eds.), Non-Market Socialism in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries. Basingstoke: Macmillan.

Puente, I. (1932/2001) Libertarian Communism. Tucson: See Sharp Press.

Anarchosyndicalism

Jesse Cohn

Anarchosyndicalism is the term for the anarchist labor union movement (a labor union is called a syndicat in French, or a sindicato in Spanish). Powerful anarchosyndicalist organizations included the Federación Obrera Regional Argentina (founded 1901), the Industrial Workers of the World (founded 1905), the Confédération Générale du Travail (founded 1906), and the Confederación Nacional del Trabajo (founded 1910). These unions were distinguished from their conventional counterparts not only by their radical goals – the abolition of capitalism and the state in favor of a system of generalized self-management – but also by their decentralized structure and willingness to engage in direct action, including extralegal tactics such as sabotage.

While anarchists had always placed great emphasis on the self-organization of workers at the point of production and on what Pierre-Joseph Proudhon (1809–1865) called “the political capacity of the working classes” as agents of revolutionary change, their attitudes toward unions as vehicles for collective bargaining and toward strikes as a tactic had been more ambivalent for a number of reasons. Proudhon, indeed, saw strikes as futile. Moreover, since trade unions lacked full legality under most governments during the early period of the anarchist movement, their utility was limited. With the legalization of unions, a number of anarchists saw a viable alternative to “propaganda by the deed” (sporadic acts of armed rebellion that failed to gain mass support) as well as to confining themselves to propaganda activities until the people became ready for revolution; by forming revolutionary labor unions, anarchists could survive within the capitalist and state-dominated order while maintaining and expanding their capacity to oppose it – managing, as Emile Pouget (1860–1931) put it, to “live in the present with all possible combativity, sacrificing neither the present to the future, nor the future to the present.” Moreover, in the words of the IWW’s “Preamble,” by adopting an internally democratic and federative structure, the anarchosyndicalist union would prefigure a post-capitalist and post-statist order, “forming the structure of the new society within the shell of the old” – a conception not unlike that of council communists such as Rosa Luxemburg (1870–1919). The function of the union was often closely bound up with projects of political education, and each particular strike was to be seen as a rehearsal for the general strike that would topple the reigning system.

In practice, there have been tensions between the anarchist and syndicalist aspects of anarchosyndicalism, as unions found themselves pulled toward a politically neutral “pure syndicalism,” designed to maximize workers’ self-interest under capitalism, and an explicitly politicized, anti-capitalist “pure anarchism” that might alienate workers of the diverse political tendencies represented in union membership. Indeed, even within unions such as the CGT and IWW, anarchism was just one element in a mixture of ideologies, including Marxism and even Nietzschean philosophy, which sometimes went by the name of “revolutionary syndicalism.” Potential contradictions also existed between the particular interests of workers and the general interests of communities. Relations with anarchists of other tendencies (e.g., anarchocommunist, eco-anarchism) and priorities (e.g., gender equality, sexual freedom) have sometimes been fraught, despite attempts to bridge them. Finally, anarchosyndicalists past and present have met with opposition within the anarchist movement from “anti-organizationalists” who reject unions as new forms of discipline in embryo. Some labor historians have argued that the CNT behaved in just such a manner during the Spanish Civil War, albeit under the banner of “workers’ control.” Others have emphasized the degree to which anarchosyndicalism gave play to some of the most unruly and creative proletarian impulses.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism; Anarchocommunist; Bourses du Travail; Confederación Nacional del Trabajo

(CNT); Confédération Générale du Travail and Syndicaliste Révolutionnaire; Dunbar, Andrew (1879–1964); Eco-anarchism; Flynn, Elizabeth Gurley (1890–1964); Galleani, Luigi (1861–1931); Gomas, Johnny (1901–1979); Gori, Pietro (1865–1911); Hatta Shūzō (1886–1934); Haywood, Big Bill (1869–1928); Industrial Workers of the World (IWW); Luxemburg, Rosa (1870–1919); Pelloutier, Fernand (1867–1901) and the Bourses du Travail; Proudhon, Pierre Joseph (1809–1865); Sachs, Solly (1900–1976); Syndicalism, France

References and Suggested Readings

- Ackelsberg, M. A. (2005) Free Women of Spain: Anarchism and the Struggle for the Emancipation of Women. Oakland: AK Press.
- Galleani, L. (1927/2006) The Principle of Organization in the Light of Anarchism. Cascadia: Pirate Press Portland.
- Pouget, E. (1910/2003) Direct Action. London: Kate Sharpley Library.
- Rocker, R. (1947/1989) Anarchosyndicalism. London: Pluto Press.
- Rosemont, F. (2003) Joe Hill and the Making of a Revolutionary Workingclass Counterculture. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr.
- Seidman, M. (1991) Workers Against Work: Labor in Paris and Barcelona During the Popular Fronts. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Andresote and the Revolt against the Guipuzcaona (1731–1733)

Dario Azzellini

During the era of Spanish colonial slavery, Zambo Andresote was a leader of runaway slaves who staged a three-year revolt from 1730 to 1733 against Spanish colonial rule and monopoly control over trade in all goods, including humans, by the monarchy in the Yaracuy and Falcón regions of Venezuela. The son of an indigenous mother and African father, Juan Andrés López del Rosario was born into slavery, probably in Valencia, Venezuela and lived on the Portuguese-owned hacienda of Silva in Yagua.

After escaping with his brother José Francisco, Zambo – who became known as Andresote (Big Andrés) – formed an army of free Africans, indigenous people, mestizos, and Europeans opposed to Spanish monopoly control in the region of present-day Yaracuy State. Andresote’s struggle was focused against the stranglehold over trade by Compañía Guipuzcoana (La Real Compañía de Caracas) that in 1728 was appointed by the Spanish crown to combat contraband and granted an exclusive monopoly over the import and export trade. The Spanish crown, with a financial stake in the Guipuzcoana, profited from the low cost of farming goods in colonial Venezuela that were exported and resold at higher prices in the Caribbean and Europe. The company actively engaged in the slave trade and imported Africans for sale as slaves to large landowners. The company's operations were extensive throughout Venezuela, including establishments on the coast in Maracaibo, Puerto Cabello, the Guaira, Cumana, and the more mountainous rural areas. To maintain the slave trade and a colonial monopoly over trade and prevent local peasants and farmers from reselling products to Dutch smugglers from the Antilles, Guipuzcoana applied a regime of terror against the free Africans, peasants, and their families who presented a threat to their most profitable business, the selling of slaves.

Andresote organized a rebel army to fight against slavery and the injustice of the Spanish colonialists, represented by Compañía Guipuzcoana. He organized and armed the resistance in the Caracas Valley and the mountains of Yaracuy, along the central coast and the Falcón Basin on the northwest coast of the Caribbean. The northern region had settlements of runaway slaves from Venezuela and the Dutch island of Curacao. Andresote established a dual campaign against Guipuzcoana, both leading rebel armies against the company and establishing commercial relations with Dutch traders from Curacao, who bought goods at higher prices and sold goods at lower prices to farmers than Guipuzcoana. The struggle provided farmers with a means to avoid the monopoly over trade established by the Spanish crown. The Andresote rebellion was supported among farmers from Barquisimeto, Nirgua, Carora, San Nicolás, Guanare, San Felipe, Morón, and other villages on the coast of Venezuela. About sixty Dutch joined his troops. He was the first in Latin America to practice guerrilla warfare and used rivers and sea to move and attack the Spaniards. The governor Sebastián García de la Torre at a certain point prohibited traveling by boat on the rivers.

In July 1731 Andresote defeated the colonial troops under the command of Luis Arias

Altamirano at the Yaracuy river mouth and after that the troops commanded by Juan Romualdo de Guevara, sent by the Spanish crown to suppress Andresote, who attacked several colonial army outposts to rescue confiscated products. In September 1731 Andresote warned the authorities to end the harassment or he would push Guipuzcoana completely from the province. The colonial governor García de la Torre declared war to the death against Andresote and his supporters. To achieve his goal, de la Torre appointed Juan de Manzaneda in October 1731 to form an expeditionary search party for Andresote's rebel army, which was based on the coast of Yaracuy. He stationed his troops in San Felipe and offered a reward of 600 pesos for his capture or death, but nobody betrayed Andresote's trust. On January 26, 1732 Manzaneda embarked on a search for Andresote with a party of 300 troops, but the mission was cut short when Andresote and his guerrillas ambushed Manzaneda and his troops at Guabinas Mountain. The violence led to the killing of five soldiers and the total disbanding of the colonial troops consisting mainly of colored people from Yaracuy and Barquisimeto. Most of Manzaneda's troops deserted the army and many joined Andresote. Manzaneda returned to San Felipe with just 46 men.

The governor decided to lead the search for Andresote personally. In February 1732 he moved with 70 soldiers from Caracas to San Felipe, formed an army of 1,500 men and distributed it along the valley. Any goods moved on the River Yaracuy were confiscated and any person resisting or trying to flee was shot. Several towns of free and runaway slaves were destroyed and a few suspected collaborators of Andresote killed. The Spanish crown appointed Martín de Lardizábal to defeat Andresote and fight Dutch smuggling. He installed a regime of terror with mass arrests, summary judgments, and executions. Andresote's brother José Francisco was arrested and brought to a jail in Cadiz, Spain. Andresote fled on a ship to Curacao. Since too many people were collaborating with Andresote, the colonial authorities suspended the executions. The repression did not stop the resistance. The troops were ambushed. Governor García de la Torre was accused of corruption and replaced in December 1732 by Martín de Lardizábal. The rebellion in the mountains of Yaracuy was finally dominated with the collaboration of the Capuchin monks. Lardizával promised to pardon the followers of Andresote if they converted to Catholicism. But instead Lardizával planned to send rebels into forced labor, so they fled, armed, towards the Orinoco and built a free community.

Afterwards, Andresote vanished and was not heard from again, but was believed by some to be engaged in smuggling in Curacao. He is considered a national hero, revolutionary, and leader of the first anti-monopolistic struggle.

SEE ALSO: Bolívar, Simón (1783–1830); Bolivarianism, Venezuela; Chirinos, José Leonardo (d. 1796); Venezuela, Negro Miguel Rebellion, 1552; Venezuelan War of Independence

References and Suggested Readings

Coello, A. (2000) Crónicas desde Morón. Valencia: Editorial El Viaje del Pez.

García, J. (1995) La diáspora de los Kongos en las Américas y los caribes Editorial Aplicum. Caracas: Conac y la Unesco.

Pollak-Eltz, A. (1977) Slave Revolts in Venezuela. Annals of the New York Academy of Sciences 292 (1), 439–45 doi:10.1111/j.1749-6632.1977.tb47762.x

Angolan national liberation, 1961–1974

Jeff Shantz

Despite its mineral wealth, the Portuguese colony of Angola was poor, and there were few attempts at modernization until the 1920s, when Portuguese control was finally consolidated and the fascistic Estado Novo (New State) regime came to power. The widespread use of forced labor and forced cash-cropping, rapid urbanization and high unemployment, a surge in white immigration and heightened job competition, all generated growing tensions, and a variety of militant African nationalist currents emerged in the 1950s. The Angolan Communist Party was formed in 1953, followed by the Party of the United Struggle for Africans in Angola (PLUA) in early 1956. These merged to form the Popular Liberation Movement of Angola (Movimento Popular de Libertação de Angola) (MPLA).

The MPLA was influenced by Marxism-Leninism as well as cultural nationalism, and drew its cadres from the educated African and mulatto elite, many of whom were from the tiny assimilado (“assimilated”) caste of black citizens ostensibly exempt from the racial laws. It initially focused on Luanda’s shanty towns. The collapse of the neighboring Belgian Congo (subsequently Zaire, then the Democratic Republic of the Congo) in 1959 sparked off riots in Luanda, suppressed through mass arrests and military operations. The MPLA’s urban base shattered and the party turned to rural armed struggle, headed by António Agostinho Neto from 1962.

Early 1960 saw military operations against a millenarian movement in the country’s central region, which opposed forced cotton cultivation. In early 1961 Africans attacked Luanda’s prison, and large-scale racial clashes swept the city. This was followed in March by an uprising in northern Angola, inspired by the National Liberation Front of Angola (Frente Nacional de Libertação de Angola) (FNLA). The FNLA had its origins in the Union of People of Northern Angola (later, the Union of Peoples of Angola) (UPA) formed in 1956. It was led by Holden Roberto, partly based in Zaire, and rooted among the Bakongo. This uprising, which involved massacres of whites, was put down by a major Portuguese counteroffensive. When Portuguese military operations ended in late 1961, perhaps 1,000 whites and 50,000 Africans had been killed.

In the early 1960s the FNLA was the only independence group with a mass base, or substantial activity; it expanded through mergers and fronts, pointedly excluding the MPLA. The National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (the Uniao Nacional para a Independencia Total de Angola) (UNITA) was formed in 1965 as an FNLA breakaway: based among the Ovimbundu of the south-central area, it was more narrowly tribalist than the FNLA. Although the MPLA’s program was fairly moderate – including a pledge to protect sectors of private capital (Harsch & Thomas 1976) – it was aligned to, and supported by, the Soviet Union. The MPLA was weak in the early 1960s. By 1967, however, it had bases in Zambia and Zaire, and ongoing military operations.

As the 1960s progressed, Portugal’s African empire came close to collapse in the face of growing, largely rural liberation movements in Angola, Mozambique, and Guinea-Bissau. Fearing instability and Soviet influence in a strategically important area, the United States decided in 1961 to provide support to Portugal.

Besides providing military training, Washington gave tacit approval to the use of American weapons, obtained through NATO. From 1953 to 1968 it provided more than $340 million in military aid, and $151 million in economic aid, to Portugal. At the same time, it also kept in contact with the African nationalists, covertly providing arms and money to the FNLA as early as 1962 (Harsch & Thomas 1976: 17, 21).

Portugal was economically weak, and liberalized foreign investment in its “overseas provinces.” Belgian Petrofina began oil production in Angola in 1955, forming a joint company with the colonial government called Petrangol. From 1966, Gulf Oil started developing the massive oil deposits, notably in Cabinda. Angola became the fourth largest oil producer in Africa by the early 1970s. It was also the second major coffee grower in Africa (and the third largest in the world): the coffee was largely sold to America; production and distribution were controlled by France and South Africa (the latter also dominated the major diamond fields of the northeast). The German multinational Krupp controlled the key iron mines of Huila.

After 1961 the developing Angolan revolution was limited to rural skirmishes, with few strikes or actions in the cities, and competition and armed conflict between the rebel forces left the resistance relatively ineffective. There were at the time, however, major political and military victories in Mozambique and Guinea-Bissau by the Soviet-linked African Independence Party of Guinea and Cape Verde (Partido Africano da Independencia do Guine e Cabo Verde) (PAIGC) and the Mozambican Liberation Front (Frente de Libertação de Moçambique) (FRELIMO).

The colonial wars took a huge toll on Lisbon: 150,000 troops were active in Africa, with military expenditures accounting for half of the Portuguese budget. Growing opposition to the colonial wars emerged within a context of economic crisis, high inflation, and unemployment – conditions that greatly increased popular Portuguese discontent. This culminated in the left-wing military coup of April 1974, which ended the Estado Novo and set in a colonial settlement. The Portuguese coup, and the Carnation Revolution that followed, encouraged mobilization among Angola’s African working class, moving the center of resistance from the countryside. A strike wave started that lasted more than a year. Urban workers in Luanda, Lobito, Benguela, Nova Lisboa, and elsewhere struck for better pay and conditions, and against racial discrimination. Workers walked off the job in such key sectors as the British-owned Benguela railway, and the ports of Luanda and Lobito. On May 26, 1974, 20,000 demonstrated in Luanda for independence. On July 15, in response to vigilante white attacks on African areas, a general strike was called, followed by occupations of universities and high schools by students and staff. African trade unions had been almost non-existent before the coup, but now workers’ committees were widely formed.

Lisbon’s new government did not initially envisage full decolonization. Since none of the independence forces were clear victors, Portugal set out with some success to get the MPLA, FNLA, and UNITA into a coalition government with the Portuguese authorities: all three groups worked with Lisbon to end the strike wave, passing a decree allowing the government to place workers under “military control, discipline and jurisdiction.” This was used to break dockers’ strikes in Lobito and Luanda. Later, wildcat strikes were made illegal. All three made regular appeals to end strikes, for the sake of the liberation struggle or of national reconstruction. Socialist rhetoric aside, the MPLA joined its coalition partners in favoring private property and foreign investment.

There were, however, serious tensions in the coalition. In part these were simply those inevitable in power struggles; they were also ideological. While the FNLA and UNITA stressed narrow racial (and also ethnic) nationalisms, the MPLA favored the Soviet Union, recruited mulattos and whites, sought to overcome the assimilado/indigeno (“indigenous”) split, and wanted to a unified “People’s Republic”; much of its support was in practice drawn from the Kimbundu.

All three groups sought allies, becoming embroiled in Cold War and regional geopolitics. The FNLA and UNITA worked with Washington and apartheid South Africa, while the MPLA secured Soviet and Cuban support. Mobutu Sese Seko’s regime in Zaire then sponsored an unsuccessful FNLA putsch, precipitating the collapse of the coalition in July and the start of a civil war. Urban battles started; the great majority of Portuguese fled, and UNITA and FNLA supporters were driven from the MPLA zones. South Africa invaded, sweeping through southern and coastal Angola. The MPLA called in Cuban and Soviet aid, the South Africans withdrew, and the MPLA took Luanda: Neto was proclaimed the first president of the People's Republic of Angola on November 11, 1975. The MPLA was decidedly authoritarian and centralist. Self-defense organizations in Luanda's poor areas were disbanded and reorganized under MPLA control; armed formations outside the MPLA's control were made illegal, and the MPLA's armed wing formed the core of the national army. A one-party state was established until 1991: factionalism in the party was banned, the breakaway Communist Organization of Angola was suppressed, and a coup attempt by a rival MPLA group in 1977 was crushed.

The MPLA government was recognized by Portugal, and Neto's Independence Day speech stressed "the constitution enacted by the MPLA guaranteed the protection of private property, 'including that of foreigners, so long as it benefits the economy of the country and is in the interests of the Angolan people'" (Harsch & Thomas 1976: 88–9). Aid was forthcoming from Canada, Sweden, the Netherlands, Denmark, and Norway. Despite Washington's support of its rivals, the MPLA was even open to American investment. However, the Soviet bloc had a large military and political presence and influence, and the MPLA declared itself Marxist-Leninist in 1976. Like FRELIMO, it moved towards central planning and extensive nationalization, along with Guinea-Bissau increasingly resembling Cuba and Vietnam – this further embroiled them in Cold War machinations.

The FNLA and UNITA established a rival Democratic People's Republic in Huambo, 500 miles from Luanda in the southeast, backed by the United States and South Africa (and occasionally, mainland China and others). American military and other aid was funneled through the Mobutu regime in Zaire. The Mobutu regime had its own interests in Angola, notably control over the oil fields of Cabinda, as well as its port, which would have given Zaire improved access to the ocean. Zaire also transported about 35 percent of its copper, its principal export, through Angola along the Benguela railway. As a long-time backer of the FNLA, Mobutu had good reason to worry that a victory for the MPLA would provide the impetus for opponents of his dictatorship.

A further front was opened up by the Cabinda Separatist Movement. Cabinda was a Portuguese protectorate from 1885, lying between Zaire and the French colonial region of the Middle Congo (now Congo-Brazzaville, or the Republic of the Congo): it was merged into Angola in 1956, contributing to the formation in 1963 of the Front for the Liberation of the Enclave of Cabinda (FLEC). The Cabindan separatists were not part of the transitional government established by the Alvor Accord – the agreement also affirmed Angola's integrity – and declared independence in August 1975. Opposed to secession, and fearing the loss of a region that provided most of the oil that funded the Luanda government, the MPLA (joined by Cuban troops) invaded. The FLEC continued to struggle, split into several groups, and the conflict still continues.

American strategists saw Angola as strategically critical to US aims, as did the Soviets. At one time Angola seemed poised to stand alongside Vietnam, Cambodia, and Guatemala as symbols of American intervention, and the American intervention in Angola followed the pattern of postwar adventures in Asia and Latin America. South Africa was also opposed to Soviet influence, concerned with containing African nationalism, and weakened by the fall of its Portuguese ally, and periodically intervened directly, and provided ongoing and substantial support to the FNLA and UNITA.

The civil war ultimately continued until 2002. One of the longest and largest Cold War conflicts, it left more than half a million dead. With the exception of the Cubans, most foreign forces left in 1976. MPLA forces entered South West Africa several times after José Eduardo dos Santos replaced Neto in 1979, and sponsored anti-Mobutu armed groups in Zaire; South Africa invaded Angola again in 1980, and undertook further incursions from 1981 to 1987. The superpowers also increased their support to the rival sides in the 1980s, with perhaps 15,000 Cuban troops fighting alongside the MPLA by 1987. One of Africa's largest battles took place at Cuito Cuanavale in Cuando Cubango province from January to March 1988, as UNITA and South African forces clashed with the MPLA and the Cubans.

The result was a stalemate, leading to a short-lived ceasefire, and indirectly, to Namibia's independence from South Africa in 1990 and Cuba and South Africa's withdrawal from the conflict. The MPLA was by this stage spending almost half of its budget on the war (including payments to Havana for its troops), adopted elements of neoliberalism in the late 1980s, joined the International Monetary Fund (IMF), formally abandoning Marxism-Leninism in 1991, and ran against UNITA in elections in 1992; the latter withdrew after a narrow loss. The war resumed anew, but the FNLA – by this time a very minor force, having declined sharply since the 1970s – did not participate.

The Angolan civil war would ultimately drag on into 2002, when UNITA leader Jonas Savimbi was killed by government troops; the war in Cabinda continues. By this time, the country was left in an ongoing humanitarian crisis and severe economic problems: Neto's dream of an African Soviet future had been buried deep beneath 27 years of war, power struggles, and a changing world. The Angolan Revolution was over.

SEE ALSO: FRELIMO (Frente de Libertação de Moçambique); MPLA (Movimento Popular de Libertação de Angola); South Africa, African Nationalism and the ANC; Zimbabwe, National Liberation Movement

References and Suggested Readings

- Harsch, E. & Thomas, T. (1976) Angola: The Hidden History of Washington's War. New York: Pathfinder Press.
- Hodges, T. (2001) Angola: From Afro-Stalinism to Petro-Diamond Capitalism. Oxford/Bloomington: James Currey/Indiana University Press.
- Martin, P. (1980) Historical Dictionary of Angola. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press.
- Wright, G. (1997) The Destruction of a Nation: United States' Policy Toward Angola since 1945. London: Pluto Press.

Anthony, Susan B. (1820–1906)

Amy Linch

Susan B. Anthony was a crucial force in the 72-year struggle for women's suffrage in the United States. She spent nearly sixty years as an activist, organizer, and lecturer, initially in support of legal protection for women and the abolition of slavery, and later in single-minded dedication to women's suffrage. As an abolitionist, she called for an end to white male dominance and practical realization of the ideals expressed in the United States founding documents. The Constitution and the Declaration of Independence, she argued, were based on the universal principle of inalienable natural rights. It was not the prerogative of white men to retain these rights for themselves alone; all women and African American men were entitled to full political participation. In the wake of the Civil War, codification of an explicitly male citizenship through the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments to the Constitution led Anthony and her lifelong associate, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, to focus solely on women's rights. Their organization, the National Women's Suffrage Association (1869), represented the radical wing of the suffrage movement, endorsing a broad platform of political and social reforms that addressed the condition of working-class and poor women. Anthony's commitment to women's equal rights never wavered, but over time suffrage increasingly trumped comprehensive social reform as she became determined that once women could vote they would create a better society.

Anthony grew up in a progressive Quaker family where she received the same education as her brothers and was accustomed to the right to speak within her community. Like many women's rights activists of the nineteenth century, she became aware of women's public inequality with men when she entered the workforce to help her family recover from financial ruin after the Panic of 1837. Anthony took a job as a teacher in a girls' school with a salary less than a quarter of that of her male colleagues and few prospects for advancement. Her firsthand experience with practical obstacles to women's autonomy, and women's vulnerability in the face of dependence on fathers and husbands, informed much of her later commitment to women's labor, education, and financial independence. After ten years she retired from teaching and became an active member of the temperance movement. She attended the first Women's Rights Convention in Seneca Falls in 1848 as a temperance advocate. Through subsequent conventions she became acquainted with leading abolitionists and women's rights activists.

The temperance movement was concerned with allaying the social cost of alcoholism borne by women and children, but it did not explicitly politicize the institutional inequality that tied women's fate entirely to that of their husbands.

Anthony recognized the impact of women's lack of political power on their ability to achieve reform when she and several other women were denied the right to speak at a temperance convention in 1853. Much as the denial of public voice at the world anti-slavery conference in 1840 radicalized Lucretia Mott and Elizabeth Cady Stanton in the pursuit of women's rights, Anthony henceforth regarded women's political equality as fundamental to the success of the reform movement. She incorporated women's rights into the temperance campaign, the education and labor reform movements, and the struggle to end slavery.

In the 1850s women's rights and abolition were common cause for Anthony and she became an outspoken advocate of freedom from bondage, full citizenship, and full participation for all women and African American men. In 1856 she was recruited by Abby Kelly Foster to the American Anti-Slavery Society, led by Douglass and Garrison, and began traveling the lecture circuit in support of abolition, with the agreement that she could also promote women's rights. In her lectures and writings she challenged both slavery and gender inequality by appealing to the natural rights language of the Declaration of Independence. At the Ninth National Women's Rights Convention in 1859 she asked her audience, "Where under our Declaration of Independence does the Saxon man get his power to deprive all women and Negroes of their inalienable rights?"

In the same year Anthony addressed the State Teachers' Association in both New York and Massachusetts, arguing for coeducation and against the commonly accepted idea that there were mental differences between the sexes. Coeducation was necessary, she asserted, to overcome such social myths by proving women's equal competence with men and providing them with the opportunity for self-development. She campaigned for equal educational opportunities for all, regardless of race or gender – a fight she would extend to include the rights of children of ex-slaves to attend public school once slavery was finally abolished.

During this period Anthony faced intense resistance to women's rights. She frequently met hostility and ridicule as she lectured in support of property rights for married women, guardianship rights for women over their children, relaxation of divorce law, and women's right to their own wages. Her embrace of the short dress and "bloomers," designed by Libby Miller and popularized by Amelia Bloomer, in the name of comfort, health, and "the principle of rational dress" during the 1853 campaign for these reforms in New York State was a particular target of harassment. The experience ultimately led her to focus on one reform at a time: "By urging two, both are injured, as the average mind can grasp and assimilate but one idea at a time. I have felt ever since that experience that if I wished my hearers to consider the suffrage question I must not present the temperance, the religious, the dress, or any other besides, but must confine myself to suffrage" (Harper 1969: 117).

The depth of this lesson and its impact on her political strategy would not come to fruition until the passage of the Fifteenth Amendment. Prior to the war, slavery was regarded by women's rights advocates and abolitionists alike as the more egregious moral issue. Ending slavery was a clear priority over advancing women's suffrage but Anthony, like many abolitionists, saw the two issues as part of a single project of creating a just society. In an 1863 address to the Loyal League of the North, which she and Stanton organized to promote abolition, Anthony exhorted women to take up their positions as moral educators and cease supporting a social order created out of the pride and ambition of white men. In response to complaints from participants that women should be concerned with their own affairs rather than become distracted by the issue of slavery, she invoked the republican principle of equal representation inherent in the Constitution. Peace within the union, ending slavery, women's political rights, and the rights of the enslaved were inseparable commitments.

After the Civil War, solidarity between the abolitionists and women's rights activists fell victim to the partisan struggle to institutionalize reform. Radical Republicans were interested in enfranchising the freedmen in order to consolidate political control over the defeated South, but women's suffrage had no similar base of support. Radical Republicans refused to jeopardize the proposed amendment to secure the vote for African American men by including women's suffrage – the latter, in their opinion, would guarantee defeat. They argued for suffrage on grounds of expediency as a defense against tyranny: just as it had been necessary to arm African Americans to win the war, they should be armed with the vote to protect themselves against the old regime. Garrison, Douglass, and other abolitionists supported the Republican argument, hoping to salvage what they could of their Reconstruction agenda and pursue subsequent reforms through the party. In the reactionary postwar climate the soldier-citizen ideal displaced universal equality as the justification for suffrage and reinstated exclusive male equality as the dominant discourse of citizenship.

Anthony was dismayed at the betrayal of Fredrick Douglass and many of the men who had shared her commitment to political emancipation for black men and all women. She opposed the amendment, arguing: “This is the hour to press woman’s claims; we have stood with the black man in the Constitution over half a century . . . Enfranchise him, and we are left outside with lunatics, idiots and criminals” (O’Neil 1971: 17). From her perspective women had moved from equal partners with the abolitionists to second-class constituents. She and Stanton repudiated the Republican Party and sought support from Democrats in their Kansas campaign for women’s rights.

Anthony’s split with suffragists who endorsed a gradualist approach to reform became decisive at the American Equal Rights Association convention in 1869. Anthony and Stanton perceived the largely New England faction of suffragists who supported Garrison and the Fifteenth Amendment as abandoning the commitment to equal rights by insisting that black male suffrage took priority. They further criticized this group for generalizing the experience of all women from their own comfortable, middle-class positions. Immediately after the convention Anthony and Stanton secretly formed the National Women’s Suffrage Association. The NWSA was centrally organized and granted full membership only to women. They mobilized working women, encouraged women’s financial independence, and endorsed equal pay for women as well as reform of marriage and divorce law. For the next 20 years the suffrage movement was divided between the NWSA and the American Women’s Suffrage Association led by Lucy Stone and Henry Blackwell.

Anthony’s focus on women’s rights led her to form pragmatic alliances with groups whose interests ran counter to her own previously held convictions, and occasionally put her at odds with other reform groups. In 1868 she and Stanton drew the wrath of the New England abolitionists for campaigning with George Train, an outspoken advocate of “educated suffrage,” through which he opposed enfranchising black men in the South. Train provided start up funds for The Revolution, a weekly journal Anthony and Stanton produced from 1868 to 1870. The Revolution endorsed an eight-hour work day, equal pay for equal work, and a nationalist economic policy to support domestic workers. Her encouragement of women’s labor ultimately challenged the interests of male workers, however, and in 1870 she was accused of strike breaking and expelled from the National Labor Union for urging employers to hire women.

Under Anthony’s direction the National Women’s Suffrage Association pursued a federal strategy toward women’s suffrage. Initially she sought legal recognition of women’s right to vote under the existing Constitution through the courts. Arguing that women, by virtue of their personhood, were entitled to the rights of citizens articulated in the Constitution, Anthony and a number of other suffragists voted in the 1872 presidential election. Their effort brought a great deal of media attention to the cause but not the desired outcome. She was arrested, convicted in a sham trial, and fined $100. She refused to pay the fine, but the judge did not take further action, denying her the opportunity to appeal the case. During the same period women in other districts also claimed the right to vote, and several of these cases did advance through the courts. By 1875, after a series of rulings that rejected a constitutional right to women’s suffrage, Anthony was convinced that the legal strategy was a dead end. She began the campaign for a federal amendment that became her sole focus for the rest of her life.

The NWSA differed from the AWSA both in strategy and justification for women’s suffrage. The AWSA sought change at the local and state level, arguing that women should vote because their roles as mothers and members of their communities gave them an important vantage on public policy. Anthony argued strategically that this approach was burdensome to women, most of whom were geographically confined by family and domestic responsibilities. In the early years of the movement Anthony’s organization also maintained a clear commitment to broad political reform in the name of universal equality. Strategy increasingly trumped principle, however, as Anthony responded to the changing institutional and social context of the late nineteenth century. Natural rights arguments gave way to an essentialist discourse of femininity that justified placing suffrage above all other concerns. Women's self-development replaced equality as the movement attempted to appeal to white supremacists in the South and growing nativist and elite republican sensibilities in the North.

By 1890 Anthony had all but abandoned her public commitment to overthrow male domination in the home and workplace in an effort to appeal to as many women as possible. In violation of the bylaws of the NWSA and against the will of many of its members, she created a special NWSA committee to vote on a merger with the AWSA. Convinced that the two organizations must unite forces and focus exclusively on the vote, she strong-armed the merger by stacking the committee with members who favored it and asking two who did not to resign. The new organization, the National American Women's Suffrage Association, consolidated the suffrage movement but it marginalized radical voices and rejected support from African American women. Anthony refused to take a stand on Jim Crow laws and, in deference to the South, took a strong states' rights position on black women's suffrage, betraying her long-held conviction that the right to vote was a federal issue. While privately she rejected racial arguments and continued to support black women's rights organizations, she saw her commitment to universal equality as a public liability in the effort to generate support for suffrage.

Anthony succeeded Stanton as president of NAWSA (1892–1900). Although she was 80 years old when she passed leadership of the organization to Carrie Chapman Catt, Anthony persisted in the fight for women's suffrage. She promoted international solidarity among women and brought worldwide attention to women's rights by co-founding the International Woman Suffrage Alliance with Catt in 1902, and heading the United States delegation to the International Council of Women in Berlin two years later. She also continued her campaign for educational opportunities for women by serving on the board of trustees of Rochester's State Industrial School where she fought for coeducation and equal treatment of girls and boys. In 1900 when the campaign for coeducation at the University of Rochester fell short of the required $50,000 in pledges, Anthony frantically worked to close the gap, contributing the cash value of her life insurance policy to make up the final $2,000 that compelled the university to open its doors to women.

Anthony's last public words, "Failure is impossible," became a rallying cry for the final years of the suffrage movement. She died in 1906, 14 years before the achievement of her goal. The "Women's Suffrage Amendment," written by Anthony in 1878, was ratified as the Nineteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution in August 1920.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Slavery Movement, United States, 1700–1870; Douglass, Frederick (1817–1895); Garrison, William Lloyd (1805–1879); Stanton, Elizabeth Cady (1815–1902)

References and Suggested Readings

- Buhle, M. J. & Buhle, P. (Eds.) (1978) The Concise History of Woman Suffrage: Selections from the Classic Work of Stanton, Anthony, Gage and Harper. Chicago: University of Illinois Press.
- Gordon, A. (Ed.) (1997) The Selected Papers of Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Susan B. Anthony. New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press.
- Harper, I. H. (1969) The Life and Work of Susan B. Anthony: Reprint of the 1898–1908 Edition. Indianapolis: Hollenback Press. Available at www.gutenberg.org/ebooks/15220.
- Marilley, S. (1996) Woman Suffrage and the Origins of Liberal Feminism in the United States, 1820–1920. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- O'Neill, W. L. (1971) Everyone Was Brave: A History of Feminism in America. New York: Quadrant Press.

Anti-apartheid movement, South Africa

Dale T. McKinley

The anti-apartheid movement in South Africa can broadly be defined as encompassing those who actively opposed a political, cultural, and socio-economic system defined by separate development based on race. While the roots of this system can be traced back many years, it was in opposition to the institutionalized program of apartheid in 1948 by the white supremacist National Party that an anti-apartheid movement was born. The key purpose of this movement – which encompassed a wide range of organizations and constituencies but centered on the nationalist African National Congress (ANC) – was the attainment of majority rule. The movement existed until the apartheid system was formally ended with South Africa's first non-racial democratic elections on April 27, 1994.

Early Years

When the National Party (NP) won the white elections in 1948, the main forces confronting the new apartheid regime consisted of a multi-class black national liberation movement, the ANC, its ally the Communist Party of South Africa (CPSA), and various black unions representing a small portion of South Africa's burgeoning worker population. The ANC had become more militant as a result of the efforts of CPSA leaders like Moses Kotane and J. B. Marks, and of Africanist activists like Nelson Mandela and Oliver Tambo. The more passive outlook represented by older leaders like A. B. Xuma was marginalized, and a commitment to mass activity was put in place. It did not take long for the NP to implement a raft of oppressive apartheid legislation which, among others, included the Prohibition of Mixed Marriages Act, the Immorality Act, the Population Registration Act, the Group Areas Act, and the Suppression of Communism Act, the latter aimed at the CPSA but sufficiently broad to be used against most opponents of the regime.

In response, the ANC and some of the unions embarked on a series of stayaways, or mass strikes, in 1950, and launched a Defiance Campaign in 1952 that was designed to repeal Acts passed since 1948 by bringing together, nationally, local grievances that emanated from disparate communities. Conceived as a non-violent mass action campaign, it followed the same strategic logic as previous ANC activities, the belief that through moral argument, and example, the government could be persuaded to mend its ways. While the campaign stated the need to bring the masses into action, the core of the campaign centered on highly public acts of leaders engaging in civil disobedience, in which most workers could not afford to participate. It achieved none of the reforms it demanded.

In 1953 the ANC's approach resulted in the establishment of what became known as the Congress Alliance. This brought together ANC (representing Africans), the Congress of Democrats (representing whites), the South African Colored Organization (representing Coloreds), and the South African Indian Congress (incorporating the Natal Indian Congress and other bodies, and representing Indians). It was later joined by the South African Congress of Trade Unions (SACTU), formed in 1955 and in which communists like Ray Alexander Simons and Elias Motsoaledi were active, and the predominantly white Federation of South African Women (FSAW). The underground South African Communist Party (SACP), formed in 1953 as successor to the banned CPSA, was also involved. There was no small irony that the Alliance mirrored the racial categories of the apartheid state: national identification had come full circle.

Although the Congress Alliance certainly represented the largest and widest coalition of anti-apartheid forces to date, opposition did arise. Arguing that the Alliance's "multi-racialism" undermined radical African nationalism, and led to undue Indian, white, and communist influence, a small group of ANC Youth League members opposed ANC participation. It was these men who were, in 1959, to lead a splinter group out of the ANC and form the rival liberation movement, the exclusivist Pan-Africanist Congress (PAC). There was also opposition from left critics of the ANC such as the Non-European Unity Movement (NEUM) and smaller independent trade unions who in the main rejected the Alliance's racial departmentalization.

The Alliance drew up the now-famous Freedom Charter in June 1955, which set out a basic program and demands. Conceptualized as a document that would express the views of the people of South Africa in a nationalist movement for equality, the Freedom Charter became the guiding manifesto of the ANC-led Alliance and came to be regarded by large sections of the black population as representative of their aspirations; it became a rallying point for the majority of those involved in the international side of the anti-apartheid movement.

The adoption of the Freedom Charter represented two important developments in the anti-apartheid movement. First, it codified the ANC alliance's commitment to a strategy for national liberation that advocated a multi-class movement and provided the logical foundation for a strategy of ideological and class accommodationism. The concept of the people came to be seen primarily as constituent of all social classes divided along racial lines, and national liberation was separated from social liberation. Second, it represented a particular ideological “party-line,” the program of a political organization seeking a prominent role in governing the country. The conscious fusion of a party program with an all-inclusive national “will” provided the ANC with the basis to claim a national mandate, not subject to the scrutiny or to the democratic processes otherwise associated with the principle of popular, mass-based party politics.

The adoption of the Freedom Charter was not well received by the apartheid government. Using the Suppression of Communism Act and the Native Labor Act (1953) the state began to arrest or ban from political activity union and left activists. Pass laws were enforced with greater zeal, and the white authorities vigorously pursued the ethnic fragmentation and control of the non-white population via the Group Areas Act. The state arrested almost the entire Congress Alliance leadership in 1956, among them Kotane, Mandela, Tambo, and Joe Slovo, for treason, setting in motion an infamous Treason Trial that dragged on until 1960. Almost the entire senior leadership was found not guilty for lack of evidence.

In response to both the state’s offensive and local socioeconomic conditions there was a noticeable upsurge in oppositional activity in the late 1950s, with boycotts, stayaways and other strike action, anti-pass struggles, rural revolts, and public demonstrations. The culmination of this intense period of widespread resistance was the Sharpeville Massacre in March 1960, when up to 70 people were killed during a PAC-led march against pass laws. While this was followed by widespread rioting, demonstrations, strikes, stayaways, marches, and a short-lived armed rural revolt led by the PAC, the apartheid state’s iron fisted response, which included the banning of the ANC and the PAC, quickly smashed the resistance.

The unprecedented turmoil that Sharpeville and its aftermath brought to South Africa meant that for the first time the apartheid state had to contend with widespread international condemnation. International investors became jittery and temporarily withdrew substantial amounts of capital from the country, although once it became clear that the state had effectively crushed the resistance, financial support and trade resumed with increased vigor. Small, anti-apartheid solidarity groups were formed in several western (notably the United Kingdom), Eastern bloc, and “third world” countries and began to lay the foundations for what would later become the international component of the anti-apartheid movement.

Externalized Armed Struggle

In 1961 a small group of leading individuals in the now-underground ANC and SACP declared the formation of an armed organization, Umkhonto We Sizwe (Spear of the Nation, or MK): unlike the main sections of the Congress Alliance, this was an interracial organization. In its first months, MK engaged in the sporadic sabotage of minor infrastructure: while proving of important propaganda value, it posed no serious negative military or strategic threat to the apartheid regime. Leaders like Slovo and Tambo were sent abroad to secure international support. Largely through the SACP’s relationships with the Soviet Union and other Eastern bloc countries, military and financial support was secured, and an external ANC headquarters set up in Dar es Salaam, Tanzania.

Before MK was able to make any real progress in consolidating itself abroad, Mandela – who had secretly returned to South Africa after leaving the country in early 1962 – was arrested inside the country in August 1962. Soon after, in early 1963, almost the entire internal leadership of the ANC/MK was arrested in Rivonia on the outskirts of Johannesburg, and subsequently most were sentenced to life imprisonment.

Throughout this period, and for most of the 1960s, mass struggle virtually ceased to exist inside the country. The apartheid state had succeeded in wiping out the organized ANC underground, and showed brutal efficiency in suppressing labor and local community struggles. While SACTU was never banned, it collapsed as a union as its key figures focused on MK. The PAC, whose main leaders had been imprisoned, and which was also attempting to establish an externally based guerilla struggle, had little impact. The externalized ANC-SACP-MK had yet to launch any kind of serious guerilla activity, and was generally moribund.

Although the stated intention of the ANC and MK was to reinforce, and spur, mass struggle, the way in which the armed struggle was undertaken and justified made this almost impossible. The decision taken to use armed struggle had been unilateral, and justified by the supposed lack of alternatives, which made the old tactics unfeasible. This ignored the possibility of combining “legal and peaceful” struggle with “illegal” mass struggle. In ruling out long-term internal mass mobilization and organization, and opting for armed propaganda – which in the circumstances could only be externally based – to stimulate the same, the ANC and SACP necessarily placed the content of their struggle outside the masses.

The one area where the exiled liberation movement did attain some success was in gaining international support and solidarity. From a very early stage in its strategy of externalization, the ANC/SACP (and to a lesser extent, and less successfully, the PAC) devoted substantial time and effort to diplomatic work. With the support provided by the Eastern bloc, the ANC/SACP/MK was able to establish a modest presence in Tanzania, with the bulk of recruits situated in four camps around the country. The ANC was also beginning to have some success at attracting the support of the Scandinavian countries, particularly Sweden. Most of the SACP leadership and structures were located in London, and contacts with the Communist Party of Great Britain and other organizations led to the establishment of the British Anti-Apartheid Movement (AAM), which in the 1970s and 1980s spawned a global network of similar anti-apartheid movements elsewhere. In Africa the ANC relied on friendly but cash-strapped states, Tanzania and later Zambia and Angola, for bases. The PAC, whose main ally was China, was not well connected, and experienced severe financial problems due to its primary reliance on pan-African support.

The failure of MK campaigns at Wankie and Sipolilo compelled the ANC to convene a national consultative conference, at Morogoro, Tanzania, in 1969: attended mainly by MK delegates, it was very critical of the ANC’s exile leadership, and communists were prominent in the ANC’s new executive. MK was put under the supervision of a “revolutionary council” that answered to the ANC’s national executive, and included non-African communists, among them Slovo. Membership of the ANC (although not senior leadership positions) was opened to non-Africans, replacing the Congress Alliance approach. SACTU, by now basically an exile group, remained closely tied to the ANC.

The ANC adopted the Strategy and Tactics program, largely drafted by Slovo. This argued that South Africa was a system of “colonialism of a special type” and that the immediate task was “national democracy,” not socialism. It solidified the externalized guerilla warfare approach: while the working class constituted a “distinct and reinforcing layer of our liberation and Socialism” (the only place socialism was identified as a goal of struggle), the thrust of the struggle was “destroying the existing social and economic relationships” to “bring with it a correction of the historical injustices perpetrated against the indigenous majority and thus lay the basis for a new – and deeper internationalist – approach.”

By the mid-1970s the anti-apartheid movement was reaping the bitter consequences of its approach: externally based guerilla war was a failure; relationships between the leadership and rank and file were strained; there was a near complete lack of structures in South Africa; the apartheid state was secure; domestic and international capital were prospering in the country. It was not without a degree of irony that the impetus for changing this situation was to come, not from the external ANC, but from renewed internal struggle.

Internal Struggle, Internationalized Politics

While the anti-apartheid movement was trying to deal with its own crisis, apartheid South Africa was beginning to experience the systemic contradictions of apartheid-capitalism. The historic division of labor between well-paid, skilled white workers and low-wage unskilled black workers had been undermined by an expanding economy. Large-scale foreign investment during the 1960s, the subsequent take-off in the manufacturing sector, and the need of the apartheid state to create ever expanding economic opportunities for its white supporters placed contradictory political and socioeconomic demands on a state unwilling and unable to adapt. This was partly a political crisis; it was also a crisis of over accumulation. The apartheid state and domestic capital responded with attempts to corporatize African labor, develop a consumerist black “middle class,” streamline production, and find external avenues for investment. The situation indicated the importance of specifically anti-capitalist struggle, and class oppression, which by itself the “national” component of the liberation struggle could not really address.

In early 1973 tens of thousands of workers in the coastal city of Durban went on a spontaneous strike and succeeded in getting most of their wage demands met. Their example set off other nationwide struggles which met with mixed responses of repression and attempts at cooption. The workers infused a new sense of struggle among the black population and catalyzed a new breed of independent “workerist” unions, concentrating on industrial unionism and shop-floor organization, which eventually gathered as the Federation of South African Trade Unions (FOSATU) in 1979. SACTU, maintaining that South Africa was a “fascist” state, demonstrated its profound isolation by claiming the new unions were puppets of the apartheid regime.

On another internal front, there had been growing unrest among African and Colored students in the early 1970s over the poor quality of government education for people of color, the lack of opportunities for further education, and the general lack of any coherent internal struggle. The students had formed their own representative bodies, which soon led to the formation of a new strand of the anti-apartheid movement, the Black Consciousness Movement (BCM). Despite its strategic limitations and lack of a mass base, the BCM influenced an entire generation, particularly young intellectuals and urban students. It was this group which sparked off the 1976 Soweto uprisings, and then provided, particularly through mass infusion of young exiles into the ANC, the means to resurrect the armed struggle and a much needed injection of energy. BCM structures, along with new labor formations, were the main focus of internal struggle throughout the 1970s.

Despite the infusion of thousands of young South Africans into the ranks of the external liberation movements (mainly the ANC/SACP/MK) and an increase in armed sabotage activities inside the country during the early 1980s, the apartheid state was far from threatened, the geopolitical obstacles were formidable and the internal conditions necessary for successful guerilla-type operations were tenuous. The one change clearly working in favor of the movements was the growing anti-apartheid sentiment (mainly evidenced through a growing divestment campaign), increasingly among sections of (white) domestic and international corporate capital who argued for serious political change in order to head off a potential anti-capitalist revolution. The ANC’s international presence had, by the early 1980s, become gigantic. Apart from the thousands of MK cadres in camps around the region, the organization had a large educational complex in Tanzania, an administrative headquarters in Lusaka (Zambia), several hundred ANC members studying at foreign universities, and a diplomatic presence in over thirty countries, with the base in London the most important.

The growing socioeconomic crisis in South Africa, the failure or subversion of various reform initiatives, and intensified resistance from ever-larger sections of the African, Colored, and Indian population, led by workers, students, and community (“civic”) organizations, eventually led to the formation of two national “front” mass movements in 1983: the BCM-aligned National Forum, and the ANC-aligned United Democratic Front (UDF). Although organizations affiliated to the National Forum did wage various struggles, especially within the student movement, and while the Forum had an overtly socialist program, it was the UDF that attracted the majority of grassroots organizations into its fold, and that took center stage as the internal anti-apartheid struggle intensified throughout the 1980s.

By the mid-1980s South Africa was on fire as township residents and organized workers – the majority, including the FOSATU unions, now united in the Congress of South African Trade Union (COSATU), formed in 1985 – engaged in intense and militant resistance against anything and anyone representing the apartheid state. This internal struggle was spurred on by the externalized ANC’s call at its 1985 conference in Kabwe, Zambia, to make the country “ungovernable.” Given the internal uprisings, the ANC/SACP/MK opted for a strategy of a “people’s war” which sought to use MK to arm and train people in their communities in order to launch effective armed and mass resistance to the apartheid state, a process which, it was hoped, would culminate in an insurrectionary seizure of power. The ANC and SACP adopted a sympathetic approach to COSATU, where they had the support of key figures like COSATU president Elijah Barayi, and won over “workerist” figures like Moses Mayekiso.

Such hopes however, were short-lived as the apartheid state, now controlled by hardline politicians and military officers, launched its “total strategy” of crushing all resistance. Through a series of legislated states of emergency, banning of internal movements, including the UDF, the massive deployment of security forces, and a program of destabilizing southern African countries supporting the external liberation movements, the apartheid state succeeded in containing attempts at “people’s war” and “people’s power.” However, the financial and strategic costs of the hard-line approach were such that by the late 1980s the state had little choice but to seek a political compromise with its enemies, ranging from the Cubans in Angola, to sections of domestic capital, to international finance capital, to powerful western countries such as the USA, to a global coalition of nongovernmental/student/community/political organizations.

The combined result of the internal and international developments during the 1980s was a concerted, all-round push for a negotiated settlement to end apartheid. The ANC, alongside its external and internal allies, including imprisoned ANC leaders like Mandela, had become the dominant representatives of the anti-apartheid struggle, and were now fully committed to a negotiations strategy. As hopes for a revolutionary seizure of power faded along with the movement’s ability to build a viable internal underground linked to popular armed struggle, the negotiations strategy was, effectively, a fait accompli.

Towards 1994 and Beyond

While the apartheid state’s late 1989–early 1990 release of high-profile leaders, and the unbanning of formations like the ANC, PAC, and SACP, was correctly seen as a victory for the anti-apartheid movement, the counter-reality was that such moves placed the same state in the best possible position to control the negotiated transition to a post-apartheid dispensation and securing the interests of the existing white capitalist ruling class and its international counterparts. The armed struggle was suspended, and MK and SACP leaders like Slovo and Chris Hani played a key role in the unfolding of negotiations. The continued existence of a still powerful security apparatus in the hands of the state provided the ultimate guarantor of a favorable outcome.

For the ANC and its partners, among them COSATU, these developments, although unexpected, were a godsend. Besides the admitted inability to pursue any kind of intensification of popular resistance, events in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union had a major impact. In addition to the loss of military and financial assistance, the collapse of the Eastern bloc delivered a severe ideological blow to those in the liberation movements who had looked to the Soviet Union as the model for transforming South Africa. Whole generations of cadres had been reared on a steady diet of Stalinism, and when it all disintegrated they were left in an ideological vacuum. The accompanying disillusionment, combined with the new conditions of negotiation, made the movement more susceptible than ever to a strategic and ideological accordant.

As the negotiations process unfolded, so too did the apartheid state’s two-tier strategy of, on the one hand, violence against the grassroots members of the anti-apartheid forces, and, on the other, engaging in talks and negotiations. The result was to weaken the “enemy” on the ground as the means towards the same at the negotiations table. While the ANC leadership responded by drumming up further international moral support and employing occasional mass action to give it further clout in ongoing negotiations, such moves could really only play a narrow role within the overall negotiation framework.

Likewise, the leadership’s position that it was only once the ANC had come to possess state power that major problem areas like monopoly control of the economy and massive inequalities could be addressed, came to represent the official movement response to the so-viewed unrealistic expectations of the masses. Many of the very demands that had driven the anti-apartheid struggle, and around which the vast majority of “the people’s” struggles had coalesced, were no longer viewed as necessary to the immediate transformation of South Africa. Closed-door negotiations among the political elite would now “deliver” the demise of apartheid but not inequality and redress. While the negotiations process eventually delivered the first-ever universal suffrage election of April 1994, the only constituency capable of leading and carrying through a revolutionary struggle against both national and social oppression, the broad working class, had been effectively demobilized and left vulnerable to post-apartheid capitalist restructuring.

The strategic primacy given to the achievement of a narrowly conceived “national democracy”

thus enabled a basically false separation between political and socioeconomic change to pervade the anti-apartheid struggle. Because of this, processes such as democratization took on a narrow bourgeois, nationalist, and predominantly “political” meaning, and “socioeconomic” change became secondary to what was seen as a parallel struggle for “political” change.

The consequent privileging of the economic status quo – capitalism – ensured that the new post-1994 government, dominated by the ANC and its allies, prioritized unity between antagonistic class and social forces. This provided the foundation for the accumulative needs of a new, increasingly deracialized capitalist elite, paved the way for international capital to exercise increased influence and control, and reinforced class, racial, and gender inequality. What post-apartheid South Africa confirms is that a revolutionary struggle against oppression cannot be advanced by attempting to reconcile the priorities of the masses with the priorities of capitalism.

SEE ALSO: Aggett, Neil (1953–1982); Barayi, Elijah (1930–1994); Communist Party of South Africa, 1921–1950; Hani, Chris (1942–1993); Mandela, Nelson (b. 1918); Marks, J. B. (1903–1972); Motsoaledi, Elias (1924–1994); Raditsela, Andries (1956–1985); Slovo, Joe (1926–1995); South Africa, African Nationalism and the ANC; South Africa, Labor Movement; South African Communist Party, 1953–Present; Tambo, Oliver (1917–1993)

References and Suggested Readings

- Davidson, B., Slovo, J., & Wilkinson, A. (1976) Southern Africa: The New Politics of Revolution. New York: Penguin.
- Ellis, S. & Sechaba, T. (1992) Comrades Against Apartheid: The ANC and the South African Communist Party in Exile. London: James Currey.
- Fine, R. & Davis, D. (1990) Beyond Apartheid: Labor and Liberation in South Africa. Johannesburg: Ravan Press.
- Holland, H. (1989) The Struggle: A History of the African National Congress. London: Grafton Books.
- Johns, S. & Hunt Davis, R. (Eds.) (1991) Mandela, Tambo and the African National Congress: The Struggle Against Apartheid, 1948–1990. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Karis, T. & Carter, G. (1972/1973/1977) From Protest to Challenge: A Documentary History of African Politics in South Africa 1882–1964, 4 Vols. Stanford: Hoover Institution Press.

- Lerumo, A. (1980) Fifty Fighting Years: The Communist Party of South Africa (1921–1971). London: Inkululeko.
- Lodge, T. (1983) Black Politics in South Africa since 1945. Johannesburg: Ravan Press.
- McKinley, D. T. (1997) The ANC and the Liberation Struggle: A Critical Political Biography. London: Pluto Press.
- Marx, A. (1992) Lessons of Struggle: South African Internal Opposition, 1960–1990. Cape Town: Oxford University Press.
- Meli, F. (1988) South Africa Belongs to Us: A History of the ANC. Harare: Zimbabwe Publishing House.
- Pomeroy, W. (1986) Apartheid, Imperialism and African Freedom. New York: International Publishers.
- Wolpe, H. (1990) Race, Class and the Apartheid State. London: James Currey.

Anti-Corn Law agitation, Britain, 19th century

Paul A. Pickering

Formed in 1839, the Anti-Corn Law League offered “free trade” as a panacea and presented itself as the vanguard of the emerging industrial middle class, whose interests lay in ending protection and opening new markets abroad. The immediate object of the League’s campaign was the repeal of the Corn and Provision Laws. A tariff barrier that was introduced ostensibly to keep the price of grain crops high following the conclusion of the Napoleonic wars in 1815, the Corn Laws buttressed the political and economic power of Britain’s landowning aristocracy. The opponents of the Corn Laws sought to introduce the ideas of free trade and economic liberalism into the mainstream of political discourse in Britain. The Corn Laws, they believed, were a tax on food that created demand for higher wages paid for from their profits. More importantly, they were a trade barrier that provoked foreign governments into retaliatory measures against British manufactured goods, particularly textiles.

The League was responsible for major innovations in the tactics and scale of pressure group politics in Britain. Initially, public lectures formed the core of the campaign as the League expanded the boundaries of politics by employing lecturers far more systematically and extensively than any previous public movement. During 1839 the Manchester Anti-Corn Law Association sent lecturers to 300 of the "principal towns of the Kingdom." This was followed by about 800 lectures in 1840, including 33 or 34 counties in England, 40 or 50 places in Scotland, 20 or 30 places in Ireland, and throughout Wales. Impressive as this effort was, in March 1842 an editorial in the League newspaper, Anti-Bread-Tax Circular, promised that lecturers would visit every parish in Britain. England and Wales were divided into 12 districts with a lecturer appointed to each. Underneath this structure the League lecturers were encouraged to appoint a person in every village to serve as a contact point for the organization. Even if the results sometimes fell short of the objective, lecturing provided the League with an extensive network of agents and an organizational structure that extended from its headquarters in Manchester to most parts of England and Wales.

The League also organized petitions to parliament. "A shower of genuine petitions," wrote the editor of the Anti-Corn Law Circular in December 1839, was sure to bring quick victory. In fact, the shower soon became a deluge. Between 1839 and 1843 the League was the most persistent petitioner of the House of Commons. Over the five sessions there were 16,351 petitions for repeal tabled in the House (an average of 3,270, containing an average total of 1,153,690 signatures, every session).

Far from relying strictly on familiar methods, League organizers became adroit in using new technology and communications in their campaign. Early in the campaign the League recognized the need to make maximum use of the new Penny Post. In September 1840 the League Council conceived a plan to rouse the country by sending letters containing tracts and handbills to every person listed in a major business directory. As many as 7,000 of these letters were sent out each day. This was only the beginning. In September 1843 the Circular was boasting "the most extensive correspondence ever contemplated," with 300,000 letters a week. Over 23,000 letters were posted at one Manchester post office in three days, complained its over-burdened manager to a Parliamentary Committee in 1846. The scale of the League campaign is impressive even when compared with modern political campaigning. In 1842-3, for example, the League distributed over 9 million tracts, weighing more than 100 tons, from its headquarters in Manchester. Similarly, special trains increased crowds at League meetings and carried visitors to the well-known League Bazaars in Manchester and London.

By this stage the League had given up attempting to convince the members of the existing House of Commons that repeal was essential and had begun to implement a strategy to replace them with men who did not need convincing. At first the new electoral strategy involved extracting a pledge from one or more of the candidates, but this proved to be a short step from standing candidates in their own right. The Rubicon was crossed in December 1840 when a by-election in Walsall in Staffordshire was contested by the inaugural president of the League, J. B. Smith.

An event of notoriety at the time, the Walsall by-election was marred by brutality, corruption, and electoral violence. Smith was narrowly defeated at the poll. Hot on the heels of this defeat, the General Election produced a Tory triumph, but, far from curing the League of the taste for electoral politics, these events sharpened its appetite. The League adopted a strategy of contesting by-elections, but the results were less than hoped for. Between 1843 and 1846, when the Corn Laws were repealed, the majority of by-elections were not contested by free-trade candidates, and even when they were the results were indifferent. The League contested 20 by-elections but managed only half a dozen victories. Nevertheless, this was the first serious attempt to create a third force in British politics.

The shift to electioneering led to two further strategic choices. The first was a bold campaign to revise the electoral register. The narrow loss at Walsall was blamed on the fact that the Tories had added a few names to the voters' register shortly before it closed. Early in 1842 the most prominent leader of the League, Richard Cobden, ordered an analysis of all the boroughs in the kingdom as a prelude to the establishment of Electoral Committees to oversee registration. By September 1845 the League had a team of lawyers at work monitoring elections, but again the results were mixed.

The conversion to electoral politics also involved the League in an elaborate scheme to create new voters. The Reform Act included the retention of the 40 shilling freehold franchise in the counties which provided the opportunity for a breathtaking attempt to manipulate the electoral system. The plan was eloquent in its simplicity: property was purchased and subdivided to be sold in lots of sufficient value to enfranchise the new multiple owners. Late in 1844 the League set an ambitious target of facilitating the enfranchisement of 1,000,000 freeholders. Here too the results fell short of the public perception. The League's electoral strategy was, however, successful in contributing to a theater of menace that shook the confidence of Tories all over Britain. The League's electoral strategies also contributed to the effectiveness of the conventional forms of declaratory politics in which it excelled.

The shift to electioneering greatly increased the need for fundraising, which was planned and executed in a highly structured, systematic, and successful manner. According to Cobden, the League had spent £25,000 by the end of 1842. Over subsequent years the total increased significantly. In 1842–3 the League raised £50,000; in each of 1844 and 1845 £100,000 was collected and expended and, late in 1845, the League commenced a £250,000 fund, of which only part had been collected when the Corn Laws were repealed. For the most part these funds came from the pockets of individual donors (although the famous bazaars made important contributions in 1842 and 1845). Overwhelmingly the individual donations flowed in from the League's heartland in the north of England, so much so that it is easy to overlook an impressive national spread of supporters. In February 1846, for example, the League published a list of 131 towns and cities where a collector was actively working, forming a truly national movement.

Recognizing that a "new power has arisen in the land," The Times declared the League to be "a great fact" of British public life. The League provided a template for "pressure from without" that would find many imitators at home and abroad. Extra-parliamentary politics would never be the same again.

SEE ALSO: Chartists

References and Suggested Readings

- McCord, N. (1958) The Anti-Corn Law League 1838–1846. London: Allen & Unwin.
- Pickering, P. A. & Tyrrell, A. (2002) The People's Bread: A History of the Anti-Corn Law League. Leicester: Leicester University Press.
- Schonhardt-Bailey, C. (2006) From the Corn Laws to Free Trade. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press.

Anti-fascist People's Front

Slobodan Karamanić

The Anti-fascist People's Front was an alliance of plural and heterogeneous political and social forces – parties, organizations, unions, and factions – united in opposition to 1930s fascism in response to the victory of the Nazis in Germany. The popular front unified former "class adversaries" among communist and bourgeois parties against a common fascist enemy.

By the end of the 1920s fascist politics and ideologies were growing rapidly and almost all European countries had their own genuine fascist party or movement. As the examples of Italy and Germany have shown, the fascist politics that gained absolute power in these countries was destructive to both liberal democracy and workers' movements. The absence of political resistance to the expansion of fascism resided not only in the weaknesses, ignorance, or frequently opportunism of the European liberal democrats, but also in the splits within the international left, divided between various communist and non-communist factions.

The idea of an Anti-fascist People's Front was proposed in the Comintern in 1934 by the Bulgarian communist Georgi Dimitrov in his "Report to the 7th World Congress of the Communist International," which called for an urgent unification of all "progressive forces" under broad anti-fascist popular fronts. Dimitrov affirmed that communist parties should engage in flexible and situation-oriented policies of coalitions, based on the analysis of the balance of class and political forces in each country. He argued that rather than arriving at abstract and theoretical analyses, the struggle against fascism must be concrete and effective, "depending on the historical, social and political peculiarities of each country, and the concrete situation existing therein" (Dimitrov 1975: 200). Thus, according to Dimitrov, popular coalitions could include all parties from left to center in common opposition against fascism, but also diverse social classes and groups, including organized and unorganized workers, the peasantry, the intelligentsia, the urban petty bourgeoisie, youth, women, and oppressed peoples of the colonies.

Comintern's appeal to unify against fascism was welcomed uniquely in different countries. On the one hand, in France and Spain, where the fascist threat was acute, a popular front was formed in opposition. In 1934 the French Popular Front (Front Populaire) was established by the Communist Party and socialist parties, and later joined by the Radical Party and other heterogeneous left and center political groups. In Spain an analogous popular front (Frente Popular) also united various political factions and parties – republicans, socialists, communists, anarchists – in common defense of the Spanish Second Republic. Both the Front Populaire and the Frente Popular received considerable support, winning elections against the right and forming governments in May–June 1936. On the other hand, in other cases the Comintern's proposal did not lead to unification, but confirmed substantial political differences and animosities on the left.

From the very beginning, numerous social democrats and socialists (for instance, in Britain, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Sweden, the Netherlands, and the US) criticized and rejected the popular front policy as a tactical maneuver orchestrated by Moscow with the defense of the Soviet Union as the primary objective. This distrust was a result of the sectarian policy in the Comintern's so-called third period (1928–35), which relied ultimately on the singular avant-garde role of communist parties in the working-class movement. During this period the moderate left was described as “social-fascist” and trade unions labeled as reformist agents directed by the capitalist class (Stalin 1954). This rigid Comintern policy had particularly fatal consequences for political developments in Germany and Austria, resulting in division of the anti-fascist forces on the left. The new popular front policy came too late to prevent fascism's advance in these two countries and was unconvincing for socialists and social democrats previously marked as the prime enemies of the working class by communists.

A wide external leftist rejection was not the only constraint on the popular front policy. The policy also carried an internal conceptual ambiguity, implicated in its principal task to recast a tension between the liberal disposition of the defense of the bourgeois democracy and the leftist radicalization towards the proletarian revolution (Dell 2006). This tension proved that the coalition policy based entirely on the negative (anti-fascist) ground, without a common affirmative and program of emancipation, could not be consistent and effective. Ultimately, such conceptual ambiguity caused failures in the French Front Populaire and the Spanish Frente Popular. In the former, the electoral victory of the Popular Front produced enthusiasm in the masses and political mobilization of the working class. A vast workers' strike and two-month occupation of the factories in 1936 was both supportive and critical of a newly established Popular Front government led by the socialist Léon Blum from June 1936 to June 1937. Although the French Communist Party did not join the government, it supported Blum decisively, resulting in the politics of mutual compromise. While the Communist Party sought peacefully to end the workers' general strike, Blum's government in turn introduced new labor laws, including the 40-hour week, the right to strike, arbitration in industrial disputes, and paid holidays. However, these social reforms were insufficient to surmount the deep economic and political crisis. The French Popular Front government fell in just a year, and finally the Popular Front majority in parliament voted in support of the Petain and Laval pro-fascist regime.

The popular front policy of concession also caused political disaster in the course of the Spanish Civil War from 1936 to 1939. In Spain the Communist Party influenced by the Comintern first turned against the socialist-anarchist revolution in Catalonia. Only after the elimination of their political opponents did the communists decide to fight the right wing with the popular front coalition. Mainly due to such internal conflicts, the Frente Popular lost political unity and strength, in part leading to military defeat of the Spanish Second Republic.

The official policy of the Anti-fascist People's Front came to a conclusion with the Molotov-Ribbentrop pact between Nazi Germany and the Soviet Union in 1939. However, inspired by the popular front policy, during World War II the new concept of an Anti-fascist Liberation Front emerged, unifying many political forces in armed struggle against fascism. In most of these fronts, for example in Albania, Bulgaria, China, France, Greece, Italy, and Yugoslavia, communist parties took significant leadership roles.

SEE ALSO: Communist Party, Germany; Communist Party of the United States of America (CPUSA); Spanish Revolution

References and Suggested Readings

- Dell, S. (2006) The Image of the Popular Front – The Masses and the Media in Interwar France. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Dimitrov, G. (1975) The United Front – The Struggle Against Fascism and War. San Francisco: Proletarian Publishers.
- Hobsbawm, E. (1994) The Age of Extremes: The Short Twentieth Century 1914–1991. New York: Vintage.
- Mazower, M. (2000) Dark Continent – Europe’s Twentieth Century. New York: Random House.
- Morrow, F. (1986) Revolution und Kontrarevolution in Spanien, einschließlich: Der Bürgerkrieg in Spanien. Essen: Gervinus.
- Stalin, J. V. (1928/1954) The Right Danger in the German Communist Party. In J. V. Stalin, Works. Vol. 11. Moscow: Foreign Language.

Anti-Franco worker struggles, 1939–1975

Michael Eaude

General Franco came to power through the Spanish Civil War (1936–9) following a military coup on July 18, 1936. The immediate reaction of the working class in the main cities such as Barcelona and Madrid defeated the coup and, especially in Catalonia, full-scale social revolution broke out.

Franco’s vengeance and his commitment to root out any sign of democracy were extreme. Opponents were executed in every village conquered by his armies. These killings reached their peak in the immediate postwar period. Several hundred thousand people left for exile and some 270,000 political prisoners were tortured, starved, and/or used as slave labor by the regime. Many others were destitute after confiscation of property and loss of jobs. Some 200,000 children died of hunger in the early 1940s.

The terror meant the population was cowed for many years. Communists and anarchists organized guerrilla bands (the maquis) in the mountains with little success, though they did tie down large parts of the security forces during the 1940s.

All trade unions were illegal, apart from the corporatist Organización Sindical Estatal (State Union Organization) (OSE). Membership was compulsory for all bosses and workers. Its full-time workers were falangists appointed from above. Its ideology was based on replacing the class struggle, considered communist and “diabolic,” by combined “capital, labor, and skill” to take forward the “fatherland.” In the words of Marcelino Camacho (1976), the OSE “was designed to tame the working class by putting it into a double straitjacket, both material and ideological.” All strikes were illegal and were judged in military courts.

Remarkably, despite the repression, there were strikes in Manresa in 1945 and in Euskadi (the Basque Country) in 1947. They were strikes of desperation: historian Sebastian Balfour calculated that in 1950 an unskilled worker had to work 8 hours to buy a kilo of bread. In March 1951 a tram boycott against fare rises in Barcelona was followed by a three-day general strike of about 300,000 workers. The boycott won the withdrawal of fare rises and the strike won the release of people arrested during the boycott. This famous struggle led to the summary sacking of the governor, mayor, police chief, and head of the OSE in Barcelona. However, Barcelona ’51 was a false dawn. Twenty more years of stubborn organization and the heroic work of thousands of anonymous militants would be needed before such broad struggles emerged again.

February 1956 saw the rebirth of a student movement. A new generation of students entered in conflict with the regime, when some non-falangists won student elections. The annulment of the results led to the first protest demonstration in Madrid since the Civil War. From then on the Falange lost its hegemony in the universities. Many student activists from 1956 became important anti-Francoists in many professional associations of lawyers, journalists, and architects in the 1960s and 1970s. Also in 1956, strikes in various parts of the state were answered by not only the customary beatings and prison, but wage rises, too. The poverty and hunger were such that the rises only restored wages to 1936 levels.

During these first two decades of dictatorship Franco followed an economic policy called “autarchy” or self-sufficiency. It was a total failure: products were scarce, there was no industrial or agricultural planning, and corruption was rife. Rescued in 1952–3 by US financial aid in exchange for military bases in Spain, by 1959 the regime faced economic collapse. The World Bank reported that the country was just two months from bankruptcy (Sartorius & Alfaya 1999: 78–92).

Despite the dictatorship’s grandiloquent rhetoric of independence and empire, it was forced to open its doors to foreign investment, which was delighted to enter a friendly country where wages were not only low but guaranteed by the police. This led to the expansion of the economy by about 10 percent a year throughout the 1960s, stimulating mass emigration from the hungry countryside to the cities and producing rapid and chaotic industrialization. This new (relative) wealth meant that workers began to organize. Profits were so high in the 1960s and worker protests so stubborn that real wages doubled between 1959 and 1970.

Birth of Workers' Commissions

The first Workers' Commission (Comisiones Obreras) for which data exist was organized at the La Camocha mine in Asturias in 1957. According to Marcelino Camacho (1976), "communist workers, socialists, the priest and the mayor of the workers' quarter of La Camocha, who was a falangist, took part." Given that the OSE was useless to workers, this practice of electing a local committee extended to other workplaces. Once a specific problem was solved, then the commission dissolved.

