that quickly led to the establishment of revolutionary organizations and their assumption of power around the country. This period was followed by a few victorious revolutionary days when a multiple party system and a new balance of forces based on the sharing of power were emerging. Internal consolidation seemed to be under way and the threats of civil war or counter-revolutionary restoration were minimal. The third phase was characterized by armed struggle: a Soviet military intervention that began on November 4 all but completely suppressed the Hungarian armed resistance by November 11. Revolutionary councils and workers’ councils founded during the early days of the revolution continued to struggle against the reemerging dictatorial regime through political means. Over the next several months these organizations were violently disbanded by the Soviet-backed leaders of Hungary claiming to rule in the workers’ name. A general strike on December 11 and 12 was the last major event organized by the workers’ councils. Arrest of council leaders and declaration of martial law finally quelled the resistance, which until that point remained so strong that the Kádár government could not be considered stable.

The massive Stalinist repressions and the miserable performance of the planned economy rank first among the general causes of the revolution, although these factors were present in other communist countries as well. What marks Hungary as unique from a comparative perspective is the intraparty struggle that followed the death of Stalin. In 1953 when the reformist Imre Nagy was appointed prime minister, the party and state organs remained largely in the hands of hardliners. Under his “New Course” Nagy slowed the pace of industrialization and ended forced collectivization of the agricultural sector. He sought to raise living standards and decrease the level of terror. His reform course was halted by Stalinist forces in 1955 and Nagy was expelled from the party. The ensuing restoration of hardline policies set in motion a radicalizing dynamic triggered by crushed hopes of reform.

Khrushchev’s secret speech at the Twentieth Party Congress commenced an ambiguous program of de-Stalinization in the Soviet Union and the countries over which it ruled. In Hungary the case of László Rajk, the communist victim of the most notorious show trial, was reconsidered.

This and similar revelations of Stalinist crimes generated a powerful intellectual reform movement even among committed communist intellectuals. The movement, which occurred largely within the framework of the Petöfi Circle (Petöfi Kör) and the Writers' Union, intensified after Hungary's chief Stalinist leader, Mátyás Rákosi, resigned from his post as party secretary in July 1956. The widely attended public burial of Rajk and other victims of the same show trial that took place on October 6, 1956, just before the outbreak of the revolution, might be viewed as the first mass protest against Stalinism. Various newly composed student bodies in several university cities, such as the first independent student body formed in Szeged, were crucial in articulating demands and thereby moving the events forward just before October 23, 1956. Their list of 16 points demanding democratization and its accompanying basic rights as well as an end to Hungary's subordination to the Soviet Union became one of the most widespread and consensually supported platforms of the revolution.

The Hungarian Revolution of 1956 began with a peaceful student protest in Budapest in the afternoon of October 23. The protest was organized in support of the Polish reform course introduced by Wladislaw Gomulka – the turn to national communism that became known as the Polish October. Spontaneous mass protests emerged in response to the students' initiative and by six o'clock that evening approximately 200,000 people had gathered in front of the parliament building. The mood among the crowd was characterized by general malcontent coupled with a euphoric sense of liberation, rather than a fighting spirit. The toppling of Stalin's massive statue heralded revolution.

Protesters brandished the Hungarian flag with the added communist symbols cut out, which subsequently became the main symbol of 1956. The revolutionaries also drew heavily on the powerful symbols of the Hungarian Revolution of 1848 in representing their campaign. That popular movement for liberal reform a century earlier had been symbolically appropriated by the Communist Party in 1948 as it consolidated the "dictatorship of the proletariat."

The communist leadership was alarmed by the actions on the streets throughout this consequential day, but internal divisions constrained its ability to respond effectively. Reform communists, who were in opposition within the party, were divided among themselves as well. The student demands for democratization of the Communist Party, the establishment of a multiple party system, and general free elections included a call for the return of Imre Nagy as prime minister. However, despite being identified as a champion of their cause, he did not initially support the protesters. Rather, he sided with the party, cautiously offering no more than consistent application of his reform program from 1953.

Three protesters from a crowd of nearly 30,000 in the eastern city of Debrecen became the first victims of the revolution on October 23 when they were killed by members of the State Protection Authority (Államvédelmi Hatóság, ÁVH) at around 6 p.m. Although the events centered on Budapest and approximately 80 percent of those killed or injured over its course were from the capital, the scope of the revolution was countrywide. Fighting broke out in Budapest the same evening, following unprovoked shootings by members of the ÁVH who were defending the Hungarian State Radio building. Many soldiers took the side of the revolutionaries. Budapest chief of police, Sándor Kopácsi, announced that his forces would not intervene against peaceful protesters. Unquestioning loyalty to the regime from the army and police was no longer a foregone conclusion.

The dreaded ÁVH proved to be the last domestic stronghold of the communist regime and the major ally of the Soviet forces. It committed various atrocities throughout the revolution, and was most likely responsible for the notorious massacre on Kossuth tér, the square in front of the parliament, on October 25 that led to the deaths of 60 to 70 people. The ÁVH became the main target of popular wrath, provoking a brutal assault on agents of the collapsing regime by the revolutionaries (regularly exploited by communist propaganda later on): 23 government officials and a number of insurgents were killed in the siege of the Budapest Committee of the Communist Party on Köztársaság tér on October 30.

At the urging of Hungary's Stalinist leader Ernő Gerő and the local Soviet ambassador Yuri Andropov, the leadership of the Soviet Union decided to launch an immediate though relatively modest military intervention on October 24. The proposed intervention encountered much fiercer domestic resistance than was expected.

Since the Hungarian military refused to cooperate, the decision served only to strengthen the resolve of the revolutionaries and turn what had been an anti-Stalinist armed uprising into a national freedom fight. Keeping the flame of revolt alive in spite of significant losses (by October 24 almost 250 people had been killed in Budapest alone), the revolutionaries hoped to preserve their chances for a political victory and acceptance of their demands for democratization and independence.

Imre Nagy remained uncommitted to the revolutionary cause, calling for a political resolution to the uprising and real reforms. He was declared head of the new communist government on October 24 with the official expectation that he would condemn the insurgency while indicating willingness to recognize some of the articulated demands. The position of the newly appointed party secretary, János Kádár, was similarly conciliating when he promised fundamental reforms as well as tough measures against armed resistance.

The revolutionaries represented a broad spectrum of Hungarian society, including top political leaders, freedom fighters, and members of revolutionary organizations. There were significant ideological divisions among them but they were nonetheless united in their demands for the abolition of the dictatorship and establishment of national independence. The desire for national independence was coupled with a demand for Hungarian neutrality – a status neighboring Austria had achieved the year before. Among their more specific demands were the abolition of the State Protection Authority and amnesty for participants in the uprising.

By October 26, protests and strikes had flared up across the country. New revolutionary organizations were emerging and cooperation between existing ones was taking place in leaps and bounds. Armed fighters, engaged in some strategic offensive action but primarily focused on territorial defense, were well networked with the surrounding population. In some cities the revolutionaries were violently repelled (as in Esztergom or Kecskemét), while in others they were victorious in spite of violent resistance by loyal members of the regime (as in Miskolc or Mosonmagyaróvár). In some places they were able to attain power without fighting because the communist authority simply collapsed (as in Győr, Nyíregyháza, Szolnok, or Veszprém), while a number of other places remained without significant revolutionary challenge at this point (Salgótarján or Szekszárd). By the next day, national councils had seized power in several other significant cities as well. Around October 28 the revolution reached the villages where the revolutionary organizations that took power were often composed of people who had been influential in the early postwar years when Hungary still had a multiparty system – many had been members of the Small Landholders' Party, which was especially influential at the village level. Meanwhile, the workers' councils, originally called on by the communists, started to emerge as another significant revolutionary force.

The emergence and spread of revolutionary organizations, widespread popular support, and committed armed resistance were obstacles to a military solution. The government, which was still largely composed of communists of various shades – although the most exposed hardliners were just about to flee to Moscow – was forced to acknowledge the popular demands and begin negotiations. In his radio address on October 28, Nagy offered significant concessions, including recognition of the new organizations, a ceasefire agreement coupled with amnesty for the participants of the uprising, and reorganization of the organs of state security. Recognizing the ever-increasing likelihood that it would be swept aside by the revolutionary forces, the leadership began to refer to the previous days' events as a national democratic movement caused by sins committed in the past. However, it was not yet prepared to call the developments revolutionary.

The reformist wing of the communist leadership seemed able to offer a political alternative that was acceptable to the Hungarian public as well as the Soviet Union. Khrushchev accepted the reformists' change in attitude since the new political solution offered by the Hungarian leadership questioned neither the leading role of the party nor Hungary's role as a Soviet ally. Meanwhile, the Soviet side was strengthening its military presence and sending warnings against further concessions. Nagy announced that it would start negotiations over the withdrawal of Soviet troops against the will of the Soviet leaders but he wished to consolidate the revolution at its current level. He wanted people to give up their weapons and quit striking. The revolutionaries, however, considered only the withdrawal of Soviet troops and reestablishment of a multiple party system as proper guarantees of their victory – precisely what the Soviet leaders refused to consider.

On October 30 Imre Nagy changed the composition of his government, dismissing the Stalinists and turning it into a popular front type of government, and accepted the end of the one-party system. At first the Soviet Union seemed to accept these developments, but Khrushchev apparently changed his mind on November 1 and, without notifying the Hungarian leadership, opted for military intervention. This led Nagy to declare Hungarian neutrality in order to preclude the appearance of legality in the Soviet intervention. The few days prior to November 4 saw the beginnings of national consolidation in Hungary and the emergence of a largely unified National Guard. Power was shared at the highest level. Over the brief course of the revolution the composition of the government changed several times, coming to resemble a true coalition government, though Imre Nagy, who was identifying more and more with the revolution after his initial reservations, remained in charge throughout.

Between 10,000 and 15,000 people fought against the massive second invasion of the Soviet army that began on November 4. Approximately 2,500 Hungarians lost their lives, 90 percent of them male and over 700 who fought on the side of the Red Army. The majority of the revolutionary victims were laborers, and many of them were very young. In the aftermath of the revolution, 200,000 people fled Hungary to the West.

Belief in a reformed socialist future or various models of a third way combining private property (without the extremes of capitalism) with a social democratic state was ideologically predominant during the revolution. No significant force supported the reestablishment of the regime from before 1945 or called for a capitalist economy. While there was general support for notions such as freedom, democracy, and socialism, opinions varied on what these terms would mean in practice. Perhaps unsurprisingly for a country under Bolshevik rule for nearly a decade, and the brief window of opportunity availed the revolutionaries, demands for democracy were frequently uttered, but were not coupled with detailed plans specifying its mechanisms. The reemergence of a range of political parties was taking place concurrent with the spread of organizations of direct democracy at all levels of society, but the terms of their anticipated relations were unspecified. Similarly, limits on the authority of revolutionary councils as well as the future role of parliament as a representative national body remained ambiguous.

As part of the ruthless reprisals inflicted by the Soviet-backed government led by János Kádár, approximately 22,000 people were imprisoned and 229 were executed over the course of the next five years. The imposition of martial law and initial efforts to suppress the revolution through internment of leaders and activists were applied so widely and arbitrarily that they certainly had the aim of frightening the population as a whole. By 1957 with the beginning of the second round of retaliation, the groups and deeds to be punished were more strictly defined.

Relations between János Kádár and Imre Nagy were rather complex. The two were relatively close allies in the early days of the revolution; Nagy, for example, claimed he would only accept the position of prime minister on the condition that Kádár replace Gerő as first secretary of the party (eventually he did take the role of prime minister, one day prior to Gerő's replacement by Kádár). But their choices radically diverged as the revolution gained ground. While Nagy came to identify with the revolutionary cause, Kádár betrayed the people he had come to recognize during the revolution's unfolding. Kádár assumed leadership of the Soviet-backed government that was to collaborate in crushing the revolution, with neither party, state apparatus, local military force, nor popular support behind him.

Kádár ordered Nagy's execution and endorsed a counterrevolutionary narrative of the events of 1956 as long as he was dictator of Hungary, until the late 1980s. Initially, Kádár stressed that the intervention was necessitated by the growing threat of counterrevolution, but he did not call the events counterrevolutionary as a whole. Assessment of the whole event as counterrevolutionary came to be accepted in early December 1956, even though it did not even square with the role Kádár himself played, let alone with many other facts. Alongside this change in official judgment, condemnation of Stalinism as a cause of the events was also gradually relegated.

The Hungarian Revolution of 1956 had momentous consequences despite its failure to achieve its objectives. Its afterlife has also been of great importance. Official attempts to distort or silence the memory of the revolution had an essential legitimating function in the Kádárist period. The leadership's fear of another uprising led it to adopt a policy aimed at depoliticizing society, while continuously providing modest but tangible gains in living standards. The revolution remained a central part of the political identity of many emigrant groups as well as 1956ers within Hungary, and the recovery and cleansing of its tarnished memory were among the most important aims of the Hungarian democratic opposition in the 1980s.

The memory of 1956 played a highly significant role in 1989 as well. The proper burial of Imre Nagy and those executed alongside him, who had until then been lying in an unmarked grave, was attended by approximately 200,000 people in the early summer of 1989. This event is considered to have provided the symbolic delegitimation of the communist system of rule in Hungary. The proclamation of the republic took place on October 23, the day of the outbreak of the Hungarian Revolution of 1956, which was declared a national holiday. Though the role of the history and memory of 1956 in 1989 was more complex than is often assumed, the restoration of its memory and the alleged achievement of the revolution's goals in the fall of the communist regime went hand in hand with warnings against its reoccurrence, as 1956 was often presented as a national tragedy.

Since 1989, the memory and legacy of the revolution have served a far less unifying function in Hungary. The revolution has been intertwined with fundamental ideological divisions, and its legacy is contested by nationalists who see in it the demand for national independence and the struggle for freedom from Soviet dominance; leftists who stress the popular demands for a reformed socialist system, and the crucial role played by reform communists; and liberals who tend to emphasize, among other issues, the reestablishment of a multiparty system and the aim of separation of powers. In the absence of a significant leftist force in Hungary, nearly 20 years after the collapse of communism, only the role played by the workers' councils has not been appropriated by a major political organization as the crucial source of revolutionary power whose spirit animates some contemporary cause.

Much quality research into the events has been conducted since 1989, largely within the framework of the Institute for the History of the 1956 Hungarian Revolution. Among the achievements of the institute is the establishment of a precious oral history collection featuring interviews with participants. The fiftieth anniversary of 1956 led to renewed attention to the events and an unprecedented number of new explorations of their meaning.

Hungary, women radicals, 1848–1849

Robert Nemes

It is difficult to exaggerate the importance of the 1848 Revolution for Hungary, which was at that time part of the Hapsburg monarchy. Over the course of 18 months, Hungary experienced unprecedented political mobilization, dramatic constitutional change, a costly military struggle to preserve the revolution, and, finally, a harsh crackdown by the victorious forces of order. Like few other events, the 1848 Revolution lodged itself deeply in the Hungarian collective memory, and every political regime since has attempted to bolster its legitimacy by appropriating the symbols of 1848. The 1848 Revolution likewise stands as a landmark in Hungarian women’s history, an event that broke down barriers to political participation and set an important precedent for later generations. As the case of the Radical Hungarian Women shows plainly, women forcefully addressed the political and national questions at the heart of the 1848 revolutions.

Women’s activism during the revolution had its roots in the period before 1848. Hungary in the first half of the nineteenth century was a largely agricultural society with a small urban population, sizable nobility, and a majority of poor peasants, many of whom were serfs. In this tradition-bound society, women had few rights and limited educational opportunities. Change came in the 1830s and 1840s with the emergence of a noble-led “party of movement,” which demanded liberal and national reforms from the rulers in Vienna. Significantly, this political agitation was concentrated in Buda-Pest, whose booming population reached 100,000 in the 1840s. The combination of intense politicization and rapid urbanization created new possibilities for women, who subscribed to (and sometimes wrote for) the patriotic press, wore Hungarian-made clothes to support domestic industry, and organized a number of educational and charitable associations. As elsewhere in Europe, such activities were largely limited to women from the middle and upper strata of society, and it is important to underscore that the walls of prejudice and the fragile nature of Hungarian civil society placed real restrictions on what women could accomplish.

The outbreak of revolution in March 1848 seemed to change everything. The events in Hungary have been called a “lawful revolution,” a phrase that neatly captures the meaningful continuity and surprising innovation that defined Hungary’s sudden transformation into a constitutional monarchy (Deák 1979). Hungary in 1848 had a responsible ministerial government and an elected parliament based on expanded but still limited suffrage, under which women, like the majority of laborers and peasants, did not have the vote. For women, the expansion of civil liberties (and, in particular, the removal of many restrictions on the press, assembly, and speech) was much more consequential. In the first months of the revolution, Hungarian women demonstrated in the streets, attended mass meetings, signed petitions, read the many new journals and newspapers, and displayed their political loyalties in a wide range of symbolic actions (wearing the tricolor cockade, greeting people as “citizen” in place of older titles, and hanging revolutionary banners from their windows). This revolutionary political culture downplayed differences of social status, religion, ethnicity, nationality, and gender; constitutional government and individual liberties, it was hoped, would create a unified, equal citizenry. Yet such divisions soon made themselves felt in Hungary, and the late spring brought sharp struggles between landlords and tenants in the cities, growing national conflicts in the countryside, and deepening acrimony between moderates and radicals within the revolutionary movement itself.

It was in this context that the “Demands of the Radical Hungarian Women” appeared in a leading revolutionary journal. The 24-point “Demands” was one of many petitions and appeals to appear over the course of the revolution, yet it broke new ground in asserting at the outset that women should “actively take part in public affairs as much as possible,” a demand with few precedents in Hungary (Nemes 2001). The petition was conventional in that it highlighted the role women could play as national-spirited wives and mothers, and it reminded women not to forget “about the woman’s realm and responsibilities.” But it also encouraged women to take up their pens in service of “freedom, the homeland, and women” and to form a network of associations across the country. Underscoring the significance of symbolic acts, the petition called on women to speak the Hungarian language, purchase domestic goods, wear national costumes, and dance national dances. At the same time, the “Demands” also demonstrated the ways in which revolutionaries used symbols to define the national community and expose “enemies”: “Those Hungarian women who avoid the national literature and arts and deem only foreign ones worthy of attention,” read the petition, “women who, for example, subscribe to German or French papers and read only foreign books, are forever despised, and we will expel these traitorous, degenerate girls from our circles.” If the “Demands” appears moderate in comparison with documents like the Seneca Falls Declaration, with its call for women’s suffrage, it is likely because the authors of the “Demands” faced even greater obstacles and because they (like many European women in the nineteenth century) gave precedence to social and educational needs over civil and political rights.

The newspaper in which the “Demands” appeared noted only that “this petition has already been signed by several hundred Hungarian women.” These women may have formed their own political club (as did women in Vienna and Prague), or they may have been connected to the Radical Circle, one of the largest and most influential clubs in revolutionary Buda-Pest. There is no question that women remained critical to the revolutionary movement. In the summer of 1848, the Hungarian government sponsored a pedagogical congress, which closely examined the question of female education. But the situation in Hungary was worsening, and by the fall, war broke out between the Hungarian government on the one side and the Hapsburg dynasty and its allies on the other. Women, like much of Hungarian society, were divided in their allegiances. Those who continued to support the revolution did so by donating food, clothing, and money to the war effort; many women also served as nurses and a handful even became soldiers in the Hungarian army (Farkas 1910). The war ended in late 1849, and several women were among those targeted in the repression that followed. Within a decade, however, women who had participated in the 1848 Revolution would again form clubs, demand educational reforms, and use symbols to demonstrate their political and national loyalties. The pioneering political events of 1848 had left their mark.

Hunt, Henry "Orator" (1773–1835)

Pia K. Jakobsson

An English radical orator and activist who advocated universal suffrage and annual parliaments, Henry Hunt was born in Wiltshire, the son of a gentleman farmer. He was educated at the local grammar school and then returned to work on the family estate, taking it over when his father died. In his late twenties he met the radical lawyer Henry Clifford and his circle of friends. Through them he became involved in politics and soon established himself as a supporter of House of Commons independent Francis Burdett. An excellent public speaker, he was asked to speak in front of large groups across the country. He advocated annual parliaments, universal suffrage, and secret balloting – positions he also espoused when he stood, unsuccessfully, as the radical candidate for Westminster in 1818.

On August 16, 1819, Hunt was asked to speak to a meeting of over 60,000 people demonstrating for parliamentary reform at St. Peter's Fields. His friend William Cobbett had already turned down an invitation, concerned that things would turn violent. Worried about an uprising, the authorities had decided to arrest the leaders, but the meeting remained peaceful until the yeomanry charged into the crowd. Then chaos ensued; several hundred people were injured and 11 were killed in what has become known as the Peterloo Massacre. In the aftermath Hunt, Samuel Bamford, and several others were arrested on the charge of holding a seditious meeting. Hunt was sentenced to two and a half years' imprisonment and spent the time writing an exposé of conditions in Ilchester Jail.

After his release Hunt continued to agitate for popular parliamentary reform as well as for ten-hour workdays and an end to child labor. In 1830 he was elected to parliament, where he was to remain for only a few years. He strongly disapproved the Reform Act of 1832 because he felt it did not go nearly far enough, but the Act had strong support and in the elections held the next year, Hunt lost his seat. He retired from public life and died in Hampshire in 1835.

Amy Linch

Anne Hutchinson was born in England to a Puritan family. Her keen intellect and radical spiritual views were cultivated by her father, a deacon whose open denunciation of Church of England ministers led to his imprisonment. At 21 she married Will Hutchinson, and together they followed the teachings of John Cotton, a Puritan minister who, like her father, sought to purify the Anglican Church of its residual Catholic elements.

In 1634 when Cotton emigrated to New England after being silenced by the Anglican Church, the Hutchinsons and their 11 children joined him in search of an environment more hospitable to their religious practice. Hutchinson and her family quickly became prominent members of Boston society. An accomplished herbalist and midwife, Anne's skills were greatly valued by the women in her new community.

She also began holding Bible studies for women in her home, initially interpreting the teachings of John Cotton, but eventually developing an independent theological position that emphasized direct experience of spirituality over conformity with socially prescribed behavior. She was also openly critical of the Puritan ministers and the religious orthodoxy she found in much of the colony. The establishment of religious practice, in her view, was redolent of the Catholicism Puritans sought to escape. She was further critical of the priority accorded to the preservation of the Puritan community over the individual experience of truth. Through interpretation of scripture she affirmed the equality and rights of women, decried racial prejudice, and denounced the enslavement of Native Americans. Her meetings eventually attracted men as well as women, and as their popularity grew her unorthodox teachings were increasingly regarded as a threat to the religious orthodoxy that was the basis of political authority in the colony.

As a result, Hutchinson was arrested by John Winthrop in 1637 and charged with subversive behavior. Winthrop, unlike the previous governor, Sir Henry Vane, regarded Anne as “an American Jezebel who has gone a-whoring from God.” He denounced her meetings as “a thing not tolerable nor comely in the sight of God, nor fitting for [her] sex,” and labeled her views heretical. Winthrop presided over her civil trial in 1637 where she was accused of violating the fourth commandment to honor one’s father and mother, by encouraging dissent against fathers in the commonwealth and luring women away from their domestic responsibilities. She was accused of disrupting social order by assuming authority that was the prerogative of men, ministers, and magistrates.

After her conviction she was sentenced to house arrest until her church trial in the spring of 1638. At the religious trial she was found guilty of blasphemy and lewd and lascivious behavior and sentenced to excommunication and banishment. Accepting her exile without challenge, she and her family and many of her followers established a new settlement in an area that is now Rhode Island. In 1642, amid increasing religious conflict, she moved to the Dutch colony of New Amsterdam near Pelham Bay, New York. She and six of her children were killed by Native Americans in 1643.

Hutterites

Richard Goff

One of the longest lasting utopian communities, the Hutterites are a communal, Anabaptist religious group that trace their history to the theological disputes of the Protestant Reformation and have a shared history with the Amish and the Mennonites. Founded by Jakob Hutter in 1528, the sect established the communal sharing of goods outlined in the New Testament as a model. Initially an itinerant group, they settled in Moravia in the late 1500s. Fusing communal property ownership with paternalistic privilege, the group flourished through the 1500s. Over the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, warfare and religious persecution made life in Europe difficult for the pacifistic group, producing migrations to Transylvania and the Ukraine. In 1874, in response to a new Russian law requiring military service, the group sent members to the United States to search for new land. The Hutterites eventually set up multiple communities in South Dakota, Montana, and Alberta, Canada.

Hutterite theological views underpin their social organization. Similar to the Shakers and other Anabaptists, the Hutterites view the world as overridden with sin and corruption. Therefore, the true Christian must separate themselves from the world and submit to the community of God. Based on their history of persecution and their theological values, Hutterites have cultivated a strong sense of community and place great emphasis on collective decision-making. Leaders are selected by the male members of the community and matters of public import are discussed at community meetings. Although they emphasize collective-decision making, they believe that it is ultimately the individual’s choice as to whether they want to stay in the community.

One key to the Hutterites success has been their ability to adapt economically to the modern age. Hutterites are typically farmers, with some skilled trades, and unlike the Amish, embrace technology. Men and women perform stereotypically gendered tasks, with children attending school until the age of 15 before being apprenticed into an appropriate trade. With this labor system, they have been relatively successful in establishing diversified farms and have at times been so prosperous that localities have forbidden the sale of land to Hutterites, due to their rapid expansion. Hutterite colonies vary in size, typically including about 20 families with populations ranging from 60 to 150. When colonies become too big, they seek out more land and “split” into daughter colonies. The community, although traditional in many respects, is open to change so long as it can be reconciled with their Christian mission.

While Hutterite communities continue to thrive, they face a growing set of challenges. As with many Christian communes, they firmly believe they are the last, best hope for the human race. Recently, however, corporate farming has undermined Hutterite economic competitiveness and increased access to the mass media has placed external pressures on the community, raising apostasy rates among the young.

Hyde, Evan Anthony (b. 1947)

Edward T. Brett

Evan Anthony Hyde (Evan X Hyde), founder of the United Black Association for Development (UBAD) and publisher of Amandala, Belize’s largest newspaper, was born in Belize City on April 30, 1947. He was educated at Holy Redeemer Primary School, by St. John’s College (High School), and SJC Junior College. He received a scholarship to Dartmouth College in New Hampshire, where he graduated in 1968 with a bachelor’s degree in English.

Influenced in the United States by the Black Power movement, Hyde joined other young blacks in Belize to form UBAD in February 1969. Hyde became the organization’s secretary, eventually taking over the presidency in March when the first president resigned. This would be a position that Hyde retained throughout UBAD’s existence.

Hyde and his associates felt that Belize’s two major political parties, the People’s Unity Party (PUP) and the opposition National Independence Party (NIP), were too conservative. Thus, they created UBAD to fight for better conditions for Belize’s poor black majority. Its constitution was patterned after the Belizean branch of Marcus Garvey’s United Negro Improvement Association (UNIA), which was founded in 1920 but quickly lost its original militancy. In August 1969, Hyde created a newspaper, Amandala, to promote the ideology of UBAD. In October the newly formed People’s Action Committee (PAC), headed by Assad Shoman and Said Musa, merged with UBAD to form the Revolutionary Action Movement (RAM), with Hyde as president. But by early 1970 the new popular front was embroiled in internal disputes and disbanded.

UBAD was resurrected in July 1971 and entered electoral politics, forming a coalition with NIP. Hyde and eight other coalition candidates ran for Belize City Council but were badly defeated. When Hyde lost another election in 1974, he terminated UBAD. He ran unsuccessfully for City Council again in 1977 as a PUP candidate.

After the dissolution of UBAD, Hyde devoted himself full time to Amandala, first as its editor, and then its publisher. His “From the Publisher” columns, which discussed Belizean history and current events, attracted a wide readership. Hyde was able to obtain government approval in 1989 to create Radio KREM. Combining Belizean indigenous music with sociopolitical commentary, the station quickly gained a large audience. In 2004 Hyde began KREM Television.

Hyde is considered one of Belize's most notable literary talents. His Knocking Our Own Ting (1969) satirizes the 1798 Battle of St. George's Caye and its annual creole commemoration. North Amerikkkan Blues (1971) highlights his years at Dartmouth, while The Crowd Called UBAD: Story of a People's Movement (1972) traces the history of that organization. In 1975 he turned his talents to the realm of fiction with the publication of Feelings, and in 1981 to poetry, when he co-authored Poems of Passion, Patriotism, and Protest.

Ibrahim, Mirza (ca. 1906–2000)

Farooq Sulehria

Known as Baba-e-Mehnat-Kashan (father of the workers), Mirza Ibrahim was a pioneer of the trade union movement in Pakistan. When he died at the age of 94 he had spent a quarter of his life behind bars, besides having lived the horror of the notorious torture center at the Lahore Fort. A committed communist and respected trade unionist, Mirza was born in 1905 in the village of Kala Googran, Punjab. He was born into a poor family and did not get the chance to attend school. Ibrahim had an early brush with politics at the age of 16 when he was arrested for his active participation in the Khilafat movement (a South Asian political campaign aimed at protecting the Ottoman Empire post-World War II). In 1924 Mirza moved to Rawalpindi and started as a brick-kiln worker. After briefly working as a gardener at a British household in 1926, he was employed at a railway workshop in Jhelum. His political metamorphosis occurred in 1930, when he was posted to Lahore, an important political and cultural center in British India. Here he came into contact with the trade union and left movements. He joined the Communist Party in the 1930s and became active in the trade union movement. When Mirza was elected vice president of the Railways Federation, the union's presidential slot was held by V. V. Giri, who was later elected the fourth president of India. Jyoti Basu, the longtime chief minister of West Bengal, was also involved at that time in trade union activities under Ibrahim's leadership.

At the end of World War II the Indian government wanted to fire hundreds of thousands of railway workers, thinking that with the end of war their services were no longer required.

On May 1 railway workers went on strike under the militant leadership of Mirza, who was then the president of the North Western Railway Workers Union. The government had to bow before the striking workers. The strike action not merely helped to save the jobs, but also won a salary hike worth 20 rupees.

After the partition of India in 1947, Mirza became active in establishing the Pakistan Trade Union Federation. In 1950 he ran for a seat in the Punjab Assembly from the Lahore constituency. His enormous popularity was evident when ballot boxes were found full with votes as well as money for Mirza Ibrahim. Thousands of working-class voters left rupee notes with Mirza's name written on them as contributions towards the creation of a fighting fund. He won the election, but the government candidate was fraudulently declared victorious. In 1951 he was implicated in the Rawalpindi Conspiracy Case and was tortured at Lahore Fort.

In 1970 he ran for a seat in the assembly yet again, but this time his legend was not strong enough to defeat the Bhutto bandwagon. The railway activists lobbied the Pakistan Peoples Party (PPP) to have Mirza nominated as the PPP candidate; however, Mirza was not ideologically aligned with the PPP and declined.

Mirza was again jailed during the Zia ul Haque dictatorship. Brutally repressed by the Zia dictatorship and in the wake of the Soviet Union's collapse, the trade union movement in Pakistan suffered a massive downturn. Despite his failing health, Mirza played a leading role in forging a broad-based trade union alliance – the Pakistan Trade Union Confederation, formed in 1994, which was an umbrella organization for nine trade union federations.

Ibrahim, Saad Eddin (b. 1938)

Andrew J. Waskey

Eddin Saad (Sa'd al-Din or Sa'ad Eddih) Ibrahim was born in Mansura, Egypt. He received a bachelor's degree from the University of Cairo in 1960. In 1968 he graduated with a PhD in sociology from the University of Washington and became an American citizen. He is a human rights advocate and a 2002 Noble Peace Prize nominee for his work promoting the causes of minority rights and democracy.

In 1988 Ibrahim founded the Ibn Khaldun Center for Developmental Studies in Cairo. Its program of studies seeks ways to develop democracy and to advance it as a way of organizing the public life of a society. Specific projects conducted by the Ibn Khaldun Center (a freedom house) have included monitoring elections, voter education, and training students in social science research methods.

Ibrahim's work on elections allowed him the opportunity to serve as the secretary general of the Independent Commission for Electoral Review. The Commission monitored Egyptian elections in 1900 and 1995. While preparing to monitor the Egyptian elections of 2000 Ibrahim was arrested. Among the investigative activities being conducted that were offensive to Egyptian authorities was the documentary film being prepared describing Egyptian election irregularities. To silence Ibrahim the publication of the Ibn Khaldun Center's periodical, Civil Society, was banned in January 2000. The Center itself was closed in June 2000.

Between the banning of Civil Society and the closure of the Ibn Khaldun Center, Ibrahim and 27 other colleagues were tried and convicted by Egyptian authorities. They were indicted for collecting funds without official permits, fraud in the use of funds, using illegally obtained funds to prepare forged voter registration lists, creating fraudulent voter registration cards, and preparing public relations media that used deceptive information with false phrases, rumors, and other disinformation that would spread provocative propaganda inimical to the interests of the Egyptian public.

Other charges claimed that Ibrahim and his associates were a danger to the safety of Egypt because they had received funds from a foreign country that was seeking to harm Egyptian national interests by producing a film that would damage Egypt's standing in the world. Ibrahim was convicted on the charges against him and given a sentence of seven years' imprisonment with hard labor. On March 18, 2003, Egypt's Supreme Court reversed his sentence and dismissed all charges against him. Human rights activists believe that the reversal was due to international pressure.

Dr. Ibrahim has authored over 30 books and taught at a number of universities; he has been involved various other organizations, including serving as president of the Egyptian Sociological Association. Since being released from prison he has continued his advocacy for democracy in Egypt.

Icaria Utopian Community

Richard Goff

Like many utopian experiments, the roots of Icarianism reside in Europe. Similar to Charles Fourier and Robert Owen, the movement's founder, Etienne Cabet, was reared in the context of revolutionary upheaval. As a young man he joined the Society of the Chabonnerie, a radical republican organization opposed to the restored French monarchy. Cabet's outspoken opposition to the government earned him a conviction for treason and exile to England.

While in England, Cabet became a disciple of Robert Owen and penned his major work, Voyage en Icarie (1834). The novel was modeled after Thomas More's Utopia and described in great detail the "nation" of Icaria. Similar to Utopia, Icarie was a thinly veiled attack on the corruption and inequality of Europe. The fictional nation was an egalitarian one, based on democratic principles, and the model of urban and rural planning. The elected leadership took care of the needs of all citizens, including food, housing, medical care, and entertainment. The state-managed production facilities were efficient and humane. Education was free for both sexes, organized religion was non-existent, and crime and vice had disappeared. The society blended aspects of Jean-Jacques Rousseau's protosocialism with Cabet's own Christian mysticism into a society simply governed by the Christian Golden Rule.

The book was an immediate success, prompting Cabet to organize an Icarian political party and to entertain the notion of creating a community based on its principles. Given the oppressive atmosphere in France and Cabet's persistent legal problems, following the advice of Robert Owen, Cabet looked to the United States. With the help of Owen, Cabet acquired a 3,000-acre tract of land just north of Dallas. The Icarians began their voyage in 1848. The poorly planned trip quickly degenerated into chaos and thus a second location was suggested, this one in the more hospitable area of Nauvoo, Illinois.

Nauvoo became the first permanent Icarian community in 1849. The community quickly adopted the social framework of the Voyage en Icarie and over the next two years constructed living quarters, a communal dining hall, theater, library, pharmacy, and tailor shop. Additionally, they constructed production facilities for their basic necessities and for items to be sold. Politically, their constitution declared Icaria a "democratic republic." Women, however, could not vote, but were free to express their opinions. Marriage was encouraged and each family was assigned roughly the same amount of space and furniture. Icarians placed great emphasis on cultural life, holding concerts and theatrical productions regularly. Their impressive library contained over 4,000 volumes. By the mid-1850s the nearly 500 Icarians enjoyed a relatively rich life.

Primarily due to Cabet's dictatorial manner, problems began to develop in the 1850s. In Cabet's brief absence in 1852–4 some members had begun to use tobacco and alcohol, items discouraged by Cabet. Icarian women began to question the legitimacy of denying them the franchise and the standardized form of dress. In 1853 Cabet revised the constitution, making it more authoritarian, expressly forbidding the use of tobacco and alcohol, and prohibiting talking while at work. These reforms generated more vociferous dissent and a split in the community.

Following the schism and the death of Etienne Cabet in 1856, members formed multiple communities near St. Louis and in Corning, Iowa. The former community withered due to its meager size and the health problems of several members. The latter continued to function into the 1870s, buoyed by the economic boom associated with the Civil War. A subsequent dispute produced another split and ultimately the demise of the communities. The final Icarian community dissolved at Corning in 1898.

What is remarkable about the Icarian experiment was the continuity between all the communities. Although there were no shortage of disputes within the communities over the exact applications of Icarian principles, all members were bound by Cabet's work and carefully tried to replicate his vision in practical ways. The Icarian communal experiment demonstrates both the power and pitfalls of shared vision in attempts to construct the "better society."

Ife–Modakeke conflict

Olayinka Akanle

The Ife and Modakeke are both Yoruba of Osun state in southwestern Nigeria. According to local ancestral myth, both are descendants of Oduduwa, the perceived progenitor of the Yoruba people. The sociocultural and political systems of the two communities are essentially identical and their geographical distribution largely overlaps. As related as Ife and Modakeke are, however, both have engaged in protracted conflict for over a century. It remains the oldest intra-ethnic conflict in Nigeria.

The Modakeke people are generally considered strangers, tenants, and migrants in Ife. Historical accounts suggest that they migrated and settled in Ife in the aftermath of the collapse of the Old Oyo empire in the nineteenth century, causing a refugee crisis to the south and resulting in the occupation of their contemporary location. Two distinct categories of people were thus created: the original settlers (landlords) and the migrants, tenants, farmhands, and a resettled group considered as refugees (Modakeke). These categorizations form the remote causes of the conflicts between the two groups. Indeed, crises are bound to exist in relationships like this when parties perceive their aspirations to be contradictory and their values, needs or interests divergent. Thus, while from a general sociocultural and identity perspective the two groups are identical as part of the Yoruba race, economic and political gains engendered through superior–subordinate notions have created an overarching challenge to peace.

The first major economic cause of the crises was the isakole (land tribute) which the Ife landlords collected from the Modakekes until the late 1970s. After the promulgation of the Land Use Decree of March 29, 1978 by the military government, land tributes were abolished. The Decree created uneasy relationships between the two groups as the Ife people perceived it as an infringement of their rights as landowners. The Modakeke, who were predominantly farmers, saw the Decree as an opportunity for free tenancy and refused to pay tributes to their landlords. A battle for liberation then began, finding its expression in the political arena as the legitimate domain for different power groups.

Political agitation for self-determination took the form of local government creation as the third and smallest tier of government in Nigerian federalism. Modakeke agitation for the creation of a Modakeke local government was rejected in 1981 by the Unity Party of Nigeria (UPN) government in Oyo state, led by Governor Bola Ige, due to supposed Modakeke support for a rival party, the National Party of Nigeria (NPN).

The relocation of the headquarters of the Ife–East local government from Modakeke to the Ooni’s Enuowa palace in Ife led to yet another crisis in 1997. Following this crisis, the government’s refusal to reverse the relocation served as evidence of its acquiescence of Ife superiority. The people of Modakeke subsequently boycotted the local government elections of 1999 as an indication of their opposition.

In February 2000, the two communities engaged in yet another violent conflict, resulting in loss of life and property. The federal government intervened by improvising a compromise, announcing its intention to create an Area Office – a sort of sub-local government area for Modakeke. The Area Office became operational on April 1, 2002. Since then, there has been relative peace between the two feuding communities.

The destruction of lives and property during the Ife–Modakeke struggles has been wanton. Records suggest that during the 1997 crisis alone no fewer than 2,000 and perhaps as many as 5,000 people were killed. Property destruction exceeded $42.4 million, and 10,000 farmers were displaced from Modakeke farmlands. Schools, public utilities, houses, and cars were burned while over 10,000 people were internally displaced. Economic activities have been affected, as many businesses have relocated from the two communities due to the ongoing conflict. Suspicion and distrust are mutual, fueling violence at the slightest provocation.

A dangerous dimension is youth aggression and disorientation. Young people became the conscience of their communities during crises and unleashed mayhem beyond the elders’ control. Youth organizations have emerged, however, that have transcended the conflict and immediate post-conflict era. Some of these youth organizations include the Great Ife, Youth Vanguard, Modakeke Progressive Union, and Drivers’ Union.

Permanent resolutions to the conflict, which assumes both ethnic and class dimensions, have been elusive. The first documented account of such an attempt was that by Ibadan's Bashorun Ogunmola of 1849, which involved oath taking and sacrifices by the two communities. Colonial administrations also attempted to resolve the crises, with varying degrees of success. During the Anglo-Yoruba treaties of 1886–93, Ife–Modakeke chiefs were made to sign what has come to be known as the 1893 Peace Treaty to End the Yoruba Wars. All in all, there have been at least 12 high-profile attempts to resolve the crises permanently.

The latest attempt occurred on February 4, 2008, when Governor Olagunsoye Oyinlola of Osun state scheduled a peace meeting between the Ooni of Ife (king of Ife) and Ogunsua of Modakeke (paramount ruler of Modakeke), imploring each to give him peace in the communities as his 57th birthday present. The response of the communities to the meeting was encouraging as both exchanged pleasantries. Nevertheless, it is important to note that such gestures are not new in the history of the Ife–Modakeke conflict.

Immigrant protests, United States, 2000s

David Bacon

On Monday, May 1, 2006 over a million people filled the streets of Los Angeles, with hundreds of thousands more in Chicago, New York, and cities and towns throughout the United States. Again on May Day in 2007 and 2008, immigrant marchers and their supporters demonstrated and marched, from coast to coast. One sign found in almost every march said it all: “We are Workers, not Criminals!” Often, it was held in the calloused hands of men and women who looked as though they’d just come from work in a factory, cleaning an office building, or picking grapes. The sign stated an obvious truth. Millions of people have come to the United States to work, not to break its laws. Some have come with visas, and others without them. But they are all contributors to the society they’ve found here.

The immigrant rights protests in the United States have seemed spontaneous, but they come as a result of years of organizing, educating, and agitating – activities that have given immigrants confidence, and at least some organizations the credibility needed to mobilize direct mass action. This movement is the legacy of Bert Corona, immigrant rights pioneer and founder of many national Latino organizations. He trained thousands of immigrant activists, taught the value of political independence, and believed that immigrants themselves must conduct the fight for immigrant rights. Most of the leaders of the radical wing of today’s immigrant rights movement were students or disciples of Corona.

Immigrants, however, felt their backs are against the wall, and came out of their homes and workplaces to show it. In part, their protests responded to a wave of draconian congressional proposals to criminalize immigration status, and work itself for undocumented people. But the protests were more than reactions to particular congressional or legislative agendas. They were the cumulative response to years of denigrating US immigrants generally, and Mexican and Latinos in particular. In 1986 the Immigration Reform and Control Act made it a crime, for the first time in US history, to hire people without papers. Defenders argued that if people could not legally work they would leave. Life was not so simple.

Undocumented people who migrated to the US formed part of the communities where they lived and worked. They sought the same goals of equality and opportunity that working people in the US had historically fought to achieve. In addition, for most immigrants, there were no jobs to return to in the countries from which they've come. Rufino Dominguez, a Oaxacan community leader in Fresno, California, says, "The North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) made the price of corn so low that it's not economically possible to plant a crop anymore. We come to the US to work because there's no alternative." After Congress passed NAFTA, 6 million displaced people came to the US as a result.

Instead of recognizing the reality that many immigrants were in the US to stay, in the first decade of the twenty-first century the US government attempted to make it a criminal act for immigrants to hold a job. Some states and local communities, seeing a green light from the US Department of Homeland Security, passed measures that go even further. In 2007 Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff proposed a rule requiring employers to fire any worker who could not provide proper documentation for their Social Security numbers provided to their employers. The regulation assumed workers had no valid immigration visa and therefore no valid Social Security number. With 12 million people living in the US without legal immigration status in 2008, the regulation led to massive firings, bringing many industries and businesses to a halt. Citizens and legal visa holders would be swept up as well, since the Social Security database is often inaccurate. Under Chertoff the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement has conducted sweeping workplace raids, arresting and deporting thousands of workers. Many have been charged with an additional crime – identity theft – because they used a Social Security number belonging to someone else to get a job. Yet workers using another number actually deposit money into Social Security funds and will never collect benefits their contributions paid for.

The Arizona legislature has passed a law requiring employers to verify the immigration status of every worker through a federal database called E-Verify, which is even more incomplete and full of errors than Social Security. Under the law, employers were required to fire workers whose names were flagged. And Mississippi passed a bill making it a felony for an undocumented worker to hold a job, with jail time of 1–10 years, fines of up to $10,000, and no bail for anyone arrested. Employers were immune from prosecution.

Many of these punitive measures were incorporated into proposals for "comprehensive immigration reform," that were debated in Congress in 2006 and 2007. The comprehensive bills combined increased enforcement, especially the criminalization of work for the undocumented, with huge guest worker programs under which large employers would recruit temporary labor under contract outside the US, bringing workers into the country in a status that would deny them basic rights and social equality. While those proposals failed in Congress, the Bush administration implemented some of their most draconian provisions by executive order and administrative action. Together, these draconian measures have produced a huge popular response, which has become most visible in the annual marches and demonstrations on May Day. Nativo Lopez, president of both the Mexican American Political Association and the Hermanadad Mexicana Latinoamericana, says the huge number of immigrants and their supporters in the streets found these compromises completely unacceptable. We will only get what we're ready to fight for, but people are ready and willing to fight for the whole enchilada. Washington legislators and lobbyists fear the growth of a new civil rights movement in the streets, because it rejects their compromises and makes demands that go beyond what they have defined as "politically possible."

The marches have put forward an alternative set of demands, which include valid legal status for the 12 million undocumented people in the US, the right to organize to raise wages and gain workplace rights, increased availability of visas which give immigrants some degree of social equality, especially visas based on family reunification, no expansion of guest worker programs, and a guarantee of human rights to immigrants, especially in communities along the US-Mexico border.

At the same time, the price of trying to push people out of the US who had migrated for survival is that the vulnerability of undocumented workers has increased dramatically. Unscrupulous employers use that vulnerability to deny overtime or minimum wage, or fire workers when they protest or organize. Increased vulnerability ultimately results in cheaper labor and fewer rights for everyone. After deporting over 1,000 workers at Swift meatpacking plants, Homeland Security Secretary Chertoff called for linking “effective interior enforcement and a temporary-worker program.” The government’s goal is cheap labor for large employers. Deportations, firings, and guest worker programs all make labor cheaper and contribute to a climate of fear and insecurity for all workers.

The May 1 actions highlighted the economic importance of immigrant labor. Undocumented workers deserve legal status because of that labor – their inherent contribution to society. The value they create is never called illegal, and no one dreams of taking it away from the employers who profit from it. Yet the people who produce that value are called exactly that – illegal. All workers create value through their labor, but immigrant workers are especially profitable because they are so often denied many of the union-won benefits accorded to native-born workers. By 2008 the average undocumented worker had been in the US for five years. By that time, these workers have paid a high price for their lack of legal status, through low wages and lost benefits. As a result a growing number of immigrant activists and organizers have argued that immigrants have already earned the right to stay in the US legally. “Undocumented workers deserve immediate legal status, and have already paid for it,” according to immigrant organizer Nativo Lopez.

On May 1 the absence of immigrant workers from workplaces, schools, and stores demonstrated their power in the US national immigration debate and continuously sends a powerful message that that they will not be shut out of the debate over their status. They have rescued from anonymity the struggle for the 8-hour day, begun in the Haymarket tragedy on May 4, 1884 in Chicago by immigrants of that era. They overcame the legacy of the Cold War, in which celebrations of May Day were attacked and banned. In the early twenty-first century, immigrants have recovered the radical traditions of all working people in the US.

Immigrant and social conflict, France

Mary Demhurst Lewis

France has been a major country of immigration for a century and a half, thanks to spontaneous labor migration in the nineteenth century, organized recruitment during and after World War I, and refugee resettlement in the 1920s. By 1931, France’s population was nearly 7 percent foreign, and by the 1980s, some 25 percent of French citizens had at least one immigrant grandparent.

Almost continuously since 1889 – except during World War II and despite restrictions instituted between 1993 and 1998 – France’s liberal nationality laws have allowed children born in France to claim citizenship at adulthood if residency requirements are met. But French society has also confronted periodic waves of xenophobia, and France’s colonial past continues to breed social division. France’s political tradition downplays cultural differences in the name of an idealized notion of the common good – which, paradoxically, also prevents discrimination from being addressed and hinders the accommodation of religious pluralism in a country where in the early twenty-first century Muslims represent 5–10 percent of the 61 million residents.

Changes in Immigration Trends, 1945–1962

In the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, France’s immigrants came mostly from within Europe. Migration from the overseas empire was heavily restricted until after World War II, when impediments to it became more difficult to sustain. A 1947 law making Algerians “citizens” rather than “subjects” affirmed the principle of free circulation between Algeria, a French colony since 1830, and France itself. Whereas North Africans constituted just over 2 percent of France’s immigrant population in 1946, by 1968 they represented nearly a quarter of it. Facing this population shift, the government aimed to counterbalance Algerian migration by facilitating the entry of southern Europeans and encouraging “voluntary” repatriations of Algerians. Between 1946 and 1968, the size of the Spanish immigrant population doubled, while that of the Portuguese increased 13 times. The Portuguese population tripled again between 1968 and 1982.

Once post-World War II rebuilding got underway, jobs remained plentiful until the oil shock of the 1970s. Unemployment ranged between 1 and 2 percent between 1950 and 1973, as French GDP per capita grew 150 percent during the same period. The expansion of the consumer goods market drove this growth and the demand for immigrant labor. Increasing affluence also bred new social divisions. At war’s end, much of the population lived modestly, often making do without indoor plumbing, piped gas, electric appliances, or automobiles. As the middle class expanded, their standard of living improved, while working-class immigrants often continued to live in overcrowded and less comfortable conditions. Immigrant shantytowns, which sprouted up in France’s industrial suburbs, epitomized this new social inequality. Housing discrimination was partially to blame for the advent of shantytowns, as newly constructed low-income housing estates initially housed few immigrants.

The concentration of Algerian immigrants in shantytowns made them prime targets of propaganda during the Algerian War (1954–62). The French Federation of the Algerian Front de Libération Nationale (FLN) circulated in the shantytowns, gathering and sometimes coercing contributions for their cause. Meanwhile, the French police and social services also intervened, subjecting shantytown residents to surveillance and paternalist measures that were off-limits with the majority population. In particular, the Paris police under the leadership of Maurice Papon (b. 1910) used Algerian auxiliary police forces to interrogate and sometimes torture their countrymen who were brought in for questioning.

In order to curtail the FLN’s nocturnal collections, and in reprisal for FLN attacks on the police, Papon ordered a curfew for all Algerian French Muslims in October 1961. To protest the curfew, the FLN organized the first mass demonstration by Algerian immigrants in Paris. Police estimated that 25,000 Algerians participated in the October 17 demonstration. Although the protesters remained peaceful, police made over 11,500 arrests, conducted over 14,000 interrogations, and killed a still untold number of demonstrators. Estimates of deaths range from as few as two to as many as 300.

The October 1961 incidents helped bring the Algerian war to mainland France. Although led by Muslims and occasionally making symbolic use of Islam, the Algerian insurrection was not about religion so much as the right to self-rule. Religion entered into the question mainly because the French government had, since its conquest of Algeria in 1830, treated Muslims as “subjects,” requiring them to maintain Quranic civil status, and then using this as a pretext for denying political rights. Until 1947, the Muslim franchise was restricted to a tiny minority, only able to vote in local elections for councils engineered to ensure French predominance. The Muslim majority was also subjected, through a series of “indigenous codes,” to repressive laws from which the minority ruling population were exempt. In contrast to Muslims, Jews were collectively naturalized under the Crémieux Decree of 1870.

Immigration and Islam in France After Algerian Independence

Algeria’s independence in 1962 raised the question of the legal status of the 350,000 Algerians living in France. Although the French government had long claimed that Muslim Algerians were French nationals, after independence it forced Algerians living in France to apply for citizenship. This was not required of so-called pieds noirs, the Algeria-born descendants of European settlers. In this way, the colonial condition affected Algerian immigrants even after decolonization.

From the 1970s on, new immigration from sub-Saharan Africa contributed to an increasingly diverse Muslim population in France. Customs among France’s Muslims varied, and some practices – such as animal sacrifices and polygamy, however rare – occasionally provoked legal conflicts. Nonetheless, public debate regarding, and government attention to, Islam remained limited until the late 1980s, when the first of three “Muslim headscarf” debates erupted. Rather than establish an official body to regulate Muslim affairs, as had existed for Protestants and Jews since Napoleon, the French government encouraged Arab states to oversee Muslim practices in France. As a result, mosque construction was funded, and imams were trained and remunerated, largely by foreign sources. The institution, in 2002, of a French Council for the Muslim Religion marked the first attempt to create a permanent domestic structure to manage relations between the secular state and Islam.

The Politicization of Immigration in the 1980s

Immigration entered the public eye in the 1980s thanks to the political coming of age of second-generation descendants of North African immigrants and the xenophobic platform of the far-right political party the Front National (FN). Led by Jean-Marie Le Pen (b. 1928), a former paratrooper in the Algerian War, the FN was formed in 1972. In his first bid for presidential office in 1974, Le Pen acquired less than 1 percent of the vote, but a worsening economy, relentless campaigning, and shifts in party politics enabled him to win more than 14 percent of the vote in the 1988 elections, and 17 percent in 2002. Unemployment, which had been negligible in the 1960s, reached 6 percent in 1980, 10 percent in 1985, and 13 percent in 1999. Drawing many of its adherents from disaffected working-class persons who had formerly voted for the Communist Party, the FN proposed to address the unemployment crisis by expelling immigrants. The government’s discontinuation of labor immigration in 1974 did not subdue anti-immigrant politics. As asylum and family reunification replaced labor contracts as the main means of emigrating legally, immigrant workers settled more permanently and had their families join them, fearing that even temporary visits home would prevent readmission. The disconnection between the newly visible immigrant families and the official rhetoric that immigration had been stopped fed into France’s new political divisions.

New forms of social segregation also contributed to the politicization of immigration. As the original occupants of the suburban housing estates began to move, immigrants took their place, prompting other long-term residents to flee. When jobs became scarce, conditions in the housing projects worsened, becoming a source of discontent among the second generation, who, while legally French, felt trapped in what had become ghettos. They expressed their dissatisfaction through popular music, in political protest, and occasionally through violent attacks on symbols of affluence and mobility. The first notable such incident occurred in the Lyons suburb of Vénissieux in the summer of 1981, when over 250 cars were destroyed. In the aftermath of this violence, young-adult children of immigrants set off in 1983 from Vénissieux and similarly disaffected suburbs on a march “for equality and against racism” that traversed France and grew to be 100,000-strong by the time it culminated in Paris six weeks later. This “March of the Beurs” (after the slang inversion of the French word “Arabes”) marked the advent of a new generation of political actors.

New Divisions Since the Late 1980s

The politicization of immigration initially turned on social, rather than religious, factors. Muslim adolescents’ clothing did not spark controversy until 1989, when Ernest Chénière (b. 1945), the principal of a middle school in the Parisian suburb of Creil, expelled three girls for wearing “veils” in a public school. French schools are strictly secular, but the action was seen as an attack on religious freedom. In response to the ensuing debate, the socialist minister of education, Lionel Jospin (b. 1937), refrained from establishing a universal policy regarding headscarves, contending that decisions regarding discipline rested with the individual leadership of each school. The French Council of State upheld Jospin’s approach, issuing an opinion in November 1989 permitting veils as long as they did not interfere with a school’s educational mission. A second headscarf debate erupted in 1994, when the center-right education minister François Bayrou (b. 1951) forbade “ostentatious” religious signs, claiming that the very wearing of them constituted proselytism. A third phase of the debate emerged when a new center-right government appointed a commission in 2003 to advise the legislature on Islam in public life. By this time, the debate was inflected by fears of political Islam, which grew with the worsening of the Israeli–Palestinian conflict, Algeria’s spiral into brutal civil war in the 1990s after the cancellation in 1992 of elections which fundamentalist Islamists stood poised to win, the 1995 bombing of a Parisian subway station by adherents of the Algerian "Armed Islamic Group," a resurgence of anti-Semitic incidents involving French Muslims, and the September 11, 2001 al-Qaeda attacks in the United States in which a French citizen, Zacarias Moussaoui (b. 1968), was implicated and later found guilty of involvement. Although only about 1,500 Muslim public school pupils insisted, for various reasons, on covering their heads at school in 2004, the commission's recommendations led to a March 15, 2004 law banning the wearing of "ostentatious" religious signs in public schools. The French media overwhelmingly applauded the law as a stand for universal values and women's rights against balkanization and extremism.

As France entered the twenty-first century, despair in the suburbs reached unprecedented levels. Jobless rates in 1999 approached 20 percent in the suburbs and reached levels of 40–50 percent for young adults in some places. Idle youth increasingly came into conflict with the police, whose tough-law tactics had fostered accusations of mistreatment since the 1980s. In the fall of 2005, violence erupted after two teenagers were electrocuted and a third was injured while taking refuge from the police in a power station in Clichy-sous-Bois, a Paris suburb. Between October 27 and November 17, young suburban residents set fire to some 10,000 cars and about 300 buildings. Three people died in the unrest that spread to a few hundred different suburban municipalities throughout the country. To restore order, the government authorized a curfew in some areas, drawing on a law that had been initially intended to quell FLN operations during the Algerian War. Although some politicians and commentators saw the riots as an indication of a larger cultural clash between Islam and the West, not all participants were Muslim, and no evidence of a direct link between the unrest and militant Islamic groups emerged. By contrast, some imams appealed for calm.

While French political culture has made addressing prejudice difficult, recent governments have tried to address some of the underlying social causes of unrest, with few tangible results. The socialist government's reduction of the work week to 35 hours in 1998 sought to create more jobs and greater job flexibility but has been unpopular among many of the people it aimed to help because it has restricted overtime.

In early 2006, the center-right government under Dominique de Villepin announced its own strategy for creating a more supple labor market: the "first job contract," which would allow employers to hire persons under age 26 for two years and dismiss them without cause at any time during that period. The contract created a furor, as the labor unions joined forces with university and eventually high school students to protest this apparent strike at job security. Massive demonstrations and campus occupations in the heart of Paris and other major cities throughout March and into April 2006 were led primarily by middle-class students and public employees unions, not by the youth who were the target of the reform, though some of these did become embroiled in violent skirmishes and vandalism, some of it reminiscent of the November 2005 conflicts. The movement was so persistent that the government was forced to reverse the reform.

Conclusion

The 2006 demonstrations proved that concerted social movements striking directly at political power in the capital can be effective, at least at blocking the liberalization of the labor market. It is less clear how to foster job creation and fight discrimination. The unrest in 2005 rekindled debates about how the French can best manage their nation's pluralism. Some commentators have called for a multiculturalist approach that would institute a form of "positive discrimination," as affirmative action programs are known in France. Others reject multiculturalism as an Anglo-American import that institutionalizes racism. It remains unclear how French society will address worsening unemployment, religious division, social stratification, and the legacy of imperialism as the twenty-first century progresses.

Imperialism and capitalist development

Paul Le Blanc

The development of the global economy since the sixteenth century – especially as it has accelerated since the explosion of the Industrial Revolution at the end of the eighteenth century – has, to a very large extent, provided the context and the impetus for the rise of modern revolutionary protests. Essential conceptualizations for understanding this process have involved the interlinked notions of imperialism (defined here as economic expansion beyond the borders of a nation into other regions, often economically less developed, in order to secure markets, raw materials, and investment opportunities) and capitalist development.

Such concepts have evolved as part of the Marxist theoretical tradition – although they have also influenced, and been influenced by, theorists and observers functioning outside of that framework. Especially since the realities being dealt with are incredibly complex, quite dynamic, and relatively fluid, it should not be surprising that there have been significant differences (including among many relating to the Marxist tradition) on how best to understand the realities, and on the adequacy or proper use of one or another theorization. Nonetheless, certain continuities in analysis can be traced that appear to have value for understanding the contexts within which protests and revolutions have emerged. Examining these concepts helps to shed light, at the very least, on the ideological orientations of many who have engaged in such protests and revolutions.

Elements in Marx’s Thought

In the 1848 Communist Manifesto, Karl Marx (1818–1883) and co-thinker Friedrich Engels (1820–1895) described capitalism as an inherently expansionistic global economic system. “The discovery of America, the rounding of the Cape, opened up fresh ground for the rising bourgeoisie [i.e., capitalist class],” they wrote. The rise of the capitalist mode of production in Europe was seen as being intimately connected with the penetration of “the East-Indian and Chinese markets, the colonization of America, trade with the colonies,” and with the Industrial Revolution “modern industry has established the world market”; “the need of a constantly expanding market for its products chases the bourgeoisie over the whole surface of the globe. It must nestle everywhere, settle everywhere, establish connections everywhere.”

Marx and Engels noted that “the bourgeoisie has through its exploitation of the world market given a cosmopolitan character to production and consumption in every country.” In addition to the relentless quest for markets, it has developed a need for “raw material drawn from the remotest zones; industries whose products are consumed, not only at home, but in every quarter of the globe,” at the same time “creating new wants, requiring for their satisfaction the products of distant lands and climes,” resulting in the “universal inter-dependence of nations.” According to the Manifesto:

The bourgeoisie, by the rapid improvement of all instruments of production, by the immensely facilitated means of communication, draws all, even the most barbarian, nations into civilization. The cheap prices of its commodities are the heavy artillery with which it batters down all Chinese walls, with which it forces the barbarians’ intensely obstinate hatred of foreigners to capitulate. It compels all nations, on pain of extinction, to adopt the bourgeois mode of production; it compels them to introduce what it calls civilization into their midst, i.e., to become bourgeois themselves. In one word, it creates a world after its own image.

Marx and Engels added that “just as it has made the country dependent on the towns, so it has made barbarian and semi-barbarian countries dependent on the civilized ones, nations of peasants on nations of bourgeoisie, the East on the West.”

The Communist Manifesto perceived an inexorable spread of capitalism across the face of the Earth, accompanied by the increasing dispossession, proletarianization, and exploitation of the world's peoples for the enrichment of dominant capitalist minorities. A result would be the struggles of various sections of the growing working class against various aspects of oppression, in order to advance living standards, human rights, and democracy. Ultimately this would culminate in working-class majorities taking political power in more and more sections of the world, and then advancing toward socialism. This creative and emancipatory conclusion, however, was dependent on the relentless global onslaught of capitalist development.

In his masterwork of 1867, the first volume of Capital, Marx described the development of capitalism as a global accumulation process in which capital changed its form within the market place – from money to means of production (raw materials and tools) combined with labor-power, leading to the process of production in which “the means of production have been converted into commodities whose value exceeds that of their component parts, and thus contains the capital originally advanced plus a surplus-value.” These commodities then “must be sold, their value must be realized in money, this money transformed once again into capital, and so on, again and again.” Marx waxed poetic: “Accumulate, accumulate! That is Moses and the prophets! ‘Industry furnishes the material which saving accumulates.’ Therefore save, save, i.e., reconvert the greatest possible portion of surplus-value or surplus product into capital.”

From its very beginning, this essential accumulation process pushed capital beyond national boundaries, contributing to the rise of “the colonial system [which] ripened trade and navigation as in a hothouse.” This system involved the military and political domination by an advanced capitalist nation-state (the “mother country”) over economically and technologically less advanced areas (the colonies), for the purpose of securing markets, raw materials, and investment opportunities. Throughout the period of what Marx termed primitive capital accumulation, “the colonies provided a market for the budding manufactures, and a vast increase in accumulation which was guaranteed by the mother country’s monopoly of the market” – but, more than this, “the treasures captured outside Europe by undisguised looting, enslavement and murder flowed back to the mother-country and were turned into capital there.” Marx summarized: “Capital comes dripping from head to toe, from every pore, with blood and dirt.”

The capital accumulation process was nothing less than a capitalist exploitation process in which “the wealth of the nation is, . . . by its very nature, identical with the misery of the people.” The impact of colonialism on native peoples, he noted, simply highlighted the dynamic within “the mother country” itself: “The capitalist modes of production and accumulation, and therefore capitalist private property as well, have for their fundamental condition the annihilation of that private property of the individual himself; in other words, the expropriation of the worker.” In the third volume of Capital, Marx noted that “capital invested in foreign trade can yield a higher rate of profit” in the colonies “on account of the lower degree of development, and so too is the exploitation of labor, through the use of slaves and coolies, etc.”

The fact is, however, that while Marx was an astute observer of capitalist economic development and its growing penetration and impact throughout the world, he was not in a position to develop an analysis of the new forms of imperialism that were to become so important in the years after his death. More than this, different scholars have drawn on his writings to highlight very different understandings of how these pieces fit together. While Bill Warren in his provocative study Imperialism, Pioneer of Capitalism (1980) argued that imperialism has played an essential pre-capitalist obstacle to modernization and industrial growth, which are prerequisites for socialism, an older work by Paul Baran, The Political Economy of Growth (1957), stressed that the impact of imperialism was not to promote modernization and economic progress in “backward” areas but to keep these areas backward the better to exploit them for the benefit of the advanced capitalist countries. This mirrors differences that arose in the early twentieth century among European socialists – with reformists such as Eduard Bernstein (1850–1932) arguing that colonialism had a progressive role to play. “Our economies are based, in large measure, on the extraction from the colonies of products that the native peoples had no idea how to use,” he emphasized, adding that there was also “the need for civilized peoples to act somewhat like guardians of the uncivilized.” Revolutionaries such as Rosa Luxemburg (1870–1919) and V. I. Lenin (1870–1924), on the other hand, insisted that colonialism and all forms of imperialism represented negative developments that must be opposed.

Aside from controversies over how one might utilize different aspects of Marx’s thought in dealing with developments after his death, there have been controversies over how Marx himself viewed matters in the face of the realities of his own time. In a 1968 introduction for a collection of excerpts and articles “on colonialism and modernization” (conceptualizations that were actually not part of Marx’s vocabulary), Shlomo Avineri (1969) suggested that Marx – concerned about the static and authoritarian qualities which he associated with variants of “the Asiatic mode of production” – looked favorably on the impact of western colonialism. According to Avineri, Marx felt that the progressive road to modernization and socialism required the break-up of traditional hierarchical societies which, at least in sections of Asia, could not be accomplished by internal social forces. Instead, “the heavy artillery” of colonialism would be required to batter down walls of tradition. Kenzo Mohri (2000) has argued, on the other hand, that Marx did, in the 1840s and 1850s, believe in “the ‘revolutionary’ role of British free trade,” but from the 1860s onward he had come to the conclusion that “the forcible integration of the old society into the world market system” would yield negative rather than “progressive” consequences and should therefore be opposed.

Revolutionary Theorizations of Imperialism

Harry Magdoff (1913–2006) was one of the most influential analysts of imperialism in the late twentieth century, closely associated, through Monthly Review, with Paul Sweezy and Paul Baran. All followed lines of analysis laid out by V. I. Lenin in 1916, who in turn was influenced by the non-Marxist left-liberal J. A. Hobson, the Austrian German Social Democrat Rudolf Hilferding, and Lenin’s Bolshevik comrade Nikolai Bukharin.

As Magdoff notes, “empire-building, territorial expansion, and domination of weaker by stronger powers – features commonly associated with the term imperialism – have a long history.”

In pre-capitalist social systems, however, “the economic root of expansionism was the exaction of tribute” through such means as “plunder, piracy, capture of slaves, and the establishment of colonies,” while for capitalist powers “the economies and societies of the conquered or dominated areas were transformed, adapted, and manipulated to serve as best they could the imperatives of capital accumulation at the center.” As Magdoff points out, Lenin led the way in seeking to limit the term imperialism to the form it took beginning in the late nineteenth century, in order “to distinguish its unique features from earlier processes of expansionism.” Magdoff suggested the following as defining periods of capitalist expansionism:

1. Late 1400s to mid-1600s: European commerce enters the world state.
2. Mid-1600s to late 1700s: commercial capital dominant.
3. Late 1700s to the 1870s: rise of industrial capital.
4. 1880s to World War I (1914–18): monopoly capital and the new imperialism.
5. Since 1918: decolonization and the rise of the multinational corporation.

Following Lenin, Magdoff viewed the last two periods listed above as the epoch of modern imperialism. Viewing the US capitalist economy as an organic whole that is inseparable from the global economy, what he termed “world monopoly capitalism” (essentially a market economy dominated by powerful multinational corporations), he added that “it is important to recognize the essential unity of the economics, politics, militarism, and culture of this social organism.” His conclusion was that “imperialism is the way of life of capitalism. Therefore, the elimination of imperialism requires the overthrow of capitalism.”

Rosa Luxemburg’s classic The Accumulation of Capital (1913) offered perspectives on imperialism quite consistent with aspects of Magdoff’s perspective, but containing several distinctive features different from the Leninist view. A key involves her stress on the coexistence in the world of different cultures, different types of society, and different modes of production (or forms of economy – different economic systems). Historically, the dominant form of economy worldwide was the communal hunting and gathering mode of production, which was succeeded in many areas by a more or less communistic agricultural form of economy which she characterized as a primitive “peasant economy.” This was succeeded in some areas by non-egalitarian societies dominated by militarily powerful elites, constituting modes of production that she labeled “slave economy” and “feudalism.” Sometimes coexisting with, sometimes superseding, these was a “simple commodity production” in which artisans and farmers, for example, would produce commodities for the market in order to trade or sell for the purpose of acquiring other commodities that they might need or want. This simple commodity mode of production is different from the capitalist mode of production, driven by the capital accumulation process, overseen by an increasingly wealthy and powerful capitalist minority.

Three features especially differentiate the analysis in The Accumulation of Capital from the perspectives of other prominent Marxists.

(1) Luxemburg advances a controversial conceptualization of imperialism’s relationship to the exploitation of the working class in the advanced capitalist countries. Because workers receive less value than what they create, they are unable to purchase and consume all that is produced. This underconsumption means that capitalists must expand into non-capitalist areas, seeking markets as well as raw materials and investment opportunities (particularly new sources of labor) outside of the capitalist economic sphere.

“Non-capitalist organizations provide a fertile soil for capitalism,” she noted, which means that “capital feeds on the ruins of such organizations, and, although this non-capitalist milieu is indispensable for accumulation, the latter proceeds, at the cost of this medium nevertheless, by eating it up.” Penetration into non-capitalist economies facilitates the capital accumulation process, but capitalist accumulation “corrodes and assimilates” these economies. This constituted a new contradiction: “capital cannot accumulate without the aid of non-capitalist organizations, nor, on the other hand, can it tolerate their continued existence side by side with itself. Only the continuous and progressive disintegration of non-capitalist organizations makes accumulation of capital possible.” The inevitable tendency this leads to will be “the standstill of accumulation,” which “means that the development of the productive forces is arrested,” leading to capitalist collapse.

(2) Another distinctive quality of her conceptualization of imperialism is that it is not restricted to “the highest stage” or “latest stage” of capitalism. Rather, imperialism is something that one finds at the earliest beginnings of capitalism – in the period of what Marx calls “primitive capitalist accumulation” – and which continues non-stop, with increasing and overwhelming reach and velocity, down to the present. Or as she puts it, “capitalism in its full maturity also depends in all respects on non-capitalist strata and social organizations existing side by side with it,” and “since the accumulation of capital becomes impossible in all points without non-capitalist surroundings, we cannot gain a true picture of it by assuming the exclusive and absolute domination of the capitalist mode of production.” Quoting Marx, she concluded:

The historical career of capitalism can only be appreciated by taking them together. “Sweating blood and filth with every pore from head to toe” characterizes not only the birth of capital but also its progress in the world at every step, and thus capitalism prepares its own downfall under ever more violent contortions and convulsions.

This meant, on the international arena, colonial policy, an international loan system – a policy of spheres of interest – and war. Force, fraud, oppression, looting are openly displayed without any attempt at concealment, and it requires an effort to discover within this tangle of political violence and contests of power the stern laws of the economic process.

(3) Another special feature of Luxemburg’s contribution is her anthropological sensitivity to the impact of capitalist expansion on the rich variety of the world’s peoples and cultures that one cannot find in the key works of Hilferding, Lenin, and Bukharin. The survey of capitalist expansionism’s impact in her Accumulation of Capital includes such examples as:

- the destruction of the English peasants and artisans;
- the destruction of the Native American peoples (the so-called Indians);
- the enslavement of African peoples by the European powers;
- the ruination of small farmers in the mid-western and western regions of the United States;

- the onslaught of French colonialism in Algeria;
- the onslaught of British colonialism in India;
- British incursions into China, with special reference to the Opium wars;
- the onslaught of British colonialism in South Africa (with lengthy reference to the three-way struggle of black African peoples, the Dutch Boers, and the British).

“Each new colonial expansion is accompanied, as a matter of course, by a relentless battle of capital against the social and economic ties of the natives,” she wrote, “who are also forcibly robbed of their means of production and labor power.” Observing that “from the point of view of the primitive societies involved, it is a matter of life or death,” she noted that the invariable consequence involved “permanent occupation of the colonies by the military” and that “native risings and punitive expeditions are the order of the day for any colonial regime.” The economic underpinnings of such realities were always emphasized: “Their means of production and their labor power no less than their demand for surplus products is necessary to capitalism,” Luxemburg wrote. “Yet the latter is fully determined to undermine their independence as social units, in order to gain possession of their means of production and labor power and to convert them into commodity buyers.” But the destructive impact of all this on the cultures of the world’s peoples was emphasized by Luxemburg as by no other Marxist theorist of her time: “The unbridled greed, the acquisitive instinct of accumulation must by its very nature take every advantage of the conditions of the market and can have no thought for the morrow. It is incapable of seeing far enough to recognize the value of the economic monuments of an older civilization.”

These strengths in Luxemburg’s analysis were drawn together, in 1915, after the eruption of World War I, in an eloquent anti-war polemic composed from a prison cell:

Capitalist desire for imperialist expansion, as the expression of its highest maturity in the last period of its life, has the economic tendency to change the whole world into capitalistically producing nations, to sweep away all superannuated, pre-capitalistic methods of production and society, to subjugate all the riches of the earth and all means of production to capital, to turn the laboring masses of all zones into wage slaves. In Africa and in Asia, from the most northern regions to the southernmost point of South America and the South Seas, the remnants of old communistic social groups, of feudal society, of patriarchal systems, and of ancient handicraft production are destroyed and stamped out by capitalism. Whole peoples are destroyed, ancient civilizations are leveled to the ground, and in their place profiteering in its most modern forms is being established.

This brutal triumphant procession of capitalism through the world, accompanied by all the means of force, of robbery, and of infamy, has one bright phase: it has created the premises for its own final overthrow, it has established the capitalist world rule which, alone, the socialist world revolution can follow. This is the only cultural and progressive aspect of the great so-called works of culture that were brought to the primitive countries. To capitalist economists and politicians, railroads, matches, sewerage systems, and warehouses are progress and culture. Of themselves such works, grafted upon primitive conditions, are neither culture nor progress, for they are too dearly paid for with the sudden economic and cultural ruin of the peoples who must drink down the bitter cup of misery and horror of two social orders, of traditional agricultural landlordism, of super-modern, super-refined capitalist exploitation, at one and the same time.

While sharing Luxemburg’s revolutionary commitments and aspects of her analysis, Lenin’s discussion of imperialism in his 1916 Imperialism, The Highest Stage of Capitalism offers a quite different perspective. According to Lenin, Marx’s analysis held that under capitalist development “free competition gives way to the concentration of production, which, in turn, at a certain stage of development, leads to monopoly.” Lenin argued that “capitalism [was] transformed into imperialism” by the opening of the twentieth century. “Although commodity production still ‘reigns’ and continues to be regarded as the basis of economic life, it has in reality been undermined and the bulk of the profits go to the ‘geniuses’ of financial manipulation.” He defined finance capital as “the concentration of production; the monopolies arising therefrom; the merging or coalescence of the banks with industry.”

This was a period, according to Lenin, in which “a monopoly . . . inevitably penetrates into every sphere of public life, regardless of the form of government and other ‘details,’” with a tendency by the state to identify the needs of the massive firms with the national interest. This is also a period in which “the ownership of capital is separated from the application of capital to production, . . . and that the rentier on income obtained from money capital, is separated from the entrepreneur and all who are directly concerned in the management of capital.” Financialmanagerial interests assume heightened importance. Under the old capitalism, the export of goods was typical, while under the new capitalism of the early twentieth century the more important dynamic is the export of capital.

The logic of the accumulation process, in Lenin’s view, leads to the fact that “surplus capital will be utilized not for the purpose of raising the standard of living of the masses in a given country, for this would mean a decline of profits for the capitalists, but for the purpose of increasing profits by exporting capital abroad to the backward countries. In these backward countries profits are usually high, for capital is scarce, the price of land is relatively low, wages are low, raw materials are cheap.” While Luxemburg saw capital as being driven into “under-developed” areas of Asia, Africa, and Latin America because the capital accumulation process was being clogged in the more capitalistically developed terrain of Europe and North America, Lenin perceived, more simply, a magnetically inexorable pull of investment opportunities. Luxemburg thought that when all the world was finally in the embrace of capitalist development, the system’s collapse was assured. Lenin, not accepting all of Luxemburg’s reasoning, did not assume this to be so, although he viewed imperialism as increasing and intensifying “the anarchy inherent in capitalist production as a whole,” certainly for workers affected by capital flight to far-off lands.

For Lenin, however, imperialism involved not simply the quest for profits in formally colonized areas, but also the drive to invest in independent countries, sometimes “semi-colonies” for all practical purposes, but sometimes enjoying even greater autonomy than that – creating “diverse forms of dependent countries which, politically, are formally independent, but in fact, are enmeshed in the net of financial and diplomatic dependence.” While this might “to a certain extent . . . arrest development in the capital-exporting countries, it can only do so by expanding and deepening the further development of capitalism throughout the world.” In contrast to Luxemburg, Lenin stressed that expanding capital sought entry into “not only agrarian territories, but even most highly industrialized regions . . . because (1) the fact that the world is already partitioned [into colonial empires] obliges those contemplating a redivision to reach out for every kind of territory, and (2) an essential feature of imperialism is the rivalry between several great powers in the striving for hegemony.” He concluded:

The epoch of the latest stage of capitalism shows us that certain relations between capitalist associations grow up, based on the economic division of the world; while parallel to and in connection with it, certain relations grow up between political alliances, between states, on the basis of the territorial divisions of the world, of the struggle for colonies, of the “struggle for spheres of influence.”

The result of all this, in the view of Lenin and Luxemburg alike, would be a chain of catastrophes: world crises, economic depressions, social calamities, wars, dictatorships, civil strife, and the possibility – through the intensification of struggles of oppressed people (particularly class-conscious workers) throughout the world – of revolutions. Yet the process was complex, Lenin cautioned, largely because of imperialist-created divisions among workers not simply along national lines but even within countries: “Imperialism has the tendency to create privileged sections also among the workers, and to detach them from the broad masses of the proletariat.”

Challenging the Revolutionary Analyses of Imperialism

Against the belief, shared by Luxemburg and Lenin, that imperialism is inseparable from the nature and existence of capitalism, the prominent Marxist Karl Kautsky (1854–1938) – choosing a different theoretical path than his erstwhile comrades – advanced the view that “imperialism is a particular kind of capitalist policy, just like Manchesterism [i.e., free trade], which it replaces." For Kautsky, imperialism involved "the struggle of every big capitalist state to expand its own colonial empire in conflict with other kingdoms of this kind." It represented "only one among various means of expanding capitalism." Not only is it not "necessary for the continuation of the capitalist mode of production," he argued, but it is "becoming a barrier" to capitalist development. According to Kautsky, "the capitalist economy . . . is extremely threatened by the conflict between the states," and he added, only slightly tongue in cheek, that "every far-sighted capitalist today must call to his comrades: Capitalists of the world unite!"

Kautsky envisioned a possible future development that he termed ultra-imperialism: "dissolving imperialism by a holy alliance of the imperialists." This would not eliminate the subjugation of agrarian countries for their raw materials by advanced capitalist countries, he acknowledged. Only the overthrow of capitalism by the working class, he asserted, or by independence struggles of the colonized peoples, could accomplish that. But ultra-imperialism – like capitalism itself – could represent a progressive stage in the development toward socialism. George Lichtheim has characterized Kautsky's conception of ultra-imperialism as "a planetary economy controlled by a unified elite of scientifically trained managers who have left the national state behind and merged their separate identities in the formation of a global cartel linking all the industrially advanced centers of the world."

Although he saw ultra-imperialism as something that "of course we must fight against just as energetically as we fought against imperialism," Kautsky sounded a characteristically optimistic note: "Socialism, that is general well-being within modern civilization, would only be possible through a powerful development of the productive forces which it concentrates into the hands of the capitalist class." He saw that "the various states of the world are at very different stages of economic and political development," but it was possible, in his view, that ultra-imperialism could facilitate a progressive development. In line with the unilinear schema which was part of his own brand of Marxist orthodoxy, he emphasized that "the more a state is capitalist on the one hand and democratic on the other, the nearer it is to socialism."

The divergent conceptions of imperialism that we have noted here dovetail with profoundly different theorizations regarding economic development in the modern world.

Imperialism, historical evolution

Clifford D. Conner

When the apologetics and ideological obfuscation are stripped away, the essence of imperialism is straightforward and easy to understand: It is the forced subjugation of less powerful nations by more powerful nations. It is invariably accompanied by cruelty and oppression on the part of the conquerors, and resistance – sometimes simmering under the surface but frequently bursting forth in protest, rebellion, and revolution – on the part of the victims. Since 1500, when Europeans gained control of the seas, European nations and their American offshoot have been the foremost imperialist powers.

Imperialism has existed since ancient times – the “first imperialist” of recorded history was Sargon of Akkad, who subjugated the neighboring city-states of Mesopotamia – but the European expansion that began just before 1500 represented a qualitative change in the character of imperialism. For most of the many millennia of human history, Europe was a backward and unimportant part of the world. It remained that way until about 500 years ago, when Europeans suddenly burst forth and began to dominate the entire globe. The advent and spread of empires of European origin is the primary historical determinant of the state of the world as it is today. The world is divided into nation-states, a few of which are wealthy and technologically advanced, but most of which, representing the overwhelming majority of the human race, are mired in poverty and dependency. The United States, for example, with only 6 percent of the world’s population, consumes an estimated 40 percent of its resources. The history of imperialism affords some insights into how this extremely inequitable situation came about.

Ancient imperialism was essentially a military phenomenon, sometimes but not always supplemented by political control. The underlying motivation for imperial conquest was nakedly economic: the conqueror wanted tribute. A conquered city would have the choice of paying up voluntarily or being sacked and looted. An ancient empire was not usually an organically connected social system, but a loose federation of territories that were forced to pay heavy taxes to a central authority. The payments would have to be regular and ongoing, so it amounted to what might be thought of as a large-scale protection racket.

Some ancient empires – the Chinese, for example – went further and were able to politically and culturally unify their territories, but that was the exception rather than the rule. Ancient empires were not held together by economic forces; they were maintained by soldiers, policemen, bureaucrats, and the threat of violence. The economic basis of ancient imperialism was generally no more complicated than putting a gun to a person’s head and demanding their money. Modern imperialism is a much more sophisticated form of robbery.

The key to world conquest in the early modern era was gaining control over the ocean routes that ships depended upon for carrying longdistance trade. Whoever controlled the sea lanes could eventually control the world. In the waning years of the fifteenth century, when Portuguese ships first crept around the Cape of Good Hope at the southern tip of Africa and tentatively entered the Indian Ocean, they found no one there capable of stopping them, so they and other Europeans were able to establish control over the world’s most important trade routes.

Some European kings and queens played a role in promoting the development of sea power and long-distance trade. Decisions of monarchs, however, were not the dynamic force behind European expansionism. The real motive that caused the ships to be built and then put out to sea was commercial profit. The key to European expansion was neither kings seeking new lands to pay them tribute, nor generals seeking glory, but merchants seeking markets for their goods.

Monarchs, landed aristocracies, and the Catholic Church all wielded a great deal of political power in fifteenth-century Europe, but they were perpetually engaged in a three-way power struggle, which gave the merchant classes ample room to thrive in their relatively free cities. As the merchants got richer, the royal rulers turned to them for loans to run their kingdoms. Monarchs like Prince Henry the Navigator of Portugal or Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain supported the merchants’ efforts to expand their overseas markets. Europeans armed their ships to fight off pirates, but they could also use their guns to gain an advantage over local merchants wherever they went. It was not enough to simply find new markets; the profit motive drove Europeans to control those markets any way they could.

The traditional ruling classes of Europe were unable to stifle the growth of a new social class, the capitalist class. Capitalism created immense wealth and fostered the development of new sailing and military technology, enabling Europeans to dominate world trade. Eventually this new European economic system based on production for the market would insinuate itself and force itself into every part of the globe, wiping out the traditional economic systems and creating a new, unified, worldwide system. Europeans and people of European descent would continue to hold most of the key positions in the new world system. That, in a nutshell, is the history of modern imperialism, but the process unfolded in a variety of ways as Europeans gained control over four major parts of the world – the Americas, the “Indies,” China, and Africa.

The Americas

Columbus’s voyages were part of a much larger European effort to find a way to trade with Asia. Most people thought the best way would be to sail south around Africa, but Columbus believed he could sail due west and wind up in Asia. When Columbus returned to Europe with the erroneous news that he had reached Asia, it set off a mad rush and within a few years transatlantic voyages were commonplace. The Spanish did not find much in the way of commerce in the Western Hemisphere, but they did find gold and silver, and they found some native peoples that they could force to mine it for them, so they began to build colonies.

Some of the native peoples they encountered had developed sophisticated civilizations of their own, especially in the areas that are now Mexico and Peru. But the Spaniards had a number of military advantages and were able to defeat and subdue them. What followed, after the European invasion of the Western Hemisphere, was the most spectacular demographic collapse in the history of the world. A major percentage of the native population was wiped out. The island Columbus landed on, which is now where the Dominican Republic and Haiti are, is estimated to have dropped from a native population of 100,000 to 300 in a short time. The native population of central Mexico declined from 25 million to 1 million within a century of the Spanish conquest.

This demographic collapse was not caused primarily by Europeans killing them in warfare or working them to death in mines, but by the germs that Europeans brought with them, especially smallpox. Europeans had developed immunity and could carry the germs without catching the diseases, but native Americans had no natural immunity and died by the millions. The population vacuum was filled by European settlers and Africans who were enslaved and transported by the Europeans to do the hard work. Europeans therefore came to dominate one of the world’s two hemispheres by replacing its original population and Europeanizing North and South America.

By far the wealthiest colonies in the early Americas were in the parts that are considered “underdeveloped” today. Before the first British attempt at colonization in North America (Jamestown, 1607), the Spanish had already created a sophisticated civilization in Mexico and South America, with many large cities, universities, complex governmental commercial institutions, and extensive commerce. The richest colonies – because they were the richest – were not developed with their own welfare in mind, but only as sources of wealth to be exploited by the mother country, Spain. The poorer colonies to the north, on the other hand, did not command much attention from England, so they were able to develop relatively independently, without being mercilessly drained. Later, as the North American settlers developed their wealth, England began to show more interest and the colonists were forced to defend themselves.

Spain extracted a great deal of monetary wealth from its new-world colonies. From 1500 to 1650, an estimated 16 million kilograms of silver and 185,000 kilograms of gold were shipped from the Americas to Spain. With all that money flowing in, not to mention the even greater profits from agricultural production in the colonies, one would expect Spain to have become the richest of European countries, but instead it became one of Western Europe’s least affluent nations. When the gold and silver began to arrive, Spain had been the strongest power in Europe, but it did not remain in that position long.

Spain's case demonstrates that money alone cannot make a country prosperous. More recently, the billions of dollars flowing into the oil-producing countries of the Middle East did not raise the countries there out of poverty or dependency. The "petrodollars" flowed in and then quickly flowed back out, into the hands of multinational corporations based in the industrialized countries. Likewise, sixteenth-century American gold and silver flowed into Spain, but stayed there only long enough to cause inflation. The money was spent buying goods manufactured elsewhere rather than creating manufacturing capacity in Spain.

Most of the gold and silver went to Antwerp, which became the greatest financial center in the world. By the end of the sixteenth century, the center of financial power had shifted to Amsterdam. The Low Countries were the first to benefit in a significant way from the American gold and silver, but in the long run the greatest beneficiary was England, which was to take Spain's place as Europe's primary power.

The "Indies": India, Indonesia, and the Spice Islands

In 1600 a group of English merchants formed a commercial firm they named the British East India Company. In spite of the word "British" in its title, it was not a national endeavor undertaken by the British government; it was a private enterprise. Merchants in other countries followed suit – there was a Dutch East India Company, a French East India Company, and so forth.

The English were not the first to try to develop trade by sea with India. The Portuguese were there first, because it was they who first found out how to sail around Africa to get to the Indian Ocean. There they came upon a long-existing free-trade system established by Arab, Chinese, Indian, and other merchants. They could have simply participated in it, but that was not what they had in mind. They wanted to control the whole market, and with their efficient sailing ships and the ability to mount powerful cannons on them, the Portuguese were able to gain control in less than 15 years.

The Portuguese thus created the first of the European "trading-post empires." They had no interest in controlling territory or populations – all they wanted was to control the trade. To accomplish that, because the trade routes were oceanic, all they had to do was control a few key locations along the coastal areas, so they built forts where they could protect their ships, store their goods, load and unload cargoes, and trade with local merchants. Portuguese forts arose at Mozambique on the east coast of Africa, at the mouth of the Persian Gulf, on the coast of India, and on the Malaysian peninsula in Southeast Asia. From those positions they were able to dominate the seas. They took over about half of the lucrative spice trade to Europe that went via the trade route under Africa, dominated shipping in the Asian ports, and forced the native merchants in the Indian Ocean to pay duties of 6 to 10 percent on their cargoes.

Portugal, however, had bitten off more than it could chew. When the Dutch and English came along in the seventeenth century, the Portuguese were unable to withstand the competition. The Dutch East India Company replaced them in Southeast Asia and the British East India Company took over in India, but these were at first still trading-post empires.

The Dutch went beyond controlling the shipping of spices and began to control the production as well by capturing several of the Molucca Islands where spices were grown, and enforcing a ban on growing those spices anywhere else. On the islands they had seized, the Dutch would not allow anything except spices to be produced, so food and clothing had to be imported. That way, the natives of the islands were made completely dependent upon the Dutch East India Company. Their traditional economy was destroyed and they were permanently reduced to poverty: a classic case of the imperialist ploy known as "enforced monoculture."

The spices brought the merchants big profits, but the market for them was limited, because it was essentially a luxuries market. In the following century, the volume of trade increased immensely as its content shifted from luxury goods to commodities for a mass market, such as coffee, tea, and textiles.

As the trade grew in volume and importance, another shift occurred. Slowly, the trading-post empires began to grow into a new form of European domination. Both the British in India and the Dutch in Indonesia gradually found it necessary – if they wanted to defend and expand their commercial interests – to assert direct political control over larger and larger areas, until by 1800 they found themselves governing immense territories and millions of native peoples on the other side of the globe. The original trading-post empires became transformed into territorial empires. The Dutch came to think of Indonesia as their possession, and the English felt the same way about India.

Africa

In the fifteenth century, Africa north of the Sahara desert was, as it still is today, Islamic territory, so the Muslim world was a barrier to trade or even cultural contact between Black Africa and Europe, as long as trade could only be carried on by camel caravans across the desert. In the middle of the fifteenth century, when the Portuguese began their efforts to develop seaborne trade, their first motivation was not to get to Asia, but to get to Black Africa. The Africans had gold and they would trade it directly for Portuguese products if the Portuguese could avoid the Islamic middleman, so the new sailing technology was created with that in mind. Only later did they develop the ambition to sail around Africa to reach Asia.

The slave trade was not at first a major factor in the commerce with Africa. But a new market for slave labor had just begun to open up with the development of a new product for mass consumption – sugar – and a new way of producing it: the tropical plantation system. Experimental plantations on the Canary Islands and in the islands of the Mediterranean were proving successful, and as they multiplied, the demand for slave labor grew. Until that time, most slaves had come from the East (the word “slave” derives from “Slavic”). But in the middle of the fifteenth century the Ottoman Turks had cut off trade between Europe and the East, so the traditional supply of white slaves dried up and the demand for African slaves rose. As the demand went up, the price went up, and as the price went up, so did the supply of slaves from Africa.

After 1492, the sugar plantation system expanded into the Western Hemisphere – in Brazil and the Caribbean islands – and that is when the African slave trade went from a trickle to a torrent and became a major factor in the world economy, not to mention a major factor in the demographic patterns of the world. The central motivation underlying the enslavement and forced emigration of 12 million Africans, and the slaughter of many more, was the profitability of sugar production for the European market.

China

European expansionism proceeded differently in China than it had in the Americas, Africa, and the Indies. European traders went to China, but the Chinese empire was strong and unified enough to resist the Europeans and control the terms of trade themselves. At first China simply rebuffed the European merchants. There was very little trade allowed, until 1685 when the emperor, for his own reasons, decided to permit some very carefully controlled trade. By 1759 the system had evolved to a situation where all trade with Europeans had to be conducted at a single port city – Guangzhou, which the Europeans called “Canton” – and by then the British East India Company had managed to squeeze out its rivals and monopolize the trade. But the British merchants were not in charge there; the Chinese emperor and his mandarins were. The fees and taxes and other restrictions the emperor imposed irritated the British because they cut into their profits, but there was nothing they could do about it.

The Chinese emperor considered the British to be barbarians and believed that China had no need for the products of barbarians. The British were allowed to buy Chinese goods, but the Chinese unwillingness to trade for British goods meant that the British had no choice but to pay cash for what they wanted. Britain had long since replaced Spain as the dominant power in Latin America, so the British had access to Latin American silver to pay for the Chinese products they wanted – above all, tea, which had become an item of mass consumption in Britain. This caused the problem that modern economists call a perpetual imbalance of payments – a continuous flow of monetary wealth from Britain to China. It became especially serious when the American Revolution blocked British access to silver from Latin America.

If this one-sided “trade” had been disrupted because Britain ran out of money and could no longer afford to pay, it would have thrown a monkey wrench into the workings of the entire world capitalist system. So the British East India Company made a major effort to find something – anything – that the Chinese would buy. What they found was opium. As they increased the supply of opium to China, opium addiction increased and the market grew, and as opium was exchanged for silver, the British began to solve their balance of payments problem. The Chinese emperor didn't allow this to happen; it happened in spite of him. It was illegal under Chinese law to import opium, but the demand was so strong that the trade went on anyway. The ability of the Chinese empire to resist the pressure of European capitalism began to break down. Opium was smuggled into China by bribing customs officials to look the other way. As lower-level officials paid off higher-level officials, before long the corruption reached all the way to the top.

In 1834 the British East India Company lost its official government-protected monopoly, and competition for the Chinese opium market was opened up. That is when American capitalism made its debut in China, quickly becoming the second-largest drug dealer after the British. An estimated three and a half million pounds of opium were imported into China in the year 1835, in exchange for 17 million ounces of silver.

The addiction and corruption that this opium trade brought with it caused devastating political and social problems. By the late 1830s the imperial regime had decided to launch a really serious "war on drugs" by cracking down hard against smuggling and corruption. In 1839 the Chinese government seized and destroyed two and a half million pounds of opium. The British opium smugglers were outraged. Facing financial ruin, they went to the British government and demanded that it take military action not only to force the trade open again, but also to force the Chinese government to pay them for the opium they had destroyed.

The British government did exactly that. Steam-powered gunboats now gave them total military superiority, so in 1842 British warships steamed up the Yangzi River, pointed their guns at the city of Nanjing, and threatened to blow it off the map. The Chinese government realized that it was powerless to resist, so it signed a treaty that gave Hong Kong to Britain, opened up five seaport cities for trade, and paid the British the equivalent of 21 million dollars for the opium that had been destroyed. This chapter of its commercial history speaks volumes for the noble ideal of British liberalism called "free trade." It meant their freedom to force dope down the throats of foreigners whether the latter wanted it or not. Today's notorious "drug cartels" of Colombia are small potatoes in comparison to their illustrious British predecessors.

The 1842 Treaty of Nanjing marked the beginning of what the Chinese call the "Century of Humiliation," which only ended in 1949 with the victory of the Chinese Revolution. In retrospect, the military action that led to the 1842 treaty was called the "First Opium War," but it was just a beginning. With the Chinese no longer able to resist, other western countries, especially the United States and France, began to take advantage of their weakness. A Second Opium War took place in the late 1850s and in 1860 another unequal treaty was forced upon the Chinese, opening up 11 more seaports for foreign commerce and officially legalizing the drug trade.

Because no one western power, not even the British, was able to exclude the others, they all jointly propped up the existing Qing dynasty government as a means of policing the Chinese people and making China safe for western business. Since the Chinese government's function was to serve the interests of foreigners, China had lost its national sovereignty.

The case of how Japan was introduced to the new world economic order was similar. For 200 years, Japan had almost completely closed itself off from any contact with the rest of the world. In 1853 American warships sailed into Japanese harbors and demanded that they open their country up for trade relations – or else! Imagine this scenario: Suppose you are at home one day and a salesman comes to the door and you tell him, "Sorry, I don't want any." The salesman pulls out a gun and says, "Oh yes you do!" That is essentially how Japan was brought into the world of "free trade." The western "salesmen" said, "You are going to buy my products and sell me your products, whether you like it or not." There is a crucial element of force and coercion underlying modern imperialism, but it is a more complicated form of conquest and domination than was the case with ancient imperialism.

From Mercantile to Industrial Imperialism

This new aggressiveness is indicative of an important transition in the history of imperialism – from mercantile imperialism to industrial imperialism. There is continuity between the two phases. In both, western expansionism was motivated by the quest for profit, but in the latter phase that quest was so greatly accelerated by the Industrial Revolution that imperialism was transformed into something qualitatively different. Controlling trade was no longer enough to satisfy the voracious appetite for profits.

The development of industrial technology that occurred in Britain around the beginning of the nineteenth century created an enormous increase in productivity. The new productive capacity created new economic needs. First of all, new factories created a demand for more raw materials. Secondly, there was a need for more customers to buy the mountain of new products that the factories were churning out. And third, as the manufacturers and their bankers accumulated more and more wealth, they found themselves faced with an unfamiliar dilemma. They seemed to be running out of profitable ways to invest all of the money – the surplus capital – that they had amassed.

As they looked for new sources of raw materials, they looked overseas. When their home markets were saturated with their products, they also looked overseas for new customers. And when they needed new investment opportunities, they began to see the teeming masses of Asia, Africa, and Latin America as a huge pool of exploitable workers.

The new imperialists were impelled not only to export surplus production and surplus investment capital; they also felt a need to export surplus people. The industrialization process had created a growing body of permanently unemployed workers who were beginning to pose a revolutionary threat. Some wise policymakers proposed a solution they called “social imperialism,” whereby excess population would be encouraged to emigrate to the colonies as settlers. This program was put into practice by France, Portugal, and Britain in Algeria, Angola, Kenya, Rhodesia, and South Africa. From the standpoint of the native peoples, these “settler states” represented an especially harsh form of imperialist exploitation, with an influx of white settlers taking over all the best land. In South Africa, for example, the whites constituted only about 20 percent of the population but claimed almost 90 percent of the land for themselves.

The mounting economic pressures in nineteenth-century Europe led to the feverish growth of imperialist penetration of the whole globe, and as the various imperialist nations began to fear that they were running out of places to economically control, they began fiercely competing with each other for various territories.

At first western nations found it generally more efficient to exercise indirect or informal control over foreign territories, but as the competition among the imperialists heated up, they felt compelled to stake out their claims more forcefully, to draw boundaries on the map and say, “This territory belongs to us.” When they drew their boundaries in Africa, they did not bother to consider the fact that they were dividing some African peoples and combining others who did not want to be combined. This is one of the legacies of imperialism that continues to cause a great deal of strife in Africa today.

To keep rival imperialists off their turf, each western nation was impelled toward direct rule, turning territorial possessions into formal colonies governed directly by Europeans. In Nigeria, for example, about 2,000 Englishmen made up a government that ruled 40 million Africans. Those 2,000 Englishmen were compelled to recruit and train a cadre of Africans to help them administer the country. It was European-trained Africans such as these who would form the pro-western ruling elites of the African nations that won their political independence after World War II.

This era of colonialism culminated, at the end of the nineteenth century, with an orgy of annexations that the history books call the “Scramble for Africa,” as all of the European powers frantically sought to stake their claims to parts of the continent – and then a similar “Scramble for Concessions” in China occurred as well. It was about 1875 when the scrambling really became frenzied, triggered by a significant economic recession in Europe from 1873 through 1896. Manufactured goods that could not be sold piled up in European warehouses. Workers were laid off and social turmoil was increasing. At that point the industrialists and financiers began to panic and to clamor for their governments to step up the imperialist policies.

The political leaders were not particularly anxious to take on the direct administration of large parts of Africa, but they were pushed into it by the businessmen. The latter succeeded in generating mass enthusiasm for imperialist policies by manipulating nationalist sentiment by means of the mass-circulation newspapers they controlled. They were able to persuade the working people of Europe that there was something glorious about their nation taking possession of other parts of the world. Intellectuals did their part by constructing ideologies to justify imperialism. Nationalism was a potent one. Racism, which had developed as a means of justifying the slave trade, also came in very handy for justifying the scramble for Africa.

By 1914, Europe and countries controlled by people of European descent ruled about 85 percent of the Earth's land area, and most of the remaining 15 percent was made up of semi-colonies that had been forced into the role of producing raw materials to supply the technologically advanced countries. In that year all of the scrambling and interimperialist frenzy came to a head when the rivalry for colonies exploded, initiating an era of world war that lasted until 1945. When the dust settled, Britannia no longer ruled the waves, nor did France or Germany or Italy. The United States had become the dominant force over the world market and the era of the hegemony of American imperialism had begun.

Neocolonialism and "Neoimperialism"

It bears repeating that modern imperialism is not primarily a matter of military or political control, but of economic control. After the era of world wars this came ever more to the fore as colonial territories in all parts of the world began to win their political independence – India and Pakistan in 1947, Ghana in 1957, and then, very quickly, almost all of Africa. But were the former colonies now really independent? Had they become the captains of their own destiny? Or were they still somehow in the grips of their former colonial masters? As time went by, it became clear that the former colonies were still completely economically subordinated to the industrialized part of the world. This situation has been given the name "neoimperialism," but there is really nothing new about it. In fact, it was a return to the older kind of informal imperialist domination that had been most common before 1875. It was preferred as a cheaper and more efficient means of exploiting poor countries, because it eliminated the great expense of maintaining the administrative machinery of government. It was made possible by the reduction in interimperialist rivalry brought about by the postwar American predominance.

Apologists for the current world economic order, however, argue that imperialism no longer exists – that it ended when the colonies gained their independence. The former colonies, they say, are not poor because they are exploited, but because it will take time for them to modernize their economies and catch up with the industrialized countries. Meanwhile (the argument goes) they are completely free to develop their economies any way they see fit. If they have failed to do a good job of it, it is nobody's fault but their own.

The euphemism commonly used to describe the impoverished and exploited countries of the world is "underdeveloped." But that word has worn so thin that an even worse euphemism has become current: "developing" countries. The implication is that although they are poor now, they are on the right track and are catching up. But Walter Rodney, a Guyanese scholar and revolutionary political leader who was assassinated in 1980, exposed the reality of the concept of underdevelopment by using the word not as an adjective but as a transitive verb in the title of his masterful How Europe Underdeveloped Africa. According to this usage, underdevelopment is not an unfortunate condition like leprosy, but a purposeful act of victimization that Europeans perpetrated on other parts of the world. How, then, did Europe underdevelop Africa . . . and Asia, and Latin America? When it forced them into the new world system, why were the newcomers unable to modernize their economies and carry out an industrial revolution, as the European countries had?

First of all, the Western European countries had the great advantage of starting out without any larger competitors blocking their path. After World War II, when the former colonies entered the scene, they were faced with competitors hundreds of times larger, in terms of economic power. Consider this metaphor: If newborn fish are put in a fishtank by themselves, they will grow into adult fish. But then if those adult fish have babies, and they are all left in the same tank, the big fish will immediately eat the baby fish. The second generation lacks the opportunity to grow as their parents did, because the competitive environment is completely different. And the same is true for poor countries trying to grow in a world dominated by powerful industrialized economies. Any wealth they produce will simply be gobbled up by their larger competitors.

How does this actually happen in practice? Do the imperialist countries simply rob their colonies at gunpoint? In isolated instances, yes; that is what the Belgians did in the Congo, but that is not the typical mechanism of modern imperialism. The fundamental problem confronting the former colonies after World War II, whether they were very large countries like India or small African countries, was the same: To succeed in the international capitalist system, the first thing they needed was some capital. In order to pull themselves out of poverty, they needed to industrialize, which is to say that they had to increase their ability to produce the necessities of life for their people. But to industrialize, they needed investment; they needed capital. Where could that have come from?

Most of the wealthy countries originally got their capital from commerce, supplemented by very important infusions of capital from American gold and slave labor. But even without striking gold or oil, or enslaving their neighbors, it is conceivable that the poor countries could work hard, produce commodities, sell them on the world market, and invest the profits in industrialization. If they could do that, they could slowly develop their productive capacity and pull themselves out of poverty.

Unfortunately, it is not that simple, because commerce is a two-edged sword. While the poor countries are selling their products to the industrialized world, they are also buying things they need, and the wealthy countries have the financial power to control the terms of trade. As a result, prices of things that poor countries produce – raw materials, agricultural products – are held low, and prices for things they have to import tend to rise. This is a phenomenon known all too well to the poor countries as the “deteriorating terms of trade.” Julius Nyerere, the first president of Tanzania, gave a typical example: His country, he said, “had to export 38 tons of sisal to buy a seven-ton truck in 1972, but in 1982 the same truck required the sale of 134 tons of sisal.” The deteriorating terms of trade mean that in the supposedly free world market, the deck is completely stacked against the non-industrialized countries. They cannot gain the capital they need by emulating their western predecessors.

But there are other possibilities. Another source of capital might be investment from outside. If foreign firms export their capital to poor countries, does that not bring capital in? Yes, it does, but it does not tend to help alleviate the poverty in the receiving countries. The foreign investors do not send capital as a charitable exercise; their motive is to make a profit. Their aim is not to benefit the country they are investing in, but to repatriate their profits – that is, to take their profits out.

But even so, when foreign investors build a factory in a poor country, is that not a step toward industrializing that country? Are jobs not created, which begins the process of creating an industrial working class? Yes, but there are two problems. First of all, the foreign investment tends to go into high-tech industries, which are capital-intensive rather than labor-intensive, and that means they create relatively few jobs.

The more important problem is that when foreign capitalists create industries, it gets in the way of native capitalists creating industries. The latter simply cannot compete with the huge multinational firms. The development of a native capitalist class is thereby blocked – another reason that the original model of capitalist development that took place in Western Europe is no longer valid. Foreign investment, then, serves mainly to make the rich richer and to strengthen the imperialists’ control over the neocolonial world. Foreign investment is a cause of, and not a solution for, economic backwardness in the neocolonial world.

Neither trade nor foreign investment, therefore, is an adequate source of capital, but there is still one more possibility: borrowing. Poor countries can get loans from western banks and governments, and from international agencies like the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund (IMF). Once again, the problem is that the loans have enriched the lenders at the expense of the borrowers. The former colonies find themselves deeper and deeper in debt and forced to use ever-increasing portions of their national budgets simply to pay interest on the loans.

As for the international lending agencies like the IMF, they attach strings to their loans, demanding that recipient nations implement “austerity” programs to increase the level of exploitation of already desperately poor populations. Clearly, borrowing capital has not proven to be a viable way out of the dilemma of underdevelopment.

With these considerations in mind, an answer as to how European imperialists underdeveloped the rest of the world begins to emerge. It was not primarily direct robbery, although some of that occurred. It was not even primarily a matter of repatriation of profits, although there was a lot of that, too. The main way was by using their immense financial dominance to block the rise of native competitors.

Consider this metaphorical example of how financial power prevents the rise of competitors. In the first years of postwar America, grocery stores were small neighborhood markets – “Mom and Pop” stores – and they were ubiquitous. Then along came the Great Atlantic and Pacific Tea Company with something new called “supermarkets.” Wherever the A&Ps appeared, they began competing with the Mom and Pop stores for customers, or, as they say, for “market share.” To maximize their market share, they decided to drive the Mom and Pop stores out of business, and they did. With their great financial resources, they could afford to operate at a loss for a considerable period of time, and so they actually sold their products at a loss. The Mom and Pop stores were unable to compete with that for long, so they went under rather quickly. Once the supermarkets had the customers all to themselves, they were free to raise their prices back to profitable levels – and more.

That is the essential way that imperialism works, too. Industrialized countries have a great advantage in productivity, which means they can manufacture products at much lower cost than non-industrialized countries can. But if the imperialist countries flood the markets of the poorer countries with cheaply produced machine-made products, that alone prevents the latter from industrializing. That is the primary answer to the question of how Europe underdeveloped Africa, Asia, and Latin America.

England’s deindustrialization of India provides an instructive case study. In 1750, India produced almost 25 percent of the world’s total manufactured goods. By 1914, India’s share had dropped to 2 percent. In 1750, India’s largest export was cotton textiles. By 1850, its largest export was opium for the China market.

The imperialists use their overwhelming financial power to distort the economies of the poorer countries. They force them to produce commodities for the American and European markets, rather than products that their own people need. A study of hunger in Latin America pointed to instances in which widespread hunger increased during periods when agricultural production was rising. How could it be that people were hungrier when farmers were producing more food? It turned out in one case that Central American farmers were growing feed for beef that would wind up in McDonald’s hamburgers in the United States. In another case, large numbers of farmers in Colombia had switched over from growing rice and beans for the local market to growing carnations for the American market. No one held a gun to the heads of those farmers and forced them to grow carnations. The farmers found they could increase their incomes thirty-fold if they would forsake rice and beans and grow flowers instead. Who can blame them? Most people, if offered jobs paying thirty times what they had previously been earning, would take them, too. That is how financial power distorts weaker economies and causes them to produce for the export market.

When the newspapers run stories about famines in Africa, readers are led to believe that the Africans are so backwards they cannot grow enough food to feed themselves, but that is not the case. African countries typically continue to export cash crops such as cotton on a massive scale while people are starving to death, and if they can grow cotton, they could be growing food. Droughts and other natural disasters may trigger or exacerbate famines in Africa, but the primary blame must be ascribed to the economic forces of imperialism.

Is There a Solution to the Problem of Imperialism?

For the exploited countries, the only way out of this dilemma – or at least the first step – is to somehow remove themselves from the worldwide economic system where the wealthy countries have an overwhelmingly unfair competitive advantage. They have to gain control of their own fragile economies and protect them so they can at least have the opportunity to grow. They can do that by centralizing economic decision-making, putting all foreign investments under strict central control, and declaring a state monopoly of foreign trade to prevent cheap foreign goods from flooding their markets and wrecking their own industries. These initial steps cannot solve all of a poor country's problems, because it still has to buy its imports and sell its exports on the world market. But gaining control over its own production decisions is an absolutely critical step, without which no further progress is possible.

Gaining that control, however, is easier said than done. When poor countries have tried to opt out of the world market system, they have invariably met with great resistance from the powerful industrialized countries. That is where the military side of imperialism comes back into play. As previously noted, China, Japan, and the African colonies were originally forced into the international economic system by military violence. Likewise, any countries trying to leave the system have found that they have to fight their way out.

Russia was the first country to successfully remove itself from the world system, and in the process showed that it could only be accomplished by means of a social revolution that abolished capitalist economic relations within the country – a lesson learned and applied by China and Cuba as well. The period when countries could pull themselves up by their own bootstraps in the context of the capitalist system seems to have ended, leaving revolution as the only means by which they can regain their sovereignty and self-determination.

The one example of a country victimized by imperialism that managed to break free of foreign domination without leaving the world capitalist system is Japan, which not only regained its sovereignty but went on to join the imperialist club itself. In the years preceding World War II, Japanese capitalists were excluded from the markets of the British empire, and the United States invoked the Monroe Doctrine to exclude them from Latin America, so Japan set out to carve out its own "sphere of influence" in eastern Asia and the Pacific. The way they went about it was every bit as brutal as what the Europeans and Americans had done in the past. What a wonderful, inspirational story Japan might have been – the first example of a non-white people overcoming and defeating the murdering, raping racists of the western world . . . if only they, too, had not created a murdering, raping, racist, imperialist regime of their own. The attempt to emulate the economic development of the western nations seems to have had a terrible effect on Japan's moral development as a nation. In any event, the Japanese exception does not invalidate the general rule because Japan accomplished its modernizing transformation by the end of the nineteenth century, before that window of opportunity had closed forever.

More recently, certain countries of the so-called Pacific Rim – especially Taiwan and South Korea – seem to have taken major steps toward economic modernization without removing themselves from the global market system. South Korea, for example, has reached a level of industrialization such that its automobiles can compete on the world market. And according to certain standard economic indicators, Taiwan and South Korea are no longer "underdeveloped" countries, but have joined the ranks of the "developed" world. It is important to note, however, that the standard economic indicators fail to tell the whole story. The primary indicator that economists use to measure development is GNP (gross national product) per capita. But although these countries have undergone a degree of industrialization that has raised their GNPs, have they really prospered? Their process of development has been so unbalanced and uneven that by most social indicators – life expectancy of the entire population, infant mortality rate, and literacy rate – they are still deeply mired in poverty.

It is not clear yet that these countries have really risen out of economic dependency in any meaningful sense. Nonetheless, the levels of industrialization that they have accomplished are impressive and demand an explanation. What was the secret of their success? And more important: Can their success be repeated by other poor countries?

The most significant factor was the position of Taiwan and South Korea in global Cold War politics following the Chinese Revolution. After China successfully broke the grip of imperialism and withdrew from the world system in the mid-1950s, and after the Korean War, the United States determined to make Taiwan and South Korea showcases of Asian capitalism. These two countries were groomed as outposts of imperialism in the Far East, and a political decision was made to modernize their economies. But the "economic miracle" of the Pacific Rim must be placed in numerical perspective. The combined populations of Taiwan and South Korea total only about 70 million – a drop in the Asian bucket of between two and three billion people. Market economies have always allowed small minorities to enrich themselves, but they have no answers for the problem of global poverty as a whole.

The history of imperialism is still developing. The demise of the Soviet Union and its Eastern European satellites has begun to reopen a large part of the world to free-market exploitation. American imperialism has for some years been in decline relative to its main competitors, giving rise to a renewed increase in interimperialist rivalry. Yet American imperialism is still the dominant military power on the planet and is more arrogant than ever, now that the Soviet threat has been removed. Its armies have already proudly triumphed over such mighty powers as Grenada and Panama, but seem to be having difficulty conquering slightly larger countries like Iraq and Afghanistan. All of this indicates that the history of imperialism has entered a new and dangerous phase of instability that will bring about more of the wars and revolutions that are characteristic of the imperialist era.

Imperialism, modernization to globalization

Paul Le Blanc

Modern theories regarding the dynamics of capitalism and global economic development have been profoundly influenced by the perspectives of Karl Marx and others attempting to utilize those perspectives. Not only are the realities being analyzed quite fluid and complex, however, but there have been significant divergences among those employing Marxist perspectives. For example, the revolutionary theorizations of such figures as Rosa Luxemburg and V. I. Lenin were sharply challenged by conceptions of Karl Kautsky, generally perceived as the leading theoretician of the German socialist movement and as “the Pope of Marxist orthodoxy” (although some have argued that the notion of “orthodoxy” is inconsistent with the dialectical, non-dogmatic quality of Marx’s own thought).

“Orthodox” Marxism

The so-called “orthodox” Marxist approach typified by Kautsky and his Russian counterpart Georgi Plekhanov tended to see history (as Kautsky wrote in his classic The Materialist Conception of History) as involving an “evolution to ever higher forms” in a manner that “operates independently of men’s volition and knowledge and, rather, determines their direction” – that is, “special laws of the development of society . . . that do not contradict the laws of natural evolution, but form, one can say, their natural extension.” History was seen as involving a succession of stages of society, each leading to a higher phase of human development: primitive-communal societies giving way to a progression of civilizations – ancient slave societies, feudalism, and then a capitalism whose accelerating productive capacities would create the material basis for socialism.

Applying this approach to “backward” tsarist Russia, Plekhanov argued that capitalist development would provide a progressive breakthrough making possible the hoped-for future, that “every factory founded in Petersburg . . . strengthens the ‘flame of economic progress,’” because “the objective social conditions of production for socialist organization have not yet matured.” In his view, “in order to fight capitalism, only one way is left: to help it grow as fast as possible.”

Before 1914, even Lenin had accepted what was then considered the “orthodox” Marxism of Kautsky and Plekhanov, stressing “the bourgeois character of the Russian revolution” of the future, which, in overthrowing tsarist absolutism and the semi-feudal backwardness of old Russia, “will, for the first time, really clear the ground for a wide and rapid European, and not Asiatic, development of capitalism.”

The Kautsky/Plekhanov “modernization” process projected an evolving industrial capitalist economic base creating a social, cultural, and political superstructure (a growing working class, capitalist class, and intermediate layers; a growing economic surplus; growing urbanization and literacy; freedom of expression and a democratic republic; and so on). Only then would it eventually become possible for a diverse but united proletarian majority to struggle for and win the economic democracy of socialism. This was seen as the essence and the promise of the “bourgeois-democratic revolution” that had triumphed in the American and French Revolutions.

Modernization Theory

In later years, this general approach was utilized by non-Marxists who developed what came to be known as “modernization theory,” muting class struggle and leaving off the need for an eventual socialism, what development scholar Gilbert Rist calls a “Marxism without Marx.” One of its best-known representatives was Walt Whitman Rostow (1916–2003), who played a key role in helping to shape US foreign policy in the mid-twentieth century. Using as a starting point a somewhat idealized conception of the rise of industrial capitalism and democratic politics in Britain and the United States, he theorized in Stages of Economic Growth (1960) a developmental model that promised a future of freedom and abundance for all of the world’s peoples. According to Rostow, “it is possible to identify all societies, in their economic dimensions, as lying within one of five categories: the traditional society, the preconditions for take-off, the take-off, the drive to maturity, and the age of high mass consumption.”

of economic productivity, but by the late 1600s and early 1700s it had entered into “preconditions for take-off” as the “insights of modern science began to be translated into new production functions in both agriculture and industry, in a setting given dynamism by the lateral expansion of world markets and the international competition for them.” In the “age of enlightenment” the idea spread “not merely that economic progress is possible, but that economic progress is a necessary condition for some other purpose, judged to be good: be it national dignity, private profit, the general welfare, or a better life for the children.” The proliferation of education and enterprising attitudes helped to generate new capitalistic personality types “willing to mobilize savings and to take risks in pursuit of profit or modernization.”

The take-off period is equivalent to Industrial Revolution – “the interval when the old blocks and resistances to steady growth are finally overcome. . . . The forces making for economic progress, which yielded limited bursts and enclaves of modern activity, expand and come to dominate the society. Growth becomes its normal condition.” All of this has a profound impact on cultural habits and institutional structures. Profitable new industries “stimulate, through their rapidly expanding requirement for factory workers, the services to support them, and for other manufactured goods, a further expansion in urban areas and in other modern industrial plants. . . . The new class of entrepreneurs expands; and it directs the enlarging flows of investment in the private sector.” There are also profound changes in agriculture and the quality of rural life, and a shrinking rural population with the acceleration of urbanization. “In a decade or two both the basic structure of the economy and the social and political structure of the society are transformed in such a way that a steady rate of growth can be, thereafter, regularly sustained.”

After a half-century of such industrializing/modernizing “take-off” comes “what may be called maturity,” constituting “the stage in which an economy demonstrates the capacity to move beyond the original industries which powered its take-off and to absorb and to apply efficiently over a very wide range of its resources – if not the whole range – the most advanced fruits of (then) modern technology.” This, in turn, leads to “the age of high mass consumption, where, in time, the leading sectors shift towards durable consumers' goods and services." Rostow notes that "as societies achieved maturity in the twentieth century . . . a large number of persons gained a command over consumption which transcended basic food, shelter, and clothing," and also "the structure of the working force changed in ways which increased not only the proportion of urban to total population, but also the proportion of the population working in offices or in skilled factory jobs aware of and anxious to acquire the consumption fruits of a mature economy." This involves a transition to a higher stage within which, in Rostow's description, we can see a flowering of democratic process and the common welfare:

It is in this post-maturity stage, for example, that, through the political process, Western societies have chosen to allocate increased resources to social welfare and security. The emergence of the welfare state is one manifestation of a society's moving beyond technical maturity; but it is also at this stage that resources tend increasingly to be directed to the production of consumers' durables and to the diffusion of services on a mass basis, if consumers' sovereignty reigns. The sewing-machine, the bicycle, and then the various electric-powered household gadgets were gradually diffused. Historically, however, the decisive element has been the cheap mass automobile with its quite revolutionary effects – social as well as economic – on the life and expectations of society.

This pathway to modernization (in which we can see the economic base transforming the social, cultural, and political superstructure) was, according to Rostow, open to all nations and all peoples. Rostow was a leading Cold War ideologist in the United States. If the "underdeveloped" regions of Asia, Africa, Latin America, and certain sections of Europe did not make their breakthroughs to "take-off" in a timely manner, he warned, they could be diverted and set back by communist revolution. He therefore advocated policies targeting the "underdeveloped" countries with foreign aid from advanced capitalist countries plus international institutions (the World Bank, International Monetary Fund, and so on) and foreign investment from multinational corporations, to help stimulate their economies and propel them toward the take-off of modernization.

Uneven and Combined Development

A dramatically different analytical approach was put forward by Leon Trotsky (1879–1940), which he began to develop in the wake of the 1905 revolutionary upsurge in Russia, giving full expression to it in the 1930s. He articulated a far more complicated view of the historical development of Europe than the simple, unilinear schema of "orthodox" Marxists (primitive-communal → ancient slave civilization → feudalism → capitalism → socialism) or of Rostow (traditional → enlightenment/commerce → industrial take-off → modernized maturity and consumer democracy). We have seen that for Rostow the Marxist emphasis on class struggle is absent, although later scholars have noted that the advances of democracy and human rights were gained through such struggles, often focused through the efforts of labor and social movements (Rueschemeyer et al.; Eley; Nimtz). In contrast to Rostow, Trotsky was far more in line with classical Marxism on this matter. But Trotsky's conception employs Marxist perspectives in a manner allowing for a greater complexity of forms and historical variety – matching more the "messiness" of life and of actual social development. He labeled this conception "the law of uneven and combined development."

While specifics of Britain's development were no less important for Trotsky than for Rostow, the specifics of France's development were also important in a way that is missing from Rostow. As with other Marxists, Trotsky saw the French Revolution as the high point of bourgeois-democratic revolution. This is defined as a revolution that sweeps away the vestiges of the feudal mode of production, clearing the way for the full development of capitalism, replacing monarchist absolutism with a popular and representative form of government. Something of the sort had been achieved by the earlier bourgeois-democratic upheavals of the 1600s in England, and although the monarchy and elements of feudal residue had not been entirely eliminated there, the outcome had also cleared the way for capitalism's full development – enabling England to be the site of the Industrial Revolution's inauguration, which soon spread to France as well.

In the course of the nineteenth century, the capitalist mode of production triumphed throughout Europe. Yet the transformation took place in a manner that was qualitatively different from the form it took in England and France. This relates to the law of uneven development: different areas and different countries are just that – different. While all of Europe had been dominated by some variety of feudalism, and while all of Europe was affected by the development of the capitalist market, the different regions had their own particular characteristics. For various reasons, technological and cultural and ideological innovations arose first in one area and then had an impact on other areas at different times – leading to uneven development in the history of Europe as a whole.

This leads to another historical law, explained by Trotsky in this way: “Unevenness, the most general law of the historic process, reveals itself most sharply and complexly in the destiny of backward countries. Under the whip of external necessity their backward culture is compelled to make leaps. From the universal law of unevenness thus derives another law which, for the lack of a better name, we may call the law of combined development – by which we mean a drawing together of the different stages of the journey, a combining of separate steps, an amalgam of archaic with more contemporary forms.”

This law of uneven and combined development guaranteed that the dynamics of the bourgeois-democratic revolution, and the transition to a capitalist social order, would be quite different in other parts of Europe and in later periods than had been the case in France at the end of the eighteenth century.

The traditional, aristocratic ruling classes of Central, Eastern, and Southern Europe very much felt what Trotsky called “the whip of external necessity.” This took several forms. One was the dangerous example of the French Revolution that could potentially become a model for their own discontented classes. Some traditionalists undoubtedly wanted to deal with this through increased repression, pure and simple – favoring reactionary policies that would prevent any changes in the forms and norms of the old social order. There were, however, three other “whips of external necessity” which thwarted such an easy “solution.”

Most important was the Industrial Revolution that was unleashed by the capitalist economic development of Western Europe. Such a mighty generator of material wealth and power could hardly be shrugged off. Related to this was the fact that the traditional ruling classes – despite their feudal origins and inclinations – had themselves, for well over a century, been inescapably seduced by and entangled in the world capitalist economy. These two interrelated “whips” (the progress of the Industrial Revolution and the traditional ruling classes’ own involvement in the world capitalist economy) made it impossible to return to an earlier feudal “golden age.” The traditionalists were, instead, compelled to adapt to a profoundly changing social order. A third “whip of external necessity” was provided by the French invasions during the Napoleonic wars that spanned the first 15 years of the nineteenth century, which both impacted on all of Europe with French “modernizing” influences and compelled the traditional ruling classes themselves to “modernize” in order to survive and compete in the changing world.

Even with the old ruling classes’ grudging adaptation to some aspects of capitalist “modernization,” however, their determination to maintain as much monarchist power and aristocratic privilege as possible was destined to generate a wave of revolutionary explosions throughout Europe in 1848. But the law of uneven and combined development ensured that these explosions would assume different forms and have different consequences than had been the case during the French Revolution.

The further development of capitalism – and especially of industrial capitalism – had resulted in a growing divergence among the new social classes throughout Europe’s cities and towns in the nineteenth century. What had been simply “the people” in revolutionary France became increasingly the sharply defined, self-conscious, and often openly antagonistic classes of capitalist employers on the one hand and proletarian wage-workers on the other. In between was a middle stratum of independent artisans and small shopkeepers, impelled by the dynamics of the capitalist marketplace but also on the verge of being ruined by larger capitalist enterprises. In Trotsky’s view, this three-layered class structure in the urban areas – bourgeoisie, petty bourgeoisie, and proletariat – did not form a cohesive revolutionary mass such as had existed in Paris of 1789, but rather an uneasy alliance in the struggle against semi-feudal absolutism. In the rural areas there were large landowners and various peasant strata – the former more often than not constituting a backward-looking aristocracy, while the peasant masses (who were a majority of Europeans) were often inclined toward traditionalist values and hostile to urban capitalist pressures, but also inclined to be revolutionary if this could satisfy their deep hunger for land and dignity.

Given this sociological line-up, Trotsky (and other Marxists, such as Lenin and Luxemburg, but also Marx and Engels before them) found the explanation of why French events of 1789–93 were not duplicated during the democratic upheavals of 1848 in Europe. In the earlier situation, amid an admittedly complex swirl of events, elements of the rising bourgeoisie helped lead a mass-based movement of the urban and rural poor in smashing the remnants of the old feudal order. Results of the revolutionary triumph included: the replacement of monarchy with a constitutional republic; the achievement of national unity, with a form of nationalism strongly tinged with radical-democratic content; and a sweeping land reform which broke the power of the aristocracy, clearing the way for a thoroughgoing development of capitalism. In 1848, dominant elements of the already-existing bourgeoisie, frightened by working-class radicalism, drew back from revolution and sought an alliance with potent remnants of the old feudal order. The results of the defeated revolution included: the preservation of powerful monarchies; in some cases (such as Germany) the failure to achieve national unity; the combined thwarting of democratic political currents and development of a conservative-tinged nationalism; maintenance of power by a landowning aristocracy; and capitalism becoming entwined with traditional elites.

In tsarist Russia, which did not experience the democratic storms of 1848, the monarchy itself had initiated a degree of “modernization” and the capitalists had become junior partners of the autocracy. For Trotsky, this meant that only a rising of the working class, supported by the vast peasantry, could carry out the democratic revolution, against both the traditional classes and the bourgeoisie. This would, he theorized, put the working class in power, helping to pave the way for a transition to socialism – which was one aspect of his theory of permanent revolution (the other being that this would be part of a global revolutionary process).

Another obvious outcome of uneven and combined development was that the more advanced capitalist countries would naturally interfere with the “natural” development of regions of the world where capitalism was just beginning or where it didn’t exist at all. In expanding across the world in their quest for markets, raw materials, and investment opportunities, the dominant capitalist powers would be inclined to swallow up earlier systems while at the same time utilizing aspects of them in new ways in order to exploit the newly dominated regions. Certain forms of development would be fostered that were consistent with the needs of the profit-seeking outsiders and their local helpers, but there would obviously be no interest in allowing “modernizing” developments (locally controlled industrialization, rising living standards, democracy, and so on) that would in any way undercut the ability of the dominant capitalists to maximize their profits.

Dependency Theory, World Systems Theory, and Theoretical Challenges

This line of thought, often developed without reference to Trotsky, but instead with reference simply to the unfolding realities themselves, informed the outlook of a number of figures who developed variations of what came to be known as “dependency theory.” As Paul Baran (1910–64) commented in his 1957 study The Political Economy of Growth, “the colonial and dependent countries had no recourse to such sources of primary accumulation of capital as were available to the advanced capitalist countries.” He added that “development in the age of monopoly capitalism and imperialism faced obstacles that had little in common with those encountered two or three hundred years ago.” Even in the transition from colonialism to the postcolonial era of the twentieth century, these dynamics continued, thwarting the independent development of the now-liberated regions, continuing the dynamics of dependence on, exploitation by, and subordination to the advanced capitalist countries.

André Gunder Frank (1929–2005) developed this in his 1967 work Capitalism and Underdevelopment in Latin America. “Historical research demonstrates that contemporary underdevelopment is in large part the historical product of past and continuing economic and other relations between the satellite underdeveloped and the now developed metropolitan countries,” Frank wrote, adding that “these relations are an essential part of the structure and development of the capitalist system on a world scale.” As he summed it up, in Latin America (and it was argued that the same was true in Asia, Africa, and portions of Europe) “the centuries-long participation in the process of world capitalist development” had added up to the “development of underdevelopment.” A number of influential theorists (Paul Sweezy, Samir Amin, Pierre Jalé, Rodolfo Stravenhaven, Fernando Cardoso, and others) embraced and helped develop this general perspective, which profoundly influenced a variety of revolutionary movements in the 1960s and 1970s.

Even on the political left, however, a number of reservations were being raised about dependency theory by the last years of the twentieth century. One of the most obvious problems has to do with the implications of the word “dependency,” tending to obscure the fact that the global capitalist economy – the “advanced” no less than the “underdeveloped” areas – has, from the beginning, been profoundly interdependent. “The Achilles heel of these conceptions of development has always been the implicit, and sometimes explicit, notion of some sort of ‘independent’ alternative for the Third World,” is how a self-critical Gunder Frank put it in 1981, adding that this “theoretical alternative never existed, in fact.” He and others sought to overcome this flaw by embracing and helping to develop the “world systems theory” pioneered by Immanuel Wallerstein (b. 1930), which built on, while at the same time transcending, aspects of dependency theory. Perceiving capitalism as a global system involving different regions – the core represented by the advanced capitalist countries, the periphery represented by non-industrialized regions, and a semi-periphery of countries having, in varying proportions, characteristics of the other two – Wallerstein and his co-thinkers saw the world economic reality as interdependent and dynamic, with important flexibilities not allowed for in dependency theory, in particular significant socioeconomic mobility that could enable one or another country to pass from periphery to semi-periphery. At the same time, they shared in the belief that since “the modern world comprises a single capitalist world-economy,” it follows that separate national economies do not follow their own individual stages of development – that “to the extent that stages exist, they exist for the system as a whole.”

Other critics – often without admitting this to be the case – have preferred a return to a more sophisticated variant of the Kautsky/Plekhanov/Rostow approach of “stages in economic development.” One contribution, particularly influenced by theorizations of philosopher Louis Althusser (1918–90), involves a focus on Marx’s conception of modes of production, i.e., types of economy, in which are combined “forces of production” (raw materials, technology, labor) and “relations of production” (having to do with ownership and management of productive forces, and distribution of what is produced). The argument is advanced that any given society contains more than one mode of production, although today capitalism is dominant – but in some regions (especially in Asia, Africa, and Latin America) elements of pre-capitalist modes of production have blocked the full development of capitalism, leading to underdevelopment. In a sense, such regions may be suffering less from capitalist exploitation than from its absence.

Taking this further, Bill Warren’s 1980 work Imperialism, Pioneer of Capitalism insisted that the primary impact of imperialism in the non-capitalist regions of the world was not to put into place a system of oppressive underdevelopment, but rather to play the progressive role of bringing about the full capitalist economic development of those areas, including industrialization and a “modernization” consistent with Rostow’s conceptualizations. Also challenging the dependency/world systems approach have been theorizations associated with Robert Brenner in his historical explorations of the transition from feudalism to capitalism. In contradiction to Sweezy and others associated with the emergence of dependency theory, Brenner’s thesis was that not the expansion of world trade but rather a series of class struggles between lords and peasants acted as “the prime mover” in the transition from feudalism to capitalism. A key conceptual approach here involves a notion of internal dynamics as opposed to external forces bringing about deep-going social change. Viewing capitalism as representing a systematic tendency to improve productive technique and thereby increase productivity, Brenner has argued that such a system will not act as a brake on productive development in the so-called “underdeveloped” countries – instead, the cause of underdevelopment is to be found within the social structures of those countries. Also, the exploitation of backward areas is not necessary for the development of advanced capitalist countries, because capitalism has its own internal dynamics for growth; the place of peripheral regions in the global economy has more to do with the class structures within those regions.

Developments in the global economy since the late 1970s, involving the emergence of newly industrializing countries (NICs) in some “Third World” areas – such as Brazil, Mexico, South Korea, Taiwan, India, and Malaysia – have buttressed these challenges. More than this, points made by economic historians M. C. Howard and J. E. King had gained considerable currency by the final decade of the twentieth century:

Corporations with huge assets on several continents can no longer be regarded as “American,” “British” or “Japanese” simply because their head offices are New York, London or Tokyo; patriotism may be, increasingly, unprofitable. To the extent that transitional corporations treat all nation states as fair game, and identify with none of them, the continued relevance of the classical Marxian approach to imperialism is in doubt.

The collapse of communism, which was occurring in the same period, contributed to a further shift away from Marxist theorizations of imperialism and critiques of capitalist development. Indian economist Prabhat Patniak commented in 1990 on what he and other Marxist “die-hards” viewed as “the paradox that while the system of relations covered under the rubric of imperialism has hardly changed over the last decade and a half, fundamental questions are discussed today, even among Marxists, without any reference to it.” Suggesting that this could be related to “the very strengthening and consolidation of imperialism,” Patniak warned that such a left-wing retreat from theorizations of (and therefore active opposition to) realities of imperialism “would only mean that the right-wing opposition to it within the Third World would get strengthened,” which would consequently “spawn racist, fundamentalist, and xenophobic movements in the Third World” putting themselves forward as the only alternative to imperialism.

Yet newer conceptualizations were gaining currency among many left-wing theorists seeking to address the realities of the new era.

Globalization and Empire

As globalization became the catchword of the 1990s, so empire would become the fashionable term for the first years of the twenty-first century. Continuities can be found between the realities covered by these conceptualizations and the dynamic developments that were the focus of the theorizations of imperialism and capitalist development that have been under examination here, despite the utilization of the new concepts, by some theorists, to dismiss the old.

Nobel Prize winner Joseph Stiglitz described economic globalization as “the closer integration of the countries and peoples of the world which has been brought about by the enormous reduction of costs of transportation and communication, and the breaking down of artificial barriers to the flows of goods, services, capital, knowledge, and . . . people across borders,” adding that “globalization is powerfully driven by international corporations, which move not only capital and goods across borders, but also technology.” This has enabled multinational corporations to rise above restraints or impositions that national governments or labor movements or the populations of any country may wish to establish.

Dutch economist Robert Went noted: “A growing number of people and companies find it easier and easier to meet, travel, send goods, receive images, cooperate and compete across frontiers. . . . Products from cigarettes to cars are assembled today with parts brought together from every corner of the world.” This naturally gives corporations much greater leverage in dealing with workers in these and in other countries. “If the company thinks it profitable, it can close or move its operations,” observed Went. “More often it can threaten to do so in order to extract concessions from trade unions.” More than this, according to Prabhat Patniak, “there is a tremendous globalization of capital,” and “this fluidity of finance represents globalization in a double sense: not only in the sense that finance flows everywhere, but also in the sense that it is sucked out of everywhere,” and that “national economies become the plaything of speculative forces with nation-states being reduced to the role of helpless spectators.”

The global expansion of capital has also meant the global expansion of paid labor (working-class occupations doubling between 1975 and 1995 to 2.5 billion), with developing technologies and job mobility – according to sociologist Ronaldo Munck impacting negatively on “the industrial workers of the old smokestack industries” of Europe and North America. He added that “any gains from increased economic integration will go to capital and not to labor, especially the traditional working class outside of the high-tech sectors.” The average income in Africa also fell steadily, and far more dramatically, in the last three decades of the twentieth century to barely 7 percent of that in the industrialized nations. The average income in Latin America was one-third of that in the industrialized North at the end of the 1970s, but only one-fourth by the end of the century. “Only a handful of East Asian countries seemed at the time to have succeeded in narrowing the gap or even joined the North,” Went reported. “But since the outbreak of the Asian crisis in 1997 it is these very prodigies that have been demoted to total losses.”

The growing inequalities have assumed proportions that some find startling: half the global population of 6 billion living on less than $2 per day – with 1.3 billion getting by on less than $1 per day. As of 2005, the world’s 225 richest people enjoyed a combined income of $1 trillion – equal to the combined annual income of the world’s 2.5 billion poorest people. It has been estimated by US economist Michael Yates that a tax of 4 percent levied on these 225 richest people would pay for basic and adequate health care, food, clear water, and safe sewers for every person on earth. Despite uncertainty over how best to theorize such realities, they have given rise to a massive and diverse global protest movement seeking to challenge the path that global capitalism has taken. Influential economist Jeffrey Sachs, while acknowledging that “the antiglobalization movement has a powerful point” in stressing abuses of power by the multinational corporations, has argued: “The movement is too pessimistic about the possibilities of capitalism with a human face, in which the remarkable power of trade and investment can be harnessed while acknowledging and addressing limitations through compensatory collective actions.”

Sachs and others placed much hope in a massive worldwide “modernization” program represented by the United Nations Millennium Development Goals campaign, initiated in 2000 and endorsed by 191 governments. It established detailed proposals and projections for achieving, by 2015, eight overarching goals: (1) eradicate extreme poverty and hunger; (2) achieve universal primary education; (3) promote gender equality and empower women; (4) reduce child mortality; (5) improve maternal health; (6) combat HIV/AIDS, malaria, and other diseases; (7) ensure environmental sustainability; and (8) develop a Global Partnership for Development.

Marxist critics responded that such a campaign could not be successful in a global context dominated by multinational corporations and their institutional appendages (such as the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund). Such campaigns, if carried out successfully, would necessarily alter the political-social balance of power, opening the possibility of improving the quality of life for many millions of people and transforming culture and consciousness in ways that facilitate further struggles against problematic aspects of the status quo. The critics insist that this would have to amount to a revolutionary challenge to the capital accumulation process, and the related necessary process of profit-driven global expansion, that Luxemburg, Lenin, and other revolutionary Marxists sought to comprehend in their own time. While the processes of capitalist development and imperialism have undergone dramatic transformations over the past century, transformations that have recently been explored by analysts employing the conceptualization of globalization, in the first decade of the twenty-first century there appeared to be a renewed confidence among many regarding the continued relevance of the older Marxist concepts.

A new theoretical construct arose, however, which both utilized and challenged aspects of these older concepts – renewing a notion that many dependency theorists had utilized during the Cold War (1946–90), that world capitalism had moved far from the days of Lenin and Luxemburg when “interimperialist rivalry” had led to global war (in 1914–18 and again in 1939–45). In the face of “the communist challenge” in the Cold War era, a unified international capitalism was being overseen by the immense power of the United States. With the fall of communism and the collapse of the Soviet Union, the United States was dominant, now more than ever – as a center of neoliberal economic and social policies, as a central driving force in the globalization process, and as the most preeminent military power in the world. The term some theorists used was empire.

“The concept of Empire is presented as a global concert under the direction of a single conductor, a unitary power that maintains the social peace and produces its ethical truths,” commented Michael Hardt and Antonio Negri in their surprise bestseller Empire, read with rapt attention by both partisans and opponents. “And in order to achieve these ends, the single power is given the necessary force to conduct, when necessary, ‘just wars’ at the borders against the barbarians and internally against rebellion.” The two analysts note that “Empire presents its order as permanent, eternal, and necessary,” that it “is formed not on the basis of force itself but on the basis of the capacity to present force as being in the service of right and peace” – or, to phrase it somewhat differently, “although the practice of Empire is continually bathed in blood, the concept of Empire is always dedicated to peace – a perpetual and universal peace outside of history.”

Hardt and Negri asserted that imperialism had now passed out of existence, superseded by this new reality of “Empire.” Yet in their description, empire “constructs its own relationships of power based on exploitation that are in many respects more brutal than those it destroyed,” and they added that “the geographical and racial lines of oppression and exploitation that were established during the era of colonialism and imperialism have in many respects not declined but instead increased exponentially.” Given the definition we have been using here, however, what they describe suggests not a replacement, but rather a dramatically new phase of imperialism, in some ways reminiscent of the “ultra-imperialism” theorized by Kautsky.

Hardt and Negri themselves noted that Lenin, perhaps Kautsky’s severest critic, wrote that “there is no doubt that the development [of the global capitalist system] is going in the direction of a single world trust that will swallow up all enterprises and all states without exception,” but in his 1915 introduction to Nikolai Bukharin’s Imperialism and World Economy he had argued that global imperialist wars and social revolutions would destroy capitalism before this “ultra-imperialist” conclusion was reached. Given the seeming failure of Lenin’s prophecy, Hardt, Negri, and others were inclined to see this new phase opening up at the dawn of the new century – particularly as the United States appeared to be moving forward with a strategy to refashion, more or less unilaterally, the world order by means of a relentless invasion of Iraq.

On the other hand, a significant range of currents with perspectives akin to classical Marxist conceptions have argued that the new phase of imperialism had more continuity with the old than Hardt and Negri allowed for. From the Philippines shrewd global analyst Walden Bello, monitoring US policy regarding Iraq, commented: “Although the United States remains the world’s prime power, its global system of domination is under severe assault and may be unraveling.” From the United States, geopolitical theorist David Harvey concurred that “the US is highly vulnerable,” stressing that “the geopolitical picture is extremely volatile,” with a number of unpredictable trouble-spots in the world that “could easily spill over into major global dislocations” that would be beyond the ability of the United States to impose any “ultra-imperialist” resolution.

While the realities of the new century were sufficiently complex and fluid to preclude the possibility of a universally agreed-upon analysis of how best to comprehend continuities and novel developments, for at least some revolutionary-minded analysts and activists the traditional theorizations of imperialism, dovetailing with the theory of uneven and combined development, seemed to retain much of their analytical strength. The realities of the early twenty-first century have caused some to conclude – along with thoughtful British analyst Sam Ashman – that the reality of the global system truly “is a combined and uneven social entity” (which she has also characterized as “clumpy and territorialized, but dynamically so and in complex ways”) that it “is clustered around capitalist cores and states,” and that it “generates movements of resistance and opposition.” This would mean – regardless of its shifting incarnations – that continued capitalist development on a global scale promises, as in the past, to continue triggering protests and revolutions throughout the world.

India, armed struggle in the independence movement

Kunal Chattopadhyay

India's independence movement has widely been regarded as a prime example of a "peaceful" revolution. But the image of Gandhi's non-violent national struggle conceals several strands of protest. Peasant and worker movements cannot be categorized as non-violent since they were not moved by the same ideals as Gandhi. Within the British armed forces, too, there were smaller revolts well before the great revolt of 1857, which saw the direct takeover of rule over India by the British state from the East India Company. From the late nineteenth century, middle-class youth were trying to organize the overthrow of British rule by force.

British rulers designated as "terrorists" those who sought to end British rule by force of arms. Indian nationalists called them revolutionaries or militant nationalists, a term many nationalist historians in independent India have accepted. However, Sumit Sarkar (1973), writing about the Bengali revolutionaries of the anti-Bengal Partition period, pointed out that the term terrorism was not inappropriate, since what the Indian freedom movement saw were not plebeian uprisings by the popular masses, as in Paris or Petrograd, nor long peasant wars, as in China, but assassinations of oppressive officials, spies, and traitors, bank robberies to finance political operations, and occasionally more grandiose plans for armed coups by penetrating the army's ranks.

Revolutionary nationalism of this kind was inspired by a combination of factors. The rise of a national consciousness among the petty bourgeoisie involved the influences of the French Revolution, the American War of Independence, and the Young Italy of Mazzini. Secondly, there was a feeling by the late nineteenth century among considerable sections of militant youth that the politics of humble supplication was achieving nothing. Thirdly, both in Bengal and Bombay, two major centers of political activity in the period, Hindu cultural politics of a new, very militant kind was influencing youth. In some cases the Hindu revival went on to become Hindu cultural nationalism and eventually a Hinduism-based right-wing politics. But in its early stages it influenced many to take a radical direction.

There were many reasons why early attempts at armed struggle turned to revolutionary terrorism rather than mass armed struggle. In the first place, with a few exceptions, the middle-class advocates of armed confrontation lacked faith in the willingness and ability of the popular masses to fight the British. Secondly, the success of the British rulers in keeping Indians disarmed by means of the Arms Act of 1878 made it impossible for Indian revolutionaries to organize large-scale operations. As a result, hatred of British rule, disgust with the politics of mendicancy, and distrust of the masses were combined in the ideology and politics of petty bourgeois youth. This left the formation of secret societies as the only option. In fact, in Calcutta, then the capital of British India, secret societies were being formed and had been recruiting among students since the 1870s, though at this stage they emphasized ideological propaganda and physical culture. The novel Anandamath by Bankim Chandra Chattopadhyay, with its tale of a secret order of Hindu monks fighting against the waning power of the Bengal Nawab as well as against the emerging power of the British, inspired the youth of Bengal. Militant youth were also inspired by a speech in 1893 by Swami Vivekananda at the Chicago Parliament of Religions, where he addressed westerners as equals, and by his missionary activities and attempts to challenge what he saw as colonialist-sponsored efforts to impose Christianity through a more militant Hinduism.

The first instance of armed action took place in the Bombay presidency. An oppressive British official named Rand, in charge of enforcing anti-plague regulations in Poona near Bombay, was assassinated in 1897 by the brothers Damodar and Balkrishna Chapekar. Both were hanged after a trial. Their condemnation of Rand included a perception that his work involved repression and insult to their religion.

Revolutionary attitudes were also being fostered in Bombay by Bal Gangadhar Tilak through the invocation of Marathi nationalism and militant Hinduism. Secret societies were being formed, for example the Mitra Mela (Friends' Association) set up by Ganesh Savarkar and his younger brother, Vinayak Damodar Savarkar. Thus secret societies and the idea of militant struggle were developing more or less simultaneously in Bengal and Bombay. The return of Aurobindo Ghosh from Britain also had an impact. Aurobindo was employed by the ruler of Baroda, from where he wrote a series of articles criticizing traditional politics. Pramathanath Mitra, Surendranath Tagore, and others set up a secret revolutionary organization named Anushilan Samiti, which emphasized physical, mental, and moral development. Margaret Noble, an Irish follower of Vivekananda whom he had named Nivedita, had contacts with Russian anarchist Peter Kropotkin and was possibly among those responsible for circulating the idea of propaganda by deed. However, the political outlook of anarchism was entirely foreign to these nationalists, who sought not a stateless society but an independent India.

First Phase of Revolutionary Terrorism: 1905–1911

Lord Curzon's decision to partition Bengal led to an intense mass movement within the middle classes. Internal weaknesses and the inability to draw in peasants, the urban poor, and Muslims of all social layers created a feeling of desperation, leading some sections to turn to revolutionary terrorism. Two papers that had been advocating militant action from an early stage were Sandhya, edited by Brahmabandhav Upadhyay, and Yugantar, published by a faction within Anushilan Samiti led by Bhupendranath Dutta, Aurobindo's brother Barindra Kumar Ghosh, and Abinash Bhattacharyya. The Yugantar group soon lost faith in the Anushilan strategy of physical culture using traditional instruments and forms (sticks, swords, wrestling) and turned to secret advocacy of guns and bombs. Aurobindo had made contacts in 1902 with a group in Midnapur founded by Jnanendranath Basu, his brother Satyendranath, and Hemchandra Kanungo. In the same year, Sarala Ghosal, a remarkable young woman, started a gymnasium at her father's house; one of the first young men to train there was Pulinbehari Das, the founder of the Dhaka Anushilan Samiti. These small revolutionary groups found many potential recruits when the mass movement of 1905 began.

Earlier attempts to assassinate former Lieutenant Governor Bampfylde Fuller had ended in failure. In 1908, while trying to kill a repressive magistrate named Kingsford at Muzaffarpur, Kshudiram Bose and Prafulla Chaki hurled bombs at the wrong car and killed an innocent British couple, the Kennedys. Chaki committed suicide rather than be caught, while Bose was arrested, tried, and hanged. While under arrest he was tortured brutally by the police, who extracted enough information to arrest Aurobindo, Barin Ghosh, Upendranath Bandyopadhyay, and others, leading to the Alipore Conspiracy Case. Led by Pulinbehari Das, the branch of Anushilan Samiti at Dhaka set up a large network all over northern and eastern Bengal and carried out several raids. In November 1908 Pulinbehari Das was arrested, but other young men like Trailokya Chakraborty, Amritalal Hazra, and Pratul Ganguly provided leadership.

Some revolutionaries, such as Jatindranath Mukherjee, often called Bagha (“tiger”) Jatin, had more far-reaching plans for an all-India collaboration among revolutionaries and worked toward an uprising by infiltrating the army. The class-caste limitation was evident, however, for in an official list of 186 killed or convicted revolutionaries from 1918, at least 165 came from the three upper castes of Bengal – Brahmin, Kayastha, and Vaidya.

Though the number of incidents was greater in Bengal, other places also saw important – in some ways more important – attempts at revolutionary armed struggle. From about 1909, the Punjab experienced revolutionary terrorism, initiated by people like Sardar Ajit Singh, Amba Prasad, and Lala Hardayal. The increase in land rent there had caused widespread anti-British feeling, and the revolutionaries were also more inclined to look into peasant grievances.

In Maharashtra, an organization set up by Savarkar and others called Abhinav Bharat (Unique India) kept in touch with secret societies in various parts of western and central India. It also set up a bomb manufacturing workshop, which was later discovered by the police. As a result of the ensuing Kolhapur Bomb Case, many revolutionaries were given severe sentences.

As well as organizing secret societies in India, revolutionary nationalists sent their members abroad. Some, like Hemchandra Das, went chiefly to learn about modern weapons, while others set up propaganda organizations and attempted to get help from countries hostile to Britain. Shyamji Krishna Verma (1857–1930), professor of culture at Oxford, set up a center for Indian students and in 1905 began publishing a paper called Indian Sociologist. Later, to avoid arrest, he went to Paris and then Switzerland. Madam Bhikaji Rustam Cama (1861–1934) was active in London and Paris. She and her colleague Sardar Singh Rajoji Rana smuggled arms to Indian revolutionaries back home. Madam Cama and Rana joined the French Socialist Party and attended the International Socialist Congress at Stuttgart in 1907.

In 1906, Vinayak Savarkar went to England and worked under the guidance of Krishna Verma. In 1909, he was behind Madanlal Dhingra’s assassination of Sir John Curzon Wyllie. Dhingra was hanged in an English jail on August 17, 1909. Savarkar was arrested and sent to India, but he jumped ship near Marseilles and swam to the French coast. The French police handed him back, which led to a trial at the International Court at The Hague on the question of political asylum. However, imperialist pressure was enough to get the case dismissed. Brought back to India, Vinayak and his elder brother were both sentenced to transportation for life in the Andaman Islands. Life in the Andamans was terrible and Savarkar broke down there, sending in a clemency petition as early as 1911. In 1913 he sent a letter to the Imperial Council promising not only his own conversion to constitutionalism, but also that of many other young people who had seen him as their guide. He was finally released subject to a condition that he abstain from political activity for five years. His future career shows that subsequent Hindu nationalism of the Savarkar variety, with its violence directed entirely against Muslims, was pro-imperialist.

By contrast, Virendranath Chattopadhyay, also in Europe, and Tarak Nath Das and Lala Hardayal in the United States were consistent propagators of revolutionary politics. The most significant effort abroad, however, prior to World War I was taken by Punjabis, both Sikh and Hindu, in the United States and Canada. Led by Baba Sohan Singh Bhakna, Kartar Singh Sarabha, Lala Hardayal, and many others, they formed the Ghadar (Revolution) Party in 1912. The party planned armed struggle in India and tried to get military training for its adherents. It had connections with Maulavi Barkatullah, a professor at Tokyo University, and through him it also attracted many Muslims.

Second Phase of Revolutionary Struggles: 1914–1918

The outbreak of World War I gave an impetus to armed struggle attempts. The number of British soldiers in the Indian army had declined to 15,000, and the revolutionaries hoped to use this opportunity to drive out the British by force of arms. Their strategy involved four targets. First, they sought to get Indian soldiers in India and Burma to defect to their side. Second, the Ghadar revolutionaries, who were returning to India, were to organize with the others and take part in the armed struggle. Third, there was to be effective coordination among all the revolutionary groups in India. Britain's war with Turkey, the seat of the Khalifa, which claimed religio-political leadership of all Sunni Muslims, brought about close cooperation between militant nationalists and militant pan-Islamists like Maulana Obeidullah Sindhi, Barkatullah, and others. Finally, a serious bid was made for German military assistance.

In 1915, Virendranath Chattopadhyay, Abinashchandra Bhattacharyya, Dr. Bhupendranath Dutta, Lala Hardayal, and their comrades set up the Indian Independence Committee, better known as the Berlin Committee. It received promises of military assistance from the German ministry of foreign affairs and planned to invade India. As an initial step, plans were made to send two shiploads of German weapons to India. Three distinct components existed in the bid for armed uprising. Raja Mahendra Pratap and his associates planned to invade India through Afghanistan. In collaboration with Obeidullah Sindhi and Barkatullah, he formed a Provisional Government of India in Kabul. Meanwhile, the Ghadar revolutionaries were coordinating action in America and India. Baba Sohan Singh Bhakna and his companions left for India on August 22, 1914. Punjabis abroad were incensed by the Komagata Maru incident, when a shipload of emigrants from Punjab was turned back from Canada after two months of privation and uncertainty. On their arrival at Calcutta harbor, they were treated badly, leading to a riot in which 20 to 40 were killed. Baba Sohan Singh Bhakna and his companions contacted Bengal revolutionaries like Jatindranath Mukherjee, Narendranath Bhattacharyya, and Rashbehari Bose as well as soldiers stationed in many camps of north India, especially at Mian Mir (Lahore), Jalandhar, Ferozpur, Peshawar, Jehlum, Rawalpindi, Mardan, Kohat, Bannu, Ambala, Meerut, Kanpur, and Agra cantonments. Many party workers joined the army with a view to obtaining arms and ammunition. Finally, Jatindranath Mukherjee and Narendranath Bhattacharyya tried to get arms for an insurrection in Bengal.

In Bengal, the revolutionaries achieved a major success in August 1914, when they managed to obtain 50 Mauser pistols and 46,000 rounds of ammunition from the Rodda firm at Calcutta. Jatindranath Mukherjee united most revolutionary groups, planning the disruption of rail communications, the seizure of Fort William in Calcutta through contacts within the 16th Rajpur Rifles, and the landing of German arms. To arrange the German arms shipment, Narendranath Bhattacharyya was sent to Java. The Bengal plans were part of a far-reaching conspiracy organized by Rashbehari Bose and Sachin Sanyal in collaboration with the Ghadar Party. The plan for a coordinated revolt on February 21, 1915, based on military uprisings at Rawalpindi, Ferozepur, and Lahore, to be backed up by popular risings, was, however, foiled by treachery. There were some scattered mutinies, notably at Singapore on February 15, 1915, for which 37 soldiers were executed and 41 transported for life. Rashbehari Bose fled to Japan, while Sachin Sanyal was transported. Despite its failure, this planned revolt showed a significant departure from earlier actions. This was no plan for heroic action by individuals but an armed revolution whose chief organizers, the Ghadarites, were the first to reach out to the army and the peasantry. The authorities struck back ferociously, organizing nine conspiracy trials, sentencing 42 to death, transporting 114 for life, and awarding various prison terms to 93 others.

In Bengal, Jatindranath Mukherjee had sent Narendranath Bhattacharyya to Batavia to procure arms. But the plans were ruined by poor coordination and accurate British intelligence reports. The captain of the ship Maverick, carrying the arms, did not go to India. Unaware of this, Jatin and a small band of his followers waited in the Sunderbans for ten days, after which they fled to Orissa, where they were apprehended by a huge British force in Chasakhand near Balasore. In a pitched battle fought on September 9, 1915, Chittapriya Roy died on the battlefield and Jatin was mortally wounded, dying the next day.

Third Phase: From National Revolutionary Politics to Mass Revolutionary Politics

At the end of World War I, British imperialism adopted a carrot and stick policy to subdue the revolutionaries. Some constitutional concessions to moderate nationalists were followed by the Rowlatt Bills in 1919, which sought to deny normal legal processes for anyone accused of terrorism or sedition. The government retained its special powers despite the end of the war. The Congress launched the non-cooperation movement and supported the Khilafat movement. But when Gandhi unilaterally called off the movement after enraged peasants had killed some policemen in Chauri Chaura, the revolutionaries again started planning operations. From 1923, "patriotic robberies" resumed. Applying the Bengal Ordinance, notorious police officer Charles Tegart carried out massive repression. In 1924, several thousand revolutionaries were arrested without trial. At the Belgaum Session of the Indian National Congress, Gandhi brought a resolution condemning political killings, which was passed by a narrow margin.

Meanwhile in northern India, the Hindustan Republican Association was set up. Its first daring action was a rail robbery at Kakori in August 1925. Many of the revolutionaries were eventually arrested; four of the principal organizers, Ram Prasad Bismil, Asfaquallah, Rajendranath Lahiri, and Roshanlal, were hanged and Sachindranath Sanyal, Jogeshchandra Chatterjee, and three others were sentenced to life imprisonment. After the elimination of its initial leadership, control of the organization fell to Bhagat Singh and Chandrasekhar Azad. In 1925, Bhagat Singh, the nephew of Ajit Singh, had returned to Lahore and within a year he and his colleagues had started a militant youth organization called the Naujawan Bharat Sabha (Young India Association). In April 1926, Bhagat Singh established contact with Sohan Singh Josh, a former Ghadar activist now veering toward socialism, and through him the Workers and Peasants' Party, which published a monthly magazine, Kirti, in Punjabi.

For the next year Bhagat Singh worked with Josh and joined the editorial board of Kirti. In 1927, he was arrested on the charge of association with the Kakori Case, being accused of writing an article under the pseudonym Vidrohi (Rebel). Bhagat Singh spent the years from 1927 to 1928 studying the history of the revolutionary movement in India. His articles, mostly written for Kirti, dealt with the Babbar Akali Movement, the Kakori Case, the Delhi Bomb Case, individual revolutionaries, the need for young people to come forward and join the revolutionary movement, and the necessity of evolving an alternative to the mainstream leadership of the Congress.

By 1928, Singh was writing about anarchism and Marxism, making it clear that the counterposition between terrorism or violence and non-violence was false, the real issue being whether the struggle was for the liberation of the people or not, and why violence was being applied. Thus, it was not surprising that at a meeting in Delhi's Feroz Shah Kotla ground in 1928, the leading members of the Hindustan Republican Association decided to change the name of their organization to the Hindustan Socialist Republican Association (HSRA). Attempts were made to link up with the working-class struggles in major industrial cities. Branches of the organization were set up across north India, Bombay, and Madras. By this time, a Communist Party of India (CPI) had been set up, formed partly by emissaries of the Communist International (sent by Narendranath Bhattacharyya, who as M. N. Roy had become a leading Comintern figure). However, the emphasis on mass organization did not mean that the HSRA gave up the idea of violence. During the anti-Simon Commission agitations in the Punjab, police brutality caused the death of veteran Congress leader Lala Lajpat Rai. The HSRA decided to avenge his death. Bhagat Singh and Rajguru killed a police officer. In April 1929, Bhagat Singh and Batukeswar Dutt entered the Central Legislative Assembly during a discussion on the Trade Dispute Bill, threw a bomb, and waited to be arrested. They shouted the slogans "Inquilab Zindabad" (long live the revolution) and "Down with Imperialism." This was the first public utterance of what has become the standard communist slogan in India. Their aim was to use the arrest to propagate their ideas.

In the ensuing Assembly Bomb Case, Bhagat Singh was sentenced to transportation for life. But this was followed by the Lahore Conspiracy Case, in which he was sentenced to death, along with Sukhdev and Rajguru, and they were hanged on March 23, 1931. During the trial, the prisoners agitated for political prisoner status and declared a hunger strike; Jatin Das died after going without food for 64 days. Bhagat Singh explained during his trial that revolution was not the cult of the bomb and the pistol but a social transformation culminating in the establishment of the dictatorship of the proletariat. Having learned his Marxism directly rather than through the medium of the Stalinized Communist International, he was also refreshingly free of talk about the necessity of supporting the bourgeoisie and a two-stage revolution. Many of the survivors of the HSRA went on to found the Revolutionary Socialist Party (RSP), the biggest of the anti-Stalinist parties formed in the late 1930s in India, though others joined the CPI. Jogesh Chatterjee, as well as many of the younger cadres, including former Anushilan Samiti activists, joined the RSP. The death penalty for Bhagat Singh caused a countrywide stir, for he was at that time practically as popular as Gandhi. Indeed, at the Round Table Conference, Gandhi candidly told the British side that if they did not deal with him they would have to deal with the revolutionary terrorists. At Karachi, Gandhi was greeted by black flagwaving youth. In 1930, after the death of Chandrasekhar Azad in an encounter with the police in Allahabad, revolutionary activities in north India died down.

In Bengal, a number of groups were active in the early 1930s. The most important was the group led by Surya Sen in Chittogram (Chittagong). Sen was not only the leader of the revolutionary group but also a local Congress leader. The group conceived a plan to set an example for the youth and students of India and to demoralize the imperialists. Thanks to the group's political strength and cohesion, the plan remained totally unknown to the police. The objective was to occupy both armories in Chittagong on April 18, 1930, cut off the telephone and telegraphic links, thereby isolating the city, and round up as many English officers as possible to be used as hostages or eliminated if they offered resistance. One assault group took over the Police Armory housing 500 policemen. More than 500 rifles, several dozen revolvers, and large quantities of ammunition were captured in the operation. The disruption to railway and telecommunication lines was also successful. On April 22, 1930, the revolutionaries confronted a huge armed enemy force at a small hill known as Jalalabad Hill; 83 of the enemy were killed, while machine gun fire from a higher hill resulted in the death of 12 rebels. The remainder retreated at night to carry out guerilla warfare.

A significant departure on the part of Surya Sen was his willingness to accept that women had the same right to fight for India's independence as men, and the same capacities for self-sacrifice.

Kalpana Dutta and Pritilata Waddedar were two heroic women who fought in this armed struggle. Pritilata took part in a raid on the Pahartali European club on September 24, 1932. After the successful raid, which she had led, on the way back she committed suicide, leaving a note for the women of India calling on them to share with their brothers the tasks of armed struggle.

The Third Armory Raid Trial that commenced on June 15, 1933 involved Surya Sen, Tarakeswar Dastidar, and Kalpana Dutta. The first two were sentenced to death by hanging, while Kalpana was given a life sentence. Before being hanged, Surya Sen and Tarakeswar Dastidar were beaten to death by the top executive officers and their dead bodies were taken to the gallows and hanged. Instead of being handed over to their kin or cremated, their bodies were thrown into the Bay of Bengal, indicating the desire for vengeance on the part of the rulers against those who had frightened them out of their wits for nearly four years.

Another distinctive feature of the Chittagong struggle was the participation of Muslims. In some of the areas where the underground guerilla activists operated, the majority of peasants were Muslims. It was they who provided shelter to Surya Sen, Kalpana Dutta, and others. As Dutta wrote, there were police informers, but they needed to be identified as informers, not as Hindu or Muslim informers.

The Bengal Volunteers, another revolutionary organization of this period, killed in succession three cruel district magistrates of Medinipur – Burge, Peddy, and Douglas. However, while Ganesh Ghosh, Kalpana Dutta, Ananta Singh, and other cadres of Surya Sen later became communists, at the time of the uprising the group carried out little socioeconomic analysis, an important difference with Bhagat Singh.

The Indian National Army

During World War II, a much more serious attempt at armed resistance was made by Subhas Chandra Bose, a well-known left-wing Congress leader who had been expelled from the Congress in 1940. Bose had fled India, hoping to get support from other countries. After being turned down by the USSR, he obtained some support from Italy and Germany. But though he organized an Indian Legion, he felt that Germany was not giving him real help. Meanwhile, Japan had begun war with the western Allies. So Bose left Germany for Japan on February 8, 1943.

Bose's relationship with the Japanese was much better than with the Germans. He met Prime Minister Tojo and was invited to the Japanese parliament. He then moved on to Singapore. When the British surrendered there, a large Indian army contingent was present. Out of their number Captain Mohan Singh organized a free Indian army. Rashbehari Bose, then a resident of Japan, presented Subhas to a cheering crowd. Three and a half months later, on October 21, 1943, Bose publicly announced from the Cathay Theater in Singapore the formation of an Azad Hind Government (Indian National Government). The tides of war had already started moving against Japan. But Subhas Chandra nonetheless persuaded the Japanese to attack India from Manipur, neighboring Burma, using the Azad Hind Fauz or Indian National Army (INA).

To most Japanese officers the issue of Indian independence was irrelevant and the conquest of India was to be carried out by the imperial Japanese army. There was mutual distrust between INA and Japanese senior officers. Pro-British writers have claimed that the INA never fought the British. The reality, however, as even British intelligence reports state, is that the INA fought the British with great courage, despite being outgunned and having limited equipment and no food. The INA marched in battalion formations, refusing to be broken up into smaller units and integrated with the Japanese army. Subhas Chandra Bose was repeatedly accused of being a Quisling. The CPI, which after the Nazi invasion of the USSR had declared the war a people's war and supported the imperialist war effort, called him a fifth columnist. The record, however, shows that this is incorrect. He refused to fight any enemy except the British. When Aung San rose in revolt in Burma, Bose refused to let the Japanese use the INA against Aung San's soldiers.

The INA itself was organized in a secular manner and its units were named after national leaders. From the beginning Bose laid emphasis on recruiting women. A young Tamil doctor, Lakshmi Swaminathan, became the leader of the women's battalion. The INA fought valiantly and came close to Kohima, where the national flag was raised. But it was forced to retreat as the Japanese were themselves retreating. In May 1945, when the defeat of Japan was only a matter of time, the INA continued to fight with death-defying courage. Two units under Captain Bagri and Lieutenant Gyan Singh Bisht fought against superior armed British forces (in one instance against a motorized column including 13 tanks and 11 armored cars); all died in action. When Japan surrendered, Bose tried to fly to Darien in Manchuria to contact the Soviet army, reasoning that after the war Soviet and imperialist interests would diverge. But he died in a plane crash on the way.

The legacy of the Azad Hind Fauz was considerable. For the first time after 1857, Indian soldiers had fought in uniform against the British and, despite the odds, had been able to move into India. This fact enthused many people and the trials of the Azad Hind Fauz soldiers became the starting point for the postwar upsurge. Clement Attlee, the British prime minister from 1945 to 1951 who presided over the final transfer of power, told a former Bengali judge that Bose's INA did much more than Gandhi's satyagraha (peaceful protest) to persuade him that it was time for Britain to pull out of India.

India, civil disobedience movement and demand for independence

Kunal Chattopadhyay

The first demand for complete independence from Britain was raised in the forum of the Indian National Congress (Congress) in 1921 by Maulana Hasrat Mohani and Swami Kumaranand. But the mainstream nationalist forces, the Moderates, and the Indian capitalist class supporting them, were willing to accept self-government within the Empire. The reforms demanded by the Congress were not conceded by imperialism and subsequent attempts at contesting elections and wrecking the system from within, proposed by a section, did not work out. Gandhi's strategy of constructive work paid some long-term dividends in terms of building organizations, but little more. The unilateral withdrawal of struggles in 1922 by Gandhi had angered the All India Khilafat Committee representing a large number of Muslims. Meanwhile, new forces began to rise. Socialist and communist movements developed. The influence of the Russian Revolution was also felt in circles beyond the emerging communists. The formation of the All India Trade Union Congress saw the rise of organized labor militancy. Conflicts between the bourgeoisie and the imperialist rulers had increased in the early decades of the twentieth century, but fear of popular radicalism had restrained the bourgeoisie. The rise of Gandhi had resolved this problem to a certain extent, for the Gandhian techniques involved a completely controlled mass movement and a careful eschewing of proletarian struggles. But in 1927, during Gandhi's absence, the Congress session saw an upset victory for a resolution demanding complete independence. Gandhi opposed the demand in 1928, but facing a significant militant nationalist and leftist pressure, promised that if within one year his demand for Swaraj (a term Gandhi never explained elaborately, but one that was roughly a demand for Dominion Status within the Empire) was not met, he would move for complete independence.

Simon Commission and Nehru Report

Throughout 1928 and 1929 Gandhi acted as a brake on the increasing pressure for a fresh round of all-India mass struggle, remaining emphatic in his moderate demand for Swaraj. But the announcement of an all-white commission headed by Sir John Simon to look into further constitutional changes led to radicalization. The Simon Commission was boycotted by militant nationalists. Liberals like Sapru and a large section of Muslim leaders led by Jinnah joined hands with the Congress to try and draw up the outlines of a constitution. In the Central Legislative Assembly, Lala Lajpat Rai's resolution stating that Indians had no faith in the commission was supported by Jinnah. The Simon Commission arrived in Bombay on February 3, and was greeted by black flags and slogans saying "Simon go back." But anti-Simon Commission protests came at a cost. In Lahore, Lajpat Rai was severely injured in a baton-charge by the police, and died a few days later. The responsible police officer, Saunders, was subsequently shot dead by Sardar Bhagat Singh and his comrades.

Meanwhile, the Indian political parties tried to arrive at a consensus. Virulent opposition by the Hindu Mahasabha (a Hindu communal organization) to any concessions to minorities was a major hindrance, especially as many Congress leaders had Hindu communal leanings. At a meeting of Muslim organizations and personalities organized by Jinnah in 1927, a set of proposals included the creation of a province of Sind, and the introduction of reforms in Baluchistan and the North Western Frontier Provinces (NWFP) on the same footing as in any other province. In case the foregoing were accepted, the Muslims were willing to give up separate electorates, and were also willing to make to Hindu minorities in Sind, Baluchistan, and NWFP the same concessions that Hindu majorities in the other provinces were prepared to make to Muslim minorities. It was further proposed that in Punjab and Bengal the proportion of representation should be in accordance with the population. In the Central Legislature, Muslim representation should not be less than a third and that also by a mixed electorate. Thus, Jinnah had prevailed upon the Muslims to cooperate with other communities and peoples without any communally separated electorate. But the Motilal

Nehru Committee Report (1928) reflected the positions of the Congress Moderates and the Hindu communalists. At the all-parties meeting (December 1928) Jinnah's emotional appeal for Hindu-Muslim unity was curtly turned down by Hindu Mahasabha leader M. R. Jayakar. As a result, Jinnah was compelled to ally with the more conservative factions of the Muslim League and to raise the demand for a separate electorate, as well as full provincial autonomy in a federal constitution.

The Salt Satyagraha

Gandhi's hesitations about launching a militant movement stemmed from a dichotomy of the capitalist class. On one hand, the Indian capitalist class, notably cotton, jute, and steamship concerns, were restive at the attitude of the rulers who protected the profit of their British counterparts. But they were also fearful of the rise of labor militancy. Throughout 1928 and 1929 there was thus a pull between militancy and moderation. On November 2, 1929 Gandhi, Motilal Nehru, the Liberals and Madan Mohan Malaviya, a Hindu communalist Congress leader, joined in accepting Viceroy Irwin's offer of a Round Table Conference on the condition of discussing amnesty and the details of Dominion Status, among other issues. Subhas Bose objected, but Jawaharlal Nehru ultimately went along. With the Viceroy rejecting Gandhi's conditions, however, negotiations broke down. Then, at the Lahore session of the Congress (1929), Gandhi agreed to the resolution for purna swaraj (complete independence), and Jawaharlal in his presidential address attacked capitalism. Control of the movement was left entirely with Gandhi. Subhas Bose's proposals for non-payment of taxes and general strikes were rejected. The main resolution even praised Irwin, and endorsed the initial acceptance of his offer. Nonetheless, a qualitative leap was taken forward in the anti-colonial struggle. The delegates welcomed the unfurled tricolor with the slogan Inquilab Zindabad (long live the revolution).

Following the Lahore Congress there was a lull, till Gandhi decided on the precise methods of the struggle. January 26, 1930 saw the independence pledge being taken all over India. In Calcutta, Subhas Bose and others were brutally beaten up by the police for trying to hoist the tricolor. Congress legislators were ordered to resign on January 6, an instruction obeyed by most, but not all, including Muslim Congressmen like Ansari, who had been unhappy with the idea of a national struggle without a pact between the major communities. A communist-led railway strike was allowed to go down in defeat without much nationalist support. On January 31, 1930 Gandhi's much diluted 11-point ultimatum to Irwin combined issues of general interest, such as 50 percent cuts in army expenses and civil salaries, total prohibition, release of political prisoners, and reform of the police. Changes were sought in the Arms Act (a strange demand from a votary of non-violence), along with three specific bourgeois demands, these being the lowering of the rupee-sterling exchange ratio to 1 shilling 4 pence, textile protection, and reservation of coastal shipping for Indians. Two basically peasant themes were sounded. One was a demand for a 50 percent reduction in land revenue, and the other an abolition of the salt tax and the government salt monopoly.

The demands show the clear commitment of the Gandhi leadership to bourgeois hegemony. There was not a single demand for the working class. The specifically bourgeois demands were extremely conjunctural. A Mercantile Marine Conference in January 1930 had failed to settle disputes between British-owned and Indian-owned shipping interests, while in March 1930 the Bombay Mill-Owners' Association demanded protection against British and Japanese competition. The Federation of Indian Chambers of Commerce and Industry (FICCI) denounced the existing rupee-sterling ratio. At the Calcutta Indian Chamber of Commerce, D. P. Khaitan declared that without India attaining self-government, the economic position was not likely to improve.

Gandhi did not take up any of the radical demands for the peasantry. He mentioned peasant woes only to highlight direct colonial exploitation. The selection of the salt tax, from which the entire movement came to be called the Salt Satyagraha (a program of peaceful violation of specific laws, mass courting of arrests, occasional general strikes), was thus symbolic. It emphasized a universal grievance of the rural poor without focusing class issues. It offered the peasant the chance of a small but psychologically important extra income, and offered to urban adherents the possibility of symbolic identification with peasant sufferings. The resounding success of the movement showed that the immense surge of popular discontent had been tapped and canalized into safe routes by Gandhi. It was not so much that Gandhi called the movement into being, but that he was able to render it harmless enough for the bourgeoisie.

Gandhi organized a march from his Sabar-mati asrama (retreat) near Ahmedabad to Dandi on the Gujarat coast, from March 12 to April 6, 1930. Accompanying him were 71 members of his asrama, drawn from all parts of India. But right from the beginning, the popular pressure on Gandhi was discernible. Village officials began to resign their posts along Gandhi's route. On March 19, well-to-do peasants in Kheda district demanded permission to start immediate non-payment of revenue, a demand Gandhi conceded with great unease. It was in mid-May, after Gandhi's arrest, that the Congress Working Committee (CWC) sanctioned full-scale non-payment of land revenue in the raiyyatwari provinces where the state collected revenue directly, while in the zamindari provinces (where the state collected revenue through landed intermediaries) they advocated non-payment of chaukidari tax (a tax paid to the state) and the violation of forest laws in the Central Provinces. At Dandi, in protest against British taxes on salt, Gandhi and thousands of followers broke the law by making their own salt from seawater. There were tremendous levels of violence going beyond what had been done in 1920–2. In Calcutta, Karachi, and Madras there were clashes between the crowd and the police. After pressure, Gandhi and the CWC agreed that women too could take part in the satyagraha. Sarojini Naidu took part in the Dandi satyagraha, and subsequently led a massive salt raid in Dharasana, when there was extreme police brutality.

