regime according to the Soviet example as well as efforts to reestablish the monarchy were undertaken to overthrow the new government. Several conflicts of ethnicity marred the fledgling state: this time the German national minorities in the newly founded Slavic states fought for autonomy or annexation of their territory to the Austrian state. In 1920, South Carinthia, part of the Austrian state, was occupied by Slavic forces. Only the protests of its German-speaking citizens and the ensuing international response saved Carinthia from being torn away from Austria.

Considerable stabilization of the Austrian republic was achieved in 1921, but this did not mean that social protest and politically motivated violence had ceased. The opposing parties in parliament, the Social Democrats and the ruling Conservative Christian Socialists, had formed paramilitary troops, the Schutzbund and the Heimwehr respectively. Street fights between these two groups were a common sight. In addition, the National Socialist Sturmabteilung (SA) took part in the violent conflicts, a clear sign that populism fought out on the streets rather than parliamentary government was to hold sway. The economic crisis triggered by the war increased in the early 1920s as hyperinflation eradicated savings and threw many Austrians into despair. The social tensions this caused led to a polarization of society, which found expression in ever more ferocious battles between the paramilitary forces of each political persuasion.

The mounting pressure reached a peak on July 15, 1927 in Vienna. Seven months before, an invalid and a child had been killed during an attack on a Schutzbund march. The accused attackers were tried and the decision expected for July 14. The working class took a particular interest in the outcome as it saw the attack as an affront against them. However, instead of a guilty sentence, all the defendants were pronounced innocent. The news spread amongst the workers and outrage over the verdict sparked mass protests on July 15. The demonstration against a perceived injustice turned violent when protesters stormed into the Viennese law court and set the building ablaze. The police reacted with force of arms and shot into the crowd. The day saw 89 dead and over 1,600 injured. Pursuant to these events, the Schutzbund, which was falsely seen as a protagonist by the state, and members of the working class in general were persecuted severely by the authorities.

Even the Catholic Church, traditionally the spiritual home of the Austrians, showed an inclination toward the right of the political spectrum, leading to a mass secession from the church.

A general anti-democratic turn can be observed in Austria in the years following 1927. The Heimwehr, having benefited from the Schutzbund's downfall, became a more autonomous force whose political aspirations turned fascist. Italy's fascist leader Benito Mussolini (1883–1945) supported the Heimwehr's actions with weapons and money. The SA acted more violently and openly against the government. The world economic crisis, which began with Black Friday in 1929, was another destructive factor in the breakdown of democracy, leading to even more social tensions. In the following years unemployment more than doubled, leaving a third of the population without income. Economic hardship in combination with political oppression of the working class and its representatives led to a further entrenchment of the social divide.

Fascism in Austria and the Anschluss

In 1932 Engelbert Dollfuß (1892–1934) became chancellor of Austria. When the Austrian parliament failed to close a sitting according to its regulations in March 1933, Dollfuß seized the opportunity to declare the parliament null and void and to take over rule in Austria. Utilizing the War Economy Enabling Act and countless emergency laws, he established a dictatorial, fascist system that was directed against the Social Democrats as well as the National Socialists. The latter, inspired by the Nazis' takeover in Germany, increased their terrorist acts to further their power in Austria. Dollfuß fended off these ambitions and subsequently banned the Austrian NSDAP and its sub-organizations in July 1933. They took refuge in Germany and were to return with a vengeance, as will be seen below.

The final elimination of the other political camp – the Social Democrats and their Schutzbund – was the result of events that are sometimes referred to in the literature as the “Austrian civil war.” The Schutzbund, which since 1927 had been operating clandestinely, was often “visited” by police forces searching for weapons, especially since Dollfuß's takeover. A weapons search of the Schutzbund's headquarters in Linz on February 12, 1934 was greeted with shooting and followed by fights. This revolt was also the starting signal for more protests by workers in other areas of Austria. However, within a few days the insurgencies were crushed due to the chaotic unpreparedness of the protesters and the brutal use of force by the police and the mobilized army. A ban of the Social Democratic Party followed.

Dollfuß's autocratic rule might have found favor with Mussolini, but Austria's northern neighbor, Nazi Germany, disapproved of the NSDAP ban and the country's refusal to yield to Germany. Economic sanctions were imposed by the Nazi regime to break the Austrian resistance but showed no noticeable effect. However, National Socialist terror acts increased immensely after the events of February 1934. It might have been the government's focus on the regime's enemies on the other side of the political spectrum that allowed the terror acts, mainly bombings, conducted by the SA and Schutzstaffeln (SS) to reach a level of hitherto unknown brutality. The climax of the mounting violence was the putsch of July 25, 1934. The attempt to take over governmental power failed: the putschists were quickly encircled and forced to yield to the police, but nevertheless Chancellor Dollfuß was murdered.

Internationally, the failure of the putsch and the pressure from Austria's fascist patron, Mussolini, forced the German leader Adolf Hitler (1889–1945) to distance himself from the events and lessen his ambitions for influence in Germany's south. It was not until February 1938 that Hitler could exercise enough pressure to achieve National Socialist involvement in the cabinet of Austria's chancellor, Kurt von Schuschnigg (1897–1977). That this was not the final stroke was shown a month later when Hitler and the Wehrmacht marched into Austria on March 12, 1938. With the Anschluss (alignment) and the law about “reunification” of the country with Germany, Austria ceased to exist as an independent state. Within the next year, Austria was politically, economically, culturally, and socially transformed into a part of National Socialist Germany. Even the country's name was banished from official use. Racially motivated laws came into being installing the same discriminatory conditions for Jews, Sinti and Roma, disabled people, and other “undesirables” that were in force in the north of the German Reich.

World War II and Aftermath

World War II began on September 1, 1939. It saw the Austrians fighting alongside Nazi Germany. Although Austria was declared to be “the first victim of National Socialism” at an Allied war conference in Moscow in 1943, and about 2,700 Austrians died as resistance fighters, one must not forget that Hitler was greeted jubilantly during the Anschluss in 1938 and many Austrians were active National Socialists in party, SS, and similar Nazi organizations.

However, unlike Germany, Austria managed to throw off National Socialism in the final days of the war. Karl Renner, who was already the leading figure in establishing the first Austrian republic, facilitated a new constitution of the Austrian government. On April 1, 1945 (over a month before the war ended in Europe with Germany’s complete capitulation), he was recognized by the Russian forces as the head of government and assigned the task of forming a cabinet. On April 27, 1945, this government proclaimed Austria’s independence and declared the Anschluss null and void.

In September 1945, the Renner government was finally recognized by the western Allies as well. Despite this, the division of Austria into four occupational zones (American, British, French, and Soviet Russian) continued until 1955 when the Staatsvertrag (state treaty) was signed and Austria once more became a fully independent state, the Second Republic, albeit under the condition of full neutrality. The situation only changed in the 1990s when Austria became a member of the European Union, thus relinquishing its position of complete neutrality for that of a member of a community of states with economic, political, and social ties.

Since the end of World War II it has become customary to view Austria as mainly a victim of National Socialism. Indeed, the new Second Republic used the phrase “first victim” to boost morale within Austria and gain respect on a foreign political scale. It is only in recent years that Austria is finally coming to terms with its past and facing all, especially the uncomfortable, facts of its history.

SEE ALSO: Austro-Marxism; Bauer, Otto (1881–1938); Ethnic and Nationalist Revolts in the Hapsburg Empire, 1500–1848; Fascism, Protest and Revolution; German Revolution, 1918–1923; Hitler, Adolf (1889–1945) and German Nazism; Hungary, Protests, 1815–

1920; Landau, Kurt (1903–1937); Mussolini, Benito (1883–1945); Russia, Revolution of October/ November 1917

References and Suggested Readings

- Barker, E. (1973) Austria, 1918–1972. London: Macmillan.
- Bérenger, J. (1997) A History of the Hapsburg Empire, 1700–1918. London: Longman.
- Botz, G. (1983) Gewalt in der Politik. Munich: Fink.
- Jelavich, B. (1987) Modern Austria: Empire and Republic, 1815–1986. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Martha, C. W. (1993) The Hidden Life of Tyrol. Prospect Heights: Waveland Press.
- Mazower, M. (1998) Dark Continent: Europe’s Twentieth Century. London: Penguin.
- Steininger, R., Bischof, G., & Gehler, M. (2002) Austria in the Twentieth Century. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction.
- Vocelka, K. (2005) Österreichische Geschichte. Munich: Beck.
- Williamson, S. R. (1991) Austria-Hungary and the Origins of the First World War. London: Macmillan.

Austro-Marxism

Robert Goodrich

Noted for its theoretical engagement with contemporary philosophical and social scientific thought and for its political activity up to 1934 in “Red Vienna,” Austro-Marxism developed after 1900 out of the Viennese socialist student movement. Its members included M. Adler, O. Bauer, R. Hilferding, G. Eckstein, K. Renner, and others. The movement coalesced in 1903 with the Fabian-style association Zukunft (Future) and the publication of Marx Studien (1904–34) and Der Kampf (The Struggle) (1907–34).

Largely a nationally specific reaction to the revisionist debate within the Second International, Austro-Marxism dealt less with political strategy than with the question of Marxist theory and methodology. Thus, while open to revision, it did not directly challenge the revolutionary platform of orthodox Marxism. Austro-Marxists instead expanded Marxism’s theoretical basis by avoiding monocausality and economic reductionism while engaging non-Marxist theory, especially Neo-Kantianism, the Austrian Marginalist School of economics, and positivist philosophy. Less a coherent system than a methodological pragmatism, Austro-Marxism favored a social scientific Marxism that was methodologically reflective, anti-dogmatic, and empirical. Essentially, Austro-Marxism prioritized a social scientific methodology within Marxism rather than a general Marxist social theory.

Initially, the Austro-Marxists played a significant role in international socialist discourse, especially in Germany. Adler not only provided the seminal explanation of Marxism as a social science, but also opened Marxism to the strong German tradition of Kantianism in philosophy in Causality and Teleology (1904). In economics, Hilferding engaged the neoclassical critique of the Marxist theory of value and presented the first systematic treatment of finance and non-finance capital in Finance Capital (1910), a work of great influence on Lenin and Bukharin. Bauer's analysis of the national question, The National Question and Social Democracy (1907), suited the context of Eastern Europe and influenced Lenin's theory of national self-determination and the platforms of several interwar parties such as the Bund, left-wing Zionists, and the Jewish Folkspartei. He also led the attempt to create a coherent left socialism that sought a "third way" between Bolshevism and social reformism after 1917 and found adherents among Independent Socialists. Renner worked as a legal and political theoretician and wrote The Institutions of Private Law and their Social Function (1904), a foundational text for the sociology of law as a discipline. The breadth of work influenced diverse schools from Western Marxism, with its representatives ranging from Lukács and the Frankfurt School in the 1920s to leading Bolsheviks.

Additionally, the Austro-Marxists were active as politicians. Bauer served as Austria's first foreign minister; Renner oversaw the experimental socialist governance of Vienna and later became the first president of the Second Republic (1945–50). And Hilferding was directly involved in ministerial responsibility in Germany.

However, growing polarization and an ascendant fascism meant that outside of Austria support declined for Austro-Marxism, while the destruction of the First Austrian Republic in 1933/34 destroyed its institutional basis. Nonetheless, Austro-Marxism's pragmatism inspired the international socialist movement in the 1970s and 1980s. Both Eurocommunism and the New Left looked to it as an alternative to Cold War polarization. Even after the collapse of communism in 1989, the Democratic Union of Hungarians in Romania (DAHR) regarded it as uniquely appropriate to its condition. A number of German, Austrian, and Slavic monographs began appearing in response by the 1970s, but little English scholarship exists.

SEE ALSO: Bauer, Otto (1881–1938); Frankfurt School (Jewish Emigrés); Germany, Socialism and Nationalism; International Socialism: Mass Politics; Internationals; Kautsky, Karl (1854–1938); Marxism; Socialism; West German "New Left"

References and Suggested Readings

- Böhm, H. (2000) Die Tragödie des Austromarxismus am Beispiel von Otto Bauer. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des Österreichischen Sozialismus. Frankfurt: Lang.
- Bottomore, T. & Goode, P. (Eds.) (1978) Austro-Marxism. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Leser, N. (1968) Zwischen Reformismus und Bolschewismus. Der AustroMarxismus als Theorie und Praxis. Vienna: Europa.
- Löw, R. (1986) Austromarxismus. Eine Autopsie. Frankfurt: ISP.
- Rabinbach, A. (1985) The Austrian Socialist Experiment: Social Democracy and AustroMarxism, 1918–1934. Boulder: Westview Press.

Autonomism

Christian Garland

The term "autonomism" or "autonomist" may broadly refer to a number of different theories and movements that, while in some ways disparate, can be said to share several underlying aims and principles. Autonomism assumes a perspective of critical and reflexive Marxism, emphasizing both its essentially negative and open-ended nature – as with any critical theory – and identifying its own theory and practice as anti-hierarchical, anti-capitalist, and anti-authoritarian. Similarly, while retaining the centrality of class struggle, autonomist currents maintain the need for revolt and self-emancipation by the exploited and oppressed themselves, as a self-valorizing agency, and not by a "vanguard party" or other self-declared liberator. The theory of autonomy can thus be defined as one of self-determination over the form and substance of life, both collectively and individually. Unlike orthodox Marxism, autonomous movements can also be defined as "anti-political" and indeed "anti-state," in that they reject the traditional means of political action and the traditional goal of assuming "political power" embodied in the state-form.

Autonomy, then, is not rigidly fixed in ideological terms, but rather can be defined as the power to freely determine the conditions of one's existence. Against hierarchical power, and its embodiment in the forces of market and state, autonomist practice stresses the possibility of alternative modes of being in the here and now, without losing sight of the need for this to become total, both in the sense of encompassing a majority of society and acting against the existing system in its entirety. However, in so far as we can speak of "autonomism" it should be stated that this very broad term is basically anti-systemic and non-ideological, and the various theories and movements associated with it deliberately resist any easy assimilation into a standard definition.

Autonomist theory has much in common with class struggle anarchism, and many autonomists and anarchists recognize the affinity. However, the Marxist character of autonomist theory makes for an important distinction with anarchism. Being a heterodox tradition, autonomism has more than one historical forerunner; as such, many within the broad movement identify a line of continuity with the critical and libertarian aspects of Marx's original theory, as much as the anti-Leninist Left Communist currents which followed in the early twentieth century.

The term "autonomism" has its origins in the Italian Autonomia and Operaismo movements of the late 1960s, which reached their high point in the Hot Autumn of unofficial strikes, sabotage, occupations, and street protests of 1969, before reemerging in the tumult of 1977. Italian autonomist Marxism found its best theoretical expression in the likes of Antonio Negri, Mario Tronti, and Sergio Bologna, but the movement, which their theories fed into, was not defined solely by such theories. In terms of late twentieth-century revolutionary ruptures, it can be argued that the two Italian movements of the late 1960s and late 1970s are second only to the French May Events of 1968 for significance and impact. In both cases, currents usually confined to the margins swept across the entirety of social relations in an advanced industrial society, to radically and permanently alter it.

The Italian movement of 1969 offers a number of notable examples of "autonomous practice," in which effective collective action undermined and subverted capitalist social relations. Besides mass squatting as a solution to housing need, equally wide-scale rent strikes offered a further refusal of the market imperative of having to pay for the privilege of a roof over one's head. This mass movement spread to include the infamous use of autoriduzione, or "self-reduction," in which thousands refused to pay full price, or indeed anything at all, for essential services such as electricity, gas, water, and transport. In the workplace, too, when not sabotaging production, workers engaged in an endless wave of unofficial strikes and stoppages outside of the control of trade unions and political parties.

In the converging struggles of the first movement of 1968–9 there can be discerned something of the more fluid and dynamic definition of "the proletariat" that autonomists continue to theorize, encompassing a non-unionized white collar sector and also recognizing the unpaid domestic labor performed by women. Instead of "the party," either Leninist or Social Democratic, pressing for official recognition from the powers that be through legal and electoral channels, autonomous movements can be seen to assume a dynamic, negative "anti-power" aimed at subverting and challenging hierarchical power in all its forms. Such examples of direct action taken by social subjects themselves remain anathema to the Leninist belief in the need for a single, disciplined party, which will lead and oversee social revolt. However, as John Holloway and other autonomist theorists have argued, such movements do not merely propose passive withdrawal, because they are opposed to engaging with the existing structures of political power. Instead, autonomist theory favors an anti-political practice: the material contestation of the totality of social relations.

Although "autonomism" – or at least the theoretical shorthand this term has come to assume – may have its origins in Italy, its heterogeneous and fluid dynamic means it cannot be temporally or spatially confined to a particular historical context. As the Italian movement of 1977 was consumed by an escalating cycle of armed provocation and repression, its force as a social movement acting in and against the existing society ebbed away until it evaporated altogether. The great strength of the movements of 1969 and 1977 was that they could not be isolated or contained and at their peak threatened to actually overwhelm the existing social order.

The other, later focus for "autonomism" found a somewhat different expression in the West German Federal Republic of the 1980s. Here, the autonomie movement consisting mostly of radicalized youth strove to develop distinctive alternative modes of being, which by their very nature were antagonistic to that of mainstream German society. Here, again, squatting offered an immediate answer to the problem of housing while challenging and undermining the market relations responsible for it. The usually communal nature of the squats of Hamburg and Berlin facilitated free experimentation with new egalitarian, non-hierarchical ways of living as distinct from the atomization experienced in advanced urban societies. Likewise, the networks of “social centers” and “info shops” offering non-commercial non-institutional space for meeting, socializing, and exchanging ideas, originating in northwest and central Europe, now exist in most parts of the world, albeit with varying degrees of success.

The German and central European movement has also been notable for its willingness to take offensive action against the forces of the state and in the destruction of symbolic targets of consumer capitalism: prestige cars, retail outlets, fast food chains – what Georgy Katsiaficas calls “civil luddism.” This willingness to engage in militant offensive action continues to be a source of heated debate among the varying tendencies in the broad autonomist tradition, but it is noticeably more one of tactics than of outright hostility to such strategies.

In the “anti-capitalist” or “alter-globalization” movement of the last decade we find similar issues at stake, with the appearance of “black blocs” of militant affinity groups openly advocating revolution and indeed prepared to take offensive action as well as create alternatives in the present. The anti-capitalist or alter-globalization movement has arguably been most visible in the mass mobilizations at the various global summits of the G8, WTO, IMF, and World Bank, where black blocs of militants have also been present. However, this is not to overemphasize the role such groups play, or to ignore the shortcomings of some of their actions, which on at least two occasions have resulted in protesters being wounded or shot dead by police. Despite its undoubted successes, the German autonomist movement of the Cold War Federal Republic, no less than in the reunified Germany of today, found itself comparatively isolated from the proletariat in a society where no rupture on the scale of those in Italy in 1969 or 1977 was experienced.

In analyzing the autonomous movement in Germany, and other countries, notably Switzerland, the Netherlands, and Scandinavia, and its relative isolation from the rest of the population, it is important not to attribute this to the absence of sufficient organization and failure to build the party. As Katsiaficas has argued, “The autonomen do not subscribe to the belief that there is one overriding truth or one true form of autonomy.” In this sense there is a clear distinction between autonomous anti-political action and indeed cultural subversion in everyday life, and the standard orthodox Marxist view of the necessity for following the usual political paths to arrive at the usual political end of governmental or state power. Autonomist practice does not ignore “politics” as such, but rather refuses to accept the terms this dictates, instead waging irregular battles on a terrain as far as possible of its own choosing. One such example in which the movement successfully spread its influence was at the height of the Cold War, when in Germany at least, autonomists fueled the fires of discontent with American nuclear bases being stationed in the country and helped catalyze a wider opposition that had noticeable political repercussions.

Autonomist currents as they exist today continue to draw inspiration from a wide range of theoretical influences and unsurprisingly diverge as much as they agree, one obvious example being the substantial differences between those for whom Antonio Negri’s recent work, especially with Michael Hardt, is a major inspiration, and those for whom this offers at best limited critical insights. Without attempting a division of the clearly very broad autonomist tradition into opposing camps, the differences between the poststructuralist and Deleuzian Negri, and those working more in the dialectical tradition of Hegelian Marxism and the Critical Theory of the Frankfurt School, should not be ignored. Another major criticism of the later Negri is what many have argued is his somewhat timid insistence on focusing rebellious energies on reform-based demands for a minimum or “social” income.

Autonomism has a number of important antecedents. In the Left Communist currents of the early twentieth century lie a number of notable precedents, specifically opposition to traditional “political action” using parliamentary and electoral strategies, and the need for anti-hierarchical or at least radically democratic and diffuse forms of organization. Rosa Luxemburg’s insistence on the creative spontaneity of class struggle is echoed in the autonomist belief that it is only from a radical collective subjectivity that real opposition stems. Similarly, other Left Communist principles such as the refusal to adopt the methods of party politics with an eye to state power can be observed in the autonomists’ belief that revolutionary means should prefigure revolutionary ends and strive to avoid replicating those of the existing system.

A later continuity in the lines of autonomist thought can be found in Cornelius Castoriadis and the “council-communist” influenced French Socialisme ou Barbarie (SoB) group of the 1960s, which had its British equivalent in Maurice Brinton’s Solidarity grouping. Castoriadis and SoB were especially notable for developing the theory of the USSR as being bureaucratic state capitalism, a result also of Lenin’s belief in the necessity for the party to create a bureaucratized, militarized state in which the Bolshevik concept of “democratic centralism” came into its own. Likewise, the Situationist International’s preference for cultural subversion and its critique of the totality of consumer society has had a noticeable influence on autonomist thought and practice, as has Gilles Dauve, perhaps better known by his pen name Jean Barrot, who has sought to develop a theory of communism antagonistic to ideological categories or containment.

Though autonomism is a broadly defined concept, the currents within it do indeed share several definite similarities in terms of theory and practice. We can recognize the primacy that “autonomy” is, if nothing else, the freedom to be, to live, which by its very definition is antagonistic to the dominant material forces shaping the world. It is this antagonism towards capitalism and the state and party politics, and the values and norms of existing society, which autonomist theories and movements share, the refusal of the existent, of “that which is” in Adorno’s phrase, posing again the question of alternatives, that remain merely “not yet.”

SEE ALSO: Anarchism; Global Justice Movement and Resistance; Marxism; Negri, Antonio (b. 1933); Socialisme ou Barbarie

References and Suggested Readings

- Bonefeld, W. (Ed.) (2004) Revolutionary Writing: Common Sense Essays in Post-Political Politics. New York: Autnomedia.
- De Angelis, M. (2007) The Beginning of History: Value Struggles and Global Capital. London: Pluto Press.
- Dyer-Witheford, N. (1999) Cyber-Marx: Cycles and Circuits of Struggle in High Technology Capitalism. Chicago: University of Illinois Press.
- Holloway, J. (2002) Change the World without Taking Power: The Meaning of Revolution Today. London: Pluto Press.
- Katsiaficas, G. (2006) The Subversion of Politics: European Autonomous Social Movements and the Decolonization of Everyday Life. Edinburgh: AK Press.
- Wright, S. (2002) Storming Heaven: Class Composition and Struggle in Italian Autonomist Marxism. London: Verso.

Ayim, May (1960–1996)

Joshua Kwesi Aikins

May Ayim was a Ghanaian German artist, academic, and activist; both her poetry and her scholarly writings have been crucial in the inception of the Afro-German movement, and continue to challenge and inspire scholars and activists in Germany and beyond. Her pioneering academic work on Afro-German history, innovative analysis in the field of critical whiteness studies in the German context, and her empowering poetry, continue to attract readers interested in the insights she gained from developing and deploying a conscious Afro-German woman’s perspective in her interaction with Germany and the global African diaspora.

Born to a Ghanaian father and a German mother, she grew up in a foster home and with foster parents (the Opitz family whose name May carried until 1992) – as an African student in Germany, her father had no right to take the child to Ghana, as he had wished. Her mother, apparently unable to cope, took the infant to a foster home, from where she was taken to a white foster family.

Her thesis, first rejected by her professor on the grounds that “there is no racism in Germany,” was the first thorough research on the presence of black people in Germany from the early middle ages to the present. It later formed the basis of Farbe Bekennen – Afrodeutsche Frauen auf den Spuren ihrer Geschichte (Showing Our Colors:

Afro-German Women Speak Out) (Oguntoye et al. 1991). Along with May Ayim's increasing popularity, which bought her speaking and performance engagements in the UK, the US, the Caribbean, and South Africa, this publication introduced the Afro-German experience to other African diasporas.

May became a founding member of the Initiative of Black People in Germany, the first organization of its kind, which provided a much needed forum for Afro-Germans to step out of isolation and take collective political actions. One of the key manifestations of protest from those years in the mid-1980s was the transformative intervention into German language, an area of activism where May played a key role. She was part of a group that developed and coined the term Afro-German, thereby replacing derogatory terms like Neger or Farbige (colored) that had been routinely used to refer to people of African descent. The demonstratively defiant act of usurping and redefining a language over whose "correct" use white Germans had assumed exclusive authority is felt in her poetry as well as in other topics she subjected to critical inquiry. While Farbe Bekennen had already shaken the German colonial amnesia by connecting Germany's imperial past with prevailing racist stereotypes and language, her later works drew other critical connections. The book Entfernte Verbindungen. Rassismus, Antisemitismus, Klassenunterdrückung (Distant Connections: Racism, Antisemitism, Class Oppression), published in 1993 and co-edited by May Ayim, looked at the interlocking of different systems of oppression and the possible ways for women's activism to counter and transgress such overlapping hierarchies of domination.

She caused controversy with her critical analysis of German Reunification, which she aptly referred to as "U-not-y," capturing the way in which a newly invigorated post-reunification nationalism translated into an upsurge in violent racist attacks on foreigners and Germans of color.

A high-profile appearance on German television in January 1996 left a wider audience impressed, but close friends concerned – under the surface of a sovereign interview and poetry performance they sensed May Ayim's mental troubles, which were to erupt into a psychosis that left friends with tough choices. Should they commit her to psychotherapy, of which she had said there was no place free of racism? She was brought to temporary in-patient care. After reporting earlier vision problems, she was moved to neurology and examined for multiple sclerosis. For unexplained reasons, the neuroleptic medication for her psychosis was abruptly ended. There was no psychological support when she was informed that she was suffering from incurable multiple sclerosis. After the diagnosis, the doctors knew of her psychological illness, yet simply discharged her from hospital. On August 9, 1996, May Ayim committed suicide.

Her achievements, life, and death were commemorated by dub poet Linton Kwesi Johnson, who wrote the song "Reggae fi May Ayim." At the African Women Living in Europe Conference, held in London in 1992, May Ayim gave a talk entitled "My Pen is My Sword: Racism and Resistance in Germany." Through her scholarly writing and her poetry, May Ayim's pen is felt to this day, providing empowerment and inspiration for resistance far beyond the borders of Germany.

SEE ALSO: Amo, Anton Wilhelm (1703–1759) and Afro-Germans

References and Suggested Readings

- Ayim, M. (1997) Grenzenlos und unverschämt. Berlin: Orlanda Frauenverlag.
- Ayim, M. (2005) Blues in schwarz weiss. Berlin: Orlanda Frauenverlag.
- Ayim, M. & Adams, A. V. (2003) Blues in Black and White: A Collection of Essays, Poetry and Conversations. Lawrenceville, NJ: Africa World Press.
- Binder, M. (1997) Hope In My Heart: The May Ayim Story. 29-min. documentary on May Ayim.
- Hügel, I., Lange, C., Ayim, M., Bubeck, I., Aktas, G., & Schultz, D. (1999) Entfernte Verbindungen. Rassismus, Antisemitismus, Klassenunterdrückung. Berlin: Orlanda Frauenverlag.
- Oguntoye, K., Opitz, M., & Schultz, D. (1991) Showing Our Colors: Afro-German Women Speak Out. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press.
- Oguntoye, K., Opitz, M., & Schultz, D. (1992). Farbe bekennen. Frankfurt: Fischer.

B

Babel, Isaac (1894–1941)

Amy Buzby

Isaac Emmanuelovich Babel was born in 1894 to a Jewish family in Odessa during a period of social upheaval, anti-Semitic persecution, and the flight of Jews from the Russian Empire. As a youth he survived the 1905 pogrom through the assistance of Christian neighbors, but his grandfather was among the victims. In 1915 he graduated from the Institute of Financial and Business Studies in Kiev and moved to Petrograd, despite residency laws that prohibited Jews from the Pale, to establish himself as a writer. Babel quickly earned the respect of Maxim Gorky, who published two of his stories in Letopis. During the Russian Civil War Babel enlisted in the Red Army and briefly saw action before contracting malaria and returning to Petrograd to work on Gorky's Novaya Zhizn.

In 1920 Babel was given the pseudonym Lyutov and sent to the front as a reporter to work with Budyonny's First Cavalry. He wrote virulent propaganda and pieces for The Red Cavalryman, the unit's newspaper. Babel channeled his military experiences into the Red Cavalry cycle of stories. Babel's innovative style enabled him to describe the violence and ambiguity of war on the front in stark, chilling, and devastating terms that stood out critically against the dull backdrop of socialist realism, as he insisted: "No iron spike can pierce a human heart as icily as a period in the right place." He portrayed both White and Red fighters as both morally and rationally bankrupt in their conduct, as he reflected: "Murderers, it's unbearable, baseness and crime . . . Carnage. The military commanders and I ride along the tracks begging the men not to butcher the prisoners." Babel also fearlessly employed the real names of powerful Soviet army officers and officials even as they, and the sociopolitical circumstances they engendered, were exposed and critiqued in his work.

In 1924 four of Babel's stories were published in Mayakovsky's LEF, which earned Babel national fame. Soviet critics praised Babel, but Budyonny vehemently condemned his work as libel and Babel was forced publicly to ameliorate some of his more daring portrayals of influential leaders. Babel's family emigrated to Paris in 1925, one year before the publication of the Red Cavalry cycle, but Babel remained in the Soviet Union despite his increasingly vulnerable position in Soviet society as a critic of Soviet policy. As Babel lamented to his friend Yuri Annenkov: "Revolution indeed! It's disappeared! The proletariat? It flew off, like an old buggy with a leaky roof, that's lost its wheels . . . now, dear brother, it's the Central Committees that are pushing forward – they'll be more effective. They don't need wheels – they have machine guns instead." Even so, Babel was driven artistically by the Russian environment and was determined to become a free man in the confines of the Soviet state.

In September 1928 an additional controversy erupted over an interview he gave to Alexander Dan. Dan attributed several anti-Soviet statements to Babel, which Babel denied ever making. Babel struggled until 1930 to clear his name with the Soviet authorities, but even so his inability to conform to Soviet guidelines condemned his works – especially those which graphically portrayed the tragedy of collectivization – to be rejected and censored by the authorities, leading to charges of "silence" – the crime of being unproductive. With the death of his patron Gorky in 1936, Babel's fate was all but sealed. He was arrested in May 1939 and charged with espionage and membership in a Trotskyist terrorist organization. Babel was shot on January 27, 1940, although Soviet officials informed his wife that his official date of death was March 17, 1941. His final plea before being shot was not for himself, but for the power of his literary creation: “Let me finish my work.”

SEE ALSO: Bolsheviks; Russian Civil War, 1918–1924; Stalin, Joseph (1879–1953) and “Revolution from Above”

References and Suggested Readings

- Babel, N. (2002) The Collected Stories of Isaac Babel. New York: W. W. Norton.
- Carden, P. (1972) The Art of Isaac Babel. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Luplow, C. (1979) Paradox and the Search for Value in Babel’s Red Cavalry. Slavic and East European Journal 23, 2 (Summer): 216–32.

Babeuf, François-Noël (1760–1797) and the Conspiracy of Equals

Robert H. Blackman

François-Noël Babeuf, better known as Gracchus Babeuf, and his Conspiracy of Equals have been a source of inspiration for political activists on the left at least since the publication of Buonarroti’s Babeuf’s Conspiracy for Equality (1828). The Conspirators wanted to create a just and egalitarian society. This was to be accomplished not by redistributing land, the “agrarian law” proposed by the Gracchus brothers in ancient Rome, but by the communal ownership of real property. They sought equality of outcomes, arguing that every person’s labor was equally important to society. They also favored women’s political and economic rights. To achieve their goals, the Conspirators put together a uniquely modern formula for revolution, combining propagandizing poor urban workers, subverting the military, and creation of a revolutionary vanguard operating in secret dominated by an anonymous central committee. Commentators on the left and right have claimed Babeuf as a forefather of Marxism and Leninism.

Babeuf had humble origins. He worked as a manual laborer and as a domestic servant before becoming a specialist in seeking out evidence and preparing cases to enforce feudal obligations. Lacking formal education, Babeuf taught himself economic and political philosophy and was particularly moved by the work of Jean-Jacques Rousseau. In the 1780s Babeuf corresponded with the secretary of the Academy of Arras, from whom he received encouragement and books. In 1787 Babeuf wrote a book on the reforms needed regarding land ownership and taxation, but events overtook his efforts.

After 1789 Babeuf became a public official in Picardy overseeing matters regarding land ownership and transfer of land. He pushed for reforms in local taxes and advocated a tax strike. He fled to Paris in 1793 after being charged with forgery. There he worked as secretary for the Subsistence Committee of the city government. In this position, Babeuf collected information and wrote orders concerning the provisioning of Paris, seeing firsthand the misery of the urban poor. It was his good fortune to be away from Paris during the height of the Terror. When he returned to Paris in late 1794, Babeuf started a newspaper in support of the so-called Thermidoreans, those who had overthrown Robespierre and his allies in July of 1794. Babeuf quickly soured on their corrupt opportunism and in October he changed its name to Tribune of the People. He took to denouncing the Thermidorean deputies in print, calling for a return to the principles of Robespierre and his Jacobin allies, including price ceilings for basic goods and the use of the guillotine to terrify hoarders. Babeuf was jailed for his words in February 1795. He was released as part of a general amnesty declared to celebrate the adoption of the Constitution of 1795, that of the Directory.

Babeuf found his co-conspirators while in prison. There he met Buonarroti and others jailed for their radicalism, and there he formed the idea of conspiring to overthrow the Directory. The details of the platform remain in some doubt – the group was an eclectic mix of the far left, from anarchists to militarists to unreconstructed Jacobins, as well as former members of the Committees of Public Safety and Public Security who had overseen the implementation of the Terror. Babeuf led the group and through the Tribune of the People he was its voice. It was his ideas concerning le bonheur commun (the public good) and radical equality that were used to propagandize the military and the people of Paris.

The Conspiracy was probably doomed from the beginning. Lazare Carnot, a former member of the Committee of Public Safety and a member of the Directory, had opponents of the regime under constant surveillance. He sought to infiltrate the Conspiracy. When the Legion of Police, a militia formed in Paris under the Directory, rose up on April 28, 1796 rather than deploy to the front lines of the ongoing war, Carnot had his chance. The Conspirators had infiltrated the Legion and hoped to use it as their military force in support of an uprising in Paris. When Carnot crushed the revolt the Conspirators lost their access to military force. Desperate to subvert the military, they brought a dissident army captain into their inner circles. This captain was a government agent and betrayed the Conspiracy.

On May 10, 1796 Babeuf and the leaders of the Conspiracy were arrested and their papers and effects seized. The Directors had decided to make the trial of the Conspirators into a showpiece of the differences between the new order and the old government by Terror. The trial was moved for from Paris to Vendôme, where lawful procedure was taken to be of the essence. The Conspirators pursued the dual strategy of denying that there had been any conspiracy on one hand while arguing that a conspiracy to help the people of France was no crime. This defense worked – not one of the almost 100 charged was convicted of conspiracy to overthrow the government. Only eight were convicted of any crime, and of these only Babeuf and one other were sent to the guillotine, in 1797. The Conspiracy had been crushed, but its members went on to organize further plots.

SEE ALSO: Buonarroti, Philippe (1761–1837); French Revolution, 1789–1794; French Revolution, Radical Factions and Organizations; Lenin, Vladimir Ilyich (1870–1924); Marx, Karl (1818–1883); Robespierre, Maximilien de (1758–1794); Russia, Revolution of October/November 1917; Socialism

References and Suggested Readings

- Birchall, I. A. (1997) The Spectre of Babeuf. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Buonarroti, P. (1828/1965) Babeuf's Conspiracy for Equality. Trans. B. O'Brien. New York: Augustus M. Kelley.
- Daline, V. (1976) Gracchus Babeuf à la veille et pendant le Grande Révolution française (1785–1794) (Gracchus Babeuf at the Dawn and During the French Revolution). Moscow: Editions du Progres.
- Mason, L. (2007) "Never was a Plot so Holy": Gracchus Babeuf and the End of the French Revolution. In P. R. Campbell, T. E. Kaiser, & M. Linton (Eds.), Conspiracy in the French Revolution. Manchester: Manchester University Press.

- Mazauric, C. (1962) Babeuf et la conjuration pour l'égalité (Babeuf and the Conspiracy of Equals). Paris: Editions sociales.
- Rose, R. B. (1978) Gracchus Babeuf: The First Revolutionary Communist. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Soublin, J. (2001) Je t'écris au sujet de Gracchus Babeuf (I write to you on the subject of Gracchus Babeuf). Villelongue d'Aude: Atelier de Gué.
- Talmon, J. L. (1952) The Rise of Totalitarian Democracy. Boston: Beacon Press.

Bacha-i Sakkao's movement

Yury V. Bosin

On the death of Khabilulla Khan in 1919, Emir Amanulla Khan assumed the Afghan throne. Inspired by European nationalist ideas, Khan embarked on a course of reforms designed to unify Afghanistan into a modern nation-state. He adopted a constitution that advanced individual freedoms, the rights of women, and religious tolerance. However, the creation of liberal democratic modernization met with great popular opposition. Many Afghans resisted the radical changes, owing to a long tradition of Islamic religious conservatism and the inability to unify the country, which was divided by ethnic, regional, and clan loyalties. Amanulla Khan's effort to reform centuries-old family and marital traditions provoked wide opposition at the grassroots level. While conflict escalated into a series of ethnic and clan revolts, Amanulla Khan's determination to continue his program of Afghan transformation was not diminished. On returning from a long trip to Europe in 1928, Khan sought to accelerate and expand social and economic reforms. As the plans were implemented, an organized, broadly based social protest movement was gaining momentum in Afghanistan's northern provinces, led by Tajik Habibulla Kalakani, better known under the nickname Bacha-i Sakkao (Son of a Water Carrier).

Kalakani formed an army of resistance fighters comprised predominantly of Tajik and Uzbek nationals rather than Pashtun peoples of Afghan origin. The Khazara, Afghan indigenous people, despite extensive and longstanding grievances against Kabul, did not join the uprising. Ideologically, Bacha-i Sakkao was a militant Islamist movement that promoted the restoration of the Holy Caliphate, an orthodox government based on the principles of the Qur'an.

In January 1929, the capital city of Kabul was captured by Kalakani and Amanulla Khan abdicated and escaped to India. Bacha-i Sakkao named himself Emir Habibulla II and established an authoritarian government that was highly unpopular, remaining in power for nine months. The Pashtun people considered Bacha-i Sakkao a foreign usurper, and this sparked nationalist sentiment in Afghanistan. A Pashtun militia was mobilized by Nadir Khan, the former minister of war, that successfully drove out Bacha-i Sakkao from Kabul. He was later captured and hanged. The new king, Nadir Khan, repealed many of Amanulla Khan's reforms and instituted an authoritarian government.

SEE ALSO: Afghanistan, 1978 Revolution and Islamic Civil War; Afghanistan, Resistance to 19th-Century British Invasion; Bin Laden, Osama (b. 1957) and al-Qaeda; Durrani Empire, Popular Protests, 1747–1823; Taliban, 1996–2007

References and Suggested Readings

- Briant, P. (2002) From Cyrus to Alexander: A History of the Persian Empire. Trans. P. T. Daniels. Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns.
- Gregorian, V. (1969) The Emergence of Modern Afghanistan: Politics of Reform and Modernization, 1880–1946. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Masson, V. & Romodon, V. (1964) A History of Afghanistan, Vols. 1–2. Moscow: Nauka (in Russian).
- Sykes, P. (1940) A History of Afghanistan. London: Macmillan.

Bacon's Rebellion

Nathan King

Bacon's Rebellion was the culmination of a series of events that aggravated small Virginia back-country tobacco farmers, and it played a large role in the development of race-based chattel slavery in the United States. In 1675–6 small farmers were faced with repeated attacks from Native Americans, low tobacco prices, and high taxes. The Virginia Colony, led by Sir William Berkeley, was perceived as ineffectual, particularly with regards to protection against Native American attacks. In the previous year, colonists retaliating against a Doeg attack on a plantation mistakenly attacked the Susquehannocks. Governor Berkeley organized a meeting with the Susquehannocks that led to the death of several tribesmen. This provoked increased attacks upon plantations, but the government would not take military action. Berkeley called for restraint on the part of the colonists. Nathaniel Bacon and other colonists refused.

In the spring of 1676, Bacon requested a commission to fight against the Native Americans but was not granted one. Against the wishes of the governor, he seized a group of friendly Appamattox, and Berkeley declared him a rebel because of his disregard for the government. In March 1676 Berkeley called the Long Assembly, which supplied friendly natives with ammunition and powder and set up a defensive perimeter around the colony. Further taxes were levied against the already overtaxed farmers to pay for this endeavor. Bacon continued his attacks upon Native American tribes. By June 1676, word of the rebellion had spread to England, but a formal account was not received until September.

Governor Berkeley realized that his forces were no match for Bacon's forces and promised to issue a pardon to Bacon if he would stand trial before King Charles II. Bacon did not comply. Fortunately for Bacon, many members of the Legislative Assembly held sentiments similar to his own and elected him to office. Once in office Bacon was pardoned after forcibly apologizing for his previous actions. While in office, Bacon and his followers pushed for better defense against Native American attacks. On June 23 the debate escalated and Bacon surrounded the assembly house in Jamestown, demanding to be allowed to campaign against the Native Americans without government interference. Governor Berkeley gave in to the demands but later reneged. The rebels took control of Jamestown between July 30 and September 1676.

For almost three months Nathaniel Bacon was in charge of Virginia. On July 30, 1676, he issued the Declaration of the People of Virginia, stating the grievances of the Virginians against Governor Berkeley. When merchant ships from England arrived to aid Governor Berkeley in his attempt to recapture Jamestown in September, Bacon and his rebels burned the town. Bacon was unable to savor his success, because he died on October 26, 1676 from dysentery. In the aftermath Governor Berkeley rounded up as many rebels as he could find and tried and executed them. When the Royal Navy and Royal Commissioners arrived, Governor Berkeley was relieved of his post and sent back to England. Royal Commissioners concluded that the majority of Virginians had supported Bacon, and they issued pardons against convicted rebels.

Although Bacon's Rebellion was not a success, it did have some lasting effects. During Bacon's rule in Jamestown, he recognized the right to keep and bear arms. Historians have argued that this is where future colonists got the idea that they had the right to keep and bear arms. Perhaps the most long-term outcome of the rebellion was the change in social classes. Poor backcountry farmers who were either former indentured servants or children of former indentured servants played key roles in the uprising. Some of these former servants were African, and the specter of class-based interracial cooperation frightened authorities. Thus, after the rebellion, new Virginia slave laws made slavery lifelong and inherited. This new legal race-based slavery, coupled with a decrease in English immigration, led to increased slave importation and broke the common bond that poor black and white farmers shared during Bacon's Rebellion.

SEE ALSO: American Slave Rebellions; Anti-Slavery Movement, United States, 1700–1870; Atlantic Port Seaman Resistance, American Revolutionary Era

References and Suggested Readings

- Anonymous (1900) Bacon's Rebellion. William and Mary Quarterly 9, 1 (July): 1–10.
- Billings, W. M. (1978) The Causes of Bacon's Rebellion: Some Suggestions. Virginia Magazine of History and Biography 78: 409–12.
- Washburn, W. E. (1957) The Governor and the Rebel: A History of Bacon's Rebellion in Virginia. University of North Carolina Press: Chapel Hill.
- Webb, S. S. (1984) 1676: The End of American Independence. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.

Bain, J. T. (1860–1919)

Lucien van der Walt

Born in Dundee, Scotland to a working-class family in 1860, J. T. Bain (James Thomas Bain, Jimmy Bain) served in the British army in South Africa and India, before returning to Scotland. There he learned socialism from Thomas Carlyle, William Morris, and John Ruskin, and trained as a fitter, moving to the Transvaal in 1890. He formed the Witwatersrand Mine Employees' and Mechanics' Union in 1892, better known as the Labor Union, and pioneered socialist ideas, distributing the Clarion to miners, and publishing the Johannesburg Witness in 1898 and 1899, the first socialist paper in South Africa. Bain's politics were a mixture of segregation and socialism: the Labor Union, for example, supported the color bar, and Bain worked as a spy for Paul Kruger's Transvaal government. Bain fought for the Transvaal in the Second Anglo-Boer War (1899–1902), and was captured by the British, narrowly escaping execution for treason when it was discovered that he had Transvaal citizenship.

After the war, Bain helped revive the unions, initiated a local Independent Labor Party, and worked with Archie Crawford, the two men leading a march of several hundred people from Johannesburg to Pretoria on May 1, 1907 to demand the government employ white labor at fair wages. The delegation was rebuffed, the movement collapsed, and Bain became involved in the founding of the South African Labor Party (SALP) in 1909. His relations with Crawford soured around this time. Bain secured a job on the railways in Johannesburg, stood unsuccessfully for the SALP in the 1910 general elections, and worked as an organizer for the Transvaal Federation of Trade Unions, formed in 1911.

Bain played a central role in the 1913 general strike, during which he advised workers to come armed, and briefly adopted the syndicalist view that it might be necessary for the strikers to take over, and run, the mines. Prominent in the 1914 general strike, he was deported to Britain for his troubles, along with Crawford and others. In 1919 workers at the Johannesburg power station struck against retrenchments, and, at the urging of Bain, established a Board of Control to administer the municipal workshops and services from the council chamber. It ran the light, power, and tram services for several days, before the municipality conceded the strikers' demands. Bain died later that year, a venerated and complex figure.

SEE ALSO: South Africa, Labor Movement

References and Suggested Readings

- Gitsham, E. & Trembath, J. F. (1926) A First Account of Labour Organization in South Africa. Durban: E. P. and Commercial Printing.
- Hyslop, J. (2004) The Notorious Syndicalist J. T. Bain: A Scottish Rebel in Colonial South Africa. Johannesburg: Jacana Media.
- Rosenthal, E. (Ed.) (1966) Southern African Dictionary of National Biography. London: Frederick Warne.

Ticktin, D. (1973) The Origins of the South African Labour Party, 1888–1910. PhD thesis, University of Cape Town.

Walker, I. L. & Weinbren, B. (1961) 2000 Casualties: A History of the Trade Unions and the Labour Movement in the Union of South Africa. Johannesburg: South African Trade Union Council.

Baker, Ella Josephine (1903–1986)

Susan Love Brown

Ella Josephine Baker was a civil rights activist best known for her work with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), and the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC). Her emphasis on grassroots activism and her ability to work with several organizations and causes at a time made her one of the most effective leaders in the civil rights movement.

Baker was born in 1903 in Norfolk, Virginia, but spent most of her childhood in Littleton, North Carolina, where her family originated. She was the second of three surviving children of Anna Ross and Blake Baker. She was named after her maternal grandmother, Josephine Elizabeth Ross, a former slave. Her parents emphasized a deep spirituality among their children through participation in the Baptist Church and instilled a sense of service that involved working to improve the lives of other people across class lines. Baker attended Shaw Academy and Shaw University, graduating in 1927 as valedictorian of her class.

After graduation, Baker went to live with an aunt in Harlem, and it was there that she learned the art of coalition building, immersing herself in the many streams of intellectual and political thought from which she would draw in later years. In 1934, she began working at the Harlem Public Library, running the Young People's Forum (YPF) and the Adult Education Committee. In 1936, she joined the Workers' Education Project of the Works Progress Administration (WPA).

In 1941, she became assistant field secretary for the NAACP, a job which required her to travel throughout the South recruiting members. She developed an excellent reputation as an organizer and became the highest-ranking woman in the organization. Noted for her ability to organize effective leadership conferences that helped to decentralize the power within the NAACP, she was always critical of the bureaucracy. By 1952, Baker became the first woman president of the New York City NAACP. She focused her attention on such problems as police brutality, desegregation, and building coalition with other groups.

In 1957, Baker helped found the SCLC, a coalition of ministers and activist leaders, served as its first paid staff member, and acted on more than one occasion as its interim executive director. The organization played an important role in voter registration drives and desegregating the South. Baker, along with A. Philip Randolph, organized the Prayer Pilgrimage for Freedom, a rally of 30,000 that eventually led to the Civil Rights Act of 1957, which established the Civil Rights Commission, a small step toward the goal of establishing voter rights in all states.

After a group of students from Greensboro, North Carolina, staged sit-ins at local lunch counters, Baker organized the Southwide Student Leadership Conference on Non-Violent Resistance to Segregation in April 1960 at Shaw University in Raleigh, and it was attended by students from all over the South. By the end of the conference, the students had formed the SNCC, and Baker served as an advisor, helping it to set up the organizational structure.

Baker continued to work in multiple capacities throughout the civil rights era and into the 1970s and beyond, slowing down only when she developed arthritis and asthma in her later years. She died on December 13, 1986.

SEE ALSO: Civil Rights Movement, United States, 1960–1965; Civil Rights, United States: Overview; Du Bois, W. E. B. (1868–1963); Evers, Medgar (1925–1963); King, Martin Luther, Jr. (1929–1968) and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC); Parks, Rosa (1913–2005) and the Montgomery Bus Boycott; Randolph, A. Philip (1889–1979); Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC)

References and Suggested Readings

Bohannon, L. F. (2005) Freedom Cannot Rest: Ella Baker and the Civil Rights Movement. Greensboro, NC: Morgan Reynolds.

Elliott, A. (1996) Ella Baker: Free Agent in the Civil Rights Movement. Journal of Black Studies 26, 5 (May): 593–603.

Grant, J. (1999) Ella Baker: Freedom Bound. New York: Wiley.

Payne, C. (1989) Ella Baker and Models of Social Change. Signs 14, 4 (Summer): 885–9.

Ransby, B. (2003) Ella Baker and the Black Freedom Movement: A Radical Democratic Vision. Chapel Hill, NC: University of North Carolina Press.

Bakunin, Mikhail Alexandrovich (1814–1876)

Paul McLaughlin

Mikhail Bakunin is among the most significant anarchist activists and theorists of the nineteenth century. In both roles he came into conflict with Karl Marx, and he developed a particularly influential form of non-Marxist socialism.

Born of noble descent, Bakunin was raised in privileged if isolated conditions 60 miles east of Tver in central Russia. As a child, he received an extensive liberal education under the guidance of his well-educated and traveled father. However, in the more difficult political and economic circumstances that followed the Decembrist uprising of 1825, he was sent to St. Petersburg to enter military school in 1828. He graduated in 1832 and was commissioned an ensign, though he secured a discharge less than three years later, having decided that the military was not for a man of his intellectual interests and rebellious character.

In 1836 he moved to Moscow to study in the circle of Nikolai Stankevich and to pursue an academic career. He immersed himself in German philosophy, initially concentrating on the subjective idealism of Fichte before falling under the spell of Hegel. Under Hegel's influence, Bakunin developed a rather speculative interest in political reality, though it was only after he made it to Berlin in 1840, to further his philosophical studies, that his political radicalism became apparent.

In the early 1840s Hegel's younger disciples, the so-called Young or Left Hegelians, were busily interpreting – or willfully misinterpreting – his doctrines in a radical way. Bakunin came to embrace Ludwig Feuerbach's humanistic interpretation of Hegel's speculative theology, Bruno Bauer's revolutionary interpretation of Hegel's logic, and Arnold Ruge's democratic interpretation of Hegel's politics. His new Left Hegelian sentiments gained noteworthy expression in “The Reaction in Germany,” published in 1842. In this seminal article, Bakunin claimed that true democracy could only be achieved by the complete and uncompromising negation of the existing world condition. Nothing of the old could remain if a new world were to be created. This new world was to be created by the “greatest part of humanity”: the “poor class” (Bakunin 1973: 57).

Mikhail Bakunin, portrait ca. 1860. It was around this time that Bakunin further developed his collectivist form of anarchism, publishing articles and supporting the social revolutionary project of a federal reorganization of popular life “from below” on an international scale. (Getty Images)

Giving up on academic life, Bakunin went to Dresden in the spring of 1842 to work with Ruge. It was here, under the influence of the poet Georg Herwegh above all, that the radical Hegelian moved towards socialism. He began reading French socialism and was impressed by his reading of the communist Wilhelm Weitling, who he later met in Switzerland en route to the capital of European revolution, Paris, where he arrived in March 1844. In Paris he was to meet the two greatest influences on his later brand of anarchism: Proudhon and Marx. Bakunin was struck by Proudhon's revolutionary temperament and libertarian sentiments, and he maintained a lifelong respect for him. Marx, by contrast, Bakunin found to be intellectually impressive but, on a personal and political level, “vain, perfidious, and cunning” (Bakunin 1980: 119).

Having made a dramatic speech on the cause of Polish liberation in November 1847, Bakunin was expelled from France. He settled briefly in Brussels, but returned to revolutionary Paris in the following February, before setting off for revolutionary adventure in central Europe: in Breslau, Prague, and ultimately Dresden. Between his activities in Prague and Dresden, Bakunin penned his next significant work, “An Appeal to the Slavs,” in which he advocated the cause of pan-Slavic liberation, social revolution, and the federation of European republics.

Escaping the failed May 1849 insurrection in Dresden, in which he had played a leading role, Bakunin was arrested by Saxon authorities at Chemnitz. He was sentenced to death for treason, had his sentence commuted, and was passed over to Austrian authorities. They also sentenced him to death for treason, commuted his sentence, and passed him over to the Russians. Thus, in May 1851, Bakunin returned to Russia in chains after more than a decade abroad, including two years in Saxon and Austrian prisons. He was held for three years at the Peter and Paul fortress in St. Petersburg, where he wrote an ambiguous and unsuccessful plea for clemency: his famous “Confession” to Tsar Nicholas I. It was only in 1857, after further imprisonment at Schlüsselburg, that Bakunin had his sentence commuted to permanent exile in Siberia by the next tsar, Alexander II. His time in Siberia was relatively free: he married, secured paid employment, and became friends with the governor of the eastern province. However, Bakunin still wished to escape and managed to do so, quite spectacularly, in June 1861, making his way to Japan and onward via the United States to England, where he arrived just after Christmas.

In London, Bakunin collaborated uneasily with the liberal Alexander Herzen, a friend from his youth, and wrote in support of the Russian Land and Liberty movement and the Polish insurrection of 1863 (in which he attempted to participate). Both causes proved to be unsuccessful and, having declined Marx’s personal invitation to join the International Workingmen’s Association, Bakunin moved on to Italy in 1864 in search of revolutionary activity. He remained there for three years, participating in secret organizations and formulating, for the first time, his anarchist position. In a series of articles published in the Italian press in the autumn of 1865, Bakunin rejected private property, church, state, nationalism, and political revolution. From this point on, he would consistently support the social revolutionary project of the federal reorganization of popular life “from below” on an international scale. This project alone would, Bakunin believed, usher in a free and equal society. He elaborated further on these themes in his important “Revolutionary Catechism,” written the following year.

August 1867 brought Bakunin to Geneva. He would remain in Switzerland for most of his remaining years, and was to write his most important theoretical works there. The first of these works, Federalism, Socialism, and Anti-Theologism (1867), was written in response to the creation of the liberal League of Peace and Freedom; Bakunin optimistically hoped to radicalize this association and to move it in an anarchist direction. After his failure in this respect, he turned his subsequent attention to the First International and attempted, from 1868 onwards, to propagate anarchist ideas within the organized socialist movement. Open hostilities between Bakunin and Marx – with ideological, ethnic, and personal roots – developed from this point. These hostilities would fatally undermine the First International, which effectively collapsed in September 1872.

In March 1869 a young Russian revolutionary named Sergei Nechaev arrived in Geneva. This committed and energetic nihilist made a strong impression on Bakunin, and the two began to collaborate on the production of revolutionary propaganda. This collaboration gave rise to controversy with the appearance of two pamphlets later in the year. Both “Principles of Revolution” and “The Catechism of a Revolutionary” urged revolutionary violence without moral restraint and proved extremely damaging to Bakunin’s reputation. However, the evidence pointing to Bakunin’s authorship of these documents is very weak, and Bakunin himself broke with the deceitful and dangerous Nechaev in the summer of 1870.

By this stage, political events in France were taking a dramatic turn with the defeat of Napoleon III in the Franco-Prussian War. Bakunin traveled to Lyon in September to try to capitalize on subsequent political unrest there. He helped organize a popular uprising, but this was a complete failure. Eluding the French authorities, he returned to Switzerland to concentrate on his major (though unfinished and unedited) work, The Knouto-Germanic Empire and Social Revolution (1870–2). Significant portions of this work were inspired by the March–May 1871 events of the Paris Commune, a revolutionary experiment that drew startling praise from Marx as well as Bakunin. In other notable documents from the same period, Bakunin wrote in response to Mazzini, whom he knew personally and who had strongly criticized the Paris Commune as anti-religious and anti-nationalist. But larger parts of The Knouto-Germanic Empire developed Bakunin’s important critique of Marx, a critique that was to be developed in his last important work, Statism and Anarchy (1873).

The remainder of Bakunin’s life was spent in bitter and disheartening dispute with Marxist opponents. Apart from an aborted attempt to participate in an insurrection in Bologna in July 1874, he spent his last days in Switzerland coping with poor health and financial troubles. He died in Berne on July 1, 1876, and was buried there.

Anarchist Theory

Bakunin developed his collectivist form of anarchism under the influence of, and as a critical reaction to, the communist position of Marx. Thus, in order to understand the essential features of Bakunin’s position, it is best to consider the theoretical relationship between these two major figures of nineteenth-century socialism. The differences are extensive: many of them are often ignored, while others can be overstated.

There are a number of fundamental philosophical differences between Bakunin and Marx that are of more than academic significance. Metaphysically, they differ with respect to their conceptions of human nature or even their willingness to speculate about it. If Marx can be said to have a conception of human nature, it is of human beings as productive mediators of nature, of utilizers and shapers of what exists for their sake. However, it is arguable that Marx, taking on board Max Stirner’s critique of metaphysics, does not wish to make any claims about human nature as such, and that he simply identifies what we supposedly are with what we verifiably do (that is, produce in accordance with historically developing needs). Bakunin, by contrast, regards the man-as-producer conception as, at best, inadequate or reductive; and he readily speculates on human nature, regarding human beings as a constituent part of nature that can be understood “as it essentially is” by means of “positive science.”

In terms of their respective philosophies of history, Bakunin and Marx differ on the logic of socio-historical development. Marx holds to a semi-preservative logic, based on the principle of sublation (Aufhebung), according to which each stage of development retains elements of previous stages. Bakunin, on the other hand, believes in a revolutionary logic, based on the principle of negation, according to which the new represents the “creative destruction” of the old: its “annihilation” in order that the new be authentically such.

Ethically, Marx’s moral deflationism contrasts starkly with Bakunin’s ethical anarchism. Marx holds, fundamentally, that capitalism is contradictory (and therefore, by his logic, bound to give way to another stage of development that is necessarily premised on it). Bakunin considers capitalism unjust, and therefore ought to be overcome, that is, by his socio-historical logic of development, must be negated. In other words, Bakunin is happy to make what Marx would consider ideological claims: he is not wholly committed to the materialist conception of history.

This brings us to the sociological differences between Bakunin and Marx. Bakunin often voices his respect for and approval of Marx’s great scientific insight – that is, as Bakunin sees it, the materialist conception of history. At times, he seems to accept it completely. But he also notes his reservations about this conception when it is “set down in an absolute manner as the only foundation and first source of all other principles” (Bakunin 1950: 20). Bakunin’s own theory emphasizes the social significance and determining capacity of various “ideological” factors: political, religious, ethical, educational, and so on. Moreover, he continually states that human will is a necessary (though insufficient) condition of social change. Thus, he appears to believe that economics is a particularly important social factor, but that it is not the only, or even the ultimate, determining factor in each and every instance.

A second sociological difference here concerns class analysis. Both Bakunin and Marx take such sociological analysis seriously, but they differ significantly on the historical role of various classes. Most notably, Marx attributes a leading role to the proletariat in the capitalist mode of production and its “sublation.” Bakunin, however, points to the revolutionary potential of the peasantry and the lumpenproletariat; he also insists on the potential of “pre-industrial” societies to become socialist – very much in contrast to Marx, at least until late in his life.

This point leads us naturally to the crucial ideological differences between Bakunin and Marx. In the first place, they differ in their respective critiques of existing society. Marx concentrated on the exploitative nature of the modern economy, while Bakunin concentrated on the dominative nature of modern society. Neither phenomenon (nor the critique thereof) necessarily excludes the other, but Bakunin found Marx’s critique partial in this respect, while he never ignored the issue of modern exploitation. It has been claimed in this context, therefore, that Marx paid insufficient attention to issues of social power, control, and authority. And this point becomes especially pertinent as we consider the next difference.

Bakunin and Marx differ substantially on their visions of a future socialist society. While neither of them paints a utopian picture of the future (contrary to popular belief), both have something to say about the fate of the state and both propose a basic principle of distributive justice (morally desirable, in Bakunin’s case, or historically necessary, in Marx’s). Bakunin claims that a social revolution requires the abolition of the state and its replacement with a federated system of freely constituted communes. Marx, on the other hand, sees a transitional role for a revolutionary state and its ultimate replacement by a socioeconomic “administration” of some kind. Bakunin considers the transitional step fatal to social revolution and the possibility of a free socialist society. He considers the ultimate administration a real impossibility or hypothetically indistinguishable from the state. On the issue of distributive justice, Marx countered that Bakunin’s collectivist principle (distribution according to effort) was inadequate from a socialist perspective. Many later anarchists conceded this point and adopted the communist principle (distribution according to need).

A final and related difference between Bakunin and Marx concerns the means of achieving a socialist society. As stated already, Bakunin rejects the possibility of a revolutionary state (transitional or otherwise). Such a state would be, he claimed, the most despotic kind, acting knowingly, if oppressively, in the presumed long-term interest of the ignorant masses. Thus, he identified it with the illegitimate “government of science.” Bakunin also criticized the involvement of Marxists in parliamentary politics, believing this to be both ineffective and corrupting. Bakunin himself looked to other “non-political” means – such as education – as well as means that have been termed “anti-political” – ranging from revolutionary conspiracy to revolutionary violence against the state and its agents. These means remain controversial, though Bakunin’s attachment to them also remains questionable.

Influence

While Marxist and liberal critics, including Friedrich Engels and Isaiah Berlin, have taken great pleasure in mocking Bakunin’s practical and theoretical achievements, his life and thought have inspired generations of activists and thinkers on the libertarian left. Thus, to cite just two notable examples, Errico Malatesta was to take up Bakunin’s role as anarchist revolutionary internationalist, while Noam Chomsky has been profoundly influenced by his writings on libertarian socialism. Justifiable criticism of Bakunin’s personal flaws and prejudices, as well as his often careless writing, persists. Nevertheless, Bakunin’s main claim for himself, as a relentless opponent of the authoritarian socialists, may be equally justified: “my name will remain, and to this name . . . will attach the real, legitimate glory of having been the pitiless and irreconcilable adversary, not of their persons, which matter very little to me, but of their authoritarian theories and ridiculous and detestable pretensions to world dictatorship” (Bakunin 1973: 250).

SEE ALSO: Anarchism; Anarchism, Russia; Chomsky, Noam (b. 1928); Decembrists to the Rise of Russian Marxism; Engels, Friedrich (1820–1895); Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich (1770–1831); Herzen, Alexander Ivanovich (1812–1870); Malatesta, Errico (1853–1932); Marx, Karl (1818–1883); Proudhon, Pierre Joseph (1809–1865); Young Hegelians

References and Suggested Readings

- Bakunin, M. (1950) Marxism, Freedom, and the State. Ed. K. J. Kenafick. London: Freedom Press.
 Bakunin, M. (1973) Selected Writings. Ed. A. Lehning. London: Jonathan Cape.

- Bakunin, M. (1980) Bakunin on Anarchy. Ed. S. Dolgoff. Montreal: Black Rose Books.
- Bakunin, M. (2000) Oeuvres Complètes (CD-ROM). Amsterdam: Royal Netherlands Academy of Arts and Sciences.
- Carr, E. H. (1937) Michael Bakunin. London: Macmillan.
- Kelly, A. (1982) Mikhail Bakunin: A Study in the Psychology and Politics of Utopianism. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Leier, M. (2006) Bakunin: The Creative Passion. New York: Thomas Dunne Books.
- McLaughlin, P. (2002) Mikhail Bakunin: The Philosophical Basis of His Anarchism. New York: Algora.
- Morris, B. (1993) Bakunin: The Philosophy of Freedom. Montreal: Black Rose Books.

Balkan socialist confederation, 1910–1948

Slobodan Karamanić

The concept of a Balkan socialist federation emerged at the beginning of the twentieth century from among left, socialist, and communist political forces in the region. The idea sought to synchronize the strivings of the Balkan people by articulating questions of national liberation with class struggle, anti-imperialism against foreign domination, and the struggle against capitalist exploitation and economic colonization. The central aim was to establish a new political unity: a common federal republic unifying the Balkan Peninsula on the basis of internationalism, political solidarity, and economic equality. The underlying vision was that despite social, economic, and cultural differences among the Balkan peoples, the historical need for emancipation was a common basis for unification.

This critical political concept went through three successive historical phases in its development. In the first phase, the idea of the Balkan federation was articulated as a response to the political crisis in the Balkans caused by the collapse of the Ottoman empire at the beginning of the twentieth century – this sequence could be framed between the First Balkan Social Democratic Conference (1910) and the end of World War I. In the second phase, mostly through the interwar period (1919–35), the dream of the Balkan federation was taken up by the Balkan communist parties. The third phase, characterized by attempts to bring about the practical realization of the Balkan (con)federation, began with the armed rebellion of the partisans in the Balkans during World War II and ended with the Stalin–Tito split in 1948.

The initial phase is characterized by the shaping of the Balkan federation ideas expressed within the framework of Marxist analyses and criticisms of the Balkan social and political reality. The first proponents of the Balkan socialist federation (Paul Argyriades [Panagiotis], Svetozar Marković, Christian Rakovsky, Vasil Kolarov, Dimitrije Tucović, Georgi Dimitrov, and others) criticized European imperialist efforts to dominate the Balkan Peninsula and the chauvinist policies of Balkan nation-states whose opposing interests were pushing peoples into division, wars, and destruction. Rather than an abstract blueprint for a desirable political arrangement, aspirations for the Balkan socialist federation resulted from a negative critique. As such, the idea was simultaneously an anti-war slogan and an appeal to overcome the condition by relying on the new uniting subjective power: the emerging Balkan proletariat.

In January 1910, the First Balkan Social Democratic Conference was held in Belgrade, bringing together Bulgarian, Croatian, Greek, Macedonian, Romanian, Serbian, and other Balkan social democrats. The conference established the idea of a Balkan Federative Republic and declared the following principles:

To free ourselves from particularism and narrowness; to abolish frontiers that divide peoples who are in part identical in language and culture, in part economically bound up together; finally, to sweep away forms of foreign domination both direct and indirect that deprive the people of their right to determine their destiny for themselves. (Trotsky 1991: 30)

Although the Belgrade Conference unified around the idea that the Balkans' future lay in a common socialist federation, its political realization was left unresolved. The basic problem was a lack of popular impetus behind the socialist ideas and proletarian internationalism, leading to a political dispute on the left. If Balkan social democrats urgently called for the creation of a common federal state, the immediate application of this demand would lead to an alliance of the existing Balkan monarchist regimes, and thus endanger the principles of social revolution. However, if social democrats strictly followed the principles of the socialist republic, they could not assertively prevent and impede war. The basic dilemma was thus a choice between the unification of the Balkan states or social revolution in the Balkans.

Ironically, the “Balkan Alliance” would indeed be created two years later, but on the principles of military cooperation against the Ottomans. The Alliance was initiated by the Bulgarian and Serbian states, joined by Greece and Montenegro. The united Balkan military forces defeated the Ottomans and expelled them from the peninsula in the First Balkan War (1912). But territorial disputes and animosities immediately transformed the Balkan Allies into adversaries, leading to the slaughter of the Second Balkan War (1913), developments that radicalized the social democratic critique of the devastating effects of bourgeois policies in the Balkans. As a result of firm anti-war and anti-imperialist positions, representatives of Balkan social democratic parties collaborated closely, creating an autonomous revolutionary platform in opposition to the reformist policy of the Socialist International. Instead of taking sides in the bloodshed of World War I, Bulgarian and Serbian social democratic parties refused to vote for war credits in national parliaments. In 1915, they met again in Bucharest, and decided to create a Revolutionary Balkan Workers’ Social Democratic Federation as the practical organization for propaganda and coordination.

According to socialist activist and future communist leader Georgi Dimitrov, “The first major practical step for the unification of the Balkan nations has been made by unifying the socialist proletariat in Rumania, Serbia, Bulgaria and Greece into one Balkan Social Democratic Federation” (Dimitrov 1971: 50) This organization, however, appeared as a transition to a new political phase, providing a link between radical factions of Balkan social democracy and later establishing the Balkan communist movement.

A new momentum in the organization of the Balkan federation was induced by the Bolshevik Revolution in Russia (1917). In January 1920, the third conference of the Balkan social democratic parties in Sofia established the Balkan Communist Federation (BCF) as a union of the communist parties of Bulgaria, Greece, Romania, Turkey, and Yugoslavia. Led by Christian Rakovsky and Georgi Dimitrov, the BCF formed a section within the Communist International (Comintern). The principal task of the BCF was to coordinate actions among the Balkan communists, creating conditions for establishing the Balkan Soviet Socialist Republic. The programmatic orientation of the BCF included two interrelated Leninist principles: the principle of proletarian internationalism and the proletarian revolution, guided by the Communist Party as a vanguard of the working class, and the principle of the right of nations to self-determination – the principle that saw national liberation movements as possible triggers for the social revolution.

The combination of national and socialist revolutionary principles thus became a decisive trait of communist politics in the Balkans, taking seriously the multinational and multicultural character of the region and reconsidering the possibilities of the dissolution and rearrangement of the existing Balkan nation-state order.

Within this framework, the Balkan communists engaged in intense discussions over particular “national questions” and territorial disputes (for instance, the questions of Bessarabia, Bucovina, Dobrudja, Pirin, and Transylvania). One of the central focuses of the BCF was the situation in Yugoslavia, where many nations were subjected to the rule of the Serbian crown. Especially with regard to the Macedonian national question, the BCF, after considerable disputes between Bulgarian, Greek, and Yugoslav parties, came to a common position in favor of the creation of “an independent and united Macedonia (and Thrace)” within a future Balkan Soviet Federation. With the 7th Congress of the Comintern (1935), which inaugurated the policy of the “Popular Front,” the concept of the Balkan federation fell off the agenda, due to the political urgency in uniting the national forces against the fascist threat.

The insurrection of partisan liberation movements against the fascist occupation of the Balkans in World War II opened a third and politically the strongest phase of the concept. Led by the Balkan communist parties, these movements provided a tangible possibility of realizing the Balkan socialist federation. In 1943, the leadership of the Yugoslav Partisans sent an emissary (Svetozar Vukomanović [Tempo]) to the Bulgarian, Greek, and Albanian parties to discuss military and political coordination of the revolutionary struggle in the Balkans. By way of concrete collaboration, Tempo proposed the establishment of a Balkan General Staff – a military organ to coordinate common army operations. This initiative, however, was blocked under pressure from Britain, whose influence rapidly expanded after the Allies invaded Sicily in July 1943. Two months earlier, in May 1943, Stalin decided to dismantle the Comintern and pursue a conciliatory course of realpolitik toward the Allies. Such a stance was confirmed in the Yalta agreement (February 1945), according to which the Balkans were supposed to be divided into two zones of interest – Soviet and western – preventing any attempt at bottom-up revolutionary unification.

After the war, however, the project of the Balkan federation was revived, albeit in the form of interstate dialogues among newly established communist authorities in Belgrade, Sofia, and Tirana. Confederation among Albania, Bulgaria, Greece, and Yugoslavia was particularly provided as an option. A more ambitious project was proposed by Georgi Dimitrov, who envisaged a Balkan–Danube confederation that would also include Romania, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, and Poland. By 1947, the first practical steps at establishing the Balkan socialist (con)federation were initiated by Albania, Bulgaria, and Yugoslavia. The Albanian communist leader Enver Hoxha met Yugoslav communist leaders in Belgrade to sign the Agreement of Friendship and Cooperation, opening up the possibility for Albania to become Yugoslavia's seventh republic in a future Balkan federation. In addition to this initiative, Georgi Dimitrov and Tito also tried to establish a common state agenda. In Slovenia, they signed a document called the Bled Agreement, which was intended to provide an economic and political framework for union.

The break between Stalin and Tito in 1948 put an end to plans for a Balkan federation. In June 1948 Yugoslavia was expelled from Cominform and all communications with other communist states were blocked. Furthermore, the communist schism in the Balkans also influenced the final political and military defeat of the Greek revolutionary movement in August 1949. As such, a concept striving to unify the Balkan Peninsula around the aim of independence and emancipation could never prove its revolutionary potential, falling prey to the geopolitical interests and contradictions of Stalin's USSR.

SEE ALSO: Albania, Socialism; Dimitrov, Georgi (1882–1949); Greece, Partisan Resistance; Tito, Josip Broz (1892–1980); Yugoslavia, Anti-Fascist “People's Liberation War” and Revolution, 1941–1945; Yugoslavia, Resistance to Cominform, 1948

References and Suggested Readings

- Dimitrov, G. (1915/1971) The Significance of the Second Balkan Conference. In Selected Works, Vol. 1. Sofia: Sofia Press, pp. 49–52.
- Lalkov, M. (1998) Ot nadežda kām razočarovanie. Idejata za federacija v balkanskija Jugoiztok (1944–1948) (From Hope to Disappointment. The Idea of the Federation of the South-East Balkans). Sofia: Vek 22.
- Lee, M. (1983) Kosovo between Yugoslavia and Albania. New Left Review 1, 140 (July–August): 62–91.
- Nadoveza, B. (1997) Balkanski socijalisti i balkanska federacija (The Balkan Socialists and Balkan Federation). Belgrade: Zadužbina Andrejević.
- Petranović, B. (1991) Balkanska federacija 1943–1948. Belgrade: Šabac.
- Pupovac, O. (2006) Project Yugoslavia: The Dialectics of the Revolution. Prelom (Break): Journal for Images and Politics 8: 9–21.
- Sakasoff, J. (1911) Neoslavism, Balkan Federation and Social Democracy. Der Kampf IV/5. Available at www.revolutionary-history.co.uk/otherdox/JanSak.htm (downloaded March 15, 2008).
- Stavrianos, L. S. (1942) The Balkan Federation Movement: A Neglected Aspect. American Historical Review 48 (1): 30–51.
- Trotsky, L. (1991) The Balkan Wars 1912–13. New York: Pathfinder.
- Tucović, D. (1945) Srbija i Arbania – Jedan prilog kritici zavojevačke politike srpske buržoazije (Serbia and Albania: A Contribution to the Critique of the Imperialist Politics of the Serbian Bourgeoisie). Belgrade and Zagreb: Kultura.

Baltic protests in the 20th century

Scott D. Orr

Until the breakup of the Soviet Union, the Baltic states of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania received little global attention. However, in the twentieth century, Baltic nationalist movements for independence in the Russian Revolutions of 1905 and 1917, World War II, and the anti-Soviet revolutions of 1989 to 1991 mirror analogous struggles in Eastern Europe. The Baltic revolutions in the twentieth century provide most complex examples of how movements for self-determination in “the lands between” correlate to the waxing and waning of the German, Russian, and Soviet empires.

Russian Revolution of 1905

Until the nineteenth century, Estonian, Latvian, and Lithuanian were spoken by peasants, while the nobility in the Baltic region were Germans in Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania Minor (Lithuania in East Prussia and modern-day Klaipėda), and Poles in Lithuania. The cities of the region were inhabited by Germans, Jews, Poles, and Russians. After “awakening” of national consciousnesses in the nineteenth century based on the standardization of territories in the three Baltic states and the transformation of peasant dialects into literary languages, nationalists opposed Russian and German rulers seeking to impose their languages and traditions in the region.

In January 1905 both nationalist grievances and class conflict boiled into revolution in heavily industrialized Estonia and Latvia, as in other parts of the Russian Empire. In Estonia and Latvia, strikes and mass demonstrations broke out among urban workers, while peasants demanding land reform attacked German landlords in the countryside. In Lithuania violence did not erupt, due to a smaller urban proletariat and less egregious resentment between peasants and their Polish-Lithuanian landlords. However, a Lithuanian Assembly convened in the capital of Vilnius demanded territorial autonomy.

After Tsar Nicholas II conceded to moderate demands, tsarist forces crushed the radical opposition. In the Estonian and Latvian countryside, with the support of Baltic German landlords, the crackdown resulted in violent reprisals. Despite this forceful reaction, the creation of an elected Duma (parliament) and the legalization of political parties provided a critical impetus to political organizing by nationalists in all three Baltic states.

Russian Revolutions of 1917, Russian Civil War, and Independence

During World War I, Germans captured Lithuania and Latvia and began a program to Germanize the population. In the unoccupied Baltic territories, the February Revolution of 1917 initiated a chaotic chain of events. Estonians and Latvians established local governing institutions under the provisional government, seizing power from Baltic Germans, and in some cases calling for independence. In May 1917 Bolsheviks took power in the Latvian provisional government and later in Estonia, following the October Revolution.

The Bolshevik victory was short-lived, as a German offensive occupied the rest of Latvia, and then Estonia, by February of 1918. National assemblies in Estonia and Lithuania declared independence, though these declarations had little practical effect until the German monarchy collapsed in October 1918. The Latvian National Council declared independence in November. The Red Army quickly launched an invasion to regain the lost territories of the empire, but Estonia cut short the attack with assistance from Britain and Finland, and Latvia and Lithuania repelled the Bolsheviks by May after forming a tactical alliance with Germans and White Russians.

In a final round of fighting, Estonian and Latvian forces turned on Baltic German Landeswehr and German Freikorps units in June, precipitating a complete German withdrawal by October 1918. The two new states also seized small strips of territory in Russia where Baltic ethnics resided. Lithuania lost Vilnius to Poland in late 1920, but in 1932 seized the Klaipėda region from Germany.

Interwar Years

In the interwar era from 1918 to 1939 major land reform was instituted in Estonia and Latvia, and to a lesser extent in Lithuania. In December 1924, following two years of worker insurgencies in Estonia, a Soviet-supported military coup was crushed by the government. In 1926 the right-wing military ousted a coalition government that included ethnic minorities and was itself threatened by a number of subsequent coup attempts by various factions. In 1934 right-wing nationalists in Estonia and Latvia opposed to unstable parliamentary governments and popular rule instituted authoritarian rule with little resistance. In all three Baltic states, right-wing authoritarian regimes emerged with fascist overtones.

World War II

The secret protocols to the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact of 1939 between Nazi Germany and Stalinist

Russia turned Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania over to the Soviet "sphere of interest." The Soviets stationed troops in the region under the guise of defense pacts and in June 1940 installed puppet governments assenting to the USSR annexation of the three Baltic states, never recognized by the West.

No armed resistance or popular protests ensued following the occupation. However, nationalization of businesses and collectivization of farms was highly unpopular, and the execution, imprisonment, deportation, or conscription of tens of thousands undermined the legitimacy of the new Soviet regime for many in the Baltic region. Many individuals targeted for deportation escaped and fled to the forests and organized guerilla opposition. As the Germans invaded in June 1941, opponents to Soviet control headed a general uprising attacking retreating Soviet forces, and in Lithuania, targeting Jews, frequently seen as sympathetic to the communists.

Nazi Germany quickly ousted the provisional governments and installed its own puppet regimes with limited resistance aside from difficulty recruiting Balts into their armed forces and war industries. The Lithuanian partisan resistance to Nazi control discouraged many from joining the military. But by 1943, after Nazi Germany began conscription, many dodged this draft or deserted the army. In Estonia some 6,000 joined Finland to fight the Soviets in Karelia. Efforts to recruit police and home defense units proved more successful, and ethnic Estonians, Latvians, and Lithuanians could be found on all sides of a multi-party struggle among Nazis, Soviet partisans, Baltic partisans, and (in Lithuania and the southeastern Latvian province of Latgale) the Polish resistance, known as the Home Army. As members of the German formations, ethnic Balts also took part in the extermination of the region's Jews in the Holocaust.

In its effort to oust the Nazi armies from the region the Soviets reoccupied the Baltic states in 1944, meeting resistance from some nationalist military units joined with the Germans. In Estonia several thousand Estonians returning from Karelia joined the battle on their own territory. As the Soviet occupation was consolidated after German withdrawal, many Balts went into exile. The Soviet territory captured by Estonia and Latvia in 1920 went back to the Russian Republic within the USSR, creating the basis of future border claims. New resistance movements, later called the Forest Brothers, formed, mostly organized and armed in Lithuania, where a Territorial Defense Force disbanded and fled into the forest after the German attempts to incorporate the army into the SS.

The guerilla war reached a height in the late 1940s in response to postwar opposition to collectivization and transfer of several hundred thousand Balts to Siberia and Central Asia. The resistance to the Soviets in each of the Baltic states numbered tens of thousands in a guerilla war with atrocities committed by Soviet police forces and armed opponents. By the mid-1950s, as the West tacitly accepted Soviet occupation and collectivization of the Baltic states and deportations cut guerillas' supply lines in the countryside, the opposition receded.

Under Soviet control, ethnic Russians and other Russian speakers settled in the Baltic states to repopulate areas where Baltic Germans and Jews, and émigré Estonians and Latvians, once lived. By the late 1980s, Russian-speakers constituted 45 percent of the population in Latvia and 35 percent of the population in Estonia. Far fewer Russians migrated to less industrialized Lithuania, which had a higher birthrate, and where Forest Brothers and later the communist leadership of the republic more effectively opposed settlement than Estonia and Latvia.

Baltic Revolutions of 1989 to 1991

As elsewhere in Eastern Europe, dissident movements expanded after the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1968 and the signing of the Helsinki Accords on human rights in 1975. In the Baltic states, anti-Soviet movements were comparatively weaker than the independent states of Eastern Europe. By the late 1970s, Estonian and Latvian opposition expanded and nationalism was on the rise as Russian linguistic and cultural ascendancy expanded.

In 1985, when Mikhail Gorbachev became general secretary of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, and with the introduction of glasnost policies of openness and tolerance, Baltic dissent against the Soviet Union gradually increased, at first among ecological activists in Latvia opposing the building of hydroelectric facilities and a subway in Riga, the country's capital. In Estonia, environmentalists opposed the Soviet dumping of toxic wastes in restricted military zones. By the late 1980s, ecological protests metamorphosed into nationalist movements against the Soviet Union.

In 1987 Latvians initiated the “calendar demonstrations” on symbolically important dates, including Latvian Independence Day, anniversaries of deportations, and the signing of the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact. In April 1987 Estonian nationalists formed a Popular Front to push for autonomy (or “sovereignty”) within the Soviet Union, and over the course of the year similar organizations formed in Latvia and Lithuania, where they were called Sajūdis. In October 1987, following Gorbachev’s proposal to centralize constitutional reforms, calls for independence increased, and the ruling Estonian Supreme Soviet Council passed a declaration of sovereignty.

The Estonian declaration began a slow-motion nationalist movement, where all activists inched forward in incremental steps, hesitant to take dramatic actions. The Baltic nationalists feared provoking violent reactions from the Soviet Union or local Russians. The nationalist movements were supported by Western warnings against the Soviet Union to refrain from violent repression. In mid-1989 the Lithuanian and Latvian Supreme Councils also passed declarations of sovereignty as popular protests continued. The Soviet government belatedly responded to Baltic concerns, calling for greater autonomy for the republics, while the Congress of People’s Deputies, the Soviet parliament, in December recognized the Molotov-Ribbentrop protocols as illegal, though the Gorbachev administration still maintained that Baltic incorporation into the Soviet Union was voluntary.

At the end of 1989 radical nationalists in Estonia and Latvia, who considered the Supreme Councils illegitimate, began organizing elections to parallel legislatures, called Congresses, claiming them as legal successors of the pre-1940 regimes. The organizers of the Congresses conducted voter registration, which included only the descendants of pre-1940 citizens, excluding the majority of Russian-speakers. Initially, many Estonian and Latvian politicians opposed this radical approach. It is notable that many Russian-speakers also expressed support for the Popular Fronts, and even, finally, independence itself, seeing the benefits of cutting the relatively advanced economies of the region from the USSR. Still, from 1989 on, many ethnic Russians joined protests against moves toward independence.

While many saw the declarations of independence and inclusive electoral participation as an effort to expand democracy, some argue that Baltic nationalists initially supported universal citizenship out of fear of Soviet intervention or revolt by Russian-speakers. Once these potential threats vanished, Estonian and Latvian support for granting citizenship to all evaporated, and the Popular Fronts, controlling the Supreme Councils, adopted the restrictive policies of the Congresses.

Estonian and Latvian nationalists viewed excluding citizenship to Russian-speakers as a means of ridding the state of a colonial occupying power. However, Russians born or living in the two countries for decades rejected relegation to non-citizen status. Ethnic Estonians and Latvians insisted that citizenship for all would undermine the legal basis of the newly independent states as the possessors of unbroken sovereignty inherited from the pre-1940 regimes. In contrast, Lithuania, with a small Russian minority, granted citizenship automatically to all inhabitants at independence.

In 1991 the three Baltic republics gained independence with little opposition from the Soviet Union. In Latvia a substantial number of Russian-speakers were not granted citizenship in the new state. In March 1990 in Lithuania a newly elected Supreme Council dominated by Sajūdis issued a surprising declaration of outright independence. In a mild response, Soviet units occupied several Communist Party buildings in Vilnius, and in April the Soviet government imposed sanctions on Lithuania, including on oil. In 1991, after elections, Estonia and Latvia declared de jure independence that would come into effect only after a transitional period. In 1991, after limited and sporadic military operations to block independence in Latvia and Lithuania, the Soviet Union and countries throughout the world recognized the independence and secession of the three Baltic republics.

In the 1990s, Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania successfully transited out of the Soviet orbit and adopted democratic and neoliberal market systems. In Estonia and Latvia the treatment of the non-citizen Russian-speaking minorities has remained a sensitive and uneasy domestic, European, and international matter.

SEE ALSO: Decembrists to the Rise of Russian Marxism; Non-Violent Revolutions; Russia, Revolution of

1905–1907; Russia, Revolution of February/March 1917; Russia, Revolution of October/November 1917; Russia, Revolutions: Sources and Contexts; Russian Civil War, 1918–1924; Soviet Union, Fall of

References and Suggested Readings

- Lane, T. (2001) Lithuania: Stepping Westward. New York: Routledge.
- Lievan, A. (1994) The Baltic Revolution: Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania and the Path to Independence, 2nd ed. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Pabriks, A. & Pürs, A. (2001) Latvia: The Challenges of Change. New York: Routledge.
- Smith, D. J. (2001) Estonia: Independence and European Integration. New York: Routledge.
- Smith, G. (Ed.) (1996) The Baltic States: The National Self-Determination of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania. New York: St. Martin's Press.

Banana Plantation Worker Rebellion, 1928

Andrés Otálvaro H.

In November 1928 a strike broke out in the banana plantation region of Magdalena, Colombia, as almost 30,000 workers and peasants called for better labor and living conditions. The United Fruit Company (UFC) exercised a powerful monopoly over the department of Magdalena, controlling production and commercialization. In support of the UFC the Colombian armed forces perpetrated a massacre in the town of Ciénaga on December 6 in order to repress the rebellion. Around 1,000 workers were killed.

The repression followed the ironically named Heroic Law approved by the government of Miguel Abadía Méndez on October 30, 1928. This law prohibited the right to strike, any action which could incite class struggle, and attacks on private property. The fact was that a profound fear was spreading across different sectors of society and foreign commercial interests: it derived from an international communist “threat,” its recent practical success in the USSR, and domestic socialist expressions. Thus, claims for better labor rights and standards of living were seen as dangerous revolutionary forces led by violent rioters against the public and the economic order.

The strike which broke out on November 12, 1928 was stigmatized as a rebellion against the state, manipulated by the interests of the Revolutionary Socialist Party (RSP), which had been founded in Bogotá in 1926. Actually, some leaders of the RSP influenced events, but their role and engagement were not at all clear. In truth, this massive strike was guided by strong democratic principles and autonomous interests that motivated the protest as a response to the miserable circumstances of the peasants and the workers exploited by the banana conglomerate. The organization of the strike was spontaneous and decentralized, and it relied on the structures of the Magdalenian Labor Union (Unión Sindical de Trabajadores del Magdalena) (USTM), created in 1926, and the participation of numerous committees that were in charge of suspending the harvesting and transportation of crops. These committees also distributed food to the strikers and led negotiations with the company.

Although the ministry of industry sent a delegation to the region, attempting to promote negotiation between both sides, the company never accepted the USTM as legitimate. In addition to this refusal, the UFC always denied the existence of labor contracts with the workers. Due to a juridical stratagem, it exclusively signed indirect contracts with them (using the figure of intermediaries), which reduced considerably its legal responsibilities and deepened the controversy.

The workers' demands were expressed in accordance with Colombian legislation. They included calls for regular and weekly payment of their salaries, recreational and work-free Sundays, an improvement in their living conditions (housing and medical care), social security benefits, and the abolition of vouchers that were only redeemable for merchandise at the company store, as a tender of payment. They were also inspired by a revolutionary spirit, something that could be seen from the posters distributed during the strike. The slogans on the posters accused “American capitalism” and its “imperialist procedures,” and asserted that their resistance was the consequence of the appalling situation of the “exploited” workers and the humiliation of the “proletarian class.”

The modus operandi of the UFC consisted of a huge extraction mechanism based on the Caribbean export economies of Jamaica, Cuba, República Dominicana, Costa Rica, Panamá, Guatemala, Honduras, and Colombia. It was a powerful monopolistic extension of imperial commerce. The tentacles of this multinational “octopus” controlled the socioeconomic needs of the inhabitants of the region and the whole banana production and commercial network that included railroads, telegraph and telephone connections, ports and docks, ownership over vast plantations and vacant lots (due to displacement of peasants), modern systems of irrigation, a big fleet of ships (la Gran Flota Blanca), and markets and clients overseas. The powerful and conservative plantation owners, or hacendados, of Santa Marta were on the side of the UFC; they sold their products to the company and received huge contracts and loans in exchange. The company had over time won important alliances in the local and national governments in order to expand its growing power structure.

On the other side, the liberal hacendados of Ciénaga and Aracataca and some regional traders supported the strike, which continued until December 6, 1928, the tragic day when the strikers gathered near the train station of Ciénaga and waited peacefully for the arrival of the department’s governor, who was going to visit and promote a negotiation. That same night, amid great expectations, they received the news that he was not coming. Almost simultaneously the commandant Carlos Cortez Vargas was empowered by an official decree, allowing him to establish martial law in the region, something he carried out at the cost of hundreds of lives when he gave his troops the order to open fire on the crowd. The number of casualties is still uncertain, but probably exceeded 1,000. Many corpses were thrown into the sea or buried in mass graves with the help of the company. There were no judicial processes after the fact, and those responsible for the massacre were left unpunished.

SEE ALSO: Colombia, Armed Insurgency, Peasant Self-Defense, and Radical Popular Movements, 1960s–1970s; Colombia, Thousand Days’ War, 1899–1922; Colombia, Unions, Strikes, and Anti-Neoliberal Opposition 1990–2005

References and Suggested Readings

- Cortés, V. C. (1929) Los sucesos de las bananeras. Bogotá: Editorial Desarrollo.
- Gaitán, J. E. (1929/1988) El debate sobre las bananeras: cuatro días de verdad contra 40 años de silencio. Bogotá: Editorial Retina.
- García Márquez, G. (1971) Cien años de Soledad. Buenos Aires: Editorial Suramericana.
- Kepler, C. & Soothill, J. H. (1949) El imperio del banano: las compañías bananeras contra la soberanía de las naciones del Caribe. Ciudad de México: Ediciones del Caribe.

- Le Grand, C. (1989) El conflicto de las bananeras. In A. Tirado (Ed.), Nueva Historia de Colombia. Bogotá: Editorial Planeta.

Bangladesh, struggle for liberation, 1971

Muntassir Mamoon and Zarina Rahman Khan

Emergence of Bangali (Bengali) Nationalism

The Bangali nationalist movement gathered strength under the leadership of Bongobondhu (friend of Bengal, a title conferred on him by popular acclaim) Sheikh Mujibur Rahman, chief of the political party the Awami League. The Awami League had been founded as the Awami Muslim League in 1949, but dropped the word “Muslim” in 1955. In the course of the 1960s it became the leading political party in East Pakistan. In 1970 it won the first election to the National Assembly held on the basis of a universal adult franchise, with an overwhelming majority of seats. But the central rulers of West Pakistan refused to hand over power to the elected Bangali leaders. This resulted in a movement against the Pakistanis. The central government retaliated by declaring war against the East Pakistanis on March 25, 1971, unleashing a massive genocide on the Bangalis, forcing large numbers of them to cross the border and take refuge in India. Soon India got involved in the war. On December 16, 1971 the Pakistani army surrendered to the joint Bangladesh-India military forces in Dhaka. East Pakistan became the sovereign state of Bangladesh.

Liberation or Independence?

Some politicians, right-wing parties such as the Jamaat-i-Islami or the Bangladesh Freedom Party, and especially the army, refer to the Liberation War as swadhinata sangram (War of Independence), emphasizing the process of transfer of power from the West Pakistani elite to its eastern Bangali counterpart. The words swadhinata sangram gained currency after 1975, when Sheikh Mujibur Rahman was killed by the army and Lt. General Ziaur Rahman became president. He was propagating a different kind of nationalism known as Bangladeshi nationalism, which has religious connotations (connected to an Islamic identity as well as Bangali).

Political activists and supporters of democratic parties like the Awami League and the Communist Party prefer to use the term mukti yuddho (Liberation War), signifying struggle to achieve democratization of social and political spaces. The difference became clearer when the word sadhinata (independence) started to be used for official purposes during military rule and not in the period of democratic regimes. With repeated bouts of military dictatorship since 1975, the generation born after 1971 have not felt the dual meaning of the term “liberation war” as strongly as did the older generation. The concept of mukti yuddho is much wider than the concept of swadhinata sangram. It is on this point that the perception of the people’s representatives differs from that of the military rulers who were directly or indirectly in power from 1975 to 1990. Since the politicians represent the people, they could understand that liberation was the prime issue. To the military, the immediate issue was the freeing of a particular geographical area from occupation by Pakistani forces.

The dual meaning of the Liberation War does not create as much debate at the grassroots level as it has among the educated elite. To many at the grassroots the year 1971 is also the Year of Unrest. To them, 1971 is the year of turmoil because the Bangalis did not face such conflicts and clashes before, though they had aspired for freedom during long years of accumulated humiliation and repression.

Prelude

After the creation of Pakistan in 1947 the Bangalis discovered that only their master had changed. One part of Pakistan – West Pakistan – became their new colonial rulers. This was evident in a number of ways. For one, they faced disparity in the administration. Until 1968 there were no Bangalis in the positions of secretary, chief of the planning commission, governor of the state bank, or finance minister. Despite the fact that East Pakistan, whose inhabitants were almost all Bangalis, had about 56 percent of the total population of the country, only 20.8 percent in the foreign service were Bangali in 1962. In the defense department, the ratio was 1:25 for soldiers and 1:90 for officers.

There was also disparity in the education and economic sectors. In investment in education in East and West Pakistan between 1947 and 1969, for primary, secondary, colleges, and university the growth rate in West Pakistan was 369 percent, 176 percent, 675 percent, and 425 percent, respectively. And despite the steady growth of population in East Pakistan the respective figures were 4.6 percent, 11.4 percent, 320 percent, and 300 percent (Rahman 1982). Economically, from 1947 to 1955 central government spending in East Pakistan amounted to 10.2 percent. Until 1966 the surplus in trading in East Pakistan was 4924.1 million taka. In West Pakistan there was a deficit of 16,634.6 million taka. The West Pakistan deficit was covered from the surpluses of East Pakistan. Almost 90 percent of the investment in the banking sector of East Pakistan went to West Pakistan (Rahman 1982).

Finally, from the very beginning the central government unleashed a policy of political, cultural, and social disparity and repression on East Pakistanis. At the center, or even in the province, if the opposition won against the rulers in elections they were removed from power on one pretext or another. Arrest and repression were daily events. Socially, the Bangalis were looked down upon. It was held that they were not true Muslims or were Muslims influenced by the Hindus. Any incident of protest was branded as an Indian conspiracy or a threat to Islam. Also, during the conflicts between India and Pakistan from 1947 to 1970, East Pakistan was always kept undefended. There was also an attempt to reject Bangla, the language of the majority, and Bangali culture was termed Hindu culture. All this created frustration and anger in the Bangalis. Their protests were channelled through different movements in 1952, 1954, 1962, 1966, and 1969.

The central government of Pakistan started to use Urdu along with English as the state language without any prior declaration. Urdu was the mother tongue of 3.27 percent of the population and Bangla was the language of 56 percent of the population. This led to the Language movement, which started in 1948 and culminated on February 21, 1952, when police fired on a procession of students and ordinary people, with huge casualties. The Muslim League was completely defeated in the 1954 provincial election. The Jukta (United) Front, formed by a coalition of many political parties following the popular protest since 1952, came to power. The Muslim League never gained popularity in East Bengal or East Pakistan. In 1954 Bangla was given recognition as a national language. The Language movement of 1952, followed by the unleashing of Bangali nationalism, strengthened secular politics by replacing the communal politics of the Muslim League. It is often held that the Language movement inspired the liberation war of Bangladesh.

Democracy in Pakistan was destroyed by the army in 1958, when army chief General Ayub Khan usurped the civil government. The creation of Pakistan had been based on a communal identity without a strong basis in civil society. The armed forces rapidly became the central element in holding together the state, especially because of the opposition of the Punjabi elite that emerged to the autonomy not only of East Pakistan, but also of Baluchistan and the North-West Frontier Province. During Ayub Khan's regime (1958–69) students, particularly from East Pakistan, started a movement against the new constitution promulgated by the military dictator in 1962. Ayub Khan also formed an Education Commission, under the secretary of education S. M. Sharif, to prepare the education policy of Pakistan. Students started the movement against the Sharif Commission in 1962, when it recommended limiting the scope of education, particularly for ordinary or poor people. On September 23, 1962 one student was killed. The report of the commission was withdrawn. But the student unrest continued, and gradually it turned into a political movement.

This political movement was strengthened by a Six Point Demand made by Mujibur Rahman in 1966. In short, it was a demand for the greater autonomy of East Pakistan. Though Sheikh Mujib was arrested immediately, the Six Point Demand laid the basis for the Bangladesh movement later on. To thwart the movement, Ayub Khan started the Agartala Conspiracy Case in 1968, accusing Sheikh Mujib of going to Agartala (capital of Tripura, India) and conspiring with India to create an independent state. It became clear that the central government wanted to suppress Bangali nationalist sentiment, which was gaining momentum. The movement, later known as the Mass Upsurge of 1969, actually started on October 6, 1968 when different political parties organized hartals (general strikes and shutdowns). Gradually, it gathered momentum. Many students, workers, ordinary people, and even an eminent professor at Rajshahi University, Dr. Shamsuzzoha, were killed. Ayub Khan was forced to withdraw the Agartala Conspiracy Case and release Sheikh Mujib in February 1969. The next day a huge reception was accorded to Sheikh Mujib, who became the undisputed leader of the Bangalis. Though Ayub Khan had to resign in 1969 when he rejected all the proposals of the Awami League, martial law was again imposed and army chief General Yahya Khan became president and chief martial law administrator.

Victory of the Awami League: Era of Conflicts and Protests

General Yahya Khan came to power after the fall of Ayub Khan on March 25, 1969 and declared that he would transfer power to directly elected representatives of the people. But in the meantime the military government initiated a process to control politicians. When general elections were held on March 7, 1970 the Awami League won 288 of the 300 provincial seats and 160 of the 162 seats at the center in East Pakistan. Sheikh Mujibur led the Awami League and Zulfikar Ali Bhutto was at the head of the People's Party. Both were regional parties. Almost all seats in East Pakistan were won by the League, while the People's Party won a provincial majority in the Punjab and Sindh.

According to the verdict of the vote, power was to be transferred to Mujibur Rahman, since East Pakistan had a majority of seats in the parliament, but as usual the civil-military establishment in Pakistan delayed the transfer of power. Basically there was an understanding on this between the representative of the military establishment, Yahya, and Bhutto, representing the West Pakistani political establishment. Yahya postponed convening the Assembly scheduled for March 10, 1971, and the Bangalis started to protest these attempts to withhold their due political power. The non-cooperation movement began. Pakistan had not witnessed non-violent non-cooperation on such a massive scale since the time of Gandhi, which made the central government totally ineffective. On March 7 Sheikh Mujibur declared at a huge rally held in Dhaka that this time it was the struggle for freedom. In order to gain time, Yahya and Bhutto came to Dhaka and started a dialogue. But at the same time they started deploying troops in East Pakistan, transported from West Pakistan.

Backlash and War

From March 1 to March 25, 1971 the army opened fire on Bangalis in different places in what appeared to be a closely coordinated effort with the non-Bangalis residing in East Pakistan. The numbers of dead kept mounting. Under these circumstances Yahya, Bhutto, and West Pakistani policy-makers left Dhaka on the night of March 25, leaving orders to the army to continue the attack and kill unarmed Bangalis in what was known as Operation Search Light. At midnight the Pakistani occupation army started the genocide in Dhaka, particularly in Dhaka University. Sheikh Mujibur Rahman was arrested and taken to Pakistan. His arrest could not kill the spirit of the Bongobondhu who passionately declared the independence of Bangladesh. On March 27 Major Ziaur Rahman, making another announcement on behalf of Sheikh Mujibur Rahman from a small radio station in Kalurghat (Chittagong), appealed for international support and solidarity.

The Liberation War started with massive murders in Dhaka by the Pakistan Occupation Army on March 25. Soon the attack spread to other regions as well. The Bangalis started to resist with whatever they had. The Bangali officers and jamans (troops) in the Pakistani army deserted their posts. Police, Ansars, and other paramilitary forces did the same. People from different professions and classes – particularly at the grassroots – joined them. Until the second week of April, resistance took various forms in different places. But by this time the Pakistani army had established its control.

When the genocide started political leaders and the people looking for shelter started to cross borders and take refuge mostly in India. Some also went to Myanmar, but the Myanmar government was not very happy at the arrival of the refugees. On the other hand, the Indian people and government accepted 10 million refugees, assisting them with food, clothing, and shelter. Once in India, Awami League leaders organized themselves, and the leadership was vested in the secretary general, Tajuddin Ahmed. They declared independence on April 10, 1971. On April 17, 1971 the government of the People's Republic of Bangladesh was formed in Baidyanathala in Meherpur of Kushtia district of Bangladesh. Baidyanathala was named Mujibnagar. Bongobondhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman was elected as the president of the republic. In his absence, Vice President Syed Nazrul Islam became acting president. Tajuddin Ahmed became prime minister. Three ministers were also appointed to the Cabinet.

Following this, Bangladesh was divided into 11 sectors and several subsectors for conducting the war and organizing armed resistance. An administrative structure was also set up and Colonel M. A. G. Osmani was appointed commander-in-chief of the military. The Mukti Bahini (liberation army) was formed with the freedom fighters. Its members were divided into regular and irregular forces. The regular forces were formed with the former Bengali members of the Pakistani army and members of the East Pakistan rifles (border forces), who conducted conventional combat with the enemy. The irregular forces were formed with the professionals, students, peasants, laborers, and ordinary people who volunteered to fight for the independence of the country. They were mostly involved in guerrilla warfare. A number of guerilla groups were also formed in the countryside.

Initially, Pakistani forces could establish control only in the cities. For assistance, they formed paramilitary Razakar forces. The Shanti Bahini (peace force) was formed all over the country in order to control the Muktiyoddha and their supporters. And a killer group, the Al-Badr Bahini, was formed by the Pakistan government to annihilate the intellectuals. The members of these forces were primarily from the Jamaati Islam Party, its student wing Chatra Shibir, Muslim League, non-Bangali Mojaher and other right-wing parties that were opposed to the Awami League. The Pakistani military adopted the scorched earth policy known as poramati, and the Al-Badr Bahini, under the command of Jamaat leader Matiur Rahman Nizami, and with the assistance of the Pakistani forces, murdered innumerable Bangali intellectuals and professionals. In nine months the Pakistani forces and their collaborators killed lakh Bangalis and raped lakh women in a massive genocide not seen since World War II.

However, the forces of reaction started facing serious resistance from April-May 1971, and this gradually became stronger. Internationally, the United States, China, Saudi Arabia, and Middle Eastern Muslim countries supported Pakistan. India, the Soviet Union, and the non-aligned nations took the side of Bangladesh. India supported the cause of Bangalis by giving shelter to refugees, providing the Mukti Bahini with arms and necessary training, and helping to influence public opinion worldwide. As a result, ordinary people all over the world built up strong opposition to the Pakistani genocide. The prime minister of India, Indira Gandhi, also played an important role in this. Bangali diplomats in Pakistan's embassies defected and became active with the help of expatriate Bangalis, not only in building public opinion, but also in providing assistance and support to the Bangladesh government.

Pakistan attacked India on the western front on December 3, 1971. On the eastern front the Mukti Bahini and Indian forces formed a mitra bahini (joint command) for conducting the all-out war on this front. On December 14, 1971 the joint forces reached the suburbs of Dhaka and finally entered the city on December 16. On that day Lt. General Abdulla Niazi and 93,000 soldiers of Pakistan Eastern Command surrendered to Lt. General Jagjit Singh Arora of the joint forces at the Dhaka Ramna Race Course.

When Bangladesh became independent on December 16, 1971 there were wide-scale repercussions in West Pakistan. Yahya Khan was forced to relinquish power. With the army discredited, Zulfikar Ali Bhutto took over state power and was forced to release Bongobondhu. It can be said that the Liberation War was completed when Bongobondhu returned on January 10, 1972. However, the coup against Mujibur Rahman in 1975, and subsequent patronage given to Muslim fundamentalists by right-wing forces in Bangladesh, meant the war criminals have not been tried for their genocide.

SEE ALSO: India, Nationalism, Extremist; India, Non-Violent Non-Cooperation Movement, 1918–1929; Indigo Rebellion

References and Suggested Readings

- Mamoon, M. (Ed.) (2005) Muktijudho Kosh (Encyclopedia of the Liberation War), 5 Vols. Dhaka: Somoy.
- Rahman, H. H. (Ed.) (1982) Bangladesher Swadhimota Juddha: Documents (War of Independence of Bangladesh: Documents), Vol. 3. Dhaka: Government of the People's Republic of Bangladesh.

Sur, N. (1982) Chhiattorer Monnontor O Sannyasi-Fakir Bidroho (Famine of '76 and Sannyasi-Fakir Revolt). Kolkata: Subarnarekha.

Umar, B. (2006) The Emergence of Bangladesh, Vol. 2: The Rise of Bengali Nationalism, 1958–1971. New York: Oxford University Press.

Baraka, Imanu Amiri (b. 1934)

Magda Romanska

Amiri Baraka, also known as Imanu Amiri Baraka, a playwright, writer, poet, and one of the leaders of the Black Revolt of the 1960s, was born in Newark, New Jersey, on October 7, 1934, under the name Everett LeRoi Jones. He studied philosophy and religious studies at Rutgers, Columbia, and Howard universities. He joined the US Air Force in 1954, but was discharged after being accused of being a communist sympathizer. Baraka moved to Greenwich Village, where he began writing. In 1964 his play Dutchman won an Obie Award. In 1965, after the assassination of Black Muslim leader Malcolm X, Baraka moved to Harlem and became involved in the Black Nationalism movement. In Harlem, Baraka founded the Black Arts Repertory Theater School, which became an influential breeding ground for talented black artists and writers. Baraka rose to prominence during the Modern Black Convention movement, which began in 1966 with the Black Arts Convention in Detroit and the National Black Power Conference summit in Washington, DC. Under Baraka's leadership, factions of the Black Arts and Black Power movements merged, fostering the politics of black cultural nationalism that began to define the Modern Black Convention movement. Baraka's movement focused on developing a number of organizations that focused on the formation of black nationality, among them, the United Brothers and the Committee For a Unified NewArk (CFUN), the NewArk Student Federation, Unity and Struggle, and a few Jihad publications. In the 1970s the local organizations emerged into the national spotlight, forming the Congress of African People, the African Liberation Support Committee, the National Black Assembly, and the Black Women's United Front. During that time, adding to his own anti-white sentiments, Baraka began using anti-Semitic and anti-gay rhetoric. In 1974 Baraka distanced himself from Black Nationalism and became a Marxist, arguing against the imperialist tendencies of the West. In 1979 he became a lecturer at SUNY–Stony Brook in the Department of African Studies. Although during the 1980s he denounced his former anti-Semitic statements, he continued to refer to himself as anti-Zionist. In 1984 Baraka became a full professor. After the attacks of September 11, 2001, Baraka wrote a poem accusing the Bush administration, together with Israel, of participating in the plot.

SEE ALSO: Black Nationalism, 19th and 20th Centuries; Malcolm X (1925–1965); Marxism

References and Suggested Readings

- Baraka, I. A. (1964) Dutchman and The Slave, Two Plays. New York: Morrow.
- Baraka, I. A. (1969) Four Black Revolutionary Plays, All Praises to The Black Man. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill.
- Baraka, I. A. (1973) Afrikan Revolution: A Poem. Newark, NJ: JIHAD.
- Baraka, I. A. (1997) The Autobiography of LeRoi Jones/Amiri Baraka. Chicago: Lawrence Hill Books.
- Benston, K. W. (1976) Baraka: The Renegade and the Mask. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Brown, L. W. (1980) Amiri Baraka. Boston: Twayne.
- Hudson, T. R. (1973) From LeRoi Jones to Amiri Baraka: The Literary Works. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Woodard, K. (1999) A Nation Within a Nation: Amiri Baraka (LeRoi Jones) and Black Power Politics. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

Barayi, Elijah (1930–1994)

Lucien van der Walt

Born in Lingelihle in the Eastern Cape, South Africa, Barayi joined the Youth League of the African National Congress (ANC) in 1948. The ANC, the country's main African nationalist organization, was adopting an increasingly confrontational position, and developing into a mass-based party. The ANC Youth League, then influenced by Pan-Africanism, and the Communist Party of South Africa (CPSA), played an important role in the organization's revival and growing militancy. Barayi worked as a government clerk, and joined the Youth League following a racial clash with white youths. He was active in the 1950s civil disobedience campaigns of the Congress Alliance, comprising the ANC, the Colored Peoples Congress, the (White) Congress of Democrats, the Indian National Congress, and, from 1955, the South African Congress of Trade Unions (SACTU). Arrested during the 1952 Defiance Campaign, he was jailed for a month in Cradock, and he was among those arrested in the state of emergency declared in the aftermath of the Sharpeville massacre of March 21, 1960, and held for four months.

Following his release he moved to the Witwatersrand where he worked as a mine clerk, mainly in the Brakpan and Carletonville areas. He was a founder member of the National Union of Mineworkers (NUM), formed in 1982, and its vice-president until his death. The NUM was a successor to the African Mineworkers' Union formed in 1930 by S. P. Bunting and T. W. Thibedi; the NUM claimed 110,000 members by 1984 (Baskin 1991), and helped establish the Congress of South African Trades Unions (COSATU) in 1985. Barayi was COSATU president until 1991, and notable for his strong stand against apartheid, and played an important role in aligning the NUM to then-underground ANC. Barayi was involved in the 1987 NUM strike – this was the biggest single industry-wide strike in South Africa to that date, but defeated – and in the civil disobedience and union campaigns of the late 1980s. The ANC was legalized in 1990, and Barayi was a candidate on its list of election candidates for the first all-race election in April 1994, but died in January that year.

SEE ALSO: COSATU (Congress of South African Trade Unions); South Africa, Labor Movement

References and Suggested Readings

- Baskin, J. (1991) Striking Back: A History of COSATU. Johannesburg: Ravan Press.
- New York Times* (2006) Elijah Barayi, African Nationalist, 63. November 9.
- National Union of Mineworkers (n.d.) Tribute to the Late Comrade Elijah Barayi, Former NUM Vice President. National Union of Mineworkers website. Available at www.num.org.za/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=38&Itemid=77#two (downloaded November 1, 2006).

Barbados and the Windward Islands, protest and revolt

Jennifer Westmoreland Bouchard

The Windward Islands are located in the southeastern portion of the West Indies. Their name comes from the fact that they are in the path of the northeast trade winds. The Windward Islands include Dominica, Martinique, St. Lucia, Grenada, St. Vincent, and the Grenadines. Barbados is also in this region. Each of these islands gained independence from its colonizing power (France, Spain, or Great Britain) at different times after 1962; however, the histories of resistance concerning both the emancipation of slaves and decolonization in these islands are closely related. The focus here will be on forms of resistance related to emancipation and decolonization of the Anglophone islands of Dominica, St. Lucia, Grenada, St. Vincent, and Barbados.

To understand the processes of emancipation and decolonization in these islands, one must first have a sense of the colonial system and the practice of European domination in general. Complete economic, political, and to a certain extent physical control is inherent in both slavery and colonialism. There is, from the slave or the native island inhabitant's standpoint, a total lack of control over one's own freedom, or, on a larger scale, the community or country's development. Thus, exploitation of both resources and labor and widespread human rights injustices were the norm in the former British colonies. The processes of emancipation, liberation, and eventual decolonization in these islands necessitated a unification of the African and Creole peoples and a complete, yet gradual, reconfiguration of power.

This complex power dynamic gave way to myriad manifestations of protest and revolt, beginning with slave revolts in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, most notably the 1674 revolt in Barbados and the 1796 revolt in St. Lucia. Historian Eugene Genovese describes the ideological impetus behind these early uprisings as a search to restore an African past through cultural or religious rituals. Religious practices were an effective way of staging ongoing, smaller-scale rebellions. Often, slave owners did not understand, or were wary of, these "exotic" manifestations. Religion not only gave the slaves a set of ideals and practices around which to rally, but also provided a forum for continual, and at times subversive, resistance. Individually, many slaves revolted on a smaller scale by deliberately ruining farming equipment, feigning illness to reduce productivity, and running away from their masters. This was especially prevalent in Barbados, where these runaways established settlements in the interior of the island.

These first revolts provided a sense of solidarity that laid the ideological foundations for later rebellions in which Creoles and Africans banded together in an attempt to overturn slavery as a social system. Emancipation from slavery in most Caribbean islands was achieved between 1820 and 1840. The granting of freedom to slaves was, in many islands, simply a political gesture. Between 1838 and 1865, a period referred to by historians as the immediate post-emancipation era, the patterns and rituals of power between the formerly enslaved and their owners persisted. Gross injustices were committed against newly emancipated slaves who were treated as second-class citizens at best. For the majority of the formerly enslaved African population in the Windward Islands, working conditions continued to be unrelentingly harsh. In addition, they were given very few opportunities to purchase and farm their own land. As a result, a majority of the newly emancipated slaves were forced to stay and work on the plantations for meager wages. By 1896, this negative trend had led to widespread social unrest and serious economic difficulties.

The next intense round of uprisings began in the 1930s for most of these Anglophone islands. Historians typically divide the decolonization period in the Anglophone Caribbean into three phases. From the 1920s to 1930s, there was a series of protests by the Afro-Caribbean and Creole communities, spawned by unfair labor and social conditions. Eventually, these protests gave way to a slow movement toward a more equal government system in which those other than the European dominators were represented. However, even with these gradual changes, it was clear that colonization and the governmental systems it engendered would continue. Between 1934 and 1962, a series of labor rebellions precipitated the process of constitutional decolonization. In the context of the Anglophone Caribbean, constitutional development, synonymous with constitutional advancement, is the process in which constitutional elements are changed, thus allowing local citizens more legal rights and the ability to run their country. Thanks to the labor rebellions and other social disturbances, many such reforms were made to the constitutions of each island. In the Windward Islands, primary reforms included those to allow greater adult suffrage, as well as changes to the Committee System and the Ministerial System. In addition, the Executive Council was transformed into a Council of Ministers, representative of more ethnic groups from each of the islands. These and other systems were established to allow full internal self-governance that would eventually lead to independence from Britain. In 1958, the British colonies throughout the West Indies were encouraged by Britain to form a federation. They did so, and the federation failed shortly thereafter in 1962. This failure instigated the movement toward individual independence for each of the British colonies. Finally, between 1962 and 1980, the majority of Anglophone Caribbean islands, including those among the Windward Islands and Barbados, became independent. Barbados gained independence in 1966, followed by Grenada in 1974, Dominica in 1978, and St. Lucia and St. Vincent in 1979.

SEE ALSO: Bussa (d. 1816) and the Barbados Slave Insurrection; Caribbean Islands, Protests against IMF; Haitian Revolution and Independence, 1801–1804; Jamaica, Independence Movement, 1950–Present; Trinidad, Anti-Colonial Movement

References and Suggested Readings

- Anstey, R. (1975) The Atlantic Slave Trade and British Abolition, 1760–1810. London: Macmillan.
- Bolland, O. N. (2006) Historiography of Decolonization in the Anglophone Caribbean. In J. De Barros, A. A. Diptee, & D. V. Trotman (Eds.), Beyond Fragmentation: Perspectives on Caribbean History. Princeton: Marcus Wiene, pp. 265–96.
- Cox-Alomar, R. (2004) Revisiting the Transatlantic Triangle: The Decolonisation of the British Caribbean in Light of the Anglo-American Special Relationship. Diplomacy and Statecraft 15 (2): 353–73.
- Farrel, T. (1983) Decolonization in the English-Speaking Caribbean: Myth or Reality? In P. Henry & C. Stone (Eds.), The Newer Caribbean. Philadelphia: Institute for the Study of Human Issues, pp. 3–12.
- Nesbitt, N. (2007) Departmentalization and the Logic of Decolonization. L'Esprit Créateur 47 (1).

Taylor, P. (1993) Narrative, Pluralism, and Decolonization: Recent Caribbean Literature. College Literature 20.

Barcelona General Strike, 1919

Summer D. Leibensperger

The Barcelona General Strike of 1919 was sparked when workers at an electric plant were fired for political reasons. The National Confederation of Workers (Confederación Nacional del Trabajo, CNT), led by Salvador Seguí, called for a general strike after initial negotiations failed. The workers were at first successful (winning an eight-hour workday), and the general strike ended in less than a month, but the situation deteriorated dramatically as the military (philosophically in line with the bourgeoisie) defied civilian authorities, setting off additional strikes and a wave of violence.