The internal contradictions of the dictatorship also helped the commissions develop. The failure of autarchy meant that some capitalists rebelled against the imposition, through the OSE at a state-wide level, of wages and conditions. It was an inefficient, rigid system. They wanted powers to make local productivity agreements. Their lobbying resulted in the 1958 Collective Bargaining Act, which permitted collective bargaining with OSE representatives elected by the workers. The existence of these representatives, known as enlaces sindicales (union links), gave business a certain margin for local negotiation. It meant too that workers could elect non-falangist representatives. "We didn't like taking part in these state-controlled structures," explained Cipriano García, leader of the commissions in Catalonia, "but we had to take advantage of any crack that appeared in the system."

In these commissions, maximum democracy was a precondition of survival. If militants organizing in workplaces were isolated, they could easily be sacked or arrested. To achieve the participation needed in a climate of fear and repression, militants had to discuss carefully with every fellow-worker and then debate proposals fully in assemblies. Paradoxically, at the start of the 1960s, under Europe's most repressive regime, more advanced forms of direct democracy were developed than in the bureaucratized unions of Europe's parliamentary democracies.

The prewar unions UGT (General Workers Union – socialist) and CNT (National Labor Federation – anarchist) and the front set up by the PCE (Spanish Communist Party), the Oposición Sindical Obrero (Workers' Union Opposition), had failed in the 1950s to take root in workplaces. Workers trying desperately to survive found these organizations too closely identified with dangerous political commitment. The commissions, however, were successful because they were organizations forged by workforces themselves for specific purposes.

Consolidation of Commissions

The strikes throughout the state in 1961 and 1962 saw a second stage in the development of the workers commissions. These included a strike in a city of reactionary tradition such as Granada, a two-month strike in Asturias (with solidarity actions in Madrid), and a general strike in Bizkaia (Euskadi) that broke the government wage freeze.

In this wave of strikes the ephemeral workers' commissions, organized some years before, arose again. Soon, commissions were being set up in other parts of the state. Many now became more permanent structures, though they maintained their democratic character. Max Gallo wrote that the commissions were an original and spontaneous creation of the Spanish working class, born of its experience and bearing witness to its strong democratic traditions. Delegates elected at one meeting could be dismissed at the next. These committees were not the fruit of any one political trend, but naturally militants, whether Communist, Socialist or Catholic, were involved, and the Communist Party tried to establish them throughout the country. (Gallo 1973: 289)

A third stage in the development of the commissions can be identified from 1964, when the first coordinating group of plant-based commissions was created in Bizkaia, followed by similar coordination in Madrid and Catalonia. In this period, links between workplaces were strengthened. Increasingly, too, alongside workplace demands, more political aims were expressed, such as calls for trade union rights and democratization.

Marcelino Camacho, communist and central leader of the commissions, described how in Madrid, in September 1964, some 500 enlaces from the main engineering companies elected in assembly a 13-person commission to negotiate their demand for a 20 percent wage rise. The commission then met every Wednesday in the offices of the vertical union. However, no one came to consult the OSE full-timers, but the commission. “Its birth was spontaneous,” explains Camacho, “but it was also the culmination of several years’ experience, of factory commissions, of contacts through the Paloma Union School.” This example of the engineering workers then spread to other sectors. Barcelona saw a similar process.

This was a new, young working class, migrated from the countryside and without prejudices or taboos. Unlike the Civil War generation, they were undefeated.

Table 1 Changes in the structure of Spanish society under Francoism

	1950	1975
Service sector	25% of the economy	40%
Industry	26%	38%
Agriculture	47%	20%

Source: Gallo (1973)

Table 2 Distribution of the working population in sectors

Year	Agriculture	Industry	Services
1940	50.52%	22.13%	27.35%
1950	47.57%	26.55%	25.88%
1960	39.70%	32.98%	27.32%
1967	27.90%	38.20%	34.00%

Source: Gallo (1973)

Another key factor in the commissions’ consolidation as permanent structures was “the idea that the catacombs represent the death of the mass movement” (Camacho 1976), i.e., it was essential to flee clandestinity whenever possible. Thus the commissions looked for legal meeting places, often in OSE offices and even, on occasion in Madrid, in the premises of José Antonio Circles (José Antonio was the founder of the Falange).

Several political forces coexisted in the commissions, but the main force was the PCE. Its policies of organizing guerrilla bands (abandoned in 1948) and then a union front (1950s) failed. Its call for a Peaceful National Strike in 1959 failed spectacularly: it showed that the party’s leaders in exile were out of touch with reality inside Spain. The decision to enter the vertical union and take advantage of this space to promote the commissions was taken by militants on the ground and then endorsed by the overseas leadership. The policy made the PCE the leading force in the internal opposition by the 1960s.

In the 1966 union elections, the tactic of infiltrating the OSE bore spectacular fruit. In Barcelona, for instance, 75 percent of the new workplace representatives were young and had not previously formed part of the official structures, which strongly suggests they were workers’ commissions supporters. The broad success of the 1966 candidacies threatened the regime. Many representatives had their credentials withdrawn in March 1967. Three years of increased repression followed, which halted the slow process of constructing an organizational fabric. Arrest, torture, and sackings were again the order of the day. Despite these reverses and the blow to the young movement’s optimism, illegalization did not long diminish combativeness. This started rising in 1969, with 491 strikes, and in 1970 with 1,547. Following the reverses, the response became more politicized.

The success of the PCE within the commissions meant certain pressure on other groups. Democracy within the commissions had been due to the requirements of the situation. In itself, the PCE was a hierarchical organization in the Stalinist tradition, with no culture of debating different lines of thought. Its line of National Reconciliation, defended since the mid-1950s and by which it meant a grand alliance of all sectors of Spanish society against the regime, brought it into conflict with many militants and revolutionary groups within the commissions. For instance, the Frente de Liberación Popular (People’s Liberation Front) (FLP), born in the 1956 student struggles, believed Spain was ripe for socialist revolution and found itself marginalized by the PCE within the commissions.

The Socialist Party, with the exception of the UGT’s traditional feud in Bizkaia, took little part in the workers’ struggle. It used Cold War rhetoric to justify its refusal to work alongside communists. The anarchists saw the commissions as collaborationist and thus condemned themselves to irrelevance. The other factor was left-nationalist forces, especially in Euskadi, where ETA (founded 1959) came to prominence in 1968 with the assassination of the San Sebastián police chief and torturer, Melitón Manzanás. ETA (Basque Land and Freedom) was an urban guerrilla band, inspired by Algeria and the Cuban Revolution. After the Burgos trial of December 1970 it had a considerable effect on the mass movement. In Euskadi in the early 1970s

ETA had the strength to call general strikes and gave the opposition throughout the state enormous confidence with its assassination of the president of the government, Admiral Carrero Blanco, on December 21, 1973.

Last Years of the Dictatorship

After the repression of 1967 and 1968, struggles such as the broad mobilizations against the Burgos trial (which included enormous international pressure on the regime) and the development of neighborhood associations demanding basic services such as transport, sewerage, and water, meant that industrial struggles were not so isolated. In Catalonia, the founding of the Assembly of Catalonia to fight for democratic and Catalan national rights in 1971 united much broader sectors than the workers' movement.

Unlike the 1950s, repression in the 1970s tended to deepen struggles. A vivid example is the killing by the Civil Guard of Pedro Patiño in Madrid while he was distributing leaflets during the September 1971 building strike. The response was the extension of the strike. Similarly, the police murder of a worker at the St. Adrià del Besòs (Barcelona) Power Station not only did not break a 1973 strike, but led to a General Strike in the cities of Cerdanyola and Ripollet, extended by the worker commissions' networks. Fear was still strong and universal, but anger against the regime and confidence in the possibility of victory overcame fear. A sign of the radicalization of the workers' movement in these last years of the dictatorship was the growing number of solidarity strikes.

In October 1971, 7,000 workers at Barcelona's SEAT car factory occupied the plant. The police tried to evict them, but the workers defended themselves with high-pressure hoses. Many bosses saw the regime's brutality as an obstacle: to avoid strikes, negotiation with directly elected workers' representatives became common.

The policy of Carrero Blanco, president of the government since 1969 and Franco's chosen successor, was in difficulties. Increased repression failed to break the workers' and opposition movements. Even the use, from 1971 on, of paramilitaries – often off-duty cops – to beat and murder opposition militants, failed to stop resistance. Towards the end of 1973, Carrero's government prepared a show-trial of ten leaders of workers commissions for unlawful assembly (known as the 1,001 trial, for the number of years in prison the prosecution demanded). It seemed that Carrero had not learnt the lesson of Burgos: big trials galvanize and unite the opposition.

In 1974, encouraged by Carrero's assassination and uncowed by the jailing of the "1,001" defendants, the mass movement advanced again. The world energy crisis and 25 percent inflation were eroding wage packets. Whereas, before 1974, strikes were limited to mines and large industry – the classical working class – now they spread to wider sectors. Bank workers, teachers, and employees in offices and smaller plants began to move.

1975 was the year Franco's regime unraveled. The country's 300,000 university students were at boiling point all year. Madrid building workers and Catalonia's engineering industry saw the biggest strikes. ETA continued active and various General Strikes were called in the Basque Country: three in September to try and stop the September 27 executions of two ETA and three FRAP militants.

Franco died on November 20 amid maximum disorder: after the September executions, mass protests throughout Europe (four embassies burnt, withdrawals of several ambassadors, EEC suspending trade with Spain); a disorganized withdrawal from the "Spanish" Sahara; army machine-gun emplacements on the streets of Basque cities; student and worker assemblies having to defend themselves against armed attacks by fascist groups such as the Warriors of Christ the King; police occupation of the streets.

1975–77: Rapid Reform to Douse Workers' Struggle

King Juan Carlos replaced Franco, but the longed-for change did not come at once. It required another huge effort from the working class to force the ruling class to dismantle the regime and install a parliamentary democracy.

The level of strikes in 1975 and 1976 was the highest in Europe, precisely in the country where strikes were forbidden and repression was extremely violent. In 1976, 110 million hours of work were lost to strikes. In Euskadi, where the demands for national rights and amnesty for political prisoners intertwined with workers' struggles, there were 13 general strikes between January 1976 and May 1977, always inseparable from huge demonstrations, paramilitary murders, and clashes with the police.

This caused the ruling class to move rapidly towards parliamentary democracy, fearful that the mass movement could expel the restored monarchy, as had happened in Athens in 1974, or enter a revolutionary process, as occurred in Portugal from April 1974. In this emergency for the ruling class, the PSOE (Socialist Party) and PCE gave their support to the king's new president of the government, Adolfo Suárez. They accepted the monarchy, restrained activity in the streets and, in general, agreed to a transition controlled from above to a limited Spanish democracy, to avoid (in their view) another military coup. There was no open constituent process: the coming of democracy was totally controlled by Suárez and other "reformists" coming out of the Franco dictatorship.

In the state-wide strikes at the start of 1976 for wage rises in the middle of galloping inflation, Madrid was paralyzed in February. The army was mobilized to break the underground train strike. Postal, building, and engineering workers were out at the same time. Even Madrid's theaters struck. In Andalusia the workers' movement was reborn in these first six months of 1976.

The struggles reached their peak in the city of Vitoria during the first nine weeks of the year. Previously, Vitoria had experienced little of the mass mobilizations that shook the rest of Euskadi. Here the PCE had a smaller base, allowing the revolutionary left (mainly Maoist in orientation) to rival it during the 1976 events. The conflict started on January 9 in most of the city's big companies. The Vitoria Workers' Coordinating Committee had drawn up demands in assembly that were then taken out and argued for in all the factories. The Platform's central demands were the 40-hour week and to end the government's wage freeze. Other demands were extremely radical, such as retirement at 60 on full pay.

Several companies settled in a few days, but in a dozen plants the conflict radicalized over the succeeding weeks. Assemblies controlled the struggle from below, serving as a school in democracy for inexperienced workers. There were near-daily assemblies of each workforce, with power of recall over delegates to the Coordinating Committee.

Women's assemblies (most strikers were men) organized their own pickets and demonstrations. Assemblies of students, neighborhoods, and workers not on strike were organized to achieve the widest possible unity, leading to three city-wide one-day general strikes and mass demonstrations. The bosses' attempt to reopen the factories mid-February with scabs and massive deployment of armed police failed.

After 60 days on strike, a city-wide General Strike was called for March 3. Shops and schools shut down. Barricades were raised against police attacks. At 5 p.m., the police surrounded a church with 5,000 workers in General Assembly, hurled in smoke bombs and then fired live bullets at people escaping. Five people were killed. In subsequent days, police occupation of the city and mass arrests of leaders led to a return to work. Despite this military defeat, the workers succeeded in breaking the wage freeze, achieved effective direct negotiation with the bosses (marginalizing the OSE), and won the readmission of sacked workers and the rights of strike and assembly. The police killings led on March 8 to the biggest strike in Euskadi since the 1930s.

Vitoria scared Spain's ruling class. The king moved quickly to sack Franco's appointee Arias Navarro as president of the government. Adolfo Suárez was sworn in on July 3 with the brief to introduce democracy as quickly as possible. Vitoria, the climax of all these years of multiple struggles against the dictatorship, showed that it was the workers' struggles that forced the end of the dictatorship, and not the good-heartedness of Suárez or the king. These reformed Franco's regime to avoid a new Republic or a more radical democracy.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism, Spain; Confederación Nacional del Trabajo (CNT); Mondragon Collective; Mujeres Libres; POUM (Workers' Party of Marxist Unification); Spanish Revolution

References and Suggested Readings

- Ariza, Julián (1976) Comisiones Obreras. Madrid: Avance/Mañana.
- Balfour, Sebastian (1989) Dictatorship, Workers and the City: Labour in Greater Barcelona since 1939. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Camacho, Marcelino (1976) Charlas en la prisión. Barcelona: Laia.
- Gallo, Max (1973) Spain Under Franco. London: George Allen & Unwin.
- Guindal, Mariano & Giménez, Juan H. (1976) El libro negro de Vitoria. Madrid: Ediciones 99.
- Morán, Gregorio (1986) Miseria y grandeza del Partido Comunista de España. Barcelona: Planeta.
- Sartorius, Nicolás (1975) El Resurgir del Movimiento Obrero. Barcelona: Laia.
- Sartorius, Nicolás & Alfaya, Javier (1999) La memoria insumisa. Madrid: Espasa.
- Sartorius, Nicolás & Sabio, Alberto (2007) El final de la dictadura. Madrid: Temas de hoy.

Anti-Japanese boycotts, early 20th century

J. Megan Greene

In the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries China was subjected to a series of humiliations perpetrated by western and Japanese imperialist nations. China lost wars against British, French, international, and Japanese armies, and as a consequence was compelled to open its markets to foreign products, transform its approach to diplomacy, pay large indemnities, and cede control of numerous territories to foreign powers. Beginning in 1905, Chinese citizens increasingly responded to these humiliations with boycotts of foreign-made goods. Although the first such boycott was in response to United States exclusion laws that severely limited the number of Chinese that could enter the United States, most of the boycotts that followed over the next four decades were aimed at the Japanese. These boycotts were acts of protest against imperialist encroachment, but at the same time they served to mobilize nationalism among Chinese consumers of all social backgrounds.

Ever since the eighteenth century, when European and American traders were severely restricted by the Chinese imperial court in the manner in which they could conduct business in China, trade had been a point of contention between China and the West. In the nineteenth century, western powers gradually turned what had been an unfavorable trading relationship to their own advantage, first by developing an illicit opium trade, and later by waging war against the Qing to defend their economic interests. The treaties that concluded the Opium War in 1842 and subsequent altercations between China and the foreign powers had as centerpieces a series of provisions that opened Chinese markets to foreign access through the establishment of so-called "treaty ports" and the elimination of other trade barriers. Although foreign states imposed themselves on China in a number of other visible ways, most notably by seizing direct control of Chinese territories such as Hong Kong, parts of Shanghai, Taiwan, Shandong, and Manchuria, it was through the increasing distribution of foreign consumer goods in the Chinese marketplace that most Chinese came into contact with the foreign powers. For this reason, it is perhaps logical that protest against and resistance to foreign imperialism increasingly manifested itself through boycotts in the early twentieth century.

Major boycotts occurred in 1905, 1908, 1909, 1915, 1919, 1923, 1925, 1928, 1931, and then more steadily until the end of the Sino-Japanese War in 1945. These events, far from being spontaneous protests against foreign mistreatment, were part of a sustained and increasingly well organized movement that aimed, above all, at building and mobilizing Chinese nationalism. Although these boycotts were not always especially economically effective (in 1905 overall trade between the United States and China actually increased, though most of that new trade was not in the areas most affected by the boycotts), they were effective at building nationalism through anti-foreign protest.

Japan became the primary focus of boycotts, in addition to other sorts of protest, in 1915, as a consequence of the Twenty-One Demands. These demands represented an overt attempt by the Japanese government to extend its economic and political influence in China, particularly in north China. Among other things, the Japanese demanded part ownership of a large Chinese iron and coal works, the right to station police officers and economic advisors in north China, and commercial rights in coastal territories. Chinese observers were offended by Japan's unobtrusive imperialistic advances, but they were equally appalled by the failure of China's republican government to repel the Japanese advances. The event thus generated a nationalistic, anti-Japanese anger that could be mobilized by nationalist activists and Chinese capitalists alike. Continued Japanese advances upon Chinese territories, especially during the 1930s, provided further fodder for boycotts and anti-Japanese protest.

The boycott constituted a powerful way for Chinese outside the government to express political views toward foreign powers in an environment in which the state was so weak as to be unable to resist Japanese advances. Boycotts were typically organized in China's major port cities and spread between them. Organizers included student groups, patriotic associations, and merchant associations, such as the National Products Preservation Association, which were eager to capitalize on an opportunity to increase the market for their own goods.

Since boycotters were encouraged to change their own habits of consumption by substituting Chinese products for foreign-made products, the beneficiaries of boycotts were often Chinese merchants and manufacturers. Many merchants, therefore, used nationalistic, anti-Japanese or anti-foreign strategies to market their goods. For example, in 1915 many merchants began to use the numbers 5–9 on their product labels to remind buyers of the humiliating date (May 9, 1915) on which the Japanese had submitted their Twenty-One Demands to China. These strategies not only helped Chinese merchants to sell their goods, they also constantly reminded buyers of China's national humiliation and reinforced the patriotic sentiment behind the boycotts. Even as boycotts themselves flagged, therefore, the heightened patriotic consciousness that they had aroused tended to remain in areas that had been active in boycotts, and this consciousness was easily revived when new reasons for boycotts presented themselves.

Boycotts constituted an important mode of protest for Chinese citizens in an era during which the Chinese state was quite weak and Chinese territory was being lost to imperialist aggressors, most notably the Japanese. Through boycotts, nationalistic consciousness was raised, populations were mobilized for political and economic action, and Chinese goods were sold.

SEE ALSO: China, May 4th Movement; Chinese Nationalist Revolution, 1911

References and Suggested Readings

Karl, G. (2003) China Made: Consumer Culture and the Creation of the Nation. Cambridge, MA: Harvard East Asia Monographs.

Anti-monarchy protests, Portugal

Javier A. Galván

Initially struggling to retain its independence in the Iberian Peninsula, Portugal emerged as a global power during the European Age of Discovery. Dynastic difficulties and a faltering system led to the demise of the monarchy. During the 1900s Portugal had three main forces of protest and revolution. First, the general population compelled the king to abdicate in 1910. However, the first attempt to run a republic failed rather quickly, and an authoritarian government took over in 1928. Second, following a long dictatorship of almost fifty years, the Portuguese, led by a worker's movement, toppled fascism with a massive populist revolution. Third, one of the largest sources of economic and political tension for Portugal in the late 1900s was the effectiveness of retaining its overseas colonies in Africa and Asia. The constant revolts in the colonies contributed to the overall coup d'état to overthrow the dictatorship in 1974.

Early Struggles

Portugal became an independent nation in 1143, when the king of Leon and Castille, Alfonso VII, recognized the country of Portugal's independence under King Afonso I. Afonso I and his successors, with the assistance of military monastic Orders, worked to expel the Moors from the Iberian Peninsula to expand Portuguese territory. The Portuguese Reconquista ended in 1249, when forces reached the southern coast of the Algarve. In 1383, when Ferdinand I, king of Portugal, died without a male heir, the king of Castille, who was married to the daughter of the Portuguese king, claimed the right to the throne of Portugal. The lack of a suitable heir led to a popular revolt, leading to the 1383–5 Crisis, which was a chaotic period of civil war. John of Aviz, brother of Ferdinand I, with the support of General Nuno Alvares Pereira, petty noblemen, and the common people, won the Battle of Aljubarrota, defeating Castille, and later ascending to the Portuguese throne in 1385 as John I. The battle is one of the most celebrated victories in Portuguese history, symbolic of the struggle for independence against Spain.

Development of a Global Empire

Portugal emerged as one of the leaders of the European Age of Discovery. Prince Henry, known as the Navigator, was an early and famous royal patron of exploration. In 1415 Portugal conquered Ceuta in North Africa to begin its global empire. Following Ceuta, Portugal accumulated territory in the Atlantic, including Madeira and the Azores, which in turn fostered colonization movements. During the fifteenth century Portuguese sailors sailed along the coast of Africa, establishing trade and supply stations along the route, in search of a passage to India to secure trade of desirable commodities, such as spices. Portugal later used these stations for slaving purposes and to expand its colonial presence in Africa. Vasco de Gama reached India successfully in 1498, leading to a period of Portuguese economic prosperity. In 1500 Pedro Alvares Cabral claimed Brazil for Portugal. In 1510 Portugal expanded its global empire in the Indian Ocean and South Atlantic, seizing Goa, Ormuz, and Malacca.

Renewed Spanish Control

King Sebastian of Portugal died in battle in Morocco. Since he did not have an heir, Philip II of Spain claimed the Portuguese throne. From 1580 to 1640 Philip II of Spain ruled Portugal separately as Philip I. In 1640 the future John IV of Portugal led a revolt with the aid of the Portuguese nobility to establish the House of Braganza. The Portuguese Empire was already on the decline by this time, losing in competition to Britain and the Netherlands. This trend would continue into the twentieth century, particularly after the devastating loss of Brazil, which attained independence in 1822.

Political Chaos and Civil Wars

The period from the reign of Maria I in 1777 to the end of the Liberal Wars in 1834 is marred by political chaos that weakened the absolutist regime in Portugal and paved the way for the country's initial attempts to establish a constitutional monarchy and then a democratic system of government.

Spain invaded Portugal in 1801 with French aid (War of the Oranges), although French forces did not arrive until after the invasion, since it was so quick. Portugal refused to join Napoleon I's continental blockade due to a longstanding Anglo-Portuguese alliance. In 1807 France and Spain reached an agreement partitioning Portugal into Northern Lusitania (to be governed by the former king of Etruria), the Algarves area and territory south of the Tagus to be ruled by Spanish General Manuel de Goody, while the rest of Portugal would be ruled by France. To impose the partition Napoleon I invaded Portugal in 1807, forcing the royal family to flee to Brazil. Anglo-Portuguese resistance forces, under the command of the Duke of Wellington, managed to hold off three French invasions, despite some French success in northern Portugal.

Britain governed Portugal while the royal family was abroad. However, John VI of Portugal demonstrated little interest in leaving Brazil. Furthermore, Brazil traded directly with other European powers, financially circumventing Portuguese economic interests. Discontent brewed in Portugal, leading to a series of protests culminating in the Liberal Revolution of Oporto in 1820. Revolutionaries demanded the royal family's return to Portugal, the establishment of a constitutional monarchy, and the return of Brazil to colony status (thereby limiting Brazil's trade to Portugal). The British governorship was replaced by a provisional junta, which called for a Constituent Cortes to write a constitution in 1821. John VI returned to Portugal, leaving his heir, Peter, in charge of Brazil. In September 1821 the Cortes voted to reduce Brazil to colony status and ordered the return of Peter to Europe. Meanwhile, Brazil petitioned Peter to remain. Portuguese troops were sent to Brazil and Brazilian units were placed under Portuguese command. Tensions mounted between Portuguese and Brazilian soldiers when Peter vowed to remain in Brazil. Following an uprising forcing Portuguese troops from Brazil and the Portuguese government's declaration of such acts as traitorous, Peter declared Brazil independent and himself king.

Peter's brother Michael supported an attempt to restore absolute rule in Portugal (the Vilafancada Revolution). The revolution was in part against his father, John VI, who supported the new constitution. Under force, John VI returned to an absolutist system. Michael attempted to manipulate his father's abdication in 1823, resulting in the Abrilada rebellion in which Michael attempted to seize the throne. John VI sought British assistance and he exiled Michael. John VI reestablished a liberal government, recognizing Brazil's independence and restoring Peter's right to the Portuguese throne before dying in 1826. Following John VI's death, a regency junta was established under his daughter.

In 1826 Peter accepted the Portuguese throne as Peter IV. The Brazilian constitution limited him from ruling both Portugal and Brazil. Consequently, he abdicated his right to the Portuguese throne in favor of his daughter, whom he betrothed to his brother-in-exile, Michael. Peter IV had approved a revised version of the 1822 constitution, which was hoped to serve as a compromise between liberals and absolutists. Michael returned to Portugal as king, and with the support of absolutist members of the nobility and the church, deposed the liberal constitution and its bicameral legislature, and recalled the Cortes of the three estates to elect him king. Michael's actions initiated the Liberal Wars, or Portuguese Civil War. Liberals rebelled, but were ultimately suppressed.

Peter returned to Portugal with an Anglo-Portuguese force to face his brother in the Liberal Wars, leaving his son to rule Brazil. The May 1834 Battle of Aceiceira was the last and decisive engagement of the Portuguese Civil War, resulting in Peter IV's victory. Michael was exiled with a pension, barred from the Portuguese succession. Peter restored the liberal constitution before his death in 1834; his daughter assumed the Portuguese throne as Maria II. As a result, liberal ideas became entrenched in Portugal.

Following the Civil War, however, the Portuguese monarchy failed to bring stability to the country and lost influence due to generals' coups and the growth of republicanism. Charles I imposed a dictatorship-like government in the person of João Franco.

Overthrow of the Monarchy

Portugal began the twentieth century with a revolution to depose its king. In 1908 republican revolutionaries killed Charles I and his son in Lisbon to end the power of the monarchy. The youngest son, Manuel II, assumed the throne, but revolutionary movements overthrew him in 1910. The main drive to remove the king was a general feeling of economic stagnation, the deterioration of the infrastructure, and overall lack of opportunities in Portugal. The result was a new government in the form of a republic, in which people could elect their own leaders. However, the new political system of government did not necessarily solve the nation's economic problems.

Portugal experienced the emergence of a conservative ideology after 1914. Its proponents supported religious-based values and despised liberal ideas in society, the economy, and politics. This movement, known as the Integralismo Lusitano (Lusitanian or Portuguese Integralism), developed a strong nationalistic ethic among the general masses, especially young people. The Integralism movement developed into Portuguese fascism following examples offered by the legacies of Italian and Spanish fascism. By the late 1920s fascism became increasingly popular among the middle and upper classes, as well as the intellectuals in Portugal. Portugal's first experience with democracy was not successful. The political leaders faced numerous minor revolts, both by civilian groups and military officers.

SEE ALSO: Fascism, Protest and Revolution; Portugal, Carnation Revolution, 1974

References and Suggested Readings

- Anderson, J. M. (2000) The History of Portugal. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.
- Birmingham, D. (1993) A Concise History of Portugal. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- De Figueiredo, A. (1976) Portugal: Fifty Years of Dictatorship. New York: Holmes & Meier.
- Marques, A. H. de Oliveira (1976) History of Portugal. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Sobel, L. A. (Ed.) (1976) Portuguese Revolution, 1974–1976. New York: Facts of Life.

Anti-Napoleonic Wars of Liberation (1813–1815)

Martina G. Lüke

The Wars of Liberation ended the period of revolutionary and post-revolutionary wars in Europe since 1792 and the French occupation in Germany, Italy, and Spain. They are part of the Napoleonic Wars and the War of the Sixth Coalition.

The end of the Holy Roman Empire in 1806 and the political change of large territories and states initiated a series of reforms in Germany, particularly in Prussia. Political leaders such as Baron Karl vom und zum Stein and Count Karl August von Hardenberg and military reformers such as Carl von Clausewitz and Gerhard Johann David von Scharnhorst believed in the potential of insurrection rationalizing popular concepts of the French Revolutionary and the Napoleonic Wars of “nation in arms” through the enthusiasm of mass armies. At the same time, the oppression by France and the economic impact of the embargo in continental trade with England, as well as the impact of the cult of patriotism during the French Revolution, led to a new spirit of nationalism. This provided additional possibilities for irregular operations, as seen in the Spanish guerilla tactics in the Peninsular Campaigns (1808–9 and 1810–12). Similarly, Austria's attempt to challenge Napoleon I (1809) led to independent military actions such as those by Prussian Major Ferdinand von Schill, who without orders left Berlin to start an insurrection, or the Duke of Brunswick-Oels, who rallied to Austria's support. Tyroleans took up arms against Bavaria, the French ally in the Confederation of the Rhine. Nevertheless, these uprisings failed.

However, when in late 1812 the extent of the devastating results of Napoleon's retreat from Moscow and the collapse of the Grande Armée became apparent, the crisis with France developed. At the Convention of Tauroggen (December 30, 1812), Prussian commander Johann Ludwig Graf Yorck von Wartenburg, in a revolutionary act unheard of in the absolutist state, signed an agreement with the Russian General Hans Karl von Diebitsch guaranteeing neutrality. Prussian King Friedrich Wilhelm III opposed Yorck and gave orders to remove him from command and arrest him. At the same time, without prior permission from the king, vom Stein began to mobilize resources and helped to form the Landsturm (home guard) and Landwehr (militia) that declared war on the French. Finally, the state of Prussia agreed to a full military alliance with Russia and signed the Treaty of Kalisch on February 25, 1813. Friedrich Wilhelm III established the decoration of the Iron Cross in remembrance of the queen of Prussia on March 10 and called for the establishment of Free Corps. Patriotic proclamations by the king, such as the declaration of war against France on March 16 and the "Appeal to My People!" on March 17, in which he called for sacrifices from all classes, led to public uprisings and large numbers of volunteers. All former exemptions and privileges on military service were abolished and universal military conscriptions in the meaning of the French principle of the levée en masse became law. With the slogan "I gave gold for iron," millions of Taler for military insurgency were spontaneously collected. Literature and music further spread the word of a war of liberation and patriotic feelings. This enthusiasm was not shared by other German states. Austrian leader

Prince Klemens von Metternich vacillated in joining the coalition against Napoleon I due to the revolutionary dimensions of the people's fight for freedom and the new Hapsburg-Bonaparte dynasty. In the summer and fall of 1813, however, Austria, joined by Britain and Sweden, entered the alliance of Russia and Prussia. Napoleon's states in Northern Germany and the Confederation of the Rhine began to dissolve.

The autumn campaign led to the battle of the Nations in Leipzig (October 16–19, 1813), the largest battle in the Napoleonic Wars, which ended with the military defeat of Napoleon I and the end of his political dominance in Central Europe. In the early months of 1814 Napoleon was driven back to Paris. The city was conquered and occupied by coalition forces on March 31. In the First Treaty of Paris (May 30), France was established in the borders of 1792. Napoleon I was banished to the island of Elba, and the house of Bourbon was restored with the enthronement of Louis XVIII as king of France. The Congress of Vienna (October 1814–June 1815) at the end of the Napoleonic Wars restored the old regimes in Europe. The Congress was briefly interrupted when Napoleon I escaped from Elba and reestablished his regime in March 1815. The Allies Austria, Britain, Russia, and Prussia immediately promised to fight until the defeat of Napoleon. Field Marshals Arthur Wellesley Duke of Wellington and Gerhard Leberecht Blücher were able to halt Napoleon's first attack. The decision came as result of the battle of Waterloo (also known as the battle of Belle-Alliance), southwest of Brussels, on June 18, 1815, when Blücher arrived to support Wellington's troops. Cavalry by Neithardt von Gneisenau pursued and dissolved the remains of the French army. Napoleon I was forced into his second and final abdication. The second Treaty of Paris (November 20) restored France in the borders of 1790.

The impacts of the Wars of Liberation included, amongst others, new tactics and realities of war. The patriotism of the allies was reflected in annual celebrations in 1814 and 1815 and centennial events. They also served in subsequent decades as important historical events for national identification, tradition, and myth. In World Wars I and II poetry and declarations of this time were in circulation, while movies in particular were used as propaganda during World War II.

SEE ALSO: Bonaparte, Napoleon (1769–1821); Enlightenment, France, 18th Century; French Revolution, 1789–1794; Schill, Ferdinand Baptista von (1776–1809)

References and Suggested Readings

- Koch, H. W. (1998) Die Befreiungskriege. 1807–1815. Napoleon gegen Deutschland und Europa. Berg am Starnberger See: Verlagsgesellschaft Berg.
- Leggiere, M. V. (2002) Napoleon and Berlin: The Franco-Prussian War in North Germany, 1813. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press.
- Nipperdey, T. (1993) Deutsche Geschichte. 1800–1866. Bürgermelt und starker Staat. Munich: C. H. Beck.
- Riley, J. P. (2000) Napoleon and the World War of 1813: Lessons in Coalition War Fighting. London: Routledge.
- Rotheberg, G. E. (1980) The Art of Warfare in the Age of Napoleon. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

Anti-nuclear campaign, Britain

Stacy Warner Maddern

Opposition to nuclear weapons emerged in Britain in 1955 following the government's announcement that it would manufacture a hydrogen bomb. In the midst of the Cold War, on July 9, 1955, Bertrand Russell issued the Russell–Einstein Manifesto, which targeted the dangers posed by nuclear weapons and urged world leaders to find alternative peaceful methods to resolve international conflict. This manifesto became the basis for the Pugwash Conferences on Scientific and World Affairs, which brought together a group of scholars to seek solutions that might reduce armed conflict and global security threats. In 1957, the issue of nuclear disaster was further exposed when J. B. Priestley published an article in the New Statesmen entitled “Russia, the Atom and the West,” which suggested an imminent threat to Britain.

In 1957, the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament (CND) was founded in Britain and elected Bertrand Russell as its president. It was centered on a “ban the bomb” movement and originally planned to work in collaboration with Britain's main opposition party, the Labour Party, to organize an H-Bomb Campaign Committee within parliament. However, the movement was overtaken by enthusiastic public support that made it a mass movement. Five thousand people attended its inaugural meeting on February 17, 1958, and a few hundred participated in the march to Downing Street that followed.

Between 1958 and 1962, CND was joined by a diverse selection of society from the working class to scientists and religious leaders. Other organizations, such as the British Peace Committee, Direct Action Committee, and National Committee for the Abolition of Nuclear Weapons Tests, all lent their support. At Easter 1958, CND organized a march to Aldermaston that attracted tens of thousands of people. “Ban the Bomb,” the chief slogan of CND, became a central icon of the youth peace movement of the 1960s.

In 1960 Bertrand Russell resigned from CND to organize the Committee of 100, which went on to become active in several political campaigns from the Vietnam War to homelessness in the United Kingdom. The Committee of 100 made a practice of civil disobedience, creating public criticism and eventually affecting the image of other protest movements like CND. After the passing of the Cuban Missile Crisis, public concern over nuclear weapons began to wane, and with it interest in CND.

In the 1980s CND experienced a resurgence as the Labour Party, gaining in the political polls, became committed to policies of unilateral nuclear disarmament. On October 26, 1980, some 70,000 people assembled at Trafalgar Square in London to protest the continued nuclear crisis. These developments reorganized and rejuvenated CND, resulting in new branches, local anti-missile groups, women's groups, and an array of scientists and university scholars joining a movement that was larger than that of the 1950s. Social historian and political activist E. P. Thompson and a host of others began to criticize the global policies of the United States and the Soviet Union, suggesting that British soil was now at risk of preemptive strikes as a result of the nuclear arms race.

Today, CND remains active in protest of the possible threat of nuclear disaster. Its current campaigns include a “No to Trident Replacement” protest over Britain's most recent nuclear technology, “No to NATO,” and assertive opposition to the use of nuclear power.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Nuclear Movement, Japan; Anti-Nuclear Protest Movements; Anti-Nuclear Protests, Marshall Islands; Russell, Bertrand (1872–1970); Thompson, Edward Palmer (E. P.) (1924–1993)

References and Suggested Readings

- Parkin, F. (1968) Middle-Class Radicalism: The Social Basis of the British Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament. New York: Praeger.
- Steck, H. (1965) The Reemergence of Ideological Politics in Great Britain: The Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament. Western Political Quarterly 18, 1 (March).
- Thompson, E. P. & Smith, D. (1981) Protest and Survive. New York: Monthly Review Press.

Anti-nuclear movement, Japan

Masuro Sugai

Nuclear power is among the most crucial topics concerning Japan's democracy movement. Since the late 1940s, electricity companies have worked closely with the Japanese government in opposing local communities who seek to oppose nuclear power. The electric utility industry is exceptionally strong in Japan. Tokyo Electric Power Company (Tokyo Electric) is the largest private electricity company in the world.

The government and electric utility industry have long promoted the notion that nuclear power development would "do good to local communities" and "serve as part of a regional revitalization." In opposition, Japanese citizens have organized in localities to call for direct democracy, or "referendum movements," opposing indirect legislative measures to build nuclear facilities.

Consequently, since the late 1990s, acquiring new construction sites has become a more difficult task for promoters of nuclear power. Some nuclear proponents have resorted to enhancing the capacity of existing plants where communities are dependent on nuclear power, even as local opposition expands.

In Japan, the state has used nuclear power development to influence and shape national energy policy. Most municipalities chosen as sites for nuclear power plants or nuclear fuel recycling are dominated by conservative legislative assemblies. From the early 1960s to the early 1970s, public antagonism has grown in response to deception by the government and electricity companies. Often confronted by government police and riot squads, anti-nuclear protesters have forced the government and utility industry to consider issues of safety and the construction of new sites. In other instances, organizers have gathered petitions demanding plebiscites.

In the early 1960s a fishermen's campaign against Chubu Electric's Ashihama plant in Mie Prefecture resulted in mass protests and government arrests in Nagashima. But the protests also led to an inspection by Nakasone's ministry of international trade and industry in 1966, forcing Mie Prefecture's governor to address the issue of nuclear safety. By the late 1960s as rapid economic growth created severe pollution, a shift in public opinion against nuclear power emerged. Local residents of coastal and scenic seaside areas nationwide were suddenly opposed to nuclear power plant construction as farmers and fishing communities witnessed the damaging health and business consequences of industrial pollution. These coastal communities were the first to recognize the danger of nuclear power development and initiate independent opposition to the government/nuclear plans for what the government euphemistically called "regional revitalization."

By the late 1960s, the anti-nuclear power movement intensified more broadly as the Japan anti-pollution movement expanded throughout the country. The anti-nuclear movement began a protest campaign at several planned construction sites considered risks for radioactive contamination. The movement included local resistance in Onagawa Town in Miyagi Prefecture, Kariwa Village and Kashiwazaki City in Niigata Prefecture, and Ikata Town in Ehime Prefecture. However, residents of Tokyo, Osaka, and major urban centers remained somewhat indifferent to anti-nuclear power movements, in part due to propaganda campaigns by nuclear producers promoting new sources of energy as a means to rapid economic growth.

In 1970, just after Kansai Electric and Tokyo Electric began operating Tsuruga Plant Unit No. 1, Mihama Plant Unit No. 1, and Fukushima Plant Unit No. 1, artificially radioactive cobalt 60 was detected in Wakasa Bay as a result of leakage from the nuclear power facilities. In another scare, in September 1970, an accident caused a radiation leak in the nuclear-powered ship Mutsu, further drawing public attention and opposition to nuclear power.

In January 1974, the Japan Analytic Chemical Research Institute, commissioned to measure radiation in a port visited by a US Navy nuclear-powered vessel for environmental monitoring, was found to have fabricated data. Nonetheless, in June 1974, at the request of local nuclear power promoters, Prime Minister Kakuei Tanaka passed the Three Electric Utility Laws to counter strong opposition movements. The laws were designed to provide special subsidies for municipalities with electric power facilities, placing nuclear producers in an advantageous position.

In an effort to resolve what was becoming a national nuclear power crisis, the Atomic Energy Administrative Commission was created to revise the Atomic Energy Basic Law and divided the Commission into the Atomic Energy Commission and the Nuclear Safety Commission. From the outset, questions abounded as to the capability of the Nuclear Safety Commission, which appeared to act only in an advisory capacity. In March 1979, the Three Mile Island nuclear accident in the US stimulated a global movement in urban communities against nuclear power. In Japan, some 8,000 people engaged in direct action against nuclear power development, confronting armed squads hired by producers. In 1981, the local assembly of Kubokawa Town in Kochi Prefecture passed a referendum ordinance calling for a vote on nuclear power development for the first time in the country. No referendum was held, but construction plans for a nuclear plant were withdrawn.

Despite opposition, nuclear construction continued in the early 1980s. In April 1986, following the completion of the Rokkasho Village nuclear facility, the Chernobyl plant in the Ukraine exploded into flames. Serious radioactive contamination spread to Belarus and Russia, to Europe and beyond. In Japan, radioiodine was found to contaminate vegetables and milk. Intense anti-nuclear power movements emerged in European countries, notably in Germany, where Green Party members advocated the abolition of nuclear power generation.

Chernobyl also served as an impetus for denuclearization in Japan, as a growing number of urban residents joined anti-nuclear movements. One year after the accident, citizens vociferously protested an output adjustment test plan at Shikoku Electric's Ikata Plant. While the protest failed to reverse the national government's pro-nuclear policy, more local governments began refusing nuclear power. Notably, residents of Maki Town in Niigata Prefecture implemented a referendum, reversing the decision of the Electric Power Development Coordination Council to construct a plant in 1981. Even with the warnings that followed in the wake of the Chernobyl accident, Japan's nuclear safety continued to pose a risk, in some cases following smaller accidents, forcing the evacuation of residential communities and killing workers through radiation exposure.

In Niigata Prefecture, the residents of Kariwa Village and Kashiwazaki City launched a signature campaign against a nuclear facility. In May 2001, residents conducted a referendum rejecting the project in Kariwa Village. Subsequently, the mayor and governor declared a postponement of the program. In 2002, Tokyo Electric and other firms were implicated in covering up and fabricating accident data, damaging the industry's reputation in Japan.

In the early 2000s, arguments against nuclear power revolved around plans to build new facilities. While it is difficult for individuals to have direct influence on legislative and administrative policy, they have resisted plans for new plants through petition and referendum campaigns. In 1981, after debating nuclear power generation since 1969, Maki residents in Niigata Prefecture, despite fervent opposition, implemented a referendum on nuclear power for the first time in the country. The government and pro-nuclear power groups persistently criticized the Maki referendum as violating Japan's parliamentary democracy. However, citizens have been quick to charge that since nuclear power was not debated in the assembly, the referendum was necessary.

Since initial efforts in 1981, Maki residents have resisted nuclear power through referendums and recall initiatives. In 1995, 1997, and 1999 petitions were gathered for the recall of the pro-nuclear power town mayor and assembly members who had not revealed their support for nuclear plants while initially campaigning for office.

Nuclear power promoters have continued to use economic leverage to press public officials and local residents to support plant construction. As the deregulation of the electric business progressed in the 1990s and 2000s, the question of the permanent disposal of radioactive waste increases, in addition to the reprocessing costs in an earthquake-prone country.

As a result of the Maki referendum other such policies were enacted by other local governments in Japan, including Hokuriku Electric's Shiga plant sites in Togi Town in Ishikawa Prefecture and the Arahama Community in Kashiwazaki City. In 2001, another referendum was conducted by Kariwa Village to call for votes on the Plutonium-Thermal Project. Referendums are taken on a variety of nuclear and environmental issues, from construction of waste disposal plants and dams to installation of power lines and mobile phone relay antenna. The number of referendums increased rapidly beyond local areas in the early 2000s, expanding the municipal-level rebellion initiated with the historical referendum by Maki Town to the prefecture level.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Nuclear Campaign, Britain; Anti-Nuclear Protest Movements; Anti-Nuclear Protests, Marshall Islands; Japan, Resistance to Construction of Narita Airport; Nuclear-Free New Zealand, 1987

References and Suggested Readings

- Harrison, S. (1996) Japan's Nuclear Future: The Plutonium Debate and East Asian Security. Washington, DC: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.
- Helmar, K. (1992) Energy Politics and Schumpeter Dynamics: Japan's Policy Between Short-Term Wealth and Long-Term Global Welfare. Berlin: Springer Verlag.
- Kaku, M. (1989) Nuclear Power: Both Sides. New York: W. W. Norton.
- Sugai, M. (1995) The Community Chose Maki Town without Nuclear Power: Sovereign Power Resides with the Residents. Science/Society/Human Beings 58.

Anti-nuclear protest movements

Paul Rubinson

Residents of the planet Earth did not sit idly by as nations developed nuclear weapons capable of mass destruction during the twentieth century. Citizens of all nations demanded a damper on the nuclear arms race, resulting in arms control treaties that restricted the development, testing, and proliferation of nuclear weapons across the globe, extending even to Antarctica and outer space. And yet the true legacy of the anti-nuclear movement remains unclear. Its champions credit the movement with branding nuclear weapons with a mark of abhorrence that prevented their use. The movement's leading historian, Lawrence Wittner (1993), has argued that anti-nuclear activists shifted the geopolitical landscape away

In January 1991, five years after the radiation-releasing accident at the Chernobyl nuclear power plant in Ukraine, a crowd gathers to commemorate the countless victims and to protest nuclear power. Nearly 60 deaths were estimated to be directly related to the radiation leak. Other estimates suggest that around 4,000 people contracted cancer as a result. (Time & Life Pictures/Getty Images) from nuclear confrontation and the Cold War. According to Wittner, it was the world anti-nuclear movement that shook the foundations of the nation-state system, as “opponents of the Bomb, by subjecting it to an onslaught of criticism, helped turn public sentiment against the weapon and thereby made it politically less acceptable as an instrument of war and diplomacy” (pp. ix–x).

Skeptics posit that the movement was more coincidental than influential, and describe the anti-nuclear movement, and nuclear weapons themselves, as having coincided with the Cold War, but having had little role in its outcome.

Protests in the Atomic Age

Protest against nuclear weapons began even before the first atomic bomb had been created. Scientists working on the Manhattan Project, the US effort to build an atomic bomb, began to reconsider the wisdom of atomic weapons once Germany surrendered in May 1945. At the forefront of this current of thought was physicist Leo Szilard, who circulated a petition to Manhattan Project scientists opposing military use of the bomb. Szilard's petition read in part:

The development of atomic power will provide nations with new means of destruction. The atomic bombs at our disposal represent only the first step in this direction, and there is almost no limit to the destructive power which will become available in the course of their future development. Thus a nation which sets the precedent of using these newly liberated forces of nature for purposes of destruction may have to bear the responsibility of opening the door to an era of devastation on an unimaginable scale.

Biophysicist Eugene Rabinowitch, also a Manhattan Project scientist, worked with Szilard and James Franck on a report that recommended a demonstration of the bomb in front of Japanese officials rather than immediate military use of the bomb; a demonstration would thus provide the Japanese with a chance to surrender before the bomb would be used.

Szilard's petition and the Franck Report came to naught; Hiroshima was bombed on August 6, 1945 and Nagasaki on August 9. Japan consequently offered the first reactions to the direct effects of atomic weapons. In his speech of surrender, Japanese Emperor Hirohito told his subjects, "the heavy casualties are beyond measure. To continue the war further could lead in the end not only to the extermination of our race, but also to the destruction of all human civilization." In the ensuing years the Japanese people would voice consistent opposition to nuclear weapons. But the Japanese were not alone in seeing nuclear weapons as a threat to the entire human race.

In the United States, victory in World War II was muted by a newfound sense of fear at the very weapon that many credited with winning the war. Journalist Edward R. Murrow was one who sensed this anxiety. He stated: "Seldom, if ever, has a war ended leaving the victors with such a sense of uncertainty and fear, with such a realization that the future is obscure and that survival is not assured." Early anti-nuclear activism was largely limited to older bands of pacifists, including the Fellowship of Reconciliation and religious groups such as the Quakers. Other activist groups included advocates of world government, who came to include a significant number of former Manhattan Project scientists. Conscious that atomic weapons threatened world stability and aware that the US monopoly of atomic weapons would not last, atomic scientists joined with world federalists in arguing that only a world government could adequately control atomic energy, a belief succinctly summarized by their slogan, "One World or None." In Japan, public opinion reflected profound anti-nuclear sentiment – hardly a surprise given that they were the only people against whom atomic weapons were used. But US occupation authorities in Japan stifled anti-nuclear opinions, forcing the Japanese to express their opposition to nuclear weapons by endorsing world government. From its beginnings, the anti-nuclear movement was not aligned with any single nation and thus challenged the nation-state system and aimed to transcend the nationalism of the coming Cold War.

These initial scientific approaches to nuclear protest were not as innovative as has been argued. In fact, scholars have only recently recognized that scientists' activism after World War II was in many ways a reprise of activism during the interwar years. During World War I, airplanes brought a new level of destruction to warfare, menacing civilians and soldiers alike. After the armistice, scientists, engineers, and other observers advocated for international control of aviation, a debate that reverberated in the arguments for international control of atomic energy after World War II.

In addition to world government, many US atomic scientists also lobbied for civilian, rather than military, control of US atomic energy policy. That they succeeded and established the US Atomic Energy Commission (AEC) is a testament to the newfound respect that civilians and politicians had for scientists. Yet the conventional nature of their movement reflects the fact that from the beginning, the bulk of anti-nuclear activism aimed to create changes in policy through participation in democratic politics. With few exceptions, the anti-nuclear movement did not employ tactics of disruption or civil disobedience, as activists were determined to work within the bounds of democratic politics. Accordingly, as Cold War bipolarity divided the globe in the late 1940s and dissent faded from mainstream politics, the initial surge of anti-nuclear sentiment began to disappear.

In the United States the rise of the Cold War and the concurrent Red Scare largely smothered opposition to nuclear weapons. The scientists' campaign for civilian control of atomic energy had been successful, but the AEC proved just as hawkish as scientists had expected the military to be. In the late 1940s the commission began a purge of liberal scientists that culminated in the humiliating dismissal of physicist J. Robert Oppenheimer, who had been largely responsible for the creation of the first US atomic bombs during World War II.

Europeans felt some uneasiness about atomic weapons after World War II, but did not engage in much activism. Small numbers of pacifists and clergy advocated world government, primarily in Britain, a nation that, because of its size, was particularly vulnerable to a nuclear attack. The residents of mainland Europe, however, were not overly impressed by atomic weapons since conventional weapons had efficiently devastated the landscape of the continent during the war. The Catholic Church saw atomic weapons as a bulwark against the rapacious Soviet empire, thus limiting atomic dissent in Europe's Catholic nations. The dictatorships of Spain and Portugal refused to tolerate anti-nuclear dissent, as was also the case in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. After the Soviet Union joined the arms race by developing its own atomic weapon in 1949, opposition to nuclear weapons increased slightly in parts of Western Europe, including Scandinavia, the Netherlands, and Switzerland. For the most part, however, Europeans maintained faith in military strength – including atomic weapons – to confront the communist powers.

The communist regimes in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe developed their own unique anti-nuclear ideology for arms control and disarmament. Represented by the World Peace Council (WPC), the communist argument against nuclear weapons alleged that the arms race was spurred by US militarism and defended Soviet atomic weapons as a necessary response. The WPC did reflect a genuine fear of atomic weapons among many of its adherents, but the organization was so blatantly partisan that it attained little influence in non-communist states. Nevertheless, some genuine activists and independent thinkers aligned themselves with it, including the British scientist J. D. Bernal and the French scientist Frederic Joliot-Curie. Since the WPC existed by official fiat, it could count on the state for resources and the public for adamant support, though much of this was undoubtedly expressed under duress. The WPC managed to create the trappings of a mass movement, including widespread canvassing, large rallies, and lengthy petitions; even poets were mobilized in the name of the WPC. Because of its highly visible efforts, the WPC enabled western governments to dismiss all anti-nuclear activists as communists.

Escalation in the Thermonuclear Age

In 1954 and 1955 the United States and Soviet Union respectively developed thermonuclear weapons vastly more powerful than the atomic bombs that destroyed Hiroshima and Nagasaki. This increased destructive power of nuclear weapons resulted in increased anti-nuclear activism around the world. As before, intellectuals and scientists were the first to respond to the nuclear danger. British philosopher Bertrand Russell and the legendary physicist Albert Einstein called upon scientists to search for a solution to the nuclear dilemma. "Scientists should assemble," their manifesto read, "not as members of this or that nation, continent, or creed, but as human beings, members of the species Man, whose continued existence is in doubt."

Protest against thermonuclear weapons generally coalesced not in opposition to their destructive power, however, but in objection to the radioactive fallout released by testing these weapons. During a 1954 US nuclear weapons test, radioactive ash fell on a Japanese fishing boat named The Lucky Dragon that had been sailing well outside the boundaries of the test zone. When the crew began to suffer radiation poisoning, it became clear that innocent people could suffer from nuclear weapons even during peacetime. When the United States government created a nuclear test site in Nevada, mass-based organizations quickly mobilized against nuclear weapons, many of them adopting "Ban the Bomb!" as their slogan. Groups such as the Committee for a Sane Nuclear Policy (SANE) drew middle-class Americans to powerful campaigns for nuclear test bans. When products of fallout appeared in milk and baby teeth, Nobel Prize-winning chemist Linus Pauling mobilized wide support by arguing that US national security policy was harming those it was meant to protect. Although the Dwight Eisenhower administration had made nuclear weapons the centerpiece of US defense policy, Eisenhower himself seriously pursued a test ban during his second term.

In Europe a similar brand of activism appeared to contest nuclear weapons. British anti-nuclear activists founded the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament (CND) in February 1958; the organization dedicated most of its efforts to influencing the British Labour Party, with mixed results. But grassroots demonstrations, including annual marches to and from the British nuclear facility at Aldermaston, were also a large part of CND's efforts. As the mainstream, political approach to anti-nuclear activism grew stronger, the movements for pacifism and world government quickly waned.

Elsewhere in Europe, including West Germany, Scandinavia, Switzerland, Belgium, the Netherlands, and Ireland, public opinion most often opposed nuclear weapons, though this did not always translate into political change. Some anti-nuclear sentiment could be heard in France, but most of it came from the Communist and Socialist parties. The ruling French government, meanwhile, had become obsessed with developing its own force de frappe, leaving the French people with little opportunity to challenge nuclear weapons.

The world communist anti-nuclear movement also challenged the development of thermonuclear weapons, though its critique of the arms race made little headway outside of the Eastern bloc. The WPC was useful for Warsaw Pact nations, since communist leaders were fearful of a US nuclear attack and their armies held an advantage in conventional weapons. In addition, Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev desired an arms control agreement of some sort, though it is unclear whether this was out of genuine desires or propaganda. With official sanction, the WPC received plenty of funding but no independence from Soviet directives. The Soviet invasion of Hungary in 1956 only further eroded the credibility of the WPC outside of the Eastern bloc.

Although the non-aligned anti-nuclear movement refused to cooperate with the WPC, many opponents of arms control in the West continued to claim that all anti-nuclear activists were communists and therefore seditious. In 1960 US Senator Thomas J. Dodd brought SANE and Linus Pauling before Congress and accused each of being under the sway of communists. He linked the US campaign for a nuclear test ban to Soviet foreign policy. Such claims caused protestors to distance themselves from radical tactics and activists; SANE, for example, asked for government assistance in purging its organization of leftists.

Although mainstream political campaigns made up the bulk of anti-nuclear activism in the 1950s and 1960s, some activists transcended borders in radical grassroots attempts to halt the arms race.

These transnational approaches, though small, had the potential to create difficulties for national governments. In early 1958 a small group of pacifists set sail from Honolulu aboard a boat called The Golden Rule toward the US Pacific nuclear testing zone, where they hoped to disrupt an impending nuclear test. Alerted to their plans, an alarmed Secretary of State John Foster Dulles predicted that a global alliance of even a few activists would lead to international problems. Undersecretary of State Christian Herter also worried that US efforts to apprehend an international union of ships would have detrimental effects on other US interests. US authorities took swift action, having the ship's crew arrested and, after a second sailing attempt, imprisoned.

Alternating crises and advances involving nuclear weapons in the late 1950s and early 1960s led to a huge growth in anti-nuclear protest. In 1957 the Soviet launch of its Sputnik satellite portended the development of intercontinental ballistic missiles. But a nuclear test moratorium, agreed to by the United States and the Soviet Union in 1958, indicated a possible break in the arms race. The fear of nuclear war and fallout from tests continued to spur activism, drawing heavily from the educated middle classes. Intellectuals, women's groups, churches, and college students made up the majority of nuclear protesters in the United States and Europe, while the movement failed for the most part to connect with the working class.

In Western Europe the CND continued to grow, though it came into conflict with activists who used direct action tactics against pro-nuclear governments. Bertrand Russell formed the Committee of 100 with the express purpose of bringing sit-ins and other methods of civil disobedience to bear on the British nuclear weapons complex, though CND officials disdained this radicalism. More mainstream anti-nuclear sentiment thrived in Denmark, Norway, Sweden, West Germany, France, Italy, and Greece. Eastern European states and the Soviet Union saw only small pockets of anti-nuclear dissent outside the approved activities of the WPC. Only those with influence could risk speaking out against Soviet nuclear policy; the nuclear physicist Andrei Sakharov was one such rare dissident. The WPC itself continued to shred its own credibility as it vocally supported the Soviet Union's ending of the nuclear test moratorium in September 1961. Neutral and non-aligned governments, such as those in Ireland, Yugoslavia, and Finland, were generally friendly to their citizens' anti-nuclear movements. In NATO and Warsaw Pact nations, however, governments mobilized against dissent from the arms race. Soviet authorities repressed non-aligned activists, while West German and Greek authorities used coercion against anti-nuclear protestors. French anti-nuclear activists were arrested, while British authorities sentenced the esteemed 89-year-old Russell to two months in prison.

France's first nuclear weapons test in February 1960, the end of the US-Soviet test moratorium a year later, and the Cuban Missile Crisis in 1962, all foreshadowed an impending nuclear Armageddon. As the arms race increased, protests movements increased as well. Eventually, world leaders began to see that arms control agreements could be politically expedient. Sweden's Social Democratic Party renounced nuclear weapons in the 1960s, while Norway, Ireland, Finland, and Denmark all enacted arms control measures. The British government even began to hedge and attempted to push the United States to accept a test ban. In 1963 Britain, the United States, and the Soviet Union signed a Limited Test Ban Treaty (LTBT) that banned nuclear tests above ground. Other measures soon followed, including the Non-proliferation Treaty (NPT) that pledged nuclear nations "not to transfer nuclear weapons to any non-nuclear weapon state" and non-nuclear nations "not to make or acquire nuclear weapons." An Outer Space Treaty that banned the testing of weapons in space and an Anti-ballistic Missile Treaty came on the heels of the NPT. According to Wittner, "the leaders of the nuclear powers recognized that nuclear arms control made good politics." This is no doubt true, but good politics did not necessarily make for effective measures. All of the arms control treaties of the 1960s and 1970s were of dubious value. The LTBT, for example, only moved nuclear weapons tests underground, where testing actually increased. Of all US tests between 1945 and 1980, 54 percent took place after the signing of the LTBT, while in the Soviet Union 56 percent of its tests between 1949 and 1980 occurred after the LTBT. The widely praised NPT only created a nuclear caste system, as its adherents have made no serious effort to comply with Article VI of the treaty that requires them to "pursue negotiations in good faith at an early date on effective measures regarding cessation of the nuclear arms race and disarmament."

Arms control treaties were not particularly effective in hindering the arms race, but they proved very effective in quashing anti-nuclear protest. The movement against nuclear weapons began a quick spin into irrelevance after the signing of the LTBT in 1963. For the most part, many of these anti-nuclear activists were siphoned off into the anti-Vietnam War movement. But arms control treaties and the ensuing rise of détente gave the impression that the superpowers were doing something about the arms race, and anti-nuclear activism began to fade even as nuclear arsenals continued to grow.

Mass Mobilization in the 1980s

During the 1970s, parties of the center-left came to power in parts of Western Europe and the United States. Accordingly, Jimmy Carter in the United States, and social democrats in Scandinavia, for example, openly supported arms control measures. But the abrupt halt of détente at the decade's end brought forth a newly invigorated arms race. US nuclear policymakers sought innovations in weaponry, such as the MX missile, and expansion of the NATO nuclear deterrent in the form of nuclear missile deployment in Western Europe. The Soviet Union, meanwhile, also contributed to détente's end by invading Afghanistan and deploying SS-20 missiles in Warsaw Pact nations. Further arms control measures were subsequently abandoned, including the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty and a second Strategic Arms Limitation Treaty.

Anti-nuclear activists again responded to the escalation of the arms race with an escalation of their own efforts. The years between 1981 and 1985 saw anti-nuclear sentiment erupt into a mass movement in Europe. Western Europe in particular displayed massive protest against nuclear weapons, in particular the NATO Cruise and Pershing missiles and the Soviet SS-20s, collectively disdained by the movement as Euromissiles. Unions, churches, and social democratic parties all opposed the Euromissiles, while CND continued to lobby the British Labour Party for disarmament, which the party supported during the 1980s. By 1985 CND had over 100,000 members and over 1,000 local groups in the UK.

But a new approach to disarmament characterized the anti-nuclear movement of the 1980s, as many Europeans sought to transcend the national and political efforts of earlier anti-nuclear groups. The European Nuclear Disarmament (END) campaign became the leading voice in deploring both US and Soviet militarism. END and other European activists demonstrated as much against the Euromissiles as against the Cold War ideologies of capitalism and communism, but the movement encompassed other forms of resistance as well. In August 1981 a British protest group made up exclusively of women surrounded a nuclear missile base at Greenham Common. In the ensuing days, months, and even years, the women remained encamped at Greenham Common in order to engage in continuous civil disobedience aimed at disrupting the military functions of the base. This led to the formation of a movement of German Women for Peace.

In the United States opposition to nuclear weapons coalesced around Randall Forsberg's bilateral "nuclear freeze" proposal to stop the development and production of nuclear weapons. A budding Nuclear Freeze movement aimed at passing a Freeze resolution through Congress, a movement that gathered such steam that in June 1982 some 750,000 people gathered in New York's Central Park to demonstrate against nuclear weapons. Numerous states passed Freeze referenda, and the House of Representatives eventually passed a Freeze resolution. The movement remained a middle-class movement and continued to work within the bounds of polite politics.

Such a scope did not limit the size of the movement. Anti-nuclear fever swept up Europeans, particularly in the northern part of the continent. In the Netherlands the Interchurch Peace Council worked for disarmament, while in West Germany the Greens combined environmental and anti-nuclear efforts. Belgium, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and Finland all harbored significant anti-nuclear opposition; in the fall of 1983 alone, according to one estimate, roughly 5 million Western Europeans took part in anti-nuclear protests. Such dissent indicated a declining faith among Europeans in the leadership of the US-NATO alliance – just as the 1980s saw the American people rise to oppose the doctrine of nuclear deterrence. Nevertheless, conservative leaders often managed to maintain power in western nations, as when the British Conservatives defeated the Labour Party in 1983, and Republican Ronald Reagan won reelection as US president in 1984.

Both NATO and Warsaw Pact governments generally took a hard line against the anti-nuclear movement. After years of tolerating his anti-nuclear stance, the Soviet government sentenced Sakharov to internal exile in Gorky in January 1980. Margaret Thatcher in Britain and Reagan in the United States made public suggestions that the anti-nuclear movement was run by communist agents, while Christian democrats in West Germany and socialists in France under François Mitterrand endorsed the Euromissile deployment. Eastern Europe did witness some sporadic unaligned protests against Soviet SS-20s by East German and Czech intellectuals. The Moscow Trust Group organized Soviet dissidents and attempted to push the Soviet Union to end the arms race and halt its human rights abuses. For its efforts the Trust Group received beatings, jailings, and imprisonment in the gulag. The governments of France, Italy, Belgium, and West Germany occasionally relied on violence to disrupt anti-nuclear demonstrations, while their counterparts in Czechoslovakia and East Germany similarly assaulted those who demonstrated for disarmament. In their shared disdain for the anti-nuclear movement, the ruling elites of East and West demonstrated that the Cold War was not entirely a competition between East and West, but rather a struggle of the non-aligned people of the world against their pro-nuclear governments.

The mid and late 1980s saw the superpowers reach agreement on arms control accords, though had the Soviet Union not unexpectedly dissolved in 1991 there would be little reason to link these agreements to the end of the Cold War. In fact, neither nuclear weapons nor movements against them were a major factor in the Cold War's end. As the superpowers resisted disarmament movements, this intransigent reliance on weapons of mass destruction came to be seen – in the Soviet Union and, to a lesser extent, the United States – as a reflection of the superpowers' lack of concern for human welfare. Accordingly, human rights protest and economic factors played a more direct role in bringing down the Soviet Union and ending the Cold War.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Nuclear Campaign, Britain; Anti-Nuclear Movement, Japan; Anti-Nuclear Protests, Marshall Islands; Nuclear-Free New Zealand, 1987

References and Suggested Readings

- Bess, M. (1993) Realism, Utopia and the Mushroom Cloud: Four Activist Intellectuals and Their Strategies for Peace, 1945–89. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Boyer, P. (1984) From Activism to Apathy: The American People and Nuclear Weapons, 1963–1980. Journal of American History 70: 821–44.
- DeGroot, G. (2005) The Bomb: A Life. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Wittner, L. (1993) The Struggle Against the Bomb, Vol. 1: One World or None: A History of the World Nuclear Disarmament Movement, through 1953. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Wittner, L. (1997) The Struggle Against the Bomb, Vol. 2: Resisting the Bomb: A History of the World Nuclear Disarmament Movement, 1954–1970. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Wittner, L. (2003) The Struggle Against the Bomb, Vol. 3: Toward Nuclear Abolition: A History of the World Nuclear Disarmament Movement, 1971 to the Present. Stanford: Stanford University Press.

Anti-nuclear protests, Marshall Islands

Justin Corfield

The Marshall Islands were ruled by Germany until World War I, when they were taken over by Japan and ruled under a mandate from the League of Nations. After World War II the US navy took control of them, with the United States controlling them as a United Nations Trust Territory from 1947. Between 1946 and 1958 the United States used the Marshall Islands for nuclear tests at Bikini Atoll and at Eniwetak.

The first major political protest in the Marshall Islands took place in 1982, when over 1,000 landowners who had been dispossessed from Kwahjalein Atoll took part in Operation Homecoming, fighting for four months against missile testing on their atoll. This led to other protest groups campaigning against US nuclear tests, although the Marshallese held back from introducing an anti-nuclear constitution as was the case in nearby Palau.

There were a number of protests against the use of the Marshall Islands for US nuclear tests, but there was little publicity for these until 1985 when the Greenpeace ship Rainbow Warrior sailed to Rongelap Atoll to help relocate some of the people away from the nuclear waste. There was a large protest in 1996 when the people from Bikini Atoll commemorated the 50th anniversary of their forced evacuation so that the US could conduct nuclear tests. They had been moved to Rongerik Atoll where many fell ill from eating poisonous fish, while others nearly starved from food shortages. Following protests later that same year and reports by German scientists hired by the people from Bikini Atoll, much of the residual nuclear radiation in the lagoon was removed to allow the people to return. This successful protest was followed by another by the people of Eniwetak Atoll who had been exiled for 33 years. The Nuclear Claims Tribunal awarded $578 million in compensation to these people and another $73 million to the people of Rongelap Atoll, where people had been exposed to radiation some 20 times the rate that the US government had previously claimed.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Nuclear Campaign, Britain; Anti-Nuclear Movement, Japan; Anti-Nuclear Protest Movements; Micronesia, Nationalist and Labor Protests; Nuclear-Free New Zealand, 1987

References and Suggested Readings

- Cockrum, E. E. (1972). The Emergence of Modern Micronesia. PhD thesis, University of Colorado.
- Coulter, J. W. (1957) The Pacific Dependencies of the United States. New York: Macmillan.

Anti-Racist Action (ARA)

Michael Staudenmaier

Anti-Racist Action (ARA) has been a militant form of anti-fascist organizing in North America for two decades. ARA is best described primarily as an organizing model, and only secondarily as a formal organization. The Anti-Racist Action Network functions as a loose coordinating framework. While emphasizing physical confrontation with fascists, ARA groups have also struggled against institutional forms of white supremacy, and against sexism and homophobia. Although it has been strongly influenced by anarchism, Anti-Racist Action has remained largely non-sectarian and open to activists of many ideological backgrounds.

McGowan (2003) notes that Anti-Racist Action began in the Minneapolis skinhead scene of the 1980s. A multiracial crew of anti-racist skinheads, the Baldies, organized public and sometimes violent opposition to a growing fascist presence. To expand their struggle, the Baldies initiated the first ARA group, with mixed results. Broadening activities beyond opposing fascism initially proved easier than recruiting activists from outside skinhead circles. Physical defense of abortion clinics and opposition to police brutality became key areas of struggle, but the activists remained primarily skinheads and punks.

By the 1990s, however, in response to surging fascist organizing in the Midwestern US, and the often tepid or legalistic response from mainstream organizations, ARA groups formed in many cities. At a conference in Ohio the Anti-Racist Action Network was founded to coordinate activities and discussion. The Network (1996) adopted four "Points of Unity" which have remained largely unchanged: "1) We go where they [fascists] go; 2) We don't rely on the cops or the courts to do our work for us; 3) Nonsectarian defense of other anti-fascists; 4) We support abortion rights and reproductive freedom." The final sentence reads: "We intend to win."

The rapid growth of Anti-Racist Action led to increasing repression, both legal and physical. Dozens of ARA supporters were arrested during or after protests in the late 1990s, although few were convicted of serious charges. At least two ARA activists were killed by fascists, and others were injured, many during mass public confrontations. The question of violence in anti-fascist organizing was not easily resolved, contributing to the decline in ARA groups during the years after 9/11, when violent protest in the US became increasingly associated with terrorism. Disarray in the fascist movement during the same period, and the continued tendency of ARA groups to rely on subcultural affinity rather than political agreement, also had a negative effect.

Anti-Racist Action groups continue to organize in various parts of North America, notably Los Angeles and Toronto. Other contemporary formations tied to ARA's legacy include the Northeastern Federation of Anarchist Communists (NEFAC), and the small "three-way fight" tendency within the North American left.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism; Fascism, Protest and Revolution

References and Suggested Readings

- Anti-Racist Action Network (1996) Points of Unity. Available at www.antiracistaction.us (downloaded February 15, 2008).
- BRICK Anarchist Collective (2003) Above and Below: Them, Them, and Us. Available at three-wayfight.blogspot.com/2005/06/above-and-below-them-them-and-us.html (downloaded February 15, 2008).
- Hamerquist, D. & Sakai, J. (2002) Confronting Fascism: Discussion Documents for a Militant Movement. Montreal: Kersplebedeb.
- McGowan, R. (2003) Claim No Easy Victories: An Anarchist Analysis of ARA and Its Contributions to the Building of a Radical Anti-Racist Movement. Northeastern Anarchist 7 (Spring/Summer).

Anti-slavery movement, Britain

Jason M. Kelly

The abolition of slavery in Britain and its Atlantic empire was a protracted process that took centuries to accomplish. While historians often focus on one element of the anti-slavery movement – the abolition campaigns of the late eighteenth century – anti-slavery resistance was, in fact, a much more complex phenomenon that ranged from slave resistance to evangelical pressure to mass boycotts and petitioning. The diversity of anti-slavery resistance in the early modern period necessitates that scholars understand the end of slavery in Britain as the accomplishment of many grassroots movements rather than that of a single, monolithic organization of middling reformers.

The abolition of slavery in the British Atlantic took place in three phases. The first phase, lasting roughly from the seventeenth century to the 1770s, saw the expansion of the British slave trade and the earliest, decentralized anti-slavery resistance. The second phase, from the 1770s to 1807, witnessed the rise of massive British support for the abolition of the slave trade, which many leaders believed was the first step in bringing an end to the institution of slavery. The third phase, between 1808 and 1838, brought the legal emancipation of slaves in the British Atlantic world.