A few major outbursts went clearly beyond the outlines of Gandhian civil disobedience and intensified repression. Notable were the armed struggles initiated by Surya Sen and his followers in Chittagong, East Bengal; the activities of the Hindustan Socialist Revolutionary Army in the Punjab; and the proletarian uprising in the city of Sholapur, where for a few days a parallel government was set up.

Within the Gandhian framework, most alarming from the British point of view was perhaps the popular upsurge in Peshawar. Abdul Ghaffar Khan, a Pathan chieftain's son, had been carrying out educational and social reform work among his countrymen. Influenced by Gandhi, in 1929 he had organized a huge volunteer force of over 50,000, the Khuda-i-Khidmatgar (volunteers for god). On April 23, 1930 the arrest of Ghaffar led to a mass upsurge in Peshawar and intensive firing at Kissakahani Bazar for hours. According to unofficial estimates the number of dead ranged from 200 to 250. Garhwal Rifles troops, all upper caste Hindus, were brought in, but they refused to fire on the unarmed Muslim protestors. It took the British ten days to regain control over the city. Thakur Chandra Singh Garhwali, who had led the military refusal, was criticized by Gandhi, who insisted that a soldier in uniform had to obey his superior officers.

With complete independence the declared goal, the movement this time was a step forward from previous Gandhian struggles, and the result was the policy of tremendous brutality adopted by the frightened imperialist government. The number of people arrested was much higher – 92,124 according to the estimate of Nehru. Bengal with 15,000 provided the largest contingent, followed by Bihar with 14,251. Non-payment of tax was met by wholesale confiscation of household goods, implements, and even land.

As with any all-India movement, there were regional variations. Metropolitan Bombay, Gujarat, Tamil Nadu under the Gandhian C. Rajagopalachari, Bengal, where bhadralok (a cultural identity combining landed interests with urban petty bourgeois linkage) Congress leaders played a very limited role, but Gandhian cadres mobilized significant numbers of people, Orissa, Bihar, and particularly UP, saw major advances in the struggles. However, in Bengal communal riots in Dhaka and in villages in Kishoreganj cut short the initial Muslim tendency to join the struggles. The failure of bhadralok nationalism to address peasant (mostly Muslim) issues and the failure of communists at this point to pose an alternative contributed to the communal transformation of class agenda. By contrast, Sind saw a weak movement due to the absence of Muslims, Andhra and Assam saw peasant movements but less participation in the Gandhian movement itself, and in Maharashtra, while new, anti-Brahmin campaigners like Keshavrao Jedhe were coming into the movement, many followers of Tilak (who had promoted a Hinduized nationalism) like B. S. Munje were moving in a distinctly fascist Hindu communal and loyalist direction. The ultra-left policy of the Communist International (its "Colonial Thesis" called for no truck with any section of the colonial bourgeoisie) meant the Communist Party of India tried to keep away from these struggles. A distinctive voice was also raised by Dr. B. R. Ambedkar, who participated in the Round Table Conference in 1930 and raised the demand for separate electorates for untouchables.

Gandhi-Irwin Pact

From the autumn of 1930 there was an overall weakening in forms of struggle associated with the bourgeois groups or upper peasantry, while popular struggles continued but fewer under Congress control. In such a situation, both the Gandhian leadership and the bourgeoisie moved towards a negotiated, compromise settlement, vital for British aims. So far the Round Table Conference had attracted only Homi Mody among big capitalists, along with a range of Muslim leaders including Jinnah, and Hindu Mahasabha leaders, Liberals, and a big princely contingent. But the mass struggle made implementation of the Simon Commission Report impossible. Liberal leaders like Sapru, Chintamani, and others had been pressing the Congress to accept some settlement. But Gandhi's change of front cannot be attributed to their pressure. Rather, there is some evidence that Indian capitalist interests were at work. On February 7, 1931 the Bombay governor reported to the Viceroy that some of Gandhi's mercantile followers were likely to break with him unless he moved to a settlement. During the Gandhi-Irwin talks, Gandhi accepted federation (a weak central government with strong imperialist control), Indian responsibility (the executive would be responsible to the legislative), and reservations and safeguards, i.e., that defense, external affairs, the position of minorities, the financial credit of India, and the discharge of obligations were kept for the Viceroy. The Gandhi-Irwin agreement of March 5, 1931 agreed to release the civil disobedience prisoners and gave concessions over salt and non-political Swadeshi propaganda. But this was more than offset by Gandhi giving up his demands for an enquiry into police atrocities and the return of confiscated land already sold to third parties.

Radical nationalists were angered by the terms of the pact, and further angered by the hanging of Bhagat Singh and two of his comrades on March 23, 1931, just before the opening of the Karachi session of the Congress. The Naujawan Bharat Sabha, the mass organization built by Bhagat Singh, organized a demonstration against Gandhi at Karachi railway station. But the left inside Congress could not resist Gandhi, a pattern that would be recurrent over the years. Nehru had worked out a fairly radical agrarian program while in jail. He also put forward the idea of a constituent assembly as the central political slogan, but then, as later, he never stood up to Gandhi. With most leading communists in jail, the only socialist criticisms came from people like Yusuf Meherali of the Congress Socialist Party, who denounced the politics of compromise, but drew back before making any operative proposal. The Karachi session did adopt a resolution on pro-left fundamental rights and economic policy, as a part of the hegemony-building strategy of the Congress. Long-term goals would be adopted with radical rhetoric, but policy and tactics would be determined by the right. It was mostly about general democratic rights such as civil liberties, legal equality, adult suffrage, free primary education, and a state policy of religious neutrality, with much of Gandhi's 11 points of 1930, and a few modest promises for labor, such as living wages, an end to forced labor, trade union rights, and a vague statement about state control over key industries and mineral resources. A very moderate program of agrarian change included reduction in land rent and revenue, and no reference was made to the abolition of zamindari (landownership).

After the compromise the Congress found its hands tied. By allowing the mass movement to fritter away its energies, the Congress had done what imperialism wanted it to do. At the Round Table Conference, separate electorates were demanded by Muslims, the Harijans or the dalits (untouchables or depressed classes), Indian Christians, and others. Gandhi fought against the concerted move to make all constitutional progress conditional on a solution of the communal problem. At one stage he even offered to accept all the Muslim claims provided they supported the Congress demand for Swaraj. But this was an empty gesture, since the Congress had not broken decisively with the Hindu Mahasabha. Ramsay MacDonald now threatened to impose a unilateral communal award if the Indians failed to agree. Outmaneuvered, Gandhi returned to India to find Nehru and Ghaffar Khan in jail, and large-scale repression underway. Viceroy Willingdon rudely turned down Gandhi's request for an interview, after all preparations had been taken by imperialism for a crackdown. As a result, a poorly organized second civil disobedience movement was launched. Arrests and convictions were high in January and February 1932, but started declining thereafter to not over 4,000 from May onwards. The imperialists themselves admitted that there was little difference between their rule and fascist rule, with Willingdon saying that he was becoming a sort of Mussolini in India.

When civil disobedience was renewed, the Federation of Indian Chambers of Commerce and Industry decided to keep away from the constitutional discussions. G. D. Birla assured the British that the decision to boycott the Round Table Conference had been taken under pressure from member bodies, and the door was not closed for further talks. At the Ottawa Imperial Economic Conference in the summer of 1932, India conceded lower import duty rates for a number of British commodities in return for preferential treatment for Indian industry in the UK. In accordance with the Lees-Mody Pact of 1933, Bombay mill-owners agreed to a further preferential cut for British textiles in return for a Lancashire promise to buy more Indian raw cotton. Some disputes remained, like that over the rupee-sterling ratio. Lancashire aligned itself with the extreme imperialist Churchill. A series of concessions was wrested by British capitalism. Still the capitalist class was not willing to go for an all-out struggle for independence over this. On the other hand, the imperialist pressures were a reminder to Indian capitalism of the need to retain strong links with the national movement. The ultimate result was capitalist pressure on the Congress for participation in elections and eventually ministerial participation. Faced with a socialist current, the bourgeoisie and the Gandhians formed strong links, and bourgeois support was crucial to Congress election victories in 1937.

By the second half of 1932, Gandhian strategy showed a shift to constructive work from the policy of confrontation. MacDonald's Communal Award of August 1932 focused his attention on Harijan welfare. His "fast unto death" and the Poona Pact (September 1932) were able to bring about an agreement whereby the Hindu joint electorate was retained, but with reserved seats for untouchables to a greater extent than under MacDonald's award. Making Harijan-upliftment a central concern, he however made his campaign rather ambiguous. He attributed the terrible Bihar earthquake of January 15, 1934 to divine punishment for the sins of caste Hindus, an obscurantist campaign that deeply shocked Rabindranath Tagore and led to a war of words between the two. Civil disobedience was formally withdrawn in April 1934.

Orthodox Hindus within the Congress disliked Gandhi's Harijan-upliftment campaign, and Hindu communal leaders moved away from him. Gandhi's meetings were disrupted repeatedly, and there was even a bomb attack on his car in Pune on June 25, 1934. Gandhi's campaign, which never rejected the caste system, was also delinked from economic demands. He also advised caution on inter-caste marriage and inter-caste dining. For dalits, the Hindu-tinged nationalism and the Hindu communalism of many upper caste politicians, and their glorification of an imagined golden age, was unacceptable, as that age was seen as one violent towards dalits. Dalit leaders like Ambedkar argued that political and economic empowerment was essential.

Constitutionalism

In August 1935 the Government of India Act was promulgated. From 1932, Indian participation in the making of this supposed constitution had been negligible. Virtually all sections of the Indian public opinion criticized it as representing little real advance over 1919. At the federal level, direct election was replaced by indirect election. Only at the provincial level, diarchy was replaced by responsible government, and the electorate was increased from 6.5 million to about 30 million. But governors retained discretionary powers regarding summoning of legislatures, giving assent to bills, and administering certain special regions. On matters like minority rights, privileges of civil servants, and prevention of discrimination against British business interests, power was "reserved."

The proposed federal structure was to come into existence only after the accession of 50 percent of the princes. It envisaged a strong center, with a few subjects transferred to elected ministers but limited by safeguards. Foreign affairs and defense were to be retained by the Viceroy, while the Central Reserve Bank and the railways were kept out of assembly control. Ultimate financial control was transferred from London to Delhi, but that meant nothing as the power was in the hands of the Viceroy. In any case the federal part of the Act proved a non-starter as the princes, who had accepted this part of the proposal only out of fear of the civil disobedience movement, were unenthusiastic once that movement declined. The Muslim League felt it was too unitary, while the Congress denounced it as a sham.

In 1937 elections were held under the new system. The Congress won outright in five out of eleven provinces (Madras, Bihar, Orissa, Central Provinces, and UP) with a near majority in Bombay (86 out of 175 seats). It received 711 out of 1,585 provincial assembly seats. Even in the Muslim seats, the Muslim League was not able to make much headway. But Jinnah's appeal for a Congress-Muslim League coalition was turned down curtly by Nehru and Maulana Azad, who advised the League to merge with the Congress. This unwillingness to adjust with other forces in the country pushed Jinnah finally away from moderate nationalism towards communalism. His success, in turn, was caused by the Congress failure to develop and implement a radical social policy.

India, Great Rebellion of 1857 (the Sepoy Revolt)

Sepoy Revolt

Despite all its claims of good governance and ethical government, British rule in India was mainly rule by force of arms. The army was the crucial institution for the establishment, expansion, and extraction of revenue for British rule. From the mid-eighteenth century the British East India Company started recruiting peasants, gave them training and discipline according to European military standards, and created a permanent independent Indian army. The commanders were European officers, some appointed from the British army, and others nominated by the company's directors. By 1794 the number of sepoys (Indian soldiers) rose to 82,000, expanding further to 154,000 in 1824 and 214,000 in 1856. There were distinct components of the army: the Bengal army, the Bombay army, and the Madras army. Despite its name the Bengal army, created first, mostly recruited upper-caste

A group of Sikh officers and men, 1858 (photographer unknown). In May of 1857, Indian soldiers in the service of the British East India Company mutinied. The rebellion spread and took a year to suppress. The revolt is considered by historians as the first prominent Indian nationalist protest. (National Army Museum, London/The Bridgeman Art Library) elements, Brahmans, Rajputs, and Bhumihars from Awadh and Bihar. A policy of respecting caste and the dietary and other practices of the sepoys fostered a sense of caste identity in the army. As the British domains expanded, however, other communities and other types of soldiers were also recruited, such as Marathas, or Gurkhas from among the Nepalis. The Bombay and Madras armies became more heterogeneous, but the Bengal army remained relatively more upper caste. Alavi (1996) shows that the military reforms of the 1830s, creating a more uniform military culture, gave rise to discontent.

Kaye (1878) and Malleon (1891) were among those British writers who sought to portray the revolt as purely a mutiny of soldiers motivated by narrow and selfish ends. Indian historians have normally argued that though the principal revolt began with an outbreak at Meerut, 36 miles from Delhi, on May 10, 1857, there were indications beforehand. On March 29, 1857 a soldier named Mangal Pandey rebelled in Barrackpore, near Calcutta, and attacked his superior officers. Though his regiment did not join the revolt, only one soldier moved against him, while Jemadar Iswari Prasad (an Indian non-commissioned officer) refused to arrest him. Ultimately, Pandey was arrested, court-martialed, and hanged on April 8. Prasad was hanged on April 22. The entire regiment was punished by being disbanded. This, however, resulted in the disbanded soldiers going home and fueling further discontent.

There are two ways of looking at incidents like Mangal Pandey's revolt. One is to have a long debate over whether his act constituted a chain in the revolt. According to Pandey's deposition in court, he had taken bhang, an intoxicant. Bhang was to the Indian sepoy what rum was to the British soldier. But a more fruitful way is to look at the string of military mutinies before 1857, and recognize that racism, pay-related issues, and other factors of discrimination and torture had contributed to them. The Bengal army had wavered on a number of occasions. There had been mutinies in Java in 1815 and in Gwalior in 1834. There had been trouble during the Afghan campaign of 1839–42 when the deficiencies of white leadership were exposed. In the 1850s grievances among the sepoys began to increase. The General Service Enlistment Act of 1856, which demanded that sepoys should affirm their readiness to serve abroad, ignored their religious sensibilities, including the caste restriction on Hindus in crossing the sea. It was an attempt to make the army more flexible, from the colonialists' point of view. It also went along with policies designed to introduce a wider range of caste and regional groups, such as the Sikhs of the Punjab. A large part of the Punjab army was integrated into the British army. This alarmed the Hindi-speaking Rajputs and Brahmans who had hitherto dominated the military services. In addition, Dalhousie's annexation of Awadh was widely resented, particularly by the sepoys of the Bengal army, most of whom came from Awadh. Moreover, as a result of the annexation the higher pay for serving outside the East India Company's territories disappeared. In addition, the company's direct rule meant higher taxes in Awadh, which fell on the families of sepoys. The Burma campaign had led to the demand that they should travel by sea, which once again involved a threat of loss of caste. It was in this highly charged situation that the story of the cartridges came.

From the late 1830s the Brown Bess gun was replaced by the new and superior Lee Enfield percussion cap rifled musket in the British army. The Enfield rifle had cartridges in casings, which had to be torn off using one's teeth. There was a rumor that the casing was greased with cow and pig fat. One was sacred to Hindus and the other was considered sacrilegious by Muslims. The idea that this would pollute them and make them Christians was a rumor that fell on fertile soil. Interestingly, though, during the rebellion the cartridges were used by the sepoys against the British.

Modern historians rejected the myth that a countrywide conspiracy had been created among the sepoys. What is definite is that incidents of disobedience, incendiarism, and violence were reported from army cantonments in extensive parts of India. Bengal, considered to have remained quiet after the solitary incident of Pandey, is now known to have had military incidents at different places. Discontent was rife in the army cantonments of Ambala, Lucknow, and Meerut. Eventually, on May 10, the Meerut sepoys started the revolt when 85 soldiers of the 3rd Light Cavalry were imprisoned and harshly punished for refusing to use their cartridges. The soldiers rescued their arrested colleagues and killed some of their European officers.

The Meerut garrison, however, had the largest proportion of British troops: 2,038 European troops with 12 field guns versus 2,357 sepoys lacking artillery. As a result, the Meerut garrison could hold out. The revolt spread rapidly in its initial stage, but then was restricted to certain parts of the country. The initial crucial link in the chain was the march of the rebel soldiers from Meerut to Delhi on the night of May 10–11, 1857. They proclaimed the Mughal Emperor Bahadur Shah Zafar the Emperor of Hindustan. Within a week Awadh, Rohilkhand, the land between the Ganga and the Jamuna (the Doab), Bundelkhand, Central India, large parts of Bihar, and the East Punjab all shook off British authority. In many of the princely states the rulers remained loyal to the British, but the soldiers were on the brink of revolt. Over 20,000 of the Sindhia's troops from Gwalior went over to Tantia Tope, Commander-in-Chief of Nana Saheb's (the adopted son of Peshwa Baji Rao II, and also the claimant to the highest authority among the Marathas, in Kanpur) army and the Rani (Queen) of Jhansi. Many lesser chiefs of Rajasthan and Maharashtra rebelled with popular support. Local unrest was also seen in Hyderabad.

Much is made of the fact that only the Bengal army revolted, whereas the Madras and the Bombay regiments remained quiet, while the Punjabi and Gurkha soldiers actually helped to suppress the rebellion. Against this it needs to be noted that the maximum number of Indian sepoys were in the Bengal regiment, and in terms of total number, around half the sepoys had rebelled. To the discontent with service rules had been added a fear that the British were determined to convert them into Christians, a belief fueled by the presence of missionaries as well as the cartridge issue. Moreover, as peasants in uniform, the sepoys were concerned about the declining condition of the peasantry due to new revenue settlements in Awadh. Sikh support for the British might have been the consequence of the role of the Bengal army in suppressing the Sikh army a few years previously, and of the administration of Lawrence in Punjab, where the interests of the well-to-do were looked after.

Civilian Revolt

No uniform explanation can be given for the civilian rebellion. Colonial rule had a differential impact on Indian society, so responses were not uniform. Among the active rebels were two kinds of people. There were the nobles and landlords on the one hand and the peasants on the other.

The nobles' grievances included the annexations, especially under Lord Dalhousie's Doctrine of Lapse, which refused to recognize adopted sons as legal heirs of ruling princes and annexed a number of kingdoms, like Satara, Nagpur, Sambalpur, Udaipur, and Jhansi, between 1848 and 1853. This amounted to British interference in the traditional system of inheritance. Finally, in 1856, the annexation of Awadh on the ground of misrule not only affected the entire aristocracy of the region but also created a panic among rulers of the Indian states. It was now becoming evident to them that groveling before the British did not ensure security of their throne. The British had indeed announced that Mughals would lose the title of Badshah (Emperor) after the death of the Badshah of Delhi, Bahadur Shah II. They would be known as mere princes. They had already been offended by Dalhousie, who was responsible for shifting them from the historic Red Fort to a humbler residence at the Qutub on the outskirts of Delhi. In a large number of cases, deposed and disgruntled princes provided political leadership, like Nana Saheb, Begum Hazrat Mahal in Lucknow, Khan Bahadur Khan in Rohilkhand, and Rani Lakshmibai in Jhansi, though earlier she was prepared to accept British hegemony if they had recognized her adopted son as the heir to the throne. By contrast, in Indore, where many soldiers of Holkar (Maratha chief) were on the verge of rebellion, the ruler remained loyal, as did Sindhia (another Maratha chief) in Gwalior. A number of powerful taluqdars (landed intermediaries) had lost about half their estates as the revenue settlement was made with the actual occupiers of the land or village coparcenaries in Awadh. So Awadh and the North-Western provinces, where too many taluqdars had been dispossessed, saw revolt. Their former tenants acknowledged their claims and united with them against the British.

Peasants joined the revolt as they were hit hard by excessive revenue demands of the state. In Awadh, for example, there were areas where revenue assessment went up, so peasants and taluqdars joined hands. Where agriculture was insecure, high revenue demands pushed peasants into debt and dispossession, with British courts and the legal system assisting the transformation. In 1853, in the North-Western provinces alone, 110,000 acres of land were sold through auction (Bandyopadhyay 2004). Chaudhuri's (1965) classic study of popular uprisings showed how the new revenue systems united former exploiters and exploited against the British. However, Stokes (1980), Roy (1994), and others have provided some evidence that the picture was not so straightforward. Not all taluqdars suffered under the British, and post-1857 official writings mention the “loyal taluqdars.” Such elements exerted an influence on their community. Among the peasants, also, region-specific conditions varied. Social homogeneity and collective power were also factors in determining resistance. Of about 150,000 men who died fighting the English in Awadh, over 100,000 were civilians. Roy traces how peasants in Bundelkhand turned against the administration, then against indigenous class hierarchies as well.

Unlike other conquerors, the British were not a people who shifted to India and became part of the local population. They treated all Indians with a haughty racist disdain. So in Indian behavior, there was a good deal of anti-British attitude well before the revolt. Monish Mohanlal of Delhi, a loyalist, nonetheless wrote afterwards that even those who had grown rich under British rule showed a degree of hidden delight at British reverses.

A further factor for the growth of popular hostility was fear of British attacks on religion. This fear stemmed from the activities of the Christian missionaries, who were keen on converting people and ridiculed Hinduism and Islam, including long-held customs and traditions. Moreover, they were given ample state protection. Regardless of the actual number of people converted, they appeared as a threat to the religions of the people of India. Religious sentiments were also, at times, connected to hard economic realities, since the imposition of tax on previously exempted land hurt many Brahmin and upper-class Muslims.

At the same time, in the course of the previous two decades, people had had the experience of seeing the English face major military difficulties in the First Afghan War (1838–42), the wars in the Punjab (1845–59), and the Crimean War (1854–6). In fact, there was probably an excessive optimism on this score, for the Indians had no idea about how much military strength the British could rely on.

Structure of Administration

In the wake of the initial success of the rebels came the weakening and disintegration of the strong anti-British combine. Rivalry arose between the Mughals and the Marathas, to the extent that Nana Saheb refused to go to Delhi, fearing he would be overshadowed by the Mughal court.

The former ruling elements, however, found control slipping out of their hands. By early July 1857 Bahadur Shah was reduced to a figurehead. After the arrival of General Bakht Khan, leader of the mutineers of Bareilly, the rebels in Delhi issued a parmanah (administrative order) outlining the structures of the proposed state. Though Bahadur Shah was again declared to be the emperor, real executive power was vested in a Court of Administration, which was to administer the state, maintain peace and order, collect land revenue, raise loans from the money lenders, defend the realm, and prosecute the wars. The court consisted of ten members, six from the army and four civilians. The members were to be elected by a majority vote from among intelligent, wise, capable, and experienced men who also had a record of faithful service. But this last clause was not strictly enforceable. One out of the ten members of the court was to be elected Sadr-e-Jalsa (President) and another Naib Sadr-e-Jalsa (Vice President). Each member of the court had charge of a department. In each case, four members of the court and appointed secretaries were to assist them. In other words, steps were taken to move towards a constitutional monarchy with a council of the army along with some civilians.

Bahadur Shah had the right to attend sessions of the court, and no decision of the court was enforceable without the signature of the emperor. In practice, it seems, the court was supreme. During his trial, he submitted in self-defense the argument that he was a de facto prisoner of the soldiers, compelled to sign and affix his seal on whatever they brought before him. While there may be some exaggeration, this suggests the rebels were trying to find solutions to modern problems, not just returning to the past. However, the procedures suggest an admixture of modernization efforts with foundations in the procedures of the traditional village self-government rules, known as the panchayat system.

The court was more an executive than a legislative body. But it was clear that it would not allow the princes to usurp its authority. This led to conflicts between the Mughal princes and the court. Mirza Mughal, the eldest son of the emperor, who had commanded the army till the arrival of General Bakht Khan, was unhappy at being removed from his command. The court also established law courts, appointed judges, and regulated the judicial procedure for civil and military cases. In the sphere of finance, too, it was supreme. But the propertied classes seem neither to have advanced loans, nor to consider the abolition of landlordism. On the other hand, the peasant soldiers came from a social background where a capitalist transformation could not be envisaged. So the court tried to fix prices and check hoarding. But it did not introduce rationing or assure supplies. Realizing that so far taxes had been paid by those who could least pay, the peasants demanded tax measures that would burden mainly the rich. Orders passed by the court show it trying to abolish landlordism and pass on land to the cultivator, as well as to overhaul the whole revenue system.

A similar Court of Administration was set up in Lucknow, consisting of a number of principal servants of the king, the great landed proprietors of the area, along with representatives of the army. There, the rebel soldiers crowned Birjis Qadr, a son of the deposed Nawab of Awadh. He was declared the Nawab Vazir, but real power was vested in a minister and a Court of Administration.

Nature of the Revolt

Some contemporaries thought the revolt was a Muslim conspiracy to restore the Mughal Empire. The dominant official version was that it was chiefly a mutiny of the sepoys, the term even now most favored in English historiography. Benjamin Disraeli had asked in the House of Commons whether it was a national revolt. Marx called it in truth a national revolt. An Indian nationalist, V. D. Savarkar, called it a war of independence, a claim contested by Sen (1957) but much supported by S. B. Chaudhuri.

A large body of scholarly opinion contends it was not national, for a number of reasons:

- The revolt did not spread out all over India, but only over a restricted part.
- It was only the Bengal army that revolted, not the other armies under British control.
- Many of the princely states took no part in the rebellion, and those who did were more concerned with their own positions than with creating a united India.

- With rare exceptions, the western-educated intelligentsia sided with the British and acclaimed the queen's proclamation of 1858 taking over direct rule of India.
- There was no national consciousness in India at that time, and the creation of 1857 as a national revolt was the myth of a later nationalist movement.

Some of these issues have already been noted. In brief, the responses have been that the scope of the revolt was national in geographic terms, as more recent archival evidence has shown, such as Lt. Governor Halliday's 150-page unpublished note on unrest in Bengal discloses. As late as the early twentieth century, a Bengali nationalist like Surendranath Banerjea was still titling his autobiography "a nation in making," so it is wrong to expect a full-fledged nation in the ideology of the rebels. Yet the rebellion shows something different from either past peasant revolts or a "feudal reaction." The real power was not the nobles but the soldiers and peasants. Contrary to the view that peasants always restrict themselves to localism, Tapti Roy's study shows how they moved forward. More crucially, the invocation of the Mughal state suggested a wider concept of the country on the part of the rebels. Rajat Ray has argued that they were trying to free "Hindustan" of foreign rule. And while they invoked the Mughals, they also had in mind a relatively decentralized set up. Thus, when Birjis Qadr was made the ruler of Awadh, he had to accept the Mughal emperor as the suzerain authority.

The argument that the rural revolt was elitist in character (Stokes 1980: 185) ignores or downplays the autonomy of the peasantry. In some cases, as in Jagdishpur, the noble Kunwar Singh was pushed into providing leadership by the peasants themselves. Bahadur Shah agreed to be the leader of the revolt in Delhi after great hesitation. Tantia Topi's confession shows that Nana Saheb in Kanpur was forced by the rebels to join them (Mukherjee 2001: 62–3). And the profession of loyalty by the western-educated intelligentsia was less absolute than a simplistic reading suggests. Thus, the Hindoo Patriot proclaimed loyalty, but also criticized the violence unleashed by the British state to restore authority. So feelings of disaffection and voices of criticism were found at all levels, even if they did not translate directly into a demand for independence.

Revolt and Reconquest

Though there were stirrings elsewhere, the main areas of revolt were Meerut, Delhi, Kanpur, Lucknow, Jhansi, Nasibpur in eastern Punjab (modern Haryana), Sialkot in Punjab, and Jagdishpur in Bihar. Occasional efforts were made to seek foreign help, for example by Rao Tularam, who after fighting at Nasibpur tried to go to Russia to get military assistance, but he died on the way.

The British started their efforts at recapturing the lost territories. Two columns left Meerut and Simla in the direction of Delhi, killing and hanging numerous Indians, including plenty of non-combatants. Troops were moved from the Crimean War and the proposed operation at China. After defeating the Indians in a major battle at Badli-ke-Serai (around Delhi), the British established a base on the Delhi ridge to the north of the city. The siege of Delhi began on July 1, 1857 and continued till August 31. But the encirclement was not complete, and reinforcements and assistance came in. Subsequently, troops from the Punjab army, Pathan soldiers, and Gurkha soldiers recruited from Nepal were also used to help the British. Eventually, the British broke through the Kashmiri gate by blowing it up on September 14, and began a week of street fighting. By September 20 they had recaptured Delhi. The victorious army looted the city and murdered a huge number of people. Cannons were set up in a mosque and neighborhoods were bombarded. On September 21 Bahadur Shah surrendered. The next day the British officer Hodson shot his sons Mirza Mughal, Mirza Khizr Sultan, and Mirza Abu Bakr at the Khooni Darwaza (the bloody gate).

At Kanpur there had been one scene of major violence from the Indian side. First, after a three-week siege, negotiations were carried out whereby the British would be given safe passage. But a number of soldiers on the British side were subsequently killed. Later, the massacre of British women and children prisoners of Nana Saheb at Bibi-Ghar was used to whip up hysteria in England about India and the rebellion, with calls for annihilation of Indians. Nineteenth-century English historians played up this incident while remaining silent about the massacres perpetrated by the British. Savarkar, on the other hand, sought to glorify the massacre, something other Indian historians have not attempted. After the retaking of Kanpur, sepoys were killed, often by being tied to the mouth of cannons which were then fired. A number of sepoys were made to lick the bloodstains at Bibi-Ghar.

In Lucknow, Henry Lawrence, the British commander, was able to fortify his position in time. When the direct assault failed, the rebels besieged the English. Lawrence himself died. After 90 days the number of defenders was reduced from 1,700 troops to 350 English soldiers and 300 sepoys, along with a number of non-combatants. On September 25 Sir Henry Havelock and Sir James Outram brought a force that defeated the besiegers but was numerically too small to break them. So the first relief of Lucknow, as it is called, ended with the relieving forces joining the besieged. Eventually, on November 18, 1857, the city was evacuated after Sir Colin Campbell, the new commander in chief, had brought larger forces in October and relieved the garrison.

In Bundelkhand, Rani Lakshmi Bai of Jhansi repulsed the attacks by the loyalist rulers of neighboring Datia and Orchha in September and October. In March 1858 Sir Hugh Rose captured Jhansi, but the Rani fled, to continue the struggle. Tantia Tope joined her. Sindhia, a British loyalist, tried to resist her, but his troops went over to the rebels and he fled to Agra. On June 1, 1858 she was able to take over Gwalior. She died three weeks later in battle, clad in a battle dress and mounted on a charger, on June 17, 1858, when the British had besieged Gwalior.

In Jagdishpur, Kunwar Singh, at the time nearly 80 years of age, performed as the most able military leader and strategist. He fought the British in Bihar, and later joining hands with Nana Saheb's forces, he also campaigned in Awadh and Central India. Turning back to Bihar, he defeated the British forces near Arrah, but suffered an injury which led to his death soon afterwards, on April 27, 1858.

Another outstanding leader of the revolt was Maulavi Ahmadullah of Faizabad, an inhabitant of Madras. In January 1857 he moved north to Faizabad where he fought a large-scale battle against the British troops sent to stop him from preaching sedition. When the revolt broke out in May, he emerged as one of its acknowledged leaders in Awadh. After the fall of Lucknow on October 23, 1857, he led the rebellion in Rohilkhand till he was treacherously killed by the Raja of Puwain, who was paid 50,000 rupees as a reward.

In 1858 the defeats continued, punctuated by a few victories, like Kunwar Singh's at Arrah. But on May 6, 1858 Bareilly was captured from Khan Bahadur Khan. On June 20 Gwalior was recaptured from the rebels. On October 17–19 Amar Singh, brother of Kunwar Singh, was defeated. The final mopping up in 1859 saw the defeat of Tantia Tope on January 21, and his betrayal by Raja Man Singh on April 7, 1859. He was hanged on April 18. Between October and December 1859, rebels in Northern Awadh and Nepal were smashed, with 4,000 of Nana Saheb's followers captured.

Defeat was followed by murderous revenge. Village after village was taken back after heavy fighting, and immense numbers were slaughtered, either by being tied to cannons and the cannons then being discharged, or by being strung up from trees.

Nationalist appropriation of the revolt has always been inadequate because the revolt was ultimately neither a revolt of feudal reaction nor a constitutionalist struggle. The reason why the urban middle class remained silent, or at most mildly critical of the British, was because of the peasant war dimension of the revolt. The new zamindars created by the Permanent (revenue) Settlement, and the emerging bourgeoisie, at that stage tied to them by a thousand strings, did not want to support a peasant war.

On the other hand, one of the strengths of the revolt was the degree of unity between Hindus and Muslims. Both among the soldiers and the people, and among the leaders, there was a good deal of inter-community cooperation. The Meerut rebels directly marched to Delhi to proclaim Bahadur Shah the emperor. In Delhi a proclamation in the name of Bahadur Shah immediately halted cow-slaughter as a gesture to Hindu sensibilities.

Aftermath

A watershed in Indian history, the revolt of 1857 meant the end of East India Company rule, with parliament declaring Queen Victoria the sovereign of British India. Bahadur Shah was tried for rebelling, a patently illegal act, for the East India Company had held its authority under the Mughal emperor, even though for many years that formality had been a legal fiction. A secretary of state for India, aided by a council, took over from the directors of the company and the board of control. The secretary was a member of the British Cabinet and as such directly responsible to parliament. The queen's proclamation of November 1, 1858 declared that Indians would be subjects with due rights. But the most important reality was the virulent racism unleashed by the British in response to the revolt. At the same time, in order to garner a degree of public support for British rule, all the conservative forces were now backed. This in turn would subsequently generate frustration, and eventually militancy, from rising middle-class nationalism later in the century.

In 1861 the India Councils Act enlarged the council and turned it into the Imperial Legislative Council. The governor-general was authorized to add to the Executive Council a few Indians. Usually, they were princes or their ministers, big landlords, big merchants, or retired government officials. In fact, therefore, the government of India remained despotism by an alien race.

India, Hindutva and fascist mobilizations, 1989–2002

Hindu Communalism and Indian Fascism

The Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS, National Volunteer Organization), set up in 1925 in Nagpur, became, by the early 1930s, a radical right organization with clear fascist tendencies. It had great contempt for democracy, hailed the Nazis, tried to imitate them, and set up a tight, leader-centric organization with a rabidly Hindu chauvinist agenda. The construction of a homogeneous Hindu identity meant negating any idea of class and caste divisions through token gestures, while retaining an upper-caste and upper-class hegemony. It also meant creating the image of a permanent enemy, the Muslims, and a gendered concept of communal identity, which meant a strong effort at controlling women by the imposition of a modernized patriarchy. M. S. Golwalkar, the second supreme leader of the RSS, in his book We, or Our Nationhood Defined (1939), welcomed the events of Kristallnacht and said that the Germans had proved that two nations cannot live in one country. During the violent days of Partition the Hindu communalist organizations made a bid for power, but the murder of Gandhi by a Hindu communalist led to strong government action, and to a decline of the organizations. However, the strategy of the RSS was already one of deeply penetrating civil society. So Golwalkar got the ban on the RSS rescinded by promising the government that it would remain a “cultural” organization and would not contest elections. To circumvent the restriction on politics, the RSS, with the help of like-minded Hindu communalists, set up the Bharatiya Jan Sangh (BJS, Indian People’s Association), a militant right-wing communalist party calling for an akhand bharat (indivisible India, implying the forcible incorporation of Kashmir, or even designs on Pakistan); an independent Indian nuclear arsenal; deep hostility to Muslims, Christians, and communists; a rejection of democracy; and espousal of economic liberalism. Between 1971 and 1984 attempts to form left-right combinations to fight the Congress rehabilitated the BJS. In 1977 it even became part of a coalition that defeated Congress (I) leader Indira Gandhi. There was a short-lived unification of the non-communist opposition into one party, the Janata [People’s] Party. RSS interference led to the eventual break up of the Janata Party, but in the process the BJS reemerged as the much strengthened Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP, Indian People’s Party). By the mid-1980s the RSS was ready for a more attacking role.

Ram Janmabhoomi Campaign

The opportunity for massive right-wing communal mobilizations came through a combination of events. The widespread popularity of the television serial Ramayana (the story of the mythical Ram, king of Ayodhya) enhanced popular fervor about Ram, widely worshipped in North India as an incarnation of the god Vishnu. At around this time, the Congress (I) government, led by Rajiv Gandhi, embarked on a strategy of balancing between communal concessions to various communities. After conceding to Muslim communalists over the Shah Bano case, where the right of Muslim women to access to a secular law on maintenance against desertion was sought to be nullified by the Muslim Women (Protection of Rights on Divorce) Act, 1986, it felt the need to turn to the Hindu right as well. So in November 1989 Gandhi’s government took the initiative in allowing the religious rites of laying the foundation stone of a Ram temple within the precincts of a Masjid set up by a general of Babar, the founder of the Mughal dynasty in India. Hindu communalists, aided by British colonialists, had claimed from the nineteenth century that it had been built by destroying a Ram temple, though no contemporary source mentions such a thing, and no post-1992 archaeological work confirmed the existence of a prior temple. But this was immediately turned into a weapon by the BJP-RSS.

In 1989 the Congress (I) was defeated and a coalition government led by Viswanath Pratap

Singh came to power, supported by communist parties as well as the BJP. Seeking to create a social base, Singh's project of focusing on a large mass of formally not untouchable but socially deprived classes undercut the RSS agenda of an upper-caste-dominated yet unified Hindu community. The Ram Mandir (temple) campaign went into overdrive. L. K. Advani, the BJP president, declared a ratha yatra (chariot tour – a Toyota dressed as one) systematically to mobilize extreme communalism. In the past, riots had been based on particular local grievances, real or imagined, as well as local socioeconomic interests. But Advani's tour of India sparked off one-sided riots in 43 towns and cities, based not on threats to particular groups of Hindus but supposedly to the core of Hindu identity, threatened as long as the Babri Masjid was not thrown down and a Ram temple constructed there. The sustained Ram Janmabhoomi campaigns of 1989–92 by the RSS and their more aggressive front organizations, like the Viswa Hindu Parishad (World Hindu Council), served to transform Hindu communalism in India into a single national and cohesive force. When Advani was eventually arrested to preserve communal harmony, the BJP brought down Singh's government by withdrawing support. Thereafter the weak Congress government at the center preferred to try to appease Hindu communalists. The Supreme Court of India, which played a confusing role, noted in its order on November 29, 1992 the warning of the lawyer O. P. Sharma that if a mob was allowed to gather in Ayodhya, all promises of peace would be rendered null and void. But the Apex Court, on the strength of the assurance of BJP MPs and the BJP-led UP state government, permitted a gathering of volunteers known as kar sevaks (voluntary labor for building the Ram temple). On December 6, 1992 the BJP government of UP remained passive while a huge frenzied mob systematically destroyed the mosque, with clear evidence of advance planning. Subsequently, regardless of changes in governments, a veritable township developed near the place, called Karsevakpuram (town of Kar Sevaks), where the parts of the proposed new temple were built. Thus, the destruction of the mosque, which represented Muslim rule over Hindus, even in independent India, and the construction of the temple were made a national campaign issue to integrate Hindus all over India.

Attacks on Islam and the implementation of a Hindu supremacist agenda were also attempted through a number of other ploys. Notable were the sudden championing of a Uniform Civil Code, the cause of the Kashmiri Pandits, and the integration of Kashmir into India as a whole through the abolition of Article 370 of the Constitution (granting Jammu and Kashmir some autonomy). This Article has been much abrogated and abused, while in turn it was a long retreat from the promise of a referendum to let the people of Kashmir decide on their future. RSS propaganda asserts that Muslims in India, like the Jews in Nazi propaganda, are unduly privileged. In post-Independence India, Muslims are grossly underrepresented at elite levels. The Uniform Civil Code as demanded by the BJP was simply a call for removal of Muslim Personal Laws. While the plight of Muslim women caused by the triple talaq (a husband can pronounce talaq thrice, to divorce his wife) is highlighted, and Muslim polygamy is denounced, this is done out of a desire to paint Muslims as privileged. At the same time, concerted propaganda is issued proclaiming that Muslim polygamy will lead to Muslims outnumbering Hindus in a short time. Actually, studies show that illegal Hindu polygamy is higher than legal Muslim polygamy.

Coalition and the Gujarat Pogrom

In 1998 the National Democratic Alliance, led by the BJP, won enough seats for it to form a minority government. It went to the polls in 1999, was returned with a bigger margin, and served a full five-year term. It opted for a strongly neoliberal economic policy, and in order to retain popular support, pursued jingoistic nationalism and extremist Hindutva mobilizations. These included the Pokharan nuclear weapons tests and the development of Hindutva-fascist politics wherever possible.

One province where the BJP was able to entrench itself firmly was Gujarat. There, through a molecular process of penetration into civil society, the RSS, the VHP, and other non-parliamentary arms of the fascists had entrenched themselves. From a traditionally upper- and middle-caste party, they became a party of dalits (former untouchables), and adivasis ("tribals"). Over the years Gujarat provided the largest number of Kar Sevaks for building the Ram temple. Socioeconomic factors also intervened.

While older industries like the Ahmedabad textile mills often shut down, leading to job insecurity, new industries such as the chemical industries provide no social security, not even minimum wages. These enabled the RSS cadres, providing certain forms of collective backing, through RSS-run schools and social welfare steps, to establish their hegemony. Using the educational institutions, a massive communalization was carried through. These advantages were then turned into a massive pogrom, as inside the NDA the BJP had been forced to accept a "secular" agenda. It could not openly talk about abrogation of Article 370 or the Uniform Civil Code. At key ministries like Home (Advani) and Human Resource Development (M. M. Joshi), a deep and sustained Hindutva drive did begin. However, misgovernance, as well as the economic implications of globalization, combined to produce dissatisfaction, causing the defeat of the BJP in four states as well as in the Delhi municipal elections. Reviving the fortunes of the Sangh family eventually came to be seen as more dependent on direct action by non-electoral, cadre-based wings of the combine.

Ostensibly, an attack by Muslims on a train-load of Kar Sevaks returning to Gujarat at Godhra station on February 27, 2002 sparked off violence. Subsequent investigations have questioned whether indeed outside attackers set fire to the compartment in question. In any case, this was followed by a series of actions calculated to create frenzy. Gujarati-language right-wing papers falsely reported that women had been abducted, raped inside madrasas (Muslim educational institutions), and then mutilated and killed. The bodies of the Godhra dead were brought to Ahmedabad and put on display. From the next day, several days of violence began.

These were not spontaneous reactions. Hundreds of thousands of leaflets were put out, showing preparation. Equally, preparation and state complicity were evident in how electoral lists and sales tax records were used to identify Muslim households, shops, and establishments. Muslim-majority areas were attacked by large mobs led by BJP leaders, as well as RSS-VHP forces. Narendra Modi, chief minister of Gujarat, who controlled the police force, stood by and remarked that it was a matter of Newton's Third Law, an action producing a reaction. At least 2,000 were killed. In a large number of cases they were set on fire. In one case a woman's womb was cut open and the fetus killed. In a number of cases women were gang raped. Property owned by Muslims was systematically targeted. The pogrom was followed by keeping many of the survivors in camps, with little government help. Attempts by secular activists to protect or to provide help were put under threat. Under such circumstances, Modi's return with a thumping majority after dissolving the state assembly showed the RSS that in its bid for power, fascist violence, pogroms, hate campaigns, and a radical-right economic agenda were essential ingredients. While the NDA lost at the center in 2004, Modi continued to be returned in Gujarat in 2007, and this legitimized overt fascist styles of politics to wider sections of the right-wing forces, including sizable parts of the Indian bourgeoisie, which is unable to liberalize as fast as it would like, due to resistance from the workers and peasants, the trade union movements, and the degenerated, but still existing mainstream left, as well as the radical left.

India, nationalism, extremist

The Emergence of Indian Nationalism

The emergence of nationalism among the middle classes in India in the late nineteenth century was not simply an imitation of western models.

Its roots may be traced back to the political legitimacy of the Mughal empire, cultural contacts between different regional groups, and an ethical tradition of good government. This traditional patriotism was reworked after the revolt of 1857, when direct rule by the British government replaced rule by the East India Company. An institutionalized public space was created for contestation with the colonial regime. Contrary to early middle-class belief in the positive value of British rule of law, colonialism brought, not a partnership of equals but exploitation, racial tension and inequality, and a threat to the Indian middle- and upper-classes' sense of culture and community. A result was the construction of an image of indigenous culture, a bid to purify it and "recover" a superior Indian civilization, capable of standing on a par with western civilization. This search for purity involved religious and social reform projects, the construction of new ideal types of womanhood and a modernization of patriarchy, and through all these, an eventual creation of the ideological basis of Indian nationalism.

One of the strands that entered into the making of Indian nationalism included the rationalist and democratic thought of the modern West, introduced through education. Concepts like citizenship, civil society, human rights, equality before the law, popular sovereignty, and social justice were used to construct a critique of the colonial state. A number of regional associations sprang up, such as the Indian Association. By 1875 there were around 400 newspapers in English and Indian languages, with the circulation of English-language papers rising from 90,000 in 1885 to 276,000 in 1905. By 1885, early nationalist aspirations had converged to create the Indian National Congress (Congress).

The early Congress was less a political party and more an annual conference organized by professional middle-class men with some landlord backing, which passed certain resolutions and put forward a set of fairly limited demands. Their ideological baggage included a good deal of western liberalism, along with a belief that British rule was fundamentally good. At the founding Congress, the speech by English ex-Civilian Allan Octavian Hume portraying the assembled people as "children of Queen Victoria" received sustained applause. In his Presidential Address at the Second Session of 1886 in Calcutta, Dadabhai Naoroji asked rhetorically whether the Congress was an organization for propagating sedition and organizing revolt, to which the hall erupted with cries of "no." For the first decade of its existence, the Congress seldom demanded any fundamental political reforms, and certainly no social reform demands concerning workers, peasants, and lower castes. Naoroji offered a specious argument, asserting that the Congress knew about no class other than its own, and so it could not discuss demands relating to those classes. Its demands included broadening Indian participation in the legislature by having 50 percent elected representation from local bodies, chambers of commerce, and universities; giving the legislature the right to discuss and vote on the budget, and to interpolate; and freedom of the press. The demand for Indianization of the civil services meant, in the immediate sense, the introduction of simultaneous civil service examinations in India and London, and raising the age limit for the test to 23 years. Demands were made for the curtailment of military expenditure and the introduction of volunteer service as well as the promotion of Indians to upper ranks. But ultra-loyalist proposals, such as forming a volunteer army to fight the British colonial wars, would have to be set against the Arms Act, which forbade Indians from possessing or receiving training in modern arms. From 1889 to 1903, every annual session of the Congress demanded the extension of the Permanent Settlement (which had created a class of landlords in full ownership of the land in Bengal) to the land revenue system of every province. But every session, from 1891 to 1903, also adopted various resolutions favoring industrial growth in India. Progressives such as Dwarkanath Ganguly were disgusted because they could not even get the issue of planter oppression over indentured tea garden laborers listed for discussion in the early years. Even when tea garden workers' conditions were taken up, the Indian-owned Bombay textile industry was omitted.

At the same time, these moderate, loyalist Congressmen made an economic critique of colonial rule that became the foundation of militant nationalism. Naoroji, R. C. Dutt, and M. G. Ranade were the architects of a "drain theory" that argued that colonial rule caused a constant outflow of resources from India to Britain and was the principal reason for poverty and famines in India. They also proposed the reduction of state expenditure on military activities, reduction of taxes, protectionism for Indian industry, reduction of revenue assessment, and encouragement of cottage industry and handicrafts.

The Rise of Extremism

The all-India organization created a sense of Indian-ness that had hitherto been absent. But British rejection of the nationalists' principal demands produced disillusionment with the principles and methods of the dominant leadership of the Congress. There was a strong call for more vigorous action and methods than those of meetings, petitions, memorials, and speeches in the Legislative Councils. Between 1896 and 1900, disastrous famines claimed over 9 million lives. The Indian Councils Act of 1892 was a complete disappointment. It retained the official majority, though conceding a few indirectly elected seats to Indians in the Imperial Legislative Council as well as the Provincial Councils. The councils were given the right to discuss annual budgets but not the right to vote on them. In 1898, a law was passed making it an offense to excite "feelings of disaffection" toward the government. In 1904, the Official Secrets Act was passed restricting the freedom of the press. In 1897, the Natu brothers were deported without trial, and the charges against them were not made public. In the same year, Bal Gangadhar Tilak and other newspaper editors were sentenced to long terms of imprisonment for rousing the people against the government.

In response to growing imperialist aggressiveness under Tory governments, a new leadership arose comprising men like Tilak, Bipin Chandra Pal, and Lajpat Rai. Speaking a different language, they were critical of the "politics of mendicancy" and were soon to question British rule itself. This was the second strand in the making of Indian nationalism. Political extremism was not simply a reaction to the failure of moderate politics. Broadly speaking, it was an attempt to define the Indian nation in terms of Hindu religious symbols, myths, and a version of history that saw the struggles of Hindus as central, and which therefore tended to cast Muslims as outsiders. Instead of attempting to bring Hindu society into conformity with the rationalist ideas of the West, this current contested the western critiques of Hindu civilization. In Bengal, it was represented by the Ramakrishna-Vivekananda movement. Ramakrishna Paramhansa, a priest in the Dakshineswar temple near Calcutta, was not so much an opponent of western rationalism as totally outside the world created by it. But his teachings, without entering into disputes with colonial rule, rejected the values imposed by it. Ramakrishna himself was a religious eclectic, not a revivalist. But his catholicity was projected by his disciple Vivekananda as the essence of Hinduism's superiority. Vivekananda condemned previous reform movements as elitist, stressing that the best way to serve God was to serve the poor. His emphasis on the superiority of Hinduism, his faith in the glory of Hindu civilization, and his belief in its recent degeneration made it possible for revivalists to appropriate him. His rhetoric combined sudden appeals to near-socialistic ideas (such as the claim that the shudra [lowest caste] would gain supremacy in every society, and talk of socialists and anarchists as the vanguard of a coming social revolution), along with a near-total lack of clarity about concrete socioeconomic programs, and even political objectives. His declaration that he hated politics probably referred to the moderate Congress politics. His combination of a cult of manly virtues, unspecified populism, and evocation of Hindu glory provided the starting point for Bengali extremism and the politics of revolutionary armed struggle.

The first major revivalist political offensive came in 1884–91, when Behramji Malabari's sustained campaign led to the passage of the Age of Consent Act of 1891. A strong Hindu nationalist storm was raised in opposition. While some nationalists, like Tilak, would fight other battles, there were many who showed strong loyalism during actual political struggles. The issue was a relatively minor one – increasing the age of marriage from 10 to 12. The matter became serious after the Phulmoni case, when a young girl was forced to have intercourse by her much older husband. Hindu nationalism argued that the woman's body was a crucial site for the preservation of the community, and therefore it was better for some women to die than for the community to be weakened. Tilak's "nationalist" argument lay in his assertion that foreign rulers had no right to interfere with religious and social customs – a specious argument, since Hindu orthodox groups were more than happy to campaign for a law to ban the slaughter of cows, thereby interfering with Muslims' right to observe their social and religious customs. In Bengal, the movement against raising the age of consent was spearheaded by the Bangabasi, which had a circulation of 20,000.

In Maharashtra, revivalism was based on Pune, and was narrowly Brahmanical. Tilak's alliance with the declining Brahmanical forces in the 1890s was a (dangerous) political use of existing material. Personally, Tilak was hardly obscurantist. But he allied himself with the traditional literati who saw their stipends drying up under British rule, and made much of Maratha glory. Tilak organized Ganapati utsav (Festival of the God Ganesha), and in 1895 refused to allow M. G. Ranade's reform-oriented National Social Conference to meet at the Congress session in Pune.

In North India much headway was made by the Arya Samaj of Swami Dayanand Saraswati. It combined a sharp critique of many Hindu practices (idolatry, polytheism, child marriage, the taboo on widow remarriage and foreign travel, a caste system based on birth, and so on) with an aggressive assertion of the superiority of Hinduism over other religions. As a result, the specific goals of social reformers were absorbed into a Hindu supremacist agenda. In Punjab the Arya Samaj struck deep roots, its membership rising to 40,000 in 1891 and eventually to half a million by 1921. The Samaj also became quite aggressively anti-Muslim. At the same time, some of the Samajists, like Lala Lajpat Rai, were involved in Congress politics.

The rise of "extremism" began with a twofold critique of the moderate Congress. It was criticized for its "mendicant" technique of appealing to British public opinion, and also for being a movement of an English-educated elite alien to the common people. There were three elements in extremist politics – self-development through constructive work; political extremism proper, attempting mass mobilization for swaraj (independence) through techniques of passive resistance; and revolutionary nationalism or "terrorism."

In 1893–4, Aurobindo Ghosh wrote a series of articles entitled "New Lamps for Old," to denounce the policy of seeking slow constitutional progress. Upholding the model of the French Revolution, he said that the vital need was to establish a link between the middle class and the proletariat. However, by this last term he seems to have meant little more than the common people, and his attempted strategy was a revivalist Hinduism. By the end of the century, he was trying to organize secret societies.

In Bengal, Aswini Kumar Dutt of Barishal, the poet Rabindranath Tagore, and Vivekananda's disciple, Sister Nivedita (an Irishwoman), all contributed to the development of extremism. The Bengali bhadralok, a cultural identity combining landed interests with urban petty bourgeois development, were also turning to swadeshi (indigenous) enterprise, a fairly large effort.

But the real trailblazer for extremism was Tilak. His development of the Shivaji cult as a patriotic-historical symbol (the fight of the Maratha hero Shivaji against the Mughals, and his espousal of a Hindu-tinged identity, projected him as a freedom fighter), and his experimentation with a kind of no-revenue campaign in 1896–7, were pioneering efforts. The British reacted strongly to even these early manifestations of extremism. The main reason for Tilak's conviction for sedition and a two-year jail term was his justification in his paper Kesari of the assassination of the Bijapur general Afzal Khan by Shivaji.

Bengal Partition

Extremism developed into a major current with the plan for Bengal partition. The underlying aim of the proposed partition was to weaken extremist politics (strong in Bengal) as well as the Bengalis by pitting Muslims against Hindus. Even when no overt anti-Muslim move was contemplated, the politics of the bhadralok effectively excluded Muslims, defining society, reform, and regeneration in diverse Hindu terms. Nonetheless, the British effort was openly communitarian and Bengal did not submissively accept this imperialist game. A mass anti-partition movement was initiated on August 7, 1905. An invitation appeared in the paper Sanjibani for the boycott of all foreign products and the use of only swadeshi products. Formal partition occurred on October 16, 1905. Many Muslims as well as Hindus observed it as a day of mourning. The hartal or general strike, including closure of shops and markets as well as business, was observed in towns and many villages. A day of abstinence from cooking was practiced in many homes, an action mainly involving women. Thousands of people participated barefoot in mourning processions.

The tide of swadeshi spread from Calcutta to various district headquarters. At the Varanasi session of the Congress, the moderate Gokhale in his Presidential Address called the Bengal partition one of the “meanest acts” of British rule in India. The moderate Surendranath Banerjea responded to Viceroy Lord Curzon’s utterance that the Bengal partition was a “settled fact” with the remark that he would “unsettle the settled fact.” But soon the limitations of moderate politics became evident. When students wanted to boycott educational institutions and a call was made for the formation of a national college, people like Banerjea drew back. Faced with an out-and-out imperialist ruler like Curzon, the moderate political agenda had no hope of success. So leadership of the movement passed to extremists. Indeed, it was at this stage that the two camps started using these terms to describe their opponents.

As the youngest layer of the intelligentsia, students tended to be more radical. There was also a material basis for their grievances, as jobs seemed to be drying up, but they initially rallied round the slogan of a national education, which would have led to even fewer jobs, since many employers were unlikely to accept degrees from such an institution. The first ever proper student organization, the Anti-Circular Society, was formed in protest against the Carlyle Circular, forbidding students from taking part in politics. This society organized boycotts of foreign textiles in shops and sales of Indian-made cloth by hawkers to people at home. Popular songs of the period glorified swadeshi goods. The tides of boycott and swadeshi flowed through Bengal, Maharashtra, and Punjab. People held festivals and burned British cloth. Women’s political involvement began to grow from this time, and attempts were made to get them to donate to the swadeshi cause. When Bhupendranath Dutta, the revolutionary younger brother of Swami Vivekananda, was arrested, a “Ladies’ Meeting” was held in his honor, with 200 women signing the address. Individual women who stood out include Sister Nivedita and Sarala Debi Chaudhurani, who sought to create a nationalist warrior-hero and urged Bengali youth to fight against British rule.

Indigenous manufactures were also enthusiastically promoted. The well-known chemist Prafulla Chandra Roy set up the successful Bengal Chemical Works. Many more textile, match, and soap factories were established. Jamshedji Tata’s steel factory was based on swadeshi subscriptions, while banks and insurance companies grew up through swadeshi enterprise. In Delhi, the driving force behind the swadeshi cause was Saiyad Hyder Reza.

On March 11, 1906, a National Council of Education (NCE) was founded in Calcutta. A number of national schools were affiliated to the council, and students who had boycotted the examinations of Calcutta University were allowed to appear at two special examinations. The NCE also set up a school and a college of its own in Calcutta, with Aurobindo Ghose as its principal. Probably due to pressure by more orthodox Hindus, a number of reformist Brahmans were kept out. The college stressed teaching in culture and the liberal arts, with an all-India outlook. An alternative route was taken by Tarak Nath Palit, Nil Ratan Sarkar, Bhupendranath Bose, and others, who set up the Bengal Technical Institute. In 1910, the two institutions merged to create the College of Engineering and Technology, eventually becoming Jadavpur University in independent India.

The ascendancy of moderates, especially after Aurobindo’s departure for armed struggle, meant the failure to establish counterhegemony through national education. Moreover, the lack of a firmly secular basis, as well as the inability to innovate, turned the NCE toward increasingly mainstream academic concerns delinked from mass-based nationalism. Rabindranath Tagore’s alternative vision stressed constructive swadeshi, involving the mass of people and the use of mother languages for education. The NCE and the swadeshi movement failed to mobilize mass struggles, while at the same time, in a concession to extremists, its rhetoric was replete with invocations to Hinduism, making it difficult to integrate Muslims and lower castes.

Boycott achieved initial success. In September 1906, the Calcutta Collector of Customs noted a 22 percent fall in the quantity of imported cotton piece-goods, 44 percent in cotton twist and yarn, 11 percent in salt, 55 percent in cigarettes, and 68 percent in boots and shoes for August compared to August 1905. The sharpest demand came in items consumed mainly by the middle class, like cigarettes and shoes.

The swadeshi mood did bring about a significant revival in handloom, silk-weaving, and some other traditional artisan crafts. There were other successful ventures too, such as the Calcutta Pottery Works, but lack of capital became a crucial factor, with the Marwari compradors (investors from the northwest of India) as yet showing no interest in investment.

A major achievement of the swadeshi age was the emergence of samitis (associations). In a 1907 police report, there were an estimated 8,485 volunteers from all the samitis in East Bengal. Up to 1908, most of these bodies were engaged in a variety of activities, including physical and moral training, social work during famines, epidemics or religious festivals, preaching the swadeshi message, and implementing the techniques of passive resistance. Five major samitis were banned in January 1909: Swadesh Bandhav, Brati, Dacca Anushilan, Suhrid, and Sadhana. The Anti-Circular Society stood apart for its secularism, counting among its associates important Muslims like Liaquat Hussain, Dedar Bux, and Abdul Gafur.

Outside Bengal, extremists were active in Punjab, Madras, and above all in Bombay. By 1907, the Kesari had a circulation of 20,000, and there was a revival of the religious and political festivals pioneered by Tilak. But Bombay's industrialists were lukewarm about swadeshi, even though swadeshi enthusiasm definitely helped them stave off a major slump in 1906–7.

Two major new initiatives were associated with extremist activity in Maharashtra in 1907–8. One was the mass picketing of liquor shops, and the other was an effort to develop contacts with the working class – easier in Bombay, where workers were Marathi-speaking, like the middle class, whereas in Bengal most workers were non-Bengalis. Tilak's arrest and trial in July 1908 generated massive proletarian anger. On the day of Tilak's conviction, July 22, 1908, the cloth shop employees of the Mulji Jetha Market called for a six-day hartal (one day for each year of Tilak's sentence). At the height of the strike, 76 out of 85 textile mills, as well as the railway workshop at Parel, were involved.

From 1905 to 1907, the struggle over tendencies was fought out within the Congress. In 1906, a split was averted by making Dadabhai Naoroji president. But differences surfaced constantly. In 1905, while partition was condemned, methods for combatting it remained vague, and the coming visit of the Prince of Wales was welcomed against opposition in the Subjects Committee from Tilak, Lajpat Rai, and Motilal

Ghosh. In 1906 an attempt to extend the resolution on boycott beyond Bengal was repudiated. At the 1907 Surat Congress, both sides came prepared for a fight. The moderates, after forcing a split, made it definitive by adopting a constitution stating that Congress methods were strictly constitutional and limited to bringing about reform of the existing system of administration. However, the Morley-Minto Reforms of 1909 dashed moderate hopes that Liberals, back in power, would be generous. The policies of Secretary of State Morley and Viceroy Minto were characterized by outright repression of radicals, a policy of divide and rule, and petty concessions to the moderates. The new Indian Councils Act allowed some increased influence in budget discussion, including putting questions and sponsoring resolutions to members of Legislative Councils, and for the first time formally introduced the principle of elections. Details of seat allocation and electoral qualifications were to be made by regulations in India, leaving ample scope for whittling down reforms. A number of seats were reserved for Muslims, beginning a trend of separate electorates and constituencies. However, it was not the Muslim community as such that benefited, but a handful of upper-class Muslims. The moderates at the Madras Congress of 1908 welcomed the proposals. Yet by 1909, even some of them became skeptical and attendance at Congress sessions fell off.

The Bengal partition was revoked in 1911, but the capital of India shifted to Delhi in a bid for Muslim support for the rulers. However, extremists, moderates, and Muslim nationalists came together, especially with the beginning of World War I, when the Lucknow Pact (1916) saw a united stand for further constitutional reforms including separate electorates and the distribution of seats being presented by a reunited Congress and a nationalist-oriented Muslim League. The only element of extremism still in existence was an attempt at building mass movements through Home Rule Leagues. Two were set up, by Tilak and Annie Besant. Activities consisted of organizing discussion groups, mass sale of pamphlets, and lecture tours. The Besant League was also responsible for making inroads into areas where extremism had not been present, such as smaller towns in Madras, among urban professionals in Uttar Pradesh, and among new groups in Sind and Gujarat. Many of the young men roused to action by the Home Rule movement would be important in the 1920s, including Jawaharlal Nehru in Allahabad.

India, non-violent non-cooperation movement, 1918–1929

Kunal Chattopadhyay

Following World War I, British rulers attempted to introduce limited reforms in India through the Montague-Chelmsford Report of 1918 and the Government of India Act of 1919. The aim of these measures was to co-opt nationalist opposition. The 1919 Act established a “dyarchy” with at its center a bicameral system with elected majorities and a viceregal veto as well as a “certificate” procedure for pushing rejected bills. Departments with limited funding and political support (education, health, agriculture, local bodies) were transferred to ministers responsible to provincial legislatures. Provincial governors too had the veto, while finance and law and order remained under the control of the bureaucracy. The electorates were enlarged to 1.5 million for the imperial legislature and 5.5 million for the provinces, with provisions for community-based representation and reservations.

From World War I, rising military expenditure, runaway inflation, and forced recruitment caused a massive drain on all classes in India, but capitalists and peasants were most affected, a key factor in the phenomenal rise of Gandhi. Grain and raw materials financed a 300 percent increase in defense spending as much of the Indian population starved. Peasants, who supplied the bulk of recruits, could not be pushed further, so customs and income tax were expanded. Overall inflation doubled from 1913 to 1920, but export prices of Indian agricultural goods increased in the same proportion as domestic and imported industrial goods. The standard of living among peasants declined with the expansion of commercial agriculture, leading to a rise in the cost of basic grains.

But war also meant fabulous profits for some sectors of the capitalist class, leading to the foundation and expansion of industrial wealth and a transformation from a colonial comprador to industrial capitalism. A rising group of Calcutta-based businessmen of the Marwari community began Indian-owned jute mills, while in the western cities of Bombay and Ahmedabad Indian textile mill production surpassed Lancashire imports.

But the British capped the growth of Indian manufacturing through reducing the value of the pound sterling against the Indian rupee, thus reducing exports. Indian businesses, in turn, demanded greater state intervention without disturbing property rights, while big industrialists, dependent on the state and patronage, called on the state to firmly suppress working-class movements.

Between 1911 and 1921, strikes expanded considerably in industries and plantations organized by unions, culminating in the formation of the All-India Trade Union Congress at Bombay in November 1920. Its militant leadership included future communists like Sripad Amrit Dange. Gandhi carefully avoided any involvement, and was especially opposed to the political general strike, however peaceful, as an instrument of opposition of the industrial working class.

In the wake of the Russian Revolution of 1917, there was much working-class unrest which was not merely the outcome of economic grievances but was part of a worldwide upsurge of anti-capitalism and anti-imperialism among the oppressed as well as Indian soldiers returning from distant lands. The immediate British panic was excessive, and there was fear that revolutionary nationalists might consider Russia a substitute for the defeated Germany as a supplier of arms. While details of the Russian Revolution were difficult to understand, concern was spreading among capitalists about a world turned upside down.

The Rise of Gandhi

Gandhi returned to India from South Africa during World War I. While in South Africa, he had developed a method of protest he called satyagraha, a form of non-violent resistance that involved accepting any resulting punishment. What was not negotiable in his strategy was ahimsa (non-violence), a method combining the more radical goal of the extremists with the moderate desire for peaceful agitation, binding the mass movements closely to a leader whose social ideas, especially support for property rights, were impeccable.

At the same time, Gandhi's critique of western modernity, especially as applied to India, struck a chord in the hearts of peasants, artisans, and small-town intelligentsia. Gandhi argued that mere political swaraj (self-rule) would mean British rule without the British. A small peasant utopia was starkly outlined in his Hind Swaraj (1909), which contended that railways spread plague and produced famines by exporting food grain, and western medicine was costly and ruined natural health measures. All this, he averred, had to go, and the upper classes had to live the life of a peasant. Taken literally, this was an obscurantist and reactionary utopia. But aspects of his ideas appealed to many groups of people. In addition, Gandhi's chosen style – wearing a loincloth from 1921, speaking in simple Hindustani, traveling third class in trains, using the imagery of Tulsidas's Ramayana, deep rooted in the popular religion of Hindus in the Hindi belt of north India – gave him further accessibility to peasants, making him the greatest mass leader India has ever produced.

During the three years after his return from South Africa in 1915, Gandhi gained the reputation of a man who would combat local wrongs by taking up three satyagrahas. Agitation at Champaran (indigo planters), Kheda (peasants), and Ahmedabad (textile workers) introduced a new style of resistance, quite different from the established top-down strategy of fighting over relatively abstract all-India issues. In each case there was pressure from below, as well as the first indications of a restraining hand.

Rowlatt Agitation and Non-Cooperation

In early 1919 the Rowlatt Act was pushed through the Imperial Legislative Council to make wartime restrictions on civil liberties permanent. While Indian political opinion opposed the Act, Gandhi promoted mass protest while remaining on the terrain of elite control. The initial plan was modest – volunteers would court arrest by the public sale of prohibited texts. Subsequently, Gandhi extended the protest to include the novel and radical idea of an all-Indian hartal (mass work stoppage), although proceeding with extreme caution. The day chosen was a Sunday, and those working could participate only with their employer's consent. Gandhi explained this position as the only means of avoiding more militant struggles.

The organizational vehicles for the struggles were the Home Rule Leagues, pan-Islamist groups with which Gandhi had developed good relations, and the newly formed Satyagraha Sabha (Association). In the Punjab, the government of Lieutenant-Governor O'Dwyer was already very unpopular because of ruthless exactions and recruitment during World War I, and repression in the wake of revolutionary developments. In a province noted for its communal divisions, extraordinary unity was achieved. Two local Amritsar leaders, Dr. Satyapal and Saifuddin Kitchlu, were deported and Gandhi was prevented from entering Delhi and Punjab. On April 11, 1919, martial law was declared in Punjab, and two days later troops opened fire without warning on an unarmed gathering in the enclosed ground of Jallianwallabagh. Government officials estimated 379 dead, while Indians claimed a significantly higher death toll. Indiscriminate arrests followed, as well as public flogging, special tribunals, and mass humiliation such as making people crawl on a road where a white woman had allegedly been insulted. Gujranwala district was subjected to aerial bombing. This unprecedented violence seems to have frightened most politicians, including Gandhi. It was left to Rabindranath Tagore to express the country's agony and anger in a famous letter renouncing his knighthood. At the sight of such widespread aggression, Gandhi confessed that he had made a "Himalayan blunder" and called off the satyagraha. This taught him the lesson that movements were not to be launched without strong organizational structures.

A number of issues were then woven together to form a bigger movement. With rumors about a harsh peace treaty to be imposed on Turkey, the Khilafat movement, which supported the Turkish sultan who was also the Khalifa (titular head of Islamic Sunni states), had gained ground. The movement developed both a moderate and a radical current. The Central Khilafat Committee, organized by Bombay merchants like Chotani, wanted to limit agitation to meetings, memorials, and deputations. The radicals, led by Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali, had the support of lower-middle-class journalists and ulama (experts in Islamic jurisprudence) who had considerable influence over small towns and villages. The Khilafat was a symbol used to create a pan-Indian identity for Muslims. Gandhi made himself indispensable to both groups and acted as their link with Hindu politicians. The Khilafat leaders were extremely eager for Hindu-Muslim unity, since that was essential for any kind of successful boycott, especially of services or councils.

The punitive Treaty of Sèvres against Turkey was followed on May 28, 1920 by the Hunter Commission Majority Report on Punjab, which whitewashed O'Dwyer. The House of Lords had rejected censure of his actions, while the Morning Post had raised a sum of £26,000 for the mass murderer of Jallianwallabagh. Public anger mounted in India. In June, the radical Khilafatists' call for non-cooperation was backed by Gandhi, who began pressing the Indian National Congress to adopt a similar program. He called for a campaign around three axes: the Khilafat demand, the "Punjab wrong," and a vague call for swaraj. Younger Congress activists, like Jawaharlal Nehru, were enthusiastic, but older leaders were wary of mass movements, preferring to plan for election campaigns under the new constitution. Between September and December 1920 a dramatic conversion of the leaders took place, in particular C. R. Das, who had mobilized a large delegation at Nagpur in December and even paid the train fares of many delegates. He eventually moved the central resolution accepting the implementation of the non-cooperation program at a time that would be suitable for the All-India Congress Committee (AICC). The goal of the Congress was redefined to read "the attainment of swaraj by all legitimate and peaceful means," although swaraj was still left undefined. The Congress organization was transformed into a mass party with committees all the way to the village. Membership dues were lowered to four annas (one quarter of a rupee). At the top, a 15-member Congress Working Committee was created to become, until independence, the real leadership of the organization. Support for Gandhi came from the hitherto "backward" provinces.

The Rise and Fall of the Movement

The non-cooperation movement began in January 1921. From January to March, the focus was on students and lawyers boycotting institutions. This movement of the intelligentsia soon showed signs of flagging, resulting in a decision to enroll ten million Congress members and raise a fund of ten million rupees. But mounting popular pressure led to a more militant stance in July, when the AICC called for an embargo on foreign clothing and a boycott of the Prince of Wales' forthcoming visit in November. Everywhere in India, the prince's visit was marked by black flag demonstrations. Between November 1921 and February 1922, the government had reached a virtual crisis point. Viceroy Reading sent a secret telegram to Montague suggesting a Round Table Conference and an early revision of the newly implemented reform scheme. But Gandhi refused to compromise. He decided to begin a no-revenue campaign at Bardoli to protest infringed liberties of speech, press, and association, beginning in the second week of February. But when on February 5, 22 policemen were burned alive by angry peasants at Chauri Chaura in Gorakhpur district of the United Provinces (UP), Gandhi unilaterally called off the movement, alienating the Khilafatists.

Despite attempts to reduce the movement to a narrowly anti-British line, to the exclusion of social dimensions, peasant militants managed to retain their autonomy. In UP, Bihar, Andhra, Gujarat, and Midnapore in Bengal, peasants showed considerable initiative. Tribal populations also revealed a developing political consciousness, as in the movement of Alluri Sitaram Raju. Peasants used the image of Gandhi they themselves had constructed, even though Gandhi repudiated their militancy. The bourgeois nationalism of Congress was contested from within the movement. The Congress resolution confirming the withdrawal of non-cooperation emphasized that withholding rent payments was contrary to Congress intentions and reassured zamindars (landlords) that Congress did not intend to attack their legal rights. In other words, the nationalist leadership was willing to betray the peasants for an alliance with “patriotic” landlords.

Such assurances were necessary because of the militant peasant struggles before and during the period of operation of the non-cooperation movement. A no-tax movement had been planned for Bardoli, a raiyatwari area (where the state itself stood as the rent receiver). In the deeply feudal princely states of Rajasthan, important agrarian struggles had developed and achieved partial victories between 1920 and 1922. These included agitation against free labor service and access to the Udaipur Maharana (king) in May 1921, and other struggles in Mewar, Alwar, and other states. In the Andhra delta region, there was broad peasant support for non-cooperation. There were mass resignations of village officers and a refusal to pay taxes, resulting in the reduction of tax collection from 1,473 million rupees to 0.4 million, until Gandhi pressurized the Andhra Congress to call off the campaign. Most violent was the anti-British, anti-landlord Moplah rebellion, in which over 1,000 Moplahs (communities located in Malabar, the northern part of present-day Kerala) were killed, and where peasant struggles at times crossed over into religious sectarianism, with forced conversions of some Hindus. In UP, where there had already been a powerful peasant movement before the non-cooperation agitation, peasants interpreted Gandhi in their own way, attacking talugdari property in 1921–2 (talugdars were traditional landlords of Awadh, protected after 1857 by the British). Gandhi criticized the peasants for their violence, but this did not deter them. Congress eventually decided to abandon the movement. Baba Ramchandra, the local peasant leader, was arrested and the movement suppressed without protest from Congress. The Gandhi imagined by the peasants was endowed with extraordinary powers. Chanting his name, peasants became involved in activities that crossed all boundaries set by Gandhi. Tribal peoples of Bengal believed that if they wore a Gandhi cap or chanted his name, police bullets would not harm them. Generally, therefore, peasant acceptance of Gandhi was a highly complex phenomenon, and peasant aspirations were firmly voiced. Thus Chauri Chaura was not, for Gandhi, an isolated example. This also shows why, despite the original harsh sentences (172 of the 225 accused were initially sentenced to death, and 19 were eventually hanged), neither Gandhi nor any other leaders condemned them. Gandhi’s self-justification stood on two planks, both of which were revealing. On one hand he passionately reiterated his faith in non-violence. But he also asked his critics what would have happened if the British government had abdicated. He warned that nobody would be able to control unruly elements. Calling off the non-cooperation movement, no less than its initiation, showed that Gandhian movements were firmly committed to preserving existing social structures of domination, notwithstanding Gandhi’s projection of a peasant utopia.

Once the movement was called off, the British government, emboldened by this retreat, arrested Gandhi and sentenced him to a fairly severe prison term. The lack of significant protest against the sentence showed that the movement had weakened. Moreover, by unilaterally calling off the movement, Gandhi had alienated many Muslim leaders, a fact that had momentous consequences later on.

India, post-World War II upsurge

Kunal Chattopadhyay

At World War II's end, the British faced a political dilemma in India. During the Quit India struggles of 1942, only the wartime special powers had enabled the British to suppress the movement. The Congress leftists were clamoring for a resumption of militant struggles. British troops were war-weary and wanted no part in smashing popular upsurges in India. Indian army units used to help the Dutch and French recover their lost colonies in Indonesia and Vietnam were unhappy. Viceroy Wavell was apprehensive, but the Supreme Allied Commander, Lord Mountbatten, overruled him. Meanwhile, postwar problems of unemployment and high prices, exacerbated by a partial crop failure and other local factors, resulted in a ration cut by February 1946 to 1,200 calories per head, compared with wartime London's 2,800 calories (in 1943). Eventually, upsurges occurred in cities, among workers, radical youth, soldiers, and peasants, creating the potential for a mass revolution. While the British imperialists were under pressure to withdraw, nationalists pushed the country toward a compromise of freedom with partition and a conservative government.

The INA Trials and the Urban Upsurge

During the war, Subhas Chandra Bose had formed an army named the Azad Hind Fauz (Indian National Army, INA) out of volunteers and prisoners of war in Singapore. Bose died in a plane crash shortly after the surrender of Japan while en route to Soviet forces. The INA surrendered, and some 20,000 INA soldiers were interrogated and transported back to India. In a number of little publicized trials, soldiers were condemned and at least nine were hanged. To denigrate the INA, a show trial was arranged for Captain Shah Nawaz, Captain Prem Sehgal, and Lieutenant Gurbux Singh Dhillon, who were accused of treason, murder, and incitement to murder and of being "war criminals." With the lifting of wartime censorship, however, the deeds of the INA were reported and made them appear as selfless patriots.

The Indian National Congress, which had ejected Bose in 1939–40, found the INA and Bose's death useful propaganda material, even though they were moving in practice to abandon mass struggles. The All-India Congress Committee (AICC) meeting in September 1945 decided to defend the accused as "misguided patriots." Among others, Jawaharlal Nehru put on the barrister's gown. When the trial of the three officers began on November 5, 1945, popular anger boiled over.

The accused, from three different backgrounds, revealed the INA's secular nature, engendering unity across communities. An INA week was observed between November 5 and 11, and the movement extended to remote localities, from Assam to Baluchistan. In Bengal, where Bose and the INA's popularity surpassed Gandhi's, a mass upsurge broke all bounds. On November 21, the Bengal Provincial Students' Federation (BPSF–Mirzapur Street), led by the Congress left and non-Communist Party of India (CPI) Marxists, called a central rally. Even the pro-CPI BPSF, which had previously called Bose a Quisling, participated in demonstrations. Tens of thousands of protesters poured into Wellington Square in Calcutta, and after several speeches set out to march to Government House. When they were blocked by police, a discussion over tactics broke out as Congress leader Sarat Chandra Bose, brother of Subhas, sent a letter advising the students to go back. Students from the Forward Bloc (FB, the party founded by Subhas) and Trotskyists condemned this attempted sabotage. Rameswar Banerjee, a student supporter of the Revolutionary Socialist Party (RSP), and a young worker, Abdus Salam, were killed by police fire while trying to break through the armed cordon. Barricade fighting broke out and a handful of nationalist student leaders went home, but students supporting the Revolutionary Communist Party (RCPI), the RSP, the FB, and the Bolshevik Leninist Party (BLPI), as well as the CPI, stayed on, as did two women leaders – the nationalist Jyotirmoyee Ganguly, who was killed by police fire, and the Trotskyist Bimalprotiva Devi. The previously hesitant CPI leadership called a general strike.

November 22 saw a massive general strike, joined by the transport workers of Calcutta and the entire industrial belt around the city. By afternoon, the crowd had swelled to between 50,000 and 100,000. Sarat Chandra Bose's press statement called the entire movement a "communist conspiracy." Congress leader Sardar Patel remarked that goonda (hooligan) elements had become dominant. Viceroy Wavell commented privately that the Congress leaders wanted to reduce political tensions because of capitalist apprehension about the security of property. Compared to the Congress, the CPI seemed radical. However, it was against independent revolutionary struggles under working-class hegemony. At that point, only the CPI of all the left parties had the requisite strength among the working class to put forward such a call as realistic, not simply rhetorical. As the agitations entered their third day, the CPI instead called for Congress–Muslim League unity in the struggle. Similar militant confrontations developed in Bombay, Karachi, Patna, Allahabad, Banaras, Rawalpindi, and other places. Though the INA officers were found guilty, in the face of this unprecedented upsurge, the government set them free on January 3, 1946.

In mid-January, the report of an unofficial inquiry into British atrocities in Orissa in August 1942 described, with slight exaggeration, the Koraput jail as Orissa's Belsen. On January 23, 1946, Bombay decided to observe Subhas Chandra Bose's birthday. Police fired on a huge demonstration demanding the release of the INA prisoners, killing ten demonstrators. On January 24, Bombay observed a complete hartal (shutdown).

On February 11, 1946, the All-Bengal Muslim Students' League (MSL) condemned the sentence of the INA officer Captain Rashid Ali in another trial (February 4, 1946). Other student associations supported the MSL. Colleges were totally shut down, and by the evening the transport workers' unions had decided on a strike. Calcutta and its industrial suburbs exploded on February 12. Over a million factory workers walked out, in an area stretching over 100 kilometers from north to south. As a half-million-strong demonstration paraded the streets of Calcutta, Governor Casey gave orders to the army to shoot at sight. Machine gun-wielding soldiers on cars patrolled and reconquered the main roads, but the side streets and lanes were held by the protesters. Unofficial estimates put the number killed by bullets at over 200. Almost every town and market center of Bengal expressed solidarity with the Calcutta uprising. But once more Congress condemned the struggles, while the CPI, after initially calling for and joining the strikes, went into pacification mode.

Naval Rising

Within days of the Rashid Ali uprising, India's other great industrial city, Bombay, saw an even more dramatic struggle. Protesting racism, poor rations, and the trial of the INA soldiers, ratings of the Royal Indian Navy (RIN) planned for a mutiny. The revolt started on February 18, 1946 at the RIN shore signal school, HMIS Talwar. After confronting their officers, the leaders of the protest seized the communications room and broadcast news of the revolt to every ship and shore base. A large number of petty officers as well as a few ranking officers joined the rebels and a Central Strike Committee was formed under M. S. Khan. The next morning the mutineers seized military vehicles and drove round Bombay, shouting slogans in support of the INA prisoners. Demands also included the withdrawal of Indian troops from Indonesia. Fighting also erupted at Castle Barracks when ratings tried to break out of encirclement, with ships providing artillery support, and crowds started fraternizing with the sailors. By February 22, the strike had spread to naval bases all over the country as well as to some ships at sea: 78 ships were involved, as well as 20 shore establishments and over 20,000 ratings. Solidarity actions occurred in Karachi, Madras, Trichinopoly, and Madurai.

The Bombay Trotskyists were the first to issue a leaflet calling for a general strike. A little later, but with greater organizational force, the CPI issued a similar call; 70 of Bombay's 74 textile mills were shut down. Once more the CPI called for a demonstration to campaign for Congress, League, and communist unity. Nonetheless, on February 22, some 300,000 workers downed tools. In the working-class districts of Bombay, like Parel and Delisle Road, fighting continued for two days. Two army battalions had to be pressed into service, 228 civilians were killed, and over 1,000 were injured before the rule of law could be restored. One CPI woman leader, Kamal Dhonde, was among those killed.

The bourgeois leadership was forthright in its condemnation of the revolt. Sardar Patel, while negotiating surrender on February 23 with the assurance that there would be no victimization, was simultaneously telling Andhra Congress leader Viswanathan that discipline had to be maintained. Gandhi condemned the ratings and called Hindu-Muslim unity on the barricades unholy. A panicky imperialism announced that a Cabinet Mission would be sent to finalize the transfer of power. But independent India did not accord the RIN ratings the status of freedom fighters.

The postwar upsurge did not die down immediately. The first ever all-India general strike of the working class took place on July 29, 1946, with 12 million total labor days lost. Only in Madras province, where the BLPI had a significant presence in the factories, was the situation different. The provincial government feared that the Trotskyists were planning to foment a general strike throughout the province. Trotskyist leader Anthony Pillai, who was elected president of the Madras Labor Union and president of the Madras and Southern Mahratta Railway Workers' Union, Perambur branch, was arrested on March 10, 1947 by the police under the orders of the Congress ministry. His arrest provoked a general strike in Madras on March 31, continuing for 100 days and was supported by the CPI.

Rural Upsurge

One of the biggest agrarian struggles in postwar India was the tebhaga movement in rural Bengal supported by a large class of sharecroppers, who were massively exploited by a landowning class named jotedars. Sharecroppers were formally obliged to hand over half their produce, but with extra deductions the amount came to much more, leaving them destitute and dependent on loans from jotedars. During World War II, imperialist military-economic policy resulted in a massive famine, causing the deaths of between one and a half million (official estimate) and five million (highest unofficial estimate), with 600,000 tenants losing their holdings in 1943.

Accumulated peasant anger was unleashed in the elections of 1946, when the CPI's candidate, Rup Narayan Ray, unexpectedly won in Dinajpur. Pressures from the district levels compelled the CPI-led Kisan Sabha (Peasant Association) to launch a tebhaga (two-thirds for sharecroppers) campaign, even though sharecropping was purely customary and was governed by no legal provisions. In the first phase organized peasants harvested and shifted paddy to common silos and invited the jotedars to take their one-third share. The second phase saw sharecroppers in unorganized areas move into action. They too harvested the crops and took them to a common silo. More often than not, news of the movement reached sharecroppers after the harvesting was done; in these cases they attacked the silos of rich jotedars and took away grain. Although the movement was strongest in Dinajpur district, it spread to 19 districts overall, and at its peak involved something like six million peasants.

Participation in terms of community was varied. Rajbanshi (a community of north Bengal, Nepal, and Assam), Muslim, and adivasi (tribal) sharecroppers and agricultural laborers all participated, resulting in police clashes in February at Khanpur, Thumnia, and Chirir Bandar in Dinajpur as well as in a number of other places. At least 50 peasants and agricultural laborers, including a number of militant women, were killed, revealing the weakness of the central leadership, which had given no thought to resisting state violence. Even when peasants captured the police and took away their guns, they were not encouraged to use them.

A feature of the tebhaga movement was its anti-communalism. Class identity was able to transcend ethnic and communal identities, and it was not unknown for Muslim peasants to attack the silos of Muslim landlords, as was the case also with Hindus. Class struggle halted the spread of communal violence for some months in rural Bengal. The most famous incident was the march of 10,000 peasants, armed with sticks, which halted an emerging riot in the town of Nilphamari in Rangpur district. Another important feature was the massive participation of women, who formed autonomous women's squads and resisted the police and the jotedars' thugs. In district after district, women peasants stormed their way into the organization and the party, often resisting deep-rooted patriarchy. They questioned traditional norms, challenged wife-beating, fought the police, snatched guns, and died in uprisings in Khanpur, Odlabari in Jalpaiguri, and in the Hajong (tribals) areas of Mymensingh district. In all, according to the Kisan Sabha, more than 3,000 activists were arrested. After early 1947, the movement petered out except in a few isolated areas.

Even more massive was the Telengana movement in Hyderabad state, one of the largest princely states in India. The Nizam of Hyderabad was an absolute ruler and a loyal servant of the British, enjoying considerable autonomy. In most cases cultivators were treated as pattadars (registered occupants, not owners), working either in special jagirs (land grants) or on crown lands. Nearly 6,500 villages were under the jagirdari system. The peasants of Nalgonda, Mahbubnagar, and Warrangal districts in particular were most intensely exploited. Extractions in this area (Vetti) involved forced cultivation of the landlord's land. A serf-like condition was imposed on poor people, usually from adivasi communities, reducing them to the status of bond-laborers for generations. The bulk of the rural masses were either from untouchable castes like the Malas and Madigas, or from tribals like the Hill Reddis, Chenchus, Koyas, Lambadis, and Banjaras.

Following the legalization of the CPI in 1942, the party was able to penetrate legal organizations in both British Andhra and Hyderabad. At the Bhongir Conference of the Andhra Mahasabha (Association), two young communists, Ravi Narayan Reddy and Baddam Yella Reddy, were elected president and general secretary respectively. By early 1946, Nalgonda and Warrangal had strong CPI units. A major incident occurred in July 1946 when over 1,000 peasants, armed with lathis (sticks) and slings, demonstrated in a village that formed part of the estate of a large and extremely oppressive Telengana landlord (Deshmukh). The landlord's hired thugs fired on the demonstrators, killing the village peasant leader, Doddi Komarayya, and injuring a few others. This incident marked the beginning of the Telengana insurrection, which spread first to Jangaon, Suryapet, and Huzurnagar talukas (administrative units) of Nalgonda.

According to one estimate, the movement involved peasants in about 3,000 villages with a combined population of about three million, reaching its greatest intensity between August 1947 and September 1948. The movement mobilized 10,000 village squad members and about 2,000 guerilla squads. About one million acres of land were distributed, based on broad class and communal alliances, which nevertheless began to unravel after land seizures commenced and the land ceiling question was settled in favor of rich peasants. Omvedt (1994) argues that Dalits were ignored because the CPI leadership did not take caste oppression seriously. During this period, the CPI made skillful use of the anti-Nizam slogans of the State Congress leaders, most of them operating from Indian territory, unlike the underground communist leaders. In this movement too, there was a considerable degree of autonomous peasant initiative, contrary to the legend of a perfect CPI leadership, which was built up afterwards. The intensification of the armed struggle sharpened class conflict. The Congress withdrew from its alliance with the communists. Then, on September 13, 1948, the Indian army under General J. N. Chaudhuri moved into Hyderabad and ensured the merger of the state into independent India. The period between September 1948 and October 1951 saw the transformation and ultimate weakening of the movement, until it was eventually called off, under circumstances rather different from those that had given rise to it. As in tebhaga, there was a significant participation of women in the movement. However, it needs to be noted that while Dalits and women were present in significant numbers, neither gained full equality.

Two smaller but important CPI-led struggles occurred in Maharashtra, among the Varli tribals, and in the princely state of Travancore in the Shertalai-Alleppey-Ambalapuzha area. Both cases involved police actions and much brutality. After a prolonged struggle, the Varlis working in forests were brought in under the Minimum Wages Act, while the struggles in Travancore, including armed resistance at Punnapra and Vayalar, while causing immediate losses (around 800 people were killed), discredited the Travancore Dewan (prime minister), Sir C. P. Ramaswami Iyer, and his attempt to maintain an independent Travancore.

British Expansion and Resistance: 1757–1857

The British colonization of India began with the Battle of Plassey in 1757, when Nawab Siraj-ud-Daulah's forces lost to Robert Clive. By 1765 the suba (province) of Bengal, one of the richest in Mughal India (1526–1857), was controlled by the English East India Company, which had obtained the dimani rights to collect taxes. From this base the British expanded in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries under aggressive governor generals, especially the Marquis of Wellesley, Lord Hastings, and the Marquis of Dalhousie. The kingdom of Mysore was annexed, the Nizam (ruler) of Hyderabad forced to accept a subsidiary alliance, and the Marathas and the Sikhs vanquished.

Resistance to British rule from the late eighteenth century took three forms: Mughal, popular struggles, and tribal rebellions.

In the initial era of subjugation, some Mughal princes did not peacefully accept dispossession. Mir Qasim of Bengal, who originally gained power with British assistance, sought sovereignty from the British before his defeat. But the staunchest opponents of the British and the East India Company were rulers of Mysore, Hyder Ali and Tipu Sultan, who joined forces with the Marathas and others in the region. Alone among the Indian rulers, Mysore rulers seemed to have perceived the dangers posed by the British. While the Marathas were less consistent, Nana Phadnavis and several others sought to cobble together an anti-British alliance. However, succession problems among opponents to the British presented the colonial authority with the opportunity to support one faction over the other, thereby weakening the alliance. By the early nineteenth century the British had defeated all the major powers of western and southern India, conquered much territory, and compelled the Moghuls to agree to indirect rule through “subsidiary alliance,” where a British resident official decided policy. In the north, the ruler of Awadh was the first to be forced to accept British policies. The last major independent Indian state, the Sikh kingdom of Ranjit Singh, was conquered after his death, through the utilization of internal dissidence and the bribing of some nobles. For example, the British rewarded Gulab Singh for his support by selling him the Kingdom of Kashmir.

From the 1770s a series of large and small popular struggles against the British raged in opposition to colonial control, notably the sanyasi and fakir (Hindu and Muslim ascetic) rebellions, and the revolt of Titu Mir in Bengal. Outside Bengal, as British rule began to be imposed, popular resistance formed against oppressive land tax. Economic exploitation, racism, and trampled religious sensibilities combined to produce repeated political outbursts in India, often described by the rulers as riots or disturbances. Even official reports, however, show a combination of class, national, and racial resistance.

Finally, tribal revolts spread across a vast zone of India, from Gujarat in the West through the central Orissa, Bihar (present-day Jharkhand) and Bengal in the East, and Andhra in the South. The rights of “tribals” were completely ignored when the British regime of absolute private property imposed its rule. Repeated tribal uprisings broke out, like the Kol revolt of 1831–2, the Santal Hool (revolt) led by Sidhu and Kanhu, two Santal brothers, resisting colonial land settlements (1855–7), and repeatedly among the Rampas of Andhra and the Moplahs of Malabar, or the important tribal revolt of Birsa Munda (1899–1900).

Peasant resistance, discontent against racism, soldiers' discontent, princely and old ruling-class discontent, and religious grievances all converged in the revolt of 1857, the high-point of early resistance. Though former rulers, including Mughal emperor Bahadur Shah Zafar, the Maratha leader Nana Sahib, and Khan Bahadur Khan at Bareilly, were important participants, the 1857 revolt was not a feudal reaction. The 1857 actions included an army revolt against racial oppression and economic deprivation, and a massive peasant upsurge in some of India's most densely populated areas. The revolt was permeated by a sense of good governance under "national" and Mughal rule, and the sharp deviation of the East India Company from the previous era. The revolt was followed by extreme repression, including the mass hanging of suspected rebels and binding rebels to cannons while firing. In the aftermath the East India Company was abolished and the British ruled India directly through parliament. As a new nationalism was growing in India, the British engaged in limited efforts to provide a voice for a limited segment of the population.

Modern Nationalism and its Stages

From the early nineteenth century, English-educated public figures in Calcutta, capital of British India, began criticizing the British for their restriction of civil liberties and Indian rights. But nationalism as a mass ideology can be traced to the second half of the nineteenth century. Early middle-class nationalists did not envisage driving the British out, but appealed to the British sense of justice against the un-British rule of the viceroy and his council.

In its formative years the Indian National Congress (henceforth, Congress), the first all-India organization, founded in 1885, explicitly rejected the idea of ejecting the British from India. Repeated failures of the politics of pleading and petitioning led to the growth of a more militant nationalist current. While moderate nationalism had been secular, extremist nationalism, in drawing upon strongly religious imageries, opened more explicitly religiously chauvinist or communalist politics.

The Bengal partition resulted in significant growth of militant nationalism, which developed the call for independence, and new tactics of struggle, including boycotting British goods and emphasizing indigenous production (swadeshi). Militants also planned armed struggles against notorious members of the ruling class and military uprisings, leading to the eventual split of moderates and extremists within the Congress. The British sought to divide Hindus and Muslims on communal lines, leading to the formation of the Muslim League in 1906. During World War I, repression increased and popular anger grew. By 1916 the political positions of moderates and extremists, as well as the Muslim League, drew closer. A Congress-League pact created the possibility of a constitutional struggle on limited demands.

The period 1917–47 saw major struggles of different kinds, culminating in freedom with Partition. The coming of Gandhi to India, and his emergence as a mass leader, brought a new style of politics, involving mass politics and an articulation of many of the grievances of the oppressed peasants, while ensuring that the reins of control remained firmly with Gandhi, who was not a revolutionary. The nationalist movement enabled Gandhi to overcome the limitations of elite moderate politics and the politics of armed struggle. The stress on non-violence ensured the continued support of the Indian upper classes, while giving the movement a new mass dimension.

Major Gandhian movements were the Rowlatt Satyagraha (peaceful violation of specific laws) (1919), the non-violent non-cooperation movement (1920–1), and the civil disobedience movement (1930–4). While Gandhi's left-wing critics saw in these repeated compromises with the British, others view the strategy as a successful effort of escalating "pressure-compromise-pressure" (Chandra et al. 1989). For the Gandhian movement, capturing the imagination of the popular masses was as important to spurring the successful anti-colonial struggle as was Gandhi's actual message.

Class, Community, Oppressed Groups

The emergence of mass politics, however, unleashed new dynamics. Gandhian movements saw the large-scale entry of women into the freedom struggle. Women had been active in the national movement earlier, but Gandhi ensured that space for women was created. Important women leaders included Sarojini Naidu. Initially auxiliaries, women were increasingly fighting for equal space in the national movement, and concomitantly demanding legal and social equality for themselves.

The pressure of Hindu communalism on Congress pushed even many liberal Muslims like M. A. Jinnah into opposition. The Muslim League revived, as a reaction to aggressive Hindu communalism. The Congress remained tied to uppercaste interests, as noted by lower-caste leaders, including E. V. Ramaswamy Naicker (“Periyar”) and B. R. Ambedkar, who formed alternative social and political organizations. Ambedkar demanded a separate electorate for dalits (the “untouchable castes”) during the Round Table Conference, but eventually agreed, through the Poona Pact, that assembly and parliamentary seats were to be reserved for untouchables, with popular elections through a general electorate. He rejected Gandhi’s Harijan (Gandhi’s term for the untouchables) upliftment program as a meaningless sop.

There was also a revival of calls for armed struggle, this time with greater sophistication in its politics. Two outstanding groups were the Hindustan Socialist Republican Army, led by Sardar Bhagat Singh, Chandrasekhar Azad and others, and the Chittagong revolutionaries in Bengal, led by Surya Sen. Both groups were moving from revolutionary nationalism to communism, and many of the surviving revolutionary nationalists became members of the Communist Party (CPI), or were involved in founding the Revolutionary Socialist Party (RSP).

Working-class and peasant struggles also developed, as did organized socialist and communist movements. The Congress Socialist Party was a party combining Marxists, Fabians, and other socialistically inclined Congress members. The CPI was a more revolutionary organization, founded in 1920 in Tashkent and in 1925 in India. By the 1930s it had become dominant within the All India Trade Union Congress, and was also a major force within the All India Kisan Sabha (Peasant Association). Nationalist leftists and socialists combined within the Congress and supported first Jawaharlal Nehru and then Subhas Chandra Bose as Congress presidents. In 1939, after Bose was elected by defeating right-wing Congress candidate Sittaramayah, who had been supported by Gandhi, the right wing hit back. Outmaneuvered, Bose was forced to resign a few months later. He formed the Forward Bloc. Thereafter, the left split, and the Congress right sought to consolidate its position in the provincial assemblies.

Compromise and Struggle: 1935–1947

In 1935 the British rulers promulgated the Government of India Act, which expanded the powers of the provincial assemblies somewhat. The Congress accepted this and went on to contest elections. Forming governments in this way turned out, however, to be an unhappy experience, as mass aspirations grew. Congress, tied to mill-owner, trader, and landlord interests, did not respond favorably to popular demands. Congress thus began to be discredited. It was therefore relieved by the unilateral declaration of war by Viceroy Linlithgow on Nazi Germany in 1939, instructing all Congress ministries to resign because the national will had not been ascertained. However, still reluctant to launch serious mass movements, Gandhi opted for a strategy of individual satyagrahas, where hand-picked volunteers would violate the law and be arrested. This was calculated not to embarrass the government and to avoid any repression. At this stage the left, notably the CPI, condemned the Congress.

Then in 1941 came the Japanese invasions as well as the Nazi invasion of the Soviet Union. At this stage it was Gandhi and the Congress Socialist Party who wanted a more militant struggle, feeling that a weakened Britain might give in, while the CPI sided with the most moderate elements in Congress, opposing struggles. In 1942 Congress adopted its historic Quit India resolution, but within 24 hours almost the entire top echelon of Congress leadership was put behind bars. Struggles developed nonetheless, and were led mostly by Gandhians and Congress Socialists, and sometimes by CPI members who defied their party’s line. Smaller Marxist parties like the Revolutionary Socialist Party and the Bolshevik Leninist Party also took part in the struggles. Hindu and Muslim communalists both opposed the movement. Close to 100,000 people were arrested, and massive repression was carried out.

Subhas Chandra Bose, who had been arrested and subsequently kept under house arrest, fled to Afghanistan, and then made his way first to Germany and then by submarine to Japan, where he received much greater support. In Southeast Asia he formed the Azad Hind (Free Indian) government and created the Azad Hind Fauz (Indian National Army or INA) with Indian prisoners of war and Indian expatriates living in Southeast Asia. The Japanese defeat doomed the INA, but stories of its valor electrified Indians.

British attempts to put on trial INA soldiers as deserters and war criminals resulted in massive India-wide struggles demanding their release, unleashing a spate of postwar upsurges, including a revolt of the Royal Indian Navy, several major agrarian struggles (in Bengal, the Tebhaga movement; in Hyderabad, the Telangana struggle; and in Kerala, the Punnapra-Vayalar struggle), and working-class protests culminating in a massive general strike. Fearful of social struggles, Congress chose to call them off whenever possible and take the path of negotiations, signaling the end of non-secular protest and the rise of communal demands and discord.

A total breakdown of law and order occurred in many parts of the country. In the 1946 elections to the Constituent Assembly, Congress dominated the General Seats and the Muslim League controlled Muslim seats. Communal riots organized by communalists – Hindu, Muslim, and Sikh – tore the country apart. On August 16, 1946, chosen as Direct Action Day, the Muslim League unleashed communalist violence in Calcutta. Hindu communalists struck back. In four days, over 4,000 perished in the “Great Calcutta Killings.” Gandhi alone fought against the communal madness engulfing the country, moving from one riot-torn area to another, but Congress leaders were in no mood to listen to his advice for a settlement with Jinnah. Eventually, the British rulers decided to pull out of India by June 1948. Lord Mountbatten, appointed viceroy, had a clear mandate of expediting the process of British withdrawal. On June 3, 1947 the Mountbatten Plan proposed transfer of power on August 15, 1947 to two successor Dominion governments, India and Pakistan, with Bengal and Punjab divided on communal lines. What followed soon after was the most widespread communal violence and displacement in the subcontinent’s political history, with about a million people killed and more than 75,000 women raped. Over 10 million people were displaced, and over six decades later, descendants of some still live in refugee camps or precarious conditions.

Indigo Rebellion

Kunal Chattopadhyay with Muntassir Mamoon

The Indigo Rebellion (Indigo Revolts) comprised widespread peasant uprisings in Bengal from 1839 to 1860 against rapacious planters of the indigo crop that are viewed by historians as important events giving rise to the early Indian nationalist movement. With the growth of the textile industry after the Industrial Revolution, dyeing of clothes became an important branch of apparel manufacturing. From the time of the East India Company, British planters had been settling in parts of India. The planters started taking a keen interest in indigo when the supply of indigo from other sources dried up and India emerged as the largest exporter of the crop. They established kuthis (large concerns) in different parts of Bengal. The biggest concern, the India Indigo Company, was established in Nadia-Jessore-Khulna. The European planters induced Bengali ryots (peasants) to reserve a part of their land to grow indigo by making small payments as dadon (an advance) to be adjusted against final payment at the time of delivery. Once the ryot took the advance, as happened extensively over several districts of Bengal, like Jessore, Nadia, and Pabna, the ryot was in the clutches of the planter. When taking produce to the planter's factory, people were cheated by dealers who used distorted scales. The value of the produce was calculated at rates far below market price. After the deductions, including the value of revenue stamps used in the agreement papers, the cost of seed supplied by the planter, and transport charges, the ryot often ended up with no profits, or even a net debt to the planter on account of the advances given. For all practical purposes a debt bondage developed in the planter-dominated areas, being handed down from father to son. Attempts to break away from the tyranny of indigo planters were tackled by sending in armed lathiyals (retainers), who would beat up the peasant and his family members and destroy his crops. The peasants had no access to the legal system.

The indigo rebellions had two phases: 1839–48 and 1859–60. The first attack on the indigo establishments was launched by Bishwanath Sardar in Nadia district to loot the kuthis and to harass their owners. But he was soon arrested and hanged by the British government. Larger-scale revolts followed in Mymensingh and Khulna, where in the latter an indigo trader named Renee brought a large area of land under cultivation forcibly through torture and coercion, displacing small zamindars. Such zamindars, talukdars (a sub-feudatory layer), and the cultivators joined in resisting the oppression of Renee. In addition, the indigo planters had purchased zamindaris and intermediate tenures to appear in even stronger guise as exploiters. As a result, the 1859–60 rebellion assumed mass forms in Nadia, Murshidabad, Pabna, Jessore, Khulna, and Birbhum, involving some 500,000 peasants. In many cases peasants banded together and set upon the indigo planters, uprooting the indigo plants, burning several factories, and consigning accounts books to the fire.

According to Reverend James Long, a British missionary sympathetic to the peasants, the rise in prices of goods, including agricultural produce, the rising cost of labor power, the growth in political consciousness from the middle of the nineteenth century, and the evident sympathy of the educated middle class provided an impetus to the peasants in openly rebelling.

In most cases, leadership was in the hands of indigo cultivators themselves. In Chougachha, Nadia district, the leaders were two brothers, Bishnucharan Biswas and Digambar Biswas, former employees of the planter who resigned in protest at the oppression of the peasants by the planters. To ameliorate conditions to a considerable extent, the peasants petitioned the government or went to courts, but when this strategy was unsuccessful, historical records demonstrate the burning of crops, and planters fled. However, elements within the middle class supported the cultivators. Palit (1975), for example, views the insurrections as purely factional disputes rather than landlord-planter rivalries. Other scholars, like Kling (1966), view the Indigo Rebellion as the beginning of an emergent nationalist movement. Certainly, there was some rivalry, and some zamindars supported the peasants, as did middle-class nationalists seeking to establish hegemony over the peasantry. Harishchandra Mukherjee, editor of Hindoo Patriot, and Girishchandra Ghosh were strong supporters of the cultivators. Mukherjee admitted before the Indigo Commission his active support for the cultivators. Mukherjee helped Pleaders (a category of lawyers in courts) financially to defend peasants and was arrested on charges of instigating supporters of the rebellion. In an attempt to mobilize sympathy for the peasants, Sisir Kumar Ghosh argued the disputes were completely peaceful, a conclusion supported by middle-class proto-nationalists seeking to remain loyal to British rule and only urging reforms.

Popular hatred of the planters among the urban middle classes was expressed through the popularity of the play Neeldarpan (A Mirror of Indigo) by Dinabandhu Mitra, translated into English reportedly by Michael Madhusudan Dutt, the foremost Bengali poet of his generation, and published by Reverend James Long.

Ultimately, the peasant militancy and popular opposition compelled the British government to establish the Indigo Commission in 1860 and issue a declaration that planters could no longer arrange forced cultivation. But planter oppression was difficult to stop. In some cases planters moved to Bihar to avoid the law. Ultimately, the discovery of chemical substitutes for indigo broke the planter monopoly.

Indochina, World War II and liberation in

Daniel Hémerly

World War II rang the death knell of the European colonial empire. However, decolonization was deferred for French Indochina. The beginning of the end of the French colonial empire in Indochina was signaled by the cataclysmic collapse of France in June 1940, followed by a brief Franco-Thai war arbitrated by Tokyo to benefit Bangkok in May 1941. On September 23, 1940 the Phuc Quoc (National Restoration) nationalists with the assistance of the Japanese army launched a short but intense attack on Lang Son in Northern Vietnam on September 23. The Phuc Quoc entered Tonkin with the Japanese army confident that they were commencing the liberation of their country.

However, the Lang Son uprising was immediately quashed, as was the Bac Son communist uprising in Tonkin in late September, as was a subsequent intense communist insurrection on November 22, 1940 in 11 of the 20 provinces of Cochinchina. They were crushed by relentless military and police repression, decimating the Communist Party of Indochina. But this was only a brief respite for the government installed by Maréchal Pétain's regime in Vichy after the Franco-German armistice and entrusted to Admiral Decoux. The Indochinese administration and army, faithful to Vichy until 1945 despite the formation of clandestine networks of General de Gaulle's Free France, was forced to comply with the Japanese ultimatum as of August 30, 1940 and then sign the Franco-Japanese agreements of January, May, and July 1941.

Vichy and the general government accepted the installation of a Japanese army of 50,000 men in the cities, at strategic points and military bases, as well as the insertion of the Indochinese economy into the "Sphere of Japanese Co-prosperity" – in other words, placement in service of the Japanese war effort. In exchange, Japan agreed to respect French sovereignty over Indochina where the colonial administration remained.

As early as 1940 the colonized Indochinese had an unshakable conviction that liberation from colonial domination and independence was only a matter of time and that the "favorable moment" (to cite an ancient Confucian belief) was very near. The major event of 1940–5 took place in the minds of all Indochinese: the national project became an event of the masses. In Cambodia the old tacit pact between the elites and the Protectorate was ripped apart at the "manifestation of the parasols" of July 20, 1942 at Phnom Penh, held to protest the arrest of one of the organizers of the "Nagaravatta," Hem Chieu. This manifestation gave rise to the first repression, heavy condemnation, and the exile of Son Ngoc Thanh to Tokyo.

Japanese repression triggered the emergence of a popular nationalism aided by a segment of the Buddhist clergy and to which the entourage of young King Norodom Sihanouk – crowned in 1941 – was agreeable. In Laos the idea of independence and revival of the collective Laotian past progressed rapidly among the educated youth. In Vietnam the idea of modern nationalism progressed like never before and the collective culture was converted to nationalism at a pace completely unknown until then. New reviews and periodicals like Tri Tan (Knowledge of Novelty) and Thanh Nghi (Enlightened Opinion) were the most active organs for these nationalist impulses, which the authorities contained only with difficulty and which were encouraged by Japanese propaganda on the theme of the Great Asia. Modern literature and theater enjoyed unprecedented success, while a thirst for knowledge and interest in national history pervaded the popular urban classes and at times even the countryside. Controversies and debates about culture, education, development, and the future of the country were followed avidly. Major movements had in fact emerged before 1940 in which clandestine political currents participated, such as the Indo-Chinese Communist Party (PCI), which in 1943 published a Cultural Manifesto exhorting writers and artists to participate in the elaboration of a “national, scientific and proletarian culture.”

Starting in 1943 the politization of the masses increased dramatically. The educated youth immersed itself in innumerable social activities, such as the SOS movements for flood victims or the popular movement for the elimination of illiteracy in Quốc Ngu that in 1938 was launched by the Association for the Diffusion of “Quốc Ngu” created in Hanoi and headed by Truong Chinh, future secretary-general of the PCI. Under the umbrella of these activities in 1944, youth movements were begun. These apparently apolitical movements – in particular Youths of First Line, whose chief scout was Ta Quang Buu in Huế, and Thanh Niên Tiên Phong (Youths of the Avant-Garde), whose creators were secretly members of the PCI in Cochinchina, such as Dr. Pham Ngoc Thach – were difficult for the French Commission of Youth and Sports to control.

Such movements were fertile fields of activism for the Vietminh communist insurgents. There was a vocabulary war: the term “Viet-Nam” was spread everywhere, driving back little by little the old colonial placenames such as Annam, Tonkin, and even Cochinchina. The word “Viet-Nam” imposed itself from then on, as it was the incontestable marker of the new national identity, to the point that French authorities were sometimes forced to use it. The authorities attempted to play a subtle game of channeling a phenomenon which was about to overwhelm them, but as 1945 neared, for the Indochinese people, colonization had become intolerable and Independence unavoidable.

Meanwhile, due to the prudent protection of the Japanese, nationalist movements quickly resumed activities. The VNQZD, the Vietnamese nationalist party, remained in the Chinese Guomindang but linked its reappearance in Vietnam to the occupation of the northern half of Indochina by Chinese troops, as agreed at the Potsdam Conference. The small, nascent nationalist parties of the Dai Việt and the Phuc Quốc, linked for the time to the Japanese, had only limited influence and at the approach of Japanese defeat were planning to transfer allegiance to the Chinese generals of the armies from Yunnan and Guangxi. This was in contrast to the Caodaisme and the Hoa Hao, who from 1944 endeavored to control entire regions in Cochinchina with the consent of the Japanese. In Cochinchina they started to constitute armed militias in such a way that the colonial authorities could not oppose them.

However, essential events occurred elsewhere, in the mountains of the High Region, the Viet Bac, the border zone with China, which was poorly controlled by the colonial authorities, and where, in early 1941, the PCI endeavored to reorganize itself on the basis of a decisive strategic reorientation. The crucial event was the return of Nguyễn Ai Quốc from the USSR after a long, cautious stay at Yanan between 1938 and 1941, and who in 1942 assumed the name Hồ Chí Minh. He crossed the border on February 8, 1941 with his suitcase and his typewriter and settled near China in the northwest of Cao Bang, imposing himself as the historical instigator of Vietnamese and Indochinese communism.

It was in Viet Bac that the 8th Plenum of the Central Committee in Pac Bo from May 10–19, 1941 adopted a new political lineage, recommended Hồ Chí Minh and the young survivors of the colonial repressions of 1939–40 in Tonkin – essentially, Vo Nguyễn Giap, Pham Van Dong, and Truong Chinh – that he had regrouped. The new political lineage prioritized the “revolution of national liberation,” ending in the agrarian revolution and the class struggle, established a political front known under the abbreviation Vietminh: the Viet-Nam Doc Lap Dong Minh (Alliance for the Independence of Vietnam), officially created on September 8.

In spite of its propagandist speeches, the Vietminh was not an alliance between independent political forces, nor a political coalition, nor a new Popular Front, nor a new anti-imperialist front. Its function, according to the 8th Plenum, was “to reunite all the patriots, without distinction of fortune, age, sex, religion or political opinion, in order to work together for the liberation of our people and for the safety of our nation.” It was a vast and flexible structure, almost-ungraspable, but which promised to be omnipresent, totally communist, and was destined to prevent and neutralize eventual political rivalry, mobilize and lead the population, encourage popular patriotism, nationalist forces, and influential networks – in brief, an apparatus to create unanimity, constituted in preparation for the inevitable fight for power that any “national liberation essentially implies.” They conceived an armed struggle – the first core of the Army of National Safety, the future Popular Army, and the first maquis organized immediately in the High Area – and as such, the installation of national structures of a party-state to be based upon the model offered by the communist revolution, Maoism, and the Chinese Communist Party, with whom the Vietnamese communists were in regular contact.

The objective was national liberation and the seizure of power. The means was armed struggle and political work. In Viet Bac it managed to establish cooperation with US officers of the Indochina section of the OSS (Office of Strategic Services) in China, aiming for the appearance at least of American and Allied legitimation. Because national Vietnamese communism was anything but isolationist, the plan was to operate patiently on an international political terrain and constantly claim solidarity among all people, including the French and Americans.

The bifurcation of Indochinese communism occurred only in Tonkin – where the PCI’s presence was more recent – and in some provinces of Annam. In the South the PCI was almost completely cut off from the North and was more classically Stalinist-communist. It was quickly reconstituted, starting in 1943 under the direction of its prewar leader Trần Văn Giàu. By 1945 it possessed a dense, clandestine network of labor unions and peasant and urban associations organized around the goal of seizing revolutionary power.

Ideologically, strategically, and practically, the meeting at Pac Bo meant that Vietnamese communism was decisively transformed into a new and essentially Asian configuration – national communism – already a strong tendency within the PCI and which reappeared at its core in 1937–8. This communism would emerge victorious and remain fundamentally faithful to the strategic formula Red China explored and elaborated in the 1930s.

Events validated the operational capacity of the new communist line in Vietnam. From 1944 onwards, the colonial regime vacillated and then rapidly unravelled. Its economic structures were dislocated under the combined effects of enormous Japanese demands, inflation, the rupture of railway and maritime communications between Cochinchina and Tonkin following the Allied bombings, and generalized shortages. During the winter of 1944–5 a catastrophic rice harvest and the interruption of rice deliveries from the South contributed to famine in Tonkin and North Annam, with approximately 1 million victims. In the cities to which starving peasants fled, scores of corpses of those who died of starvation during the night were found each morning. From then on, the isolated colonial regime was paralyzed.

From March 1945 the Japanese were in an increasingly difficult situation on all Asian fronts. Worried about the activity of Free France networks in the army and the French administration of Indochina, and the possibility of their turning against their own settlements, they decided to take a decisive step. On the night of March 9, Japanese troops disarmed the colonial army and imprisoned French soldiers and those in authority in camps and jails. Within a few days the colonial regime had broken down irremediably in all of Indochina. In Hué, at the urging of the Japanese ambassador, Emperor Bao Dai proclaimed Vietnamese independence on March 11 and constituted a government of national figures, as similarly undertaken by King Sihanouk in Cambodia and King Sisavang Vong in Laos. With the end of three-quarters of a century of French domination, the history of the Indochinese people consequently underwent abrupt and unforeseeable change.

Until the Japanese surrender was announced on August 10, 1945, the three new Indochinese governments were confronted with general skepticism towards an independence issued not by the Allies but by a virtually vanquished Japan. These governments had only five months to organize and consolidate their power. Throughout Vietnam, a revolutionary environment prevailed. Once the colonial administration had disappeared, imperial authorities, although they were supported by the Japanese, did not succeed in taking over from the colonial administration. Taxes ceased being raised, rent stopped being paid to landowners, official buildings were occupied, plundered, or burned down by mobs, jails and prisons were emptied, the Indigenous Guard and the militiamen of old mandarins gradually dispersed, and disorder and social fear set in.

At the end of July and the beginning of August a wave of revolutionary and nationalist sentiment and activism lifted the peasantry, youth, blue-collar workers, and the common people of the cities, causing a general power vacuum in countryside and town. For everyone, it was a decisive moment situated between the Japanese surrender, the entry of Chinese troops in the North upon which nationalist groups and British troops in the South counted, and the foreseeable and dreaded return of the French. Time seemed suspended between past oppression and an ominous future. For national survival, the near-eschatological concept of national safety (cuu quốc) became a decisive “now or never.”

The communists seized power under the Vietminh banner. From the end of 1944 the Communist Party with its 5,000 members – of which a thousand were in jail – was the only political force organized on a national scale or at least in a great number of provinces. It created hundreds of committees of national safety (cuu quốc hoi), probably grouping together tens of thousands of activists. In Tonkin, starting in March 1945, armed Vietminh groups equipped with new material by the American OSS officers who accompanied them, pushed all the way to Thai Nguyên. Hồ Chí Minh established his headquarters in Tan Trao, 70 kilometers from Hanoi, and in Cochinchina the PCI had armed its working militia.

After the announcement of the Japanese surrender an improvised “national convention” at Tan Trao from August 13–15 proclaimed the constitution of a provisional government headed by Hồ Chí Minh. Vietminh units marched toward Hanoi, where the Vietminh committee and its militia seized without violence essential buildings on August 19, after negotiating with imperial delegates in Tonkin. The Japanese army remained neutral throughout Indochina. Hồ Chí Minh, who discreetly entered the city on August 26, proclaimed on September 2 before an enthusiastic crowd of hundreds of thousands independence and the formation of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam (DRV), as well as a government of national unity that was in fact largely communist.

At Hué, the Vietminh took possession of the capital on August 22. On August 29 Emperor Bao Dai agreed to abdicate and assume the title of “supreme advisor” of the government of the DRV. In Saigon an Executive Committee of Nam Bo took power on August 24–25, presided over by the communist Tran Van Giau. The PCI formed the majority of the committee, the minority comprising politico-religious sects and Trotskyists.

In the protectorates of Cambodia and Laos the consequences of the Japanese surrender were different. In Phnom Penh, through the coup d'état of August 9, Son Ngoc Thanh removed the young King Sihanouk and governed until his arrest by Leclerc on October 15, 1945. There was a different outcome in Vientiane, where King Sisavang Vong chose to join France again, while Prince Phetsarath and his half-brothers Souvanaphouma and Souphanouvong demanded independence and created the Lao Issara movement, with which the Vietminh came into contact in October.

The leaders of the CPI and of the DRV were immediately confronted with the need to preserve power and install everywhere the apparatus of the “popular committees” charged with the local management of the fight against the French and/or Chinese enemy. Very quickly, August's national unanimity was broken. In the North, while the VNQZD of Dai Việt and Phuc Quốc nationalists sought with little success to compete on the terrain of the Vietminh, they were reinforced by the entrance of the Chinese army from Yunnan in Tonkin and in Laos, and reorganized openly, particularly in the cities.

In Saigon, conflict raged at the heart of the Executive Committee of Nam Bo, who fought in a dispersed manner the Battle of Saigon against French troops. Japanese resistance was sustained on September 23 by the British who had arrived ten days before and were reinforced by the Expeditionary French Task Force in the Far East (CEFEO) of General Leclerc, arriving on September 25, 1945 in Saigon, and endeavoring to reconquer the southern half of the peninsula. In several regions the Vietminh physically eliminated enemy leaders: Pham Quynh in Hué and the constitutionalist chiefs in Cochinchina (Bui Quang Chieu in particular). Trotskyists, still influential in the South, were assassinated by the Vietminh: Ta Thu Thau in September with Quang Ngai, his comrades Phan Van Hum, Tran Van Thach, Huynh Van Phuong, and several others, probably executed in Cochinchina during or after the Battle of Saigon, as would be Huynh Phu So, the prophetic leader of the Hoa Hao, killed in 1947.

The result of the August Revolution was binary: seizure of power by the Indochinese Communist Party (in fact, Vietnamese) and installation by the communists of the DRV, then vested with considerable popular support. These two fragile phenomena were incompatible with the Chinese military and political presence and its support for anti-communist nationalism, and the French Indochinese project (secretly prepared in 1943 and revealed in the declaration of the government of General de Gaulle of March 24) whose realization on the ground was entrusted to Admiral d'Argenlieu, the appointed high commissioner in Indochina.

The incompatibility of the French project with Indochinese independence was total. For de Gaulle and the new French political class emerging from the Resistance and the Liberation, there was no question of accepting the fait accompli of the August Revolution. Rather than simply restoring the old colonial order, they sought to establish a renewed colonial dependency, neocolonial in the true historical sense of the term. They sought the installation of a new political partnership with the modern elites of the five countries of old Indochina (notwithstanding recognition of the Vietnam unit) using a formula of self-government associated with political democratization but under the control of a powerful federal government presided over by the French high commissioner. The secret Indochinese Constitution was written to that effect.

A plan was drawn up for accelerating the industrialization of Indochina, to be financed by metropolitan investment and with the goal of remedying the alarming underdevelopment of the Vietnamese and Khmer countryside, in decline since the 1930s. This was the true meaning of the geopolitical concept of Indochinese Federation proposed in the March 24 declaration that was considered the cornerstone of the French union, then discussed within the framework of the constitutional French debate of 1945–6 and destined to replace the political structures of the old colonial empire. War with the DRV was therefore unavoidable.

The Vietnamese August Revolution was disconcerting in Indochina, its success submitting it almost instantly to the heavy and multiple constraints of war. It was a continuous war because – as in future Third World revolutions – once independence was achieved, political power was immediately and durably confiscated. Political democracy had barely taken hold and time was against it. In Vietnam, the state was built into the revolutionary movement itself. It was not all-powerful, but it was stronger than society, and affirmed the rise of an executive bureaucracy invested in the monopoly of power. Everything was accomplished within a strikingly short time: an immense popular revolution was almost instantaneously captured by the communist movement and immediately transformed into a party-state in a revolutionary war. The revolutionary Vietnamese intelligentsia marched toward power and its transformation into the communist bureaucracy.

This unpredictable metamorphosis would expand beyond Vietnam and emerge triumphant throughout Indochina. The Vietnamese August Revolution was a striking prologue to the rise of extremes in the peninsula, sparking three consecutive and interminable wars – the “10,000-day war,” to use a contemporary Vietnamese expression. Indochina would experience the longest wars of the twentieth century because of the enmeshment of decolonization, a peninsular civil war, the Cold War, and the Sino-Soviet conflict.

Indonesia, colonial protests, 16th century to 1900

Henri Myrntinen

The European colonial conquest of the Indonesian archipelago began in the mid-1500s with the arrival of Portuguese traders seeking access to the spice and sandalwood trade, which at the time was mainly controlled by Arab, Bugis, Chinese, and Gujarati traders. Almost from the outset, the European traders were met with local resistance, in some instances manipulated by the competing imperial powers seeking dominance.

The first European traders to arrive in the archipelago were the Portuguese, who succeeded in setting up several bases across the archipelago but were soon forced into the eastern part of the archipelago due to local revolts such as in 1575 in Ternate and competition from the rapidly growing Dutch Empire. By the seventeenth century the Portuguese trading outpost network was reduced to a presence in East Timor, a colony they managed to retain until 1975. British colonial efforts tended to focus on the Malay Peninsula, though Britain had a foothold at the port of Bengkulu on the island of Sumatra.

Dutch East India Company

Dutch traders first arrived in the archipelago in 1596 with a four-ship expedition under Cornelis de Houtman. The Dutch fleet attacked the port of Banten, West Java, the major pepper trading port of the time. After clashes with local and Portuguese traders in Banten and further bloody battles along the Javanese coast and in Madura, the expedition returned to the Netherlands with enough plundered goods to encourage further expeditions. The frequency and size of Dutch efforts to monopolize the spice trade expanded with the establishment of the Dutch East India Company (Verenigde Oostindische Compagnie or VOC), granted a monopoly on trading activities in the region by the Dutch parliament in 1602.

The VOC pursued an aggressive policy of expansion, pushing Portuguese traders out of their bases in the eastern archipelago through allying with local leaders and consolidating settlements in Java. While the VOC was first based in Mabon in the Moluccas, the most important base soon became Batavia (later Indonesia's capital city of Jakarta), which was built at the site of the town of Jayakarta razed by VOC troops in 1619.

Javanese and Sundanese resistance to VOC advances continued throughout the seventeenth century, but the Banten kingdom or the more powerful Mataram kingdom under Sultan Agung were unable to dislodge the VOC from Batavia. Through cooptation, coercion, and brute force, the VOC gained hegemony in the spice trade, often relying on cooptation of local rulers and Ambonese and Bugis mercenaries to impose its monopoly. The VOC presence was tenuous, relying initially on a minimal Dutch presence and manipulating local power politics. The dependence on local mercenary leaders also had risks, as displayed by the insurrection of the Ambonese Captain Joncker in Batavia in 1689.

On Java the VOC became increasingly involved in local political struggles and gained important concessions from Amangkurat II of Mataram in 1677, when Dutch troops and mercenaries from nearby islands supported his bid to become Sultan. Over the next century the presence of "the Company" in Java became increasingly prominent as it established a system of tribute payments and forced delivery of goods, overseen by a network of resident Dutch officials. VOC involvement in Javanese politics became increasingly commonplace, with the Dutch presiding over intra-Javanese power struggles.

The last stadtholder of the Dutch republic, William V of Orange, having fled to British exile after establishing the Batavian Republic, gave the British control of Dutch-controlled territories for "safe-keeping" in 1795. The former VOC settlements, however, only came under British control after sustained military campaigns from 1811 to 1816. Facing bankruptcy in 1799, the VOC was dissolved due to failure of its own economic policies. The Dutch government assumed control over VOC areas, which in the turmoil of the Napoleonic Wars changed hands from the Batavian Republic to the French. Louis Bonaparte named H. W. Daendels governor-general of the Dutch East Indies, who was instrumental in laying the foundations of the Dutch colonial system.

Dutch Colonial System (1814–1900)

Following the British interregnum from 1811 to 1814, the territory of what is now Indonesia became formally recognized by the other colonial powers as the colony of the Dutch East Indies by the Anglo-Dutch Treaty of 1814.

While the VOC-system had mainly been mercantilist, focused on maintaining a trade monopoly by force and cooptation, the Dutch colonial system established after the archipelago became a proper colony had significantly more ambitious goals, including establishing a thorough and hierarchical administrative system, improving infrastructure, a social system based on racial discrimination, the establishment of plantations and extraction of raw materials for the economic benefit of the Netherlands, and, especially in Eastern Indonesia, opening of the territory for proselytizing by Christian missionaries.

The financial impact of the Padri and Java Wars (see below), coupled with the loss of Belgium in 1830, led to a new, more intense strategy of resource extraction by the Dutch government in its colonies in order to avoid bankruptcy. The new cultuurstelsel policy of forced cultivation of export crops such as indigo, coffee, and sugar at the expense of food crops brought massive financial gains for the Dutch colonial government and local compradors, but starvation and poverty to the local peasantry.

The cultuurstelsel policy was abandoned in 1870 following an outcry in the Netherlands after publication of Multatuli's (the pen name of Edward Douwe Dekker) book Max Havelaar, a fact-based novel outlining the human cost of forced cultivation. The new policies adopted in 1870 came to be known as the Liberal Period. During this time some of the worst excesses of the cultivation system were curbed and the colony opened to capitalist expansion and increasing commodification of labor, land, and goods. The Liberal Period saw the development of larger plantations, the introduction of new crops, and intensified extraction of oil from Sumatra and Kalimantan and other natural non-renewable resources. The era ended in 1901 with the introduction of the Ethical Policy, increasing public access to education, healthcare, and limited political participation for the colonized population.

Padri War (1821–1837)

From 1821 to 1837 the Dutch colonial administration in Western Sumatra faced its first major challenge in the Padri or Minangkabau War. The conflict was sparked by internal struggle in Western Sumatra between traditionalist (adat) and reformist Islamist (padri) factions over control of Minangkabau society. The adat faction gained the support of Dutch forces in military engagements against the padri faction from 1821 to 1824. The Masang Treaty temporarily brought an end to the fighting, but hostilities resumed in 1830, centering on the padri stronghold of Bonjol. After a three-year siege, Bonjol was captured by the Dutch and the padri leader Tuanku Imam Bonjol was forced into exile, effectively ending the conflict.

Java War (1825–1830)

During the pause in the fighting in Sumatra's Padri War, the Dutch faced a major and far more threatening uprising in the heart of their colony as the Java War raged from 1825 to 1830. The Java War was triggered by a Dutch road project in Tagalareja, Central Java, but its roots lay much deeper. The Dutch colonial administration appropriated land for plantations and introduced new taxation systems. The presence of new European landowners and Chinese middlemen and the reduction of the Javanese royal courts to mere cultural centers profoundly transformed the traditional socioeconomic structure. Droughts, floods, famines, and the eruption of the holy Mount Merapi volcano were viewed by many as portents for the coming of a new era, for the end of the Age of Chaos and the coming of the Just King (Ratu Adil). These millenarian dreams were to find their repository in Prince Diponegoro, over whose parents' graves in Tagalareja the Dutch were planning to build a road.

Prince Diponegoro was versed in Islamic teaching and Javanese mysticism, and lived in peasant communities rather than in the royal courts. He was able to tap into both Javanese elite and grassroots discontent, formulating the revolt in religious and traditional terms familiar to the population. Diponegoro took on the title of Ratu Adil, mounting a prolonged five-year guerrilla war against the Dutch and Dutch-supported Javanese rulers. The Dutch were forced to bring in reinforcements from the Netherlands as well as recruit mercenaries from Sulawesi and Western Africa. Adopting an early form of counterinsurgency strategy, the Dutch eventually gained control of Central Java. Tricked into ceasefire negotiations, Diponegoro was arrested and exiled to Sulawesi. Some 7,000 Javanese and 8,000 Dutch soldiers lost their lives in the war, but the conflict directly or indirectly caused the death of about 200,000 civilians.

The Java War marked the end of Javanese elite resistance to Dutch colonialism, though some argue that reverting to a more cultural role was in itself a kind of spiritual resistance against Dutch colonial rule. Localized grassroots peasant revolts persisted in Java, as elsewhere in the Dutch East Indies, throughout the rest of the colonial era, often with a millenarian or otherwise religious tinge, but triggered by economic and social hardship. These, like the short-lived revolt in Ciomas, West Java, in 1886, were usually crushed quickly and forcefully by colonial forces.

Following the end of the Padri and Java Wars, most revolts against Dutch rule – for example, the Banjarmasin War in southern Kalimantan – remained local and small scale, with the exception of the Aceh War and the sustained Dutch efforts to conquer Bali.

Aceh War (1873–1904)

The next major uprising against Dutch rule was the Aceh War, beginning in 1873 and lasting over thirty years until 1904. Acehnese independence had been de facto recognized by the Anglo-Dutch Treaty of 1814, but rescinded following the purchase of the Dutch Gold Coast Colony by Great Britain in 1871. The initial Dutch assault on the Sultanate of Aceh was officially triggered by their fears that Aceh might align with France, Turkey, or the United States to ensure its independence.

The initial Dutch expedition under Major General Köhler was quickly defeated by the Acehnese troops and Köhler was killed in what was the most humiliating defeat of Dutch forces in a colonial war until that date. A second, far larger expedition in 1874 managed to occupy the Sultan's palace and a thin strip of land. Intermittent guerrilla warfare continued for another six years or so, with the Dutch controlling the capital city of Banda Aceh and other settlements and the Acehnese forces the countryside. In 1880 the Dutch colonial government declared the war's end.

Hostilities flared again in 1883 after Acehnese insurgents captured and held hostage British sailors. Dutch and British forces mounted an offensive against Acehnese forces and the sailors were released for ransom. Dutch forces continued their military campaign with limited success. A Dutch breakthrough in the guerrilla war seemed closer when a local leader, Teuku Umar, agreed to join the Dutch forces in return for weapons, money, and opium. But in 1896 the newly appointed “chief warlord” turned against the Dutch once his troops had been trained and equipped. Following the death of Teuku Umar in battle in 1899, the struggle was continued by his widow, Cut Nyak Dien, until 1905.

Dutch tactics changed when Major J. B. van Heutsz (who became governor of Aceh in 1898) began using an early form of a “hearts and minds” strategy. The Dutch embarked on a strategy of targeted cooptation of the traditional aristocracy (ulee balang) while marginalizing the religious ulama. The social strategy was accompanied by brutal military campaigns against the Acehnese. Colonel van Daalen killed some 2,900 Acehnese, including 1,150 women and children, while losing 26 Dutch soldiers.

The Dutch officially completed the conquest of Aceh in 1904, killing some 500,000 to 1 million people. But in the Acehnese Highlands, intermittent small-scale guerrilla attacks continued for another decade. The Aceh War laid the seeds for future attempts at regaining independence in the twentieth and early twenty-first centuries against the Republic of Indonesia.

Conquest of Lombok and Bali (1894–1906)

Though the first European ships had landed on Bali in the late 1500s and initial Dutch bases established in the 1840s, the Hindu island remained effectively outside of Dutch control. While the Aceh War continued, Dutch colonial forces also launched several attempts to gain control of Bali and the neighboring island of Lombok, which was under Balinese rule. Dutch troops landed in Lombok in 1894 to “liberate” the Sasak population, and having defeated the Balinese forces in 1895 the remaining members of the ruling class committed ritual suicide (puputan). Expeditions to conquer Bali continued until 1906, when Dutch forces finally conquered Badung and Klungkung. In both cases the Balinese rulers along with several hundred loyalists committed puputan; in addition, scores of Balinese civilians were massacred by Dutch forces.

The Dutch East Indies in 1900

After nearly 400 years of European colonial presence in the Indonesian archipelago, by the early twentieth century they could only claim to have little more than nominal control of the territories. Conquest came at a heavy price, especially once the imperial powers began attempting to impose a colonial state system rather than relying on coopting local elites. Resistance against European expansion took three forms: on the lower-intensity end of the scale were individual riots and uprisings, often sparked by local concerns and/or millenarian and religious influences. The Padri and Java Wars were more serious and sustained uprisings, evolving into guerrilla wars, aimed at reducing Dutch influence but not necessarily being fully-fledged, anti-colonial, protonationalist uprisings. The third category of colonial war engaged by the Dutch was essentially international wars against extant states; preliminary campaigns against the Majapahit kingdom or the decades-long attempts to forcibly subdue Aceh and Bali. Aceh, especially, was for all intents and purposes already de facto an independent state in the modern sense of the word when the Dutch military campaign was commenced.

The excesses of the cultivation system and the socioeconomic upheavals caused by the plantation system and limited industrialization, turning peasants into more mobile wage laborers, began radicalizing the population as a whole. The discontent at the living and working conditions led to numerous small-scale peasant revolts and strikes, especially in those parts of the archipelago most impacted by the Dutch colonial system, i.e., Sumatra and Java. Unrest continued also in other parts of the archipelago, for example in Western Timor or Lombok, leading to punitive operations by the Dutch colonial forces and their locally recruited mercenaries. Several areas, most notably Aceh and Bali, held out against the Dutch colonizers into the first years of the twentieth century. In other areas, especially in Papua, the eastern islands of the archipelago, and in parts of Kalimantan, Dutch colonial presence was nominal at best.

Concomitantly, the increased access to secondary and tertiary schools, though highly restricted, created educated elites imbued with revolutionary ideas such as nationalism and communism, often imported by Indonesian intellectuals studying in the Dutch metropole. The third important revolutionary ideology in Indonesia – reformist, political Islam – also began making headway in the Indonesian archipelago, much as in other parts of the Islamic world. A further tool which the Dutch unwittingly gave to the upcoming political elite was that of a common language, Indonesian, a Malay-based Creole language lingua franca which later evolved into modern-day Indonesian. The survival of a common language provided a foundation upon which a community could be imagined by numerous ethnicities of the archipelago and a practical tool for communicating in a territory with hundreds if not thousands of indigenous languages.

Indonesian pro-democracy protests

Max Lane

With the rise of the Suharto military regime at the end of the Indonesian revolution new policies were enacted to further the suppression of the left. Once the immediate threat of social revolution had been dealt with, the new counter-revolutionary government began a political restructuring aimed at ending any form of open mobilization politics. A ban on villagers participating in any party activity at all – except voting at election time – was central to institutionalizing political passivity. The village people, who formed the overwhelming majority of the population in 1965–75, were simply to work, produce, and have no political engagement.

After a national revolutionary struggle, lasting nearly 60 years, Indonesia entered a new era of mass counter-revolutionary violence. Suharto's New Order deployed a process of depoliticizing through a territorial command system of the armed forces. Special national coordinating bodies, based in armed forces headquarters, were established to coordinate this system of political management. The first was called Command for the Restoration of Stability and Order (Kopkamtib), later slightly restructured and renamed the Body for Coordination of National Stability (Bakorstannas). Military command posts existed at almost every level of society, with military personnel posted to all villages. This structure ensured that the ban on political party activity in the villages was strictly implemented.

Some parties were allowed to continue to open offices at the district town level and in larger towns. The New Order decided that the counter-revolutionary movement needed these parties – nine in all – to be further de-politicized. The Islamic parties were forced to fuse into one party to be called the United Development Party (Partai Persatuan Pembangunan, PPP). The non-Islamic parties, including the now thoroughly purged Indonesian National Party (Partai Nasional Indonesia, PNI), were forced to merge into the Indonesian Democratic Party (Partai Demokrasi Indonesia, PDI). Both the PPP and PDI were also subject to permanent intervention by the government in the selection of their leaderships. The regime's own party, Golkar, made up the third party that was allowed to participate in elections.

The political restraints on these outside parties included a limit on campaigning to a ten-day period before the four-yearly elections, and an opportunity to hold rallies and marches on only three out of the ten days. Not surprisingly, under these conditions, when elections did occur, the PDI and PPP could never match Golkar, which had massive funds and a de facto presence in the villages. The regime declared a policy of monoloyalitas for all civil servants, right down to the village head and his staff. They all had to be active members of Golkar.

After 1972, organizations of workers, peasant farmers, fisher people, youth, civil servants, and civil servants' wives were established. All were affiliated to Golkar, and considered to represent key "functional groups." They were consistently used throughout the New Order period to stifle genuine unionization. When internal rumblings from within these organizations occurred, in an attempt to offer genuine representation, they were immediately suppressed. By this means, the majority of Indonesians were removed from all political involvement in order to leave them more time to work and produce.

In the world of ideas Suharto's regime realized that terror and suppression would not be enough. Those key institutions which could propagate left-wing ideas had been destroyed. The remaining threat came from the national revolution itself, that is, from its legacy. Memory of the national revolution had to be erased from the popular consciousness. Given that the very existence of Indonesia, even conceptually, was a direct product of the revolutionary process, the institutions of media, arts, culture, and education were put under the control of the state. The country's most prestigious university, the University of Indonesia, became the location for joint seminars with the armed forces to map out the country's future. The nation's left cultural organizations were banned and writers and artists were jailed and then exiled to Buru Island.

In this process of "Guided Democracy" all of the writings of former President Sukarno and other leaders of the Indonesian Communist Party (PKI) and intellectuals were banned and removed from bookshops and libraries. However, the wiping of the memory of the previous 60 years of history also required a more systematic approach. The New Order began a total rewriting of Indonesian history to be propagated in schools, universities, and through the mass media. New textbooks were written for all levels of schooling and a feature film was produced that depicted the New Order's version of politics under Sukarno, designating it as an "abortive communist coup." This film was compulsory viewing in schools throughout Indonesia for almost two decades. For many, it is almost as if Indonesian history began some time in the 1980s, as the systematic and unchallenged falsification of history through the education system virtually eliminated any memory in the popular consciousness of the national revolutionary process that occurred before 1965.

It took almost 30 years – until the late 1980s – for a movement to revive that could challenge this powerful coalition, with so many resources and with a monopoly on the means of violence. The pro-democracy campaign in Indonesia included the Petition of Fifty, a group comprising former leaders of traditional non-communist political parties, retired democratic-minded military figures, intellectuals, and former student activists. This group consistently issued statements demanding democratic reforms. In the 1980s they were harassed and sometimes jailed on various trumped-up charges. Another group was the Forum Demokrasi (FODEM), a coalition of Muslim and secular liberal democrats, mainly intellectuals, who advocated democratic reform. A third was a group of organized students who formed the Pijar Foundation and the Indonesian Students' Action Front (FAMI). One Pijar member, Beathor Suryadi, served a four-year sentence for distributing political leaflets, while an additional 21 were put on trial for anti-government protests. The Indonesian Legal Aid Foundation (YLBHI) was a long-term public advocate and courtroom defender of civil liberties.

During this time, a new important development was the emergence of committees in solidarity with particular groups of workers and peasants. The most prominent of these was a campaign in solidarity with peasants being forced off their land, with minimal compensation, to make way for a World Bank project in the Kedung Ombo region of Central Java. A series of public protest actions in Java and Jakarta brought the case to national attention, only to be suppressed after two years by President Suharto who declared the Kedung Ombo area to be a base for communist activity.

This new generation had studied and developed a class analysis of politics and began to look around the region for other experiences of struggle. A few went to the Philippines and spent time with anti-dictatorship movements fighting to overthrow President Ferdinand Marcos. The Indonesian Students in Solidarity with Democracy (SMID), organized in 1990, subsequently formed a political party made up of workers, peasants, and students. The People's Democratic Association (Persatuan Rakyat Demokratik) was formed in 1994 by SMID students and became the People's Democratic Party (PRD) in 1996. In its founding declaration, the PRD called for a restoration of full democratic rights and freedoms, civilian rule, and the redistribution of the wealth of society to the poor. The PRD declaration also goes much further than any previous pro-democracy group in Indonesia in the 1970s and 1980s by publicly calling for the restoration of full civil rights to the tens of thousands of former communist and nationalist political prisoners. It also called for a peaceful resolution in East Timor, without military intervention and recognizing the human and democratic rights of the East Timorese nation.

Between 1990 and 1996, these students organized a series of joint student-worker and student-peasant actions. The aim of these actions was to break the floating-mass political culture where mass action and mobilization had become taboo. Some of these actions in the early 1990s were quite extensive, involving thousands of workers or farmers, but they were still locally based or concentrated on local issues. In 1992 the movement brought out thousands of people in Central Java waving white election boycott flags in local elections, and there was a large demonstration at Gajah Mada University against the undemocratic administration of the elections. In 1993, 15,000 turned out in protest against new traffic regulations which had enormous potential for expanding police corruption and increasing the burden on the public transport system, especially the sector servicing the poor. In the same year, the threat of a transport strike in Jakarta eventually forced the government to back down, and additional protests in Yogyakarta against the corrupt multi-million-dollar state lottery, involving Suharto's children, were followed up with mass actions held outside the presidential office in Jakarta, forcing the abolition of the lottery. In 1994, 13,000 workers, mainly women, demonstrated in Solo against the minister of labor Abdul Latief, and another 25,000 in the major city of Medan, North Sumatra, and six days of riots ensued after a stand-off with the military.

The strategy of concentrating on the immediate demands of workers and farmers or on issues of popular concern such as the state lottery or traffic regulations, rather than the issue, for example, of presidential succession or anti-party laws, enabled these protests to continue for a considerable period of time while obtaining sympathetic press coverage and a minimum of harassment. As these protests increased they also began to have a major impact on the general political atmosphere, with issues such as land, wages, trade union rights and so on becoming more and more frequently discussed in the media. This systematic organization of actions helped generate a very large number of other spontaneous actions modeled on detailed, hour-by-hour chronologies of the actions, which were then circulated around the country in bulletins, newsletters, and sometimes via email. With amazing speed, protest mobilizations – aksi as they were called – spread around the country. While these actions did not develop into a political movement of their own, in 1995 they had radicalized the political atmosphere, re-legitimizing in the popular mind an old form of struggle associated with the national revolution.

Indonesian protests against Suharto dictatorship

Max Lane

In 1965, Indonesia's largest student organizations were those affiliated to the leftist Indonesian Communist Party (Partai Komunis Indonesia, PKI) and Indonesian National Party (Partai Nasional Indonesia, PNI), which were suppressed by the new military dictatorship. This left the field to the Islamic Students' Association (HMI), ideologically aligned with Masyumi and "non-political" groups, which forged an alliance in late 1965 as the Indonesian Students' Action Front (KAMI), which, backed by the army, campaigned against Sukarno and the PKI.

It was the next generation of students who turned against the Suharto government, which had consolidated itself by 1967 when Suharto became acting president. There were small protests in 1971 and 1972, and the first clearly anti-Suharto student newspaper, Sendi, was published, until banned a few months later.

In 1973, student protest began again but on a larger scale, organizing through student councils on major Indonesian university campuses. Students protested against corruption, abuse of power, rapidly expanding foreign debt, and foreign investor domination of the economy. The 1973 protests reached a climax in major demonstrations in January 1974 during a visit to Jakarta by Japanese Prime Minister Tanaka, and hundreds of students and academics were arrested. Three of them – Hariman Siregar, chairperson of the University of Indonesia student council, Aini Chalid, a brilliant student activist from the University of Gajah Mada in Central Java, and Syahrir, an economics lecturer – were put on trial and sentenced to several years' imprisonment.

The second wave of student protests began in 1978 and was suppressed, resulting in the conviction and imprisonment of several central leaders. In response, all campus political activity was banned and student councils were abolished, and no significant student mobilizations appeared for the next ten years. In 1978, there was a wave of factory strikes among workers in new industries, but the unrest did not converge into a mass workers' movement. These single workplace strikes, mainly over wages and conditions, never congealed into a sustained movement, but forced the government to suppress the labor sector more systematically, including further developing the state-controlled trade union. No independent labor union activity was permitted by the Indonesian military dictatorship.

In 1979, after having achieved a high level of political "stability" following the suppression of the student sector, and under pressure from international public opinion and the US administration of President Carter, Suharto released 14,000 political prisoners, including left Sukarnoists and communists. Those released included writer, Pramoedya Ananta Toer; publisher, Hasyim Rachman; and journalist, Joesoef Isak. In open defiance of a law banning former political prisoners from the publishing sector, the resistance formed a publishing company, Hasta Mitra. In 1981, they began publishing a series of novels that had been written by Toer while in prison. This Earth of Mankind was set in Java at the beginning of the twentieth century and told the story of the personal struggle of a Javanese woman who had been taken as a concubine by a Dutch businessman, her relationship with a young Javanese man who married her daughter, and their fight against Dutch colonialism and racism. The book was an immediate critical and popular success throughout Indonesia. Toer and the publishers were summoned to see Suharto's vice-president, Adam Malik, a radical in his youth, who also praised the book, calling for the entire nation's youth to read it.

Several months later, newspapers claimed that the book was communist propaganda, and it was banned for spreading Marxism-Leninism under a 1967 law banning the ideology by the Suharto-controlled parliament. As each book in the series was published, it was soon after banned. Hasta Mitra fought the bans with public statements and continued to publish books until it was no longer financially possible. Between 1981 and 1987 several people went to jail because of their association with the books. Joesoef Isak went back to jail for three months. Two university students and a university employee were arrested, tried, and jailed in Central Java for selling and discussing the books at a seminar. Joesoef Isak's son was expelled from the University of Indonesia for inviting Toer to speak on campus.

The books had a profound, almost revolutionary effect on the course of political developments. Students began talking to former political prisoners about the 1960s, as well as researching the early history of the left from the 1920s. Many studied ideas about politics, journalism, mass organizations, and the secret police, which were discussed in the novels that followed This Earth of Mankind. These books related stories about the founding of the first mass organization that fought the Dutch, the Sarekat Dagang Islam (SD), or Islamic traders' union. The refusal to give in by Hasta Mitra served as a symbol of resistance among these students. These activists played the leading role in building the movement that succeeded in bringing about the fall of Suharto in 1998.

From 1990 to 1995 cracks had started to appear in the dictatorship's political system. It began when the Indonesian Democratic Party (PDI) named Megawati Sukarnoputri, a daughter of former President Sukarno, as chairperson. Despite 30 years of negative propaganda against her father, his name continued to resonate positively among a significant section of the masses. Suharto moved to dislodge Megawati from her position, but her stubborn refusal turned her into a symbol of popular opposition. In 1996, Suharto moved to withdraw official recognition of Megawati as PDI leader, instead recognizing a rival leadership that had held its own congress with government support. Megawati and her leadership refused to recognize the government's actions and vacate PDI offices.

The PDI took advantage of this opportunity by throwing its support behind the newly established People's Democratic Party (PRD), along with other student protest groups, organizing a mass rally in central Jakarta. A few weeks later, armed thugs attacked the PDI office, killing and injuring several supporters of Megawati. News of the attack sparked more rallies and protests, and mass insurrections spread through Jakarta, causing millions of dollars of damage to public and private property.

The government accused the PRD of provoking the unrest, alleging it was communist, and ordered the arrest of all members. Eventually, the PRD's chairperson, Budiman Sujatmiko, was arrested. Several key members of PRD's leadership, including Danial Indrakusuma, Web Warouw and Agus Jabo Prijono, and Andi Arief, escaped and went underground. The party continued organizing using various front organizations to hold protest actions. Party members also participated in activities initiated by other protest groups.

One of the party's most important interventions was the mass distribution of leaflets and anti-government protests during the May 1997 general elections. Hundreds of thousands of people joined in marches and rallies on the streets of Jakarta. The Islamic United Development Party (PPP) was shocked and cancelled its own rallies and marches. The protests called for a Mega-

Bintang alliance to oust Suharto. Mega stood for Megawati and "Bintang," or "star," referred to the Islamic political constituency. It was a huge spontaneous demand for a united campaign to oust Suharto. When marches and rallies were met by police or army barricades, they tore down the barricades and burned police stations. Suharto's Golkar party easily "won" the elections, even as its electoral offices in some regions were attacked and burned down by angry masses charging the government with vote rigging. The government's inability to stem these huge and militant outbursts signaled an end to Suharto's reign of power.

In August and September 1997, after the Asian financial collapse, militant student mobilizations spread throughout the country, in virtually every provincial capital, finally hitting Jakarta in early 1998. Physical clashes between students and the army occurred more frequently, with students often fighting back, even detaining security officers. The protests concentrated on attacking the corruption and cronyism surrounding the government, embodied in more detailed exposés of the massive wealth of the Suharto family.

As student protests spread, additional mobilizations were carried out by other sections of society. Activist organizations such as Solidaritas Perempuan held their own protest events, including street protests. After the economic crisis, food prices increased, and housewives also began mobilizing. One organization, Suara Ibu Peduli (The Voice of Concerned Mothers) became particularly prominent. Women factory workers had always been a majority section of the most militant participants in factory strikes, providing the backbone of new union formations, such as the Indonesian Center for Labor Struggles (PPBI). Female students, housewives, and poor urban women started organizing, strengthening the authority of the protest movement as a movement increasingly representing the whole of society.

In March 1998 the People's Consultative Assembly (MPR) reelected Suharto, who then proceeded to appoint a cabinet that was more nepotistic than any previously selected. He even appointed one of his daughters as a minister. The street protests around the country became larger and more frequent, with the PRD calling for different committees of protest to form a People's Committee.

More moderate forces called on the leaders of the opposition, which included mainstream figures who had joined the anti-Suharto movement, to form a presidium as a collective that could take over power from Suharto. As these calls started to gain momentum, central figures in Suharto's Golkar began to call for him to resign, wanting to pre-empt any further radicalization. In May, the students, organized in a cross-campus coalition involving at least 14 major campuses, called for a mass student mobilization in central Jakarta. However, moderate leaders, afraid of the radicalization, appeared on television calling for it to be canceled, claiming that the army would suppress it violently.

Students mobilized to occupy the parliament grounds instead which resulted in more Suharto supporters abandoning him. On May 23 Suharto appeared on national television and resigned. His vice-president B. J. Habibie became president. The PRD and other groups had also been able to popularize the demand that the army end all political involvement. Mobilizations around this demand continued growing in size and militancy as an "Extraordinary Session" of the MPR approached in November. Again a radicalization process developed as student leaders demanded that the three mainstream opposition leaders – Megawati, Amien Rais, of the urban Muslim constituency, and Abdurrahman Wahid, of the rural Muslim constituency – form a presidium and demand that Habibie resign and hand power to them. The three leaders of the liberal and excluded bourgeoisie declined to accede to the students' demands. When word spread, the student-led mobilizations collapsed.

Indonesian revolution and counterrevolution

Max Lane

The fundamental process of forging an Indonesia emerged in the twentieth century with the emergence of a nationalist movement that created a state identity through revolution. The word Indonesia first came into general circulation in the 1920s. It was first introduced by a British naturalist in the nineteenth century, based on the Latin Indus for “India” and the Greek nesos for “island.” In this respect, the creation of Indonesia was a revolution in itself as an absolutely new entity was created, building on some minimal elements of the previous eras of history – in particular the interchange of goods and ideas between the islands – but more generally the processes of anti-colonial revolution.

The processes that began at the start of the twentieth century, and are still unfolding today, required in their first phase the complete overturning of the colonial social and political system, the expulsion of the Dutch capitalist class as the ruling class in Indonesia, and, at the same time, the creation of a new entity: the Indonesian nation. It was a nation-in-formation that struggled for its independence during the first decades of the twentieth century. And it was a nation-in-formation that continued that struggle after independence attempting to liberate itself from the constraints of neocolonialism. Even today, after the end of 35 years of counterrevolution, the nation-in-formation still faces the necessity of an anti-neocolonial revolution.

By the end of the nineteenth century, Dutch colonial power and commercial interests had been dominant in the archipelago for at least 300 years. In many areas of the archipelago, the Dutch did not rule directly but through their military presence and commercial clout. The Dutch political power in the main cities of Batavia (Jakarta) and Surabaya provided overwhelming dominance over political, economic, and even social life throughout the archipelago. The first indications that opposition to Dutch colonialism was transforming itself beyond local resistance or efforts to restore the previous social order into an arch that might lead to a national revolution were reflected in the emergence of foreign travelers returning with a modern perspective on the question of political equality.

The most outstanding example of Indonesian nationalist currents is found in the writings of the young Javanese woman Kartini (1879–1904), who lived in central Java and was the daughter of a bupati, a low-level aristocrat working in the Dutch administration. Kartini was raised in the environment dominated by the Dutch aristocracy. At the age of 12 she went into seclusion, as did all young women upon reaching puberty until their parents arranged marriage for them.

Kartini began corresponding with Dutch feminists, and later socialists, revealing a new consciousness in the Netherlands Indies. The native peoples soon became aware that they were suffering systematic discrimination at the hands of Dutch colonial powers. Kartini viewed this as a question of racial equality. In collaboration with her sisters, Kartini established a school to provide general and vocational education to young women in the hope of freeing them from the necessity of marriage. Kartini wrote the Dutch colonial authorities to petition that women have greater access to education.

Forced into a polygamous marriage, in 1904 Kartini died in childbirth. But her legacy lived on in the following years as young women, influenced by Kartini’s philosophy, established similar schools. Kartini’s writings, published posthumously, revolutionized thinking among young educated people in the archipelago. While the idea of an Indonesian nation-state had not yet emerged, the necessity of opposing a foreign power that sanctioned inequality was on the agenda. Kartini’s writing stressed that a colonial power did not have the right to prevent a people from modernizing and advancing, a form of moral opposition markedly different from previous forms of resistance against Dutch colonial rule, serving as a turning point in the revolutionary process, at the sociological level, which eventually led to the creation of the Indonesian nation.

Over the centuries, the Malay language was used as the lingua franca to facilitate the exchange of ideas and goods among the islands. Used primarily in trade, Malay was a language of contracts and bargaining in the marketplace. However, at the turn of the twentieth century, commercial life in the urban centers of the archipelago advanced so far as to support publication of a number of Malay-language vernacular newspapers and periodicals. Initially the newspapers, owned mostly by Chinese merchants, were used for advertising. Malay-speaking Chinese emerged as popular writers of short stories and novels, and Malay gradually was used as a language of contract and price as well as a means of discussing and relating conditions of modern urban life. In the early twentieth century, Malay was transforming into the national language of Indonesia, and subsequently the vernacular of a national revolution.

The newspaper Medan Priyayi, founded in 1907 by Tirta Ahdisuryo (1880–1918), was an early example of the importance of Malay as a means of communication in the archipelago. Tirta, who received a privileged Dutch high school education and medical college training, used the newspaper to expose corruption in the Dutch administration and campaign against injustices under the slogan “voice of the governed.” While the concept of Indonesia was not yet developed, a deeply felt common interest of all those governed had developed extensively in major urban centers throughout Indonesia.

The colonial courts and authorities sought to discipline Tirta for his exposés on the corruption of the Dutch administration. Tirta was among the first of his generation to recognize the importance of organization based on a common political outlook and a modern political structure. If Kartini had been the first to begin to transform ideas, Tirta was the first to understand the necessity of organizing and mobilizing the masses to improve conditions. His initial organizing effort was among the native bureaucracies who were members of the Sarekat Priyayi (Union of Priyayi), who were mostly descendants of aristocratic families (referred to as priyayi) employed under the Dutch. Owing to their exposure to western education, Tirta assumed that members of Sarekat Priyayi would gravitate to a more enlightened political outlook. However, the attempt at organizing the organization failed, due to the subservient mentality flowing from material dependence on the Dutch colonial power. Tirta later became a founding member of the Islamic traders’ union, the Sarekat Dagang Islam (SI), in 1911, which by 1912 became the first mass organization opposed to Dutch colonial rule.

Indonesian historian and writer Pramoedya Ananta Toer argued that Tirta formed the SI as he was searching to organize people who had independence, unlike those with a mentality of dependency that he found among the salaried workers of the Dutch colonial administration, many the descendants of a long-defeated aristocracy. As such, the SI recruited from diverse social and economic backgrounds – traders, peasants, coolies, religious teachers, among many others. Tirta was arrested and exiled shortly after the formation of the SI and died in Batavia soon after his return from exile. Pramoedya Ananta Toer and other historians suspect Tirta may have been murdered on the orders of the Dutch colonial authority. A few years after its founding, the SI recruited several hundred thousand members among almost anyone who considered colonial rule unjust. The SI would eventually serve as the basis for the first mass communist party in Indonesia, the Indonesian Communist Party (PKI).

The first socialist organization, the Indies Social Democratic Organization (ISDV), was founded in 1914 by four Dutch socialists, and as it expanded some members joined the SI, which was organizing more and more protest actions against the policies of the colonial government. Concomitantly, important ideological disputes were developing inside the SI, particularly over opposition to capitalism. Semaun, the son of a low-ranking railway worker, would emerge as the leader of the PKI. Semaun joined the SI at the age of 15, and by 1917, during the Russian Revolution, became leader of an SI branch in Semarang, one of Java’s busiest urban centers. In 1923, Semaun was arrested, exiled, and spent the rest of his life in the Soviet Union.

From 1920 to 1926 the SI engaged in mass organizing of “non-dependent” sectors of society – radicalizing the consciousness of coolies, workers, peasants, and traders and laying the ground for deeper trade union radicalism. Due to a lack of industry, the size of Indonesia’s working class was small, and most organizing took place in small sugar mills, mines, and rail and tram sectors. Following Semaun’s arrest for leading a large rail worker strike, physical attacks on Dutch officials increased, including an assassination attempt on the Dutch governor-general. Radical ideas, strikes, and large public meetings emerged as the major forms of expression of the new Indonesian political culture. This period, known the pergerakan, conveys a sense that all is in motion.

By 1927 the PKI launched an armed insurrection against the Dutch colonial state. The rebellion was quickly crushed: 18,000 people were arrested and 4,800 detained. The Dutch sent 1,308 of the detainees to a malaria-ridden prison camp, Boven Digul in Dutch western Papua, where many died, including the left-wing journalist and writer Marco Kartodikromo (ca. 1890–1932), who worked on Tirta Adhisuryo's publications. While the failure of the insurrection was an enormous blow to the movement, at the same time a new generation of young nationalists emerged, including the prominent future leader Sukarno. For Sukarno, the notion of equality was linked to the idea of Indonesia.

In September 1928, youth activists adopted an "Oath of Youth: One country, One people, One language: Indonesian." Sukarno became active by establishing the idea of merdeka – "freedom" or independence – but the question was how to achieve it. Mass organization and action, reflected in the growth of the SI and later the PKI and the trade unions, already demonstrated its enormous potential. However, the next wave of future nationalists saw the movement as divided and weak.

An article by Sukarno entitled "Nationalism, Islam, and Marxism" sought to elaborate a basis of unity among adherents of the three "isms" that was consistent with the ideals of ending inequality and oppression. His method was to facilitate greater unity within the nationalist movement by emphasizing opposition to capitalist economic exploitation and social inequality. Sukarno went on to establish the Indonesian National Party (PNI), which grew rapidly as he traveled the country explaining his ideas at large public meetings, often in cinemas. He insisted the party's newspaper be distributed to all those present at meetings, and it was not long before the Dutch grew suspicious of the PNI. In 1930, they arrested and tried Sukarno, who spent the next ten years in prison or exile. In 1933 the Dutch, aware of the threat of the independence movement, suppressed all open nationalist political activity.

The revolutionary process in Indonesia went through a unique and extraordinary experience after 1942. The socioeconomic transformation of society under colonial capitalism was producing some of the material elements required for the emergence of a nation. The political struggle against colonialism was forging a new national culture, standing in opposition to the hegemony of "feudal" and colonial despotism. Then came Japanese occupation soon after Japan entered World War II, during which most of the advanced sector of the colonial economy – plantations, mines, railways – as well as some agriculture were destroyed. The whole Indonesian economy turned to the immediate economic needs of the Japanese war effort rather than supporting Europe. By war's end, tens of thousands of Indonesians were forcibly recruited as slave labor for Japanese war projects in Indochina. The military administration became increasingly brutal and repressive as the war effort pressed on.

The Japanese occupation introduced an entirely new set of colonial features, turning those living under Dutch rule upside down. The Japanese promised eventual independence and released all nationalist leaders from prison, with the exception of known communist activists who were hunted down, jailed, or killed. Indonesian became the official working language, and due to the small number of Japanese who could speak Indonesian, large numbers of Indonesians took positions formerly occupied by the Dutch in the civil service. The Japanese also began training a people's militia, involving thousands of young people. The Dutch had previously provided military training to Indonesians serving in the Dutch colonial army, but the Japanese were training Indonesians to aim their rifles at Europeans, institutionalizing a psychological revolution among the youth.

The Japanese released nationalist leaders from prison who were willing to support the war effort, permitting them to travel and speak to large mass gatherings and on the radio. Sukarno and others, including the conservative nationalist Mohammad Hatta, took the Japanese offer. Some, such as social democrat intellectual Sutan Syahrir, refused to cooperate with the Japanese but was permitted to hold discussions in his house in Jakarta as long as he did not engage in anti-Japanese activities. Sukarno, a gifted orator, traveled the country agitating for national independence, often sliding around Japanese censorship by alluding to local stories and anecdotes.

During 1945, as the Japanese suffered more defeats in the war, they made more concessions to the nationalists, allowing the formation of a committee to prepare for independence. However, political repression remained severe. While nationalist leaders had the right to speak and express their views, organizing was banned. But, after the US dropped atomic bombs on Hiroshima and Nagasaki, underground youth groups in Batavia called on Sukarno and Hatta to declare independence. During negotiations, the two leaders were kidnapped by youths who sought to pressure them to declare independence immediately. Two days later, after the official surrender of the Japanese, on August 17, 1945, Sukarno and Hatta wrote a short statement proclaiming Indonesian independence on the steps of a suburban house in Jakarta. Soon after, the committee to prepare Indonesia constituted itself as a government, electing Sukarno and Hatta as president and vice-president. Indonesian nationalists defied the Allied powers, who instructed the Japanese to continue to police the country and await the arrival of Allied armies who would eventually hand the colony back to the Dutch colonial authorities. The demand represented further complications of dominance between the new nation and its former colonizer, and only after a four-year guerilla war did the new nation of Indonesia negotiate an agreement in which the Dutch finally recognized independence in 1949.

In 1949, national liberation was achieved to the extent that the Indonesian nation was recognized as independent with equal formal status with other nations. Indonesia was admitted into the United Nations in 1951. The agreement the Hatta government negotiated with the Netherlands left the Indonesian economy burdened by a massive foreign debt, returning almost all of what little modern sector there was to Dutch ownership and control.

As soon as the guerilla war ended and Dutch forces withdrew, nationalist political struggle reorganized for operation within a multiparty parliamentary system, a cabinet government, and a social system that continued to legally recognize private property through all spheres of production. Within this framework, class divisions were asserted and political parties polarized into two blocs: the Islamic MASYUMI Party, based in towns of West Java and in Sumatra, and the Islamic Nahdatul Ulama, based in the villages of Java. The framework dominated government in one combination or another until 1965, when the revolution was considered over.

The party system supported the country's integration into the world economy, accepting the conditions demanded by the western states with whom it aligned in global politics and opposing efforts to introduce major redistributive policies, especially land ownership. It supported policies to facilitate the transformation of holders of bureaucratic positions into a new business class, through a corrupt system of distribution of business licenses, monopolies, and other privileges. And it opposed the use of mass mobilization in politics, which it claimed was an obstacle to rational administration, trying to channel all political energies into short-lived election campaigns.

MASYUMI was allied with both the PNI, based in towns and villages, and the Indonesian Socialist Party (PSI), based mainly among a small section of the intelligentsia. These parties dominated cabinets from 1948 until 1960 and remained influential between 1960 and 1965 in partnership with the army. All these parties shared the same general political outlook and supported the same kind of economic strategy for the country. The differences between them did not reflect fundamental policy issues but cultural and religious cleavages, usually related to the history and sociology of dissimilar regions of the archipelago.

The leaderships of the MASYUMI, PNI, and PSI were overwhelmingly drawn from the urban and village bourgeoisie, including rural landowners. They recruited their mass following through appeals to religious and cultural ideas and symbols. They were also built upon complicated conglomerations of patron-client relations that linked landowners and small business families to their dependent workforces and communities, sometimes organized directly at the site of work, sometimes through mosques and village administrations and, as time went on, through the parties and their myriad affiliated organizations.

The other bloc comprised the PKI and affiliated organizations, together with a layer of left-leaning intellectuals. The PKI remained the permanent opposition for the post-independence political elite. During 1949–59, Sukarno had minimal power, due to constitutional constraints and the fact that he led no political party. The PKI, reestablished in 1950 and rebuilt under the influence of the ideas of the Soviet and Maoist leadership, made no concessions to Sukarno's appeal to leftist interpretations of Islam. The philosophy and vocabulary of the PKI were very much within the orthodoxy of 1950s mainstream communist parties. While the majority of the PNI leadership supported Sukarno's emphasis on nation-building and national unity, some were hostile to his Marxist interpretation of colonialism and imperialism. Therefore, as president, Sukarno was locked into the same mode of political practice as during the Japanese occupation.

Complicating factors for Sukarno were the immediate questions considered the unfinished business of the revolution: remaining colonial domination of western Papua, the foreign debt to the Netherlands, and the continuing ownership of most of the profitable sectors of the economy by Dutch capital. The most contentious issue with the broadest support was for the liberation of western Papua and its integration into Indonesia. A broad front organization was established demanding that the Dutch leave Papua. The PKI and the PNI, and their affiliated mass organizations, were the most active in this campaign. While the main target was the liberation of Papua, the campaign could not but provide a platform for agitation around the demand for the repudiation of the foreign debt to Holland. Mass campaigning on the Papuan issue and against the continuation of the Dutch neocolonial presence escalated from the early 1950s onwards.

Anti-colonial and anti-imperialist sentiments were further consolidated and deepened through Indonesia's hosting of the 1955 Asia–Africa Conference in Bandung. The conference was attended by Third World leaders from around the world, including Hô Chi Minh, Chou Enlai, Gamal Abdel Nasser, and Jawaharlal Nehru. The 1955 Bandung conference is considered to have helped initiate the non-aligned movement. Indonesia had an important material basis for the growing support for these campaigns, specifically growing poverty in the post-independent state. The undeveloped economy was viewed as a consequence of the Dutch colonial economy of extraction.

While liberation of Papua was a central goal, repudiation of foreign debt and nationalization of Dutch enterprises were more pressing demands. Through 1956 and 1957 the strength of the trade unions enabled the first radical and concrete steps against the Dutch neocolonial presence by occupying Dutch-owned enterprises. This allowed parliament to pass legislation to nationalize the enterprises in order to repudiate the remaining foreign debt to the Netherlands. During 1950–7, the Indonesian economy stabilized as Dutch capital and technical expertise returned and resumed some steady growth. By 1958, Indonesia had a state-controlled modern sector and only a very small foreign debt. This modern sector was, however, extremely underdeveloped relative to the size of the country.

When Indonesia became independent, it had a domestic bourgeoisie but not a national bourgeoisie – small-scale capitalists operating parochially in local towns, cities, or regions with relatively few resources. The Dutch had not built a university system in the colony, so very few families had educated their children in post-secondary institutions. As such, intellectual, scientific, and cultural resources were minimal.

The ideological-political weaknesses of the domestic bourgeoisie – flowing from its general underdevelopment as a social class – left it few resources in suppressing radicalism on the left, opening the way for an increased political role of the army leadership. The military itself was dissatisfied and envious of the official leadership role of the civilian politicians and parties. The army made another enormous advance in the wake of the trade union occupations of the Dutch enterprises.

With martial law in operation throughout the country, the military was in a position to seize enterprises from workers in the name of the government, which later appointed many military officers as managers of the Dutch enterprises. With this step, the foundations for army officers to become the most likely candidates to succeed in becoming national-scale capitalists were laid, if not immediately, at least in the medium term. In the immediate term, there was the increasing strength of political radicalism and the PKI to contend with. By 1959 these series of developments had resulted in another change in the balance of forces between the two contending class blocs. There appeared to be a stalemate.

As early as 1956, strategic differences had emerged as President Sukarno increasingly became critical of the political parties. In 1956, Sukarno delivered a speech known as “Bury the political parties,” where he expressed his “dream” that all the party leaders would gather and decide to abolish the parties, replacing them with a single party or a single mass movement. There was little support for this idea from any quarter. Behind Sukarno's thinking was the idea that a way must be found to mobilize the energies of the population in a single state-building and development effort.

In the absence of any signs of a voluntary dissolution of the parties, Sukarno shifted emphasis to include all parties in decision-making processes of the state, including at the top level of government, the cabinet. In a 1957 speech,

Sukarno proposed the formation of a Gotong Rojong cabinet, a form of taking advantage of village practices of mutual assistance and cooperation in completing various projects. He proposed that all parties winning a specified electoral quotient be included in the cabinet. Sukarno also proposed that the cabinet be assisted by a National Council comprising representatives of the parties, of "functional groups" such as labor, peasants, and the intelligentsia, and which included armed forces heads and some ministers. The revolution was still not yet complete, and for that it had to head in the direction of building "Indonesian socialism."

The counter-position was most clearly articulated by Vice-President Hatta, who recognized the destructive impact of constant "political squabbles." The contradiction came to a head in July 1959, when Sukarno disbanded the Constituent Assembly and decreed that the 1945 Constitution replace the existing 1950 Constitution. Islamic and other right-wing parties consistently opposed the 1945 Constitution, a shorter, simpler document providing the president more room to maneuver in reordering governmental structures. But the key significance of this move was ending the constitutional deadlock.

From 1959 on, a massive campaign began, led by Sukarno, to win Indonesians over to the idea of actively supporting the move in a socialist direction. Sukarno sought to connect socialism, human liberation, and the goals of the Indonesian national revolution. As the left expanded in numbers, Sukarno's capability to press the government in a socialist direction advanced. Still, Sukarno could never appoint a cabinet with a strong left presence, meaning that most steps to move government in a radical direction were aimed at the imperialist presence in the country rather than at capitalist or landlord privilege.

In 1962, Sukarno's government rejected austerity proposals from a World Bank delegation visiting the country in the aftermath of an economic crisis precipitated by a fall in the world price of Indonesia's main export, rubber. The delegation proposed the imposition of fiscally severe proposals that would have rolled back social expenditures. At a rally in Jakarta, where the US ambassador was present, Sukarno made his famous remark: "Go to hell with your aid!" In August 1965, Sukarno announced plans to nationalize all foreign trade.

There seemed little doubt by the beginning of 1965 that elections would result in a majority for the left parties. The prospect of elections deepened fears in the military and its conservative political allies. Already several initiatives were under way to establish anti-Sukarno and anti-left political organizations, such as the Body in Support of Sukarnoism, Democracy League, and, in the cultural field, the Cultural Manifesto. These organizations were banned, often with the initiative of rival anti-communist elements in the government seeking to appear as members of the pro-Sukarno camp. Even in 1965, conservative and moderate forces, including army officers, held many cabinet posts.

However, apart from possible elections, other tensions created by increased radicalization stemmed from the fact that one of its key agents was actually head of state. The armed forces leadership began organizing more seriously to seize any opportunity or misstep by the PKI or Sukarno. They had already, some time earlier, begun the process of establishing what amounted to their own political party, although they did not call it a party, as they hankered for an end to open party activity. This organization was called the Joint Secretariat of Functional Groups (SEKBER GOLKAR), structured as a centralized federation of occupational groups. Backed by significant resources from the army, GOLKAR did not develop a large active membership.

On the early morning of October 1, 1965, pro-Sukarno military officers, led by the commander of the presidential guards, Colonel Untung, attempted to arrest seven senior generals. The soldiers and officers sent to detain the generals had no training, photos of the generals, or intelligence about their houses. Untung's forces occupied the main radio station and central square of Jakarta, announcing that officers plotting against President Sukarno were arrested. During the day, as the conspiracy was failing, all the other abducted generals, detained at an air force base, were killed.

By evening this action had collapsed; but one key general was not on the detention list – Major-General Suharto, who controlled the Strategic Reserve Command comprising very mobile troops. He moved quickly to disperse Untung's troops. By the following day, the army was in a position to blame the PKI for a coup attempt, setting off one of the largest killing sprees of the twentieth century. An estimated 500,000 supporters of the PKI and left-wing champions of Sukarno were killed and tens of thousands arrested.

All conspiracies are organized in secrecy, as were Colonel Untung's actions. The army claimed it was a conspiracy by the PKI. Since 1965, several other analyses have emerged to explain the events. Some argued that the so-called September 30 Movement was purely an internal army affair. Others say it was masterminded by General Suharto, who may have initially blessed Untung's conspiracy but later turned against him.

Many of those killed died horribly as part of a terror campaign – decapitated, disemboweled, dragged behind trucks, or otherwise cruelly slaughtered. Hundreds of thousands more were detained for between a few months to a year, often in unlisted safe houses. At least 12,000 were further detained for another 10 to 12 years. Tens of thousands were dismissed from their jobs, especially in the teaching service, civil service, and railways.

This terror, however, must be seen as aimed at more than the annihilation of the organized left, the PKI, and all other groups following Sukarno's left direction. This terror was aimed at ending the processes of the national revolution. It was meant to end the politics of pergerakan: all of the ideas and methods that had been an integral part of the Indonesian national revolution between 1909 and 1965. It is not difficult to understand why Suharto and the leadership of this counterrevolutionary offensive felt the need to annihilate these ideas and methods. In 1965 they faced an impending social revolution. More than half of the voting population actively mobilized behind demands that would completely undermine the privileged position of aspiring military businessmen and rural landowners. This movement for worker control of state enterprises, land reform, further nationalization of the economy, and deeper cooperation among non-aligned countries had developed as an extension of the national revolution itself, as an extension of the struggle to consolidate Indonesia as a stable and sovereign nation.

The counterrevolution launched by Suharto in October 1965 was a counterrevolution not only in the sense of being an act of massive suppression of the organizations of the left and of the social revolution, but also of the national revolution itself. The first part of this counterrevolution was perceived clearly by its perpetrators.

On this their cry was ganyang PKI! – crush the PKI! On the second aspect, they were probably blind to the destruction they were doing to the Indonesian national revolution, although the following decades were to show that they did indeed have only little conception of and commitment to a genuine development of an Indonesian nation.