In 1919, an oppressive Spanish government faced a constitutional crisis: Catalan separatists were arguing for autonomy, and economic conditions were strained in the post-world war society. Workers across the world were trying to gain improved working conditions, better pay, and legitimacy for their unions through general labor strikes, and the Bolshevik Revolution was viewed as a success of working-class action. During this time in Catalonia (the capital of which is Barcelona), the CNT, an anarchosyndicalist union formed in an October 1910 meeting of trade unionists, gained in strength (in membership and effectiveness).

When the eight workers at the electric power plant La Canadiense were dismissed in February 1919, CNT's leadership leapt into action: by the end of February, the majority of the plant workers were striking, and the city lost power. The strike escalated when workers from other industries joined La Canadiense's workers. The captain-general of Barcelona, Milans del Bosch, initially pushed the Conde de Romanones (then prime minister) to draft workers into the army to force an end to the strike and later to declare martial law in the city. When the call to arms failed (because workers ignored it), some workers were confined to military barracks.

While their motives for striking varied, most strikers wanted an eight-hour workday, union recognition, reinstatement of fired workers, and/or wage increases. Some also demanded the release of political prisoners (many of whom were strikers). Government officials sent by Romanones negotiated with CNT, planning to concede to these demands, but army officials were furious at the government's negotiations, seeing them as conceding to anarchism, and refused to release a number of prisoners.

That refusal sparked a general strike that began on March 24 and ended in early April. The situation worsened after Romanones resigned on April 14. In the months that followed, workers went through a pattern of working and striking (to obtain better pay or improved conditions), and employers exploited the situation: workers (especially union activists) were often fired or were victims of lock-outs or blacklists, even when employers had agreed that workers could come back to work. This duplicity, in turn, increased tensions, often leading to the next strike.

Beginning in December 1919, the more militant factions within the CNT began to increase violence against employers and the police, and the situation worsened after General Martínez Anido was appointed civil governor in 1920. CNT members were terrorized using illegal means: assassinations of unionists were ordered; unionists responded in kind. Oliveira (1972: 182) describes the time period from 1918 to 1923: "law suffered a total eclipse, delinquency was put down with delinquency, political crime with political crime. Darkness closed over Barcelona and blotted it out."

The strike allowed the military to demonstrate its power, enabled the bourgeoisie to consolidate its power, and shifted focus from the movement for Catalan autonomy. Miguel Primo de Rivera dissolved the CNT in May 1924, although it continued to operate underground and reemerged in the 1930s when de Rivera's dictatorship fell.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism, Spain; Anarchosyndicalism; Bakunin, Mikhail Alexandrovich (1814–1876); Catalan Protests against Centralism; Confederación Nacional del Trabajo (CNT); Spanish Revolution

References and Suggested Readings

- Brenan, G. (1950) The Spanish Labyrinth: An Account of the Social and Political Background of the Civil War. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Oliveira, A. R. (1972) Politics, Economics, and Men of Modern Spain, 1808–1946. New York: Arno Press.

Peirats, J. & Ealham, C. (2001) The CNT in the Spanish Revolution. Hastings: Meltzer Press.

Smith, A. (2007) Anarchism, Revolution, and Reaction: Catalan Labour and the Crisis of the Spanish State, 1898–1923. New York: Berghahn.

Barzani, Mulla Mustafa (1903–1979)

Deniz Ekici

Mulla Mustafa Barzani was a Kurdish leader who became the symbol of the twentieth-century Kurdish nationalist movement. Barzani inspired a sense of pride not only among Iraqi Kurds but also among the Kurds of Turkey, Iran, Syria, and the Kurds in diaspora, which is how he became a national leader. With his dedication to the Kurdish freedom movement, Barzani led the Kurds in an armed struggle for over five decades against Iraqi and Iranian states. However, because of the feudal structure of Kurdistan, different tribal affiliations, and intertribal rivalries the Barzani-led Kurdish movement could not develop into a unified national struggle.

Barzani and his mother were detained in Mosul Prison in 1906, after an uprising against the Ottomans led by his older brother Sheikh Abdul Salam II, who was later executed. In 1919, at age 16, Barzani joined Sheikh Mahmud Berzenci's rebellion and led a force of 300 men. Sheikh Mahmud and Barzani withdrew to the mountains after the British brigades crushed the rebellion.

In 1931 Barzani and his older brother, Sheikh Ahmad, led a rebellion against the British after they settled with the Assyrians in the Barzan region, a move that was interpreted as a British extension of influence. With the help of the Iraqi government, the British quelled the rebellion as planes dropped bombs on the region to isolate the Kurdish forces. After the uprising was finally defeated in the summer of 1932, Barzani and Sheikh Ahmad fled to Turkey where they were captured and handed over to the Iraqi authorities. The Barzani family was eventually exiled to Nasiriya and later to Sulaimania, where they stayed under house arrest. In the summer of 1943 Mulla Mustafa Barzani escaped from Sulaimania and returned to the Barzan region after gaining assistance from the Partî Hîwa (Party of Hope). In the Barzan region he led a number of armed clashes against the government and pro-government Kurdish tribes. In 1943–5 Barzani conducted a successful campaign with some Kurdish factions including the Partî Hîwa in which the Iraqi army, backed by British air forces, carried out heavy attacks on Kurdish peshmergas (freedom fighters). In October 1945, after Barzani was hemmed in by the Iraqi forces, he was forced to cross the Iranian border with many of his fighters.

In Iranian Kurdistan, Barzani supported the short-lived Mahabad Republic of Kurdistan under the president, Qadi Muhammed. The forces of General Mulla Mustafa Barzani soon became a source of strength and confidence for the Kurdish state. Because they were deemed “outsiders,” the Barzani faction provoked rivalries among Kurdish tribes in the region, especially among the Mamish and Mangurs. In August 1946 Barzani became the leader of the Partî Demokratî Kurdistan-Îraq or Kurdistan Democratic Party, an extension of the Partî Demokratî Kurdistan-Îran.

When the Mahabad Republic collapsed in 1946 Barzani crossed the Soviet border with his 1,000 peshmergas and stayed there until 1958, when Colonel Abd al Karim Qasim carried out a successful coup d'état against the Hashemite monarchy. After the coup, amnesty was granted to the Kurds involved in the 1943–5 rebellion, which allowed those in exile to return home. After Barzani sent telegrams to Qasim and the Council of Sovereignty offering his congratulations the new government invited him and his peshmergas back to Iraq.

At first, friendly relations were established with the Qasim government, but when reconciliation with the Kurds began to deteriorate in 1961, Barzani would emerge as the formidable political power in the region. Barzani revolted against the Qasim government, demanding official and extensive autonomy. Qasim secured the support of pro-government Kurdish tribes and took military action against Barzani. Conflict between the two forces would continue for years, with Barzani taking control of most of Iraqi Kurdistan. Under Barzani, the Iraqi Kurds would enjoy a de facto independence until the Baa'th Party came to power in 1968 by means of a coup. In 1970 a peace agreement was signed that recognized the Kurds as equal partners in the Iraqi state. However, when the Baa'th Party failed to uphold the treaty, Barzani once again took up arms in March 1974, this time with the support of Iran and the United States.

In 1975 the United States and Iran withdrew their support and the Kurdish national movement was defeated again. Barzani retreated to Iran with a few thousands of his followers. In 1979 Barzani traveled to the United States to receive medical treatment, where he died on March 1 in Washington, DC. The Kurdish leader was later transported and buried in the town of Barzan where he was born.

SEE ALSO: Kurdistan Nationalist Movement and the PKK (Kurdistan Workers' Party)

References and Suggested Readings

- Barzani, M. & Ferhadi, A. (Eds.) (2004) Mustafa Barzani and the Kurdish Liberation Movement. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Brifkani, Abd al-Qadir (2000) Mustafa Barzani: Leader of the Modern Kurdish Nationalist Movement. London: Kegan Paul International.

Bastille

Nicole Martone

The Bastille was a prison located in eastern Paris that held political prisoners during the ancien régime in France. Widely regarded as a fearful symbol of aristocratic corruption and oppression, the Bastille emerged as a focal point of popular discontent when, on July 14, 1789, commoners stormed the old fortress, thus igniting a major insurrection that launched the French Revolution.

The Bastille was constructed from 1370 to 1383 as a fortress to provide protection for Paris. During the reign of Charles VI (1380–1422), the Bastille became a prison, primarily intended to hold political prisoners and spies, but also religious prisoners, heretics, and freethinking writers who threatened the government. Those held captive within the Bastille included the unknown Man in the Iron Mask, Voltaire, and the Marquis de Sade. It was also immortalized in Charles Dickens' Tale of Two Cities.

During the rule of the house of Bourbon in France, beginning in the sixteenth century, the Bastille began to be perceived as a symbol of injustice. Many of the prisoners within the Bastille were arrested under lettres de cachet, which were royal warrants containing direct orders from the king, usually to enforce arbitrary judgments that could not be appealed. Those arrested under lettres de cachet were sentenced without a trial or even an opportunity to plead for mercy. Frequently, the wealthy who enjoyed the king's favor would purchase lettres de cachet to dispose of rivals. Such arrests and imprisonments consequently became symbolic of the corruption and inequality of the Old Regime, and fed the perception that those confined within the Bastille were innocent.

A confrontation between the people and the royal government intensified during 1788 and erupted into the open in July 1789. On July 14, following several days of disturbances in Paris, a crowd of about 1,000 gathered to demand the surrender of the Bastille, which by then contained only seven prisoners and was being used primarily as an armory. The crowd's main objective was to seize the fortress's guns and ammunition to arm a militia. The Bastille was under the governorship of Bernard René de Launay and protected by a force of about 80 veteran soldiers who had been wounded or were otherwise unfit for regular duty, and a detachment of 32 Swiss mercenary grenadiers.

The governor opened negotiations with representatives of the crowd. Frustrated with the slow process of negotiation, the crowd broke into the prison's outer courtyard and cut the chains on the drawbridge to the inner courtyard. The Bastille's defenders opened fire, but the attackers were reinforced by mutinous members of the French Guard of the Royal Army, armed with cannons. De Launay surrendered and the crowd stormed the fortress, freeing its prisoners and carrying off its supplies. De Launay was dragged toward the Hôtel de Ville (city hall) and killed en route. Members of the French Guard attempted to protect the Swiss grenadiers and soldiers charged with the Bastille's defense, but several of de Launay's officers were killed nonetheless.

The storming of the Bastille has been mythologized as the founding event of the First Republic. Its propaganda value was recognized even in 1789, when entrepreneur Pierre François Palloy began demolishing the old structure to accentuate the destruction that occurred on July 14. He turned it into a museum where visitors paid a fee and could purchase mementos. Today, nothing remains of the original structure, although its outline has been etched into the pavement. The area where it stood has been named the Place de la Bastille and Paris's modern opera house, the Opéra Bastille, occupies the site.

French governmental leaders of the Third Republic (1870–1940), attempting to portray themselves as the legitimate heirs of the Republicanism of the French Revolution, created a new national holiday to commemorate the storming of the Bastille. July 14 has been celebrated as Bastille Day throughout France since 1890.

SEE ALSO: French Revolution, 1789–1794; Hôtel de Ville, Paris; Mirabeau, Comte de (1749–1791); Sans-Culottes

References and Suggested Readings

- Fitzsimmons, M. P. (2002) The Night the Old Regime Ended: August 4, 1789 and the French Revolution. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press.
- Ross, S. (2001) The Fall of the Bastille: Revolution in France. Oxford: Heinemann Library.
- Shapiro, B. M. (2002) Revolutionary Justice in Paris, 1789–1790. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Bauer, Otto (1881–1938)

Robert Goodrich

Otto Bauer emerged as the most eminent of the Austro-Marxist theoreticians and as leader of the Social Democratic Workers' Party of Austria (SDAPÖ) during the First Republic (1918–34). Born into a wealthy Jewish Viennese textile manufacturing family, Bauer joined the SDAPÖ in 1900 and graduated from the University of Vienna in 1906 in law. Active in the student socialist movement, he met K. Renner, M. Adler, R. Hilferding, and others, who formed the nucleus of Austro-Marxism. By 1907 Bauer was already a rising star, and became the head of the SDAPÖ following V. Adler's death in 1918. The Austro-Fascist coup of 1933 and the subsequent socialist uprising in 1934 led to his exile, from where he organized the socialist opposition. He died from a heart attack in Paris and was buried in Pere Lachaise cemetery.

Bauer's contributions to Marxism confronted the rapidly changing political contexts of central Europe and the revisionist debates within the Second International. Bauer sought to liberate Marxism from the sweeping generalizations and increasingly doctrinaire categories of both Vulgar Marxism and revisionism and stressed that Marxism “should not be a schema that controls us, but rather only a method that we control” (Bauer 1975–80, 7: 938). Consequently, Bauer was one of the first to argue that Marxism was not a philosophy but instead an empirical social science, and thus compatible with all philosophical directions.

Bauer immediately applied his methodological insights to the pressing issues of the day. His The Nationalities Question and the Social Democracy (1907) led to immediate controversy in its support of national self-determination and emphasis on the cultural rather than economic origins of national identities and formation. Bauer thus formulated a non-territorial and associative notion of national organization based on the “personal principle.”

Bauer also led the Austro-Marxist attempt to negotiate a “third way” between reformist social democracy and revolutionary communism as part of the left socialist movement. In a series of articles in the early 1920s, including Bolshevism or Social Democracy? (1920) and The New Course of Soviet Russia (1921), Bauer supported the Russian Revolution yet questioned its socialist nature and opposed its suitability for Western conditions. His stance led him to co-found the International Working Union of Socialist Parties, or Vienna International (derisively dubbed the 2½ International by K. Radek).

Further, under the influence of the Neo-classical Austrian School, or Marginalists, Bauer consciously sought to engage non-Marxist economic analyses. He rejected Kautsky’s agrarian policy and his Accumulation of Capital (1912) involved one of the first comprehensive critiques of Das Kapital, which had only been published in full form in 1909. Unlike many revisionists, Bauer responded to the rise of fascism in 1936 with a new theory of capitalist “breakdown” arising from underconsumption.

Bauer was also an active politician. Under the Austrian Republic, Bauer regarded Austro-Marxism as a means of preventing the split between communists and socialists and shepherded the internationally recognized success of municipal socialism in “Red Vienna.” Based on these experiences, Bauer’s The Austrian Revolution (1923) laid the foundation for left socialism in practice and was adopted in the Linzer Program in 1926. While exiled, Bauer published Between the Two Wars? (1936), regarded as his political testament, in which he developed the concept of “integral socialism” as a guide for joint communist–socialist anti-fascist and anti-war activity.

SEE ALSO: Austro-Marxism; Germany, Socialism and Nationalism; International Socialism: Mass Politics; Internationals; Kautsky, Karl (1854–1938); Marxism; Socialism; West German “New Left”

References and Suggested Readings

- Albers, D., Hindels, J., & Radice, L. (1979) Otto Bauer und der “dritte” Weg. Die Wiederentdeckung des Austromarxismus durch Linksozialisten und Eurokommunisten. Frankfurt am Main: Campus.
- Albers, D. et al. (Eds.) (1985) Otto Bauer. Theorie und Politik. Berlin: Argument.
- Bauer, O. (1975–80) Werkausgabe, 9 vols. Vienna: Europa.
- Klein, H. (1994) Otto Bauers Gesellschaftsidee für eine bessere Welt. Leipzig: Leipziger Gesellschaft für Politik und Zeitgeschichte.
- Leichter, O. (1970) Otto Bauer. Tragödie oder Triumph? Vienna: Europa.
- Löw, R. (1980) Otto Bauer und die Russische Revolution. Vienna: Europa.

Beauvoir, Simone de (1908–1986)

Nichole Shippen

Simone de Beauvoir, French existentialist, novelist, autobiographer, journalist, and self-described “woman of letters,” is considered one of the founding thinkers of Western feminism. Predominantly known for what many now consider a canonical text in feminist theory, The Second Sex (1949), Beauvoir dramatically influenced what came to be known as Second Wave feminism by disrupting traditional understandings of sex, gender, and identity.

In her most famous line from The Second Sex, “One is not born, but rather becomes, a woman,” Beauvoir contests the “biology is destiny” argument historically used to justify women’s economic, political, and social subordination. Drawing on existentialism and Marxism, Beauvoir illuminates the historical and material constraints surrounding women’s “situation” in a patriarchal society. She reveals not only how patriarchy oppresses women, but also how women are sometimes complicit in their own oppression by a refusal to exercise freedom outside the prescribed boundaries of gender roles. By confronting the sexism prevalent within psychology and within the hard sciences of her time, she recognizes the signifier “woman” as a historical and thus not a universal or essential category. Thus she departs from her long-term intellectual interlocutor and partner Jean-Paul Sartre’s early attempts to posit existentialist categories of freedom and choice as independent of an individual’s social constraints. In contrast, Beauvoir makes a distinction between the freedom of an individual and an individual’s limited ability to exercise that freedom. The line she draws remains ambiguous and controversial as some accuse Beauvoir of identifying freedom with an overly masculinized notion of freedom.

The two main arguments she puts forth in this text are the idea that the category “woman” is socially constructed and the contention that women have historically been designated, in Hegelian terms, as man’s absolute “Other.” However, Beauvoir does not simply translate Hegel’s master/slave dialectic into man as master and woman as slave. Instead, she creates a more novel adaptation of the dialectic. In Hegel, the struggle for one’s “consciousness,” or the conception of one’s identity, must necessarily end in the death of another’s consciousness. In Beauvoir’s interpretation of the master/slave dialectic, the struggle for consciousness does not end in the death of either actor’s consciousness. Rather, Beauvoir leaves open the possibility for “reciprocity” or the mutual recognition of one another’s humanity. Beauvoir first formulates her philosophical categories in Pyrrhus et Cinéas (1944) and in Pour une morale de l’ambiguïté (1947), translated as The Ethics of Ambiguity (1994).

Beauvoir’s literature also reflects her philosophical interests. Highly autobiographical and regarded by many critics as thinly disguised, Beauvoir’s The Mandarins (1954) describes the aftermath of the French Resistance following the withdrawal of Germany. Awarded the Prix Goncourt in 1954, The Mandarins is an exercise in existentialist thought describing the varying situations confronted by the characters involved in the French Resistance post-liberation. Individuals, for example, face the decision of how to handle French citizens who collaborated with the Nazis. The author illustrates other themes by relating the plight of a woman who finds herself exercising bad faith by refusing to recognize her inherent freedom outside of a relationship that has long since ended.

Beauvoir’s autobiographies include Memoirs of a Dutiful Daughter (1958), the first volume, which extends from her childhood to her meeting Sartre; The Prime of Life (1960), the second volume, which picks up from her meeting Sartre and continues to the end of World War II; and Force of Circumstances (1963), the third volume, which includes her affair with American novelist Nelson Algren (also described in The Mandarins) and her and Sartre’s emergence as public figures. A Very Easy Death (1964) is an account of her mother, Françoise de Beauvoir’s death from intestinal cancer in 1963.

The prolific philosophical, literary, and autobiographical works of Beauvoir are a testament to the lives and works of her intellectual circle, including Sartre, Albert Camus, and Maurice Merleau-Ponty. There is little doubt of Beauvoir’s influence on French existential thought despite the fact that she is often not given the credit she deserves for her efforts. Some critics claim Beauvoir is little more than a mouthpiece for Sartre’s existentialism. This analysis fails to address the theoretical challenges Beauvoir’s work poses to Sartre’s work or the ways in which she fundamentally revises original theoretical terms such as the category of the “Other” through a gendered lens.

From the 1970s until her death, Beauvoir was an ardent feminist activist. She fought for women’s rights in Algeria during the Algerian War for Independence (1954–62); campaigned for free contraception and abortion, which was legalized in 1974 for a 5-year trial period and made permanent in 1979; and fought for equal pay for equal work and a fairer redistribution of domestic chores in the household. The Second Sex continues to inform a wide range of thinkers ranging from the early radical feminists to postmodernist queer feminists such as Judith Butler.

SEE ALSO: Sartre, Jean-Paul (1905–1980)

References and Suggested Readings

- Bair, D. (1990) Simone de Beauvoir: A Biography. New York: Summit Books.
- Bauer, N. (2001) Simone de Beauvoir, Philosophy, and Feminism. New York: Columbia University Press.

Grosholz, E. R. (Ed.) (2004) The Legacy of Simone de Beauvoir. Oxford: Clarendon Press.

Tidd, U. (2004) Simone de Beauvoir. New York: Routledge.

Beethoven, Ludwig van (1770–1827)

Walter R. Herscher

Ludwig van Beethoven was a revolutionary nineteenth-century German composer of classical and romantic music. Born in Bonn, Germany, Beethoven moved to Vienna, Austria, while in his teens. Living in Vienna during Emperor Joseph II's reforms, Beethoven often discussed liberal ideas, including those of the French Revolution, but his friendship with aristocrats, who were also needed as patrons, probably softened his politics. He espoused liberal ideas while accepting aristocratic patronage, and he remained friends with individual aristocrats while criticizing the aristocracy.

Politically liberal but never a political revolutionary, these contradictions never troubled him. In 1793 his writing praised the love of freedom above all. Yet in 1802, as the political current changed, he refused to write a sonata containing references to the French Revolution. Indeed, he avoided obvious political overtones in his music. In his opera Prometheus he portrayed Prometheus as an Enlightenment philosopher dispensing knowledge rather than as the rebel Titan who stole fire to aid humankind. This approach made the opera more palatable to Austrian censors, yet the audience still identified Prometheus' heroic act with rebellion and freedom. Similarly, though he admired Napoleon Bonaparte's reforms as First Consul of France and planned to name his third symphony for him, after Bonaparte proclaimed himself emperor, Beethoven crossed out "Bonaparte" on the title page and substituted "to the memory of a great man." This symphony became known as the Sinfonia Eroica (Heroic Symphony).

As French armies spread across Europe, Beethoven composed operas promoting the human spirit and individual liberty. Leonore (rewritten as Fidelio) depicted a prisoner unjustly incarcerated. Egnont (written while Austria was under French control) praised a Flemish hero who had led an unsuccessful revolt against Spanish tyranny; however, the implicit message was that freedom would eventually triumph. The nascent nationalism spread by French armies affected him, and in 1817 he announced that he would thereafter annotate some music in German instead of the traditional Italian.

The French Revolution and Napoleon had raised liberal hopes. These hopes were exploited in pledges made by monarchs seeking their subjects' support against Napoleon. However, liberals became disillusioned as the restored regimes grew increasingly conservative. Austria's ultra-conservative government especially disappointed Beethoven. He made many private references to politics and censorship, and after Napoleon's death admitted that perhaps he had been wrong to condemn the leader so harshly. In 1821–4 he wrote music for the German poet Friedrich von Schiller's Ode to Joy and incorporated it into the climax of his ninth symphony, thus creating what has become an anthem for universal freedom. He continued to complain privately of political injustices until his death in 1827.

During his life, Beethoven was recognized as a musical revolutionary, and later generations have sought the political aspect in his music. During World War II the French Resistance utilized the fifth symphony's famous opening theme to symbolize victory because it spelled the letter "V" in Morse code. Before the collapse of communism, East Germans used his music as rallying symbols, and when the Berlin Wall fell, celebrations ended with a performance of his ninth symphony.

SEE ALSO: Bonaparte, Napoleon (1769–1821); French Revolution, 1789–1794

References and Suggested Readings

- Cooper, B. (2000) Beethoven. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Forbes, E. (Ed.) (1967) Thayer's Life of Beethoven, 2 vols. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Johnson, S. (1997) Ludwig van Beethoven: An Essential Guide to His Life and Works. London: Pavilion Books.
- Kerman, J. & Tyson, A. (1983) The New Grove Beethoven. New York: W. W. Norton.
- Knight, F. (1973) Beethoven and the Age of Revolution. New York: International Publishers.
- Lockwood, L. (2003) Beethoven: The Music and the Life. New York: W. W. Norton.
- Solomon, M. (1998) Beethoven, 2nd ed. New York: Schirmer Books.

Begin, Menachem (1913–1992) and the Irgun

Lawrence Davidson

Menachem Begin was born in the Polish city of Brest–Litovsk in 1913. He was the youngest of three children and, like his lifelong rival David Ben-Gurion, he was born into a family with strong Zionist leanings. He was educated in a Mizrahi Hebrew school, a Polish gymnasium (high school) and later, in 1935, he obtained a law degree from the University of Warsaw. While still young, Begin became a follower of Vladimir Jabotinsky's Revisionist Zionist movement which sought the immediate founding of a Jewish state in Palestine by violent means if necessary. Begin joined the Revisionist youth movement organization Betar at 16, worked for it full time after graduation, and became its leader in Poland by 1939. During this time he encouraged thousands of young Polish Jews to move to Palestine.

When the Nazis moved into Poland in 1939 Begin fled to Vilna (then controlled by the Soviet Union). There he was arrested in 1940 by the Soviets for Zionist activity and sentenced to eight years of prison in Siberia. He was in Siberia for over a year (he would subsequently write a book about this time of imprisonment entitled White Nights) when he was recruited, along with other Polish prisoners, into a newly formed Free Polish Army to fight the Nazis. It was as a member of this Polish Army that he found his way to Palestine in 1942. His parents and one older brother remained trapped in Poland and perished in the ensuing Holocaust.

Soon after arriving in Palestine, Begin joined the main Revisionist Zionist militia, the Irgun Tzevai Leumi (National Military Organization). The Irgun, which had been formed in the early 1930s, was a product of a split in the main Zionist defense militia, the Haganah. The "rules of engagement" for the Haganah, set by the Jewish Agency and its leader David Ben-Gurion, were basically defensive. There was, at this point, to be no retaliation against Palestinian civilians for the violent acts of resistance that the Arabs put up against the Zionist incursion into their country. It was this defensive position that frustrated a group within the Haganah and they broke off and formed the Irgun as well as aligning themselves politically with Jabotinsky's Revisionist movement. This new Zionist militia had a policy of what Jabotinsky called "active retaliation," attacking Palestinian fighters and civilians alike. They also attacked British soldiers.

With the outbreak of World War II the Irgun leadership declared a truce with the British forces in Palestine, though not with the Arab resistance. This was because many of the Irgun fighters wished to join the British army's Jewish Brigade being formed to fight the Nazis. However, there was a minority of Irgun fighters who objected to this truce. They broke off from the Irgun and, under the leadership of Avraham Stern, formed their own militia (known as the Stern Gang) to carry on attacks against the British in Palestine. The future Israeli Prime Minister Itzhak Shamir was associated with the Stern Gang.

This was the situation in 1942 when Menachem Begin reached Palestine. He quickly joined the Irgun and by the end of 1943 he became its commander. It was Begin who reoriented the Irgun away from its position of truce with the British. He insisted that the Irgun's main mission was to push the British out of Palestine as quickly as possible, violently if necessary. Begin moved the organization to act toward this end. Knowledge of the Nazi Holocaust was now spreading among the Jews of Palestine and it seemed to Begin imperative that the immigration barriers maintained by the British be overcome. The fact that the British were still fighting Nazi Germany and had to divert troops to quell unrest in Palestine did not mean much to Begin. Later Irgun spokesmen would rationalize this issue by claiming that "in 1943, it was already clear that the victory of the Allies was only a question of time" (see the official Irgun website, www.etzel.org.il/english/ac06.htm). Thus, in early 1944, the Irgun broke the truce with the British that had been maintained since the outbreak of the war and declared "armed warfare" against their colonial government. As with so many other groups past and present, seeking to expel foreign occupiers, the Irgun used terrorist tactics to achieve its ends. Immigration offices in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, and Haifa (considered symbols of British refusal to allow open Jewish immigration into Palestine) were attacked in February 1944, a month later income tax offices were attacked, next came an attack on the British intelligence headquarters and then, finally, the destruction of the King David Hotel.

The attack on the King David was Begin's most famous (or infamous) wartime act. The King David was a Jewish-owned luxury hotel in Jerusalem. Opened in 1931, the southern wing of the hotel was requisitioned by the British mandatory authorities in 1938. In that wing were housed many of the British government offices as well as their military command center. About a third of the hotel's 200 rooms were reserved for civilian use. After the end of World War II there was coordination between the forces of the Haganah, Irgun, and Stern Gang. Thus, there is evidence that Begin did not order the attack on the King David in isolation. Indeed, Moshe Sneh, a leader in the Haganah, probably was part of the operation's initial planning. The attack took place on July 22, 1946. Disguised as Arabs, the Irgun attackers broke into the hotel through its ground floor restaurant. They planted explosives against the basement supporting beams of the building, lit 30-minute fuses and then, the Irgun leadership claimed, called the hotel switchboard to issue a warning that an "explosive device" had been planted in the hotel by the "Hebrew Underground." The British government denied that such a call was ever received, and it is clear that no attempt to evacuate the building was made. The subsequent explosion collapsed the southern wing of the hotel and killed 91 people, including 17 Jews. After the attack the British began making mass arrests of suspected Irgun fighters (sometimes with the help of the Jewish Agency and the Haganah), and drove the Irgun underground. They labeled Begin a terrorist and put a price of £10,000 on his head. The Jewish Agency, ignoring the Haganah's involvement in the early planning of the action, condemned the attack on the King David Hotel and called the perpetrators "a gang of criminals." David Ben-Gurion, then in Paris, gave an interview to a French newspaper in which he called the Irgun "the enemy of the Jewish people." Begin eventually told his side of the story of the years of struggle in the Irgun in a book entitled The Revolt.

With the end of World War II, Begin and the Haganah leaders began to cooperate in an armed effort to drive the British out of Palestine once and for all. Such cooperation seemed to suggest that, once the Israeli state was proclaimed in 1948, Begin would approve of the Irgun forces merging with the Haganah to form the Israeli army. This issue was momentarily put in doubt when, in 1948, an Irgun-owned ship laden with arms, the Altalena, arrived at the port of Jaffa near Tel Aviv. Ben-Gurion ordered the arms to be turned over to the Haganah, as it was the main core of the new state's army. However, in the ensuing negotiations Begin seemed to hesitate and Ben-Gurion ordered an attack on the ship. This incident clearly proclaimed that Menachem Begin had to give up the idea of an independent Irgun militia. He accepted the reality of this fact and soon went from being a militia commander to becoming a successful politician.

After the establishment of the state of Israel, Begin became the leader of the Revisionist Zionist Herut (Freedom) Party, a position he would hold for the next 30 years. Herut, which later became the core of the Likud bloc, was the principle opposition party to the dominant Labor Party in Israel. In many ways the uncompromising attitudes of the Irgun were carried over into the new party's policies. Herut became known for its strident nationalism and expansionist aspirations. Begin and his party briefly joined a Government of National Unity in 1967 (in which he served as a minister without portfolio) but later resigned in protest over Israeli consideration of United States peace initiatives which suggested a possible willingness to trade land for peace.

Begin finally attained power in 1977 when his Likud bloc defeated the Labor Party in parliamentary elections. He became Israel's first non-socialist prime minister. At first glance Begin proceeded to do things that one might not have expected of such a passionate Zionist. For instance, he was the first Israeli head of state to officially and publically meet with an Arab leader. This happened in November of 1977 when Anwar Sadat broke ranks with the Arab League and came to Jerusalem to offer the Israelis peace. Begin was also the first Israeli prime minister to sign a peace treaty with an Arab leader, also Sadat, and then proceed to evacuate Jewish settlements from the Sinai desert. However, on closer inspection, Begin's behavior becomes more understandable. The Revisionist notion of Eretz Israel – for which the Irgun had fought and to which Begin obsessively clung – stretched from Gaza into Jordan. It did not include the Sinai. As a tactical move, the peace treaty with Egypt removed Israel's main enemy in the west, allowing the Israeli government to concentrate on expansion and consolidation in the east. Proof of this position was seen when Begin reneged on his Camp David promise to President Jimmy Carter to grant the Palestinians autonomy. Begin's subsequent receiving of the Nobel Peace Prize (1978) was thus only partially deserved.

Begin went on to reprise his Irgun fighting role in 1982 when he launched a bloody invasion of Lebanon rather ironically named Operation Peace in Galilee. Aimed at pushing the fighters of the Palestinian Liberation Organization out of Lebanon (from where they had launched violent raids into northern Israel), Operation Peace in Galilee resulted in terrorist actions by the Israeli army reminiscent of past Irgun behavior. These included an attack on a United Nations refugee center, massacres in Palestinian refugee camps, and the indiscriminate shelling of parts of Beirut.

Begin's direct action policies and his apparent disregard for international law and opinion made him quite popular in Israel. He was a true reflection of the national consciousness that saw Israel as standing alone against numerous enemies, ultimately able to rely only on itself and the Jews of the diaspora.

Begin resigned from the office of prime minister in 1983, shortly after the death of his wife. The last nine years of his life were spent in seclusion and it is reported that he suffered prolonged periods of depression. He died of heart failure in March of 1992.

SEE ALSO: Ben-Gurion, David (1866–1973) and the Haganah

References and Suggested Readings

- Begin, M. (1977) The Revolt. New York: Nash.
 Carter, J. (2007) Peace, Not Apartheid. New York: Simon & Schuster.
 Gervasi, F. (1979) The Life and Times of Menachem Begin: Rebel to Statesman. New York: Putnam.
 Silver, E. (1984) Begin, The Haunted Prophet. New York: Random House.
 Stein, K. (1999) Heroic Diplomacy: Sadat, Kissinger, Carter, Begin and the Quest for Arab-Israeli Peace. New York: Routledge.
 Temko, N. (1987) To Win or to Die: A Personal Portrait of Menachem Begin. New York: Morrow.

Belgium, 1959 coal strike

Nicolas Verschueren

In February 1959 a major revolt took place in the Borinage, the oldest coalfield in Belgium. Aware of the structural problems of the coal mines, the Belgian government had joined with France, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, and West Germany in an agreement to pool coal and steel resources through the Schuman Plan. With the prospect of the Common Market, Belgian coal, compared to other coal partners, was at a disadvantage. In fact, the price of coal was much higher in Belgium than in Germany or the Netherlands. Brought on by the resulting closure of the Borinage pits, this spontaneous movement marked the first sign of the unavoidable decline of the coal industry in Europe and was the first major social crisis since the start of the European Coal and Steel Community.

In spite of investments to develop infrastructure in the Borinage so that Belgian coal could enjoy the benefits of this planned cooperative, by 1958 stockpiles and unemployment had greatly increased, especially in the unprofitable collieries in Belgium. There were 28 mines in 1950, 18 in 1959, and 9 in 1960. The number of mineworkers decreased from 26,000 to 12,000 between 1950 and 1960. The main problem was the single-industry characteristic of the Borinage. Indeed, the coal industry was the center of all economic activities. Because of this regional recession, and with the pressure of the High Authority of the ECSC, the Belgian government had to close the unprofitable pits, including the Crachet, a coal mine that had recently been modernized for 10 billion Belgian francs.

On February 12, 1959 the National Council of Collieries, a tripartite organization, decided to close nine pits in the Borinage, leaving only four collieries active. The next day, a spontaneous strike started in the Crachet-Picquery mines. The trade unions were run over by strikers, and the movement quickly spread all over the Borinage and into other Walloon coalfields. This upheaval lasted ten days and had in some instances bordered on insurrection.

The population feared that the coal industry would not be replaced by other industries. Therefore shopkeepers, craftsmen, workers belonging to other professions, and the whole Borinage population took part in this conflict. Wagons, picket lines, and roadblocks covered the streets and slogans were written on walls: "No pit closures," "We want bread," "The Borinage must not die." Negotiations began between the Belgian government, the trade unions, the collieries, and the High Authority, but it was obvious that the closures were the only solution. The mineworkers' trade union leaders had no other choice but to accept, and they were only able to delay the closures to the end of the year.

For the European newspapers, particularly the communist press, this strike was the first social crisis in the context of European integration. Aware of that threat, the High Authority renewed allocations several times to help the mineworkers who met with difficulties following the opening of the Common Market. However, this crisis emphasized the weakness of the High Authority and the fragile nature of the supranational concept. A feeling of abandonment grew within the population of the Borinage and gradually gave place to deep resentment.

SEE ALSO: Belgium, Strike of the Century, 1960–1961; Belgium, 20th-Century Political Conflict; France, Post-World War II Labor Protests

References and Suggested Readings

- Cammarata, F. & Tilly, P. (2001) Histoire sociale et industrielle de la Wallonie, 1945–1980. Brussels: Editions Vie ouvrière.
- Carion, C. (1969) Conséquences sociales et économiques des fermetures d'entreprises et de la reconversion au Borinage. Brussels: ULB.
- Poidevin, R. & Spierenburg, D. (1993) Histoire de la Haute autorité de la Communauté européenne du charbon et de l'acier : une expérience supranationale. Brussels: Bruylant.

Belgium, Strike of the Century, 1960–1961

Nicolas Verschueren

The winter of 1960–1 witnessed the most important protest movement of the twentieth century in Belgium. Called the Strike of the Century, this event left long-lasting marks on the political history of Belgium. It ended a decade of deep social unrest linked to the Royal Question, the secondary school war, and the industrial collapse of the southern regions of Belgium.

The violence and extent of these events left a deep impression on Belgian society. The triggering factor was Eyskens' Bill. Called Loi unique, it was proposed to the Parliament on September 27, 1960 and introduced a number of austerity policies to reduce the public deficit and fight threats of economic destabilization after decolonization. The workers' anger spread to all industrial areas, including Flanders, and especially Ghent and Antwerp. The mineworkers, steelworkers, and public servants became the spearheads of this movement, which started on December 14, 1960. At first, the trade unions and the Belgian Socialist Party were overwhelmed by events. Facing the Catholic-Liberal coalition government, the Belgian socialists federated the party, the trade union, and the socialist mutual insurance company to fight the Eyskens' Bill. This union was called Common Action. The public service socialist trade union (CGSP) and the unionists and workers who followed André Renard were the most virulent actors in this protest movement.

During the socialist trade union congress held on December 16, 1960, two main positions were brought up: the moderate Dore Smets' proposal and a tougher proposal supported by André Renard demanding a general strike. The Flemish trade unionists voted by a majority for the Smets' proposal while the Walloons chose to vote for the one supported by Renard. From then on, a deep divide grew within the socialist trade union. The workers, especially within the public service, were determined to go on strike on December 20. On the same day, discussions on the bill Loi unique began in the House of Representatives while tension spread all over the country.

At a national level, the socialist trade union had not called for a general strike. Instead, the movement was encouraged by the workers themselves and by local trade unions. While the Walloon strikers supported the federalist plan, the Catholic trade union was tied down by its links to the Catholic Party and the workers opposed to the Eyskens project, and thus had a more reformist position, hoping to avoid the strike's violence. The Christian workers' movement took a more moderate line and preferred to avoid discussion. However, there was serious unease voiced by the Walloon Christian workers facing Flemish supremacy in the Christian Worker organizations. Alongside this, confusion reigned among the socialist trade unionists, and incoherence and disorder marked their actions.

During the second week, the demonstrators in Wallonia gradually adopted a community withdrawal while the movement ran out of steam in the Flemish industrial areas and in some parts of Wallonia. The following week, the socialist trade unionists, especially in Wallonia, toughened up their speeches and tried to use the political front when they understood that they could not impede the Eyskens' Bill. On January 13, 1961 the House of Representatives voted on the bill. The strike finished on January 21 and had lasted five weeks in some parts of Wallonia, such as Liège and Charleroi.

The strike was linked to Belgian economic developments. For the first time, in 1960 Flemish industry did better than Walloon industry. From then on this trend played a very important role in the emergence of a Walloon identity. At the same time, there was a demand for structural reforms. The holding companies' domination of the Belgian economy was strongly criticized by the Walloon socialists, and Renard, a steel-worker trade unionist from Liège, provided a strong leadership presence in the pursuit of the federalist claim. A few weeks after the strike, the pressure group Walloon Popular Movement emerged with Renard as leader. The struggle continued through this movement supported by numerous Walloon strikers and trade unionists.

SEE ALSO: Belgium, 1959 Coal Strike; Belgium, 20th-Century Political Conflict

References and Suggested Readings

- Deprez, R. (1963) La Grande grève: décembre 1960–janvier 1961: ses opinions, son déroulement, ses leçons. Brussels: Fondation J. Jacquemotte.
- Féaux, V. (1963) Cinq semaines de lutte sociale: la grève de l'hiver 1960–1961. Brussels: Institut de sociologie de l'Université libre de Bruxelles.
- Mabille, X. (2000) Histoire politique de la Belgique: facteurs et acteurs de changement. Brussels: Crisp.
- Neuville, J. & Yerna, J. (1990) Le Choc de l'hiver 60–61: les grèves contre la loi unique. Brussels: Politique et histoire.
- Tilly, P. (2005) André Renard: biographie. Brussels: Le Cri.

Belgium, 20th-century political conflict

Stacy Warner Maddern

Belgium had acquired independence in 1830 and throughout the nineteenth century it remained a neutral state. From its inception the National Congress of Belgium chose a constitutional monarch as its form of government and designated Leopold I as its first king. Throughout the nineteenth and into the twentieth centuries the upper-class Francophile population controlled the political arena, treating the Dutch-speaking or Flemish as second-class citizens. In 1914, under the reign of King Albert I, Belgium was invaded by Germany en route to France.

During the German occupation, Flemish national identity experienced a reawakening as the occupying authorities utilized a policy of administrative separation to exploit French/Flemish animosity to their advantage. Because of these measures, benefits were afforded to the Flemish since their language was closely related to German. This was in contrast to French Belgians or Walloons, who were both culturally and linguistically aligned with the French. With this existing characteristic the Germans had an excellent opportunity to use Flemish frustrations to their advantage, creating further division between the two groups. However, while these attempts were carried out to benefit the German cause, they ended up serving Belgium's interests as well. By the time the Germans left Belgium in 1918, there was concrete influence for conditions for the Flemish to be improved.

Belgium was again invaded during World War II, on May 10, 1940. The new king, Leopold III, remained in Belgium while the government fled into exile in Paris (and later London). His decision to remain in Belgium to greet the Nazis would later bring accusations from Paul Reynaud, president of France, that Leopold III had committed treason. However, Leopold III refused to cooperate with the Nazis or administer Belgium as a German satellite. Despite his defiance of the Nazis, the exiled Belgian government refused to recognize Leopold III's right to rule, effectively deposing him as their monarch in protest of his actions. After the war Leopold III was exonerated of treason in 1946, causing civil uprisings that forced him to abdicate in 1951. World War II was not nearly as economically devastating for Belgium as it had been for neighboring countries. However, its political situation was to enter a period of flux that would attempt to reinstate those institutions that had existed before the war, while new factions and parties fought to build a new structure.

The Christian Socialist Party was founded in 1945 as an alternative to the Catholic Party's church affiliations. It had separate Walloon and Flemish wings, which allowed for political victory in 1946. In the process the Socialist Party broadened its political base, while the liberals and communists maintained their previous approach. However, when Leopold III returned to Belgium in 1945, he was supported by the Christian socialists, while the communists demanded his abdication. The liberals, on the other hand, maintained that the monarchy should be abolished altogether. The Christian socialists would later resign from government in protest, followed by the communists, which left the government unable to function. In response the Christian socialists formed a coalition with the socialists and together they implemented reforms, including the establishment of a central economic council and the granting of the right to vote to women.

In 1950, the Christian socialists gained an absolute majority and a referendum was held to determine what constitutional rights the monarch should be granted. While 58 percent of voters throughout Belgium favored the king's return to the throne, these results were regionally polarized, with Wallonia favoring abdication. After parliament voted to reinstate the king on July 22, 1950, a wave of protests followed in industrial Wallonia. After much negotiation a compromise was worked out which resulted in the abdication of Leopold III on the condition that his son, Baudouin I, would be crowned within one year.

The difficulties between the Flemish north and the Wallonian south, since the end of World War II and liberation, had softened in regards to economic and social solidarity. The practice of reform by successive governments had not allowed either side to drift too far apart. However, one of the greater difficulties during this period seemed to be the debates over educational reform. The Catholics demanded that a more autonomous form of education be mandated, while anti-clerics supported a standard public education. As with the previous referendums on King Leopold III, the Catholics, socialists, liberals, and communists were again clearly divided. Because of these ideological differences, the wedge between north and south had made it clear that a principal consensus on this issue was impossible. As such, on December 3, 1953, the Walloons and the Flemish moved to reform the current centralized state.

Belgium's existing linguistic disputes were in large part a constant source of agitation within political parties, causing further divisions. The century-long linguistic development was one that would shape social relations throughout Belgium. Within each community, both north and south, the political progress of democracy was driven and shaped by this central conflict. In addition, it did not help that the majority of the new economic structures established during the 1950s seemed to favor the Walloons. However, by the end of the decade, Walloon industry suffered setbacks as American industry increased activity in the region, bringing benefits to the Flemish population. Wallonia began a cycle of decline. By the 1960s, linguistic disputes would be compounded by questions regarding the economic future of the region. Several strikes and demonstrations in the early part of the decade addressed the "law of uniformity," which regulated economic development through the reorganization of state finances. However, while these were times of great tensions in the areas of language, religion, and labor, the 1960s was a period of great economic prosperity that saw new heights in consumer spending, construction, and infrastructure. But this prosperity benefited a small portion of the population as approximately 900,000 people remained in poverty.

By the 1970s, the desire for complete cultural, linguistic, and territorial autonomy amongst the Flemish and Walloon populations increased. In their effort to pull themselves out of economic despair, the Walloons sought new divisions that would give them the right to administer their territory according to their terms. This brought about constitutional revisions and legislation in the 1980s that preserved the language, culture, and lifestyle of the different groups in Belgium. Thus the country became a fractured state of three separate regions – Flemish-speaking (Flanders), French (Wallonia), and German (Brussels). In 1980, these regions were given their own authority of independent rights and institutions, resulting in the current system of government that operates on an independent provincial and regional level under the guidance of a centralized state. Under the current system, the state controls 60 percent of the national government, while the remaining 40 percent is divided amongst the remaining regional governments.

The division of Belgium along linguistic lines has also led to strict institutional splitting along the same lines as members of parliament remain loyal to their linguistic heritage. This has led some political critics to suggest that the government is run from a dualistic premise that has relegated a great portion of the power to be divided between the Flemish and Wallonian regions. For the Flemish this crisis existed on an economic level, since they were under constant oppression by the Wallonian bourgeoisie. The means by which they were able to unify was the difference in language first exploited during World War I.

SEE ALSO: Belgium, 1959 Coal Strike; Belgium, Strike of the Century, 1960–1961; Congo Crisis, 1960–1965; Mandel, Ernest (1923–1995)

References and Suggested Readings

- Beaufays, J. (1988) Belgium: A Dualist Political System? Publius 18 (2). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Cook, B. (2002) Belgium: A History. New York: Peter Lang.
- De Meeüs, A. (1962) History of the Belgians. Trans. G. Gordon. New York: Praeger.
- Deprez, K. & Louis, V. (Eds.) (1998) Nationalism in Belgium: Shifting Identities, 1870–1995. New York: St. Martin's Press.
- Kelly, G. A. (1969) New Nationalism in an Old World. Comparative Politics 1 (3). New York: City University of New York.

Belize, general strikes, 1952

Edward T. Brett

The 1952 general strike in British Honduras played an important part in the colony's struggle for independence from British rule in that it increased the national appeal of the People's United Party (PUP), the organization that would eventually win independence for Belize.

Forestry, which had long been the mainstay of the economy of British Honduras, had declined precipitously by the end of the 1940s, thereby causing widespread unemployment and poverty throughout the colony. Thus, when the colonial governor, Sir Ronald Garvey, using his special powers to override the opposition of the legislature, devalued the British Honduran dollar on December 31, 1949, the plight of the Belizean working class became even more desperate. This devaluation meant that the worth of the Belizean dollar was now lowered from $4.03 to the pound sterling to $2.08, and in terms of the US dollar, from $1 to 70 cents. Since most goods in British Honduras were imported from Britain or the United States, the governor's unilateral decree was the last straw for already hard-pressed Belizeans.

To protest Garvey's action, a group of young creoles formed a People's Committee in January 1950 and soon committee leaders widened their grievances to include British colonialism in general. On September 29, the People's Committee was transformed into the People's United Party, a political organization whose goal was to end colonial rule. Its main leaders were George Price, Leigh Richardson, and Philip Goldson. From its inception, PUP allied itself with the General Workers Union (GWU) and in April 1952 gained full control of the latter when Price was chosen as its leader.

In October 1952 citrus workers in Stann Creek went on strike. Seizing the moment, PUP-GWU officers called for a national strike. Soon government workers as well as laborers from Belizean Estate, United Fruit, and other private sector companies joined their Stann Creek counterparts. The general strike ended after ten days, when all but the Belizean Estate Company agreed to meet with union officials in arbitration talks. Belizean Estate had been the main target of the strike leaders, but rather than negotiate a settlement, it chose to close its sawmill operations until it could replace its 268 striking workers with scab labor. After 49 days the desperate strikers were forced to capitulate and the strike ended.

Although the strike was only partly successful in obtaining higher wages for workers, it was nevertheless important in that it significantly increased membership in the GWU. It likewise gained widespread popular support for the PUP, which won eight of nine Legislative Council seats in 1954 in the first-ever Belizean general elections.

SEE ALSO: Belize, National Independence Movement

References and Suggested Readings

- Barry, T. (1989) Belize: A Country Guide. Albuquerque: Inter-Hemispheric Education Resource.
- Bolland, N. (1986) Belize: A New Nation in Central America. Boulder: Westview Press.
- Fernández, J. (1989) Belize: Case Study for Democracy in Central America. Brookfield, VT: Gower.
- Shoman, A. (1987) Party Politics in Belize, 1950–1986. Benque Viejo del Carmen, Belize: Cobula Productions.

Belize, national independence movement

Edward T. Brett

Belize gained full independence from Great Britain in 1981, but only after a struggle that lasted nearly a half-century. When the English settled Belize (officially called British Honduras until 1973) the colonial government created a socio-economic structure that assured lumber companies a cheap source of labor. The Belize Estate and Produce Company (BEC), for instance, was granted ownership to about one-third of the colony's territory and refused to lease or sell any of its land for agricultural use. This meant that most men had little choice but to work for extremely low wages as loggers for the BEC. Salaries ranged from about $12 to $15 per month throughout the nineteenth century and well into the twentieth. Furthermore, through a variety of unjust company practices that robbed workers of the little they made, most were forced into constant debt and therefore obligated to perpetually work for the logging company. Loggers who attempted to leave their jobs before fulfilling the terms of their contracts or before paying off their debts were subject to imprisonment. The Great Depression, coupled with a devastating hurricane in 1931, only made the plight of Belizean workers and their families worse. Less global demand for Belizean lumber and other products meant large-scale unemployment, which in turn brought many to the verge of starvation.

In 1934 a group of almost 18,000 desperate men, dubbing themselves the Unemployed Brigade, marched to the governor's office demanding employment. When the governor responded by offering only 80 jobs, and these at 25 cents a day, one of the marchers, Antonio Soberanis Gómez, decided to fight back. He began to hold meetings in Belize City, where he denounced colonial rule and explained to workers the structural reasons for their poverty. He formed the Labor and Unemployed Association (LUA), whose members began to picket the businesses of wealthy merchants. He also called for a national boycott of their products. Through such methods Soberanis was able to get dockworkers in Stann Creek (now called Dangriga) a raise from 8 cents an hour to 25. Picketing at the BEC sawmill in Belize City, however, resulted in a riot and the destruction of property. Consequently, 17 LUA members were arrested and when Soberanis attempted to post their bail, he too was incarcerated and kept in jail for five weeks. The riot and subsequent arrest of Soberanis caused a split in the LUA and as a result the association lost much of its effectiveness. In 1939 Soberanis formed the General Workers Union (GWU), which grew in membership throughout the next decade.

Economic hardship eased somewhat during the World War II years, since thousands of workers emigrated to the United States, Britain, and the US Canal Zone, where the war effort caused a scarcity of labor. When the war ended, however, their jobs were terminated and they were forced to return home, creating even greater unemployment. Despite such hardship, on December 31, 1949, the colonial governor, Sir Ronald Garvey, devaluated the Belizean dollar, even though the Belizean legislature had opposed the move. In response to his callous decree, a People's Committee was formed in early January. By the end of September, it had metamorphosed into the People's United Party (PUP), a political organization whose goal was independence from Britain. One of its talented leaders was George Price and when he was chosen to head the GWU in April 1952, the two organizations merged, thereby creating a powerful nationalistic movement.

When citrus factory workers in Stann Creek went on strike in October, PUP-GWU leaders decided to seize the moment and called for a general strike. The strike lasted 49 days, and although it was only partly successful in obtaining its aims, it increased the popularity of the PUP immensely. Price and his party were able to win for the people the right to universal adult suffrage and on April 28, 1954, in the colony's first ever general elections, the PUP won eight of the nine contested seats. From this time until December 1984, the PUP totally dominated Belizean politics, winning every general election.

Although colonial officials skillfully sowed discord within the leadership ranks of the PUP and were a factor in causing ten central committee members to leave the party in 1956 to form a rival party, the British were nevertheless unable to dent the PUP's countrywide popularity. In 1961, following Price's acquittal by a jury on questionable charges of sedition, his party won all 18 seats in the Belizean House of Representatives.

With this victory, Price, who now totally dominated the PUP, was able to force the British government in London to agree to accept a new Belizean Constitution, which granted the small colony full internal self-government. The new Constitution went into effect on January 1, 1964. It allowed Great Britain to retain jurisdiction over national defense and foreign affairs, but this was wholly due to the fact that neighboring Guatemala was claiming the right of sovereignty over Belize and the British were needed to prevent a threatened Guatemalan invasion.

Price now dedicated himself to nation building. He created a new flag for Belize, a new national anthem, and even a new national prayer. Since the founding of the PUP, its leaders had refused to use the name British Honduras, choosing instead to refer to their nation as Belize. In 1973 Britain finally capitulated to Price's demand and Belize was recognized as the official name of the nation.

In accordance with the provisions of the 1964 Constitution, a general election took place on March 1, 1965. The PUP again demonstrated its popularity by winning 5 of the 8 seats in the Senate and 16 of the 18 in the House of Representatives. Price was also elected to a five-year term as premier. In the 1969 elections the PUP again fared well, even picking up a seventeenth House seat. But it was in this year that the PUP began to face a new challenge from the left. Evan Hyde, upon his return from Dartmouth College, formed the United Black Association for Development, a radical Black Power organization, which commenced to assail Price and his party, dubbing them neo-colonialists. Meanwhile, the newly constituted conservative United Democratic Party (UDP) attacked from the right. Such challenges took their toll. In the 1974 general election, although Price won another term as premier and the PUP maintained control of the National Assembly (the House and Senate), the UDP won six House seats, thereby establishing itself as a serious challenger to the PUP. Although the PUP finally gained full independence for Belize on September 21, 1981, internal divisions and strife weakened the party. Consequently, it was defeated for the first time in the 1984 general election by the UDP.

SEE ALSO: Belize, General Strikes, 1952; Hyde, Evan Anthony (b. 1947)

References and Suggested Readings

- Barry, T. (1989) Belize: A Country Guide. Albuquerque: Inter-Hemispheric Education Resources.
 Bolland, N. (1986) Belize: A New Nation in Central America. Boulder: Westview Press.
 Fernández, J. (1989) Belize: Case Study for Democracy in Central America. Brookfield, VT: Gower.
 Shoman, A. (1987) Party Politics in Belize, 1950–1986. Benque Viejo del Carmen, Belize: Cobula Productions.

Ben Bella, Ahmad (b. 1918)

Andrew J. Waskey

Mohamed Ahmad Ben Bella is an Algerian politician considered to be the father of modern Algeria. He is an Arab nationalist who fought in the struggle against colonialism. Ben Bella was born December 25, 1918 in Maghnia, Algeria, into a family of Sufi Muslims. He attended school at Tlemclen where the anti-Moslem prejudice of his European teacher deeply affected him.

In 1936 Ben Bella joined the French army. During the early stages of World War II he was awarded the Croix de Guerre. After the fall of France he was demobilized. He then joined a Moroccan infantry unit and fought in the Italian Campaign. He was then promoted to the rank of warrant officer and was awarded the Medaille Militaire for bravery. In 1945 Ben Bella was offered a commission in the French army but he refused it after learning of reprisals against the Algerian town of Setif following a revolt by Muslims in May of 1945. Turning instead to politics, he won election as a municipal councilor. While serving as a municipal councilor Ben Bella founded a secret organization, the Organisation Speciale, dedicated to the overthrow of French colonialism. The underground organization was the predecessor of the Front de Liberation Nationale (FLN).

In 1951 Ben Bella was arrested and sentenced to prison for eight years. He escaped and fled first to Tunisia and then to Egypt. While in Egypt Ben Bella served as a member of the Revolutionary Committee of Unity and Action. The nine-member committee was headed by the FLN which was leading the Algerian independence movement.

In 1956 the French arrested Ben Bella following the mid-air interception of his airplane by French fighter planes. Imprisoned by the French until 1962, he learned Arabic as a second language to his first language of French. After Algeria gained its independence Ben Bella returned to become a leading politician. As his popularity grew he challenged Benvoucef Ben Khedda for the premiership in June 1962. When challenged himself by FLN rivals he used his growing support, especially in the military, to suppress opposition. By September 1962 Ben Bella was in control of all of Algeria. He was elected premier on September 20, 1962. In 1963 he was elected unopposed Algeria's president. However, in 1965 he was overthrown by Houari Boumedienne (1932–78). He was put under house arrest until 1980, at which time he was granted exile to Switzerland. In 1985 Bella founded a new political party called the Mouvement pour la Democratie en Algeria (MDA). He returned from Lausanne in 1990.

In 2003 Ben Bella was elected president of the International Campaign Against Aggression in Iraq (ICAAI) at the Cairo Anti-War Conference. ICAAI is a coordinating group for a coalition of anti-war organizations.

SEE ALSO: Algerian Islamic Salvation Front; Algerian National Revolution, 1954–1962; Francophone Africa, Protest and Independence

References and Suggested Readings

- Ageron, C. R. (1991) Modern Algeria: A History from 1830 to the Present. Trenton, NJ: Africa World Press.
- Ben Bella, A. (1986) Ben Bella revient. Paris: Jean Picollec.
- Ruedy, J. (1992) Modern Algeria: The Origins and Development of a Nation. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

Benezet, Anthony (1713–1784)

Srividhya Swaminathan

In 1750 a minor revolution took place among the Philadelphia Quakers that eventually eliminated slavery within the community. The most active and visible proponent of this revolution was Anthony Benezet, whose impassioned publications and personal good works put him at the forefront of change in colonial America and Great Britain.

Born a French Huguenot, Benezet was educated in London and immigrated to Philadelphia at the age of 18. There he joined the Society of Friends.

After a brief and unsuccessful attempt at a trade, Benezet began teaching in 1739 and developed an awareness of the multiple inequities within his society over his lifetime. He sought to address those inequities through education, establishing the first girls' public school in 1755 and the Negro School at Philadelphia in 1770. The primary inequity that captured his imagination was the keeping of African slaves, a practice which was justified by their supposed intellectual inferiority. In 1750 he began tutoring the children of slaves out of his home in the evening and observed first hand both their intellectual capabilities and the injustice of keeping sentient human beings as chattels. He argued that belief in the "inferior capacities" of Africans was a "vulgar prejudice" based on the "pride or ignorance" of slavemasters (Armistead 1971: 18). From his interactions with these eager and disenfranchised pupils, Benezet took a more active role in the leadership of his community and published pamphlets on the evils of the slave trade. He advocated that current Quaker slaveholders gradually manumit their slaves and refrain from purchasing any new slaves. His antipathy for slavery prompted him to move beyond his own community and agitate for change in the larger political context.

His first two publications described the violence and injustice of the slave trade. He used the widely read travel narratives of Europeans to Africa in order to show how detrimental the slave trade was to African societies as well as Pennsylvania slaveholders. Aimed at the Quaker community, Benezet emphasized the violation of Christian principles, particularly the Golden Rule that slavery and the slave trade represented. Though reluctant to advocate the radical solution of immediate emancipation, Benezet's writings focused on the African slave trade as the first step to ridding Britain and her colonies of the blight of slavery. His next publication, Caution to Great Britain and her Colonies (1767), addressed all Britons and advocated strongly for the political solution of ending the slave trade. He sent a copy of this publication and a letter of support to Granville Sharp, the mastermind of the Somerset Decision outlawing slavery in England. Impressed with the writing and the message, Sharp reprinted Benezet's pamphlet in London. Benezet further developed the message in his final publication, Some Historical Account of Guinea (1772), and both tracts were reprinted several times and widely distributed in the campaign to end the British slave trade. Benezet's influence can be seen in the abolitionist writings of Granville Sharp, John Wesley, and Thomas Clarkson, who canonized him as an early "Saint" of the abolition movement. Benezet is also credited with helping to draft the first petition for the abolition of the British slave trade that was presented to Parliament in 1783. Though he did not live to see the slave trade abolished in Britain or the United States, Benezet's writing had a profound impact on the British anti-slave trade movement, and his lifelong commitment to teaching educated successive generations of the most disenfranchised members of Philadelphia society.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Slavery Movement, Britain; Anti-Slavery Movement, United States, 1700–1870; Clarkson, Thomas (1760–1846); Sharp, Granville (1735–1813)

References and Suggested Readings

- Armistead, W. (1859/1971) Anthony Benezet: From the Original Memoir: Revised with additions. Freeport, NY: Books for Libraries Press.
- Brendlinger, I. (2003) Anthony Benezet: True Champion of the Slave. Wesley Center for Applied Theology. Available at www.wesley.nnu.edu/wesleyan_theology/theojrnl/31-35/32-1-7.htm#_edn1.
- Davis, D. B. (1975) The Problem of Slavery in the Age of Revolution. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Soderlund, J. R. (1985) Quakers and Slavery: A Divided Spirit. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Bengal, popular uprisings and movements in the colonial era

Muntassir Mamoon and Zarina Rahman Khan

Bengal, Bangladesh, and Consolidation of British Rule

The state of Bangladesh came into existence only in 1971. Before August 15, 1947, present-day India, Pakistan, and Bangladesh were known as one country, India. Bengal was in the eastern part of India. East Bengal was the part of Bengal including a sizable part of Bangla-speaking north Bengal (i.e., excluding areas like Darjeeling, where the inhabitants more often speak Nepalese dialects), along with east and south Bengal. The territory of the old East Bengal is more or less the same area that is known as Bangladesh today. Bengal was a Suba (a province administered by a Subadar, with a Diwan, collecting revenues) in the Mughal Empire. But after the death of Aurangzeb, de facto power passed to the Subadars, now styling themselves Namabs (Emperor).

In 1757 the British East India Company's Robert Clive conspired with certain local notables to wage war against and defeat the Namab of Bengal, Siraj-ud-Daulah. Between 1757 and 1765 the powers of the East India Company grew until in 1765, after defeating another Namab, Mir Qasim, it forced the Mughal Emperor Shah Alam II to grant the company Diwani, or the right to collect the revenue. By 1772 it emerged as the all-powerful ruler of Bengal, and Calcutta (Kolkata) was established as the capital. Beginning that year, the consolidation of British rule took place when Warren Hastings, governor of Bengal, declared the British intention to collect revenue directly rather than through intermediaries. During the next couple of decades an administrative and revenue collection system was set up. In 1857 there was a widespread uprising in India against the British, but the rebels were defeated and Queen Victoria of Britain took over the rule of India in 1858, replacing the defunct Mughal Empire. India became a part of the British Empire, to be ruled by viceroys, the queen's representatives.

Fakir-Sannyasi Revolt (1763–1800)

The Fakir-Sannyasi revolt was a unique uprising in the history of Bengal, which continued for nearly forty years. The word fakir means Muslim spiritual persons or ascetic mendicants. Sannyasi is a (generally Hindu) person who renounces all worldly interest in search of spiritual attainment. The fakirs and Sannyasis had established settlements in many regions of Bengal and Bihar. And although they were known as fakir-Sannyasis they were basically peasants who often went on pilgrimage in groups.

Under colonial rule the oppression of the peasants and artisans reached such heights that many artisans soon became unemployed and peasants landless. The dispossessed began to form small armed groups to loot the food and property of landlords and wealthy English traders. Some soldiers of the declining Mughal army joined these armed bands. At this time the colonial rulers imposed a tax on pilgrimages. This enraged the fakir-Sannyasis, who saw it as an imposition on their religion. They identified the colonial rulers as their enemy in their pursuit of religion and earning a living and revolted in different regions. Rather than a centrally organized movement, this was a spontaneous uprising led by individual leaders in different parts of Bengal and Bihar. The unemployed artisans, landless peasants, soldiers from the disbanded Mughal army, and small armed bands organized under the leadership of the fakir-Sannyasis.

The first phase (1763–9) took place in Dhaka, Rajshahi, Bihar, and Jalpaiguri, beginning in Dhaka in 1763 with the attack on the Kuthibari (trading center). In Rampur and Boalia of Rajshahi the English Kuthis were attacked in 1763 and 1764. Although the English withdrew from these places, they eventually recaptured them.

Between 1770 and 1772 other groups started revolting. Inspired by the earlier uprising the fakir-Sannyasis stopped paying taxes in many districts. A devastating famine broke out in 1770. According to the English, 5 million people perished, but unofficial estimates are much higher. Under these circumstances the rebel groups expanded in different parts of Bangladesh and the strength of the force in Dinajpur was over 5,000. At this stage the leader of this rebellion was Fakir Mojnu Shah. Ordinary peasants supported the rebels with shelter, food, and even funds. From 1773 to 1780 the third phase of the revolt centered around Rangpur, Dinajpur, Bogra, and Mymensingh districts. In the fourth phase Mojnu Shah attempted to reorganize the movement, but at this point short-lived internal disputes broke out between the Sannyasis and the Fakirs.

Although the fakir-Sannyasis started as separate movements in different parts of the country, in the fifth phase Mojnu Shah's efforts put an end to the internal feud and consolidated the movement. Mojnu Shah was killed in a fight near Bogra, but the war continued under the leadership of his brother Musa Shah. From 1793 to 1800 (the last phase) the British initiated organized efforts to suppress the revolts, achieving their goal in 1800. During this 40-year period many rebels not only became popular but also turned into legends and became the inspiration for popular resistance movements. Bankim Chandra Chattopadhyay's attempts in the late nineteenth century at creating images of resistance included a mythical version of the Sannyasi revolt, with a heroic female character named Debi Chowdhurani.

Shamsher Gazi's Revolt (1767–1768)

The oppression of the people reached the highest level immediately after the East India Company took over revenue collection. During the rule of Siraj-ud-Daulah, the rate of revenue in Roshnabad Chakla (present Comilla) was Taka 33,305 and 10 years later in 1765 it rose to Taka 150,000. This resulted in such economic degradation of the peasants that many lost their homesteads.

Shamsher Gazi was the son of a poor peasant. He was sold by his father to Nasir Mohammad, zamindar of South Sik. When on reaching adulthood Shamsher was appointed the Tahsildar (revenue collector) of the zamindari he was able to witness the poverty and deprivation of the ordinary peasants. Sympathetic to their plight, he started to organize them. Declaring rebellion against the zamindars in 1767, Shamsher stopped revenue payment to the king of Tripura and proclaimed himself the king of the newly independent Roshnabad Chakla. He distributed land to the landless and the slaves and became involved in many social welfare activities in the region. However, his rule lasted only two years. In 1768 the king of Tripura, with the assistance of the British-supported soldiers of the Nawab, suppressed the uprising. He was arrested and killed in 1768.

Sandwip Revolt (1769)

A clerk and benian (employer of traders) named Gokul Ghoshal was the Ahaddar, or revenue collector, of Sandwip. Most of the population of the Bay of Bengal island of Sandwip were peasants or artisans. There were a few zamindars as well, and the Ahaddar had the permanent revenue settlement with them. Abu Torap Chowdhury was a small zamindar of Sandwip, who succeeded in overpowering other zamindars and gaining the loyalty of most of the peasants. He soon became the most powerful man in Sandwip. To counter this, Gokul Ghosal, with the help of the British, attacked Sandwip and Abu Torap was killed in a fight in 1766. With Gokul Ghosal's acquisition of all powers in Sandwip his oppression increased. The desperate peasants openly revolted in 1769. Unable to suppress this rising by the peasants alone, Gokul once again sought the help of the British and ultimately quashed the uprising.

Chakma Revolt (1776–1787)

The northwest frontier of Bangladesh is the Chittagong hill tract area. It is the habitat of an indigenous tribal population, predominantly the Chakmas. Their source of livelihood was jhoom (terrace cultivation) and karpash (cotton) cultivation. There was no private ownership of land, and during Mughal rule they paid a small amount of cotton as revenue and cultivated without any interference. From 1760 the British started leasing out "cotton enclaves" to middlemen or speculators. The indigenous people were forced to pay in large quantities of cotton. At the same time they were restricted to cultivating small designated plots, which was contrary to the traditional system of cultivation. Colonial encroachment and extortion rose to such heights that the Chakmas revolted.

The Chakmas rebelled four times between 1776 and 1787, in rebellions that remain mostly unrecorded. The little that is known shows that a Chakma chief, Sher Daulat, and his military chief Ramu Khan led the first uprising in 1776. In this the rebels destroyed the crop silos and command quarters of the land leasers. Even the support of the British soldiers did not enable the speculators to suppress the rebels. They then took a new strategy. The Chakmas traded cotton for other essentials in the markets of the plain land. Knowing that this was crucial for Chakma survival, the British closed off the Chakmas' road to the markets. As a result the Chakmas were forced to surrender to the speculators in less than a year. The war came to an end at the agreement of the Chakmas to provide 501 maund (measurement of weight equal to approximately 1,000 pounds) of cotton as yearly revenue.

The Chakmas rebelled again in 1782 under the leadership of Jan Bux Khan, the son of Sher

Khan, for the same reason. Unable to suppress the Chakmas in the hills, the British kept the plain land out of bounds to them. Eventually, the Chakmas were forced to surrender once more. Jan Bux revolted again in 1784 and 1787, but was completely overtaken and subdued in 1787. In 1789 the British abolished the system of revenue collection through agents and established direct collection by the company officials. This system reestablished peace in the region.

Bulaki Shah's Revolt (1792)

In the southern part of Bangladesh is Barisal, also known as Bakerganj. Bakerganj was renowned for its abundant crop production. The peasants of Bakerganj also faced the oppression and exploitation of the zamindars as in other parts of the country. This exploitation during the initial stage of colonial rule became so severe that when the area was hit by famine in 1789 over 6,000 people died in Bakerganj.

In 1792 an uprising started in south Bakerganj under the leadership of Bulaki Shah, a peasant. He was initially associated with the Fakir revolts, but the latter had no connection with Bulaki Shah's revolt in Bakerganj. The oppression of the landlords and the traders did not stop even after the famine. Bulaki organized the peasants and built up a strong resistance in a place named Shubandia. Bulaki even managed to acquire seven Mughal guns. After preparations, Bulaki declared that the "rule of the foreigners has ended" and so there was no need to pay taxes to the zamindars. The zamindars attacked the stronghold of Bulaki with their armed forces. The illiterate and poorly armed followers of Bulaki either perished under this onslaught or fled, and the fortress was destroyed. It was in the following year that Governor General Cornwallis pronounced the Permanent Settlement of land in Bengal.

Early Nineteenth-Century Revolts

The establishment of the Permanent Settlement with the zamindars changed the nature of British colonialism. It now developed a class of indigenous collaborators who were strongly tied to its rule. At the same time, the Permanent Settlement transformed zamindars from revenue collectors (a status they had under the Mughals) to absolute landowners. A further dimension of British rule as it was consolidated was the importation of juridical concepts and practices from Britain. These also created popular opposition.

A significant early nineteenth-century popular protest was the Faraiizi movement, which had two phases: the first phase led by Haji Shariatullah and the second phase with his son Dudu Mia as leader. Shariatullah of Madaripur (1781–1840) traveled to Mecca at the age of 18 and was educated in the Wahabi religious ideology. Returning after 20 years, he started preaching Wahabism, the objective of which was to reform Islam. His influence started to spread. Though this initiative started as a religious movement, it gradually became a peasant uprising because most of the cultivators were Muslims and the landowners Hindu.

On the death of Shariatullah his son Dudu Mia took up the responsibility of organizing the Faraizis throughout the country. The movement turned into a peasant uprising under his leadership. The central idea of Dudu Mia's philosophy was that God and not man is the owner of all land, so no man has the right to levy tax on land, nor can it be inherited by succeeding generations. He rejected the 18 types of taxes levied by the zamindars. His followers included Muslim and Hindu peasants and artisans who set up their own Panchayet (local self-government) to resolve disputes. All this led to the non-payment of taxes in many areas. Consequently, the Hindu landlords and the indigo planters organized their forces against the movement. In many areas confrontation took place between the followers of Dudu Mia and the armed men of the zamindars. When it turned into a massive conflict in 1838, the colonial rulers stepped in to suppress it. Dudu Mia was arrested and a number of criminal cases were filed against him, but he was acquitted because of the absence of any witnesses against him. He was again arrested as a state prisoner on charges of treason during the revolt of 1857. However, he was released in 1860 and died in 1862 in Dhaka.

Hatikhedra Revolt

The Garo hills are located in north Mymensingh in what is now the Indian province of Meghalaya. The valley was inhabited by tribal communities of whom the majority was Hajong. Towards the middle of the sixteenth century Shamsheer Singh, a soldier in the army of Isha

Khan (one of the 12 major landlords who fought the Mughals), settled in this Pargana (administrative division) as its ruler. With the help of the Hajongs he succeeded in subjugating the Garos, another tribal community, and founded the Susanga-zamindari line in this region.

In 1770 one of the zamindars of this descent, Raja Kishore, settled a large number of Hajongs in Durgapur thana for catching wild elephants. It was profitable to trap and sell wild elephants, an animal used for transporting and other purposes. Later, a system known as the Begar (a system of unpaid labor akin to corvée) was introduced in the process of trapping elephants and led to a level of oppression that caused the Hajongs to declare war against the zamindars under the leadership of Mona Sardar. Soon this revolt spread to all parts of the Susanga pargana.

The Garo peasants who were the victims of zamindari domination started to join this uprising. When the zamindars arrested and murdered their leader, Man Singh, the revolt flared up and spread to all parts of the region. The rebels started to attack the zamindars with all their strength. Many of the forces of the zamindar were killed; many others fled. The zamindar fled to Netrokona, and the rebels destroyed the traps dug in the ground for trapping elephants. The conflict continued for five years before peace returned. At the end of it the system of trapping of elephants by unpaid labor was banned.

Pagolponthi Revolt (1825–1872)

Pagolponthi is a mystic philosophy like that of the aul-bauls (syncretic folk sect). Central to this philosophy is the concept of brotherhood, equality, and the quest for truth. In 1775 when a fakir named Korom Shah started to spread this philosophy it was well received by the Garos and the Hajongs in the Susanga hills because they were badly oppressed by the zamindars and the British. Korom Shah succeeded in building solidarity and brotherhood among the hill people to resist the exploitation of the zamindars. When Korom Shah died in 1813 a follower of the pagolponthi named Tipu from Lentiakanda village of Susanga started disseminating this philosophy intensely among the Garos. The core of Tipu's preaching was that all humans are created by the Creator. Therefore, all are equal and no one has a right to exploit and oppress another. Under the leadership of Tipu the Garos united against the oppression of the zamindars and, defeating them in Sherpur, established a new Garo kingship in 1825. The new king, Tipu, developed an administrative and judicial system. Tipu's rule lasted for two years and survived several English attempts to dethrone him. In 1827 an English battalion from Rangpur arrived in Sherpur and started to fight Tipu. He was defeated, arrested, and jailed. Although the first Pagolponthi uprising under Tipu failed, it was never totally eliminated. After this, the Garos revolted against the British administration in 1832, 1833, 1837, 1848, 1861, 1866, 1871, and 1872.

Popular Struggles in the Late Nineteenth Century

The revolt of 1857 was followed by the ending of rule by the East India Company and the takeover of India directly by the British government. A number of laws slightly modified the extent of control over rural Bengal by the zamindars. Peasant protests also gained a little space to express grievances within the framework of the colonial state. The most important of these peasant protests, the Indigo revolt, is discussed in a separate entry. Another important peasant protest was the Sirajganj revolt of 1872–3.

The Sirajganj uprising of 1872 is also known as the Pabna uprising because it was under the Pabna district. It is significant because it was conducted under the command of an efficient agrarian league. Perhaps patterned on the Pabna model, these movements gradually took the aspect of a widespread and popular protest against the forms of landlordism in the cash-crop producing areas of Bangladesh. All six of the most influential Sirajganj zamindars were absentee landlords. The zamindars were extremely exploitative and in addition to the land revenue they extracted a number of illegal taxes known as abwab. The peasants had to pay over fifteen types of abwab on top of the tax on agriculture.

Some peasants filed and won cases against such unauthorized revenue collections. Encouraged by this, many peasants stopped payment of illegal taxes and started payment of the land taxes through the courts. Antagonized, the zamindars intensified their oppression of the cultivators. The peasants then organized and formed agrarian leagues under the leadership of Ishan Chandra Roy, Raju Sarkar, Gangacharan Paul, and others and started attacking the offices of zamindars. When the uprising spread to different parts of the region, the zamindars, their employees, and the wealthy fled to the town of Pabna and sought assistance from the administration. The administration suppressed the uprising through police action, jailed the leaders, and then slapped different terms of punishments on them.

The Sirajganj uprising had far-reaching consequences. In response to the uprising the British passed the Bengal Tenancy Act, Act VIII of 1885, which came to be known as the Declaration of the Peasants. Empowered by the Permanent Settlement Act of 1773 and the Act of 1859 the zamindars could increase the rates of taxes and evict peasants from their land by taking permission from lower courts. The Act of 1885 abolished this privilege and passed the law that a peasant having occupancy for 12 years could not be evicted from the land.

SEE ALSO: Bangladesh, Struggle for Liberation, 1971; Pakistan, Bengali Nationalist Struggles

References and Suggested Readings

- Basu, S. (1987) Gono Oshontosh O Unish Shotoker Bangali Samaj (Popular Unrest and Nineteenth-Century Bengali Society). Kolkata: Pustak Biponi.
- Bhattacharya, A. (2006) A Critique of the Existing Historiography of the Sannyasi Rebellion. Journal of History, Jadavpur University, 22–3: 18–50.
- Dasgupta, A. K. (1992) The Fakir and Sannyasi Uprising in Bengal. Calcutta: K. P. Bagchi.
- Kaviraj, N. (1972) A Peasant Uprising in Bengal, 1783. New Delhi: People's Publishing House.

Ben-Gurion, David (1886–1973) and the Haganah

Lawrence Davidson

David Ben-Gurion was one of the three principal leaders of the Zionist movement along with Theodor Herzl and Chaim Weizmann. He helped to found the Haganah, the precursor of the Israeli army, and served as Israel's first prime minister. He is considered by many Israelis to be the founder of his country.

David Ben-Gurion was born David Gruen in Plonsk, Poland. His father was an early Jewish nationalist, and thus Ben-Gurion grew up in

Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion (center left with jacket) presides as the last of the British troops are dismissed on July 4, 1948. Israel had previously declared its independence from Britain on May 14, 1948, the day before the British Mandate of Palestine expired, signaling the beginning of the 1948 Arab–Israeli War over control of the region. (© Bettmann/ CORBIS) a Zionist household. His education included the learning of modern Hebrew. In 1906 Ben-Gurion left Poland for Palestine, which was then part of the Ottoman Empire. In Palestine he worked as a farm laborer and became active in Zionist organizations.

Ben-Gurion's motivation was secular rather than religious. He was a socialist and, in 1921, declared that Zionists in Palestine were "following a new path which contradicts developments in the whole world except Russia." He was, in those early years, a great admirer of Vladimir Lenin. He was active at the 1907 convention of the Zionist Socialist Party, and there helped insert into the party's platform the declaration that "The party aspires to the political independence of the Jewish people in this land [Palestine]." From the very beginning of his political activities in Palestine, Ben-Gurion sought the creation of a Jewish state.

Ben-Gurion was strong willed and ambitious. In 1910 he edited the party's newspaper and in 1911 attended the eleventh Zionist conference in Vienna. At one point he traveled to Istanbul after concluding that it was necessary for the Zionist leaders to learn Ottoman law, but World War I intervened. By the time the war broke out he was well known to the Ottoman authorities as a person working for Jewish independence, and so was arrested for conspiring against the Empire. He was subsequently sent into exile by the authorities.

In exile, Ben-Gurion made his way to New York City in 1915 to build a socialist Zionist movement in the United States. It was in the US that Ben-Gurion first experienced a democratic political environment and his admiration for it helped temper his Leninist style of leadership. It was in New York that he met his wife, Paula Munweis, who was also a Zionist activist.

After World War I Ben-Gurion returned to Palestine, now a British mandate territory, and rapidly rose in the ranks of the Labor Zionist Party. He helped found and lead the Histadrut (the General Federation of Labor), the huge labor organization that represented and provided services for most of the Jewish workers in Palestine, and later Israel. It was also at this time (the early 1920s) that serious resistance to Jewish immigration flared among the Arab Palestinians. At this stage Ben-Gurion saw the Palestinians as rather primitive people, lacking any nationalist consciousness and having no collective rights. He ultimately thought that most of them could be bribed to leave the country. This latter assumption was overturned when Palestinian Arab demonstrations against Jewish immigration turned violent. By late 1920 he seemed to have concluded that the Jews of Palestine could not rely on the British to protect them from Arab violence or to suppress Arab resistance to further Jewish immigration. Indeed, he decided that a war with the Arabs was inevitable, and began to advocate for Zionists in Palestine to create their own armed force.

This led to the creation of the Haganah (defense) in December of 1920. Initially, it was a loosely organized militia force of the Histadrut, which had branches in the larger Jewish towns and settlements, and looked after their defense. After the Arab rebellion of 1929, the Haganah's organization was overhauled. Leadership was centralized and as many of the Jewish youth of Palestine as possible were enlisted and trained. Urban corps were also established in the cities and officer training courses were initiated. Arms were purchased on the black market and small factories were secretly established to manufacture small arms; clandestine arms depots were created. According to the Israeli version of the Haganah's history, Ben-Gurion created a doctrine of restraint for the organization throughout much of the 1920s and 1930s. That is, the Haganah's duty was to maintain a strict defensive posture, refrain from retaliation, and avoid civilian casualties.

The policy of restraint caused a split in the Haganah movement. Those opposed to it left the organization to start their own militias. This led first to the formation of the Irgun Zva'i Leumi (National Military Organization), led by Menachem Begin, and eventually Lehi (Fighters for Israel's Freedom) led by Abraham Stern. Both organizations adopted the strategy of retaliation against the Arabs, and later against the British forces as well; both used terrorist tactics that targeted civilians. Palestinian commentators on the struggle between Zionists and Arabs at this stage assert that the policy of restraint was mere camouflage on the part of Ben-Gurion and the Haganah. They argue that the Haganah never made any effort to stop independent attacks on Arab civilians and so, unofficially, went along with them.

As far as the British mandate authorities were concerned, the Haganah was an illegal, underground operation; however, until the end of World War II, there is evidence that the British turned a blind eye to Haganah actions and even utilized Haganah fighters on occasion. For instance, in 1938 the British created a special Jewish commando unit, called the Special Night Squad, for counterinsurgency operations against Arab rebels. These men were drawn from the Haganah. It was also in this year that Ben-Gurion created a professional military general staff for the organization.

After 1939 the main job that Ben-Gurion gave to the Haganah was to organize and facilitate illegal immigration operations. Simultaneously, he encouraged elements of the Haganah to enlist in the British army's "Jewish Brigade" that was to be used in the war against the Nazis. This latter move was to give the Haganah forces as much real military experience as possible. No similar Palestinian Arab force was created by the British. All of these activities resulted in a professionalized Zionist military organization in place by the end of World War II.

Ben-Gurion may have expected that with the coming of World War II and the dire conditions facing Europe's Jews the British would increase their rate of Jewish immigration into Palestine; however, this did not happen. On May 17, 1939 the British government issued a White Paper that stated "the framers of the Mandate in which the Balfour Declaration was embodied could not have intended that Palestine should be converted into a Jewish state against the will of the Arab population of that country." In the light of the impending outbreak of World War II and the need for the support of the Arab and Muslim worlds against the fascist powers, the White Paper announced a new policy for Palestine. It promised an "independent Palestinian state" within ten years. Jewish immigration was to be kept at 15,000 per year for five years, and thereafter allowed only with the (highly unlikely) agreement of the Arab population. It was estimated that at the end of the ten-year period the Jewish population would be no more than one-third the total population. Thus the White Paper, if fully implemented, spelled the end of the dream of a Jewish state in Palestine.

Ben-Gurion and the rest of the Zionists were now in a bind. They could not begin a serious struggle against the British because that country led the fight against Nazi Germany, a much more deadly enemy of the Jews than either England or the Palestinian Arabs. On the other hand, with Europe's Jews in ever greater danger, the western nations maintaining overly restrictive immigration laws, and the Zionist ideology being decidedly oriented toward Palestine, that land seemed to be the only place for refugees to go. Thus, Ben-Gurion made his famous declaration that the Zionists would fight with the British against the Nazis "as if there were no White Paper" and fight against the White Paper "as if there were no war" with the Nazis. The latter fight took the form of smuggling refugees into Palestine.

Once World War II ended, Ben-Gurion again might have expected the British to evacuate Palestine and allow for the creation of a Jewish state. Once more, that is not what took place. The British hung on to Palestine, even as they transformed much of the rest of their empire into the British Commonwealth. Now, however, there was no Nazi threat to complicate the situation for Ben-Gurion and the Haganah. The Zionists were free to wage war against British forces in Palestine. Ben-Gurion, who was now head of the influential worldwide organization known as the Jewish Agency, as well as leader of the largest Zionist political organization in Palestine, ordered the Haganah to begin to prepare for a showdown struggle with both the Arabs and the British. Indeed, both Jewish and Arab resistance to British rule eventually forced them to announce, in December of 1947, a date (May 15, 1948) upon which they would unilaterally withdraw from Palestine.

On May 14, 1948, a day before the British withdrawal, Ben-Gurion declared the establishment of the State of Israel. He became the country's first prime minister, and its first minister of defense. Fighting between the Haganah, now joined by the Irgun and Lehi, against Palestinian Arab irregular forces had already begun. In March 1948 Haganah commanders came up with a campaign strategy known as Plan Dalet (D). The Haganah claimed that this plan was for the defense of the impending new state. The Palestinians claimed that, as executed, the plan aimed to rid as much of the territory as possible of its non-Jewish inhabitants. As it turned out, both sides used terror as a tactic; however, since the Zionist forces proved the stronger, it is the Palestinians who ended up fleeing for their lives or being pushed out by the combined forces of the new Jewish state, including the Haganah.

David Ben-Gurion was now prime minister of Israel and the Haganah now provided the troops for the Israeli army. Besides securing the country from invading Arab armies and pushing as many Palestinians out of Israel as they could, the Israeli army had to subdue the militia of their long-term rival, the Irgun. Ben-Gurion despised his rivals in the Irgun and seemed to have seriously believed that its leader, Menachem Begin, was capable of attempting to take over the country through an armed coup. Thus, destroying the Irgun militia became a strategic goal for Ben-Gurion. He accomplished this in June 1948, when an old naval ship, renamed Altalena, belonging to the Irgun arrived off the coast of Tel Aviv laden with arms. Ben-Gurion ordered the weapons turned over to the Haganah and, when Begin hesitated, he ordered the ship shelled. There was to be only one government, one prime minister, and one army in Israel.

After the establishment of the state, Ben-Gurion retired from government several times (the first time in 1953), but could never stay away entirely. He was defense minister again in 1955 and responsible for the policy of systematic reprisal actions for Palestinian raids. These were to be carried out beyond the armistice lines and inflict punishment on Jordanians, Syrians, and Egyptians greater than any damage done by Palestinian raiders. Ben-Gurion's rationale was that such punishment would force the neighboring governments to close their borders to the Palestinians. This strategy only worked partially, though it killed a lot of Arab civilians. Ben-Gurion finally retired from politics permanently in 1965 after losing electorally during a final comeback attempt. He died in 1973 at the age of 87.

SEE ALSO: Begin, Menachem (1913–1992) and the Irgun; Intifada I and Intifada II; Zionism

References and Suggested Readings

- Ben-Eliezer, U. (1998) The Making of Israeli Militarism. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Ben-Gurion, D. (1970) Memoirs: David Ben-Gurion. New York: World Publishing.
- Ben-Gurion, D. (1974) The Jews in Their Land. Garden City, NY: Doubleday.
- Van Creveld, M. (1998) The Sword and the Olive: A Critical History of the Israeli Defense Force. New York: Public Affairs.
- Zweig, R. (1991) David Ben-Gurion: Politics and Leadership in Israel. New York: Routledge.

Benjamin, Walter (1892–1940)

Michael Löwy

Walter Benjamin, born in Berlin on July 15, 1892 to a German Jewish middle-class family, occupies a unique place in the history of modern revolutionary thought: he was the first Marxist to break radically with the ideology of progress. His thinking has therefore a distinct critical quality that sets his apart from the dominant and “official” forms of historical materialism.

This peculiarity has to do with his ability to incorporate into the body of Marxist revolutionary theory insights from the Romantic critique of civilization and from the Jewish messianic tradition. Both elements are present in his early writings, particularly The Life of the Students (1915), where he rejected “a conception of history, whose confidence in the infinity of time only distinguishes the speed by which men and epochs roll, quicker or slower, along the track of progress” (Benjamin 1974, I, 1: 75).

Benjamin's first reference to communism appeared in his (1921) Critique of Violence, where he celebrated the “devastating and on the whole justified” critique of the Parliament by the Bolsheviks and the anarcho-syndicalists (Benjamin 1974, II, 1: 191). This link between communism and anarchism was an important aspect of his political evolution as his Marxism began to take a libertarian color. But it was only after 1924, when he read George Lukács' History and Class Consciousness (1923) and discovered practical communism through the eyes of Asja Laciš – a Soviet artist and political activist he met in Capri – that Marxism became a key component of his worldview. In 1929 he still referred to Lukács' opus as one of the few books which remained lively and topical and continued to influence his independence of mind towards the "official" doctrine of Soviet Marxism despite his sympathies for the USSR (Benjamin 1974, III: 171).

The first work where the influence of Marxism is clear is One Way Street, written from 1923 to 1925 and published in 1928. In this work, Benjamin charged his former neo-romantic criticism of progress with a revolutionary Marxist tension, as in the section called "Fire Alarm": "if the abolition of the bourgeoisie is not completed before an almost calculable moment in economic and technical development (a moment signaled by inflation and poison-gas warfare) all is lost. Before the spark reaches the dynamite, the lighted fuse must be cut." Survival or destruction of "three thousand years of cultural development" depended on the proletariat being able to fulfill this historical task (Benjamin 1978: 84). Yet, in opposition to the evolutionist brand of Marxism, Benjamin did not conceive the proletarian revolution as the "natural" or "inevitable" result of economic and technical progress, but as the critical interruption of an evolution leading to catastrophe. This critical standpoint explains why his Marxism has a peculiarly pessimistic spirit – a revolutionary pessimism which has nothing to do with resigned fatalism. In his 1929 article on Surrealism – where he again tried to reconcile anarchism and Marxism – he defined communism as the organization of pessimism (Benjamin 1974, II, 1: 308).

When Hitler seized power in 1933, Benjamin, like many Jews and anti-fascists, had to leave Germany. Exiled in Paris, he survived precariously with a small stipendium from the Institute of Social Research, the "Frankfurt School" exiled in New York. During those years he worked on his unfinished project on the Parisian Arcades, while producing some remarkable Marxist essays on Baudelaire and on the "Work of Art in the Age of its Mechanical Reproduction" (1935).

Politically, Benjamin was very critical of social democracy, and after 1937 he also increasingly distanced himself from Soviet (Stalinist) Marxism.

His 1937 article "Edward Fuchs, Collector and Historian" contains a severe criticism of social democratic ideology, which combined Marxism with positivism, Darwinist evolutionism, and the cult of "progress." Its greatest mistake is that it saw in the development of technology only the progress of natural sciences, never the social regression. It never perceived the danger that the energies produced by technology could serve above all for the technical perfection of war. Against the shallow optimism of the pseudo-Marxists, Benjamin opposed his pessimistic-revolutionary perspective, referring himself to Engels and Marx's prognosis on the possibility of a barbaric development of capitalism (Benjamin 1974, II, 2: 474–5).

Benjamin's Marxism, nourished by Romantic culture and Jewish theology, was a new and original reinterpretation of historical materialism radically different from the orthodoxy of the Second and Third Internationals. It should be considered as an attempt to deepen and radicalize the opposition between Marxism and bourgeois ideology, to heighten its revolutionary potential, and to sharpen its critical content. This was also the aim of the Arcades project: "One can perceive as one of the methodological aims of this work to demonstrate the possibility of a historical materialism, that has annihilated in itself the idea of progress. Here is precisely where historical materialism has to dissociate itself from the bourgeois habits of thought" (Passagenwerk, in Benjamin 1974, V, 1: 574). Such a program did not aim for "revision," but rather, as Karl Korsch tried to do in his 1936 book Karl Marx (one of Benjamin's major sources), sought a return to Marx himself.

In 1939, as the war began, Benjamin was interned as an "enemy alien" by the French government. He managed to escape the internment camp, but after the German victory and occupation of France in 1940, he had to leave Paris for Marseille. Under these dramatic circumstances he wrote his last piece, the thesis On the Concept of History, perhaps the most important document in revolutionary theory since Marx's celebrated Theses on Feuerbach (1845). In these few but extraordinarily dense pages, the ideology of progress is criticized in its philosophical foundations, the linear and empty time, with the help of a messianic conception of time.

Soon after, in August 1940, Benjamin and a group of German anti-fascist refugees tried to cross the French border at the Pyrenées but were arrested by the (Franco) Spanish police. They were taken to the village of Port-Bou and told they would be delivered to the French or German police. In his final act of protest, Benjamin chose to commit suicide.

The question of the relationship between Marxism and messianism in Benjamin's later writings is controversial. Some explain this relation in terms of "secularization." Others, however, speak of "theologization." During the sharp polemics of the 1960s in Germany, some insisted on the religious dimension, others on Marxist materialism. Benjamin himself referred to his "Janus face," but the critics looked at one face only, ignoring the other one. In reality, his faces were manifestations of one single thought which had simultaneously a messianic and a Marxist expression. His works offer a critique of the sort of Marxism that understands history as a mechanical process leading automatically to the triumph of socialism; the reestablishment of the explosive, "theological" (i.e., messianic), and revolutionary spirit of historical materialism, reduced to a miserable automaton by its epigones.

One must take seriously the idea according to which theology is "at the service of" historical materialism – a formulation that reverts the traditional scholastic definition of philosophy as ancilla theologiae. Theology, as memory of the victims and hope of redemption, is not for Benjamin an aim in itself, a mystical contemplation of the divine: it is at the service of the oppressed's struggle. Indeed, a few decades after Benjamin's death, the idea of a theology at the service of the poor in the struggle for their self-liberation, a theology intimately linked with Marxism, came to life again through the liberationist Christianity of Latin America.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism; Lukács, Georg (1885–1971); Marx, Karl (1818–1883); Marxism; Socialism

References and Suggested Readings

- Benjamin, W. (1969) Illuminations. New York: Schocken.
- Benjamin, W. (1974) Gesammelte Schriften. Frankfurt am Main: Suhrkamp.
- Benjamin, W. (1978) One Way Street. In P. Demetz (Ed.), Reflections. New York: Harcourt Brace.
- Leslie E. (2000) Walter Benjamin: Overpowering Conformism. London: Pluto Press.
- Löwy, M. (2005) Fire Alarm: Reading Walter Benjamin's "On the Concept of History". London: Verso.

Marcus, L. & Nead, L. (1998) The Actuality of Walter Benjamin. London: Lawrence & Wishart.

Berkeley Free Speech Movement

Nicole Frisone

The 1964 Free Speech Movement (FSM) at the University of California, Berkeley served as a catalyst and inspiration for countless student demonstrations around the world for over a decade. The issues debated during the Free Speech Movement extended beyond free speech to include the relationship between students and the university, the meaning of individuality and education, and the role of the university in American society.

During the years preceding the FSM, the University of California system experienced a massive expansion of its student population, campuses, and bureaucracy. Administrative duties decentralized to form separate campus and state-wide administrations. In undergraduate courses, graduate teaching assistants increasingly replaced faculty, while the growing bureaucracy further separated both students and administrators from the university's president, its board of regents, and the faculty. By 1964 the civil rights movement reached the Bay Area. Many Berkeley students participated in demonstrations and sit-ins against area businesses such as the Sheraton Palace and Mel's Diner. The civil rights movement politicized many Berkeley students, including FSM student leaders Mario Savio and Jackie Goldberg through their involvement in Bay Area civil rights activities as well as Mississippi Freedom Summer.

In July 1964 a local newspaper notified university officials that the sidewalk students used for political advocacy belonged to the Board of Regents, who expressly forbade political advocacy on campus – so administrators closed the area to campus clubs. When students returned to campus that fall, the university banned advocacy on the sidewalk at the intersection of Bancroft and Telegraph Avenues. An area usually reserved for political advocacy, students could no longer recruit for demonstrations, pass out leaflets, or collect donations. Administrators picked the worst time possible to implement the change – the November ballot included a presidential election and important California equal housing legislation.

Students, infuriated, demanded the area be returned to them. Campus groups selected representatives to speak with administrators. Student clubs ranging from the Young Socialist Alliance, Young Republicans for Goldwater, and Friends of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee coalesced into what they called the Free Speech Movement. By October, student demands changed to include the students' right to advocate and recruit for off-campus illegal demonstrations, such as sit-ins, anywhere on university property.

The February 1, 1960 sit-in in Greensboro, North Carolina launched the civil rights sit-in movement that dominated early 1960s activism. In similar fashion, Berkeley students launched the on-campus demonstrations that pervaded the decade when they sat-in around a police car on October 1–2, 1964 for over 30 hours to prevent the arrest of activist Jack Weinberg. Weinberg, a former Berkeley student and Congress of Racial Equality member, joined students to defy the administration's prohibition of advocacy on university property. In December, Berkeley set a record for the largest mass arrest on a university campus, a record that remained intact. Police took over 12 hours to arrest over 700 participants in the Sproul Hall sit-in. The FSM ultimately won the support of the Faculty Senate, which met all their demands. The movement ended, but the message of personal freedom and questioning of university authority remained strong on the Berkeley campus and spread to others.

Savio's words on the steps of Sproul Hall on December 2, 1964 gave voice to a new generation of students:

There is a time when the operation of the machine becomes so odious, makes you so sick at heart, that you can't take part, can't even tacitly take part; and you've got to put your bodies upon the gears and upon the wheels, upon the levers, upon all the apparatus, and you've got to make it stop. And you've got to indicate to the people who run it, to the people who own it, that unless you're free, the machine will be prevented from working at all!

Campus administrators around the country learned little from President Clark Kerr or Chancellor Edward Strong. Students, however, took note of the FSM's strategy, organization, and message, which held mass appeal to a new generation of students. European activists cite Berkeley and Savio as an influence; Columbia University students in 1968 echoed the feelings of "intellectual lock step" and concern over their university's role in society in the same way Berkeley students did four years earlier. The Free Speech Movement's adept use of the media, centrally organized bureaucracy, and coalition of disparate campus groups provided a blueprint for future activists seeking change on their campuses.

FSM leaders had the foresight to create an archive of documents for future study, currently a part of the Bancroft library at the University of California, Berkeley. Trial transcripts, leaflets, and Berkeley newspapers comprise only some of their immense holdings. At Berkeley, faculty at the university during the FSM often rushed out to study the events as they unfolded or immediately afterward. Berkeley sociologists in particular published many studies of the student movement, while the students themselves wrote and published their own accounts, leaving behind a rich written record of their activities.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Vietnam War Movement, United States; Civil Rights Movement, United States, 1960–1965; CORE (Congress of Racial Equality); Student Movements

References and Suggested Readings

- Cohen, R. & Zelnik, R. (Eds.) (2002) The Free Speech Movement: Reflections on Berkeley in the 1960s. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Draper, H. (1965) Berkeley: The New Student Revolt. New York: Grove Press.
- Goines, D. L. (1993) The Free Speech Movement: Coming of Age in the 1960s. Berkeley: Ten Speed Press.
- Heirich, M. (1971) The Spiral of Conflict: Berkeley, 1964. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Lipset, S. M. & Wolin, S. S. (Eds.) (1965) The Berkeley Student Revolt: Facts and Interpretations. Garden City, NY: Anchor Books.
- Searle, J. (1971) The Campus War. New York: World Publishing.

Berkman, Alexander (1870–1936)

Jeff Shantz

Alexander Berkman was a leading US and Russian anarchist activist and author from the 1890s to his death in 1936. Born Ovsei Osipovich Berkman in Vilnius, Lithuania in 1870, Berkman moved to the US at age 16 following the death of his parents. He ardently embraced anarchism and syndicalism following the Chicago Haymarket Tragedy in 1886 and through his association with his lover, Emma Goldman. In the pages of his own journal Blast (1915–17) Berkman consistently advocated direct action and political violence as critical acts of “propaganda of the deed,” a notion that individual acts of violence could encourage mass uprisings.

In 1892 Berkman was arrested after his attempt to assassinate industrialist Henry Clay Frick during the Homestead strike. Hoping to arouse the striking workers to rebellion through the inspiration of his act, Berkman provoked only the contempt of the workers, who threw their sympathies over to Frick. Following his release after 14 years in prison, Berkman was a devoted anarchist organizer, notably with the Ferrer Modern School that sought to educate children outside the restrictions of the Church, and contributed to Emma Goldman’s publication Mother Earth.

A victim of the state repression by US Attorney General Mitchell Palmer under the notorious Red Scare, Berkman was arrested and imprisoned for two years for opposing conscription and US entry into World War I. In 1919 Berkman and Goldman were deported to Russia. While initially enamored of the Bolsheviks, including translating Lenin’s writings, Berkman became disillusioned by the persecution of anarchists and what he saw as the deferring of revolutionary objectives to the self-interests of the party bureaucracy. Berkman and Goldman left Russia for Germany in 1921, following the Soviet suppression of the Kronstadt rebellion and murder of sailors and workers.

In his later years, informed by his direct experience in the US and Soviet Russia, Berkman questioned the expediency of violence in anarchist social transformation. In his classic work What is Anarchist Communism? (1929) Berkman provides a clearly written introduction to anarchocommunist ideas as influenced by Kropotkin’s work on mutual aid and the practices of anarchist approaches to social development. Berkman identifies violence as a “method of ignorance” and a “weapon of the weak,” condemning even the violent suppression of counterrevolutionaries. He considered that promoting anarchism is most effective and lasting through providing practical examples of liberty and equality through action.

Berkman spent the last years of his life as a leading progressive critic of the Bolshevik regime and authoritarian communism. In severe pain during the final years of his life, Berkman committed suicide on June 28, 1936 mere weeks before the beginning of the Spanish Revolution.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism in the United States to 1945; Escuela Moderna Movement (The Modern School); Goldman, Emma (1869–1940); Haymarket Tragedy; Kronstadt Mutiny of 1921; Kropotkin, Peter (1842–1921); Palmer Raids; Spanish Revolution

References and Suggested Readings

- Avrich, P. (1990) Anarchist Portraits. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
 Berkman, A. (1980) What is Communist Anarchism? Gloucester, MA: Peter Smith.
 Horowitz, I. L. (2005) The Anarchists. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Press.

Berlinguer, Enrico (1922–1984)

Mauro Stampacchia

Enrico Berlinguer was secretary of the Italian Communist Party (PCI) from 1972 to his sudden death in 1984. He strongly influenced his party by proposing “historical compromise” and “Eurocommunism,” but failed to succeed politically in both goals. Berlinguer was born in Sassari on the island of Sardinia on May 25, 1922, to a liberal democratic, anti-fascist family that was actively involved in politics. Young Enrico enrolled in the PCI in 1943, and three years later joined the Central Committee in Sassari. From 1949 to 1956 Berlinguer headed the Young Communist Federation. He was elected deputy in 1968 and vice-secretary of the PCI at the 12th Congress, when serving PCI secretary Luigi Longo’s health was in decline.

In 1972 Berlinguer became secretary of the Italian Communist Party. His career as a party official did not hinder him from acquiring strong charismatic appeal. As the head of a party now at the top of its electoral and popular support, Berlinguer was perceived as a potential agent of transformation of the Italian political system.

In the aftermath of the Chilean coup of September 11, 1973, Berlinguer wrote three articles in the party weekly Rinascita, pointing out that any Popular Front-like alliance in Italy would cause the rise of right-wing reaction similar to that in Chile. He argued that the only way to bring about political change was through “historical compromise,” a new alliance of the three parties that had founded the Italian political system, the communists, socialists, and Christian Democrats (DC), the latter, in that political pattern, to be brought back to their “popular roots.” Berlinguer voiced this proposal, representing a dramatic turn in communist politics, during the 1970s, a decade of great upsurge in social and political dissent, and drew sharp criticism from the new left. PCI leaders, however, endorsed the plan as the party strategy.

In international relations the strategy of historical compromise in internal politics was matched with stronger criticism of the Soviet Union, a quest for more independent policies in the “national path to socialism,” and support for “Eurocommunism,” a common strategy of European communist parties seeking to free themselves from strong Soviet control. Berlinguer fought against the idea that the association of the PCI with the Italian national government would intensify the Cold War through creating an imbalance in global relations between the US and the Soviet Union. The plan also laid the groundwork for ending the unofficial conventio ad excludendum (covenant to exclude) that kept the PCI from participating in Italian governments.

The 1976 general elections brought the PCI a close second, just behind the DC, and the way seemed clear to winning electoral control. In parliament communist deputies took a moderate stance, not voting to support DC government policies but, by abstaining, not voting against. Berlinguer appealed to “national solidarity” in facing the economic crisis and supported the idea of “austerity,” meaning a cut in working-class conditions. However, 1977 saw an upsurge of protest by young people and workers, aimed also against the PCI and its trade union, the Confederazione Generale Italiana del Lavoro (CGIL).

In the Christian Democrat Aldo Moro, Berlinguer had found an interlocutor and a link with the party. On the same day, March 15, 1978, that parliament was planning to vote in support of a new executive expressing the new alliance, Aldo Moro was kidnapped by the Red Brigades in Rome. Berlinguer and the PCI followed a rigid stance of non-negotiation with the Red Brigades and launched a broad campaign against terrorism. However, the campaign did not bring the PCI nearer to the executive. Aldo Moro was killed, and a year later Berlinguer returned to the opposition, ending the era of “national solidarity.” In the meantime the Eurocommunist project continued to decline, adversely influenced by Moscow and Washington policies.

In the last years of his leadership from November 1980, Berlinguer positioned the PCI with the hope that a “democratic alternative” could be achieved through the communists and socialists sharing a party. However, the Socialist Party leader Bettino Craxi opposed Berlinguer’s effort, and the PCI again failed to gain a governing role. Berlinguer then turned to what he called the “moral question,” a strong rebuke of big business, politics, and corruption, later revealed to be widespread in the 1990s. In the international arena, in the depths of the so-called “second Cold War,” Berlinguer expanded the prestige the PCI had gathered in its Eurocommunist days by condemning Jaruzelski’s coup d’état in Poland and the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, even declaring in Moscow that the forward thrust of the 1917 Russian Revolution had come to a halt – an assertion condemned by Soviet leaders.

Berlinguer’s political project, though hampered, was to remain incomplete. On June 11, 1984, during a PCI mass rally in Padua for the European elections, Berlinguer was unable to finish his speech and died of a stroke. His death caused widespread mourning and the funeral was a mass event. In the European elections the PCI gained more votes in the polls than any other party in Italy.

Berlinguer sharply reshaped the political culture of the Italian Communist Party from a class-based doctrine to what he saw as a third way between Soviet socialism and European social democracy, but failed in his efforts to put the plan into practice. Soviet General Secretary Mikhail Gorbachev acknowledged that he was influenced by Berlinguer in his attempts to reform Soviet socialism, although the plan was never fully realized. The PCI was never completely integrated within the mainstream European political system. Despite his failures, Berlinguer’s efforts are widely recognized in Italian politics, and he remains a popular political icon.

SEE ALSO: Eurocommunism; Gorbachev, Mikhail (b. 1931); Italian Communist Party; Italian Socialist Party; Italy, from the New Left to the Great Repression (1962–1981); Red Brigades

References and Suggested Readings

- Barbagallo, F. (2006) Enrico Berlinguer. Rome: Carocci.
- Berlinguer, E. (2001) Discorsi parlamentari 1968–1974. Rome: Camera dei Deputati.
- D'Alema, M. & Ginsborg, P. (1994) Dialogo su Berlinguer. Florence: Giunti.
- Fiori, G. (1992) Vita di Enrico Berlinguer. Bari-Rome: L'Unità-Laterza.
- Gorbachev, M. (1994) Le idee di Berlinguer ci servono ancora. Rome: Sisifo.
- Pons, S. (2006) Berlinguer e la fine del comunismo. Turin: Einaudi.
- Tronti, M. (1994) Il profeta disarmato. Rome: Sisifo.
- Veltroni, W. (2004) La sfida interrotta: Le idee di Enrico Berlinguer. Milan: Baldini Castoldi Dalai.

Bernstein, Eduard (1850–1932)

Manfred B. Steger

Eduard Bernstein was a leading German social democratic politician and theorist. His life is a microcosmic reflection of the first century of the German Social Democratic Party (SPD). Like the German labor movement itself, Bernstein started out as a socialist eclectic, then he “converted” to Marxist orthodoxy only to return to an eclectic position which, enriched by Marxist theory, nonetheless espoused a non-revolutionary, democratic socialism that recognized Marxism only as one among several important theoretical sources. Reviled by his enemies as a “traitor of the working class” and celebrated by his supporters as a “champion of democracy,” Bernstein contributed more than any other pre-World War I socialist theorist to the conceptual framework of twentieth-century European social democracy.

Born in Berlin on January 6, 1850, Bernstein grew up in modest circumstances. After a short career as a bank clerk in Berlin, he joined the SPD as a campaign speaker and pamphleteer. After being expelled from Germany in 1878 as a result of German Chancellor Bismarck’s repressive “Anti-Socialist Laws,” Bernstein settled in Zurich, Switzerland, from where he edited Der Sozialdemokrat, the rallying point of the underground SPD press. When Bismarck secured his expulsion from Switzerland, Bernstein continued publication of the periodical from London, where he cultivated close contacts with Friedrich Engels and the leaders of the British socialist Fabian Society. When Engels died in 1895, Bernstein served as his literary executor and was widely regarded as one of the leading Marxist voices in Europe.

Thus, it came as a shock to his party comrades when Bernstein launched a series of tough criticisms of Marxist theory. In a number of articles and books that appeared between 1896 and 1900, the former Marxist stalwart rejected the central Marxist dogma of the inevitable collapse of capitalist society and the ensuing revolutionary seizure of power by the working class. In his view, Marx and Engels had painted an unrealistic picture of a revolutionary “final goal.” As Bernstein (1988: 168–9) put the matter famously, “I must confess that I have very little interest in what is usually referred to the ‘final goal of socialism.’ This goal, whatever it may be, is nothing to me, while the movement is everything.” He added: “By ‘the movement’ I mean the progressive social change and its political and economic organization by working people.”

Suggesting that capitalism was getting better at containing its weaknesses, Bernstein rejected revolution in favor of an “evolutionary” road to socialism through peaceful, parliamentary means centered on success at the ballot box and gradual democratic reforms. Stressing the tight connection between means and ends, he insisted that the extension of democracy required democratic methods. Moreover, he argued that the SPD ought to broaden its narrow working-class base and appeal to the middle class as well, thus turning itself into a genuine “people’s party.” Finally, rejecting the Marxist view that liberalism and socialism constituted diametrically opposed worldviews, Bernstein urged socialists to consider themselves “the legitimate heirs of liberalism” and embrace the Enlightenment language of citizenship, human rights, rule of law, and universal ethics.

Although Bernstein’s views became the widely accepted cornerstones of modern European social democracy after World War II, they were severely condemned at three successive SPD congresses at the turn of the century. Various European Marxists like V. I. Lenin in Russia and Rosa Luxemburg and Karl Kautsky in Germany, wrote vitriolic pamphlets against Bernstein, calling him a “muddle-headed revisionist” betraying the cause of the working class. Unlike these leading Marxist theorists, however, Bernstein proved himself to be a skillful orator and organizer who recognized the importance of practical politics. Allowed to return to Berlin in 1901 after 23 years of political exile, he was elected to the Reichstag, the German parliament, from 1902 to 1906, 1912 to 1918, and 1920 to 1928.

At the outbreak of the Great War in 1914, Bernstein first voted with the entire SPD leadership in favor of the war, but reversed his opinion a year later, arguing that the German Imperial Government had been the aggressor. Three years later, when Lenin’s Bolshevik Party successfully seized power in Russia, he emerged as one of communism’s earliest and fiercest critics, warning that Lenin’s brand of “socialism” was based on the “erroneous belief in the omnipotence of brute force.” Bernstein (1996: 190) predicted, correctly as it turned out, that the Soviet regime represented an “odd repetition of the old despotism of the Czars” that would eventually lead Russia into a “social and economic abyss.” In the short-lived German Weimar Republic (1918–33), the aging Bernstein held high political posts, including the cabinet position of under-secretary of the treasury. During his parliamentary tenure in 1920–8 he concentrated on matters of taxation and foreign affairs while maintaining his busy journalistic schedule. Bernstein died on December 18, 1932, only six weeks before Adolf Hitler took power in Germany.

The core of Bernstein’s non-revolutionary, democratic socialism is perhaps best expressed in a passage taken from his revisionist masterpiece, The Preconditions of Socialism (1993: 142): “Democracy is both means and end. It is the weapon for the struggle for socialism, and it is the form in which socialism will be realized.”

SEE ALSO: Germany, Socialism and Nationalism; Social Democratic Party, Germany; Socialism

References and Suggested Readings

- Bernstein, E. (1988) Marxism and Social Democracy: The Revisionist Debate 1896–1898. Ed. H. Tudor and J. M. Tudor. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Bernstein, E. (1899/1993) The Preconditions of Socialism. Ed. and trans. H. Tudor. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Bernstein, E. (1996) Selected Writings of Eduard Bernstein, 1900–1921. Ed. and trans. M. B. Steger. Atlantic Highlands, NJ: Humanities Press.

Gay, P. (1952) The Dilemma of Democratic Socialism: Eduard Bernstein’s Challenge to Marx. New York: Columbia University Press.

Steger, M. B. (1997) The Quest for Evolutionary Socialism: Eduard Bernstein and Social Democracy. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Betances, Ramón Emeterio (1827–1898)

Michael Staudenmaier

Ramón Emeterio Betances was a prominent Puerto Rican nationalist and social reformer during the latter half of the nineteenth century. He is considered by some to be the “father of the nation” as a result of his leadership of the early struggle for independence from Spain. His greatest fame came as a central organizer of the insurrection later known as the “Grito de Lares” (Cry of Lares), a seminal uprising against Spanish rule in 1868. Betances also campaigned actively for the abolition of slavery in Puerto Rico, which was finally achieved in 1873, eight years after the end of the US Civil War. Throughout, he was an ardent internationalist, working closely with radicals throughout the Caribbean, in the United States, and further afield in Europe.

Born to a mixed-race father and a French mother, Betances was at home in several worlds from birth. He lived much of his life in France, but also spent time in the Dominican Republic, the United States, and the Virgin Islands. He studied medicine in Paris and became an accomplished surgeon with a strong focus on public health. While in France he witnessed the aftermath of the 1848 revolutions, and this experience, along with his active participation in freemasonry, colored his approach to social change. He prioritized secretive conspiracies but also cultivated well-known and powerful individuals to advocate publicly for independence and abolition. This two-pronged approach was first utilized in his campaign against slavery, for which he was exiled from Puerto Rico in 1858. Subsequently, drawing on both the Bolivarian tradition of revolutions in South America and the internationalism of the 1848 events in Europe, Betances called for a Confederation of the Antilles, which entailed independence for Puerto Rico, Cuba, and Jamaica, as well as sovereignty for Haiti and the Dominican Republic.

In 1867 Betances initiated a conspiracy to stage an armed insurrection against Spanish rule in Puerto Rico. The plot was far-flung, including, among other elements, an attempt to gain support from the Chilean government, a purchase of weapons coordinated between New York and the Dominican Republic, and a ship chartered to transport the arms and reinforcements to Puerto Rico via the Virgin Islands, where Betances, again in exile, coordinated the conspiracy at a distance. In the end, the effort fell victim to a perfect storm of misfortune: the emissary sent to Chile fell ill and died upon arrival, the vessel carrying weapons and volunteers was impounded in the Virgin Islands, and the clandestine cells established in Puerto Rico were discovered by agents of the Spanish military shortly before the planned date of insurrection. The uprising, short of weapons and men, and deprived of any practical support from outside the island, was crushed by the Spanish after only a few days of combat.

Despite its spectacular failure, however, the Grito de Lares marked a turning point in the history of Puerto Rico. Betances and his comrades had drafted a constitution for an independent island, and in Lares on September 23, 1868 the insurgents had proclaimed the Republic of Puerto Rico. Every subsequent generation of the independence movement has drawn inspiration from Lares and from Betances. In a broader sense, the internationalism of the uprising foreshadowed later interactions among Puerto Rican, Cuban, and Dominican revolutionaries that have continued up to the present. Betances himself spent much of the next two decades working with the Cuban revolutionary movement.

Betances spent the remainder of his life in exile, mostly in France. Late in life he is reported to have assisted the Italian anarchist Michele Angiolillo in his assassination of the Spanish prime minister, Antonio Canovas. The evidence for this claim is limited, but it is clear that Betances was associated with anarchists in Paris and had met with Angiolillo. His support for armed action against Spain suggests the accounts are at least plausible. In the end, a commitment to internationalism and revolution ensured that Betances participated in and supported a strikingly wide range of struggles. At the time of his death, he was basically penniless, but his life's work has been remembered by radicals, in Puerto Rico and elsewhere, for more than a century.

SEE ALSO: Cuba, Struggle for Independence from Spain, 1868–1898; European Revolutions of 1848; Puerto Rican Independence Movement, 1898–Present

References and Suggested Readings

- Anderson, B. (2005) Under Three Flags: Anarchism and the Anti-Colonial Imagination. New York: Verso.
- Jimenez de Wagenheim, O. (1993) Puerto Rico's Revolt for Independence: El Grito de Lares. Princeton: Markus Wiener.
- Ojeda Reyes, F. (2001) El Desterrado de París: Biografía del Dr. Ramón Emeterio Betances (1827–1898). San Juan, PR: Ediciones Puerto.