Phase I: Expansion and Resistance (1607–1770)

By the end of the sixteenth century, English traders were actively participating in the transatlantic slave trade. With the establishment of several permanent American colonies during the first decades of the seventeenth century, the institution of slavery became part and parcel to these colonies' economic success. The tobacco, sugar, and, eventually, cotton that fed a growing consumer society in Europe demanded large labor forces to plant, grow, harvest, and process them.

The introduction of a massive slave society into the English world required philosophical and legal justifications. Throughout the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, plantation owners, merchants, scholars, and politicians alike cobbled together a regime built on control and exploitation that was bolstered by philosophical notions of difference and protected by a legal superstructure. The English borrowed from a set of preexisting discourses to defend their engagement with the slave trade and forced labor. These included arguments from natural philosophy, which emphasized cultural, physiological, and even moral differences, and the Christian scriptures, from which contemporaries extrapolated that black Africans were descended from Ham and thus condemned to be slaves. Clergy in the Church of England, such as the seventeenth-century missionary Morgan Godwyn, argued that the institution of slavery was not inconsistent with the doctrines of Christianity. Thus, the extension of the slave system and the articulation of a racial hierarchy became mutually enforcing processes. English common law did not initially provide strong support for the Atlantic slave system, but the legal institutionalization of slavery was forthcoming, although there was never a legal formula as comprehensive as France's Code Noir (1685). By the 1660s, colonial statute law recognized slaves as property, a status that was hereditary through matrilineal descent, and miscegenation laws, protection for masters who killed their slaves, and restrictions on equal rights under the law, even for free blacks, soon followed.

Early resistance took many forms that stretched from Africa to the Americas to Britain and Ireland. African strategies included open military confrontation, revolts, and even reconfiguring the layout of villages and establishing sites of refuge. Likewise, slave revolts in African slaving ports were not uncommon. Records indicate that for every ten slaving voyages, there was a shipboard revolt. Most of these took place while the ship was anchored and loading its victims. In a significant number of examples, Africans in boats attacked anchored slave ships in order to free the captives. Once slaves found themselves working on the American plantations, their resistance continued. A Virginia statute from 1680 prevented slaves from carrying any weapons or leaving their master's estates, a reaction to the continued efforts of Africans to undermine the slave system. In the Caribbean, slave owners experienced regular revolts. Escape proved another mode of resistance, and no group embodied this example more than the Jamaican Maroons, who, for 140 years, resisted the imposition of British rule.

Before the 1770s, European resistance to slavery was limited. Both Anglicans and non-conformist sects justified slavery, and even the Religious Society of Friends, or the Quakers, were reluctant to take a firm stance against it. As early as 1671, one of the Quaker founders, George Fox, argued for the spiritual equality of all humans, but he did not reject slavery outright. Instead, he used the Christian scriptures to justify a period of temporary slavery after which slaves should be freed with some form of compensation. When four Quakers and Mennonites in Germantown, Pennsylvania signed a petition in 1688 against the "traffik of men-body," the event marked the beginning of the anti-slavery movement amongst peoples of European descent. From this community of mid-Atlantic non-conformists came more sustained and significant opposition to slavery in the mid-eighteenth century.

The most influential document of the pre-1770 abolition movement was John Woolman's Some Considerations on the Keeping of Negroes (1754), in which he spoke out against both the slave trade and the institution of slavery. A Quaker, his conscience led him to the conclusion that "the Colour of a Man avails nothing, in Matters of Right and Equity." Speaking out against slavery at the annual Philadelphia Meeting of Friends in August 1758, he convinced his fellow Quakers to begin freeing their slaves. His journals record his visits to his fellow Quakers, encouraging them to end their participation in the slave system. Woolman's voice was joined by another Philadelphia Quaker, Anthony Benezet. Benezet devoted himself not only to the cause of abolition, but also to social reform. Arguing that humans were not just spiritual equals, but that they were social equals, he was an advocate for black and female education. As early as 1750, he tutored free blacks and slaves at his house. In 1770, using his own fortune and funding from the Philadelphia and London Quakers, Benezet founded a free school for Philadelphians of African descent.

Woolman and Benezet were part of an increased move toward abolitionism among the eighteenth-century devout – in part, the product of the Great Awakening. John Wesley preached openly against slavery to his fellow Methodists. Likewise, mid-century Moravian, Baptist, and Mennonite leaders spoke out against the institution. Slaves and free blacks were encouraged to join their congregations. Nevertheless, despite the radical nature of their theologies and the potential challenge that they posed to the slave system, none of these sects rejected slavery altogether. Preaching spiritual equality was not the same thing as practicing social equality. Many of their members continued to own slaves, and evangelicals typically imagined abolition in gradualist terms.

Phase 2: The Abolition Movement (1770–1807)

Anti-slavery resistance during the last decades of the eighteenth century resulted in the abolition of the slave trade in the British Atlantic world in 1807. Most British and American abolitionists believed that their success rested in a two-phased attack on the slave system: first outlaw the slave trade, and then outlaw slavery. The reasons for the end of the slave trade were many, but one recognizable feature of the movement was an increasingly vocal public rejection of the institution. The public critique of slavery was inspired by ideas about religious and natural equality. It found its voice in the burgeoning literacy and print culture of the Anglo-American world.

In 1771–2, the cause of abolition found an unprecedented success in the English courts. A slave, James Somerset, who had come to London as chattel to a Scottish merchant, Charles Stewart, claimed freedom as a consequence of his 1771 baptism. While many colonies had passed laws prohibiting manumission upon baptism, precedent in England was unclear. Stewart had Somerset captured and prepared to send him to Jamaica, at which point Somerset's lawyer, Granville Sharp, filed a writ of habeas corpus. Thus, Somerset and his abolitionist friends orchestrated a case against Stewart's claims of ownership and the institution of slavery in England in general. William Murray, 1st Earl of Mansfield, heard the case and produced a carefully worded ruling that held that masters could not send slaves out of England. Despite its precision, much of the public interpreted the ruling as the end to the institution of slavery in England. A similar case lasted from 1772 to 1778 in the Scottish courts. Inspired by the Somerset ruling, Joseph Knight claimed his freedom from John Wedderburn.

The press coverage of the Knight and Somerset cases generated momentum for abolition during the 1770s. Abolitionists in Britain joined their American counterparts in their calls to end slavery, even as the colonies went to war against the British government. In 1773, slaves in Massachusetts unsuccessfully petitioned the state legislature to end slavery. The following year, the colonial assemblies began a long and uneven process of withdrawal from the slave trade. At their annual meeting in 1776, Pennsylvania Quakers banned members who owned slaves. But, in the North American context, it was the British government that did the most to manumit slaves between 1775 and 1783. In 1775, the Governor of Virginia, John Murray, 4th Earl of Dunmore, declared that slaves who fought for the British against the American revolutionaries would become free. While self-serving reasons motivated the British, thousands of African Americans fought against the odds by escaping plantations and joining the British. While many of them found themselves recaptured at the end of the war, more than 14,000 former slaves eventually found their freedom.

In Britain, abolitionists continued their campaigns. Former slaves, such as Olaudah Equiano and Quobna Ottobah Cugoana, added their voices to activists such as Ignatius Sancho and Ukawsaw Gronniosaw. Appealing to Christian morality and philosophical arguments about human equality, their pamphlets, newspaper articles, and books used autobiography to expose slavery's evils. Their descriptions were confirmed in the courts, most horrifically in a King's Bench case of 1783 – the Zong massacre. Typical of the period, the Zong was making an overcrowded and sickly slave voyage in autumn 1781. With its high mortality rates, the ship's captain, Luke Collingwood, decided to cut his losses and throw 133 ill slaves overboard. Considered as chattel under the law, the Liverpoolian owners would have lost money if the slaves died of disease. However, Collingwood claimed that water reserves were low. By throwing these slaves overboard to save the other slaves from dehydration, the owners could claim them as lost property to the underwriters. The case that entered Lord Mansfield's court in 1783, Gregson v. Gilbert, was a suit by the ship owners to collect the insurance. When Olaudah Equiano, a former slave and abolitionist, heard about this case, he worked with Granville Sharp to publicize the horrors of the Atlantic slave trade.

In the 1780s, a formal coalition developed to pressure parliament to end slavery. As in the Americas, Dissenters were at the forefront. At the London yearly Meeting in 1783, 273 Quakers petitioned parliament to end the slave trade. They also set up the Committee on the Slave Trade, which became the first abolitionist organization in Britain. Following their mandate, two members on the Committee, William Dillwyn and John Lloyd, published The Case of Our Fellow-Creatures, the Oppressed Africans in December 1783, a denunciation of slavery that had print runs of 2,000 and 10,000 within the year. Granville Sharp, who had worked closely with Anthony Benezet as early as 1772, developed the links between the Anglican community, the British and American Quakers, and the British evangelical community – most notably, the emergent Clapham Sect. Their association culminated in the Committee for the Abolition of the Slave Trade in 1787, the group that has often been widely interpreted as the single voice of abolition.

The success of the Committee for the Abolition of the Slave Trade relied upon the politicization of the British masses, coupled with parliamentary pressure. A growing reading public and new forums for the discussion of the abolitionist cause played a major role in their achievement. Likewise, a modern mass marketing campaign accompanied the cause. The icon of a supplicant slave in chains and the accompanying motto, “Am I not a Man and a Brother?,” found itself repeated on everything from medallions created by Josiah Wedgwood's Staffordshire factory to anti-slavery tokens to folk art. The motto appealed to Enlightenment notions of human equality and Christian ideas of brotherhood. The image of the slave as supplicant confirmed paternalistic middling attitudes toward people of African descent and their duty to raise people up from their oppression. Furthermore, the tireless campaigning of people such as Hannah More and Thomas Clarkson made the colonial humanitarian crisis palpable to provincial English publics.

Using the technique of petitioning to pressure members of parliament (MPs), hundreds of thousands of Britons added their voice to the abolitionist cause. This provided MPs, such as William Wilberforce, with the leverage that they needed to legislate against the slave trade. As early as 1787, over 10,000 enfranchised men from Manchester signed an anti-slavery petition. Organizing themselves through a nationwide epistolary network, within a year petitioners numbered nearly 100,000. In 1792, these numbers approached 400,000. It was not just the wealthy who added their names to these petitions. For example, in 1789, 769 Sheffield metalworkers signed an anti-slavery petition, knowing that to do so undermined their livelihoods. In their petition, they recognized that slavers traded Sheffield cutlery for slaves in Africa. By the 1790s, some provincial anti-slavery organizations took the lead in organizing a boycott of West Indian sugar.

When the French Revolution began in 1789, radical-minded British abolitionists such as Clarkson saw an opportunity to join their cause with that of the Société des Amis des Noirs in France. Unexpectedly, however, the course of the French Revolution undermined the cause of abolition in Britain. When the French Revolution entered its radical phase in 1793–4, British conservatives saw all reform movements as a potential threat to the British state, a perspective that was as much a reaction to Jacobinism as it was to the Saint-Domingue slave revolt of 1791. When the slaves of Saint-Domingue, driven by their desire for freedom and inspired by revolutionary rhetoric, revolted against French plantation owners, British anti-abolitionists argued that the abolition movement was to blame. This perspective gained more credibility with revolutions in Dominica and Jamaica the same year. The slaving lobby proved tenacious in the 1790s. Panicked by the abolition movement, plantation owners increased the numbers of slaves that they imported from 5,662 per year in 1784–7 to 25,960 in 1793 (Geggus 1981: 222). In turn, sugar and coffee plantations saw their profits increase as Saint-Domingue's imports fell during its civil war. Thus, even though William Wilberforce nearly succeeded with an abolition bill in 1796, it was not until 1807 that the abolitionists successfully passed a slave trade bill.

Phase 3: The Emancipation Movement (1807–1838)

After the abolition of the slave trade, abolitionists initially turned their attention to enforcing the end of the slave trade. The most ardent exponent of enforcement was the African Institution, which included many prominent abolitionists such as Clarkson and Wilberforce. While British ships could not participate in the slave trade, the African Institution recognized that this did not mean the slave trade had ended. They pressured the government to pass legislation to require Caribbean colonies to compile slave registers. By 1817, these registers allowed the government to monitor slave smuggling. Abolitionists saw the registers as a way to trace plantation mortality rates, numbers with which they could press for humanitarian reform.

In the Caribbean, plantation owners continued to protest reforms, and a succession of conservative governments generally responded with a gradualist approach toward legislation. Slaves, however, were unwilling to suffer the abuses of the slave system, and they continued their anti-slavery resistance. In 1816, a revolution in Barbados, often called Bussa's Rebellion, marked a new moment in British slavery. The slaves, inspired by Haitian independence and abolitionist sentiment, planned a complete overthrow of the Barbadian government. Their leaders, Bussa, Washington Franklin, Nanny Grigg, and others, led a rebellion for three days. While unsuccessful in their ultimate aims, their revolt led to reforms, including extended rights in the 1825 Consolidated Slave Law.

With pressure for and against slavery, the British government responded with an approach known as "amelioration." Amelioration would institute gradual reforms, in particular the Christian education of slaves. Groups such as the London Missionary Society sent evangelicals to proselytize Christian non-resistance. Once they saw the horrors of plantation slavery, some missionaries became vocal abolitionists. This was the situation in the Demerara, Guyana revolt of 1823. Jack Gladstone, a slave, led approximately 13,000 slaves against plantation owners. Following the advice of the Christian missionary John Smith, the slaves generally revoked violence. When plantation owners violently suppressed the revolt, John Smith was arrested and eventually died from pneumonia in prison. He became a symbol for abolitionists and slaves alike, "the Demerara Martyr."

The cases of Barbados and Demerara infused new life into the abolition movement, which in 1823 formed the Society for the Mitigation and Gradual Abolition of Slavery throughout the British Dominions, also known as the Anti-Slavery Society. Like its predecessor, the Society for Effecting the Abolition of the Slave Trade, the Anti-Slavery Society became the national voice of a network of regional organizations. While women had been integral to the pre-1807 abolitionist movement – numbering up to a quarter of subscribers in abolitionist societies – women featured even more prominently in the Anti-Slavery Society and its affiliates. Over 70 women's organizations joined the cause, including the Birmingham Ladies' Society for the Relief of Negro Slaves, later the Female Society of Birmingham. These groups were essential to the success of the petitioning campaigns of the 1820s and 1830s, which gathered over 1.5 million signatures.

In a world of patriarchal hierarchies, the cause of emancipation became implicated in the burgeoning women's rights movement. Against the stance of the Anti-Slavery Society, Elizabeth Heyrick, who formed the Female Society of Birmingham with Susannah Watts in 1823, argued for the immediate emancipation of slaves in her 1824 pamphlet, Immediate, not Gradual Abolition. She called for voters to elect MPs who supported immediate emancipation. And she was at the center of a new wave of sugar boycotts. In response, William Wilberforce, the aging leader of the gradualist Anti-Slavery Society, spoke out against Heyrick and the role of women in politics. He even sought to undermine their influence. In 1830, the Female Society of Birmingham, a major contributor to the Anti-Slavery Society, used its financial muscle to force the national organization to call for immediate emancipation. If the Anti-Slavery Society insisted on a gradualist approach, then the Female Society of Birmingham would withdraw its support. Its influence was bolstered by its prominence among other women's groups which controlled roughly 20 percent of all contributions. Thus, in 1830, the national campaign became one of immediate abolition.

As the immediatist movement grew, the final and most significant slave revolt in the British colonies took place in 1831–2 in Jamaica. Sometimes known as the Baptist War, as planters laid blame on evangelical missionaries, Samuel Sharpe led 60,000 slaves to take their freedom. Orders were to harm no whites, perhaps indicating the leadership's awareness of anti-slavery momentum in Britain. Instead, the revolutionaries focused their attacks on property, causing perhaps £1 million in damage. Only 14 planters died, but 540 slaves died or were executed. The consequence of the revolt showed many in Britain the futility of perpetuating the institution of slavery.

The 1832 Reform Act, coupled with popular abolitionist momentum, proved the decisive factor in legally ending the institution of slavery in Britain and its American colonies. Nevertheless, the Slavery Abolition Act that passed through parliament in 1833 was hardly radical. Overall, the government paid slave owners nearly £20 million for their losses, which were determined by a Slave Compensation Commission. The Act mandated immediate emancipation of slaves under 6 years of age after August 1, 1834. Slaves over 6 years of age were forced to serve an apprenticeship of between four and six years. When abolitionists, including Joseph Sturge and the Central Negro Emancipation Committee, led the campaign against apprenticeship, the colonies passed legislation ending the institution of slavery in the British Americas in 1838.

Nevertheless, slavery still existed in the British empire and around the world. From 1839, the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society became a new voice for international slavery issues. Holding the first World Anti-Slavery Convention in London in 1840, the group invited some of the most prominent abolitionists from around the world. British leaders, such as Clarkson, Thomas Buxton, and Sturge, organized with American leaders, such as Louis Lecesne and

S. L'Instant de Pradine. Noticeably, however, the male leaders prohibited female involvement. Lucretia Mott and Elizabeth Cady Stanton, visiting from the United States, found that they could not even sit at the convention. Prominent British abolitionists Anne Knight and Elizabeth Pease petitioned to the committee, but to no avail. Inspired by their dismissal from the 1840 World Anti-Slavery Commission, these women went on to organize various women's rights organizations and, most prominently, the Seneca Falls Convention of 1848. Thus, the cause of abolition also catalyzed the women's rights movement in Britain and the United States.

SEE ALSO: Benezet, Anthony (1713–1784); Bussa (d. 1816) and the Barbados Slave Insurrection; Clarkson, Thomas (1760–1846); Demerara Slave Rebellion, 1823; Equiano, Olaudah (1745–1797); Haiti, Saint-Domingue Revolution, 1789–1804, Aftermath; Queen Nanny and Maroon Resistance; Seneca Falls Convention; Sharp, Granville (1735–1813); Stanton, Elizabeth Cady (1815–1902); Wilberforce, William (1759–1833); World Anti-Slavery Convention, London

References and Suggested Readings

- Brown, C. L. (2006) Moral Capital: Foundations of British Abolitionism. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Costa, E. V. (1994) Crowns of Glory, Tears of Blood: The Demerara Slave Rebellion of 1823. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Diouf, S. A. (2003) Fighting the Slave Trade: West African Strategies. Athens: Ohio University Press.
- Drescher, S. (1987) Capitalism and Antislavery: British Mobilization in Comparative Perspective. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Geggus, D. P. (1981) Jamaica and the Saint Domingue Slave Revolt, 1791–93. The Americas 38: 219–33.
- James, C. L. R. (1963) The Black Jacobins: Toussaint L'Ouverture and the San Domingo Revolution, 2nd ed. New York: Vintage.
- Oldfield, J. R. (1995) Popular Politics and British Anti-Slavery: The Mobilization of Public Opinion against the Slave Trade, 1787–1807. Manchester: Manchester University Press.
- Richardson, D. (2001) Shipboard Revolts, African Authority, and the Atlantic Slave Trade. William and Mary Quarterly, 3rd ser., 58 (1): 69–92.
- Whyte, I. (2006) Scotland and the Abolition of Black Slavery, 1756–1838. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.
- Williams, E. E. (1944) Capitalism and Slavery. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

Anti-slavery movement, British, and the black response to colonization

Beverly Tomek

The emphasis on the Atlantic World as a dynamic, interactive community has provided a fresh perspective on New World slavery. Social historians and African studies specialists have learned to greater appreciate the roles black members of this community played, not just as slaves, but also as merchants, sailors, and activists. Former slaves contributed to this complex transatlantic society by participating in an abolitionist crusade that spread to three continents during the last half of the eighteenth century. During this time, educated former slaves in England including Ignatius Sancho, Ottobah Cugoano, and Olaudah Equiano joined British philanthropists in an effort to educate the public about the evils of slavery. Their work helped to convince the British government to make slavery illegal in England in 1772, to halt the slave trade in 1807, and to emancipate colonial slaves in 1833.

One major tactical controversy that developed among anti-slavery activists was that of colonization, or repatriation of blacks to Africa. This question became an issue in Britain during the late eighteenth century, and it drew the attention of black abolitionists in both the British Isles and the United States. Equiano was the first black British abolitionist drawn into the debate. At that time, colonization was a white-initiated, white-led movement, but many supporters were well-intentioned philanthropists. White humanitarians such as Granville Sharp, John Wesley, James Ramsay, Thomas Clarkson, and William Wilberforce saw colonization as a way to redeem a continent and a people that had been ruthlessly exploited. Unable to overcome their own patriarchal assumptions, they argued for the rights of blacks by seeking to convince the public that even if slavery had conditioned the bondsperson to adopt negative racial characteristics, the enslaved were indeed human beings. To make up for past transgressions, many of these philanthropists sought a means not only to free the slaves but also to positively affect the entire continent. For many, the best solution was to send a select number of the most educated and skilled blacks to Africa where they could serve as colonial leaders, creating societies which would in turn influence the remaining indigenous population and put an end to the slave trade.

Sharp saw this plan as an “experiment in freedom.” London’s poor blacks had been appealing to him for assistance for years and when they heard about a proposal for a West African colony put forth by Dr. Henry Smeathman, an English naturalist who had lived in Sierra Leone from 1783 to 1786, they became interested and approached Sharp for details. While Smeathman stressed the possible economic and commercial benefits of founding such a colony, Sharp envisioned a grander scheme – “the chance to construct the perfect society on Earth.” By the end of 1788 he had donated over £1,700 and had personally written the plan of government for the settlement. Although Sharp’s proposed government included Victorian-type regulations on personal behavior, with taxes imposed for pride and indolence, it clearly would have provided for self-government by the settlers, had it been adopted.

A group of evangelicals, known as the Clapham Sect, added another humanitarian element to the Sierra Leone venture. Instead of seeing the colony merely as a chance to create a model society, they recognized the opportunity to spread European civilization and Christianity. They hoped this would help end the slave trade at the source.

The idea may have sounded good in theory, but the British government had provided funding and would eventually govern the colony. Cugoano realized that, unlike the humanitarians, the government was concerned only with alleviating the problem of a growing population of poor blacks in London. He voiced his concerns and spoke out against the proposed colony of Sierra Leone in his 1787 pamphlet Thoughts and Sentiments on the Evil and Wicked Traffic of the Slavery and Commerce of the Human Species, which provided a series of reasons that the colony was doomed for failure. First, sufficient preparations for the success of the colony had not been made and no legitimate treaty had been reached with Africans as to the terms and location of the settlement. He added that the settlers had not been provided for, and that they “were to be hurried away at all events, come of them after what would.” He contended that maltreatment of the proposed colonists and high mortality among them as they waited aboard delayed ships served as evidence of a less altruistic motivation behind the settlement plans. Finally, he explained that many potential black settlers would not participate in such a government-supported, white-initiated scheme because they had learned from centuries of forced captivity and exploitation not to trust the “European seafaring people in general.” Although promoters had made great efforts to recruit colonists, “the wiser sort [of blacks] declined from all thoughts of it, unless they could hear of some better plan taking place for their security and safety.” Cugoano thus did not rule colonization entirely out of the question, but settlement initiated by whites and funded and promoted by the British government was suspect.

Cugoano was not alone in espousing these sentiments. Though he had initially supported the idea that legitimate trade with Africa would help stop the slave trade, Equiano’s experiences with the British government turned him against the Sierra Leone project as well. When asked by the government to serve as commissary of stores for the expedition, he initially praised the project and accepted the post. During his four months as commissary, however, he discovered sufficient evidence to refute government claims of benevolent motivation for the scheme. He uncovered acts of corruption in which “pilfering agents” had pocketed money and provisions allotted for the settlers. He also witnessed the “most wretched” conditions of the settlers as they waited on board for the ships to set sail for the colony. Determining that the government was being cheated and his countrymen “plundered and oppressed, and even left destitute of the necessities for almost their existence,” he tried to correct the situation by reporting the abuses to the Navy. Rather than applauding his honesty, however, the government quickly dismissed him from his post. This humiliating experience made Equiano believe that the British government hoped to use well-educated, free blacks as pawns to achieve its own desires. Perhaps even more disheartening, he began to realize that even the supporters of abolition were often unwilling to allow blacks true leadership roles.

By the time the lords of the treasury cleared Equiano of any wrongdoing and paid his lost wages, the damage had been done. He had learned that white abolitionists were willing to “save” the slaves but, although they did not realize it, their faith in blacks’ ability to help themselves was insincere. Though white philanthropists had good intentions, they failed to realize that blacks such as Equiano had the ability to truly contribute to the movement. This paternalistic outlook offended men like Equiano, who wanted to be more than symbols or tokens in the anti-slavery crusade.

Realizing their marginal status within the white abolitionist movement, Equiano, Cugoano, and other blacks living in England rejected colonization and founded their own organization, the Sons of Africa. After rejecting the Sierra Leone venture, they focused their writings and public appeals on the job of convincing the British government to end the slave trade and abolish slavery throughout the British Empire. By taking active roles in the anti-slavery crusade, these men created a legacy of black participation in the abolition movement.

Unaware of Equiano’s plight, African Americans of the same era also felt initial hope for Sierra Leone. Paul Cuffe of Massachusetts and James Forten of Philadelphia tried to recruit qualified representatives of the American free black community to emigrate to Sierra Leone to open businesses and help ensure the colony’s self-sufficiency. Cuffe, a successful merchant sailor, personally took a group of settlers to the colony, but he died before he could contribute more. Forten worked as a recruiter until Cuffe’s death left the movement void of black leadership and revealed the extent to which it was a white initiative. This, plus the development of a similar colonization scheme by American whites, caused Forten to question both schemes.

The colonization effort that alarmed Forten and other African Americans was led by the American Colonization Society. Aware of growing British anti-slavery sentiment and the Sierra Leone project, officials of the ACS actively marketed their own scheme for settling the colony of Liberia. They borrowed the arguments of Sierra Leone’s founders that a colony in Africa would lead to the end of the slave trade, allow “enlightened” blacks to spread their knowledge throughout the “Dark Continent,” and provide trade opportunities for Britain and America. Their appeals brought colonization back to the forefront of British philanthropic thought.

Dr. Thomas Hodgkin was perhaps the most prominent British humanitarian to accept the American colonizationists’ arguments. While Hodgkin argued against the possibility of forced expulsion of blacks, he was convinced that American racism was so deeply rooted as to be incurable, and he was enticed by the benefits colonization could provide for slaves as well as for Africans. He agreed with the ACS argument for gradual emancipation, accepting their arguments that moral suasion would convince slaveholders to join the cause and that immediate and unconditional abolition would foster resentment and racial hatred. This conservative argument backfired, however, by fueling free blacks' fears that colonization was really just an effort to get rid of them and strengthen slavery.

African American abolitionists who were touring Britain to enlist aid for a number of antislavery causes seized the opportunity this argument provided to take the lead in resisting the ACS. They used the society's own words and publications to prove the strength of pro-slavery sentiment among many colonizationists, expose the irony of the argument that black colonists could provide a civilizing force in Africa, and refute the illogical claims that American-born blacks wished to be transported to an unfamiliar foreign land. Thus, just as Equiano and Cugoana had realized that the Sierra Leone project was partly fueled by a government desire to rid England of poor blacks, most African American leaders saw a similar motivation behind the Liberia project.

In light of such vehement opposition to repatriation, humanitarian arguments in support of colonization lost credibility by the last half of the nineteenth century. British humanitarians largely ignored the efforts of American colonizationists to gain their support, once attempts to "help" blacks leave a country they had no desire to leave no longer appeared altruistic. Furthermore, observers began to see humanitarian appeals to help slaves as hypocritical at a time when Britain was directly supporting slavery with its reliance upon American slave-produced cotton.

However, just as the humanitarian appeals for white-led colonization lost the last vestiges of strength, African American advocates of a different back-to-Africa movement seized on this economic argument as they sought to capitalize on British philanthropic paternalism and gain support for a scheme of their own. The general goals of this movement focused on self-sufficiency for blacks as they sought an important place in the economic world. Because the economic goals of black colonizationists coincided largely with the needs of the British textile industry, African American emigrationists argued for the benefits of West African agricultural colonies, emphasizing their potential to provide alternative sources of cotton.

By the 1850s African American emigrationist leaders had adopted the ideas put forth by Sharpe and the Clapham Sect a generation before. They began calling for the uplift of the African race, and they saw themselves as uniquely qualified to lead in this process. The crucial difference between their proposals and those of the ACS was that theirs was a black-initiated, black-led movement. Another important difference was their addition of a strongly commercial argument. In this spirit, Jamaican Robert Campbell, one of the leading proponents of commercial colonization, insisted that blacks who had already returned to the motherland, particularly those at Sierra Leone, had, by serving as "teachers, catechists, clergymen, and merchants, inaugurated a mighty work, which, now that it has accomplished its utmost, must be continued in a higher form by the more civilized of the same race, who for a thousand reasons, are best adapted to its successful prosecution." But they needed help to further their efforts.

As black support for emigration grew, the movement's leaders realized the need for financial backing. When they failed to gain substantial support from white Americans, they turned to Great Britain. Building upon the British abolitionist and colonizationist legacy, they referred to the project as African Regeneration. This tactic managed to pique the curiosity of a number of British nobles and gentlemen, including Hodgkin and Charles Buxton, a member of Parliament. After a series of meetings, this committee of notable Britons founded the African Aid Society in 1860 and asked Robert Campbell and the American Martin R. Delany to meet with them. In helping form the goals of the society, Campbell explained to the committee that the emigrationists wanted "to be dealt with as men, and not children" and to be allowed to rule their own colony. The committee agreed to support voluntary emigration of American blacks through this black-initiated scheme.

As the campaign for British support of emigration solidified, black emigrationists developed a coherent set of goals that focused mainly on the "free produce" idea. British abolitionists had used similar arguments throughout their anti-slavery crusade. They had argued that the purchase of goods produced by slave labor encouraged the slave trade, and they insisted that every seven families in Britain employed one slave by purchasing slave-produced goods. The solution, argued the abolitionists, was to boycott the rice, sugar, and cotton grown by slaves in order to make slavery unprofitable. Even as emigrationists sought British support, they continued to insist that the colonies being settled were first and foremost ventures in black independence and would remain free from white rule.

Ultimately, the African Aid Society abandoned support of the colony, instead opting to pressure the British government to simply extend its sphere of influence in West Africa. They soon began calling for direct and swift imperialistic intervention in the autonomous governments in the area. Choosing exploitation over paternalism, the society abandoned black emigrationist leaders in favor of adopting goals that were strictly commercial. Just as white abolitionist motives were coopted by the government in the 1790s, so were black abolitionists overcome by commercial interests in the 1860s. Both groups learned how easily their former allies in the colonization scheme could transform the proposed colonies into self-serving entities with no regard for black interests.

These colonization ventures played their own unique role in the transatlantic community, but, despite the grand hopes of Sharp and Delany, they failed to serve as model societies. The failure lies not only in the economic greed of manufacturers or the self-serving motives of the British government, but also in the paternalistic attitude shared by both white and black abolitionists toward Africa and Africans. Tragically, they not only contributed little to the anti-slavery movement, but they also helped encourage the further exploitation of the continent and its people.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Slavery Movement, Britain; Anti-Slavery Movement, British, and the Founding of Sierra Leone; Clarkson, Thomas (1760–1846); Equiano, Olaudah (1745–1797); Wilberforce, William (1759–1833)

References and Suggested Readings

Bell, H. H. (Ed.) (1969) Search for a Place: Black Separatism and Africa, 1860. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.

Blackett, R. J. M. (1983) Building an Anti-Slavery Wall: Black Americans in the Atlantic Abolitionist Movement, 1830–1860. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.

Campbell, R. A. (1969) Pilgrimage to My Motherland: An Account of a Journey among the Egbas and Yorubas of Central Africa, in 1859–60. In H. Bell (Ed.), Search for a Place: Black Separatism and Africa, 1860. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.

Delany, M. R. (1969) Official Report of the Niger Valley Exploring Party. In H. Bell (Ed.), Search for a Place: Black Separatism and Africa, 1860. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.

Edwards, P. (Ed.) (1988) The Life of Olaudah Equiano. Harlow: Longman.

Ripley, C. P. (1985) The Black Abolitionists' Papers. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

Scobie, E. (1972) Black Britannia: A History of Blacks in Britain. Chicago: Johnson Publishing.

Walvin, J. (1972) The Black Presence: A Documentary History of the Negro in England, 1555–1860. New York: Schocken Books.

Anti-slavery movement, British, and the founding of Sierra Leone

Kenneth Wayne Ackerson

Europeans had visited the West African coast since the 1400s, and the area that became Sierra Leone was explored first by the Portuguese in the 1460s. Contact and settlement attempts were sporadic until after 1600, however. Not surprisingly, the earliest semi-permanent white settlements established in West Africa were slave-trading outposts, but a British botanist, Doctor Henry Smeathman, was the first to suggest a permanent settlement to combat, rather than foster, the slave trade.

The plan Smeathman created was revolutionary in several ways. Not only would the colony be free from the slave trade, but free labor and not slave labor would provide the basis for agriculture. Perhaps even more revolutionary was the fact that both white and black settlers would live together in a free, democratic, and egalitarian arrangement. A group of poor but free blacks living in London, known as the Black Poor, were interested in Smeathman's scheme and so approached Granville Sharp (1735–1813), the noted humanitarian and abolitionist who had served as a patron for the group, for advice on the botanist's proposals. Sharp's input was crucial and influential in the development of Sierra Leone, first as a single settlement and later as a colony. The Clapham Sect, a reform group that included such abolitionist figures as William Wilberforce (1759–1833), Henry Thornton (1760–1815), and Zachary Macaulay (1768–1838), also expressed some interest, believing that the colony could become an ideal base from which European culture could be spread throughout Africa. Even at this early date in their movement, anti-slavery supporters believed that a successful settlement based on legitimate (non-slave trade based) commerce would be an effective means of damaging or even destroying the slave trade.

There were several delays and mishaps, but finally 411 blacks and whites left Britain for West Africa in 1787. While members of the Black Poor figured prominently in this initial number of settlers, they were by no means the entire group, which included poor whites, other free blacks, a number of prostitutes, and some whites simply looking for a new start. From the day of their arrival the settlers faced numerous difficulties. Almost immediately upon disembarking the rainy season arrived and disease claimed many lives. Most of the local leaders proved troublesome and less than hospitable.

The original settlement was abandoned in 1791 for a nearby but more favorable location, and new blood was injected into the young colony with the arrival in early 1792 of black settlers from Nova Scotia. These new settlers were black loyalists who had fought for the British in the American War for Independence and had been given refuge in Nova Scotia after Britain's defeat. They had never really adjusted to life in the harsh climate, however. Hungry for freedom and an equal opportunity for a good life, the Nova Scotians proved a vital and vibrant, if sometimes unruly, addition to the struggling colony.

By the time the Nova Scotians arrived, Sierra Leone was under the auspices of a newly chartered Sierra Leone Company. Although the company's purpose was really to encourage commerce between Britain and Africa, it did not abandon earlier concerns such as civilization and Christianization. Indeed, its board of directors included many of the regular anti-slavery figures such as Sharp and Thornton. Lieutenant John Clarkson (1764–1828), a naval officer and the brother of the famed abolitionist Thomas Clarkson (1760–1846), was appointed governor and, despite gaining the respect of most of the settlers, had very little success running a colony inhabited by increasingly discontented citizens. Macaulay followed as governor, serving from 1794 to 1799. Problems persisted, however, and a bill was introduced into parliament for the government to assume control of the failing colony. Subsequently, Sierra Leone passed from company control on January 1, 1808 and became a crown colony.

Abolitionists continued to monitor Sierra Leone, and after 1807 it was the African Institution who carried this mantle. Founded in 1807, the African Institution was Britain's premiere anti-slavery organization until the 1820s. Several members of the Sierra Leone Company's board of directors were also well placed in the African Institution, and the group's membership rolls read like a veritable "who's who" of abolition – Wilberforce, Thomas Clarkson, Macaulay, Sharp, and William Allen (1770–1843), among many others.

Crown government faced many of the same problems that the Sierra Leone Company had faced, however. Settlers often made a good living for themselves, but many did not take up agriculture as was hoped and had been expected. There were also continual troubles with settlers complaining about rights and freedoms, mainly due to the influence of the Nova Scotians, who brought these ideas with them from North America. Nonetheless, the first crown governor, Thomas Perronet Thompson (1783–1869), was on his way. Thompson had been recommended by Wilberforce, so it is not a stretch to say that abolitionists hand-picked Thompson. It is also quite clear that the African Institution exerted considerable influence on British policy on Africa in general and on Sierra Leone in particular; correspondence between Zachary Macaulay and Lord Castlereagh, the secretary of state, spells this out. Macaulay essentially put forth the overall "platform" of the organization as recommended policy for Britain in West Africa.

Thompson attempted to fix the colony's problems, dealing with social, economic, and military matters, but he ran afoul of both the directors of the African Institution and of his superiors in the Colonial and Foreign Offices. Thompson was recalled and while abolitionists continued to have some influence in choosing governors, they never again hand-picked one.

Sierra Leone became a base of sorts for western culture, much as abolitionists had hoped. The establishment of a vice-admiralty court in Sierra Leone was instrumental in the colony's development. The slave cargoes of captured slave ships were often landed there, and over 60,000 slaves were resettled there following the condemning of over 500 slave ships in court.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Slavery Movement, Britain; Anti-Slavery Movement, British, and the Black Response to Colonization; Clarkson, Thomas (1760–1846); Sharp, Granville (1735–1813); Wilberforce, William (1759–1833)

References and Suggested Readings

- Ackerson, W. (2005) The African Institution (1807–1827) and the Antislavery Movement in Great Britain. Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen Press.
- Fyfe, C. (1961) A History of Sierra Leone. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Peterson, J. (1969) Province of Freedom: A History of Sierra Leone 1787–1870. Evanston: Northwestern University Press.
- Walker, J. W. S. G. (1976) The Black Loyalists: The Search for a Promised Land in Nova Scotia and Sierra Leone. New York: Africana Publishing.
- Walvin, J. (1986) England, Slaves, and Freedom, 1776–1838. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi.

Anti-slavery movement, United States, 1700–1870

Francesca Gamber

The use of enslaved African labor to wring profits from the plentiful natural resources of the New World began in what would become the United States in the seventeenth century, but the system ironically carried the seeds of its own demise. Opposition to slavery in the United States began as soon as the system itself did, and as plantation slavery expanded over the course of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, anti-slavery sentiment only grew stronger and gained more adherents. Opponents of slavery offered a number of possible solutions that ranged from supporting gradual abolition of slavery that compensated slaveholders for the loss of their investment, to relocation of freed slaves to Africa, to the pursuit of immediate abolition without compensation through either violent or non-violent means. Though formal abolition societies never claimed more than a small percentage of the population among their members, the sustained efforts of white abolitionists as well as free and enslaved African Americans kept anti-slavery dissent within public view. Often fraught with internal disagreements over goals and tactics, the anti-slavery movement in the United States succeeded in bringing about the abolition of slavery at the end of the Civil War and in pioneering techniques that would be used by generations of later activists.

Opposing Slavery in Colonial America

The first abolitionists were the slaves themselves, and the first of these arrived in the American colonies in 1619 when John Rolfe purchased 20 Africans at Jamestown, Virginia. Europeans had begun trading in African slaves in the fifteenth century, entering into a form of commerce already well established within African societies as a means of demonstrating wealth and status. The majority of African slaves, sold to European traders in exchange for luxury goods like cloth, iron, and alcohol, were sent to sugar-producing plantations in the Caribbean. As Europeans began to settle the Atlantic coast of North America, African labor was only one of several forms of servitude that included white indenture and Native American slavery. For the first half of the seventeenth century, African slavery was not widely used, given the high cost of purchasing a slave. Yet the susceptibility of Native Americans to disease and decreases in the number of available white servants increased the practice of African slaveholding in Virginia, and its example was followed by both northern and southern colonies established after it.

In its first decades in North America, slavery was not yet the stringent, racially based institution it would become. African slaves worked side-by-side with white servants and even with slaveholders. It was possible for slaves to accumulate their own property and wealth, and this allowed some of them to purchase freedom for themselves and their families. Slaves also pursued extralegal ways of becoming free, establishing a tradition of resistance that would last until emancipation.

The Anti-Slavery Record was a monthly publication of the American Anti-Slavery Society. Its July 1835 issue, exhibited here, contained articles on the fate of recaptured fugitive slaves in New York City; the kidnapping and sale of a young African American woman in Ohio; arguments against the colonization movement that proposed sending African Americans to Liberia; reports on state and local abolitionist meetings; and a list of contributors. Although cheaply printed, the tract is illustrated and its small size enables folding for easy mailing. The sale of tracts was an important source of financing for the usually impoverished anti-slavery movement and its traveling speakers. (Courtesy Antislavery Literature Project, Arizona State University)

Slaves never accepted the conditions of their bondage without challenge. Resistance took both overt and covert forms, including revolt, murder, suicide, running away, feigning illness, breaking tools, slowing work, and setting fires. For women, abortion and even infanticide figured as extreme forms of keeping another generation from becoming enslaved, particularly because African American women were susceptible to the unwanted sexual advances of white men in the household. Nearby Native American tribes, particularly the Creeks and Seminoles, often aided fugitive slaves, who then established maroon communities of other runaway slaves. This interracial cooperation was a forerunner of the Underground Railroad in the antebellum period. Former slaves were also sometimes incorporated into Native American settlements and, as first the colonies and then the United States expanded their borders, lent support to Native American efforts to halt encroachment upon their land.

Though plantation sizes, work regimes, and the type of crop grown varied from place to place and over time, what remained constant was the slaves' determination to be free whenever and however possible. During the colonial period, slaves demonstrated that determination in a number of violent uprisings. In New York City in 1712, slaves set fires and murdered nine whites, resulting in new policies to discourage manumission and prevent slaves from meeting. The revolt also created an atmosphere of suspicion that manifested itself in the execution in 1741 of over thirty African Americans accused of conspiring to rebel once more. In South Carolina the 1739 Stono Rebellion of about one hundred slaves resulted in the deaths of about two dozen whites and harsh new codes to monitor slave behavior. In the colonial period, slave revolts only intensified the desire of whites to keep the slave system in place rather than convincing most whites of its inhumanity.

Anti-slavery sentiment among white colonists was confined to members of the Society of Friends during the colonial period. Quakers, as they were called, adhered to a dissident version of Protestantism that argued the equality of all people, no matter their race. Yet when Quakers arrived in the British colonies in the late seventeenth century, their predecessors in other British settlements had already established agricultural economies based on enslaved African labor. Many Quakers, despite their religious principles, followed suit as they settled the new colony of Pennsylvania. The colony's founder, William Penn, owned a farm of 8,000 acres called Pennsbury that utilized slave labor. Other Quakers were dismayed by the involvement of their religious brethren in the buying and selling of slaves and registered some of the earliest written critiques of slavery in the American colonies. In 1688, four Quakers from Germantown, Pennsylvania condemned the institution in a statement, known as the Germantown Petition, to their local church officials. A 1693 anti-slavery pamphlet by George Keith prompted the earliest voluntary manumissions among Philadelphia Quakers. Other individual critiques proliferated in the eighteenth century. Such writers as Benjamin Lay, John Woolman, and Anthony Benezet urged fellow Quakers to free their slaves. Moved perhaps as much by the declining profitability of slavery in southeastern Pennsylvania as the exhortations of slavery's opponents, the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting barred its members from purchasing slaves in 1755 and prohibited any slaveholding in 1776.

Revolutionary Ideals and the Beginning of Organized Abolitionism

In the same year that Philadelphia Quakers severed their link to slavery, the Declaration of Independence severed America's colonial relationship to Great Britain. Revolutionary rhetoric of freedom and equality did much to generate anti-slavery sentiment among whites and to encourage African Americans to take advantage of the disruption of war to become free.

During the war, British officials detected the contradiction between Revolutionary ideals and the persistence of African American bondage and attempted to use it to their advantage. In April 1775 Lord Dunmore promised freedom to any slave who escaped to British lines. Both the British and the rebels counted African Americans among their supporters as both the free and the enslaved hoped that the victor would finally institute emancipation. The leaders of the new United States, as the colonies now called themselves, attempted to hold at bay the influence of Revolutionary ideals on the fate of slavery in the new nation. Beyond pledging to end the nation's participation in the transatlantic slave trade, the Constitution did nothing to abolish slavery and even formalized the process by which three-fifths of a state's slave population could be added to its population for purposes of determining Congressional representation, the so-called three-fifths compromise. Slavery continued to be essential to the economy of the Southern states, and Constitutional framers feared that abolishing the institution would prevent the colonies from forming a single union. Congress prohibited slavery from the Northwest Territory in 1787 but left it intact elsewhere.

Given the reluctance of the national government to bring about the end of slavery, the anti-slavery impulse was continued by African Americans and by whites inspired by Revolutionary values. Northern states, where large-scale slavery was already of little economic value, began instituting emancipation policies after the Revolution, starting with Vermont in 1777 and Pennsylvania in 1780. These policies, however, usually entailed gradual emancipation and were more difficult to institute in states, including New York and New Jersey, where slave labor could still be used in agriculture. Free blacks in the North participated in petitioning their state legislatures to abolish slavery. They also formed mutual aid organizations, an independent press, and their own churches to help a community that had grown during the war as slaves either ran away or were manumitted. In the upper South states of Maryland and Virginia in particular, slaveholders freed many of their bondsmen and women as a result of the inconsistency of slavery with the principles of the new nation, as well as the shift from tobacco to cereal crop cultivation, which required a smaller labor force. Elsewhere in the South, the effect of Revolutionary ideals was blunted by the advent of a more efficient way to harvest cotton in 1793 with the invention of the cotton gin. As Americans settled the new states of Mississippi and Alabama in the early nineteenth century, the successful cultivation of cotton in these areas entrenched slavery even more deeply in the economy and politics of the South.

Despite the challenges in instituting emancipation there, Northern states soon witnessed the development of an organized anti-slavery movement after the Revolution. The first anti-slavery society formed among Philadelphia Quakers in 1775 and dissolved after four meetings. In 1784 Quakers met again to form a more enduring organization known as the Pennsylvania Abolition Society. The group helped African Americans pursue their freedom in the courts and also worked with black community organizations to provide education and other support. In 1816 the founding of the American Colonization Society (ACS) ushered in a new phase in anti-slavery agitation that focused on relocating freed slaves to Africa. Only the most radical opponents of slavery challenged prevailing notions at the time of the inherent differences between blacks and whites.

Members of the ACS, including Henry Clay and Francis Scott Key, believed that slavery should be abolished but that African Americans and whites could not live together in the same country. Though they did not join the ACS, some black leaders like Paul Cuffe also supported colonization because they doubted that white Americans would ever accept blacks as equals in their society. In cooperation with the government, the ACS founded the African colony of Liberia in 1821 and eventually resettled 12,000 African Americans there.

Colonizationist sentiment prevailed among the anti-slavery movement throughout the 1820s. Indeed, many white abolitionists participated in the colonization movement first before pushing anti-slavery activism to more radical goals beginning in the 1830s. At the same time, a number of African Americans also advocated resettlement, in the form of emigration. Very few, however, supported the African experiment, and most chose instead to move to Haiti or Canada. Though colonization was a form of anti-slavery, this focus on separation of the races prevented its adherents from focusing their efforts on acquiring true freedom and full citizenship for black Americans at home.

If formal abolitionism hesitated to advocate full citizenship as well as emancipation for African Americans, the threat of slave revolts in the early nineteenth century reminded Americans that not all of slavery's opponents would be so cautious. In the summer of 1800, Virginia officials uncovered an insurrection plot by a slave named Gabriel Prosser to march on the state capital, seize its arms, and force the government to free its slaves. Authorities in Charleston, South Carolina foiled a similar plot by Denmark Vesey in 1822. Seven years later, an African American tailor in Boston named David Walker criticized the use of colonization as an anti-slavery tactic and encouraged Southern slaves to rebel against their masters in his Appeal to the Coloured Citizens of the World. When the Virginia slave Nat Turner led a bloody insurrection in 1831 that resulted in the deaths of about sixty whites, many observers claimed that Turner had been influenced by Walker's appeal. While it is unclear whether or not this was so, both Walker and Turner occupied the same radical position along the spectrum of anti-slavery sentiment. Both men saw violence as a legitimate tool in achieving emancipation.

The Growth of Abolitionism in Antebellum America

Though critiques of colonization as an abolitionist goal began to surface in the early decades of the nineteenth century, it would take a new wave of religious fervor to unseat it from its prominence within the burgeoning abolitionist movement. By the late 1820s and early 1830s, thousands of Americans subscribed to the evangelical Protestantism most famously preached by Charles Grandison Finney. Known as the Second Great Awakening, this religious revival emphasized human agency and the ability to perfect oneself and one's society. Its egalitarian rhetoric also attracted African Americans, particularly to the Methodist and Baptist denominations, although dissatisfaction with continued racism in evangelical churches prompted Philadelphia blacks to form the African Methodist Episcopal Church in 1815. Evangelical Protestantism encouraged Americans to engage in social reform, and hundreds of new societies dedicated to temperance, education, and missionary work were formed. These societies gave women an opportunity to participate in the public life of the United States at this time. Despite the dominant understanding that a woman's place was at home, reform work was acceptable as an outgrowth of women's task of guarding the morality of their families.

The anti-slavery movement was another reform activity influenced by the principles of the Second Great Awakening, and it changed in an important way in the 1830s. Evangelical Protestantism made opponents of slavery unwilling to wait for gradual emancipation, and it encouraged them to challenge the assumption beneath colonization schemes that American society could not be improved in order for blacks and whites to live together. In 1826 anti-slavery activists added a new tactic in the form of the free produce movement. Between 1826 and 1867 abolitionists opened more than fifty stores in the Northeast and Midwest that sold only goods produced without slave labor. An even more important ideological shift soon followed the advent of the free produce movement. A new form of abolitionism arose, called immediatism, that demanded emancipation without delay or compensation to slaveholders and extension of full citizenship rights to African Americans. In 1831 William Lloyd Garrison signaled his abandonment of colonization and his acceptance of immediatism with the publication of his newspaper The Liberator, which would become one of the premier abolitionist newspapers in the nation. The first immediatist organization, the New England Anti-Slavery Society, formed in 1832 and was also the first anti-slavery society to admit both African Americans and whites as members. In 1833 the immediatist orientation of this regional group was translated into a national organization with the foundation of the American Anti-Slavery Society (AASS). Under Garrison's leadership, the AASS replaced the American Colonization Society as the most outspoken abolitionist society in the antebellum United States.

The American Anti-Slavery Society was first headquartered in New York City but relocated to Boston in 1843. Supported by hundreds of local affiliates, it attracted thousands of fervent opponents of slavery and admitted both whites and blacks as members. The Society distinguished itself from earlier abolition societies and from the message of militant anti-slavery writers like David Walker by combining a commitment to an interracial society with an insistence upon achieving this society through non-violent means.

Though abolitionists never constituted a majority in American society at any time, the AASS sustained constant pressure on local, state, and federal government as well as on ordinary Americans themselves. In addition to its newspaper, the National Anti-Slavery Standard, the AASS published thousands of anti-slavery pamphlets, most notably American Slavery As It Is (1839), that publicized the brutal treatment slaves received. It sponsored anti-slavery fairs, often organized by women, to raise money. It sent thousands of petitions to Congress demanding the abolition of slavery, and their agitation became so troublesome within the legislature that it issued a gag order from 1836 to 1844 prohibiting the discussion of any of these petitions. The AASS also employed dozens of field agents who traveled throughout the Northern and Midwestern states delivering lectures. Many of these agents were former slaves like Frederick Douglass and Sojourner Truth whose firsthand experiences lent even more strength to the Society's message. The Society courted further controversy by employing women, starting with sisters Sarah and Angelina Grimke, as lecturers as well and permitting them to speak before audiences of both men and women.

Its tactics and unrelenting critique of slavery won the AASS as many enemies as friends. In the South, postal workers refused to circulate anti-slavery materials, and the region's intellectuals and lawmakers crafted a spirited defense of slavery as a benevolent institution that benefited slaves as well as slaveholders. AASS meetings in the North were often interrupted by mob violence, incidents that were particularly driven by suspicions that the biracial organization really sought to legalize interracial marriage. In 1837 one of these mobs murdered Elijah Lovejoy, an anti-slavery newspaper publisher in Alton, Illinois. The following year a mob burned down the Philadelphia meeting hall where a women's anti-slavery meeting had convened. While many of these mobs were composed of white Northern workers whose opposition to abolition was grounded in fears of job competition with newly freed slaves, there were also segments of the emerging working class that recognized the affinity between their interests and those of the abolitionists. Skilled artisans dismayed by the effect of industrialization on their craft and unskilled laborers in groups like the National Reform Association could embrace abolitionism's critique of slavery as another example of the consequences workers felt when capitalism was permitted to run rampant.

The immediatist abolitionists of the AASS faced an unfriendly environment outside the anti-slavery community, but disagreements within the society posed threats of their own. Throughout the organization's history, African Americans charged that white AASS members and leaders often displayed the same sense of black inferiority that characterized slavery's defenders. Dissatisfied African Americans frequently met in their own conventions throughout the antebellum era, although others continued to emphasize the importance of interracial cooperation and avoided these separate gatherings. Other abolitionists were troubled by the activism of women in the AASS. The Society moved toward establishing gender equality in the late 1830s, allowing women to attend its annual meeting as delegates in 1839 and electing Abby Kelley to its business committee in 1840. Fearful of hampering the anti-slavery cause by linking it to the even less popular drive for women's rights, conservative AASS members led by Arthur and Lewis Tappan left the organization in 1840 and formed a rival group, the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society (AF&AS). The new AF&AS worked throughout the rest of the antebellum period to secure the commitment of churches to anti-slavery principles.

Other abolitionists objected to the rejection of organized politics that William Lloyd Garrison had introduced to the AASS. Garrison had argued that the Constitution itself was a pro-slavery document and that abolitionists should not endorse political candidates or even vote. In 1840 those who disagreed with Garrison formed the anti-slavery Liberty Party and proposed its own candidates for president. The Liberty Party became the Free Soil Party in 1848, a shift that replaced the demand for immediate abolition with that of opposing the spread of slavery to territory acquired through the Mexican War. Also known as the Free Democratic Party by the 1852 election year, the Free Soil Party eventually merged with the factions that formed the Republican Party in 1854. The Liberty Party also spawned a more radical offshoot, the Radical Abolition Party or Radical Political Abolition Party, in 1855. This multiracial group, whose supporters included Frederick Douglass, Gerrit Smith, and James Mc-Cune Smith, departed from Garrisonian principles by accepting violence as a means of ending slavery and embracing the Constitution as fundamentally opposed to slavery. It was active until 1860, but its radical message never garnered any electoral victories.

Another conspicuous presence in antebellum abolitionism was the Underground Railroad, an interracial network of activists who provided fugitive slaves with safe places to hide as they escaped to the North. The activities of the Underground Railroad were challenged in 1850 by the passage of the Fugitive Slave Law, which permitted slaveholders to reclaim even those runaway slaves who had safely made it to the free soil of the North. The law touched off a new wave of abolitionist protest in the North. It was the focus of a lecturing campaign by the AASS between 1851 and 1853. Individual abolitionists did their best to prevent federal marshals from returning fugitive slaves to the South. A riot broke out in Christiana, Pennsylvania in September 1851 when a Maryland slaveowner attempted to seize four runaway slaves. In the so-called Jerry Rescue of October 1851, an anti-slavery mob marched on a prison in Syracuse, New York, and freed the jailed fugitive William “Jerry” Henry, who then escaped to Canada. Another group of abolitionists unsuccessfully attempted to keep a Boston fugitive named Anthony Burns from recapture in 1854.

The Fugitive Slave Law was just one of a number of events in the 1850s that worsened tensions between the North and the South. Stoked by the continued agitation of the abolitionists, these tensions would eventually lead to civil war. In 1852, Harriet Beecher Stowe moved hundreds of Americans to sympathize with the anti-slavery cause in her novel Uncle Tom’s Cabin. The novel, which depicted cruel slaveowners and slave families torn apart by sale, sold 300,000 copies in its first year of publication and later became a popular stage show. Southerners attempted to suppress the sale of the novel and even imprisoned African Americans who were found with it.

In 1854 tensions mounted as pro-slavery and anti-slavery partisans flooded into the new territory of Kansas, where legislation passed that year permitted its residents to decide whether or not it would enter the Union as a free or slave state. Violent confrontations between opposing sides ensued, fueled in part by the rifles that the abolitionist Henry Ward Beecher had sent to anti-slavery settlers there. Kansas would not be admitted to the Union until 1861, by which time most Southern states had left the union and ceded their claim to it. One veteran of the so-called Bleeding Kansas was a fierce abolitionist named John Brown. In 1859, with the financial backing of six prominent New England abolitionists, he mounted a raid on the federal arsenal at Harpers Ferry in what is now West Virginia. Brown, whose band of rebels included whites and blacks, hoped to use the weapons to arm the slaves and start a revolt, but he was captured and hanged in December 1859. Most abolitionists, even radical immediatists, disagreed with Brown’s violent tactics but supported his ultimate aim of ending slavery.

Though Abraham Lincoln was not a radical abolitionist, his election in 1860 symbolized to pro-slavery Southerners the beginning of the end of their way of life if they stayed in the union. Southern states began seceding in 1861, and the Civil War began in April.

Civil War and Emancipation

Many abolitionists hoped that the Civil War would present an opportunity for the final abolition of slavery. To their chagrin, Lincoln moved slowly on the subject. As it had happened throughout the history of anti-slavery activism, slaves took the initiative in turning the chaos of war into an opportunity for freedom. Thousands ran away from their sites of bondage, often seeking refuge with Northern armies in their area. Republican congressmen including Charles Sumner and Thaddeus Stevens pushed for the passage of the Confiscation Acts in 1861 and 1862, which freed those slaves who escaped to Union lines, as a means of weakening Southern resources. After the battle of Antietam in September 1862, Lincoln announced his intention to emancipate all of the slaves held in the South, effective January 1, 1863. Though many critics point out that the Emancipation Proclamation only applied to the rebellious states of the Confederacy and left slavery intact in the border states still loyal to the union, it succeeded in transforming the nature of Northern military intervention in the South. Whereas Lincoln had denied any association between the Civil War and the end of slavery at the start of the war, the Union army became a force for emancipation after 1863. It also began enlisting African American soldiers in 1863, and black abolitionists like Mary Ann Shadd Cary and Martin Delany served as active recruiters.

Abolitionists cheered the Emancipation Proclamation, and some local anti-slavery societies began to dissolve. The national office of the American Anti-Slavery Society began to curtail its lecturing and publishing activities. The abolitionist cause assumed new forms after the Emancipation Proclamation affirmed the federal government's commitment to abolition. Anti-slavery women raised money and provided material aid for slaves who escaped to the North. Many Northern women also went South during and after the war as teachers or missionaries to African American communities. In Congress and in the abolitionist press, opponents of slavery demanded a constitutional amendment abolishing the institution forever. Their call was answered with the passage of the Thirteenth Amendment in 1865.

At this point, many abolitionists believed they had completed their task and moved to close down anti-slavery societies. In 1865 the stalwart activist William Lloyd Garrison resigned his presidency of the AASS and stopped publishing his newspaper. Other activists, including new AASS president Wendell Phillips, vowed to remain active until additional legislation could be obtained to guarantee African Americans the same legal and civil rights as whites. Only the most radical remaining abolitionists, such as Thaddeus Stevens, went even farther by calling for the government to provide newly freed slaves with land that once belonged to Southern planters. Most abolitionists were certain that, once accorded equal citizenship status under the Fourteenth Amendment in 1864 and given the right to vote under the Fifteenth Amendment in 1870, African Americans would be equipped to participate equally in American society and politics. The American Anti-Slavery Society disbanded in 1870, and the last of the female anti-slavery societies dissolved in this year as well. Many veterans of the abolitionist movement went on to further activism in the temperance and women's rights movements of the late nineteenth century.

The government committed federal troops to the South during Reconstruction to prevent former Confederates from instituting restrictive laws and economic policies that would have resembled the antebellum order. The removal of these troops in 1877 and the dissolution of the Freedmen's Bureau five years earlier signaled the limits of the nation's commitment to ensuring racial equality for newly freed African Americans. Southern state governments rapidly instituted harsh legal codes and segregation in public accommodations while Northern whites did little to intervene. African Americans carried on the freedom struggle in their communities, churches, schools, and newspapers as the nineteenth century entered its final decades of segregation, violence, and lynching. Some former abolitionists also aided Southern black communities by founding black colleges.

Lessons from the Anti-Slavery Movement

The end of slavery was not enough by itself to ensure civil rights for African Americans; that struggle would continue and mature into the civil rights movement of the 1950s and 1960s. But the anti-slavery movement of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries left important legacies for later activists. Throughout these two centuries, opponents of slavery kept abolition on the public agenda through tactics including non-violence, media campaigns, lecturing, and boycotts that would be staples of subsequent movements. They braved violence and even broke the law in pursuit of their cause. Women and African Americans demanded equal footing within anti-slavery organizations and would do so in the civil rights groups of the twentieth century. Although the struggle for racial equality was far from over in 1870, the anti-slavery movement succeeded in its goal of bringing about the final abolition of slavery.

SEE ALSO: American Slave Rebellions; Brown, John (1800–1859); Douglass, Frederick (1817–1895); Garrison, William Lloyd (1805–1879); Nat Turner Rebellion; Slave Rescues and the Underground Railroad, United States; Truth, Sojourner (ca. 1797–1883); Walker, David (1785–1830)

References and Suggested Readings

- Blue, F. J. (2005) No Taint of Compromise: Crusaders in Antislavery Politics. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.
- Bordewich, F. M. (2005) Bound for Canaan: The Epic Story of the Underground Railroad, America's First Integrated Civil Rights Movement. New York: Amistad.
- Egerton, D. (1993) Gabriel's Rebellion: The Virginia Slave Conspiracies of 1800 and 1802. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Egerton, D. (1999) "He Shall Go Out Free": The Lives of Denmark Vesey. Madison, WI: Madison House.
- Goodman, P. (1998) Of One Blood: Abolitionism and the Origins of Racial Equality. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Greenberg, K. (Ed.) (2003) Nat Turner: A Slave Rebellion in History and Memory. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Jeffrey, J. R. (1998) The Great Silent Army of Abolitionism: Ordinary Women in the Antislavery Movement. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Nash, G. B. & Soderlund, J. R. (1991) Freedom by Degrees: Emancipation in Pennsylvania and Its Aftermath. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Newman, R. S. (2002) The Transformation of American Abolitionism: Fighting Slavery in the Early Republic. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Soderlund, J. R. (1974) Quakers and Slavery: A Divided Spirit. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Wood, P. H. (1974) Black Majority: Negroes in Colonial South Carolina from 1670 through the Stono Rebellion. New York: W. W. Norton.
- Zilversmit, A. (1967) The First Emancipation: The Abolition of Slavery in the North. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Anti-Vietnam War movement, Britain

Sylvia Ellis

In the 1960s, opposition to the Vietnam War provided a focus for political protest and cultural rebellion in Britain, uniting students, dissident MPs, activists, and cultural rebels into a single-issue campaign. The movement began as early as 1953 when a communist sympathizer, Commander Edgar Young, formed the British–Vietnam Committee (BVC) and began publishing the Vietnam Bulletin. In 1962 the BVC held a rally with 70 protesters outside the US embassy in London.

The movement grew in intensity after the US began bombing North Vietnam and introduced ground troops in February 1965, sparking protest demonstrations at universities around the country and the formation of the communist-run British Council for Peace in Vietnam (BCPV) in April 1965. Labour MP Fenner Brockway served as its president. The BCPV was an umbrella organization that attempted to pull together the spiraling number of religious, labor, and political organizations that opposed the war, calling for a negotiated settlement and British dissociation through a concerted poster and newspaper campaign.

In 1966 a more radical anti-war group, the Vietnam Solidarity Campaign (VSC), was formed with Bertrand Russell as one of its supporters. The VSC, led by Trotskyists Tariq Ali and Pat Jordan, supported the National Liberation Front (the Vietcong) and campaigned openly for their victory. Ali was a member of the International Marxist Group, as well as editor of its newspaper, Black Dwarf, and encouraged the idea that students could be a revolutionary vanguard.

Student radicals, many belonging to far-left groups such as the International Socialists, had organized many of the occupations of university buildings between 1967 and 1968 and helped organize demonstrations against the war. The most potent symbol of youth protest was provided by the televised pictures of students attempting to march to Grosvenor Square, the location of the American embassy. On March 17, 1968 a VSC-organized march ended with police horses charging into the 10,000-strong crowd and making several arrests; the apogee of the movement came on October 2, 1968, when the largest London demonstration took place, with up to 100,000 protesters.

There was also a cultural dimension to the anti-war protests, noticeably by students in art colleges producing striking expressions of anti-war sentiment through posters and symbols, but also through the participation of artists, actors, and musicians in the demonstrations. After attending the March 1968 Grosvenor Square rally and witnessing over-reaction by the police during the demonstration, Mick Jagger of the Rolling Stones was inspired to write his most political song, "Street Fighting Man."

The anti-Vietnam war movement in Britain was not confined to student protest and direct action campaigns. Many left-wing members of the Parliamentary Labour Party condemned American action in Vietnam, participating in motions in the House of Commons and organizing petitions to the prime minister and the American embassy. A small minority of MPs participated in organized anti-war groups such as the BCPV. Constituency Labour parties, trades councils, trade unions, cooperatives, and women's groups also expressed anger at the American bombing campaign and outrage and disappointment at Britain's support for US policy in Vietnam, urging British dissociation.

Many of the early accounts of the anti-Vietnam War movement emphasized its smallness and the dominant role of students. More recent assessments have also acknowledged that protest against the war did not constitute a mass movement, that demonstrations against the war were predominantly student affairs, and that the anti-war protests in Britain were less radical than those in the United States and continental Europe. The movement's largely middle-class composition and US-inspiration has also been noted, and the altruistic nature of the movement has been stressed, noting that British student protesters were not faced with the draft. The political symbolism of the Vietnam War for British youth, in particular, has also been recorded. Not only did activists oppose the war on humanitarian grounds, but the war allowed them to criticize the Labour government for betraying their social democratic ideals.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Vietnam War Movement, United States; Britain, Post-World War II Political Protest

References and Suggested Readings

- Ali, T. (1987) Street Fighting Years: An Autobiography of the Sixties. London: Collins.
- Caute, D. (1988) Sixty-Eight: The Year of the Barricades. London: Hamish Hamilton.
- Edmonds, A. O. (1994) The Viet Nam War and the British Student Left: A Study in Political Symbolism. Viet Nam Generation 5, 1-4 (March).

Ellis, S. (1995) British Opposition to the Vietnam War, 1964-68. In K. Versluys (Ed.), The Insular Dream: Obsession and Resistance. Amsterdam: Vu University Press.

Fraser, R. (1988) 1968: A Student Generation in Revolt. London: Chatto & Windus.

Widgery, D. (1976) The Left in Britain, 1956-1968. London: Penguin.

Anti-Vietnam War movement, United States

Rick Clapton

The first protests in the United States against the Vietnam War were small and little noticed. Yet by the 1970s, opposition to the war divided Americans more deeply than any issue since the country's Civil War (1861-5). Most importantly, Vietnam War protests, in combination with other 1960s movements, destroyed Americans' unquestioning faith in their government.

American merchant marines became the first Americans to protest their country's involvement in Vietnam. Within two months of Vietnam's independence, US authorities diverted as many as twelve troop ships from their task of returning soldiers to the States and sent them to transport US-armed French troops and Foreign Legionnaires from France to Vietnam. The entire crews of four of the merchant marine ships met in Saigon and drew up a resolution against the US government, protesting the use of American ships to transport French troops for the purpose of subjugating a native population. In the almost two decades after World War II, few voices of dissent were heard addressing the Cold War's greatest attacks on communism. Yet by 1963 the waning popularity of Ngo Dinh Diem's American backed government had reached a boiling point within Vietnam. Much of this dissent originated from the patronage, the corruption, and the manipulation of the peasant population on which Diem's family oligarchy rested.

On May 8, 1963 in Hue, government troops fired into a crowd protesting a Diemist law forbidding the flying of religious flags celebrating the 2,527th anniversary of the Buddha's birth, killing eight unarmed Buddhists. Diem's government denied the shootings and shifted blame to the communists. Despite the deceptive spin, the Buddhist revolt against Diem's family rule deepened. On June 11, 1963 Thich Quang Duc immolated himself on a busy downtown Saigon street. Forewarned about the event, reporters captured graphic images that splashed across American and global newspapers and television. The coverage brought international pressure, questioning why the Americans would support a regime that persecuted religious worshippers.

The self-sacrifice of Duc brought others to protest the war in a similar manner. On a Detroit, MI street in March 1965, 82-year-old Alice Herz attempted self-immolation. An unidentified man and his two sons were driving by and saw the flames. Stopping, they extinguished the fire. Their efforts failed, and Herz died ten days later in hospital. Seven months later, below the third-floor Pentagon window of Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara, Norman Morrison, a 31-year-old Quaker pacifist, doused his body in kerosene and set himself alight. Morrison brought his 1-year-old daughter Emily, and it remains unclear whether he set her down or threw her to the crowd. Many believed Morrison's daughter signified the senseless murder of children in Vietnam. A week later, Roger LaPorte immolated himself outside the United Nations Building in New York. In mid-October 1967 Florence Beaumont set herself alight outside the Federal Buildings in Los Angeles. George Winne Jr. stands as the last American to self-immolate in protest of the war. On May 10, 1970 he set himself alight in Revelle Plaza on the campus of the University of California, San Diego. He died ten hours later. With his final words he asked his mother to write a letter to President Richard Nixon.

Most acts of protest against the war were not as horrifying. Still, by 1966 – one year after the US officially entered the war in Vietnam under the Tonkin Gulf Resolution – politicians became concerned with the growing number of protests. The House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC) began investigating Americans they believed to be supporting the National Front for the Liberation of South Vietnam and began drafting a bill that would make such activities illegal. On August 16, during the HUAC's first meeting convened to discuss the bill, police and security forces arrested 50 anti-war protesters who disrupted the meeting.

Many forms of protest against the Vietnam War proved controversial, as signified by the labeling of politicians as either hawks (those who supported the war) or doves (those who opposed the war). No doubt, draft dodging stood as one of the most controversial forms of protest. Draft evasion occurred in a number of different forms. First, because National Guard soldiers remained exempt from active duty in Vietnam, young men that came from well-connected political families avoided active duty in Vietnam by enlisting. Second, others avoided the draft by exploiting loopholes in legislation: staying in post-secondary education; feigning mental illness; and inflicting some form of physical ailment that would cause draftees to fail the military physical were all viable means to avoid the draft. Also, claiming homosexuality caused potential recruits to be rejected, but ardent homophobia made this option unattractive. Third, tens of thousands emigrated to Sweden, Canada, and to a lesser extent Mexico to avoid the draft. Ironically, the number of Americans that avoided the draft by moving to Canada remained equal to the number of Canadians that voluntarily served in Vietnam.

It remains difficult to separate the Vietnam protests from the other social movements of the 1960s, particularly the civil rights movement. Martin Luther King Jr. remains the most famous pastor and civil rights advocate that spoke out against the war in Vietnam. In April 1967 King stated that the crusade for civil rights and protest against the war in Vietnam were one and the same, citing the government's exploitation of the poor as evidence; black men and white men fought side-by-side in battle, but could not live on the same city block in America. This disastrous disparity, King argued, taught people that violence worked to solve problems. Peace, he believed, stood as the moral cornerstone of the United States of America. In light of the sheer amount of dissent at the end of the 1960s, many believed that the United States had truly lost its way, spurning King to declare that "if America's soul becomes totally poisoned, part of the autopsy must read Vietnam."

As early as 1954 civil rights activist Malcolm X had spoken out against the war in Vietnam, drawing parallels between the war there and the Mau Mau rebellion against the British in Kenya. Further, as a member of the Nation of Islam he protested the draft, stating that its people believed in a peaceful nation – they rejected waging war on any nation and the senseless acts of aggression in Vietnam went against their convictions. In August 1963, two years before the official entry of the US into Vietnam, Malcolm X spoke publicly, encouraging African Americans to resist the draft – and they did. In February of the following year, Cassius Clay won the World Heavyweight Boxing Championship; immediately after the fight he announced that he had joined the Nation of Islam and discarded his slave name, choosing instead Muhammad Ali. Three years later the US government drafted Ali. He politely cooperated with military personnel, but refused the army oath; later, an all-white jury found him guilty of draft evasion and he was sentenced to time in prison and stripped him of both his boxing licence and championship belt. In 1971 the Supreme Court overturned the conviction and returned his boxing licence. Still, the refusal to serve by one of the sport's most famed and inflammatory figures fueled the fires of protest in the latter part of the 1960s.