The terror, murder, and massive arrests were the first step in ending open mobilization politics. The physical elimination and the psychological destruction of the movement itself, right down to the grassroots, was the first task. Suharto's purges were not purges aimed only at decapitating the leadership of the movement. Nor were they aimed at simply combining decapitation of the leadership and some modest "shock therapy" to demoralize and unbalance the rest of the movement. It went further than that. The violence was aimed at the class base of the movement itself. Factories with a reputation for militancy had their whole workforce slaughtered. Villages that had supported the left were annihilated. Of course, this policy was implemented unevenly, depending on the intensity of the local social conflict. However, the fundamental policy behind all the killings was to decapitate the leadership, eliminate the activist base, and terrorize the millions of sympathizers of the PKI, the left wing of the PNI, and all affiliated mass organizations – all of Sukarno's supporters.

The slaughter and terror were accompanied by policies of immediate suppression of the organizational left. While the new Suharto regime felt compelled to continue to refer to socialism and revolution in its rhetoric, Marxism, Leninism, and subsequently the writings of Sukarno were banned. The PKI and Sukarnoist left press was closed down. Papers with obvious organizational affiliations with the PKI were immediately closed; others lasted a few months before being closed. The PKI and its mass organizations were banned. In the case of the PNI, both the party and its mass organizations were allowed to continue subject to purge. The secretary general of the PNI, Surachman, was detained, tortured, and killed.

Industrial Workers of the World (IWW)

Paul Buhle

The Industrial Workers of the World, known colloquially as Wobblies, remains unique in the history of US labor and the left despite its troubled history and small size, for a number of crucial reasons. Founded in 1905 as the industrial era proper reached a new phase across much of the globe, the IWW set out to build a global labor movement, ignoring national boundaries as well as differences in race, ethnicity, and gender. The IWW also represented, from its first day, a unique perspective upon the prospects for democracy: it sought to replace not only capitalist economics but also the political state with a decentralized democracy based in the workplace. In short, unlike socialist or communist visions of the future, it did not seek to take over a state mechanism or replace it with a party-style rule. Not ideologically anarchist, either, the IWW sought a functional as well as egalitarian answer to the question of how a modern society could govern itself.

The exact origins of the IWW are elusive not only because it arose out of largely untutored and often violent labor experience in the Western US of the nineteenth century, but also because the language of participants was so frequently

The Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) or “Wobblies” was founded in Chicago in 1905 as a more inclusive and radical alternative to the American Federation of Labor (AFL). Founded by a group of socialists, anarchists, and radical trade unionists, including such figures as Eugene V. Debs, Big Bill Haywood, and “Mother Jones” (Mary Harris Jones), the IWW sought to promote solidarity among all workers and encourage the growth of class consciousness. This 1933 pamphlet illustrates its call for “One Big Union.” (Oregon Military Department Records, Communist Activity Intelligence Reports, Oregon State Archives) non-English. The “social revolutionaries” of the Chicago-based radical movement that peaked in the middle 1880s disdained the word “anarchist,” but clearly stood outside the socialist movements based upon patience in the eventual influence of education and the voting power of the working class. Most, but not all, of the activists were foreign-born and mainly German in origin. The infusion of anarchist ranks after the suppression that followed the Mayday 1886 Haymarket Incident was due mainly to “new” immigrants from Eastern and Southern Europe, primarily Jewish and Italian. These groups, along with German immigrants, were no strangers to the ideas of syndicalism, and rightly suspected that the mainstream American craft labor movement was conservative by nature.

A very different source of IWW ideas and energy came out of the Knights of Labor, peaking at a half-million members in the middle 1880s, also from Western mining camps, railroaders and others active in the 1890s who looked upon the American Federation of Labor (AFL) as a sad failure in its own terms. The American Railway Union, formed under the leadership of Eugene Victor Debs after the failure of railroad brotherhoods (and the rival Knights of Labor) to form cohesive unions, guided the Pullman Strike of 1894, hugely successful until its suppression – but only west of the Mississippi River. The Western Federation of Miners, likewise disdainful of craft unions' exclusionary practices and inability to cope with the effect of changes in mechanization upon union prospects, joined veterans of the collapsed ARU and others in forming a Western Labor Union, then (with some further participants in the East) an American Labor Union. These were weak bodies, but expressive of large-scale impulses towards real solidarity.

The political scene on the left added complications. Never large by European standards, the socialist movements of the US exerted sometimes considerable influence upon particular unions, including the largely German-American brewery workers (a genuinely international union, with workers carrying the membership cards from the homeland, and an all-inclusive union within the breweries) and the substantially Jewish needles trades. Unionists led by the small but active Socialist Labor Party had sought to launch a new labor federation in 1894, following the near-collapse of the Knights of Labor and the sharp decline of the AFL in the severe depression beginning the previous year. The Socialist Trades and Labor Alliance was intended to be a more European-style union, openly socialistic. But it quickly failed, due in no small part to strike-breaking by AFL bodies and by local authorities. The parent SLP soon began to split apart, and loyal AFL unionists sought a different kind of socialist movement, amenable to existing unionism of any kind, but especially to the progressive craft unionists who made the local central labor federation their home base.

The Socialist Party, formed from a handful of existing groups in 1901 and already following Eugene Debs' presidential run in 1900, sought to be catholic in all things except the necessity of a socialist political mechanism and associated education. As elsewhere in the world, the assumption of a rapid decline of capitalism ahead lent a degree of optimism to the hope for peaceful transition through patient agitation. The initial steady if modest growth of the Socialist Party seemed to verify this prognosis, but the languishing AFL (and its small-scale rivals) and the notable lack of socialist progress in the overwhelming majority of working-class neighborhoods and communities prompted difficult questions. The Democratic Party frequently held the whip hand, especially among Irish Americans (who, in turn, dominated considerable sections of the AFL, especially the building trades), leaving socialists out in the cold. In short, even with a certain success, the political movement alone was not likely to bring socialism.

And yet, as past experience had shown, American workers of nearly every description were capable on occasion of striking in solidarity, often building upon the strengths of working-class (and frequently) ethnic communities. How could it be possible to use that strength and presumably bring political energy forward, reversing the usual procedure of the Europeans? For this question, a handful of labor's own intellectuals and organizers offered proposals in a series of meetings held during 1904. All aimed at solidarity, and most agreed that the needed industrial unionism (that is, unionism throughout the major workplaces of the great industries) had little prospect within the AFL, its leadership increasingly centralized under its deeply conservative, anti-immigration, unembarrassed racist president, Samuel Gompers.

The opening convention of the IWW in Chicago, famously described by mineworkers' leaders William D. "Big Bill" Haywood as the Continental Congress of the Working Class, had a bundle of fresh ideas and an ocean of prospects. It did not, however, succeed in drawing the more socialistic-minded AFL members or locals into the new organization. Most notable in their absence were the brewery workers (their leader, William E. Trautmann, became a Wobbly intellectual and leader, heavily influenced by German syndicalism, but brought few with him), garment workers, metal workers, and coal miners (also known for their industrially inclusive union practices).

The IWW vision had been best laid out by Daniel DeLeon, the leader of the shrunken Socialist Labor Party and editor of its Daily

People newspaper. Addressing an audience in Minneapolis a few days before the convention, DeLeon offered an anthropologically influenced view that society was ready to return, at a higher technological level, to the democracy it had known before the rise of class society. The IWW, then, represented the end of capitalism because the system had done its job and become unnecessary, as had the political state. Unlike the plans of European socialists, this transcendence was to be realized by workers of all kinds, political and non-political.

However, the IWW flagged after an initial burst of energy, and it nearly collapsed as the recession of 1907–8 made strikes almost impossible to win. Worse, the Western Federation of Miners withdrew, and in the political fracas DeLeon was expelled (as a “lawyer”) and powerful socialists, especially Eugene Debs, badly alienated. The IWW had become a propaganda organization more than a union.

Within that framework it recovered, gained new leaders, and invented a style of agitation that quickly drew upon the best of American radical traditions, from Abolitionism to Populism and the Knights of Labor. The emblematic songs, hilariously anti-capitalist (but also drawing upon current vaudeville hits), marked the street-corner style of reaching unskilled workers, itinerant laborers in extractive industries, and others excluded by the AFL. Notwithstanding the WFM withdrawal, the IWW became a beloved (by the employers, despised) part of the Western scene, with clubhouses in the towns where lumberworkers and crop pickers stopped, usually spent their money on liquor and prostitutes, and then threw themselves upon the mercies of the Salvation Army. The IWW offered self-education in place of all forms of degradation, and hopes for liberation from the grinding capitalist system: a brother- and sisterhood of a new, comprehensive quality. Among the high points of agitation were the “free speech fights” in Western cities, the right to agitate openly, fights that brought IWW supporters on the rails from all directions, and resulted in much publicity, mass arrests, jailhouse sing-alongs, and moral support of liberty lovers along with the iron fist of legal representation.

The IWW reached its apex first in the strikes of the unskilled, mostly foreign-born workers in the mass industry of the East and Midwest, 1911–13 – mirroring the strikes of unskilled workers across much of Europe just before the outbreak of war. The Lawrence, Massachusetts, textile strike of 1912, with more than a dozen nationalities taking part, was a particular high point and a signal victory, although not with IWW union recognition. Defeat followed in a textile strike in Paterson, New Jersey the following year and the center of gravity shifted definitively westward, to migratory agricultural labor in particular.

This last development, of crucial importance to the institutional strength of the IWW but mainly among white, male, younger workers, tended to disguise other, subtler developments in the trans-racial, global outreach of the IWW and its ideas. The Brotherhood of Timber Workers, a mostly African American organization in Louisiana from 1909 to 1913, briefly offered the most significant racial breakthrough in the South (or anywhere in the US) since the rise of Populism during the 1890s. It was brutally crushed. The followers of the Flores Magón brothers, in the US Southwest, created a cross-border movement of labor mobilization and support of the Mexican Revolution. Faithful Wobblies, the Magonistas contained dozens of organizers who crossed the border back and forth, sometimes hiding from authorities among supportive Native American peoples. On the West Coast, Japanese Americans (influenced by anarchism in their homeland) and Chinese Americans sought to organize through the IWW. (The popular term “Wobbly” was commonly attributed to a Chinese immigrant cook’s pronunciations of the organization’s initials.)

Likewise, the IWW and its approaches heavily influenced working-class movements in Ireland, Scotland, and above all Australia, among English-speaking peoples. In a few years the appearance of Russian “soviets” (or workers’ councils) was widely considered “the Russian IWW.” The analogy was natural if overblown. The IWW was becoming a world society of labor within itself and beyond its organizational self a model for solidarity, not merely an expression of socialist or anarchist (or by 1917, communist) ideas, but solidarity in its own name and for labor’s own destiny.

It was no wonder, then, that the repression, when it came, was so absolute. The IWW, at its second apex as the US government prepared to enter the world war, likely would have emerged a significant competitor to the craft labor movement in the very homeland of the new global capitalist empire. Instead, the White House, under noted liberal president Woodrow Wilson, engaged in the most extensive persecution of any labor or political group in US history (later matched in intensity, if perhaps not in scope, by the persecution of the Black Panthers in the 1960s). IWW leaders were arrested and sentenced to long terms in prison, local IWW halls were destroyed by right-wing mobs with the compliance of authorities, and promising organizing drives blunted, local organizations shattered.

It was notable that industrial unionism in some AFL and independent unions meanwhile surged forward, buoyed by the restriction of immigration and consequent labor shortage in the wartime economy. Most important of these developments was the rapid emergence of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, under leadership sympathetic to the idea of “workers’ control” but careful not to draw repression by open statement of anti-war sentiments. A handful of leading IWW agitators, especially Italian Americans, went over to the ACWA. Meanwhile, former Wobbly William Z. Foster as much as led the 1919 steel strike, and many Wobblies or former Wobblies took part in what amounted to a near general-strike movement that year, shutting down the port city of Seattle for a time and inspiring hopes that global revolution would spread to the new center of global capital. Only in the next several years, with the steady retreat of organized labor, did the calamity of the 1910–21 repression (choreographed by the new Bureau of Investigation, soon to become the Federal Bureau of Investigation and already under the hand of eagerly repressive J. Edgar Hoover) and its full effects become evident.

The IWW survived, its leadership wiped out, into the 1920s, and with one significant addition: the waterfront and seamen’s labor pocket of Wobbly strength in Philadelphia. Years later, when industrial unionism of this sector took hold under communist leadership, the surviving radicals, non-whites in particular, were aging Wobblies, and in some places the radical influence continues today. Meanwhile, technological advances eroded organization among agricultural workers, and Wobbly efforts to gain footholds in coal mining and other sectors proved unsuccessful. In truth, the young radicals, especially immigrants and their descendents, flocked to the communist movement. Ideological differences notwithstanding, the emphasis on mobilization among the very poor and non-whites, on direct action rather than patient education, were Wobbly expressions in communist form.

The rise of the Congress of Industrial Organizations (and in a few sectors, the rapid expansion of AFL-affiliated unions, such as Teamsters) left the IWW behind in practical terms, but hardly in terms of vision. The civil rights movement during the 1950s and 1960s recalled, to many aging radicals, the sense of solidarity in the IWW, the uplifting of the lowest sectors by their own efforts and collective self-confidence (as did Black Power at a somewhat later time), and the free spirited New Left, women’s, gay and lesbian movements all recalled memories of the IWW sensibility. Scarcely existing in organizational form, the IWW maintained itself during the 1970s–1990s through cultural associations and printing “job shops” owned cooperatively by IWW members. The Charles H. Kerr Company of Chicago, before 1920 a chief publisher of pro-IWW materials, also returned to the scene with important historical works of Wobbly history.

The idea survived into the twenty-first century mainly by these means, and through the perennial popularity of IWW music, sung by the likes of Utah Phillips and even Bruce Springsteen. As the US workforce became steadily more immigrant-based and as the mainstream of organized labor steadily collapsed, the appeal of Wobbly ideas found new audiences. A much-publicized organizing drive among the employees of Starbucks had scant success in attaining union recognition as such, but brought the IWW back to visibility for the young, casually employed generation in particular.

Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), Australia

Verity Burgmann

The Australian Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), an offshoot of the American IWW, achieved public notoriety and popularity amongst militant workers between 1907 and the 1920s. By 1916 it had about 2,000 members in a population of 4.5 million, but many more sympathizers. Only waged workers could join, so unemployment or domestic duties excluded many potential members. Its acerbic, lively newspaper, Direct Action, had a circulation of around 15,000. As in the US, IWW members addressed each other as “Fellow Workers” and were known as “Wobblies.” Leading members included Tom Barker, Tom Glynn, J. B. King, and Charlie Reeve.

Like its American progenitor, the Australian IWW maintained all workers should join One Big Union (OBU) that would be so powerful it could assume control of production and end capitalist class rule. It shared with European syndicalism the belief that workers should not entrust the task of abolishing or ameliorating capitalism to representatives in parliament, who would betray that trust, but should use their own working-class organizations to achieve their aims; but its OBU project was grander and more centralized.

The first IWW Club was formed in Sydney in 1907. After the split in the American IWW in 1908, new Australian branches (Locals) were formed, first in Adelaide in 1911, which adhered to the Chicago IWW that disdained all connections with parliamentary parties. This section became what is commonly known as the Australian IWW. The Detroit IWW Clubs continued to function, but were less influential, because of their sectarianism and commitment to parliamentary politics.

Australian workers had secured voting rights and payment of politicians before the end of the nineteenth century, so Labor parties and governments formed earlier than elsewhere. The Chicago Locals grew by appealing to workers disillusioned with the inability of Labor governments to significantly improve working-class conditions. Australian Wobblies were distinguished by contempt for “Labor fakirs.” Their song “Bump Me Into Parliament,” to the tune of “Yankee Doodle,” caricatured the moderation and self-serving motivations of a Labor politician. It began: “Oh yes I am a Labor man, And believe in revolution, The quickest way to bring it on, Is talking constitution.”

Unlike the American IWW, the Australian IWW did not practice dual unionism, because the trade union movement was well developed. Wobblies were predominantly unskilled and semi-skilled male workers, who were already members of trade unions, so the IWW “bored from within” the existing union movement while establishing Locals and meeting places in capital cities and large working-class regional centers. It opposed the White Australia Policy, which was then supported by most of the labor movement. It campaigned strongly against Australian involvement in World War I from its outbreak in August 1914, in Direct Action and at huge outdoor meetings. Tom Barker was prosecuted in 1915 for publishing a poster “prejudicial to recruiting.” The IWW was significant in the defeat of two wartime referenda seeking support for conscription for military service.

Fearing the rise of the labor movement for its growing influence amongst workers, in December 1916 the national Labor government outlawed the IWW and made membership punishable by six months’ imprisonment: 103 Wobblies were jailed, many more lost their jobs, and a dozen foreign-born Wobblies were deported. Also in 1916, 12 Wobblies were accused of seditious conspiracy to commit large-scale arson on Sydney business premises and received jail sentences of 5 to 15 years. Amidst widespread union-led agitation to secure justice for the IWW 12, they were all released by late 1921 after two royal commissions into the trial found serious deficiencies and evidence that the IWW men were framed by police.

In the 1920s militant workers carried on IWW ideas in the OBU movement and successor organizations, such as the International Industrial Workers and the Industrial Union Propaganda League. There were occasional reformations of IWW Locals, in Adelaide from 1928, in Perth in the late 1930s, and in Sydney during the 1940s. The Communist Party of Australia always had to contend with the IWW's continuing syndicalist influence amongst workers. The Australian IWW still exists, in diminished form.

Indymedia global justice campaign, 2000s

André Spicer

Indymedia describes itself as “a network of collectively run media outlets for the creation of radical, accurate, and passionate tellings of the truth” (www.indymedia.org). It is made up of a network of over 150 local Indymedia Collectives (IMCs) around the world who publish and broadcast independent news and opinion. They largely do this through a series of local websites that allow members of the public to post news stories. The website of each IMC consists of an open newswire where articles posted by the public appear, a features section which picks out major stories, and a links section which includes connections to other IMCs and campaigns. IMCs also frequently engage in mobilizations for large protests or meetings. During these mobilizations, they often aim to provide a way activist groups can represent their own perspective on the events. IMCs often also run events such as film screenings, dance parties, and discussion groups. Finally, some collectives have sought to branch out into the distribution of other media such as print, radio, and film.

Indymedia has a number of important precursors. Many of the activists involved in establishing the early IMCs were inspired by the Zapatista movement in Chiapas, Mexico. The Zapatistas' use of the Internet to distribute communiqués from their figure head, Subcommandante Marcos, was seen as an important model for Indymedia. IMCs also drew on the deep and rich experience and talents built up in the community and do-it-yourself (DIY) media movement. This movement is based on the principle of users creating their own media content and distributing it themselves, often at very low cost. It provided significant competencies in developing and distributing media content. Additional impetus and technical skills came from the Free and Open Source Software (FOSS) movement. This movement provided the technology that was necessary for using the Internet to distribute news. The “alter-globalization” movement of the late 1990s and early 2000s provided a significant political impetus to Indymedia and served as an important source of stories. For instance, the June 18 protests in London during 1999 were central in the founding of UK Indymedia. Finally, radical political movements in each locality feed into the founding and development of each collective. For instance, the United Kingdom IMC drew a lot of inspiration and experience from the anti-roads movements of the 1990s.

The first IMC was established in 1999 during the anti-World Trade Organization (WTO) protests in Seattle. Initially it was established by North American alternative media activists who were seeking to distribute media content produced by activists. They set up an independent media center in downtown Seattle where activists could upload footage from the protests.

They also established a website which would allow activists to directly upload their reportage. The website proved to be an immediate success and was widely accessed during the mobilization. This site served as a model that quickly spread throughout North America, Europe, and some other locations. Often IMCs were set up in response to large-scale summit protests. Indymedia has also been an important part in social forum mobilizations.

Because Indymedia is such a large and autonomous network of collectives, there is significant diversity in the orientations of people in the network. However, there are some common points of commitment that appear to be shared by many throughout the network. The first is a commitment to self-representation. This involves a concern that many political groups have to go through mainstream news media to have their voice heard. In order to get around this problem, radical groups should set up alternative media outlets where they have control over their own voice and the way they are represented. A second ethic underlying Indymedia is an anti-corporate and anti-state orientation. This is based on the idea that the growing domination of the media by large corporations and in some cases governments has resulted in an increasingly narrow range of news stories being available. A third ethic is a commitment to participation in media making. This means breaking down the split between consumers and producers of media content. Finally, IMCs often have a commitment to “horizontality.” This means a commitment to flat and participative forms of organizing and decision-making.

As Indymedia has developed, it has faced a number of significant dilemmas. The first of these involves issues around editorial process and charges of censorship. Initially, the open newswire meant that any content could appear on an IMC site. The result was that a small percentage of posts contained anti-Semitic, racist, and sexist content. In order to deal with this, many Indymedia adopted an editorial process. This involves collective members examining posts, and if they are judged offensive, they are assigned to the “hidden” newswire. A second challenge faced by many IMCs has been processes of collective organizing. Typical problems include individuals holding up consensus decision-making processes, difficulties around involving new members, and lack of a stable resource base.

A third challenge has been balancing the autonomy of each local collective with the solidarity of the whole global network. This has become particularly pronounced when issues such as funding sources and the involvement of more formal NGOs have been debated. A fourth challenge that IMCs face is increasingly punitive policing of their activities. This has extended to police raids on an IMC during the Genoa protests of 2001 and the seizure of Indymedia servers during 2004 in London. A final challenge that IMCs face is the changing nature of the media as a whole. Indymedia has found that many activists have begun using commercial services such as YouTube which allow the easy distribution of user-generated content.

Infoshops

Antonios Vradis

Infoshops (sometimes also called social centers) are physical spaces serving as nodes for the distribution of anarchist and other radical material and the exercise of such ideas and practices. Infoshops exist across the world, with a particularly prominent presence in North America and Western Europe.

The origins of contemporary infoshops can be traced to autonomism in 1970s Germany and Italy, as well as the peace and justice centers in the US during the Vietnam War era (Munson 1998). Germany's autonome focused on campaigns against nuclear weapons and airport expansions. The Italian autonomia was based around worker struggles (operaismo, or "workerism"). Both social movements utilized occupied spaces as centers wherein they could promote their propaganda and develop a political culture that was autonomous from, and antagonistic to, the mainstream.

In the early 1990s the sharp rise of urban gentrification threatened rented and occupied infoshops alike. This threat ignited an ongoing discussion on the appropriate occupational status of infoshops. Such debate is particularly relevant in the light of recent evictions of social centers in Europe. Copenhagen's Ungdomshuset and London's RampART were evicted in 2007; Berlin's Koepi was under imminent threat in the summer of 2008.

Infoshops can be understood in relation to the Temporary Autonomous Zone tactic as described by Hakim Bey (1985). By suggesting that political change can start from confined social and physical spaces, this tactic has crucially differentiated anarchist and autonomist politics from more conventional theories of the left.

International Congress of Women at The Hague

Cayo Gamber

Eight months after the start of World War I, almost 1,500 women – from neutral and “belligerent” nations – congregated in the Netherlands for four days to discuss how to achieve international peace. From April 28 to May 1, 1915, at the International Congress of Women at The Hague, the participants concurred that international disputes “should be settled by pacific means” and “the parliamentary franchise should be extended to women” who then would have a say in deciding between war or peace. In spite of the fact that travel was made difficult by war, 12 nations participated with the following number of members: Australia, 6; Belgium, 5; Canada, 2; Denmark, 6; Germany, 28; Great Britain, 3 (180 others were prevented from attending due to the closing of the North Sea for military reasons); Hungary, 9; Italy, 1; the Netherlands, 1,000; Norway, 12; Sweden, 12; and the United States, 47. The women who gathered also received messages of solidarity from women from Argentina to Romania.

From the outset, the Congress advanced transnational organizing and was the only international meeting, of any kind, during World War I to bring together representatives from both neutral nations and those at war. A spirit of appreciative solidarity was evidenced by both belligerent and neutral nations. Nonetheless, the competing demands of nationalism and internationalism were felt. For example, the French sent no delegates because they were under invasion and thus believed discussions of peace were not possible when they themselves were fighting for their country.

In their opening statement, the participants protested “against the madness and horror of war, involving as it does a reckless sacrifice of human life and the destruction of so much that humanity has labored through centuries to build up.” They decried the horrible violation of woman which attends all warfare; the transfer of territories without the consent of the people of said territories; the exercise of secret treaties; and the greed of transnational arms corporations that grew rich from the sale of weapons.

In order to advance their resolutions, the Congress repeatedly called for the enfranchisement of women. Once given full participatory power, they believed women, as the “World’s Mothers,” would guide men toward peace. They also envisioned the formation of a permanent International Court of Justice accompanied by a permanent Council of Conciliation. In advancing this proposal, they argued that to achieve peace in a postwar world, it would be necessary to negotiate an international peace based on mediation by neutral nations rather than on a military settlement. Whipps (2006) asserts that these “proposals were taken seriously by presidents and prime ministers and were incorporated into President Wilson’s famous Fourteen Points speech (1918)” (124).

While their efforts were transnational in nature, the women who gathered at The Hague were, for the most part, white and middle class. Not only military movements restricted participation, financial concerns also limited participation as “delegates to the Hague Congress footed their own bills” for international travel, which proved to be quite expensive (Rupp 1994: 1577).

In the various contemporaneous accounts of the women who attended the Congress – especially those of Jane Addams (who chaired the proceedings), Emily G. Balch, and Alice Hamilton, of the American contingent – the participants spoke of women as victims of war, as mothers who have suffered the loss of their sons and as wives now widowed. In addition, these women reported that the men who were fighting the war repeatedly appealed to women to come to their aid by voicing their opposition to warfare.

At the conclusion of the meeting, delegates from the Congress met with governmental leaders of the various war capitals to call for an end to war. They believed the countries of war-torn Europe could unite if the “perfectly artificial national boundaries . . . made to signify collective greeds and hatreds” were overcome (Addams et al. 2003: 11). In her accounts, Addams appealed to a desire for “the fruitful processes of cooperation in the great experiment of living together in a world become conscious of itself” (Addams et al. 2003: 66). At the conclusion of the Congress, the International Committee for Permanent Peace was formed, and later, in 1919, the Committee adopted a new name, the Women’s International League for Peace and Freedom. The women who participated believed that “if national hatred could be taught, so, too . . . could international understanding and love” (Rupp 1994: 1600).

International socialism: mass politics

Kevin J. Callahan

In the year 1848, as Europe was in the throes of liberal and national revolutions from Paris to Berlin to Vienna, two unlikely figures – a German philosopher named Karl Marx and the Rhenish industrial magnate Friedrich Engels – published a pamphlet in London with the clarion call “Workers of all countries, unite!” By the eve of World War I in 1914, the slogan of the famous Communist Manifesto had come to inspire the largest mass-based political and social movement of the western, and perhaps the entire, world. International socialism was born.

International socialism galvanized a significant portion of the disenfranchised population of the working classes of Europe in the emergent industrial society of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. The Scottish socialist Keir Hardie estimated in 1912 that European socialism rallied 15 million voters and represented 45 million workers. The German Social Democratic Party was by far the world’s largest political party, with over one million party members. Organized workers of Europe carrying the banner of socialism constituted a protest to the existing liberal industrial order on several levels: the exploited status of workers in the new industrial era, the lack of political rights and power for the masses in an elitist liberal and monarchical political culture, and the unfulfilled goals of fraternity and equality harking back to the 1789 French Revolution.

International socialism was probably the most pioneering and innovative social movement of its day. Its success was based on its ability to unite a complex and diverse group of national-based worker parties, while devising innovative political tactics and strategies with the objective of influencing public opinion and public policy. As a result, the movement prior to World War I became a model of social and political organization, which many twentieth-century mass movements such as communism and fascism would in certain ways emulate.

Protest or Revolution?

Five traits define the salient features of international socialism. First, the movement stands out in its efforts to articulate and embody the spirit of internationalism in an era plagued by rampant nationalism and imperialism. Second, the movement formulated a powerful critique against the liberal middle-class capitalist hegemony of the Victorian era, with all of its problems and contradictions ranging from social disparities to lack of political and economic rights. Third, in offering a class-based and global analysis of current injustices and events in the world, the movement was fueled by members of the working classes of Europe, even if the leadership came mainly from the middle class. Fourth, the movement was truly mass-based, relying on the direct participation of hundreds of thousands of citizens. It largely provided the operating definition of the phenomenon of mass politics contemporary sociologists like Max Weber and Robert Michels have identified as changing the political landscape of Europe from the 1880s until today. The fifth important characteristic of international socialism is its use of demonstration as a method of mass politics. Demonstration in the pre-World War I era entailed the practice of showing, manifesting, expressing, and displaying, and included propaganda, public display, manifestos, political symbolism, and massive anti-war rallies.

The concept of demonstration entailed an element of both protest and revolution. In fact, two demonstrations in Russian history – the January 1905 demonstration led by Father Gapon and the 1917 March demonstration celebrating International Women's Day – were catalysts for the 1905 and 1917 Russian revolutions. Such demonstrations were a powerful indictment of a specific aspect of the status quo and offered socialism as the logical solution to the problem. Thus, they were simultaneously against and for something, and they undermined control of the public order while holding out the possibility of instigating a revolutionary situation. The emphasis of demonstrations was not on fomenting a revolutionary crisis but rather on using this potential scenario as a tactic of intimidation to convince European governments to take action to remedy the situation. Consequently, international socialist demonstrations were mass-based social and political protests with potential revolutionary implications.

The Trajectory of the Socialist Ideal and Mass Politics until the Second International

The intersection of the political and social mobilization of the working classes of Europe and the doctrine of socialism did not occur in a sustained fashion until the rise of international socialism around 1900. Both evolved along different trajectories from their origins through the course of the nineteenth century. The history of the socialist ideal is nearly as old as western civilization itself.

Some scholars assert that the first communist uprising occurred during the French Revolution, when Gracchus Babeuf instigated the “Conspiracy of Equals” in 1796, only to fail miserably and face the guillotine. Babeuf believed in a strong state that would abolish private property and implement a sweeping land reform. More important than Babeuf the individual is the significance of the French Revolution itself. Socialists from the nineteenth century onward drew inspiration from the possibility of a dramatic overhaul of societal institutions and the unfulfilled social ideals of equality and fraternity. It was no coincidence that the second Socialist International was founded on July 14, 1889 in Paris, the centennial of the Storming of the Bastille, nor that later the Bolshevik leader Vladimir Lenin drew lessons from the French Revolution to apply to the 1917 October Russian Revolution.

Mass mobilization in the nineteenth century was sporadic in continental Europe, punctuated by the revolutionary outbursts of 1830, 1848, the 1871 Paris Commune, and occasional nationalist uprisings. In England, workers forged an impressive mass movement in the early nineteenth century, from 1832 until the early 1850s, known as Chartism. The internationalist ideals of the time were of a conservative and liberal republican variant. Liberal internationalism stood for a fraternity of independent and peaceful nations. Jacobins of the French Revolution and later Romantic nationalists such as the Italians Giuseppe Mazzini and Giuseppe Garibaldi embraced this creed. A counterdoctrine known as “conservative internationalism” was intended as an antidote to the upheaval of the French Revolution. Crafted by the Austrian minister Klemens von Metternich at the 1814 Congress of Vienna, it entailed a diplomatic approach to social control: Europe’s dynasties and nobility pledged to cooperate in a “Concert of Europe” in order to fend off all forms of popular politics and the subversive ideologies of nationalism, liberalism, and democratic radicalism. This variant of cooperation virtually disappeared when Germany’s Iron Chancellor, Otto von Bismarck, reconfigured the international system according to the nationalist principle of the Balance of Powers. Liberal internationalism lost much credibility against the backdrop of escalating national tensions from the 1860s until World War I.

Socialist internationalism was merely a phrase in 1848, year of the publication of the Communist Manifesto. It emerged as a weak force in the 1850s and 1860s when liberal and conservative internationalism were faltering in light of the national unification by military means of Italy and Germany. At first, socialist internationalism consisted of the intermingling of exiled socialist agitators in Europe’s urban safe havens such as Geneva, Paris, and London. English and French worker organizations began to forge alliances across the English Channel, resulting in the creation of the International Workingmen’s Association or First International in London in 1864.

The First International was a centralized organization consisting of socialist leaders and activists from several European countries, but it was never a mass-based movement. The personal and ideological struggle between Karl Marx and Mikhail Bakunin, both of whom accused the other of manipulating the institution for his own sectarian purposes, plagued the International until it dissolved itself in 1872.

Its significance is not, however, negligible. First, the organization exemplified, on occasion, international solidarity in the form of financial support for strike funds across frontiers. Such solidarity even made its way into popular novels of the time, such as Emile Zola’s classic account of the tensions of a French coalmining town, Germinal. Second, it provided an institutional framework, albeit briefly, for the ideal of socialist internationalism that inspired European militants to resurrect the Second International in 1889. Third, although the First International had limited influence, its mere existence played into the fears and phobias of Europe’s ruling elites, who greatly exaggerated its influence (claiming, for example, it had started the 1871 Paris Commune) and thus in part legitimized the force of socialist internationalism.

A Decade of Transition: The Second International in the 1890s

When the Second International was established on Bastille Day in 1889, the symbolism of the event could not cover up the patent disunity of the movement. Nor did the occasion receive much notice since it was drowned out by the fanfare of the French Third Republic’s own celebration of the centennial of the French Revolution. Even so, the disparate socialists in attendance made their commitment to internationalism clear by passing a memorable resolution declaring May 1 to be an international day of labor and peace, or what has become simply known as May Day. The 1890s was a decade of transition for international socialism, sowing the seeds of the movement, which would blossom after the turn of the century.

The struggles of the First International were initially carried over into the Second International. The periodic international socialist congresses in the 1890s – 1891 Brussels, 1893 Zurich, 1896 London, and 1900 Paris – were beset by factionalism, ideological conflict, and simply uncivil behavior. The dispute between Marxists and anarchists was renewed, while new currents of thought such as socialist reformism entered the fray. With socialists finding it difficult to settle their own personal and ideological differences, international cooperation was a virtual impossibility. In fact, only on rare occasions did leaders hatch the idea of coordinated action and almost exclusively a bilateral, as opposed to an international, initiative. The relative calm decade of the 1890s in terms of international relations created few scenarios in which the International felt compelled to express its internationalism in a concerted and organized campaign.

Two developments were occurring which portended the dynamism of international socialist demonstrations in the future. First, the late 1880s and 1890s marked a watershed in socialist movements, establishing nationally based political parties and worker organizations. For example, the Belgian Workers' Party was founded in 1885, the Austrian Social Democratic Party in 1888–9, and the Swedish Social Democratic Party in 1889. The Second International later relied on such national-based organizations to mobilize workers in its mass demonstrations. Second, broader developments within European society were preparing the ground for the emergence of mass politics. Technological advances such as the typewriter and the telegraph made a thriving print and press culture possible. Freer press and assembly laws along with improved urban and national transportation networks made it easier and faster for people to congregate in the city center. The International masterfully exploited the newest technologies and an increasing expansion of the public sphere by directing political activism beyond parliament and the king's court into the extraparliamentary realm of the press and street protests.

The Activities of the International Socialist Bureau

The year 1900 marked a turning point for the movement of international socialism because the International executed a resolution it had passed at its 1900 Paris congress to establish an International Socialist Bureau (ISB). Located in Brussels, Belgium, the ISB attended to the secretarial business of the International as well as to organizing international socialist congresses. Its mandate also empowered it to organize "protest movements" and "anti-militarist agitation" on all instances of "international importance."

The exact nature and scope of "protest movements" and "anti-militarist agitation" the ISB was charged to fulfill were unclear in the beginning. Tactics available for member parties to implement were theoretically wide and varied, including economic boycott, propaganda, parliamentary intervention, protest meetings (indoor), street demonstrations, the general strike, and/or the anti-war strike targeting strategic industrial sectors. Different movements and even factions or individuals within a single movement favored specific strategies for the mobilization of the working class. For example, the Scot Keir Hardie and the Frenchman Eduard Vaillant supported firmly the tactic of an anti-war strike, while the leaders of German and Austrian socialism dismissed any form of strike as impractical. Socialist delegates at the periodic international socialist congresses (1900 Paris, 1904 Amsterdam, 1907 Stuttgart, 1910 Copenhagen, and 1912 Basle) engaged in spirited debate about the best strategies for shaping public opinion and public policy until the outbreak of World War I. At the same time, unlike the First International and the first few congresses of the Second International, national sections after the 1900 Paris congress sought to uphold the unity of the international movement at all costs, so compromise and behind-the-scenes negotiations became the order of the day.

The result of debates over tactics was that the ISB, with input from representatives of its constituent socialist parties, gave concrete meaning to socialist internationalism by promoting demonstration activities. These actions consisted mainly of passing resolutions, issuing manifestos, and facilitating the organization of mass-based international protest meetings. International socialist congresses were also an extension of this prerogative, in that they became carefully orchestrated public spectacles designed to project the image of unity and solidarity of the international socialist movement. The most notable example of the trend is certainly the 1912 Basle congress when the ISB staged a spectacular congress and organized mass-based international demonstrations involving hundreds of thousands of people across Europe with the goal of preventing a regional war in the Balkans from engulfing the entire European continent.

The ISB held regular conferences from 1901 until 1914, at which the leaders of Europe's socialist parties conferred on matters influencing the international movement and set the agenda for the next international socialist congress. In addition, it was common for the ISB members to pass resolutions expressing the International's support or protestation of pressing current events. For example, the ISB conference held on February 7, 1904 adopted resolutions on the following topics: congratulating Russian socialists for their efforts toward party unity, protesting the expulsion of foreign socialists from Argentina, protesting the German government's persecution of Russian socialists, protesting the prospect of a Russian–Japanese War, and protesting against the massacres in Macedonia. Resolutions were generally of a symbolic nature and readily passed at ISB conferences without much discussion or debate. It is unlikely that these resolutions were given wide dissemination in the socialist press.

The issuance of a manifesto by the ISB was a far more serious and complicated process. Manifestos were official public announcements of the International and intended for mass publicity. They were published periodically when neither an ISB conference nor an international socialist congress was imminent. The primary function of a manifesto was to call immediate attention to an international crisis or event. Unlike resolutions, manifestos sometimes underwent an arduous process of behind-the-scenes negotiations among the national sections of the International. When announced, they were widely publicized in the socialist press and represented the united front of the international socialist movement. For example, in 1903, the ISB issued two manifestos protesting against the pogroms of Kishinev and condemning the lynching of black Americans. In terms of topical content, four themes were predominant: May Day, protestations against the Russian tsar and/or injustices committed in the Russian empire, violations of human rights, and opposition to war. Through manifestos, the International presented itself as the guarantor of a secular morality, whose obligation it was to make known violations against human dignity. In many ways, it was a modern-day Amnesty International.

International Demonstrations: Examples against Russian Tsar Nicholas II

The most dramatic exhibition of the spirit of socialist internationalism occurred at international demonstrations. The ISB fostered the mobilization of hundreds of thousands of workers across Europe in protest of specific international issues or crises. In terms of logistics, the ISB relied heavily on the established political parties and worker organizations in a given country to organize demonstrative activities. Consequently, the intensity and size of activism within a country and from nation to nation could vary greatly. Generally, the German Social Democratic Party and its affiliated trade unions were able to generate the largest numbers of protesters, while the French Socialist Party was the most eager to call the International to action. Large-scale campaigns were infrequent until 1908. Thereafter, the ISB oversaw one international demonstration or more of considerable magnitude almost every year culminating with the massive anti-war rallies in late July 1914 on the eve of World War I, when as many as one million Europeans filled the streets to express their vehement opposition to the impending European bloodletting. An overview of two such international demonstrations directed against the Russian tsar Nicholas II sheds light on how the International mobilized the masses around political causes in the attempt to influence public opinion and policy.

For socialist and labor movements around the world and particularly in Europe and North America, the Russian tsar stood as the supreme symbol of tyranny and despotism. The enmity militants held for the “bloody tsar” specifically, and Russian tsarism as an institution, was deep-seated, dating as far back as the French Revolution. For example, French militants held Russian autocrats in contempt for their repeated suppression and crackdown of Polish independence uprisings in the nineteenth century. A veritable tsarophobia permeated the German socialist milieu among its leaders and the rank-and-file. In the United States, hundreds of thousands of Russian Jewish immigrants, some of whom were sympathetic with or activists in the US labor, socialist, and anarchist movements, recalled with horror the state-sponsored pogroms of Alexander III in 1881 following the assassination of Alexander II.

The event that really galvanized the international socialist and labor movement against Nicholas II was the suppression of the 1905 Russian Revolution, symbolized by the violence of “Bloody Sunday” on January 22, 1905. On this day, hundreds of thousands of Russian workers and peasants led by Father Gapon marched through St. Petersburg to submit to Nicholas a list of grievances. Nicholas happened to be away, but his security officials chose to disperse the unarmed crowd by force, resulting in the death of more than 100 people. In reaction to this tragedy, the ISB promptly issued a manifesto on January 31, 1905, condemning the actions of the tsarist government and its head, Nicholas II. Thereafter, socialist and labor organizations throughout Europe and North America, emboldened by the ISB's manifesto, raised their voices in uncoordinated actions on behalf of the martyrs of Bloody Sunday and against the Russian tsar. Local and national activism generated momentum for an organized and sustained international campaign when the San Francisco branch of the United States Socialist Party sent a letter to the ISB on November 11, 1905, requesting the ISB to draft a manifesto that would call for the workers of the world to organize demonstrations on January 22, 1906, commemorating the anniversary of Bloody Sunday. The ISB issued a manifesto on December 2, 1905, to the workers of all countries. The content of the manifesto summarized the atrocities committed by the counterrevolutionary forces and the tsarist regime since the outbreak of the Revolution, listing several of the martyred heroes of the Revolution and the Bloody Sunday massacre.

The summons of the International to organize demonstrations in the form of public meetings or processions was heeded throughout Europe, North America, and even parts of South America. In Italy, no fewer than 80 public reunions were organized in Venice to commemorate the Russian martyrs. One socialist group decided to use black flags to decorate the hall where the publicist Guido Marongoni was to speak. The agitation in France was also keen, with public meetings organized for January 20–2 in Paris and in the provinces. A meeting in St. Etienne on January 21 included a procession of 5,000 workers, who carried six large red flags and sang the Internationale on their way to a public reunion. In Germany, the German Social Democratic Party used the occasion skillfully to combine two political objectives at the same time: to honor the dead of Bloody Sunday and to agitate for the cause of universal suffrage in Prussia. For the public meetings organized in Berlin, socialist organizers deliberately waited until the last minute to publicize where the reunions would take place in order to frustrate the attempts of the public authority to monitor them. One socialist newspaper estimated the attendance of workers at the meetings in Berlin at around 200,000, and about 1,500,000 for all of Germany. Meetings held to commemorate Bloody Sunday and likewise protest against the Russian autocrat were held in the United States, Belgium, Spain, Norway, Serbia, Sweden, Bulgaria, Romania, parts of the Russian empire like Warsaw and St. Petersburg, and the Republic of Argentina.

Participants of these international demonstrations expressed their solidarity with financial contributions to a fund on behalf of the Russian revolutionary movement. The month following the commemoration of Bloody Sunday, the ISB was inundated with money designated for this Russian fund. In the month of February alone, the ISB received a total of 28,966.72 Belgian francs, the lion's share of contributions coming from the United States. The small Socialist Party of Argentina gathered almost 2,000 francs; the International Socialist Club of Sydney represented the most distant donor, mustering more than 250 francs for the cause. Over the next three years, the ISB continued to receive a steady stream of contributions.

In the summer of 1909, the Russian tsar Nicholas II embarked on a European tour in order to shore up his political alliances with England and France and to procure additional foreign loans to ensure the solvency of his administration. When the International heard of the tsar's travel plans, it encouraged its members to launch an extensive demonstration campaign. A few days prior to Nicholas's departure, the ISB issued a manifesto on June 17 protesting the tsar's planned visits to meet the heads of state of Sweden, England, France, and Italy. The content of the manifesto was a summary of the political injustices the tsarist regime had committed since the 1905 Russian Revolution. Therefore, it was incumbent upon the sections of the International through whose country Nicholas would pass to protest against the presence of the tsar and his desire to attain foreign loans. The ISB manifesto refrained from prescribing specific courses of action socialist parties should take other than that they should "raise their voice" in order to generate publicity in condemnation of Nicholas II.

The manifesto of the ISB complemented the multitude of national manifestos issued by its members, giving the campaign a truly international character. Socialist members of parliament in Sweden, England, Italy, and France expressed their opposition to the tsar's visit in parliament. In addition to parliamentary intervention, socialist and labor organizations organized hundreds of public meetings to protest the tsar's arrival, while the socialist press published daily anti-tsarist resolutions and manifestos passed by local socialist and labor organizations. The extent of protest from the different sections varied, but it appears that protest activities in Sweden, England, and Italy were carried out vigorously, while the amount of protest in France did not match the expectations of the leaders of French socialism. In spite of the different levels of mobilization, the English, French, and Italian movements prided themselves on the fact that the tsar had not actually stepped foot on land. Their protest, the socialists argued, had intimidated the tsar and so he had to be received off the coast in a navy vessel.

The Social Democratic Party of Britain made the most noise about the upcoming visit of the tsar. Its daily organ Justice published "An Open Letter to the Bloody Tsar Nicholas" that incited polemical responses in the English public and was even denounced in the House of Lords as a provocation to murder the Russian tsar. The letter was indeed subversive, justifying that in the name of humanity certain "venomous and dangerous creatures" ought to be destroyed. Part of the letter appeared on posters that hung in public spaces all over England; in pamphlet form, it was distributed to participants in demonstrations against the tsar.

The Independent Labour Party also mobilized its sections by organizing protest meetings. On July 10, 1909, the British Section to the International Socialist Congress, representing the diverse socialist and labor organizations affiliated with the International, issued a joint resolution. The proclamation protested against the hospitality offered by the king and the government to the Russian tsar and invited all worker associations to join together and express their outrage. The apogee of the protest activities in England occurred on July 25 in Trafalgar Square; socialist and anarchist organizations mobilized over 10,000 people. The principal objective of the protest movement for both anarchists and socialists was to influence British public opinion against the tsar so that the House of Commons would reject financial and political projects that served to stabilize the tsarist regime. In this goal, they failed.

The French Socialist Party engaged in an energetic propaganda campaign to protest the arrival of the tsar off the coast of France near Cherbourg on July 31 and August 1, where a few devout militants in Cherbourg hatched an innovative, if posterous, idea to bring attention to the tsar's crimes. They wanted to release a bunch of balloons representing the "heads of the dead" of Russian revolutionaries precisely when French President Fallières was to welcome Nicholas II. Logistical complications such as the unpredictability of the wind and the inability to find a company to make the "têtes de mort" balloons thwarted their idea.

French socialist newspapers printed several manifestos publicizing the tsar's journey, while local organizations plastered a mass-reproduced proclamation of the national party on city walls. Titled Contre le Tsar Rouge (Against the Red Tsar), the manifesto started with a short description criticizing republican France's relationship with Russia. After listing the atrocities committed by the tsar, the manifesto concluded with an emphatic plea to French workers to demonstrate their internationalism by attending organized anti-tsar rallies and meetings. In spite of strident rhetoric, militants barely responded to the publicity campaign. Protest meetings were poorly attended and the leader Eduard Vaillant lamented in the socialist press that French workers had protested "with less vigor" than their English and Italian counterparts.

Perhaps the most successful international demonstration was held in the German port city of Kiel, near which the tsar's naval contingent passed en route to and in return from Western Europe. Two mass meetings were organized: the first one took place at the end of July to protest against the tsar's journey, and the second one on August 15 to demonstrate for world peace. At the first meeting, the Kiel working populace marched through town to the meeting hall, where Karl Liebknecht was to speak about the barbarism of the Russian regime. The facility turned out to be too small, so the meeting organizers asked the police for permission to hold the meeting "in the open air" on a nearby sports field. Request granted, a crowd of about 10,000 people assembled and listened attentively to Liebknecht's speech, raising their hands in solidarity with the spirit of the resolution.

The evident success of this demonstration motivated the Kiel authorities to use their power to thwart the scheduled demonstration for August 15. The demonstration organizers wanted to surpass the success of the first meeting by giving the second one a truly international dimension. The cause it championed was the call for peace amid the rising political tension between Germany, England, Sweden, and Norway and the resultant naval arms race. The local socialist organization first requested permission to hold the demonstration on the same sports field as the previous meeting. After the Kiel police denied this request in the name of public security, the demonstration organizers sought to procure the public hall used for the first meeting. This time, Kiel's marine authority pressured the facility's owner not to rent it out, so the local organization was forced to rent the three next largest public halls in Kiel, together capable of accommodating about 8,000 people. The organization had to leap over another bureaucratic obstacle because invited foreign speakers not proficient in German were required to obtain a permit to speak in their native tongue. The regional Schleswig government denied these permits without an explanation. As a result, when the Scot Ramsay MacDonald wanted to address each assembly, the German Eduard Bernstein was forced to summarize his thoughts and speak on his behalf in German. The other guest speakers from Copenhagen, Denmark, and Malmö, Sweden, spoke adequate German. The police interference in the organizational details of the demonstration failed to prevent a successful display of internationalism. To the contrary, as the German and foreign speakers emphasized, it gave their event additional propagandistic power.

Conclusion

International socialism continued to grow steadily in the years approaching World War I, and the vigor and size of its international demonstrations were a testament to this trend. The predominant mood of the times was the possibility of a war unlike any ever experienced, and the International was resolved to prevent a European bloodbath where Europe's working classes would face the most hardship. Even so, the peace activism of the International could not withstand the tidal wave of nationalism that engulfed Europe's middle and upper classes in the summer of 1914. In spite of a valiant anti-war campaign in late July 1914 mobilizing up to one million demonstrators, Europe's kings, prime ministers, and generals disregarded the voice of the International. As socialists had accurately predicted, industrial warfare resulted in the toppling of the European dynasties of Hohenzollern, Hapsburg, and Romanov, and ushered in a period of war that lasted from 1914 until 1945, claiming the lives of tens of millions of people. World War I transformed Europe and brought about the split of the European left between social democrats and communists. The precarious yet impressive unity of the Second International was never again attained.

However, the influence of international socialism of the pre-World War I era continued into the twentieth century in tangible ways. Many figures of the Second International assumed positions of extraordinary power after World War I as prime ministers, presidents, the leader of the first communist state of the world, and even prominent members of the fascist movement. The phenomenon of mass politics became a trademark of the twentieth century around the world, inspiring popular protest, insurrection, and revolution from Russia to China to Cuba to Iran to the Philippines. No political movement or ideology would be the sole custodian of the mobilization of the masses. Demonstrations, extraparliamentary activism in the press and the streets, and a politics of performance and spectacle have all become staples in the repertoire of modern political culture from Pyongyang to Caracas to Washington, DC.

The major thrust of the socialist internationalism of the Second International rooted in social justice, human rights, and international peace combined with elements of liberal internationalism, leading to the establishment of international organizations such as the League of Nations in 1919 and the United Nations in 1945. Even today, citizens from around the world are members of the modern Socialist International, dedicated to democratic socialism and to realizing the spirit of international fraternity expressed in Karl Marx's 1848 slogan: "Workers of all countries, unite!"

International Women's Day

Marilyn J. Boxer

International Women's Day (IWD), celebrated annually on March 8 in dozens of countries and on every continent, originated in the revolutionary socialist movement of the early twentieth century. Commemorated today with tributes to outstanding women past and present, even in some places with gifts to sweethearts and spouses, the socialist heritage of IWD may be forgotten. But IWD first entered public discourse on August 27, 1910 in the form of a resolution presented to the International's Socialist Women's Conference held at Copenhagen. Meeting in conjunction with the Second International, that is, the Socialist International founded in 1889 to succeed the defunct First International (as the International Workingmen's Association founded in 1864 by Karl Marx was known), the women's group was led by German socialist Clara Zetkin. With her comrades, Zetkin submitted the following resolution:

In agreement with the class-conscious, political and trade union organizations of the proletariat of their respective countries, the Socialist women of all countries will hold each year a Women's Day, whose foremost purpose it must be to aid the attainment of women's suffrage. This demand must be held in conjunction with the entire women's question according to Socialist precepts. The Women's Day must have an international character and is to be prepared carefully.

The resolution in Copenhagen actually followed the first celebration, for that event had occurred in New York City on Sunday, February 23, 1909, when American socialists met to commemorate a demonstration the preceding year by women of the Lower East Side of New York City for the vote as well as for an end to sweatshops and child labor. It has also been asserted that the date was selected to commemorate a much earlier event, a strike by women textile workers on March 8, 1857, and its fiftieth anniversary celebration in 1907; but historians have not been able to find any evidence of either supposed event and now consider the tale a myth.

The Copenhagen resolution, however, is well documented; and like the 1909 event in New York, reflected a decision by men and women of the Second International to abandon their earlier position of dismissing campaigns for woman suffrage as mere reforms unable to assuage the condition of working-class women, for whom only socialist revolution could bring better lives. Suffrage campaigns were now reaching their peak, enrolling hundreds of thousands of women in countries around the world. In 1907 in Stuttgart, during the first meeting of the International Conference of Socialist Women, attended by women from 13 countries, an extensive discussion of woman suffrage had been held. The issue was complicated by the fact that universal manhood suffrage had not yet been achieved in countries with prominent socialist parties, such as Austria and Belgium. Zetkin and other socialists opted for limited cooperation with non-socialist women, always keeping in mind their socialist goals. Votes for women, they hoped, would serve their purposes by helping to educate working-class women to support the socialist movement.

Influenced by the 1907 conference, the Socialist Party of America created a Women's National Committee to Campaign for the Suffrage and held a mass meeting on March 8, 1908, stating, however, that "socialist women shall not carry on this struggle for complete equality of the right to vote in alliance with the middle-class women suffragists, but in common with the socialist parties, which insist on woman suffrage as one of the fundamental and most important reforms for the full democratization of political franchise in general." During 1909 and 1910, despite some resistance to cross-class collaboration, the American socialist women's groups cooperated with the National American Women's Suffrage Association, then led by Carrie Chapman Catt, to circulate suffrage petitions. More than 5,000 socialists joined the famous citywide suffrage parade held in New York in 1912, constituting, according to one description, "a brilliant mass of red sashes, banners, and red torches."

The first European celebration of IWD took place in Vienna on March 18, 1911, a date selected to commemorate the Paris Commune of 1871. There also, women marched with red flags. There are said to have been some 300 demonstrations that year by women in the Austro-Hungarian empire. Similar events took place in Germany, Denmark, and Switzerland. Russia first celebrated the holiday on February 23, 1913, when both liberal feminists and Bolsheviks marked the occasion with meetings, lectures, and publications. (It should be noted that February 23 in the Gregorian calendar then used in Russia is the same day as March 8 in the western calendar.) France marked the occasion on March 8, 1914, with some 2,000 attending. The outbreak of war later that year created major problems for the socialists, who were caught between an internationalist ideology and patriotic defense of their homelands.

Nevertheless, some celebrations of IWD took place during the war years, including the most significant of all, that in St. Petersburg in 1917, which is considered by historians to be the event that launched the Russian Revolution. While in 1917, IWD was marked in Paris and Turin, and elsewhere, it was doubtless the events of late February (old calendar) in St. Petersburg that turned IWD into one of the leading national holidays of the Soviet Union, along with May Day and the anniversary of the Bolshevik revolution. Celebrated the last Sunday in February in 1913 and 1914, IWD in 1917 came amidst a bitter winter when, after several years of war, prices for food, fuel, soap, and other necessities had reached grossly inflated wartime prices that working people could not pay. During January and February many men and women workers protested by striking. On February 23, 1917 (March 8, new calendar), women workers at the textile factories defied a party order not to strike by staging a walkout and mass meeting in the street. Textile workers joined hungry housewives in the streets. Male metalworkers soon enlisted in sympathy. The theme of the IWD celebration was inclusive: "The War, High Prices, and the Situation of the Woman Worker." Along with middle-class feminists, women workers also demanded voting rights. Most remarkably, some women walked right up to the soldiers who had been called to control the demonstrations, took hold of their rifles, and said, "Put down your bayonets – join us." Other women attacked bakeries and grocery stores. Two days later, after the call "Give us bread" had escalated into "Down with autocracy," the tsar ordered one of his generals to shoot if necessary to stop the demonstrations. The women had provided an example of unstoppable civil disorder that was dangerous to the tsarist regime. By February 27, Nicolas II was forced to abdicate. The Russian Revolution was begun on IWD by hungry women and children demanding food and looting shops.

After the war, everything had changed. The Bolsheviks cancelled an IWD celebration planned for 1918, partly in response to male leaders who opposed it. Lenin's government created a special "women's section" to pursue educational, health, and political work among women that lasted until 1930, when it was eliminated by Stalin. Elsewhere, scattered celebrations took place in 1918 and the following years, while the socialists of the Second International contended with, and were eventually eclipsed by, the new Communist Third International. In 1922 Lenin declared March 8 (new calendar) a communist holiday. The Chinese Communist Party followed suit. But although IWD continued to be celebrated in the USSR, its original impulse as a way to support women's rights was lost. While lauding notable Bolshevik women, party leadership used the occasion to stress the need for women to support government policies. In 1930 the IWD slogan in the Soviet Union was "100% Collectivization." In 1931 German socialist women used the occasion to demonstrate under the slogan "Against War and Nazi Terrorism, for Socialism and Peace." Scattered celebrations of IWD continued through the 1940s and 1950s in countries as widespread as France, Cuba, Puerto Rico, Australia, Germany, England, China, and Indonesia, with numbers recorded that ranged up to half a million in the latter case. In 1942, the Chinese revolutionary and feminist poet Ding Ling marked the occasion by addressing revolutionary women with a stirring speech about the conflicting demands they faced seeking to meet expectations of both new and traditional roles for women. "When will it no longer be necessary to attach special weight to the word 'woman' and raise it specially?" She hoped for "less empty theorizing and more talk about real problems."

Following World War II, celebrations of IWD lapsed in some countries, including the United States, perhaps because of its association with international communism. Its resurgence as a source of feminist interest seems to have started in the late 1960s, when a group of women at the University of Illinois, Chicago Circle, in 1967, commemorated the day by showing the film Salt of the Earth, which depicts a labor struggle by women workers in the American Southwest. The Chicago group is said to have included a number of "red diaper babies," who had heard of IWD from their parents. In 1971 the day was marked by sit-ins by women in Boston and New York.

During the 1970s, as knowledge of the day's history spread, especially through burgeoning women's studies programs, it became the occasion for feminist events on many campuses. In 1976 a women's studies student at San Diego State University who was active in the National Organization for Women (NOW) successfully petitioned the city schools to designate April 18–24 as Women in History Week. In 1977 a student of women's history at Sonoma State University who sat on the Santa Rosa Commission on the Status of Women convinced the Sonoma County school system to proclaim the week that included March 8 as Women's History Week. By 1981 celebrations of IWD had spread across the nation, and Representatives Barbara Mikulski and Orrin Hatch helped then-Representative Barbara Boxer win support for a resolution on Women's History Week from the United States Congress. Expanded in 1987 into Women's History Month, Congress has continued to pass similar resolutions every year since. Designated as a national holiday in numerous countries, March 8 is now recognized as International Women's Day by the United Nations, as part of a global effort to promote gender equality as a fundamental human right.

International Workers of the World, Marine Transport Workers

Jon Bekken

The Marine Transport Workers Industrial Union (MTW-IWW) was a vital presence in the maritime industry from 1913 through the 1940s, organizing longshoremen throughout the Americas and establishing a network of union halls that served seamen on four continents. Although the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) established offshoots in many countries, the MTW was the IWW's only truly international industrial union. In addition to its US halls, the MTW maintained halls in Bremerhaven, Hamburg, and Stettin, Germany; Tampico, Mexico; Stockholm, Sweden; Adelaide and Sydney, Australia; Vancouver and Port Arthur, Canada; and Iquique and Valparaíso, Chile, for many years. In Germany, MTW members published Der Marine-Arbeiter through 1930.

In the early 1920s, the MTW seemed on the verge of becoming the dominant union in the American maritime industry, but it was ultimately unable to dislodge the AFL-affiliated International Seamen's Union (ISU) and the International Longshore Association. However, the MTW had an impact far beyond its numbers because of the MTW's reputation among maritime workers as a militant, fighting union, because its direct action tactics maximized workers' power, and because the MTW never accepted the divisions of craft, port, and the like that enabled maritime employers to isolate workers' struggles.

Themselves a multinational workforce, Wobbly maritime workers recognized the importance of global cooperation and solidarity. Both the MTW-dominated Chilean section of the IWW (from the 1920s) and the MTW itself (in 1935) joined the syndicalist International Workingmen's Association (AIT), even though the IWW as a whole ultimately decided against affiliation. MTW newspapers carried detailed reports on the struggles and conditions of maritime workers around the world. In September 1925, the MTW walked out in solidarity with striking British seamen, tying up dozens of ships in Baltimore, Mobile, New York, and Philadelphia. The Baltimore MTW forwarded the names of scabs who shipped out to Latin America to MTW affiliates there, so they could be greeted appropriately. Given the lack of support from other US maritime unions, the strike lasted only a few weeks, although some seamen won agreements to hire from the MTW hall, shorter hours, and wages of $15 a month above the Shipping Board/ISU scale.

Similarly, the union took a stand of international solidarity in political matters. In 1936 MTW seamen in Philadelphia struck against the shipping of 34 tons of dynamite to Francisco Franco's army in Spain, holding up the ship for several hours until the ISU imported scabs from New York City. While other US maritime unions demanded hazardous duty pay for working war cargo, the MTW called on maritime workers to refuse to handle cargo to ports where the fascists held power, and they published lists of ships that should not be worked.

The IWW enjoyed a great deal of power in its heyday. Many shipping lines found themselves obliged to hire seamen through MTW halls or to accede to MTW demands, often delivered by a crew committee as a ship was preparing to sail. The MTW called several successful strikes and played an important role in many others, even though only a minority of maritime workers ever held IWW membership. In March 1922, the ISU's president reported that the IWW had taken complete control of the Boston waterfront. Boston Wobblies reported that hardly a ship left the port without a majority of the crew carrying IWW cards. The IWW was so strong there for a time that the Marine Transport Workers secretary issued crew menus with the IWW seal affixed and posted them on mess hall bulletin boards. Ship owners who refused to follow the menu were confronted with direct action.

While seafaring is an intrinsically transient occupation, the IWW was able to establish a lasting presence among longshoremen, who provided some of the union's most stable job branches and often helped maintain the MTW halls that were a vital part of the union's presence on the waterfront. Best known is the IWW's organization on the Philadelphia docks, where a biracial MTW held job control from 1913 until 1921 – and continued to have an organized presence into the 1930s. There were also significant, if shorter-lived, MTW presences among longshoremen in Baltimore, Boston, Hoboken, New Orleans, Newport News, Norfolk (where the IWW was especially strong among black longshoremen), Portland, and San Pedro.

MTW also organized longshoremen in Canada, Chile, Mexico, and Puerto Rico. The MTW's Chilean section grew to 9,000 members in seven maritime cities, before being suppressed by the military dictatorship in the late 1920s. In Valparaíso, longshoremen formed an IWW branch in April 1918 that quickly established job control and spread to other ports over the following year. Chilean Wobblies used direct action tactics to force individual employers to grant better terms, whipsawed other firms into line, and relied on the "redondilla" system of work sharing to maintain solidarity. A series of bitter strikes weakened the union in many ports, but when Valparaíso dockworkers struck March 1, 1924, they wired the names of ships that left Chilean ports to other MTW branches, urging maritime workers to boycott the ships and refuse to handle their cargo. While these battles won some victories, the Chilean IWW often found itself alone in its struggles, and was once again outlawed in 1927. In 1936, after the Ibañez dictatorship fell, the Chilean MTW reorganized, publishing La Voz del Industrialismo on a press donated by US Wobblies, and organizing short job actions. But the union was ultimately unable to reestablish itself in Chile. Seamen also helped carry the IWW to Mexico, although workers who crossed the border played at least as important a role. IWW branches were established throughout Mexico – most notably in Tampico, where the union successfully organized maritime and petroleum workers.

The period from 1913 to 1924 was the peak of the Marine Transport Workers' influence. But several ships remained under IWW control throughout the 1930s, and in some ports many longshoremen carried two union cards. The IWW press was replete with stories of seamen forcing better conditions through direct action. Quickie strikes on the eve of sailing prevented captains from slashing wages and officers from beating and harassing crew members, and they enforced vacations and working hours. The transitory nature of the work and the hostile legal climate made it difficult to maintain union conditions over the long haul, however. One crew organized en route from New York to the Panama Canal (there were three IWW members when the ship left port, and 22 when it reached the Canal) and was able to win better food, extermination of the bed bugs that infested their sleeping quarters, and other improvements. But when the ship reached Australia, the captain fired four of the most active MTWs. When the remaining crewmen refused to sail without them, he had 16 arrested on mutiny warrants.

In 1937, a National Maritime Union-CIO organizer estimated that there were 10,000 MTW seamen (with the NMU and ISU each having 25,000) on the Atlantic and Gulf Coasts. The MTW was strongest on the Pacific and Gulf coasts, where it was able to build a working alliance with other maritime unions. When Congress passed legislation requiring seamen to carry a Continuous Discharge Book (a record of each job worked and the terms under which the seamen left: essentially a traveling blacklist), the Marine Transport Workers worked with the Sailors Union of the Pacific (temporarily independent of the ISU, which ordered its members to carry the fink books), the Firemen's Union of the Pacific Coast, and a dissident NMU caucus (the NMU officially opposed the fink book, but directed its members to cross picket lines) to picket US Maritime Commission halls. Determined resistance persuaded several shipping lines to abandon the fink books, especially in the SUP's Pacific Coast stronghold.

But the MTW was increasingly surrounded by contracts that cemented business unionism in place. The IWW retained a strong presence on the waterfront through the mid-1940s, but it was a minority presence. Most seamen shipped by the voyage, and since hiring was done through union halls Wobblies either had to have at least tacit agreements with captains to hire through their halls or had to carry two (or more) union cards to get jobs. Few ships chose to hire Wobblies, and so the Marine Transport Workers halls generally could not function as a source of jobs. And both the National Maritime Union (CIO) and ISU (AFL) worked to keep IWW members off ships.

MTW mounted its last organizing drive in 1945–7, lining up Houston tugboat workers in early 1945. The Galveston & Houston Towing Co. defeated the MTW by firing union activists, a promised cash bonus if the company union won the election, and the reluctance of many MTW members to stay on the job through months of National Labor Relations Board delays when better-paying jobs were available. Despite the loss, MTW activists tried (with some success) to pull the tugboat crews in fall 1946, when a wave of strikes swept the industry, and the MTW won two union representation elections among towing and ferry workers in 1947, though no permanent union presence was established.

Like the rest of the IWW, the seriously weakened Marine Transport Workers collapsed under the combined pressure of the Taft-Hartley Act and increasingly entrenched craft unions. MTW reports in the late 1940s and 1950s refer to empty halls, the impossibility of finding maritime workers to staff them, and the ever-present danger that they would be overrun by drunks and transformed into dingy flophouses where no self-respecting seaman would set foot. The Baltimore hall was closed in 1954, partly because the port was doing less business but primarily because no one could be found to keep it open. The New Orleans hall closed in 1953, again for lack of a delegate to keep it open. By the 1960s, there were only about a dozen (mostly retired) members of the Houston MTW branch, and the union's last maritime hall was falling apart around their ears (it was finally sold and bulldozed in 1967).

Internationals

Michael Forman

The Internationals were associations aimed at promoting, facilitating, and coordinating working-class solidarity beyond national and local attachments. They served as the institutional embodiment of workers' internationalism and as the symbols of the labor movement. They were also the precursors of today's non-governmental organizations (NGOs) and of the World Social Forum, under whose banner internationalist globalization activists have gathered annually since 2001.

Internationalism, the notion that human solidarity in freedom and equality properly extends beyond the nation, has its roots in the Enlightenment's universalism, which early liberals deployed as a secular alternative to Christian cosmopolitanism. During the French Revolution, for example, "committees of correspondence" emerged across Europe and North America, in solidarity with the French revolutionaries. It was the more radical elements of the labor movement that took up the banner of internationalism in the 1840s, eventually establishing those institutions which would be known as the Internationals. At least a dozen organizations have claimed the name. Among them, three stand out because of their influence and historical importance: the International Workingmen's Association (First International), the Workers' or Socialist International (Second International), and the Communist International (Third International). While each of these organizations took on the issues of the day, their primary concern was to counter the nationalist discourse that was influencing the working class and their organizations.

The First International

During the first half of the nineteenth century a number of largely secret societies of intellectuals emerged to take up radical causes such as the extension of democratic rights and the cause of labor. Though the First International was their descendant, it was by all accounts a new organization with grassroots origins. The idea of the First International emerged when the London Trades Council invited representatives of the French labor movement to the "party of international fraternization" at London's Masonic Pub in April of 1862. The contacts they established came to fruition two years later when as many as two thousand people attended the founding Congress of the International Workingmen's Association in London.

On a day-to-day basis the First International (1864–76) was led by a General Council which consisted of the corresponding secretaries of the national sections. These were composed of regional or local sections with mass membership. From its inception, the First International was marred by conflicts between three factions: labor unionists, Marxist socialists, and communalists or anarchists. While they all agreed on the basic purpose of the organization, their conceptions of its mid-range goals and means were very different: communalists and then anarchists rejected participation in state-oriented politics, unionists looked to use the political arena without seeking political office, and socialists sought to capture the state. Once Bakunin joined in 1868, the conflicts between anarchists and Marxists intensified, at least in part because of the mutual dislike between Bakunin and Marx. The most important factor in the dissolution of the International was the Paris Commune of 1871.

From the start of the Paris events, divisions between Marxists and Bakuninists intensified. The former initially thought the uprising ill-advised and untimely, the latter became deeply involved through their French sections. When the Commune fell after two months, the International, at the behest of Marx, issued what was essentially a eulogy to the fallen Communards (Marx's "The Civil War in France"). Thinking the position of the International too radical, the English section which had always held the balance withdrew from the organization. At the same time, European governments blamed the International for the insurrection and intensified their campaign of repression against it, its sections, and its members. That the International did not have the resources to bring about such events did not matter: the repression was systematic. This, in turn, meant that at the next congress, held in The Hague in 1872, Marx and Engels were able to secure the expulsion of Bakunin and his followers. The latter went on to establish the Anti-Authoritarian International (1873–7). After the 1873 congress, the General Council relocated to Philadelphia, where it dissolved following the 1876 conference.

The Second International

Almost twenty years later, the Workers' or Socialist (Second) International (1889–1940) held its first congress in Paris. Members of the Anarchist International (1881–1907) were not invited. Labor unions organized separately into international trade secretariats, many of which survived to the present as the global union federations of the International Trade Union Confederation. The Second International, then, was an organization of political parties with a working-class base. Mostly, these parties called themselves socialist or social democratic. All of them counted a broad spectrum of the left, from radicals to reformists, among their leadership and their membership. They all also accepted some version of Marx's analysis of capitalism, if not his full-blown revolutionary ideas.

Much had happened since the collapse of the First International. By the late nineteenth century the labor movement was a significant political force in the major countries of Europe. The German Social Democratic Party was well on its way to becoming that country's largest party. Elsewhere, especially in Austria-Hungary, Belgium, Holland, and a little later in Britain, labor-based parties were on the rise and held seats in national legislatures. In France, socialists soon faced a new political and philosophical challenge: whether to participate in a coalition government. In fact, the pragmatic goal of the Paris Congress was to mend the divisions between "revolutionaries" and "revisionists" on the political side of the labor movement, not least those among the two principal French parties, led respectively by Jules Guesde (1845–1922) and Paul Brousse (1844–1912).

Judging by its reach (parties from every European country, the United States, Argentina, Japan, and later other Asian and Latin American countries joined), by the stature of the figures participating in its congresses (e.g., Otto Bauer, Eduard Bernstein, Jean Jaurès, Karl Kautsky, V. I. Lenin, Wilhelm and later Karl Liebknecht, Rosa Luxemburg, Norman Thomas, Clara Zetkin), and by its ability to command the popular imagination, the Second International was the most significant and broadly representative of all. At its congresses the Second International pronounced itself and proposed guidelines for its members on all the major issues of the day: revisionism, women's rights, imperialism, and national minorities. Most importantly, from its very first congress, the International considered the question of war. While very few among its principal figures would reject the national right to self-defense, the real issue was what socialists should do to forestall this eventuality. Congress after congress of the International committed its members to agitation against war, proposed the calling of mass strikes in the eventuality of war, and pledged that its members would oppose war efforts in their respective legislatures. In the end, however, most member parties would support their governments' war efforts. Some, notably the German Social Democrats, split over the decision, but at least for a time the most committed internationalists were isolated and marginalized in their parties. While the Second International held two congresses (1919 and 1920) and one conference (1919), and its governing body, the Bureau of the International, did not disband until 1940, it lost its stature and importance after 1914. In 1951 it was succeeded by today's Socialist International, which counts over 150 parties and organizations among its members, but does not have the same political or symbolic stature as its predecessor.

The Third International

The reasons member parties of the Second International, especially the German Social Democrats, chose to support their governments at the start of World War I remain a matter of controversy among scholars, but it was Lenin's analysis of these decisions which would prove politically significant. Lenin saw the decisions of the western parties as a great betrayal. In his view, the working classes of the major powers now benefited from their countries' imperialism – they had become an aristocracy of labor. The leaders of these parties were blinded by their successes and subordinated their principles to electoral considerations. Finally, the International itself simply lacked the institutional capacity to control its own members. Lenin sought to advance this line of analysis at a series of conferences organized by the Zimmerwald (Switzerland) Committee in 1915 and 1916 at the behest of radicals such as Liebknecht, Luxemburg, and Radek, but he failed to carry the day. Still, the Zimmerwald movement also failed to reinvigorate the Second International.

The first conference of the Communist International or Comintern (1919–43) took place in Moscow. At the time, uprisings in central Europe and radical activism elsewhere made it reasonable to believe that the flames of revolution would spread west from Russia. The Bolsheviks and other radicals thus saw the establishment of a new and revolutionary international as a viable and necessary option; in fact, Lenin had called for it as early as April 1917. This option, however, was not without its opponents. Rosa Luxemburg, for example, instructed the Spartacus delegates to the 1919 congress to oppose a new international. Similarly, efforts to reconcile the two Internationals continued for some time, most notably through the so-called “Two and a Half” International based in Vienna. These were unsuccessful; the Vienna group eventually merged with the remnants of the Second International, while some of its members and leaders joined the Third.

It was not only political and philosophical considerations that kept the two Internationals apart. In keeping with his analysis of the Second International, Lenin proposed and the second Congress of the Comintern (1920) approved a specific organizational model which excluded most Second International parties. The statutes of the Third International provided for a structure similar to the centralized model of the Soviet Communist Party, thus guaranteeing that the member parties would consistently follow the policies and directives of the Third International. In addition, another document, the so-called Twenty One Points, set up conditions for membership, including similar organizational structure and programmatic standards for all parties, as well as the exclusion of parties which counted among their members a number of explicitly named individuals such as Karl Kautsky (1854–1938). It was these measures, as well as the prestige and resources of the Soviet state, which brought the Communist International under the control of the Russian party. In the end, the Comintern would become an effective instrument of Soviet foreign policy.

The Third International was conceived as a revolutionary organization, but it soon changed its position. Although the International embraced the policy of a “united front” during its third congress (1921), which would promote alliances among workers of all movements to defend their class interests, it also accepted at this time the proposition that capitalism had stabilized itself, thereby preparing the way to remove revolutionary action (but not rhetoric) from the agenda. Despite this and despite Stalin’s opposition, the Executive Committee of the International did approve of a revolutionary action in Germany in 1923. It would be the last independent action of the Comintern. As Stalin consolidated his position within the Russian party and so in the Soviet Union, he also came to have greater control over the International, which by then was very much under the influence of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. This trend was reinforced once the Stalin government embraced the principle of “socialism in one country” (originally proposed by Bukharin in 1922) toward 1924. From this pragmatically justifiable point of view, the defense of the Soviet Union became the overriding concern of the communist labor movement and particularly of the International.

Certainly in its organizational capabilities, the Comintern embodied Lenin’s answers to the institutional weakness of the Second International. During the 1920s and 1930s the Third International was able to provide authoritative guidance to communist parties around the world. In Europe, and especially in Germany, this involved purging a number of significant figures from the party. Similarly, the Comintern remained silent when, in 1923, the USSR provided crucial support to the founders of the Chinese Nationalist Party (Kuomintang) and made for an alliance between the Chinese communists and the Kuomintang, which resulted in the massacre of the Chinese communists – all of this despite the fact that the Chinese communists were members of the Comintern. On a more positive note, once the Nazis had come to power in Germany (1933), the Communist International promoted the “Popular Front” among its member parties. Through this policy, communists joined with socialists and even liberals in forming governing coalitions which would seek to prevent the rise of fascism in a number of countries, including France, Spain, Chile, the Netherlands, and, less urgently, the United States and Great Britain. All of these policies were very much in keeping with the Soviet leadership's conception of that state's interests. In the end, when the USSR was negotiating the opening of a European front with the Allies in 1943, the Presidium of the Third International announced the dissolution of the organization.

Intifada I and Intifada II

Lawrence Davidson

Intifada is the Arabic word for “shaking off.” It is the name given to two recent popular uprisings of the Palestinian people in the Occupied Territories against Israeli occupations and oppression. Israel occupied the West Bank and the Gaza Strip following its victory in the 1967 Six Day War. For 20 years thereafter it proceeded to confiscate Palestinian land, create illegal Jewish settlements in the conquered territories, and place the Palestinian population under repressive rules that restricted their personal mobility and economic potential.

This process created a situation that can metaphorically be compared to a volcano. In other words, in the year 1987, Israel's occupation sat atop a thin layer of seeming stability underneath which roiled a deep and broad layer of tension and resentment. All that was needed to have the volcano explode was an incident that would crack the layer that held back the tensions of the situation. That incident took place on December 8, 1987 near a crowded checkpoint leading in and out of the Gaza Strip. An Israeli truck went out of control and struck and killed four Palestinians. Though the incident was most likely accidental, the rumor rapidly spread that it was a deliberate act of murder. Within days the Gaza Strip, and soon after the West Bank, were in a state of general rebellion. This first Intifada would last for six years, until the signing of the Oslo Accords in 1993.

The Intifada was not organized by any central authority, such as the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO, then headquartered in faraway Tunis). Indeed, the PLO was as much surprised by the rebellion as were the Israelis. As the spontaneous acts of resistance (initially youths throwing rocks at Israeli soldiers, settlers, and policemen) spread, they began to be organized and directed by grassroots elements most of which were associated with either Yasser Arafat's Fatah or Hamas, the Palestinian Islamic fundamentalist organization. Eventually a united front group formed called United National Leadership of the Uprising (UNLU). Other grassroots organizations which had taken root to support the population under occupation, such as medical groups, women's groups, and religious groups, also played a role in sustaining the Intifada. Soon the rock throwing was joined by such tactics as general strikes, the refusal to purchase Israeli goods, and a tax boycott.

As the Intifada generated grassroots organizations within the Occupied Territories, this growing local leadership put pressure on the PLO in Tunis to develop a plan with more definitive steps to guide the Palestinians to their national goals. As a result the PLO leadership called a meeting of the Palestine National Council (PNC) held in Algeria in November of 1988. The PNC proclaimed the goals of the Palestinian struggle to be the creation of an independent state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. This would be established as a state living peacefully next to Israel, which the PNC now recognized. It also renounced terrorism as a tactic of the Palestinian struggle. If the Israeli government had responded in kind to this momentous compromise in Palestinian goals there would be peace in the Holy Land today. However, the Israeli policy of colonizing the Occupied Territories was a clear sign that powerful forces in Israel were more interested in territorial expansion than peace.

Because Israeli interest in a just peace was lacking, its government responded to the Intifada with massive force and brutality. They called this a strategy of "force, power, and blows." Army commanders were instructed to break the arms of rock throwers (several instances of this tactic were captured on video tape and shown worldwide, except in the United States). Between 1987 and 1991 the Israeli army killed over 1,000 Palestinians, 200 of whom were under the age of 16. About 100 Israelis died. The Israelis increasingly labeled the Palestinians terrorists but failed to note the ten to one kill ratio. Nonetheless, the Israelis were not able to suppress the Intifada by force.

As this first Intifada went on, year in and year out, a division occurred within the Israeli government. Yitzhak Rabin, who was of the Labor Party and had become defense minister within the unity government then ruling Israel, came to a realization that force alone would not end the rebellion. He concluded that the Palestinians must be given some form of statehood. This did not mean that he had in mind the same form of viable statehood the Palestinians desired, but Rabin was at least willing to begin negotiating with the Palestinians. Unfortunately, there was strong opposition to this position on the part of the right-wing Likud Party, whose leader at the time, Yitzhak Shamir (who had once been a member of the terrorist Stern Gang), was prime minister. The Likud wanted a "military solution" to the Intifada.

It was not until 1992, with the Palestinians still in a state of rebellion, that Rabin was elected prime minister of Israel. He soon authorized the secret negotiations that led to the Oslo Accords (signed in Washington, DC on September 13, 1993). These Accords were to lead the way to a staged Israeli withdrawal from the Occupied Territories and the creation of a Palestine National Authority. The Accords also allowed Yasser Arafat to return from Tunis to Ramallah in the West Bank. The initial optimism generated among the Palestinians by the Oslo Accords brought an end to the first Intifada. In retrospect many Palestinians now think that they were misled by the Israelis and that Oslo's promise of a productive "peace process" was only a myth.

Several years of negotiations followed and the "facts on the ground" provided evidence that the Israeli government had no real intention of completely withdrawing from the Territories. Indeed, during the seven years of the Oslo peace process that preceded the outbreak of the second Intifada, conditions for the Palestinians deteriorated and the colonization process accelerated. However, in the initial period following the signing of the Accords, the mere fact that Rabin was discussing territorial compromise with the Palestinians caused a growing number of Israeli religious extremists to brand him a traitor. In 1995 one of these extremists murdered Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin. It was a sign of the reluctance of the Israeli people in general to sacrifice for peace that in the general election that followed Rabin's assassination, they elected a right-wing conservative majority to the Knesset and placed Benjamin Netanyahu of the Likud Party in the office of prime minister. From that point on any chance that the Oslo Accords would succeed was gone.

In the summer of 2000 there was an abortive effort made to institute a variation on the Oslo Accords when President Bill Clinton brought Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak and Yasser Arafat to the United States for Camp David II. Although the story was put out that Barak had made Arafat a "generous offer" which he foolishly refused, the truth is quite different. What was offered Arafat was a Palestinian "state" divided into numerous, disconnected cantons the external and economic affairs of which were to be controlled by Israel. This may well have always been the end product that Israel envisioned for the Oslo Accords, but it was one that Arafat, or any other serious Palestinian leader, could not accept.

By the early fall of 2000 most Palestinians realized that the Oslo process was at a dead end and optimism turned to despair. Then, on September 28, in a move approved by the Barak government and almost certainly planned as provocative, Ariel Sharon, leader of the Likud Party, entered the Haram al-Sharif complex in Jerusalem accompanied by a massive police contingent. This was the Muslim holy site of the Al-Aqsa Mosque. This episode triggered the second Intifada, also known as the Al-Aqsa Intifada.

The second Intifada has proven much more violent than the first. The initial Palestinian demonstrations were met with even greater Israeli violence than was the case in the first Intifada. Within a month 200 Palestinians were dead. Also, very quickly Palestinian popular demonstrations gave way to guerilla war tactics on the part of an armed resistance.

In February of 2001 Ariel Sharon became Israel's prime minister. Sharon was a hardline general who had the well-deserved reputation for brutal and aggressive action against Palestinians. Immediately the repression intensified. According to the Israeli writer Yitzhak Laor, Israeli army records reveal that Israeli forces fired approximately one million rounds of live ammunition at Palestinian targets at this time ("Diary," in the London Review of Books, October 3, 2002). Tactics such as targeted assassination of Palestinian leaders, the use of helicopter gunships and F-16 warplanes against civilian urban areas, prolonged "shoot to kill" curfews, and the shooting down of unarmed demonstrators now became common. In the opinion of the Palestinian intellectual Ali Abunimah, "no people in history, not Indians led by Gandhi, nor South Africans led by Nelson Mandela, ever faced the kind of state violence that Palestinians faced without some of them resorting to armed resistance or desperate acts of revenge" ("On Violence and the Intifada," The Electronic Intifada, January 22, 2003).

It was the Israeli army's total disregard for Palestinian civilian life, against the backdrop of prolonged despair, that brought an eventual response in kind. As a tactical last resort, after decades of repression, some of the Palestinian resistance groups launched suicide bombings against Israeli civilian targets. It was an "illegitimate and immoral response to an illegitimate and immoral occupation."

The second Intifada has also seen the growing popularity of the Palestinian Islamic fundamentalist movement Hamas. Hamas has led the second Intifada resistance in the Gaza Strip and has developed a widespread social service system to meet the needs of many Palestinians in the Occupied Territories. Its initial tactic of resistance was the support of mass demonstrations but when these proved ineffective and led to growing civilian casualties, Hamas took up arms and was involved in launching some of the suicide bombings against Israel.

The use of suicide bombings became a much more riveting topic in the western media than the repression and oppression of the Occupation ever were. Because this was so, western readers are almost unanimously unable to place the tactic within an accurate historical context. Nonetheless, it was the growing worldwide objection to the tactic that eventually caused the Palestinian resistance groups to halt the practice. The Israelis seem to have credited their own countermeasures, such as the so-called "security fence," for the abatement of bombings.

The second Intifada also spurred on American efforts to settle the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, as can be seen in George W. Bush's "Road Map to Peace." These, however, have been as ineffectual as past American efforts and for the same reason. The US political structure is tied to powerful lobby groups, and the American Zionist lobbies, both Jewish and Christian, are among the strongest. Thus any American plan for a settlement of the conflict is subject to prior Israeli review. Nor does lack of Israeli cooperation bring about any serious American reaction.

For the Palestinians the failure of both the first and second Intifadas to move the Israelis toward a just peace has generated dangerous, though not surprising, divisiveness. That divisiveness is most clearly seen between Hamas and Fatah, which have long competed for leadership within the Occupied Territories. However, since the death of Yasser Arafat in 2004, Fatah itself has split into factions some of which wish to cooperate with Israel. This fracturing of Palestinian resolve in the face of prolonged occupation is what Israel's decades-long policy has aimed at. The western governments must take much responsibility for the injustice as they consistently refused lay down any penalties for Israeli brutality, even when officially declared in violation of international law. The world has given Israel a green light to crush the Palestinians and they have proceeded to do so in the harshest fashion.

Iqbal, Muhammad (1877–1938)

Farooq Sulehria

Dr. Muhammad Iqbal, reverentially known as Allama (Sage), is unquestionably one of the most important twentieth-century Urdu poets. While Pakistan claims Iqbal to be its national poet, responsible for conceiving the idea of Pakistan, India takes pride in Iqbal's masterpiece "Tarana-e-Hindi" (The Song of India); in fact, Iqbal died nearly ten years before the creation of Pakistan and the division of the Indian subcontinent in 1947. Iqbal was highly critical of capitalism, and paid glowing tributes to Karl Marx and Lenin. He was, however, a devout Muslim, and never associated with atheistic Bolshevism. While declaring the Qur'an a panacea for all ills and capitalism a curse to this world, Iqbal rejected the destruction of capitalism. The Progressive Writers' movement in Pakistan was divided over Iqbal's legacy. While a large majority of progressives disowned Iqbal, stalwarts like Faiz Ahmed Faiz defended him as a Muslim intellectual who sought to cleanse the House of God of all false idols; others viewed him as an obscurantist mullah, a withdrawn mystic, and a demagogue.

Muhammad Iqbal was born in Sialkot, a town in northern Pakistan, in 1877. After his matriculation and intermediate examinations at the Scotch Mission School, he moved to Lahore. He graduated from Government College, Lahore in 1897 and later earned a master of arts in philosophy (1899). After graduation he started teaching English at Government College in Lahore, and began drawing a large audience to hear his poetry. It was his "Tarana-e-Hindi," written in 1904, which brought him fame across British India.

In 1905 Iqbal left Lahore for Europe to study for three years, earning another BA, a law degree, and a PhD in philosophy. On his return he settled in Lahore. It was as a poet and Muslim intellectual that he became immortal. The publication of his first Persian-language collection of poems, Israr-e-Khudi (1915), resulted in both fame and controversy. In his attempt to explain his concept of Khudi (Ego), he criticized the Sufis, especially the legendary Persian poet Hafiz. Since Hafiz is held in great esteem by Muslims, many Muslim intellectuals strongly criticized Iqbal for desecrating a holy man. The reaction was so strong that in the second edition Iqbal withdrew the poems about Hafiz.

Controversy surrounded Iqbal throughout his life. On January 1, 1923 he was knighted and a year later he lent support to Abd' Al-Aziz Saud of Arabia. A mullah (Islamic legal expert) in Lahore issued a fatwa declaring Iqbal an apostate. Both his knighthood and his support for Saud antagonized a section of Muslims involved in the Khilafat movement, in alliance with the Gandhi-led Congress. The Khilafat movement demanded the retention of the Ottoman Empire since its Sultan was also the Khalifa, or head of all Sunni Muslims (the majority of Indian Muslims were Sunnis). Saud's British-backed attempt to establish an independent Arab kingdom was seen as treachery.

Iqbal's poetic reputation was enhanced further, in spite of the controversy, with the publications of Piam-e-Mashriq (The Message of the East, 1923) and Bang-e-Dra (Call of the Caravan, 1924). The former was a response to Goethe's West-Ostlicher Divan (itself a reaction to Hafiz). In it, Iqbal tried to send a message of spirituality to the West. Bang-e-Dra was his first collection of Urdu poems.

In 1926 Iqbal ran for a seat in the Punjab Legislative Assembly and was elected; however, as a parliamentarian he remained obscure. He expressed himself best in literary and philosophical terms. Away from politics he delivered his famous six lectures in 1928, later published as The Reconstruction of Religious Thought in Islam (1930); it was considered a bold attempt to interpret Islam in line with the modern age. As President of the Muslim League in 1930 Iqbal was the first to envisage an autonomous state for the Muslims of India in Northwestern India (roughly present-day Pakistan). In 1931 he traveled to London to represent Indian Muslims at the Round Table Conference called by the British rulers to solve the Indian question. On his way back he stayed in Rome and called on Mussolini. His poem praising the Fascist leader triggered yet another round of controversy. In 1932 he published Javed Nama, which he called an Asian “divine comedy.” In 1935 his second poetry collection in Urdu, Bal-e-Jibrael, came out. He died soon after in Lahore on April 4, 1938.

Iran, Kurdish national autonomy movement

Nandini Bhattacharya

The Kurds are the largest non-state nation in West Asia, and their homeland, Kurdistan, remains distributed mainly among Turkey, Iraq, and Iran, and to a lesser extent in Armenia, Azerbaijan, and Syria. Five to six million Kurds, forming 10 percent of Iran’s population, still live in Iran and strive to carve out their autonomous existence. Despite the changes in ideology and regimes, Iranian nationalism and Kurdish identities have repeatedly clashed since 1945.

During World War I, Kurdish leaders announced independence, taking advantage of Iran’s political weakness. Ismael Agha established authority in the west of the Lake Urmia zone from 1918 to 1922, and Jafar Sultan began to expand his control between Marivan and Halabja. Reza Khan, leader of the Iran empire, suppressed the efforts at autonomy. Ismael Agha was killed in 1930 and hundreds of Kurdish chiefs were deported and exiled. During World War II, when Allied troops entered Iran in 1941, the Kurdish movement gathered momentum under Hama Rashid from Baneh, who was finally driven out in late 1944 by the Persian army.

Meanwhile, from 1942 onwards, the Society for the Revival of Kurdistan, popularly known as Komala (Kurdish for society), developed in Mahabad in Iran. Principally an urban bourgeois body with a small nationalist clergy and landed aristocracy, Komala became the Kurdistan Democratic Party (KDP) in 1945 with the program of establishing an autonomous republic in the area under the Soviet sphere of influence. On January 22, 1946, Qazi Muhammad of the KDP proclaimed a progressive Kurdish Republic, with space for marginals, minorities, and women, in the city of Mahabad with tacit Soviet support. Confined to the cities of Mahabad, Bukan, Nagada, and Oshneviyeh, the republic did not claim independence, although it had a president, a flag, a cabinet, and a national army, and Kurdish was the official language.

Some of the republic’s social and political demands were: the use of Kurdish as the medium of education and administration; the establishment of a single law for both peasants and notables; the election of a provincial council for Kurdistan to supervise state and social matters; all state officials to be of local origin; and unity and fraternity with the Azerbaijani people. Though small, the Kurdish Republic inspired hundreds of Iraqi Kurds to actively participate in military and civil administration. Mulla Mustafa al-Barzani, the leader of the Iraqi Kurdish movement who had been driven from Iraq, was commander of the republic’s army.

The US and Britain viewed the Kurdish Republic as an extension of Soviet influence and supported the Shah’s military campaign against it. Soviet troops withdrew from Iran in May 1946, and seven months later, Iranian forces suppressed the autonomous republic. Qazi Muhammad was hanged in Mahabad on March 31, 1947 on charges of treason. Devoid of a rural social base, the republic was isolated.

From the 1950s, peasant uprisings developed as the outcome of social transformation in Kurdish villages. Land reforms by the central government and the peasant exodus to Kurdish cities led to the development of an urban, educated working class. A modern bourgeoisie comprising mainly professionals rather than entrepreneurs emerged, while a small Kurdish working class formed in the oil industry, construction, and other factories. Traditional ulama (experts in religious law) and landed elites were displaced by an emerging modern intelligentsia. Gender relations changed as urban women gained access to education, followed by public participation in social, economic, political, and cultural life. Such changes left their impact on the various strands of Kurdish autonomy movements.

In the 1960s and 1970s armed resistance in Iraq initially contributed to the revival of the KDP in Iran (KDPI). In 1969, a group of radical intellectuals formed the Revolutionary Organization of Toilers of Kurdistan. Distinct from both pro-Soviet tendencies and the urban guerilla emphasis of some Iranian revolutionary groups, it mobilized Kurdish peasant youths. One wing's program was close to Iran's Communist Tudeh (Mass) Party, while another wing after 1968 was influenced more by European social democracy. The party program of 1973 demanded autonomy, parliamentary democracy, equal rights for landlords and peasants, redistribution of land, and gender equality. The anti-Shah revolution saw the KDP integrating demands for linguistic rights and self-government into the common call for the abolition of the Shah's rule. But it had to compete with numerous radical left groups that called for a social revolution besides autonomy.

The pro-Tudeh wing of the KDP, opposed in principle to religion, accepted collaboration with Ayatollah Khomeini. The KDP mainstream, steering a course between left radicalism and accommodation, engaged in guerilla resistance when the new regime sent its army to Kurdistan. Khomeini, consolidating his position, engaged in brutal persecution, since the majority of Kurds were Sunni, while most Iranians were Shi'ite Muslims. Khomeini prevented Abdul Rahman Ghassemlon, the elected representative of the Iranian Kurds, from entering the assembly of experts. In 1980, the regime unleashed a military campaign to capture most of the Kurdish cities, including Mahabad. After 1983 the KDP and its left factions participated peripherally in the Kurdish movement of Iran as its leaders were forced to move across the Iraqi border. The new regime could not trust the Kurdish faction given its cross-border alliances and separatist ethno-linguistic identities, even as it sought to manipulate Iraqi Kurds against Saddam Hussein.

Iran, the Mossadegh era: democratic socialists and the US-backed coup

Nandini Bhattacharya

Imperialist exploitation of Iran was carried out primarily through the Anglo-Persian Oil Company (renamed the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company or AIOC in 1935), which played a role analogous to the East India Company in India in earlier times. The discovery of oil in 1908 by the British in Khuzestan gave rise to new interests regarding Iran in the British empire. The significance of oil as a factor in the world economy was becoming well recognized by the beginning of World War I, and as a result, Iran's occupation by Russian, British, and Ottoman troops during the war was linked to its oil.

Iranian oil was not just a valuable source of revenue for the British. It was central to maintaining the British empire throughout the world against other European competitors and aspiring independence movements in the colonies themselves. Reza Khan Pahlavi, who carried out a coup in 1921 and subsequently almost forced the Majlis (parliament) to depose Ahmad Shah, the last Qajar king, in October 1925 on an assurance to landlords and the conservative clergy that he would defend Islamic law and would not undertake any radical reform, had the full backing of British imperialism. Some leaders of the Majlis, particularly Hassan Modarres and the young Dr. Mohammad Mossadegh, were opposed to Reza Khan's plan to consolidate his autocracy, but the Majlis declared him the Shah on December 12, 1925.

As the founder of the Pahlavi dynastic rule, Reza Shah unleashed a policy of modernization and secularization of politics on the western model. At the same time, despite an opportunity to improve the terms between the APOC/AIOC and Iran, the Shah did little. Abdolhossein Teymourtash, a leading minister, had demanded 25 percent of the APOC's shares, but the Shah's agreement in 1933 ultimately gave the best 100,000 square miles to the AIOC (as it was renamed), and accepted an agreement whereby it would pay £750,000 per year at a minimum. In response, Mossadegh and other opponents of the Shah's repressive rule formed the Jebhe Melli (National Front) of Iran, which profoundly shaped the contours of oil nationalism.

During World War II, Iran became a vital link in the Allied supply line. Reza Shah Pahlavi, suspected of secretly collaborating with the Germans, was forced to abdicate in favor of his son Mohammad Reza Pahlavi by the combined British and Soviet troops in 1941. Mohammad Reza Shah's regime, which continued till 1979, was a period of utter chaos and indecision. Yet voices in favor of independent political decisions on some important issues could be heard quite distinctly. Public opinion in favor of nationalization of Iran's oil industry grew from 1949 onwards.

The Shah versus Oil Nationalism

By 1950 Abadan, a city in the Khuzestan province in southwestern Iran, had become the world's largest refinery. The AIOC, which had a monopoly control over oil supply in Iran, relied heavily on Iranian oilfields for three-quarters of its supplies. At the same time, most extreme forms of exploitation were carried out. Iranian laborers lived in slums and long dormitories with only primitive sanitation. The air was heavy with sulfur fumes, a constant reminder of the vast wealth that was pouring from Iranian soil into AIOC's coffers. Politically conscious Iranians were aware that the British government derived more revenue from taxing the concessionaire, the AIOC, than the Iranian government derived from royalties. The oil issue figured prominently in the 1949 elections for the Majlis, and nationalists were putting heavy pressure on the government to renegotiate the terms of contract with AIOC. During the 1950s, Iran's dynamic leader, Mossadegh, who was pro-democratic in spirit, stubbornly upheld the nationalist demand for oil industries.

In November 1950, the Majlis committee concerned with oil matters, headed by Mossadegh, rejected a draft agreement in which AIOC refused to accept 50–50 profit-sharing terms like most of the other Persian Gulf oil concessions. When AIOC ultimately offered this equal share of profit, nationalists demanded complete nationalization of the oil industries. The prime minister, General Ali Razmara, who advised against nationalization on technical grounds, was assassinated in March 1951 by a militant of the Fadayan-e Islam group. In the same month the Majlis voted to nationalize the oil industry. Mohammad Mossadegh was made prime minister in the next month by the demand of the Majlis under popular pressure.

Oil nationalization was a landmark in the nationalist history of Iran. Britain took the issue of Iran's oil nationalization to the International Court of Justice at The Hague. The dispute between Iran and AIOC remained unsettled as the court ruled in Iran's favor. Ultimately, the US intervened in the oil issue and manipulated AIOC to offer better terms. Meanwhile, British rejection of the initial efforts led to radicalization within Iran. An atmosphere of militant anti-compromise politics was created, whereby the government rejected all offers. The economy began to suffer from the loss of foreign exchange and oil revenues as countries allied to Britain refused to take Iranian oil, and the Abadan refinery was closed. AIOC withdrew from Iran and traded off its other reserves. Mossadegh's growing popularity and power challenged various imperial powers.

The Shah's refusal of Mossadegh's demand for the constitutional prerogative of the prime minister to name a minister of war forced his resignation in 1952. But as a result of rising public pressure coordinated by the National Front and supported by Communists, Mossadegh was reappointed three days later. Mossadegh now took up seriously the cause of Iranian nationalism. Using emergency powers, Mossadegh tried to strengthen the democratically elected political institutions by limiting the monarchy's powers, cutting the Shah's personal budget, forbidding him to communicate directly with foreign diplomats, and transferring royal lands back to the state.

Cold War Politics and the Coup

Mossadegh also weakened the landed aristocracy, abolishing Iran's centuries-old feudal agriculture sector, seeking progressive land reforms in a bid to undercut the growing influence of the Tudeh (Communist) Party, even though they were convenient allies. In Marxist terms, Mossadegh was a bourgeois nationalist. But in 1952–3, when he traveled to the United Nations to make a case for the Iranian people, his was the first voice of the third world that the West heard, before Nkrumah, Nasser, or Lumumba. In that Cold War era, Mossadegh transgressed the limits of protest. As a willing associate of progressive forces, including the Tudeh Party, he was immediately a suspect figure. This further determined his Anglo-American critics to move strongly against him.

A secret CIA operation for the shift of the regime, code-named TPAJAX, which worked directly with royalist Iranian military officers, chose an officer named Shah General Zahedi as an alternative for the prime minister, but ultimately looked forward to the initiative on the part of the Shah for the overthrow of the nationalist regime. The scheme for a coup was not moving very smoothly as Shah Pahlavi continued to vacillate. Meanwhile, Mossadegh began to realize that there was a plot against him. He sought to consolidate power by calling for a national referendum to dissolve the parliament in August 1953. The results of this referendum, held on August 4, were overwhelmingly in his favor.

Within ten days the Shah was finally forced by the operation to sign the decrees agreeing to support an army-led coup, news of which spread rapidly among the army officers backing General Zahedi as prime minister, who could only be appointed or dismissed by the Majlis. The coup began on August 15–16, but initially did not attain much success. The soldiers sent to arrest Mossadegh at his home were captured. On August 17 and 18, a massive demonstration in support of Mossadegh was staged, while statues of the Shah and his father were pulled down all over the country. Indecision prevailed for quite a few days as the operation was stalemated, and the Shah left for Baghdad. Mossadegh, on the other hand, dissolved the parliament. Meanwhile, the Tudeh Party had been attacked and destroyed by Iranian soldiers in support of the Shah. The Shah's return to Iran in late August was followed by the imposition of martial law.

Mossadegh was ousted in 1953 and the coup turned out to be successful, with the CIA taking full credit for the event. With Iranian society still containing a strong royalist section, the coup succeeded because substantial sections of the army and upper-class opinion ultimately decided to back the Shah, in view of the communist support for Mossadegh. Mossadegh was jailed for three years, while his minister of foreign affairs, Hossein Fatemi, was executed, as were many Tudeh Party members. Hundreds of National Front members were imprisoned. The coup of 1953 and the overthrow of the parliamentary regime showed how the Cold War politics of the United States was crucial for the smashing of nationalism. Anti-US sentiment in Iran subsequently drew its legacy from the memory of the coup.

In return for the removal of Mossadegh, with US support, Mohammad Reza Shah agreed in 1954 to allow an international consortium of British (40 percent), American (40 percent), French (6 percent), and Dutch (14 percent) companies to run the Iranian oil facilities for the next 25 years, with a 50–50 split of profit with Iran. But the consortium refused to allow Iran to audit its accounts to confirm the amount of profit properly, or to have members on its board of directors. During the oil crisis the Shah took a lukewarm stand in favor of the Anglo-US design. However, once the coup succeeded, his pro-West policy became even more blatant and unrestricted. Despite a return to some sort of stability in the late 1950s and the 1960s, with such a surrender to western high-handedness, the scope for the economic development of Iran along national lines was thwarted.

Iran, political and cultural protests, 1844–1914

Nandini Bhattacharya

Iran, the land of ancient civilization, with a history of political preeminence and rich cultural heritage, witnessed in the nineteenth century almost a clash of culture and civilization while encountering western encroachment in the realm of ideas and politics. It stood as the only country that refused to accept the western model of state and polity. Forms of protest must therefore be judged in terms quite distinct from models set by western ideas. Two distinct forms of protest can be recorded – resistance within an Islamic framework, and constitutionalist resistance.

The Babi Conference

The quest for freedom was one of the most exalted ideals for which Iranians had long struggled. Intellectual trends to rise against the existing norms could be traced back as early as the Babi movement of the 1840s, when a section of religious activists challenged the existing Shi'ite norms and practices of Islam in Iran. The Babi were a group of people with a charismatic leader, Sayyid Ali Muhammad, surnamed the Bab (the Gate). In 1844, he promised to usher in the way to Qa'im (Messiah), thereby initiating a new era in the history of Islam. This claim on the part of the Bab implied outright challenge to the position of the Shi'ite clergy as well as the temporal authority of the Qajar dynasty (Iranian–Turkmen dynasty established in 1781). Subsequently his imprisonment by the authorities generated a movement by 81 of his followers, the Babis. As a result, the Babi Conference took place at Badasht in Khorasan between June and July 1848. Mulla Muhammad Ali Barfurushi, popularly known as Qaddus, was one of the first leaders to join the Babi movement and participated in the Badasht Conference along with his companions. The other famous Babi leader was a poetess named Qurrat al-'Ayn, who along with her companions was traveling from Teheran in order to join Qaddus and his companions. The two groups met and decided to rent three gardens. The first garden was assigned to Qurrat al-'Ayn surnamed Tahirih (the Pure One), the second to Qaddus, and the third to Mirza Husayn Ali, who later took the title of Abdu'l-Baha. Undoubtedly the most significant event in this regard was the occasion of the poetess' unveiled appearance at the public meeting. The unveiling of a woman spontaneously in the public sphere in nineteenth-century Shi'ite Iran was virtually an act of revolt against male domination. Thus, the Babi Conference carried a revolt within a revolt for which the remaining leaders were unprepared. Even revolutionary men who had assembled against tradition in their quest for a new religious direction could not accept such independence and strong individuality on the part of a woman. This startling event received marked attention in the writings of contemporary narrators, such as Nabil's Narrative, which recorded Shaykh Abu Turab's experiences. Abu Turab described that it was inconceivable for the other male members to accept the public unveiling of a woman, who was regarded as the incarnation of Fatimah – the noblest symbol of chastity. Turab's narration also mentions that one participant even cut his throat in reaction and many others left the conference. Qurrat al-'Ayn, however, remained unperturbed; with composure and dignity, she sat beside Qaddus to deliver her speech. Not only did she show unprecedented courage in going against social norms, she also claimed enormous power for herself in defying the authority of the chiefs and nobles. Moreover, the poetess-leader argued for a definitive break with old Islamic traditions at the conference and questioned Qaddus's very claim to leadership as he had failed to rouse a Babi revolt in Mashhad, one of the holiest cities of the Shi'ias. This radical split between the two leaders indicates the complex dynamics of the Badasht Conference and brings up the question of gender relations within Islam. The event has been viewed in contemporary history as representing two opposite extremes of women and Islam: as the starting point of women's liberation, or as an outright act of heresy.

An important landmark in the history of Iran, the Babi Conference raised one of the basic social issues that still remains unresolved – that of the hijab and the public–private dichotomy within the Islamic framework. It is also noteworthy that rejection of the hijab had come from within the religious community and was voiced by a woman, without the intervention of any alien agency. This exceptionally brave woman was ultimately put to death by the existing Qajar ruling orthodoxy.

The Qajar Era: Constitutional Revolution

With the turn of the century Iran began to face a number of problems in the political sphere as western thoughts and ideas began to percolate. There was also the overbearing presence on her borders of two European great powers – Russia and Britain. The rulers of the Qajar dynasty, who had governed Iran since 1797, could not wholly ignore the influence and domination of imperial forces from outside. During the rule of the Qajar king, Nasser-al-Din Shah (1848–96), western science, technology, and educational methods were introduced in Iran and the country's modernization began. Despite his best efforts, Nasser-al-Din Shah could not actually prevent foreign encroachments into the traditional regional life of Iran. The regime of his weak successor Mozaffar-al-Din Shah (1896–1907) became financially dependent on foreign powers, particularly Russia. Protests were organized against the Shah by the Shi'ia religious establishment, merchants, and other sections of the population. In January 1906, fearing possible arrest, merchants and clerical leaders took sanctuary in mosques in Teheran and outside the capital. On August 12, 1906, the Shah was forced to accept the popular demand and issued a decree promising a constitution.

In the Qajar era, Iranian society was stratified into two broad categories of privileged and underprivileged people. The privileged were a narrow section comprising courtiers, state officials, tribal leaders, religious notables, landlords, and big merchants, while the vast majority of peasants, tribals, agricultural laborers, and laborers in traditional handicrafts and services remained underprivileged. However, between these two broad divisions, there were several middling strata that included local notables, headmen of semi-urban zones and villages, ordinary landowners and merchants, master artisans and shopkeepers, and others. Interestingly, the constitutional law introduced by the Shah in 1906 attested to this social hierarchy quite vividly.

Instead of applying a simple “one man-one vote” rule, this law brought six categories with a distinct number of votes assigned to them according to their class position and social standing. The tabaqas (classes) were: (1) princes and the Qajars; (2) a'yun va ashraf (nobles and notables); (3) ulama (religious leaders) and tollab (theology students); (4) tojjar (merchants); (5) landed proprietors and mallakin va fellahin (farmers); and (6) asnaf (master artisans and shopkeepers). Out of a total of 156 deputies, 60 were to be allotted from the capital. The law limited the right to vote to men over the age of 25 and restricted it further to those who belonged to one of the aforementioned categories. Thus the vast majority of the population fell outside these six social categories, including the mass of peasantry, tribesmen, laborers, apprentices, and foot-boys in the bazaar. And, of course, women across the categories remained out of the orbit of enfranchisement and in effect were not recognized as “citizens.” In October, an elected assembly was convened which drew up a constitution that markedly limited the royal power and created a Majlis (elected legislature) and a cabinet accountable to the Majlis. The Shah signed the constitution on December 30, 1906 and died five days after. The new Fundamental Laws approved in 1907 provided limited freedom of speech, press, and association, and recognized the security of life and property.

Mohammad Ali Shah, the next monarch (1907–9), made a futile attempt in 1908 to abolish parliamentary government with Russian assistance. In retaliation, resistance to the Shah arose in Tabriz, Esfahan, Rasht, and elsewhere. Many intellectuals and political activists swelled the ranks of revolutionaries and several became martyrs in their zeal to uphold freedom and liberty. Bibi Khānoom Astarābādi's name deserves special mention not only as one of the founding figures of the Iranian women's movement but also as a major activist, who contributed to this constitutional revolution by her pen. Founder of the girls' school in Teheran (the first of its kind in Iran) in 1907, Astarābādi's satirical book Ma'ayeb al-Rejal (Failings of Men) was published 11 years before the constitutional revolution. Mirzā Jahāngir Khān was another revolutionary who was also a crusading editor of a progressive newspaper, Sūr-e-Esrāfil. He and Malek al-Motakallemin were particularly targeted as Babis, and were executed in 1908.

By April 1909, Tabriz freedom fighters led by Sattar Khan, in attempting to break through a blockade, lost many fellow revolutionaries. The joint effort of Bakhtiari leaders like Samsam ul Sultaneh and Haj Aligoli Khan Bakhtiari and the Gilan fighters ended in a successful takeover of the capital on July 16, 1909. The constitutional forces spared no time in deposing the Shah; he was exiled to Russia and the constitution was reestablished. In spite of their success, the constitutional forces had to face further challenges. Mohammad Ali, with Russian help, attempted a military coup in July 1910. Meanwhile, the Anglo-Russian entente in 1907 destroyed any ultimate hopes of independence and progress in Iran under the constitutional regime. By the terms of the entente, Russians controlled the north while the British preferred their stronghold in the south and east of Iran. The Iranian government, on the other hand, had appointed an American expert, Morgan Shuster, as its treasurer general. Under his directives the Iranian government sought to collect taxes from the powerful officials who were patronized by Russia. This led to the entry of the tax department of Iran into the Russian zone, near Azarbaijan. In December 1911, Russian troops attacked the capital after the Majlis had refused the Russian ultimatum to dismiss Shuster. Bakhtiari tribal chiefs and their troops surrounded the Majlis building on December 20, 1911 to combat Russian aggression and forced it to accept the Russian ultimatum, closing down the assembly. This shows the government did not have the means to enforce law and order. Constitutional experiments also remained suspended for the time being when Iran remained occupied by British, Russian, and Ottoman forces.

Though the constitutional monarchy came to an end in 1925 with the dissolution of the Qajar dynasty, it should be noted that the movement for constitutional freedom and civil liberties took a different note in Gilan, northern Iran, from 1914. Mirza Kuchak Khan organized a revolutionary movement based in the forests of Gilan known as the Nehzat-e Jangal (Forest movement). Propagating an agenda of total social reform for the poor Jangalis (forest tribes) combined with independence and Islamic unity, this movement spearheaded actions against the Qajar rulers, imperialists, landed elites, and tribal leaders.

They were fought by White Russian forces and British troops under General Dunsterville. In response, Mirza Kuchak formed an alliance with the Soviet forces. However, differences soon arose between the Communist Party, supported by Soviet Russia, and Mirza. One reason was Mirza's unwillingness to abolish feudalism. In addition, a tussle between the secularism of the communists and the religious views of Mirza Kuchak contributed to the collapse of the alliance. As a result, Reza Khan was able to defeat him.

Iranian Revolution, 1979

The Rule of the Shah

In 1953, a CIA-sponsored coup d'état overthrew the nationalist government of Mohammad Mossadegh and firmly installed Mohammad Reza

Shah Pahlavi as the dictatorial ruler of Iran. The era of martial law (1953–7) and the Baghdad Pact brought Iran closer to the West, particularly the US and its military and economic aid. The elite-based modernization program of the government, known as the White Revolution, and the increasing arbitrariness of the Shah had alienated not only certain Islamic religious and political groups but also a number of intellectuals seeking democratic reforms. Both denounced the Shah's subservience to the United States. Throughout the late 1970s there were widespread religion-led protests, supported by and involving as participants a vast majority of the disaffected population.

The Shah's regime suppressed all opposition from the working class and the left, jailing and torturing some 20,000 political prisoners with the help of Iran's security and intelligence organization, the SAVAK. Relying solely on oil revenues, especially from 1973, the Shah's pursuit of developing Iran as a mighty Gulf power within the US hegemony ultimately increased poverty for the masses and destroyed political freedom. Growing oil profits helped Iran to become the world's largest arms importer in the 1970s and to acquire a huge army – with an air force rivaling that of France – which became the guardian of US interests in the Persian Gulf. At the same time, the oil money and US military aid that flowed into Iran served to industrialize the country and create a sizable working class, with some 2.5 million people employed in manufacturing and 70,000 workers in the all-important oil industry.

The Origins of the Revolution

A significant drop in oil revenues in 1975 and the aggravated economic crisis, with disparities and cuts in wages, helped to explode the seething discontent into a widespread popular rising that eventually toppled the Shah's regime. For the first time in 14 years, thousands of slum dwellers in Teheran protested publicly against the Shah in June 1977. These movements by workers and the urban poor, followed by legalization of some opposition, opened the floodgate of protest between July and September, involving other sectors of society such as intellectuals and mullahs (traditional clergy) who had felt left out of the earlier economic boom and squeezed by foreign companies. The protests culminated in one of the largest demonstrations in history, bringing together some two million people in Teheran on September 7, 1978, although the regime retaliated by imposing martial law and massacring over 2,000 demonstrators. Subsequent strikes, particularly the strike of 30,000 oil workers, brought the country's economy to a standstill, sparking off a massive strike wave in which workers took over factories, offices, hospitals, and universities across the nation. Shoras (democratic workers' committees) were organized, which either bypassed or confronted owners and managers. Slum dwellers' committees were also set up around local mosques, thereby playing a key role in allowing the clergy to take control of the movement of the marginalized urban poor. They also took over the functions of the police and army by patrolling the neighborhoods. The main forces on the left, People's Fedayeen, People's Mojahedin guerillas, and the Communist Tudeh Party, played a leading role in mobilizing urban subaltern revolts.

On February 11, 1979, a rebellion of the Shah's army at the instigation of the Fedayeen and Mojahedin guerillas paved the way for Ayatollah Khomeini's forces and his coalition of clergy and liberal capitalist politicians to seize power. Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, just returned from exile, was able to capture the leadership of a struggle actually initiated by the working class. Despite the prominent role of the working-class strike, as Sepehri (2000) has observed, the strike committees made no coordinated attack on the structure of the capitalist system, nor was there much coordination with civil society institutions outside the workplace. This gap was filled by the religious opposition, which held a relatively privileged status, while other forces were completely smashed.

Khomeini and Islamic Fundamentalism

Since the early 1960s, Khomeini had been identified as a religious leader who had conducted a hate campaign against the Shah. Strongly opposed to the Shah's autocracy from an Islamic moralist standpoint, he began to attract much popular attention and was therefore repeatedly exiled by the Shah regime. Intellectuals and, more intriguingly, clerics in Iran upheld freedom as a sacred goal. This was reflected in numerous statements issued on the eve of the Islamic Revolution by Ayatollah Khomeini, Ayatollah Shariat Madari, and others. Khomeini was vehemently opposed to the spread of the western model of secularization, introduced in Iran by the Shah's reform program. Khomeini was imprisoned more than once, from 1963, for fomenting anti-establishment protests through his writings and speeches during the White Revolution. Khomeini's attack on the Capitulation Law, whereby any member of the US army held guilty in Iran would be tried according to US laws, met with six months' imprisonment. This had terrible repercussions when the prime minister of Iran, Hassan Ali Mansur, forced Khomeini to apologize upon his release; when he refused to do so, the prime minister slapped him. Hassan Ali Mansur was assassinated soon after this event. Four members of Fadayan-e-Islam, a secret fundamentalist society closely associated with Khomeini, were executed for the crime while Khomeini was exiled.

In exile Khomeini spent about a year in Turkey and the rest of his 14 years' absence in the Shi'ite religious city of Najaf in Iraq, where he developed his ideas in his writings. However, in 1978 he was thrown out of Iraq by Saddam Hussein, then vice-president, and went to France on a temporary visa. Taking the opportunity of the Shah's absence, he appeared in Iran on February 1979, announcing an alternative interim government against the provisional government under Shapour Bakhtiar. A majority of the army were in favor of Khomeini, because it was evident to the military high command that the mullahs were less dangerous than the militant working class. Severe repression of left-wing opponents was combined with a demagogic referendum, with the alternatives of the monarchy or an Islamic Republic. For the masses, the key issue was rejection of the monarchy. This polar opposition enabled Khomeini to secure a 98 percent vote in favor of the Islamic Republic on March 30–1, 1979. A new era of revolution ensued in Iran. But this revolution had its own unique blend of highly intoxicating religiosity and conservatism on the one hand, and adjustment with modernity and international considerations on the other. Since 1963, Khomeini had been focusing on the legend of the Karbala, the most popular symbol of martyrdom and self-sacrifice in Shi'ism, and placing it in juxtaposition to the sufferings of the people under the Shah. In 680 AD Imam Hussain, the third Imam (a powerful religious leader), opposed the tyrannical rule of Yazid, the Umayyad Caliph, risking his own life. Depicting the Shah as Yazid, Khomeini rallied the charged-up people to attain this holy martyrdom.

The charismatic personality of Ayatollah Khomeini, combined with his reputation for leading the anti-Shah struggle, made him an attractive and respected leader of the revolution. He mobilized a social bloc including the traditional bourgeoisie, with its various factions, the large and medium-sized bazaar merchants and small manufacturers, a large petty bourgeoisie, and the plebeian masses, though the uprising of February 1979 was actually started without his support. In order not to be outflanked, he supported it after it had begun. His supporters then tried to demobilize the workers' shoras, to disarm the left, and to set up an Islamic regime. The White Revolution was undermining the hold of the Shi'ite clergy, and this was what had generated Khomeini's opposition. Hence, he had supported Mossadegh's overthrow, but had subsequently opposed imperialism's influence and the westernization of Iran, which struck a chord among the masses.

The Islamic Revolution was a major turning point in the modern history of Iran. It did not merely overthrow the monarchy but was designed from the outset to achieve a complete revolution, by the Islamization of all spheres of life. After long years of repression, the referendum was a free one, with all Iranians of 16 years and above eligible to vote. Thus, a democratic maneuver was used to impose the conservative solution. From the very outset, this revolution carried a striking dichotomy. Although it rejected the western model of democracy and liberalism, the regime established itself by popular election. And, above all, at one stroke the revolution allowed all women to express their political opinions and technically to enjoy political equality alongside their male counterparts. But this was a token right and did not signify women's liberation in general. The state rather became even more repressive and authoritarian in regard to its women subjects.

The Islamic Regime

While Islam was the religion of the Iranians, not all of them saw Islam as the sole solution to their problems. Only 5,000 of the 70,000 villages had a permanent mullah presence in 1979. And they were connected to landowners. Peasants fought for and, in hundreds of villages, occupied land. Land reform legislation was stalled at the end of 1979, when mullahs like Ayatollah Golpayegani opposed it on the grounds that division of large landowners' land was contrary to Islamic principles. Thus, the radical socioeconomic dimensions of the Iranian Revolution were suppressed by using Islam as a unifying credo. The revolutionary credo al-Islam buna al-hal (Islam is the solution) embodied the alternative vision. But "Islam" is not a monolithic structure of thought and practice. The Iranian Revolution followed the Shi'ite variant of Islam. And here, too, there were multiple interpretations of the same religion. Khomeini's version of Shi'ism formed an innovative discourse.

His experimental model of a traditional Islamic brand of ideology led to a regime quite unprecedented in tradition. Beginning from a conventional religious standpoint, it reached very novel conclusions that were possible only in the modern political set-up of a nation-state. In many ways, the takeover of government was just the first phase. The revolution then had to prove that its dogma could cure society's ills, and this task became the main challenge for the revolutionary regime, especially during the Iran–Iraq War. Apparently, the revolution led to the unification of religion and state and the transfer of both theological and political power to the highest religious authority, the marja'-al-taqlid (the highest Shi'a authority), or velayat-e faqih (government of Islamic jurists). But problems developed at two levels. First, there was conflict between the philosophy of the revolution and the political interest of the Iranian state. Second, there were conceptual, factional, and personal conflicts among the revolutionaries themselves on the questions of policies, power structure, and the succession issue at the end of Khomeini era.

Khomeini found in Islam the tool to contest and combat western political and cultural ideologies. He formulated his new ideas at a time of acute internal social distress. Peasants were running away from villages to town slums, and small businessmen were feeling threatened by wealthy entrepreneurs linked to the central government as well as by multinational corporations. Khomeini harped on the point of national security threatened by the Americans, and also on the Pahlavi (state) alternative of steady encroachment upon religious properties and institutions, especially seminaries, publishing houses, and landed endowments. At this juncture, when state was about to take over religion, Khomeini turned the situation upside down and it was religion that ultimately took over the state. In fact, in his book Hokumat-e Islami: Velayat-e faqih (Islamic Government: Authority of the Jurist), he claimed the supremacy of the clerical judges while denouncing monarchy as an alien institution imposed by various external forces. This claim for supreme leadership in political as well as religious decision-making made Khomeini the unquestionable supreme authority of the state.

The Khomeini brand of "fundamentalism" received diverse and contradictory explanations from various intellectual positions. According to Abrahamian (1993), the Khomeini regime was an experiment with populism as this term is associated with ideological adaptability and intellectual flexibility, with political protests against the established order, and with socioeconomic issues that fuel mass opposition to the status quo. "Fundamentalism," in contrast, implies religious inflexibility, the centrality of scriptural doctrinal principles, political traditionalism, and social conservatism. In other words, "fundamentalism" implies the rejection of the modern world, while "populism" connotes attempts made by nation-states to enter that world. Achcar (2006: 48–59) argues that fundamentalism had a distressed petty bourgeois social base, but distinguishes between nationalism with Islam as a component and fundamentalism, which sees Islam as an end in itself. It involves a form of reactionary "internationalism" that wants to go beyond the border of the country of its origin, opposing the US not because it is imperialist and Israel not because it is a Zionist usurper of Palestinian land but because the US is the "Great Satan" and Israel "the Jewish usurper of an Islamic holy land."

In fact, the constitutional proposals saw a radical innovation. It was Khomeini who for the first time fused the two distinct yet overlapping positions of authority (political and religious) into one, by making the religious head the supreme political authority. The Islamic Revolution reached a new level of experimentation when Khomeini abolished the office of the Shah and brought political, ethical, cultural, and religious responsibilities under a new model of Islamic rule. After the success of the revolution, the task of rebuilding the state and running the government became the major practical objectives at hand. Khomeini upheld the view that the faqih (jurist-consult) had the right to act as a political ruler as part of common Shi'i political theory. But he had further extended the position of the faqih and transcended the traditional Islamic parameters of Shari'a (Islamic law). These ideas, held by Khomeini, emerged in writing Articles II and V of the Constitution of Iran in 1979. It was specifically claimed that in the absence of the mahdi imam (messiah), guardianship over the affairs of the community should be bestowed on the just faqih, who is pious, knowledgeable, courageous, and acceptable to the majority of the masses. If no faqih can achieve this majority, a leader or a leadership council composed of faqih meeting all the requirements would shoulder this responsibility. Thus a shift of emphasis from Shari'a to the faqih as the ultimate leader was a reinterpretation of the traditional idea of an Islamic state. The pragmatic political leadership sought to replace the age-old written texts. Khomeini's stand was revolutionary even within the traditional parameters of Islam itself. While running the government, the Iranian Revolution, instead of sliding back toward tradition, started Islamizing western political ideas and institutions such as "republic," "constitution," "cabinet," and "parliament." And since final decision-making power remained with the leader, revolutionary policies remained fluid, divergent, often contradictory, and in constant quest for a balance between theoretical claims and the demands of the real world.

The constitution of the new revolutionary regime was prepared under the direct supervision of Khomeini. The text of the constitution with its 175 clauses began with the declaration that the Islamic Republic was based on the "principal faiths" of the justice of God; the existence of one God and submission to his will; the divine message and its fundamental role in all human laws; and the concept of the "resurrection" and its role in human evolution. But the text also included a number of pragmatic clauses. It divided the government into the executive, headed by the president, supervising a highly centralized state; the judiciary, with powers to appoint district judges and review their verdicts; and the national parliament, elected through universal adult suffrage. Khomeini, who had opposed the Shah's decision in 1963 to let women vote in local elections, now changed his stance and argued that to deprive women of the vote was un-Islamic. The constitution also contained many populist visions. It promised all citizens pensions, social security, unemployment benefits, disability pay, medical services, and free secondary as well as primary school education. It further promised to eradicate hoarding, usury, monopolies, unemployment, poverty, and social deprivation; provide interest-free loans; and utilize science and technology. Finally, the constitution declared that it would plan the economy in such a way that all individuals would have the time and opportunity to enhance their moral and social development.

Thus, Iran's revolutionary constitution promised to make Iran fully independent, pay off external loans, cancel foreign concessions, nationalize foreign companies, and strive for the total unity of all Muslims. Despite Khomeini's vehement rejection of "western" ideologies and practices, a number of ideas that he had reestablished within traditional Islamic vocabulary were actually borrowed from the West. He divided society into two opposite camps as the mosta-zafin (oppressed) and the mostakberin (oppressors), the fogara (poor) and the sarvatmandan (rich), and so on. The slogan of helping the world's oppressed struggle against their oppressors had an overwhelmingly socialistic rhetoric. The constitution pledged to balance the government budget, encourage "home ownership," and respect the predominance of the private sector in agriculture, trade, services, and small industries. Khomeinism thus mobilized the masses and played on their lived-reality issues in a radical-sounding rhetoric against the external powers and the ruling elite, carefully securing the right to private property. It claimed to be a return to native roots and a means for eradicating cosmopolitan ideas, thereby showing a non-capitalist, non-communist "third way" toward development. The former USSR initially provided lip-service to the revolutionary endeavor in Iran as an anti-US, anti-capitalist movement. But Iran did not lean much on support from that quarter – nor did the USSR bend further to promote Cold War praxis to this area.

However, in reality, Khomeini had to pay much attention to running the revolutionary state, often compromising his theoretical premises. To run the vast array of social services, the Islamic Republic had no choice but to extend the large ministries and their regional departments. It had a system of Komitehs (local committees) and Sepah-e-pasdaran (loyal Islamic troops of the regime). To alleviate public discontent, it introduced food rationing and price controls and periodically launched campaigns against speculators, hoarders, and price-gougers. To administer the then recently nationalized enterprises, mostly confiscated from multinational corporations, the royal family, and their close associates, the new regime had to dramatically expand the bureaucratic machinery. Above all, the inherent contradiction between his populist rhetoric and his respect for private property created a double standard in Khomeini's regime. The majority in the majlis (parliament), the "progressives," attacked wealth, while the Guardian Council, the body with constitutional authority, ensured that all parliamentary bills conformed to the sacred law. In fact from 1981 to 1987, the Guardian Council vetoed some 100 reform bills as violations against the sanctity of private property, which included issues as important as land reforms, labor legislation, progressive income tax, and nationalization of foreign trade. Khomeini was reluctant to alienate his wealthy supporters, while deeming it inexpedient to immediately turn against the laboring classes. He was rather concerned about the support of the bazaaris, who were the economically proactive class as well as the commercially thriving section of society. As Islam's main pillar of strength throughout Iranian history, this class was always very vocal in the state's political affairs.

The model of state thrown up by the Islamic Revolution was one that respected private property but presented a version of "Third Worldism." It talked of Islam as protecting the poor, but clearly marked itself off from any genuine socialism. At the same time, through bank nationalizations (of mostly crisis-ridden banks), it portrayed itself as different from western liberal democratic models with a capitalist framework. It seemed most intriguing to discover Khomeini's interest in observing May Day officially in Iran. May 1, 1979 was a major public festival in the Islamic Republic, which was openly hostile to Marxism and communism as an alien western ideological importation. However, the streets of Iran were flooded by people celebrating International Workers' Day as well as freedom from the tradition of repressive monarchy from time immemorial. May Day had been an integral part of leftist tradition in Iran, and had been observed since 1921. But with the establishment of the Islamic Republic it was made a gala show as a ploy by the Khomeini regime to mobilize the urban working class and as much left supporters as possible under its hegemony, so that any threat from the secular left could be forestalled. The takeover of May Day was logically followed by the systematic elimination of the leftist parties one by one. In 1981, the Mojahedin, the National Front, and many Marxist groups were outlawed. In 1982, the authorities arrested members of the Tudeh Party on a mass scale. In the late 1980s, the regime shifted May Day celebrations from streets to confined spaces such as university campuses and sports stadiums, which also indicated the growing conservatism and skepticism of the revolutionary regime's political outlook. Thus with the consolidation of the regime, the spirit of May Day was manipulated and narrowed down. But that it still remains alive in Iran evidences the deep-rooted existence and symbolic strength of the leftist tradition in modern Iran.

Alternatives and their Failures

Ahcar has described the Iranian Revolution as a "permanent revolution in reverse." In origin it was a popular national democratic revolution with anti-despotic, anti-monarchic, and anti-imperialist stances, which was steadily pushed to the right by Islamic fundamentalists. Beginning as a national democratic revolution with a powerful proletarian component, it ended up by enacting extreme reactionary measures. Among the political forces that participated in the revolution were the Tudeh Party of Iran, the Iranian People's Fedayeen guerillas, the Organization of People's Mojahedin of Iran, the National Front, the Freedom Movement, and pro-Khomeini clergy. From the beginning, tensions existed between these groups.

The victory of the February 1979 Revolution resulted in the emergence of a political atmosphere in which for the first time, after 25 years of repression and suppression of progressive forces by the Shah's regime, political parties and organizations were allowed to organize freely. The Tudeh Party of Iran was prominent among those. But it tended to support the Khomeini regime as "anti-imperialist." The Fedayeen and the Mojahedin were more opposed to the regime. In the Turkoman region, where members of the former ruling family held extensive land, peasant struggles to expropriate landowners were supported by the Fedayeen, and initially they fought the pasdaran to a standstill. But this uneasy equation between completely diverse ideologies could not last long. The Mojahedin, following a policy of aligning with one or other wing of the elite, sided with Abolhasan Bani-Sadr, who had fallen out with Khomeini, and started carrying out terrorist activities in 1980–1. Using this as an excuse, the regime cracked down on all opponents. The militant opponents were smashed first. Shortly thereafter, the Tudeh Party also found that Khomeini had no more need of it. As part of a general repression, prominent members of the party were imprisoned as Soviet spies. Almost 10,000 cadres were arrested and the party was declared illegal. By the time of Khomeini's death, all radical forces had been destroyed and every progressive issue for which the masses had fought in 1979 snatched away from them.

Khomeini's new experimental populism was deeply rooted in tradition, orthodoxy, and patriarchy. Although the revolutionary regime utilized women as a vote bank, it moved swiftly to push women back into domesticity soon after its consolidation. Both their private and public lives were affected. Laws and policies concerning women in revolutionary Iran were not only orthodox, they were also crafted in a misogynistic way and were therefore quite obviously derogatory to women. Hijab (the veil) was made mandatory in public places and use of cosmetics was restricted, with punishment for defiance ranging from whipping to imprisonment. Higher study was markedly restricted for women. They were not allowed to participate in sports, or even watch men play sports. Women also could not travel or acquire a passport without the written permission of their male guardian (husband or father). Such endless restrictions came to women as a result of their vote for the revolution. The stipulation of equality for women was qualified in the constitution by adding that equality only went so far as Islamic law allowed. A series of new laws restricting women's mobility was passed between 1981 and 1983. Gender segregation started in the public transport system and even in educational institutions. The freedom of women performers was severely curbed. Women were being silently removed from important political positions and barred from participating in the judiciary. The case of Iran provides the classic example of the fact that the right to vote by itself cannot change or improve the position of women. Ziba Mir-Hosseini (2006) quite legitimately pointed out that women did not get a fair deal by the regime's fierce Islamization process. The more extreme steps included legalization of stoning to death for adultery, the annulment of the Family Protection Law of 1967 (and its 1975 amendments), which had abolished men's right to talaq (repudiation), restricted their right to polygamy, and placed men and women on a more or less equal legal footing in terms of access to divorce and custody rights, and the restoration in 1979 of the Shari'a in order to "protect the family" and realize women's "high status" in Islam. The legally approved marriageable age became 9, and polygamy was legalized.

Women did not accept this silently. When the new family courts presided over by Islamic judges started functioning, women were incredulous to learn that their husbands could divorce them without securing their consent. They started challenging the judges. Even after several years, voices of protest could still be heard. The enforcement of patriarchal fiqh (the science of jurisprudence) notions of marriage and divorce created such havoc in family life that eventually a series of reforms had to be brought in by the government, at least for those women who presented no overt challenge to the patriarchal ethos of the law as defined by classical Muslim jurists. To exercise his right to divorce, a man was told to either obtain his wife's consent or pay her substantial compensation. Rather than producing matrimonial harmony, the ostensible reason for the return to the Shari'a, the reality was increased marital breakdown.

Struggles Within the Islamic Camp

Stabilization of the regime was possible only after internal conflicts were resolved. With the consolidation of the clerical regime, significant differences within the revolutionary camp over the formulation of concrete policymaking and governance became more vivid within the inner core of Khomeini's power base. After Khomeini's death, this polarization and conflicts within the leadership increased even more as each party vied for ultimate political authority while dealing with social issues. The practical context did much to foment this tension within the leadership. Internally, the most serious difficulties included the struggle for power among the different groups in the revolutionary movement, socioeconomic challenges following the revolutionary takeover, and a substantial drop in oil income. Externally, post-revolution Iran faced a number of persistent troubles – tension with the United States and other western powers, the prolonged and indecisive Iran–Iraq War, and also the uneasy equation with most of Iran’s immediate neighbors.

On September 22, 1980, Iraq invaded Iran. The US and its allies, in order to teach Iran a lesson, provided supplies to Iraqi President Saddam Hussein. Iraq also obtained its weaponry from the Soviet camp at one point. This destructive war, which caused a constant drain on money and manpower for the new Islamic state of Iran, ended with UN intervention in 1988. Khomeini died in 1989, leaving the future of the Iranian Revolution at an indecisive midway point.

Iraq, anti-British nationalists

Shibashis Chatterjee

Iraq’s modern history begins from the eighteenth century with the gradual penetration of western trade and capital as a byproduct of Ottoman Turkish agreements with the western powers, primarily through the commercial agency of the British East India Company. The early nationalism came in the form of urban opposition to Ottoman rule. In particular, the Iraqi and Syrian army officers who had fought for the Ottomans came to support the first wave of Arab nationalism against this regime. But the movement, led by the Hashemite Prince Faisal and strategically supported by Britain, proved abortive. Full independence of the people of Iraq was not considered because of the imperial struggles between France and Britain. Although Britain lost control of Syria to France, it managed to gain Iraq and Palestine as mandated territories under the League of Nations. Faisal became the puppet-king.

The Al Ahad Society, formed by Arab officers in 1916, began to demand an independent Arab state, also supported by the Kurds (an ethnic group settled in the adjacent parts of Iran, Iraq, Syria, and Turkey) and the Iraqi peasants. The Kurdish declaration of independence in May 1919 was followed by spontaneous armed struggle in 1920, when the peasants and a section of the urban lower and middle classes also joined in. But this anti-proto-colonial domination collapsed when confronted by British retaliation against the Kurdish peasant villages. The Cairo Conference of 1921 saw the further perpetuation of the mandate system with the grant of British-controlled minor political concessions.

A combination of repression and bribery eventually secured Faisal’s place on the throne. Iraq gained nominal independence in 1932 and a seat in the League of Nations, with British advisers remaining firmly in power behind the scenes. A treaty between the two governments in 1930 maintained Britain’s military domination of Iraq. The British granted land titles to the tribal sheikhs, the predominant landowning class of Iraq. Private property in land thus replaced the traditional communal agricultural system. The new landed gentry, together with a section of army officers, became the new aristocracy of Iraq, who agreed to complete subservience to British dominance in return for their total control over agriculture. The resultant appalling degradation of peasantry ignited a series of peasant revolts throughout the 1930s. The superior technology of counterinsurgency succeeded in crushing but could not silence this mass resurgence.

The political reality of the 1930s was one of continuous plots, subterfuges, and nefarious backstage manipulation by the British through their agents, particularly Nuri-al-Said, many-times prime minister and a key figure in the old regime. Even in the 1920s the social basis for the Iraqi monarchy had been very thin, and by the 1940s it was even thinner, as new social forces, such as the growing working class, the urban poor, and the new middle class, combined in protest at its continued domination. The government's usual response was increased repression. Parties were banned, strikers shot down, and communists slaughtered publicly. Jobs, dependent on the British army, shrank with the end of the war in a situation when prices and rents remained ruinously high and the population doubled, particularly in Baghdad. War profiteering combined with an oil boom allowed a thin layer of the elite to indulge in conspicuous consumption. Meanwhile industrialization, however small scale, pulled people out of the villages into the great urban centers. The turning point came in 1948, when a regressive regime led by Iraq's first Shi'ite prime minister, Salih Jabr, planned to extend the hated Treaty of 1930 with the British in the guise of revising it. Massive protests (Al-Wathba or the Leap) broke out in Baghdad and other cities and were followed by repression, combined with some concessions.

The British concession came in the form of a new design for constitutional monarchy, armed with a bicameral legislature and voting rights for the citizens. But the opposition parties had little influence over the masses. By the early 1950s the Iraqi Communist Party (ICP) had become a mass party, drawing several trade unions and students into its fold. Communist support for Kurdish national rights combined with their defense of Kurdish peasants and workers meant that in many areas of Kurdistan the ICP could count on much greater support than the nationalist Kurdistan Democratic Party (KDP).

The Wathbah uprising, led by students, workers, and the urban poor, showed that the relationship between the nationalist and the class struggle was a key factor in maintaining the dynamic of mass protest. Almost all manifestations of opposition by organized labor during the 1940s and 1950s tended to combine claims for higher wages and better living conditions with the struggle for national independence. It was often against British-owned or controlled concerns that the strikes and demonstrations were concentrated. After a brief lull in the early 1950s, the pressure from below reemerged with the Al-Intifada (the Uprising) in 1952. External events were by now adding to the pressure on the old regime. Nationalism in Iran under Mossadeq in 1951 and Nasser's rise to power in Egypt helped the reemergence of the nationalist movement, which could not be arrested despite Nuri-al-Said's announcement that his Constitutional Union Party was calling for the reform of the electoral system.

Several tendencies developed in Iraqi nationalism. The first of these saw the crystallization of a sense of Iraqi national identity, which invoked the historic memory of the great Babylonian or Mesopotamian heritage. Jamat-al-Ahali was the principal mouthpiece of this tendency of social reformism, largely inspired by Fabian socialist ideals. But its broad bourgeois character demanded political independence and democratic rights be achieved through political moderation and gradualism. The other tendency was Arab educationist Sati' al-Husri's pan-Arabism, connoting the idea of a single Arabic geopolitical entity without arbitrary political divisions created by the colonial West. Pan-Arabism as an idea attracted the Sunni Muslims, who were to be an overwhelming majority in an undifferentiated Arab republic. This very reason made the idea unfavorable with the Shi'ite population and the northern Kurds, who together constituted the demographic majority of the Iraqi state.

A third current, popular radicalism with significant communist presence, also existed, as discussed above. By the mid-1950s the Suez Crisis also radicalized a whole generation of officers who were inspired by the success of Nasser in Egypt. The anti-Soviet Baghdad Pact in 1955 also pushed many toward rebellion. However, the nationalist officers were still a small minority inside the army. So unpopular were the monarchy and the old ruling class, however, that this military group was able to carry out the revolution of 1958.

Iraq, protest, rebellion, and revolution: overview

Johan Franzén

The history of modern Iraq is often characterized as an unremitting popular struggle against various ruling constellations at the apex of power. This is due, in large part, to the inception of the modern Iraqi state as a British “mandate” in the aftermath of World War I and a range of political groups challenging its legitimacy. From the outset, British intentions in Iraq of creating a colony to be incorporated into the empire were confronted by Iraqi nationalists, and the British eventually had to settle for a “semi-colony” in the form of an officially “independent” state. Relentlessly challenged in a series of events – the Rashid ‘Ali al-Gaylani regime of 1941, the Wathbah of 1948, the Intifadas of 1952 and 1956 – the pro-British regime eventually fell on July 14, 1958, after a carefully orchestrated military coup that was carried out by a group of army officers and a populist front.

Unfortunately for Iraq, the new era opened up by the 1958 Revolution eventually led to bitter and bloody power struggles between Iraq’s various political and ethnic groups over the legacy of British rule. The Qasim regime that had been in power since the 1958 Revolution was overthrown in February 1963 by the Baath Party, which went on to massacre many of Qasim’s supporters. Overthrown later in the same year, the Baathists would manage a comeback in 1968, whence they held on to power through the iron-fist rule of the infamous Saddam Hussein until the 2003 US/UK invasion.

In the 1960s, the Kurdish national movement started to come to the fore. Led by the legendary Mulla Mustafa al-Barzani, it fought wars against the regime throughout the decade and into the next until splitting into contending factions that fought each other as much as they combated the regime.

The other significant group in Iraq, the Shi’a, who were repressed during Saddam Hussein’s regime (1979–2003), also tried to resist the regime as best they could. Following the Coalition expulsion of the Iraqi army from Kuwait in 1991, they rose in a rebellion against the regime, which was bloodily put down. The same fate awaited the Kurds when they attempted their own rebellion in the north.

Despite the efforts of large sections of the population and their almost 25 years of unyielding clandestine resistance, it was the military might of the American army that eventually toppled the dictator, whom, ironically, they had been instrumental in propping up and arming throughout the Iran–Iraq War of the 1980s.

Iraq, Revolt of 1920

Johan Franzén

At the close of World War I, Kurdish areas of northern Iraq fell under the control of Great Britain. In December 1918, the British appointed a local notable, Shaykh Mahmud al-Barzinji, as governor of lower Kurdistan. Shaykh al-Barzinji was an ambitious man and as such tried to spread his influence throughout Kurdistan. While the British tried to restrain him, he eventually declared Kurdistan an independent state in May 1919. This prompted the British to dispatch an expeditionary force to Kurdistan, eventually capturing Shaykh al-Barzinji and instituting direct rule in al-Sulaymaniyyah. Soon after, they also abolished existing Ottoman elected municipal councils throughout Iraq in favor of their own political officers. This was not a welcome change as it inspired many native uprisings that included the assassination of British political officers.

Another group that became increasingly averse toward British rule was the old Ottoman bureaucratic “aristocracy,” the so-called effendiyyah. During Ottoman times, this group had been very prominent and in effect constituted the ruling elite. When Britain opted for direct rule, its position became directly threatened. Many disgruntled members, mostly of the younger generation, radicalized for nationalist purposes. Together with other urban nationalists, they joined forces with rural nationalist shaykhs and religious 'alims and mujtahids (Shi'i religious scholars) and formed the backbone of what was to be the 1920 Revolt.

The revolt began brewing in 1919 when an Iraqi delegation was prohibited from going to the Versailles Peace Conference to discuss the postwar settlement of the world. This prompted the formation of Haras al-Istiqlal (the Guardians of Independence), a mostly Shi'i nationalist organization led by Muhammad al-Sadr, son of a prominent Shi'i mujtahid, Ayatollah Hasan al-Sadr. Muhammad al-Sadr turned to Ayatollah Muhammad Taqi al-Shirazi to succeed the moderate Ayatollah Yazdi as the “the spiritual leader of the revolt.”

Matters were further enflamed in May 1920 when a San Remo Conference granted the Iraqi territory to Britain. Realizing that independence could now only be achieved through armed action, nationalist cooperation between Sunnis and Shi'is started to take shape. The Ayatollah al-Shirazi followed suit and issued a fatwa declaring working for the British administration unlawful. Soon after, Ayatollah al-Shirazi's son was arrested by the British. This prompted another fatwa that supported an armed revolt. In response the British made a preemptive strike on the nationalist shaykhs and arrested many of them on cooked-up charges. On June 30, a nationalist shaykh of the Zawalim tribe was arrested in Rumaythah in al-Diwaniyyah province. After being freed by an armed group of his men, he declared a rebellion against the British by destroying nearby infrastructure. News of the revolt soon spread to nearby Samawah, where a British garrison was taken completely by surprise and had to surrender.

In the months that followed British forces began defending themselves on several fronts simultaneously, causing the British governor at al-Najaf to withdraw when a Provisional Revolutionary Government was set up to support the revolt. In Iraqi Kurdistan, many Kurdish aghas (Kurdish tribal leaders) opportunistically seized the moment and rose up in local rebellions against British rule.

Fearing for the safety of Baghdad, British military commander General Haldane requested British War Minister Winston S. Churchill to send reinforcements from Iran. The request was granted and two squadrons of the Royal Air Force were sent. This inevitably shifted the balance of forces and marked the beginning of the end of the revolt. After five months of fighting, the rebels' resources were eventually depleted. The British forces were able to quell the revolt before it was able to encompass all of Iraq. In some areas, notably al-Kut and al-'Amarah, the local shaykhs, as a result of having their vast landowning recognized by the British, decided to take the British side and worked against the revolt.

While the revolt had failed, the British suffered a death toll of 500. For the Iraqis it is estimated that 6,000 were killed. The cost of subduing the revolt amounted to a staggering £40 million, forcing the British to rethink their whole policy toward Iraq. Instead of reinstating direct rule, they eventually decided to establish an “indigenous” monarchy, with the son of the Meccan Sharif, Faysal bin Husayn, appointed as king of the new state in 1921.

Iraq, Revolution of 1958

Communists and Nationalists: The Roots of the Revolution

A watershed in Iraq's modern history, this revolution was responsible for creating the broad parameter within which the vicissitudes of Iraq's sociopolitical contradictions took shape. The advent of the Allied armed forces during World War II meant a sudden rise in market demand for commodities backed up by good purchasing power. The wreckage of the war also led to supply disruptions from the West, which gave a new boost to industrial production in Iraq. The result of this spurt in industrial activities was the beginning of a very strong working-class movement, to be led by the Iraqi Communist Party (ICP), which had momentous consequences for political trends in the future. Despite the imposition of martial law in Iraq between 1941 and 1946, the dynamic leadership of Yusuf Salman Yusuf (more popularly known as Fahd) created a mass base for the underground ICP, established in 1934. The ICP did not work for the overthrow of the Hashemite regime, which was a puppet of the UK, an ally of the USSR during World War II. However the communists played a leading role in the 15-day railway workers' strike in Iraq in April 1945. The striking workers got a wage hike but their union was declared illegal by the Iraqi authorities.

The period after the lifting of martial law also saw the development of a large number of important political parties, such as the liberal National Democratic Party (NDP) and the Istiqlal (Independence) Party, upholding a somber vanity of pan-Arabism. There was a massive expansion of trade unions during this period, under the overwhelming control of the ICP. The climate of political activism and turbulence from below alarmed the British and their domestic political surrogates. A major event of the period was the July 1946 strike in the Iraq Petroleum Company (IPC) in Kirkuk that turned violent when police fired against the strikers. The Salih Jabr cabinet resorted to wanton persecution of the communists, with three of their top leaders executed, and banned the National Democratic Party in anticipation of further political mobilization. Repression failed to quell a rising crescendo of mass struggles. The uprising of January 1948 followed more than two years of rising industrial struggle. As the huge street protests of 1948 subsided, major strikes, involving railway workers and postal workers, continued even with Jabr's replacement by the new cabinet of Muhammad al-Sadr. The situation exploded when the Communist Party led a massive strike of April–May 1948, in the IPC pumping station near Haditha, where the main demand was a wage rise of 25 percent to 40 percent. The strike committee organized round-the-clock picketing, marshaling 3,000 strikers so efficiently that production completely stopped. The state retaliated brutally, but the unfazed workers staged a dramatic counteraction of supreme defiance – a spectacular march called the al-Mazira al-Kubra – where class demands coincided with those of national independence. This explosive combination turned the class movement into a nodal focus of organizational struggles with greater mass appeal. Brought back in January 1949, Nuri-al-Said, a trusted politician of the puppet regime, gave orders for the public hanging of Fahd. The party was virtually purged of its leaders, but the hanging of Fahd and the slaughtering of his comrades assumed an immortal martyrdom in the public imagination that turned the ICP into the most potent ammunition in the battle to gain complete independence from the British and the Hashemite government.

The mood of political discontent had, however, made the collapse of the surrogate system only a matter of time. Gamal Abdel Nasser's success in Egypt in 1952 had tumultuous consequences for the politics of the entire Arab world. The announcement of land and social reform in Egypt acted as a spur to the movement in Iraq. In response to growing pressure from below, Nuri-al-Said announced that his Constitutional Union Party was calling for the reform of the electoral system. Finding an opening within the ruling class front, the mass movement poured in. There began the Intifada. The government quickly reacted by declaring martial law and banning all political parties. But repression could not halt the resumption of communist activities. Iraq's ruling class, calculating a final intervention by the British, tried to articulate new developmental schemes to share its oil wealth with other deprived classes, but did not succeed. Their schemes had nothing to offer to the poor peasants, whose condition had by then become unbearable. The newly mobilized and ascendant urban class of salaried civil servants, teachers, middle- and low-ranking officers of the army, petty businessmen, and new professionals found no incentive in these schemes. The idea gained ground that even if the development schemes spawned benefits, these would invariably be controlled by the ruling aristocracy and the British agents. The new middle class could no longer be politically contained – their aspirations had outgrown the exclusionary limits of the existing regime. The catalyst to the insurrection finally came in the apparently outrageous decision, viewed in hindsight, by the Iraqi government to swim against the tide and draft Iraq into the US-led Baghdad Pact in 1955 and then to unite with Jordan in 1957 to counter the combined might of Syria and Egypt. The Suez misadventure by the British finally removed the ground completely from under the feet of the “old gang.” Mass discontentment swelled to an unprecedented pitch, with the communists playing a stellar role, and a second national opposition front was formed in February 1957 comprising the National Democratic Party, the Independence Party, the Communists, and the Ba'ath Party.

But the decisive blow to the old establishment came from the army, most of whom being Sunni were attracted to pan-Arabism. By the mid-1950s discontent was also spreading in the army. The Suez Crisis radicalized a whole generation of officers who were inspired by the success of Nasser in Egypt. The Baghdad Pact also pushed many toward rebellion. However, the nationalist officers were still a small minority inside the army. The political sterility of the system, coupled with the past ruthlessness of the establishment and the grave political ambiguity that gave different messages to the constituent parts of the new coalition, meant that a revolution was inevitable in the absence of a peaceful and democratic political transformation. The young generation of army officers led by a senior free officer called Brigadier Karim Qassem (or Qasim) plotted a coup on July 14, 1958. This coup terminated the constitutional monarchy and created a new republic based on nationalist ideals.

The narrative thus far reads the rebellion of 1958 in essentially political terms. Underlying the revolution were, however, major tectonic shifts of political economy, brilliantly summarized by Hanna Batatu (1978). Batatu located the epicenter of the revolution in the mass impoverishment of the lower peasants in the countryside and the urban lower classes and workers, as against the growing opulence of a new commercial elite based on the wealth of oil. The inevitable class polarization and antagonism within an archaic political setup that did not allow even nominal political representation of the newly emerging groups made revolutionary transformation a possibility. Support from the lesser classes, who did not understand the dynamics of the groups that were to seize power, made the rebellion happen at a comparatively low cost. Batatu's account stresses primarily the class contradiction, possibly reducing the significance of the existing reality that consisted of a whole range of ethnic and religious diversities, and largely omits the role of the motley of groups standing somewhere in the middle of these class hierarchies. The 1958 revolution, like all social revolutions, was multi-causal rather than a simplistic narrative of class. Most crucially, there was no consensus about what the revolution meant to its makers. This deep schism within the ideational blueprint(s) of the event amounted to its defeat in a decade's time.

The Qassem Regime

Iraq in 1958 inherited the pre-1958 structures – the hapless peasantry caught in the grip of the gentry; the IPC in British hands and being the main conduit for providing much-needed developmental funds to the state; and several weaknesses that dwarfed the growth of the domestic capitalist class and pegged Iraq to the exploitative structure of the West. Like so many other postcolonial leaders, Qassem essentially worked on a negative agenda. The main objective of the new government was to remove the older, venal aristocracy from power and shift the locus of authority to the new urban classes. But there was no political imagination that could hold the new groups together and there was no political strategy to deepen the mass base of the regime by drawing the peasants and the workers into the system. The ambiguity was clearly manifest in Qassem's tryst with land reforms. While he knew that the landed gentry had to be weakened, there was no attempt at distributing land to the peasants. The same weakness was demonstrated in his dealings with the IPC. Although he was instrumental in revoking the concessions of the international cartel, he stopped short of full nationalization, unsure of the consequence it might provoke.

The ultimate tragedy of Qassem lay in the contradictions of his structures of support, namely the Ba'athist and the communist notions of independence. The pan-Arabist leaning of the Ba'athists had made them demand Arab unity as the material-cum-ideological basis to defy the West. Their fascination lay with the Nasser version of Arab nationalism, epitomized by his decision to merge with Syria. Arab nationalism was the core of the Ba'ath ideology, who recruited heavily from the Sunni Arabs of Tirkit and Baghdad. Right-wing nationalists such as Abdul Salain Aref vindicated nationalism as the motive force of post-1958 Iraq.

The nationalist left stood opposed to Aref's brand of Arab nationalism. The most important players here were the communists and the Kurdish Democratic Party, the latter having a distinctive left leaning after 1945. The communists held Nasser's vision to be undemocratic and reactionary. They argued that joining the United Arab Republic (UAR) would mean the end of Iraq's hard-won democratic freedoms. The ICP organized huge demonstrations acclaiming Qassem as "sole leader" of the Iraqi Revolution, hoping to build his support as a counterweight to Nasser. But ideologically the Communist Party had a typical Stalinist multi-stage concept of revolution. The Kurds were suspicious of pan-Arabism on ethnic grounds. The NDP also opposed Nasser's ideas as totalitarian. The ultimate deciding factor, however, remained the army, a sizable section of whose officers were indeterminate and thought Iraqi nationalism under Qassem to be safer for their sectional interests than a broader unity dictated by Nasser's Egypt. In May 1959, the city of Mosul reached a flashpoint. Near the Syrian border, it was relatively conservative, and Nasserite forces were rumored to be planning a coup. In response, the ICP organized a massive demonstration, again with the slogan "No leader but Abd'al-Karim Qassem." Clashes broke out, and the rebellion was eventually crushed by the communist front People's Resistance and troops loyal to Qassem, but not before the fighting had spread along ethnic and religious lines in Mosul. Yet, as Hanna Batatu points out, the overwhelming divide in the conflict was class.

The Communist Party now demanded positions in the cabinet. After initially refusing, Qassem invited some of its members. But this was a meaningless gesture, as he was plotting to purge the army of communist influence. He calculated that his regime rested on a delicate balance of pan-Arabist and left nationalist forces. Hence, he turned next to containing the communist challenge, which led to an enormous sapping of strength for both Qassem and the communist forces. By the second half of 1959, the ICP was under severe attack. Why did the Iraqi communists come so close to power, and yet still fail? A crucial role was played by the Soviet leadership. Emissaries from Moscow put pressure on the ICP, telling it that no support would be forthcoming in case of seizure of power, for Moscow saw a stable anti-American Iraq as more valuable than a revolution in which the Americans might intervene, as the US navy was already moving close to the Gulf. However, despite this outside pressure, when the ICP's politburo debated the possibility of breaking with Qassem, a minority were in favor of "daring for victory" and taking power. But throughout 1958, the party had made no political preparations for such a struggle. In November 1958, the ICP attempted to revive its alliance with its erstwhile partners, the nationalists and the Ba'athists, even though they were moving to the right. The party's mass mobilizations had taken place under the banner of national unity, not class struggle. Rather than fight to increase the social content of the nationalist struggle, the communists generally worked to smooth over cracks in the cross-class alliance.

Qassem's problems were, however, far from over, since the Kurds and the national democrats were also disillusioned with him, as he failed either to grant the former the kind of autonomy they wanted or to democratize the political system rapidly by liquidating the military regime from above. Hemmed in by such diverse pressures, and trying to dominate all, Qassem undercut his own popularity and support base. Ultimately, Qassem fell to a coup, engineered by his one-time compatriot, Abdul Aref, in 1963, who inaugurated another phase of tenuous rule in Iraq before dying in a mysterious helicopter crash in 1966. His brother and successor Abd al-Rahman Aref ultimately fell pray to yet another military coup – though bloodless – by the Ba'ath Party under the dual leadership of Ahmad Hassan al-Bakr and Saddam Hussein in 1968.

Iraqi resistance, 1991–2007

Shibashis Chatterjee

Invading Iran and Kuwait

Iraq was an oil-rich country with a dictatorship trying to steer an autonomous course, which brought it into confrontation with the US as the Cold War ended. During the Cold War, Iraq's geopolitical and strategic significance had brought Saddam Hussein gains. Holding together a state divided between ethnic and sectarian identities of the Iraqi Sunnis, Shi'ias, and Kurds, Hussein opted for a brutal dictatorship, but received support from both the US and USSR. The importance of Iraq increased rapidly after the Shah's collapse in Iran in 1978, with the US desperate to balance Soviet interests in the region. Second, a regional conflict of interest existed between Iran and Iraq. The Shi'i Islamic rebellion in Iran emboldened the local Shi'i community to challenge the Sunni Ba'ath rule. Fearful of Iranian support for Shi'i and Kurdish groups as well as ambitious for a regional leadership role, Hussein went in for a war against Iran to mobilize domestic support and garner military help from abroad. The war with Iran was a careful gamble, and Saddam was able to achieve some goals, though at an enormous cost. Saddam's grandiose plans of weaponization, including weapons of chemical warfare, were realized with the full knowledge and connivance of the US and Moscow. Moreover, the war apparently united Iraq in the face of a bellicose neighbor. The Kurds as the only exception paid a terrible price for their betrayal at the hour of national peril, as Saddam saw it.

The nine-year-long Iran–Iraq War (1979–88) ended in stalemate with major gains for Iraq. This success made Saddam more adventurous and risk-taking. He had already alienated the United States by refusing to give up his weaponization drives. On top of this, Iraq was badly in need of funds to tide over an acute domestic economic distress occasioned primarily by the ravages of the war. The Gulf Council States under the leadership of Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, at the insistence of the US, would not allow the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC) to increase oil prices, thereby allowing Saddam to generate additional revenues. Pushed to the brink, Saddam's gamble of occupying Kuwait (August 1990) misfired. Saddam could not grasp the post-Cold War reality of power politics. The lone superpower of the unipolar world, the US, did not allow any system-breaker to prevail uncontested. The First Gulf War of 1990–1 followed, which saw a US-led international coalition quickly vanquish Iraq. Sanctions and other punitive measures like no-fly zones were put in place to break the Ba'ath resolve to hold on to power. But sanctions unleashed by the West failed to remove Saddam from the seat of power.

The Sanctions Debate

Responses to the Gulf War of 1990 were mixed. West Asia as a whole saw a mass–elite disjuncture, with Arab (Sunni) states witnessing massive pro-Saddam demonstrations and strong currents of anti-American and anti-Israel protests. Support for Saddam was rather symbolic. He was eulogized for his defiance of the United States.

The sanctions regime became the new discourse, which divided political opposition against Saddam. The Saddam regime, as the opposition anticipated, did not collapse under pressure. The US indeed was in a quandary, as it wanted to leave intact an Iraqi state, and therefore hoped for internal dissidence within the Ba'ath Party to remove Saddam. The popular insurgency in southern Iraq was ruthlessly suppressed. The political dissenters hoped that sanctions would restrict Saddam's capacity to subsidize the machinery for repression. Defeat, isolation, the sliding economy, and the consequent weakening of Saddam's hold would provide a fresh opportunity to strike.

These expectations did not materialize. Saddam found resources to distribute to the masses. He invested in new infrastructural projects, particularly big electrification plants. And most crucially, he succeeded in neutralizing the army. As in the 1958 revolution, radical change was not possible without a revolution led by the army. As a result, internal opposition, including in Islamist quarters, questioned the sanctions, arguing that they did not draw the necessary distinctions between the regime and the people. The West seemed impotent against Saddam's resilience. The political opposition thus became disillusioned with the West.

Resistance to US Invasion

The final chapter in the history of Iraq till today was drafted unilaterally by the United States. The attacks of September 11, 2001 changed the parameters of US policy to a large degree. Offshore preemptive strikes and anticipatory military measures, completely illegal in international law, became the new doctrines of the imperial hegemony. Ultimately the United States invaded Iraq in 2003. The charge that Iraq was remaking its weapons of mass destruction (i.e., nuclear weapons) and refusing to allow international agencies to monitor them was a complete fabrication, as is evident from American official sources later. Nor could Saddam's links with al-Qaeda or other terrorist groups be confirmed. The invasion of 2003 was simply a further step to transform the US into a planetary superpower by military means, to remove Saddam Hussein, and to bring Iraqi oil under the control of US corporations.

Defeat was preordained. Saddam was captured in March 2003 and an interim government set up by the Iraqi Governing Council (IGA) came into force. The state was devastated by collateral damage during the war. Out of such wreckage, the contours of a new Iraq are emerging. Democracy has been established from the top and is guaranteed life by the coalition forces.

However, as Chomsky (2003) points out, talk of democracy was lofty rhetoric forming an obligatory accompaniment to any resort to force. A large number of political parties and civil society groups have emerged. Some see hope of a genuine democratization out of the ashes of the present carnage, while others condemn the pliant puppet regime in Iraq that would serve America's geopolitical and geo-economic interests in the long run.

The Shi'ites and the Kurds, together the numerical majority within Iraq, are by and large with the new regime and the coalition forces. Ali al-Sistani, a senior influential Shi'i cleric, had in fact issued a religious injunction (fatwa) to allow cooperation with the coalition forces. The Shi'ites, who desire full sovereignty, dare not risk a Ba'ath return to power and a reversion to tyranny.

The Kurds with their cultural, religious, and linguistic distinctiveness have always demanded full autonomy short of secession. Invariably after defeating its adversaries, the strong Iraqi state had punished the Kurds for what it saw as acts of gross disloyalty to the nation. Hence, it is scarcely surprising that in northern Kurdistan, the coalition forces received the full cooperation of the Kurds.

Opposition to the IGA and then to the newly elected multiparty alliance after the elections of 2006 came from three sources. Most of the violent attacks took place in the Sunni triangle of Baghdad and the territory to its north and west, in towns like Tirkat, Ramadi, and Fallujah, and were carried out by supporters of the old regime, ex-secret police personnel and agents, and a group of Islamic terrorists with links to Saudi Arabia and other Arab states. The second line of opposition came from the Arab states that saw the IGA as a US-controlled rump coalition. The third line of critique came from people who wanted change to come from within, without the involvement of the western forces.

Creating a Culture of Rights

The resistance to war is, however, not to be confused with resistance to democratization in the current phase. Democracy is alien to Iraq, as it is to most of the Arab world. The ethical propriety of the external grafting of "democratic" institutions and practices through the agencies of an illegal, invasive force remains questionable. The present regime's alignment with ethnic and sectarian forces would probably balkanize Iraq along ethnic lines. The ethnic polity in this model is largely one of elite cartelization rather than mass based. Even amidst this fear of imperialist aggression and unceasing sectarian violence there are signs of political mobilization, attempts at democratization, and a new aspiration to a culture of rights. Most progressive political forces in Iraq, including communists and a large number of women's organizations, want democratization to deepen and consolidate in Iraq. Feminists fear the dominance of the Shi'ite clerics, who would not hesitate to emulate Iranian standards in depriving women of a whole range of political, social, and economic rights.

Ireland, Age of Revolutions, 1775–1803

Daire Keogh

In her study of eighteenth-century Ireland, Edith Mary Johnston (1974) employs an elegant aphorism to describe the period; for the elite it was an age of elegance, and for every section of the community an age of insecurity. A great deal of that anxiety stemmed from the nature of the Kingdom of Ireland, which was at once an example of a colony and an ancien régime-type society.

The century was born from the embers of the Williamite Wars (1688–91) in Ireland and from the paradox at the heart of the Protestant victory. For while the Jacobites had been defeated, the Protestant community was left with a real sense of its own insecurity. At the root of its fears were the terms of the Articles of Limerick (1691), which concluded the wars but left the defeated Catholics in a far stronger position than might have been expected. The implications were clear: Catholic strength implied Protestant weakness and there could be no accommodation between the two. The Protestant state owed its life to the destruction of Catholic power. Yet the security of the state was threatened by Britain's continued war with Catholic France and the continental allies of the exiled James II.

It was from this pervasive background of fear that the Penal Laws emerged, not from a desire to eliminate the Catholic religion, but rather as an attempt to destroy the political and military threat of the Catholic majority. For this reason the inheritance of land, the political system, and the legal profession were closed to Catholics, while regular clergy and those exercising ecclesiastical jurisdiction were banished. Penal legislation was also extended to the Presbyterian community, and while they were never excluded from parliament or from the franchise, they were barred from civil and military offices, including municipal government, by the imposition of a sacramental test in 1704. The application of the laws was uneven; there were loopholes which Catholics exploited and their consequences were softened for Presbyterians by the passage of annual indemnity acts, but the effect of the legislation was to divide Irish society along sectarian grounds.

The concept of "Protestant Ascendancy," however, is not without its limitations, as the benefits of this monopoly of privilege did not extend to the entire Anglican community. The Irish parliament was almost exclusively Anglican, since Catholics (70 percent of the population) were excluded by law, and Presbyterians (a further 13 percent) were excluded by their social and economic status. Yet, of the 300 members in the House of Commons, 234 represented boroughs, while the franchise for the 64 seats representing the 32 counties was restricted not only by the Penal Laws but also by a property qualification. As a consequence, before 1793, the electorate in each county was less than 4,000, with the exception of County Down, which had 6,000 voters.

The Irish parliament also reflected the quasi-colonial nature of Ireland. In spite of Ireland's constitutional status as a separate kingdom, the Dublin parliament was subordinate to Westminster. Its prerogatives were limited by Poynings's Law (1494), which curbed its legislative potential, and the Declaratory Act (1720), which denied the appellate jurisdiction of the Irish House of Lords and asserted the right of London to pass legislation binding to Ireland. The implications of these claims were manifest in the restrictions on Irish trade imposed by the Cattle Acts (1671) and the Woollen Acts (1699). Moreover, the Irish executive was headed by a lord lieutenant or viceroy who was answerable to the cabinet in London, not to the Irish parliament, which he could manage through a judicious use of patronage and pensions. Such manipulation, however, could create resentment and resulted in distinctions in parliament between what was regarded as an "Irish interest," as opposed to the "English interest" of the viceroy.

Opposition to England's claim to legislate for Ireland found expression in a small but vocal "patriot" tradition, which had among its ideological champions William Molyneux (1656–98) and Jonathan Swift (1667–1745), who had memorably compared "government without the consent of the governed" to slavery. This patriot voice became the principal source of opposition to the administration represented in parliament by the Dublin "Castle Party." The patriots were never very numerous: they were not a party in the modern sense, nor had they a coherent policy. On occasion, however, they were able to present a serious threat to the government based in Dublin Castle, as in the celebrated "Wood's Halfpence" affair (1722–5) and the money bill dispute (1753–6), which highlighted the erosion of the constitutional rights of the Irish parliament.

By the second half of the eighteenth century there was also great economic change, which brought not just opportunities but social tension. The period after 1741 was marked by increasing prosperity, but the effects of the agricultural boom had not filtered down. Indeed, the combination of rising population, which doubled to reach five million by the end of the century, created land hunger, bringing rent increases, subdivision, and frequently subsistence living. The consequent tensions found expression in the growth of agrarian protest movements. Amongst the earliest groups were the Whiteboys, who arose in protest to the enclosure of common land in County Tipperary in 1761. As the movement spread, its agenda increased to include excessive rents and tithes payable to the state church, the Church of Ireland. The Whiteboys established a pattern of rural protest. In Ulster their example was followed by the Hearts of Oak and the Steelboys, but of greater concern was the Rightboy movement, which began in Cork in 1785 and gradually fanned out across the provinces of Munster and South Leinster. The Rightboys opposed high rents, tithes, and other taxes, but in a novel departure they made attempts to regulate the dues charged by Catholic priests for their services.

Such anti-clericalism demonstrates the folly of simple notions of a "penal consensus" in Ireland; indeed, the Whiteboys and Rightboys were both excommunicated by the Catholic bishops. However, such realities failed to calm Protestant anxiety in the context of the Seven Years' War (1756–63) and the subsequent American Revolution (1775–83), during which such popular protest was interpreted as evidence of a Catholic plot. The fullest expression of such fears was given in a pamphlet written by the Anglican bishop of Cloyne, Richard Woodward, entitled The Present State of the Church of Ireland (1787), which ran to several editions, both in Dublin and in London. It eventually developed into a paper war between the defenders of the church establishment and their Catholic and Presbyterian adversaries.

The American Revolution, of course, transformed the political landscape in Ireland. Not only were there historic ties between Ulster and America, but the grievances of the colonists struck a sympathetic chord with Irish patriots, who Benjamin Franklin believed were disposed to be friends of America. The Catholic leadership, for its part, remained conspicuously loyal during the American War. This decision was rewarded by two Relief Acts (1778 and 1782), removing the principal restrictions on land ownership and the practice of religion, which the London government sponsored in an effort to boost recruitment to the forces. The patriots, in contrast, became more assertive in the course of the war. The economic consequences of the conflict sharpened patriotic sensitivities, while the failure of the government to establish a militia prompted the formation of independent Volunteer companies, beginning in Belfast in March 1778.

At their height the Volunteers boasted 100,000 members, and once the threat of invasion receded they turned their attention toward a political agenda. In November 1779, the Dublin Volunteers gathered at College Green demanding “Free Trade or a Speedy Revolution,” in a powerful display which Lord North’s government could not resist. And having wrested that prize, the Volunteers campaigned to remove constitutional restrictions, culminating in a delegate convention at Dungannon in February 1782, which asserted the exclusive legislative authority of the Irish parliament. Lord North’s government collapsed in the following month, creating circumstances that were more favorable to the Volunteers. In opposition, the Whigs had supported the Irish patriots; now in office, the new Rockingham administration introduced a body of legislation to repeal the Declaratory Act and amend Poyning’s Law.

The achievement of legislative independence for the Irish parliament ushered in a wave of euphoria and Henry Grattan (1746–1821), the hero of the hour, was awarded £50,000 by the Irish House of Commons “in testimony of the gratitude of this nation for his . . . unequalled services to this kingdom” (Parliamentary Register, 1.383). Such emotion, however, was short-lived as the limitations of the so-called Constitution of 1782 became apparent. Henry Flood (1732–91) identified the weakness of “simple repeal,” pushing instead for an unequivocal renunciation of Westminster’s right to legislate for Ireland, which was conceded in 1783. The Volunteers under the leadership of Flood and Frederick Hervey (1730–1803), the earl bishop of Derry, turned to the complex issue of parliamentary reform. A grand national convention of Volunteers was held in Dublin in November 1783. It divided on what William Drennan (1754–1820) later called “the rock of religion and indulgence to Catholics,” and its reform agenda was defeated by the Irish House of Commons, in a vote which reflected parliament’s increasing hostility toward the Volunteers and out of doors political agitation.

From a British perspective, the extension of the rights of the Irish parliament made political management more critical. The new circumstances challenged the abilities of successive viceroys. In the short term, the executive arm of the government was strengthened by the appointment to key offices of reliable members like John Foster (1740–1828), John Fitzgibbon (1749–1802), and John Beresford (1738–1805), the talented troika who served as an informal Irish cabinet. In the long term, however, the implications of the patriot achievement demonstrated the desirability of a legislative union as the ultimate solution to the problem of parliamentary management. This was immediately apparent in the “Regency Crisis” of 1789, when only the king’s recovery averted a constitutional catastrophe. The outbreak of the French Revolution in the same year confirmed the urgency of a correction of the Anglo-Irish connection.

The Revolution quickly became, in Theobald Wolfe Tone’s expression, “the test of everyman’s political creed.” French principles were obviously attractive to radical Anglicans and Catholics, but among the Presbyterians of Antrim and Down they had immediate resonances. In July 1790, the Volunteers marched again in Belfast, to celebrate not the Battle of the Boyne but the fall of the Bastille. Significantly, too, news from France began to diminish the anti-Catholic sentiments that had divided reformers in the previous decade. Not only did Catholics now appear capable of living in liberty, but the French enjoyed rights in excess of those afforded by Britain’s vaunted constitution. That sense was developed in Tone’s Argument on behalf of the Catholics of Ireland (1791), the most influential pamphlet in Irish history, which dismissed the Constitution of 1782 as a “bungling and imperfect business” which had “left three quarters of our countrymen slaves as it had found them.” William Drennan, the Belfast radical, shared Tone’s enthusiasm for a new departure. Having tired of the Whigs, whom he dismissed as an “aristocratical society,” he called instead for “a benevolent conspiracy – a plot for the people.” Drennan collaborated with Samuel Neilson (1761–1803), Thomas Russell (1767–1803), and the Belfast Volunteers, and in October 1791 the Society of the United Irishmen was founded. In the following month, the veteran Dublin radical and Volunteer James Napper Tandy (1737?–1803) convened a United Irish Society in the capital. The aims of the United Irishmen reflected the long pedigree of Irish radicalism, the British Whig tradition, and Irish patriotism transformed by the American and French Revolutions. Yet, in a radical departure, it called for “immediate, ample, and substantial justice to the Catholics,” and only then “a reform of parliament.” The Belfast society was dominated by the Presbyterian middle class, while the Dublin society was divided equally between Protestants and Catholics. From the outset, the Society was decidedly propagandist and aimed, in Thomas Addis Emmet’s (1764–1827) expression, “to make every man a politician,” through the Northern Star and cheap editions of Paine, Locke, and Godwin.

Just as the reform movement and Volunteering were transformed by events in France, so too were Catholic politics. Since the Revolution, the aristocratic and episcopal leadership of the Catholic Committee had given way to a new bourgeois generation, including founders of the Dublin United Irish Society such as Richard McCormick and John Keogh, who demanded “relief” as a right, not a reward to be sought with deference. In July 1792, Tone was appointed assistant secretary of the Committee, thus establishing an important connection with the United Irishmen. His organizational ability was critical to the success of the Catholic Convention of December 1792, the so-called “Back Lane Parliament” which petitioned the king directly, over the head of the viceroy and the Dublin parliament, for emancipation. This affront to the Dublin establishment spoke volumes for the ambitions of Irish Catholics, but with the advent of war with France on February 1, 1793 the peace of Ireland became a priority for William Pitt, as was the recruitment of Catholic troops. For these reasons, the London government pushed a relief measure through the Irish parliament which extended the franchise to Catholics. From a radical perspective, the vote without the right to sit in parliament was nonsense, but the ultra-Protestant conservatives were equally irate. The Speaker of the Commons, John Foster, acknowledged it was “vain to imagine that admission to the elective franchise does not draw with it the right of representation” in parliament, while the chancellor, John Fitzgibbon, believed that the only solution to this revolution of rising expectations was a legislative union between the two islands. War, however, was no time for such constitutional innovations, and the government introduced a raft of legislation aimed at securing the kingdom. This included restrictions on the importation of arms, a seditious libel act, an unpopular militia act, and a Convention Act, which outlawed representative political assemblies.