Bethune, Henry Norman (1890–1939)

Chris Keefer

Norman Bethune was a Canadian surgeon, social activist, and internationalist. He innovated a revolution in military medicine on the frontlines of the anti-fascist struggle of republican Spain and the anti-imperialist struggle of China between 1936 and 1939. After his death Bethune became a Chinese cultural icon and example of communism's selfless "New Man."

Before his political conversion to communism in 1935 Bethune was a respected thoracic surgeon who dabbled in painting and art collecting. However, this period was characterized by a commitment to serving the poor. He contracted tuberculosis (TB), likely from the immigrant and working-class patients whom he tended despite their inability to pay. Bethune's own brush with death between 1926 and 1927 led him on a "crusade" against TB in which he recognized the primacy of the need for radical changes to the social and economic conditions that foster the disease. This realization, coupled with a trip to the Soviet Union in which he saw the possibilities of a radical restructuring of society, led Bethune to join the Canadian Communist Party in 1935. Bethune became an advocate for progressive healthcare reform and a founding father of Canadian Medicare by organizing Montreal healthcare workers to draft a manifesto for socialized medicine.

In 1936 he began his involvement with military medicine when he traveled to Spain to aid the republican cause. There he innovated the technique of battlefield blood transfusion, which brought medicine to the wounded and avoided the high mortality rate associated with delayed treatment and transportation of casualties. Returning to Canada in 1937, Bethune led a country-wide propaganda campaign in order to raise funds and solidarity for the Spanish republican cause.

Bethune spent the last two years of his life with Mao Zedong's 8th route army in China where he developed a legendary reputation as a courageous and extraordinarily hard-working battlefield surgeon. He expanded upon his work in Spain by developing mobile army surgical hospitals (MASH), training medical personnel, and writing textbooks on guerilla warfare medicine. He died of sepsis in 1939 after cutting himself while operating on a wounded soldier. He left behind a powerful legacy of solidarity and service which was immortalized by Mao in an essay that was made compulsory reading for Chinese students as one of the "three constantly read articles" of the cultural revolution.

Bethune's relevance is best understood in the West by comparing him to Argentinean revolutionary doctor Che Guevara. Like Che, Bethune left behind a bourgeois background and his country of origin to throw in his lot with a foreign people's struggle for socialism and national liberation. He ultimately became a martyr for this cause and continues to be celebrated as an example of the "New Man."

SEE ALSO: Guevara, Ernesto "Che" (1928–1967); Mao Zedong (1893–1976)

References and Suggested Readings

- Hannant, L. (Ed.) (1998) The Politics of Passion: Norman Bethune's Writing and Art. Toronto: University of Toronto Press.
- Lethbridge, D. (Ed.) (2003) Bethune: The Secret Police File. Salmon Arm, BC: Undercurrent Press.
- New Media, D. A. (n.d.) "Comrade" Bethune: A Controversial Hero – People – CBC Archives. Retrieved 05:03:58 3, 2008, from www.archives.cbc.ca/IDD-1-74-1345/people/bethune/.
- Stewart, R. (1977) The Mind of Norman Bethune. Toronto: Fitzhenry & Whiteside.

Bezerra, Gregório (1900–1983)

Rogério Fernandes Macedo

Gregório Lourenço Bezerra was born in 1900 in Pernambuco, Brazil. In 1917, he participated in demonstrations in support of the Bolshevik Revolution as well as in the first general strikes for labor rights in Brazil, being arrested for the first time. In 1922 he joined the army, where he was taught to read and write. In 1929 he enrolled in the Sergeant School in Rio de Janeiro, and a year later he joined the Brazilian Communist Party (PCB). He was a leader of the National Alliance for Liberty (ANL), founded in 1935. After the movement's defeat, he was arrested and condemned to 27 years in prison. He received amnesty in 1945, went back to Pernambuco, and presented himself as a PCB candidate for the Federal Congress. In 1948, after the PCB had become illegal, his mandate was abrogated. Bezerra fought for agrarian reform and for rural labor organization. After the military seized power in 1964, he dedicated himself to organizing the rural army's struggle; however, he was arrested and publicly tortured on television. In 1969 Bezerra was exchanged for US ambassador Charles B. Elbrick, who had been kidnapped by the October 8 Revolutionary Movement (MR8). He went into exile in Mexico and the USSR, where he lived for ten years, before returning to Brazil in 1979 and leaving the PCB Central Committee. On October 23, 1983, he died in the city of São Paulo.

SEE ALSO: Brazil, Guerilla Movements, 20th Century; Brazil, Labor Struggles

References and Suggested Readings

- Bezerra, G. L. (1979) Memórias, Vol. 1. Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira.
- Bezerra, G. L. (1980) Memórias, Vol. 2. Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira.

Biennio Rosso (1919–1920)

Pietro Di Paola

The "Biennio Rosso" (Two Red Years) identifies the period between 1919 and 1920 when Italy seemed to be on the verge of a revolution. Social and industrial protests of unprecedented intensity and scale broke out all over the country. The failure of this insurrectionary movement and the subsequent reaction of industrial and landowner elites with the use of fascist violence, and the support of a middle class frightened by the specter of “bolshevism,” have long been regarded as crucial factors in determining the failure of the liberal state and Mussolini’s rise to power (Detti 1978).

After World War I discontent was widespread. The population was confronted with rising inflation and a dramatic increase in the price of basic goods, whilst extensive unemployment was exacerbated by mass demobilization. Concurrently, affiliation to the trade unions, the Socialist Party (PSI), and the anarchist movement increased dramatically. The PSI grew to a membership of 250,000, and the major trade union, the General Confederation of Labor (Confederazione Generale del Lavoro, CGL), reached two million members, while the anarchist-led Italian Syndicalist Union (Unione Sindacale Italiana, USI) ranged between 300,000 and 500,000 affiliates. The vitality of the anarchist movement was bolstered by the return from exile of the anarchist leader Errico Malatesta, welcomed as the “Lenin of Italy.” The Italian Anarchist Union (Unione Anarchica Italiana, UAI) was founded in July 1920 in Bologna and Umanità Nuova, the first anarchist daily newspaper, appeared in Milan in the same year.

However, most social conflicts of the period were characterized by an unparalleled level of autonomy from the direction of parties and trade unions. Indeed, popular discontent quite often burst out spontaneously and unexpectedly.

The question of land was one of the first contradictions to tackle. The government’s failure to fulfill wartime promises to give land to the peasants led to vast rural unrest. These disturbances took different forms depending on the various agricultural systems and social structures characterizing the Italian regions (Vivarelli 1991). From the beginning of 1919, trade unions, landless peasants, ex-servicemen’s groups, and socialist and Catholic leagues promoted the seizure of public and private wasteland dominated by large land estates particularly in the south. Parts of these seizures were later ratified by the Italian government. In the center and the north, where independent small land properties and holdings were in the majority, strikes were organized by leagues of sharecroppers and day-laborers especially at harvest time.

Disturbances in the countryside accompanied those in urban areas. In May and June 1919, disruptive food riots broke out, posing one of the most dangerous challenges to the established order in postwar Italy (Clark 1973). Cost-of-living riots spread quickly from La Spezia to central and northern Italy, following the contours of anarchism’s political geography (Levy 1999: 121). People assaulted city councils, looted shops, requisitioned goods and food, and organized local food committees. Socialists and Chambers of Labor often had difficulty maintaining control over the insurgents. In broad terms, riots in central Italy were more organized and mobilized different social categories. In big towns, such as Milan, Turin, Naples, or Rome, the participation of the working class was more marked. In the south, Sicily, and Sardinia, peasant leagues and groups of ex-servicemen replaced the socialists and the Chambers of Labor; riots here were often violent and spontaneous. However, in the southern urban areas where the socialist and trade union presence was prevalent, government repression turned out to be particularly harsh and bloody (Bianchi 2006: 118).

It was in this insurrectionary atmosphere that, in 1920, conflict erupted in the industrial triangle in northern Italy. In April, a general strike in defense of the factory council movement was called in Turin.

Through the pages of L’Ordine Nuovo Antonio Gramsci and his associates had contributed significantly to the transformation of the internal commissions, a form of workshop organization that had obtained formal recognition by the employers in 1919, into “factory councils.” Factory councils, elected directly by all workers, were meant to become the building blocks of the revolution. They had not only to perform the functions of the internal commissions, but also to assume a managerial role and to maintain and develop organization and discipline among the working class. The factory council movement faced the opposition of the moderate wings of the trade unions and of the Socialist Party, while it was supported by the USI and the anarchists.

Between 1919 and 1920 factory councils experienced dramatic growth. They were established in all the major industries in Turin; however, they did not expand into its hinterland, in Piedmont and in the other regions. The concept of councils was taken up also by the Catholic leader Guido Miglioli, who organized the peasants' courtyards farm councils in the Po Valley during the harsh rural struggles of summer 1920. In the early spring of 1920, industrial employers launched an offensive against the factory council movement that was challenging their authority in the factories. After the failure of the negotiations regarding the role of the factory councils and the workshop commissars, a lockout was declared on March 29. A Committee of Agitation was promptly established independently of official trade unions, and a general strike was proclaimed in Turin. As factory councils were limited to that city, the strike could only be successful if it gained national support. However, the PSI refused to launch a national campaign to support it and the CGL did not intend to negotiate recognition of the factory councils. Thus, the CGL accepted the employers' terms and the strike was called off on April 23. This event was taken by the radical sectors of the labor movement as ultimate proof of the bad faith and even treason of the reformists (Maione 1975).

Bitterness between revolutionaries and reformists was exacerbated after the Ancona insurrection. A detachment of the rifle regiment to be deployed in Albania mutinied on June 26 with anarchist support. The revolt spread quickly among the population of Ancona and the surrounding villages. The navy bombed the town and after three days of fighting, during which more than 25 rebels were killed, the insurgents surrendered. The revolt was used as a pretext by the PSI to withdraw its participation from the Genoa Congress of the Revolutionary Single Front, a committee launched by the anarchist leader Borghi in an attempt to create a united revolutionary front that would have included the PSI, CGL, USI, the anarchists, and the Railwaymen's Union.

The apex of the Biennio Rosso was reached at the beginning of September when, after several months of weary dispute on pay raises, metalworkers occupied factories all over the peninsula to prevent a lockout by employers. Several non-engineering factories were occupied as well. Paramilitary troops – the Red Guards – were mobilized in defense of the factories, while the workers managed production themselves. Prime Minister Giolitti decided not to intervene. Throughout the occupation, the USI urged for the extension of the occupation to all industries and for its transformation into an “expropriating general strike,” moving from economic negotiation onto political terrain. But the PSI and the CGL did not intend to follow that route.

Negotiations between leading industrialists, Giolitti, and the CGL ended in a compromise. The prime minister agreed that a joint commission of employers and trade unions should draw up a bill introducing trade union control of industry. After three weeks of occupations without pay, the metalworkers accepted a solution presented as a great victory in a national referendum. In fact, the extent and the consequences of the defeat became evident in a very short time. The bill never materialized and the employers regained full control. The economic crisis of the following year, the disillusion of the workers, the split of the Socialist Party with the creation of the Partito Comunista d'Italia (Communist Party of Italy), and the employers' spirit of revenge opened the doors to the fascist reaction (Spriano 1964).

Historical interpretations of the Biennio Rosso mirror the political divisions and the mutual accusations regarding its failure and its relation to the advent of fascism. The idea that fascism was a direct reaction to stop the revolutionary movement was advanced in the immediate aftermath of the Biennio Rosso (Fabbri 1922). This interpretation remained predominant for a long period. Linked with the above is the view that considered the Biennio Rosso as a “missed opportunity,” the result of reformism and the lack of a proper revolutionary party (Maione 1975). Other scholars instead challenge the “myth” of the Biennio Rosso, questioning whether it actually ever represented a real revolutionary opportunity (Spriano 1964; Clark 1973; Vivarelli 1991).

SEE ALSO: Anarchosyndicalism; Anarchism, Italy; Bordiga, Amadeo (1889–1970) and the Italian Communist Party; Di Vittorio, Giuseppe (1892–1957); Galleani, Luigi (1861–1931); Gramsci, Antonio (1891–1937); Italian Communist Party; Italian Socialist Party; Lenin, Vladimir Ilyich (1870–1924); Malatesta, Errico (1853–1932); Serrati, Giacinto Menotti (1872–1926)

References and Suggested Readings

Bianchi, R. (2006) Pace, Pane, Terra. Il 1919 in Italia. Rome: Odradek Edizioni.

- Clark, M. (1973) The Failure of Revolution in Italy, 1919–1920. Reading: Department of Italian Studies, University of Reading.
- Detti, T. (1978) Il Biennio Rosso. In F. Levi, U. Levra, & N. Tranfaglia (Eds.), Storia d'Italia: Il Mondo Contemporaneo, 2 vols. Florence: La Nuova Italia.
- Fabbri, L. (1922) La Contro-rivoluzione preventiva. Riflessioni sul fascismo. Bologna: L. Capelli.
- Levy, C. (1989) Italian Anarchism, 1870–1926. In D. Goodway (Ed.), For Anarchism: History, Theory and Practice. London: Routledge.
- Levy, C. (1999) Gramsci and the Anarchists. Oxford: Berg.
- Maione, G. (1975) Il Biennio Rosso. Autonomia e Spontaneità Operaia nel 1919–1920. Bologna: Il Mulino.
- Spriano, P. (1964) L'Occupazione delle Fabbriche, Settembre 1920. Turin: Einaudi.
- Vivarelli, R. (1991) Storia delle Origini del Fascismo. L'Italia dalla Grande Guerra alla Marcia su Roma, 3 vols. Bologna: Il Mulino.

Biermann, Wolf (b. 1936)

Filip Bloem

The singer-songwriter and poet Wolf Biermann was one of the most prominent socialist dissidents of the communist regime in the German Democratic Republic (GDR). His expulsion from the country in 1976 for supporting democratization and greater individual freedom in the socialist system sparked a flood of protests among leftist dissidents in the GDR and throughout Germany.

Wolf Biermann was born and raised in a communist family in Hamburg, West Germany. His father was killed in Auschwitz in 1943. In 1953 Biermann immigrated to East Berlin to live in a socialist society, where he studied political economy, philosophy, and mathematics. From 1957 to 1959 he was an assistant at the Berliner Ensemble theater, founded by Bertolt Brecht. In his satirical songs Biermann criticized the absurdities of socialist bureaucracy, although he remained a committed socialist. In 1965, after many problems with the East German authorities, he was forbidden to publish or perform any more. This ban did not silence him. Home-made recordings of his songs circulated in the GDR and he gave interviews to West German media that were smuggled into and broadcast in East Germany. Together with his friend and long-time ally, the physicist Robert Havemann (1910– 82), Biermann consistently called for a more democratic socialism in the mode of the Prague Spring, the brief period of democratic reform in Czechoslovakia. He also had sympathies for Eurocommunism, the democratic movement in western communist parties which he hoped would influence the communist parties of Eastern Europe. For all its faults, however, Biermann still thought the GDR better than West Germany, since it had abolished capitalism. Biermann therefore adamantly rejected emigration to the West.

In 1976 Biermann was unexpectedly granted permission to travel to West Germany for a series of concerts. While there, his East German citizenship was revoked. The expulsion of Biermann from East Germany prompted an outcry of protests from leading East German writers such as Stefan Heym and Christa Wolf and is regarded as a turning point in the history of the GDR. In the following years, hundreds of artists, actors, and writers would abandon their hopes for a more liberal cultural policy and leave for West Germany, thereby further undermining the legitimacy of the GDR regime.

Once in West Germany, Biermann slowly lost his belief in the reform of communism. He continued to write songs, commented on political issues, and toured widely. After the fall of the GDR in 1989, Biermann became an ardent supporter of opening the archives of the Ministry for State Security (Ministerium für Staatssicherheit or Stasi), the East German secret police, to the public. He also played an important role in the so-called Literaturstreit, a debate on the role of writers in the GDR.

SEE ALSO: Brecht, Bertolt (1898–1956); Eurocommunism; German Democratic Republic Protests, 1945–1989; Prague Spring; Socialism

References and Suggested Readings

- Anz, T. (Ed.) (1995) “Es geht nicht um Christa Wolf”: der Literaturstreit im vereinten Deutschland. Frankfurt am Main: Fischer-Taschenbuch.
- Berbig, R. (Ed.) (1994) In Sachen Biermann: Protokolle, Berichte und Briefe zu den Folgen einer Ausbürgerung. Berlin: Links.
- Pleitgen, F. (Ed.) (2006) Die Ausbürgerung: Anfang vom Ende der DDR. Berlin: List.
- Neubert, E. (1997) Geschichte der Opposition in der DDR 1949–1989. Bonn: Bundeszentrale für politische Bildung: Bonn.
- Rothschild, T. (Ed.) (1976) Wolf Biermann: Liedermacher u. Sozialist. Reinbek bei Hamburg: Rowohlt.

Bin Laden, Osama (b. 1957) and al-Qaeda

Lawrence Davidson

Osama bin Laden was born in 1957 into the wealthy bin Laden clan of Saudi Arabia. His father, Awad bin Laden, started as a poor laborer but ended up owner of the largest construction company in the country. The bin Laden family has been close to the royal Saudi family for decades.

Osama was his father's seventh son. Awad died when the boy was only 13. Osama was educated in Jeddah and eventually received a college degree in public administration. He was also raised as a religious Sunni Muslim. He has almost no experience outside of the Muslim world and little understanding of Western secular culture.

As a student Osama was disciplined and hard working, but did not stand out. He appeared to be non-confrontational in nature. When the Grand Mosque in Mecca was taken over by Islamic radicals in 1980, he was as critical of the action as were most other Saudis. Nonetheless, the religious orientation of the family, as well as its high social position, brought him into contact with numerous leading Islamic fundamentalist leaders and scholars. These contacts were influential in his religious and intellectual development and no doubt structured his faith in a way that caused him to accept the need for activism.

Bin Laden saw the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan in late 1979 as an act of colonial aggression on the part of a godless, but imperialist, Western country. He soon began to raise money to support the Afghan resistance. This effort led to a more personal involvement in the struggle. By 1984 he had established a "guest house" in Peshawar, Pakistan, to house Arab and other fighters bound for the Afghani front. It soon turned into something of a logistical center involved in training and the funneling of men and equipment into Afghanistan.

By 1986 bin Laden was using his immense wealth to establish his own camps within Afghanistan. He had his own command structure, recruited men with military experience from Syria, Egypt, and elsewhere in the Muslim world, and thus created his own private army. The entire apparatus became known as al-Qaeda, or "the firm base." Between 1986 and 1989 bin Laden saw considerable combat. He was involved in at least five major battles and hundreds of smaller operations. With the Soviets in retreat, bin Laden had reason to believe that his efforts had helped defeat one of the world's two great superpowers.

When bin Laden returned to visit Saudi Arabia in 1989, the government banned him from leaving the country. The reason for this was the Saudi government's fear that bin Laden would now spread his military operations to other Muslim lands, attacking those regimes he perceived as corrupt and inimical to Islam. He was also giving talks throughout the kingdom warning of Iraqi plans to invade Kuwait and Saudi Arabia. This embarrassed the Saudi government which, at the time, was on good terms with Saddam Hussein.

When the Iraqis did invade Kuwait in 1990, bin Laden submitted a detailed plan to the Saudi king for the defense of the state. As part of this plan he offered to mobilize the Arab fighters he had commanded in Afghanistan to confront the Iraqis in Kuwait. His reasoning was that if these fighters could defeat the Soviets they could certainly take on Saddam's forces. The Saudi government, however, had no desire to see thousands of radicalized Muslim fighters operating just across their borders, and accepted American military assistance instead of bin Laden's offer.

The Americans had a lot at stake in the Gulf and so were anxious to stop the Iraqis – they were not going to leave the security of their oil interests in the hands of bin Laden's fighters. Bin Laden reacted with disapproval, and he expressed this publicly as well as privately to many of the kingdom's religious scholars and Muslim activists. The Saudi government then limited his movements to the city of Jeddah. In 1991 he was finally able to slip out of Saudi Arabia. He went first to Pakistan and then into Afghanistan, where he sought to mediate between the factions then fighting a civil war for control of the country. The Saudis made several attempts to kidnap him and so, in late 1991, he secretly fled to Sudan.

In Sudan, bin Laden used his experience and contacts in the construction industry to help the government organize and fund large domestic projects. During this time anti-American incidents occurred in Somalia and South Yemen. In both countries the incidents involved people who had been trained in Afghanistan; however, bin Laden's direct connection to these incidents has not been proven. Nor did he involve himself in Sudan's civil war. Nonetheless, the Saudi regime had him classified as an enemy of the state and, in 1992, froze his assets. In 1994 they withdrew his citizenship. In 1996, feeling that he had become an embarrassment to the Sudanese government, he returned to Afghanistan where he eventually came under the protection of the Taliban government. Shortly after his return to Afghanistan, the Khobar towers, a US military housing complex in Saudi Arabia, was bombed. There is strong suspicion that bin Laden was involved in the planning and financing of this attack.

Also in 1996 bin Laden issued his first "bayan," or public announcement against the United States. Bin Laden titled this statement a "Declaration of War Against the Americans Occupying the Land of the Two Holy Places." This was a reference to the presence of American troops in Saudi Arabia. Bin Laden accused the United States of having started, in alliance with the Israelis, a war against the Muslims in which "the Muslims' blood became the cheapest and their wealth as loot to their enemies." He went on to suggest his long-range goal:

There is no other duty after belief than fighting the enemy who is corrupting life and religion. . . . If it is not possible to push back the enemy except by the collective movement of the Muslim people, then there is a duty on the Muslims to ignore the minor differences among themselves. The ill effect of ignoring these differences, at a given period of time, is much less than the ill effect of the occupation of Muslim lands by the main Kafr [infidel]. (www.lib.ecu.edu/govdoc/terrorism.html#binladn)

Bin Laden seeks to unite the Muslim world against the United States, which he sees as the leader of an infidel invasion of Muslim lands. In lieu of the unification, however, the battle has been joined using many of the same fighters who had defeated the Soviets in Afghanistan. Bin Laden describes these men in his declaration, "I say to you [the American leadership] that these youths [Muslim fighters] love death as you love life." By 1998 his threats were turning from theory into practice. In that year bomb attacks were launched against US embassies in East Africa. In 2001 the US naval vessel Cole was attacked in Yemen. Bin Laden was almost certainly involved in these actions.

While American (non-Muslim) troops operating on Muslim soil, and especially in the holy land of Arabia, were seen as a sacrilege, this was not bin Laden's only grievance against the United States. He regarded US policy in Iraq, Egypt, and Palestine as part of a Western war on Islam. The way bin Laden interpreted US behavior reflected his worldview and ultimately led to his involvement in the attacks on the World Trade Center and Pentagon on September 11, 2001. At that point he became, at least in the West, the world's best-known, and most wanted "terrorist mastermind." The United States has been hunting for him ever since. However, since 2002, the US government's emphasis on bin Laden has lessened (perhaps because, so far, they have failed to capture him) in favor of seeking out al-Qaeda cells in general.

Bin Laden gave one post-September 11 interview and this was to the Al-Jazeera TV network. It was recorded on October 21, 2001 and subsequently broadcast by CNN in February 2002. In this interview bin Laden stated that "we will work to continue this battle, God permitting, until victory or until we meet God. . . . If killing those who kill our sons is terrorism, then let history be witness that we are terrorists."

The American government has not responded to bin Laden's accusations. No US politician will publicly entertain the possibility that America's post-World War II foreign policy in the Middle East has anything to do with the terrorist (or non-terrorist) actions taken against the country. Thus, since September 11, 2001 American policy has seen a steady escalation in terms of military involvement in the region (as is witnessed by the war in Iraq), the alliance with Israel has grown stronger, and the Bush administration has adopted behaviors that appear to be inviting war with such countries as Iran and Syria. At the same time, however, efforts to pursue Osama bin Laden appear to have become less and less of a priority for the American government.

This may be because bin Laden has proved very difficult to catch. He is allegedly hiding on the Pakistan-Afghanistan border among a population that is willing to protect him. To pursue him would mean alienating the Pakistani government, which shows little interest in angering the border tribes by going after bin Laden. On the other hand, bin Laden alive gives a certain central reality to the otherwise increasingly amorphous nature of al-Qaeda.

The elusiveness of Osama bin Laden has by now earned him the name of “Elvis” among the intelligence agents that still pay attention to him. The suggestion here is that while many people might think they see bin Laden, nobody really does. However, most of those intelligence agents do see clearly that, while his capture would have great symbolic value for the American government, it would not stop terrorism against the United States.

SEE ALSO: Islamic Political Currents

References and Suggested Readings

- Bergen, P. (2002) Holy War, Inc.: Inside the Secret World of Osama Bin Laden. New York: Free Press.
- Coll, S. (2004) Ghost Wars: The Secret History of the CIA, Afghanistan and Bin Laden from the Soviet Invasion to September 10, 2001. New York: Penguin.
- Hamud, R. B. (2005) Osama Bin Laden: America's Enemy in His Own Words. San Diego: Nadeem Publishing.
- Lawrence, B. (2005) Messages to the World: The Statements of Osama Bin Laden. London: Verso.
- Pape, R. (2006) Dying to Win: The Strategic Logic of Suicide Terrorism. New York: Random House.

Bishop, Maurice (1944–1983)

Immanuel Ness

Born in Aruba on May 29, 1944 to the son of a Grenadian nationalist and populist leader, Maurice Bishop was a revolutionary leader and prime minister of the island nation of Grenada, located in the southern Lesser Antilles, in the Southeastern Caribbean Sea. Growing up in Grenada in abject poverty, he was drawn to political life through the British disregard for the island's Afro-Caribbean working class and peasant population. Like a growing number of Caribbean nationalists, Bishop was drawn to Marxist-Leninism as a means to create independence and class and racial equality. To achieve this goal Bishop helped form the New Jewel movement in 1973 and was critical to the organization's growth through advancing a Marxist democratic political program of nationalization of the island's sparse economic resources and the formation of an equalitarian society.

Bishop's connection to communist governments, especially Cuba, alarmed the US, and historians have found documentary evidence that the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) orchestrated a political crisis in Grenada through supporting opponents of the Bishop government in 1982 and 1983. The CIA coordinated a coup d'état against Bishop by arming military supporters of Bernard Coard, former deputy prime minister. On October 13, 1983 Coard, Bishop's former law partner, seized power and six days later mass demonstrations against the military coup fomented a national crisis.

Bishop was placed under house arrest and the Grenadian army seized control of the major military and communications installations. However, popular support for Bishop broke into mass demonstrations which overwhelmed the military government. On September 16 protesters overtook the beleaguered military guard, setting Bishop free. In the ensuing days the Grenadian army fired rounds of ammunition into large crowds of supporters shielding Bishop from the military at Market Square and the Fort Rupert military installation in St. George, Grenada's capital. On September 19, 1983 Bishop and his Cabinet ministers in the NJM were executed without trial immediately after the military overpowered the masses that were protecting them at Fort Rupert. Nonetheless, since the majority of the population continued to support Bishop and the New Jewel movement, the military government stood on shaky ground.

On October 25, 1983, two days following the bombing of the US government's own military installation in Beirut, Lebanon, Ronald Reagan used the opportunity to order an invasion of Grenada on the grounds that growing popular unrest and the presence of Cuban forces posed a threat to American medical students (who were known to be out of harm's way). The contingent of some 6,000 US Marines, joined by a small delegation of troops from Barbados, Dominica, Jamaica, St. Lucia, and St. Vincent, routed all opposition, imprisoned activists, and killed leading officials in the NJM. Subsequently, the Grenadian government arrested 16 leaders of the military that overthrew and killed Bishop and sentenced them to life imprisonment. However, more than twenty years after the coup d'état, popular support remains for the legacy of Bishop, who sought to bring economic justice to the island where poverty is rampant and inequality continues to grow. In Grenada, nostalgia remains for the legacy of Maurice Bishop among the country's working class and peasants.

SEE ALSO: Aristide, Jean-Bertrand (b. 1953); Caribbean Islands, Protests Against IMF; Cuban Revolution, 1953–1959; Grenadian Revolution, 1979–1983; New Jewel Movement

References and Suggested Readings

- Crandall, R. (2006) Gunboat Democracy: The United States Interventions in the Dominican Republic, Grenada, and Panama. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Marcus, B. & Taber, M. (1983) Maurice Bishop Speaks: The Grenada Revolution and Its Overthrow 1979–1983. New York: Pathfinder Books.
- Meeks, B. (2001) Caribbean Revolutions and Revolutionary Theory: An Assessment of Cuba, Nicaragua and Grenada. Kingston: University of West Indies Press.

Black nationalism, 19th and 20th centuries

Albert Scharenberg

As a general idea, Black Nationalism is present where African people live – on the continent as well as in its diaspora. As a social movement, however, it first surfaced about two centuries ago and has mostly been associated with the African American resistance tradition and the fight against racism and oppression in the United States. Theoretically, it can be conceptualized as a minority's "nationalism of liberation," and politically it may be articulated either as a progressive or a reactionary program.

Theoretical Context

In the theoretical context, Black Nationalism can be classified as a specific "nationalism of liberation" which evolved in response to the legacy of racial slavery in the United States. The institutionalization of racial slavery in the English colonies established an American apartheid that remained in effect even after slavery had been abolished during the Civil War. Residential, educational, workplace, and other forms of segregation continued to forcefully exclude blacks from the benefits of white society. This systemic exploitation, exclusion, and unequal distribution of power was symbolically upheld and reproduced by a white American nationalism which developed immediately after the American Revolution and was founded on an ideological marriage of egalitarian democracy and biological racism. Racism was thereby deeply inscribed into American society and consciousness; skin color became, as African American writer James Baldwin noted in "The Fire Next Time" (1963), "a political reality."

For African Americans, it was a hostile environment created by white supremacy and "uneven development." Martin R. Delaney, one of the founding fathers of Black Nationalism, compared the American situation to internal colonialism within Britain, the Habsburg Empire, and Russia. Blacks eventually were, as a means of their survival, forced to form their own parallel institutions, most importantly the black churches, starting with the African Methodist Episcopal Church (AME Church) founded by Richard Allen in 1786. These separate black institutions in turn provided the social space for the creation of a semi-independent black civil society. They gradually became "nationalizing institutions" for the social construction and daily reproduction of black minority nationalism.

This sense of being part of, yet separate from, white America led to a feeling that black intellectual W. E. B. DuBois described as a "double consciousness" in his 1903 "The Souls of Black Folk." Black nationalists emphasize the "African" side of this duality, while integrationist approaches have traditionally made the case for the "Americanness" of blacks. While the latter have fought for inclusion into the existing institutions of American society, the former have rejected the values, practices, and institutions of white America, conceived of as still closed for blacks, and tried to obtain some sort of independence or even territorial separation from the former slaveholders. Historically, integrationism was strongest in times of high mobilization of blacks, for instance, after the Civil War or during the heyday of the modern civil rights movement. In contrast, Black Nationalism was particularly strong in times of black disillusionment, such as from the late nineteenth century to the time of Marcus Garvey in the 1910s and 1920s (described by historian Wilson J. Moses as "Golden Age of Black Nationalism") and in the Black Power period of the late 1960s and early 1970s.

Black Nationalism contains two aspects: anti-racist solidarity and "orthodox" nationalism. On the one hand, it represents the collective black resistance struggle against racial domination and exclusion. In this respect, Black Nationalism differs substantially from European or American nationalism. On the other hand, it is still a form of nationalism. Opposition to the blacks' exclusion from the American national community is articulated in nationalist terms, symbols, and concepts. To this extent, "orthodox" Black Nationalism signifies – as many works have shown for nationalisms of liberation in Asia and Africa as well – a reaction to and "an adoption or even imitation of European ideas" (Kedourie 1971). As any nationalism of liberation, it thus represents an ambivalent phenomenon.

Definition and Common Denominators

As a response to white racism, Black Nationalism can be defined as a nationalism of the racially excluded. However, "nation," "nationalism," and "nationalist minority" are not substantialist, but rather contingent terms; they mark a field of competitive positions adopted by different organizations, parties, movements, or individuals seeking to represent the minority, as Rogers Brubaker states in "Nationalism Reframed" (1996). In fact, African Americans have at times adopted varying interpretations and contesting constructions to make sense of their situation in the United States. As a contingent phenomenon, "Black Nationalism, like other nationalisms, is no clear-cut guide to present action; it represents rather a cluster of related ideas" (Carlisle 1975). The main related ideas characteristic of the various black nationalist approaches are (1) the historically founded distrust of white people, their deeds and institutions; (2) a "black" standpoint, i.e., the assessment of politics from the perspective of the dominated blacks; (3) the imagination of the black community as a "nation within a nation"; (4) the reference to common African roots and enslavement; (5) the positive emphasis of the black culture that evolved in the context of racial segregation; (6) the accentuation of the necessity for acting jointly and organizing "all-black" organizations, i.e., of anti-racist and nationalist solidarity; and (7) the perspective of autonomy, i.e., of economic, social, political, and cultural (but not necessarily territorial) independence (Scharenberg 1998).

Beyond these rather general denominators black nationalists share little common ground. There is neither a common interpretation of the blacks' plight in the United States, nor agreement on proper political action. Its adherents may embrace left-wing or right-wing political programs, revolutionary or cultural nationalism, territorial separatism or "soft" community control, etc. While in the twentieth century, religious nationalism, cultural nationalism, and revolutionary (left) nationalism have been the most important currents, black nationalist ideologies can be distinguished according to both their contents and strategies.

As regards content, economic, political, cultural, educational, and religious nationalism may be distinguished. With respect to strategy, the main goals of Black Nationalism are emigration to Africa, territorial separatism in North America, self-determination within the United States, revolutionary nationalism, and Pan-Africanism. These distinctions, however, are largely analytical; in reality, many different combinations of these elements exist.

Contents of Black Nationalism

In particular, concerning content, the different elements to a certain degree belong together, as Marcus Garvey's internationally organized "Universal Negro Improvement Association" (UNIA) demonstrates, which included elements of economic, political, religious, educational, and cultural nationalism. On the other hand, most forms of Black Nationalism put one of these elements at the center of their ideology.

Economic Nationalism

The economic form of Black Nationalism stresses the importance of the economic advancement of black people. In this respect, Booker T. Washington's emphasis on "Black capitalism" has served as the ideological basis of most forms of economic nationalism, but the roots of this line of thought can actually be traced back to Paul Cuffe's involvement with Sierra Leone and the British African Institution. Martin Delany's plans for settling American blacks in the Yoruba territory in western Africa also rested largely upon economic nationalism. The best-known enterprise, however, was Marcus Garvey's Black Star Line designed to bring blacks "back to Africa." The basic idea behind the advocacy of black capitalism is that business owners may do good for the community by employing blacks, by giving back a portion of their earnings to blacks, and by giving blacks a place to shop and do business beyond the reach of white hostility. More often than not, economic nationalism mainly reflects the interests of those sections of the black upper and middle classes who have historically strived for economic control of the black segregated communities. However, the “Don’t Buy Where You Can’t Work” campaigns of the 1930s and in particular the formation of all-black unions such as A. Philip Randolph’s Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters or the Dodge Revolutionary Union Movement (DRUM) associated with the League of Revolutionary Black Workers of the 1960s reflect another (left) interpretation of economic nationalism.

Political Nationalism

Another form of Black Nationalism focuses on the political organization of African Americans. The best-known case in point is the cry for Black Power of the 1960s first articulated by Stokely Carmichael (later renamed Kwame Touré) of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC). The goal was to redistribute power and to change the society’s power relations, thereby liberating African Americans from the whites’ enduring political domination. Political nationalism may also be expressed in the formation of “all-black” political parties such as the revolutionary nationalist Black Panther Party. Moreover, elements of political nationalism also exist within “black caucuses” (including the Congressional Black Caucus founded in 1970), or in the electoral campaigns of certain black candidates running for public office, especially in black majority cities, where nationalism has served as a foundation of radical political activism, as James Jennings notes in “The Politics of Black Empowerment” (1992).

Cultural Nationalism

Cultural Black Nationalism emphasizes the autonomy, longevity, and value of black culture – and particularly the African roots and heritage of black Americans. Focusing on the cultural and psychological effects of slavery and racism, this nationalism particularly cuts across the other variants, uniting quite different ideologies and movements ranging from “soft” versions merely emphasizing “black pride” (“Black is beautiful”) to “hard” interpretations of mental separatism. Generally, there are two levels of cultural nationalism. First, as an expression of African American culture, the Harlem Renaissance of the 1920s and the Black Arts movement led by Amiri Baraka (LeRoi Jones) in the 1960s are examples of cultural nationalism (as was the international Négritude movement). Second, and apart from cultural production and the arts, the term refers to nationalists in the tradition of Maulana Ron Karenga and his Californian “US Organization” (United Slaves) of the 1960s. Karenga’s ideas such as Kwanzaa represent the prototype of cultural nationalism. In this tradition, “Afrocentricity” propagated by, among others, Molefi Kete Asante, has in recent years turned out to be the most visible form of cultural nationalism. Generally, cultural nationalists refrain from politics; they have either rejected or remained silent about the state and the need to capture state power. Black cultural nationalists instead focus on a spiritual return of American blacks to their supposedly “true” African culture and identity, and thus on a strict “mental separatism” vis-à-vis white American society.

Educational Nationalism

Black Nationalism aiming at both child education and the reform of educational institutions is known as educational nationalism. This is more or less closely linked to cultural nationalism in a broader sense. Concerning child upbringing, nationalists aim at instilling “black pride” and “self-respect” into black children. Concerning the reform of educational institutions, students as well as faculty in the Black Power period of the late 1960s started criticizing college curricula for not really dealing with African Americans or dealing with them only in stereotypes. A further critique was that college faculty did not include a proper share of blacks. As a result, Black (or African American) Studies Departments were institutionalized at many universities and colleges, beginning in 1967 at San Francisco State College. More recently – and sparking off a national controversy – cultural nationalists have been demanding a specific “African-centered education” for high schools and colleges.

Religious Nationalism

Religious nationalism criticizes the oppression of African Americans primarily in religious terms. Whites are often seen as collective sinners or as “the devil,” violating God-given rules. Religious nationalists do not see political action, but God’s intervention, as the road to liberation. Religious nationalists come from various denominations. There are black Christian nationalists in the tradition of Henry McNeal Turner (AME Church), Marcus Garvey (African Orthodox Church), Albert B. Cleage (Shrine of the Black Madonna) and others, preaching a black liberation theology based on the idea that “God is found among the black oppressed who were being destroyed by ‘respectable’ white murderers,” as James H. Cone writes in “For My People: Black Theology and the Black Church” (1984). Another religious nationalist group is the Black Hebrew Israelites.

The most important religious nationalist organization, however, has been the Lost-Found Nation of Islam in the Wilderness of North America, or Nation of Islam (NOI). As an offspring of Noble Drew Ali’s Moorish Science Temple of America, the NOI was founded by Wallace D. Fard in 1930, who subsequently was deified by his successor Elijah Muhammad. The NOI rose to national prominence in the late 1950s and 1960s under the leadership of Malcolm X, and after Elijah’s death, his son Wallace Muhammad moved the organization closer to Sunni Islam. Louis Farrakhan reestablished the “old” NOI in the late 1970s. The NOI claims that whites are genetically determined to be a “race of devils,” and that Christianity and Judaism are their “devilish” religions. Contrary to this, blacks are supposedly “chosen,” and Islam is said to be their “natural” religion. Only by taking on the Islamic faith will blacks save themselves from destruction (a claim already established by Americo-Liberian Edward W. Blyden). The so-called Nation of Gods and Earth, commonly known as the Five-Percent Nation, is a radical offspring of the NOI and an important reference for many nationalist rappers.

Goals and Strategies

Although many black nationalists favor separatism, either physically or mentally, Black Nationalism should not be limited to territorial separatism (Hall 1978). As regards strategy, self-determination within the United States, revolutionary nationalism and Pan-Africanism represent non-separatist forms of Black Nationalism. In addition, there are various intersections between the following strategies, as well as between goals and contents.

The oldest strategy that was popular during much of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries was “Back to Africa.” The collective exodus from the white man’s Babylon, ending the involuntary presence of African people in the Americas, was perceived as the road to liberation. Emigration was, however, more a negative reaction than a positive identification. In other words, if things in America got worse, glorification of Africa mushroomed – in particular, because American blacks at that time had little if any knowledge about the African past and present.

There were many attempts to realize black re-migration, starting with Cuffe, who managed to bring the first 38 blacks to Freetown, Sierra Leone, in 1815. At times, white people, including Abraham Lincoln, have supported emigrationism, in particular via the American Colonization Society (ACS). This group, which survived until the 1960s, brought thousands of blacks to Africa and founded the colony of Liberia. Most blacks resisted the efforts of the ACS and chose to support their own African settlement schemes. Prominent advocates of independent emigrationism include Martin R. Delaney and Marcus Garvey. Contemporary cultural nationalists have taken up the idea, too, though they claim to “go back” only spiritually. Today, the main ideology still favoring long-term emigration is Jamaican Rastafarianism.

The “classic” nationalist goal is to establish an independent nation-state. This is true for Black Nationalism as well, and some demand a separate black state on the territory of what today is the United States. Assuming that American whites will never accept the full emancipation of African Americans, territorial separatism is seen as the key to black liberation. Already in the nineteenth century, black nationalists had tried to promote a black state by encouraging African American migration to Kansas and later Oklahoma (Carlisle 1975). Between 1928 and 1934, the American Communist Party (CPUSA), following Cyril Brigg’s African Blood Brotherhood, propagated the right of African Americans to establish an independent nation-state on the territory of the Black Belt in the Deep South. When the party abandoned this position in favor of the “popular front” concept, a nucleus of black nationalist communists had formed around Harry Haywood and Queen Mother Moore.

Moore later co-founded the Republic of New Africa (RNA), along with Milton and Richard Henry (later renamed Gaidi and Imari Obadele) and other activists from the Malcolm X Society. The RNA follows Malcolm X’s idea from his “Message to the Grassroots” (1963) that “land is the basis of independence.” Today, the RNA’s radical left territorial separatism – ideologically founded on the assumption that Africans in the US have become a new people, i.e., “New Afrikans” (Lumumba 1992) – is also upheld by groups such as the Malcolm X Grassroots Movement. Territorial separatist demands have also been raised by the Nation of Islam.

Importantly, however, Black Nationalism on American soil is not necessarily separatist. A “softer” version primarily aims at African American self-determination in the form of community control. In a society still largely dominated by white people, the underlying idea resembles the political demand for Black Power, but this power is supposed to be obtained within the – albeit reformed – framework of American society. Therefore, such strategies, which have also been described as “a Black version of ethnic pluralism” (Robinson 2001), are located at the intersection of nationalism and radical integrationism and have been pursued by nationalists and radical reformist activists alike.

Yet another strategy is revolutionary nationalism. Revolutionary nationalist positions were already popular before the Civil War. In 1829 two black activists – David Walker, in his famous “Walker’s Appeal,” and Robert A. Young, in his “Ethiopian Manifesto” – claimed that African Americans were “a nation within a nation” and raised their voices for a “second American revolution.” Since the twentieth century, revolutionary nationalism has generally referred to the radical left wing of Black Nationalism in the United States, i.e., the various socialist, communist, and New Afrikan organizations. Their adherents have come up with a distinct analysis and political strategy.

Presuming that the root cause for the oppression of African Americans rests with the economic and political system of the United States, revolutionary nationalists claim that the only way to black liberation is to overthrow the existing order. Due to their anti-capitalist stance, they usually favor some sort of cooperation with radical leftists from other ethnic/national groups, including whites. The most important revolutionary nationalist organization was the Black Panther Party for Self-Defence (BPP), founded in Oakland in 1966 by Huey P. Newton and Bobby Seale. Known worldwide for its call to take up firearms to protect black people from police brutality and white racist violence, it was the leading all-black organization of the late 1960s and was very popular with the international student movement. Like other radical black groups, the BPP was targeted by the FBI’s illegal Counterintelligence Program (COINTELPRO). During the downfall of the BPP, the Black Liberation Army (BLA), loosely allied with the Weather, an offshoot of the militant Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), radicalized the BPP’s concept and went underground.

Finally, Pan-Africanism, originally largely developed in the Caribbean, revolves around the connection between the blacks’ plight in the Western hemisphere and in Africa. Its adherents claim that progress can only be achieved through blacks’ mutual support. Pan-Africanism, which may be termed a form of black internationalism, seeks to unite and uplift Africans both on the continent and in the diaspora as part of the global African community. Some organizations such as the African People’s Socialist Party (APSP), the All-African People’s Revolutionary Party (A-APRP), and the National Black United Front (NBUF) have particularly focused on Pan-African solidarity. However, in a broader sense, many (if not most) black nationalists claim to be sympathetic to this cause.

Commonly, W. E. B. Du Bois (1869–1963), an academic and progressive political activist, is considered to be the father of Pan-Africanism in the United States. Next to many other activities, including the founding of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), Du Bois organized a series of Pan-African Congresses between 1919 and 1945. The last one was attended by, among others, George Padmore from Trinidad, as well as African leaders Kwame Nkrumah and Jomo Kenyatta and was a precursor of the Bandung Conference ten years later. Another key figure of Pan-Africanism was Malcolm X, in particular, because of his journeys to Africa and his Organization of Afro-American Unity (OAAU), patterned after the Organization of African Unity (OAU).

Criticism

Black Nationalism has been criticized by academics as well as activists, though at times even critics staunchly defended the anti-racist element constitutive of this nationalism of liberation

(Collins 2006). In their view, the fight against enduring white racism requires some form of “national” solidarity among the racially excluded. National/ethnic discrimination should thus not be understood as a mere ideological construction that can be overcome rather easily, but as a form of systemic oppression. In this context, Black Nationalism has to be conceptualized as part of the African American resistance tradition.

The dialectic of Black Nationalism means, however, that it contains two sides: anti-racism as well as “orthodox” nationalism. The latter has been subjected to fierce criticism. Much of this criticism, though specifically directed at Black Nationalism, applies to any nationalist ideology.

Nationalists have repeatedly been charged with using false categories in historiography and with “reading back” nationality into history. Likewise, black nationalists have been criticized for their primordial views of history and culture, as well as for “inventing” tradition. Afrocentric writings about history are a good case in point. By celebrating the reputed “greatness” of African (in fact, mostly Egyptian) culture, cultural nationalists are inventing a “feel-good history,” romantically leaving out the dark sides inherent in any culture, as liberal historian Arthur M. Schlesinger criticizes in his book This Disuniting of America (1992). Moreover, if they derive today’s individual rights and duties, moral values and behavioral principles from what is supposed to be ancient African traditions, they are actually “freezing” ever-changing culture – as if there were solutions for contemporary problems to be found in the ancient tombs of Pharaohs. Accordingly, African American culture is not the outcome of any “substance” inherent in African traditions and peoples, but rather a new “hybrid” culture determined by the various necessities of surviving in a racialized, segregated, and hostile environment.

The nationalist approach is also problematic with respect to politics. It has often been argued that the post-colonial development of many African liberation movements demonstrates the deep ambivalence of nationalist ideologies – after their leaders got in power, they more often than not quickly reestablished traditional power relations, in particular with respect to gender and ethnic/tribal affairs, and returned to “business as usual.” Currently, Zimbabwe and Robert Mugabe’s Black Nationalism is a good case in point. Ignoring this historic experience or playing it down as a mere “accident” imprisons reason and openly invites its historic repetition.

Also, Black Nationalism, as any nationalism, is a politically contingent phenomenon that may be articulated in different ways. According to Marable and Mullings (1994), “Black nationalism can be progressive, but it can also be reactionary, sexist, homophobic and pro-corporate capitalist.” It is the latter, reactionary version that has drawn most of the criticism directed at black nationalist identity politics. Since black nationalists see white racism as the main (if not only) form of domination, African American identity is supposed to revolve around issues of “race” and nationality. Black nationalism, therefore, tends to reduce the society’s complexity and power relations to just one factor, “insisting that the individual has no identity apart from his nation” (Kedourie 1971). This ideological “reductionism” inherent in (black) nationalist ideology serves as a means not only for generating unity, but also for the legitimization of internal domination; issues such as class and gender tend to be neglected or completely done away with.

Within conservative Black Nationalism the interests of the economically superior are usually depicted as being identical with the interests of all – despite the fact that capitalism has largely failed black people in the US, as well as globally. Accordingly, many black nationalists argue against welfare as “generating dependency” among blacks. Furthermore, socially constructed roles such as gender and “race” are depicted as naturally given. Likewise, homosexuality has been condemned as “European decadence” and a deviation from “true blackness.” In fact, many black nationalists propagate views about “Black manhood” that are quite similar to the “traditional family values” put forth by white Christian fundamentalists. In his book Black Nationalism (1962) Nigerian scholar Essien U. Essien-Udom has to that effect compared the NOI to the Puritans. Black nationalists’ reactionary gendered visions of black liberation have been increasingly targeted within the black community, in particular, by feminists/womanists.

In public discourse, especially within the media, Black Nationalism is furthermore labeled racist. This accusation has to be carefully scrutinized though, because firstly it can be (and in fact is) used as an excuse for white racism, and secondly because only access to power provides the opportunity to transform ideological constructs of “race” into a relationship of racial dominance. However, reactionary Black Nationalism does indeed essentialize “race” and has accordingly been criticized for remaining imprisoned by the logic of racialization (Glaude 2002). In particular, visions such as the NOI’s mythology of “Yacub’s history” are as much a response to white racial domination as a copy of it. Moreover, a biological understanding of “race” has historically served as the ideological basis for the much-criticized cooperation between certain black nationalists (including Garvey and the NOI) and white supremacist groups.

Black Nationalism has also been charged with anti-Semitism. While many (if not most) black nationalists are not, some reactionary groups may indeed be called anti-Semitic. Again, it was the NOI that published a treatise on “The Secret Relationship Between Blacks and Jews” (1991) that was shaped by anti-Semitism, and Farrakhan’s speeches have at times had clearly anti-Semitic overtones. While the NOI seems to recently have toned down its anti-Semitism, the so-called New Black Panther Party (no relation to the historic BPP), basically a splinter group led by expelled NOI leader Khalid Muhammad until his death in 2001, frankly admits to being anti-Semitic, blaming Jews for, among other things, the attack on the World Trade Center on September 11, 2001, as white racists have also done. As a result, these groups have increasingly been counted among “hate groups.”

Finally, “hard” particularistic versions of Black Nationalism have repeatedly been criticized for falling into the trap of “divide and conquer.” The more particularistic their ideology is framed, the more unity is prevented among blacks through internal gender and class divisions, as well as concerning potential alliances with other oppressed groups which many activists have strived for. The question remains: How should racial and ethnic domination be addressed within liberation politics of the twenty-first century?

SEE ALSO: Civil Rights Movement, United States, 1960–1965; Civil Rights, United States, Black Power and Backlash, 1965–1978; Civil Rights, United States: Overview; Garvey, Marcus (1887–1940) and Garveyism; Malcolm X (1925–1965)

References and Suggested Readings

Bracey, J. H. et al. (Eds.) (1970) Black Nationalism in America. New York: Bobbs-Merrill.

- Carlisle, R. (1975) The Roots of Black Nationalism. Port Washington: Kennikat Press.
- Collins, P. H. (2006) From Black Power to Hip Hop: Racism, Nationalism, and Feminism. Philadelphia: Temple University Press.
- Cone, J. H. (1984) For My People: Black Theology and the Black Church. Maryknoll: Orbis Books.
- Glaude, E. S., Jr. (Ed.) (2002) Is It Nation Time? Contemporary Essays on Black Power and Black Nationalism. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Hall, R. L. (1978) Black Separatism in the United States. Hanover, NH: Dartmouth College.
- Kedourie, E. (Ed.) (1971) Nationalism in Asia and Africa. London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson.
- Lumumba, C. (1992) The Roots of the New Afrikan Independence Movement. Jackson, MS: New Afrikan Productions.
- Malcolm X, with Alex Haley (1965) The Autobiography of Malcolm X. New York: Grove Press.
- Marable, M. & Mullings, L. (1994) The Divided Mind of Black America: Race, Ideology and Politics in the Post-Civil Rights Era. Race and Class 36 (1): 61–72.
- Moses, W. J. (Ed.) (1996) Classical Black Nationalism: From the American Revolution to Marcus Garvey. New York: New York University Press.
- Pinkney, A. (1976) Red, Black, and Green: Black Nationalism in the United States. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Robinson, D. E. (2001) Black Nationalism in American Politics and Thought. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Scharenberg, A. (1998) Schwarzer Nationalismus in den USA: Das Malcolm X-Revival [Black Nationalism in the United States: The Malcolm X Revival]. Münster: Westfälisches Dampfboot.
- Segal, R. (1995) The Black Diaspora: Five Centuries of the Black Experience Outside Africa. New York: Farrar, Straus, & Giroux.
- Stuckey, S. (Ed.) (1972) The Ideological Origins of Black Nationalism. Boston: Beacon Press.
- Van Deburg, W. L. (Ed.) (1997) Modern Black Nationalism: From Marcus Garvey to Louis Farrakhan. New York: New York University Press.

Black Panthers

Yohuru Williams

Born out of diverse elements of protest in the late 1960s, including the civil rights movement, a parallel Black Power movement, and third world liberation struggles, the Black Panther Party (BPP) emerged in Oakland, California in October 1966. The Panthers articulated a program that called for Marxist revolution as a remedy for the unequal distribution of wealth and rampant racism they saw at the core of American society. Through their Ten Point Program its leaders Huey Newton (1942–89) and Bobby Seale (b. 1936) demanded full employment for the black community, education reform, armed patrols of the police to insure the defense and safety of black people, and in a final summary, land, bread, peace, and justice.

The Panthers' armed patrols of the police garnered the most attention, and soon the group was the target of investigation from both state and federal law enforcement agencies. Although often at odds with their "survival programs" that approximated the work of liberal government anti-poverty initiatives, of a stripe that became common especially during President Lyndon Johnson's War on Poverty, the Panthers' militant posturing and use of revolutionary rhetoric invited closer scrutiny by law enforcement, most notably the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Law enforcement agencies often emphasized the revolutionary nature of the organization and its ties to third world revolutionary violence. The Panthers were soon one of the primary targets of the FBI's counterintelligence program COINTELPRO, which often crossed the line into provocation and violence in an effort to arrest the growth and influence of the organization. This government campaign, coupled with political infighting, organizational troubles, and problems in the leadership, ultimately led to the demise of the organization in the early 1980s.

In spite of its reputation as a violent and revolutionary group, Alkebulan (2007) has argued that over the course of its history the party underwent three distinctive phases, transforming from an organization committed to armed revolutionary struggle to one that embraced community service and even electoral politics as the key to substantive social, economic, and political change. The Panthers proved to be the most radical during their first phase, which Alkebulan argues lasted between 1966 and 1971. Calling for a violent revolution in the United States, it is this image of the party that remains most dominant in scholarship and popular culture.

Murch (2007) attributes the emergence of the BPP to three important factors: black southern migration to California in the decades during and after World War II, migrants' subsequent encounter with the carceral state, and the younger generation's response to the worldwide expansion and democratization of education that coincided with their arrival on the West Coast. From the South the party inherited not only its ideas about armed self-defense, but also a deep investment in the transformative power of education. In Oakland black youth benefited from the state network of public campuses. Merritt College, located on the edge of northwest Oakland, became the genesis point for a number of different black radical organizations, including the Soul Students Advisory Council, West Coast RAM, and finally the BPP. Murch's work challenges the popular view of the Panthers as little more than a politicized street gang by exploring the party's origins in the rich intellectual and cultural milieu of the East Bay and its extensive network of public colleges and universities. At the heart of the Panther movement was a remarkable story of black youth trying to make their education relevant to the plight of generations of African Americans long denied participation in the political process, access to decent housing, and relentless exposure to the dehumanizing impact of incarceration and police brutality.

Both contemporaries and scholars have debated the nature of the Panthers. More sympathetic assessments see the party's angry rhetoric and call for retaliatory violence as a logical outgrowth of black oppression. Others, however, argue that the media has paid the group too much attention, adding substance to something that was really hollow symbol. Recent accounts, such as Joseph (2006), have treated the party in a more sophisticated manner, showing that the Panthers were more than an angry reaction to the slow pace of civil rights. Those who joined the ranks of the Panthers were not merely disenchanting urbanities, but lay claim to a parallel Black Power movement that was local, national, and international in its goals and focus. When the BPP looked to third world revolutionaries for ideas and inspiration, for instance, they were continuing a tradition within the Black Power movement of individuals like Malcolm X and Robert Williams of seeing the global nature of social, economic, and political oppression.

One thing that is clear is that the Panthers impacted the civil rights movement. They functioned as a protest organization by anchoring their activities in the local communities in which they became involved. While their radical posture often proved a problem for more staid civil rights organizations like the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), they had serious appeal among both radical and moderate influences for their ability to inspire change through action as protest. Indeed, their revolutionary rhetoric inspired parallel organizations who adopted the Panthers' methods and often its message. Ogbar (2005) demonstrates how a host of other like-minded organizations including the American Indian Movement and the Puerto Rican Young Lords experimented in their own ways with the Panthers' radical critique of American society, creating parallel raced-based movements for community and cultural empowerment.

A subtext to this discussion is just how revolutionary the Black Panthers were. Rhodes (2007) argues that the Panthers rejected the United States, a country that had long oppressed blacks, but that they maintained hope in the country's democratic principles. Thus, in spite of their radical critique of American society, the Panthers helped deepen American democracy by challenging it to live up to its broadest and most liberal interpretations.

SEE ALSO: Civil Rights Movement, United States, 1960–1965; Civil Rights, United States, Black Power and Backlash, 1965–1978; Malcolm X (1925–1965)

References and Suggested Readings

- Alkebulan, P. (2007) Survival Pending Revolution. Tuscaloosa: Alabama University Press.
- Austin, C. (2006) Up Against the Wall: Violence in the Making and the Unmaking of the Black Panther Party. Fayetteville: Arkansas University Press.
- Garrow, D. (2007) Picking Up the Books: The New Historiography of the Black Panther Party. Reviews in American History 35: 650–70.
- Joseph, P. (2006) Waiting 'Til the Midnight Hour: A Narrative History of Black Power in America. New York: Henry Holt.
- Lazerow, J. & Williams, Y. (Eds.) (2006) In Search of the Black Panther Party. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Lazerow, J. & Williams, Y. (2008) Liberated Territory: Toward a Local History of the Black Panther Party. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Murch, D. (2007) The Campus and the Street: Race, Migration, and the Origins of the Black Panther Party in Oakland. CA Souls: A Critical Journal of Black Politics, Culture, and Society (October–December): 333–45.

Ogbar, J. (2005) Black Power: Radical Politics and African American Identity. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

Rhodes, J. (2007) Framing the Black Panthers: The Spectacular Ride of a Black Power Icon. New York: New Press.

Williams, Y. (2008) Black Politics/White Power: Civil Rights, Black Power and Black Panthers in New Haven. Oxford: Blackwell.

Black September

Kristian Patrick Alexander

Often referred to as the “era of regrettable events,” Black September draws its lineage from the consequences of the Arab–Israeli War of 1948 and the exodus of more than half a million Palestinian refugees to Transjordan. After the annexation of the West Bank that same year, King Abdullah of Jordan had to account for an additional 400,000 Palestinians now settled in his territory, shifting Jordan's total population to two-thirds Palestinian. This set the stage for future clashes between a politicized majority of discontented Palestinians and the Jordanian monarchy.

During the 1950s and 1960s the Jordanian regime, now under the reign of King Hussein, was subjected to various currents of Nasserism, Baathism, and communism that led to a heightened sense of pan-Arab and anti-western sentiments. This would eventually lead to the formation of the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO) in 1964. The PLO's mission was the complete annihilation of Israel and the promotion of an Arab state. In addition the PLO recognized the pan-Arabism of Egyptian President Nasser. These ideological currents were especially appealing to Palestinians in Jordan, making its ties to Britain a serious liability. King Hussein eventually severed the mutual defense pact with Britain and ultimately refused to join a pro-western Baghdad pact. In 1967, King Hussein would join Egypt and Syria in the Arab–Israeli War, a move that would prove fatal and lead to the loss of the West Bank.

The defeat at the hands of Israel seemingly weakened Nasser's influence, which allowed for the emergence of Yasser Arafat, an advocate of guerilla warfare and a founding member of the Fatah, one of the largest Palestinian political parties. Arafat was instrumental in incorporating the Fatah into the PLO and began to use fedayeen guerillas in a campaign of cross-border attacks into Israel. The failures of 1967 left a lasting impression on Palestinians as they began to doubt that the Jordanian government could facilitate a return to their homeland. King Hussein initially permitted PLO guerillas to organize and strike at Israel from Jordanian territory, believing that he would gain some level of influence over their operations. However, as time passed, it became evident that the PLO desired to establish an independent base of operation, with its own administrative networks in refugee camps.

In 1968, Israeli forces launched a counterattack on the Fatah in the village of Karameh, the home of a Palestinian refugee camp. During the attack the fedayeen received support from Jordanian troops against the orders of King Hussein, which allowed them to avoid a complete slaughter. By 1970, after several failed attempts to negotiate a ceasefire amongst all involved in the conflict, King Hussein called upon the United States for assistance. That summer US Secretary of State William Rogers formulated a peace plan between the Arabs and Israelis that was supported by both Egypt and Jordan but was vehemently opposed by the PLO. The Rogers Plan called for recognition of the state of Israel. Certain radical organizations within the PLO were now aiming at undermining pro-western Jordan by publicly calling for the overthrow of King Hussein.

On September 7, 1970, the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP), the second largest faction of the PLO, hijacked four civilian airliners and landed three of them on Jordanian territory, where they were later blown up after all the passengers had been released. As noted by Philip Robins in A History of Jordan (2004), this event symbolized to Jordan and King Hussein “a humiliating demonstration of weakness and the lawlessness into which the kingdom had sunk.” King Hussein considered the hijackings as a direct threat to his authority in Jordan and responded by declaring martial law on September 16. The fedayeen were then ordered to lay down their arms and to evacuate the cities. Ironically, Arafat became supreme commander of the Palestine Liberation Army (PLA), the regular military force of the PLO, on the very same day.

Over the next ten days an intense, bloody civil war was fought between the PLA and Jordan Arab Army, with Syria coming to aid the fedayeen. The United States Navy and Israel both took “precautionary military deployments” to aid Hussein. After Syrian forces began to withdraw on September 24, the fedayeen finally agreed to a ceasefire on September 25. Three days later Hussein and Arafat met in Cairo and signed an agreement that would relocate fedayeen guerilla forces from Jordanian cities to “appropriate” towns for continuing the battle with Israel.

On October 13, Hussein and Arafat signed an additional agreement in Amman that would require the fedayeen to recognize Jordanian sovereignty and the king’s authority, to withdraw their armed forces from towns and villages, and to refrain from carrying arms outside their camps in exchange for full amnesty. In the end, Black September would claim nearly 5,000 lives, although exact numbers have never been confirmed. The number of Palestinian deaths throughout the 11 days of fighting has been estimated at 3,400, although Arafat contended that some 20,000 were killed.

SEE ALSO: Arafat, Yasser (1929–2004), Fatah, and the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO); Hamas: Origins and Development; Intifada I and Intifada II; Israeli Peace Movement

References and Suggested Readings

- Bailey, C. (1984) Jordan’s Palestinian Challenge 1948–1983: A Political History. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.
- Bar, S. (1998) The Muslim Brotherhood in Jordan. Tel Aviv: Moshe Dayan Center for Middle Eastern and African Studies.
- Milton-Edwards, B. & Hinchcliffe, P. (2001) Jordan: A Hashemite Legacy. New York: Routledge.
- Robins, P. A. (2004) A History of Jordan. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Tal, L. (1995) Dealing with Radical Islam: The Case of Jordan. Survival 37, 3 (Autumn): 139–56.

Blake, William (1757–1827)

Robin Ganev

William Blake is considered one of the first and most important Romantic poets. His poetry and art are uniquely powerful and expressive against the background of elite, genteel, eighteenth-century culture. Influenced partially by the Bible, Blake created his own mythology and his own imaginary world. Underappreciated in his own time, he was rediscovered in the 1860s and has had an immense influence on succeeding generations of poets, artists, and political radicals.

The son of a hosier, Blake belonged to the class of prosperous London artisans. He can be connected to several strands of eighteenth-century popular protest. He belonged to Joseph Johnson's radical circle in London, where he met people like Joseph Priestley and Thomas Paine; however, the poet is not known to have belonged to any formal radical organization or to have participated in any demonstrations. Raised in the tradition of religious dissent, Blake was an Antinomian, believing that the true Christian did not have to obey conventional moral laws.

Blake had ties to the anti-slavery movement. He illustrated the work of Captain J. G. Stedman, A Narrative, of a five Years' expedition, against the Revolted Negroes of Surinam (1796), which became an important text for the abolitionist cause. It has been argued that Blake's Visions of the Daughters of Albion (1793) was also inspired by Stedman's narrative. In the poem the wicked character Bromion is a slave owner and he rapes Oothoon, "the soft soul of America."

A staunch defender of liberty, Blake supported causes he felt would help free humanity from bondage and tyranny. He shared the widespread sentiment in England that opposed the American war and saw the king's attempt to control American trade as an injustice. He also supported the French Revolution, especially before 1792, seeing it as a milestone on the way to humanity's liberation. He recorded his utopian and millenarian hopes for the Revolution in his unfinished epic poem, The French Revolution.

Blake has been appropriated by everyone from the labor movement to the Anglican Church. This desire to make his visionary poetry serve different ends is also visible in the scholarship. Initially, emphasis was placed on Blake's allegorical mysticism, but later scholars began to look more closely at Blake's social and political context. Some have claimed that Blake feared disorder and riot and was no supporter of rebellion. But Erdman (1977) convincingly argues that Blake's prophetic epics can be read as anti-war and anti-imperialist. Thompson (1993) places Blake in the context of radical dissent.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Slavery Movement, Britain; Britain, Anti-War Movement, 1775–1783; Paine, Thomas (1737–1809)

References and Suggested Readings

- Erdman, D. V. (1977) Blake, Prophet against Empire: A Poet's Interpretation of the History of his Own Times. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Mee, J. (1992) Dangerous Enthusiasm: William Blake and the Culture of Radicalism in the 1790s. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Thompson, E. P. (1993) Witness against the Beast: William Blake and the Moral Law. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Blanc, Louis (1811–1882)

Yann Tholomiat

Jean-Joseph-Charles-Louis Blanc was a French politician and historian who played an integral role in the Revolution of 1848 and its aftermath in France, emerging as an important spokesman for socialism. Born in Madrid, Spain, he was the son of a general tax inspector of King Joseph Bonaparte, Napoleon's brother. Blanc went to Paris in 1830 to study law after his family had been ruined by the Revolution of 1830. He worked two years in Arras as a private tutor and as a freelance journalist for Le Progrès du Pas-de-Calais.

In Paris in 1834 Blanc joined the Republican cause and worked for Le National and Le Bon Sens, of which he became the chief editor in 1837. His reputation grew as he campaigned in favor of the extension of universal suffrage, thanks to the Revue du progrès (1839–42) and La Réforme. Meanwhile, from 1841 to 1844 he wrote the five-volume Histoire de dix ans, 1830–1840 (The History of Ten Years), which attacked the Louis Philippe government. He also expounded his Republican opinions in L'Organisation du travail (1839) and in the Revue du progrès, which was reprinted ten times between 1841 and 1848.

In his books and writings Blanc argued that three principles governed the history of societies: authority (vanquished in 1789), individualism (which emerged after 1789), and fraternity. In order to reach this last goal, ruthless competition in the economy and among people had to be abolished and replaced by workers' cooperatives, or social workshops. The state would provide the financial means, appoint the staff, and hire the workers for these cooperatives. It would then act as a regulator of the market, which would not disappear, but would be controlled. A strong believer in state intervention, Blanc advocated the interrelationship of social and political reforms. Blanc expressed the ideas of a state socialism that gained a wide popularity among the workers and the artisans and led Karl Marx to call him a “utopian Socialist.”

The 1848 Revolution brought Blanc to power. He took part in the provisional government as a representative of the left, with Albert L’Ouvrier, known as “the worker Albert,” and his ideas grew in popularity. On February 25 he wrote a right-to-work proclamation, insisting that work should be guaranteed by the state and workers should be allowed to create trade unions. He also advocated the creation of a ministry of work, but no such agency was ever established. However, named at the head of the Luxembourg Commission, which was the government’s commission department for workers, he was able to implement the first social workshops, but the workshops were rapidly transformed into charity workshops and became a means of drawing the mass of unemployed workers out of Paris and thus remove a radical force from the city.

Blanc was elected in March 1848 to participate in the Constituent Assembly, but he had to resign from executive power under the resistance of moderate Republicans, who now formed the majority of the new assembly. His national workshops also perished, and this helped to fuel the June uprising of 1848. He did little to prevent the closings and instead fled to Brussels, then London, where he remained during the Second Empire from 1852 to 1870. While in exile he dedicated himself to writing historical books, such as the 13-volume Histoire de la révolution française, which defended Robespierre, the Jacobin French revolutionary leader. Between 1865 and 1867 the newspaper Le Temps published his “Letters about England.”

Blanc returned to Paris on September 4, 1870 and worked in favor of national union and war against Prussia. Elected the first representative of Seine to the National Assembly in 1871, he condemned the Parisian Commune as illegal and a threat to the new republic. He was reelected in 1876, and in 1879, alongside the senator and literary icon Victor Hugo, he campaigned for the amnesty of the Communards, which was eventually voted on July 11, 1880. He died in Cannes in 1882 and was given a state funeral in Paris by the Third Republic.

SEE ALSO: European Revolutions of 1848; France, June Days, 1848; Hugo, Victor (1802–1885)

References and Suggested Readings

- Blanc, L. (1848) A History of Ten Years, 1830–1840. 2 Vols. Trans. W. K. Kelly. Philadelphia: Lea & Blanchard.
- Fortescue, W. (2005) France and 1848: The End of Monarchy. New York: Routledge.
- Loubère, L. A. (1961) Louis Blanc: His Life and Contribution to the Rise of French Jacobin-Socialism. Evanston: Northwestern University Press.
- Pilbeam, P. (2001) French Socialists Before Marx: Workers, Women, and the Social Question in France. Montreal: McGill-Queens University Press.

Blanqui, Louis Auguste (1805–1881)

R. O’Brian Carter

As a French socialist and protest leader, Louis Auguste Blanqui was an influential and indefatigable nineteenth-century insurrectionist and populist radical, for which he spent large portions of his life imprisoned. He participated in the French Revolutions of 1830 and 1848, as in several other rebellions, including those of 1839 and 1870.

Blanqui was born on February 1, 1805 in Puget-Théniers, situated on the Var River, north of the Mediterranean port-city of Nice, a region that was incorporated into France, and then only temporarily, in the broad course of the 1789 French Revolution. The region is now encapsulated in the modern French department of Alpes-Maritimes. Even before the young Louis Auguste turned revolutionary, the Blanqui family made its mark, albeit a minor one, on French history. During the Convention the French Revolutionary legislative assembly convened to draft a constitution from 1792–5. Blanqui’s father, Jean Dominique, was a Girondist, a faction of independent radical theoreticians in the legislative assembly. The Girondins were ultimately outflanked on the left by the Jacobins, who were also republicans, but representative of Paris’s more radical elements. As a Girondist, the elder Blanqui opposed the monarchy of Louis XVI and promoted the interests of the wealthier elements of the bourgeoisie. With the radicalization of the Revolution from 1793 to 1794, the Girondins were outflanked by the Jacobin revolutionary Maximilien Robespierre (1758–94). Blanqui's father was imprisoned and narrowly escaped execution. He later became an official of the Napoleonic Empire. Blanqui's older brother, Adolphe, was in his own day an important French liberal economist, a student of the influential Jean-Baptist Say (1767–1832).

Although infinitely better known than either his father or brother, the legacy of Louis Auguste Blanqui is proportionately more ambiguous and debatable. Blanqui was lauded in some circles, but deemed diabolical in others. His enemies frequently referred to him as “little Robespierre.” This was as much a reference to Blanqui's diminutive stature as to his fiery devotion to revolutionary causes. Curiously enough, Blanqui detested the radical heritage of Robespierre. The grudge certainly owed something to the imprisonment and near execution of Blanqui's own father, at the hands of the Jacobin leader.

Despite his roots in southern France, Blanqui was politically active and made his mark in Paris, where he first joined his brother in 1818 to pursue his education at the Lycée Charlemagne, graduating in 1824. He was a brilliant student. Matriculating at the University of Paris, he enrolled at both the School of Law and Medicine. Quickly putting his studies aside, he was drawn into the circle of the Carbonari, a secret society modeled on the original Italian revolutionaries of that same name. Extolling liberalism, the Carbonari pledged the overturn of the Restoration monarchy of Louis XVIII (1814–24). Blanqui learned much during this period of revolutionary apprenticeship. His relentless persistence and skill in organizing clandestine groups would prove formidable and representative for future generations of revolutionists in the centuries to come. Blanqui began organizing the streets and took to the barricades with the Revolution of 1830. However, the crown of Charles X (1824–30) merely passed to the more open, yet still repressive July Monarchy of Louis-Philippe (1830–48). The house of Bourbon was simply replaced by its junior branch, that of Orléans.

Blanqui became an increasingly active participant in the slow march towards the Second Republic of mid-century. In the service of another secret society, the Friends of the People, Blanqui earned his first imprisonment. Placed on trial for conspiracy in January 1832, he and François Vincent Raspail (1794–1878) were initially acquitted of any wrongdoing, but found guilty of seditious remarks made while testifying on the stand. They were sentenced to a yearlong prison term at Sainte-Pélagie, beginning in March 1832. Free again in 1833, Blanqui made the acquaintance of revolutionary Philippe Buonarroti (1761–1837). A descendant of the great Renaissance artist Michelangelo, Buonarroti had participated in the French Revolution of 1789, as an accomplice of Gracchus Babeuf (1760–97). Their Society of Equals hatched a failed plot against the Directory in 1796. Executed for this, Babeuf is often regarded as the founder of communism, although a branch distinct from that later articulated by Karl Marx (1818–83). As for Blanqui, his links to Buonarroti helped situate him within the more radical matrix of the French revolutionary tradition, a place not afforded by his father's Girondin past.

With the assistance of Armand Barbès (1809–70), Blanqui established, in 1835, the Society of Families, constructed along Carbonari lines. Linked hierarchically, each society cell was made up of five members, who stocked munitions in anticipation of their pending activities. The group was inadvertently discovered by French authorities in the 1836 clampdown that followed an unsuccessful attempt on King Louis-Philippe's life. Serving as his own lawyer, and using the stand as a pulpit for his message, Blanqui was condemned to two years imprisonment. The sentence was revoked after just nine months, in 1837. Working again with Barbès, Blanqui reorganized, creating the Society of the Seasons. Seeking to take advantage of an 1839 ministerial crisis within the monarchy, he ordered a 12–13 May uprising, which left 50 dead and 190 wounded before fizzling out. Blanqui was finally apprehended in November. Put on trial, he was found guilty and sentenced to death on January 31, 1840. The next day, however, the sentence was reduced to life imprisonment. Blanqui remained incarcerated until his early release in 1847. Although his health had suffered, Blanqui's revolutionary zeal continued undiminished. After his release he organized the Central Republican Society. Surprising and unforeseen evidence then surfaced regarding his 1839 rebellion. It was insinuated that Blanqui may have acted with duplicity, appearing to plot against crown authorities, while acting as an informant for those very same powers. It was suggested that this was at the root of his having his death sentence commuted to life imprisonment. The scandal was known as the Taschereau Affair. Jules Taschereau was an official of Louis-Philippe's regime, and a journalist. The evidence Taschereau published about Blanqui never completely explained away. The charges were to reemerge at critical junctures in his life.

As revolutions erupted throughout Europe in 1848 Blanqui and a group of activists seized the opportunity afforded by the turmoil and surged into the French National Assembly, commandeering the rostrum on May 15 to demonstrate their opposition to the government. A constitution marked the founding of the Second French Republic later that same year. Louis Napoléon Bonaparte, the nephew of Napoléon I, was elected by a landslide as president. Blanqui's unsuccessful storming of the National Assembly and revolutionary effort to overthrow the government warranted his immediate return to prison. In 1852 President Bonaparte reversed course, overturned the republic, and established the Second Empire, assuming the title Napoléon III.

Serving a ten-year sentence, Blanqui managed to publish articles under a pseudonym in the revolutionary newspaper Candide. Liberated in 1859, he plotted with his new group, Social Well-Being (Bien-Être Social). Arrested once more for conspiracy in 1861, he was sentenced to four years in prison. Although nearing the end of his term, Blanqui still chose to make an escape in 1865. He was aided by a group of admiring students who referred to him affectionately as the Old Man. For this new generation, ignorant of the Taschereau Affair, Blanqui was an archetype of civil disobedience and permanent revolt. Forced to live abroad in Belgium and Spain, the Old Man tried with varying degrees of success to orchestrate the maneuvers of his young Blanquists. With the 1870 outbreak of the Franco-Prussian War, the Second Empire collapsed, creating circumstances propitious to Blanqui's return. He began publication of a revolutionary, nationalistic newspaper, The Fatherland in Danger. An uprising of Blanquists at La Villette, located on the fringes of Paris, failed despite its violence. Blanqui's own seizure of the city hall, the Hôtel-de-Ville, was ephemeral and unsuccessful. Adolph Thiers (1797–1877), who would oversee the armistice signed with the newly created Germany, before serving as the first president of the French Third Republic, called for Blanqui's arrest. This new prison term ended only in 1879. In 1880 Blanqui launched a newspaper, Neither God Nor Master. He died on January 1, 1881.

Blanqui was a gifted writer, one who labored over his craft. His revolutionary newspapers were peppered with biting invective. He was no theoretician. Both his writing and his revolutionary actions were practical and action-oriented, as he participated in nearly all of the pivotal uprisings of post-Restoration France. Blanqui regarded the budding labor movement with suspicion, and disparaged the 1864 formation of the International Working Men's Association (IWMA), or First International. Although his contacts with Karl Marx, the founder of the IWMA, were cordial, they were limited to letters. Marx still considered Blanqui as the "head and heart" of the French proletariat, owing to his uncompromising tenacity and courage. Blanqui's contacts with the French working classes were, however, practically non-existent, and there is no indication that he ever received more than paltry support from their ranks. More to his credit, Blanqui was a lightning rod of sorts, attracting the charged spectrum of nineteenth-century French revolutionary thought and tradition.

SEE ALSO: Babeuf, François-Noël (1760–1797) and the Conspiracy of Equals; Bonaparte, Louis-Napoleon (1808–1873); Bonaparte, Napoleon (1769–1821); Buonarroti, Philippe (1761–1837); Directory, France, 1795–1799; France, June Days, 1848; France, Revolution of 1848; French Revolution, 1789–1794; French Revolution, Radical Factions and Organizations; Marx, Karl (1818–1883); Marxism; Raspail, François-Vincent (1794–1878); Robespierre, Maximilien de (1758–1794)

References and Suggested Readings

- Bernstein, S. (1971) Auguste Blanqui and the Art of Insurrection. London: Lawrence & Wishart.
- Dommanget, M. (1957) Les Idées politiques et sociales d'Auguste Blanqui. Paris: Rivière.
- Dommanget, M. (1969) Auguste Blanqui: Des origines à la révolution de 1848. Paris: Mouton.
- Dommanget, M. (1971) Auguste Blanqui au début de la IIIe République, 1871–1880. Paris: Mouton.
- Hutton, P. H. (1981) The Cult of the Revolutionary Tradition: The Blanquists in French Politics, 1863–1893. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Paz, M. (1984) Un Révolutionnaire professionnel, Auguste Blanqui. Paris: Fayard.
- Spitzer, A. (1957) Revolutionary Theories of Louis Auguste Blanqui. New York: Columbia University Press.

Bloch, Marc (1886–1944)

Richard Francis Crane

Marc Bloch was a historian, soldier, and a member of the French Resistance during World War II. He was an influential founder of the Annales school of social and economic history, which reached prominence in the middle of the twentieth century, as well as the author of the posthumously published Strange Defeat, a seminal account of the 1940 fall of France to Nazi Germany. A veteran of both world wars, and a patriot devoted to French democracy, Bloch ultimately gave his life in the French Resistance.

Born in a middle-class Jewish home, Bloch identified less with his religious background than with forbears who had fought in the French Revolution in the late eighteenth century and in the Franco-Prussian Wars in 1870–1. Growing up near the turn of the century, however, he was still affected by anti-Semitism, especially by the Dreyfus Affair, in which a Jewish captain in the French army was wrongly convicted of espionage.

Following distinguished service during World War I (1914–18), in which he received the Croix de Guerre and the Legion of Honor, Bloch went on to achieve considerable success as a historian. He published his doctoral thesis in 1920, taught at the University of Strasbourg, then the Sorbonne, and made his scholarly reputation with pioneering studies of medieval agrarian history and feudal society. An emphasis on long-term, as opposed to event-centered, history inspired his founding of the journal Annales d'histoire économique et sociale (Annals of Economic and Social History) with fellow scholar Lucien Febvre in 1929.

Though the father of six children, Bloch also served as a reserve captain and was recalled to active duty in 1939, when war with Germany appeared imminent. As a staff officer within the French army's command structure from May to June 1940, Bloch witnessed the stunning 6-week collapse of French arms in the face of the German Blitzkrieg, or "lightning war," followed days later by the dissolution of the Third French Republic. In late 1940 he wrote a book about the defeat, what he termed his own "white heat of rage." This examination of contemporary events marked a departure from his typical historical approach. Providing an analysis that was anything but detached or impersonal, Bloch offered a diagnosis of military disaster with social-political roots, emphasizing the selfishness and shortsightedness of the bourgeoisie with which he identified.

Failing to get his family out of the country when France fell to Germany, Bloch nonetheless was spared immediate persecution under the anti-Jewish laws promulgated by Marshal Philippe Pétain's new authoritarian regime based at Vichy. But Bloch's name no longer appeared on the Annales' editorial list, and he eventually lost his professorship. After German occupation of the southern zone that included Vichy in November 1942, Bloch participated in the Franc-Tireur Resistance group in Lyons and in the larger Mouvements Unis de la Résistance (United Movements of Resistance). Under pseudonyms such as "Narbonne" he coordinated resistance activities and contributed to underground publications until arrested in March 1944. The arrest was depicted in the Nazi-collaborationist press as the capture of a leading "Jewish-Bolshevik terrorist." After interrogation and torture, the Germans shot Bloch on June 16 among a group of younger resisters. Bloch's legacy can be appreciated today both in the school of historical inquiry he helped establish, and in his contemporary analysis of the fall of France.

SEE ALSO: France, Resistance to Nazism

References and Suggested Readings

- Blatt, J. (Ed.) (1998) The French Defeat of 1940: Reassessments. Providence: Berghahn Books.
- Bloch, M. (1968) Strange Defeat: A Statement of Evidence Written in 1940. Trans. G. Hopkins. New York: Norton.
- Fink, C. (1989) Marc Bloch: A Life in History. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Jackson, J. (2001) France: The Dark Years, 1940–1944. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Reid, D. (2003) Narratives of Resistance in Marc Bloch's L'Étrange défaite. Modern and Contemporary France 11, 4: 443–52.

Bloody Sunday Demonstration, 1887

Lisa Keller

Bloody Sunday was the nickname given to a violent confrontation between demonstrators and police in Trafalgar Square, London on Sunday, November 13, 1887. The clash occurred when more than 4,000 police and hundreds of special constables and armed soldiers attempted to block tens of thousands of people from protesting against unemployment and asserting free speech rights. The word “Bloody” reflects British intolerance of unjustified civil force and of public casualties. By most standards, violence was limited: three fatal injuries occurred, 75 people were hospitalized, and 50 people arrested.

Though casualties were few, the event was sensational because it symbolized “law and order” government policy, temporary repression of free speech and assembly rights, and the perception that socialist and other left-wing groups had failed to establish themselves as mainstream political forces. In the long term the event opened a debate resulting in the reestablishment of rights; the acknowledgment that law and order were necessary in a city but that authority had limits and could not abridge basic rights; and the realization that British leftist and labor groups were key in the evolving political landscape. It also focused public attention on the newly reorganized Metropolitan Police, established in 1829 as London’s public order arbiters.

The confrontation that Sunday resulted from an unusual government ban on a working-class demonstration in Trafalgar Square, a popular meeting ground, following a turbulent year of demonstrations and government worries over public order. A February 8, 1886 meeting of labor and leftist groups in the square had resulted in violence (though no fatalities), with marauding crowds breaking windows and looting. Black Monday, as the day was dubbed, shook London to its very core. Merchants closed their shops, viewing the attacks on property as a sign of revolution. The Home Office, the government branch which oversaw London and its police, took drastic steps to ensure that order be maintained. Police were criticized for ineffectiveness and, following a parliamentary investigation, were reorganized and given a new commissioner, a former military man who imposed severe and unprecedented restrictions on public meetings.

Black Monday and Bloody Sunday were indicative of the increasing number of street demonstrations in London during the 1880s, as economic depression and high unemployment rates spurred public protest. The last quarter of the nineteenth century saw the rise of a wide array of political groups challenging the status quo, including the Social Democratic Federation, the Socialist League, the Fabians, the Metropolitan Radical Federation, and the Irish National League. Labor as a political movement was in its ascendancy and dependent upon accessing public spaces to get its message across to the newly expanded electorate. London’s parks, commons, and squares, always popular for public meetings, became a daily meeting ground for various causes by the 1880s. British socialists viewed public meetings as key to providing the public with information and receiving its support, thus avoiding the violence that had roiled the Continent.

Bloody Sunday signaled the end of the government’s effort to repress free speech and assembly rights, which had started with Black Monday. A new debate opened on civil rights in Great Britain involving parliament, government law officers, and the public; the first civil liberties group in the nation, the Law and Liberty League, was formed in this period. The lasting outcome was a reassertion of British “birthright” principles of tolerating public speech and assembly.

SEE ALSO: Reform Bills, Britain, 1867 and 1884; Socialism; Socialism, Britain

References and Suggested Readings

- Cole, G. D. H. (1941) British Working Class Politics 1832–1914. London: G. Routledge & Sons.
- Keller, L. (2008) Triumph of Order: Democracy and Public Space in New York and London. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Thompson, P. (1967) Socialists, Liberals and Labour: The Struggle for London 1885–1914. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul.

Boal, Augusto (b. 1931)

Roxanne Schroeder-Arce

Brazilian theater activist/theorizer Augusto Boal is best known for his development of the Theater of the Oppressed during the 1950s and 1960s. The primary objective of his life’s work was to incite audiences into action, emphasizing the inherent nature of theater and performance. Boal was engaged in theater from a young age, and his earliest professional work was at the Arena Theater in southern Brazil. It was at the Arena where Boal began to explore interactive and political theater, which led to his arrest, torture, and ultimate exile to Argentina in 1971. Greatly influenced by Paulo Freire's book Pedagogy of the Oppressed, Boal titled his first text Theater of the Oppressed, an exploration of how theater gives voice to subjugated peoples. The book attacked Aristotelian elitist ideals, insisting that the Greek philosopher's theories were coercive, paralyzing people rather than inspiring them to proactive ideas and behavior. Boal's text, eventually translated into 25 languages, shared his preliminary theories on employing theater to foster social change and transformation through protest and activism.

Boal contributed several other texts to the fields of theater practice and pedagogy, including The Aesthetics of the Oppressed, Legislative Theater, Games for Actors and Non-Actors, and Rainbow of Desire. Through his literary contributions and workshops around the world, Boal introduced multiple theories and practices to theater artists and community activists. One of Boal's most celebrated forms is forum theater, where actors stop mid-conflict to include audiences in exploring solutions to social problems introduced in performance. Boal termed his audiences "spect-actors," insisting that theater has a responsibility to invite and inspire audiences to participate in what they see on stage and consider their power to act beyond the performance itself. Image Theater was another of Boal's contributions to the theater. In Playing Boal: Theater, Theory, Activism, theater critics Mady Schutzman and Jan Cohen-Cruz describe Image Theater as "a technique that privileges the human body over spoken word . . . [using the body] as an expressive tool to represent, non-verbally, a wide repertoire of feelings, ideas, and attitudes."

Boal lives in Rio de Janeiro, where he continues theorizing and writing on art and protest. He offers Theater of the Oppressed workshops throughout the world at conferences, prisons, and in communities, which thrive internationally. Theater of Oppressed techniques have been appropriated by fields beyond theater, including psychology, to promote mental health through drama therapy, where patients engage in acting.

SEE ALSO: Agitprop; Anarchism; Brecht, Bertolt (1898–1956); Eisenstein, Sergei (1898–1948); Freire, Paulo (1921–1997); Marx, Karl (1818–1883); Žižek, Slavoj (b. 1949)

References and Suggested Readings

Boal, A. (1985) Theater of the Oppressed. New York: Theater Communications Group.

- Boal, A. (1992) Games for Actors and Non-Actors. London: Routledge.
- Boal, A. (2001) Hamlet and the Baker's Son. London: Routledge.
- Boal, A. (2006) The Aesthetics of the Oppressed. London: Routledge.
- Colleran, J. & Spencer, J. (1998) Staging Resistance: Essays on Political Theater. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.
- Peixoto, F., Epstein, S., & Schechner, R. (1990) Brazilian Theatre and National Identity. TDR 34, 1 (Spring): 60–9.
- Schlossman, D. A. (2002) Actors and Activists. New York: Routledge.
- Schutzman, M. & Cohen-Cruz, J. (1994) Playing Boal: Theatre, Therapy, Activism. London: Routledge.

Bogotazo and La Violencia

Andrés Otálvaro H.

Forty-five years of conservative hegemony ended in 1930 when Enrique Olaya Herrera won the presidential elections in Colombia and the Liberal Party assumed control over the state apparatus after decades of political exclusion. The electoral victory was the origin of a new and especially violent period for Colombian society, culminating in the tragic events of April 11, 1949: the Bogotazo insurrection.

The initial efforts to implement urgent social, constitutional, tributary, and land reforms by the Liberal governments of Enrique Olaya Herrera (1930–4) and Alfredo López Pumarejo (1934–8) were constantly blocked by Conservative opponents. López Pumarejo's political project from 1934 to 1938 was designated La Revolución en marcha. Conservatives opposed his reforms, especially measures designed to promote a new distribution of farmland based on the official slogan "the land belongs to those who work on it."

After the administration of Eduardo Santos (1938–42), López Pumarejo was reelected president for a second term. But a strengthened domestic opposition, World War II and international crisis, and personal family problems obliged him to resign in 1946 and confer power on Alberto Lleras Camargo. While López Pumarejo sought early elections, his resignation marked the end of this Liberal dynasty, which had been shaken by arduous political battles and violence from the moment the Liberals gained executive power in 1930.

Committing what has been seen by Liberals as a tremendous political error, López Pumarejo appointed a candidate as his successor, leading the way to a more general battle between Liberals and Conservatives. The Liberal Party itself was divided by a centrist faction led by Gabriel Turbay and a leftist one led by Jorge Eliécer Gaitán. Intense political propaganda campaigns were stoked by the newspapers from each faction (El Liberal on the side of Turbay and La Jornada supporting Gaitán). The Conservatives were unified under one candidate, Mariano Ospina, who won the elections and took power as president in August 1946.

Under the Ospina presidency, paramilitary groups called Los Chulavitas and Los Pajaros were formed, with the support of police, who devastated the country through terror and murder in the name of the government, the Conservative Party, and the interests of wealthy landowners and merchants. The desired objective of the paramilitary forces was to ensure that land remained in private hands. In turn, members of the paramilitaries received land rights as a reward for their services. As a consequence, violence intensified in the cities, towns, and rural areas, which suffered multiple combats, persecutions, and assassinations among Liberals and Conservatives. It was dangerous to travel around Colombia and there were several restrictions on movement by road in order to prevent assaults and other criminal activities. The army was unable to offer security to the inhabitants of Colombia. It usually supported the Liberal Party, while the police force was on the Conservatives' side.

In 1948, the Liberal Party refused to participate in elections for the Congress, giving Conservatives the opportunity to extend their grip on executive and legislative power. One of the most radical Conservatives of all time, Laureano Gómez, gained absolute influence over the debates in Congress during this time, thanks to enormous prestige based on his rhetorical skills, and he was able to single-handedly pursue his objectives of legitimizing the status quo, thus perpetuating the perks and privileges of the wealthy class. His political counterpart on the left, Jorge Eliécer Gaitán, stood at the opposite extreme, favoring the rights and demands of the poorest inhabitants of the country. On April 9, 1948, Gaitán was murdered and one of the most tragic and bloody episodes in the nation's history was unleashed.

"I am not a man, I am the people," Gaitán would say, in speeches that mercilessly attacked the Colombian oligarchy and demonstrated a commitment to the popular struggle. The strong revolutionary spirit that influenced the life and ideas of this charismatic leader, who was supported by millions of Colombians, is usually tainted by those who accuse him of being a fascist autocrat on account of his political methods, which are presumed to resemble those of il Duce, Benito Mussolini. The truth was that the death of Gaitán produced major national turmoil whose revolutionary character was expressed mainly in the country's capital, Bogotá. It was a Friday noon when the Liberal leader left his office with friends. At the entrance of the building, his assassin opened fire and Gaitán received three bullet wounds. He died a few minutes later in the Central Clinic, despite receiving medical attention.

From that point on, madness and fear invaded the streets of the city. Churches, public buildings (including the Congress and the Supreme Court Building), stores, buses, historical monuments, schools, cars, and other vehicles were burned or attacked. Rioters used any tools as weapons. For several days and nights, the sound of gunfire and shouting marked the rhythm of that chaotic and bloody symphony. People looted stores indiscriminately and the rule of law vanished during the most critical hours. It took the military forces almost seven days to restore public order. While there are no exact records of the number of people killed, estimates suggest that 1,000 people lost their lives in the uprising.

Gaitán's murderer, Juan Roa Sierra, was killed while being dragged to the front gates of the Presidential Palace and demonstrators demanded justice and vengeance. Nevertheless, the Bogotazo cannot be understood as just an emotional reaction to the assassination of a beloved political leader. The destructive impulse not only became a massive killing and plundering spree but was an expression of popular anger and frustration against the century-old injustices within Colombian society – a violent outcry of the poorest sectors who had not had the historical chance to voice their demands until that day.

The popular uprising became a proclamation against the social hierarchy in Colombia, which dated back to the earliest days of national independence. The revolts were conducted by many who had suffered exclusion and expropriation since the days of colonial domination and then throughout the republican period at the service of the political and economic establishment. As Gaitán once asserted: "People can be subdued for a long time to an order against their interests, but this only results in making their rebellion even more violent" (cited in Pécaut 2001: 437).

Thus the disturbances were not merely violent acts but in many respects a revolutionary impulse of Gaitanism and the mass movement it inspired – a denunciation of the abuses of power and a general claim for sweeping changes inside Colombian society. But this spirit was effectively crushed when the government declared martial law to stifle the demonstrations with as much military force as would be necessary. With the loss of Gaitán, the absence of real leadership and organizational skills also dealt a critical blow to revolutionary aspirations.

As outsiders to the popular insurrection, Liberal leaders ran the gauntlet of the furious armed crowds that surrounded the Presidential Palace as they convened a meeting with the head of state, Ospina, in the latter's office. This historic 17-hour meeting between the Liberal and Conservative leadership set the course of the political events that followed.

Although the Liberals, represented mainly by Dario Echandía and Carlos Lleras Restrepo, suggested that the president resign for the "good of the nation," Ospina refused to stand down as president and commander-in-chief of the army. After intense debate and some concessions from both sides, a final resolution was taken: the Conservatives and Liberals called upon themselves to constitute a government of national unity supported by the armed forces. Fundamental beliefs linked to the restoration of the status quo, enforcement of the rule of law, and personal ambitions explain this step.

The Liberal speakers could have obtained power independently without Conservative support, based on the strong popular feeling expressed by the angry and revolutionary masses throughout Colombia. Instead Echandía, who was appointed by Ospina as his minister of government, remarked laconically: "power: what for?" With the most prestigious revolutionary leader dead, the Liberals preferred an alliance with the Conservatives – a strategic agreement that would deepen in the coming decades (especially from 1958 to 1974). The cost of this arrangement was the loss of popular support and the consolidation of a hermetical political regime, based on exclusion, elitism, corruption, and, last but not least, surreptitious ties with criminal forces.

After the suppression of the uprising, the capital city appeared as a scene of destruction, pain, and mourning. A stronghold of resistance was the Police Fifth Division. The national army could not defeat their revolutionary persistence and surrender was only achieved after the combatants received assurances of amnesty and privileges from the government. Although an informal trade thrived due to rampant pilfering, the population did not have a sufficient supply of basic food, and starvation endangered the inhabitants of the capital.

The Liberal Party blamed the Conservative regime for the crime against Gaitán, but no responsibility for the assassination was ever established. The division inside the Liberal Party (Gaitán vs. Turbay) also nurtured suspicion about the complicity of one or several Liberal figures. Whoever was guilty, both Liberals and Conservatives benefited by the killing of this powerful political advocate: Gaitán effectively symbolized the opposition and would have been Colombia's next president without doubt.

Most scholars assume that the historical period of La Violencia began in 1948, but the roots of these events can be found in previous decades when Liberals and Conservatives fought relentlessly for farmland and political position, primarily in the Santander, Tolima, el Valle, and Boyacá regions. The obstacles placed by the Conservative Party in the way of the Liberal project promoting land reform triggered continuous and violent clashes that involved both parties and their followers. The rural conflict led to a "territorialization" of violence, and complete towns, municipalities, and regions were assigned to one or other party. Geographical landmarks were defended and conquered with fire and blood, while peasant displacement was constant. By official estimates, more than 300,000 people perished from 1948 to 1953.

After Gaitán's death, guerilla groups with Liberal tendencies occupied eastern Colombia, especially the Los Llanos territory facing el Orinoco and el Amazonas. Organizations like Los Bautistas, Los Parras, and Los Fonsecaes fought against troops of Chulavitas, the armed forces, and the Conservative government, and Colombian revolutionaries like Guadalupe Salcedo and Eduardo Franco emerged.

The disorder surrounding the Bogotazo enabled Manuel Marulanda, known as Tirofijo, to escape from jail and emerge as leader of the Armed Revolutionary Forces and Popular Liberation Army (Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias de Colombia, FARC) until his death in March 2008. He went to the Tolima territories, joined a radical faction of the Liberal Party, and with Guadalupe Salcedo declared “La Ley del Llano,” the first political manifesto written by peasant rebels, which legitimized the use of violence as a political strategy against the establishment.

Guerilla militants emerged not only as revolutionary Liberals, but also with strong political connections to the Communist Party. Liberal political leaders, primarily in urban areas, distanced themselves from the strategy of the rural fighters, searching for a peaceful approach in terms prescribed by the constitution.

As a symbol of political dissent, mainly because of the lack of fundamental rights for any legal opposition, Liberals decided not to participate in the presidential elections of 1950, which accounts for the Conservative Laureano Gómez’s victory in the polls. Some guerilla factions accepted the beginnings of peace talks with the government, whose representative was Alfonso López Pumarejo, which extended them the benefit of amnesty. Nevertheless, the government of Laureano Gómez was cut short by a putsch carried out by General Gustavo Rojas Pinilla, who governed Colombia from 1953 to 1957. Despite the “progressive dictatorship” imposed by the regime of Rojas, the violence never subsided and military forces promoted every means of systematic violence available to punish opponents.

SEE ALSO: Colombia, Armed Insurgency, Peasant Self-Defense, and Radical Popular Movements, 1960s–1970s; FARC (Revolutionary Armed Forces and Popular Liberation Army); Gaitán, Jorge Eliécer (1898–1948), UNIR, and Revolutionary Populism in Colombia

References and Suggested Readings

- Alape, A. (1983) El Bogotazo: Memorias del olvido, 2nd ed. Havana: Ediciones Casa de las Américas.
 Braun, H. (1998) Mataron a Gaitán. Bogotá: Norma.
 Campos, G., Falls Borda, O., & Luna, E. (2005) La violencia en Colombia, Vol. 1. Bogotá: Taurus.
 Espinosa, O., Varela, E., & Tirado, M. A. (1990) La Cultura de la Violencia en Colombia durante el Siglo XX. La Cábala 11.
 Gaitán, J. E. (1929) La Masacre de las Bananeras: 1928. Medellín: Editorial Pepe.

- Pécaut, D. (2001) Orden y Violencia. Bogotá: Norma.
 Melo, H. (Ed.) (1989) Reportaje de la Historia de Colombia: 158 documentos y relatos de testigos presenciales sobre hechos ocurridos en 5 siglos. Bogotá: Planeta.
 Tirado, A. (Ed.) (1989) Nueva historia de Colombia. Bogotá: Planeta.

Böhm, Hans (also Hans Behem) (1458?–1476)

Matthew H. Wahlert

Hans Böhm was a popular fifteenth-century German preacher who gained fame as the “Drummer of Niklashausen” following a vision directing him to advocate greater social equality. Although his exact date of birth is unknown, Böhm was born in the village of Helmstadt in the south-central region of Germany known as Franconia. In 1476, Böhm, a shepherd and street entertainer, claimed to have had a vision of the Virgin Mary in the village of Niklashausen. The vision prompted a series of sermons that challenged the elites of Germanic society.

The vision prompted Böhm to burn his drum in a medieval ritual called the Bonfire of the Vanities. Traditionally, citizens would burn their possessions (their vanities) in a public display of dependence on God and adherence to a lifestyle of poverty. Böhm declared that the vision of the Virgin Mary spoke of the need for more social equality. Social equality, Mary claimed, could only be accomplished with the cessation of payments to the corrupt clergy. In addition, all rents and forced labor at the hands of the nobles should stop. Although Böhm lacked both a religious and secular education, peasants were drawn to his sermons calling for their repentance but also critically attacking clergy and nobles. Böhm’s call for equality based upon the words of the Virgin Mary even called for the end of taxes and, quickly, emerged as a threat to the status quo. Thousands of peasants would often converge on Niklashausen in order to hear the preaching of the Drummer Boy. Böhm soon gained fame throughout all of central and southern Germany, and often crowds of pilgrims exceeded 40,000. As the crowds increased, Böhm became more and more radical, even calling for the deaths of the clergy. A popular uprising, known as the Niklashausen peasant revolt, began in May of 1476.

Böhm drew the wrath of Bishop Rudolph von Sherenberg of Wurzburg and was arrested on July 12, 1476, based upon the bishop's fears that Böhm would ultimately lead peasants in an armed uprising. An estimated 16,000 of Böhm's followers attempted to rescue him on July 14, but were soon dispersed. On July 19 a trial of Böhm, on the charge of heresy and on enchanting, led to a recantation and his execution. On the eve of the Reformation, many historians consider Böhm and the revolt as symptomatic of many of the problems associated with the condition of peasants. In addition, experts of the period note that the ability of Böhm to gain such a following points to the role of spiritualism in medieval Europe, which was the only available vehicle to express change in the societal order. The fact that the peasant revolt began during the period of Carnival (the mystic celebration on the eve of Lent) suggests that Böhm emboldened the peasants at a time when they were most susceptible to mystical calls to change the social structure.

Most of the story of the Drummer of Niklashausen comes from primary sources of the clergy and nobles of the period, including Bishop Rudolph von Sherenberg of Wurzburg. Johann Trithemius recorded the story in 1514. More recently, historian Richard Wunderli contributed a modern treatment of the Drummer Boy in 1992. The work, however, is somewhat controversial in that Wunderli, for lack of primary sources, often was forced to base the exact nature of Böhm's sermons on modern perspectives.

SEE ALSO: German Reformation

References and Suggested Readings

Wunderli, R. (1992) Peasant Fires: The Drummer of Niklashausen. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

Bolívar, Simón (1783–1830)

Jan Ullrich

Simón Bolívar was a central character in the Hispanic American movements for independence against Spanish colonial domination. “The Liberator,” as he was called after his victories over royalist forces in today's Venezuela, Colombia, Ecuador, Panama, Peru, and Bolivia, became the first president of the Great Colombian Republic

Simón Bolívar, ca. 1820, called El Libertador (the Liberator). He is credited with helping South America achieve independence from Spain, specifically the countries of Venezuela, Colombia, Ecuador, Peru, Panama, and Bolivia, where he is canonized in the culture and political mythology. (Getty Images) (Gran Colombia) in 1821. While his thinking and struggle for independence, liberty, and unity profoundly influenced the political development of contemporary Latin America, the historical interpretation of his life and ideas is a subject of historical disputes and ideological conflicts even today.

Bolívar was born on July 25, 1783 in Caracas to an aristocratic Creole family. After the early death of his parents, Bolívar was educated by liberal teachers Andrés Bello (1781–1865) and Simón Rodríguez (1769–1854). Bolívar's ideals, such as a free and popular education system, were greatly influenced by the revolutionary pedagogue Rodríguez, who was an enthusiastic disciple of Rousseau. Bolívar and Rodríguez met up again in Europe, where the two made the acquaintance of Alexander von Humboldt and witnessed Napoleon Bonaparte's coronation ceremony. The impressions made on Bolívar by Europe's Age of Revolution led him to the famous Oath of Monte Sacro, in which he dedicated his life to the liberation of the Americas from the domination of the Spanish.

When he returned to Venezuela in 1807, the profound crisis of the colonial order, brought on by growing conflicts between aspiring Creole elites and the Spanish aristocracy, had created the historical backdrop for the beginning of Venezuela's War of Independence in 1810. Bolívar was colonel of the republican forces under Francisco de Miranda (1750–1816) before they were defeated by the royalists in 1812. Bolívar went on to New Granada to join the struggle for the independent United Provinces. In his Cartagena Manifesto (1912), he concluded that the division of the republicans and the absence of broader popular support had enabled the return of the royalists and that a unified and centralized republican government had to be the basis for independence.

Bolívar had conquered Caracas in 1813, but the Second Venezuelan Republic was defeated and Bolívar fled to Jamaica. From Haiti he returned to Venezuela in 1816 and continued his struggle. In his Angostura Address of 1819 he outlined the constitutional principles of the Venezuelan Republic. A democratic republic, he announced, without a king, would abolish privileges and inequality and respect human rights, the right to work, and freedom of thought, expression, and publication. But even if these ideas made him too revolutionary for his time, Bolívar's republican thinking was more oriented toward the British constitutional monarchy. A strong executive power, with an elected president instead of a king at its head, would be accountable to the parliament, which would have legislative functions and financial control.

By 1821 Bolívar had liberated today's Venezuela, Colombia, Panama, and Ecuador from the royalists, and in the Congress of Cúcuta in the same year he became president of the newly founded Great Colombian Republic. Bolívar, who by then had received the title of The Liberator, moved on to Peru and Bolivia, where the last royalist resistance was defeated in 1824. In his Letter from Jamaica (1815), Bolívar had insisted that the new republic had to abolish any kind of racial hierarchies, but his attempts at complete abolition of slavery were thwarted by resisting conservative forces in the Cúcuta Congress, even though slaves who had fought in the republican army were released and the slave trade became outlawed. In the Bolivian Constitution of 1825, Bolívar could finally assert this idea.

In the Panamerican Conference in Panama in 1826, Bolívar realized his ideal of a United Confederation of the independent South American nations. But growing divisions among the republican elites and the regions' particular interests threatened the confederation, which fell apart after a few months. Peru and Bolivia evaded Bolívar's domination and Great Colombia's fragile unity was answered by The Liberator's increasing authoritarianism. His skepticism of liberal forces increased, and his insistence on unity and centralization opposed democratic federalism. Constitutional reforms and his self-proclamation as dictator on August 27, 1828 could not prevent the final division of Great Colombia in 1830. Bolívar finally resigned and died on his way to European exile on December 17, 1830 in Santa Marta in present-day Colombia.

The life of The Liberator and contradictions between the realist politician and idealist thinker became the source of a national myth that was created only a few years after his death. South American conservative and progressive forces compete over interpretations and the significance of Simón Bolívar even today.

SEE ALSO: Bolivarianism, Venezuela; Chávez, Hugo and the Bolivarian Revolution, 1998–Present; Rodríguez, Simón (1769–1854); Rousseau, Jean-Jacques (1712–1778); Venezuelan War of Independence

References and Suggested Readings

- Carrera Damas, G. (1969) El culto a Bolívar. Esbozo para un estudio de la historia de las ideas en Venezuela. Caracas: Universidad Central de Venezuela.
- Liévano Aguirre, I. (1988) Bolívar. Caracas: Academia Nacional de la Historia.
- Lynch, J. (1983) Simón Bolívar and the Age of Revolution. London: Institute of Latin American Studies, University of London.
- Pino Iturrieta, E. A. (2004) La independencia de Venezuela: historia mínima. Caracas: Funtrapet.

Bolivarianism, Venezuela

Dario Azzellini

Bolivarianism refers to Simón Bolívar (1783–1830), Venezuelan liberator and general who fought for independence throughout South America and promoted the unification of the continent. Bolivarianism occurred in various South American countries, but its heart and stronghold is in Venezuela, where most movements and the government define themselves as Bolivarian and the transformation process is called Bolivarian Process or Bolivarian Revolution. In twenty-first-century Venezuela Bolivarianism has become a set of political ideas and collective experiences and values without a clearly defined program or theoretical framework, and thus is a work in progress rather than a meticulous ideology or theory.

Venezuelan president Hugo Chávez, the modern exponent of Bolivarianism, traces the ideology to the thought of Karl Marx, Antonio Gramsci, Leon Trotsky, and Mao Zedong, to the Italian philosopher Antonio Negri, and even Jesus Christ. Bolivarianism reaches across a wide ideological spectrum reflecting the large diversity of political, social, cultural, and religious influences feeding it. Chávez views his role as providing a political framework rather than expounding a political dogma.

The diverse forces converging in the process of the Bolivarian Revolution are seen by political analysts Luis Bonilla-Molina and Haiman El Troudi as historical currents for change, a variety of leftist and emancipatory tendencies emerging from the Latin American economic crises of the 1980s to 2000. While the 1980s were considered a lost decade by socialist ideologists, a growing network of groups and organizations in Venezuela saw the events that led to the economic collapse of workers as strengthening the idea of a non-dogmatic revolution. The crisis created multiple spaces of convergence, encounter, and disencounter between the forces resisting neoliberalism, free market policies, and injustices in society. Workers, peasants, and cells within the army were driven by discontent with societal corruption and the expropriation of the nation's resources by the upper classes and foreign capital. This historical encounter built the base for the forces known in later years as the Bolivarian Revolution.

The basic idea of Bolivarianism provides direct reference to the history of local, regional, national, and continental experiences of emancipatory resistance and struggle against oppressive forces. The primary Venezuelan historical references of Bolivarianism are Simón Bolívar, Simón Rodríguez (1769–1854), and Ezequiel Zamora (1817–60).

The progressive and revolutionary reference to these historic figures can be traced back to the mid-1960s debates that divided the Communist Party of Venezuela (PCV) that was actively supporting the FALN (Armed Forces of National Liberation) guerrilla movement. In 1964 some FALN guerrilla members of the PCV began to define themselves as revolutionary Bolivarian Marxists, leading to defections, divisions, and expulsions from the party. The new group formed the guerrilla PRV-FALN (Revolutionary Party of Venezuela) and viewed the historical heritage of black and indigenous resistance through Bolívar, Rodríguez, and Zamora as the foundation for Venezuelan socialism. They considered civilian-military alliances and future uprisings as a historical strategy for creating revolutionary transformation.

Simón Bolívar represents the importance of independence, sovereignty, and armed resistance. Simón Rodríguez, philosopher and teacher of Bolívar, was forced from Venezuela after he supported an uprising against Spanish colonialism in 1797. While in exile in France, Rodríguez was exposed to the ideas of Jean-Jacques Rousseau. Rodríguez, often characterized as an early socialist, advocated for the search for independent social and political organization. He saw the necessity to create innovative models for institutions and government in Latin America in contrast to importing hierarchical European models into South America. Rodríguez asserted that “We invent or we mistake.” Rodríguez saw the importance of education. As the teacher of Bolívar, Rodríguez is considered a pioneer of mass education in Latin America. The notion of armed struggle is embodied through Ezequiel Zamora, peasant general of the Venezuelan federal war in the postcolonial and ongoing struggle for justice and democracy. Zamora led peasant uprisings with slogans like “free land and free people,” “popular elections,” and “horror to the oligarchy.” Zamora's peasant army was known for burning the manor houses of landlords and immediately redistributing the land they monopolized to peasants.

Since 1964 a growing number of Venezuelan social movements, political organizations, and progressive sectors inside the army have adapted the ideas of Bolivarianism or contributed to their collective creation. Between the end of the 1960s and the mid-1970s the political and military defeat of the guerrilla movements led inside the revolutionary left to a radical criticism of the focus theory, of the simple transfer of revolutionary experiences from Eastern Europe, Cuba, or Asia, and of the authoritarianism of the communist parties. The critical debate spread among the currents that gave up the armed struggle, as well as among those that continued with it. They all oriented themselves more to social movements, most in recognition of the autonomy of such movements.

Historians and political theorists have rooted Bolivarianism within a range of categories and influences. There are various social, historical, and philosophical currents, beginning with the critical Marxism of Ernesto Che Guevara, José Carlos Mariátegui, Anton Pannekoek, and European models of autonomous labor councils that are rooted in the self-activity of workers. The movement is also founded in the work of Antonio Gramsci and Antonio Negri, whose work examines the historical and social factors that influence worker consciousness and liberation theology as found in the work of Gustavo Gutiérrez, Frei Betó, Camilo Torres, and popular Christian movements that fused with guerrilla and national liberation movements in Latin America that can be traced back to Bolívar, José Martí in Cuba, or Augusto César Sandino in Nicaragua, and expressed in the Cuban and the Nicaraguan revolutions. Bolivarianism is also founded in the critique of European civilization and development of indigenous movements in Argentina, Colombia, Bolivia, Chile, Ecuador, and Mexico; and currents of black resistance from the US to their social, cultural, and militant expressions in the Caribbean and Brazil.

The influences comprise collective insurrectional experiences like the student revolt of 1987, the popular anti-neoliberal uprising on February 27, 1989, and the two civil-military insurrections of 1992 and 2002, when the people and the army reversed the coup d'état and put Chávez back in power.

Other influences include sociopolitical events that break with the dominant powers in history and prefigure historical processes of liberation, like the guerrillas of the 1960s and 1970s; the cultural congress of Cabimas in 1973, introducing a vision of cultural resistance as part of all revolutionary process; the experiences of workers councils and revolutionary syndicalism in the 1980s; the national student congress in Merida in 1985 at the root of the 1980s student rebellion;

the rebirth of the peasant movement and land occupations in Yaracuy in 1987; the neighborhood councils of Caracas from 1991 to 1993, as beginning the movement of popular councils and direct democracy; the libertarian pedagogical movement of the 1990s based on the democracy of knowledge, with its highest expression in 2000–1; the development of the constituent powers of the people from 1995 onwards; the electoral campaign and victory of Chávez in 1998 as a break in the historical power framework; the constituent assembly and first constitutional specification of a participative and protagonic democracy in 1999; and the widespread experience of self-organization during the entrepreneurs' lock out and oil sabotage in 2002–3.

In 1971, like many other young Venezuelans, 17-year-old Hugo Chávez joined a reformed military academy with new educational content and where young recruits, mostly from working-class backgrounds, were educated in the social sciences and exposed to critical ideas. Chávez recognizes as his primary influences Bolívar, Mao, and sociologist Claus Sélzer, especially his book about the army as agent of social change, sympathizing with the Peruvian leftist nationalist Velasco Alvarado and Panama President Omar Torrijos (both militaries).

As a young soldier between 1975 and 1980 Chávez was relegated to anti-guerrilla activities. In his intelligence work he was encouraged to familiarize himself with the readings of the guerrillas to anticipate their strategies, including Mao, Ho Chi Min, Fidel Castro, Che Guevara, Camilo Torres, Marx, and Mariátegui. The reality that Chávez recognized in both these writings and on the ground was the poverty of the rural population standing in sharp contrast to the moral decay of the politicians in power and most of the high-ranking militaries.

Beginning in 1980 Chávez and leftist military officials began working at the military academy and influenced thousands of young recruits. In December 1982 Chávez and other officials founded the Bolivarian Army 200 (Ejército Bolivariano 200, EBR-200), renamed the Revolutionary Bolivarian Movement 200 (MBR-200) after the people's uprising in Caracazo in 1989. The MBR-200, a conspirative civil-military organization, developed far-reaching ideological and programmatic fundamentals, organizational, tactical and strategic orientations, and positions on various social and political issues. So the ideological and programmatic work of the MBR-200 represents an important cornerstone of modern Bolivarianism.

The initial criticism of Chávez and his supporters was directed against the corrupt political system that promoted social injustice. Besides Bolívar, Zamora, Rodríguez, and Rousseau and their conceptions of radical democracy represented strong reference points. The basic organizational structure comprised Commands of Revolutionary Areas (CAR), civilian-military groups with indigenous names.

Through the 1980s MBR-200 gained in strength and experience in response to the brutal repression of the urban uprising in Caracas during and after Caracazo 1989, as civilian allies convinced the MBR-200 to pursue an armed uprising in 1992. MBR-200 deepened contacts with political and social movements, organizations, and individuals. While the coup d'état of February 4, 1992 was crushed, the MBR-200 changed strategy from a clandestine group to a popular organization, especially among the poor and revolutionary left.

The MBR-200 was conceived as a civil-military organization, with a strong emphasis on promoting democracy. According to Chávez, it recognized itself as a deeply dynamic entity, with various liberated forces in movement. The different social movements and grassroots organizations were considered independent forces, indispensable for the political project of the MBR-200 to build a unified Bolivarian Front. Given the prohibition against political participation of army members, the civil-military nature of the MBR-200 created difficult obstacles to overcome.

The MBR-200 opposed consolidation of the organization through participation in elections as a means of institutional collaboration, considering the political sphere as antithetical to expressing the will of the people. It did not reject elections entirely, but sought to engage pragmatically in electoral activities at propitious moments, assume government powers, and adopt changes at once. Between 1994 and 1996 the strategy of the MBR-200 was – apart from the construction of grassroots structures – mainly characterized by the demand for a constituent assembly.

The MBR-200 postulated the need for a far-reaching transformation of all social structures in order to build a society of solidarity. The aim was defined as popular democracy, a direct democracy with the people as decision-makers.

Based on a new philosophical-political model with Bolivarian-Robinsonian-Zamoran ideological fundamentals, a new model of a mixed economy was constructed that would provide the federal state with five powers: legislative, judicial, executive, moral, and electoral; a model of society based on equality, justice, and freedom. The MBR-200 model of civilian-military relations was based on integration of the army and not on domination. It was dissolved before the elections in 1998, but the political project to a great extent characterized the perspective of the government of Hugo Chávez when he became president in 1999.