To the growing list of dissident voices, musicians added a tempo to which the protesters marched and chanted their rallying cries. In 1965 Tom Paxton wrote "Lyndon Johnson Told the Nation," producing one of the first specific Vietnam War protest songs. By 1968 a significant number of protest songs reached billboard charts. Although Buffalo Springfield's "For What It's Worth" protested anti-loitering laws, it became a hit single and rallying cry of the Vietnam War protesters. Arlo Guthrie's 18-minute "Alice's Restaurant" song told of the tale of his being convicted of littering, getting drafted, and not being selected to join the army due to his inane criminal past. The most poignant protest song remains Jimi Hendrix's 1969 rendition of the "Star Spangled Banner" at the Woodstock Music Festival. Showcasing his talent as one of the greatest guitarists of all time, Hendrix's version injected imitated sounds of war into the US National Anthem. Others such as Bob Dylan, John Lennon, Pink Floyd, Crosby, Stills, Nash & Young, Martha and the Vandellas, and Marvin Gaye gained widespread popularity for their stand against the war. So popular were many of these songs that decades later they still stood as the greatest ballads of the classic rock era.

Although still smarting from the HUAC-instigated communist "witch hunts" that occurred during the 1950s, celebrities also made an impact on the anti-war movement. As a young adult, Danny Glover worked tirelessly in the civil rights movement. His beliefs fueled his anti-war sentiments and during the late 1960s he worked as an anti-draft counsellor. Jane Fonda – daughter of actor Henry Fonda – proved to be one of the most ardent anti-Vietnam protesters. She participated in demonstrations and spoke passionately against the war during rallies; in 1972 she posed for a photograph with a North Vietnamese anti-aircraft gun. Some viewed the act as unpatriotic, while others labeled Fonda as a traitor and expressed their outrage by nicknaming her "Hanoi Jane." That same year, Canadian-born actor Donald Sutherland and Fonda co-produced and starred together in the anti-Vietnam touring company called the Free Theater Associates. The company put on a series of sketches performed outside army bases in the Pacific Rim. These shows included interviews with American troops who were then on active service, and contributed to the growing dissent among military personnel and veterans.

Although not a public figure at the time, John Kerry emerged as a leader of Vietnam Veterans Against the War (VVAW). In April 1971 Kerry made a statement to the US Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. The statement urged the United States government to withdraw from Vietnam, stating that communism was not the enemy, and that a lack of purpose for Americans in Vietnam demoralized troops. That same month VVAW made a poignant statement against the war by throwing their combat medals onto the steps of the White House. Morale among the soldiers in Vietnam had been declining since 1968, largely due to President Nixon's Vietnamization program. Both its amorphous objectives and policy of not winning the war undermined the military's effectiveness. By the early 1970s substance abuse, desertion, racial violence, and insubordination plagued the ranks of the US army. Further, in response to not wanting to be "the last man to die in Vietnam," many soldiers began adopting the dress of peace protesters. In the years after 1969 incidents of "fragging" (assault or killing with a fragmentation grenade) of military superiors more than doubled, and due to the difficulty of gathering sufficient evidence, few soldiers were court-martialed.

Like the actions of some soldiers, student protests at times became violent. In response to President Nixon's announcement on April 30, 1970 that the Vietnam War was expanding into Cambodia in an attempt to stop supplies coming down the Ho Chi Minh trail, student protest erupted. Fanned by Nixon's inflammatory statement that those "blowing up the campuses" were "bums," violence on American campuses expanded. Protesters bombed and burned Reserve Officer Training Corps (ROTC) buildings from Yale to the University of Wisconsin. On May 3, at Kent State University in Ohio, protesters burned down the ROTC building. The next day, after massive unrest and protest, authorities called in police and the National Guard in an attempt to restore public order. Police opened fire on the crowds, killing four students and injuring nine others. Afterwards, Crosby, Stills, Nash & Young epitomized the event in their song "Four Dead in Ohio." Two days later, police shot and wounded several students at the SUNY-Buffalo campus. On May 14 police were called to Jackson State University in Mississippi by firefighters after protesters started fires and overturned several vehicles. After confronting protesters for a period of time, city and state police fired into the crowd of protesters, killing two and injuring twelve. In late August 1970 four students, tired of the federal government's lack of action, resorted to violence. At the University of Wisconsin-Madison they bombed Sterling Hall, which housed the physics department where researchers conducted experiments for the US military and its dealings in Vietnam. The enormous car bomb inflicted tremendous damage and killed Dr. Robert Fassnacht, who was working in the building during the early hours of the morning.

Although eclipsed by the violence, a large portion of student protests remained planned and peaceful. Non-violent student groups emerged during the 1960s, often to rebel against many of the injustices that plagued American society. During the second half of the 1960s student activists protested against the Vietnam War largely due to the possibility of their being drafted. Students for a Democratic Society (SDS) emerged in the mid-1960s as the biggest student organization. In late March 1965 SDS organized the first major teach-in at the University of Michigan. Approximately 2,500 attended the event. The teach-in consisted of debates, lectures, movies, and musical events aimed at educating people about the immorality of the war. The widespread popularity of teachins caused the movement to spread across the country; these forms of protests, in combination with sit-ins, caused the SDS to become a household name.

Intellectuals and academics joined the growing voices of dissent on university campuses. In 1968 the New York Times published Noam Chomsky's "The Responsibility of Intellectuals." In his anti-war essay Chomsky argued that all Americans held responsibility to question the deceit and deception of the American government, but more so intellectuals due to the privilege they enjoyed. Some of these privileged few, however, supported the US government's foreign policies that exploited and colonized other nations through outright deception. Chomsky felt that erudites, with their access to information and freedom of expression, should expose the lies and misinformation, thus providing leadership for the resistance against the war in Vietnam. In keeping with his exhortatory essay, Chomsky refused to pay taxes that he believed supported the US government's flawed foreign policy in Vietnam.

In 1966 British philosopher Bertrand Russell published War Crimes in Vietnam. In his book Russell compared the atrocities occurring in Vietnam with the Holocaust. Shortly after the book's release, Russell organized an International War Crimes Tribunal to investigate and evaluate US foreign policy. Here, distinguished award-winning members of the global community heard testimony about the war crimes that had occurred in Vietnam. Still, no direct representation from either Vietnam or the United States sat on the tribunal. Consequently, the US labeled it a leftist show trial and the whole affair was largely ignored. The tribunal received some attention from the international community and it provided further awareness about US dealings in Vietnam.

In 1969, after Nixon introduced his program of Vietnamization, the US began its withdrawal of troops. Despite this change in government policy, the war later expanded into Cambodia and Laos and protests against the war escalated. Most protests outside of Washington had little impact on government policies or actions; however, the unauthorized release of "The United States-Vietnam Relations, 1945-1967: A Study Prepared by the Department of Defense," or the "Pentagon Papers," in early 1970 and their subsequent printing in the New York Times and Washington Post spurred a host of legal actions by the US government. Commissioned by Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara in 1967, this 47-volume, 7,000-page study documented the politico-military involvement of the US in Vietnam. The release of the papers proved embarrassing not only to the Nixon administration, but also to the Kennedy and Johnson administrations by showing that the government had repeatedly lied and misinformed Americans. This leak led to the development of the Plumber's Group, Watergate, and the first resignation of an American president.

Over the course of the Vietnam War, South Korea, Australia, and New Zealand supported the US with equipment and troops. By the early 1970s these countries began to remove their support in response to international and diplomatic pressure for the US and its allies to end the war in Vietnam. Australian Prime Minister Gough Whitlam, for example, won the 1972 election by promising to withdraw Australian troops from Vietnam. After winning the election he fulfilled his election promise. During the same period peace talks between the US and Vietnam broke down. In response, President Nixon initiated the most intensive bombing campaign of North Vietnam of the entire war. Sweden's Prime Minister Olaf Palme denounced the escalated aggression, comparing the bombings with Nazi atrocities committed during World War II. Both Russia and China threatened to reconsider détente, which had been the most successful peace negotiations of the entire Cold War. China's Premier Zhou Enlai and Jiang Qing – Mao Zedong's wife – attended a mass rally in Beijing in support of North Vietnam.

In response to domestic and international protests, the war ended in January 1973 when the US and North Vietnam signed the Paris Peace Accord. Two years later North Vietnamese soldiers invaded Saigon in violation of the agreement. Authorities evacuated the American embassy there under the cover of helicopter gunships.

Some have argued that protesters prolonged the war, that their action emboldened the enemy and eroded any chance the US had of winning. Whether or not this is the case, there is little doubt that the movement opposing the Vietnam War irrevocably altered America's social, political, and military landscape.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Vietnam War Movement, Britain; King, Martin Luther, Jr. (1929–1968) and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC); Russell, Bertrand (1872–1970); Students for a Democratic Society (SDS); Vietnam, Protest and Second Indochina War, 1960–1974

References and Suggested Readings

- Anderson, T. H. (1996) The Movement and the Sixties: Protest in America From Greensboro to Wounded Knee. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Foley, M. S. (2003) Confronting the War Machine: Draft Resistance During the Vietnam War. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Garfinkle, A. (1997) Telltale Hearts: The Origins and Impact of the Vietnam Antwar Movement. New York: St. Martin's Press.
- Moser, R. R. (1996) The New Winter Soldiers: GI and Veteran Dissent During the Vietnam Era. New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press.
- Moss, G. D. (1994) Vietnam: An American Ordeal. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall.
- Small, M. (1994) Covering Dissent: The Media and the Anti-Vietnam War Movement. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press.

Anti-war activism, Yugoslavia, 1990s

Boris Kanzleiter

The outbreak of war in the former Yugoslavia in 1991/92 was a first reminder that the collapse of socialism in Eastern Europe and the end of the Cold War would not lead to a period of prosperity and peace, as many had hoped, but to a world of increasing conflict and social destruction. During the military conflicts in Slovenia in 1991, Croatia 1991–5, Bosnia-Herzegovina 1992–5, Kosovo 1996–9, Serbia 1999, and Macedonia 2001, an estimated 150,000 people were killed and millions were made homeless. The breakup of the multinational state, war atrocities, and images of “ethnic cleansing” were widely interpreted as signs of a new era of a “clash of civilizations” and “ethnic conflict.”

A closer look at the conflicts in former Yugoslavia, however, reveals that the wars were much more linked to social and institutional crisis, the rapidly changing international power relations after the end of the precarious stability of bloc-confrontation, and the political agendas of local power elites than to “ancient ethnic hatred” among different peoples in the country that was destroyed. Although nationalist political forces in a different scale gained mass support in all of the former Yugoslav republics, there was also widespread active and passive resistance to violence and the forceful breakup of the society on ethnic lines. According to opinion polls in the summer of 1990, only one year before the conflict escalated, only a small minority of 16 percent of the total population favored the idea that every national group should form its own national state.

Active resistance against nationalism and war came from different layers of society and political groups. The most notable attempt of elite groups to stop the destruction of the country was led by the communist politician and former partisan Ante Markovic (b. 1924), prime minister of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (SRFY) from March 1989 until December 1991. After the official dissolving of the League of Communist of Yugoslavia (LCY) in January 1990, he formed the League of Reform Forces aiming to hold the country together and to start a process of democratization. His work was torpedoed by nationalist presidents of the republics like Slobodan Milosevic in Serbia, Franjo Tudjman in Croatia, and Milan Kucan in Slovenia.

At the same time, a range of grassroots organizations and an emerging civil society were engaged in anti-nationalist and anti-war activism. A serious attempt by intellectuals from all parts of the country to form a political alternative was the founding of the Association for Yugoslav Democratic Initiative (UJDI). It brought together many former student activists from 1968. The UJDI program sought a democratic federal Yugoslavia, legalization of a multi-party system, and direct elections to the Chamber of Citizens in the federal parliament. Its attempts failed, but UJDI was a nucleus for many non-governmental organizations and groups, which continued to campaign against nationalism and war during the 1990s. These included human rights organizations like the Helsinki Committees in the different republics, women's groups like Women in Black (Belgrade), political organizations like the Citizens Union of Serbia (GSS), and media like the journal Republika (Belgrade), Arkzin (Zagreb), and Radio Zid (Sarajevo).

While the international media spread the image of an "ethnic war" in which virtual neighbors were killing each other, the reality on the battlefields often looked very different. It was mainly (para-)military groups which terrorized the civilian population, making any resistance to the killings almost impossible. In spite of this there were many examples of "interethnic" support and help at an individual level. Apart from organized attempts to oppose the policies of nationalism and war, many citizens resisted and often risked their lives. For example, the Serb teenager Srdjan Aleksic defended his Muslim friend Alen Glavovic against an attack of Serbian paramilitaries in the town of Trebinje in Bosnia-Herzegovina in January 1993. He was subsequently killed by the aggressors. According to estimates, more than 200,000 young male citizens refused to be drafted by the army during the 1990s. Many of them had to emigrate or to go underground, often for a long period of time.

The war in Yugoslavia was a breaking point for the international peace movement. A part of the international left embraced the idea of "humanitarian intervention" as a means to stop war by foreign military intervention. Key figures of these ideas were some prominent intellectuals and politicians from the 1968 protest movements in Germany and France, like Joschka Fischer and Daniel Cohn-Bendit from the Green Party. Another segment of the international left – like linguist and political activist Noam Chomsky or literature Nobel Prize winner Harold Pinter – strongly opposed "humanitarian intervention" as a form of new "imperialism." The opposing views were motivated by differing analyses of the character of war in Yugoslavia. While the "interventionists" claimed the breakup of the state was mainly due to internal factors, the "anti-interventionists" saw the war mainly as a result of western politics favoring the destruction of Yugoslavia.

SEE ALSO: Yugoslavia, Anti-Fascist "People's Liberation War" and Revolution, 1941–1945; Yugoslavia, Student Protests, 1966–1974

References and Suggested Readings

- Popov, N. & Gojkovic, D. (Eds.) (1999) The Road to War in Serbia: Trauma and Catharsis. Budapest: Central European University Press.
- Sekelj, L. (1992) Yugoslavia: Process of Disintegration. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Women in Black (Eds.) (1995) War Deserters in the Former Yugoslavia. Belgrade: Women in Black.
- Woodward, S. L. (1995) Balkan Tragedy: Chaos and Dissolution after the Cold War. Washington, DC: Brooking Institution Press.

Anti-war movement, France, 20th century

Melanie A. Bailey

Anti-war movements in France evolved from the broad internationalist efforts of the first half of the twentieth century to take the form of focused protests against particular kinds of conflicts, such as the “imperialist” war in Indochina or the “dirty” war in Algeria. Although the effect of such activism may be debated, it is clear that their efforts have shaped modern French culture.

In the decade before 1914, French socialists and pacifists promoted the formation of institutions that would dispose nations toward diplomacy. By means of newspaper articles, speeches, and rallies, they celebrated the early efforts of the International Court of Arbitration at The Hague; they pressured the French government to empower conflict resolution by funding the court and by fully supporting the work of French delegate Aristide Briand. Internationalists repeatedly averred that their cultivation of pan-European fraternity did not imply that they loved France any less than financiers and businessmen who formed international partnerships.

The tension between patriotism and internationalism would be broken in favor of the former. Throughout July 1914, socialist leader Jean Jaurès strived to persuade the French government to declare its neutrality in a Russo-German conflict. War, as he asserted in various articles published in L'Humanité, would be the product of a desire for war on the part of governments and citizens, not of necessity. The July 31 assassination of Jaurès by an ardent French nationalist rendered it virtually certain that France would become involved in World War I, especially as the socialists lost any will to organize a general strike against troop mobilization. Indeed, most socialists and anarchists supported the war. The “sacred union” of political parties within a wartime government of national unity kept potential anti-war leaders in check. Most citizens firmly believed that the French had been tasked with defending liberty and their territory against German aggression.

By 1917, evidence of war profiteering and conspicuous consumption revived class conflict. Workplace conditions and low wages prompted increasing numbers of strikes. Tensions between officers and men, who endured miserable conditions and who did not always receive scheduled rotations away from the front, led to mutinies. Though Marshal Pétain believed that pacifists were to blame for these mutinies, soldiers were in fact expressing discontent more with the manner in which the war was fought than with the war itself. Opposition to the war was restricted to a relatively small minority.

After 1918, however, the material and human costs of the war began to weigh upon the consciousness (and consciences) of leaders and citizens alike. Socialists strived to reduce the willingness of future generations of French men and women to go to war. Since most public schoolteachers were socialists or communists, the curriculum offered to French children was informed by pacifist ideals. International exchanges of students, especially between Germany and France, occurred, as did conferences between French and German intellectuals. French organizers of such activities hoped that their efforts would inspire similar goodwill on the other side and diffuse the hatreds that were empowering fascism.

By the mid-1930s, “pacifism” was an element in the ideologies of both left-wing internationalists and right-wing fascists in France. In the years after the “strange defeat” of 1940, French men and women pondered the differences between pacifism and defeatism. Those who joined the Resistance concluded that violence was a legitimate response when confronted by evil; basic liberties and human rights should be defended even when doing so entailed bloodshed. Although the Resistance involved only a relatively small percentage of French citizens, it left an indelible mark. The principles of the Resistance later inspired efforts to end the wars in Indochina and Algeria.

The fractious political left in France unified in opposition to French war to retain control of Indochina. Although the socialists did not share exactly the same hopes for an independent Southeast Asia as the French Communist Party (PCF), they all rejected French imperialism. Hence, they vociferously supported Henri Martin, a French naval officer and member of the PCF who had enlisted to fight the Japanese but instead found himself deployed to suppress the independence movements in Indochina. Upon returning to France, Martin distributed leaflets about the war in Indochina; he was arrested by the military police in 1950 for sedition and sentenced to five years in prison. His case became a cause célèbre, given Martin's stature as a former participant in the Resistance and the disproportion between his "crime" and the sentence. Meanwhile, anti-war workers sabotaged armaments production. Although many conservatives decried negotiations, the majority of French citizens accepted the 1954 decision by Prime Minister Pierre Mendès-France to end the French presence in Indochina and in Tunisia: the public had become averse to "imperialist" wars.

Whereas French military activities in Indochina could be cast as imperialism almost without controversy, opponents to the conflict in Algeria found it more difficult to apply that label. According to the constitution of the Fourth Republic, the three départements into which Algeria had been divided were theoretically equal in status to those on the mainland. A large population of European settlers identified Algeria as their home, and these pièdes noirs urged the French government to crush Algerian nationalism. During the Sétif massacres of 1945, French soldiers killed thousands of Algerian Muslims, intending to stifle any independence movement. However, poverty, injustice, and general disillusionment with French leadership galvanized nationalism and increased support for groups such as the National Liberation Front (Front de Libération Nationale, FLN).

Public reaction to the situation in Algeria was muted, for the most part, until the 1956 decision by the socialist government of Guy Mollet to grant emergency powers to the military and civilian administrators. In so doing, Mollet gave license for the military to use torture to secure victory. The case of Maurice Audin, a university mathematician arrested, tortured, and "disappeared" (after being accidentally killed by his police captors) in Algiers, caused intellectuals and many ordinary citizens to express opposition to the methods being used in the "dirty war." The political and military situation reminded some French citizens of fascism. Some decided to oppose the policies of their government actively, just as they or those they admired had done as part of the Resistance to Nazism. Perhaps as many as a few hundred French men and women aided the FLN by ensuring that funds collected from Algerians living in France reached FLN leaders. These French "suitcase carriers" were members of the Jeanson group (founded by intellectual Francis Jeanson); they were prosecuted and sentenced to prison terms in 1960. The trial provided anti-war activists with a platform from which they could justify their opposition to the French military's behavior and the overall French presence in Algeria.

The advent of such a platform was important because the government had eliminated virtually all legal means to express opposition to the war publicly. Efforts to publicize the use of torture in Algeria were censored. Although Henri Alleg's La Question (The Question) (1958), which described his torture at the hands of the French military, was initially available in bookstores, newspapers were not allowed to print excerpts from the memoir. After thousands of French citizens purchased a copy in the first month of its publication, the government decided to prevent further sales. When a group of prominent intellectuals and celebrities, ranging from Jean-Paul Sartre and Marguerite Duras to Simone Signoret and François Truffaut, signed what became known as the Manifesto of the 121 (1960), the government prevented newspapers from printing the text. The signatories of the Manifesto expressed approval of French citizens who aided the FLN, describing resistance in such circumstances as a "sacred duty." Despite censorship, periodicals such as Esprit and Sartre's Les Temps Modernes (Modern Times) helped their readers to understand the conflict and to evaluate what responses they were morally or politically obliged to make.

Although opponents to the Algerian War were always a small minority of the French citizenry, their efforts probably encouraged the government to develop a strategy to end the violence. A large demonstration in support of the government in its negotiations with the FLN (and against the insurrectionary efforts of the Organisation de l'armée secrète, OAS) indicated that the 1964 Evian Accords would be endorsed by referendum. Although the French had not generally opposed the war, they supported peace: the Accords were ratified by more than 90 percent of the population in mainland France.

The Algerian War was the last major conflict in which French troops have become involved and against which large numbers of anti-war activists became engaged. Most of the French political left supported the deployment of French troops to Bosnia as part of the NATO operation in the former Yugoslavia. European peace and the end to the French empire – both achieved in the wake of twentieth-century conflicts and the opposition that they inspired – have reduced the likelihood that anti-war activists will need to oppose a French-led war in the near future.

SEE ALSO: Algerian National Revolution, 1954–1962; Anti-Vietnam War Movement, Britain; Anti-Vietnam War Movement, United States; Anti-War Movement, Iraq; Counterrecruitment; Jaurès, Jean (1859–1914); May 1968 French Uprisings; Vietnam, First Indochina War, 1945–1954

References and Suggested Readings

- Defrasne, J. (1994) Le Pacifisme en France (Pacifism in France). Paris: Presses Universitaires de France.
- Evans, M. (1997) The Memory of Resistance: French Opposition to the Algerian War (1954–1962). Oxford: Berg.
- Ingram, N. (1991) The Politics of Dissent: Pacifism in France, 1919–1939. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Shalk, D. L. (1991) War and the Ivory Tower: Algeria and Vietnam. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Siegel, M. (2005) The Moral Disarmament of France: Education, Pacifism, and Patriotism, 1914–1940. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Anti-war movement, Iraq

David Michael Smith

International resistance to the US invasion of Iraq became the largest, most diverse, and arguably first genuinely global anti-war movement in the annals of human experience. By March 2002, people throughout the world had begun mobilizing to oppose the George W. Bush administration's increasingly obvious plans for war in Iraq. On March 16, in Barcelona, about 300,000 people participated in the European Social Forum's march against globalization and war. When the president visited Berlin and Paris in late May, tens of thousands of protesters greeted him with anti-war slogans and epithets. In early September, former South African President Nelson Mandela expressed the view of the majority of the world's peoples when he described Bush's plans for war as a threat to world peace.

In the autumn of 2002, the extraordinary size and scope of the global movement against war in Iraq became clear. On September 28, about 400,000 people participated in an anti-war demonstration in London called Stop The War Coalition (STWC) and the Muslim Association of Britain. It was the largest anti-war event held in the UK in decades. On the same day, more than 100,000 people took to the streets in Rome, while scores of thousands of others marched in Beirut, Gaza City, and in cities in Australia and New Zealand. As many as 20,000 people gathered for an anti-war rally in New York City's Central Park, and thousands more participated in protests in San Francisco, Los Angeles, Chicago, and other US cities.

On October 26, 2002 ANSWER organized a national anti-war demonstration that brought some 200,000 people to Washington, the largest anti-war demonstration since the Vietnam War. At the same time, thousands of others turned out for protests in other US cities. The turnout, diversity, and energy of the October 26 actions confirmed that a serious anti-war movement was developing in the US. But it was also increasingly clear that the anti-war movement in the US did not speak with one voice. The day before the October 26 protests, several organizations from the left announced the creation of a new anti-war coalition, which became known as United for Peace and Justice (UPJ). On November 9, as many as one million people participated in an anti-war march and rally sponsored by the European Social Forum in Florence. This was one of the largest protests held in Europe since the end of World War II, and the inclusion of US peace activists on the speakers' platform in Florence was only one indication of growing international coordination in the global anti-war movement.

In late December 2002 and early January 2003, as the Bush administration deployed a growing number of US military forces to the Persian Gulf, anti-war protests broke out in Egypt, Bahrain, Morocco, Pakistan, and India. On January 8, 2003, train drivers in Scotland refused to operate freight trains carrying ammunition from the Glasgow area to the Glen Douglas military base, the largest North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) weapons storage facility in Europe. Growing opposition to war among US union members led to the formation of US Labor against the War (USLAW) in Chicago on January 11. By mid-January, hundreds of peace advocates from around the world were arriving in Baghdad to voice their opposition to the impending invasion in Jakarta, Osaka, Tokyo, and Geneva called for internationally coordinated protests on September 27. But after a summer of waning actions against the war and occupation, much smaller numbers of people participated in the September 27 demonstrations. Tens of thousands marched in London and several Spanish cities, and turnout in a dozen other countries was even smaller. On October 25, an anti-war protest jointly organized by UPJ and ANSWER in Washington drew between 50,000 and 100,000 people.

Although many people drifted away from the global anti-war movement because of disillusionment and demoralization after the fall of Iraq, others continued to organize marches, rallies, civil disobedience actions, and educational programs. On February 15, 2004, the first anniversary of the historic global day of action against war, more than 150,000 rallied in Madrid. The following month, in the aftermath of terrorist attacks on Madrid trains, the Spanish anti-war movement helped ensure the electoral defeat of Prime Minister José Maria Aznar, one of the few Western European leaders who had supported the invasion of Iraq. As many as 500,000 people demonstrated against the Republican National Convention in New York City on August 29, and opposition to the Iraq war was a prominent theme of the day. However, on November 2, Bush narrowly won reelection but received no popular mandate to continue the war and occupation in Iraq.

By 2005, as US casualties in Iraq mounted and domestic public opinion increasingly came to view the war as a mistake, anti-war activities began to increase again throughout the country. In January, tens of thousands of people protested Bush's second inauguration in Washington, while thousands of students walked out of their high school and college classrooms in California, Washington State, Colorado, and Illinois. Former military personnel who had served in the war launched Iraq Veterans against the War, and families who lost members in the war formed Gold Star Families for Peace. In February, dozens of towns in Vermont discussed, debated, and adopted anti-war resolutions while student organizers planned protests against military recruiters in several states. On March 19, internationally coordinated protests commemorating the second anniversary of the invasion drew much smaller numbers than the previous year but confirmed that the global movement had not disappeared. More than 100,000 people marched in London, and tens of thousands protested in New York City, but the turnout was lower at demonstrations in Barcelona, Stockholm, Oslo, Athens, Warsaw, Istanbul, and other cities in Asia, Africa, and Australia.

In August, Cindy Sheehan, whose son had died in the war, galvanized the US movement by setting up a camp outside Bush's ranch in Crawford, Texas for three weeks. On September 24, as many as 300,000 people participated in a march in Washington organized by UPJ, ANSWER, and Troops Out Now Coalition (TONC). Fifty thousand rallied in San Francisco, and 100,000 protested in London. Protests also took place in Rome, Brussels, Baghdad, Seoul, and some other cities. Two days later, more than 400 people were arrested in civil disobedience actions near the White House and the Pentagon.

As 2006 began, the anti-war movement in the US faced new opportunities and challenges. A majority of people in the US now believed that the war was a mistake and supported the withdrawal of troops from Iraq within the year. A growing number of students, workers, and military families began to take part in local anti-war activities across the country. Activists from the US and more than a dozen other countries planned another wave of coordinated protests on the third anniversary of the invasion of Iraq. While most activists recognized the need to organize larger civil disobedience actions and support the development of resistance within US military forces, concrete work on these projects continued to be limited.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Vietnam War Movement, Britain; Anti-Vietnam War Movement, United States; Anti-War Movement, France, 20th Century; World Social Forums

References and Suggested Readings

- Achcar, G. (2005) Whither Iraq? International Viewpoint. Available at www.internationalviewpoint.org/article.php?id_article=574 (posted February 24).
- Agence FP (2003) World Condemns Iraq War, Fears for Civilian Lives. Common Dreams News Center. Available at www.commondreams.org/headlines/03/0321-02.htm (posted March 21).
- Cortright, D. (2004) A Peaceful Superpower: The Movement against War in Iraq. Goshen, IN: Fourth Freedom Forum.
- Epstein, B. (2003) Notes on the Anti-War Movement. Monthly Review 55, 3 (July–August): 109–16.
- Ewert, J. (2005) Another Anti-War Movement Taking Shape? Columbia Chronicle. Available at

- www.ccchronicle.com/paper/citybeat.php?id=1917 (posted November 14).
- Gupta, A. (2006) Moving Forward: UFPJ and the Anti-War Movement. Left Turn Magazine #19. Available at www.leftturn.org/Articles/Viewer.aspx?id=827&type=M#top (posted January 28).
- Murray, A. & German, L. (2005) Stop the War – The Story of Britain’s Biggest Mass Movement. London: Bookmarks.
- Smith, S. (2005) The New Anti-War Majority. CounterPunch. Available at www.counterpunch.org/sharon08112005.html (posted August 11).
- Tyler, P. (2003) A New Power in the Streets. New York Times, February 17.

April Revolution, Nepal, 2006

Sushovan Dhar

On June 1, 2001, King Birendra of Nepal, his wife, and several members of the royal family were shot and killed by his son, Crown Prince Dipendra, who then committed suicide by shooting himself. Prince Gyanendra, the younger brother of King Birendra, was crowned king.

King Gyanendra dismissed the government in October 2002, labeling it corrupt and useless. He declared a state of emergency in November and ordered the army to crack down on the Maoist guerillas. On February 1, 2005, the royal coup was further advanced when the king appointed a government led by himself and simultaneously enforced martial law to deal with the insurgency. Several top political leaders were apprehended and other opposition leaders fled to India and regrouped there. A broad alliance, the Seven Party Alliance (SPA), was formed, including about 90 percent of the parliamentarians from the dissolved parliament, who came from the Nepali Congress Party (NCP), the Communist Party of Nepal (United Marxist Leninist) (CPN-UML), and others.

In December 2005, the SPA signed a 12-point understanding with the Maoists by which the Maoists committed themselves to multiparty democracy and freedom of speech, while the SPA accepted Maoist demands for elections to a Constituent Assembly. In early 2006, the situation became even more volatile as the SPA launched a series of agitations, followed by waves of arrests of opposition leaders. The agitations reached a peak around the February 8 municipal elections, which were boycotted by the SPA and the Maoists. Official figures claimed participation of about 21 percent of voters, a figure which is questioned by the opposition. The SPA’s call for a four-day nationwide general strike on April 5–9 elicited a massive spontaneous demonstration. Even the curfew from April 8 with orders to shoot protesters on sight could not deter the people’s protest.

On April 9, the SPA announced an indefinite strike and called for a tax boycott. The government responded with plans to step up its enforcement of the curfew and claimed that the Maoists had infiltrated the protests. Protests continued on the following days, involving about 100,000 to 200,000 people in Kathmandu, more than 10 percent of the city’s population. On April 21, opposition sources claim that about 500,000 took part in the protests in Kathmandu, forcing the king on the same evening to announce that he would return political power to the people and call early elections. He called on the SPA to nominate a new prime minister of Nepal in a speech on a state-owned television channel. However, the royal proclamation was rejected by the opposition. The next day, the leaders of the SPA met in the capital and set out three demands: the reinstatement of the old parliament; the formation of an all-party government; and elections to a Constituent Assembly that would draft a new constitution.

In a nationally televised address, King Gyanendra reinstated the Nepal House of Representatives on April 24, 2006 and called upon the SPA to bear the responsibility of running the nation. The reinstatement of parliament was accepted by the SPA and it nominated G. P. Koirala as head of the new government, stating that the new parliament would elect a body to draft the constitution. The move was rejected by the Maoists, with Baburam Bhattarai, a prominent leader of the Communist Party of Nepal (Maoist) (CPN-M), stating that merely restoring the parliament was not going to resolve the problems and that the rebels planned to continue fighting against government forces. They still demanded the formation of a Constituent Assembly and abolition of the monarchy.

The events in Nepal leading to the April Revolution were tumultuous and what was once regarded as antique and fixed changed rapidly. Citizenship rights were conferred on millions of formerly disenfranchised Nepalese, especially of the Tarai region, through the Nepal Citizenship Bill, and the very ground rules of nationhood were rewritten. The period also witnessed the transition of the Nepalese from being the king's subjects to citizens of a nation. The fundamentals of Nepali life were reviewed, including the roles of women or Dalits (marginal social groups who, according to the Hindu caste system, were considered untouchables) in the parliament and the fate of Hinduism as the official state religion. The Madhesi ethnic group, which comprises a third of Nepal's population of 29 million, was granted citizenship rights for the first time in the 50-year history of independent Nepal.

On April 27, 2006, the Maoists announced a unilateral three-month truce in the Nepal Civil War, responding to demands by G. P. Koirala, with a resolve to abolish the monarchy and elect a Constituent Assembly. In addition, Bhattarai announced that the Maoists would abide by the results of elections provided they were free and fair. This was a large step forward as it exemplified the first signs of Maoist acceptance of the democratic process and of liberal and moderate left parties.

On May 2, Koirala announced the new government cabinet, which included himself and three other ministers from the NCP, the CPN-UML, the Nepali Congress (Democratic), and the United Left Front. This was followed on May 12 by the arrest of four ministers from the ousted royalist government and an investigation into alleged human rights violations by the army during the general strike.

On May 18, 2006, parliament voted a bill stripping most of the king's powers, including placing the army under the control of parliament, imposing a tax on royal property, abolishing the royal advisory council, declaring Nepal a secular country, scrapping the existing national anthem, and removing references to the king as the supreme commander of the army. This overrode the 1990 Constitution. Though there were plans for a constitution through a Constituent Assembly, these provisional measures came into force for the time being. On June 16, 2006, the political parties of the government of the urban areas and the leadership of the CPN-M, representing the de facto government of the rest of the nation, reached an eight-point agreement as a precondition for immediate fair elections to a Constituent Assembly as demanded by the popular movements. The terms were as follows.

- The implementation of the earlier 12-point pact of November 2005 and the signing of a 25-point Ceasefire Code of Conduct between the SPA government and CPN-M on May 26, 2006.
- A commitment to the universal application of democratic norms and values, including a competitive multiparty system, civic liberties, fundamental human rights, press freedom, and the concept of the rule of law.
- A request to the UN to help monitor and manage the armies and weapons of both the government and Maoist sides prior to free and fair elections to the Constituent Assembly.
- The guarantee of democratic rights achieved through the popular movements of 1990 and 2006; the drafting of an interim constitution based on the 12-point pact and the Ceasefire Code of Conduct; the formation of an interim government; the announcement of a date for the Constituent Assembly elections; the dissolution of the House of Representatives through consensus after making alternative arrangements; and the dissolution of the parallel people's governments of the CPN-M.
- A consensus decision on the long-term issues of national interest.
- The guarantee of the fundamental right of the Nepalese to participate in the Constituent Assembly elections without fear, influence, threat, or violence; the invitation of international observers and monitors during the elections as necessary.
- The advancement of a forward-looking plan to restructure the state so as to resolve the class-, race-, region-, and gender-based problems through the Constituent Assembly elections; the transformation of the ceasefire between the Nepal government and CPN-M into a permanent peace by focusing on democracy, peace, prosperity, and change, and on the country's independence, sovereignty, and pride; a commitment to resolve problems through talks.
- A directive to the government and Maoist negotiators to accomplish all the tasks related to the above-mentioned points immediately.

The Role of Women, Labor Unions, and the Dalits in the Revolution

The overwhelming participation of women was a major force in the success of the anti-king protests, a fact that the CPN-M admitted in its statements. During the April movement, women comprised 45–70 percent of protesters. In urban and remote rural districts ranging from 10,000 to 50,000 people, women made up the majority of the protesters. Parliamentary approval for two important rights – namely, the reservation of 33 percent of seats for women representatives in parliament and citizenship on the basis of the mother’s nationality – were essential steps to ensure the participation of women in shaping the post-revolutionary society.

Yet despite their major role in the democracy movement in Nepal, women were excluded from all decision-making processes. In the cabinet, just one out of 20 ministers was a woman, Sahana Pradhan of the CPN-UML, who was minister of foreign affairs. Not one woman participated in the six-member committee formed to draft an interim constitution, nor did any woman in government or among the Maoists participate in peace negotiations. In a country where women comprise 52 percent of the population, the embedded patriarchal bias in the social and political spaces remained, despite the social revolution.

Nepali trade unions stood firm against the royal takeover from the very beginning. They embarked on a grand procession on May 1, 2005, the first of its kind since the royal takeover. More than 10,000 workers participated in Kathmandu. The royal regime responded by creating fake unions to divide workers. The anti-worker ordinance of “hire and fire” was promulgated in order to ban government employees’ unions from aligning with the Nepali journalists’ federation. Various trade union leaders were arrested, houses were searched, and a number of people fled. Several trade unionists were injured in clashes with the police and the army, and in Kavre district 12 workers were injured on April 6, 2006. The workers of Nepal Bank Limited ceased work in solidarity and support. The trade union federations led by the General Federation of Nepalese Trade Unions (GEFONT) rallied on April 8, 2006 and were fired at, leaving hundred of agitators injured. There was a series of strikes and agitations in which government employees and workers from banks, schools, universities, the health sector, industries, factories, transport, and hotels participated. Repression continued on a grand scale with the arrest and illegal detention of trade unionists. Nevertheless, the Nepalese working class remained committed to the struggle for democracy and the nation witnessed the largest mobilization of the working class, along with all other sections of the oppressed.

Dalits too played an important role in the democratic movement by actively participating in protests amidst many reports of Dalits being arrested and injured. On April 18, 2006, Dalits demonstrated in different parts of the country. In Dhangadi, thousands of Dalits, Janjati (tribals), and Kamaiya (bonded laborers) jointly protested in a mass demonstration, carrying with them halo (plow), juwa (yoke), and kodalo (spade) and organizing a mass rally demanding a republican Nepal. Dalits also protested in Nepalganj, where one young Dalit woman, Setu Sunar, was killed by the police. In Bhojpur, Khotang, Shankhuwa Shava, and Dhankutta districts, Dalits joined hands with Janjatis, while in Biratnagar, Dharan, Rajbiraj, Bharapur, and Kakarbhitta, they demonstrated independently in conjunction with the nationwide movement, reiterating that only in a democracy could all their rights be realized.

SEE ALSO: Nepal, Maoists’ Rise; Nepal, People’s War and Maoists

References and Suggested Readings

- Brown, T. L. (1996) The Challenge to Democracy in Nepal: A Political History. London: Routledge.
- Gellner, D. N. (Ed.) (2002) Resistance and State: Nepalese Experience. New Delhi: Social Science Press.
- Mikesell, S. L. (1999) Class, State and Struggle in Nepal. New Delhi: Manohar.
- Ogura, K. (2001) Kathmandu Spring: The People’s Movement of 1990. Kathmandu: Himal Books.
- Parajulee, R. P. (2000) The Democratic Transition in Nepal. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Reaper, W. & Hoftun, M. (1992) Spring Awakening: An Account of the 1990 Revolution in Nepal. New Delhi: Viking.
- Saha, R. (1993) Politics in Nepal 1980–1991. New Delhi: Manohar.

Aptheker, Herbert (1915–2003)

Yusuf Nuruddin

Herbert Aptheker was a US Marxist historian and political activist who achieved recognition for his pioneering and prolific contributions to the field of African American history, and as a long-standing spokesperson for the CPUSA who took uncompromising stances against McCarthyism and US military involvement in Vietnam.

Aptheker was born in Brooklyn, New York, the youngest of five children of Benjamin Aptheker and Rebecca Komar Aptheker, Russian Jewish immigrants who became wealthy through the garment manufacturing business. He developed an early interest in American racial matters through a close relationship with his Trinidadian nanny and family domestic servant, Angelina Corbin. This interest was intensified in 1932 when at age 16 he accompanied his father on a business trip through the Jim Crow South. Appalled by the poverty and legalized segregation which he witnessed, he composed his first article on racial injustice entitled “The Dark Side of the South” for his Erasmus High School newspaper. He returned to the South six years later, after graduating from college, to work as a union organizer and educator of black food and tobacco farm workers. Recognizing that black tenant farmers were virtually still enslaved under a system of debt peonage, he then became the secretary of an organization advocating the abolition of this sharecropping system.

Aptheker attended Columbia University, receiving an undergraduate degree in geology and a doctorate in history. His master’s thesis was a study of the Nat Turner Rebellion of 1831. His doctoral dissertation was published as a book entitled American Negro Slave Revolts in 1943, and became a classic study in African American history. It challenged the prevailing pro-slavery theories of racist historians such as Ulrich B. Phillips who sought to portray blacks as child-like, submissive, docile, and content to be enslaved. Aptheker also hotly contested William Styron’s 1966 revisionist psychohistorical novel The Confessions of Nat Turner, which cast the slave rebellion leader as an emasculated psychopath who lusted after white women. Aptheker produced numerous notable contributions to the field of African American history, and also edited the 40 volumes of scholarly and literary writings of his dear friend and mentor W. E. B. Du Bois.

Viewing the Communist Party as a progressive anti-racist and anti-fascist organization, he joined it in 1939. Aptheker enlisted in the army in 1942 and served as a commissioned officer, but lost his commission in 1950 because of his communist views and activities. During this decade, which was marked by McCarthyism, Aptheker was blacklisted. He sought a career in academia but was barred from lecturing in US colleges and universities. He was employed instead as the editor of two publications: Masses and the Mainstream (1948–53) and Political Affairs – the journal of the CPUSA (1953–63). He also served on the National Committee of the CPUSA (1957–91) and for nearly two decades as executive director of the American Institute for Marxist Studies. In 1991 he left the Communist Party to help found the Committees of Correspondence.

In the 1960s Aptheker became one of the earliest and fiercest critics of the war in Vietnam. In 1966 he made a widely publicized trip to Hanoi and Beijing with Staughton Lind and Tom Hayden in an effort to negotiate an end to the war. This brought down upon them the ire of the US State Department, which tried unsuccessfully to restrict their right to further international travel. Aptheker resumed university teaching in the 1970s, holding appointments as lecturer, professor, and visiting faculty member at several institutions. By the time of his death in 2003 at age 87 he is reputed to have authored over fifty books.

Aptheker’s reputation as a icon of the left was somewhat tarnished during his lifetime by charges of Stalinism and posthumously by a controversial memoir, Intimate Politics, written by his daughter Bettina Aptheker, a professor of women’s studies which, based on “recovered memory,” accused her father of sexually molesting her for several years during her childhood.

SEE ALSO: Civil Rights, United States: Overview; Communist Party of the United States of America (CPUSA); Du Bois, W. E. B. (1868–1963); Marxism; Nat Turner Rebellion

References and Suggested Readings

- Aptheker, H. C. (1983) American Negro Slave Revolts. New York: International Publishers.
 Phelps, C. (2006) Herbert Aptheker: The Contradictions of History. Chronicle Review 53, 7.
 Thompson, C. et al. (Eds.) (2003) White Men Challenging Racism: 35 Personal Stories. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.

Arab left and socialist movements, 1861–1930

Steven Isaac

One of the key problems pointed out by scholars in defining Arab socialism resides in the term

“socialism” itself. The term has a multivalent history within Arabic more as a symbol than as a label with a clearly attached dogma. The Ottoman world paid little attention to the 1848 revolutions that brought contending visions of socialism to the center of European debates. Nonetheless, socialism, if not a full understanding of its claims and agendas, began to seep into the Middle East as refugees brought treatises and revolutionary pamphlets in their original European languages into Istanbul. In 1861, the neologism ishtirak may have appeared for the first time to describe socialism in an English–Turkish lexicon. The term was apparently built from the root sh-r-k, describing a form of common ownership of water, fire, housing, and other necessities before the Prophet Muhammad’s time. This idea of communal property was effectively endorsed in the Constitution of Medina, the agreement under which Muhammad’s refugees from Mecca merged their future with that of the “helpers” (ansar) who received them in Medina.

In 1871, when the Paris Commune broke out, Arab interest in Europe’s affairs had grown considerably, matched by a growing Arabic press, particularly in Egypt and Lebanon. As the editors of the leading papers reported on the events of 1871, they invoked ishtirak to describe the agenda of the Communards, but also employed a number of other terms and circumlocutions demonstrating the ongoing novelty of socialism. For the most part the editorial slant of the journals rested against the Communards, perhaps out of a need to avoid causing any domestic political irritation. Still, a quite interesting development came with the reportage in Istanbul’s al-Jama’ib (Tidings) of the Commune’s spread to Lyons and Marseilles: while explaining the socialist vision, the writer drew parallels with communal ideas practiced in the Acts of the Apostles, including the death of Ananias for not truly sharing all his possessions. Socialism’s perceived relationship with religion (especially Islam, but Christianity and Judaism as well), if not its actual genesis therein, was foundational for many Arabs’ understanding of the ideology.

In the 1890s, Boutros al-Bustani undertook to educate readers of both his encyclopedia and journal (al-Muqtataf) of socialism even as he criticized the movement. In 1890 his paper’s editor launched a critique of socialism, beginning with a full explanation of its claims, and used the term ishtirakiyya (the modern Arabic designation) for the first time. Bustani’s 1894 encyclopedia article on socialism showed a deepening understanding of the terminology and issues: participation (ishtirak) had now become an “ism.” He also distinguished between communists and socialists, arguing that participation in property described the Commune, but that genuine ishtirakiyya derived from Robert Owen and described a reform, not a revolution, of society.

This gradualist approach would mark much of Arab socialism, which often downplayed, or outright ignored, class struggle in socialism. Simultaneously, a leading voice for modernizing Islam, Jamal al-Din al-Afghani, wrote a series of essays outlining his understanding of contemporary socialism in the West and, more importantly, how it was once practiced in the Arab world. The primary problem was the resentment of laborers who were unjustly compensated in capitalism. Al-Afghani argued that in pre-Islamic Arabia, Bedouins of means shared their goods. Once the Islamic community had the Qur’an to guide them, the rules were clear on sharing of material goods.

War spoils were parceled out to non-participants, alms mandated, and injurious usury forbidden. For al-Afghani, the caliphs abu Bakr and ‘Umar established proper examples of socialism in practice – both continuing austere lives despite the riches pouring into the nascent empire. Under ‘Uthman, the system began to go askew as the leadership began to enjoy material privileges. Discontent grew among a class of “intelligent poor” who understood that Islam’s guidelines were being dismissed; al-Afghani thus characterized the dissension of Abu Dharr as a populist and religious movement. In the end, this Companion of the Prophet was shown not simply as one advocating material equality but, just as vital, as one chiding the caliphs to avoid the creation of faction in the ‘umma, or community.

Despite some efforts to demonstrate an original Arab penchant for social equity, or the socialism implied in the arrangements in Medina, socialism, as a European construct, remained suspect. Even a modernizer like al-Afghani could only go so far in Arabizing or Islamizing ideologies and practice, but he also realized that very different conditions in the East from those in the West could make socialism seem so compelling.

The Early Twentieth Century

Even as a few Muslim Arab intellectuals grappled with socialism and attempted to show harmony with an Arabic/Islamic heritage, other residents of the Ottoman empire were drawn to it for quite different reasons. Because of the many closed doors they faced in territories still firmly under Ottoman control, Syrian Christians were drawn to the new opportunities the new British intrusion into Egypt's administration appeared to offer. Many espoused a laissez-faire approach that suited their own commercial pursuits and endeared them to the British, but a significant few saw socialism as a way to progress that might avoid further divisiveness between religious confessions. By espousing socialism, intellectuals gained the advantage of distance from the very western policies making Egypt's economy a satellite of Europe's. Donald Reid sketched the literary contributions of three of these Syrians in Egypt, plus the seminal work of one Egyptian disciple who was a Copt.

In the first two decades of the twentieth century, novels and newspaper articles presented socialism, both in its western formulation and in ways suited to the region's needs. One recurring theme was an emphasis on gradual, democratic transition to socialism; in Farah Antun's novel al-Din, revolution yielded self-immolation, not progress. Doubtless, as members of a minority, they recognized vulnerability in any outbreak of hostilities, or recognized the oddity of stressing class struggle in a pre-industrial culture. By 1908, Sibli Shumayyil was promoting a socialist party advocating government wage control, public health, education, and provision of jobs for the unemployed. Niqula Haddad authored one of the earliest books on socialism, but even his 1920 monograph made cursory mention of the Bolshevik Revolution. The revolutionary angle received more attention in the work of Salamah Musa, whose 1913 pamphlet al-Ishtirakiyah is often accounted the first "book" in Arabic dedicated to the topic. Musa was more an activist than his Syrian counterparts, traveling to Europe to meet with Marxists, honing his understanding of Marxist tenets, and eventually helping found a socialist party in 1920. He was jailed often for his activities, but lived long enough to see Egypt embrace socialism after the century's mid-point.

World War I was pivotal in shaping Arab relations with the West, both in the hopes dashed by the creation of the mandate system and in how Arab thinkers began to relate to socialism and its communist sibling after the Bolshevik Revolution. Even as the understanding of Marxist principles gained depth, proponents of socialism grounded their espousal ever more on Islamic foundations. Flirtation with communism's adamant secularism proved too unsettling both for Arab intellectuals and for the masses. Alongside nationalism – especially as manifested by pan-Arab nationalism – Islam was the great shaper of socialism in the Middle East, soon able to voice differentiation from the Marxist version.

Interest in Bolshevism appeared in most new Arab politics after expectations of independence were dashed by Britain and France. Arab frustration with failures of liberalism and constitutionalism, however, did not suffice to introduce another western ideology. In addition, the mandate powers had enough leverage in their positions to use local institutions to suppress Bolshevik activity. As an option limited mostly to a small group of intellectuals, the early communist parties had little influence, remaining still a quantité négligeable in one historian's estimation. The Egyptian Socialist Party, which soon became the Egyptian Communist Party, was founded in 1921 and demonstrates the above points. Bankrolled by the heir to a cotton-exporting fortune, the Egyptian communists had pledges of support from 22 of Egypt's 30 trade unions, leading to the formation of the first Egyptian Federation of Workers, which had 40,000 members during its brief lifetime.

Working with the Third International in Moscow, Egyptian communists joined efforts at a worldwide general strike in 1923, but they had also secured approval from the International to abandon the strike if Egypt's new, nominally independent government requested an end to such participation. The government made such a request, and the Federation complied, save for workers in three Alexandria factories who were dislodged by force. While the 1923 government took little repressive action, the following year's government, operating more under British direction, banned the party and made all communist activity illegal. Hosni El Orabi, who financed the party, was jailed for five years. He tried publishing a socialist journal afterwards, but the government shut down the operation after six months. According to one of Arab socialism's proponents, the 1930s saw socialist activity in the Arab world “almost at a standstill.”

If activism was stymied, however, intellectual consideration of socialism’s fitness for the Arab-Islamic world was not. The great theorist of Arab nationalism, Shaqib Arslan, wrote: “[I]f Islam has socialist principles, it has no connections with communism and therefore cannot be Bolshevized in the meaning known to Russia.” Still, he and other leading voices did see good reasons why Arabs and Bolsheviks could cooperate: “The Bolsheviks appear as the enemy of the states of imperialism who are hostile states to all the Islamic world.” But the commonality of interests had its limits. Rashid Rida outlined his stance in 1919: “The Muslims wish for the success of the socialists, success which would abolish the slavery of peoples – all of them are workers – even as they rebuke them as they rebuke others for all that is contrary to the Islamic law.” The appeal of the Bolsheviks, according to Arslan, was in their call “to liberate the weak.” That call was more to Arslan than just an anti-imperialist slogan, but was an appeal for the poor, including those of the Islamic world, to be freed from abuse by the rich, including rich Muslims. School texts which appeared in the 1920s and 1930s presented these ideas to students across the Middle East. The 1930s also saw the redaction of al-Afghani’s essays on socialism that argued the inherently socialist nature of Islam.

The discontent against the imperialism of the western powers entailed much self-examination as Islamic thinkers countered western charges that Islam was inherently defective and retarded the economic and societal development of its faithful. Not surprisingly, this led some Muslim apologists to embrace socialism as a framework for their opposition; by itself, however, socialism as propounded in the West could not answer the accusations. Al-Afghani was only one voice who noted modern socialism’s creation in negative circumstances and eschewed the call for class conflict. On the other hand, socialism as embodied by Islam was presented as a positive call to action, a call incumbent on all good Muslims, and a complete system of social justice long before Marx.

The most daring statement of this position was probably that of Bandali Jawzi, who wrote the first wholly Marxist analysis of Islam’s foundation by the Prophet. Little noticed at the time of its publication in 1928, Jawzi’s Min Tarikh al-Harakat al-Fikriyyat fi’l-Islam (The History of Intellectual Movements in Islam) has since garnered the Palestinian author more attention in the latter twentieth century. Analysis of his work stressed that he did not view Islam as “essentially socialist”; instead, he argued that wherever societies attempted socialist programs, one finds the purist manifestations of Islam. In Jawzi’s interpretation, “social solidarity” was a primary goal of Islam, and Muhammad had struck at the economic inequity which prevented this. The Prophet, however, had not attacked property per se, but instead the acquisition of property when that pursuit meant disadvantaging others. Muhammad’s balancing act in this matter was not so skillfully followed by his political heirs as the Islamic community saw much poverty and injustice propagated by public authorities. For that reason, Jawzi expressed a wish that Muhammad had abolished private property. In the rest of his analysis, Jawzi looked at several groups, most notably the Isma’ilis and their associates, the Qarmatians, as examples of socialist principles enacted within Islamic settings. He attributed the longevity of each group to socialist principles and their demise to interference by external foes. The emphasis once again was on consensus, not on raising class consciousness to the point of creating strife within the Islamic community.

SEE ALSO: Egypt and Arab Socialism; Owen, Robert (1771–1858); Paris Commune, 1871; Syria and Iraq, Baathists

References and Suggested Readings

- Dawn, C. E. (1988) The Formation of Pan-Arab Ideology in the Interwar Years. International Journal of Middle East Studies 20, 1 (February): 67–91.
- Hanna, S. (1967) Al-Afghani: A Pioneer of Islamic Socialism. Muslim World 57: 24–32.
- Hanna, S. & Gardner, G. (1969) Arab Socialism: A Documentary Survey. Salt Lake City: University of Utah Press.
- Kerr, M. (1968) Notes on the Background of Arab Socialist Thought. Journal of Contemporary History 3, 3 (July): 145–59.
- Reid, D. M. (1974) The Syrian Christians and Early Socialism in the Arab World. International Journal of Middle East Studies 5, 2 (April): 177–93.
- Sonn, T. (1985) Bandali al-Jawzi’s Min Tarikh al-Harakat al-Fikriyyat fi’l-Islam: The First Marxist Interpretation of Islam. International Journal of Middle East Studies 17, 1 (February): 89–107.

- Tibi, B. (1986) Islam and Modern European Ideologies. International Journal of Middle East Studies 18, 1 (February): 15–29.
- Wahba, M. M. (1990) The Meaning of Ishtirakiyah: Arab Perceptions of Socialism in the Nineteenth Century. Alif: Journal of Contemporary Poetics 10: 42–55.

Aracaré (d. 1542)

Stefan Thimmel

Aracaré, a chief of a tribe of the indigenous Guaraní in the actual state of Paraguay, was the first and one of the most important leaders who resisted the Spanish conquistadors in the sixteenth century. In 1542 Aracaré and approximately 800 Guaraní people guided Alvar Núñez Cabeza de Vaca in his expedition to find the mystic kingdom of Peru with all the promised gold and treasures. However, the famous cacique only pretended to lead the conquerors to the Promised Land, instead going upstream the Rio Paraguay. Contrary to other representatives of the Guaraní, he realized early that his people would have to suffer under the regime of the Spanish Corona. So during the expedition more and more Guaraní scouts disappeared and the Spanish lost themselves in the impermeable jungle. Aracaré utilized the situation to attack the troops of Cabeza de Vaca, and the desperate Spanish soldiers had to withdraw and abort the expedition. Shortly afterwards there was a second expedition, but the recruited Guaraní once again only presumed to guide the conquerors; in effect they were leading them to regions where the cacique Aracaré commanded his fellowships. They got lost and they were attacked by the chief's men. For Cabeza de Vaca, Aracaré became the main enemy. Finally Aracaré was caught by the Spanish troops and at the end of 1542 he was hanged. This led to the first real rebellion of indigenous people in the Paraguayan territories (1543), led by Tabaré, Aracaré's brother.

SEE ALSO: Caonabo (d. 1496); Cuauhtémoc (1502–1525); Hatuey (ca. 1400s–1512); Jumandí (d. 1578); Lempira (d. 1537); Tisquesuza (d. 1537); Túpac Amaru (ca. 1540–1572)

References and Suggested Readings

- Roulet, F. (1993) La resistencia de los Guaraní del Paraguay a la conquista española. Posadas: Editorial Universitaria.

Arafat, Yasser (1929–2004), Fatah, and the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO)

Lawrence Davidson

Yasser Arafat was born in Cairo (this is disputed; some sources say Gaza and others say Jerusalem) on August 24, 1929. He was the youngest of seven children of a well-to-do merchant family. His mother died when he was five years old and his father sent him to live in the house of his maternal uncle in Jerusalem. At the time, Palestine was controlled by the British under the League of Nations Mandate for Palestine. The 1930s saw growing Arab rebelliousness against British rule and Arafat's place of residence was raided by British troops. This incident constituted one of his earliest memories.

At the age of nine or ten, Arafat was sent to Cairo to live in the home of his eldest sister. By 1946, at the age of 16, he was fully aware of the dire situation faced by the Palestinian people. They had lost their national patrimony and faced the threat of cultural extinction. He was politicized to the point that he was aiding in the smuggling of weapons into Palestine. These weapons were used by the growing resistance movement to British rule and Zionist immigration. During the 1948 war Arafat joined the resistance forces in the Gaza Strip. After the resistance was defeated by Zionist forces, Arafat returned to Egypt where he attended the University of Faud I (later Cairo University). There he became involved with the Muslim Brotherhood and served as president of the Union of Palestinian Students from 1952 to 1956. In 1956 he graduated with a degree in Civil Engineering. That same year he served with the Egyptian army in the Suez War, again experiencing defeat at the hands of the Israeli army.

It was after the Suez War that Arafat left Egypt and moved to Kuwait. There he worked as a civil engineer in the Kuwait Department of Public Works and eventually established his own contracting company. His business thrived; however, Arafat's heart was still with the Palestinian movement for national liberation and he used much of his income to support that cause. His ongoing political activism led him to help form Al Fatah (conquest) in 1958. Fatah stood for the Movement for the National Liberation of Palestine and identified itself as a revolutionary movement in the line of other third world movements of the day, such as those in Cuba and Vietnam. On the other hand, Fatah tended to stand apart from that revolutionary tradition by purposely not adopting any specific political ideology. This is particularly true in reference to the prevailing Arab ideologies of the time (Nasserism, Baathism, Islamism, etc.). To tie the movement to one or another of these would make entanglement in inter-Arab rivalries inevitable. Thus, Fatah adhered strictly to the generic, non-ideological goal of liberating Palestine mainly by the actions of Palestinian Arabs. Over the next six years Arafat helped build Fatah into a network of underground groups trained and armed for guerilla war against Israel. Then, in 1964, he left Kuwait to serve as one of the leaders of that effort.

Fatah was initially backed by the government of Syria. The organization pledged a policy of non-interference in the internal affairs of host countries as long as they reciprocated by practicing non-interference towards the Palestinian movement. Initially Fatah sought to launch its “fedaayin” raids into Israel from Lebanon and Jordan, as well as from Syria. Since this was before the 1967 war, Fatah’s concentration was on pre-1948 Palestine and not what are now known as the Occupied Territories. There was no lack of volunteers for military operations against Israel from this generation of Palestinian refugees. As a 1959 issue of Fatah’s underground journal, Filastinuna, stated, “The youth of the catastrophe are dispersed . . . life in the tent has become as miserable as death . . . to die for our beloved Fatherland is better and more honorable than life.” Therefore, the organization fought for the rights of the original 1948 refugees which would be restored through the eventual transformation of Israel, a state first and foremost for Jews, into the secular democratic nation of Palestine wherein all citizens, regardless of religion or ethnicity, had equal rights. In this sense, Fatah’s political goals were and continued to be Western in orientation.

Yet this was not the aspect of Fatah that caught the public’s attention throughout the Middle East or made Arafat and his lieutenants into popular heroes. It was their willingness to challenge Israel militarily and, on occasion, hold their own against much greater odds. This was demonstrated in the Battle of Karameh in March 1968. Karameh was a town in Jordan not far from the Jordan River border with Israel. In 1968 the town served as a military staging area for armed incursions into Israel. The Israelis eventually launched an invasion of the town but were fought to a standstill by Fatah forces. The Jordanian army eventually intervened and the Israelis withdrew under a Jordanian artillery barrage. The withdrawal of the superior Israeli forces was characterized as a victory for Palestinian fighters and was a great boost in morale for the Palestinian refugee population. Fatah also attacked civilian targets within Israel (its very first raid was an attempt to sabotage Israel’s National Water Carrier project) that earned Fatah and other Palestinian resistance groups the label of terrorists in the Western media. Arafat struggled in vain against this image. He once observed: “Those who call us terrorists wish to prevent world public opinion from discovering the truth about us and from seeing the justice on our faces. They seek to hide the terrorism and tyranny of their acts, and our own posture of self-defense.” It is a historical fact that in struggles against occupation and colonization the violence of the oppressed usually rises to the level of the violence of the oppressor. Thus, it is in the struggle in Palestine that the brutality of the occupier gave rise to the terrorism of the occupied. Yet American audiences in particular were never given this reality in sixty years of media reporting.

In 1964, some six years after Fatah was organized, the Arab League, at the behest of Egyptian President Nasser, created the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO). The PLO, created as an umbrella organization for the increasing number of small Palestinian resistance organizations then appearing, was designed to channel the restiveness of the Palestinian refugees into an organization that could be controlled by the Arab regimes. The elites which led these states, particularly those that bordered on Israel, understood that the Palestinians had the potential to provoke an unwanted war with the Zionist state. This meant that up until 1967, Fatah and the PLO were rivals for the loyalty of the Palestinians; the PLO received official backing from the Arab regimes, while the independent stand of Fatah earned it mounting hostility. Increasingly, its operations had to be launched clandestinely. After the Israeli victory in the Six Day War of 1967, it was clear that the Palestinians could not rely on the Arab states for their liberation. Fatah was able to take over the PLO by 1969, when Yasser Arafat became chairman of the organization's executive committee. At that point Arafat was recognized not only regionally, but also internationally, as the leader of the Palestinian struggle for justice.

As we will see, that struggle has gone through a great number of hardships and reversals; however, Arafat did achieve great initial successes in non-military areas. The PLO position was that, if the struggle for national liberation was to be long and hard, the organization must organize the refugee population to improve their living conditions in the refugee camps where many of them now resided. With the financial aid of the wealthy Arab states of the oil rich Persian Gulf, Arafat and the PLO created a social welfare system that looked after the health, education, and general welfare needs of hundreds of thousands of people. This was part of a process of institution building that would mimic those of an established state. It also helped the PLO to become recognized worldwide as representing the rights of all Palestinians.

The fact that Fatah and the PLO had no territorial base they could truly control seriously limited its military effectiveness and proved a standing threat to its independence. This can be seen when, in 1970, the Palestinian resistance organizations based in Jordan were attacked by the Jordanian army. This was the so-called Black September incident. King Hussein of Jordan claimed that the Palestinians were acting as a "state within a state" (in Jordan) and provoking war with Israel. In a short but bloody war, the PLO was pushed out of Jordan. Arafat moved the organization to Lebanon. In 1982 Israel invaded Lebanon and forced Arafat and the PLO into exile in Tunisia (and thus far from any border with Israel).

Events took yet another turn in 1987 with the outbreak of the first Palestinian Intifada (shaking off). While Arafat and the PLO did not initiate this rebellion (it began spontaneously), it did bring both back into the Palestinian struggle. From his office in Tunis, Arafat encouraged, supplied, and popularized the Intifada, directing it when and where he could. It was the ongoing nature of the Intifada that forced the Israeli government, for the first time, to negotiate directly with Arafat. This led to the signing of the Oslo Accords in 1993. The Accords called for mutual recognition between Israel and the PLO.

One of the remarkable consequences of the Oslo Accords was that they allowed for the return of Yasser Arafat and his organization to Palestine. But they did not bring peace. In many ways the Accords were dependent on the will of the leadership of both parties to carry them through in the face of domestic opposition. Only Arafat could do this for the Palestinians. He was easily elected President of the Palestine National Authority in national elections held in January 1996. In April of that same year Arafat was able to amend the Charter of the PLO, removing from it the clause that called for the destruction of Israel. However, his Israeli counterpart at the time, Yitzhak Rabin (whom Arafat always referred to as his "partner in the search for peace"), proved unable to reciprocate. The Israeli opposition to Oslo was so intense that it led to Rabin's assassination by a right-wing Jewish fanatic in December of 1995. It was a sign of Israeli popular intentions that in the national elections that followed the hardline conservative Benjamin Netanyahu came to office. Israeli adherence to the Oslo Accords then began to erode.

In the years that followed, Yasser Arafat continued to struggle for a settlement with Israel that would give the Palestinian people a viable state under conditions of peace and justice, now voluntarily restricted to the Occupied Territories of the West Bank and Gaza Strip. What he got from a continuous line of Israeli governments was intensified and illegal colonialism, as Jewish settlements were built rapidly on confiscated Palestinian land. When, in 2000, US President Bill Clinton and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak, meeting at Camp David, tried to pressure Arafat into accepting Israeli territorial encroachment, the Palestinian President had the fortitude to refuse. From that time on, both Israeli and American policy aimed at undermining Arafat's leadership of the Palestinian National Authority. In 2004 Arafat fell ill under mysterious circumstances. Many Palestinians believe he was poisoned by agents of the Israeli government. He died in a French military hospital on November 11 of that year.

SEE ALSO: Black September; Intifada I and Intifada II

References and Suggested Readings

- Aruri, N. (1995) The Obstruction of Peace: The US, Israel and the Palestinians. Monroe, ME: Common Courage Press.
- Gowers, A. & Walker, T. (2005) Arafat: The Biography. London: Virgin Books.
- Khalidi, R. (1997) Palestinian Identity. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Said, E. (1995) Peace and Its Discontents: Essays on Palestine in the Middle East Peace Process. New York: Vintage.
- Wallach, J. (1997) Arafat: In the Eyes of the Beholder. London: Citadel Books.

Arbenz, Jacobo Guzmán (1913–1971)

Dima Zito

Jacobo Guzmán Arbenz was president of Guatemala from 1951 to 1954. After implementing democratic and economic reforms, he was overthrown by a CIA-organized coup d'état and replaced by a military dictatorship.

Jacobo Arbenz was the son of a Guatemalan mother and a pharmacist who had immigrated from Switzerland. He pursued a career in the Guatemalan army and taught history and science at the Guatemalan Military Academy. In 1939 he married a Salvadorian immigrant, Maria Cristina Villanova Castro, who had contacts with left-wing activists and who influenced Arbenz toward socialist ideas and opposition to the military dictatorship of Jorge Ubico.

In 1944 a growing movement of teachers, students, and skilled workers demanded democratic reforms. After the killing of more than 200 demonstrators by the army, Ubico lost support and passed power to General Francisco Ponce, who announced elections to gain public backing. The presidential candidate of the democratic opposition was Dr. Juan José Arevalo Bermeja, an exiled professor. As Arevalo was to be arrested on returning to Guatemala, Arbenz and other young officers organized a military rebellion. On October 20, 1944, they killed their superiors and distributed arms to Arevalo's supporters. Ponce and Ubico had to leave Guatemala. This "Guatemalan October Revolution" was the beginning of the decade of the "Democratic Spring."

Arbenz was a member of a provisional junta that prepared the country's first free elections, which were won by Arevalo in March 1945.

Arbenz became defense minister. A new constitution was enacted, and democratic and labor rights were strengthened. The main opponent of the reform agenda was the US enterprise United Fruit Company. It controlled the country's only port, the electric power company, the railway, and the telegraph system. Under the Ubico dictatorship, United Fruit had become Guatemala's largest landowner with 550,000 acres and had received dispensation from taxes. To preserve these interests, several coups against the Arevalo government were attempted.

At the elections of 1951, Jacobo Arbenz became president with 65 percent of the vote. His political program was to develop Guatemala to a modern capitalist state with economic independence. In his inaugural speech Arbenz promised "an agrarian reform which puts an end to the latifundios and the semi-feudal practices, giving the land to thousands of peasants, raising their purchasing power and creating a great internal market favorable to the development of domestic industry" (Schlesinger & Kinzer 1982: 59). A port, a hydroelectric plant, and a highway to the Atlantic coast were built by the government, and a new tax system was introduced.

The agrarian reform was enacted in June 1952. Through this program, 1.5 million acres, uncultivated portions of large plantations, were expropriated and distributed to about 100,000 landless peasant families, and 46 farms were given to cooperatives. The disappropriated landowners were compensated according to the worth of the land claimed in the May 1952 tax assessments. As United Fruit cultivated only 15 percent of its land, more than 386,901 acres were expropriated from it.

On the initiative of United Fruit, the so-called "Operation Success" was planned. US Secretary of State John Foster Dulles and his brother, CIA director Allen Dulles, shareholders with close ties to the company, organized the coup. A "liberation army" of mercenaries was built up, commanded by the Guatemalan officer Carlos Castillo Armas and trained by CIA member Rip Robertson in Nicaragua and Honduras. The CIA started a disinformation campaign against Arbenz's "communist tyranny," distributing articles and pamphlets which contained false information. The Guatemalan government learned of the CIA activities and asked the UN Security Council for help. The US government stated falsely that the conflict was a Guatemalan civil war. Arbenz tried in vain to buy weapons for the defense of his government in western countries. He ultimately purchased Czechoslovak weaponry, which arrived in May 1954 on board a Swedish vessel, which was presented as a proof of Arbenz's Soviet links. A CIA-run radio station started transmitting in May 1954, jamming Guatemalan national radio. It called in vain for a popular uprising, announcing the arrival of the "liberation army." Guatemalan military commanders were paid by the CIA to surrender. Finally, Arbenz ordered the distribution of weapons to popular organizations, and Ernesto Guevara also participated in the failed attempt to organize militias.

In June 1954 Guatemalan cities were bombed by CIA planes, and Arbenz became convinced that there was no longer any chance of resisting the invasion. On June 27, 1954, he announced his resignation over the radio and sought refuge in the Mexican embassy.

Castillo Armas was installed as president and Arbenz's reforms were taken back. All opposition newspapers, political parties, trade unions, and peasant organizations were forbidden. In the following weeks, thousands of Arbenz's supporters were arrested on charges of communist activity. Many of them were tortured and killed. This was the beginning of more than four decades of military dictatorship and scorched earth policy with more than 200,000 deaths.

Arbenz sought exile, going to Mexico, Switzerland, France, Czechoslovakia, the Soviet Union, and Uruguay. Following the Cuban Revolution he was invited to live in Cuba. After the suicide of his daughter Arabella in 1965, he returned to Mexico. On January 27, 1971, Jacobo Arbenz died under suspicious circumstances in his bath tub. He was buried in El Salvador. In 1995 his remains were brought to Guatemala.

SEE ALSO: Guatemala, Democratic Spring, 1944–1954; Guatemala, Popular Rebellion and Civil War; Guatemala, Worker Struggles and the Labor Movement, 1960s–1990s

References and Suggested Readings

- Alfonso, J. M. (1969) Guatemala: Subdesarrollo y violencia (Guatemala: Underdevelopment and Violence). Madrid: IEPALA.
- Asturias, M. A. (1956) Week-end en Guatemala. Buenos Aires: Losada.
- Black, G. (1984) Garrison Guatemala. London: Zed Books.