The effect of such legislation was to drive radicalism underground. The United Irishmen were not formally suppressed until May 1794, but as prosecutions silenced prominent members, the Society was gradually reorganized into a secret, oath-bound military conspiracy intent on separation from Britain with French aid. Traditional historiography attributed this move to the failure of the liberal Fitzwilliam viceroyalty in 1795; indeed, the United Irish leadership claimed as much in the wake of the Rebellion of 1798. However, this conspiratorial tendency was present in the United Irish ranks from the outset, particularly in Ulster, and it is evident in Tone’s writings from as early as July 1791. The Society faced a twofold challenge. The first was to transform itself from a bourgeois debating society into an army of citizen soldiers. This would take time, but the task of securing foreign aid was rapidly advanced by Tone, and the appearance of a fleet at Bantry Bay in December 1796 was evidence of French enthusiasm for an Irish rebellion. That attempted invasion failed, but the presence of the fleet boosted United Irish confidence. Historian Nancy Curtin (1998) estimates that in Ulster alone, membership increased from 38,576 in October 1796 to 117,917 by the following summer. Sectarian tensions were heightened, too, and clashes between the loyal Orange Order and the Catholic “Defenders” led to the formation of an alliance between the United Irishmen and this radicalized secret society. This coalition represented a fundamental departure from the non-sectarian ideals of its foundation, but it served to broaden the base of the United Irish conspiracy, which by the spring of 1798 would claim 280,000 members in arms.

The Dublin Castle administration met this threat with heightened surveillance and a vigorous and often draconian campaign of counter-insurgency. An Insurrection Act (1796) provided for the death penalty for those administering illegal oaths. It also allowed the government “proclaim” areas, thereby suspending trial by jury and giving sweeping powers to magistrates. This was employed with great effect in the so-called “dragooning of Ulster” in the spring of 1797, but it failed to break the organization. The United Irishmen faced a dilemma: whether to await the promised French invasion or to go it alone. Within the leadership, Arthur O'Connor (1763–1852) and Lord Edward Fitzgerald (1763–98) advocated the latter, and a complex military plan was prepared for a rebellion beginning in Dublin and fanning out across the country in response to a series of signals. The organization, however, was infiltrated by informers, and the plan was frustrated by the arrest of the Leinster Directory of the United Irishmen in February 1798. This and the subsequent capture of Fitzgerald, the talismanic military leader of the movement, threw the plan into disarray. Neither were the French likely to support an insurrection, since the Directory had committed itself to Napoleon's ill-fated Egyptian campaign.

From the outset, the United Irish rebellion had little chance of success. The insurgents gathered in Dublin on the night of May 23 to discover their assembly points occupied by government militia. Unaware of the fate of the city, rebels in the surrounding counties of Meath, Kildare, and Wicklow gained control of a broad crescent of territory around the capital. Within days, however, they had lost the initiative and the inactivity of United Irish leaders in the provinces brought success to the government forces, which accepted the rebel surrender in Kildare on May 30. The province of Ulster failed to rise until June 7, and divisions in the United Irish leadership on the propriety of waiting for French aid and, perhaps, the "popish tinge" of the rebellion in the south severely affected the turnout in counties Antrim and Down. And there, too, the pattern of initial success and then rapid failure was repeated, as victories at Antrim town and Saintfield were reversed following a crushing defeat at the Battle of Ballynahinch on June 12–13.

In contrast, strategic victories at Oulart and Enniscorthy on May 27–8 allowed the rebels to take most of County Wexford, which they maintained until their defeat by General Lake's army at Vinegar Hill on June 21. At that point, the rump of the Wexford rebels formed two large columns which broke into the midlands. One received little support in the neighboring counties of Kilkenny and Laois, but the second had greater success in the mountainous parts of north Wexford and Wicklow, where Joseph Holt and Michael Dwyer held out in the hopes of French assistance. Yet when a small fleet, under General Humbert, landed in County Mayo on August 22, it was too little, too late. News of the French landing, however, roused rebels in counties Sligo, Longford, Westmeath, and Leitrim. Again, the Franco-Irish force enjoyed initial success at an encounter, celebrated as "the Races" of Castlebar, but they were no match for the superior force of the crown under the command of the viceroy, Charles Cornwallis, veteran of the American Wars. General Lake surrounded and overwhelmed the rebels at the Battle of Ballinamuck, County Longford, on September 8. This defeat marked the end of the rebellion of 1798, although guerilla resistance continued in parts of Wicklow, where Michael Dwyer, "master of the mountains," remained at liberty for several years.

The Rebellion of 1798 failed because it lacked coordination as a consequence of the pre-rebellion arrests. Moreover, the failure of the French to provide a substantial force deprived it of potential leadership, discipline, weaponry, and recognition. Perhaps, more significantly, the rebellion failed because Catholic Ireland had, by and large, sided with the government. The Catholic bishops, in particular, were distinguished by their steady loyalism, and of the lower clergy, a mere 70 of the 1,800 priests were even remotely associated with the rebel cause. Such realities, however, were lost in the immediate aftermath as many loyalists sought to portray the rebellion as a religious war, a "Popish Plot," or a rerun of the turmoil of the 1640s and 1690s. Certainly, as rebel discipline broke down, there were horrific incidents of blatant sectarianism, as in County Wexford where 200 innocent Protestants were burned alive in a barn at Scullabogue. On the loyalist side, too, there were atrocities, such as the slaughter of 500 rebels as they surrendered at Gibbet Rath in County Kildare. Ironically, the rebellion in the north had many of the hallmarks of a religious war, for the rebels were largely Presbyterian, while their opponents were adherents of the Established Church, or Catholic soldiers. In the aftermath of the rebellion, however, such distinctions were ignored and efforts were made to separate the risings in Antrim and Down from the tumult in the south. When Sir Richard Musgrave published his monumental history of the rebellion in 1801, so far had amnesia about the rebellion in Ulster developed that he devoted a mere 12 pages to events in Antrim and Down, compared with over 600 in which he described the religious mayhem in Leinster.

It is a great irony of the 1790s that the decade which began with hopes of a "brotherhood of affection” and independence for Ireland ended in 30,000 deaths and the extinction of the Irish parliament in the Act of Union. Indeed, no sooner had William Pitt received news of the outbreak of the rebellion than he enquired: “cannot crushing the rebellion be followed by an act appointing commissioners to treat for a union?” There was little novel in the prime minister’s suggestion; as early as 1707, in the context of the Anglo-Scottish Union, the Irish House of Commons expressed a hope that this would establish a precedent for a more comprehensive union. The events of the eighteenth century clearly illustrated the difficulty and insecurity of the Anglo-Irish relationship, and in spite of Irish patriotic opposition to such a measure, legislative union remained an option. Ironically, however, it was the great patriot victory in the “Revolution of 1782” that made a union of the parliaments imperative. And if this was so, the concessions to Catholics in 1793 and the rebellion of 1798 moved the question of union into the realm of practical politics. Irish nationalists have subsequently claimed that Pitt provoked the rebellion in order to promote a union. Such an assertion is unrealistic, but the rebellion did make the union possible. Protestants were made aware of the precariousness of their position; indeed, King George approved of “using the present moment of terror for frightening the supporters of the Castle into union.” And the Catholic establishment, too, in the white terror that followed the rebellion, welcomed the prospect of a union: Thomas Hussey, the bishop of Waterford, expressed his preference for a union with the “Beys of Egypt” rather than continued oppression of the “Mamelukes” of the Irish Ascendancy. Significantly, one of the most vociferous opponents of the measure was the Speaker, John Foster, who opposed the union not on patriotic grounds alone but for fear that direct rule from London would undermine the Protestant Ascendancy.

The difficult task of managing the union fell to Cornwallis, who favored a broad union with “the Irish nation instead of making it with a party in Ireland.” But his proposals to include Catholic emancipation in the union package threatened to endanger the entire project; apart from opposition in Ireland, King George had set himself against any “further indulgences” to Catholics. Accordingly, an Emancipation Bill would not accompany the union, but the promise of immediate relief was an important inducement to Catholics to support the measure. Critics of the union, however, including the young Daniel O’Connell (1775–1847), argued that the continuation of the Irish parliament, even with Catholic inferiority, was preferable to the loss of Ireland’s legislative independence.

When the proposed union was first debated in the Irish House of Commons on January 22, 1799, the government found itself with a majority of one; two days later it was defeated by five votes. Cornwallis had not expected such a reversal, and there was great rejoicing in the streets of Dublin. There was recrimination on both sides, but the government was not to be deterred. The Irish chief secretary, Viscount Castlereagh, applied additional pressure to secure support for the union. The tried and tested measures of parliamentary management were employed with great effect: £32,336 was extended to purchase votes and seats, while pensions, places, and peerages were offered. When the session of 1800 began Castlereagh was confident of the outcome, and on August 1, 1800 the Union of Great Britain and Ireland Act (1800) received the royal assent.

The Irish parliament was no more. The politicization of the 1790s and the previous decades had made this union inevitable; the alternative was an overthrow of the existing order if not a complete separation of the kingdoms. In the absence of Catholic emancipation, however, the Act of Union embodied a fatal flaw. In the shorter term, too, the government’s strategy of normalization was challenged by the rebellion of 1803, led by Robert Emmet (1778–1803). And while the Castle could derive solace from the fact that it was the rebels’ ill-judged timing which had saved the day, rather than any effort of their own, this Protestant-led rebellion gave stark lie to the assumption that the union had offered a panacea or final settlement of the Irish question.

Ireland, Great Rebellion, 1798

Clifford D. Conner

In 1798 a long-anticipated rebellion burst forth in Ireland, releasing the repressed fury that had accumulated over decades of oppression. Ireland's impoverished Catholics – politically disenfranchised, tormented by harsh penal laws, barred from formal education, and economically helpless in the face of the ever-increasing demands of rack-renting landlords – were ready for revolution. They had the requisite determination, courage, and numerical superiority to sweep aside their oppressors, if only their potential power could be organized and focused. The unknown factor was leadership. Could the raw power of the Irish rebels be harnessed to create a coordinated striking force?

The penal laws imposed on Ireland over the previous century had been designed to prevent the development of political leadership in the Catholic community. They had forbidden Catholics to hold any office or position of civic authority, or even to vote or serve on juries. They made it illegal for Catholics to be lawyers or schoolmasters, or to buy or inherit land, or even to receive land as a gift from a Protestant. Some of the most extreme provisions of the penal laws were repealed in 1778, but their general spirit remained intact. "This horrible system," Wolfe Tone declared, "had reduced the great body of the Catholic peasantry of Ireland to a situation, morally and physically speaking, below that of the

In May 1798, 100,000 people in Ireland revolted against the British government. This portrait entitled "Tone's interview with Napoleon, December 23rd, 1797" depicts the leader of the Irish independence movement, Theobald Wolfe Tone, pointing out Ireland to Napoleon on a map of Europe. beasts of the field." Leadership, therefore, had to be found elsewhere.

The Presbyterians, or Dissenters, who made up a sizable proportion of the population of the northern province of Ulster, were Protestants but were not of the established Anglican Church. Dissenters were subjected to legal and political discrimination which, though not nearly as severe as that imposed upon the Catholics, was a source of constant irritation. They were also legally compelled to pay tithes to support a Church that regarded them as heathens. The resulting resentment created fertile ground for a dissident political movement in Ulster. In addition, a small number of scions of Anglican families – including Theobald Wolfe Tone, Lord Edward Fitzgerald, and Arthur O'Connor – had been radicalized by the American and French Revolutions and were attracted to the ideals of democratic equality and national independence.

In October 1791 a movement of great historic importance was founded in Belfast. Wolfe Tone, then a young Irish lawyer, was invited by a few Belfast radicals to help create an organization they named the United Irish Society. The United Irishmen urged Protestants and Catholics to put aside their differences and join forces to break the British stranglehold on their country – “the never-failing source of all our political evils,” in Wolfe Tone’s words. Irish nationalists today lay claim to history’s longest-running national liberation struggle, which dates from Henry II’s annexation of Ireland in the twelfth century.

Protestant radicalism and Catholic anger thus merged in the years preceding 1798 to create a massive movement for political reform, at the head of which stood the United Irish Society. As Ireland’s social crisis deepened during the 1790s, the United Irishmen were transformed into an explicitly revolutionary movement with an underground army capable of seriously challenging the mighty British empire. At the same time, their social base became increasingly less Protestant and more Catholic.

Catholics and Protestants

Although Ireland’s misery was rooted in British domination, the Rebellion was not an insurrection of the entire Irish nation against England, because most Protestants – a significant minority of the Irish population – supported British rule. Superimposed upon the struggle for national liberation was a civil war that tended to split Ireland along Catholic versus Protestant lines. The United Irish Society struggled mightily to overcome that communal division but was only partially and temporarily successful.

There was a long history in Ireland of bitterness between the disadvantaged Catholics, who constituted some 70 percent of the population but owned only 7 percent of the land, and the privileged Protestant elite, whose ancestors had stolen the Catholics’ land. The hostility between Catholics and Protestants thus had little to do with theological or doctrinal disputes; the religious identifications were surrogates for social divisions. Furthermore, the governing class was entirely composed of Protestants, while the people governed were mostly Catholics. With Protestants wielding a vastly disproportionate share of economic and political power, it would have been peculiar if the Catholics had not been deeply resentful.

Although limited land resources fueled endemic agrarian warfare, the sectarian hatreds prevented the conflict from becoming a pure class struggle of poor against rich, or tenant farmers against their landlords. The wealthy Protestant upper classes had a vested interest in maintaining British power in Ireland; they perceived the redcoat army as guardians of their property against the land-hungry Catholic hordes. The bulk of the Protestant population, on the other hand, consisted of small farmers – yeomen or tenants – who were far from wealthy, but who enjoyed social and economic privileges over their Catholic counterparts. Loath to surrender those privileges, many of the less affluent Protestants allied themselves with the big landlords and British governors, and served as shock troops to repress the Rebellion. The savagery with which the Protestant yeomen behaved in the years preceding the rising of 1798, however, had the effect of further arousing and galvanizing the Catholic population rather than intimidating it.

This complex mix of nationalism, sectarian strife, and agrarian grievances made Irish society highly unstable and prone to explosive rebellions. The aim of the United Irishmen was to harness that revolutionary energy and give it direction. In spite of the deep antagonisms separating the Catholic and Protestant populations, the United Irish Society’s leadership of the struggle for Catholic emancipation – full political rights for everyone regardless of religious affiliation – provided a basis for nonsectarian unity.

The Catholic peasantry of Ireland had an established tradition of organized resistance. Their secret societies, however, were localized and transitory. Although they frequently gained a measure of revenge through violent action, they were in turn always savagely repressed. As long as their attacks remained scattered and unfocused, they posed no threat to the continued existence of the social order that oppressed them.

By 1793 the great fear of the landowning class – that the agrarian secret societies would someday coalesce into a unified movement – seemed to be coming to pass in the form of a rapidly growing, nationwide, plebeian Catholic organization called the Defenders. As government repression escalated, both the Defenders and the United Irishmen were driven toward seeking a revolutionary solution, and as their interests converged, Defender militants began to join the United Irish underground army in large numbers. The amalgamation of the Defenders and the United Irishmen was far from seamless, but from 1795 to 1798 the level of collaboration between Catholic and Protestant freedom fighters reached a height never before attained.

The United Irish leaders – most of whom were from upper-class Protestant families – were radical democrats who courageously dedicated their lives to freeing their country from foreign domination. Their class background, however, contrasted sharply with that of the dirt-poor Catholics who constituted the mass base of the Rebellion. The Catholics wanted more than mere political equality; they yearned for a social revolution that would bring about economic equality as well. Above all, they wanted the land to be equitably distributed. The United Irish leadership perceived this as a utopian “leveling” demand that was unachievable and could lead only to a communal bloodbath. They also knew that if they launched a fight to redistribute the land, most of their supporters among the Protestant gentry and middle class would desert them.

As a result, the United Irishmen were hesitant to mobilize the full power of the Catholic masses, and instead looked for salvation to the French army, a power that could drive the British out without turning the social structure of Ireland upside down. By thus attempting to bring about a controlled revolution, the United Irish leaders sapped the Rebellion of a great deal of its natural dynamism and vitality.

“The French Are On the Sea”

Nonetheless, a shared desire to gain French military aid to liberate Ireland was a major factor in bringing the Defenders into alliance with the United Irish. Many generations of Irish peasants had looked to Catholic France to someday avenge their historic defeat at the hands of William of Orange. Tá na Francaigh teacht thar sáile – “The French are on the sea” – was a common refrain, expressing an almost messianic hope that a great external power was on its way to deliver them from their enemies.

Although revolutionary France no longer fought in the name of Catholicism, it had gained a reputation as the champion of oppressed peoples everywhere. In November 1792 the French legislature issued a ringing proclamation of international solidarity, including a pledge to use French military power to help others win their liberation. The promise was only implemented insofar as it suited France’s diplomatic interests, but the United Irishmen devoted intense efforts toward holding the French government to its word. United Irish leaders including Tone, O’Connor, and Fitzgerald created an Irish republican embassy-in-exile in Paris and vigorously lobbied for French ships, troops, and weapons to be sent to Ireland.

By 1795, when the United Irish diplomacy began, the French Revolution had already begun to lose its original ardor. The fall of Robespierre’s revolutionary regime in July 1794 initiated the period of Thermidorian reaction. The five members of the Directory who held the reins of power when the first United Irish emissaries arrived in Paris behaved more like bureaucrats than revolutionaries, and the liberation of oppressed peoples was of little interest to them. But France was at war against England, so the Directory saw potential value in cultivating a relationship with the United Irishmen. If Ireland was, as the United Irish envoys claimed, on the verge of a massive nationwide uprising against English rule, it would serve French strategic interests to encourage that revolt. Whether it succeeded or not in liberating Ireland, it would tie down British troops and ships and prevent their use against France. The Directory was therefore receptive to the United Irishmen’s overtures.

The United Irish representatives established a virtually permanent mission in Paris that would survive the Directory and continue through the Napoleonic era. Britain and France were at war almost continuously from 1792 to 1815, and Bonaparte, too, looked upon the Irish rebels as a potentially valuable political asset. In all, five French attempts at invading Ireland were launched in collaboration with the United Irishmen between 1796 and 1798. In addition, Bonaparte drew up plans for further invasions in 1803, 1805, 1807, and 1812, but none was implemented.

The first of the French attempts, launched in the winter of 1796–7, was substantial enough to represent a genuine military threat. General Lazare Hoche, whose influence in France rivaled Bonaparte’s at the time, commanded an invasion force of more than 35 ships and 14,450 troops, and carried a store of more than 40,000 weapons to be distributed to the thousands of Irish rebels who were expected to rise up and welcome them. Wolfe Tone, one of the chief organizers of the expedition, accompanied it and bore the rank of general in the French army. Whether this force was sufficient, in conjunction with Irish rebel forces, to liberate Ireland will never be known. The fleet was separated at sea by storms; when some of the ships reached Bantry Bay on December 21, 1796, General Hoche's frigate was not among them. The harsh weather prevented a landing and after five days dwindling supplies induced the fleet's acting commander to weigh anchor and turn back to France.

As disappointing as this episode was to the United Irish leaders, it transformed their mission in the eyes of all concerned observers. Throughout Ireland, the news of the near invasion electrified the population. The French really were, at long last, on the sea! Although this first attempt had been foiled by bad luck, future efforts were expected to follow. The British government, too, was shocked by the revelation that a major French expedition had so easily evaded the supposedly impregnable naval blockade they depended on to shield all of the British Isles from French attack. Subsequent French invasion attempts, however, were considerably less potent.

Dependence upon French military assistance led the United Irishmen to preach against premature risings and to counsel patience, patience, patience . . . until the French arrived. In spite of the restraints it imposed, the United movement won the allegiance of the insurgent Catholics, who agreed that France's assistance in freeing Ireland would be most welcome. A United Irish assessment of its own numerical strength in March 1798 counted 279,896 men in arms in three of Ireland's four provinces (Ulster, Leinster, and Munster; no figures were given for Connaught). While this figure may be exaggerated, there can be no doubt that the underground rebel army under United Irish command was immense and ubiquitous.

The rebels faced a formidable enemy. England's determination to maintain its rule was evidenced by the 100,000 troops it had at its disposal in Ireland, compared with only about 30,000 at home in England itself. Its forces in Ireland comprised not only British soldiers but also Protestant yeomanry and local Irish militia detachments. The militias were considered of dubious loyalty, however, because their rank-and-file was Catholic in composition. They had ostensibly been formed to defend against foreign invasion, but it was generally assumed that in a civil war situation the militias would mutiny against their Protestant officers and switch sides. After all, the only threat of foreign invasion in 1798 was from the French, whom the Irish Catholics looked upon as potential liberators.

The British and their puppet Irish government in Dublin deeply feared the people they governed. Over the previous decade landlords had introduced an innovative technique known as "rack-renting" as a means of intensifying the exploitation of their tenants. Rack-renting required tenant farmers to put up large sums of cash in advance, which they could only do by going deeply into debt to city bankers and speculators. It also entailed short-term leases on which the rents were jacked up each time a lease expired. The victimized peasants tried to defend themselves by the only means at their disposal – threats and acts of violence against their oppressors. As the peasants' misery and anger increased, localized agrarian warfare raged throughout Ireland. The rural gentry barricaded their houses, stockpiled firearms, and lived in a state of siege for fear of midnight visits from their tenants.

The Rebellion Begins

In response to the agrarian violence the government launched a campaign of military terrorism that treated every poor Catholic as a potential rebel. The peasants' continuing resistance and the increasingly savage reprisals by the government culminated in the Great Rebellion of 1798. On March 30 the government proclaimed the entire country in a state of rebellion and imposed nationwide martial law. The United Irishmen responded with a formal call to rise – with or without the French – on May 23.

The attitude of the British military had been expressed the previous year by General Gerard Lake when he put the province of Ulster under martial law. "You may rest assured," Lake declared, "that nothing but coercive measures in the strongest degree can succeed in this country. The lower order of people and most of the middle class are determined republicans, have imbibed the French principles, and will not be contented with anything short of a revolution.”

In early 1798 the government intensified its efforts to systematically disarm the rebels; all hidden pikes and firearms were to be handed over or the military would “lay the country waste.” A policy of “collective punishment” including torture and executions was implemented to force the surrender of arms. Blacksmiths and carpenters were primary targets because they were collectively blamed for the manufacture of pikes, the main offensive weapon of the rural insurgents. British army units encouraged local gentry and yeomanry to draw up long lists of “suspects” whose homes then were burned down and who were tortured to extract confessions and to force the naming of friends and neighbors as rebels.

A hundred years later the Protestant historian W. E. H. Lecky described the suffering thus visited upon the Irish nation. “It was a scene of horrors,” he wrote, “hardly surpassed in the modern history of Europe.” Even considering the worst atrocities of the twentieth century, the savage repression that preceded and followed the Rebellion of 1798 remains among the most tragic entries in the chronicles of man’s inhumanity to man. Apologists for British rule attempt justification by insisting that outrages were committed by both sides, but the reciprocal violence should not be considered morally symmetrical. The cruelty of the oppressor cannot be excused by pointing to the defensive violence of the oppressed.

Two particular instruments of torture – triangles and portable gallows – became symbols of the British terror campaign. The triangles were three-sided frameworks to which suspects were tied as they were publicly flogged with a fiendish whip called a cat-o’-nails – a cat-o’-nine-tails with barbwire tips. The portable gallows were wooden apparatuses upon which suspects were subjected to a procedure known as half-hanging: They would be hanged by the neck until almost unconscious, then let down, requestioned, and if their answers were still deemed unsatisfactory the procedure would be repeated. A third form of torture that also became emblematic of the period was pitch-capping, whereby a cap of coarse cloth or paper filled with boiling tar was forced onto the victim’s head and held until it cooled.

The military terror sparked widespread uprisings in the southern counties of Kildare, Carlow, Wicklow, and Wexford in March 1798. At the end of May and the beginning of June an army of 20,000 rebels took over the town of Wexford, and by the beginning of June another massive rebel army in Wicklow was threatening to move against Dublin. In spite of their courage and superiority in numbers, the poorly armed and poorly trained peasant combatants were at a significant disadvantage. Fighting with pikes against experienced British soldiers with cannons, they were decisively defeated by Lake’s army in a famous battle at Vinegar Hill.

Meanwhile, a second phase of the Rebellion had begun in Ulster in the north. A rebel force of 6,000 men led by Henry Joy McCracken took Antrim on June 7 but was forced to withdraw later the same day. Four days later 7,000 rebels commanded by Henry Munro captured Ballynahinch in County Down. Risings occurred elsewhere in Ulster, but in an uncoordinated manner that allowed government forces to defeat them one at a time. All in all, the insurrection in Ulster lasted less than a week; McCracken and Munro were captured and executed. In the aftermath of these events the general populations of both north and south were treated with great brutality. For his particularly barbarous role General Lake is still remembered in Ireland as “the Butcher of Wexford.”

The Republic of Connaught

The final scene of the Rebellion occurred in the west of Ireland when – at long last – the French arrived. On August 22 a force of slightly more than 1,000 French soldiers under the command of General Jean-Joseph Humbert landed at Killala in the province of Connaught. By that time, however, the rest of Ireland had been brutally pacified and the full strength of the English armies could be brought to bear against Humbert’s tiny band of men.

Humbert was supposed to represent only the vanguard of a considerably larger French invasion force. His instructions were to establish a beachhead and await the arrival of 12,000 more men under the command of Generals Hardy and Kilmaine. He was explicitly ordered not to undertake offensive action on his own, but when hundreds of Irish peasants flocked to his banner and pressed for action, he proclaimed the birth of the Republic of Connaught and proceeded to win a series of impressive victories in its name. On August 27 Humbert challenged a far superior force at Castlebar, the main British garrison in Connaught. The British troops at Castlebar were commanded by three experienced Generals: Lake, Hutchinson, and Trench. Nonetheless, their ranks broke in the heat of battle and turned tail and ran, prompting Irish nationalists to commemorate the battle as “the Races of Castlebar.” It was a humiliating defeat for Lake and the British army. From Castlebar, Humbert marched his small but growing force toward the interior of Ireland.

Meanwhile, the British authorities feared that the French military presence and their inspiring victory at Castlebar would rekindle the Rebellion that they thought had been snuffed out once and for all in the other provinces. The lord lieutenant of Ireland, General Cornwallis, took personal command of the Anglo-Irish armies and set out to crush Humbert before it was too late. Although Cornwallis’s forces numbered 30,000 against Humbert’s 2,000 French and Irish troops, he dispatched an urgent appeal to London to send “as large a reinforcement as possible.” His concern, of course, was that Humbert would provide leadership and organization to many hundreds of thousands of Irish rebels.

Cornwallis, who had been forced to surrender to the American rebels at Yorktown in 1781, was determined not to be embarrassed again. In spite of his overwhelming numerical advantage he proceeded very cautiously and methodically against Humbert. The French general, meanwhile, was counting on the arrival of Hardy and Kilmaine with significant reinforcements, but they never appeared. Humbert put his men on a forced march toward Dublin, which was lightly defended, but ultimately Cornwallis intercepted and encircled them and forced Humbert to surrender at Ballinamuck, County Longford, on September 8.

Cornwallis recognized Humbert and his French soldiers as prisoners of war; they were treated humanely and repatriated to France in exchange for English prisoners of war. The Irish fighters who had joined Humbert, however, were considered rebels not to be accorded prisoner-of-war status. Rather than being allowed to surrender peaceably they were hunted down and slaughtered without mercy. The Republic of Connaught was destroyed.

General Hardy’s long-delayed invasion force finally departed for Ireland on September 16 – a week after Humbert’s surrender. It ran afoul of the British navy on October 12, however, and was defeated. Wolfe Tone, who accompanied Hardy’s expedition, was captured, imprisoned in Dublin, and sentenced to death, but cheated the hangman by cutting his own throat on November 11. He died a week later and remains among the most revered of Irish martyrs.

Why Did the Rebellion Fail?

Everywhere the freedom fighters rose in 1798 the plebeian majority rallied solidly behind them. Viewed from each local vantage point the insurrection appeared universal and unstoppable, but viewed on a larger scale it could be seen to have unfolded unevenly. Ultimately the Rebellion failed as the forces of order were able to isolate the localized risings and defeat them one at a time. Tens of thousands of rebels paid with their lives.

The inability of the United Irish Society to coordinate the uprisings resulted from the government’s success in destroying its central leadership on the eve of the Rebellion. Government intelligence services had penetrated the organization at its highest levels; the greatest betrayals were those committed by informers Leonard McNally, a Central Committee member, and Thomas Reynolds, a confidant of Lord Edward Fitzgerald. Before the United Irish Society issued the call to rise, virtually all of its original leaders were dead, in prison, or in exile. Most of the leaders had been arrested in a raid on March 11; only Fitzgerald escaped, but he was captured shortly afterward and died in prison on June 4 of wounds sustained during his arrest.

Consequently only unseasoned third- and fourth-rank leaders were on the scene in Ireland at the outset of the Rebellion. Furthermore, communications between them were risky and difficult, making it virtually impossible to coordinate their actions. Each local insurgent group thus found itself on its own.

Another major factor in the defeat of the Rebellion was the failure of significant French support to materialize. The successes of Humbert’s minuscule force provide a small indication of what a serious French invasion might have accomplished. The two most influential French backers of Irish liberation – “the two Lazares,” Lazare Hoche and Lazare Carnot – were lost to the cause in September 1797 when General Hoche died of tuberculosis and Carnot was chased into exile by Bonaparte’s coup d’état of Fructidor. Bonaparte originally endorsed the policy of attacking England by invading Ireland, but in the spring of 1798 he decided to invade Egypt instead – a disastrous decision for the Irish rebels (and, as it turned out, for Bonaparte himself).

The Aftermath

After Humbert's surrender the Rebellion was over, but the defeated rebels' hatred of their persecutors was undiminished. Cornwallis realized that continued violence against the vanquished populace would only lay the groundwork for future rebellions, but his efforts to restrain the Protestant yeomen who were bent on revenge met with little success. He bewailed "the numberless murders that are hourly committed by our people without any process or examination whatever. The yeomanry . . . take the lead in rapine and murder. The Irish Militia with a few officers, and those chiefly of the worst kind, follow closely on the heels of the yeomanry in murder and every kind of atrocity." Later, in 1799, Cornwallis complained that the counterproductive reprisals were continuing: "The same wretched business of Court-martial, hanging, transportation etc. attended by all the dismal scenes of wives, sisters, fathers kneeling and crying, is going on as usual."

No fundamental problems had been solved; indeed, they had been aggravated. Cornwallis recognized the "same spirit of disaffection continuing to pervade the lower orders." Although "the rebellion is less openly persisted in," he said, "it does not fail to show itself in various outrages and depredations not less destructive and infinitely more embarrassing . . . than open insurrection." The United Irish leadership in exile drew similar conclusions and consequently anticipated another general uprising in the very near term, and continued to entreat the French government to invade Ireland once again.

Cornwallis led a political campaign in favor of abolishing the puppet Irish government and replacing it with direct, unambiguous rule from London. The corrupt Irish Parliament was bribed to vote itself out of existence. The Act of Union was passed in 1800 creating the United Kingdom of England and Ireland, but the Union's two partners were far from equals. It was a coercive partnership of prince and pauper.

With the Irish Protestants no longer empowered to legislate for Ireland, British policymakers took the opportunity to make concessions to the Catholics in hopes of avoiding more Great Rebellions in the future. In 1829 Catholic Emancipation finally became the law of the land and the majority of the Irish people were no longer legally second-class citizens in their own country. Later generations nevertheless continued to fight for genuine national independence. In 1922 a compromise resulted in 26 of Ireland's 32 counties forming the Irish Free State. Six counties in the north of Ireland, however, remain part of the United Kingdom, and Irish nationalists continue to insist that they will not be satisfied until the whole of their country is free from English rule.

The divisions in Irish society that gave rise to the Great Rebellion, and that were exacerbated by it, have still not fully healed. The savagery with which the Catholics were treated in its wake ensured that it would not soon fade from memory. On the other hand, the resistance of the rebels was so courageous that today, more than 200 years later, Irish nationalists still derive inspiration from the spirit of 1798.

Ireland, the Troubles

Robert W. White

"The Troubles" is a neutral term that attempts to balance the perspective of paramilitaries, who

A demonstrator is chased by a British soldier during a Northern Ireland Civil Rights Association march in Derry, Northern Ireland, on January 30, 1972 (Bloody Sunday). saw themselves as soldiers engaged in a war, and the perspective of the media and government officials who observed a sectarian conflict between the Northern Irish Catholic and Protestant communities. Events associated with the Troubles that made worldwide news include the bombing of Birmingham pubs (Provisional IRA, 1974), the attack on the Miami Showband (Ulster Volunteer Force/Ulster Defence Regiment, 1975), the firebombing of the La Mon House restaurant (Provisional IRA, 1978), and the Omagh bombing (Real IRA, 1998).

Between 1969 and 2005 more than 3,500 people died in the Troubles. The Provisional IRA, or “Provos,” with more than 1,750 victims, was responsible for more deaths than any other organization. More than half of the Provos’ victims were members of the security forces, including 454 British army personnel. The Provos killed more than 625 civilians, including more than 300 Protestant civilians. Loyalist paramilitaries (loyal to the British crown) killed approximately 1,100 people, most of whom were Catholic civilians. The security forces killed more than 350 people, most of whom were killed by the British army. The British army killed 104 Provisional IRA volunteers, 118 Catholic civilians, and 20 Protestant civilians. The Troubles were simultaneously a war and a sectarian conflict, and most of its victims were civilians.

The Troubles began on October 5, 1968 in Derry City (the Unionists call it Londonderry), when the Royal Ulster Constabulary (RUC) attacked Northern Ireland Civil Rights Association (NICRA) marchers, precipitating a riot. The attack’s origins stem from events of previous decades and even centuries. Northern Ireland, established by the Government of Ireland Act (1920), was created in the midst of the Anglo-Irish War, a part of the 1919–23 generation’s “Troubled Times.” The province’s Protestant majority dates from the seventeenth-century plantation of Ulster.

NICRA sought equal rights for Northern Ireland’s Nationalist population, claiming they suffered discrimination at the hands of Unionists. Most Nationalists are Catholic and desire the reunification of Ireland. Most Protestants are Unionists and want Northern Ireland to remain part of the United Kingdom. Civil rights protests were met by counter-demonstrators, often supported by the RUC. A particularly vociferous opponent of civil rights was the Reverend Ian Paisley, Moderator of the Free Presbyterian Church and known for his anti-Catholic statements. In August 1969 major rioting throughout Northern Ireland resulted in several deaths, the burning of Belfast neighborhoods, and the deployment of British troops as peacekeepers. The troops were welcomed by many Nationalists.

The Nationalist and Unionist communities reacted differently to these events. In December 1969 the Irish Republican Army split and the Provisional IRA was created. The Provisional IRA (henceforth referred to simply as the IRA) rejected constitutional politics, embraced armed struggle in support of a united Ireland, and was complemented by Provisional Sinn Féin (henceforth, Sinn Féin). In 1971 moderate Nationalists formed the Social Democratic and Labour Party (SDLP), which seeks the reunification of Ireland through peaceful methods. Also in 1971, hard-line Unionists left the Ulster Unionist Party (UUP) and formed the Democratic Unionist Party (DUP), led by Reverend Paisley. In the early 1970s Loyalists organized paramilitary organizations.

In August 1971 the British government authorized the internment without trial of persons suspected of paramilitary activity, but until 1973 only Nationalists were interned. This alienated a large segment of that community, an alienation that was exacerbated in January 1972 – “Bloody Sunday” – when 14 unarmed civil rights protestors attending an anti-internment rally were shot dead by British soldiers. In March 1972 the British prorogued Northern Ireland's government and instituted direct control from London; almost 500 people were killed in the Troubles that year.

There were several attempts to resolve the conflict. In 1973–4 moderate Nationalists and Unionists, with the support of the London and Dublin governments, formed a power-sharing executive, but it was brought down by a Loyalist-led general strike. In 1975 the British entered into an open-ended, bilateral truce with the IRA in a failed attempt to engage Irish Republicans in constitutional politics. In the early 1980s, in response to rapid growth in Sinn Féin following the deaths of Irish Republican prisoners on hunger-strike, including Bobby Sands, MP, the British organized a Northern Ireland Assembly. The SDLP, fearing it would be outflanked, followed Sinn Féin's lead and boycotted it.

In the early 1990s, after secret talks between Sinn Féin, Irish and British governmental representatives, and the SDLP, the situation changed. The Downing Street Declaration (1992) included the principle that the people of Ireland should determine their future, including the possibility of unifying the North and South. In August 1994 the IRA declared a unilateral ceasefire. Six weeks later, the Combined Loyalist Command did the same. Over the next four years the London and Irish governments, the SDLP, the DUP, the UUP, Sinn Féin, and others haltingly worked out the Good Friday Agreement (or Belfast Agreement) of April 1998. The agreement led to reform in Northern Ireland, including changes in the RUC, which was renamed the Police Service Northern Ireland (PSNI). Following a referendum in the Republic of Ireland, the Irish government's claim on Northern Ireland was deleted from the Irish constitution.

In 2007, after some false starts and defying all expectations, London devolved power to a Northern Ireland Assembly with the Rev. Ian Paisley (until 2008) as first minister and Martin McGuinness, IRA veteran and prominent Sinn Féin member, as deputy first minister. The two unlikely leaders worked together well. Some Republican organizations, including Republican Sinn Féin, the Continuity IRA, the 32 County Sovereignty Movement, and the Real IRA, rejected the Good Friday Agreement and continue to resist, but on a relatively small scale.

Irish nationalism

Claire Fitzpatrick

Irish nationalism in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries included various currents: the movement for self-government, land agitation, cultural regeneration, and eventually radical separatism. For many years the discourse on nationalism in Ireland was dominated by a teleological perspective that viewed the struggle for, and achievement of, independence as inevitable – the natural result of long-established national consciousness defined by the colonial relationship with Britain. This view has been superseded by a more complex and elaborate picture of the factors shaping Irish nationalism. Nationalism must be seen in the context of growing modernization and development in class relations and social structure. The transformation of the power structure led to the rise of rural and petty bourgeoisies as the main architects of the nationalist identity. Famine and emigration are also now recognized as important influences in preparing the ground for the flourishing of nationalism by making it more amenable to modernization and assimilation. Three variants can be discerned in the development of Irish nationalism: constitutional, cultural, and radical-separatist.

Constitutional Nationalism

Constitutional nationalism was the dominant form, centering on the quest for home rule. The land question, which had dominated Irish politics in the late nineteenth century, had developed into a wider movement initially led by Charles Stewart Parnell, which put the policy of self-government at the forefront of its agenda. The identification of the nationalist cause with the land question gave Irish nationalism a distinctive mark, and the alleviation of the land question by the Wyndham Land Purchase Act of 1903 led to a significant reduction in activism, which altered the nature of the nationalist cause. During this period nationalism was curtailed by the narrow confines of the British parliamentary structure, which to some extent accounts for its failure to realize its goals.

Parnell and the Irish Parliamentary Party (IPP) that he formed in 1882 were somewhat out of step with the dynamics of modern Irish nationalism. Although the IPP is often thought of as the most representative of Irish nationalist parties, it became increasingly conservative and to some extent irrelevant. When John Redmond, the IPP's leader from 1900 to 1918, declared support for the British war effort in World War I, he alienated provincial nationalists and hastened the party's decline. For more radical nationalists the war was a great catalyst to action challenging British rule.

Cultural Nationalism

The decline of parliamentary nationalism in the late 1890s resulted in a period of political stagnation and gave rise to a new nationalism that took cultural and radical forms. The cultural resurgence of the 1890s involved a conscious move to cultivate a truly national consciousness that would stress self-reliance and evoke pride.

The Gaelic League, formed in 1893, drew on Douglas Hyde's call in 1892 for the de-Anglicanization of Ireland and a revival of all things Irish. It developed a nationalist historicism that stressed the injustices of the colonial relationship. Together with the Romantic literary movement that celebrated a quasi-mythical construct of "Irish Ireland," the cultural nationalists aimed to educate and gaelicize the populace. However, although the Gaelic League succeeded in making the Irish language an important political rallying point, the language revivalist movement failed in its primary aim to displace English as the country's dominant language. It was through English that Irish nationalism was expressed.

The anti-modern nature of the Gaelic revival was reflected in its aversion to the growing assimilation of Irish society to British values, and the cultivation of an ethnocentric cultural distinctiveness in defiance of Victorian Britain. Among other things, it created a symbolic basis for the political mobilization of Catholics. The equation of Catholic and Irish by D. P. Moran, the editor of the nationalist periodical The Leader, has been credited as a critical influence in that regard.

The Gaelic League, by reflecting the hopes and ambitions of those who felt socially excluded from power and status, filled a gap the IPP could not by mobilizing urban Ireland for nationalist politics. Although the League was the most important influence on the governing elite of the Irish Free State, the revolution that produced that state exposed (as one historian put it) the "hollowness of the cultural movement" (Garvin 1987). Nevertheless, as a vehicle for Catholic mobilization and promotion of "Irish Ireland" identity, it was of fundamental importance in the development of both modern separatist nationalism and the broader nationalist identity.

Radical Separatism

Concomitant with the cultural regeneration, and heavily influenced by it, more radical groups emerged offering new views and resolutions of the Irish national question. Of these, Arthur Griffith's non-republican Sinn Féin, founded in 1904–5, embodied bourgeois nationalism and represented a middle way between constitutionalism and physical force. It stressed the policy of national independence alongside passive resistance. By 1910 it was a spent force, eclipsed by a revitalized IPP and a regrouped Irish Republican Brotherhood (IRB). The ambiguous nature of Sinn Féin and the conciliatory approach of the IPP were both scorned by more radical separatist nationalists who combined the ideals of the Romantic literary movement and Gaelic revivalism with the militant urgency of Fenianism. The formation of the IRB in 1858 had added a physical-force dimension to Irish nationalism and it later recruited from the Gaelic revival movement to become the main force behind the Rising of 1916. Contemptuous of the idea of a constitutional settlement within the context of the British empire, the more militant nationalists strove for the establishment of an Irish Republic.

The arming of the northern Unionists, who rejected any form of self-government for Ireland, had contributed to this resurgence of militant nationalism. Patrick Pearse, the leader of the rebels in 1916, was “glad the north had begun,” and the cult of violence and blood sacrifice was proclaimed as a legitimate response, although it remained a marginal ideal. Pearse propounded the mythical ideals of Irish nationalism and Catholic aspirations, and espoused separatism as the only true nationalist position. Meanwhile, the presence among the rebels of the Marxist James Connolly, who equated the cause of labor with the cause of Ireland, had a profound effect on labor politics in Ireland, and perhaps lent to Irish nationalism an egalitarianism it did not always espouse. Connolly’s socialism was often at odds with Irish nationalism.

In recent years the conflict in Northern Ireland has brought the role of nationalism under intense scrutiny. “Revisionist” interpretations of the role of nationalism in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries have challenged the idea that republicanism was inevitable and argue that 1916 was “aberrant” and not a logical extension of developments in early twentieth-century Ireland. More cogent arguments, however, support the notion that the post-1916 revolution was the triumph of the “Irish Ireland” party, which had managed to express Irish nationalist aspirations by capturing the middle ground and its ideals in Irish politics. The aspirations and ideas of all three strands of Irish nationalism were influential in shaping the subsequent expression and development of nationalism in Ireland, and the Rising of 1916 transformed the nationalist debate in Ireland and made possible the establishment of the modern Irish state.

Irish Republican Army (IRA)

Robert W. White

The Irish Republican Army (IRA) was born in April 1916 when rebels in Dublin declared an Irish Republic, but its roots date from much earlier. Some of the 1916 rebels had been Fenians in the 1860s–1880s and some Fenians had been Young Irelanders in the 1840s. The IRA’s ideology dates from eighteenth-century republican philosophy and the United Irishmen of the 1790s, who, in the words of Theobald Wolfe Tone sought “to break the connection with England, the never-failing source of our political ills . . . and to substitute the common name of Irishmen in place of the denomination of Protestant, Catholic and Dissenter.”

The 1916 Easter Rising failed, its leaders were executed, and its soldiers were arrested and interned. Most Irish people had not supported the rebellion, but by the time internees were released in late 1916 the brutal British overreaction to the Rising had laid a fertile ground for the reorganization of the IRA and an associated political party, Sinn Féin. Sinn Féin won the majority of Irish seats in the 1918 election to the British parliament. Instead of taking their seats in London, Sinn Féin's representatives formed a revolutionary government in Dublin, Dáil Éireann.

On the day Dáil Éireann convened, January 21, 1919, an IRA group in County Tipperary started the Irish War for Independence (also known as the Black and Tan War or the Anglo-Irish War). IRA fighters went on the offensive throughout Ireland, especially in Dublin and the west. They received less support in the northeast province of Ulster, where the predominantly Protestant population, which was descended from the seventeenth-century English "plantation" of Ireland, favored union with Britain.

The Government of Ireland Act (1920) partitioned Ireland, but the rebels ignored this. In January 1922, however, Dáil Éireann ratified a treaty that confirmed partition and provoked a split in the IRA and Sinn Féin. Northern Ireland remained part of the United Kingdom and the pro-Union Protestant majority formed a government in Belfast. In Southern Ireland the armed forces of the newly born Irish Free State pursued the soldiers of the anti-treaty IRA, executed former comrades, and won the Irish Civil War.

The IRA and Sinn Féin refused to acknowledge the legitimacy of the Dublin and Belfast parliaments. In 1938 a group of Dáil Éireann veterans who, based on a resolution passed by the revolutionary government, considered themselves the de jure government of the Irish Republic, devolved the powers of government to the IRA Army Council. This provided a legitimacy that cannot be underestimated; it gave the IRA a moral basis for armed struggle.

In 1939 an IRA campaign led by 1916–23 veterans started with bombings in England and spread to Ireland. The British, Northern Irish, and Free State governments responded severely with internment and executions. The Free State government, led by former IRA men, let IRA members die on hunger strike rather than recognize their political status. The campaign ended in 1945. In December 1956 a "Resistance Campaign," organized by 1916–23 veterans and 1940s veterans, and by the children of 1920s veterans, was launched. The campaign began with activity in many Northern Irish locations, but over time it was confined to attacks along the border with the Republic of Ireland (which in 1949 officially replaced the Irish Free State). The two Irish governments again responded firmly, arresting and interning activists without trial. The campaign ended in 1962 in failure, but many of those involved believed they had kept faith with their predecessors and had handed on a tradition to the future.

In the mid-1960s the Northern Ireland Civil Rights Association (NICRA) was organized to support Irish nationalists – primarily Catholic and supporting the reunification of Ireland – who argued they suffered discrimination at the hands of the majority Unionist community. NICRA marches were met by counterdemonstrations and there was major unrest in August 1969. British troops were called in as "peacekeepers" and in December 1969 the IRA split over how best to respond to the situation. The "Official" IRA wanted to combine military action with revolutionary politics and participate in the Belfast, Dublin, and Westminster parliaments. The Provisional IRA ("Provos") supported a military response but held to the traditional view that the Belfast and Dublin governments were illegitimate and that participation in constitutional politics would inevitably undermine armed struggle.

The Official IRA declared a ceasefire in May 1972. In 1974 some members of the organization formed the Irish National Liberation Army (INLA) and returned to armed struggle. The INLA and its political counterpart, the Irish Republican Socialist Party (IRSP), although small, continue to this day.

The repressive response of the British and Northern Ireland governments, including internment without trial of suspected republicans in 1971 and "Bloody Sunday" in 1972 (in which 26 unarmed civil rights protesters were shot, 14 of them fatally, by British troops), fueled the rapid growth of the Provisional IRA. Hunger strikes by IRA prisoners also generated sympathy and support for the organization, especially after the May 1981 death of Bobby Sands, who had been elected as an abstentionist MP for Fermanagh/South Tyrone.

As electoral support for Provisional Sinn Féin increased, the Provos split. In October 1986 delegates to an IRA convention recognized the authority of the Dublin parliament. A minority (including the vast majority of the Provos' founders who were still active) continued to reject that parliament and, believing that constitutional politics would lead to compromise rather than a united Ireland, formed the “Continuity” IRA (CIRA). They also formed “Republican” Sinn Féin. In August 1994 the Provisional IRA entered into a unilateral ceasefire, followed by a ceasefire by the Combined Loyalist Military Command. In 1996, with the Provisional IRA still on ceasefire, the CIRA formally revealed itself. In 1997 the Provisional IRA split again and internal critics created the Real IRA. In April 1998 the Provisional leadership accepted a political compromise, the Good Friday Agreement (Belfast Agreement), which was rejected by both the CIRA and the Real IRA.

The Provisional IRA formally ended its military campaign in July 2005. By that time, Provisional Sinn Féin members had taken seats and participated in the Dublin parliament and the Northern Ireland Assembly. The Continuity IRA and the Real IRA remain active, though on a small scale.

Although members of the Provisional, Continuity, and Real IRAs view themselves as guerrillas pursuing national liberation, they are all proscribed by the British, Irish, and United States governments as “terrorist” organizations. Among the most noteworthy of the acts for which various groupings calling themselves the IRA have claimed responsibility are “Bloody Friday” (1972), in which 22 bombings in Belfast killed 11 people and wounded more than a hundred; the firebombing of the La Mon House restaurant (1978) that took 12 lives; the assassination of the Queen’s husband’s uncle, Lord Mountbatten (1979); and the Omagh, County Tyrone bombing (1998) that killed 29 and wounded more than two hundred.

The IRA’s membership has included such prominent political leaders and statesmen as Eamon de Valera, Seán Lemass, Seán MacBride, and Martin McGuinness, as well as author, playwright, and poet Brendan Behan. The current president of Provisional Sinn Féin and MP for West Belfast, Gerry Adams, is reportedly an IRA veteran, which he denies.

Irish Republican Army resistance campaign

Robert W. White

On December 12, 1956 the Irish Republican Army began what they called the Resistance Campaign, which would continue until February 26, 1962. For the first three years IRA forces attacked Royal Ulster Constabulary (RUC) police stations and officers, British army bases and personnel, and government facilities in many parts of Northern Ireland. By 1960, however, strong opposition from the British and Northern Ireland governments and the collaboration of the Republic of Ireland’s Cabinet limited military action to areas along the border of these two states. Disappointed, internal IRA critics began to refer to it as the Border Campaign, and it is by this title that it is popularly known. Many 1950s IRA activists, however, including Ruairí Ó Brádaigh, the primary author of the IRA statement “to end the Resistance Campaign,” continue to use the original name.

The Resistance Campaign is important because it served as the transmitter of the ideals, goals, and tactics of 1916–23 IRA veterans to future generations of activists. Between 1916 and 1922 agitation and political action by the IRA and the political party Sinn Féin achieved independence for 26 of Ireland’s 32 counties, which formed the Irish Free State (later the Republic of Ireland), with a government in Dublin. The six counties of Northern Ireland, established in 1920–1 with a separate government in Belfast, remained part of the United Kingdom. The IRA and Sinn Féin split over the Anglo-Irish Treaty (1922), which confirmed the partition of Ireland. Anti-Treatyites lost the Irish Civil War (1922–3), but the treaty’s opponents in Sinn Féin and the IRA never accepted the “partitionist” governments.

IRA veterans of 1916–23 organized an IRA campaign that began with bombs in England in 1939 and ended with small-scale actions in Northern Ireland in 1945. In the late 1940s, and in spite of their failures, the 1916–23 IRA veterans, complemented by veterans of the 1940s campaign, again reorganized the IRA. Key personnel included Paddy McLogan and Larry Grogan, who joined the IRA in the 1910s, and Tomas Mac Curtain, the son of the Sinn Féin lord mayor of Cork, who was killed by the Royal Irish Constabulary in 1920. Tony Magan, chief of staff from 1948 to 1957, joined the IRA in the 1930s. The veterans were complemented by younger recruits, many of whom were the children of activists from the 1916–23 era, including Dáithí O’Connell and Ruairí Ó Brádaigh. In the late 1950s O’Connell joined the IRA Army Council and was director of operations. Ó Brádaigh was IRA chief of staff when the campaign ended. Although the 1950s IRA failed to reunite Ireland, many activists believed that by taking up arms they had kept faith with their predecessors and handed on a tradition to the future. The statement ending the campaign declared: “The Irish Resistance Movement renews its pledge of eternal hostility to the British Forces of Occupation in Ireland.”

IRA and Sinn Féin activists of the 1950s, as middle-aged men, were key organizers of the Provisional IRA and Provisional Sinn Féin in 1969–70; Dáithí O’Connell was the first Provisional IRA director of publicity and served on the organization’s founding Army Council; Ruairí Ó Brádaigh was the first president of Provisional Sinn Féin. In 1986, when the Republican movement split again, it was still-active 1950s veterans who organized the Continuity IRA and Republican Sinn Féin (RSF), including Dáithí O’Connell, the first Continuity IRA chief of staff, and Ruairí Ó Brádaigh, the president of RSF. The Continuity IRA was named by Tom Maguire, a prominent IRA veteran of the 1916–23 era and member of the revolutionary Irish government of 1921, the Second All-Ireland Dáil Eireann. Using the word “Continuity” in its name staked the organization’s claim to direct descent – through an unbroken link – with the IRA of 1916–23. The Resistance Campaign provided that link. The founders of the Provisional IRA, Provisional Sinn Féin, Continuity IRA, and Republican Sinn Féin are often, appropriately, described as traditionalists.

The Resistance Campaign failed for several reasons, including the “apolitical” approach of the IRA leadership in the early 1950s. During the 1940s campaign the IRA was almost destroyed by severe state repression on the part of the Dublin government. By concentrating their military activities in Northern Ireland and avoiding conflict with Dublin (a government whose authority they never recognized, de jure or de facto) the leadership hoped to avoid a repeat of the 1940s. Yet, when the campaign started, both the Northern Irish and Dublin governments responded quickly with internment without trial, as well as the banning of Sinn Féin and its newspaper in the North, and the use of military courts in the South. These actions undercut the ability of the IRA and Sinn Féin to complement military activity in Northern Ireland with political action there and in the South. Late in the campaign younger activists pushed to combine military and political approaches, which set the stage for important political developments in the Republican movement in the 1960s.

Irish revolts, 1400–1790

Kathleen Ruppert

By the beginning of the fifteenth century the English colonial presence in Ireland, having reached a high point in the thirteenth century, had declined in both area and profitability. Henry IV (1399–1413) was preoccupied with a rebellion in Wales. Furthermore, with plots in England aimed at overthrowing him, he and his successors were too concerned with an ongoing struggle against France to devote significant resources to the Irish colony. Under these circumstances, powerful Gaelic lords from beyond the Pale (the area around Dublin where English law prevailed) were able to mount an almost constant threat to English rule. Unable to reassert dominion over Ireland, the government was forced to rely on Anglo-Irish magnates to maintain law and order. When the Gaelic Irish sept (chieftain), O'Reilly, took up arms in a 1423 rising, for example, the intervention of the Earl of Desmond, with a large force from Munster, was required to protect the Leinster colonists. However, the presence of powerful Anglo-Irish magnates posed its own difficulties, as disputes among leading Anglo-Irish families (particularly between the Butlers and the Geraldines) were endemic and contributed to the unrest.

In the second half of the fifteenth century, as England once again became embroiled in a dynastic struggle, Ireland began to assume a greater significance in English politics. When Richard, Duke of York, was convicted of treason during the Wars of the Roses, he fled to Ireland. In defiance of the English parliament, an Anglo-Irish parliament confirmed York in office and declared that any law passed in England must be accepted by the Anglo-Irish parliament in order to be binding in Ireland. Following a Yorkist victory in 1461 the Earl of Ormond, who had supported the Lancastrian side, was executed in England. The late earl's brother, Sir John Butler, invaded Ireland, and with the help of his cousins captured Waterford and New Ross, and incited risings in the midlands. Inadequate resources rendered the crown authorities in Dublin unable to suppress the rebellion, but the Earl of Desmond marshaled his forces to defeat the Butlers.

As a reward for his assistance against the Butlers, Desmond was appointed chief governor of Ireland in the spring of 1463. The Anglo-Irish within the Pale doubted the loyalty of the great gaelicized magnate, however. Desmond was dismissed in 1467 and charged with treason the following February. Desmond's subsequent beheading sparked widespread risings throughout the country. The Earl of Kildare, who had been charged with treason along with Desmond, escaped from custody and joined in the rebellion along with several Gaelic Irish leaders. Unable to subdue the opposition, the administration agreed to reverse the charges against Kildare if he would induce the Irish chieftains to make peace. The incident served as a powerful reminder to crown authorities that they could not keep the peace without the cooperation of powerful local magnates.

Ireland once again factored into England's dynastic struggle in 1487 when young Lambert Simnel, posing as the nephew of Edward IV, was crowned King Edward VI in Dublin. Backed by Irish supporters and German mercenaries, Simnel invaded England but was soundly defeated by the forces of Henry VII. Following a similar attempt on the Tudor throne in 1491, Henry VII sent Sir Edward Poyning to Ireland. Poyning's Law, passed in 1495, greatly restricted the freedom of the Irish parliament by providing, among other things, that future Irish parliaments and legislation must receive prior approval from the English Privy Council. Though it would be several decades before the crown attempted a consistent policy of direct rule, circumstances had forced the nascent Tudor state to begin taking a more active role in Ireland.

Sixteenth Century

The first serious challenge to Tudor rule in Ireland occurred in 1534 under the leadership of Thomas, Lord Offaly ("Silken Thomas"), son of the ninth Earl of Kildare. The Kildare family's control was threatened by increased Tudor centralization under the direction of Henry VIII's chief minister, Thomas Cromwell. The rebellion began in June when Lord Offaly, supported by a guard of 140 horsemen, resigned his position as vice deputy and repudiated his allegiance to Henry VIII before the Irish Council. Intended as a show of force to remind the king that the crown could not govern effectively without the backing of the Fitzgeralds of Kildare, the rebellion took on a religious aspect as well. Lord Offaly denounced the English king as a heretic and demanded an oath of allegiance to himself, the pope, and Holy Roman Emperor Charles V. It took 14 months for the crown's forces of 2,300 men to suppress the rebellion.

The consequences of the Kildare rebellion were far-reaching. The extensive Kildare lands were confiscated and Lord Offaly and his five uncles were all put to death. The religious challenge posed by the Kildare rebellion prompted King Henry VIII to convene an Irish parliament to declare him supreme head of the church. In addition, the king established a permanent garrison in Ireland and thereafter appointed only English-born governors to Ireland. In the power vacuum that followed the removal of the Kildare family, Gaelic lords of the midland area were free to launch sporadic attacks on the Pale. Repeated disturbances, including a joint invasion of the Pale by Manus O'Donnell and Con O'Neill, necessitated a new strategy to restore order to Ireland. The resultant "surrender and re-grant" policy was aimed at turning Irish enemies into loyal subjects of the crown. In exchange for surrendering their lands and title to the crown, Irish chiefs and Anglo-Irish lords were offered secure titles to their lands and the protection of English law. At the same time, the Irish parliament in 1541 elevated Henry VIII's status from lord of Ireland to king of Ireland.

Not all Gaelic chieftains were willing to submit to the terms of surrender and re-grant, as a disputed succession to the earldom of Tyrone soon made clear. In 1559 Shane O'Neill took the Irish title "The O'Neill" in defiance of English law. Determined to assert English authority, the Earl of Sussex sought to oust Shane O'Neill from Ulster. Military excursions into Ulster proved ineffective, however, and the Anglo-Irish community resented the exactions taken to finance the military campaign. Anglo-Irish hostility was heightened when Sussex's successor as governor, Sir Henry Sidney, attempted the plantation of English families onto Irish soil by granting land to colonial adventurers. A series of insurrections resulted, prompting Elizabeth I to put an end to Sidney's scheme of colonization through private enterprise. The queen granted clemency to the insurrection leaders, with the exception of James Fitzmaurice Fitzgerald, who was forced to flee to the Continent.

In 1579 Fitzgerald returned to Ireland accompanied by a papal nuncio and a small band of papal troops. Given Ireland's strategic position vis-à-vis England, the pope was willing to aid insurrection in Ireland as a means of attacking English Protestantism. The so-called Desmond Rebellion attracted widespread support in Munster and, to a lesser extent, within the English Pale. The Earl of Desmond's brothers, and later the Earl himself, joined Fitzgerald in launching a rebellion against the "heretic queen" and the Protestant faith. Although Fitzgerald was killed shortly after his arrival in Ireland, the rebellion spread to Leinster the following summer under the leadership of Lord Viscount Baltinglas and Gaelic chieftain Feagh McHugh O'Byrne. An army of 8,000 men under the command of Arthur Lord Grey de Wilton succeeded in suppressing the rebellion by 1583. Although most participants in the rebellion were motivated by resentment at the extension of English power as much as by religious concerns, the English government feared a general Catholic conspiracy throughout Ireland and implemented a swift and fierce military repression. Elizabeth I showed no mercy to the leaders, who were deprived of their property and executed. Portions of the confiscated lands, which amounted to approximately 300,000 acres, were used subsequently for the plantation of English families into Munster.

The final decade of the sixteenth century witnessed a rebellion of such magnitude that it threatened to overturn English rule in Ireland. Hugh O'Neill, claimant to the earldom of Tyrone, had sided with the English in suppressing the Desmond Rebellion. Nevertheless, his desire to regain all the hereditary powers of his family in Ulster led O'Neill to take up arms against the English. The conflict, known as the Nine Years' War (1564–1603), or Tyrone's Rebellion, began as a squabble between O'Neill and minor English officials, whom he sought to remove from Ulster. As the conflict escalated, O'Neill solicited the help of other discontented lords in Ireland, most notably Hugh O'Donnell. O'Neill broadened his appeal overseas by advancing himself as a champion of the Counterreformation, thus earning the support of Philip II of Spain.

Seventeenth Century

Having won a number of victories against the forces of the English crown in the Nine Years' War, including the Battle of Yellow Ford (1598), the Gaelic rebels welcomed the arrival of 4,000 Spanish troops at Kinsale in 1601. The Spanish forces quickly capitulated, however, and English forces under Lord Mountjoy managed to crush the rebellion by defeating O'Neill's men as they attempted to aid the Spanish, and employing what amounted to a scorched-earth policy throughout Ulster. O'Neill surrendered in March 1603, days after Elizabeth I's death.

Despite a surprisingly lenient settlement in which the leaders of the revolt were allowed to retain their lands in Ulster, O'Neill and other Gaelic lords continued to find English rule intolerable. As officials pressed ahead with plans to divide Ulster into counties, and extend English common law to all of Ireland, Rory O'Donnell (brother of Hugh O'Donnell) entered into secret negotiations with Spain in a conspiracy to seize Dublin Castle and spark a general rebellion. When the alleged plot was discovered, the O'Neill and O'Donnell clans, along with many of their followers, fled to the Continent. The historic "flight of the earls" in 1607 paved the way for the most comprehensive land settlement yet attempted in Ireland. Elizabeth I's successor, James I of England, approved the state-sponsored plantation of English and Scottish settlers onto confiscated lands in Ulster and, to a lesser degree, other regions of Ireland. Native Ulstermen who had remained loyal to the crown during Tyrone's revolt were assured that they would not be deprived of their lands. Following the short-lived rebellion of Sir Cahir O'Doherty in April 1608, however, the Ulster plantation became more extensive and punitive.

With increasing numbers of Protestant settlers arriving from England and Scotland as part of the government's plantation scheme, the Anglo-Irish gentry and burghers, most of whom were Catholic, began to call themselves the "Old English" in order to distinguish themselves from the more recent Protestant arrivals. Efforts to force the Old English into conformity with the Church of Ireland provoked hostility to both church and state. This was particularly the case after 1633, when Thomas Wentworth arrived on the scene as Lord Deputy of Ireland. Wentworth managed to alienate the landed classes (Gaelic, Old English, and New English alike) by challenging land titles, and charging landowners heavy fines to retain their estates. Additionally, in an attempt to enforce conformity with the state religion and raise money for the royal coffers, Wentworth levied recusancy fines for failure to attend Church of Ireland services. Resentment and insecurity continued to grow, particularly as rumors began to circulate about plans for a plantation of Old English lands in Connacht and elsewhere.

In the summer of 1641, with royal authority severely undermined both by Scottish Covenanters and by extreme Protestants within the English parliament, Old English and native Irish Catholics faced the likelihood of a rigorous anti-Catholic policy in Ireland. Fearing a fresh wave of confiscations, native Irish landowners in Ulster began to plot a preemptive strike for late October. Plans to seize Dublin Castle were thwarted at the last moment by an informant, but Sir Phelim O'Neill and other Irish gentry managed to seize control of a number of towns, castles, and forts throughout Ulster. In late November the insurgents inflicted a key defeat on English relief forces at Julianstown, County Louth.

Fearing that crown officials would use the rebellion as a pretext for confiscating all Catholic lands, and perhaps for ending the tacit toleration shown the Catholic religion, the Old English lords of the Pale decided to join forces with the native Irish rebels in the north. Together, the two groups formed the Confederation of Kilkenny in 1642. By that time the rebellion had become, despite the intentions of its planners, a widespread popular rising characterized by brutal attacks on the settler population and their property. An estimated 2,000 to 4,000 Protestant settlers were killed, and thousands more stripped of their possessions and driven from their land. Given the native Irish atrocities (the extent of which was greatly exaggerated in English reports), suppression, when it came under Oliver Cromwell in 1649, was brutal and left a legacy of lasting animosity between Protestants and Catholics in Ireland.

Eighteenth Century

The first three decades of the eighteenth century witnessed the consolidation of the Protestant Ascendancy in Ireland, as a series of comprehensive laws greatly limited the ability of Catholics to own land and eventually deprived Catholics of the vote. In addition, the penal code barred Catholics from the legal profession, the army, and all public offices. However, it was not only Irish Catholics who found cause for resentment. A 1704 law requiring holders of public office to take sacraments according to the usage of the Church of Ireland offended and alienated Presbyterians as well. Furthermore, even those Irish who conformed to the state religion were disgruntled at the fact that the best posts in both church and government were given to English-born individuals. The fact that the Irish market was controlled from Westminster, while Scotland enjoyed free trade, was also a source of considerable grievance, particularly since Westminster forbade the export of Irish wool. There was considerable sympathy in Ireland for the demands of the American colonists, and by mid-century a Patriot party had been formed to oppose the subordinate status of the Irish parliament as enshrined in Poyning's Law.

The middle decades of the century were also characterized by endemic violence in the Irish countryside. In Munster and south Leinster agrarian rebels known as Whiteboys rose up against the local gentry and Church of Ireland officials, primarily over the issues of tithes and the enclosure of common lands. Major outbreaks of Whiteboy violence occurred between 1761 and 1765, and again between 1769 and 1776. Such outbreaks included the widespread destruction of property, the maiming of animals, and the terrorizing of landlords and tithe collectors. Similar agrarian violence was carried out simultaneously in Ulster, where the Oakboys and Steelboys launched insurrections in 1763 and 1769, respectively.

The American War of Independence left Ireland dangerously exposed to both internal unrest and foreign invasion, as troops normally stationed in Ireland had been sent overseas to America. Irish Protestants, many of them members of the Patriot party, formed militia units known as the Irish Volunteers. By 1778, when France entered the war against Britain, the political demands emanating from Dublin carried an unprecedented weight. Between 1778 and 1782 a good deal of legislation was passed to redress Irish grievances. Restrictions on Irish commerce were lifted and Poyning's Law was amended to give the Dublin legislature greater independence. Despite concessions, however, the political situation became much more radical with the outbreak of the French Revolution. A decade of mounting unrest met by increasing repression culminated in the Great Rebellion of 1798.

Ishikawa Sanshirō (1876–1956)

David G. Nelson

Ishikawa Sanshirō, a Japanese socialist turned anarchist theorist influenced by the works of anarchists Edward Carpenter and Elisée Reclus, was born and raised in Saitama Prefecture. Upon graduation in 1902 from Tokyo Hōgakuin (currently Chūō University), Ishikawa began his writing career with the popular newspaper Yorozu Chūhō. After the paper endorsed the Russo-Japanese War, Ishikawa and fellow journalist Kōtoku Shusui resigned in protest and helped found the socialist society Heimisha, publishing an associated newspaper that lasted for two years.

Like other activist writers of the late Meiji era, a period when Japan was undergoing rapid industrialization and modernization, Ishikawa was imprisoned several times for his socialist advocacy. While incarcerated Ishikawa spent much of his time reading and studying the history of western socialist movements. Ishikawa turned toward anarchist theory reading the writings of Carpenter and others. Upon his release from prison Ishikawa spent 1913 to 1920 in self-imposed exile in Europe, deepening his understanding of anarchism through correspondence with Carpenter and Paul Reclus, Elisée Reclus's son.

Returning to Japan in 1920, Ishikawa promoted anarchist ideas both through his Mutual Study Society and associated publications and through the practical application of the anarchosyndicalist principle of autogestion (worker self-management). Considering peasant life as the basis of democracy, Ishikawa actively promoted and organized self-governing peasant associations. In 1946 Ishikawa founded the Anarchist League of Japan, and remained active in the movement until his death in 1956.

Islamic political currents

Jason Hannan

Like other religious cultures, the Islamic world has been forced to reckon with a variety of modern realities, including secularism, democracy, industrial capitalism, human rights, gender equality, and natural science. These developments have revealed certain tensions between Islam and modernity. It is often said that Islam today is in a state of crisis and must undergo reform if it is to flourish in the modern world. There has been a wide range of Muslim responses to the challenges of modernity and all have had to face an inescapable dilemma: how to address such challenges while remaining faithful to the Islamic tradition. In some cases, the responses have become powerful political movements; in others, they remain mere ideas. There are pointed disagreements among Muslims concerning how to respond to modern realities.

What binds these different points of view, however, is a common struggle for the future of Islam.

Historical Background

The emphasis that Muslims place upon the contemporary crisis of Islam derives in large part from an enduring cultural memory of the historical grandeur of the Islamic civilization. During the medieval period, Muslim societies flourished in a network of empires stretching from Spain and large parts of Africa to the Middle East and Persia, India, and even parts of China. Muslim cities such as Cordoba, Cairo, Baghdad, and Isfahan were among the cultural capitals of the world. Muslims were at the forefront of science, philosophy, mathematics, medicine, and technology. The cultural achievements of this period were enormous and later influenced much of modern western culture. Algebra, humanism, the university, and even the common law, for example, owe their origins to medieval Islam. Although the number and sophistication of such achievements declined considerably under the Ottoman empire, the Islamic world nonetheless enjoyed several centuries free of external domination.

This state of affairs changed dramatically with the rise of European imperialism. Beginning with the British takeover of India and culminating in Britain and France's division of the former territories of the Ottoman empire, the Islamic world underwent a fundamental transformation in several crucial ways. First, the majority of the Iranian Shi'ite students protest in front of the embassy of Saudi Arabia in Teheran on July 24, 2007 in response to reports of an insult by Saudi Wahhabi clerics regarding the holy shrines of Shi'ites in Karbala and Damascus. From the early twentieth to early twenty-first centuries, Islamic protest movements have ranged from extremist to modernist currents. (AFP/Getty Images)

Muslim world fell under non-Muslim rule. This was the single most traumatic and disorienting experience for the collective Muslim body. Second, the political geography of the Islamic world was further transformed when it was divided into separate nation-states, a system that was entirely foreign to Muslim societies. Third, the practice of Islamic law was heavily influenced, if not systematically replaced, by European civil law. This required training in a foreign legal tradition, leading to the decline of Islamic law. Fourth, whereas a career in Islamic law had formerly been regarded with high esteem, Muslims now accorded greater prestige to careers in modern medicine, the sciences, the civil service, and, most notably, engineering. Fifth, the traditional languages of Islamic learning, such as Arabic, Persian, Turkish, and Urdu, were relegated to a secondary status, while European languages, such as English and French, became the lingua franca.

These structural changes had the humiliating effect of underscoring European hegemony. Although the period of decolonization following World War II permitted Muslim countries some degree of sovereignty, the Islamic world has since been unable to revive its past glory. It remains ravaged by poverty, illiteracy, unemployment, autocratic government, and political violence. The sense of despair pervading much of the Islamic world has generated a number of Muslim discourses concerning possible solutions to these problems. Such discourses shape a large part of public discussion in the Islamic world today.

Early Muslim Responses to Modernity

Among the earliest responses to modernity were those of Muslim reformers Jamal al-Din al-Afghani (1838–97) and his student Muhammad ‘Abduh (1849–1905). Al-Afghani and ‘Abduh were both trained in Islamic law, the former at schools in Afghanistan and Iran and the latter at Cairo’s Al-Azhar University. They later spent considerable time in Europe, where they became acquainted with western intellectual fields and disciplines. In particular, they were impressed with western philosophy and science, which they regarded as important tools of knowledge missing in the Islamic world. They argued that Muslim societies stood to gain by adopting these fields and disciplines, provided that those conclusions that conflicted with Islamic beliefs were rejected.

Al-Afghani and ‘Abduh rejected the established view that Islam was closed to ijtihad (novel interpretations of Islamic law) and that Muslim laypersons were required to practice taqlid (uncritical imitation of scholars). They held that Muslim societies had been thwarted under the imposition of taqlid and that systematic reform was needed if Muslim societies were to move forward in the modern world.

Al-Afghani in particular was not fond of Europe. He believed that European science and philosophy had to be deployed precisely to subvert European hegemony. He was fierce in his rejection of scientific materialism and Darwinism, the latter being a key part of modern science. Al-Afghani maintained that any worldview devoid of theistic content was detrimental to the larger society and he deemed evolution a categorically atheistic science. Among his most subversive ideas, however, was a program for pan-Islamism, a movement to unite Muslim territories under the banner of the Caliphate.

‘Abduh adopted this program for pan-Islamism, as did his most renowned student, Rashid Rida (1865–1935). Rida is best known for launching modern Salafism, a movement aimed at returning to the original principles of Islam. Believing that Islamic societies had been suffocating under a conservative legal tradition, Rida called for bypassing that tradition and returning to the original textual sources of Islam, the Qur’an and the hadith. He advocated an anti-traditional view according to which the practice of ijtihad ought to be unencumbered by centuries of established legal precedents. His intellectual legacy, however, was contradictory. On the one hand, he inspired further reformist thinkers, most notably ‘Ali ‘Abd al-Raziq (1888–1966), who challenged the necessity of the Caliphate. On the other hand, the Salafi movement to which Rida gave birth eventually turned on him and morphed into an anti-reformist and ultra-conservative movement.

Salafism

Salafism is among the most powerful political currents in the contemporary Islamic world. It is a synthesis of Rida’s anti-traditionalism and the Wahhabi movement founded by Muhammad ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhab (1703–92) of Arabia. Although Ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhab was not a modernist like Al-Afghani, he is noted for his aggressive campaign to return to a pure and unadulterated Islamic past. Ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhab was critical not only of traditional Islamic jurisprudence, but also of Islamic mysticism and theology. He regarded the bulk of the Islamic tradition as aberrations and therefore established a program of doctrinal purification. Ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhab was an absolutist in the most severe sense. Whereas disagreement within certain juristic and theological boundaries had long been tolerated, Ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhab’s purist program fixed each article of Islamic belief and practice and imposed harsh punishments for violations of those articles.

Ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhab’s conservative program sustained a large number of followers after his death. Following its consolidation of power, which it secured through a longstanding alliance with the al-Saud family, the Wahhabi movement gained control of the Arabian peninsula, including Mecca and Medina. The established kingdom became Saudi Arabia and its official state religion became the Wahhabi creed. It was not until the 1960s that the Salafi and Wahhabi movements merged with one another to become a super-movement known today as Salafism. With the enormous financial power afforded by its lucrative oil production, Saudi Arabia has managed to propagate Salafism throughout much of the Islamic world. It produces Salafi literature in several languages, organizes Islamic conferences, and funds Islamic schools. Several of the largest mosques in the West have been built with Saudi funding.

Today, there is a heated battle of ideas between the adherents of Salafism and those who follow a traditional interpretation of Islam. Salafis are accused of both intolerance and heresy. They are also frequently accused of promoting violence in the name of Islam. However, although Osama bin Laden and his terrorist organization al-Qaeda are often described as Salafi, the official creed of Salafism strictly prohibits terrorism.

The Muslim Brotherhood

Another powerful Muslim movement today is the Muslim Brotherhood. Founded in 1928 by Hassan al-Banna (1906–49), the Brotherhood began as a reformist movement dedicated to reviving Islam and has since become a major political influence in its native Egypt. Led by scholars trained at Al-Azhar University, its adherents advocate the implementation of Islamic law and the rejection of western culture. They call for uncompromising segregation of the sexes, strict prohibition of liberal lifestyles, and a return to conservative forms of Islamic dress. The Brotherhood is known for using Islamic clothing as a symbol of cultural and political defiance. Although it is frequently accused of violence, the Brotherhood officially rejects violence as a means to achieve its goals. Today, it has local chapters throughout the Middle East and North America, where members of the Brotherhood often serve as imams.

Islamic Reform in South Asia

One of the earliest Muslim reformers in South Asia was Sir Muhammad Iqbal (1877–1938). He was the first to propose an independent state for Muslims in greater India and was the principal inspiration of Muhammad Ali Jinnah (1876–1948), the founder of modern Pakistan. Like al-Afghani, Iqbal received a European education and advocated the revival of Islamic power and knowledge. However, Iqbal argued that Muslims should reject western culture. He dreamed instead of a modern Muslim state based on the principles of an Islamic enlightenment. Although Iqbal’s vision of an independent Muslim state materialized shortly after his death, the newly formed state of Pakistan was soon ravaged by a civil war, which claimed the lives of over one million ethnic Bengalis. The massacre was supported by West Pakistan’s largest Muslim political party, the Jamaat-e-Islami.

The Jamaat-e-Islami was founded by Sayyid Abul A’la Maududi (1903–79), one of the most influential Muslim scholars of the twentieth century. Maududi wrote extensively about his vision of an ideal Islamic state, one in which democratic government would be practiced alongside Islamic law. He called for a strict application of Islamic law, replete with harsh penal codes and a second-class status for non-Muslims. Although his political vision was quite unlike that of Iqbal or Jinnah, Maududi’s ideas continue to exert considerable influence in Pakistan. His Jamaat-e-Islami remains an important political force in contemporary Pakistani politics.

Other Islamic Political Movements

There are several other Muslim political movements prominent in the Islamic world today. These include Hizb ut-Tahrir, a powerful Islamist organization dedicated to the implementation of Islamic law and the revival of the Caliphate. It has become a political force in large parts of Central Asia where the reformist Jadidi movement once wielded considerable power. Although Hizb ut-Tahrir officially rejects violence, several of its members have been prosecuted on charges of terrorism.

The Islamic Republic of Iran is an example of a modern Shi'ite Islamic movement that has achieved its dream of establishing a Shi'ite Islamic state. The movement was initially led by revolutionary intellectuals such as the Ayatollah Khomeini (1902–89), Ali Shariati (1933–77), and Morteza Motahhari (1920–79). These intellectuals capitalized upon the widespread public dissatisfaction with the government of Shah Mohammed Reza Pahlavi and prevailing anti-western sentiment. That sentiment has since become a major part of the cultural and foreign policy of the post-revolutionary Islamic government. Public dissatisfaction with the Islamic government, however, has prompted reformists to rethink the revolutionary program. Among the most influential reformists in Iran today is Abdolkarim Soroush (b. 1945), who advocates a liberal and democratic model of Islamic government.

The most violent Islamic political movements, however, are those not solely dedicated to Islamic revival and whose origins lie in political conflict, such as border disagreements. Organizations such as Hamas, Islamic Jihad, and Hezbollah owe their origins to political tensions involving Israel, whereas Jaish-e-Mohammad and Lashkar-e-Taiba owe theirs to border disputes involving Kashmir. Similarly, al-Qaeda was not formed to revive or purify Islam, but rather as a mercenary force in the wake of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. Although these organizations universally declare their intention to establish Islamic law, that determination is secondary to their original political ambitions.

Liberal and Traditional Islam in the West

The most recent political currents in Islam are led by liberal and traditionalist Muslim intellectuals from Europe and North America. The climate of intellectual and political freedom afforded in the West permits a lively debate about a wide range of concerns. Liberal intellectuals notably call for democracy, gender equality, and the suspension of Islamic penal laws. Muslim feminists in particular call for a rejection of sexist practices, with some going so far as to demand the right for women to lead men in prayer. More extreme liberals argue for recognition of the rights of sexual minorities. Although there are substantive disagreements among Muslim liberals, they generally concur on the need to bring the practice of Islam into conformity with modern liberal values. Notable liberal Muslim intellectuals include Farid Esack (b. 1959), Tariq Ramadan (b. 1962), and Amina Wadud (b. 1952). The liberal movement has received fierce criticism from more conservative Muslims.

The 1990s also saw the rise of the traditionalist movement in the West. Led largely by Muslim converts such as Hamza Yusuf (b. 1960), Zaid Shakir (b. 1956), and Abdal Hakim Murad (b. 1960), the traditionalist movement advocates a collective healing of the Muslim body by returning to classical forms of learning. Traditionalists emphasize the importance of learning Arabic, studying under a properly trained scholar, and creatively engaging with western culture. Traditionalists are critical of the Salafi movement and equally critical of Muslim liberals. However, it is their adherence to established scholarly methodologies and emphatic rejection of violence that gives the traditionalists credibility in the eyes of the Muslim public and therefore gives the movement relatively strong prospects for success.

Israeli peace movement

Eitan Y. Alimi

Israeli scholars usually agree that the vast majority of peace groups consolidated in the wake of the Six Day War (a.k.a. June 1967 War) between Israel and a joint Arab armies front, resulting in Israel's taking over of East Jerusalem, the Golan Heights, the Sinai Peninsula, the West Bank, and the Gaza Strip and, soon after, extending its rule over these territories.

There are two closely related reasons for the significance of the Six Day War in the peace movement. First, the Israeli government's decision to maintain and extend domination over the occupied Palestinian lands was a major factor in the rise of internal opposition. Originally, the idea was to use the territories as a bargaining card for peace – the Territories for Peace formula – which, at first, lessened to a considerable extent harsher criticism over the immorality of the very act of occupation. Still, the lack of any meaningful progress in that regard and the perpetuation of the occupation became an important impetus in the consolidation of peace groups. The second reason was the increasing evidence of de facto takeover of the territories – the policy of “creeping annexation” – as was the case with the implementation of Israeli law in Eastern Jerusalem already in 1968 and the irresolute attitude of the government to illegal settling attempts in the West Bank by religious right-wing activists. These examples and others were indicative of the government's surrendering to the pressure by national religious right-wing forces who considered the results of the war as a divine miracle signaling the beginning of redemption of the Jewish people, thereby promoting the agenda of deportation of the Palestinians and full annexation of the territories.

A useful example of the significant influence of the June War on Israeli peace groups was the Israeli Socialist Organization, also known by the name of its news outlet, Matzpen (Compos). Matzpen was formed in 1962 by former members of the Israeli Communist Party who were soon joined by several Arab members of the ICP Haifa chapter, notably Jabra Nicola and Daoud Turki. All agreed on several principles, such as rejection of Zionism, revolutionary socialism, support for the integration of Israel in a socialist Arab union, and international solidarity on the basis of self-determination. Accordingly, the group established links with socialist organizations worldwide and also with left-wing Palestinian organizations such as the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine. Following the June 1967 War, internal tensions surfaced over the issue of whether the war was a necessary and just act of self-defense or an unnecessary act of pure Zionist chauvinism and aggression. Soon afterwards the group went through ideological and organizational fragmentation, the result of disagreements revolving around the appropriate balance between nationalism and class struggle. In 1970 those who were concerned with the oppression of the Palestinian right for self-determination and with neglect of the group's commitment to class struggle from within Israel splintered and became involved in assisting and guiding community based activism.

Period I: 1967–1977

In late 1968 students from Tel-Aviv University and the Hebrew University, influenced deeply by the worldwide wave of New Left activism, decided to join hands and form SIH – Smol Israeli Hadash (New Israeli Left). Despite differences of opinion, mostly found in the groups' respective stances towards Zionism, Ran Cohen, Tzvika Doitsh, and others united around their utter objection to the morally corrupting occupation, and support for participatory democracy and freedom of speech. For over five years, until its dissolution in mid-1973, SIH set an important precedent not only in its dominant unruly, direct mode of action, but also in its bold and radical sociopolitical outlook, promoting the idea of Arab-Palestinian Zionism and Israel's responsibility in fulfilling it.

Although SIH was a relatively small and marginal episode of radical left-wing peace organizing, things began to change dramatically as a result of the traumatic experience of the October 1973 War (Yom-Kippur War). During 18 days Israel suffered the loss of nearly 2,600 soldiers and civilians and 7,500 wounded, facing the most imminent threat to its existence by a joint Arab States front. Despite intelligence evaluations, the Israeli leadership failed to foresee the Arab States' military attack. This misjudgment threw into question the leadership's competence and credibility, a crisis exacerbated by the leadership's misconduct during the war itself.

For the first time in the history of the Israeli state peace groups proliferated, this time from the mainstream of the political spectrum. The October War, or as it is labeled in Israel "the omission," has illustrated for many the possible devastating repercussions of the creeping annexation policy. During the run-up to the national elections of December 31, 1973, the growing public unrest forced the government to found the Agranat State Investigating Committee on November 18. After months of investigation the committee recommended to end the ministry of the military chief-of-staff David Elazar and several other high officers. The political level, that is, Defense Minister Moshe Dayan and Prime Minister Golda Meir, was found to be only indirectly responsible. In face of what was seen as mild recommendations in the committee's report and during the formation of yet another Meir-led coalition, peace-oriented groups from within the Labor Party institution raised stern criticism of the government's decision-making process in security issues. Such were Etgar (Challenge) and the Hoog Le'libun Baayot Hevra Ve'Medina (Circle for Sorting out Social and State Problems), who demanded a peace initiative based on a significant territorial compromise.

The criticism raised by these groups, however, was soon to be magnified by a considerable portion of the public as well as large numbers of released reserve soldiers and officers who, disappointed with the Agranat Investigation Committee's recommendations, voiced a deep sense of estrangement from the political system. Perhaps the strongest expression of this trend was the action taken by released military officers who protested individually (at first) in front of the government offices (e.g., Assa Kadmony and Moti Ashcenazi), and Israel Shelanu (Our Israel) who believed the war could have been prevented if decision-making processes, accountability norms, and checks and balances in the political systems had not been ineffective and faulty, and employed disruptive actions to promote its goals.

The wave of peace-driven protest abated primarily as a result of a dramatic development. On April 11, 1974 the continuing unrest led Prime Minister Meir to resign from office, and Dayan, minister of defense, was not included in the new government formed by Itzhak Rabin. Ironically, however, the subsequent period witnessed the formation of Gush Emunim (Block of the Faithful), who soon became the vanguard of right-wing forces who argued that the state had veered from its course and needed to correct these acute aberrations, viewing the situation as an opportunity to undermine the current secular state apparatus in order to transform it into a religious state (Halakha state) over the entire promised land of Israel. The religious Zionist camp, however, produced a counter-movement to Gush Emunim, Oz Ve'Shalom (Valor and Peace), a small group formed in 1975 committed to promoting the ideals of tolerance, pluralism, and justice, and support for peace on the basis of political reality and justice. As a reaction to a Gush Emunim-led unruly campaign against the evacuation of Yamit (April 1982) and the Lebanon War, a second group was formed, Netivot Shalom (Paths of Peace), which joined hands with Oz Ve'Shalom in 1985 to present an alternative peace-oriented expression of religious Zionism.

Period II: 1977–1992

The ascendancy of Menachem Begin and the formation of a Likud-led coalition in 1977 was more than a mere political realignment. It was a significant shift in the decades-long conflict over the character, identity, and essence of the Jewish Israeli state; the rise to power of those who claimed for the historical and divine right of the Jewish people on the land of Israel – the Greater Israel. Indeed, Begin's first term in office (1977–81) made the settlement of the occupied territories a straightforward government policy under the supervision of Ariel Sharon as minister for settlement affairs. At the same time, however, Begin also decided seriously to explore the possibility of peace with Egypt. This dual policy was key to the formation of perhaps the most influential peace group in Israeli history, Shalom Achsav (Peace Now).

Troubled by Gush Emunim's growing influence within Israeli society and the "corridors of power" and concerned with lack of progress in the peace talks at Camp David, a group of reserve officers drafted a carefully worded letter to Prime Minister Begin with a blunt warning: "only a peace-seeking Israel that exhausted all possible means for attaining peace would continue to enjoy the support of its soldier-citizens, and thus be capable of standing firm and winning any future war forced upon it." While avoiding any actual signs of disobedience, Shalom Achshav set a meaningful precedent by which soldiers conditioned their military service on a moral basis, arguing that only unequivocal threats to Israel's existence would receive their full support and personal sacrifice.

The launching of the Lebanon War on June 6, 1982 turned out to be exactly what Shalom Achshav members had in mind when drafting the Officers Letter. Whereas during the first few weeks of fighting Shalom Achshav was paralyzed, mostly because so many of its members were involved in the war front, things began to change quickly following the collapse of the first ceasefire agreement (June 16). Shalom Achshav was the key player behind two mass demonstrations against the war: the 100,000-strong demonstration following the siege on Beirut on July 3 and the 400,000-strong demonstration on September 25 protesting Israel's role in the massacre of Sabra and Shatila Palestinian refugee camps.

Other peace organizations formed during the war included Without Languor, a group of several thousand Israeli soldiers who refused to accept the war decoration and medal of valor, and Soldiers Against Silence and Parents Against Silence who demanded full exposure of all war-related information. The deepening ambivalence of soldiers towards the use of force spread to wider sectors in Israeli society and was reflected in the mass media and academia. The Sabra and Shatila refugee camps massacre, which many believed Israel knew about but did nothing to prevent, accelerated this tendency and was critical in that regard. Shortly after, two military officers – Colonel Eli Geva and later Brigadier General Amram Michna – resigned from duty. The most organized expression of this development was There Is A Limit, a group of several hundred soldiers who rejected the war in Lebanon and openly called for insubordination.

The removal from office of defense minister Sharon, following the harsh recommendation of the Kahan investigating committee into the Sabra and Shatila events, the formation of a National Unity Coalition in 1984 and the subsequent partial withdrawal from Lebanon in 1985, combined to bring about a relative abatement of the peace group-led protest campaign. Yet the outbreak of the Palestinian Uprising in December 1987 (the Intifada) which, at least during its first few weeks, made Israeli peace groups pause, acted as a major catalyst for the renewal of protest campaigns and the formation of yet additional peace groups. An exception was the Anti-Occupation Treaty – Year 21st. Several weeks before the outbreak of the Intifada this group was formed calling for a total struggle against the occupation, including boycotting of settlements products, changing of schools' curriculum, or refusing to serve in the occupied territories. The continuation of the Intifada and the growing signs of brutal Israeli crackdown acted not only as a validation and subsequent expansion of the Year 21st campaign, but also as an impetus for Shalom Achshav to renew its protest campaign activity. Members of Shalom Achshav continued to develop an infrastructure of dialogue with Palestinian public figures such as Ziad abu-Zyad and Faisal Husseini, and to initiate joint Israeli-Palestinian peace conferences – the type of activity they had begun prior to the Intifada – as well as initiating peace rallies and demonstrations such as the demonstration in December 1988 in which a demand was raised to recognize the PLO.

But Shalom Achshav and Year 21st were not alone; for the first time in the history of the state, women joined the arena of protest. A group of Jewish and Palestinian women, representing a wide spectrum of voices (e.g., Zionist, non-Zionist, feminists, religious, and non-religious) and called Women in Black began to gather in Paris Square, Jerusalem from January 1988 every Friday with signs in Hebrew as well as Arabic and English on which the slogan "Enough with the Occupation" was written.

Period III: 1992–Present

The period extending from October 1991 to the present began with a dramatic breakthrough in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict: the Madrid Peace Conference. If up to 1992 Israeli peace groups were trying to put Israel on the track of peace – demanding recognition of the Palestinian people, an end to the occupation, and recognition of the PLO – the bilateral negotiation between Israel and Jordan-Palestinians in Madrid, the subsequent self-rule municipal elections in the Occupied Territories during 1992, and the signing of the peace accord in Oslo in September 1993 between the Israeli government and Yasser Arafat – all marked a significant change in the essence of the peace groups' campaign. Peace groups, old and new, have since been trying to keep the Israeli government on the peace track, with some offering a more radical agenda.

Shalom Achshav has begun focusing mostly on the issue of construction of new settlements, expansion of existing ones, and establishment of illegal outposts in the Occupied Territories using a combination of information reports, known as the Settlement Watch, and legal actions. Such was the petition to the Israeli High Court for Justice in July 2005 to demolish the illegal outpost of Amona, resulting in its evacuation in February 2006. The political activity of There Is A Limit has significantly decreased following the signing of the Oslo Accords, yet it continues to lend support to soldiers who refuse to serve in the army. During the al-Aqsa Intifada (2000–5) the group petitioned to the International Criminal Court, accusing high Israeli military officers of war crimes.

Since 2000 many new peace groups emerged with meaningful innovations and developments introduced by several, demonstrating that the Israeli peace movement has yet to have its final word. First, there has been a significant increase in the quantity and quality of collaboration efforts and coordinated activities among peace groups. The Coalition of Women for Peace is a case in point. Comprising several autonomous women's organizations (the most central of which are Bat Shalom, MachsomWatch, New Profile, and Women in Black), the coalition was formed in November 2000 and has been committed since then to “end the occupation; to the full involvement of women in peace negotiations; to an end to the excessive militarization of Israeli society; to equality, inclusion, and justice for Palestinian citizens of Israel; to equality and social justice for all inhabitants of Israel.”

Second, there also has been a significant shift in the mode of contention, from an emphasis on conventional forms of protest (e.g., demonstrations and peace rallies) to more disruptive direct action. There is growing evidence for this, such as Anarchists Against the Wall (i.e., the security fence/barrier), a group of Israeli anarchists formed in 2003 that organizes protest and confrontation campaigns against the Wall in varying locations, the most famous of which is the four-year-long campaign at the West Bank Palestinian village of Bil'in, during which several activists were severely injured in shootings by soldiers.

A third development involves the formation of joint peace groups, Israelis and Palestinians, at the grassroots level involving acts of solidarity and support. Such is the case of Ta'ayush (Arabic for “life in common”), formed as a result of the outbreak of the al-Aqsa Intifada and the October Events (i.e., a wave of violent confrontations between Israeli police forces and Israeli Arabs/Palestinians resulting in the death of 13 protestors). Comprising Israelis as well as Palestinian activists, Ta'ayush has been engaged in voluntary activities such as providing food and medical supplies, and building playgrounds and roads for Palestinians both within Israel and inside the territories.

Ta'ayush, however, represents also a fourth development in the Israeli peace movement: the shift in the center of action from within Israel to the actual scene of contention. Here, in addition to the activity of Ta'ayush and Anarchists Against the Wall, the activity of MachsomWatch is especially illuminating. Formed during the early stages of the al-Aqsa Intifada (February 2001), MachsomWatch is a group of Israeli women who decided to protest against the systematic violation and repression of Palestinian human rights as it is practiced at the myriad of military checkpoints (Machsom in Hebrew) throughout the West Bank. The MachsomWatchers are not only scrutinizing the behavior of the soldiers and inspecting the protection of human rights on the ground, but they also spotlight violations and arbitrariness in military court rulings through daily, monthly, and yearly reports, as well as through photographic exhibitions.

Several additional new peace groups demonstrating the expansion and broadening of the goals and activities of the aforementioned groups are Courage to Refuse, a group of Israeli combat officers and soldiers who published a letter of refusal (hence, Refuseniks) to serve in the Occupied Territories in early 2002 after which the group was formed, stating that the occupation poses a threat to the security of Israel; Peace Bloc, founded by Uri Avneri in 1992 and calling ever since for recognition in principle of the right of return of Palestinian refugees and Jerusalem as the capital city of two states; and Four Mothers, who played a lead role in bringing about the full withdrawal of Israel from Lebanon in 2000. These are only several of the additional groups constituting the Israeli peace movement.

Israeli settlers movement

Lawrence Davidson

When Israel won the Six Day War in 1967, it found itself in control of territories that had traditionally been considered part of Eretz Israel (the Land of Israel) by the Zionist movement. As early as 1918, when Chiam Weizmann presented the case for Zionist control of Palestine to the Paris Peace Conference, he put forth a map that included the territories taken in 1967. After the Six Day War, this expansionist point of view was not just held by the conservative Likud Party – leaders of the Labor Party were also of this conviction. Thus, the idea that the conquered territories – the West Bank, the Gaza Strip, the Sinai Peninsula, Syria's Golan Heights, and East Jerusalem – would be useful as bargaining chips in negotiations that would trade land for peace has always been debatable, and historically it is a position that has never been realized.

Almost immediately after the end of the 1967 war, Israel's Labor government began to establish colonies along the Jordan River. These were referred to as “defensive military establishments,” but they soon had all of the characteristics of small civilian agricultural settlements. This made them illegal under international law. Within a year of the war's end, some 14 colonies had been set up throughout the conquered lands. In the early years of the colonization program Israel's Labor government tried to manipulate the process. This was done not to limit the numbers of settlers, but rather to direct them to strategic points that would facilitate long-term control of the territories. With the election of the more conservative Likud Party governments in the 1977 election and beyond, restraints on settlement loosened considerably. Both parties used special tax breaks and subsidized housing to attract colonists.

To populate the West Bank, the Israeli government provides financial incentives for settlement through tax breaks and subsidized housing, attracting many Jewish settlers. Many of those who settle in the West Bank are apolitical citizens motivated by such economic imperatives, while others are religious zealots who view the Occupied Territories of Judea and Samaria as integral to the “Land of Israel,” granted to the Jewish people by God as a form of patrimony.

One example of the latter group is Gush Enumin (the Bloc of the Faithful). The group was established in 1968, significantly, in a hotel in occupied Hebron. Their radical ideology required further settlement to advance the coming of the Jewish messiah. By 1974, under the leadership of Rabbi Moshe Levinger, Gush Enumin was the most aggressive settlement organization in Israel. This aggressiveness included booby-trapping the cars of several West Bank mayors and plotting to blow up Arab buses. In 1984, the more militant wing of the Gush Enumin, the Gush Enumin Underground, planned (and failed) an attack on the Muslim holy site of the Harem al-Sharif (Jerusalem's Dome of the Rock mosque). With the election of Menachem Begin and the Likud Party in 1977, Gush Enumin secured a green light to settle anywhere in the territories. They did so as armed squatters with the cooperation and assistance of the Israeli government, particularly the man who was then agricultural minister, Ariel Sharon.

Once the right-wing Likud government of Israel consolidated an alliance with the Gush Enumin and other religious settlers, the living status of Palestinians on the West Bank was even more precarious, as large tracts of land on the West Bank were occupied and expropriated. In addition, the vast majority of water drawn in the West Bank is diverted for the use of the colonists. Palestinian freedom of movement is severely limited as the land they do live on was cut up into isolated cantons by checkpoints, Jewish-only roads, and "security" walls; and violence by settlers toward Palestinians has become endemic. It must be understood that the status of the more fanatical and violent colonists is not that of rebels or resisters. It is that of a vigilante arm of the Israeli government. Taking the colonizing movement as a whole, it represents an ongoing process of ethnic cleansing and cultural genocide against the indigenous Palestinian population.

Things have not always gone well for Israel's settlers. For instance, the incessant resistance put up by the Palestinians of the Gaza Strip finally convinced the Likud government of Ariel Sharon, in August of 2005, to cut its losses and withdraw the settlements located in that area. There were only 8,000 settlers in the Gaza region living next to nearly a million and a half hostile Palestinians. This process – sometimes referred to as "Sharon Shock" – so upset the religious settlement movement that they threatened civil war if they were called upon to leave the West Bank. There is no indication of present or future Israeli plans to do this. Indeed, settlement of the West Bank and East Jerusalem continues apace, and Israel now has transferred nearly half a million of its citizens into these areas.

All of Israel's settlements are illegal under international law. The law referred to here is the Fourth Geneva Convention to which Israel is a signatory. That convention forbids the forceful or voluntary transfer of a conquering country's civilian population into the conquered areas. The illegal status of the Israeli settlements has been confirmed by the International Court of Justice at The Hague, various international human rights organizations, various United Nations Resolutions, and even the legal council for the Israeli Foreign Ministry. The legal council's Theodor Meron stated officially in 1967 that "My conclusion is that civilian settlement in the administered territories [the Occupied Territories] contravenes the explicit provisions of the Fourth Geneva Convention." In spite of this, Israel continues to deny the illegality of the settlements, arguably using a distorted interpretation of the law; but most of the time the government chooses to ignore the issue. It has been allowed to do so because the governments of the United States and Europe have willfully ignored and supported Israeli policy and behavior. Thus, while Israel is in violation of international law, there are no police to move against that nation and its settler agents.

Italian Communist Party

Peter Ryan

The Italian Communist Party (PCI) was established in 1921 through a split within the Italian Socialist Party (PSI) orchestrated by Antonio Gramsci and Amadeo Bordiga. Though outlawed by the Mussolini regime throughout the fascist period, it eventually emerged as the strongest party of the left in Italy. At its peak it was the largest Communist Party in the West. It received a great deal of funding from the Soviet Union, largely for organizational purposes, and was often the target of attacks from both far left and far right groups. It can be fairly said that much of post-fascist politics in Italy was organized around the perceived need to keep the PCI out of power.

From the beginning the PCI was torn between international aspirations represented by Russia's October Revolution and the particulars of Italian political and cultural life. Italy was a relatively new nation with profound regional differences. Any group seeking substantial influence would either have to control the existing parties or create its own, as well as have a broad enough agenda to have mass appeal in a poor, agricultural country with pockets of rapid industrialization. The PCI emerged from the PSI with both a reformist, nationalist faction and an internationalist, Soviet Union-oriented one that were in conflict throughout the party's history.

The division between the reformist and revolutionary factions in the PCI took on tragic significance as the threat of fascism rose in the years immediately following World War I. Amadeo Bordiga was a primary proponent of the Italian left in the early part of the twentieth century. He became quite prominent in the PSI as an ally of Mussolini, but split with him over involvement in World War I before helping to found the PCI. Bordiga saw the war as a catastrophe for the working classes and was scathing of what he regarded as the Socialist Party's "revisionism" of Marxist dogma to justify involvement in the war.

Although part of the justification for the war was expressed in terms of national greatness, returning soldiers found the economy in shambles. Workers rioted throughout Italy, provoking continuous and violent suppression by the government. There were fatalities in most of the major cities. In late August 1919, workers began self-organizing in Turin's Fiat plant. These organizations became known as "factory councils" and were endorsed by workers throughout Turin and the rest of the country. By 1920, 150,000 workers were self-organized in factory councils; by the end of the year, participation peaked near 800,000.

Antonio Gramsci had theorized a path to communism that was not reliant on institutions that had evolved out of capitalism, namely unions and established political parties. These institutions would invariably be used to prop up the current political order and diffuse the ambitions of the working classes. Gramsci saw the establishment of factory councils as uniquely capable of reflecting the evolving consciousness of the working class and thus as a critical step toward communism. They were not, however, run by the party, and efforts to integrate the councils into the larger political program faltered when Moscow insisted that the Socialist Party be a "streamlined, 100 percent revolutionary party . . . molded on the Bolshevik pattern" with no tolerance for a reformist wing in its ranks (Weinberg 1995: 10).

From within parliament, the leader of the Socialist Party, Filippo Turati, sought to undermine the sudden strength of the workers' movement. This exacerbated the split on the left, just as the threat from the far right was growing. In early September 1920, metal workers seized factories throughout Italy, in major cities north and south. Turati advised the government to use force to regain control. In the spring of 1921 workers declared a strike at the Fiat plant in Turin in response to proposed layoffs of 1,500 out of 13,000 workers. The fragmented left was unable to press its temporary advantage, and the owners responded with a lockout. Fascist "punitive expeditions" soon followed; beatings, murders, and arson became commonplace. Elections strengthened the socialist presence in the Assembly, and the extra-legal reaction was ferocious. Hundreds of social centers, union halls, cooperatives, and peasant trade union halls were destroyed, even those run by moderate socialists and Catholics. Any threat to the dominance of landowners was met with harsh retaliation. The lack of a coordinated response on the part of the left, the unwillingness of the PSI or the government to stem or even criticize the fascist tide, and rapidly growing support of the fascists by landowners emboldened and strengthened the attackers.

Bordiga led the split from the ineffectual Socialist Party, bringing Gramsci with him. Fascist violence, both organized and spontaneous, utterly delegitimized parliament. With Mussolini's ascension to prime minister, and the subsequent arrests and murder of hundreds of prominent leftists, the Communist Party fell back. The fascists claimed wide and deep support across most regions of Italy, emphasizing nationalism, order, and discipline. Among the many arrested was Gramsci himself, who while in prison, on what available scraps he could lay his hands, wrote his famous Prison Notes.

With Gramsci in prison, Palmiro Togliatti became the de facto leader of the PCI. The party saw itself as the only true resistance to the fascists, yet even this position took years to develop. PCI's unique standing among the major parties in Italy was forged in the struggle against fascism and proved the basis for its mass appeal through much of the twentieth century.

After the war, while the PCI was uniquely positioned to be a legitimate and authoritative voice for Italy, it was held in check by numerous factors. The escalation of the Cold War in the late 1940s challenged its ideological coherence as it put the party in a position of both advocating for and distancing itself from the international communist movement. The support the party received from the USSR, although in secret, provoked numerous intrigues by the United States. The most significant obstacle to the PCI's influence in government was the determination of the Socialist and Christian Democrat (DC) parties to keep the communists out of power. These parties refused to form coalitions with communists; they were thus marginalized in the absence of a clear majority. The PCI's popular base continued to grow nonetheless.

At the local level, with its control of Emilia-Romagna, Tuscany, Umbria, and Le Marche – the so-called “red belt” – the PCI developed a reputation for competence and integrity, especially when compared with the DC and PSI. It had rejected Bordiga's revolutionary posture in favor of Gramsci's plan for “a long march through the institutions.” Yet the PCI was continuously kept outside of the government by the coalitions arrayed against it.

In the postwar period, Togliatti began to fashion the PCI into a mass party with broad appeal. His strategy, the so-called svolta salerno, emerged during the war as the PCI developed autonomy. Its alliance with other anti-fascist parties was part of a broader strategy that emphasized national liberation first, and advancement of the PCI as a substantial voice in national politics (Serfaty & Grey 1980: 25). Togliatti refocused the PCI by emphasizing its national character, dispensing with “purely propaganda functions,” and preparing to govern. The PCI would no longer be a party of the working class but a mass party, concerned with democracy and alliances between the various economic classes in the name of the national interest.

The influence of these changes was felt soon after the war. In 1947 the Constituent Assembly, presided over by a communist, approved a new constitution which included such “fundamental laws” as the right of citizens to a job, a living wage, free education and health care, and the right of workers to share in profits with employers. The DC, seemingly in a trade-off, was given a far more concrete concession: Catholicism was also recognized as the official religion of the country. Though highly criticized, the PCI's apparent concession to the DC indicated a willingness to work with almost all elements in Italian politics. The early postwar period was one of unusual concord. Even though Italy's political climate would become more factional, and the PCI continued to be kept out of power, it would grow eventually into the West's largest Communist Party.

The growing strength of the PCI remained a source of anxiety to many, both in Italy and in the West, especially the United States. In May 1947, between the election of the Constituent Assembly in 1946 and the adoption of the constitution in December 1947, the Christian Democrats, under pressure from the Vatican and the US, expelled the PCI from the coalition. The Soviet invasion of Hungary created further conflict within the party, between revolutionaries of an internationalist inclination and reformists who tended to support a nationalist agenda, independent of Moscow. Italy had also entered a period of sustained, if uneven, economic growth, which for many seemed to undermine the fundamental claims of orthodox communism. Yet the party continued to appeal to an ever broader constituency.

By the late 1960s, the PCI was demonstrating considerable independence from Moscow. The 1968 protests in Czechoslovakia, for instance, were overtly supported by the party leadership and seemed to indicate a national rather than international orientation. The center-left coalition of the early 1970s, which partly relied on the communists' support but did not include them in the government, illustrated both the electoral strength of the party and the limits of that strength during a time of political extremism while the party's antagonists (e.g., the Catholic Church) were so entrenched and powerful. The government proved unable to meet the diverse demands of the student demonstrators and the many factions, left and right, that had sprung up throughout the country. The Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia, the student uprisings, and the Piazza Fontana bombing in Milan in December 1969 all created challenges for the PCI. Its very electoral presence was a provocation to neofascist groups, and its moderate, reformist approach infuriated the far left.

The Milan bombing, which killed 16 and wounded many others, was initially blamed on the left, though it was in fact the first of many attempts by the far right to destabilize the country and move it toward a more authoritarian footing. The Red Brigades emerged in 1970 and were soon followed by the Italian Social Movement, an openly neofascist group. The two decades of frequent bombings and assassinations from 1969 to 1986 came to be known as the anni di piombo (years of lead).

By the early 1970s the PCI came to see Marxist dogma as largely irrelevant to the achievement of its political goals in Italy. This created an opening for groups like the Red Brigades, whose activities the far right would then use to justify its own violence. This, combined with a widespread suspicion that its acceptance of democratic methods was no more than a means to an end, created a period of blockage in the Italian government and rendered it incapable of meeting the diverse and often violent challenges it faced.

By 1973, worldwide economic shocks and the resulting unrest forced the Christian Democratic Party leader Aldo Moro to broaden his support by appealing to the trade unions. An attempt by the Catholic right to ban divorce had failed, revealing the party's weakness as its traditional electoral base was becoming more and more secular. The PCI, led by charismatic Enrico Berlinguer, now saw a way out of the permanent opposition that had been the party's fate. Berlinguer undertook a pact with Moro to shore up the credibility of the PCI as a party of reform rather than of revolution. Marxists abandoned the party, and the party itself even considered dropping the word comunista from its name. The compromise was effective. Moderate communists gained control of most of Italy's big cities in the elections of 1975. This success can be attributed to general administrative competence on the part of the PCI, and the perception of widespread corruption on the part of the ruling DC. A reaction against this, however, boosted DC turnout: in 1976 the DC gained a little over a third of the vote, the PCI a little less.

The kidnapping in broad daylight and subsequent murder of Aldo Moro in March 1978 by the Red Brigades put irreconcilable strain on the attempt at coalition. The Red Brigades sought to undermine the PCI, which clearly opposed its campaign of terror. Many on the left believed that the United States was sponsoring a "strategy of tension" to destabilize the country and prevent any coalition involving the communists from succeeding.

The collapse of the Soviet Union provoked the PCI to split into two progressive, leftist parties: The Democratic Party of the Left (PDS) and the Communist Refoundation Party (PRC). The former took part in the government of Romano Prodi in 1996. It had been 50 years since a communist party had been part of a ruling coalition.

Italian labor movement

Maurizio Antonioli and Jorge Torre Santos

The first development of workers' associations in Italy dates back to the second half of the nineteenth century. Friendly societies (società di mutuo soccorso) spread from Piedmont, where they began to be established since 1848, to the rest of the country after Unification in 1861, and from a few hundred they rose to more than 5,000 in 1885. They gathered in annual congresses (the first in Asti, 1853), mainly for the aim of mutual assistance (unemployment, health, disability, age benefits), and in many instances also included members of the bourgeoisie and aristocracy. In some cases mutual assistance was matched with salary and working hours claims; but the transformation of those associations into local unions (leghe di resistenza) is more an exception than a general rule and it is highly questionable to consider local unions of the late nineteenth century as instrumental in developing socialist ideology.

From the 1880s, mutualism and resistance had two distinctive paths, although in some cases (e.g., printers) overlapping, confronting the rapid growth of conflict-oriented and workers-only organizations. In the countryside the agrarian crisis generated organized protest movements such as the la boje ("the pot is brewing"), that unified land workers from Rovigo, Mantova, and Cremona in 1884–6. In cities some industrial workers (printers, typesetters, and construction workers) tended to create associations claiming better wages and working conditions. Often, these organizations, called di miglioramento or di resistenza (improvement, resistance), were ideologically close to the rising socialist movement, whose different currents converged into a single party in 1892, when a Partito dei lavoratori italiani (from 1895 Partito socialista italiano) was founded in Genoa.

The workers' società di resistenza are the core of an important organizational form of the Italian trade union movement: the chamber of labor. They were inspired by French Bourses du Travail, spread mainly in Northern Italy during the 1890s, under the unceasing propaganda of Osvaldo Gnocchi Viani (commonly remembered as the father of the chambers of labor). The first one to open was the Piacenza Chamber in 1891, but the leading role at the national level was taken by the Milan Chamber of Labor. The tasks of the chambers of labor range from territorial representation of workers – through sections to which different craft societies adhered – to the employment of workers. The chambers formally had no political affiliation and exercised a public service function, receiving funds from local administrations. This explains why the Milan Chamber of Labor was not dissolved in 1894, when government repression struck the Fasci siciliani, the proletarian organizations born in Sicily during the 1890s that had become an important movement in voicing popular claims, and acquired a socialist orientation. The first trade unions were formed alongside the chambers of labor: in Milan a federation of printers and a federation of construction workers were the first to be established.

The trade union movement as a whole was overwhelmed by repression after the bread riots in Milan in 1898. The failure of the authoritarian shift marked the beginning of a new liberal course during which the labor movement gained a role as protagonist. The sharp rise in conflicts, often with a spontaneous character, is considered by historiographers as a sudden, almost telluric, phenomenon, contemporaneous with a strengthening of the trade union movement, industrial unions in particular. The year 1901 saw the take-off of Italian unionism, as numerous federations were established (Federazione italiana operai metallurgici, FIOM, Federazione nazionale lavoratori della terra, Federazione Italiana Operai Tessili, FIOT, respectively industrial unions of metal, land, and textile workers) and others brought to new life (book, construction, and glass workers).

The strengthening of trade unions paralleled the outbreak of factional struggle within the Socialist Party and the formation of a revolutionary current – revolutionary syndicalism – that in 1904 gained sway over the party and at different moments of the chambers of labor and the Segretariato della resistenza, established in 1902 as the first national committee for coordinating industrial and territorial organizations. The first general strike in Italian history, in September 1904, newly reinforced the influence and thrust of revolutionary syndicalism, which was later to decline in 1905 and 1906, as socialist reformist leaders regained influence within the trade union movement through the founding of the Confederazione Generale del Lavoro (CGdL) in 1906.

This new confederation organizational model, promoted by FIOM, and aligned with reformist-led federations and the socialist leadership, unified unions among different industries, marking the triumph in a longstanding conflict between industrial unions and chambers of labor, which sought to gain monopoly representation of the labor force. The process of merging trade unions into the CGdL was not automatic and thus remained incomplete. Sections of the trade union movement did not join, for political reasons or because of autonomist industrial craft traditions. The case of the Sindacato Ferrovieri Italiani (railwaymen's union) founded in 1907 is in that sense paradigmatic.

The evolution of the CGdL paralleled the expansion of collective bargaining: in 1906 the car factory Itala in Turin signed an agreement establishing a commissione interna (a workers' commission internal to the workplace) sanctioning organs of workers' representation created in the previous decade. A short period of "agreements of union truces" followed, and agreements included a mutual and consensual end to conflict and a set of conciliatory procedures emerging from the commissione interna.

The early 1910s opened a new cycle of labor struggles, reaching an apogee in 1913, but showed some weaknesses among unionists. The state of the economy was poor and entrepreneurs aggressively resisted workers with the founding of a national association of industrialists, the Confederazione Italiana dell'Industria (1910). The union movement was in a state of crisis over its relationship to the Socialist Party. Internal conflict in the party divided reformists on the occasion of the Libyan War in 1912, giving rise to the emergence of a revolutionary party leadership by revolutionaries Costantino Lazzari and Benito Mussolini at the Reggio Emilia Congress.

In the union movement a new generation of revolutionary syndicalists sought to undermine the reformist hegemony in the CGdL, promoting the general adoption of a direct action method with the aim of a radical transformation of society, and also a new organizational model, shaped in similarity to Anglo-American industrial unionism. In November 1912, led by charismatic figures such as Alceste De Ambris and Filippo Corridoni, syndicalists founded a new national organization, the Unione Sindacale Italiana (USI).

The CGdL for the first time faced strong union competition, especially in the urban and industrial zones of Northern and Central Italy and among unskilled workers. Internal divisions in the union movement and within the Socialist Party grew sharper during the strikes of spring and summer 1913 and the so called Settimana Rossa (Red Week) of June 1914, when a strong wave of protest and insurrectional strikes shook the whole country, centered in the Marche and Romagna regions.

The outbreak of World War I had strong repercussions on the Italian union movement. The USI experienced a profound crisis as part of its leadership supporting intervention was forced to resign. In 1918 a split in the federation formed the new Unione Italiana del Lavoro (UIdL). Some secessionists became leading forces in the growth of Fascist unionism. Conversely, the CGdL paid a heavy price for its outspoken neutrality after Italy's entrance into the war. Union repression during the war was proportional to involvement in the organization of production, by participating in the organs of industrial mobilization, in a context leaving little space to unions, anticipating the authoritarian turn of the following decade.

In the immediate post-World War I period working-class militancy, repressed during the war, forcefully broke out as feverish social and political unrest shook the whole country. The union successes of the Red Biennium (1919–20), particularly through national bargaining and the creation of the 8-hour work day, led by 1920 to a sharply increased membership of 4 million in the CGdL, USI, UIdL, and CIL (a Catholic union founded in 1918).

The CGdI and USI's (now under anarchist hegemony) failure to reach agreement and the growing internecine conflict among socialists, with the formation of the Italian Communist Party (PCd'I) in 1921, substantially weakened opposition to Fascism. Mussolini's rise to power in 1922 brought growing repression of free unionism and simultaneously the growth of Fascist unionism, which was given preferential status by the state and entrepreneurs in collective bargaining. With the Pact of Palazzo Vidoni in 1925 Confindustria, the entrepreneurs' organization, granted Fascist unions a monopoly of labor power and rights. The Fascists ended independence through declaring the USI and SFI illegal. Meanwhile, the CIL dissolved itself in 1925, followed by the CGdL. The decision of the latter, taken by the leadership in Italy, was not accepted by the union leadership in exile. Bruno Buozzi, the last secretary of the CGdL, began a process of reconstructing confederal organization with a reformist tendency from exile in Paris. In 1927 Italian communists founded an underground CGdL d'Italia, which in 1930 came under the direction of party leader Giuseppe Di Vittorio. In the 1930s the two organizations operated primarily among Italian emigrants, mainly in France, but the tormented relations between socialists and communists created substantial hostility.

In 1934, with the "pact for unity of action" among socialists and communists, a new effort was made to achieve unity among labor unions, but the 1939 Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact between Stalin and Hitler put a halt to cooperation between the two parties.

The mounting difficulties of the Fascist regime, particularly after Italy entered World War II in 1940, brought a resurgence of anti-Fascist parties inside Italy. After the September 1943 armistice and the beginning of the resistance against Nazis and Fascists, the status of unions was also transformed. In June 1944 the main representatives of free unionism met in Rome and signed an agreement creating a united union confederation, the Confederazione Generale Italiana del Lavoro (CGIL), under first secretaries Di Vittorio (communist), Oreste Lizzadri (socialist), and Achille Grandi (Christian democrat). This new union, representing other smaller influences, operated in liberated zones, while under the Fascist Repubblica Sociale in the North of Italy the clandestine united struggle created a new element of cohesion among labor unions.

The postwar political strains and contrast in political culture among the different currents within the CGIL tended to separate Christian democrats from the socialist and communist bloc, although the fact that all three agreed substantially on many matters has been under-appreciated.

A break in unity took place in July 1948 in the aftermath of the proclamation of a general strike, when republicans and social democratic union members left the CGIL. In 1950 Italian unionism saw two new organizations emerge that promoted an organizational model based on associations. The first was the Confederazione Italiana Sindacati Lavoratori (CISL) that, in spite of its Christian democratic roots, attempted to play an "apolitical" and "a-confessional" role, oriented to collective bargaining; the second was the Unione Italiana del Lavoro (UIL), with a republican and social democratic orientation.

Competition between major confederations during the 1950s took place mainly in the factories of Northern Italy, where difficult economic and political conditions made union activity problematic, especially when promoted by communists. Elections to the internal commission, born anew after the war, mirrored the strength of every union. The severe defeat of metal workers of the FIOM-CGIL at Fiat plants in Turin in 1955 was the occasion for a change of strategy of the CGIL, which would now pay more attention to the different contexts of factories and work plants. Inside the CISL a new generation of union rank and file saw the necessity of closer unity between the different unions, a phenomenon that took place in the 1960s, more as the result of industrial conflict and rank-and-file support than agreement between union leaderships.

The impressive cycle of struggles (1969–73) begun by the strike wave of the Hot Autumn of 1969 brought a new array of social goals such as the Statuto dei lavoratori, a law to protect workers against discrimination in the workplace. The metal workers of the three union confederations were the spearhead of the entire union movement, as they were the first to gain formal unity with the establishing of a united Federazione dei Lavoratori Metalmeccanici (FLM). Confederations, on the other hand, after a troubled process of growing closer (at the three congresses in Florence, the first in 1971, the second and the third in 1972), gave birth only to a federative pact to establish a coordinating committee with the name of Federazione unitaria CGIL-CISL-UIL (1972).

The strength of confederation unionism was bound to decline in the face of the 1970s Italian economic crisis and political tensions, even though unions were seen as at the front line in defense of democracy. The Federazione unitaria was pressed increasingly on the left by rank-and-file unions and on the right by disagreements within the CISL and UIL leadership, which emerged in the severe union defeat at Fiat in October 1980 and in the curbing of scala mobile (an automatic wage adjustment to inflation), causing the Federazione unitaria to disband in 1984.

The political and institutional crisis that struck Italy in the 1990s coincided with a new role for the union movement, which in some cases functioned as a political substitute for political actors. The 1993 agreement between the executive, the three confederations, and Confindustria was the foundation of a new phase of industrial relations based on the idea of concertazione, a general agreement on wages and economic policies that came to characterize Italian unionism. In the first decade of the 2000s the traditional union system underwent major organizational changes, with the strengthening of organizations not aligned with historical Italian unionism, in a context of deep transformation of industries and of the labor force further punctuated by a transition to neoliberalism in the new century.

Italian Risorgimento

Marcelline Block

The nineteenth-century struggle for the political, cultural, and social unification of Italy is known as the Risorgimento, which means “the resurgence” or “the rebirth.” The Risorgimento had many supporters, including conservative members of the aristocratic establishment such as Count Camillo Benso di Cavour (1810–61), who after 1852 was the prime minister of Piedmont-Sardinia under King Victor Emmanuel II. Other significant actors in the Risorgimento include the revolutionary, pro-democratic philosopher Giuseppe Mazzini (1805–72) and the popular, charismatic folk hero Giuseppe Garibaldi (1807–82). Garibaldi is commemorated by the street named “rue Garibaldi” in Nice, his birthplace, while Cavour is memorialized by the street called “via Cavour” in the historic center of Rome.

Cavour was not only prime minister of Piedmont-Sardinia under King Victor Emmanuel II but also a staunch advocate of Italian unification as a constitutional monarchy as opposed to Mazzini’s vision of a democratic republic. Cavour eventually succeeded in his plan to unite Italy around Piedmont-Sardinia as a constitutional monarchy under Victor Emmanuel’s rule in 1861. Although in 1870 Italian unification was nearly completed when Rome, still under papal rule supported by the French, was seized by Italy, the goal of a fully unified Italy was not entirely attained until during and after World War I. The Italian Risorgimento of the nineteenth century went beyond political unification, however, since it represented a rebirth of Italian society as well as its liberation from the rule of foreigners.

The Risorgimento accomplished its objectives through diplomatic efforts as well as a series of violent conflicts, and had numerous – often clashing – leaders and factions. The Risorgimento was a drawn-out, fragmented movement and process that continued throughout the nineteenth century and even spilled into the twentieth. The Risorgimento movement in the twentieth century was known as Italia irredenta or “unredeemed Italy.”

The impetus of the Risorgimento can be found in the eighteenth century, inspired by the French Revolution of 1789 as well as eighteenth-century Italian intellectuals such as Ludovico Muratori, Vittorio Alfieri, and Antonio Genovesi. Italian nationalist sentiment and unification movements took hold in 1815 after the Congress of Vienna. At this important diplomatic conference the main powers of Europe redrew the borders of the European continent after the overthrow of Napoleonic France, disbanding the Kingdom of Italy, which had been ruled by Napoleon. Italy was returned to its pre-Napoleonic status as a group of fractured, independent states, each of which was loyal to and/or ruled by Austria or another prominent European country.

Austria was in charge of much of the Italian peninsula, including Lombardy and Venetia, while dukes loyal to Austria were in charge of several other states. According to the Austrian diplomat Prince Metternich, Italy was “a mere geographical expression” (Merriman 1996: 754). Naples and Sicily were ruled as the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies by the French Bourbon royal family, and the Papal States were returned to the pope. Piedmont-Sardinia became the Kingdom of Sardinia under the rule of the House of Savoy.

The phase of the Risorgimento that began in 1815 as a reaction to the Congress of Vienna lasted until the failed European and Italian revolutions of 1848–9, after which Cavour’s diplomatic tactics allowed for the unification of Italy. The years leading to the 1848 revolutions were times of romantic ideologies and revolutionary insurgencies, led in particular by the Southern Italian secret society known as the Carbonari (“Coal Burners”). The best-known uprisings of the Carbonari were in 1820 in the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies and in the Kingdom of Sardinia in 1821. Members of the Carbonari were mainly middle-class intellectuals, and many leaders of the Risorgimento, including Mazzini and Garibaldi, were initially members of the Carbonari, as was Emperor Napoleon III in his youth. In the early 1830s Carbonari insurrections took place in the papal legations of Bologna, Forlì, Ravenna, Imola, Ferrara, Pesaro, and Urbino; the Grand Duchy of Tuscany; the Duchy of Modena; the Kingdom of Lombardy-Venetia; and the Duchy of Parma. The Carbonari persisted throughout the Risorgimento, condemning Napoleon III to death – a botched assassination attempt by Felice Orsini occurred in 1858.

Another secret society devoted to a unified Italy was the radical and anti-clerical La giovine Italia (“Young Italy”), formed in 1831 by the Genoese Giuseppe Mazzini, who was arrested and exiled to Switzerland and London for his revolutionary activities on behalf of Italian unification. Mazzini “frequently dressed in black (often surrounded by cigar smoke and in the company of his pet canaries), vowing to remain in mourning until Italian unification could be achieved” (Merriman 1996: 757). La giovine Italia sought the independent and republican nation of Italy with Rome as its capital. Cavour and Mazzini’s leadership and diplomatic styles clashed since Mazzini, unlike Cavour, was against the monarchy and aristocratic rule and privilege. Mazzini’s movement was brutally defeated by the Austrians in 1853, since Cavour informed them of a planned insurrection led by La giovine Italia in Lombardy. Mazzini furthermore organized a failed invasion of the Kingdom of Naples in 1857, losing many of his followers, who formed the National Society in support of Cavour and his more moderate message of nationalism which opposed Mazzini's ambitious plan for total social reform.

Along with the Carbonari and La giovine Italia, other factions persisted during the Risorgimento, particularly after the wave of European revolutions in 1848 in Austria, France, and the German states. Revolutionary and nationalist fervor inspired by the revolutions of 1848 throughout Europe soon arrived in Italy, beginning in Lombardy in January 1848, spreading to Tuscany in February 1848, and Milan and Venetia in March 1848. The Milanese uprising toppled the Austrian army, while Venetia stated that it was an independent republic led by Daniele Manin. Tuscany and Rome established themselves as republics, the latter led by Mazzini, but Austria squashed the revolutions in 1849, defeating the Kingdom of Sardinia under the rule of King Charles Albert, who voluntarily left the throne and gave his title to his son, Victor Emmanuel II, who quickly established peaceful relations with the Austrians.

Tuscany was once again ruled by the grand duke; the pope took control of Rome with the help of the French army; and although the Venetian Republic fought alone against Austria for a year, it, too, surrendered. Austria also repressed revolutions in Parma, Modena, and the Two Sicilies. In 1849, while the Italian uprisings of 1848 were entirely defeated, nationalist desire for Italian unification was focused on the mutual hatred of Austria, which now ruled most of the Italian peninsula.

The liberal unification effort focused upon Piedmont-Sardinia, the only Italian state that kept its own constitution, elected parliament, and tricolor flag under the rule of Victor Emmanuel and Cavour. Nearly all Italian nationalists, except for loyalists to Mazzini, accepted the leadership of Piedmont-Sardinia as the seat of Italian unification. Cavour understood that Piedmont-Sardinia would need foreign troops and aid in order to defeat Austria. Cavour hoped to win international support by establishing progressive social reforms in his state, including a free-trade policy, placing Sardinia in European councils as the voice against Austrian rule over Italy, and joining the Allies in the 1855 Crimean War.

Cavour and Napoleon III met at Plombières in 1858, during which Napoleon promised military aid to Sardinia in its fight against Austria. War between Sardinia and Austria took place in 1859. The Sardinians and the French defeated the Austrian army at Magenta, forcing the Austrians to retreat at Solferino. Cavour, with the aid of the French as well as the non-Mazzini nationalists known as the Italian National Society, made Austria cede Lombardy to Piedmont-Sardinia, although Austria kept Venetia. The Italian victories came at a high price, and so Napoleon signed a separate armistice at Villafranca di Verona. Tuscany, Modena, Parma, Bologna, and Romagna, which had been ruled under provisional revolutionary governments, were to be returned to their former leaders. However, this aspect of the armistice was not satisfied since these states voted for union with Sardinia after plebiscites were held in March 1860. Napoleon recognized these plebiscites and in turn received Savoy and Nice.

In 1860 Garibaldi, Italy's most admired and well-liked hero – a former member of Mazzini's La giovine Italia and a veteran who fought against the Austrians in Lombardy in 1848 as well as in the war of 1859 – sailed to Sicily with 1,000 members of his volunteer army (known as the Red Shirts) in order to help the Sicilians in their uprising against Francis II, the French Bourbon ruler of the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies. At the Sicilian Battle of Calatafimi, on May 15, 1860, Garibaldi's famous rallying cry was "Qui si fa l'Italia o si muore!" ("Here we make Italy, or die!"). Urged by Mazzini (openly) and Cavour (secretly), Garibaldi's shocking victory over the stronger, professional Neapolitan army in Sicily strengthened his scrappy, colorful band of nationalist followers, which went on to take Palermo in May and eventually Naples, the biggest city in Italy, in September.

According to Maxime du Camp, in Naples in 1860 people first shouted "Long Live Italy!" after which they asked the meaning of "Italy" (Merriman 1996: 765). Out of concern that Garibaldi's military victories, as well as his assumption of dictatorial power in Sicily, may possibly lead to support for a republic rather than a monarchy, as well as further conflicts with Austria, Prussia, and/or France, Cavour sent Piedmontese troops to the Papal States the very day that Naples fell to Garibaldi. The combination of Cavour and Garibaldi's factions quelled papal resistance as well as the rule of the French Bourbon family of Naples.

Plebiscites in October in Naples, Sicily, and the Papal States indicated their overwhelming support for joining Piedmont-Sardinia, which also took Umbria and the Marches. Victor Emmanuel went to Naples triumphantly with Garibaldi in November 1860. The only remaining unincorporated states in the new Italy were the small country of San Marino, Venetia (Austrian), Rome, and Latium (both under the dominance of the pope with the support of France). In March 1861 Victor Emmanuel of Piedmont-Sardinia became King Victor Emmanuel II of Italy. The Kingdom of Italy under King Victor Emmanuel II was announced in Turin, the capital of Piedmont-Sardinia. Cavour died unexpectedly on June 6, 1861 before seeing the realization of his dream of a fully unified Italy, which occurred in the following decade. By allying itself with Prussia, the victor over Austria in the month-long Austro-Prussian War of 1866, Italy received Venetia. Italy seized the last of the papal holdings in 1870 when France withdrew its army due to the Franco-Prussian War. On May 13, 1871 the Italian parliament passed the Law of Papal Guarantees, which limited the realm of the pope to the Vatican. Rome became Italy's capital in 1871.

Although Italian unification was considered complete by 1871, it was a difficult transition, since violent resistance to the Risorgimento occurred in the South of Italy as well as in Sicily, where poverty, unemployment, and local brigades of bandits combined in what proved to be potent catalysts for uprisings against the new, centralized Italian bureaucracy, fashioned on France's. The oppression against these incidents of insurgence was brutal, killing more Italians than in the sum total of all the wars of the Risorgimento. Moreover, unfulfilled nationalism under the rubric of irredentism continued well into the twentieth century, since even after the triumphs of the Risorgimento in the nineteenth century many Italians continued to live outside of the bounds of the Kingdom of Italy.

With the secretly negotiated 1915 London Pact, Italy joined the Allies and declared war against the Central Powers, receiving Friuli, Trentino, and Dalmatia in return. After World War I Italy gained 9,000 square miles of Austria-Hungary, including Trentino and Trieste, as well as Gorizia, Istria, and in 1919 the city of Zara. When Italy was defeated in World War II, it lost Istria and Dalmatia. Secessionist factions wishing to unite with Austria continue to exist in the Italian Alto Adige/South Tyrol.

Italian Socialist Party

Peter Ryan

The Italian Socialist Party (PSI) was founded in 1893 by trade unionists and socialists. It was the first political party in Italy to represent the interests of a wide spectrum of Italian society and gave political voice to many people, including the masses, for the first time. It had a profound influence on Italian reform movements in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries; most significantly it unified the many rural and urban workers' movements that were arising throughout the country.

PSI's origins lay partly in the early Italian Workers' Party, a federation of numerous groups that asserted the freedom to act and organize on one hand, and promulgated institutional reforms such as expanding suffrage and a free education on the other. They did not question the legitimacy of the state and allied with other progressive groups in electoral competition. As the Socialist Party consolidated, it easily absorbed all but the most radical of these groups.

A brutal economic downturn drove much of rural Italy close to starvation in the 1880s. Soldiers returning home had seen prosperity abroad, and those at home caught glimpses of a better life as railroads and the telegraph penetrated into long-isolated regions. These contrasts were bitter indeed when the national government appeared to do little but tax salt. The economic crisis provoked strikes and bloodshed. Socialist, largely urban intellectuals understood little of these regions, but saw the political opportunities they presented and sought to explain the disruptions in Marxist terms. The government, long controlled by elites north and south, blamed the unrest on the socialists and embarked on a fierce campaign of suppression. Far from breaking the progressive forces throughout Italy, the government's action against the socialists helped consolidate them in opposition to the government.

In November 1903, after a period of increased prosperity and expanded rights, Giovanni Giolitti became prime minister and signaled that he considered many of the policies of the previous years unfair and counterproductive. He criticized taxes on food when there were no taxes on wealth per se, and indicated that conservatives were as much to blame for recent instability as the socialists. This softening toward the left had an immediate effect. The PSI's policy of gradual socialism was evolving rapidly at this time and it was willing to take a more conciliatory stance toward the government.

Although socialism appealed far more to industrial workers and intellectuals than to those in the rural south, whose way of life had been profoundly disrupted by the many economic and technological changes of the late nineteenth century, the PSI's share of the vote and its representation in the national assembly rose dramatically. In order to bridge the factions emerging within it, Filippo Turati arranged the approval of both a minimal and maximal program for the PSI. He regarded the former as the means to the latter. The party did not abandon revolution but was freed to work with liberals to achieve more immediate goals, such as the right to strike, government neutrality in labor disputes, and universal suffrage. The PSI had become a mainstream political party with a mass base. It would prove to have a difficult and turbulent history, often lurching between efforts to accommodate liberal and bourgeois parties on the one hand and communists on the other, with its own highly divergent left and right wings struggling for ideological control.

Prior to World War I conflicts within the PSI were between its so-called maximalist, or revolutionary, wing and those who sought to reform existing institutions. Among the maximalists was future fascist leader of Italy Benito Mussolini. As a journalist for the party organ Avanti!, Mussolini pushed strongly for involvement in World War I to unite Italy with the Italian-speaking territories under Austrian rule. Pacifist and internationalist elements within the party, as well as trade unions, opposed the "bourgeois war." The wing of the party Mussolini represented was eventually purged. At around the same time, another anti-reformist wing split off, forming the Italian Communist Party (PCI).

The conclusion of World War I polarized various aspects of Italian political life. Fascists had coalesced around a strongly nationalist, corporatist agenda and battled socialists and communists in the streets of many cities throughout Italy. Under Turati's leadership, the PSI maintained a policy of allying with any democrats in order to undercut the growing power of reactionary forces throughout the country. As the PCI was mostly revolutionary in its posture, and the fascists seemed increasingly able to intimidate the political center into compliance with their agenda, the PSI was caught in the middle. Its reform program was lost in the severe political crisis Italy was facing.

The fascist ascent to power was facilitated by the fragmenting of the left. Fascist violence had driven the leadership of the PSI to Paris. In an attempt to regain leadership of the Italian left, the socialists in exile called a conference in 1930 and issued a joint unification document creating an anti-fascist front. Pietro Nenni, now a major voice in the PSI, rejected revolutionary tactics but tried to retain Marxist class analysis and a strong anti-capitalist posture. The document firmly emphasized democratic means and ends, seeking to effect the transformation of existing institutions into “instruments of the exploited class.”

Some leaders of the PSI, such as Rodolfo Morandi, sought to institute a program of gradual reform but with immediate practical action. Some socialist leaders alleged that the founding of the republic merely gave rise to a bourgeoisie that wanted democracy only to the degree that it boosted productivity, and then endorsed fascism in order to limit reform and economic enfranchisement.

Domestically, throughout World War II it was the Communist Party that became associated with the resistance to fascism. The practical response of the communists in the face of the fascist threat gave them considerable moral authority and support – at the expense of the PSI.

Nenni viewed the classical Marxist emphasis on economic conditions alone to be a mistake. Change, in postwar Italy, required power, which meant direct involvement in the country’s institutions. Representation in the government was only possible with a united left. However, the Communist Party saw itself as the genuine force for reform in Italy and was unwilling to cede what it saw as its moral standing. The PSI, on the other hand, sought to lead this united left into power by blunting the revolutionary rhetoric and tactics of the PCI. Adding to the volatility was the robust support of the PCI by the Soviet Union, and the thorough opposition of the Roman Catholic Church to all parties on the left. Later, during the immediate postwar occupation, any alliance with the Communist Party was looked on with great suspicion by the Americans. Despite the enormous difficulties, the PSI formed an uneasy pact with much of the left which helped shape the new republic that emerged from the Constitutional Assembly of 1946.

The party continued to be plagued by division between accommodation with the PCI and with centrist and center-left parties. The PSI vociferously denounced the invasion of Hungary by the USSR in 1956, leading to yet another split with the Communist Party. Its participation in numerous center-left governments left it vulnerable to criticism that it sought power more than reform, and the party eventually lost its leadership of the left to the PCI. This resulted in Italy’s distinction as the only western democracy with a communist party larger and more powerful than its socialist party.

By the mid-1970s, under the leadership of Bettino Craxi, the PSI had become, in effect, a typical social democratic party. It no longer represented the socialist/workers’ party tradition, having ceded that portion of the electorate to the growing PCI. Craxi sought to distance the party from its Marxist roots and position the PSI as the key to forming a governing coalition without the communists – who had become the country’s second largest party after the Christian Democrats.

A series of countrywide scandals (known as Tangentopoli or “bribesville”) was eventually tied to Craxi, the personification of the modern Italian Socialist Party. He resigned soon after and was sentenced to prison for taking millions of dollars in bribes. The PSI never recovered and the party was disbanded in November 1994.

Italy, anti-racist movement

Nicola Montagna

Modern anti-racist movements in Italy have primarily sought to defend the rights of migrants, especially as international migration has expanded significantly in the late 1980s to 2000s. From the 1990s to the early 2000s, most anti-racist mobilizations evolved in reaction to attacks on migrants and aimed to confront xenophobic demonstrations organized by local citizen committees and the Lega Nord (Northern League). This first phase of anti-racist mobilizations sought to expand migrant citizenship rights. Unlike the larger presence of the more paternalistic institutional left and trade unions, independent organizations were weakly organized (Della Porta 2000). In the 1990s, the first cycle of mobilizations was primarily local, without coordination at the national level (Cousin & Vitale 2007).

Since 1998 anti-racist mobilizations shifted focus to the Centri di Permanenza Temporanea (Temporary Stay Centers, CPTs) and the restriction of freedom and movement for undocumented migrants. The passage of the Turco-Napolitano law in 1998 and then the Bossi-Fini law in 2002 provided the Italian government with powers to hold undocumented migrants in CPTs prior to expulsion. The law introduced “administrative detention” procedures whereby migrants could be imprisoned without committing any crimes while the government deliberated their status.

The anti-racist movement demanded the closure of CPTs and freedom of circulation for all migrants. The struggle against the CPTs emerged as a symbol of a broader movement involving Occupied Social Centers (Centri Sociali), traditional left parties, unions, Catholic associations, and immigrant organizations (Cousin & Vitale 2007). Popular mobilizations shifted from a local to a national base, and ultimately to the transnational level when migrants’ freedom of movement was taken up by the European Social Forum and the global justice movement. The anti-racist movements organized demonstrations, church occupations, hunger strikes, and direct action. On October 24, 1998, several hundred protesters from throughout Italy joined an organization known as White Overalls (Tute Bianche), converging on a newly built CPT detention center in Porto Vecchio, Friuli Venezia Giulia. The protesters clashed with police seeking to prevent their passage and occupation. On January 29, 2000, 10,000 people organized by Tute Bianche demonstrated against the CPT in Milan, and in spring 2000, several thousand migrants mobilized in Brescia to reclaim the right of “leave to remain” and of “freedom of circulation” (Montagna 2001). On January 25, 2002, Disobbedienti protesters engulfed a CPT in Bologna and “dismantled” a wing of the center. Subsequently, several mobilizations throughout Italy focused on direct action, targeting airline companies involved in the deportation of migrants and associations administering CPTs. Since the 2001 anti-G8 protest in Genoa, the global justice movement has coordinated protests against CPTs and calls for the freedom of movement. The CPTs are viewed internationally as a symbol of the violation of human rights and of the perverse effects of neoliberal globalization. On January 31, 2004 and April 2, 2005, protesters mobilized on CPTs in several Italian localities as part of the First and Second European Action Days of the October 2004 social forums held in Paris and London.

Italy, anti-war movement, 1980–2005

Nicola Montagna

The peace movement in Italy from the early 1980s and the early 2000s arose in reaction to the Italian government’s joining external allies in international conflicts. The coalitions in the anti-war movement are actors from a diversity of political cultures: trade unions, Catholic groups, environmentalists, left-wing parties, and Occupied Social Centers. Overall, five cycles of protest characterize the peace movement from 1980 to 2005.

The Italian anti-war movement arose in response to the Italian government’s support for NATO and US President Jimmy Carter’s decision in 1979 to deploy 120 cruise missiles in Comiso, Sicily, and the Reagan administration's escalation of the arms race with the USSR in Western Europe. Italian anti-war activists viewed the NATO deployment of nuclear weapons as a means of further escalating the arms race with the Soviet Union. The Italian anti-war movement was part of a wider protest wave in Western Europe calling for the unilateral end to the intensification of the arms race. From 1981 to 1986, Comiso emerged as the main focus of the Italian peace protests, as the movement organized a number of non-violent direct actions to stop the deployment of the nuclear missiles. The actions were supported by dozens of demonstrations in Italian cities and the formation of 600 anti-war committees across Italy. On October 22, 1983, on the International Day for Peace, 500,000 demonstrators joined a non-violent march in Rome.

In the early 1990s, the Italian peace movement began a new cycle of mass protest to support diplomatic resolution of the crisis following the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait, prior to the US Gulf War in Kuwait against Iraq. On October 7, 1990, 100,000 demonstrators marched from Perugia to Assisi; and in November a delegation of Italian pacifists traveled to Iraq, securing the freedom of 270 Italian workers held hostage by Saddam Hussein's government. The peak was reached on January 12, 1991 when 150,000 people took part in a national demonstration in Rome, while mobilizations ended soon after the bombing of Iraq started.

Two other intense phases of mobilization occurred during the Bosnian War (1992–5) and the bombing of Kosovo by NATO (1996–9). The movement engaged in street protests, boycotts of products, and vigils against parties implicated in the hostilities.

The fifth cycle of protests, in 2002 and 2003, was against the US war in Iraq, targeting the Italian government's support for the US administration of George W. Bush and culminating in the largest mobilization ever in Italy when 400 groups and associations brought three million demonstrators to protest the war plans on February 15, 2003. In addition, Italian anti-war protests engaged in several non-violent direct actions, including some attempts to prevent the transportation of arms, known as "armament trains." The Italian anti-war movement was closely linked to the global opposition and international activist organizations coordinating protests against the coalition war against Iraq. The global anti-war movement participated actively in various protests against the G8 multilateral international meeting of the world's leading economic powers and joined the World Social Forum meetings for justice and peace organized throughout the world.

Italy, Centri Sociali

Nicola Montagna

From the 1980s to the 1990s, the squatter movement flourished in Italy as activists engaged in a policy of occupying empty buildings in the country in what became known as Occupied Social Centers (OSCs), or Centri Sociali. Although the category of OSC varies in space and time, occupation of empty buildings and squatting and managing the affairs of the buildings were common features of the movement. OSCs represented a radical criticism of representative democracy, the rejection of bureaucratic hierarchy, and the adoption of political autonomy and participative forms of decision-making processes in society. The occupied buildings were the avatar of social and de-commodified spaces where activists self-organized political initiatives, cultural events, and community services in opposition to the gentrification and decline in housing for workers and the poor.

The informal and putatively illegal nature of OSCs created liberated but precarious places for those who squatted in the buildings for political purposes and as representations of the de-commodification of housing and the failure of capitalist society to provide for basic social needs. Most members of Centri Sociali participated in loose multifaceted networks. In the 1980s, Centri Sociali emerged in several locations, expanding dramatically to about 120 by the 1990s. By the 2000s, the number of OSCs has grown further to approximately 150, spread throughout Italy and concentrated in the urban centers of Milan, Turin, and Rome. Even the number of activists engaged in the Centri Sociali has fluctuated dramatically.

The historical origins of the OSCs are rooted in the antagonistic social movements of the 1970s when youth groups began a process of “claiming the city” through the occupation of empty buildings. Some activists and members of Centri Sociali claim they are the successors of the 1970s new left, operating within the social conditions created by the transition from an industrial to a post-industrial society. On the one hand, the OSCs filled the physical void left by the dismantling of inner-city factories and their move toward extra-urban areas. On the other hand, the social composition of the OSCs reflects the restructuring of the labor force that has occurred in Italy in the 20 years from 1980 to 2000 and the fragmentation of the labor market, based on the increase of flexible work in the service sector and the decline of permanent and full-time employment.

Most OSCs participate in regional and national networks through political affinities and tactical alliances for specific activist campaigns, differing in political and cultural orientation as libertarians, neo-Leninists, and post-autonomous, non-ideological organizations in contrast with hostile, pragmatic, and strategic institutions. The various strands of the Centri Sociali are cultural, political, and social, dividing the “countercultural” and the “political” and representing a continuum of political tendencies that encourage alliances or fissures. The “countercultural” networks mainly emphasize the innovations of cultural languages, the alternative use of communication and information technology, and the promotion of independent music, alternative models of development, and ethical lifestyles. The “political” networks target political opponents and adopt repertoires of protest based on direct action and civil disobedience.

Dario Azzellini

The Italian partisan resistance (La Resistenza) were critical in defeating fascism and the German occupying forces in northern and central Italy from 1943 to 1945. The partisan army was made up of 250,000 men and women, of whom the majority were communists, with smaller numbers of socialists, conservatives, leftist Catholics, monarchists, small leftist factions, and regional autonomists. Most partisans fought for national liberation in a civil war against Italian fascism. But beyond national liberation, partisans also struggled for a social revolution to transform the society, a view that is often denied by mainstream, liberal, and even Communist Party historians.

The broad political spectrum of the resistance and its many contradictions deeply influenced Italian postwar society as the future of liberal democracy and worker power surfaced. While the Italian Communist Party (PCI) superstructure sought to participate in a government of national unity, the rank-and-file pressed for radical social change. After the defeat of Italian fascism and German occupation, some fascist groups still actively sought to oppose socialist revolution and defend capitalist privilege. The Allies faced the contradiction of relying on partisans in the war against Germany but opposing armed communist troops and social reforms. While the US hoped to rely on anti-fascist bourgeois forces, given their absence, the US had no choice but to rescue and reinstate the former fascist upper classes and their political allies. Upon arrival in southern Italy in 1943, the US relied heavily on factions of organized crime to establish stable conditions. In 1944, the US even supported the candidacy of Trapani mafia boss Virgilio Nasi for High Commissioner of Sicily. The CIA joined forces with Italian organized crime as they both shared a common anti-communist enemy.

Throughout the Italian partisan war and thereafter, many workers hoped for social revolutionary changes, evinced by 1943 strikes in northern Italy where police killed 95 people from July to September. By 1944, social pressures elevated in southern Italy as peasants seized great quantities of fallow land. The US soon recognized that the elites they supported were not equipped to challenge the leftist threat. Their next move would be the construction of an anti-communist front of fascists, oligarchs, the bourgeois right, and even a former conservative faction of the partisans.

In 1944 the PCI was given direct orders from Moscow to respect the spheres of influence established by the US and the USSR. In January, demands were reduced to the resignation of the king, and the question of a new constitution was postponed. In March the Soviets recognized General Pietro Badoglio's government and the PCI renounced its demand for the king's abdication, opting for a constitutional pact with the industrialists. On June 6, PCI General Secretary Palmiro Togliatti returned from exile in the USSR to inform communist leaders in northern Italy that the central goal was national liberation from German occupation and the defeat of Italian fascism, not socialist or communist uprising and power. Social inequality in Italy, according to Togliatti, should be resolved at a later date through a national constituent assembly.

By April 1945, when the Allies advanced into the northern Po valley, most cities were liberated by popular uprisings organized by the resistance and administered by the CLN (Committees of National Liberation). In December 1944, the CLN were recognized as official representatives of areas formerly occupied by the Germans by both the Italian government and the Allied forces. Tensions mounted when the oligarchy and bourgeoisie, supported by the US, tried to expand and consolidate power while workers and peasants engaged in strikes and occupation of land in pursuit of social reform. The PCI evoked national unity, supported the bourgeoisie's interests, and ceased to advocate radical democratic anti-fascist parliamentarianism, as the CLN had achieved in northern Italy. The PCI simply compromised and supported a bourgeois democracy. However, in May 1947, after solidifying their position, conservatives excluded communists and socialists from government.

Disappointed by the "unfinished revolution," former partisans formed armed groups and began carrying out punitive actions against fascists. Within the first 18 months of liberation the central Italian region of Emilia reported 1,496 "political criminal offenses" committed by communists. In the district of Bologna alone, 615 fascists were killed and 75 "disappeared." A communist unit in Schio stormed a prison on July 8, 1945 and executed 54 fascist detainees. These groups also attacked landlords to force land redistribution. In the district of Bologna, 21 landlords were killed or seriously injured and in Ravenna 15 landlords were killed, while 12 more were abducted, never to be found. A part of the Resistenza had refused to hand over weapons after the war. In 1947, some 80,000 former partisans remained armed.

In 1945 and 1946 Palmiro Togliatti, serving as minister of justice, issued a vaguely formulated amnesty leading to the release of all convicted fascists, which was intended to end all legal proceedings arising from strong discontent among partisans against collaborators. Over 500 armed partisans returned to the mountains and were disbanded only in 1947. Fascist groups that remained were dispersed by the police and some were incorporated into the intelligence services. The secret service was rebuilt through integrating former exponents of the fascist secret police with 4,500 members of the conservative partisan division Osoppo in April 1946, with US support. Minister of the Interior Mario Scelba (1947–55), a member of Christian Democracy (DC), restructured the police according to a fascist model, purging former partisans who had joined the police in the postwar era. National police chiefs Giovanni Carcaterra (1953–60) and Angelo Vicari (1960–73) were members of Mussolini's personal staff in the Republic of Saló. During the 1950s, only two first-grade police prefects had not participated in the fascist regime. All 135 police chiefs and 139 deputies began their careers under fascism, with only five deputies connected to the anti-fascist resistance. It is crucial to emphasize that repressive Italian postwar policies were supported by a broad authority that spanned fascists to former anti-fascist conservatives. In the immediate aftermath of the war, Italian policy was strictly anti-communist and would remain so for several decades.

With extensive resources from the Marshall Plan flowing almost entirely into the industrialized north and with wages stagnating because of moderate union politics, the big companies in northern Italy accumulated significant capital which was invested in restructuring production with a focus on export and goods of mass consumption through the widespread introduction of assembly lines. These industries were staffed by unskilled workers migrating from the impoverished south of Italy, and required strong mechanisms of repression and control in the workplace.

Scelba conducted a campaign of forced capitalist restoration through police brutality against militant workers and peasants. Six communist workers were killed by police at a 1949 strike in Modena. Later that year, in response to unauthorized peasant occupation of land in the south, police responded with machine gun fire and hand grenades, killing three and seriously injuring another 12. Between June 1947 and January 1951, 81 protesters were killed by police, landlords, or organized crime gangs.

In the 1953 election the Christian Democratic vote fell from 12.7 million in 1948 to 10.86 million, creating concern among right-wing circles in Italy and the US. That same year 6.1 million voted for the PCI and the party expanded to 2.5 million members, with a strongly ideologically conscious working-class base. Still, the PCI followed General Secretary Palmiro Togliatti's line of a democratic seizure of power without a revolutionary process. Between 1953 and 1958, the PCI grew weary of coordinating local strikes. The historical task defined by the PCI was constant progress of the productive forces and implementation of the new constitution. The PCI argued that progressive democracy was incompatible with the interests of entrepreneurs, and for that reason also was a step toward socialism and ultimately peaceful factory takeovers. The policy of the PCI and its trade union CGIL (Confederazione Generale Italiana del Lavoro) was suddenly oriented toward sporadic land struggles and city hall occupations in southern Italy and factory occupations in the north.

The PCI's support for the Soviet intervention in Hungary in 1956 finally led to the emergence of a new left. The position led to the Italian Socialist Party (PSI) leaving its unity agreement with the PCI, with hundreds of intellectuals leaving both parties. By the early 1960s, the new left sought to advance a new autonomous workers' movement.

The year 1960 marked the beginning of a new dynamic of political and social conflicts. The election of Christian Democrat Fernando Tambroni on March 25 was made possible by support from the fascist party MSI (Movimento Sociale Italiano). Tambroni authorized a congress of the MSI on July 2 in Genoa, a leftist stronghold, to test to what extent society accepted an institutionalized opening toward fascists. The organizations of the institutionalized left limited themselves to demanding the prohibition of the congress. But students, workers, and youths organized a protest meeting on June 25. When police tried to break up the meeting, workers from a nearby port fought side by side with protesters, wielding iron bars and hooks. In an effort to regain control of the protest, leftist parties and trade unions called for a general strike in Genoa and Savona on June 30. But while the PCI, PSI, and union officials stressed the peaceful character of the protest, thousands of students, working-class youth, communist dissidents, and anarchosyndicalists began attacking some 15,000 police. The protesters, lacking weapons, called for intervention by the former partisans. In Turin, workers organized a spontaneous solidarity strike and were prevented by CGIL from attacking the police. In Genoa, clashes started the next day without the presence of the official left. The chairman of the PCI-dominated National Partisan Association (ANPI) made a public call not to support those arrested, while CGIL tried to relieve the situation. Nevertheless, thousands of young people and armed ex-partisans traveled to Genoa and soon the congress was canceled. The following day the official left organized "peaceful demonstrations" across Italy that ended only in heavy clashes with the police. From July 1 to 9, ten workers were killed and the protest resulted in a general strike. Tambroni resigned on July 19.

The events of June and July 1960 are considered the birth of the non-traditional Italian new left in response to the failure of traditional leaders to support the struggle and demands of youth and workers. The working class found the conciliation and appeasement of the PCI in Genoa loathsome, while the militant behavior of youth was considered remarkably refreshing. The media labeled them “youngsters with the striped jerseys,” making it clear that while they may not have been workers, they formed part of a new oppositional generation to the rigid social norms of Italian postwar society. Without an alternative leftist organization to the PCI, they identified with unskilled mass workers from the south who refused to work under inhumane conditions.

Dario Azzellini

The formation of a mass independent left in Italy from 1962 to 1981 in response to the institutionalization of the traditional left and working-class parties and mass organizations created a mass wave of popular unrest and government repression that turned to armed struggle and further suppression of freedoms. The new left was rooted in new social movements of workers, students, women, and those marginalized by Italy's postwar industrialization.

By the 1950s and 1960s, northern Italy's economy industrialized on a massive scale, as labor productivity expanded from 100 (1953) to 140.6 (1960). However, the working class was not integrated economically or culturally into the Italian economy as in the US or Germany, as wages grew to only 108.9. Italy restricted wages by encouraging 1.5 million unskilled workers to migrate from the poor agrarian south of Italy to the industrial north. Southern migrants resided in large dormitory suburbs or ghettos with substandard conditions on the edges of large cities. As living costs rose and pay scales fell, Italy's middle-wage workers' and students' standard of living declined precipitously.

Social discontent broke out in 1962 with mass strikes at the Michelin and Lancia factories in Turin, as workers in the metal trades demanded new collective contracts. Remarkably, young unskilled workers employed in Turin's factories participated widely in the strikes. By late June 1962, production ceased at all industrial factories in Turin, including the huge Fiat motor vehicle plant that employed 60,000 workers. As the strike wore on, Fiat workers' demands expanded beyond higher wages to reducing work hours, the intensity of production, and draconian disciplinary standards.

From July 7 to 9, as labor rank-and-file leaders called for new strikes, the two major unions, Unione Italiana dei Lavoratori (UIL) and Sindacato Italiano Dell'Auto (SIDA), signed separate agreements exclusively covering wage increases, without addressing concerns over labor conditions. Industrialists believed a contractual settlement would break the strike, since UIL and SIDA had won the previous worker representation elections in Fiat with 63 percent of the workers' votes. In opposition to the settlement, on July 10, thousands of workers of all unions and factories gathered at Statuto Square in Turin at UIL headquarters, and by the afternoon the demonstration had grown so large that police squads clashed with workers, who defended themselves. Workers disregarded union and Italian Communist Party (PCI) efforts to persuade a return to their jobs. The rank-and-file strike and violence lasted for three days, prompting conservatives to accuse PCI's union, Confederazione Generale Italiana del Lavoro (CGIL), of provoking disorder. The PCI accused the police, industrialists, fascists, and “radical groups” of initiating the violence. The Turin labor uprising instigated the Italian autonomous workers' movement, a militant worker movement independent of organizational ties with established unions and left parties.

The theoretical foundation of the autonomous workers' movement and the new left was built by circles of dissidents who left the PCI and the Italian Socialist Party (PSI) in the early 1960s. In 1961, the position of worker autonomy was advocated in a publication of leading left and Marxist intellectuals named Quaderni Rossi (Red Notebooks). Among the leading intellectuals in the autonomy movement were Rainiero Panzieri, Mario Tronti, Sergio Bologna, Massimo Cacciari, and Antonio Negri.

Supported by worker cadres, an independent organizing network was established in the factories of northern Italy. In 1962 the magazine Quaderni Piacentini (Piacenza Notebooks) was founded, followed by Classe Operaia (Working Class) in 1963, aiming to initiate and defend worker rank-and-file struggles outside of parties or unions. The PCI rejected the autonomist approach, which postulated a permanent workers' struggle as incompatible with the party's social partnership policy. But the PCI could not prevent the advance of autonomous worker organizations, wildcat strikes, and clashes with the police. While the PCI lost support from a growing number of union members in plants, the party was gaining electoral support, winning one million additional votes in the 1963 elections and emerging as the party that promised the best hope for the working class. The PCI's electoral gains occurred while the youth revolt was spreading and the counterculture expanding through imaginative public actions, including the setting up of a tent city in the center of Milan. By the mid-1960s the youth rebellion had reached schools and universities, with the emergence of anti-war, anti-imperialist, and socialist sympathies supporting China, Algeria, Cuba, and the Vietnamese liberation struggle. Mao Zedong and Che Guevara became iconic symbols of rebellion and new paths beyond traditional leftist positions. As the diverse movements expanded in Italy, a heterogeneous left linked to global movements emerged. A source of the unrest was the growing and relatively inexpensive access to the political writings of revolutionary leaders throughout the world, as evinced through the publications of the Italian communist Giangiacomo Feltrinelli.

By the fall of 1967, students were supporting workers in labor conflicts and the student movement occupied the University of Trento, University of Milan, and Turin University. Protests were initiated by official students' associations, but the official representations were rapidly displaced by self-organized autonomous structures.

While student opposition originated in discontent with learning methods, antagonism turned rapidly to focus on the centrality of the working class in society and the role of the universities, by the late 1960s shaping into a movement.

In early 1968, student activists occupied half of Italy's 36 universities. In Turin and other cities, violent police evictions of students from campuses were followed by their reoccupation. On February 2, students occupied Italy's largest university, La Sapienza in Rome, and were evicted by police four weeks later on February 28. The following day, student demonstrations reoccupied the university and engaged in a major confrontation with authorities that was dubbed the "Battle of Valle Giulia." For the first time, students did not disperse in response to a police attack but resisted in a battle that provided a new impulse to university occupations and influenced high school student occupations in Milan.

Police responded to student, farmer, and worker demonstrations by escalating repression, engaging the Carabinieri militarized units to attack protesters. From October 1966 to June 1968, approximately 10,000 workers and students were convicted for participation in protests. In addition, leftist demonstrators faced widespread armed attacks by fascists.

As in other European countries, 1968 was a pivotal year of Italian protest. The movement in Italy was led by dissidents from traditional leftist parties, as well as Trotskyists, Maoists, anarchists, anarchocommunists, leftist Catholics, critical theorists, the beat movement, factory workers, anti-psychiatric movement activists, anti-colonial and anti-imperialist solidarity organizations, and an emergent feminist movement. The demonstrations criticized and rebelled against government authority, exploitation, consumption, mental institutions, and prisons. Protesters emphasized the importance of self-determination, autonomy, collectivity, and liberation directed against the establishment as well as the traditional left.

In 1968, communist dissidents, workers, and students unified through the foundation of new labor organizations: Potere Operaio (Workers' Power) and Lotta Continua (Constant Struggle). Italy's factories experienced an explosive atmosphere that included physical attacks on directors, foremen, and widespread sabotage of machines. On March 7, trade unions organized a general strike against the government. At the Fiat factory – considered the symbol of Italian progress – worker participation in the struggle was extensive, motivated less through traditional unions than by autonomous worker discontent.

The protests spread to the cultural sector as well. In Venice, students and artists disrupted the Biennale and the film festival. In October the Unitarian Grassroots Committee CUB (Comitato Unitario di Base) was founded in the Pirelli tire factory in Milan, and spread first to the Sit-Siemens factory and then to other plants. Together with collectives from schools and neighborhoods, the CUB built the Political Metropolitan Collective (CPM). On December 2, police fired on and killed two day laborers in Avola, Sicily, who were protesting the renewal of the national work contract. Strikes and demonstrations throughout Italy followed.

The year 1969 also represented a new peak and revitalization for the movements. Visible unity between students and workers crystallized into less visible but stronger organizational ties among professional workers and students. At universities, student struggles were institutionalized through dogmatic communist organizations. The primary worker mobilization of 1969 focused on the renewal of the national work contract in the metal industry. A movement of employees arose and merged with the workers' movement. Autonomous worker committees emerged and mobilized to oppose work rules, the oppressive organization of work, and long working hours. Workers sought wage increases independent of labor productivity, leading to mass strikes throughout the country. On April 9 police shot two striking workers in Battipaglia. In May and June several autonomously organized strikes stopped production in Fiat for 50 days.

In December, four bombings struck Rome and Milan, one bomb exploding in the National Agricultural Bank in Milan, killing 16 and injuring 84. In response, police prohibited all marches and focused investigations on the revolutionary left. One leftist, Giuseppe Pinelli, fell from the fourth floor of the police department during interrogation in a death police presented as a confession.

The movements placed responsibility for the bombing on the state, viewing the event as a military counteroffensive from above. Still, in 1969, some movements postulated “revolutionary violence” as a necessary response to violent state repression. In Genoa the guerilla group

“October 22” was founded and the publisher Feltrinelli formed the GAP (Groups of Partisan Action).

The PCI had already begun in 1968 to exclude members showing affinity to the movement. In 1970 the PCI excluded former World War II partisan Rossana Rossanda and the whole current referring to the group and newspaper Il Manifesto. The PCI sought to legitimate its participation in the government and declined to criticize the system, fearing radicalization of the conflicts. In 1970 and 1971 most revolutionary groups forced out of factories shifted focus to neighborhoods. Potere Operaio and CPM both sought to further radicalize the struggles, the former in the context of mass militancy, the latter as periodic interventions. Due to persecution and repression in the factories, only clandestine organizations could retain some capacity of intervention in factories.

Founded in 1970 by militants of the CPM in Milan, the Red Brigades (BR) supported worker struggles with small attacks on the cars of shift bosses, with the support of factory employees and working-class suburbs. The BR's goal was to build a Marxist-Leninist urban guerilla movement through armed struggle from below.

In March 1972, the communist publisher and member of GAP Giangiacomo Feltrinelli was found dead near an electricity pylon in Milan, apparently from the detonation of his own explosives. His death provoked broad discussion among social movements about armed struggle and alliances with radical democrats established after the 1969 bombings broke them apart, creating a democratic and revolutionary left. From 1972 to 1973, the radical left focused on defending civil rights, including the passage of a referendum to permit divorce, while the traditional leftist parties and unions could again consolidate their positions.

In March 1973, workers' unrest did not end after a four-week strike at the Fiat-Mirafiori factory in Turin ended in an agreement with unions and employers. Workers in autonomous organizations organized a movement for improved working conditions that undermined factory management and productivity. They occupied the Fiat-Mirafiori factory and raised red flags. The police did not dare to evict it. But the movement inside factories became aware of the limitation of factory politics, which could not resist efforts by employers to restructure factories to reduce worker resistance.

The autonomous organization forms spread throughout workplaces and society. In March delegates from autonomous labor structures in 28 factories founded Autonomia Operaia (Workers' Autonomy). Following the Mirafiori occupation, Potere Operaio dissolved and joined autonomous structures, while Lotta Continua slipped into a crisis and dissolved in 1976. Throughout Italy, tens of thousands of people joined hundreds of collectives, Centri Sociali (social centers), and squatted vacant houses and buildings.

The movement was called the "environment of the Autonomia" or autonomist movement. It represented a new militant, intellectual, and artistic model based on new forms of communication outside established organizations, with greater representation of women and working-class youth. The autonomous movement made use of a range of mobilizing techniques, including theater, dance, free radio, magazines, public festivals, and musical events to bring together diverse segments of society seeking new forms of organization. Public spaces became major sites of mobilization that brought thousands of people throughout metropolitan areas to the urban cores of cities, frequently clashing with police who had been ordered to suppress unsanctioned public gatherings. The autonomous movement besieged public expressions of private wealth through raiding food shops and luxury boutiques that were typically restricted to the upper class.

In the summer of 1976, the autonomous movement together with Lotta Continua, anarchists, and Autonomia Operaia organized a large youth festival in the Parco Lambro in Milan that attracted 100,000 participants. However, the festival turned into a disaster, with outbreaks of violence marking the end of the hippy movement's calls for "love and happiness" and making all too obvious their limited capacity to change society. The festival also failed to turn consumers into actors. A lack of common political objectives and dynamism persisted throughout, resulting in a violent release of pent-up frustration. The events provoked a broad debate among the movements, which acknowledged the need to strengthen their political aims and "declare war on capitalism and the bourgeoisie."

In sharp contrast, the PCI, deducing from the 1973 coup d'état in Chile that radical politics was impossible, postulated a historic compromise with the Christian Democrats (DC) and shared government responsibility as the party's goal. As part of the new compromise with the political right, the PCI gave up any pretense of defending the popular movements outside its ambit, permitting the criminalization of the autonomist movements. In the Italian parliament, the PCI abstained when an act was introduced giving police immunity when committing violence against activists and protesters. Nearly 100 activists were killed by the police from 1975 to 1977, and during the late 1970s dozens of armed groups emerged in response. Most of the armed leftist organizations consisted only of a few militants and lasted for a few months. The BR turned to a more inflexible position that postulated the need to engage war against the state and its institutions. While the more orthodox political positions of the BR had little in common with those of the autonomous movements, their armed operations managed to find hidden sympathies.

In 1977 the struggles exploded. A radical youth movement flourished, mixing creativity and subculture with militant and armed actions. It took over public spaces, raided stores, and entered concert halls and cinemas without paying. The year began with massive student protests and university and school occupations all over the country. In Rome and Turin, after several leftist activists were killed by fascists, thousands of protesters took to the streets in a demonstration that ended with the burning down of the offices of the fascist party, MSI (Movimento Sociale Italiano). Police responded with firearms during demonstrations and leftist militants shot back. The PCI and CGIL opposed the student demonstrators occupying the universities. The final break between revolutionary movements and the PCI and established unions occurred after CGIL Secretary Luciano Lama tried to speak at Rome University, leading to a fierce confrontation between the PCI and CGIL security services and students and ending with Lama being chased out of the university.

Subsequently, on March 11, a student was killed by the Carabinieri near the occupied University of Bologna. Massive disorders followed and the university was occupied by armored infantry vehicles. The next day, a demonstration in Rome turned into a mass protest against the killing, with over 100,000 protesters marching through the city, attacking police stations, businesses, prisons, and party offices with firearms and gasoline bombs. The protesters plundered armories and engaged in armed shootouts with police. Similar actions occurred in Bologna and Milan, which were subsequently occupied by the military. The police engaged in widespread repression in the aftermath of the protests, storming legal leftist meetings and seizing or destroying documents.

In 1977, as mass legal activity became near impossible due to a total ban on the movements, many activists turned toward armed struggle. The government in turn passed new laws, with the support of the PCI, establishing special prisons and declaring a permanent state of emergency. From September 22 to 24, over 100,000 youths gathered for a meeting in Bologna. They argued about revolutionary strategies and fell into sectarianism, the optimistic mood of the movements turning into a generalized feeling of hopelessness. New production technologies led to mass dismissals. The revolutionary left again advocated a further radicalization of the struggle, leading to about 2,000 armed actions during 1977.

In March 1978, the BR kidnapped Christian Democrat chairman Aldo Moro, in order to prevent a "historical compromise" between the PCI and the Christian Democrats. The Italian state for the first (and only) time refused to negotiate, and Moro was killed by the BR after 55 days in captivity. In 1978 and 1979, additional armed actions were carried out even as many small armed groups disbanded. The BR and established organizations recruited massively among activists, even though they had little in common with the movement of 1977. But the armed groups and the movement of 1977 had no strategy beyond reaction to state repression.

On April 7, 1979, hundreds of leftist militants, mainly intellectuals with revolutionary ideas and spokespeople for legal groups, were arrested, including lecturers of the Padua University Philosophy Institute. The mass arrests were justified by a judge and PCI member, who sought to place responsibility on Antonio Negri and other leftist professors for what he saw as subversive activities in Italy. He accused Negri, Oreste Scalzone, Emilio Vesce, Luciano Ferrari Bravo, Franco Piperno, and other former leaders of the Autonomia Operaia and Potere Operaio of setting up a subversive organization and preparing armed insurrection against the state. Moreover, Negri was accused of being the mastermind of the BR. Most of the accusations were dismissed later during the trial that started in January 1987.

In October of 1979, just a few months after April 7, the first 61 politically motivated dismissals at Fiat took place. One year later, Fiat laid off 23,000 workers, creating a sense of fear and the basis for deep social transformation. Meanwhile, the mass arrests continued until 1982. The Italian state countered the social conflict with a total of 40,000 legal cases, 15,000 arrests, and over 4,000 convictions for "terrorist activities." Hundreds were killed on both sides and several thousand leftist militants were forced underground or into exile. By 1982, the mass movements were destroyed and those few isolated armed groups that survived disbanded within a few years.

Italy, new syndicalism, cobas, and precarious workers' organization

Andrea Fumagalli

Origins: Hot Autumn and the 1970s

Cobas are independent rank-and-file worker organizations that emerged in Italian factories in the 1980s in opposition to the established system of trade union representation averse to class conflict. The history of Italian cobas can be traced to the late 1960s, during what was known as the great blue-collar movement called autunno caldo (hot autumn). In that period within the large firms of the North, some autonomous workers' collectives opposed to traditional trade unions that were linked to Italy's left-moderate parties began to develop a new form of unionism based on autonomous labor control. The first cobas took the names Comitati operai di base and Cub, and continued into the early 2000s. The philosophy of cobas is rooted in response to the repressive labor conditions in the 1960s, aimed at supporting "same wage increase for all," without taking into account different occupational categories. Cub and Comitati operai di base were autonomous organizations linked to leftist extra-parliamentary political groups (Avanguardia Operaia, Lotta Continua, Potere Operaio) and the student movement.

During the 1970s a militant Italian labor movement engaged in major strikes at manufacturing facilities, leading to significant growth in organized labor. In 1973 over 6 million Italian workers went on strike. Most notably, in March 1973 workers occupied the Fiat-Mirafiori plant for two days, contributing to the formation and growth of autonomous workers' assemblies (Autonomia Operaia) in the North of Italy and the industrial belt surrounding Rome. The demands of Autonomia Operaia extended beyond improving labor conditions in factories to support socially driven petitions calling on government to improve the provision of housing, transport, education, and public welfare. After 1977, radicalism in the established labor movement precipitously declined, after which the Autonomia Operaia capacity for mobilizing workers also decreased, in part due to state repression in response to the growing radicalization and militancy among some autonomous labor organizations. In 1980, after a 35-day strike at Fiat, three autonomist union caucuses – Cgil, Cisl, and Uil – were defeated at the auto company, throwing the independent labor movement into crisis.

1980s and the Fragmentation of the 1990s

After the repression and defeat of the autonomist movements, the 1980s were characterized by a period of trade union moderation and conflict-free bargaining. Autonomist labor organizations opposed the restructuring of large manufacturing firms and the shift towards the post-Fordist model of flexible production. Among the autonomists' most important initiatives was a referendum opposing corporate plans to institute wage indexation (scala mobile) to inflation. The failure of trade union unity further weakened the position of workers in the factories, as the long and painful process of resistance to neoliberal restructuring ended with the defeat of the resistance to prevent elimination of wage indexation in 1992, which inevitably contributed to higher income inequality in Italy. Dissatisfaction with the failure of trade unions encouraged a renewal of labor activism outside of traditional union forms, with representation on the basis of specific regional and territorial units and within industries at the firm level. The two most influential organizations in central Italy and Rome are Rdb (Rappresentanza di base) and Cobas. Rdb was founded as part of the struggles that occurred in some manufacturing industries in Rome's manufacturing belt, especially among public sector workers employed in pensions and welfare, fire departments, railways, and bus transportation.

Created in 1987, cobas operated in education, especially in secondary schools, opposing school privatization and the growth of unstable jobs (labor precariousness), and in support of improved job and wage conditions. The experience of cobas spread from workers in schools and educational institutions to other labor markets. The formation of the National Committee of Cobas provided a forum for workers in many public services, including Enel (energy), health, telecommunications, and private firms.

During the 1980s and early 1990s Cobas engaged in a protracted struggle with Alfa-Romeo. In northern Italy, especially in Milan, metal-industry trade unionists that were expelled from Fim-Cisl (the Catholic trade union) because of their radical positions, created the FMLU, which in the 1990s founded the CUB (Basic Unitary Committee) and federated with RdB. Hence, by the late 1990s, a new form of antagonistic trade union was constituted – Cobas, RdB in central Italy, and RdB-Cub in the North. Cobas had to overcome a major challenge of official recognition by state labor organizations to bargain on a regional territorial level on behalf of workers. Existing trade union law specified that only the primary representative trade unions – Cgil, Cisl, and Uil – were allowed to engage in nationwide bargaining activity.

A first attempt at reform was the election of RSUs at the firm level. Subsequently, in a growing number of medium to large enterprises and in public services, Cobas gained official trade union rights to bargain on behalf of their members. Since in Italy collective bargaining activity is based on a dual system (national and firm) of bargaining, Cobas were only able to operate at the firm level. Thus, beyond the ideological differences among cobas and established trade unions, established Italian labor law forced the organizations into pursuing new bargaining strategies. As such, the failure of the system's laws to mesh with the emerging unions furthered the fragmentation of established trade unionism, which reached its high point in the mid-1990s, as a growing number of cobas emerged across Italy (Slai-Cobas, Al-Cobas, and Sin-Cobas).