From 1999 to 2005 Bolivarianism moved dramatically to the left. By 2005 the movement defined itself as socialist and dispensed with nationalist and anti-communist approaches traditionally common in the military. Instead, the program pursued a socialist democratic position that defined Bolivarianism as a means of developing a socialism of the twenty-first century for Venezuelan society. Bolivarianism distanced itself from conventional perceptions of historical state socialism by defining freedom, democracy, and participation as fundamental elements of society.

SEE ALSO: Bolívar, Simón (1783–1830); Caracazo, 1989; Castro, Fidel (b. 1926); Chávez, Hugo (b. 1954); Gramsci, Antonio (1891–1937); Guevara, Ernesto “Che” (1928–1967); Gutiérrez, Gustavo (b. 1928); Hồ Chi Minh (Nguyen Tat Thanh) (1890–1969); Mao Zedong (1893–1976); Mariátegui, José Carlos (1894–1930); Marx, Karl (1818–1883); Negri, Antonio (b. 1933); Rousseau, Jean-Jacques (1712–1778); Torres Restrepo, Camilo (1929–1966); Torrijos, General Omar (1929–1981); Trotsky, Leon (1879–1940); Velasco Alvarado, Juan Francisco (1910–1977); Venezuela, Guerilla Movements, 1960s–1980s; Venezuela, MBR-200 and the Military Uprisings of 1992; Zamora, Ezequiel (1817–1860)

References and Suggested Readings

- Azzellini, D. (2007) Venezuela Bolivariana. Cologne: ISP.
- Denis, R. (2007) La profecía de ALCASA. In aporrea, 26.3.2007. Internet version 26.3.2007: www.aporrea.org/actualidad/a32464.html.
- Ellner, S. & Tinker Salas, M. (2007) Venezuela: Hugo Chávez and the Decline of an “Exceptional Democracy.” Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Garrido, A. (2000) La Historia Secreta de la Revolución Bolivariana. Merida: Editorial Venezolana.
- Garrido, A. (2002) Documentos de la Revolución Bolivariana. Caracas: Ediciones del autor.

- Gott, R. (2005) Hugo Chávez and the Bolivarian Revolution. New York: Verso.
- Zago, A. (1998) La rebelión de los ángeles. Caracas: Warp Ediciones.

Bolivia, protest and repression, 1964–2000

S. Sándor John

The year 1964 marked a turning point for Latin America. In March, a military coup ousted the left-nationalist regime of João Goulart in Brazil. The Brazilian military junta was heavily backed by the US government, which placed counter-insurgency at the center of its regional policy, and became a linchpin of the “Southern Cone model” of hard-line dictatorships using techniques taught at the US Army’s School of the Americas then located in the Panama Canal Zone.

In Bolivia, discontent with the regime grew ever more intense among wide sectors of the population. New cuts in the Comibol workforce touched off a long and bitter miners’ strike, in response to which the government jailed prominent leftist union activists. Meanwhile, supporters of different Revolutionary Nationalist Movement (Movimiento Nacionalista Revolucionario, MNR) factions clashed violently in several peasant regions. Popular revulsion against the ruling party reached the point that Bolivian Labor Federation (Central Obrera Boliviana, COB) leader Juan Lechín left the MNR to set up his own Revolutionary Party of the National Left (PRIN), while the MNR right wing also split off to form what it called the Authentic Revolutionary Party.

As his 1960–4 term neared its end, President Victor Paz Estenssoro declared that he would seek reelection, with the bitter opposition not only of Lechín’s sympathizers but of Hernán Siles Zuazo and a segment of the MNR as well. As his running mate, Paz chose General René Barrientos (1919–69), a flamboyant air force officer from Cochabamba who spoke Quechua and was known for his close relations with the US Pentagon. Barrientos was a cachorro de la Revolución (a child [literally puppy] of the revolution), who had co-piloted the plane that brought the exiled Paz back to Bolivia after the April 1952 revolution. In the early 1960s, he came to public attention as a leader of the Washington-financed “Civic Action” plan and was befriended by Curtis Le May, the US air force general later infamous for his call to bomb Vietnam “back to the Stone Age.”

Despite cries of election fraud, Paz was reelected. In the ensuing wave of unrest, many workers and left-wing students frustrated with the MNR hoped it would be thrown out and replaced by a leftist regime. Instead, as the country became a pressure cooker of protests and mobilizations, almost all the political forces disenchanted with Paz came together in a tragic marriage of convenience. Guided by Siles, this alliance included the groupings formed by the former MNR left and right wings, as well as the Francoist Falange and the remnants of the 1940s Stalinist Revolutionary Left Party (Partido de la Izquierda Revolucionaria, PIR). Behind the scenes, US representatives cultivated Barrientos as the up-and-coming strongman.

A pitched battle near Oruro between armed miners and government troops, including US-trained “Rangers,” was the immediate prelude to Barrientos seizing power. In early November 1964, the general carried out a coup, beginning a new cycle of military rule that would last until 1982. Barrientos took aim at what had long been the stronghold of insurgent movements in Bolivia, declaring a state of emergency in the mining districts, demanding that the workers’ militias give up their arms, then dismantling the miners’ union outright. Leading militants of the Revolutionary Workers’ Party (Partido Obrero Revolucionario, POR), notably César Lora and Isaac Camacho, paid with their lives for their efforts to organize clandestine unions to defend workers against this onslaught.

The junta also proclaimed a “Military–Peasant Pact,” cultivating support among peasant sectors that could be persuaded to see the military as benefactors, even protectors against a “communist threat” to take the land parcels they had gained as a result of agrarian reform.

United States support for Barrientos was enthusiastic and munificent. As the US government consolidated its own “national security doctrine,” one historian notes, Bolivia became a “laboratory” for programs through which the armed forces of Latin American countries could shore up the region against new setbacks such as the Cuban Revolution. The American Institute for Free Labor Development (an arm of the AFL-CIO [American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations] leadership that worked closely with the Central Intelligence Agency in Latin America) helped the junta identify which labor groups to purge.

Kennedy increased military assistance to Bolivia by 800 percent. His successor Johnson viewed the regime as an important element in regional counterinsurgency, and Barrientos became a symbol of Latin American “gorila” (military) dictators allied with the White House and Pentagon as the US was drawn ever deeper into a massive, losing counterinsurgent war in Southeast Asia.

Che Guevara’s Guerilla Experiment (1967)

“Create two, three, many Vietnams” was the call made by Ernesto “Che” Guevara (1928–1967), whose attempt to establish a base for guerilla warfare in the heart of South America drew the attention of people around the world to Bolivia. The impoverished Andean country became especially important to Che given the quick frustration of efforts in his native Argentina. He hoped to replicate the victory the guerilla strategy had achieved in the Cuban Revolution of 1959, and to spread the combat throughout the region.

The attempt at guerilla warfare in Bolivia was, however, virtually doomed to failure. At the tactical level, the decision to establish operations in the Ñancahuazú region in Bolivia’s east was particularly misconceived. Not only was the terrain unsuitable, but the local peasantry was markedly conservative, having received significant parcels of land from the government. Che Guevara also received little real backing from the Cuban leadership, faced outright hostility from the Soviets, and clashed repeatedly with the pro-Moscow Communist Party of Bolivia (PCB).

A more basic problem was Che Guevara’s foco (guerilla) theory itself. Conceiving of revolution as the project of a small group of heroes in the mountains, it practically ignored the actual class struggle in Bolivia. Che’s strategy relegated the tens of thousands of Bolivian miners to the role of sideline supporters. Yet both before and after Che’s Bolivian tragedy, wide sectors of the country’s impoverished population repeatedly grouped themselves around the miners when the time came for head-on conflicts with the regime. This vanguard role of the mining proletariat was engraved in the country’s historic memory. Yet the foco strategy was not based on mobilizing this class power in alliance with the indigenous peasantry and other oppressed sectors. (Guevarism’s publicist, Régis Debray, went so far as to call the Bolivian proletariat “a class deluded as to its own political importance and with an overweening self-confidence.”)

As the army zeroed in on the guerilla foco, the government targeted well known radical activists, sending many into internal exile. The period’s most horrific episode of repression took shape in early June 1967 as Barrientos raged against the miners of Huanuni, who had declared the mines “territorios libres” (liberated territory). Defying his threats, a miners’ assembly was called at Siglo XX to demand the reinstatement of fired workers and restoration of wages cut by inflation and government decree. As the government hunted down Che Guevara’s guerillas, the workers decided to donate a mita (day’s pay) to send them medicine.

For Barrientos, the miners’ assembly was an opportunity to set a bloody example. Troops invaded Siglo XX and Catavi in the midst of the fiesta of the Night of San Juan (corresponding to the Andean solstice ceremony) and carried out yet another large-scale massacre of mine workers and their families. In October 1967, the government’s manhunt against guerillas and their sympathizers reached fever pitch with the capture and summary execution of Che Guevara.

Ovando’s Interregnum (1969–1970)

After two more years of the Barrientos regime, the Bolivian left, labor and student movements breathed a collective sigh of relief in April 1969, when the strongman died in a helicopter crash. The ensuing period brought a new swing to the left in Bolivian politics, a new upsurge of labor and student radicalism, and a reawakening of peasant activism. The chameleon of Bolivian nationalism changed shades once again, taking on the olive-green coloration of a new populist military regime, only to give way to a new and brutal rightist regime that predated the Chilean dictatorship of Augusto Pinochet by two years.

The death of Barrientos set off a power struggle with far-reaching consequences. His vice-president took office but lasted only five months before being ousted in September 1969 by General Alfredo Ovando (1918–1982). The new Ovando government was strongly influenced by the nationalist military “revolution” that began in 1968 in Peru. While Ovando shifted government discourse leftwards, officers who played central roles in tracking down Che Guevara’s guerillas remained prominent in the military hierarchy.

Ovando’s new departure included bringing a number of left-leaning civilian intellectuals into his cabinet, most importantly the young intellectual Marcelo Quiroga Santa Cruz (1931–80) as oil and mining minister. Recalling measures taken by the “military socialists” of the late 1930s, at Quiroga’s urging Ovando nationalized the Gulf Oil Company. This measure was widely popular, but the government’s decision to compensate the US company was met with protests from the left.

As the political situation opened up, labor organizations suppressed under Barrientos began to emerge from illegality. The COB leadership called for the establishment of an “anti-imperialist united front” of workers, peasants, professionals, members of the clergy, and “forward-looking” military officers. This last group found an increasingly prominent spokesman in General Juan José Torres (1921–76), the new armed forces commander whose variations on the old theme of military national-populism would soon open a new chapter in the country’s politics.

In March 1970, students at the foremost institution of higher education, the Universidad Mayor de San Andrés (UMSA), launched the “University Revolution.” Students in each department threw out the deans and administration, setting up a Revolutionary Student Committee which took control of the university. The radicalization of labor and student movements generated a reaction within the Bolivian military and business community, which came out against the Gulf nationalization, as did civic leaders in Santa Cruz, the eastern department (province) which had received an 11 percent royalty on Gulf revenues. Responding to pressure, the Ovando regime made a sharp right turn in March 1970, firing oil minister Quiroga and relieving Torres of his command due to the tone of his speeches.

Political polarization sharpened further in May, when the COB held its Fourth Congress and adopted a new programmatic text known as the “Socialist Theses of the COB,” worked out through the joint efforts of the POR and the pro-Moscow PCB. In July, young adherents of Che Guevara’s ideas attempted to reignite guerilla warfare at Teoponte in the northern part of the department of La Paz. When the army quickly wiped out almost all the Teoponte guerillas (including Benjo Cruz, a pioneer of Bolivia’s folk music movement), La Paz was swept by student protests against this massacre of young idealists.

Torres and the People’s Assembly (1970–1971)

In October 1970, tensions within the armed forces exploded in a new round of coups and counter-coups. Rightist officers, together with the Falange and the right wing of the MNR, backed a power bid by hard-line officers, among them Ovando’s son-in-law Hugo Banzer (1921–2002), a strident anti-communist influenced by the Falange. Ovando refused to relinquish his post, but after extensive negotiations, power was turned over to a military triumvirate on October 6.

Later on the same day, General J. J. Torres proclaimed that he would be the one to take power. Bolivia’s main left parties issued a call for a “popular anti-imperialist government” and formed a “Political Command,” which coordinated a general strike and mass demonstrations that tipped the balance in favor of Torres. The new president sought to institutionalize labor support as one pillar of his regime, restoring miners’ pay to 1965 levels and courting the COB and left parties. The other pillar was the “institutionality” of the armed forces. Rightist officers continued to occupy high positions, and General Reque Terán, a leader of the CIA-supervised counterinsurgency against Che Guevara, was made commander of the armed forces. In office, Torres found himself obliged to carry out a continual balancing act between social forces whose antagonisms were breaking out after years of rightist rule.

The Military College remained under the leadership of General Banzer, who attempted a new coup in January 1971. In response, miners went out on strike and marched on La Paz. The workers rallied in the Plaza Murillo outside the presidential palace, demanding arms to “smash the military fascists” and a complete purge of the military high command. The “Trotskyist” labor leader Filemón Escóbar (later the key strategist for the party of Evo Morales) recalls: “The walls resounded with chants of Workers to power! and Long live socialism!”

Over and over during the following period, the demand for arms would be repeated. Instead, Torres insisted that the people should have confidence in the army. The failed January putsch was followed in March by another rightist coup attempt in Santa Cruz. Arrested for his involvement, the head of the Falange was, like Banzer, set free. These events were dress rehearsals for the all-out assault Banzer would launch a few months later.

In May, responding to growing demands for action against US agencies, Torres declared that his government was expelling the Peace Corps from Bolivia. This and other symbolic steps against US interests fueled growing disquiet on the right, already up in arms against advances by the Zafra Roja (Red Harvest), as they called the radical left.

The right wing was further alarmed by the foundation of the Asamblea Popular (People's Assembly) at Bolivia's Legislative Palace, which Torres had provided for the event, which was chaired by Lechín together with other union and student leaders. Sixty percent of the Assembly's delegates would be representatives of working-class organizations. Middle-class organizations and peasant groups would contribute 30 percent, and political parties the remaining 10 percent. (Acrid debates would soon break out over the number of peasant delegates.) Although the former government party, the MNR, was not formally represented, the biggest bloc of labor delegates came from the MNR's "Labor Command."

Lora's POR, as well as some Latin American news correspondents, hailed the Assembly as "the first soviet of the Americas," harking back to the workers' councils of the Russian Revolution. However, the body proved strikingly ineffectual. Citing the absence of some delegates, it decided not to reconvene until late June. Acutely aware that right-wing officers and political leaders had no intention of abandoning their plans to seize power, the Assembly passed a motion stating that in the event of a coup, "the Asamblea Popular, as the expression of workers' power, will take over the political and military leadership of the masses."

Yet no real preparations were made for defense against the rightist danger. The Assembly's watchword turned out to be "later"; the matter of workers' defense was put off for discussion sometime in September. In reality, Lechín and his allies on the left relied on Torres's assurances that the army would remain loyal. The Assembly met ten more times, adjourning on July 2 with the decision to reconvene more than two months later.

The right wing, both military and civilian, was less inclined to wait. Bolivian rightists had powerful friends and were energetically encouraged by their Brazilian and Argentine colleagues. Nor did the US government sit idly by, as the Nixon administration promoted plots against the Allende government on the other side of the Andes. Operation Condor, the joint counter-insurgency plan of the region's military dictators that would bring torture and death to leftists throughout the Southern Cone, was just over the horizon.

Hugo Banzer's followers in the armed forces joined with the Falange and the MNR (now led by Paz Estenssoro) to set the stage for a coup. This was a golpe anunciado – a coup foretold – for which intensive preparations had proceeded at least from early April. The military rising began on August 19 in the city of Santa Cruz. On August 20, up to 100,000 people gathered outside the presidential palace shouting at Torres and Lechín: "Armas, armas!" Torres again refused.

When Banzer's forces seized the historic mining center of Oruro, government representatives used Radio Illimani to call on the miners to join loyal army units in "Operation Centipede–Flying Eagle," a battle to retake the city. The radio kept repeating this call even as those military units went over to the coup. The miners marched to fight and were massacred. Rural union leaders from Norte Potosí reported that 8,000 peasants waited in vain for the government to tell them where they should march in order to resist the coup.

In La Paz, resistance began to be organized long after the coup began in Santa Cruz, and only after local regiments joined Banzer's revolt. By that time a Banzer-controlled regiment named after the "Liberator" Simón Bolívar was advancing through El Alto, and tanks began descending towards the nation's capital. Thousands of workers and students came out to fight, but the vast majority had no weapons. When civilians seized a stock of Mauser rifles left over from the Chaco war, many of these obsolete guns would not fire. Ammunition was so scarce that each combatant was given one or two bullets. Resistance was "completely disorganized, the Assembly had done absolutely nothing to prepare,” one participant recalled.

Students and factory workers searched for ways to fight. Receiving no direction from their leaders, young revolutionaries joined crowds of students and factory workers clamoring for arms. The news spread that resistance to the coup was concentrating at the foot of Laikacota Hill, where civilians hoped to dislodge a pro-Banzer army unit that had seized this point overlooking the city.

While students had received some rudimentary weapons training during their obligatory military service, the only activists with serious military preparation and cohesion were those from the Ejército de Liberación Nacional (ELN) guerilla movement. Still, the crowd advanced up the hill, facing withering fire; participants vividly remember friends and comrades falling dead around them. Determined to dislodge the hostile troops, the young activists kept firing and finally, to their surprise, succeeded in storming the army position. The frightened and demoralized soldiers surrendered and were told to run away. Yet there was no real leadership to advise the leftists what to do next.

Rumours that the Torres regime would finally distribute arms, spread by the leaders of the COB and left parties, proved fatal. Just as false were the promises that the military would “defend the people.” General Reque Terán, the anti-guerilla veteran who headed the armed forces, had categorically denied that officers were plotting a rising. When the coup broke out, he pledged loyalty to Torres, only to resurface the next day to command pro-Banzer troops in downtown La Paz. At Laikacota, word arrived that the air force – Torres’s branch of the armed services, still supposedly under his control – would provide support. Civilians holding the strategic hill were told to come down so that planes could bomb the rightist army positions. Planes began flying overhead, but it was the young revolutionaries who were the targets of their strafing: the air force was supporting the coup. When the main army barracks were close to being taken by workers and students, the special army regiment which had been built up to bolster the Torres regime joined the rightist revolt. Its tanks reached downtown La Paz in half an hour. When these World War II relics arrived at the presidential palace, Torres was gone, leaving a lieutenant and six soldiers behind.

A New Cycle of Military Dictatorships (1971–1982)

The Banzer coup placed power in the hands of a “Nationalist People’s Front” made up of rightist military officers, the Falange and the Paz Estenssoro wing of the MNR. This coalition lasted until late 1974, when Banzer consolidated his personal power in an autogolpe (“self-coup”). The new “dark night” of repression (as British historian James Dunkerley has called it) left deep scars on the labor movement, which found itself forced back underground.

Euphoric pronouncements about the first soviet of the Americas gave way to the Anti-Imperialist United Front (FRA), an alliance of “bourgeois” political figures, notably the deposed President Torres, and left parties, among which Lora’s POR played the leading role. Calling for the patriotic unity of all Bolivians, the FRA replicated the policy of subordination to nationalist forces practiced by the left and labor leadership during the National Revolution period.

Despite the heavy toll exacted by military repression, Banzer was not able to eliminate social conflict. In January 1974, large-scale peasant protests broke out against the elimination of government subsidies to a range of products and services. Soldiers moved in on the village of Tolata, in the valley of Cochabamba, killing up to 200 peasants in what came to be called the “Massacre of the Valley,” which some compared to the My Lai massacre US troops had carried out in Vietnam. Yet the incident backfired on the junta, leading to a resurgence of the peasant movement and, eventually, the rise of new “indigenist” political currents.

Banzer’s government came to the end of its rope amidst a series of dramatic developments centered, once again, on the tin miners. In mid-1976, miners’ strikes swept the country under the leadership of militants from the POR, PCB and other left groups. Almost a thousand miners were fired as a result of these strikes. Hunger and destitution pressed down on their families in mine camps across the altiplano. In response, a hunger strike was launched by four miners’ wives from Siglo XX (among them Trotskyist militant Aurora Villarroel and Domitila Chungara, the Pulacayo-born activist who achieved world renown for her accounts of the struggle). Their demands included the rehiring of fired miners, freedom for political prisoners, and withdrawal of troops from the mine camps.

Normally a tactic of desperation, the hunger strike touched off large-scale protests. The government failed in its attempts to intimidate or repress the miners' wives, whose courage and determination galvanized Bolivia's working people. Their fast lasted over three weeks and eventually included a thousand people, leading labor and student groups to launch demonstrations widely credited with hastening the end of the Banzer regime. The dictator was forced to agree to the women's demands, with the exception of withdrawal of troops from the mines.

Greater trade union freedom and political amnesty once again opened the floodgates to left and labor organizations. In elections already scheduled by the regime, a number of leftist groupings presented candidates, while Hernán Siles Zuazo, the nationalist leader who now had his own party, the MNR-Left, ran as the head of the People's Democratic Union (UDP), a classic "popular front" which included the PCB, the formerly Castroite Revolutionary Left Movement (MIR), the indigenist Túpac Katari Revolutionary Movement, and other groups.

The elections ended in blatant electoral fraud. In the face of popular outrage, a sector of the armed forces cited the threat of international communism as justification for a new coup. Over the next two years, five presidents held office and two more elections were held. Another round of elections in July 1979 yielded no clear winner, although the UDP got the largest number of votes. In November of 1979, yet another coup placed the presidency in the hands of Colonel Alberto Natusch Busch. The putsch was answered by the first general strike in almost a decade, and the new junta responded by "disappearing" large numbers of protesters, left and labor activists.

Faced with widespread repudiation of the massive repression, Congress named former MNR activist Lidia Gueiler interim president. When her government enacted austerity measures prescribed by the IMF (International Monetary Fund), mass protests erupted. New elections held in June 1980 yielded a decisive plurality for Siles's front, but the UDP was prevented from taking office by the bloodiest military takeover in Bolivia's coup-ridden history. This putsch was carried out by a group of military officers – headed by Colonel Luis García Meza (a cousin of Gueiler, who had appointed him army commander) – who became world-famous for the intensity of the violence they unleashed and the astonishing scope of their corruption.

In previous takeovers, military leaders sometimes supplemented their forces with paramilitary gangs. In the García Meza coup, paramilitary forces played a central role, most notoriously in the all-out attack on the central offices of the COB, in which labor and left leaders were killed or arrested and the building was reduced to rubble. The new junta became notorious for its close links to cocaine cartels that had developed a symbiotic relationship with death squads connected to Klaus Barbie, the Nazi "Butcher of Lyons." One of the SS officers spirited out of Europe by the "rat line" after World War II and protected by US intelligence, Barbie had received citizenship from Siles in the late 1950s and been entrusted by Barrientos with funds for a phantasmagorical "warship for Bolivia" (supposedly to be deployed on Lake Titicaca). The extraordinarily high level of corruption and brutality exhibited by the military junta brought it increasing international isolation.

The colonels' troubles multiplied when a series of working-class strikes and protests broke out against the regime's repression and IMF-inspired austerity measures. The armed forces were wracked by new splits, as dissident officers launched one plot after another against García Meza. In the wake of a general strike, the military ousted the narco-dictator in August 1981 and replaced him with less notorious officers.

Yet it was the miners of Huanuni who dealt the death blow to military rule. In November 1981 they launched militant strikes that spread to other mines and industries. The government was forced to agree to legalize the unions and the COB. The labor federation followed up with highly effective general strikes against the government's devaluation of the peso and cuts in subsidies for basic items of consumption.

Siles, the UDP, and the "Days of March" (1982–1985)

Faced with rising mass mobilizations, the military decided to cut its losses, preparing to turn power over to the congress elected in 1980. The COB convoked a new general strike, proclaiming that the walkout would continue until the military ceded power. Siles, MNR cofounder and nemesis of the miners' union in his first term (1956–60), was installed anew in the Palacio Quemado presidential palace in October 1982. His UDP front populated the ministries with left-nationalists, MIRistas, and leaders of the pro-Moscow PCB.

It was not an auspicious time for popular-front governments, in a world marked by the anti-communist offensive of the Reagan White House. The UDP's difficulties were exacerbated by the high inflation and fiscal crises inherited from its military predecessors. Siles found himself caught between the IMF, with its demands for austerity, and the plebeian sectors that had swept him into office.

The combustible mixture of high popular expectations and harsh living conditions fueled increasing social unrest. Miners marched repeatedly in La Paz against the government's austerity measures. The Bolivian Congress gave the president new headaches when it refused to back his "anti-narcotics program." Unable to satisfy the demands of labor and other impoverished sectors, the UDP found itself on a collision course with the working class. This was particularly excruciating for the PCB, which had one foot in the cabinet and the other in the top FSTMB (Bolivian Mine Workers' Union Federation) and COB leadership.

The explosion came in March 1985, as the miners were at the center of mobilizations that once again posed the question of revolution on the altiplano. Twelve thousand miners occupied La Paz to protest against the UDP's austerity measures and the 40 percent drop in wages the working class had suffered since 1980. Armed with dynamite, miners' pickets took up position on the city's central arteries. Now it was their detachments that patrolled the capital. Police and army troops abandoned the streets. The strikers met daily in mass assemblies in the Open Air Theater. "Obreros al poder!" (Workers to power) was chanted over and over at mass demonstrations.

Paralyzing the capital, the mobilization polarized its residents. Entire layers of the plebeian and middle-class population, seeing their hopes and frustrations crystallize in the miners' protest, came over to the workers' side. Market women organized to provide food for the strikers; other sectors took charge of giving them lodging. The miners' "vanguard role," told and retold in their history, traditions and class memory, asserted itself once again. This time the miners' enemy was not a military junta or oligarchic government, but the popular front of "left" nationalists (Siles), "Communists" (PCB) and former guerrillas influenced by social democracy (MIR).

Yet far from putting forward a strategy to put the slogan of workers' power into practice, the labor leadership, headed by veteran COB chief Lechín (who flanked himself yet again with allies from the "far left"), let the miners' mobilization continue with no clear direction. When it began to run out of steam, the union leaders called a retreat. After the majority of the COB leadership voted to lift the strike, the miners gathered at a farewell meeting, with a slogan that became famous: "Volveremos"—"We will return."

Paz Estenssoro's Revenge: "Neoliberalism" on the Altiplano (1985–2001)

As none of the strike's central demands were met, demoralization spread in the labor movement. In early elections called by Siles, middle-class sectors that had looked to the miners for a way out of a desperate situation now swung sharply to the right. Large swathes of voters who had previously backed the UDP switched over to right-wing candidates, including former dictator Banzer and MNR founder Paz Estenssoro. History seemed to be cycling backwards, as Siles was replaced by his aged ex-Jefe Paz, who emerged as Bolivia's new president.

Paz returned to the Palacio Quemado not as the man who had denounced the Catavi Massacre four decades before but as a criollo version of Margaret Thatcher, the "Iron Lady" who made privatization an ideological crusade, closed Britain's mines, and routed the powerful miners' union. Advised by Harvard economist Jeffrey Sachs and the young technocrat Gonzalo Sánchez de Lozada (himself a private mine owner), Paz was intent on structurally adjusting the mine union into oblivion. He seized on a drastic fall in the price of tin to shut down the majority of the mines he had, in a previous incarnation, nationalized in 1952. Over the next years, Paz and Sánchez de Lozada turned Bolivia into a laboratory for the policies popularly known as "neoliberalism," based on wholesale privatizations, the gutting of social services, and the drastic reduction of the labor movement's power.

The centerpiece of their program was Decree No. 21060, a number that became synonymous with misery and defeat for tens of thousands of workers. The hated “21060” closed most mines, gave private employers wide powers to fire workers for “absenteeism” (including strikes), and turned over production and much of the nation’s infrastructure to private, largely foreign capital. In September 1985, the miners carried out a desperate “March for Life” against the decree. As workers, their wives and children marched along the highway towards La Paz, their dramatic appeal for survival captured the imagination of much of the country. Nonetheless, the march was surrounded and turned back by the armed forces, ending in a new and bitter defeat.

Decree No. 21060 had large-scale effects on Bolivian society. Among them was the government’s drive to “relocate” laid-off miners to regions far away from their historic mine camps. Many relocated to the sprawling Aymara township of El Alto on the outskirts of La Paz. Others found themselves in agricultural regions like Cochabamba’s Chapare and the Yungas zone of La Paz province, where a little green leaf called coca would help turn another page in Bolivia’s history. Displaced and sometimes demoralized, the miners nonetheless brought their own forms and methods of organization to these new areas.

Over the following years, as the US intensified “drug wars” in Latin America, indigenous peasants in Bolivia’s Chapare region became increasingly prominent in the nation’s social struggles, becoming the nucleus of one of Bolivia’s most powerful social movements. Against the government’s drive to “eradicate” crops it argued were destined for cocaine production, peasant activists pointed out that coca had been chewed by most of the country’s laboring population since long before the Spanish Conquest, that large sections of the peasantry depended on its cultivation, and that Bolivia had no business being a junior partner in Washington’s neocolonial drug wars. The resulting movement combined the defense of the cocaleros (coca-growing peasants) with an affirmation of pride in indigenous culture, history and language.

Eventually, the movement put the young Aymara cocalero organizer Evo Morales (b. 1959) into parliament at the head of a new political party called the Movement Toward Socialism (Movimiento Al Socialismo, MAS). Morales’s mentor was the former Trotskyist miner Filemón Escóbar, but the MAS was a pragmatic grouping that oriented to electoral politics while speaking in general terms of “communal socialist” values.

In the 1990s, the difficulties of the Bolivian left were magnified with the election of right-leaning governments. The first was a coalition between ex-dictator Banzer’s “Nationalist Democratic Alliance” and the MIR, which was originally formed in the resistance against Banzer’s 1971 junta but later shifted rightwards. This was followed by the first presidency of MNR technocrat Sánchez de Lozada, who deepened the policy of “capitalization” (privatization). In 1997, Banzer won the presidency again; his term was cut short when he died of cancer.

In the late 1990s, new struggles and realignments in Latin America began to challenge the “Washington consensus” on economic and political issues. A range of ideologically diffuse movements arose under the banner of opposition to “neoliberalism” and “globalization.” Bolivia was thrust into the headlines in 2001, when a “Water War” erupted in Cochabamba. Massive opposition broke out against a plan to turn the city’s water supply over to a subsidiary of the giant Bechtel conglomerate. The protests were led by a Coordinadora (coordinating committee) headed by a factory workers’ leader influenced by anarchism.

SEE ALSO: Bolivia, War of the Pacific to the National Revolution, 1879–1952; Bolivian Neoliberalism, Social Mobilization, and Revolution from Below, 2003 and 2005; Cocaleros Peasant Uprising; Cochabamba Water Wars; Katarismo and Indigenous Popular Mobilization, Bolivia, 1970s–Present; Morales, Evo (b. 1959)

References and Suggested Readings

- Anderson, J. L. (1997) Che Guevara: A Revolutionary Life. New York: Grove Press.
- Debray, R. (1975) Che’s Guerrilla War. Harmondsworth: Penguin.
- Gill, L. (2000) Teetering on the Rim: Global Restructuring, Daily Life and the Armed Retreat of the Bolivian State. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Grindle, M. S. & Domingo, P. (Eds.) (2003) Proclaiming Revolution: Bolivia in Comparative Perspective. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Klein, H. S. (1992) Bolivia: The Evolution of a Multi-Ethnic Society. 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Lagos, M. (1994) Autonomy and Power: The Dynamics of Class and Culture in Rural Bolivia. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Rabe, S. G. (1999) The Most Dangerous Area in the World: John F. Kennedy Confronts Communist Revolution in Latin America. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

Bolivia, struggle for independence, 1809–1825

S. Sándor John

The Seven Years' War (1756–63), sometimes described as the first global war, left the belligerent powers with an enormous burden of debt. Like the British and French, Spain's rulers reacted by decreeing a series of controversial new measures to raise revenue and revamp administrative structures. Designed to strengthen the Spanish empire, the Bourbon Reforms (named after the ruling family) wound up weakening it.

"War is the mother of revolution," Russian revolutionary leader Leon Trotsky (1879–1940) noted at the end of World War I. The same may be said of the events leading to the struggle for independence of Spanish colonies and the formation of the Bolivian republic.

The crown created Creole army units and expanded the colonial militias, many of whose officers and men would join the independence struggle. It separated Upper Peru from the Viceroyalty of Peru and made it part of a new Viceroyalty governed from Buenos Aires. It created a new layer of colonial administrators (intendants), mainly Spanish-born peninsulares, seemingly limiting the upward mobility of Creole elites. And it launched a limited liberalization of trade while blocking local entrepreneurs from pushing through commercial policies designed to further their own interests.

It was the Napoleonic Wars that brought the latent conflicts to the surface and rang the death knell of Spanish rule. In 1808 Napoleon deposed the king of Spain, placing his brother on the throne. Juntas loyal to the ousted monarch were formed in many areas, but Spain's control of its colonies had been fatally disrupted.

Bolivia can lay legitimate claim to being the birthplace of Spanish American independence, as juntas in Chuquisaca (today the city of Sucre) and La Paz sought to seize power in early 1809. The following year, the young Venezuelan Creole Simón Bolívar became the central leader of the nascent movement for colonial independence, which grew rapidly but suffered a major setback in 1813 when an Argentine army was defeated in its attempt to seize Upper Peru. Lower Peru won its independence in a series of struggles culminating in the battle of Ayacucho in late 1824. Soon after, Bolívar's forces under Antonio Sucre took Upper Peru, which in August 1825 declared itself the independent Republic of Bolivia, named after the Liberator himself.

Shortly thereafter, Bolívar brought his triumph to Potosí. He climbed the Rich Mountain of Silver and made an impassioned speech paying tribute to generations of miners. The new republic would need them too, but it did not put an end to the inferno of life in the mines, nor did it view Indians as citizens. Neither did independence liberate African slaves in the country named after El Libertador. As Bolivia inaugurated its tradition of writing one new constitution after another, lawmakers tinkered with provisions related to slavery, which continued to exist for another quarter-century, coming to a definitive end only under the presidency of Belzu.

This was a sign of how things would be on most social questions in the new republic. Independence had severed Spanish control over Bolivia, while opening new opportunities for penetration by British capital which had favored the independence forces. It did not fundamentally alter the social structure of the country, in which political and economic power continued to be a near monopoly of a narrow "white" elite.

Indeed, independence brought sharply increased pressures on the indigenous population that made up almost three-quarters of the population. Of the approximately one million Indians living in the countryside, about two-thirds still lived in Indian communities; the remaining third lived on haciendas (estates) where fewer than 25,000 whites subjected them to a regime of free labor and personal service (ponguaje). New laws inspired by prevalent liberal concepts of individual ownership helped paved the way for constant inroads on community landholdings by hacienda owners. The indigenous population was almost entirely excluded from national life, feared and generally despised by the white ruling stratum. The oppressive social reality of independent Bolivia contrasted harshly with the noble rhetoric with which it had been launched.

SEE ALSO: Bolívar, Simón (1783–1830); Bolivia, Protest and Repression, 1964–2000; Bolivia, War of the Pacific to the National Revolution, 1879–1952; Bolivian Neoliberalism, Social Mobilization, and Revolution from Below, 2003 and 2005

References and Suggested Reading

Stern, S. J. (Ed.) (1987) Resistance, Rebellion, and Consciousness in the Andean Peasant World, 18th to 20th Centuries. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.

Bolivia, War of the Pacific to the National Revolution, 1879–1952

S. Sándor John

In 1879, war broke out, pitting Chile against the alliance of Bolivia and Peru. Bolivia's weak central government had done little to prepare for the conflict, and suffered a decisive defeat. The outcome was the loss of Bolivia's sea-coast, a national humiliation that would leave the country landlocked and provide material for revanchist agitation up to the present day.

The war opened a breach in the Bolivian elite, which divided into supporters of a peace accord with Chile, grouped around the "Conservative" ideologue Mariano Baptista, and opponents of the accord, who began to call themselves "Liberals." With the temporary ascendancy of the Conservatives, the postwar period came to be known as the rule of the "Conservative oligarchy." While both parties took for granted that elections were a matter for the small "white" minority to decide (as unlettered Indians did not have the vote), they took on some of the ideological coloration common in Latin America at the time, with the Conservatives presenting themselves as defenders of traditional Catholic values, and the Liberals putting themselves forward as partisans of progress and modernity.

Whereas Bolivian politics had been largely "personalist" until this time, without clear or stable political party demarcations, it now polarized sharply into Conservative and Liberal camps. This polarization became increasingly violent, as disputed elections led to armed clashes and, in 1888 and 1890, to the defeat of Liberal insurrections against Conservative presidents. While their opponents depicted them as enemies of all progress, Conservative presidents carried through important road and railway construction projects, as well as mapping the remote Beni region to facilitate exploitation of its vast rubber reserves.

In 1898, the Liberal Party was handed an explosive issue in its struggle against the Conservatives, when legislators voted to require that the president and congressmen live in Sucre, the nation's titular capital, rather than La Paz. Enraged, the populace of La Paz launched a "Federalist Revolution." Backed by the Liberals, the revolt coincided with and drew in a wave of indigenous resistance and rebellion on the altiplano. Liberal leader José Manuel Pando enlisted the support of Aymara rebel Pablo Zárate (also known as "El Temible Willka"), reportedly promising the return of communal lands taken by hacienda owners. Pitched battles culminated in the military defeat of the Conservative government's forces outside Oruro.

Victorious, the Liberals turned on their Indian allies, subjugating them by force and renewing the assault on community lands in the name of the principles of modernity, development and free enterprise. Zárate was imprisoned on sedition charges and later executed. As for "federalism," with La Paz firmly established as the center of the nation's political life, the Liberals quietly put this issue aside.

The Age of Tin

Having entrenched themselves in power, the Liberal oligarchy presided over the new Age of Tin. War made the new boom: tin was used for canning the food and making the armaments the great powers increasingly required. Bolivia had large reserves of this metal, some of it in the very mountains that had yielded so much silver.

As the twentieth century began, the production and export of tin became Bolivia's economic raison d'être. By 1929, tin accounted for three-quarters of the country's exports, and Bolivia was one of the four nations that provided 80 percent of the world supply of the metal. Tin reconfigured Bolivia's ruling sectors into a "ring" – La Rosca, in popular parlance – centered on the three principal tin companies, the politicians and newspapers they controlled, and the landowning interests with which they allied.

Dominating affairs at home, the "tin barons" Simón Patiño, Mauricio Hochschild and Carlos Aramayo depended on European and US firms which processed their tin – Bolivia had no smelters – marketed it, and provided them with loans when necessary. Weapons provided from abroad outfitted the army that openly served to protect the Rosca's power.

In the Indian countryside, ponguaeje (the system of personal service to the "white" landowner) continued to hold many peasants in bondage, although many indigenous communities were able to maintain some of their traditional ayllu structure. When indigenous people ventured into cities they often found that the public squares were closed to them. Declared guilty of a multitude of offenses and infractions, indigenous people in chains were routinely exhibited in newspaper photographs. For Bolivian elites, "modernization" was seen largely as a process of overcoming the Indian origins of the nation's majority. This attitude characterized not only the Liberals but their successors in the Republican Party, whose July 1920 putsch (styled the "July Revolution") ended two decades of Liberal rule.

The Mining Proletariat

The lode mining system used in Bolivia's tin industry required a high concentration of workers in the mines. Living in mining camps on the high plateau, they worked amidst extreme heat and cold. Accidents were frequent and often deadly, and clouds of dust left many miners with mal de mina (mine sickness – silicosis). Miners rarely reached the age of 40; and still today, most die before the age of 50. Exhausting work combined with bitter poverty: in 1940 a miner earned half an American dollar in the average mita (the Inca word still used today for a day's work). Five years before the 1952 revolution, a miner's wage could buy only 20 percent of the necessities of a family of five.

The nature of underground mining, in which solidarity is essential for survival, made mine laborers a combative labor sector in many parts of the world. In Bolivia, this combined with their central role in the nation's economy to put the miners at the head of the nascent labor movement. This role as the advance-guard of the laboring poor became a crucial part of Bolivian miners' identity. While giving voice to an increasingly militant syndicalism, Bolivian miners, most of whom were Quechua or Aymara, remained in close touch with rural society.

Nor did the miners lose touch with their pre-Colombian (and pre-Inca) roots. Ideological syncretism mirrored the cultural world of miners who prayed to the Virgin Mary above ground before descending to the realm of the "Tío [uncle] of the Mines." This deity, also known as Supay or Huari, was called diablo (devil) by the Spaniards. El Tío, in turn, is intolerant of Christian symbols, and requires regular tribute in coca, alcohol, and tobacco.

The Massacre of Uncía (1923) and the Growth of the Labor Movement

The years at the close of World War I brought a wave of labor agitation to Bolivia, just as in many other parts of the world. The growth of railways facilitated the emergence of a trade union movement. Labor disputes erupted among factory and transport workers, as well as among the miners, who launched strikes in 1917, 1918, and 1919. Railway workers launched a large-scale protest in 1920 which was suppressed by government troops.

Matters came to a head in June 1923, when the army shot down striking miners at Uncía. (The Patiño firm paid the expenses of mobilizing and feeding the troops and destroying the local miners' union.) This massacre became the symbol of repression by the employers and government against the mine workers and the nascent labor movement as a whole. The clash at Uncía also became a symbol of miners' resistance, a landmark in their historical memory, and an important episode in their increasing politicization.

Over the following years, the miners would become central to the nation's political life. By the time the old regime was finally overthrown two decades after the Uncía massacre, in the "National Revolution" of 1952, the Bolivian Mine Workers' Union Federation (FSTMB) was widely seen as the single most powerful force in Bolivian society.

As in many parts of Latin America, some of Bolivia's pioneering trade unionists identified with anarchism. This was particularly the case among urban skilled tradesmen and artisans, as well as female culinary workers; less so among miner activists. The anarchist orientation extended to the early leadership of the La Paz labor federation. Yet in Bolivia anarchism never achieved the level of allegiance and organization it won in Argentina, Mexico or Brazil. By the time the core of the Bolivian proletariat entered the field of union and political militancy, anarchism was in decline on most of the continent.

Under the impact of the Bolshevik Revolution, the 1920s saw the emergence of significant communist parties in many Latin American countries. Bolivia, however, was an exception to this pattern. Several of the country's best-known labor activists and radical intellectuals sympathized with the Communist International or participated in movements aligned with the Comintern, such as the Red International of Labor Unions and the Anti-Imperialist League. However, a structured Communist Party did not emerge until much later. This conditioned the emergence of an influential movement in the ensuing period that identified itself with the ideas of exiled Bolshevik revolutionary Leon Trotsky.

Bolivian Leftists and the Chaco War (1932–1935)

In 1932, war broke out between Bolivia and Paraguay, over a remote region called the Chaco Boreal. It pitted against each other the losers in two crucial clashes of the late nineteenth century in Latin America: Bolivia had lost the War of the Pacific and Paraguay had lost the War of the Triple Alliance (1864–1870), in which it was devastated by Brazil, Argentina and Uruguay.

The causes of the Chaco war have been the subject of considerable debate. The contested region was not merely inhospitable but virtually uninhabited; a Comintern report stated, "there is nothing [there] but mosquitoes, crocodiles and oil." Many believed oil was the real prize being fought over, even that Bolivia and Paraguay were little more than stand-ins for Standard Oil and Royal Dutch Shell. Yet hoped-for oil deposits in the Chaco may have been less important than Bolivia's desire to use the Paraguay River as an outlet to the sea, particularly for oil in other parts of the country whose transport over the Andes was prohibitively expensive.

Domestic politics provided additional motives for the war. The Republican government of Daniel Salamanca (president 1931–5) had grown increasingly concerned with the "red threat" that loomed larger as the world depression brought increased unemployment and misery. War with Paraguay would provide a useful stimulus to national unity. Indeed, the outbreak of war was greeted with a wave of jingoistic enthusiasm in almost all sectors of society, with only small groups of communist and anarchist sympathizers opposing it.

Yet as the conflict dragged on until 1935, it increasingly exposed the fault lines in Bolivian society. In terms of casualties, it was the hemisphere's most costly conflict since the US Civil War, with 100,000 Bolivian and Paraguayan deaths in what the leftist intellectual René Zavaleta Mercado later called "a kind of self-cannibalism," an "absurd . . . mass duel" between two of the hemisphere's poorest countries. Tens of thousands of Bolivian and Paraguayan soldiers were taken prisoner. Yet the majority of the soldiers called upon to die for the fatherland were Indians excluded from most aspects of citizenship and publicly derided as "savages." Each new final offensive ended in new defeats and new national humiliations.

As the Bolivian state hurled itself against its neighbor, its inability to emerge from the Chaco quagmire came to be seen as the moral, political and social bankruptcy of the old order and the social groups that ruled it. Thus, the war was a watershed in the nation's political, social and cultural life. It would be a defining experience for many protagonists of Bolivia's 1952 revolution.

Bolivia and "Military Socialism"

In response to the manifest failure and decrepitude of the country's political system, a group of young military officers took power in the aftermath of the war and established a regime they called "military socialism." In some respects, the new regime was an episode in Latin America's experience with military reformers and adventurers, from the rebellion of Brazilian tenentes (lieutenants) to Argentina's nationalist strongman Juan Domingo Perón. This early Bolivian experiment was noteworthy for carrying out the nationalization of a powerful foreign oil concern, as well as for its unusual end.

The new regime was, in an immediate sense, a response to labor unrest. In May 1936 a graphic workers' strike turned into a general strike demanding a 100 percent wage increase. La Paz was patrolled by the strikers, who virtually controlled the capital city. In mid-May a military coup was carried out in alliance with nationalist civilian groups that had adopted a "socialist" coloration. Colonel David Toro was named head of a "socialist military junta" and a red banner was raised over the city hall of La Paz.

Toro's junta moved to incorporate labor directly into the government, appointing the leader of the graphic workers as head of the newly created Ministry of Labor. Toro also created a "State Socialist Party" and decreed a labor code, minimum wage and limits on commercial profits. He proclaimed his intention to establish what he called "corporatist unionism": obligatory syndicalization through unions that would explicitly be an arm of the state. While Toro was not in power long enough to fully implement this project, it anticipated future corporatist experiments in several Latin American countries. In late 1936, the regime moved further to the right, as Toro issued a decree against communism, and jailed and exiled leftists.

While short-lived, the Toro government made its mark on history by confiscating Standard Oil's Bolivian properties in 1937. This measure was based on the company's 1920–1922 contracts, which included a clause allowing for oil fields to revert to the state if the government demonstrated that the firm had defrauded the nation. Toro's regime carefully demonstrated that Standard Oil had done just that.

In July 1937 Toro was overthrown by his military colleague Germán Busch, who called a convention which decreed the "protection" of Indian communities, "limits" to the exercise of private property, and other populist measures. Busch declared himself dictator in 1938, flirting with Hitler's Germany while making sure not to burn his bridges with the United States. He was one of a line of Latin American rulers who used rivalries between the great powers before, during and after World War II to gain space for modernizing national-populist regimes.

But where Brazil's Getúlio Vargas, Mexico's Lázaro Cárdenas and Argentina's Perón succeeded in establishing corporatist regimes, Busch failed. Having come to power with the support or at least tolerance of the Rosca (the "ring" of ruling families), his demagogic posturing became a liability. Finding himself in a dead-end, he committed suicide in August 1939. "Military socialism" gave way to a more traditional military regime. The "suicidal dictator" entered the picturesque pantheon of failed nationalist idols that would furnish the mythology of the future Revolutionary Nationalist Movement (Movimiento Nacionalista Revolucionario, MNR). Most significant for Bolivia's political future was the formation of the circle of Busch advisors, led by Victor Paz Estenssoro (1907–2001), a populist nucleus that later created the MNR.

New Political Parties

Meanwhile, a number of new political parties and movements emerged from the Chaco crisis. The first was the Revolutionary Workers' Party (Partido Obrero Revolucionario, POR), founded in exile in 1935 as a merger between two currents: anti-war "defeatists" and dissident communists led by José Aguirre Gainsborg, and the "Túpac Amaru Group" of Tristán Marof (pseudonym of the flamboyant bohemian Gustavo Navarro). Marof had become Bolivia's most famous leftist with impassioned manifestos denouncing the ruling elite in a rhetoric that borrowed from indigenism, nationalism and Marxism. While its own ideology reflected the idiosyncrasies of these origins, the POR proclaimed its sympathy with the exiled Soviet revolutionary Trotsky, but lacked real ties to his international movement. Disoriented by "military socialism," the POR collapsed three years after its foundation. Only after it was "refounded" by a new generation of leaders in the late 1930s did the party eventually become a section of the Fourth International.

Another group emerging from the Chaco cataclysm was the Revolutionary Left Party (Partido de la Izquierda Revolucionaria, PIR), led by prominent intellectual José Antonio Arze. While staunchly favoring Stalin and Soviet foreign policy, the PIR was not a section of the Communist International – indeed, the Communist Party of Bolivia (PCB) was only founded in 1950 by a split in the PIR's youth organization. The PIR achieved considerable influence on university campuses and among railway and factory workers.

By far the most influential new political force arising from the war experience was the MNR, which took shape in the early 1940s under the leadership of young members of the country's urban elite headed by Paz Estenssoro, a journalist, congressman and former Patiño mine company lawyer who became the party's "Jefe" (chief). The early MNR was influenced by the Axis powers, identifying Anglo-American imperialism as the nation's nemesis and Germany as the "enemy of my enemy." Stridently anti-Marxist and anti-Semitic in this period, it was nonetheless not a fascist party but an organization voicing the nationalist aspirations of a frustrated, modernizing sector of the urban elite.

While incorporating a quasi-indigenist strand into its ideology, the MNR had no base among the rural population and did not propose to carry out agrarian reform. It did begin to win support from tin miners after Paz Estenssoro used the parliamentary tribune to denounce the massacre of workers at Catavi (see below). The party won the allegiance of a number of union leaders, most importantly Juan Lechín (1914–2001), the charismatic head of the FSTMB miners' federation whose speeches and documents were often written by young members of the "Trotskyist" POR.

World War II and the Villarroel Regime

The outbreak of World War II made Bolivian tin a strategic mineral for the US war effort. The US Senate's Armed Services Subcommittee stressed the importance of freezing Bolivian tin prices for the duration of the war. As a result, the Bolivian government sold tin at "democratic prices" far below those current on the open market. In monetary terms, Bolivia contributed ten times more to the Allied war effort from 1941 to 1945 than the total of US aid to all Latin America throughout the 1940s.

While mine companies reaped enormous profits, the indigenous labor force faced speedup, inflation and tightened labor discipline. In line with Soviet foreign policy, however, Bolivia's best-known leftist party, the pro-Moscow PIR, opposed any actions that might reduce the flow of tin to the Allies, and aligned itself with the parties of the tin barons' Rosca, which it now identified as part of the "progressive bourgeoisie." PIR leaders even participated in government massacres of striking miners. This provided important openings for the POR, which built a base among the miners, often in alliance with Lechín and other FSTMB leaders linked to the nationalist MNR.

Labor radicalism, as well as the popularity of the opposition MNR, grew under the pro-US military dictatorship of General Enrique Peñaranda (ruled 1940–3), particularly after army troops shot down supporters of a miners' strike at Catavi, including an elderly woman named María Barzola, who became an important symbol of worker resistance.

In December 1943, a coup was carried out by the nationalist Cause of the Fatherland military lodge. Headed by Major Gualberto Villarroel (1908–1946), this group of young officers invited Paz Estenssoro and other MNR leaders to join its new government, which carried out a number of labor reforms while vowing to respect private property and back the Allied war effort. "I am not an enemy of the rich, but I am more a friend of the poor" was Villarroel's motto. His government convened an Indian Congress to discuss the situation of the indigenous peoples and promote education in the countryside. It also promised to abolish pongueaje, but in practice this form of servitude in the countryside remained a dead letter until after the revolution of 1952.

Simultaneously, the Villarroel regime sought to control labor and grassroots organizations, and cracked down hard on opposition from both the left and the right. These repressive measures, together with Villarroel's inability to meet the basic needs of the urban population, led to a peculiar situation in which the right wing, the Stalinist PIR, and the US Embassy supported a popular uprising against him.

Villarroel was dragged out of his office and repeatedly stabbed with the long pins that chola (urbanized Indian) market women of La Paz use to fasten their ponchos, then hanged from a lamppost in front of the presidential palace. The "Anti-Fascist Democratic Front" which coordinated the rising turned power over to a coalition of Rosca parties and the PIR.

The Theses of Pulacayo

Shortly before the fall of Villarroel, the "danger of Trotskyism" became major news in both the pro- and anti-government press, as young POR leaders, particularly Guillermo Lora (b. 1922), spoke at a nationwide congress of the FSTMB miners' union. Opposing support to either the government or the right-wing parties, they called for creating workers' defense groups, a "sliding scale" of wages and hours, and other demands drawn from the "Transitional Program" of the Fourth International. They also called for a "workers bloc to fight against capitalism," which soon led to a Miners' Parliamentary Bloc (including Lechín, Lora, and others) being elected to the Bolivian senate and house of representatives.

Months later, another congress of the FSTMB approved the document that would be the most important ideological statement of Bolivian labor over the course of the subsequent decades. Called the “Theses of Pulacayo,” it was written by POR members and stressed the central role of the mining proletariat in leading the peasantry and other oppressed sectors in a revolution against imperialism and the local ruling class. Again drawing slogans and demands from Trotsky’s Transitional Program, it called for “proletarian revolution and proletarian dictatorship,” while declaring solidarity with the working class of North America.

The most advanced program adopted by any union movement in the western hemisphere, the Theses of Pulacayo both reflected and further stimulated the militancy and class consciousness of Bolivian miners. The thesis vowed “war to the death against reformist collaborationism,” although it did not mention any party by name nor pose the need for a party of the working class. The contradiction was that this program was written for union leader Lechín, a member of the nationalist MNR, and helped burnish his “revolutionary” credentials. The document categorically denounced the entry of “worker ministers” into any capitalist government, but six years later Lechín and other labor leaders became “worker ministers” in the MNR regime brought to power by the 1952 revolution.

The Sexenio Rosquero and the Civil War of 1949

The period of reaction lasting from late 1946 to 1952 has entered Bolivian history as the sexenio rosquero – six years of Rosca rule. These were years full of repression, mass firings of radical workers, continual MNR conspiracies for a putsch, and the disintegration of the political order, preparing the way for the April 1952 revolution.

The year 1947 began with a new massacre, at Potosí, when miners joined a wave of protests against a new retirement law unfavorable to labor. The authorities appealed to well-off sectors’ fear of the Indian masses, denouncing the miners as “savages.” Large numbers of demonstrators were shot down in the streets on the orders of the Potosí mayor and police chief, who were members of the “Stalinist” PIR, as was the minister of labor who ordered troops into the mines.

Repression escalated as President Enrique Hertzog (ruled 1947–9) declared a state of siege, which was followed by a “white massacre” (mass firing) of miners, a new “red” (bloody) massacre of Patiño company workers and the arrest and exile of FSTMB and POR leaders. The government’s troubles were compounded by a series of indigenous peasant revolts in the Cochabamba region, the largest of which occurred at Ayopaya.

A fiscal crisis and spiraling inflation set off by a downturn in the price of tin confronted the government with a further escalation of mass discontent. In August 1949, the MNR launched a pronunciamiento (coup attempt), seeking to take over the capital and regional centers. When the nationalist party’s hopes for backing from sectors of the military did not materialize, it was forced to rely on its own, clandestine fighting groups. At the eleventh hour, the MNR decided to mobilize some labor and middle-class sectors in the attempted seizure of power.

The insurgents were quickly defeated in La Paz, but managed to seize some provincial cities. The ensuing struggle between the government and the MNR has come to be known as the “Civil War of 1949.” The government forces won this conflict, but theirs was a Pyrrhic victory. While the MNR suffered heavy losses, its reputation rose as the party of resistance to the Rosca. Fearing that the social order could be torn apart by class conflict, the nationalist party was reluctant to distribute arms to the population. Nonetheless, miners, some of whom had received military training during the Chaco war, played an important role in the fighting.

After two months of bloody clashes, the rebels were driven out of the areas they had managed to seize. Their last redoubt was the remote area near Ñancahuazú in southeastern Bolivia where Che Guevara would perish two decades later. Miners captured in the fighting were put on military planes and thrown into Lake Poopó near Oruro, in an anticipation of the technique the Argentine armed forces would use in the 1970s in their “dirty war” against the left.

In May 1950, a general strike was launched by a clandestine coordinating committee of trade unionists (in which members of the POR, MNR, and the newly formed Communist Party [PCB] were prominent). Workers built barricades in response to military repression and summary trials of strikers. Defeat came after the army surrounded the La Paz textile workers’ barrio of Villa Victoria, using artillery fire and strafing from the air to level the entire neighborhood.

National Revolution of 1952

In the general elections of May 1951, popular discontent led to a landslide victory for MNR presidential and vice-presidential candidates Paz Estenssoro and Hernán Siles Zuazo. In response, President Mamerto Urriolagoitia (ruled 1949–51) carried out a “self-coup,” popularly dubbed the Mamertazo, turning power over to a military junta headed by General Hugo Ballivián.

This latest military dictatorship was unable to overcome mass disaffection, which was further inflamed by an acute shortage of basic articles of consumption brought on by a dispute with the US over the price of tin. The government tried to distract the populace with a renewed campaign to “regain the sea-coast” lost to Chile in the Pacific War, but the gambit had little success.

What began on April 9, 1952 was not supposed to be a revolution. Instead, the MNR had planned a coup d'état in concert with a section of the armed forces. The plan called for armed MNR cells to back the coup, but the nationalist party did not initially call on the masses to mobilize. Instead, they made an agreement to take power with the head of the elite Carabineros police force, as well as the fascistic Bolivian Socialist Falange (Falange Socialista Boliviana, FSB). However, the FSB backed out and the insurgents encountered unexpected resistance from government-loyal military units. When mass sectors entered the fighting, the head of the Carabineros withdrew from the rising. The MNR leadership proposed a joint army–MNR government, but seemed ready to give up the attempt when the military refused.

At this point the situation changed in a way that would deeply affect Bolivian history. In the face of the army's advance on La Paz, the civilian population came out to wage street battles which rapidly turned into an all-out insurrection. A crucial part was played by factory workers, notably those of the main La Paz glass factory. Armed with rifles from the Chaco war, dynamite, homemade bombs or nothing but wooden sticks, the miners of Milluni entered the fray, followed by those of Oruro and Potosí. The seizure of the military arsenal in the capital's Ayacucho plaza gave civilian rebels access to ammunition and more modern weapons.

The standing army fell to pieces during the April Days; its demoralized remnants took refuge in their barracks. After the victorious insurrection, militias of miners and factory workers became the only effective armed force. With the Rosca's repressive apparatus shattered, who controlled the workers' militias became the key to power. FSTMB leader Juan Lechín, the central leader of the April rising, was thus the linchpin of MNR control. At the head of throngs of armed workers, it was Lechín who “took” the presidential palace (the old government had fled) and promptly turned it over to Siles, who announced that a new government would be headed by MNR Jefe Paz Estenssoro, with himself as vice-president and a cabinet including Lechín and two other “worker ministers.”

Representatives of the MNR hastened to assure the US that their regime was not anti-capitalist but anti-communist. The uprising was still in progress when Siles declared to the foreign press that the revolt “is completely democratic, without any connection with international communism.” Bolivia's international agreements “will be respected,” he vowed, and the MNR would begin an era of “pacification.”

Social and Political Changes under the New Regime

Under Lechín's leadership, a powerful new labor federation was formed a week after the uprising: the Bolivian Labor Federation (Central Obrera Boliviana, COB). The COB exercised what was formally and officially called “co-government” with the MNR. This was both a recognition of the federation's power and a means of containing and co-opting that power. In the first years of the revolution, the functions of the COB went far beyond the normal reach of a trade union body, as innumerable social sectors affiliated to the federation.

In the period after April 1952, peasants, street vendors, and many other non-proletarian but downtrodden sectors turned to the COB to resolve problems that would, elsewhere, have been the province of government functionaries. In the countryside, peasant unions linked to the COB often became the highest authority in their communities. The workers' militias and the exceptional weight of the COB meant there were some “elements of dual power in Bolivia,” according to the international Trotskyist press, making a partial analogy to the situation in Russia between the February and October revolutions of 1917, when workers' councils (soviets) shared and contested power with the bourgeois Provisional Government.

Immediately after the April 1952 insurrection, the labor movement demanded nationalization of the mines: the old slogan “mines to the state” (which Tristán Marof had popularized even before the Chaco war) became the order of the day. There was a real threat that if the government did not nationalize the major mines, the workers would take them over directly. Paz Estenssoro sought to assuage US fears while granting an important concession to mass pressure. Rather than nationalizing the mines at once, he named a commission to study the issue for six months, after which the government carried out the nationalization of the mining properties of the “tin barons” Patiño, Aramayo and Hochschild under the aegis of the newly created Bolivian Mining Corporation (Comibol).

Only the three large mining firms were taken over; medium-sized and small mining properties were unaffected. Bolivia’s tin remained subject to the monopolies that dominated the market (notably in the London Metal Exchange). Meanwhile, the government opened the door to foreign oil companies. At the same time, “co-government” was extended to the mines through an institutionalized “workers’ control” consisting of the integration of labor leaders into Comibol management.

One of the regime’s most significant measures was the decree of universal suffrage (July 1952), which put an end to one of the most visible mechanisms by which the Indian majority had been excluded from political rights (voting had been reserved for those who could read and write Spanish).

SEE ALSO: Bolivia, Protest and Repression, 1964–2000; Bolivia, Struggle for Independence, 1809–1825; Bolivian Neoliberalism, Social Mobilization, and Revolution from Below, 2003 and 2005

References and Suggested Readings

- Barrios de Chungara, D., with Viezzer, M. (1978) Let Me Speak! Testimony of Domitila, a Woman of the Bolivian Mines. New York: Monthly Review Press.
- Dunkerley, J. (1984) Rebellion in the Veins: Political Struggle in Bolivia, 1952–1982. London: Verso.
- Gill, L. (2000) Teetering on the Rim: Global Restructuring, Daily Life and the Armed Retreat of the Bolivian State. New York: Columbia University Press.

- Grindle, M. S. & Domingo, P. (Eds.) (2003) Proclaiming Revolution: Bolivia in Comparative Perspective. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Lagos, M. (1994) Autonomy and Power: The Dynamics of Class and Culture in Rural Bolivia. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Larson, B. (2004) Trials of Nation Making: Liberalism, Race, and Ethnicity in the Andes, 1810–1910. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Nash, J. (1992) I Spent My Life in the Mines: The Story of Juan Rojas, Bolivian Tin Miner. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Stern, S. J. (Ed.) (1987) Resistance, Rebellion, and Consciousness in the Andean Peasant World, 18th to 20th Centuries. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.

Bolivian neoliberalism, social mobilization, and revolution from below, 2003 and 2005

Dwight R. Hahn

The implementation of neoliberal “shock therapy” in 1985 with President Victor Paz Estenssoro’s New Economic Policy, through Presidential Decree 21060, followed by privatization via the 1994 Law of Capitalization promoted by President Gonzalo Sánchez de Lozada, had initially turned Bolivia into something of a model for neoliberal development. Among the first of the developing countries to throw out a state-centered economic development model, Bolivia became an early test case for the effects – economic and political – of relatively rapid neoliberal implementation within the institutional context of an electoral democracy.

By the year 2000, it was clear that the model was not working as neoliberal ideologues had promised. In that year, the population of the department of Cochabamba erupted in outrage over the loss of water rights and steep rate hikes for water charged by the new foreign owners of the Cochabamba water system. Perhaps as many as 100,000 people participated in barricades and open-air assemblies; the government of President Hugo Banzer was forced to back down as the contract with the private investors of Aguas de Tunari was withdrawn; and water distribution returned to the publicly managed SEMAPA.

Undaunted, Sánchez de Lozada returned to the presidency in 2002 for a second (non-consecutive) term and negotiated contracts with foreign oil and gas companies for the extraction and export of Bolivian oil and natural gas. Viewed by the opposition social movement leadership as highly favorable to the foreign companies, and set in the context of growing inequality in the distribution of income and productive land, unemployment, and foreign-sponsored efforts to eradicate the major cash crop of coca, these deals caused Bolivia's political system – an elite pact forged in the 1952 National Revolution – to collapse. The major portion of that collapse came with the events of October 2003, forcing the key architect of neoliberal policy in Bolivia, Sánchez de Lozada, to resign the presidency and flee the country. The completion of the collapse came in 2005 as the October 2003 successor to the presidency, Carlos Mesa Gisbert, was also forced to resign and power was handed over to a caretaker government. In December 2005, Bolivia demonstrated that it had undergone a significant political realignment, if not revolution, with the election of Evo Morales Ayma to the presidency.

October 2003

Commentators on the popular mobilization that brought down Sánchez de Lozada generally agree that agitation leading to the events of October began in February of that year with the imposition of a new flat rate income tax of 12.5 percent on salaries over $110.00 a month in order to placate the lenders at the International Monetary Fund (IMF). In La Paz, the measure caused police to go on strike to demand higher wages. This led to violent conflict between protesters, including striking police, on one side, and the presidential guard and military police on the other side, as protesters gathered in the Plaza Murillo in front of the presidential palace.

The deaths of several protesters set loose a revolt in the ensuing days as crowds set fire to the offices in La Paz of the major “neoliberal” parties – i.e., the major parties of the post-1952 party system. Within a few days 29 people had been killed and another 205 had been injured by government troops. However, the police returned to work within the week, and the violence subsided, even as political conditions remained tense as Sánchez de Lozada repealed the tax and brought in a new cabinet. Kohl and Farthing contend that though this protest did not contain the same element of a sustained social movement as that demonstrated in the earlier “water war” in Cochabamba, the events of February demonstrated that the Bolivian government was clearly willing to use violence against Bolivians in order to impose the dictates of an external agency. Hence, the Sánchez de Lozada government allowed leaders of several causes to portray neoliberal policies as a betrayal of Bolivian national sovereignty. Issues ranging from coca leaf eradication to the sale of the railroads to Chile and the proposed sale of gas, also to Chile – the enemy of Bolivia since the War of the Pacific and the loss of its coastline to Chile in the early 1880s – would become the basis of a unified nationalist popular opposition to the imperialism viewed as implicit to neoliberal policies.

The movement-based opposition, unified by its nationalist opposition to neoliberalism, came to a head over the government's plan to allow foreign companies to extract and export natural gas, through Chile, to California. Opposition parties – the MIP (Pachakuti Indigenous Movement) led by Felipe Quispe and MAS (Movimiento al Socialismo) led by Evo Morales – as well as the union movement of the coca growers, a peasant/indigenous union, and the community organization of El Alto – the largely Aymaran urban area that sits on the edge of the altiplano above the city of La Paz – mobilized together in opposition to the government's plan, through street marches and the erection of road barricades, to shut down and isolate La Paz in September 2005.

These protests coincided with a protest led by Quispe over the government's detention of an Aymara community leader, Edwin Huampu, for the murder of two individuals who had been found guilty of stealing cattle by a community assembly in the village of Cota Cota.

The mobilization of 10,000 Aymarans who marched from El Alto and into the central district of La Paz to protest against the arrest of Huampu was not unconnected to the other mobilizations against the privatization and export of Bolivian natural gas. Rather, the mobilization in defense of local Aymaran jurisdiction in criminal matters was intimately linked to the nationalist opposition movements by the common cause of an indigenous-rooted national identity.

This same common cause was the basis for the coca grower mobilization in opposition to government as they couched their protest against coca eradication in the symbolism of coca as the sacred leaf of the indigenous population.

Loss of life began in late September outside La Paz in the village of Warisata when the Bolivian army used force to break through a barricade to evacuate foreign tourists trapped in the town of Sorata by the shutdown of the road back to La Paz. In response there were more mobilizations and the construction of more barricades on the major roads connecting La Paz to the rest of the country and on other major roads as well. By early October, more protesters marched into the streets of La Paz, calling for the industrialization of gas and not its export through Chile; no to the Free Trade Agreement of the Americas; repeal of the law that had been used by the government to enhance its powers against the protesters, especially at the road blockades; and the resignation of the president. As October progressed the mass demonstrations within La Paz and El Alto continued and grew as protesters arrived from other departments. The use of violence to suppress the protests, and loss of life, also grew.

By the middle of October, the major urban centers throughout the Andean region were controlled by protesters. The number of protesters in La Paz swelled to 300,000, and more were on their way from the mining centers on the altiplano. The use of violence against the protesters was a self-defeating mechanism as it motivated more groups to support the uprising in La Paz. As the army command made it clear that it would not use extraordinary means to protect the Sánchez de Lozada government, and as the vice-president, Carlos Mesa, publicly distanced himself from Sánchez de Lozada, the president recognized that he could no longer hope to govern. He resigned and slipped out of the country on October 17. Carlos Mesa was sworn into office that same day. With promises from Mesa that he would act in compliance with the demands of the protesters, Bolivia demobilized and awaited results from the new government.

June 2005

Granted something of a breathing space, Mesa's government was nevertheless still constrained by the IMF, and by the economic necessity for foreign investment to exploit Bolivia's resources, as well as by the US government's demand to continue coca eradication efforts. That is, Mesa's government would attempt to soften the impact of neoliberal policy and thus hope to avoid arousing the nationalist sentiment that had ended the government of Sánchez de Lozada; but his government was, still, committed to neoliberal policy. As promised to the protesters, Mesa introduced a referendum on the exploitation of oil and natural gas in Bolivia for a vote by the people in July 2004. Contrary to what had been promised, or at least what the leaders of the movements believed had been promised, the proposal did not allow voters to respond yes or no to the question of renationalization of hydrocarbon resources in Bolivia. Most of the major social movement leaderships called for the boycott of the referendum. The single major political party leader to support Mesa was Evo Morales – leader of the recently created MAS Party which had been formed out of the Coca Growers' Federation of the Chapare of which Morales was the leader. The referendum contained five separate questions all of which were passed. The wording was clearly an effort to strike a politically acceptable compromise between property rights and profit demands of foreign capital on one side, and the October 2003 demand for nationalization on the other. Implementation of the referendum's allowance of foreign exploitation of gas and oil depended on the inability of the popular opposition movements to remobilize and the ongoing support of the Mesa government from Mesa's party in the congress in conjunction with the support of the traditional parties.

In January 2005 Mesa conceded quickly to a protest, this time in El Alto, over water privatization. Although lacking the heroic confrontation of the 2000 water war in Cochabamba, Mesa's concession emboldened the popular opposition and aroused the hostility of the pro-neoliberal right wing in Bolivia. By March of 2005, as the Mesa version of the hydrocarbons law advanced through the legislative process, the popular opposition began once again to mobilize. This time, Mesa dug in, depending on continued support from the neoliberal right and Morales. After some hesitation, but with street protests growing, Morales and the MAS withdrew their support of the Mesa government in June. Mesa was thus left in a position identical to that of his predecessor, except, perhaps, that Mesa would not order the use of violence against the demonstrators. Once again, more than 100,000 protesters marched into the streets of La Paz. With the return of mass mobilizations and the loss of support in congress, Mesa resigned from the presidency.

The normal constitutional procedure would have been for the president of the senate, Hormando Vaca Diez, to assume the presidency, given that the vice-presidency was vacant. However, the mobilized popular groups made it clear that it was unacceptable for Vaca Diez, from the neoliberal right, to assume the presidency. The congress moved its discussion from La Paz to Sucre in hopes of escaping the pressure of the street demonstrations. In a show of organizational strength and determination of the popular groups, the protesters followed the congress to Sucre and forced a compromise in which the head of the supreme court, Eduardo Rodríguez Veltze, assumed the presidency as caretaker. New elections for the presidency and congress were set for December 2005.

To the astonishment of nearly all observers, Morales won the December election for the presidency with an outright majority of the vote – 54 percent. No candidate had obtained an outright majority since the return of electoral democracy in 1982. As such, previous presidencies had been determined by the congress. Further, the MAS became the dominant party in the congress, with 73 seats out of a total of 130 seats in the chamber of deputies and 12 out of 27 seats in the senate (second to the neoliberal opposition party PODEMOS – Democratic and Social Power Party – which took 13 seats). At the very least, the stunning electoral results for Morales and the MAS were indicative of a major realignment in Bolivian politics. Many observers of the current Bolivian situation have engaged in the debate over whether the results of the election indicate that the mobilizations of October 2003 and June 2005 were indicative of a social and political revolution.

The political conditions for this Morales government were born of the failures of the neoliberal policy of the preceding two decades. Morales had deftly drawn a political accommodation between the need for foreign capital for the development and exploitation of oil and gas, and the need to demonstrate that Bolivia is not giving away its patrimony at a bargain price to international capital. Morales has also pushed ahead aggressively with land redistribution in the face of opposition from the political elites of eastern Bolivia – the so-called Half-Moon. On the issue of coca eradication he has refused to cooperate with the United States while, at the same time, insisting that he is very open to cooperation with the United States on the separate issue of narcotics trafficking.

More recently, the political implications of ethnic identity have come to the fore in the events surrounding the constituent assembly that was originally promised by Mesa and delivered by Morales in 2006. Resulting from the effort to write a new constitution that would, among other things, centralize the collection of revenues from resource extractions, and the refusal of the “white” elites of the eastern “Half-Moon” departments of Bolivia to compromise on their current access to that revenue, the rhetoric of “racial” and ethnic identity has intensified. It remains to be seen whether any common vision of Bolivian “national identity” can actually be constructed to unify that country within a single state.

SEE ALSO: Bolivia, Protest and Repression, 1964–2000; Bolivia, War of the Pacific to the National Revolution, 1879–1952; Cocaleros Peasant Uprising; Cochabamba Water Wars; Morales, Evo (b. 1959)

References and Suggested Readings

- Albo, X. (2007) El Alto: Mobilizing Block by Block. NACLA Report on the Americas (July/August): 34–8.
- Grindle, M. S. & Domingo, P. (Eds.) (2003) Proclaiming Revolution: Bolivia in Comparative Perspective. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Hylton, F. & Thomson, S. (2007) Revolutionary Horizons: Past and Present in Bolivian Politics. New York: Verso.
- Kohl, B. & Farthing, L. (2006) Impasse in Bolivia. London: Zed Books.
- Vann Cott, D. L. (2005) From Movements to Parties in Latin America: The Evolution of Ethnic Politics. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Bolotnikov's Rebellion, 1606–1607

Yury V. Bosin

Russia suffered considerable economic and political upheaval in the early seventeenth century as raids by Crimean Tatars and the protracted Livonian War (1558–82) with the Polish-Lithuanian Confederation destabilized Russian society. The agricultural crop failure of 1601–2 caused a great famine: in Moscow alone, 127,000 people starved to death. Against this backdrop of struggle and crisis, Bolotnikov's Rebellion was the first of four peasant wars that shook Russia in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

The reign of Tsar Fyodor from 1584 to 1598 marked the end of the Rurick dynasty and ushered in the "Time of Troubles" denoting economic crisis and a political power vacuum. Following Fyodor's death, the crown was turned over to Boris Godunov (1598–1605), then to False Dmitry, an impostor claiming to be the son of Ivan the Terrible and true heir to the throne. This political volatility accentuated rumors that spread quickly to the masses, leading to popular ferment and dissension. When Vassiliy Shuysky ascended to the throne following False Dmitry's assassination in 1606, the foundation for a vast uprising had already been built in southern and southwestern Russia, where Russian fugitives typically fled for asylum. Ivan Bolotnikov, a nobleman who became a serf, fled to the Don River to join Cossacks to organize an insurrection against the tsar. He was captured by Tatars, sold to Turkey, and escaped to Venice, returning to Russia through Hungary, Germany, and Poland where he initiated the movement against Shuysky, otherwise known as Vassiliy Ivanovich, who was tsar from 1606 to 1610. Bolotnikov, seeking control over Moscow, formed an army of 180,000 that controlled 70 towns, and defeated Shuysky's army in two battles in October 1606.

To prevent the onslaught, Shuysky purchased the services of Bolotnikov's closest commanders who assisted in defending Moscow from the approaching troops. Bolotnikov was defeated and retreated to the towns of Serpukhov and Kaluga. The war was not over. In 1607, Bolotnikov captured the large town of Tula and sent reinforcements to defend the settlement from a siege by Shuysky's army of 150,000 through October of that year. Bolotnikov was taken into custody in a remote northern town of Kargopol, and a year later blinded and drowned in an ice hole.

SEE ALSO: Bulavin's Rebellion, 1707–1708; Decembrists to the Rise of Russian Marxism; Pugachev's Rebellion, 1773–1775; Razin's Rebellion, 1670–1671

References and Suggested Readings

- Avrich, P. (1976) Russian Rebels, 1600–1800: Four Great Rebellions Which Shook the Russian State in the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries. New York: W. W. Norton.
- Peasants' Wars in Russia in the 17–18th Centuries* (1966) Moscow and Leningrad (in Russian).
- Smirnov, I. I. (1951) Bolotnikov's Rebellion of 1606–1607. Moscow (in Russian).

Bolsheviks

Alex Zukas

Bolsheviks were Marxist revolutionaries active in early twentieth-century Russia who devoted their lives to creating a tightly knit political organization with the intention of leading a mass insurrection of discontented workers and peasants against the oppressive social, economic, and political conditions of the autocratic tsarist regime. Their efforts earned them an important place in modern history because, distrustful of the coalition socialist-liberal provisional government that had replaced the tsarist regime in the wake of the first Russian Revolution of February 1917, led by Lenin (1870–1924) and Trotsky (1879–1940) they harnessed a wave of popular radicalism among the peasantry and proletariat and organized a second revolution in October 1917. The first revolution in world history carried out by a self-consciously Marxist party, it eventually transformed the huge Russian empire into the Soviet Union, the first militantly communist and anti-capitalist nation in the world and one of only two superpowers to emerge from World War II. Today "Bolsheviks" generally refers to those men and women who were members of the Leninist party in the pre-revolutionary era of exile and underground struggle and the revolutionary upheavals of 1917 through 1921.

Initially, Russian Marxists were united in one party, the revolutionary Russian Social Democratic Labor Party (RSDLP). The RSDLP was formed by Russian socialists at an 1898 congress in Minsk to unite a variety of Russian revolutionary organizations into a cohesive political force. The congress founded the party on key Marxist ideas: the historical universality of class exploitation and class struggle, the historical necessity of working-class revolution to bring the exploitation of one class by another to an end, and the creation of a future communist society of socially and politically equal citizens who engaged in freely chosen, non-alienated labor. Since any independent political activity or organizing was against the law in tsarist Russia, the party existed as an illegal, underground organization. In 1902, the year before the Second RSDLP Congress, the revolutionary Vladimir Ilyich Ulyanov, better known to history by his underground alias Lenin, published What Is To Be Done?. In this work Lenin explained his strategic vision for the RSDLP in a tsarist autocracy which allowed no political parties, no open political campaigning, and no form of representative government. In his vision the party would become the institutional home of activists, agitators, and organizers who would assume the role of a disciplined vanguard of proletarian revolution. Party members would need to commit themselves full time to revolutionary agitation and organization. Lenin dubbed this organizational paradigm “a party of a new type.” That is, it was a party that was not concerned with electoral success but with inculcating a transformative revolutionary consciousness and activism in the mass of workers and peasants and with organizing the overthrow of the government in order to create a new kind of society that would realize Marx’s ideas of human emancipation. Sympathizers and those who could not make such a commitment would remain outside the party structure. They could contribute to the revolutionary cause by forming or joining institutions like trade unions, cooperatives, and other “mass,” general membership organizations. Having dealt with structural issues, Lenin then turned to decision-making processes within the party. In order for this underground organization of professional socialist revolutionaries to be both an effective and legitimate organization that could hold the loyalty of its members under the conditions of tsarist repression, he proposed that “democratic centralism” govern all internal party processes and debates. Party members had the right to discuss and debate matters of policy and direction freely and openly within the party and vote for leaders in an open, fair, and democratic process, but once they came to a decision by majority vote, all party members, including those in the minority, had to uphold that decision and present a united front to the outside world. As Lenin described it, democratic centralism embodied freedom of discussion and criticism within the party tied to unity of action and purpose outside the party. That is, discussions and decisions would be based on grassroots participation of party members “from below,” but democratically arrived-at decisions would be implemented uniformly, centrally, “from above,” and apply to every comrade’s conduct as part of party discipline until decisions were revised at a later date by the same process.

The Second Party Congress met in Belgium in November 1903 and Lenin moved that his ideas from What Is To Be Done? be adopted by the RSDLP. He and his supporters, members of the editorial board of the party’s newspaper Iskra (Spark), could not persuade the congress that the RSDLP should be transformed into a disciplined party of professional revolutionaries (cadres). The RSDLP majority voted that the party remain a mass-based organization open to militant trade unionists, radical workers, and other social activists. Lenin’s faction did not come away empty-handed, however. It did win a less crucial vote concerning the composition of Iskra’s editorial board. After winning this vote Lenin began calling his faction Bolshevik, which meant “members of the majority.” The main faction opposing the Bolsheviks at this congress subsequently became known as Mensheviks (“members of the minority”), even though they were the majority at the congress. Despite defeat at the 1903 congress, Bolsheviks put Lenin’s ideas of a vanguard party and democratic centralism into practice in their faction. Factions within the RSDLP were porous and members joined and left often in 1903 and 1904. For example, the godfather of Russian Marxism, Georgi Plekhanov (1856–1918), at first allied himself with the Bolsheviks but found a permanent home in the Menshevik camp by 1904. On the other hand, Trotsky first sided with the Mensheviks but broke with them in September 1904 over their resolve to ally themselves with Russian liberals and their refusal to reconcile with Lenin and the Bolsheviks. He remained an independent social democrat who worked to unify the factions until August 1917. By that time he became convinced of the necessity of a vanguard party and a second, workers’ revolution and joined the Bolsheviks.

To harden boundaries, the Bolsheviks held a Bolsheviks-only conference in London in April 1905, which they termed the Third Party Congress, while the Mensheviks organized a rival conference. With greater organizational separation, ideological differences between the two groups became more pronounced. While both Marxist groups expected a future revolution against tsarist rule would be bourgeois in nature, the Bolsheviks believed that this revolution had to be led by the working class in alliance with the peasantry because unlike the self-confident and rising bourgeoisies of seventeenth-century Britain and eighteenth-century France, the bourgeoisie of twentieth-century Russia was too small, weak, and indecisive to lead a popular revolution against autocratic rule and install liberal democratic government and freedoms. The Mensheviks held the more orthodox Marxist position that a bourgeois revolution was logically the work of bourgeois parties, such as the liberal Constitutional Democratic Party (Kadet) in Russia, and workers and peasants would play only a subordinate role. At the Fourth (Unification) Conference in Stockholm in April 1906, the Bolsheviks and Mensheviks sought to reconcile their differences and work together within a reunified RSDLP. However, to avoid arrest by the tsarist police for seditious activities, Lenin began a self-imposed exile in 1907, living for a time in various European countries and finally landing in Switzerland in September 1914. His exile corresponded with an era of serious internal factional and party disputes. At the Fifth Conference in London in May 1907, the Bolsheviks achieved a majority but cooperation between the factions soon broke down. Part of the problem was that, hoping to forestall future revolutionary insurrections after the urban revolts of 1905/6, Tsar Nicolas II (1868–1918) loosened his autocratic rule. Political concessions included legalizing parliamentary political parties, granting a limited franchise, and establishing an elected Duma (parliament) with restricted powers. Divisions soon appeared within the Bolshevik faction as a result of these reforms. Lenin, Grigory Zinoviev (1883–1936), and Lev Kamenev (1883–1936) held that Bolsheviks should participate in the Duma to exploit the newly opened political space, while Alexander Bogdanov (1873–1928) held that Bolsheviks should shun the Duma. After criticizing Bogdanov's position in Materialism and Empirio-criticism (1909), Lenin won majority support at a Bolshevik conference in Paris in 1909 as well as Bogdanov's expulsion from the Bolshevik faction. Contacts between Bolsheviks and Mensheviks to revive a unified RSDLP in 1910 bore no fruit. Instead, at a

January 1912 Bolshevik-only conference in Prague, the Bolsheviks declared that they were no longer a faction within the RSDLP but an independent party, the RSDLP (Bolshevik), with no organizational ties to the Mensheviks or other RSDLP factions.

Bolsheviks repudiated Russian involvement in World War I (1914–18), basing their stance on socialist internationalism. From their point of view, the war was an inter-imperialist conflict that redirected the revolutionary energies of the lower classes into fratricidal warfare when they should be uniting to overthrow their own ruling classes. Bolshevik agitation among Russian workers, peasants, and soldiers tried to foment an insurrectionary mood and persuade them to channel their energies into a rebellion against a semi-capitalist regime and ruling class at home that would end the war and establish a workers' and peasants' state. That is, a war for imperialist ends should be transformed into a war for social emancipation. Bolsheviks were instrumental in organizing numerous international anti-war conferences, including the famous one at Zimmerwald, Switzerland in 1915. The defeat of revolutionary forces in 1905 and the pro-war stance of the Russian bourgeoisie convinced Lenin and the Bolsheviks that Marx's historical teleology did not fit Russia and that the historically separate bourgeois-democratic and socialist revolutions would have to occur simultaneously involving a class-conscious proletariat led by a vanguard party in conjunction with the mass of the peasantry. The revolutions would install a dictatorship (i.e., emergency rule) of the proletariat, that is, a class-based democracy in which workers and peasants exercised political power through elected councils known as soviets. Lenin and the Bolsheviks maintained that without a proletarian revolution there could never be true social emancipation because the ruling classes would turn the class-based power (i.e., "dictatorship") of the state, whether autocratic or bourgeois-democratic, against the massed power of workers and peasants as they had done in the past. Only when the proletariat and peasantry were the "ruling classes" could socialism be built.

After two years of war, the overextended Russian army and economy imploded. Encouraged by Bolshevik agitators, peasants and workers absconded from the front in the face of severe casualties, officer ineptitude, and staggering defeats. Physical deprivation surpassed human endurance and by early 1917 Russia was in a revolutionary situation with strikes and food riots in every major city instigated and led by local Bolshevik cadres. To hasten Russia's collapse on Germany's eastern front, in early 1917 the German government provided transportation and financial support for anti-war Bolshevik leaders living in exile to return to Russia. Unable to contain the revolutionary upsurge, Nicholas II abdicated in February 1917 and a Provisional Government of liberals and agrarian socialists assumed power. The February Revolution ended the autocracy. While the Bolshevik leadership living outside Russia played no role in this first revolution, local Bolsheviks organized the daily strikes and street demonstrations that convinced the tsar to abdicate. The differences between Bolsheviks and Mensheviks remained unbridgeable, however. Following orthodox Marxism, Mensheviks held that Russia needed a liberal-capitalist revolution so that the country could make the transition to socialism at a later date once capitalism and the proletariat had matured. For that reason they backed the Provisional Government. Back in Russia Lenin championed the workers' soviets as the legitimate government of the country and opposed the Provisional Government in his April Theses (1917). Bolsheviks soon rallied mass support for their position to end the war, redistribute land, socialize production, and create a workers' democracy with the widely popular slogans "All Power to Soviets" and "Land, Bread, and Peace." Keenly aware that their promoting socialist revolution in a "backward" country went against orthodox Marxist ideas, Bolsheviks argued that world capitalism was an interlinked system and the world war had fomented mass unrest in all belligerent nations in Europe. In this unique conjuncture, a worker-peasant revolution in semi-capitalist, semi-industrial Russia would spark classic Marxist proletarian revolutions in the capitalist and industrially developed countries of Europe which would then be in a position to export socialist development to Russia.

Bolsheviks gained strong support in the soviets over the summer and fall, and Lenin persuaded reluctant Bolsheviks to launch an insurrection on October 24, 1917 and overthrow the Provisional Government. As head of the Petrograd soviet, Trotsky organized the almost bloodless uprising after joining the Bolshevik party in mid-1917. During the uprising the Second All-Russian Congress of Soviets met and instituted a new government, the Council of People's Commissars. The Congress chose Lenin to head the new government with other Bolsheviks as commissars for major government departments. With one foot in the past and one foot in the future, the Seventh Party Congress of the RSDLP (Bolsheviks) met in March 1918 and officially changed the name of the party to the All-Russian Communist Party (Bolshevik). In December 1925, after the formation of the Soviet Union, the party became the All-Union Communist Party (Bolshevik). The designation of "Bolshevik" was only dropped from the party's formal name in October 1952, very near the end of the Stalin era.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism, Russia; Bukharin, Nikolai Ivanovich (1888–1938); Class Struggle; Counter-revolution; Kollontai, Alexandra (1872–1952); Lenin, Vladimir Ilyich (1870–1924); Leninist Philosophy; Luxemburg, Rosa (1870–1919); Marxism; Plekhanov, Georgi (1856–1918); Reed, John (1887–1920); Russia, Revolution of 1905–1907; Russia, Revolution of February/March 1917; Russia, Revolution of October/November 1917; Russian Civil War, 1918–1924; Socialism; Stalin, Joseph (1879–1953) and "Revolution from Above"; Trotsky, Leon (1879–1940); Women in the Russian Revolution; Zetkin, Clara (1857–1933)

References and Suggested Readings

- Acton, E. (1990) Rethinking the Russian Revolution. London: Edward Arnold.
- Budgen, S., Kouvelakis, S., & Žižek, S. (2007) Lenin Reloaded: Towards a Politics of Truth. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Burbank, J. (1989) Intelligentsia and Revolution: Russian Views of Bolshevism, 1917–1922. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Carr, E. H. (1985) The Bolshevik Revolution, 1917–1923, Vol. 1. New York: W. W. Norton.
- Carr, E. H. & Davies, R. W. (2004) The Russian Revolution from Lenin to Stalin 1917–1929. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Cohen, S. F. (1980) Bukharin and the Bolshevik Revolution: A Political Biography. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Cohen, S. F. (1985) Rethinking the Soviet Experience: Politics and History since 1917. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Dukes, P. (1979) October and the World: Perspectives on the Russian Revolution. New York: St. Martin's Press.
- Fitzpatrick, S. (2001) The Russian Revolution, 3rd ed. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Haimson, L. H. (1985) Russian Marxists and the Origins of Bolshevism. Boston: Beacon Press.

- Haimson, L. H. & Tilly, C. (Eds.) (1989) Strikes, Wars, and Revolutions in an International Perspective: Strike Waves in the Late Nineteenth and Early Twentieth Centuries. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Medvedev, R. A. (1985) The October Revolution. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Pipes, R. (1991) The Russian Revolution. New York: Vintage.
- Rabinowitch, A. (2007) The Bolsheviks in Power: The First Year of Soviet Rule in Petrograd. Indianapolis: Indiana University Press.
- Read, C. (1996) From Tsar to Soviets: The Russian People and Their Revolution, 1917–21. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Service, R. (2002) Lenin: A Biography. Cambridge, MA: Belknap.
- Service, R. (2007) The Russian Revolution, 1900–1927, 3rd ed. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Stites, R. (1989) Revolutionary Dreams: Utopian Vision and Experimental Life in the Russian Revolution. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Ulam, A. B. (1998) The Bolsheviks: The Intellectual and Political History of the Triumph of Communism in Russia. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Woods, A. (1999) Bolshevism: The Road to Revolution. London: Wellred Books.

Bonaparte, Louis-Napoleon (1808–1873)

Casey Harison

Louis-Napoleon Bonaparte, a nephew of Napoleon Bonaparte, seemed an unlikely heir to his uncle's legacy. Conspirator, politician, and then emperor of France, Louis-Napoleon established a political system whose closest counterpart is Mussolini's Italy of the twentieth century. Louis-Napoleon's ambiguous personal and political history has been the subject of scholarly debate ever since.

Following Napoleon I's exile in 1815, the Bonapartes were forbidden to live in France, and so Louis-Napoleon was raised in Switzerland and Germany. He spent years traveling, developing a special fondness for Italy, where he joined the Carbonari in its struggle for an independent Italy. As heir to the Napoleonic crown, Louis-Napoleon made two ill-fated, almost comical attempts to come to power in France: the first launched from Strasbourg in 1836 and the second from Boulogne in 1840. The latter led to imprisonment, where he wrote Napoleonic Ideas, giving a social and economic dimension to the "bonapartism" he would later call upon as emperor.

The chance to come to power legally came with the presidential elections following the French Revolution of 1848. Louis-Napoleon returned to France during the Second Republic and gained financial and political support from sections of society unhappy with the turmoil of revolution and the June Days. Louis-Napoleon promised order; his famous name helped win votes. He received almost 5.5 million votes and gained the presidency in a landslide. It was a remarkable ascendancy for a person many considered to be a shadow of the great uncle.

Louis-Napoleon, it turned out, was an authoritarian. He ended the republic in December 1851 with a well-planned coup d'état and subsequent repression. Thousands of opponents were arrested or exiled. The next year (1852), he formally abolished the republic and declared France an empire. Louis-Napoleon now became Napoleon III.

With the coup, Louis-Napoleon became the object of scorn from famous critics like the exiled Victor Hugo, who labeled him "Napoleon the Little." Karl Marx, too, offered a biting analysis with The Eighteenth Brumaire of Louis Bonaparte, denigrating the younger Napoleon's seizure of power in comparison with that of his great uncle in 1799: "The first time as tragedy, the second time as farce." Later historians described the empire as a form of caesarism or proto-fascism. By the mid-1860s, the empire had become more "liberal," though it was undermined by the misadventure of an invasion of Mexico (1862–7). The Second Empire ended with military defeat in the Franco-Prussian War (1870–1). Napoleon III was himself taken prisoner at the battle of Sedan and died in exile in England in 1873.

SEE ALSO: Bonaparte, Napoleon (1769–1821); European Revolutions of 1848; France, June Days, 1848; Marx, Karl (1818–1883)

References and Suggested Readings

- Guérard, A. (1972) Napoleon III: A Great Life in Brief. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.
- Marx, K. (1984) The Eighteenth Brumaire of Louis Bonaparte. New York: International Publishers.
- Price, R. (1997) Napoleon III and the Second Empire. London: Routledge.
- Spitzer, A. B. (1962) The Good Napoleon III. French Historical Studies 2 (2): 308–29.
- Thompson, J. M. (1955) Louis Napoleon and the Second Empire. New York: W. W. Norton.
- Truesdell, M. (1997) Spectacular Politics: Louis-Napoleon Bonaparte and the Fête Impériale, 1849–1870. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Bonaparte, Napoleon (1769–1821)

Annette Richardson

The towering figure of his era, Napoleon Bonaparte (born Napoleone di Buonaparte) was a French army general who rose to prominence in the 1790s during the French Revolutionary Wars and became emperor of France in 1804. His success on the battlefield enabled him to dominate Europe for much of the early nineteenth century. Napoleon established constitutional monarchies and social reforms in the European states that he conquered, spreading the anti-aristocratic transformation wrought by the French Revolution, while establishing a strong centralized government – some would say dictatorial and anti-democratic – within France. Forced to abdicate in 1814, Napoleon returned briefly to power in 1815 but was then exiled from France for the rest of his life.

Napoleon was born on August 15, 1769, in Ajaccio, Corsica, to Carlo Buonaparte and Maria Letizia Ramolino. Although the Buonapartes were minor nobles of Italian ancestry, the island of Corsica had recently become a French possession. Napoleon attended the Military Academy at Brienne-le-Château on a scholarship from 1779 to 1784, and then the Ecole Royale Militaire, where he studied artillery and emerged as a second lieutenant at age 16.

At the outbreak of the French Revolution in 1789, Napoleon was a lieutenant colonel in the Corsican National Guard. After coming into conflict with Corsican nationalist leader Pasquale Paoli, Napoleon fled to mainland France, where he became an artillery officer for the revolutionary government. He earned promotion to the rank of brigadier general after leading an attack in 1793 on British-held Point l'Éguillette during the siege of Toulon, which had risen up against the revolutionary government with British aid.

Napoleon had joined a provincial branch of the Jacobin Club in 1791 and had gained a reputation as a “Jacobin general.” He became friendly with Augustin Robespierre, brother of the revolutionary leader Maximilien Robespierre. Shortly after the latter was overthrown in July 1794, Napoleon was arrested due to his Jacobin connections, but he was released in early 1795. Napoleon refused an order to suppress an uprising in the royalist Vendée region of western France, but redeemed himself with the revolutionary leadership on October 5, 1795, when, with what he famously described as a “whiff of grapeshot,” he dispersed a royalist uprising against the National Convention at the Tuileries Palace. This earned him appointment as commander of the French “Army of Italy” on March 2, 1796. On March 9 he married the charming and lively Josephine de Beauharnais, a widow with two children, and shortly thereafter dropped the “u” from his name to take it into the more French-sounding “Bonaparte.”

Although not a military innovator, Napoleon was a good strategist and excellent tactician. In late March 1796 he launched an invasion of Italy, winning victories at Lonato, Castiglione, Mantua, and Rivoli. He occupied the Papal States, dethroned Pope Pius VI, occupied Venice, defeated the Austrians, organized several Italian Republics, and was responsible for the Treaty of Campo Formio on October 17, 1797. In the eyes of French public opinion, he had become a military hero, which seems to have given rise to political ambition. Among other indications, he founded journals to promote himself.

Following his success in Italy, Napoleon embarked on a military expedition to Egypt in an effort to challenge British influence in the region. A group of scholars accompanied the expedition to study Egyptian artifacts and landscape. Napoleon defeated the Mamelukes at the Battle of the Pyramids on July 21, 1798, and triumphantly entered Cairo. However, on August 1–2, British Admiral Horatio Nelson annihilated the French fleet at Abukir Bay, leaving Napoleon landlocked in Egypt. He invaded Palestine (present-day Israel) and took Jaffa. During the expedition, his troops contracted plague. Napoleon failed to wrest the key fortress of Acre from the English. Upon his return to Egypt, he defeated the Turks at Abukir on July 25, 1799. On August 23, Napoleon left his troops in Egypt (his detractors would say he abandoned them), leaving many to die under the command of subordinates, and returned to France on October 9. The British repatriated the remaining French troops in 1801.

He received an enthusiastic welcome in France, although the country was in turmoil. Napoleon and the Abbé Sieyès engineered a coup d'état to overthrow the Directory, the five-man governing council that had become widely perceived as corrupt and inadequate. Sieyès was one of the five Directors, but he hoped the coup – known as the Eighteenth Brumaire, after the date on the French revolutionary calendar on which it occurred – would increase his personal power. Napoleon, however, was more interested in his own career. He quashed the two existing legislative bodies, the Council of Elders and the Council of the Five Hundred. A few compliant members of both bodies formed a rump assembly that appointed a new three-man governing council consisting of Sieyès, a Sieyès ally named Pierre Roger Duclos, and Napoleon himself, with Napoleon at their head as First Consul.

Napoleon legitimized his new position of power by organizing a plebiscite to approve a new constitution of his making. He gained the Catholic Church's support for his rule by negotiating a Concordat with Rome on July 15, 1802, officially recognizing Catholicism as the country's primary religion, thus ending the hostility between France and the church that the Revolution's anti-clerical and de-Christianizing reforms had engendered. Napoleon retained the power to appoint the church's bishops, but allowed the pope to claim "spiritual control" over them. The deal was sweetened for the church by the government's promise to pay the clergy salaries.

Meanwhile, French armies had suffered setbacks in Italy, so Napoleon set out to reconquer the lost territory. He entered Milan on June 2, 1801, and was victorious at Marengo on June 14. He secured peace with Austria on February 9, 1802, and a peace treaty with England – the Peace of Amiens – was signed on March 25, 1802. Napoleon became Consul for Life on August 4, 1802, with the adoption of yet another new constitution that once again greatly increased his powers.

Despite his growing popularity and authority, Napoleon was not without opposition. Monarchists continued to plot against him and the royalist Vendée region remained a source of insurrection. Democratic-minded intellectuals resented and feared the increasingly dictatorial style of his rule. Assassination plots were uncovered. A revolt had erupted in Haiti, a key French colony in the Caribbean. But on May 18, 1804, a carefully managed plebiscite (the vote was about 3,500,000 to 2,500) ratified a Senate proposal to create a hereditary emperor, and Napoleon, of course, was the only candidate for the position. On December 2, 1804, in the presence of Pope Pius VII, Napoleon had himself crowned emperor of France and king of Italy.

Napoleon was an able administrator. In addition to reorganizing and further centralizing the administrative divisions of France, he introduced a comprehensive system of laws, the Code Napoléon (or Civil Code), which institutionalized the bourgeois property relations established by the French Revolution and served as a model for other countries where a similar socioeconomic transformation occurred. He also regulated finances, changed the tax system, and founded the Bank of France. His reorganization of the French educational system emphasized military education and reduced educational opportunities for girls. At the same time, he shored up his increasingly autocratic rule by imposing strict censorship and developing a secret police force.

Meanwhile, war with the other European powers continued. The Peace of Amiens between France and England had lasted only one year. Napoleon prepared an invasion of England, but was forced to abandon the plan when his nemesis, Admiral Nelson, demonstrated England's naval superiority by defeating the French navy at the Battle of Trafalgar on October 21, 1805. Napoleon's land forces fared much better, however, against a challenge to his claim to Italy by a coalition of British, Austrian, and Russian armies. After his Grand Army defeated the Austrians at Ulm on October 18, he scored his greatest victory against the Russians and Austrians at Austerlitz on December 2, 1805.

In 1806 another coalition of Britain, Prussia, and Russia once again challenged Napoleon's military dominance of the continent, but he defeated the Prussians at Jena on October 14, 1806, and the Russians at Eylau on February 8, 1807, and at Friedland on June 14, 1807. On July 7 he imposed the Treaty of Tilsit on Russia, after which Tsar Alexander I and Napoleon agreed to collaborate in establishing the "Continental System" to combat growing British economic influence in Europe by prohibiting British imports into the continent. By this time, Napoleon held dominion over seven kingdoms and 20 principalities in Europe, many of which he had placed under the control of his brothers and adopted children.

But when Spain refused to join the Continental System's economic blockade against Britain, Napoleon invaded the Iberian peninsula.

He took Madrid on December 13, 1808, and after defeating British forces in the country, crowned his brother Joseph as king of Spain. Although Napoleon left to fight on another front, his troops remained, but Portuguese guerillas, supported by Britain's Duke of Wellington, eventually forced the French out of Spain. Meanwhile, he won an important victory against Austria at the Battle of Wagram on July 5–6, 1809, and imposed the Treaty of Schonbrunn on Emperor Francis I on October 14, 1809.

Napoleon's long-range plan was to establish a Bonaparte dynasty that would rule Europe long into the future. With no male heir, however, and his wife Josephine no longer capable of bearing children, he divorced Josephine and on April 12, 1810, married 18-year-old Archduchess Marie Louise of Austria. The marriage allied Napoleon to one of the most prominent royal houses in Europe and was meant to lay the basis for permanent peace between France and Austria. The couple had a son, Napoleon Francis Joseph Charles, on March 20, 1811, and the infant was designated the king of Rome.

After Tsar Alexander I abandoned Napoleon's Continental System, in June 1812 Napoleon invaded Russia under the pretext of enforcing the Treaty of Tilsit. He had been warned against the venture by numerous advisors, but felt vindicated by initial successes at Vilna, Vitebsk, and Smolensk. After a major victory at Borodino on September 7, 1812, he pursued the retreating Russian forces, who burned everything in their path to make supplies scarce for Napoleon's troops. On September 14 Napoleon entered Moscow with his Grand Army of 500,000 men. The Russians burned the city, however, and Tsar Alexander refused to enter into negotiations. With supplies rapidly depleting, Napoleon was forced to retreat. The Grand Army left Moscow on October 19, but massive defections, starvation, Cossack harassment, and lack of preparation for the extreme cold on the return journey contributed to an extreme rate of attrition among the French troops: only 30,000 survivors reached France. The Russian campaign had ended in a major defeat.

Reminiscent of his earlier departure from Egypt in 1799, Napoleon left his army in Russia on December 5, 1812, and returned to France. Although he raised another army, he was overextended on too many fronts. Although victorious in battles at Lutze on May 2, 1813, at Bautzen on May 21, and at Dresden on August 26–7, he suffered a critical loss at Leipzig on October 16–19. Early in 1814, a coalition of Russia, Prussia, Austria, and Britain invaded France, and the allied armies reached Paris on March 30. Unable to offer effective resistance, in early April Napoleon was persuaded by his generals to abdicate unconditionally.

The Bourbon monarchy was restored in France with the enthronement of Louis XVIII, and Napoleon was exiled to the island of Elba. Less than a year after his abdication, however, he engineered one of history's most spectacular comebacks. On March 1, 1815, he escaped from Elba, landed in France with about 600 men, and began a march toward Paris, gathering masses of devoted soldiers along the way. One of his former commanders, Marshal Michel Ney, was sent to arrest him, but Ney joined him instead. His army grew to number hundreds of thousands, and when he triumphantly entered Paris on March 20, the streets were lined with cheering crowds. King Louis XVIII and his government fled.

Napoleon's return to power was short-lived, however; it has entered the history books as "the Hundred Days." Picking up where he had left off, he invaded Belgium, but on June 18, 1815, he was decisively defeated by British and Prussian forces at the Battle of Waterloo. Once again he was forced to abdicate and this time was sent into exile to a more distant island, Saint Helena, from which escape was much more unlikely. Louis XVIII returned to France on July 8, 1815, and the Bourbon restoration recommenced. During his final exile Napoleon wrote his Memoirs, later published in ten volumes, in which he portrayed himself as the savior of France. He died on May 5, 1821; his body was returned to France in 1840 and now lies in the famed Hôtel des Invalides monument in Paris.

Even in defeat, his popularity grew, and his posthumous influence continued to roil French politics for decades to follow. In the late 1840s an adventurous nephew, Louis-Napoleon Bonaparte, would ride his uncle's enduring legend to power and eventually establish himself as Emperor Napoleon III.

SEE ALSO: Bonaparte, Louis-Napoleon (1808–1873); Directory, France, 1795–1799; Eighteenth Brumaire; French Revolution, 1789–1794; Sieyès, Abbé (1748–1836)

References and Suggested Readings

- Alexander, R. S. (2001) Napoleon. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Barnett, C. (1978) Bonaparte. London: Farrar, Strauss, & Giroux.
- Bergeron, L. (1981) France Under Napoleon. Trans. R. R. Palmer. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Broers, M. (1996) Europe Under Napoleon. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Chandler, D. (1996) The Campaigns of Napoleon. New York: Macmillan.
- Eglund, S. (2005) Napoleon: A Political Life. New York: Scribner.
- Geyl, P. (1965) Napoleon: For and Against. New York: Penguin.
- Johnson, P. (2002) Napoleon. New York: Penguin.
- LeFebvre, G. (1969) Napoleon. Trans. J. E. Anderson. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Lyons, M. (1975) France Under the Directory. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Markham, F. (1963) Napoleon. New York: Mentor Books.
- Tulard, J. (1984) Napoleon: The Myth of the Saviour. Trans. T. Waugh. London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson.

Bonifacio, Andres (1863–1897)

Atoy M. Navarro

Andres de Castro Bonifacio was a Filipino patriot and revolutionary, considered the “Father of the Philippine Revolution” against Spanish colonialism in the Philippines. Recognized as the leader of the first revolution in Asia and the first independent government of the Philippines, he is regarded as a national hero and his birthday is commemorated as a national holiday known as Bonifacio Day.

Bonifacio was the oldest of six children born to a lower-middle-class family in Tondo, Manila, on November 30, 1863. His parents, Santiago Bonifacio of Tondo and Catalina de Castro of Zambales, were both devout Catholics. He had three brothers and two sisters who all became part of the Filipino revolutionary movement.

He first studied under his aunt, who taught him the alphabet and Catholic prayers, before his father sent him to study under a private tutor, who taught him arithmetic, Spanish, and Tagalog. Orphaned at an early age, Bonifacio was forced to give up his studies to support his brothers and sisters. With the help of his siblings, he made canes and paper fans and sold them in the streets of Manila. Making the most of his interest in calligraphy and penmanship, Bonifacio also made posters for commercial establishments. Eventually, he found a job as a clerk-messenger and was later promoted as an agent of Fleming and Company, a British trading company, where he learned English. Not long after, Bonifacio transferred to Fresell and Company, a German trading house, where he worked as agent-warehouseman.

To further educate himself, Bonifacio bought and fervently read different historical, legal, and literary books. Bonifacio also joined various endeavors contributing to his self-education. He became an actor and organizer of plays for a dramatic society in Tondo that made him even more proficient in Tagalog. Subsequently, Bonifacio and his friends formed the Teatro Porvenir. He also affiliated himself with the Masonic lodge Taliba and joined José Rizal’s socio-civic organization, La Liga Filipina, where he participated in discussions on social reforms in the Philippines.

With the dissolution of La Liga Filipina and the exile of Rizal, Bonifacio and several others founded the Kataastaasang Kagalangalang na Katipunan ng mga Anak ng Bayan (Katipunan) in Manila on July 7, 1892. Unlike Rizal’s La Liga Filipina, which advocated social reforms through legal means, Bonifacio’s Katipunan formed a secret society whose primary goal was independence through revolution.

While working for the Katipunan, Bonifacio married Gregoria de Jesus. They had a son, Andres de Jesus Bonifacio, who died two months after being born. After the death of their son, the couple’s lives revolved around social transformation. In the Katipunan, Bonifacio distinguished himself as its foremost organizer and one of its leading thinkers, resulting in his election as the society’s Supremo. De Jesus, with the symbolic name Lakambini, was made the society’s primary custodian of valuable papers and seals.

Together with Emilio Jacinto, Bonifacio wrote most of the official documents of the Katipunan including most of the contributions to Kalayaan, the society’s official publication. The literature written by Bonifacio and Jacinto provided Katipunan not only with a philosophy of revolution but also with a practical propaganda tool. With the release of Kalayaan, the membership of the society substantially increased, gaining footholds in the various provinces of the Philippines. With significant growth in membership, the Katipunan was inevitably discovered by the Spanish authorities in Manila.

Responding to the Spanish authorities' arrest of members of the Katipunan, Bonifacio led the society in launching the Philippine Revolution on August 24, 1896. He was elected president of the first independent government of the Philippines that attacked Spanish installations in Manila on August 29 and 30, 1896. Under the leadership of Bonifacio's supreme council in Manila and the various Katipunan local councils in the provinces, the revolution spread throughout the country.

From its initial foundation in Manila, the revolution increasingly moved southwest to Cavite. The Katipunan in the province was divided into two factions, the Magdalo, headed by Emilio Aguinaldo, and the Magdiwang, led by Mariano Alvarez. To settle disputes, the factions invited Bonifacio as Supremo of the Katipunan to intercede through a convention. But the convention became the venue for forming a new government and electing Aguinaldo as president under dubious circumstances. Citing convention irregularities, Bonifacio, acting as Supremo of the Katipunan, declared the proceedings invalid. Subsequently, Aguinaldo moved to legitimize his new republican government and ordered the arrest of Bonifacio. Within days Bonifacio was arrested and charged with sedition and treason. After a mock trial, Bonifacio was found guilty and sentenced to death. On May 10, 1897, Bonifacio was shot near Mount Buntis, Maragondon, Cavite. The Philippine Revolution nevertheless continued. With the end of Spanish rule in the country, Filipino nationalists gradually viewed Bonifacio as the "Father of the Philippine Revolution," a national hero, and most recently, as president of the first independent government of the Philippines.

SEE ALSO: Huk Rebellion, 1946–1954; Philippines, Colonial Protests during the Spanish Era; Philippines, Protest during the US Era; Philippines, Protests, 1950s–1970s; Philippines, Protests, 1980s–Present; Rizal, José (1861–1896)

References and Suggested Readings

Agoncillo, T. (1956) Revolt of the Masses: The Story of Andres Bonifacio and the Katipunan. Quezon City: University of the Philippines Press.

Almario, V. (1993) Pamitikan ng Rebolusyon (g 1896): Isang Paglilingon at Katipunan ng mga Akda nina Bonifacio at Jacinto (Literature of the (1896) Revolution: A Look Back and Compilation of the Writings of Bonifacio and Jacinto). Manila: Cultural Center of the Philippines.

Guerrero, M. & Schumacher, J. (1998) Kasaysayan: The Story of the Filipino People, Vol. 5: Reform and Revolution. Hong Kong: Asia Publishing Company.

Salazar, Z. (1994) Agosto 29–30, 1896: Ang Pagsalakay ni Bonifacio sa Maynila (August 29–30, 1896: The Attack of Bonifacio in Manila). Quezon City: Miranda Bookstore.

Sarmiento, A. (2005) The Trial of Andres Bonifacio: The Appeal. Quezon City: University of the Philippines Press.

Bonus Army Unemployed Movement, 1932

Stacy Warner Maddern

In 1924 the US Congress voted to give the veterans of World War I a bonus consisting of $1.25 per day for overseas service and $1 a day for all remaining service. However, it stipulated that no payments would be made until 1945. In 1932, as the Great Depression worsened, some 15,000 unemployed veterans would make their way to Washington to demand payment of their bonuses. Members of this Bonus Expeditionary Force, later dubbed the Bonus Army, feeling ignored by the administration of President Herbert Hoover, embedded themselves in makeshift camps at Anacostia Flats across the river from the Capitol.

On June 17 the Senate voted on a bill already passed by the House to give veterans their bonuses in full. Local newspapers described it as "the tensest day in the Capitol since the war." After the bill was defeated by a vote of 62 to 18 a silent "death march" ensued in front of the Capitol for a month, disbanding on the day Congress adjourned. Unmoved by their action, Senator William Borah announced that he was unwilling to "vote for one penny for veterans as long as they are in the Capitol exerting pressure on the Congress by their physical presence."

Rather than leaving Washington after the legislative defeat, the Bonus Army dug in for an indefinite stay determined to have their demands met. Hoping to gain popular support, the veterans shifted their agenda to include “all suffering Americans,” a move that was plausible due to the looming economic depression that established the American family as a symbol worthy of political action. This was of great concern to District officials who, fearing a national movement, called for more extreme measures. In response, Attorney General Mitchell ordered that the veterans be removed from government property on July 28 in what would later become known as the Battle of Washington.

Led by newly appointed Chief of Staff General Douglas MacArthur, under the reluctant orders of President Herbert Hoover, the US Army drove its own veterans out of Washington by a military force that utilized tanks, cavalry, and bayonets. Those veterans who resisted were doused with tear gas until they withdrew and retreated across the river where Hoover had ordered MacArthur to stop. However, the General ignored the order and continued on to the Anacostia camp where, by nightfall, the remaining veterans were forced out of the District. Later, under MacArthur’s orders, the camp was torched, burning what was left of the Bonus Army to the ground. Major Dwight D. Eisenhower, who served as liaison to MacArthur, later wrote, “The whole scene was pitiful. The veterans were ragged, ill-fed, and felt themselves badly abused. To suddenly see the whole encampment going up in flames just added to the pity.”

Considering its place in United States history, the Bonus Army stands as a landmark of political protest that further extended the boundaries of justifying the presence of citizenry in the Capitol. In 1933 the Nation speculated that marches on Washington had become “a successful American technique for direct action.”

SEE ALSO: Coxey’s Army and the Unemployed Movement; Unemployed Protests

References and Suggested Readings

- Barber, L. G. (2002) Marching on Washington: The Forging of an American Political Tradition. Los Angeles: University of California Press.
- Daniels, R. (1971) The Bonus March: An Episode of the Great Depression. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.
- Dickson, P. & Allen, T. B. (2004) The Bonus Army: An American Epic. New York: Walker.

Bordiga, Amadeo (1889–1970) and the Italian Communist Party

Elvio Ciferri

Amadeo Bordiga was one of the founders and first secretary of the Italian Communist Party. Born in Resina, Bordiga joined the Socialist Party in 1910 and soon, as a student at the engineering faculty, became a leader of the socialist left in Naples, advocating the rejection of electoral alliances with radicals and democrats, to him a source of corruption and misleading of socialists, who should rather act as a working-class and militant force, and reject reformism. The new militant tendencies in social conflicts in 1912–14 were met by Bordiga with reaffirmation of Marxist principles, and he stood strongly against Italy’s participation in World War I.

The 1917 Russian Revolution provided him with further evidence of Marxist doctrine. He founded and edited Il Soviet, turning it into a national organ of a left-wing fraction of the Socialist Party at the 1919 Bologna Congress, advocating abstention as a means of political and revolutionary propaganda and gained nationwide visibility in the Red Biennium. Bordiga did not engage in social movements like Ordine Nuovo in Turin, but rather stressed working inside the party to strengthen his fraction so that it could turn as soon as possible into an independent Marxist revolutionary party. He went to Russia to attend the Second Congress of the Communist International, but although he stressed the similarity of his program to the Bolsheviks, he was criticized in Estremism by Lenin himself, who on the contrary stood for a revolutionary use of elections and parliaments, therefore rejecting abstention.

Bordiga accepted this rejection by Lenin and committed the fraction he led to split with the Socialist Party, as the Communist International indicated. The 1921 Leghorn Congress gave birth to a new Communist Party, although the majority of socialists stuck with the old party. Bordiga was the natural leader of a party that desired to stress its difference to socialists.

The Bordiga leadership of the Communist Party (PCd’I, later PCI) rejected any alliance with socialists and other popular parties in defense against mounting fascism, which he regarded as a temporary phenomenon to be identified with bourgeois reaction, and soon conflicted with the Moscow International that wanted PCd'I to engage in "united front" tactics against fascism and accept the Serrati "internationalist" fraction of PSI into the new party. On these issues, Bordiga led the party to near rupture with the 1922 Fourth Congress of the International. In spite of that, Bordiga's influence inside the Italian party was strong and the years to follow were at the same time years of repression (Bordiga was incarcerated in 1923 and years later confined) and of conflict within PCd'I. The long internal debate initiated by Gramsci ended with the Third PCd'I Congress in Lyon (France) and Bordiga's marginalization. He was expelled from the PCI in 1930 for his critical defense of Trotsky.

Bordiga was one of the first to criticize Stalin's Soviet Union as a form of state capitalism. During World War II he opposed any anti-fascist alliance, favoring the founding of the Partito Comunista Internazionalista, while his views were to influence also Lotta Comunista. The idea that "tactic is to be derived from principles" made his Marxism very consistent but unpopular and incapable of gaining wide support. Bordiga was an antagonist to Gramsci. In his later years he was a vigorous thinker and a prolific, and in some sense original, writer. He died in Formia on July 23, 1970.