Informationsstelle Guatemala (Ed.) (1982) Guatemala. Der lange Weg zur Freiheit (Guatemala. The Long Way to Freedom). Wuppertal: Peter Hammer Verlag.

Schlesinger, S. & Kinzer, S. (1982) Bitter Fruit: The Untold Story of the American Coup in Guatemala. New York: Doubleday.

Arch, Joseph (1826–1919)

Stacy Warner Maddern

Joseph Arch is considered one of the key figures in the development of British trade unionism because of his efforts to help organize England's agricultural laborers. Born in 1826 in Barford, Warwickshire, Arch was the son of a farm laborer who later became a Primitive Methodist preacher. In the early 1870s, when farm laborers in the southern and central areas of England began protesting low wages and harsh working conditions, Arch came to their aid by creating the National Agricultural Labourers' Union (NALU).

The NALU came up against a landed aristocracy that wielded a great amount of power and influence. Arch held that the rich were bent upon treating those who worked the land no differently from the animals that grazed it. Citing the position of the rich, the land belonged to the rich man and the poor man had no part nor lot in it. As such, the poor had no sort of claim on society. Arch criticized the rich for censoring the needs of the poor and demoralizing them with a starvation wage.

In 1872 the organization had a membership of 86,000 despite immense hostility from the landowners and farmers, who claimed that unions were just another communist challenge of the existing social system. However, by 1874, after a prolonged strike, the NALU suffered from depleted funds and decreasing membership. By the 1880s the NALU was struggling to survive, and morale among workers and their interest in building a strong union began to wane. Arch turned his attention to politics and in 1885 served the first of several terms as a Liberal member of parliament (1885–6, 1892–1900) representing a Norfolk constituency. As the first agricultural laborer to be elected to parliament, Arch utilized his influence to benefit farm workers by securing legislation with the 1885 Redistribution Act, which granted agricultural laborers the right to vote.

In 1888, the labor force was rejuvenated by the London dock workers' strike, which led to record numbers of organized unions in Great Britain. In 1896, the NALU formally collapsed, but in 1906 it reorganized in Norfolk as the Eastern Counties Agricultural Labourers and Smallholders' Union. In 1910 it changed its name to the National Agricultural Labourers and Rural Workers' Union before becoming the National Union of Agricultural Workers (NUAW) in 1920. By 1964, the NUAW had a stronghold over the agricultural sector in Norfolk, Lincolnshire, and Dorset, where it held a membership of 90 percent of all agricultural workers in those regions.

SEE ALSO: Britain, Trade Union Movement; Combination Laws and Revolutionary Trade Unionism; Reform Bills, Britain, 1867 and 1884; Thompson, Edward Palmer (E. P.) (1924–1993)

References and Suggested Readings

- Arch, J. (1898) The Life of Joseph Arch by Himself. London: Hutchinson.
- Hamish, F. (1999) History of British Trade Unionism, 1700–1988. New York: Palgrave.

Arendt, Hannah (1906–1975)

James M. King

Born in Hanover, Germany, Hannah Arendt was a German Jewish political theorist of nationalism and revolution who was eventually forced to flee her home country due to the rise of National Socialism, an exile prompting her to direct her efforts toward combating totalitarianism.

During her university years Arendt was uninterested in contemporary political issues, and in 1926 attended her first Zionist lecture by Kurt Blumenfeld, in Heidelberg. While frustrated with the lack of political awareness, she did not immediately become a Zionist.

Arendt's initial political activity was allowing use of her apartment as a hideout or form of Underground Railroad to house communists and other opponents of the Nazi regime. In spring of 1933, Zionists asked Arendt to participate more actively. She was sent to the Prussian State Library to collect materials on the anti-Semitic activity of non-governmental organizations. These documentary materials were to be examined at the 18th Zionist Congress and distributed to the foreign press, which had no ready access to such materials. After collecting much material Arendt and her mother were arrested and held for eight days before fleeing for France.

Arendt's political activity continued while in France, working as a secretary for Agriculture et Artisanat, overseeing the contributions that the Baroness Germaine de Rothschild made to Jewish charities, and acting as director of the Paris branch of the Youth Aliyah, a Jewish organization that rescued thousands of Jewish children from Nazi Germany. In May 1940 Arendt was sent to Gurs internment camp, although she soon escaped, and fled to New York City, where she found work as a columnist for Aufbau, a German-language newspaper. Arendt used her position at Aufbau to advocate her political positions, specifically her stance on the need of a Jewish army. In 1944, Arendt became research director for the Conference of Jewish Relations and the Commission on European Jewish Cultural Reconstruction, which sought to reclaim the lost cultural treasures of European Jewry.

Several of the articles Arendt produced during the 1940s were incorporated into her first major publication, The Origins of Totalitarianism (1951). The book examines the contribution of anti-Semitism and imperialism to totalitarianism. Total terror did not cease once individuals were deprived of their public lives, as tyrannical terror did; nor when the opposition was eliminated, as revolutionary terror did. Totalitarian terror thrived once the political opposition was eliminated, turning on the innocent, and thereby continuing endlessly.

Seeking to prevent rather than analyze this evil, Arendt turned her focus toward human action, which totalitarianism must destroy to maintain power. In The Human Condition (1958), Arendt describes the three fundamental activities – labor, work, and action – that she believes compose the vita activa, the active life.

Arendt attended the trial of the Nazi Adolf Eichmann in 1961 to better understand the impetus behind totalitarianism's destruction of action and, ultimately, of people. At the trial, Eichmann maintained that he was never anti-Semitic nor willed the murder of human beings. His guilt came from obedience that was praised as a virtue under Nazism. He contended that his virtue was abused by Nazi leaders and he was a victim and “only the leaders deserved punishment.” Indeed, Arendt claimed that Eichmann did not have a radically evil core or motivation that fueled his monstrous actions, but a banal evil that was perpetrated by his thoughtless obedience.

While Arendt depicted this bleak picture of horrendously evil actions committed from obedience rather than an evil motivation, she continued to have hope for future generations. In her work On Revolution (1963), Arendt described revolution as the act of foundation for a public realm. She singled out the American Revolution, in contrast to the French Revolution, as a model that placed authority in the foundation itself, as Rome had done and as states should do. This foundation, i.e., the US Constitution, was achieved through the conditions that Arendt constantly reiterated as necessary for the creation of a public realm – free deliberation and debate.

SEE ALSO: American Revolution of 1776; Germany, Resistance to Nazism; Hitler, Adolf (1889–1945) and German Nazism; Jewish Resistance to Nazism; Zionism

References and Suggested Readings

- Arendt, H. (1968) Eichmann in Jerusalem: A Report on the Banality of Evil. New York: Viking.
- Arendt, H. (1979) The Origins of Totalitarianism. San Diego: Harcourt Brace.
- Arendt, H. (1998) The Human Condition. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Arendt, H. (2005) Essays in Understanding, 1930–1954. Ed. J. Kohn. New York: Schocken Books.
- d’Entrèves, M. P. (1994) The Political Philosophy of Hannah Arendt. London: Routledge.
- Villa, D. R. (1999) “Terror and Radical Evil.” Politics, Philosophy, Terror: Essays on the Thoughts of Hannah Arendt. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Young-Bruehl, E. (2006) Why Arendt Matters. New Haven: Yale University Press.

Argentina, armed struggle and guerilla organizations, 1960s–1970s

Pablo Augusto Bonavena

There is a long history of armed struggle in defense of popular interests in Argentina. One of its first antecedents can be found among colonos, agricultural immigrant workers in the Santa Fe province in 1893. As the poor saw themselves hurt by the tax burden, colonos rose in arms against the authorities, an event that paralleled the creation of the Radical Civic Union (Unión Cívica Radical, UCR) – a political party that still survives. Another early case of armed action was carried out by anarchist groups at the beginning of the twentieth century, with the street executions of police chief Ramón Falcón (1909) and of Colonel Héctor Benigno Varela (1923) – both condemned for leading bloody repression against workers’ protests. These attacks were carried out respectively by Simón Radowitzky (1891–1956) and Kurt Gustav Wilkens (1886–1925). Another important anarchist figure was Severino di Giovanni (1901–31), who promoted direct actions such as bank robberies and bombing state buildings. After being arrested, Di Giovanni was executed. These libertarian experiences with armed struggle accompanied the formation of the working class and the trade union movement in Argentina.

Years later, in 1946, elections made Perón’s Partido Justicialista (Justicialist Party) the governing party. Peronism, an ideology embodied by the populist nationalist class alliance led by Juan Domingo Perón (1895–1974) and dominated by industrialist bourgeois groups, framed working-class social, economic, and political conquests. It materialized in, among other things, the idea that trade unions would relinquish the right to strike, in exchange for which the state would assume the role of negotiator between conflicting interests.

In 1955, Perón was overthrown by a pro-imperialist bourgeois faction in a military coup d’état (dubbed the Revolución Libertadora), which installed a dictatorship. From that moment, several organizations were exiled, including many Peronist parties. With all institutional paths to political participation closed and with workers’ gains under threat, armed actions resumed in order to gain a place within the repertoire of workers’ protest and popular struggle. Small groups of militants (commandos) emerged spontaneously from Peronist bases, carrying out sabotage and sometimes even attacks with explosives, thereby corroding the legitimacy of the de facto government. These groups supported workers’ strikes, and some of them accompanied a civic-military Peronist uprising in June 1956 led by retired Generals Juan J. Valle and Raúl Tanco, which was supported by some army units and subordinate military personnel. The attempt was crushed and 27 military and civilian participants were executed.

Peronist commandos seeking the return of Perón, who was living in exile in Spain, were active until approximately 1960. One of their last appearances occurred during that year, when a group of left-wing Peronist youth attacked a guard post at the airport in Ciudad Evita, Greater Buenos Aires. Even though these groups were unable to coordinate their campaigns effectively, they gained sympathy among workers and became a reference for their struggles.

In order to defuse the situation, the military dictatorship of General Pedro Eugenio Aramburu (1903–70) once again violated the constitution in 1958 by calling for restricted elections, outlawing Peronism and many other leftist groups, a practice that continued until Arturo Illia's overthrow by another military coup in 1966.

The impossibility of participating in elections was the context for the emergence of the first guerilla organization in Argentina. The Peronist Liberation Movement–Army of National Liberation (Movimiento Peronista de Liberación–Ejército de Liberación Nacional), known as Uturuncos (Tiger-Men), settled in the hills of the Tucumán and Santiago del Estero provinces. The group operated between October 1959 and June 1960, when the group disbanded as a result of repression. Its members were Peronist commandos led politically by John W. Cooke and militarily, it is believed, by Spanish anarchist Abraham Guillén (1913–93). The group demanded Perón's return to government and the return of the trade union headquarters (which had been seized by the military dictatorship) to the workers of the General Confederation of Labor (Confederación General del Trabajo, CGT).

The second guerilla manifestation also had a rural character. Towards the end of 1963, the People's Guerilla Army (Ejército Guerrillero del Pueblo, EGP) settled in the area of San Ramón de la Nueva Orán in the province of Salta. Unlike previous guerilla experiments, this one was related not to Peronism but to the Cuban Revolution and its continental strategy. Its militants included Cubans and youths who had left the Communist Party of Argentina (Partido Comunista Argentino, PCA) after its reformist turn. The group was rapidly dismantled by the Gendarmería (border guards).

The first attempt to organize an urban guerilla campaign was made in 1963 by the Armed Forces of the National Revolution (Fuerzas Armadas de la Revolución Nacional, FARN), a split from the Trotskyite organization Workers' Word (Palabra Obrera, PO), which expressed its support for armed actions in 1961 under the influence of the Cuban Revolution. The FARN group also sought to install a rural guerilla foca (small cell of guerillas in the countryside), but its main leaders died accidentally in 1964 while making a bomb.

In June 1966 a new military coup d'état, known as the Revolución Argentina, ended the cycle of limited democracies. The military sought to end the political crisis initiated by the overthrow of Perón by reorienting the economy in favor of concentrated capital. Paradoxically, the dictatorship's economic and repressive policies ended up by mobilizing large groups of resistance among workers and students, giving rise to widespread political radicalization. Considerable sectors of the working and middle classes, especially the student movement and Christian activists, formed a massive force that took to the streets to resist the dictatorship, incorporating the use of direct violence as an everyday instrument of combat in clashes with the police.

With these developments, the impulse toward new guerilla organizations gained vitality. The impact of the Cuban and Chinese revolutions, in addition to the anti-imperialist struggles in Indochina, further reinforced such determination. In this way, national events combined with events worldwide fueled support for the use of violence in political struggles.

Groups coming out of the PCA and the Argentine Socialist Vanguard Party (Partido Socialista de Vanguardia, PSAV) created the Army of National Liberation (Ejército de Liberación Nacional, ELN) in support of the guerilla foca launched by Ernesto "Che" Guevara in Bolivia. In 1970, joined by other leftist groups, it founded the Revolutionary Armed Forces (Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias, FAR). The ELN's first public appearance consisted of taking over the city of Garín in the province of Buenos Aires, although the group had been in existence since 1969 when it carried out actions against 13 grocery stores of the American chain Minimax in repudiation of Nelson Rockefeller's visit to Argentina. The group ended up by growing closer to and vindicating Peronism.

In 1968 a rural guerrilla foca was sent to Taco Ralo in the Tucumán province by a small group of Peronist activists. Having only meager means at their disposal, its members were rapidly captured by the police; however, they reappeared later under the name of the Peronist Armed Forces (Fuerzas Armadas Peronistas, FAP). Comando Descamisados (Shirtless Commandos), another Peronist guerilla group, appeared the following year, targeting Peronists who were judged traitors by the group. By 1969, urban armed struggle and guerilla activity began to escalate rapidly. That year, important worker and student uprisings took place in Córdoba and Rosario. Spontaneous armed struggle, including sabotage, incendiary and explosive attacks, the use of homemade arms, and the use of snipers, accompanied the uprisings.

After 1969, violence gained increasing legitimacy as a means to confront the military dictatorship, generating an intense debate among popular and leftist groups regarding strategies and tactics, while politicization grew among worker and youth vanguards. Different insurgent forces combined military actions with political and union activities that appealed to the people. Support for armed struggle did not involve terrorist methods; rather, when the military called for elections to reestablish the constitutional system, several organizations actively participated in electoral campaigns.

In April 1969, when a commando captured a guard post in the army facilities of Campo de Mayo, the Armed Forces of Liberation (Fuerzas Armadas de Liberación, FAL) were born, with militants coming from the Communist Party and other groups evolving out of it. At the same time, the Popular Commandos of Liberation (Comandos Populares de Liberación, CPL) also came into existence, created by Peronists and Marxists who sought to integrate their political traditions. Similar initiatives steadily expanded after 1970; new organizations, both Peronist and Marxist, proliferated and gained political momentum.

On May 29, 1970, the Montoneros, a leftist Peronist guerilla group with Catholic affiliations, made its first public appearance by kidnapping and executing ex-President Aramburu, one of the most virulent enemies of Perón who had taken part in his overthrow. Absorbing several preceding guerilla groups, the Montoneros soon became the most important political and military organization in the country. Its program, with a populist basis, defended what it called socialismo nacional, arguing for the need to acknowledge the Peronist identity and Perón's leadership. The Montoneros mostly developed as an urban guerilla organization, with rural guerillas only in areas where it had a presence through the Christian Agrarian Leagues (Ligas Agrarias), especially in the province of Chaco.

Also in 1970, at its Fifth Congress, the Combatant Workers' Revolutionary Party (Partido Revolucionario de los Trabajadores El Combatiente) founded a guerilla group, the People's Revolutionary Army (Ejército Revolucionario del Pueblo, ERP), and immediately began military operations "for the construction of socialism." Its main leader, Mario Roberto Santucho (1936–76), was the most important political figure of the Argentinian left. The creation of this guerilla group was endorsed by the Secretariat of the Fourth International, led among others by Livio Maitan (1923–2004) and Ernest Mandel (1923–95), which promoted the formation of guerilla organizations in all Latin American countries. Even though its actions were mostly urban, ERP also created a rural guerilla force in Tucumán's jungle areas.

By 1971, the Marxist-Leninist Communist Party of Argentina (Partido Comunista Marxista Leninista Argentino, PCMLA) was created. With a Maoist orientation, the party advocated armed struggle, but only implemented it in 1975 with a modest group of militants that carried out a few attacks and kidnappings. Toward the end of 1973, the Communist Workers' Power Organization (Organización Comunista Poder Obrero, OCPO) emerged out of the fusion of small Marxist groups; its guerilla groups were called Red Brigades (Brigadas Rojas).

In different ways, all of these organizations were linked to the popular force that developed after 1969, enjoying significant support among various sectors of the population.

As the confluence of mass and guerilla actions confronted the military dictatorship, the regime responded by reopening the electoral system and legalizing Peronism in an attempt to separate the popular sectors and the working class from the revolutionary vanguards. The move was partially successful, as many organizations split over the call for elections. The Montoneros were part of the Justice Liberation Front (Frente Justicialista de Liberación, FREJULI) electoral alliance that won the elections in 1973, and a few of its members secured positions in the government and Congress. Between May 25, 1973 and March 1976, democratic institutions were in place. Perón returned to the presidency after 18 years in exile, but part of the popular military organizations continued their struggle. After the elections the Montoneros carried out their actions mostly through normal institutional channels, until they eventually distanced themselves from Perón, whose policies failed to progress toward the proposed social reforms. On September 6, 1974, the group again went underground by announcing its return to armed struggle.

Repression against the guerillas was headed by Perón himself, using both legal and illegal means. Perón condoned the clandestine action of paramilitary organizations such as the Argentine Anti-Communist Alliance (Alianza Anticomunista Argentina, AAA), which murdered revolutionary militants from different organizations. Illegal repression mounted after Perón's death on July 1, 1974 and reached a whole new level after the coup d'état of the military junta on March 24, 1976. The military dictatorship of El Proceso (National Reorganization Process) implemented a policy of direct and clandestine extermination of members of all political and military organizations, as well as of all the other popular groups that threatened the status quo. The result was the massacre of thousands of popular, socialist, and democratic militants. During the dictatorship, which lasted to the end of 1983, guerilla groups were totally disorganized. Only the Montoneros attempted a counteroffensive in 1979, but it cost many lives and achieved few political results.

With the return of democracy, armed struggle declined. The most prominent action was an attempt to capture the Mechanic Infantry Regiment 3 in La Tablada, in Buenos Aires province, on January 23, 1989. The action was carried out by the All for the Fatherland Movement (Movimiento Todos por la Patria), a group holding mixed socialist and nationalist ideas and containing former members of ERP. Most of the assailants were killed, "disappeared," or arrested.

Various small guerrilla groups came and went in later years, including: Tendencia Revolucionaria, Brigada Che Guevara, and Frente de Resistencia Popular, although their actions were barely noticed. Of more salience was the Marxist Revolutionary Armed Organization of the People (Organización Revolucionaria del Pueblo, ORP), created in 1992, which carried out actions against several banks and attacked and seriously injured medical doctor Jorge Bergés, known as the "Argentinian Mengele" for his role in torturing prisoners during the last military dictatorship. One of the group's main political goals was to fight against the laws of impunity. All of these groups were quickly suppressed.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism, Argentina; Argentina, Semana Roja, 1909; Argentina, Socialist and Communist Workers' Movement; Cordobazo and Rosario Uprising, 1969; Cuban Revolution, 1953–1959; Ezeiza Protest and Massacre, 1973; Guevara, Ernesto "Che" (1928–1967); Madres de la Plaza de Mayo; Peronist Resistance

References and Suggested Readings

- Antognazzi, I. (1997) La lucha armada en la estrategia política del PRT-ERP (1965–1976). Revista Razón y Revolución 3 (Winter). Available at www.razonyrevolucion.org/textos/revryr/luchadeclasses/ryr3Antognazzi.pdf (downloaded July 1, 2001).
- Bonavena, P. et al. (1995) Orígenes y desarrollo de la guerra civil en Argentina: 1966/1976. Buenos Aires: Oficina de Publicaciones del Ciclo Básico Común de la Universidad de Buenos Aires.
- Brunetto, L. (2007) 14250 o paro general. Témperley: Estación Finlandia.
- Caviazca, G. (2006) Dos caminos: ERP y Montoneros en los '70. Buenos Aires: Ediciones del Centro Cultural de la Cooperación.
- Dias, M. (1978) La guerra en la Argentina. Lisbon: A Regra do Jogo.
- Gallo, E. (2007) Colonos en armas: Las revoluciones radicales en la provincia de Santa Fe. Argentina: Siglo Veintiuno Editores.
- Gillespie, R. (1982) Soldados de Perón: Los Montoneros. Buenos Aires: Grijalbo Editor.
- James, D. (1999) Resistencia e integración. Buenos Aires: Editorial Sudamericana.
- Löbbe, H. (2006) La guerrilla fabril. Buenos Aires: Ediciones Razón y Revolución.
- Lofredo, J. (1996) Herejes y alquimistas. Grupos radicalizados en la Argentina. Revista Nueva Sociedad 146 (November/December). Caracas.
- Marín, J. C. (1996) Los hechos armados. Argentina 1973–1976: La acumulación primitiva del genocidio. Buenos Aires: Ediciones PICASO/La Rosa Blindada.
- Pozzi, P. (2001) El PRT-ERP. La guerrilla marxista. Buenos Aires: Eudeba.
- Pozzi, P. & Schneider, A. (2000) Los setentistas. Buenos Aires: Eudeba.

- Pucciarelli, A. (Ed.) (1999) La primacía de la política: Lanusse, Perón y la nueva izquierda en tiempos del GAN. Buenos Aires: Eudeba.
- Seoane, M. (1991) Todo o nada: La historia secreta y la historia pública del jefe guerrillero Mario Roberto Santucho. Buenos Aires: Planeta Bolsillo.
- Werner, R. & Aguirre, F. (2007) Insurgencia obrera en Argentina (1969–1976): Clasismo, Coordinadoras Interfabriles y estrategias de la izquierda. Buenos Aires: Ediciones del Instituto del Pensamiento Socialista Karl Marx.
- Zamorano, E. (2005) Peronistas revolucionarios. Buenos Aires: Editorial Distral.

Argentina, general strike (Semana Trágica), 1919

Eduardo Sartelli

Semana Trágica, or “tragic week,” refers to the workers’ insurrection that took place in Buenos Aires in January 1919. The term alludes to the bloody outcome of the event, which shook Argentine society and briefly transported it to the climate of the Russian Revolution. The events of the Semana Trágica need to be framed in the international and local dynamics of class struggle. At the local level, they begin with the 1916–17 successful strike of the Maritime Worker Federation (FOM), the union of coasting trade ships workers, and ends with the 1921 failed general strike. At the international level, Semana Trágica inscribes itself in the revolutionary wave by cutting across a significant part of the world, in particular under the influence of the Russian and German revolutions. Looking at the phenomenon from the standpoint of economic and social trends, the period framing the event includes the economic and social crisis following World War I. In that juncture, between 1916 and 1921, wages fell, unemployment was more than 20 percent of the economically active population, and immigration came to an end.

From a political perspective, the events of January 1919 were determined by the development of bourgeois democracy, installed in Argentina after the 1912 Sáenz Peña Law established secret and universal male suffrage. Seen in the context of proletarian history, the event inscribes itself at the crossroads of the exhaustion of anarchism and the emergence of a trade union bureaucracy, the first represented by FORA V (Argentine Regional Workers’ Federation of the Fifth Congress), and the second by FORA IX (the worker Federation arising from the Ninth Congress).

Semana Trágica began on January 7, 1919 and ran until January 13. The epicenter was located in the warehouses of the Vasena Workshops in Barracas, the main metal factory of the period and one of the largest companies in the country, with more than 2,000 workers. The workers were on a strike demanding a salary rise, a reduction of the workday from 11 to 8 hours, no work on Sundays, and the reincorporation of union delegates fired as a result of the strike. The triggering episode leading to the metal worker general strike was the death, at the hands of the police, of four workers who tried to prevent strike breakers from entering the plant. The next day the two FORAs decide to extend the general strike to the entire nation, beginning on 9 January with almost 100 percent compliance. The Vasena plant was surrounded by anarchist forces while FORA IX negotiated with the management defended by dozens of private police. Meanwhile, serious episodes took place, especially in the passing of the funeral cortège accompanying the dead workers to the cemetery and escorted by a formation of a hundred armed workers. On their way to the cemetery, several workers were assaulted and killed upon entering a church. Protestors broke into gun shops to take arms, but there were no other thefts from other stores. At 5 p.m. the cortège arrived in the cemetery of Chacarita, where the massacre restarted: posted on the cemetery’s walls, the police and firefighters shot at the multitude indiscriminately without the armed worker guard being able to do much. Estimates of workers’ deaths range from 12 to 50.

After the cemetery’s massacre infuriated the strikers, shootings took place throughout the city of Buenos Aires, especially in the vicinity of the Vasena workshops, where the workers successfully confronted the police until the 3rd infantry regiment took control of the situation. At dusk, shootings were widespread. The number of the dead on January 9 ranged from 40 to 100, according to different sources.

On January 10 railway workers from FOF (Railway Worker Federation) joined the general strike on account of the Vasena Company’s reluctance to acknowledge the negotiations began by FORA IX with the government. The strike of maritime and railway workers had Buenos Aires paralyzed and isolated from the rest of the country. Anarchist propaganda reigned in the streets, seeking to give the strike a wider content. The same day, the police and the Liga Patriótica, or patriotic league, a paramilitary Fascistoid organization, attacked and destroyed the printing facilities of La Protesta, the newspaper of anarchist FORA. In the rest of the country a large number of strikes gave a sense of the extension of the movement, which matched a general strike declared in Montevideo. Fighting between anarchist workers and the police helped by the Patriotic League took place throughout the day and resulted in the deaths of several workers. Children also participated in the struggle, throwing stones at public lighting to be able to operate safely in the night. Some 500 workers attacked a police station to free their imprisoned fellow workers.

In the meantime the government surrounded the city of Buenos Aires with the army and forced Vasena to accept the workers' demands to prevent the further expansion of the strike. FORA IX accepted and decided to lift the strike, yet in practice the federation's workers rejected the decision and continued carrying out actions, overall under anarchist influence. January 10 ended with 50 more workers dead. On January 11 the strike continued throughout the country, with strengthened repression from the police and the Patriotic League, especially in the Once neighborhood, where synagogues were attacked and members of the Jewish community beaten up and even shot, leaving behind a considerable number of dead.

Anarchists became increasingly isolated under the pressure of both "novenarios" (members of FORA from the Ninth Congress) and members of the Socialist Party to lift the strike, which in any case they continued until January 13, as the unions involved did not want to abandon the struggle until achieving their specific goals. More attempted assaults on police stations took place, but the movement rapidly declined. The persecution of union leaders, especially anarchists, became a priority for the government from then on. An assessment of casualties on January 14 ranged around 700 dead and 2,000 wounded, as reported by La Vanguardia, the newspaper of the Socialist Party, to the 100 dead and 400 wounded acknowledged by La Nación, the newspaper of the Argentine aristocratic bourgeoisie. The number of those arrested during and after the events is difficult to establish, but different anarchist sources count between 20,000 and 50,000.

After the Semana Trágica, which many choose to remember as Semana de Enero, the January week, to stress the component of the struggle instead of just the repression marking the episode, the union movement continued on the rise until the mid-1920s, a rise that placed FORA IX at the head of the working class throughout the whole of Argentina. FORA V also expanded yet to a lesser degree. From the end of 1919 and during the 1920s, however, workers met increasing resistance among managers, and their main private war machine, the Patriotic League. Strikes followed throughout the provinces, many of which ended in massacres, such as the strike of forest workers in the Northeast, the strike in Patagonia, Tres Arroyos, and Jacinto Aráuz. There was a sense among the workers that the trust in President Hipólito Yrigoyen expressed by FORA IX behind a curtain of "apoliticism" would be fatal for the movement. A claim for a general strike to force the government to disarm the Patriotic League, to derogate repressive laws, and to free political prisoners began. Finally, the general strike took place in June 1921, ending in a complete failure, with all its leaders – even those from FORA IX – being taken to jail. This 1921 defeat closes the cycle of struggles that had peaked during the Semana Trágica.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism, Argentina; Argentina, Labor Strikes of 1890 and 1902; Argentina, Semana Roja, 1909; Argentina, Worker Strikes in Patagonia, 1920–1921

References and Suggested Readings

- Bayer, O. (1974) Los vengadores de la Patagonia Trágica. Buenos Aires: Galerna.
- Bilsky, E. (1984) La Semana trágica. Buenos Aires: CEAL.
- Godio, J. (1986) La Semana trágica de enero de 1919. Buenos Aires: Hyspamérica.
- Rock, D. (1984). El radicalismo argentino, 1890–1930. Buenos Aires: Amorrortu.
- Romariz, J. (1952) La semana trágica. Buenos Aires: Hemisferio.

Argentina, general strike, 1975

Eduardo Sartelli

The general strike of June–July 1975 incribes itself in the most intense period of class struggle in Argentina, a period which begins with Cordobazo (1969) and ends with the military coup of March 24, 1976. The strike belongs to the last revolutionary wave of the twentieth century, which begins with the Cuban Revolution and ends with the revolution in Nicaragua (1979). In Argentina, this particular event marked the highest point of revolutionary struggle led by the industrial working class, with the arrival of revolutionary tendencies to the industrial belt of greater Buenos Aires, which until then had been isolated from the processes taking place elsewhere in Argentina. The strike was led by organizations of the “new” left (Trotskyites, Guevaristas, Maoists) together with the Peronist left (Montoneros), thus displacing the hegemonic peronist union bureaucrats. The movement led to the demise of Celestino Rodrigo, the minister of economy in the government of President Isabel Perón, and his furious plan of economic adjustment called rodrigazo. It also led to the resignation (and fleeing the country) of José López Rega, minister of social welfare and main organizer of the paramilitary squads of the Triple A (Argentine Anti-communist Alliance), which were responsible for dozens of political murders. The general strike of June–July 1975 marks the end, then, of the peronist experience.

Perón, removed from office through a military coup in 1955, controlled Argentine politics in exile. He could not, however, return to the country until political conditions were favorable. It was the social and political crisis of the time, a product of Argentina’s stagnation, that gave him this opportunity. From his exile, Perón played both with the right and the left, promoting himself especially in his party’s youth. With them and with other moderate sectors he attempted to control the unions which were trying to organize a “peronism without Perón.” The dictatorship of General Onganía (1966–9) provided this possibility to some union leaders, especially to Augusto Vandor, the leader of Unión Obrera Metalúrgica, at the time the most important union in Argentina.

The support of leftist youth helped Peron also to harass the military in power, especially General Agustín Lanusse, the successor of Onganía after General Levingston’s brief term in office. This is how from peronism an experience of intense militancy opened up to progressively acquire leftist tones as well as a remarkable capacity to mobilize. Cordobazo, the famous worker-student insurrection in Córdoba city, marked the beginning of Perón’s offensive against his political enemies, a process in which a number of leftist tendencies and organizations converged in the context of a worsening economic crisis.

Once in power, Perón needed to contain inflation. He organized the Pacto Social, through which union bureaucrats committed themselves for two years to avoid strikes and to accept frozen wages. In exchange for their support, union bureaucrats were favored with a law of Professional Associations sanctioned by Congress at the end of 1973, which recognized only one union for each productive sector, allowed the intervention of unions’ local and regional chapters, gave union leaders power to force the mandates of grassroots representatives of Comisiones Internas de fábrica (factory councils) to expire, and extended the tenure of union leaders from two to four years.

The agreement in June 1973 set an objective limit to claims regarding wages, and led to the rise of workers’ demands for improvements in their conditions of labor, requests to reincorporate workers who had been fired, and demands for new forms of representation. These struggles led to tensions and confrontation with union bureaucrats.

Three months before the expiration of the Social Pact, in February 1975, the bureaucrats began preliminary talks with the government to reopen salary negotiations that had been suspended in the context of the Pact. On May 12, 1975, the minister of economy Gómez Morales set a limit of 25 percent for salary raises, while the unions asked for 40 percent. This conflict led to the fall of the minister and his gradualist policies. On June 2 the new minister of economics, Celestino Rodrigo, took office and announced a series of shock measures, el Rodrigazo, consisting of a strong devaluation, an increase in tariffs and gas prices, and absolute price deregulation, which resulted in a brutal, unseen inflationary escalation. Salary negotiations were interrupted against a background of strong mobilization; the Confederación General del Trabajo (the national union confederation) obtained 100 percent salary rises. Defeated, the government delayed confirmation of the agreements with the unions, only to announce its withdrawal on June 25.

Both in the city of Buenos Aires and in greater Buenos Aires the crisis led to assemblies, strikes, workers abandoning their posts, and mobilizations around union headquarters, the CGT, and the Casa Rosada presidential palace. Street assemblies were also organized, such as that on June 17 in Puente Pueyrredón by General Motors workers from Barracas and San Martín, and Chrysler workers from Monte Chingolo, to whom the police tried to prevent access to the city of Buenos Aires and CGT headquarters. In this context, on June 24, Unión Obrera Metalúrgica leaders saw themselves forced to mobilize 25,000 metal workers in the Plaza de Mayo to put pressure on the government. The CGT had to call a strike with mobilization for June 27 in the Plaza de Mayo.

The day after the general strike the first Plenary of Unions, Internal Commissions, and Bodies of Delegates in Struggle took place with the goal of addressing three topics: the analysis of paritarias (joint boards of employers and employees) by unions, the defense of salaries, and the recuperation of unions for the workers. The government's announcement of the non-confirmation of wage agreements – known that day – triggered the struggle. On July 1, Ford workers from Pacheco, workers from the Tigre and San Fernando Shipyards, COMETARSA, and of Dálmine Siderca from Campana, Mercedes Benz workers from Isidro Casanova, from General Motors in San Martín and the city of Buenos Aires, Chrysler workers from San Justo and Monte Chingolo, from Fiat in Caseros and Citroën in the city of Buenos Aires, carried out an on-site strike. Protests, mobilizations of all kinds, and confrontation with the police took place daily. In this context, a movement for the coordination of grassroots factory delegates emerged. On June 4 the CGT attempted to set a limit to workers' activism, and announced a 48-hour strike without mobilization, to be held on 7 June, which gave the government time to confirm the (previously rejected) agreements before being forced to do so as a concession to the workers. The government thus confirmed the agreements.

The Coordinadoras made their appearance between May and June 1975 and lasted until the March 1976 military coup. These organizations played a key role in convoking and mobilizing against Celestino Rodrigo's economic program, which peaked with the great strikes of June and July 1975. In both the city of Buenos Aires and greater Buenos Aires the struggle against union bureaucrats pivoted on two elements: regaining control over the organs of representation of the class (bodies of delegates and internal commissions) and debate over the conditions of production. There thus arose a new grassroots leadership in countless factories: Astilleros Astarsa, Ford, Indiel, Philips, Bagley, General Electric, Molinos Río de la Plata, Zárate-Brazo Largo, Petroquímica Mosconi, Frigorífico Minguillón, General Motors, etc. Union bureaucrats were caught by surprise and were overwhelmed by a movement arising from the base.

The mobilizations of June–July 1975 had a decisive impact on Argentine politics, with the apparent outcome of the government's confirmation of collective agreements over salaries and the estrangement of both López Rega and Rodrigo. The inter-factory coordinators continued in activity in the months following the general strike. In March 1976 the (minister of economy) Mondelli Plan triggered a new wave of protests, which saw a rise in the activity of the coordinators, a development that was interrupted by the military coup. Because of the strike, the chief concern of the military moved from the activity of guerillas to factory activists, who would be symptomatically called “factory guerillas.” It is from this sector that most of the workers who were made to “disappear” by the military dictatorship of El Proceso would come from.

SEE ALSO: Argentina, Labor Unions and Protests of the Unemployed, 1990s; Cuban Revolution, 1953–1959; Guevara, Ernesto “Che” (1928–1967); Madres de la Plaza de Mayo; Nicaraguan Revolution, 1970s–1980s; Peronist Resistance; Trotsky, Leon (1879–1940)

References and Suggested Readings

- Colom, Y. & Salomone, A. (1998) Las coordinadoras inter-fabriles de Capital Federal y Gran Buenos Aires, 1975–1976. Razón y Revolución 4, Otoño de 1998.
- Cotarelo, M. C. & Fernández, F. (1998) Lucha del movimiento obrero en un momento de crisis de la sociedad: Argentina, 1975–76. Razón y Revolución 4, Otoño de 1998.
- Lobbe, H. (2006) La guerrilla fabril. Buenos Aires: Ediciones ryr.
- Milagros no hay* (2003) Film documentary directed by Gabriela Weber.

Argentina, grassroots workers' movement: Villa Constitución, 1975

Agustín Santella

The military government of Argentina (1966–73) lost support after the popular revolts of Cordobazo and Rosaríazo from May to September 1969. Popular sectors increasingly opposed the government's authoritarian political and economic measures that benefited concentrated transnational industrial capital. Since 1969, grassroots union organizations had challenged the inaction of the CGT (Confederación General del Trabajo), rejecting "bureaucratic" unions eager to negotiate with management. Workers' radicalization was nurtured by a new generation of youth who took inspiration from the path of armed struggle of the Cuban, Chinese, and Vietnamese revolutions. The elites allowed Juan Perón, labeled a "populist," to return to government after 18 years of proscription (1955–73). Nevertheless, not even the democratically elected Peronist administration could stop social mobilization, despite its many attempts to contain it through both reforms and repression. After 1973, Perón's government exercised armed violence against Marxist subversion with the goal of disciplining youth organizations (especially in universities) and workers (in unions). In 1976, a new military dictatorship closed the cycle of social mobilization through the bloodiest repression in Argentine history, with tens of thousands of desaparecidos.

After the 1950s, investments had led to the industrialization of Villa Constitución, on the Paraná River, 250 kilometers northeast of Buenos Aires. The implantation of big factories offering high salaries attracted internal migrants. Between 1960 and 1970, the population grew by 42 percent, while the national growth rate was 13 percent. In 1960, 23 percent of the Argentine population was rural; in 1970, the proportion had dropped to only 3 percent. In Villa Constitución, the district center, where the majority of metal workers lived, the population reached 25,148.

Metal sector industries consisted of a few large transnational companies: Acindar, Marathón, Metcon (supplier to Ford), and Villber. Acindar led the sector with a workforce of 3,500. The company had close ties with the Argentine military industrial elite, so much so that the company's president from the early 1970s, Alfredo Martínez de Hoz, became the neoliberal minister of the economy for five years from 1976. One of the ten most important companies in Argentina, Acindar made metal parts for the construction sector and the automotive industry. In its plant, the most powerful sector of the Argentinian working class – the Peronist Unión Obrera Metalúrgica (UOM) – started a movement of rebellion. Before 1970, levels of participation in UOM-Villa Constitución were low.

Accompanying what was happening elsewhere in Argentina at the time, a strike began to change the passivity of Villa Constitución. In December 1969, delegates opposed to UOM's national leadership presented a list of demands regarding labor conditions and salaries. With the support of union leaders, Acindar fired the activists. In response, the workers went on strike until March, when demoralization and isolation defeated them. Even though activists accepted monetary compensation for retirement, they went back to struggle for UOM's local chapter. In January 1973, the tactic finally paid off: most of Acindar's elected delegates joined the leftist opposition. In Argentina's trade union system, workers could choose factory section delegates who in turn chose an Internal Commission by plant. In Acindar, grassroots delegates voted for opposition leader, Alberto Piccinini, who obtained 53 votes against 23 for the official union candidate.

With 50 percent of the vote, on March 11, 1973, Peronism won its third presidential election (the previous ones were in 1946 and 1952). Massive worker support for Peronism legitimized the position of the local UOM leadership. However, the problems that had led to the strike in 1970 were still unresolved. The legal rights of entire factory sections were not recognized, and union members did not enjoy health services like those of other sections. Their union dues, administered by the central union board, were never returned to the union's local office. In addition, the national UOM leadership denied Villa Constitución's union affiliates the right to hold elections. Thus, the victory of the leftist opposition in Acindar, plus the growing chances of a coalition to win the local chapter, became unbearable for UOM's national leadership.

In this context, on March 7, 1974, union representatives entered Acindar proclaiming that there were communists there, and that it was the duty of every single Peronist to vote for Peronist delegates. The plant workers received them with boos. In retaliation UOM fired 11 activists, triggering what was called el Villazo, or a major movement of protest in town. The workers decided to go on strike for an indeterminate time to protest the firings and to support democratization of the union. The strike extended from Acindar to the Marathon factory, where workers occupied the factory premises. Worker committees elected in assemblies took hostages among the management and threatened to blow up the factory if there was any police or other form of violent repression. The occupation was supported by the city's population. The wives of metal workers organized a Women's Committee and the strike became general, comprising workers from all metal factories as well as workers in textiles, the port, railways, trade, and the food industry.

The strength of the mobilization forced President Perón to intercede on behalf of the workers. In the agreement, approved by an assembly of 5,000, union elections were decided for the UOM chapter of Villa Constitución. On March 16, 12,000 people celebrated in the main local square. The Villazo became a symbol of the new anti-bureaucratic workers' union struggles, as well as a focus of attention in national politics. In November, the Lista Marrón group, incorporating grassroots delegates and leftist activists, obtained 2,636 votes, substantially more than the 1,473 votes cast for the Lista Rosa group representing the traditional UOM leadership.

Over the following three months, the new UOM leftist leadership expanded the number of union affiliates, organized the local CGT, and fought for labor demands (for example, achieving a reduction in the workday to six hours for dangerous factory jobs). At the beginning of 1975, just before the national round of negotiations, the new leadership advanced radical proposals.

The rise of the new union leadership in Villa Constitución took place amidst intensifying efforts by both the government and the traditional union leadership to control the grassroots. Tactics included reforms centralizing union structure as well as a campaign of illegal violence with state sponsorship. Claiming to have discovered a "subversive plot" to "paralyze the nation's industrial capacities," the government implemented a surprise operation against Villa Constitución. Starting at dawn on March 20, 1975, security forces arrested more than 300 local union activists and almost the entire local UOM leadership in town. These arrests led metal workers to call an indefinite strike. During the first week, the workers occupied the plants. Surrounded by police, they had to abandon the occupation only to reorganize and mobilize from the neighborhoods where they lived with their families. Over 60 days, the strike mobilized a significant part of the population in solidarity with the workers. The strike was deeper and more violent than the 1974 Villazo. The UOM national leadership supported repression by paramilitary squads, both politically and morally. Workers suffered 46 armed actions, with a total of 14 violent actions by guerillas in support of the strikers. During the strike 15 activists were murdered, and another 13 were killed later under the military dictatorship. Most members of Villa Constitución's UOM leadership were detained until 1981, while others managed to go into exile.

The 1970s workers' rebellion in Villa Constitución needs to be examined as part of the post-World War II trade union struggle between bureaucracy and democracy. Because of the strong centralization that accompanied union growth after 1946, there was little renovation of union leadership. Under Peronism, internal union conflicts confronted political identities, while the left disputed Peronist loyalties. The specialized literature discusses the dynamic of opposite identities in the mobilization of workers in light of E. P. Thompson's concept of experience. M. C. Cangiano draws on the "linguistic turn" to argue that the experience arose through a new class language in Villa Constitución's revolutionary mobilization. A. Andujar studies workers' radicalization and focuses on their social rather than linguistic experience. A third perspective arising from the sociology of conflict examines the dynamics of struggle between actors in antagonistic relations. Even though the general implications of the case remain contested, Villa Constitución shows that political violence in Argentina during the 1970s indeed expressed deep social confrontations.

SEE ALSO: Argentina, Armed Struggle and Guerilla Organizations, 1960s–1970s; Argentina, General Strike, 1975; Cordobazo and Rosario Uprising, 1969; Thompson, Edward Palmer (E. P.) (1924–1993)

References and Suggested Readings

- Andujar, A. (1998) Combates y experiencias: las luchas obreras en Villa Constitución (1974–1975). Taller. Revista de Sociedad, Cultura y Política 3 (6). Buenos Aires: Asociación Sociedad, Cultura y Política.
- Brennan, J. P. (1998) Peronism and Argentina. Wilmington, DE: SR Books.
- James, D. (1988) Resistance and Integration: Peronism and Argentine Working Class 1946–1976. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Marín, J. C. (1996) Los hechos armados. La acumulación primitiva del genocidio. Argentina 1973–1976. Buenos Aires: La Rosa Blindada.

Argentina, Grito de Alcorta Peasant Rebellion, 1912

Horacio Tarcus

In June 1912, in Alcorta in the province of Santa Fé, a group of farmers declared a rural strike that became known as the Grito de Alcorta and extended to other Argentinian provinces. The farmers were small family producers, many of them immigrants, who rented the land they worked under extremely onerous conditions, paying landowners, colonial companies, or large commercial corporations (such as Dreyfus and Bunge & Born) between 34 and 50 percent of their production. They were also responsible for threshing, packing, and leaving the produce at the train station.

According to the terms of their lease, tenants were forced to buy everything from food to clothes and tools at company-owned grocery stores and warehouses and to sell landowners their surplus, which was then resold in the stores. They had to use their own threshing machines and buy bags, seed, and even insurance from the landowners. Contracts forbade farmers from keeping pigs or other farm animals; they even had to fight locusts themselves, in addition to maintaining streets and roads. The leases had to be renewed yearly, and tenants could be evicted if they failed to comply with any of the clauses.

Nevertheless, the definitive trigger of the Grito de Alcorta was the poor harvest of 1910 and the fall in the international price of cereals, while the rent, fixed in an earlier period of economic prosperity, remained high. The first clandestine meetings of farmers took place in the basement of an almacén, or local store, in mid-June 1912. A few days later, on June 17, in an assembly held at the Sociedad Italiana de Socorros Mutuos in Alcorta, about 300 farmers declared themselves on strike until further notice. The meeting gathered on the initiative of the farmers of Alcorta; they were led by Francisco Bulzani, and the group enjoyed support from local priests José and Pascual

Netri, as well as from small shop owners in the area. Socialist lawyer Francisco Netri, the priests' brother, played a notable role in the assembly, writing a new lease for the farmers and insisting that they "organize their own autonomous union."

The new terms of the lease established a reduction of 25 percent in the harvest included as payment, changed the location of payments from the local train station to the farms themselves, extended the term of the contracts from one to four years, and freed the farmers to rent machines and tools from any company, not necessarily from those of their landowners. A strike committee was designated.

The movement was supported from the beginning by anarchist-led unions of dockers and craftsmen and spread throughout the pampa gringa, a region populated by immigrants, to the corn-growing areas of southern Santa Fé and Córdoba as well as to the provinces of Entre Ríos and Buenos Aires. As the strike continued to grow, the idea that farmers needed to organize themselves gained force. Finally, on August 15, at the Sociedad Italiana in Rosario, Santa Fé, the Argentine Agrarian Federation (Federación Agraria Argentina) was born. Its first vice-president was Antonio Nogueras, an anarchist of Catalan descent.

Landowners and the police reacted with virulence to both the strike and the organization. In a political meeting held in Firmat, Santa Fé, anarchist agrarian union leaders Francisco Menna and Eduardo Barros were murdered, while lawyer Francisco Netri was killed in Rosario. In the Argentine Congress, socialist representatives Juan B. Justo and Alfredo Palacios defended the farmers' demands, protesting the repression of the workers and interpellating the agriculture minister. In addition to the initial support of anarchists and socialists, the cause of the rural strikers gained new adherents among priests, small shop owners, professionals, and wide popular sectors. Facing the possibility of considerable economic losses, landowners slowly began to make concessions and by mid-1913, in the context of an improved harvest, most tenants had obtained a significant reduction in their lease.

Even though the Grito de Alcorta did not transform the unequal structure of Argentinian landownership, it helped to achieve some improvements and led to the creation of the Argentine Agrarian Federation, a group that has

An estimated two million anti-war protesters in London demonstrate on February 15, 2003, an international day of protest against the impending invasion of Iraq. Over the weekend of February 15–16, approximately 12 million protesters in more than 800 cities across the globe participated in rallies, marches, and civil disobedience. This was the largest mass protest in history. (REUTERS/Stephen Hird) of Iraq. Four US citizens who had lost family members in the September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks came to Baghdad and spoke out against war.

On February 15–16, 2003, approximately 12,000,000 people around the world participated in the global day of action against the approaching invasion of Iraq. Marches, rallies, vigils, civil disobedience actions, and other anti-war activities occurred in more than 600 cities in about 75 countries. As many as 3,000,000 people marched in Rome and other Italian cities. More than 1,000,000 rallied in Barcelona, and several hundred thousand protested in Madrid. As many as 1,000,000 joined the London demonstration organized by STWC, and as many as 500,000 took to the streets in Berlin and Paris. Hundreds of thousands of people marched in Dublin, Athens, and other European cities. More than 500,000 marched in Sydney, Melbourne, and other Australian cities. This global day of action was the largest mass protest in history and a historically unprecedented demonstration of international solidarity against war.

On March 14, several million workers in Spain, Germany, Italy, and Switzerland stopped work at midday in an anti-war action called by the European Trade Union Confederation. The following day, another wave of internationally coordinated anti-war protests swept across the planet. About 1,000,000 people gathered in Madrid, and about 500,000 assembled in Barcelona. Over 400,000 joined a demonstration in Milan organized by the General Italian Confederation of Labor. In other cities across Europe, North America, the Middle East, and Asia, hundreds of thousands of people participated in anti-war marches and rallies. On March 17, four members of the Catholic Worker movement entered a military recruiting center in Ithaca, New York and poured their own blood on the walls, windows, posters, and the US flag in the office.

On March 20, 2003, when the US invasion of Iraq began, new protests erupted around the world. In Greece, a four-hour general strike virtually paralyzed the country, and as many as 500,000 people took to the streets in Athens and other cities. Daily anti-war protests continued in Greece for several weeks. In Italy, the three largest labor unions organized a two-hour general strike, and hundreds of thousands of workers joined with students leaving high schools and colleges for demonstrations in several cities. More than 300,000 protested in cities across France. Riot police in Geneva fired rubber bullets at students marching on the US mission to the United Nations. Hastily organized demonstrations took place throughout the US and Canada. In San Francisco, thousands of protesters engaged in civil disobedience actions; within three days, more than 2,300 were arrested. In Melbourne, over 40,000 protesters brought traffic to a standstill in the first of four days of anti-war actions. Demonstrations also took place in Palestine, Lebanon, the Philippines, Indonesia, and dozens of other countries.

By mid-April, as US-led military forces consolidated their control of much of Iraq, the global anti-war movement began to decline. In the weeks and months that followed, peace actions continued to occur in dozens of countries, but their frequency, size, and intensity steadily diminished. In May, activists attending peace conferences since gained political significance in the country. On June 12, 1920, the Federation subscribed to the Pacto de San Pedro, an agreement to collaborate with FORA (Federación Obrera de la Región Argentina), an anarchist workers' organization. According to the terms of the pact, each Federation would keep its own specific field of action but would work in parallel for a similar objective, to put the land and the means of production in the hands of the workers themselves and abolish capitalism's and landowners' arbitrary expropriations.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism, Argentina; Argentina, General Strike (Semana Trágica), 1919; Argentina, Labor Strikes of 1890 and 1902; Argentina, Semana Roja, 1909; Argentina, Socialist and Communist Workers' Movement

References and Suggested Readings

- García, J.-M. (1972) El Campo Argentino a 60 Años del Grito de Alcorta. Buenos Aires.
- Grela, P. (1958) El Grito de Alcorta. Historia de la revolución campesina de 1912. Rosario: Tierra Nuestra.
- Solberg, C. (1971) Rural Unrest and Agrarian Policy in Argentina, 1912–1930. Journal of International Studies and World Affairs 13 (1): 18–52.

Argentina, human rights movement

Horacio Tarucus

Argentina's long history of human rights movements began in the early twentieth century with activists linked to leftist political movements. Socialist lawyers defended working-class leaders who led protests and demonstrations, while anarchists and syndicalists demanded the release of anarchists Simón Radowitsky, Sacco and Vanzetti, and the "Bragado prisoners," among others. The Pro-Prisoners Committee in the 1920s and the 1930s, the Red Socorro and its successor, the Argentine League for the Rights of Man, were inspired by communists and the more ecumenical Permanent Assembly for Human Rights.

In the late 1970s organizations such as the Mothers of the Plaza de Mayo and the Grandmothers of Plaza de Mayo were born in the core of civil society without any direct links to political parties. To understand the emergence of the latter, the starting point is the military coup of March 24, 1976, which overthrew the weakened Peronist government of Isabel Martínez, Juan Domingo Perón's widow. A military Junta, formed by members of the three armed forces, placed itself in power, shutting down Congress, suspending political life, dissolving political parties and leftist organizations by decree, intervening in trade unions, and declaring a state of emergency. It named its own government Proceso de Reorganización Nacional, setting as its goals the "annihilation of subversion" as well as the economic, social, and labor reorganization of the country, while declaring that the political process would be reopened and elections called once the country was "normalized."

What distinguished the 1976 military dictatorship from other similar dictatorial experiences in Argentina which, as in 1930, 1943, 1955, 1962, and 1966, had limited themselves to deposing a government and sending its supporters to prison, was the scope of its repression as much as its peculiar methods. The 1976 military dictatorship of El Proceso not only sought to depose the Peronist government, but it also transformed the economic and social structure of the country in such a way as to dislocate the industrial and urban centers that had produced and reproduced the Peronist working class. While crushing leftist armed organizations that defied the power of the state and the armed forces (especially the Peronist Montoneros and the guevarista Ejército Revolucionario del Pueblo), the dictatorship also attacked the social and cultural roots of the "new left" among students, artists, intellectuals, and wide sectors of the population by imposing a true regime of terror.

The government intervened in universities, dissolved student governments, shut down publishing houses, banned hundreds of books, and hunted down leftists, as had previous military regimes. Yet the distinct trait of the 1976–83 Argentine military dictatorship was state terror in a systematic policy of persecution of "subversives" (a loose category that included armed combatants, union and student activists, leftist sympathizers, and relatives and friends of activists), who were kidnapped, tortured, stripped of their property, and in most cases also murdered, with their remains either being thrown into the sea or buried in common graves as "N.N."

Tens of thousands of detainees, tortured and kept clandestine, were too many for police stations. Thus, about 350 clandestine centers of detention were set up throughout the country. One of the best known and most ominous was ESMA, the Escuela de Mecánica de la Armada de la Ciudad de Buenos Aires. With the families of the disappeared actively looking for them in police stations, prisons, courts, and state offices, detainees received the juridical label of desaparecidos or “disappeared.” The corpses of the victims were never returned to relatives. Human rights organizations estimated the number of detainee-disappeared as 30,000, adding the victims of the military dictatorship to those of the paramilitary squads during 1974 and 1975. The method of forced disappearances created a climate of terror and uncertainty among the civilian population.

The mothers of many detainee-disappeared, tired of traveling fruitlessly to police and military offices to inquire about their children’s whereabouts or filing habeas corpus in court, began meeting in the Plaza de Mayo in front of the Casa Rosada (the president’s headquarters) from Thursday, April 30, 1977. The initiative was taken by Azucena Villaflor de Devinenti, who invited other mothers she had met on her journey through different state offices to gather peacefully in front of the Casa Rosada to request an interview with General Jorge Rafael Videla, Argentina’s de facto president. From then on, the mothers met every Thursday. In the first weeks, there were only 14 of them, later joined by others. When security forces asked the mothers to move along, as the state of siege made any meeting of people illegal, they decided to march in circles around the Mayo Pyramid in the center of the plaza. The mothers recognized each other by the white handkerchief on their heads, which eventually turned into a symbol that traveled around the world.

As the mothers embraced values understood as belonging to Christian traditionalism, the military dictatorship never dared openly to attack the movement, who embodied a deeply rooted sensitivity that as women, no obstacles should prevent them from protecting their offspring. However, the Mothers were maligned in the media (who called them “the madwomen of the Plaza”), threatened, suffered persecution, and even disappeared themselves. By late 1977 Navy Captain Alfredo Astiz had infiltrated the Mothers organization and kidnapped several members, including French nuns Alice Domon and René Leonnie Duquet, following a secret meeting at Santa Cruz Church in the porteño neighborhood of San Cristóbal. Two days later, Azucena Villaflor was taken from her home.

Despite this blow, the movement of the Mothers persisted, marching around the Plaza de Mayo. During the 1978 Soccer World Cup in Argentina, Mothers gained international recognition when cameras captured their Thursday rounds. The following year, the visit of the OAS Interamerican Human Rights Commission contributed to raising international awareness of the serious situation in Argentina. Such recognition was reinforced when Adolfo Pérez Esquivel, leader of a human rights group resisting the military dictatorship, was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize.

After the Argentine defeat in the Malvinas/Falklands War (1982), important new groups began accompanying the Mothers in their Thursday rounds. A few months earlier, in December 1981, the Mothers themselves had begun convoking a special 24-hour annual round named Marcha de la Resistencia, which eventually attracted tens of thousands of people. In one of these marches, thousands of protesters wore white masks as a way to represent the unrepresented: the presence of the disappeared. In another demonstration, thousands of silhouettes drawn by protesters with chalk covered the streets following the line of march.

The movement of the Mothers retained political relevance following the end of the dictatorship in 1983, through claims of “truth and justice” to the governments of the democratic transition. Internal disagreements among the Mothers over the degree of confrontation with post-dictatorial governments and the assessment of the actions of armed organizations in the 1970s led to a split into two groups: the Asociación Madres de Plaza de Mayo, led by Hebe Pastor de Bonafini, and the Madres de Plaza de Mayo – Línea Fundadora, led by Nora de Cortiñas.

Some of the Mothers attending the Thursday rounds in the Plaza de Mayo knew that their daughters or daughters-in-law were pregnant and had grounds to believe they had given birth in secret detention centers. One such “mother-grandmother” was Alicia Zubasnabar de De la Cuadra. Maria Isabel Chorobik de Mariani began looking for other mother-grandmothers. Toward the end of 1977, following the suggestion of Lidia Pegenante, a remarkably courageous lawyer working in La Plata courthouse, Mariani went to De la Cuadra's house in La Plata. From their conversation, Abuelas de Plaza de Mayo, the Group of the Grandmothers, was born, who sought and joined together with other grandmothers of the disappeared. According to the testimony of "Chicha" de Mariani, Licha [Alicia de De la Cuadra] looked for the other grandmothers she knew from Plaza de Mayo, we met, and decided to start working together. We were twelve at the time. I was surprised to see their serenity; I was a wreck, I was crying all the time, I saw them so serene and said to myself "I must be like them." First we made ourselves known as Abuelas Argentinas con Nietitos Desaparecidos [Argentine Grandmothers with Little Grandchildren Disappeared]. But we grew, people started to know us and to call us the Grandmothers of the Plaza de Mayo.

That initial group split from the Mothers of the Plaza de Mayo, since – without stopping the search for their disappeared children – they understood that the recovering of kidnapped babies and young children called for specific strategies and methodologies. In the first place, they tried to sensitize the local and international public about the dictatorship's systematic plan to steal babies by publishing paid announcements in the media, requesting meetings with government officers and members of the Catholic Church, and meeting figures of international relevance such as the pope. In 1977 they appealed to the OAS, following which the Interamerican Commission of Human Rights visited Argentina in 1979 to file a report on the situation in the country.

Thanks to several testimonies, the Grandmothers exposed the existence of clandestine maternity hospitals (such as those in detention centers like Campo de Mayo, Escuela de Mecánica de la Armada, Pozo de Bnafield, etc.) as well as "waiting lists" among military families. Some sources estimate the number of kidnapped children at 300 from 1975 and 1980, whereas others refer to 500. Children, treated as "war booty," used to be given in "adoption" to military families, but in some cases they were abandoned or sold.

The Grandmothers initiated a tracking of their grandchildren (e.g., searching in minor courthouses, orphanages, and maternities) with the goal for their return to their legitimate families and retrieving their true identity. After the end of the military dictatorship, the Grandmothers promoted the trial of perpetrators who had kidnapped the babies, while resorting to the latest genetic innovation – DNA tests – to confirm the biological identity of many children and youths suspected of having been stolen and renamed with a fake identity. To ensure the validity of blood tests the Grandmothers implemented a Bank of Genetic Data, created by law, storing the genetic maps of all the families who had children disappeared. Starting in 1997, the Grandmothers developed an intense campaign so all youths born between 1975 and 1980 who had doubts about their identity could go to the Asociación Abuelas de Plaza de Mayo to run a DNA test. To date (June 2008) the Grandmothers have recuperated 90 grandchildren.

The first president of the Grandmothers was Alicia de la Cuadra, later replaced by "Chicha" de Mariani in 1984, who left the group in 1989 because of differences with Estela Barnes de Carlotto, who went on to preside over the organization. For her part, in 1996 Mariani founded a new human rights organization, Fundación Anahí. In May 2008 the Grandmothers of the Plaza de Mayo were nominated candidates for the Nobel Peace Prize.

In the 1990s the generation of the children of the disappeared emerged in public life, beginning by meeting each other at memorial commemorations of their parents, popular mobilizations, and participation in university student governments. The first group was organized in 1994 after a Day of Memory and Commitment held in the School of Architecture at the Universidad Nacional de La Plata. In October 1995 more than 300 children of the disappeared from throughout Argentina gathered in the city of Córdoba, founding a human rights organization known by the acronym HIJOS (Hijos por la Identidad y la Justicia, contra el Olvido y el Silencio). Since then, HIJOS has gained public recognition with appearances in the media by offering testimonies and making their claims to truth, justice, and identity heard through banners exhibited in Resistencia marches and other human rights public events, adding "vindication of the spirit of struggle of our parents."

The rapid visibility of HIJOS owes much to its innovative method of denunciation of the government's failure to bring perpetrators to justice. The organizers appealed to the porteño lunfardo of “escrache,” a local dialect that refers to public denunciation. Protesters staged mass demonstrations at the homes of perpetrators released or exempted from prison by the government of President Carlos Menem’s pardons or “impunity laws,” as a means of identifying and exposing them publicly in their true character before their neighbors and society at large.

Among other human rights groups formed to protest the abuses of the military dictatorship were the Asamblea Permanente por los Derechos Humanos (Permanent Assembly for Human Rights), Familiares de Detenidos y Desaparecidos por Razones Políticas (Relatives of Detainees and Disappeared for Political Reasons), Centro de Estudios Legales y Sociales (Center of Legal and Social Studies), Servicio de Paz y Justicia (Service of Peace and Justice), and the Movimiento Ecueménico por los Derechos Humanos (Ecumenic Movement for Human Rights).

SEE ALSO: Argentina, Piquetero Movement; Argentina, Social and Political Protest, 2001–2007; Grandmothers of the Plaza de Mayo; HIJOS Movement, Children of the Disappeared; Madres de la Plaza de Mayo

References and Suggested Readings

- AA.VV. (1997) Historia de las Abuelas de Plaza de Mayo. Buenos Aires: La Página.
- CONADEP (1984) Never Again: Report of the National Commission on the Disappearance of Persons. Buenos Aires: Eudeba.
- CONADEP (1995) Never Again: Report of the National Commission on the Disappearance of Persons. Buenos Aires: Eudeba and Página.
- Las Madres de Plaza de Mayo (2008) Official website www.madres.org.

Argentina, indigenous popular protests

Walter Delrio

The situation of indigenous peoples in Argentina has been shaped, on the one hand, by a political history of failure to acknowledge their existence and influence in the nation and, on the other, by the continual expropriation of resources by the state. Although from 3 to 5 percent of Argentina’s population acknowledge membership in the 27 indigenous groups within the country, Argentinian society identifies itself almost exclusively with European immigrant descendants.

In the 1870s, the Argentine government launched a military expedition, led mainly by General Julio Argentino Roca, to conquer the indigenous people, known as the “Conquest of the Desert.” The military campaign, which defeated indigenous people in the south (the pampas and Patagonia) and the northeast (Chaco), forms an integral narrative of Argentinian national expansion and historical consolidation. The military conquest terminated previous agreements between indigenous people and the Spanish colonizers in Argentina’s Andean region. By removing the indigenous people from their lands, the “Conquest of the Desert” shaped a new national identity that excluded indigenous people as an extinct population.

Throughout the twentieth century, Argentina has evolved through several forms of governing regime – from democracies and military dictatorships to oligarchies and popular governments – and has remained primarily an exporter of raw materials. The different regimes set in motion several disciplinary measures against indigenous peoples, who were categorized either as uncivilized or invisible, their existence, sociopolitical organization, and rights completely denied. Thus, indigenous peoples have been evicted from their territories, violently incorporated into the agrarian or industrial labor force, or concentrated into religious or state missions in rural and urban areas.

The Argentinian military dictatorship of 1976–83 systematically suppressed social and political militancy. During that time, indigenous organizations were only just beginning to define themselves and lacked organizational cohesion. From the early 1980s a new leadership emerged, which identified the basic problems of aboriginal communities as residing in their absence of juridical security and the occupation of their lands by government, military, or private interests. Following the end of the dictatorship and the return of Argentinian democracy in 1983, the new leaders set out to advance their rights.

In 1983 the “indigenous issue” was invisible and there was no acknowledgment of indigenous rights. However, as human rights activists began to criticize the state terrorism of the military dictatorship, the demands of Argentina’s indigenous peoples were made visible. The growing maturity of indigenous organizations also earned them the support of many international organizations. Questions were asked of Argentina's policies of exclusion of indigenous peoples from civil and political society. Throughout this process of inquiry, the rights of indigenous communities were advanced through judicial decisions at the national and provincial government levels. The Aborigine Integral Law in Formosa (1984) was the first piece of legislation to propose rights to land ownership and participation. In 1985, National Law 23.302 conceived four principal areas for indigenous policy: land policy, production, education, and health. It also created the National Institute of Indigenous Affairs (INAI) – unregulated until 1989 – within which indigenous representatives would actively participate. This office was responsible for defining who was indigenous and for registering indigenous communities such as civil associations as legal entities.

From 1986 to the early 2000s, as indigenous peoples and organizations mobilized resistance, legal reforms were advanced in 11 of Argentina's 23 provinces, increasing the pressure to modify the 1853 national constitution, which did not recognize aboriginal rights. In 1990, indigenous people actively coordinated reform at the national level. A crucial antecedent was Argentina's adoption of the International Labor Organization (ILO) convention No. 169 in 1992, incorporating in the constitution the criteria of "peoples," "self-identification," "territory," and "participation." As a consequence of the pressure on the constitutional convention by indigenous militants, Article 75.17 of the new constitution acknowledged indigenous peoples' preexistence and their specific rights to land and participation in decisions regarding their communities. The article was included in the programmatic part of the constitution, requiring state regulation to implement the rights of indigenous people.

The primary aim was to rise above the mere acknowledgment of indigenous rights and to effectively implement demands in official projects and program planning in the areas of health, education, and land, and in the management of the INAI. Under a legal obligation, in 1998 the INAI created the Indigenous Peoples Council as an overarching organization, without specifically defining different community interests. The Indigenous Participation Council was created in 2006 as a representative body of individual communities in Argentina.

Between 1996 and 1997, the Indigenous Peoples Participation Program met as a consultative body to implement the new constitution within indigenous communities. Various organizations engaged in local, regional, and national meetings, agreeing to share claims on the basis of three fundamental concepts: indigenous peoples, territory, and culture. The body represented one of the first national instances in Argentina of political expression and the pooling of experiences to strongly influence the process of recognition and organizational participation.

At the same time, during the 1990s indigenous struggles advanced demands for private companies, particularly firms engaged in natural resource extraction, to share their wealth, which had been earned through expropriation of indigenous land. In the southern Patagonia region, where the Mapuche and Tehuelche communities are located, mining and petroleum companies have large interests. In other regions, lumber companies and cash crop farming have encroached further on indigenous lands, particularly in the provinces of Formosa or Salta, where hunter-gatherer communal territories and forests have been severely reduced.

The growth of large farms has concentrated rural property into large latifundia and vast farming estates, further extended through the sale of lands to foreign firms in the early 2000s. Indigenous peoples seek reparations from landowners, private companies, provincial governments, and the army.

As part of the historic claim for cultural and political autonomy, indigenous peoples have struggled for the right of self-identification for community and urban organizations, and for the acknowledgment of existence prior to the consolidation of the Argentinian state. In addition, indigenous communities demand laws to expand their participation in national and state organizations beyond the pattern of paternalism and dependence. The new indigenous organizations seek to expand multicultural respect of their cultural diversity, and demand greater economic rights. The majority of indigenous peoples live in a position of structural poverty. In addition to addressing economic inequality and poverty, indigenous peoples seek to recover their "other history," recognizing, documenting, and denouncing the state's history of genocide against them.

The indigenous struggle from the early 1980s through the early 2000s has opened up a new space for political projects and organizational agendas on the basis of regional and generational status. Organization and articulation of demands have been multiplied outside the indigenous community in rural communities, urban settlements, and cross-communitarian organizations, among different communities, provinces, and nations. After the mid-1990s – following mobilization for constitutional reform and opposition to the consolidation of neoliberal policies – the indigenous struggle appeared at a provincial level. Since the Argentinian economic and political collapse of 2001, indigenous peoples have introduced new proposals for action throughout the state.

The creation of the Organization of Indigenous Nations and Peoples in Argentina (ONPIA) in 2004 was intended to represent indigenous interests at the national level in order to press for state indigenous policies. A multiplicity of positions has emerged among Argentinian indigenous peoples, depending on historic policies of expropriation, control, and tutelage as well as on culture, class, and generation. Indigenous peoples are seeking direct relations with multi-lateral organizations, without the mediation of state agencies. They are also seeking to construct a social and political space for themselves without interference or assistance by the state.

SEE ALSO: Canada, Indigenous Resistance; Colombia, Indigenous Mobilization; Ecuador, Indigenous and Popular Struggles; Mexico, Indigenous and Peasant Struggles, 1980s–Present

References and Suggested Readings

- Briones, C. (Ed.) (2005) Cartografías argentinas. Políticas indígenas y formaciones provinciales de alteridad. Buenos Aires: Antropofagia.
- Briones, C. & Carrasco, M. (2000) Pacta Sunt Servanda. Capitulaciones, convenios y tratados con indígenas en Pampa y Patagonia (1742–1878). Buenos Aires: IWGIA-Vinciguerra.
- Briones, C. & Díaz, R. (2000) La nacionalización/provincialización del “desierto.” Procesos de fijación de fronteras y de constitución de “otros internos” en el Neuquén. Actas del V Congreso Argentino de Antropología Social. “Lo local y lo global. La antropología ante un mundo en transición,” Part 3. La Plata: Entrecorillas impresores, pp. 44–57.
- Carrasco, M. (1997) La juridización de “lo indígena o la conveniencia estratégica de utilizar las leyes para defenderse.” Desarrollo Agroforestal y Comunidad Campesina 7 (33): 18–25.

Argentina, labor strikes of 1890 and 1902

Horacio Tarcus

Argentina, May 1, 1890

The International Workers’ Congress held in Paris in June 1889 designated May 1 as the workers’ global day of protest to commemorate the martyrs of the Haymarket tragedy in Chicago. At the conference, Argentina was represented by an exiled French citizen, Alejo Peyret, while the Buenos Aires Vorwärts Association, formed by socialist workers exiled from Germany after the implementation of Bismarck’s anti-socialist laws, sent a report and was represented by Wilhelm Liebknecht. The members of the Vorwärts Association in Argentina decided to adopt the program agreed upon in Paris.

At the beginning of 1890 the Association designated a commission, comprising José Winiger, a Swiss journalist and editor of the Buenos Aires Vorwärts Weekly, shoemaker Gustav Nohke, cabinetmaker Guillermo Schultze, laborer Marcelo Jackel, and graphic worker Augusto Kühn, to coordinate with other trade unions as well as with the International Socialist Circle, an anarchist group that had been in existence since 1888. The initiative was welcomed, especially by labor associations, as the loss of purchasing power in previous years had led to an important strike movement, especially among railway workers, bakers, hatters, and shoemakers. The protests were not isolated incidents but were part of a definite resistance movement that had gained the sympathy of many union organizations.