Recomposition of 2000 and San Precario Movement

In Italy the late 1990s were characterized by responding to the spread of precarious unsteady work through organizing, and the formation of new social struggles linked to the increasing activity of Autonomous Social Centers and the anti-globalization movement. The growth in part-time and precarious work arrangements in Italy increased the complexity of labor union representation. Several labor reforms were passed by the Italian government in the 2000s to take into account the growth of precarious work, and by 2008 more than forty types of precarious ("typical" and "atypical") labor contracts were in place – from full-time and lifelong work to temporary labor. The labor contracts differ on the basis of length of job tenure (temporary to permanent), the number of hours (full or part time), and degree of social security coverage. The dramatic expansion of unsteady work in Italy established the foundation for one of the strongest national movements against precariousness in Europe in the country at a time of relatively non-antagonistic labor-management relations. Autonomous labor organizations contended that contingent part-time labor was becoming a structural and generalized problem and that workers engaging in precarious work tended to lead precarious lives.

In 2001 a chainworkers' collective decided to highlight the plight of precarious workers by organizing a May Day Parade. This event quickly became the most important rally against precariousness in Italy, with almost 100,000 participants, spread throughout the whole of Europe (Euro May Day). Traditional trade union rallies disappeared and new forms of communications, new languages, and unconventional use of media (subvertising, free press, and so on) stimulated the creation of new tactics in resisting precariousness and improving life and work conditions. The San Precario icon for precariousness, a Catholic religious symbol known all over the world, is considered the representation of this movement, which signifies the frontier of a new form of labor syndicalism responding directly to the structural changes in the modern neoliberal capitalist system.

Italy, operaism and post-operaism

Sandro Mezzadra

Operaismo ("operaism"), also known in the English-speaking world as "autonomist Marxism," refers to a theoretical and political current of Marxist thought that emerged in Italy in the early 1960s. An original reading of Marx in the framework of the radical workers' struggles that developed in the country during the decade led to the invention of new theoretical concepts (such as technical and political class composition, the mass worker, the refusal of work) and of a new political methodology (so-called militant investigation or co-research). The development of operaism deeply influenced both the political culture and social movements of the 1960s and 1970s in Italy. The theories of Italian revolutionary operaism, which after 1968 shaped political experiences such as Potere Operaio (Workers' Power) and the multifarious movements of Autonomia Operaia (Workers' Autonomy), were widely circulated abroad as well.

After the waves of repression that began on April 7, 1979 and that led to the imprisonment and exile of hundreds of militants and intellectuals of the autonomous movement in Italy, the early 1990s marked the beginning of a new theoretical and political season and the birth of what is currently referred to as "post-operaism." Key to this new season have been such concepts as "general intellect," "immaterial labor," "cognitive capitalism," the "autonomy of migration," and the "multitude." Hardt and Negri's Empire (2000) has widely contributed to the global dissemination of such concepts within social movements, in Marxist and post-Marxist discussions, as well as in cultural and postcolonial studies.

A New Era of Class Struggle

"The workers have imposed it on the capitalists, through the objective violence of their organized strength in the factories. Capital's power appears to be stable and solid; the balance of forces appears to be weighted against the workers. And yet precisely at the points where capital's power appears most dominant, we see how deeply it is penetrated by this menace, this threat of the working class." These are the opening sentences of Mario Tronti's "Lenin in Inghilterra" ("Lenin in England"), written in 1964 as an editorial for the first issue of the newspaper Classe Operaia (Working Class) and republished in 1966 in Operai e capitale (Workers and Capital). The above-quoted article by Tronti is particularly important in the history and formation of operaism: the first sentences clearly indicate one of the main polemical fronts of this current of political thinking, that is, the frontal attack against all theories of working-class integration that were circulating widely in the 1960s, in mainstream social sciences, in public discourse, and even in some varieties of "third-worldist" Marxism. To this polemical front Tronti added, in the same article, the formulation of a methodological principle (often emphatically referred to as a kind of "Copernican revolution") that remained crucial to the theories of operaism and post-operaism: the idea that it is necessary to reverse the classical relation between capitalist development and workers' struggles, to identify in workers' struggles the real dynamic element (the real "mover") of capitalistic development, and to affirm the latter's subordination to workers' struggles.

As a newspaper, Classe Operaia (1964–7) emerged out of the militant journal Quaderni Rossi (Red Notebooks), which had been founded in 1961 in Turin by Raniero Panzieri, a prominent intellectual and left-wing leader of the Italian Socialist Party. Critical toward the new party line that was laying the basis for the experiences of the center-left governments in the country, Panzieri gathered a group of young intellectuals, workers, and technical employees and started an investigation into the living and labor conditions of the working class in and around Turin. The journal Quaderni Rossi was born out of a connection with similar groups based in other regions of northern Italy: intellectuals such as Antonio Negri and Mario Tronti (the former linked to the Socialist Party in Padua, the latter to the Communist Party in Rome), and militant researchers such as Romano Alquati and Guido Bianchini. In many senses the work done by Quaderni Rossi can be considered the origin of operaism, although it is also correct to emphasize the split within the group (which led to the birth of Classe Operaia) as the real moment of emergence of a political operaism. Quaderni Rossi, which originally maintained a strong relationship with the left wing of the trade unions, produced a rupture within the hegemonic political culture of the Italian left of the time, which was deeply shaped by the reading of Gramsci (as proposed by intellectuals of the Communist Party in the 1950s and by the political line set by Palmiro Togliatti since the end of the war). Although it may appear paradoxical, the rupture produced by Quaderni Rossi consisted in a double rediscovery: the rediscovery of Marx (the first Italian translation of a fragment of Marx's Grundrisse, the famous "Fragment on the machinery," was published in the fourth issue of Quaderni Rossi), and the rediscovery of the factory. After the historical defeat of the left at Fiat in 1953, the factory was conceived of (by the official organizations of the labor movement) as a site of resistance and political formation of cadres, but certainly not as a strategic site of offensive workers' attack: while a "historicist" reading of Marx prevailed, the politics of alliances was recognized as the main task of communist and socialist politics.

Quaderni Rossi looked for a way out of the internal and international crisis of the labor movement, with an emphasis on the new quality of class struggle and composition within the novel conditions determined by the wave of mass industrialization that had radically transformed the Italian social, economic, and cultural landscape between the end of the 1950s and the beginning of the 1960s. The journal started to produce an accurate cartography of workers' conditions and struggles, stressing the importance of seemingly "unpolitical" workers' behaviors such as absenteeism and small (even individual) gestures of sabotage, and initiated "militant investigations" in many factories, directly involving workers in the production of knowledge about their living and working conditions and experimenting with the transformation of this knowledge into a condition for struggle. In a way it is possible to say that Quaderni Rossi played a key role in the establishment of industrial and labor sociology in Italy, in a condition in which the predominant historicist culture of the left was basically hostile to sociology per se.

Classe Operaia tried to interpret the radicalization of workers' struggles that had become apparent at least since 1962, when an uprising in Turin (the so-called Piazza Statuto uprising) brought to the fore the oppositional behaviors of new, unskilled, and young workers – mainly migrants from the south of the country whose recruitment had radically transformed the composition of the working class in the factories of the north. Crucial to the split within Quaderni Rossi was the idea that the Italian situation was ripe for political experiments in revolutionary autonomous workers' organization. At the same time, Classe Operaia was also the theoretical laboratory within which the main categories and the methodology of the first wave of operaism were defined. The concept of "technical class composition" was developed as a kind of reverse side of what Marx had termed the "organic composition of capital." To this the concept of "political class composition" was added, in order to take into account the subjective behaviors, needs, and traditions of struggle in the definition of class.

While the analysis of the new role assigned to the state by Keynesianism led to the concept of the "plan of capital" (later developed by Negri in the early 1970s into the "plan state" theory), in the most engaged theoretical chapter of his Operai e capitale on Marx, labor-power, and the working class, Tronti contended that the relation of labor to capital is always double: at once incorporated into its workings as a commodity (as "labor-power") and separated from its logic as a form of political subjectivity (as "working class"). Drawing on a reading of Marx's Grundrisse, Tronti developed the idea of "labor as subjectivity" – labor as set against capital, as not-capital. This idea implied a radical emphasis on the partiality of the subjectivity of the working class. On the one hand, Tronti stressed the fact that only from the unilateral point of view of this partial subject was it possible to produce knowledge of the "totality" of capitalism. On the other hand, he fully developed the political consequences of this theoretical point, setting the interest (and the "explosive power") of the working class against such concepts as the "people" and "popular sovereignty" itself, which had been key to the theory of "progressive democracy" in the Communist Party under the leadership of Togliatti (cf. Tronti 1971: 79). The militant investigation of the new technical conditions of labor in the "Fordist" factories led the Classe Operaia group to identify the new composition of the working class as the so-called mass worker: the lack of identification of the unskilled worker in the "content" of labor, far from being described in terms of "alienation," was considered by Italian operaists as the root of a refusal of work and of political struggles for wages independent of productivity.

The students' movement of 1968 and the workers' "hot autumn" of 1969 led to a new split within Italian operaism. Mario Tronti and others decided to continue their political and intellectual activity within the Communist Party, since they were convinced that workers' struggles structurally needed a political "supplement" in order to multiply and consolidate their power (a position that was later elaborated by Tronti in his theory of the "autonomy of the political"). Antonio Negri and others were instead convinced that the level of autonomous power expressed by workers in the "hot autumn" directly posited the problem of a revolutionary rupture. The organization Potere Operaio (Workers' Power) was founded upon this political evaluation and was active until 1973. Although the history of the organization was shaped by many contrasts on the "party line" (with positions ranging from an emphasis on workers' autonomy and violence to a rediscovery of the Leninist politics of insurrection), its newspaper was an important point of reference for the most radical workers' experiences in Italy.

Both the new dimension of workers' struggles (symbolically represented by the occupation of the Mirafiori Fiat plant in March 1973) and the spread of new social movements from the end of the 1960s led the majority of Potere Operaio to propose an end to the group and its confluence into the wider movement of Autonomia Operaia (Workers' Autonomy). The composition of this movement was radically heterogeneous, from both a political and a social point of view: although the proposal of "workers' autonomy" came from a few large factories in the north and from workers' committees in the service industries in Rome, the movement increasingly registered and expressed the political militancy of new proletarian sectors, especially in the peripheries of the metropolitan areas. The slogans and language of operaism were rearticulated in the new situation and hybridized on the one hand with older political traditions (such as workers' councils), and on the other with the emerging experiences of feminism, environmentalism, and counterculture. The emphasis on organization, "counterpower," and the spread of proletarian violence against the state and capital, which were the defining components of the movement for some, was met by an emphasis on creativity, micropolitics, and the rediscovery of "situationism," which were the defining components for others. The uprising of 1977 in Italy (particularly in Bologna and in Rome) was the culminating moment of the growth of the autonomous movement: in a way it can be retrospectively considered as the embryonic emergence of a new social composition of labor and as the announcement of many of the issues that have been crucial in the development of post-operaism in recent years. That year was also shaped by a dramatic clash between the autonomous movement and the Communist Party: after 1977, in a situation increasingly characterized by the military actions of the Red Brigades and other leftist armed organizations, the Communist Party played a key role in the criminalization of the autonomous movement and in the organization of repression against its militants and intellectuals.

From a theoretical point of view, the development of Italian revolutionary operaism in the 1970s was intertwined with the history of political and social struggles briefly sketched above. A first element can be identified in an attempt to reconstruct the international dimension of the cycle of struggles of the mass worker. This attempt led to an intensive study of the history of class struggles in the US, particularly focused on the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) and on such experiences as "facing reality" in the 1950s, as well as to an investigation of workers' struggles in the 1960s and the early 1970s in Western Europe. Operai e stato (Workers and State), a collectively authored book published in 1972 that can be considered an important move in this direction, introduces a second important theoretical element, which is the role and changing shape of the state in capitalism. Particularly important in this regard is the work of Antonio Negri and Luciano Ferrari Bravo: the definition of the "plan state," which has already been mentioned, was elaborated on the basis of two essays included in Operai e stato, one devoted to Keynes by Negri and the other discussing the New Deal in the US by Ferrari Bravo. In subsequent years, the struggles of the mass worker were recognized as the crucial element that produced the crisis of the "plan state": while politically the operaists within the autonomous movement thought it necessary and possible to deepen the disarticulation of the form of the state through a mixture of sabotage and social struggles for "indirect wages" (that is, for the increase of the state's public expense), the analysis of the crisis of the "plan state" led to the proposed concept of the "crisis state," which anticipated many debates on the crisis of the welfare state. A third crucial theoretical element in the 1970s was the militant investigation into the incipient forms of capitalistic restructuring as a response to mass workers' struggles. At least since 1973, many collective investigations and analysis have stressed the fact that capital itself was compelled by the intensity of these struggles to invent new forms of production and new modalities of intertwining between production, circulation, and reproduction. Such concepts as the "diffused factory" have tried to grasp these emerging new capitalistic forms, while the concept of the "social worker" was proposed in order to identify the class composition that could politically anticipate capital's attempt to reaffirm its command over the whole of society.

What is currently referred to as "post-operaism" began to emerge in the early 1990s. While in Italy a new students' movement (1990–1) and the consolidation of the social centers (Centri Sociali) movement opened up new possibilities for radical political action and thinking, two journals were launched that contributed to a critical examination and renewal of the legacy of operaism: the first, Luogo Comune (Common Place), was started in Rome by Paolo Virno and others; the second, Futur Antérieur (Future Anterior), was started in Paris by Antonio Negri, other Italian political expatriates, and French intellectuals such as Jean-Marie Vincent. Both journals initiated a debate on “post-Fordism” that tried to read many of the characters and the rhetoric itself of the new “flexible” organization of capitalism against the grain. The following years witnessed several developments: a new reading of Marx’s concept of “general intellect” was proposed in order to stress the role of knowledge and language in the composition of labor dominated and exploited by capital; a lively discussion focused on the concept of “immaterial labor”; the emphasis on the mobility of labor led some post-operaist theorists to propose a theory of the “autonomy of migration”; and the concept of the multitude, originally developed by Negri in his reading of Spinoza, was further elaborated in order to grasp the “technical” heterogeneity of the composition of labor and to propose a form of political organization beyond the tradition of the labor movement.

Since 1999, post-operaist concepts and theories have deeply influenced discussions within the alter-globalization movement. They have been sharply criticized by some leftist intellectuals and activists, while others have enthusiastically appropriated them. Through the publication of Empire by Hardt and Negri (2000), operaism and post-operaism have become “traveling theories,” an essential part of the global critical discussion within social movements and of knowledge production within and outside the academy.

Italy, peasant movements, 19th–20th centuries

Max Henninger

The pre-capitalist subsistence agriculture of traditional peasant societies was largely eliminated in Italy within the first decades of the nineteenth century. At Italian unification, small property in land and sharecropping (mezzadria) were to be found in Piedmont, Lombardy-Veneto, the Papal States, and Tuscany; the latifundia of Latium, Naples, and Sicily employed landless agricultural workers (braccianti). Closer in some ways to urban proletarians than to traditional peasants with their family-based subsistence economy, the braccianti gradually became modern Italy’s typical agricultural workers, and the driving force behind much rural unrest. By the turn of the century the agricultural strike had largely replaced tax boycotts and food riots as the dominant form of collective action in rural areas.

The years 1845–7 brought poor harvests and high bread prices. As food riots erupted in most cities, peasant bands outside Milan attacked grain convoys. Land was occupied throughout Italy, as would be done repeatedly during the next two decades (notably in Calabria between 1850 and 1853). The occupiers typically demanded the redistribution of lands formerly held in common. Other practices observed in rural areas during the 1848 revolutions included the destruction of tax and land records and the burning of private woods. Sicily was the heartland of rural unrest during the 1850s; hostility was often directed at the gabellotti (estate administrators employed by landlords). A rural food riot occurred in Arona (Lombardy) in 1853. An April 1860 insurrection in Palermo prompted tax boycotts and attacks on mills in the countryside; the attacks on mills were a response to the imposition of a milling tax (macinato). In July 1860 the restoration of enclosed commons was demanded at assemblies in Matera. Landlords were successfully pressured to redistribute land.

Millenarian peasant movements were active during the 1870s, notably the movement of Davide Lazzaretti in Tuscany. Yet most rural unrest during the period was of a secular nature. Braccianti organized agricultural strikes in Lombardy in 1875. Similar strikes occurred in the Po Valley during the 1880s, usually within the context of industrial conflicts. An 1884 organizational effort by Mantovano peasants, the founding of the Mutual Aid Society of Peasants, was responded to with mass arrests by the authorities, although the peasants' resources were sufficient for staging, in April 1885, a major strike that spread to the Milan and Cremona provinces (La Boje revolt). Romagna rice workers went on strike in 1888 and 1889. In 1890 rice workers in Conselice (Ravenna province) marched to the local municipal building alongside unemployed braccianti; three demonstrators were shot.

The 1890s brought numerous agricultural strikes, tax boycotts, and land occupations, mainly in Sicily. In 1893 several hundred peasants took to hoeing formerly common land near Catavuturo, prompting repression that left 11 dead. The massacre led many braccianti to join the Sicilian fasci, autonomous political organizations with a republican and socialist program. Fasci were founded in several Sicilian cities in the early 1890s; agitation against Sicily's landowners was common during their demonstrations. A regional congress of Sicilian fasci was held in Palermo in May 1893. By 1894 the fasci had largely been crushed by police repression. Popular unrest continued during the rest of the decade, partly due to the rise in bread prices that followed the poor grain harvest of 1897. The Sicilian food riots of 1897 spread to central Italy in 1898.

The period between 1900 and the outbreak of World War I was one of major agricultural strikes in various parts of Italy: in Apulia and Sardinia between 1901 and 1906, in Parma province in 1908, and in the Po Valley between 1910 and 1913. The period from 1919 to 1921 brought a wave of land occupations in southern Italy, but also in Latium in central Italy. They occurred against a backdrop of general working-class restiveness. Peasant demonstrations and strikes returned with a vengeance after World War II, particularly in southern Italy from 1949 to 1950. In March 1950 some 10,000 to 12,000 braccianti squatters seized uncultivated land outside Messina, in Sicily. Raniero Panzieri, soon to become an influential theorist of the operaista current of Marxism, participated in the squat and helped create a consensus, within the left, that land reform was essential.

The population of the barbagia in central Sardinia are a case unto themselves. They constitute a genuine peasant society, excepting those living as semi-nomadic shepherds. Sardinia's peasants have cultivated a subsistence economy based on communal land ownership and periodic repartition of land until well into the twentieth century. The nineteenth-century Sardinian resistance to enclosure took the form of land invasions, organized attacks on landowners, and storming of municipal offices (with subsequent burning of property and tax records). As "primitive rebels," Sardinian peasants in the barbagia also engaged in banditry (banditismo) throughout the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. The practice peaked in the late nineteenth century, but resurged in the 1960s. Armed confrontations between barbagia inhabitants and the police were common during the mid-1960s. In 1969 attempts to convert the town of Orgosolo's commons, the pratobello, into a military training ground led to the commons being squatted, with support from the student left. At the time, Milan-based Marxist Giangiacomo Feltrinelli believed the barbagia bandits might form a guerrilla army akin to those active in Latin America.

Italy, 17th-century revolts in the south

Nicole Martone and Eric Martone

During the early modern period, the Italian peninsula remained divided and experienced frequent invasions from various foreign powers, which exercised control over parts of the peninsula. Often, such foreign occupation was met with fierce resistance by the Italian people, resulting in numerous insurrections in the pursuit of freedom. Furthermore, while the northern Italian peninsula remained, for the most part, independent of foreign domination and emerged as a cultural center during the Renaissance, the southern Italian peninsula was exploited by foreign powers. The result was sharp social divisions and uneven development among the peoples of Italy.

In the seventeenth century, the southern Italian regions of Sicily and Naples remained under foreign occupation by Spain. Spain, which had territories throughout Europe, was engaged in frequent wars during the seventeenth century, including the Thirty Years’ War (1618–48), and war with the Netherlands (1621–48) and France (1635–59). In order to finance these wars, Spain increased taxation and borrowing, placing an enormous burden on its territories. This pressing burden, when exacerbated by other facts (such as poor harvests), led to several rebellions in southern Italy.

Sicily, which usually was a grain exporter, had a poor harvest in 1647 that resulted in massive inflation in the cost of bread. Food riots broke out in May in Palermo, the island’s largest city, focusing popular discontent on the local elites who continued to have food despite the increase in prices. Giuseppe d’Alesio, an advocate of civic republicanism, emerged as the leader of the protesters. The Spanish viceroy, lacking the forces necessary to suppress the rebellion, turned Palermo over to d’Alesio; however, once in control, the rebels soon turned on each other, resulting in d’Alesio’s murder. Property owners, fearful for their land, rallied to support the Spanish viceroy in an attempt to restore order. The rebellion was suppressed by September 1647.

In July of 1647, a rebellion also broke out in Naples. The Spanish had relied on the Neapolitan nobility to maintain control over Naples; however, the local nobility abused its privileges and manipulated the judicial system to its benefit. Popular dissatisfaction with the rule of the landowning aristocracy and perceived injustices on the part of government exacerbated existing tensions. Finally, in July, a new tax on the sale of fruit sparked massive resistance. Rebels protested against existing conditions, assaulting tax collectors, nobles, and other figures symbolic of oppression. The Spanish garrison was also attacked. The first leader of the rebellion was Tommaso Aniello (ca. 1622–47), a fishmonger who became known by his nickname “Masaniello.” Shortly after the seizure of the Spanish garrison, Masaniello was murdered.

The rebellion spread to the countryside. As it spread, the rebels became more brazen in their demands, calling for the abolition of taxation and reforms to the administration to reduce the political power of the nobility. The rebels, under the leadership of Gennaro Annese, a blacksmith, proclaimed Naples a republic. In an effort to secure French aid against the Spanish, the rebels cited the Duke of Guise as the new head of the republic. In October, Spain sent a fleet of ships to restore order. The rebels’ petition for French aid was in vain. Finally, in April 1648, Spain appointed a new viceroy and sent troops. The rebels returned control of the Spanish garrison upon promises to remove taxes on food and to grant amnesty to all the rebels. Shortly thereafter, the Neapolitan nobles resumed control over local administration. Following the rebellion, Spain was wary of imposing new taxes, leaving Naples deprived of the revenues necessary to maintain its administration. The economic crisis in Naples continued to deteriorate after the reoccurrence of the plague in 1656.

In 1674, Sicily witnessed yet another rebellion. A group of unsatisfied oligarchs in Messina rebelled against Spain by appealing to France for aid against the popular party, Merli, a coalition encouraged by Spain to undermine the influence of the local elites. France initially sent assistance, only to abruptly rescind its support in 1678, leaving the rebels to face severe reprisals from the Spanish.

With the end of Spanish domination, southern Italy emerged as an intellectual center. A separate branch of the French royal family, the Bourbons, became rulers of Spain. Enlightenment ideas from France spread to Italy, gradually introducing political reforms. The new spirit of the age led many members of the upper middle class to inquire about society and the natural order, paving the way for the entrance of the French Revolution and the changes it would cause to the Italian peninsula.

Itō Noe (1895–1923)

David G. Nelson

Born to a family of landed aristocracy on the southern island of Kyushu, Itō Noe would be forced into an arranged marriage after graduating from Ueno Girls High School. In protest she ran away to Tokyo where she would become a feminist anarchist seeking to break with the social conditions of Japan. In Tokyo she joined the Seitoshu (Blue Stocking Society) and in 1915 became an editor of its magazine, Seito (Blue Stocking). This gave Itō the opportunity to develop her literary, aesthetic, and political capabilities. Skilled in several languages, including English, she translated articles by the anarchist Emma Goldman.

In 1916 Itō met Ōsugi Sakae, a prominent anarchist, and abandoned the journal to assist Ōsugi with his writings and political activism. As a couple, Itō and Ōsugi believed in the concepts of free love, which allowed Ōsugi to conduct an affair with fellow woman anarchist Ichiko Kamachiko. However, the concepts of free love soon collided with human nature as Kamachika stabbed and severely wounded Ōsugi with a knife in a fit of jealousy. The mass media used this incident to attack Itō, Ōsugi, and Kamachika for their immorality and the anarchist movement in general. Because of this bad publicity, several prominent members of the anarchist movement split from Itō and Ōsugi.

In 1919 Itō and Ōsugi, along with fellow anarchists Wada Kyutaro and Kondo Kenji, published the first Rodo Undo (Labor Movement) magazine, seeking to form a coalition between the anarchist movement and the industrial working class. In 1921 Itō was also instrumental in the helping to form Japan's first socialist women's group, Sekirankai (Red Wave Society). Believing that this couple was a threat to domestic tranquility, the Imperial Police kept them under constant surveillance. In the aftermath of the 1923 Tokyo earthquake many fires broke out and more people were killed by these than by the quake. Soon after, may rumors, perhaps encouraged by the authorities, began to spread that various "unpopular" anarchist groups were responsible for starting fires. As a result, mobs attacked many immigrant Korean and Chinese workers, and the police began gathering and arresting several political activists, among them Itō and Ōsugi. They were taken into custody and were beaten and strangled in the cells of the secret police. For a long time, Ōsugi had been number one on a death list circulated by the secret police, so when a secret policeman, Amakasu Masahiko, was later found guilty of the murder, on orders from Emperor Hirohito, there was little surprise. Amakasu was given a ten-year prison sentence and was later released by personal order of Hirohito and assigned to special duties in Manchuria. In 1945 he committed suicide before his crimes could be avenged by the many anarchists after his blood.

British activist Bertrand Russell would recall, in his autobiography, the first time he met Itō Noe in Japan in 1921. “She was young and beautiful . . . Dora [Bertrand Russell’s wife] said to her: ‘Are you not afraid that the authorities will do something to you?’ She drew her hand across her throat, and said, ‘I know they will sooner or later.’”

Jabotinsky, Vladimir (Ze'ev) (1880–1940) and revisionist Zionism

Lawrence Davidson

Vladimir Jabotinsky was born in Odessa, Russia, on October 18, 1880 into a middle-class family with an intellectual and internationalist outlook. He had a secular education and, while still in high school, developed an interest in journalism. Following graduation he got a job as the European correspondent for several Russian newspapers and traveled in that capacity to Bern in Switzerland and Rome in Italy. While in Rome he also took up the study of law.

Jabotinsky was pushed toward the ideology of Zionism, as well as the need for organized self-defense throughout the diaspora, by the 1903 pogrom against the Jews of Kishinev in Russia. He took it upon himself to organize armed self-defense units in the Jewish communities of Russia, while encouraging as many Jews as possible to immigrate to Palestine. It was also at this time that he taught himself modern Hebrew and took on the Hebrew name of Ze'ev (wolf).

When World War I broke out, and the Ottoman empire joined the struggle on the side of the Central Powers, Jabotinsky sensed that this was a historical moment that might lead to a Jewish Palestine. Thus, he urged the World Zionist Organization (WZO) to ally with the British empire and form a Jewish Legion to fight alongside the British forces moving into Palestine. He was somewhat successful, as the British did eventually create a small number of Jewish units. Jabotinsky enlisted in this effort, rose to the rank of lieutenant, and saw combat in Palestine.

After World War I, Jabotinsky became increasingly impatient with the gradualist approach of the WZO leadership. He wanted an immediate declaration of a Jewish state and the preparation for war, if necessary, to achieve this end. He repeated his efforts at organizing military units, but this time among the Jewish communities in Palestine. Many of these engaged in spiraling acts of violence with the Arab resistance that developed to both British postwar occupation and Zionist immigration.

In 1925 Jabotinsky broke with the WZO and formed his own political organization, the Union of Zionists-Revisionists, which called for the immediate establishment of a Jewish state in all of historical Palestine, including what is now Jordan. To this organization he appended two others, the youth movement Betar, which he had established in 1923 to inculcate Jewish youth with a nationalistic and military spirit, and later, in 1937, the Irgun Tzvai Leumi, the military arm of the revisionist movement. The Irgun was destined to fight against both the British and Arabs in Palestine and would use terror tactics in doing so.

As World War II approached, Jabotinsky took it upon himself to tour Eastern Europe to warn the Jews, particularly those in Poland, that they faced approaching disaster. In this he was quite prescient. He even drew up plans for the evacuation of all Jews from Poland, the Ukraine, Hungary, and Romania to Palestine, and negotiated with these governments to this end. The British, who controlled Palestine, vetoed the plan.

Jabotinsky assumed that a Jewish state in Palestine would necessitate a war with the Arabs. Yet once the war was won and the state established, he stated that he was quite willing to see the Arabs living in the Jewish state “participate on an equal footing throughout all sectors of the country’s public life.” Jabotinsky died of a heart attack while visiting a Betar youth camp in New York in 1940. His revisionist movement did not achieve power in Israel until the electoral victory of Menachem Begin’s Likud Party (a successor of the revisionist movement) in 1977.

Jackson, Jesse (b. 1941)

Yusuf Nuruddin

Born on October 4, 1941, Jesse Jackson was a leading US civil rights activist and leader, human rights sponsor, international mediator, and populist presidential candidate from the 1960s to the early twenty-first century. Jackson, a controversial and charismatic figure, rose from humble origins to become the most influential African American civil rights leader in the post-Martin Luther King era.

Jesse Louis Jackson was born Jesse Louis Burns in Greenville, South Carolina, to Helen Burns, a 16-year-old impoverished, unwed mother. His biological father, Noah Robinson, was Burns's next-door neighbor, a married middle-class black man. His mother later married Charles Jackson, who eventually legally adopted Jesse, but he was actually raised by his maternal grandmother.

Jackson initially attended the University of Illinois on a football scholarship (1959) but transferred the following year to North Carolina A&T, where he met his future wife, Jacqueline, whose enthusiastic talk of Fidel Castro and the Cuban Revolution unnerved the somewhat conservative Jackson. She would challenge Jackson's political beliefs throughout their courtship and married life, constantly radicalizing him, pushing him in later life, for example, to meet with PLO representative Yasser Arafat and Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan. Other motivating influences in his life included the college classmates who drafted the cautiously apolitical Jackson to be a spokesperson for sit-in demonstrations in Greensboro, North Carolina. This was his initial foray into the activism that was to be his life's calling.

Earning a bachelor's degree in 1964, Jackson attended Chicago Theological Seminary from 1964 to 1966, but he ended up dropping out for full-time work in the civil rights movement after participating in the 1965 Selma to Montgomery march with King. He was ordained as a minister without a theological degree in 1968, receiving an honorary doctorate from the Seminary in 2000. In 1966, King selected Jackson to head the Chicago office of Operation Breadbasket – the economic development program of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) – and promoted him to national director of this program in 1967. A major focus of Operation Breadbasket was a “selective buying” campaign, which included the boycotting of businesses that did not hire minorities or purchase from minority vendors.

On April 4, 1968, Jackson was with the coterie of SCLC leaders at the Lorraine Hotel in Memphis when King was assassinated. Jackson attempted to inherit King's mantle of leadership, clashing with the low-key Ralph Abernathy, who had been King's second in command in the SCLC. Their dispute was irreconcilable. Jackson resigned under pressure from Operation Breadbasket and in 1971 founded a similar organization, People United to Save Humanity (Operation PUSH). PUSH became involved in economic empowerment through the development of the black bourgeoisie and employment of black workers while promoting educational achievement for urban youth through a program called PUSH/Excel.

In the 1980s, Jackson entered the arena of electoral politics, first locally and then nationally. He organized 100,000 new voters during a 1983 Chicago voter registration campaign, thereby ensuring the victory of Harold Washington as the city's first black mayor. During the same year, he was encouraged to seek the highest national office himself, and the slogan “run, Jesse, run” became a chorus in the black community. His first international diplomatic intervention, a trip to Syria resulting in the release of a captured black American pilot, gave his 1984 presidential campaign an enormous boost, but this was counterbalanced by his anti-Semitic remark that New York City was “Hymietown,” which cost him the Jewish vote and the loss of the New York Democratic primary.

His candidacy broke racial barriers and resonated among the many marginalized, powerless, disenfranchised, and left-of-center groups. Jackson, who in his former capacity as director of Operations PUSH and Breadbasket was an advocate of black capitalism, was influenced by the policy advisors of his various constituencies – militant trade unionists, feminists, gay rights activists, farmers’ groups, peace and anti-nuclear activists – to adopt a radical social democratic platform. He garnered 80 to 90 percent of the nationwide black vote – despite the lack of support from black establishment politicians – and won convincing victories in Louisiana, Virginia, and the District of Columbia, and second place showings in Arkansas, Mississippi, and South Carolina. All in all, he yielded over three million votes and 384 delegates.

Organizing his dispossessed supporters into a Rainbow Coalition, Jackson ran again in 1988, this time with an even more impressive showing. Winning five states on Super Tuesday, and temporarily toppling Michael Dukakis, the Democratic front-runner in Michigan, Jackson ultimately gained some seven million votes and won 1,200 convention delegates, to come in second after Dukakis in the Democratic primaries.

Jackson’s post-presidential election activities have included international mediation in hostage crises, leadership in the anti-war and anti-apartheid movements, and election to a non-salaried post in Washington, DC to lobby Congress for the right of the District of Columbia to elect a senator.

Jacobite risings, Britain, 1715 and 1745

Kieran German

The Jacobite risings of 1715 and 1745 were major uprisings that seriously challenged the Hanoverian regime in Great Britain. Their aim was the restoration of the royal House of Stuart to the thrones of England, Ireland, and Scotland. As well as immediate Irish and Scottish resistance to the “Glorious” Revolution, other Jacobite attempts occurred in 1708 and 1719, although these were relatively unconvincing. Jacobitism sustained itself as an ideological movement in Britain until the death of Charles Edward Stuart (aka Charles III, aka the Young Pretender) in 1788. As a militant movement it remained a sporadic cause in England until 1716, but in Scotland motive and organization sustained it into the late 1720s, and it resurfaced again in 1745. While Jacobitism represented a dynastic alternative to the monarchies of William III & II, Queen Anne, and subsequently the House of Hanover, it became a vehicle for other causes, which included confessional disenchantment, the movement for Scottish parliamentary independence, and the private fortunes of out-of-favor politicians. Jacobitism was also a powerful tool in European statecraft, and the Jacobite cause was occasionally adopted as an expedience by rivals to Britain.

The Jacobite rising of 1715 (the ’15) was a major domestic uprising which tested the stability of the Hanoverian government of the United Kingdom. Upon ascending the throne in 1714, George I dismissed the Tory ministry and formed a new government of Whigs. With monarchical backing, the Whigs also won the election of 1715, thus achieving a monopoly of power. Leading Tories, most notably James Butler, 2nd Duke of Ormond, Henry St. John, Viscount Bolingbroke, and John Erskine, 6th Earl of Mar, became convinced that the revival of their fortunes could only be achieved by restoring the Stuarts. Foreign intervention was courted to coincide with uprising in the West of England. The Jacobite leadership also had high expectations that Catholics in the North of the country would contribute significantly and that the Scots would too. However, the chief Jacobite conspirator, Bolingbroke, entered exile when the Whig ministry launched impeachment proceedings against him and his Tory ministerial colleagues. Ormond likewise fled, abandoning the rising in western England, which subsequently floundered.

The English Jacobites, mindful of the strong personal relationship between James II & VII and Louis XIV, had high expectations of French support. In reality, the only Jacobite at the French court with any significant status was James Fitzjames, Duke of Berwick; James Francis Edward Stuart (James III & VIII, aka the Old Pretender) was resident in Lorraine, having been sidelined by the Treaty of Utrecht (1711), which had concluded the War of the Spanish Succession. The French government was not prepared openly to breach the treaty and reopen hostilities. Nevertheless, Louis and his government saw advantage in the Jacobite crisis hitting Britain and, intent upon benefiting whatever the outcome, provided surreptitious support for James. Spain provided financial support and, while interested, Sweden was too embroiled in the Great Northern War to provide assistance.

In the end it was the Scottish Jacobites who formed the brunt of the Jacobite army. Opposition to the Anglo-Scottish Union of 1707 was a major contributory factor. The uprising was run on a mandate that a Scottish parliament would be called by the restored James VIII.

Scots Episcopacy also provided an important Jacobite motive. The Episcopal Church was institutionally Jacobite, on account of which it had been disestablished in 1689 and subjected to penal laws. The Union of 1707 reasserted the Presbyterian Church government in Scotland, but Scots Episcopacy had persevered as an ideological force in the North of Scotland and engaged in Jacobite activity with the clear aims of a Stuart restoration, reestablishment of the Episcopate, and the dissolution of the Union. Indeed, Episcopalian regions were the most significant areas of Jacobite recruitment in the '15.

The rising in Scotland was led by John Erskine, 6th Earl of Mar. Like his English colleagues, Mar was a former Tory secretary of state facing Whig charges of ministerial misconduct. Without an official commission from the Jacobite court, he succeeded in convincing influential Highland clan leaders and Lowland nobility and heritors to raise their men. With little resistance, the Jacobites took control of a string of northeast coastal towns and based their army at Perth. In Aberdeen they proved competent in assuming and administering local government. But they failed to hold Inverness and were unable to take control of Edinburgh, Glasgow, or Stirling. Thus Mar, an experienced politician but no military general, failed to consolidate his advantage in Scotland. John Campbell, 2nd Duke of Argyll, the commander-in-chief of government forces in Scotland, was a veteran of Marlborough's campaigns in the Low Countries. He skillfully and repeatedly outmaneuvered his hesitant opponent. Argyll's force sustained significant casualties at the Battle of Sheriffmuir (November 13, 1715), but lost no ground to Mar's larger, albeit disorganized, army.

In England the insurrection failed to materialize except in the North, where it was energized by the Catholic community. Though relatively organized, they had to be reinforced by a force of Scots, led by William Mackintosh of Borlum. They were cornered in Preston on the same day as Sheriffmuir, and, rather than take the fight to the government, they surrendered (to the fury of their Scottish comrades). By the time James arrived in the North of Scotland in December of 1715 the war was lost.

The Jacobite armies which fought at Sheriffmuir and Preston together numbered 14,000 Scots and 1,000 English. Considering army turnover, it is more likely that the Scots serving, at one point or another, in the Jacobite army actually reached as high as 20,000. This number is considerable; the ceiling of Scottish recruitment in the eighteenth century is estimated to have been 25,000. The size of the army compared favorably with the Scottish Jacobite army of 1690, which numbered between 2,000 and 5,000.

While historiographical tradition has painted a different picture, less than half of the Scots Jacobite recruits were Highlanders. The majority came from the Scottish Lowlands, particularly the Northeast, and a significant number were from urban areas. The government army was augmented by up to 6,000 Dutch and Swiss mercenaries. Nevertheless, in total, 10,000 Scots served in the government army.

Following the failure of the uprising, the government trod a path of authority and clemency. Transportation was the preferred means of punishment; by and large, capital punishment was exemplary. The government provoked anger among the Scottish establishment by attempting to try Scottish prisoners by English law. Mass forfeiture of property was initiated, which the well-affected Scottish establishment sought (and often succeeded) to frustrate. Thus, the property and livelihood of many Scottish Jacobites were preserved in a manner which placed a burden of honor on individual Jacobites to their patrons. It has been argued that this, rather than the government's policies, harnessed Scottish Jacobitism for a generation.

The historical and cultural legacy of the '45 is far greater than that of the '15. However, as an uprising, it was of a smaller scale and its imperatives were less explicit. By the 1730s the putative Jacobite generals in exile had actively begun to campaign against the movement as a military endeavor. A French-sponsored invasion of Britain in 1744 miscarried. Nevertheless, on his own initiative, in 1745 the Jacobite Prince of Wales, Charles Edward Stuart, arrived on the northwest coast of Scotland without an army, with little money, and with false promises of foreign support. He slowly generated an army and went on to record extraordinary success in Scotland, defeating the government army at Prestonpans and assuming control of Edinburgh and, effectively, the administration of Scotland.

Rather than press its advantage in Scotland, the Jacobite army marched towards London in the winter of 1745/6. It failed to pick up further recruits in England and suffered mass desertion. Charles lost the confidence of his council of war and, despite the proximity of London, the Jacobites turned back at Derby. The army retreated deep into Northern Scotland. Outside Inverness on April 16, 1746, the government army finally caught up with the Jacobites and overwhelmingly defeated them at the Battle of Culloden. The Jacobite failure was brought about by the collapse of its leadership, and in particular the exclusion of General Lord George Murray from key decisions. Though some troops mustered at Ruthven in the aftermath, Charles lost heart, disbanded the army, and fled.

In 1745/6 the Jacobites mustered the support of fewer Highland clans than in 1715. At the most, they raised 12,000 men and never numbered more than 9,000 at once, a significant drop compared to 1715. Recruitment to the Jacobite army relied heavily on both the Highlands and the Northeast Lowlands of Scotland. Lowlanders may have outnumbered Highlanders in recruits, but clansmen formed the majority of actual fighting forces. At the Battle of Culloden, 67 percent of the Jacobite army was Highland.

The popular image of the '45 as a Highland endeavor can be undercut. First, Highland clans had gravitated toward military neutrality by 1745 and, in the case of the Black Watch Regiment, support went to the highest bidder. More cynically, impressment, into both government and Jacobite armies, was also recorded among the Highland clans. On the contrary, impressment was notoriously difficult to achieve in the Lowlands, especially the towns; thus, the Jacobite success there reflects voluntary enlistment.

The association between Episcopacy and Jacobite recruitment testifies, again, that the continuing loyalty of Scots Episcopalians to the Stuarts remained compelling. So, too, does the fallout: meeting houses across the Episcopalian heartlands were systematically razed to the ground in the aftermath of the uprising and strict penal laws were instituted to disrupt their services and eventually render the diminution of the church. It was not until the death of Charles Edward, in 1788, that the Episcopal Church was able to reconcile itself to Hanoverian monarchy and initiate a process of recovery.

The response of the British government to the Jacobite rising was considerably less clement than after the '15 and the clans found themselves on the frontline. Government policy in the aftermath of the battle was disproportionate to the threat. Massacre extended beyond the battlefield, has been described as "state terrorism" on the brink of "ethnic cleansing," and was designed to wipe out Jacobite sensibility once and for all (Macinnes 1996: 211). In the rout, the distinction between Jacobite clansman and loyal Highlander was not made. Propaganda, which served as justification for the atrocities, conflated Scottish and Highland culture with barbarism, irrespective of actual Jacobite commitment. That notwithstanding, the government pursued both military and legislative means to assume the loyalty and duty of clansmen in the aftermath of the '45 and integrate the valuable manpower of clanship into the British imperial project.

Jagan, Cheddi (1918–1997)

Perry Mars

Cheddi Jagan was a revolutionary in the Guyanese anti-colonial movement, primary opponent of imperialism, and advocate of social equality who helped guide the country to independence. Born and raised on a sugar plantation in Port Maurant, Guyana, Jagan was admitted at the age of 15 to Queens College, the most prestigious secondary educational institution in Guyana at the time. Upon completion of high school Jagan left for the United States to study dentistry, first at Howard University in Washington, DC, and subsequently at Northwestern University in Chicago. During Jagan's studies in the US, he was attracted to Marxism and socialism. There also he met his wife Janet, whose own leftist political orientation reinforced his radical beliefs and commitment.

Jagan, along with his new wife, returned to Guyana upon graduating in dentistry, and plunged directly into the national political arena. He won a seat in the Guyana parliament in 1947. The Enmore Riots of 1948, when striking sugar workers on a plantation were shot and killed by the colonial police, propelled Jagan to a lifelong commitment to revolutionary struggle for the total emancipation and elevation of the Guyanese working classes.

By 1946, Cheddi and Janet Jagan, along with several Guyanese professionals and intellectuals (including Ashton Chase and Jocelyn Hubbard), formed a pro-Marxist political pressure group called the Political Affairs Committee (PAC), an embryonic organization that in 1950 formed the basis of the People's Progressive Party (PPP) with a more radical mass-based political agenda. In 1953, the PPP under Jagan won the first national election under universal suffrage by a landslide. However, this victory was shortlived as the British swiftly suspended the new constitution, dismissing from office what they perceived as a communist government in their colony, incarcerating PPP leaders including Cheddi and Janet Jagan, and by 1955 engineering an ideological-racial split in the party.

Consequent political and ethnic conflicts violently manifested themselves from 1962 and 1964, involving British military and US (CIA) covert interventions. The result was a legacy of seemingly irreparable racial-ethnic polarization along partisan political lines, with East Indians overwhelmingly supporting Jagan's PPP, and Afro-Guyanese adhering to the rival People's National Congress (PNC) headed by Forbes Burnham. Jagan's party was eventually defeated at the polls in 1964 conducted under the newly introduced proportional representation (PR) system, leading a rival coalition led by the PNC into power. The 1964 electoral defeat relegated Jagan and PPP into political oblivion for 28 years, since national elections were rigged in favor of the PNC between 1968 and 1992.

During this "wilderness" period Jagan worked closely with other opposition forces, particularly the Working People's Alliance (WPA) and Patriotic Coalition for Democracy (PCD), with the objective of restoring free and fair elections in Guyana. In 1992, as collective opposition to one-party rule mounted with the support of high-profile US and foreign appeals, internationally supervised elections were held, and Jagan and the PPP were returned to power.

However, almost immediately, Jagan and the PPP were forced to embrace neoliberal reforms to ensure US and western support, leading to a significant ideological shift of the party toward the political right. Jagan adopted International Monetary Fund economic strategies inherited from the previous administration, diluting his working-class base. In addition, Jagan could not stem the rising trend of East Indian ethnic dominance within the party, which gained momentum particularly since the elections.

Yet Cheddi Jagan retained a revolutionary rhetoric and stance, reflected in his indefatigable opposition to colonialism, imperialism, and economic inequality, his unwavering support for poor and working-class people and causes, his commitment to the political sensitization of the labor movement, and his internationalism reflected in his consistent support for Cuba and the Soviet Union during the height of the Cold War. Just before his death in March 1997, Cheddi Jagan, in keeping with his concern for the human condition, crafted a very sensitive conceptualization of what he termed the “New Global Human Order” to promote the alleviation of poverty and human suffering throughout the world.

Jalib, Habib (1928–1993)

Farooq Sulehria

Known as the People’s Poet, Habib Jalib signifies struggle for democracy, socialism, secularism, peace, and human and women’s rights in Pakistan. Born in 1928 at Miani, an Afghan village in Hoshiarpur district, Punjab (now in India), Jalib witnessed extreme poverty as his father, a shoemaker, was hardly able to make ends meet. His parents, however, were ambitious regarding the education of their children. In 1943 the family moved to Delhi, which for centuries has been the political and cultural center of the Indian subcontinent. Young Jalib was greatly influenced by Delhi’s literary atmosphere through his elder brother Mushtaq Mubarak. In Delhi Jalib’s father managed to establish himself as a small trader, and the family experienced relative prosperity. This financial comfort proved short-lived, however, as the partition of India in 1947 forced his family to migrate to Karachi, ushering in another period of extreme poverty.

At the age of 20 Jalib often frequented Mushairas (public poetry recitations) and soon established himself as a poet of some repute. In 1952 he became active in the peasant movement in Sindh province, led by charismatic peasant leader Comrade Haider Bux Jatui, and joined the secular left-wing National Awami Party (NAP). Formed in the 1950s, the NAP absorbed members of the Communist Party of Pakistan (CPP), which was banned in 1954. For a brief period, Jalib worked as proofreader at Dawn, a leading English daily in Pakistan, and the daily Jang, a widely circulated Urdu-language newspaper. He then moved to Faisalabad, a center of the textile industry in Pakistan, and started working at Koh-e-Noor Textile Mills.

Jalib soared to fame with his poem “Dastoor” (The Constitution), written in response to military dictator Ayub Khan’s foisting of a new anti-democratic constitution on the country in 1962; soon Jalib was reciting his poems at opposition rallies attended by thousands of people. Because of his popularity and defiant political stance, Jalib was arrested and his book of poetry, Sar-e-Maktal, was banned.

In 1970 Jalib ran as a candidate for the National Assembly with the NAP in the first nationwide general election in Pakistan since independence, but he lost to the Pakistan People’s Party (PPP) candidate. The PPP was committed to socialism, but its politics were at best social democratic and was committed foremost to Islam, while Jalib was a secular communist striving for revolution. In the end, all but one of the seats in East Pakistan went to the Awami League (AL), while the PPP retained control of the seats in West Pakistan (although not by the same large margin). AL control of the government was seen as a threat to the economic and political interests of the military, and so the convening of the new AL government was postponed with the help of Zulfikar Ali Bhutto. Jalib was arrested and sent to jail along with other NAP leaders when the Bhutto government dissolved the NAP governments in Balochistan and the North Western Frontier Provinces. He remained imprisoned for 14 months and was finally bailed out. With the imposition of the Zia ul Haq dictatorship in 1977 a new period of imprisonment, police torture, trumped-up charges, and harassment began for Jalib. As the democracy movement began to gather steam in 1984, Jalib once again held hundreds of thousands of people spellbound with his verses at opposition rallies, which got him arrested yet again. In total, he spent over seven years in various jails from 1952 to 1988.

With the restoration of democracy in 1988, Jalib had a relatively calm life for the first time. His passport, after 30 years of confiscation, was returned; he traveled to Moscow and European countries, but his health was failing. From 1991 he spent most of his time in hospitals and finally died on March 13, 1994.

Jalib never accepted a government award; he refused dozens of offers by various governments for economic help. He earned his living by reciting Mushairas, accepting meager book royalties, and composing songs for films. He remained banned on radio, television, and official Mushairas until 1988.

Jamaica, independence movement, 1950–present

Obika Gray

Despite significant shortcomings, radical social movements in post-independence Jamaica exerted enormous influence on the island's political evolution, occasionally directing it along paths more favorable to popular needs than power holders preferred. Dissident movements accomplished this by displaying creativity in fashioning a variety of ideological challenges to power, by producing a succession of political organizations, notable personalities, and anti-status quo groups with popular appeal, and by summoning poor Afro-Jamaicans and alienated middle-class intellectuals to a common agenda. For two decades – 1960 to 1980 – this broad social movement, with its protean ideological and diverse social composition, retained an unmatched unity in challenging the authority of the state, in impugning the legitimacy of its repressive power, and undermining the cultural bases for its moral claims.

Despite the enormity and duration of this influence, however, the Jamaican social movement's hold on the popular imagination, and its capacity to subvert authority on the basis of an alternative politics and competing moral claims, dissipated and even unraveled after 1980. Faced with the defeat of left-wing regimes at home and abroad, the imposition of a neoliberal economic agenda in the region, and disillusionment with the meager gains of radical politics, the dissident social movement collapsed. It was replaced by a fearsome, but sharply different, kind of challenge to power holders – resort to nihilistic social and interpersonal violence, often led by drug and criminal gangs newly freed of political influence.

Horizontal, self-immolating violence among the alienated urban poor, and criminal gangs' predation and search for booty, displaced the ideologically driven opposition of earlier political formations. Nihilism and self-criminalization by sections of the Afro-Jamaican urban poor now became the mutant form of dissidence after 1980. In it criminal violence replaced the moral authority of traditional post-independence social movements. This displacement of ideologically motivated social movements by interpersonal and gang-related forms of violence after the 1980s had massive political consequences. That is, by exposing the Jamaican state's inability to rein in criminal violence and punish perpetrators, the agents of this kind of "protest crime" showed that they too were political actors, stirring public disaffection and increasing disgust with the seeming failure of the Jamaican state to exercise its most basic functions. Despite these calamities and a raging violence that claimed hundreds of lives each year, hesitant state-led reforms and newer, collective forms of dissent highlighted the emergence of a new consensus, this time around the twin goals of effective governance and citizen engagement.

Sources of Discontent

In a remarkable development, Jamaica's peaceful achievement of political independence in August 1962 brought with it neither social unity nor political stability. On the contrary, political independence produced social tensions, upheaval, and instability. Indeed, the occasion of the island's independence threatened both the viability of the newly won independent state and the authority of the nationalist leaders who claimed the granting of independence as their greatest achievement. There were several reasons for this dissatisfaction.

Firstly, the postwar boom in the global economy produced uneven effects on the island. On the one hand, foreign direct investment in the island's bauxite industry and in the service sector – particularly tourism, banking and finance, and manufacturing – generated significant economic growth in the 1950s. Capital-owning groups, the local middle class, and unionized workers in the manufacturing, services, and mineral sectors, enjoyed the benefits of this development. On the other hand, growth in these sectors was not reproduced in the wider economy. That growth, paced by foreign capital, did not stimulate significant development, either in the agricultural sector, or for that matter in manufacturing, and thus remained confined mainly to bauxite and services. Consequently, most Jamaicans, including agricultural laborers, the urban working class, and especially the rural and urban unemployed, were left behind.

This marginality was particularly acute for the rural population in the 1940s and after, who began to make their way to the capital city, Kingston, and its adjacent parish of St. Andrew. Between 1943 and 1961, for example, some 173,000 persons trekked from the countryside to the city of Kingston, increasing the population in both parishes by 85 percent. These unskilled migrants lived in overcrowded tenements and shacks in the western parts of the city and became part of the permanently unemployed. Their desperate condition, in sharp contrast with the growing affluence and upward mobility of better-off classes in the city, heightened social tensions at the moment of independence.

Secondly, apart from economic factors, political and cultural strains heightened social tensions. For example, the political leadership of the anti-colonial movement that had bargained successfully for political independence on the basis of their political reliability and loyalty to the empire met the determined opposition of black cultural nationalists. The two nationalist leaders, Norman Washington Manley – the brown-skinned Oxford-trained lawyer and leader of the People's National Party – and Alexander Bustamante – the tall light-skinned labor leader and head of the Jamaica Labor Party (JLP) – had emphasized shared values with Britain in the long transition to political independence between 1938 and 1962. Neither leader made appreciation for African civilization or immediate independence a part of anti-colonial discourse, ignoring the fact that the majority of the population was of African ancestry, and that poor Afro-Jamaicans began embracing cultural nationalism in the late 1950s. This nationalism insisted, against Creole mockery, on Africa's importance to Jamaica and to global civilization. In opposition to this Jamaican Africanism, the Creole elite, led by Bustamante and Manley, muted cultural and racial differences with the British and instead summoned Jamaicans to a multi-racial nationalism that demoted black racial consciousness. This alternative summons was aptly captured in the Creole-inspired national motto: Out of Many One People. Between the 1950s and late 1960s, therefore, both verbal attacks as well as police violence against the Rastafarian community – and that group's denunciation of Creole nationalism – captured this epic clash between the two nationalisms.

Thirdly, the state's authoritarian uses of power, as well as a violent political clientelism, which distributed benefits to supporters on the basis of political loyalty, fed broad discontent against post-independence regimes in Jamaica. On the one hand, autocratic exercise of power alienated middle-class dissidents, who turned to oppositional politics. On the other, political parties' use of a violent clientelism to stifle the militancy of the urban poor also fostered popular resistance to national governments. This was so even as that clientelism favored a few political loyalists among the poor.

Blossoming of Social Movements: The Rastafarians

Unemployed members of the urban Rastafarian community led the first wave of opposition to post-independence Jamaican governments. Beginning in the late 1950s and cresting a decade later, the Rastafarian movement established the political terms for opposition to post-independence regimes. Representing a tributary of the migrant unemployed and slum-dwelling rural population in Kingston, this movement, with its religio-political appeals, frontally challenged the ideology and moral claims of the nationalist elite. Firstly, the Rastafarians criticized these leaders' right to rule. Where other Jamaicans looked to this political leadership as a guide to state and nation-building, the Rastafarians put forward a most subversive assertion. They argued that they were not Jamaicans, and were therefore not subject to the authority of the Jamaican state and its rulers. Rather, they asserted, they were African sojourners living in exile and held in captivity in Jamaica. They therefore had only one demand of the Jamaican government: repatriation to Africa to enjoy the birthright freedom they once had on that continent. This startling demand was incomprehensible to Jamaican governments, then desperately summoning the Afro-Jamaican population to middle-class Creole multi-racial nationalism. Derision and contempt, and often assault and incarceration, therefore greeted the defiant claims of the Rastafarians.

Secondly, in sharp opposition to Creole cultural identification with Europe and to most Jamaicans' uncertainty about their cultural identity, or shame about blackness, the Rastafarians affirmed pride of race. They hailed the teachings of the late Marcus Garvey, the Jamaican black nationalist and race leader, who was long ignored and condemned by both colonial governments and the nationalist elite. The Rastafarians also grew their hair in dreadlocks and proudly proclaimed the distinctiveness and beauty of Africans' physical features even as most Afro-Jamaicans were made to feel uncomfortable with their physical appearance.

Thirdly, Rastafarian-inspired reggae music reinforced the political and cultural critique of the elite multi-racial nationalism for its rejection of the claims of black consciousness. Musicians, singers, and other popular artists inspired by Rastafarian beliefs quickly generated a new subversive musical form that achieved immediate and widespread support among poor Afro-Jamaicans. In its lyrical content, aesthetic style, and performative values, Rastafarian-inspired reggae music challenged the entire moral and ideological edifice on which Jamaican independence and progress for the new nation-state rested. Recurrent anti-Creole Rastafarian themes informed the new music, including the charge of false decolonization and the accusation that puppeteer and culturally dependent national leaders ruled the country. Early creative exponents of the new music, like the young Bob Marley, struck complementary themes that resonated with the black and militant urban poor. Early Marley songs, including the defiant "Slave Driver" and the revolution-inspiring "Small Axe," threatened powerholders' claim to legitimacy while reminding the black poor of the bankruptcy of national governments.

Sustained Rastafarian cultural and political defiance and the growing popularity of the group's values thus created anxieties and fed government's security concerns. The discovery of an arms cache during a police raid on the premises of a Rastafarian leader, Claudius Henry, in April 1960, and the suppression of an attempted coup by his son, Ronald, in June, heightened government fears. The urgency of these concerns thus led the Jamaican government to call for an inquiry into the origins of the movement, as well as the nature of its beliefs and its demands. Within weeks, three professors at the University of the West Indies had turned in to the government a sympathetic report on the Rastafarian movement. Among other things, the report recommended repatriation to Ethiopia for the Rastafarian brethren, proposed welfarist measures to improve their lot in Jamaica, and suggested changes in the state's repressive response to the group. For all the modesty of the academics' report and recommendations, however, the credibility and intellectual respect the report generated for the Rastafarian movement led to condemnation of both the report and the professors who had produced it. Just the same, it was clear that despite elite and respectable society's contempt for the Rastafarians, the movement would not be denied, as its ideology and appeal spread far beyond black slum-dwellers, to influence urban youth, large swaths of the urban unemployed and, stunningly, university students, the middle class, and sections of the dissident intelligentsia.

Left-Wing Grassroots Militancy: The Unemployed Workers Council

Even as Rastafarian dissidence encouraged panic within Jamaica's ruling circles, other challengers from the slums emerged with equally corrosive anti-system ideologies and practices. The Unemployed Workers Council (UWC) was one such militant social force in the slums of Kingston. Founded in March 1962 by Ben Monroe, a willful, self-assured carpenter and long-time left-wing militant in labor politics, the UWC challenged the country's divisive "party-unionism" on behalf of the mass of urban unemployed workers and of labor more generally.

With the development of Jamaica's modern trade union movement and mass political parties after 1938, a situation unfavorable to the working class had developed. This was the notorious phenomenon of party-unionism. In it, the two dominant and competing trade unions were affiliated with the two dominant and competing political parties. Hence, unionized workers in the Bustamante Industrial Trade Union (BITU) were also typically members of the JLP. The same was true of members of the National Workers Union affiliated with the People's National Party (PNP). Political unionism, therefore, meant that workers were often forced to stifle their independent interests as workers when those interests collided with the policies of the affiliated parties. Party membership and trade union membership thus did not always conform to workers' interests. Moreover, as each party favored its own supporters for unionized jobs and political spoils, competition for jobs and spoils unleashed violent party and trade union wars in which laborers engaged in destructive attacks against each other.

The UWC therefore set its face against these practices, denouncing both the union and party cartels for engaging the victimization of workers and the unemployed. UWC Leninism, its opposition to political unionism, and its affirmation of the United Nations' Charter on Human Rights – particularly Article 23 on the Right to Work – formed the core of UWC ideology and activism. At the same time, the UWC went beyond ideology critique to engage in direct action. The UWC leadership, and its cadre of unemployed workers from the slums, repeatedly laid siege to job sites all across Kingston in the early 1960s, demanding non-partisan distribution of work and an end to political unionism.

Likewise, Ben Monroe fearlessly led squatter resistance to the JLP's heedless and insensitive slum clearance policies in West Kingston in 1963. Although the UWC was unable to deter the bulldozers indefinitely, it did manage to call public attention to the plight of slum dwellers and embarrassed the JLP administration into acknowledging squatters' right to be given housing and jobs on a non-partisan basis.

Rude Boy Phenomenon and the Gangsterization of Jamaican Politics

Social defiance and moral outlawry among unemployed male youth in Kingston's slums matched desperate squatters' plaintive protests

there. Emerging in 1961, and achieving its apogee within three years, a rebellious male youth movement mounted yet another challenge to middle-class moral sway. This time the assault took the form of an inversion of moral class values. With the Creole elite acting as moral standard bearers, the majority of the respectable poor lived by the rules of Christian moral propriety. The latter therefore knew the importance of both decency and respectability in this class-and-status-conscious ex-colonial society. Not surprisingly, then, this law-abiding group sought uplift through hard work, personal sacrifice, and moral restraint. In this respect, the majority of poor Afro-Jamaicans shared much with their middle-class kin, who constantly warned the black poor against succumbing to indiscipline and moral depravity. The rebellious male youth movement in urban Jamaica wholly rejected these values, substituting instead a celebration of urban ghetto culture. Cultivation of a "cool pose" that combined emotional distance with readiness to use violence and menace against an unjust society distinguished this oppositional formation.

Rebellious males in urban slums proudly wore the badge of social outlawry as an identity. They copied the stylized violence of the bandits and gunslingers from American cowboy movies; they adopted the proud black nationalism of the Rastafarians, as well as their disdain for Jamaican leaders; and they gave full expression to both wanton hedonism and an unchecked, violent gangsterism. In their eyes, social injustice had expressed itself in the form of middle-class cultural domination. Hence, calls for restraint and demands for a return to moral decency were wholly rejected as only the summons of an oppressive government and the ruling groups it represented.

This cultural and political refusal had massive social and political consequences. It occasioned violent gunfights among rival youth gangs and pitted these gangs in violent encounters with the police. At the same time, however, the decades-long party clientelism in which poor voters received material benefits in exchange for political loyalty, fatefully adapted this gangsterism to its own agenda. Hence, in a remarkable development in Jamaican politics in the early 1960s, both the JLP and the PNP moved away from only trying to stamp out the gangs, to soliciting their support and recruiting their leaders to do political work.

In this case the rival parties and their middle-class leaders made an unprecedented move: they brought juvenile street gangs and gang leaders into the political process, using them now to end political competition in constituencies through violence and intimidation. The effectiveness of this practice created the first garrisoned communities in urban Kingston, violently barring political competition in poor communities there, while elevating politically aligned gang leaders, on both sides, to positions of honor and notoriety in the slums. In such circumstances a few notables and recruits from the dispossessed urban poor had clearly moved from marginality to close political affiliation with powerholders. Thus, a mutual dependency had emerged in this cohabitation between politicians and political gangsters, as poor slum-dwellers with guns traded on their expertise in the political uses of violence.

Revolt of the Intellectuals and a Social Explosion

From the foregoing, it is clear that the militant black poor in urban Jamaica were leaders of the anti-systemic social movement in post-independence Jamaica. By the mid-1960s this contingent had generated both the subversive ideologies and the social forces that challenged the legitimacy of post-colonial governments. Until then, university-trained political intellectuals and the alienated middle class had mostly responded to the state's authoritarianism with circumspection and even fear. Although a few West Indian economists at the University of the West Indies had played a major role in the formation of the West Indies Federation in the 1950s and had publicly campaigned on its behalf when it was threatened in 1961 by Jamaica's imminent withdrawal, university-based intellectuals remained largely above the political fray. This was the case notwithstanding the fact that in 1963 the Young Socialist League – a youthful left-wing dissident political formation allied to the PNP – had won support from intellectuals at the Mona (Jamaica) campus of the University of the West Indies (UWI) with the establishment of the UWI Area Council affiliated with the League.

This relative aloofness of intellectuals began to change in the mid-1960s as the authoritarian JLP regime and an autocratic university administration pushed intellectuals at the Mona campus into political opposition. Mention has already been made of government dissatisfaction with the 1960 university report on the Rastafarians and the tensions it produced between academics and the state. The conservative JLP regime and its political allies had attacked the writers of the report for not expressing the official view concerning the subversive character of the Rastafarian movement. Relations between university-based intellectuals and the state thus became more conflicted as the 1960s wore on. This was apparent in 1962 when a small group of West Indian economists in Guyana burst onto the Caribbean political scene with powerful critiques of regional governments' economic policies and political conduct. Calling themselves the New World Group, this circle of economists – the majority of whom who were based on the Mona campus – established themselves as yet another force in opposition to the Jamaican and Caribbean status quo.

In March 1963 the group published the first issue of the New World Quarterly, a journal of ideas devoted to the creation of informed public opinion on regional problems. This development represented a major breakthrough in intellectuals' involvement with public issues because the group sought to win independent public support for their critical ideas. Thus, instead of regarding themselves as merely technical consultants to governments in the region, the New World Group now made a bid for public support on the basis of a critique of the status quo, and for the establishment of an independent public opinion. This stance brought the group into direct confrontation with the Jamaican government, already suspicious of dissenting and politically unreliable intellectuals.

In 1965 the JLP administration struck back. It seized and cancelled the passports of LeRoy Taylor and George Beckford, two notable West Indian economists associated with the New World Group who had traveled to Cuba during the summer of 1965. Although the JLP refused to explain the seizure as punishment for visiting Cuba, and for opposing the government's policies, the Jamaican government left little doubt about its antipathy for uncooperative intellectuals at the university. That distrust was followed by the suspension of work permits for dissenting academics from Britain and the United States who were also teaching at the Mona campus. And in October 1968 a panicked Jamaican administration capped this assault on intellectuals with the banning of Walter Rodney, a Guyanese historian at the university. Rodney's crime, according to the JLP, was that he had become a security threat. He had evidently achieved this status by consorting with the Rastafarians in the slums; debating Jamaica's racial problems with them there; inviting them to meet at the campus; and in other ways giving intellectual respectability to Rastafarian ideas. In addition, Rodney had evidently linked poor Jamaicans' cultural dissent to the turbulent history of African peoples at home and abroad. Furthermore, in his public lectures and talks, Rodney had given a fillip to Rastafarian ideas by suggesting the need to throw off Creole class oppression in Jamaica by remembering the importance of Jamaicans' African civilization identity.

With the alarming news of Rodney's expulsion and JLP intolerance and stifling of intellectual dissent at the university, dissatisfaction and fierce opposition expanded. Students, professors, workers, and sections of the alienated middle class marched in opposition to the banning. The militant urban poor and the irrepressible lumpenproletariat joined them in the streets of Kingston. The latter burned buses, disrupted traffic, and fought with police trying to quell the disturbance with tear gas and batons. For the first time in Jamaica's post-colonial political history, intellectuals at the university and allied middle-class groups joined the militant black poor in united opposition to the disreputable and increasingly discredited JLP administration.

Fall of Black Culturalism and Emergence of Caribbean Leninism

The social explosion of October 1968 exposed the JLP's cultural and political isolation from the Jamaican people. That party's reliance on authoritarian measures to cope with dissent, its unwillingness to accommodate demands from the black poor for cultural respect, and its inability to solve the country's mounting economic problems, made it a target of widening public ridicule. Moreover, the emergence of a Caribbean black power movement in this period only made matters worse. Across the English-speaking Caribbean, and in Jamaica in particular, the Afro-Caribbean peoples, as well as dissident leaders and organizations, challenged national governments in the region to address the cultural, political, and economic needs of the black majority. This claim found particular resonance in Jamaica in the 1960s. In the wake of the "Rodney rebellion" of October 1968, then, it was not surprising that the appeal of black consciousness found expression in yet another dissident social movement: the Abeng Newspaper movement.

A polyglot group of dissidents held this formation together. New World activists, radical Catholics, black cultural nationalists, socialistically inclined activists, and patriotic pro-PNP personalities belonged to the Abeng movement. As a diverse grouping united in opposition to the JLP administration, Abeng activists coalesced around the cause of the militant but marginalized black poor in the urban slums. Identifying themselves with these black "sufferers," Abeng activists sounded the diverse themes already abroad in the emerging black power movement in the region. Consequently, when the first copy of the Abeng newspaper appeared on February 1, 1969, its pages confirmed the movement's preoccupation with racial uplift for the black poor and with their relief from joblessness, police brutality, and political victimization.

Because of the many ideological tendencies in the Abeng, however, other outlooks competed with the movement's focus on race. These included Marxist critiques of class relations, concern for human rights, analyses of Jamaica's economic dependency, and indictments of a compromised judicial system that was deemed unfair to poor Afro-Jamaicans. This jostling of anti-status quo ideologies produced divisions within the Abeng movement, as contending groups fought for ideological dominance. By the time a suspicious fire had razed the Abeng printery in June 1969, the movement was already in disarray, falling apart over ideological differences.

Intellectuals' defense of the working class and their adoption of Marxism-Leninism now replaced the earlier vogue of Black Nationalism. By 1974 this stance, adopted by a tiny minority of left-wing intellectuals at the UWI, led to the creation of the Workers Liberation League (WLL) in that year. The League acted as a pressure group from the far left, militantly urging a reluctant PNP – in power since 1972 – to go beyond its cautious and ambivalent adoption of democratic socialism in December 1974. But as the PNP's embrace of a mild form of socialism deepened class polarization and social divisions, WLL leaders saw an opportunity to rally disaffected workers to a left-wing agenda. In 1978 they formed a Marxist-Leninist political party, the Workers Party of Jamaica (WPJ). Thus, ten years after the Walter Rodney-inspired black power revolt, university-based intellectuals made a decisive shift from Black Nationalism to Marxism as a basis of organization and social mobilization.

Implosion of Leninism and Return to Anarchy

This journey to the far left in which class identity replaced cultural concerns was short-lived. The PNP's democratic socialist agenda that had favored the poor and working people since 1972 collapsed in 1980. Voters, fed up with social polarization, raging political violence, and economic hardship unleashed by the PNP's policies, removed that party from power in a brutal electoral contest that took some 800 lives. Pragmatic voters, dissatisfied with the meager returns of PNP democratic socialism, thus returned the conservative, pro-private enterprise JLP to power in that year.

This defeat for the Jamaican left was followed by a shattering event on the island of Grenada. There, the Marxist Peoples Revolutionary Government (PRG) that had been in power since a 1979 coup, imploded. Political differences within the leadership of the PRG resulted in the army's execution of Maurice Bishop, the popular party leader on October 19, 1983. The United States' invasion of the island on October 25 and its ouster of remnants of the PRG sounded the death knell for socialist experiments in Jamaica and for Caribbean Leninism more generally. Indeed, Jamaica's own communist party, the WPJ, collapsed in disarray in the early 1990s, as events in Grenada and the subsequent collapse of communism in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union took their toll.

Beginning therefore with the 1980 PNP defeat and the self-immolation of the PRG leadership in Grenada, these momentous events brought down the curtain on a remarkable 20-year-long era of dissenting movements in Jamaica and throughout the Caribbean. There, cultural nationalists, Marxist-Leninists, radical Christians, and a militant and unbowed poor people's movement had faced down conservative governments across the region. Remarkably, social movements in Jamaica and in the wider Caribbean had often dictated the terms of contestation, had typically exercised a remarkable hold on the popular imagination, and had occasionally broken through to win political power.

These grand achievements were nullified after 1980. Mounting economic hardships in the 1980s and after added to the sting of political defeat for the movements. Indeed, the PNP's ideological turnabout in the mid-1980s only made matters worse, even as that party's reversal of course highlighted the agony and crisis of the social movement in Jamaica. In 1989 voters returned the PNP to power, but only after Michael Manley, the once-radical party leader, had wholly repudiated the party's welfarist policies and progressivist tradition in favor of the privatization of state enterprises and the adoption of economic neoliberalism.

This political and ideological reversal in Jamaica fed popular disillusionment with an economically retrenching government and encouraged widespread resort to crime. In the absence of a social ideology that could motivate the population to a credible national agenda beyond appeal for worker productivity as well as company-and-government efficiency, individual self-interest, greed, and a get-rich-quick mentality replaced utopian norms. In the 1990s and after, self-interest, nihilism, and resort to crime became the commonsense for many among the militant Afro-Jamaican urban poor. Discontent with ineffective governments unable to deliver benefits found release in corrupted self-and-group immolating violence. No longer inspired by ideologically motivated heralds of an earlier time like Bob Marley and the Rastafarians, the dissenting urban poor turned once again to internecine drug-and-gun-involved gang warfare, this time with more murderous weapons and with a higher death toll. Spiraling criminal violence in the 1990s and after typically claimed many hundreds of lives each year.

Although this violence was not accompanied by any political vision or critique of power, it did have massive political consequences. For by committing murder and mayhem on a grand scale with near-total impunity, and answering to no political authority, marauding criminal gangs in urban Jamaica held the Jamaican state up to public ridicule for its inability to rein in crime or to punish the perpetrators. Paradoxically, then, although the new criminal gangs are inspired neither by ideology nor by politics, their mayhem did politicize crime by stirring public disaffection and disgust with the seeming failure of the Jamaican state to exercise its most basic functions.

Civism and New Social Movements Today

Confronted with such unpalatable circumstances, social movements in the 1990s and after could only mount a plaintive call for a return to traditional norms and values, to civility and the rule of law. This civism and its recovery became the rallying cry of embryonic reforming social movements in the 1990s and after. Led by notable political figures, crusading journalists, human rights organizations, community leaders, and rump political organizations, the new social movement spoke up for social reconstruction on the basis of good governance and citizen empowerment. Civic groups such as Citizens Action for Free and Fair Elections (CAFFE), Jamaicans for Justice (JFJ), and Families against State Terrorism (FAST) confirmed this renewed interest in civic politics. Its importance for contemporary Jamaica cannot be overstated, for as Gray (2007) has observed, “what is remarkable about such groups is not so much the demands made of weakened politicians, as these groups’ bid to rescue the idea of the public interest, to restore the category of the citizen, and to promote the norm of civism as an autonomous citizen-based activity for the common good.” That a few leaders in both political parties have taken this appeal to heart and are beginning to institutionalize the idea of the primacy of the citizen over the claims of the partisan political loyalist is yet another promising development wrought by ever-evolving social movements in Jamaica.

Jamaica, 1938 labor riots

Obika Gray

The 1938 labor rebellion in Jamaica did not end British colonial rule in this former slave colony. However, the sustained and unprecedented militancy of the laboring classes there unleashed events that transformed the political history of the island, with major implications for the wider Caribbean.

The 1938 labor riots spurred two momentous processes. First, the riots gave birth to Jamaica’s modern nationalist movement, with the emergence of notable leaders, development of party politics, and a mature trade unionism. Second, labor’s militancy in 1938 convinced the British Colonial Office to end colonial rule and initiate major reforms. In the aftermath of the unrest, the British therefore made significant concessions to the strikers and, equally important, initiated constitutional reforms that ended colonialism.

The labor revolts of May–June 1938 in Jamaica were not an isolated event. Rather, they capped a three-year-long series of strikes and demonstrations in Caribbean territories under British colonial rule. World recession, low pay, high levels of unemployment, and land hunger provoked unrest in the 1930s. An autocratic and moribund colonial political structure aggravated these economic circumstances by blocking native political advance. Marginality, both economic and political, in the context of 1930s uncertainty, encouraged dissatisfied workers and emergent nationalist leaders to protest British colonialism.

In the 1930s the laboring classes faced difficult economic circumstances. Firstly, the global recession of 1929 hurt the islands’ exports, as prices for these commodities fell by nearly half between 1928 and 1933. This decline led to layoffs and reductions in wages for already poorly paid workers across the region. Thus, in his study of the 1938 labor revolts in Jamaica, Post (1978) observed of the largest British territory that while 12s. 0d. per week was regarded as a living wage for some rural workers, a worker's typical weekly earnings was actually 7s. 8d. Equally worrisome for labor was the fact that work on agricultural estates was seasonal and this tended to encourage the paying of low wages. Some Jamaican estate workers earned wages of 1s. 9d. to 1s. 3d. per day. These developments increased economic insecurity among wage earners and provoked restiveness among the growing ranks of the rural unemployed.

Secondly, as if falling export prices, low wages, and widespread unemployment were not enough, inequality in the distribution of land also deepened economic uncertainty in the countryside. There, big farmers and multinational companies like the United Fruit Company and the Standard Fruit Company dominated landholding. They controlled large estates, occupied the most arable land, and sought to limit the growth and expansion of a vast smallholding peasantry. Smallholders' hunger for land, reluctance to do estate work, and the big planters' monopoly of land were, therefore, major sources of tension that fed unrest.

Thirdly, rural unemployment combined with land scarcity increased migration from the countryside. This trek of the rural population to the cities contributed to labor's discontent as migrants moved into tenements and shantytowns. They lived a pitiful existence in makeshift, overcrowded shacks with names like Trench Pen, Ackee Walk, Jones Pen, and Back-O-Wall. This mass of unskilled, alienated unemployed workers promptly joined the rebellion in the region.

Fourthly, general discontent with a moribund colonial government that levied taxes and fees on the working people while excluding them from power added to resentment in the region.

The revolts against these circumstances began on January 28, 1935 on the island of St. Kitts, as sugar workers demanding a wage increase walked off estates. They were met not with conciliation, but with bullets. Arrests, imposition of a state of emergency, and the dispatching of a British warship to the island ended the protest. The collapse of the strike in St. Kitts did not deter labor's militancy, however. In February, oilfield workers in Trinidad walked off the job. Strikers in British Guiana and St. Vincent joined them in September and October, while workers in St. Lucia entered the fray later that year. While the region saw some diminution of protest in 1936, widespread discontent continued into 1937, as laborers expressed dissatisfaction with strikes and demonstrations in Barbados, Trinidad, the Bahamas, British Guiana, St. Lucia, and Jamaica.

It was in Jamaica in May-June 1938 that the unrest of the 1930s had its greatest impact. There, labor's desperate circumstances produced the combination of sustained popular militancy from below and emergence of ideologically moderate middle-class leadership from above. These developments encouraged the Colonial Office to initiate far-reaching reforms. The triggering event came on Friday, April 29 at the Frome estate of the West Indies Sugar Company (WISCO) in the parish of Westmoreland, as a dispute over pay caused a riot. Laborers on the estate walked off the job, demanding more pay – 4 shillings for laborers and more for skilled workers. Armed police were rushed to the scene, where they clashed with protestors on Monday, May 2, firing into the crowd of demonstrators, killing four and wounding fourteen. Outraged workers retaliated by burning cane fields at Frome and other WISCO estates.

The dispute spread to Kingston between May 2 and 23, where marches, mass meetings, and rallies summoned thousands to labor's cause. There, dock workers, railway employees, hospital and sanitation workers, and tramway drivers and construction workers walked off the job. As well, unemployed slum dwellers joined striking workers in Trench Pen from May 16 to 18 to disrupt work at a construction site.

A subsequent wave of agitation in the countryside matched the turmoil in Kingston. From May 25 through June 3, laborers at the Caymanas sugar estate in Clarendon Parish, dockworkers in the city of Montego Bay, and agricultural workers in the parishes of Portland, Clarendon, and St. Mary, burned cane fields, while others stoned and fought with police. One such clash with armed police in St. Mary on June 3 resulted in more deaths as police fired yet again on a riotous crowd, this time killing four persons. Hence, despite the colonial governor's effort to crush the rebellion by reading the riot act, by employing the police force at every turn, and by sending in the Sherwood Foresters and the typically brutal Special Constables, by early June 1938 the Jamaican working people were in revolt against colonial rule all across the island.

However, the announcement of a conciliation board on May 26 to negotiate with the strikers, and the governor's June 2 proposal to spend some £500,000 on a land settlement scheme, eased the crisis. By June 6, 1938 normality returned, though intermittent strikes continued into the next year.

This epic confrontation provoked inspired leadership from two Jamaican personalities, Alexander Bustamante and Norman Washington Manley. The former was a tall demagogic brown-skinned moneylender and critic of colonialism. His assault on the system was expressed in rhetorical flourishes suggesting willingness to abet the fury of the working people if local authorities ignored their claims. This menace was complemented by a contrary disposition that reminded demonstrators of Bustamante's value to them and their need to temper hostility to the old order. In contrast with the largely unschooled but canny Bustamante, Manley was a brown-skinned urbane and highly educated nationalist. Having graduated from the elite Jamaica College, Manley went to Oxford University on a Rhodes scholarship to study law. After returning to the island, Manley established an illustrious career as a social reformer and highly regarded barrister, who at the time of the upheaval counted WISCO as one of his clients.

Both leaders entered the fray on labor's behalf. Bustamante led demonstrations, spoke at rallies, and joined marchers in forays against employers. Manley did much the same, emphasizing his role as mediator between capital and labor. Each leader demanded better pay for workers, and offered himself as broker and negotiator for the strikers. But each leader did so with a concern for the restoration of order, not the elimination of colonial rule. What was most striking about these leaders was not their backing for increased worker militancy to deepen the crisis of colonialism. Rather, rhetorically and politically each tempered labor's militancy and channeled it into representative but politically moderate organizations that each leader had by then created.

Thus Bustamante became the unchallenged union leader as head of the Bustamante Industrial Trade Union (BITU) that was founded in 1938. In September of that year Manley became the leader of a major nationalist organization, the People's Nationalist Party (PNP). Within months of the disturbances, then, two nationalist political figures, a representative trade union, and a political party had appeared on the scene with each enjoying widespread support from the Afro-Jamaican population. By 1943, in anticipation of major constitutional reforms, Bustamante also hastily founded his own political party, the Jamaica Labour Party (JLP), to compete in forthcoming elections in 1944.

Despite suppression of unrest in the colonial Caribbean, the 1930s labor revolts in the region, and in particular the 1938 labor revolt in Jamaica, signaled the coming demise of British colonial rule. Indeed, the Moyne Commission that was established to study the causes of unrest in the region was permitted to include in its mandate both political and constitutional issues. Besides calling for the funding of improved social services and proposing a land settlement, the commission also recommended political and constitutional reforms. By 1943 several of these reforms were adopted, the most important of which was the granting of universal adult suffrage with a popularly elected House of Representatives in Jamaica.

The first national elections were held under the new constitution in December 1944, and the JLP won in a landslide with 23 seats to the PNP's five. An embryonic competitive two-party system had therefore been established in Jamaica – a first for the British colonies in the Caribbean. To be sure, while electoral politics under colonial rule did not establish a democracy in Jamaica, competition on the basis of a universal franchise did begin the diminution of colonial autocracy and encourage a competitive party pluralism in the region. These achievements, alongside colonial governments' acceptance of trade union representation, adoption of land settlement programs, public works expenditures, and other labor reforms, provide incontestable evidence of the power of Caribbean laborers and unemployed workers to shape momentous changes in the governance of the colonial Caribbean.

Jamaica, peasant uprisings, 19th century

Mimi Sheller

Peasant uprisings in nineteenth-century Jamaica can be understood as part of a longer history of slave uprisings and anti-slavery struggles. They also connect to the emergence of African and black liberation movements throughout the Americas, to wider working-class movements across the transatlantic world, and to ongoing peasant movements in twentieth-century Latin America. Thus they are an important link between different historical forms of popular social protest and political uprising.

As Great Britain's largest and most economically significant Caribbean colony at the beginning of the nineteenth century, Jamaica was a major producer of sugar and coffee, but also had areas specializing in cattle pens and export items like ginger and logwood. Only towards the end of the nineteenth century would this be joined by the fruit trade, with the development of the banana industry. As an export-oriented colonial plantation economy, Jamaica was controlled and governed by a small, mainly white elite of landowners, joined by some merchants, while the vast majority of the population were of African descent. Jamaica has a lively history of slave resistance and rebellion, including the Maroon Wars of the eighteenth century and a major slave uprising in 1831.

Slavery in the British West Indies ended between 1834 and 1838, as the transitional system known as "apprenticeship" finally gave way to full freedom. It is at this point that we can begin to think in terms of a "reconstituted peasantry" existing, as anthropologist Sidney Mintz (1974) describes it, consisting of small farmers, squatters, and landless agricultural laborers, some of whom did occasional wage-labor on larger plantations and lived in the "interstitial" spaces of the plantation economy. Such Afro-Caribbean peasantries are considered to be a modern form of resistance to a capitalist world system, rather than a precursor from an earlier age. Thus when we speak of "peasant uprisings" in Jamaica, it must be understood to encompass a wide array of people who may have described themselves as emancipated laborers, smallholders, or small settlers. The immigration of Indian indentured workers after emancipation also created the foundations for an Indo-Jamaican peasantry.

Access to land was significantly constrained by white planters and the local government that they controlled; nevertheless, the rapid expansion of the peasantry in the post-emancipation period took place through the struggles of the ex-slaves and ex-indentured workers to gain landholdings despite the efforts of white planters to prevent it. While some gained legal title to land, many more squatted on crown lands, while others leased land or engaged in sharecropping. Much of the internal marketing of peasant produce was carried out by women. In the effort to gain land, the formerly enslaved people also created new institutions such as "family land," indivisible plots passed down to all the children of a family line to share in perpetuity (Besson 2002). Access to land was one of the key issues contributing to peasant political movements in the post-emancipation period (Bakan 1990), but there were also many other grievances concerning poor governance, lack of justice, unfair taxation and tolls, and racial injustice (Heuman 1994; Sheller 2000).

Many of these grievances came to a head in the events known as the Morant Bay Rebellion of 1865, which is considered one of the most significant formative events in British colonial history (Holt 1992). The rebellion, and especially the brutal government response to it, marks a turning point in British colonial forms of governance indicated by a hardening of racial ideologies, the emergence of more paternalistic forms of direct rule, and a retreat from democratization and equal citizenship. Appreciating the scope and extent of peasant mobilization and political uprising in the periods before, during, and after the Morant Bay Rebellion offers insights into the larger transitions taking place in colonial regimes after slavery was abolished. While Jamaica is a unique case, events there had great influence over British colonial policy in general.

Social Unrest Prior to Morant Bay

Almost immediately after the celebration of Emancipation Day on August 1, 1838, the Jamaican sugar plantations were convulsed by work stoppages and vehement disputes over wage rates, hours of work, rent of houses, employment of women and children, and use of provision grounds (small plots where food was grown). Many freed people believed that they should have been given land as compensation for their enslavement, but instead payment was made to plantation owners for loss of their slaves. Public meetings were held at Baptist chapels in the months prior to and just after full emancipation, providing public space for the expression of grievances and calls for justice. These meetings were in part addressing immediate economic issues, but agricultural workers also began to sign petitions calling for electoral enfranchisement and the framing of new laws. And they also turned their attention to the abolition of slavery elsewhere in the world, including in the United States of America.

Among Baptist and Native Baptist congregations in the rural milieu of the plantations and the “free villages” that formed near them, social and economic tensions in the 1840s produced an increasingly autonomous and racially conscious black or African-identified counterpublic. The Sugar Duties Act of 1846 and a broader economic crisis in 1847 led to strained labor relations and a growing “spirit of disaffection.” In 1848, the year of many popular uprisings throughout Europe, there was an “apprehended outbreak” in the western parishes of Jamaica, with witnesses describing discontent, debate, field consultation, and passive resistance taking place amongst the peasantry. This unrest was linked to an alleged “insurrectionary movement” against the white populace. It is indicative that the first decade of freedom was already leading to disappointment and political mobilization of the peasantry.

Other “riots” and “disturbances” continued to take place, such as the Westmoreland Tollgate Riots of 1859, when tollhouses and gates were pulled down after petitions against them were ignored, and there were violent clashes with police during the court proceedings. A riot also took place to disrupt another court proceeding in Falmouth in 1859, in which prisoners were freed and police attacked. But more often grievances were expressed through non-violent means such as holding public meetings, signing petitions, and participating in electoral politics.

Planters and their attorneys dominated political life in Jamaica, despite emancipation, in part because of tight restrictions on voting rights and office holding. For example, in the 1864 election, out of a population of 436,807, only 1,903 men were eligible to vote, and actual voters were only around 1,450. Nevertheless, in the early 1860s there was a lively oppositional politics led by members of the brown middle class, by newspaper editors, and by Baptist clergy, who were willing to represent the interests of the black majority. One particularly important series of meetings known as the Underhill Convention took place in 1864–5 and involved a central role played by the prominent “brown” politician George William Gordon, who became a catalyst of popular mobilization against the governing elite. He also developed ties with a group of peasant smallholders in a Native Baptist settlement known as Stony Gut in St. Thomas-in-the-East, which would be the epicenter of the Morant Bay Rebellion.

The Morant Bay Rebellion

On October 7, 1865, a fracas in the Morant Bay courthouse over a court case involving trespass resulted in an armed group of people associated with the Native Baptist leader Paul Bogle rescuing a young man from the police. When the police arrived in the small village known as Stony Gut to arrest those involved, they were attacked and several black policemen were captured and forced to swear oaths to “cleave to the black.” On October 11, people from Stony Gut were joined by several hundred men and women from surrounding rural areas in an organized, armed march into Morant Bay, the capital of the sugar-growing parish of St. Thomas-in-the-East, where the local government was holding its monthly meeting in the courthouse. They seized weapons from the police station and came face to face with the volunteer militia who were protecting the courthouse. Fighting erupted and by the end of the day the crowd had killed 18 people and wounded 31 others. The rebellion then spread across other parts of the parish, leading to additional deaths and destruction of property.

The government forcefully suppressed the rebellion, making use of the army, local Jamaican forces, and the Maroons (a community of former runaway slaves in the nearby Blue Mountains who had signed treaty rights with the government). In the process, nearly 500 people were killed and hundreds of others seriously wounded, including women who were as prominent as men in participating in the uprising. Villages were burned to the ground and hundreds of houses destroyed. Many political leaders were arrested and tried by court martial, leading to executions including those of Paul Bogle and, more controversially, G. W. Gordon, who was captured in Kingston but claimed to have no knowledge of the rebellion.

These events led to public outcry in Britain, and an official inquiry by the Jamaica Royal Commission in 1866. The critical conclusions of the Royal Commission resulted in the dismissal of Governor Edward John Eyre. However, it also led to the abolition of Jamaica's 200-year-old House of Assembly and its replacement by Crown Colony rule, which effectively ended democratic electoral politics in Jamaica for some time to come. This was the most significant uprising against British colonial power in the post-emancipation era, and its harsh suppression ensured that it would not be repeated.

After Morant Bay

The latter part of the nineteenth century did not see any further violent uprisings like that of 1865. This may be because of the discouraging example of the lack of success of the rebellion and the suppression of political opposition and newspapers that it fomented, and also because of the more encouraging changes for the better that it partly helped to effect. Another result of the Royal Commission was the recommendation that crown lands be opened up to leasing by small settlers, which met some of the demand for and helped support the growing peasantry. Even more importantly, as Jean Besson's research shows, during this period peasants themselves appropriated and overturned European institutions and built their own culture in the heart of Jamaica (Besson 2002). The peasant economy gradually grew in the latter decades of the century, and by the 1880s the emerging banana industry offered new opportunities.

In another sense what began as a peasant politics in the nineteenth century was gradually transformed into a working-class politics in the early twentieth century, feeding into new political and social movements such as Garveyism, Rastafarianism, and the 1938 labor rebellion. Thus the peasant uprisings of the post-emancipation period would eventually culminate in the independence movement and the transition towards a national politics in which the same issues of land, good governance, justice, and ultimately freedom continued to be sources of struggle. Despite the advances made by black creole nationalism in the post-independence era, many Jamaicans consider emancipation to remain incomplete. The descendants of the post-emancipation peasantry live in today's highly urbanized ghettos where political warfare is taking far more lives each year than were lost in the largest peasant uprising of the nineteenth century.

Jamaica, rebellion and resistance, 1760–1834

Steeve O. Buckridge

Resistance to slavery in Jamaica was a daily occurrence among the slave population. Slaves pursued complex and diverse activities to express their anger and frustrations at their enslavers and the institution of slavery. The record on slave rebellion confirms that slaves were not passive beings; instead, they resisted the institution of slavery that sought to dehumanize them and make them powerless. Edward Long (1774: 51–2), a local historian and Jamaican planter, described West Indian-born slaves as “irascible, conceited, proud, indolent . . . and very artful” and as “always trying to overreach their overseers by thwarting their plans.” Similar views were expressed by Long’s contemporaries, who described Coromante slaves as ferocious and the instigators of every rebellion in Jamaica. Slave rebellions often led to destruction of property and much loss of life among slave owners and slaves. Furthermore, suppressing slave revolts created a financial burden for the colonial regime. The slave rebellion of 1760, for instance, resulted in the death of 60 white settlers and 400 slaves. The expense of putting down this rebellion was estimated at £100,000. During the last slave rebellion of 1831–2 in Jamaica, the expenses accrued and the value of property destroyed exceeded five times the amount spent in 1760. In addition, parliament granted £300,000 as a loan to assist those planters whose plantations had been destroyed by the slaves.

Excluding Haiti, formerly known as St. Domingue, the largest slave rebellions in the western hemisphere were in Jamaica and in Demerara and Essequibo, or the Dutch Guianas. These areas averaged one major revolt every two years during the period between 1731 and 1832. The high incidence of slave revolts was due to several factors. Many slave owners in Jamaica chose to spend most of the year in England living off the profits of their estates. Their absence led to estrangement between owners and their slaves. In addition, the high African to white ratio, combined with extremely harsh conditions for slaves and a large concentration of unseasoned foreign-born African slaves, fostered an atmosphere conducive to revolts. Slave revolts were more common in areas where African slaves outnumbered Creole or local-born slaves. Consequently, planters in these areas lived in a state of perpetual insecurity and under constant threat of slave insurrection.

Slave resistance contested the colonial regimes of power and slaves devised various methods to deceive their owners and to subvert the system of slavery. These resistance activities can be divided into two broad categories, one overt or blatant and the other covert or subtle. Overt resistance consisted of individual and collective violent acts such as destruction of property, deliberate harm to others, rebellions, or revolts. However, not all slaves believed in open insubordination since they realized that in almost any context that would provoke a more rapid and ferocious response from the authorities than a more pervasive resistance, one that would never venture to contest openly the formal definition of hierarchy and power. Therefore, some Jamaican slaves resorted to covert activities such as foot dragging, false complaints, sabotage, feigning illness, reopening old wounds, malingering or go slows, refusal to work, general inefficiency and deliberate laziness or evasion, satire, marronage or running away, suicide, or disguise.

Resistance was an ongoing process in the daily lives of slaves; all slaves, including women, resisted servitude. Slave women in Jamaica participated with slave men in various forms of resistance activities such as revolts and running away. Many of the rebellious slaves captured during Tacky’s rebellion in 1760 were women. Some slaves committed suicide to resist slavery and a few slave women chose to kill their children to prevent them from becoming slaves, as in the case of Sabina Park, who was tried in the Half Way Tree slave court for the murder of her 3-month-old child. Infanticide was atypical among slave women but some women sought a final way out of their suffering, if not for themselves then at least for their children.

Disguise as Resistance

Jamaican slaves sometimes stole and destroyed clothing that belonged to their enslavers as an act of defiance. During the slave rebellion led by Tacky in 1760, great houses were attacked and European clothes were seized by slaves and destroyed. In some situations, stolen clothes were used as disguise for possible escape. Others used clothing to mock and ridicule slave owners. Such was the case in the 1831 slave rebellion when the head driver of an estate allowed a party of rebels to burn the great house, then imitated his master by galloping around the property on his master's horse wearing his owner's hat.

Some runaway slaves disguised themselves by cross-dressing to escape servitude. Slave women dressed as men and men as women; girls dressed as boys and vice versa, sometimes changing gender identities several times to evade slave catchers. A fascinating example of cross-dressing in Jamaica was that of the slave Hurlock, who disguised himself for the benefit of the slave rebels in 1831. Dressed as a woman, Hurlock successfully deceived every guard in Montego Bay and eventually learned strategic information that benefited the resistance movement.

Runaway slaves also disguised themselves as freepersons and were able to resist being caught. Although there were no codes that regulated slaves' dress, there were certain aesthetic norms in dress that were associated with specific groups of people. Slaves tended not to wear shoes since this was not part of the clothing rations provided by their owners. Slaves were usually branded on the shoulder with the logo of their owner or their owner's name. These characteristics in a slave's appearance served as markers that identified the person as a slave. Those slaves fortunate to obtain shoes, or a dress of refined fabric and stockings, were perceived by observers as freepersons once outside their familiar circles. Slaves obtained money to buy their disguise by selling their produce in the local market in their free time. Others stole garments from their owners. Female runaway slaves were ingenious at disguising themselves as freewomen, and local newspaper advertisements such as those in the Jamaica Mercury often described them as artful and very skilled in deception, warning whites to be on their guard against them. The runaway slave Mary Sadler, for example, successfully escaped capture by dressing as a freewoman. She fled in 1779 with her two young sons; later her owner, Isaac Furtado, discovered that she had hired herself out, dressed as a freeperson, and eventually lived with a freedman as his wife. Runaway slaves who dressed well and spoke fluent English could meld into free society unless they were identified.

Slaves who fled into the hills often camouflaged themselves to evade slave catchers while traveling through the forests. Successful runaway slaves who were welcomed by Maroon communities participated in the military tactic of camouflage during times of war. Among the Moore Town Maroons, women and men tied carcoon bushes around their bodies so that they could easily ambush their enemies or move their camp through the mountains without being detected by the British. The carcoon plant was used in this manner because its leaves and branches remained green long after cutting before turning dry and crumbling.

Slave Dress as Symbolic Resistance

Slaves' responses to enslavement were greatly influenced by African cultural patterns and a deep yearning on the part of slaves to survive and be free. Dress was a principal exponent of this process. Personal adornment and expressive cultural patterns in dress were regular features in slave society. For some slave women in particular, dressing the body was more than a mere aesthetic act; it was also a way of communicating a message. These messages were based on slaves' relationships with each other and their experiences within their environment. Slave women's style of dressing reflected and reinforced their commitment to their African heritage and their fellow enslaved Africans. Such was the case of the slave woman Cubah, who had amassed a huge following among the slave population and was a key organizer of a major rebellion planned in 1760. Cubah dressed as an African queen and sat in state under a canopy with a short robe on her shoulders and a crown on her head. Although warned by the authorities to stop this, she refused. It was believed that she performed the functions similar to those of a West African queen mother. Cubah was later captured and shipped off the island, transported for life. However, she managed to prevail on the captain of the transport to put her ashore again on the leeward part of Jamaica. Cubah remained there for a while, but eventually was rearrested and executed. Some slaves used their dress to reflect communal or collective resistance. The ringleaders of the 1831 slave rebellion in Jamaica wore scarlet jackets as a uniform statement of resistance and to reflect some level of military sophistication and organization. Similar to several African societies, red was not only symbolic of strength and courage but was also closely associated with resistance, war, and ritual dress.

Jamaican slaves received Oznaburgh fabric, a type of German linen, from their owners to make their own clothes. Many slaves accessorized their outfits to create an African aesthetic in dress. During holidays, slave women often appeared decked out in a profusion of beads, corals, and gold ornaments of all descriptions. Some slaves proudly displayed their ethnic marks or scarring with a mixture of ostentation and pleasure, either considering them highly ornamental or appealing to them as testimonies of distinction from Africa. Hairstyles for women, meanwhile, consisted of plaits, braids, or having their hair combed into lanes like the parterre of a garden, as in West Africa.

Nonetheless, the most popular garment that represented the continuity of African customs in dress was the African woman's headwrap known in Jamaica as the tiehead. During slavery, many slave owners considered the headwrap a badge of enslavement, but to slave women this type of dress was distinctly African. Headwraps in Jamaica were diverse in styles and colors and they reflected the woman's own creativity.

Headwraps served many functions. They absorbed perspiration and offered an expedient means to cover the hair quickly to make one presentable or to protect newly styled hair. Moreover, they assisted with balancing loads on the head, as in Africa. The headwrap would be complemented with a piece of cloth or dried banana leaves rolled into a coil, shaped into a donut called a cotta and laid flat on top of the headwrap before the load was placed on the head. The headwrap also served as a protection against injuries to the head during beatings by the slave owner and against scalp infections such as lice. Among the Moore Town Maroons, women wrapped their heads in a particular style to signal a state of war. According to Maroon legend, their leader, Nanny, wore headwraps that reflected her status as leader and spiritual healer among her people. She also used her headwrap to store her bullets during the Maroon wars.

Another feature of slave dress that was reminiscent of Africa was that worn during slave carnivals. Enslaved Africans held crop-over fêtes and evening dances and celebrated Christian holidays. On Christmas Day, Boxing Day, and New Year's Day, slaves participated in masquerades called Jonkonnu or John Canoe that consisted of masked troupes, dancers, actors, and processions of women called Set Girls in their finest dresses. Jonkonnu has its roots in West Africa and the masqueraders were accompanied by slave bands that provided music for spectators and performers. The entertainers as well as the masked participants were usually slaves or freed persons of non-European descent. Aesthetically, these slave carnivals emphasized dress and revelers could show off their fancy clothing while others competed for the best outfits. The carnival parade consisted of a contrast of costumed segments each with its own colors, style, and floats. For some African slaves, carnival was an opportunity to have fun, take a break from the rigors and stress of work, and enjoy their free time. For others it was also a return to their roots, to reminisce about the use of masks in mediating between supernatural beings and the society within which they dwelt. The masks and outfits worn in carnival were similar to those used in West African rituals and festivals.

Carnival dress among slaves was important because the dress functioned as a mask that transformed the persona, permitting slaves to do wild and uninhibited things such as mock Europeans and even the slave owner with antics, taunts, and pelvic gyrations. During the festivities slaves sang satirical philippics against their master and mistress, communicating a little free advice now and then; but they never lost sight of decorum or went too far. Such carnivals were in themselves a satire that allowed slaves, including women, to subtly resist the norms of the colonial society. Behind this mask of fancy dress, slave men and women could act freely, and at times even mimic whites. They could be outrageous, thus going beyond the normal structures of plantation morality and behavior. In this manner, slaves experienced some control, if only temporarily.

The continuity and popularity of African customs in dress among the Jamaican slave population enabled slaves to resist Europeans' efforts at cultural annihilation and simultaneously maintained a vital link to their African heritage. All resistance, whether overt or covert, was essential to slaves' survival against the institution of slavery that sought to rob them of their African identity.

James, C. L. R. (1901–1989)

Roderick Bush

C. L. R. James is one of the preeminent revolutionary theoreticians, activists, and cultural critics of the twentieth century. His role as anti-colonial militant, Pan-African internationalist, Marxist revolutionary, and political activist establishes him as one of the intellectual giants of the twentieth century in the tradition of W. E. B. Du Bois. James's life began in the Trinidadian periphery of the world-system in a middle-class family of schoolteachers. He combined the benefits of a superb education with an uncommon sensitivity to the common people of Trinidad. In Trinidad he was a teacher but became an anti-colonial militant who infused his writings with the lives of the common people whose passion, common sense, and decency he had come to respect and love.

This class standpoint was to stay with him throughout his travels and was to stamp his particular angle of vision. From these early beginning James was a practical theorist. He wrote about the exciting lives of the Trinidadian masses in Minty Alley and a short story, "Triumph." This mental attitude also inclined James to take a proactive position in his historical writing. He wanted to write about the Haitian Revolution because he wished to focus not simply on what had been done to people of African descent, but on what kind of action people were taking on their own behalf. He was concerned for people to be the subject of their own history. That was the logic behind the writing of The Black Jacobins and The History of Negro Revolt. When he traveled to England in 1932, his anti-colonial and labor sympathies placed him in the company of a number of people who were rejecting the liberal reformism of the British Labour Party. This inspired him to study Marxism, in which James found an attitude toward history and people that he had not encountered in other books but which resonated profoundly with his own attitudes. He had already read Trotsky's History of the Russian Revolution, so he was aware of the critique of Stalinism. But he read Marx and Engels, as well as Stalin and Trotsky, before determining that he would join the Trotskyist movement.

James's origin as an anti-colonial militant with a strong working-class standpoint was the filter through which he read and interpreted Marxism. He therefore offered a corrective to the Eurocentric reading and interpretation of Marxism that dominated the movement in Europe and North America. Both The Black Jacobins and The History of Negro Revolt give prominence to the agency of black people, and indeed argue for their centrality to revolutionary history on a world scale. The sense in which traveling to England liberated James had more to do with his liberation from a government job and from the tutelage and oversight of his parents. James was indeed an opponent of the predominant Eurocentric reading and interpretation of Marxism, despite his own wide exposure to European history and culture. Because of his education, he was able to read a great deal in English, Latin, French, and Greek.

While James's political practice focused on Europe when he lived there, he worked with George Padmore in the International African Service Bureau. Padmore had been the highest-ranking black person in the Comintern, but left the organization when, because of the popular front against fascism, it changed its stance toward the "democratic capitalist" nations of Britain, France, and the United States who were now in an alliance with the Soviet Union. Padmore argued that Britain and France were the major colonial powers in Africa and that the United States was the most race-conscious country in the world. He refused to accept this change in line and thus resigned from all his posts in the Communist International. When James moved to the United States, his focus was more on the issue of race but he maintained a critique of the practices of the international communist movement.

For James, Leninism argued against the possibility of socialism in one country. Lenin had argued in 1919 that “We live not in a state but in a system of States, and the existence of the Soviet Republic side by side with imperialist states for an extended period of time is unthinkable” (James 1993: 131). Admitting that it was bound up with the international market from which it could not break away, Lenin’s final written statement held that it was a question of whether the Soviet Republic could maintain itself until the capitalist countries of Western Europe completed their development to socialism. He did not think they were civilized enough to pass directly to socialism, though he thought they had the political premises for it (James 1993: 132).

James argued within the Trotskyist movement for the autonomy of the black liberation movement, despite the need for alliances and coalitions with whites. But the logic of the autonomy of the black liberation movement was soon generalized as James came to oppose the necessity of a vanguard party, without which the revolutionary forces could not establish a socialist society. James split with the Trotskyist movement when he argued that it was the activity of the working class and not the vanguard party which would lead to the building of a socialist society. This profoundly democratic and egalitarian position differed profoundly from the authoritarian views of the communists, who are quite like the Jacobins that James criticizes near the end of The Black Jacobins.

Japan, community labor union movement

Edson I. Urano

Enterprise unions are functionally “adjusted” to the productionist and enterprise-centered characteristics of Japanese society, with both core enterprises and regular workers as the pillars of the social system. The emergence and hegemony of this type of union has effectively resulted in the exclusion of marginal workers, such as part-timers, temporary workers, and foreign workers, from the labor movement. In this context, Japanese community unions are meaningful organizations which function as alternatives to the mainstream labor movement. Despite their numerical irrelevance, their link to the progressive social movements of the past, their combativeness, and their inclusive role on the unionization of minorities and atypical workers make them of major relevance as a sociological phenomenon.

In many ways, community unions are the antithesis of enterprise unions. While enterprise unions organize workers through union shop agreements, community unions promote unionization through individual membership, focusing on specific niches, occupations, and the identities of local communities. Categories such as gender, ethnicity, and employment patterns frequently serve as criteria for the unionization of workers and the determination of union strategies. For example, the Women's Union Tokyo, founded in 1995, is mainly focused on women's labor rights and the abolition of sexual discrimination. The Managers' Union Tokyo was born out of the crisis so many middle management workers faced in 1993 when restructuring began as a result of the economic recession. The Kanagawa City Union, located in Kanagawa Prefecture south of Tokyo, originally organized Korean migrant workers, but from the mid-1990s started to organize Latin Americans of Japanese descent, who are now the most numerous constituent group of associates (more than a half of a total of around 800 members). These examples give us an idea of the mosaic drawn by diversity based on gender, ethnicity, and employment patterns that the constellation of community unions spread throughout Japan have developed over time. At the same time, the plurality of their agendas means the criteria for unionization is not just limited to occupation or enterprise.

Social Movements: Sohyo and Rengo

The left-wing social forces that emerged in the postwar period were triggered by the democratic political framework instituted by the American occupation forces as they carried out the process of deliberately dismantling the political and social system that led Japan into World War II. However, this strategy was drastically changed in the context of the Cold War. In 1950, a Red Purge was directed against left-wing activism, which had significant consequences on emerging social movements. Sohyo, a labor union with a national structure founded in 1950, played a fundamental role in terms of the political agenda and provided the initiative for community-based labor movements to spring up around Japan as an alternative to enterprise unions. The Godo Roso type of unions constituted under the Sohyo movement in the 1960s were predecessors of community unions. They were an attempt to organize workers with a policy of individual membership, by industrial sector, by occupation, and by region and local community, as a way to improve the grassroots nature of the labor movement.

In 1989 the Sohyo movement was dissolved, and Rengo (Japanese Trade Union Confederation) was founded. For the labor movement, this effectively established a system which had been in the process of development since the 1960s. It was a consolidation of enterprise unions as the dominant type of labor organization.

Edogawa Union: The Pathbreaking Case

Takagi (1988) first used the expression "community union" to designate these new forms of organizations, quoting from the American community unionism of the United Auto Workers (UAW) in the 1960s. The community union movement arose in the mid-1980s with the Edogawa Union, Tokyo, founded in March 1984, as the pathbreaker. Created by the Edogawa Ward Labor Union Federation (EWLUF), the Edogawa Union was the result of EWLUF efforts to unionize small and micro enterprise workers in the local community through a process of labor consultation and mobilization. This initiative proposed a new way to organize workers by decentralizing unionization from enterprise-based membership to a system of community-based individual membership. Obata (2004) rightly noted that the main objective of the community unions was to organize unstable workers excluded from the scheme of mainstream trade unions and emphasize the community as a place of living as well as employment.

Organizing the Unorganizable?

There are concerns that the institutional framework of the traditional labor union organization has not been able to respond to drastic changes in the social and economic system, such as the flexible production system and accumulation on course, and that new paradigms are needed. In this landscape, the versatile characteristics of organizations like non-government organizations (NGOs) are providing some new perspectives on how to redefine the role of labor unions as social entities. Like American workers' centers, Japanese community unions are basically hybrid, community-based organizations that provide labor consultation and support services, and also operate through alliances and coalitions with NGOs and civil organizations.

The remarkably singular institutional framework established by the Japanese Labor Law permits individual membership and representation in collective bargaining even if only one worker of a company is a member of the union. This “liberal” institutional framework has provided the basis for the existence of community unions. In addition to this, the initiative of two workers is sufficient to start a new union. This, however, can also be viewed as an indication of the frailty of community unions, since legal reform could clearly have a lethal effect on this type of organization.

With regard to organizing workers from outside the workplace, the need for labor consultation has been the trigger for community union membership in Japan. When faced with a variety of labor problems, such as unfair dismissal, industrial injury, and unpaid wages, workers excluded from traditional forms of labor organization turn to the unions. Through consultation and the resolution of individual matters, community unions are permanently at the frontier, dealing with the changing nature of the labor problems in society. However, their dependence on such a fluid membership base has resulted in chronic budgetary constraints since their finance derives mainly from contributions from settlement money from labor disputes and union dues. Structures such as the local unions of Zenroren, the second largest national center, and Chiiki Union structure of Rengo, the major national confederation, are similar to community unions. This is also true of the General Union, Osaka, affiliated to Zenrokyo, the third largest national center in terms of scale.

As a way to compensate for their atomized character, community unions actively develop networks. These networks can be local, regional, national, union centered, or a combination of any of these. The largest network of community unions is the Community Union National Network (CUNN), with around 70 unions spread throughout almost all regions of Japan, from Hokkaido, the north island, to Kyushu in the south. Formed in 1990, and with a total membership of around 15,000 workers, the CUNN does not have a deliberative role, but through annual national meetings, joint actions, and information exchange, the CUNN amalgamate has atomized power, and this is felt all around the country. It is very difficult for the CUNN, with its loosely structured network, to assume a deliberative role due to the heterogeneity of its members with regard to scale, membership, and regional differences. However, it plays a significant role, as can be seen in the case of the great earthquake in Hanshin-Awaji, in Kobe Prefecture, in January 1995. The network allowed for rapid mobilization and offered help and labor consultation to the victims. The unionization of numerous workers fired due to the consequences of the catastrophe resulted in the Kobe Workers’ Union becoming the main actor in the CUNN.

Many community unions stayed out of Rengo at the time of its foundation in 1989, in an attempt to preserve and build up a left-wing and locally oriented labor movement. However, in 2003, 11 community unions affiliated to the CUNN founded the Japan Community Union Federation (JCUF). With a total of 11 union members and two observer members, it has a total membership of 3,300 associates (the actual number is around 7,000 associates, but only 3,300 officially pay dues to Rengo). A number of activists within the CUNN are still critical of Rengo, and have remained outside the JCUF system. Nevertheless, the JCUF has effectively served as a bridge between the minority movement network and the National Confederation, which has implications in terms of the resonance it can have in the broader political sphere. In 2005, the candidacy of JCUF’s president, Momoyo Kamo, for Rengo’s presidency brought some fresh air to its “consensual” and bureaucratic electoral process. The winning candidate, she is a former boss of the most “ambitious” Rengo union, the Japanese Federation of Textile, Chemical, Food, Commercial, Service, and General Workers’ Unions, UZENSEN, well known for its know-how in unionizing new members, including part-timers in the service sector, through union shop agreements and its approach to the management side. Her election effectively confronted two different models of unions in internal politics and in the broader political arena. Mrs. Momoyo’s victory was a clear indication of opposition to the possibility of Rengo supporting proposed reforms to the country’s constitution and the consequent remilitarization of Japan.

Another example of how community unions contribute with innovative cases is the challenge to unionize McDonald’s workers, which began in 2006. The pathbreaking case that served as a precedent for McDonald’s workers’ unionization at Rengo was that of a single store manager, a member of the Managers’ Union of the JCUF, who made a claim against overtime exemption and lengthy working hours and started a legal dispute against the company.

For the future, with an inevitable increase in the number of atypical workers and foreign workers in Japan, and a decrease in labor density, the experiences, experiments, failures, and successes that community unions accumulate over the decades will certainly be of major significance when rethinking the rigid framework of enterprise unionism in Japan. How the mainstream of the labor movement and marginal movements are going to interact, through coalitions and alliances, may be the nodal point for the future of the labor movement of Japan.

Japan, labor protest, 1945–present

Masao Inoue

It is possible to divide Japan's six-decade postwar labor movement into three distinctive periods. The first lasted from 1948 to the 1973 oil crisis. At this time, during the Korean War and the "Red Purge," the Sohyo Federation (General Council of Trade Unions of Japan), formed under the approving watch of GHQ (General Headquarters of the Allied Powers) and SCAP (Supreme Commander for the Allied Powers), gradually developed stronger leftist tendencies. At the same time, the Sanbetsu Federation (Japan Council of Industrial Labor Unions), which had ties to the Japanese Communist Party, had declined. Thus, Sohyo was able to play a powerful role in improving labor conditions and was active on various political fronts. The second period lasted from the 1973 oil crisis to the collapse of Japan's bubble economy at the beginning of the 1990s. During this time Sohyo had lost its ability to influence unions in the private enterprise sector, as corporate management undertook rationalization measures in response to the economic recession that followed the oil crisis. In contrast, the Domei Federation (Japan Federation of Labor) and IMF-JC (Japan Council of International Metalworkers' Federation), which were nationwide rightist unions, enlarged their power to boost wages. In line with the policies favored by these rightist labor unions, Japan's two major labor federations, Sohyo and Domei, formed a united front. The third period began in the early 1990s. After Japan's economic bubble burst and for the next ten years, a time known as "the lost decade," Japan's economy found itself mired in the greatest recession since World War II. Corporate restructuring accelerated and economic development in the name of globalization was promoted, but labor unions found themselves unable to devise effective countermeasures to the changes approved over their heads, and thus became insignificant.

First Period (1948–1973)

During the initial postwar period the labor movement, led by the Sanbetsu, which was heavily influenced by the Communist Party, developed into the most aggressive political and industrial action force in the history of modern Japan. For example, unions acquired the power to severely erode the decision-making prerogatives of corporate management. However, a few years after coming into existence, Sanbetsu lost all influence. The reverse-direction occupation policy of GHQ/SCAP and resistance by management, which was eager to reconstruct Japan's economy, along with criticism from inside the unions of extreme leftist tendencies and a lack of union democracy, had a crippling effect.

In 1950 Sohyo was founded with the support of GHQ/SCAP to replace Sanbetsu. But with the sudden outbreak of the Korean War and the "Red Purge" of workers presumed to be communists and their sympathizers from public office and the workplace, within one year of its formation Sohyo was in defiance of GHQ/SCAP based on calls for the conclusion of a full-scale peace treaty and voiced objections to rearmament. Sohyo's conversion from a labor organization with a rightist outlook to one that embraced a leftist philosophy, known in Japan as "the chicken to the duck" transformation, was born of a worker consciousness that had become more combative against the background of an international political environment that was starting to crystallize around the Cold War.

The Sohyo movement developed along three dimensions. The first was political confrontation. Sohyo organized a popular movement against the various anti-labor and anti-peace policies of the government, such as military rearmament, and united with the Japan Socialist Party (JSP), which Sohyo supported, to form the "Japan Socialist Party–Sohyo Block." The second and unsurprising dimension was providing support for improved working conditions through union activism, while the third dimension was campaigning for greater worker control of the workplace.

As for the fight for higher wages, the centerpiece of campaigns to improve working conditions, Sohyo's origination of the shunto (annual spring offensives in support of wage increases) is particularly important. The first shunto occurred in fall 1954, when in response to a proposal put forward by Kaoru Ohta, the chairman of Gokaroren (Japanese Federation of Energy and Chemistry Workers' Unions), five industrial unions organized a joint fight for higher wages, followed in spring 1955 by eight industrial unions joining together. The shunto became a deeply rooted Japanese style of fighting for wage gains because the rightist labor organizations Domei and IMF-JC, formed in 1964, adopted that style for their own springtime wage-hike campaigns.

The shunto style can be described as follows. First, powerful unions in the private sector achieve strong wage gains. Second, their success is filtered through the Shitetsusoren (General Federation of Private Railway and Bus Workers' Unions of Japan) and is spread to the Korokyo (Council of Public Corporations and Government Enterprises Labor Unions Council), an umbrella organization for various unions like Kokuro (National Railway Labor Union). Third, the fore-going becomes reflected in the wage-hike recommendations of the National Personnel Authority, which decides national government civil service salaries, a procedure that is also linked to salary decisions for local government employees. Finally, this train-like action influences the annual setting of minimum wages for remaining groups of workers around the country.

In effect, shunto functions to establish the social standards that govern pay-raise decisions in Japan. Strongly motivated to boost the wages of workers, shunto became a process by which unions demanded uniform pay raises for all enterprises regardless of the type of industry in question. Two conditions made this process possible. The first was uniform pay raises that did not greatly affect competitive conditions between enterprises, and the second was supportive labor market conditions made possible by labor shortages during times of high economic growth.

Sohyo also pioneered various kinds of workplace control, particularly during the labor strife on the shopfloor in the 1950s. In one typical case involving the coal industry, where poor working and health conditions led to a relatively high degree of solidarity among miners, the union for this industry tried to achieve workplace control by opposing the foreman. In one famous labor action, the Miike labor union of the Mitsui Mining Co. Ltd. successfully maneuvered to control the equal distribution of coalmining work to miners. However, Mitsui Mining fought back, arguing that the union was infringing the management's workplace rights and obstructing growth in productivity. In 1959 it found a way to strike back at the union as the conversion of Japan's national energy policy from coal to petroleum provided an opportunity to make large-scale dismissals of nearly 1,300 people, including powerful union activists. It is clear that the dismissals were intended to weaken the union and its control of the workplace.

At the same time, this particular labor dispute was connected to a broader social conflict over revision of the Japan–US Security Treaty, which developed intensely into Japan's biggest postwar popular political movement. This labor dispute experienced many ups and downs. Some union members who opposed the aggressive policies of the union split away to form a second union and one member was stabbed to death by a criminal gang, while on the other hand the spouses of union members devoted themselves to organizing "housewife associations" and joining the dispute. But after the government in power railroaded a revised Security Treaty through Japan's parliament (the Diet), the opposition to the treaty dissolved and was followed by the defeat of the union in what had been an intense labor dispute for nearly one year.

Following labor's defeat in the Miike dispute, Japan experienced all-out economic growth in the 1960s and Japan largely turned into a mass consumption society. Also, old-fashioned work skills gave way to new skills following a process in which workers on the factory floor were introduced to new mechanical equipment as a result of capital investments in technological innovations. Among workers there was of course some resistance to the changes, but the strong desire for more affluence facilitated acceptance of the new equipment, even though this led to the dilution of labor skills and corporate wage policies that created a tiered wage structure tied to differences in work ability. This desire chipped away at a worker consciousness that Japanese workers shared in common with workers around the world, a consciousness that held that workers should demand the greatest pay for the least amount of work and that it was natural for unions to control work on the shopfloor. It is the reason why working-class consciousness was weakened and a middle-class consciousness took firm hold among Japanese workers.

This transformation in worker consciousness was rooted in the fact that the labor skills workers possessed were not constituted into a common social system due to the weakness of guild control over craftsmanship during premodern times and the collapse of the vocational education system in modern times. Therefore they came to rely on working hard for a particular company, not on labor unions formed around their particular labor skills. High economic growth acted to weaken working-class consciousness and strengthen middle-class consciousness by offering more chances to workers to demonstrate their work ability. Needless to say, this change in consciousness dovetailed nicely with policies advocated by management that were designed to raise production efficiency. As worker consciousness underwent a major change, unions affiliated with Domei managed to gradually expand their power.

In contrast to Sohyo, Domei and IMF-JC, adhering to a policy of a greater distribution of the fruits of a company's success, cooperated with the effort by corporate industrial management to boost productivity through replacing outdated equipment. This policy conformed with the insatiable drive by workers to raise their standard of living through the acquisition of a large number of consumer goods. Unions under the control of management-friendly Domei achieved a dominant position among unions at large-scale corporations through adroit exploitation of worker self-interest. Most likely, however, the policies pursued by Domei ended up subordinating the needs of workers to the logic of the corporate enterprise. Moreover, because the expansion of Domei-affiliated unions undermined the basis of Sohyo's organized opposition to management, both labor organizations inevitably clashed with each other. Because of Domei, in this way from the late 1960s onward, Sohyo gradually began to lose support among the unions at major private corporations. As a result, Sohyo's main base of organized workers became limited to public sector unions with no connection to market competition, and the unions at small and medium-sized private businesses.

Although workers gradually adopted a more conservative outlook in conjunction with improvements in their standard of living during the high economic growth period, from 1968 to the beginning of the 1970s university students, feeling too pigeonholed in an increasingly managed society, exploded into rebellion against the stifling supervision of university administrations. The rebellion of youth around the world had a homogeneous character that incorporated the anti-war movement in the US that opposed the Vietnam War and the student movements in France and Germany opposed to the development of a more structured society. The resistance movement in Japan consisted of the “new left,” the children of the anti-Security Treaty movement in 1960, and students unaffiliated with any of the established political parties (the so-called Non-Sect Radicals), young people suffused with anger who were the most sensitive to the changes happening in Japanese society and bursting with a desire for self-expression.

In addition, around 1970 there was an outbreak of multiple pollution-related health disasters, such as Minamata disease, the itai-itai disease, chronic asthma, and many more. Business activities that only had economic growth as the primary objective caused water contamination, air pollution, and other forms of environmental destruction. Intense reactions of grassroots concern in local communities and among the victims of a degraded environment led to cross-examinations of offending companies and of central and local governments to assess who was responsible. Furthermore, in 1971, farmers, supported by students and workers, offered strong resistance to government efforts to expropriate farmland in order to construct a planned international airport in Narita city in Chiba Prefecture. The struggle against the construction of Narita Airport became deeply inscribed in the public’s mind as a result of the intense objections raised to the unilateral exercise by government of its power to take away a community’s livelihood.

Second Period (1974–1990)

In this period the advanced industrialized countries suffered “stagflation,” a combination of inflation and stagnation, due to the oil crisis triggered by the fourth Middle Eastern war in October 1973. In Japan, during the 1974 shunto, unions achieved a substantial wage increase of 32.9 percent corresponding to extreme inflation. That led government and business organizations to argue that wage hikes served to accelerate inflation, and so they began a campaign to restrain wage gains in time for the next shunto in 1975.

Acting in sympathy with this argument, Domei and IMF-JC moved to exercise self-restraint over pay raises. In the end the wage gains for unionized employees at major companies resulting from the 1975 shunto were restricted to an average of 13.1 percent, substantially less than what was demanded. After this IMF-JC took over the leadership of shunto, and an abnormal situation settled in which low wage gains continued over the long term even after companies managed to weather the effects of the oil crisis. With defeat now marking campaigns for wage increases, many unions belonging to Sohyo began to call it “the end of shunto.” The result was that Domei-affiliated unions, which acquiesced in subordinating worker needs to the logic of enterprise, conversely gained the upper hand in the labor movement, while the idea inspired by Sohyo at the time of the first shunto of establishing social standards for wage increases on the basis of the needs of the workers and of continuing to press management as a prerequisite of business activities was weakened.

But this does not mean there was no resistance by labor during this time. From among the Sohyo-affiliated unions at small and medium-sized companies that fell into bankruptcy as a result of the economic downturn induced by the oil crisis, new worker efforts emerged. Under their own form of management and control, unions at shuttered factories sought to guarantee a place of employment for themselves. At the same time, the kind of worker self-management movements that existed in countries like Great Britain and France started to appear in Japan.

In comparison with workers employed by major corporations, the workers at small and medium-sized companies, where wage levels and other working conditions were inferior, searched for ways to manage factories on their own in order to revitalize their companies. These workers found themselves in confrontation with court-appointed administrators and others trying to effect legal bankruptcies, or they shared extremely low-level working conditions based on difficult conditions caused by corporate bankruptcy. This kind of struggle has continued in Japan on a long-term basis for two to three years or in some cases even longer. In the end, some workers managed to finally establish a new small company, where they can then try experimenting with making democratic decision-making compatible with efficient corporate management amidst severe market competition.

In addition, one important fight from this time that cannot be forgotten was the fight to recapture the right to strike, which is being attempted mainly in regard to Kokuro. Japan's public sector employees lost their right to engage in labor disputes when the civil servant law was reformed in 1948 as a result of the "MacArthur letter" being issued. But in November 1975 Korokyo attempted an extended eight-day strike directed mainly at Kokuro at the same time the Miki Takeo cabinet, the most liberal Liberal-Democratic Party (LDP) cabinet ever, was inaugurated. This strike depended on Kokuro launching a tough counter-offensive against a plan that was devised four years earlier by the Japanese National Railways authorities to weaken the power of unions through a productivity improvement drive that was in name only. But faced with hardline opposition to allowing the right to strike from a conservative faction within the LDP, this extraordinary undertaking, known as the "strike to recapture the right to strike," ended in defeat. The defeat of this strike effort reduced the militancy of a powerful public sector union like Kokuro and represented a devastating blow to Sohyo's union base, all of which had a later negative effect on Japan's labor movement.

The existence of this Kokuro union delivered another decisive shock to Sohyo's survival when in 1987 Japanese National Railways was broken up and privatized. When the Suzuki cabinet came into office in 1980, restructuring of government administration in order to achieve fiscal reform without resorting to tax increases was raised as an important policy consideration. The focus became privatization of the Japanese National Railways, which was burdened by an enormous deficit. But behind the scenes was a plan to weaken the power of Kokuro, which had a relatively strong voice in the workplace given its powerful organization abilities.

In 1982, Yasuhiro Nakasone, who succeeded Suzuki as prime minister, acted to limit as much as possible government intervention in the economy in line with the neoliberal policies espoused by British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher and US President Ronald Reagan. Trust was placed in market mechanisms. As privatization of public enterprises was now viewed as an important step in the direction of reforming government administration, the spotlight was focused on forcing through the breakup and privatization of the Japanese National Railways. Four labor unions affiliated with the Japanese National Railways, which organized to oppose privatization under this process, were unable to cooperate.

Doro (powered vehicle labor union) and other labor unions stopped participating in the campaign of opposition, which resulted in Kokuro being isolated. Moreover, driven by worries about the loss of jobs, union members began to quit Kokuro. Faced with the hardline stance of the central government and the Japanese National Railways authorities, Kokuro convened a special meeting in September 1986 at which time a proposal by the union's executive committee to recognize the breakup and privatization of the Japanese National Railways was denied. When a new executive committee was elected, Kokuro dismembered. Once this schism occurred, more union members resigned, leaving Kokuro with vastly reduced influence in the ranks of Japanese labor.

In sum, Kokuro's battle against the breakup and privatization of the Japanese National Railways was bound to be defeated in the face of intimidation from the government and the authorities. Quite probably Kokuro itself had problems, such as a relaxation of labor discipline among union members who were in a position to exercise control in the workplace. On the other hand, other key factors cannot be ignored. The unsympathetic regard for Kokuro by unions at private companies which had overcome the adverse economic effects of the oil crisis and, similarly, by people who had developed stronger inward-looking conservative tendencies in the wake of the oil crisis played a role in the collapse of the movement to oppose the privatization of the Japanese National Railways. The defeat of Kokuro in its labor struggles marked the beginning of difficulties for unions functioning within Japanese society to maintain a fight with no loss of worker pride.

At nearly the same time as the battle to oppose the Japanese National Railways privatization, a unified Japanese labor front materialized. At one time toward the end of the 1960s there was a discussion about a united labor front, but differences in labor movement philosophy between Sohyo and Domei caused them to collapse. In 1978, however, the need for a unified labor front, primarily among private enterprise unions, was once again raised by Domei. In reply, Zensendomei (Japanese Federation of Textile, Garment, Chemical, and Mercantile Workers' Unions), a Domei-affiliated union, and Tekkororen (Japan Iron and Steel Industry Labor Union Federation), which was the core union of IMF-JC though a Sohyo member, issued a call in support of the unified front concept to private enterprise unions. At this point, successive shunto failures for the labor movement as a result of severe economic conditions provided the reason why a stronger voice was needed in government policy decision-making, in order to achieve better living conditions for workers through favorable economic and social welfare policies. But in addition to this, in the workplaces of private enterprises, differences in union activities resulting from belonging to the two different national federations, Sohyo and Domei, were minimized. Because of the economic downturn caused by the oil crisis, the need to maintain employment functioned to temper existing differences and disagreement in labor union policy toward such matters as rationalization.

Workers were urged to accept the idea that stable company management through stronger corporate competitiveness was a matter of vital importance. As a result, at the end of 1982, Zenminrokyo (All-Japan Private Labor Union Council) was the first united council of unions to form in the private enterprise sector. The organization then began to take harsh action, such as expelling unions that were strongly influenced by the Japanese Communist Party. This led in 1987 to the formation of Minkanrengo (Japan Private Labor Union Federation), an umbrella labor organization of the entire body of unions in the private enterprise sector. Next, 1989 witnessed the dissolution of Sohyo, and Domei, as the main organized labor body in the public sector, was dismantled through the privatization of the Japanese National Railways. Formed in the aftermath was Rengo (Japan Labor Union General Federation), which now serves as the umbrella labor organization for most unions, including those in the public sector.

In resisting labor front unification, the small number of unions under the influence of the Japanese Socialist Party's left wing and the Japanese Communist Party each formed separate small national federations of labor unions. For the present, Rengo's formation is a major event to the extent that it has managed to subsume the pre-World War II disagreements between labor's left and right. But the result has been a weakening of the independence and the will of Japanese workers to resist. Here it can be seen that, with the passing of the age of affluence, this outcome has become reflected in a change in human values that marks an unmistakable turning point in contemporary thought.

Third Period (Post-1990s)

With the collapse of the bubble economy at the beginning of the 1990s, the Japanese economy became mired in the longest and deepest economic depression since the end of World War II. What has become known as the "lost decade" had arrived, but this was accompanied by other major historical events around the world: the "big story" of the collapse of the Berlin Wall and a form of globalization that was based on spreading an American-style market capitalism. As for the labor movement, it now found itself even more on the sidelines. Faced by a deep economic depression and more competitive markets, Japanese companies accelerated corporate rationalization in order to achieve the cost reductions that would help provide them with a sharper competitive edge. Long-term employment practices were abandoned, the use of new types of employment increased, and performance-based working principles were introduced. The discarding of the custom of long-term employment, a distinctive feature of Japan's longstanding employment system, while decreasing the number of full-time employees and, through an increased division of labor, replacing them with temporary agency workers, contract workers, part-timers, free-floating part-timers, and other kinds of unconventional workers was also accompanied by layoffs of full-time workers unresponsive to the greater number of demands coming from management. Even when full-time employees were retained, another fundamental change in the employment system was the introduction of merit-pay systems tied to short-term business performance results.

The reorganization of the employment system functioned, on the one hand, to augment the work loads of the slimmed-down full-time labor force, and on the other hand to increase reliance on the unconventional employment of women and young people and to further enlarge differences in the employment structure. In contrast, ignoring the existing slow-moving unions, this base of irregular workers formed community unions, unions for administrative workers, unions for part-timers and temporary workers, or woman-only unions. Furthermore, worker cooperatives sprang up. All of this was a sign that various forms of resistance to unjust corporate layoffs and unilaterally imposed low working conditions had taken root. In what has become a difficult age, this free experimentation with solidarity by workers who are strongly motivated to guard their own employment and lives and attempts by workers to resist discrimination and labor inequalities represent important developments. Also, Rengo, which sits at the center of the nation's labor organization, has become sensitized to these new events and has started to help unionize part-timers and tackle improvements in the labor conditions applicable to unconventional forms of employment. It can no longer afford to overlook the vigorous attempts that are underway to correct workforce disparities and the newly emerging employment problems.

Conclusion

Japan's postwar labor movement generally suffered defeat in the major struggles that took place during the period of high economic growth. An important factor is that for Japanese workers, rather than realizing a vision of life based on forming social bonds with labor unions, the development of a job–workplace–company platform that encourages a sense of self-identity has cleared the way to a certain inherent mentality. Because Japanese managers are promoted from within the rank-and-file they are in a position to be familiar with the humiliation and depression of workers. By talking of the worker mentality in a management context, management has succeeded in converting this depression into energy for the job. The social class divisions between workers and managers are few, but they are strong enough to be a factor in causing brittleness in the Japanese labor movement.

However, as a result, what now faces Japanese workers is the amount of damage done to civic freedoms caused by working hours that are so long that death through overwork has become routine, and by the excessive demands companies endlessly put on their workers. Postwar Japanese workers have been deprived of the “bountiful times” that bring a modestly affordable lifestyle as well as depth and variety to life.

Japan, pacifist movement, 1945–present

Ichijo Muto

After Imperial Japan's defeat in World War II in 1945, a broad pacifist social consensus emerged in Japan. By 1995, it came to permeate not just the peace movement, but also social movements in general as their guiding spirit. For decades this pacifism enjoyed majority popular support and served as one of the defining characteristics of post-World War II Japanese state and society.

This pacifism, however, was neither a clearly defined credo nor the sole guiding principle of state and society in postwar Japan. It had to live in chronic conflict with two other factors defining the state – military alliance with the United States and the ruling group's usually concealed allegiance to, and justification of, the Japanese imperial past, both war-friendly and incompatible with pacifism. Indeed, this pacifism has seen concentrated attacks from conservative forces headed by far right political and ideological groups which set out in the mid-1990s to remake the postwar Japanese state into a new type of war-capable regime. They pursued two goals: legitimating the now unconstitutional Japanese military by changing the constitution in order to more fully satisfy US strategic global requirements, and openly reinstating the “glory” of the modern Japanese empire. The postwar pacifist principle is the main obstacle to the achievement of this design.

The Historical Backdrop: Three Factors at Work

This pacifism came into being reflecting a few historical factors that conditioned postwar development in Japan. First, the broadest popular base of this pacifism was the bitter wartime experience of the common people. Three million Japanese died in the 15-year war since the 1931 invasion of Manchuria, and in the last stage of this long war, US aerial bombings devastated most cities in mainland Japan, causing the deaths of hundreds of thousands of civilians. The vast majority of the population also cherished democracy, welcoming the collapse of the wartime military fascist rule that had harshly silenced all free expression. It was by the middle of the 1950s that the broad public consensus favoring peace and democracy settled among the Japanese public. Though broadly based, this pacifism had serious limitations, including the failure to clearly recognize the vast sacrifices and damage Japanese imperialism had inflicted on neighboring Asian peoples and the complicity of the Japanese people in wars and aggression. Other weak factors in this pacifism were a clear understanding of the causes of the war and the urge to identify and punish the individuals and groups responsible for the war.

Second, the Hiroshima and Nagasaki genocides by atomic bombs imparted a unique character to postwar Japanese pacifism: the shared public imagination that the entire Japanese people were nuclear victims and that prohibition of nuclear weapons was the Japanese people's cosmopolitan mission to the rest of the world. This perception, galvanized by the 1954 Bikini incident, gave rise to a very broad movement in favor of the prohibition of nuclear weapons.

Third, the constitutional abandonment of war strengthened, and provided a legal ground for, pacifist consensus. The 1946 constitution, known as the Peace Constitution, under Article 9 declared that Japan would abandon war and would not maintain military forces and denied the state's right of belligerency. The US occupation authorities led by General Douglas MacArthur were the first drafters of this constitution. While the US merely wanted by this pacifist clause to demilitarize Japan as a potential enemy, the Japanese people soon reappropriated the constitutional pacifism to resist the US Cold War strategies imposed on them, including remil-itarization. Under popular pressure, the conservative government adopted a series of peace policy guidelines as "principles," such as three non-nuclear principles (no manufacture, no possession, and no introduction of nuclear weapons) and three principles restricting arms export. The conservative governments did not fully subscribe to pacifism but felt that its use would facilitate their rule over a peace-oriented public.

Japan and Okinawa under US Imperial Strategy

By far the strongest factor faced by postwar Japanese pacifism was Japan's full integration into the system of US imperial dominance through the US–Japan Security Treaty. In 1952, Japan regained independence through the San Francisco peace treaty but simultaneously signed the security treaty accepting continued US military presence. The United States has maintained numerous permanent bases and military troops in Japan since 1945. (The treaty, revised in 1960, still continues today.)

In addition, the occupation authorities ordered the creation of Japanese military forces immediately after the outbreak of the Korean War in 1950, first ostensibly as a police reserve force. In subsequent decades, however, this so-called self-defense force was built up as the world's third most expensive modern military force, complementing the US forces deployed in Asia-Pacific. From the beginning this military force was unconstitutional, but Japanese conservative governments have managed to find one interpretation after another of the constitutional clause to justify the military build-up. This was not only to better serve US interests but also to fulfill the ruling elites' dream of some day reinstating their gloried imperial past with a full-fledged constitutional armament.

Okinawa, the southwestern chain of islands now belonging to Japan, has traversed a very difficult path in relation to Japan and the United States. Annexed in 1872–9 as an internal colony of Imperial Japan, the people of the former Ryukyu kingdom were subjected to discrimination and poverty. In 1945, when Japan's defeat was imminent, the Tokyo government chose to order a desperate resistance in Okinawa against surging US forces. In the fiercest ground battle fought in World War II, an estimated 120,000

Okinawa civilians were killed and the land was turned to debris. The Japanese army ordered Okinawa civilians to fight with it and ordered them not to surrender, forcing them to kill themselves when the situation became desperate. After conquering the islands, the US turned Okinawa into its military colony, building huge bases which have been used freely for the Korean, Vietnam, and Iraq wars.

Under the San Francisco peace treaty, Japan willingly surrendered to the United States the right to exercise all and any powers of administration, legislation, and jurisdiction over the territory and inhabitants of Okinawa, allowing the US to use it as its exclusive military territory. In fact, the early postwar US policy of demilitarizing Japan was predicated on the indefinite US retention of Okinawa as the largest US overseas military citadel to serve its global military requirements.

Though Okinawa reverted to Japan's sovereignty in 1972, the US and Japanese governments agreed to continued American military presence at Okinawa. Even now, 75 percent of the US bases present in Japan are concentrated on Okinawa. After the September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks in New York, a series of new US–Japan arrangements for military transformation has been introduced to strengthen the US and Japanese posture of joint military operation, and a new base is being imposed in Okinawa, provoking determined resistance by local people. In their half-century resistance, Okinawa people have developed strong pacifist traditions, thoroughly rejecting any justification of the military.

Anti-Base Action as a Pillar of the Peace Movement

Thus embracing its own version of pacifism, postwar Japan has developed vigorous movements, campaigns, and grassroots resistance pertaining to peace issues. One of the most typical peace struggles has been the anti-military base struggle directed against the presence, expansion, and/or establishment of US bases under the security treaty as well as against Japanese military bases perceived as violations of the peace constitution.

The first wave of anti-base struggle in mainland Japan dates back to the early 1950s when the United States, fighting the Korean War, set out to confiscate fishing people's land for the expansion and/or establishment of military bases. The forerunner was the fishing community's resistance to the US project of using the beach of Uchinada as a firing ground. This struggle, fought in 1952–3 jointly by peace movement, labor, and other social movements, drew national support and achieved victory. Similar struggles unfurled around US base projects all over the country and culminated in the Sunagawa struggle in 1955–7. This was a dynamic mass resistance by the organized farmers of the affected village of Sunagawa, joined by workers and students, to the expansion of the Tachikawa US air base on the fringe of Tokyo. It finally achieved victory in 1968 when the US scrapped the plan.

The Sunagawa struggle was of landmark significance too because it called into question the constitutionality of the US–Japan military treaty. The Tokyo District Court acquitted those accused of trespass of the US base area by declaring the treaty unconstitutional. This sent a shock wave through the Japanese government. The Supreme Court immediately overturned the Tokyo court verdict, claiming that security treaty matters belonged in the realm of “political judgment” and were not amenable to judicial judgment. Since then the court, using this flimsy legal argument, has systematically evaded judgment over the constitutionality of the US military presence in Japan.

Resistance to Japanese military bases also developed. In a lawsuit filed in Hokkaido against the destruction of forests by the construction of a missile base, local residents won a district court verdict declaring that the self-defense forces were unconstitutional. Again the higher court rejected this by recourse to the same “political judgment” logic as in the Sunagawa case. Since the 1950s it has become the tradition of Japanese progressive movements to take action against strengthened US and Japanese military arrangements, ranging from operation of military bases through visits by US aircraft carriers, to transportation of munitions to Vietnam.

Okinawa Develops its Own Pacifism

The anti-base protest in Okinawa has taken more acute forms than on the mainland. The first major confrontation came in 1956 when the US wanted to establish permanent land tenure for people's land used for bases. The struggle, known as the "whole island struggle," exploded in island-wide action, forcing the US to retract its policy. Faced with the harsh repression of resistance by the US military authorities, Okinawa people by 1960 started a movement for reunification with Japan, thinking that Okinawa, by "going back" to Japan, would come under the rule of the pacifist constitution. In the subsequent protest against the bases and military rule, particularly during the Vietnam War when Okinawa was used for B52 bombing operations in Vietnam, the anti-base movement in Okinawa developed into a genuine pacifist movement, rejecting the military as murderous machinery under the slogan "Life is the treasure."

Anti-Nuclear Bomb Movement: Hiroshima/Nagasaki

In the early postwar years, the occupation authorities severely restricted reports about the atomic genocide in Hiroshima and Nagasaki. Stories, poems, and photos about what happened in the two cities in August 1945 were practically banned and circulated only secretly. So when the occupation ended in 1952, information about the atomic genocides gushed out, shocking the public. In 1954, the US test-exploded a hydrogen bomb on the Bikini atoll in the Pacific, and radioactive fallout affected the crew of a Japanese fishing boat operating outside the danger zone.

This incident, known as the Bikini incident, triggered an unprecedentedly broad popular movement against atomic and hydrogen bombs. The movement, initiated by grassroots women's groups collecting signatures against nuclear tests, spread like wildfire throughout the country, with tens of millions of people signing the petition. On this basis, a national coordinating center was founded, including both conservatives and progressives, eventually leading to the founding of the Japan Council against A&H Bombs (Gensuikyo).

This movement immediately decided to appeal to world public opinion under the slogan "No more Hiroshimas" and ventured to convene a World Conference against Atomic and Hydrogen Bombs in Hiroshima in 1955. Five thousand people representing a broad spectrum of Japanese society participated with 50 foreign delegates from 11 countries. Survivors of the atomic bombings (hibakusha), neglected for a decade, raised their voice for the first time, coming together to participate in the world conference and to demand protective legislation from the Japanese government.

The issue of nuclear bombs was thus injected into world politics for the first time on the basis of the actual experience of victims. The movement held an annual world conference in subsequent years while serving as the broadest base of the Japanese peace movement. It experienced splits over the Sino-Soviet dispute compounded by socialist/communist rivalry in the 1960s, but has survived into the twenty-first century, holding international anti-nuclear events around August 6 and 9, the dates of the Hiroshima and Nagasaki bombings.

Pacifism as Militant Value: The 1960 Anti-Treaty Struggle

Postwar pacifism organically linked with the protection of democracy showed its political edge in 1960 as Prime Minister Kishi Nobusuke signed a new security treaty to strengthen Japan's military role in the US Asian strategy. Pacifist ideas had captured the people's imagination, particularly after the emergence of the anti-bomb movement. Besides, the public was on the alert because Kishi was a notorious class-A war criminal who had served as a minister in the Tojo cabinet in 1941. Sensing that the dark ages of war and fascism would return unless they resisted, millions of people stood up to oppose the treaty in the largest political mobilization in postwar Japan.

But the Kishi government railroaded the treaty through parliament while hundreds of thousands of protestors surrounded the Diet building. President Dwight Eisenhower, on his way to Tokyo to celebrate the treaty's ratification, had to cancel his trip as the Tokyo police could not guarantee his safety. Though the new treaty took effect, Kishi was forced to resign, and the ruling groups felt that it would be wise to come to a compromise with pacifism while avoiding confrontation and promising a better life through rapid economic growth.

Radical Upsurge, 1965–1975

This policy worked for some time, and peace, increasingly reinterpreted as the preservation of the status quo, seemed to have lost its militant edge. However, the doldrums were ended with the outbreak of the Vietnam War, giving rise to a period of global radical activism with anti-war protests, radical students' revolts, a new wave of the feminist movement, and struggles for all kinds of minority rights.

In Japan, a new radical movement targeted at fundamental social change sprang up. It included a number of elements, such as a radical student movement, a new anti-Vietnam War movement, and new left political groups. Postwar pacifism in these turbulent days was revitalized, acquiring a new edge that cut into the status quo. In particular, Beheiren (Peace for Vietnam Committee), an entirely new type of peace movement founded in 1965, totally renovated the idea and style of previous Japanese peace movements. While established social movements, tamed by economic prosperity, were increasingly accepting the status quo, Beheiren, together with other radical movements of the period, criticized the status quo itself as an integral part of the American war in Vietnam and oppressive national and global realities. A loose coalition of groups and individuals, Beheiren denounced Japan's complicity in the Vietnam War by offering bases and logistics. Of the several major non-violent confrontations, the Sagami-hara munitions depot protest in 1972 was typical: thousands of citizens, joined by municipalities, effectively halted transportation of repaired American tanks from the depot to the Yokohama port from where they were to be shipped to the Vietnam front.

A self-critical review of Japan's imperial past, absent in postwar pacifism, started in this period on a socially significant scale. This radical stance stimulated and largely remade the public pacifist tradition, and the Beheiren movement spread quickly, giving rise to spontaneous initiatives and action all over the country. Beheiren surprised the public in 1968 by announcing that it had smuggled to Sweden three US soldiers who had deserted in Japan. This activity to work on American soldiers from Vietnam was continued throughout the Vietnam War period. Many non-violent mass actions were organized against military exercises, weapons transportation to Vietnam, port calls of US aircraft carriers, and the Japanese government's acts of support for the American war.

In the 1970s, after student occupation of campuses and street fights with the police, community-based actions began to spread all over the country against nuclear power plant and other "development" projects that jeopardized people's lives and environment. In the 1980s the Cold War escalated. When one million people demonstrated in New York in June 1982 for a nuclear freeze, half a million people in Tokyo and 300,000 in Osaka turned out in huge rallies for nuclear disarmament, while a vigorous national campaign developed against the introduction of Tomahawk cruise missiles. But this was the peak for mobilization on peace issues in mainland Japan.

Post-Cold War Militarization: Okinawa Leading Pacifist Resistance

In the 1990s, after the end of the Cold War, the United States set out to fully mobilize Japan. This involved pressure for rapid militarization through "redefinition of the security alliance," a new process in Japan's militarization accelerated by the post-September 11 US imperial design. This process involved a series of new security arrangements with the United States at the administrative level, beginning in 1997 with new guidelines for US–Japan security cooperation and culminating in the 2005 agreement titled "Transformation and Realignment for the Future," under which the self-defense force command was practically integrated with the US command to engage in joint operations in and beyond Asia. The same process witnessed the rise of the far right in Japanese politics, aiming to abolish Article 9 of the pacifist constitution. The US and the Japanese far right, despite their different visions and motivations, concurred on this point and cooperated to uproot the postwar pacifist principle from Japanese soil.

The new scheme to strengthen US military bases all over Japan kicked off a fresh wave of anti-base action. This was again spearheaded by protest in Okinawa, where in 1995, a major anti-base struggle rocked both the Tokyo government and Washington following the rape of a 12-year-old-girl by US soldiers. Washington and Tokyo felt they had to do something in response to this situation and began to talk about "alleviating the burden on Okinawa." Under this pretense, however, the US and Japanese governments agreed to build a new US marine base to replace an old one that had to be scrapped.

Protest against the construction of the base off the coast of Henoko beach soon became a focus of the anti-base movement. From November 2004 through September 2005, Okinawa activists and community members, with supporters from overseas as well as other parts of the country, engaged in daily non-violent action at sea, using canoes and boats to obstruct sea-bottom drilling work for the base project.

Faced by growing opposition, the Japanese government had to abandon this plan. But under the 2005 arrangement, the US and Japanese governments decided to build a larger base, of a different design, close by the original site. The struggle was resumed against this new project in 2007. The Okinawan movement is in solidarity with anti-base movements in and beyond Asia and the Pacific through its close links with a new global anti-base network formalized in March 2007 in Ecuador.

The 2005 security arrangement with the US involves reorganization and reinforcement of major US military bases in mainland Japan, too. The main US military facilities for reorganization include the Yokosuka naval base, Atsugi naval air base, Yokota air base, Iwakuni marine air base, Zama army base, and Sagami-hara army base. All of these base-strengthening steps are opposed by local communities, headed in most cases by mayors and municipal offices. Committed to the new strategic role assigned by Washington, the Japanese government is using a carrot and stick approach to impose its plans on local people.

Compared to a few decades ago, the pacifist base of Japanese society has been considerably eroded. But it continues to hold out against the far right offensive and US military demands, so much so that in opinion polls, around 60 percent of the population want to keep Article 9 intact. As the Liberal Democratic Party is pressing revision of the constitution within a few years, a major confrontation over pacifism is likely.

Japan, post-World War II protest movements

Yohichi Sakai

The Japanese imperialist and colonial war waged against China from 1931 and expanded into Southeast Asia and the Pacific region in 1941 was brought to an end, not internally through a popular revolt or uprising by Japanese workers or soldiers, but by Emperor Hirohito's declaration of Japanese surrender and acceptance of the Potsdam Ultimatum issued by the United States, United Kingdom, China, and the Soviet Union on August 15, 1945.

The US military occupation began at the end of August, and the instrument of Japanese surrender was signed at the beginning of September. The domination of Japan by the General Headquarters (GHQ) under the Allied Occupation supreme commander Douglas MacArthur started as an indirect rule, with the GHQ directing and controlling the Japanese governmental administrative machinery, including the emperor. When Imperial Japan surrendered, there were two major sources of possible social explosion, the urban working masses and rural peasants under the landlord–tenant system. The response of both workers and peasants to their new, highly exploitative situation was not immediate.

Japan began to industrialize in the 1930s, growing to over six million workers in factories, mines, and transport in 1941. This new proletarian industrial workforce had no experience of generalized mass activities under Imperial Japan's despotic and repressive regime. The peak unionization rate was 7.9 percent, out of 4.67 million workers in 1931, and the highest number of workers who participated in labor dispute actions was 123,000 out of 6 million workers in 1937, when the unionization rate was 6.9 percent. Furthermore, the left-wing currents of the workers' movement were severely repressed by the state. The pro-communist union movement was virtually destroyed by the mid-1930s, and the non-communist left-wing union federation was banned in 1937.

The remaining right-wing organization, Nihon Rodo Sodomei (Labor Confederation of Japan), was dissolved in 1940 and the state-controlled Sangyo Hokoku Kai (Industrial Patriotic Federation) and its local unit organizations were established among the workers in 1941. Thus, the subjective condition of the organized workers' movement was rather challenging, even though the unorganized mass workers had a profound capacity for militant explosion and far-reaching aspirations from late 1945 to early 1947.

Japanese agriculture was marked by a specific landlord-tenant system. In 1940, tenant farmers numbered almost 1.5 million (27.1 percent) and tenant farmers with some rights to the land numbered 2 million (42.1 percent) of 5.6 million farm households. The total cultivated area was over 6 million cho (cho = 0.99 hectare), and the tenanted area was over 2.7 million cho (45.5 percent). It is estimated that there were 386,000 landlords, and that 1.284 million cho and 1.119 million cho of the tenant land were owned respectively by 99,000 landlords holding from 1 to 5 cho of tenanted land, and 287,000 landlords holding more than 5 cho. Of these, 220,000 were non-cultivating, "parasitic" landlords in 1940. The annual average tenant rent was 50.6 percent of the yearly harvest in the case of rice paddies. By 1939, more than 200,000 farmers were organized, and the left-wing currents were reflected in the majority in peasant unions from the mid-1920s to the 1930s. Thus, the peasant movement seemed better positioned than workers' movements at the time of the 1945 Japanese defeat in the Pacific War.

Following Imperial Japan's surrender, with a devastated economy, hyperinflation, and deepening economic crisis, the ruling institutions lost political legitimacy. The bourgeoisie and business managers were also thrown into disarray with the US occupation and the imposition of GHQ's policies over Japan. In these circumstances, the social power of workers and peasants was tested and confronted by the US policies from 1946 to 1947.

Economic Crisis and Rise of the Working Masses

At the start of the Pacific War, the whole economy and workforce were already under heavy strain; mining and manufacturing production marked its peak in 1939-41, stagnated in 1943-4, and was damaged heavily by massive US air raids in 1945 and by the first B-29 raids of North Kyushu and Tokyo in June and November 1944. Both cities of Hiroshima and Nagasaki were wiped out by the US A-bombs, and another 117 cities were burned and destroyed extensively by US air raids. More than 2 million houses were burned, and about 9 million people lost their dwellings. After the war, the closure of military plants, paralysis of general production, massive demobilization of the Imperial Army, and repatriation of overseas soldiers and civilians left some 13 million unemployed out of a total Japanese population of 72 million. Concomitantly, in 1947, agricultural production dropped to 76 percent of the 1934-6 average.

The economic crisis greatly increased human misery. First, food shortages became acute, especially in urban areas. Then, the production of coal dropped sharply, and the consequent shortage of the major source of energy became a serious bottleneck for the whole economy. Just after the war, the importation of industrial raw materials was ended, and production was sustained by the stock of raw materials, which were becoming scarce in the fall of 1946. In this atmosphere, wholesale and consumer prices soared and inflation skyrocketed. The government implemented measures to freeze bank deposits, to switch over to the new bank notes, and to limit cash holdings of all the wage earners and households in February 1946. The government's fiscal policy remained inflationary, with the added burden of financing the GHQ's procurement of goods and services.

The GHQ dissolved the zaibatsu enterprise system, purged a considerable number of top-level managers, and liberalized trade union activities. Japanese foreign trade was monopolized completely by the GHQ, and Japanese businesses were prohibited from international commerce. When the war ended the Japanese government owed business enterprises about 96 billion yen, and the GHQ ordered the government to nullify the obligation. The result was extremely wide-scale and radical financial restructuring of the enterprises and financial institutions. Under these circumstances, the capitalist class was in deep disarray without a definitive power structure or clear future economic prospects, and industrial workers and toiling masses were neglected and abandoned by the government and bourgeoisie.

The first workers to rise up after the defeat were Chinese and Korean forced laborers in the Japanese mining industry. About 1 million Koreans and 40,000 Chinese workers were brought to Japan under duress as forced labor during the Pacific War, mostly in coal mining. After the war Koreans and Chinese were forced to remain in coal mine internment camps; they organized themselves at the site and mobilized their colleagues in other mines.

The Koreans and Chinese were not the only workers to organize. Due to the extinction of war production, about 4 million workers were dismissed from factories, and some engaged in organized opposition to the massive dismissal. In general, however, only after the GHQ attempted to “democratize” Japan and bring about broad reforms did working masses begin exploding into struggles and founding trade unions. Mine workers began unionizing under the influence of Korean and Chinese laborers, and went on strikes in early October 1945. At the end of 1945, some 66,000 coal miners were organized into 40 unions in Hokkaido, and about 141,000 miners were organized into the 96 unions throughout Japan.

Soon after, journalists and workers of the Yomiuri Newspaper Company, one of the three major nationwide daily newspaper firms, formed a union and demanded the resignation of the firm’s president and all members of top management due to their culpability in the war, democratic reform of the management structure, and improvement of working conditions. However, the demands were rejected and five representative figures from among the journalists and workers were instantly dismissed by the company president; about 2,000 journalists and workers in the firm then declared and implemented direct control over editing and publication of the daily newspaper on October 25, 1945. Naturally, the contents of the daily became significantly more politically progressive and popular.

When the GHQ ordered the Japanese government to arrest war crimes suspects on December 2, Yomiuri’s president himself was on the list, and the dispute ended with total victory for the journalists and workers after nearly 50 days of worker control over the newspaper. The Yomiuri labor dispute and the journalist and worker control of the daily significantly influenced the broader working masses, setting an exemplary pattern for workers’ struggles to follow.

After these efforts, the working masses rose up and unionized at a phenomenal rate beginning in November 1945. The number of unionized workers increased from 1,000 at the end of September to more than 450,000 by year’s end. In 1946, about 500,000 workers were unionized anew each month in January, February, April, and May, and 1 million alone in March 1946.

The explosive labor uprising and unionization of working masses were primarily spontaneous. At the same time, the process was led and organized largely by the Communist Party (CP), and to a lesser degree by the pro-Socialist Party (SP) veteran trade unionists who had been active in the 1930s. The broad layer of newly formed militant activists flowed into the Communist Party, which grew from 1,083 members in December 1945 to over 200,000 in 1949. Thus, the CP became a powerful left-wing force spearheading the working class. The CP’s initial organizational policy was to set up blue-collar and white-collar factory committees and promote industrial unions based upon the principle of “one union at one factory/establishment” under a national federation.

The preparatory caucus for a new federation of industrial unions was established by major industrial and regional groupings of unions in February, and the Zennihon Sangyobetsu Rodokumiai Kaigi (Sanbetsu Kaigi: Congress of Industrial Unions of Japan) was founded by 21 industrial unions, with a membership of 1.621 million workers, representing 43 percent of all the unionized workers, in August 1946. Upon its founding, Sanbetsu Kaigi was already the driving force and active majority of the entire workers’ movement, and under the firm grip of militant CP trade unionists.

Concurrently with the CP’s activities among the working masses, the pro-SP group of veteran trade unionists worked for their own trade union federation. In October 1945, an organizing group of the Central Preparatory Committee for Trade Union Organization was established by right-wing trade unionists around Komakichi Matsuoka, the former president of the Nihon Rodo Sodomei (Labor Confederation of Japan) and left-wing activists around Minoru Takano, a leading member of the banned Nihon Rodokumiai Zenkoku-Hyogikai (National Council of Trade Unions of Japan). Eventually, the group founded the Nihon Rodokumiai Sodomei (Sodomei: Japan Confederation of Trade Unions) with a membership of about 650,000 workers in August 1946, and its leadership body was dominated by the right-wing figures around K. Matsuoka, its new president. The Sodomei was structured as a centralized organization primarily through its regional components of prefectural federations, although it included several national and regional industrial unions.

The common demands of the unions were recognition and rights of collective bargaining and industrial action, a steep pay increase to account for hyperinflation, and the eight-hour workday. Unions also demanded and pressed for radical reforms of management structures, removal of high-handed management personnel, abolition of blue-collar and white-collar discrimination, revocation of dismissal, and prior agreement by concerned employees and unions on the matter of personnel changes and working conditions.

Peasants' Movement and Agrarian Land Reform

After the surrender of Japan, peasants' rice delivery to the government dropped sharply, so the government made rice delivery compulsory in February 1946. A peasant campaign for voluntary delivery developed in response. The organizing effort also called for fair and democratic allocation of delivery quotas and popular democratization of village administrative bodies and agriculture organizations. Tenant peasants also fought for a decrease in rent payments. Under the circumstances, the organization of peasants proceeded rapidly, and Nihon Nomin Kumiai (Nichino: Japan Peasant Union) was founded as a unified organization of the pro-SP and pro-CP currents, with more than 100,000 peasants in 1946, growing to over 3 million, more than half of the 5.702 million farming households, by 1947.

The Japan Peasant Union was primarily a tenant peasant organization, which initially did not conceive of radical land reform. The GHQ project of Japanese land reform, however, called for larger changes as the most secure foundation for building a sound democracy and the most reliable barrier against the pressure of extremist ideas. Thus, the GHQ initiated its own land reform that set the general course of peasant activities thereafter, bringing the peasant masses into the GHQ's democratization program and hampering the potential for an alliance of workers and tenant peasants. The GHQ's Land Reform Law was enacted in October 1946, setting the upper limit of land holding by the resident but non-cultivating landowner at 1 cho (5 cho in Hokkaido) and providing that all the tenant land owned by the absentee landowners would be bought up by the government and sold to the tenant peasants. From 1947 to 1950, 1.74 million cho of farm land was bought from landowners and 1.93 million cho sold to peasants. The proportion of tenant land of the total farm land decreased from 45.9 percent in 1945 to 10.1 percent in 1950, and the proportion of landowning farmers increased from 32.8 percent in 1946 to 61.9 percent in 1950.

Workers' Production Control and its Potential

As for the industrial actions by unions in this period, workers' and employees' control of the production or business operation played quite an important role. Following the Yomiuri journalists' and workers' control of newspaper production, about 2,500 workers of Keisei Dentetsu, a local electric railway company, set up a union, which took control of all railway operations on December 11, 1945, leading to free transport services for four days. The union demanded recognition of the right to collective bargaining, a five-times wage increase, shorter working hours, resignation of top management officers, and establishment of a joint management council. Workers' control of the railway operation ended with the union's complete victory on December 29.

From January 10 to 29 the following year, 2,000 employees of the Nihon-Kokan Tsurumi Ironworks followed suit, winning an eight-hour workday and the elimination of management's presence on the shop floors. Large-scale organizing also ensued among production, business, and production control operations, including Tokyo Shibaura Engineering Works (14,000 employees, January 12–29, 1946), Kanto Power Distribution (16,000 employees, January 16–26), Toho Eiga (a movie firm: 6,000 employees, March 23–April 6), Hokkaido Colliery & Steamship's coal mines (19,700 miners, April 2–June 7), Tohoku Power Distribution (50,000 employees, May 4–26), and the traffic, waterworks, construction, and other departments of the Tokyo Metropolitan Government (41,000 employees, June 21–30). In all these cases, worker and employee control of production and business operation was adopted and carried out as a means of ending labor disputes combating horrendous economic conditions and high-handed or irresponsible management practices.

Hiroshi Hasegawa, CP Political Bureau member in charge of trade union activities, has argued, however, that these gains had limits. Through the production control struggles, workers obtained the right of veto on management's decisions concerning dismissal, hiring, redeployment, and matters of working conditions. They also gained the right to intervene in management decision-making in general and were able to restrain some management prerogatives. Indeed, the struggles for production control signified the beginning of working-class struggle toward the socialist revolution. The problem, however, was that the anti-capitalistic revolutionary perspective of production and business control was not defended and promoted positively, nor was the awareness of this anti-capitalist potential propagated actively among the worker activists and broader working masses.

Indeed, the production control struggles required the broader nationalization of major industries and generalized workers' control of production and the working-class struggle for its own government. But the CP's orientation upheld the moderate framework of "democratic revolution," with no room for anti-capitalist elements in its strategic program. As for Sanbetsu Kaigi, which was under the tight influence of CP activists, its platform was fundamentally "democratic" too. While those unions that fought the production control struggles mostly joined the industrial federations that were established by Sanbetsu Kaigi, and though the latter earnestly defended the struggles for control of production and business operations, its platform said nothing about nationalizing major industries and worker control of production.

GHQ's Policy Shift

In tandem with the workers' and peasants' movements, popular unrest began to spread. Street demonstrations, mass rallies, various campaigns for securing food supplies, and defense of production control spread from late 1945 through spring of 1946. Though spontaneous and embryonic, elements of the dual-power situation were emerging sporadically at the workplace and in the streets. The Japanese machinery of state and government were thrown into deep crisis with the dismantling of the military force of the Imperial Army.

On May 1, the first May Day after the Japanese surrender, 500,000 people rallied at the Imperial Palace Plaza in Tokyo, and there were 2 million participants nationwide. The popular mobilization reached its peak at the Foodstuffs May Day as 250,000 people gathered at the Imperial Palace Plaza demanding an adequate supply of food, popular control over all foodstuffs, and the formation of a democratic government by the SP and CP, based upon the democratic front of trade unions, peasants' organizations, and cultural associations.

The rising tide of massive workers' struggles entered a critical phase in which the workers' movement collided head-on with the GHQ and its global policy. The GHQ's orientation was a government system of parliamentary democracy with the social order of a capitalist economy; however, the workers' struggles for production control and the popular street mobilizations were becoming a serious threat to the GHQ's global policy, both socially and politically.

The GHQ's political project was to introduce a moderate system of parliamentary democracy after dismantling the highly oppressive ancien régime of Imperial Japan. The GHQ had handed its own draft of the new constitution to the Japanese government in February, and the April 1946 general election was an important step toward the new Japanese regime of parliamentary democracy. The GHQ could not allow the mass activities of working people to disturb the realization of the new parliamentary democracy and formation of a government based on the newly elected lower house. The GHQ would permit the Japanese people a democracy that was neither unconditional nor unlimited, and the mass activities of working people and workers' movements in general would be subject to US objectives and contained within the limits of parliamentary bourgeois democracy.

Under these circumstances, George Acheson, US member of the Allied Council for Japan, an advisory body to the Allied Occupation supreme commander, denounced the CP's activities, while supreme commander Douglas MacArthur denounced the popular mobilization under the CP leadership as a major threat to the "orderly government" and "future evolution of Japan." The GHQ's tolerant policy toward the Japanese workers' movement since October 1945 came to an end in May 1946, setting off a new period of confrontation between the bloc led by GHQ with the Japanese government and the bourgeoisie against the CP-led militant wing of the mass workers' movement under Sanbetsu Kaigi.

The GHQ's policy shift to containing the radicalizing workers' movement was a crucial factor in resolving the prolonged political crisis in Japan, leading to the establishment on May 22, 1946 of a new Liberal Party and Progressive Party government under the premiership of Shigeru Yoshida. The new government sought to restrain and push back growing worker struggles, laying the basis for capitalist economic reconstruction, with GHQ's backing.

Under the Yoshida government, an imperial ordinance on the punishment of violations of the Occupation's objectives was issued on June 12, and the government decreed a "maintenance of social order" statement denying production control as a rightful means of industrial dispute. The Imperial Diet then passed a Land Reform Law restricting labor disputes in public service sectors such as transport, post and telecommunication, water, electricity and gas supply, and medical care and public health, and depriving non-blue-collar government employees of the right to undertake any worker actions. The enactment of this law was a preventive measure against the rising workers' struggles.

Concurrently in June, the GHQ raised an objection to the content of the Yomiuri newspaper, hoping to suppress its progressive editorial policy. In mid-June, the firm demanded that six leading members of the October–December struggle for control of newspaper production quit the firm, a request the union rejected. The journalists and workers split over the demand for dismissal. The firm mobilized their goon squad and the police intervened forcibly in the dispute. In July, the firm issued relocation orders to 17 journalists, and the union took control over the printing facilities and went on strike. Publication of the paper was suspended for four days, and the factory was taken over by the firm and the pro-firm group, protected by the GHQ military police and Japanese policemen. Thus, the GHQ succeeded in eliminating progressive content from the daily newspaper through the second Yomiuri dispute, intervening in the Hokkaido-shinbun (Hokkaido Newspaper) with similar results.

Workers' Responses and the Sanbetsu Kaigi October Campaign

While workers' actions were generally based on worksites or individual enterprises from late 1945 to the middle of 1946, their actions and struggles became more organized, industrial, and nationwide in the latter half of the year, and, concurrently, strike actions became more numerous and common than the production control struggles, though the latter remained an important form of industrial action through 1947.

Workers of the Japan National Railways (JNR) and seamen fought against mass dismissal plans in September. Sanbetsu Kaigi supported the JNR workers and seamen's struggles, and several Sanbetsu Kaigi unions set up a joint struggle committee with the JNR workers and the seamen. The transport ministry planned to dismiss 129,000 JNR workers. Opposing the mass dismissal, Kokutetsu Soren decided to go on strike on September 15, 1946, but there was a fierce internal conflict between the unyielding militant current and the pro-management current. However, the militant current built up its readiness for the September 15 railway strike, and joint activities with the Sanbetsu Kaigi unions developed simultaneously. Finally, the transport ministry withdrew its entire dismissal plan on the eve of the strike action. Similarly, the shipping industry, which had been severely damaged in the Pacific War, planned to dismiss 43,000 seamen. In this case, a strike led by the All Japan Seamen's Union and the joint struggle committee of the Sanbetsu Kaigi unions prevented the entry of 80 percent of large-sized vessels and 90 percent of smaller boats, leading to a complete labor victory over the ship owners.

At the same time, the Yoshida government and big businesses were seeking to enforce a fixed ceiling on wages and to carry out structural rationalization of major industries with mass dismissal of workers. In confrontation with the government and businesses, following the JNR workers' and seamen's struggles, Sanbetsu Kaigi and its component unions and federations waged a vigorous offensive campaign, demanding full employment, a minimum wage based on the cost of living, abolition of the wage ceiling of 500 yen a month, an eight-hour workday, end of sexual discrimination, industry-wide collective agreements, abolition of the earned-income tax, repeal the Labor Relation Adjustment Law, establishment of unemployment insurance and social security, and protection against strikebreaking.

This October 1946 campaign was successful overall: the working masses blocked the businesses' attempts at mass dismissal, and workers' job security was improved. The government's 500-yen wage ceiling was broken down, and the monthly wage rose to the level of 1,000 yen. The workers achieved better working conditions such as the eight-hour labor system, and their rights to trade union activities were secured.

Climax of Class Conflict: Attempted General Strike

The Sanbetsu Kaigi October campaign was waged mostly by the private sector unions, whose workers received considerable wage rises: 33 percent and 17 percent increases respectively from the levels of July and September 1946. However, the wages of government and public workers and employees were pegged at the level of July 1946 under the hyperinflationary situation, and their wages were roughly less than half of private sector wages in November. Thus, workers and employees in the government and public sector began taking action, becoming the main forces of battle in a direct confrontation with the government from December 1946 to January 1947, opening the way for an attempted general strike on February 1, a climax of class conflict.

In the middle of October, 8,000 delegates representing 320,000 primary and middle-school teachers held their national convention (Zenkyoso), which decided on the demands to be presented to the government and set up its national struggle committee. At the end of October, Zenteisin Rodokumiai (Zentei: Japan Postal and Telecommunication Workers' Union) held its national congress to decide its demands, which were submitted to the government in November. In the same month, Kokutetsu Rodokumiai Sorengokai (Kokutetsu Soren: Federation of National Railway Workers' Unions) held its national congress and agreed to wage a campaign against the government jointly with Zenkyoso and Zentei. Also in the same month, Zenkoku Kanko Shokuin-Rodokumiai Kyogikai (Zenkankorokyo: National Conference of Government and Public Employees and Workers' Unions) and Zenkoku Kokyodantai Shokuin-Rodokumiai Rengokai (Zenkoren: National Federation of Public Bodies Employees' and Workers' Unions) submitted their respective demands to the government, which largely rebuffed the workers.

Finally, Zenkankocho Kyodotoso-iinkai (Zenkankocho Kyoto: Joint Struggle Committee of All Government and Public Sector Unions) was set up by those national unions and federations at the end of November. Its joint demands were for a minimum wage of 650 yen, payment of the year-end allowance, cash payment of all wages and allowances, abolition of income tax on wages, raising the exemption point of consolidated income tax to 30,000 yen, abolition of the Labor Relations Adjustment Law, elimination of discriminatory treatments, conclusion of collective bargaining agreements, payment of a "cold zone" allowance, and no wrongful discharges.

Zenkankocho Kyoto was composed of Kokutetsu Soren (533,000 national railway workers), Zentei (380,000 postal and telecommunication workers), Zenkyoso (328,000 teachers), Zenkankorokyo (83,000 government and public workers), Zenkoren (230,000 public body workers), and another eight unions and federations in the government and public sector. There were about 1.8 million workers and employees as a whole within those unions when in mid-January 1947 the joint struggle committee issued its declaration for a general strike for February 1.

The strike never materialized, but the striving for such a broad-based action was the most advanced and centralized mass worker struggle in the period following the Japanese surrender. The collapse of the February 1, 1947 general strike had damaging consequences for the centralizing momentum of the mass workers' movement in Japan, which was gaining prominence through 1946 to the aborted February 1 general strike. Subsequently, a trend toward decentralization was evident within the workers' movement, while the spontaneous mass militancy of workers remained largely unaltered.

Japan, protest and revolt, 1800–1945

Janet E. McClellan

In Japan the period of the Industrial Revolution spanned two phases of critical social and political periods that included the Tokugawa Shogunate (1603–1868) and the Meiji Restoration (1868–1912). The examination of peasant, union, and labor uprisings and strikes includes the study of oppressive taxation burdens imposed by officials and the combined malfeasance of taxing authorities and ministerial officials in complicity with the social/political elites in the repression of laborers. Specifically, a series of revolts occurred from 1800 to 1884 when regional crop failures together with excessive taxation and official malfeasance threatened the livelihood and lives of the populace and effectively brought about the end of the Shogunate period and the rise of the Meiji Restoration. The Meiji Restoration was followed by a steady progression of the nation toward militarism (1912–45).

Japan Militarism and Opposition, 1874–1945

For more than 70 years Japan marched toward an ever-deepening militaristic posture. Beginning in 1874 with the Taiwan Expedition and proceeding through the Boxer Rebellion (1899–1900), the First Sino-Japanese War (August 1, 1894–April 17, 1895), Russo-Japanese War (February 10, 1904–September 5, 1905), Manchuria Invasion (1931–2), Second Sino-Japanese War (July 7, 1937–September 9, 1945), the Korean Occupation (1910–5), World War I (1914–17), and finally World War II (1941–5), Japan's cultural environment and political expectations were dominated by expansionism in the Asian theater.

Socialists, Communists, and Labor Organizations

Although a system of labor and skill guilds had existed for centuries in Japan, the emergence of the modern union movement was spurred by the encouragement and involvement of socialist intelligentsia and an emerging Japanese Communist Party. The transition of guilds to labor organization was perceived as a threat to the newly industrializing nation. The rise of a new Japanese intelligentsia, educated middle class, and socio-economic laborer class (1886–1945) took place in the expanding industrialization and modernization of the Japanese nation. However, those movements clashed with the underlying political maneuverings in the government during the Meiji Restoration. The aggressive remaking of the emperor as the head of state supported by former beneficiaries of the shogunate system, the military, and emerging industrialists during the Meiji period was the impetus to the rise of a modern military-industrial governmental complex.

Through the enactment of the Public Peace Police Law that prohibited organized and unionized strikes and banned all peaceable gatherings of groups in order to prevent the disruption of law and order, the response to any dispute, strike, or protest that was perceived as threatening to the harmony of the country was delegated for investigation and resolution by the Japanese government to the police and secret police (Kempeitai). The police forces possessed detailed knowledge of citizens (through a system of records and informers) and were respected and feared by them for their ability to enforce the laws; as such, the prospect of police intervention, detention, and prosecution of “troublesome persons” was justifiably feared (Scalapino 1983). Moreover, the Peace Preservation Law empowered the government to maintain surveillance of citizens’ thoughts and behaviors, thereby repressing “dangerous” thoughts (e.g., socialism and communism). Restrictions on freedom of speech were thus intensified. In the 1930s under the sway of the militarists, all protests that were union or anti-war inspired were effectively smothered.

Japanese War Protests (1874–1945)

The governmental promotion of nationalism and patriotism and the increasing importance of world political influence undermined anti-war sentiments and efforts by union organizers and socialist and communist organizations. Moreover, those who did protest in small or larger ways against the government found themselves at odds with the new constitution, legislation, and police enforcement tactics, and were subjected to arrests and imprisonment. Dissenting political organizers and individuals were imprisoned or disappeared. By 1940, the trade union movement had disappeared from Japan. It was not until after World War II that labor unions and competing political parties and ideologies began to reemerge.