SEE ALSO: Bolsheviks; Gramsci, Antonio (1891–1937); Italian Communist Party; Lenin, Vladimir Ilyich (1870–1924); Russia, Revolution of October/November 1917; Trotsky, Leon (1879–1940)

References and Suggested Readings

- De Felice, F. (1974) Serrati, Bordiga, Gramsci e il problema della rivoluzione in Italia. Bari: De Donato.
 Grilli, L. (1982) Amadeo Bordiga: capitalismo sovietico e comunismo. Milan: La Pietra.
 Peregalli, A. & Saggioro, S. (Eds.) (1995) Amadeo Bordiga (1889–1970). Bibliografia. Milan: Colibri.

Borge, Tomás (b. 1936)

Kerstin Ewald

Tomás Borge was the only founding member of the Nicaraguan Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN) to survive the revolutionary process leading to the Nicaraguan Revolution in 1979. As a socialist activist and guerilla commander within the FSLN, he took part in various steps to overthrow the Somoza regime in Nicaragua, including the unification of the popular movement and a nearly 20-year-long guerilla conflict. After the revolution and until his party was deselected in 1990, he was Nicaragua's minister of the interior. After the FSLN was reelected in 2006, he was delegated as the Nicaraguan ambassador to Peru.

Borge was born in Matagalpa, Nicaragua, and grew up during the time when Anastasio Somoza García ruled as dictator, relying on the Guardia Nacional (National Guard) to protect his rule. The Somoza dynasty ruled Nicaragua for 43 years, backed strongly by North American governments. Borge met Carlos Fonseca, the later FSLN leader, in Matagalpa, where both started to show their opposition to the dictator. When García was killed by Rigoberto López Pérez, Borge was taking part in a student resistance organization in León. As Borge was accused of involvement and of covering up the assassination, he was condemned to nine years' imprisonment. In 1959, a student campaign for the liberation of political prisoners led to the change of Borge's jail sentence into house arrest. He managed to escape, first to Honduras, and then to Costa Rica.

During this time he prepared for armed resistance. He attended military training as exiled Nicaraguans, supported by the Costa Rican Party of National Liberation, prepared armed operations. Later, together with Carlos Fonseca, Silvio Mayorga, and José Reyes Monterrey, Borge agitated among Nicaraguan migrants, who worked in Costa Rica on banana plantations or as shoemakers. In 1959 and 1960 he visited post-revolutionary Cuba and was deeply impressed by the personality of Fidel Castro, to whom he feels bound in friendship to this day. While in Cuba he furthered his military training. He was a member of the group that founded the FSLN in 1961–2, whose first crucial goal was to raise all forces against the Somoza dictatorship.

Borge supported an FSLN tendency that was defined by the strategy of prolonged popular war. This strategy included various means that were designed to lead to an insurrection by the whole Nicaraguan population after an armed vanguard had created the necessary political conditions. He took part in numerous guerilla operations such as bank robberies, the purchase of weapons, and training new combatants. In 1974 Borge prepared and supervised a raid on a farewell party given in honor of the US ambassador in which guerilla units took several Nicaraguan officials hostage, including foreign minister Alejandro Montiel Argüello and members of the Somoza family. This operation led to the liberation of Sandinist prisoners, including Daniel Ortega. Borge was once again arrested in 1976 by the Nicaraguan Security Police in Managua. After a press campaign that demanded a proper trial and fair treatment, he was put on trial and condemned to 180 years' imprisonment. He was liberated in 1978, when the FSLN occupied the National Palace.

After the Somozas' overthrow, Borge was minister of interior affairs from 1979 to 1990, representing the Marxist leftist wing of the FSLN government. Under his guidance, the interior ministry built up a large police and security apparatus for the Contra war. He was elected to the position of vice-general secretary of the FSLN in 1994 and remains in that office to the present day. During the 1990s Borge's popularity declined, due largely to the bankruptcy of the former party organ, the daily newspaper Barricada, while under his management. After the reelection of the FSLN Party in 2006, Borge was sent by the government of President Ortega as ambassador to Peru. As an author and journalist, Borge has also published poetry and several books about Latin American politicians.

SEE ALSO: Fonseca, Carlos (1936–1976); Nicaraguan Revolution, 1970s–1980s; Ortega, Daniel (b. 1945); Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN)

References and Suggested Readings

- Borge Martinez, T. (1992) The Patient Impatience. Willimantic: Curbstone Press.
- Hodges, D. C. (1987) Intellectual Foundations of the Nicaraguan Revolution. Austin: University of Texas Press.
- Vickers, G. R. (1990) A Spider's Web. Nacla 24, 1 (June). Available at www.nacla.org/node/2842 (downloaded May 2008).

Bose, Subhas Chandra (1897–1945)

Kunal Chattopadhyay

Subhas Chandra Bose, an Indian nationalist and advocate of armed struggle, was born on January 23, 1897. He was influenced in a nationalist direction from his schooldays. When he passed his Indian Civil Service (ICS) examinations from England in 1921, the nationalist struggle was proceeding in a radical direction. Subhas resigned from the ICS, choosing not to work as a voice of the colonial rulers. Returning to India in mid-1921, Subhas met Mahatma Gandhi. He was deeply respectful of Gandhi, but somewhat critical of Gandhi's strategy and promises of attaining swaraj (self-rule) in one year. The man who attracted him was Chittaranjan Das, a leading nationalist with contacts with revolutionary nationalists.

From Swarajya Party to Congress Leftism

In the second half of 1921, as the unquestioned leader of the national movement in Bengal, Das was passionately calling for Hindu-Muslim unity and for the end of bureaucratic rule and the installation of self-government. In this situation the Congress Working Committee (CWC) called for a boycott and a general strike and black flag demonstration wherever the Prince of Wales went in late November 1921. Put in charge of volunteers in Calcutta, Subhas was instrumental in organizing a total hartal (general strike, including shops, schools, courts). Overnight, he shot to fame as a rising national leader of Bengal, and imperialism responded by arresting him when the prince was scheduled to visit Calcutta.

Following the unilateral withdrawal of the Non-Cooperation movement by Gandhi in 1922, a section of the Indian National Congress wanted to take part in Assembly elections. Led by Das, Motilal Nehru, and others, they formed the Swarajya Party within the Congress, opposed by Gandhi loyalists. Bose, as the chief lieutenant of Das and unlike many Hindu nationalists, strongly supported the latter's policy of job reservation for Muslims in order to strengthen Hindu-Muslim unity in Muslim-majority Bengal.

In 1924 the Swarajya Party contested and won the Calcutta municipal corporation elections. Chittaranjan Das became the first Indian mayor of the corporation and Subhas Chandra Bose was appointed the chief executive officer of the corporation. Measures were undertaken designed to strengthen nationalist politics as well as provide some service to the people. Primary education was extended, dispensaries opened for free medical treatment of the poor, and in giving appointments the claims of Muslims and other deprived groups were prioritized. At the same time, family members of revolutionary nationalists were often given jobs, and this was viewed with a jaundiced eye by imperialism. On October 25, 1924 Bose was arrested along with a large number of radical Congressmen as suspected revolutionaries. He then spent nearly four years in prison, much of it in Mandalay in Upper Burma.

While historians like Leonard Gordon (1990) and Gautam Chattopadhyay (1997) have found no evidence of Bose being the mastermind behind the revolutionaries, as alleged by imperialism, it is true that Bose greatly admired the courage and self-sacrifice shown by the revolutionaries. It is now also well known that in 1922–4 he had extended help to former revolutionary nationalists who had become communists, like Nalini Gupta and Abani Mukherjee. In that sense, imperialism was right in paying such attention to him as a dangerous man.

Prison treatment in Mandalay was very rough, and in protest the prisoners went on hunger strike from February 22, 1926. It was lifted on March 4, after the prison authorities acceded to some of their demands. But Bose's health was shattered and he would join full political work only from 1928.

In the late 1920s, following the death of C. R. Das, the Bengal Congress was divided between supporters of Jatindra Mohan Sengupta and Subhas. A powerful surge of the working-class movement, led by the young Communist Party of India (CPI), had arisen in 1927 and by 1928 had assumed massive dimensions. The CPI wanted wider links with the nationalist movement, especially leftists like Jawaharlal Nehru and Bose. Bose welcomed workers' struggles but feared that the CPI might turn the working-class struggle into an alternative to the nationalist movement. In 1928 there was almost a confrontation during the Calcutta session of the Congress. In it, left nationalists like Jawaharlal Nehru and Bose were thwarted by Gandhi in their bid to pass a resolution calling for complete independence. Yet when a procession of 50,000 red-flag waving workers turned up at the Congress session, Bose as the volunteer in charge tried to block the procession. Only the intervention of Motilal Nehru, president of the session, allowed the workers to come in and hold a short meeting. The incident profoundly impressed Subhas, and turned him to closer collaboration with the communists. In 1929, when Sir John Simon was appointed to head an all-white commission to take a look at further constitutional changes in India, Bose and the communists united to organize a total hartal on January 19, along with a demonstration of nearly 100,000 people. By slapping the Meerut Conspiracy Case (1929) on prominent trade union leaders, and the Second Lahore Conspiracy Case against members of the Hindustan Socialist Republican Association, imperialism was pushing left nationalists and communists closer. Within the Congress, too, Subhas Bose was emerging as a major leader of the leftists, opposing not only traditional moderates but also Gandhi. As a result, at the Lahore Congress, Subhas and his close ally Srinivas Iyengar were kept out of the CWC. Back in Calcutta he was given a one-year imprisonment term for a case previously launched against him.

Bose was elected the mayor of Calcutta on August 22, 1930, while still in prison. But after his release on September 23 in his speech during the oath-taking ceremony, Subhas suggested that in India there was a need to combine the justice, equality, and love in socialism with the efficiency and discipline of fascism. On January 26, 1931, while trying to hoist the national flag at the Calcutta Maidan (a large open field), Bose was beaten up by the police, kept in a lock-up for a day with no food or medical attention, and then sentenced by a magistrate to six months' imprisonment.

The countrywide civil disobedience movement launched by Gandhi in 1930 subsided in 1931 when the Gandhi-Irwin Pact was signed. It was perceived as a great comedown, for after proclaiming the demand for independence, the Congress was agreeing to suspend the movement in exchange for relatively paltry concessions. A special meeting of the Congress was called at Karachi towards the end of March 1931. The youth of India condemned the Gandhi-Irwin Pact. While presiding over the Annual Conference of the Naujawan Bharat Sabha (Young India Association) founded by Bhagat Singh, a nationalist revolutionary hanged a few days previously in March 1931, Bose criticized the Gandhi-Irwin Pact but told the youth that they could not denounce their commander (Gandhi) in the middle of the struggle. The same logic made him criticize the pact in the Subjects Committee but speak for it in the full Congress session. Only a handful of communists and revolutionaries present as delegates voted against the pact. But the forebodings of Bose were correct, and the Gandhi-Irwin Pact only benefited imperialism. The Round Table Conference was a failure, and a second round of struggle began. In 1932 Subhas was arrested again. He fell ill in prison and doctors diagnosed tuberculosis. The British government ultimately agreed to release him only on condition that he should leave India.

Europe and Fascism

Between early 1933 and March 1936 Bose lived in Europe. He met Mussolini and expressed his admiration for the efficiency of the fascist state. In 1938, confronted on this issue by Communist Party of Great Britain leader R. Palme-Dutt, he responded that when he had expressed his admiration, fascism had not yet shown its imperialist tendencies, the focal point of his admiration being the strong state, which he wanted in India as well. Yet he also condemned the Italian invasion of Abyssinia and hailed the struggle of the Abyssinians. He also criticized Hitler openly when the latter made some anti-Indian remarks. His reactions to fascism, unlike that of Nehru, who was influenced by the Marxist views of fascism, were colored chiefly by his perspective of an Indian nationalist for whom British imperialism was the main enemy, and Germany, Italy, and the Soviet Union were all equally potential allies. He returned to India, was arrested on April 8, 1936, and imprisoned until March 1937.

Leader of the Left

The growth of the left inside the Congress led to the election of leftist presidents for several years. In 1936 and 1937 Jawaharlal Nehru was twice elected president. He called for scientific socialism and condemned imperialism and fascism, which had a great impact regardless of the fact that he always deferred to Gandhi in the end. The Congress right wing tried to put pressure on him. Surprisingly, Subhas at this juncture remained silent. In his book The Indian Struggle he mentioned only the Congress Socialist Party (CSP) leaders among the left, and not the communists or Royists (followers of the ex-communist M. N. Roy). In January 1938, while again in England, he received news that he had been elected Congress president. But he found that the Working Committee was heavily stacked with right wingers. In 1939 as the presidential candidate of all the left forces, Subhas defeated

Gandhi-backed right-wing candidate Pattavi Sitaramayyah, a defeat that Gandhi conceded was his own defeat. But the right struck back. On February 22, 1939 all CWC members, including Jawaharlal Nehru, and excluding just the brothers Subhas Chandra and Sarat Chandra Bose, resigned. The left urged Bose to set up a strongly leftist CWC.

At the Tripuri session of the Congress, Govind Ballabh Pant moved a resolution expressing full confidence in Gandhi and asking the president to nominate the Working Committee in accordance with the wishes of Gandhi. In full session, the CSP leaders decided to abstain, and as a result the left was defeated. Instead of resolutely selecting a left-wing Working Committee, Subhas Chandra ultimately tendered his resignation as Congress president. On May 3, 1939 he formed a new group within the Congress, named the Forward Bloc. He wanted it to unite all radical and anti-imperialist progressive elements on the basis of a minimum common program. In mid-June, seeing that other left trends were not joining, the Forward Bloc Conference called for the formation of a Left Consolidation Committee, with equal representation for the CSP, the Royists, the CPI, and the Forward Bloc. But neither the CPI nor the CSP wanted to join the Forward Bloc, for they argued it would lead to a split in the national movement. This showed a lack of confidence in the political consistency of Bose. Moreover, as a result of the Popular Front line of the Communist International, the CPI was hesitant to fight for hegemony within the national movement, conceding leadership to the bourgeoisie. This made them spurn Bose's offer.

Meanwhile, the Congress high command now proceeded to action after action against Subhas Chandra. When he called for July 9, 1939 to be Left Day, the high command banned it, and when he went ahead, he was removed from his position as president of the Bengal Provincial Congress Committee. Rabindranath Tagore, the great poet, made one of his rare interventions in politics, requesting Gandhi to reconsider the measure, but Gandhi turned him down. Jawaharlal Nehru, the idol of the left, showed once again that he would not move a step against Gandhi, and in a letter of March 2, 1940, dismissed Bose as talking "arrant nonsense."

One of Bose's achievements as Congress president was to initiate discussions on planned economic development for a free India, based on the experience of the Soviet Five Year Plans.

Ultimately, this would result in the Planning Commission and the Indian Five Year Plans.

When World War II began, the CWC met at Wardha, and Bose was invited. The committee unanimously decided not to support the war effort unless the British government gave assurances that India would become independent after the war. Bose wanted to go beyond this and utilize the crisis to further the freedom struggle by force of arms. When the Congress held its annual session at Ramgarh in 1940, Bose held a parallel meeting, the Anti-Compromise Conference. Thousands of peasants were mobilized for it by his ally, Swami Sahajanand Saraswati. His speech at Ramgarh shows he was not praising the Nazis but was willing to seek help from them. On July 2 Bose was arrested. He went on hunger strike to secure release from jail, and then planned an escape from India with the help of the communists of Punjab. Helped by the young communist Bhagat Ram Talwar of Peshawar, he escaped to Afghanistan. There, the Soviet Embassy did not entertain his requests seriously, but the German and Italian embassies were more responsive. In the first week of April 1941 he reached Berlin via the Soviet Union. A new phase in his political career began.

Armed Struggle

What Bose did not know was that Operation Barbarossa was already sanctioned. On June 22, 1941 Hitler invaded the USSR, declaring that what India was for England, the Russian territories would be for Germany. Bose knew nothing of this and hoped for German support for the cause of Indian independence. Ribbentrop, the Nazi foreign minister, promised German aid, but refused to recognize the Free India Government set up by Bose.

During his previous European tours Bose had met Emilie Schenkel, and now he married her. In India this was disbelieved for a long time, because after his death he was turned into a cult figure, and cult followers had a difficult time accepting that their hero had married a non-Indian. In May 1941 he went to Italy. The Italian minister of foreign affairs Ciano's diary shows that the Italians also regarded him as little more than an upstart.

The German invasion of the USSR came as a shock and Bose reacted sharply. German secret service reports show him as taking the stance that Germany was an imperialist aggressor. By the end of 1942 Bose had become convinced that Germany would not give him real help to wage armed struggle. Meanwhile, Japan had begun its war with the western Allies. So Bose left by submarine on February 8, 1943, with only one Indian assistant, Abid Hasan, transferring to a Japanese submarine on April 24.

Subhas's relationship with the Japanese government was much better. On June 10, 1943 Prime Minister Tojo met him, and two days later he was invited to the Japanese parliament. On June 19 he held a press conference. He then moved on to Singapore, where Captain Mohan Singh had organized out of the Indian prisoners of war a free Indian army. Bose was to rename this the Azad Hind Fauz (Indian National Army) (INA). A veteran revolutionary, Rashbehari Bose, had been living in Japan for many years. On July 4, 1943 he presented Subhas to a cheering crowd. Three and a half months later, in October 1943, Bose publicly announced from the Cathay Theatre of Singapore the formation of an Azad Hind (Free Indian) government. The tides of war had already started moving against Japan. But Subhas Chandra nonetheless persuaded them to attack India from Manipur, neighboring Burma in the northeast corner.

Bose's decision to ally with the Japanese has been questioned, as many argue that had Japan been victorious, he would have been as much a puppet as the Manchukuo ruler Pu-Yi. Bose was not unaware of the danger. But he sought consistently to establish his autonomy, including the military autonomy of the INA. Moreover, he probably felt that the Japanese were already stretched too far to try and hold India against its will. But Bose does seem to have ignored the terrible way in which Japan treated the peoples in the Asian countries it occupied as part of the Greater East Asian Co-Prosperity Sphere. Nonetheless, the accusation that he was a Quisling, made by the CPI, was incorrect. He refused to fight any enemy except the British. When Aung San rose in revolt in Burma, Bose refused to let the Japanese use the INA against Aung San's soldiers.

The INA itself was organized in a secular manner. Though himself a religious person, Bose did not allow religion to dictate politics. The units of the INA were named after national leaders. From the beginning, Bose laid emphasis on recruiting women. A young Tamil doctor, Lakshmi Swaminathan, who was recruited, became the leader of the women's battalion, the Rani of Jhansi regiment.

On May 25, 1945, when the war was virtually lost, in a speech delivered from Singapore, Bose warned that wartime alliances would no longer hold good, and the war aims of the USSR and those of the western powers being different, there would be a clash. When Japan surrendered, he tried to fly to the Red Army in Darien, accompanied by an aide, Habibur Rahman. But his plane crashed almost immediately after taking off. Habibur Rahman's testimony is that in hospital a badly injured man next to him told him he was Subhas Chandra. Bose told him to tell his countrymen that he had fought to the last for the freedom of his country. A peculiar Bengali sentimentalism refuses to accept that he died in the air crash, though the evidence clearly points in that direction.

SEE ALSO: Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand (1869–1948); India, Armed Struggle in the Independence Movement; India, Civil Disobedience Movement and Demand for Independence; India, Non-Violent Non-Cooperation Movement, 1918–1929; Nehru, Jawaharlal (1889–1964)

References and Suggested Readings

- Bose, S. C. (1996) The Indian Struggle 1920–1942. Calcutta: Oxford University Press.
- Bose, S. K., Werth, A., & Ayer, S. A. (Eds.) (1973) A Beacon Across Asia: A Biography of Subhas Chandra Bose. New Delhi: Orient Longman.
- Chakrabarty, B. (1990) Subhas Chandra Bose and Middle Class Radicalism: A Study in Indian Nationalism, 1928–1940. New York: St. Martin's Press.
- Chattopadhyay, G. (1997) Subhas Chandra Bose, The Indian Leftists and Communists. New Delhi: People's Publishing House.
- Gordon, L. (1990) Brothers Against the Raj – A Biography of Indian Nationalists Sarat and Subhas Chandra Bose. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Kumar, R. (Ed.) (1992) Subhas Chandra Bose: Correspondence and Selected Documents, 1930–1942. New Delhi: Inter-India.
- Toye, H. (1991) The Springing Tiger: Subhas Chandra Bose. Bombay: Jaico.

Boston Tea Party

Nathan King

The Boston Tea Party was, on the surface, an act of protest against a monopoly that the East India Company held on tea importation. More significant in the broader scheme of US history, however, the Boston Tea Party popularized

An early act of civil disobedience against the British government, the Boston Tea Party is seen as an iconic moment and one of the catalysts of the American Revolution. In this eighteenth-century hand-colored lithograph (artist unknown), the “Sons of Liberty” throw 90,000 lbs. of non-taxed tea belonging to the British East India Company into the Charles River. The Tea Act of 1773, passed by the British parliament, undermined colonial tea merchants by removing any taxes levied on tea imported to the US colonies by the British East India Company. (Private Collection / The Bridgeman Art Library)

one of the most important rallying cries of the American Revolution: “No taxation without representation.”

By the eighteenth century tea was a mainstay in the diet of a majority of Great Britain and her colonies. By the 1760s illegal importation of tea into the British colonies was rampant, and in 1767 the Townshend Act was passed in an effort to curb illegal tea imports. The plan would have worked had the East India Company been able to sustain a low price, but by 1771 tea prices were steady at 3 shillings per pound, and Dutch tea was illegally imported into the colonies and sold for under 2 shillings per pound. In June 1773 parliament passed a statute that allowed the East India Company to be its own exporter and to open branch houses in the colonies. Colonists were outraged at the favoritism shown to the East India Company by the government and the creation of a monopoly on tea. By November 1773 Samuel Adams, John Hancock, and other Bostonians began to organize town meetings at the Old South Meeting House to decide what action to take in response to the importation of dutied teas by the East India Company into Boston.

Throughout November 1773 members of the town hall meeting demanded the resignation of tea consignees of the East India Company. The consignees denied their requests. At the town hall meeting of November 30, 1773 a resolution was passed to prevent the landing and sale of dutied tea. The Dartmouth landed in Boston with tea in late November, but was prevented from unloading its tea. The colonists used Mr. Rotch, partner of the Dartmouth, to appeal to Governor Hutchinson to send the tea back to England. The governor refused. On the night of December 16, 1773 one last town hall meeting was held and the governor's response was given. Within a few minutes there was yelling in streets near Griffins Wharf as people disguised as "Indians" raided the Dartmouth, Eleanour, and Beaver. All of the tea aboard the ships was thrown overboard. The Boston Tea Party had occurred.

Parliament was appalled by the Boston Tea Party. It called it an act of vandalism and condemned it. It responded with the Coercive or Intolerable Acts that closed the Boston port until the tea was paid for, restricted town meetings and local authority, and eventually introduced the Quartering Act.

SEE ALSO: American Revolution of 1776

References and Suggested Readings

- Labaree, B. W. (1964) The Boston Tea Party. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Mui, H. & Mui, L. H. (1968) Smuggling and the British Sea Trade before 1784. American Historical Review 74, 1 (October): 44–73.
- Puls, M. (2006) Samuel Adams: Father of the American Revolution. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Schlesinger, A. M. (1917) The Uprising Against the East India Company. Political Science Quarterly 32, 1 (March): 60–79.

Botswana, protest and nationalism

Wazha Gilbert Morapedi

Botswana (formerly the Bechuanaland Protectorate) was one of three British dependencies in southern Africa, and is roughly the size of France. A landlocked country long surrounded by white-minority ruled states in southern Africa, a region marked by war and conflict, Botswana was notable for its peaceful road to independence and sustained parliamentary democracy. The people of the country are often called Batswana, but the term also includes ethnic groups that do not speak the Setswana language: the Bakalanga, Bakgalagadi, Bayei, Baherero, Basubiya, Batswapong, Babirwa, and Basarwa (derogatively called Bushmen). The Setswana-speaking groups are the Bangwato, Bangwaketse, Bakwena, Barolong, Bakgatla, Balete, Batawana, and Batlokwa.

Pre-Colonial Times and the Bechuanaland Protectorate

The non-Setswana-speaking tribes were, since pre-colonial times, regarded as subject groups subordinated to the Setswana, who, in turn, were traditionally ruled by dikgosi (chiefs) in hierarchical societies headed by the dikgosana (nobles), followed by bafaladi (foreigners recently absorbed into tribes), and malata (hereditary serfs) who paid tribute and labor; the latter were largely Basarwa or Bakgalagadi.

Britain declared a protectorate over Botswana in 1885 during the Scramble for Africa, mainly for strategic reasons. Batswana lands were being eyed by the Afrikaners in the Transvaal (today, part of South Africa), and the Germans in South West Africa (now Namibia). Britain viewed Bechuanaland mainly as part of a corridor connecting the Cape in South Africa to its colonies in Central Africa. Cecil Rhodes, one-time Cape premier, owner of the British South Africa Company (BSAC), and ardent imperialist, also wanted Bechuanaland a white settler colony.

The British government retained much of the traditional social structure as part of a system of indirect rule. The declaration of the protectorate was met with opposition by several Batswana dikgosi, mainly Sekgoma Letsholathebe of Batawana, Gaseitsiwe of Bangwaketse, and Sechele and his son Sebele of Bakwena. These dikgosi questioned the usefulness of British protection, as they had earlier managed to ward-off conquest, and they feared interference in their prerogatives. In the end they reluctantly accepted the protectorate. The colonial administration imposed taxes and a host of laws to govern the country. Despite the proviso that Batswana rulers would rule as they had previously, some legislation undermined the chiefs, reducing their powers and subordinating them to British authorities in the 1890s. The high commissioner of the protectorate was armed with powers to punish or even depose dikgosi. Recalcitrant dikgosi like Sebele I of Bakwena were threatened with deposition, and Sekgoma Letsholathebe of the Batawana was in fact deposed in 1906 for refusing to cooperate.

However, when Britain considered transferring the Protectorate to BSAC rule to avoid shouldering unnecessary costs (along the lines of Southern Rhodesia, now Zimbabwe), Batswana dikgosi resisted tenaciously, as they viewed company rule as exploitative; they preferred protectorate status. The dikgosi finally succeeded after visiting England in 1895, where they received public support against a BSAC takeover. "Throughout the first part of the colonial period, the chiefs acted individually and collectively to prevent their own absolute subordination to Britain and the dissolution of their respective tribal nations" (Parson 1984: 27).

The population of Bechuanaland was small, with the first census in 1911 showing about 123,000 Africans and about 600 Europeans; the largest ethnic group was the Bangwato (34,886), followed by the Bangwaketse (18,098). The whites were mainly engaged as freehold farmers and general dealers, or employed in the government bureaucracy, mainly as district commissioners, clerks, superintendents of works, teachers, and nurses. They did not constitute a working class, nor form unions or professional associations. Even in 1946 the census showed a total population of only 304,000.

Rise of Batswana Nationalism

It was in the 1920s that early forms of what can be termed Batswana nationalism emerged. From the beginning of colonial rule Britain neglected the development of Bechuanaland, which provided Batswana nationalists with ammunition against the colonial power. Throughout the colonial period the capital was located at Mafeking in South Africa; there were few modern urban centers, and hardly any industrial development. There was also significant land alienation to whites in the 1890s and early 1900s, mainly in areas ceded as freehold farms like the Tuli block, the Ghanzi block, the Gaborone and Lobatse farms, and the Tati Concession.

Discontent can be traced to the early 1920s, when a growing number of young educated citizens started to demand greater participation in administering the country, and came to view representation via the dikgosi as inadequate. In part to address this discontent and pressure, the colonial administration set up the Native (later African) Advisory Council (AAC) in 1919, as well as a European Advisory Council for whites. The AAC was an advisory body composed of representatives from different tribes, and was meant to advise the government. Although the AAC was only an advisory body, Africans used it as a platform to criticize the racial discrimination prevalent in government service, low salaries for Africans in government employment, lack of economic development, and the lack of educational and health facilities. (Discrimination also had an ethnic dimension, mainly directed against the subject tribes; for instance, the Batawana regent blocked the appointment to a government job of Motsamai Mpho, an educated Moyei, later a notable activist. Black South Africans were also often recruited in place of Batswana.) When Britain, which continued to regard the colony as economically unsustainable, considered incorporating it into the recently formed Union of South Africa, Africans like the Bangwato regent Tshekedi Khama and the Bangwaketse kgosi Bathoen II used the AAC to oppose this move.

The AAC scored some successes. The educated Batswana in the council were usually united across ethnic lines and spoke for the whole country. The council made some useful suggestions on improvements in the administration. AAC members championed improvements in education, health, and agriculture. Crucially, the AAC provided "a training ground for self-rule later" (Tlou & Campbell 1997: 245). Although the AAC is often overlooked because of its advisory nature, it sensitized the British to the needs of Batswana when formulating policies because it became a platform from which Batswana exposed the limitations of colonial rule. Some modest developments in education and agriculture were also made.

Although mass politics and militant nationalism really started in the 1950s, these were built upon two strands of intellectual nationalism dating to the 1920s. The first centered on progressive chieftainship and was spearheaded by dikgosi Tshekedi Khama, Bathoen II and Seepapitso I of the Bangwaketse, and regent Isang of the Bakgatla, who called for a body with real legislative powers. These educated chiefs "held progressive ideas of economic development and of bureaucratizing their administrative machinery" (Picard 1985: 13). They stressed presenting a united front to the colonial authorities, and appealed to the precedent of the dikgosi who went to London in a united delegation in 1895. It should however be noted that despite their progressive ideas, these dikgosi were firm in the defense of their aristocratic privileges. They wanted, above all, to preserve their autonomy and avoid colonial interference in the administration of the tribes.

The second strand of nationalist movements from the 1920s and 1930s was that of intellectual democratic nationalism led by men such as Simon Ratshosa and S. M. Molema. These men were different from the progressive dikgosi in their education and background: they did not possess the power and influence of traditional society. They adopted a form of bourgeois nationalism, which wanted Bechuanaland to move towards a western-type elected parliamentary state, and end what Ratshosa regarded as the dictatorial and feudal practices of the chiefs. Ratshosa was a nationalist who called for a united Botswana nation, led by a national intelligentsia, and inclusive of the subject tribes. He was well educated and became a teacher and then head teacher of primary schools in Serowe. Ratshosa was an idealist, but not a revolutionary; his type of nationalism was against the authority of the dikgosi but it was also reformist and non-socialist. This brand of nationalism was crucial to the transformation of Bechuanaland, as it provides a critical antecedent to the anti-colonial nationalism that emerged later. Although Ratshosa was not a revolutionary, his call for a western-type parliamentary system was a significant development in a period when Batswana leaders were largely concerned with opposing incorporation of the country into South Africa and maintaining British overrule.

There was also some nationalist and socialist influence from neighboring South Africa in the 1920s. Marxist intellectuals from that country regarded Bechuanaland as a labor reserve and held that the chiefs ruled on behalf of imperialism. Batswana had started migrating to South Africa in significant numbers following the discovery of diamonds and gold in Kimberley and the Witwatersrand in 1886 and 1884, respectively. The rates of migration followed an upward trend until the 1980s. At the time of the declaration of the protectorate, Bechuanaland was a very poor country, with an economy based on subsistence agriculture. Beef exports to South Africa were the country's main source of income. The society was also highly stratified, with cattle ownership largely in the hands of a few, mainly notables. There were very few wage-earning opportunities within the country, and the high levels of poverty contributed to mounting migration rates.

In line with their stress on industrial and African recruitment, members of the Communist Party of South Africa (CPSA), and its successor the South African Communist Party (SACP), recruited Batswana mine laborers. Some Batswana attended night schools and party meetings in South Africa. Efforts were also made to spread propaganda in the Protectorate through the clandestine distribution of the party newspapers Umsebenzi and Inkululeko. Following the banishment of kgosi Sebele II in 1931 to Ghanzi, and the temporary suspension and banishment of Tshekedi to Francistown in 1933 for flogging a white man, Umsebenzi called for the establishment of an independent republic of Botswana. Although the agitation of the 1920s and 1930s did not achieve much, it was a forerunner of later struggles.

“Reformist” Phase, 1945–1959

The next phase of protest in Bechuanaland was a “reformist” stage when no nationalist or political party emerged: associations and small groups were formed with the intention of improving members' welfare. Batswana, like Africans elsewhere, focused on an improvement in conditions within the existing colonial framework. Batswana working outside the country learnt about mutual aid groups, like burial societies and sporting clubs, and formed a number of associations abroad, like the Bechuanaland Cultural Club in Southern Rhodesia.

In 1954 the nationalist leader Leetile Raditladi formed the Francistown African Cultural Organization for educated residents of the African townships. This body was succeeded by the Tatitown Cultural Organization in 1959. Francistown was the oldest town in Bechuanaland and was the country's industrial and commercial center. The organization was the first body to openly discuss political issues in the country, and it was a crucial building block towards decolonization nationalism because its members later played a key role in forming the first mass-based political party in the country: the Botswana People's Party (BPP), formed in December 1960. Several other small and loosely organized sporting clubs and cultural groups emerged throughout the Protectorate in the late 1940s, and, among other things, discussed political issues.

Rise of Organized Labor

Trade unionism was another weapon of protest used by Batswana to transform the country during the reformist stage. Unions were a rather belated development and remained small because of the low level of economic development in the country. In 1949 the African Civil Service Association was formed to promote and protect the rights of African workers in the civil service. Africans in the tribal administration endured poor working conditions and low pay. Senior and better-paying positions were held by whites, and Africans occupied the lower rungs under white supervision. Educated Africans with widespread experience were not promoted to top positions. The association called for the protection of African rights, promotion of qualified Africans, and better pay for all ranks. It criticized the lack of adequate educational facilities in the country, which resulted in the recruitment of many black South Africans. Due to pressure from the association some Africans were elevated to higher positions in the early 1960s.

Because of unfavorable working conditions in the civil service, Africans had formed the Bechuanaland Protectorate African Teachers Association (BPATA) in 1937. Working conditions for teachers were even poorer than for other civil servants. They had lower salaries, no benefits from the pension fund, and lacked accommodation and adequate classrooms. This body also called for the participation of teachers in curriculum development. It scored some successes, as a provident fund was later established to provide a retirement income for teachers.

Industrial unions also emerged. Unionism in Bechuanaland was clearly influenced by both African workers' activities in the neighboring countries of Southern Rhodesia and South Africa. For example, Batswana working outside the country like Knight Maripe and Kenneth Nkhwa were prominent leaders of the transnational Rhodesia Railways African Workers Union (RAWU), and applied their experience in Bechuanaland.

Local conditions also contributed to workers forming unions to advance their rights. In Francistown workers often worked 12 hours a day instead of the stipulated 10; wages were very low, while the cost of living was very high, particularly after World War II. The government did not stipulate minimum wages, living conditions were squalid, and squatting mushroomed in the town. Workers in Francistown were also subjected to racial discrimination: white employees received higher salaries regardless of qualification. Because they were exploited, racially discriminated against, and denied any prospects of a better future, workers formed the Francistown African Employees Union (FAEU) in 1948. The goals of the FAEU were to regulate relations between members, to protect and further their interests in relation to employers, to encourage settlement of disputes by conciliatory methods, and to assist members to obtain employment. The FAEU made some gains, winning an 8-hour day; in 1949 it succeeded in negotiating a 2.5 percent increase in wages of workers in the Francistown creamery. It collapsed in 1958 for several reasons. Peaceful negotiation did not always succeed, and the union shied away from strikes. It lacked a clear-cut ideology and strategy, and inefficient leadership was a source of weakness. There were also allegations of embezzlement of funds. The union did not have a strategy of collective bargaining. The low level of economic development hampered the union because it was difficult to organize the small number of workers.

In 1957 the Bechuanaland Protectorate Workers Union was formed in Serowe at the instigation of the progressive chief Tshekedi Khama. Members of this union included shop assistants, domestic servants, and low-paid tribal administration employees. Its objectives were to secure satisfactory working conditions for African employees by constitutional means, and to secure and maintain reasonable hours, wages, and other conditions. The union intended to do all in its power to improve the social and economic conditions of members and to make representations to the Chamber of Commerce, the African Traders' Union, and other organizations and persons who employed Africans. It was successful in obtaining the release of garage workers and those in the tribal administration during the plowing season. However, the union was also short-lived and collapsed in the mid-1960s. It had no clearly stated ideology or working-class guiding principles. The leadership was inexperienced, ineffective, and lacked initiative. It also did not fare well as far as collective bargaining was concerned, and it suffered because of the low level of industrial development.

The other notable trade unions formed in the early 1960s were the Bechuanaland Trade Union Congress (BTUC) and the Bechuanaland Federation of Labour (BFL) in 1962. Both were influenced by the newly formed nationalist political parties. The BTUC was influenced by the radical and Pan-Africanist BPP, while the BFL was influenced by the moderate Bechuanaland Democratic Party (BDP) of Seretse Khama, which was formed in 1962. The BTUC was more radical than earlier unions because of the influence of the BPP: its declaration of principles demanded the unity of the working class regardless of color, ethnicity, or creed, and it strove to form alliances with the progressive sections of society in the struggle for economic and political emancipation. The objectives of the BTUC were to coordinate the activities and interests of unions in Bechuanaland, to organize the unorganized, to oppose discrimination in employment, to fight for equal pay for equal work, and to promote the democratic rights of workers. These high ideals were a radical departure from those of the FAEU and BPWU.

The BTUC inspired workers with hopes of better working conditions and wages. It drew its inspiration from the dynamism provided by the first wave of African decolonization struggles, which it saw as symbolized by the BPP. Working closely with the BPP in its political rallies, the BTUC made tireless efforts to expose the plight of workers and improve their working conditions. In 1963 the BTUC made strong representation to the labor officer responsible for enforcing colonial labor laws and mediating employer-employee relationships concerning the conditions at the Tati beer hall in Francistown. It protested that employees worked 56 hours a week instead of the stipulated 45, earned low wages, had no clearly defined leave days, and were not supplied with protective clothing. These protests led to an enquiry that confirmed that workers worked 10 hours more than the norm. The labor officer also successfully requested an increase in wages and provision of protective clothing to the management of the beer hall, to the credit of the BTUC.

The union was relentless. In August 1963 it decried the working conditions at the Lozi quarry near Mahalapye, where workers worked with dangerous stones but without protective clothing; they were not provided with accommodation. A committee appointed to look into the union's charges confirmed most of them. The management conceded some union demands, increased wages, and provided free accommodation and protective clothing. It also provided for 26 days of paid leave.

In short, BTUC strategy centered on the identification of workers' concerns, and then presenting grievances, and it evidently achieved some success. Yet by the end of 1965 it was in decline. One of the main reasons for this was the absence of Klaas Motshidisi, its secretary general and the most experienced and dedicated official. The union faced the general problem of low industrial development, and its fate remained tied to a small leadership.

Mass Politics and Nationalism

Mass anti-colonial nationalism really only started in the late 1950s. This was largely due to "a peculiar twentieth-century relationship between nationalist sentiment and support for British overrule, and the survival of traditional Tswana political culture within the colonial context" (Ramsay 1988: 101).

For most of the colonial period Batswana were largely concerned with the struggle against incorporation into South Africa. Until the last decade of the colonial period nationalists generally favored retaining British overrule rather than ending it, as it was deemed preferable to incorporation into white-ruled South Africa or Southern Rhodesia. However, the situation altered. The likelihood of transfer to South Africa receded after the 1948 elections which put the National Party in power. Independence then became seen as a viable option. At the same time, many activists had put their energies into political movements in South Africa itself, developing activists like Mpho and Philip Matante who would later bring the lessons learnt in South African movements to bear in organizing political parties in Bechuanaland.

Another factor that hindered the emergence of political parties was the extent to which the traditional Setswana political culture continued to operate as both a weapon for local activism as well as an effective tool of colonial control. Even the nationalists drew on this style of politics: thus, Seretse Khama – later Botswana's first president – was regarded as a kgosi and drew much of his support from this status, even while he stood for a multi-party democratic parliamentary system. Politics was in this sense based on continuity and set for peaceful transition.

From the 1950s the constitutional transformation that would ultimately usher in independence developed rapidly. In the late 1940s Batswana in the AAC called for the setting up of a Joint Advisory Council (JAC) because they were against the existence of the two separate councils for Africans and whites, which they regarded as divisive and likely to lead to the adoption of racist laws that were practiced in white-ruled neighboring states. The JAC was formed in 1950 with equal representatives from both councils. Africans then used the JAC to demand increased participation in administering the country. The JAC was an important organ in the transformation of the country because from 1956 to 1965, when self-government was achieved, its members – together with its successor, the Legislative Council (Legco) – cooperated in creating a non-racial nation. Africans in the JAC continued to use it as a platform to criticize British colonialism in Bechuanaland, especially the lack of economic development and continuing racial practices.

The establishment of Legcos in British colonies was a crucial step towards self-rule. Originally, Legcos were reserved for whites and meant to enable greater participation in ruling the country. Eventually, Legcos were extended to largely African colonies to allow Africans to participate in governance. In Bechuanaland the administration resisted the formation of a Legco because it was content with the existing councils. However, as Legcos involving Africans were established in many British African colonies, Batswana also demanded a Legco in place of existing councils, regarded as powerless. Moreover, a Legco was seen as a step towards independence. After kgosi Bathoen's call for a Legco was rejected by the resident commissioner and the white members of the JAC in 1952, he, together with Seretse Khama, Tshekedi Khama, and M. Kgasa, tabled a motion at the JAC for the speedy setting up of a Legco. The Legco was set up in 1960 with equal numbers of Africans and whites (although Africans were a majority in the country). The Asian population was represented by one member. The EAC, AAC, and JAC were all dissolved into the Legco. With the founding of the Legco the process was started for the country to move through the constitutional phases towards independence. The Legco was also used by Africans to criticize the colonial government for its failure to develop the country, and to make suggestions for various improvements. Batswana also used the Legco to demand independence.

The development of mass party politics in Bechuanaland is coterminous with the period 1957–66. This was the period of the bourgeois democratic nationalism of the “new man,” as opposed to the earlier traditionalist nationalism of the dikgosi and the intellectual nationalism of men such as Ratshosa (Picard 1985: 16–17). By 1957 a core of the “new” nationalists had gathered around Seretse Khama. Several nationalist leaders had attended school and worked in South Africa, where they became involved in that country's African nationalist movements: these included Kgalemang Motsete, Matante, and Mpho. Before the nationalist movement was banned by the apartheid regime in 1960, many Batswana who might have become involved in nationalist politics at home had directed their energies to what they viewed as the more fundamental issue of the minority regime in South Africa. With a Pan-Africanist outlook, they had approached the problem of decolonization regionally, and perhaps also thought that change in Bechuanaland was dependent on change in South Africa. It really was only when prospects for change diminished in South Africa after 1960 that these activists returned to Bechuanaland to engage in nationalist politics.

The first real attempt to form a countrywide political party was in April 1959 when Raditladi, who had connections to the Bangwato royalty, formed the Bechuanaland Protectorate Federal Party (BFP). The formation of the party was linked to his aim of influencing the results of the ongoing talks about the composition of the Legco. He believed the Legco would be dominated by the JAC, which he distrusted as a coalition of whites and dikgosi. Raditladi also wanted to counter the reemergence of his old rival, Tshekedi Khama, as the dominant political figure in the Bangwato area. The BFP wanted the federation of tribes and greater representation for non-royals in running the country. It also called for use of the ballot to replace hereditary appointments to political office. The BFP opposed the racial composition of the Legco because it believed this encouraged racism. Some of its members later played crucial roles in forming other parties, such as Matante of the BPP and Archie Tsoebebe of the BDP. In November 1959 Raditladi accepted a tribal position in the African Authority at Mahalapye, and the BFP collapsed by 1962. The BFP had remained small and did not gain support countrywide. It was short-lived because Raditladi was incapable of leading it. However, the party was important because it was the first political party and because it called for democratically elected political leaders. The BFP represented a critical connection with intellectual movements and a transition to its successor, the BDP.

The first real mass political movement in Bechuanaland was the BPP. Once the process of constitutional and political change began with the Legco and the birth of the BFP, the pace moved swiftly. The leadership and political philosophy of the BPP had their origins in the racially unstable situation of South Africa, and was influenced by its African National Congress (ANC) and Pan-Africanist Congress (PAC). It was formed after these were banned. The founders of the BPP drew their political experience from their involvement in nationalist movements outside the country. Mpho had worked in South Africa since 1948 and had been secretary of the ANC's Roodepoort branch from 1953. He was charged for treason, imprisoned, and later released, and returned to Bechuanaland in 1960. Motsete had helped in the formation of the Nyasaland African Congress in 1944 in Nyasaland (now Malawi), and also had contacts with the ANC in the 1950s. Matante had been an ANC activist in Johannesburg in the early 1950s, but became sympathetic to the PAC after it broke away from the ANC in 1959. It was Mpho, a member of a subject tribe in Bechuanaland, who spearheaded the formation of the BPP; he was later joined by Motsete and Matante. Motsete became president, Matante vice president, and Mpho secretary general.

The BPP grew quickly, especially in Francistown and towns along the railway line such as Mahalapye, Lobatse, and Palapye, built on the earlier work of different organizations, and also had branches among Batswana migrants in South Africa. Francistown and the centers along the railway line were critical, attracting people because of jobs and providing a transport linkage that connected the north and south, as well as connecting the country with Southern Rhodesia and South Africa.

Because of its radical influences the BPP was anti-colonial and espoused a militant nationalism. It opposed the Legco, which it viewed as unrepresentative: the Africans had only one third of the votes and the seats were racially segregated. It opposed the role of the royalty, since it represented inequality and tribal superiority. It attacked racism, racially biased salaries, unequal pay for equal work in government service, and the racially imbalanced civil service. The BPP criticized white settler domination of the north-east by the Tati Company. It also attacked the colonial government for neglect of economic development. The BPP demanded immediate independence through an open election based on adult suffrage, and a common voter's roll. The colonial government and the dikgosi felt threatened by the BPP's radicalism. Probably because of BPP pressure, the colonial authorities moved forward the date of the revision of the Legco constitution from 1968 to 1963. The BPP, however, demanded that the Legco constitution be abolished and an independent constitution set up immediately. As part of its strategy, Matante twice addressed the United Nations committee on colonialism in 1962 and 1963, attacking British colonialism in Bechuanaland. The Organization of African Unity supported the BPP until 1965. The BPP scored successes as it gained international recognition as the country's liberation party, and was supported and funded by Ghana's first president, Kwame Nkrumah.

One of the strategies used by the BPP to push for political change was through protest demonstrations. During one such demonstration, Matante led over 800 people to the High Court in Lobatse. Because of its criticism of the colonial government, the BPP attracted many supporters, especially in towns. BPP strategy also included establishing political structures such as women and youth leagues, and in addressing audiences in beer halls, football grounds, and "freedom squares." The BPP was Pan-Africanist and it demanded the Africanization of the civil service and some nationalization of land. Land alienation was particularly severe in the freehold areas of the Tati and South East district, which bordered the Gaborone and Lobatse farms. The party played a crucial role in political development because it stimulated the rapid spread of political consciousness via its radical leadership, supported by an influx of politically experienced refugees from South Africa. It sought to mobilize the workers and the emerging middle class in support of its demands. The party enjoyed successes especially in mobilizing members in urban and semi-urban areas, because of poor living conditions in towns and the growth of the politically conscious, albeit small, working class.

The BPP organized large and impressive anti-colonial demonstrations in Lobatse and Francistown in 1963. In that year riots organized by the BPP women's league erupted in Francistown against the Tati Company's monopoly on the brewing and selling of traditional beer. The BPP's youth wing supported the rioters. Stones and petrol bombs were used against the police and rioters were arrested. At its zenith the BPP had 17 branches in Bechuanaland and five in South Africa. Despite its failure to win the first general elections in 1965, the BPP contributed to the establishment of multi-party democracy in Botswana as it formed the first opposition in parliament. The BPP can be credited for having introduced radical politics in Botswana and for pushing the colonial government to heed the call for immediate independence.

However, the BPP had some major weaknesses, which finally ended in a debilitating split. Because of its opposition to dikgosi, the party faced difficulties in mobilizing many Batswana peasants. Party membership was largely confined to the few major centers such as Mochudi, Lobatse, and the Tati area, and it did not cover the whole country. The BPP failed to attract local moderates such as Moutlaggola Nwako, Archie Tsoebebe, Quett Masire, and Lenyeletse Seretse. In 1961 the party made a strategic blunder by boycotting elections to the AAC, and it also lost the crucial support of Seretse Khama, who was widely regarded as the crown leader of the Bangwato, the largest ethnic group. The BPP was also wracked by dissension and Mpho was expelled in 1962. He formed his own party, originally called the BPP No. 2 and later renamed the Botswana Independence Party (BIP). In 1963 there was another split in the party when Matante criticized the more moderate Motsete and broke away to form his own party, the BPP Matante. The feuds within the BPP were caused by several factors. Alleged financial mismanagement caused major misunderstandings. The splits in the BPP were largely those of personalities, not ideological. The splits weakened the party, hence its failure to win the elections in 1965.

The BPP also faced a serious rival in the form of the other major political party that emerged during the final transition to independence: the BDP, formed by Seretse Khama to counter the BPP. He was a lawyer who had studied in South Africa and London, the tribal secretary of the Bangwato, a member of the Legco, and heir to the Bangwato throne. He had renounced his chieftainship after his marriage to a British woman (opposed by the British and initially by a section of his tribe). The leadership of the BDP was drawn from Legco members, who were from the African elite. It was a party of educated notables and progressive nobles, and supported the chieftainship. The BDP founders had contacts with the peasantry, for many of whom loyalty to the party was just an extension of existing loyalties. Nonetheless, the BDP leaders were determined to transfer power from the dikgosi and the colonial government to a central, national, and democratic government. None had any direct association with the South African nationalists. It was loosely organized as a coalition of prominent Africans, led by the politically shrewd Seretse Khama and Masire. Seretse Khama was president, Tsoebebe the vice president, Masire the secretary general, Amos Dambe the vice secretary general, and B. Steinberg the treasurer. Masire was a key leader, a commoner, teacher, farmer, and journalist. He was an astute organizer and hard worker. He had gained political experience while serving as a member of the Bangwaketse Tribal Council, the African Council, and the Legco, and this placed the BDP in a good position. Masire's tireless organization at grassroots level ensured the transformation of the BDP from an elite organization into a large national movement, with structures in all the regions and villages of the country. The position of Khama was also a major asset to the BDP. Although he had renounced chieftainship after his marriage crisis, he was still regarded as a kgosi by most Bangwato, assuring the BDP of grassroots support.

The BDP wanted the independence of Botswana, but the immediate stimulus in starting the party was to oppose the BPP. BDP leaders believed the BPP would not lead the country to peaceful independence; its splits and tendency towards a racial nationalism worried them. They were also worried by the influence of the ANC and PAC on the BPP. The BDP emphasized multi-racialism, which attracted support from whites in the country and the colonial administration. The BDP was portrayed as a party that would ensure racial coexistence and therefore attain peace and development. The BPP's nationalism, by contrast, often tended to an exclusivist "Africa for the Africans." The BDP seized upon this and portrayed the BPP as an anti-white party.

Independence and Beyond

Under pressure from the political parties, the colonial administration arranged constitutional talks in Lobatse in August 1963. The constitutional agreement provided for a National Assembly, to which members would be elected by adult suffrage. The country would then achieve self-rule, with Britain remaining in charge of defense, the public service, and external affairs. The Legco was dissolved in January 1965 and elections were held on March 1, 1965 on the basis of the 1963 constitution. The BDP won the elections, gaining 28 out of 31 seats, while the BPP obtained only three.

The country obtained internal self-government with Seretse Khama as prime minister. The new government then demanded full independence. A constitutional conference was held in London in February 1966. The new constitution adopted was similar to the one of 1963. Independence was granted on September 30, 1966, and Seretse Khama became the first president of the independent republic of Botswana.

At independence, Botswana was surrounded by white settler-dominated regimes in South Africa, South West Africa (now Namibia), and Southern Rhodesia, while Angola and Mozambique remained Portuguese colonies. Wars of liberation started in these countries from the early 1960s, and Botswana inevitably got involved. Botswana, together with independent Tanzania and Zambia, formed the Frontline States and played a crucial role in the liberation struggle. It provided moral and diplomatic support to liberation movements in international forums such as the United Nations, the Commonwealth, the Non-Aligned Movement, and the Organization of African Unity. Botswana provided sanctuary to what it called genuine refugees from wars and human rights violations. However, official policy was that the country should not be used to launch attacks on its neighbors. The country was also used as a transit route for refugees who wanted to proceed north to Zambia and Tanzania to join liberation movements. For harboring refugees and for supporting liberation movements Botswana incurred armed attacks, intimidation, and threats from Southern Rhodesia and South Africa, ending with the 1985 South African raid in Gaborone that left 14 dead.

After independence, Botswana adopted a multi-party political system with elections held every five years, based on a first-past-the-post system where the party that gains the most seats assumes power. New political parties were formed after independence, from the Botswana National Front (BNF) which was formed just before independence, to the Botswana Congress Party (BCP) and the Botswana Alliance Movement (BAM) – both splinters from the BNF – and the National Democratic Front (NDF) and the Marx, Engels, Lenin and Stalin (MELS) group. Nonetheless, Botswana has been described as a one party-dominant democracy because the BDP has won all general elections. Its successes have largely been due to splits in the opposition, the conservative nature of Botswana's peasant majority, the low levels of literacy, the youthful population (Molutsi 1988), and the massive resources at the BDP's disposal. The country's political landscape has been characterized by continuous infighting and factionalism in the BDP and the BNF (Maundeni 1998). Also important has been the ongoing struggle between the government and the traditional rulers, with the powers of the dikgosi being systematically eroded – a process that started to intensify from the 1930s (Molutsi 1988).

Besides its unprecedented level of political stability and tolerance, compared to elsewhere in Africa, Botswana has also achieved immense economic growth fueled by the discovery of diamonds and copper nickel in the early 1970s. It has moved from one of the poorest countries at independence to a middle-income country, although high levels of poverty and inequality persist. New unions were formed, including the Botswana Mineworkers Union (BMWU), several teachers' unions, and the umbrella Botswana Federation of Trade Unions (BFTU), which was formed in 1977. These have been largely concerned with negotiating agreements on labor policies; strikes have been used on rare occasions. The unions have largely remained weak, divided, and somewhat elitist, in that only about 20 percent of eligible workers join a union

(Parson 1984: 94). The majority of workers are employed in the civil service, and it has been difficult to unionize or mobilize these workers

In the 1980s and 1990s a wave of democratization swept through African countries. Botswana was affected in that the new democratic dispensations in Zimbabwe and South Africa enhanced trade and economic cooperation in Southern Africa, and eased tensions along the country's borders. Botswana was and is also viewed as a leading example of democracy because of its unmatched history of multi-party democracy. On the other hand, donor assistance has shifted to what are seen as democratizing countries and cut aid to Botswana as a medium-income country.

Recently, a burning issue surfaced around the question of the relocation of the Basarwa, the most underprivileged ethnic group, from the Central Kalahari Game Reserve (CKGR) to the Kweneng district, in order to pave the way for game development and for the Basarwa to be provided with social amenities. This has aroused intense controversy, with the Basarwa and Survival International (SI) accusing the government of removing the Basarwa to prepare for diamond exploration and mining. This issue resulted in a marathon high court case which ruled that some Basarwa should return to the CKGR. This issue is still causing much controversy and has placed Botswana in the international spotlight for violating the human rights of the Basarwa.

Conclusion

Botswana is unique in Southern Africa. The transition to independence was through a peaceful process, in contrast to the protracted and bloody liberation wars preceding independence elsewhere in the region. Surrounded by white-ruled minority regimes at independence, and economically and militarily vulnerable to them, Botswana nevertheless played a crucial role in the liberation of Southern Africa that paid dividends with the final democratic dispensation in South Africa in 1994. The post-independence era has been characterized by a multi-party democratic political system. Political stability and economic growth and development are crucial features of today's Botswana.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Apartheid Movement, South Africa; Khama, Seretse (1921–1980) and Botswana Nationalism; Maripe, Knight (1927–2006); Mpho, Motsamai (b. 1921)

References and Suggested Readings

- Colclough, C. & McCarthy, S. (1980) The Political Economy of Botswana: A Study of Growth and Distribution. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Hosia, T. (1992) A History of Trade Unionism in Bechuanaland, 1940–1960. BA research essay. Gaborone: University of Botswana.
- Maundeni, Z. (1998) The Struggle for Political Freedom and Independence. In W. Edge & M. Lekorwe (Eds.), Botswana: Politics and Society. Pretoria: Van Schaik.
- Molutsi, P. (1988) Elections and Electoral Experience in Botswana. In W. Edge & M. Lekorwe (Eds.), Botswana: Politics and Society. Pretoria: Van Schaik.
- Morton, B. (1994) The Making of a President: Sir Ketumile Masire's Early Years. Gaborone: Pula Press.
- Morton, F. & Ramsay, J. (1987) The Birth of Botswana: A History of the Bechuanaland Protectorate, 1910–1966. Gaborone: Longman Botswana.
- Ngidi, G. (1985) A History of the Botswana Mining Workers Union (BMWU). BA research essay. Gaborone: University of Botswana.
- Parson, J. (1984) Botswana: Liberal Democracy and the Labour Reserve in Southern Africa. Boulder: Westview Press.
- Parson, J. (1987) The "Labour Reserve" in Historical Perspective: Toward a Political Economy of the Bechuanaland Protectorate. In L. Picard (Ed.), The Politics of Development in Botswana: A Model for Success. Boulder: Lynne Rienner.
- Parsons, N. (1982) A New History of Southern Africa. London: Macmillan.
- Parsons, N. (1987) The Evolution of Modern Botswana: Historical Revisions. In L. Picard (Ed.), The Politics of Development in Botswana: A Model for Success. Boulder: Lynne Rienner.
- Parsons, N. & Ramsay, J. (1998) The Emergence of Political Parties in Botswana. In W. Edge & M. Lekorwe (Eds.), Botswana: Politics and Society. Pretoria: Van Schaik.
- Picard, L. (1985) From Bechuanaland to Botswana: An Overview. In L. Picard (Ed.), The Evolution of Modern Botswana. London: Rex Collins.
- Picard, L. (1987) The Politics of Development in Botswana: A Model for Success. Boulder: Lynne Rienner.
- Ramsay, J. (1988) Twentieth Century Antecedents of Decolonizing Nationalism in Botswana. In W. Edge & M. Lekorwe (Eds.), Botswana: Politics and Society. Pretoria: Van Schaik.
- Sekgoma, G. (1987) A History of Trade Unionism in Botswana, 1940s–1978. BA dissertation. Gaborone: University of Botswana.
- Tlou, T. & Campbell, A. (1997) History of Botswana. Gaborone: Macmillan.

Tlou, T., Parsons, N., & Henderson, W. (1995) Seretse Khama, 1921–1980. Gaborone: Macmillan.

Bourses du Travail

Stephen Leberstein

The Bourses du Travail (labor exchanges or workers councils) that spread throughout France during the 1890s were self-governing working-class institutions that contributed to the radical syndicalist ideology characteristic of the French labor movement in the period before World War I. While the national and local governments that established and funded them hoped the Bourses would help diminish social strife, the Left seized on them as centers for worker self-activity and as generators of class consciousness.

In an effort to accommodate an increasingly restive working class and bring a measure of social peace to a rapidly industrializing nation, the Third French Republic under President Leon Gambetta legalized trade unions in 1884. Following that step the Paris municipal council agreed to create and help fund a Bourse du Travail in 1886, and the next year provided a building for it on the Rue Jean-Jacques Rousseau. In 1892 the Parisian Bourse moved into a new building on the Rue du Chateau d'Eau, which it still occupies.

By the end of the 1890s municipalities across the country had established 57 Bourses in total. Among them they brought together 1,065 separate trade unions (syndicates), 48 percent of the total in France. In 1892 a Federation des Bourses du Travail was created, headed by Fernand Pelloutier after 1895. The Federation des Bourses merged with the Confederation Generale du Travail (CGT) in 1902.

Pelloutier, originally a member of the French Knights of Labor, rejected parliamentary politics, instead advocating anarcho-syndicalism. Under his influence the Bourses became a focal point of the revolutionary syndicalist ideology, and centers of working-class mutual aid, self-improvement, and protest activity. Practically, the Bourses were gathering places with meeting rooms and other facilities for all the trade unions in their respective localities. Their main function was to serve as job placement bureaus, saving workers from the perils of private employment agencies. They also offered support to itinerant workers as they traveled the country in search of work through the viaticum, or material subsidy, and to the unemployed, measures that Pelloutier called “a debt of solidarity.”

The Bourses were controlled by activist workers themselves rather than administered by bureaucrats. As Georges Sorel saw them, rank and file control of the Bourses would “convince workers that they would easily find men capable of running their institutions among their own ranks when they stopped being hypnotized by political utopias. To show the proletariat its will-power, to have it develop through its own action and so reveal its own capacity – there’s the whole secret of the socialist education of the people” (Pelloutier 1901: 1).

For another contemporary commentator, the Bourses were the actual places “where that great thing, working-class consciousness, is born. There, men of the people meet other men of the people, in a room that belongs to them, in an institution that they themselves wanted and run . . . the exchange becomes more than an ‘exchange,’ but a Home, the fresh nucleus of a class” (Halevy 1901: 86). In the eyes of Pelloutier and his supporters, the Bourses would be the well-springs of militant workers, the “active minorities” of the coming revolution. Ubiquitous police spies certainly agreed with them!

Like the Wobblies in the US, French syndicalists believed that “We can bring to birth the new world from the ashes of the old, for the union makes us strong” (Ralph Chaplin, “Solidarity Forever”). Workers organized a range of activities at the Bourses, from job placement and the viaticum for the unemployed and itinerant, to trade courses as well as language classes and labor education. The trade courses tended to be in artisanal crafts, like the apprenticeship training in typography at the Toulouse Bourse, mechanical design and geometry for the building trades at the St. Etienne Bourse, or training in coachwork or surveying elsewhere.

Other efforts included building libraries in every Bourse. The one in Paris reportedly held 2,700 volumes. Plans were also made for creating labor museums, showing the evolution of particular trades, and for an office of labor statistics. In one nine-month period in 1899–1900, there were 597 class meetings offered at the various Bourses at an average length of 2 hours and an average attendance of 426 (Raynaud, Etude sur l'enseignement professionnel, cited in Pelloutier 1901: 120). Along with these mundane examples of self-activity, workers at the various Bourses participated in strikes, May Day demonstrations, eight-hour day demonstrations, and the like.

As worker militancy and strike activity began to peak around 1906, some municipalities began to withdraw their subsidies to the Bourses. Ironically, the withdrawal of state support for Bourse activities not only curbed the scope of their efforts, but also showed the limits of their ideological goals. At a moment when a revolutionary uprising was not in sight, their worker self-activity was not sufficient to bring to birth the heralded new world. Much as Pelloutier and his comrades unwittingly followed Marx's injunction "that circumstances are changed by men . . . [and] the coincidence of the changing of circumstances and of human activity or self-changing can only be comprehended and rationally understood as revolutionary practice," the ferment the Bourses created in the labor movement was insufficient to achieve the overarching goal of social transformation.

If we believe contemporary critics like Daniel Halevy, the syndicalist movement, and the Bourses that were at its heart, began to develop a cadre of the "new men" who would be needed both for the transformative moment but also for the success of the new society itself. "Our militants," he said, "are new creatures . . . the harbingers of the future society" (Halevy 1901: 295). We can regard them as the necessary but insufficient condition for the revolution that the syndicalists dreamed of.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism; Confédération Générale du Travail and Syndicaliste Révolutionnaire; Internationals; Pelloutier, Fernand (1867–1901) and the Bourses du Travail; Syndicalism, France

References and Suggested Readings

- Ansell, C. K. (2001) Schism and Solidarity in Social Movements: The Politics of Labor in the French Third Republic. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Berry, D. (2002) A History of the French Anarchist Movement, 1917–1945. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.
- Guerin, D. (n.d.) Ni Dieu, ni maître: anthologie historique du mouvement anarchiste. Lausanne: La Cité.
- Halevy, D. (1901) Essais sur le mouvement ouvrier en France. Paris: Société nouvelle de librairie.
- Julliard, J. (1971) Fernand Pelloutier et les origines du syndicalisme d'action directe. Paris: Editions du Seuil.
- Lefranc, G. (1967) Le Mouvement syndical sous la Troisième République. Paris: Payot.
- Maitron, J. (1951) Le Mouvement anarchiste en France, 1880–1914. Paris: SUEDEL.

- Pelloutier, F. (1895) L'Anarchisme et les syndicats ouvriers. Les Temps nouveaux (November 2–8).
- Pelloutier, F. (1901) Histoire des bourses du travail, origines, institutions, avenir. Paris: Schleicher.
- Rappe, D. (2004) La Bourse du travail de Lyon. Lyon: Ateliers de création libertaire. Available at www.Pelloutier.net (accessed February 24, 2008).
- Seilhac, L. de (1899) Syndicats ouvriers, fédérations, bourses du travail. Paris: Armand Colin.
- Vidalenc, G. (1947) Histoire du syndicalisme. Paris: Centre confédérale d'éducation ouvrière.

Brand, Adolf (1874–1945)

Larry W. Heiman

Adolf Brand was a German publisher and anarchist whose strong belief in individual freedom was intrinsic to his advocacy of male homosexual emancipation. He argued "the right of self-determination over body and soul is the most important basis of all freedom" (Brand 1991: 155). After a brief career as a schoolteacher, Brand started a publishing company in Berlin and in 1896 began publication of Der Eigene (The Self-Owner or The Special One). Initially conceived as an individualist anarchist journal, it soon focused entirely on male homosexual culture, making it the first journal of its kind in history. It ceased publication in 1931.

Brand initially joined with sexologist Magnus Hirschfeld and his Wissenschaftlich-humanitäre Komitee (Scientific-Humanitarian Committee) in support of the repeal of Paragraph 175, the provision of the German Criminal Code that made male homosexual acts a crime. But due to his disagreement with Hirschfeld's medical/biological views on homosexuality, Brand later turned against Hirschfeld and co-founded the world's second homosexual emancipation organization with Benedikt Friedländer and Wilhelm Jansen, the Gemeinschaft der Eigenen (Community of the Special), as a counterbalance to the Komitee. The GdE viewed homosexuality as a vigorously masculine cultural movement, advocating love relationships among male friends akin to those of ancient Greece as a noble ideal, although Brand and Friedländer believed men were essentially bisexual and both married women. The GdE never achieved the prominence of the Komitee and its reputation has suffered from its exclusivity, promotion of pederasty, and misogynistic views.

Brand's homosexual publications and often brazen political activism repeatedly resulted in litigation and even jail time. He was imprisoned for a year for using a dog whip on a member of the German Parliament in 1899. He published articles "outing" prominent figures as homosexual, including one in 1907 accusing two advisors of Kaiser Wilhelm II of a homosexual affair, which resulted in a libel conviction and another 18 months in prison. He was also periodically prosecuted for publishing lewd materials.

After the Nazis came to power, Brand's home and publishing house were raided and his publications destroyed. Although never prosecuted for his homosexuality, he was left financially ruined and curtailed his political activities in the early 1930s. He and his wife were killed in their home in 1945 by an Allied bombing.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism and Culture, 1840–1939; Friedländer, Benedikt (1866–1908); Hirschfeld, Magnus (1868–1935); Lesbian, Gay, Transsexual, Bisexual Movements, Germany

References and Suggested Readings

- Brand, A. (1991) What We Want. Journal of Homosexuality 22 (1/2): 155–66.
- Kennedy, H. (2005) Brand, Adolf (1874–1945). In gbtq: An Encyclopedia of Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual, Transgender, and Queer Culture. Available at www.gbttq.com/social-sciences/brand_a.html (downloaded April 13, 2008).
- Oosterhuis, H. (Ed.) (1991) Homosexuality and Male Bonding in Pre-Nazi Germany: The Youth Movement, the Gay Movement, and Male Bonding Before Hitler's Rise: Original Transcripts from Der Eigene, the First Gay Journal in the World. Also published as Journal of Homosexuality 22 (1/2).
- Steakley, J. D. (1975) The Homosexual Emancipation Movement in Germany. New York: Arno Press.

Brandreth, Jeremiah (1790–1817) and the Pentrich Rising

Summer D. Leibensperger

Jeremiah Brandreth, known as the "Nottingham Captain," was one of the leaders of the unsuccessful Pentrich Rising against the British government. Brandreth was born in Wilford, Nottingham, and became a stocking maker by trade. He later moved to Sutton-in-Ashfield where he lived with his wife and two children. It is likely that he took part in Luddite activities in 1811.

By 1817, industrialization, agricultural recession, and repressive legislation from a government concerned about insurrections set the stage for the rising, which was unique for its working-class origins. The unemployed Brandreth, along with Isaac Ludlam and William Turner, led a group of approximately 200 men from Pentrich, Derbyshire, to Nottingham on June 9, planning to continue to London as part of a wider uprising they had been led to believe was occurring. The group was armed mostly with primitive weapons like pikes, but some had pistols. During the march to Nottingham, they stopped at farms and houses, demanding a man and gun from each. Brandreth promised roast beef and rum and talked of a new government. He also killed a servant when he fired a gun through a window during the march.

When the rebels arrived in Nottingham, they discovered that there was no larger rising and instead encountered a force of Hussars. The rebels dispersed in a panic, but many were captured. Brandreth, Ludlam, and Turner were sentenced to be hung, drawn, and quartered at Derby for high treason for their roles as the leaders. The prince regent commuted the sentence to hanging and beheading only, which was carried out on November 7, 1817. Others were sentenced to imprisonment or transportation.

On the scaffold, one leader claimed: "This is the work of the Government and Oliver." William Oliver, the "London delegate" (better known as "Oliver the Spy"), had met with radicals in May 1817, discussing with them the gathering of local workers as part of a larger armed uprising in London. Many believe Oliver was working as an agent provocateur for the government, a paid informer directed to provoke locals to action, thereby allowing the government to make examples of them. Freemantle (1932) and White (1955), however, both suggest that Oliver's role in the rising has been overstated.

After the Pentrich Rising and other demonstrations, the Six Acts of 1819 were passed in an attempt to maintain order and were seen as the high point of repression. It has also been noted that Oliver's role in the rising encouraged a constitutionalist outlook for the working-class reform movement.

SEE ALSO: Luddism and Machine Breaking; Luddite Riots in Nottingham

References and Suggested Readings

- Freemantle, A. F. (1932) The Truth about Oliver the Spy. English Historical Review 47: 601–16.
- Pentrich Historical Society, www.pentrich.org.uk.
- Royle, E. (2000) Revolutionary Britannia? Reflections on the Threat of Revolution in Britain, 1789–1848. New York: Manchester University Press.
- Stevens, J. (1977) England's Last Revolution: Pentrich 1817. Buxton: Moorland.
- Thompson, E. P. (1963) The Making of the English Working Class. New York: Pantheon.
- White, R. J. (1955) The Pentrich Revolution, 1817. History Today 5 (8): 534–41.

Brazil, guerilla movements, 20th century

Diogo L. Pinheiro and Paula Rodrigues Pontes

Unlike many neighboring countries, Brazil did not experience any sort of large-scale guerilla movement during the twentieth century. Despite the severe inequality and, for most of the century, disenfranchisement of the lower strata of society from the political process, all armed revolts in Brazil were relatively short lived, very limited in scope, and mostly unsuccessful. This is partly explained by significant class, regional, and racial differences that prevented the formation of any kind of broad compromise necessary to form a large-scale military movement. Unlike other Latin American nations, such as Bolivia, Brazil did not have large Amerindian-descended populations that lived in similar conditions and provided the basis for so many social movements and guerillas in the region. Regional disparities in income meant that urban blue-collar workers had distinct interests from rural laborers, who in turn were scattered throughout the hinterlands, and under the control of local bosses and their armed henchmen. Furthermore, throughout a significant portion of the twentieth century, governments that mixed populist policies aimed at specific sectors of society and brutal repression of dissenters ruled Brazil. Early social security measures and labor protection laws only applied to certain specific and more mobilized sectors, creating an inherent interest in the maintenance of the status quo for those groups.

Armed guerilla movements appeared in three distinct moments in twentieth-century Brazilian history: the old republic (1889–1930), the Vargas era (1930–45), and the military dictatorship (1964–85). One of the key features of most of these movements is that they were organized by small groups, usually with links to disgruntled members of the military, who overestimated the support that they would get from the population in general.

The Old Republic (1889–1930)

Brazil differed from the rest of Latin America in that it continued to be a monarchy for a significant amount of time after its independence. The republic was only established in 1889, but it was far from a full democratic regime. The first direct presidential elections came in 1894, when the first civilian president was elected. Only a small minority had the right to vote – mostly literate, white, propertied male citizens – and there was no secret voting. The relative federalization of the republic gave local bosses, the Coronéis, more power, something that was reinforced by the lack of secret voting, which effectively allowed them to determine the winners of local elections. This led to the creation of an alliance between local oligarchies and the federal government, allowing the ruling parties to decide the winner of the national elections. The two richest and most populous states, São Paulo and Minas Gerais, used this sort of alliance (which became known as “coffee and milk politics” because of the main products of these states) to control the presidency for the entire period in question. This configuration generally gave the federal government important allies in the suppression of any popular revolts. The repression of the Prestes column relied to some extent on the henchmen controlled by local bosses (see below). On the other hand, in the rare instances when these local bosses were displeased with the federal government, they became formidable foes, such as when one local boss decided to support the rebels in the Contestado war. Because of these factors, this period saw the most significant guerilla movements of the twentieth century. Besides the Contestado war and the revolts of the Tenentismo movement, the period also saw a number of disorganized revolts, such as those over the compulsory vaccination laws in 1904 and the mutiny of low-ranking naval officers in 1910.

The Contestado War (1912–1916)

The Contestado war took place between rebels and the Brazilian military in a region that was disputed by two Brazilian states, Paraná and Santa Catarina. The causes of the conflict are numerous and are reflected in the diversity of the rebel forces. A mixture of messianic movements, dissatisfaction over land expropriation, and border disputes led to a situation that allowed a broad coalition of different sectors of society, due to which the rebels were able to fight federal and state troops for almost four years in a costly war that was the longest and bloodiest conflict in the Brazilian republic. The rebel leader was the self-proclaimed monk and prophet José Maria de Santo Agostinho (unknown–1912), who appeared in the region shortly before the conflicts began. The region had a long history of messianic leaders dating back to the previous century. Before conflicts began, he acted mostly as a sort of medicine man, using herbs and prayer to heal the faithful. Soon, he gained a reputation as a miracle worker, winning the trust of dozens of followers and even of a local Coronel after he allegedly healed his wife. He gained even more followers after the federal government granted the American Brazilian Railway Company the ownership of the land that was within 30 kilometers of the railroad it was constructing between São Paulo and Rio Grande do Sul. Hundreds of displaced peasants and farmers sought José Maria's leadership in dealing with this issue. Already distrustful of the republic and the federal government, particularly because of the official separation of church and state, José Maria saw this as further evidence of the corruption and decay of the republic. He and his followers decided to organize themselves in a community that was independent from Brazil, and went so far as to crown an emperor to the area under their control. The community was named Quadro Santo, and several villages joined it, forming what José Maria called a monarquia celeste (heavenly monarchy). Even though this act of secession went unnoticed for a while, a number of different factors led to the mobilization of both federal and state troops from Paraná in order to destroy the rebelling community.

The first battle of the war took place in a town-ship called Irani claimed by both Santa Catarina and Paraná. Fearing repression from the federal government and from local Coronéis not allied with him, José Maria decided to unite all his followers in that city. The state of Paraná, however, saw the huge influx of people from Santa Catarina into that town as a threat to their claims over that region, and soon dispatched state troopers to expel José Maria's followers. Troops from the Regimento de Segurança do Paraná (Paraná's Security Regiment) entered into combat with José Maria's followers in October of 1912. The resulting bloodbath saw the leaders from both sides, José Maria and Colonel João Gualberto, killed. But, despite the loss of their leader, the rebels came out of the combat with renewed strength and a significant part of the Paraná troops' arsenal. The messianic element of this movement is evident in that the rebels strongly believed that José Maria would resurrect and lead them to victory, so much so that he was buried in a way that would facilitate his return to this world.

During the following year confrontations between rebels and the government were small and limited, with the rebels employing guerilla tactics in order to avoid prolonged confrontations. But that would change in February 1914, when the federal government and the states of Paraná and Santa Catarina decided to send a joint force to repress the rebellion. Over 700 soldiers, armed with artillery and machine guns, marched to the rebel camp of Taquaruçu. Most rebels, however, were aware of the impending offensive and fled. As a result, government troops were able to raze the camp, but that had very little effect on the rebel movement, as they lost very few lives and even fewer resources. The rebels took refuge in Caraguatá, where they would face government troops for the second time just a few weeks later. In March of that same year new troops were dispatched to the new rebel refuge with the goal of completely wiping out the rebellion. This time, however, the rebels stood their ground and routed the government troops. Emboldened by their success, the rebels went on the offensive, raiding large plantations and small towns for supplies. On September 1, 1914 they issued a "Monarchist Manifesto," calling for a holy war against the republic and Coronéis who did not accept their vow of poverty and asceticism. Among their targets were the city of Curitiba, and where they destroyed the public archives that held the information on land ownership on the region, and the Southern Brazil Lumber and Colonization mill, an American company that was located in the area and belonged to the railroad company.

After these bold actions, the federal government picked General Carlos Frederico de Mesquita, a veteran of the Canudos campaign, to deal with the rebels. After failing to negotiate a peaceful treaty with the rebels, Mesquita and his troops crushed one of the rebel camps, while their main base, Caraguatá, was decimated by a typhus epidemic. Mistakenly interpreting the lack of a rebel reaction as the end of hostilities, Mesquita declared the conflict over and returned to Rio de Janeiro. But this period of calm was followed by the boldest actions yet by the rebels. After regrouping in Santa Maria, they initiated a large-scale offensive, capturing several towns, destroying many railroad stations, and causing panic in many of the larger cities. At this point, the rebels controlled about 25,000 square kilometers of land. Seeing the seriousness of the situation, the federal government dispatched its strongest expedition yet – 7,000 men, heavily armed, and, for the first time in Latin American history, two planes that were used in military operations. Leading this expedition was General Setembrino de Carvalho, and this time the federal troops made sure that they did not underestimate the rebel forces and their ability to regroup. So much so that his first action as commander of the federal forces was to offer the rebels their land back if they decided to cease fighting and lay down their arms. Not many rebels accepted this offer, and the fighting continued. But Setembrino had learned from previous mistakes, and this time did not engage the rebels head on, as he was aware that this would just drive them underground without really dismantling them. Instead, he chose to surround the main rebel camps, cutting off rebel supply lines and preventing people from moving in or out. This strategy gradually worked, as soon the rebels started to experience shortages of food and supplies. Over time, many rebels decided to surrender instead of facing starvation. Internal fights within the rebel forces also became more common, especially as rebel leaders ordered those caught trying to surrender to be shot on the spot. Despite all of this, the few times the federal troops decided to attack the rebels, fighting was fierce. The main rebel camp fell on April 5, 1915, and the last rebel camp was only dismantled in December of that year. Even after these victories, the government troops remained in the region until the last leader of the rebels was captured, in August 1916. In the end, after five years of bloody conflict, almost 20,000 people had been killed and dozens of villages and towns partially destroyed. It was the largest insurrection against the Brazilian government of the twentieth century, and certainly the most violent. The most immediate and significant impact of the uprising were the accords that finally ended the dispute over state borders in the region. Despite a few skirmishes between peasants and local bosses following the end of the rebellion, its impact was small and the status quo was preserved.

Tenentismo

The Tenentismo movement, and especially the Prestes column, was the rebellious movement that had the greatest impact on Brazilian politics in the first half of the century. Tenentismo involved several small revolts by low-ranking military officers as well as one prolonged guerilla movement, the Prestes column, which roamed the hinterlands for over two years. As a movement, it defended a number of different democratic policies, but it lacked a coherent overarching ideology. It was a reaction to the existing political arrangement between the two largest states and the Coffee and Milk policies of that era. More specifically, it was a direct reaction to the events of the 1922 presidential elections. Minas Gerais and São Paulo chose the Minas governor, Artur Bernardes, as its official candidate. Other states, resentful of their exclusion from this process, chose the former vice president Nilo Peçanha as the opposition candidate. One of the major points of disagreement between the two sides was the role that the government played in maintaining coffee prices by purchasing surplus and manipulating the currency exchange rate, something that greatly benefited São Paulo and Minas Gerais.

The opposition campaign tried to use urban support and the dissatisfaction of those who were not related to the coffee sector to win the election, but because of the characteristics of the existing system, which made it easy for elites to verify and control voting by the populations under their control, and extensive voter fraud, Bernardes was easily elected. Large sections of the military had sided with Peçanha, and their distrust of Bernardes became even more evident after letters attributed to Bernardes were published in Brazilian newspapers. In these letters, which were later discovered to be false, Bernardes allegedly attacked the Military Club and its president, former Brazilian president Hermes da Fonseca, which was seen by many in the military as an attack on the corporation as a whole. Things got further out of hand as Fonseca started to discuss ways of stopping Bernardes' inauguration. Fonseca was arrested and the Military Club closed for six months. This was the last straw, and on July 5, 1922, lieutenants (hence the name "Tenentismo") led a revolt at the Copacabana Fort to save the "honor" of the military. No other military units joined then, however, and soon many of the rebelling officers surrendered. Only 18 people, the Fort's 18, as they would be called, resisted. After a brief fight, only two, Siqueira Campos and Eduardo Gomes, survived. Despite its resounding failure in mobilizing forces in its favor, this revolt was important in that it provided the impetus for further actions.

These actions happened two years later, this time better prepared and planned. Besides deposing Bernardes, who they saw as being anti-military, the members of the Tenentismo also thought that the ruling regime, which elected such figures as Bernardes, was exclusively controlled by the existing oligarchies. As such, despite the lack of any overarching ideology, the movement also proposed a number of measures to modernize and strengthen democracy, such as extending suffrage and instituting secret voting. On July 5, 1924, a date that was selected to pay homage to the Fort's 18, forces led by General Isidoro Dias Lopes rebelled in São Paulo. They were initially successful: on July 9 they forced the state governor to flee the city, leaving it effectively under their control. This control was short lived, however, and on July 27 they fled the city under intense bombardment by federal forces.

Their revolt was not the only one to take place that year. Forces in Rio Grande do Sul, led by Captain Luis Carlos Prestes, also rebelled. Just as in São Paulo, their success was brief. After the failure of both revolts, forces from São Paulo and Rio Grande do Sul were on the run. They met each other in Paraná in April 1925, forming the Coluna Prestes, or Prestes column, Brazil's most politically significant guerilla movement. After a brief skirmish in the western area of that state, the column set out on a march throughout the country. Numbering 1,500 people at its peak, it began a journey through the Brazilian hinterlands trying to gather support for its cause, actively avoiding direct confrontations with the pursuing federal forces. In almost two years of existence, it marched for over 24,000 kilometers, from the extreme South to the Northeast, ending in the Midwest by crossing the border into Bolivia. It failed to garner the support of the rural population, and, suffering from disease and starvation, its members were chased out of the country by henchmen from northeastern Coronéis. Despite this relative failure, they had a profound impact on the political landscape, and gained some support within urban areas, to the point that Prestes was nicknamed Cavaleiro da Esperança (Hope's Knight). Many of their leaders went on to become significant political figures, such as Prestes, the longtime leader of the Brazilian Communist Party, and Eduardo Gomes, eventual presidential candidate.

The Tenentismo movement was important at least symbolically in its opposition to the politics of the Old Republic. Ironically, however, the end of the Old Republic would be the event that would divide the movement forever. Events like the Tenentista revolts helped to wear down the Old Republic, but the defining factor in bringing about its end was the economic crisis of 1929. There was some dissatisfaction in the other states with the political dominance of Minas Gerais and São Paulo, especially when it came to the government's policies of maintaining coffee prices and indirectly subsidizing its producers. With the Great Depression and drastic decreases in coffee prices, however, for the first time the interests of these two major states differed. São Paulo had a greater interest in maintaining the existing policy with regards to coffee, and in the 1930 elections it broke its pact with Minas Gerais. Part of the pact was that the president would always support the candidate supported by the governor of the other state for president, so that the states would always alternate on who held the presidency. In 1929, however, the ruling president, Washington Luís Pereira de Sousa, a former governor of São Paulo, declared his support for the current governor of São Paulo, Júlio Prestes. Because of this, Minas Gerais' oligarchies supported the governor of Rio Grande do Sul, Getúlio Vargas, for president. Political leaders from both states created the Aliança Liberal in 1929 in order to support his candidacy. Besides the opposition to São Paulo dominance in the political sphere, the alliance also supported secret voting, a greater independence for the judiciary, and amnesty to all those who participated in the Tenentista revolts. Vargas was defeated in an election surrounded by claims of fraud, but his alliance had enough power to overthrow the government, especially since they had the support of most of the military and of the Tenentistas. Despite the amnesty to the Tenentistas, part of the movement, especially the more left-leaning leaders, strongly opposed the new government. Notably, Prestes went so far as to write a manifesto condemning Vargas and calling for a real revolution. This division marked the end of the Tenentismo as a united movement. Others who initially supported Vargas would also move to the opposition as he extended his powers. And members of the movement would continue to have an important role in Brazilian politics, as they helped depose Vargas in 1945, launching Eduardo Gomes as candidate in the presidential elections of 1945 and 1950 and Juarez Távora in 1955, all unsuccessfully.

The Vargas Era (1930–1945)

The Vargas era can be divided into three periods: the provisional (1930–4), the constitutional (1934–7), and the Estado Novo (New State) (1937–45). Getúlio Vargas was kept first as an interim president until a new Constitution was crafted. When that happened in 1934, he was elected by Congress as president, and in 1937 he used the threat of communism to grant himself extraordinary powers and extend his mandate. This was a period of relative calm, compared to the Old Republic. New labor laws, cooptation of labor unions, and a stronger and more centralized state made revolts like the Tenentista uprisings and the Contestado war a thing of the past. There were only two significant uprisings during these years, and only one of them used anything that resembled guerilla tactics. The first was the Constitutionalist Revolution of 1932. This was an organized action on the part of the São Paulo state, and did not involve guerillas in any significant way. São Paulo oligarchies were dissatisfied with the Vargas government and with the fact that he had been in power for two years in a “provisional” way with no end in sight. The revolt was suppressed that same year, but some of its stated objectives were achieved, as elections for Congress were held sometime later and a new Constitution crafted.

More significant, although far less successful, was the Intentona Comunista of 1935, a communist uprising led by Prestes. Organized with some help from Moscow, it was quickly suppressed, but gave Vargas the perfect excuse to grant himself extraordinary powers, prolonging his government and leading to a more brutal repression of left-wing forces.

The Intentona Comunista (1935)

After being forced to leave Brazil, members of the Prestes column stayed in exile until 1930, when many of them returned and joined other Tenentista movement members in supporting the Vargas government. One of the few exceptions to this was Prestes himself. After returning to Brazil and meeting with Vargas, he decided not to support him and issued a manifesto calling for a socialist revolution. Even though he explicitly supported communism, Prestes was rejected by the Brazilian Communist Party, as they deemed that his personality and celebrity status would overshadow the party. He then went on to live in Moscow for a few years, where he worked as an engineer. There, he became a member of the Comintern, which then forced the Brazilian Communist Party to accept him. In a meeting of Latin American communist parties it was decided that Brazil was a prime location for an insurrection, with Prestes as the leader.

In the meantime, Vargas was indirectly elected president. Forces in Brazil began to mobilize to oppose his government. One such was the Aliança Nacional Libertadora (National Liberation Alliance). It was created in March 1935 by former Tenentistas, socialists, and communists with the goal of fighting fascism, and specifically to depose Vargas. Prestes, who was out of the country at the time, was elected honorary president, a post he assumed when he returned to Brazil clandestinely in 1935. It must be stressed that the goals of the ANL were not the establishment of communism in Brazil, although several of its members would certainly have welcomed that. It was (or at least it was supposed to be) a popular anti-imperialist front, following a very common conviction among communist leaders of the time that before communism could be implemented in the peripheral nations they had to undergo a bourgeois revolution that freed them from the exploitation of imperialism, allowing capitalism to fully develop. As such, the ANL was supposed to congregate not only the left-wing sectors of society, but also the progressive bourgeoisie and parts of the elites who were in sectors that were not directly linked to the export-import economy. This can be seen in its goals, which were mostly nationalistic and non-revolutionary: default on the external debt, nationalization of foreign companies, democratic reforms and stronger individual freedoms. Its only difference from other popular fronts of the time is that, even though it emphasized the need for inter-class coalitions, it still believed that an armed insurrection was the way to go.

With plans for an armed insurrection ready, Prestes gave an eloquent speech upon his arrival in Brazil in which he called for “all power to the ANL.” By this time the ANL was a large organization with thousands of members. They were constantly involved in street fights with fascist supporters. The speech, which had national repercussions, gave Vargas the excuse he needed to outlaw the ANL and drive its members underground. But instead of weakening the movement, preparations for the uprising intensified. In November 1935 a military revolt in the northeastern area of Brazil signaled the start of the rebellion. Military battalions with the help of some civilians tried to take over the cities of Natal and Recife. They were successful in Natal and took over the government of the state. In Recife the insurgents were easily defeated. The ANL government in Natal was able to hold power for a few days, but it was eventually defeated by federal troops. A few days later, military battalions in Rio de Janeiro also rebelled, but again they were easily defeated by troops loyal to Vargas. The reasons for the rebels’ failure are several, two of which should be underlined. They hoped that their rebellion would incite the progressive bourgeoisie and its leaders to help them, and as such they had hoped that people such as the governor of Rio de Janeiro would use available resources to assist the ANL – something that never happened. They also hoped that the masses would fight on their side, which again failed to happen. Instead, the sectors upon which they were counting decided to support Vargas and his fight against the alleged communist threat of the ANL.

These events were followed by a wave of brutal repression. Prestes was jailed for ten years, his wife deported to Germany, and all other leaders of the movement incarcerated and tortured. For all its attempts to broaden its goals and generate inter-class support, the movement was still branded as communist and used by the ruling powers as a pretext for further authoritarian measures.

The Military Dictatorship (1964–1985)

The period following the overthrow of the Vargas government was one of relative calm. Populist policies coupled with the cooptation of class and union leaders and the fact that communist parties were outlawed for most of this time meant that there was very little support to organize any sort of meaningful guerilla movement. That would all change in the 1960s. The success of the Cuban Revolution, the João Goulart government, and the ensuing military coup led to greater mobilization by Brazilian left-wing organizations.

Goulart, or “Jango” as he was popularly called, was part of a political tradition called Trabalhismo, which originated with Vargas’ government and involved limited gains in terms of labor laws, cooptation of unions, and nationalization of industries in certain key infrastructural sectors. With the advent of the Cold War, the labor laws passed late in the first Vargas tenure, and the new divisions within Brazilian society (generated by rapid urbanization), such a tradition was now seen as dangerously close to “communist subversion.” So much so that when Jango, who was elected vice president in 1960, was set to assume the presidency in 1961 after the incumbent resigned, the military conspired to prevent it. After a brief standoff between troops loyal to Jango and those who supported the intervention, Jango was allowed to assume the presidency, but with limited power due to a compromise that established a parliamentary system of government. This led to a situation where demands and hopes by left-wing organizations were high, but the actual power to implement any sort of change was lacking. Established left-wing groups were also reluctant to engage in more decisive action. The Brazilian Communist Party firmly believed that the first priority of revolutionary movements was to save Brazil from imperialistic exploitation, as this would be the only way for national capitalism to develop. Once more, it emphasized the need for an inter-class alliance, and hoped that by forgoing armed struggle such a compromise could be reached.

The lack of action by the Communist Party and the federal government, coupled with the high expectations of some left-wing militants, quickly led to divisions within left-wing organizations. These divisions accelerated with events in the Soviet Union and the denunciation of Stalinism, which led to the expulsion of Stalinists from the Brazilian Communist Party. In this period of left-wing fragmentation several small groups started to plan armed insurgencies.

These splinter groups were small and had few resources, but nevertheless they made plans for establishing communism within a relatively short time frame. The inspiration behind this was the Cuban Revolution and the idealized view that a small group of rebels acting in isolation could inspire the masses to rise up in support. Such a perspective was called Foquismo because of its emphasis on a localized revolutionary focal point, which would spread the revolution throughout the region.

Numerous attempts at armed insurrection were repressed before they even left the planning stage. The first of these – the only one attempted during the democratic period – involved the Ligas Camponesas (peasant leagues), organizations comprised of small land owners and landless peasants who called for land reform. A few sectors and influential members of the leagues tried to create revolutionary camps in the distant town of Dianópolis, in the northern section of the Midwest state of Goiás. However, they were arrested within months of settling there. This sort of failed action would become commonplace in the early years of the dictatorship.

The military dictatorship started on April 1, 1964. Internationally, the independent foreign policy of Jango, coupled with the nationalization of a few foreign companies, drew the ire of the United States, which helped military conspirators plan the coup and provided resources to groups that would spearhead protests against the government. Internally, Jango's proposed reforms, including land reform, upset local elites, while the fact that such reforms did not go far enough in the eyes of left-wing organizations meant he had little or no support. Thus the military were able to overthrow him without force.

Two important splinter groups from the Communist Party were able to carry out successful actions against the government in local areas. The Ação Libertadora Nacional (ALN) was organized by Carlos Marighella after he was expelled from the CP. The Movimento Revolucionário Oito de Outubro (MR-8) was named after the date Che Guevara was captured and killed. They carried out several bank robberies and some kidnappings as a way of obtaining resources for larger actions, as well as pressuring the government into releasing political prisoners. The most daring of their actions was a joint operation in which they captured the American ambassador in 1969 and negotiated the release of several prisoners. These groups were never able to move beyond this stage, however, and the increasingly brutal dictatorship either dismantled such groups or drove their members into exile.

The Araguaia Guerilla Movement

In addition to such groups, Brazil also witnessed two distinct guerilla movements during the dictatorship. The first one was the Caparaó guerilla, a movement that was repressed in 1967 before it had a chance to move beyond the training stage. It was organized by the Movimento Nacional Revolucionário, a short-lived movement that disbanded as soon as its leaders were arrested. Much more significant was the Araguaia guerilla, named after the region where its training camp was located. It was able to resist the first government attack, but eventually all its members were killed, arrested, or driven into exile.

The Araguaia guerilla took place on the borders of the Araguaia River, in the desolate jungles of northern Brazil. Its history is familiar enough: the Communist Party of Brazil (PCdoB) – Stalinist dissidents from the Brazilian Communist Party – decided to organize a guerilla movement to establish a state of “prolonged popular war” in the Brazilian hinterlands. It was designed on the Maoist model and it was supposed to prepare and educate local populations about their objectives before engaging in any form of military struggle. The first members arrived in the region in 1970 and began to provide basic needs such as schooling and medical services to local populations. At its peak it had about eighty members. Ironically, it ended up following the Foquista example based on the Cuban Revolution, becoming an armed, autonomous guerilla movement acting alone and hoping to draw local support. This occurred because the military found out about the movement's plans in 1971 and dispatched federal troops. The rebels were able to avoid capture and fend off the federal troops until 1974, when over 15,000 troops were sent to the region to fight fewer than 100 rebels. Casualties were estimated at 16 army soldiers and 68 rebels, many of them killed after being captured and tortured.

The history of guerilla movements in twentieth-century Brazil is filled with organizations that never left the planning stage. Those that went further were mostly short lived. Most revolutionary movements mistakenly believed that Brazil was on the verge of a revolution and that the masses and some of the bourgeoisie would support them. This mistake cost them dearly.

SEE ALSO: Argentina, Armed Struggle and Guerilla Organizations, 1960s–1970s; Cuban Revolution, 1953–1959; Ligas Camponesas; Marxism; Prestes, Luís Carlos (1898–1990) and Prestes, Olga Benário (1908–1942)

References and Suggested Readings

- Gorender, J. (1987) Combate nas trevas. A esquerda brasileira: das ilusões perdidas à luta armada. São Paulo: Ed. Ática.
- Löwy, M. (Ed.) (1992) Marxism in Latin America from 1909 to the Present. Atlantic Highlands, NJ: Humanities Press.
- Marighella, C. (1971) For the Liberation of Brazil. Trans. J. Butt & R. Sheed. Penguin: Harmondsworth.
- Prestes, L. C. (1992) Manifesto, May 1930. In R. Levine (Ed.), The Brazil Reader: History, Culture, Politics. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Quartim, J. (1971) Dictatorship and Armed Struggle in Brazil. Trans. D. Fernbach. London: New Left Books.

Brazil, labor struggles

Paulo Fontes and Fernando T. Silva

In 1858 the printers of Rio de Janeiro went on strike for a wage increase. While they considered themselves qualified craftsmen, they articulated a certain class identity and language leading to identification with the oppression suffered by all workers. This movement is considered to be the first workers' strike in Brazil, but such a view is valid only if one ignores the experience of enslaved peoples in working-class formation. Even before the printers' stoppage, the slaves of a large foundry and shipyard in Rio de Janeiro had stopped their activities in protest against punishment inflicted on their companions. Starting from the second half of the nineteenth century, breakouts, rebellions, legal actions in the courts to purchase liberty, formation of quilombos (communities of fugitive slaves), abolition movements, strikes, and associations of various kinds were just some of the combat and survival strategies around which free workers, freed slave workers, and enslaved workers shared their traditions, experiences, and common goals. In the aftermath of the Great Migration at the end of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, white laborers, former slaves, and descendants of Africans participated in working-class uprisings with strong political reverberations, such as the 1904 Rio de Janeiro Vaccine Revolt against the compulsory vaccination campaign aimed at curbing the smallpox epidemic in the city.

With urban and industrial growth in the late nineteenth century, intense immigration, and the deception that succeeded the proclamation of the republic, urban workers developed a strong associative movement that was considerably in evidence from at least 1850, as demonstrated by the many religious fraternities formed among ethnic and occupational categories, and large numbers of mutual aid associations. This associative culture expressed a visible class identity although it stemmed mainly from the initiative of skilled workers who were not typically militant. Brazil's mutual aid societies reached an apogee with the advance of urbanization, organized according to ethnic group, trade or occupational categories, company of employment, or neighborhood. Most programs of these mutual aid groups were directed strictly to objectives of assistance and were expressly politically neutral, but many engaged in resistance, counting among their ranks republican, socialist, and even anarchist militants.

In the period of the First Republic (1889–1930), trade unions usually formed during strikes or right after, and had an ephemeral existence. The better-structured unions, and those with greater influence in the labor movement, comprised skilled workers (bricklayers, printers, stonemasons, etc.) whose professional skills provided labor market power over employers and bargaining advantages unskilled workers did not have. Textile workers, who numbered in the thousands, encountered greater difficulty in mobilizing; industrial unions predominated and formed federations in municipal and state spheres, setting the stage for the foundation in 1906 of the national Confederação Operária Brasileira (COB) (Brazilian Worker Federation), a union with nominal power.

Enthusiastic about prospects for widening citizenship for workers with the Proclamation of the Republic, many socialists tended to prefer the political-parliamentary field to defend workers' interests. The socialists' performance was marked by evolutionist scientificism, by Saint Simon-type industrialism, and a moderate and legalist orientation. The socialists' political success was slight, though several were significant, including São Paulo's Círculo Socialista Avanti! trade union.

Interaction and integration among workers' parties and trade unionism was, however, fragile due to very limited worker participation in elections. Less than 6 percent of the population participated in the 11 presidential elections of the First Republic, where electoral recruitment was the monopoly of parties of rural oligarchies in the states. Electoral fraud, prohibition of votes for the illiterate, and the overwhelming presence of immigrants indifferent to any appeals for naturalization were all sufficient motives for the advance of anarchism and revolutionary syndicalism, and both viewed the electoral process as mere farce.

Up until the end of the 1920s anarchists were divided into those refusing to participate in trade unions, those defending their tactical or contextual presence in unions to disseminate anarchist principles, and still others who thought that trade unions should be free of ideological disputes. In practice differences tended to become diluted, but revolutionary syndicalism was definitely the most important tendency during the First Republic, notably in São Paulo. That faction rejected party politics, political proselytizing, and the existence of the state, holding that direct action was the only legitimate means of emancipation for the working class. Revolutionary syndicalists considered the general strike as the workers' most efficient weapon, defending the idea that trade unions should be the preferential locus for the class struggle and inculcating a sense of collective ownership over the means of production.

In Rio de Janeiro the reformist faction of syndicalism attained the greatest visibility in the labor movement, comprised of a heterogeneous group of positivists, republicans, socialists, and others. They all had in common a minimum set of principles: actions within the limits of legality, defense of mediators in labor-capital conflicts, support for legislative measures in favor of workers, use of strikes only as a last resort and, in some cases, supporting worker candidates in electoral disputes. Reformists, strongest among port and transport workers, were widespread in Rio de Janeiro, which was the seat of government and the most dynamic political-administrative center in the country, where politicians, journalists, and union leaders held negotiations with public authorities in moments of conflict, much less evident in São Paulo.

In general terms, workers confronted a range of dangers to their living standards and divisions: low wages, long working hours, precarious housing, insalubrious working conditions, unemployment, ethnic rivalry, political repression, and the intransigence of managers. In response to such adversity the labor movement, until the end of the 1910s, engaged in collective actions consisting of strikes in a single company or in entire categories, including the stoppage at all the textile factories of the federal capital from August to September 1903, which led to a general strike that was severely repressed. In 1906 and 1907 the movement in defense of an 8-hour day paralyzed the city of Porto Alegre, but in São Paulo worker struggles reached a significant level in 1912 and 1913, notably strikes in opposition to the law for deporting foreigners, and the increase in the cost of living.

The 1917 general strike in São Paulo was a labor convulsion of unprecedented dimensions. The death of the Spanish shoemaker Antonio Martinez from a shot fired by a policeman on July 9 instigated a militant strike wave as some 50,000 workers put down their tools during a four-day period of looting, shooting, and barricades. At the root of the insurrection was worker discontent over exhausting, unhealthy, and dangerous conditions in the factories, and mostly, the high cost of living. Anarchist leaders, revolutionary syndicalists, and one socialist formed the Comitê de Defesa Proletária (Proletarian Defense Committee) to elaborate a list of demands. The workers won a 20 percent wage increase, the commitment of employers not to sack strikers, and the promise of the state government to free those imprisoned during the melee and to legislate for better living and working conditions. The workers celebrated their victory and a fever of associative sentiment swept the city, leading to a proliferation of new unions, neighborhood leagues, and worker newspapers. But the euphoria was short-lived, as an upsurge in arrests, deportation of foreigners, closure of unions, and total disrespect for the agreement on the part of the company owners followed. In 1919 and 1920 a strike wave arose in other Brazilian cities, with workers presenting similar demands to those of 1917. The São Paulo strikes provoked redoubled reaction among employers in the next few years: continuous repression and the formulation of social and labor laws.

In the 1920s new actors appeared on the scene. In 1922 the Communist Party of Brazil (PCB) was founded, including in its ranks ex-revolutionary syndicalists and ex-anarchists. In São Paulo and Santos the PCB only managed to acquire a more expressive presence in the syndical movement at the end of the decade. In Rio de Janeiro, by means of the Bloco Operário (Workers' Bloc), the PCB elected one city councilor in 1926 and two others in 1928, but generally speaking the party gained only meager electoral success.

In 1922 in Rio de Janeiro, and 1924 in São Paulo, insurrections among young military officers were important turning points for the working class in the army. The Coluna Prestes (Prestes Column) carried that movement forward and soon became a myth: in two years troops under the command of Captain Luís Carlos Prestes marched 25,000 kilometers without suffering a single military defeat. Such movements, which were called tenentistas ("Lieutenantist"), sought to instigate a coup d'état, but to do so without the participation of the ordinary classes in the process of political and social transformation. In the struggle against the domination of the agrarian oligarchy, tenentismo viewed itself as a movement to regenerate republican institutions and autonomy of the armed forces, defending state centralization and secrecy of the vote, and imbued with a vague sense of nationalism. During the 1930s the left-wing sectors of tenentismo incorporated themselves into the Communist Party, thereby considerably expanding the influence of the PCB on the Brazilian political scene. Luís Carlos Prestes became the main party leader in the decades to follow.

The "revolution of 1930," supported by the majority of the "lieutenants," brought the reformist rural oligarch Getúlio Vargas to power. The "revolutionaries" defended the line that class conflict ought to make way for harmony between workers and employers. In 1931 a law instituted a single union for each category and municipality, to be submitted for recognition to the ministry of labor. The ministry, in turn, was empowered to intervene in union activities, removing "undesirable" directors, including anarchists, communists, and socialists, who ferociously opposed such "official unionism" of the early 1930s.

In a context of economic crisis and increasing political polarization, those political currents took the lead in the strikes and protests mobilizing thousands of workers, especially from 1934 to 1935. The continual intervention of the state in workers' organizations, conditioning eventual legal rights to form official unions, and especially the generalized repression unleashed by the Vargas government after a military insurrection set in motion by communists in the armed forces in November 1935, finally defeated any possible effort for organized resistance of the autonomous trade union movement.

The dictatorship of the Estado Novo (New State) from 1937 to 1945 crowned the victory of corporate unionism, and on May 1, 1943, after nearly a decade of intense legislative activity, the Consolidated Labor Laws (CLT) were instituted, regulating the work of several labor categories and arbitrating individual and collective disputes between workers and employers, with the exception of rural workers. But Brazil's entry into World War II on the side of the Allies led to a suspension of labor rights and the recrudescence of employer despotism.

However, in the euphoria following the end of the war, thousands of workers engaged in a mass strike wave, many organized by workers' committees, ignoring trade union leaders who refused to support them. Many categories of workers opened direct negotiations with the owners and employers, ignoring and brushing aside the corporative institutions. In cities with high concentrations of industrial workers the PCB achieved important electoral victories. In December 1945, among the 15 communists elected as federal deputies, 9 were workers.

The objective of workers in the postwar period was to deliver a message: it was going to be increasingly difficult to govern without taking into consideration the interests of the working class. However, President Dutra (1946–50) would not accept that message, intervening in the unions and declaring the Communist Party illegal.

The labor movement only surfaced again in the second Vargas government (1951–4), in the midst of rising prices. In March 1953, 60,000 workers demonstrated in the streets of São Paulo in a parade known as the “empty pot” march, expressing dissatisfaction culminating in the Strike of the 300 Thousand. For 27 days from March to April, textile workers, metalworkers, glass workers, printing industry workers, and others paralyzed the country’s businesses. Despite winning a wage increase of only 23 percent (37 percent less than demanded) the movement was successful, as union membership grew, new leaders emerged from factory committees, union boards opposing the strike were marginalized, and the Pact for Inter-Union Unity was created, which crystallized around 100 unions.

The Strike of the 300 Thousand was a mark of the future challenges of the working class. In the 1950s intense labor migration from rural regions, above all from the Northeast, to the great urban centers added 3 million industrial workers in steel, automobiles, national petroleum, and gigantic hydroelectric plants, creating a new class calculus. From the mid-1950s on, development with nationalism was the great rallying force of leftists who defended strengthening the national bourgeoisie and the state in the productive sector, while controlling foreign capital and demanding social justice.

Alliances between communists and the left wing of the Partido Trabalhista Brasileiro (PTB) (Brazilian Labor Party) fashioned a labor movement on a national scale, including a massive mobilization and unionization of rural workers in the early 1960s. In 1962 the Comando Geral dos Trabalhadores (CGT) was created, in defiance of the CLT, which expressly forbid federations of union organizations. With João Goulart president of the republic from 1961 to 1964 the union movement pressed for wide-scale “base reforms” (agrarian, welfare, and others) and participation in the national government, managing to influence the choice of ministers committed to their cause. The opposition considered working-class participation as a “Cubanization” of the country, the “Trade Union Republic,” and communist atheism. “Enough!” cried newspaper headlines, and on April 1, 1964 João Goulart was deposed in a military coup d’état. Upon taking power, the government intervened in trade unions, deposed leaders, arrested militants (some were tortured to death), and set in motion a process of rigid control over the labor movement.

In spite of the repression, the labor movement found interstices where it could be active, at least during the first four years of the military regime. In the explosive situation of 1968, workers appeared once more on the scene. Generalized strikes broke out in the industrial cities of Osasco (São Paulo) and Contagem (Minas Gerais), but were violently suppressed by police and army. Given the context of growing discontent among the common people, and student demonstrations, the military government closed parliament, abolished a whole set of civil rights, and intensified the dictatorial nature of the regime. Under the dictatorship, the country entered on a new phase of economic growth anchored by external debt, transnational corporate investment, and vigorous state participation in the economy. From 1969 to 1973 the country’s GNP expanded at average rates of over 10 percent per annum in what became known as the Brazilian miracle. Urbanization, industrialization, and internal migrations accelerated, as did social inequities. In the factories and workplaces the rhythm of work intensified, management authoritarianism prevailed, and wages were tightly controlled. In an atmosphere of intense societal repression and control over unions, strikes practically disappeared and worker struggles fragmented, sometimes appearing clandestinely within companies.

Working-class neighborhoods remained an important space for popular resistance. With the military and political defeat of left-wing factions opting for armed struggle, and intense persecution of the Communist Party and the inheritors of populist and laborite traditions, progressive sectors of the church that had adopted the directives of the theology of liberation ever since the 1960s became increasingly influential in emerging urban and rural social movements. The crisis of the economic miracle in the 1970s and the process of gradual political distension controlled by the military regime were the basis of a new workers' struggle.

In 1978 a spontaneous strike of metalworkers in the ABC industrial region of São Paulo took the country by surprise. In the following three years, hundreds of strikes across labor sectors – metalworkers, bank workers, teachers, rural laborers, and beyond – demonstrated strong dissatisfaction with the government, challenged the military regime, and put workers at the forefront of the struggle for re-democratization. The strikes that played a decisive role in the labor movement also brought to the fore the leadership of a young trade unionist of the ABC metalworkers, Luis Inácio da Silva, better known as Lula.

On one side, trade unionists demanded greater participation of the social bases, greater freedom for unions, and a radical re-democratization for the country. On the other, the more conservative and moderate sectors of the labor movement, including members of the Communist Party, counseled caution defending not only the establishment of an ample political alliance to combat the military regime, in which workers would not necessarily be protagonists, but also preservation of essential aspects of trade union structures inherited from the policies of Vargas. The rift between the two perspectives characterized the labor movement from 1979 to 1983 in spite of efforts to create a unified labor confederation for joint action. Trade unionists of the first group, allied with militants of various social movements, sectors linked to the progressive factions of the Catholic Church, and a variety of left-wing groups, founded the Partido dos Trabalhadores (PT) (Worker's Party) in 1980, and three years later its own trade union federation, Central Única dos Trabalhadores (CUT). In turn, part of the more conservative sectors of the Brazilian trade union movement continued entrenched in the confederations of the official union structure while yet another faction, supported by communist trade union leaders, founded the Central Geral dos Trabalhadores (CGT) in 1986. In 1991, advocating a business unionism of North American inspiration, a significant group of labor leaders broke with the CGT and founded the Força Sindical, which became the second largest labor national organization, after CUT.

In contrast to all the international tendencies of the 1980s, trade unionism and intense social struggle expanded dramatically in the 1980s. The trade union movement played a fundamental role in Brazil's re-democratization, actively participating in massive campaigns for direct presidential elections in 1984 and applying pressure in defense of worker rights at the National Constituent Assembly (1987–8). Against a background of renewed economic crisis and growing inflation, strikes to preserve the purchasing power of wages and reduce working hours multiplied. Indeed, from 1985 to 1992 workers engaged in more than 15,000 strikes, more than any period in Brazil's history. Brazilian trade unionism in the 1980s definitively extended its outreach to all sectors of the country, expanding well beyond traditional strongholds to civil services and rural workers. However, despite the significant presence of trade unions in the public realm, former problems persisted. The 1988 constitution abolished many elements of labor repression, but the pillars of the official trade union structure remained intact. Labor organization in the workplace was fragile and restricted to a few sectors, and equally trade union penetration in the growing informal sector of the economy was minimal.

The neoliberal reforms and deregulation of the economy, and insertion of the country in the framework of globalization initiated during the government of Fernando Collor (1990–2), deepened during Fernando Henrique Cardoso's two terms as president (1995–2002), were a setback for Brazilian trade unionism. The defeat of the petroleum workers' strike in 1995 was emblematic of a new phase of labor repression, comparable to the defeat of the British coal miners' strike by Margaret Thatcher ten years earlier. Cornered by hostile media and successive governments, the labor movement went on the defensive and moved in a retrograde cooperative direction. The control of inflation followed by a period of low economic growth and increasing unemployment, together with an intense process of productive restructuring, industrial reallocation, and increasing precariousness of labor relations, greatly reduced workers' mobilization and strike capacity.

In 2002 Lula was elected president (and was re-elected in 2006), the first time a left-wing workers' leader took power in Brazil, awakening enormous expectations among workers and labor leaders. While Lula could not advance the much-anticipated and far-reaching labor and union reforms first envisioned, he created a relatively favorable context for strengthening union bargaining power.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism; Brazil, Guerilla Movements, 20th Century; Brazil, Workers and the Left: Partido dos Trabalhadores and Central Única dos Trabalhadores; Movimento Sem Terra (MST); Prestes, Luís Carlos (1898–1990) and Prestes, Olga Benário (1908–1942); União dos Lavradores e Trabalhadores Agrícolas do Brasil (ULTAB-Brazil)

References and Suggested Readings

- Araújo, A. (1998) A construção do consentimento: corporativismo e trabalhadores nos anos trinta. São Paulo: Scritta.
- Batalha, C. (2000) O movimento operário na Primeira República. Rio de Janeiro: Jorge Zahar.
- Cardoso, A. (1999) Sindicatos, trabalhadores e a coqueluche neoliberal. Rio de Janeiro: Editora da Fundação Getulio Vargas.
- Chalhoub, S. (1999) Cidade febril: cortiços e epidemias na corte imperial. São Paulo: Companhia das Letras.
- Fortes, A. et al. (Eds.) (1999) Na luta por direitos. Estudos recentes em história social do trabalho. Campinas: Editora da Unicamp.
- French, J. (2004) Drowning in Laws: Labor Law and Brazilian Political Culture. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Gomes, A. (1988) A invenção do trabalhismo. São Paulo: Vértice.
- Hall, M. (2004) O movimento operário na cidade de São Paulo, 1890–1954. In P. Porta (Ed.), História da cidade de São Paulo, Vol. 3. Rio de Janeiro: Paz e Terra.
- Luca, T. (1990) O sonho do futuro assegurado: o mutualismo em São Paulo. São Paulo: Contexto.
- Mattos, M. (Ed.) (2004) Trabalhadores em greve, polícia em guarda. Rio de Janeiro: Bom Texto, Faperj.
- Munakata, K. (1981) A legislação trabalhista no Brasil. São Paulo: Brasiliense.
- Oliveira, C. & Mattoso, J. (Eds.) (1996) Crise e trabalho no Brasil. São Paulo: Scritta.
- Rodrigues, I. (1997) Sindicalismo e Política: a trajetória da CUT. São Paulo: Scritta.
- Toledo, E. (2004) Travessias revolucionárias: idéias e militantes sindicalistas em São Paulo e Itália (1890–1945). Campinas: Editora da Unicamp.
- Vianna, L. (1999) Liberalismo e Sindicato no Brasil. Belo Horizonte: Editora UFMG.
- Weinstein, B. (1996) For Social Peace in Brazil. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Welch, C. (1999) The Seed Was Planted: The São Paulo Roots of Brazil's Rural Labor Movements, 1924–1964. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press.

Brazil, peasant movements and liberation theology

Michael Löwy

Liberation theology is the expression of a vast social movement that emerged at the beginning of the 1960s. It is best expressed in a body of writings produced since 1970 by Latin American figures like Gustavo Gutiérrez (Peru), Hugo Assmann, Carlos Mesters, Leonardo and Clodovis Boff, Frei Betto (Brazil), Jon Sobrino, Ignacio Ellacuría (El Salvador), Pablo Richard (Chile/Costa Rica), Ruben Dri (Argentina), and Enrique Dussel (Argentina/Mexico) – to name only some of the best known. The theology began to emerge, however, well before these writers began to describe it. It involves significant sectors of the church (priests, religious orders, bishops), lay religious movements (Catholic Action, Christian University Youth, Young Christian Workers), popularly based pastoral networks (workers pastoral, peasants pastoral, urban pastoral), ecclesiastic base communities (CEBs), and several popular organizations created by CEB activists: women's clubs, neighborhood associations, and peasant or workers' unions. This social movement helped facilitate the emergence of a new workers' movement in Brazil and the rise of revolutions in Central America and Chiapas.

Usually this broad social/religious movement is referred to as “liberation theology,” but this is an inadequate term insofar as the movement appeared many years before the new theology – its first manifestations can be seen in Brazil at the beginning of the 1960s in certain documents of the JUC (Christian Academic Youth) – and most of its activists are hardly theologians at all. Sometimes it is also referred to as the “Church of the Poor,” but this social network goes well beyond the limits of the church as an institution, however broadly defined. To say that it is a social movement does not mean necessarily that it is an “integrated” and “well-coordinated” body, only that it has, like similar movements such as feminism, a certain capacity for mobilizing people around common aims.

Aspects of both “church” and “sect” can be found in liberation theology, perhaps better termed liberationist Christianity, which embraces the community ethics of brotherliness and neighborliness. All these elements can be found, in almost “pure” form, in the ecclesiastic base communities and popular pastorals in Latin America.

Liberationist Christianity is vigorously opposed by the Vatican and by the heading body of the church hierarchy in Latin America, the CELAM (Latin American Bishops’ Council), led since the early 1970s by the conservative wing of the church. This tension to some extent reveals a class struggle within the church since certain positions correspond to the interests of the ruling elites and others to those of the oppressed. On the other hand, the bishops, Jesuits, or priests who head the “Church of the Poor” are not themselves poor. Their rallying to the cause of the exploited is motivated by spiritual and moral reasons inspired by their religious culture, Christian faith, and Catholic tradition. Furthermore, this moral and religious dimension is an essential factor in the motivations of thousands of Christian activists in the trade unions, neighborhood associations, base communities, and revolutionary fronts. The poor themselves become conscious of their condition and organize to struggle as Christians, belonging to a church and inspired by a faith.

Liberation theology is the spiritual product of this social movement, but in legitimating it and providing it with a coherent religious doctrine, it has enormously contributed to its extension and reinforcement. Summarized in a single formula, the central idea of liberation theology is best expressed by the Puebla conference of the Latin American Bishops (1979), which described it as the preferential option for the poor. Importantly, however, it must be added that in this theology the poor are the agents of their own liberation and the subject of their own history – and not simply, as in the traditional doctrine of the church, the object of charitable attention.