With the support of different unions a larger commission was constituted under the name of the International Committee. The Committee designated Winiger its provisional president and asked him to write a Manifesto, of which 20,000 copies were printed. The Committee established its plan of action: (1) to summon workers of the Buenos Aires capital district to a meeting on May 1; (2) to organize a Workers’ Federation; (3) to edit a newspaper to defend working-class interests; and (4) to petition the Argentine Congress for legislation protecting workers.

At the same time, the Vorwärts Weekly promoted a campaign in support of the eight-hour workday and an extension of the May 1 protest.

The document presented to Congress invoked the right of petition, established by the constitution to demand laws protecting the working class, the eight-hour workday, the prohibition of child labor, the reduction of the workday to six hours for workers aged between 14 and 18, the abolition of night work, apart from in branches of industry that required uninterrupted labor, work safety standards, the prohibition of piecework, state factory inspections monitored by workers, control of productive processes in factories and punishment for counterfeiting, and, finally, arbitration tribunals formed by worker and management delegates.

The International Committee collected 500 pesos to pay for posters and flyers calling for a mass rally and the launching of a new Workers' Manifesto. On May 1, despite rain and the threats of factory owners to fire protesters, about 2,000 workers met in the Prado Español and in the amphitheater in the Recoleta neighborhood of Buenos Aires. The event began with a workers' parade. At 3 p.m., Winiger, the Committee's president, took the platform, explaining the reasons for the event and praising socialism and May 1, which "found socialists of all over the world congregated in their respective countries." He then presented a report of the work of the Committee, which the assembly approved with applause.

Fourteen other speakers were also at the event, among them Bernardo Sánchez, the delegate of the cigar makers and secretary of the Committee, who spoke in Spanish; Marcelo Jackel of Vorwärts, who spoke in French; A. Uhule, also of Vorwärts, who spoke in German; and Tyrolese cabinetmaker Carlos Mauli, who spoke in both French and Italian. An anarchist from the International Socialist Circle argued against petitioning Congress. Finally, the assembly voiced its objections against the management resolution to fire protesters and collected 120 pesos to help those affected. The offer was received with an ovation; according to the Committee's treasurer, Augusto Kühn, one worker who later came asking for help was awarded 20 pesos.

According to journalists' accounts, at the rally the Vorwärts newspaper was distributed, a petition was circulated for signatures, and attendees left cheering for socialism and May 1 while singing the Internationale. Later that evening, a small celebration with singing, music, and dancing was held at the Vorwärts Club. The next day, the press gave the event extensive coverage, rejecting the existence of a "social problem" in Argentina and calling it "a land of opportunities" where "everybody finds jobs."

The three currents of the workers' movement that converged in the celebration of May 1, 1890 were socialists, who were the authors of the initiative, especially German socialists whose positions ranged from supporters of Lassalle to the socialism of the Second International; Mazzinist republicans, who led most of the Italian associations that had joined the International Committee; and finally anarchists, who already occupied a hegemonic position in the incipient Argentinian workers' movement but who played a subordinate role on that particular day.

Argentine General Strike, 1902

The Argentinian working class grew out of the flows of European immigrants that were concentrated in the country's larger cities, especially in Buenos Aires, the capital, as well as in Bahía Blanca, Rosario, and Córdoba. The nascent urban working class was concentrated in sectors such as transportation and port and railway activities, as well as in a number of crafts that supplied the demand for goods and services in the expanding cities. The Argentine Workers' Federation (Federación Obrera Argentina, FOA) was founded on May 25, 1901 by construction workers, workers in the graphic industry, transport workers, cabinetmakers, workers in metal, wicker, and marble, mechanics, bakers, stonecutters, plasterers, saddlers, candlemakers, rug makers, and shoemakers. The Federation attempted to unify anarchists and socialists and drew heavily on direct action methods, beginning with a major boycott in August 1901 and a general strike in 1902.

The year 1902 began with a strike that paralyzed the port of Rosario. In February railway firemen, sailors from Buenos Aires, and dockers from Bahía Blanca went on strike. In April, transport workers went on strike in Buenos Aires, as did bakers for five weeks between July and August. At that time, dockers had to carry cereal bags weighing up to 120 kilos, while the length of the workday and remuneration were at the managers' discretion. In August, the workers of the Buenos Aires port refused to carry bags unless certain conditions were met (e.g., maximum weight, payment, working conditions). They were joined by dockers from other cities in the Buenos Aires province, such as Campana and San Nicolás. The Chamber of Commerce was forced to concede.

The real starting point of the 1902 general strike was the Buenos Aires Central Fruit Market workers' struggle. Before unionizing in 1901, market workers labored for more than 14 hours a day, carrying bags weighing more than 100 kilos. In October, the workers petitioned their managers for the abolition of piecework, a minimum of 4 pesos per day for adults, and 2 and a half pesos for minors under 15, a nine-hour workday, and legal recognition of the union. As managers ignored their demands, they formed an assembly on October 16 and decided to go on strike. The government responded by sending in strikebreakers. Dockers and transport workers joined the strikers in support, blocking the transportation of fruits and cereals. Promoted by anarchists, a chain of solidarity strikes extended from the end of October to the beginning of November to factories, workshops, ports, and the streets; there were 70,000 strikers and Buenos Aires and other cities were paralyzed. Police and military forces persecuted and arrested strikers. The government shut down union offices, both anarchist and socialist, sent dozens of workers to prison, and closed down worker newspapers. An anarchist majority in the FOA voted a general strike for November 20, despite the reservations of socialists, who considered an extension of the strike imprudent.

Employers demanded more drastically repressive measures, but the government alleged that it lacked adequate legal instruments. It was then that the government of General Julio A. Roca submitted to Congress a bill banning "any foreigner whose behavior compromises national security or disturbs public order." What eventually became the Residence Law was hastily approved by the Argentine Congress. Law 4144 was brutally implemented. From that time on, as reported by anarchist Diego Abad de Santillán, "Buenos Aires turned into a military camp: a few tens of thousands of worker activists were deported, prisons became packed with detainees." On November 23, in a meeting of the FOA Federal Committee, anarchists and socialists finally split, with anarchists calling to ratify the strike despite the repression while the socialists judged the strike ineffective. Arrests and deportations produced a crisis in the strike movement, placing a temporary halt on anarchist activities. However, some anarchist militants succeeded in evading the law by throwing themselves overboard while ships stopped over in Montevideo. A few hid temporarily in Uruguay while others reentered Argentine clandestinely. Others quit politics altogether, to be replaced by a new generation of activists who emerged in 1903.

There are different interpretations of the outcome of this strike depending on ideological positions. According to a manifesto of the Socialist Party from the end of 1902, the strike ended in a clear defeat: "Under the pressure of the state of emergency, managers felt themselves stronger than ever before, while workers were dispersed and gagged by the ignominious law." On the other hand, Diego Abad de Santillán ponders the question: "What have been the consequences of the November movement?" His response was unequivocal: "A great moral victory. The awakening of the proletariat of this country."

SEE ALSO: Anarchism, Argentina; Argentina, General Strike (Semana Trágica), 1919; Argentina, Semana Roja, 1909; Argentina, Socialist and Communist Workers' Movement; Argentina, Worker Strikes in Patagonia, 1920–1921; Brazil, Labor Struggles; Internationals; Haymarket Tragedy; May Day

References and Suggested Readings

- Abad de Santillán, D. (Ed.) (1933) Ideología y Trayectoria del Movimiento Revolucionario en la Argentina. Buenos Aires: Nervio.
- Oddone, J. (1934) Historia del Socialismo Argentino, 2 vols. Buenos Aires: La Vanguardia.
- Oddone, J. (1949) Gremialismo Proletario Argentino. Buenos Aires: La Vanguardia.
- Ratzer, J. (1970) Marxistas Argentinos del 90. Córdoba: Pasado y Presente.
- Tarcus, H. (2007) Marx en la Argentina. Sus Primeros Lectores Obreros, Intelectuales y Científicos. Buenos Aires: Siglo XXI.

Argentina, labor unions and protests of the unemployed, 1990s

Marina Kabat

Organizations of the unemployed stepped into the limelight of Argentinian political life in the 1990s. Their mobilizations were a response to both the high unemployment rate and the economic recession that followed from the Tequila

Effect: the economic crisis of the Southern Cone that resulted from the Mexican economic crisis of 1994. These organizations experienced a tremendous growth that allowed them to move from scattered and isolated actions associated with protest movements into the development of a national struggle with a broader spectrum of demands.

Background

In the 1990s the growth in Argentina's unemployment rate accelerated rapidly; equally swift was the organization of unemployed workers' movements, which benefited from strong Argentinian political and organizational traditions.

In early 1991, Domingo Cavallo was appointed minister of the economy. He implemented the convertibility plan (Plan de Convertibilidad), which pegged the Argentinian peso to the US dollar, and proposed the National Employment Law (Ley Nacional de Empleo), which facilitated and reduced the cost of dismissals, allowed the hiring of temporary workers, promoted "flexible" work contracts, and extended working hours. The result was an exponential increase in the unemployment rate. When Cavallo took office, the unemployment rate was 6.6 percent; in three years it doubled, and by 1995 it had risen to 18.6 percent. The total percentage of underemployed and unemployed workers nationwide reached 30 percent, and was up to 50 percent in the country's interior. Until 1991, Argentinian workers did not have unemployment benefits. In that year, as part of the Employment Law – and in hopes of administering a palliative to the instability sparked by the growth of unemployment – a derisory unemployment benefit was created totaling less than $300 per month, to be received for one year. Even so, only 5 percent of workers met the requirements to apply for it. The mass of unemployed workers did not have any unemployment compensation.

Worker Response

The demands of organized unemployed workers ranged from the takeover of private companies to setting objectives for a deeper transformation of society. The movement started in the poorest provinces in the extreme north and south of the country, and later spread into greater Buenos Aires. Even though it was born in more marginal areas, the movement grew and expanded until it had a strong impact on the heart of the Argentinian economic and political system. The unemployed workers' movement, along with the piquetero movement, was crucial in the struggle against the economic reforms implemented first by Carlos Menem's government, then by De la Rúa's, as well as in the political process that converged in the Argentinaazo insurrection that forced De la Rúa to resign from the presidency in December 2001.

Roadblocks were a popular tactic of the workers. The first roadblock organized by the unemployed took place in Senillosa, in the province of Neuquen, in 1994. By 1995, the movement had spread to different points of the country. The strong Argentinian union tradition and history of insurrectional protest help explain the rapid growth of the movement. These experiences were embodied in the leaders of the movement themselves. Some had been union representatives of private companies, and their disappointment with the bureaucratic unions, which had taken no action against privatizations, drove them to resume the combative traditions of the Argentinian working class. Direct action, especially the roadblock, was the method chosen in favor of seeking parliamentary regulations. Assemblies became places where decisions were made, and a system in which mandates could be revoked was implemented to prevent the co-optation of leaders and to guarantee internal democracy within the movement. Working together with the factory and state workers who had lost their jobs were young people and women, most of whom were housewives with no work experience.

In 1995, the year of President Menem's reelection, the first demonstrations of the piquetero movement took place in the city and province of Buenos Aires. The following year, the coordinator of the unemployed of Berazategui set up a popular open canteen in front of the local town hall. The coordinator received an allowance of some bags of food, which she accepted on condition that they were distributed by her. This criterion of local rather than government control, which was intended to break with the clientelist governmental structures, has been persistently defended by the unemployed organizations all across the country.

In June 1996, the first insurrection took place in Cutral C6, in the province of Neuquen.

Workers from this city and from Plaza Huincul blocked Road 22 for a week in protest against the reduction in unemployment benefit and the announcement that a new factory would not be set up as planned. Five thousand neighbors blocked the road, and when the gendarmerie attempted to evict them, the people revolted, organized barricades, and forced the government to negotiate. Ultimately this led to new benefits for the unemployed as well as the reconnection of gas and electricity, which had been cut off. A year later, the experience was repeated, but this time it affected an even greater part of the province. In the middle of a teachers' strike, the teachers, together with student and parent assemblies, blocked interprovincial access bridges and roads; the gendarmerie again tried to prevent the blockages. It took the authorities three days to clear the streets, and they proceeded to chase picketers through the city. This provoked a popular uprising; in trying to suppress it, the police murdered a young woman, Teresa Rodríguez. The gendarmerie was confronted by 15,000 people who forced it to retreat.

In Cutral Có and Plaza Huincul barricades were mounted. The unemployed blocked access roads and demanded not only unemployment benefits or social service plans but also genuine work. During this period, new unemployed organizations emerged in Buenos Aires, Córdoba, Jujuy, and Salta. In September 1996, the first piquetero march to Plaza de Mayo was organized. The March Against Hunger, Unemployment, and Repression gathered more than 1,000 people in front of Government House. In 1997 similar uprisings took place, but this time they were more radicalized. Between 1998 and 1999, the movement ebbed as expectations grew regarding a change of president. However, it reemerged stronger than before in the face of the aggravation of the economic crisis and disappointment with the new president, De la Rúa, in 2000 and 2001.

The internal political debate within the movement was difficult to surmount. Different political orientations competed for leadership: Trotskyists, Maoists, communists, autonomists, nationalists, even a group of priests who had been expelled from the church led different unemployed organizations. The intellectual debates surrounding this phenomenon have focused on the degree of novelty that this form of protest, or the individuals who carry it out, entails. In this sense, one aspect of the debate is the conceptualization of the unemployed and whether they constitute a faction of the working class, an industrial reserve army, or new social actors generally conceived as marginal within the greater system.

SEE ALSO: Argentina, General Strike (Semana Trágica), 1919; Argentina, General Strike, 1975; Argentina, Grassroots Workers' Movement: Villa Constitución, 1975; Argentina, Piquetero Movement; Argentina, Social and Political Protest, 2001–2007; Argentina, Socialist and Communist Workers' Movement; Argentina, Worker Actions, October 17, 1945; El Argentinazo, December 19 and 20, 2001

References and Suggested Readings

- Dinerstein, A. (2001) Roadblocks in Argentina: Against the Violence of Stability. Capital and Class 74.
- Oviedo, L. (2001) Una historia del movimiento piquetero. De las primeras coordinadoras a las Asambleas Nacionales. Buenos Aires: Rumbos.
- Sartelli, E. (2007) La plaza es nuestra. La lucha de clases en la Argentina a la luz del Argentinazo. Buenos Aires: Ediciones ryr.
- Svampa, M. & Pereyra, S. (2004) Entre la ruta y el barrio. La experiencia de las organizaciones piqueteros. Buenos Aires: Biblos.

Argentina, piquetero movement

Silvina Pascucci

The existence of the piquetero movement marked a milestone in the political history of the post-dictatorship Argentinian working class. The movement's name is derived from its members' affinity for direct action methods, especially picketing, blocking roads, and occupying buildings and factories during moments of intense struggle. The most common image of the piquetero is a person armed with sticks and stones, wearing a hood, and blocking the traffic with blazing fires.

Much of the significance of the picket as a direct action tool is derived from its traditional use as a strike tool. In the piquetero movement, the unemployed status of its members precludes the use of the strike as a tool. What characterizes the piquetero movement, then, is the use of the picket without the strike, in direct contrast to employed workers who strengthen their strikes with picket lines. With roots in the struggles of unemployed workers, piqueteros have instigated a political movement that includes the most active factions of the employed and unemployed working class and established alliances with factions of the urban and rural petty bourgeoisie (such as small agrarian producers, merchants, and professionals). Due to the struggle's methods (based on direct action) and its forms of organization (linked to the Popular Assemblies), the piquetero movement became, from 1999 to 2003, one of the most critical players in Argentina's class struggle. Its insurreccional tendency helped facilitate the events of December 19 and 20, 2001, known as the Argentinazo. During this event, an alliance of class factions challenged the state and overthrew President Fernando de la Rúa. The piquetero movement played a central role in the formation of this process, and exercised a moral leadership of the protagonists of the 2001 insurrection.

The economic roots that gave way to the emergence of the piquetero movement go as far back as the 1990s, a time period characterized by the disintegration of capitalist social relationships that would lead up to the 2001 economic crisis. The crisis resulted in a permanent increase in unemployment, precarious employment, the destruction of the health and educational systems, and a food crisis. Unemployment rates largely exceeded 20 percent of the economically active population, whereas underemployment rates reached even higher levels. The lower and middle classes got poorer, leaving almost 50 percent of the population below the official poverty line. The growing presence of the unemployed and pauperized workers influenced the piquetero movement to take an active role in the creation of free soup kitchens, schools, first aid clinics, and workers' co-ops. Even a piquetero culture was born: piquetero cinema, mostly documentaries on popular struggle, piquetero rock bands, piquetero painting, especially murals and graffiti, among other artistic manifestations, have had a worldwide audience and impact.

A great variety of platforms, as well as different political tendencies, have coexisted within the movement since its inception. Both collective struggle and disputes over the movement's direction have always been present. On the whole, the movement adopted two strategies that functioned alongside one another until 2001. One was reformism, which sought an alliance with the progressives and the national bourgeoisie. Groups using this strategy included the Combative Class

Current (CCC) and the Land and Housing Federation (FTV). The second strategy, of a more revolutionary character, rejected any bond or commitment with bourgeois factions, and aimed at a policy of class independence that confronts the capitalist system and allows the struggle for socialism. Several left-wing parties embody this tendency, most of which gave birth in 2002 to the National Piquetero Bloc (PBN). Some movements worth highlighting are the Workers' Party (Polo Obrero), the Teresa Lives Movement Without Work (from the Socialist Workers' Party), the Territorial Movement of Liberation (associated with the Communist Party), the Teresa Rodriguez Movement (MTR), the CTD of Aníbal Verón, and the Unemployed Workers' Movements (Movimientos de Trabajadores Desocupados).

At the movement's inception, proponents of both strategies worked well together, helping to organize the first pickets and mobilizations and taking part in the national piquetero assembly, where the battle plans and slogans that marked the political characterization of each phase were decided upon. However, insofar as the insurreccional tendency existed alongside the growing economic and political crisis, the revolutionary strategy gained greater power. This is how the CCC, which had decided not to take part in the 2001 insurrection, founded the basis for what was later called the "Soft Picketers" due to its conciliatory tendency and rapprochement to the new president, Néstor Kirchner, who was elected in 2003.

The second, more revolutionary group of activists increased in number and cohesion after the insurrection of 2001. The organizations that embodied this tendency formed the PBN and became organized in National Assemblies of Employed and Unemployed Workers. Delegates from all over the country met in those assemblies on behalf of the unemployed workers' organizations, internal committees, workers' unions, petty bourgeoisie organizations, students, occupied factories, and any other type of political association with an active role in the struggle. Theirs was a revolutionary political platform based on class independence. Internal struggles, arguments, and break-offs also occurred, but all within a frame of unity. These assemblies worked with thousands of workers, who were in turn representatives of tens of thousands of other workers. It was a mass organization.

The visibility that the piquetero movement achieved brought several historians, sociologists, and journalist into a closer study of the case. One of the most common interpretative lines identified it with the concept of new social movements. According to this tendency, the eruption of piqueteros marked the end of the traditional struggles of the working class linked to workers' unions, with the strike as their primary tool. Contrary to this, the piquetero movement was made up of unemployed workers, who were identified as a new social subject. Likewise, the movement's quintessential method of struggle, the roadblock, was shown as innovative and unprecedented in the history of Argentina. New "alternative" methods of organization were also emphasized, which would lead to the formation of new subjectivities, opposed to traditional forms of struggle and association with political parties. These views are discussed within Marxist studies, which conceptualizes the piquetero movement as the vanguard of the working class (employed and unemployed) that resumes its historical method of struggle – direct action – and proposes itself as the revolutionary leadership.

Since the beginning of economic recovery in 2003, the employed workers' movement has come back into the limelight. If in the 1990s the movement was relatively paralyzed due to the advance of labor flexibility and unemployment, the economic recovery – though weak – made it possible to demand better conditions. Whereas the most institutionalized worker factions remained in the bureaucratic trade union organizations, the employed workers who belonged to the most dynamic factions (subway, rail, and health workers, for instance) joined in the piquetero movement. Most of the left-wing organizations and political parties that were part of the piquetero movement gained control of some internal committees in the trade unions and formed new boards of delegates, outnumbering the traditional trade union leaders who were hindering the process. The new leaders thereby reasserted the unity of employed and unemployed workers – which had already existed, in an embryonic form, since the beginning of the movement. However, as the economic recovery advanced, the movement seemed to sway and scatter, a trend that began in 2004 and continues today. In spite of this, the organizations that were set up during the boom of the movement (1999–2003) have not disappeared and still have a significant role.

SEE ALSO: Argentina, Labor Unions and Protests of the Unemployed, 1990s; Argentina, Social and Political Protest, 2001–2007; Argentina, Socialist and Communist Workers' Movement; El Argentinazo, December 19 and 20, 2001; Movement of Recuperated Factories, Argentina

References and Suggested Readings

- Cominiello, S. (2007) Tres semanas de cortes que iniciaron el Argentinazo. Estudio del Piquetazo de julio-agosto de 2001. Anuario CEICS 1. Buenos Aires.
- Isman, R. (2004) Los Piquetes de la Matanza. Buenos Aires: Ediciones nuevos tiempos.
- Mazzeo, M. (2004) Piqueteros, notas para una tipología. Buenos Aires: FISyP.
- Oviedo, L. (2004) Una historia del movimiento piquetero. De las coordinadoras al Argentinazo. Buenos Aires: Ediciones Rumbos.
- Sartelli, E. (2007) La plaza es nuestra. El Argentinazo a la luz de la lucha de la clase obrera en la Argentina del siglo XX. Buenos Aires: Ediciones ryr.
- Svampa, M. & Pereyra, S. (2003) Entre la ruta y el barrio. Buenos Aires: Biblos.
- Zibechi, R. (2003) Genealogía de la revuelta. Argentina: la sociedad en movimiento. Buenos Aires: Letra Libre.

Argentina, Semana Roja, 1909

Eduardo Sartelli

Semana Roja (Red Week) is the name given to the general strike of May 1909 that had insurrectional characteristics. The strike is framed within the historic struggle of the Argentinian working class for democratic liberties, especially resistance against repressive laws and regulations, the defense of freedom of expression, and the right of assembly. Semana Roja marked the beginning of escalating repression against union organizing, culminating with the Centenario celebrations in 1910 marking 100 years since Argentina gained independence from Spain.

In the late nineteenth century, the Argentinian working class gained greater self-identification during the economic crisis of 1898–1904, when labor strikes – an unknown phenomenon up to then – unleashed the rapid expansion of labor organizing and labor unions, and the national FORA (Regional Argentinian Workers' Federation) was created. The first decade of the century represents the dawn of Argentinian working-class consciousness. In this decade, union actions were met with extreme repression by the state, which proved itself incapable of responding through conciliation, leading to general strikes in 1902, 1904, and 1906. Although each strike had different objectives, all sought to end working-class oppression.

In 1902, the Argentinian government initiated its first major anti-labor policy through the passage of the Law of Residence of 1902, permitting the national executive power to expel foreigners who “compromised national security or disturbed public order,” understood to refer to any immigrant seeking to form a union. Given that, at the time, immigrants comprised the great majority of workers and leaders in Argentina, the law was considered a means to hamper union organization. The law, which remained in force until 1965, was the object of all the general strikes before 1930. Partly as a response to the Semana Roja of 1909, a second repressive law, the Law of Social Defense, was passed in 1910, permitting the government to incarcerate any worker who “disturbed public order” in a prison intended for serious criminals near Ushuaia in Tierra del Fuego, the extreme south of Argentina.

In the early twentieth century the proletariat labored under severely degrading conditions, enduring 11-hour workdays or longer, low pay, unhealthy workplaces, and tenement dwellings (los conventillos). The period was marked by the absence of centralized production and limited industrial development, with few large factories and many small workshops. The working masses were employed in the rural sector and transport industry (as rail workers, longshoremen, or in sea transport). Unions were weak and the few members there were had a tendency to disperse.

Politically, this period is characterized by rampant fraud, corruption, and a clientelist system controlled by large bourgeois families. There were no modern mass political parties, with the exception of the socialists. The restrictive circulation of political power triggered the mobilization of the urban and rural petty bourgeoisie, who were broadly linked to the Radical Civic Union (UCR) led by future president Hipólito Yrigoyen. The level of labor repression stimulated popular mobilizations and workers’ protests to advance democratic freedoms that were recognized by the subordinated classes as a whole.

Semana Roja is central to the political evolution of the working class, whose most distinguishing feature was a tripartite division that would later contribute to the development of the Peronist party in the 1940s: anarchists, who evolved into communists, socialists, and revolutionary labor unionists. The three currents would later struggle for leadership of the workers’ movement for 40 years. In 1909, at the time of the dispute, anarchists – who controlled FORA – were the dominant power, while the revolutionary labor unionists under the General Workers’ Union (UGT), a socialist offshoot, were a significant presence. The rising influence of the UGT and revolutionary labor unionism during the Semana Roja further contributed to the decline of the anarchists after the repression of 1910.

May Day celebrations on May 1, 1909 by the three political tendencies of the working class triggered the beginning of the Semana Roja. FORA demonstrators gathered in Plaza Lorea in Buenos Aires (currently named Plaza de los Dos Congresos). As the protesters were about to begin their procession to another square, they were attacked by the police, who fired 300 bullets and killed ten people, injuring another 70. The crowd scattered in all directions; as if planned in advance, ambulances rushed to remove bodies and the injured, and firefighters hosed the blood off the streets.

The socialist May Day rally originally planned for the Plaza Constitución on the south side of Buenos Aires redirected its course and was transformed into a protest action. The three political orientations created a committee and declared a general strike, while the government of Roque Sáenz Peña launched an assault, calling out more policemen and military troops, arresting hundreds of people, and closing all workers’ meeting places. The strike leaders demanded the reopening of meeting places, the liberation of prisoners, and the repeal of the Municipal Penalty Code, which forced transport workers’ unions to accept a series of government controls that virtually eliminated the right to strike.

Many workers also sought the resignation of the police chief, Ramón Falcón – widely believed responsible for the massacres – but strike organizers did not make the demand due to ideological differences. Whereas socialists vigorously demanded the police chief’s resignation, anarchists and revolutionary labor unionists considered that the demand acknowledged the legitimacy of the bourgeois state, with which they refused to negotiate.

In the following days, 200,000 to 300,000 workers of the city's working population of 500,000 demonstrated in the streets of Buenos Aires against the massacre. The protests were clear proof of the enormous popularity of the strike and of high-level mobilization. Further proof would be provided in response to government actions as it mobilized the city's police force, armed with war ammunition, 5,000 army soldiers, two regiments of artillery, three cavalry regiments, six infantry battalions, two engineer battalions, and 1,500 students from the shooting school. Government House, known as the Pink House (Casa Rosada), was protected by a squadron from the regiment of grenadiers.

The burial of victims brought out 50,000 to 80,000 people, the largest mass gathering ever before 1909 in Buenos Aires. Mourners were attacked by the police on their way to the cemetery: 70 people were injured and 120 arrested. On the fourth day of the strike, a socialist speech resulted in another death and several casualties; on the fifth and sixth days, the city was paralyzed. In response to the mass unrest, the government seemed willing to relent and to revoke the penalty code. Negotiations with the government were opened on the seventh day of the strike, with Benita Vilanueva, president of the senate, serving as mediator.

Paradoxically, the socialists, who were the least militant of the three groups, demanded that Falcón's resignation be a condition of negotiations. Backed by popular sentiment that sought Falcón's dismissal, the socialists refused to enter into negotiations unless the government opened a discussion to include the dismissal of Falcón. But the anarchists and radical labor unionists, refusing to acknowledge the legitimacy of the bourgeois state, agreed to negotiate a settlement. After the government agreed to free prisoners and allow workers' meeting places to reopen, the strike was ended.

The protagonists' analysis of the outcome differed according to their viewpoints: the socialists considered the strike a failure because the police chief had not resigned; the anarchists held ambiguous views; and the labor unionists called the strike a total success. These differences show the political divisions and limitations of the working class at that time: strong union awareness undermined by weak political awareness, best expressed as a high combativeness marred by a limited capacity to influence national politics.

Paradoxically, again, those who had a better understanding of political problems – the socialists – were the least committed to revolutionary change, while those who were most devoted to revolutionary outcomes were the most politically limited. This contradiction would remain unresolved up until the creation of the Communist Party in the 1920s and was one factor in the emergence of Peronism. Falcón was ultimately punished in 1910 when anarchist Simón Radowitzky threw a bomb at his carriage and killed him. To this writing, the Argentinian government's National Police School is still named after Falcón.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism, Argentina; Argentina, General Strike (Semana Trágica), 1919; Argentina, University Reform, 1918

References and Suggested Readings

- Bilsky, E. (1989) La FORA y el movimiento obrero. Buenos Aires: CEAL.
- Frydenberg, J. & Rufo, M. (1992) La Semana Roja de 1909. Buenos Aires: CEAL.
- López, A. (1987) La FORA en el movimiento obrero. Buenos Aires: CEAL.
- Rock, D. (1984) El radicalismo argentino, 1890–1930. Buenos Aires: Amorrortu.

Argentina, social and political protest, 2001–2007

Khatchik DerGhougassian

After the “lost decade” of the 1980s, Argentina rose as the “poster child” of the neoliberal reforms of the 1990s. Following the guideline of the Washington Consensus, the government of Carlos Saúl Menem (1989–95 and 1995–99) implemented a plan known as convertibilidad (convertibility), which fixed the peso value to the US dollar on a one-to-one basis and liberalized the economy through a vast plan of price stabilization and tied fiscal adjustments to the privatization of state-owned enterprises. Tired of hyperinflation and the burden of foreign debt, Argentinian society, including the popular sectors, gave broad support to the first phase (1990–6) of these reforms. After the initial shock therapy, popularized in the words of then president Menem as “cirujía sin anestesia”

(“surgery without an anesthetic”), the economy grew despite the Mexican (1994) and Asian (1997) crises, until 1998 when it entered a recessive phase. Despite increasing difficulties in keeping the one-to-one exchange rate, convertibility was maintained during the Fernando de la Rúa government (1999–2001), mostly for fear of a return of hyperinflation.

With the recession it also became clear that the social consequences of the neoliberal reforms had been disastrous. By the end of 2002, 20.8 million people were living in poverty (more than half of the population), almost 10 million people lived in impoverished conditions, and infant mortality for lack of food in a country that produced 300 million tons of grain per year reached an unforgivable level. The unfairness of income distribution was even more striking: in the federal capital and Greater Buenos Aires, the most densely populated province in Argentina, the richest 10 percent of the population, some 1.2 million people, earned 37.6 percent of the national income, whereas the poorest 10 percent, also some 1.2 million people, earned as little as 1.1 percent. The gap between the richest and the poorest sectors had reached 34.2, when it was only 12.26 in 1974. The participation of the middle class in income distribution was less than 30 percent, the lowest level in the history of Argentina.

These conditions explain the general social outburst on December 18, 2001, when, unable to sustain convertibility and eager to stop the capital flow out of the country’s banking system, the De la Rúa government implemented the corralito forbidding any cash withdrawal from banks beyond a strict minimum and imposing the use of checks, credit and debit cards, and other non-monetary means for all economic transactions. Following two days of massive popular mobilization known as the cacelorazo, referring to the middle-class protest of clanging empty stew pans and pots, riots and clashes between demonstrators and police left more than 30 dead, tens of wounded, and hundreds of people arrested. De la Rúa, who had tried unsuccessfully to impose a state of siege on December 19, resigned two years before ending his constitutional mandate. After four frustrated attempts, the Congress finally elected the governor of the province of Buenos Aires, Eduardo Duhalde, as the president of the nation. Meanwhile, the country declared default and ceased paying its foreign debt.

Duhalde declared the end of convertibility on January 1, 2002 and devalued the peso.

For the next year and a half, until the election of Néstor Kirchner in April 2003, Argentina went through one of the worst social and economic crises of its history. During the years of convertibility, $60 billion flew out of the country. According to a congressional investigation, 30 multinational corporations took the leading role in this capital flight, alone being responsible for half of the money leaving the national financial system. The middle class went from a life of luxury, including vacations in Miami, Florida, and shopping in Bal Harbor, to heavy indebtedness. They had no choice but to build their own safety nets to survive the crisis. They were only latecomers along a path already taken by the 40 percent of the society that earned less than a dollar a day. But as these precarious means of protection against the market proved to be seriously limited, resistance and protest movements became inevitable.

The mobilization in late 2001 and 2002 of the Argentinian middle class, whose standard of living had declined dramatically, was triggered by two political decisions – the freeze and limitations placed on access to bank accounts and the forced conversion of frozen foreign money, mostly savings in the form of US dollars, to pesos, which had been devalued in a highly unfavorable exchange rate. Despite their frustration, the protest and mobilization of the Argentinian middle class remained within the legal framework and used court procedure to denounce the violation of property rights, a process that became known as la judicialización de la política. In essence, they consciously used lawsuits against the government to create a sharp confrontation between the executive and the judiciary. In the process, they created important savers’ networks all over the country that took the lead in organizing protests and legal actions. This network of savers became a typical safety net that the impoverished middle class created as protection against further damage by the savage expansion of the free market.

Inter-Class Cooperation? Social Safety Nets for Survival

Unlike the protests of the poorer classes, which were deeply rooted in the structural consequences of the neoliberal model, the middle-class protest was motivated by the specific policies that hurt their savings. Thus, the middle-class protesters ended up bargaining their individual cases. Yet it is wrong to conclude that there was no connection between the two classes. Indeed, some original surviving experiences reflect a loose inter-class strategy that emerged during the crisis. One of these survival strategies was the barter club, which in early 2002 made headlines in the Argentinian media. Barter fairs were organized in clubhouses, auditoriums, and abandoned factories where goods and skills were exchanged without the need for money. As the networks grew, the simple forms of bartering became increasingly complex. The number of participants also increased, especially after the 2001 economic collapse. In early 2002, an estimated 2 million people were involved in 4,500 barter clubs functioning in more than 20 provinces.

Another protest/safety net-building initiative of the Argentinian urban middle class was the neighborhood assembly (asamblea), which emerged after the social explosion of December 19–20, 2001. Similar to the spontaneous eruption of popular protest that for the first time in Argentinian history provoked the fall of a government without military intervention, neighborhood assemblies were created without the interference of any political party. There were no ideological restrictions and no conditions for participation. Self-insured with the resurging “power of the people,” the assemblies aimed at “reclaiming the street,” according to the analysis of an active participant. In the context of a city abandoned by a bankrupt state and left to the mercy of crime, “reclaiming the street” gained a concrete meaning.

Most importantly, the neighborhood assemblies aimed at the reconstruction of social ties among people. Typical initiatives of each assembly included meals for the most needy, temporary jobs for the unemployed, cultural events, protest marches against the price rises of public goods, and support for workers occupying and managing a closed industrial plant. The assemblies combined the claim for a state and, at the same time, replaced it where it had retreated as a result of the process of privatizing public services. In some neighborhoods, the assemblies took the initiative of recovering abandoned municipal markets, cafés, bars, and even clinics. They then converted them into communitarian enterprises. Thus, in August 2002, the assembly of the Flores neighborhood recovered an abandoned clinic and was surprised to find out that it was fully equipped. Since then, with the voluntary help of physicians and nurses, the clinic has provided health coverage for workers of occupied plants. In another neighborhood, Palermo Viejo, the assembly converted an abandoned municipal market into a workshop for handmade goods that provided means of subsistence for hundreds of unemployed people. In short, in abandoned places that became useless for the market and brought nothing but insecurity and health problems to the neighborhood, a sense of society and communal belonging began to emerge thanks to the assemblies. Though political power was not their aim, most neighborhood assemblies became an embryonic state, legitimized by the people living nearby and recognized by municipal authorities. The assemblies thus fomented political participation and a sense of civic duty and citizen responsibility.

The State Response: Incorporation

On April 27, 2003, Argentinians chose a new president to take office on May 25. The two candidates who received the highest percentages of the vote, former president Carlos Saúl Menem and the Santa Cruz province governor Néstor Kirchner, went to a second round on May 18. Both were from the Peronist Party, in power since 1989 with a two-year (2000–1) interlude, yet they had opposite views of how to deal with the crisis. Whereas Menem promised tough measures, including the use of the military, to end the protest, Kirchner declared his opposition to any form of repression. Furthermore, the former was inclined toward deepening the market reforms, while the latter favored an industrial growth model. The almost 80 percent of participation in the first round of presidential elections showed democracy’s deep roots in Argentina after its restoration in 1983. Indeed, the social protest and safety net-building experiences during the economic hardship and the 2002 crisis had only strengthened the engagement of Argentinian society with democracy and confirmed that military interference in domestic issues was history. Moreover, faced with a potentially massive defeat in the second round of the 2003 elections, Menem preferred to step out of the race and let his opponent have the presidency.

Within less than a year, Kirchner's popularity was boosted, the economy was stabilized, and exportation growth ensued. The government also successfully negotiated its foreign debt. On the domestic front, Kirchner left open lines of communication with the societal sector, and, as promised during his campaign, refused to use force against protesters. Moreover, he followed a strategy of incorporation by including several working-class leaders in official institutions.

SEE ALSO: Argentina, Labor Unions and Protests of the Unemployed, 1990s; Argentina, Piquetero Movement; Argentina, Socialist and Communist Workers' Movement; El Argentino, December 19 and 20, 2001; Movement of Recuperated Factories, Argentina

References and Suggested Readings

- Algranati, C., Seoane, J., & Taddei, E. (2004). Neoliberalism and Social Conflict: The Popular Movements in Latin America. In F. Polet & CETRI (Eds.), Globalizing Resistance: The State of Struggle. Ann Arbor, MI: Pluto Press.
- Di Marco, L. (2006) El fogonero. La Nación, suplemento Enfoques. Buenos Aires, October 29.
- Grimson, A. & Kessler, G. (2005) On Argentina and the Southern Cone: Neoliberalism and National Imaginations. New York: Routledge.
- Novaro, M. (Ed.) (2002) El derrumbe político en el ocaso de la convertibilidad. Buenos Aires: Grupo Editorial Norma.
- Schuster, F. L., Naishtat, F. S., Nardacchione, G., & Pereyra, S. (Eds.) (2005) Tomar la palabra: Estudios sobre protesta social y acción colectiva en la Argentina contemporánea. Buenos Aires: Prometeo.
- Swampa, M. & Pereyra, S. (2003) Entre la ruta y el barrio: La experiencia de las organizaciones piqueteras. Buenos Aires: Editorial Biblos.

Argentina, socialist and communist workers' movement

Eduardo Sartelli

The origins of socialism in Argentina go back to the second half of the nineteenth century and are linked to the action of typographers. The first workers' mutuality society, the Bonaerense Typographical Society, was organized in the 1850s. Soon, other similar organizations linked to corporate interests and ethnicity appeared. Most had an eclectic ideology, mixing utopian socialism with republican liberalism. The best example of this convergence is the newspaper El Artesano, the first socialist publication in Argentina, which began to be published in 1863 by Bartolomé Victory y Suárez, a pioneer of the Argentine workers' movement and socialism. But it would be the typographers who made contacts with the International Workers' Association in 1870, and who were consequently chosen by the Marxist sector of the International to lead their expansion in Latin America. The presence of the International in Argentina was reinforced by a large number of exiles coming from the 1871 Paris Commune. Again the typographers played a prominent role by organizing the first union and carrying out the first strike in 1878. From then on the Argentine worker movement grew, accompanying the pace of the development of the working class after successive migration waves that caused it to grow in size and quality, considering the considerable union and political experience that many immigrants brought with them.

Socialist tendencies developed along with the growth of the working class and its trade unions, which would solidify in the extension of the socialist press and the organization of the Socialist Party. Examples of the first are Le Révolutionnaire (1875), El Descamisado (1879), and El Socialista (1877). The Socialist Party arose from the evolution of different groups, in particular from the action of German immigrants organized in the Club Vorwärts, founded in 1882. The Club was responsible for the organization of the first workers' federation, the Partido Obrero, the organization of the first May 1 commemoration, and for publishing a very influential newspaper, El Obrero (1890). El Obrero, whose main figure was Germán Ave Lallemand, had a clear Marxist inspiration. The 1890 crisis, with its social and political sequels, brought many intellectuals to nascent socialism, including the founder of the future Socialist Party, Juan B. Justo. By 1894, La Vanguardia began to be published. The oldest socialist newspaper in Argentina, La Vanguardia became the newspaper of Justo's party after its foundation two years later.

It would take several years for Justo to govern his party, especially against the left wing represented by Leopoldo Lugones and José Ingenieros, who had their own newspaper, La Montaña, which had promoted the legitimacy of violence and the refusal to ally with bourgeois parties. Under Justo's leadership the Socialist Party gained a distinctive character, merging the ideas of the intellectual elite with a reformist program not far from democratic liberalism.

The party slowly expanded both in electoral and union influence. Electorally, it confronted the peculiar Argentine political system of the time: in formal terms, the regime was a full democracy, but in fact it was governed through fraud, through mechanisms guaranteeing the circulation of a few members of the political elite. As a result of Argentina's entrenched leadership, anarchism's anti-state and anti-political message resonated and received considerable popular support. Public antipathy for the established political system only changed with the passage of the Sáenz Peña Law in 1912 providing for mandatory, secret, and automatic voter registration.

From that moment on the party experienced exponential growth, overall in the city of Buenos Aires, making La Vanguardia a wide-circulation newspaper and turning its representatives into recognized political figures. Among the latter was a small circle of professionals linked by family ties: Justo, Nicolás Repetto, Enrique Dickman, and Alicia Moreau (Justo's wife). The circle incorporated figures with a relevance of their own, such as the lawyer Alfredo Palacios, the first socialist elected representative in the Americas (1904). Its reformist style, akin to Bernstein's German revisionism and to British Fabian socialism (yet directly influenced by the experiences of New Zealand and Australia), together with the "personality cult" toward Justo, earned the party criticisms from anarchists and revolutionary syndicalists, who judged it just one more bourgeois party. For similar reasons the party experienced a number of splits: the newly created International Socialist Party later turned into the Communist Party (1918), the Independent Socialist Party (1927), and the Worker Socialist Party (1936).

In the trade union world the Socialist Party gained only weak support. It was never the dominant choice among organized workers. Until 1910, it remained a minority vis-à-vis anarchism; between 1910 and 1920, it was weaker than revolutionary syndicalism; between 1920 and 1945, it was weaker than communism. Such ineffectual trade union roots were due to the fact that the Socialist Party was a reformist liberal party whose main field was the electoral parliamentary arena, which is where it obtained its major victories. During the 1930s the party grew closer to the Unión Cívica Radical, even though socialists always criticized the radicales as a "populist" and "demagogic" party. The Socialist Party eventually allied with the Unión Cívica Radical against Peronism in 1945, fusing into an alliance known as the Unión Democrática. The electoral triumph of Peronism left the Socialist Party even further from the working class, moving toward an increasingly conservative ideology, a circumstance that provoked new splits with the creation of, on the left, the Argentine Vanguard Socialist Party and, on the right, the Democratic Socialist Party. The Socialist Party's atomization accelerated during the 1960s, at the same pace as society's political radicalization. The party's political decadence peaked with its support for the last military dictatorship (1976).

In Argentina, the most important split in the history of the Socialist Party is the one giving rise to the Communist Party. Before World War I, leftist tendencies within the party served as the basis for the organization of a group linked to the workers' movement. In 1917, the group edited La Internacional and adopted positions close to the Zimmerwaldian left against war and militarism. Their anti-war position clashed with that of the dominant group, whose agenda supported military actions against the allies, creating a split in the party that led to the formation of the International Socialist Party in 1918. The Russian Revolution permanently fused the split, after the dissident group openly expressed support for the Soviet Republic, accepted the conditions for joining the Third International, and adopted the name of the Communist Party.

In its early years the Communist Party experienced intense activism, leading it to gain the place vacated by the decline of anarchism during the 1920s. The Communist Party furthered strategies of political intervention first developed by the Socialist Party in a dispute with anarchists and syndicalists, to which the communists added a will to power lacking among socialists which they had learned from the Bolshevik program.

The Communist Party followed the swaying politics of the Communist International, positioning itself within the International as supportive of Stalinist tendencies. It practiced the class against class tactic until it received abrupt orders to join the Popular Front. During the 1930s the Communist Party expanded, notably among the workers, to the point of becoming the most powerful force within the CGT (Confederación General del Trabajo), assuming a protagonist role in historical strikes such as that of construction workers in 1935, and in the organization of unions by productive branch, which replaced old anarchist unions with their local, artisanal bases.

Following the Popular Front tactic, the communists joined socialists and radicales in opposing electoral fraud in Argentina during the 1930s. In agreement with the Soviet Union's foreign policy, the Argentine Communist Party gave support to the pro-democratic positions that led most communist parties around the world to support their own bourgeoisies against the rise of fascism, especially after the invasion of the Soviet Union. This alliance with the liberal bourgeoisie culminated with the opposition to Peronism and the communists joining the Union Democrática.

With Perón in power, communism suffered a loss of union influence. Harassed and with many of its activists in prison, Argentine communism witnessed Perón's fall in 1955 with delight and tried to recuperate positions among the working class, which was hostile because of the Communist Party's anti-Peronism. Even though it regained a protagonist role during the 1960s, its support for Stalinism, added to its anti-Peronism, alienated the support of younger generations, who saw in Peronism and Guevarism a way out of the Communist Party's reformism and de facto "democratism."

A small group of activists within the party started to control its growing political apparatus. They were notably endowed with material resources and became politically and culturally influential. This situation led to divisions within the party. Some groups of youths were eager to reinterpret Peronism and to associate themselves with the dynamism of the Cuban Revolution. Several collectives would thus be formed, one of the most important among them, Past and Present, defending Guevarist tendencies closer to Peronism. Other tendencies led to the organization of guerilla groups such as FAR (Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias). The most important, however, was provoked by the eruption of Maoism in 1968, which gave rise to the Revolutionary Communist Party. Even though severely damaged by the repression of the third Peronist government (1973–6), this group ended by giving its support to the military dictatorship of Videla, which they defined as dictablanda (or "soft dictatorship"). After the dictatorship (1982), the party became a shadow of its former self, with a number of splits barely contained by the weight of an economic apparatus inherited from the past.

Support for Trotskyism appeared early in the Communist Party's history. Argentine Trotskyism developed in the 1930s, with weak appeal within the workers' movement and with a panoply of tendencies represented by small groups of intellectuals. Liborio Justo, Posadas, and Héctor Raurich were influential during this period. The first, the son of conservative president Agustín P. Justo, played a key role in the Trotskyist movement, opposing even Trotsky himself. Posadas, a former soccer player, organized a Trotskyist tendency close to the workers' movement, while Raurich's group consisted exclusively of intellectuals. During the years of Peronism new tendencies arose, in particular one known as morenismo from its founder Nahuel Moreno, who has had an enduring influence on the Argentine left. Another influential tendency in the formation of a "new left" in the 1970s was led by Silvio Frondizi and his group Praxis. As well as the Argentine left in general, both of these tendencies were influenced by the Cuban Revolution, which Frondizi openly supported. The morenista group joined guevaristas to found the Partido Revolucionario de los Trabajadores (PRT), which was dominant in the left during the 1970s, especially once the morenistas left the party in the hands of its main figure, Mario Roberto Santucho. The PRT launched an armed struggle against the military dictatorship of General Onganía (1966–9) that continued until the 1976 military coup. Other Trotskyite groups, such as Política Obrera, and a renewed morenismo in the Partido Socialista de los Trabajadores, defended workerist positions, rejecting the guerilla strategy. The revolutionary process opened up by Cordobazo in 1969, the popular uprising in the city of Córdoba, made it possible for the left, especially guevaristas and Trotskyites, to achieve important breakthroughs among the workers, and their representatives were elected to leadership positions in unions, especially in unions' internal commissions. By that time the Maoists had split from the Communist Party.

The Peronist left deserves a treatment of its own. Emerging with the Resistencia Peronista (1955–62), it suffered the impact of anti-colonial struggles in Asia and Africa, as well as that of the Cuban Revolution. Its main concern was to effect Perón's return to Argentina from his enforced exile, although it was progressively influenced by the remaining left as well as by a few Marxist intellectuals such as Rodolfo Puiggrós. These groups and tendencies, which had their most important expression in the guerilla group Montoneros, developed a confusing ideology which they characterized as “national socialism.” The Peronist left experienced serious difficulties in interpreting the political scenario that opened with Perón’s return and his third government. Despite its strong representation in the labor movement, the Peronist left resented its ambiguous position in relation to the Peronist government, which quickly moved to the right and carried out ruthless clandestine repression, in particular through the Alianza Anti-comunista Argentina (Triple A). Most of the victims of this repression were members of the Peronist left. Together with the PRT, Montoneros led vanguard labor groups and important worker organizations, who were key protagonists in the great general strike of June–July 1975. The mass of those “disappeared” by the military dictatorship came from these groups.

The March 1976 military coup definitively changed the political situation of the Argentine left. It marked the downfall of the guevarista and the Peronist left, and the definitive decline of the Communist and Socialist parties on account of their support for the military. Peronism was no longer a living force in the heart of the working class, leaving a legacy of leadership that remains vacant, despite the self-proclaimed heirs emerging from the Trotskyite and Maoist groups that are dominant in the contemporary Argentine left.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism, Argentina; Argentina, Armed Struggle and Guerilla Organizations, 1960s–1970s; Argentina, General Strike (Semana Trágica), 1919; Argentina, Labor Strikes of 1890 and 1902; Argentina, Worker Actions, October 17, 1945; Argentina, Worker Strikes in Patagonia, 1920–1921; Cordobazo and Rosariazo Uprising, 1969; Cuban Revolution, 1953–1959; Marxism; Peronist Resistance; Trotsky, Leon (1879–1940)

References and Suggested Readings

- Campione, D. (2005) El comunismo en Argentina. Buenos Aires: Ediciones del CCC.
- Coggiola, O. (2006) Historia del trotskismo en Argentina y América Latina. Buenos Aires. Ediciones ryr.
- Corbiere, E. (1984) Orígenes del comunismo argentino. Buenos Aires: CEAL.
- Moreau de Justo, A. (1983) Qué es el socialismo. Buenos Aires: Sudamericana.
- Vazeilles, J. (1968) Los socialistas. Buenos Aires: Jorge Álvarez Editor.

Argentina, University Reform, 1918

Rosana López Rodríguez

The University Reform of 1918 was a milestone in Argentina and Latin American student struggles, resulting in the installation of democratic principles that are still intrinsic to university systems today. These principles and reforms include: university autonomy, co-governance of university councils, fair and open admission procedures, selection of university officials through public examination and democratic means rather than by nepotism and seniority, and substantive academic freedom to insure a plurality of ideas. The movement for reform also had a strong impact on wider social struggles, especially with regard to worker–student collaboration, which helped the reforms to take on a politically progressive slant.

Though originally localized in the National University of Cordoba during the presidency of Hipólito Yrigoyen, Argentina’s 1918 University Reform eventually altered the entire Argentinian university structure. The process was framed within the development of electoral democracy in Argentina and was one outcome of the 1912 Sáenz Peña Law, which established compulsory, secret, universal suffrage (for males) and resulted in the elimination of electoral fraud. Once the new law was brought into effect, conservative groups were displaced from the management of state affairs by the Union Civica Radical (Radical Civil Union), a left-leaning and ultimately powerful political party.

The University Reform was born out of this changing political climate and began in Cordoba because the power of conservative oligarchs and the Catholic Church was greater there than in other areas. Though an air of intellectual backwardness and political conservatism was present in all Argentinian universities, in Cordoba it was perceived to be more pronounced. The 1918 reforms were preceded by student agitation as early as 1903 and 1904, when a powerful strike movement brought universities to a halt.

The factors that triggered the reform movements initially did not seem to foreshadow any serious upheaval, being primarily scheduling problems and some pedagogical demands. Still, these factors would eventually bring an end to an archaic governmental university structure. Until the era of reform, University Boards of Directors were not subject to reelection or a similar process, but instead belonged to a group called Corda Frates, members of which held lifelong positions and were linked by political, ideological, and at times kinship bonds. The group essentially held control of all university positions and worked alongside the political and clerical elite that governed the province. Higher education was marked by a pointedly right-wing Catholic viewpoint, and curricula were remarkably anti-scientific. Libraries lacked any books that might contradict the domineering ideology in the boards, most notably works by Charles Darwin and Karl Marx.

The conflict that led to the University Reform began at the end of 1917 with the protests of engineering students who opposed new regulations imposed regarding attendance. Students of medicine also joined in this protest, as they rejected the removal of the patient beds at the Hospital Nacional de Clínicas. In March the following year, after creating student centers and demanding changes to university governance policies that were not met by university authorities, students reacted violently and authorities resorted to a call for police intervention. In the wake of the first reactions, a pro-reform committee was set up. In light of the events – disturbances to prevent students' enrollment, repudiation of professors, collective absence, for example – the authorities closed the university until further notice. A month later, the committee asked for the intervention of President Yrigoyen, who consented and was appointed mediator. Meanwhile, the movement provoked repercussions throughout the country and the FUA (Argentine University Federation) was founded. At Cordoba, the new reforms, which many hoped would take effect with the replacement of the old chancellor, did not go through. Instead, the new chancellor was elected through the conservative groups' influence and had the explicit support of the church of Cordoba. The students prevented the new chancellor, Nores, who was affiliated with Corda Frates, from taking power, and the struggle intensified. In the following months there were arrests, protests, occupations of buildings, and other disturbances. The demonstrations had public support and the support of the workers' movement, and included as many as 10,000 people demonstrating in the streets of Cordoba.

The movement led to the extension of student organizations, and Cordoba was the host of the first national student congress organized by FUA. Finally, and as a result of the student struggle, Nores resigned in August, paving the way for a new executive power. Yrigoyen failed to intervene in a manner consistent with student demands, and the students occupied the university by surprise, appointing authorities and resuming their lessons. Afterwards, the conflict came to an end, leaving the university government in the hands of the reformists.

SEE ALSO: Argentina, General Strike (Semana Trágica), 1919; Argentina, Semana Roja, 1909; Student Movements; Student Movements, Global South

References and Suggested Readings

- Ciria, A. & Sanguinetti, H. (1968) Los reformistas. Buenos Aires: Editorial Jorge Álvarez.
 Rock, D. (1984) El radicalismo argentino, 1890–1930. Buenos Aires: Amorrortu.
 Hurtado, G. (1990) Estudiantes: reforma y revolución. Buenos Aires: Cartago.

Argentina, worker actions, October 17, 1945

Alejandro Horowicz

The battle fought and won on October 17, 1945 by workers through a massive mobilization in the Plaza de Mayo in Buenos Aires brings class struggle into the arena of parliamentary politics in Argentina. It was a decisive victory. Between 1930 and 1945, the period of military government known as the era of “patriotic fraud” made it impossible for workers and other citizens to vote. Prior to those years, most workers were foreigners and therefore did not vote. Through the October 17 mobilization, workers achieved a new status, acquiring full political citizenship under their own leadership and initiative.

The October 17 action was the culmination of a series of important events. On October 13, Cipriano Reyes, a veteran leader of the union of meat workers, which was affiliated not with the General Confederation of Labor (Confederación General del Trabajo, CGT) but with the Comité de Enlace Intersindical (Interunion Liaison Committee), requested its Federal Central Committee (Comité Central Confederal) to call a meeting for a general strike. General Avalos, chief of the military center in Campo de Mayo, who had been responsible for stripping Juan Perón of his positions as vice-president of the republic, war minister, and secretary of labor, met Luís Monzalvo, a representative from the railway workers' union then in charge of the CGT General Secretariat, at the war ministry on October 15.

Monzalvo informed the general that the working class was ready to strike. On October 16, the Federal Central Committee met and after a passionate debate decided to support the strike as workers were advancing over the city of Buenos Aires from all directions. Silverio Pontieri, a railway worker acting as CGT general secretary, assessed the situation in the following terms: "The managerial class has declared war on Colonel Perón, not because of Perón himself, but because of what he has done for the workers, to whom he has granted the demands they were seeking as well as others they had not even dreamt of . . . The Capitalist class here as well as in the entire world seems to have forgotten that the war against Fascism has been won by the workers; thus they pretend to return to the previous situation of injustice, denying [the workers] what legitimately belongs to them." Pontieri insisted that it was the CGT's duty "to lead this defensive movement of the workers" (Anon. 1973).

The nature of the debate poses problems. First, protagonists established a relationship between Perón's fall and his social democratic policies at the department of labor. Second, they ascribed a defensive character to the move they needed to execute, seeing it as a question of preserving their gains. Third, they believed themselves to be operating in a situation of internal conflicts and splits within the armed forces, even though their analytical precision was less acute on this point. Despite understanding the political nature of the dispute, the movement's leadership placed itself to the right of the workers: the CGT did not categorically endorse a claim for Perón's release, only pleading against turning power over to the Supreme Court. The workers, on the other hand, mobilized behind a clear slogan: Freedom for Perón. For the CGT leadership, the question was not to transform its organization into the basis of a new political structure, but to decide on the struggle between union organizations in the political arena. That is, it did not understand that a new political order was in the making.

The Military Crisis

Rival factions within the military dealt with their conflicts by proposing either to transfer the government from General Edelmiro Farrell to the Supreme Court (Admiral Héctor Vernengo Lima's position) or to keep Farrell in power (the position of Eduardo Avalos, chief of the army). Vernengo Lima counted on the support of the protesters in the October 12 March of Liberty, including conservatives, socialists, communists, and members of the Unión Cívica Radical (Radical Civic Union, UCR), while Avalos counted only on military support from the Campo de Mayo. The only person with the workers' full support was Colonel Perón, yet Avalos had overthrown him. Avalos needed Perón in order not to be outmaneuvered by the navy. Considering that the workers also needed Perón to guarantee the stability of their gains, the October 17 movement clearly had a defensive character. The challenge ahead consisted of "stopping Vernengo while making sure power was not left in the hands of the Supreme Court; otherwise, both Farrell and Avalos would be sent to the prison in Martín García to accompany Perón" (Horowicz 2007: 90).

Tellingly, it was not the CGT but the least organic leadership that was closer to the feelings of the mobilized workers. The Interunion Liaison Committee had for three days between October 15 and 17 encouraged and maintained the workers' mobilization. On October 15, workers marched in La Plata and Berisso, and on the 16th they tried to reach the city of Buenos Aires, only to find the southern access to the city across the Avellaneda Bridge blocked. It was only on October 17 that the inconceivable happened: the workers entered the citadel of the ruling classes.

The issue at stake was not an alliance between a nationalist army faction and the working class, but a situation in which the immediate interests of the military faction headed by Avalos and those of the CGT coincided. The army groups of Campo de Mayo represented by Avalos had placed in danger the social democratic policies of Colonel Perón. If Avalos had not plotted against Perón on October 9, October 17 would not have happened. Thus, if Avalos let the mobilized workers cross the Avellaneda Bridge, it was not due to police complicity in exaggerating the numbers of protesters, but because of his need to guarantee his own place in events. Working-class mobilization was required to oppose Admiral Vernengo Lima.

Through the cracks in the military conflict slipped thin lines of industrial workers. Of course, this was not a revolution passing underneath the horse's belly, as Leon Trotsky describes 1917 in his History of the Russian Revolution. It was not the working class winning over a decisive faction of the armed forces to its own cause. Rather, it was the majority of military officialdom determining that the labor movement's defensive mobilization included them.

October Days

October 17 was not a revolutionary strike, a pre-insurreccional mobilization, or a scaled-down democratic revolution. Rather, it marked the birth of political Peronism. Surrounding the center of the bourgeois citadel with the instruments of trade union struggle, workers gained political citizenship by their own means. For the CGT leadership, it was not a question of trying to transform the trade union organization into a launching pad for a new political structure, but one of determining a union struggle in the broader political arena. October 17 was the extreme limit; in its debate of October 16, the CGT had made it clear that revolution was not on its program.

The mobilization did not seek to reinstate Colonel Perón to his three previous positions, thereby restoring matters to the situation that existed before October 9. These were not the terms of the military dispute, and the workers' movement did not even consider them. The important thing was to stop Vernengo Lima and to let the forthcoming elections determine whose perspective would oversee the reorganization of Argentinian society.

Perón did not organize October 17, which Peronists acknowledge by calling it the Day of Loyalty. In other words, when Perón no longer possessed authority, when his power had evaporated and he could command neither from the heart nor on the ground, loyal workers rescued him from the hands of his civilian and military enemies and installed him in the balcony of the Casa Rosada (Government House). Perón, in his own way, was always clear about this.

Throughout his extended political career, he devoted himself to preventing another October 17 and impeding workers from responding to political differences between the ruling classes through direct mobilization. This was the task that Perón claimed for himself.

October 17 was a legal mass mobilization of opposition forces, but it was not yet a struggle. It was both a popular and workers' mobilization, but it set no limits on bourgeois politics. "It is mobilization for a military leader by the workers' movement, without military mobilization in defense of the workers' movement" (Horowicz 2007: 95). For the army, on the other hand, October 17 was the moment when it became clear that governing Argentina was not a military task, unless the ruling classes decided otherwise. The parties had reorganized and their alternative programs were conducive to perpetuating the bourgeois state. From that point on, all government parties would be parties of state seeking legitimacy by electoral means. The army's time would come again. Until then, the army's loyalty to the chief was rewarded with the participation of the armed forces in the national budget.

SEE ALSO: Argentina, Armed Struggle and Guerilla Organizations, 1960s–1970s; Argentina, Human Rights Movement

References and Suggested Readings

- Anon. (1973) La CGT y el 17 de octubre de 1945. Actas del Comité Central Confederal. Cuadernos de Pasado y Presente, n.s., 2–3 (July/December). Buenos Aires.
 Horowicz, A. (2007) Los Cuatro Peronismos. Buenos Aires: Edhasa.

Argentina, worker strikes in Patagonia, 1920–1921

Horacio Tarcus

The first large rural strike in Patagonia took place in November 1920 in Santa Cruz, a wool-exporting area dominated by large latifundios and British meatpacking plants.

In October 1920, police arrested several leaders from the city of Río Gallegos's Miscellaneous Craft Workers' Society (Sociedad Obrera de Oficios Varios), an organizational member of the syndicalist Argentine Regional Workers'

Federation (Federación Obrera Regional Argentina, FORA IX). Led by Antonio Soto, the Sociedad Obrera demanded the release of detainees as well as a number of measures to improve the conditions of both rural and commercial workers. Initially prisoners were released, but Soto proposed to continue with the struggle until their economic demands were met as well, pending the arrival of the radical new governor, A. Guzmán Iza, a member of the Radical Civic Union (Union Civica Radical, UCR). When toward the middle of January 1921 the federal government of President Hipólito Yrigoyen, also of the UCR, sent military forces to occupy Río Gallegos under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Héctor Benigno Varela, the new governor arrived in town and awarded a decision favorable to the strikers. Soto then distributed a pamphlet announcing the lifting of the strike, judging the outcome a great victory for the workers.

However, by September 1921, estancia (cattle ranch) owners and large merchants decided not to honor the governor's decision, ostensibly because of a decline in the international price of wool. Manuel Outerelo, an anarchist of Galician origin as well as a delegate of the workers at the Port of Santa Cruz to the regional Workers' Federation, called for a general strike and the reinstatement of dismissed workers among other demands. Faced with an extension of the strike, the federal government dispatched a new military expedition headed by Varela, which this time left more than 1,500 rural workers dead.

At the beginning of November, leaders of the Port of Santa Cruz's Sociedad Obrera were detained, beaten up, and sent as prisoners to Buenos Aires. Nevertheless, Outerelo continued visiting estancias to recruit rural workers and collect food and arms for the strikers. On November 16, 1921, he and 400 other strikers occupied Paso Ibáñez and resisted military troops by using estanciero and police hostages as shields. Outerelo sent a commission to the Port of Santa Cruz, led by Avendaño, to negotiate an agreement. The workers' delegates met with the captain of the Almirante Brown, the ship that was guarding the Armour meatpacking plant, yet he refused to negotiate. The commission also went to the meatpacking plant, threatening a general strike if troops were sent in again.

On November 23, Outerelo met Varela in Paso Ibáñez. In response to Varela's demand for unconditional surrender, Outerelo opted to continue the strike and not to abandon workers in other regions. Avendaño argued in favor of surrender. However, both leaders agreed to release the hostages and called an assembly of strikers to decide on further action. Outerelo hoped to win the motion for a strike if he could persuade the workers from Puerto San Julián, led by José Albino Argüelles. He was later murdered along with more than 30 other workers, while the remaining 400 or so strikers were arrested on December 1, 1921 in the vicinity of Cañadón León. At his execution, Outerelo addressed the firing squad so persuasively that its members refused to shoot him. He was eventually killed by an army captain using a saber.

With the murder of Outerelo and the defeat of his group controlling the strike movement in the center of the region, both Soto in the south and Jose "Facón Grande" Font, a leader in the north, were left isolated, and the victory of Varela was secured. For his part, the leader of San Julián's Sociedad Obrera, socialist José Albino Argüelles, proposed carrying out boycotts and other measures to force estancieros to comply with the workers' demands. Later, he and his followers joined the second Patagonian strike after witnessing widespread rural worker support for unions in other cities in the region. On their way to the San José estancia to help its workers to organize, Argüelles and a group of strikers were met by a cavalry force led by Captain Elbio Carlos Anaya. Despite Argüelles's attempt to negotiate, he was executed by Anaya.

Toward the end of September 1921, the office of the Workers' Federation was raided and its leaders were arrested. The target of the attacks, Antonio Soto, resigned from his position as union secretary and started to prepare for action, calling for a strike in those places where workers' demands had not been met and condemning petty theft by some of the members. On October 21, Soto distributed a pamphlet calling for the people of Río Gallegos to go on strike until union leaders were released, thus ratifying the call for a general strike launched by the few members of the Workers' Federation who had not yet been arrested. Toward the end of October, Soto and his men were influential in instigating a rebellion in the southeastern part of the territory of Santa Cruz.

At the beginning of November, while traveling to Río Gallegos to meet with the governor, leaders accompanying Soto were arrested by the police. Isolated, Soto reorganized his column around the estancia of La Anita, which became the movement's general headquarters. At the end of November, an encounter with army troops left several strikers dead and many wounded. Until early December 1921, Soto and his 600 men dominated the area of Lake Argentino and Lake Viedma. From La Anita, the group sent parties of strikers to other estancias, entering clandestinely to take supplies and leaving credit notes for the value of the confiscated goods. When news reached him of the executions of the strikers led by Outerelo and Avendaño at Paso Ibáñez, Soto decided not to meet Varela.

At dawn on December 7, 1921, army troops descended upon the strikers concentrated in La Anita. Soto tried to convince his fellow workers that the army could not be trusted and that they had to flee in order to continue the strike. Despite his pleas, the assembly decided to send two delegates to negotiate; they were killed soon after meeting the troops. Soto rejected the majority decision to surrender unconditionally and escaped to Chile along with a few followers. With Soto gone, the Sociedad Obrera ceased to exist.

The final attempt at resistance was led by José "Facón Grande" Font, who headed a column of men through the northern part of the territory of Santa Cruz, recruiting people and taking horses from estancias along the way. At Tehuelches train station on December 20, 1921, Font's men confronted army troops, leaving three strikers and one soldier dead. Through the intermediary of one of the estanciero hostages from the Fitz Roy station, Font negotiated an agreement with Varela by telephone. Afterwards he went to the army headquarters in Jaramillo to negotiate the demands of the strikers, but both he and the strikers were executed and buried in a common grave.

On January 27, 1923, Lieutenant Varela was shot by German-born anarchist Kurt Gustav Wilckens in Palermo, a neighborhood of Buenos Aires.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism, Argentina; Argentina, General Strike (Semana Trágica), 1919; Argentina, Grito de Alcorta Peasant Rebellion, 1912; Argentina, Labor Strikes of 1890 and 1902; Argentina, Socialist and Communist Workers' Movements

References and Suggested Readings

- Bayer, O. (1978) Los vengadores de la Patagonia trágica. Buenos Aires: Galerna, 1971–1973, Vols. 1–3; Essen, Germany: Hammer, Vol. 4.
- Suriano, J. (2001) Anarquistas: Cultura y Política libertaria en Buenos Aires, 1890–1910. Buenos Aires: Manatíal.

Aristide, Jean-Bertrand (b. 1953)

Thierry Saintime

Jean-Bertrand Aristide was the leader of the Haitian Rebellion of 1980–90, which culminated in the deposition of the US-imposed dictatorship of François and Jean-Paul Duvalier. As a young Catholic priest in the 1980s, Aristide used his pulpit to rally the destitute peasantry for economic justice and democracy. He was instrumental in organizing the Haitian peasantry to engage in mass resistance against the military-dominated government through advocacy of economic equality and democratic rights for all citizens of Haiti. Following the overthrow of the Duvalier regime, Aristide decisively won a popular election as the first democratic president of Haiti since independence in 1804.

Aristide was born on July 15, 1953 in Port-Salut, Haiti, but grew up in Port-au-Prince, under the care of priests of the Salesian order of the Roman Catholic Church. Accordingly he was educated in Salesian parochial schools. He then studied at the University of Haiti and left Port-au-Prince for advanced biblical studies in Israel, Egypt, Canada, and Britain. He was ordained in the Salesian order in 1982 but in 1988 was expelled for preaching radical ideas and criticizing Haiti's lack of democracy. He was accused of inciting the poor against the state by increasing their awareness of their oppression.

In the early 1980s Haiti was dominated by the Duvalier dynasty. The US-backed army installed François "Papa Doc" Duvalier in 1957, and he was succeeded by his son Jean-Paul, "Baby Doc," in 1971. Aristide's career as a preacher began under Baby Doc's reign, enforced by the tontons macoutes ("cannibal uncles") military corps, whose sole purpose was to report, arrest, and kill all opponents of the government and to counter all emergent opposition movements. The militia was known for its fierce brutality and slaughter of thousands of Haitians seeking greater equality and democracy. Aristide used the pulpit to publicly denounce the dereliction, inequality, injustice, corruption, and violence of the Duvalier government and tontons macoutes.

In 1985, at the age of 35, Aristide founded Ti Legliz (little church), a theological liberation group composed mainly of peasants and urban workers, which spread rapidly throughout the nation through the Haitian Catholic Church. Aristide used the Catholic Church to reach out to Haiti's poor and dispossessed in both the rural areas and major cities. It was the first time in Haiti that a priest was delivering liberation and anti-oppression speeches instead of biblical scriptures. He faced many threats and assassination attempts, but he continued his radical and revolutionary sermons, in effect launching a national mobilization against the Duvalier regime.

On February 7–8, 1986, after months of popular demonstrations and aided by the army and its chief, General Henry Namphy, Duvalier was forced out of office and out of the country. Namphy proclaimed himself the new ruler of the country until new elections, which he promised would take place in November of the same year. Instead, the country went through four years of coup after coup and leader after leader, and the result was Haiti's rapid economic, social, and political deterioration.

During those four very tumultuous years, Aristide's popularity and political presence grew stronger. For one, amidst the violence and power struggles, the country's other leaders had lost all respect and trust of the Haitian population. Aside from that, two events played important roles in Aristide's rise into the presidency. The first was one of the several attempts on his life in September 1987 while he was leading mass at his parish of St. Jean Bosco. At about 9.15 a.m. on Sunday morning of September 11, 20 men, all wearing red handkerchiefs on their left arm (sign of the tontons macoutes corps) and armed with guns, machetes, and sticks, took the church and its congregation hostage, threatening to kill them all if they did not turn over Father Aristide, who had mysteriously disappeared with the help of some of the parishioners. Sixty to seventy people were severely wounded and a dozen killed; Aristide blamed himself for the massacre. Then, months later, the St. Francis De la Sale priests' association expelled Aristide from the church and priesthood, accusing him of using the church for his personal and political agenda. These last two events brought home to Aristide the depth of the political anarchy clouding the island and led him to run for president to push forth his social agenda.