Labor Strikes and Insurrections

What is known as the Industrial Revolution, its spread throughout various countries, and the chronicling of its effects on economies, industries, political regimes, and the lives of laborers does not lend itself to a recitation of clearly articulated seminal events. The study and weighting of impacts of the Industrial Revolution present a non-linear assortment of stimulations and influences that frequently depended on the social, economic, and historically critical industrial base of a particular country. Moreover, the spread of the Industrial Revolution was not unaffected by other prevailing historical events (war, political and environmental events) of the periods marking various phases of the Industrial Revolution (1708–1914). In the early phases of the Industrial Revolution (1707–1850), dramatic alterations occurred in the economic prospects of workers, expanding the variety of work and employment opportunities and altering the outlook of factory and non-factory citizens.

In the Meiji Restoration, the old guilds maintained their hold on the industrial and pre-industrial workers in the skilled and semi-skilled trades (e.g., miners, woodcutters, plasterers) prior to 1884 but were dominated by the legacy of the feudal paternalistic relationship between employer and laborer that was imbued with a marked propensity for worker loyalty and deferential response to employer demands. However, as the industrialization of Japan spread, bringing new tools, equipment, technologies, and methodologies of production, workers’ obsequious responses were reduced. Transformations began to take place and unions that focused on the economic, social, and cultural well-being of laborers began to emerge. As industries altered the economic landscape of the country, the prospects of workers were similarly altered, expanding the variety of work and employment opportunities and changing the outlook of laborer citizens with educational possibilities, increased longevity, access to beneficial material goods, and rising social expectations (Cullen 2003; Gordon 2003; Rohl 2005).

In 1898, a strike occurred at the great Nippon Railway company and the strike fever spread to other industries throughout the country. A series of nearly 20 strikes in 1898 involved workers engaged in mining, iron production, furniture making, and silk dying. The most significant unions to emerge initially in Japan were the Iron Workers’ Union, founded in 1897, and the Railway Engineers’ and Firemen’s Union, founded in 1898. The first unions in Japan were industrial unions and did not spread beyond more than a few of the major industries, for example, iron workers, maritime trades, railroading, and mining. In 1900, the enactment by the Imperial Diet of the Public Peace Law effectively prohibited workers and farmers from organizing and conducting strikes. The institution of the law has been noted as the beginning of a 12-year period of systematic suppression of the labor movement. The law effectively served to redirect the attention of social activists and union organizers, who concentrated their energies toward efforts to popularize socialism among the working class to the neglect of union organizing. The near abandonment of the suppressed unions and neglect of workers’ grievances regarding work conditions erupted into riots that were quickly and vigorously put down in 1906 and 1907 (Katayama 2001).

The Ashio riots of 1907 occurred as a result of the arduous conditions of miners: all aspects of their lives were controlled by industry edicts, including the daily necessities of food, clothing, and shelter, and access to toilet facilities (Nimura et al. 1997). In 1911, a street car strike took place in Tokyo after talks between workers and management broke down. The strike, involving thousands of engineers and conductors, began on December 31, 1911 and lasted until January 4 of the following year. Because of the disruption of transportation affecting the lives of the two million citizens living in Tokyo at the time, the strike unfortunately did not enjoy popular support.

Through the enactment of the Public Peace Police Law prohibiting worker strikes, the response to any dispute, strike or threatened strike had been delegated by the Japanese government to the police. As the police possessed detailed knowledge of citizens and were able to enforce minor noxious edicts, the decisions made by the police were rarely disputed by the offending parties (Scalapino 1983). Union organizers and striking workers served long terms of imprisonment, went into hiding, or were otherwise disappeared.

In 1921, the Japan Labor Federation (Sodomei) was formed but capitulated to government demands and threats. Other labor unions and federations remained shadow institutions without effective means of intervention for the benefit of workers. By 1940, the government had established its own labor union, the Patriotic Industrial Association (Sampo), and the trade union movement disappeared from Japan. The trade union movement did not revive until after World War II with the growth of heavy industry accompanying the war boom, when a large number of workers became permanent wage-earners.

A new labor movement emerged during the American Occupation of Japan after World War II with the enactments of the Trade Union Law of December 1945 and the Labor Relations Adjustment Law of September 1946. The Trade Union Law guaranteed the right to union organization for all laborers, with the exception of public service employees including firefighters, police officers, and penal system employees. The Trade Union Law effectively outlawed company unions, outlawed employer representation in the unions, and emphasized the necessity of unions to represent employee interests rather than those of the employer (Baker 1965/1966).

Peasant Revolts

In the nineteenth century, five identifiable peasant/worker revolts occurred in Japan. The revolts were the Takeda Rising (1811–12), the Echigo Rising (1814), the Nambu Rising (1853), the Kaisei Rising (1866–7), and the Chichibu Rising (1884). The Tax Law Opposition (1949) was the first important peasant uprising to occur in the twentieth century. The first five revolts that occurred between 1811 and 1884 may be identified as peasant revolts and were regional in reach, whereas the Tax Law Opposition of 1949 involved working-class individuals and the business community in non-violent opposition to the taxes proposed by the American economic/tax specialists of the Shoup Mission during the occupation of Japan at the end of World War II (Burg 2003). An additional difference between the earlier revolts and the 1949 opposition was the absence of violence and bloodshed marking the previous five revolts. The 1949 Tax Law Opposition and resistance emerged as a broadly based national protest against the austerity programs imposed under the Dodge Plan. Crucial to the uprisings was the principal notion that “(a)n unlimited power to tax involves . . . a power to destroy” (M’Culloch v. State, 17 U.S. 316, 1819). In all instances, tax burdens imposed by the ruling elites were the key feature of the revolts that occurred in the 150-year period from 1800 to 1950.

It is important to note that the term peasant, in Japan or other cultures, as used by scholars varies. The most comprehensive definition combines an assortment of the understandings and application of the academic discipline or investigative interests of the scholar. Nominally, the definition of peasant includes one or more of the following characteristics: (1) they are rural cultivators; (2) they have minimal control of the land (labor) they cultivate (work performed); (3) the individuals comprise a distinctive community of cultural practices; and (4) as a group they are socially, politically, and economically subordinate to a dominant/ruling class (Kurtz 2000). Therefore, the primary difference between the structural model and definitional difference between the terms of peasant and working-class laborer may be the inclusion or exclusion of rural cultivation. Sanson (1978) remarked that although all ruling elites in the history of the world tend to concern themselves with the moral and ethical development of their citizens or subjects, those elites fail to show concern for the economic necessities of those over whom they have power and control. The six revolts occurring from 1800 to 1950 in Japan exemplify Sanson's (1978) observation.

The study of peasant uprisings in Japan generally involves historical inquiry into oppressive taxation burdens imposed by officials and the combined malfeasance by those taxing authorities and the social and political elites. Although the successes of the uprisings occurring from 1800 to 1884 are important in contributing to the fall of the Tokugawa Shogunate and the rise of the Meiji Restoration, the continued struggle against high taxation, high rent, and military conscription continued central features of peasant and commoner life in Japan up to the middle of the twentieth century.

Takeda Rising (1811–1812)

In the district of Bungo near the area of Takeda, a peasant uprising in late 1811 occurred after a request by peasants for a reduction in taxes was responded to by the district administrator contemptuously doubling their taxes. Peasants numbering in the thousands marched against the official and his representatives, carrying guns, swords, and torches and causing officials to flee and their demands to reach the capital. The success of the revolt led to changes in taxation policies and punishment of the miscreant officials; however, identified leaders of the revolt were also punished. Moreover, the successes of the Takeda Rising inspired similar and more violent uprisings in the Bungo district in the villages of Usuki and Nobeoka. In the case of the Usuki and Nobeoka uprisings, hundreds of thousands of peasants threatened officials, destroying homes of the elites and devastating local businesses. Most of the uprisings were eventually able to achieve significant concessions, although other local uprisings were quashed and their leaders severely punished.

Echigo Rising (1814)

The province of Echigo had suffered several years of poor harvests as a result of harsh seasonal environmental conditions, leaving little food for the peasants. However, although the crop failures and harvest reductions were the fault of bad weather, the ruling elite's expectations regarding the submission of taxes by the peasants was inflexible. Tens of thousands of rebellious peasant farmers stormed the town of Muramatsu, forcing the local official to flee. The rebellion lasted for weeks and encompassed more than 30 districts in the province. Ultimately, the ruling official gave rice to the peasants, dismissed the offending local officials, and punished many of the ringleaders of the rebellion.

Nambu Rising (1853)

Nambu was a fiefdom that saw over a dozen uprisings in 1853 arising from oppressive taxation and official political corruption. The uprisings were unique in their organization and the political tactics employed by the rebellious peasants, including the march of 25,000 peasants to the neighboring fief of Sendai to appeal for relief by defecting from Nambu and becoming farmers in Sendai (Borton 1968). Of the numerous demands put forward by the farmers, most were conceded and a significant crisis was averted. Borton suggests that the officials of both fiefs determined that major compromise was necessary, since a force of 25,000 determined peasants could easily march unhindered by force-of-arms or geographical barriers and ultimately pose a greater threat than the desire for mere tax relief.

Kaisei Rising (1866–1867)

Contemporary researchers (Borton 1968; Bix 1986) have suggested that the Kaisei Rising had three main causes: the introduction of additional and severe tax burdens, the conscription of peasants for military campaigns, and the continued seasonal crop failures. In November of 1866 several thousand peasant rebels marched on nearby towns and the region's castle stronghold, having failed to obtain satisfaction of their demands for tax relief. The successes of the earlier exploits were followed by the near riotous behavior of participants in the uprising, who caused destruction of property and threatened injury against various local officials, merchants, moneylenders, and landlords. The uprising and its violence spilled over into other fiefs and provinces, threatening the very fabric of the feudal system in Japan. Bix contends that the Kaisei Rising set the stage for the new form of state and governance of Japan that would emerge after the Chichibu Rising of 1884.

Chichibu Rising (1884)

Chichibu is a district in the Saitama prefecture where independent farmers were severely taxed by authorities and where control was centralized by the emerging government under the Meiji Restoration. The Chichibu farmers had been supplementing their incomes by raising silkworms and producing silk since 700 CE (Tsuzuki 2000); indeed, the heart of that early industry continues into the twenty-first century. For the Chichibu farmers and others throughout the world, the 1880s were punctuated by calamitous events and economic hardships. Beginning in 1883, the world economies plunged into economic depression; the massive volcano Krakatoa (Krakatau) erupted and ultimately altered the northern hemisphere's climate for the next ten years; US President Garfield was assassinated and several European countries entered into war against Third World states.

In 1884 conditions worsened for the peasants of Chichibu and they joined other farmers and merchants in areas affected most dramatically by the changes in governance, tax levies, and the draconian taxation collection practices of officials. Armed rebellion broke out. At its height the rebellion evolved into a full-scale civil war against the Meiji government. The rebellion, led by a self-proclaimed Revolutionary Army, began in late October and was effectively quashed by the first week of November after facing the mobilized army of the centralized government near Mt. Yatsuga. In his detailed investigation into the October–November peasant army, Irokawa (1985) claims that the uprising was not merely a revolt in favor of tax relief and the institutionalization of enlightened governance but a full-scale rebellion against the long history of economic, political, and social stratification of Japanese culture. Thus, in his view, the rising was nothing less than a rebellion against centuries of oppression.

Tax Law Opposition (1949)

The Tax Law Opposition of 1949 involved members of the working class and the business community in opposing taxes proposed by the American tax specialists of the Shoup Mission following the end of World War II (Burg 2003). The reestablished political parties did not oppose the resistance to the new taxes and as a result their implementation was significantly delayed. Continued opposition and political maneuvering ensued over the next three years (Steiner 1973), and the taxes were never fully enacted.

Japan, resistance to construction of Narita airport

Ichijo Muto

In July 1966 the Japanese government suddenly announced plans to build a new airport at Sanrizuka, a thriving farming area 40 miles from downtown Tokyo. The decision reflected the regime's overconfidence and condescension toward workers and peasants. The government did not consult the local farmers involved, who first learned about the plan from a newspaper article. The government assumed from its previous experience of land confiscation for large industrial projects that if offered money the farmers would willingly give up their land. Instead, the move sparked a prolonged movement that challenged not only plans for the airport, but Japan's hegemonic notions of development and economic growth and the supremacy of corporate power at the expense of the people, their dignity, and their environment. The movement grew to include many facets of Japan's New Left, and created alliances and organizational models new to Japan's progressive movements.

Struggle Begins

The farmers who inherited rich paddy fields from their ancestors were deeply attached to them; others who opened up fields in the post-war years with backbreaking labor felt their land was a part of them. The farmland in Sanrizuka is a very fertile area, and there was reason for farmers to fear losing their source of income. The Members of the Zengakuren student movement march in solidarity with local farmers protesting the appropriation of their family lands for construction of a new airport in Narita, Japan, in 1967. Japanese riot police later clashed with the protesters, resulting in 43 people injured, including 19 policemen and one journalist. The conflict pit a police force of 5,000 against 1,000 helmeted and club-toting members of the Zengakuren movement. The students later attempted to storm a police barracks near the airport construction office. The protesters were repelled by police using high-pressure water hoses and nightsticks. (© Bettmann/CORBIS) struggle soon acquired a non-economic dimension as the Japanese state sent thousands of armed police into the hamlets to forcibly appropriate their land. The arrogance with which the state dealt with the farmers injured the pride of the farmers and ignited their anger.

The first major confrontation came in 1967 when the government stepped in with thousands of riot police to forcibly carry out a land survey, and the farmers blocked all roads leading to the prospective sites. The farmers clashed with the police, 3,000 of whom were mobilized for the compulsory land survey. Farmers, organized into women's, youth, and old folk's brigades, fought back using "night soil" bombs. Farm women bound themselves to trees with iron chains, and primary and junior high school children, forming their own brigade, boycotted classes, and set up their own study program with sympathetic university students as teachers. Still, by sheer force and through arresting resisters, the government completed the land survey, the first step toward land confiscation.

Major confrontation occurred again in 1971. The government stepped in during February and March to carry out compulsory land expropriation. The Farmers' League and supporters set up "fortresses" in six places along the northern side of the prospective 4,000-meter runway, dug deep tunnels where an old folk's "dare-to-die" corps pent themselves up, braving cave-ins under heavy bulldozers, defiantly declaring that they were old and so prepared to die. The whole area was turned into a veritable battleground, the police attacking and demolishing the farmers' wooden fortresses one after another. Farmers fought in the fortresses, resisting by wielding bamboo spears, but the fortress towers, including a farmers' broadcasting tower, eventually fell with the farmer-fighters inside. In the fields around them students and workers fought the police. The police exhausted themselves before they could demolish all the resistance posts.

The second expropriation campaign began in September of the same year, causing yet more violent clashes. The police set out to take the remaining Komaino and other fortresses and destroy the home of an old widow, Ohki Yone. Students, workers, and citizens mobilized from all over the country for this confrontation, and a guerilla unit attacked a police unit, killing three policemen, while the 5,500 police with 130 heavy vehicles were attacking three farmers' forts. The 3,500 resisters used fire bombs to defend the besieged forts. Finally, Komaino Fort was brought to the ground in a sea of fire. Ohki's house was then attacked, and as the 65-year-old woman refused to move she was knocked down and beaten, her tiny house destroyed. The construction of the runway thus began, and in 1972 the Opposition League constructed a 60-meter steel tower close to the runway to disrupt flights from the airport.

Originally, the government scheduled to open the airport in 1971, but the resistance frustrated that plan. Although construction proceeded after the land confiscation, opposition spread from the site of confrontation to various new areas involving increasing numbers of citizens' groups. National support networks were organized. In 1974 Tomura Issaku, the Christian chairman of the Opposition League, stood as an independent candidate for the House of Councilors election with the slogan, "More Sanrizukas in Japan!" Though he did not win, the campaign spread Sanrizuka's message throughout the country. Other government projects were also met with community resistance. The public began to doubt if the project was viable. Irritated with the indefinite delay, the Fukuda Cabinet declared in January 1977 that the airport should by all means be opened within the year "whatever the cost." The opposition also grew, joined by new groups including anti-nuclear power and other community organizations struggling against land confiscation and development. The largest mass rally of 23,000 people was held at Sanrizuka in April of the same year. The government responded by sending in special mission police in early May. Before dawn on May 16, police quietly surrounded the steel tower after cutting all telephone lines. They slipped through the protestors' base and pulled down symbols of resistance. This sneak attack enraged the opposition and thousands of people protested. Bloody battles followed, when the police brutally counterattacked. Higashiyama Kaoru, a young supporter caring for the wounded at the field hospital, died after he was hit by a tear gas canister fired by the police. The opening of the airport was postponed again and the final date for the opening was set for May 1, 1978.

In March 1978, 14,000 police were mobilized from throughout the country to ensure the airport opened. On March 25 clashes started as the opposition began to build an iron tower designed to impede flights from the runway. Water cannons and cranes were mobilized and the struggle continued overnight. On March 26, 15,000 supporters arrived for the final confrontation and held rallies around the airport. While the rallies were going on, several hundred paramilitary groups from three political sects made simultaneous surprise attacks on the airport. A group of commandos appeared from a manhole near the control tower, occupied it, and completely smashed the air traffic control apparatus. The slogan for the day was "Besiege, penetrate, and smash," and this slogan was literally realized. The attack shocked the government and "Control Tower Destroyed" hit the headlines. Time magazine made a cover story of it, using the miserable face of Fukuda for its cover photo. The airport opening had to be postponed yet again.

The airport finally opened, after 11 postponements, on May 20, 1978 and began functioning with one runway. But even after its opening the Opposition League continued, and as of the 1990s still confronted and obstructed the government's plan to build the second runway and terminal building.

Soil, Agriculture, and Life

Though this abridged chronology features the violent, confrontational aspect of the struggle, this is in fact only one particular aspect of it. Sanrizuka has also been the wellspring of new ideas, views, imaginations, and human experiences powerful and persuasive enough to challenge the prevalent money-and-development-fetish and to allow a glimpse into alternative ways of organizing society. For activists from the various urban movements drawn to Sanrizuka, the Sanrizuka experience was an eye-opener: at Sanrizuka there was no distinction between struggling and living, they were synonymous. Sanrizuka offered the whole Japanese movement a space where activists could refresh, touch the soil, be with the community, and thus think and rethink the nature of state power, industrial society, nature, and humanity, as well as the meaning of struggle. It was indeed a school of movements. Thus, through various support networks, thousands of people came to Sanrizuka to struggle with the farmers and do farm work for the Opposition League farmers. Many settled in the village communities. Scores of solidarity huts, built by political sects and non-sect citizens' groups, were strewn over the vast area surrounding the airport, where full-time support workers were stationed, offering labor for farm work and rendering organizational support.

The farmers' struggle had the capacity to attract such a large number of supporters for several reasons. One is that at the time the struggle began, a mood of resistance had taken over the country and, in fact, much of the world. Another is that even in the early stages of the confrontation, members of the Youth Brigade began to develop unique notions of farmer, land, and soil as the basis of their struggle, thus creating and employing the collective identity that would aid in unifying those engaged in the struggle. Shima Hiroyuki, a leader of the Youth Brigade, spoke of the distinction between nomin (the official term for farmer) and hyakusho (the traditional term for farmer) and the corresponding distinction between tochi (land) and daichi (soil). The distinction between nomin and hyakusho as well as between land and soil is subtle, but it is essential. Soil is not real estate bought and sold for money but is something that the farmers' sweat and toil have been ploughed into over generations. Therefore, it is cultural, social, and historical, as well as a human reality. Hyakusho is a farmer attached to, and integrated with, such soil. Hyakusho is also part of the whole community, complete with its landscape, festivals, and community relations, and is one with the lush green of surrounding forests and fields. Soil is thus essential to life, and soil grasped in this context is hyakusho's life itself. It was precisely this that the state sought to wipe out. This was why the government assumption that greedy nomin would readily yield land for the promise of money and succumb to police intimidation was an affront to hyakusho. As far back as 1970 this basic understanding of hyakusho, soil, and nature served as the bedrock of the fierce and protracted farmers' resistance.

The Sanrizuka struggle in this sense was a struggle for the ethic and logic of the soil and agriculture as opposed to the industrialist non-ethic and logic in a country where reckless industrial expansion was fast destroying agriculture and marginalizing farmers. It is true that the struggle is par excellence one against state power. It had at first no explicit ecological assertions as such, nor was it a conventional farmers' movement directly addressing agricultural issues. Yet the logic of the struggle implicitly pointed to an alternative society that harmonizes with nature where farmers and agriculture are appreciated as the basis of human life.

This aspect, concealed in the first battle-only phase of the struggle, came to the fore when the government stepped into the communities in 1980 with the novel tactic of coopting the opposition farmers by offering a new irrigation system. It was a crucial time since some League members whose farms were located in swampy areas were attracted to the Airport Corporation's offer. At this juncture the League explicitly addressed agricultural matters for the first time. Opposition League members developed their own irrigation scheme without government money. Large windmills were constructed to pump water and land improvement work was undertaken. These efforts also kept the struggle going. Though undoubtedly a farmers' struggle, the Farmers' League until that time singularly lacked concern about agricultural affairs. Agriculture had been merely each household's business, and farmers were united only to fight the state onslaught.

Earlier, in 1972, members of the Youth Brigade started the Sanrizuka Organic Farm Association and its One Pack movement. At that time, most farming families in Sanrizuka used conventional agricultural chemicals and had little mutual collaboration in farming. When the Youth Brigade launched the organic farming project, there were 17 families in the association. Participating households collectively produced vegetables with organic manure and without pesticides, regularly delivering assortments of them in "one pack" to subscribing consumers in Tokyo who supported the Sanrizuka struggle. Each pack contained a dozen different kinds of vegetables and a leaflet describing how the struggle was going. One Pack movement families formed a collective, each offering a portion of their land and doing farm work collectively. At its peak in the early 1980s the movement was supplying 1,200 families with vegetable packs twice a month. The One Pack movement can be characterized by several of its accomplishments. It can be seen as the point at which the opposition's livelihood and the struggle intersected, or as the point at which the struggle against the airport became a struggle to remain farmers. The introduction of organic farming also brought to the surface the ecological quality of the Sanrizuka struggle that had been lurking beneath tear gas fog and riot police shields. It can also be seen as an example of how new, collective, and cooperative lifestyles were being created both within the movement and between the movement and its community of supporters. Youth Brigade members, in their publications about the movement, even reported changes in familial and gender relations.

Anti-Kaihatsu Foundation

At the root of this and other contemporary people's movements, as writer Tsumura Takashi has said, was a challenge to the logic and practice of corporate supremacy that had set in by the 1970s. The reckless development of Japanese capitalism since 1955 had already turned Japan into the pollution archipelago of contemporary journalists' clichés. With the backing and protection of the state, large corporations freely disposed of the land and seas of the Japanese islands, reclaiming vast coastal sea areas for huge industrial complexes, polluting water and sky without a modicum of consideration for the environment or the people living in it. Obsessed by economic growth, the government not only did not care about these social or environmental repercussions, but fully sided with immediate corporate interests. The government in fact was the chief promoter of the National Land Planning whose purpose was to build infrastructure for private industries with tax money. For their part, big trade unions, eager to enlarge their part of the pie of corporate earnings, were too deeply trapped in the thinking that money can buy anything and everything to protest.

The unwillingness and inability of the established parliamentary political parties and their aligned forces to face any of these crying issues gave birth to new independent and autonomous people's movements. The struggles faced a system of values that the Japanese state and big business defended and justified, sacrificing nature, human communities, and human relationships. These movements developed new value systems in opposition to legitimize themselves. The Sanrizuka struggle was especially able to do this and conveyed it in language accessible to ordinary people, emphasizing autonomy, and establishing a methodology of organization that allowed the movement itself to determine its own tactics and strategies.

One remarkable feature of Japanese people's movements since the 1970s may be found in the unique role of the struggles for survival waged by mostly peripheral communities in exposing the fundamental problems of the economic growth-oriented Japanese society. The struggles are the residents' own struggles, highly autonomous and grassroots, taking their cue from no one outside or above. Thus, the Sanrizuka struggle was not an isolated case. The decades-long struggle of farmers at Sanrizuka against the imposition of the Narita Tokyo International Airport project belongs in the broad category of community based struggles; in the 1970s, thousands of communities and citizens' groups fought against government or company projects that threatened to uproot them, undermine the basics of their lives and values, and irreparably destroy the natural environment.

Many of these struggles were classified together as anti-pollution or environmental movements. Though that was how the public recognized the issues, it is a superficial characterization. The struggles of the communities were not simply against pollution as an isolated phenomenon, but were fundamentally for their survival in the face of the imposition from outside and above of one or another "development" project.

To understand the importance of the Sanrizuka farmers' struggle it is imperative to understand that the Japanese language has two words that are translated as "development," hatten and kaihatsu. Hatten is neutral or usually carries a positive meaning, as does the English word “development.” Kaihatsu is a heavily loaded word. It means economic and industrial development projects by business and the government. Though kaihatsu is presented as positive in official planning documents, kaihatsu projects gradually gained popular recognition as disasters for the communities involved. The people and communities in kaihatsu sites were told to vacate their land, sell fishing rights, and endure the destruction of their environment for the sake of industrial plants, nuclear power stations, nuclear waste dumping installations, or highways, all for the good of the public. In almost all cases the victims are not the beneficiaries of kaihatsu, for the projects in question cater mainly to the needs of big business or serve remote urban centers. The very notion of the “public” was thus called into question. Pollution was merely the end result of these kaihatsu processes.

With this more nuanced understanding of development in mind, Sanrizuka and the other community movements and struggles occurring in this context may be rightly characterized as anti-kaihatsu struggles. Since development has been generally promoted as the dominant positive value in the highly materialist Japanese society, each struggle had to evolve its own alternative universal logic and language about society, company, nature, and human virtues to counter the language of public good that told victims that they had to sacrifice their particular interests for the sake of development. Kaihatsu projects invariably destroyed the community with its historically developed diversities and traditional culture.

Attachment to community identity was an essential element in motivating people to resist. But it was rare that the traditional community as such became the unit of resistance. Official community organization leaders were often bought off; traditional community bosses became modernization pioneers overnight, particularly when the community and its traditional business were being pushed to the margins by the urban-based economy. For the resistance to continue, traditional values, organizations, and personal relations were often remade and recreated in order to assert that there was something more precious than cash. This struggle was in fact a matter of human dignity: it was their dignity as farmers that was at stake.

Sanrizuka Farmers and a New Left “Captured” by the People

By participating in the Sanrizuka farmers’ struggle, the New Left forged new kinds of ties with the people. The farmers were no longer anonymous masses for the New Left – they were people deeply rooted in the soil, with their families, houses, farm work, traditions, and land. Whole families joined the struggle and even children organized. These were the people state power was ruthlessly attempting to stampede by using massive police forces organized like military units. “Progress” and “development” were the impressive-sounding slogans used effectively by the government to impose giant industrial complexes on farmland, confiscate fishing grounds from fisherfolk, and destroy the lives of common people. But Sanrizuka farmers rejected the very premise of this type of thinking. They called into question the dominant, accepted pattern of “development,” declaring that they would continue to live as farmers, that the soil was their life, and that they could not be bought with money. The government thus met with tough resistance from the farmers, a radical resistance in the sense that it challenged the very premise of postwar modernization of Japanese society, with its emphasis on the supremacy of money and economic interests.

Establishing lasting relations with the farmers’ struggle meant something new to the New Left. It no longer allowed them the luxury of “issue-hopping.” They had to become a responsible partner in a protracted struggle. This would require them to reassess the simplistic notion of the unilinear development of society, for example that any kind of industrial development indicated progress. In this sense the New Left was captured by the people when it committed itself to the Sanrizuka farmers’ struggle for livelihood and dignity.

When they made their eye-catching arrival in Sanrizuka, however, New Left political groups did not grasp the theoretical and ideological importance of what they were doing. The mainstream New Left simply considered Sanrizuka an extension of its street fights against state power. They supported the farmers primarily because the farmers were fighting courageously against the government. In order to more securely link their anti-imperialist and anti-war concerns with the farmers’ cause, some New Left parties simply added the slogan, “We oppose the construction of a military airport” to their repertoire. The logic was that the New Left should oppose the construction of the airport because it was to be used for military purposes. There were of course military implications to the Narita airport amid the escalation of the war in Vietnam, and with the US military using most Japanese civil airports for supply purposes, but that aspect did not represent the real and deepest motivations of the farmers’ struggle, nor did it point to the fundamental problems of burgeoning Japanese capitalism. The real significance of the Sanrizuka struggle would only later be conceptualized and acted on accordingly by New Left groups, which had to develop a new kind of relationship with the people through participation in the Sanrizuka farmers’ struggle.

For this marginalized community struggle against development, support groups and networks were organized in various forms which served the struggle by disseminating information, mobilizing at decisive points of confrontation, raising money, and, more importantly, bringing the issues and their implications to public attention. The support networks were generally national, horizontal coalitions of various spontaneous groups scattered all over the country; all independent groups with their respective agendas and their own activities in residential areas, unions, campuses, and other arenas that defined their proper constituencies. It is these support networks that former Zenkyoto, Beheiren, and other New Left activists created, or entered, or otherwise served effectively. Another important form of support was that of settling. In Sanrizuka, due to its severe confrontation with state power, former students and other activists set up on-the-spot organizations where supportive outsiders were stationed to work for and with the movement on a day-to-day basis.

In addition to activists’ groups, doctors, nuclear scientists, water specialists, lawyers, and other professionals joined support networks, sometimes playing key roles in identifying and exposing the nature of the issue, and offering their expertise to help strengthen the local resistance. With the participation of these intellectual activists, some of the networks established information and research centers in Tokyo and other urban settings, which played the advocacy role for the development of the struggle. These sought to create national and international coordination networks. Through these networks local struggles like Sanrizuka have garnered national and sometimes international attention.

Thus, a dual structure of the “struggling” and the “supporting” became a common practice. This movement structure, unlike the union or political party bureaucracy, is organic rather than institutional. Its efficacy rests on constantly renewed and always strained relations between “struggling” and “supporting.” The generally accepted movement code was for the supportive side to recognize the sovereignty of the local people involved in struggle, limiting themselves to facilitating roles. Yet it is not easy to practice this code, and particularly where the New Left vanguardists were involved, relations frequently became acrimonious as “supporters” sought to dominate the struggle.

The relationship between the “struggling” and “supporting” roles poses an important problem. The outcome can be a crass vanguardist approach based on the juxtaposition of “the masses” and the “party,” in which the mass struggle is instrumental to the vanguard’s political goals. But it is also possible for people’s movements to avoid this pitfall and to achieve deeper and broader dimensions in which, with the outside support as the medium, the issue-based movement provides original and precious insights that transcend its immediacy and shows its potential to be part of a universal struggle for social change. The vanguardist claim is that such specific struggles can obtain universal significance and be part of the general political struggle only by accepting vanguard leadership. This classical approach subjugates people’s movements and siphons off their universal significance into the arena of alienated politics, which the professional parties claim they alone can handle. But support also can play a role in mediating the specific to the universal by helping those in struggle to create their own political dimensions.

Alliance, Autonomy, and Violation

A sort of agrarian anarchism underlies the long struggle. The Anti-Airport League itself was a loose organization with little procedural bureaucracy other than a chairperson, executive meeting, and secretary general. If a group of members took the initiative and proposed a new tactic, and if they were able to persuade the majority, then the proposal became the League’s. This can be said to be a farmers’ version of Zenkyoto and Beheiren, though farmers did not just replicate these groups.

The hyakusho spirit and this organic structure protected the autonomy of the farmers' struggle. Before the struggle began, the farmers depended on Liberal Democratic Party parliamentarians for advice on agricultural issues. After the struggle began, they looked to socialists and communists, which resulted in a similar dependency. Eventually, the Communist Party was expelled from the movement, as it attempted to lead, instead of support, the farmers. There was disappointment with the socialists, and working with the New Left proved troublesome as well. At long last, in 1976, the Opposition League established an explicit principle of farmers' sovereignty for the joint struggle and all supporting groups promised "to consult closely with the Opposition League on all matters" and "to obtain the approval and consent of the Opposition League before undertaking any action whatsoever at Sanrizuka."

The fact is that this independence and autonomy were not easy to guard, as the Sanrizuka struggle largely rested on the symbiosis of farmers and New Left political sects. Nevertheless, the autonomy and sovereignty of the farmers was basically preserved and all the New Left sects had to collaborate by respecting farmers' decisions as long as they operated in Sanrizuka.

This symbiosis was not without problems. Though not equally true of all the political sects, their motivations were fundamentally different from those of the struggling farmers. While the farmers were fighting for their survival and dignity, the political sects engaged in the struggle for the sake of "revolution," which would be realized through their leadership, through strengthening their organization and political influence, and ultimately through seizure of state power. With the rapid waning of the New Left movement in the 1970s, most of them began to regard the Sanrizuka struggle as their private political asset which would give them prestige and help them survive. The farmers, while they knew that the sects had ulterior motives, began to depend on them for organizational work such as publishing newsletters, on the farm work done by sect members, and other services.

This difference came into the open when Chukaku began blatant violation of the farmers' autonomy. Of the several major political sects with solidarity huts and full-time staff stationed in Sanrizuka, Chukaku was by far the largest. As Chukaku Zengakuren was the first to come and offered the largest number of combatants in the early stage of the struggle, it claimed a special "blood-sealed bond" with the Opposition League. But this sense of privilege became arrogance and a will to dominate. Considering Sanrizuka instrumental to its revolutionary agenda, and finding significance only in the anti-state power side of the farmers' struggle, Chukaku did not appreciate the Youth Brigade initiative for the revitalization of Sanrizuka agriculture. In 1982 the majority of the Opposition League farmers were angry when Chukaku openly proposed that some of the League farmers be expelled for betrayal – those who were attracted by the government's irrigation project. Many League members felt the farmers' sovereignty was being violated. The Youth Brigade members, a main force in agricultural work and important animators of the struggle, felt that carrying on the struggle without addressing fundamental issues intrinsic to local agriculture would be counterproductive, and that expelling members affected and weakened by these issues was unfair. Chukaku continued to push the issue and many farmers were offended.

Early the following year Chukaku-League relations entered into crisis as Chukaku suddenly began to vilify the League's tactical initiative known as the One Tsubo movement. In the early stage of the struggle, about four hectares of land in the airport site were divided up and sold to 700 struggle supporters, each of whom became the owner of one tsubo (3.3 square meters) plot. But the number of owners decreased as the years passed, and the question of protecting the plots became a problem of urgent concern for the Opposition League. The League decided to recollectivize the plots by recruiting new owners from among those who were prepared to fight for the land.

After this decision was made, Chukaku suddenly denounced the recollectivization movement as a sell-out and a traitorous act to the cause of Sanrizuka. According to Chukaku, the proposed movement intended to sell League land ultimately to the Airport Corporation. Chukaku's anti-one tsubo campaign was incredibly intense and spread all over the country. Chukaku's newspaper used a sensational headline calling Ishii Shinji, a leader of the Youth Brigade and one of the main promoters of the One Tsubo movement, a "traitor." Inside Sanrizuka, Chukaku used threats and physical intimidation against farmers who resisted the party's high-handed, strong-arm tactics. The logic used by Chukaku persuaded no one. According to a Youth Brigade leader, the real issue was not the One Tsubo movement but Chukaku's distrust of the farmers and its fear that it would sacrifice its hegemony in the struggle. The One Tsubo campaign was initiated by the Youth Brigade with the support of the overwhelming majority of the farmers themselves, a move Chukaku could not tolerate as it symbolized the ultimate independence of the farmers' struggle.

Farmers rose up for independence and autonomy. On March 8 the League held a general assembly attended by 160 farmers and unanimously decided to sever relations with Chukaku. Those farmers who opposed the One Tsubo movement and sided with Chukaku boycotted the general assembly, held their own meeting attended by about 20 families, and decided to dismiss all anti-Chukaku officials from their posts. This decision confirmed the League's split.

Still, the overwhelming majority of the League opted for independence, recovered autonomy, and largely renewed their style of work while the splinter of the League siding with Chukaku split again in 1988. The whole issue concerning the relationship between vanguardist political organizations and the autonomy of farmers still remains unresolved. The symbiosis between the two still characterizes the Sanrizuka struggle, though Sanrizuka has certainly produced new things, showing forth new facets that people's movements are now acquiring – facets strikingly distinct from the left political culture where individual struggle is seen only as an instrument for the ultimate seizure of state power. More important than revolution was the immediate concern of nurturing the farmers' self-determination.

Sanrizuka in a Larger Political Context

When Sanrizuka farmers began their opposition to the government's usurpation of their land, it was one of a number of diverse community struggles. However, despite diversity and geographical distance, these movements were not isolated from one another. In addition to the Sanrizuka support networks, mutual support networks – most of them informal and extremely flexible – developed through the exchange of visits and information. Some were national, but many were regional. These movements introduced a new dimension into the Japanese people's movement: the convergence of environmental and sociopolitical concerns, which prepared the ground for the emergence of an entirely new understanding of the political.

Since kaihatsu development was poised to destroy the values and means of subsistence of community life through destruction of the natural environment, the movement in one way or another asserted community values and ethics strictly differentiated from the obsession with money and growth – values and ethics providing for harmonious relations with nature. In the process, the idea of chiiki (locality, or community) entered movement thinking as central to the struggle. This was a Copernican revolution. The existing sociopolitical power structure would be dismantled, making the community the basic arena of political struggle.

The choice of arena is important. The national power structure ultimately depends on community level sociopolitical power structures operating in the midst of everyday relations, which are the real abode of power. The new emphasis on chiiki represented the refusal to respect the authority of the power center and its rules. It was the assertion of independence of the power base. In this sense, community movements began to pursue alternative politics of their own based on total distrust of the state and state-centered politics. The new alternative rules of the game facilitated the empowerment of the people. By transforming sociopolitical relations in a direct and tangible way, community people came to realize that they have the power to change their situation, that they can accumulate power within themselves and prevent its being sucked upward into external bodies.

As kaihatsu assaults were made by the state and big corporations, community struggles were forced to fight these powerful and distant enemies. The chiiki struggle, therefore, is not a local struggle on a local issue, even if the chosen arena is local. In this sense, this type of movement is differentiated from a movement aimed at merely changing and democratizing the local power structure as an end in itself. The important fact is that it is a new way of combating the centralized national power of the state and corporation.

Though all these community movements started by reacting to kaihatsu projects, the major ones went beyond just opposing them, and developed – even if only partially – visions of an alternative society based on their sense of identity and sovereignty.

Japan Socialist Party (JSP)

Koji Nakakita

The Japan Socialist Party (Nihon Shakaitō) (JSP) was the most important socialist party in post-World War II Japan. From 1955 to 1993, under the so-called 1955 system, it was the largest opposition party to the ruling Liberal Democratic Party (LDP). Ideologically, it advocated Marxism and pacifism for most of its existence, and was one of the most leftist parties affiliated with the Socialist International.

On November 2, 1945, two months after Japan's formal surrender, the JSP was organized by three of the main non-communist socialist groups from the prewar period: the Shamin-kei (Social Democratic group, right-wing faction), the Nichirō-kei (Japan Labor group, centrist faction), and the Nichimu-kei (Japan Proletarian group, left-wing faction). The early JSP was led by Chairperson Tetsu Katayama and General Secretary Suehiro Nishio, both from the Shamin-kei. The American occupation forces viewed the JSP as a valuable collaborator for the “demilitarization and democratization” of Japan. In 1947 it won a plurality of seats in the Lower House and formed two consecutive three-party coalition governments headed by Katayama and Hitoshi Ashida, the president of the Democratic Party. However, these governments soon collapsed amid conflicts over economic reconstruction policies and corruption scandals, weakening the right-wing Shamin-kei and broadening the influence of the left-wing Nichimu-kei. In 1949 left-wing leader Mosaburō Suzuki was named JSP General Secretary (later, Chairperson).

The conflict between the factions was intensified by the spread of the Cold War to East Asia, particularly the outbreak of the Korean War in 1950. While the Shamin-kei and the Nichirō-kei supported the West, the Nichimu-kei criticized US military strategy in accordance with its Four Principles of Peace: overall peace, neutralism, anti-military bases, and anti-rearmament. In 1951 the JSP split into two parties due to conflicts over acceptance of the San Francisco Peace Treaty and the Japan-US Security Treaty. The left-wing Socialist Party soon established a lead over the right-wing party as a result of the radicalization of the largest national trade union Sohyo, the strong anti-war feelings of the general public, and the predominance of Marxism among leading intellectuals. In 1955 the two wings reunited into a single party around the policy of “unarmed neutrality.” The JSP together with the Sohyo worked to prevent the “Peace Constitution” from being revised and organized a massive protest against the revision of the Japan-US Security Treaty in 1960.

Although the JSP effectively contended with reactionary policies by the conservative governments, it was prevented from coming to power by the formation of the LDP as a single conservative party one month after JSP reunification. In 1959 the Shamin-kei and a part of the Nichirō-kei seceded from the JSP, and founded the Democratic Socialist Party (DSP) the following year based on the support of the smaller national trade union, Zenrō (later Dōmei). Shortly thereafter, the leader of the modern Marxist group (the new right-wing faction), Saburō Eda, was named Secretary General and introduced the Structural Reform theory of the Italian Communist Party in an effort to adapt JSP policies to social changes occurring under rapid economic growth. Eda's scheme was foiled, however, by the traditional left-wing faction. Under left-wing leadership, the JSP worked to establish "progressive local governments" in urban areas in cooperation with the Japan Communist Party, but meanwhile it lost many of its seats in the Diet, and was unable to exercise significant power at the national level due to its reluctance to form a coalition with the DSP and the Clean Government Party (CGP).

In 1977 Eda and some right-wingers left the JSP and founded the Socialist Citizens League (later the Social Democratic League). Thereafter, the right-wing faction gradually regained power and finally, in 1986, the JSP adopted the New Declaration in reference to the Godesberg Program of the German Social Democratic Party, which foreswore Marxism and embraced reformist social democracy. This new policy was related to the Sohyo's effort for the unification with the Dōmei after the failure of the major strike of 1975 (the Rengō was formed in 1989); however, the JSP retained its policy of unarmed neutrality due to the persistence of the Cold War as well as the deep-rooted influence of left-wing activists. Although Takako Doi was named Chairperson in 1986 as the first female party head in Japan, and the JSP significantly increased its seats in the Diet owing to the Doi Boom, conflicts over security policy precluded a JSP-CGP-DSP coalition which would have been the JSP's only means of coming into power. The policy of unarmed neutrality prevented the JSP from coping well with the Gulf War in 1991, immediately after the end of the Cold War, and Chairperson Doi was forced to resign.

The JSP was out of power under LDP rule, but behind the scenes it was incorporated into the LDP politics of patronage. After the revelation of the Recruit corruption scandal in 1988, there emerged broad support for the view that the medium-sized constituency systems ought to be replaced by a single-seat constituency system for Lower House elections, in order to establish a two-party system with a greater possibility for a change of government. In 1993 reformist groups broke away from the LDP and the anti-LDP eight-party coalition Cabinet of Morihiro Hosokawa was formed. Although the JSP participated in the Hosokawa Cabinet and approved the electoral reform, conflicts with conservative reformists drove the JSP to form a coalition with the LDP. JSP Chairperson Tomiichi

Murayama was named Prime Minister in 1994 and declared the JSP's abandonment of the policy of unarmed neutrality, but this only aided the LDP's return to power and accelerated the JSP's decline. After the resignation of the Murayama Cabinet, the JSP reformed to become the Social Democratic Party on January 19, 1996, but the right wing seceded and joined the Democratic Party which had been newly established that same month.

Japanese Communist Party

Janet E. McClellan

In October of 1898 a small group of Japanese intellectuals held the first meeting of the Shakaishugi Kenkyukai (Association for the Study of Socialism) in Tokyo. A variety of western socialist ideas was presented, among them the philosophies of Charles Fourier, Louis Blanc, Ferdinand Lassalle, and Karl Marx. The dominant force in the socialist leanings was marked by pacifism and a Christian humanism entrenched in the early years of the Japanese socialist faction holds historical sway over the current philosophical and political efforts of the Japanese Communist Party (JCP) in contemporary Japan.

The first meeting of the Association for the Study of Socialism marks the initial historical movement of what would ultimately become the JCP. The history leading to the emergence of the contemporary JCP was marked by internal disarray, philosophical differences, government prosecutions and imprisonments of its leaders and radicalized elements, US occupation after World War II, and the influence of Soviet and Chinese communist forces.

In the 1920s four proletarian parties emerged, creating divisions within the Japanese socialist movement. The parties that emerged represented various interests and emphases; specifically, the conservative wing was represented by the Shakai Minshūtō (Social Mass Party), and rural alliance interests by the Nihon Nōmintō (Japan Farmers' Party), the Nihon Rōnōtō (Japan Labor Farmer Party), which included labor and intellectual interests, and the Rōdō Nōmintō (Labor–Farmer Party), a party basically under communist control. Throughout the time leading up to World War II the various factions of the proletariat movements in Japan were subjected to the shattering effects of continuous arrests by Japanese governmental authorities and internal philosophical conflicts over the future direction of the party.

The Japanese Communist Party emerged shortly after the beginning of the American Occupation. On October 4, 1945, the Supreme Commander of the Allied Powers ordered that all political prisoners were to be released. The reemergence of the imprisoned leaders of the communist movements heralded the initial postwar political reorganization and representation of a variety of social, economic, and political interests of the Japanese people.

As in the prewar era, the contemporary JCP is opposed to the existence of the Imperial House, militarism, and nuclear proliferation. The JCP's political efforts are directed toward defending the interests of the people, establishing democratic processes, and serving as watchdog of the activities and processes of corporations. In the twenty-first century the JCP perceives the push toward neoliberalism and the supremacy of transnational corporations and international banking as a form of hazardous globalization which, without democratic regulation, subjects the world economy, environment, and monetary and financial systems to potential disaster.

Jara, Víctor (1932–1973)

Benjamín Anaya González

One of the most influential songwriters of the Latin American Nueva Canción (New Song) movement, Víctor Lidio Jara Martínez was killed, along with thousands of Chileans, after newly appointed Army General Augusto Pinochet assaulted the Palace of La Moneda and killed President Salvador Allende on September 11, 1973. In the following days, participants of the Unidad Popular (the leftist coalition that supported Allende's presidency) were detained, tortured, and killed after being taken to the Chile and National stadiums. Víctor Jara, who was born in the peasant village of Lonquén on September 28, 1932, was detained in the building of the Technical University in the College of Arts where he had taught. After being brutally separated from his friends, he was ordered to sing for the crowd of detainees in the stadium in which he had performed many times. Then he was tortured. On September 15, 1973, he was killed and his corpse abandoned in the street.

Jara was a member of the Communist Party, where he joined Nobel Prize-winning poet Pablo Neruda and the great songwriter and poet Violeta Parra, both of whom influenced him. He performed in many demonstrations and strikes and recorded memorable songs, both as a soloist and with the folk-based bands Quilapayún and Inti-Illimani. In 1971 he was named cultural ambassador for Allende's Unidad Popular. He also directed theater plays and wrote poetry.

Jara conceived folk music and revolution as one. Many of his tunes became hymns for guerillas, describing daily life in campaign, such as "Camilo Torres," "Questions About Puerto Montt," "Abre tu ventana," "I'm Going to Cochabamba," or "The Right to Live in Peace," dedicated to Vietcong leader Hô Chi Minh. His legacy is recognized by many songwriters and musicians from several genres and countries, including verses by composers Daniel Viglietti, Pablo Milanés, Silvio Rodríguez, The Clash, Pete Seeger, U2, and Fabulosos Cadillacs, and some of his tunes are very popular around the world.

Jaurès, Jean (1859–1914)

Geoffrey Kurtz

Jean Jaurès was a prominent socialist politician, orator, and writer during the period of the Second International (1889–1916) and France's Third Republic (1870–1940). A defender of Alfred Dreyfus, a proponent of democratic reformism, and an advocate for peace, Jaurès sought to reconcile Karl Marx's theory of class conflict with the liberal individualism of the 1789 Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen. He was assassinated on the eve of World War I.

Jaurès was born to a middle-class family in Castres in 1859. Graduating third in his class from the Ecole Normale in 1879, he taught philosophy in an academic high school near his hometown until 1885, when he won a seat in the Chamber of Deputies. In his first term, Jaurès quietly supported secular democracy and modest social reforms. As he began to work with the miners'

Jean Jaurès, a French socialist politician and intellectual, was an advocate of a moderate third way merging the ideas of Karl Marx and social justice with the principles of liberal individualism. He gained prominence as a champion of Alfred Dreyfus during his trial. Jaurès was assassinated in 1914, but his philosophy lived on as an important representation of democratic socialism in France and Europe. (Getty Images) and glassmakers' unions in his home region, he became an outspoken socialist.

Losing his parliamentary seat in 1889, Jaurès turned to scholarship and local politics. During the next four years, he served on the Toulouse city council and completed the two dissertations – one in French and one in Latin – that would earn him a doctorate in philosophy from the Sorbonne. His first dissertation sought to reconcile idealist and materialist philosophies; the second traced the roots of German social democratic thought through the works of Martin Luther, Immanuel Kant, Johann Gottlieb Fichte, and Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel.

Jaurès was elected to the Chamber again in 1893 and soon became prominent through his role in the Dreyfus Affair. Alfred Dreyfus, a Jewish army officer, had been convicted of spying for Germany in 1894, but his innocence soon became clear and the resulting controversy divided France. Many on the French left denied that the plight of a bourgeois army officer was of any concern to the working class. However, Jaurès argued that when Dreyfus was subjected to the injustice of an unfair trial, he was no longer a member of the privileged class but simply a suffering human being. Socialists ought to embrace Dreyfus's cause, Jaurès wrote, since socialism continued and expanded the liberal commitment to human rights. He explored this link between liberalism and socialism in his writings on the affair, published in 1898 as Les Preuves: Affaire Dreyfus, and in the 13-volume socialist history of modern France, the Histoire socialiste, 1789–1900, that he edited and for which he wrote four volumes starting in 1898.

Jaurès's efforts to ally socialists and liberals helped forge a series of center-left coalition governments in France between 1899 and 1905. The left wing of the socialist movement throughout Europe criticized these coalitions and the strategy of democratic reformism they implied. Jaurès and like-minded leaders such as Eduard Bernstein (1850–1932) in Germany argued that socialists' commitment to democracy ought to mean engagement in the give-and-take of political reform. Other socialists, led by Karl Kautsky (1854–1938) and Rosa Luxemburg (1870–1919) in Germany and Jules Guesde (1845–1922) in France, insisted that the movement should use parliamentary and electoral politics primarily as exercises to prepare for an eventual revolution.

Among the reformist socialists, Jaurès offered a distinctive argument. Socialism, for him, meant a commitment to an ethical ideal of social justice and individual rights, coupled with a realization that this ideal could only be pursued through class struggle. Socialism was not a political paradise set somewhere in the future, but a demanding ethical commitment that could deepen the meaning and extend the scope of reformist activity in the present.

Jaurès argued for this radical reformism in his prolific writings and speeches, and in 1904 founded the journal L'Humanité as a vehicle for these ideas. However, reformists remained a minority among Europe's socialists. When the long-divided French socialists formed a united party in 1905, Jaurès's prestige made him the new party's natural leader even though his arguments had not persuaded most of his fellow socialists. He guided the French socialists toward a reformist strategy but was constrained by his party's official commitment to revolution.

After 1905, Jaurès increasingly turned his attention to foreign affairs, working to forestall the Europe-wide war that seemed inevitable to many. He supported an international tribunal for the peaceful arbitration of conflict and proposed that socialists lead a general strike in any country that started an aggressive war. At the same time, he argued that French socialists should defend their republic if another country attacked without provocation. In 1911, he published his final book, L'Armée Nouvelle, in which he proposed restructuring the French military as a purely defensive militia and argued that socialism and patriotism could be compatible in any country committed to democracy and social justice.

Jaurès's efforts for peace earned him the hatred of France's nationalists. He was assassinated by Raoul Vilain, a young right-wing activist, on July 31, 1914. Within days, the war he had sought to prevent began.

Today, Jaurès is fondly remembered in France, where many streets and public facilities are named for him. He has received less attention elsewhere. Even in France, he has often been remembered simply as a great moral figure, and his distinctive argument for radical reformism has often been neglected. Since the late 1990s, however, as French socialists have sought an alternative to the moderate "third way" or "new middle" ideas of leaders like Tony Blair in Britain and Gerhard Schroeder in Germany, there has been a revival of French scholarly interest in Jaurès's political thought.

Jewish Bund

April Rosenblum

The Jewish Bund, known in full as the General Jewish Workers' Union of Lithuania, Poland and Russia (Der Algemeiner Yidisher Arbeter Bund in Lite, Poyln, un Rusland), was a mass movement of Jewish workers that played an essential role in the birth of the Russian revolutionary movement. A secular organization, it opposed tsarism and capitalism, and fought both to remedy universal inequality and to defend Jewish cultural and political rights. With 30,000 active members on the eve of the Russian Revolution of 1905, the Bund comprised one of the largest socialist organizations in the Russian empire.

As a founding organization of the Russian Social Democratic Workers' Party (RSDWP), the Bund saw its mission as strengthening and promoting the RSDWP by bringing its message to the Jewish working class. However, as the views of the Bund and the RSDWP's dominant Iskra faction diverged irreconcilably on party structure, the status of Jews, the role of workers, and the relationship of theory to practice, the Bund established itself as an independent party, cooperating with others where possible to advance social democracy and revolution. After folding in Russia in 1921, it found renewed vibrancy in Poland, but was forced by World War II to marshal all of its resources for armed resistance to the Holocaust.

The Bund was founded in October of 1897 by a coalition of Jewish activist-intellectuals who, after early political education in Russian populism, had embraced Marxism. In March of 1898, it helped to convene the first congress of the new Russian Social Democratic Workers' Party, out of which Iskra, the Bolsheviks, and the Mensheviks would soon emerge.

The Bund's early leaders were soon joined by many of the workers they served. These new leaders were intimately familiar with the pressures faced by Jews, who for a century had been confined to a "Pale of Settlement" in the empire's western border region. Ninety percent lived in or near poverty, compounded by heavy discriminatory taxes, quotas restricting education, and exclusion from many trades. Periodic pogroms unleashed mass popular violence on Jewish towns, and generations had suffered under tsarist military policies which, aiming to undo Jewish cultural identity, enabled the regular kidnapping of children for decades of forced military service and conversion.

The Bund understood Russia's five million Jews to be not simply a religion but a "nationality," a distinct ethnic culture that had developed its own forms of expression over centuries together and among whom 97 percent spoke their native Yiddish. The Bund's rejection of contemporary views of nationhood, which defined a nationality by its natural link to geographic territory, brought it into stark conflict with both fellow socialists and the emerging Zionist movement.

Beginning in 1897, the Bund dedicated itself to recruiting and educating workers, organizing strikes, boycotts, and political protests, producing and distributing political literature, agitating within the military, and carrying on relationships with the empire's major social democratic and socialist organizations. The successes of Bund organizing gave it a membership which dwarfed that of other parties. In many cities, it was recognized as the only party with an actual mass base. Fellow revolutionaries observed its advanced level of organization with a mixture of praise and resentment, as when Vera Zasulich declared in a letter to Plekhanov: "The Jewish Bund is a marvel of pure balance . . . It is annoying that it is they who are so businesslike and not the Russians; all the same one must do them justice" (Tobias 1972: 92).

By 1901, Bund strikes drew consistent victories, demonstrations were formidable in size, and physical conflicts with police were increasing. In 1902–3, faced with a horrific wave of anti-Jewish pogroms at Kishinev and Czestochowa, the Bund took the lead in organizing the first Jewish mass self-defense units. The success of these units deterred pogromist violence and served as revolutionary preparation, providing Jewish workers with their first experience of fighting tsarist military forces.

By mid-1901, pressures were mounting for the Bund to develop a revolutionary approach to Jewish identity. Bund leaders had long hesitated to advocate for preserving Jewish culture, having been inculcated by both tsarist schools and socialist theory to see the eventual disappearance of Jews through assimilation as inevitable and welcome. But Zionism now threatened to draw followers away from the Bund by offering Jewish workers an affirmation of their culture that they craved. The Bund determined to formulate a vision of how minority cultures could thrive within a classless socialist society that transcended national boundaries.

Drawing on the writings of Karl Kautsky, the Bund developed a platform of “national cultural autonomy” for Jews which would eventually be endorsed at its sixth congress (1905). Unlike Zionism, the Bund’s solution sought no geographic territory. Instead, it saw liberation for Jews, and for all national minorities, in the creation of a new, multinational society where socialist ideals and education would lead dominant cultures to reject ethnic hatreds, and smaller nationalities would be supported to develop their cultures. Its stance was met with strong criticism from other social democrats, who denied Jewish nationality and accused the Bund of being poisoned by nationalism.

Simultaneously, Lenin sought to centralize the RSDWP under Iskra’s control. In July 1903, at the RSDWP’s second congress, criticism of the Bund’s national thought expanded into attempts to limit Bund activities and question the organization’s long-term usefulness. Led by Iskra, delegates roundly rejected proposals that would decentralize RSDWP structure and affirm the Bund’s ability to continue operating on its own terms. Foreseeing a future as the debilitated appendage of a new, highly centralized RSDWP, the Bund resigned from RSDWP membership. In September 1904, it was recognized as the first independent Jewish party of the Socialist International.

Despite these troubles, external Bund activities continued to increase. By the revolutionary days of May 1905, it had risen to the level of a counter-institution among Jews, with Bund groups formally implementing communal taxes on Jews to fund strikes, establishing food distribution centers and hospitals for those wounded during actions, and in some instances replacing local rabbis as the destination for Jewish individuals, families, and businesses seeking to settle disputes.

In January 1905, when the “Bloody Sunday” massacre unleashed massive strikes, the Bund sounded the call for workers to drop their tasks, arm themselves, and begin the work of revolution. The coming months led to major successes in Bund-influenced areas, where as early as January tsarist advisors observed “far more serious conditions” than in major Russian cities (Tobias 1972: 299). It was not until October that strikes in St. Petersburg and Moscow led the regime to convene a democratically elected parliament and grant broad new political freedoms. The social democratic movement cautiously accepted partial victory.

The repression that followed, including a surge in police-supported anti-Semitic violence by the “Black Hundreds,” left the Bund badly damaged. Hundreds of thousands of Jews escaped via immigration to the United States. Bund members who stayed were weakened and depressed. Throughout the next decade, the organization gradually rebuilt itself through an increased focus on proletarian Jewish cultural life. In 1917, the Bund participated actively in the February revolution. However, it opposed the Bolshevik seizure of power, and after several years of struggle was dissolved in 1921.

Operations now shifted irrevocably to Poland, where Bund activities had been allowed semi-independence since 1914. There, Bundists founded a proliferation of cultural institutions, from secular Yiddish schools and a youth sports movement to an organization for Jewish working women and a children’s sanitarium. The Bund fought Jewish exclusion from trades, shut down major sectors of Poland in a general strike against pogroms, and began to organize among the conservative, religious Jewish workers whom they had previously never reached.

The Bund’s continuing struggle against political isolation in the increasingly anti-Semitic climate of the 1920s and 1930s led it to cooperate with reformists and moderates. It participated in elections, joined the Labor and Socialist International after being rejected by the Comintern, and partnered with the Polish Socialist Party, which it had long criticized.

By 1939, Polish popular support for the Bund had reached unprecedented levels. But with the German invasion of Poland in 1939, Bund activities were forced underground. In secret, members organized education and cultural activities for youth, published newspapers, and played a leading role in organizing the network of armed Jewish resistance to the Nazis, including the massive Warsaw Ghetto Uprising of April 1943. Though a handful of Bundists survived the war, the organization shut down under Soviet pressure in 1949.

Even after the Holocaust, the Bund remained fierce opponents of Zionism, advocating instead the concept of do-ikayt (“hereness”), which affirmed that wherever Jews lived, there was their homeland; there they should build permanent Jewish culture, and fight to improve conditions for all people.

The Bund’s influence extended beyond Europe, particularly in early twentieth-century mass Jewish immigration to the United States, where Bundists rose to leadership in the American Labor Party, the Communist Party, the socialist Forverts (Forward) and communist Frayhayt (Freedom) newspapers, the Workmen’s Circle, the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, and the International Ladies’ Garment Workers’ Union, and helped to found the Jewish Labor Committee and Jewish Socialist Federation. In the theoretical realm, the Bund proposed a postmodern understanding of nationality at a time when Russia had scarcely emerged from medieval structures. In practical terms, the organization contributed a relatively unique example of revolutionary organizing that addressed with equal seriousness both Jewish needs for safety and self-determination and the mandate to work toward universal liberation.

Though the Bund officially still exists, drawing a small membership primarily from Jews who once took part in its European chapters, its impact is more strongly felt in the progressive movements around the world that its members joined, founded, or influenced indirectly. The Bund today remains a source of influence and inspiration for radical and progressive Jewish activists, non- and anti-Zionists, intentionally secular Jewish communities, and the Yiddish revival movement.

Jewish resistance to Nazism

Rabbi Yehiel Grenimann

Jewish resistance to Nazism should be seen within two contexts: the history of Jewish responses to the virulent European Christian anti-Semitism of the approximately 1,000 years which preceded the Holocaust on the one hand, and the history of religious, ethnic, and political resistance to totalitarianism in the twentieth century on the other.

In the first context, Jewish consciousness of Nazism as a qualitatively different, more radical, threat to Jewish existence came tragically late. This led to ineffective “shtadlanut” responses of traditional communal leaders, who chose to bargain with, negotiate with, or bribe those in power. There were also defiant expressions of religious observance, particularly among the Orthodox Jews. Passive resistance to the Nazi onslaught began in Germany under the spiritual leadership of figures such as Rabbi Leo Baeck and the philosopher Martin Buber who organized a revival of Jewish education and cultural activity in the late 1930s. In the ghettos and camps throughout Europe, self-help, medical, social, educational, and cultural institutions served to counter demoralization, focus passive resistance, and sometimes create environments from which activist rescue and armed resistance groups could work and recruit participants.

In the second context, Jews of the more ideological modern movements became increasingly aware that they were faced with an ideology that was absolutist, racist, and uncompromising in its commitment to the total destruction of the Jewish people. The Jews, defined racially, were slated for extermination. Religious, national, or ethnic loyalties had become irrelevant. They were the prime target of Nazi totalitarianism, even at the expense of the German war effort. This realization led to organized efforts of rescue, which became increasingly desperate as the war continued. Efforts at documenting Jewish life and suffering were widespread, as were attempts at disseminating information about the Nazi genocide until it became public knowledge.

The continued postponement of armed uprising as long as some options for physical survival still seemed possible was characteristic of the behavior of most ghetto-based resistance groups. They feared mass reprisals and concluded that armed struggle could be carried out only from the forests or within general nationalist (often anti-Semitic themselves) and communist resistance movements. This approach changed when it was clear that the final liquidation of a ghetto was at hand.

The crescendo of armed resistance was reached in the Warsaw ghetto revolt of April (Passover) 1943, where the remaining thousands held out against the Nazi war machine for more than a month until the last survivors were murdered and the ghetto razed. Apart from that major revolt, incidents of organized armed revolt have been documented in 43 other ghettos, as well as a number of the major death camps: Sobibor, Treblinka, and Birkenau-Auschwitz. Unlike these, however, the Warsaw rebellion created a precedent for urban rebellion elsewhere in occupied Europe and became a rallying symbol of Jewish resistance under the slogan "Do not go like lambs to the slaughter." This impacted Jewish behavior during the immediate postwar period, leading up to the Jewish rebellion against the British mandate in Palestine in 1946 and Israel's war of independence two years later.

One reason the reaction was slow in many quarters was that ideological movements had contributed to the secularization and modernization of the Jewish masses during the early twentieth century. This had encouraged the breakdown of traditional religious authority and social structures. Mass migration to Western Europe, North America, and Palestine at the end of the nineteenth century also contributed to this tendency, at least until migration was stopped by restrictions and anti-Semitic backlash in those countries.

Amongst these movements Jewish socialism (known as the Bund), Jewish communism, and Zionism were to become agents of active and armed resistance against Nazism just before and during World War II. These ideological parties had spawned youth movements, the best known of which were Hashomer Hatzair, Betar, Gordonia, Dror-HaBonim, and Skif-Tsukumft, which played a crucial role in the ghetto uprisings of 1942–1943. Well known leaders of these groups included Mordecai Anilewicz and Mark Edelman of Warsaw, Abba Kovner and Joseph Wittenberg of Vilna, and Mordecai Tannenbaum-Tamarov of Bialystok, all of whom had been youth leaders of socialist or socialist Zionist groups in prewar years. Young women such as Roska Kurzack, Hanna Senesh, Haviva Reich, and countless others, also played heroic roles in these resistance groups, serving as couriers between ghettos and contacts on the Aryan side, as saboteurs, and, later in the war, as parachutists behind the lines for the Allies in Hungary, where the last sizable Jewish community still remained.

A particular focus of resistance activities was the rescue of children, victims of the first "aktziot" (round-ups). Children were smuggled out of ghettos and concentration camps and thrown off trains taking Jews to extermination centers. When possible, they were supplied with forged identification documents, placed with non-Jewish families, hidden in the countryside of occupied countries and smuggled across borders throughout Europe, sometimes in cooperation with local resistance groups in Germany, the Scandinavian countries, Holland, Belgium, France, Italy, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, and Yugoslavia. Even Polish nationalists cooperated in such efforts, unlike those in the Baltic states, Ukraine, Croatia, and Romania. The American Zionist leader Henrietta Szold organized an international effort to get children out of Germany, Austria, and Czechoslovakia before the outbreak of World War II. This project, called "Youth Aliya," saved thousands of children who were settled in youth villages and kibbutzim throughout Palestine during the late 1930s. Most of their families presumably perished.

Jews played a central role in the resistance against Nazism of partisans in the forests of Yugoslavia, Lithuania, Belarus, Slovakia, Poland, and Ukraine in Eastern Europe, as well as the French and Dutch resistance in Western Europe.

Thousands who had fled into the countryside to escape Nazi persecution and mass murder joined existing resistance groups, initiated new ones, and were prominent in the organization of sabotage and guerilla warfare against the German army. Figures like Jacob Glazman, Boris Greineman, Alexander Bogan, and the Bielsky brothers organized specifically Jewish resistance units, such as “Nekomma” (Vengeance) in the Naroch forest near Vilna, which not only fought the Germans, sabotaging communications and supplies on the eastern front and attacking small German outposts, but also protected and fed hundreds of Jewish civilians hidden in these forests. They infiltrated ghettos to encourage young people to flee and join them in their armed struggle.

Most such groups were disbanded by the Soviets when they took control of these areas as the tide turned against the Nazi occupiers, though many continued fighting in the ranks of the Red Army until the end of the war. In addition, more than a million Jews served in the regular armed forces of the Allies in the effort to defeat Nazism, including a contingent called “The Jewish Brigade” from British Palestine.

Jews and revolution in Europe, 1789–1919

Howard N. Lupovitch

The interplay between European Jewry and European revolutions manifested itself in two ways during the long nineteenth century, from 1789 to 1919. First, the legal and political status of Jews, primarily in Central and Eastern Europe, ranked among the most hotly contested and protracted debates among revolutionary elites and their antagonists. Second, from 1848 onward, Jews were among the leaders of most revolutionary movements.

The particular aims at stake during the revolutionary movements of the nineteenth century changed from liberalism in 1789, to liberalism and nationalism by 1848, to socialism and communism by 1917. Yet the centrality of the Jewish Question, as the debate over the status of Jews came to be known by the 1820s, remained throughout; the inclusion of Jews in the new states and societies that these movements hoped to build remained at the forefront of revolutionary and counterrevolutionary discourse and debate. Each of the great revolutionary dramas of 1789, 1848, and 1917 added a dimension to the debate over the fate of the Jews. The Jewish Question eventually delineated the future of a religious and ethnic minority, but also became a gauge of the success of revolutionary ideas and movements.

Jews in France

The French Revolution brought discourse on Jewish rights to the forefront. For several decades prior to 1789, public exchanges on civic amelioration of Jews in England, France, the Netherlands, and the German states remained confined to the world of academic and belletristic discourse. The consequence of the discourse on Jewish inclusion is evident in Friedrich Wilhelm of Prussia’s policies, and especially in the Hapsburg monarch Joseph II’s Patent of Toleration. These initial discussions influenced subsequent debates in revolutionary settings: progressive and revolutionary movements would include Jews in a newly refashioned state and society quid pro quo, or permit inclusion on the condition of Jews meeting certain expectations.

The broader brush strokes of this quid pro quo proposition, and the complexity of translating it into an actual state policy, became clear during the early days of the French Revolution. The central point of contention was whether the Jews would be willing and able to cede corporate autonomy and social isolation in exchange for citizenship, a revolutionary concession in exchange for revolutionizing Jews’ status. This condition’s centrality was made explicit in an oft-cited statement by Count Clermont-Tonnere, a leading proponent of Jewish emancipation, in December 1789: “The Jews should be denied everything as a nation, but granted everything as individuals. They must be citizens. . . . [But] it is intolerable that the Jews should become a separate political formation or class. The existence of a nation within a nation is unacceptable to our country.” The Jews residing in France, in other words, were expected to transform themselves into French citizens of the Jewish persuasion.

This expectation was complicated by the fact that, at the end of the eighteenth century, French Jewry was comprised of two starkly different groups: the highly acculturated, comparatively more affluent, and less numerous Jews of Bordeaux; and the unacculturated, more numerous, less affluent Jews of Alsace-Lorraine. The latter had come under French rule as part of the Peace of Westphalia in 1648, but were never integrated into French society beyond a limited role as commercial intermediaries and creditors. Jews of Alsace-Lorraine were largely impoverished (except for a few affluent merchants and creditors), religiously traditional, Yiddish-speaking Jews, who were organized into self-governing, corporate communities. In contrast, the Jews of Bordeaux lived inconspicuously in France for several generations as an exception to a general ban on Jewish settlements. Sephardic Jews were largely descendants of Spanish and Portuguese Jews, who, after settling in France ostensibly as Christians during the late seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, eventually resumed practicing Judaism openly. In contrast to their co-religionists in Alsace-Lorraine, the Jews of Bordeaux were Jewish in the modern sense, for their Jewish identity was one component of a compartmentalized identity. They had neither designs nor use for corporate status, but lived contentedly as individual Jews within French culture and society. They were Frenchmen of the Jewish persuasion a century or more before this term became in vogue.

Not surprisingly, the Jews of Bordeaux were emancipated in January 1790 with little fanfare a few months following the Declaration of the Rights of Man. In actuality, Jews had been socially emancipated a generation or two earlier; legal emancipation merely made overt a situation existing for decades. The Jews of Alsace-Lorraine were emancipated in September 1791, after nearly two years of debate. The sharp contrast between the two emancipation edicts left a profound impact on the more acculturated Jews of Alsace.

In early 1791, Isaac Cerf Berr, a leading spokesman of Alsatian Jews from Nancy, articulated his aim to prove Jews of Alsace-Lorraine worthy of emancipation, essentially by emulating Jews of Bordeaux: “I cannot too often repeat how absolutely necessary it is for us to divest ourselves entirely of that narrow spirit of corporation and congregation, in all civil and political matters, not connected immediately with our spiritual laws; in these things we must absolutely appear simply as individuals, as Frenchmen, guided only by a true patriotism and by the general good of the nation.” Cerf Berr was the first in a long series of Jewish leaders contemplating eliminating elements of Jewish distinctiveness in exchange for citizenship.

From this point onward, each revolutionary movement contemplating including Jews used the emancipation of the Jews of Bordeaux and Alsace-Lorraine as a template, to determine conditions for Jewish inclusion and distinguish worthy Jews from those first needing to meet certain conditions. This paradigm remained at the center of revolutionary discourse after 1789, especially during the revolutions of 1848.

Jews in Central Europe and Russia

While, in some ways, the revolutionary movements of 1848 reprised in Central Europe the events of 1789, two interim developments set the events of 1848–9 down a different path. First, during the half-century between 1789 and 1848, Romantic notions of culturally and historically based differences between national and ethnic groups supplanted Enlightenment notions of primacy of reason and universal equality. In the Hapsburg Monarchy, in particular, this challenged the leaders of the revolutions of 1848 to negotiate the often conflicting claims of Germans, Magyars, Czechs, Poles, Romanians, Serbs, and Croats, while eliminating social inequality between privileged and unprivileged classes, and unseating the dynasty.

The early weeks of the revolution in the spring of 1848 were characterized by a burst of idealistic rhetoric reminiscent of Paris 1789, with little nationalist sentiment. Calls for Jewish emancipation, at the forefront of revolutionary aims throughout Central Europe, echoed the rhetoric of the French Revolution with calls for universal brotherhood and equality to include Jews. Among the leaders of the Revolution in Vienna – among the most significant mid-century revolutions – were two assimilated Jews, Adolf Fischhof and William Goldmark. Each had set aside his Jewish culture for a struggle on behalf of humanity, a tribute to the universalist idealism of the spring of 1848. After the abdication of Hapsburg Emperor Ferdinand in 1848, Fischhof, leader of the Commission on Public Safety, became de facto ruler of the Hapsburg Monarchy.

Within six months after the outbreak of revolution in March 1848, nationalist aims appeared alongside the transnational aims of Fischhof and Goldmark; including those of the Magyars for political independence. The Springtime of Nations and the flood of national aspirations added a dimension to the debate over Jewish emancipation. The question shifted from whether Jews were worthy of state citizenship to whether they were worthy of inclusion in a given nation. The Frankfurt Parliament, voice of German national aspirations in 1848, reiterated the promise of religious equality under the banner of the fundamental rights of the German people.

Jews responded to this new expectation accordingly, exemplified by Hungarian Jews, who embraced the Magyar cause in thought, word, and deed. The patriotism of Hungarian Jewry elicited a powerful response revealing the underbelly to revolutionary agitation as anti-Jewish riots broke out primarily in cities in Hungary and Central Europe. In Hungary, violence was provoked by the prospect of Jews joining revolutionary armies such as the Hungarian national guard (hónvéd). In Hungary, Sándor Petöfi and Mihály Vörösmarty and other leading figures reproached anti-Jewish agitators as enemies of the revolution.

Following the defeat of the Revolutions of 1848, conflicting images of Jews appeared, for example, through the Rothschild family's financial support for the reinvigoration of the royal and imperial armies of the Hohenzollern and Hapsburg dynasties. Political conservatives and reactionaries viewed Jews such as Fischhof as revolutionary, and progressives, particularly social democrats and those further to the political left, personified Jews as the Rothschilds, and indispensable agents of counterrevolution. These conflicting stereotypes fortified nascent political anti-Semitism in the late 1800s, reinforced in the early twentieth century by an even greater presence of Jews among the leaders of the socialist and communist revolutions in the wake of World War I.

The revolutions in Germany, Hungary, and Russia during and immediately after World War I marked the full realization of the aims of previous revolutions with respect to Jews. The leaders of these revolutions who were of Jewish origin (notably Rosa Luxemburg in Germany, Béla Kún in Hungary, and Leon Trotsky in Russia) forged solidarity with a working class beyond their own social origin. As Luxemburg wrote in 1916: "I feel equally close to the wretched victims of the rubber plantations of Putumayo, or to the Negroes in Africa with whose bodies the Europeans are playing catch-ball . . . I have no separate corner of my heart for the ghetto. I feel at home in the entire world wherever there are clouds and birds and human tears."

This universalist outlook was realized most dramatically and en masse during the Bolshevik Revolution and the emerging revolutionary Soviet state seeking to foster class bonds of solidarity. Concomitantly the Bolshevik Revolution introduced extraordinary material and cultural possibilities for individual Jews. Just as the Revolutions of 1848 had a backlash on Jews by laying a foundation stone for political anti-Semitism, the early twentieth century revolutions fortified the tendency to equate Jews and communism.

Jinnah, Muhammad Ali (1876–1948)

Kunal Chattopadhyay

Born in 1876 in Karachi, Sindh, a province in the Bombay Presidency of India, Jinnah was a leading opponent of British colonialism, a representative of Muslim aspirations, and the founder of Pakistan who was known as Baba-e-Quam (Father of the Nation). Though a Shi'ite Muslim, Jinnah was not observant. He studied law in London and was called to the bar at the age of 19. He joined the Indian National Congress in 1896 as a reformer, and from 1910 he was a moderate nationalist in the Imperial Legislative Assembly.

In 1906, Jinnah wrote a letter challenging the claims of the Aga Khan and others as representatives of the Muslim community. The same year, he attended the Calcutta Session of the Congress, and in a speech over the Wakf (religious endowments) question, expressed satisfaction that Muslims could stand on the same platform as other religions in India. For the next 30 years Jinnah advocated Indian nationalism while articulating Muslim grievances. After initially rejecting Muslim League communal politics, Jinnah joined the organization in 1913, becoming president at the 1916 session in Lucknow. Later Jinnah became architect of a Congress–League alliance against colonial rule, and was viewed as the ambassador of Hindu–Muslim unity. Like most moderate nationalists, Jinnah supported the British in World War I while remaining active in the home rule movement.

Gandhi's rise to power caused Jinnah's drift from the Congress. He welcomed Gandhi and invited him to join the Home Rule League as president. But Gandhi sought to portray Jinnah as a Muslim sectarian rather than as a nationalist. By late 1920 Jinnah became estranged from Congress. A constitutionalist, he objected to Gandhi's style of mass politics. Opposing Gandhi's "Hindu style" at the 1923 Muslim League Congress, Jinnah emphasized Hindu–Muslim unity in order to achieve Indian dominion status. In 1927, Jinnah convened a meeting of representative Muslims demanding one-third representation in the Central Legislature. Congress leaders ignored Jinnah and supported an alternative constitutional plan by Hindu communalists. Jinnah rejected an invitation to attend the All-India Muslim Conference in Delhi convened by the Aga Khan. At the All-Parties Convention in Calcutta, Jinnah pleaded for national unity despite communal differences, and participated in the Round Table Conference as an independent voice. Ignored by the British and by Gandhi, Jinnah moved to England to practice law.

Jinnah's political proposals prior to 1940 exposed a commitment to civil liberties. In 1918, he told the viceroy that terrorism was a political not a criminal action, caused by discontent against British colonial policy. In 1924, Jinnah argued that violence and bomb throwing could be prevented through meeting people's aspirations, not by repressive laws.

Until the mid-1930s, as leader of the Muslim League, Jinnah aspired to a unified independent India. But his effort to compromise with Congress through power sharing was rejected by Jawaharlal Nehru, who opposed any competition with Congress in India. Following the 1937 elections, Nehru demanded a Muslim League merger with Congress. Fearing that Congress would use its majority vote to suppress Muslim aspirations, Jinnah subsequently returned to communal politics and held the view that Hindus and Muslims constituted two nations. Nevertheless, from 1937 to early 1940 Jinnah's writings and speeches alternated between urging protection for minorities and the two-nation theory. As a culmination, the Lahore Resolution of the Muslim League for Muslim rights and autonomy was an ambiguous rather than absolute call for partition.

In 1941, Jinnah founded Dawn as the organ of the League. The following year he demanded parity of Muslim League and Congress ministers and the right for Muslim majority provinces to secede. Some historians question whether Jinnah actually sought an independent state, or whether he raised the issue as a means to gain greater autonomy and security for Muslims. Repeated negotiations between Gandhi and Jinnah in 1944 failed to yield tangible results. In 1946, the Muslim League won a large majority of Muslim seats in the Constituent Assembly of India, while Congress swept the general seats. Jinnah accepted the 1946 British cabinet mission proposal for a united India with significant autonomy for provinces and religions, a plan first rejected by Congress. After a second proposal calling for partition along communal lines, Congress accepted provincial autonomy without broader communal autonomy. Jinnah called this acceptance dishonest and withdrew the League from the Constituent Assembly.

On August 16, Jinnah called on the Muslim League to launch "direct action." Communal violence broke out throughout India, notably in Calcutta, Noakhali in Bengal, Bihar, and the United Provinces. Eventually the League–Congress coalition collapsed in the central government. Congress accepted partition, since its conservative leaders were wary of Jinnah and popular radicalism. The new viceroy, Lord Mountbatten, and civil servant V. P. Menon promulgated a partition plan creating Muslim dominion in West Punjab, East Bengal, Baluchistan, and Sindh. The Northwest Frontier Province voted for Congress, but over 90 percent of the population boycotted a plebiscite creating an independent Pakistan.

On August 14, 1947, Pakistan became an independent dominion and Jinnah was named governor general. Speaking to the Pakistan Constituent Assembly on August 11, 1947, Jinnah called for a pluralist democracy, with equal rights for Muslims and Hindus. But the first months of independent Pakistan were diverted to address violence caused by the partition. Jinnah put his imprint on Pakistan's future in two important ways. In a trip to Bengal, he declared Urdu as the official language of Pakistan, even though the majority did not speak it. Jinnah also confronted India over the accession of the princely states of Junagarh and Kashmir. India then sent troops to ensure the incorporation of Junagarh. Pakistan supported Kashmiri rebels, leading to more than six decades of confrontation with India.

Jinnah died on September 11, 1948 from lung cancer and tuberculosis.

Joshi, P. C. (1907–1980)

Shatarupa Sen Gupta

P. C. Joshi was born in in Almorā, Uttar Pradesh. He joined the Workers' and Peasants' Party in 1928 and became the joint secretary of its United Provinces unit. Alarmed at the rise of communist and trade union activities, the British launched a series of repressive measures, culminating in the arrest of 31 labor leaders, including Joshi, on March 20, 1929; they were tried for three years in the famous Meerut Conspiracy Case. Joshi joined the Communist Party of India (CPI) the same year. He was released in 1933 and participated in the All-India Textile Workers' Strike from Kanpur, for which he was again arrested and imprisoned for two years.

Joshi became general secretary of the CPI in 1935, the period of the Comintern's turn to Popular Frontism. His period as party chief (1935–48) was marked by a combination of significant growth – both horizontally and in number of members – and a reformist orientation. Joshi was able to push the party towards penetrating civil society by forming mass organizations of students, women, and people in the creative arts. In 1943 he married another remarkable revolutionary: Kalpana Dutt, a supporter of armed revolution, who later became a party member.

After the Nazi invasion of the Soviet Union in 1941, the CPI declared that the war was a "Peoples' War" against fascism, which led to the decriminalization of the CPI by the Indian government. Taking advantage of this moment, the CPI grew hugely, and was able to emerge as the leading party in the postwar upsurge of 1945–7, spearheading struggles like the Tebhaga movement (Bengal), Telangana struggle (Hyderabad), Punnappa Vyalar (Kerala), and the all-India General Strike of 1946; however, Joshi's nationalist line meant that the party did not try to turn the struggles into a revolution, and instead called for the Congress to take leadership.

Shortly after India won its independence, the CPI took a position of armed insurrection – a line Joshi opposed. He was denounced as a rightist and expelled in 1949. Though taken back after the change in line of 1951, he remained marginalized. In 1952 Joshi went to the World Peace Congress in Vienna. He was also elected to the Central Committee of the CPI in the Palghat Congress of 1956, eventually becoming the editor of New Age, the party organ of the CPI.

The Sino-Indian border conflict of 1962 posed a fresh challenge to the CPI. A section within the party supported China's claim that India was the aggressor, whereas another section, in the wake of the Soviet Union's support to Nehru, wanted to steer the party closer to the Congress. When the pro-Chinese faction split from the CPI (Marxist) in 1964, Joshi remained in the CPI, but faced isolation for refusing to approve the CPI's forming of Samyukt Vidhayak Dal (a united legislators group). Towards the end of his life, Joshi built the Socialist Ashram (hermitage) in his home town of Almora, and dedicated his remaining years to documenting the history of the CPI, and building an archive of the left movements in India at Jawaharlal Nehru University. He died on November 9, 1980.

Juan Santos Atahualpa Rebellion

Gabriel Cabrera M.

The Juan Santos Atahualpa Rebellion was an anti-colonial and millenarian armed uprising carried out by the indigenous population of Peruvian central Amazonia during Spanish domination. It took its name from its leader, Juan Santos, named Atahualpa. Though one of the most important indigenous rebellions in the eighteenth-century Peruvian viceroyalty, and the longest, most of the facts surrounding both the rebellion and its leader are unclear. Some are mixed with legend, while others are hypotheses or possibilities. It is known that Juan Santos and his army, recruited from among different Amazonian indigenous peoples, fought the Spanish army for more than 14 years and were never defeated. While they could not chase the colonial powers out of Peruvian territory, they did manage to expel Franciscan evangelist missions from the central jungle for several decades.

Juan Santos was born around 1710. He was educated in Cusco by the Jesuits, so he was probably a member of the indigenous nobility. Santos learned Spanish and Latin and traveled with a priest to France, Spain, England, and Angola. That trip allowed him to contrast life in Europe to that of most Indians in Peru and may have helped form his anti-colonial consciousness and influence his decision to rebel. When he did return, he built a movement calling for the expulsion of the Spanish; the eradication of social, economic, political, and cultural oppression enforced on the indigenous people; and the restoration of the Tawantinsuyu (the Quechua name for the Inca empire), of which he declared himself a representative.

In about 1740, a short time after his return to Peru, Santos penetrated into the central jungle and traveled among the indigenous people there, meeting with local caciques, or chiefs. During this time he became known as Apu Inka, descendant of Atahualpa, who was the last sovereign of Tawantinsuyu. The Ashaninka people, the largest indigenous population in the Amazonian region of Gran Pajonal, joined the rebellion, soon to be followed by other indigenous peoples such as the Yaneshas, Piros, Shipibos, Conibos, and Katataibos.

The rebellion broke out in June 1742 as Atahualpa began expelling the missionaries from the region. José Antonio de Mendoza, then viceroy of Peru, immediately sent an armed expedition to defeat the rebels. In 1743 the Spaniards established their headquarters in Quimiri, but the rebels interrupted their supplies and besieged them. The Spaniards either deserted or died, and the rebel army took the Chanchamayo valley. A larger expedition was sent by the next viceroy, José Antonio Manso de Velasco, but it was also defeated by Atahualpa, whose army knew the land well and used guerilla tactics. The rebel movement and its political influence rapidly extended to areas occupied by the current Huanuco, Pasco, Junin, and Ayacucho departments.

After the defeat of the second expedition, Atahualpa decided to advance through the Andean region and establish relations with the local indigenous leaders there. The rebel army, after taking the Sonomoro and Andamarca settlements, reached the edge of Tarma, an important Andean village, which it besieged. Yet, unexplainably, the rebel army abandoned its position after a while, retreated, and turned back to the tropical mountain region. Some sources say the cause likely involved the harsh Andean climate, unbearable for the Amazonian rebels. However, the Spaniards decided to fortify the main settlements and did not dare to make raids into the jungle again.

No information about the rebel movement or its leader is available for the period after 1756. It is speculated that Atahualpa died that year. Some say he was killed by his lieutenant and brother-in-law, the black Antonio Gatica, or by another leader of his army, because of a power conflict. Others say he was killed when somebody wanted to prove his alleged immortality. However, he most likely died because of his age. At any rate, after his death the indigenous warriors built a monument in Metraró, where his corpse remained until being moved to the Tarma cemetery after the republican period.

There are also varying interpretations of many details surrounding the movement and its leader. In seeking to explain why the movement did not have larger political repercussions, historians have pointed out that though it threatened the colonial power for many years, it did not extend to the most important regions of the viceroy – the Andes and the coast. There is no clear answer as to why this is the case. Also uncertain is the information about a probable collaboration between Juan Santos Atahualpa and the English vice-admiral George Anson, whom Santos might have met during his trip to Europe. Apparently Anson waited with his fleet in the Pacific Ocean for many months in 1742, with the purpose of supporting the rebellion, but he decided to leave shortly before the uprising finally broke out.

The rebellion strongly influenced other uprisings. One was the 1750 conspiracy by a group of indigenous people in Lima. Encouraged by Atahualpa's successes, they planned to take the viceregal palace and expel or kill all the chapetones or Spaniards. After the failure of the conspiracy, one of its leaders, Francisco Inca, escaped his sentence of death and quartering to start a new uprising in Huarochiri province, but that too was soon defeated.

Perhaps the most important legacy of the Atahualpa rebellion was to unify under one emancipating project a vast population from several Indian tribes. It also preserved indigenous culture by restricting the cultural Catholic influence for many years, because until about 1780 or later, missionaries did not dare to penetrate into their territory.

Juárez, Benito (1806–1872)

Leticia Pacheco Espejel

Known for participating in a plot to overthrow Mexican President Antonio López de Santa Anna (1794–1876) and as President of Mexico from 1858 to 1871, Benito Juárez García was born on March 21, 1806, in San Pablo Guelatao in the Mexican state of Oaxaca, a member of the Zapotecas indigenous group. His parents, Marcelino Juárez and Brígida García, died when he was 3 years old, and he was placed under the guardianship of his grandparents and uncle, Bernadino Juárez. At 13 years of age, Benito Juárez moved to the city of Oaxaca where his older sister, Guadalupe, worked as a maid for the Maza family. Some years later, in 1843, he married the Mazas' daughter, Margarita.

After arriving in Oaxaca, Juárez studied under the Catholic priest Antonio Salanueva, who taught him Castilian and instructed him in religious theology. He joined the Santa Cruz Catholic order but not did wish to dedicate himself to the priesthood. Instead, he joined the Institute of Science and Arts at Oaxaca to study and later teach law. In 1952, Juárez was designated secretary and director of the Institute. While in Oaxaca, Juárez was twice elected governor, in 1848 and 1856.

In 1853 Juárez went into exile in the United States for 18 months, during which time he made contact with other liberal intellectuals in exile like Ponciano Arriaga and José María Mata y Melchor Ocampo. This small group of intellectuals created the national plan to overthrow the Mexican president, General Santa Anna. Under the name of the Revolutionary Mexican Junta, they demanded greater equality within society and limitations on clerical power based on a strict separation of church and state.

Juárez's career can be divided into four distinct periods. The first, from 1855 to 1857, is characterized by his exile to the US and participation with the plan to overthrow Santa Anna's government. In the new government of Juan Alvaréz, Juárez became minister of justice and public education and introduced the Law of Juárez (1855), which abolished specific ecclesiastic and military tribunals and promulgated the separation of church and state. Under Ignacio Comonfort's presidency the liberal constitution of 1857 was proclaimed. In the second period, from 1858 to 1861, the process of realizing the constitution was begun. Disclaiming the new constitution by the executive, the government initiated the so-called War of Reform, which finally led to the dismissal of President Comonfort. Benito Juárez was elected president in 1858.

The third period, from 1862 to 1865, was characterized by the invasion of Napoleon III of France, who decided to enter Mexico by force as Juárez had suspended payment of foreign debts. In 1864 Napoleon III established Ferdinand Maximilian of Austria as emperor of Mexico against the opposition of the Mexican people. Juárez and his cabinet retreated to northern Mexico, building a government-in-exile for two and a half years, while Maximilian remained an "undesired European intervention." In the fourth and final period, from 1866 to 1872, Juárez drove out the French, dismissing Maximilian from power and ordering his execution on June 19, 1867. He governed the nation, suppressing revolts by Porfirio Díaz and other opponents and ensuring his reelection by using the power of the presidency in 1867 and 1871. On July 17, 1872, Juárez died of a heart attack.

Julião, Francisco (1915–1999)

Henrique Tahan Novaes

A lawyer, deputy, novelist, and socialist influenced by the Catholic Church's left wing, Francisco

Julião was leader of the Farmers' Leagues in the northeast of Brazil and a federal deputy for the Brazilian Socialist Party (PSB). Julião revealed the correlation that existed between large landed property, the monoculture of sugar cane, and the proliferation of poverty in the northeast. His theory of social revolution revolved heavily around biblical and Christian principles, "according to which the land should belong to those who work on it, with their own hands and their own sweat, and not the sweat of others" (Julião 1962: 22). He believed that the real battle was that between peasants and property owners, and he thus supported radical agrarian reform. His theory, however, suffered the impact of the 1959 Cuban Revolution and the anti-communist hysteria that followed in the United States and other western countries. He was exiled after the military coup in 1964.

Jumandi (d. 1578)

Viviana Uriona

Jumandi was a prestigious cacique, or Indian chieftain. He converted to Christianity and was familiar with Spanish ways. The importance of Jumandi as a figure in the history of indigenous peoples of Ecuador should be viewed in the historical context following the arrival of the Spaniards in search of wealth in gold and spices, especially cinnamon. The indigenous who fell into the hands of the Spaniards during the Spanish expeditions (from 1534 to 1560) were forced to reveal where the treasures were to be sought. If they did not respond, they were arrested and cruelly murdered. In this process, 16 cities were founded. Compared to the foundation of other cities in the Andean region, this demonstrates the interest of the conquerors in the region of Ecuador. The people from each of these regions were subjected to the cruel exploitation of slavery and feudal court.

Faced with this situation, all warlords took up arms against the Spaniards. In 1578 the Quijos revolted to free themselves from oppression. Jumandí, in alliance with other leaders, commanded an army of 5,000 men with the military objective of destroying the cities of Ávila, Archidona, and Baeza. In this uprising the Pendes played a leading role. Pendes were sorcerers, shamans, sages, or healers, and they were highly respected by the indigenous. Beto and Guami were the first Pendes who convened all the indigenous to the first uprising in arms. The Quijos had a variety of strategies to combat the Spaniards. They guided the Spaniards through false paths, fled and penetrated into the jungle, or fought directly against the conquerors.

The indigenous chiefs, including the leader Jumandí, were captured, taken to Quito, and sentenced to death. As a result of abuses, epidemics, and clashes with the Spaniards, the Quijos, who numbered 16,000 in 1576, were down to 1,649 people in the early seventeenth century.

Jung Hwa-am (1896–1981)

O. H. Jang-Whan

Jung Hwa-am was a Korean anti-imperialist and revolutionary activist with strong bonds to the activist movement. As an anarchist activist, Jung was a member of the Je-jung-kuk jo-sun mu-jung-bu ju-eu-ja yun-meng (Korean Anarchist Federation in China). Together with the brothers Li Eul-kyu and Li Jung-kyu, Jung worked for the National Labor University in Shanghai and the Chung-Yung People's Training Center in collaboration with Chinese anarchists in 1927. Following the full-scale invasion of the Japanese army in China, Jung participated in a broad anti-Japanese front.

In 1931, at the French settlement in Shanghai, Jung organized the Hang-il gu-kuk yun-meng (Anti-Japanese National Salvation Association) with Chinese anti-imperialist anarchists to work for reconnaissance of military and police facilities, assassination of key enemy figures, purging of pro-Japanese elements, and the formation of an anti-Japanese propaganda network throughout China. He formed the Nam-wha han-in chung-nyun yun-meng (Korean Youth Federation in South China) in 1932 and established the South China Club under its control. He also organized the Huk-sek gong-po-dan (Black Terrorist Unit) to attack all Japanese elements. In 1937, when the Manchurian Incident escalated into the Sino-Japanese War and the Battle of Shanghai erupted, he organized the Han-kuk chung-nyun jun-si kong-jak-dai (Korean Youth Wartime Operational Unit) with Chinese army cooperation. After 1945 he created the Private School of Korean Studies and Commemorative School for Sin Chai Ho in Shanghai. Returning to Korea in 1950, he devoted himself to working with revolutionary political parties in South Korea, helping to found the social-democratic Minjusahoe-dang in 1955 and the Unification Socialist Party in 1961.

Kabyl resistance to government

Andrew J. Waskey

The Kabyl (Kabail) are Indo-European Berber-speaking people who have lived in North Africa since the Roman empire. The Berber people of Algeria are called Kabyle from the Arabic word for tribe, qaba'il (pl. qabila). Some are also called the Chaouis, and live mainly in the Aures Mountains.

The Kabyl live in the mountains of eastern Algeria, Tunisia, and oases of the Sahara, living in the Tell and Sahara Atlas Mountains, in a region named Greater Kabylia and Lesser Kabylia. Berbers have resisted the Arabs for centuries.

When the French took control of Algeria in the 1830s they were opposed by many local Kabyl. One important resistance fighter was the Lalla, Fadhma (Fatma) n'Soumer, an inspiring leader likened to Joan of Arc, but ultimately unable to stop French advances.

In 1871 Mohamed El-Mokrani (1815–71) led the Cheikh Mokrani Rebellion in resistance to French attempts to exercise authority over the previously independent tribes before he was killed. The Kabyl arose in a mass revolt but were suppressed. The tribes that resisted had their lands taken, while others were exiled to New Caledonia in the Pacific, where the French also sent Paris Commune organizers. Through a process of suppression, the French dominated the region, but repeatedly faced resentment and recurring protests.

The French attempted to gallicize the Kabyl through various means, including disseminating the idea that they were the original Christian population. They sought to substitute French law and judges for Shari'a and Muslim judges. However, the policy failed and instead encouraged greater support for Arabic culture and Islamic faith.

After the Algerian War for Independence the Kabyl found that the Arab majority dominated the new nationalist government. Many Kabyl mastered French and were members of the bureaucracy and business class. In the post-independence era, the government sought to "Algerianize" the population. It made Arabic the official language over Berber, and imposed the language on the Kabyl and all others.

In the late 1970s and 1980s, the failure of the Algerian state to reduce poverty for the majority of the population contributed to greater religious observance of Islam and an emergent fundamentalist political movement. In the civil war that followed, the Kabyl resisted efforts to use Arabic as a means to impose Islamic strictures. In the academic year of 1979–80, Arabic-speaking students protested the benefits that French studies gave to other students, and the government responded by making Arabic the official language of education. Kabyl students sought to resist this effort to make Arabic the official language, waging a strike at the University Center of Tizi Ouzou and demanding recognition for Berber speakers on the campus and beyond. The movement quickly spread to other schools. The uprising that ensued became known as the Berber Spring.

In 1994 Kabyl students in Algeria again boycotted the public schools, demanding the teaching and use of Berber as an official language. The protest resulted in the creation of the Haut Commissariat à l'Amazighte in 1995, and Berber was taught as a non-compulsory language in the Kabyl areas.

In 2001 the Kabyl organized the Arouch Movement (Berber Citizens' Movement) to represent Algerian Berbers. Arouch is the plural of Arch, which is the traditional Kabyl form of democratic village assembly. Following a mass rebellion during the Black Spring protests of April 2001, in which 126 Kabyl protesters were killed, the Arouch adopted the El Kseur Platform, calling for recognition of the Berber language, increased democratic rights, and greater social benefits.

Another form of Kabyl resistance was the formation of the Movement for the Autonomy of Kabylia (MAK). Ferhat Mehenni, a university graduate and singer, emerged as a leader of the Black Spring protests. His political music promotes Kabyl autonomy.

Kashmir, popular struggles to 1947

Kunal Chattopadhyay

Kashmiri Nationalism

Conquered by the Mughal emperor Akbar in 1586, Kashmir has experienced religious diversity which has been a source of division ever since, although the people retain a strong sense of unity known as Kashmiriyat (Kashmiri national identity). From the Mughals Kashmir passed to the Afghan empire of Ahmad Shah Abdali, and then to the Sikh empire of Maharaja Ranjit Singh. Ranjit gave Jammu as a jaigir (land allotment against military service) to Dogra Rajput chieftain Gulab Singh. After Ranjit's death, Gulab Singh helped Britain to conquer the empire. As a reward, in the Treaty of Amritsar of 1846, Kashmir was given to Gulab in return for 75 lakh rupees, a token tribute of a dozen pashmina goats, one horse, and three pairs of Kashmiri shawls. Kashmiri nationalists subsequently have called Amritsar a bill of sale, not a treaty.

While Jammu-Kashmir was formally independent of British India, in fact, as with the territory of other Indian princes, a British resident was the real power, and the Maharaja had no military or diplomatic autonomy. As bourgeois nationalist sentiment began to advance, the princely rulers sought to contain autonomous fervor. But the Indian National Congress, formally restricted to British India, did not want to intervene in the internal affairs of the princely states, up until the period preceding the transfer of power. The princes of Jammu-Kashmir were semi-feudal autocrats under British protection, and alone claimed to speak for their states when at least 13 percent franchise was used to elect the Constituent Assembly of India. On the other hand, they were under great pressure to join India or Pakistan. The ruler of Jammu-Kashmir, a Hindu, was put in a complicated position, since the majority of his subjects were Muslims, and first sought democracy and independence before deciding on the future status of the country.

Hindu-Dogra rule in Kashmir privileged religion above all identities, a highly exploitative system marked by community-linked sectarianism. Most Muslims, Buddhists, and non-Rajput Hindus, Kashmiri Hindus or Pandits were denied participation in the government. Even Sir Albion Bannerjee, a British loyalist, wrote an article in 1929 after resigning as political advisor to the Maharaja, condemning the ill treatment of Muslims like “dumb cattle.” His position was supported by Sheikh Muhammad Abdullah, a young teacher from the capital city of Srinagar. As nationalism was gathering momentum in British India, the Kashmiri people, frustrated by decades of Dogra oppression, pursued a democratic-nationalist path. The nationalists condemned Dogra Rajputs as non-Kashmiris ruling illegally under British protection. Abdullah took the initiative, organizing numerous meetings to advance nationalist consciousness. The Maharaja was forced to meet a delegation of Muslim representatives. But in June 1931, Qadir, an outspoken critic of the Maharaja, was arrested for supposed seditious speech. On July 13, 1931, an immense crowd assembled at the Srinagar Central Jail, protesting against Qadir's trial and seeking to gain entry to the jail. To prevent protesters from advancing, a large police squadron fired on them, killing 22 people, on a day that is observed in Kashmir as Martyrs' Day.

The July 13 murders failed to slow a growing sense of secular Kashmiri nationalism demanding working-class rights and Muslim equality. Kashmiri nationalism was more radical than India's, spurring peasant struggles against jaigirdars and moneylenders in Mirpur, Kotli, and Rajouri in Jammu. By September 1931, the British armed forces stepped in to suppress the uprising. But the massive protest wave compelled the Maharaja to establish a Grievances Enquiry Commission in November 1931.

Struggle for a Constitution

In April 1932, the Commission recommended removal of the most egregious forms of exploitation, including abolition of unpaid labor by Kashmiri Muslims for the state. But these palliatives did not reduce popular agitation. In October 1932, Abdullah and his supporters formed the Muslim Conference (MC), at which time Abdullah said that the struggle in Kashmir was not to advance one community over another, but to advance the interests of common people, regardless of religion. The MC demanded representative government, ending discrimination against Muslims in education and employment.

In 1934, Maharaja Hari Singh proposed establishing the Praja Sabha (House of the Subjects), with limited powers, and 30 percent of all members popularly elected. The MC denounced the assembly as a sham, but nonetheless contested the elections. Within the Muslim community a conflict emerged between orthodox Muslims forming the Azad Muslim Conference, a conservative organization under Mirwaiz Yusuf Shah, and moderates under Abdullah. The Jammu-Kashmir Muslim Conference defeated its opponents in elections, affirming the popularity of secular nationalist politics and opposition to the communalist politics of the Azad Muslim Conference and the Hindu communal supporters of the Maharaja.

In 1938, MC leaders held discussions with the poet Iqbal and Jawaharlal Nehru, the future Indian prime minister. The discussions culminated in the Muslim Conference changing its name to the Jammu and Kashmir National Conference (NC) as a conscious attempt to combat both communalisms. On the NC agenda were land reforms, sociocultural equality, and democracy. While the NC retained close links with Indian nationalists, it remained quite independent. Some Hindu activists, including Prem Nath Bajaj, joined the NC, while conservative Muslims opposed participation. In 1941, Chaudhuri Ghulam Abbas left the NC to join Mirwaiz Yusuf Shah to revive the Muslim Conference, which kept ties with the Muslim League led by Jinnah, and campaigned primarily on communal lines.

In 1944, the NC submitted a Charter of Demands to the Maharaja, publishing a manifesto known as the Naya Kashmir (New Kashmir), which sought a constitution, with equal rights for all citizens regardless of religion and caste, equality for women and men, freedom of conscience, religion, and press, and freedom to hold assemblies and public meetings, and to form political parties, youth organizations, and trade unions. The NC also proposed that the right to work be recognized constitutionally, with unemployment benefits if the state failed to provide everyone with jobs. The right to education was also recognized as a constitutional right. The manifesto also called for a constitutional provision providing political asylum to foreign freedom fighters. The manifesto promised an egalitarian society, abolition of landlordism, land redistribution to peasants, food sufficiency, and the advancement of the status of women and workers.

Quit Kashmir

In 1945, a new wave of struggles emerged, and the Maharaja responded by appointing Ramachandra Kak as new prime minister. In 1946, the NC launched the Quit Kashmir movement against the Maharaja as it wanted the people of Kashmir, rather than the autocratic Maharaja, to have the power to determine Kashmir's future. At the same time, the similarity with the Quit India movement indicates the greater proximity between the NC and Congress. When the Cabinet Mission came to discuss transfer of power in India, Abdullah sent a telegram to its leader, Sir Stafford Cripps, saying that the people of Kashmir wanted complete independence from the Maharaja. In order to suppress the Quit Kashmir movement, the prime minister declared martial law. State violence led to many deaths. On May 20, 1946, Abdullah was arrested and the Indian leadership intervened. An All-India States People's Conference was created with representation of all the princely states.

In 1946, Jawaharlal Nehru was president of the conference and Abdullah vice-president. After Abdullah's arrest, Nehru rushed to Kashmir. When he was prevented entry, Gandhi and other leaders explained to the Maharaja that Nehru's trip was not ill-intentioned. Nehru ensured that protests took a "peaceful" and "constitutional" shape. Under pressure, Sheikh Abdullah signed a statement dropping the demand to end the Dogra monarchy.

The Muslim League, campaigning for a separate Muslim state in Pakistan, sympathized with the princes, and Jinnah described the Quit Kashmir movement as a movement of hooligans. As agitations ended, a relieved Maharaja Hari Singh called new elections to the Praja Sabha, boycotted by the NC, and the Muslim Conference gained the majority. Meanwhile, as Britain transferred power in South Asia through partition according to communal majorities, the situation in India was changing. But the Maharaja did not join the Constituent Assembly, receiving support from Hindu and Muslim communalists. The Muslim League declared the princes sovereign powers, not obliged to join the Constituent Assembly.

The Hindu fundamentalists in Jammu-Kashmir declared that the state should under no circumstances join "secular" India. The Muslim Conference demanded that the Maharaja declare Kashmir independent, create a separate Constituent Assembly, and a separate state constitution.

The Maharaja, Muslim communalists, and Hindu communalists were united in opposition to Jammu-Kashmir unification with India. Of course, the Maharaja and Hindu communalist supporters sought to retain autocratic rule and thwart Kashmiri nationalism, while the Muslim Conference hoped a weak government in Jammu-Kashmir could be pushed into Pakistan. To bring the princely states under Indian control, Sardar Patel, the home affairs minister and Congress leader in charge of the process, demanded that the princely states accept Indian Union control over defense, foreign affairs, and communications.

On June 15, the All-India Congress Committee adopted a resolution opposing the declaration of independence by any princely state. But Maharaja Hari Singh refused to relent. Jinnah's personal secretary, Khurshid Ahmed, went to Kashmir and told Hari Singh toward the end of July 1947 that Pakistan would not intercede in his rule. The only organization fighting for democracy and independence was the Jammu-Kashmir NC, most of whose leaders remained in jail.

Kashmir, under India

Kunal Chattopadhyay

India Incorporating Kashmir

The princely state of Jammu and Kashmir had been ruled by Dogra rulers under indirect British control since the mid-nineteenth century. As British rule ended and India gained independence with partition, both India and Pakistan wanted to incorporate the princely states. Maharaja Hari Singh hoped to keep Kashmir independent, offering a "standstill agreement" for trade, communications, and other normal affairs between Kashmir, India, and Pakistan, as in the British era. Pakistan immediately signed the agreement on August 15, but India pressed for Kashmir's incorporation into India. The Maharaja had a powerful national movement and there had been demands for autonomy in Gilgit, Baltistan, Hunza, and Nagar regions, autonomous vassals of Jammu and Kashmir (Jammu-Kashmir), since the mid-nineteenth century.

In June 1947, Poonch disputes assumed a militant and separatist character. The Maharaja's armed forces responded with tremendous brutality. Within two weeks of Britain's transfer of power to India and Pakistan, the Muslims of Poonch were victims of state terror. In Jammu, Hindu and Sikh communalists, supported by the fascist Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (National Volunteer Organization, RSS) and the Sikh Akali Dal (Akali Party), attacked Muslim villages and set them on fire, displacing some 500,000 residents. By September, there was an armed uprising in Poonch, led by Muhammad Ibrahim Khan of the Pakistani-backed Jammu and Kashmir Muslim Conference. Pakistan sent a delegate, A. B. Shah, to Kashmir's capital, Srinagar, proposing incorporation of the country.

Sheikh Abdullah, leader of the secular progressive Kashmiri National Conference (NC), was released on September 29 after months in jail. He declared that Kashmir must first receive independence and responsible government before a decision was made on its future status. Abdullah's party was committed to equal rights for Muslims, abolishing landlordism, and establishing a sovereign state, like Switzerland in Europe. Hari Singh realized that remaining independent and autocratic would be difficult. Despite his antipathy to India, he saw joining Pakistan as worse, risking the loss of his privileges as a Hindu ruler over a Muslim majority. This consideration prompted the appointment of Meher Chand Mahajan, an associate of Indian home minister Sardar Patel, as prime minister.

On October 24, 1947, a large contingent of militant tribals of the Northwest Frontier province of Pakistan invaded Jammu-Kashmir, supported by "volunteers" from the Pakistan army under the command of Major General Akbar Khan, with support from local Muslims. In Baramulla district of Kashmir, the army carried out massive looting and destruction. Faced with this invasion, Hari Singh sent deputy prime minister R. L. Batra to New Delhi. On the same day, rebels in Poonch proclaimed an Azad (Free) Kashmir. Facing imminent danger in the Kashmir Valley, Hari Singh and his administration left for the safer Jammu area, and the NC assumed the tasks of administration and resistance. On October 26, India made the signing of an "Instrument of Accession" the precondition for military assistance, and the Maharaja capitulated. The document stipulated that any Jammu-Kashmir government agreed to accept India's authority on defense, foreign affairs, and communications.

The government of India proclaimed that after restoration of law and order in Jammu-Kashmir, the will of the people would be ascertained, and only then would incorporation into India be finalized. On October 27, Indian soldiers arrived in Kashmir as NC volunteers organized resistance to protect property, especially that of non-Muslims. On November 2, 1947, Jawaharlal Nehru, prime minister of India, promised again, in a radio speech, that "As soon as law and order had been restored in Kashmir and its soil cleared of the invader, the question of the state's accession should be settled by a reference to the people" (Guha Roy 1999: 34).

A Referendum Promised and Denied

On January 1, 1948, India referred the Kashmir issue to the United Nations Security Council (UNSC), which called for a plebiscite on its future. While Pakistan and India accepted the referendum in theory, both objected practically over timing and process. On January 12, 1949, Nehru wrote to Abdullah that there was a high probability that no referendum would ever be held. In 1954, the Cold War became a new factor in the dispute. With the US assisting Pakistan militarily, India decided to station at east 21,000 troops in Kashmir and hold off a referendum vote. From 1957 on, the Soviet Union, allied with India, agreed to use its UNSC veto to block attempts to revive a referendum on Kashmir's future. Finally, Indian UN representative Muhammad Karim Chagla stated that "under no circumstances can we agree to the holding of a plebiscite in Kashmir" (Guha Roy 1999: 38).

By war's end, Pakistan occupied the Mirpur, contiguous with Jammu, the Muzaffarabad near the Kashmir Valley, and Gilgit in the far north. India occupied Jammu, the Kashmir Valley, and Ladakh. While India, Pakistan, and on occasion the son of the former Maharaja evoked the people of Kashmir, all parties sought political and economic control. Hari Singh desired an independent Kashmir dominated by landlords. When he thought that Pakistan-backed aggression might end the idea of Kashmiri independence, he appealed to India, not Kashmiris. The Indian rulers were determined to fully incorporate Jammu-Kashmir, creating the fiction that integration was the popular democratic will. Initially, India and Pakistan assumed Abdullah and the NC to be pawns of India. While Nehru sidestepped the claim, he was confident that Abdullah would "deliver the goods." In time, the Indian rulers recognized that Abdullah's notion of Kashmiriyat (Kashmir's national identity) was not mere rhetoric.

Nehru wanted Abdullah to share power with the Maharaja rather than establish representative government. Abdullah, the most popular politician in Jammu-Kashmir, did not advance the popular will of Kashmir's future. Upon becoming prime minister in March 1948, Abdullah initiated radical reforms, including the abolition of jaigirdari and chakdari rights (pre-capitalist landlordism) without compensation and fixing a land ceiling. In all, nearly 400,000 acres of land belonging to merely 9,000 owners were confiscated. Next, the government cancelled the debt of all peasants who had paid principal and interest 1.5 times the original loan. Access to government jobs, deprived to Kashmiri Muslims for years, was subsequently opened.

The former dominant Hindu elite sought to foment Hindu communalism, backed by Hari Singh, Queen Tara Devi, and former prime minister, Meher Chand Mahajan. In the Kashmir Valley, Hindu lives and property were protected by the NC. But in Jammu, Hindu communal violence took the lives of Muslims. Under pressure, Hari Singh abdicated in May 1949 in favor of his son, Karan Singh. The Constituent Assembly of India in October 1949 adopted Article 306(A) granting autonomy to Jammu-Kashmir with an interim arrangement until the people could decide on the final status of the region. Abdullah called for a Constituent Assembly for Jammu-Kashmir, with 25 seats in Pakistani-occupied districts and 75 seats under Indian control. But India's rulers negated nominations other than those from the NC, establishing virtual one-party rule.

Right-wing opposition to Abdullah came from the Jammu Praja Parishad (Subjects' Association), a Hindu communalist organization led by RSS activist Balraj Madhok. The Praja Parishad, supported by former bureaucrats and landlords, opposed Abdullah's reforms, protested against "special status" for Jammu-Kashmir, and from 1949 to 1951 promoted the mass murder of Muslims in Hindu-majority Jammu.

The Indian state also sought to limit Abdullah's radicalism by compelling him to accept Karan Singh as the titular head of state, or Sadr-i-Riyasat. Karan Singh overstepped his constitutional powers by referring land reforms to the president of India, violating the provisions of the Union government restricting India's responsibility to defense, foreign affairs, and communications. Under Indian pressure, the land reforms were drastically watered down.

Destroying Autonomy

According to the Indian Independence Act, 1947, Clause 7(1) subsection (b), the paramountcy of the British crown over the Indian princely states ended as of August 15, 1947. Consequently, incorporation of the princely states into either India or Pakistan depended on new treaties, an Instrument of Accession for India. Since Jammu-Kashmir had elected an independent Constituent Assembly, popular sovereignty remained unimpaired except in defense, communications, and external affairs. Justifying the entry of Kashmir's representatives into the Constituent Assembly of India, Sir Girja Shankar Bajpai, secretary general of the external affairs ministry, told the UN that the Jammu-Kashmir people had the right to decide on the constitution of India, but not to "alter the Government of India's determination to abide, in the matter of accession, by the freely declared will of the people of Jammu and Kashmir" (Noorani 1993: 212).

Delhi sought to subvert the independent constitution-making process of Jammu-Kashmir. On October 17, 1949, after discussing a draft with Kashmir delegates, Sir N. Gopalaswamy Ayyanger, backed by Patel, introduced a different draft of what became Article 370 of the Indian Constitution. The text allowed Indian rulers the right to dismiss the government, a means that could later be used to depose Abdullah.

Abolition of the elected government was not permitted in Kashmir and the Indian parliament could only make laws about Kashmir relating to the three items covered by the Instrument of Accession. On other matters, the agreement of the Kashmir government was essential. Even modifications were subject to final agreement by the Jammu-Kashmir Constituent Assembly. Once the assembly concluded, no modifications or impositions by Indian law on Kashmir were permitted. But although the Constituent Assembly of Jammu-Kashmir was disbanded after 1956, Article 370 was repeatedly and illegally amended, removing all pretense of an autonomous Kashmir. In 1963, Nehru told the Indian parliament that Article 370 was eroded.

Though India ensured Abdullah's party won all 75 seats in the Constituent Assembly, Abdullah was not willing to trade away the independence of Kashmir. Thereupon, Karan Singh, with the support of Nehru, sacked and arrested Abdullah, who was replaced as prime minister by Bakshi Ghulam Mohammed, a member of his party. Bakshi conspired with Karan Singh and D. P. Dhar, a high-caste Hindu, to arrest opponents in the party and force through a resolution in the Jammu-Kashmir Constituent Assembly declaring Kashmir an integral part of India.

Kashmiri Democracy

Under Indian rule, Kashmiri democracy has been repeatedly suppressed. First, the government of Abdullah, while popular, was not democratically elected. After Abdullah's arrest, governments in Jammu-Kashmir were maintained through vote rigging. In 1957, Bakshi's party won in most seats, 43 uncontested, and in 1962 won 70 seats, with five "given" to selected opposition forces. All forms of legitimate opposition, whether from the right-wing Praja Parishad or the left-wing People's Socialist Party, were denounced as anti-nationalist. After 1957, Abdullah and his supporters founded a party – the Plebiscite Front – to campaign for India to grant a vote on self-determination. In opposition, Abdullah spent years in prison or exile.

On November 17, 1956, the constitution of Jammu-Kashmir was adopted, declaring the state as integral to India. Ignoring many Kashmiri protests, India claimed incorporation to be the popular will, with no further referendum necessary. In 1958, a constitutional amendment brought Jammu-Kashmir under central Indian administration.

From 1964, Jammu-Kashmir was administered by a governor appointed by the central government, which applied Article 356 of the Indian Constitution permitting India to dissolve elected assemblies or remove provincial governments. The Sadiq faction of the NC became the provincial branch of the Indian National Congress, which in 1967 won elections through annulling nomination petitions. In 1977, after the end of a countrywide dictatorship, democratic elections were held and the NC, led by Abdullah, won 47 of the 75 seats. But he no longer demanded a plebiscite or restoration of Article 370 to its original form. In 1982 Abdullah died, and his son, Farooq Abdullah, became the next chief minister, leading the NC to another victory in 1983. Farooq then aligned with non-Congress parties, whose demands for decentralization appealed to the NC. Jagmohan, a right-wing candidate, was made governor of the province; soon after he toppled Farooq's government and ended the recognition of the NC as a nationalist organization. Farooq subsequently adapted his politics to the policies of the Indian central government.

In the mid-1980s, a breakaway faction of the NC under Sheikh Abdullah's son-in-law, Gul Mohammed Shah, joined with Congress as popular protests grew. A curfew was imposed across the Kashmir Valley for 72 of the first 90 days of Gul's chief ministership. His policy consisted of promoting Hindu and Muslim communalism in Jammu-Kashmir Valley in opposition to secular and democratic forces. In February 1986, attacks were launched on the Hindu minority in Anantnag district. Afterwards, Kashmiri Muslims donated money to help rebuild Hindu temples. Mufti Muhammad Sayyid, a Congress leader from the Bijbehara constituency of Anantnag, was blamed by some observers for sparking the violence.

Article 356 of the Indian Constitution was promulgated in response to the communal violence, the government was dismissed, and Jagmohan ruled as Delhi's satrap through the end of the year. Afterwards the recruitment of Muslims was reduced, and although the valley had a large Muslim majority, on Hindu festival days the sale of meat was completely forbidden. The policy was aimed at splitting Kashmiri national identity along Hindu and Muslim lines.

Towards Insurrection

The Congress-NC alliance of 1987 was seen as a great betrayal, spurring the formation of an alternative alliance named the Muslim United Front (MUF) by educated youth, workers and peasants, and opponents of administrative corruption, family politics, and economic decay. Concurrently, the party provided a political voice to Jamaat-e-Islami and other communal Muslim forces. On March 23, 1987, elections for the state assembly were at last held. The Congress-NC defeated the MUF through booth capturing and driving out opposition candidates and supporters during vote counting.

After the 1987 election, Farooq Abdullah, emboldened by Delhi's support, publicly rebuked all oppositionists, swelling the ranks of MUF supporters and militant groups who crossed into Pakistan for arms and training. The leading militant organizations were divided among those advocating Kashmiri independence and those supporting accession to Pakistan. In the late 1980s, militants began assassinating NC leaders and engaging in other acts of violence. Yasin Malik, an oppositionist arrested in 1987, subsequently became chairman of the Jammu and Kashmir Liberation Front (JKLF). He and others like him, notably Asfaq Wani (who died from injuries suffered through police torture), Abdul Hamid Sheikh, Aijaz Ahmed Dar, and Javed Ahmed Mir, revived the JKLF as a militant organization.

Jammu and Kashmir Liberation Front

The JKLF was founded in 1964 by Maqbool Butt, a former member of the Plebiscite Front. In 1966, Butt was accused of killing a security guard in Indian Kashmir. In 1971 his associates, Hashim Qureshi and Ashraf Qureshi, hijacked and commandeered the Ganga, an Indian Airlines airplane to Pakistan. Initially hailed by the Pakistan regime, they were soon charged as Indian agents. India used the incident as the basis to ban overflights from West Pakistan to East Pakistan, frustrating Pakistan's effort to curb the Bangladesh freedom struggle. Hashim Qureshi provided documentation to refute the Pakistani claim that they were Indian agents. Thus, the demand for an independent secular, pluralistic, and united Jammu-Kashmir was met with determined hostility in Pakistan and India.

In 1976, after entering Indian territory, Maqbool Butt was arrested, tried, and condemned to death for the 1966 murder. Hashim Qureshi and others opposed Amanullah Khan's support for a terrorist strategy over a political solution. The politics of the Amanullah Khan group was revealed by group members' contention that those opposed to a military strategy were "traitors" and "communists." In 1986, Amanullah was ordered out of the UK, leading to the collapse of the JKLF's UK-based group. Thus the action of Yasin Malik and associates provided a new nationalist leadership to the next generation of Kashmiris.

Rising Indian Violence

In mid-1988, the situation worsened. On June 10, police fired on a demonstration in Srinagar, killing many peaceful protesters. The state government held no inquiry, viewing the demonstration as the work of anti-national elements. On June 15, a bandh (a general strike involving the total shutdown of public life) was observed. In July 1988, the JKLF carried out a bomb blast in Srinagar, marking the beginning of armed insurrection in the valley. On August 15, 1988, the valley observed a bandh on the occasion of India's Independence Day, and black flags were hoisted in place of the Indian tricolor. On February 11, 1989, the JKLF observed the anniversary of Maqbool Butt's hanging with mass protests. On April 5, the aged father of a militant leader, Sabbir Shah, was tortured to death in police custody, giving rise to a spontaneous popular protest. Two distinct currents emerged in the uprising of 1988–9: mass popular opposition to Indian repressive measures and a faction supporting terrorism. Leaders of the Indian state willfully ignored the distinction and sought to communalize the conflict between Hindus and Muslims. On September 15, 1989, a Hindu, a Pandit (Kashmiri Hindu), and the Bharatiya Janata Party (Indian People's Party, BJP) leader were killed by two armed militants. On November 4, former judge Nilkant Ganjoo, who was responsible for sentencing Maqbool Butt to death, was killed. But the government of India spread fear among Hindus that all of them in Kashmir were targets, causing many to leave the valley. Amid the rancor, parliamentary elections were held in November 1989. The JKLF called for an election boycott, and in Baramulla and Srinagar fewer than 5 percent of voters turned out. The NC won hollow victories with a low turnout. At the all-India level, a National Front government took power under Viswanath Pratap Singh, with support on the left by the Communist Party of India (Marxist) (CPI-M) and the Communist Party of India (CPI), and on the right by the BJP.

On December 8, Dr. Rubiya Syed, the daughter of the new central minister Mufti Muhammad Syed, was abducted by militants of the valley, who demanded and obtained the release of five leading JKLF members on December 13. Dr. Syed was immediately released, but the peaceful resolution of the hostage crisis hardened the government's resolve not to negotiate a solution.

On January 19, 1990, Jagmohan was reappointed governor of Kashmir, despite his notorious anti-Kashmiri sentiments. On January 21, police fired on 20,000 protesters, killing at least 60 people, and the next day, police fired on another demonstration, killing over 100 unarmed civilians. On March 1, during demonstrations by some 500,000 protesters in Srinagar, police again opened fire on demonstrators in at least three areas of the city.

When Muslim leaders tried to join hands with Hindus to combat the threat of communalism, Hindu leader Jatto was hustled off to the airport and put on an outward-bound flight by police. Protesting against Jagmohan's appointment, Farooq Abdullah resigned. With no opposition, Jagmohan became the unchallenged ruler of the valley until May 24, permitting state-organized mass killings as a legitimate form of government action. In protest, a Muslim fundamentalist women's organization, Dukhtarane-Millat (Daughters of the Nation), staged a demonstration on March 14. Central Reserve Police Force personnel attacked them with batons and followed them into a mosque, causing mayhem and raping women there. On March 7, 1990, the Central Reserve Police was accused of entering houses in the Chhanpura area and raping women. Even while Jagmohan was carrying out his suppression, Harkishen Singh Surjeet, the general secretary of the largest left party in India, the CPI-M, wrote in an article: "It is not the time to go into the causes of the collapse of the administration and how far the Central and State Government have been responsible for this. But immediate measures have to be taken . . . to firmly handle the separatists and extremists" (Guha Roy 1999: 89).

Aside from this public statement by the CPI-M, no other Indian party rose in protest. Eventually, on May 24, the government of India was forced to remove Jagmohan. But by then public opinion had turned firmly against India, with an estimated 95 percent of the population opposing the central government. To counter the opposition, India launched a furious propaganda campaign, claiming that Kashmiri Muslims were carrying out repression over Hindus. When the Babri Masjid was destroyed on December 6, 1992, Lal Krishna Advani, the BJP leader, claimed that over 40 Hindu temples had been destroyed in Kashmir without reproach, even though 21 of the 23 temples in the state were found intact. The BJP whipped up animosity, claiming that over 350,000 Pandits were forced to leave Kashmir; Evans (2002) estimates the actual figure of departures through 2001 were approximately 150,000.

However, the BJP and its supporters ignored that many Pandits continued to reside in rural Kashmir, and the number of Pandits killed was in the dozens, not thousands. Even if the scale was grossly exaggerated, there is no doubt that some Pandits were oppressed by the rise of Muslim communalist factions. According to Hashim Qureshi, murders and rape of Kashmiri Pandit women and other violence through much of 1990 were significant factors in the mass departure of Pandits.

The target of Indian attack, however, was secular nationalists. As the movement intensified, a number of organizations other than the JKLF sprang up. They included the Hizbul Mujahadeen (Party of Freedom Fighters), Allah Tigers (Tigers of Allah), Al-Jihad, and other related organizations. A wider umbrella organization emerged, called the Hurriyat Conference, which agreed on the necessity to end Indian rule. But disagreements raged over independence, incorporation with Pakistan, or a secular or Islamic state. Both Amanullah Khan and Yasin Malik, on two sides of the border, stated that JKLF supported a secular and independent Kashmir. As a result, the Pakistan government turned against the JKLF, on one occasion killing 12 adherents by firing on a demonstration. India wanted to push militants in Kashmir towards a pro-Pakistan, pro-communist position to consolidate public opposition in India against them. But even pro-Pakistan fundamentalists have often admitted that in a free and fair plebiscite, the majority of the valley would likely vote for independence.

The Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and the subsequent support given to Pakistan and Islamic fundamentalists by the US resulted in the growth of Muslim fundamentalist forces in Pakistan. As a result, in the early years of the twenty-first century, the communalization of the Kashmir conflict intensified. India retaliated by arming and training local auxiliary forces of militants who surrendered or were captured to assist in counterinsurgency operations, outside the command structure of the Indian security forces. These groups participate in joint patrols, carry out the orders of security officers, and operate openly. For the Kashmiri people, the counterinsurgency prolonged the suffering for nearly two decades.

Kashmiri opponents of Indian rule can be distinguished clearly between Islamic fundamentalists, who are often non-Kashmiri and have been patronized by the Pakistan government, and Kashmiri nationalists fighting for self-determination. Indian repression is targeted against ordinary Kashmiris, especially youth, even though for international consumption and diplomatic purposes India contends it is opposing Islamic fundamentalists.

Katarismo and indigenous popular mobilization, Bolivia, 1970s–present

Silvia Rivera Cusicanqui

In 1974, almost 200 years had passed since the great Andean insurgency of 1780–1. The Agrarian Reform Law of 1953 had been in force more than two decades, and the peasantry seemed to have been tamed and satisfied with the distribution of land in the Andean high plateau (Altiplano) and valleys, while a new oligarchy was formed through the concentration of land in the eastern lowlands of Bolivia. In January that year, during the dictatorship of Hugo Banzer Suárez (1971–8), Qhichwa peasants in the Tolata and Epizana communities blockaded roads in protest at a series of measures that benefited the industrial products of the landed oligarchy of the lowlands (sugar, rice, oil, and others) and froze the prices of the traditional peasant crops. More than 80 peasants were brutally killed and disappeared in the ensuing confrontations, and a wave of rage and dissatisfaction erupted in the whole western Andean region of the country.

The massacred peasants belonged to a region where there had been active markets and a multi-ethnic society since the end of colonial times. Private property, a market economy, and a mestizo and citizen identity were the solid bases upon which a new form of peasant organization took shape: the peasant union or sindicato. Unions had been promoted by the state since 1936, during the “socialist military” regimes in the aftermath of the Chaco War (1932–5), fought against Paraguay. By 1952, sindicatos had become the universal model of organization for rural producers, regardless of their ethnicity and ancestral organizational and productive practices.

In the Aymara Altiplano, the removal of traditional ethnic authorities by newly elected union leaders, usually young and single, was an open challenge to Aymara custom and was confronted with a mixture of adaptation and resistance. In some regions the union was organized, but it was based in the previous cargos and functions, and it kept the rotational shifts of authority, which allowed each and every ayllu (or territorial community) to serve as authority for one term, in a rotational fashion. In other regions, especially in areas where the haciendas (estates) were not dominant, the unions were resisted and were forcefully imposed. The general atmosphere of cultural modernization and rejection of the past pushed many of these Andean forms of authority and organization underground, but the ritual and moral grounds of authority remained an important feature of Aymara leadership and communal organization.

In the late 1960s the Altiplano witnessed the emergence of a second generation of leaders aware of the unfulfilled promises of the Revolutionary National Movement (MNR) and the 1953 Land Reform. Racism and discrimination were rampant in the towns and cities, even among the leaders of the MNR that had massively recruited them in the past decade. Altiplano peasant lands were overcrowded and subdivided into negligible under-subsistence plots, and their access to the market put them in a disadvantageous position with regard to the industrial agricultural products of the eastern lowlands. It was precisely these uneven terms of exchange between traditional and industrial agricultural products that prompted the protest movement of Tolata and Epizana in 1974. For Aymara peoples, government dispositions were also taken as a clear discriminatory policy toward them as Indians, and not only as peasants and agricultural producers.

The Aymara leaders of the National Peasant Workers' Confederation of Bolivia, both at the national and at the state level, had links with Aymara migrants in the cities of La Paz and Oruro, as the first generation of Aymara migrants entered the university and formed part of the multifaceted student movement. These migrants formed cultural urban centers such as Centro Mink'a, Movimiento Universitario Julián Apaza, as well as political organizations such as the Túpac Katari Revolutionary Movement (MRTK) and the Túpac Katari Indian Movement (MITKA). These organizations were active during the first years of the Banzer dictatorship, but their cultural identity made them less visible than the leftist parties and organizations which were suffering repression and being forced underground.

The katarista-indianista movement was then a rural–urban network of intellectuals, peasant leaders, and grassroots that allowed for the circulation of more general ideologies and theories, which linked present-day grievances and claims with the structures of external and internal colonialism. The writings of Fausto Reinaga, a Q'ichwa writer and ideologue of the Indian Party of the 1960s, were discussed in rural gatherings and union meetings, and the theories of anti-colonialism were linked to the lived experience of mestizo racism and forced acculturation by the school system and military service. The new ideology took shape in the form of a manifesto, issued in July 1973: the Manifiesto de Tiwanaku, a document signed by various centers: the Puma Aymara Defense Union, the Mink'a Center of Peasant Coordination and Promotion, the Túpac Katari Peasant Center, the Bolivian Association of Peasant Students, and the National Association of Peasant Teachers. The rural–urban links were crucial to the movement, and it was the massive numbers of the rural population that gave the greatest political impulse to the underground organizing activities of these centers and informal organizations.

The peasant union was therefore the main battleground of the kataristas in the period from the 1973 manifesto and the last days of the Banzer dictatorship. Forced by a massive hunger strike started by four wives of exiled miner leaders, by the beginning of 1978 the dictator was forced to decree an amnesty, call for elections, and resign. Before the 1978 elections, the unions led by the kataristas and their allies in other regions held a massive congress in La Paz, where they added to the name of their organization – the Confederation of Peasant Workers of Bolivia (CNTCB) – the name of Túpac Katari.

The congress gathered in La Paz was the first to recognize an explicit Indian leadership as the head of a peasant organization. Genaro Flores, an Aymara leader from the Aroma province in La Paz, was elected as the executive secretary of the newly renamed CNTCB-TK, challenging the puppet organization still controlled by the military. Under his leadership the Confederation played a crucial role in the mobilizations leading to the downfall of Banzer's dictatorship. In the context of new democratic elections and a climate of peace, in June 1979 the CNTCB-TK joined with other independent peasant unions, such as the Independent Block (Bloque Independiente), a small Marxist peasant organization, to create the CSUTCB (United Confederation of Peasant Workers of Bolivia). The congress also resolved to join the powerful Bolivian Workers' Confederation (COB) as a vehicle to participate more effectively in the brewing wider national-popular movement seeking a democratic resolution of the political crisis that followed the end of Banzer's dictatorship.

For at least five years the country sank into turmoil with three inconclusive elections marked by fraud and four coups and countercoups until October 1982, when finally the leftist coalition Popular Democratic Union (UDP) was recognized as the winner of the previous two elections and granted the government for a constitutional period (1982–5). During this period rural populations in the Andean valleys and Altiplano actively participated in the resistance against anti-popular economic measures. In response to the drastic late 1979 devaluation of the Bolivian peso, peasant road blockades virtually paralyzed the country, and after three weeks of food scarcity in the urban consumer markets, they forced the government to issue decrees favoring some of their demands.

The ideology of the katarista movement, turned into a first-rank political actor through the CNTCB-TK, was based on oral traditions about the eighteenth-century anti-colonial leader Túpac Katari, who it was believed would eventually return as “thousands of thousands.” The anti-colonialism of the Túpac Katari rebellion was also linked to the memories of freedom and a just moral order of Inca times. These ancestral ideas inspired the fierce criticism against the liberal and populist state that granted the Indians only a second-class citizenship. They challenged the authoritarian, monopolistic, and monocultural nature of the Bolivian state and proposed a new form of democracy, based on the recognition of cultural diversity and the right to autonomous self-government by the Indian communities and federations within the structure of the state.

The control of the kataristas over the CSUTCB remained unchallenged until 1988, when a coalition of leftist parties overthrew Genaro Flores and undermined the independence and autonomous ideology of the peasant confederation. Many small political parties were formed by the katarista-indianista leadership and went on to participate in the 1985 and 1989 elections. Katarista organizations and other small Indian parties gained scant access to parliament, becoming little more than culturalist ornaments in an otherwise western, modern, and mestizo parliament dominated by traditional liberal and populist political parties.

The neoliberal policies weakened not only the peasant movement, but the urban workers' movement as well. The COB lost its main constituency, the Union Federation of Mining Workers of Bolivia (FSTMB), when, due to the structural adjustment Decree 21060, more than 50,000 miners lost their jobs. The waves of internal and international migration led these jobless workers, with a rich previous organizational and insurgent experience, to different destinies and occupations. While the peasant unions became largely inefficient in forcing the government to pay attention to their grievances, and the political parties that controlled them used their constituencies to gain electoral support, the Indian and katarista ideology was basically coopted by mestizo populist parties that used the symbols and identity issues of the kataristas to justify their paternalistic and contemptuous positions on ethnicity.

By the mid-1990s, a new configuration of power was taking shape. In the Chapare and tropical lowlands of Cochabamba, the coca growers' movement had been supplied with fresh organizational and ideological resources from the ex-miners turned “colonizers” in the coca-growing areas. In the Altiplano, the disastrous effects of the neoliberal adjustment policies and the open support by the state of a new class of agribusiness entrepreneurs in Santa Cruz had led the traditional agricultural economy of the western highlands into a deep state of crisis. By then, Felipe Quispe, one of the leaders of MITKA, had become a peasant union activist with a virulent ethnic discourse based on the ancestral rights of the Aymara people to their autonomous territories. After being involved in a short-lived guerilla adventure, Quispe returned to the union arena and became the executive secretary of the CSUTCB in 1998, thereby taking away this important organization from the hands of the political parties (left or center-left) that had controlled it for over a decade.

The election of Quispe – who adopted the name “Mallku,” a traditional communal authority – was a result of various union currents and tendencies that opposed the control of the peasant movement by the political parties of the left or right. The coca growers' movement was already active and had won four parliamentary seats in the 1997 elections, headed by Evo Morales, then a coca grower in Chapare. On the other hand, the initial coalition of cocalero and valley peasant leaders was in disarray, and a new independent faction, led by Alejo Véliz from the Valle Alto, was fighting for power. Felipe Quispe became a sort of transitional candidate between these two leaders. On the other hand, the support of Quispe for the “sacred leaf” discourse of the cocaleros was convenient for Evo Morales, who as a minority parliamentary force was trying to enlist the support of a wider indigenous and peasant constituency.

Given the circumstances, the confrontation of Evo Morales and Felipe Quispe as leaders of two factions in the peasant movement spilled into the broader political arena. The former was a political leader and parliamentarian, with a strong base in a regional union movement (the Six Federations of the Tropic of Cochabamba), while the latter was the head of an increasingly powerful peasant union that had regained its autonomy and political profile basically as an Indian organization. By the 2002 elections, Quispe had also jumped into the electoral arena through the MIP (Pachakuti Indian Movement), which gained six electoral seats. Along with the 35 seats that Evo Morales's party had gained, these two forces gathered a considerable parliamentary oppositional force.

The peasant mobilizations of 2000–5 saw the eclipse of the Quispe leadership by the figure of Evo Morales, who was able to capitalize on the discontent against neoliberal policies by a wider segment of the population, beyond the exclusive notion of Indian, but also including some of its features. The water war of February–April 2000 had the direct participation of the six cocalero federations, and the road blockades of September–October that same year were a confluence of two parallel blockades, one in the Chapare and the other in the Altiplano, the latter led by Felipe Quispe.

The notion of sovereignty, expressed in the struggle for the right to plant coca, for the right to water, and for the Bolivian state's ownership of the country's gas and hydrocarbon resources, has a deep ideological link with the notions of Indian autonomy, self-government, and dignity. The coca symbol, an Indian symbol, is rooted in the practice and in the common sense of millions of Andeans, who identify with the proposal of Evo Morales disregarding their different Indian and mestizo identities and ethnic affiliations. The pluri-ethnicity of Evo Morales's proposal is also expressed in the coalition between "the poncho and the tie" (as Vice-President García Linera considers his alliance with Evo), although many Aymara intellectuals think that the mestizo–Creole advisors of President Morales are drowning the best of the Indian demands and proposals implied in his plan of government. This was the case, for example, with Felix Patzi, a prominent Aymara intellectual appointed secretary of education, replaced shortly after by a more conservative appointee due to the pressure of the Catholic Church over his proposals for a lay education and the recognition of Indian "spirituality" and religious practices.

But it is the struggle against the UN classification of the coca leaf as a narcotic drug that better conveys the importance of katarista and indianista ideology in contemporary Bolivia. An important argument against the criminalization of the coca leaf is its links with ancestral traditions of community well-being, natural health, and sacred wisdom. The potential universality of its health benefits is also an issue. The withdrawal of the coca leaf from the list of narcotic drugs under international guidelines established by the UN-sponsored International Narcotics Control Board could have a positive impact for the economic development and formation of community and micro and small enterprises based on the commercialization of this ancestral plant. Moreover, UNESCO, through the declaration of Oral Intangible Patrimony of Humanity to the Kallawayá healers' culture, has recognized the herbal medicinal wisdom of Indian peoples of Bolivia. Members of the Mollo culture, these itinerant healers travel through northwestern Bolivia and parts of Argentina, Chile, Ecuador, and Peru offering their naturopathic services and knowledge. At least 60 percent of Kallawayá pharmacopoeia includes coca leaves in one way or another.

On the other hand, there is an evident Indian input in the draft of a new constitution of Bolivia. The declaration of Bolivia as a multinational state, the recognition of indigenous autonomies, the legalization of indigenous systems of justice and many other features, shows traces of the katarista–indianista program of the 1970s, with the added issue of sovereignty over Bolivia's natural resources and opposition to the free trade agreements that threaten to kill indigenous ways of survival and knowledge of biodiversity.

Kaunda, Kenneth (b. 1924)

Immanuel Ness

Dr. Kenneth David Kaunda was a leading figure in the independence movement of Zambia (formerly the British colony of Northern Rhodesia), and from 1964 the country's first president. He remained in office into 1991, operating a single-party system headed by the nationalist United National Independence Party (UNIP). In 1991 he was defeated in open elections by the Movement for Multiparty Democracy (MMD).

The youngest of eight children, Kaunda was born in Lubwa, Northern Rhodesia on April 28, 1924. His father was a Malawian pastor who established the Lubwa Mission in Chinsali Province in the north for the Church of Scotland. In 1943 Kaunda completed his formal education, including two years of post-secondary training in Lusaka, and returned to Lubwa as a teacher, becoming headmaster at the Lubwa Mission. In 1945 he left Lubwa and joined the British army, but was relieved of duty. In 1948 Kaunda sought work in Northern Rhodesia's copper mining industry, and became a teacher and boarding director at a school for mineworkers in Mufulira, on the border of the Belgian Congo (now the Democratic Republic of the Congo). He became active in public life. He joined many groups in the region as a choirmaster at the Church of Central Africa and briefly served with the local Nchanga colonial government.

Kaunda was increasingly drawn into African nationalism, and in 1951 he became an official in the Northern Rhodesian Congress (NRC). This was the country's first real African nationalist party and had been founded in 1948 as the successor of the Federation of African (Welfare) Societies. This federation had been established in part to participate in the African Representative Council (ARC), formed in 1946 following the establishment of African Provincial Councils (APCs). The ARC and APCs provided a training ground in politics for educated Africans like Kaunda and NRC founder Harry Nkumbula. Kaunda ascended quickly through the NRC ranks, rising to the position of party general secretary within two years. Under Kaunda and Nkumbula, the party was closely linked to South Africa's African National Congress (ANC), which was led by figures such as Nelson Mandela and Oliver Tambo. A major stimulus for the rise of African nationalism in Northern Rhodesia at the time were proposals by whites to form a Central African Federation comprising Northern Rhodesia, Nyasaland (now Malawi), and Southern Rhodesia (now Zimbabwe). The NRC was strongly opposed to Federation, and influenced the ARC to reject the proposals in 1951. That year, the NRC – now renamed the African National Congress (ANC) – launched a mass campaign against Federation, drawing in the unions, the urban working class, and the rural population. There were parallel struggles in Nyasaland and Southern Rhodesia. The campaign failed to stop Federation, but the ANC remained active despite arrests, including the jailing of Kaunda in 1955.

By 1958 the ANC was deeply divided between moderates like Nkumbula, who wanted to participate in the Federation, and younger militants like Kaunda who were opponents of compromise. Kaunda and others broke with the ANC to found the Zambian African National Union (ZANU) on an anti-colonial platform and boycotted Federation elections: it was banned, with thousands arrested, but was effectively replaced by UNIP in 1959. This had widespread African support and advocated non-violence, but was feared by the white and Asian minorities. In 1961 UNIP organized mass resistance against reforms in the Federation's electoral system, escalating into the Cha Cha Cha uprising: this was only ended by an offer to negotiate with UNIP, and from 1962 UNIP and the ANC participated in the coalition government formed in 1962. Zambia became independent in October 1964, headed by Kaunda and UNIP.

In power, Kaunda reiterated his support for anti-colonial struggles elsewhere and advocated the "African socialist" ideology called Humanism. The UNIP government provided nationalist movements like the South African ANC with a base, which placed a significant economic stress on Zambia and led to a number of armed incursions. Zambia also joined the Non-Aligned Movement (NAM), hosting a NAM summit in Lusaka in 1970 and serving as NAM chair from 1970 to 1973.

In practice, UNIP was focused on import-substitution-industrialization (funded by copper revenues) and state-building, taking control of the unions and in 1972 establishing a de jure one-party state. Kaunda contended that the turmoil in southern Africa required a strong government, that party politics promoted tribalism and secessionist movements, and that, in any event, a one-party state could still be democratic. UNIP's rule was, however, increasingly authoritarian and centralized in the hands of Kaunda.

The precipitous decline of copper prices on the international market in the early 1970s (and to a lesser extent, state inefficiencies) brought the country into economic crisis and a spiral of debt. Growing poverty and unemployment proved a growing challenge to Kaunda's one-party state, fostering union opposition, revolts within UNIP itself, and a coup attempt. In the 1980s Kaunda implemented neoliberal structural adjustment policies, leading to widespread protests and growing calls for a multi-party system. In 1991 Kaunda was forced to allow open elections, the MMD won a sweeping victory, and popular trade unionist and MMD leader Frederick Chiluba replaced Kaunda as president. Contrary to popular expectations, the MMD embarked on a sweeping structural adjustment program. This led to a sharp collapse in incomes and living standards and the very real prospect of an MMD defeat in the 1996 elections at the hands of a resurgent UNIP, headed by Kaunda. Chiluba prevented Kaunda from standing and had him arrested in 1997, following which Kaunda retired from political life.

Despite his controversial rule, Kaunda remains, for many, a symbol of African freedom struggles and enjoys a great deal of respect across southern Africa for his forthright support for struggles in South Africa and Southern Rhodesia. Since his retirement he has been mainly involved in charity work.

Kautsky, Karl (1854–1938)

Jürgen Nautz

Karl Kautsky was born in Prague on October 16, 1854. In 1863 the family moved to Vienna, the capital of the Hapsburg empire. During his schooldays, influenced by reading George Sand and Louis Blanc, Kautsky became a socialist. In 1875 he became a member of the Social Democratic Party in Austria, founded the year before at Neudörfel. Greatly influenced by Ernst Haeckel's popular book Natürliche Schöpfungsgeschichte, Kautsky intensified his studies in scientific materialism and Darwinism. His theories were first developed in 1876/7 in the manuscripts Entwurf einer Entwicklungsgeschichte der Menschheit (1927) and Rasse und Judentum (1914). Kautsky also studied economic theorists Karl Eugen Dühring, David Ricardo, Wilhelm Roscher, and Adam Smith, philosophers John Stuart Mill and Friedrich Albert Lange, and Karl Marx, especially his Capital (1875/1876).

Beside his studies Kautsky published articles in the Viennese socialist newspapers. Because of his involvement in the Social Democratic Party, Kautsky came into contact with many of the prominent leaders of German social democracy. Carl Höchberg, a wealthy publisher and patron of the socialist movement, offered Kautsky the editorship of the political weekly Der Sozialdemokrat, which was then published in Zurich. Kautsky agreed and moved to Zurich in 1880, joining Höchberg's secretary, Eduard Bernstein, as co-editor of the weekly, which was smuggled back into Germany. Kautsky joined a group of German socialist exiles. Under their influence, Kautsky switched to Marxism.

Kautsky's attempt to complete a doctorate at the University of Jena in the early 1880s was blocked by the philosophy faculty, so he focused his energy on party work instead. From 1885 to 1890, Kautsky lived in London and became a close friend of Friedrich Engels and Bernstein. After the repeal of the law preventing socialists from living in Germany, Kautsky moved to Stuttgart and then Berlin in 1897.

Kautsky advanced as a leading theorist of the Social Democratic Party and the Second International (1889–1916). He was editor of Die Neue Zeit, the theoretical journal of the Social Democratic Party and a leading European socialist periodical until September 1917. Using this journal Kautsky popularized Marx's ideas and substantially influenced the program and conception of the Social Democratic Party of Germany (SPD). In 1891 he co-authored with August Bebel and Bernstein the party's Erfurt Program, which adhered to revolutionary Marxism. With the first part of the Erfurt Program the party adopted Kautsky's interpretation of Marxism: historical determinism, crisis theory, socialism as a historical necessity, the party as leader in the class struggle, and internationalism. This was in conflict with Bernstein's more liberal ideas and political demands, including the general and equal right to vote, freedom of speech and assembly, equal rights for women, and separation of state and church. Kautsky argued that Bernstein's emphasis on electoral politics was based on a non-class approach. This went against his basic understanding of Marxism, the role of the working class within the class struggle, and party ideology and practice. At first Kautsky's theoretical position gained acceptance in the party, but he was challenged when the revisionism controversy reemerged in 1904–5.

During World War I Kautsky adopted a pacifist attitude. In 1914 he suggested that the social democratic members of the Reichstag (national parliament) abstain from the vote on war credits. During the summer of 1915 he joined with Bernstein to launch an attack against the war and the pro-war policy of the social democratic leadership. Because of the contrary positions of Kautsky and the party leaders on the war question, Kautsky left the party in 1917 for the Independent Social Democratic Party of Germany (USPD), formed by social democratic pacifists. As a consequence he lost the editorship of Die Neue Zeit. While Kautsky did not oppose war, he remained opposed to armed revolution, leaving him in disagreement with the positions of Rosa Luxemburg and Lenin. After the war Kautsky condemned the Bolshevik Revolution of 1917 and criticized the notion of the dictatorship of the proletariat. The Bolsheviks, in Kautsky's eyes, had initiated a revolution that led not to better conditions for the working class but to a new form of bureaucracy and economic need. He was attacked for this opinion by Lenin, who called Kautsky a "renegade." In October 1920, at a party convention in Halle, the USPD at the height of its power split over the controversial decision of whether or not to join the Comintern. The party's left wing joined with the German Communist Party (KPD) to form the United Communist Party of Germany (VKPD), while others returned to the SPD, Kautsky among them.

After the German November Revolution of 1918 Kautsky served as chairman of the Socialization Committee (Sozialisierungskommission) and as undersecretary of state in the SPD-USPD revolutionary government. During this time he edited German documents on the causes of World War I to prove imperial Germany's war guilt (Die deutschen Dokumente zum Kriegsausbruch, 1919; Wie der Weltkrieg entstand, 1919).

Kautsky's influence in Germany and on international social democracy declined thereafter. He moved back to Vienna with his family in 1924, although he remained a productive writer, publishing several voluminous theoretical works and historical studies, including Die materialistische Geschichtsauffassung (1927), Grenzen der Gewalt (1934), and Sozialisten und Krieg (1937). Kautsky was forced to leave Austria after the country's occupation by Nazi Germany in 1938. He fled first to Czechoslovakia, then to the Netherlands, where he died on October 17, 1938 in Amsterdam.

Kelly, Edward "Ned" (1855–1880) and the Kelly Gang

John McQuilton

The Kelly Gang was at large in Northeastern Victoria (also known as Kelly Country) from October 1878 to June 1880. It consisted of Edward (Ned) Kelly, his brother Dan, Steve Hart, and Joe Byrne. The Kelly Outbreak began in October 1878 when a police search party and the gang fought a gun battle at Stringybark Creek. Three policemen were shot dead. Declared outlaws by the Victorian government, a reward was placed on gang's heads. A massive police hunt followed, but failed to find them. In December 1878, the gang robbed a bank in the Victorian town of Euroa. In February 1879, they crossed the border into New South Wales and robbed a bank at Jerilderie. During the robbery, Ned Kelly left what he called a "small part of my life," an 8,300-word letter setting out his side of the story (the Jerilderie Letter). The colonial governments and banks in Victoria and New South Wales increased the original reward to £8,000. Although an unprecedented sum of money, it found no takers. The Kelly Gang disappeared from sight until June 26, 1880. No longer the hunted, the gang had become the hunter.

Ned Kelly and Steve Hart captured the hamlet of Glenrowan on the main regional railway line. Sections of the line were removed. At the same time, Joe Byrne and Steve Hart appeared in the Woolshed near Beechworth where Joe Byrne shot his boyhood friend,

An outlaw to some and a hero to others, Ned Kelly was an Australian version of Robin Hood. Here he is pictured around 1870 in an armored suit made out of ploughshares. His gang was famous for wearing these homemade suits. (Popperfoto/Getty Images)

Aaron Sherritt, suspected of being a police spy. Sherritt had a police party quartered in his hut. After the murder, the two joined their companions at Glenrowan. Ned Kelly knew that Sherritt's murder would draw a large police contingent to the Woolshed by train which would pass through Glenrowan. Protected by armor fashioned from plow mold boards, the gang planned to deliver a major blow against their enemies. But the strategy failed. The police in Sherritt's hut reported the murder the next day. Disputes amongst the police in command of the hunt delayed the dispatching of the police special. Warned by the local school teacher, the police special stopped at Glenrowan at 3 a.m. on June 28. In what was described at the time (and is still described today) as the Last Stand, Ned Kelly was captured and his companions were killed. Convicted of the murder of Thomas Lonigan, one of the police at Stringybark Creek, he was hanged on November 11, 1880.

Why did the Kelly Outbreak occur? Folklore claims police persecution. The police paid particular attention to the Kelly family, perhaps for good reason. There is little doubt that Ned Kelly and his companions were involved with stock theft, something Ned Kelly referred to as "wholesale and retail horse and cattle dealing" (Jerilderie Letter). Yet, if the record of convictions for charges is an indication, they were over-diligent. Most of the charges brought against the family failed. One that did stick, however, triggered the Outbreak. Ellen Kelly, Ned and Dan's mother, was sentenced to three years' hard labor for the attempted murder of Constable Alexander Fitzpatrick in October 1878 on evidence even the chief commissioner of police doubted. Concentration on family, however, obscures the factors that allowed the Kelly Gang to defy the police for almost two years and created the Kelly legend.

The Victorian authorities had assumed the reward would bring a speedy close to the Outbreak: it did not. Publicly, the police claimed that the reward failed because the Kellys terrorized a regional population. Privately, they blamed widespread sympathy for the gang from the region's selectors, the majority of the regional population. This triggered one of the great blunders in the hunt for the Kelly Gang. In December 1878, the police arrested over 30 men as sympathizers. All were from selector backgrounds. The arrests were meant to warn a community that support for outlaws brought with it penalties, but they backfired. After continual remands, the accused were released without charge in April 1879. Rather than weakening sympathy for the gang, police policy reinforced it.

During the 1860s, the Victorian government had embarked on an ambitious social engineering project by passing a series of land acts designed to create a nation of yeoman farmers. Men and single women were entitled to select crown land. The amount selected was limited and the land was to be used for agriculture. Previously, the land had been held under long-term leases by squatters (pastoralists) in runs that covered thousands of hectares. The squatters had no intention of relinquishing land they regarded as theirs. Using both legal and illegal means, they began alienating their runs. The legislation not only effectively pitted two rural social groups against each other for the control of rural resources – it was also flawed. The cultural agrarianism it sought to foster ignored the realities of the Australian environment. Selectors' farms were too small and the environment was better suited to mixed farming rather than mono-agricultural land use. By the 1870s, rural society was divided into two mistrustful, sometimes antagonistic, groups. Social tension found expression in stock theft, which rose substantially during the 1870s. The principal victims were the squatters. The principal suspects were the selectors. Inevitably, the police intervened on the side of the squatters and came to be seen by the selectors as the squatters' agents.

The Kelly Gang's members all came from selection backgrounds. And all had been jailed for stock theft. This was the link that created sympathy for the gang and it was regional sympathy that allowed the gang to remain at large. Ned Kelly was certainly aware of the link. At both bank robberies, he burned mortgage papers held against selectors' farms. The Kellys became a surrogate means of expressing rural social discontent. But sympathy for the Kellys extended beyond Kelly Country. Over 32,000 people in Melbourne signed a petition for his reprieve. What is striking about Kelly sympathy was its ability to reach across the traditional ethnic, even class, divides in colonial society. It was not, as some colonial newspapers hoped, purely an Irish Catholic matter.

The obverse of sympathy is fear and the latter was clearly evident during Kelly's trial. The memory of the rebellion of miners in Ballarat at Eureka in 1854 lingered. When handing down his sentence, the judge, Sir Redmond Barry, specifically referred to the dangers posed by a frontier society where the bonds that bound society together were weak and lawlessness was common. Barry had a point for there was more to Glenrowan than derailing a police special. If the strategy had worked, Ned Kelly intended to declare a republic in Northeastern Victoria. And for seven years after Ned Kelly's execution, a new outbreak was feared. One officer described the police stationed in the region as an army of occupation. In many ways, the Kelly Outbreak matches Eric Hobsbawm's portrait of social banditry.

After Ned Kelly's execution, a Royal Commission was appointed to inquire into the police force. Witness after witness unwittingly corroborated the bushranger's allegation of police oppression, collusion with the squatters, and a force in crisis. Leading police figures in the hunt were sacked and the force was reformed. And a new land act in 1885 finally released selectors from the agrarian tyranny of the earlier acts and recognized in legislation what selectors had turned to in the 1870s – mixed farming, which would finally bring a measure of prosperity to the yeoman farmer.

The specifics may have changed, but Ned Kelly's story lived on. He and his gang have been the subject of paintings, novels, plays, opera, film, television, and public debate. The story is a powerful narrative of loyalty, protest, rebellion, and defeat. Of greater importance, however, are the Kelly legend and its chameleon quality. Each generation has drawn something different from the legend to reflect views of their times. The diggers (Australian soldiers) during the Great War laid emphasis on Ned Kelly's loyalty to his mates. During the Great Depression, poverty, the "battler" (or underdog), and police oppression were dominant. In the 1960s and 1970s, Kelly as Australian nationalist and republican appeared. During the 1980s, the Kelly women as protagonists were foregrounded. And the Kimberley clans have woven him into their stories of resistance. It seems Australian society still has need of a man hanged for the murder of a police constable.

Kelly, Petra (1947–1992)

Eric F. Trump

Petra Kelly was a seminal figure of the European peace and ecology movements. She helped to found the German Green Party (Die Grünen) in 1979. Born Petra Lehmann in Bavaria, her name changed to Kelly after her mother married an American in 1958. The family moved to the United States in 1959, and Kelly later studied political science at American University's School of International Service in Washington, DC. She later returned to Europe and in 1971 received a master's degree in political science from the University of Amsterdam. During her years in the US, the non-violent civil rights movement left a lasting impression. Also, her sister Grace's death from eye cancer in 1970 exemplified what she later called the "cancerization" of the world from nuclear pollution.

In 1972 Kelly engaged in environmentalist activity and joined Willy Brandt's Social Democratic Party. She left the party in 1979 to protest its energy policies and went on to become spokesperson for a citizens' initiative called the Bund Bürgerinitiativen Umweltschutz (Citizens Initiative for Environmental Protection). She collected over 5 million signatures to protest the stationing of Pershing II and Cruise Missiles in Europe. In the 1970s, by means of the electoral route, the Green Party, with environmental positions, steadily gained power in the local and state elections. Kelly, along with green and left activists Rudi Dutschke, Herbert Gruhl, and Joseph Beuys, sought to integrate "green" ideas and supporters into one progressive political party.

The German Green movement formed into a party in 1979. Kelly referred to the Greens as an "anti-party party" dedicated to the principles of "non-violence, ecology, social justice, and feminism." In her essay "Thinking Green!" Kelly called on the need to achieve fundamental transformative positions through the electoral arena: "Green politics must address the spiritual vacuum of industrial society, the alienation that is pervasive in a society where people have grown isolated from nature and themselves." She opposed political compromise as a betrayal of Green ideals.

Kelly was nominated to the European Parliament as a Green in 1979. A year later she was elected to the German Green Party's Executive Committee. In 1983 the Green Party won over 2 million votes. Kelly was one of 17 Greens who entered the German Parliament, where she remained a member until 1990 when she lost her seat. In her first year as a parliamentarian she organized a "war crimes tribunal" in Nuremberg to indict countries who possessed nuclear weapons. A fierce opponent of oppression in Tibet, Kelly held the first international hearing on Tibet and human rights, and adopted a Tibetan daughter.

In a 1992 "Open Letter to the German Green Party," written a year before her death, she writes the Green Party should use "creative civil disobedience to combat every form of repression, which combines audacious imagination with efficient working methods, and which recognizes the link between world peace and peace in every individual."

Kelly was found shot dead in Bonn in October 1992 with the body of her companion of ten years, Gert Bastian, a Green Party member and former general. The death was officially ruled a murder-suicide, though its circumstances remain in dispute.

Kelly was controversial and outspoken, often embroiled in arguments with her fellow Greens, some distrustful of her celebrity status. Yet commentators credit Kelly with serving to reverse the nuclear arms race and prioritizing ecological concerns on a global basis. The Petra Kelly Foundation was founded in 1997 to promote Kelly's political messages of ecology and social justice.

Kent State student uprising

Stacy Warner Maddern

The incidents at Kent State University on May 4, 1970 would galvanize the anti-Vietnam War movement in the United States, forming solidarity between colleges and universities across the nation. Responding to President Richard Nixon's announcement that US forces would invade Cambodia on April 30, 1970, students began demonstrating on the campus of Kent State University intending to "bring the war home." Beginning on Friday May 1, the protest included an effigy of burning draft cards, American flags, and copies of the US Constitution. The protest and violence would escalate and travel into the neighborhoods of Kent, Ohio, where several bars had to be closed and police were called out to quell disturbances. The following morning, after declaring a state of emergency, Kent Mayor Leroy Satrom asked Ohio Governor James A. Rhodes to assist in what was by then considered a city-wide riot.

The governor called in the National Guard, but by the time they arrived in Kent the Reserve Officer Training Corps (ROTC) building on campus had been set on fire. Standing around the blaze were about 1,000 protesters. Immediately, confrontations broke out and several students were arrested. Others were tear-gassed, and a few students were reported as being stabbed with bayonets.

By Sunday May 3, 1,000 Guardsmen occupied Kent State to protect the citizenry from what the governor called "the worst kind of people we harbor in this country." By 11.00 p.m. new protest campaigns were raging on the campus and the Guard was ordered to force students back into their dorms. When the crowds refused to move, they were tear-gassed again and many more arrests made.

Student-organized protests the next day would eventually bring the conflict to a head. In an effort to quell any further disturbance, university officials printed and distributed 12,000 leaflets indicating that all rallies, including those scheduled that day, were prohibited. But the day's activities had already begun, and a mass of 2,000 students gathered around to hear protesters speak. Lurking in the distance, some hundred yards away, close to 100 Ohio National Guardsmen armed with M-1 military rifles sat observing the protest. Shortly before noon, as the gathering began to reach its peak, a Kent State police officer, standing with the Guard, began barking orders through a bullhorn for all students to disperse. With the announcement having no effect, the officer climbed into a jeep with several Guardsmen and was driven into the crowd, where he began telling protesters that the rally was banned and that they must disperse. The detail was met with angry shouting and pelted with rocks, causing it to retreat. Soon after, the Guard was ordered to load and lock their weapons. Tear-gas canisters were fired into the crowd around to clear the way for a unit that marched in closer, forcing the protesters to move up a steep hill, known as Blanket Hill. Once they were over the hill, students began flooding onto the Prentice Hall parking lot and an adjoining practice football field. Most of the Guardsmen followed only to find themselves somewhat trapped on the fenced-in field. Students began to yell and hurl rocks at the Guardsmen, some of whom were huddling together, while others knelt and pointed their guns, but no weapons were fired at this time. The Guard then began retracing their steps from the field back up Blanket Hill. As they arrived at the top of the hill, 28 of the 77 Guardsmen turned suddenly and fired their rifles and pistols into the air and the ground. However, a small portion fired directly into the crowd. Altogether between 61 and 67 shots were fired in a 13-second period.

Why the shots were fired at all remains under debate. Many Guardsmen claimed that they were afraid for their lives, while public opinion noted in Time magazine that “triggers were not pulled accidentally at Kent State.” The President’s Commission on Campus Unrest concluded that “the indiscriminate firing of rifles into a crowd of students and the deaths that followed were unnecessary, unwarranted, and inexcusable.” In the end there was no plausible explanation.

Four students were killed and nine wounded. Of the four killed only Allison Krause and Jeffrey Miller had been participants in the protest, while Sandra Scheuer and William Knox Schroeder were walking by on their way to their next class. The uproar would solidify the anti-war movement as students on 350 campuses across the nation came out in protest. In similar demonstrations, the National Guard was called out to quell uprisings in 16 different states, resulting in the closure of 75 colleges and universities for the remainder of the academic year. Five days after the shootings, 100,000 gathered in Washington, DC to demonstrate against the war and the killing of unarmed student protesters. The event caused President Nixon to flee the White House for the safer Camp David, where he would remain for two days. In recalling the atmosphere former counsel to the president, Charles Colson, remembers thinking to himself, “This can’t be the United States of America. This is not the greatest free democracy in the world. This is a nation at war with itself.”

Kenya, national protests for independence

George Gona

Much of the 1980s witnessed a general absence of popular resistance in Kenya. While some churches criticized the state in matters concerning the structure and use of state power, civil organizations and individuals were muzzled through the party state machinery. Detentions, crackdowns on pro-democracy advocates, suspension and expulsions from the single party Kenya African National Union (KANU), intimidation of the masses into submission, and the silencing of popular leaders by the state were all employed to achieve this result. The suppression of Mwakenya (an underground movement formed to resist President Daniel arap Moi’s rule) and other opposition groups epitomized the dark ages of the party-state rule in the 1980s. Popular sections of civil society, like the labor movement, which would normally have played the role of checking state excesses, were co-opted. Genuine pro-democracy activities and oppositional views were criminalized and innocent individuals incarcerated because of associating with those implicated in this group. This, however, did not dampen the resolution of the pro-democracy forces in Kenya to continue their resistance to the Moi rule.

Popular pressure was key to bringing political change in Kenya in the early 1990s. But scholars such as Abrahamsen (1997) have also argued that external pressures ranging from the fall of the Berlin Wall in 1989 to political conditionality imposed by the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund on Kenya and African states in general played a critical role in the change to multi-party democracy in Africa. The power of external donors to press for both economic and political reforms was nowhere greater than in Africa. Yet these external pressures would not have yielded much if citizens had not pushed for change. External pressures only set the context for internal forces to take the lead in forcing change in the country.

One key feature of the Moi era was hegemonic leadership characterized by a stage-managed democracy, where the party hierarchy became all-powerful even in respect of parliament. Outside parliament, church leaders and the Law Society of Kenya constantly reminded the government of the need to be tolerant of dissent. Within the ruling party there arose dissenting voices that began to challenge the developmentalist logic with which Moi had sought to control and dominate society. Thus new challenges faced Moi by 1990 from a new generation of leadership. These groups received support from those in exile, the popular masses of Nairobi, students, and workers in general. They formed the counterhegemonic forces against Moi's regime.

Heightened Protest

The period 1990–2 witnessed a heightened confrontation between various social forces and the intransigent and dictatorial government of Moi and KANU. These forces sought to “reinvent the wheel of democracy” in Kenya. Church leadership, which had for much of the 1980s been critical of the regime, provided the appropriate occasion and space for those social forces to find voice. Early in 1990, Dr. Timothy Njoya of the Presbyterian Church of East Africa's Tumutumumu parish challenged the ruling party to rethink the single-party political system in light of the events in Eastern Europe, which had seen monolithic regimes collapse. Not surprisingly, this challenge earned him the ire of KANU stalwarts. The national chairman of KANU, Peter Aloo Aringo, declared the sermon to be the highest possible insult, absolute madness and folly (Daily Nation, January 3, 1990). Other ministers lambasted Njoya's utterances, some suggesting that he should be detained.

The 1990 murder of Robert Ouko, Kenya's foreign minister and defender of Kenya's reputation at home, put severe pressure on the government. Even though he had not been in favor of multi-party democracy, outraged public reactions to his murder paved the way for this kind of change. His murder was followed by “a public discussion of the nature of the political system,” while church leaders and various non-governmental organizations called for an independent investigation into his death, insisting that since the government was possibly implicated in the affair, it could not investigate itself (Sabar-Friedman 1997). Finally, the president set up an independent commission of inquiry led by Justice Evans Gicheru to investigate the death of Ouko. The commission started its work in 1990 but was abruptly stopped by the president, who claimed that it was not doing its job and instead was listening to rumors.

In May 1990, Kenneth Matiba and Charles Rubia, two former cabinet ministers expelled from KANU in December 1988, added their voices to the campaign for the reintroduction of multi-party politics in Kenya. They announced that they were applying for licences to hold pro-pluralism rallies in various parts of the country, including the Kamukunji grounds in Nairobi. The months of May and June 1990 saw mounting grassroots agitation in Nairobi, and Matiba and Rubia may well have been responding to these pressures from below. The provincial administration and later the president rejected their applications.

On July 3, 1990 the president issued a lengthy statement warning that the government would use all means at its disposal to maintain law and order. Following this statement, a major crackdown on multi-party advocates ensued; Matiba and Rubia were arrested, together with other pro-pluralists. However, Matiba and Rubia announced before their arrest that even without the permit they would go ahead and hold a rally at the Kamukunji grounds on July 7, 1990. For the first time since 1978, when Shikuku said in parliament that KANU was dead, a strong challenge to the Moi–KANU regime had emerged. This new group sought to challenge the iniquities perpetuated by the client-patronage system that Moi had perfected. Opposition leaders began to draw support from the public without recourse to established patronage bosses.

At this point the government was anxious to avoid unilateral decisions that would give the opposition groups political mileage. It therefore launched a national campaign to undermine the opposition. The campaign's central objective was to argue that Kenya was not ripe for a multi-party system and that multi-partyism was a foreign ideology. In May 1990 the president warned that the introduction of many parties would be worse than in the early days of the country's independence, as people would now reach for rifles instead of the traditional rungus (clubs) (Daily Nation, May 31, 1990). The president ruled out public debate on the merits and demerits of multi-partyism: "If there should be two or three parties, then it is not now when tribalism is at its climax. Maybe it will be 40 or 50 years to come when the current generation in school now will be grown up and will have wiped out tribalism" (Gona 2003). Some cabinet ministers even invoked Jomo Kenyatta, the first president of Kenya, in the debate and charged that the late president's spirit would haunt the advocates of multi-party democracy. Yet invoking the past could not hold back the rising tide for change.

How the labor movement responded to the demands for change and the accompanying protests depended on the relationship that the labor movement had established with the state, its capacity to meet demands of members, and its mettle to formulate programmatic issues and follow them through. This was lacking at the time the pro-democracy wave was sweeping across the country. Right from independence, labor had been coerced into submitting to the state and capital. Through coercive legislation and welfarist/statist strategies, the state managed to isolate labor from participation in policy formulation and debates, and generally in the decision-making process. From its inception, the Central Organization of Trade Unions (COTU) was straightjacketed into economic demands. Trade union leadership did not feel free to articulate any social and political agenda. It remained tied to economist unionism, making protests and raising matters to do with wages, unemployment, price increases, and so on. Such was the condition of labor at the time of demands for political liberalization: weak in leadership and inept in organization.

Local Conflict over Public Spaces: The Muoroto Episode and Related Issues

The surge for support for multi-party democracy coincided with local conflicts over urban and other spaces. In May 1990, City Commission askaris (guards) and police forcibly evicted slum dwellers of Muoroto, a shanty village in the east of Nairobi. A pitched battle followed between Commission askaris and later regular police on the one side and Muoroto residents and hawkers who joined them on the other. This battle lasted several hours and spread to Eastleigh, River Road, Gikomba, Muthurwa, Pumwani, and Tom Mboya Street. During the running battles sympathizers jeered their assailants with chants of "multi-party." Over the three days of rioting that followed the evictions, the police played a cat and mouse game with the people. Clearly, citizens were showing awareness of the need for change since every time they came across the police they flashed the two-finger salute that denoted multi-partyism.

These evictions drew various responses from the public. The church leadership criticized the heavy loss of life (eight people died) and called into question the commitment of the country's leadership, which claimed to be Christian and was supposed to be guided by the principles of love, peace, and unity. The churches' condemnation of the brutal evictions was not confined to the Muoroto case but extended to similar episodes in Mombasa as well as in some rural locations. As Anglican Archbishop Manasses Kuria asked during a sermon at St. Ann's Church in Nairobi, "who in their right minds can stand and watch such vicious destruction of poor people's lives? How can the nation stand by and watch children being battered by the City Commission askaris and hundreds of people sleeping outside in the cold because their houses have been demolished?" (The Standard, May 28, 1990).

Public indignation over the demolition of the shanties was also expressed in music. Related issues that touched on political repression emerged out of this protest, with some songs echoing resentment over the Muoroto evictions while others raised questions about the death of Robert Ouko. The state responded to the artistic opposition in a typically repressive fashion. In July 1990, police in Nairobi and Nakuru impounded hundreds of cassettes and musical equipment. The cassettes featured songs like “Mahoya ma Bururi” (Prayers for the Country), “Who Killed Dr. Ouko?,” “Mathina ma Matiba” (Matiba’s Tribulations), “Nituhoje Ngai” (“Let Us Pray”), “Patriotic Contributions,” and “Thina Uria Wakorire Athini na Gicagi Kia Muoroto” (“Problems that Befell the Poor People of Muoroto”). The Muoroto resistance also questioned the moral and political authority of the city government. In a letter to the editor of the Daily Nation, one observer wrote: “A city authority that is not elected has neither sense of responsibility and accountability to continue acting purportedly for and on behalf of people of Nairobi” (May 29, 1990; Gona 2003).

The initial reaction from the labor movement came from its Director of Organization Francis Atwoli, who termed the evictions “very inhuman.” He appealed to the government to revoke the eviction until an alternative site was found. Atwoli’s sympathy contrasted with the attitude adopted by Mugalla and Fred Omido, the secretary general of the Amalgamated Union of Kenya Metal Workers and MP for the Bahati constituency in Nairobi. Mugalla apparently backed the demolition of kiosks and other businesses. He justified his support by arguing that in the event of “a let-up in the clean-up exercise, a slum culture would develop which would be difficult to get rid of in the future” (Gona 2003). For his part, Omido condemned the manner in which members of the public joined the Muoroto victims in fighting the City Commission askaris. He wondered why people were flashing the multi-party two-finger sign as they rioted. He did not see how the evictions were connected with the calls for multi-partyism.

Mugalla’s view was repudiated by Ambrose Adongo, the secretary general of the Kenya National Union of Teachers (KNUT), who described it as “regrettable” and depicted Mugalla as “unfit to lead a worker’s organization and the very antithesis of a worker’s leader” (Gona 2003). Church leaders also lambasted Mugalla, asserting that he “had lost credibility among the country’s workers because of his radical stand on the slum issue” (Gona 2003). Generally, official responses by the trade union movement reflected the extent to which the COTU leadership was out of touch with reality. Since Mugalla was not serving the interests of the workers he represented, church leaders called for his resignation. Its failure to respond to the call to attend the Saba Saba rally at Kamukunji revealed how distanced the leadership of the formal organized labor movement was from public feeling (Gona 2003).

Saba Saba and its Aftermath

The period after Matiba and Rubia’s call for change to a multi-party democracy was of great importance to the nascent opposition. At the time, Kenya was carried along by a wave of renewal, an urban awakening in which a new mass movement was born. This was reflected by the readiness of the masses in Nairobi, including hawkers, jua kali artisans, and street urchins, to attend rallies or participate in the demonstrations called by opposition groups. The political strength of the challengers to KANU’s monopoly of power became more visible during 1990, notwithstanding the crackdown on protests. Matiba and Rubia received support for their call to attend a political rally on July 7, 1990, despite the government ban. Evidently, the state could not halt the tide of change. People defied government warnings not to attend the meeting at Kamukunji, famously known as the “Saba Saba” rally (the Swahili equivalent of 7/7, connoting the date the riots started) (Mutunga 1999).

The choice of Kamukunji grounds in the Eastlands of Nairobi was deliberate. During the struggle for independence, African politicians and those who supported their cause held their rallies there (Mutunga 1999), and it was the site of independence debates. After independence, Kamukunji was neglected. Kenyatta built Uhuru Park, where he exalted his government and the “development” achieved since independence on public holidays such as Kenyatta Day (October 20), Madaraka (Self-Rule) Day (June 1), and Jamhuri (Independence) Day (December 12). The less well-off occupied Nairobi’s Eastlands in low-income estates like Jeriko, Bahati, Ziwani, and Kaloleni. Kamukunji’s neglect symbolized the general neglect of the people of Eastlands.

By convening the meeting at Kamukunji, the pro-democracy groups were thus identifying with the impoverished and downtrodden people of Eastlands. In earlier times Kamukunji came to symbolize “Not Yet Uhuru” (Mutunga 1999). In the 1990s it symbolized “Not Yet Democracy.” Later it came to be a contested terrain, a source of legitimation and gauge of popularity between the government and the pro-democracy forces.

The contestation over the use of the grounds symbolized the continued struggles for citizens' rights to assemble and associate freely.

On July 7, 1990, about 200,000 citizens descended on the grounds. Groups of people began gathering around noon and by 2 p.m. thousands of people had congregated in the area. Many came from the neighboring slum areas, residential areas, and the Gikomba open-air market. Small groups, mostly young men, gathered in the middle of the Kamukunji grounds. Hundreds of others stood either at the edges or on the streets and among houses, shanties, and sheds around Kamukunji. No politician was in sight, nor did any prominent person address the crowd.