For liberationist Christianity, choosing the side of the poor is not a mere literary phrase: it is expressed in practice by the commitment of hundreds of thousands of Christian members of base communities, lay people involved in pastoral work, priests, and members of religious orders. It is seen in the setting up of neighborhood committees in shantytowns, of class struggle currents in the trade unions, in the organization of landless peasant movements and the defense of political prisoners against torture.

The full recognition of the poor’s human dignity and the special historical and religious mission attributed to them by liberationist Christianity is certainly one of the reasons for its relative success, in some countries at least, in enlisting the support of the poorest layers of society. The motives for this can be better understood by referring to a most remarkable ideal-typical analysis proposed by Max Weber in his study of the economical ethics of the world religions: “The sense of dignity of socially repressed strata or of strata whose status is negatively (or at least not positively) valued is nourished most easily on the belief that a special ‘mission’ is entrusted to them.”

Whatever the differences between liberation theologians, several basic tenets can be found in most of their writings, which constitute radical innovations. First is the fight against idolatry, specifically the new idols of death adored by the new Pharaohs, the new Caesars, and the new Herods: Mammon, Wealth, the Market, National Security, the State, Military Force, and “Western Christian Civilization” as the main enemy of religion. Second is historical human liberation as the anticipation of the final salvation in Christ, the Kingdom of God. The third tenet is a critique of traditional dualist theology as the product of Platonic Greek philosophy, and not of the biblical tradition where human and divine history are distinct but inseparable. Fourth is a new reading of the Bible, giving significant attention to passages like Exodus as a paradigm of an enslaved people’s struggle for liberation. The fifth tenet is a sharp moral and social indictment of dependent capitalism as an unjust and iniquitous system, as a form of structural sin. Sixth is the use of Marxism as a social-analytical instrument in order to understand the causes of poverty, the contradictions of capitalism, and the forms of class struggle. The last two tenets include the preferential option for the poor and the solidarity with their struggle for self-liberation and the development of Christian base communities among the poor as a new form of church and as an alternative to the individualist way of life imposed by the capitalist system. These ideas of liberationist Christianity directly contributed to the rise of peasant/indigenous movements in several Latin American countries.

Rebellious Peasant Movements in Latin America

Liberation theology has contributed to the rise of rebellious peasant and indigenous movements in several places in Latin America. In some cases this has led to armed uprisings, as in Nicaragua in the 1970s, in El Salvador in the 1980s, and to a lesser extent in Guatemala during those years. More commonly, however, it has led to mass peasant mobilizations.

One such mass mobilization occurred in Ecuador. During many years the progressive sector of the church there helped to promote an autonomous movement among the Quechuas. The charismatic Monsignor Leonidas Proaño, bishop of Riobamba (Chimborazo), became well known in Latin America as “the Bishop of the Indians” because of his lifelong commitment to social justice and in support of the Ecuadorean Indian outcasts. With the help of 1,300 pastoral agents, including lay and clerical, local, national, and international personnel, he built an impressive network of parishes, schools, medical teams, centers, and institutes and created, with a group of Quechua leaders, the Indian Movement of Chimborazo (MICH) in 1982. Mgr. Proaño and his followers rejected the capitalist model of development as destructive of the indigenous culture and society and tried to propose an alternative model, a sort of Indian communalism based on the Quechua peasant tradition. Their action helped Indian communities throughout the country to take consciousness of their rights and claim them, for the first time in centuries. This is how a broad association was created – the National Indian Confederation of Ecuador (CONAIE). After his death in 1988, Mgr. Proaño was replaced by a new bishop, Mgr. Victor Corral, who continued the pastoral action of his predecessor.

In June 1994 the Ecuadorean government issued a neoliberal agrarian law, which offered strong guarantees to private property and excluded any further distribution of land. It aimed also at the complete submission of agriculture to the exclusive logic of the market: the communitarian lands could be parceled out and sold, and even the water could be privatized. Mgr. Victor Corral led the protest against the law, declaring that it defended the interests of those who “wanted to transform the country into an agro-industrial enterprise and reduce land to a commodity.”

The Indian movement – CONAIE, cooperative associations, MICH, peasant unions – and other popular forces mobilized against the law, with the support of the progressive church (the conservative bishops sided with the government). For two weeks the rural areas of Ecuador were in a semi-insurreccional state as Indian communities blocked roads, stopped traffic, and demonstrated in the towns. The army tried in vain to suppress the movement by arresting some of the leaders, closing the church radio stations that supported the Indians, and sending troops to open the roads. Only through an outright civil war could the Indian upsurge be crushed, and the government was forced to retreat and to introduce substantial modifications in the agrarian law. While the Indian rebellion was neither “led” nor “promoted” by the progressive church, liberationist Christianity – represented by Mgr. Proaño, his pastoral agents, and his successor – was certainly a crucial factor in developing a new awareness and stimulating self-organization among the Quechua communities. Other rebellions organized by CONAIE took place in the next 15 years, and the movement is still an important factor in the struggle for social change in Ecuador.

Another example is the peasant indigenous uprising in Chiapas in 1994, under the leadership of the Ejército Zapatista de Liberación Nacional (EZLN). The Zapatistas were described by the media as inspired by liberation theology and led by Jesuits, while Monsignor Samuel Ruiz, the bishop of San Cristobal de las Casas (Chiapas), was accused of being “God’s guerilla fighter.” In reality, however, it was not so simple.

Mgr. Ruiz studied at the Gregorian University in Rome and arrived in Chiapas in 1965, working for several years as head of the Department of Missions of the CELAM after taking part in the Medellín conference. Influenced by liberation theology, he published Teología Bíblica de la Liberación in 1975, celebrating Christ as a revolutionary prophet. By a patient work of pastoral education – with the help of Jesuits and female religious orders – he created in his diocese a vast network of 7,800 indigenous catechists and 2,600 base communities. The pastoral agents helped to raise consciousness among the indigenous and to organize them in order to struggle for their rights, in particular for the recovery of their ancient lands. Mgr. Ruiz supported the indigenous communities in their confrontation with the landowners and in particular with the rich cattle-raisers of Chiapas. He also took under his protection the numerous Guatemalan refugees who arrived in southern Mexico, fleeing the brutal military repression in their country.

This very concrete and practical option for the poor led to an increasing conflict with the Mexican authorities and with the cattle-raisers' association of Chiapas, who accused the bishop of "agitating the Indians." During the pope's visit to Mexico in 1990, a strong campaign was launched asking for the removal of the "troublemaker." In October 1993 the papal nuncio in Mexico, Mgr. Geronimo Prigione, summoned him to Mexico City and ordered him to resign – probably following a request from the Mexican authorities. While Mgr. Ruiz was appealing to Rome against this decision, the Zapatista uprising took place and the Mexican government, unable to suppress the movement, had to call on Mgr. Ruiz as a mediator in order to negotiate with the EZLN.

From the available data, it appears quite obvious that neither Mgr. Ruiz nor his Jesuit and religious agents were the "promoters" of the upsurge. As in El Salvador, consciousness raising and the impulse for self-organization created a new political-religious culture among a significant part of the indigenous population. In a second stage, a revolutionary cadre, probably of Marxist background, built on this new social and political consciousness and helped to organize several thousand Indians, with the support of their communities, into an armed force. The ideology of the EZLN is not religious and draws its main symbolic references from the Mayan culture. It is true, however, that the patient work of education and empowerment of the indigenous communities by Mgr. Ruiz and his catechists created a favorable environment for the rise of the Zapatista movement.

One of the most important examples of the impact of liberationist Christianity in the rise of peasant movements is Brazil's Rural Landless Workers' Movement (MST), founded in 1985 (see below). Today the MST is one of the largest social movements in Brazil and in all of Latin America. It brings together thousands of peasants, poor farmers, posseiros (small landowners without titles), and salaried agricultural workers – a significant proportion of them women – in a tenacious combat against the formidably non-egalitarian structure of land ownership and for a radical agrarian reform. The term rural workers encompasses this diversity by emphasizing work and class as the common denominator and as the basis for a necessary alliance with urban workers against neoliberalism. Completely secular and non-denominational, the MST still has its roots in the socioreligious culture of what could be called liberation Christianity.

After supporting the April 1964 military coup in Brazil (in the name of defending Christian values against an imaginary "Bolshevik menace"), the church became in the 1970s the main force of opposition to the dictatorial regime and to its strongly non-egalitarian development model. For the most advanced Catholic sector, inspired by liberation theology and inspiring, in turn, the ecclesiastical base communities, responsibility for the people's poverty and sufferings lay with capitalism itself. For example, in a joint declaration of 1973, the bishops and superiors of religious orders in Brazil's Central Western Region published a document entitled "The Cry of the Churches," which concluded that "Capitalism must be defeated: it is the greatest evil, the accumulated sin, the rotten root, the tree that produces all these fruits which we know so well: poverty, hunger, disease, death."

In his studies on economic history and the sociology of religion, Max Weber had already drawn attention to the "profound aversion" of the Catholic ethic – of Lutheranism as well – to capitalism's cold and impersonal spirit. This "traditional" attitude is found in the positions of the most radical current of Brazilian Catholicism, with two important differences: (1) the moral protest against capitalism is supplemented by a modern social analysis of Marxist inspiration (dependency theory); (2) the poor are no longer perceived primarily as victims and objects for compassion and charity, but as the subjects of their own history, the actors in their own liberation.

Brazil's Landless Workers' Movement

Of all the structures tied to the church, few have incarnated this "preferential option for the poor" in as radical and consistent a fashion as the Pastoral Land Commission (CPT), founded in 1975. The CPT is a vast network composed of members of the clergy, especially from the religious orders but also priests and even some bishops, and lay people of various types, such as theologians, experts, Bible scholars, sociologists, and above all lay workers, often coming from the rural milieu. The CPT, then, has been a formidable school for peasant leaders. At first established in the North Region – Amazonia – and the Northeast Region, it has spread out little by little to the whole of the country, thanks to its direct connection to the CNBB (National Conference of Brazilian Bishops).

Many lay workers, but also some members of the clergy, of whom the best known is Father Josimo Tavares, the organizer of the so-called Parrot's Beak region, have paid with their lives for the CPT's active and intransigent commitment to the side of the rural workers struggling for their rights. The millenarianism of the CPT – but also of the CEBs and in a general way of liberationist Christianity – is expressed in the socioreligious utopia of the "Kingdom of God," not as a transcendent quality projected into another world, but as a new society here on earth, one based on love, justice, and freedom. However, contrary to traditional millenarian beliefs, this "Kingdom" is not conceived as imminent but as the result of a long march (caminhada is the Brazilian word) toward the Promised Land, following the biblical model of the Exodus. The present social struggles are theologically interpreted as stages that prefigure and herald the "Kingdom." This is a reading of the Bible that is innovative and charged with a social message, including the "illegal" occupations of idle land and the setting up of democratically self-managed camps.

An important stage in the movement's establishment was the regional (South) meeting in January 1984 in Cascavel (Parana state), the first to be organized by the members themselves and not by the CPT. Among the resolutions adopted were a declaration of autonomy in relation to the CPT as well as all other institutions, and the definition of the movement's objectives: agrarian reform and a new society that is "just and egalitarian, different from capitalism." The final document denounced the Land Statute granted by the military as capitalist, anti-popular, and favorable to the concentration of landed property.

The CPT supplied a decisive contribution to this process of self-organization, but tensions gradually appeared as the movement was freeing itself from its "advisors." Some members of the clergy and some bishops had trouble accepting that the MST would escape entirely from their friendly solicitude and would not follow their reasonable advice. The question of "violence" crystallized the disagreements. For example, at the time of the occupation of the Annoni estate (Rio Grande do Sul), 49 progressive bishops – participating in the Sixth Interchurch Encounter of the CEBs in July 1986 – published a declaration which supported the occupation but laid great emphasis on its peaceful character and warned the movement, in veiled terms, against an "explosion of violence" that would have a "bloody repression" as its consequence. But, little by little, the organizers of the CPT and the majority of the bishops who were close to it resigned themselves to the MST's separation, and supplied consistent support while respecting its autonomy.

The MST was, therefore, constituted as a secular independent movement that encouraged the "illegal" occupation of idle land and the setting up of democratically self-managed camps, yet it had ties to religious organizations. Despite its secular and non-confessional character, it is no secret that the great majority of the active members and cadres of the MST are originally from the CPT and the CEBs. Some have retained ties with these structures, but all of them have borrowed their socioreligious culture and the deepest ethical motivation for their commitment from liberation Christianity.

The socioreligious utopia of liberation Christianity is present, implicitly or explicitly, in the numerous rituals that mark the struggles and the way of life of the MST's encampments: celebrations, processions, marches, songs, speeches. These rituals, organized by the cadres and members of the movement – of whom the majority are oriented toward liberation theology – are well received by the peasants, despite the fact that the majority of the population of the camps are closer to (Catholic) traditional popular religious practice – belief in the magical powers of the saints – than to the new theology. A growing minority of neo-Pentecostalist Protestants are also present, a little disconcerted by the simultaneously Catholic and politicized ambiance of the encampments, but drawn by the struggle for land. Two other minorities, less important, of European origin and present especially in the south of the country, are the "Romanized" Catholics (strictly obeying the doctrine of the Vatican) and the historical Lutherans, who are often close to liberation theology.

But the “mystique” pervades the MST’s secular socioreligious culture in a more general fashion. The term is used by the members themselves to designate their moral intransigence, emotional commitment, devotion to the cause at the risk of their lives, and hope for radical social change. The movement’s mystique displays itself, writes João Pedro Stedile, one of the principal leaders of the MST, “in the symbols of our culture, in our values, in the conviction that you have to struggle,” and above all in the belief in “the possibility of a more just and fraternal society.”

This secular mystique and this lay millenarianism are present in the rituals, the texts, the speeches, and the education of the movement’s activists. They represent a sort of investment of the members’ “believing energy” in the MST’s revolutionary utopia. This stubborn faith in the coming of a new society “different from capitalism” – the lay equivalent of the “Kingdom” – does not prevent the MST from acting with a perfectly modern rationality, by setting itself immediate and concrete objectives, by negotiating with the authorities from a position of strength, and by organizing profitable and productive agricultural cooperatives. This successful synthesis of utopia and realism has undoubtedly contributed to making the MST not only the organized expression of the struggle of the poor of the countryside for radical agrarian reform, but also the central reference for all the forces of Brazil’s “civil society” – unions, churches, left parties, professional and academic associations – which struggle against neoliberalism.

SEE ALSO: Brazil, Workers and the Left: Partido dos Trabalhadores and Central Única dos Trabalhadores; Canudos, Religion and Rebellion in 19th-Century Brazil; Ejército de Liberación Nacional, Colombia; Gutiérrez, Gustavo (b. 1928); Latin America, Catholic Church and Liberation, 16th Century to Present; Movimento Sem Terra (MST); Zapatismo; Zapatistas, EZLN, and the Chiapas Uprising

References and Suggested Readings

- Gaiger, L. I. (1987) Agentes religiosos e camponeses sem terra no sul do Brasil. Petropolis: Vozes.
- Gorgen, F. S. A. (1959) Os cristãos e a questao da terra. São Paulo: Editora FTD.
- Hobsbawm, E. (1959) Primitive Rebels: Studies in Archaic Forms of Social Movement in the 19th and 20th Centuries. New York: Norton Library.

Löwy, M. (1978) Los Obispos Latinoamericanos entre Medellín y Puebla. San Salvador: Universidad Centroamericana.

Löwy, M. (1996) The War of the Gods: Religion and Politics in Latin America. London: Verso.

Stedile, J. P. (1977) A Reforma Agraria e a Luta do MST. Petropolis: Vozes.

Weber, M. (1967) “The Social Psychology of the World Religions” and “Religious Rejections of the World and their Directions.” In H. Gerth & C. Wright Mills, From Max Weber. London: Routledge.

Brazil, rebellions from independence to the republic (1700s–1889)

Diogo L. Pinheiro

The history of the process through which Brazil achieved independence is unique in the world. It is the only case of a colony becoming the de facto head of an empire. Independence was achieved almost bloodlessly in 1822, when the son of the Portuguese monarch was crowned Emperor of Brazil. Brazil became a republic in 1889.

Independence Movements in the Colonial Period

Brazil had been continuously colonized by the Portuguese since they first landed in the northeast in 1500. For a long time, the exploitation of fertile lands and the discovery of gold in the interior of the colony guaranteed prosperity for the metropole. For most of the seventeenth century, Brazil had a near-monopoly on the global production and export of sugar, and by the time sugar production spread to the Caribbean and elsewhere, gold was discovered in the interior. During the first three quarters of the eighteenth century, Brazil was the world’s largest producer of gold. Portugal was heavily dependent on its main colony: it is estimated that about 60 percent of Portugal’s exports during this period were re-exports of Brazilian produce. However, for all this bounty, Portugal was still a semi-peripheral nation far behind other empires such as the British, the French, and even the Spanish.

Portugal’s fragility is shown in its many treaties and trade relations during this period. In the early stages of the War of Spanish Succession (1701–14) Portugal allied itself with France, assuming a submissive role in exchange for naval protection. However, given the ease with which the British could reach Portuguese shores, it soon began negotiations to switch sides. The result was the 1703 Treaty of Methuen, named after the lead English negotiator, Lord John Methuen (1650–1706). Besides affecting the War of Spanish Succession, this treaty had an immense impact on British–Portuguese trade relations, which in turn deeply affected Portugal’s relations with its colonies. The treaty granted Portuguese wines free access to the British market, while reducing tariffs of English cloths to zero. While this boosted the Portuguese wine industry, it also led to the virtual disappearance of Portuguese manufacturing, which was competing on unfavorable terms with English goods. This generated a long-term trade imbalance. Portugal sustained itself by re-exporting goods and gold from its colonies. This essentially turned the metropole into a mere intermediary. Such a system was only possible because of the extensive restrictions placed upon Brazil by the Portuguese. Brazil was only allowed to trade with Portugal and no manufacturing could take place within Brazilian territory. Even culture was restricted: censorship outlawed the importing of most books to Brazil, and universities and colleges were strictly forbidden.

However, the Brazilian elite still had close ties to the Portuguese. Brazilian colonization was slow and most of the land was given by the Portuguese crown to a select few donatários, which meant that a significant part of the landed aristocracy still strongly identified with the colonizers. Pro-imperialist sentiment extended throughout the colonial administration, where, unlike the rest of Latin America, it was common to see native-born persons holding important posts. These connections extended to trade relations, since the export-oriented Brazilian economy involved lasting ties with Portuguese merchants. Additionally, slow colonization that benefited those well connected with the Portuguese crown, combined with a large influx of African slaves to work the plantations, created a society sharply divided between landowners and slaves. Thus, many landowners actually desired the Portuguese presence as a way of maintaining order and suppressing any slave uprisings. Given the weakness of the metropole and all these close ties, it was relatively easy to circumvent the rules when necessary.

There were only four notable movements organized by Brazilians to gain independence, and all were of limited scope. Two of them, the 1794 Conjuração Carioca and the 1801 Conspiração dos Suassunas, were more like organized debating societies that shared some Enlightenment principles. They were repressed before they could even consider planning any sort of concrete action. The Carioca movement was centered on a literary debating society that met regularly in Rio de Janeiro. This society brought together intellectuals who would discuss works by progressive writers. In 1794 they were prosecuted for possessing books outlawed by the authorities. Most of the society’s members were tried for conspiracy, but due to the lack of evidence the charges were dropped. The 1801 conspiracy was similar: a secret society dedicated to discussing the principles of the French Revolution was unsuccessfully prosecuted by the crown. The two other movements, the Inconfidência Mineira of 1789 and the Conjuração Baiana of 1798, were far more significant.

Inconfidência Mineira

In the first quarter of the eighteenth century the captaincy of Minas Gerais experienced what was to that point the greatest gold rush in the Western hemisphere. By 1711 that gold rush led to the town of Vila Rica (modern Ouro Preto) being given the status of city, and, soon afterwards, capital of Minas Gerais. It soon became the largest city in the Americas, attracting thousands with the promise of a golden fortune. The region became the largest producer of gold in the world, helping Portugal fulfill its obligations with its trade partners. However, by the middle of the century the gold began to give out, and soon the local economy started to shift to a more self-reliant mix of agriculture and export-led mining. Portuguese reaction to the disappearance of such an important source of income was the imposition of even stricter and more oppressive regulations. Besides the already existing prohibitions on manufacturing, starting in 1785 even the production of items handcrafted through the putting-out system was outlawed, with the prices of similar goods imported from Portugal substantially increased. Additionally, the existing tax codes disregarded the actual gold production of the captaincy, becoming more problematic as production slowed down. The Portuguese crown was entitled to a fifth of the gold extracted from Minas Gerais, but starting in 1750 a new law was passed requiring gold from the captaincy of not less than 1,500 kilograms, and entitling the crown to raise by force more gold to meet this quota. To begin with this was not problematic, but as time went on Minas Gerais had a harder time fulfilling the quota, and in 1789 the dreaded Derrama, as the collection of extra gold was called, was announced. This provided the background and the motivation for revolt in the region.

The evolution of local elites in Ouro Preto was such that, with fortunes accumulated throughout the century, a great many local families were able to send their sons to universities abroad, especially the Universidade de Coimbra. There, these men were exposed to the ideals of the Enlightenment and the American Revolution, and later brought them home to Brazil. It was this mixture of youthful idealism and economic desperation among debt-ridden families that led to the creation of the Inconfidência Mineira. In December 1788 renowned poets like Tomás Antônio Gonzaga (1744–1810), powerful landlords, clergymen like Padre Rolim (1747–1835), and idealists like Joaquim José da Silva Xavier (1746–92) began a series of meetings with the intent of rebelling against colonialism and the heavy taxes placed upon them. This conspiracy went beyond those outlined previously in that they were already deep into the logistical planning of their actions when they were discovered and arrested. In 1789 Joaquim Silvério dos Reis (1756–1819), one of the conspirators, denounced the movement to the crown in exchange for cancellation of his tax debts. All the conspirators were arrested, and the revolt, which was supposed to take place on the day of the Derrama, was aborted. All the “Inconfidentes” were sentenced to death, but, with one exception, all had their sentences converted to exile or imprisonment. The only one to be hanged was Tiradentes, the sole conspirator of modest means and poor background. He was killed on April 21, 1792, in Rio de Janeiro. He is to this day celebrated as a national hero, and the anniversary of his death is a national holiday.

Conjuração Baiana

If the Inconfidência Mineira was made up mostly of oligarchs in debt, the Conjuração Baiana, which took place in 1798, was organized by the poor urban sectors of the former colonial capital of Salvador, Bahia. Also known as the Revolta dos Alfaiates, its members included freed slaves, tailors (hence the name “Alfaiates”), and soldiers and low-ranking officers. Once more the backdrop to the conspiracy was the severe economic crisis of the last quarter of the eighteenth century. The crisis was particularly acute in the Bahia captaincy, given its steady decline in importance within the colony. Once the local seat of power, the most populated and richest city in the colony, its sharp decline can be attributed to a drop in sugar production. In 1763 the colonial capital was transferred to Rio de Janeiro, the main port for the southeast region and its gold and agricultural production. This combination of local decline and general crisis had a severe impact on Salvador, as shortages of goods and foodstuffs led to a series of riots in 1797 and 1798.

Things were further exacerbated by news of the planned revolt in Minas and the American and French revolutions. Many underground organizations were formed, among them the Academia dos Renascidos. This was a literary society that soon broadened its discussions to encompass the social and political situation of the region. As the situation deteriorated, it started to go beyond the discussion of philosophy and literature and into the realm of concrete political action. It had several goals, most of which were closely tied to the ideals of the international revolutions. Besides the independence of the Bahia captaincy, it supported the abolition of slavery and changes in the public administration system, so that merit played a greater role than personal connections and political patronage. The members of this association, however, made the same mistake as several other insurgent movements in Brazil: they underestimated the state’s repressive apparatus and overestimated popular support. Underground rebellious ideals started to appear in pamphlets and other literature distributed in front of churches and busy places. Most pamphlets contained texts by Luiz Gonzaga das Virgens (ca. 1761–99) and Cipriano Barata (1762–1838). Such actions were swiftly and brutally repressed, and the movement was soon dismantled. Through torture and intimidation the local government was able to apprehend most group members. As in Minas Gerais, punishment for this “act of sedition” was uneven: poorer members were condemned to death, while those with ties to the ruling oligarchy were either exiled or received shorter prison sentences. The crown was particularly brutal to mulattoes and blacks, as it feared a revolution similar to that which had taken place in Haiti. Luiz Gonzaga das Virgens and three others were hanged and their bodies left on display. Several others were publicly flogged and imprisoned for long terms. Cipriano Barata and other members of the conspiracy with close ties to the powerful received sentences that ranged from six months to a few years.

This was the last meaningful resistance to Portuguese rule in the colonial period. A few years afterwards, circumstances affecting the balance of power in Europe changed the relationship between colony and colonizer, setting in motion a series of events that would eventually lead to a unique independence, obtained not on the battlefield, but around the bargaining table.

United Kingdom of Portugal, Brazil, and the Algarve (1808–1822)

If, internally, there was little explicit resistance to Portuguese rule, international conflicts, starting with the French Revolution, eventually put Brazil on the path to independence. The French Revolutionary Wars (1792–1802) set the European continent on fire, weakening the colonial powers so that they failed to repress several independence movements in the New World. France itself was unable to hold on to Haiti and Louisiana. Even though Portugal was a member of the First Coalition to fight alongside the royalists in France, it soon withdrew from the conflict, remaining neutral for over a decade.

The French Revolutionary Wars were soon followed by the Napoleonic Wars (1803–15), and this time Portugal would eventually get dragged into the conflict, even though it tried to remain neutral for as long as possible. The recrudescence of British and French hostilities eventually presented a dilemma to the Portuguese. Soon the French were allied to or controlled most of Europe, while the British unequivocally ruled the seas, particularly after their overwhelming victory at Trafalgar. At first, Portugal tried to play a balancing act, adopting weak, poorly implemented anti-British measures that would not anger its longtime ally and main trading partner, nor the French and its Spanish allies. For a while the strategy worked, especially as France had its hands full with Russia and Prussia. But with the Berlin and Milan decrees, Napoleon forbade his allies from trading with the British. Soon the Americans followed suit and embargoed most trade with its former metropole. With the Treaty of Tilsit of 1807, Prussia and Russia joined France in the blockade against Britain. With the Spanish allied with Napoleon, only Portugal and a handful of smaller states were still openly trading with England. This made it impossible for Portugal to maintain its neutrality. Napoleon threatened to invade Portugal, while England threatened to destroy the Portuguese fleet and take over Brazil and other colonies. Whereas in the past the Prince Regent of Portugal, Dom João (1767–1826), had been able to stall negotiations on both sides, this time he was not able to do so. By the end of 1807, French and Spanish troops were marching towards Lisbon. On November 23, 1807, French troops crossed the border, and were only a few days from capturing the capital. Sensing imminent defeat in Europe, and desperate to maintain power over the colonies, Dom João decided to accept the British offer and move the court and the royal administration to Brazil, gaining British protection and leaving Portugal itself to the French.

In the week following the French invasion, over 10,000 Portuguese boarded ships to Brazil. They took with them the royal treasury, different libraries, and even a printing press. For the first time in history the former colony was now the head of the empire. While the provincial and local administrations remained virtually unchanged, the colonial administration was completely replaced by the institutions of the Portuguese state. More importantly, however, the change in Brazil's status within the kingdom meant that the oppressive restrictions it faced before were gone. Within days Brazilian ports were opened to trade with all friendly nations. A few months later, Dom João revoked the laws that banned manufacturing in the colony. Also revoked were the laws preventing the imports of books and printing presses. While this was initially deemed temporary, Brazil was officially raised to the condition of United Kingdom with Portugal in 1815. These changes would eventually lead to Brazilian independence, as local oligarchies would resist any attempt to reduce Brazil to its former colonial status.

For all the newfound freedom that Brazil enjoyed, the system also brought with it new burdens. With Portugal under French occupation, Brazil had to sustain the courts and the crown mostly by itself, bearing a larger share of the tax burden. Some of the new conditions imposed by the English on the Portuguese clearly contradicted the interests of the Brazilian oligarchy. Most notably, the English were eager to suppress the slave trade, on which a large part of the local economy was based. Portuguese slave trade was to be restricted to the Southern hemisphere, and could only involve Portuguese territories. The British navy was even given permission to inspect any vessels suspected of carrying slaves illegally. Another major point of contention was the deployment of Portuguese troops in most major Brazilian towns. So while on one hand the Brazilian populace welcomed the easing of restrictions, on the other hand the administration of Brazil was now more “Portuguese” than ever.

Revolução Pernambucana (1817)

These tensions were particularly significant in the northeast region of Brazil, where the new restrictions on the slave trade and the increased presence of the Portuguese were felt more acutely. Not only was there increasing regional inequality, but now the weight and power of the central administration were more evident. Combined with a drought and increased export taxes to pay for the military campaign in the Cisplatine captaincy, these factors resulted in the Revolução Pernambucana, a revolution in the captaincy of Pernambuco. Recife, the provincial capital, was taken, and soon the revolt spread through the hinterlands. Pernambuco was proclaimed a republic, with a new “organic law” that was supposed to maintain vaguely stated goals of equality and religious tolerance. The unifying factor behind this uprising was dissatisfaction with the Portuguese, which was evident despite all the differences between the members of the movement. Even though it preached equality, it was mute about slavery, with a substantial portion of its leadership actively endorsing it. Additionally, no effort was made to alter the existing class structure. For all its internal differences, however, the movement was surprisingly organized. It sent representatives to meet several of the leaders of other colonies and even foreign governments. They were successful in obtaining the support of the governments of Paraíba and Rio Grande do Norte, neighboring colonies facing the same problems. Despite this regional support the rebels were swiftly crushed by the increased Portuguese military in the colony. A few days after the uprising the Portuguese fleet initiated a blockade of Recife, and a few days later troops landed in Alagoas. The internal differences between the rebels proved to be significant. They failed to mount a unified resistance and in less than two months the entire region was back under Portuguese control. If on one hand the revolution fell short of its stated goals and failed to present a lasting resistance to the empire, on the other hand it nurtured a new generation of leaders who wanted an emancipated Northeast – leaders like Frei Caneca, who would play a central role in the Confederation of the Equator in 1824. (The Northeast would become the focus for most of the rebellions and revolts after the 1822 independence.) The Revolução Pernambucana was the only significant revolt during the time Brazil was raised to equal status with Portugal.

Independence and the Reign of Dom Pedro I (1822–1831)

While there had been some dissatisfaction with the Portuguese court in Rio, especially in the Northeast, what really concerned many Brazilians was a reversal in its equal status with Portugal (especially after Portugal’s own liberation) – a reversal desired by a significant portion of the Portuguese, especially within merchant circles. The French invasion created a vacuum in the upper levels of Portuguese society. The court was in Brazil and the British controlled the military stationed in Europe, as well as trade with the colonies. Discontent was at an all-time high in the former metropole, and many saw the solution to these problems in reinstating Brazil’s colonial status. This discontentment led to the events of 1820–1 in Portugal, which in turn sped up the process of independence. The bourgeoisie and the military, unhappy with the situation and the budget problems which left civil servants and the army stationed in Europe unpaid for long periods. Towards the end of 1820, first in Oporto and then in Lisbon, a liberal revolt broke out. It was liberal because many of its objectives related to abolishing the absolutist state, but at the same time it intended to restore Brazil as a colony and reestablish Portugal as the intermediary in the English trade. A provisory Junta was established, and it called for an assembly – the Cortes Gerais Extraordinárias e Constituintes – to be created and to formulate the new constitution for the kingdom. In the first few months of 1821 the Portuguese military stationed in Brazil rose up in support of the revolt. The Junta established that the members of the Cortes were to be indirectly elected – one deputy for every 30,000 free citizens. Facing his own military, Dom João had no choice but to acquiesce to the creation of this new assembly. If the goal of the Cortes was to diminish the power of the king and change the absolutist state, it also had an important side-effect. Given the distribution of seats in this assembly, Brazil would elect fewer than 80 of the over 200 deputies. This definitely swung the pendulum of power towards the Portuguese and their interests.

The Cortes began the process of returning Brazil to its colonial status by ordering the return of Dom João to Europe. Faced with the risk of losing territories in Europe, he acquiesced and returned on April 6, 1821. Dom Pedro became Prince Regent of Brazil in his place, and it became clear to the Brazilian oligarchies that they would have to take the Cortes seriously if they wanted to retain the privileges the status of United Kingdom had granted them. As such, political debate in the empire became polarized between the Brazilian and Portuguese factions. The differences between the factions centered on the relationship between the two nations, and not so much on ideological grounds (with a few radical liberals on both sides, including Cipriano Barata, one of the members of the Conjuração Bahiana). The move towards independence would gain momentum as the Portuguese deputies pushed ahead with their agenda, taking advantage of the lack of Brazilian representatives in the first few months of the Cortes. The assembly had met for the first time in January 1821, and ordered the return of Dom João to Portugal by April of that same year, but elections for Brazilian representatives were only held from May through September. Those elected would only begin arriving in Lisbon by late August, with several only reaching Lisbon later still. In the meantime the Portuguese representatives decided in April that provincial governments in Brazil should report directly to Lisbon instead of Rio. In September they ordered that all imperial institutions that had remained in Rio were to be dismantled, and in October Dom Pedro was ordered to return to Europe. These decrees signaled the futility of trying to retain Brazilian autonomy via the Cortes. Some Brazilian deputies fled Lisbon, and Dom Pedro himself was determined to circumvent some of these decrees.

Full independence, however, was something that many were not ready to fight for. Dom Pedro announced on January 9, 1822 that he would remain in Brazil, a date that became known as the Dia do Fico. Instead of completely repealing the Cortes, Dom Pedro and his ministers decided in May that, even though they recognized the authority of the assembly, all decisions that involved Brazil should be approved by the prince. This same sort of ambiguity was evident when members of the military refused to recognize his authority and, instead of being repressed or expelled, they were simply reassigned to the Northeast. It should not be forgotten that Dom Pedro, for all his defiance of the Cortes, was the next in line in succession to the Portuguese throne: given his position in Brazil, regardless of what happened the throne of both nations would surely remain in the hands of the Bragança family. So instead of moving for separation from Portugal, the struggle was to establish institutions to govern the nation locally, albeit still maintaining its ties to the former metropole. A local constituent assembly and a ministry headed by a Brazilian-born politician were the first steps in that direction. These measures were more of a reaction to the deeds of the Cortes, and only a few of the more radical Brazilians would support any change to the existing structure of power within the territories, so that institutions such as the monarchy were secure.

However, in September 1822 Dom Pedro received a series of decrees charging his ministers and other members of his government with treason, revoking all his own decrees and laws, and once more demanding his return to Portugal. On September 7, 1822 Brazilian independence was proclaimed. The Southeast region at this stage was de facto independent, as all troops stationed there were loyal to Dom Pedro. He had at his disposal a number of loyal troops, the henchmen from several landlords, and a navy assembled by the British Lord Cochrane. The only remaining forces that resisted independence were those loyal to the Portuguese in the Northeast, especially Bahia. Despite a few minor scuffles and a short-lived siege of Salvador, by mid-1823 most Portuguese troops had left the former colony. The bargaining table was where independence was won. The deal between Portugal and Brazil that led to independence was brokered by England. Brazil paid compensation to its former metropole and agreed not to support the independence of other parts of the empire. By 1825 Brazil was widely recognized as an independent nation, including by Portugal. Informal recognition had come much earlier.

De jure independence, however, brought very limited changes to Brazil. Its position in the international division of labor was the same, as was its trade relation to England. Internally, the social structure was left virtually intact. Despite pressures by the English to force the abolition of slavery, all they got was a mild effort to curtail the slave trade. Even the local administration was mostly left in the same hands as before. An assembly to craft a new constitution was called by Dom Pedro, but was eventually dissolved for its reluctance to accept a system in which the emperor had too much power. The result was a constitution promulgated in 1824 by the emperor, which established Catholicism as the official religion of the nation and granted no rights to slaves. A house of representatives and a senate were established, but their elections were indirect and limited to white male landowners, and even then the monarch retained significant power, as the provinces were only allowed to elect lists of possible senators, from which the executive would choose the elected. Besides a legislature, an executive, and a judiciary, the constitution also created a fourth power, the moderating power, which was an attribute exclusively of the emperor, who would have the power of “moderating” disagreements between the other three powers, de facto giving the emperor veto power over every decision made. It is in this context of continuity that conflicts and civil strife took place.

Confederação do Equador (1824)

The events that took place in 1817 in Pernambuco were swiftly repressed, but their underlying motivation remained. Hostility to the centralized bureaucracy, its taxes and its Portuguese ties, never really went away. If anything, it only grew stronger when independence brought little change. From a regional standpoint, there was little difference between being subjugated to the whims of the Portuguese crown or to those of the Brazilian crown in Rio de Janeiro, led by the same people as before. The return of Frei Caneca and Cipriano Barata to the region, coupled with the subsequent arrest of the latter, stirred up anti-absolutist feeling. Newspapers in the major cities of the region ran lengthy attacks on the established authority. Finally, with the arrest of Barata and the appointment of a new provincial governor loyal to Dom Pedro, tensions boiled over. On July 2, 1824 the former governor of Pernambuco, Manuel de Carvalho, proclaimed regional independence and the creation of the Confederação do Equador (Confederacy of the Equator).

The Confederacy of the Equator included the provinces of Rio Grande do Norte, Ceará, and Paraíba, besides Pernambuco. Unlike the Revolução Pernambucana this was mostly an urban and popular upheaval and had a distinct ideological component. Representatives were sent to the US to try to gather support against European intervention in the continent. However, the British and Portuguese were still immensely influential and the appeal to the US failed. The uprising had a very distinct liberal component: defense of the implementation of a federalist republic in the region, with direct elections. Thus, some of the rural elite decided to support the federal government, fearing that the institution of slavery might be at risk. The confederation was unable to form a solid military defense, although the Brazilian government itself did not have much military strength and had once again to count on the paid services of Lord Cochrane and his forces. By September 1824 Pernambuco, Rio Grande do Norte, and Paraíba were back in the hands of the federal government, with Ceará following in November. The leaders of the democratic uprisings were imprisoned and executed, despite appeals even by loyal troops. Frei Caneca, for example, had to be shot when his executioner refused to carry out his hanging.

If the confederation was a failure because it lacked the means to achieve its ambitious goals, it was nevertheless a further indication of the deteriorating situation in the Brazilian Northeast and the increasing regional inequality that still plagues Brazil. The 1824 uprising would not be the last one in the region, which would see many revolts even after the abdication of Dom Pedro I.

Regency and Reign of Dom Pedro II (1831–1889)

Brazil's independence was marked by a great deal of continuity, so much so that Dom Pedro I would simultaneously rule both Portugal and Brazil for a short period in the 1820s, before abdicating the Portuguese throne in favor of his daughter. His decision to maintain so many Portuguese in influential positions alienated parts of the Brazilian population. His popularity with the Brazilians took a further dent when he began to get involved with the Portuguese succession, trying to prevent his brother Miguel from claiming the throne. Uruguayan independence after the Cisplatine war further divided the polity, with Brazilian liberals and Portuguese conservatives bitterly opposing each other. With the dissolution of his Cabinet in 1830, and with pressures from all sides on who to select for the new one, tensions reached an all-time high, culminating in the Noite das Garrafadas on March 13, 1831, when a generalized brawl broke out between members of the “Brazilian” and “Portuguese” parties. Soon high-ranking Brazilian military commanders joined the revolt against Pedro I. On April 7, 1831 Dom Pedro renounced the Brazilian crown in favor of his five-year-old son, also named Pedro.

Given his age, young Pedro could not be crowned as the new emperor. Instead, for the next decade, Brazil was ruled by interim governments. After defeating their common foe, Brazilians became divided between moderates and radicals. As a compromise, the power of the national executive was curtailed for the specific period of the regency. Greater power was granted to the provinces, and the so-called moderating power, which made the legislature and judiciary subordinate to the head of the executive, was diluted, at least until a new emperor was crowned. This greater decentralization and reduction of central state power led to some of the bloodiest internal conflicts in Brazil. The regency lacked the legitimacy of an emperor, while the greater power afforded to the provincial governments increased local tensions as different factions started fighting for regional supremacy. Four notable revolts marked the regency period. They all had a distinct separatist goal, caused by dissatisfaction with a central government that was at its weakest.

In 1840, after nearly a decade of crisis and in-fighting, Pedro, now only 14 years old, was crowned, becoming Emperor Dom Pedro II of Brazil. This was the result of internal pressures that saw the return of an emperor as head of the executive as a way of reunifying the nation.

The Cabanagem (1835–1840)

The Cabanagem took place in the scarcely populated province of the Grão Pará, the modern-day state of Pará. It was the result of local tensions over the provincial presidency. A number of groups had fought aggressively against the Portuguese and other foreigners. Once independence was achieved, however, the leaders of these groups saw themselves isolated from the positions of power in the region. Among them were members of the military, including João Batista Gonçalves Campos (1782–1834), who led an unsuccessful revolt among the military in 1831. The provincial government appointed by the regents tried vicious repression, which in turn led to a popular revolt. In 1835 open fighting broke out as the rebels assaulted and took over the provincial capital, Belém. Led by 21-year-old Eduardo Angelim (1814–82), the rebels – called Cabanos, in a reference to where they lived – were made up mostly of the poor and destitute of mixed heritage. It was a rebellion against foreign influence and in defense of Catholicism (part of the clergy had been persecuted by the former provincial government), Dom Pedro II, and nationalism. Despite the social origins of its members and its attacks on local oligarchies, the rebels had no interest in deep reforms or abolishing slavery. They themselves repressed slave uprisings while they controlled the local government.

The battles that ensued as the central government tried to regain control were bloody and vicious. Some historians estimate that as much as 40 percent of the provincial population died as a result of this fighting. Control of Belém alternated between rebels and troops before rebel forces were driven to the countryside after a naval blockade of the city. Fighting continued until 1840, after the rebels were granted amnesty in 1839. This sort of rebellion, which combined folk elements with a sort of radical Catholicism and defense of the monarchy, would happen again many times in the North and Northeast, the most notable example being the Canudos.

The Sabinada (1837–1838)

The Sabinada was a rebellion in Salvador, province of Bahia. Its name is derived from that of the leader of the rebellion, Francisco Sabino Vieira. Salvador had witnessed a few minor rebellions soon after the abdication of Pedro I, but in 1835 a full-blown movement emerged. As with the Cabanagem, the Sabinada was an ambiguous movement: it defended the monarchy and Pedro II, but despised the central government and what it saw as its excessive power over local affairs. On November 7, 1837 Sabino and others proclaimed the República Bahiense. This was in fact a reaction against a number of policies, including the military draft instituted in the province. The rebellion was fully supported by the military stationed in Salvador, and they were able to take over the city with relative ease. While this new republic broke with the regency and the provincial government, its goals were modest: a temporary government, and when Pedro II was crowned the rebels would rejoin the union. As was the case in several other revolts, there was little intention of promoting changes that altered the existing class structure in the region. What unified this broad class coalition was its distaste for the regency. The only significant change adopted was that Brazilian-born slaves who took up arms in the name of the new republic would be granted freedom.

While initially successful in unifying Salvador behind their cause, the rebels soon found themselves confined to that city. The Bahian hinterlands, dominated by an agrarian oligarchy that depended on the Southeastern market for its products, remained loyal to the federal government. Soon, Salvador was encircled by land and sea. In March 1838 the troops that had laid siege to the city marched in, crushing the rebellion. Its leaders were either executed or exiled, and the provincial government restored.

Balaiada (1838–1841)

More than the other revolts examined so far, the Balaiada was the result of tensions between local dominant elites. Maranhão, the province where the rebellion took place, was in transition during the 1830s. The production of cotton, which had been the main export of the region, was in severe crisis due to North American competition. In turn, an influx of people, including freed slaves, had boosted cattle production. Each sector was linked to a different party, with the farmers siding with the conservatives and the cattle herders siding with the liberals. With the arrest of a popular liberal, and the subsequent attempt by troops loyal to the liberals to release him, open fighting broke out. What was initially a liberal movement soon became a widespread popular uprising against the provincial government, with the liberals losing control over their objectives. One of the leaders of the rebellion, Manuel Francisco dos Anjos Ferreira, was a maker of balaios (baskets), hence the name of this movement.

As the liberals lost control over the rebels, it became mostly a popular affair, with over three thousand freed or escaped slaves participating on the side of the Balaios. They were able to move swiftly through the hinterlands, capturing major cities along the way. The movement became a revolt against the local elites and the regency, while at the same time the rebels defended the monarchy and Pedro II. As they began to disrupt the business of the local oligarchies, the latter requested the help of the central government, which dispatched Colonel Luís Alves de Lima e Silva (1803–80). Lima e Silva used a two-pronged approach to disband the rebels: on one hand he offered amnesty to those who surrendered and volunteered to help fight the insurgency, while on the other hand he ruthlessly pursued rebels throughout the region. His success earned him the title of Baron of Caxias (a town in the Maranhão hinterlands) and the nickname of “the pacifier.” From this point on he would become a key figure in Brazilian history, leading the repression of several regional uprisings. His strategy of creating internal divisions among the rebels soon proved very effective, and by 1841 they were crushed, often having to fight their old comrades.

Guerra dos Farrapos (1835–1845)

The longest lasting and perhaps most significant conflict of the regency was the Guerra dos Farrapos, which occurred in the extreme south and began in the province of São Pedro do Rio Grande do Sul. The causes of this conflict were essentially economic and in many ways a result of Uruguayan independence years earlier. Rio Grande do Sul’s economy was mostly based on the production of charque (salt-cured meat) for

This painting depicts a cavalry charge during the Guerra dos Farrapos (War of the Farrapos) in 1835. The war followed a republican uprising in Rio Grande do Sul and Santa Catarina in southern Brazil over perceived economic inequalities. The state of Rio Grande do Sul consistently played a secondary role in Brazilian politics; as a result, both Uruguay and Argentina were given free access to its markets, while gauchos (residents of the region) were forced to pay high tariffs on products normally produced inside Brazil. (Museu Julio de Castilhos) consumption in the internal market. Most lands, especially those close to the Uruguayan border, were used for raising cattle. With Uruguayan independence, competition from foreign producers for the Brazilian market increased, and with a favorable exchange rate, Uruguayan and Argentinean producers were able to sell at cheaper prices than Brazilians. Furthermore, as the Brazilian government instituted a new tax on live cattle crossing the border, many farmers who owned land in Uruguay saw themselves with extra costs. Landowners and the urban middle classes were increasingly dissatisfied with the federal government, whom they saw as extracting too much in taxes for too little in return. As tensions increased, the province was divided between the conservatives, sometimes called caramuru, who were loyal to the federal government, and the liberals.

On September 20, 1835 the liberals rose up against the provincial government and federal authorities, arresting members of the Conservative Party and taking over most of the state. A conservative reaction expelled the rebels from the provincial capital, and they established their new basis of operations in the town of Piratini. On September 11, 1836 the rebels proclaimed the establishment of the Rio-Grandense Republic, which the conservatives derogatorily called the Piratini Republic, and its members farrapos, those with torn clothes. It is unclear if the objective of the rebels was an outright permanent secession from the Union. All other provinces were called to join them in establishing a new union with a new federative pact. The rebels controlled a substantial part of the province. Regional landowners, who mostly sided with the rebels, usually had military experience dating from the wars for the control of the former Cisplatine region, and had at their disposal horses and resources to establish a powerful military, one that at least initially faced little resistance from federal troops. With the leadership of Bento Gonçalves (1788–1847) and the Italian Giuseppe Garibaldi (1807–82) the rebels were able to push north, conquering part of the Santa Catarina province and creating the República Juliana. During the conflicts the rebels were able to sustain themselves by exporting charque through Uruguay.

The federal government saw no choice but to accept some of the demands of the insurgents. In 1840 a new import tax on charque was created. But even after the introduction of these measures and the crowning of Pedro II the fighting continued. It was Lima e Silva, now Baron of Caxias, who would restore peace to the region. Assigned to the conflict in 1842, he adopted the same strategy as before, offering amnesty and concessions to those who surrendered, while pursuing victory on the battlefield. Peace was finally achieved in 1845 after conciliatory measures were taken by the federal government. Those who fought on the Farrapos side were integrated into the Brazilian military at the same rank they obtained with the rebels, the federal government absorbed the debts of the Juliana republic, and the rebel leadership was given unconditional amnesty. The only ones not to receive favorable terms were the former slaves who fought on the rebel side, as they were either forced into exile or resold as slaves.

Revoltas Liberais (1842)

The accession of Pedro II to power in 1840 was supposed to bring greater stability to the nation, but the initial years of his reign proved to be troublesome. The first of the revolts the young king would face were the liberal revolts of 1842. The origin of this conflict was political: the king's Cabinet was dominated by the conservatives, who promulgated a series of decrees further concentrating power in the hands of the central government. More importantly, the Cabinet recommended the dissolution of the legislature, which the king had the power to do and which he yielded. Liberals in both São Paulo and Minas Gerais rose up in response. Led by Rafael Tobias de Aguiar (1795–1857) in São Paulo, and by José Feliciano Pinto Coelho da Cunha (1802–69) in Minas, the rebels assembled a small force in order to “defend the constitution and the Emperor” and remove the conservatives from the Cabinet. Once again, Lima e Silva was dispatched to repress the rebels, who were swiftly defeated. Small in scope and effect, this revolt is important because of where it took place and the involvement of key political figures. Despite the initial harsh punishment of the rebels, they were offered amnesty in 1844, when a new Cabinet was assembled, this time with greater participation of the liberal party.

Revolta Praieira (1848–1850)

The Revolta Praieira was the last significant revolt of Pedro II’s reign. It took place in Pernambuco in 1848 and was perhaps the most ideologically charged revolt of the period. Just as Europe was being swept by revolutions, socialist ideals inspired many in the province. It is important to note, however, that the socialism they defended was not that of Marx, but that of Owen and Fourier. As we have already seen, Pernambuco saw the birth of several other revolts. By the late 1840s discontentment was increasing as the sugar industry was in crisis. The final straw that led to the mobilization and uprising of the rebels was the destitution of a popular liberal provincial president, Antônio Pinto Chichorro da Gama (1800–87), and the selection of a conservative to take his place. Da Gama had been an adversary of the large landowners of the region, trying to reduce their power and influence on politics. With him out of power, the radical sectors of the Liberal Party decided to organize revolution. On November 7, 1848 troops led by General José Inácio de Abreu e Lima (1794–1869) removed the newly appointed conservative from power. On January 1, 1849 the rebels published their manifesto, in which they defended universal suffrage, freedom of the press, the expulsion of the Portuguese and the nationalization of retail commerce, the abolition of the moderating power, the end of the military draft, and several other measures. For all its socialist inspiration it said very little about property or redistribution of wealth, which is unsurprising given the number of the wealthy who adhered to the movement.

The rebels were able to remove the unwanted appointee from power, but had significantly less success militarily. In February 1849 an attempt to conquer the provincial capital, Recife, was repelled by loyal troops. Soon, federal troops defeated the rebels. As before, punishment for the insurgents was determined by class and wealth. The most powerful of the rebels were granted amnesty and returned to their old posts in the provincial administration, while the poorest were incarcerated, forcibly drafted into the military, or even executed. The end of the revolt marked a new period of calm in the nation, which would only be disturbed again in the proclamation of the republic.

Proclamation of the Republic (1889)

Brazil became a republic on November 15, 1889, after a military coup removed Pedro II from power. The demise of the monarchy was caused by tensions between the monarch and three central social institutions of the period: slavery, the military, and the church. Additionally, the crisis and debt that followed Brazilian involvement in the War of the Triple Alliance also generated enough popular discontent, especially in the coffee-growing provinces of São Paulo and Minas Gerais, to boost the popularity of republican movements.

Under the monarchy there was no separation of church and state. The monarch was also the head of the Catholic Church in Brazil. If on one hand this increased the influence of the clergy over the state, on the other hand the reverse was also true, and the king was in a position to interfere with papal decrees. The source of the tensions between monarchy and church was Pope Pius IX’s encyclical and his commands to ban or excommunicate freemasons. Dom Pedro II used the powers granted to him by the constitution to bar bishops from doing so, and ordered the arrest of the clerics who decided to follow through on Pius IX’s orders. As the result, Pedro II lost the support of the church in Brazil.

The military, which had lost influence during the middle of the century, was once again highly influential after the War of the Triple Alliance. However, the debt accrued from the war led to a virtual freeze in salaries, promotions, and so forth, leading to greater military discontentment, and the government ruled that members of the military had to ask for permission before speaking publicly about politics. The ensuing crisis led to the resignation of the minister of war, and even though the new law was repealed, dissatisfaction with the monarchy remained.

Additionally, Brazil had been slowly moving towards the abolition of slavery. The British had severely limited the traffic of slaves from Africa to Brazil. Slaves who fought in the War of the Triple Alliance were granted freedom, and from 1871 onwards newborns were free. This gradual shift towards abolition culminated in the Golden Law of 1888, which freed all slaves. The abolition of slavery meant that the last pillar of support for the monarchy – large landowners who still depended on slave labor – also became dissatisfied.

In the backdrop to these changes was the growing influence of republican ideas. In 1873 the Partido Republicano Paulista was formed. Republicanism was especially influential in the provinces of São Paulo, Minas Gerais, and Rio Grande do Sul, who felt that for all their size and influence they were underrepresented in the Cabinet and Parliament. Their original basis of support was the coffee-growing sector, which was export-oriented and felt unsupported by the central government. As it gained adherents from the military and from the growing urban middle classes it became more vocal in its opposition to Pedro II. As these economic, political, and religious crises deepened, the republicans found themselves in a position to claim power. While Pedro II was ill and not very active in political circles, the military, led by Deodoro da Fonseca (1827–92), proclaimed the republic in a bloodless coup on November 15, 1889. Two days later, Pedro II left the country. His government was the last monarchy to exist on the American continent, and its end marked the beginning of a new period in Brazilian history, that of the Old Republic, dominated by oligarchs in Minas Gerais and São Paulo.

SEE ALSO: Canudos, Religion and Rebellion in 19th-Century Brazil; Cuba, Struggle for Independence from Spain, 1868–1898; Fourier, Charles François Marie (1772–1837) and the Phalanx Utopians; Imperialism and Capitalist Development; Imperialism, Historical Evolution; Imperialism, Modernization to Globalization; Marx, Karl (1818–1883); Owen, Robert (1771–1858)

References and Suggested Readings

- Bethell, L. (Ed.) (1984) The Cambridge History of Latin America, Vols. 3 and 4. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Bethell, L. (Ed.) (1989) Brazil: Empire and Republic, 1822–1930. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Furtado, C. (1970) Economic Development of Latin America: A Survey from Colonial Times to the Cuban Revolution. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Maxwell, K. R. (1973) Conflicts and Conspiracies: Brazil and Portugal, 1750–1808. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Wilcken, P. (2004) Empire Adrift: The Portuguese Court in Rio de Janeiro, 1808–1821. London: Bloomsbury.

Brazil, workers, and the left: Partido dos Trabalhadores and Central Única dos Trabalhadores

Diogo L. Pinheiro

The Brazilian Partido dos Trabalhadores (Workers Party), or PT, and the Central Única dos Trabalhadores (Unique Workers Center), or CUT, are the two most significant organizations to have emerged from the new Brazilian left that appeared during the late 1970s. The PT was founded in São Paulo in 1980 by a group of union leaders, progressive sectors of the Catholic Church, and left-wing intellectuals. It has become Latin America's largest workers party. It has controlled the Brazilian presidency since 2002 when Luis Inácio Lula da Silva, one of the founders of the party and its first leader, was elected. The PT has close ties to the CUT, Latin America's largest association of unions, which was founded in 1983. Together, they have helped shape the history of left-wing policies and labor relations in Brazil.

The Brazilian Left Before the PT

The creation of the PT marked a significant break with Brazil's two historical political

In March 1984, Luiz Inácio da Silva (Lula) addresses a trade union rally in São Bernardo do Campo, São Paulo, Brazil. In 1983 Lula was a founding member of the independent Central Única dos Trabalhadores (CUT), and in 1984 he helped build the Partido dos Trabalhadores (PT/Workers' Party), which demanded a democratically elected government. On October 27, 2002, Lula was elected president of Brazil. (© Alain Keler/Sygma/CORBIS) traditions associated with the working class, the Trabalhismo and the Brazilian communist parties. Trabalhismo was associated with Getúlio Vargas and his party, the populist Partido Trabalhista Brasileiro. Vargas ruled Brazil twice, in 1930–45 as a dictator, and in 1950–4 as a democratically elected president. The PTB also held the presidency from 1961 to 1964 with João Goulart, who was deposed by a military coup. Trabalhismo left two important legacies for left-wing organizations in Brazil: a set of labor laws that remained virtually unaltered for decades and a mode of party organization centered on charismatic leaders and a top-down decision-making structure. Labor relations in Brazil are regulated to this day by the Consolidação das Leis do Trabalho (Consolidated Labor Laws), promulgated by Vargas in 1943. The CLT provided certain classes of urban workers with fundamental basic rights, such as an eight-hour workday, maternity leave, paid vacations, and so on. More importantly, it also strictly regulated unions. Unions were organized from the top-down as a way of maintaining social order. Each occupational category was to be represented by a state-recognized union, which would have a legal monopoly over that category. In addition, the government was given the right to regulate these unions directly, and could legally replace union leaders with government workers. Besides this direct control, labor union leaders were also coopted through other means, such as the possibility of working in the labor courts or the administration of the new social security agencies. These forms of cooptation also played a key role in the formation of the PTB. From 1945 through 1964 the members of that party used the legacy of Vargas as the “father of the poor” to gain the support of the urban working classes, which were those who benefited the most from the CLT. As the dictatorship that started in 1964 eased its suppression of political freedoms and political parties were once again formed, Leonel Brizola, a political heir to Vargas, organized the Partido Democrático Trabalhista on the same model as the PTB, with a charismatic leader controlling virtually the entire party. Despite the greater influence of European-style social democratic ideas, the party was organized in a top-down fashion.

The Partido Comunista Brasileiro (Brazilian Communist Party) was one of the first to be created in Latin America, in 1919. For many decades it concentrated most Brazilian left-wing groups. It competed with the PTB for working-class support. Except for brief periods, such as in the mid-1940s, the PCB had to act clandestinely for most of its history. This, coupled with a close association with the Comintern, led the PCB to be organized in a strict centralized fashion. And even though divergences, such as those generated by the Sino-Soviet split, led to several party divisions, the new parties and groups that formed maintained the same model of what was called “democratic centralism,” or the strict enforcement of party discipline. Besides having similar centralized, top-down, decision-making structures, both the PCB and the PTB emphasized the necessity of a national alliance between the working class and the national bourgeoisie (though their methods and ultimate objectives were very different). The PCB believed that this alliance was important, as it was the only way of ridding the nation of imperialistic exploitation, which was necessary for the full development of Brazilian capitalism and subsequent communism. As such, it opposed general strikes and other tactics that might compromise the possibility of such an alliance. It was because of the dissatisfaction of workers with these tactics that the PT would emerge.

The PT was created by a group of labor unionists, left-wing intellectuals (many of them Trotskyites) and liberation theologians interested in giving a greater voice to social movements, rank and file union members, and workers who were seen as left out of decision-making in other left-wing parties. It emerged at a specific point in time as a new generation of leaders assumed control of the unions that had been previously purged by the 1964 dictatorship. Economic and political conditions in the late 1970s created the opportunity for these leaders to organize themselves in a new party, one which was supposed to fight for working-class interests as ends in themselves, not as the means of achieving social harmony.

Military Dictatorship

In 1964 PTB's João Goulart was ousted by a military coup. His government had been marked by extensive in-fighting among the left and was strongly rejected by the conservative sector of society, who were fearful of proposed policies such as land reform. The new military government made full use of the provisions in the CLT that allowed it to intervene directly in established unions. Over 500 elected union leaders were replaced with persons selected by the military. Furthermore, the government relegated unions to a more administrative role, managing things such as dental plans and healthcare instead of engaging in negotiations on behalf of those they were supposed to represent. The dictatorship also established a number of economic policies that would reduce the purchasing power of the minimum wage by about half between 1964 and the late 1970s. One of the main tenets of the economic policy of the dictatorship was the use of wage controls to reduce industry costs to keep inflation low. Thus, working-class wages declined significantly while Brazil experienced its so-called economic miracle in 1967–73, a period in which gross domestic product grew at about 10 percent a year. Part of this loss of purchasing power came from the establishment of wage indexation. Wages were tied to inflation, but since wage adjustments were made only from time to time, real wages were always trying to catch up with the inflation of the previous period. It was also shown later on that the government actually manipulated inflation data in order to reduce real wages.

These policies created a vacuum in the leadership of the labor unions at precisely the time when pressure for better wages provided a rallying cry for the working class. Together, these two factors generated space within the labor movement for new figures such as Lula. Lula's personal history is representative of this sort of trajectory. Born in 1945 in the town of Garanhuns in the poor state of Pernambuco, he was the seventh of eight children. His family moved to São Paulo when he was seven, a journey made in the back of an open truck. He started working in menial jobs at the age of 12, and a few years later he became a lathe operator. Uninterested in politics, his first experience in a leadership role in a union came in 1969 when his brother, José Ferreira da Silva, asked Lula to be a part of his slate in the union elections. Elected, he became more active within the union, but still refused to get more involved in politics. Unions themselves were largely apolitical and dominated by pelegos, union leaders closely aligned with employers and the government. Things began to change in 1975. Lula was elected to the presidency of the São Bernardo metalworkers union that year, with even the support of some of the pelegos, who did not see him as a threat precisely because of his apolitical stance. But that same year his brother, a member of the clandestine PCB, was arrested on the grounds of being a communist subversive. This event awoke Lula's political consciousness and soon he would join other newly elected union leaders, such as Olívio Dutra from Porto Alegre, in organizing the first general strikes in years.

The first issue that drew Lula's attention and served as a way of mobilizing workers against employers and the government was the wage recovery campaign. One of the first things that the new union leaders did was to use more effectively the Departamento Intersindical de Estatística e Estudos Socioeconômicos (DIEESE), the union research center. In 1977 DIEESE found that the government had manipulated official cost of living figures in 1973 in order to give lower wage raises. This launched the wage recovery campaign, which initiated the first mass mobilization of workers in years. The campaign was unsuccessful: both the courts and the government refused to recognize workers' rights to wage recovery. But the event was a clear sign for most workers that if they wanted anything from employers and the government they would have to "get tough." Additionally, this experience taught the new generation of union leaders a number of lessons: the importance of organizing at the plant level, and that unions could be more than bureaucratic organizations in charge of social welfare programs. The following years were marked by intense union activity, which included several general strikes that, as a side-effect, helped to galvanize society against the dictatorship and in favor of a return to democracy.

The first of the wave of strikes that marked the 1978–80 period took place in Santo André at the Scania factory. Soon after, other strikes broke out, especially in the highly industrialized ABCD area, comprising the cities of Santo André, São Bernardo do Campo, São Caetano do Sul, and Diadema. These strikes were successful in winning workers higher wages and served as a prelude to the general strikes of 1979. In 1979 more than three million workers from 15 different states went on strike. This time the demands included more than wage increases, such as the recognition of workers' rights to debate about democracy – not in lofty terms but in the very practical questions of worker mobilization. However, employers and the government were much better prepared to deal with the situation this time. For all the organization and effort that was put into the strikes, all the workers obtained was a modest 6 percent wage increase. The successes and failures of these strikes convinced some union leaders that they needed to organize in ways that went beyond bargaining with employers: they needed to gain some control over the state if their efforts to improve worker conditions were to be successful. As the dictatorship slowly started to relinquish some of its powers and allowing the creation of new political parties, some union leaders believed that the next step in their mobilization should include the creation of a party exclusively dedicated to workers' concerns.

Creation of the PT

During the strikes of 1978–9 the union leaders in different cities, especially in the ABCD region, Belo Horizonte, and Porto Alegre, began to discuss the creation of a political party as a way of avoiding the restrictions imposed on the ways unions could fight for improvements in the lives of workers. The creation of such a party did not happen overnight, and it faced difficulties dealing both with the laws that allowed the creation of new parties and with sectors of the labor movement that were already associated with other parties, such as the still-clandestine PCB and the centrist Movimento Democrático Brasileiro (Brazilian Democratic Movement), or MDB.

From 1964 to 1979 only two parties were legally permitted in Brazil: the Aliança Renovadora Nacional (ARENA) and the Movimento Democrático Brasileiro (MDB). The MDB was the officially recognized opposition party. By 1978 it had become clear that it would be just a matter of time before new parties were allowed to organize, a development that set off a wave of intense debate throughout Brazil. Lula first raised the idea of a workers party in 1978 in a conference of oil workers. This idea was echoed in the many meetings and conferences of the different confederations of labor unions that took place during this period. The São Paulo State Metalworkers' Congress in January 1979 passed a resolution calling for a national debate with the purpose of establishing a workers' party. A committee was formed and it came up with a statement of principles that was distributed throughout the nation during the May Day rallies of 1979. Besides outlining a set of principles that the party should follow, the statement went as far as setting a date on which the party should be officially registered with the government: May 20, 1979. This statement was extremely controversial. Even those who supported the idea thought that the date set was too soon and that further discussions were needed. Opposition to the creation of a workers party also came from those sectors closely associated with the MDB and the PCB. Those connected with the MDB thought that a new party would only create division within the opposition to the military dictatorship, thus weakening it. The communists held a similar position. They thought that the creation of a workers party would increase tensions between the workers and the national bourgeoisie, fragmenting what they thought would be the only way to fight imperialistic exploitation, a broad alliance congregating all those who had an interest in the development of national capitalism.

Despite this opposition, another meeting of a confederation of unions passed a resolution later that year also calling for the creation of a workers party, and a number of meetings were scheduled between union leaders, left-wing intellectuals, and MDB politicians. These developments broadened the scope of the proposed party: it should be a party not only of the workers, but of all those who did not own the means of production. MDB members were skeptical about this new party, but Lula and others felt the risk of depending on a bourgeois party such as the MDB was greater than the risk of failure. With the support of Trotskyite groups, left-wing intellectuals, liberation theology priests, and several different unions the Partido dos Trabalhadores was founded on February 10, 1980. Soon, progressive members of the MDB, now called the PMDB to incorporate the word "party," joined the PT.

The PT was organized differently from most other labor parties around the globe, in a conscious effort to avoid what they saw as a problematic cooptation of the labor movement by existing parties. PT leaders saw the party's duty as that of serving the labor movement, not controlling it. Therefore, it had no formal relationship with unions, in order to maintain their autonomy. Internally, the PT was set up to avoid the "democratic centralism" and the top-down structure of other left-wing parties. The differing groups within the party are organized into different sectors called tendências, which have some freedom of action within the party. Each group is given proportional representation within the party hierarchy. Furthermore, party members are locally organized into different nuclei, which are supposed to organize grassroots mobilization. All these arrangements were put in place to avoid excessive bureaucratization and centralization of the party, and to give unions, grassroots organizations, and social movements an active voice in the party and the governments it would eventually control.

Creation of the CUT

The PT remained at least formally disconnected from the labor unions from which it had emerged. It was supposed to fight for workers' interests in the political arena, not to serve as a central organization of labor unions. As such, the need to create some sort of an organization that would be responsible for inter-union coordination remained. In 1980, after the creation of the PT, unions initiated a new round of general strikes. This time the military responded in a more aggressive manner. Union leaders, including Lula, were arrested and removed from their positions within the labor movement. This repression led to a new emphasis on the local organization of unions. Unionists associated with the PT thought that the labor movement should emphasize the strengthening of the unions and their power at the plant level. With the goal of creating a national organization that would be in charge of strengthening unions at the plant level, the first Conferência Nacional da Classe Trabalhadora (National Conference of the Working Class), or CONCLAT, was held in August 1981. The idea of a national organization that congregated unions from all sectors was a controversial one. While most agreed on the importance of such an organization, there was much debate over what its main objectives should be. Some of the union leaders associated with the movement Unidade Sindical wanted this new organization to function not as a way of strengthening plant-level representation, but as an organization that would set policies for all unions.

In order to continue the debate about this new national organization, an interim commission, called Pró-CUT, was established. However, tensions within this commission remained high, as the two sides could not come to an agreement. The 1982 version of CONCLAT was postponed because of this impasse. In 1983 the Pró-CUT commission split when differences became irreconcilable. Besides the issue of what the role of the new national inter-union organization should be, there was significant disagreement over who would be eligible to be a part of the organization, with the group closer to the PT favoring a broader membership which would include workers from occupations not officially recognized by the CLT. After the split, those who favored the latter position decided to go ahead and hold the CONCLAT in 1983. The Central Única dos Trabalhadores (CUT) was founded on the last day of the 1983 conference, on August 28. Those associated with Unidade Sindical created their own version of a national organization, the Confederação Geral dos Trabalhadores (General Confederation of Workers).

Unlike the CGT, the CUT has often employed more confrontational tactics, such as general strikes. It has remained closely allied with the PT, even though they maintain a formal independence from each other. Through the years CUT has grown to become the largest union in Latin America. As it has become more influential, it has faced a dilemma similar to that of the PT: how can an institution created to counter the excessive centralism and bureaucratization of previous organizations remain loyal and open to criticism from its rank-and-file members when it becomes more powerful? The Lula presidency presented such a challenge to both the PT and the CUT, some of whose members left to create dissident organizations.

The PT's First Electoral Victories

The PT's first electoral campaigns took place during the 1982 general elections. Expectations were high, especially in the state of São Paulo, where the bulk of PT members were located. The results, however, were largely disappointing. Lula did poorly in his attempt to win the gubernatorial election, only receiving about 10 percent of the vote. The only significant PT victory was in the mayoral election in the city of Diadema, in the ABCD region. Governing Diadema proved to be a real challenge, and before his term was over, Mayor Gilson Menezes saw most of his Cabinet resign over allegations that the local government was trying to coopt local unions and grassroots organizations through public employment and monies. These challenges showed the PT the difficulties involved in balancing party discipline with open internal debate. It did not do much better during the 1985 mayoral elections. Its only important victory came in the city of Fortaleza, capital of the state of Ceará. Maria Luisa Fontenelle surprisingly won the election, becoming the first woman to become mayor of a state capital in Brazil. But her government was once again marked by divisions within the PT and she was eventually expelled from the party.

It was during the 1988 elections that the PT gained national recognition. Riding a wave of discontentment with the federal government and its failed policies to combat inflation, the PT elected the mayors of three state capitals – São Paulo, Porto Alegre, and Vitória – as well as those of a number of significant medium-size cities. Better prepared for holding office, this time the PT established a number of innovative policies, such as the participatory budget, a program under which neighborhood associations had a voice in deciding where the city's funds would be invested. The PT was especially successful in Porto Alegre, where it held power for the next 16 years. These victories made the PT a national force, but it was only during the 1989 presidential elections that it became the most important left-wing party in Brazil.

The PT's Presidential Campaigns

In 1989 Brazil held its first presidential elections in 29 years: 22 candidates from different parties ran for office. Among them were Leonel Brizola, the president of PDT and the political heir to trabalhismo, and Mário Covas, the representative from the newly created Brazilian Social Democratic Party (PSDB). In the first round of the election, Fernando Collor de Melo received the most votes, but fell short of the majority needed to avoid a runoff. In what surprised many, Lula, the PT's president and candidate, edged Brizola by a small percentage of the vote. In the runoff, the PT was able to assemble a large coalition of left-wing parties. Lula lost the runoff, but the fact that the PT had made it that far and had led a large coalition immediately made it a major party and Lula a nationally recognized figure.

In 1992 Collor was impeached due to corruption allegations. In the ensuing negotiations to form a new government, there occurred a major split between the PSDB and the PT. The PT had decided to remain in the opposition as Itamar Franco, Collor's vice president, took office. The PSDB, however, decided to join Franco and embrace neoliberal economic policies such as massive privatization. So in 1994 the presidential elections had two main candidates: Fernando Henrique Cardoso, a former political ally of Lula, who ran on the initial success of the Real Plan, which established a new currency and drastically reduced inflation; and Lula, who ran on a more explicitly left-wing policy, denouncing the lack of land reform and the privatization of several companies. The Real Plan was popular enough to give Cardoso a victory without the need of a runoff, something that would happen again in 1998. Despite these defeats, Lula and the PT became the main opposition party, and in 2002, in his fourth attempt, Lula was elected president.

The Lula Presidency

After losing the presidential elections three times, the PT decided to soften its left-wing discourse in order to gain a larger share of the vote in 2002. Once a ferocious critic of the orthodox economic policies of the Cardoso era, Lula and the PT released a document entitled “Carta ao Povo Brasileiro” (Letter to the Brazilian People) in which it announced its intention to continue with the economic policies of its predecessor. Lula went so far as to align himself with the Partido Liberal (Liberal Party). Running as a moderate instead of the aggressive left-wing leader of the previous elections paid off, and he was finally sworn in as president in 2003.

The Lula presidency remains extremely controversial within left-wing circles. The PT abandoned many of its traditional positions and supported austerity policies, yet unified and greatly expanded social programs under the newly created Bolsa Família, which provides extremely poor families with a monthly stipend. Such controversies reached their peak in 2003 when social security reform was approved despite heavy internal opposition. A number of influential figures within the PT were expelled for not following the party line. Heloísa Helena and others left the PT to create the dissident Partido Socialismo e Liberdade (Socialism and Liberty Party). The CUT has remained largely loyal to the government, which also generated a dissident group, as many started to consider CUT as an organization coopted by the government. Thus, significant questions remain about how to balance party discipline with internal debate.

In 2006 Lula was reelected president. His support came mostly from the lower classes, especially those who benefited the most from the Bolsa Família. Corruption scandals and the social security reform eroded some of his support among civil servants and the middle classes.

SEE ALSO: Mendes, Chico (1944–1988) and Amazonian Rainforest Protest and Resistance; Silva, Luiz Inácio Lula da (b. 1945)

References and Suggested Readings

- Baiocchi, G. (Ed.) (2003) Radicals in Power: The Workers' Party and Experiments in Urban Democracy in Brazil. New York: Zed Books.
- Branford, S. & Kucinski, B. (1995) Brazil: Carnival of the Oppressed. London: Latin American Bureau.
- Carr, B. & Ellner, S. (Eds.) (1993) The Latin American Left: From the Fall of Allende to Perestroika. Boulder: Westview Press.
- Keck, M. (1992) The Workers' Party and Democratization in Brazil. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Leal, P. R. F. (2005) O PT e o dilema da representação política. Rio de Janeiro: Editora da Fundação Getúlio Vargas.

Bread and Puppet Theater

Terri Bennett

The politically radical Bread and Puppet Theater was founded in the early 1960s on the Lower East Side in New York City by Peter Schumann, and has been based on a farm in Glover, Vermont since the 1970s. The theater's name stems from its practice of distributing free bread during its performances. Themes of the performances, circuses, or pageants address contemporary social and political issues and serve as a means of communicating information, publicly resisting social injustices, and building community. The act of distributing bread to its audiences is a symbol of a basic tenet of the theater: that art, like bread, is a necessity.

The theater is best known for its use of giant puppets and effigies, sometimes operated by persons on stilts and measuring up to 20 feet tall. The puppets were regular features at demonstrations against the Vietnam War and each subsequent war or military occupation by the US government since that time. Bread and Puppet puppeteers have been active in the global justice movement and participated in the World Trade Organization (WTO) protests in Seattle in 1999. During the 2000 Republican National Convention (RNC) in Philadelphia, Bread and Puppet puppeteers were among more than 70 people arrested at a warehouse where out-of-town puppetistas and demonstrators were temporarily housed for the event. Many puppets and puppet-making supplies were seized during the raid, and the arrests prompted the largest civil suit against the City of Philadelphia that resulted from the RNC, citing violations of protesters' basic civil rights and misconduct on the part of the Philadelphia police department.

In addition to its presence at demonstrations across the US and abroad, the Bread and Puppet Theater held a weekend-long “Domestic Resurrection Circus” on farmland in Glover each summer for 23 years until 1998. Attendees, sometimes in the tens of thousands, camped at the site, which included a large outdoor amphitheater, often with their families. The pageants were not advertised in advance in an effort to dissuade audiences deemed too large to manage. Events consisted of a large pageant and many smaller sideshows in the woods surrounding the amphitheater. The premises of the performances ranged from condemnation of US foreign policy, to criticisms of New York mayor Rudolph Giuliani's controversial tenure, to celebrations of international social movements. These yearly events were canceled in 1998 after a man was accidentally killed during a fight in the campgrounds.

The theater continues to host smaller pageants on weekends throughout the summer at its Vermont farm, though now they are no longer overnight affairs. Bread and Puppet continues to be a fixture at large-scale demonstrations. The group also maintains a museum on the farm, conducts street theater workshops, and operates the Cheap Art Press. Sales from the press support the theater and help the company uphold its philosophy that art and the act of artistic creation should be inexpensive and accessible to everyone. The Cheap Art movement began in 1982 in response to the exclusionary corporatization of the art world, and the "Why Cheap Art" manifesto remains one of the theater's best-known works.

SEE ALSO: Global Justice Movement and Resistance; Guerilla Theater; World Trade Organization (WTO) Protests, Seattle, 1999

References and Suggested Readings

- Brecht, S. (1988) The Bread and Puppet Theater. New York: Routledge.
- Estrin, M. & Simon, R. T. (2004) Rehearsing with Gods: Photographs and Essays on the Bread and Puppet Theater. White River Junction, VT: Chelsea Green.

Bread riots, Britain, 1795

Michael T. Davis

The bread riots of 1795 were a series of extensive disorders in Britain over the scarcity and high price of provisions, especially wheat and bread. Traditionally, food riots tended to be localized and transient in nature, but the bread riots of 1795 and into 1796 were more prolonged and outbreaks occurred in most regions of Britain. Palmer (1988: 141) counts some 74 disturbances in the period 1795–6, which the most significant set of disturbances since the 1760s and 1770s.

During the course of the eighteenth century, the diet of most Britons changed toward a greater dependency on wheat-based foodstuffs rather than products derived from oats or barley. In 1795, wheat yields were extremely low as an unfortunate alignment of bad weather and war brought Britain to the brink of famine. The previous year witnessed a poor harvest due to a hot, dry summer and the winter of 1794–5 was extremely cold, affecting crop production and preventing farmers from undertaking field work. The spring of 1795 was equally unfavorable to agricultural production, with bad weather further reducing market supply. At the same time, the war against revolutionary France disrupted European trade and the market balance derived from importing grain when necessary was impeded.

As supply was shortened, prices began to rise quickly and sharply. Britain entered crisis mode. Some towns organized food subscriptions for the neediest members of the community and other forms of remedial charity were instituted in an effort to alleviate the situation and to avert disaster. However, popular discontent rose as the price of bread and other foodstuffs continued to increase. The government budget of February 1795 did little to appease the people, with new taxes imposed on items such as tea, coffee, and spirits. The threat of the situation was abundantly clear to all contemporaries. The diary of William Goodwin, Earl Soham, for example, constantly refers to the high price of provisions and the discontent of the population during the course of 1795. In June he wrote: "Complaints for Bread (now 2d per lb) are universal and risings among the People are very general" (Suffolk County Record Office, William Goodwin diaries, 1795).

The operations of market speculators served only to exacerbate the situation. They bought remaining supplies of grains, which forced up prices and created shortages across the country. Moreover, grains and foodstuffs were sent to markets offering higher prices, fueling the anger of some communities who regarded locally grown products as their own. Angry rioters would typically attack the premises of millers and bakers as well as barges used for carrying grain. Their targets and tactics were in many senses traditional, embedded in the longstanding ritual of food protest. Women were prominent participants in bread riots and the disturbances of 1795 were no exception. Indeed, the Hammonds have described the bread riots of 1795 as “the revolt of the housewives” (Hammond & Hammond 1913: 120–1).

The authorities initially responded to the bread riots with force. Troops were often sent in to quash the rioters, but on some occasions this only served to heighten the level of violence. When dragoons attempted to arrest the ring-leaders of bread riots in Manchester in July 1795, one diarist recorded how “the mobers made a Terable attack with stones on the Military in order to rescue the prisoners the Soldiers sent for more assistance which Emedeatly Joined them and by firing their pistols and slashing away wit their swords wounded several of the Riotters” (Randall 2006: 212). While physical force was sufficient to defeat riots at a local level, a broader remedy was required to address the fundamental problem of food shortages. Ultimately, the situation was stabilized through a massive campaign of grain importation and increasingly favorable weather conditions saw an expansion of wheat yields in the winter of 1795–6. A glut was created in the market, forcing prices down and dampening the heated environment.

John Stevenson (1975: 66) argues that there is “no evidence to suggest that the disturbances of 1795–6 denoted a crisis of revolutionary proportions.” Certainly, the number of riots offered potential for a revolutionary force and there was some alignment with radical interests. Indeed, groups such as the London Corresponding Society undoubtedly gained momentum during 1795 as a result of popular discontent over food prices.

Radicals sometimes made the connection between the need for political reform and the burdens of the time. However, they never fully exploited the political potential of the bread riots or rioters. In fact, the broad conclusion that can be drawn is that the riots lacked any real political potential. While some historians might argue that the bread riots of the period 1795–1801 marked a transition from traditional community politics to violent class conflicts of the industrial age, the food riots of this period were underpinned by a fundamental appeal to the moral economy. The bread riots of 1795 were limited in focus and motive and as such lacked any substantial revolutionary potential.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Corn Law Agitation, Britain, 19th Century; Enclosure Movement, Protests against; Food

Riots; Gordon “No Popery” Riots, Britain, 1780; London Corresponding Society; Spithead and Nore Mutinies, Britain, 1797; Swing Riots

References and Suggested Readings

- Bohstedt, J. (1983) Riots and Community Politics in England and Wales 1790–1810. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Gilmour, I. (1992) Riot, Risings and Revolution: Governance and Violence in Eighteenth-Century England. London: Pimlico.
- Hammond, J. L. & Hammond, B. (1913) The Village Labourer, 1760–1832. London: Longman.
- Palmer, S. (1988) Police and Protest in England and Ireland 1780–1850. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Randall, A. (2006) Riotous Assemblies: Popular Protest in Hanoverian England. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Stevenson, J. (1975) Food Riots in England, 1792–1818. In J. Stevenson & R. Quinault (Eds.), Popular Protest and Public Order: Six Studies in British History 1790–1920. New York: St. Martin’s Press.
- Wells, R. (1988) Wretched Faces: Famine in Wartime England, 1793–1803. Gloucester: Alan Sutton.

Bread and Roses Strike

Anne F. Mattina

The Lawrence, Massachusetts Woolen Mills Strike of 1912, popularly known as the Bread and Roses Strike, had its roots in protective legislation enacted by the state of Massachusetts, reducing the hours of labor for women and children from 56 per week to 54, causing a de facto reduction in wages. On January 11, women in the Everett Mills walked out upon discovering their pay was short. By the end of the next week, 10,000 workers had joined them, and by the end of the strike, 30,000 were out.

Though the strike itself lasted only 63 days, it looms large in the history of American labor reform, by representing an enormous victory for the workers and the Industrial Workers of the World. A presence in Lawrence for five years, IWW organizers helped with work slowdowns and wildcat walkouts in the months prior to the strike, and the “One Big Union’s” inclusive message served to bind together the myriad of ethnic groups employed in the city.

In addition to the IWW, the Italian Socialist Federation, the most visible and organized of the ethnic labor groups in Lawrence, played a major role in the strike's success. Female networks in Lawrence's neighborhoods also added considerable strength to the strike force. Workers, wives, and mothers forged strong alliances with neighbors in their tenement blocks out of necessity born of poverty. They shared food and childcare, laundry and "papers" necessary for gaining their children employment. The strength of these networks contributed to the solidarity essential to sustaining the strike of 1912.

The workers organized quickly and formed a general strike committee of 56 members, with each person responsible to the different ethnic groups involved. These individual units were charged with taking care of their own, providing soup kitchens, medical assistance, and clothing among other resources for their compatriots. The ISF, along with the IWW, raised money nationally and internationally to support the local efforts.

On January 15 the state militia was called in to aid the Lawrence police, who were having trouble containing the strikers. Fire hoses were proving ineffectual at crowd control, so bayonets and clubs were employed. A young Syrian striker, John Ramey, was killed after being stabbed by a bayonet during one confrontation. Over the next several days, massive parades of strikers were met and turned back by the militia. Workers met nightly in halls, listening to speakers and plotting their resistance. Early on, the IWW warned against violence as a strategy. City officials and mill owners, however, were fearful and called in private security consisting of Pinkerton agents and Harvard undergraduates as reinforcements and strikebreakers.

January 29 was a watershed day for the strike. After hearing of the arrival of trolley cars filled with strikebreakers, workers swarmed the scene. Newspaper reports and city officials blamed strikers for the ensuing riot as "scabs" were dragged from the cars. The "thugs" were actually Pinkertons hired by the owners, disguised as workers, in an attempt to beat the workers back while generating fear and hostility among the general populace. Later that same day, Anna Lopizzo died after being shot while the militia attempted to control the riot. City officials began to close access to public gathering places, forcing the workers to meet outdoors. It was here that existing communication networks of women became essential to the life of the strike.

The women of Lawrence seized the neighborhoods around the mills. Large numbers of women would link arms to create a human chain incapable of being broken by police, protecting each other from arrest. "Scab mugging," another tactic, included following strikebreakers to the gates of the factories all the while hectoring those who dared cross the line. In response, the police doused the strikers with fire hoses, clubbing and finally arresting them.

Perhaps the most publicly creative action associated with the strike was the strategy of sending the striker's children out of Lawrence. Common among Italian strikers, the strategy was based on the premise that the workers might be compelled to return to the mills before the strike was settled if they were worried about their hungry offspring. "The Children's Exodus" occasioned a violent response from the police, the mayor, and the militia. On February 10 the first group boarded a train, bound for New York and sympathetic socialist host families. By and large, public response to the event was favorable, save in the city of Lawrence. Mill owners and the mayor were furious at the stunt. City officials called for the National Guard, and workers were threatened with jail if they tried to send any more children out of the city. On February 24 the strikers returned to the train station with more children. Brutal opposition met them. Police seized children as parents fought to get them on trains. A ferocious battle ensued with the city prevailing, the captive children ferried out of town to an orphanage.

The rest of the country reacted with outrage to the actions of Lawrence officials. National labor activists and social reformers called for an immediate investigation. Congressional hearings began on March 6, in Washington, DC. Under mounting public pressure and unable to break the strike force, the mill owners began to settle with the strikers. By mid-March, most had capitulated to the demands of reduced hours without a pay reduction. The workers won.

SEE ALSO: Anarchosyndicalism; Flynn, Elizabeth Gurley (1890–1964); Haywood, Big Bill (1869–1928); Industrial Workers of the World (IWW); Lowell Female Labor Reform Association

References and Suggested Readings

- Cahn, W. (1980) Lawrence, 1912: The Bread and Roses Strike. New York: Pilgrim.
- Cameron, A. (1995) Radicals of the Worst Sort: Laboring Women in Lawrence, Massachusetts, 1860–1912. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.

Foner, P. (1965) History of the Labor Movement in the United States: The Industrial Workers of the World 1905–1917. New York: International Publishers.

Watson, B. (2005) Bread and Roses: Mills, Migrants and the Struggle for the American Dream. New York: Viking.

Brecht, Bertolt (1898–1956)

Christina Suszynski Green

Bertolt Brecht was a German playwright, poet, librettist, and dramaturge during the early twentieth century. Born in 1898, in Augsburg, Germany, Brecht lived to be one of the most celebrated and controversial playwrights of his time. The frequency with which his dramas were performed in the 1950s rivaled that of Shakespeare and Schiller in western Europe. Yet the combination of his narrative style, dramaturgical choices, and critical theory earned him more than a few adversaries. Brecht was a proponent of social change through the theater, believing that if he could present the contradictions driving modern Western societies (both politically and socioeconomically), audience members would cease to be passive receivers of empty entertainment, and process such contradictions as a dialectic for the mind to contemplate with seriousness. This process is what Brecht considered to be the removing of the fourth wall, a screen of illusion between the performance and the audience. Such a direct relationship with the action of the stage would then, Brecht posited, cause audiences to form connections between the stage and the outside world, leading to uprising action on the street.

The theory of epic theater unfortunately relied on the presence of the working class, the supposed beneficiaries of Brecht's poetic talent. In actuality, the working class formed such a small percentage of his audience that he was compelled to express how troubled he was over this fact in his personal writings. His own friend and colleague, Theodor Adorno, predicted the likelihood of this coming to pass, claiming Brecht was only preaching to the choir. These details do not diminish the great influence Brechtian drama has had over Western theory and art. In exile from 1933 to 1947, the American period led to numerous collaborations that poised Brecht to be a leading voice against industrialized capitalist and fascist regimes.

A central theme in many of Brecht's dramas is the degradation into which the masses are thrown when they no longer control the means of production, and are forced to sell their labor, even when it necessitates their exploitation and contradicts their values or commitments to loved ones. In this category, St. Joan of the Stockyards, Mother Courage, and The Threepenny Opera remain the most recognized today. The last of these is a musical written with Kurt Weill (a frequent collaborator with Brecht), and it may be the one work truly considered to have popular appeal. Similarly, The Caucasian Chalk Circle, another of Brecht's most performed and read dramas, sheds light on the contradictions to our values and the danger to ourselves that we can become immersed in when motivated by compassion to help others or, conversely, when motivated by greed to help others.

Such countercultural thinking earned Brecht an interview with the House Committee on Un-American Activities in 1947, which labeled him a communist. He never admitted to being a communist in his hearings, though his theory of epic theater is grounded in Karl Marx's Das Kapital. His trip to Moscow in 1932 and his collaborations with the communist writer Sergei Treiakov were also cause for American paranoia, and it would be ridiculous to suggest that his world of ideas was not bound with communist ideals. Shortly after this hearing, Brecht returned to Germany, where he died in 1956.

Brecht's dramas have been an important part of the post-colonial and Marxist dialogues in literary, dramatic, social, anthropological, and political theory. However, it is little recognized that Brecht also wrote prose, poetry, musical lyrics for ballads, cantatas, and operas – endeavors that were praised highly by Hannah Arendt. His Buckow Elegies, The Baden Cantata of Acquiescence, and Mahagonny stand out as excellent examples.

SEE ALSO: Adorno, Theodor W. (1903–1969); Arendt, Hannah (1906–1975); Dictatorship of the Proletariat

References and Suggested Readings

- Brecht, B. (1992) Brecht on Theatre: The Development of an Aesthetic. Trans. J. Willett. New York: Hill & Wang.
- Brecht, B. (1995) Bertolt Brecht: Journals 1934–1955. Trans. S. S. Brecht. New York: Routledge.

- Brecht, B. (1997) Bertolt Brecht: Poems 1913–1956. Ed. J. Willett & R. Manheim. New York: Routledge.
- Demetz, P. (Ed.) (1962) Brecht: A Collection of Critical Essays. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice Hall.
- Demetz, P. (1967) Marx, Engels, and the Poets: Origins of Marxist Criticism. Chicago: Chicago University Press.
- Tomson, P. & Sachs, G. (Eds.) (1994) The Cambridge Companion to Brecht. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Brissot, Jacques Pierre (1754–1793)

Leonore Loft

Jacques Pierre Brissot was one of the most misunderstood men of his generation and ours. Best known for his prominent political role during the French Revolution, his earlier career as a publicist, journalist, and disciple of the French Philosophes provides the key to his lifelong commitment to reformist, egalitarian, and democratic ideals.

Born in 1754 to a master chef and caterer of Chartres and a highly devout mother, Jacques Pierre was one of seven surviving siblings. He began studying for a legal career, but as a voracious reader of Enlightenment philosophic and deistic works, he soon felt driven to begin writing down his own reflections concerning religion, politics, society, and human rights.

Early in life, Brissot experienced a wrenching crisis of faith, resulting in a violent break from the Catholic Church. From there he went on to condemn Catholicism for its despotic collusion with the state, reinforcing an exclusive, hierarchical system. Although he came to embrace a Rousseau-style deism, he adopted his own version of the humanitarianism of the Judeo-Christian tradition.

He left Chartres for Paris, but his fierce ambition, intellectual curiosity, and the tumultuous events of late eighteenth-century society and politics led him to London, to the cantons of the future Switzerland, to Holland, and to the United States. His writings of the late 1770s, 1780s, and during the Revolution reflect his commitment to political and social reform and humanitarian progress. Among his early works were polemics on Catholicism, a two-volume theory of criminal law (his magnum opus), and numerous other pamphlets and collections dealing with criminal jurisprudence and legal reform. He attempted to establish a European-wide correspondence among intellectuals and scientists who would learn from one another. Financial difficulties ended these efforts.

As Brissot's awareness and understanding of contemporary political events deepened, his sense of himself as reformer and activist intensified. His Le Philadelphien à Genève discussed the unsuccessful Genevan democratic revolt of 1782 and gave full expression to what he believed were the pernicious effects of ministerial and aristocratic complicity. His contributions to the Englishman David Williams' Letters on Political Liberty contained radical ideas on constitutional reform and indicated the extent to which Brissot was absorbing a broad-based political ideology and applying it to France. He wrote two open letters to Emperor Joseph II, the second advocating the right of the oppressed to revolt in the Transylvanian peasant uprising of 1784.

Rather than put his faith in the corrupt legacy of European models, which he saw as paralyzed by aristocratic privilege, he drew his inspiration instead from the New World where the American republic offered vibrant proof of possibilities for progress. By the time he left for the New World in 1788, he had already formed lasting ties with English Quakers and had exported and enlarged their emancipationist efforts, founding the Société des Amis des Noirs, the first French anti-slavery group. While in the United States, he traveled through New England, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Virginia, carrying a letter of introduction to George Washington from the Marquis de Lafayette. Having received an invitation to visit the president in Mount Vernon, he attempted to persuade Washington to abolish slavery in the new democracy. Although he was horrified by the continued existence of slavery, which he considered to be a sign of Old World infection not yet rooted out, Brissot nevertheless planned to relocate his wife, Félicité née Dupont, and their three sons to Pennsylvania. Instead, receiving news from France of the calling of the Estates General in 1788, he returned to participate wholeheartedly in events and reform efforts he felt he had helped to create.

Late in July of 1789 Brissot founded a daily news sheet, the Patriote français, which became one of the most influential of the pro-Revolutionary journals. He was elected deputy to the Legislative Assembly (September 1791 to September 1792) and then to the National Convention. He became the leader of an influential faction to which he was so closely associated in the minds of his contemporaries that it was known as the Brissotins; only later would it become generally known as the Girondins (after the Gironde, the area of France that many of its other members represented).

In March of 1792, during the period of constitutional monarchy, the king called upon Brissot and his Girondins to join, and in effect head, the government. Brissot's prolonged struggle with Maximilien Robespierre began when the Girondins advocated, and then put into effect, a policy of revolutionary war against the crowned heads of old-regime Europe. The radical journalist Jean Paul Marat (with whom Brissot had formerly been closely associated) and Robespierre strongly condemned this militaristic adventurism, but Brissot's call to war was very popular with the radicalized Parisian population, and war with Austria was declared on April 20.

Within a few months, counter-revolutionary armies were threatening Paris and the ensuing crisis served to rapidly deepen the radicalization of the Parisian sans-culottes. In a great insurrection on August 10, 1792, the constitutional monarchy was overthrown. Although a few months earlier Brissot and the Girondins had represented the leading edge of revolutionary radicalism, events had passed them by and they increasingly appeared as defenders of moderate political policies against Robespierre's ever-more-radical Jacobin party. Their moderation was attractive to revolutionary intellectuals, including Thomas Paine, the Marquis de Condorcet, and Madame Roland's circle, but it increasingly alienated the rank-and-file sans-culottes.

When a chest of Louis XVI's private correspondence was discovered, and it proved that he had been engaged in treasonous plots against the Revolution, overwhelming sentiment for his trial and execution came to the fore. The Girondins resisted the call to put the king to death, putting themselves ever more at odds with the rising revolutionary tide. Brissot's political career came to an end in yet another Parisian insurrection, May 31 to June 2, 1793. He fled, hoping to escape arrest, but was captured and imprisoned. Charged by Jacobin deputies with conspiracy and treason, he and virtually the entire leadership of the Girondin faction were condemned to death. Brissot and 19 of his colleagues were executed on October 31, 1793; he was 39 years of age.

Although Brissot did not live to see it, the remnants of his faction eventually made a political comeback after the Revolution's radicalism had run its course. Robespierre's fall in July 1794 resulted in the return of the moderates to power in the period that came to be known as Thermidor.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Slavery Movement, Britain; Condorcet, Marquis de (1743–1794); Counter-revolution, France, 1789–1830; Danton, Georges Jacques (1759–1794); Enlightenment, France, 18th Century; Estates General, France; French Revolution, 1789–1794; French Revolution, Radical Factions and Organizations; Haiti, Revolutionary Struggles; Lafayette, Marquis de (1757–1834); Marat, Jean-Paul (1743–1793); Paine, Thomas (1737–1809); Robespierre, Maximilien de (1758–1794); Rousseau, Jean-Jacques (1712–1778)

References and Suggested Readings

- Burrows, S. (2003) The Innocence of Jacques-Pierre Brissot. Historical Journal 46, 4 (December): 843–71.
- Darnton, R. C. (1968) The Grub Street Style of Revolution: J.-P. Brissot, Police Spy. Journal of Modern History 40: 301–27.
- De Luna, F. A. et al. (1991) Forum: Interpreting Brissot. French Historical Studies 17: 159–218.
- d'Huart, S. (1986) Brissot: La Gironde au pouvoir. Paris: Editions Robert Laffont.
- Ellery, E. (1915/1970) Brissot de Warville: A Study in the History of the French Revolution. New York: AMS Press.
- Loft, L. (2002) Passion, Politics and Philosophie: Rediscovering J.-P. Brissot. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.

Bristol Riots, 1831

Steve Poole

The Bristol Riots of October 29–31, 1831 were the single most serious provincial urban disturbance in modern English history and the most catastrophic since the Gordon Riots of 1780. Several public buildings were set on fire, between 100 and 250 people were killed or wounded, mostly by military action, and the cost of damage to property was estimated between £50,000 and £150,000. Eighty-one rioters were later convicted and four hanged. The cause was the House of Lords' rejection of the Reform Bill, for which there was strong cross-class support in the city. Unlike Nottingham and Derby, however, where rioting occurred immediately, disturbances at Bristol did not break out until three weeks later, when crowds mobilized to demonstrate against the arrival of Tory Recorder Sir Charles Wetherell, a notorious opponent of reform, to open the assize.

There were important local causes of discontent too, however, chief of which was the unaccountable nature of the Corporation. The civic elite, still drawn predominantly from wealthy merchant dynasties, had become irretrievably unrepresentative of the growing economic influence of the commercial and industrial middling sort. Against a background of perceived decline and Corporation inactivity, a considerable proportion of the population felt alienated from the historical mythology of civic cohesion. The refusal of the middling sort to report for duty as special constables when Wetherell first arrived in the city, and of the Political Union to become the "cat's paw of the Corporation," was a clear enough expression of disinterest and a primary cause of escalation in disorder.

Magistrates responded by hiring 300 intemperate sailors, whose violent attempts to make arrests amongst the crowd protesting Wetherell's presence at the mayor's Mansion House in Queen Square were largely responsible for much of what followed. By the following day, magistrates had little choice but to request military intervention, but there were few precedents for the wholesale use of soldiers for crowd control in England and, after Peterloo, most local authorities were reluctant to introduce them. Nervousness and misunderstandings between magistrates and military commanders produced inertia for two days while crowds went largely unopposed.

The destruction was not indiscriminate. To begin with, only the Mansion House was attacked. The jails were liberated on the second day, chiefly to recover arrested prisoners, followed by assaults upon other symbols of local governance – the harbor toll houses, the Bishop's Palace, the Custom House, and the Excise Office. In the closing stages, a number of private houses and warehouses in and around Queen Square were looted and set on fire, and this appears to have finally spurred the middling sort, including members of the Political Union, to volunteer as constables. Magistrates finally regained control on the third day after ordering a series of devastating cavalry charges across the square and through the principal streets.

SEE ALSO: Gordon "No Popery" Riots, Britain, 1780; Peterloo Massacre, 1819; Reform Acts, Britain and Ireland, 1832

References and Suggested Readings

- Caple, J. (1991) The Bristol Riots of 1831 and Social Reform in Britain. Lampeter: Edwin Mellon Press.
 Harrison, M. (1988) Crowds and History: Mass Phenomena in English Towns, 1790–1835. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
 LoPatin, N. D. (1999) Political Unions, Popular Politics and the Reform Act of 1832. Basingstoke: Macmillan.

Britain, anti-war movement, 1775–1783

H. T. Dickinson

Throughout the crisis leading to the War of American Independence, successive British administrations secured comfortable majorities in parliament for their efforts to subordinate the American colonies to the sovereign authority of the Westminster parliament. There was always, however, some opposition in parliament to these policies and even greater opposition outside parliament. These critics were alarmed by the outbreak of war in 1775 and most urged reconciliation before it was too late. In parliament, William Pitt, the Earl of Chatham, and Edmund Burke were simply the most famous who aired this opinion. Their views were increasingly shared by such men as Charles James Fox and David Hartley.

There were even more critics of the war outside parliament. Rational Dissenters and Real Whigs, such as James Burgh, John Cartwright, and Catharine Macaulay, and leading publishers and publicists, such as John Almon and Thomas Holcroft, were vociferous critics of the American war. Probably the most celebrated critic was Richard Price, who produced bestselling pamphlets, such as Observations on the Nature of Civil Liberty in 1776 and Additional Observations on the Nature and Value of Civil Liberty, and the War with America in 1777, which attacked government policies, supported American claims, and condemned efforts to subordinate the American colonists to British authority by force of arms. Price regarded the war as an unmitigated disaster and believed that victory would prove elusive. He urged Britain to concede American independence rather than wage war. Although far from sharing the political views of Price, the two foremost British economists of the age, Adam Smith in his Wealth of Nations (1776) and Josiah Tucker, argued that war should be avoided and that what should matter to Britain was her trade with America, not her right to subordinate America to her political authority.

While it is difficult to be certain how the British people as a whole regarded the American war, there is considerable evidence to suggest that many were opposed. The London supporters of the popular radical John Wilkes, including such resident Americans as Arthur Lee and Stephen Sayre, encouraged the London Common Council to address the king and to petition parliament against the war in 1775–6. These London radicals not only condemned the war, but actually tried to block efforts to recruit men into the army and to impress men into the navy. Their efforts encouraged a petitioning movement against the war from many parts of Britain, and particularly from commercial centers and towns with many inhabitants who were Protestant Dissenters (Bradley 1986). Opposition to the war frequently appeared in several leading London and provincial newspapers and in a host of individual pamphlets. In 1776 a virulently republican magazine, The Crisis, circulated in the provinces until it was suppressed by the authorities. In the early stages of the conflict, Lord North himself confessed to George III that the war was not sufficiently popular with the British people, while Lord Camden, a close ally of Chatham, warned the House of Lords that the common people strongly opposed the war and that less than half the nation supported the government. John Wesley, who had traveled around the country more than anyone else, warned that the bulk of the people were dangerously dissatisfied with the government's policies (Dickinson 2000: 2–3).

In the first years of the war, however, opposition was fragmented and demoralized, even though there were many expressions of serious concern that the war was unwise and that victory might not be achieved. It was news of the stunning American victory at Saratoga, which arrived in Britain in late 1777, that convinced a considerable body of opinion in Britain that the war could not be won and should be abandoned as soon as possible. On March 23, 1778 the Duke of Richmond moved a resolution in the House of Lords that British troops should be withdrawn from America. Although he was easily defeated there was growing support for concentrating on the new war with France rather than seeking an elusive victory in America. For several months, from April to June 1779, the parliamentary opposition regularly condemned the government's conduct of the war and made it clear that American independence would need to be conceded. Charles James Fox and David Hartley became two of the most vocal members of the House of Commons to take this position. From late 1779 these views received considerable support outside parliament as a widespread popular movement, mainly initiated by Christopher Wyvill's Yorkshire Association, began to condemn the government's policies, urged economic and parliamentary reform, and advised an end to the American war. When news of Cornwallis's surrender at Yorktown reached London in late 1781, the opposition, in and out of parliament, became fully convinced that the war with America must be abandoned. Even Lord North acknowledged that the military effort in America must be scaled down. On February 27, 1782 the opposition in the House of Commons secured a majority for a motion urging an end to offensive operations in America.

Less than a month later, Lord North resigned. His administration was replaced by one controlled by those who had long criticized his American policies and who were ready to end the war in America and to concede American independence. Negotiating peace not only with America, but also with France, Spain, and the Dutch Netherlands, who all had different objectives, proved very difficult and took many months of tortuous negotiations. Those who had long opposed the American war still hoped to retain some relationship with America, particularly strong commercial links, but they were ready to concede independence and to offer quite generous territorial concessions in North America in order to end what they had always regarded as a misguided war.

SEE ALSO: American Revolution of 1776

References and Suggested Readings

- Bonwick, C. (1977) English Radicals and the American Revolution. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Bradley, J. E. (1986) Popular Politics and the American Revolution in England: Petitions, the Crown, and Public Opinion. Macon: Mercer University Press.
- Conway, S. (2000) The British Isles and the War of American Independence. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Dickinson, H. T. (Ed.) (1998) Britain and the American Revolution. New York: Addison Wesley Longman.
- Dickinson, H. T. (2000) "The Friends of America": British Sympathy with the American Revolution. In M. T. Davis (Ed.), Radicalism and Revolution in Britain, 1775–1848. New York: St. Martin's Press.
- Sainsbury, J. (1987) Disaffected Patriots: London Supporters of Revolutionary America 1769–1782. Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press.

Britain, peasant uprisings, 16th century

Jason Jewell

During the sixteenth century England's Tudor dynasty and Scotland's Stuart dynasty suffered a number of rebellions against their authority. Members of the aristocracy instigated and led the majority of these rebellions, but some of them featured enough initiative, leadership, and participation from the lower classes to be termed peasant uprisings. The most important of these were the Cornish Rebellion of 1497, the Pilgrimage of Grace of 1536–7, and two uprisings of 1549 – the Western Rebellion and Kett's Rebellion.

The Cornish Rebellion, on the cusp of the sixteenth century, originated as a tax revolt against a parliamentary grant levied in 1497 to finance an invasion of Scotland. Cornishmen saw no threat to themselves from the Scots and protested the heavy tax. Michael Joseph an Gof (a blacksmith) and Thomas Flamank (a lawyer) led an estimated 15,000 Cornishmen on an orderly march across England to rid King Henry VII of his "evil advisors." In June the rebels arrived at Blackheath, where they were confronted and defeated by a larger royal force. The rebel leaders were executed and Henry VII laid heavy fines on the regions that had supported the rebels.

The Pilgrimage of Grace was a popular response to the Dissolution of the Monasteries proclaimed by Henry VIII in 1536. This threat to traditional religion, combined with dissatisfaction over taxation, eventually led to risings in Lincolnshire, Yorkshire, Cumberland, Durham, Westmorland, and Northumberland. The name Pilgrimage of Grace properly refers to the rising in Yorkshire, led by lawyer Robert Aske. In October 1536 he occupied York with 9,000 followers, reinstated monks and nuns to their houses, and resumed Roman Catholic religious observances. Later that month the rebel force, now grown to 30,000 with the support of many gentry, negotiated with the Duke of Norfolk at Doncaster Bridge. Petitions were sent to London and disingenuous royal assurances were given that the rebels' grievances would be addressed. Aske persuaded the "pilgrims" to return home; he was later arrested and executed.

The uprisings of 1549 had different causes. Anger over the new Book of Common Prayer motivated the Western Rebellion, which was primarily composed of men from Cornwall and Devon, but the rebels also displayed clear hostility towards almost all members of the upper class. Kett's Rebellion, centered in East Anglia, had motivations that were more clearly economic; enclosure of common lands was a chief grievance. In both cases, thousands of commoners mobilized to seize control of local administration. After some vacillation the Duke of Somerset, the leader of Edward VI's regency, ordered sharp military reprisals which resulted in the deaths of 3–4,000 commoners in each region.

SEE ALSO: Class, Poverty, and Revolution; English Reformation; German Peasant Rebellion, 1525

References and Suggested Readings

- Beer, B. L. (2005) Rebellion and Riot: Popular Disorder in England during the Reign of Edward VI. Kent: Kent State University Press.
- Cornwall, J. (1977) Revolt of the Peasantry, 1549. London: Routledge.
- Fletcher, A. & MacCulloch, D. (1968) Tudor Rebellions. London: Longman.
- Hoyle, R. W. (2001) The Pilgrimage of Grace and the Politics of the 1530s. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Moorhouse, G. (2002) The Pilgrimage of Grace: The Rebellion That Shook Henry VIII's Throne. London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson.

Britain, post-World War I army mutinies and revolutionary threats

Gerard Oram

Following the Bolshevik revolution that overthrew its Russian allies, the British government – increasingly fearful of similar threats – placed responsibility for monitoring and managing “industrial and revolutionary unrest in the United Kingdom” in the hands of the army, a role it would fulfill from the end of 1917 to 1920. As well as civilian unrest, the army’s Intelligence Branch (A2) concerned itself with the growth of trade unionism in the army and with the attitude of troops toward labor unrest and strikes (Englander 1987: 24–32). Unlike his wartime equivalent, the postwar soldier was less concerned with his immediate survival and instead looked more to the future – a future in which few envisaged continuing military service – and many were prepared to use collective bargaining to this end. But a great fear developed within the government and A2 surrounding a potentially politicized or revolutionary soldier.

In Britain, the end of the war precipitated a wave of mutinies in the army, navy, and airforce. Army units at Shoreham mutinied merely two days after the armistice, but January 1919 saw a rash of mutinies all across the country involving many thousands of men. At RAF Biggin Hill in Kent, the Internationale was sung. Elsewhere, soldiers’ and sailors’ councils were set up or (as in the case of a naval mutiny at Milford Haven) the red flag was raised. However, the demands and grievances of the mutineers show a remarkable lack of any Bolshevik agenda and instead emphasized poor pay and conditions, uncertainty about further deployments, general dislike of army discipline, and, most of all, the slow pace of demobilization. Mostly, these mutinies were dealt with peacefully by local commands that tended to adopt a conciliatory approach whilst at the same time isolating and arresting the ringleaders. But at Kempton Park, where mechanics of the Army Service Corps went on strike to demand civilian rates of pay, A2 placed one of the ringleaders (Private George Gray) on its payroll by employing him as an informer.

Not all mutinies were peaceful. At Kimmel Park, Canadians, aggrieved at the slow pace of repatriation, rioted. Three rioters and two sentries were killed in the incident. The raising of the red flag and the role played by a Russian Canadian, William Tarasevich, no doubt lay behind an incorrect and sensational article in The Times (March 7, 1919) which blamed Bolshevik ringleaders. But this incident was exceptional, and the most striking characteristic of these postwar mutinies was the lack of orchestration.

Significantly, the only true attempt at orchestrating military personnel’s protests – the formation of a union – elicited a rather different response from the state. On January 3, 1919, at the ports of Folkestone and Dover, several thousand troops refused orders to embark for France and seized the harbor, thereby preventing any further crossings. Elsewhere, men of the Army Service Corps took their protest over demobilization direct to Whitehall. In both cases the War Office capitulated to demands for extra leave, early demobilization, and indemnity from prosecution. Delegates elected by the Folkestone mutineers then joined with the Discharged Consumptives’ Society and Sailors’ and Soldiers’ Protection Society to form the Sailors’, Soldiers’, and Airmen’s Union (SSAU). The metamorphosis from “society” to “union” and its implications of politicized and revolutionary soldiers caused alarm at A2, which immediately strove to infiltrate what it described in its fortnightly report on revolutionary organizations as “a very active and mischievous body” (National Archives 1919).

The new union quickly established a list of objectives reflecting common concerns, including leave, pay, pensions, and status, but crucially it also aimed to prevent servicemen being used as strike breakers in industrial disputes. Amidst fears that the real object of the meeting was to urge soldiers to mutiny if called upon to assist the civil power during coming disturbances, The Times (March 16, 1919) published an article that blamed “revolutionary wire-pullers” for leading astray the “misguided servicemen” to establish “soldiers’ councils of the approved Bolshevik pattern.”

Largely thanks to the intrigues of the A2 spy George Gray, the leadership of the SSAU was fractured and its president was forced to resign amidst accusations of financial wrongdoing. His successor, Jack Byrnes, was in fact another A2 spy who then set about radicalizing the union and forging links with other potential revolutionary groups such as Sylvia Pankhurst's British Socialist Party. Clearly, acting as an agent provocateur in an attempt to flush out any revolutionary threat, Byrnes also pledged the union's support for the planned police strike. But the threat had diminished by late 1919 and with it the great fear of the revolutionary soldier. Byrnes was redeployed to infiltrate the Irish nationalist movement and was executed in 1920 by the IRA.

Overseas, there were mutinies in France, Italy, Russia, Mesopotamia, and India, where the Connaught Rangers mutinied in protest of British actions in Ireland. A total of 511 men were tried by courts martial for mutiny between the signing of the armistice and March 31, 1920. This is a small percentage of the number who actually refused orders, the vast majority of whom did not face trial at all. Fewer still were revolutionary, and the deployment of Bolshevik symbolism was just one of a range of bargaining strategies. But Bolshevism had become the new "folk devil" and the cause of a moral panic through sensationalist reporting. As such it was likely to alarm an increasingly insecure state that faced widespread industrial unrest and a police strike. Broadly, where military mutinies were motivated by soldiers' immediate concerns, government and army acquiesced. But where a degree of orchestration was suspected, or when any prospect existed of a union between military personnel and industrial workers, the reaction was markedly different.

SEE ALSO: Bolsheviks; Britain, Strikes, 1905–1926; Britain, Trade Union Movement; Irish Nationalism; Irish Republican Army (IRA); Pankhurst, Emmeline (1858–1928), Christabel (1880–1958), and Sylvia (1882–1960)

References and Suggested Readings

- Englander, D. (1987) Mutiny and Myopia. Bulletin for the Study of Labour History 52 (1): 5–7.
- Gill, D. & Dallas, G. (1985) The Unknown Army. London: Verso.
- National Archives (1919) Fortnightly Report on Revolutionary Organisations in the United Kingdom and Abroad. CAB24/76, GT6976. March 10.
- Putkowski, J. (1989) The Kimmel Park Camp Riots 1919. Hawarden: Flintshire Historical Society.
- Putkowski, J. (1998) British Army Mutineers 1914–1922. London: Francis Boutle.

- Ward, S. R. (1973) Intelligence Surveillance of British Ex-Servicemen 1918–20. Historical Journal 16: 197–88.

Britain, post-World War II political protest

Bruce T. Harpham

British society has frequently been convulsed by protests, riots, and other uprisings since the conclusion of World War II. Starting in the 1960s, protests became a fixture of British life, though these varied in significance and efficacy. In general, protests can be broken into two main categories: those centered around group identity protest and those that involve single issue protests.

Group Identity Protest and Organization

Race Riots and Immigration

Following World War II, there were significant increases in immigration to Britain. From 1948, when the British Nationality Act was introduced, until the 1970s, residents of Britain's former colonies, as citizens of Commonwealth countries, were allowed to emigrate to Britain. Riots and political unrest greeted these new immigrants, many of whom came from the Caribbean, South Asia, and Africa, and the government responded by moving to restrict black immigration in 1972. Racial tensions largely smoldered in Britain until they erupted with riots in the 1980s.

In 1981 a series of race riots convulsed Britain, revealing significant socioeconomic disparities between the white majority and recent immigrants from Africa, the Caribbean, and South Asia. The rioting began in the Brixton area of London, where there was high unemployment, poor housing, and endemic crime. As a response to this crime, police began stop-and-search tactics, which ignited a two-day riot that resulted in significant property damage. Several hundred police officers were injured and 82 people were arrested. Similar riots occurred in Toxteth, Liverpool, and elsewhere, with white youths frequently joining in, and sometimes outnumbering, their black counterparts. Such riots tended to occur in areas where racist police tactics were implemented in deprived urban districts suffering from high unemployment and having a large visible minority population.

Government response to this rioting brought only limited success. Though there were government inquiries into the riots, such as the Scarman Report of 1981, and greater efforts at community policing, riots continued, especially as fringe political groups formed to oppose “colored immigration,” claiming that it was changing British identity for the worse. The first of these was the National Front, founded in 1967 as a merger of several conservative groups. It was active in opposing immigration as well as membership in the European Economic Community. The Front declined in the 1980s, as Thatcherism absorbed some of its immigration views, but other groups, such as the British National Party, formed in its place. Founded in 1982, the BNP, infamous for limiting party membership to “indigenous Caucasians,” had some limited success in local elections in 2006.

Youth Culture: Riots and Protest

The rise of youth culture in postwar Britain has also generated disturbances. There was a student movement where different youth subcultures clashed, as well as a more politically minded student movement focused in a handful of universities. The development of several distinct youth subcultures has been explained by the increase in prosperity in the postwar era, and the increasing liberalization of the 1960s. Youth riots in the postwar era were caused for a wide variety of reasons, ranging from musical differences to political protests. In the early 1960s, Rockers and Mods – adherents of different lifestyles mainly defined by music and fashion – witnessed some moderate clashes. More serious were the riots in British universities and at the American embassy against the Vietnam War.

The anti-Vietnam War protests were one aspect of the 1968 protests that convulsed Western Europe and the United States. These protests were inspired partly by the actions of university students in Paris, who were protesting their poor treatment and lack of participation in university governance. In Britain, university students at the London School of Economics (LSE) and the University of Essex demanded a voice in university administration and won a limited role as a result. In addition to these student concerns there was considerable anger at the failure of Prime Minister Harold Wilson to denounce the US war against Vietnam. This upsurge of radical politics, concentrated in youth culture, assumed a violent aspect when a group called the Angry Brigade bombed the homes of several Cabinet members in 1970. Following the end of the Vietnam War, protests declined markedly until 2003, when about 1 million individuals marched in London to protest the imminent Anglo-American invasion of Iraq and the complicity of Prime Minister Tony Blair.

Women and Homosexuals

In the 1960s, liberation movements were seemingly everywhere. In this context, women and homosexuals began concerted efforts for both social acceptance and better treatment. Women had been granted the vote in 1918 after World War I to highlight their social contribution. Despite this major political advance, however, there was a realization that few gains had been made since.