Aristide won the December 1990 presidential election with nearly 70 percent of the total votes. At age 37, then, he entered history by becoming the first democratically elected president of Haiti since its birth in 1804. Once in power he remained true to his radical and revolutionary ideologies: "Power for the people." It was also the first time that there was a direct relation and communication between the government and the population. Several local and regional movements were formed to keep the government abreast of the various communities' needs and requests. Even Haiti's judiciary and legal system, nearly nonexistent since the fall of the Duvalier regime, seemed functional again. Economically, the country appeared to be moving toward a brighter path as well. Aristide's senior delegation, sent to Paris to attend a World Bank international lenders conference, was successful in obtaining promises of a $442 million loan for the reconstruction of the country. Haiti finally seemed to be taking steps toward a promising future.

Seven months into the presidency, the army staged a coup. Joseph Nerette was made president, but army commander Raoul Cedras held the real power. Cedras justified the coup on the claim that Aristide was forming a secret and personal armed corps of about 300 men (later known as "Attachés") and that he was creating a dangerous conflict between the affluent class and the poor. Many prosperous business men and women who lived in the hills of Port-au-Prince and owned more than 70 percent of the country's wealth echoed Cedras's latter claim, insisting that during the seven months of Aristide's reign, they were in constant fear for their lives and property. They cited Aristide's speeches, such as the one in which he told listeners: "my famished, unemployed, uneducated and broke men, women and children, if the sun is burning you, if your stomach is growling, your kids can't go to school . . . and you look up in the hills at your brothers and sisters who have more than they need, I say go to those hills and ask them for a slice, a piece of bread, a penny, ask them for shelter” as the reason for their fear.

Aristide rallied international support and the military regime was forced to back down. He returned to Haiti in late 1994 to complete his presidential term. He then disbanded the Haitian army and created instead a civilian police force. The Haitian constitution does not allow for consecutive terms, so when Aristide’s presidency expired in 1996 his ally and former prime minister, Rene Preval, ran as his successor and garnered 88 percent of the vote. This was the first democratic and peaceful power transition in Haiti.

Aristide ran for a second term in 2000 and won under the newly created Fanmi Lavalas Party. However, most opposition parties boycotted the election, creating a crisis in legitimacy from the beginning. Aristide’s government was dependent upon foreign aid, and the US, Canada, and France led an embargo on some types of aid, leaving him vulnerable to a coup attempt. This led to a rebellion by an armed gang sponsored by the US and France in 2004, and Aristide’s departure from Haiti for a second time, in what many observers view as a kidnapping. He went to South Africa and earned a doctorate in African languages from the University of South Africa in 2007.

SEE ALSO: Haiti, Democratic Uprising, 1980s–1991; Haiti, Foreign-Led Insurgency, 2004; Haiti, Protest and Rebellion, 20th Century; Haiti, Resistance to US Occupation; Haiti, Revolutionary Struggles

References and Suggested Readings

- Aristide, J. B. (2000) Eyes of the Heart: Seeking a Path for the Poor in the Age of Globalization. Monroe, ME: Common Courage Press.
- Chomsky, N., Goodman, A., & Farmer, P. (2004) Getting Haiti Right This Time: The US and the Coup. Monroe, ME: Common Courage Press.
- Dupuy, A. (2006) The Prophet and Power: Jean-Bertrand Aristide, Haiti, and the International Community. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Hallward, P. (2008) Damming the Flood: Haiti, Aristide and the Politics of Containment. New York: Verso.
- Robinson, R. (2007) An Unbroken Agony: Haiti from Revolution to the Kidnapping of a President. New York: Basic Civitas Books.
- Wilentz, A. (1990) The Rainy Season: Haiti since Duvalier. New York: Simon & Schuster.

Armenia, mass protest and popular mobilization, 1980s to present

Khatchik DerGhougassian

Armenian “Terrorism” as a Diaspora Phenomenon

Between 1975 and 1985, an estimated total of 222 violent actions were perpetrated against targets related to the Turkish state or Turkish interests, in approximately 20 western and non-western countries, including former Yugoslavia and Bulgaria, both at that time under a socialist regime. Armenian secret organizations claimed responsibility for these acts perpetrated in demand of the recognition of the Armenian genocide (1915–23), as well as moral and material reparations, often formulated in terms of the devolution of the Armenian historical homeland – Western Armenia – in today’s eastern Turkey. The RAND Corporation characterized the geographical scope of these actions as the broadest of its time, not equalized by any other group.

According to an early observer of what the Armenian press called “armed propaganda,” more commonly labeled “Armenian terrorism,” some 20 organizations released public statements either claiming responsibility for an action or to announce the formation, aim, and course of action. Nevertheless, only two groups stand as the leading organizations that generated the phenomenon: the Justice Commandos for the Armenian Genocide (JCAG) and the Armenian Secret Army for the Liberation of Armenia (ASALA). The former had a national orientation, limiting the scope of its actions to the Turkish state, whereas ASALA defined the struggle in the broader context of anti-imperialism and seldom targeted both Turkish non-state objectives (including the civil population) and western interests. A third organization, the Armenian Revolutionary Army (ARA), closer to the ideological position of the JCAG, became widely known after five of its members occupied the Turkish embassy in Lisbon (Portugal) on July 27, 1983, blowing themselves up during the operation. The last important action of Armenian “terrorism” was the occupation of the Turkish embassy in Ottawa (Canada) on March 14, 1985 by three members of the ARA, who eventually gave themselves up to the Canadian government. After the Ottawa operation, the phenomenon of Armenian “terrorism” came to an end, although some of the organizations continued releasing public statements. The legacy of the decade made an important political impact on what is widely known as the Armenian cause.

Armenian “terrorism” stands apart from the terrorism usually linked to liberation movements in that it constitutes primarily a protest against the denial and forgetting of the 1915 Armenian genocide. Nevertheless, it pursued a political agenda more broadly known as the Armenian cause, the up-to-date characterization of the nineteenth-century Armenian Question. Furthermore, Armenian “terrorism” is a phenomenon proper to the Diaspora in that it is the violent expression of a struggle for memory, truth, recognition, and reparation; yet, it also has deep roots in terms of a historical legacy dating back to the Armenian national liberation struggle at the end of the nineteenth century in the Ottoman and Russian empires, when Armenian revolutionaries used terrorist tactics widely practiced at that time by other, usually anarchist and leftist, but also national liberation, revolutionary movements. The immediate antecedent of the 1975–85 Armenian “terrorism” closely linked to the 1915 genocide, however, is Operation Nemesis, popularized in the Diaspora as “the Armenian Nuremberg,” which aimed at punishing the Turkish Ottoman government officials who planned, organized, and executed the mass extermination plan of the Armenians. Yet, precisely because it was a Diaspora phenomenon, Armenian “terrorism” was strategically limited in terms of evolution toward guerilla warfare or mass mobilization. Its only achievement was making the “forgotten” genocide visible worldwide, first in the mass media, and later in international forums. This limitation notwithstanding, Armenian “terrorism” had a deep impact on the politicization of the Diaspora. In fact, it helped the institutionalization of political activism for the Armenian cause, and in this sense it left a strong political and cultural legacy.

Motivations, Strategic Aims, and the International Context of the “Forgotten” Genocide

Both a psychological and a political-strategic approach to understanding Armenian “terrorism” are useful. The resort to violence in 1975–85 reflects both the psychology of the victim and a strategic choice in the political struggle for the Armenian cause. Moreover, both approaches are complementary when the phenomenon is studied in context, that is, within the social conditions of the Diaspora and the particular international situation of the historical moment. In fact, Armenian “terrorism” cannot be understood without looking at the trauma of the 1915 genocide and its centrality to the social construction of the Diaspora, as well as the learning process and intellectual interaction of its ideologues with the international environment. In other words, Armenian “terrorism” is both a singular phenomenon and circumscribed in what David Rapoport has considered the third “new left wave” of terrorism, though with a marked presence of elements of the second “anti-colonial wave.”

As every human tragedy, the mass extermination of the Armenians in the Ottoman empire from 1915 to 1923 has its singular characteristic. For more than 50 years, from 1915 to 1965, it has been “forgotten” by the world following the self-imposed amnesia of the World War I Allies. There are five main reasons for the emergence of the “Great Silence,” a term coined by the Armenian writer Berj Zeituntsians in one of his plays, about the Armenian genocide. First, official Turkish denial, as the Republic founded by Mustafa Kemal (known as Atatürk) never recognized the responsibility of the Young Turks government in the official planning and execution of arguably the first crime against humanity in the twentieth century. Over the years following the proclamation of the Republic of Turkey, which ambiguously claimed to be both the successor of the Ottoman empire and a break from it, official Turkish policy varied from silence to open denial, questioning of the historical truth, and a rationalization and relativization of the facts.

Second, the economic and strategic interests of the Great Powers: the geopolitical position of Turkey as a “benevolent” neutral during World War II, as well as a Cold War NATO ally crucial for the containment of the Soviet Union, provided the political rationale for the West to accept Ankara's policy of denial. In this sense, the Armenian Question, as it was formulated on the international agenda by the end of the nineteenth century, within the broader context of the Oriental Question, became a disturbing detail after World War I, and was taken out of the international agenda after World War II.

Third, it was impossible for the Soviet Socialist Republic (SSR) of Armenia to lead an international process for justice because of its lack of sovereignty; the Soviet Union, in turn, had no intention of assuming the initiative (neighborly relations with Turkey became a diplomatic tradition with the strategic cooperation of the Bolsheviks with Mustafa Kemal against the Allies in the early 1920s). Fourth, the Diaspora was not ready for a massive political mobilization, as it was in the early stages of formation and organization. Fifth, it was not until 1944 that Raphael Lemkin conceived of the concept of "genocide" as a legal term. However, Lemkin had no doubt about the planned and systematic nature of the 1915–23 massacres.

The Diaspora as a Nation in Exile: Memory as Identity

The organized Armenian communal presence outside its historical homeland is not a twentieth-century phenomenon. Nevertheless, it is only after the 1915 genocide and the Sovietization of Armenia that the Armenian dispersion was identified as a "Diaspora." The word was rarely, if ever, used before these founding events of a new Armenian national identity. In fact, as a common concept it came into being in early 1930s when the hopes for a rapid solution to the Armenian Question, and hence the return of the survivors of the genocide to their homeland, started to fade away. In short, Diaspora was defined as a temporary existence forced upon the Armenians by the genocide; its aim could be nothing less than return to the homeland once the international conditions became favorable again and justice was done. This particular self-awareness of the Armenian identity in Diaspora also provided an organizational principle for the communities, which were designed as closed structures consisting of institutions where cultural particularity was preserved and perpetuated. Political emancipation in Diaspora was firmly grounded upon the centrality of the memory and the preservation of national identity and cultural heritage.

The Critical Juncture: 1965

The fiftieth anniversary of the genocide, however, became a critical moment for the evolution of the Diaspora and Soviet Armenia. For the first time, the commemoration of the genocide became a popular mobilization and demand for justice. An agreement between the three main political organizations of the Diaspora provided the grounds for massive rallies in almost all Armenian communities in the world, demanding recognition and reparations for the genocide. In Soviet Armenia, for the first time since 1920, the silent commemorations of the anniversary of the genocide led to a popular outburst with the provocative cry of "Our lands! Our lands!," referring to Western Armenia. For almost three days the government lost control of the situation and risked a military intervention from Moscow if order was not restored. To both the Diaspora and Soviet Armenia, the fiftieth anniversary of the genocide meant a critical juncture with the revival of the Armenian cause in forthcoming years. Understandably, only in the Diaspora was the struggle politicized in terms of public demands, and ultimately the use of violence. The critical juncture of 1965 was the consequence of the coalescence of three factors: the coming of age of a third generation of Armenians in the Diaspora since the genocide; the persistence of the silence about the crime; and the international context. Indeed, the Armenians born in Diaspora who came of age in the late 1960s and 1970s were the grandchildren of genocide survivors. This generation was not faced with the survival problem of their grandparents or the need for success in business as a way of integration and assimilation, as had been their parents, the generation of the 1940s and the aftermath of World War II. Moreover, the third generation of Diaspora Armenians was the generation that grew up within ghettoized community institutions, foreseen by their parents as the way of preserving their national identity while waiting for the day of redemption – the massive return to the Fatherland. The third generation is also the generation of Armenians who received higher education, started to wander outside the community, and were much more politically engaged with the world than the generation of their fathers, who usually defined engagement in the struggle with the preservation of a national identity. It is precisely this contact with the world that drove the third generation of Armenians to question the persistent international silence about the genocide in a world that had condemned the Holocaust in Nuremberg and created the UN Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide in 1948. Preserving the national culture, identity, and memory through passivity in politics did not satisfy them anymore, as they witnessed how the very element perpetuating national identity, the Armenian language, was already vanishing from everyday life. The third generation also grew up with Vietnam, May '68 in France, and Palestinian emancipation following the Six Days' War of 1967. The international context of the late 1960s and 1970s, of detente and the emergence of Third World politics, thus motivated the third generation to begin a new phase of politicization of the Armenian cause through direct action.

Recognition and Beyond: Analyzing the Actors and the Actions of Armenian "Terrorism"

The Persistent Political Culture of the Struggle for National Liberation

The international context of the 1970s motivated and encouraged the 1975–85 Armenian "terrorism"; however, the latter was part of a political culture forged in the late nineteenth-century national liberation struggle, which persisted in the collective memory of the Diaspora. Moreover, at least for a considerable sector of the Diaspora, the legacy of this political culture formed an essential element of both identity and destiny to fulfill. Largely inspired by the activists of Narodnaya Volya (late nineteenth-century Russian organization struggling against autocracy), Armenian revolutionaries used terrorist acts against specific targets, usually to punish traitors or (Turkish or Russian) government officials and agents identified as repressors, as well as for tactical ends such as propaganda aiming to attract international attention to the Armenian Question (e.g., the occupation of the Ottoman Bank on August 14, 1896 or the 1905 assassination attempt of Sultan Abdul Hamid II).

An immediate antecedent of the Armenian "terrorism" of 1975–85 was the Nemesis Operation against Turkish officials who planned and executed the extermination of the Ottoman Armenians in 1915. The secret decision was made during the Ninth World Assembly of the Armenian Revolutionary Federation (ARF-Dashnagtsutiun) in 1919, and implemented from 1921 to 1923. After World War I, members of the Union and Progress government were condemned as war criminals, yet the sentences of the martial court were never implemented, as they became fugitives, living hidden in Europe. Under the leadership of Garo Armenian and Shahan Natali, a group of selected militants – Soghomon Tehlirian, Aram Yerganian, Arshavir Shirakian, and Missak Torlakian among others – tracked the minister of interior affairs and those responsible for the genocide, eventually eliminating them. The Nemesis Operation was popularized in the Armenian Diaspora as the Armenian Nuremberg, but was kept a secret until the 1980s, when French writer Jacques Derogy was granted access to the archives of the ARF-Dashnagtsutiun in Boston and the Zorian Institute in Toronto to write the book Opération Némésis (1986; published in English as Resistance and Revenge: The Armenian Assassination of the Turkish Leaders Responsible for the 1915 Massacres and Deportations).

The Nemesis Operation was in essence a punitive expedition, an act of justice perpetrated by the stateless victims of an unpunished crime; it had a deep impact on Armenian post-genocide political thought in the Diaspora. Yet terrorism as a tactical tool for propagandistic aims became an issue of discussion as early as 1933, when, in the aftermath of the violent repression of the Kurdish rebellion in Anatolia (1925), the perspective of an Armenian–Kurdish joint insurgency against Turkey vanished. The use of terrorism against Turkish diplomatic representatives was thus thought of as a new strategic phase of struggle; however, it never got the chance to be implemented given the political conditions of the moment. The idea of a natural right to resist – by violent means including armed struggle if necessary – for the propagation of the Armenian cause reemerged in the 1960s.

The Road to Armed Propaganda

From 1970 to 1975, just before the emergence of the secret organizations that would use terrorist tactics for the propagation of the Armenian cause, in total five random and individual attacks were registered against Turkish interests and representatives. The best known of these attacks was the assassination of the Turkish general consul and his deputy in January 1973. The assassin, Kurken Yaneekian, a genocide survivor, gave himself up to the US authorities and in court declared that he had no remorse whatsoever for an act he characterized as revenge for the killing of all the members of his family during the 1915 genocide. Condemned to prison for life, Yaneekian became a hero for the young generation of Diaspora Armenians.

Yaneekian's assassination came in the same year that a UN Subcommission for Human Rights submitted a report that, in the thirtieth paragraph, designated the mass extermination of Armenians in the Ottoman empire as "the first genocide of the twentieth century." Upon opposition and pressure from Turkey, however, the paragraph was eliminated. The decision caused widespread indignation in the Armenian Diaspora. The Armenians interpreted the elimination of the paragraph as the final act of denial, and hence the denial of memory and the proper existence of a whole group of people.

Fighting for the Armenian Cause, or Struggle Against Imperialism?

The two main organizations that started to use armed propaganda as a means of struggle for the Armenian cause, JCAG and ASALA, initially targeted Turkish diplomatic representatives and Turkish interests. In this sense, Armenian "terrorism" emerged as a protest against the denial of the Armenian genocide, an act of both self-affirmation and revival of a new Diasporan generation and an outcry against silence, a demand for justice. Not coincidentally, "breaking the wall of silence" became a metaphor for the use of guerilla tactics as the only way to be heard after the failure of all peaceful means. Yet there was general confusion about the identity and purposes of the two organizations, in spite of general enthusiasm over these acts and widespread support from the Armenian press. Soon the substantial difference between the two groups over the use of terrorism as a tactical tool within a broader strategy of political struggle became all too clear; the way each group conceived of this strategy depended on its perception of the Armenian cause.

JCAG exclusively targeted Turkish officials and diplomatic representatives, arguing that it was the Turkish state that was mainly responsible for the policy of denial. ASALA, however, conceived the struggle for the Armenian cause as part of a worldwide struggle against "imperialism," seldom targeting western interests, including commercial ones supposedly linked to Turkish interests. This broad use of terrorist violence inevitably ended up in criminal actions against innocent civilians, such as the 1982 suicide attack in Istanbul which killed two, including a 13-year-old boy, and wounded 27 civilians, as well as the bombing of Orly Airport in Paris, which killed eight civilians and wounded 60 others. As early as 1979, ASALA started to target Armenian Diaspora organizations and public figures accused of being "reactionaries" or pro-western and pro-US. According to a statistical analysis of all ASALA violent actions, out of a total of 181 between 1975 and 1988, 57 (31 percent) targeted Turkish representatives and interests, 74 (41 percent) targeted non-Turkish interests, and 50 (28 percent) targeted Diaspora Armenians and Armenian interests. Although ASALA claimed responsibility for 81 percent of all Armenian acts of "terrorism," JCAG and ARA (Armenian Revolutionary Army) claimed only 15 percent (33 actions), with the 4 percent remaining (eight actions) claimed by other little-known organizations. Whereas JCAG and ARA made an obvious effort – in both their actions and public statements – to manifest their independence and focus on the Turkish state, ASALA, whether consciously or not, ended up linked to international terrorism.

Not surprisingly, ASALA split in two following the bombing of Orly Airport, and the two factions – hardliners who remained firm in their "anti-imperialist" orientation and dissidents who openly criticized the indiscriminate use of terrorism and the killing of fellow Armenians – were engaged in a bloody internal struggle for power. Dissidents of ASALA, such as Monte Melkonian (1957–93), a US-born militant who later joined the national liberation struggle in Nagorno Karabagh, later claimed that ASALA never had a single identified strategy, never defined a final goal, and often used vague terms, such as the call to "liberate Armenia," to manipulate the emotions of fellow Armenians. In contrast, the armed campaign conducted by JCAG and ARA followed a clear strategy aimed at projecting the Armenian cause into the arena of international politics. The armed propaganda pursued the goal of breaking the international silence about the 1915 genocide and thus opened the way for recognition and reparations by Turkey.

SEE ALSO: Armenian Resistance, 1915; Atatürk, Mustafa Kemal (1881–1938); Young Turks

References and Suggested Readings

- Chalian, G. & Blin, A. (2006) Histoire du terrorisme: De l'Antiquité à Al Qaida. Paris: Bayard.
- Dadrian, V. N. (1997) The History of the Armenian Genocide: Ethnic Conflict from the Balkans to Anatolia to the Caucasus. Providence, RI: Berghahn Books.
- Derogy, J. (1986) Opération Némesis: Les vengeurs arméniens. Paris: Fayard.
- Gaspard, A. (1989) The Struggle for Armenia: Between Terrorism and Utopia. Trans. and Ed. A. Donoyan. Glendale, CA: Navasart.
- Hovannessian, R. G. (Ed.) (1999) Remembrance and Denial: The Case of the Armenian Genocide. Detroit: Wayne University Press.
- Krikorian, A. (2002) Dictionnaire de la Cause Arménienne. Paris: Edipol.
- Kurth, C., Ludes, A., & Ludes, J. M. (Eds.) (2004) Attacking Terrorism: Elements of a Grand Strategy. Washington, DC: Georgetown University Press.
- Melkonian, M. (Ed.) (1993) The Right to Struggle: Selected Writings of Monte Melkonian of the Armenian National Question. San Francisco: Sardarabad Collective.
- Ritter, L. (2007) La longue marche des Arméniens: Histoire et devenir d'une diaspora. Paris: Robert Laffont.
- Tololyan, K. (1987a) Cultural Narrative and the Motivation of the Terrorist. Journal of Strategic Studies 10 (4).
- Tololyan, K. (1987b) Martyrdom as Legitimacy: Terrorism as Symbolic Appropriation in the Armenian Diaspora. In P. Wilkinson & A. Stewart (Eds.), Contemporary Research on Terrorism. Aberdeen, WA: Aberdeen University Press.
- Walter, R. (Ed.) (1998) Origins of Terrorism: Psychologies, Ideologies, Theologies, States of Mind. Washington, DC: Woodrow Wilson Center Press.

Armenian resistance, 1915

Rubina Perroomian

The Armenian Genocide is commonly thought to have started in April 1915. However, the roots of this event and the Armenian resistance to annihilation stretch back for centuries, beginning with the fifteenth-century occupation of Armenia by the Ottoman Turks. Indeed, Ottoman rule over Armenia was one of oppression and discrimination. Armenians were treated as second-class citizens and were subjected to illicit taxation, discriminatory laws, and constant harassment and persecution. Armenian culture and civilization suffered significant setbacks, and Armenians were turned into subservient slaves who showed absolute compliance even when their belongings were looted, their villages ransacked, and their women kidnapped. This situation changed in the early nineteenth century, as the liberal ideas of Europe began to reach the Armenians. National awareness was on the rise, and the will to stand up for their basic rights escalated.

The first act of resistance against oppression occurred in 1862 in the mountainous region of Zeitun, where Zeituntsies refused to pay the discriminatory and illegal taxes levied upon them and took up arms against a 12,000-strong Turkish army, bolstering the 6,000 irregulars who had arrived to punish the defiance. The unprecedented resistance, which ended successfully with the interference of the French government, became an inspiration to all Armenians. Political parties were formed; bands of revolutionary militants called fedayees went from village to village to protect defenseless Armenians against the Turkish and Kurdish assaults; pleas and supplications were sent to Sultan Abdul-Hamid II, and the intervention of European governments was sought. The Ottoman government responded with increased persecutions. Crushing any form of resistance and brutal reprisals against the innocent population became a governmental policy, culminating in the widespread massacres of 1895–1896. With a few exceptions, most notably Zeitun and Van where resistance warded off disaster, these massacres resulted in an enormous destruction of life and property.

Significantly, the incident that triggered this bloodshed was the resistance in Sasun in the summer of 1894, spurred once again by refusal to pay the impoverishing high taxes the Kurdish chieftains and government tax collectors demanded. With the Hnchakists (Social Democrat Hnchakian Party) encouraging, arming, and leading them, the Sasuntsis organized fighting bands and repelled the Kurdish irregulars and the Turkish army. The resistance lasted about a month and was eventually crushed; the entire region was ransacked, and the population was massacred.

Protests, petitions, and memoranda by the European Powers to stop the carnage bore no results. The Ottoman government labeled the incident an uprising with an intention of sedition, therewith justifying the ensuing massacres. Genocide scholars believe that these massacres mark the beginning of the Armenian Genocide.

Acts of protest, peaceful or otherwise, against these extreme measures were turned into bloodbaths. Examples include the September 1895 peaceful rally organized by the Hnchakists in Constantinople, the attack to avenge the destruction caused by the Mazrik Kurdish tribe (the Khanasor Expedition, July 1897), the vengeful plot against the sultan's life on July 21, 1905, and the capture and threatened destruction of the Ottoman Bank, housing European capital, in August 1896, organized by the ARF (Armenian Revolutionary Federation; Dashnakists). As a manifestation of resistance, the ARF joined the Turkish opposition aimed at toppling the government and breaking the sultan's absolute power, and supported the July 1908 constitutional revolution led by the union of opposition factions, the Ittihad ve Terragi Party (Young Turks). A few months later, however, in April of 1909, incited by the Muslim religious leaders and under the indifferent eyes of the police and the army, the Turkish mob began to attack the Armenians in Adana. The carnage of looting, rape and murder soon spread into the towns and villages of Cilicia.

The Armenians, having gained the right to bear arms after the Young Turk revolution, engaged in armed resistance in a few places including Adana, Hajin, Sis, Zeitun, and Dort Yol. The bloodshed stopped only after the Turkish army chose to intervene. Although total extermination ("genocidal intent") was not yet a part of the government policy, the path chosen was certainly one that was leading to the annihilation of a people. The ground was being prepared for the Young Turk ultranationalists – the triumvirate of Enver, Talat, and Jemal – who took over the government in a coup in January 1913, and who would finish the job in 1915.

The task was not an easy one: the Armenians were more or less organized, and even had representatives in parliament to protest against the mistreatment and injustices that were going on in the empire. The plans for Armenian annihilation could not be executed without first neutralizing all likely resistance. World War I gave the opportunity to isolate the empire and cut off intervention by Great Britain, France, and Russia – the enemies of the Ottoman Empire (now the ally of Germany).

To preempt possible armed resistance, the government promulgated the law of general conscription, and almost all Armenian men aged 18–45 were drafted into the army. Next the populace was disarmed; those who did not have weapons to turn in were often tortured and killed; houses were looted and churches were desecrated on the pretext of searching for hidden weapons. The arrest, exile, and execution of Armenian civic, political, and religious leadership was the last blow aimed at beheading the Armenian people.

From April to August of 1915, Armenians from across the empire, and not only the battle zones as the denialists claim, were ordered to leave their homes, leaving their belongings behind. In the process, the male deportees were the first to be liquidated, executed or shot on the deportation route. Very soon, the caravans consisted only of women, children and elderly men – prey to the frequent attacks of the bandits, Muslim villagers, and even the gendarmes accompanying them.

While collective resistance was almost impossible, individual acts of resistance were numerous. Eyewitness accounts, memoirs, and reports speak of those who refused to obey orders, stayed behind and defended their homes and belongings to the last breath against the Muslim refugees from Thrace or Bulgaria, sent by the government to settle in Armenian houses. These accounts also describe young women who plunged to their death from the cliffs or drowned themselves in the Euphrates River, resisting the evil intentions of the perpetrators. Young survivors of the Armenian Genocide remember their mothers teaching them the Armenian alphabet, tracing it on the desert sand, reading them the Bible, and encouraging them to keep their spirits up, despite hunger and thirst, and despite the misery and death around them. These children were taught not to forget their Armenian ancestry, to remember the great Tragedy, and uphold their national identity. The transmission of this memory by the survivors is the one form of resistance that has outlasted the Genocide.

The possibility of organized armed resistance was crushed at the outset. In this uncompromising process, the very few exceptions include the resistance in Zeitun, Van, Shabin Garahissar (June 1915), Mush (July), Sasun (August), Urfa (late August), and Musa Dagh. With the exception of Van and Musa Dagh, resistance only gained these cities several weeks of respite, at the end of which the population was brutally massacred or deported. With regard to the unyielding resistance of the 35,000 Armenians in Urfa against an 11,000-strong army, Fahri Pasha, the army commander, is quoted as saying “What we would have done if in these difficult times we had a few Urfas to deal with.”

The unrestrained assaults against the Armenians of Zeitun began in late March 1915. Twenty-five youth protested against the treatment and took to the hills. The local army, with the help of a battalion of 5,000 soldiers from Aleppo, attacked, captured and killed the fighters and drove the Armenian population of Zeitun out on a death march. The date was April 8, marking the first act in the process of deportation of the entire Armenian population of the empire and the first futile attempt to resist the government’s plans of extermination.

News of massacres in the surrounding villages and deportations from Zeitun and other Cilician towns and villages was reaching Van, and Armenians were preparing to defend the city. They had been able to muster some makeshift arms and ammunition and organize strongholds. The battle, headed by Dashnak Aram Manukian (1879–1919), began on April 20 and lasted about four weeks until the Russian army entered the city and the Turks fled. As a result of this brave act, the lives of 30,000 were saved. The city enjoyed a few weeks of semi-independence until the sudden withdrawal of the Russian army, which was followed by the perilous exodus of the Armenian population toward eastern Armenia. The Van self-defense was labeled an uprising and the reason for the government’s decision to drive out the entire Armenian population.

The self-defense of the Armenian population of Musa Dagh on the shores of the Mediterranean was another successful operation which saved 4,000 Armenian lives. Musa Dagh Armenians decided not to obey the government decree of deportation. On July 31, they climbed up the mountain carrying food, arms and ammunition and fought for seven weeks before they were rescued by a French warship which saw their signals calling for help.

The Musa Dagh resistance is typical of all instances of Armenian resistance to the Genocide of 1915, in that it involved the participation of not only the fighting men, but also the women, carrying food and ammunition to the fighters, caring for the wounded, and even making bullets, as well as the children, who risked their lives to run from one bunker to another to dispatch orders and bring news to the headquarters. The Musa Dagh resistance inspired the Austrian-Jewish journalist Franz Werfel to write the world-renowned novel, The Forty Days of Musa Dagh (1934). Some Holocaust scholars believe that the Jewish resistance in the Warsaw ghetto was inspired by that novel.

SEE ALSO: Armenia, Mass Protest and Popular Mobilization, 1980s to Present; Turkey, Protest and Revolution, 1800s–1923; Young Turks

References and Suggested Readings

- Auron, Y. (2000) The Banality of Indifference. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Publishers.
- Dadrian, V. N. (1995) The History of the Armenian Genocide. New York: Berghahn Books.
- Hovannisian, R. G. (Ed.) The Armenian People from Ancient to Modern Times, Vol. 2: Foreign Dominion to Statehood: The Fifteenth Century to the Twentieth Century. New York: St. Martin’s Press.
- Nalbandian, L. (1963) The Armenian Revolutionary Movement: The Development of Armenian Political Parties Through the Nineteenth Century. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.
- Walker, C. J. (1980) Armenia: The Survival of a Nation. New York: St. Martin’s Press.

Artigas, Gervasio José (1764–1850)

Viviana Uriona

José Gervasio Artigas was a South American military man, politician, and freedom fighter. He was born in Montevideo, Uruguay, the son of police officer José Artigas Martín and his wife Antonia Rodríguez Arnal. His grandfather was one of Montevideo’s first settlers. Artigas is considered the “father of Uruguayan independence.”

Gervasio received a moderate primary education in the Franciscan Monastery of St. Bernardino. When he was 12 years old he went to the family lands in the Banda Oriental del Uruguay, “East Bank of the Uruguay River,” today Uruguay. The people living there were called orientalis by the Spaniards in the Río de la Plata. There he became close to the Gauchos and learned horse riding and weapon handling. In 1797, when he was 33 years old, he joined the corps of Blandengues, a special militia of the Viceroyalty of the River Plate. They had the primary functions of police and surveillance along the border with Brazil. The Viceroyalty limits contained the territories of present Argentina, Bolivia, Paraguay, and Uruguay.

From 1806 to 1807 he participated in the Spanish resistance against the British invasion at the River Plate. He was appointed captain of the militia and later adjutant major for his efforts to liberate Montevideo and Buenos Aires. During the Battle of Montevideo (1807) Artigas was captured by the British army and was supposed to be shipped to England, but he was abandoned because he had been wounded during the battle.

The Viceroyalty of the Río de la Plata saw an uprising on May 25, 1809 in the city of Chuquisaca. Two years later, the viceroy was deposed in Buenos Aires. As a result of this May revolution, a council was elected in his place, and the Spanish colonial government moved its seat to Montevideo. By this point Artigas had gone back to his position with the police; however, he was prepared for the ideas of the new time of independence. In 1811 he joined the revolutionary forces and soon became Uruguay’s leader of the independence movement in the Banda Oriental. But Montevideo, the important city with political power, was under control of the Spanish authorities. Spanish power was weakened in the colonies, however, because of Napoleon’s intervention in Spanish domestic politics with the abdication of King Charles IV. That same year the new viceroy, Francisco Javier de Elío, declared war to the Council in Buenos Aires.

Artigas took command of the revolution in the Banda Oriental, issuing the Call of Mercedes on April 11, 1811. On May 18 he defeated the Spaniards in the Battle of Las Piedras. Elío and the Argentineans faced the possibility of losing the whole area to the Portuguese, and they signed a ceasefire treaty, but they did not consult Artigas. Thereafter Artigas and his people’s aim was separation both from Spain and its representatives in Montevideo, and from Buenos Aires. Artigas signed the ceasefire agreement with the viceroy Elío for the Council in Buenos Aires. Then he moved in protest with about 10,000 troops and civilians to the western bank of the River Uruguay in what is known as the east exodus. In the province of Misiones, in the area north of the present city of Concordia, Artigas created a new camp with equipment, livestock, and 16,000 people in January 1812. From there, he held contacts with the leaders of the provinces of Entre Ríos and Corriente, creating a base for his influence on the territories in the Argentine coastal region. With the withdrawal of the Portuguese, Artigas and his people could come back to Banda Oriental. There they fought in all directions: against the troops from Argentina and the royalists.

During an assembly at Artigas’ camp, two members were elected to participate in the constituent assembly in Buenos Aires (1813), but all of their demands were rejected. Then José Rondeau called a second congress which elected new deputies, none of whom shared Artigas’ political ideology. Artigas withdrew angrily to his supporters on the River Uruguay. From there he launched several campaigns in the interior of the Banda Oriental and Entre Ríos. The director supreme of the United Provinces, Gervasio Antonio Posadas, then declared Artigas “traitor of the fatherland” on February 11, 1814. He offered a 1,000-pesos reward to anyone who would deliver Artigas, alive or dead.

Artigas saw the American constitution as a model and wanted the provinces at the Río de la Plata to become unified. Leaders in Buenos Aires preferred a central government according to European standards. In 1814 Artigas organized the League of the Free Peoples (Liga de los Pueblos Libres; today, Córdoba, Corrientes, Entre Ríos, Misiones, Uruguay, and Santa Fe), of which he was declared Protector. When the Portuguese again occupied the provinces in 1816, the union broke but the government in Buenos Aires did not react. Artigas fought militarily for four years and fled to Paraguay in 1820, after losing the Battle of Tacuarembó. The Paraguay dictator Dr. Francia banished him to Candelaria. After a long exile, without reentering Uruguay, Artigas died on September 23, 1850 in Ibiray near Asunción in Paraguay.

Artigas’ political and military career lasted nine years, during which he tried to weaken the economic dominance of Buenos Aires with the opening of the ports of Montevideo and Colonia and tried to create social equality by redistributing the land that had been confiscated by the Spaniards to Indians, blacks, Zambos (mixed African and Amerindian ancestry), and poor whites.

SEE ALSO: Argentina, Indigenous Popular Protests

References and Suggested Readings

- Luna, F. (2000) José Gervasio Artigas. Buenos Aires: Planeta.
- Méndez Vives, E. (1968) Artigas y la Patria Grande. Montevideo: Tauro.
- San Martín, Z. (1930) La Epopeya de Artigas. Montevideo: Nacional Colorada.
- Street, J. (1971) Artigas and the Emancipation of Uruguay. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Arundel, Lady Blanche (1583–1649)

Samantha A. Morgan-Curtis

Blanche, Lady Arundel, a Royalist supporter of Charles I, is counted among the heroes of the English Civil War and stands as a heroine in English folklore and Catholic annals. In May 1643 during the early days of the English Civil War, Lady Blanche, then about 60 years old, held Wardour Castle in Wiltshire, England, during a six-day siege against 1,300 Parliamentary troops led by Sir Edward Hungerford. Parliamentary forces, also derisively known as Roundheads, had been dispatched to the largely Royalist West Country supposedly to maintain order. Hungerford demanded the surrender of Wardour Castle, claiming it sheltered “cavaliers and malignants” so that its money and resources were forfeited to Parliamentary use (Plowden 1998: 34).

Lady Blanche’s husband Thomas, the second Lord Arundel of Wardour and a declared member of Charles I’s Cavaliers, had taken most of his able men to fight with the king at Oxford, leaving Lady Blanche, her daughter-in-law, and three grandchildren with little protection. Citing her husband’s order to hold the castle, however, Lady Blanche refused to surrender and instead organized and commanded the remaining 25 men of her garrison to hold the castle and had her ladies-in-waiting carry food and bullets to the men at their posts. After six days of siege, with her men falling asleep at their posts, and artillery preparing to breach the castle, Lady Blanche negotiated a surrender to protect her people from capital punishment and her home from plunder.

Unfortunately, certain parts of Lady Blanche’s surrender agreement were broken, as the castle’s considerable treasures were plundered irreparably, though Lady Blanche’s son, Henry, the third Lord Arundel, later retook the castle from Parliamentary control. Lady Blanche’s troubles multiplied, as she lost her husband ten days after her home when he died at Oxford in Charles’ service, leaving her temporarily captive and penniless. However, Lady Blanche would eventually survive these indignities; when she died, she was buried with her husband at Tisbury near Wardour Castle. The inscription on Lady Blanche’s tomb lauds her valor and recognizes her as possessing a “spirit above her sex” and cites Proverb 31 to recognize her as a “valiant woman” (Jones 2000: 73). Tradition holds that Lady Blanche’s ghost still haunts the area around the original Wardour Castle.

A descendant of Thomas Woodstock and the Plantagenet line through her mother, Lady Blanche was the sixth daughter of Edward Somerset, the Earl of Worcester. Her father, though a staunch Catholic, had served as Master of the Horse late in Elizabeth Tudor’s reign. Her son Henry, the third Lord Arundel, was imprisoned during the reign of Charles II based on the testimony of Titus Oates because of his avowed Catholicism, but was eventually freed and appointed Keeper of the Privy Seal in 1687 by James II.

Historian Alison Plowden (1998) suggests that the extensive and active involvement of strong women like Lady Blanche on both sides contributed to the English Civil War being less “barbarous” than its contemporaneous European counterparts.

SEE ALSO: Cromwell, Oliver (1599–1658); English Revolution, 17th Century; English Revolution, Women and

References and Suggested Readings

- Cooper, T. (1873) A New Biographical Dictionary: Containing Concise Notices of Eminent Persons. London: Bell.
- Herberman, C. G. et al. (1907/1913) The Catholic Encyclopedia. New York: Universal Knowledge Foundation.

- Jones, D. E. (1997/2000) Women Warriors: A History. Washington, DC: Brassey's.
- Plowden, A. (1998) Women All on Fire. Stroud: Sutton.
- Shed, J. A. (2000) Legalism Over Revolution: The Parliamentary, 1647–1655. Historical Journal 43, 4 (December): 1093–107.

Assembly of the Poor

Terri Bennett

The Assembly of the Poor (AOP) is a large network of grassroots activists from across Thailand, comprised predominantly of peasant farmers and urban slum dwellers, but joined by development non-governmental organizations (NGOs) and academic allies. Founded in 1995, the group has united around various issues that disparately affect the nation's poor, including natural resource use, land and property rights, and safe working conditions. The AOP also pressures policymakers toward agricultural policy that supports small-scale farmers and food sovereignty. Membership has fluctuated, but at times up to 200,000 activists have belonged to the Assembly. Among other successes, the AOP has been instrumental in bringing public attention to the plights of both the rural and urban poor, garnering support for structural changes in favor of the poor, and challenging a top-down development paradigm that champions technocratic, state-led projects devoid of local input.

The group is well known for its highly visible, large-scale demonstrations; certainly, its 99-day protest at Bangkok's Government House in January 2007 cemented the AOP's struggles into public discourse. Over 25,000 villagers and slum dwellers joined the demonstration, vowing to stay until the government responded to their petitions, which cited 122 grievances and necessary reforms. The predominantly rural AOP lived in makeshift camps on the streets of the capital, making their communities' struggles heard via national television and newspaper stories. The event provided Assembly members with opportunities to foster solidarity between geographically disparate community groups and People's Organizations (POs) as well as to confront – sometimes face-to-face – government bureaucrats and officials.

The grievances and demands contained in this and other AOP petitions range from quite practical and specific to broad based and ideological; they characterize the depth and scope of the AOP itself. For instance, the Assembly mandated that thousands of small-scale, rural fisherfolk be compensated for displacement by the state-led Pak Mun Dam project, which was designed to supply electricity to a growing urban middle class. However, such demands are linked to overarching critiques of a dominant development model that often benefits a small, wealthy, urban population at the expense of the rural poor. Much of the AOP's public discourse can be interpreted as an indictment of capitalist development schemes, as well as an indictment of a hierarchical political order that discounts villagers' demands as "backward" or "reactionary" because they are peasants. In fact, a fundamental goal of the Assembly lies in granting Thailand's poor a legitimate and credible voice within debates concerning resources and over what it means to develop them.

For the AOP, combating unjust and exclusionary social hierarchies requires providing an example of more just social relations. One way this is accomplished is by employing a horizontal organizational model within the network itself. Though no social movement can claim to have eradicated all aspects of entrenched power disparities within its interactions, the Assembly makes deliberate and decisive moves to recognize and value the voices of all its constituents. This characteristic is particularly crucial to AOP, as one of its primary principles is that local wisdom must be a factor in development decision-making – such situated knowledge is the foundation for villagers' expertise in managing their own resources. This commitment to inclusivity is representative of the reciprocal objectives of the Assembly – it seeks to achieve a radically democratic society by using radical democracy as a methodology.

SEE ALSO: Food Sovereignty and Protest; Global Justice Movement and Resistance; Korea, Peasant and Farmers' Movement; Neoliberalism and Protest; Participatory Democracy, History of; Thailand, Popular Movements, 1980s–Present; Via Campesina and Peasant Struggles

References and Suggested Readings

- Baker, C. & Pasuk, P. (2005) A History of Thailand. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Chalermripinyorat, R. (2004) Politics of Representation: A Case Study of Thailand's Assembly of the Poor. Critical Asian Studies 36 (4): 541–66.

Missingham, B. (2003) The Assembly of the Poor. Chiang Mai: Silkworm Books.

Phatharathananunth, S. (2006) Civil Society and Democratization: Social Movements in Northeast Thailand. Hawaii: University of Hawaii Press.

Asturias Uprising, October 1934

Andrew Durgan

In October 1934 the coal miners of Asturias rose up against the Spanish government and for two weeks not only held off the army units sent to crush them, but created their own embryonic “socialist republic.” The Asturian uprising was part of a far wider domestic and international crisis that marked a decisive step towards Civil War (1936–9).

The rise of fascism internationally was an important factor in the radicalization of the Spanish workers’ movement. In particular, much of the powerful Socialist Party (PSOE), frustrated by the sabotage of reform and under pressure from its rank and file, turned sharply left. This radicalization was symbolized by the transformation of the once-cautious trade union leader, Francisco Largo Caballero, into the leader of the socialists’ erstwhile revolutionary left. With the rise of Hitler in January 1933, an armed uprising a year later by the Austrian socialists in response to the formation of the Dollfuss government, despite its defeat, inspired anti-fascists in Spain. “Better Vienna than Berlin” became their watchword.

Spain’s main conservative party in 1933, the Confederación Española de Derechas Autónomas (Spanish Confederation of Autonomous Rightist Groups) (CEDA), despite its supposed commitment to democracy, was increasingly sympathetic to the Nazis. The right won the election in November 1933 due to the changing alliances of the center Radical Party, anarchist abstention, and disunity on the left. The possibility that the CEDA could enter government alongside Prime Minister Alejandro Lerroux’s Radicals alarmed the left. The similarities between the reactionary Catholic corporatism of CEDA leader Gil Robles and the would-be Austrian dictator Dollfuss convinced most workers’ organizations that the entry of this party into the Cabinet would signal the introduction of an authoritarian regime.

To confront the threat of the authoritarian right, Workers’ Alliances against Fascism were established in different parts of Spain by local socialist, syndicalist, and dissident communist groups. However, the absence of the anarcho-syndicalist CNT, with the notable exception of Asturias, meant the labor movement remained divided. The participation of the CNT in Asturias was due to the long tradition of collaboration that existed in the local workers’ movement, in part a by-product of the specific conditions of the mining industry. Collaboration in a series of labor disputes and opposition to unemployment laid the basis for the creation of a truly united Workers’ Alliance. Only orthodox communists remained aloof, but even they would adhere to the Alliances on the eve of the October revolt – a reflection of the incipient move away from the Comintern’s previous ultra-left sectarianism. There was also a clear economic basis to working-class radicalism in Asturias due to the crisis in the coal industry. The fact that many of the miners’ leaders were followers of the moderate socialist Indalecio Prieto, rather than Largo Caballero, illustrates the breadth of the radicalization that had taken place.

At a state-wide level, the socialists had responded to their defeat at the polls by threatening revolution if there was an attempt to introduce an authoritarian regime through parliament. The socialists established a Revolutionary Committee to prepare any eventual insurrection. But such preparations amounted to very little. The socialist leadership hoped that the threat of revolution would be enough to dissuade the Radicals from inviting the CEDA into power. Thus, when the Southern farm workers struck in June 1934, despite the provocations they had suffered under socialist leadership, the PSOE and UGT refused to organize solidarity action. The resulting defeat meant any forthcoming revolutionary movement would be deprived of its potential mass base in the rural South. The Alliances had a strong local base in Asturias and Catalonia where there were successful mobilizations. In Catalonia on March 13, a one-day General Strike was organized in solidarity with strikers in Madrid “against fascism.” On September 8 a General Strike was declared in Asturias in protest of the CEDA’s fascist-style rally at Covadonga.

Unable to govern alone, and under pressure from the right, Lerrox invited the CEDA to join his Cabinet in early October. Gil Robles was aware that his entrance into government would provoke social disorder, but believed it was better to have an inevitable showdown while the workers' movement was still unprepared. The socialists' bluff had been called and their Revolutionary Committee reluctantly called a General Strike on October 4.

The response to the call was uneven. In Madrid, the Revolutionary Committee was immediately arrested and given the socialists' reluctance to work through the Workers' Alliances, the movement lacked even nominal leadership at a national level. The strike dragged on for ten days in the capital, punctuated by abortive attempts by the Socialist Youth militias to seize strategic buildings. Elsewhere there were stoppages in Valencia, Aragon, and in much of the Basque Country, where there were also armed clashes with the security forces. In Catalonia the movement overlapped with the rebellion of the Catalan government against attacks by Madrid on its regional autonomy. Yet without the CNT and given the half-hearted attitude of the Catalan nationalists, the movement was soon defeated.

In Asturias a Provincial Revolutionary Committee representing the workers' organizations coordinated the insurrection. Local committees set about organizing different aspects of daily life, from food distribution through to hospitals. Money was abolished in some villages. A make-shift arms industry was rapidly set up. Apart from the capture of the arms factory at Trubia, other workplaces turned out armored vehicles, weapons, rudimentary hand-bombs, and ammunition. A "red guard" arrested known right wingers and dealt with looters. The Provincial Committee was initially based in the leftist stronghold of Mieres, an industrial and mining center with a population of around 40,000. It was there on October 5 that the committee proclaimed from the balcony of the town hall to an enthusiastic crowd the founding of a "Socialist Republic."

Hastily formed militias soon lay siege to the region's Civil Guard barracks. Vehicles and trains were seized to transport the armed workers and columns of miners descended on the capital, Oviedo, and the mountain passes that led into the region. Despite the miners' ingenious use of dynamite, lack of arms and ammunition soon took its toll on the revolutionary forces. Unable to completely take over Oviedo and threatened by government forces pressing down on the region, the Provincial Committee dissolved itself, after ordering a general retreat. A new committee, composed of young communists and socialists, was determined to resist to the end, refusing to believe the news that the movement had failed in the rest of Spain. Two days later the miners finally abandoned the capital. In the anarchist stronghold of the Port of Gijón the strike continued until October 16 despite the arrival of government forces. The main centers of resistance were the mining villages and the mountain passes where, devoid of ammunition, the revolutionaries used giant catapults to shower the advancing troops with dynamite.

On October 18 a third reconstituted Provincial Committee, faced with the advance of government forces, the lack of arms and ammunition, and the movement's debacle elsewhere, agreed to surrender. Despite assurances that there would be no reprisals, the occupying troops, many from the Army of Africa, under General Franco, launched a campaign of terror in the mining villages. Of the over one thousand workers who lost their lives during the rebellion, most were victims of repression. Thousands more were imprisoned. The brutality faced by those detained contrasted with the generally correct treatment that rightist prisoners had faced during the insurrection. The execution of 34 members of the clergy and a few factory managers by insurgents, widely publicized by the conservative press, proved an exception.

The revolt of October 1934 was an important step on the road to Civil War. For conservative historians, it was proof that the left did not respect democracy and was therefore to blame for provoking the military uprising of July 1936. However, the experience of Germany and Austria was foremost in the minds of the most militant sections of workers' movements. The insurrection probably deterred the introduction of an authoritarian regime by "legal" means and the brutal repression that followed in Asturias would prove a salutary lesson for the left. The military coup nearly two years later would thus be met with desperate popular resistance under the battle cry of October: ¡UHP!

(¡Uníos Hermanos Proletarios! Unite Proletarian Brothers!).

SEE ALSO: Confederación Nacional del Trabajo (CNT); Mujeres Libres; POUM (Workers' Party of Marxist Unification); Spanish Revolution

References and Suggested Readings

- Díaz Nosty, B. (1974) La Comuna Asturiana. Revolución de octubre 1934. Bilbao: Zero.
- Grossi, M. (2000) The Asturian Uprising. Fifteen Days of Socialist Revolution. London: Socialist Platform.
- Jackson, G. et al. (1985) Octubre 1934. Madrid: Siglo Veintiuno.
- Molins i Fàbrega, N. (1977) UHP. La insurrección proletaria de Asturias. Madrid: Ediciones Júcar.
- Ruiz, D. (1988), Insurrección defensiva y revolución obrera. El octubre español de 1934. Barcelona: Labor Universitaria.
- Shubert, A. (1987) The Road to Revolution in Spain: The Coal Miners of Asturias 1860–1934. Chicago: University of Illinois Press.
- Taibo, P. I. (1980) Asturias 1934. Madrid: Ediciones Júcar.

Atatürk, Mustafa Kemal (1881–1938)

Andrew J. Waskey

Turkish nationalist Mustafa Kemal Atatürk was born in Salonika (Thessaloniki, Greece) in the Ottoman empire in 1881. His father, Ali Rıza Efendi, was a Turkish-speaking minor official of the Ottoman empire who had also achieved some business success. Kemal attended a number of military schools before graduating from the War Academy in early 1905. He then joined the army, where he organized the Fatherland Society and eventually joined the revolutionary activities of the Young Turks, which later broadened into the Committee for Union and Progress (CUP). Abandoning hope in reforms, Kemal and others marched on Constantinople in order to overthrow the authoritarian rule of Sultan Abdulhamit II.

While in the army, Kemal gained leadership training as well as his nationalist outlook. In 1911, as a major in the Turkish army, he was sent to fight in the nominally Ottoman province of Trablusgarp (Libya) against Italy. The fighting gave him experiences for effective leadership in the future. Fighting in the Balkan Wars of 1912–1913, with the empire's loss of further territory to European powers, stimulated the development of Kemal's nationalist ideology. He was heavily influenced by the writings of Ziya Gökalp (1876–1924), an ardent promoter of a Turkish nationalism.

In November of 1914, the Ottoman empire joined Germany in the Great War. The British navy in February of 1915 unsuccessfully attempted to seize the Dardanelles and Constantinople, which would have ended Ottoman participation in the war. The failure allowed the Ottomans time to fortify Gallipoli, where Kemal was to make his reputation as Turkey's leading general in the Gallipoli campaign (1915).

After the war, as the Allies prepared to carve up the whole of the empire, resistance developed in eastern Anatolia. Several Turkish army commanders took control of Ankara. The disorder led the British to send Kemal to Samsun to command the Ninth Army. He arrived on May 19, a day he would later declare his official birthday.

Instead of restoring order as the British had hoped, Kemal organized resistance into the War of Independence. The British demanded his arrest by the sultan; Kemal responded by resigning and then signing the Amasya Protocol, which called for independence. Forming a National Congress in Erzurum, the nationalists drafted their manifesto, the National Pact. By January 1920 the nationalists were claiming to be the true government of Turkey.

In March 1920 Kemal established a new parliament in Ankara as an alternative to the old parliament in Constantinople. Under the authority of the Grand National Assembly, Kemal became the president of Turkey under a new constitution proclaimed on January 20, 1921. When the terms of the Treaty of Sèvres (later codified by the Paris Peace Conference), which was signed by the sultan's government, became known, the nationalists declared the Istanbul government to be traitors. In several campaigns between 1920 and 1922 Kemal defeated Armenian attempts to take control of their traditional homeland in eastern Anatolia and thwarted French attacks in northern Syria. He also defeated the Greeks and drove them out of Anatolia. The fighting established the modern boundaries of Turkey with the signing of the Treaty of Lausanne on July 24, 1923. On November 1, 1922, the sultanate in Istanbul was abolished and the Ottoman empire was ended. The capital was officially moved to Ankara on October 13, 1923. On October 29, 1923, the Republic of Turkey was proclaimed with Kemal as its president.

Kemal next set about transforming Turkey into a nationalist society. The calendar and clock were changed in 1925, the metric system was adopted in 1931, street numbering was instituted, the traditional fez hat was abolished, and “Turkification” of the language and vocabulary promoted. In 1928 the Latin alphabet was adopted for the Turkish language. To promote it, Kemal went to village schools where he taught the new system. In 1934 all Turks were ordered to adopt a surname. Kemal chose Atatürk, which means “father of the Turks.” In 1930, Kemal instituted reforms in agriculture, industry, and banking. New crops were introduced. Mining and industry were promoted with the aid of new banks that provided financing. A new labor code was adopted in 1936.

Opposition to Kemal came from several quarters, but the strongest was from devout Muslims. In 1923 Ali Sukru, the deputy for Trabzon and a devout Muslim, verbally attacked him for excessive drinking and accused him of wanting to make himself the sultan. The subsequent discovery of Ali Sukru’s body in a shallow grave near Kemal’s villa damaged the latter’s reputation.

The new constitution allowed for the existence of other political parties than Kemal’s party, the Republican People’s Party. The Progressive Republican Party arose in opposition but was proscribed in June 1925. In 1926 plots to assassinate Kemal were uncovered. The plotters were tried and hanged for treason.

On November 8, 1938, Atatürk died at the Dolmabahce Palace in Istanbul. The cause of death was cirrhosis of the liver due to excessive drinking. He was buried in Ankara.

SEE ALSO: Turkey, Protest and Revolution, 1800s–1923; Turkish Rebellions, 1918–1925; Turkish Republic Protests, 1923–1946; Young Turks

References and Suggested Readings

- Armstrong, H. C. (2001) Kemal Atatürk. Phoenix: Simon Publications.
- Atilasov, Y. (2002) Mustafa Kemal Atatürk. Woodside, NY: Woodside House.
- Gulbeyaz, H. (2005) Mustafa Kemal Atatürk. Berlin: Parthas Verlag.
- Mango, A. (2002) Atatürk: The Biography of the Founder of Modern Turkey. New York: Overlook Press.

Atlantic port seaman resistance, American Revolutionary era

Craig Marin

In November 1747 the inhabitants of Boston were up in arms. What began as a group of 300 sailors swelled, according to one contemporary source, into a “mob” of several thousand residents of the port town. The protestors focused their anger on the press gangs sweeping the port for sailors to replace the 50 who had deserted from a British naval vessel, the Lark, under the command of Commodore Christopher Knowles. Part of the mob gathered at the waterfront, where they successfully intercepted some of the Lark’s officers attempting to return to their vessel with forced recruits. To further interfere with the press gang, a contingent of the crowd seized what they mistakenly assumed was a naval barge and carried it through the streets of the town, eventually setting it ablaze on Boston Common. The Massachusetts governor attempted to intervene but was threatened by the crowd that had gathered around the Provincial Council Chamber. With some of his officers seized as hostages until the return of the pressed sailors and townsmen, the enraged Commodore Knowles threatened to bombard the town with his cannons. The protests and exchange of threats only ended when Knowles agreed to release the pressed men.

This event, known to historians as the Knowles Riot, while certainly not the first group action instigated by sailors and supported by the residents of a port city, began a string of protest actions in Colonial North America that would culminate in the American Revolution. Commodore Knowles, on the way to his new station in the West Indies, desperately sought to fill his complement of sailors before departure. In authorizing the press gangs that combed the streets of Boston and the vessels in the harbor, the commodore acted within his legal rights and expected cooperation from local law enforcement. The response of the sailors and then large numbers of town residents caught him by surprise, despite his knowledge of recent small-scale resistance to impressment in the West Indies. Historians argue that the sailors engaged in these protests were asserting their rights to liberty based on a loose interpretation of an earlier Act of Parliament that exempted sailors in the Sugar Islands from impressment, implicitly demanding that this protection be extended to the British North American colonies. The sailors exhibited a clear willingness to confront authority to protect that liberty. Additionally, historians argue, as a population of multi-ethnic laborers, some free and some enslaved, these sailors did more than simply assert protection under English law. Drawing upon a mixture of radical Enlightenment thought and traditional views of a just and moral economy, sailors called both for the recognition of universal human rights and for control over their bodies and their labor. In this battle, seamen would find more and more allies among the land-bound on both sides of the Atlantic.

Following the Knowles riot, unrest among sailors spread throughout the Atlantic, where resistance to impressment continued, and sailors made broader claims about their rights to control their own bodies and the fruits of their labor. Back in the North American colonies, the Stamp Act, with its freezing of trade, loosed the wrath of sailors again. A group of seamen, determined to obtain and destroy the stamped paper sent from England, forced their way into Charleston merchant Henry Laurens's house to demand the papers they suspected him of holding. Laurens was at first intimidated by their threat of violence, and later impressed with their restraint after determining that they had accused him unjustly. Indeed, despite their large numbers and aggressive demeanor, they did him no physical harm and only committed minimal, and incidental, destruction to his property.

Directed actions such as this one would continue through the next few decades. For example, in Newport, Rhode Island in 1763 and 1765, sailors and other residents attacked press gangs and naval vessels used in forced recruitment of sailors. In Boston in 1768 sailors dragged a naval barge to the Boston Common and burned it, just as others had done in 1747. In various Atlantic ports over the next decade (Wilmington, North Carolina in 1765; Nevis in 1765; Newport again in 1769 and 1772; twice in New York in 1775; and London in 1770 and 1776) sailors again and again responded forcefully to perceived attacks on their own liberty. They also allied themselves in protest with other workers in or near the maritime environment. In 1775 in Liverpool, for instance, sailors joined the land-bound laborers in protests against lowered wages. When the mustered militias directed musket fire on the crowd of 3,000, sailors responded by hauling guns off ships in the harbor and bombarding the trading house in the center of town.

Historians attribute sailors' radical nature when ashore to their experiences of naval warfare, and to their traditions of resistance to the brutally violent discipline that characterized labor at sea. Furthermore, the cooperative nature of ship's work built a strong sense of interdependence and loyalty among common seamen – everyone had a part to play in the successful navigation of a vessel from port to port. This sense of brotherhood extended to all crew members, frequently trumping divisions of race and ethnicity. In order to compel sailors to continue to labor on board leaky vessels and on voyages plagued with warfare, short rations, and disease, masters of vessels and their officers employed extreme violence to coerce labor, curb disobedience, and reinforce their authority. This type of arbitrary and brutal violence engendered intense resentment among most sailors, making them prime candidates for strong action against the heavy-handed and arbitrary policies of British trade and colonial government enacted from the late 1740s through the Revolution and beyond.

In the narrative of worker resistance, the ship has been likened to the first factory, and the sailor as the first wage worker. When sailors experienced the loss of control over their labor power, they essentially became commodified. From this perspective, their resistance to these unfair conditions can be understood as forms of labor organization. The connection is clearest in the 1768 work stoppage on the River Thames in London, during which sailors, demonstrating an awareness of their strength in numbers, agreed to strike (lower) the sails in a show of solidarity to abused fellow workers along the river. This action gave rise to the use of the term "strike" to refer to a group's refusing to work and preventing others from using the work place in their stead.

Traditional histories of the American Revolution, drawing on elite-authored sources, have accorded sailors very little agency or ability to develop and/or express a coherent ideology. In these accounts, sailors are characterized as pointlessly unruly, frequently drunk, and easily bought with cash in hand or tankards of rum; sailors are present in these histories as easily manipulated figures rather than autonomous actors. Work by George Rudé (1964) and Eric Hobsbawm (1968) on crowd actions in the context of European food riots, labor militancy, and political protests successfully challenged the notion that sailors lacked their own ideology or initiative, and encouraged a reconceptualizing of sailors as historical actors. Moving beyond notions of American exceptionalism allowed historians of the American Revolution to likewise approach the actions of sailors in port cities, before and after the outbreak of hostilities with Great Britain, with a greater appreciation for the self-activation of seamen and their cohort.

The influence of sailors outside of the maritime world is the subject of many works from the late 1960s through 2007. Jesse Lemisch (1968) and Gary Nash (1976, 2005) both have placed the sailor at the center of the radical activities leading up to the Declaration of Independence, suggesting that their forms of protest, including taking to the streets, tarring and feathering, targeted destruction of property, and other forms of intimidation were adopted by other groups. Thus, seamen's aggressive responses to unjust authority and oppression influenced the land-bound laborers of many of the port cities of North America, forcing many of the middling and lesser elites of these locales to take much more direct action in response to British policies of the 1760s and 1770s than they might otherwise have done.

This transfer of revolutionary ideas and protest actions from sailors to others is well documented. The Knowles Riot and other anti-press actions became the models for protests against British customs policies and duties in port cities throughout British North America. The effectiveness of sailor activism and the popularity of sailors' anti-tyranny ideology resonated both with the working poor and middling elements of colonial society. Even outside of the port city environment, sailor ideology and activism resonated with American colonists. Indeed, Irvin (2003) has noted that tarring and feathering, a traditional act of sailor retribution, was not uncommon among land-locked social activists as a punishment for over-zealous British officials or open Loyalists in inland areas from the 1760s through the war years. While not the inventors of group protest or the original defenders of a moral economy, within the context of struggles against British policies in the mid-eighteenth century, sailors set the bar, and their radical and aggressive responses were incorporated into the independence movement.

While the working poor of port cities either were part of the population of sailors or worked closely with them, they were not the only members of the "lower sort" who participated in or incorporated the tactics of sailors' protests. Slave and free black sailors were an important part of the ethnically and nationally diverse naval and merchant marine fleets in the British colonial theater. As ubiquitous workers in the West Indies and the plantation economies of South Carolina, Virginia, and Georgia, slaves were frequently employed as hands on local and deep sea vessels. This put them in all of the ports of the Atlantic, and ensured their presence at all moments of protest and rebellion sparked by or including sailors. The narrative of Olaudah Equiano offers a clear picture of the possibilities for cooperation across race and condition of servitude, as Equiano's shipmates were alternately co-workers, fellow sufferers, teachers, mutual survivors of disasters, and champions of his rights. As a sailor, Equiano found ways to partially escape the restrictions and brutality of slavery, despite being surrounded by slaves who were constantly brutalized and slave owners who were consistently brutal. Indeed, Equiano's experiences radicalized him and prompted his determination to attack slavery from within by refusing to be controlled as his masters wished; and from without by publishing his intensely abolitionist narrative.

Equiano was by no means unique in finding empowerment as a slave or free black sailor. Witness the activism in the Boston Massacre of Crispus Attucks. Although written out of the event in Paul Revere's famous engraving, Attucks was a recognized leader of the crowd of seamen and apprentices attacking the British soldiers billeted in Boston. His knowledge of both British policies and working conditions in Boston not only shaped his strong oppositional response toward the British soldiers who undercut local workers by accepting lower wages, it allowed him to make connections to others outside of his ethnic group to engage in cooperative protest. Indeed, slave sailors and boatmen were often uniquely positioned to understand and draw attention to attacks on sailor rights and liberties, and to lead the attack against arbitrary authority. River boatmen along the James River in Virginia, for example, still holding out for the promise of liberty and equality so broadly circulated in the early years of the Revolution, took leading roles in Gabriel's Rebellion in 1800 and a subsequent plot in 1802.

While the middling and wealthy of early America made concerted efforts to curb group protests after the Revolution, sailors and slaves continued through the next several decades to push back at oppressive work conditions and social repression. Recent studies suggest that, in the Caribbean, the information disseminated through slave communication networks, many of them created and supported by enslaved sailors and boatmen, fueled and spread protest and rebellion from island to island and to and from mainland North America. The spread of the more radical American and French revolutionary ideals sparked protests and revolts in the Caribbean, contributing to the impetus and success of the largest slave-led revolt and social revolution in the Atlantic: the Haitian Revolution. In turn, the Haitian Revolution sparked revolts throughout the Americas. The boatmen of Gabriel's Rebellion knew of the struggles in Haiti and planned on assistance from the island nation if their own plans bore fruit.

While slave revolts and revolution marked the western side of the Atlantic, on the eastern side British sailors, still dissatisfied with impressment, lack of pay, and horrible treatment in the navy, staged a massive mutiny that was, in essence, a strike not unlike the 1768 action along the Thames. Refusing to take their posts in 1797, the seamen of the fleet stationed at Spithead and the Nore made their collective voice heard as they protested unpaid wages and attacks upon traditional practices and their liberty as Englishmen. In this way, despite the culmination of the American Revolution and the reassertion of elite power there, sailors demonstrated their willingness to continue in their struggles against tyranny and oppression.

SEE ALSO: American Revolution of 1776; American Slave Rebellions; Gabriel's Rebellion; Haiti, Saint-Domingue Revolution, 1789–1804, Aftermath

References and Suggested Readings

- Bolster, W. J. (1997) Black Jacks: African American Seamen in the Age of Sail. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Egerton, D. (1993) Gabriel's Rebellion: The Virginia Slave Conspiracies of 1800 and 1802. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

- Hobsbawm E. & Rudé, G. (1968) Captain Swing. New York: Pantheon.
- Irvin, B. H. (2003) Tar, Feathers, and the Enemies of American Liberties, 1768–1776. New England Quarterly 76, 2 (June): 197–238.
- Lemisch, J. (1968) Jack Tar in the Streets: Merchant Seamen in the Politics of Revolutionary America. William and Mary Quarterly 3rd Series 25, 3 (July): 371–407.
- Linebaugh, P. & Rediker, M. (2000) The Many-Headed Hydra: Sailors, Slaves, Commoners, and the Hidden History of the Revolutionary Atlantic. Boston: Beacon Press.
- Nash, G. (1976) The Urban Crucible: Social Change, Political Consciousness, and the Origins of the American Revolution. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Nash, G. (2005) The Unknown American Revolution: The Unruly Birth of Democracy and the Struggle to Create America. New York: Viking.
- Rediker, M. (1987) Between the Devil and the Deep Blue Sea: Merchant Seamen, Pirates, and the Anglo-American Maritime World, 1700–1750. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Rodger, N. A. M. (2004) The Command of the Ocean: A Naval History of Britain, 1649–1815. London: Allen Lane.
- Rudé, G. (1964) The Crowd in History: A Study of Popular Disturbances in France and England, 1730–1848. New York: Wiley.

ATTAC (Association for the Taxation of Financial Transactions for the Aid of Citizens)

Vicki L. Birchfield and Annette Freyberg-Inan

The international social movement ATTAC (Association for the Taxation of Financial Transactions for the Aid of Citizens) was launched in France in 1998 and has since evolved into a transnational network that spans the globe with associations in over forty countries. Pushing for alternatives to neoliberal globalization, ATTAC is a loose network of non-hierarchical, decentralized associations in many different countries – from the most highly developed to the most impoverished – and includes diverse groups and individuals, ranging from public intellectuals, teachers, and ecumenical leaders to small farmers, environmentalists, and advocates for the homeless and unemployed. ATTAC characterizes itself as an alter-globalization movement that promotes some limits to commodification and the reign of market forces, more transparent and equitable forms of international economic exchange, and greater political and democratic control of financial markets.

The Crisis of Global Capitalism and the Emergence of ATTAC

The birth of ATTAC and the transformation of a protest statement and critical discourse into an organized social movement in France and beyond were preceded by two crucial events. First, the Asian financial crisis of 1997 sparked a reaction among French intellectuals, which culminated in a widely discussed editorial by Ignacio Ramonet in Le Monde Diplomatique published in December 1997. As the East Asian economies began to crash due to rampant capital flight and the ensuing collapse of their currencies, Ramonet used the crisis as an opportunity to underscore the consequences of deregulated global financial markets and the volatility and systemic risks generated by short-term, speculative capital flows. He highlighted the inherent instability and inequity generated by unregulated global capitalism and called for a “disarming of the power of financial markets.”

Moreover, Ramonet proposed that an organization be created to implement the so-called Tobin tax to impose some degree of control over financial markets and set up a redistributive mechanism to aid disadvantaged citizens (especially in developing countries). Such a tax of 0.1 percent to 0.5 percent on foreign exchange transactions was proposed in 1972 by Nobel prize-winning economist James Tobin to discourage private speculation in money markets that can undermine national monetary policies. It would also both stabilize global markets and raise funds which could potentially be used towards debt relief for developing countries. The acronym ATTAC was originally derived from the name “Action for a Tobin Tax for the Aid of Citizens,” but it later came to stand for the “Association for the Taxation of Financial Transactions for the Aid of Citizens.” The plea for a Tobin tax allowed for a critique of unrestrained capitalism while at the same time proposing a strategy for change that emphasized the interconnection of societies of the developed and developing worlds.

According to opinion polls at the time, as much as 71 percent of the French population supported the idea of such an international solidarity tax. Thus, Ramonet’s critique resonated with many in French society and produced an outpouring of support in the form of thousands of letters professing solidarity and endorsement. The letters of support precipitated a meeting held in March 1998 bringing together intellectuals, trade unions, civic groups, representatives of political publications, and others to discuss the general political and moral principles shaping their views on globalization and to seek agreement on strategies and goals. Three main points were agreed at this first meeting: the need to confront the hegemony of neoliberalism and propose credible alternatives; the necessity of curbing increasing economic insecurity and inequality through the implementation of a Tobin tax; and an urgency to transcend traditional cleavages in French society and reinvigorate participatory politics locally and globally in order to counter the ill effects of financial globalization. This meeting was followed up three months later and the association was formally established on June 3, 1998, with the first general assembly electing a board of directors and a president, Bernard Cassen, managing director of Le Monde Diplomatique, and adopting an official platform.

Simultaneous to discussions and preparations for the meeting, but actually preceding the formal launch of ATTAC, the second trigger event occurred which revolved around the negotiations for the Multilateral Agreement on Investment (MAI) taking place at the headquarters of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) in Paris. These negotiations were an effort to produce a comprehensive framework for the liberalization of international investment that, according to its opponents, would severely limit the ability of national governments to regulate certain public sectors and aid domestic industries. A coalition of 70 different associations in France, including many prominent individuals such as Susan George and François Dufour, who later became vicepresidents of ATTAC, had actively opposed the MAI and lobbied the French government to pull out of the negotiations. Most vociferous among the MAI opponents were individuals from the entertainment sector, who claimed the agreement would effectively kill French cinema, as it would spell an end to the complex public financing and subsidy scheme that has been in place in France since the inception of the cinematic arts.

Such intense criticisms and political pressure coupled with increasing internal disputes among OECD members themselves led the French to officially pull out of the negotiations. Upon announcing withdrawal, France released the Lalumière Report, in which it argued that the MAI “marks a step in international economic negotiations. For the first time we are witnessing the emergence of a ‘global civil society’ represented by non-governmental organizations, which are often active in several countries and communicate across borders. This is no doubt an irreversible change.” As for the suggestions made in the report, Susan George commented in her published debate with Martin Wolf (editor-in-chief of The Financial Times) that the Jospin government actually incorporated most of the arguments she and other opponents had made against the MAI. Such tangible influence provided considerable motivation for more comprehensive action that would come to define the essence of the ATTAC movement.