Pandemonium erupted after the crowd confronted a person suspected of being a policeman. The security detail (plain clothes and regular police) descended on the grounds and violently dispersed those gathered there (Daily Nation, July 8, 1990). This degenerated into riots in which people engaged the police in running battles. Skirmishes beginning in Kamukunji spread to the entire Eastlands, toward the city center, and extended to Ngara, Eastleigh, Pangani, Huruma, and Mathare. Similar incidents were reported in low-income estates such as Kibera, Uthiru, and Kangemi among others. Still more incidents were reported in Nakuru, Murang'a, Nyeri, and Kiambu. Rioters mounted roadblocks, stoning and burning vehicles (Daily Nation, July 8, 1990). The rioters also issued political statements. Flashing the two-finger salute as a sign of support for the multi-party system, they chanted anti-government slogans and called for the release from detention of Matiba and Rubia (Gona 2003).

The eruption of violence was a manifestation of the anger and tension that had built up in the city for several weeks. The detention of Matiba, Rubia, and other reformists, and the subsequent brutal dispersal of the July 7 meeting, gave focus to these feelings of liberation. Suddenly the opposition spoke with one voice: political pluralism had to be allowed in Kenya. Externally, the incident sensitized the outside world to the oppressive conditions of the Moi regime, a government that was not ready to expand the political arena.

Workers Defy their Leaders and Walk to Kamukunji

From the time Moi adopted dictatorial tendencies after his rule was challenged in an aborted coup in 1982, to the Muoroto skirmishes, to riots associated with the death of Robert Ouko and to the Saba Saba event, the need for popular forces to come together had never been as great as this time. Mobilization efforts were crucial because of the general antipathy toward the ruling party that was reflected in the open challenges from within the party and the decreased attendances at its rallies. If COTU had concentrated on its grass-roots through its affiliates it might have been able to capitalize on the antipathy and effectively establish itself as an alternative voice to that of KANU. Yet the trade union leadership chose to ignore the revolutionary wave that was sweeping across the country. Instead it was the workers themselves who embraced the moment, protesting their inept leaders as they walked to Kamukunji.

The COTU leadership did not support the July 7 rally and assured the government, KANU, and the president that workers could not be misguided into attending. It viewed the rally as leading to potential chaos that would sabotage the already battered economy. Joseph Mugalla, COTU's secretary general, advised members not to attend the planned "illegal and devilish" meeting (Gona 2003). Such language exemplified COTU's longterm association with the ruling party. Mugalla further termed the rally and the subsequent protests "treasonable acts," even accusing the attorney general of being unworthy of the job. "People are committing crimes against the government but the AG is silent," he said (Gona 2003).

On July 8, 1990, churches throughout the country held prayers for peace and condemned the detention of the two former cabinet ministers and their lawyer, John Khaminwa. Bishop Henry Okullu of the Church of the Province of Kenya (CPK) called on the government to resign and pave the way for a new government and a new future. The churches also proposed the urgent establishment of a forum for dialogue and regular consultation. The Catholic bishops supported these sentiments. COTU rejected these calls for change, viewing the clergy's "persistent demand" for a national convention to discuss Kenya's future as "sinister." Mugalla accused the clergy of underrating the ability of KANU and parliament to handle the problems facing the country. For some, the call for multi-partyism was misplaced. COTU could not join the bandwagon for change just for the sake of it because citizens were not fighting a colonial government. Similarly, it was argued that labor leaders were not politicians. It was not their place to attend political rallies (Gona 2003).

These warped arguments did not deter members from attending the Kamukunji rally. They walked in masses to Kamukunji, to be “with the people,” and to be part of the revolution that was unfolding in the country. As part of the majority of disenchanted Kenyans, workers perceived the call to Kamukunji as part of the campaign to secure democratic space in which citizens could participate freely in the decision-making process in the country. It was not about promises of material benefits; it was about seeking ways of instituting and expanding democratic practice in the country. To them, the call to Kamukunji was a defining moment that called on unionists and the public alike to stand up and be counted, to purge the KANU government of its ills, and to pursue a new economic, political, and social order. The workers who swamped Kamukunji grounds were expressing their indignation at the leadership of the trade union movement, which was caught in the one-party system and was denying workers the opportunity to participate in the making of a new Kenya by asking them not to attend the rally.

Disillusioned by a co-opted trade union leadership, workers recognized that the pro-democracy leaders shared the people’s struggle for unity of the long-oppressed Kenyans. Workers generally saw their leadership’s vulnerability to corruption by the ruling party KANU. At that moment Kamukunji symbolized the convergence of revolutionary ideas and voices, and people of all walks of life – a meeting on common grounds for joint action by the people. In the absence of channels of participation such as a national convention or constituent assembly, where labor could engage in dialogue or lobby for its programs to be included in the new dispensation, protests and public meetings remained, at the time, the only “legitimate” avenues through which the opposition could agitate for change. Workers were right to be there.

It was the workers and not the leadership that recognized that the Kamukunji rally was the real platform for the campaign of democracy in Kenya. For the trade union leadership to insist that trade unionists were not politicians and therefore should not be involved in the democratization agenda was to employ an inverted logic, which did not consider that such a response was tantamount to condoning the undemocratic KANU regime. The failure in KANU was a failure in leadership. The country needed a new leadership, a type of leadership that could source the best ideas and try to implement them in the most reasonable way.

Moi’s intransigence seems to have yielded to the internal pressures mounted by the Church and oppositional voices. These social forces, best expressed and symbolized in the Saba Saba riots, succeeded in forcing the question of change onto KANU’s agenda. An indication of progress in this direction was President Moi’s appointment of the George Saitoti KANU Review Committee in July 1990, which was to collate public views on what type of political system citizens wanted (Throup & Hornsby 1998). Consequently, KANU abolished the queevoting system, a contested issue since its introduction in 1988. There was also the restoration of security of tenure of the judiciary, the attorney general, and the controller and auditor general that had been lost in the mid-1980s. Kamukunji and the subsequent Saba Saba protests had laid the foundation for further struggles. Buttressed by external support, the internal pressures finally pushed Moi into allowing the formation of other political parties to face him at the polls of December 1992, which he won easily due to division in the opposition ranks.

Conclusion

In the context of popular protest and resistance in Kenya in the 1990s, Kamukunji and Saba Saba became part and parcel of Kenya’s pro-democracy protest and revolutionary parlance. In this way, Kamukunji has remained in the minds of citizens a place to “revisit,” figuratively and literally, when repression and suppression seem to reemerge in society. Significantly, Saba Saba has been played out in many instances where again citizen rights have been trampled on and where protest methods have been used to exert pressure on the state to act responsibly toward its citizens. The “Nane Nane” riots of August 1997 (“nane” means 8 in the Kiswahili language, so “nane nane” means 8/8) were reminiscent of this phenomenon. These protests were called to bring pressure on the government to reconsider its refusal to allow for minimum constitutional changes for the 1997 elections. In the quest for constitutional reform, “kamukunjis” and “saba sabas” were held between March and August 1997 by the opposition groups and attracted huge numbers, despite the security forces disrupting most of these rallies and protests and the government’s warning Kenyans not to attend them. Unfortunately, the reforms initiated by KANU did not come close to fulfilling the demands for pro-democracy advocates; however, they were born out of these popular struggles.

Kenyatta, Jomo (1893–1978)

George Gona

Jomo Kenyatta was a leader in the anti-colonial struggle against Britain and the first president of independent Kenya. His exact date of birth is difficult to establish because record keeping, like that of the rest of Kikuyu society, was alien to his father Muigai and his mother Wambui. He was probably born in the mid-1890s among the Kikuyu of central Kenya, and grew at a time of immense change that heralded the alienation of Kikuyu land for British settler occupation. Curiosity about the “Whiteman’s magic” (education) sent him to Thogoto Scottish Mission in 1909, thus formally entering the history of the West.

In the mid-1920s he was among a small group of progressive and educated young men who formed a political organization called the Kikuyu Central Association (KCA) to challenge the colonial establishment. These men pursued their complaints through the limited channels of petition and constitutional redress. They demanded a return of African land and a stop to forced labor. Kenyatta and his group also waged a cultural battle against the British colonial government over the issue of female circumcision, which the protestant churches, with government approval, had outlawed.

In 1929 Kenyatta left for Britain, sent by the KCA to present the case of land for the Kikuyu. While in Britain he studied anthropology at the London School of Economics under the instruction of Bronislaw Malinowski, the renowned anthropologist who wrote a forward to Kenyatta’s Facing Mount Kenya published in 1938. This book, a treatise on Kikuyu traditional life and an assertion to be heard in their own voice, was a masterpiece that showed Kenyatta’s experience and verve in social anthropology. In Britain he also met and was briefly acquainted with Mbiyu Koinange, his latter-day confidant. Their friendship endured till the death of Kenyatta. Increasingly, he came under the influence of his circle of left-wing friends, ranging from Ghana's Kwame Nkrumah to the West Indian trade unionist George Padmore and the famous American actor and close personal friend of Kenyatta, Paul Robeson. He was part of this group that organized the 1945 Pan African Conference in London, where a declaration for an end to colonization was made.

In 1947 Kenyatta returned to Kenya after a 16-year stay in Britain. He quickly joined the territorial Kenya African Union (KAU), becoming its president in 1948 and using it as a mobilization vehicle to talk about the "stolen lands," something that probably fanned the flames of Mau Mau. Kenyatta thus became part of the rising anti-colonial tide among the landless Kikuyu in central Kenya and the Rift Valley and the general resentment toward African political elites now in the Legislative Council. Coupled with labor unions' protests under Makhan Singh, the momentum could not be reversed. Soon the radical changes that World War II brought to Kenya, changes that exposed the inequalities of British colonial rule and galvanized Kikuyu discontent, were channeled into a mass peasant movement called Mau Mau. On October 21, 1952, under Operation Jack Scott, Kenyatta, Paul Ngei, Fred Kubai, Kungu Karumba, Achieng Oneko, and Bildad Kagia were arrested for leading Mau Mau, which the British had branded as an unlawful organization bent on overthrowing the colonial government. At Kapenguria they were tried and sentenced to seven years in prison with hard labor.

Kenyatta was never the radical leader of Mau Mau. Earlier, he had tenuously kept the young Kikuyu militants in check who had wanted the KAU leadership to take on a more radical stance against the colonialists. In fact, Mau Mau only gained strength when Kenyatta was arrested. Overnight he became a martyr; a point on which his future fame would rely. He became a potent unifying political symbol; a point of reference for both his political friends and foes in the anti-colonial struggle. He was released from prison on August 20, 1961 into a political arena of which he had not largely been a part. He was given the position of president of the Kenya African National Union, subsequently leading it to win the 1963 elections. He became the first president of Kenya on December 12, 1963, creating a free-enterprise economy but largely skewed in favor of loyalists. He instituted bits of democratic machinery, but inequity, corruption, and tribalism ran riot during his era.

After independence Kenyatta differed with his compatriots like Kagia and Oginga Odinga on the issue of land. He wanted Kenyans to buy land from departing colonialists, while the latter wanted land to be repossessed without compensation. He baffled many Kenyans when he invited the former British colonizers back as junior partners in nation-building. His nest-feathering drew less criticism among Kenyans, however, than that of his ministers, and particularly his family, which aroused lots of rumblings. Under his rule Mau Mau veterans were completely neglected on the land issue. He instead rewarded former homeguards with plum jobs and with large parcels of land.

Kenyatta epitomized the new African political leadership that was colonial in all but name.

Catapulted onto the new Kenya by self-interest, he proceeded systemically to isolate or liquidate the pro-people nationalists from mainstream politics through detention and curtailment of their freedom of movement and association, and inhibited them from participating in the general development of the country. By 1975 he had managed to sideline many of the individuals who could boast pre-independence struggle credentials that could challenge him. At death he had become an imperial president.

During his twilight years Kenyatta was hardly in control of his government. A kitchen Cabinet of trusted lieutenants insulated him from the public and largely ran the country. Kenyatta died on August 22, 1978. His death was a mystery, just as his life had been an enigma. He was revered as much as he was loathed by many. People whispered about his death. You dared not talk about it. He was an African “Big Man” and these men do not die; they are immortal. Yet the manner in which his life history is now coming under scrutiny belies a rethinking about past iconic representations of African nationalist heroes.

Khama, Seretse (1921–1980) and Botswana nationalism

Wazha Gilbert Morapedi

Seretse Khama was born heir to the Bangwato throne on July 1, 1921 in Serowe village, capital of the Bangwato in the British colony of Bechuanaland (now Botswana). The Bangwato were the largest ethnic group in the country, and Seretse was the grandson of Kgosi (King) Khama III of the Bangwato. His father, Sekgoma Khama, died when Seretse was only 4 years old, and his uncle, Tshekedi Khama, acted as regent until Seretse finished his education before he could ascend to the throne.

Khama spent his early years in the royal household, beginning his primary education at Khama Memorial School in 1929. He also learned traditional outdoor skills like tending cattle and horse riding. From 1931 onwards, Khama was educated in South Africa at the missionary-run interracial Lovedale Institution in the Eastern Cape and at Tiger Kloof, Vryburg; he was active in sports, studied music, and was a prefect.

In 1941, the year he matriculated, Khama was a senior prefect at Lovedale and played a critical role in pacifying a student strike. Around this time, he showed a growing political awareness, resenting South Africa's racial segregation and discrimination. In Bechuanaland, too, he was opposed to racial and ethnic discrimination: here, discrimination was practiced in trading stores, in public places, and in trains. Khama clashed with a white station master at Palapye, and in his summer holidays of 1940–1 tried to overcome ethnic tensions at Serowe between Ikalanga- and Setswana-speaking boys.

Although he wanted to study law, Khama ended up doing a general Bachelor of Arts at Fort Hare because of his Latin grades. In 1942 he was expelled after a student strike, but was later readmitted. At Fort Hare he befriended figures like Charles Njonjo of Kenya and Joshua Nkomo of Southern Rhodesia (now Zimbabwe), later prominent nationalists. In 1945 he enrolled in Balliol College, Oxford, regarded as one of the elite institutions in England, but left to undertake barrister studies at the Inner Temple in London, which he completed in 1948.

In London, Khama met an Englishwoman, Ruth Williams, and they fell in love. His marriage to Williams in September 1948 was opposed by leading elders and royal uncles, including Tshekedi. He had broken protocol, and had also chosen a non-Motswana. The marriage was denounced at a kgotla (assembly) in November by the majority of Bangwato, although a second meeting in December saw this position reversed.

Bamangwato tribal chief Seretse Khama founded the Bechuanaland Democratic Party in 1962 to fight for multi-racial reform and self-government. In 1966 he became the first president of the independent Republic of Botswana, a position he held until his death in 1980. Here Khama and his wife, British-born Ruth Williams, sit on a hill overlooking Bechuanaland in 1950. (Time & Life Pictures/Getty Images)

The controversial marriage turned Khama into an international figure. His mixed marriage was vehemently opposed by the white minority regimes in Southern Africa, and Britain opposed the marriage because of pressure from South Africa. Parsons summarizes the effect of the marriage thus: “The story of Ruth and Seretse, which broke into world consciousness in 1949, thus brought South Africa as well as Bechuanaland into the world spotlight” (Tlou et al. 1995: 96). The rise of apartheid meanwhile helped kindle nationalist politics in Bechuanaland.

Although Khama returned to Bechuanaland in 1949, he was called to Britain in 1950 and asked to renounce his chieftainship. He refused and was banned from returning to his homeland from 1952 to 1956. This was widely opposed across the world. In London, a Seretse Khama campaign committee arranged protests, as did Labour Party politicians. In Serowe, serious riots broke out, ending with three policemen dead: police reinforcements were sent from Lesotho and Southern Rhodesia as the Bangwato territory became ungovernable.

Politics and the Presidency

In 1956, Khama renounced the chieftainship for himself and his children and returned to Bechuanaland as a private citizen, touring the Bangwato Reserve. Khama now saw himself as a republican nationalist leading a political party representing the whole of Bechuanaland and not only the Bangwato Reserve, and lived with his wife as a commoner (Tlou et al. 1995: 2).

Although dogged by illness, which proved to be diabetes, closely monitored, and involved also in cattle ranching, Khama was politically active. He was involved in setting up (and then heading) the elected Bangwato Tribal Council in 1957 and participating as well in the Joint Advisory Council (JAC). He advocated a multiracial Legislative Assembly, to which Britain acceded in 1960 by introducing the Legislative Council (Legco), a stepping stone to independence.

Botswana’s first mass-based political party, the Botswana People’s Party (BPP), was formed in 1960. Khama was initially sympathetic, but came to view the BPP as creating confusion and dissension: “the only way to fight the party was . . . to form ourselves into a body which would expose the falsehoods put out by the People’s Party” (quoted in Tlou et al. 1995: 194). During the November session of the Legco, Khama summoned a caucus of African members, forming with Quett Masire, Amos Dambe, and Archie Tsoebebe the Botswana Democratic Party (BDP) in 1962 in Gaborone. In the Legco, Khama used his political image, and that of his new party, to position it as the representative of the intelligentsia and aspiring cattle owners.

One of his main concerns, raised in the Legco, was racial discrimination, and at his insistence a Select Committee was set up to examine ways of ending discriminatory practices in the civil service. He attended the constitutional talks in July 1963 that paved the way for general elections and then independence. Khama campaigned throughout the country for the BDP, emphasizing multiracialism rather than an exclusivist Pan-Africanism. His party won the general elections of 1965 with a landslide of 28 out of 31 seats, and he was sworn in as prime minister. In 1966, he became the first president of the new republic of Botswana.

In 1965, Khama received an honorary Doctor of Literature from Fordham University in New York, the first of the many honors he would receive, including a knighthood in Britain. He was now an international figure and stressed “the development of Botswana as a viable multi-racial democracy whose unity and independence is based on social and economic justice for its people, regardless of race, color or tribe” (Tlou et al. 1995: 293). His foreign policy was nonaligned. He became more inclined toward Pan-Africanism, but mainly emphasized regional rather than continental cooperation.

As president, he stressed “education for self-reliance” (Ipelegeng) to avoid class divisions and to promote development and “pride in ourselves and our past, which in turn would lead to a greater degree of self-confidence” (Tlou et al. 1995: 313–14). He condemned colonialism for its denigration of African culture and helped establish a national university. He opposed “anti-whiteism,” and tried to prevent racial tensions, but was supportive of national liberation struggles in the white-ruled territories on Botswana’s borders.

In the mid-1970s the Rhodesian crisis was getting worse, and in 1976 Rhodesia declared its frontier with Botswana to be a war zone. Despite his country’s economic vulnerability, Khama maintained that Botswana would fulfill its international obligations by providing sanctuary to refugees seeking asylum, straining relations with South Africa. As tensions grew there was fear of war, and security was tightened around the president, who was disturbed by being thus isolated.

Throughout his presidency, Khama was dogged by poor health, and from 1979 his illness increasingly kept him at home, working from the State House, his official residence. He missed the company of his friends and relatives at parties in town and his occasional sojourns into the rural areas. Botswana was that rarity among postcolonial African regimes, a parliamentary democracy, and 1979 saw Khama campaigning in the general election against what he called the “destructive revolution” of the opposition Botswana National Front. His health came under strain and in November he was flown to London where he was hospitalized. By early 1980 it was clear he was gravely ill. His last major political action was setting the Southern African Development Coordinating Conference (SADCC) program of regional cooperation firmly on course: having played a key role in the preparatory talks and in the design of SADCC, he chaired the first SADCC summit in Lusaka, Zambia, in April 1980. SADCC was, consequently, initially based in Gaborone. Khama continued his normal routine over the next few months, but was diagnosed with cancer in June and died at State House in Gaborone on July 31, 1980. He was buried at the royal cemetery in Serowe. Perhaps, as Parsons says, one of Khama’s assets was his ambiguous and interlocutory status between the different worlds of Botswana: he was both “covert chief and overt commoner” (1993: 2).

Khmelnysky Uprising

Andrew J. Waskey

The Khmelnysky (Chmielnicki) Uprising was a series of armed peasant revolts across present-day Ukraine that raged from 1648 to 1654, converging with a campaign to liberate the territory from Polish control. The uprisings are considered to be actions that liberated the Ukrainians and set in motion the formation of the modern nationalist movement.

The Khmelnysky Uprising was led by Hetman Bohdan Khmelnysky, a Ukrainian nobleman who had been virtually expelled from his lands by Aleksander Koniecpolski, a Polish magnate. As head of the local administration of the Polish king, Daniel Czaplinski sent armed men to harass Khmelnysky so that he would be forced to leave. After two raids that destroyed agricultural property, Khmelnysky’s son, Yuri, was badly beaten. Khmelnysky now felt that his family was in such danger that he sent them away for safety.

Khmelnysky sought justice from the king of Poland, Władysław IV Vasa, and traveled to Warsaw twice to present his case. The journeys were fruitless because the king was either unwilling or unable to remedy the situation. Khmelnytsky was a veteran of campaigns against the Ottoman empire, where he had been captured and held for ransom, and was a registered Cossack. The case of a Cossack nobleman being treated badly by the Poles became a matter of agitation for his Cossack regiment and other Cossacks. The Polish government succeeded in arresting Khmelnytsky, but he escaped with the aid of friends and sympathizers.

Had there been a rebellion of the Cossacks led by Khmelnytsky it would have failed, since the Polish cavalry would have destroyed their infantry. However, Khmelnytsky recruited the Crimean Tartar cavalry, using his diplomatic skills to overcome a century of hostility between the two groups. On January 25, 1648, Khmelnytsky began a campaign to liberate peasants in Ukraine from Polish domination. The Poles responded to the revolt by dispatching a small army, which was defeated by Khmelnytsky at the Battle of Zhovti Vody. The two sides met again at the Battle of Korsun. Shortly afterwards the Polish king died, leaving Poland leaderless.

Khmelnytsky's army marched westward across the Ukraine, freeing peasants from the Polish real estate managers, or arendators. The Ukrainian peasantry, comprised primarily of poor peasants who were Orthodox Christian, became incensed by the harassment of their priests and the closure of churches by the Poles, who pressured many to convert to Catholicism, and eagerly joined Khmelnytsky's campaign. Khmelnytsky and the peasants defeated the Poles at the Battle of Pyliavtski, which allowed him to turn a peasant revolt into a national liberation movement. On Christmas Day 1648, he entered Kiev as a liberator.

By 1654 the Ukrainians were allied with the Russians against the Poles and the Crimean Tartars. The war had killed perhaps a million people, at least 40,000 of whom were Jews, who were seen as agents of oppression because they had worked for the Poles.

Khmer Rouge and Pol Pot

Justin Corfield

The formation of the communist movement in Cambodia goes back to the late 1920s when some of the Chinese who were resident there became involved in strike and sympathy action, undoubtedly motivated by events in China. In 1930, the Indochinese Communist Party (ICP) was founded in Hong Kong by Hô Chi Minh, aiming to draw together the communists in Vietnam, Cambodia, and Laos. However, from the start it was dominated by the Vietnamese, and members from Cambodia also tended to be ethnic Vietnamese. The first communist in Cambodia who seems to have been an ethnic Khmer (the native people of Cambodia) was Ben Krahom ("Red" Ben), a 24-year-old manual laborer who was involved in distributing leaflets in Phnom Penh on July 31, 1930. He worked at an electricity plant in the Cambodian capital, and nothing more is known about his career.

Led by Son Ngoc Thanh, Vietnamese nationalists used the opportunity provided by the Japanese in the country on July 20, 1942 to organize a large demonstration, known as the "Umbrella Revolt." Although it was put down and the leaders hunted down, it helped inspire many young Cambodians, including Saloth Sar (later better known as Pol Pot). He was 17 at the time, and his family had connections at the Royal Palace, an aunt being a minor concubine of the king. This allowed him a privileged upbringing, and he attended the Collège Preah Sihanouk, a new school established in the town of Kompong Cham. By 1947 when he moved to Phnom Penh to attend a technical school, the political landscape had changed completely and the Democrat Party, a center-left socialist party, was in power. He supported them in the 1947 elections. The only communist movement in Cambodia at the time was still the ICP, which remained heavily dominated by ethnic Vietnamese.

Soon after returning to Phnom Penh in 1947, Saloth Sar befriended another student, Ieng Sary,

On April 17, 1975, Khmer Rouge soldiers entered the Cambodian capital of Phnom Penh, their victory marking the end of a five-year-long civil war. Celebrations soon ended, however, as the brutal rule of Democratic Kampuchea (1975–9) brought death to as many as one in six Cambodians (1.5 million people). (AFP/Getty Images) who was also active in the Democrats. Both received government scholarships to study in France. While in Paris, Sar was heavily influenced by the communist movement and joined the French Communist Party (PCF). When he returned to Cambodia in 1953, he joined the Khmer People's Revolutionary Party (KPRP), which had been founded two years earlier after the disbanding of the ICP. By this time, as fighting in Vietnam had spilled over into Cambodia, the French were gradually losing the First Indochina War. In December 1953, Cambodia gained its independence.

With preparations under way for the Geneva Peace Conference, the Cambodian communists formed the Krom Pracheachon (People's Group) to contest the elections that were to be held in 1955, immediately after the Geneva agreements. Due to electoral fraud, the royalist movement, Sangkum, won and Pracheachon was marginalized, although one of its members, Keo Meas, did contest the 1958 national assembly elections. By this time the communists had given up on the idea of coming to power through electoral means, if they had ever believed that to be a viable plan. Many of the Cambodian communists were evacuated to Hanoi after the agreements were signed by the various sides in Geneva, and those who were left decided to mobilize quietly.

In September 1960, KPRP members reorganized themselves as the Workers' Party of Kampuchea. A Marxist-Leninist party, its leader was Tou Samouth, a former monk who had been involved in the 1942 protest. He was from the Khmer Krom, the Cambodian minority in Vietnam. Samouth ran the Workers' Party as its general secretary, and Sar became his personal secretary. In 1962 Samouth was arrested by the police and tortured for about a week before he died, refusing to name any of his fellow communists. This event drove Sar further underground. In 1963, as the secretary of the permanent committee of the Workers' Party, he fled to the jungle and set up a guerilla base there, seeking help from China and Vietnam. Both were reluctant to help him openly, as this would have jeopardized their close relations with the Cambodian government of Prince Norodom Sihanouk. By this time Sihanouk had dubbed the communists the Khmer Rouge (Red Khmers), a title they never used, and indeed rejected.

In 1967, following a downturn in the Cambodian economy and the election of a right-wing government in the previous year, the Cambodian communists tried to join a rebellion in Battambang in the west of the country. This attempt failed, and three leading left-wing members of the Cambodian national assembly, Khieu Samphan, Hu Nim, and Hou Youn, fled to the jungle to join Sar. They planned for a communist revolution, but their opportunity did not arise until March 1970 when Sihanouk was overthrown by his right-wing government led by Lon Nol. The Cambodian civil war followed as Sihanouk, in China, established his government-in-exile, and the communists, including Sar, rallied to his support. The Vietcong started attacking the Lon Nol government, and the communists gradually took over much of the fighting.

By 1973 with the signing of the Paris Peace Treaty for Vietnam, fighting continued in Cambodia and in fact intensified. The communists, who were eager to take power, gradually (and secretly) took over most of Sihanouk's movement, using him as a figurehead and trying to trade off his international prestige. In 1974 the fighting became even fiercer, and it became clear that Sar and his communist hardliners wanted to establish a totally new society. They achieved this on January 17, 1975 when, on the day Sihanouk's supporters won the Cambodian civil war, the communists evacuated Phnom Penh, which had a population of about two million.

The evacuation immediately led to the communists establishing a rural-based society, announcing the start of “Year Zero,” and proclaiming the country officially as Democratic Kampuchea. Sar transformed himself into Pol Pot, renouncing his well-to-do middle-class early life and his palace connections. In 1978 he told a visiting Yugoslav camera crew that he had been born a peasant. The figurehead leader of the Khmer Rouge was Khieu Samphan, although the exact nature of the power he wielded is hotly debated.

The agrarian society that the Cambodian communists tried to establish began to fall to pieces. Pol Pot and the people around him became obsessed with preventing plots against himself and other party leaders. Some no doubt existed, but others appear to have emerged from his paranoia and distrust of others. The few pro-Lon Nol groups that operated in parts of the countryside were quickly eliminated.

Pol Pot had already established internment and death camps all over the country. Some dealt with anti-communist enemies and people who had been, or were suspected of being, members of the Lon Nol government. These people were killed out of hand, and many hundreds of thousands of others died of exhaustion, overwork, lack of medicines, or other causes. About 20,000 party members and others suspected of involvement in plots were taken to interrogation centers. The one in Phnom Penh, S-21, survives and is now a chilling tourist attraction of a macabre sort. Leading party officials such as Keo Meas and Hu Nim were taken there, tortured, and, after confessing to crimes they could not possibly have committed, were forced to sign confessions and executed.

From April 1975 to December 1978, the Cambodian communists tried to control what was happening in the country and managed to get some support from Communist China. As the Cambodian communist movement turned in on itself, some of its members fled to Vietnam, while others remained and started to try to overthrow the government of Pol Pot. Fighting began along the Cambodian–Vietnamese border in 1977, probably instigated by the Cambodians. This led to renewed fighting in mid-1978, and in December 1978 a group calling itself the Kampuchean National United Front for National Salvation emerged.

As cross-border incidents increased, in December 1978 the Cambodian communists launched an attack on Vietnam. Their army was cut to pieces, which allowed the Vietnamese to attack Cambodia, driving back the Cambodian army and easily overrunning the country. In a fortnight, the Vietnamese had taken over some 90 percent of Cambodia, installing their pro-Vietnamese People’s Republic of Kampuchea (PRK) in Phnom Penh.

The Cambodian communists who were loyal to Pol Pot fled to the Thai border. The Vietnamese might have managed to destroy them had it not been for the timely intervention of China (which invaded northern Vietnam), but Pol Pot managed to rally together his forces and they started waging a guerilla war against the Vietnamese from 1979 until 1991. During that time they had the support of the Thai government and army, which used them as a bulwark against the possibility of Vietnam invading eastern Thailand.

Pol Pot and his group realized that they had the strong support of China, and Prince Norodom Sihanouk, whom they had held under house arrest, managed to speak up on their behalf at the United Nations, where he urged against the recognition of the PRK. By this time the leadership of Pol Pot’s communists was clearly in the hands of three people: Pol Pot, Ieng Sary (his former foreign minister), and Son Sen (the security chief). Together these three, often assisted by the wives of the latter two, managed to hold their supporters together. In 1981 they formed the Party of Democratic Kampuchea as their political force, and in 1982 they joined the formation of the Coalition Government of Democratic Kampuchea, a group that brought them together with two non-communist groups, united in their opposition to the PRK led by Heng Samrin and Hun Sen, two former Khmer Rouge who had sided with Vietnam. Pol Pot and Sary were both put on trial, in absentia, by the PRK, found guilty, and sentenced to death in 1979. Building on traditional Cambodian hatred of the Vietnamese, Pol Pot and his supporters denounced the influx of Vietnamese settlers into their country and the domination of the PRK by people with “Khmer bodies and Vietnamese minds.”

For much of the period from 1979 to 1991, the warfare conducted by the National Army of Democratic Kampuchea was of a limited guerilla nature. Gradually, as it started winning clashes and seizing more land, Hun Sen brought the PRK to the negotiating table. In 1991, the Paris Peace Agreement recognized the role of the Khmer Rouge and allowed it to participate in the running of the country. Khieu Samphan and Son Sen were appointed to the Supreme National Council, the body which symbolized the sovereignty of the country. The Party of Democratic Kampuchea was certainly going to take part in the 1993 elections, but when Khieu Samphan was nearly lynched when he returned to the country on November 27, 1991, it decided to pull out. Prior to the election, the Khmer Rouge launched a number of attacks on Vietnamese settlers, technically illegal immigrants in Cambodia, and this forced many ethnic Vietnamese to flee the country.

In 1993 Khmer Rouge supported any candidate who looked likely to defeat the former PRK officials' Cambodian People's Party. There is little doubt that this gave the royalist party FUNCINPEC a narrow but clear victory. The Cambodian People's Party, through a number of maneuvers, ensured that it remained in power by forming a coalition with FUNCINPEC. This initially marginalized the Khmer Rouge. In the run-up to the 1998 elections it looked as though FUNCINPEC might seek a political alliance with the Khmer Rouge. Amidst heightened speculation about a change in the political landscape, a Khmer Rouge leader, Son Sen, and his family were murdered on the orders of Pol Pot. Pol Pot was then put on show trial and jailed. Days later, with Prince Ranariddh, the prime minister, out of the country, the Cambodian People's Party of Hun Sen launched a preemptive strike, and in the coup d'état of July 5, 1997, turned on FUNCINPEC, murdering many of its leaders.

By this time it was clear that the Khmer Rouge movement had split. Hardliners under Ta Mok maintained their base at Anlong Veng, along the northern border with Thailand, and were supportive of FUNCINPEC. The others, under Ieng Sary, were centered at Kratie and formed a tacit understanding with Hun Sen. Evidence has emerged that the split might have been tactical, but it marked the end of the Khmer Rouge as a political force. In the immediate run-up to the 1998 elections, the Khmer Rouge carried out some small (and vicious) attacks on Vietnamese settlers, causing many of them to flee.

The 1998 election resulted in a narrow victory for the Cambodian People's Party, amidst many documented cases of ballot rigging and many more of vote "miscounting." With the formation of the Cambodian Genocide War Crimes Tribunal, many of the surviving leaders of the Khmer Rouge have been put on trial. Pol Pot, however, died on April 15, 1998.

Khomeini, Ayatollah Sayyid Ruhollah Mussau (1902–1989) and the Shi'ite Islamic Revolution

Lawrence Davidson

Ayatollah Sayyid Ruhollah Mussau Khomeini was the leader of the revolutionary movement that overthrew the Pahlavi dynasty of Iran in 1979. He instituted Shi'ia-based Islamic government in that country.

Ruhollah Mussau Khomeini was born in the small village of Khomein in central Iran on September 24, 1902. The Khomeini at the end of his name simply designates his village origin. He was born into a family that traced its lineage back to the prophet Muhammad through the line of the seventh Shi'ite Imam, Musa al-Kazem. The youngest of six children, he first attended a government school as well as a maktab, or religious school for children. In the maktab, Khomeini was taught a Shi'ite version of history that emphasized the historical wrongs done to the Shi'ite community within the context of an ongoing struggle between good and evil. All his studies past the elementary school level were of a religious nature. Intelligent, disciplined, and hard-working, in the early 1930s Khomeini became a recognized mujtahid, or learned interpreter of Islamic law.

Khomeini's early professional life was characterized by frustration over the corrupt and secular-oriented rule of the Pahlavi Shahs as well as the apparent passivity of the clerical establishment in the face of state repression. He remained in the background, however, out of deference to senior clerics. Meanwhile, in the course of his developing career as a teacher at various religious schools, he built up a considerable student following.

Khomeini began to be more vocal in his opposition to the government after World War II. The new and young Muhammad Reza Shah had just taken the throne, and Khomeini's seniority within the religious establishment was growing. It was at this time that he began to articulate the notion that "government can only be legitimate when it accepts the rule of God and the rule of God means the implementation of the Shari'a [Muslim law]." Soon he would become the recognized leader of clerical opposition to the Shah.

Khomeini's Worldview

Khomeini believed in an inner search for contact with God and an inner exploration of the true nature of reality. This striving carried over into a belief in the perfectibility of man and his institutions and the obligation of the enlightened leader to push the Muslim community in the direction of greater moral and social perfection. In his struggle with the Shah of Iran, he would turn this belief from theory into practice. Khomeini also saw the world in terms of a number of irreconcilable opposites. There was the division between the Islamic and the non-Islamic world, as well as that between the oppressed and the victims of injustice on the one side, and the oppressor and the perpetrator of injustice on the other. Khomeini saw the struggle against the Shah and his American ally in this context.

Indeed, in Khomeini's mind, Muhammad Reza Shah stood as a symbol of non-Islamic contamination by an exploitative alliance of westerners and upper-class Iranians who together were transforming Iran into a secular, materialistic place. In the process, he believed the Muslim Palace employees replace the portrait of Shah Reza Pahlavi with a portrait of the Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini at the Niavaran Palace in February 1979. The western-backed Shah fled Iran on January 16, 1979, and on February 1, Ayatollah Khomeini returned from exile in Paris to become the supreme spiritual leader of Iran soon after. way of life was being undermined and would ultimately be destroyed. This set the stage for what the Ayatollah saw as a literal struggle of good (Islam) against evil (the Shah and the West) in which the contest for political control of Iran was key to its cultural and religious fate.

Khomeini led a group of Islamic fundamentalists who organized as the Islamic Republican Party. Their analysis of Iran's situation in some ways resembled that of Hasan al-Banna in Egypt. Indeed, Khomeini had studied the history and philosophy of the society closely. Khomeini, however, would prove much more aggressive and bolder than had al-Banna. While al-Banna had believed that the Muslim Brothers should seek political power only when the Islamic consciousness of the Egyptian people was sufficiently reestablished, Khomeini adhered to no such qualification. Perhaps this was because, unlike al-Banna, who saw the source of sovereignty residing in the collective Muslim community, Khomeini placed sovereignty with God. The people needed to be guided by a religiously righteous government to do God's will. For Khomeini, the answer was first to overthrow the impious Shah and create a government dominated by the pious ulama. Then one would proceed to "purify" Iran of its "contamination."

To this end, Khomeini and his followers would develop a governmental system based on an Islamic constitution under which the Qur'an and Shari'a were to be the basis for all law. Also central to this scheme of government was the rule of the jurispudent (velayat-e faqih, guardianship of the supreme religious leader). As Khomeini explained, this office would function as the final arbiter within society. In the fundamentalist government that would soon rule Iran, the jurispudent would be constitutionally endowed with the power to command the armed forces, declare war and peace, control the Guardian Council that would approve or disapprove (on the basis of its Islamic compatibility) all legislation coming from the legislative assembly (Majles), and appoint the state prosecutor, chief of the Supreme Court, as well as other key members of the judiciary. He would also be able to dismiss the elected president of the country.

The jurispudent would not be accountable to the people of Iran, and so no mechanism would exist to prevent abuse of his power. He was to be accountable only to God. Of course, it was assumed that the jurispudent would be wise enough to make abuse of power an impossibility. The privileged position of the jurispudent stood at the apex of a system designed to ensure the dominance of the Muslim clerics (ulama) and those who accepted the premise that Iranian society must be thoroughly Muslim in the fundamentalist sense outlined by Khomeini. Candidates for all offices would be screened according to religious criteria. Government agents were expected to be creative and innovative only within the predetermined boundaries of accepted premises – that is, God had already revealed in the Qur'an which contained the basic legislation necessary for the good life. This legislation had long been elaborated and interpreted in the Shari'a (Islamic law). The main job of the government was to implement that divine legislation. The challenge was a tactical one.

Making a Revolution

In the early 1960s, and at the urging of President John F. Kennedy, the Shah initiated a series of secular reforms that included women's suffrage and the confiscation of clerically managed property. This began an escalating confrontation between the government and the Shi'ite ulama of whom Khomeini was now a militant leader. The Shah's government dealt with Khomeini's role in the growing unrest by sending him into exile. In the late 1970s, President Jimmy Carter put pressure on the Shah to rule in a less autocratic fashion. Once more the Shah felt obliged to respond at least superficially to the American president. Thus, in 1977, he moved to reduce press censorship, liberalize court proceedings (fewer secret trials before military tribunals), end the use of torture, and allow the Red Cross to visit Iranian prisons. This sudden liberalization of a longstanding repressive system emboldened the Shah's opposition. Both secular and Islamic groups came to believe that the Shah no longer had the unquestioning support of the United States and thus was no longer invincible. Coincidentally, this process of loosening the repressive bonds came at a time of economic downturn due to falling oil prices. Economic discontent fed renewed political protest.

The renewed protests of 1977 were at first non-violent and essentially reformist in their demands. The initial aim, pushed by the secular opposition, was to transform the government into a constitutional monarchy. But then, in January 1978, two Teheran newspapers published a government-inspired attack on Khomeini, accusing him of being an "agent of colonialism" and a "traitor of non-Persian descent." A peaceful protest against these accusations by theology students in the city of Qum turned violent when police arrived. Many died, and hundreds were injured in the incident. Far from deterring Khomeini's supporters, the clash with police sparked new protests in other cities. Khomeini, whom the government sought to vilify, was instead turned into a nationwide symbol of resistance.

From this point on, Khomeini, who was now in exile in France, skillfully coordinated the evolution of a united front of opposition groups. He pushed a relentless strategy of direct confrontation with the Shah. In the face of this growing movement, the Shah was neither relentless nor direct. He vacillated between repression and compromise. Given that he had created a system of one-man rule where all others were discouraged from acting independently, such vacillation would prove fatal.

By late 1978 the continuing protests had escalated into national strikes involving the bazaaries (traditional business community), public employees, oil industry workers, and others. The factories shut down, public services were interrupted, and heating oil became scarce as winter set in. At this point, Khomeini, then orchestrating events from Paris, made it clear that the Shah's regime had to go. He had declared that monarchy was incompatible with Islam. The leaders of the secular opposition concurred with the demand, though not with the religious reasons Khomeini offered. There was less enthusiasm among them when Khomeini followed up his demand for the Shah's removal with the assertion that what the revolution was to put in his place was an Islamic Republic. But by this time (November 1978) Khomeini was nearly unstoppable. On December 10 and 11, 1978, massive peaceful demonstrations involving millions of people took place in all the major cities of Iran. These demonstrations applauded Khomeini's leadership and called for a new government based on the tenets of Islam. A little over a month later, on January 16, 1979, the Shah left Iran for good.

Soon thereafter, on February 1, 1979, Khomeini returned from exile to Iran. There would follow an interim period of provisional government during which Khomeini and his followers consolidated power through the creation of revolutionary Islamic institutions such as the Komites (vigilante committees that sprang up in neighborhoods, factories, schools, and universities), revolutionary courts, and the Pasdaran (a powerful party militia also called the Revolutionary Guards). Slowly, the secular opposition and the more moderate ulama were pushed aside. More forceful opposition to Khomeini, which came from organized groups on the left, was violently suppressed.

In April 1979 a national referendum asking simply "Do you favor an Islamic Republic or a monarchy?" was held. According to reported results, 98.2 percent of 15.7 million votes cast were in favor of an Islamic Republic. Subsequently, an Assembly of Experts was elected to write a draft constitution. This assembly was dominated by members of Khomeini's Islamic Republican Party.

The constitution that it created was thoroughly Islamic and contained the unique and powerful post of jurisprudent. Khomeini would be the first to hold this all-powerful position and through it rule Iran. As ruler of Iran from 1978 to his death on June 3, 1989, Khomeini strove to create an institutionally stable Islamic state. In doing so, he found that he had to make compromises with his ideal of perfection. In the realization of the Islamic state, God took a vengeful form.

Subsequent events seemed to encourage the evolving autocratic direction of the Islamic government. The American embassy in Teheran was seized by militant Muslim students in late 1979. While this was not done on the orders of Khomeini, he did decide to go along with the action after the fact. The embassy seizure had been triggered by the admittance of the Shah into the United States in October. The Shah was fatally ill with cancer at this time and, after brief stays in Egypt, Morocco, and Mexico, he sought permission to enter the United States for medical treatment. This triggered a debate within the Carter administration. The US government had reliable information that admitting the Shah would cause a crisis in Iranian-US relations and very likely lead to some form of retaliation against American citizens and property in Iran. Nonetheless, under great pressure from the Shah's friends in Congress and other influential Americans (particularly Henry Kissinger), the Carter administration granted permission for the Shah to come to the United States. In Iran, this decision was seen as a provocation and the result was the embassy seizure and the holding hostage of its 63 resident Americans. This hostage crisis lasted for 444 days.

Before the hostage situation could be resolved, Iraq invaded Iran in September 1980, thereby beginning a long (1980–8) and destructive war. All of these events intensified the Islamic revolutionaries' sense of religious and national purpose and were used to label all opposition to the new Islamic regime as traitorous. By 1983 all political groups except the Islamic Republican Party and its immediate allies had been destroyed or driven underground.

Islamic Fundamentalism Comes to Power

Revolutionary Shi'ite Islamic fundamentalism is now in power in Iran. At least in this one case, we can see how such a politically empowered Islamic society might look and act. In social and cultural terms, the Islamic Republic of Iran has sought to create a new society wherein the citizens' values, outlook, and behavior are guided by Shari'a law. To this end, the Iranians voided all non-Islamic laws created since 1907 and required that all judicial judgments had to flow from the Qur'an, accepted hadith, or Shi'ite-based theological precedents.

An outward public morality is enforced. The Islamic Republic established an Office for the Propagation of Virtues and Prevention of Sins, which is empowered to assure that public behavior accords with Islamic moral standards. Not abiding by the Islamic dress code (in the case of women this means wearing a full-body-length loose-fitting robe called the chador, and men must wear modest, loose-fitting clothing) when appearing in public or other obvious non-Islamic behavior can result in harassment or arrest. In addition, bars, discos, nightclubs, and the like have been shut down. Western films are banned or censored, modern music is prohibited, and alcohol forbidden.

In June 1989, after guiding the Islamic state for a decade, the Ayatollah Khomeini died. His death led to a fracturing of forces within the fundamentalist camp that has persisted over time. As with all revolutionary movements, what might look from the outside to be a united effort on the inside really is a multifaceted affair. Since Khomeini's death there has been an ongoing competition for power between conservative and moderate factions, with a pragmatic group of technocrats in the middle.

Whatever their political persuasion, the majority of Iranians recognize Ruhollah Khomeini's seminal role in shaping today's Iran. That he sought the well-being of the masses of Iranian people, particularly the poor, is generally accepted by most of those who study this period of Iranian history. And there can be no doubt that his legacy goes far beyond Iran, for his success continues to inspire Islamic fundamentalists throughout the Muslim world.

Khuda-i Khidmatgar: Pashtun non-violent resistance force (1929–1948)

Sruti Bala

Origins and Structure

The Khuda-i Khidmatgar (KK), in the Pashto language "Servants of God," was a unique formation as an unarmed resistance force with roots in an Islamic interpretation of non-violent politics. It pledged itself to non-violent resistance to British rule and to the reform of Pashtun, also known as Pathan society (the dominant ethnolinguistic group in eastern and southern Afghanistan and in the Northwest Frontier (NWF) Province of today's Pakistan). Launched in 1929 as the interventionist wing of a broader social reform and Pashtun youth movement, the KK was banned in 1948, following independence from British rule and the partition of the subcontinent. At different points in its brief 18-year history, the KK was partly the representative office of the NWF section of the Indian National Congress (Congress); at other moments it was a social welfare organization, as well as an unarmed, rurally based, anti-colonial protest force. At its peak in the 1930s, KK membership was estimated at 25,000, consisting mostly of men but also a few hundred women. Membership was open primarily to Pashtuns, but though most of the KK members and office holders were Muslims, there were also some Hindu and Sikh recruits. Despite being a voluntary civil movement with an explicitly pacifist and reformist agenda, the KK was often referred to as an army because of its organizational characteristics and institutional structure. Yet, as evident from press reports in the 1930s, the KK was more often suspected to be allied to the Bolsheviks, as a military-like protest and resistance force.

Background to the Region's Colonization

The rising political disturbances and clan-based feuds and violence in the region at the beginning of the twentieth century was a direct consequence of colonial laws and interference with the traditional land distribution system of the Pashtuns, known as wesh, and its related rules of social authority and ownership. The annexation of the NWF Province region bordering Afghanistan in the second half of the nineteenth century gave way to the emergence of small landed elites, patronized and appointed by the British, who controlled and administered the province on behalf of the British in return for favors and privileges. The ruling elite emerged as a group of powerful landlords who fought with each other and increased rivalry among their clans. Ignoring traditional tribal authorities such as the jirga and introducing their own methods of punishment and control, including levies, fines, and even imprisonment, they gradually created a new culture of conflict and its own rules of settlement. The jirga's traditional focus on limiting conflicts and blame, and the practice of resolving feuds without punishment, soon diminished in relevance.

Special regulations were introduced in the NWF Province to curb what was termed in colonial vocabulary as tribal violence, unrest, and inter-clan fighting. These regulations, such as the Frontier Crimes Regulation Act or the Tranquility Act, first introduced in 1872, directly limited civil liberties, sanctioned punishments and mass arrests without trial or legal support, and placed heavy restrictions on the free assembly of Pashtuns. With these regulations, violence and anti-British sentiment increased.

Abdul Ghaffar Khan

The founder of the movement, Khan Abdul Ghaffar Khan (1890–1988), was an active member of the Congress and a close ally to Gandhi.

His political activism became prominent with the founding of reform schools, not controlled by the Muslim clergy or British missionaries and promoting education in the Pashto language. These were also the first schools open to educating girls and accessible to the rural poor in the region. The brothers Abdul Ghaffar Khan and Dr. Khan Sahib belonged to a well-placed landowning family, and were active in the reform movements Anjuman-I-Islah-ul-Afghana (Society for Afghan Reform, founded 1921) and the Zalmo Jirga (Youth League, formed in 1929). Abdul Ghaffar Khan became a widely respected leader, not only for his reform activities, but because he refused privileges and wealth and chose to live a simple life dedicated to the service of his Pashtun community.

He established the KK with the professed aim of creating a united, independent, secular India, along with Pashtun autonomy. As its commander-in-chief, Khan traveled to the most inaccessible villages of the Pashtun-dominated districts, addressing large gatherings of supporters, greeting new recruits, visiting schools, and consulting with local jirga leaders. Profoundly influenced by the striking power of the Gandhian non-violent strategy of satyagraha, Ghaffar Khan, as a devout Muslim, grounded his principled non-violence in teachings of Islam, without however politicizing Islam. Satyagraha was a program of peaceful violation of specific laws, mass courting of arrests, occasional hartals (general shutdown or strike), and spectacular demonstrations or rallies. He was popularly addressed as Badshah (Urdu) or Bacha (Pashto) Khan, “King of Kings,” Khan also being a title for members of respected landowner families. He was an outspoken and fearless critic of British policies and later bitterly opposed the idea of the Partition of India and Pakistan. For his political actions and opinions, Khan spent more than 30 years of his life in prison, both during British rule as well as following independence. When Khan died on January 20, 1988 in Jalalabad in Afghanistan, a ceasefire was announced during the raging war, and the borders to India and Pakistan were declared open to allow for masses of supporters from all parts of the subcontinent to attend the funeral of a leader whose life had by then become steeped in myth. His radical dream of Pashtun autonomy and of a society that could defend itself purely by the strength of civilian effort remains one yet to be accomplished.

Military Organization and Structure

The KK aimed at independence from British domination and the reform of Pashtun society to establish a degree of political autonomy and self-rule. Whereas the Zalmu Jirga (Youth League) mainly consisted of the educated and landed elite, the KK accommodated the peasant and rural population in a voluntary action force, particularly in protest against the civil rights restrictions imposed through the Frontier Crimes Regulation Act. Further, the KK trained its members in community work and civil service.

The movement had a militant and a social wing, each with a different set-up and division of roles and tasks. The militant wing participated in visible protest actions, where the risk to personal safety was high and direct or indirect confrontation with armed forces was a threat, such as demonstrations, blockades, or as unarmed guards. The social wing concentrated on community or educational services and social work. The KK was hierarchically organized, using a combination of both the traditional model of the jirga with local village elders in commanding positions, as well as colonial military structures with posts such as that of lieutenant, colonel, general, or commander. Since most of the recruits of the army were from the grassroots, including peasants and landed or landless laborers, and mobility was restricted, there were committees and branches in every village and sub-district. The KK funded itself through voluntary contributions and donations of well-placed members and supporters. An economy based on solidarity and recognition of status also played an important role in creating the cohesion and collective engagement of the KK.

The thrust of the KK activities was in visible public disobedience and disregard of colonial laws. Foot soldiers traveled from village to village, persuading influential Pashtun landlords and local authorities to resign from government posts and not accept favors from British officers. They picketed and raided courts and other colonial institutions, calling for boycotts of British goods and non-cooperation with authorities. When challenged by armed policemen, KK soldiers sought arrest en masse. It was also common practice for KK activists to conduct flag marches through the same areas where British police forces conducted their patrols. They held mass public gatherings throughout the NWF

Province, with speeches, poetry readings, performances of patriotic Pashto plays, and community singing. They wore uniforms made of hand-spun cloth dyed in a reddish brown color from the local leather factory, which gave them the mostly derogative title of the Surkh Posh (Red Shirts). Women members wore black clothes. Visibility, not camouflage, was the key characteristic of the protest acts of the KK. The presence of KK guards in red uniforms enhanced their authority and credibility in the public sphere, particularly in areas of tension and social unrest, or at the arbitration of clan feuds.

Training in Non-Violence

Regular camps were run, attended by up to 1,000 KK soldiers from several villages, who gathered for several days at a stretch, undergoing disciplinary training by way of drilling and physical exercises, parades, and regional patrols. They received schooling on the anti-imperialist struggle and the political principles of non-violence. As a youth movement, the KK sought to demilitarize and disarm an area where it was considered necessary for every respectable male Pashtun to carry a rifle. Traditionally, Pashtuns served in one of the most prestigious British army regiments, known as the Corps of Guides. The Congress Committee Reports from the NWF region document the reintegration of several ex-army men as trainers in the camps of the KK. The quasi-conversion of combatants or ex-servicemen to the fold of non-violent civilian resistance was a part of the strategy of the peace force. Rather than disqualify persons with a background in the British military, their experiences and skills were integrated into the activities of the KK camps, which placed great emphasis on physical fitness and discipline.

The KK camps were publicity events in themselves, attracting crowds of onlookers, creating a spectacle out of the military-style camps. Ritualistic aspects of the military, such as conferring ranks and badges of honor, were adapted and transformed into Pashtun emblems of dignity. Yet the omission of the most obvious part of military training, namely the use of weapons, made the protest movement into a statement of pacifist defiance.

The work profile of a “Servant of God” also consisted of a reform program including religiously endorsed practices and obligations (Islahi), such as cooking for and feeding the poor. This program was extended to adopt Gandhian ideas of constructive non-violence, such as hand-spinning, weaving, prayer, and fasting, in addition to elements such as village sanitation drives, and maintenance and improvement of village infrastructure.

The Pakhtun, the monthly journal of the KK movement in the Pashto language, was repeatedly banned, stopped, and systematically destroyed by both the British and Pakistani rulers. No single library possesses the complete file of all issues of the journal from May 1928 to August 1947. Abdul Ghaffar Khan, his son, Ghani Khan, apart from other KK members, wrote regularly for the journal. The articles dealt with a vast array of topics, ranging from poetry to personal health and hygiene, village sanitation, educational reform, and current affairs. A search for Pashtun identity and sense of community, free from violence and oppression, marked the profile of the journal.

Servants, Servers, or Servicemen?

Importance was given to the notion of khidmat, or service to the community, to a cause greater than oneself, a concept with direct reference to Islamic tenets. The religious and cultural connotations of the notion of serving the community are crucial to understanding the acts of the non-violent army. The non-violent philosophy of the Pashtuns was not a matter of individual soul-searching and achievement, but an ideal and a principle for the entire community, stressing shared suffering and experience of discrimination, and hence requiring a collective effort. This is in clear contrast to the primarily individualistic approach that Gandhi adopted in his non-violent politics.

The use of the term Khidmatgar also describes a rewriting and punctuation of the colonial vocabulary. In government contracts or documents it was used to denote on the one hand lower-class, menial or domestic laborers, as well as civil servants, usually upper- or middle-class English-educated administrators. The term also referred to servicemen, implying army recruits. In calling the non-violent resisters by the same name as those who cooperated with the colonizers, the KK appropriated a social role, giving it a completely different meaning and relevance.

The concept of the servant or the server being devoted to a larger cause of the community is common to both the military and a religious group. Like the military, KK servicemen were required voluntarily to subordinate themselves and obey orders without question; however, being a voluntary association, they were theoretically allowed to leave without punishment. The social and peer pressure to stay in the movement was, however, extremely high, in spite of the repressive persecution by the British. Non-violent resistance was a high-risk commitment. The line between consent and coercion in maintaining membership of the army was arguably thin. Even if there were no authorities to persecute someone for desertion from service to the resistance force, families and the larger community placed immense pressure to maintain the momentum of KK agitations. This aspect is more akin to the mechanisms of a religious community, where sanctions are often indirect and subtle.

Transforming a Culture of Violence

Every recruit to the KK took an oath to become a Servant of God, to refrain from touching weapons, from taking revenge, or engaging in clan-based feuds by becoming a servant of humanity. Further, the oath committed every member to a certain number of hours of community work on a daily basis, as well as to a frugal lifestyle, sacrificing wealth and comfort for the service of the community. The oath was taken with hands placed on the Quran but without any reference to religious identity. There was in fact not even any mention of national independence. The oath sought to establish a new sense of Pashtun identity, using and deriving legitimacy from existing elements of Pashtunwali (Pashtun culture). Interestingly, an idea such as nang (integrity), which previously justified revenge and bloodshed, was reframed as a non-violent principle. So the very same culture that upheld the image of an armed Pashtun warrior was able to generate the role model of an unarmed Pashtun soldier and citizen. The pacifist praxis of the KK was not characterized by a total rejection of anything related to violent institutions. Rather, the critique of the military was performed through a reconstitution of what it meant to be a fighter, or to sign up for combat.

An Islamic Understanding of Non-Violence

A common question asked of Abdul Ghaffar Khan was how far the idea of non-violence was coherent with or derivable from Islam. When Khan used the term in his speeches, he usually meant Gandhian ahimsa (non-injury). However, the term used more frequently is sabr (patience, endurance, or self-restraint). This religiously connoted term refers to patient, individual suffering of hardships without complaint, or enduring false accusations and trouble caused by others, and steadfastness in pursuing an Islamic way of life and mission. The way in which Khan used the notion of sabr is probably conceptually the closest to non-violence. Adapted as a proactive idea, the concept is not just limited to non-injury of others, while it includes the idea of self-restraint and control of aggression. This also suggests a new or better form of masculinity, whereas traditionally, patience as in forbearance is a feminine attribute. Most significantly, sabr, as opposed to the notion of passive toleration of injustice and unwarranted suffering, is directly interpreted as a weapon, as sanctioned by Islam, and as the instrument fit to use against the weapons of the colonial power. Self-restraint and self-control in the face of aggression are also interestingly written into the discourse of trained bodily discipline, which then draws the link to military training. For a people historically marked as primitive, excessive, and uncontrollably violent, the show of discipline and control itself is a way of protesting against the stereotypes and quasi-rationalizations of repressions against them. While seeking recognition for non-violence as a method of combat, this organization involved itself in the process of religious and cultural legitimization to negotiate a new interpretation of Pashtun identity, of what it meant to “do Pashto.” In doing so, it asserted that non-violence was rooted both in Pashtun and Islamic tradition.

The model of non-violent action practiced in the army of the KK was notably different from Gandhian non-violence, often perceived as its inspiring model. While Abdul Ghaffar Khan may indeed have admired and respected Gandhi as an individual and professed affiliation to his political goals, his interpretation of non-violence within the Pashtun social set-up was closely connected to Islamic principles of service to humanity and of forbearance, as well as to uniquely Pashtun concepts of integrity, citizenship, and social cohesion.

Local Before the National

While Islamic principles strongly influenced not only the leadership of the KK but also the kind of activities that it pursued, it was not an organization dedicated to promoting political Islam. Despite referring to themselves as the Servants of God and unhesitatingly locating their working principles in an Islamic code of social conduct and engagement, the KK did not strive to unite all Muslims. It emphasized faith-based social commitment in equal measure to resisting political oppression. In spite of its entire nationalist, anti-imperialist ethos, the KK was meant to be a local organization, aiming at the complete self-sufficiency and autonomy of the Pashtun community, which included creating a sense of solidarity and dignity, as well as economic and administrative independence.

The organization was impervious to the idea of Muslims as a separate political community and never saw Pashtunistan (the Land of the Pashtuns) as a Muslim land. This gave the KK and particularly its leadership the reputation of being a pro-Hindu lackey among Pakistani nationalists. It also saw the organization in an uncomfortable position with the Congress Party during late 1946 and 1947, when the idea of Partition had gained popularity and many Congress leaders supported the move, while Abdul Ghaffar Khan bitterly opposed the Partition and the formation of a Pakistani state. The KK became unpopular with the Muslim League and the proponents of the two-nation theory supporting the Partition of India and Pakistan. Yet Khan refused to leave his Pashtun homeland and migrate to India after Partition and opted for Pakistani citizenship.

The KK and Indian Freedom Struggle

The relationship between the KK and the all-India freedom struggle was complex. For the British, the NWF Province was a vital area, on one hand due to its role as the frontier, with Soviet Russia just beyond Afghanistan, and on the other hand because the Pashtuns were a major component of their military recruitment. They therefore tried their best to smash the movement. To do this, in 1930, during the civil disobedience movement, they brought in upper-caste Hindu Garhwali troops, who however refused to fire on the unarmed Khidmatgars. From 1932 the involvement of women in the movement also posed a problem for the British, as many Indian officers were reluctant to use violence on women. The British, however, were undeterred, and bombed a village, as well as arresting thousands of KK activists. Close connections developed between the Congress and the KK from the civil disobedience period. Ghaffar Khan's brother Dr. Khan Saheb led the Congress to victory in the 1937 elections. In 1939 his government was one of several Congress governments that resigned. In the NWF Province this had the effect of strengthening the hands of opponents of the KK. They were aided by the British, who shifted from repression to communal propaganda, arguing that collaboration with Hindus would mean blows against the traditional Muslim and tribal culture of the region. These problems were compounded by a factional conflict inside the KK, when Ghaffar Khan wanted his son to be the leader of Pakhtun Zalemy, the youth organization affiliated to the KK, though Salar Aslam Khan had been elected. Collectively, these factors meant a relative strengthening of their opponents. However, despite this, the KK had considerable strength. In the immediate pre-Partition period, Khan wanted the option of voting for a separate Pathan state, and when this was not given, called for a boycott. Only a minority took part in the plebiscite that decided that the NWF Province would go to Pakistan. This made Khan and the KK permanently suspicious in the eyes of the Pakistan government, which eventually smashed the movement by persecution as well as support to its opponents.

Kim Joa-jin (1889–1930)

O. H. Jang-Whan

Kim Joa-jin (aka “Baekya”), an anarchist military leader sometimes compared to Nestor Makhno, is largely remembered as a Korean patriot, particularly for his achievements as general and commander of the Korean Independent Army in Manchuria. Born to a wealthy family, he was inspired by ideas of social justice from an early age, setting free his family's slaves at the age of 18. Entering the fight for independence from Japan, in 1919 he organized the Buk-ro gun-jung-sea (Northern Military Administration Office Army) and founded a military academy to train Korean soldiers against the Japanese army. The next year he became a national hero when his army wiped out an entire division of the Japanese Imperial Army at Chungsan-ri in Manchuria, winning the Koreans' first military victory against the Japanese army since 1876. At this time, he became increasingly influenced by the anarchist ideas of his close relative Kim Jong-jin. In 1925 he organized the Sin-min-bu (New People's Society) to build a new society along egalitarian and libertarian lines. In 1929 he formed the Han-jok chong-yun-hap-hoi (General League of Koreans) in Manchuria, supported by all Korean anarchists in China, to form a new commune-type organization. For the first time in Korean history, he attempted to put anarchist ideas into practice in rural villages in the Shinmin province of Manchuria (where some 2 million Koreans lived), establishing an autonomous region which lasted from 1929 to 1931. In 1930 Kim was assassinated by a Communist Party agent while repairing a cooperative's rice mill.

King, Martin Luther, Jr. (1929–1968) and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC)

Susan Love Brown

Martin Luther King, Jr. was the most prominent leader of the modern civil rights movement in the twentieth century in the United States, largely because of his charismatic preaching, adherence to the principles of non-violence, engagement in the most important civil rights struggles, and martyrdom in the cause of human rights, peace, and freedom. Through the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) of which he was a co-founder and president, he and other religious leaders gave the civil rights movement its strong moral foundation, insisting on the use of non-violence as an overall strategy and carrying out workshops to train potential protestors. After King's assassination in 1968 the SCLC continued to carry on this work. King's family history within the Baptist ministry, his education, his adoption of a social gospel, being in the right place at the right time, and his association with a group of strong leaders all contributed to his prominence and the work of the SCLC.

Early Life and Education

King was born on January 15, 1929 in Atlanta, Georgia to the Reverend Martin Luther King, Sr. and Alberta Williams King. He was the second of three children, flanked by his older sister Christine King Farris and his younger brother, the late Alfred Daniel Williams King (known as A.D.). His maternal grandfather and great grandfather had been ministers, as was his father. His father came from a family of share-croppers. King was educated in Atlanta at the Daniel T. Howard Elementary School, the Atlanta University Laboratory School, and Booker T. Washington High School. He has been described by some as precocious, skipping the 9th and 12th grades and graduating from high school at the age of 15. He went on to Morehouse College, where he first read about Gandhi and Henry David Thoreau, earning a degree in sociology in 1948 at the age of 19, and becoming an ordained minister and an associate pastor of the Ebenezer Baptist Church. Although King had been a mediocre student at Morehouse, he blossomed at Crozer Theological Seminary, where he read the work of Walter Rauschenbusch (Christianity and Crisis, 1907) and Reinhold Niebuhr (Moral Man and Immoral Society, 1932). He also became acquainted with Mohandas K. Gandhi in India and his non-violent philosophy. These three influences would help King formulate his own social gospel and non-violent approach.

King was class valedictorian, graduating in 1951 with a divinity degree, and earning a scholarship that allowed him to continue his studies in systematic theology at Boston University, where he rediscovered Gandhi and non-violence. While in Boston he met Coretta Scott, an Alabama native who had graduated from Oberlin College and was studying at the New England Conservatory of Music. They married on June 18, 1953. King earned his PhD in 1955.

Montgomery Bus Boycott

Although King was associate pastor of the Ebenezer Baptist Church in Atlanta, his father's church, he took a job at the Dexter Avenue Baptist Church in Montgomery, Alabama in 1954 while writing his dissertation. This ministry put him in the right place at the right time for what he came to see as his destiny. He joined the local branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and joined its executive committee but declined a leadership role because of his ministerial duties. He was 26 years old when the Montgomery bus boycott began. Both Jo Ann Gibson Robinson of the Women's Political Council (WPC) and Rufus Lewis, head of the Citizen's Steering Committee, were members of King's church. The Montgomery bus boycott began on December 5, 1955 when the WPC decided, upon Rosa

An icon of the American civil rights movement, the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. (1929–68) relied on non-violence, patience, and optimism to win support for the cause. Parks’ arrest for refusing to yield her seat to a white bus rider, that the time had come to protest the treatment of black people on the city’s buses. They sought the support of local ministers for their protest. King was named president of the newly formed Montgomery Improvement Association (MIA), largely because he was new in town, well spoken, and not a part of any faction within the local black community.

According to Ralph Abernathy, King spoke at length about the importance of non-violence the first night of the boycott at a rally held at the Holt Street Baptist Church:

That lesson was crucial. We were asking these people to go into the streets and to accept whatever punishment the white community had to offer, whether jail or beating or death, and we were asking them to take the risk without every raising a hand in their own defense. So it was only fair that they understand thoroughly why they were being asked to do something so contrary to human nature. . . . It was absolutely essential that the decent people in the community, as well as in the nation at large, see Jim Crow for what it really was – an oppressive system maintained by the persistent threat of violence. It was that violence we wanted to expose. For only when it came out from behind the mask of legalism and respectability could people of good will fully understand our predicament and act to free us. This is the lesson Martin taught that night. (Abernathy 1989: 152)

The Montgomery bus boycott gave King the opportunity to test his ideas about non-violence in action, and its successful outcome provided the impetus for further non-violent protest throughout the South. King also reported that his life’s mission was realized during the boycott.

King and his family quickly became targets of violence by some local whites. He was arrested on trumped-up charges of speeding when he participated in the carpool set up by the MIA. He was indicted and arrested for violating an anti-boycott law, and his house was bombed with his wife and children inside. After the Supreme Court had ordered the buses to be desegregated, the violence continued, with someone shooting through the front door of King’s house, sniping at black bus passengers, and even bombing Ralph Abernathy’s house.

Move to Atlanta and the SCLC

Following the successful ending of the bus boycott, King and other civil rights activists met in Atlanta and later New Orleans and eventually formed, in 1957, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC). This loosely structured organization was designed to serve as a coordinator for all civil rights actions. It had a very deep commitment to non-violent direct action as a protest strategy and always provided training workshops in non-violent techniques for potential demonstrators. With headquarters in the Savoy Hotel on Auburn Avenue in Atlanta, organized by veteran activist Ella Baker, the SCLC worked with other organizations and ministers around the country. The SCLC was run solely on donations, raised largely through King’s personal appearances around the country. Although it had some paid staff members from time to time, especially when it hired people at the site of local protests, it was usually underfunded and often on the verge of bankruptcy, especially when funds were used to pay bail for arrested demonstrators, keeping its money constantly in short supply.

Under the auspices of the SCLC, King, Abernathy, and a host of other ministers and activists began their campaigns to desegregate the South. The movement to desegregate buses and waiting rooms for interstate travel, boycott merchants in downtown areas, and the push for voter registration were all part of the activities that SCLC supported in conjunction with national organizations such as the NAACP, the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE), and the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) and whatever local groups sought their assistance.

In 1957 King's picture appeared on the cover of Time magazine, and in 1958 King's first book, Stride Toward Freedom: The Montgomery Story, was published. During a book-signing event in Harlem, King survived a near-fatal stabbing by a mentally deranged woman, hospitalizing him. In 1959 King and his wife visited India, meeting Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru and undertaking training in Gandhian non-violence. King resigned from his ministry at the Dexter Avenue Baptist Church on February 1, 1960 to take up permanent residence in Atlanta as co-pastor of the Ebenezer Baptist Church and president of the SCLC.

After four students in Greensboro, North Carolina, staged a spontaneous sit-in at the segregated lunch counter in F. W. Woolworth's on February 1, 1960, and other students across the South began to follow suit, the SCLC, through the offices of Ella Baker, hosted a conference at Shaw University in Raleigh, North Carolina, that tried to capture the momentum of this movement through the formation of the SNCC. King, whom students knew about and admired because of his participation in the Montgomery bus boycott, was a keynote speaker. The SCLC and SNCC would be involved in a number of civil rights activities in the years to come, and the SCLC was successful in passing on its non-violence ideology and practice to the students. However, as the civil rights movement progressed, King and the SCLC would be perceived as too moderate in their approach. Indeed, King saw his and the SCLC's role as moderating between complacency and violence – the only way to bring about change in a principled way.

In 1961 CORE organized Freedom Rides in order to desegregate facilities served by interstate transportation, namely buses. Members of the SNCC also participated, along with some Northern volunteers. King became directly involved in the Freedom Rides of 1961 when he returned to Montgomery for a rally on behalf of the freedom riders who had been denied further passage by the bus companies and had been attacked by white mobs. This event turned into an all-night siege at Ralph Abernathy's First Baptist Church when thousands of whites blockaded the church, burned cars, and broke windows, and US marshals were brought in to rescue the people in the church.

Following success in desegregating the buses in Montgomery, King and the SCLC also experienced setbacks. One of these occurred in Albany, Georgia, where the SCLC joined with the SNCC and the NAACP in a campaign against segregated facilities at bus stations in the wake of a ruling by the Interstate Commerce Commission (ICC) that all such facilities must desegregate. Although the ruling was made, city officials of Albany, as in many Southern cities, refused to comply. When SNCC members attempted to use the facilities, they were placed under arrest. Local supporters of the Albany movement were also arrested. The SCLC was asked to join the local movement with the hopes of gaining additional local support, but their efforts were thwarted by the arrest of more than 700 people, including King and Abernathy, who were imprisoned, found guilty, and fined several times. Lack of cooperation among the groups involved, lackluster support from the local black community, and the refusal of city officials even to meet with black leaders doomed the movement to failure. However, this encounter taught those involved the importance of focusing their attention on specific issues, presenting a united front, and the importance of outside assistance from the federal government and the news media.

Birmingham Campaign

Perhaps the most visible civil rights campaign involving King and the SCLC since the bus boycott took place in Birmingham, Alabama. At the urging of Reverend Fred Shuttlesworth, one of the founders of the SCLC and pastor of the Bethel Baptist Church, the SCLC decided to undertake the desegregation of Birmingham stores in April 1963. The protest began with lunch counter sit-ins and demands for fair hiring practices in the stores and in Birmingham city government, the desegregation of parks, and the dismissal of charges against those who had been jailed for the initial sit-ins. King and Abernathy and some of the local clergy and SCLC supporters, in defiance of local and state law, participated in the protests. They were arrested, and it was while he was incarcerated that King wrote his famous “Letter from a Birmingham Jail” on toilet paper and had it smuggled out of the jail.

King’s “Letter from a Birmingham Jail” became one of the classic pieces of civil rights literature. Written in response to a letter written by white clergymen urging a cessation of the demonstrations, King pointed out all of the reasons why African Americans could no longer wait, the virtue in non-violent direct action, and the difference between just and unjust laws. He expressed his profound disappointment in the white clergy for not supporting the civil rights movement. The letter is a model of reason and eloquence and a strong rebuke to those who felt that it was not the role of the church to become involved in social issues.

As the protests continued, and more and more people were arrested, the movement added hundreds of young people to its ranks of demonstrators in its Children’s Crusade. The children, too, were led off to jail in buses. When the jails were full and could hold no more protestors, the police, led by police commissioner Bull Connor, used dogs and fire hoses to stop the protests. The confrontations of the protestors with police and dogs in front of television cameras, the massive number of arrests, and the stiff fines and jail sentences captured the attention of the nation and forced the involvement of the John F. Kennedy administration, whose advisors strong-armed Birmingham business people. The combination of negative national publicity, declining profits for businesses, and pressure from the rest of the country led to an agreement to desegregate store fitting rooms and lunch counters, remove signs from restrooms and drinking fountains, and to upgrade black employment.

As many as 3,000 blacks had been jailed for their participation in these protests, and their bail was paid by a donation from the United Auto Workers (UAW) at the behest of President Kennedy. In the face of the possibility of federal involvement, Birmingham government officials eventually desegregated such public facilities as public schools, golf courses, and the library and promised to consider improvement in black employment by the city. However, the hotel that King and Abernathy were staying in was destroyed by a bomb on the day they left town, and the Reverend A. D. King’s home was bombed as well. Later that year, on September 15, 1963, one of the many tragedies of the civil rights movement occurred when a bomb at the Sixteenth Street Baptist Church in Birmingham killed Addie Mae Collins, Denise McNair, Carole Robertson, and Cynthia Wesley, four young girls who were attending Sunday school. At least twenty other people were injured, many of them children. King delivered a eulogy at the services held for them.

March on Washington and the Civil Rights Act of 1964

On Wednesday, August 28, 1963 members of the civil rights movement held a March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom organized by veteran civil rights leader and former Pullman porter A. Philip Randolph. The purpose of the rally was to make a show of solidarity in order to assist the passage of the civil rights bill that was before Congress. In addition to the movie stars and entertainers present at the march, there were civil rights leaders, labor leaders, and members of the clergy. It was at this event, attended by more than 200,000 people and receiving massive media coverage, that King cemented his spiritual and symbolic national leadership of the civil rights movement in general when, at the end of the day, he delivered his “I Have a Dream” speech. King’s speech differed from all the other speeches that day in its vision and optimism.

The Civil Rights Act of 1964 was finally passed under President Lyndon B. Johnson, although it had been initiated under President John F. Kennedy, who was assassinated in November of 1963. The year 1964 was also marked by King becoming the youngest person ever to receive the Nobel Peace Prize. King was more in demand than ever, and his busy schedule of travel and speeches left him sick and exhausted. Indeed, he was hospitalized when the news of the prize came.

Mississippi, Voting Rights, and Compromise

For King, the entire country became his operating theater, although his focus for change was in the South. One of the fissures that appeared between the SCLC and the SNCC was the result of King's perceived siding with politicians following Freedom Summer in 1964. The object of the campaign in Mississippi was to register blacks to vote. Largely under the direction of the SNCC and leader Bob Moses, and using many college students from Northern states, those participating in Freedom Summer not only organized blacks in communities for voting and conducted Freedom Schools for young people, they also organized an alternative party, the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party (MFDP), and elected delegates to the upcoming Democratic National Presidential Convention to be held in Atlantic City in the fall. This was a direct challenge to the segregated Democratic Party.

However, Mississippi was intolerant of any changes that involved parity of blacks and whites, and its white citizens did not hesitate to use violence to maintain the status quo. This wanton attitude toward violent solutions became clear after the assassination of Medgar Evers in 1963, a number of black church burnings, and the murder with the help of legal law enforcement officers of three civil rights workers – James Chaney, Andrew Goodman, and Michael Schwerner. These murders and the discovery of their bodies in an earthen dam, along with the bodies of black men who had been reported missing over the years, set off riots all over the country. King and other civil rights leaders were called upon to quell the unrest.

However, King lost face with the younger members of the movement when he accepted a compromise at the Democratic National Convention. The Convention agreed to seat two of the MFDP members as at-large members, along with the entire delegation of the all-white Mississippi Democratic state party. This compromise was brought about in order to make sure that President Johnson received support from the Southern delegations. The deed was accomplished by Hubert Humphrey and Walter Mondale. King, Bayard Rustin, and James Farmer of CORE agreed to the compromise. SNCC and MFDP delegates themselves disagreed with the compromise. After President Johnson won reelection, he pushed through the Voting Rights Act of 1965 that reinforced the 15th Amendment, guaranteeing the right to vote to all American citizens. King and the older civil rights leaders had been practical in their support of the compromise, but the younger members saw their actions as capitulation to the political powers that be.

Selma and the Push for Voting Rights

It was not an accident that the next major campaign undertaken by the SCLC concerned the push for voting rights. Seventy percent of African Americans in the South who were eligible to vote were kept from registering to vote by a variety of ploys, including outright use of physical force. King and others wanted to encourage the passage of a Voting Rights Act that would ensure the ability of blacks to register and vote. The SCLC chose Selma, Alabama as the location of its voting rights campaign, which began following the election in January 1965, once again in conjunction with the SNCC. The campaign started out badly when King and his group registered at a previously segregated hotel, and King was attacked by a white man identified with a segregationist group. Nevertheless King was able to secure a room there.

The plan in Selma was to send blacks to the courthouse to register to vote. After organizing a march from the courthouse to Brown Chapel, King was arrested for marching without a permit. In the wake of thousands of arrests in Selma, King continued to lead the demonstrators, but they were met with police violence resulting in the shooting to death of a young man, Jimmy Lee Jackson. These confrontations with the local sheriff ultimately led to the idea of a long march from Selma to Montgomery, Alabama (the state capitol) in order to alert Governor George Wallace of the police brutality the group had encountered in Selma, but the governor sent down an edict that the march was not to take place. The march took place anyway on Sunday, March 7, 1965, but King was not present because he had returned to Atlanta to conduct the Sunday services at his own church. The 500 marchers were confronted with armed police on horseback, who used whips and clubs to subdue the marchers, and it was all broadcast nationwide. The day became known as Bloody Sunday.

King then organized another march following the same route, but added to the local demonstrators were clergy from all over the country. As 1,500 protestors marched the following Tuesday with King in the lead, the police were again present and blocking their way. King's choice was to turn back, and this decision demoralized a good number of the participants, including SNCC leaders. Some have identified this and later events as the turning point in the movement away from moderate protest to more radical protest and the abandonment of non-violence and the embrace of Black Power. In addition, a white Unitarian minister, James Reeb, one of the marchers, was murdered. In response to this violence, President Johnson immediately began working for the adoption of a Voting Rights Act. Eventually, King and thousands of demonstrators were able to complete the walk from Selma to Montgomery under the eyes of the federalized Alabama National Guard on Sunday, March 21, 1965. Although Governor Wallace refused to accept the petition for voting rights that King delivered to the capital on March 25, the rally of 25,000 people, including many entertainers, was a symbolic triumph.

Shift to Broader Issues

Because the civil rights movement and the tactics of King and the SCLC were really aimed at dismantling the system of legal segregation in the South, and because of the different racial histories of the North and the South, King had almost no success outside of the South, although he became the symbol of the quest for rights for African Americans all over the country and served as a kind of elder spokesman for the black community. King realized, however, that blacks in other parts of the country had problems equally as compelling as those in the South; namely, unfair housing practices, unfair employment practices, police brutality, and poverty.

The city of Chicago had been one of the chief destinations of blacks leaving the South during the great migration at the beginning of the twentieth century. One of the main problems that Chicago blacks faced in the mid-twentieth century was discriminatory housing policies. King's attempt to call attention to and solve the housing problems in Chicago met with resistance from both white city fathers and black officeholders. His increasingly heavy schedule meant that he could not devote the time to this project that it called for, nor did he have the same kind of constituencies that he found in the South. Indeed, King underestimated the nature of the problem in Chicago.

Nevertheless, King began with a huge symbolic gesture – an address to 35,000 people and a march to City Hall to present a list of demands to city officials. At that time, Chicago was run by Mayor Richard Daley, a democratic politician with an extremely long incumbency. King's demands were not as simple as requesting that people be allowed to exercise their rights. They included such broad issues as an end to the de facto school segregation that was largely the result of housing patterns, as well as budget increases for schools, mass transit, and public housing. King rented an apartment in a depressed area and was appalled at its condition, but he was so busy that he spent very little time there. He had to contend with summer riots that ignited almost spontaneously, causing him to make pleas for peace. His marches through Chicago's ethnic neighborhoods stirred up resentment, and efforts to negotiate resulted in promises officials that members of SNCC and CORE considered vacuous. Once again, the rift between King's moderate, non-violent stance and the increasing radicalism of other parts of the civil rights movement grew.

Eventually, King also became interested in the anti-war and labor movements. On April 4, 1967 he spoke out against the Vietnam War for the first time and continued to address the cause of peace in the days to come. In 1968 the SCLC decided to address the problem of poverty in the United States and planned the Poor People's Campaign to be held in April to dramatize the plight of so many Americans, black and white, and to push for some sort of relief of their plight. But before that campaign could be realized, King and his advisors decided that the SCLC should go to Memphis, Tennessee to support the sanitation workers there in their quest for recognition of their union and for wage and benefit increases. A strike and an injunction against demonstrations by the strikers meant a confrontation between the workers and city officials. Once again, King's involvement in a demonstration brought him into conflict with young people who were impatient with non-violence and engaged in looting. King's response was to hold another demonstration exhibiting the discipline of non-violence in order to legitimate the demonstration.

When King returned to Memphis on April 3, he addressed a crowd of 2,000 people, giving his “I Have Been to the Mountaintop” speech, which some considered to be prophetic of the events that followed. On April 4, 1968, the day after the speech, Martin Luther King, Jr. was shot dead outside of his motel room in Memphis. He was 39. The news of King’s death brought riots in cities across the United States. Ironically, after King’s death (and probably because of it), the sanitation workers in Memphis settled their strike by reaching favorable terms with city officials.

King’s funeral was held at the Ebenezer Baptist Church in Atlanta, Georgia, attended by some 60,000 people. His body was then transported by mule and wooden cart to Morehouse College for a eulogy read by Reverend Benjamin Mays. King is buried at the Martin Luther King, Jr. Center, which was founded by Coretta Scott King as a memorial to his life and work.

By the end of his life, King had been arrested and jailed at least thirty times. He wrote six books and won numerous prizes, honorary degrees, and awards. Following his death, many cities, streets, buildings, and public facilities were named after him. In 1986 Martin Luther King, Jr. Day became a national holiday.

Knights of Labor and Terence Powderly (1849–1924)

Stacy Warner Maddern

The Noble and Holy Order of the Knights of Labor, established in 1869, found prominence in the United States during the 1890s and was an important working-class institution in the late nineteenth-century American labor movement. In 1869 Uriah S. Stephens led a small group of tailors in forming the Knights as a forum of discussion that sought to end child and convict labor, while advocating equal pay for women, progressive income taxes, and a cooperative setting of an employer–employee ownership industry.

Stephens envisioned the Knights as a “brotherhood of toil” open to every laborer, mechanic, and artisan who wanted to improve his mind and condition. Their primary goal was to educate wageworkers on the nobility of labor and the evils of the present wages system. The Knights became the direct descendent of the Nation Labor Union, continuing those traditions of reforming labor during the Jacksonian era.

In 1879 Stephens stepped down as leader and was replaced by Terence V. Powderly. Powderly was an idealist and a reformer. His sympathy for the underdog and constant desire to alleviate the conditions of the oppressed and the unfortunate made him an ideal leader for the Knights. The son of immigrant working-class parents and a laborer himself, he witnessed the devastating effects of an economy that emphasized material gain over principles of humanity. Under his leadership, membership of the Knights expanded and became more public.

The Knights changed the outlook of labor unions by serving as a counter-vision of cooperation. Pledges of equality and social responsibility resulted in economic and cultural solidarity extending beyond any given class or corporate interest. They discouraged strikes, which Powderly described as “a relic of barbarism,” preferring instead to exert pressure on employers through alternative means such as boycotting. The Knights also attempted to break “the walls of prejudice” by bringing large numbers of skilled and unskilled African American workers into what was a predominantly white labor movement. Estimates from 1886 suggest that out of a total membership exceeding 700,000, there were no less than 60,000 African American members.

In 1869 employers began importing cheap labor from Europe, inspiring a great flow of immigrants into the United States and driving wage rates down, especially in cases involving strikes. Along with other labor organizations the Knights supported the US Congress in passing the Contract Labor Law in 1885, along with the Chinese Exclusion Act to further restrict the number of immigrants into America. The Knights’ position was merely to protect the American working class. Powderly held that “corporate greed alone” was the factor most “responsible for the sweeping tide of immigration now flowing upon us.”

Powderly moved that the Knights spread into Europe in order to achieve global solidarity among all working classes. This was particularly in respect to the large influx of window glass workers in Europe, who in great numbers had immigrated to America. The Knights began to investigate why so many had come to America and accepted contracts for less than the current wages. Their main interest was to establish closer lines of communication between America and the old country in order to protect the interest of all window glass workers. This effort remains a unique example of unifying a working class while ignoring national borders.

The strength of the Knights was their ability to tap into any and all segments of society. They were able to present themselves as a sociopolitical alternative to powerful political parties and corporate culture. However, by 1890 the order would see its international efforts decline, while their membership at home fell to fewer than 100,000. The decline began as early as 1886 as animosity between the Knights and organized trade unions started to rise. This clash of distinct and opposing ideologies drew a line through the labor movement, as the Knights sought to organize all workers into one single body, while trade unions wanted to organize workers along trade lines. This created a fundamental fracture in the ultimate objectives of the movement, one that went beyond structural or organizational differences. Each union had separate goals. The Knights’ unification of labor was in pursuit of issues both political and social, whereas the trade unions wanted only to serve as a tool for collective bargaining between worker and employer.

These ideological differences splintered the movement. The Knights continued efforts to abolish the wage system, reform society, and educate the working class. The national trade unions, on the other hand, were left alone in the economic sector, prohibiting the Knights from exercising any control over wages, hours, working conditions, or the process of collective bargaining. Herein, the aspects of trade unionism and reform unionism became separate realities.

In 1893 Terence Powderly was replaced by new leadership, and two years later the Knights’ membership fell to a mere 17,000. With the formation of the American Federation of Labor and the Industrial Workers of the World, the order became virtually non-existent as a labor union by 1917. Their collapse was indicative of larger shortcomings in late nineteenth-century modes of political association. Business enterprise hardened into a nationalist capitalist system and labor adopted wage-consciousness. Those factors were enough to defeat the idealism of collective effort which it sought. In America, labor policies would be determined by politics and the Knights’ attempt to reverse this trend ultimately failed.

Kollontai, Alexandra (1872–1952)

Alex Zukas

The socialist-feminist Bolshevik revolutionary Alexandra Kollontai, née Domontovich, who held the distinctions of being the first woman cabinet minister and the first woman ambassador in modern history, is more often remembered for raising fundamental questions about sexual intimacy, about the relationship between love and work, and about traditional sexual and social mores that challenged orthodox socialist and feminist thought and practice. Her ideas found little resonance among her socialist and feminist contemporaries, but they became a touchstone for many socialists and feminists who came of age in the 1970s and after.

Born into a liberal upper-class Russian family, Alexandra Domontovich read avidly, became fluent in numerous languages, and developed a strong sense of independence and non-conformity. She spent summers at her grandfather's estate in Finland where she saw firsthand the plight of tenant farmers and farm laborers. In 1888 she passed an exam to become a teacher. She fell in love with a distant relative, Vladimir Kollontai. Her parents disapproved of the match and sent her to Europe where, much to their dismay, she became attracted to Marxism. When she returned she married Kollontai against her parents' wishes. Alexandra witnessed the harsh industrialization of St. Petersburg and became convinced of the importance of working-class revolution. In 1896 she became actively involved in leafleting and fundraising to support a mass strike of female textile workers and for the rest of her political career she maintained close ties to these textile workers.

Always the non-conformist, she left her husband and son in 1898 to pursue life as a student of Marxism and as a political activist and by 1899 she was active in the Russian Social Democratic Labor Party (RSDLP) underground. In 1900 her first article on Finland appeared, to be followed by a book three years later investigating the emergence of capitalism in Finland and the condition of the working class there. For the next 20 years she was regarded as the RSDLP's expert on the "Finnish Question." On January 3, 1905 she joined the workers' procession to the Winter Palace which ended in Bloody Sunday, an experience which converted her into a full-time revolutionary holding illegal factory meetings during the Revolution of 1905. An eloquent speaker, she made a tremendous impression on workers, as she would again on a larger scale in 1917. In 1906 and 1907 she attended international conferences of socialist women in Germany sponsored by Clara Zetkin (1857–1933) and hoped, like Zetkin, to develop a proletarian women's movement. From 1905 to 1908 she organized women workers, but in 1908 her work was cut short when she left Russia to avoid arrest for assorted illegal activities. She remained in exile for the next nine years, working as a full-time agitator for the German Social Democratic Party until the outbreak of World War I when she moved to Scandinavia. Her anti-war stance drew her to join the Bolshevik faction of the RSDLP in 1915 and her presence in neutral Scandinavia helped make it a crucial base for Bolshevik agitation. During this period of exile she developed her theories of non-possessive love and erotic friendship that sanctioned the sexual liberation of men and women without regard for the institution of marriage or conventional gender-sexual norms.

Kollontai returned to Russia in March 1917 and sided with Lenin in all Bolshevik disputes in the run-up to the October Revolution and in initiating the revolution itself. She became the first woman elected to the party's Central Committee and the first woman cabinet minister (in charge of public welfare) in modern history. She resigned her post six months later to protest the Brest-Litovsk Treaty which delivered Finland to the white terror. The peak of her political activity, if not her power, came during the civil war (1917–23) when she served as commissar for propaganda in the Ukraine, organized women's conferences in Petrograd, co-founded the Women's Section of the Communist Party (Zhenotdel) where she helped draft laws protecting women, drew women into Soviet life, and promoted women's equality, and she served as vice-president of the International Women's Secretariat of the Communist International. Unhappy with Lenin's New Economic Policy and with the withering of internal party democracy, Kollontai joined the Workers' Opposition, a party faction that was banned with all other factions in 1921. Her time as a Communist Party insider was over.

In the post-revolutionary period (1918–23) her writings on gender and sexual relations continued themes from her exile period: a “comradely union” of equals would replace marriage (which would wither away under communism), children would be raised collectively rather than in families, the idea of illegitimacy in offspring would be banished, restraints on pre- or non-marital sex would be lifted, and freely chosen partners would regard each other with non-possessive love, passion, and consideration. The Bolshevik (later Communist) leadership completely rejected her ideas and by 1923 she was no longer a political or moral force in the Soviet Union. She took diplomatic posts to Norway (1923–5), Mexico (1925–7), Norway (1927–30), and Sweden (1930–45), beginning what many would consider another exile. After 1943 she was ambassador to Sweden, the first woman in the modern world to hold ambassadorial rank. In 1944 she conducted the armistice negotiations that ended hostilities between the Soviet Union and Finland in World War II and for which the Finnish prime minister nominated her for the Nobel Peace Prize in 1946. She was one of the few Old Bolsheviks, and the only major critic of Soviet government, to survive Stalin's purges. She retired to the Soviet Union after World War II, wrote a final set of memoirs, and died in Moscow in 1952.

Korea, civic movement

Won Young-su

In the early 1990s, while many radicals were disillusioned by the collapse of the Soviet Union, a new movement appeared in Korea that began to distance itself from the existing left and radical movements, criticizing the militancy and violence. This move crystallized in the birth of the “civic movement.” This movement depoliticized to an extent and confined itself to legal activities, keeping distance from other popular movements and focusing on a petition campaign for political and economic reform. Because of the movement's less radical appearance, both the mainstream media and the government regarded it as a civil junior partner. However, these civic groups were not completely depoliticized, in spite of their public image. They led a series of political campaigns, such as electoral watch campaigns and blacklist campaigns for corrupt politicians, thereby causing strong reactions from conservatives.

The movement began to lose momentum after the turn of the century and was fraught with various internal problems. First, its support base and membership remained weak. Even the largest civic groups had to be dependent upon external finance and were thus vulnerable to corruption, which in turn hurt the movement's image. Secondly, many civic leaders joined political parties, disrupting the image of political neutrality. Compounding this problem, some civic leaders not only supported the Kim Dae-jung and Roh Moo-hyun regimes, but also accepted government posts. In more than a few cases, they even supported neoliberal reforms and criticized the labor and popular movement.

After its existence for almost two decades, the civic movement's role and function thus became ambiguous. Historically, it was born out of the radical popular movement, but distanced from it. Thus, in spite of its success in various experiments with liberal reforms, it remained politically and organizationally weak. It needed closer links with popular movements yet alienated popular movements by trying to influence them.

Overall, the civic movement generally succeeded in securing the space created by the popular struggles in the 1980s, but it failed to substitute the popular movement as an alternative force. The unexpected, though limited, success of the socialist Democratic Labor Party (founded in 2000) and the subsistence of popular movements put some limitation on the scope of the civic movement. Also, the alliance with institutional politics brought into question the legitimacy of the civic movement. Furthermore, because of its criticism of statism, the civil movement repeatedly showed an ambiguous attitude toward anti-worker, anti-popular neoliberal reforms.

Korea, labor movement, 20th century

Won Young-su

The formation of an independent and democratic labor union in post-World War II Korea posed a great challenge. Labor advocates were forced to deal with recalcitrant and often violent capital at the factory level, while also facing government hostility and institutional violence. Even the labor wing focused on anti-communism in the far-right Cold War political climate under South Korea's first president, Rhee Syng-man, who used labor for his own political interests. After that, General Park Chung Hee took over and dissolved the National Assembly in 1961 and remained president until 1979. His military regime, and that of Chun Du-hwan, who was president from 1980 to 1988, suppressed any move to voice workers' interests. Though a union reform movement surfaced in the political space created by the 1960 Revolution, efforts to build an alternative labor federation failed because of the military regime's suppression. Only anti-communist official trade unions, such as the Federation of Korean Trade Unions (FKTU), were legally allowed within the framework fixed by the government directives.

Even in this climate, however, the rapid industrialization and subsequent formation of the working class inevitably caused workers to resort to spontaneous resistance sporadically as class antagonism between labor and capital emerged in the 1970s. Faced with the harsh suppression from military dictatorships, employers, and the official trade union bureaucracy, workers' resistance took two forms: one was an immediate violent response by male blue collar workers, and the other was the democratic trade union movement by female workers in the export-oriented light industries.

Independent Unionism in the 1970s

In the context of the combined development of capitalist industrialization and brutal suppression from the military dictatorship, the spontaneous form of resistance began to turn into a more organized expression of the labor movement. But the starting point of the new labor movement was the self-immolation of a young worker. On November 11, 1970 Chun Tae-il burned himself to death in protest of inhumane conditions for young textile workers in Pyunghwa Market, downtown Seoul. His death symbolized the spontaneous outburst of workers' indignation and signaled the birth of the modern labor movement for independent and democratic unionism. Shock, sympathy, and social anger paved the way for the formation of a new labor movement, different from the official government-controlled unionism. In this context, progressive churches and student activists joined the workers' struggles. Young female workers from rural areas especially began to realize the cause of their miserable conditions and the need for a trade union that would defend their interests and rights.

These new democratic unions fought for their rights against hostile managers and employers, as well as other male colleagues and, usually, against plain-clothes policemen and secret agents hired by employers and planted on the shop floor. Since most of the constitutionally legal actions were prohibited by decree, young women workers were forced to resort to illegal means of struggle. One of the most striking examples was the struggle of women workers who occupied the opposition party office in protest of the closure of a wig manufacturing factory in the summer of 1979. In the course of brutal suppression, a young worker, Kim Kyung-sook, was killed.

Throughout the 1970s the government remained under the control of a military dictatorship that continued to suppress workers in every possible way, including kidnapping, torture, detainment, threat, and constant propaganda that depicted women workers as puppets controlled by communists. Students, activists, and priests who helped them also faced the same harsh suppression. The democratic union movement that had been initiated by the death of Chun Tae-il formed an important part of the opposition movement against the military dictatorship. Young women workers from export industries under terrible working conditions fought for their human rights and labor rights to organize for their own trade unions. But in spite of their sacrifice, their struggles were mostly confined to individual workplaces, far away from the next round of working-class militancy and radicalization.

The 1970s was a preliminary stage for the full-scale development of the labor movements. Young workers joined trade unions for better wages and humane working conditions, in the process developing a militant stance. A series of spontaneous struggles from these workers paved the way for the next stage of the trade union movement and even stronger anti-dictatorship struggles in the 1980s.

Emergence of a Militant Stance

Kwangju Uprising

On May 15, 1980 over 100,000 students and citizens gathered in front of Seoul Station, demanding the full-scale democratization of Korean society through the abolition of martial law and the elimination of the remnants of the Yushin regime, a government associated with Park's military dictatorship. In response to the uprising, the military conspirators staged another coup d'état by expanding martial law to the entire country on May 17 and swiftly arresting most student activists and prominent opposition leaders, including Kim Dae-jung. With the help of the United States military, the government managed to quell the resistance, killing hundreds of civilians.

The Kwangju uprising and its brutal suppression had a significant impact on the labor movement. To that point, democratic unionism had been focused on workplace issues, mainly economic issues like wages, working conditions, plant closures, and so on. More importantly, it only covered a small section of the working class, mainly female workers from export-oriented light industries like textile, garments, and stuffed toys. The experience of Kwangju awakened the political consciousness of the labor movement, leading it to recognize the military dictatorship as its enemy and to look for the fundamental cause of the contradictions of capitalism. This gave the movement new direction and orientation for the future.

Aftermath of Kwangju and Labor in the 1980s

In the spring of 1980, after the military dictatorship collapsed, there were new attempts to revitalize the trade union movement. There were hundreds of strikes and occupations around the country, and a very strong move to reform the official union, FKTU, but soon workers were faced with another abrupt military coup. In the aftermath of the Kwangju uprising, the new military regime suppressed all the opposition, targeting student and popular movements, especially the democratic unions.

The Chun Doo-hwan regime, which had assumed power just before the uprising, reacted to Kwangju by attacking the labor movement on various levels. In the course of a so-called purification campaign, many union leaders were arrested together with gangsters and other criminals and sent to concentration camps. In addition to this physical violence and the union closures, the new military leaders revised the labor law, dismantling industrial unions and reorganizing them into company-based trade unions. This measure was meant to uproot labor resistance and democratic unionism by making it almost impossible to form a trade union at the workplace.

In the early 1980s, though most of the democratic trade unions were destroyed by the military regime, activists began efforts to revitalize the labor movement. Thus, workers and union activists, most of whom were expelled from their workplaces because of a blacklist, began to get involved in labor support groups. More significantly, student activists turned to the oppressed people with the firm conviction that under harsh exploitation the working class would rise to lead the struggles for social and political revolution. In this situation the student movement recovered its organizational capacity. Students vigorously organized campus and street protests, confronting riot police at the risk of being imprisoned or sent to forced military service. With the growing militancy of student protests, labor activists – especially former student activists – began to focus on labor struggles.

Thus, the mid-1980s witnessed a series of important struggles. In June 1985 the nine trade unions in Kuro industrial complex in southern Seoul went on a joint strike in protest of the oppression of democratic unions. This action was the fruit of the labor struggles in the early 1980s and a monumental battle for the revolutionary labor movement. The May struggle in Incheon in 1986, in which student and labor activists converged at the opposition party's rally, symbolized the new phenomenon of worker-student alliance; however, it failed to organize the workers in large plants, where oppressive control by the state and capital was focused, with the exception of the successful strike at Daewoo Motors in 1985.

Daewoo Motors Workers' Struggle

Daewoo Motors was one of the big three auto makers, and it had a yellow union – a company union controlled by the corporation. In the early 1980s some former student activists who were employed there began in-plant organizing activities. In 1984 at the union delegates election, out of 22, 12 were democratic delegates. They challenged the collaborationist leadership, forming a commission to normalize the trade union. In the face of pressure from below, the union declared a strike on April 16 and remained on strike for six days. The management attempted to divide the workers, but failed as workers occupied the Technology Center building, armed with sticks to defend themselves from the police. Daewoo President Kim Woo-jung eventually accepted most of the workers' demands. After the strike, however, the police arrested eight strike leaders and the company dismissed one worker, imposed "voluntary resignation" on three workers, and disciplined four others with three-month suspensions.

In spite of this sacrifice of activists, the victory of the strike had a significance for the labor movement. It inspired workers in other plants and put the government's wage guideline policy under scrutiny. Also, the active role of former student activists in organizing a strike provided an exemplary model for other activists to follow in their in-plant activities.

Kuro Solidarity Strike

Kuro Industrial Complex was a symbol of the rapid industrialization of South Korea. Hundreds of factories were concentrated in the complex, mostly labor-intensive industries like electronics and textiles. Most workers were young women from the countryside. They lived in factory dormitories with poor facilities, or in nearby small apartments called bee-hives or chicken cages. From the early 1980s many activists sought jobs there and began to organize workers. In the mid-1980s a few trade unions were formed and developed joint activities among new union leaders and activists. These organizing drives were led by former unionists of the 1970s and student-turned-worker activists.

In 1985 the Daewoo Apparel Company union had finished a collective bargaining after 40 days' negotiation, but after the wage struggle was over the police arrested three union leaders for their two all-night sit-in struggles. At this news the union leaders of nearby factories like Hyosung, Sunil Textile, and Karibong Electronics decided to initiate a solidarity strike for the arrested colleagues. They recognized that the arrest was not just against a single union, but a signal for a series of prepared labor repressions. On June 25 the workers in nearby factories like Namsung Electronic, Sejin Electronic, and Rom Korea joined the solidarity strike. On June 26 opposition groups started a sit-in in support of the Kuro strike, and that evening a street demonstration was organized around the Kuro area. In this way the struggle spread to the factories in other areas. However, on June 29 the Daewoo Apparel management, in collaboration with the police force, sent hired thugs to occupied buildings, destroying workers' sit-in camps.

The historic six-day Kuro strike was joined by 2,500 workers in ten trade unions. Solidarity was expressed by the all-plant strike, work to rule, lunch rejection, solidarity statements, sit-ins, and street demonstrations. In the course of this struggle, 43 were imprisoned, 38 legally charged, 47 held in custody, and more than 700 dismissed or forced to resign. The Kuro solidarity strike signified the new development of militant unionism that dared to confront state power, pursuing the combination of economic and political struggle.

These battles, combined with turn-to-industry tactics, paved the way for the massive explosion of workers' struggles in July 1987. At the same time, the increasing militancy of politically awakened workers caused a fierce debate on the orientation and tactics of the labor movement. In spite of the confusion and excessive polemics, the militancy of the worker-student alliance in this period set the basic framework of the popular movement in general, and the political terrain of the labor and student movement in the 1980s.

1987 Hot Summer: Great Workers' Struggle

In spite of the huge increase in labor productivity in the 1980s, workers continued to experience relative poverty because of the ever-increasing gap between improved productivity and real wages. In this situation workers' discontent reached boiling point, but the labor control policies of the military regime suppressed the explosion of workers' anger. However, in early 1987 the illegitimacy of the military regime and its political crisis led to the June Uprising, forcing it into retreat. Thus, from July onwards, in the newly created political space, workers took to unprecedented massive struggles to fight for their rights and dignity.

From June 29 to October 31, workers went on 3,225 strikes with an average of 44 strikes per day. This wave of strikes began on July 5 when Hyundai Engine workers formed a trade union and struck in Ulsan, the biggest industrial city dominated by Hyundai chaebol. This was the first of subsequent strike waves for three months. The wave spread from the southeastern industrial belt in Ulsan, Masan, and Changwon, via big cities like Busan, Kwangju, Daegu, and Daejeon, and finally to Seoul. This huge wave of strikes passed through three stages and had an enormous impact on plants and factories all over the country. The first stage was initiated by workers in Ulsan, where Hyundai Engine workers fought for the right to form a trade union, and the workers in another Hyundai subsidiary, Mipo Shipbuilding, joined the unionization drive. The management attempt to block unionization provoked workers' anger, triggering an unprecedented explosion of working-class struggle.

The second stage of escalation was initiated by the formation of an association of trade unions in Hyundai Group, the strike of Daewoo Shipbuilding on August 8. Massive street protests of over 40,000 Hyundai workers symbolized the escalation of labor militancy. And the death of a Daewoo shipbuilding worker, Lee Seok-gyu, killed by a tear-gas bomb, ignited workers' anger even further. In the third week of August alone, there were 880 strikes and 113 new trade unions were formed. The strike wave spread over the whole country, covering all industries, all sectors, and all local areas and regions.

The regime met this huge wave with a third stage of repression. On August 28, the funeral day of martyr Lee Seok-gyu, the police interrupted the funeral rally, arrested 993, and imprisoned 67. On the same day, the prime minister publicized "the statement for elimination of left pro-communist forces," and on September 4 riot police were sent to the sit-in camps of Daewoo Motors and Hyundai Heavy Industry, and 95 and 40 workers, respectively, were arrested. The next day the government launched a massive anti-worker campaign, with the employers' federation and their media. Thus, the strike wave began to subside.

Though the vast strike wave subsided, the hot summer of 1987 completely changed the Korean working class and society as a whole. The anger which had accumulated for more than three decades finally exploded, signaling the emergence of the working class in the proper sense of the word. It was the biggest mass struggle since the Korean War, and three months of struggle leapt over the dark age of three decades.

In these struggles the demands of workers were to guarantee a basic livelihood and labor rights, to abolish the repressive personnel management system, to guarantee trade union-building and free activities, to conclude collective bargaining, and to democratize yellow unions. Their organizing drives attempted to go beyond particular plants so as to organize different forms of joint struggles by region, industry, and chaebol groups, covering not just manufacture workers, but also diverse service workers.

In spite of its vast significance, the strike wave had some limitations of spontaneity, usually confined to a factory or a given region and mainly focused on economic demands. Thus, these spontaneous struggles were rather distant from radicalization, with little experience and weak organizational capacity. Despite such limitations, the Hot Summer of 1987 signified a new start for a radicalized mass movement of the South Korean working class as a whole.

Labor Radicalization: Second Generation of Democratic Unionism

After the labor upsurge of 1987 the terrain of the movement and its relationship with the state and capital changed considerably as the newly formed democratic trade union movement established itself as a social and political force representing the working class. This historic process of building democratic unionism is divided into three periods or stages of development. The first period, from late 1987 to 1988, saw the formation of democratic unionism. The second, from 1989 to 1992, included the consolidation of democratic unions in the face of state repression. Finally, between 1993 and 1995 the regional, industrial, and group organizations merged to form the new KCTU.

Formation of Democratic Unionism (1987–1988)

In this formative period of independent unionism there emerged 1,361 new unions with 220,000 new members in 1987. Union membership increased dramatically from 1,036,000 in 2,675 unions in 1986 to 1,932,000 in 7,883 unions in 1989, covering research institutions, hospitals, construction, newspapers, broadcasting, hotels, and public enterprises, as well as chaebol enterprises that had been anti-union fortresses. In this period, workers' efforts were focused mainly on economic issues like wage increases and the improvement of working conditions, and building a trade union to defend their interests. Where there was already a trade union the priority was to change the corrupt leadership. Many won their struggles, but they were inexperienced in maintaining trade unions. These struggles were also confined to each plant and factory. Awakened by struggles and realizing the power of their unity, they expanded their activities for solidarity and class cooperation. Thus, around 1990, the new independent unions got together in different forms, and they were organized nationally at three levels: regional organizations, industrial organizations, and chaebol group organizations.

An important feature of the newly born independent unionism was its diversity in scope and composition. Usually, blue collar workers formed the backbone of the labor movement, but in this formative period various white collar workers also joined the unionization drive. One of the most striking examples was the teachers' union in 1989. Upset with poor educational conditions and stale bureaucratism, many teachers wanted to build their own trade union for educational reform. Through a successful organizing drive the teacher union was formed, but the government prohibited rank and file teachers from joining, and 1,527 teachers were dismissed for their union membership.

Another important feature in the formation of the new labor movement was the convergence of labor militants and organizers, mostly former student activists. The formation of the National Association of Labor Movement Organizations (NALMO) signified the completion of a nationwide network of militant labor activists outside of trade unions. It played a key role in the founding of the militant KTUC, or Jeonnohyeop. The former student activists in NALMO got involved in the newly formed trade unions, assisting their practical activities, such as routine operations, holding rallies, and devising tactics, propaganda, and educational agendas. Many activists also began to work as trade union officials at different levels. NALMO was a loose coalition of different tendencies from nationalist to left-wing groups. On the issue of a political party it was divided, and as the trade unions as a mass organization grew, the role of activists outside the official framework of the unions lessened. Thus, in the mid-1990s, NALMO was gradually marginalized.

Consolidation of Democratic Trade Unions Under State Violence (1989–1992)

From the Workers' Great Struggle of 1987 the working class waged a resolute fight for livelihoods and better working conditions, while at the same time organizing a movement to build democratic unions independent of the state and capital. These trade unions pursued unity and solidarity with other workers by regional or occupational base. As a result of these efforts, in January 1990 the Korean Trade Union Congress (KTUC, Jeonnohyeop) was formed as the national peak organization of independent, democratic, and militant trade unionism. In the initial stage of networking and solidarity after the 1987 struggle, activists had a serious debate on long-term perspectives, strategy, and tactics. One crucial issue was whether to build a separate organization from the FKTU or to initiate a reform drive within the framework of the FKTU.

The KTUC represented the victorious outcome of the 1987 workers' struggle organizationally, and the emergence of a full-grown labor movement politically. The slogans of the KTUC – "Build an equalitarian society!" and "Achieve working-class emancipation!" – demonstrated the political orientation of the new labor movement, even though it could not express its socialism explicitly because of the notorious National Security Law, which made communism illegal. The KTUC led the working-class struggle in most regions and staged a political struggle against the dictatorship. Though less militant white collar workers and some trade unions of chaebol companies did not join the KTUC in fear of expected government suppression, the KTUC formed a labor front with other unions and led various working-class struggles.

Inevitably, the KTUC became the arch-enemy of the Roh Tae-woo regime (1988–92) and the government constantly harassed and suppressed the union by all possible means. In fact, after a short span of hypocritical neutrality, the Roh Tae-woo government declared a war on the working class in the name of "war against crimes" in December 1989. In this brutal assault, thousands of leaders were arrested, imprisoned, and pursued, while attacks and searches of the KTUC national office and regional offices were everyday routine. In the face of incessant harassment and attacks from the state and capital, as well as ideological and psychological bombardment, the number of affiliated unions and membership under the KTUC was halved by the end of 1991. Thus, in spite of its militancy and independence, the KTUC began to lose its influence, slowly becoming isolated. At the same time, it dealt with internal dissention over militancy as democratic trade unions turned toward moderation.

On the other hand, white collar workers also organized into a separate federation of occupational unions, reflecting different social and working conditions from those of blue collar workers. In May 1990 they formed their own organization, the Korean Council of Industrial Trade Union Federations. This white collar organization was a loose coalition compared with the KTUC, forming the moderate wing of the democratic unionism that was not resolute in terms of the separation from the framework of the FKTU. In this context the KCTU failed to develop further, and its organizational goal of building industrial unions could not be completed. Numerically, the KTUC represented less than one-tenth of the total organized workers, and most of the members were in medium- and small-sized factories, though a few trade unions in big enterprises were KTUC members or at least worked closely with it. Therefore, the major task of the labor movement – the unity of all the democratic trade unions under a national organization and the building of industrial unions beyond the company union system – was not realized. However, in spite of the suppressions, internal disputes, and failures, the KTUC played a leading role in the struggle as a symbol of working-class militancy and new democratic unionism in the 1990s.

Founding the KCTU (1992–1995)

During the early days of the Kim Young-sam regime (1993–7), a series of reform measures raised workers' hopes, and the labor movement experienced a temporary lull, especially since the new leader promised autonomy in industrial relations. However, the government implemented a wage control policy to overcome recession, and workers rapidly gave up any expectations they had of the government. In this situation the Federation of Korean Trade Unions (FKTU), which had functioned as a yellow union under the military regimes, concluded an agreement with the Korean Employers Federation (KEF) to suppress wage increases. This was regarded by many unionists as a betrayal to the working class, and many member unions joined the campaign to refuse to pay union dues. In June 1993 the regime abandoned its principle of autonomy, resorting to labor oppression by sending riot police to suppress the Hyundai workers' strike.

Meanwhile, the KTUC, the Federation of Hyundai Group Trade Unions, and the Council of Large Enterprise Trade Unions, all opposed to the FKTU, formed the Korean Congress of Trade Union Representatives (KCTUR, Jeonnodaee), covering more than 400,000 members. The formation of the KCTUR was a big step forward in terms of national unity of the democratic union movement, in that it succeeded in uniting the once-scattered democratic unions into a unified organizational framework, even though it was, at this stage, still little more than a coalition of the leaders.

Then the FKTU once again made a deal with the KEF on wage control, triggering the anger of its union members and leading to a widespread disaffiliation campaign. This incident boosted the democratic union movement, and the 1994–5 struggles for collective wage negotiations were carried out in a much more organized manner, with the workers organizing solidarity struggles and coordinating their strike schedules. Based on this heightened solidarity, the Korean Confederation of Trade Unions (KCTU, Minjunochong) was established in November 1995. It was initiated by KCTUR member unions and became the national headquarters of the democratic union movement, encompassing 500,000 members.

The establishment of the KCTU showed that the democratic union movement had grown into a strong force to be reckoned with, and that the democratic unions had finally achieved unity, which was the cherished dream of the democratic labor camp since the Hot Summer of 1987. However, the birth of the KCTU came with a high price: the militant elements of the democratic union movement, who had dreamt of uniting all democratic unions under the flag of KTUC (Jeonnohyeop), lost the internal power struggle and the revolutionary and militant trend, called the Jeonnohyeop spirit, was significantly weakened. As a result, it was Kwon Young-gil, a journalist union leader and initiator of the moderate trend within the democratic union movement, who became the first president of the newly launched KCTU.

As the KCTU was launched under the hegemony of the moderate wing, its orientation and methods showed new characteristics distinct from those of Jeonnohyeop, whose revolutionary orientation had been expressed in its slogans “Labor emancipation” and “Fighting for an equal society.” In contrast, the political orientation of the first KCTU leadership can be summarized in its slogan “A labor movement that moves with the people.” This was the general political line pursued by the first KCTU leadership, characterized by renunciation of a revolutionary orientation, pursuit of reform within the established system, acceptance of capitalist ideologies (such as national competitiveness and enhancement of productivity), advocacy of inter-class compromise, and a shift towards the civil movement model. This trend was not something that was created overnight with the inauguration of the Kwon Young-gil leadership; it was an extension of the rationale of “labor movement reforms” adopted by the critics of Jeonnohyeop’s revolutionary and militant activism in the early 1990s. The reason this reform-oriented line was established as the general strategy of the first KCTU leadership was that with the expansion of the democratic union movement there was considerable participation from unionists with middle-class consciousness, who came to gain a greater say within the movement.

Major Labor Struggles, Early 1990s

The militancy and organizational strength of the new democratic unionism allowed it to overcome the challenges it faced and consolidate its forces. Capitalists and government attempted to coopt militant leaders or destroy their unions, but workers defended their unions in spite of potential death, imprisonment, lynching, and legal action.

Initially, manufacturing workers in large plants led militant struggles in industrial bases like Ulsan, Masan, and Changwon, joined by workers in medium and small companies. Soon, white collar workers in banks and financial institutions, broadcasting companies, offices, and government subsidiaries joined the unionization drive. Shipbuilding workers in Hyundai Heavy Industry and Daewoo Shipbuilding, and auto workers in Hyundai Motors, Kia Motors, and Daewoo Motors, led the major confrontations. The subway and railway workers led unprecedented strikes, but the sit-in camps were attacked and most strike leaders were imprisoned. The government firmly sided with management. Many strikes were declared illegal and most of the successful strikes ended in massive arrests of leaders. Thus, labor law revision in the interest of workers became one of the major demands of democratic unions.

Democratic trade unions resisted and fought back despite incessant provocation and legal and physical attack. In this formative period workers were militant in struggles and tactics. In time of strikes, workers occupied plants and factories. They also organized self-defense units, consciousness-raising programs such as lectures and cultural activities, and strike and solidarity rallies. At local and regional levels, solidarity strikes were not uncommon, and rallies usually ended in physical confrontation with riot police. Thus, from workplace to national level, workers' struggles and organizing formed the basic framework of trade unions and their activities, thereby consolidating democratic unionism in the face of the class-collaborationist yellow trade unions of the FKTU.

Labor's Response to the Neoliberal Offensive

At the end of 1993 the Kim Young-sam government began to emphasize globalization and international competitiveness as the core of its policies. As part of this shift to neoliberalism the government launched the Commission for Industrial Relations Reform in April 1996. The immediate purpose of the commission was to prepare for the revision of labor laws dealing with "individual" industrial relations. This attempt to revise labor laws was the first neoliberal offensive against the working class. The KCTU leadership decided to join the commission in hopes of gaining legal status. Contrary to its promises, however, the government rushed the bill through the assembly, passing revised labor laws and secret agency laws that were worse than before, and leaving no room for concessions. The KCTU leadership, which had been heading towards compromise with the government, was forced to launch a general strike immediately.

General Strike 1996–1997

The general strike in the winter of 1996–7 was another turning point for the Korean labor movement. In the early 1990s, in the face of workers' anger and fierce resistance, capital and the state was forced to retreat, but in the context of the neoliberal turn the government strove to divert the gains won by workers and attempted to revise labor laws in the interest of international capital. Workers, however, demanded the revision of labor laws in their own interest, since the greater part of the laws were so outmoded and old-fashioned that they were meaningless.

On December 26, 1996, under orders from President Kim Young-sam, legislators gathered to pass the revised version of the labor laws and the national security agency law in the absence of the opposition party. At the news of this abrupt provocation workers immediately began a nationwide general strike. The first phase occurred between December 26, 1996 and January 2, 1997, when the KCTU organized massive rallies that included hundreds of thousands of workers. Then, between January 3 and 14, the strike spread. The height of the strike occurred January 15–19, and the final consummation took place from January 20 to March 10.

The government was shocked at the scale of the strike and tried to coopt the FKTU to create the image of industrial peace by isolating the militant workers' struggle. However, FKTU leaders also joined the struggle, visiting Myung-dong Cathedral where the KCTU leadership remained in sit-ins. The joint struggle of KCTU and FKTU drove the government onto the defensive. It agreed to cancel the labor law revision and to revise it again. The leadership of the general strike then decided to change tactics, which caused confusion among strikers and angered militant workers. On February 27 the KCTU organized the last strike, with 131,448 workers from 107 unions. In March the government submitted the revised bill to the National Congress. Though the general strike hit the government hard, and workers won an important victory, the result was rather limited considering the scope and impact of the strike. According to KCTU statistics, 531 trade unions with 404,054 workers joined the strike more than once, while the total number of trade unions that joined the strike more than once was 3,422, and the total number of unionists was 3,878,211. On average, every day 184,498 workers of 163 unions were on strike. In addition to strikes, 1.4 million workers and protesters joined over thirty mass rallies all over the country.

However, just at the time when the solidarity struggle had reached its peak, when even conservative papers were calling on the government to yield, and it seemed that the government had no choice but to make concessions, the KCTU leadership decided to end the general strike, on the pretext of exhaustion of internal strength and respect for public opinion. It was a decision made without prior consultation with the national coalition – the National Committee to Repeal the Revision of the Labor Law and National Planning Agency Law and to Defend Democracy. It was a decision prompted by the government's hint of legalizing the KCTU.

With the end of the general strike the issue of labor law revision changed from open and direct confrontation between state and capital and labor to political negotiation within the legislature, which was dominated by politicians. The deal was to legalize multiple union membership and to put off the immediate introduction of redundancy layoffs. Thus, the general strike paved the way for the legalization of the KCTU, but at the same time its conclusion brought despair to the rank and file unionists and created an unbridgeable gap between the union leadership and workers.

Economic Crisis and Workers' Struggle Against Neoliberalism

In the winter of 1997 an abrupt financial crisis struck the South Korean economy. The immediate impact of the crisis was immense, especially on workers: mass layoffs, massive dismissal and unemployment, worsening of living conditions, drastic wage cuts, insecure employment, and a heavier workload. The newly elected Kim Daejung government initiated a series of neoliberal structural adjustment policies, such as industrial and corporate restructuring, further privatization, mass layoffs, and labor flexibilization, all at the request of transnational and national monopoly capital.

To impose huge burdens on workers, the Kim Dae-jung government attempted to establish a social accord system in the form of a tripartite commission of government, bosses, and unions: on the one hand, the government promised to permit political activity by trade unions and legalize the teachers' union; on the other hand, it forced labor to accept the system of layoffs and flexible work time. This maneuver posed a major threat to the very existence of the labor movement, and the KCTU leadership was seriously confused, faced with the government's double tactics of propaganda and cooptation. Amid widespread propaganda about saving the country from national crisis, the leadership of the KCTU agreed to join the tripartite commission and accept the managerial right to dismiss workers. Militant workers were upset with this betrayal, however, and at the extra session of the KCTU Congress in January 1998 the KCTU leadership had to resign in a body. Thus, confusion was compounded. Under new leadership the KCTU declared its withdrawal from the tripartite commission and called a general strike in May to demand that the government cease its offensive against workers.

In July, when Hyundai Motors publicized a restructuring plan that included over 10,000 dismissals, workers responded immediately, occupying the plant for more than two months. Hyundai and the government intended to assault the workers, but as workers were so united, attacking them physically was almost impossible. However, the union leadership made a compromise with the management, accepting the temporary layoff plan in a bargain that saw the dismissal of about 300 female cafeteria workers. Though the proxy war at Hyundai Motors ended, other workers, like those in Mando Machinery, were attacked physically and dismissed en masse. In May 2000 Daewoo Motors management, in face of bankruptcy, publicized its massive restructuring plan, and in spite of over a year's struggle, thousands of workers were dismissed. In the course of the struggle the leadership was arrested and many workers kept on their sit-in struggle at a church outside of their plant.

Faced with structural adjustment and massive dismissal offensives, most workers were defenseless. Where they had a strong trade union and were united, they could resist and at least bargain with management, but unorganized workers were forced to accept the dismissal and wage cut, under bombardment from national crisis propaganda.

In general, it may not be easy to fight back in an age of economic crisis, but the Korean labor movement failed to organize a resistance. Internally, moderates failed to develop their collaborationism, and the resistance and struggles from below went on. In contrast to the lip-service paid by labor leaders, many casual workers kept on their struggle to save their jobs and livelihood. Moreover, under pressure from domestic and international capital, the government attempted to revise labor laws to adjust the international standard of labor flexibilization in the 2000s. The trade unions were against it, organizing several strikes and rallies, but in 2006 the National Congress passed the revised law, further expanding the trend of flexibilization and casualization. Thus, the Korean labor movement failed to defend the interests of the working class.

FKTU: Official Unionism and Its Long, Dark Past

Basically, the Federation of Korean Trade Unions (FKTU) was founded under direct supervision by the military regime, and functioned as a vehicle for state and corporate control of the workers. Thus, its role at the national level was to support the military dictatorships, to join the state-controlled anti-communist campaign, and mobilize workers for government ceremonies. In the workplace it held the overwhelming power over rank and file workers and repressed all the moves to organize independent struggles and to form alternative unions. In a word, the FKTU existed for the government and employers, not for workers and union members.

However, the nationwide struggle for democratization in June 1987 and the Great Workers' Struggle from July to September 1987 forced the FKTU to give up its role as a yellow union. It tried to a certain extent to transform itself into an organization independent of political power and representing the interests of its member unions. During the general strike of 1997 it joined forces with the KCTU. But from a broad perspective the FKTU still seeks to compromise with government and management. It accepted the government policy of suppressing wage increases, and in the face of the neoliberal restructuring of Korean society it adopted the strategy of minimizing the damage to workers, based on its "realistic" recognition that such restructuring programs were inevitable.

In July 2000, with growing concern that the second phase of restructuring involving the public and financial sector would cause massive redundancy similar to the first phase from 1998 to 1999, the FKTU-affiliated financial workers union went on strike. It was just a one-day strike, but through this struggle the union succeeded in forcing high-ranking government officials to the bargaining table and drawing some concessions from them.

In the 1990s and 2000s the membership of the FKTU continued to decline. In 2005 the civil servants' Korean Government Employees' Union (KGEU) joined the KCTU, and the FKTU lost its status as a major union. Though the FKTU joined the tripartite commission exclusively representing workers' interests with the absence of KCTU representatives, the symbolic power of the FKTU as the largest union is gone. Historically, in time of formation of the KCTU, the FKTU proposed the merger of two federations in the name of working-class unity and a united labor front, but its real purpose was to prevent the emergence of a robust rival confederation. Thus, as the KCTU was established, the FKTU discarded its own proposal of merger.

Until recently, while the FKTU claimed numerical superiority over the KCTU, it was just nominal, because the key trade unions in strategic industries belonged to the KCTU and, in turn, the KCTU commanded the more powerful position. Furthermore, within the FKTU, when the reform movement was successful, or the reform leadership won at union elections, usually the trade unions changed affiliation to the KCTU. In that sense, the reform drive from above had a fundamental limit and dilemma. But as the moderate wing became dominant inside the KCTU, the logic of labor unity came to the surface from time to time. For example, despite a series of government attempts to coopt the labor movement leadership through the social dialogue or tripartite negotiation, the dominant moderate faction within the KCTU preferred joining the tripartite dialogue and class compromise. In this context, the merger debate has different connotations.

Overall, even the reform leadership of the FKTU cannot provide any viable alternative vision, except participation in the social dialogue as a junior partner of state and capital. The FKTU is stuck in a multiple crisis and is forced to depend on government subsidies and institutional mechanisms for its survival. In that sense the FKTU's reform is doomed to fail, and ironically, it can survive only by collaborating with the anti-worker government and hostile employers.

The DLP and the Political Representation of the Working Class

The democratic trade union movement survived in the face of brutal hostility from governments and employers. It has a very strong tradition of anti-statism. As survival itself was a priority, democratic unionism was hesitant in coping with issues of working-class representation. One reason for this was the historical anti-communism and subsequent bias against working-class politics in South Korean society. Faced with incessant government attacks and politically hostile surroundings, however, the trade union movement nevertheless began to raise the issue. The turning point was the 1996–7 general strike. Though the outcome was poor, the power of the general strike was felt widely, and workers recovered their political orientation. Thus, the KCTU decided to run a workers' candidate in the 1997 presidential elections.

One of the important impacts of the general strike in 1996–7 was the revitalization of interest in the political representation of the working class. Thus, as the presidential election drew near in 1997, the KCTU decided to run a working-class candidate and nominated Kwon Young-gil. The other popular and social movement organizations joined this bid for political power. In this context the tactics of an independent candidate for workers and people was legitimized among unionists and activists, and its organizational expression was known as People's Victory 21, a broad electoral front for the presidential election, covering all political tendencies and shades. It appeared as a real hope for the labor and popular movement – a new momentum for working-class politics.

However, the result was a fiasco. In the course of the electoral campaign, the leadership of PV 21 leaned toward a tactical appeal to nationalist sentiment in the face of unprecedented economic crisis. For instance, the slogan of its campaign was "Rise up, Korea!" Many militants were upset with this nationalist maneuvering. As a moderate leader, the candidate Kwon Young-gil accepted it without question. The final tally from the contest was around 300,000 votes, much less than the membership of the KCTU. In that sense, the goal of implementing working-class politics was dismissed before the logic of "real politics" and electoralism. And however disastrous the election process and result were, the momentum toward institutional politics began to increase within the labor movement.

After the election, moderate leaders of PV 21 hastened to form a political party without any discussion of the electoral campaign or concrete plan for further organizing. While militants were absent from the process, the majority tendency of PV 21 began the organizational work of building an electoral party. Finally, in 2000, the Democratic Labor Party (DLP) was launched and took part in the general election in the spring. This attempt was also a total failure, and although ambitious individuals ran for election, the total vote for the DLP was less than 3 percent.

Internally, in 2002 the nationalist tendency that had been hostile to independent politics – and especially hostile toward forming an independent political party – made an abrupt political shift: the national congress of the NFDNU – National Federation for Democracy and National Unification – decided to join the DLP. Thus, nationally, thousands of nationalist activists joined the party, leading to a struggle for inner-party hegemony. Thus, in the mid-2000s, the DLP was a mixture of social democratic reformism and nationalism. This sectarian maneuvering degraded the party's reputation, disappointing many rank and file members.

In spite of internal factional fighting and growing bureaucratism, the DLP had some luck in 2004, when newly elected President Roh Moo-hyun was impeached by the conservative and reactionary coalition and a general election was held. The people were greatly upset with the arrogant maneuvering of the opposition parties, and Roh's new party, Uri Party, enjoyed a support rate of over 70 percent. In this context there appeared some room for a third party. Progressives voted for the DLP instead of the ruling Uri Party. Thus, in the general election in May 2004, the DLP won ten parliamentary seats. It was a great success for the DLP and a historical victory for the movement for popular political representation. However, it turned into a trap for the DLP.

Though the DLP enjoyed exclusive status as representing the labor and popular movements (excluding the minority left opposition outside of the DLP), political leadership and representation were in question over diverse issues. For example, though DLP MPs played a key role in blocking the passage of anti-worker labor laws, the DLP's position on the government revision was ambiguous. Also, when there was a fierce debate on the KCTU's participation in the tripartite commission, the DLP failed to make its position clear. The KCTU leadership's decision to join the tripartite commission was radically criticized by militant workers and rank and file activists, as the government's hostility meant that the tripartite institution was a mere rubber stamp and a political means of cooption of labor leaders.

Historically, the DLP has made some progress in terms of its entry into institutional politics, as well as quantitative growth, and it enjoys prestige as a progressive mass party. However, it is not free from sectarianism and bureaucracy, and it is unable to develop more consistent alternatives to the neoliberal agenda. Though it joined the struggles of workers and oppressed people, it failed to provide political leadership and representation. This limitation was dramatically shown in the presidential elections of 2007, in which DLP candidate Kwon Young-gil won just 712,000 votes (3 percent), less than in 2002. This electoral fiasco, together with the shock caused by the election of Lee Myung-bak, former CEO of Hyundai Construction and programmatic conservative, drove the DLP into internal crisis. In the aftermath of the election, left-wing tendencies and individuals split from the DLP, criticizing its hegemonic maneuvering, bureaucratism, and blind pro-North attitudes, and finally forming a new party to the left of the DLP.

Development of Rank and File Organizations and Political Differentiation

In the early 1990s one of the most important struggles in the workplace was the fight for democratic trade unionism against government-controlled and employer-friendly yellow pseudo-unions. Though workers won significant gains in terms of wages, benefits, and working conditions, not a few unions were still in the grip of bureaucrats or collaborators. Thus, militant activists set the new stage of struggle for democratic unions through the course of union elections at workplace level. In many cases the activists began to democratize the union structure and reform bureaucratic practices, thereby implementing union democracy at workplace level. However, once democratization was consolidated, political differentiation developed among rank and file activists. A moderate tendency emerged among union leaders, who emphasized negotiation rather than struggle. This division between the moderate and militant tendencies was important for the future course of the labor movement. The difference was a multi-faceted one over the strategy and tactics of the labor movement.

One important aspect was the collapse of socialism internationally, which demoralized left tendencies and led to an unexpected ideological and political vacuum for working-class politics. Thus, working-class politics was reduced to union politics, and the labor movement, without its political arm, had to lead the popular movements as a whole, and the political struggle was one of the most important tasks for the labor movement. In terms of plant-level politics, the democratic rank and file activist groups began to divide through political differentiation. The different tendencies developed their own organizational networks, reflecting political differences over various issues. Thus, union elections became a focal point at which different tendencies contended for the leadership. Of course, pro-company groups took part in elections, but most of them failed to win.

The real problem was that as the struggles prolonged, the moderate wing began to gain ground among the union leadership not just at the plant level, but also within industrial federations and the confederation as a whole. Many of them were politically close to the NL tendency that steadily emphasized the importance of bargaining and appeal to citizens, not workers, for social reforms. Naturally, this rightward shift caused a series of debates and conflicts within the trade union movement.

Especially after the general strike in 1996–7, militant activists felt the need to organize rank and file activists into a nationally coordinated body. As political differentiation grew sharper, each tendency developed its own organizational network. And internal struggle intensified over the major issues of the labor movement. As the Kim Dae-jung and Roh Moo-hyun governments had strong personal links with many moderate leaders, they wanted to coopt the labor movement. And the tripartite commission for social dialogue between the state, capital, and labor preferred to show off its capacity to control the labor movement. The neoliberal keynote of government policy made any compromise irrelevant, except for the means to coopt the leadership and tame labor militancy. In spite of strong opposition against the social partnership, the moderate wing persisted in joining the tripartite commission as a social partner, ignoring the bitter lesson of western labor movements' experience of such partnership.

Ideological or political differentiation was crystallized into three major tendencies within the framework of the KCTU: the moderate wing, the centrist tendency, and the left-wing militant tendency. These three tendencies contest for the leadership of the KCTU, and while the militant tendency that inherited the Jeonnohyeop's militant unionism is a relative minority, it has a nationwide network of rank and file activists fighting against the rightward shift of democratic unionism.

Aftermath of Economic Crisis

Crucially, the South Korean labor movement failed to keep up the momentum of the general strike in 1996–7, mainly because of an unexpected economic crisis. The myth of employment for life was gone, and the issue of employment became the major concern for unionists, while a larger number of unorganized casual workers were most severely hit by the crisis. Though the labor movement resisted neoliberal offensives, most unorganized workers were defenseless. Under constant attack, most trade unions were busy with the defense of their own members. This instability accelerated the union leadership's turn to bureaucracy and collaborationism. In tandem with growing reformism and collaborationism, moderates in the bureaucracy strengthened their hegemony. Naturally, with growing discontent and apathy among rank and file unionists, the union leadership constantly felt threatened. Debate on the social partnership was a key issue over which internal tendencies were diametrically opposed.

In this context the KCTU gradually lost its prestige as leader for democracy and social progress. Its most serious problem was that it lost its strong support from the base, losing actual capacity to fight back, as well as the capacity to lead the whole struggle of the working class. In the 2000s the most important labor struggles were led by militants at small- and medium-sized factories, mostly casual workers. They were usually driven to the wall when faced not only with attacks by the state and capital, but also, more ominously, the apathy of regular workers and their unions.

In the 2000s most struggles were organized by militant casualized workers. Many of them carried on month-long or year-long struggles. For instance, casual workers in Korea Telecom waged a struggle for their right to be employed as regular workers over two years in the early 2000s. Plant construction casual workers waged militant street fights in major industrial cities in 2004 and 2005. Truck workers led a general strike and tower crane workers organized several sit-ins, occupying high-rise cranes. The workers hired by inplant subcontractors in the auto and ship-building industries organized workers' unions separately from regular workers' unions.

In 2004, based on militant struggles, casual and contingent workers organized a nationwide network of militant casual workers within the KCTU: the National Solidarity of Casual Workers' Unions. The formation of a national network of casual workers is a symbol of the new militancy of casual workers. As more than half of the working population is in irregular employment, a series of struggles by casual and contingent workers provided some potential for revitalization of the Korean labor movement and could form another generation of democratic unionism in the near future.

On the other hand, as union machines became more and more bureaucratic, class-based solidarity is growing weaker in the face of even harsher attacks. Reformist leadership pursued "social dialogue" while avoiding confrontation with the state. The fundamental reason for this is its dubious relationship with the liberal wing of the ruling bloc. Thus, the independence of democratic unionism was seriously threatened. This led to the multi-faceted crisis of democratic unionism in South Korea.

Korea, migrant workers' struggle

Won Young-su

From the late 1980s, migrant workers began to work in place of Koreans who shunned dirty, dangerous, and difficult ("3D") jobs. These workers faced low wages, inhumane working conditions, and brutal treatment by Korean employers as they became a third class within the workforce. Some churches and non-governmental organizations (NGOs) helped migrant workers in terms of wage arrears, industrial accidents, and medical care in a humanitarian effort, but this aid was small-scale. By the mid-1990s, however, some migrant workers who had become acquainted with the South Korean workers' struggle and the militant culture of the democratic labor movement began to fight for their rights in a broader sense.

The Industrial Trainee System (ITS) under which migrant workers were permitted to work in South Korea forced them to work only for designated companies and denied them the basic right to choose their own jobs. At the risk of breaking the rules, many migrant workers moved companies for better jobs and became illegal workers, and by the end of the 1990s, two-thirds of Korea's 600,000 migrant workers were illegal or undocumented. This left them vulnerable to the crackdowns of immigration officials and exploitation by employers. Many of them were deported, leaving behind a bad memory of wage arrears, industrial accidents, verbal assaults, violence, and rapes. As a result, migrant workers began to demand the abolition of the notorious ITS and the introduction of a working visa, as well as equal treatment with South Koreans. In 2001, they developed the Migrant Branch of Equality Trade Union (MB-ETU) and led a huge struggle for migrant workers' rights, organizing sit-in camps in historic Myoungdong Cathedral to oppose a Work Permit System that was to be introduced in place of the ITS.

In the course of over a year's struggle, migrant activists trained to form the core leadership of a migrant workers' movement. In early 2004 they built their own full-fledged union, Seoul-Gyeonggi-Incheon Migrant Workers' Union, and joined the Korean Confederation of Trade Unions, in spite of government suppression and the deportation of migrant leaders. Thus, they reproduced the militant tradition of the independent and democratic labor movements and built an independent and democratic trade union in alliance with militant Korean trade unionists and radical activists, free from humanitarian intervention.

Korea, movement of the urban poor

Won Young-su

Exceptionally rapid urbanization in the 1960s and 1970s produced chaotic shantytowns in Korean cities, especially Seoul and the surrounding metropolitan areas. Poor living conditions and lack of adequate sanitary systems, basic utilities, and mass transportation were the norm for every shantytown. Thus, the popular anger of shantytown dwellers was a matter of course. In 1970, an urban poor riot broke out at Kwangju, a suburban area of Seoul, as enraged residents fought with riot police and occupied the city hall, demanding their rights for decent housing and reasonable living conditions.

This spontaneous riot ignited the struggle of the urban poor, and in the 1970s and early 1980s, many shantytown residents organized themselves, with the help of local churches and student activists. Thus, as the military regime initiated its cleansing plan for shantytowns, residents organized a coalition for their right to residence. This was an important trend of urban poor struggles. However, as most shantytowns were eliminated one by one, the poor were scattered or driven out to remote places, and the movement of urban shantytown dwellers lost its momentum in the late 1990s. A growing number of homeless appeared, signifying the phenomenon of "new poverty."

At the same time, street vendors led another important movement of the urban poor. These informal sector workers, mostly self-employed, constantly faced harassment by government officials and the police who wanted to create an image of a modern city and saw their presence as a hindrance. The vendors were forced to struggle for their very existence and organized themselves in the 1990s. They formed a national federation of street vendors, and together with the shantytown dwellers' group they built the Korean Federation of Poor People's Movements in November 1990. After the democratization of society, however, because of its loose organization and the atypical character of its membership, the urban poor movement lost its momentum and dynamics, becoming less and less visible in the late 1990s and 2000s.

Korea, peasant and farmers' movement

Won Young-su

Korea's rural communities have been continuously hard hit by imperial exploitation, industrialization, urbanization, and globalization. After the end of Japanese imperial rule, rural society was transformed into a peasant economy that was subordinated to the urban sector. As South Korean society turned from an agricultural to an industrial one, the rural population decreased from more than three-quarters to one-tenth of the whole population.

Traditionally, the rural communities had been bastions of social conservatism, even becoming a reactionary electoral base for the military dictatorships that ruled Korea in the postwar years. However, under the impact of rapid industrialization and urbanization, rural communities faced natural disasters as well as government policies of low agricultural prices and social discrimination. Recently, the indiscriminate opening of domestic markets to transnational agricultural monopoly capital has further harmed rural Korea. Thus, most peasant households are riddled with huge debts and driven to the verge of complete bankruptcy.

From the 1970s, farmers began to fight back for survival. In the initial stages of the movement, the Catholic and Protestant churches helped farmers organize. Not a few rural pastors and former student activists helped, in spite of threats and propaganda by government officials and local authorities. Often, activists were condemned as communists, reminiscent of the nightmare of the Korean War. Because of such scare campaigns, the government's anti-farmer policy contributed to the growth of discontent and protest among farmers.

In the 1970s and 1980s, according to a long tradition, students went to the countryside to help farmers work. While there, they attempted to expose the miserable situation of rural villages and to raise the class consciousness of farmers. The summer vacation activities of these students helped lay organizational bases for the future development of the peasant movement.

In the 1980s, radicalization and mass struggle against the government influenced the farmers' movement. In the face of harsh government policies in the agricultural sector, young farmers began to join the struggles gradually, becoming a cadre of growing peasant activism. Throughout the 1980s scores of farmers' associations developed at the local level and competed with government-controlled rural organizations. But in this stage, most of the struggles were confined to the local or regional level, though church-assisted groups established a national organization.

Eventually, under the impact of a 1987 uprising and subsequent democratization, several currents of farmers' groups joined forces to build a national federation. The Korean Peasant League (KPL) was formed in April 1990, out of the merger of different peasant groups, including a Catholic and Protestant farmers' association. From this stage, the farmers' federation kept its organizational independence from religious groups.

In the 1990s, especially under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade-initiated Uruguay Round talks, the opening of the local agricultural market, especially the rice market, became a critical issue for farmers' existence. In the course of the broad struggle against the Uruguay Round, farmers led the struggle for their livelihood and food sovereignty, with the KPL organizing national rallies several times, much like the national workers' rally held every November. Accordingly, by the mid-1990s, the peasant movement established itself as one of the two pillars of the Korean popular movement, along with the labor movement. Though farmers' mobilization was restricted by the farming schedule, often, after harvest every year in November or December, the KPL had a capacity to mobilize tens of thousands of farmers nationally.

After the struggle against the Uruguay Round negotiations in the 1990s, changes in the rural community further accelerated, driving most of them to the brink of collapse. With the growing importation of cheap agricultural products, especially from China, many farmers went bankrupt. As a result, by the turn of the century Korean farmers led the national and international struggle against neoliberal globalization and the opening of agricultural markets, confronting the neoliberal regime, transnational agricultural capital, and international financial institutions like the World Trade Organization (WTO), International Monetary Fund (IMF), and World Bank. For instance, the KPL was a leading force in the anti-WTO struggle in Cancun, Mexico (2003), where a farmer, Lee Kyung Hae, killed himself in protest at the WTO's anti-farmer policy. Korean farmers led another anti-WTO struggle in Hong Kong (2005), and in struggles against the South Korea–US Free Trade Agreement in 2006 and 2007. In these protests, the Korean farmers' movement played an important role, along with Latin American peasants and indigenous farmers, in the international struggle of La Via Campesina.

Korea, popular rebellions and uprisings, 1492–1910

Won Young-su

The Chosun Dynasty (1492–1910) was founded by the military rebellion of General Lee Sung-gye, who became the first king, Taejo. His rebellion represented the formation of a new ruling class based on a newly emerging elite and military leaders under the auspices of Sung Confucius ideology. For a century, the Chosun Dynasty witnessed impressive developments in science, industry, and institutional reform, including the creation of Hangul, the Korean alphabet, under King Sejong. However, from the sixteenth century, the contradictions of the medieval caste regime began to harden, and divisions among the ruling class, factional struggles, and challenges from below destabilized the social structure, severely weakening the nation. Thus, Chosun was invaded by Japanese forces under Toyotomi Hideyoshi in 1592, and by the Ching Dynasty of China in 1637. These foreign invasions further destabilized the legitimacy of the Chosun Dynasty. On the other hand, the rapid development of production by means of two-crop farming and rice transplantation clashed with feudal land ownership. Thus, while a new class of enriched plebians began to grow as a social force, together with professionals like doctors and other specialists, large numbers of feudal farmers were expelled from their lands and exploited by landowners and government officials.

Centralized rule constantly evoked resistance from local oligarchies and popular classes combined with class conflicts. The deep corruption of local authorities, known as the three injustices of land, military service, and rice, was an immediate target of the ever-widening anger of farmers and various underclasses. Thus, from the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, revolts and protests of plebes (mostly peasants) became more frequent in diverse forms.

The nineteenth century, the final century of the Chosun Dynasty, is called the Century of Popular Rebellions, as the whole feudal system was in crisis. As these primitive forms of popular movements and rebellions targeted feudal ruling classes and imperial forces, they were an effort from below to modernize the nation. These popular protests took two forms: popular rebellions and political revolts. Basically, popular rebellions were economic struggles of the deprived classes – mostly local struggles against government officials. In contrast, political revolts were consciously organized by intellectuals and professionals who were discriminated against by the caste system.

In the earlier period, popular protests had taken a spontaneous form, but at this point they became more organized and persistent. In most popular rebellions, farmers and their leaders protested against local authorities, but when their demands were not met they became violent, attacking low-level officials and in some cases expelling from town appointed top officials. Protesters usually circulated appeals, held assemblies, and began collective actions, including arson, lynching, and looting. Rural intellectuals played a leading role in the early stages of protest, but as actions turned violent, militant rank-and-file farmers led the struggles.

On the other hand, the politically and economically marginalized Yangban elite led a more organized form of rebellion, and some of them even attempted a political revolt or revolution against the feudal regime. In this case, religion was important. Popular faith in a future Buda or Prodigy was an important means to mobilize the disgruntled lower classes for a utopian future.

In some cases, peasant uprisings and popular rebellions were combined. As the feudal regime lost control over its subjects, more and more disgruntled intellectuals joined forces in political plots and actively organized impoverished peasants. This meant the rebellions and revolts were politicized and revolutionized more and more, developing into a more systematic anti-feudal and anti-imperial popular movement.

At the same time, the Chosun Dynasty was severely weakened by internal contradictions and vulnerable to foreign invasions. At different times, Chosun was invaded by Japan and China. Both invasions destroyed the whole country, as the royal court was incompetent in defending the country. In contrast, oppressed people voluntarily organized themselves and fought the invaders, alongside official armies or independently waged guerilla wars. Mostly composed of Buddhist monks, lower-class people, and opposition intellectuals, these forces were called Just Militia.

Many people were angered by the cowardice of government officials who ran away in the face of the Japanese and Manchurian armies. Thus, many began to feel that Chosun was close to its demise, and disgruntled intellectuals and professionals attempted organized rebellions. In many cases they gained the support of local people and sometimes even of famous militias. Lee Mong-hak and Song Yu-jin led revolts against the incompetent dynasty.

In addition to these challenges, the dynasty also faced a number of bandits, such as Lim Keokjung, Hong Kil-dong, and Chang Kilsan. As they became the subjects of folklore passed down from generation to generation, these bandits stimulated the imagination of the oppressed people. Though they are categorized as bandits, they generally enjoyed broad popular support, and in some cases, when groups of bandits spread rebellious ideas, most of the oppressed people, even lower officials and some members of the lower Yangban class, welcomed what they saw as their just cause. Though the boundary is rather blurred, the thefts, robberies, and violence of these bandits represented popular anger and frustration with the corrupt regime of the Chosun Dynasty.

Besides bandits, there were secret societies that challenged the caste system of the time. The lowest classes under Chosun's caste system were private and official servants and untouchables like butchers. As the caste system began to collapse, many intelligent servants became politically conscious and organized other secret societies, like the Sword Society and the Kill the Lord Society. The existence of these secret societies showed the depth of anger among the lower classes who had been systematically discriminated against and exploited. As they watched their masters and lords from close quarters, they saw the contradictions of the caste system and its injustices.

In the final decades of Chosun, the feudal regime was faced with crisis after crisis, universalizing protests and rebellions from all strata of oppressed people. The various forms of rebellions in the nineteenth century culminated in the nationwide Imsul Rebellion and Donghak Peasant War.

Hong Kyung-rae's Rebellion (1811) occurred in the northern territory bordering China. The locals felt they were discriminated against and exploited by the central government and its local agents. Hong Kyung-rae gathered his comrades and initiated an uprising in which he confronted the government's army. At first the rebel army moved to the south, but in the face of the government army it retreated to a fortress, where it fought with the government army for over four months. In spite of heroic resistance, the revolt was crushed and more than 2,000 rebels were executed.

Of all the rebellions in Chosun, the Imsul Popular Rebellion (1862) was the first to have a nationwide scope. It covered three regions in the southern part of the kingdom. The rebellion began in Jinju in southern Keongsang province and spread to neighboring Jeonra and Chung-cheong provinces, covering most of the southern part of the peninsular, even toward Jeju Island.

The Donghak Peasant War (1894) was the largest rebellion in the history of Chosun. The rebels were equipped with Donghak ideology, which was against western civilization, especially Catholicism, which was protected and encouraged to spread under the pressure of western imperialism. The war originated in the Kobu Rebellion and developed in two stages of massive peasant wars under the leadership of Jeon Bong-jun, a national hero of the anti-imperialist and anti-feudal struggle. In the first stage, the mass base of the movement led to peace with the government and co-governance over the region. However, as the Chosun government aligned with Japan, the peasant army rose up again. The rebel army was defeated by joint Chosun and Japanese forces, and the anti-feudal and anti-imperialist orientation of the peasant war was finally crushed. The war is an important part of the heritage of popular struggle in the Chosun Dynasty, as well as a precursor of the anti-imperialist national liberation movement in the first half of the twentieth century.

Under the final king of Chosun, Kojong, the country was in its terminal crisis. Confronted with imperialist pressure, the ruling class was divided into differing factions: pro-Chinese, pro-Japanese, and pro-Russian. On one hand, there were moves to modernize the country by opening it to diplomacy with western countries. On the other hand, popular revolt against the feudal regime and foreign forces became more frequent.

After the Donghak Peasant War, a number of revolts broke out in Pungcheon, Chilwon, Tongyeong, Ulsan, Yeosu, Jeongseon, and throughout the country. The most remarkable of these rebellions was led by Lee Pilje, who attempted revolts in four counties in Jincheon, Jinju, Yeonghae, and Joryeong. He succeeded in the uprising in Yeonghae, but failed in Joryeong, and was executed. Lee Pilje symbolized a professional revolutionary in the Chosun feudal era and enjoyed a broad mass base. Anti-feudal revolts in Jeju Island were also important. Peasants in Jeju occupied local government and fought against government forces. Lee Jesu's revolt was particularly successful and even attempted to turn the island into an independent country.

Thus, in face of a corrupt feudal dynasty and an incompetent regime, peasant and grassroots people organized rebellions and revolts that served as examples for future generations in the twentieth century.

Korea, post-World War II popular movements for democracy

Won Young-su

South Korea's brilliant economic performance and achievement since the end of the Korean War was built on the labor and suffering of workers, peasants, and the socially marginalized. An incessant series of popular struggles and movements reflects and represents the aspiration for democracy and popular welfare as a basic condition for humane subsistence. In the course of fierce resistance against the military dictators who have ruled Korea in the postwar years, various movements have developed a wide range of organizations and political strategies, establishing a vital social force over the diverse sectors of South Korean society.

Historical Background

For over 35 years in the first half of the twentieth century, the Korean nation was under the harsh rule of Japanese imperialism, which exploited the Korean people economically and brutally suppressed any resistance against its rule. In spite of harsh oppression, the Korean people continuously organized the struggle for national liberation, both inside Korea and abroad. On August 15, 1945, the nation was liberated from Japanese rule when Japan lost World War II to the Soviet Union and United States. When the war was over, both superpowers advanced into the Korean peninsula, where the nationalist and left forces were already so organized as to build a government of their own. Even so, the US occupation army ruled the South, and the USSR ruled the North, thereby planting a tragic seed of permanent national division.

National Liberation, War, and National Division

Combined with the international factor of Cold War politics and internal conflict, the divided Korean nation witnessed the establishment of separate national governments in mid-1948, contrary to the popular desire to build an independent country. All the left forces moved to the North in order to escape the anti-communist violence of the Rhee Syng-man regime. In the North, however, those from the South faced purges by northern leaders. This unstable climate and hostility led to a war between North and South in 1950 – the Korean War. It was one of the fiercest and most barbaric civil wars ever fought, and the first war in the Cold War era. In the course of the war, several million Koreans were killed and many more millions were injured, separated from their families, and displaced from their hometowns.

Both the United States and China intervened, and the civil war turned into a full-scale international war. As the forces involved and weapons in use escalated, the war became protracted and neither side could claim victory. Hence, both sides finally concluded a truce agreement in July 1953. Unfortunately, the truce of the war made the national division permanent, completely destroying the popular aspiration for an independent state, democracy, and economic welfare. Two different paths of social development were pursued separately: capitalism in the South, and socialism in the North.

The Impact of the Korean War on South Korean Society

The war destroyed all of what was left, and the entire population was impoverished, with the exception of those who cooperated with the United States. The war and concurrent class and ideological conflict divided the nation and created two antagonistic class states. Thus, in the South, any opposition to the government was prohibited, and the society was absolutely inoculated from left-wing or radical ideologies, regardless of whether it was socialism or communism. A succession of military dictators, such as Rhee Syng-man, Park Chung-hee, and Jun Doo-hwan, reproduced the same anti-communist, anti-democratic regimes for their own sake.

In the international context of the Cold War, South Korea, as an ally of the US, was at the forefront of international anti-communism. For instance, the South Korean government sent a large number of soldiers to Vietnam alongside the US forces. Also, the government blocked any kind of overseas contact for fear that any contact with North Koreans would become a direct threat to the regime, possibly engendering class-conscious grassroots opposition. Thus, South Korea was like an isolated island segregated from the international community.

For more than 40 years, the Korean people had suffered from all kinds of brutal suppression. They were unilaterally mobilized for the modernization and the nation-building project from above, without any claims to their legitimate rights. To suppress any popular resistance, successive regimes made use of anti-communist propaganda, depicting communists as non-humans.

Struggles against Dictatorship and toward Democratic Transition

Though civilian and military regimes used brutal means to suppress people, they failed to uproot popular resistance. They imprisoned tens of thousands of innocent people, on top of committed activists, but resistance sprang up incessantly, whenever and wherever possible. Thus, completely lacking political legitimacy, the dictatorships were periodically faced with internal and external crises. Under US tutelage, Rhee Syng-man's government was toppled by the student revolution of April 1960, in which students, including young middle and high school students, went against the dictatorship for its omnipresent corruption and electoral fraud. The Park Chung-hee government that came to power through a military coup d'état in May 1961 also collapsed in a royal court assassination by his own right-hand man and intelligence chief, Kim Jae-gyu. The notorious Yushin regime, which Park Chung-hee implanted under the banner of "Korean Democracy," collapsed because of its internal contradictions and popular resistance. Jun Doo-hwan, Chung-hee's successor, was forced to give up his intention of prolonging his military regime through the mechanism of an indirect electoral system, instead stepping down from the throne. He escaped being punished for his illegal coup d'état and for brutal crimes under his rule because of the division of opposition candidates and the subsequent victory of his colleague, Rho Tae-woo. But some time later, he was faced with imprisonment along with Rho, by the hand of Kim Young-sam, his political ally. As Kim Dae-jung and Rho Moo-hyun, both stubborn opposition leaders, won unexpected victories beginning in 1997, the long historical process of democratization appeared to mature. Thus, though the reaction from the former ruling bloc is not insignificant, South Korean society is regarded as a fully grown democracy, both nationally and internationally.

However, the neoliberal turn under the democratic civil government caused not a little confusion among their own supporters, as well as a reactionary backlash from the ruling oligarchy. The combination of the failure of consistent democratic reforms and the success in the neoliberal turn erased the dynamics of the democratization struggle. Eventually, the reconquest of power by the conservative forces that criticized the rule of liberal governments as "a lost decade" was completed in the presidential election in December 2007. Thus, the long cycle of democratic transition in South Korea has finished its final span, leading to another stage of conflict.

From State-Led Capitalism to Neoliberalism

As the war destroyed everything in the South, the remnants of the colonial economy were gone for good. The South Korean economy survived through western aid, especially US aid driven by its anti-communist agenda. The military dictatorship under General Park Chung-hee introduced a state-led economic plan to compensate for its lack of legitimacy. Park Chung-hee abandoned his pledge to return to the barracks and created a political party, intended as a tool for his personal rule. He maintained the state-driven economic development policy, suppressing any possible opposition.

Heavy investment by the state, and its control over all sectors of the economy, imposed burdens and sacrifices on workers and farmers, yet in spite of huge problems, the absolute poverty that had prevailed over both urban and rural society gave his regime some room for maneuver. In particular, the state-led rural campaign known as the New Village Campaign gave farmers some material benefits such as new roads, housing improvements, and connection to electricity. All these basic material improvements were welcomed by rural residents, who in turn became the electoral base for the military dictatorship. Also, in the course of state-led development, a small number of chaebols (conglomerate family-controlled firms) formed. Nepotism was an important source of economic success in this turbulent economic saga. The biggest victims were grassroots people, especially newly formed workforces from the rural areas and farmers in the countryside.

In five decades, the personal GDP of South Korea skyrocketed by a hundred times, from 200 US dollars in the early 1950s to 20,000 US dollars in the mid-2000s. This condensed rapid development transformed both Korean society and the economy fundamentally. But all of this was achieved within two generations, thereby causing a series of problems and contradictions. This rapid economic progress was not made in a smooth cycle but in a series of ups and downs, in particular the oil crisis in 1973–5, the economic crisis of the late 1970s, and the financial crisis in 1997–8. These terrible economic crises shifted the burdens of their contradictions to the working class, farmers, and urban lower classes. The economic transformations that were initiated in the course of the economic downturn of the late 1970s were a turning point in the march to neoliberalism, and the economic crisis in the late 1990s completed the transformation. Many big corporations went bankrupt, and many were sold to foreign enterprise hunters at artificially low prices. A huge number of unemployed and homeless were the symbols of South Korean capitalism in crisis. Under the banner of democratic reforms by civilian regimes, even under the Kim Dae-jung and Roh Moo-hyun regimes, neoliberal reforms such as structural adjustment, privatization, opening markets, deregulation, liberalization, and labor flexibilization were put on the permanent agenda of all the ruling blocs.

Popular Struggle: A Driving Force for Historical Development

Faced with constant economic exploitation and rigid political suppression, South Korean people were forced to choose between silent subservience and bold resistance. The overall picture of the last five decades may be depicted as a mixture of victory and defeats, but history has shown that the other side of rapid development and subsequent popular suffering is the heroic struggles and movements to build a democratic and humane alternative to the developmentalist dictatorship.

Emerging from an ideological and political vacuum, the popular resistance rose spontaneously and developed through a series of ups and downs, finally becoming crystallized in the powerful student movement from the mid-1970s to mid-1990s, and, later, in the labor movement from the late 1980s up to the present. These movements were known for militancy and tireless struggles against the overwhelmingly hostile power of the state and capital. At their core, the originally naïve liberal movements were radicalized, creating strong left movements which aimed at the revolutionary transformation of South Korean society.

Korea, protest against neoliberal globalization

Won Young-su

In recent years, a phenomenon known as globalization or neoliberal restructuring has affected nations throughout the world. The basic premise of this system is that restrictions on trade, such as tariffs, are a hindrance and that "free trade," or a lack of restrictions such as tariffs, is better. Opponents, however, point out that such a system leads to workers and farmers throughout the world being exploited even further while only the ruling classes profit. In Korea, as in other nations, this system has been universalized across all sectors of society. From the early 1990s, the labor movement has been hard hit, faced with a neoliberal New Management Strategy whose essence has been to implement the flexibilization of labor, employment, and labor markets. Thus, the struggle against neoliberal globalization has constituted a large part of the union movement, as public sector workers have fought against privatization, financial workers against the opening of the financial market, and other workers against worsening working conditions and precarious jobs.

In this context, the labor movement joined the anti-globalization movement in the late 1990s, waging a struggle against international financial institutions like the International Monetary Fund (IMF), the World Trade Organization (WTO), and the World Bank that had imposed neoliberal conditionality over nation-states. Thus, many Korean labor activists and unionists joined a series of important battles like WTO protests in Seattle in 1999, Cancun in 2003, and Hong Kong in 2005. Fighting the WTO and IMF, and the more recently the South Korea-US Free Trade Agreement, has been one of the major areas of workers' struggle. Together with farmers who have been severely affected by the liberalization, workers formed a bulwark against neoliberal globalization, protesting, for example, when the Roh Moo-hyun government initiated South Korea-US Free Trade Agreement negotiations in 2006. In response, the Korean Confederation of Trade Unions and other popular and social movements converged to form a broad coalition. Though two years' struggle failed to stop the negotiation, Korean workers and peasants held a national rally in July 2006 with tens of thousands joining in, and metal workers organized a general strike against the free trade agreement in July 2007.

Kosovo, civil and armed resistance, 1990s

Isabel Ströhle

Following the abolition of Kosovo autonomy in 1989 and the restoration of Serbian central rule in Yugoslavia by Slobodan Milošević under the “anti-bureaucratic revolution,” a broad resistance movement emerged in the region. In December 1989, the leaders of the Kosovo Albanian opposition founded the Democratic League of Kosovo (LDK), forming a shadow state with parallel political institutions. The LDK, organized on the basis of a broad political movement rather than a standard party, sought to prevent violent conflict, deny the legitimacy of Serbia’s rule, and encourage international intervention.

LDK activists effectively prevented the legitimate expansion of Serbian rule into Kosovo through boycotting Serbian and Yugoslav elections and censuses and operating through the political channels of the unsanctioned parallel state and institutions. On July 2, 1990, Albanian deputies of the dissolved Kosovo Assembly declared the Yugoslav Republic of Kosovo, and following the secession of Croatia and Slovenia from Yugoslavia on October 19, 1991, the nationalists sought outright independence, declaring the sovereign and independent Republic of Kosova. In a referendum on independence, clandestine parliamentary and presidential elections were held, with the LDK winning 76.5 percent of the votes, and Ibrahim Rugova being elected president of the Kosovo Republic by 99.5 percent of the vote which included almost exclusively those of Albanian descent and excluding Serbs living in the region.

The government organized parallel health and education systems replacing social services curtailed by the Yugoslav authorities. A system of secondary and university education was organized on private premises through 1997, despite shortages of trained teachers and materials. Basic medical aid was provided in clinics established in private homes and operated by the Mother Theresa Association and local humanitarian agencies. The institutions were financed by the collection of a special 3 percent household tax, a 10 percent tax on Kosovo Albanian businesses, and donations from communities in Western Europe and the United States.

To avert any pretext for ethnic cleansing akin to Bosnia in the early 1990s, the doctrine of non-violence was advanced by a broad coalition of Kosovar sociopolitical forces, who pragmatically recognized the military superiority of the Serbian army. By advocating non-violence the LDK sought to internationalize the conflict, assuming that peaceful protest would be rewarded by furthering the goal of internationally recognized independence. But when the international community neglected Kosovo Albanians in the peace treaty of Dayton, passive resistance increasingly lost its appeal and the political leadership split into pacifist, activist, and militarist camps.

Until 1997 armed resistance was only supported by marginal, radical groups like the Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA), which initially issued communiqués carrying out attacks on Serbian police stations, government officials, and so-called Albanian collaborators. The KLA was rooted in small, secretive, Marxist-Leninist nationalist clandestine groups that also had support from traditional clans in remote rural areas. The state collapse in Albania in 1997 and the subsequent plundering of arms depots facilitated the KLA’s acquisition of large stores of weapons, which were smuggled across the porous Albania border into Yugoslavia. The military cache made possible the growth of the KLA from a marginal guerilla organization of some 150 members in 1997 into a broad armed resistance movement. The KLA armed resistance was catalyzed by the increase in Serbian police and army violence against the rural population, in particular the Drenica massacres in spring 1998. To prevent further attacks on civilians, the KLA operated a security force in the rural region and ideologically sought to gain an internationally recognized independent state, envisaging the creation of a Greater Albania. By 1998, the KLA grew to an estimated 12,000 rebels, still outnumbered by Serbian fighters by a factor of 2:1. However, the KLA was a decentralized rebel force, lacking a unified command structure.

The April to September Serb military offensive against KLA strongholds in central and western Kosovo weakened the guerillas greatly, displacing approximately 200,000 Kosovo Albanians.

Some 98,000 Kosovo Albanians sought refugee status in nearby countries as reports of human rights violations and an impending refugee crisis mounted. In the face of the early onset of winter, the international community, led by US special envoy Richard Holbrooke, sought to force Milošević into an armistice, the so-called Milošević–Holbrooke Agreement.

Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) peacekeeping troops were deployed in the region as Serbian troops withdrew in a “verification mission,” permitting the return of refugees. However, the KLA seized the opportunity to reoccupy formerly lost positions, in turn provoking Serbian military action. Following a renewed Serbian offensive, peace talks continued in the spring of 1999 through the NATO-brokered peace talks in Rambouillet and Paris. The peace talks legitimated the KLA’s political position, providing the organization a prominent role in the Albanian negotiation team. However, the proposed peace agreement was signed only by the Albanian side and Holbrooke’s final negotiation attempts failed. Subsequently, NATO launched air strikes against Yugoslav targets on March 24, 1999 aiming to end the Serbian offensive and the further expulsion and exodus of Albanians from the region. On July 1, 1999, following the establishment of the United Nations administration in Kosovo, the KLA ostensibly agreed to demilitarization in the peace agreement. Although the KLA officially disbanded, the rebels were integrated into the new Kosovo Protection Corps (KPC), a civilian emergency service, the Democratic Party of Kosovo (PDK), and other sanctioned military structures. However, due to obscure channels of financing, alleged involvement in organized crime, and suspicion over the masterminding and organized expulsion of Serbs and Roma peoples in the months following the war, the former KLA has also come under severe criticism for human rights violations.

Kronstadt Mutiny of 1921

Christian Garland

The Kronstadt Mutiny refers to an uprising in the early part of March 1921 by Russian sailors at the Kronstadt naval base on Kotlin Island, near the Gulf of Finland, against the Bolshevik regime. The uprising remains of key historical importance to this day, drawing differing and opposing positions on the Russian Revolution, and questions of workers’ control, the nature of post-revolutionary politics, and where power should lie. Broadly speaking, left communists and class struggle anarchists almost without exception take the view that the Kronstadt revolt was an authentic proletarian uprising against an authoritarian regime, controlled by a new bureaucratic class. Leninists, by contrast, are equally firm in their belief, albeit with a few variations, that the suppression of the rebellion led by Leon Trotsky was vital – however regrettable – to the survival of the revolution.

The uprising was the culmination of a period of discontent across a country ravaged by famine and poverty, following the end of the Russian Civil War. Lenin’s policy of War Communism saw production in many sectors falling to around 20 percent of pre-World War I levels, creating intense hardship for the general population in the process. Elsewhere, in the Ukraine, Nestor Makhno’s anarchist guerrilla army would soon finally be crushed by the Bolshevik regime it had helped sustain against the counterrevolutionary White Guard throughout the bitter civil war.

The Bolsheviks had continually struggled to impose party discipline on both non-party and party members of the Baltic Fleet; however, sailors refused to accept the party’s will, despite all attempts to enforce acceptance of its directives. Measures such as “Army customs” from 1920 onwards met with opposition and outright resistance from the rank and file. Hostility to the Bolshevik hierarchy was voiced in the sailors' anger at the "dictatorial attitudes" of party apparatchik, and an atmosphere of open insubordination largely prevailed.

On February 15 the Second Conference of Communist Sailors of the Baltic Fleet had met and assembled 300 delegates who voted to condemn the Poubalt (Political Section of the Baltic Fleet) as a "a bureucratic organ" which had "separated itself from the masses," adding that it now had "no authority amongst the sailors." The second resolution condemned the "total absence of a plan or method in the work of Poubalt," adding: "There is also a lack of agreement between its actions and the resolutions adopted at the Ninth Party Congress." The third resolution stated that Poubalt had "totally detached itself from the Party masses, [and] destroyed all local initiative." The resolution also stated that Poubalt had "transformed all political work into paper work," adding: "This has had harmful repercussions on the organization of the masses in the Fleet. Between June and November last year, 20 percent of the sailor party members have left the party. This can be explained by the wrong methods of the work of Poubalt." The four resolutions concluded with criticism of the centralized bureucratic nature of Poubalt, citing "the very principles of [its] organization. These principles must be changed in the direction of greater democracy" (Mett 1967).

The Kronstadt sailors – once referred to as "the flower of the revolution" by Trotsky – sent delegates to St. Petersburg to report back on the situation; reports of repression and near-terror continued. On February 28 the crews of the the battleships Petropavlovsk and Sevastopol met and agreed a resolution issuing the following 15 demands:

- 1 Immediate new elections to the Soviets. The present Soviets no longer express the wishes of the workers and peasants. The new elections should be by secret ballot, and should be preceded by free electoral propaganda.
- 2 Freedom of speech and of the press for workers and peasants, for the anarchists, and for the left socialist parties.
- 3 The right of assembly, and freedom for trade union and peasant organizations.

- 4 The organization, at the latest on March 10, 1921, of a Conference of non-Party workers, soldiers, and sailors of Petrograd, Kronstadt, and the Petrograd District.
- 5 The liberation of all political prisoners of the socialist parties, and of all imprisoned workers and peasants, soldiers and sailors belonging to working-class and peasant organizations.
- 6 The election of a commission to look into the dossiers of all those detained in prisons and concentration camps.
- 7 The abolition of all political sections in the armed forces. No political party should have privileges for the propagation of its ideas, or receive state subsidies to this end. In the place of the political sections various cultural groups should be set up, deriving resources from the state.
- 8 The immediate abolition of the militia detachments set up between towns and countryside.
- 9 The equalization of rations for all workers, except those engaged in dangerous or unhealthy jobs.
- 10 The abolition of Party combat detachments in all military groups. The abolition of Party guards in factories and enterprises. If guards are required, they should be nominated, taking into account the views of the workers.
- 11 The granting to the peasants of freedom of action on their own soil, and of the right to own cattle, provided they look after them themselves and do not employ hired labor.
- 12 We request that all military units and officer trainee groups associate themselves with this resolution.
- 13 We demand that the Press give proper publicity to this resolution.
- 14 We demand the institution of mobile workers' control groups.
- 15 We demand that handicraft production be authorized provided it does not utilize wage labor.

In response, a general meeting of the garrison was held, attended by Bolshevik dignitaries including the commissar of the Baltic Fleet. In opposition to the Bolshevik presence, a Provisional Revolutionary Committee was formed, approving the 15 demands. On March 2 the Bolsheviks responded with an ultimatum demanding the Kronstadt rebels disband their new committee or face the consequences. The Kronstadt sailors refused. The Bolsheviks denounced the mutiny, claiming it had "undoubtedly been prepared by French counterintelligence” and that the Petrovavlovsk resolution was a “SR-Black Hundred” resolution, referring to the Social Revolutionaries and the unrelated right-wing Black Hundreds.

The rebels by now had occupied strategic points across the naval town, taking over all government establishments, including staff headquarters, and the telephone and wireless buildings. Meanwhile, each battleship and regiment elected its own committee, modeled on the directly recallable model of the Soviets. By 9:00 p.m. on the evening of March 2 the majority of Red Army detachments at Kronstadt had declared their support for the rebellion. On March 3 Kronstadt published the first issue of the Izvestia of the Provisional Revolutionary Committee.

On March 7 Trotsky and Lev Kamenev ordered the attack against Kronstadt, dispatching around 60,000 troops under the command of Mikhail Tukhachevsky. The Red Army forces met fierce resistance, losing more than 10,000 men, not including those who joined the rebellion. The rebellion was finally crushed on March 19. Official Soviet figures put the number of rebels killed at just 1,000 but the real figure is almost certainly more, with some estimates putting it as high as 14,000–16,000. Many fled to nearby Finland, while many more were sent to labor camps.

The Kronstadt mutiny had been provoked by the depredations and miseries of a prolonged civil war, and a Bolshevik regime impervious to criticism from below. Besides the seemingly modest demands of the rebels calling for freedom of speech and free elections, there was the belief that the Soviets, originally organs of proletarian democracy, had been suffocated by the bureaucracy who maintained a rigid policy of top-down diktats imposed by force. Trotsky notoriously claimed that his suppression of the mutiny had “with an iron broom, rid Russia of anarchism once and for all.”

The suppression of the mutiny continues to provoke bitter argument, but what is apparent in the demands and actions of the sailors is the resolute belief that the revolutionary hopes of 1917 had been betrayed by an increasingly authoritarian party growing ever more removed from the masses it claimed to represent; the rebellion was an attempt, made from the bottom up, to confront the power of the Bolsheviks with what it saw as the power of the people.

Kropotkin, Peter (1842–1921)

Benjamin J. Pauli

Peter Kropotkin was one of the foremost theorists of anarchism – its principal exponent in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, and someone who imbued it with a philosophical and scientific legitimacy that would greatly enhance its reception in his own day and beyond. Kropotkin himself traced his anarchist sensibility back to his earliest years. He was born in Moscow in 1842 to a family that belonged to the highest stratum of Russian nobility. Kropotkin’s father was a military officer and serf owner. Though his father’s treatment of the family serfs was mild by relative standards, Kropotkin was dismayed by the extent of their oppression, and would come to sympathize deeply with their plight. After his mother died, Kropotkin and his siblings were placed almost entirely in the care of serf servants, and the loving affection and devotion the young Kropotkin received from them contributed strongly to the respect he had for the peasantry and the solidarity he felt with them throughout his life. His feelings of solidarity with the lower strata of society were further reflected in his refusal, at age 12, to be addressed as “Prince” – the beginning of a lifelong rejection of special status on account of his noble blood.

Having caught the eye of Emperor Nicholas I at a reception in the emperor’s honor, Kropotkin was shortlisted for the Corps of Pages, the most prestigious military school in Russia, which he entered in 1857. The school was a somewhat paradoxical combination of often abusive military discipline and enlightened progressive education. While Kropotkin distinguished himself as an exceptional student, he also launched small revolts against the prevailing order in the school, including the publication of his first underground radical paper. His academic accomplishments overshadowed his burgeoning rebelliousness, however, and he was successful enough to be appointed personal page to Tsar Alexander II in 1861.

Like many Russian youths sympathetic to liberal reform at the time, Kropotkin was a constitutionalist, calling for the tsar to limit rather than renounce his power. In the tsar's presence on a daily basis, Kropotkin was at first optimistic about his seemingly reformist tendencies. The liberation of the serfs in 1861, it seemed, was a sign of considerable progress. It soon became clear, however, that hopes for reform were overblown, due to Alexander's weak temperament and his conservative circle of advisors. Disillusioned, Kropotkin left the Corps and the side of the tsar in 1862 determined to pursue reform through other channels.

Because he was unable to attend university at this time, Kropotkin enlisted in a military regiment posted in the remote Amur region of Siberia. During his time in the area, he worked on reforming prisons and local government under General Kukel, the military governor of eastern Siberia, who shared many of Kropotkin's liberal views. Kropotkin's skepticism about government was confirmed by the rampant corruption and conservatism he witnessed during this period. When St. Petersburg officially put a moratorium on liberal reform, the disappointed Kropotkin turned his attention to exploration. His several expeditions in eastern Siberia and Manchuria led to the geographical discoveries that would later make him famous in the scientific world, and his observations of animal interaction laid the groundwork for his theory of mutual aid. Furthermore, even though the working conditions that Kropotkin came across horrified him, he was consistently impressed by the resilience and solidarity of the peasants, even in the face of brutal oppression, as well as the structure of village communities.

Fed up with the army, and freshly conscious of the difficulty of reform from within, Kropotkin returned to St. Petersburg in 1867 with the ground thoroughly primed for his burgeoning anarchist political philosophy. He finally got the chance to study math at the university level, and became known as a rising star in the field of geography. Kropotkin longed to become more politically active, however, and turned down an offer of the prestigious secretaryship of the Russian Geographical Society in 1871 in order to devote himself more fully to political causes. While he continued to write scientific articles and flesh out his principal contributions to the field, for the rest of his life Kropotkin's geographical work would take a back seat to his political activism.