Although women went to universities, female graduates were often expected to return home to raise families. This sense of discontentment came to a head in the late 1960s with industrial struggles that put women front and center. When Ford automobile workers went on strike in 1968, their main concern was to establish equal pay for equal work for women. The Dagenham Ford plant had an overtly sexist pay system: a woman’s pay was lower than the lowest male pay grade, regardless of experience or skill. This struggle for economic equity would continue to be a mainstay of the women’s movement for many decades. Through the 1970s, disparate women’s groups tackled the issue of domestic abuse and access to abortion, which had been limited in 1967. When a bill was brought forward in parliament in 1979 to further restrict access to abortion, women’s groups persuaded the Trades Union Congress to organize a demonstration. The resulting October 1979 demonstration attracted an estimated 100,000 people, a high point for the women’s movement.

The lesbian and gay liberation movement in Britain had a slower beginning, with the first hints of postwar activity only becoming apparent in 1970. As with other political movements, homosexual politics had its beginning in the universities. One of the first organizations, the Gay Liberation Front (GLF), had its genesis at the London School of Economics in 1970, an institution that had seen considerable student unrest a few years earlier. Rapidly expanding from its student base, the GLF issued a manifesto in 1971 outlining some of the movement's priorities. The manifesto sought both political and social change: that school sex education no longer be exclusively heterosexual, that homosexuality no longer be treated as an illness, and that discrimination by employers and others be made illegal. One of the key confrontations for the GLF was its agitation against the Festival of Light in 1971–2. Networking with activists in the women's movement, the GLF was opposed to the festival's reactionary views of 1960s liberation. The experience of disrupting the festival was a major organizational achievement for the GLF. However, the group quickly devolved. Lobbying continued through the 1970s but faced major challenges when the Conservatives took power in 1979.

Single Issue Protest Politics

Peace, Environmentalism, and Anti-Poll Tax

The postwar era witnessed the rise of new advocacy groups dedicated to the concerns of the modern age. Some groups were explicitly dedicated to changing government policy. One such group, the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament (CND), was established in 1958, proposing that the United Kingdom unilaterally rid itself of nuclear weapons. This is especially notable given that the British military only had its first successful nuclear test in 1952 on the Monte Bello Islands, off the northwest coast of Australia. Prominent early members of the CND included mathematician and intellectual Bertrand Russell, and historians A. J. P. Taylor and E. P. Thompson. In 1984 the membership of the CND reached approximately 100,000 people, but its popularity went beyond the official membership: its Hyde Park rally in 1982 drew an estimated crowd of 400,000. Beginning in 1958, the group has made an annual protest march to the Aldermaston nuclear base, initially attended by some 10,000 people. In addition to demanding British disarmament, the CND also has opposed US nuclear weapons stationed in Britain, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and US President Ronald Reagan's Strategic Defense Initiative and other efforts at ballistic missile defense. Though it has not achieved its goal of disarmament, nuclear testing was much reduced in the later twentieth century.

There were also a series of ecological movements that had their origin in the postwar era, which did much to alter the British political landscape. Greenpeace UK was founded in 1977 and quickly made an impact with its opposition to nuclear technology, pollution, and other environmental concerns. British environmentalists became famous for opposing the use of genetically modified organisms in the 1990s, citing health and ecological issues. At times, these organizations took the form of direct action – destroying experimental crops – but these groups generally limited themselves to publicity and public education. Animal rights groups were also prominent in Britain, opposing the use of animals in both scientific and industrial research. The Coalition to Abolish the Fur Trade (founded in 1997) and Animal Aid (founded in 1977) are the most notable animal rights organizations. Many of these ecological organizations lobby corporations, as well as governments, in order to further their objectives.

Beyond defense policy, government actions generated opposition movements which achieved a very wide following. For instance, the introduction of a poll tax by the Conservative government of Margaret Thatcher in 1989 ignited widespread criticism and protest across Britain. The tax was conceived as a way for local governments to finance their own activities rather than relying on subsidies from the central government, which had been the case before. There were organized campaigns of non-payment and protest, which did much to undermine the popularity and credibility of Thatcher. Opposition to these measures was widespread on the political left and right; two Conservative MPs attempted to amend the tax to make it sensitive to income. The tax was rescinded in 1990, but so damaged Thatcher's reputation that she did not lead the Conservatives in the 1992 election.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Nuclear Campaign, Britain; Anti-Vietnam War Movement, Britain; Brixton Riots, 1981; Ecological Protest Movements; Greenpeace; Lesbian, Gay, Transsexual, Bisexual Movements; Reclaim the Streets

References and Suggested Readings

- Byrne, P. (1988) The Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament. London: Croom Helm.
- Cruickshank, M. (1992) The Gay and Lesbian Liberation Movement. London: Routledge.
- Garner, R. (1998) Political Animals: Animal Protection Politics in Britain and the United States. London: Palgrave.

- Glynn, S. (1995) Modern Britain: An Economic and Social History. New York: Routledge.
- Lent, A. (2001) British Social Movements since 1945: Sex, Color, Peace and Power. New York: Palgrave.
- Mason, D. (2000) Race and Ethnicity in Modern Britain. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Osgerby, B. (1998) Youth in Britain since 1945. Oxford: Blackwell.

Britain, Renaissance-era conflict

Nicole Martone

Following the Hundred Years' War between England and France in 1453, civil war engulfed England as two factions of the royal family – the House of York and the House of Lancaster – competed for the throne from 1455 to 1485. The war, caused by succession irregularities following the deposition of Richard II (r. 1377–99), has become known as the Wars of the Roses because, according to legend, the York's symbol was a white rose while the Lancaster's symbol was a red rose. The Duke of York and his supporters challenged the Lancastrian monarch, Henry VI (r. 1422–61). In 1461 the Duke's son, Edward IV (r. 1461–83), managed to maintain his hold on the throne and increase the finances and power of the monarchy with the assistance of capable ministers. Edward IV's brother, Richard III (r. 1483–5), usurped the throne from Edward IV's son, Edward V, but was defeated by the exiled Henry Tudor in 1485.

Henry Tudor ruled as Henry VII (r. 1485–1509) and founded the Tudor dynasty, which controlled England until 1603. He worked to restore royal prestige, crush the power of the nobility, and establish law and order at the local level. He curbed the authority of the English nobility through the Court of Star Chamber, which sometimes involved procedures contrary to English common law, such as preventing the accused from seeing evidence against them, secret trials, torture, and the omission of juries. He also used English laws to the monarchy's benefit by confiscating lands and fortunes of nobles, thereby governing without having to depend on parliament for funds. Through such actions he laid the foundations of what would emerge as one of Europe's most significant governments during the reigns of his successors.

English Reformation to 1553

Demands for ecclesiastical reform dated back to at least the fourteenth century. In the 1520s a group of future English reformers gathered in Cambridge to discuss the Protestant writings of Martin Luther. One of those in attendance was William Tyndale, who had translated the New Testament into English while in Germany. By the middle of the 1520s Tyndale's English translation began to be circulated in England.

Furthermore, Henry VIII's challenge to papal authority had precedent. Medieval English kings had traditionally maintained their rights against the pope, most notably Edward I (r. 1272–1307) against Pope Boniface VIII to prevent secular taxation of the clergy. Furthermore, Statutes of Provisors and Praemunire passed in the fourteenth century paved the way for curtailing payments and judicial appeals to the pope, as well as rejecting papal appointments in England.

In addition, the Lollard movement, led by John Wycliffe, had established a tradition of religious protest in England by the time of the Renaissance. The Lollards had been driven underground during the fifteenth century, but persisted in parts of southern England and the Midlands. The movement was especially popular among the working classes and stressed an individual interpretation of the Bible, which was considered the only standard of Christian faith. As a result, Lollards were anti-clerical and skeptical about the sacraments, opposing the wealth of the clergy, the veneration of the saints, and prayers for the dead.

However, the Catholic Church was well established in sixteenth-century England. Traditional Catholicism still maintained a powerful hold over the popular English imagination and loyalty. Catholic teachings were reinforced through the liturgy, sermons, plays, and art.

Henry VIII became heir to the throne upon the death of his brother Arthur in 1502. He was betrothed to Catherine of Aragon, Arthur's wife, to maintain the alliance with Spain. The two were married days before Henry became king in 1509. However, to marry the wife of one's brother was against canon and biblical law. Consequently, a special dispensation had to be secured from Pope Julius II, eliminating all legal technicalities about Catherine's previous union. During Henry VIII's early reign, Cardinal Thomas Wolsey, and later, Sir Thomas More, guided royal opposition to Protestantism, and, ironically, Henry even earned the title Defender of the Faith from Pope Leo X.

Henry went from defending Catholicism to splitting from the church when Catherine failed to produce a male heir. She gave birth to a healthy girl, the future Mary I, in 1516, but by 1527 Henry began to feel that the marriage was cursed and that the anarchy of the Wars of the Roses would be repeated under a female heir. Thus, he sought an annulment so he could marry his younger mistress, Anne Boleyn, in an attempt to produce a son. He formally requested an annulment from Pope Clement VII in 1527, stating that a valid marriage to Catherine had never existed. Excuses were commonly found for papal annulments during this time, particularly if the marriage had produced no heirs, but Clement VII had reasons for denying Henry's request.

The pope's attention was focused on the Lutheran movement in Central Europe and the Habsburg-Valois struggle for domination of the Italian peninsula. When Imperial soldiers fighting in the Italian peninsula mutinied and sacked Rome, Clement came under the protective custody of Holy Roman Emperor Charles V, nephew of Catherine of Aragon. Due to the influence of Charles V, combined with the fact that the marriage between Henry and Catherine had been made through special papal permission, and had lasted for almost 20 years, Clement refused to grant Henry an annulment. Furthermore, Clement believed that Julius II never had the right to grant permission for the marriage of Henry and Catherine in the first place, for it violated the law of God, but to admit that Julius had subjugated church law to his own judgments would lend credence to the arguments of the Protestant reformers. Dismayed, the king charged Wolsey with securing the royal annulment and dismissed him in disgrace when he failed, replacing him with Thomas Cranmer, who harbored Lutheran sympathies. Henry's new advisors advocated a course in which the king would be declared supreme in spiritual affairs as he was in temporal affairs and could thus resolve his dilemma himself.

In 1529 the "Reformation Parliament" convened for what would become a seven-year session, passing a series of legislation that ultimately placed the clergy under royal control and ended the pope's power in England. This created the precedent that religious change in England was to be made by the monarch in conjunction with parliament. In 1531 the Convocation, an assembly representing the English clergy, recognized Henry as the head of the church in England, and in 1532 parliament passed the Submission of the Clergy, which placed canon law under royal control and the clergy under royal jurisdiction. In 1534 parliament ended all payments to Rome and accorded Henry jurisdiction over ecclesiastical appointments. Through an Act of Succession the future children of Henry's union with Anne were declared legitimate heirs to the throne. The Act of Supremacy completed the king's break with the pope by declaring the monarch the supreme head of the Church of England. Thomas More and John Fisher refused to recognize the Acts of Succession and Supremacy and were executed shortly thereafter.

From 1536 to 1538 parliament disbanded monasteries and nunneries, seizing their wealth and lands. At this time, monasteries comprised about 20 percent of land in England. Consequently, this act increased royal power and expanded the royal treasury. Henry sold the property to the aristocracy, raising revenues for war while tying loyalty to the crown.

Despite the break with Rome, Henry remained religiously conservative. In 1536 the Ten Articles granted only moderate concessions to Protestant tenets. Church doctrine remained mostly unchanged. For example, the clergy was not allowed to marry, and those repeatedly caught in concubinage were punished. Angered by growing Protestant views in England, in 1539 Henry passed the Six Articles, which reaffirmed transubstantiation, denied the Eucharistic cup to the laity, declared celibate vows unbreakable, and called for the continuation of oral confession and private masses, all Catholic practices.

Henry's changes were not greeted with universal support from the English people. Many laypeople wrote to the king to petition him to spare monasteries. In 1536 a popular rebellion known as the Pilgrimage of Grace broke out in the north in opposition to the king's religious reforms. The rebels, who derived from several different classes, eventually accepted a truce, and the leaders were executed. In 1546 rebellions broke out in East Anglia and in the west. Such actions demonstrate that despite the Protestant dispositions that had existed in England, there was considerable opposition to Protestantism.

Henry's marriage to Anne Boleyn was deemed unsuccessful, for she too failed to give birth to a male heir, instead producing the future Elizabeth I. Anne was later charged with adulterous incest and beheaded, thereby making Elizabeth illegitimate. Henry's third wife, Jane Seymour, was able to give him a son, Edward (the future Edward VI), but died in childbirth. Henry's marriage to Anne of Cleves was an attempt to create an alliance with the Protestant German principalities. The marriage, conducted through proxy, was arranged by Thomas Cromwell. Henry VIII was dissatisfied with the marriage, which he had annulled, and executed Cromwell. He later married Catherine Howard, who was executed, and then Catherine Parr, who outlived him. In 1536 he relegitimized Mary and Elizabeth as his daughters.

On January 28, 1547 Henry died, leaving a legacy of religious change that would have a lasting impact on his country. His ten-year-old son, Edward VI, became king and reigned through regents, first the Duke of Somerset and then the Earl of Warwick (later known as the Duke of Northumberland), both men with Protestant sympathies.

Consequently, during Edward's reign, England enacted a true Protestant Reformation. Henry's Six Articles and laws against Protestant heresy were repealed, clerical marriage and communion with cup were sanctioned, and chantries, places where endowed masses had been said for the dead, were dissolved. Thomas Cranmer's Book of Common Prayer was imposed on all churches through the 1549 Act of Uniformity, and in 1550 images and altars were removed from churches. The Second Act of Uniformity (1552) imposed a revised version of the Book of Common Prayer on all churches, and Cranmer wrote a 42-article confession of faith, articulating a moderate Protestant doctrine, which advocated justification by faith, the denial of transubstantiation, and the recognition of only two sacraments.

These changes, however, did not last long. Edward was a sickly king and died young (and without an heir) in 1553. His eldest sister, Mary, the Catholic daughter of Henry and Catherine of Aragon, seemed the likely successor to the throne. Many devout Protestants feared the ascension of Mary, so some Protestant nobles developed a scheme to place Lady Jane Grey, the daughter of a powerful Protestant aristocrat and, through her mother, the granddaughter of Henry's sister, on the throne. Within days of Queen Jane's crowning, uprisings broke out in London and elsewhere in support of the principle of hereditary monarchy and the rights of Mary. Mary quickly regained the throne from Jane, whose reign totaled only nine days.

Era of Religious Conflict

Mary (r. 1553–8) returned the country to Catholicism and in 1554 married her cousin, Philip of Spain (later Philip II), to further a Catholic alliance. Her domestic policies divided the English people, creating protest and conflict. Parliament repealed the Protestant statutes of Edward VI and fully restored Roman Catholicism. The major Protestant reformers during Edward VI's reign, including Thomas Cranmer, Hugh Latimer, and John Hooper, were executed for heresy. Over 280 Protestants were burned at the stake, forcing many religious dissenters to seek asylum abroad in Germany and Switzerland where they became exposed to more radical Protestant ideas than those that had existed in England. Many of these exiles would later hold positions in the Church of England during the reign of Elizabeth I (r. 1558–1603).

Mary I died without issue in 1558 and was succeeded by her Protestant sister, Elizabeth I, the daughter of Henry VIII and Anne Boleyn. At the beginning of her reign, sharp differences existed in England. While Catholics wanted a Catholic ruler, a number of returning Protestant exiles wanted all Catholic elements in the Church of England purged. Elizabeth and her first advisor, Sir William Cecil, worked to rebuild England's image abroad and create a united domestic front, guiding a religious settlement through parliament that prevented religious differences from destroying England. A politique who subordinated religious doctrine to political unity, Elizabeth developed the Anglican Church, merging a centralized episcopal system under her firm control with broadly defined Protestant doctrine and traditional Catholic practices. As a concession to Protestants, priests in the Anglican Church were permitted to marry and could deliver sermons in English rather than Latin. As a concession to Catholics, the Anglican Church maintained some of the ornate elements of the Catholic mass, including detailed robes and golden crucifixes. The Elizabethan Settlement required outward conformity to the Church of England and uniformity in all ceremonies. Those who refused to attend Anglican services paid a fine.

A 1559 Act of Supremacy repealed all of Mary's anti-Protestant legislation and confirmed Elizabeth's role as supreme governor over both spiritual and temporal matters. Also in 1559, an Act of Uniformity imposed on every church in England a revised version of the second Book of Common Prayer. In 1563 a convocation of bishops approved the 39 articles, a revision of Thomas Cranmer's 42 articles, establishing moderate Protestantism as the official religion within the Church of England.

Elizabeth hoped to avoid both Catholic and Protestant extremism by following a moderate path. However, when she ascended the throne, Catholics were the majority in England, and zealous Catholics, urged by Jesuits, plotted against her. The Spanish also assisted conspirators against her, especially after she refused a marriage proposal from Philip II of Spain, Mary's former husband. Catholic radicals favored the Catholic Mary Stuart, Queen of Scots, as queen of England and wanted to use the fact that Elizabeth had been declared illegitimate during Henry's reign to bar her from the succession. This would leave Mary Stuart, a granddaughter of another of Henry VIII's sisters, in possession of the throne. Elizabeth dealt with such plots decisively, demonstrating little mercy to those who threatened her rule.

One group that proved to be a source of agitation was the Puritans, whose numbers in England steadily grew. Puritans worked within the national church to rid it of what they perceived as impure elements and vestiges of "popery." To Puritans, the maintaining of Catholic practices within the Church of England and the continuation of the Episcopal system undermined true Protestant reformation. Puritans at this time were not true separatists and enjoyed popular support. They worked through parliament to establish an alternative national church of semi-autonomous congregations governed by representative presbyteries based on the model of Calvin and Geneva. Radical Puritans wanted each congregation to be autonomous, with neither higher Episcopal nor Presbyterian control. Elizabeth found their views subversive and passed the Conventicle Act of 1593, providing such separatists with the options of conforming to the Church of England or facing exile or death.

A series of events deteriorated relations between England and Spain, ultimately leading to war. In 1567 the Duke of Alba marched into the Netherlands to quell an uprising there. If Spain were successful, England feared that Spain could invade England from the Netherlands, so Elizabeth supported Protestant Dutch rebels against Spain and was excommunicated for heresy in 1570 by Pope Pius V. This encouraged Catholics abroad and within England to act against her. Furthermore, in fear of Spain's growing naval power, England signed a mutual defense pact with France. Elizabeth also sponsored privateers, such as Sir John Hawkins and Sir Francis Drake, to prey upon Spanish galleys in the Americas. Finally, Mary was implicated in a plot to assassinate Elizabeth and was executed. Philip, hoping to reunite England with Catholic Europe, had supported the conspiracy. He received news of the execution and, with promises of financial support from the pope, declared war, counting on the support of English Catholics.

The Spanish were ultimately defeated. The English naval victory in 1588 marked the decline of Spain as a global power and gave inspiration to Protestant resistance throughout Europe. Philip failed in his attempt to impose Catholic unity on Europe, and Elizabeth died in 1603, leaving behind a strong and unified nation positioned to become a leading global power. To maintain Protestantism in England, she made certain that the succession passed to James VI of Scotland, a Protestant who ruled England as James I, the founder of the Stuart dynasty.

SEE ALSO: Luther, Martin (1483–1546); Reformation

References and Suggested Readings

- Bernard, G. W. (2005) The King's Reformation: Henry VIII and the Remaking of the English Church. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Colby, P. & Carnes, M. (2005) Henry VIII and the Reformation Parliament. White Plains, NY: Longman.
- Dickens, A. G. (1989) The English Reformation. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press.
- Lander, J. R. (1990) The Wars of the Roses. London: Grange.
- Randell, K. (2001) Henry VIII and the Reformation in England. London: Hodder & Stoughton.
- Tyler, S. (1993) Tudor Queens and Princesses. New York: Barnes & Noble.
- Weir, A. (2001) Henry VIII: The King and His Court. New York: Ballantine.

Britain, strikes, 1905–1926

Edmund Rogers

The 1905 bootmakers' march, industrial unrest over 1910–14, and the 1926 General Strike have been perceived as defining moments in British working-class consciousness, demonstrating labor's capacity to organize to achieve social change, with workers across various trades united in sympathy in shared battles between labor and capital. These strikes were, however, less revolutionary than many writers have recorded.

In March 1905, Northamptonshire bootmakers employed by War Office contractors struck to win minimum pay. With employers holding firm, the strike's leader, Joe Gribble, organized a march to London, initially without union approval, to "intimidate" the War Office into enshrining union wages in all army contracts. On May 8, 115 bootmakers marched, prompting Secretary of State for War Arnold-Forster to promise an inquiry into army contract wages. Trade unionists and socialists supported the marchers at a demonstration in Trafalgar Square on May 14, attended by an estimated 8,000–10,000 people. Following negotiations, the bootmakers won standard rates and the establishment of a conciliation board. Gribble remedied an industrial grievance using public protest and a mass show of working-class strength against the key player: the democratic state amenable to public opinion. Although the cause was less revolutionary than some socialist demonstrators believed, the march nevertheless illustrates organized labor's effective use of public protest.

The motivations behind the 1910–14 unrest, most infamously in coal and transport, have been a matter of historical debate. Contemporary and interwar writers identified rampant syndicalism, an ideology envisioning coordinated industrial action replacing capitalism with control of industry by organized labor. Postwar revisionists instead emphasized industrial grievances. However, the current consensus is that syndicalism was a minority ideology in Britain, locally concentrated, and less a cause of the unrest than a symptom. The major strikes arose from an upsurge in union organization in favorable economic conditions in which workers tried to win concessions from employers, who themselves faced cost pressures and were unwilling to engage in constructive collective bargaining. Militancy to a great extent reflected less-skilled workers' organizational difficulties. Historians have tempered the idea that 1910–14 was even extraordinary: apart from the exceptionally bad year of 1912, the worst years of the 1890s were more tumultuous.

There are several reasons for syndicalism's exaggerated importance. First was its relative strength among South Wales miners. The South Wales coal strike of September 1910–October 1911 has become associated with the "Tonypany Riots" of November 7–8, when picketing descended into violence and looting. The national coal strike of February–April 1912 saw the South Wales miners' Reform Committee publish The Miners' Next Step, generally considered the high point of British syndicalism, which explicitly called for a syndicalist industrial system. However, for the vast majority of British miners, syndicalism meant little and the strike was about securing minimum pay. An overwhelming majority of South Wales miners actually voted to resume work. Secondly, the syndicalist trade unionist Tom Mann was prominent in the transport strikes of summer 1911. Seamen struck for union recognition in mid-June, and dock workers soon joined, initially in sympathy but then for wage increases. Britain's first nationwide rail strike, for higher pay and shorter hours, followed on top of this. In Liverpool Mann led a particularly militant strike, resulting in "Bloody Sunday," on August 13, 1911, when police and troops dispersed 80,000 workers, resulting in his conviction for sedition and brief imprisonment. Involving 120,000 men at their height, the transport strikes were less a unified assault on capital than interconnected opportunistic attempts to extract better pay and conditions.

The General Strike of May 3–12, 1926 involved roughly 1.75 million workers, mainly in transport, striking in sympathy with around one million miners. Socialists and communists regard the strike as a seminal moment for working-class consciousness and organization. However, it arose not from revolutionary ideology but from the internal politics of the trade union movement. With the government pursuing a deflationary monetary policy to return sterling to the gold standard in 1925, employers sought to reduce wages. After an official inquiry recommended wage reductions for miners in March 1926, mine owners proposed pay cuts as high as 28 percent, and miners' resistance resulted in a lock-out. The Trades Union Congress (TUC) General Council felt morally obliged to support the miners following "Black Friday" (April 15, 1921) when the National Union of Railwaymen and the Transport and General Workers' Union had backed out of striking in sympathy with the miners. The Council now organized a general strike to support the miners. As in 1910–14, unskilled workers turned to violence and intimidation to enforce the strike: in Glasgow, workers attacked the tram depot and looted shops following rumors that students were to drive the trams. The TUC intended merely to defend the miners' wages. Realizing it had overstepped the mark, the General Council ended the strike after nine days, although the miners persevered until December. By demonstrating labor's organizational strength, it arguably made employers more willing to avoid confrontation, as demonstrated by the consequent Mond–Turner talks between labor and industry.

SEE ALSO: Anarchosyndicalism; Britain, Trade Union Movement; Combination Laws and Revolutionary Trade Unionism

References and Suggested Readings

- Fox, A. (1958) A History of the National Union of Boot and Shoe Operatives 1874–1957. Oxford: Blackwell.
- Fraser, W. H. (1999) A History of British Trade Unionism 1700–1998. Basingstoke: Macmillan.
- Perkins, A. (2006) A Very British Strike: 3 May–12 May 1926. London: Macmillan.
- Reid, A. J. (2004) United We Stand: A History of Britain's Trade Unions. London: Allen Lane.
- White, J. L. (1978) The Limits of Trade Union Militancy: The Lancashire Textile Workers, 1910–1914. Westport: Greenwood Press.

Britain, trade union movement

Mark J. Crowley

The Historical Context

It was the lack of workers' rights first emerging in the eighteenth century that highlighted the need for a representative body to campaign for workers' welfare in Britain. The Combination Laws passed by Prime Minister William Pitt in 1780 and 1799 made it illegal for workers to lobby their employers for improved pay and conditions. This effectively made trade unions illegal. Opposition to the acts was led by trade unionist Francis Place, with Joseph Hume and Sir Francis Burdett leading the parliamentary charge. The acts were repealed in 1824, but a series of strikes erupted, leading the government to pass the 1825 Combination Acts, which effectively restored the powers of the previous act and reasserted their power over the workers, confining trade union roles purely to meeting to discuss wages. If they met under other provisos, they would be subject to arrest and prosecution, defined as criminal conspiracy in restriction of trade.

The Conservative government under Benjamin Disraeli responded by passing the Masters and Servants Act in 1867, which ensured that those engaging in strikes could only be prosecuted for breach of contract, and criminal action could only be brought if it was deemed that the strike was aggravated.

This prompted the head of the Conservative government, the Earl of Derby, to set up a Royal Commission on Trade Unions in 1867. However, he resisted calls for the inclusion of a working man in the Commission. Trade unionists refused to accept the report, as it was hostile to the existence of trade unions, and instead produced a report of their own. In short, they campaigned for trade unions to be given full legal recognition under British law.

The Trade Union Congress successfully campaigned for the new Liberal government under William Gladstone to accept the proposals. This led to the passage of the 1871 Trade Union Act, which ensured that trade unions received full legal recognition under British law and that no trade union could be regarded as illegal. The result, however, was bittersweet. The Criminal Law Amendment Act, passed on the same day, made picketing illegal. However, the Trade Union Act provided the platform for the increased status and power of trade unions in the remaining part of the nineteenth century.

One of the main motivations behind the formation of trade unions in the late nineteenth century was to politically represent the British working classes, who until then were denied the right to vote and did not have access to parliamentary representation. Their views were effectively ignored. Although the formation of the Independent Labour Party in 1905 and the introduction of the much-triumphed Representation of the People Act 1918 were heralded as major steps toward the political emancipation of the working classes, this did little to increase the power of the masses, who remained largely marginalized within a political framework dominated by an aristocratic, upper-class elite. It was they who prevailed as the dominant decision-making force. Secondly, working-class protests were not a new phenomenon in twentieth-century Britain and had indeed been a distinct feature of the nineteenth century, in which disenchantment with governmental policies toward the workers was largely articulated through a series of popular protest groups, such as the Rebecca rioters (beginning in the 1830s), the Chartists (by 1834), and the Blanketeers (by the late 1830s).

Twentieth Century

The elevation of protest and political campaigning articulated through trade unionism at the beginning of the twentieth century provided a greater legitimacy to the working-class cause. The political presence of the trade unions would, in theory, ensure the eschewal of government mistreatment previously attributed to popular protest groups on the grounds of their non-political status.

Nevertheless, trade union protests in the 1930s can be considered from two differing perspectives. First, internal protests occurred within the British Labour Party. Trade unions and affiliated organizations formed a significant part of these, serving merely to undermine the electoral and political stance of the parliamentary party. Second were external protests, in which trade union disaffection became publicly witnessed through marches, lockouts, and strikes. This formed the most prevalent component to contemporary anti-government reactions. However, their effectiveness remained constrained by far-reaching legislation passed in the preceding decades, especially the 1920s with the passing of the 1927 Trades Disputes Act in the aftermath of the 1926 general strike. During that strike all workers in the public services struck over the issue of pay and conditions for nine days in 1926. The trade unions called for this strike, arguing that the people deserved better pay and conditions for their work. However, the strike was crushed by the Conservative government, who refused to cooperate with the trade unions and forced the workers back to work. The 1927 Trades Disputes Act was passed to heavily regulate trade union activity, making strikes illegal without a mandate from a clear majority of all trade union members.

Nevertheless, the label of an illegitimate, disparate “rabble” previously attached to popular protest movements prior to the creation of trade unions was now replaced with a movement claiming legitimacy at a far higher level. Leaders of nineteenth-century popular protest movements did little to address the difficulties attached to their “mob rule” image, which ultimately culminated in the acceptance by some and emulation by others of a self-fulfilling prophecy. Ultimately, this failed to create a favorable image of working-class political concerns amongst the political elites. Conversely, trade unions claimed political status. Comprising elected officers, subscribing members, and a hierarchically defined organization, the perception of a coherently structured movement with a constitutionally defined aim and power structure was presented to the political sphere. Their purpose was to represent, through democratic means, the interests of the working classes.

The 1920s: The “Internal” and “External” Politics of Trade Union Protests

By the late 1920s, the fortunes of the British economy could be described as “mixed.” Britain had experienced its first major industrial dispute of the twentieth century, serving as a warning shot across the bows of the ruling elite. The general strike of 1926 had demonstrated the potential strength of the working class and the dangers of militant trade union protests. Contrary to the feelings of some Conservative members, within whom a deep-rooted desire was prevalent to unceremoniously smash the trade unions, the Conservative leader, Stanley Baldwin, believed a more conciliatory stance was now necessary. He sought to integrate, rather than isolate, the trade unions into governmental business through promoting discussion and debate with major union leaders.

Many politically important steps had already been taken. The appointment of Ernest Bevin as minister of labor, the merging of the Trade Union Congress and the Workers' Movement, the construction of Transport House in London to house Labour Party headquarters and the Trade Union Congress, together with the publication of the socialist newspaper, the Daily Herald, all provided an important platform for the furtherance of trade union activity. This, nevertheless, did not occur without the essential prerequisite of political concessions clearly exercised by the unions themselves.

Rationalization as a means of securing increased growth at limited cost was an aspect dominating political discussion in this period and was prevalent in what became known as the "Mond-Turner" talks at the end of 1929. The talks, which included trade union leaders and senior government officials, were successful in brokering a deal between the conflicting parties. It was agreed that each side would exercise mutual respect toward their opposing political viewpoints, thus ensuring a cessation of hostilities in the interest of national development. Although ultimately these promises were not adhered to, it initially appeared that Baldwin had succeeded in finding a platform with which compromise could be reached between employers, trade unions, and the government, thus facilitating a move away from militant protest and toward professional collaboration in the national interest.

Despite this accommodative stance, however, Baldwin's success at the polls in the British general election of 1929 was undermined by the wider appeal articulated by the British Labour Party, which effectively used its newly acquired resources and capitalized on the inexorable rise of socialism amongst the working classes to espouse a socialist-loaded manifesto to the electorate. The manifesto, by the very nature of its title, Labour's Appeal to the Nation, was suggestive more of a plea to a disillusioned electorate rather than a substantive political document. It promised amendments to trade union laws passed in the aftermath of the general strike, better working conditions, and Committees of Inquiry into the causes of and remedies to the depression in the cotton and iron industries.

Baldwin's desperate election machine appealed to the electorate for retention of their faith in the Conservative Party. Conservative election posters compared Britain to a cruise-liner heading straight toward the rocks, a fate they believed would befall Britain if the electorate were to elect a socialist government. Despite this desperate plea, it was the Labour Party, supported by the newly emancipated trade unions, who would taste victory at the polls.

The economic event that followed shortly after the 1929 election could not have been foreseen by either the Conservative or Labour Party. The Wall Street Crash of October 1929 brought economic collapse on an unprecedented scale, and with it the inevitable and inexorable rise of unemployment in industries largely associated with the dominance of the British empire, including coal and steel. The catastrophic events that followed proved Baldwin's cautionary economic policy of "Safety First," which was a series of cautionary and conservative economic policies that did very little to address the root cause of the problem.

This led to Baldwin being replaced by his predecessor, the socialist Ramsay MacDonald, who had been voted out of office in 1924, largely as a consequence of working-class disillusionment at his failure to implement socialist policies for the benefit of the working classes. Although he claimed to have learned his lessons from 1924, the evidence of this was not conclusive. The working-class feeling of betrayal provided the platform for the strengthening of trade unionism, articulated through high-profile protests in Britain during the 1930s.

"Lockouts" and Protests against Working Conditions

Protests escalated and adopted many different forms. Marches were accompanied by "lockouts," where workers would refuse to enter their factories in protest against their working conditions. This provided further impetus for the strengthening of trade unionism in Britain. The first example of this can be seen by the government response to a union-supported strike in Yorkshire, northern England, in 1930, in which woolen workers refused to work in a protest against pay and conditions. Although the protest could not be considered a lockout on the same scale as that of the 1926 general strike, it acted as a means of demonstrating, both to the employers and the government, that the workers remained disenchanted with government employment policy and were again willing to take direct action as a method of seeking reform. The new minister of labor, Margaret Bondfield, intervened but provided little support to the disenchanted workers, who were forced to return to work in what was regarded as a humiliating defeat.

Nevertheless, it later appeared that this protest had not been completely in vain. One of the earliest promises put forward by the Labour government was to reduce the length of the working day to a maximum of seven hours. The action of the British Miners' Federation in pushing for this legislation proved to be instrumental. However, despite being open to this concession, the government was less conciliatory toward the Federation's increased wage demands. In the closing stages of 1930, the seven-hour working day had become law but was largely confined to the mining industry. The miners' call to bring the minimum wage legislation up to date from its previous 1912 index was duly rejected by Chancellor Philip Snowden, who argued that the coal industry, unlike in previous decades, would no longer receive generous subsidies from the state. This, amongst other marginal events in 1930, proved to be a catalyst for what became militant trade union protests for the remaining part of the decade, with shorter working hours and improved pay being the two major planks of union demands.

Internal Protest: The Fall of the Labour Party and Decline of the Trade Unions

The provision of employment with fair working conditions remained a priority for the trade unions throughout the 1930s, although prevailing legislation meant that their voices in support of these moves remained largely muted. Much to the annoyance of senior trade unionists, the new Labour government, despite their socialist ideals, remained opposed to the provision of an initiative which had been long supported by the trade union movement: the provision of a Public Works scheme. This scheme, funded by the government, would provide factories for the unemployed and guarantee employment in a period dominated by uncertainty and strife. Ironically, despite their bold claims of future economic reform whilst in opposition, the upheaval caused by unprecedented worldwide economic collapse forced MacDonald and his colleagues to follow a much more prudent economic course than originally advocated in his 1929 manifesto.

This pragmatism nevertheless received considerable opposition from workers and political figures alike, especially David Lloyd George, Britain's inspirational leader for the latter half of World War I, who claimed, in his 1929 general election manifesto, that the Liberal Party would "conquer unemployment" if it ever returned to power. Nevertheless, such was the acute nature of the economic crisis that befell Britain in 1929 that the commitment of the Labour government to implement socialist ideals was completely overridden by its desire to revive capitalism as a method of ensuring stability in the short term, a move provoking outrage amongst trade unionists and workers alike.

Discontent amongst the trade unions, the Labour Party's biggest supporters, led to many internal political protests, many advocated by senior trade unionists unhappy with the Labour Party's apparent abandonment of its socialist credentials. These protests, in tangible political terms for the unions, achieved very little, and merely served to destroy the Labour Party from within, leaving the party susceptible to factionalism and depriving it of the united support of its loyal and financial support base, the trade unions.

At the 1931 general election, the Labour Party was comprehensively defeated and replaced with a new coalition government comprising senior political figures from the three major political parties, united in crisis policymaking for the regeneration of Britain. A further assault came upon the fortunes of the British Labour Party with the defection of its leader, Ramsay MacDonald, to become the leader of this new coalition government. This coalition included both Conservative and Labour Party members of parliament working to incorporate a range of views to help solve the economic crisis. Coalition governments were only traditionally used in British politics during a period of crisis. The last coalition was during World War I, but MacDonald believed that such was the problem facing Britain, with unprecedented economic collapse, that a coalition was once again needed. However, his decision to form this coalition split the Labour Party spectacularly.

This demise in the party's fortunes effectively signaled not only the temporary capitulation of the party's political quest for power, but also impacted considerably upon the influence, motivation, and status of their major financial and “moral conscience,” the trade unions. Once again, in the same vein as their political vanguard, the trade unions were confined to the political wilderness, and furthermore lacked a strong political party with whom they could align and espouse their political demands. It could be argued that an axiomatic shift was occurring within British politics. What emerged was an increased bureaucratization of the political system, with the inception of Royal Commissions as investigative bodies developing strategies to alleviate the problems of unemployment and working conditions, which were the unions’ two major concerns.

Moreover, the increased use of “economic experts” did much to marginalize the trade unions. Academics, articulating grand economic theories as the resolution to the nation’s problems, now occupied the political limelight. This merely served to relegate once more the trade unions from their recently revived status of relative importance, secured through agreements of mutual cooperation with the government, to that of marginality, with newfound economists appointed by the government as the arbiters of Britain’s future legislation in all public policy areas.

To make matters worse, much to the anger of trade unionists, it appeared that even their most loyal members and supporters who had reached positions of authority, such as Ernest Bevin, were turning their back on the movement. Bevin, as early as 1931, when quizzed about government inaction vis-à-vis unemployment policy, contemptuously commented: “I know that I could be answered by the usual socialist philosophy, but when you go on a Royal Commission you have to deal with the facts as they are and the problem as it is.” In what could only be regarded as a conciliatory gesture, Bevin published a proposal, My Plan for the 2,000,000 Workless (1933), which gave some people the illusion that new jobs were actually being created.

The reality, however, proved to be considerably different. Jobs were merely being redistributed, and unemployment remained at staggeringly high levels (above three million at its highest point in 1933), thus serving merely to fuel further resentment amongst trade unions, who became increasingly concerned about the welfare of their members. However, this, coupled with their political paralysis as a consequence of the legislation passed in the aftermath of the 1926 general strike, meant that there was indeed very little that they could do to register their discontent other than to turn away from the ballot box toward direct action, which became a distinct feature of trade union activity for the remaining part of the decade.

Protests against the Means Test: The “Hunger Marches”

Measures to deal with the unemployed poor could be traced back to nineteenth-century Disraelian politics, which is associated with the former prime minister, Benjamin Disraeli. He was famous for his several initiatives to help the poor, developing laws such as the 1834 Poor Law Act, which ensured that those who were out of work had payments from the state until they found more work. Moreover, the state would also help them to find alternative employment, although many people were forced to attend workhouses, where the conditions were harsh and people were forced to work long hours. The work they would do was also mundane (such as boot repairing) and they often worked for 16 or more hours without food and without breaks.

Many revisions took place in the intervening period to these laws, but by 1930 one aspect of this legislation became a highly contentious issue for the working class. The development of what became known as the “Household Means Test” was extremely controversial. People’s eligibility to claim unemployment benefits from the state depended upon their ability to prove their destitution to the authorities. The intrusive nature of these investigations, commissioned by members of the Local Employment Exchanges, opened the lives of the poor to the scrutinizing eye of government-employed personnel, thus making the unemployed an object of ridicule. Government inspectors would be sent to claimants’ houses to see what assets they had, and this would be used as a basis for judging whether they would be eligible for state support. In many cases, officials would tell claimants to sell their possessions in order to raise money before they would allow them to claim assistance from the state. By its very nature, this test aimed to reduce dependency on the state by forcing the unemployed to seek employment, thereby eschewing the widespread humiliation and anguish brought about by resorting to this system.

The government could not have foreseen the widespread protest that this would inevitably generate. These early protests culminated in what became known as the "Hunger Marches" of the 1930s. These marches brought together not only people confined to destitution by the existing laws, but also those in employment frustrated by their lack of power. The employers' strength appeared to be increasing while workers' rights, despite trade union prominence, appeared to be diminishing.

As trade unions began to decline, the National Unemployed Workers' Movement (NUWM) remained strong. Protests were organized regularly, primarily against government treatment of miners in the aftermath of the 1926 general strike. The government now sought repayment from the miners who claimed state benefit during the strike, and cited the undertaking signed in 1926 by these workers, which signaled their compliance with this arrangement. The major grievance of the NUWM nevertheless was that in the aftermath of the general strike, the miners had experienced reductions in their wages, which had consequently made living conditions more difficult, and to a great extent led to the impoverishment of many miners. Demanding repayment under these unfavorable conditions appeared unreasonable.

As the government refused to negotiate, trade unionists, together with extreme militants from both the left and right wing of the political spectrum, came together to organize a national march to London. Participants included the fascist Oswald Mosley and leading figures in the Communist Party, like Arthur Horner. Preparations began in February 1930, bringing together workers from Scotland, Wales, and the north of England, marching against the Labour government's policies toward the workers. Despite its unwillingness to negotiate, the government was prepared to offer overnight accommodation to the marchers at the numerous Victorian workhouses prevalent along the marchers' route. Combined with this conciliatory gesture came the condition that any food provided to the protesters would be below the standard of nutrition provided to the workhouses' regular inhabitants, which, to the contemporary observer, would be almost unimaginable. Nevertheless, this was an offer duly declined by leaders of the march, and marchers declared clearly their preference to spend the night out of doors rather than resorting to the humiliation to which their ancestors were previously subjected in the much-loathed Victorian workhouse.

The most considerable protests against the means test were seen in Wales, a country that had the highest density of unemployment within a given area, and where protests intensified and occasionally became violent. The Communist Party, which remained marginalized throughout the rest of Britain, proved considerably influential within the South Wales valleys, largely as a consequence of the deep-rooted left-wing political values of its citizens, accentuated by their entrenchment in a long industrial history of coal mining. Their extreme left-wing views acted as a consolidating force to trade unions and motivated movements toward direct action. Anger amongst these groups toward the Labour Party, who appeared disinterested in the plight of the workers, remained a feature of grassroots political sentiments. The NUWM, created as a representative force for an unemployed population that now numbered, on average, one in every three people, emphasized the importance of consolidation and unity on a local level.

One of the major causes of the protests against this system was the lack of uniformity in the application of financial assistance regulations. There were severe anomalies which created considerable resentment amongst claimants. For example, certain areas in southern England were awarded higher payments than their counterparts in northern England. Variations also existed within Wales, with certain areas of the Glamorganshire Valleys benefiting more than their counterparts. The major contributory factor to this anomaly was the implicit statutory stipulation that gave discretionary powers to the public assistance officers in their allocation of benefits. Their presence as assessors operating in a relatively autonomous fashion, subject only to limited government control, ensured the eschewal of arbitrary and centralized financial control.

Protests against the means test were becoming prominent by 1931. In January, a protest was organized by workers in London's Battersea area, incorporating thousands of workers. The protest gathered strength as it progressed down London's Embankment toward Temple Underground Station. A procession through Oxford Street led by the prominent Red Communist flag and accompanied by brass bands and people singing the Internationale caused some disorder, bringing traffic on the busy London streets to a standstill. However, the original plan to march on to Whitehall was aborted, with the protesters diverting toward London's Hyde Park instead. Nevertheless, the events in London acted largely as a catalyst for the cathartic outburst that was to be witnessed in Britain later that decade.

Unemployment had reached three million and was not declining, but harsh governmental treatment of the protesters merely reinforced the conviction that the government had not changed its outlook toward trade unionists and the unemployed since the days of the general strike. The militaristic and authoritarian fashion in which protesters were treated, with many suffering injuries at the hands of police on horseback, led to dissenting voices amongst the popular press, especially the left-wing newspapers, who expressed their disgust. The New Statesman was one of many newspapers contributing to the condemnatory tone expressed toward the government for their actions during this time.

The Jarrow March

By 1936, Britain was suffering from the worst effects of the Great Depression, and a Royal Commission was deployed under the guidance of Chancellor of the Exchequer Neville Chamberlain to investigate ways to create employment in the areas worst affected. The findings of the Investigative Commissioners were echoed somewhat by King Edward VIII during his brief visit to South Wales in November 1936, when he observed the abject poverty of the unemployed masses and concluded that "something must be done."

Tacitly reflecting his despair at the perceived government inaction, the king's comments merely reiterated in a more conciliatory tone the sentiments of the Jarrow marchers. This group was led by the Labour MP Ellen Wilkinson (affectionately known as "Red Ellen") in June 1936 in a 300-mile march to London to present a petition for the construction of a steelworks in the area to reinvigorate employment there. This northern English town had, the previous year, been decimated by the closure of its lifeblood, Palmers Shipyard, which left 70 percent of its population unemployed with very little prospect of obtaining further employment. Despite his previously conciliatory gestures toward protesters and trade unionism, Prime Minister Stanley Baldwin refused to meet the marchers or enter into any negotiations. Likewise, the petition presented by the marchers to parliament merely fell on deaf ears, symbolizing the government's refusal to address the workers' plight.

News traveled very quickly, and it was not long before the masses of unemployed throughout the nation knew the fate that befell their Jarrow comrades. As a consequence, winning the support of the working class for government employment initiatives became increasingly more difficult.

Protests against British Work Centers

In the latter half of the 1930s, the Commissioners for the Special Areas concluded their investigations with findings largely reinforcing trade unionists' claims that British employment policy had, for the previous two decades, been inadequate. As a final attempt to address this issue before the onset of war, the government sought to redefine the problem of unemployment into an issue of retraining. The government committee created to examine the issue of unemployment concluded that by retraining workers with new skills, diversity and transferable skills would create greater employability in a range of areas and specializations through the provision of Work Centers.

The first Work Centers were opened in London in 1938 and were greeted in an unfavorable way by the trade unions. The workers protested against a program which they claimed presented them in an unfavorable light. Their position as unemployed workers was presented as evidence of their fecklessness by the government, which described them as "workshy." As a result of this attitude, the government linked payment of unemployment benefit to attendance at a Work Center. This, largely reminiscent to the days of the much-loathed Victorian workhouses, did very little to aid the government's efforts to win the "hearts and minds" of the working classes, and in fact did more to provoke further unrest and resentment. Some refused to attend, while others refused to cooperate when they attended the centers.

The main cause for concern among trade unionists was that this system would once again create major anomalies, further deepening the inequality cleavage between the unemployed masses and wider society. Trade unionists believed that men at the Work Centers would be producing the goods that were already produced by the few who were fortunate to be employed. Even worse, for their effort they would only receive unemployment payments, which were a fraction of the ordinary wage. However, the Unemployment Assistance Board, which was responsible for coordinating the activities of the Work Centers, argued that the goods produced by the workers were for training purposes only, and would not be sold to the commercial market. This did much to quell the original suspicions of the unionists of government exploitation of the workers. The government argued that the purpose of the Work Center was to train the men in new skills, thus increasing their employability, and to keep them fit until they could find alternative work.

The 1930s in Britain witnessed numerous trade union protests which in themselves created a considerable impact. However, the nature of the protests evolved in this period as unions leaned their lessons from the mistakes of the 1926 general strike, realizing that successful protests meant that numerous tactics needed to be deployed. With the onset of war in 1939, though, despite a few dissenting voices within the trade unions, most began to see collaboration between the government and the unions as essential in the national interest for the mobilization of workers on the home front to defeat the fascist enemy.

SEE ALSO: Britain, Post-World War I Army Mutinies and Revolutionary Threats; Britain, Post-World War II Political Protest; Britain, Strikes, 1905–1926; British Miners' Strike, 1984–1985; Burdett, Sir Francis (1770–1844); Chartists; Combination Laws and Revolutionary Trade Unionism; Glasgow General Strike, 1820; Labour Party, Britain; Place, Francis (1771–1854); Poor Law, Britain, 1834; Red Scotland and the Scottish Radical Left, 1880–1932; Wales, Nationalist Protest, 19th Century

References and Suggested Readings

- Clarke, P. (1996) Hope and Glory: Britain 1900–1990. London: Penguin.
- Cohen, M. (1946) I Was One of the Unemployed. London: Victor Gollancz.
- Constantine, S. (1980) Unemployment in Britain Between the Wars. London: Longman.
- Evans, N. (1999) South Wales Has Been Roused as Never Before: Marching against the Means Test, 1934–36. In D. W. Howell et al., Crime, Protest and Police in Modern British Society. Cardiff: University of Wales Press.

- Kingsford, P. (1982) The Hunger Marchers in Britain, 1920–40. London: Lawrence & Wishart.
- Pelling, H. (1971) A History of British Trade Unionism, 2nd ed. Harmondsworth: Penguin.
- Skidelsky, R. (1970) Politicians and the Slump: The Labour Government of 1929–1931. Harmondsworth: Penguin.
- Taylor, A. J. P. (1967) English History. London: Readers' Union.
- Williamson, P. (1982) Safety First: Baldwin, the Conservative Party and the 1929 General Election. Historical Journal 25.

Britain, women's suffrage campaign

Harold L. Smith

The British organized women's suffrage campaign began in the mid-1860s when a reform bill was under consideration that would expand the electorate. John Stuart Mill, a member of Parliament (MP) and a prominent women's suffrage advocate, agreed to introduce a women's suffrage amendment to the bill if the women's groups would generate a petition supporting that reform. Suffrage societies were formed in London and Manchester and provided Mill with a petition requesting women's suffrage with 1,499 signatures. Mill proposed his amendment when the 1867 Reform Bill was under consideration by the House of Commons, but it was easily defeated. Some MPs thought the idea of women voting was ludicrous.

Although there was strong resistance to granting women the parliamentary franchise, they were accepted as voters in local elections. The 1869 Municipal Corporations (Franchise) Act granted women the right to vote in local elections on the same terms as men, and the 1870 Education Act permitted them to vote in local school board elections. Those who opposed women's parliamentary suffrage often argued that because women were rightfully concerned with their communities and the education of their children it was appropriate that they vote in local elections, but parliamentary elections were a different matter. Parliament was concerned with issues of defense and foreign policy that were considered as being outside women's sphere; it was also argued that since women did not serve in the military it would be inappropriate for them to decide whether men should be sent off to war.

The establishment of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies in 1897 was a key turning point in the development of the constitutional suffrage movement. Led by Millicent Fawcett, the NUWSS began as a federation of 17 of the largest suffrage societies that evolved into the largest and most influential suffrage organization. Its objective was to obtain equal parliamentary suffrage rights for women. Its first major victory came in 1897 when the House of Commons passed a women's suffrage bill by a large majority, but the Conservative government blocked further consideration of the measure.

The NUWSS's members tended to be Liberals, and originally the NUWSS assumed that lobbying the Liberal government and working for the election of pro-suffrage Liberal MPs would bring about reform. But after Herbert Asquith became prime minister in 1908 this assumption seemed questionable since he opposed adding women to the existing electorate because most of those enfranchised would be property owners who were likely to be Conservative voters. When Asquith indicated he would support legislation granting adult suffrage, however, many working-class and Labour women's organizations began to support this instead of the more limited equal suffrage reform (working-class women would not have gained the vote if equal suffrage rights were granted). Democratic suffragists inside the NUWSS also preferred a wider extension of the suffrage and began to agitate for the NUWSS to associate itself with the Labour movement's demand for a democratic suffrage.

The formation of the Women's Social and Political Union in Manchester in 1903 by Emmeline Pankhurst and her daughters Christabel and Sylvia was an important turning point in the suffrage campaign. In contrast to the NUWSS, most of its original members were working-class women who, like Mrs. Pankhurst, were active in the Independent Labour Party. Because of their Labour movement background, they were accustomed to methods such as open-air meetings and the politics of disruption which the NUWSS spurned. The WSPU justified its confrontational tactics by claiming that working-class men had gained the vote during the previous century through militant methods. Although the WSPU is often perceived as being more radical than the NUWSS because it used militant methods, they shared the same objective: equal parliamentary suffrage rights for women.

The WSPU declared "Deeds, not words" to be its motto as part of its attempt to distinguish itself from the NUWSS, and the group soon became famous for militant deeds. Mrs. Pankhurst's daughter Christabel transformed the campaign in October 1905, disrupting a Liberal Party rally by demanding women's suffrage and then securing her arrest by committing a technical assault on a policeman. She realized that this would generate powerful images of male brutality against women that would place women's suffrage back on the front page of the newspapers. Although her mother offered to pay her fine, Christabel refused, and by serving a week in prison became a martyr for the cause. This brought a surge in WSPU membership and revived support for the suffrage campaign.

During the following years the WSPU encouraged women to engage in a variety of types of militant methods, such as street marches involving clashes with the police, disrupting political meetings, and breaking windows in public buildings. Militancy was not valued solely as a way of gaining the vote. Christabel viewed it as a means by which women could shed the submissive attitude that Victorian culture had ingrained in them. This is why she insisted that the vote not simply be given to women; they would be empowered only if they forced the government to concede it.

The NUWSS and the WSPU moved in opposite directions between 1910 and 1914. While the WSPU increasingly recruited well-to-do women and was drawing closer to the Conservative Party, the NUWSS became a mass movement with formal ties to the Labour Party. Although the NUWSS was originally mainly a "bourgeois" women's organization, after 1910 its support from working-class women increased significantly. The NUWSS expanded rapidly during the period, growing from 210 affiliated societies in 1910 to over 500 by July 1914, and from 21,571 members in 1910 to over 100,000 members or Friends of Women's Suffrage in 1914.

Before 1912 the WSPU had limited its attacks to public property and had sought to win over public opinion to the cause. But when the Liberal government repeatedly prevented suffrage bills from becoming law, the WSPU began to attack private property in the hope that the public's desire for order would force the government to proceed with reform. In 1912 the WSPU initiated a campaign of arson and bombing of unoccupied buildings that included setting fire to about fifty churches because the clergy were unwilling to speak out on behalf of women's suffrage. This resulted in a reduction in public and parliamentary support for reform.

Although the WSPU began as an ILP women's movement, its leaders had already severed their ties to the Labour movement by 1912 when the WSPU declared war on the Labour Party for refusing to help drive the Liberal government from office. When Sylvia Pankhurst ignored this policy and created an East London WSPU branch that worked closely with Labour and trade union leaders, she was expelled from the WSPU.

Prior to 1912 the majority of NUWSS members were Liberals, and it had always been assumed that the Liberal Party would establish women's suffrage. But the Liberal government's refusal to endorse that reform discredited this assumption, and in 1912 the NUWSS established an electoral alliance with the Labour Party, which was committed to women's suffrage. Although some, including Fawcett, viewed the Labour alliance as a temporary expedient, the democratic suffragists in the NUWSS considered the Labour Party to be feminism's natural ally and intended that the alliance should become a permanent link.

The NUWSS intervened in several by-elections between 1912 and 1914 to support Labour candidates. Their assistance helped reduce the Liberal vote sufficiently that four Liberal MPs lost their seats. Liberal leaders realized that NUWSS electoral work in the approaching general election could result in their being replaced by a Conservative government, and began discussing possible suffrage legislation with the women's leaders. But the WSPU's continued militancy prevented further steps toward reform prior to World War I.

The principle of women's suffrage was conceded in 1918, but historians disagree as to whether World War I was the cause or merely the occasion for reform. Some historians have claimed that women gained the vote as a reward for their contributions to the war effort as munitions workers. But since only women aged 30 and above gained the vote in 1918, and almost all female munitions workers were under 30, this seems improbable. What the war did do was remove the major obstacles to reform. By 1914 women's suffrage was being prevented by Prime Minister Asquith's opposition, WSPU militancy, and party conflict over the form legislation should take. The war removed all three: the WSPU abandoned militancy in 1914, Asquith resigned in 1916, and the establishment of a coalition government removed the issue from overt party politics.

The suffrage issue was revived in 1916 when the possibility of a general election forced the government to reform the law to enable men in the armed forces to vote. When the Cabinet considered reform legislation, Arthur Henderson, the Labour Party's leader, insisted that women's suffrage be included in any reform bill. A Speaker's Conference was established to review the issues and recommended that women's suffrage be included in the bill, but that restrictions be imposed to ensure that women were not a majority of the new electorate. Most women's organizations accepted these terms and in 1918 the Representation of the People Act enfranchised women aged 30 and above who were also local government electors or the wives of local government electors. This meant that the women who gained the vote were disproportionately middle-class housewives aged 30 and above.

Although the 1918 Act conceded the principle of women's suffrage, it did not grant equal suffrage rights, and the campaign for this continued for the next decade. Since the Labour Party's 1918 election manifesto called for equal suffrage rights, the NUWSS and Labour women initially allied in support of the Labour Party's Women's Emancipation Bill to obtain that reform. But the Coalition government blocked it, and when the 1924 Labour government failed to introduce suffrage legislation the women's movement began to work more closely with Conservative Party women.

The issue divided the Conservative Party. Even many of those supporting equal suffrage rights preferred making 25 the voting age for both men and women. But since this was politically impossible, the party reluctantly began to edge towards enfranchising women at 21. Reform opponents desperately sought to portray women under 30 as "flappers" – unmarried, independent, and politically ignorant – but this attempt to appeal to gender and generational stereotypes failed. In 1928 the Conservative government secured passage of the Representation of the People (Equal Suffrage) Act with little parliamentary opposition, enabling women, as well as men, to vote at age 21.

SEE ALSO: Pankhurst, Emmeline (1858–1928), Christabel (1880–1958), and Sylvia (1882–1960); Reform Bills, Britain, 1867 and 1884; Women's Movement, Britain

References and Suggested Readings

- Holton, S. (1986) Feminism and Democracy: Women's Suffrage and Reform Politics in Britain 1900–1918. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Purvis, J. (2002) Emmeline Pankhurst. London: Routledge.
- Rosen, A. (1974) Rise Up, Women! The Militant Campaign of the Women's Social and Political Union 1903–1914. London: Routledge.
- Smith, H. (2007) The British Women's Suffrage Campaign 1866–1928, new ed. Harlow: Longman.
- Vellacott, J. (1993) From Liberal to Labour with Women's Suffrage: The Story of Catherine Marshall. Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press.

British miners' strike, 1984–1985

Steffan Morgan

The miners' strike of 1984–5 was a defining moment in the history of the British labor movement. The strike was not only an industrial dispute concerned with the future closure of a significant number of collieries within the British coalfield or the dramatic job losses that would occur as a result. It was also symbolic of the wider conflict between the trade union movement, embodied by National Union of Mineworkers (NUM) president Arthur Scargill, and the Conservative government, embodied by the entrepreneurialism promoted by Margaret Thatcher.

The dispute started in response to the announcement of the closure of Cortonwood Colliery, in Yorkshire. This decision formed part of a wider strategy by the National Coal Board (NCB) to further contract the British coal industry. In this context, Cortonwood can be understood as the “final straw” in the disintegrating relationship between the NUM and the NCB. The scale of the proposed closures and the manner in which the announcement was made – without any consultation with the union – also marked a turning point in the way in which the Conservative government understood the role of the coal industry.

The NUM sought to endorse local area strikes that were already underway in Yorkshire, Scotland, and South Wales, in an attempt to instigate a domino effect. Therefore, rather than calling for a national ballot, the NUM decided to appeal for worker support and to promote an “area by area” stoppage. On March 12, NUM president Arthur Scargill proclaimed that these local strikes would be part of a national strike. Levels of support varied, and in some areas it was distinctly lukewarm; however, despite the overwhelming antagonism to strike action shown by the majority of the Nottinghamshire miners, by April 2, over 80 percent of the British miners were out on strike. The decision not to hold a national ballot, however, meant that the strike was illegal according to the Conservative government's new anti-union legislation. As a result, the striking miners were not entitled to any state benefits; support networks, staffed mainly by women, became an important part of the strike effort.

The main tactic employed by the NUM in their attempt to force the NCB to halt their pit closure program was picketing out workers from other working collieries, or power stations. The most famous picketing incident during the strike was the Battle of Orgreave, at Orgreave coking works in South Yorkshire on June 18, 1984. On the day of the battle approximately 7,000 police officers were prepared for approximately 5–6,000 miners who had traveled from all over the country to stop coal entering the coking plant. In an attempt to obstruct the pickets, Assistant Chief Constable Clement, the Ground Commander in charge of the police, deployed a wide cordon of long shields in front of other non-shielded officers. Mounted police were deployed at the rear of the police line. As the day went on, clashes between miners and the police became more and more violent, and police on horseback were sent to challenge the picketing miners. Both sides disputed to the cause of the violence – the police claimed that the miners threw stones, and the miners claimed that the police attacked without provocation or warning.

Whatever sparked the violent scenes, the dominance of the police was unquestionable. The miners were much less prepared for physical confrontation than the police. Once the initial objective of clearing the entrance and the roadways surrounding the coking plant had been achieved, the police continued to push back pickets. Under a heavy barrage of missiles, and with the miners setting fire to a car taken from a nearby scrap yard, police on horseback again decided to charge at the miners.

By mid-afternoon, the final phase of the battle involved police on horseback chasing the miners through the residential streets of the village of Orgreave. Official police reports state that 51 pickets and 72 policemen were injured; however, this number was skewed by the fact that many miners did not seek medical attention because they were afraid of being arrested. Ninety-five pickets were charged with riot and unlawful assembly, but by 1987 no one had been convicted. South Yorkshire police later awarded £425,000 and £100,000 in legal costs to 39 pickets who challenged their arrest in an out of court settlement.

Strikers failed to halt coal transportation through Orgreave, and the strike ended on March 3, 1985, nearly a year after the dispute had begun. Twelve deaths occurred during the dispute. David Wilkie, a taxi driver, was killed while carrying a strike-breaker back to work in South Wales by a rock thrown on his car by Russell Shankland and Dean Hancock. Eight picketing miners died in clashes with the police, and three young men died while picking coal. During the strike 11,291 men and women were arrested and 8,392 were charged with a number of offenses, such as breach of the peace and obstructing the highway.

The defeat had a dramatic effect on the British coal industry and its surrounding communities. On the eve of the strike in 1984 there were 170 collieries in Britain. By 2005, there were only eight deep shaft coalmines in Britain; furthermore, the miners' strike of 1984–5 can also be considered the final occasion when the British trade union movement attempted to use mass, nationwide, picketing in an industrial dispute.

SEE ALSO: Britain, Trade Union Movement; Socialism, Britain

References and Suggested Readings

Adeney, M. & Lloyd, J. (1986) The Miners' Strike 1984–5: Loss Without Limit. London: Lawrence Wishart.

Deller, J. (2002) The English Civil War Part II. London: Artangel.

Fine, B. & Millar, R. (1985) Policing the Miners' Strike. London: Lawrence Wishart.

Richards, A. J. (1997) Miners on Strike: Class, Solidarity and Division in Britain. Oxford: Berg.

Winterton, J. & Winterton, R. (1989) Coal, Crisis and Conflict: The Miners' Strike in Yorkshire. Manchester: University of Manchester Press.

Brixton Riots, 1981

Christian Hogsbjerg

From April 10 to 12, 1981, about 1,000 Londoners, mainly black youth, fought the police in the Brixton Uprising. The Brixton Riots brought violence to Britain's capital on a level unseen for a century, and saw the first use of petrol bombs against the British state on the streets of Britain. They were the most explosive events in an arc of black-led but multiracial riots in anger at unemployment, poor housing, and institutional police and state racism that had Brixton, South London, April 13, 1981: A man holds up his fist in the Black Power salute as he stands on top of a burned-out car, hit by a petrol bomb during rioting over the previous two days. The result of ongoing economic pressures and police harassment in the poor and predominantly black neighborhood of Brixton, the rioters' aggression was primarily focused on the police and police property. (Getty Images) begun in Bristol in 1980, and would soon spread to engulf Liverpool and other towns and cities of Britain.

Brixton in south London was the undisputed "capital of black Britain," home to generations of migrant workers. However, general social deprivation and a rise in unemployment after the arrival in power of Margaret Thatcher in 1979 had hit the young black population particularly hard. Insult and injustice were added to injury on an almost daily basis by an institutionally racist police force. In 1978 Thatcher had played the race card, arguing that "people are really rather afraid that this country might be rather swamped by people with a different culture." In April 1981 the local police launched Operation Swamp '81 in Brixton, which saw the hated and feared Special Patrol Group (SPG) aggressively target black youth.

This new provocation came after sustained police racism, in particular given license by the "sus" laws, which empowered the police to stop and search anyone they "suspected" of committing a criminal offense. In January 1981 the police did not bother to investigate adequately the tragic death of 13 black youngsters from a fire in New Cross. Proof that years of systematic harassment had lost the police the consent of local people came on Friday, April 10. Black youth rioted for an hour after a misunderstanding concerning a seriously injured black youngster who was seen as being helped into a police van. Rumors that he had subsequently died because of police neglect spread that night around Brixton, and when the SPG was sent in force into the heart of Brixton's black community the next day it was a recipe for disaster.

The area around Railton Road and Atlantic Road, known as the Front Line, was to be the epicenter of the new wave of rioting, which left hundreds injured and damage to property in the region of £10 million. Yet the riots forced the Thatcher government to accept that "something had to be done" with respect to Britain's materially impoverished black communities, and Home Secretary William Whitelaw appointed Lord Scarman to undertake a public inquiry into the riots. Operation Swamp '81 was abandoned and the hated "sus" laws eventually repealed.

SEE ALSO: Black Nationalism, 19th and 20th Centuries; Britain, Post-World War II Political Protest; Notting Hill Riots, 1958; Unemployed Protests

References and Suggested Readings

- Fryer, P. (1984) Staying Power: The History of Black People in Britain. London: Pluto Press.
- Gilroy, P. (1981/1982) You Can't Fool the Youths . . . Race and Class 23 (2/3).
- Harman, C. (1981) The Summer of 1981. International Socialism 14.
- Scarman, Lord (1981) The Brixton Disorders, 10–12 April 1981: Report of an Inquiry by the Rt. Hon. The Lord Scarman, OBE. London: HMSO.

Brown, H. Rap (b. 1943)

Yusuf Nuruddin

H. Rap Brown, born Hubert Gerold Brown (October 4, 1943) and now known as Jamil Abdullah Al-Amin, is an African American political activist who first gained national prominence in the 1960s and 1970s as a leader in the civil rights and Black Power movements.

Born in Baton Rouge, Louisiana, Brown attended Southern University where he joined the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), a civil rights organization whose interracial membership was drawn largely from college and university students. Brown became SNCC's director of the Alabama Project, empowering disenfranchised blacks through voter registration and the encouragement of locals to seek public office.

Increasingly disenchanted in the face of white resistance, many of SNCC's black members, under the leadership of Stokely Carmichael (Kwame Turé), made a transition in 1966 from the advocacy of non-violence and integration to the advocacy of militancy and Black Power. In this climate, H. Rap Brown ascended to national prominence in 1967 as the newly elected chairperson or National Director of the reconstituted SNCC, which now relied heavily on black rather than interracial solidarity. Brown's fiery oratory and uncanny ability to move crowds by impassioned rhetoric earned him the nickname "Rap."

As urban uprisings increasingly occurred across the nation, Brown became an articulate spokesperson advocating black insurrection. The media billed him as a Black Power advocate to be feared and hated by white America, seizing upon his more sensationalized comments, such as his emphatic repudiation of non-violence with its allusions to the American Revolutionary War:

“Violence is as American as apple pie” and his oft-quoted “Burn, Baby, Burn,” which became an exclamatory refrain as insurrectionists looted and torched the exploitative white-owned stores in the inner cities.

Brown was one of the prominent participants at the Black Power Conference held in Newark on July 20, 1967. Because the Newark Uprising had erupted one week before the pre-scheduled conference, the meeting drew national attention. In the immediate aftermath of the Newark rebellion and conference, Brown escalated his call for urban guerilla warfare. An insurrection erupted in Cambridge soon after Brown’s call, and Maryland Governor Spiro Agnew called for Brown’s arrest for inciting a riot. He also used the tensions to articulate a state policy curtailing freedom of speech in the event of future black militant oratory. Brown was arrested two days later on charges of flight to escape prosecution.

Brown turned to an alliance with more radical forces. He and Carmichael were invited to speak at a Black Panther Party rally in Oakland in support of jailed Panther leader Huey P. Newton in February 1968. At this rally, Brown was named minister of justice of the Panther Party.

Brown faced a variety of legal entanglements and found himself continuously in and out of courtrooms and jails for parole violations and other charges, including firearms possession. Convicted in the hold-up of a bar in New York, supposedly to obtain money for revolutionary endeavors, he was sentenced to 15 years at Attica State Prison but was paroled in 1976. While incarcerated, he converted to orthodox Islam and adopted the Muslim name Jamil Abdullah Al-Amin. Upon his release, he settled in Atlanta, where he became the imam or religious leader of a community of Sunni Muslims and the proprietor of a community-based grocery store. He rose to the leadership of a national Sunni Muslim organization, the Dar’ul-Islam movement, and repudiated his former Black Power politics, denouncing black solidarity in deference to religious solidarity. In 2000, he was once again arrested, this time for shooting black policemen Ricky Kinchen and Aldranon English, Fulton County, GA sheriff’s deputies. The officers were fired upon after stopping Al-Amin’s car in an attempt to serve a warrant for his arrest for failure to appear in court for a previous traffic violation. He initially eluded capture, but in 2002 was convicted of 13 criminal charges, including the murder of Kinchen. He was sentenced to life in prison without possibility of parole.

SEE ALSO: Black Panthers; Carmichael, Stokely/Kwame Turé (1941–1998); Civil Rights, United States, Black Power and Backlash, 1965–1978; Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC)

References and Suggested Readings

- Brown, H. R. (1969) Die Nigger Die! A Political Autobiography. New York: Dial Press.
- Carson, C. (1981) In Struggle: SNCC and the Black Awakening of the 1960s. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Goldberg, L. (1968) Ghetto Riots and Others: The Faces of Civil Disorder in 1967. Journal of Peace Research 5 (2): 116–32.

Brown, John (1800–1859)

Amy Hatmaker

Believing from a young age that God had destined him to destroy the institution of slavery, John Brown lit the fuse that sparked the American Civil War. He also brought a level of violence to the anti-slavery campaign that has historians even today debating the morality of his actions and the stability of his mind. The staunchest of abolitionists, he waged a bloody battle against the pro-slavery forces in the struggle over Kansas and led the failed raid at Harper’s Ferry, Virginia.

Born in Torrington, Connecticut, Brown was the child of strict Calvinists Ruth and Owen Brown. John was close to his mother Ruth and was distraught for years following her death in 1808. His father, a tanner and shoemaker, was an abolitionist who believed that all men were social equals. John Brown’s intense hatred of slavery developed due to a combination of his father’s influence and his witnessing a slave boy’s mistreatment while on a cattle drive as a child.

Brown married Dianthe Lusk, the daughter of his housekeeper, on June 21, 1820 in Hudson, Ohio. Together they had five children who survived into adulthood. Dianthe died in 1831, shortly after giving birth. Finding it difficult to tend to the needs of a young family on his own, Brown married Mary Ann Day, the 16-year-old sister of his housekeeper, in 1833 in New

“The Last Moments of John Brown” (1887) by Thomas Hovenden depicts John Brown as he is led to his execution for his attempted raid at Harpers Ferry on July 3, 1859. Brown was an abolitionist who favored armed insurrection as a means to end slavery, and his failed attempt to start a slave rebellion at Harpers Ferry is seen as the nascent spark of the American Civil War. (Time & Life Pictures/Getty Images)

Richmond, Pennsylvania. Mary and John Brown had 13 children, but only four outlived Mary. Brown raised his family in the Calvinist tradition, ruling as a strict disciplinarian. Though several of his sons would turn away from religion later in life, Brown’s children shared his hatred of slavery. Three of his sons – Frederick, Oliver, and Watson – would die fighting against the institution.

Brown was inept as a businessman. Over the course of his life he had a variety of failed business ventures, at various times operating a tannery, raising cattle, surveying land, trading wool, and speculating in land. He filed for bankruptcy in 1842, losing all his belongings except the bare essentials. Continued problems with business endeavors and creditors followed him throughout his life, and he and his family lived in impoverished conditions.

The one consistent presence throughout Brown’s life was his intense hatred of slavery and his belief that blacks and whites were equals. He dedicated his life to destroying the institution. Unlike other abolitionists, Brown chose to fight slavery and discrimination through action rather than legal means. Brown consistently aided fugitive slaves. He attempted to start a school for black children in 1834, though his financial misfortunes prevented its opening. Brown also moved his family in 1849 to live within a community established for black farmers in North Elba, New York. Like all abolitionists Brown was outraged at the passage of the Compromise of 1850 and the Fugitive Slave Law. He formed the League of Gileadites in January 1851, meeting with several black friends and advocating the killing of slave catchers. Though this would be the first mention of retributive action by Brown, it was in the battle over Kansas that he completely split with pacifist abolitionists and began to see violence as the only way to settle the issue of slavery.

When Congress passed the Kansas–Nebraska Bill in July 1854, obliterating the Missouri Compromise line by allowing residents to vote on the slavery issue, Brown was outraged. Like many in the northeast he viewed it as a Southern plot to extend slavery. Five of his sons – Owen, Salmon, Frederick, Jason, and John Jr. – decided to take advantage of the opportunity for a new start and headed to Kansas in 1855. John decided to follow after collecting money and weapons in order to do battle with the proslavery forces that were also immigrating to Kansas in droves.

The battle between free-soil and pro-slavery factions in Kansas escalated to civil war proportions. As pro-slavery forces resorted to violence and intimidation to achieve their goals, Brown, disgusted at what he viewed as the cowardly response of free-staters, decided to take direct action. Two events culminated in Brown’s decision – the looting of Lawrence, Kansas by pro-slavery forces and the beating of Senator Charles Sumner. On the night of May 24, 1856 Brown led a group of six, including four of his sons, in the late night murder of five influential pro-slavery men in the Pottawatomie Creek area. The Pottawatomie Massacre, as it was dubbed, was the most contentious of his anti-slavery acts, but Brown never stood trial for these killings. Two of his sons, John Jr. and Jason, were arrested and later released. Another son, Frederick, was shot by Martin White, a pro-slavery man, on May 30.

Brown had planned on instigating a slave insurrection as early as 1847. The violence in Kansas convinced him more than ever that this would be the only way that slavery could be stopped. On a trip to the East in 1857 to raise funds for the Kansas fight, Brown met with a group of influential individuals, known as the Secret Six, who would provide financial support for his slave liberation plan. Inspired by Nat Turner's rebellion, the Haitian rebellion, and the Calvinist militant Oliver Cromwell, Brown devised a plan that involved raids into slave country and developing an asylum for escaped slaves in the Allegheny Mountains. He chose the federal arsenal located in Harper's Ferry, Virginia, as the first site of attack. Brown believed that word of the attack on federal property would travel quickly and he would be joined by slaves, freedmen, and abolitionists. His own men were only told of the target the night before the raid was to commence.

Brown, with a group of 21, including six blacks, initiated their raid on Harper's Ferry on October 16, 1859. The group split up upon arrival – some to cut telegraph wires, others to capture the night watchman and guard the bridge, and the remainder descended on the arsenal. Several hostages were taken on the way, and Brown successfully took control of the armory. Raiders were sent out in the area to take hostages and free slaves. The plan began to disintegrate when the relief night watchman reported for duty. Brown's men fired on the man. Wounded, he warned an approaching train. Brown allowed the train to pass, so word spread and militias sprang up immediately to converge on Harper's Ferry. Surrounded and with some of the men wounded, including Brown's sons Watson and Oliver, the group held up in the armory until it was stormed by a federal company under the command of Robert E. Lee on October 18, 1859. A total of 17 people died as a result of the raid, including 10 of Brown's recruits.

Brown was tried by the state of Virginia for the charges of murder, treason against the state of Virginia, and conspiring to incite a slave rebellion. On October 31 the jury convicted Brown. He was sentenced to hang on December 2. Though initially they objected to his violent attacks, abolitionists came to see John Brown as a leader in the fight against slavery.

SEE ALSO: American Civil War and Slavery; American Slave Rebellions; Anti-Slavery Movement, United States, 1700–1870; Cromwell, Oliver (1599–1658); Nat Turner Rebellion; Toussaint Louverture and the Haitian Revolution, 1796–1799

References and Suggested Readings

- Chowder, K. (2000) The Father of American Terrorism. American Heritage 5, 1: 68–78.
- Oates, S. B. (1984) To Purge This Land with Blood: A Biography of John Brown. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press.
- Phillips, C. (2005) John Brown Raids Harpers Ferry. American History 41, 4: 16–71.
- Reynolds, D. S. (2006) John Brown, Abolitionist: The Man Who Killed Slavery, Sparked the Civil War, and Seeded Civil Rights. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.
- Sanborn, F. B. (Ed.) (1885/1969) The Life and Letters of John Brown, Liberator of Kansas, and Martyr of Virginia. New York: Negro Universities Press.
- Trodd, Z. (2006) Writ in Blood: John Brown's Charter of Humanity, the Tribunal of History, and the Thick Link of American Political Protest. Journal for the Study of Radicalism 1, 1: 1–29.

Bukharin, Nikolai Ivanovich (1888–1938)

John Bokina

Nikolai Bukharin was a Soviet Communist Party leader and theoretician who was executed following a Stalinist purge trial, and so much is made of his engaging personality and tragic fate that his prominent position within the Communist Party is often obscured. Approximately ten years younger than the other Bolshevik leaders at the time of the November Revolution, there were frequent remarks about how he was the Party favorite, with his zest for life, intellectual curiosity, sense of humor, and general amiability. And then there is that tragic, but fascinating, denouement. Arrested on false charges; imprisoned and interrogated; attempting to retain his integrity during the sham trial; his execution not enough to prevent reprisals against his family. But between his appearance as the Party favorite and his demise, there were Bukharin's two decades of power and prominence: founder of the Communist youth organization (Komsomol), member of the Politburo, editor of the Party newspaper Pravda, official theorist of Soviet Communism, and head of the Communist International.

Bukharin was born in Moscow. His parents were primary school teachers. As a university student, he participated in the 1905 Russian Revolution. The following year he joined the Bolshevik faction of the Russian Social Democratic Party. After several arrests he went into exile in Germany, Austria, Switzerland, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, and finally the United States. While in exile he wrote two theoretical works, The Economic Theory of the Leisure Class (1914) and Imperialism in World Economy (completed in 1915 and published in 1918). He returned to Moscow during the February Revolution. There he edited the theoretical journal Spartak. After the November Revolution brought the Bolsheviks to power, Bukharin was prominent in Moscow politics and appointed to the Party Central Committee. In 1919, along with Evgenii Preobrazhensky, he wrote The ABC of Communism, an influential textbook.

In the early years of Bolshevik power Bukharin was identified with the Party's left wing for two reasons. First, he wanted a continuation of the emergency economic measures known as "war communism." And second, and contrary to Lenin's desire to get Russia out of World War I at any price, Bukharin opposed the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk. Bukharin wanted Soviet Russia to stay in the war as a way of inciting world revolution. The 1921 publication of Historical Materialism established his reputation as the Party's most important theoretician. That same year Bukharin was reconciled with Lenin, and by 1924 he was a full member of the ruling Politburo.

Indeed, Bukharin was the leading advocate of Lenin's New Economic Policy (NEP) between 1921 and 1928. Before Stalin turned it into the slogan of "socialism in one country," Bukharin believed that socialism could be created in the Soviet Union without the help of socialist revolutions in more developed nations. For Bukharin, the NEP signified a balanced and long-term approach to this goal. Heavy industry, consumer goods, and agriculture were all high priorities. The Soviet state supported both the working class and the peasants, with their private plots of land. Relative freedom prevailed in academia and the arts. Between 1925 and 1928 Bukharin and Stalin – with the support of Mikhail Tomsky and Alexei Rykov – became the dominant figures in the Soviet Communist Party.

In 1928 Stalin turned left, advocating a policy of massive and rapid industrialization and the complete collectivization of agriculture. With a new majority dependent upon Stalin's support on the Politburo, Bukharin, Rykov, and Tomsky were isolated as a Right Opposition. A by-now familiar pattern ensued. Bukharin was vilified as a capitalist reactionary and patron of the peasants. He and his supporters were removed from their Party and governmental positions. There was a brief respite when Bukharin was appointed editor of the government newspaper Izvestia between 1934 to early 1937, but by the end of February 1937 Bukharin was arrested and spent the next 13 months in a cell in Moscow's Lubyanka Prison.

Unlike previous victims, Bukharin refused to humiliate himself during his March 1938 show trial. He sparred with the prosecutor, but without an outright public denunciation of Stalin. He pleaded guilty to the set of charges against him as a whole, while claiming innocence to every specific charge. As expected, he was found guilty and sentenced to death on March 13. The sentence was carried out two days later. His wife Anna Larina was also arrested in 1937 and she spent the next 20 years in Stalin's Gulag. Their 11-month-old son, Yuri, was raised in orphanages and foster homes under another name. They only met again in 1956. The efforts by Anna and Yuri to clear Bukharin's name came to fruition in 1988 when he was rehabilitated by Mikhail Gorbachev.

SEE ALSO: Bolsheviks; Lenin, Vladimir Ilyich (1870–1924); Stalin, Joseph (1879–1953) and "Revolution from Above"; Trotsky, Leon (1879–1940); War Communism and the Rise of the Soviet Union

References and Suggested Readings

- Bergman, T., Schaefer, G., & Selden, M. (Eds.) (1994) Bukharin in Retrospect. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe.
- Bukharin, N. I. (1969) Historical Materialism: A System of Sociology. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.
- Bukharin, N. I. (1972a) The Economic Theory of the Leisure Class. New York: Monthly Review Press.
- Bukharin, N. I. (1972b) Imperialism and World Economy. London: Merlin Press.
- Bukharin, N. I. (1998) How It All Began. Trans. G. Shriver. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Bukharin, N. I. & Preobrazhensky, E. A. (1988) The ABC of Communism: A Popular Explanation of the Program of the Communist Party of Russia. Trans. E. & C. Paul. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.

- Cohen, S. F. (1975) Bukharin and the Bolshevik Revolution: A Political Biography, 1888–1938. New York: Vintage Books.
- Gluckstein, D. (1994) The Tragedy of Bukharin. London: Pluto Press.
- Heitman, S. (1958) An Annotated Bibliography of Nikolai I. Bukharin's Published Works. Fort Collins: Colorado State University Press.
- Katkov, G. (1969) The Trial of Bukharin. New York: Stein & Day.
- Larina, A. (1994) This I Cannot Forget: The Memoirs of Nikolai Bukharin's Widow. Trans. G. Kern. New York: W. W. Norton.
- Medvedev, R. A. (1980) Nikolai Bukharin: The Last Years. Trans. A. D. P. Briggs. New York: W. W. Norton.
- People's Commissariat of Justice of the USSR (1988) Report of the Court Proceedings in the Case of the Anti-Soviet "Bloc of Rights and Trotskyites". New York: Howard Fertig.

Bulavin's Rebellion, 1707–1708

Yury V. Bosin

Like numerous Russian peasant rebellions, Bulavin's uprising emerged in the Cossack areas along the Don River. While the Russian government sought to limit the power and independence of the Cossacks, at the same time it sought to control the border region to prevent serfs from escaping beyond the Don. In the early 1700s, the Russian government was under political pressure from Russian landowners to capture more than 60,000 serfs who fled their masters to the Don River. In response to calls for action by landowners, Peter the Great signed a decree on July 6, 1707 calling for a census in Cossack settlements as a pretext to track down all runaway serfs and return them to their lords. Peter the Great appointed Duke Dolgorukiy to lead the military expedition that initially captured about 3,000 fugitive serfs. But Cossacks saw Dolgorukiy's mission as a threat to their own rights and freedom. In response to the Russian military infiltration, Cossack chief or ataman Kondratiy Bulavin formed a rebel army to repel the Russian forces. On the night of October 8, 1707, Kondratiy Bulavin staged an attack and killed Dolgorukiy and his entire forces.

Not all of the Cossacks supported Bulavin's effort. Some atamans remained loyal to the tsar and sought to capture Bulavin and his insurgents, who had already escaped to Zaporozhye, a town on the western Donetsk River Basin, to regroup before staging a second attack. During the winter hundreds of Cossacks and non-Russian nationalities, including Kalmyks, Mordva, and Tatars, joined the rebels. In February 1708, Bulavin and his rebel army returned to the Don to commence a second uprising against the Russians, seizing Cherkassk, the political center of the Don, and seeking to advance to Moscow. Simultaneously, the tsar organized an army of 32,000 soldiers to capture Bulavin and quell the insurgency. Meanwhile, some Cossacks in Bulavin's entourage conspired against him, surrounding his house on July 7, 1708 and killing him in a shootout. While Bulavin's defeat was seen as a decisive victory in the royal court, and Peter the Great sought extensive control over the Don, he could not abolish Cossack customs and traditions and future popular uprisings against the Russians.

SEE ALSO: Bolotnikov's Rebellion, 1606–1607; Decembrists to the Rise of Russian Marxism; Pugachev's Rebellion, 1773–1775; Razin's Rebellion, 1670–1671

References and Suggested Readings

- Avrich, P. (1976) Russian Rebels, 1600–1800: Four Great Rebellions Which Shook the Russian State in the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries. New York: W. W. Norton.
- Buganov, V. I. (1986) Moscow Chronicles: Popular Uprisings in the 11–18th Centuries. Moscow (in Russian).
- Pod'yapolskaya, E. P. (1962) Bulavin's Rebellion of 1707–1706. Moscow (in Russian).

Bulgaria, anti-Soviet movements

Vasil Paraskhevov

Protests 1944–1954

The Soviet declaration of war on Bulgaria on September 5, 1944 and the coup d'état by the Fatherland Front coalition four days later put the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP) in control of critical government ministries. With Soviet backing the BCP gradually eliminated their partners in the coalition, suppressed dissent, and consolidated control over the country. Although the initial Fatherland Front coalition had been broadly representative of political factions in Bulgaria, by the end of the Soviet occupation in 1947 political power was concentrated entirely in the BCP, economic resources had been nationalized, and the opposition had been completely suppressed.

In 1945 there were four main opposition parties: the Bulgarian Agrarian National Union, the Bulgarian Workers Social Democratic Party (United), the Democratic Party, and the Radical Party (United). Independent intellectuals were part of the opposition as well. The Agrarians and Social Democrats were members of the ruling Fatherland Front coalition at the time of the coup, and some of their leaders were ministers in the government as late as August 1945. However, objections to the communist agenda and the sweeping purges of government the communists conducted through control over the ministry of the interior and the ministry of justice soon led these initial partners to leave their parties, and the government, to organize in opposition.

The Agrarian Union was the most influential among the opposition parties. Dr. G. M. Dimitrov, who had returned from exile to take control of the Agrarian Party in 1944, began challenging communist dominance immediately, arguing that Agrarians, by virtue of their numbers, should manage the reconstruction of Bulgaria. Communist authorities forced Dimitrov to resign in January 1945 and Nikola Petkov assumed leadership of the party. Petkov had worked with the communists during the war and participated in the Fatherland Front coup, but he sought democratic reforms and strongly opposed sovietization of Bulgaria.

The Communist Party deployed the security apparatus, the legal system, and the mass media against the opposition. Accusations of fascism or wartime collaboration with the Nazi-supporting government were a tool for communists to purge the government and society of opponents of their agenda. Conspiracy charges and show trials were a common means of contending with officials and opposition leaders, while many people simply disappeared or were detained in labor camps. Nikola Petkov was accused of treasonous sabotage and organizing a coup d'état against the Fatherland Front. His arrest and subsequent execution resulted in the dissolution of the Agrarian Union and the end of organized opposition in Bulgaria. The other opposition parties were weaker than the Agrarians and were easily isolated by the authorities. In 1948 the BCP banned opposition completely.

The elimination of legal opposition parties marked the beginning of illegal armed insurrection by "forest people" (goriani) squads. These squads, composed of adherents of the opposition, agrarians, and former military officers, were active in the regions of Sliven, Pazardjik, Samokov, the Rhodops, and Pirin Mountain. Their main motivation was objection to the communist government's appropriation of private property and curtailment of political freedoms in Bulgaria. Among their commanders were Gerasim Todorov, Hristo Buzov, Kostadin Deikov, Georgi Tarpanov, and Atanas and Ivan Batalovi. Some groups trained in Greece and Turkey and entered Bulgaria illegally. The goriani movement reached its peak in 1950–1, with some squads numbering 70–80 men. The state began a serious campaign of suppression and by 1956 the insurgents were all but eliminated. According to state security data, 440 men were killed and over 800 were arrested.

Political Emigration

Forced emigration of non-conforming political leaders was among the strategies the communists employed in consolidating control over Bulgaria. According to state security files, 4,542 people emigrated between 1944 and October 1953 and after that point between 300 and 600 emigrated each year. The first wave of emigrants included adherents of the old regime, monarchists, former politicians, diplomats, and members and supporters of the opposition parties. Many of these people remained active critics of the communist government while in exile, and continued to promote political change.

The largest and most influential ex-patriot resistance group was the Bulgarian National Committee, "Free and Independent Bulgaria," led by former agrarian leader G. M. Dimitrov, who escaped from Bulgaria in 1945 with American support; and the Bulgarian National Front led by Ivan Dochev and Hristo Statev. A deep ideological rift put the two organizations in perpetual conflict: the Bulgarian National Committee was made up of agrarians and republicans, some of whom had ruled along with the communists after 1944; the Bulgarian National Front was made up of monarchists and ardent anti-communists, politically active prior to 1944. Other important organizations were the Bulgarian Liberating Movement led by Tsenko Barev and the Temporary Bulgarian Representation supported by the former king, Simeon II.

In the 1960s and 1970s a number of influential intellectuals such as Georgi Markov, Dimitar Bochev, Dimitar Inkirov, and Atanas Slavov immigrated to Western Europe. They worked with radio stations such as the BBC, Radio Free Europe, and Deutsche Welle to communicate information to and about Bulgaria. Their broadcasts openly declared the state of the Bulgarian government, breaking domestic silence about both the problems that plagued the country and the injustice of the regime, and efforts to challenge communist hegemony. The Bulgarian authorities reacted to these challenges with surveillance and secret operations by the state security forces against famous emigrant figures such as Markov, Dochev, Slavov, and Vladimir Kostov. The government waged a media campaign to discredit the emigrants by sponsoring films, articles, and books that undermined their moral authority. They also tried to jam foreign radio stations, but people continued to find ways to receive the broadcasts throughout the period.

SEE ALSO: Bulgaria, 20th-Century Leftist and Workers' Movements; Bulgaria, World War II Resistance and the Rise of Communism; Fascism, Protest and Revolution; Soviet Union, Fall of; Stalin, Joseph (1879–1953) and “Revolution from Above”

References and Suggested Readings

- Baev, J. & Grozev, K. (2005) Bulgaria. In K. Persak & L. Kaminski (Eds.), A Handbook of the Communist Security Apparatus in East Central Europe 1944–1989. Warsaw: Institute of National Remembrance.
- Black, C. E. (1979) The Start of the Cold War in Bulgaria: A Personal View. Review of Politics 41, 2: 163–202.
- Dimitrov, G. (2003) The Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 1939–1949. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Horner, J. E. (1974) The Ordeal of Nikola Petkov and the Consolidation of Communist Rule in Bulgaria. Survey 20, 1 (Winter): 75–83.
- Hristova, N. (2005) Spetsifika na balgarskoto “disidentsvo”. Vlast i intelligentsia 1956–1989 (Specificity of Bulgarian “Dissidence”: Power and Intelligentsia, 1956–1989). Sofia: Letera.
- Kalinova, E. & Baeva, I. (2001) La Bulgarie contemporaine entre l'est et l'ouest. Trans. V. Lebedevska. Paris: L'Harmattan.
- Markov, G. (1983) The Truth that Killed. Trans. L. Brisby. London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson.
- Moser, C. (1979) Dimitrov of Bulgaria: A Political Biography of Dr Georgi M. Dimitrov. New York: St. Martin's Press.
- Oren, N. (1973) Revolution Administered: Agrarianism and Communism in Bulgaria. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.
- Padev, M. (1948) Dimitrov Wastes No Bullets: The Inside Story of the Trial and Murder of Nikola Petkov (Leader of the Bulgarian Agrarian Party). London: Eyre & Spottiswoode.
- Slavov, A. (1986) With the Precision of Bats: The Sweet and Sour Story of Real Bulgaria During the Last Fifty Years or So. Washington, DC: Occidental Press.
- Statelova, E. & Tankova, E. (2002) Prokudenite (The Exiles). Plovdiv: IK Janet-45.

Bulgaria, independence movement, 1830–1835

Todor Todorov

Bulgarian nationalism emerged in the early nineteenth century as the Ottoman Empire was beset by pressures domestically and internationally. In 1830 the once-dominant Ottoman Empire was under pressure from political and economic competition from the colonial expansion of England and France, gradually eroding the apparatus of the Turkish central authorities in Constantinople. Known as the sick man of Europe, the Ottoman Empire's passive partnership with Russia under the Treaty of Hünkâr İskelesi, in which it agreed to control the Dardanelles on Russia's behalf, was just one example of the loss of political power and status within the region.

By 1830 Greece had become an independent country, and autonomous Serbia, Montenegro, Walachia, and Moldova were striving for complete political independence from the Ottomans. Bulgarians had provided armed and financial assistance to the Greeks in their six-year struggle against the Ottomans, and fought alongside Serbian troops in the regions adjacent to the rebellious territories. The success of Greece and the Balkan struggles stimulated a movement for national liberation among Bulgarians as well. Several peasants' rebellions broke out in north-eastern Bulgaria in 1833, initiating an extended period of resistance to Ottoman central control and domination.

The Treaty of Hünkâr İskelesi fostered hopes among the Bulgarian population for liberation with the support of the Russians. Two revolutionary bases were established in northern Bulgaria. One organized a rebellion against Ottoman authority in Silistra, under the leadership of Captain G. Mamarchov (a Bulgarian national in Russian service). The other orchestrated rebellion occurred in Turnovo, under the leadership of Velcho Atanasov, the Glazier. In the midst of feverish preparations for the insurrection the rebels were betrayed by Hadji Yordan Kissyov, a wealthy man from Elena. The conspirators were caught, and most were executed, including Velcho Atanasov. Captain G. Mamarchov escaped the death penalty because he was a Russian subject, but was banished to the Mediterranean island of Samos.

SEE ALSO: Bulgaria, Anti-Soviet Movements; Bulgaria, 20th-Century Leftist and Workers' Movements; Greek Nationalism

References and Suggested Readings

- Crampton, R. J. (2005) A Concise History of Bulgaria. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
 Macdermott, M. (1962) A History of Bulgaria, 1393–1885. London: Allen & Unwin.

Bulgaria, protests against economic hardships, 1990s

Vasil Paraskevov

In the early 1990s Bulgaria began a slow transition from the former communist state-directed economy to the market economy. Initially, the Bulgarian Socialist Party (BSP), the former Communist Party, took the responsibility to lead the country after electoral success in the first free elections held in June 1990. However, economic conditions in Bulgaria became worse and undermined the domestic and international prestige of the government led by Andrei Lukanov – in April 1990 the Cabinet stopped payment of the foreign debts of the country, the level of foreign investments was low, and reforms did not begin. Social discontent grew in the autumn of 1990 because of lack of basic foodstuffs. In September queues in the shops began and the government set up coupons for certain foodstuffs. In this situation in November 1990 street protests and strikes began. The demonstrators wanted the resignation of the government. The trade union Podkrepa organized a political strike in the entire country which increased the tension and threatened social turmoil. On November 29, 1990 Lukanov resigned.

In the following years governments followed inconsistent reform policies which led to a fall in living standards. In December 1994 the BSP won the parliamentary elections and formed a new government, but it could not solve the economic and political crisis in the country. Furthermore, during the rule of Zhan Videnov's government (January 26, 1995–December 23, 1996) the aftermath of this policy became more obvious – significant unemployment, increasing inflation, criminality, etc.

In early 1997, amid permanently increasing inflation, mass protests started. On January 10 demonstrators encircled the parliament in order to support the demand of the opposition parties: the BSP to leave power. As the day progressed the tension rose and finally the gathered people rushed into the parliament and besieged the deputies of the BSP, but the police succeeded in dispelling the demonstrators and later that night evacuated the deputies. Henceforth, the opposition began daily peaceful demonstrations which gathered tens of thousands of people on the main streets in Sofia. The protests continued for around a month and took in other Bulgarian cities as well. In early February the tension reached its peak. Demonstrators blocked major streets in the capital for some days, as well as in Plovdiv, Varna, Russe, etc., and main roads and highways throughout the country. Finally, on February 4, Nikolai Dobrev, the socialist nominee for prime minister after Videnov's retirement, decided to return the mandate for formation of a new government in the face of strong pressure from the street and political opposition. This opened a road for more determined market reforms as well as reevaluation of the old position within the BSP.

SEE ALSO: Bulgaria, Anti-Soviet Movements; Sofia Demonstrations, 1989

References and Suggested Readings

- Dainov, E. (2000) Politicheskiyat debat i prehodat v Balgaria (The Political Debate and the Transition

- in Bulgaria). Sofia: Fondatsia Balgarska nauka i kultura.
- Dimitrov, V. (2002) Bulgaria: The Uneven Transition. London: Routledge.
- Kalinova, E. & Baeva, I. (2002) Balgarskite prehodi 1939–2002 (Bulgarian Transitions, 1939–2002). Sofia: Paradigma.
- Zloch-Christy, I. (1996) Bulgaria in a Time of Change: Economic and Political Dimensions. Aldershot: Ashgate.

Bulgaria 20th-century leftist and workers' movements

Vasil Paraskevov

The agrarian and workers' movements were the most significant challenges to the monarchy and bourgeoisie in Bulgarian society in the beginning of the twentieth century. The workers' movement drew upon the Marxist-social democratic tradition, while the agrarian movement adopted some of the ideological tenets of Marxism, but looked to the peasants rather than factory workers as the source of social and political transformation. Differences in the demographics the movements appealed to, and communist rejection of the agrarian movement because it sought reform within the bourgeois economic system rather than its overthrow, ultimately set the two movements in conflict with one another rather than in alliance against their common enemies.

The workers' movement in Bulgaria emerged during the last decade of the nineteenth century. In 1891, Dimitar Blagoev and Nikola Gabrovski established the Bulgarian Social Democratic Party; the following year, Slavi Balabanov formed the Bulgarian Social Democratic Union. The organizations merged to form the Bulgarian Workers' Social Democratic Party (BWSDP) in 1894, but differences with respect to ideological purity and programmatic scope led the party to split in 1903. The Broad Socialists, led by N. Gabrovski and Yanko Sakazov, embraced an inclusive platform and political strategy, arguing that Bulgarian society relied not only on workers but also on peasants, who were the majority of the population. The Narrow Socialists, whose leader was D. Blagoev, were adherents of Marxism and worked only among the proletariat in the cities. In the interwar years the Broad Socialists, who preserved the name of the BWSDP, were inclined to compromise with non-socialist parties and insisted on democratization of political life. The Narrow Socialists became the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP) in 1919 and accepted the goal of a socialist revolution and guidance of the Comintern.

The Bulgarian Agrarian National Union (BANU) was originally established in 1899 as a professional association exclusive to peasants. It generated broad support throughout the country with peaceful demonstrations against regressive tax policies, but it eschewed political partisanship. The union changed course in 1901 and became a political party. In 1909, Aleksander Stamboliski provided the party with a much needed ideological foundation in a series of articles elaborating the historical relationship between peasants and the state.

Like the workers' movement, the agrarians were concerned with large-scale social reform to address the unequal distribution of wealth and obligation in Bulgarian society. While the social democrats emphasized industry and factory workers as the site of economic and political transformation, the agrarians focused on agriculture and the plight of farmers. They sought to improve the lot of peasants by fostering efficient production through equal distribution of land, state-supported education, and agrarian cooperatives. Stamboliski saw the party as a source of unity and education among peasants as well as a means of securing their interests against large-scale corporate agriculture.

Public disaffection following World War I due to inflation and high taxes increased support for the socialist and agrarian party alike, but the agrarians had broader appeal for the largely peasant population of Bulgaria. BANU won a plurality of the vote in the 1919 election. Stamboliski invited the BCP, which finished second, and the BWSDP to form a ruling coalition, but they rejected a junior partnership, forcing Stamboliski to ally with factions on the right.

His government won the support of political and economic elites by harshly suppressing a mass transportation strike – organized by communists and social democrats – that lasted for three months in late 1919 and early 1920. The following year BANU won a majority in the parliamentary elections and, with full control of the government, Stamboliski immediately instituted radical reforms. He broke up large land holdings and redistributed them to the poor, and implemented a progressive income tax and compulsory secondary education. His reforms were directed against "parasitic" elements of society such as lawyers, usurers, and merchant capitalists, and toward achieving more equal distribution of social benefits and burdens. The Stamboliski government further renounced imperialist territorial claims, pursued rapprochement with the European powers and Turkey, and sought membership in the League of Nations.

The agrarian government was brought down by an alliance of tsarists, nationalists, and members of the military, who were alarmed at Stamboliski's reforms and conciliatory foreign policy, and social democrats, who were opposed to the repressive measures he employed in controlling dissent. On June 9, 1923, Stamboliski was assassinated by Macedonian extremists and control of the government fell to the right-left alliance led by Alexander Tsankov.

Tens of thousands of peasants rose up in an effort to protect agrarian rule, but they were poorly armed and badly organized. The authorities neutralized the resistance fairly quickly, killing Stamboliski's brother Vasil, Raiko Daskalov, Krum Popov, Stoyan Kalachev, Dimitar Kemalov, and other prominent agrarian figures. In the districts of Shumen around 1,400 people were arrested, in Pleven 700, and in Karlovo 1,200.

The communists were not part of the coup but neither did they aid the peasant resistance, initially intending to remain neutral while the rival factions weakened each other. On the advice of the Comintern, they revised this position and staged an ill-conceived uprising in mid-September. The government was aware of the planned insurrection and arrested about 2,500 communists on September 12 in a preemptive strike. The party leadership stuck to its plan despite clear indications that the conditions did not favor success, and the army quelled the uprising by the end of September.

The Democratic Alliance that assumed power in Bulgaria after the 1923 coup severely repressed both the agrarian and communist opposition. The authorities arrested and accused communists such as Hristo Kabakchiev, Anton Ivanov, Nikola Penev, and Tina Kirkorova, along with Vasil Kolarov, Georgi Dimitrov, and T. Lukanov who were in exile, of conspiring with Moscow to overthrow the government. Prominent members of the agrarian government, among them Nedyalko Atanasov, Stoyan Omarchevski, and Spas Duparinov, were tried for anti-constitutional activities during their rule. The government proceeded with caution in this trial, however, because of international interest and the threat of new peasant unrest, and on April 9, 1924 the court discharged all defendants.

The Communist Party was officially dissolved in 1924, but low-level insurgency continued. In 1925 the government undertook a mass purge of leftist resistance when on April 16 the communists detonated a bomb in the Sveta Nedelya cathedral in Sofia, killing over 150 people. The police arrested some 13,000 people in response to the bombing, many of whom disappeared in custody. Both the agrarian and communist movements lost some of their most distinguished members. Poet Geo Milev and journalists Sergei Rumyantsev and Iosif Herbst, for example, who were not involved in the events but criticized the regime for its inhuman violence, were executed.

The abortive communist uprising in 1923 split the Communist Party geographically as well as ideologically. The majority of the rank and file remained in the country while the leadership fled en masse to the Soviet Union between 1923 and 1927. Most of the Bulgarian exiles became party functionaries in southern Ukraine, but the upper ranks of leadership were given extensive training and positions within the Comintern. Within Bulgaria communists who survived the purges reorganized as the Bulgarian Workers' Party (BWP) in 1927. They sponsored the Independent Workers' Trade Union, which became the center of political activity for labor, and voluntary associations for university students. The BWP won 31 seats in the 1931 general election and a plurality in the Sofia municipal elections. The communist victory in Sofia was overturned by the court, however, and in 1933 the BWP deputies were banned from parliament by the ruling People's Bloc, a coalition that included BANU.

The Communist Party's experience organizing under repressive conditions and the support of the Comintern left it well positioned to contend with the government ban on organized party activity in 1933 and after the 1934 coup. However, the leftists who had gained control of the party in the 1920s interpreted the events through the lens of orthodoxy, seeing them as one more step in the process of capitalism's self-destruction. The fascist Zveno group, in the orthodox view, would hasten the path to revolution by exacerbating the contradictions within the bourgeois system. The communists opted for neutrality in the situation as they had in 1923, only to again find themselves in conflict with the Soviets and Comintern, who thought the communists should have supported the democratic faction rather than passively foment revolution.

Meanwhile, in 1934 Dimitrov, the leader of the Old Guard communists who was responsible for communist neutrality in 1923, returned from exile in Germany where he had been sent after earning the disfavor of the left-dominated Bulgarian faction within the Comintern. With Stalin's shift to the right, Dimitrov was more in line with Moscow than with his compatriots in the Comintern and he was welcomed with open arms. Dimitrov sought to regain control over the Bulgarian communist émigrés and began to purge the "left sectarians" from positions of authority, calling them Trotskyites. Dimitrov's accusations of conspiracy fed his opponents into Stalin's great purge and hundreds of Bulgarian communists – from the Ukraine as well as the Comintern – were arrested by the Soviet secret police and either executed or sent to perish in concentration camps.

Dimitrov attempted a similar purge within Bulgaria but his task was less easily accomplished in the underground against formidable resistance from the leftist leadership. After the coup the party decided to dissolve the BWP rather than maintain two illegal organizations. Dimitrov favored the opposite course on the grounds that the BWP was better positioned to work with the democratic factions, and the Communist Party was superfluous. The left leadership refused to surrender their organization and for five years there were two underground communist organizations in Bulgaria. Dimitrov managed the more intractable leadership by "inviting" them to Moscow where they met their deaths in Stalin's purge. The leftists in Bulgaria knew nothing of the fate that befell their comrades in the Soviet Union. They maintained their opposition to Moscow's agenda out of the belief that their actions served the true needs of Bulgarian communism. Their ranks were ultimately decimated. Some survivors left the party; others participated in the resistance during the war, and were later forgiven for their deviance and allowed to aid the communist consolidation of power after 1944.

SEE ALSO: Bulgaria, Anti-Soviet Movements; Bulgaria, World War II Resistance and the Rise of Communism; Fascism, Protest and Revolution; Stalin, Joseph (1879–1953) and "Revolution from Above"; War Communism and the Rise of the Soviet Union

References and Suggested Readings

- Bell, J. D. (1977) Peasants in Power: Alexander Stamboliski and the Bulgarian Agrarian National Union, 1899–1923. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Crampton, R. (1997) Eastern Europe in the Twentieth Century – and After. London and New York: Routledge.
- Daskalov, D. (1999) Politicheski ubistva v novata istoria na Bargaria (Political Murders in the Modern History of Bulgaria). Sofia: Izdatelska Kashta Petar Beron'.
- Groueff, S. (1987) Crown of Thorns: The Reign of King Boris III of Bulgaria, 1918–1943. Lanham, MD: Madison Books.
- Kosev, D. (1978) Septemvriuskoto vastanie (The September Uprising). Sofia.
- Lewis, P. G. (Ed.) (2001) Party Development and Democratic Change in Post-Communist Europe: The First Decade. London: Routledge.
- Markov, G. (1994) Kambanite biyat sami. Nasilie i politica v Bargaria, 1919–1947 (Violence and Policy in Bulgaria, 1919–1947). Sofia.
- Oren, N. (1977) Bulgarian Communism: The Road to Power, 1934–1944. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Rothschild, J. (1959) The Communist Party of Bulgaria: Origins and Development, 1883–1936. New York: Columbia University Press.

Bulgaria, World War II resistance and the rise of communism

Vasil Paraskovov

By 1941 Bulgaria was already strongly allied with Germany. Cultural ties had existed since before World War I, Bulgaria's economy was entwined with Germany's, and Tsar Boris's tight management of political representation and control over elections ensured that the National Assembly was dominated by ministers who shared his own pro-German sentiments. In 1939 the previous prime minister had declared Bulgaria Germany's "natural ally" since they had both been victims of injustice after the war. Cultural exchanges had been established between the two countries and Nazi-like celebrations were conducted in Bulgaria. In deference to Hitler, laws imposing restrictions on Jews had been under consideration in Bulgaria since July 1940, and in January 1941 the Law on the Protection of the Nation subjected Bulgarian Jews to many of the disabilities they suffered in Germany. Bulgaria formally joined the Axis powers in March 1941, intending to limit its military involvement to the Balkans and reclaim the territories it had lost in World War I: neither would be the case.

The Agrarians staged the first serious resistance to Bulgarian support for the Germans in late 1940. Dr. G. M. Dimitrov, a radical Agrarian member of parliament in the early 1930s, planned a coup with the support of British intelligence. In February 1941, however, the police neutralized the conspirators and tried 35 people. Dimitrov fled Bulgaria but received a death sentence in absentia.

The communists took up armed resistance in Bulgaria and Germany after the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941. In conjunction with the Bulgarian ex-patriots who fled their homeland after the communist uprising in 1923, the Soviet government inaugurated the resistance through a series of radio broadcasts in Bulgarian: Radio Hristo Botev was followed by Radio Narodn Glas and Radio Moscow. Police data indicate that small groups were responsible for the bulk of the resistance in 1941–2: 27 armed groups with 381 partisans implemented approximately 70 actions in Bulgaria's major cities. They employed tactics such as sabotage, strikes, and infiltration of the armed forces.

The Bulgarian government brutally repressed the resistance through arrests, murder, and imprisonment in concentration camps. In August and September 1941 the Soviet Union sent 56 people to Bulgaria to aid the resistance; the police arrested or killed all but seven. Between 1941 and 1942 authorities arrested 5,279 people, of whom 3,882 were sentenced and 130 were executed. Among the victims were Anton Ivanov, Nikola Vaptsarov, General Vladimir Zaimov, and Tsvyatko Radoinov. By 1943 the regime had sent 3,770 people to concentration camps.

In addition to underground activities there was legal civic resistance to the Bulgarian government's submission to Germany. The Law on the Protection of the Nation, passed in 1941, had not been implemented due to a general lack of anti-Semitic sentiment in Bulgaria. In 1943 Germany increased pressure on the government to support Hitler's elimination of Jews from the region. A special agreement was signed ordering the deportation of 20,000 Jews from Bulgaria's recently reclaimed territories in Macedonia and Trace; 11,400 people were deported directly, and preparations for the deportation of 8,500 more Jewish people from the territories were underway. Popular resistance to the decision from all areas of society – intellectuals, politicians, and ecclesiastics – culminated in a clash between demonstrators and police in Sofia on May 24, 1943. Over 400 people were arrested, but the deportation order was canceled by the action of the National Assembly and on the orders of Tsar Boris.

Germany's losses in the Soviet Union and North Africa in early 1943 emboldened communists to intensify their armed struggle. Between February and May 1943 the insurgents killed General Hristo Lukov, Sotir Yanev, and Colonel Atanas Pantev, who were famous for their pro-German and anti-communist positions. In February 1943 the Communist Party distributed A Directive for Armed Rising to support the Bulgarian resistance, but the plan was useless under the current conditions. The partisan movement was strengthened nonetheless. In 1943 the Communist Party divided Bulgaria into 12 zones of rebellion and the partisan groups were named the National Liberation Revolutionary Army. Between November 1943 and September 1944 the number of armed partisans grew from 1,340 to 6,900 and over 9,600 people were involved in some aspect of the resistance. The Bulgarian authorities responded by creating a special police force with unlimited power to pursue partisans. The special police committed atrocities on partisans, murdering their families and burning down their homes. Between 1943 and 1944 the regime killed 2,740 members of the resistance and sent thousands of others to concentration camps.

The Rise of Communism

The end of 1943 brought the war to Bulgarian soil with the beginning of Allied air raids on Sofia. It was clear that Germany could no longer protect Bulgaria, but the presence of German forces in the country prevented Bulgarian officials from unconditionally surrendering. The Soviet Union further threatened the country with war if it did not quickly move to assert its neutrality vis-à-vis Germany. Support for the resistance greatly increased as people experienced hunger and homelessness, and the majority of this effort was organized by the communists.

The communists had proposed the Fatherland Front in 1942 in an attempt to unite resistance to Tsar Boris's regime. The Front's program, first broadcast over Soviet Radio Hristo Botev in the summer of 1942, was limited to complete neutrality in the war, withdrawal from the occupied territory, and full institution of civil rights. The communists downplayed their own role in an effort to generate mass support, but they had been unable to secure the cooperation of the Agrarian, Social Democrat, and Democratic Party leadership. As the war progressed some of the second-tier leadership agreed to cooperate despite their mistrust of the communists. Among their most important allies were the Pladne (noon) Agrarians, a leftist faction of the Agrarians that had worked with the communists in the 1930s. Nikola Petkov, the leader of the group in the absence of Dr. G. M. Dimitrov – who was in exile for attempting to overthrow the government in 1941 – admired the Soviet Union and supported a democratic–communist alliance. In 1943 the Fatherland Front formed a National Committee that became an important tool in the communists' consolidation of power at the end of the war.

Support from some of the leadership of the democratic factions greatly strengthened the communist position by dividing its potential opposition. Tsar Boris's death in 1943, and the deterioration of the regime's anti-communist, pro-German stance due to the rise of the resistance and encroachment of the Soviet Union during the last year of the war, had further dealt significant blows to the opposition at the other end of the political spectrum. Nonetheless, the communists sought a broad coalition and courted the support of bourgeois leaders.

On September 5, 1944 the Soviet Union declared war on Bulgaria. Before the Red Army reached Sofia, on the morning of September 9, members of the Military League (a faction of reserve officers and tsarists) and communists staged a coup, arresting the government and replacing it with one of the Fatherland Front Coalition. The new government was broadly representative of Bulgarian political factions but communists, despite their pivotal organizing role, were relatively inconspicuous. There was one communist on the three-member Regency Council, and two on the 16-member Council of Ministers.

Over the next two years communists gradually purged the government and society of opposition. With control of the ministry of the interior and ministry of justice, and the support of the occupying Soviets, the communists labeled real and potential enemies as “fascists” and eliminated them. Many were executed; some simply disappeared; others were tried and convicted as war criminals. The Agrarians were the first to challenge the communists. Dr. G. M. Dimitrov, who returned from exile to lead the party, was broadly critical of communist policies and argued that Agrarians, by virtue of their numbers, were entitled to direct the reconstruction of Bulgaria and manifest the peasant democracy Stamboliski envisioned.

Georgi Dimitrov, who had been responsible for initiating the purge of the Bulgarian leftist in the Soviet Union, coordinated the final suppression of opposition. He organized a referendum on the monarchy which returned overwhelming support for establishing a republic. The day the US Senate signed the peace treaty recognizing Bulgaria as a sovereign state, Georgi Dimitrov accused Petkov, the Agrarian leader, of conspiring with the army to overthrow the government. He was stripped of his parliamentary immunity and arrested on the assembly floor. Three months later he was tried and sentenced to death. His execution marked the end of real opposition in Bulgaria.

SEE ALSO: Bulgaria, Anti-Soviet Movements; Bulgaria 20th-Century Leftist and Workers' Movements; Fascism, Protest and Revolution; Stalin, Joseph (1879–1953) and “Revolution from Above”

References and Suggested Readings

- Bar-Zohar, M. (1998) Beyond Hitler's Grasp: The Heroic Rescue of Bulgaria's Jews. Holbrook, MA: Adams Media Corporation.
- Brown, J. F. (1970) Bulgaria Under Communist Rule. London: Pall Mall Press.
- Chary, F. (1972) The Bulgarian Jews and the Final Solution, 1940–1944. Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press.

- Miller, M. L. (1975) Bulgaria during the Second World War. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Moser, C. (1979) Dimitrov of Bulgaria: A Political Biography of Dr. Georgi M. Dimitrov. Ottawa, IL: Caroline House.
- Oren, N. (1971) Bulgarian Communism: The Road to Power, 1934–1944. New York and London: Columbia University Press.
- Pundeff, M. (1992) Bulgaria. In J. Held (Ed.), The Columbia History of Eastern Europe in the Twentieth Century. New York: Columbia University Press.

Buonarroti, Philippe (1761–1837)

Robert H. Blackman

Philippe Buonarroti has been called the first professional revolutionist. A Florentine noble, Buonarroti abandoned home, family, and country to support the French Revolution in its Jacobin and Robespierreist guise. A leader with Babeuf of the Conspiracy of Equals, Buonarroti survived prison and exile to found secret societies dedicated to restoring the Jacobin republic in France and fostering revolution throughout Europe. His history of the conspiracy led to renewed interest in Babeuf and his ideas of communal property and radical egalitarianism. Buonarroti's combination of secret political organization and public pronouncements influenced generations of European radicals, including Louis Blanc, August Blanqui, Giuseppe Mazzini, Karl Marx, and Mikhail Bakunin.

Buonarroti preached Jean-Jacques Rousseau's ideals of popular sovereignty and individual equality well before the French Revolution. During the Revolution Buonarroti moved to Corsica, where he became a bureaucrat in Pasquale Paoli's government. In time, he became an ardent Jacobin and a friend of the Bonaparte family. These twin connections led him to oppose Paoli and prompted his move to Paris in 1793. There he became a French citizen, frequented the Jacobin club, and came to know Robespierre. Buonarroti was sent by the National Convention to administer territory near Menton conquered in 1794. He retained this post past Thermidor (July 1794) but was jailed in March 1795 for seizing the property of a local noble. While in jail, he met Babeuf and had a jailhouse conversion to the religion of conspiracy. Freed in the general amnesty following the adoption of the Constitution of 1795, Buonarroti set about agitating for a return to the Jacobin constitution of 1793 and for an invasion of Italy to establish a unified Italian state on the model of the French republic.

Buonarroti was arrested in May of 1796 as member of the Conspiracy of Equals and was sentenced in 1797 to be deported to Guyana. He never left Europe, remaining in French jails until 1806, then sent into exile. He plotted incessantly to overthrow Bonaparte and later the restored monarchy in order to bring back the Jacobin republic. Under the guise of giving music lessons or teaching Italian, he taught revolution. A secret society he formed in Geneva ran from 1809 until 1823, when a messenger was arrested carrying documents that exposed the conspiracy. Forced to flee from Geneva to Brussels, he began a new conspiracy and wrote his justification of the Terror and denunciation of the post-Thermidor republic. Buonarroti returned to Paris after the Revolution of 1830, where he continued plotting to create a republic. Experience had taught Buonarroti that he could no longer hope that the people would spontaneously arise and topple their masters. Instead, he led the way in establishing long-term plots meant to undermine a sitting government to the point of collapse while setting up a shadow government made up of professional revolutionaries.