In this way the critique of neoliberalism crystallized into a vision for a deliberate, sustained contestation of the forces of globalization that were seen as usurping governments’ and citizens’ power to shape the contours of their own societies. Though many French intellectuals had long agitated against the increased powers of the WTO, the neoliberal direction of EU integration, and growing foreign ownership of French companies, pension funds, and the stock market, until the establishment of ATTAC, no coherent links had been made between all these developments. Once these connections were made, the movement very rapidly spread beyond France, as groups in many countries began to organize at local, national, and transnational levels to counter neoliberalism with their own agendas for a more equitable and humane international political economy.

Guiding Values and Principal Objectives

The platform adopted by the General Assembly in France on June 3, 1998 begins by stating that financial globalization exacerbates economic insecurity and social inequality and that this process bypasses democratic institutions and sovereign states and restricts people’s choices. It refers to financial globalization as guided only by speculative logic and the private interests of multinational corporations and financial markets. The platform lays out its critique of the economic fatalism and claims of inevitability that are often associated with the present transformation in the global economy and argues that only vigilant pressure on governments can halt the process. The document specifically mentions the hegemony of US-inspired neoliberalism and criticizes the EU for being a handmaiden to the crusade even as it jeopardizes the public welfare and the audiovisual and agricultural sectors throughout Europe. There is a reference to the growing gap between North and South and a call for the implementation of the Tobin tax. The organized resistance is aimed at giving more room to maneuver to states and citizens, and the platform concludes with a proposal for a formal association and an appeal to common action at the European and international levels. In addition to invoking the need “to reclaim our future,” the platform specifies the following more concrete objectives: (1) to hinder international speculation; (2) to tax financial capital transactions; (3) to sanction tax havens; (4) to inhibit the privatization of pension funds; and (5) more generally to oppose the abandonment of state sovereignty to investors and markets.

ATTAC in general does not focus on lobbying to achieve public policy change directly, but rather seeks to function like a consciousness-raising movement to fundamentally affect the ideational structure of civil society. This is an important factor in accounting for the movement’s potential to function at the core of an emerging global civil society. ATTAC uses parallel strategies to achieve this goal. For one, it organizes peaceful protest activities with publicity value to draw attention to its agenda points. Examples are the blockade of the conference center in Genoa at the G8 summit in 2001, a floating “tax oasis” (tax haven) on the River Alster in Hamburg to stimulate public curiosity concerning the issue of tax evasion, various decentralized activities on the occasion of WTO meetings, and mass demonstrations on the occasion of important EU summits in Brussels.

A second and parallel strategy contributes vitally to the credibility of the movement’s assessments and propositions. Reflecting its self-perception as a movement of popular education, ATTAC creates and provides expertise on its subjects of concern. Its member organizations actively inform themselves and each other in a complicated network of working groups on all aspects of the organization's agenda. Collaborating with scientists, investigative journalists, and analysts (many of them members), they are building themselves up as educational resources while continually working to share their expertise with the larger public. ATTAC France, for example, has a Scientific Council responsible for publishing books, articles, and tracts of general, critical education on the global economy. ATTAC Germany as well as ATTAC groups in Belgium, Sweden, and Italy all publish a range of material, from scholarly works on political economy to brochures on hot policy topics. The emphasis on education is also reflected in the local ATTAC associations in most European countries, which are encouraged to adopt campaigns that suit the local concerns and needs but also contribute to the formulation of ATTAC strategies at the national and transnational levels.

ATTAC's self-perception as a movement of popular education is also realized, especially in Germany and France (two of the largest associations), through ATTAC-sponsored Sommerakademien or universités d'été, as well as many smaller seminars and workshops, held for dialogue between activists, intellectuals, and ordinary citizens to discuss developments in political economy that pose threats to jobs, the environment, cultural diversity, and ways of life. In August 2008 a first European-wide Summer University was held in Germany, hosted by the University of Saarbruecken and Attac Saar working in collaboration with a cross-regional preparation team under a European working group responsible for the program. The organization of this event, which drew about 1,000 participants from a range of European countries, illustrates the progress the movement is making towards closer collaboration between different national associations across Europe.

ATTAC as a Transnational Movement: Organizational Structure and Political Strategy

The key organizational principles for all ATTAC associations are decentralization and non-hierarchical forms of decision making. Even though differences can be observed between countries, ATTAC organizations everywhere share the same basic concerns. The idea is to maintain a democratic and transparent organization which functions based on active grassroots participation in all major decisions and activities and which pursues the ideal of consensual decision making. What is most significant about ATTAC's organization within different national contexts is the inclusiveness of the decision making procedure.

Only six months after the establishment of ATTAC France, the international ATTAC movement was launched and a platform adopted on December 11–12, 1998 in Paris. Representatives from Africa, Asia, Europe, and Latin America were present, as well as numerous social networks and non-governmental organizations (NGOs). Three broad objectives were identified: (1) to launch an international movement for the democratic control of financial markets and institutions; (2) to enlarge and consolidate the political struggle against neoliberalism and its consequences; and (3) to offer more effective means of communication and to work collectively to provide information and counter-expertise on the international economy as tools for social movements. By June 1999 ATTAC membership had already grown significantly and the first official international conference was held in Paris under the title "The Dictatorship of Markets: Another World is Possible."

The next major event took place at the WTO meeting in November 1999 in Seattle, as ATTAC delegations mobilized and joined the protests under the slogan "The World is not a Commodity." Simultaneous protests were held by ATTAC groups across Europe. ATTAC's international campaign against the WTO revolves around the critique that trade agreements are increasingly negotiated behind the backs of citizens and are involving more and more areas of everyday life, including the provision of goods and services crucial for survival, which had previously been viewed as requiring state control and protection. There is a call for a moratorium on negotiations in the areas of agriculture, services, and intellectual property, with a special emphasis on avoiding the inclusion of any more public services in international trade negotiations. The same concerns are expressed at protests against other main protagonists of neoliberal globalization, such as in June 2007 at the G8 summit in Heiligendamm, Germany. At such events, which bring together a great variety of alter-globalization groups and activists, ATTAC is often a key organizer and can gain visibility and new members.

The expansion of the international movement appears to have been a rather spontaneous phenomenon that surprised the founding members by its volume as well as the speed with which new associations emerged. At the global level, the counter-summit has been the key organizational form. It began with the idea of mounting a counter-conference during the World Economic Forum held initially in Davos, Switzerland, which took place in 2000 and brought together social movements from five different continents in a dialogue initiated and facilitated by ATTAC in association with the Coordinating Center against the Multilateral Agreement on Investment, the World Forum for Alternatives, and a Latin American branch of SAPRIN – the Structural Adjustment Participatory Review International Network. In 2001 a conference was held both in Davos and in Porto Alegre, Brazil to emphasize the contrast between the “planet of superrich and Porto Alegre, the planet of the poor, marginalized, and concerned.” Since then, counter-summits have known different venues. Responding directly to the priority of democratizing the global economy, the yearly gathering of the World Social Forum has involved massive coordination among ATTAC groups as well as numerous other networks and NGOs. These networks have organized the panels and workshops, mobilized protests, and featured key speakers, from officials like the UN Secretary General to important activists, which gives the conference both thematic coherence and visibility.

ATTAC has no organizational structure at the global level. The fact that in spite of consistent networking no official transnational organizational structure has emerged is a reflection of the commitment to local autonomy. Yet the movement has generated effective collective action through its ability to solidify discontent and achieve mass mobilizations at the national, regional, and global levels. ATTAC’s slogan “Another World is Possible” has become a rallying cry for the transnational contestation of neoliberal globalization that reaches far beyond the formal organizations of the ATTAC network themselves, indicating the successful internationalization of the movement.

SEE ALSO: G8 Protests, Genoa, 2001; G8 Protests, Heiligendamm, June 2007; Global Justice Movement and Resistance; World Social Forums; World Trade Organization (WTO) Protests, Seattle, 1999

References and Suggested Readings

- Ancelovici, M. (2002) Organizing Against Globalization: The Case of ATTAC in France. Politics and Society 30 (3): 427–63.
- Birchfield, V. & Freyberg-Inan, A. (2004) Constructing Opposition in the Age of Globalization: The Potential of ATTAC. Globalizations 1 (2): 278–304.
- Della Porta, D. & Diani, M. (1998) Social Movements: An Introduction. Oxford: Blackwell.
- George, S. (2002) Another World is Possible. The Nation, February 18.
- Ruggiero, V. (2002) “ATTAC”: A Global Social Movement? Social Justice 29 (1–2): 48–60.

Aung San (1915–1947)

Nupur Dasgupta

Bogoyoke (General) Aung San was the most important of the generation of Burmese nationalists who matured into national leaders in the watershed period of World War II. The anti-colonial struggle and the dream of a consensual Union of Burma with all ethnic communities are inextricably linked with Aung San, considered the father of modern Burma.

He was born in the town of Natmauk, Magwe district, in central Burma to an affluent family. His uncle Bo Min Yaung participated in the anti-British resistance movements in 1886. In 1932 he matriculated with distinctions in Burmese and Pali and joined Rangoon University. In 1936 he was elected secretary of the Rangoon University Students’ Union (RUSU). Soon Aung San became the crusading editor of the RUSU magazine, Omay (Peacock’s Call) and his days of anti-establishment political writings were initiated in this atmosphere of criticality. Along with U Nu, the president of the RUSU, he was slapped with an expulsion threat by the university when they supported an article criticizing a university official. This was followed by a massive students’ strike in 1936. In 1938 Aung San was elected president of the All Burma Student’s Union. His appointment by the government as the student representative in the Rangoon University Act Amendment Committee was a gesture of cooperation. Aung San married Daw Khin Kyi in 1942. Aung San Suu Kyi, who carries the torch of her father in continuing to fight for democracy in Burma, was his youngest daughter, born in 1945.

Nationalist Politics: Collaboration and Confrontation with Japan

In October 1938 Aung San moved into the wider arena of nationalist politics. He joined the Dobama Asiayone (We-Burmans Association) and acted as the general secretary. Emerging as an ideologue for Burmese nationalism in 1938–9, Aung San had also developed close relations with the nationalist leaders in India and was imbued with the ideas of democracy as well as socialism in these years.

World War II seemed to pose nationalists with a choice between anti-fascism and anti-colonialism. Aung San and the Thakins (members of Dobama Asiayone often called “masters,” signifying that they and not the British were the real masters of Burma) opted for the path that they thought was quickest to achieving freedom for Burma. Ideological issues had been in Aung San’s conscience and this is brought out in his post-1943 speeches and actions. During the war years he became the pivot of the nationalist movement in Burma. The decision of turning to an anti-British movement was influenced by his own patriotism and the politics of the British in the prewar years, which made him suspicious of their motives. In October 1939 he helped to found Bama-htwet-yat Ghine (Freedom Bloc) and became its general secretary. Aung San was contacted in China by the Japanese. The Burma Independence Army was raised in 1941 with the help of the Japanese to aid them in their 1942 invasion of Burma. Aung San was its chief of staff. It accompanied the Japanese occupation forces and grew in numbers as the Japanese entered Burma.

Even before the August 1, 1943 Japanese declaration of Burmese independence with Dr. Ba Maw as the Adipadi (head of state), Aung San had lost his faith in the Japanese intruders. He retraced his policy and vision for Burma’s future. From the middle of 1943 till June 15, 1945, when the Allied victory parade was held in Rangoon, Aung San, along with the members of the Communist Party of Burma and the People’s Revolutionary Party led by U Nu, developed a strong anti-Japanese movement under the Anti-Fascist Organization (AFO). This was a major achievement for Aung San, as this popular front brought together different ideological and political interests. While delivering the Independence Day anniversary speech in August 1944, Aung San openly declared Burma’s independent status as fake. He led the anti-Japanese movement with help from the communists hiding in the hills of Burma and contacted the British Force 136 through them in India. In March 1945 Burmese troops throughout the country rose up against the Japanese.

British Return and After

British rule was reinstated in September 1945. British policies, however, did not meet with the expectations of the Burmese nationalists. Aung San had formed the Anti-Fascist People’s Freedom League (AFPFL) on August 19, 1945, and began to press forward with the issue of Burma’s independence. Having denounced the White Paper containing His Majesty’s Burma Policy in 1945, Aung San led the nationalists in the country in protest against British policy. In 1946 Governor Dorman-Smith was replaced and Hubert Rance’s government inducted the AFPFL leaders into the Executive Council. In September 1946 Aung San was appointed deputy chairman of the Executive Council of Burma with portfolios for defense and external affairs. This was followed by the Aung San-Attlee Agreement signed in London on January 27, 1947, guaranteeing Burma’s independence within a year. Aung San and his colleagues in the council came back to press forward with plans of action for consolidating the future of Burma with a consensual government ensuring the participation of all ethnic communities. His concept of the Burmese nation was that of an integrated plural culture. During the negotiations with British Prime Minister Attlee, Aung San had asked for “the full freedom of all races in our country.” It was with such a vision that he entered into the Panglong Agreement on February 12, 1947 with leaders from nationalist groups expressing solidarity and support for a united Burma. In April 1947 the AFPFL won 196 of 202 seats in the election for a constituent assembly. In June 1947 Aung San convened a series of conferences at the Sorrento Villa in Rangoon for reconstruction of the country. On July 13, 1947 he delivered the last public speech before his assassination on July 19, 1947.

Middle Path

The Manifesto of the Thakin Party, supposedly penned by Aung San before Japanese Occupation, has aroused debates over the nature of his political vision for Burma. It has been held that the Blueprint in the Manifesto was the theoretical basis for military dictatorship (Maung Maung 1969: 298–9). However, Houtman (2007) has sharply criticized the inclusion of this document in Aung San's writings, claiming with some evidence that Maung Maung did this to justify Ne Win's dictatorship with reference to Aung San and his popularity. Certainly, the sentiments did not match Aung San's stand in 1946–7. It is true that in view of the total body of his writings and speeches, the ideas expressed in the Manifesto do not appear to be central to Aung San's thought (Silverstein 1993: 219; Houtman 1999: 19).

Aung San conceived democracy as the Buddha's Middle Path between the two extremes of communism and capitalism, which he bracketed with fascism (Houtman 1999: 21). He talked of sham democracy, which uses the people as a lever, "in the name of the people." His relationship with Marxist ideology and the Communist Party has been much debated. Both he and leading communists like Thakin Than Tun emerged from the nationalist Dobama movement and its left wing. He was certainly attracted by the appeal of egalitarianism in communism. But as a nationalist, his tactics during World War II differed from those of the communists. Like nationalists across Southeast Asia, he had a phase of collaboration with the Japanese before becoming disillusioned, after which he again collaborated with the communists. Then the decision to enter into government under Rance led to a rupture with the communists. Nonetheless, unlike in subsequent years, the relationship between nationalists and communists was not hostile. He approached the question of Burma's future from the standpoint of a middle path. His assassination put an end to this approach to democracy for Burma.

His daughter Aung San Suu Kyi described his memory as the guardian of the people's political conscience. Given the distrust between the Burman majority and the national or ethnic minorities, Aung San showed a great ability to bring about unity among peoples.

SEE ALSO: Bose, Subhas Chandra (1897–1945); Burma, Democracy Movement; Burma, National Movement Against British Colonial Rule; Soe, Thakin (1906–1989)

References and Suggested Readings

Houtman, G. (1999) Mental Culture in Burmese Crisis Politics: Aung San Suu Kyi and the National League

for Democracy. Tokyo: Tokyo University of Foreign Studies.

Houtman, G. (2007) Aung San's lan-zin, the Blue Print and the Japanese occupation of Burma. In K. Nemoto (Ed.), Reconsidering the Japanese Military Occupation in Burma (1942–45). Tokyo: Tokyo University of Foreign Studies.

Kyi, A. S. S. (1991) Aung San of Burma: A Biographical Portrait by His Daughter. Edinburgh: Kiscadale.

Maung Maung, U. (1969) Burma and General Ne Win. London: Asia Publishing House.

Naw, A. (2001) Aung San and the Struggle for Burmese Independence. Chiang Mai: Silkworm Books.

San, A. Speeches. Available at www.aungsan.com/Speeches.htm. Accessed May 3, 2008.

Silverstein, J. (1993) The Political Legacy of Aung San. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.

Australia, anti-war movement

Terri Bennett

Organized and sustained anti-war and peace movements occurred in Australia as early as World War I and have persisted with each foreign war in which Australian troops have been involved, including World War II, the Korean War, Vietnam, and the US War in Iraq.

During World War I, Australia's early feminists were at the forefront of the movement against the war. Vida Goldstein (1869–1949) and Cecilia John (1877–1955) co-founded branches of a militant anti-war group, the Women's Peace Army, in Brisbane, Melbourne, and Sydney. According to Marilyn Lake (1999), meetings were often opened by John, a celebrated vocalist who sang popular anti-war songs considered so influential in shifting public opinion against the war and hampering recruitment that they were outlawed in the War Precautions Act of 1915. Also formed was the Sisterhood of International Peace, which would later become the Australian chapter of the worldwide (and still active) Women's International League for Peace and Freedom. Proponents of feminist pacifism also worked within other organizations with anti-war aims, such as the Australian Freedom League, which most notably fought compulsory conscription and military training, referred to as "military tyranny."

World War II saw similar anti-war movements, although, as in much of the world, peace activists were sometimes split by the complexities of simultaneously opposing war and fascism. Many groups, however, stood their ground, such as the Labor Anti-War Committee of the Australian Labor Party, who, in a 1935 pamphlet entitled "Labor's Case Against War and Fascism," called for the "application of science to the social betterment of the entire people" rather than "to the purposes of death and destruction in the interests of an exploiting minority of capitalists." The recurrence of such a great war so soon after World War I, for the Australian Labor Party in its greater social analysis, signaled an incriminating failure of the capitalist social system itself.

The Korean War marked the beginning of what would become a long legacy of Australian resistance to wars of US imperialism. The issue of safety was magnified during the Korean War for Australians, as many feared that the country's proximity to the war-torn region would increase the threat of attack if Australia involved itself in the warfare. In 1950, more than half a million people supported the Australian Peace Council in its statement that Australian involvement in the Korean War would not only be a danger to the Australian people, but would implicate Australia in what was viewed as an unjust obstruction to that country's right to self-determination. The US was further accused of denying the right of the Korean people to choose their own form of government, thus violating tenets of the Marshall Plan and contravening a United Nations charter. Because the US promulgated dubious claims of Soviet aggression toward Korea, the Australian anti-war movement claimed the US misrepresented security information to instill fear in the international community in order to garner support and military assistance. Activists staged prolonged campaigns aimed at informing the Australian people of these issues.

Less than two decades later, similar criticisms were launched during the US war in Vietnam. The anti-war movement in Australia visibly emerged in 1965, where Sydney's first anti-war rally was held at the US consulate in Sydney and organized by the Eureka Youth League, a youth organization affiliated with the Communist Party of Australia (CPA), just before Australia announced that it would send troops to Vietnam. After the announcement, hundreds of protesters gathered in front of Parliament

House. A year later when US President Lyndon B. Johnson visited Australia, he was met by over 10,000 protesters. Groups such as Vietnam Action Committee (VAC), Australian Student Labor Federation, Association of International Cooperation and Disarmament (AICD), and unaligned student activists proved intrinsic to organizing future actions. Multiple anti-war publications began circulating the nation. Coalitions of mothers also proliferated to demand their sons never be conscripted to join the war. By 1970 the anti-war movement had spread widely, and it continued until 1975, when the war was over and Direct Action, a popular anti-war movement monthly, ran the headline "A Victory for All Humanity."

The Australian movement against the US war with Iraq began, as in much of the world, before the war commenced in March of 2003. Though opposition to Australia's involvement in the Iraq War was evident in media outlets and in public discourse earlier, massive anti-war sentiment made itself known the weekend of February 14, 2003 when an estimated 150,000 to 200,000 demonstrators marched on the streets of Melbourne (with smaller demonstrations throughout Australia) during the global days of action organized by anti-war and peace activists around the world. Resistance to the Iraq War in general, as well as Australian participation in the war in particular, has been pervasive since the onset of the war. Anti-war activists in Australia have been credited with some victories, including Prime Minister Rudd's withdrawal of 550 Australian troops in June of 2008, and continue to challenge the legitimacy of the war in Iraq as well as US imperialism and the proliferation of US military bases around the world.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Vietnam War Movement, Britain; Anti-Vietnam War Movement, United States; Anti-War Movement, Iraq; Australia, New Social Movements; Australian Left; Communist Party of Australia; Women's Movement, Australia

References and Suggested Readings

- Lake, M. (1999) Getting Equal: The History of Australian Feminism. St. Leonards, NSW: Allen & Unwin.
- Marshall, J. V. (1969) World of the Living Dead and Jail from Within. Sydney: Wentworth Press.
- Moore, E. (1949) The Quest for Peace as I Have Known it in Australia. Available at www.reasoninrevolt.net.au/pdf/a000699.pdf (accessed July 16, 2008).

Australia, new social movements

Sean Scalmer

Since the early twentieth century, the term “social movements” has been used to denote socialist and industrial campaigns of labor. “New social movements” are generally dated from the middle 1960s. The term was invented by a group of European thinkers impressed with the radicalism of contemporary protest and convinced of labor’s exhaustion. They depicted the “new” movements as critics of industrial society; advocates of post-material values; democratically organized; staffed by the new middle class; and devoted to the most radical and extra-parliamentary of actions. They were, so the argument ran, the social actors of the future (Touraine 1971; Offe 1985; Melucci 1989).

Many Australian radicals were impressed by these ideas, and they seemed to sum up the rhythms of recent history. From 1965, a wave of political protest crashed across the Australian polity. It began with protests against racial segregation, the Vietnam War, and conscription, and soon swept up students, trade unionists, indigenous people, Christian believers, and many else besides. “Black liberation” was followed by “women’s liberation,” “gay liberation,” and even “tree liberation” (Scalmer 2002). Opposition to the Vietnam War formed the center of political anger and dissent. However, younger activists also created “Free Universities,” scribbled manifestos, held conferences, and led occupations. The peak of political protest was not reached until 1971. In a few exhilarating years, a series of apparently “new” movements was imagined into sudden and exciting life.

Writing was important to all of these campaigns. Germaine Greer discovered The Female Eunuch and thereby fed the growth of women’s liberation. Dennis Altman helped to invent gay politics in Homosexual: Oppression or Liberation? Geoff Sharp and Doug White explained the rise of student protest with a theory of the “intellectually trained” that stimulated great excitement in their new journal, Arena. Later, Peter Singer opened a fresh front with Animal Liberation, and Helen Caldicott and Jim Falk championed the cause of anti-nuclear disarmament. These were more than local contributions. Most of these writers were published internationally, and they had a substantial impact on radicals outside of Australia.

Unlike the supporters of the Australian labor movement, this new generation of “social movement” activists were also university intellectuals. The possibility of holding these dual identities represented an important shift. The boundaries between the academy and the street were increasingly crossed over the 1970s and 1980s. If the campus had been radicalized, then the politics of dissent had also become an object of acceptable academic contemplation. As a result, scholarship was considerably changed.

Adherents of the new social movements reshaped the institutions of higher education. New journals were launched in the fields of political economy, feminism, and social theory. Courses were also established in these fields, sometimes after long struggle with resistant universities. In later years, histories of the new movements tumbled forth, but also more critical studies, seeking to diagnose the structures of racial and sexual difference, and to ponder the procedures of tenable reform.

The Labor Party was receptive to some of these developments. This was strongly evident in the program of the Whitlam government (1972–5), and also in the more cautious activity of its successors, the Hawke–Keating governments (1983–96). Labor administrations in the states also provided opportunities for change. In consequence, “femocrats” entered the bureaucracy over the 1970s and 1980s as directors of new programs devoted to gender equity. There were also initiatives dedicated to the recognition of multiculturalism and the rights of indigenous peoples. And the rise of environmentalism led to the establishment of consultative mechanisms to promote “economically sustainable development.”

Outside of the bureaucracy and the parties of labor, further institutional changes were evident. Advocacy groups became increasingly professionalized and expert. In the 1980s, some of them formed close ties with a party dedicated to liberalism, the Australian Democrats. Then, in 1993, a national Green Party was formed, building upon preexistent organizations and campaigns in a number of states. Over recent elections, the Greens have consolidated their support and have gained important representation in the upper houses of most Australian parliaments. Their policies address wider issues than environmental collapse, and at present they are the major electoral alternative to the parties of labor and conservatism.

The overall trajectory of the “new social movements” has therefore largely conformed to the pattern set by the Australian labor movement 100 years earlier: protest has been met by integration and institution-building; while revolution has not occurred, successful reforms have been enacted, and moderate social improvements achieved. Onlookers have seldom grasped these historical parallels, however.

From the later 1980s, a strong political reaction to the “new movements” began to gather pace. Drawing inspiration from American neo-conservatism, the Australian right developed a powerful critique of contemporary trends. Its leaders were scornful of the welfare state, derisive of “political correctness,” and celebratory of market forces. Their arguments won substantial support, and a conservative government ruled Australia from 1996 to 2007. Its leaders attacked the new social movements as “special interests,” “elites,” and spokespeople of a “victim industry.” They removed the funding previously enjoyed by advocacy groups and sought to silence dissent across the polity (Hamilton & Maddison 2007). The universities were mocked as cradles of propaganda, and their share of public funding was greatly reduced. And far-right movements opposed to immigration emerged as the most obvious signs of contemporary protest and dissent.

As a result, the theory of the “new social movements” was increasingly discredited. It is now generally accepted that its key theoretical insights were vastly overdrawn. The contrast between the “old” labor movement and the “new” social movements ignored the tendency for feminism and environmental activism to become institutionalized, as well as their sometimes hidden histories, before the radicalism of the 1960s. It blinded many to the contribution of working-class people to the “new” politics (see Burgmann & Burgmann 1998). At times, it became an unedifying means for middle-class intellectuals to proclaim their own importance (Burgmann & Milner 1996, for a critique). It cannot explain contemporary movements that respond directly to the globalization of people and of capital. It leaves the movements of the political right unexamined. And it offers little guidance as to “how” social movements (of all kinds) manage to mobilize politically.

In recent years, the concept of the “new social movements” has therefore lost its intellectual centrality. Attention has turned more squarely to globalization. Verity Burgmann (2003) has analyzed the global justice movement. Kevin McDonald (2006) has explored global movements of many different kinds. And other scholars have sought to document the tactical dilemmas common to a range of contemporary campaigns, and the attempts of activists to negotiate them (Scalmer 2002; Maddison & Scalmer 2006). The “new social movements” of Australia form part of a common field of protest, rebellion, and reform, and are no longer regarded as the central actors of the future.

SEE ALSO: Aboriginal/Left Struggle for Land Rights; Anarchism, Australia; Anti-Nuclear Protest Movements; Australia, Anti-War Movement; Australian Aboriginal Protests; Australian Left; Ecological Protest Movements; Global Justice Movement and Resistance; Green Bans Movement, Australia; Lesbian, Gay, Transsexual, Bisexual Movements, Australia; Student Movements; Women’s Movement, Australia

References and Suggested Readings

- Burgmann, M. & Burgmann, V. (1998) Green Bans, Red Union: Environmental Activism and the New South Wales Builders’ Labourers’ Federation. Sydney: UNSW Press.
- Burgmann, V. (2003) Power, Profit and Protest: Australian Social Movements and Globalisation. Sydney: Allen & Unwin.
- Burgmann, V. & Milner, A. (1996) Intellectuals and the New Social Movements. In R. Kuhn & T. O’Lincoln (Eds.), Class and Class Conflict in Australia. Melbourne: Longman Australia, pp. 114–30.
- Doyle, T. J. (2000) Green Power: The Environment Movement in Australia. Sydney: UNSW Press.
- Hamilton, C. & Maddison, S. (Eds.) (2007) Silencing Dissent: How the Australian Government is Controlling Public Opinion and Stifling Debate. St. Leonards, NSW: Allen & Unwin.
- McDonald, K. (2006) Global Movements: Action and Culture. Malden, MA: Blackwell.
- Maddison, S. & Scalmer, S. (2006) Activist Wisdom: Practical Knowledge and Creative Tension in Social Movements. Sydney: UNSW Press.
- Melucci, A. (1989) Nomads of the Present: Social Movements and Individual Needs in Contemporary Society. Philadelphia: Temple University Press.
- Offe, C. (1985) New Social Movements: Challenging the Boundaries of Institutional Politics. Social Research 2 (4): 817–68.
- Scalmer, S. (2002) Dissent Events: Protest, the Media and the Political Gimmick in Australia. Sydney: UNSW Press.

Touraine, A. (1971) The Post-Industrial Society: Tomorrow's Social History: Classes, Conflicts and Culture in the Programmed Society. New York: Random House.

Australian aboriginal protests

Gary Foley

Australian indigenous political resistance of the modern era can be traced to the first aboriginal political organization, the Australian Aboriginal Progressive Association (AAPA), established in 1924 by aboriginal wharfies (members of the Maritime Union of Australia) Fred Maynard and Tom Lacey. The AAPA had in part been inspired by Jamaican Marcus Garvey and shared the motto of Garvey's Universal Negro Improvement Association: "One God, One Aim, One Destiny." The AAPA stood for self-determination, economic independence, and land rights for aboriginal people, and its adaptation and incorporation of the ideas of Garvey demonstrates a far higher level of political sophistication than white Australian historians have ever acknowledged. Operations of the AAPA were largely restricted to the north coast of New South Wales (NSW). It managed to last only four years due to intense police and Aborigines Protection Board harassment, but the AAPA nurtured the flame of resistance, embedded ideas of self-reliance and independence, and was to have a powerful influence on the next generation of NSW indigenous activists in the 1930s.

Between the late 1920s and mid-1930s, Salt Pan Creek, an aboriginal squatters' camp southwest of Sydney containing dispossessed refugee families of NSW and people seeking to escape the harsh and brutal policies of the Aborigines Protection Board, became a focal point of intensifying aboriginal resistance in NSW. Significant alliances, strategies, and future leaders were developed at Salt Pan Creek. People such as Jack Campbell, George and Jack Patten, Pearl Gibbs, and Bill Onus all spent time in the camp. In 1933 Joe Anderson was filmed at Salt Pan Creek by Cinesound News making a strong statement in support of indigenous land rights. Thus the spirit of resistance had a strong focal point until new organizations were developed.

A decade after the AAPA succumbed to police and Aborigines Protection Board pressure, two new indigenous political organizations emerged, one in Melbourne and one in Sydney. In the Melbourne suburb of Fitzroy during the 1930s a growing aboriginal community saw an influx of refugees from the bitter struggle on Cummeragunja reserve on the NSW/Victorian border. Among these dispossessed and disaffected refugees were William Cooper, Bill Onus, Marge Tucker, and Doug Nicholls, who in 1936 were among the founders of the Australian Aborigines League (AAL). AAL membership was open to all Aborigines, and the aim of the group was "to gain for aboriginal people those civil and human rights denied since occupation."

One year later in NSW former shearer Bill Ferguson joined forces with Jack Patten and established the NSW Aborigines Progressive Association (APA). The APA was created as a follow-up organization to the earlier AAPA. Jack Patten had links with the old AAPA, and interestingly, so too did the AAL's Bill Onus. Thus the two new organizations were regarded as the next generation of the resistance. In 1938, on the occasion of the 150th anniversary celebrations of white settlement, the two organizations joined forces to mount a protest. William Cooper of the AAL declared January 26, 1938 as a Day of Mourning, and a protest meeting was held in Sydney. This protest was a great success in terms of the national and international attention it attracted. The protests were successful despite difficult and tough times for aboriginal political organizers, who were subject to a broad range of restrictive and discriminatory state laws that controlled the movement of indigenous people.

The particular methodology of the 1938 protest marked the start of a long strategy by the indigenous resistance of challenging the popular myths of white Australia in a variety of ingenious, satirical, and subversive ways. The Day of Mourning protest left a profound imprint on the consciousness of a generation of political activists, and the leaders of the 1938 action all went on to become enormously influential in indigenous politics for the next 30 years. They would collectively mentor the next generation of activists that emerged in the 1950s and 1960s.

In 1958 the first national indigenous political organization was founded in Adelaide. The Federal Council of Aboriginal Affairs (FCAA) was created as a national voice for indigenous people, yet paradoxically at the inaugural meeting of the 25 people who were there, only three (Bert

Demonstrators demanding Aboriginal indigenous land rights at the 1982 Commonwealth Games in Brisbane, Australia, march without a permit. A state of emergency was declared by the premier, Malcolm Fraser, making street protests illegal, resulting in the arrest of hundreds of indigenous protesters and their supporters. (© Penny Tweedie/CORBIS)

Groves, Doug Nicholls, and Jeff Barnes) were aboriginal. As the organization grew, the dominance of non-indigenous people on its governing committee became entrenched, and even as it changed its name at its Easter conference in 1964, there were rumblings of aboriginal discontent at the lack of indigenous control. Before that discontent surfaced, there were two major events in the late 1960s that had a powerful effect on the younger generation of that era on all parts of the continent.

In 1965 an ex-soccer player and aboriginal student at Sydney University, Charles Perkins, led a group of white students on a bus tour into some of the most racist country towns and into history. What we now know today as the 1965 Freedom Ride was inspired by an action of the same name conducted by activists in the civil rights movement in the US earlier that decade. Like their American counterparts, Perkins and the students deliberately confronted segregation and racism in such notorious towns as Moree, Walgett, and Bowraville and not only generated riots and outrage, but also headlines around the world. The Freedom Ride exposed Australian racism to the world and as such was a significant embarrassment to the Australian government and nation. It had the much more important effect of radicalizing a new generation of activists who were teenagers when the Freedom Ride passed through their towns, and they saw the local white racist establishment exposed and shamed in the most powerful way. This left a deep impression in the minds of such people as Lyall Munro Jr., Billy Craigie, Michael Anderson, Lyn Thompson, and Gary Williams.

In 1967 the Federal Council for Aborigines and Torres Strait Islanders (FCAATSI, its name changed in 1964) ran a national campaign to change the constitution to make the federal government, rather than the states, responsible for aboriginal affairs. It was felt that the Commonwealth would be able to deliver a standard and more compassionate administration of indigenous affairs than the notoriously negligent and racist state regimes. The concept of the referendum was imposed on the increasingly impatient younger generation by the “elders” of FCAATSI. The young people were told to assist in the campaign for a “Yes” vote, as that would be the answer to indigenous people’s ongoing oppression and marginalization.

When the referendum resulted in the biggest “Yes” vote in Australian history, the old guard of the aboriginal movement effectively declared the battle won. However, nothing really changed. In fact, in southern states, things got significantly worse as the NSW government repealed its Aborigines Welfare Board and withdrew administration from the 45 reserves around the state, effectively abandoning more than 40,000 aboriginal people. This led to considerable discontent on the part of the younger generation, whose white counterparts were challenging the white political mainstream over issues concerning imperialism and neo-colonialism (in the Vietnam War) and personal freedom. Between 1968 and 1970 at the annual FCAATSI conference in Canberra, there were a series of increasingly intense confrontations between indigenous representatives and the organizational leadership who were mostly non-indigenous. Young indigenous activists were arguing for “Black control of Black Affairs,” which was also being promoted as the idea of Black Power.

The term Black Power had entered the Australian vernacular in 1969 when an incident occurred at the Aborigines Advancement League (not to be confused with the AAL of the 1930s) in Melbourne. The incident itself was very mild and innocuous in that it was a short talk and press conference held at the League by West Indian academic Professor Roosevelt-Brown, an advocate of Black Power. The Australian media artificially contrived a controversy out of the incident by equating the term Black Power with “black violence and anarchy,” playing on the fears of an already xenophobic Australian public. Thus the term Black Power became synonymous with evil.

The aboriginal political movement split into two distinct camps in 1970 when the annual FCAATSI conference that year resulted in a confrontation between those who believed in Black Power (aboriginal control of FCAATSI) and those who believed in maintaining the status quo (mostly whites and older aboriginal delegates). When the Black Power delegates lost the vote for aboriginal control of FCAATSI, they split and formed a new body, the National Tribal Council. More importantly, younger activists in Sydney, Brisbane, and Melbourne were developing their own ideas and methods.

In Sydney’s inner-city suburb of Redfern, an aboriginal community of some 25,000 people had grown since the mid-1960s as part of an exodus from rural settlements and reserves to inner-city Sydney. Redfern in 1971 was the largest aboriginal community in Australia, comprising more than 10,000 landless refugees from the old apartheid system of the NSW Protection Board. This was an impoverished but dynamic, struggling community which developed its own social networks and entertainment. But it also attracted an undue amount of attention from the local police force, which began to conduct a protracted campaign of harassment and intimidation of the Redfern black community. Certain younger members of the community who had been radicalized by the Freedom Ride and gained political experience in the campaign for the 1967 Referendum began a discussion group that became known as the Black Caucus. This group began to consume radical anti-imperialist political literature and, because of contact with black US soldiers in Sydney on R&R from the Vietnam War, developed a close interest in such US groups as the Black Panther Party in California.

Utilizing tactics partly adopted and adapted from the US, and partly developed along indigenous philosophies, the young Redfern radicals began to create local community self-help organizations such as free shopfront legal aid centers, community controlled free health clinics, housing cooperatives, and a Breakfast for Children program. The early success of these self-determination ventures coincided with an intensification of street demonstrations in support of a campaign for land rights. Redfern activists such as Paul Coe began attending anti-Vietnam War demonstrations, challenging the young white student radicals about their own racism, and taunting them with accusations of hypocrisy.

In 1971 the Australian anti-apartheid movement staged major demonstrations against a touring white South African rugby team, and again Coe and fellow members of the Redfern Black Caucus challenged white protestors about why they were not supporting the land rights campaign. This time the anti-apartheid movement accepted the challenge and began to organize joint demonstrations with Koori activists. These demonstrations led to a series of violent confrontations in Sydney, Brisbane, and Melbourne, increasing mainstream community fears about a violent form of Black Power. In early January 1972, a front-page article in the New York Times reported the “emergence of a militant black power movement among dissatisfied young Aborigines” that was said to be stirring Australia.

All of this action, plus the handing down of the Gove Land Rights case, compelled Prime Minister William McMahon to make a major policy statement on aboriginal land rights. McMahon decided to make this statement on the symbolically powerful and politically contentious day known to white Australia as Australia Day and to indigenous peoples as Invasion Day. The statement essentially denied the right of aboriginal people to land, and it triggered widespread outrage in indigenous communities nationwide. That night in Redfern the Black Caucus dispatched a group of four young men – Michael Anderson, Billy Craigie, Bert Williams, and Tony Coorey – to Canberra to set up a protest on the lawns of Parliament House. The idea of the protest was originally simply to stage a small demonstration, be arrested, and hope that the media would take photos before the men were dragged away. This would make the point that aboriginal people were rejecting the McMahon Australia Day statement, and would hopefully keep media interest high until a major demonstration was organized for that weekend. But this plan went spectacularly wrong, to the pleasant surprise of everyone but the McMahon government.

The young Redfern activists duly arrived on the lawns of Parliament House and set up a beach umbrella with the sign “Aboriginal Embassy.” This was the idea of Tony Coorey, a poet, who said, “The PM’s statement has effectively declared us aliens in our own land. If so, we should have an embassy like all the other aliens.” When the ACT police arrived, they informed the protestors that there seemed to be no appropriate law to prevent them camping. The group was told by police that if they only had 11 tents they could not be moved. If they had 12 tents they could be deemed a camping area and evicted. To the amazement of the activists, and everyone else, they had accidentally discovered a loophole in ACT laws whereby it was not actually illegal to camp on the lawns of Parliament House.

The next day the campers installed a proper tent to serve as the “office” of the Aboriginal Embassy and in front of the tent placed a letter-box on top of a pole. The following day mail started to be delivered. The Embassy rapidly became the most popular new tourist attraction in the national capital. Tourist bus operators began delivering their busloads of tourists to the Embassy, where they would be given talks about land rights by the Embassy crew and asked for donations and to sign a petition before trooping off to visit Parliament House across the road. The protest rapidly became a great success, enjoying broad community support to an extent rarely seen in indigenous affairs. This was in part due to the larrikin appeal of a protest that snubbed the authorities and was simultaneously peaceful and highly creative, and also due to the extensive publicity it received both nationally and internationally. Television crews from more than thirty countries filmed and broadcast stories about the Embassy and the situation of aboriginal peoples in Australia. Among the international media that covered the Embassy were the Guardian, the New York Times, Le Figaro, Time magazine, the Israeli Post, Le Monde, and newspapers from such faraway places as Norway, Jamaica, Malaysia, and New Delhi. With that sort of local and international media coverage it very quickly became apparent that the Embassy protest was becoming a major political embarrassment for the McMahon government.

The most important development occurred in February when opposition leader Gough Whitlam visited the Embassy and was challenged by Paul Coe about ALP Aboriginal Affairs policy which, Coe asserted, was little different from the position of the McMahon government’s. Whitlam’s response was to change ALP policy to support land rights for aboriginal people.

This was a significant moment in Australian history and would directly result in 1976 in the Northern Territory Land Rights Act.

This proved too much for the McMahon government, which had been extremely embarrassed and flummoxed by the campers on their lawn. So McMahon moved, in May 1972, to create a new law making it illegal to camp on the lawns of parliament. That law became reality on the morning of July 20, 1972, when the Trespass on Commonwealth Lands Ordinance was gazetted. Within 20 minutes of the new ordinance coming into effect, ACT police moved on the Embassy and forcibly removed the tents in the midst of a brawl in which nine protestors were arrested and many more were injured.

The televised images of the forced removal of the Embassy were shown around the nation and around the world, to the further embarrassment of the McMahon government. Three days later more than 2,000 indigenous people and their supporters marched on Parliament House and re-erected the Embassy. They linked arms around the tent, forming a solid wall of people and defying the police. In the resulting melee, many were injured, and 18 people were arrested. Again, the violent scenes were broadcast around the world and a week later more than 3,000 people marched on parliament and set up the Embassy again.

This time they were confronted by overwhelming force in the form of ACT police backed up by two contingents from the NSW Police Riot Squad and several busloads of soldiers from the Royal Military College at Duntroon, which was also on special alert in case more troops were needed. In the face of such assembled force, the leaders of the demonstration (conscious of the numerous elderly and children in their ranks) decided to seize the high moral ground and claim victory by peacefully allowing the police to remove the tents from over the heads of a token delegation. This generated TV news footage that enabled the Embassy campers to claim a “moral victory” and further undermine the image and standing of the McMahon government. These events directly contributed to the rapid demise of the McMahon administration which, six months later, in December 1972, was voted out of office in one of the biggest political landslides in Australian history.

The Aboriginal Embassy protest of 1972 initiated more than a decade of high-profile indigenous protest actions that placed questions of land rights, sovereignty, and self-determination firmly on the national political agenda ever since. It also created a greater international awareness of the local indigenous struggle for justice.

Indigenous people in Australia had high expectations when Gough Whitlam was elected prime minister of a Labor government in December 1972. The Whitlam government's two major indigenous policy initiatives were the establishment of the first national, elected indigenous representative body, the National Aboriginal Consultative Committee (NACC), and the framing of the 1976 Aboriginal Land Rights Act (Northern Territory), which was later passed by the Fraser Liberal government. However, despite Whitlam establishing some limited reforms in the area of aboriginal affairs, his tenure as PM was cut short in 1975 and indigenous political activists were upset at a return to a conservative Liberal government in Canberra. This led to the aboriginal political movement seeking greater international links and support when the National Aboriginal and Islander Health Organization (NAIHO) set up an "information center" in London and began organizing support for aboriginal rights all over Europe.

In keeping with the tactic of embarrassing the Australian government in the international political arena, aboriginal activists organized major demonstrations at the Brisbane Commonwealth Games in 1982. These demonstrations saw hundreds of aboriginal people arrested on numerous occasions as the state government had implemented anti-demonstration laws that made it illegal for more than three people to gather in public in Brisbane for the duration of the Games. The resultant mass arrests made headlines around the world and proved an extreme embarrassment for the Federal government of Malcolm Fraser, who was until then enjoying a positive image from his efforts to assist in negotiating a peaceful settlement to racial problems in Rhodesia.

In 1983 a Labor government returned to Canberra with former trade union leader Bob Hawke as prime minister. Hawke had come to power ostensibly strongly committed to granting aboriginal people land rights in the form of "national, uniform land rights legislation," utilizing Commonwealth government powers gained in the 1967 referendum. The promised legislation would, according to Hawke, be along the lines of the federal 1976 Aboriginal Land Rights Act (NT) that enabled aboriginal people to gain land in freehold title, and state government opposition would be overridden by federal legislation. The Hawke government's commitment to aboriginal land rights came at the end of a decade of effective peaceful and creative protest actions by the aboriginal political movement, and Hawke was initially praised by aboriginal activists.

However, in a matter of months, Hawke did a political backflip when he reversed his position on land rights after an intense, racially charged, multi-million dollar advertising campaign mounted by vested interests in the mining and pastoral industries. The final nail in the coffin of freehold title land rights came after a meeting between PM Hawke and the Labor premier of Western Australia, Brian Bourke, who was acting as an advocate of the powerful WA mining lobby. (Bourke would some years later be exposed as a corrupt politician who ultimately was jailed for his activities, but would continue to be an ALP powerbroker for decades to come.) After Hawke met with Bourke, the prime minister revoked his earlier strong statements on aboriginal land rights and instead claimed that mining interests were the "national interest" and would be protected. This instantly incurred the wrath of the aboriginal community, where activists declared that they would mount major protests at the forthcoming 1988 Australian Bicentennial celebrations.

Given the effectiveness of the 1982 Brisbane Commonwealth Games demonstrations, the Hawke government was understandably nervous about the prospect of indigenous anger being expressed during the Bicentennial year. The Hawke government decided that it would be necessary to offer some items of appeasement to aboriginal anger and announced several significant reforms to that end. The first was a major reform of the old, hated Department of Aboriginal Affairs (DAA), which was given some minor cosmetic changes, along with attaching a component of elected representatives and a new name, ATSIC. Because this ill-conceived organization was cobbled together in a climate of political expediency it was destined to fail, which it ultimately did more than a decade later in spectacular fashion with its cynical architects blaming aboriginal people for its demise.

Another Hawke government initiative that would have long-term divisive effect was the creation, by an Act of parliament, of the Council for Aboriginal Reconciliation (CAR). The government at that time wanted to deflect public attention from Hawke's backflip on land rights and defuse the resultant aboriginal community anger. So, to get everyone talking about something else, they had pulled the reconciliation rabbit out of the hat. The problem was, as aboriginal activists pointed out, that this notion of reconciliation was not an issue that had emerged spontaneously from either the indigenous or non-indigenous communities, and was certainly not on the indigenous political agenda. Thus the issue and debate about reconciliation would divert and dilute debate for the next two decades and beyond.

Unfortunately for the Hawke government, these attempts to redirect aboriginal energies away from Bicentennial protest failed spectacularly when the biggest assembly and protest march by aboriginal people in Australian history was held peacefully in central Sydney in the heart of the Bicentennial celebrations. Two hundred years after the invasion, the survivors of the original Australians declared to the world that "We Have Survived" and that the struggle for justice continued.

The international interest in the Australian indigenous struggle for justice, generated largely by the activists at the 1972 Aboriginal Embassy action, has continued to bedevil and embarrass subsequent Australian governments' attempts to downplay the issue in international forums. The Embassy should be regarded as the apex of the indigenous peoples' struggle for justice in the twentieth century, and the moment that the world realized that Australia's indigenous population had not all "died out" as the assimilationist Australian government propaganda had claimed, but rather had developed throughout the twentieth century a highly sophisticated resistance struggle. From 1972 until the 1990s this indigenous political movement dominated debate on issues of race relations and justice in Australia, and it was not until the Mabo High Court decision and the subsequent and deeply flawed Native Title Act, as well as the advent of the extremely conservative Liberal government of John Howard, that the pendulum began to swing the other way.

SEE ALSO: Australia, Anti-War Movement; Australia, New Social Movements; Australian Left; Canada,

Indigenous Resistance; Garvey, Marcus (1887–1940) and Garveyism; Native American Protest, 20th Century

References and Suggested Readings

- Attwood, B. & Markus, A. (1999) The Struggle for Aboriginal Rights: A Documentary History. Sydney: Allen & Unwin Academic.
- Broome, R. (1982) Aboriginal Australians. Sydney: Allen & Unwin.
- Libby, R. T. (1992) Hawke's Law: The Politics of Mining and Aboriginal Land Rights in Australia. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press.
- Lippmann, L. (1981) Generations of Resistance: The Aboriginal Struggle for Justice. Melbourne: Longman Cheshire.
- Peterson, N. & Langton, M. (Eds.) (1983) Aboriginal Land and Land Rights. Canberra: Australian Institute of Aboriginal Studies.
- Wills, N. (1982) Give Me Back My Dreaming: Background to the Australian Aboriginal Claim to Land Rights. Melbourne: Communist Arts Group.

Australian labor movement

Sean Scalmer

The long history of the Australian labor movement discloses a pattern of precocious advance, swift integration, periodic challenge, and recent exhaustion. Revolution has loomed as a common fear, a marginal cause, but never a likely prospect.

European Australia began as a penal colony in 1788. By the third decade of the new century, the skilled male workers of the new cities had begun to form their own associations. These consolidated an already strong group identity and secured a range of protections: subscription to benefit funds; resistance to the employment of convicts and apprentices; guarantees of workmanship; maintenance of a fair price.

The circumstances for rapid unionization were propitious. With the discovery of gold in the summer of 1851, a long economic boom began. Unionists took advantage of the new conditions. In 1856 stonemasons in Melbourne and Sydney pressed for and won an eight-hour day. Workers in other trades struggled for their own improvements in a series of strikes, and in 1883 one observer claimed that the "eight-hour system" was generally accepted across the land.

Now the spirit of unionism spread to less skilled workers, among them wharf laborers, miners, shearers, tailoresses, and salesmen. These workers lacked the prestige of their more respectable comrades. Without the protections of trade, their methods were necessarily more aggressive, their fellowship wider, and their challenge sharper. The organizations they established were dubbed “new unions”; they enrolled mass memberships, and they claimed wide aims.

By the end of the nineteenth century, this growing movement comprised a political as well as an industrial challenge. More than 100 labor newspapers were established over the three decades from 1870. Labor’s devotees created their own schools, libraries, and bookstores. Historians canonized the movement’s successes, and annual processions celebrated the winning of the eight-hour day. Agitators attracted large audiences when they stood on rough platforms and spoke of a new and just order. The unions formed central bodies to expand their association at this time: the Trades and Labor Councils of major cities and towns. These were the parliaments of the workers, and their members soon massed in great, bold, stately buildings.

This remained an exclusive movement, however. Unionists dreamt of an Australia that was “white, pure and industrially good” (McQueen 1975: 24), and racism drew a line across the labor force. Those workers deemed non-white were typically forbidden membership in the labor family. When they tried to form their own organizations, these were shunned, too. And despite women’s central contributions to industrial struggle, their unions remained weak and marginal and their working conditions poor.

Nonetheless, the advance of organized male labor was general enough to frighten many employers. From the middle of the 1880s, they began to form their own associations. From August 1890 a series of industrial disputes pit the powers of capital against labor: a maritime strike; shearers’ and seamen’s strikes; the repeated locking-out of miners. These were conflicts of desperate extremity and enduring rancor. Special constables and soldiers buttressed the resources of conventional police. Leading militants were arrested at bayonet point and marched through the city streets in chains. Magistrates punished strikers for breach of contract, or with crimes of conspiracy and sedition. With the connivance of colonial governments, the employers emerged victorious, and the unions were smashed. Some disappointed radicals left for Paraguay, to found

The campaign for an eight-hour workday by unskilled and rural workers led to several strikes in Australia during the 1890s. Protesters calling for an eight-hour day are depicted marching through Melbourne on May 1, 1895. These events eventually led to the formation of the Australian Labor Party and the organization of trade unions in the twentieth century. (Courtesy of the State Library of Victoria) a utopian community (a “New Australia”). Everywhere, the optimism of Australia’s youth seemed now embittered and concerned citizens sought a new means of bringing order and peace.

The “great strikes” of the 1890s bequeathed two institutions. Both had a decisive impact on the career of labor: advancing the movement’s immediate interests, but also containing the prospects of revolution.

The Labor Parties established in various colonies were an experimental response to recent defeat. Their original impulses lay in the recognition of defeated strikers: “trade unionists must use the parliamentary machinery as it has in the past used them.” The new institutions were commonly acknowledged as a collective challenge to bourgeois democracy. Labor’s policies were formed by a conference, made up of delegates from affiliated unions and local branches. Its representatives elected to parliament were pledged to vote as a bloc and to enact conference decisions. In this way, the autonomy of the politician was superseded by the solidarity of the delegate; the policies “to be submitted to the people” would now be “determined by the people” (Childe 1923: 28).

These unfamiliar Labor Parties stormed into colonial parliaments from 1891, and then into the new Commonwealth Parliament after the Federation of 1901. Australians elected the first Labor governments in the world. These were formally dedicated to a “socialism” defined with increasing (if still slight) rigor over the first decades of the twentieth century. Their achievements were limited, but genuine: the nurturing of unionism; the regulation of minimum standards; the extension of state enterprises; old-age pensions; child endowment; and then, after World War II, a more substantial welfare state. Some international visitors thought Australia a beacon of reform in the years before mid-century; local worthies declared pride in their undoubted achievements.

However, Labor governments also disappointed many. Australian Labor firmly rejected revolutionary politics and consistently repressed more radical movements. It developed an internal culture dominated by deal-making and oligarchic control. Politicians refused the dictation of conference. The party split and its leaders repeatedly defected during moments of political and economic crisis: World War I, the Depression, and the Cold War. Looking across the decades, Labor’s time in office was comparatively brief, and its formal dedication to “socialism” was consistently blocked by political timidity and constitutional impediments. Critics have derided the party as “laborist” rather than “socialist.” Labor’s champions have embraced the former label, proclaiming the virtues of a “civilized capitalism” and the intrinsic rewards of political longevity.

For good or ill, Labor governments were keen supporters of a second antipodean departure: the system of compulsory wage arbitration. This described special courts established from the middle 1890s to regulate industrial relations and to avoid long-running disputes. In the event of strikes or lockouts, arbitration courts were empowered to direct a reconciliation of disputants. And if agreement could not be reached, then they could also enforce a settlement.

These new institutions reshaped the conditions of employment. In a landmark judgment of 1907 (the “Harvester Case”), Justice Higgins of the Commonwealth Court determined the payment of a “fair and reasonable” wage for an unskilled laborer. In order to make precise calculations, the judge imagined a family of five living in frugal comfort, with the wife and children dependants of the man. The cost of housing, clothing, food, transport, and moderate amusements was calculated, and this became known as the “basic wage.” The new standard was extended across the workforce over subsequent years and regularly adjusted for changes in the cost of living. It became bedrock for all white, employed males. From this point, the vicissitudes of the market were supplanted by the determinations of law. A “new province of law and order,” to adopt a phrase of Higgins, was born.

Arbitration courts offered legal recognition for unions and a formal process of register. The maintenance of the basic wage ensured that white Australian men would never be employed at starvation wages. As a result, unionism quickly rebounded. On the brink of the Great War, 33 percent of employees held a union card. At this time, Australians were more likely to combine for industrial protection than any other people in the world.

However, not all unionists were enamored of the new order. It was a condition of an arbitration court judgment that workers accept the court’s decision without demur. The new courts possessed “penal powers” to discipline the unruly and these were rapidly reinforced by a brace of further legislation. Unsurprisingly, the unions nurtured by arbitration were therefore often small, defensive, and competitive. They spent scarce resources in lengthy court submissions and built fragile empires through judicial favor. Legal and political preoccupations now increasingly displaced the immediacy of direct action and popular involvement.

Moreover, the protections of the “basic wage” were limited. The court assumed that male workers supported their wives and children; women, by contrast, were assumed to support only themselves. They were paid at a lesser rate, and corralled into a limited range of occupations. Aboriginal workers faced a similar fate. And even white men went hungry in frequent moments of economic downturn and insecure employment.

Not surprisingly, the most radical protests of the twentieth century therefore emanated from those citizens least protected by this patchy regime. The pattern is clear. Unemployed and irregularly employed workers were the major supporters of the most revolutionary organizations: the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) and the Communist Party of Australia. Women launched protests and strikes for equal pay over several decades. Aboriginal workers consistently fought for improved pay; one of their struggles, the Wave Hill dispute of 1966, became a successful fight for land rights. Postwar migrants, excluded from meaningful union protection, demanded justice in wildcat strikes that over the 1960s and 1970s were not supported by officialdom.

These were all challenges to the priorities of the labor movement and to the leadership of its officials. They were typically succeeded by a renovation of union structures and by an attempt to widen the family of labor. In this way, the failures of the movement were successively addressed by the energy and the radicalism of those most excluded from its protections. Slowly, the principles of unionism were extended across the lines of gender and race.

However, the apparently settled structures of the labor movement were also periodically convulsed by more widespread instabilities. Australia participated in three major wars over the twentieth century: the Great War, from 1914; World War II, from 1939; and the Vietnam War, from 1965. Each moment was associated with heightened industrial conflict, skepticism toward arbitration, and the language of revolutionary aspiration. Insurgent organizations enlivened labor's activities during each of these moments: the IWW, around World War I; the Communist Party of Australia, around World War II; the new left and new social movements, in the era of the Vietnam War.

Unionists were swept up in these developments. Many militants sought to build "One Big Union" under the influence of the IWW; communists led long-running strikes after World War II; radical unionists in New South Wales developed "green bans" against environmentally damaging development in close dialogue with the new left. The Labor Party's response to these episodes was typically more ambivalent. It repressed labor's most militant activists and organizations. However, the stirring of the wider movement also enlivened Labor's policies. The party formulated a more robust "socialization objective" in response to radicals in 1921. Under prime ministers John Curtin and Ben Chifley in the 1940s, it sought postwar reconstruction, a welfare state, and even attempted, unsuccessfully, to nationalize the private trading banks. The brief period of Whitlam government (1972–5) was marked by a more independent foreign policy, greatly enhanced provision of public education and health care, and an increasing sensitivity to inequalities of gender and race.

Since the middle 1970s, the labor movement has been in retreat. The protections of arbitration and the basic wage have been removed by successive governments. Employers have increasingly opposed unions as illegitimate intruders upon the intimate relationship between boss and worker. The old strongholds of blue-collar unionism have been swept away by economic change; contemporary workplaces are smaller, more diffuse, and harder to organize than ever before. Labor governments between 1982 and 1996 sought formal cooperation with the unions, but this often compromised the latter's ability to win rewards at the shop floor. Conservative governments from 1996 to 2007 sought to eliminate union influence, conspired with employers in notable disputes, and drafted strongly anti-union legislation.

It is therefore not surprising that union membership has fallen. From one in two workers at the beginning of the 1980s, it has recently fallen below one in five. The Labor Party was elected in 2007 with the strong support of the unions and promises of a more equitable industrial environment. However, the ties linking the unions and the party are no longer so close. They rest mostly on the career histories of leading politicians. While the need for working-class challenge to capitalism's inequalities has rarely been greater, the capacity of the Australian labor movement to lead that fight has rarely appeared so weak.

SEE ALSO: Aboriginal/Left Struggle for Land Rights; Anarchism, Australia; Australia, New Social Movements; Australian Left; Class Identity and Protest; Class Struggle; Communist Party of Australia; Green Bans Movement, Australia; Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), Australia

References and Suggested Readings

Burgmann, V. (1985) In Our Time: Socialism and the Rise of Labor, 1885–1905. Sydney: George Allen & Unwin.

- Burgmann, V. (1995) Revolutionary Industrial Unionism: The Industrial Workers of the World in Australia. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Childe, V. G. (1923) How Labour Governs: A Study of Workers' Representation in Australia. London: Labour Publishing Company. Available at www.reasoninrevolt.net.au/pdf/b000125.pdf (downloaded June 2008).
- Connell, R. W. & Irving, T. H. (1980) Class Structure in Australian History. Melbourne: Longman Cheshire.
- Macintyre, S. (1999) The Reds: The Communist Party of Australia from Origins to Illegality. St. Leonards, NSW: Allen & Unwin.
- McQueen, H. (1975) A New Britannia. Ringwood, Victoria: Penguin.
- Scalmer, S. (2006) The Little History of Australian Unionism. Carlton North, Victoria: Vulgar Press.

Australian left

Peter Beilharz

The left in Australia across the twentieth century had two main coordinates – the USSR and the Australian Labor Party (ALP). The mistake made by the Australian communists was to imagine that the experience of the Soviet Union was entirely relevant to Australia – but it was not. The mistake made by Australian radicals more generally was to imagine that the Labor Party would somehow become the vehicle or encourager of the cause of Australian socialism. They were also wrong, though they did much good work in the process of testing these fantasies.

Early Australian radicalism was much influenced by both American and British movements and ideas, from Bellamy to Henry George. Australian practices, such as arbitration and conciliation, which were forged in league with New Zealand, were in turn highly influential in the north. The left in Australia had a strong new liberal impulse, where the project of the state was seen to be that of civilizing capitalism. Other parallel trends like anarchism and syndicalism were equally apparent.

Provincial Labor governments were active from the 1890s. The Federal Labor Party agreed to a Socialization Objective in 1921, which, as elsewhere, functioned as the Sunday China. The Federal Labor government followed a deflationary policy in the Depression. The Golden Age of Labor emerged in the 1940s, in direct parallel to the British case, though with less success; there was nothing like the National Health Service introduced in Australia. National Fordism began to emerge into the 1940s, together with a Californian form of suburbia. From the 1950s, Labor was marginalized by the Cold War and the Democratic Labor Party split of 1955. A newly social democratic glaze adhered to the Whitlam government, elected in 1972 but dismissed by the vice-regal in 1975. Labor returned to office from 1983 to 1996 in the highly controversial “Labor Decade,” which combined some traditional commitments to social justice with serious steps toward economic deregulation. The apparent policy centerpiece of these years was the ALP–ACTU (Australian Council of Trade Unions) Accord, which looked like a social contract though it harbored many dreams attached to the idea of industry development policy and full employment. This was a particularly interesting moment in radical political and intellectual history, as some of the key actors in this process were communists or ex-communists whose great dream was to produce a robust economic base for national development, this at the very moment when globalization destroyed all such old modernizing hopes.

Federal Labor returned to power in 2007, looking again to modernize and to restore some aspects of an administrative social democratic tradition. But, needless to say, without even a word about socialism. The last Labor government to use this term, in the form of democratic socialism, was the Whitlam government of 1972–5, where the affiliations were with postwar British Fabianism. Labor has progressively moved to the right, or center, and taken much of the Australian left with it. The prospects of a globalized economy replaced those of localized innovation, this in Australia but also, more emphatically, in New Zealand, where Labor also pioneered the global project at the expense of the state tradition. In terms of political geography, the point is an important and overlooked one: developments in the antipodes led, first in the 1890s with innovations like Arbitration, then into the 1980s with deregulation.

The Labor Party has thus dominated the history of the left in Australia, whether practically, because of electoral significance and union ties, or symbolically: for the point is that discussion of socialism in Australia always at some point became discussion of the Labor Party. The left projected its fantasies onto the ALP as bearer, while the ALP shifted away from social justice talk, becoming a party of state rather than the party of the labor movement.

There were always, of course, determined revolutionaries who would have none of this. They belonged less to the Communist Party than to the Trotskyist or Maoist sects. The history of Trotskyism in Australia develops to the point at which it duplicates the entire histories of the Fourth Internationals. Trotskyism emerged as anti-Stalinism in the 1920s, and revived in opposition to the Great Patriotic War in the 1940s. It then grew significantly into the 1960s, mainly in connection with local opposition to the war in Vietnam and to conscription. The cult of Mao and Che were strong among radical youth, but Maoism was mainly influential in the building trades unions, where the more radical initiative of the New South Wales CPA led to so-called green bans in defense of urban ecology. The most influential variant of Trotskyism, the Socialist Workers' Party, itself reformed as the Green Left. Trotskyism in Australia since the 1960s follows this pattern, of identifying popular single issues and seeking to steer parts of the youth movement around them. In Australia, as elsewhere, opposition to the World Trade Organization (WTO) is the most apparent focal point for public mobilization today. Feminists organized alternatively, outside the sects or through the ALP.

In a small country, or a big country connected by small distances, left culture is also the culture of its cities – Melbourne, more traditionally reformist, Sydney, traditionally more libertarian, Brisbane, Adelaide, Perth. Australia has an urban structure of maritime cities, which sometimes means that they are better connected out than to each other, and globalization stands logically to extend this. As elsewhere, left politics is usually reactive, responding to global changes rather than leading, this again, in acceleration since the 1980s. The issue today is less that the Australian left has illusions about the Labor Party, or other places, than that it is increasingly difficult to see beyond the fragments of postmodern life and its immediate personal challenges. We are too busy just coping, or renovating the self, to imagine changing the world.

SEE ALSO: Australia, Anti-War Movement; Australian Labor Movement; Australian New Social Movements; Communist Party of Australia; Eurocommunism; Green Bans Movement, Australia;

Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), Australia; Russia, Revolution of October/November 1917; Trotsky, Leon (1879–1940); Women's Movement, Australia

References and Suggested Readings

- Beilharz, P. (1994) Transforming Labor: Labor Tradition and the Labor Decade in Australia. Melbourne: Cambridge University Press.
- Beilharz, P. (2008) Socialism and Modernity. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Macintyre, S. (1989) The Labour Experiment. Melbourne: McPhee Gribble.
- O'Lincoln, T. (1985) Into the Mainstream. Sydney: Stained Wattle.

Austria, 20th-century protests

Helen Bluemel

Protests in Austria have taken a variety of forms, from ethnic minority issues surrounding demands for autonomy in the Hapsburg empire to anti-democratic left- and right-wing protests in the First Republic (1918–34) and eventual fascist takeover. When describing the development of conflicts in Austria from 1900 to the present day, it is important to discern the change in what “Austria” means. The country has undergone multiple forms of government; it has progressed from a monarchy at the onset of the century to a parliamentary democracy today. Furthermore, it also has changed its territorial and ethnic character immensely. It ceased to exist as an independent state for seven years from 1938 to 1945. All these factors had an influence on the form protests took in the country itself.

Austria at the Turn of the Century

In 1900, Austria had progressed in less than 50 years from an autocratic to a parliamentary monarchy. The multi-ethnic state under German-Austrian Hapsburg rule also had to make concessions to its largest minority: the double monarchy of Austria-Hungary was established in 1867. This meant that Austria's Hapsburg emperor was concurrently the king of Hungary, which otherwise had become a rather autonomous state. What was thought to defuse the mounting ethnic tensions that had concerned the empire throughout the 1800s only inspired greater unrest amongst its different people. The “ascendance” of the Hungarians to a position on par with the Austrians sparked hopes and movements for recognition amongst the other ethnic minorities in the empire. Most notably, the Czechs tried to reach a similar agreement to that of the Hungarian autonomy but failed in their attempts. This was received as a bitter blow as the Czech-inhabited territories of Bohemia and Moravia were the main industrialized areas of Austria-Hungary, thus playing a pivotal role in the growth of the Austrian economy. To be denied at least some form of autonomy in the light of this increased the perception of being treated with contempt. The conflicts between Slavic nationals and German speakers grew throughout the empire, and were generally solved by suppressing the demands of the Slavic minorities.

The final decades of the nineteenth and the first years of the twentieth centuries were marked by growing tensions throughout Europe. Economic and political animosities, and the growing importance of nationalism, led to the establishment of two hostile camps within Europe. On the one hand were the Central Powers, Austria-Hungary, Germany, and Italy (which changed sides in 1915), and on the other was the alliance of Great Britain, France (the entente cordiale of 1904), and Russia (Triple Entente, 1907).

In the first decade of the new century, all European powers were flexing their muscles and the hostility and readiness for war grew. In 1908, Austria-Hungary annexed Bosnia, which it had occupied decades earlier. This caused discontent amongst the other great European powers, yet an open international conflict could still be avoided. The wait, however, was not long.

World War I

The annexation of Bosnia increased tensions between Austria-Hungary and Serbia, which seemingly was next on the list to be consumed into the Austrian empire. Therefore it was hardly surprising that during a visit to Bosnia on July 28, 1914, the Austrian crown prince, Franz Ferdinand, and his wife became the victims of an attack. The attacker was the Serbian-trained Gavrilo Princip. Although this killing was not the reason for the events that followed, it presented a formidable trigger in releasing all the pent-up tensions in Europe in World War I.

Austria-Hungary deliberately set Serbia an impossible and degrading ultimatum, with Germany standing firmly behind her ally. Serbia, with Russian backing, rejected the problematical order. Austria declared war on Serbia, and Germany declared war on Russia and France. Furthermore, through the German violation of Belgian neutrality, Great Britain became involved as well. Other countries had grouped around these states and the fighting became fully internationalized. It was an Austrian state affair that led to the greatest conflict the world had seen so far. What was thought to be a matter of a few months – every European country greeted it jubilantly and expected a quick victory – turned into four years of war with over ten million dead.

From the beginning of the war, Austria was ruled by emergency laws and the War Economy Enabling Act. This meant that the entire industrial production was directed toward the war effort. To reach the highest possible output, workers were forced to work long hours and to exceed normal production. When the promise of a short, victorious war receded, these working conditions in connection with progressively harsher living circumstances for the civil population generated growing unrest amongst the Austrians. The October Revolution in Russia in 1917 made a huge impression on Europe and its people and stirred further commotion. In Austria-Hungary, the revolutionary spirit found its expression in a first great strike on January 14, 1918. Resentment had grown amongst the working class due to the hardship caused by the war and oppression encountered at the hands of state authorities. Thus a spontaneous strike in Vienna spread quickly throughout Austria and encroached also into Bohemia and Hungary. As the strike erupted at grassroots level, the Social Democratic Party, the political representation of the working class, was taken by surprise and acted to calm down the radical elements within the strike with the promise of small concessions. However, this did not fully stifle the revolutionary momentum in the Austrian empire. The armed forces were also inspired by the events and several mutinies followed. The biggest mutiny, involving several battleships of the Austrian navy, took place on February 1, 1918 in the gulf of Cattaro. These uprisings were suppressed by the state forces, which managed to conceal the events from the wider public. Therefore, fraternization between civilians and soldiers – a factor that would later lead to widespread revolutionary actions – was averted.

However, the beginning of the process of dissolution of the Hapsburg monarchy and especially its multi-ethnic empire could not be halted. Several national minorities demanded their own states, inspired by American President Woodrow Wilson's "Fourteen Point" Plan which included the claim for self-government of ethnic groups in their own states. On September 26, 1918, a Czechoslovakian republic was proclaimed. This proclamation in exile was repeated in the soon-to-be capital Prague a month later on October 28. The Czechs and Slovaks were not the only peoples to declare independence. The Croats and Slovenes together with the Serbians established a national assembly in early October, and their republic was proclaimed a day after the Czechoslovakian one, on October 29, 1918. The German Austrians also prepared for the time after the multi-ethnic empire, and under Karl Renner they constituted a cabinet on October 31, 1918. The Hungarians left the battlefield on November 3, 1918, having decided that this was no longer their fight. The Hapsburg empire had broken down. The revolutionary spark erupted again in protests in Vienna. However, these remained largely non-violent as the final breakdown of the empire and the end of the war were clearly in sight. Military defeat was obvious. On the day of the armistice, November 11, 1918, the Hapsburg emperor declared his retreat from all state business. On November 12, a German Austrian republic was proclaimed in Vienna. Ethnic tensions and the catalytic catastrophe of war had destroyed Austria-Hungary.

First Attempt at Democracy

The remaining Austria, a territory of German speakers, encountered a period of continuous political unrest with a revolutionary character from 1918 to about 1920. The new form of state, the parliamentary democracy, was not welcomed by the people. The government was blamed for the peace settlements, which were less than favorable for the Austrians: the pursued union with Germany was forbidden as a condition of peace and the territory of Austria was considerably reduced. Repeated attacks from the left and the right followed; attempts to create a socialist