In 1872 Kropotkin traveled to Switzerland to observe firsthand the Swiss groups affiliated with the International Workingmen's Association (IWA). Kropotkin was not particularly taken with the opportunistic political approach he witnessed in places like Geneva, but felt right at home in the anti-statist Jura Federation, where Bakunin's influence was heavy and relations with the General Council of the IWA were strained. Observing anarchist principles in practice among the Jurassian watchmakers was enough to definitively convert Kropotkin to anarchism. Though he considered staying in Switzerland, Kropotkin decided to return to Russia to agitate for revolution in his home country. Influenced by the growing nihilist and narodnik movements, he became involved with the Chaikovsky Circle, a revolutionary populist group in which he helped to distribute and produce radical literature and organize discussion groups amongst workers. For his activities, Kropotkin was arrested in the spring of 1874, and would spend two years in the Peter and Paul Fortress. The experience, which weakened him physically for the rest of his life, came to an end in 1876 when he made a dramatic escape from a military hospital and fled Russia, ultimately returning to Switzerland in 1877. Here he threw himself into the activities of the struggling Jura Federation, and founded the papers Le Révolté and La Révolte.

In 1881, Kropotkin and his wife were expelled from Switzerland at the behest of St. Petersburg and, after a year and a half in England, settled in France in 1882. Continually pestered by local authorities and Russian spies, Kropotkin was arrested within months of his arrival and sentenced to five years in prison, though he was released prematurely in 1886 after international outcry. Banished from France, Kropotkin once again settled in England, where he focused on elaborating his anarchist philosophy. His best-known work stems from this time, including The Conquest of Bread (1892), Fields, Factories, and Workshops (1899), Memoirs of a Revolutionist (1899), and Mutual Aid (1902). In part because of his ailing health, Kropotkin toned down his political activity during this period of his life, though he helped to establish the British anarchist journal Freedom and lectured extensively. Though his extensive writing had established him as the most famous and respected anarchist in the world, Kropotkin alienated many of his radical friends with his somewhat puzzling support for World War I, claiming that it was a war against the state and the authoritarian German tradition that worshipped it. During the revolutionary events of 1917, Kropotkin returned to Russia for the first time since the 1870s, but quickly became disheartened about the prospects for revolutionary change with the ascendance of the Bolsheviks. Kropotkin died in 1921; his funeral was widely attended in what would be the last major gathering of anarchists in Russia.

If there is one major concern that underlies Kropotkin's body of work, it is the need to ground anarchist thought in a scientific understanding of the natural world. The rise of science, for Kropotkin, represented an intellectual revolution virtually unprecedented in scope and depth, fostering mental freedom through the dissipation of metaphysical and supernatural understandings of the world, and physical freedom through the continually expanding ability of humans to shape their environment. Science tells us, Kropotkin believed, that the interaction of matter on a cosmic scale is characterized by an ever-shifting search for equilibrium, a perpetual process that cannot be captured by the rigidity of legalistic or deterministic thinking. Harmony is not pre-conceived (for example, by a divine figure), is not preordained in a rigid code, but is constantly created, undermined, and reestablished, by countless interactions. In terms of human society, such equilibrium, far from being established from above by imposed regulation, has to arise through free association. Thus the development of a new, scientific understanding of the world and its processes went hand in hand for Kropotkin with the discovery of anarchism as the appropriate mode of human organization. Anarchism represented a flexible arrangement in which new configurations were continually sought to secure both the fullest development of individuality and the most thorough cultivation of voluntary, cooperative association. As such, an anarchist society could not be subjected to law or authority, even if instituted from below.

A scientific understanding of society would not be complete, however, without a scientific understanding of human nature. Kropotkin drew heavily from Darwin in his conception of the evolution of animal species, including the human species, but was sharply critical of the way Darwin's ideas had been appropriated by people like Herbert Spencer and Thomas Huxley, who emphasized competition and struggle as the essential mechanism of the evolutionary process. While Kropotkin conceded that competition was often central in relationships between species, he noted that within a particular species, mutual aid was by far the overriding variable in determining survival. Nature did indeed occasion the need for struggle, but this struggle was a collective struggle against circumstances rather than a war of each against all. Thus, society arises naturally from an innate tendency – present in even the minutest of animals – toward cooperation.

The instinct of mutual aid that Kropotkin observed among the animals of Siberia had its human equivalent in human beings' innate moral sense. Solidarity is the most fundamental instinct of the human species, and however oppressive the social system, Kropotkin believed that mutual aid was constantly at work in innumerable aspects of life. This intrinsic moral sense is, however, corrupted and stifled to a considerable extent by oppressive social arrangements like economic and political inequality, law, and the state's apparatus of punishment. It is further hindered by codified moral law, particularly insofar as the latter is a product of institutionalized religion. The concrete practice of mutual aid, not repression or even moral teaching, is the most effective way of maintaining the moral level of a given society. While Kropotkin consistently stressed the social nature of human beings, he refused to lose sight of the individual (though he was a sharp critic of the individualistic excesses he identified with anarchists like Max Stirner and Benjamin Tucker). Social tendencies and individual happiness, Kropotkin felt, develop in tandem. Self-realization cannot be separated from the good of the community.

If society is a natural outgrowth of instinctual tendencies, the state is an unnatural excrescence that serves the interests of a privileged elite rather than promoting equality and individual self-realization. Kropotkin thought that the idea of the state as a necessary coordinator of human activity was but another musty belief that had to go, and endeavored to bring to light the significant portion of daily life that is conducted outside of state auspices, including the rich diversity of voluntary associations that function in all spheres of human activity. Kropotkin wove a historical narrative in which the scope of voluntary association – which was broad in primitive societies and among the medieval free cities – was restricted over time by the rise of capitalism and the state. But the centralization and stratification of economic and political organization could not, of course, uproot the instinct of solidarity, and Kropotkin suggested that the modern world offered unprecedented opportunities to construct a society on this foundation.

Just as science was on the march, Kropotkin believed anarchism to be on the march; its arrival was, he thought, inevitable, though as he aged he saw it as coming further and further in the future. The contemporary advancements made in the direction of political liberty and economic equality had primed society for the introduction of anarchist communism. Anarcho-communism distinguished itself from both Proudhonian mutualism and Bakuninian collectivism by holding that the fruits of labor should be distributed on the basis of need, rather than individual contribution to the productive process. Kropotkin maintained that the eminently social character of production, especially in the modern era, rendered the notion of private property essentially incoherent, and necessitated a communist form of social organization.

Because the satisfaction of needs would be thoroughly fulfilled by communism, the groundwork would be laid for each and every individual to pursue his or her highest development. Scientific advancement, Kropotkin thought, had rendered the once-utopian anarchist ideal of social organization a concrete possibility. Most notably, the development of industrial technique, including intensive methods of food production, had made it possible to render the Malthusian notion of “scarcity” obsolete. The implication, Kropotkin suggested, was that in the modern industrial era it was possible to secure not only bread – as the title of one of his major works would suggest – but genuine well-being for all. He envisioned a society in which industry was decentralized, town and country were integrated, and the means of production were in the hands of associations of producers. Labor would be freely chosen, but a combination of mental and manual work would be emphasized. Accordingly, education would instill both mental and manual skills, as well as respect for both kinds of labor. Such an arrangement would lead to large gains in productivity, which would allow for significant reductions in the workday, as well as regional self-sufficiency.

Kropotkin argued that this mode of economic production could not be reconciled with the centralized political apparatus that had arisen with capitalism. In an anarchist society, he proposed, customs and a network of voluntary associations would take the place of the state, law, and government. Coercion, Kropotkin believed, is both an undesirable and ineffective strategy for preventing antisocial acts. Kropotkin assumed genuinely antisocial temperaments to be extremely rare, and thought the pressures of custom and social censure would be sufficient means of regulating behavior in an anarchist society. Drawing from his extensive experience as an observer of prison life on both the outside and the inside, Kropotkin concluded that prisons failed miserably in their supposed mission to rehabilitate criminals, instead dehumanizing them and rendering them unfit to function in society, and ultimately fostering rather than alleviating crime.

Despite his emphasis on harmony, Kropotkin realized that an anarchist society could only be created through forceful and sometimes violent action. Kropotkin did not share Bakunin’s enthusiasm for destruction – indeed, he had a deep personal aversion to violence and was more ambivalent about the use of “propaganda by the deed” than contemporary advocates like his friend Elisée Reclus – but he believed that occasional violence was an unavoidable, if distasteful, necessity. Kropotkin adamantly rejected the notion that revolution could be brought about by means of the state and law. He saw peaceful, parliamentary means of change as inadequate in the face of a middle class determined to maintain its grip on power, and warned that socialists who participate in the state have the tendency to drift away from their socialist inclinations.

Kropotkin did more than any other anarchist of his time to popularize anarchist thought and imbue it with ethical respectability and scientific and philosophical depth. He is the chief representative of a major branch of anarchist thought that insists upon seeing the individual in the context of the whole and linking individual well-being to the good of society. He was one of the few anarchists willing to give some idea of what an anarchist society would look like, and the vision he formulated would have a strong influence on subsequent anarchist theorists.

Kuliscioff, Anna (1853/1857?–1925)

Donatella Cherubini

Anna Kuliscioff was a leading Russian revolutionary and anarchist. After immigrating to Italy, she went on to become a socialist feminist, dedicating her political work to advancing the cause of women's emancipation.

Born to a wealthy family in Crimea, Kuliscioff received a university degree in philosophy at Zurich at a time when anarchist revolutionary ideas were spreading in Russia. Kuliscioff returned to Russia by order of the tsarist authorities, and there she joined the anarchist international movement as an activist. She later moved to Paris but was arrested and extradited, along with her companion, the Italian anarchist revolutionary Andrea Costa. Kuliscioff then moved to Italy, establishing contacts in Florence with anarchists influenced by Mikhail Bakunin, and was arrested and tried. It was at this time that Kuliscioff dissociated herself from anarchism and began pursuing socialist ideals and action.

After her relationship with Costa ended, Kuliscioff returned to Switzerland and obtained a degree in medicine, beginning a professional commitment to assist pregnant women. Kuliscioff then became a companion of the future founder of the Italian Socialist Party, the gradualist reformist Filippo Turati. From the end of the 1880s Turati and Kuliscioff immersed themselves in the socialist milieu of Milan, founding Italian socialism's most important theoretical journal, Critica Sociale. Kuliscioff's relationship with Turati and socialism lasted throughout her lifetime. Surmounting the late nineteenth-century political crisis, Kuliscioff strengthened her commitment to welfare legislation and the absolute priority of women's suffrage. Her aspirations in favor of women's suffrage were not realized during the political turmoil in Italy following World War I as the influence of fascism was growing in the country. Kuliscioff died in 1925, as Benito Mussolini's fascist regime was gaining power. She remains a prominent figure in Italian socialism for her support of welfare rights and female emancipation and her activism in advancing these causes.

Kurdistan nationalist movement and the PKK (Kurdistan Workers' Party)

Deniz Ekici

The Partiya Karkerên Kurdistan (PKK) or Kurdistan Workers' Party was one of the most radical and influential Kurdish revolutionary movements in the twentieth century. The PKK was born out of the ashes of previous Kurdish rebellions against the modernizing Turkish state established under the leadership of Mustafa Kemal Atatürk following World War I, in quest of founding an independent Kurdish state. While the majority of Kurdish movements were more traditionally nationalist in character, the PKK was unique due to its Marxist-Leninist orientation (Barkey & Fuller 1998).

The PKK utilized Marxist Leninism as an ideological basis for creating an independent and united Kurdistan against Kemalist Turkey under a democratic people's dictatorship, with the ultimate goal of creating a classless society. To achieve these goals, the PKK launched a guerilla war in the early 1980s against the colonialist Turkish state and its local "collaborators." The war lasted more than 20 years, resulting in close to 50,000 deaths.

After World War I and the signing of the Treaty of Lausanne, Kurdistan was divided between newly created entities, namely Turkey, Iran, Iraq, and Syria. Soon after, these four states began intense campaigns to assimilate the Kurds, with the Turkish state being the most ruthless of all. Numerous local and spontaneous rebellions led by religious, tribal, and some secular nationalist intellectuals occurred after the establishment of the Turkish Republic, although they were all severely crushed. The Kemalist regime represented these revolts to the outside world as religious revolts to bring back the Caliphate system, while promoting Kemalism as a progressive and revolutionary regime (Nezan 1993).

The PKK was the result of the failure by Turkish leftist groups to address the Kurdish issue. In May 1973, a member of the Turkish left, Abdullah Öcalan, stated that the creation of a Kurdish group was necessary, arguing that Kurdistan existed as a colony under the Turkish state and Turkish leftist organizations would never be capable of diagnosing the Kurdish issue properly. According to Öcalan, the Kurds, as a separate nation, should determine their own political destiny (Gunter 1990). In addition, Öcalan felt that Kurds should struggle with their own organization based on their own dynamics (Öcalan 2004). In their meeting in the Tuzluca district of Ankara in 1974, the Kurdish leftists who were members of the Ankara Democratic Higher Education Association (ADYÖD) decided to establish a Kurdish organization independent of the Turkish leftist movements. This would be the foundation of what was later to become the PKK.

While the majority of its membership were half-educated town dwellers and peasants, the leadership of the PKK was progressive, consisting of intellectual cadres with a Marxist-Leninist program. The program called Kurdistan Devriminin Yolu (The Road to the Revolution of Kurdistan) was written by Öcalan and Mehmet Hayri Durmuş between 1976 and 1977 (Öcalan 2006). It championed a Leninist notion of every nation's right to self-determination. According to this program, the armed struggle, based on the Stalinist model, was the only way to realize the revolution of Kurdistan. In this struggle the main forces of the Kurdish revolution would be based on the alliance between workers and peasants. While peasants would be the main base of the popular army, the proletariat would provide the movement with its progressive Marxist-Leninist ideology, although Marxism was anathema to the Muslim and conservative Kurdish nation.

By the end of 1978 Öcalan was confident that conditions existed to form a political party and to start a war for the liberation of Kurdistan. On November 26–7, 1978, Öcalan gathered the entire cadre's group and set a meeting in Fis (Ziyaret) village of Lice town, near Amed. This meeting would serve as the first congress of the party and the name Partiya Karkerên Kurdistan, or the Kurdistan Workers' Party, was adopted. The PKK declared its formation by attacking Mehmet Celal Bucak, a feudal landlord and tribal leader in the region of Sêrek (Siverek), who exploited the peasants and collaborated with the Turkish state. Bucak would survive the attack only to encounter several future confrontations with PKK militants.

The continued attacks by the PKK on other feudal landlords and Turkish organizations gained significant support among Kurdish peasants, young students, and the proletariat. In the beginning the PKK attacked only the big landlords, collaborators, and other rival organizations. It circulated books, brochures, and periodicals to justify its attacks on these groups and emphasized the importance of violence as the only way to achieve its goals of liberation (van Bruinessen 1988).

In December 1979, Öcalan withdrew to Syria while the rest of the militants and cadres remained in Turkish Kurdistan. Öcalan, under the code name Ali, sought a relationship with Palestinian organizations in Syria and Lebanon. He succeeded in acquiring the help of Nayef Hawatmeh of the Popular Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PDFLP), who assisted in establishing a training camp in Lebanon for PKK militants. During the same period Öcalan found support for Kurdish groups in other parts of Kurdistan and in Western Europe. He also established a relationship with the Soviet Union, Bulgaria, and Cuba. By 1982, Öcalan had developed a strong and permanent relationship with the Syrian authorities through Cemil al-Assad and Rifat al-Assad, brothers of the Syrian president Hafiz al-Assad. This allowed the PKK to form several training camps, not only in Syria but also in Iraq, Iran, and Lebanon. Beginning in 1980, the PKK deployed trained groups of between 30 and 35 militants in Turkish Kurdistan. The following year more groups were deployed as new members arrived to be trained at the camps.

In 1981, the PKK held its first conference to evaluate its practice of armed conflict with Turkish Kurdistan. The party concluded that these conflicts should be avoided and greater emphasis placed on military and political training. During the second congress in 1982, the PKK decided to make preparations to "return back to the country" (Öcalan 2003). The second congress also generated a political program promoting a weak force against a strong state in a long-term popular war. By the end of 1982, the first reconnaissance groups headed back to Turkish Kurdistan to establish contact with patriots in villages and to scout locations in the mountainous areas where guerilla forces could enter. In 1983 the PKK carried out its first significant attack on the Turkish security forces in which three soldiers died. After the attack the Iraqi government allowed the Turkish army to enter Iraq to pursue the PKK. However, they failed to find anything related to the attack.

The PKK later organized its guerilla forces under the Hêzên Rizgariya Kurdistan (HRK) or Liberation Forces of Kurdistan. On August 15, 1984, after announcing the establishment of the HRK, the PKK carried out two simultaneous attacks on the towns of Dihê (Eruh) and Şemzînan (Şemdinli) in Sêrt (Siirt). In the following months the HRK carried out more attacks on Turkish security forces based on hit-and-run action. The HRK was the first phase in the PKK's plan to develop a powerful guerilla army. In March 1985, the PKK established the Eniya Rizgariya Netewa Kurdista (ERNK) or Kurdistan National Liberation Front to organize "the non-Marxist and often religious Kurdish masses" (Imset 1996). The primary role of ERNK was to carry out public relations for the PKK and function as the propaganda apparatus. In 1986, at its third congressional conference, the PKK replaced the HRK with the Artêşa Rizgariya Gelê Kurdistan (ARGK) or the People's Liberation Army of Kurdistan. The ARGK assumed the role of executive body for military matters with the PKK. ERNK produced recruits for the ARGK, organized mass demonstrations and riots, collected money from PKK supporters, provided logistical supplies for the ARGK, and represented the PKK in Middle Eastern and European countries by carrying out international diplomacy activities. ERNK was made up of several sub-organizations, each designed to focus on and organize different social groups with different social, economic, and ideological backgrounds.

In October 1998, Turkey accused Syria of supporting the PKK and, with the consent and support of the US, called on Syria to expel Öcalan or face a heavy attack from Turkey. Öcalan agreed with the request of Syrian officials and left the country. Thereafter, he sought asylum in many European and African countries, first going to Russia to obtain political asylum and to seek a peaceful solution for the Kurdish cause. However, he failed to secure asylum both from Russia and later from Greece and Italy. In February 1999, the Greek authorities told Öcalan that they would take him to South Africa where he could seek political asylum. However, instead he was taken to Nairobi and handed over to the Turkish military (White 2000). It is believed by Öcalan's lawyer that he was sent to Kenya because this put him outside the jurisdiction of the European Convention on Human Rights. On February 16, 1999, Öcalan was delivered to the Turkish security forces at a Greek diplomatic residence in Nairobi to await extradition to Turkey. He has been kept in a prison cell on Imralı island where he is serving a life sentence.

In 1991, Turgut Özal, former president of the Turkish Republic, stated that the PKK had 3,900 guerilla forces. Two years later the US Department of State estimated that the PKK had around 3,000 guerillas. That same year, the New York Times claimed that the PKK had 10,000 guerilla forces in Turkish Kurdistan (Imset 1996). In 1995, the US Department of State estimated the total number of guerilla forces at around 15,000, supported by 75,000 active ERNK members (White 2000). According to PKK officials, the figure was much higher. In 1994, Kani Yılmaz, former PKK foreman in Europe, claimed that the PKK had 30,000 professional fighters (Gunter 1997). In 2005, the PKK declared it had around 10,000 active guerilla forces operating in Kurdistan. In addition, Partiya Jiyana Azad a Kurdistanê (PJAK) or the Kurdistan Free Life Party, considered to be a hybrid of the PKK, had 2,000 guerillas conducting a guerilla war against the Iranian government (The Economist, 2006).

After Öcalan was captured the PKK Central Committee managed to appoint a new Ruling Council, which unilaterally declared a ceasefire that lasted from 1999 to 2005. Conflicts would resume when the PKK accused Turkish security forces of failing to obey the ceasefire agreement. In October 2006, Öcalan called for a peaceful solution and the party declared another ceasefire that is still in effect. Because the PKK had been designated a terrorist organization by both the United States and the European Union, it was necessary to change its name in order to pave the way for a more diplomatic, peaceful solution. In April 2002 at its eighth congressional conference, the PKK officially changed its name to Kongreya Azadî û Demokrasiya Kurdistan (KADEK) or the Freedom and Democracy Congress of Kurdistan. In December 2003, for similar reasons, KADEK was renamed the Kongra-Gelê Kurdistanê (Kongra-Gel) or Kurdistan Peoples. This fooled no one, in particular the Turkish state, who again designated both KADEK and the Kongra-Gel as terrorist organizations. In 2004 the name PKK was restored, with structural changes within the organization. Later that year some of the substantial cadres broke away from the PKK to form the Partiya Welatparêzên Demokrat ên Kurdistanê (PWD) or Patriotic Democratic Party of Kurdistan. Hikmet Fidan and Kani Yılmaz were allegedly assassinated by the PKK soon after the establishment of the PWD.

From his prison cell on Imrah island, Abdullah Öcalan recently announced a sketchy outline for the structure of an organization called the Koma Komelên Kurdistan (KKK) or Confederation of Kurdistan Associations (some prefer to translate it inaccurately as the Democratic Confederation of Kurdistan). The KKK is a roof organization that brings together various units of the PKK under an Executive Presidential Board headed by Murat Karayilan. The Koma Komelên Kurdistan was renamed the Koma Ciwakên Kurdistan (KCK) or Confederation of Kurdistan Societies at Kongra-Gel's fifth general assembly, held on April 16–22, 2007.

Kuroń, Jacek (1934–2004)

Amy Linch

One of the most influential thinkers and activists in Eastern Europe, Jacek Kuroń was a leader of the democratic opposition to the People's Republic of Poland from the mid-1950s until its demise in 1989. He co-founded the Worker's Defense Committee, was both organizer and intellectual advisor to Lech Walesa and Solidarność (Solidarity), and played a pivotal role in the Round Table negotiations that paved the way for democratic governance in Poland. During the 1990s Kuroń was twice Poland's minister of labor and social policy. Through his official capacity and as a private citizen he worked to alleviate the economic impact of the transition to market capitalism on the poorest members of society.

Kuroń began his social and political activism as a committed communist. Born into a family of socialist intellectuals in the now Ukrainian city of Lvov, Kuroń became a member of the Communist Youth League at 15 and of the Polish United Workers' Party as a young adult. He was active in the Polish Scouting Association, organizing "red" troops with the goal of teaching cooperative social values to the next generation – future Solidarność leader Adam Michnik was among his charges. During the mid-1950s Kuroń was one of the most prominent members of the Crooked Circle Club (Krzywe Kolo), a discussion group of dissident intellectuals. In 1964 he collaborated with a fellow lecturer at the University of Warsaw, Karol Modzelewski, in publishing a Marxist analysis of Polish society entitled An Open Letter to Members of the Polish United Workers' Party. He argued that the central political bureaucracy, rather than creating a society in which workers were in control of their own labor, had become a new ruling class. The fundamental conflict between the working class and this new bureaucratic class was plunging the country into a social and economic crisis that could only be resolved by a true proletariat revolution that brought about worker control over factories and gave executive and legislative control to a federation of workers' councils. A multi-party system, independent trade unions, a workers' militia, and full intellectual freedom would further characterize the new political order – which would be saved from Hungary's 1956 fate by similar revolutions in other communist countries. Kuroń was expelled from the party and sentenced to three years in prison.

By 1968 Kuroń no longer believed that reform was possible through the Communist Party. Poland's participation in the Warsaw Pact invasion of Czechoslovakia to wrest control of the country from reformers seemingly left few options for reform-minded Poles. With the party delegitimized and the prospects for direct confrontation with the regime grim, Kuroń advocated a strategy of societal self-organization. People created power when they organized, a power that broke the ideological control of the state. Each instance of engaged citizenship and "self-help" association "challenges the monopoly of the state and thereby challenges the basis upon which it exercises power." By creating new institutions, fostering new forms of public behavior, such as public protest and the use of the media, and teaching people by example to confront the state with inventiveness, courage, and energy, Kuroń cultivated the dissolution of the communist system.

Kuroń was among 13 intellectuals who established the Workers' Defense Committee (Komitet Obrony Robotników, KOR) in response to the brutal repression of striking workers in 1976. KOR was the first openly functioning opposition group in any communist country. The group united workers and intellectuals in the common cause of resistance. Kuroń's apartment was a center of the effort to organize legal and financial support for detainees and develop an international network of civic activism that drew attention to the workers' plight. This alliance began the nationwide, cross-class mobilization of the public in the Solidarity movement. During 1980–1 Kuroń was an advisor to Lech Walesa and Solidarność; he spent numerous hours with striking workers and negotiating with the government. He was again arrested in December 1981 and imprisoned until 1984, when he was granted amnesty.

Kuroń continued his struggle for justice once Poland transformed into a democratic, market capitalist system. As minister of labor and social policy in the 1990s he sought (unsuccessfully) to bring together trade unions, employers' associations, and government agencies to negotiate social policy. Dismayed that the democratic system he struggled to bring about left people hungry, he organized soup kitchens through which he served the poor in the spirit of "mutual aid" rather than charity. In his last public speech, at the World Economic Forum in Warsaw (2004), Kuroń told activists: "It is you, my Dear Friends, who have to perform the actions which contemporary political elites cannot perform: who have to create new concepts of social cooperation, implement ideals of freedom, equality, and social justice."

Kwangju student uprising

Won Young-su

Though the Yushin regime (1972–9) came to an end with the assassination of President Park Chung-hee on October 26, 1979, the military conspirators had no intention of giving up power. The military coup d'état of December 12, 1979 led by Chun Doo-hwan paved the way for a new military regime. But in the following spring there was a massive upsurge for democratization in universities, factories, and mines, and an overwhelming majority of people demanded the immediate end of military rule and the realization of democratic politics. May 15, 1980 was the culmination of this Spring of Democratization. On that day, over 100,000 students and citizens gathered in a mass rally in front of Seoul Station, demanding the full-scale democratization of Korean society through the abolition of martial law and the elimination of the remnants of the Yushin regime. In response, the military imposed martial law upon the entire country on May 17 and swiftly arrested most student activists and prominent opposition leaders, including Kim Dae-jung. In response, the students and people of the city of Kwangju, a strong political base for Dae-jung, rose up.

Of course, the popular uprising brought a swift reaction. Under the name of Operation Glorious Holiday, parachute ranger troops were sent to Kwangju with the permission of the US military force. On May 18, soldiers began beating protesters indiscriminately and killing innocent and defenseless civilians, even slaying a pregnant woman with a bayonet. The people in the street began to fight back, and insurgents began to arm themselves by taking weapons from the soldiers and attacking the arsenals. On May 19, in the face of unexpected popular resistance, the troops were driven out of the city and the armed population occupied the provincial office. Finally, on May 21, the armed militia occupied the whole city and Kwangju was liberated, though the city was blocked and encircled by troops.

During the uprising the insurgents set up their own governing committee, and the militia units defended the city from the military. Every day they held mass rallies and the leadership of the uprising attempted to expand it into surrounding areas, as well as throughout the nation. But those efforts failed and Kwangju was isolated from the rest of the country while the military propaganda depicted Kwangju as a city dominated by communist provocateurs.

After ten days' occupation and uprising, the military attacked the insurgents in Kwangju. On the early morning of May 27, the troops reoccupied the provincial hall. Eventually, the Kwangju uprising was brutally suppressed.

Student leaders were shocked at the level of violence committed by the special forces, and it caused psychological trauma and related political debates. The retreat from the mass mobilization of Seoul Station was one issue, and the leaders' decision to evade direct confrontation with the military was harshly criticized, hence militancy became an essential element for the upcoming struggles. The goal of the movement also came up for debate, and it was concluded that the complete revolutionary overthrow of the military regime was the only way to achieve democracy. It was also decided that the movement should be targeting capitalism as well. Thus, the event in Kwangju foreshadowed a later radicalization of the whole movement, bringing about a new generation of young revolutionaries.

La Boétie, Etienne de (1530–1563)

Abel Polese

Etienne de La Boétie was a distinguished lawyer, poet, and humanist who also translated Xenophon and Plutarch. Most importantly, his “Discourse of Voluntary Servitude” is considered the basis for modern non-violent protest movements.

De La Boétie was born in Sarlat, France, on November 1, 1530 to a family of magistrates. His father, a lieutenant, died when Etienne was still very young, so his uncle, Estienne, took responsibility for his education. Although some historians claim that de La Boétie went to the Collège de Guyenne in Bordeaux, others disagree. Historians do agree that de la Boétie studied law at the University of Orleans under the guidance of Anne du Bourg. He graduated in 1553, and six years later his mentor was burned for heresy.

During his years as a university student, de La Boétie conceived his most famous work, the “Discourse of Voluntary Servitude,” which was a reaction to the attitude of the French king, François I. In September 1579, a new regulation taxing salt (la gabelle) prompted popular uprisings in Bordeaux, and the government engaged in brutal repression. On this occasion, de La Boétie started asking himself why people obey rules that go against their own interest. The result was a pamphlet, circulated privately until 1576, called “Le Discours de la servitude volontaire.”

Thanks to the reputation he earned during his university years, upon completion of his law studies in 1553 de La Boétie was invited, as councillor, into the Bordeaux parliament. He was then elevated to court councillor and, after 1560, entrusted with leading negotiations in the frame of the Catholic–Protestant dispute. His career turned out to be very short since on August 18, 1563, at age 32, de La Boétie died on his way to Médoc, where he was hoping that the healthy climate would help him recover from dysentery.

Etienne de La Boétie paved the way for the concept of civil disobedience by examining the reasons why some people obey those who command, while others resist. The state and tyrants do not force citizens, de La Boétie maintains; rather, some are simply inclined to comply with state orders out of an inclination to voluntary servitude. In explaining why tyranny occurs, Etienne de La Boétie placed tyrants into three categories – those elected, those who inherited power, and those who claimed it by force.

Regardless of how they got power, rulers who rule justly are legitimate, and those who rule badly are not and are tyrants. At the beginning, the new tyrant has to create new habits and behaviors. This is possible because collective obedience comes from a human inclination that contradicts nature. La Boétie refers to this proclivity as vice because humans are born free and each has the ability to reason and cultivate his or her innate independence, but in the end, not everybody pursues free will of thought and action. After the majority is accustomed to automatic obedience, the tyrant’s main challenge is to reduce dissent. Control of the masses rests in control of media and education, and determines the way people are formed and the information they can spread around a country. The tyrant then seeks to create a pyramidal structure, with a number of people fed by the system, through tax-funded salaries, faithful to the tyrant and willing to preserve the status quo to keep their benefits. Man’s liberty does not require the death of the tyrant but the end of the system (tyranny). The only way to liquidate the system is to destroy its power structures through non-violent resistance. A tyrant is defeated when people simply refuse to consent to their own enslavement, thus non-violent resistance and civil disobedience are the best strategies to challenge state power.

Students of collective action view this conception of power deriving from below as a central contribution to the theory of non-violent protest, and it has arrived almost unchanged to our days. Gene Sharp, founder of the Albert Einstein Institute and scholar of non-violent protest in the twentieth century, argues that Etienne de La Boétie's essay is crucial to understanding the origins of dictatorship and popular means of liberation from political enslavement.

La Ceiba Uprising of 1924

Olga Burkert

The La Ceiba Uprising of 1924 was the revolutionary overthrow of President Antonio López Gutiérrez by several Honduran generals and politicians. López Gutiérrez had been the leader of an armed movement against former President Francisco Bertrand and was elected president in 1919 for the Liberal Party (Partido Liberal de Honduras, PLH). As the 1923 elections ended with no clear winner, López Gutiérrez imposed a state of emergency and installed himself in power as a dictator.

A civil war broke out, and several parties began trying to overthrow the López Gutiérrez regime. One of them was General Tiburcio Carías Andino, who started his campaign in the northern town of La Ceiba on the Atlantic coast of Honduras. Carías was the conservative National Party (Partido Nacional de Honduras, PNH) candidate for presidency in the October 1923 elections. The PLH had been unable to agree upon a candidate owing to internal disputes, so it presented two candidates, Policarpo Bonilla and Juan Angel Arias. As none of the three candidates gained an absolute majority, according to the Honduran constitution parliament had to appoint a president and vice-president. However, the members of parliament were unable to obtain a quorum.

On February 1, 1924, López Gutiérrez appointed himself ruler by decree, concentrating all state powers in his person, “until the country returned to a normal situation” (Barahona 1999: 86). López Gutiérrez feared the revolutionary uprising of Tiburcio Carías's troops, even asking for US intervention to avoid a civil war in Honduras. Shortly after proclaiming a state of emergency, repression against the opposition began: 200 members of the PNH were arrested, and one was killed. Meanwhile, General Carías declared himself president because he had received the greatest number of votes in the 1923 elections.

An armed conflict broke out. On February 28, there was a battle in La Ceiba between the rebels and government troops, and 50 people were killed. Even the presence of the US Marines could not prevent the fighting. Carías and his troops headed toward the Nicaraguan border, where they gathered supporters, and they battled the government troops successfully. Other insurgent generals like Gregorio Ferrera and Vicente Tosta fought and won important battles on the Atlantic coast. Shortly afterwards, in April, the forces of the uprising controlled almost the entire Honduran territory but were unable to seize the capital.

Carías's troops were largely supported and financed by the US Standard Fruit Company based in La Ceiba. The banana export company was a large landholder in Honduras and Central America, and also the owner of much of the transport and communications systems. In the beginning of the twentieth century, the US had begun to invest in Central American countries, particularly in banana companies. Until 1930 most areas of transportation (railways, harbors) were in the hands of the fruit industry. In 1932, for example, the United Fruit Company, together with Standard Fruit and the Cuyamel Fruit Company, the three largest banana export companies, controlled two-thirds of the worldwide banana trade and owned 96,000 square kilometers of land, a fleet with 160 ships, and 3,000 kilometers of railway all over the world. The Standard Fruit Company's headquarters were in the northern Atlántida department in Honduras. Together with the other companies they controlled a large proportion of Central American political and economic development. Because of these huge US interests, the US government intervened all through the twentieth century in the political affairs of Honduras and all Central and Latin American countries. The US ambassador in Honduras observed political developments closely in those years and tried to influence the different parties in the conflict according to US interests.

In an agreement signed in 1907 by all Central American countries except Costa Rica and the United States (and renewed in 1923), the nations confirmed that they would not accept any government imposed by coup d'état or a revolution in any of these countries. According to the terms of this agreement, and concerned about political instability in Central America, the US military intervened several times in Honduras in 1924. In total, 70 infantry battalions of the US Army disembarked in La Ceiba between February and March 1924. In March of the same year, the US embassy in Tegucigalpa called for intervention to protect US citizens. Two hundred Marines disembarked in the harbors of La Ceiba and Puerto Cortés on March 19, and a few days later they occupied the Honduran capital. At the same time, Washington made efforts to end the civil war and sent the intermediary Summer Welles to participate in the peace negotiations between all political parties. After López Gutiérrez's death in March 1924, a Council of Ministers assumed power.

On May 3, Vicente Tosta Carrasco was proclaimed interim president, agreeing to form a government with members of all revolutionary parties and a Constituent Assembly within 90 days. Presidential elections were to be held as soon as possible. The United States put pressure on Tosta to conduct a fair election, placing an embargo on arms to Honduras and preventing the interim government's access to loans. The US government made it clear that it would not accept any candidate who arose from one of the revolutionary parties. So, finally, Carías withdrew his candidacy for the coming term and the PNH nominated Miguel Paz Barahona, who won the 1924 elections and remained president until 1929.

Revolutionary leader Tiburcio Carías Andino was elected president in 1932 and maintained power until 1949, the longest period of presidency ever in Honduras. During his administration, Honduras weathered the economic crisis of the 1930s with a dramatic fall in banana prices. Carías is remembered as the president who helped to develop the country by building infrastructure, creating a solid financial policy, and strengthening the military. On the other hand, he institutionalized his power by changing the constitution to allow his reelection, prolonging the period of office from four to six years. He also reintroduced the death penalty. Furthermore, Carías suppressed worker strikes and organizations and banned the Communist Party.

La Matanza 1932 Peasant Revolt

Edward T. Brett

Matanza, which in Spanish simply means massacre, is the name commonly used by Salvadorans for the peasant uprising of January 1932 in El Salvador and the slaughter of between 15,000 and 30,000 mostly Pipil Indians that followed.

In March 1931, with both the oligarchy and military divided and supporting five different candidates for president, a sixth candidate, the populist Arturo Araujo, was able to win with a plurality of the vote, thereby becoming president. When he attempted to implement some modest reforms that would help peasants who were suffering from the collapse of the coffee market brought on by the Great Depression, he was overthrown in a December 2 military coup and replaced by his vice-president, General Maximiliano Hernández Martínez.

Meanwhile, the Communist Party, along with discontented indigenous peasant groups and segments of the military, had been planning an uprising. The leading force behind the plot was Agustín Farabundo Martí, the secretary general of the Communist Party. January 22 was chosen as the date for the insurrection to begin. The government discovered the plot, however, and on January 19 Martí and several other leaders were arrested. The next day the government declared a state of siege and the barracks revolt that had been planned by dissident military officers was abandoned.

Peasants in the western departments of Ahuachapán, Santa Ana, and Sonsonate, and along Lake Ilopango east of San Salvador, revolted anyway. Without any means of communication, they probably did not receive word that the leaders of the plot had been taken into custody. Armed with little more than machetes and lacking leadership, they did little harm. They were able to take some towns in Sonsonate, where they looted some warehouses and killed about a hundred people. About half of these were soldiers sent to crush the revolt; the rest were mostly exploitative storeowners and local governmental officials.

General Hernández Martínez and other high-ranking military officers, however, seeing an opportunity to make an example of the Pipil Indians so that in the future others would think twice about rebelling, and also hoping to cement their alliance with the coffee oligarchy, decided to eradicate “the communists.” Even though the uprising was over in two days, soldiers continued to roam the countryside, rounding up and killing large numbers of indigenous people by firing squad. Altogether, about 2 percent of the Salvadoran population was executed.

La Matanza has been permanently seared into the collective memory of all Salvadorans, rich and poor alike. Since people were executed solely because they were Indians, the indigenous survivors abandoned their traditional clothing and customs and took up the ways of Hispanic culture. For the military-oligarchy power structure, a mythology was developed that depicted a “communist” revolt in which the lower classes raped, pillaged, and murdered. Thus, for them the lesson learned from 1932 is that all lower-class unrest must be nipped in the bud so that history will not be allowed to repeat itself.

Labor revolutionary currents, United States, 1775–1900

Paul Le Blanc

Revolutionary currents in the labor movement of the United States can be identified in several different ways. One involves strong influences on organized workers flowing from the American Revolution and the Second American Revolution (the Civil War). Another involves self-consciously revolutionary currents – led by various socialist, communist, and anarchist elements – which at times played an essential role in the struggles to advance the interests of the working class in the United States. Yet another involves revolutionary challenges inherent in the nature of the labor movement, which sometimes finds reflection even in some of the more conservative elements of organized labor.

Working Class and Labor Movement

There has been much confusion around the terms working class and labor movement. The term working class refers here to those who can make a living, or can hope to make a living, only through the sale of their ability to work and to those dependent on such “breadwinners.” This includes both unemployed and retired workers. The term labor movement refers to various organizations and struggles organized by and for workers to defend and advance their interests as workers.

Labor movements can include trade unions that focus on improving wages and working conditions in the workplace, but they can also include reform groups, which seek to bring about improvements, often through new laws that will result in concrete changes in workers’ conditions. Examples of such laws include those which place limits on or abolish child labor, limit the number of hours in the workday, enforce health and safety provisions at the workplace, and extend the right to vote among those who labor, to name but a few. Labor movements can also include self-help groups such as consumer cooperatives, health and burial societies, educational and cultural societies, and multifaceted activist organizations which engage in a variety of activities for the working class, often guided by radical or revolutionary ideologies. Finally, political parties which focus on electoral and other activities designed to help the working class advance its political power and, ultimately, its control of the country’s key governmental institutions are often parts of labor movements.

The working class has meant, for some, only manual wage workers, especially factory workers. This excludes many others, including various service employees (whether government workers, store clerks, social workers, maids and laundry workers), so-called “white-collar” office workers, teachers, and, historically, artisans and craftsmen, indentured servants, and slaves. Some of the first labor organizations, however, were organized by artisans and craftsmen at the journeyman level whose traditional way to evolving into master craftsmen (with the opportunity of owning their own establishments) was being blocked by the natural development of the capitalist economy.

For some labor radicals, an explicit link was made between the chattel slavery that exploited African American laborers and the wage-slavery that exploited alleged “free labor.” While some “white” labor radicals were inclined to adopt the racist argument that white workers deserved better treatment, the more revolutionary-minded labor radicals in the pre-Civil War period insisted that the abolition of black slavery was a precondition to overcoming the wage-slavery that oppressed all of “free labor.” Similarly, many labor radicals of later years (for example, within the Knights of Labor in the 1880s and the Industrial Workers of the World of the early 1900s) had a more broadly inclusive definition of what constitutes the working class.

Nonetheless, the fragmentation of the working class among different occupational, cultural, ethnic, racial, and gender groups, which have often rejected identification with each other, has hampered labor organization. This fragmentation has been nurtured by the complex development of the market economy and has found frequent reflection in the development of workers’ consciousness and of the labor movement in the United States. For example, the incredible waves of immigration (often from impoverished agricultural populations), generated by the dynamism of a rapidly industrializing American capitalism, tended to flood the US labor market in ways that were used by employers to bring down wages, and also were detrimental to working conditions. This often resulted in anti-immigrant sentiments among native-born workers, or even among earlier immigrants or their children. The use of women by employers to undercut wages and increase the rate of exploitation was similarly one of the factors contributing to male hostility to female labor. The fact that skilled workers could more easily be organized than unskilled workers contributed, among skilled workers who were organized into unions, to the prejudice that unskilled workers were “unorganizable” and not worth worrying about.

The most consistent revolutionary currents have labored to overcome divisions within the working class – generally insisting on “solidarity” among all who labor, that “an injury to one is an injury to all,” and in some cases arguing that the entire working class should be in “one big union.” Often these revolutionary impulses have been – despite rhetorical pretenses to the contrary – blunted or compromised by more conservative, more bigoted practices. But it has generally been from revolutionaries of one kind or another that effective efforts have been made for the labor movement to embrace all sectors of the working class.

It is important to recognize that the great majority of US workers were at no time formally part of the labor movement. Union membership in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries was generally not greater (and often was much less) than 10 percent of the labor force – the highpoint being 36 percent in 1955. One could say that organized labor consisted of the working class’s “vanguard,” but often it was a militant minority with influence far beyond its numbers, helping to improve working conditions and living conditions not only of its own members but also of the working class as a whole. As already indicated, sometimes majority elements of this labor vanguard turned inward to advance only the short-term interests of those who were organized, with a profoundly conciliatory attitude to the existing social realities and power relations. Our focus here, however, will be on the more revolutionary currents in the organized vanguard of the labor movement.

Early Revolutionary Influences

The United States of America was established through the American Revolution (1775–83), which proclaimed that governments should not be ruled by powerful kings but should be based on “the consent of the governed” and exist to provide “life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness” for the people who live there. The merchants, plantation owners, and lawyers who were the nation’s “Founding Fathers” were able to prosper after independence was won from Britain – but many of them prospered at the expense of poor laboring people and slaves. In fact, the anti-democratic, immoral, inhuman institution of slavery became an essential component of US economic development and was written into the US Constitution. The Native American peoples, the Indians, were systematically driven off their land and destroyed. A dirty war was initiated against Mexico which stole half of that country and absorbed it into the United States, turning Mexican Americans from Colorado to Arizona and from Texas to California into second-class citizens. All such things were justified by a racism that stressed the Manifest Destiny of the United States as a “white man’s republic.” Bigotry was also used against many millions of immigrants – from Ireland and Germany, from China and Japan, from Italy and Poland and many other parts of the world – who were drawn to the United States for the purpose of exploiting their much-needed labor, even as they were put down by various forms of violent prejudice and pervasive discrimination.

But a powerful countervailing tendency also existed, particularly within sectors of the laboring population. There were some people who took certain Judeo-Christian values so seriously that they insisted on the humanity and dignity and rights of all people regardless of race, creed, or color. There were some who completely and consistently embraced the radical democratic principles of the 1776 Declaration of Independence:

We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, that to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed, that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it, and to institute a new government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness.

Consistent reference was made – in a variety of reform struggles in succeeding decades – to this document, and to the heroic example of revolutionary struggle waged by modest farmers, small shopkeepers, and both skilled and unskilled laborers in creating a republic in which there was to be liberty and justice for all. Some people fought to implement the proposition that everyone – regardless of race, creed, color, gender, or income level – is included in the notion that “all are created equal” and deserving of equal rights. Such influences could be found among those engaged in struggles against slavery, for women’s rights, against racial and ethnic discrimination, and for the dignity of labor.

One of the most radical of the spokesmen for the American Revolution, Thomas Paine, whose 1775 classic Common Sense powerfully influenced the Declaration of Independence, in 1797 expressed concerns that would become essential themes of the early labor movement: “The accumulation of personal property is, in many instances, the effect of paying too little for the labor that produced it; the consequence of which is, that the working hand perishes in old age [a category, at that time, which might embrace people in their late 40s and 50s], and the employer abounds in affluence.” While by no means an opponent of the growing market economy, the old revolutionary (aged 60) nonetheless believed that “the contrast of affluence and wretchedness is like dead and living bodies chained together.”

By the early nineteenth century, as the impact of industrial capitalism was beginning to make itself felt in the new republic, workers who organized unions for their mutual protection were often arrested for “unlawful combination.” In response, a Boston carpenter and labor agitator named Seth Luther, in the spirit of Paine, scoffed that “the Declaration of Independence was the work of a combination, and was as hateful to the traitors and tories of those days as combinations among workingmen are now to the avaricious monopolist and purse proud aristocrat.” In contrast to some male labor activists, Luther insisted that “unless we have the female sex on our side, we cannot hope to accomplish the object we have in view.” In fact, striking factory girls in Lowell, Massachusetts sounded the same revolutionary note as that articulated by the Boston agitator: “As our fathers resisted unto blood the lordly avarice of the British ministry, so we, their daughters, never will wear the yoke that has been prepared for us.” Such sentiments as these found expression among many engaged in union organizing efforts: carpenters, typographical workers, masons, shoe workers, textile workers, and cigar makers, among others.

There were also impressive efforts in the 1820s to organize independent workers’ parties. Organizers of such efforts won significant support, for a time, as they called for a check on business monopolies and the expansion of public education, at the same time thundering against the polarization of the American republic into “two distinct classes, the rich and the poor; the oppressor and the oppressed; those that live by their own labor, and they that live upon the labor of others.” Such efforts were soon drawn into (and ultimately frustrated by) the Democratic Party that was reorganized under the rags-to-riches slaveowner Andrew Jackson. Yet non-electoral reform struggles (such as that for the ten-hour workday) continued to attract working-class support. “Our cause is the cause of truth – of justice and humanity,” in the words of Seth Luther, who added: “Let us be determined no longer to be deceived by the cry of those who produce nothing and who enjoy all, and who insultingly term us – the farmers, the mechanics, and the laborers – the lower orders – and exultingly claim our homage for themselves as the higher orders – while the Declaration of Independence asserts that ‘All men are created equal.’”

Much of the organized labor movement in the United States failed to rise in support of the abolition of slavery. In some cases, representatives of that movement were inclined to make common cause with agricultural pro-slavery forces against the increasing hegemony of industrial capitalism. A skilled black wage-worker who had been a slave and later became a leader of the abolitionist movement, Frederick Douglass, perceptively analyzed this problem in a manner consistent with revolutionary-democratic principles:

The slaveholders, with a craftiness peculiar to themselves, by encouraging the enmity of the poor, laboring white man against the blacks, succeed in making the said white man almost as much a slave as the black slave himself. The difference between the white slave and the black slave is this: the latter belongs to one slaveholder, and the former belongs to all the slaveholders collectively. The white slave has taken from him by indirection what the black slave has taken from him directly, and without ceremony. Both are plundered, and by the same plunderers. The slave is robbed by his master of all his earnings, above what is required for his bare physical necessities; and the white man is robbed by the slave system, of the just results of his labor, because he is flung into competition with a class of laborers who work without wages. . . . They appeal to their pride, often denouncing emancipation as tending to place the white working man on an equality with negroes, and by this means they succeed in drawing off the minds of the poor whites from the real fact that, by the rich slave-master, they are already regarded as but a single remove from equality with the slave.

On the other hand, a radical critique of slavery did find expression among some labor activists, particularly in New England. One 1846 resolution from a convention of workingmen deplored the fact that “there are at the present time three millions of our brethren and sisters groaning in chains on Southern plantations,” and two years later a similar convention resolution asserted that “we regret the despotic attitude of the slave power at the South, and the domineering ascendancy of the monied oligarchy in the North as equally hostile to the interests of labor, and incompatible with the preservation of popular rights.”

By the late 1850s, a substantial number of Northern workers were drawn into the newly formed Republican Party. Part of the appeal stemmed from their agreement with that party’s commitment to the ultimate triumph of the free-labor system predominant in the North over the slave-labor system on which the South’s plantation economy was based. The Republicans represented a broad alliance in which proindustrial business interests were interwoven with small business and farming interests in the North, as well as certain radical sectors of the labor movement, and various other reform movements as well, most notably abolitionism and feminism.

Elements of Republican ideology that attracted, reflected, and influenced labor activists can be found in various comments of its most effective early leader, Abraham Lincoln. Most fundamental was his commitment to the revolutionary-democratic ideals of the Declaration of Independence that heralded “a new nation, conceived in liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal,” and that would establish “government of the people, by the people, and for the people.” Commenting in 1860 about a shoe workers’ strike in New England, he said: “I am glad to see that a system of labor prevails in New England under which laborers can strike when they want to, where they are not obliged to work under all circumstances, and are not tied down and obliged to labor whether you pay them or not.”

This defense of the free-labor system was by no means antagonistic to capitalism. Lincoln emphasized that “we do not propose any war on capital,” but simply to “allow the humblest man an equal chance to get rich with everybody else . . . in the race for life.” At the same time, influenced by the labor theory of value advanced by such classical economists as Adam Smith, he reflected: “Labor is prior to and independent of capital. In fact, capital is the fruit of labor, and could not have existed if labor had not first existed. Labor can exist without capital, but capital could never have existed without labor. Hence, labor is the superior – greatly superior to capital.” Such notions, hardly unique to Lincoln, represented an extension of the revolutionary ideology of 1776 and permeated the ranks of organized labor in the years before and after the Second American Revolution, the Civil War of 1861–5.

Socialist Influences

There were other revolutionary influences in the ranks of organized labor, particularly those associated with modern socialist, communist, and anarchist ideologies. Among the most dramatic of these was Frances (or Fanny) Wright, who first came to the United States from Scotland in 1818 as an enthusiast of the democratic ideals inherent in the American Revolution. Along with Robert Dale Owen (the eldest son of British utopian socialist Robert Owen), she played a major role in the agitation for workingmen’s parties in the United States during the 1820s and early 1830s, enjoying a substantial following in New York and beyond.

Wright was a prominent writer, editor, and spokesperson for a number of reforms related to public education for all, women’s rights, the anti-slavery cause, equal rights for African Americans, utopian socialist experiments, and the cause of labor. In Wright’s opinion, there was now (in 1830) “a war of class” in which “now and everywhere the oppressed millions . . . are making common cause against oppression,” with “labor rising up against idleness, industry against money; justice against law and against privilege.” Regarding the 1827 founding of the interracial utopian community of Nashoba in Tennessee, she emphasized the labor theory of value, associated with the pro-capitalist economist Adam Smith, but from which – as in her case – anti-capitalist conclusions could be drawn: “Labor is wealth; its reward should be enjoyment.” While the Nashoba experiment soon collapsed, the term “Fanny Wrightism” for some time was synonymous with the term radicalism among labor reformers and their enemies. The development of the US economy, however, provided little support for the development of rural utopian communities – the wave of the future was with the rising factory system brought into being by the relentless spread of the Industrial Revolution.

An influx of German American immigrants in the wake of the failed Revolution of 1848 resulted in important new radical influences on the American scene. Among these were small but vibrant currents which identified with the theoretical perspectives developed by such intellectuals associated with Wilhelm Weitling, Ferdinand Lassalle, and Karl Marx. Marx's influence would prove especially durable because it combined a comprehensive orientation rooted in the social sciences with a practical-minded commitment to the actually existing movements and struggles of the working class. In the 1850s, the handful of Marxist partisans, such as Joseph Weydemeyer, sought to strengthen the sporadically growing labor movement. Organized into such small groups as the New York Communist Club, their aim was to help American workers to realize that "the laboring class is the foundation stone upon which must rest the main reliance of all movements for general and special reforms," and that it was "up to the proletariat" to replace capitalism with "the rule of its own class – the class that no longer has any other class below it," in order to bring about "the abolition of all class privileges."

Yet these revolutionaries found themselves in an incredibly contradictory and fluid reality that created far too many obstacles for the consistent development of such working-class consciousness. In touch with these comrades, Marx was alert to countervailing tendencies in the United States that blocked the realization of the revolutionary socialist scenario. In analyses from the 1840s through the 1850s, he suggested that the radicalism inherent in the early working-class movement of capitalist America had little hope of being triumphant as long as slavery continued to exist and as long as the "safety-valve" of western lands remained available – which was consistent with the experiences of such German American communists as Weydemeyer. They consequently threw themselves into the anti-slavery struggle, constituting a dynamic left fringe of the new Republican Party, and did not hesitate to enlist in the ranks of the Union Army with the outbreak of the Civil War. Weydemeyer himself became a colonel leading a regiment of German Americans, rose to the rank of brigadier-general, and was assigned by Lincoln to serve as commander of the military district of St. Louis, Missouri.

Although Weydemeyer himself died a year after the Civil War's end, a significant current of German Americans, similarly influenced by Marx's ideas, went on to play an essential role in the US labor movement that grew dramatically

(as Marx had suggested it would) after the abolition of the slave system. Indeed, in the post-Civil War period, a significant interplay can be observed between the evolution of two of the most prominent "home-grown" labor radicals – William Sylvis and Ira Steward – and Marxist-influenced immigrant workers.

A Pennsylvania iron molder who identified with the radical-democratic currents that had been absorbed into the Democratic Party, Sylvis was a supporter of the Democratic presidential candidate Stephen A. Douglas (who in turn was a supporter of the continuation of the slave system), but as soon as the Civil War broke out, Sylvis's allegiance was with the North, committed to the preservation of the United States, and "from the day the first gun was fired, it was my earnest hope that the war might not end until slavery ended with it." Nonetheless, far from rallying to the ranks of the Republican Party, Sylvis and some like-minded Northern workers hoped to organize a new political party that would place "in positions of public trust men of known honesty and ability; men who know the real wants of the people and who will represent us according to our wishes; men who . . . will not become mere tools of rotten corporations and aristocratic monopolies." After being elected president of the National Molders' Union, Sylvis presented an unabashedly revolutionary orientation:

I believe that all men are "endowed by their creator with certain inalienable rights" among which is the divine right to labor, the right to an interest in the soil, the right to free homes, the right to limit the hours of toil to suit our physical capacities, the right to place a valuation upon our own labor proportionate to our social and corporeal wants, the right to be in the first social position in the land, the right to a voice in the councils of the nation, the right to control and direct legislation for the good of the majority, the right to compel the drones of society to seek useful employment . . . and the right to adopt whatever means we please within the pale of reason and law to secure these rights.

With this motivation he helped to organize and lead the first federation of trade unions after the close of the Civil War, the National Labor Union (NLU). His militancy did not diminish, as he noted that "to work, to slave, and suffer, for the simple reward of what will keep body and soul together, with no hope of a respite in old age, is the real condition of millions at this hour.”

According to Sylvis, “the cause of all these evils is the wages system. So long as we continue to work for wages, so long will we be imposed upon by those who buy our labor, so long will we be subjected to small pay, poverty, and all the evils of which we complain. . . . We must adopt a system that will divide the profits of labor among those who produce them.” With such an orientation, it is not surprising that he welcomed the 1864 formation of Karl Marx’s International Workingmen’s Association, welcomed activists associated with Marx into the NLU, and just before his premature death in 1869 sent the International a warm message:

Our cause is a common one. It is a war between poverty and wealth: labor occupies the same low condition, and capital is the same tyrant in all parts of the world. . . . Go ahead in the good work you have undertaken, until the most glorious success crowns your efforts. That is our determination. Our late war resulted in the building up of the most infamous monied aristocracy on the face of the earth. This monied power is fast eating up the substance of the people. We have made war upon it, and we mean to win.

While the NLU failed to survive Sylvis’s death (in part due to the pull of divergent electoral strategies), his ideas were absorbed by what remained of the labor movement, which in fact was spreading and deepening in the years that followed – in the mushrooming Knights of Labor, in a dramatically growing independent labor press, and in the trade unions that were proliferating, especially among skilled workers, and that would soon culminate in the American Federation of Labor (AFL).

Perhaps the most influential labor intellectual to arise in the post-Civil War period was a Boston mechanic named Ira Steward, the foremost figure in the movement for the eight-hour workday. Like Sylvis, who supported his efforts, Steward was an uncompromising foe of the “the wages system.” Emerging from the milieu of antebellum reformism and labor radicalism, he independently crafted a revolutionary critique of political economy and capitalism that in many ways paralleled that of Karl Marx.

Steward argued that just as the reason for “making a man a slave was to get his labor, or its results, for nothing,” so “the motive for employing wage-labor is to secure some of its results for nothing; and in point of fact, larger fortunes are made out of the profits of wage-labor than out of the products of slavery.” In his view, the struggle for the eight-hour workday without a reduction in the workers’ income would be possible and desirable, because it would bring about the rise in workers’ living standards and freedom while driving down the capitalist’s profits. This would mean an end to the wages system, and the capitalist would “pass away with the kings and royalty of the past,” giving way to a cooperative economy and a true working-class democracy, or in Steward’s terms “a republicanization of labor, as well as a republicanization of government.”

While Marxist-influenced socialists such as Friedrich Sorge inclined toward a different terminology, they saw in Steward a kindred spirit. They shared with him an English translation of excerpts from Marx’s Das Kapital (Steward was positively impressed and wrote that he would “help introduce and make his name more common to our readers”), and made common cause with him in organizing a nationwide struggle for the eight-hour workday.

The Workingmen’s Party of the United States (WPUS), organized July 19–22, 1876, was the first nationwide socialist organization in the United States. While it did not last even for two years before splitting into irreconcilable factions, it was an important seedbed for future developments of the American labor movement – embracing trade unionism, labor journalism, workers’ education, struggles for social reforms, socialism, and electoral activity.

The WPUS was formed through a merger of several groupings. This included the North American remnants of the International Workingmen’s Association (the First International of which Karl Marx had been a primary leader), which included Friedrich Sorge, Carl Speyer, and Otto Weydemeyer. There was the Social-Democratic Workingmen’s Party of North America, which included Adolph Strasser, Peter J. McGuire, George Schilling, Thomas J. Morgan, and Albert Parsons. In addition, there were two smaller groups – the Workingmen’s Party of Illinois and the Social Political Workingmen’s Party of Cincinnati (Ohio). The influence of Marx was obvious within the WPUS, but there were other influences as well, including ideas of the late German socialist leader Ferdinand Lassalle, and the analyses and agitation for the eight-hour workday by Ira Steward.

The fact that the United States was a multicultural “nation of nations” was reflected in the WPUS. The party had two official weekly German-language papers – the Chicago Verbote (Herald) edited by Conrad Conzett and the New York Arbeiter-Stimme (Labor’s Voice) edited by Otto Walster – reflecting the large number of German American members. (Germans were the largest immigrant group in the US at this time, followed by the Irish.) The party’s official English-language weekly, the Labor Standard, was edited by J. P. McDonnell, a former Irish Fenian and later, for a time, a secretary to Karl Marx in the First International. In addition, no fewer than 21 other newspapers around the country supported the WPUS in various languages. By the following summer the WPUS doubled its membership to 7,000, with 82 sections (of which 23 were English-language).

The WPUS faced the same divisive issues that affected the labor movement in general. Officially, the organization favored working-class unity transcending racial and ethnic divisions, yet there is evidence of prejudice among some of the members in California toward imported Chinese laborers and in Missouri toward black workers. Nor was there an appreciation in the organization of the catastrophe wrought by the Republican Party’s final betrayal of Reconstruction and black rights in the South. There were also differences over whether women workers should be organized into trade unions or instead be driven back to their “rightful place” in the home, so as not to compete with male labor. On the other hand, the WPUS did have a small number of black members (most prominently Peter H. Clark of Cincinnati) and women members (generally concentrated in “women’s clubs” or, in German, frauenverein), and one of its founding documents proclaimed the organization’s adherence to “perfect equality of rights of both sexes.”

The decisive event in the short life of the WPUS was what has been appropriately tagged “the great labor uprising of 1877,” a wave of militant labor insurgencies and street battles that swept through many cities as part of a nationwide strike of railway workers. In 1877 an explosion of working-class protest rocked the United States. Initiated as a more or less spontaneous railway workers’ strike, it became generalized into a nationwide crescendo of street protests and pitched battles. Millions of dollars of property was destroyed, well over a hundred lives were lost, with many more injuries. Pittsburgh was at the explosive center of this historic upsurge, but similar confrontations and struggles wracked cities throughout the Eastern and Midwestern portions of the country. Strikers in Martinsburg, West Virginia issued a manifesto capturing the sentiments of many:

Strike and live! Bread we must have! Remain and perish! . . . A company that has from time to time so unmercifully cut our wages and finally has reduced us to starvation . . . has lost all sympathy. . . . The merchants and community at large all along the line of the road are on our side, and the working classes of every State in the Union are in our favor, and we feel confident that the God of the poor and the oppressed of the earth is with us. Therefore let the clashing of arms be heard, let the fiery elements be poured out if they think it right, but in heed to our right and in defense of our families, we shall conquer or we shall die!

In many cities, WPUS members seem to have played no visible role in the upsurge. Support meetings and rallies were organized in others – most notably in Boston, Cincinnati, Louisville, Newark, New York City, Paterson, San Francisco. In Chicago’s general strike WPUS leaders Philip Van Patten, George Schilling, and Albert Parsons were arrested for their efforts to draw the spontaneous outburst into more organized channels, and in St. Louis such WPUS stalwarts as Albert Currin and Peter Lofgreen (who later assumed prominence as a writer under the name of Laurence Gronlund) played a central role in a general strike that for a brief period put workers in control of that city and led newspapers to dub it “the St. Louis Commune.” The uprising was systematically repressed by federal troops, but its powerful impact helped to generate future labor struggles, and it also brought a flood of new members into the WPUS determined to help advance the struggle of labor against capital.

Many of the new members responded to the determination of some WPUS leaders – in contradiction to the organization’s more cautious founding documents – to accelerate the efforts to field candidates in elections. In the autumn of 1877, the working-class ferment in many US cities encouraged WPUS sections to run candidates and rewarded them with amazingly high vote totals. They refused to turn back from this path and sought alliances and joint efforts with a massive but fuzzy-minded Greenback Labor Party effort that, within a few years, collapsed, leaving the socialist electoralists in disarray. By the 1890s, the organization came under the sway of a doctrinaire interpretation of Marxism associated with Daniel De Leon which limited its influence in the broader labor movement.

Reacting against the electoralist impulse, a substantial minority in 1877 – including Friedrich Sorge, Otto Weydemeyer, Carl Speyer, J. P. McDonnell, Adolph Strasser, a young Samuel Gompers, and others – left the WPUS. They chose instead to concentrate on trade union organizing that began with the International Labor Union and eventually evolved into the Federation of Organized Trades and Labor Unions, later renamed the American Federation of Labor. The majority renamed the organization the Socialistic Labor Party, later simply the Socialist Labor Party (SLP).

Another split occurred in 1881, in the wake of the Greenback Labor debacle, when more revolutionary elements bolted from the SLP. Disillusioned with electoralism, they helped create the anarchist-influenced International Working People's Association (IWPA). The Chicago wing of this organization (which tended toward a revolutionary anti-statist interpretation of Marx's ideas more than toward traditional anarchist theory) gained an especially large following and foothold in the labor movement.

Also in 1881, the Federation of Organized Trades and Labor Unions of the United States and Canada (FOTLU) was formed in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, largely guided by the trade unionist current among early socialists associated with Adolph Strasser, Friedrich Sorge, Samuel Gompers, and others. In large measure through the efforts of an indefatigable socialist organizer among the carpenters, P. J. McGuire, the Federation called in 1882 for the celebration of Labor Day on the first Monday in September, and also called for nationwide work stoppages and demonstrations on May 1, 1886 in favor of the eight-hour workday (initiating May Day, the international workers' holiday). The influence of Karl Marx was evident in the organization's preamble – which was retained in 1886 when the group was reorganized as the American Federation of Labor:

A struggle is going on in the nations of the civilized world between the oppressors and the oppressed of all countries, a struggle between capital and labor, which must grow in intensity from year to year and work disastrous results to the toiling millions of all nations if not combined for mutual protection and benefit. This history of the wage-workers of all countries is but the history of constant struggle and misery engendered by ignorance and disunion; whereas the history of the non-producers of all ages proves that a minority, thoroughly organized, may work wonders for good or evil. . . . Conforming to the old adage, "In union there is strength," the formation of a Federation embracing every trade and labor organization in North America, a union founded upon a basis as broad as the land we live in, is our only hope.

Samuel Gompers of the Cigar Makers Union was nominated to be president of the federation, but so was Richard Powers of the lake seaman's union. The Pittsburgh Commercial-Gazette ran an article explaining the contest in this way: "It is thought that an attempt will be made to capture the organization for Gompers as the representative of the Socialists, and if such an attempt is made, whether it succeeds or not, there will likely be some lively work, as the delegates opposed to Socialism are determined not to be controlled by it." In fact, such internal conflict was side-stepped by adept compromises, and Gompers later explained in his autobiography:

In those early days not more than half a dozen people had grasped the concept that economic organization and control over economic power were the fulcrum which made possible influence and power in all other fields. Control over the basic things of life gives power that may be used for good in every relationship of life. This fundamental concept on which the AFL was later founded was at that time not formulated in men's minds, and the lines between Socialists and trade unionists were very blurred.

At the founding convention, a controversy also arose around whether the new federation should consist exclusively of people who were already members of labor unions. In this period, and for many years afterward, only skilled workers were able to build and sustain trade unions organized on a specific craft basis. A decision to make the federation an exclusively union organization would restrict it to skilled workers. Many delegates agreed with the comments of one that “I wish this Federation broad enough to encompass all working people in its folds,” and an African American delegate from Pittsburgh explained: “We have in the city of Pittsburgh many men in our organization who have no particular trade, but should not be excluded from the Federation. . . . I speak more particularly of my own people and declare to you that it would be dangerous to skilled mechanics to exclude from this organization the common laborers, who might, in an emergency, be employed in positions they could readily qualify them to fill.”

This inclusiveness was consistent with the orientation of the Knights of Labor, by far the largest labor organization at the time, some of whose members were present in force at the FOTLU founding. The Knights organized workers into reform struggles, social events, and educational efforts as well as trade union activities. FOTLU included members and some unions that were affiliated with the expansively reformist Knights of Labor, and it was formally on record as favoring close relations with the larger organization. But it represented in the minds of many trade unionists “a broad and enduring basis,” as FOTLU secretary Frank Foster put it, for organization because – in contrast to the Knights – it drew members together along “the trade line,” providing “greater feasibility and . . . economic soundness” in facing “the growing power of associated capital.” Rather than relying on lobbying and elections to secure gains, “in the world of economic reform the working classes must depend upon themselves for the enforcement of measures as well as for their conception,” as Foster put it. Eventually the two groups became rivals, and in the late nineteenth century the reformed AFL would eclipse the then-disintegrating Knights.

Separation of Revolutionaries From Moderates

During the 1880s, Gompers became known not as an advocate of socialism but as an advocate of what became known as “pure and simple trade unionism.” This meant organizing workers into unions that would focus on struggles at the workplace around issues of higher wages, fewer hours of work, and improved working conditions to the exclusion of radical social causes, whether socialism or anything else. When asked what the labor movement wanted, Gompers once replied simply, “More.” Yet Pennsylvania Federation of Labor president James Maurer (himself a dedicated socialist) has left this record of one of Gompers’s many “pure and simple” union speeches:

If a workingman gets a dollar and a half for ten hours’ work, he lives up to that standard of a dollar and a half, and he knows that a dollar seventy-five would improve his standard of living and he naturally strives to get that dollar and seventy-five. After that he wants two dollars and more time for leisure, and he struggles to get it. Not satisfied with two dollars he wants more; not only two and a quarter, but a nine-hour workday. And so he will keep on getting more and more until he gets it all or the full value of all he produces.

Despite rhetoric that retained something of the ardor and implications associated with the old revolutionary orientation, however, a growing number of labor radicals in and around the AFL, including Gompers himself, began to pull in a different direction that enabled them to adapt to the prejudices of some skilled workers against unskilled workers, new immigrants, blacks, Asians, other people of color, and female wage-workers. They also entered far-reaching compromises with some of the more astute (“liberal-minded”) representatives of the capitalist system. By the early 1900s, Gompers (while still defending the memory of Karl Marx and the German American Marxists who had been his teachers and comrades) became an explicit and uncompromising foe of socialism.

In the same period that Gompers was beginning to deradicalize, however, some of the most vibrant representatives of revolutionary labor were coming to the fore. This was especially true in Chicago, where such figures as August Spies and Michael Schwab among German Americans, as well as Albert and Lucy Parsons among English-speaking Americans, rose to the leadership of the IWPA. They blended an uncompromisingly revolutionary interpretation of Marx’s ideas, which had been moderated and diluted among some of their former SLP comrades, with libertarian and anarchist ideas.

The IWPA was founded at an 1883 conference in Pittsburgh, and it produced a “Pittsburgh Manifesto” which blended ideas from the Declaration of Independence, the Communist Manifesto, and anti-centralist conceptions of Russian anarchist Mikhail Bakunin, all in an intransigently revolutionary tone. Some of the Chicago participants were uneasy with this. Spies insisted that “The Pittsburgh program is secondary, our program is the Communist Manifesto!” and he shared the book with Parsons, Gorsuch, and other Americans who worked with him in the office of the Arbeiter-Zeitung (Workers’ Journal), the left-wing daily he edited. Parsons went out of his way to emphasize that “the IWPA was not founded by Bakunin” and that “the IWPA is not in opposition to Marx. . . . The first publication ever issued by the IWPA was written by Marx and Engels.” This was the Communist Manifesto (in the first English translation by Helen Macfarlane), of which 25,000 copies were distributed in one year. Editor of the Chicago IWPA’s The Alarm, a lively English-language weekly with a circulation of 2,000, Parsons noted: “We are called by some Communists, or Socialists or Anarchists. We accept all three of the terms.”

The ideal society for which Parsons and his comrades were fighting, however, was one in which there would be no government ruling over the laboring majority, not even a paternalistic one dedicated to their well-being, but instead a system of self-government embedded in democratic organizations of the workers themselves, in which the free development of each person would be the condition for the free development of all. Of all the IWPA groupings, only those around Spies and Parsons had the sympathies of the German American Marxist stalwart Friedrich Sorge, whose description gives a sense of the movement there:

It is undeniably the meritorious accomplishment of the Chicago anarchists to have brought into this marvelous mixture of workers of all nationalities and languages a certain order, to have created affinity, and to have given the movement at that time unity and goals. . . . Only the Chicagoans maintained a certain agreement of views and tactics, stayed in close touch with the trade unions and other organizations, and secured themselves great respect and importance among the working population of the city. This they took advantage of on various occasions and made the bourgeois authorities very uncomfortable. . . . At the head of the Chicago anarchists, indeed of the Chicago workers at that time, stood intelligent and energetic people. . . . To the aforementioned characteristics must also be added great courage, loyalty of conviction, and untouchable personal honor.

The IWPA leaders were at the head of the massive movement for the eight-hour workday on the first May Day, in 1886, but shortly thereafter were victimized and falsely condemned for murder in the wake of the violent Haymarket Affair, in which someone threw a bomb at police who were breaking up a workers’ rally. The subsequent repression destroyed the IWPA and threw the labor movement into disarray. Eight IWPA leaders were arrested for murder, and four (including Spies and Parsons) were executed, although it was widely acknowledged in the years following their deaths that they had been innocent of the crimes of which they had been convicted. A later governor of Illinois provided a posthumous exoneration of the martyrs who had, to a large extent, been killed because of their practical commitment to revolutionary ideas. Those ideas, the speeches and writings of the Haymarket martyrs, were circulated widely within much of the labor movement in future years. Future leaders of the American Railway Union and the Western Federation of Miners, Eugene V. Debs and William D. Haywood, are two among many who later personally attested to their profound influence.

In carrying on the revolutionary tradition represented by the Haymarket martyrs, activists such as Debs and Haywood diverged from the path followed by Samuel Gompers and others guiding the AFL, who were going in the opposite direction. Increasingly they veered away from revolutionary principles and onto the path of reformist moderation, narrowing “pure and simple” unionism and partnership with political representatives of the capitalist status quo. By 1894, when Debs’s American Railway Union (ARU) was engaged in a life-and-death struggle with the railroad industry through the Pullman Strike, with federal troops coming in on the side of the corporations, Gompers and the AFL leadership gave a rhetorical salute to the “impulsive, vigorous protest against the gathering, growing forces of plutocratic power and corporation rule.” But considering it “folly” to join the ARU in its confrontation with corporate power, the AFL leadership headed off a movement for a general strike in Chicago, the storm center of the Pullman dispute, which was the last best hope for the ARU. The AFL leadership, unsympathetic with the ARU's industrial union structure, which was at variance with the more exclusive craft union structures and skilled-worker base of most of its own member organizations, was also less and less inclined to accept the expansive militancy and combative commitment to major social change evident in Debs's own evolution. These radical/moderate fissures that developed in the US labor movement in the late nineteenth century would profoundly influence future developments in the movement.

Labor revolutionary currents, United States, 20th century

Paul Le Blanc

Revolutionary challenges to capitalism are inherent in the nature of the labor movement, which sometimes finds reflection even in some of the more conservative elements of organized labor. At the same time, however, self-consciously revolutionary currents – led by various socialist, communist, and anarchist elements – have at times led key struggles to advance the interests of the working class in the United States.

The development of the labor movement of the United States in the twentieth century has deep roots in a profound division that developed in the ranks of labor between an increasingly “moderate” current and more explicit revolutionary elements. The first was represented by ex-socialist Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor (AFL). The second was symbolized by Eugene V. Debs, whose increasing radicalization – in the wake of the evolution of the American Railway Union and its destruction in the Pullman Strike of 1894 – was leading him to embrace revolutionary socialist perspectives.

Socialist Party and IWW

By 1901, Debs and others had formed the Socialist Party of America, which enjoyed considerable support among radicalized workers and intellectuals, with a base that soon gave them control of an estimated one-third of the AFL unions. Some unions, such as the locals of the International Ladies Garment Workers' Union, but also unions of miners and machinists, among others, could not have come into being without the dedication and energy of socialist activists. But they now found themselves at loggerheads with Gompers, who declaimed:

I want to tell you, Socialists, that I have studied your philosophy; read your works upon economics, and not the meanest of them; studied your standard works . . . And I want to say that I am entirely at variance with your philosophy. I declare it to you. I am not only at variance with your doctrines, but with your philosophy. Economically, you are unsound; socially, you are wrong; industrially, you are an impossibility.

Debs, addressing a state convention of the AFL in Kansas, advanced the other side of the question. He called for trade union organization on an industrial basis, not a craft basis, and for the working class to organize politically as well as economically. "We have now no revolutionary organization of the workers along the lines of this class struggle, and that is the demand of this time," he argued. "The pure and simple trade union will no longer answer. I would not take from it the least credit that belongs to it. I have fought under its banner for thirty years. I have followed it through victory and defeat, generally defeat." It had served a useful function once, but it was being made obsolete by the development of industrial capitalism and the intertwining of big business corporations with the government. "The tool you worked with twenty-five years ago will no longer do. It would do then; it will not do now." Workers being organized economically in a union but then being divided in support of one or another pro-capitalist party was a recipe for defeat. "You have got to unify your forces," he insisted. "You have got to stand together shoulder to shoulder on the economic and political fields and then you will make substantial progress toward emancipation."

In Debs's view, "the labor question, which is really the question of all humanity, will never be solved until it is solved by the working class. It will never be solved for you by the capitalists. It will never be solved for you by the politicians. It will remain unsolved until you yourselves solve it." The key was consciousness, will, and organized struggle: "As long as you can stand and are willing to stand for these conditions, these conditions will remain; but when you unite all over the land, when you present a solid class-conscious phalanx, economically and politically, there is no power on this earth that can stand between you and complete emancipation." That was the purpose of the political organization to which he had now committed his life: "The Socialist party as the party of the exploited workers in the mills and mines, on the railways and on the farms, the workers of both sexes and all races and colors, the working class in a word, constituting a great majority of the people and in fact THE PEOPLE, demands that the nation's industries shall be taken over by the nation and that the nation's workers shall operate them for the benefit of the whole people."

By 1905, Debs and other (but hardly all) Socialist Party members joined with other socialists, anarchists, and labor radicals to form a new revolutionary union – the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW). It pledged to organize the entire working class on an industrial basis regardless of race, ethnicity, sex, or occupation into "One Big Union." The "Wobblies," as they were nicknamed, envisioned their organization as a revolutionary union that would fight for immediate gains as steps designed to lead, hopefully sooner rather than later, to a general strike by the entire working class capable of bringing the functioning of the entire capitalist economy and government to a standstill. With power in the hands of the working-class majority, the economy would then be owned, organized, and run by the working class.

Fired by this vision, Wobblies reached out to timber workers on the West Coast, harvest hands on the Great Plains, textile workers in New England, steelworkers in the Midwest, and other workers across the country. The IWW organized black and white timber workers in a united struggle in Louisiana. The organization proved willing and able to organize what many in the AFL had dismissed as "unorganizable," such as the thousands of immigrant workers – men, women, and children laboring in the textile mills – who joined together in what came to be called "the Bread and Roses Strike" in Lawrence, Massachusetts in 1912. As James Oppenheim put it in his song, dedicated to women workers: "As we come marching, marching, we bring the greater days. / The rising of the women means the rising of the race. / No more the drudge and idler – ten that toil while one reposes. / But a sharing of life's glories: Bread and roses! Bread and roses!"

In this strike the eloquent Wobbly orator Elizabeth Gurley Flynn joined with other skilled organizers such as Arturo Giovannitti and Carlo Tresca to mobilize workers and their families, leading them to victory. Flynn explained the IWW conception of "a labor victory" by insisting that strikes must help workers “gain economic advantage, but must also gain revolutionary spirit, in order to achieve a complete victory.” She elaborated:

For workers to gain few more cents a day, a few more minutes less a day, and go back to work with the same psychology, the same attitude toward society is to have achieved a temporary gain and not a lasting victory. For workers to go back with a class-conscious spirit, with an organized and determined attitude toward society means that even if they made no economic gain they have the possibility of gaining in the future. In other words, a labor victory must be economic and it must be revolutionizing.

In his opening remarks at the founding convention of the IWW, proclaiming the intention of “emancipation of the working class from the slave bondage of capitalism,” militant leader “Big Bill” Haywood denounced the AFL for failing to live up to its own class-struggle preamble. He noted that “there are organizations affiliated . . . with the A. F. of L. which in their constitution and by-laws prohibit the initiation or conferring of the obligation [of union membership] on a colored man; that prohibit the conferring of the obligation on foreigners. What we want to establish at this time is a labor organization that will open wide its doors to every man that earns his livelihood either by brain or muscle.” What Haywood did, for example during the Lawrence strike, was consistent with these words. “He actually loved to spend time with the workers, to talk with their women and children,” recalled tough-minded anarchist Carlo Tresca of the hulking, battle-scarred organizer. “He went to supper with strikers every night. . . . He would sleep in the houses of Italians, Syrians, Irish, Poles, Letts. People were all brothers to him.”

This approach was translated into practical organizational realities. From 1913 to the early 1920s, for example, a largely immigrant and African American local of the IWW controlled Philadelphia’s docks, led by the black Wobbly Ben Fletcher. “The organized labor movement has not begun to become a contender for its place in the sun until every man, woman and child in industry is eligible to be identified with its cause, regardless of race, color or creed,” Fletcher explained. Noting that “organized labor for the most part, be it radical or conservative, thinks in terms of the white race,” he emphasized that this would be changed only when black workers themselves organized “to generate a force which when necessary could have rendered low the dragon of race prejudice whenever and wherever it raised its head.” The militant union he led showed how this could be done, leading to black–white unity and consequent gains for all workers.

The labor radicals assumed that the big business employers would be dedicated to dividing and cheating the workers and using violence against them – and IWW organizers became adept at militant and intelligent mass mobilizations to push back such attacks. Even more serious was the IWW goal of replacing the capitalist economic system with what some of them called “the commonwealth of toil,” an economic system that would be owned by all of society and democratically controlled by the working-class majority. The spirit and ideals of the IWW were captured in the great labor anthem “Solidarity Forever,” which has inspired idealistic activists in the labor movement ever since. Its last verse says:

In our hands is placed a power greater than their hoarded gold,
Greater than the might of armies magnified a thousandfold.
We can bring to birth a new world from the ashes of the old,
For the union makes us strong.

Fear of this revolutionary labor union caused many mainstream politicians and some of the smarter employers to develop a more generous attitude toward reforms that would improve the living and working conditions of the working class, and even the toleration of more moderate trade unions. In order to save the existing capitalist system, it would become necessary to make growing numbers of people feel that the system – while imperfect – works well enough for enough of the people, enough of the time. And this opened up more space for the more moderate mainstream of the American labor movement, under the banner of Samuel Gompers’s AFL.

Radical Regroupment

The failure of the IWW to replace the increasingly conservative AFL highlights challenges faced by revolutionary-minded labor activists in the face of twentieth-century capitalism in the United States. The IWW was primarily an organization of working-class revolutionaries who believed, in the words of its 1908 constitutional preamble, that “the working class and the employing class have nothing in common” and that “between these two classes a struggle must go on until workers of the world organize as a class, take possession of the earth and the machinery of production, and abolish the wage system.” Yet this represents the view of revolutionary workers, not all workers, and under normal circumstances most workers will not be prepared to risk all that they have for the purpose of abolishing the wages system. They are dependent on wages for their livelihood and their very survival. In fact, a function of the trade union is to increase the income and improve the conditions associated with jobs that are an integral part of the wages system. While revolutionaries can help to build strong, effective unions to advance workers’ interests, it is not the case that an organization of revolutionaries can itself function as a trade union, which must include masses of workers, many of whom may not understand or agree with the revolutionary program.

One of the clearest revolutionary critiques of the IWW orientation was developed by someone who had been active in both the IWW and the Socialist Party – William Z. Foster. Foster helped develop and lead the small Syndicalist League of North America and what later became the more substantial Trade Union Educational League (TUEL). Foster rejected the notion of breaking away from non-revolutionary trade unions in order to form revolutionary ones. “The truth is that the trade union movement acts always upon the revolutionary policy of utilizing its power to the utmost in forcing the employer to grant concessions.” He insisted that, because of their very nature, “in all trade union movements, conservative as well as radical, there is going on a double-phased process of strengthening their forces and increasing their demands accordingly, and that this process of building constantly greater power and making bigger demands inevitably pushes the unions on . . . to overthrow capitalism.” He believed that in addition to the dynamics inherent in capitalism, the class struggle, and the nature of unions, there was a need for what he called the militant minority, comparable to the leaven necessary to cause a loaf of bread to rise. “The militant minority is the thinking and acting part of the working class,” Foster asserted. “It works out the fighting programs and takes the lead in putting them into effect.”

Foster and a small circle of co-thinkers immersed themselves in organizing activity with the AFL through a strategy they termed “boring from within.” They found strong allies in such people as John Fitzpatrick, president of the Chicago Federation of Labor, in a successful organizing drive among packinghouse workers, and more vacillating support from Samuel Gompers himself and the entire AFL in the effort to organize steelworkers that culminated in the momentous 1919 steel strike. The strike took place during the “Red Scare” repression of radical labor in the United States during and after World War I and in the wake of the 1917 Russian Revolution, from which V. I. Lenin, Leon Trotsky, and others called for global working-class insurgencies to overthrow capitalism. The primary targets of the repression had been the Socialist Party, the IWW, and the anarchists, but the steel strike was also tarred with the same brush. The strike was smashed by the combination of intransigent steel corporations, a viciously hostile press, and brutal assaults from local, state, and national authorities, with the AFL leadership backing away, once again, as it had done at the time of the Pullman Strike.

Inspired by the Russian Revolution’s establishment of a Soviet Republic, and the subsequent founding of the Communist International, segments of the Socialist Party and IWW, even some anarchists, as well as Foster and others from the TUEL, came together to establish a US branch of the Communist Party. In the early 1920s, under Foster’s leadership, the TUEL became a significant force in many of the unions affiliated to the AFL. The promising beginnings of this labor left wing were shattered by the combined effects of an anti-communist offensive orchestrated by the Gompers leadership and sectarian blunders of the communists themselves.

By the late 1920s and early 1930s, the communists’ consequent isolation from labor’s mainstream intertwined with a sectarian policy emanating from the Stalin dictatorship in the Soviet Union which called for the formation of “revolutionary trade unions,” which caused American communists to build rival unions to those of the AFL. Despite some heroic efforts under the banner of the Trade Union Unity League, communist efforts yielded few positive results.

Some left-wing socialists and dissident communists sought to maintain the “boring from within” strategy that would enable radical organizers to build up a dynamic left wing in the mainstream of the labor movement. One of the most influential figures to advance this perspective was Rev. A. J. Muste, who served as the director of Brookwood Labor College from 1921 to 1933. Hundreds of labor activists were trained at Brookwood, which was largely funded and supported by AFL unions, but within which there were strong left-wing influences – symbolized by a May Day celebration in which there were portraits of Samuel Gompers, Eugene V. Debs, Karl Marx, and Vladimir Ilyich Lenin. The tensions inherent in this situation culminated in the ejection of Muste and others, who went on to form their own left-wing American Workers Party.

When the US and global economy took a disastrous downturn with the Great Depression of the 1930s, an increasing number of radicalizing young workers began organizing militant struggles and industrial unions more in the spirit of the old IWW, and the AFL proved completely incapable of overcoming its ingrained conservatism and narrowness. In 1934, there were signs that the workers could win if they had capable leaders. In Minneapolis, Vincent Raymond Dunne and other dissident communist followers of Leon Trotsky (who opposed the Stalin dictatorship that had taken over in the decade following the Russian Revolution) led thousands of teamsters and others to victory through a militant general strike that used bold new tactics. In San Francisco, mainstream communists, allied with Harry Bridges, led West Coast longshoremen to a partial victory after a hard-fought general strike. In Ohio, Toledo Auto-Lite workers, led by militants of A. J. Muste’s American Workers Party, won a similar victory.

These three victories rocked the labor movement, particularly due to the revolutionary orientation of the strikes’ leadership. “Our policy was to organize and build strong unions so workers could have something to say about their own lives and assist in changing the present order into a socialist society,” Dunne matter-of-factly commented. On the West Coast, Bridges offered the view that “the capitalistic form of society . . . means the exploitation of a lot of people for a profit and a complete disregard of their interests for that profit, [and] I haven’t much use for that.” In “every strike situation,” Muste commented, “the policy of drawing in the broadest forces – all the unions, unemployed organizations, political parties and groups – must be carried out in order to break down trade union provincialism; to politicalize the struggle; develop class consciousness; face the workers with the problems of conflict with capitalist governmental agencies, etc.”

The Radical Rise of the CIO

This revolutionary challenge transformed the American labor movement. This is dramatically illustrated in the evolution of John L. Lewis of the United Mine Workers of America. Lewis had never been a labor radical or a socialist – he had been a Republican and an advocate of the Gompers “pure and simple unionism” line. But he was convinced, along with several other top union leaders in the AFL, that the time had come to organize unskilled and semi-skilled mass production workers in the steel, auto, electrical, rubber, textile, and other industries, as well as transit workers, longshoremen and maritime workers, white-collar workers, and others. In order to do that, it would be necessary to overcome many of the racial, ethnic, and gender barriers of the AFL, to work with idealistic left-wing political radicals shunned by the traditional AFL leaders, and to organize on a more inclusive industrial union basis. This could only be done, in the 1930s, by breaking with the AFL and starting a new, more radical and socially conscious labor federation – the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO).

The CIO was built by thousands of men and women who organized their co-workers into new industrial unions, went on strike and maintained picket lines, and conducted sit-down actions that took over factories. They won over and mobilized communities, facing and defying company goons, battling anti-union vigilantes and sometimes pro-company police forces and National Guard units. None of this would have been possible without the involvement of a “militant minority” of revolutionary activists – from the Communist and Socialist parties, Trotskyist and other dissident communist groups, and various independent socialist and anarchist currents.

Nonetheless, Lewis, with his stern face, his bushy eyebrows, and his militant labor oratory, which resonated with Shakespearean and biblical tones, became a powerful symbol of the new unionism that was transforming and revitalizing the American labor movement. Echoes from the revolutionary rhetoric of more than a century could be heard in his pronouncements:

This movement of labor will go on until there is a more equitable and just distribution of our national wealth. This movement will go on until the social order is reconstructed on a basis that will be fair, decent, and honest. This movement will go on until the guarantees of the Declaration of Independence and of the Constitution are enjoyed by all the people, and not by a privileged few.

The radical editor of the CIO News, Len DeCaux, later described the early CIO as “a mass movement with a message, revivalistic in fervor, militant in mood, joined together by class solidarity.” The CIO’s expansive and radical idealism was captured by DeCaux in this description:

As it gained momentum, this movement brought with it new political attitudes – toward the corporations, toward police and troops, toward local, state, national government. Now we’re a movement, many workers asked, why can’t we move on to more and more? Today we’ve forced almighty General Motors to terms by sitting down and defying all the powers at its command, why can’t we go on tomorrow, with our numbers, our solidarity, our determination, to transform city and state, the Washington government itself? Why can’t we go on to create a new society with the workers on top, to end age-old injustices, to banish poverty and war.

Complications and the Triumph of Moderation

In the mid- to late 1930s, however, Lewis and other CIO leaders (including those associated with the Communist Party) turned away from the notion of launching an independent labor party in order to support, instead, the social-liberal presidency of Franklin D. Roosevelt and the New Deal reform program of the Democratic Party. As James Matles, left-wing leader of the United Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers of America, commented, in the difficult years of the Great Depression “Roosevelt knew that this [capitalist] system had to make concessions in order to save itself, and he proceeded on a course to do just that, to save the corporate system in America. . . . Under the pressure of the millions, he gave ground. He put through some of the outstanding labor and social legislation of our time.” In doing this, he helped to nurture a dependence of the growing labor movement, both CIO and AFL, on the Democratic Party and on institutions of the state (such as the National Labor Relations Board). When someone even as influential in labor’s ranks as John L. Lewis resisted this trend, he found himself removed from leadership of the CIO. Those inclined toward revolutionary perspectives, no less than those inclined toward trade union moderation, would feel the resulting constraints in future years, particularly as the political climate in the United States tilted in a more conservative direction.

Another complication for would-be revolutionaries in the US labor movement involved the contradictions that developed in the communist movement with the consolidation of the vicious bureaucratic regime over Soviet communism of Joseph Stalin. Those loyal to the communist mainstream, whatever their noble and idealistic intentions or their substantial and positive contributions to the labor movement, became associated with one of the worst dictatorships in human history, and with policies sometimes more in tune with foreign policy preferences of Soviet leaders than with actual revolutionary principles or the best interests of the working class.

During World War II, when the United States and the Soviet Union were allies against Nazi Germany, this seemed unproblematical. But in the late 1940s, a Cold War confrontation developed between the two countries, lasting for half a century. This helped generate a new anti-communist “Red Scare,” and the deepened dependence of labor on government supportiveness caused leaders of both the AFL and the CIO to launch a fierce assault on communists, but also on other radicals and revolutionaries in their own ranks.

The expulsion of 11 “left-wing” unions from the CIO was part of a deradicalization that enabled the two labor federations to unite into the AFL-CIO in 1955, with the consequent marginalization of the revolutionary influences that had played such an important role in the labor movement in earlier times. This was reinforced by dramatic changes in the US economy and social reality that would erode the conditions that had provided the base for labor radicalism in earlier decades – an unprecedented, long-term prosperity that embraced most of the working class until the 1970s and 1980s, the spread of consumerism and suburbanization, the transformation of the workplace through technological innovation, a dramatic increase in the percentage of white-collar occupations in the working class, and early developments in what would eventually explode into what would later be called “globalization.”

This led to a long-term decline of revolutionary currents in the labor movement. It also caused the movement to lose much of the social vision and old idealism that had made it such an attractive force for many working people. It could be argued that AFL-CIO President George Meany, a tough-talking, cigar-chomping plumber, had an outlook in many ways no broader than that of Sam Gompers in his twilight years. A counter-argument – a variation of William Z. Foster’s old notion that the trade union movement was inherently more revolutionary than the excessively moderate stance of its leaders – was advanced by a popular socialist spokesperson, Michael Harrington, who argued that the “progressive” social policies of ostensibly pro-capitalist labor leaders such as Meany, and ex-socialist Walter Reuther of the United Auto Workers, added up to the creation of new “socialist definitions of capitalism” that could pull the United States beyond the oppressive limitations of the market economy.

Radical Stirrings

One person who represented a genuinely expansive social vision in the AFL-CIO, and who never renounced his earlier socialist commitments, was the head of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, A. Philip Randolph. Randolph had pioneered in forming a strong all-black union – no mean trick in the racist climate of the 1920s – a union that pushed its way into a reluctant AFL and stayed there, fighting both for black-white unity in labor struggles and for racial equality within the labor movement. An early pioneer and highly respected leader of the modern civil rights movement, Randolph’s crowning achievement was to conceive of and oversee the organization of the 1963 March on Washington – the massive march where Martin Luther King, Jr. gave his “I Have a Dream” speech. Randolph proclaimed to the gathering that this huge demonstration represented “the advance guard of a massive moral revolution for jobs and freedom.”

In 1966 Randolph issued A “Freedom Budget” for All Americans, endorsed by over 200 prominent civil rights, trade union, and social activists and academic figures. He described the Freedom Budget’s meaning:

The “Freedom Budget” spells out a specific and factual course of action, step by step, to start in early 1967 toward the practical liquidation of poverty in the United States by 1975. The programs urged in the “Freedom Budget” attack all of the major causes of poverty – unemployment and underemployment; substandard pay, inadequate social insurance and welfare payments to those who cannot or should not be employed; bad housing; deficiencies in health services, education, and training; and fiscal and monetary policies which tend to redistribute income regressively rather than progressively. The “Freedom Budget” leaves no room for discrimination in any form, because its programs are addressed to all who need more opportunity and improved incomes and living standards – not just to some of them.

Randolph explained that such programs “are essential to the Negro and other minority groups striving for dignity and economic security in our society,” but that “the abolition of poverty (almost three-quarters of whose victims are white) can be accomplished only through action which embraces the totality of the victims of poverty, neglect, and injustice.” He added that “in the process everyone will benefit, for poverty is not an isolated circumstance affecting only those entrapped by it. It reflects – and affects – the performance of our national economy, our rate of economic growth, our ability to produce and consume, the condition of our cities, the levels of our social services and needs, the very quality of our lives.” In Randolph’s opinion, the success of this effort would depend on “a mighty coalition among the civil rights and labor movements, liberal and religious forces, students and intellectuals – the coalition expressed in the historic 1963 March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom.”

But the Freedom Budget was too radical for most of the Democratic and Republican politicians – and it “didn’t sell” under the Lyndon Johnson presidency, not to mention that of his conservative successor, Richard Nixon. Since labor had no political party of its own, this closed the door on such proposals as the Freedom Budget. A bitter Randolph commented that the persistence of poverty and racism is rooted in “fundamentally economic problems which are caused by the nature of the system in which we live. This system is a market economy in which investment and production are determined more by the anticipation of profits than by the desire to achieve social justice.” This suggested, despite Randolph’s desire to appeal to moderate labor and political elements, the revolutionary implications of Randolph’s far-reaching goals.

His ally, Martin Luther King, Jr., was less inclined than Randolph to compromise with Democratic Party politicians who (at the time) prioritized the Vietnam War over any wars on poverty. King argued that “revitalized sectors of the labor movement” must join together with other social movements to “reshape economic relationships and usher in a breakthrough to a new level of social reform.”

Such developments failed to take shape in the final decades of the twentieth century. With the dramatic and relentless decline in the power, influence, and membership of the organized labor movement in the United States, those defending the “pure and simple” approach of Gompers and the relatively conservative “business unionism” of Meany increasingly lost credibility. More radical rhetoric once again found expression within labor’s leadership, and some in labor’s ranks began to look for inspiration to the movement’s revolutionary traditions.

Labor’s Volunteer Army

Stephen O’Brien

In July 1916, with Australia deeply involved in the European war, a wave of opposition to military conscription swept the country. The movement was strongest in Broken Hill, where 2,500 men swore to resist industrial or military conscription by the “capitalist military oligarchy” by signing up to Labor’s Volunteer Army (LVA).

Broken Hill, a remote town with large silver and lead mines, like most of the country had initially supported the war. However, by 1916 enthusiasm in Broken Hill and elsewhere had waned, the supply of volunteers began to dry up, and the government proposed conscription to provide fresh troops. In a context of layoffs, poor public health, and inflation, the idea of conscription galvanized public discontent, and people turned to union traditions for solutions. The miners of Broken Hill had a high level of class consciousness and many of them were supportive of the local branches of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) and the Socialist Party. In 1915 the underground miners had adopted the IWW slogan "If you want a 44-hour week take it" as their own. After a month-long strike, in defiance of their union, mine owners, and even the prime minister, they won the right to the 44-hour week. One of the leading strikers, a former seafarer from Liverpool, Percy Brookfield, brushed off accusations that they had sabotaged the war effort. Brookfield and his co-thinkers regarded talk of military conscription as a prelude to industrial conscriptions and a massive attack on workers' rights and conditions.

When the government announced a referendum on the issue, the miners decided to organize a workers' army to resist what they called the capitalist military oligarchy. They formed the LVA, and over 2,500 eligible conscriptees pledged to resist conscription until death. Thousands flocked to LVA public meetings and street demonstrations during the referendum campaign. The campaign saw fines, arrests, and jailings under the War Precautions Act, as well as street battles with loyalists and the police. Undeterred, the miners held stop-work meetings and strikes, and in their election eve rally mobilized over 10,000 people, including brass bands and women's and youth contingents.

Broken Hill was impressed with Brookfield's conviction and courage. On one occasion he fought off a patriotic mob bent on ransacking the IWW rooms, and on another he called the prime minister "a traitor and a viper," for which he spent a month in jail. When a by-election was held, Brookfield was nominated and elected as Labor member to state parliament, to be subsequently reelected twice.

Broken Hill recorded a two to one majority against conscription. The government tried unsuccessfully in a second referendum a year later. Broken Hill again voted strongly against, but the political focus had now shifted. The state government had provoked a general strike by enforcing speedups and launching a massive crackdown against the IWW. Brookfield and his allies had also become preoccupied with defending 12 IWW members who had been framed on serious charges, including arson.

In 1920, after being expelled from the Labor Party, Brookfield was reelected for the Industrial Labor Party. Holding the balance of power, he forced the eventual release of the IWW 12, defended the first Soviet consul, Peter Simonoff, a Russian who had been a Broken Hill miner and LVA member, and helped Broken Hill miners win the 35-hour week and the best industrial conditions in the country in the Big Strike of 1919–20. Six months later, on March 21, 1921, Brookfield was assassinated while attempting to disarm a gunman at a railway station. His funeral, attended by 15,000 Broken Hill people, led by a horseman carrying a red flag, was the last great rally of the LVA era.

Labour Party, Britain

John McCormick

The Labour Party is one of Britain's two major political parties. It was founded in 1900, following debate about the need for a party to represent the interests of Britain's working-class population. In 1922 it replaced the Liberals as the opposition to the Conservatives, and headed its first coalition government in 1924 under Ramsay MacDonald. Labour won outright power for the first time in 1945 under Clement Attlee and set about completing construction of a welfare state and a managed economy, nationalizing key industries and creating a national health service, a social security system, and a subsidized education system. It lost power in 1951, but returned in 1964–70 and again in 1974–6 under Harold Wilson, and in 1976–9 under James Callaghan. It went into opposition in 1979, losing four straight general elections and undergoing a crisis of confidence before finally regaining power in 1997 under Tony Blair.

Labour's difficulties in the 1980s were widely blamed on a combination of the political shrewdness of Conservative Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, "unelectable" party leaders such as the old-style socialist Michael Foot, and the unpopularity of many of its more traditional socialist policies, including state ownership of key industries, support of labor unions, and the redistribution of wealth through taxation. The depth of its internal problems was emphasized in 1981 when a group of moderate members of the party broke away to form the Social Democratic Party (SDP) (which went on to merge in 1988 with the Liberal Party, becoming the Liberal Democrats).

Tony Blair was elected party leader in May 1994, and moved to "modernize" Labour by adopting what he called a new left-of-center agenda. This included abandonment of the controversial Clause Four of its constitution, which pledged "common ownership of the means of production, distribution, and exchange" (thereby threatening to undo Thatcher's popular policy of privatization). It went on to promote the "third way" in politics, meaning an approach to government, politics, economics, and social issues that lay somewhere between the kind of right-wing conservatism associated with the Thatcher government and the left-wing liberalism associated with European socialist parties.

At the May 1997 general election, "New Labour" won a 177-seat majority, while the Conservatives lost half their seats in the Commons and all their seats in Scotland and Wales. Labour succeeded by capitalizing on a widely felt need among Britons for new ideas in government, and a new focus on social problems. It had also moved itself towards the center of the political spectrum (for example, promising not to raise income taxes), and benefited from internal squabbles within the Conservative Party. Furthermore, there was clearly much tactical voting in the election, with Labour and Liberal Democrat supporters voting for the other party in districts where one of them was in a strong position to challenge the incumbent Conservative. Finally, a new generation of young people who had known nothing but Conservative government was voting for the first time: 52 percent of under-25s voted Labour, up from 35 percent in 1992.

Labour under Blair went on to encroach into traditionally Conservative territory, embracing the market economy, developing a closer relationship with business, reducing the influence of trade unions in the party, making a commitment to a balanced budget, instituting a more pro-European policy (Labour was for many years hostile to the idea of European integration), and moving Labour toward foreign policy positions that were pro-globalization and aligned closely with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) and with the United States. Perhaps his greatest tactical achievement was to prevent damaging in-fighting within the party between left wingers who preferred public ownership and intervention in the economy, were opposed to nuclear weapons, and were cool on the transatlantic alliance, and right wingers prepared to take a more pragmatic approach, favoring nuclear weapons and supporting the transatlantic alliance. Labour maintained its commanding position at the 2001 election, when its majority was reduced by just 12 seats, and its percentage share of the vote fell from 43 to 41. However, voter turnout fell to 59 percent, suggesting that enthusiasm for Labour was waning and that it was being returned to office partly because the Conservatives had failed to offer a strong alternative.

The situation changed during 2002–3 when Blair supported the US-led invasion of Iraq. Mass demonstrations against the war were held in Britain, as elsewhere in Europe, and when it became clear that the pretext for invasion – that Iraq was developing weapons of mass destruction – was false, and as questions were raised about the real motives behind the war and about the wisdom of British support for the US, Blair became increasingly unpopular. Labour's record on public services, crime, and asylum was also facing new criticism, as was Blair's governing style. But the strength of the economy worked in his favor, as did the unpopularity of the Conservatives, and Labour won an unprecedented third term at the 2005 general election, with a reduced but still impressive majority of 66. Blair had muddied the waters by declaring several months in advance that it would be his last election, sparking damaging debate in 2005–6 about how long he would stay in office, and generating calls from his critics for him to step down. He finally stepped down in June 2007, and was replaced as party leader – and as prime minister – by Gordon Brown, who had served as chancellor of the exchequer throughout the Blair years.

Lafayette, Marquis de (1757–1834)

Annette Richardson

Marie Joseph Paul Yves Roche Gilbert du Motier, Marquis de Lafayette, was a wealthy French aristocrat who participated in several revolutions, including the American Revolution, the Great French Revolution (and Counterrevolution), and the July Revolution of 1830.

Lafayette was born on September 6, 1757, to Michel Roche Gilbert du Motier, also Marquis de Lafayette, and Marie Louise, a daughter of the Marquis de la Rivière. The family had served the French state since the Hundred Years' War of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Lafayette received a classical and military education, and became a proponent of liberal ideas. He inherited great wealth, married at age 17, and soon had three children. He was on friendly terms with highly placed court officials, as well as with Queen Marie, wife of King Louis XV.

In late 1776 he learned about the American Declaration of Independence, which contained ideals he espoused. That, and the fact that France had lost its North American empire to Britain in the Seven Years' War, encouraged young Lafayette to support American independence. He ventured to America, whereupon the Continental Congress granted him permission to volunteer at his own expense and gave him the rank of major general. He met George Washington shortly thereafter and they became instant friends. Lafayette used his own financial resources to ensure that his men were trained well, equipped properly, and fed.

Lafayette was involved in numerous battles, and facilitated French military and financial assistance to America, during the revolutionary period. He received letters of gratitude from Congress for his 80-mile, eight-hour journey on horseback from Newport to Boston on August 29, 1778, to assist the retreat of the American forces. In 1779 he returned to France for a six-month visit, during which time he urged French military assistance to the Americans. As a result, an expeditionary force of 6,000 French troops under the command of the Comte de Rochambeau arrived in Rhode Island in July 1780 to assist Washington.

The British General Cornwallis, following a successful battle in North Carolina on March 15, 1781, moved into Virginia and joined with Benedict Arnold, who had just defected to the British, to create a combined force of 4,000. Lafayette, in command of 1,000 infantrymen, retreated but Cornwallis pursued him and famously boasted, "The boy cannot escape me." Lafayette marched to Yorktown, however, where he established an effective spy network; consequently, the Americans knew exactly what the British were planning. Cornwallis was surrounded, and a combined Franco-American operation routed the British at Yorktown, which led to their surrender on October 19, 1781, and secured the victory of the American Revolution. In 1782, Lafayette returned to France, where he was hailed as a "hero of two worlds."

In 1784 Lafayette again returned to America and visited George Washington at Mount Vernon. He then toured Germany, where he became interested in the abolition of slavery. He stated his intention to emancipate the slaves on a large plantation he had bought in Cayenne, which greatly impressed Washington and Thomas Jefferson.

Lafayette greeted the early stages of the French Revolution with enthusiasm, and he played a prominent role in it. He served as a member of the Assembly of Notables in 1787, and was one of the signatories to the document that recalled the Estates General (after a 175-year hiatus) on May 5, 1789. On July 11, 1789, he proposed a Declaration of the Rights of Man and the Citizen, similar to the American Declaration of Rights. He became commander of the newly established National Guard on July 25, 1789, a position he held until October 8, 1791.

As the Revolution progressed, however, Lafayette found himself increasingly in opposition to its rapidly radicalizing trend. He was a founder of the Feuillants Club, a conservative split-off from the Jacobin Club. His popularity plummeted when on July 17, 1791, troops under his command opened fire on a massive demonstration calling for the king's removal – the infamous “Champs de Mars massacre.”

In June 1792 Lafayette made an explicit attempt to militarily subdue the Revolution. Then in command of one of France's four armies, he left his troops at the front and returned to Paris to address the Legislative Assembly and demand that it suppress the Jacobin Club. When the Assembly failed to respond to his entreaties, he attempted to raise the Parisian National Guard he had formerly commanded to attack the Jacobins and eliminate them as a center of influence. Only a handful of the guardsmen responded, however, and his initiative ended in humiliating failure. Ridiculed as a would-be Julius Caesar, he returned to his army at the front.

On August 10, 1792, a powerful insurrection occurred in Paris that resulted in the overthrow of the monarchy and the proclamation of the Republic. Once again Lafayette attempted to intervene militarily, and once again he failed. He tried to lead his army to Paris to block this giant step forward of the Revolution, but his troops deserted him. On August 19 the Assembly declared him a traitor; to avoid the guillotine he fled to join the Revolution's worst enemies, the Austrians. Lafayette may have hoped the Austrians would welcome him as an ally against the Revolution, but unfortunately for him they did not. Instead they imprisoned him and he remained behind bars for several years.

Napoleon Bonaparte included Lafayette's release as a stipulation in the Treaty of Campo Formio in 1797. Lafayette was freed as a United States citizen on September 23, 1797, to the United States consul in Hamburg. Returning to France, he retired to La Grange, his wife's family castle in Brie near Paris. Although Lafayette had lost most of his wealth, he declined all awards from Bonaparte and offers of political positions from the United States. He disapproved of Bonaparte's imperial title and was never supportive of the emperor's ambitions and despotic tendencies. After Bonaparte's defeat at Waterloo and his final departure from the scene in 1815, Lafayette was elected to the Chamber of Deputies, a position he held from 1818 until 1824. As a political leader of the opposition to the restored Bourbon monarchy, Lafayette consistently supported liberal causes.

Following his tenure as a deputy, Lafayette returned to the United States, accompanied by his son, and visited all 24 of the then-existing states in 14 months. Congress voted to grant Lafayette $200,000 and 24,000 acres of land in appreciation of his services, and he celebrated his sixty-eighth birthday at the White House. After his return to France he was reelected, in 1827, to the Chamber of Deputies, a position he held until his death. During the July Revolution of 1830, Lafayette became commander-in-chief of the National Guard. Still a believer in constitutional monarchy, he was instrumental in placing Louis Philippe, the “bourgeois king,” on the French throne.

Lafayette died in Paris on May 20, 1834, and received a grand funeral. He was buried beside his wife in Le Jardin de Picpus cemetery in the Faubourg Saint-Antoine.

What was Lafayette's legacy as a revolutionary? The “hero of two worlds” made positive contributions to the American Revolution and to the French Revolution in its first year or two. By 1791, however, although he undoubtedly believed he was defending the Revolution from devolving into anarchy and chaos, it is evident in retrospect that he had gone over to the Counterrevolution by placing himself and the troops he commanded in the service of the Revolution's most implacable enemies. Another way of assessing Lafayette is as a consistent liberal who was willing to fight for democratic reforms and political equality, but just as willing to fight against the struggles of poor people for social justice and economic equality.

Lalor, Peter (1827–1889)

Ann Beggs-Sunter

Peter Lalor achieved fame as the leader of the gold diggers in their revolt against the British government at the Eureka Stockade, Ballarat, Victoria in 1854. Lalor was born in Ireland in 1827, the youngest of 11 sons of Patrick and Ann Lalor of County Laois, Ireland. His father sat in the House of Commons with Daniel O’Connell in the Reform Parliament, and the family became involved with the movement for repeal of the Act of Union and for land reform in Ireland. The eldest son, James Fintan, became a Young Irelander in 1848 and gave his life for the cause.

Such were the family influences on the engineer Peter Lalor when he immigrated to Australia in 1852. By October 1854, Lalor was a gold miner in Ballarat and was drawn into the protest movement against the unjust and corrupt administration of the Ballarat goldfields. On November 30, 1854, Lalor drew on his Irish nationalist heritage and stepped forward to lead the radical arm of the movement on Bakery Hill. Lalor mounted a stump under the Southern Cross flag and called on those present to swear an oath that would ring passionately down the generations:

We swear by the Southern Cross to stand truly
by each other,
And fight to defend our rights and liberties.

Lalor’s oath inspired men with revolutionary fervor. They marched away to form a defensive stockade on the Eureka Lead and commence collecting arms. With the Irish being the largest ethnic component of the militants, Lalor was elected commander-in-chief. The previously conservative youngest son had suddenly stepped into his elder brother’s shoes and become a rebel.

When the military and police made a secret pre-dawn attack on the Stockade on Sunday morning, December 3, 1854, the defenders were caught napping and after a brief and bloody battle, the Stockade was overrun. Lalor led his men bravely but was shot and severely wounded during the battle. He was saved by comrades who hid him until a secret operation could be arranged to amputate his shattered left arm. This operation took place in the presbytery of the Catholic chapel of St. Alipius, evidence of his support base amongst the Irish community.

When Lalor had regained some strength, he was spirited away to Geelong, where his fiancée, Alicia Dunne, nursed him back to health. Although there was a reward of £200 on his head, nobody betrayed him. On April 10, 1855, Lalor published a long letter in the Melbourne newspapers, justifying his actions to his fellow colonists and to the world:

Is it to prove to us that a British Government can never bring forth a measure of reform without having first prepared a font of human blood in which to baptise that offspring of their generous love? Or is it to convince the world that where a large standing army exists, the Demon of Despotism will have frequently offered at his shrine the mangled bodies of murdered men?

A month later, with a price still on his head, Lalor boldly attended a land sale in Ballarat and successfully bid £260 for 160 acres of land near Ballarat. Four days later, on May 9, 1855, the government declared an amnesty, and Lalor was at last a free man. Later that year Lalor was elected to parliament as the champion of the diggers at Ballarat and began a long parliamentary career which culminated in his election as Speaker of the Legislative Assembly.

However, soon after his entry into parliament, Lalor confounded his supporters by voting in favor of an electoral bill that maintained property qualifications, and he defended himself in a statement published in the Argus on December 31, 1856:

I would ask these gentlemen what they mean by Democracy?
Do they mean Chartism, or Communism, or Republicanism?
If so, I never was, I am not now, nor ever will be a democrat.

But if democracy means opposition to a tyrannical press, a tyrannical people or a tyrannical government then I ever have been, I am still, and will ever remain a democrat.

For Lalor, democracy meant opposition to tyranny, not equality for the people. It was the tyranny of a corrupt magistracy and a brutal police force that drove him to arms at Eureka, not belief in the Chartist democratic points. Thus it was not surprising that Lalor would vote with the landed interests, his own class, in parliament. Lalor became a mining capitalist, using his parliamentary position to gain advantage in mining deals. The electors of Ballarat withdrew their support for his parliamentary candidacy, and he was forced to move to a conservative rural seat. However, as Speaker, Lalor repeatedly refused the offer of a knighthood, saying that no higher honor could be bestowed on him than being “first commoner of Victoria.”

Lalor died in Melbourne in 1889, and his death unleashed a rash of memorials around the continent. Lalor was mythologized in poetry, paintings, and sculpture. Clive Turnbull wrote the first full biography of Peter Lalor in 1946. Turnbull pointed out that Lalor was an ordinary man before and after Eureka, but for a brief moment he rose to magnificent heights to become a symbol of courage, determination, and comradeship. Ian Turner’s entry on Lalor in the Australian Dictionary of Biography (1974) is a careful assessment, which weighs the positive and negative aspects of Lalor’s character, concluding that though “neither a profound thinker nor a skilful politician, Lalor was a good fighter and a man of rectitude” who earned the grudging respect of those whom he opposed.

Lamartine, Alphonse de (1790–1869)

Casey Harison

Alphonse de Lamartine flashed across the historical landscape during France’s Revolution of 1848. A political moderate rather than a revolutionary, the lofty rhetoric for which Lamartine was known was not matched by skills in governing. In the end, Lamartine’s fall was as grand as his rise.

Lamartine was born in Burgundy and given a Jesuit education, though intellectually he fit the Deist tradition. He spent much of his youth traveling. Unlike many Romantic-era contemporaries, Lamartine mostly rejected the influence of classical thinkers and instead was drawn to more recent authors like Jean-Jacques Rousseau. A poet and writer himself, Lamartine’s fame came early with Méditations poétiques (1820). Elected to the Académie française (French Academy) in 1829, his literary reputation paved the way for a political career, beginning with election to the Chamber of Deputies. During the July Monarchy (1830–48), Lamartine cultivated a reputation as a brilliant speaker who was sympathetic to the “social question.” His appeal also derived from the success of History of the Girondins (1846).

Lamartine’s place in history especially comes from his role in the French Revolution of 1848. A critic of the Orléanist monarchy, he was a prominent actor in the February Revolution that saw Louis-Philippe deposed, a provisional government declared, and France made a (Second) Republic. Lamartine was appointed foreign minister and was an influential figure before the June Days rebellion, lending his energy to such accomplishments as the abolition of slavery in French colonies, extending the right to vote for males, and promoting economic reforms for the lower classes.

Lamartine’s character was marked by flaws. Alexis de Tocqueville admired him as a great poet and an inspiring speaker, but in his Recollections he wrote: “I do not think I ever met in the world of ambitious egoists . . . any mind so untroubled by thought of the public good as his. . . . [H]e . . . always seemed ready to turn the world upside down for the fun of it.” Lamartine courted radical elements in 1848, but temperamentally he was a moderate and in crucial moments he proved reticent. Early in the Revolution he argued in favor of the French tricolor flag and against the red flag of socialism. Lamartine’s reputation declined through the spring as tensions between workers and the middle classes grew and as Paris slid inexorably toward the June Days.

Lamartine’s career cascaded downward following the June Days. In the presidential election of December 1848, he received about 18,000 votes, compared to the winner Louis-Napoleon’s nearly 5.5 million. Likewise, Lamartine’s writing career did not revive after 1848. He died in relative obscurity and poverty in 1869.

Lame, Manuel Quintín (1880–1967), Indian/peasant organization, and the struggle for land in Colombia, 1920s–1930s

Olga Burkert

Manuel Quintín Lame was the most important indigenous leader in Colombia in the twentieth century. Born October 31, 1880 on the Hacienda San Isidro in the northwest of Colombia, Lame grew up illiterate with five brothers and sisters in a poor peasant family that belonged to the indigenous Paez people. At this time in the Colombian region of Cauca, it was common practice for indigenous people not to own land; instead, they lived as tenants on the land of large landholders whom they had to pay in hours of work. Through his uncle, Lame’s interest in reading grew and he learned how to read and write. In 1901 he entered the army of the Conservative Party, where he stayed until 1903 after the conclusion of the Thousand Days’ War. On leaving, he asked for a piece of land near his father’s house.

Over the years the situation worsened for peasants and Lame grew increasingly radical. He began studying law on his own and became an advocate for indigenous rights, presenting his demands before local, regional, and national authorities. In 1914 he started a campaign to mobilize the indigenous people of the Cauca region and founded an organization that challenged the power of the armed forces and large landowners. Later that year the armed struggle began with the participation of about 6,000 indigenous people. At the end of 1914, Lame gathered with the chiefs of Tolima, Huila, Tierradentro, Cauca, and Valle to start an uprising in February 1915 which they hoped would lead to the foundation of a free indigenous territory, the República Chiquita de Indios. The plan was discovered, however, and Lame was arrested. Throughout his fight for indigenous rights, Lame was arrested and imprisoned several times, as landowners began to put pressure on the authorities to fight him. Because of his law studies, he insisted on representing himself.

Through the 1920s and 1930s, several battles and land occupations took place. In 1924 the indigenous communities of Ortega and Chaparral named Lame, José Gonzalo Sánchez, and Eutiquio Timoté as their representatives. This started a new agitation, ending in the founding of a village, San José de Indias. In 1930, Timoté was nominated the Communist Party’s presidential candidate. Lame, a strict Catholic who never favored an alliance with the communists, broke with Timoté and Sánchez.

In 1931 San José de Indias was attacked by landowners’ troops. Lame was able to flee, but 17 indigenous people died and 40 were injured.

From 1945 on, systematic violence against the indigenous communities began. As the first to demand extensive land rights for indigenous peoples, Lame continued to emphasize that they had an ancestral right to the land because it had belonged to them before the Spaniards conquered South America. He continued this fight until his death in Ortega in 1967.

Landau, Kurt (1903–1937)

Holger Briel

Kurt Landau was born on January 29, 1903 in Vienna, the son of a wealthy Jewish wine merchant, and was an eminent non-aligned Austrian Marxist. He was elected leader of the Kommunistische Partei Österreichs (Austrian Communist Party) (KPÖ) in Vienna-Währing, but became disillusioned with the Stalinist grip on power and the persecution of Leon Trotsky. As cultural editor of the communist newspaper Rote Fahne (Red Flag), Landau defended Trotskyist positions, including the notion of permanent revolution with democratic elements. Together with other rebels, Landau was expelled from the KPÖ during 1926 and 1927. In 1929, on Trotsky's suggestion, Landau moved to Germany to unify communist factions. He set up in the Berlin area of Wedding, traditionally a leftist workers' quarter, and organized the Roter Wedding (Red Wedding) movement. He was elected onto the Provisional National Leadership Board of the Linke Opposition der KPD (Bolschewiki-Leninisten) as the liaison to the International Bureau and wrote for the newspaper Der Kommunist.

As a result of possible Stalinist intervention, a rift was created within the leftist opposition between Landau and the up-and-coming Roman Well (aka Robert Soblen). Trotsky sided with Well, who accused Landau of exaggerating the danger of a possible Nazi takeover of Germany. In May 1931 the left opposition split and Landau founded the so-called Gruppe Landau or Gruppe Funke (Group Spark), named after its magazine, Funke, that started publishing in 1933. The group formed part of the larger left-wing party Linker Flügel der KPD/Marxisten/Leninisten.

In further opposition to Trotsky, Landau advocated alliances of national communist parties with non-communists to oppose fascism. Trotsky considered Landau's popular front proposal a prescription for failure, as it included non-communists with different agendas, and severed ties with Landau.

After the Nazis took power in Germany, Landau fled to Paris in March 1933 and established ties with French leftist groups such as Que faire? In 1936 some of Landau's former allies were executed following the Moscow show trials, confirming his disillusionment with the Soviet Union under Stalin. Also in 1936, the Spanish Civil War commenced, and like other liberals and leftists, Landau traveled to Barcelona to fight the fascists. He believed strongly that Spain represented the basis of the democratic reconsolidation of Marxist forces.

While war raged in September 1937, Landau, who was in hiding in several anarchist safe houses around Barcelona under the pseudonym Wolf Bertram, disappeared, apparently kidnapped by Stalinist agents. After his kidnapping, Kurt Landau was never heard from again and while his ultimate fate is disputed, sources contend that in 1937 he was either murdered by German communists or Soviet secret police.

In 1988 a memorial was inaugurated in the Central Cemetery in Vienna for Austrian volunteers killed in the Spanish Civil War which includes the name of Kurt Landau. Of the 1,500 or so Austrians who fought, about 260 were killed.

Landauer, Gustav (1870–1919)

Jesse Cohn

Gustav Landauer was an anarchist organizer, theorist, and writer whose importance to a history of revolution is twofold: first, in terms of his own revolutionary practice, and second, in terms of his contribution to a radical revision of theories of revolution.

Political Practice

While best remembered as a theorist, author of a prodigious corpus of lectures, essays, translations, novels, and larger works of literary criticism, history, and political philosophy, Landauer was active in the anarchist movement throughout his life and was to pay for his radical practice with two prison terms and, ultimately, his own extra-judicial execution. German anarchists in Landauer's time were struggling to retain their place in the broader socialist movement, a place increasingly denied them by a socialist party establishment bent on maintaining its legitimacy within the parliamentary system and by a trend toward centralization in the labor movement. Thus, Landauer began his political life as a member of "Der Jungen" (or "Youth"), an anti-parliamentarist faction within the Social Democratic Party of Germany (SPD). As the SPD moved toward reformism and doctrinaire Marxism after the Erfurt congress of 1891, the Jungen were marginalized and ultimately expelled, forming a new group called the Verein Unabhängiger Sozialisten (Association of Independent Socialists) in 1892. After a struggle over its ideological direction, Landauer became chief editor of their journal, Der Sozialist (which he subsequently subtitled Organ für Anarchismus-Sozialismus) in May 1893. At the congresses of the Second International, first in Zurich in July 1893, and then in London in July 1896, Landauer was among the anarchists who protested their exclusion.

Landauer was active in building an anarchist-socialist movement that would present a viable alternative to reformism. Faced with the increasing co-optation of industrial unions by employers and the state, Landauer sought new avenues for resistance to capitalism, such as radical aesthetics, the formation of cooperatives, and the unionization of non-factory workers – including, significantly, peasants and women. Thus, in October 1892, he participated in the founding of the Neue Freie Volksbühne (the New People's Independent Theatre) in Berlin as an alternative to theater created by the SPD. Through this he helped to popularize the politically charged dramas of new playwrights such as Georg Kaiser. In March 1895, Landauer helped to create a worker-consumer cooperative named "Befreiung" ("Liberation") in Berlin, and subsequently intervened in the Berlin Garment Workers' Strike of February 1896 on behalf of seamstresses, mainly home workers, angry at their misrepresentation by an SPD-led strike committee.

These activities earned Landauer the increasingly hostile attention of the German government, which sentenced him to a total of 17 months in prison in 1893 and 1899 on political charges of "disobedience," "incitement," and "libel." The government also jailed several other writers and editorial staff of Der Sozialist, and subjected them to repeated arrests, searches, seizures, surveillance, interrogations, and trials. This led to a complete shutdown of the paper in 1899. Nonetheless, Landauer continued to write journalistic articles, philosophical works, translations, literary criticism, and novels, and to associate with some of the brightest minds in the German Jewish intellectual world, such as the theologian Martin Buber, poet and dramatist

Erich Mühsam, and language philosopher Fritz Mauthner.

In 1908, Landauer launched the Sozialistischer Bund (Socialist Federation), an association working for a non-violent revolution by building cooperative “settlements” as concrete alternatives to government and capitalism. To this end, he revived Der Sozialist as the Bund’s house organ. Landauer’s manifestos for the Bund combined the “mutualist” economics of Pierre Joseph Proudhon and Silvio Gesell, in which individuals and cooperative enterprises would exchange labor and goods “in justice” (i.e., without profit, rent, or interest) with the decentralist philosophy of Peter Kropotkin and Ebenezer Howard (for whom, in Landauer’s paraphrase, “the central power of the state” was to be replaced by an infinity of “organs and arrangements” serving particular, localized communities, uniting the “people” with the “land”).

The Sozialistischer Bund grew until the disruptions of World War I. Sensing the danger as early as 1907, Landauer campaigned against militarism and imperialism but found himself isolated as large sections of the German and European left joined in the call for war. In 1915, due to heightened censorship, Der Sozialist ceased publication.

Landauer remained active in the peace movement and after Germany’s defeat participated in the first Bavarian Räterepublik (Council Republic) of 1919. Its left-wing socialist president, Kurt Eisner, appointed Landauer Commissioner of Enlightenment and Public Instruction – a position Landauer insisted must remain “provisional” until confirmed by the vote of the assembled workers’ and soldiers’ councils. Landauer planned to institute broad curricular reforms along lines suggested by the Spanish anarchist educator Francisco Ferrer, giving priority to poetry and culture. After the defeat of the revolution, Landauer fell victim to right-wing reprisals: imprisoned on May Day, 1919, he was beaten to death by soldiers in the prison yard at Stadelheim the following day.

Theoretical Work

Landauer’s anarchism developed in contrast to three other currents in anarchism: “propaganda by the deed” or individual terrorism; anarcho-syndicalism, focused on organizing the working class via labor unions; and anarchocommunist, refusing the wage system in favor of free distribution of goods according to need. Rejecting all violent means as inconsistent with anarchist goals, Landauer also argued against vesting revolutionary hopes solely in the urban industrial working class and did not see communism as the best alternative to capitalism. Instead, he proposed a “way to freedom” closely linked to his conception of culture and community as forms of “spirit” (Geist).

Landauer’s use of this concept owes much to Romantic philosophy and Judaism. Indeed, one of his major works argues that a rational critique of received ideas is compatible with “a new mysticism.” However, “spirit,” for Landauer, is not supernatural; rather, it consists of common bonds of thought, feeling, language, and identity that unite people. As he explained in his Aufruf zum Sozialismus (translated into English as For Socialism), this force is simply “solidarity,” materially codified and transmitted through repeatable signs (“symbols”) and signifying practices (“rituals”). Spirit decays when people mistake these signs and signifying practices for the social bond itself, treating them as sacred and unalterable, making their repetition into something rigid and compulsory. Without the spirit of community, cooperation becomes difficult, leading to conflict and coercive arrangements such as the state. In order to “destroy” coercive systems, then, we must “build” new communities based on solidarity.

To some extent, this conception of revolution as prefiguring the future society within the present parallels the anarcho-syndicalist conception of the revolutionary union as the organizational “embryo” of the post-revolutionary economic system. However, Landauer generalizes this project beyond the confines of the workplace to embrace every aspect of life. Thus, Landauer asserted that “the state is not a thing” but “a relationship between human beings, a way by which people relate to one another.” Landauer inverts King Louis XVI’s declaration, “I am the state,” to argue that “we are the state,” that its power to dominate comes from our willingness to submit. It can only be “destroyed” by transforming coercive, hierarchical relationships into cooperative, egalitarian ones. This transformation goes beyond governmental or economic relationships; ultimately, as he argued in his 1907 treatise Die Revolution, “revolution relates to the whole of the social life of men” – including “spiritual structures and currents, art, culture and education.” All of these areas of “social life” are fields for revolutionary transformation.

Moreover, Landauer suggests, transformation need not be violent, sudden, and all-encompassing to be authentically “revolutionary.” Along these lines, Die Revolution presents a prehistory of the French Revolution that undermines the Jacobin conception of revolution as a single, total overturning of social relations as a consequence of the overthrow of a state. Instead, Landauer sees revolution as an endless process or “tradition”: there is “only one revolution,” advancing quickly at certain times, slowing or receding at others.

In the course of this discussion, he redefines “utopia” by contrast with “topia.” Rather than regarding utopias as mere daydreams, he suggests that while they indeed begin in individual imaginings, they also present an emergent “form of life” appearing during periods of crisis when the “topia” – i.e., “social life in a state of relative stability” – becomes intolerable and unstable. Contrary to a Marxist interpretation of history for which revolutions are the predetermined outcome of economic development (making the “utopian socialism” of individual reformers irrelevant), Landauer’s interpretation gives new validity to utopian desires as a force for change. “Socialism,” he insisted, “is possible at all times, if enough people want it.”

Legacy

While linked to avant-garde intellectual currents such as expressionist theater and language philosophy, as a champion of “tradition” Gustav Landauer was not always in tune with his times. He broke with Erich Mühsam and Margarethe Faas-Hardegger, fellow organizers of the Sozialistischer Bund, over their endorsement of psychoanalysis and their critique of marriage as a patriarchal institution. By the same token, his redemption of tradition and ethnicity as sources of solidarity and his utopian vision of self-reliant communities had considerable influence on the early kibbutz settlements in Palestine. His ethics of non-violent change forms part of the heritage of modern pacifism.

Lanka Sama Samaja Party (LSSP) and Sri Lankan radicalism

Charles Wesley Ervin

The Lanka Sama Samaja Party (LSSP), formed in 1935, was the first broad-based anti-imperialist and socialist political party in Ceylon, officially renamed Sri Lanka in 1972. During the colonial era, the LSSP was at the vanguard in the fight for independence from Britain. Starting in 1940, the LSSP was affiliated to the Fourth International, launched by Leon Trotsky as an alternative to the Soviet Third International (Comintern). At its pinnacle, in the late 1940s and 1950s, the LSSP had a mass following, a large trade union base, and led the opposition in parliament. For nearly a quarter-century the LSSP was arguably the largest and most successful section of the Fourth International.

The LSSP was founded, shaped, and directed by Philip Gunawardena (1901–72), a dynamic and charismatic Trotskyist, who turned toward socialism as a student in the US from 1922 to 1928. After moving to London, he joined the Communist Party of Great Britain. In 1930 he came into contact with Trotskyists in London and became a supporter of the persecuted Left Opposition in the USSR.

Given the Stalinist armed campaign against Trotskyism, Gunawardena functioned as a secret Trotskyist within the British Communist Party. Assigned to work with students from various British colonies, he secretly recruited a circle of talented young Marxists, including Colvin de Silva (1907–89), Leslie Goonewardene (1909–83), and N. M. Perera (1905–79), future LSSP leaders. In 1932 the British Communist Party, suspicious of Gunawardena's criticisms of the Comintern party line, summarily expelled him for Trotskyist sympathies.

Returning to Ceylon in October 1932, Gunawardena recruited his younger brother, Robert (1904–71), to Marxism, and they joined the South Colombo Youth League, a nascent offshoot of the All-Ceylon Youth Congress, inspired by the nationalist movement in India. As other nationalists returned from London, many joined the Youth League. Philip Gunawardena was thus building and training the nucleus of a future Trotskyist party in Ceylon, becoming known as "the father of Ceylon Marxism."

In 1933 the Youth League participated in a new protest movement, called the Suriya Mal campaign, in which patriotic Sinhalese sold Suriya (a local sunflower), rather than the official poppy, on Armistice Day (November 11) and used the proceeds to benefit Ceylonese veterans. Philip Gunawardena and his group, which now included a Youth League recruit, Vernon Gunasekera (1908–96), injected overt anti-imperialist slogans into the campaign and recruited more young nationalists to their Marxist caucus.

In December 1935 this group held a conference in Colombo that launched the LSSP. The party called for immediate independence and an egalitarian socialist society. The small Trotskyist inner circle (hence known as the "T Group") did not publicly articulate the Trotskyist opposition to Stalinism, simply because the debate was totally alien in Ceylon. However, on many key issues of the day, such as the demand for the unconditional independence of all colonies and opposition to militarism and war, the LSSP echoed the line of the International Left Opposition. The founding conference issued a manifesto, which avoided specifically Trotskyist terms, but proclaimed that the party was committed to achieving complete national independence, nationalization of the means of production, distribution, and exchange, and abolition of inequalities arising from differences of race, caste, creed, or sex.

Shortly after the party's formation, LSSP fielded candidates for the elections to the second State Council, established in 1931 on the basis of the Donoughmore Constitution, which granted a certain measure of internal autonomy. The two popular LSSP leaders, Philip Gunawardena and N. M. Perera, were elected, and for the next four years used the council as a platform to denounce injustice, propose reforms to benefit working people, and explain the ideas of the party to the broad public. Gunawardena and Perera were consistent opponents of communalism (in the Lankan context, the conflict between the Sinhala majority and the Tamil minority), denouncing the militant Sinhala Maha Sabha movement, led by S. W. R. D. Bandaranaike, demanding a privileged position for the Sinhalese. They were the first Marxist campaigners to oppose division of the working people of the island on communal grounds. In particular they opposed any discrimination toward the Tamil plantation workers, resisting the call for disenfranchising the so-called "Indian Tamils," who arrived in Ceylon in the twentieth century.

Outside the genteel chambers of the council, the LSSP members organized a working-class base in Colombo. This brought the Marxists into direct conflict with entrenched labor leader Alexander E. Goonesinha (1891–1967), who had been organizing workers for more than ten years with notable success. He led workers of the Wellawatte Spinning and Weaving Mills, one of the big factories in the island, but was not actively pursuing worker democracy in the union. It took the LSSP several years and a number of bruising and bloody clashes to form strike committees to discredit and ultimately dislodge Goonesinha. The LSSP also had an uphill fight to gain a base among Tamil plantation workers in the upcountry estates, which were dispersed, difficult to organize, and firmly in the grip of their own community-based trade unions.

The Trotskyist LSSP sought to establish contact with like-minded leaders abroad and especially with Trotsky himself, who was then in exile in Mexico City. In 1939 the party sent Selina Perera (1909–86), a prominent member of the LSSP and wife of N. M. Perera, to work with Trotskyists in London and New York. However, after leaving New York, she was stopped at the Mexican border. The authorities thus prevented Trotsky from having a direct influence on the development of what would become his largest contingent of followers after his assassination in 1940.

In 1939 and 1940 the LSSP led a wave of strikes among workers of tea and rubber plantations, which swept from one estate to the next, culminating in the famous Mooloya strike of 1940. This strike in the upcountry Mooloya Estate at Hewahetta was the focal point of unionized and militant labor activism in colonial Ceylon. The police shot a Tamil laborer, Govindan, whom the LSSP turned into a martyr, leading to direct conflict with plantation owners.

After the Stalin–Hitler Pact, the LSSP majority passed a resolution of no confidence in the Comintern, expelling the pro-Stalinist minority in the party shortly thereafter, and in early 1940 openly proclaimed solidarity with the Trotskyist Fourth International. They were the militant leaders enjoying the confidence and support of the party, due to their participation in mass struggles and in parliament, forming the United Socialist Party in November 1940, subsequently renamed the Communist Party. The British government decided that the time had come to take pre-emptive action against the LSSP. In June 1940 four senior LSSP leaders, including Philip Gunawardena, were arrested and imprisoned. However, the party, knowing that such repression was inevitable, had already planned activation of an underground apparatus, directed by Leslie Goonewardene, a confidante of Philip Gunawardena since the London days, and Doric de Souza (1914–87), an English professor who was a leading ideologue and organizer in the party.

The government cracked down on the remnants of the LSSP, confiscating the party press and arresting party cadres. Nevertheless, the underground organization mounted strikes and held a secret party conference in April 1941, where delegates adopted a new party program based on the “Transitional Program” of the Fourth International, the canon of international Trotskyism. During the period 1939–41 the transformation of the LSSP into a specifically Trotskyist party was completed.

From the start the Trotskyist leaders of the LSSP developed links with the Congress Socialist Party and other left-wing parties in India. Unlike the Stalinist communists, the Trotskyists rejected the thesis that true socialism could be built within the confines of a single country, and certainly not in a little island that had just one large factory (the Wellawatte Spinning and Weaving Mills). The Trotskyists, applying the thesis of permanent revolution, concluded that the decisive blows against the Raj (rule) would have to be delivered in India. Therefore, starting in 1940, the LSSP dispatched organizers to Calcutta, Bombay, and Madurai to help the scattered Trotskyist groups in India unify into an all-India party.

In April 1942 the LSSP underground party freed the imprisoned Trotskyist leaders from jail. Given the repression in Ceylon, the LSSP leaders decided that the majority of the cadres should get up to India posthaste and work with the Bolshevik Leninist Party of India (BLPI), the Indian section of the Fourth International just launched in May 1942. In July 1942 the clandestine exodus began, with one contingent going to Bombay, the other to Madurai in South India. The Trotskyists arrived at a historic moment. In August M. K. Gandhi delivered his boldest ultimatum to the viceroy: quit India or face mass civil disobedience.

The government arrested Gandhi and most of the top echelon Congress leaders, triggering the historic Quit India revolt. While the Communist Party of India (CPI) actively opposed the struggle, the BLPI participated, and many were arrested during 1942–3, including several top leaders deported to Ceylon and imprisoned through the end of World War II.

With the end of the war in 1945, the government released political prisoners in Ceylon and India. Huge crowds gathered in Colombo to welcome the Trotskyists. As strikes erupted during 1945–6, the LSSP leaders reemerged in the leadership. The Trotskyists captured the Ceylon Federation of Labor and the Government Workers' Trade Union Federation and formed new unions, notably the All-Ceylon United Motor Workers' Union and All-Ceylon Harbor and Dock Workers' Union. During the decade after World War II the ranks of Ceylonese organized labor swelled to an estimated 300,000 members and engaged in economic strikes and negotiations and two broader general strikes in 1946 and 1947.

However, the Trotskyists were unable to fully take advantage of these opportunities due to a crippling split culminating in 1945, forming the LSSP and the Bolshevik Samasamajist Party. The split resulted from accumulated personal animosities, misunderstandings, clashing ambitions, and personal factors exacerbated by the abnormal conditions of underground struggle during the war. While the two parties were virtually carbon copies of one another, their political positions differed. Colvin de Silva advocated forming a party across South Asia (the Bolshevik Leninist Party of India, Ceylon and Burma), with the LSSP as the Ceylonese branch, a position opposed by Philip Gunawardena and N. M. Perera. A generational conflict between Gunawardena and younger leaders such as Doric de Souza also emerged. Both parties fielded candidates in the elections to the first parliament in 1947, when transfer of power was imminent. To their chagrin, the conservative United National Party (UNP), which remained aloof from the freedom fight, won a solid majority. N. M. Perera of the LSSP was elected leader of the opposition in parliament.

In 1948 the British announced the transfer of power in Ceylon. While the Communist Party hailed the victory, both Trotskyist parties saw independence as a transfer from "direct rule" to "indirect rule." One of the first acts of the UNP government was disenfranchising Tamil plantation workers, robbing the Trotskyists of a critical electoral base. The Trotskyists in particular fought the disenfranchisement, demanding full citizenship rights for all and parity of the Sinhala and Tamil languages.

In 1950 the two Trotskyist parties finally reunified, keeping the name LSSP. However, Gunawardena left with his followers to form the Viplavakari (Revolutionary) LSSP (VLSSP), leaving Colvin de Silva and Leslie Goonewardene as the principal political leaders of the LSSP and N. M. Perera as popular mass leader. The LSSP contested the second general elections in 1952 with great hopes. However, the UNP again humiliated the left, which won only nine constituencies, fewer than the 15 seats it had won in 1947. The setback caused a backlash in the LSSP, with one-third of the party splitting off to join Gunawardena's VLSSP.

In 1953 the UNP government reduced the rice subsidy, provoking criticism and popular opposition. The LSSP called for a one-day hartal (general shutdown, involving not only a strike but closure of schools and colleges), for August 12, 1953, which gained widespread popular support and participation. The hartal prevented the government from ending the rice ration and projected the revolutionary credentials of the LSSP. The LSSP hoped to reap the reward through a new wave of recruitment and more votes at the polls in 1956.

However, Philip Gunawardena outflanked the LSSP, forming an electoral front with the nationalist-socialist Sri Lanka Freedom Party (SLFP), formed by S. W. R. D. Bandaranaike in 1951, called the Mahajana Eksath Peramuna (People's United Front, MEP). The MEP won in a landslide that has since become known as "the revolution of 1956." Under the influence of Gunawardena, the MEP government carried out numerous popular reforms, such as a sweeping land redistribution, nationalization of certain industries, and the takeover of remaining British military installations. Concomitantly, pandering to the Buddhist establishment and rural Sinhalese, the MEP government proposed to make Sinhala the official state language. The LSSP fought to keep parity for both Sinhala and Tamil. LSSP parliamentary leader Colvin de Silva gave an impassioned but unsuccessful speech in defense of minority rights, sounding a prescient warning of the pending disaster if Tamil were relegated to second-class status: "Two languages, one nation; one language, two nations."

By 1960 some top LSSP leaders, most notably Dr. N. M. Perera, reached the conclusion that the only path to socialism was through the ballot box, and the LSSP could gain a majority only through the coalition politics that Philip Gunawardena pioneered five years earlier. In 1960 coalition with the nationalist SLFP was rejected by a narrow party majority, but the LSSP softened its policy of opposition to the government considerably.

At a historic party convention in June 1964, a majority of the LSSP endorsed Perera's proposal for coalition with the SLFP, led by Sirimavo Bandaranaike. The LSSP's left wing, led by Edmund Samarakkody (1912–92), Bala Tampoe (b. 1922), and V. Karalasingham (1921–83) opposed the coalition and formed the LSSP (Revolutionary). When the LSSP entered coalition government, the Fourth International expelled the LSSP for “class collaborationism,” recognizing LSSP(R) as the official Ceylon section. The LSSP(R) subsequently splintered further following splits in international Trotskyism, and the organizations soon became marginal parties.

The coalition government lasted only a few months. A section of the SLFP, uncomfortable with the LSSP alliance, crossed over to the opposition and brought down the government in December 1964. The experiment in popular front politics (alliance with bourgeois parties) cost the LSSP, which lost not only the left (and Trotskyist “conscience”) but also control over the Lanka Estate Workers' Union, which represented the party's hard-won base in the plantations. Nevertheless, the LSSP leaders persisted in their quest for a broader electoral coalition.

In May 1970 the LSSP–SLFP–CP United Front reversed its fortunes at the polls. Winning the largest number of votes in its history (433,244), the LSSP had 19 members in parliament, constituting the second largest party, after the SLFP, in the United Front government, and three party leaders accepted important portfolios in finance, plantations and constitutional affairs, and transport.

In April 1971 the United Front government was faced with a youth insurrection organized by the Janatha Vimukthi Peramuna (People's Liberation Front, JVP). The LSSP and its coalition partners, including the Communist Party, supported the brutal police and military suppression of the revolt. The LSSP organized trade unionists to assist in fighting the rebels.

Within the United Front government the LSSP pursued constitutional reforms, including the establishment of a unicameral legislature, and nationalizing plantations. The new constitution, largely the brainchild of Colvin de Silva, enshrined the preferential position of Buddhism and Sinhalese as the official language – which the LSSP had opposed for three decades. By 1974 the LSSP and SLFP were at odds over a number of issues, and the following year the SLFP pushed the LSSP out of the United Front government.

In the 1977 election the LSSP formed a United Left Front coalition with the pro-Moscow CP and the People's Democratic Party, a breakaway from the SLFP, but both the LSSP and CP failed to elect even a single candidate to parliament. The debacle extended into the labor movement. The ruling UNP, adopting “democratic socialist” rhetoric, and the SLFP started to erode the LSSP's base, particularly in government sector unions. In 1980 the UNP provoked a general strike and crushed LSSP's labor strongholds. After the election defeat radicals in the LSSP split to form a rival party, known as the Nava (New) SSP.

In 1982 proposals to seek another coalition caused yet another split in the party. Colvin de Silva, the LSSP candidate for president, received less than 1 percent of the vote and in the 1983 parliamentary by-elections the LSSP lost all its seats in parliament. Due to this string of defeats, while continuing to remain active, the LSSP became a faint shadow of its past.

Laos, protest and revolution, 19th and 20th centuries

Justin Corfield

Traditionally, Laos had been dominated by neighboring Siam (modern-day Thailand). From the late eighteenth century the Siamese conquered large parts of the kingdom of Wieng Chan (Laos), installing Chao Anou, a Lao prince who had been educated in Bangkok, as the “King of Wieng Chan,” and a vassal of the king of Siam. However the Vietnamese were also emerging as a powerful military state, and Emperor Gia Long managed to get Chao Anou to pay him tribute as well. In the 1820s Chao Anou led a revolt against the Siamese, expecting Vietnamese support. However, this did not materialize and the Siamese armies invaded, sacking Wieng Chan, and also the nearby kingdoms of Luang Prabang and Champasak (Champassac), which had maintained a degree of independence. The prisoners taken by the Siamese were sold off as slaves, and it became clear to most Laotians that domination by the Siamese was inevitable.

For that reason, with the emergence of France as a major power in the region in the late nineteenth century, the Laotians decided that it would be better to invite a European power and save the country. A similar situation had occurred in Cambodia in 1863, and King Oun Kham started negotiating with the French. In a series of treaties between the French and the Siamese, gradually the Siamese had to cede all their territory on the east bank of the Mekong River. The Laotian kingdoms were then merged and became the French Protectorate of Laos. It was an important buffer state to protect French Tonkin and Annam from the British-dominated Siam. It had also been hoped that the Mekong would provide river access to Chinese markets, but this had already been proven not to exist. Laos was certainly too hilly to provide land for plantation agriculture. It maintained an opium industry, with small amounts of tin, coffee, and rubber. By 1940 there were only 600 French citizens in the entire country.

With the Japanese deploying soldiers in French Indochina from 1940, Laos gained a small degree of autonomy. The small Laotian elite, mainly members of the royal family and courtiers, remained largely Francophone, although there was the emergence of a small pro-communist group under Prince Souphanouvong.

In March 1945 the Japanese forced the Laotians to declare independence, and the viceroy, Prince Phetsarath, formed the Lao Issara (Free Lao) movement to urge for full independence. He managed to take power, and when a new constitution was drawn up the king refused to accept it and was deposed. Late in 1945, the French returned to Laos and deposed Prince Phetsarath, declaring Laos to still be a French Protectorate. In April 1946 King Sisavang Vong was reinstated as king, and in fact became “King of Laos.” However two days after his coronation, the French and their supporters took back control of Vientiane, and many members of Lao Issara fled to Thailand or to Vietnam where they came to support the communists, leading to the formation of the Pathet Lao in 1950. By that time there was fighting in rural Laos with Lao nationalists trying to wrest power from the French.

The right wing in Laos rallied around Prince Boun Oum of the royal house of Champasak, in the south of the country. He was closely linked with the anti-communist forces in South Vietnam and was eager for an alliance with the United States. By contrast, Prince Souphanouvong led the communist-dominated Pathet Lao, and Prince Souvanna Phouma tried to steer a neutral course. Souvanna Phouma was prime minister from November 1951 until November 1954. During that time the Pathet Lao managed to take over two provinces of the country and establish a de facto government there with the support of the Viet Minh. The French built a huge defensive structure at Dien Bien Phu to prevent more Viet Minh going to Laos, but in March 1954 were attacked, suffering a dramatic defeat on May 7. Trying to achieve some form of power sharing, Souvanna Phouma stood down and in August 1956 returned to power heading a coalition government which included the Pathet Lao. This continued until 1958 when Phoui Sananikone came to power.

On August 9, 1960, General Kong Le staged a neutralist coup d'état. He ousted Prince Somsanith, the right-wing prime minister, but on August 15, a conservative counterattack led to fighting commencing again. The foreign minister Quinim Pholsena was briefly head of government to try to broker a compromise, but he was forced to hand over power to Prince Boun Oum. Quinim Pholsena was assassinated on April 1, 1963. By that time, fighting had started again. Massive US bombing, to halt the advances of the Pathet Lao, had devastated the countryside and wrecked the economy of the country. Much of the fierce fighting took place around the plain of Jars in central Laos. The fighting continued until 1974, with the United States backing the royal Lao army and the Hmong tribesmen against the communists. By that time the Hmong tribes were decimated by the war, and the Chinese had sent in about 6,000 soldiers to join the conflict.

Finally a peace agreement was brokered in 1974 and Prince Souphanouvong returned to Vientiane to help in the formation of the National Political Council, which held power until December 2, 1975. On that date the monarchy was abolished and Prince Souphanouvong became the president of the Lao People's Democratic Republic.

There was some fighting after that date but most of the right wing had already left the country. Boum Om, the younger brother of Boun Oum, and the most powerful figure on the conservative side of politics, had been assassinated on May 6, 1975, by a bomb explosion. Boun Oum himself went into exile in Paris where he died five years later. Laotian exiles tried to organize resistance to the communist government but were unable to get much support from other countries and had real problems getting access to the land-locked country.

After the overthrow of the monarchy in 1975, Laos became isolated from the international world. The Vietnamese used southern Laos for some of their forces in the invasion of Democratic Kampuchea (Cambodia) in December 1978. By that time many Laotians had fled as refugees to Thailand, and large numbers were resettled in the United States and other countries. In the early 1990s, the Laotian government started to soften its stance towards the rest of the world, and gradually started allowing tourists to visit the main cities, and then soon travel at will in the countryside. By the 2000s, it had become a popular destination for many western tourists, and the communist government had implemented large-scale economic reforms and introduced the free market system along the same lines as Vietnam.

Latin America, Catholic Church and liberation, 16th century to present

Edward T. Brett

The modern-day progressive Catholic Church in Latin America came into full life in the 1960s, but to fully understand its nature and development one must briefly review the history of Catholicism in the southern region of the western hemisphere.

The Colonial Period

When the Spanish monarchs Ferdinand and Isabella realized that in October 1492 Christopher Columbus had encountered a world previously unknown to Europeans and populated by countless inhabitants who were ignorant of Christianity, they thought they were the recipients of an urgent mandate from God. Granada had fallen just months earlier in January, thus completing a 500-year Reconquista, a crusade to drive the Muslim “infidel” from the Iberian Peninsula. Two months later, on March 30, the two monarchs had put the finishing touch on the Catholic “purification” of Spain by issuing a decree ordering all Jews to be baptized or face expulsion. Thus, it seemed to Catholic Spain that all the signs were there. Spaniards had just completed one historical epic with the conquest and Christianizing of the Iberian Peninsula, and they were now convinced that it was part of God’s divine will that their nation embark upon a similar mission in America.

Ferdinand and Isabella based their plan for the New World on the traditional medieval model. The warrior class would conquer and subjugate the indigenous population, while the regular clergy (religious orders) would convert and “civilize” the natives. Thus, from the beginning the Spanish used military power to evangelize America. Soon, however, a substantial number of clergy, led by members of the Dominican Order, most notably Bartolomé de Las Casas, protested the brutal treatment of the Indians at the hands of their fellow Iberians. Franciscans and later Jesuits also played a prominent role in defending the native population. As a result, the Spanish upper class became embroiled in a debate over the morality of its treatment of native peoples and the crown promulgated some reforms. Unfortunately, however, colonial leaders refused to enforce most of them.

Although many first-generation missionaries fought to curtail European mistreatment of the indigenous masses, they were less successful in their attempts to directly evangelize them. This is because they did not realize the importance of understanding Indian culture and mastering Indian languages. Only with the second generation of missionaries did some come to recognize the limitations of a Eurocentric mission methodology. But it was too little too late. The vast majority of Indians had little comprehension of Christianity. They converted because it was imposed on them, but in reality Christianity remained in large part a foreign entity separate from their culture.

The primary reason a substantial number of Spanish priests came to champion Indian rights was that the monarchy had chosen to use regular clergy to proselytize the indigenous population. They were better educated, more zealous, and more reformed than their diocesan counterparts (secular clergy under the direct authority of the local bishop), and thus more inclined to conclude that mistreatment of the Indians was contrary to true Christian morality. When secular priests were sent to America, or when colonists entered the diocesan clergy, they were nearly always assigned to work with Spanish parishioners, not Indians. This policy changed, however, during the reign of King Philip II (1556–98). Although originally sympathetic to Las Casas-like reformers, when financial pressures increased due to his costly European wars, Philip’s concern for Indian welfare diminished. He came to favor a policy that condoned and even encouraged oppressive conduct toward native peoples, because it produced more gold for the royal treasury.

To reduce the power and influence of the regular clergy, Philip issued a decree in 1574 which gave colonial bishops more control over the number of friars in their dioceses and also over where they would be assigned. In 1583, he issued a second decree stipulating that secular clergy were to receive preference over religious order priests in all parish assignments. With their power curtailed, the regular clergy became less able and to some degree less willing to defend the Indians. Although the church still maintained the loyalty of the poor through the selfless service of many priests, by the mid-seventeenth century, most clergy came to prefer “a life of ease and profit to one of austerity and service” (Keen 1992). Only the Jesuits as a whole remained zealous in their commitment to Indian rights. In 1759, however, they were expelled from Portuguese Brazil and in 1767 from the Spanish colonies.

After Independence

To make matters even worse, following independence in the early years of the nineteenth century, the Latin American church became isolated from its counterpart in Europe. Almost all of its bishops and foreign priests returned to Spain, causing a severe shortage of clergy that would henceforth hinder its effectiveness. With the rise to power of the anti-clerical liberals in the latter decades of the nineteenth century, the institutional church was further weakened. In many countries, religious orders and congregations were suppressed and some bishops and clergy were expelled. As a result, only about a third of the people were able to participate on a regular basis in the sacramental life of the church. Rural areas were especially affected.

Without priests, the Indians developed a type of folk Catholicism that blended the cult of the saints with elements from their pre-Christian past. The indigenous and mestizo masses had virtually no understanding of Catholic doctrine and liturgical rites. Realizing that Latin America was in large part Catholic in name only, the Vatican attempted to address the problem. Substantial numbers of missionary priests and sisters were sent in the last half of the nineteenth century from the various countries of Catholic Europe. As a consequence, improvements were made, but the situation still remained dire.

The Twentieth Century, Before the Second Vatican Council

Change, albeit on a small scale, began in the 1930s, when Acción Católica (Catholic Action), a movement that emphasized active participation of the laity in the religious life of the people, was imported from Europe. Prior to this time, Latin American laymen and women had been expected to be faithful but largely passive Catholics. Acción Católica members formed small groups which first studied and appraised the political, social, and economic realities of their countries in light of Catholic social justice principles first articulated by Pope Leo XIII in his encyclical Rerum novarum (1891). Members next applied what they learned in an attempt to ameliorate socio-economic conditions in their region. In many ways the methodology that Acción Católica employed, although rooted in medieval Thomism, was not unlike the methodology used by European communist cells. Proponents of liberation theology would later employ a similar methodology and be accused of Marxist tendencies by church and state opponents.

In 1953, Acción Católica leaders from 20 countries met in Chimote, Peru, where they concluded that the Latin American church was in need of massive revitalization. This meeting marks the beginning of a long and at first slow transformation of the Latin American Catholic Church, which would eventually culminate in the progressive era of the 1970s and 1980s. At any rate, Acción Católica soon produced a substantial number of lay leaders, some of whom eventually became influential intellectuals and political founders of the Christian Democratic Party in their countries.

Another important factor leading to the creation of a more progressive church was the development of national and transnational Latin American bishops' conferences. Prior to the 1950s, the institutional church of Latin America had been decentralized and extremely weak organizationally. Each bishop dealt directly with the Vatican. There was not only no structure in place for communication between the bishops of different nations, but also none for contact between prelates from the same country. This decentralization meant that national churches as well as local bishops lacked united strength when it came to dealing with the Vatican or the secular state. In 1955 this changed when the first Latin American Episcopal Conference (CELAM) convened in Rio de Janeiro to discuss mutual church problems. Only one thing of any consequence came from this gathering: the bishops did agree to hold ordinary meetings every year and extraordinary regional conferences every ten years. Although no one knew it in 1955, the second regional conference at Medellín, Colombia (1968) and the third at Puebla, Mexico (1979) would prove to be of unparalleled importance in the creation of a progressive Latin American Catholic Church.

Another development that helped to change the Latin American church was the influx of North American missionaries to the southern part of the western hemisphere in the 1940s and 1950s. Prior to World War II, nearly all US and Canadian Catholic missionaries were assigned to Asia. The war, however, made it too dangerous for Americans and Europeans to cross the oceans. Thus, no new European missionaries could come to Latin America, and this created a potentially even greater shortage of priests and nuns. But since American religious orders and congregations could no longer send their mission personnel to Asia, their leaders decided to redirect them southward, thereby making up for the loss of Europeans. This new policy worked well, and by 1950 most US and Canadian Catholic mission organizations had decided to designate Latin America as the primary focus for their overseas work.

But these newly arriving priests, nuns, and religious brothers, coming from countries that had long been prosperous, were unfamiliar with, and shocked by, the extreme poverty and misery they now encountered. Since they had the material means to do so, they began almost immediately to create countless developmental projects for the poor, only to find that government officials, rich landowners, or the military often impeded their success. Such reactionary conduct by the powerful caused most North American missionaries to eventually conclude that the vast majority of Latin Americans lived in poverty because of unjust socioeconomic and political structures that were intentionally kept in place by the elite class. Developmental projects alone could not change the miserable conditions of the poor masses; only a radical progressive makeover of Latin American society could bring about justice. Thus, North American Catholic missionaries were predisposed to enthusiastically champion the “preferential option for the poor” that would result from the decrees of the Second Vatican Council and the Medellín and Puebla Latin American Bishops’ Conferences.

Pope John XXIII, Vatican II, and Medellín

Several Latin American bishops prior to the mid-1960s developed reputations for their work on behalf of the poor and oppressed. Archbishop Victor Sanabria Martínez of San José, Costa Rica, for instance, joined forces in the early 1940s with progressive President Rafael Calderón Guardia, and at least indirectly with the Costa Rican Communist Party, to create a most impressive program of labor reform. Dom Hélder Câmara, bishop of Recife, Brazil, won fame and the wrath of the elite class for his championing of the poor in his diocese. Cardinal José María Caro of Santiago, Chile, implemented social programs for the poor, while Bishop Leonidas Proaño of Riobamba, Ecuador, fought for the rights of peasants. Aside from these and a few other exceptions, however, the Latin American bishops and the churches they presided over remained quite conservative and disconnected from the poor masses until the 1960s.

More than anyone else, Pope John XXIII, who was elected to the papal office in 1958, was responsible, albeit obliquely, for the progressive transformation of the Latin American church. The new pope set the stage for change when he issued two important encyclicals, Mater et Magistra (1961) and Pacem in Terris (1963), which discussed injustices caused by colonialism and neocolonialism, while also outlining the conditions needed for their eradication.

In August 1961, the pope sent Archbishop Agostino Casaroli to the University of Notre Dame to deliver a papal message to the 1,500 male and female religious superiors attending the second National Congress of Religious. The pope requested that the North American church send 10 percent of its religious personnel as missionaries to Latin America. Although the 10 percent goal was never reached, over the next three decades thousands of North Americans – priests, nuns, religious brothers, and lay people – answered the pope’s call. Most were sent to areas where the priest shortage was most acute. Some religious congregations, such as the Maryknoll Society, were actually placed in charge of whole departments in rural areas in countries like Bolivia, Peru, Honduras, and Guatemala.

The US church was also able to set up a language school in Cuernavaca, Mexico, and later others in Brazil and Peru, to train its recruits. It was the director of the Cuernavaca school, Father Ivan Illich, who in 1967 shook the Catholic mission enterprise to its very core and forced missionaries to reevaluate not just their methods, but their very reason for existence, when he argued in a magazine article that the American missionary movement was no more than a tool of US imperialism and therefore did more harm than good.

But Pope John’s greatest contribution to the transformation of the Latin American church was his summoning of the Second Vatican Council (1962–5) to modernize the global Catholic Church. At a time when poverty and oppression were escalating all through the developing world, bishops from rich and poor countries alike came together and produced a document on the Church in the Modern World (Gaudium et Spes). This document, perhaps the most significant issued by the Council, condemned the hoarding of wealth and power for the benefit of a small segment of society and warned that private property was not an unlimited right, but must be weighed against the rights of all people to the basic necessities of life. Gaudium et Spes also broke from a strict adherence to traditional theology by incorporating the social and behavioral sciences into a “see, judge, and act” theological methodology.

Almost 600 Latin American bishops attended the Second Vatican Council. Though few if any of them played a significant role in the production of Gaudium et Spes, the discussions and debates that took place opened their eyes and, consequently, they resolved to meet once they returned home to determine how they could best apply the lessons of Vatican II to the Latin American situation.

After two years of careful preparation, 130 prelates finally met at the Second Latin American Bishops' Conference at Medellín, Colombia. Using the methodology of Gaudium et Spes, they changed the direction of the Latin American church from one aligned at least indirectly with the power structure to one that sided with the poor and oppressed masses. The bishops were influenced by the new controversial theology of liberation, which originated with Gustavo Gutiérrez, and was elaborated on by Juan Luis Segundo, José Comblin, Leonardo Boff, Jon Sobrino, Enrique Dussel, and others. This theology attempted to interpret Christian faith from the perspective of the poor. Although heavily grounded in the biblical prophetic tradition, it sometimes resorted to Marxist analysis in posing questions. As a result, conservative churchmen including Pope John Paul II eventually became highly critical of it. The consciousness-raising techniques used by Brazilian educator Paulo Freire in teaching literacy to the poor, as articulated in his Pedagogy of the Oppressed, also influenced the bishops. In summary, the final documents of Medellín stated that the church itself had been sinful within a sinful society that was premised on unjust structural inequalities. Change was needed, and the church would henceforth dedicate itself to bringing about that change by siding with the poor.

To achieve its aims the church encouraged the creation of base ecclesial communities (comunidades de base, or CEBs), a pastoral technique emanating from the Brazilian church. Base communities comprised small groups of lay people who studied the Bible and applied what they learned to the problems existing in the society in which they lived. There were many different models for comunidades de base, ranging from the pietistic conservative type to a radical form oriented toward social justice. The latter, however, seemed to be more prevalent in the most conflictive Latin American nations. The more socially oriented CEBs tended to break down the fatalistic mindset of the poor and create grassroots leaders who played a significant role in the struggle for change. Some base community members, especially in Nicaragua, El Salvador, and Guatemala, eventually gravitated into guerilla organizations. However, they constituted only a small minority and their decision to resort to violence was never condoned by the church. It was far more common for CEB members to eventually become involved in labor or peasant organizations, where they fought for land and labor reform.

The Medellín documents called for greater lay participation in the liturgical life and social justice work of the church. Thus, many religious leaders created institutos para la capacitación (institutes for empowerment) to train lay "delegates of the word," who led church services in the absence of a priest and served as catechists in their barrios and villages. In some countries delegados would also run radio schools that the church set up to teach literacy, religious doctrine, and social justice to the poor. Courses on social awareness based on the documents of Vatican II and Medellín served as prime components in the pedagogy of the institutos.

Persecution of the Church

In some countries the Latin American church's "option for the poor" had little effect on the church hierarchy. In Argentina most bishops either supported the violent conduct of the military government or remained silent. For the most part, the Colombian bishops were also indifferent or hostile to the conclusions of Vatican II and Medellín. Indeed, as preparations were being made for the Medellín Conference, Camilo Torres, a Jesuit sociology professor at the Universidad Nacional in Bogotá, became frustrated with the hierarchy's apathy toward the poor. When Cardinal Luis Concha of Bogotá attempted to silence him, he decided to join the Marxist Army of National Liberation (Ejército de Liberación Nacional) in an attempt to incorporate his interpretation of Catholic social justice into the guerilla movement. Killed in his first battle in February 1966, he became a revolutionary icon over the next two decades for many frustrated leftist Catholics throughout Latin America. Catholic religious leaders in Venezuela and Uruguay were also mostly indifferent to the church's post-Medellín emphasis on social justice.

In the vast majority of Latin American countries, however, the church's radical "preferential option for the poor" soon led to clashes with elites and military governments that had come to power throughout the continent in the 1960s and 1970s. In Brazil, where most bishops had initially supported the military coup of 1964, the church became the government’s most vocal critic following the Medellín Conference. Particularly effective was Cardinal Paulo Evaristo Arns of São Paulo, who formed a Commission of Peace and Justice in 1972. With the help of Presbyterian pastor Jaime Wright, Arns was able to secretly copy police reports of government human rights abuses and publish them under the title Brasil: Nunca Mais. The book became a bestseller and did much to publicize internationally the violence perpetrated by the military government. Later, in the 1990s, the Human Rights Office of the Archdiocese of Guatemala, under the direction of Bishop Juan Gerardi Condera, published a similar report, Guatemala: Nunca Más. As a result of his efforts, military personnel beat the bishop to death immediately following a press conference in which he announced the release of the four-volume report.

In Chile, Cardinal Raúl Silva Henríquez of Santiago formed the influential Vicariate of Solidarity in 1976 to monitor abuses of the repressive Pinochet regime and provide legal services to its victims. The Vicariate served as a model for other national churches to emulate. Especially notable in this regard was Tutela Legal (Legal Defense), established by Archbishop Arturo Rivera Damas of El Salvador in 1983. Under the able leadership of María Julia Hernández, it investigated and documented arrests, murders, disappearances, and other forms of violence. It soon developed a global reputation for fairness and professionalism, and its files became a major resource for international human rights organizations such as Amnesty International and Americas Watch.

In Chile, Arns’s episcopal successor, Cardinal Juan Francisco Fresno Larraín, played a major role in organizing and uniting opposition to General Augusto Pinochet when the country faced an upcoming plebiscite on whether the general should be allowed to continue to rule. The bishops of Bolivia played a similar oppositional role, especially during the presidencies of Hugo Bánzer Suárez and Luis García Mesa, as did the church hierarchy in Paraguay in the latter years of the Stroessner dictatorship. The story was likewise the same in El Salvador, where Archbishop Rivera Damas, with the help of the Jesuits at the Central American University, was able to form an impressive grassroots movement that was successful in forcing the Farabundo Martí Liberación Nacional guerrilla front and the Salvadoran government to take peace talks seriously. Five of the Jesuits would later be murdered by the Salvadoran military, along with their housekeeper and her daughter.

Throughout the 1970s and 1980s, thousands of priests, religious sisters and brothers, lay catechists, and comunidades de base members were arrested, tortured, or murdered by the security forces of repressive governments.

The best known of these was Archbishop Óscar Romero y Galdámez of El Salvador. Faced with opposition from the Salvadoran oligarchy and military, as well as from all but one of his fellow Salvadoran bishops and the papal nuncio, Romero nevertheless became a most eloquent spokesperson for the poor and oppressed. So effective was he that the leaders of the security forces concluded that they had no choice but to take the unheard-of step of assassinating an archbishop. He was murdered while saying mass in March 1980; in death he became a symbol throughout the world of the post-Medellín church’s option for the poor.

The rape and killing, also in El Salvador, of four US missionary women – Sisters Maura Clarke, Ita Ford, and Dorothy Kazel, and lay missionary Jean Donovan – received wide international news coverage that resulted in a massive grassroots movement in the United States demanding that the US government terminate its support for a Salvadoran regime that had murdered tens of thousands of its people. Indeed, well over 30 priests and religious sisters and brothers were killed, along with hundreds of lay catechists, by repressive governmental forces in Central America alone in the 1970s and 1980s.

Backlash within the Church

Some clergy and laity responded to the church's "option for the poor" in ways that alarmed the vast majority of the Latin American hierarchy as well as Vatican officials. In the early 1970s in Chile, a Jesuit priest, Gonzolo Arroyo, founded Christians for Socialism, a group of as many as 100 priests who supported the Marxist government of Salvador Allende. Although at first tolerated by the hierarchy, the group was soon championing Fidel Castro's Cuba as a model for Latin America and becoming increasingly more virulent in its criticism of the traditional church. In 1973 the Chilean bishops finally condemned the group and forbade priests to be members.

But even more disturbing to the bishops were priests and lay Catholics who took up arms to bring about change. In 1967, on the eve of the Medellín Conference, a group of six US Maryknoll missionaries, led by Father Thomas Melville and Sister Marion Peter Bradford and inspired by the revolutionary priest Camilo Torres, formed a "Christian revolutionary movement" for the purpose of overthrowing the military government of Guatemala. After being discovered and exiled from Central America, Melville published an article in the National Catholic Reporter in which he contended that Christians were morally justified and even obligated to take up arms when repressive governments aborted peaceful attempts at social reforms. In Bolivia Néstor Paz, a young Catholic layman also inspired by Torres, penned an explanation similar to that of Melville for his decision to take up arms. After he died in battle, it was published under the title My Life for My Friends. In 1978 a Spanish Sacred Heart Father Gaspar García Laviana was likewise killed in combat while fighting with the Marxist Sandinista Revolutionary Front against the Somoza dictatorship. Later in the same year Father Ernesto Barrera died in a shootout with Salvadoran security forces while fighting for the Fuerzas Populares de Liberación (Popular Liberation Forces) in El Salvador. In 1983 a US Jesuit missionary, James "Guadalupe" Carney, disappeared in the jungles of Honduras after becoming a member of a revolutionary guerilla group. Prior to joining the rebels he wrote his autobiography in which he proclaimed himself a Christian Marxist. These were the most publicized "revolutionary priests." Many other clergymen of less notoriety also took up arms or joined revolutionary groups in non-combatant roles in the 1960s and thereafter.

What probably most alarmed traditionalist church officials in both Latin America and the Vatican, however, were events in Nicaragua. Like most of their fellow countrymen in the late 1970s, the Nicaraguan hierarchy, led by Archbishop (later Cardinal) Miguel Obando y Bravo, opposed the dictatorship of Anastasio Somoza Debayle. Indeed, in May 1979 the Nicaraguan bishops were the only bishops ever in history to issue a statement justifying a revolution, when they noted that the masses had the right to take up arms against a tyrant because all peaceful means had already been tried and had failed. Nevertheless, unlike the base communities and a substantial segment of the progressive clergy, the hierarchy did not favor a Sandinista government as an alternative to Somoza, due to the Sandinistas' Marxist leanings. When Ernesto Cardenal and a handful of other pro-Sandinista priests declared themselves "Christian Marxists" and claimed that there was no contradiction between Christianity and revolution, the Nicaraguan hierarchy began to fear that the FSLN (Sandinistas) intended to create a parallel revolutionary church. When large numbers of base community members took up arms, often at the instigation of their priests, and fought with the Sandinistas against Somoza, the hierarchy's suspicions intensified. Thus, when the FSLN came to power in July 1979, it was inevitable that the institutional church and the new regime would soon clash.

Following the installation of the revolutionary government, depictions of revolutionary "martyrs" and Jesus in guerilla fatigues appeared juxtaposed with more conventional saints on murals in churches headed by pro-FSLN priests. When a confidential Sandinista position paper containing suggestions on how to undermine organized religion was leaked to the press, the hierarchy had had enough and decided to go on the offensive: led by Obando, the bishops began to openly criticize the revolutionary government. They likewise took measures to "rein in" the so-called "popular church," that is, the church of most comunidades de base members.

Especially irksome to the Nicaraguan bishops was the appointment in 1979 and 1980 of four priests – Ernesto and Fernando Cardenal, Miguel D'Escoto, and Edgar Parrales, all of whom had been highly critical of the hierarchy – to important posts in the Sandinista government. After months of vituperative dialogue with the priests, Archbishop Obando finally issued an ultimatum: the four must relinquish their posts or face church sanctions. All refused and were eventually suspended from active priestly ministry.

Church–state problems in Nicaragua had previously been compounded by the election in October 1979 of Pope John Paul II. Having experienced firsthand the oppression of the Polish church by a communist government, the new pope was not inclined to tolerate a government with Marxist leanings. Thus, when the Nicaraguan hierarchy charged that priests influenced by liberation theology and backed by radical Christian base communities had created a schismatic church, the pope without hesitation publicly supported the bishops and demanded that the Nicaraguan clergy and faithful do likewise.

To make his demand more emphatic, he decided to visit Nicaragua in 1983. Upon his arrival at the Managua airport, he made the reason for his visit crystal clear when he wagged his finger in the face of Ernesto Cardenal, who had kneeled to kiss his ring, and demanded that the priest obey his bishop. Tensions mounted and shortly thereafter, while the pope officiated at an open-air mass, base community members and other Sandinistas harassed him, after he refused to condemn atrocities perpetrated by anti-Sandinista counterrevolutionaries and admonished the crowd to obey their bishops. This episode had a profound effect on Pope John Paul. Rather than view his Nicaraguan experience as something unique to that country, he seems to have equated it with liberation theology and the Latin American progressive church in general. Thus, he determined to “set things right” in Latin America by destroying the former and marginalizing the latter.

In 1984 the Vatican issued An Introduction on Certain Aspects of the Theology of Liberation, the so-called Ratzinger Report, which was extremely harsh in its appraisal. Although it was pressured to release a second, more nuanced and less abrasive report two years later, due to the outrage that the first report caused among both Latin American and US bishops, it was nevertheless apparent that liberation theology was anathema to Rome. This was made especially clear by the 1985 silencing of Leonardo Boff and the Vatican investigation of several other liberation theologians, including Gustavo Gutiérrez. Over the next two decades, liberationist-oriented bishops were either marginalized by Rome or, upon their retirement, replaced by more conservative prelates. The comunidades de base movement was likewise deemphasized.

Other factors, however, also contributed to the weakening of the progressive church and its “option for the poor.” The murder and expulsion of so many priests on a continent already suffering from a shortage of clergymen caused many bishops throughout Latin America to wonder how the church would be able to minister effectively to the needs of the faithful if it was forced to endure continued persecution from the power structure. These anxieties were intensified by the fact that, for the first time in history, large numbers of Latin Americans, especially from the poor classes, were turning toward evangelical Protestantism. Such concerns eventually forced even some progressive church leaders to take a more low-key approach to social justice. Moreover, this attitudinal change coincided with the demise of military dictatorships throughout Latin America and the movement toward democracy. Thus, in order to remain relevant, liberation theology was forced to undergo a metamorphosis that made it more compatible with the changes of the time. Although it is not as widespread and no longer as conspicuous as in the past, the progressive church with its theology of liberation still survives in Latin America, along with its more conservative counterpart.

Latin American punk rock and protest

Heather Squire

Far from being a monolithic experience, scene, or movement, Latin American punk rock refers to a broad range of musical, aesthetic, and historical currents that emerged from the Spanish- and Portuguese-speaking and indigenous communities of the Americas. The diversity of Latin American culture and history is reflected in the various forms of resistance that Latin American punks embraced, as well as the different conflicts that have inspired them: from struggles against dictatorships and involvement in guerilla movements, to class struggle, anarchism, Zapatismo, the anti-globalization movement, immigration policy, and the multiplicity of narratives to be found in Latin American diaspora communities across the United States. Further, whereas white punks in the United States were largely politicized through political bands in the punk scene, in Latin American communities the youth were already politicized by their everyday realities and became involved in the punk scene specifically because of its political nature.

Armed conflict, dictatorship, and resurgent democracy gave rise to the punk movement in South America. Prior to the return of democracy in countries such as Argentina, Brazil, Chile, and Peru, punk rock music and culture were very much underground, as leftist and generally subversive people and movements experienced repression in the form of exile, disappearance, and often murder. The opening of political space that resulted from dictatorships ending allowed punk to flourish and shout its critical politics more out in the open. For example, in Peru, the years from 1983 to 1985 are generally considered to be the nascent period for the punk movement, the most political coming after 1985. Influenced by radical leftist organizations such as the Sendero

Luminoso (Shining Path) and Movimiento Revolucionario Túpac Amaru (MRTA), as well as various anarchist groups, bands such as Narcosis, Ataque Frontal, Voz Propia, and Kaos came to the forefront.

In Chile, the punk movement got its start largely from returning exiles who brought punk music with them from other countries in the early 1980s. Early Chilean bands such as Caos and the Pinochet Boys were explicitly political, reacting to both the dictatorship and what they viewed as a status quo opposition that had developed. As in Argentina, Peru, and Colombia, punks in Chile were sent into exile and killed by death squads by the late 1980s.