SEE ALSO: Babeuf, François-Noël (1760–1797) and the Conspiracy of Equals; Bakunin, Mikhail Alexandrovich (1814–1876); Blanc, Louis (1811–1882); France, 1830 Revolution; French Revolution, 1789–1794; French Revolution, Radical Factions and Organizations; Robespierre, Maximilien de (1758–1794); Socialism

References and Suggested Readings

- Buonarroti, P. (1828/1965) Babeuf's Conspiracy for Equality. Trans. B. O'Brien. New York: Augustus M. Kelley.
- Eisenstein, E. (1959) The First Professional Revolutionist: Filippo Michele Buonarroti (1761–1837). Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Talmon, J. L. (1952) The Rise of Totalitarian Democracy. Boston: Beacon Press.

Burdett, Sir Francis (1770–1844)

Victoria Arnold

Sir Francis Burdett was one of the most important reformers of his period. A controversial figure, particularly in his early career, Burdett played a significant and leading role in several of the most popular agitations of the early nineteenth century.

Born in Foremark, Derbyshire in January 1770, Burdett was the eldest surviving son of Francis Burdett (1743–94) and Eleanor Jones, daughter of Sir William Jones of Ramsbury Manor in Wiltshire. He was educated at the Westminster School and Christ Church College, Oxford, but did not graduate. In 1793 Burdett married Sophia Coutts, daughter of the wealthy London banker Thomas Coutts (1735–1822). They had six children, only one a son. Burdett became the fifth baronet upon the death of his grandfather Sir Robert Burdett in February 1797. With the title, Burdett received lands in Foremark and Bramcote in Warwickshire. In 1800 he also inherited Ramsbury Manor from his maternal aunt, Lady Jones.

Burdett first entered parliament in 1796 as MP for Boroughbridge, a seat purchased by his father-in-law from the Duke of Newcastle for the sum of £4,000. He determined to be an independent member and voted against Pitt's ministry on a regular basis, opposing almost all fiscal and tax bills, the suspension of Habeas Corpus, the Combination Acts, the Act of Union, and the exclusion of reporters from the House. In these early days, Burdett's views were seen as extremely radical. His contacts with suspected traitor Arthur O'Connor, convicted traitor Colonel Despard, and his mentor, the radical John Horne Tooke, ensured that the government watched him closely.

Burdett's experience of Parliament in this period was a frustrating one and by 1802 he was ready to retire, but he was persuaded to stand as candidate for Middlesex. Using the mistreatment of political prisoners at Coldbath Fields Prison, Clerkenwell, as the central issue of his electoral campaign, Burdett was returned ahead of the government candidate William Mainwaring. In 1804 Burdett's election was voided, resulting in a new contest in which parliamentary reform rather than prison conditions became his emphasis. He was defeated as a result of the dubious practices of the county sheriffs, but in 1805 his appeal against the result was successful and he was restored to the seat. His victory was to be short-lived, as he was once again unseated in 1806 after the success of Mainwaring's counter-appeal. Once again, Burdett expressed a wish to retire from public life, the Middlesex election campaigns having cost him thousands of pounds. He resolved to spend no more on campaigning, or even to participate, resulting in his defeat.

By this time Burdett was seen as an important advocate of reform. It was for this reason that in 1807 leading metropolitan radicals worked for Burdett's return as MP for Westminster, a seat he was to hold for the next 30 years. In Parliament Burdett moved for the abolition of flogging in the army and supported moves for an inquiry into allegations of corruption on the part of the Duke of York. In 1809 he introduced a motion for parliamentary reform, calling for a ratepayer franchise, shorter parliaments, single-day elections, and equal electoral districts. Predictably, it was defeated.

In April 1810 Burdett fell foul of the Commons when William Cobbett's Political Register published his parliamentary speech in defense of John Gale Jones, a radical publicist jailed for publicizing a debate held at the British Forum in February 1810. Burdett was declared guilty of breach of parliamentary privilege and ordered to the Tower. This judgment provoked the largest mass agitation in London since 1780 as thousands gathered outside Burdett's Piccadilly home, where he had barricaded himself inside to prevent his removal to the Tower. He was forcibly arrested on April 9 and remained in the Tower until the end of the parliamentary session in June. His refusal to join in the mass celebrations on the day of his release offended many of his supporters, but did not permanently damage his status as a popular hero, and he remained a champion of the reform movement.

By the mid-1810s Burdett returned his attention to prison reform and the issue of flogging in the army. This period saw the beginnings of his breach with metropolitan radicals, who turned to more extreme radical leaders such as Henry "Orator" Hunt. To them, the moderate reform advocated by Burdett was not enough. As radicalism began to center more and more on the plight of the working classes and the devastating effects of industrialization, Burdett became further estranged from the radical movement. During this period he had a series of very public disputes with his former ally Cobbett, who frequently criticized Burdett in his Political Register.

In Parliament Burdett moved for parliamentary reform in 1812 and 1818, the latter effort being the product of a brief union with Jeremy Bentham, but without much success. He supported Brand's Parliamentary Reform Bill in 1812, seeing it as a step in the right direction, opposed plans for the renewal of property tax, and bombarded the House with reform petitions. However, his reluctance to call for universal suffrage and to back mass meetings, such as that in Spa Fields in 1816, damaged his reputation in radical circles. Burdett remained dedicated to the cause of liberty and in 1820 was fined and imprisoned for seditious libel for his attack on the government's brutal suppression of a public meeting in Manchester, commonly known as the Peterloo Massacre. This, and his support for Queen Caroline, improved his radical standing for a time and ensured he was returned unopposed for Westminster in the election of that year.

Throughout the 1820s Burdett moved away from the radical reform movement and concentrated more on the campaign for Catholic Emancipation, in which he played a central role, bringing the subject before the House of Commons more than any other MP of the period. It was also during this period that he formed a closer relationship with the parliamentary Whigs. In the Commons Burdett supported calls for repeal of the Corn Laws and the Combination Acts. During the campaign for Parliamentary Reform in the late 1820s, Burdett acted as mediator between the government and the radicals and worked for the passage of the 1832 Reform Act. In 1837, after a public argument with Daniel O'Connell over O'Connell's extremist tactics, Burdett was asked by Westminster electors to resign his seat. He did so but won the resulting by-election. Two months later at the general election, Burdett turned his back on Westminster and stood for North Wiltshire, which he represented until his death in 1844. This later period of his life saw Burdett cross the floor of the House and side with the Conservatives.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Corn Law Agitation, Britain, 19th Century; Catholic Emancipation; Cobbett, William (1763–1835); Combination Laws and Revolutionary Trade Unionism; Despard, Colonel Edward Marcus (1751–1803) and the Despard Conspiracy; Hardy, Thomas (1752–1832); Horne Tooke, John (1736–1812); Hunt, Henry "Orator" (1773–1835); O'Connor, Arthur (1763–1852); Peterloo Massacre, 1819; Reform Acts, Britain and Ireland, 1832

References and Suggested Readings

- Dinwiddy, J. R. (1980) Sir Francis Burdett and Burdettite Radicalism. History 65.
- Galbraith, G. (Ed.) (1965) The Journal of the Rev. William Bagshaw Stevens. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Hodlin, C. S. (1989) The Political Career of Sir Francis Burdett. D. Phil. dissertation, Oxford University.
- Hone, J. A. (1982) For the Cause of Truth: Radicalism in London, 1796–1821. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Patterson, M. W. (1931) Sir Francis Burdett and His Times, 1770–1844. London: Macmillan.

Burkina Faso, Revolution, 1983

Animasawun Gbemisola Abdul-Jelil

Much of sub-Saharan Africa has failed to develop economically and, due to the continued legacy of colonialism, remains mired in political and economic chaos, unable to provide for the basic necessities of life. The causal role of colonialism and imperialism is too obvious to ignore for a proper critical analysis. Burkina Faso, the country hitherto known as Upper Volta, is no exception. Following independence from France on August 5, 1960, Upper Volta remained in economic destitution and political turmoil until 1983, when Thomas Sankara sparked a revolutionary transformation that brought many achievements, although they remain unfulfilled.

In the early twentieth century, Thomas Sankara was among the most respected modern political figures in modern Africa. In 1983 he led the National Council of the Revolution (Conseil National de la Révolution, CNR) and founded a modern African state that sought to secure total emancipation from neocolonialism and imperialism. On taking power, Sankara's first major step was to rename the landlocked West African country through asserting cultural independence and rejecting the dependent terms of development offered by the West, represented by multilateral institutions and transnational corporations (Christoff 2007).

The name of the former French colony was changed from Upper Volta to Burkina Faso, meaning "the land of the upright or righteous," a step that reflected a move toward socialism. Sankara also opted for a locally generated concept of development based on the specific needs of Burkina Faso to secure an independent and prosperous future for the country and its people. Ironically, Sankara enhanced popular participation by citizens in national affairs through a military government rather than through a democratic neoliberal regime imposed by the West in the interests of foreign capitalists. The military government was embraced by the citizens of the country as a viable alternative to the failed democratic regimes that had preceded it, marking a new concept in civil–military relations and demonstrating a more independent form of rule for African nations (Skinner 1988).

The revolutionary action of the government dramatically transformed the society through the emancipation of women, democratic transparency, a war against corruption, and greater access to health care. Sankara's government advanced health care rapidly, vaccinating three million children against deadly diseases such as yellow fever, measles, and meningitis (Skinner 1988). Through advancing societal rather than liberal western democratic forms, Sankara gained the support of the vast majority of people, while inciting opposition from France, western capitalists, and neighboring capitals in Francophone West Africa, leading to his ultimate demise.

Thomas Sankara believed it was criminal for soldiers to lack political education, a prerequisite for holding political office. If soldiers trained to defend the territorial integrity of their country were in positions of authority, he also thought there was a strong propensity to inadvertently or deliberately do a great disservice to the people. Sankara believed that postcolonial Africa had been plundered by military and civilian leaders primarily concerned with accumulating wealth for themselves. Through his charisma and integrity, Sankara represented a vision of action based on clear-headed thinking and sure-footedness, all of which made him unique as an African soldier in a postcolonial African state. Sankara led a humble and transparently Spartan lifestyle, which earned him the confidence and trust of the citizenry. Although he sought to promote egalitarian development, Sankara may have neglected to recognize the scarcity of the country's economic resources, which halted efforts to dramatically transform the society.

Sankara drew the ire of neighboring African regimes when he called for mass action against elites, believing that the cause of African poverty and underdevelopment was the active connivance of those regimes with imperialists. In 1987,

French President François Mitterrand (1981–93) colluded with leaders of Côte d'Ivoire, Chad, Mali, and Togo to depose Sankara, a conspiracy that ultimately kept Burkina Faso perpetually underdeveloped.

In 1987, Blaise Compaore, a member of the CNR, seized power in a military coup, then proceeded to execute Sankara. Under Compaore's rule, Burkina Faso restored the power of the elites who had opposed Sankara's revolutionary transformation and who also had close ties to France and international capital. Compaore restored formal democracy and in 1991 ran unopposed for the presidency of Burkina Faso. He became an ardent opponent of socialism, privatized key sectors of the economy in accordance with International Monetary Fund precepts, and won the presidency continuously through 2005, despite an ostensible multiparty system.

While the Burkina Faso Revolution was reversed by France and neighboring countries, it remains a proud moment in the history of the country and of Africa, being recognized throughout the world for advancing democracy, women's rights, education, and health care during a time of scarcity.

SEE ALSO: Côte d'Ivoire, Post-Independence Protest; Francophone Africa, Protest and Independence; Ghana, Nationalism and Socialist Transition; Nkrumah, Kwame (1909–1972)

References and Suggested Readings

- Ake, C. (1996) Democracy and Development in Africa. Ibadan: Spectrum Books.
- Christoff, S. (2007) Echoes of Revolution: Burkina Faso's Thomas Sankara. Available at www.thomasankara.net/article.php?id_article=0524.
- Sene, J. J. (N. D.). Burkina Faso: The Country of Honourable Men. Pennsylvania: Center for the Study of Conflict, Chatham University.
- Skinner, E. P. (1988) Sankara and the Burkinabe Revolution: Charisma and Power, Local and External Dimensions. Journal of Modern African Studies 26 (3): 437–55.

Burma, democracy movement

A. May-Oo Mutraw

The origins of Burma's struggle for democracy are subject to debate. Historians disagree as to the factors that brought about the movement for change. To some extent it is accurate to conclude that each of the periodic movements was the result of backward leadership. Others argue that the country's economic and intellectual development could not keep up with the social and political demands of the time.

A member of the National League for Democracy Party holds a portrait of General Aung San, the esteemed negotiator of Burmese independence from Great Britain in 1947 and father of Aung San Suu Kyi, a pro-democracy political prisoner under house arrest since 1990. (AFP/Getty Images)

Britain's final annexation of Mandalay in 1885 ended the Burman monarchy and feudalism by early 1886. In early British Burma a state of lawlessness contributed to the animosity between the Burman ethnic group and the rest of the population. One contemporary historian, Thant Myint-U, observed that "Burmese nationalism as it developed in the early 20th century [was] a big problem, and [nationalism] sees [Burma] as basically 'Burmese' with ethnic minorities either as nice museum pieces or problems to be 'managed' or 'foreigners' to be expelled (like the Indians and Anglo-Burmans)." Thereafter, the independence movement came in the 1920s – some of the most vibrant years in Burma.

In light of Burma's composition of solidly diverse ethnic groups, as Burma strived for independence, Aung San (a well-known Burman leader highly regarded as the architect of Burma's independence, and father of Aung San Suu Kyi) proposed the idea of a federal union. Considering the importance of the development of culture and national identity on the one hand, and the importance of freedom on the other, such an idea was compelling; and so the endeavor to establish a federal union or Pyidaungsu was born. However, many ethnic Burman leaders at the time saw a solid unitary state as the only option. This was true even as a significant amount of discussions and constitutional debates persisted about the establishment of a federal union at the time of the independence movement.

Neither British rule nor the independence movement necessarily led to democracy in Burma; in fact, British colonization and competing ethnic nationalisms were the fundamental cause of the first movements for change. It was those periodic movements that brought the idea of democracy closer to Burma. Historical as well as contemporary events in Burma illustrate two unpopular points about Burma: (1) the aspiration for democracy in Burma has always been understood only in majority ethnic Burman terms; and (2) democracy that excludes the interest of ethnic minorities – all other ethnic groups – and does not accommodate diversity will only result in disastrous political and economic instability.

Parliamentary Democracy and Ethnic Minorities (1952–1962)

Burma became independent from Britain in January 1948. The first constitution of independent Burma, known as the 1947 constitution, came into effect in 1948. Multi-party elections were held as Burma started to exercise parliamentary democracy. Because Burma had enjoyed a parliamentary democracy and an elected government with a free press in the 1950s, it has been argued that Burma was a place where democracy flourished. Ensuing events such as communist resistance and the Karen revolt after the elected government came into power in 1952 illustrated preventable but deliberate failures. Neither the constitution nor the leadership was prepared to deal with many of the realities in the country.

These were the years during which Burma faced the most uncertain future – ranging from ideological conflict between groups that were predominantly Burman, to the unaddressed question of ethnic minorities. Notwithstanding “equal participation toward the Union of Burma,” the majority of ethnic groups were marginalized. After the Communist Party of Burma commenced an armed revolution against the ruling parliamentary regime on the eve of Burma’s independence, the Karen people also took to the streets, demonstrating and demanding their right to equal participation in the Union on the basis of the principle of ethnic equality in 1949. Systematic militarization of the regions housing the majority of Burma’s minorities during the parliamentary era also gave a horrible impression of democracy to ethnic minorities. The growing political instability and discontent under the elected government resulted in the 1962 military coup led by General Ne Win.

Military Coups and Pro-Democracy Uprisings (1962–1988)

Analysts – Burmese and non-Burmese – often tend to evaluate the 1962 military coup orchestrated by General Ne Win as the end of democracy in Burma. The military men took several years to prepare their transformation into civilian government and adopted the Burmese Way to Socialism (Ne Win’s personal ideology) with a change of constitution in 1974. Burma came under the iron-tight rule of the former General Ne Win and his Burmese Socialist Programme Party (BSPP). This ensured the permanent death of any prospect for democracy, at least until 1988. For 26 years the socialist regime reigned and ruined the country – economically and politically. At the same time, the avoidance of the question of ethnic minorities and their demand for the right to self-determination and equal participation in the affairs of the Union continued. With the nationwide suppression of all the rights that might carry the slightest sense of democratic value, the socialist regime put the Tamadaw (Burma’s army) to good use handling the rebelling ethnic minorities. Ne Win also introduced the infamous Four-Cut Policy in 1968 – cutting supplies, communications, transportation, and the means to recruit, all of which targeted ethnic resistance. The Four-Cut Policy caused massive internal displacement, flows of refugees into neighboring countries, and destruction of hundreds of thousands of villages.

The BSPP nationalized industries and trade. Many critics of the regime claimed that the depth of the government’s intervention in the nation’s economy resulted in the disaster that led to a public protest in 1988. Although the nation at large ignored the aspect of civil war in the form of “ethnic rebellion,” the mismanagement of the country’s economy made it impossible for citizens to continue to be indifferent – until the 1988 uprisings occurred.

The popular 1988 uprisings began with an argument between a small group of students from the Rangoon Institute of Technology (RIT) and the township people over the music played in a café. The government mishandled the incident and overreacted by using riot police. On August 8, thousands of protesting students were gunned down by the military – the citizens of Burma were stunned and outraged. The situation only got worse as leaders, including Aung San Suu Kyi, viewed the situation as “the concern of the entire nation.” An American Congressman offered his observation, saying: “Burma could plunge into civil war if demands were not met since most rank-and-file-Burmese soldiers are sympathetic to anti-government protests” (Lintner 1990). However, there was no mention of the ongoing civil war in Karen State, Karenni State, Shan State, and Kachin State. Although the movement was nationwide, the demands were disjointed until thousands of students and non-students fled into the ethnic minority regions after the military coup in September 1988. For many citizens of Burma, entering into these areas – mostly war zones – was an epiphany.

Democracy Movements and Ethnic Minorities

The year 1988 was significant in Burma’s contemporary history of social movements for at least two reasons. First, nationwide protests demanded a total change – both of the political system and of people who had been in power for too long. Demonstrators all over the country demanded a change from the “Burmese way of socialism” to democratic rule. They specifically asked for free and fair elections and democracy be “reinstalled,” and wanted no military in the government. The 1988 uprising was what seemed to create a semi-permanent chasm between the military (the Tamadaw) and the rest of the country, with almost no prospect to reconcile the two. Second, the military coup (following violent crackdowns against the demonstrations) broke down some walls isolating ethnic minorities from the Burman majority and the rest of the country. Many Burmese/Burman students, monks, lay persons, and even some defecting Burmese soldiers from the government army fled into areas controlled by armed ethnic resistance groups in order to escape the massive retaliation by the military regime. As many Burmese/Burmans penetrated ethnic resistance-controlled areas, they frightened villagers along the way simply because they were ethnic Burmans. This was an enlightening moment for ethnic minorities and ethnic Burmans – the city-dwellers. Burmese/Burman politicians and political activists began to learn about the plight of Burma's ethnic minorities that they had failed to acknowledge over the previous 40 years. The focus of the movement began to change – from pressing for mere democracy, to demanding a democratic federal union.

The 1990s were years of rebuilding a much-needed understanding between ethnic minorities and ethnic Burmans. When the general elections took place in May 1990, as promised by the State Law and Order Restoration Council (SLORC), the election was held relatively successfully, fairly, and freely. The National League for Democracy (NLD), led by Aung San Suu Kyi, won a landslide victory and was eager to take power. Unfortunately, the ruling regime, which changed its name to the State Peace and Development Council, has refused to transfer power as of 2008.

Under the current military regime, two general approaches to a democratic Burma can be witnessed. One is led by the military government and the other is loosely led by the National League for Democracy under the leadership of Aung San Suu Kyi. Both are the result of the 1988 political upheavals that demanded democracy. Both attempts for transition to democracy have progressed little since that memorable time – in structure or content. The prevailing movement among the ethnic minorities to establish a democratic union based on the federal principle has always been an afterthought, although the mainstream movement for democracy (as well as the military regime) does not fail to rhetorically address the importance of establishing a union.

If democracy, in fact, is a set of rules and institutions that allow the people a hand in their own government – elections, referenda, legislatures, and the like – it is apparent that Burma's efforts for transition to democracy need some major adjustments. Democracy is irrefutably a desired value for many in Burma; however, to understand democracy as merely a contest for power through elections is too simplistic for a situation as complex as Burma's. In a broader context, Burma's movement for democracy should be seen and understood as a movement towards a peaceful union, firmly built on the principles of federalism and democracy. In other words, for Burma, democracy is an element of a larger struggle. In order for a relatively successful transition to a democratic Burma to be accomplished, the military regime, as well as the non-ethnic democracy movement, must devise a system that can accommodate the nation's rich diversity both structurally and politically.

SEE ALSO: Aung San (1915–1947); Burma, National Movement Against British Colonial Rule; Student Movements, Global South

References and Suggested Readings

- Callahan, M. P. (2003) Making Enemies: War and State Building in Burma. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Lintner, B. (1990) Outrage: Burma's Struggle for Democracy. Chonburi: White Lotus Press.
- Myint-U, T. (2001) The Making of Modern Burma. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Myint-U, T. (2006) The River of Lost Footsteps. New York: Farrar, Straus, & Giroux.
- Reynolds, A. (Ed.) (2002) The Architecture of Democracy: Constitutional Design, Conflict Management, and Democracy. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Smith, M. (1999) Burma: Insurgency and the Politics of Ethnicity. London: Zed Books.
- Win, U. K., Han, U. M., & Hlaing, U. T. (1990) Commission to Re-write True History. In Nationalities' Affairs and the 1947 Constitution. Rangoon: University of Rangoon Press.

Burma, national movement against British colonial rule

Nupur Dasgupta

The genesis of the Burmese nationalist movement can be traced to the urban-elitist Young Men's Buddhist Association (YMBA) movement of 1906. However, Adas (1974), Ghosh (2000), and others have located anti-British protests in nineteenth-century rural uprisings, stigmatized as banditry. This changed perception relates to the agency of the vast rural mass in Burma, who lost their political voice over the years under the British military state.

Young Men's Buddhist Association

The annexation of the Irrawaddy delta region by the British in 1852 was followed by nearly half a century of local uprisings mainly led by the displaced thugyis (traditional village chiefs) and myothugyis (township heads), pongyis (Buddhist preachers), and the displaced officials of the court of the Konebaung dynasty. It had taken the British over five years after the Third Anglo-Burmese War (1886) to bring about order in the countryside. The legacy of these unorganized and largely localized uprisings left a tradition of anti-colonial resistance, which would reach a peak in the 1920s and 1930s.

Formal public movements began in Burma with the founding of the YMBA by a group of English-educated middle-class Burmese youth such as U Ba Pe, Maung Maung Gyi, and Maung Hla Pe. It was an attempt at retaining Burmese cultural identity within the British rule to which its members expressed loyalty at the 1917 Henzada conference held at Moulmein. The major demands comprised free and compulsory education for Burmese youth, social reform, and adherence to the Pancashila (the five Buddhist precepts). By 1911 the organization had launched the English-language Burman-Buddhist Weekly and the vernacular Thuriya (Sun). The first largescale protest against the colonial presence began over a religious issue, as the Burmese saw the British not just as a threat against their culture and religion, but against the oneness and totality of the universe in the Burmese Buddhist concept. In 1916 the YMBA staged sustained protests against the use of footwear in the precincts of Buddhist pagodas without any exception made for foreigners. The colonial government was forced to accept it. This marked the first success of the YMBA. Buddhism remains central to Burmese concepts of nationalism and purity to this day (Gravers 1999: 7–9).

General Council of Buddhist Associations: Wunthanu Movement

The first politically nuanced movement of protest began in Burma in 1918 in view of the proposed Montague-Chelmsford reforms under the aegis of the slowly transforming YMBA. A split took place in the YMBA. Two veterans, U Ba Pe and Maung Gyi, decided to accept the Montague-Chelmsford reform and participate in the elections, and for this purpose founded new parties – the 21 Party and the Progressive Party, respectively. The YMBA, which by then had 45 branches, remained under younger radical leaders – U Chit Hlaing, Tharrawaddy U Pu, and U Tun Aung Kyaw.

The YMBA movement entered a new phase with the participation of a Buddhist monk, U Ottama, who had been exposed to the Gandhian movements in India in the 1920s and was labeled as “Mahatma of Burma.” U Chit Hlaing organized meetings and accompanied U Ottama on tours in the districts, preaching the ideas of nationalism and self-rule. The YMBA was also quick to provide leadership to the 1920 Rangoon University students’ strike against the authorities over the University Bill. They received support from parents, school teachers, and veteran political leaders. Thus the YMBA began tapping the reserves of the student community for the first time. From the 1920s the YMBA, which was transformed into the General Council of Buddhist Associations (GCBA), was led by U Ottama and U Chit Hlaing, who spearheaded a district-level boycott and self-rule movement by setting up district-level patriotic bodies, known as Wunthanu (protector of national interest or family, race, and lineage) Athins (local associations). This was the third force within the nationalist forum that carried the legacy of the nineteenth-century grassroots sentiments revitalized with new economic and social issues. U Ottama was inspirational for the involvement of Buddhist monks in mainstream politics. He was arrested in 1921 for his anti-British speeches. With the formal introduction of the diarchy in Burma the YMBA declared a permanent boycott of the diarchy reforms and local government which “graduated to non-cooperation” (Maung Maung 1980: 43). The British government passed the Anti-Boycott Act in 1923.

The late 1920s witnessed district-level agitation and the active involvement of the Buddhist Sangha (Order) in politics. The political forum of the General Council of Sangha Sammeggi branched out into local bodies, called the Sangha Sammeggi Apwe. This was also the phase which witnessed an increasing flow of newspaper publications, both in English and the vernacular. The Wunthanu Athins and Konmayi Athins (women's patriotic organizations) were active in organizing local rural protest over economic issues, including demands for the repeal of the Village Act, capitation tax and the Thatameda (poll) tax, and other specific demands. The peasant uprising thus assumed a constitutional form with a nationalist goal. The religious messages for the grassroots of Burma were interspersed with political overtones. This method of protest was similar to that of the Gandhian principle of satyagraha (a program of peaceful violation of specific laws and boycott of colonial institutions). Some of the branches took the shape of secret societies like the ones headed by Thet Kywe, the leader of 11 Wunthanu Athins. The boycott of circle boards and Legislative Councils elections in 1922 and 1925 were extremely successful (Moscotti 1974: 123–4; Maung Maung 1980: 43). Government repression came in the form of force and constitutional measures. The village centers of Wunthanu activities faced strong government repression. Arrests, quick trials on the spot, strong sentences for rigorous convictions, and police atrocities affecting whole villages weakened the movement by 1927 and it was concomitant with the period of worst conditions for the rural economy and a crisis in national leadership. The GCBA had witnessed a further split in its organization in 1925 and the party was now led by So Thein, a radical leader who maintained close association with young dhammakatikas (Buddhist radicals) and district-level lay leaders. U Chit Hlaing had opted out and formed the new organization Innya Minya Thanbanda Apwe. The Sangha elders in the meantime broke up with So Thein and had also set up a separate faction at Rangoon. The waning of the sincerity of the members, failure of a successful central leadership, scandalous activities of the leaders, and loss of the members to government prisons, Councils, or death, led to the dwindling of the Wunthanu movement by 1929.

1930s: Waves of Movements

In the turbulent 1930s Burma was swayed by waves of labor riots and student movements, as well as the famous and last of the old form of millenarianist grassroots rural upsurge led by Saya San in 1930–2. It is important to note that all these developments from the 1930s were related to the economic conditions confronting Burma, when the rice business was hit hard by the Great Depression. The Sipmae Baho (Central Economic) Committee formed by Burmese landowners and rice mill owners put forward proposals to the government for relief measures, especially by regulating the price of paddy which was falling rapidly. But this was to no avail. Together with the government's determination to go ahead with plans for imposing the Thatameda (household and fuel taxes), this led to the Saya San rising in the countryside. Economic depression continued and multitudes of peasants, now landless, flocked to the cities in search of laboring jobs. Clashes between the already entrenched non-Burman Coringhee (persons from Coringa, a seaport of southern India) labor and the swelling bands of Burmese laborers exploded in the form of widespread labor and racial riots (the Coolie Riots) in the early 1930s.

Youth Movements

The year 1930 may be seen as a watershed. It marked the beginning of a new phase of the national movement in Burma, leading to new directions, especially towards youth movements. A few small cultural bodies appeared on the scene, reminiscent of the YMBA but secular in nature. In 1925 a few middle-class Burmese serving under the colonial government founded the Friendly Correspondence Club, which graduated into the Youth Improvement Society in 1926. By 1930 a subtle change took place in its composition and aims. Tats (voluntary groups), particularly oriented to the physical training of young men, were set up under the leadership of U Maung Gyi. These caught the imagination of the youth and multiple Tats spread to the districts, organizing regular drills and social services, later known as the Green Army. The All Burma Youth League was also founded in 1930 by school teachers and college students. By the mid-1930s the League openly led revolutionary nationalist movements. It was at the First All Burma Conference of the Youth League in 1934–5 that the new organization with wider visions – the Dobama Asiayone (We-Burmans Association) – was established by Ko Ba Thuang, a translations tutor at Rangoon University. He used his own funds to produce pamphlets spreading nationalist ideas. The tone of the writings in these pamphlets was revolutionary and classically political. Dobama (We Burmans) was also the rallying cry in the Coolie Riots. Dobama members Ko Ba Thaug, Ko Hla Baw, and other young men organized mass rallies and raised the Peacock flag in memory of the Coolie Riots. The members, consisting of college students, tutors, businessmen, and clerks in government offices, used the title Thakin (a prefix which literally meant Master). The Dobama or the Thakin Party inspired the new generation and was instrumental in the fundamental transformation which occurred in the Burmese nationalist movement during the decade prior to World War II, i.e., the emergence of a mass nationalist party. The young Burmese men who joined the party set the trend of delivering public speeches, soon banned by the government. They were arrested but acquitted in trials where they were helped by young Burmese legal professionals. Within a short time a number of branches were set up in the districts. By 1936, when the second conference was held in Myingyan, the Dobama had emerged as a nationwide mass organization. The Thakins passed the resolution to contest the coming elections and formed the Komin-Kochin Party (Our King and Our Kin Party). All these acquired significance when Burma came directly under the British Parliament with the enactment of the 1935 Government of Burma Act. Dr. Ba Maw and U Ba Pe became prominent figures under the new system. In 1936 Ba Maw formed his Sinyetha Wunthanu (Poor Man's) Party and keenly contested the general election held in December. U Ba Pe's United GCBA won the largest number of seats. However, Ba Maw, an astute politician, soon made alliances and emerged as the first prime minister of the Dominion of Burma.

Students' Movements

The years 1936–8 witnessed the widening of the sphere of student participation in active politics. It was in fact from 1934 onwards that the more radical students had begun to join the Dobama Asiayone. The Rangoon University Students' Union (RUSU), founded in 1926, was evolving as a more active, socially oriented body in the 1930s. The student community was changing in character with exposure to new ideologies. Ko Tun On, Ko Kyaw Nyein, and Ko Thein Pe were the famous trio who imparted nationalist color to the Union. The students were establishing contacts with the important leaders in the Rangoon community, the Gampaka (trustees) of the Shwedagon Pagoda. They had begun an economic drive to contribute funds to the people suffering in the Dry Zone in the central part of the country. The newly elected president of the union in 1935–6, Ko Nu, delivered a highly nationalist speech at the presidential inauguration. Rangoon University threatened to expel both Ko Nu and Ko Aung San, the secretary of the union, for refusing to reveal the author of the article Hell Hound At Large, which criticized a high official of the university in 1936. A massive students' strike forced the university to retract. The students steered into the wider arena of politics. Among them was young Aung San, who would emerge as the foremost nationalist leader in the years to come. In 1937 the Students' Union set up the Thanmani Tat or the Steel Tat, a Green Army organization. This was also the phase when the student leaders were drawn to communist ideology. Marxist literature was smuggled into Burma. The Socialist Club was formed under the RUSU in early 1938. The club later shifted under the Dobama Asiayone headquarters in Yegyaw.

The period 1938–9 witnessed the waning of Dobama activities and popularity, as eventually it split (in November 1938), with a section of older members emerging as conservative nationalists, while their opponents favored leftist politics. Student organizations continued and concerned themselves with political and economic issues like the passing of the Tenancy Bill, Land Alienation Bill, Lower Burma Land and Revenue Amendment Bill, and the Measuring Basket Bill. A series of reports and comments were published by Aung San. He had resigned from the RUSU and joined the Dobama and participated in the Thakins' initiative to organize workers' movements. The workers of the Burma Oil Company joined in a strike in October 1937. This gave a signal for further combined labor and student strikes under the direction of Thakin leaders. The Ba Maw government came under serious criticism from the nationalists for compromising with British interests on all counts. A general All Burma Congress was planned, synchronizing workers' and peasants' movements in January 1939. By the end of February 1939, 34 strikes had been organized involving 17,645 workers from the oil fields, dockyards, steamer services, and small factories. At the same time there were widespread school strikes. Protests broke out over police atrocities. The main thrust of the students' mass movements was to put pressure upon the government. In 1939 Ba Maw's government was defeated in the House of Representatives.

Emergence of the Freedom Bloc

World War II sparked off a new phase of Burmese nationalist agitation which was fraught with the contrasting aims of multiple parties. Leaders of the Communist Party of Burma (CPB) Thakin Than Tun and Thakin Soe, while in Insein prison in July 1941, had co-authored the Insein Manifesto, which called for temporary coalition with the British, identifying fascism as the main enemy in the coming war. This was counter to the prevailing anti-British feeling among the nationalists led by the Thakins, who strongly resented the British decision to enter Burma in the war. Meanwhile, Soe had already gone underground to organize resistance to the Japanese Occupation. The country was put in a state of war. Defense laws and regulations were clamped down on the people. The nationalists began to plan their anti-British wartime strategies. The Sinyetha Wunthanu Party of Ba Maw and the leftist Thakin or Dobama Party, along with the Students' Organization, formed the Freedom Bloc in October 1939 with Dr. Ba Maw as the "dictator" and Aung San as secretary. In the first few months the Freedom Bloc organized mass meetings and demonstrations in Rangoon. At the February 1940 session of the Burmese Legislature, Freedom Bloc's resolution for the complete independence of Burma was defeated by opposition from all non-Burman members. Thwarted on the constitutional front, the Freedom Bloc began to agitate. Thakin leaders intensified their movement and organized a conference in 1940 in the Tharrawaddy district. The Sinyetha Party had its meeting in Mandalay, which lasted for three days and was attended by over 15,000 people. Government repression was heavy, leading to the prevention of meetings and arrests of a number of leaders. Ba Maw, Ba Pe, Ba U, Ba Thi, and Thakin Nu were sent to jail. Aung San and some of his colleagues averted arrest and went to India and then to China. The Japanese were in search of a foothold in Southeast Asia since 1940 after the opening of the Burma Road. They eventually contacted Aung San and his colleagues.

In the years between 1941 and 1944 the ideological ambivalence of the nationalists was reflected in their tactical and political actions. The confusion was sharpened with divisions within their own ranks. The choice before the Burmese nationalists was between collaboration with the Japanese or resistance. While the communist leaders were strengthened in their anti-fascist resolve on ideological grounds, the nationalists saw the war as an event leading towards freedom at any cost.

War, Japanese Occupation, and the Burma Independence Army

U Maung Maung (1969) claimed that some time in January–February 1941 Aung San had drafted the Blueprint for Burma, a controversial document of the Thakin Party which apparently set down the vision of the radical leaders for the future of Burma. The manifesto declared the party's resolution for complete freedom of Burma and the introduction of a free, independent people's democratic republic with a dictatorship, on the ground that western democracy was a sham democracy. How far the message in this manifesto represented Aung San's real aims is a debated issue (Silverstein 1996: 218–19). The vision contained in the manifesto appears blurred with contrasting aims, especially in comparison with the stand he adopted later. Houtman (2007) has sharply criticized the inclusion of this document in Aung San's writings, claiming with some evidence that Maung Maung did this to justify Ne Win's dictatorship with reference to Aung San and his popularity. It should be noted that Aung San considered the Japanese and the British both as fascists, and neither as role models.

Aung San and his colleagues were trained in Japanese-occupied Hainan Island and formed the Burma Independence Army (BIA). The BIA accompanied the invading Japanese force into Burma, with "30 comrades" led by General Aung San. It fought a few wars on the northern frontier and became the living symbol of Burmese nationalism in these early days of the war. Aung San's aims, however, were not realized. The Thakins' expectation that the Japanese would immediately recognize Burma's independence and treat the new nation as an ally in the war was shattered. And the Japanese took more than a year to declare an independent Burma. Seeds of doubt were sown in the minds of Aung San and his colleagues. However, they were not in a position to retrace their steps.

Shadow of Independence: Anti-Japanese Movement

Burma was proclaimed "a fully independent and sovereign State" on August 1, 1943. Ba Maw, installed as the Adipadi (head of state), displayed his indebtedness by declaring war on the "Anglo-Americans." The Axis countries, Japan, Germany and Italy, recognized Burma's "independence"; however, doubts were growing in the minds of the Burmese leaders about its nature and extent. A whole year of Japanese occupation was enough to alienate the people. The Japanese army lived off the land and the peasants were pressed to provide supplies of rice and food which were transported outside the country to feed the army. This meant prolonged starvation for the Burmese and famine broke out. The transport system and infrastructure had been cut down by the retreating British army, following scorched earth tactics. The puppet Burmese government under Ba Maw admittedly worked under serious constraints. It had no resources of its own and borrowed the paper currency from the Japanese, who reaped all the essential benefits. The confusion and ambivalence nagging the Burmese nationalists in this phase is reflected in the writings of U Maung Maung. He wrote that independence was empty and the Burmese nationalist leaders as well as the general people knew it – but it gave them some self-respect.

However, by 1944, anti-Japanese feeling overrode all other considerations. Aung San, the defense minister in the Ba Maw government and the commander of the Burma army, emerged at the nucleus of the anti-Japanese movement. At the celebration of the first anniversary of Ba Maw government in 1944, Aung San declared in his speech that Burmese independence was only a paper independence, and a long and hard road still had to be trod. An anti-Japanese resistance movement gathered force from the middle of 1944. During 1943 and 1944 the BIA made contacts with other political groups inside Burma such as the communists who had taken to the hills in 1942. Eventually, a popular front called the Anti-Fascist Organization (AFO) was founded by the CPB led by Thakin Soe, the BNA, led by Aung San, and the People's Revolutionary Party, later renamed the Socialist Party, led by U Nu, at a secret meeting in Pegu in August 1944 to resist the Japanese Occupation. The nationalists were eventually able to make contact with the British Force 136 in India through the communists and the Arakan Defense Army. Lord Mountbatten supported the AFO-led movement. In March 1945 the BIA was transformed into the Burma National Army (BNA) and launched resistance against the Japanese, while the Axis powers were collapsing on all fronts. The Allied troops entered Burma with full support from the AFO and the BNA and the expulsion of the Japanese was completed by May 1945. The military administration was withdrawn. The AFO was transformed into the Anti-Fascist People's Freedom League (AFPFL) on August 19, 1945, under the leadership of Aung San.

Reimposition of British Rule

British rule was reintroduced in Burma with Sir Reginald Dorman-Smith's appointment as governor with full executive and legislative powers by His Majesty's Order-in-Council, dated September 8, 1945. The governor declared in his first public speech in Rangoon on October 17, 1945 that the British had returned with a new approach to old problems and a definite and practical program of offering Burma the same degree of freedom as enjoyed by Great Britain itself. However, the words were hollow and the Burmese nationalists were impatient. The White Paper on the Burma Statement of Policy by His Majesty's Government, 1945 was denounced by the Burmese as reactionary. A head-on collision was inevitable between the British governor and the most popular nationalist front, the AFPFL, over the issue of the power of representation in the government and the function of the new Executive Council as a National Provisional Government. The AFPFL was shunned by Dorman-Smith and the new council of 11 members was formed without representation from the most popular party.

The League, however, had the people behind it and commanded the widest membership. The large and growing force of ex-soldiers and guerrillas, who joined the party, formed into the People's Volunteer Organization (PVO) and operated like a patriotic military force. As the clamor for independence grew in magnitude the governor's de facto powers waned. The PVO drilled with dummy rifles outside Rangoon. It was an impossible situation. Aung San decided to go to London and plead Burma's case before the new Labor Cabinet in 1946, but was stopped from leaving Burma by the governor. The news of the situation in Burma had reached the House of Commons and questions were raised. In 1946 the AFPFL called a general strike of workers and government personnel to demonstrate the strength of the people's will. The government in Britain under Prime Minister Clement Attlee replaced Dorman-Smith with Hubert Rance, who was more astute, liberal, and aware of Burmese sentiment.

Transfer of Power

A new Executive Council was formed with Aung San as deputy chairman. The transfer of power was planned to be in a gradual manner, but the intentions of the British were now clear. Attlee's ministry had paved the way for India's independence. It had also initiated the negotiations for the independence of Burma and Ceylon and the genesis of the British Commonwealth.

The nationalists in the Executive Council were preparing for the transfer of power. They were now concerned with the more pressing job of consolidating Burma's future. Plans for economic development were proposed. Consolidation of the different ethnic communities and minority groups into a union was the goal. Aung San spent time touring the remote parts of the country, getting acquainted with the people. He and his colleagues were invited to England at this juncture. During the negotiations Aung San asked for the full freedom of all races in his country within a year. Attlee promised to see the Burmese people attain their self-government by the quickest and most convenient time possible (Isaacs 1947: 145–9). The Aung San-Attlee Agreement was signed in January 1947. Elections were held in April of that year. The AFPFL won an overwhelming victory at the polls. The general feeling was inclined towards a Burmese Union. The new Constituent Assembly sat down to work on June 17, 1947 and moved the resolution to define the basic principles for the constitution. Events were moving fast towards realization of the goal, but an event of great magnitude halted this process. On July 19, 1947 Aung San and six of his colleagues were shot to death by a group of assassins while in a meeting at the secretariat. The plot was thought to have been masterminded by U Saw, the ex-premier (1940–2), who had been implicated in conspiring with the Japanese and exiled by the British to Uganda during the war years. The perpetrators were arrested and sentenced to death. The AFPFL ploughed ahead in this dire situation. Thakin Nu was nominated as the deputy president of the League and president of the Constituent Assembly. In November 1947 the Nu-Attlee Treaty was signed in England and Attlee introduced the Burma Independence Bill in the House of Commons. On January 4, 1948 the Union of Burma came into existence as a sovereign, independent republic outside the British Commonwealth of Nations.

SEE ALSO: Bose, Subhas Chandra (1897–1945); Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand (1869–1948); Saya San (Hsaya San) Movement of the 1930s

References and Suggested Readings

- Adas, M. (1974) The Burma Delta: Economic Development and Social Change on an Asian Rice Frontier, 1852–1941. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.
- Ghosh, P. (2000) Brave Men of the Hills: Resistance and Rebellion in Burma, 1824–1932. London: Hurst.
- Gravers, M. (1999) Nationalism as Political Paranoia in Burma: An Essay on the Historical Practice of Power. London: Routledge Curzon.
- Houtman, G. (2007) Aung San's lan-zin, the Blue Print and the Japanese Occupation of Burma. In K. Nemoto (Ed.), Reconsidering the Japanese Military Occupation in Burma (1942–45). Tokyo: Tokyo University of Foreign Studies.
- Ileto, R. (1999) Religion and Anticolonial Movements. In N. Tarling (Ed.), The Cambridge History of Southeast Asia, Vol. 2. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Isaacs H. R. (Ed.) (1947) New Cycle in Asia: Selected Documents on Major International Developments in the Far East, 1943–1947. New York: Macmillan.
- Maung Maung, U. (1969) Burma and General Ne Win. London: Asia Publishing House.
- Maung Maung, U. (1980) From Sangha to Laity: Nationalist Movements of Burma 1920–1940. New Delhi: Manohar.
- Moscotti, A. D. (1974) British Policy and the Nationalist Movement in Burma 1917–1937. Honolulu: University Press of Hawaii.

- Silverstein, J. S. (1996) The Idea of Freedom in Burma and the Political Thought of Daw Aung San Suu Kyi. Pacific Affairs, 69 (2): 211–28.
- Stockwell A. J. (1999) Southeast Asian War and Peace: The End of European Colonial Empires. In N. Tarling (Ed.), The Cambridge History of Southeast Asia, Vol. 2. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Taylor, R. H. (1987) The State in Burma. London: Hurst.

Burschenschaften

Matthew B. Conn

Burschenschaften refer to German student fraternities or clubs that became politically active following the Napoleonic wars of national liberation. The first political student fraternity formed at Jena on June 12, 1815, and its members sought freedom and national unity. Branches also formed in Berlin, Halle, and Heidelberg. Members demonstrated their nationalism by expressing the motto: “Honor, Freedom, and Fatherland.” They wore traditional German costumes, and adopted the colors worn by patriotic volunteers in the Wars of Liberation – black, red, and gold. Important leaders such as Karl Follen drew inspiration from the French Revolution and its ideals, in particular, popular sovereignty.

The radical student fraternities are perhaps best known for their participation in the 1817 festival held near Wartburg Castle. The original occasion, planned by the Jena Burschenschafiler, planned for a two-day celebration (October 18–19) commemorating both the third centenary of Martin Luther’s nailing his thesis to a church door in Wittenberg, and also the fourth anniversary of the Battle of Leipzig. What began as a national conference of student radicals quickly turned into a mass celebration of virulent German nationalism. Students built bonfires on to which they piled various symbols of despotism, including a corporal’s walking stick and a French corset. Most notably, the students piled books onto the flames – in particular works by foreign or “un-German” authors, as well as Prussian police laws and the Code Napoléon. Although only approximately 500 students attended the Wartburgfest, it served as a key moment of social protest by the German youth.

The year 1819 marked a turning point for the Burschenschaften. On March 23, 1819, the theology student Carl Ludwig Sand stabbed to death the reactionary writer (and tsarist apologist) August von Kotzebue in the latter’s Mannheim home. Sand was a disciple of Karl Follen, and it is widely agreed that the latter had prior knowledge (if not direct influence) over the former’s action. The murder of von Kotzebue served as a pretext for conservative politicians to enact increasingly repressive policies. On September 20, 1819 the Austrian Chancellor Clemens von Metternich enacted the anti-liberal Carlsbad Decrees, which disbanded fraternities, forbade the wearing of “old German costumes,” and censored all publications containing “breathtaking theories and infectious madness.” The final provision of the Decrees dealt with universities, and placed fraternities under surveillance. Prussian citizens were forbidden to study at “foreign” universities such as Jena; the Jena Burschenschaft disbanded on November 26, 1819.

Historians have found that there were different factions within the Burschenschaften, and have offered a general periodization of their development (Jarusch 1984). The most radical branches consisted of students at the universities of Jena and Giessen under the leadership of Karl Follen, and were commonly referred to as the Blacks. The first and perhaps most radical phase lasted between 1815 and 1819. During the second phase (late 1820s and 1830s) student demands were split between constitutional reform and a reform of university life. In the 1840s, the third (or Progress) phase of student protest called for equality and educational reform – these demands predated the March 1848 revolutions.

SEE ALSO: European Revolutions of 1848; Germany, Socialism and Nationalism; Student Movements

References and Suggested Readings

- Breuer, K. (2002) Constructing Germanness: The Student Movement from the Burschenschaft to the Progressbewegung, 1814–1849. PhD dissertation, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.
- Hartwig, W. (1986) Studentische Mentalität – Politische Jugendbewegung – Nationalismus: Die Anfang der deutschen Burschenschaften [Student Mentality, Political Youth Movement, Nationalism: The Origins of the German Burschenschaften]. Historische Zeitschrift 242: 581–628.
- Jarusch, K. (1984) Deutsche Studenten, 1800–1970. Frankfurt am Main: Suhrkamp.
- McClelland, C. (1980) State, Society, and University in Germany, 1700–1914. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Bussa (d. 1816) and the Barbados slave insurrection

Trevor Rowe

Bussa is the architect of Barbados's African Rebellion of 1816, an uprising that was crushed by the British colonial authorities and failed in the immediate objective of abolishing slavery, but which demonstrated the long-term effectiveness of popular insurrection in bringing the system to an end. Bussa's Rebellion of 1816 is a signal event in the fight toward emancipation in Barbados.

Born a free man in Africa, Bussa was captured and transported to Barbados in the late eighteenth century to work as a slave in the sugar cane fields. Bussa was a house slave who did not experience many of the hardships endured by field slaves who planted and harvested the cash crop. While some domestic slaves felt superior to field slaves and exposed plans for agrarian rebellions to gain favor with their masters, Bussa was exceptional. He apparently enjoyed the confidence of his master and the respect of the slaves. Given his age at capture and the amount of time it would have taken to learn the language and customs required of a house slave, he was likely a respected middle-aged man who nurtured the seeds of revolt by forming an alliance with agrarian workers as he planned a rebellion to end slavery.

Bussa planned to set the sugar cane fields on fire during April harvest season, when planters were complacent and most vulnerable to attack. This would sharply limit sugar exports and concretely damage the financial interests of plantation owners, jeopardizing their relations with traders. Plantation owners were caught off guard by the insurrection, as African slaves fought valiantly against troops of the colonial administration's First West India Regiment. The revolt spread quickly across Barbados and engulfed half the island. After four days, the colonial forces routed the slaves, executing Bussa and the agitators.

Nearly 100 Africans were killed in battle, 214 were executed by the colonial government, and another 123 men were sent into exile. While the uprising destroyed 25 percent of the year's cash crop, damaged property, and instilled fear among plantation owners, only two members of the First West India Regiment and one white were killed during the battle.

Several years later, in 1824, the House of Assembly granted slaves the right to own property and give evidence in courts and permitted owners to free slaves through manumission. The new legislation, however, allowed whites immunity from prosecution for killing slaves in the 1816 revolt and maintained the death penalty for any slave who threatened a white person.

SEE ALSO: Barbados and the Windward Islands, Protest and Revolt; French Caribbean in the Age of Revolution; Nat Turner Rebellion; Queen Nanny and Maroon Resistance; Vesey's Rebellion

References and Suggested Readings

- Hilary, H. M. (1990) A History of Barbados from Amerindian Settlement to Nation-State. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Hoyos, F. A. (1978) Barbados: A History from the Amerindians to Independence. London: Macmillan.

C

Cabanagem of Grão-Pará, Brazil, 1835–1840

Newton Ferreira da Silva

Cabanagem was one of the most important insurrections in Brazil's history. It took place in the province of Grão-Pará (currently the States of Pará and Amazonas) during the years 1835–40 and is known for the violence implemented in its ruthless suppression, during which 30,000 people – more than 35 percent of Grão-Pará's population in 1819 – were killed.

After a fairly calm independence process conducted by large-scale farmers in 1822, Brazil faced difficult economic and political circumstances. With the maintenance of slavery and the heavy demands of its crop exportation policy, Brazil did not alter its colonial production structure and all the social and economic inequalities of the colonial systems were transferred to the new period. The new government, suffering a lack of resources, was not financially able to provide the new state with institutions. Brazilian export products were passing through a deep crisis of demand, so the new empire could not increase export taxes. In order to solve this complicated situation, the government developed paper money. Inflation rates increased, and the whole society was obliged to pay for the losses caused by the export-related economic policy that favored the ruling class. However, the newly created middle class (soldiers, public servants, small owners and traders), the poor, and sectors of the ruling class not connected to export business were unwilling to accept impoverishment.

In this context the first emperor of Brazil, Dom Pedro I, abdicated and returned to Portugal. Between 1831 and 1840, the country was commanded by regents who maintained power until Dom Pedro II was able to assume control. It was a period full of social fermentation and political agitation – in nearly half of its provinces, rebellions and revolts exploded. Cabanagem was one of the most popular and successful of these movements.

Although the revolution of Cabanagem was characterized by massive participation of the poorest sectors of society – the cabanos were Indians, slaves, and mestizos (people of mixed race) who lived in huts near rivers – the middle class and some farmers took part in the rebellion as well. Of course their goals were quite different. The cabanos were trying to overcome their unbearable and miserable situation through the abolition of slavery, an end to the submission to the Portuguese class that was very powerful in that region, and the adoption of popular sovereignty, while the middle class was resisting the intense impoverishment that it had long been suffering.

In the beginning of the 1830s the province of Grão-Pará had already experienced social agitation, led by the priest Batista Campos and farmer Felix Malcher. The cabanos participated directly in these initial struggles. Concerned about the unstable situation in Grão-Pará, the regency government named Bernardo Lobo de Sousa president of the province. He assumed command of the region in December 1833 and started a violent repression against popular movements. Persecutions, arbitrary arrests, and murders were used to suppress any voice against the president, causing even more dissatisfaction and hatred among the population.

On January 6, 1835, the government's palace of Grão-Pará in Belém was surrounded by 200 cabanos. After they occupied the palace and killed Lobo de Sousa, Felix Malcher was proclaimed president of Grão-Pará. His short-lived government was controversial from the first day as he largely ignored cabanos demands. Accused of treason – he was negotiating surrender with the empire and asked people to drop their weapons – he was arrested and murdered. On February 22, 1835, Francisco Vinagre, a small landowner, assumed the presidency. Vinagre was the military chief of the cabanos and was more in tune with their desires and plans. Nevertheless, he behaved questionably as president: on one hand he gave the people hope concerning their demands, and on the other he recognized the regency power over Grão-Pará. Again, an environment of suspicion and distrust was created and the instability continued.

In June 1835 Diogo Feijó, regent of Brazil, helped by the British army and European mercenaries, sent the Brazilian navy to take Belém back from the rebels. The cabanos were expelled and fled to the countryside to reorganize. They initiated guerilla warfare and after ten days of struggle, on August 23, 1835, the cabanos retook Belém. On this occasion, in contrast to the first takeover, there was intense persecution of Portuguese merchants, seen as responsible for the poverty and abuse of the workers (mainly slaves and Indians).

Eduardo Angelim, who commanded the new invasion along with Antônio Vinagre (Francisco Vinagre's brother), became the third president appointed by the revolt. He tried to solve some of the province's most pressing problems, such as epidemics and the lack of food, which were decimating Grão-Pará's population. He built bakeries and butcher's shops in order to improve people's social conditions, but the economic embargo imposed by the central government on the province made it impossible to fulfill these aims. Although Angelim had made some attempt to improve the lives of cabanos, he was not willing to accept all of their demands – including the abolition of slavery. In the end, Angelim did not intend any great transformation in the lives of Indians and black people – those who had placed him and the other two cabanos presidents in power.

Militarily well organized but with many problems in their political constitution, the cabanos were unable to modify the structure of society. Divided and weakened, they could not resist the attack from the central government in May 1836. The empire recovered the capital and began a tough and severe policy of repression, torture, and killing. The cabanos survivors fled in disarray to the rural areas and tried to continue their resistance there, until the last leader of the great Cabanagem rebellion, Gonçalo Jorge de Magalhães, surrendered on March 25, 1840.

SEE ALSO: Brazil, Rebellions from Independence to the Republic (1700s–1889); Class Struggle; Mendes, Chico (1944–1988) and Amazonian Rainforest Protest and Resistance

References and Suggested Readings

- Prado Jr., C. (1975) Evolução Política do Brasil e outros estudos. São Paulo: Brasiliense.
- Ricci, M. (2006) Cabanagem, cidadania e identidade revolucionária: o problema do patriotismo na Amazônia entre 1835 e 1840. Available at www.scielo.br/scielo.php?pid=S1413-77042007000100002&script=sci_arttext&tlng=g.
- Santos, S. C. (2004) Cabanagem: crise política e situação revolucionária. Master's degree dissertation. Campinas: Unicamp.
- Werneck Sodré, N. (1967) Formação Histórica do Brasil. São Paulo: Brasiliense.

Cabañas, Lucio (1938–1974)

Benjamín Anaya González

The former leader of the Poor People's Party (Partido de los Pobres, PDLP), teacher Lucio Cabañas Barrientos was born in Atoyac de Álvarez on December 12, 1938 and killed in combat against the Mexican army in Tecpan de Galeana on December 2, 1974, both villages located in the southern state of Guerrero, Mexico.

Cabañas participated in a number of political movements. In addition to the PDLP, in which he worked with Octavino Santiago, Félix Bautista, Serafin Núñez, César Núñez Ramos, Inocencio Castro, and Jacob Nájera, he was active in the Communist Party (PC), the Revolutionary Action Movement (Movimiento de Acción Revolucionaria, MAR), the Revolutionary Teachers' Movement (Movimiento Revolucionario del Magisterio, MRM), with Othón Salazar, and the Guerrero Civic Association (Asociación Cívica Guerrerense, ACG), with Genaro Vázquez Rojas, in which he led the Atoyac branch. The regional director of the public education ministry sent Cabañas and Serafin Núñez to the northern state of Durango, where they organized protests. On their return to Guerrero, after several attempts at being recognized as a political organization, the ACG became the PDLP.

On May 18, 1967, as secretary of section 14 of the teachers' union, Cabañas led a protest when the head of an elementary school in Atoyac de Álvarez asked poor students for extra money. The protest became a massacre, for which the Guerrero government blamed Cabañas, prompting him to go underground. At that point the PDLP became primarily an armed guerilla group, operating mainly in the Sierra of Guerrero and finding support among peasants and farmers as well as students and teachers. Other organizations from Guerrero joined Cabañas and the PDLP, including the Peasant Organization of the Southern Sierra (Organización Campesina Sierra del Sur), the Guerrero People's Self-Defense Council (Consejo de Autodefensa del Pueblo de Guerrero), and radical students from the Autonomous University of Guerrero. After another massacre, this time at Tlatelolco on October 2, 1968, Cabañas intensified his actions.

From 1968 to 1974, Cabañas and the PDLP built up the movement with social support in the northern area of the state of Guerrero. They accepted help from other guerillas, including MAR (who had trained in North Korea) and the Revolutionary Armed Forces. The appearance of the September 23 Communist League (Liga Comunista 23 de Septiembre) in the PDLP's headquarters, however, marked a breaking point in Cabañas's struggle. He and his supporters had rallied around a peasant, Christian-oriented ideology focusing on poverty and dignity and saw little or no appeal in Marxism-Leninism, which was often hostile to Christianity. Thus they expelled the League's guerrilleros from their coalition.

In late May 1974, former Senator Rubén Figueroa Figueroa, who was running for governor, insisted on visiting Cabañas's headquarters. Figueroa and four other people were kidnapped by Cabañas but freed by military troops after three months. After being betrayed by Isabel Ramos, Cabañas and six other guerrilleros were killed by the army and the PDLP ceased to exist.

SEE ALSO: Latin America, Catholic Church and Liberation, 16th Century to Present; Tlatelolco 1968 and the Mexican Student Movement; Zapatistas, EZLN, and the Chiapas Uprising

References and Suggested Readings

- Suarez, L. (1985) Lucio Cabañas, el guerrillero sin esperanza. Mexico City: Grijalbo.
 Tort, G. (2005, dir.) The Guerrilla and the Hope: Lucio Cabañas. DVD. Mexico City: Macondo Cine.

Cabral, Amilcar (1924–1973)

Adebusuyi I. Adeniran

Pan-African socialist, poet, and revolutionary theoretician, Cabral was central to the establishment of the African Party for the Independence and Union of Guinea and Cape Verde (Partido Africano da Independência da Guiné e Cabo Verde, PAIGC) between 1956 and 1959. He also assisted Agostinho Neto (1922–1979) in creating a freedom party in Angola. Cabral was a major proponent of armed struggle in liberating African society from colonial rule, and is today considered to be one of the greatest cultural advocates of contemporary African society.

Amilcar (Lopes) Cabral was born in Bafata, Portuguese Guinea (Guinea-Bissau) on September 12, 1924. Amilcar's parents were of Cape Verde descent. His father, Juvenal Cabral, worked as a basic school teacher and opinion leader, while his mother, Iva Evora, primarily engaged in tailoring and community work.

Upon the death of Simoa Borges (Juvenal's adopted mother) in 1932, Juvenal, Iva, and young Amilcar returned to Cape Verde, where they remained throughout the difficult World War II period, which was marked by Portuguese dictator António de Salazar's disastrous financial policies that amplified the cost of living in creating scarcities of goods. Between 1940 and 1948, drought and famine led to the death of an estimated 55,000 Cape Verdeans. This and other related developments during Amilcar's formative years helped to shape his emancipatory philosophy later on.

Cabral attended Mendelo High School on São Vicente Island from 1941 to 1943. He thereafter proceeded to the Agronomy Institute in Lisbon on a scholarship in 1945, where he met his first wife, Maria Rodrigues, with whom he had two children: Iva Maria and Ana Luisa. At the Institute, among the books Cabral came across was Léopold Senghor's edited Anthology of the New Black and Malagasy Poetry (1948), which he confessed reassured him of the fact that "the Negro is (re)awakening everywhere in the world." He believed that it was imperative to return home: a view that similarly impacted other Negro students.

Amilcar Cabral, leader of the African Party for the Independence of Guinea and Cape Verde, gives an interview in Havana, Cuba, in 1970. Cabral, a leading African intellectual exponent of decolonization and socialism, was assassinated on January 20, 1973 outside his home in Conakry, Guinea, by Portuguese agents a few months before Guinea-Bissau declared its independence from Portugal. (AFP/Getty Images)

Cabral completed his studies at the Agronomy Institute in 1950 and began working in Santarem as an agronomist. During his time at the Institute, Cabral became involved notably in various African reinvention movements. He proposed searching for the real “African identity” that differentiated Africans from “the white.” This facilitated the establishment of the Center for African Studies. Cabral’s contributions to the activities of the Center were overtly anti-Eurocentric, drawing intermittent intrusion from the secret police (PIDE).

Upon his return to Guinea-Bissau in 1952, Cabral continued even more zealously with his anti-imperial endeavors, engaging and organizing the local indigenous population. His anti-colonial position led to his exile from Portuguese Guinea in 1955. He subsequently relocated to Angola, where he worked assiduously as a member of the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola (Movimento Popular da Libertação de Angola, MPLA), which was formed in 1956.

Meanwhile, Cabral and his colleagues were inspired to establish the PAIGC in 1956 by a confluence of events including the conference of a group of non-aligned African and Asian states in Bandung, Indonesia, and the commencement in 1955 of a militarized struggle between the Algerian National Liberation Front and the colonial government. Among his colleagues were Fernando Fortes, Aristides Pereira, Elisée Turpin, and Luis Cabral – Amilcar’s half-brother who eventually became the president of Guinea-Bissau upon independence in 1974.

In 1957, Cabral attended an anti-Portuguese colonialism meeting in France, and in 1960, he was a participant at the second conference of African peoples held in Tunis. The PAIGC began functioning in Bissau on September 19, 1959 as an underground outfit. Its main objectives were: to train armed fighters and party loyalists for the interior Guinean communities; to gather support from neighboring countries; and to secure foreign sympathy and patronage. Having operated outside the Republic of Guinea since its establishment, the PAIGC eventually launched an open militarized confrontation with the Portuguese colonialists on January 23, 1963 with the destruction of a military installation situated in southern Guinea-Bissau. By July 1963, the PAIGC took the battle to the northern flank of the country. The primary goal of the insurgency was to achieve liberation for both Portuguese Guinea and Cape Verde. By 1972, Cabral was already arranging for an Indigenous Assembly in anticipation of independence. However, disgruntled elements within the rank and file of the PAIGC, in active connivance with imperial Portuguese agents, assassinated Cabral on January 20, 1973 in the presence of his second wife, Ana Maria.

Paradoxically, the killing of Cabral brought no respite for the Portuguese colonial administration. Rather, the PAIGC insurgents persisted, gaining the upper edge in the ensuing altercation. On September 24, 1973, the PAIGC declared independence for Guinea-Bissau.

SEE ALSO: Agbekoya Peasant Uprising and Rebellion, 1968–1969; Algerian National Revolution, 1954–1962; Cape Verde, Independence Struggle; Fanon, Frantz (1925–1961); Guinea-Bissau, Nationalist Movement; MPLA (Movimento Popular de Libertação de Angola); Négritude Movement; Neto, Agostinho (1922–1979); Senghor, Léopold (1906–2001)

References and Suggested Readings

- Chabal, P. (1983) Amilcar Cabral: Revolutionary Leadership and People's War. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Chailand, G. (1969) Armed Struggle in Africa: With the Guerrillas in "Portuguese" Guinea. New York: Monthly Review Press.
- Chilcote, R. H. (1991) Amilcar Cabral's Revolutionary Theory and Practice: A Critical Guide. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner.
- Fobanjong, J. & Ranuga, T. K. (2006) The Life, Thought and Legacy of Cape Verde's Freedom Fighter Amilcar Cabral (1924–1973): Essays on his Liberation Philosophy. Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen Press.
- McCulloch, J. (1983) In the Twilight of Revolution: The Political Theory of Amilcar Cabral. Boston: Routledge & Kegan Paul.

Calvin, John (1509–1564)

Amy Hatmaker

John Calvin radically changed religious interpretations, restructured church organizations, and altered the relationship between the church and community governance. He was born July 10, 1509 in Noyon, France to a staunch Roman Catholic family. His father served as a bishop's secretary, and this relationship resulted in Calvin interacting with aristocrats and other influential people. Calvin received a humanist education in Paris. He studied theology and planned for the priesthood until his father requested in 1527 that he study law. That same year he switched to Lutheranism. Calvin completed his law degree in Orléans in 1532. When several of his reformist associates were persecuted for heresy, Calvin fled Paris. His Institutes on the Christian Religion, a defense of French Protestants, was published in 1536 in Basel. Following this he planned to move to Strasbourg; however, he was detoured through Geneva where a leading reformist Guillaume Farel used the threat of God's wrath to convince him to stay in Geneva and aid their struggle to make Geneva a Protestant city.

Calvin, using his beliefs as a guide, profoundly altered church and civil institutions in Geneva. Believing in strict biblical interpretation, he used a literal reading of the scripture to organize the church into a four-part hierarchical organization: pastors, teachers, elders, and deacons. Pastors preached the word, teachers studied and wrote, deacons oversaw the social welfare institutions, and elders governed in all moral matters. Calvin believed in predestination, the theory that only a select few were chosen by God for salvation, yet he added to this with the belief that the elect were obliged to govern over those who were not. Because of this belief, discipline became a central concern of the church. Calvin and Farel used this doctrine to impose a strict moral code on Geneva; initially Genevans rebelled against this, and Calvin lived in exile for a number of years until new city officials invited him back in 1540. After his return, Calvin restructured city government, making clergy part of the municipal decisions, especially in areas of civil discipline. Calvin based his organizational changes, both church and civil, on the theory of voluntary association, a belief that communities should choose their own members and that those members, in turn, elect to participate in that society. Calvin remained in Geneva until his death on May 27, 1564.

Due to Calvin's reforms, Geneva was the center of Protestantism by the mid-sixteenth century, attracting Europeans ejected from their own provinces. The Calvinist influence on foreign refugees is thought to be responsible for the quick spread of Calvinism throughout Europe. Calvinism would remain the dominant form of Protestantism throughout the seventeenth century.

SEE ALSO: Fox, George (1624–1691); Luther, Martin (1483–1546); Reformation; Wesley, John (1703–1791), Methodism, and Social Reform

References and Suggested Readings

- Bouwsmas, W. J. (1988) John Calvin: A Sixteenth-Century Portrait. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Calvin, J. (1975) John Calvin: Selections from His Writings. Missoula, MT: Scholars Press for the American Academy of Religion.
- Jones, S. (1995) Calvin and the Rhetoric of Piety. Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press.
- Kingdon, R. M. (1971) Social Welfare in Calvin's Geneva. American Historical Review 76, 1 (February): 50–69.
- Muller, M. (2000) The Unaccommodated Calvin: Studies in the Foundation of a Theological Tradition. New York: Oxford University Press.

Cambodia, anti-colonial protests, 1863–1945

Justin Corfield

During the 90 years of the French Protectorate of Cambodia (1863–1953) the French faced a number of challenges to their rule. They assumed rule on August 11, 1863 under the “Treaty of Friendship, Commerce, and French Protection,” signed by King Norodom (1834–1904). This treaty established the French Protectorate of Cambodia whereby the French would control foreign policy and defense matters, with the king maintaining his rule, albeit heavily restricted.

The first rebellion against the French actually began before the establishment of the Protectorate. An anti-French nationalist named Assoa led an armed uprising which lasted from 1862 until August 1866, when he was killed in the fighting. A former monk, he had claimed that he was the youngest son of Prince Ang Em. Although his royal lineage is extremely doubtful, the fact that he claimed it was to set the scene for further and more serious rebellions.

A much more significant revolt was led by another former monk, Poukombo, who also falsely claimed to be a prince. He rallied many supporters in Kompong Thom in central Cambodia, gaining support in 1865. The French denounced his rebellion as an illegitimate rebellion led by an opportunist, but it caused major trouble for the colonial power and their Cambodian supporters. Nervous that Norodom might be overthrown, the French had 700 marines, aided by gunboats and artillery, stationed in Phnom Penh.

In October 1866 Poukombo succeeded in defeating the Royal Cambodian army, killing the minister of the navy, who was in command. Many royal soldiers deserted, and Poukombo’s men then laid siege to Phnom Penh, a siege which was only lifted when French marines defeated the poorly equipped peasant army in January 1867. Poukombo’s men were forced to flee, with the French pursuing them into the mountains and Poukombo himself escaping to Laos. In November 1867 Poukombo received a petition from the people of the township of Kompong Thom, returning with 100 or so of his supporters to try to keep his revolt going. On arrival the party camped near the main monastery at Kompong Thom; when they awoke in the morning they must have suspected that they had been lured into an ambush. Poukombo retreated under a sacred fig tree, where he was surrounded by his supporters for protection against attack by the people from Kompong Thom. Poukombo escaped from the mêlée into the middle of a lake, where he was pursued by two slaves who beat him to death and brought his body back onto land. He was beheaded and the head was taken to Phnom Penh, where it was put on display.

Some of Poukombo’s men fled into the jungle and were later to join the revolt of Si Votha, the third uprising against the French. In 1877 Prince Si Votha, younger brother of King Norodom, decided that he had to try to eject the French. His revolt quickly petered out, but began again in 1883–4, gaining some support from a few of Poukombo’s lieutenants. Si Votha fought stubbornly and, because of his close palace connection, received help from many members of the royal family, though the French were never able to prove this.

The French imposed the convention of June 17, 1884 on Cambodia, forcing King Norodom to sign away customs duties to pay for the rising costs of the French presence. Norodom had clearly been reluctant to sign the treaty, but the presence of a French gunboat and the French governor-general of Cochin China, Charles Thomson, as well as a compliant interpreter, Son Diep, managed to persuade Norodom to concede. Even so, one of his close palace advisors, Kol de Monteiro, vigorously resisted, reportedly telling Norodom: “Sire, this is not a convention that is proposed to Your Majesty, this is an abdication.” The French escorted him away under armed guard, and, under increasing pressure, Norodom finally signed the convention.

Resistance grew after the signing of the convention. Prince Sisowath, hoping to claim the throne for himself, was anxious to deal with the French. Another contender for power, Prince Si Votha, immediately recruited more supporters from those who wanted to fight the French. By 1886 the French had taken control of only parts of the country, with Si Votha still proving troublesome, especially in Kompong Thom. French soldiers in the field suffered losses from cholera, dysentery, and malaria as much as from attacks by the rebels. They soon found themselves fighting a guerrilla war, and had to resort to harsh measures. It has been estimated that 40,000 peasants fled the fighting.

By late 1886, the French realized that they might have to compromise in order to win the war. They promised not to take control of provincial administration and to restrict the number of advisors (Résidents) to four: in Kampot, Kompong Svay, Kratié, and Pursat. In return Norodom issued a proclamation in favor of the French and promised his support. By this time the French had better knowledge of the country, and had also managed to win over Prince Sisowath as their firm ally in return for a promise to make him heir to the throne, ahead of Norodom's numerous children.

Although Si Votha's supporters were largely routed by the end of 1884, he did manage to keep his rebellion going along the Cambodian–Laotian border. In May 1890, Si Votha asked to meet with the French, who found him “in the most extreme misery,” wanting to live in France and worried about what Norodom might do to him if he returned to Phnom Penh. Si Votha died on December 31, 1891.

The revolts of Assoa, Poukombo, and Si Votha had many similarities. All three were led by men who were, or claimed to be, of royal heritage. Even if the connections of Assoa and Poukombo were invented, the fact that they chose to claim to be members of the royal family is important, as it showed that they believed that the peasants would only follow royal pretenders rather than any opponents of the French. This resulted in the French beginning to keep a closer eye on the royal family.

The French had long suspected Prince Duong Chakr and Prince Norodom Phanouvong of supporting Si Votha. Duong Chakr was seen by many as Norodom's possible successor, since his mother, Norodom's tenth wife, was the daughter of a senior mandarin and one-time chief minister of the Cambodian government. The French were never able to prove conclusively that Duong Chakr had helped Si Votha, but when he went to Paris to urge the French government to dismiss the head of their colonial administration there, they refused to allow him return to Cambodia. Duong Chakr went to Thailand, then returned to Paris. The French had him deported to Djelfa, Algeria, where he died on March 25, 1897.

The French maintained their interest in Prince Norodom Phanouvong, but another prince was inciting rebellion. Prince Norodom Mayura, another son of King Norodom, started criticizing the French in 1896 and working with the governor of Battambang, still under Siamese (Thai) rule, to stage a revolt. In March 1897 he was found guilty of treason and sentenced to death, but his sentence was commuted to life imprisonment. He was released in 1916 but had to remain in exile in Vietnam for the rest of his life. He died two years later.

A much more publicized incident concerned yet another son of Norodom, Prince Aruna Yukanthor. He was recognized by many as the crown prince of Cambodia, and was technically senior to Duong Chakr. His anger at the French, however, had a completely different origin than the others. The reason for his opposition to their rule was that the French were appointing people outside the traditional aristocracy to positions in the administration. The most important of these was a pro-French politician named Thiounn, who was to amass a vast fortune and incredible power in the service of the French as minister of the palace from 1898 to 1941. Prince Aruna Yukanthor failed to press his case in Phnom Penh and decided to follow the example of his half-brother, Duong Chakr, by heading to Paris. He arrived in 1900. The “Yukanthor Affair,” as it became known, led to the French refusing to allow Yukanthor to return to Cambodia, and he ended up in exile in Thailand. After a short stay in Singapore, he returned to Thailand, where he died in 1934.

At around this time, the French decided that, rather than exile all the troublesome princes and courtiers, it would be easier if they were given administrative positions. Kol de Monteiro had already been welcomed back into the government as minister of the navy, and in 1918 Prince Norodom Phanouvong, a former leading critic of the French, had become Akkamohasena (prime minister).

King Norodom died on April 24, 1904, and was succeeded by Prince Sisowath, who became King Sisowath and reigned until his death in 1927. Sisowath ruled over a much more peaceful Cambodia. Battambang and Siem Reap were reincorporated into the country. In 1914, when World War I broke out, the Cambodians sent about 2,000 men to Europe, some for combat duties, others in labor detachments. However, on their return, the French refused to allow them to form veterans' groups for fear that their military training and camaraderie would be used against them.

The next outbreak against the French was in 1925 when, on April 18, Cambodian villagers in Krang Leav, Kompong Chhnang, murdered the French Résident, Félix-Louis Bardez. Fifteen villagers were eventually found guilty of the murder, and three were sentenced to death. However, there were few protests against the French during the 1930s, unlike in neighboring Vietnam, where the Communist Party was active.

In April 1930, the first communist organization, a branch of the Chinese Communist Party, was founded in Cambodia. Located in Kampot, its organizers were Huynh Nghi and Lao Hun. The French were worried about this development, and when some 350 leaflets and posters were displayed in Kampot and nearby towns on July 31, they arrested three communists, followed by 36 others. Lao Hun was sentenced to ten years in jail, with Huynh Nghi getting five years. That same day, Vietnamese-language leaflets were distributed in Phnom Penh, organized by 24-year-old Ben Kraham (“Red” Ben) and two teenage Vietnamese school students, Sau Mel and Prak Sim. They were also arrested. Other attempts were made during the 1930s to try to establish communist groups among Cambodians, but they also ended in failure: most of the recruits came from the ethnic Vietnamese living in Cambodia, many of whom worked on the rubber plantations along the Cambodia–Vietnam border, such as at Chup, or in bureaucratic positions. Even Ben Kraham’s connection to the communist movement seems to have been through his wife, who was Vietnamese.

Cambodian opposition to the French during the 1930s was again connected with political machinations at the royal palace. King Sisowath had died in 1927 and his son, Sisowath Monivong, had become king. One of Monivong’s daughters, Kossomak, was married to Prince Norodom Suramarit, minister of the navy from 1929, and was becoming interested in nationalist ideas, centering on Son Ngoc Thanh, a Khmer Krom who had studied law in Paris on a government scholarship. Soon after Thanh’s arrival in Phnom Penh, he joined the Alumni Association of the Collège Sisowath (later Lycée Sisowath), although he had never attended the school. He also became deputy director of the Buddhist Institute and started working as a public prosecutor.

In 1936, Thanh began publishing Nagaravatta (Angkor Wat), the first-ever Khmer-language newspaper. Its editorial team included a World War I veteran, Pach Chhoeun, and Sim Var, later prime minister, and it was initially funded by Prince Suramarit. Though never anti-French, the newspaper was anti-colonial, arguing for greater opportunities for Cambodians in business and further education and equal treatment before the law. It played an important part in the foundation in 1938 of Yuvasala, a youth organization that promoted fraternal relations with Vietnam. In fact, Thanh viewed Thailand as a greater danger to the long-term safety of Cambodia than Vietnam.

In 1940, the fall of France to Nazi Germany after less than six weeks proved the inherent weakness of French military power, and hence its colonial rule. Thailand was able to defeat the French in Indochina and seize the provinces of Battambang and Siem Reap. Two senior members of the royal family, Prince Sisowath Monireth and Prince Sisowath Monipong, the two older sons of King Monivong, both served in the war. They returned to Cambodia to see that the French were forced by the Japanese to allow them to establish bases in Cambodia to use as a springboard for their attack on British Malaya in December 1941. King Sisowath Monivong, increasingly anti-French, died on April 23, 1941, and his 18-year-old great-nephew (son of Prince Suramarit), Prince Norodom Sihanouk, succeeded him as king. The French administration in Cambodia, as well as in neighboring Vietnam and Laos, was strongly pro-Vichy, supporting the pro-German government in France.

Protests against French rule started in Phnom Penh in July 1942. The French were concerned about the role played by Son Ngoc Thanh, Pach Chhoeun, and a Buddhist monk, Hem Chieu. When they arrested Hem Chieu, the act of taking a monk for trial in Cochin China angered many Cambodians, leading to a massive demonstration on July 20, 1942 involving up to 2,000 people and 500 monks. It became known as the “Umbrella Revolt” because of the large numbers of monks who held umbrellas to protect themselves from the heat of the day during the demonstration. The French reacted quickly and arrested many of the ringleaders, including Pach Chhoeun from the Nagaravatta newspaper and Bunchhan Mol (minister of religion in the early 1970s), sending them, along with Hem Chieu, to the French penal island of Poulo Condore off the coast of Cochin China. Son Ngoc Thanh went into hiding, and the Japanese were able to smuggle him to Tokyo. Hem Chieu died in prison in 1943, the year the French unveiled plans to Romanize the Khmer alphabet, which provoked massive protests from Buddhists and others.

On March 10, 1945, the Japanese staged a coup de force, overthrowing the French administration because they feared that, after the liberation of Paris in June 1944, the French in Indochina might try to support the Allies. King Sihanouk was unsure of what course of action to take, but after some vacillation, he was persuaded by his uncle Prince Monireth to proclaim the independent kingdom of Cambodia on March 12. Six days later Ung Hy, a longtime pro-French bureaucrat, became the first prime minister of Cambodia.

The immediate effect of the overthrow of the French – in Vietnam and Laos as well as in Cambodia – was the release of political prisoners, with Pach Chhoeun, Bunchhan Mol, and others returning to Phnom Penh. A number of political groups were also created soon afterwards. The best known was a youth group called the Greenshirts, which included many college students, the most important among them being Prince Norodom Chantaraingsey, Oum Mannorine, and Sak Suthsakhon.

In early August 1945, Son Ngoc Thanh returned from Japan to lead the Cambodian nationalists. On the night of August 12, nine radicals among his supporters, led by Prince Norodom Thon from the National Guard, stormed the royal palace. After a shoot-out with some royal guards, they managed to force the cabinet to resign en bloc, making King Sihanouk proclaim Thanh prime minister on August 14. On the following day the Japanese surrendered to the Allies.

Son Ngoc Thanh inherited a country that was in poor shape financially and also in a precarious political position. On October 16, British troops arrived in Phnom Penh to oversee the surrender of the Japanese. In a grand ceremony, the Japanese surrendered to the Gurkhas who had accompanied the British commander, Colonel Murray-Lyon. The British also arrested Son Ngoc Thanh, released the French who had been interned by the Japanese, proclaimed the restoration of French rule, and supervised the appointment of Prince Sisowath Monireth as prime minister on October 17. Although French rule was to last for another eight years, the French had to make massive concessions: they had to agree to grant internal autonomy in the country, allow for the establishment of political parties, have an elected legislature, and reach agreements with many of the rebels who were fighting against them.

SEE ALSO: Cambodia, Communist Protests and Revolution; Cambodia, Rebellion against France; Sihanouk, Norodom (b. 1922)

References and Suggested Readings

- Corfield, J. (1993) The Royal Family of Cambodia. Melbourne: Khmer Language and Culture Centre.
- Corfield, J. & Summers, L. (2003) Historical Dictionary of Cambodia. Lanham, MD: Scarecrow Press.
- Kiernan, B. (1985) How Pol Pot Came to Power. London: Verso.
- Osborne, M. (1969) The French Presence in Cochinchina and Cambodia: Rule and Response 1859–1905. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Tully, J. (2002) France on the Mekong: A History of the Protectorate in Cambodia 1863–1953. Lanham, MD: University Press of America.

Cambodia, communist protests and revolution

Justin Corfield

On September 30, 1960, Cambodian communists held a secret congress at Phnom Penh railway station where, under the leadership of Tou Samouth, they changed their name from the Khmer People's Revolutionary Party to the Communist Party of Kampuchea. They were uncertain what to do in the short term. Some clearly favored an accommodation with King Norodom Sihanouk, the current ruler, and a number of leading communists joined the Sangkum Reastr Niyum (Popular Socialist Community), commonly referred to as the Sangkum, which had been founded in 1955 by Sihanouk. Others were keen on launching an armed struggle, while another group wanted a closer alliance with the Vietnamese communist movement. Although a number clearly supported what Sihanouk was doing in terms of providing education and health care for the vast majority of people in the country, and they welcomed his rapprochement with China, they were nervous about the level of influence of men like Lon Nol, the police chief and now army strongman who was clearly anti-communist and pro-American. They were also bitter over the incident on August 11, 1957, when Sihanouk invited some left-wing democrats to the palace for a debate: the five who appeared met with Sihanouk but were beaten up by palace guards when the prince left the room. In 1962, Tou Samouth was betrayed, arrested, tortured at Lon Nol's house for a week, then taken to the Stung Meanchey pagoda, where he was killed. He refused to name any names, and after his death Saloth Sar (later known as Pol Pot) was elected as the leader of the communists, who changed their name again to the Workers' Party of Kampuchea.

In the National Assembly elections on June 10, 1962, a number of pro-communist candidates managed to get themselves preselected as Sangkum candidates. Khieu Samphan, Hou Youn, and Hu Nim all took up their seats in the National Assembly after being duly elected. There were also some other anti-Sihanouk candidates, including the right-wing diplomat Douc Rasy, brother-in-law of nationalist hero Pach Chhoeun. Even though the new assembly had been "hand-picked" by Sihanouk, he had allowed for dissenters, and the Sangkum National Congress became a forum for many people to debate political issues, short of being critical of Sihanouk himself.

On May 1, 1963, the Chinese president Liu Shao-chi visited Phnom Penh. The visit went fairly well. It showed that Sihanouk was clearly a friend of communist China, and the Chinese gave him massive aid. With the Sangkum National Congress later that year rejecting US aid, it was clear that Sihanouk was opposed to the American involvement in the growing war in Vietnam. Cambodia broke off diplomatic relations with South Vietnam over the Buddhist Crisis during that year, and after the coup d'état in Saigon, South Vietnam's capital, which led to the overthrow of the South Vietnamese president, Ngo Dinh Diem, Sihanouk was certainly unnerved. He named his son Prince Norodom Naradipo his heir.

Opposition to Sihanouk recoiled slightly in January 1964 with the public trial of Preap In, a fairly insignificant Cambodian supporter of Son Ngoc Thanh. Preap In was executed for treason on January 20, and photographs and film of his execution were shown around the country as a clear example of a vindictive government action. This led to murmurings in many right-wing political circles about the possibility of overthrowing Sihanouk. If these opponents looked to the United States for help, finding support from that quarter became harder when Cambodia broke off diplomatic relations with the US on May 3, 1965.

The turning point came in 1966 when, on September 11, just after a visit to Cambodia by France's president, Charles de Gaulle, elections were held for the National Assembly. Sihanouk decided to allow a plurality of Sangkum candidates to stand in the election, with the result that all but one constituency had a contest. Some Cambodian communists gambled on managing to get their candidates back into the National Assembly, with Hu Nim, Hou Youn, and Khieu Samphan all comfortably reelected. Other communists despaired when the final results were published and it became clear that there had been a large swing to the right, with many conservative candidates elected, and Lon Nol able to form the new government.

Lon Nol had been the police chief and army commander, and had only twice contested elected office – in the 1947 and 1951 elections for his Khmer Renewal Party. He was from a family which had served in the Cambodian administration for several generations. He emerged as a major political figure with the formation of Sangkum and his appointment in 1961 as commander-in-chief of the Royal Khmer armed forces. He became prime minister on October 22, 1966, and on November 4, Sihanouk announced the formation of a shadow cabinet of other politicians who would be able to put a check on Lon Nol's moves to free up the economy and reduce the amount of central planning.

It is not clear what followed, but an uprising broke out in Samlaut, in the province of Battambang in the west of the country, on April 2, 1967. Its cause appears to have been rice requisitions which were ordered by Prince Sihanouk and then carried out by Lon Nol. These were supposed to make up for a significant shortfall in rice caused by large amounts being sold illegally to the Vietnamese communists. The leaders of the Cambodian communist movement were in the northeast of the country at the time, but with Samlaut being a particularly radical area, they quickly endorsed the uprising and tried to turn it into a rebellion. In Phnom Penh, both in the National Assembly and in the press, the three pro-communist members of the National Assembly were heavily criticized. On April 25, Khieu Samphan and Hou Youn fled Phnom Penh to try to make contact with the rebel communists in the jungle, which they eventually did, and were joined by Hu Nim, who fled on October 7. It was also during this time that Hun Sen, a school student, joined the communist guerillas.

Lon Nol sent in soldiers to Samlaut, and many peasants were killed. On April 30, facing intense criticism for allowing the Samlaut uprising to break out, and for his inability to deal with it, Lon Nol resigned and was succeeded by a neutralist, Son Sann. On April 30, 1967, Lon Nol became minister of defense, and on August 14, 1969, he became prime minister again. By this time the communist movement in Cambodia had decided that the only way it could come to power was through an armed struggle, and it abandoned street protests, although a few individuals did speak out against police heavy-handedness.

With the war in Vietnam intensifying, many Vietcong and North Vietnamese sought refuge on Cambodian soil, establishing bases along the Cambodian–South Vietnamese border. The United States started a program of “secret” bombing of these bases on March 18, 1969, and on June 11, Cambodia finally reestablished diplomatic relations with the United States. By this time the right-wing forces had begun to get together and plan their next course of action. Their obvious route would have been to try to constitutionally sideline Sihanouk, reduce his powers, and strengthen the office of the prime minister. However, nobody was sure what role Sihanouk fulfilled as leader of Cambodia, as his mother, Queen Kossamak, actually held the leadership position.

Prime Minister Lon Nol started taking advice from Prince Sisowath Sirik Matak, another member of the royal family, who was a strong supporter of capitalism. He had served as ambassador to China and Mongolia, and then as ambassador to Japan and the Philippines. Prince Sirik Matak clearly believed that it would be impossible to sideline Sihanouk. Instead the conspirators would have to depose him entirely, preferably when he was overseas.

On January 6, 1970, Sihanouk left for France to see his doctor, but his right-wing opponents were not sure of their numbers in the National Assembly, so they tried a convoluted way of attacking Sihanouk by bringing up allegations of corruption against his brother-in-law, Lieutenant-General Oum Mannorine, head of the “surface police.” Apparently the customs service had found large parcels of silk at the airport with Oum Mannorine’s name on them, and he was accused of trying to bring them into the country without paying duty, a charge he denied. While this was being discussed in the National Assembly, on March 8, some 1,500 people started protesting in the township of Svay Rieng, close to the Vietnamese border. These people demonstrated against the presence of the Vietcong and the North Vietnamese on Cambodian soil. The demonstration seems to have been organized by Hem Keth Sana, the governor of Svay Rieng and an ally of Lon Nol.

On March 11, a very large demonstration took place in Phnom Penh, where up to 20,000 schoolchildren, students, and adult protesters, along with large numbers of monks, demanded that the Vietcong and the North Vietnamese leave Cambodia. It has long been alleged that Sihanouk and Lon Nol planned these demonstrations together. Indeed, they did meet at Rome airport while Sihanouk was on his way to France in January, and Lon Nol was returning to Cambodia after medical treatment in Europe. Sihanouk was planning to go to Moscow and then Beijing, and a demonstration against the Vietnamese presence in his country would certainly strengthen his hand. The protesters marched on the embassy of the Provisional Revolutionary Government – the communist government of South Vietnam whose armed wing was the Vietcong. They sacked the embassy, then marched on the North Vietnamese embassy and the office of the North Vietnamese commercial attaché, sacking both those buildings as well. An attempt to attack the Chinese embassy was stopped by Cambodian soldiers.

Sihanouk had undoubtedly wanted a large peaceful demonstration and was horrified when he heard what had happened, and what had been done essentially in his name. He tried to shore up his diplomatic position by condemning the Lon Nol government, but made the mistake of privately raging against Lon Nol’s cabinet ministers, claiming that he would return to Cambodia and have them shot. The outburst took place inside the Cambodian ambassador’s residence in Paris, but a Cambodian official, Prince Essaro, taped the shouting and the tape was flown back to Phnom Penh, where Prince Sirik Matak, Essaro's brother, urged the other conspirators to act soon or risk being killed when Sihanouk returned. As this was happening, some of Sihanouk's closest supporters tried to escalate the disturbances in Phnom Penh by rioting against the Vietnamese civilians in the city. The aim was to make the place so unruly that Sihanouk would have to return quickly and the right-wing conspirators would have to distance themselves from the escalating lawlessness.

On March 16 at a meeting of the National Assembly there was an attempt to put forward a motion against Oum Mannorine as a way of testing the support for the conspirators. However, student protests outside got out of hand. On the following day Oum Mannorine tried to forestall Lon Nol by having him arrested. This failed and Oum Mannorine was himself seized and held in custody for the next three years. At dawn on March 18, Prince Sirik Matak urged Lon Nol not to back down but to stage a takeover of the government and formulate plans to draw up a republic. Lon Nol eventually agreed, and at a joint session of the National Assembly and the High Council of the Kingdom that followed, the parliamentarians voted to dismiss Sihanouk and appoint the little-known speaker of the National Assembly, Cheng Heng, as the new head of state. In a blaze of publicity, Lon Nol released all political prisoners, including many communists, some of whom briefly supported his government, but were to be quickly disenchanted.

Sihanouk was just leaving Moscow when he was told the news. He was flying to Beijing and was surprised that on his arrival at the Chinese capital he was still greeted as a visiting head of state. The Chinese government announced that they had no intention of recognizing the Lon Nol government and would support Sihanouk if he chose to fight his way back to power.

On March 23, 1970, Prince Sihanouk announced the formation of the National United Front of Kampuchea, calling on the Cambodian communists to support him, which they did. Preempting any request from Sihanouk, the North Vietnamese and the Vietcong then attacked Lon Nol, driving back his badly armed and inexperienced forces. Lon Nol was desperate to survive and called for US support. On April 30, large numbers of US soldiers and their South Vietnamese allies came across the Cambodian-South Vietnamese border to attack the Vietcong and North Vietnamese bases. The next day

Sihanouk announced the formation of the Royal Government of National Union, a government-in-exile, and the Cambodian civil war began. On October 9, 1970, the Lon Nol government formally ended the Cambodian monarchy and proclaimed the formation of the Khmer Republic.

The rule of Lon Nol from 1970 to April 1975 is one of the paradoxes in the history of Cambodia. On the one hand the government was fighting an increasingly deadly civil war, which it eventually lost, and saw the emergence of the Khmer Rouge and the massacre of hundreds of thousands of the population, with the deaths of over a million more. On the other hand, Lon Nol allowed much greater freedom, including the right to protest and freedom of the press. Lon Nol saw himself as the father-figure of the country, and although he reacted badly to criticism of himself personally, he did try to maintain as much democratic spirit as was possible during a civil war.

In particular, Lon Nol always had a respect for university students, even though he himself had never attended university. While he could be brutal against peasants, he was rarely heavy-handed with university students. He met regularly with a number of the leading student activists such as San That and Im You Hay, the latter being given a safe seat in the National Assembly in 1972. As a result, Lon Nol was a little indecisive in the actions of February 1972. On the one hand he was not keen on antagonizing the students who had been loyal supporters, but on the other hand he could not sit idly by as they started a sit-in at the faculty of law, demanding the reinstatement of Keo Ann. However, it also seems that Lon Nol thought that he could use the student protesters in his moves to try to stop Prince Sirik Matak from taking over the government.

By this time Lon Nol had become angered by the National Assembly delaying the introduction of a new constitution and he preempted their moves by proclaiming himself president on March 10. Son Ngoc Thanh, the veteran nationalist hero who had returned to Phnom Penh in 1970, became prime minister ten days later. A referendum to approve the new republican constitution was held two days after the end of the Koy Pech affair and presidential elections were scheduled for June 4, 1972. It was obvious that Lon Nol would contest the elections, and he certainly hoped to be elected easily. However, with the Paris peace talks on Vietnam being dragged out, the United States, the main financial backer of the Cambodian government, was eager for a genuinely democratic election, far better than that in South Vietnam at the end of the previous year.

On the day of the election, vast crowds of people turned out to vote, and there was little doubt that the public was endorsing the process. The results were awaited with anticipation. It seems certain that Thappana Nginn and Lon Nol's brother, Lon Non, altered the voting figures and results to give Lon Nol 578,203 votes to 257,320 for In Tam and 217,341 for Keo Ann. Douc Rasy, a supporter of In Tam, immediately claimed election fraud. A member of the constitutional court resigned in protest as the remainder of the court proclaimed Lon Nol the overall winner.

The election split the three forces that had supported the formation of the Khmer Republic. Lon Nol and In Tam became bitter opponents, and Keo Ann and the students started to become disenchanted with the whole electoral process. With Lon Nol confirmed as president, elections were held for the National Assembly on September 4, and for the Senate on September 17, both resulting in every seat being won by the Socio-Republican Party. There were many irregularities in these elections, with the Republican Party of Prince Sirik Matak and the Democratic Party of In Tam both boycotting the elections and being quickly sidelined.

Lon Nol survived an assassination attempt on March 18, 1973, when the boyfriend of a daughter of Prince Sihanouk bombed the presidential palace. Three days later a state of siege was proclaimed, and from then on, heavy restrictions were placed on royalists and suspected royalists, as well as all enemies of the regime. Finally, after pressure from the Americans, the High Political Council was formed with Lon Nol, In Tam, Cheng Heng, and Sirik Matak forming a coalition government with In Tam as prime minister.

In 1974 large student protests began again. During one of these, Keo Sang Kim, the minister of education, and his deputy, Thach Chia, were "abducted" by students who marched them, in relatively good spirits, to their strike headquarters. Both were then shot dead, with the assassin, who definitely was not a student, fleeing. At the time the newspaper Nokor Thom accused Sirik Matak of organizing the shooting, but subsequently a man from the communists came forward to claim responsibility. It was the last anti-government protest in the Khmer Republic. The final pro-government protest was on August 15, 1974, when the government held a demonstration to show that its regime had lasted on its own a year after the US halted bombing.

By early 1975 the military situation for the republicans was dire, with many senior officials fleeing the country and going into exile overseas. The prime minister, Long Boret, tried hard to keep up the flagging morale of the army. When Lon Nol left the country on April 1, some people thought that it might be possible for a ceasefire to be negotiated. On April 12, the US embassy evacuated its staff, some third country nationals, and the acting president, Saukham Khoy. Prince Sirik Matak refused to leave "in such a cowardly fashion" and Long Boret also refused the offer to evacuate himself and his family.

On April 17, 1975, the republican forces collapsed and the forces of Sihanouk and the communists – now totally dominated by the communists with a few Sihanoukists in symbolic positions – took control of the capital. The republican military commander, Sak Suthsakhon, fled the capital for Thailand, and Long Boret was captured by the communists and killed. Sirik Matak sought refuge in the French embassy but later handed himself over to the communists, who killed him as well. With the shelling of Phnom Penh over, vast crowds cheered the communists, only to find themselves forcibly evacuated into the countryside. Supporters of the communists in France, Australia, and elsewhere held small rallies to mark the end of the war in Cambodia, two weeks before the final collapse of South Vietnam.

Initially it was thought that Prince Norodom Sihanouk would lead the new government that came to power on April 17, 1975. Although he was officially the leader, he remained a figurehead, with the real power lying with a number of Cambodian communists. The "public face" of Cambodian communism up until that time had been Khieu Samphan, a respected former teacher who had led protests in the mid-1960s against corruption – and, indeed, he had been a member of the Cambodian National Assembly at the time. However, the real power lay with three men, Saloth Sar (Pol Pot), his brother-in-law Ieng Sary, and a close ally, Son Sen. The three of them had worked in the communist movement since the 1960s and had built up close relations with the Chinese communists. All three, who had been educated in France, were also passionately anti-Vietnamese. Indeed, Ieng Sary was a Khmer Krom – one of the Cambodian minority in Vietnam – and had long harbored a deep resentment against Vietnamese influence in Cambodia. It was around this time that Saloth Sar assumed the identity “Pol Pot,” the name by which he became better known.

The three – Pol Pot, Ieng Sary, and Son Sen – engineered one of the most violent revolutions in the modern era. On taking control of Phnom Penh and the other cities on the morning of April 17, 1975, they ordered all of them to be evacuated at gunpoint, with everybody forced to leave for the countryside. In the new communist society, city people were forced to work in the villages, where many of the peasant farmers enjoyed having members of Cambodia’s middle class forced to work in the fields for them. A large number of the displaced headed for the villages where they had family, in the hope of better treatment. Some certainly achieved this, but it also allowed them to be quickly recognized and identified, then denounced by other villagers. Others ended up in villages where they were not known, and as a result some of them survived. As many as 100,000 people were killed, and as many as a million others died from starvation, overwork, malnutrition, disease, or a broken heart.

By this time Pol Pot had established a security apparatus that became known as S-21. With its headquarters in a former high school in Phnom Penh, and now better known as Tuol Sleng, over the next three and a half years the center held about 15,000 detainees. Many others were also held in regional detention centers. Whilst most “enemies of the state” were summarily executed, those deemed important enough to be questioned were held at these centers, with Tuol Sleng being used for the highest-ranking prisoners. Most of the prisoners were interrogated, tortured, and executed either at the prison or, in most cases, at execution sites elsewhere in Phnom Penh.

The security apparatus during the Cambodian revolution essentially involved interrogating people to find out their collaborators, friends, and co-conspirators, who were then arrested and also interrogated or tortured to reveal further “enemies of the state.” Gradually a number of the guards at Tuol Sleng found themselves denounced, and it was not long before the security apparatus was turning in on itself and executing former guards and interrogators. By late 1978 the finger was also pointing to some in the leadership of the Khmer Rouge, notably Son Sen. By that time, quite a number of senior members of the communist movement, such as Hu Nim, former student leader Phouk Chhay, and Keo Meas, had all been killed.

With Democratic Kampuchea backed by the People’s Republic of China, and Vietnam backed by the Soviet Union, war was looming between the two countries. Indeed in late 1977, the Vietnamese sent a large military force into Cambodia to threaten the government of Democratic Kampuchea, which responded, on December 31, by breaking diplomatic relations between the two countries.

From February to May 1978 Radio Hanoi started broadcasting attacks on the leadership of Democratic Kampuchea and urging for an insurrection to overthrow Pol Pot. More ominously, it was also collecting pro-Vietnamese Cambodian communists to serve as a rival government to Pol Pot should he be overthrown. In response, the government of Democratic Kampuchea started virulent anti-Vietnamese broadcasts on its radio station, and cross-border attacks mounted.

With both sides arming themselves for an eventual confrontation, Democratic Kampuchea appealed for help from Beijing. The Khmer Rouge leaders had closely linked themselves to the so-called “Gang of Four” in Beijing, and their overthrow in 1976 had led to a brief strain in relations. However, Beijing promised help if Vietnam did attack. In order to show the outside world its peaceful intentions, the Khmer Rouge invited a Yugoslav television crew to film in Cambodia, and even interview Pol Pot himself, and then invited three westerners, Scotsman Malcolm Caldwell, and US journalists Elizabeth Becker and Richard Dudman, to visit the country. Unfortunately, this trip went badly, and Malcolm Caldwell was shot dead by unknown assailants on December 23.

On December 2, the United Front for the National Salvation of Kampuchea had been proclaimed. It consisted of pro-Vietnamese Cambodian communists and set itself up essentially as a rival government to that of Pol Pot. On December 25, the Vietnamese army launched its attack on Cambodia, ostensibly in support of this government. The Vietnamese attack on December 25, 1978 is believed to have followed a Khmer Rouge attack on Vietnam. The Khmer Rouge forces are thought to have penetrated deep into South Vietnam, where they were surrounded and destroyed. With most of their soldiers dead, the Khmer Rouge were unable to prevent the Vietnamese invasion, which led to the Vietnamese capturing Phnom Penh, still largely deserted after the forced evacuation of April 17, 1975, on January 7, 1979.

The Vietnamese backed a new People's Republic of Kampuchea (PRK), which failed to make any diplomatic headway, and was only recognized by Vietnam, the Soviet Union, and its allies. India was the only non-communist country to extend diplomatic recognition. Its leader Heng Samrin was denounced in the West and by China as a Vietnamese puppet. By 1989 the PRK was anticipating the fall of communism. Seeing the chance for a peace settlement, on April 29–30, 1989, the National Assembly adopted a new constitution by which it changed the name of the country to the State of Cambodia (SOC), introduced a new flag and national anthem, and enshrined the right to own property, as well as declaring Buddhism the state religion. In September 1989, the Vietnamese announced the withdrawal of all their military forces from the country, and peace talks started again.

SEE ALSO: Cambodia, Anti-Colonial Protests, 1863–1945; Cambodia, Rebellion against France; Sihanouk, Norodom (b. 1922)

References and Suggested Readings

- Chandler, D. P. (1991) The Tragedy of Cambodian History. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Corfield, J. (1994) Khmers Stand Up! A History of the Cambodian Government 1970–1975. Clayton, Australia: Monash University.
- Kiernan, B. (1985) How Pol Pot Came to Power. London: Verso.

Cambodia, rebellion against France

Justin Corfield

Although French colonial rule was officially restored on October 16, 1945, the French

Protectorate of Cambodia was much weaker than it had been prior to the fall of France in 1940. In its last eight years it was to face many problems, both from internal rebellions, often helped by people in neighboring Vietnam and Thailand, and from major constitutional opposition from Cambodian socialists, often with the help of French socialists. These forces sometimes fought each other but often made common cause, leading to France having to grant Cambodia full independence on November 9, 1953.

Since the end of the Si Votha rebellion in 1891 with the death of Si Votha, there had been no organized armed group aiming to end French colonial rule in Cambodia. However, a number of individuals, mainly members of the royal family, wanted changes in the way the place was administered, most realizing the impossibility of defeating the French militarily. The situation changed in 1940 with the fall of France. Some Cambodians decided to form a resistance group, which became known as the Khmer Issarak (Khmer Independence). It was founded in December 1940 in Bangkok by Poc Khun, a well-connected ethnic Khmer (Cambodian) who was himself the grandson of Poc, minister of the navy from 1889 to 1895, minister of the palace in 1898, and then minister of justice. Poc Khun was a representative of Battambang in the Thai parliament and had clear support from some sectors in Thailand.

Although the Khmer Issarak was created in 1940, it was not until 1945 that the group became active in Cambodia. The leading nationalist of the period, Son Ngoc Thanh, had been leery of them when the movement had been created because he had wanted pressure on the French from an urban elite rather than a guerilla war. However, following his arrest by the British on October 16, 1945, the urban supporters of Thanh and the Khmer Issarak, aided by the anti-colonial government of Pridi in Thailand, made common cause. They gained support from some prominent Cambodians, including Pach Chhoeun and Chau Sen Cocsal, a Khmer Krom (ethnic Cambodian from South Vietnam). The latter left Kompong Cham on October 26 to join up with the former in Triton, South Vietnam, where the two established a Free Cambodia Party that operated briefly until the French occupied the region.

Of more significance, militarily speaking, was the rise of a Battambang warlord called Dap

Chhuon, who came to lead the Khmer Issarak in the northwest, with a power base in Siem Reap. A guerilla war seemed inevitable, but nothing on the scale of what was happening in neighboring Vietnam was expected.

The French made a major concession on January 7, 1946, establishing a modus vivendi in which they granted internal autonomy to Cambodia. Its major conditions included allowing Cambodians to form political parties, elections to be held for a constituent assembly, and then elections for a national assembly with legislative powers. These moves helped win over some of the wavering Issarak who believed that they might be able to make gains constitutionally. On February 20, 1946, Chau Sen Cocsal and some of his supporters surrendered and accepted the authority of the Cambodian crown, encapsulated in the young king, Norodom Sihanouk.

In early 1946, the first Cambodian political party was established. Known initially as the Constitutional Party, it was quickly renamed the Liberal Party. It was founded by Prince Norodom Norindeth with the support of some French officials, notably Louis Manipoud, the head of the education system, and sought "gradual" independence within the framework of the French Union. It also advocated wider individual rights, especially civil rights and the right to hold property, and it had the support of court mandarins, courtiers, some wealthy landowners, Chinese businessmen, and the Cham Muslim minority. It wanted the franchise to include all men and women, including monks and nuns, who could read and write in the Khmer language.

The formation of the Liberal Party helped persuade many radicals who wanted full independence to create the Democrat Party, which had been organizing since January 1946, but only became an official political party in March with the return to Cambodia of Prince Sisowath Youtévong. He had been in Paris during the German occupation and had established numerous contacts among members of the French Socialist Party. On his return to Phnom Penh, support for his political party came from some French lawyers associated with the socialists, and the party started to establish a provincial network, with committees in the capital of each province, and encouraged people to join. Although the party advocated that Cambodia should remain within the French Union, the role of the French would be significantly reduced and the Cambodian king would assume the role of a constitutional monarch. There would be a single legislative chamber, and concentrated development of public health and public education, with scholarships offered to French universities for the brightest children. With Prince Youtévong as the party president, it drew support from many of the people connected with the Nagaravatta newspaper – Sim Var, Pach Chhoeun, his brother-in-law Chuop Hell, and many others including Prince Sisowath Sirikmatak and his brother Prince Sisowath Essaro.

Another political party was formed soon afterwards. The Progressive Democratic Party was led by Prince Norodom Montana, who had been minister of religion, minister of the economy, and minister of agriculture. This group advocated increased public health and education provision, as well as more public works, but it lacked the party structure or the specific policies to gain much support.

On September 1, 1946, elections were held throughout Cambodia for the constituent assembly. It was the first time elections on a wide franchise had been held in the country, and the result was that the Democrat Party won 50 of the 69 seats, with 14 seats going to the Liberals, and three to independents (two of whom were openly sympathetic to the Democrats). In the following month, Thailand returned the provinces of Battambang and Siem Reap to Cambodia, and on December 15, Prince Sisowath Youtévong became prime minister.

The new Democrat government found that it did not have as wide a range of powers as it had hoped to have, with the French still controlling the police and the army. It was not long before simmering resentment between the French and the Democrats came into the open.

In March 1947 the French arrested a number of leading Democrats, accusing them of being members of a secret society. It meant that the French were holding in custody 18 Democrat deputies at the time the assembly was voting on a new constitution. This allowed the Liberals and some rebel Democrats to choose a constitution which had two legislative chambers, the National Assembly, elected by universal male suffrage, and the High Council of the Kingdom, with members elected or nominated by small interest groups, such as the chambers of commerce, branches of the bureaucracy, and the palace.

For the elections, two new political parties were established: the Khmer Renewal Party and the National Union, both registered in September 1946. The former, with support from the palace, was formed by Nhiek Tioulong, a man with close court connections, and Lon Nol, the police chief, aiming to get much support from the recently incorporated Battambang and Siem Reap provinces. It was well funded and campaigned heavily on supporting the Khmer Krom. The National Union was a small party bankrolled by Khim Tit, an ambitious politician who had served in World War I, and Tayebbhay Hiptoola Machhwa, a prominent Muslim Indo-Cambodian businessman. It had little wide support but aimed at using its elite connections to take control of a number of seats in the High Council.

With so many political machinations in Phnom Penh, the effect was for the Issarak insurgency to hold off from major attacks on the French. They expected that a Democrat victory would lead to the promised amnesty for all political prisoners and eventual independence from the French. However, they became worried when Prince Sisowath Youtévong died on July 11, 1947. He had been ill for some time, suffering greatly from stress, but his death shocked the Democrat Party and worried the Issarak, with rumors incorrectly attributing his death to unnatural causes.

Nevertheless, on December 21, 1947, the first National Assembly elections were held, with the Democrats winning 55 of the 75 seats. The Liberals won all the remaining 20 seats. This was reassuring news for the Issarak, but the Democrats soon found their victory “spiked” with the elections to the High Council of the Kingdom in January 1948, with the National Union managing to get the largest block – eight seats in the upper house.

It was not long before the Democrat Party started to experience internal dissensions, and a major series of splits occurred. This led to Yèm Sambaur, a member of the Democrats but closely aligned to the palace, becoming prime minister on February 12, 1949. By this time the Khmer Issarak rebels were making headway in much of the countryside, and Yèm Sambaur made his main aim balancing the budget and ending the insurgency. The former was achieved largely by the establishment of the Phnom Penh casino. For the latter, it was obvious that the Issarak could not be defeated by military means, and a political compromise would have to be reached. The main Issarak commander in the northeast of Cambodia, Dap Chhuon, surrendered to the government in October 1949. The French granted semi-independence to Cambodia on November 8, making the country an Associated State of the French Union.

On January 14, 1951, an assassin killed the Democrat Party leader Ieu Kocus by rolling a hand grenade into his house. The man arrested soon afterwards initially claimed to be connected with Prince Norindeth of the Liberal Party, but seems more likely to have been acting on the orders of Yèm Sambaur, the prime minister, who later left the Democrat Party with a large number of deputies, forming the National Recovery Party in April 1950. In February 1951 Dap Chhuon and other Democrat rebels established the Victorious Northeastern Khmer Party. By mid-1951 there was a major political impasse, and on September 9, new elections were held for the National Assembly.

The elections saw the Democrats again win, taking 54 of the 78 seats in the National Assembly. The five right-wing parties split their votes badly, and although they did achieve an absolute majority of the vote, they only picked up 24 seats between them, of which 18 were won by the Liberals. Yèm Sambaur lost his seat very narrowly, and no other members of his party came close to winning any seats. The only success from the new parties was the Victorious Northeastern Khmer Party, which won four seats in Battambang and Siem Reap, its power base.

Three weeks after the election, on September 30, 1951, the Khmer People’s Revolutionary Party was established. It was the first Cambodian Communist Party and was formed in secret, with a public front, the Krom Pracheachon (People’s Group), to fight in elections. In the heightening tension, Huy Kanthoul, a moderate Democrat, became prime minister on October 13, and on October 29, Son Ngoc Thanh returned from six years’ exile in France. Thanh’s arrival in Phnom Penh led to massive street protests in his favor. Whole schools emptied when the children saw his plane circling as it was coming in to land, and thousands of his supporters lined the route from the airport into Phnom Penh.

Although Son Ngoc Thanh was one of the major political forces in the country, and had briefly been prime minister in 1945, the new Cambodian parliamentary system of negotiations and compromise was anathema to him. The murder of the French commissioner, Jean de Raymond, on the day of Thanh's return, albeit by a servant with no political motive, confused the issue for some time. Thanh believed that his popularity alone would be enough for the French to concede ground to him, but he was badly mistaken. He was also hopelessly misled by the importance of the Issarak who, with the rallying of Dap Chhuon, were only able to provide limited resistance in particularly remote parts of the countryside. Believing that an insurgency was possible, on March 9, 1952, Son Ngoc Thanh left Phnom Penh and formed his "Movement of the People," a resistance group aimed at ejecting the French from Cambodia.

Thanh's actions were disastrous for the Democrats in Phnom Penh. The French were easily able to brand the two disparate groups as working together and turned to King Norodom Sihanouk for help. Sihanouk, advised by Yem Sambaur and others, launched his Royal Crusade for Independence. He proclaimed himself in favor of Cambodia's unconditional independence, and to this end he retired to Siem Reap to lead a very mild campaign of civil disobedience against the French. Ten days later he sacked Huy Kanthoul as prime minister, becoming prime minister himself, and on January 13, 1953, he dissolved the National Assembly.

Throughout 1953 King Sihanouk urged the French to grant independence, persuading them that they had the choice between having a friendly and cooperative royalist government, or facing a potentially serious campaign of civil disobedience by the Democrats, or even an insurgency by Son Ngoc Thanh. Sihanouk enlisted the help of foreign powers and gained much support from the US administration. With these options, and facing major problems in Vietnam, the French agreed to Sihanouk's demands. On November 9, 1953, Cambodia became an independent country and a member of the United Nations.

SEE ALSO: Cambodia, Anti-Colonial Protests, 1863–1945; Cambodia, Communist Protests and Revolution; Sihanouk, Norodom (b. 1922)

References and Suggested Readings

Chandler, D. P. (1991) The Tragedy of Cambodian History. New Haven: Yale University Press.

Corfield, J. (1994) Khmers Stand Up! A History of the Cambodian Government 1970–1975. Clayton, Australia: Monash University.

Kiernan, B. (1985) How Pol Pot Came to Power. London: Verso.

Camejo, Pedro or Negro Primero (1790–1821)

Catherine Ross

Pedro Camejo was born into slavery as a servant of the Spanish royalist Vicente Alonzo in San Juan de Payara (Estado Apure, Venezuela). Forced to serve under the Spanish army, he fought against the independence fighters led by Simón Bolívar until joining them in the battle for independence in 1816. Until his death in the famous (second) Battle of Carabobo against the troops of Miguel de la Torre in 1821, which finally led to Venezuelan independence, he served under the eminent general José Antonio Páez, who, apart from playing an important role in the fight for independence, was elected president of Venezuela after 1831. Pedro Camejo, who is also known as "El Negro Primero" (the first black), stands as a symbolic figure of courage and strong will who made his way from slavery up to participating in the glorious struggle for independence from the Spanish colonialists, reaching the rank of lieutenant.

He was conspicuous by his engaging role in defending Lieutenant José María Córdoba, who had been sentenced to death because of his desertion and murder of two compatriots. This action by Pedro Camejo and his friend Trinidad Traveso brought them high regard. In 1818 he met Simón Bolívar in San Juan de Parayara, who appeared to be impressed by his alertness and intelligence.

With General Antonio Páez he took part in the battle of Las Queseras del Medio in 1819, for which he and his comrades were honored with the Orden de los Libertadores de Venezuela (medal of the Venezuelan liberators). In this battle Páez, accompanied by his personal guardian Pedro Camejo and only 150 men, attacked Pablo Morillo, who had a force of more than 6,000 soldiers. It resulted in victory for Páez and his men. Using special tactics and because of their familiarity with the region, Páez and his men lost only two of their comrades, whereas Pablo Morillo lost over 500 men in the battle. It was a successful diversionary tactic that was planned by Simón Bolívar within the scope of the Apure campaign to distract General Morillo, while leading his troops west and freeing Nueva Granada from Spanish occupation.

Pedro Camejo was honored for his role as a brave and faithful independence fighter under Antonio Páez, and as a representative of African slaves in Venezuela. He became a very important figure in the struggle for freedom in the colonies and in the abolition of slavery at the same time. With the implementation of the new Venezuelan currency in 2007, Pedro Camejo was honored by being placed on the five Bolívares fuerte (strong Bolívar) bank note.

SEE ALSO: Bolívar, Simón (1783–1830); Venezuelan War of Independence

References and Suggested Readings

- Angel Jaramillo, H. (1991) El encubrimiento de América. Pereira, Colombia, Fondo Editorial del Departamento de Risaralda.
- Armas Chitty, J. A. (1971) La batalla de Carabobo: antecedentes y efectos. Caracas: Armitano.
- Graziano, F. (2007) Cultures of Devotion: Folk Saints of Spanish America. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Solorzano Márquez, C. (1971) El negro primero. Caracas: Edición Sesquicentenario de la Batalla de Carabobo.

Cameroon, popular anti-colonial protest

Ayokunle Olumuyiwa Omobowale

Cameroon came under French rule in 1919, having been seized from German control during World War I. It remained a Mandate Territory until it was redesignated a Trust Territory after World War II. Of all French controlled territories in sub-Saharan Africa, it was the most economically viable, with a considerable number of educated elites and imbued with huge French economic and infrastructural investments. Indeed, Cameroon was seemingly a favored territory in the comity of French colonies. Against this backdrop, Cameroon was the territory with the most radical nationalist movement in black Africa and the only one where the French colonial regime was engaged in armed rebellion.

Nationalism and Um Nyobe's UPC Revolt

Active nationalism commenced in Cameroon with the birth of the Union des Populations du Cameroon (UPC) on April 10, 1948. It became most vibrant and radical under the charismatic leadership of Reuben Um Nyobe. Um Nyobe was a nationalist with just a primary education. He was, however, exposed to Marxist ideology by French associates. He is generally described as the father of French nationalism, even by opponents. Right from inception, the UPC unequivocally demanded independence, which was not part of French policy for its colonies at that time. Internationally, the UPC was affiliated to the interterritorial Rassemblement Démocratique Africain (RDA) (with membership cutting across French sub-Saharan Africa) and the French Communist Party (PCF). Locally, the UPC enjoyed the support of the Union des Syndicats Confédérés du Cameroon (USCC), whose membership cut across about 75 percent of the working population. Ethnically, the UPC drew its supporters predominantly from the Bamileke and Bassa people, who had somewhat been exposed to and become conscious of the dialectics of French rule, which favored European settlers, French companies, and members of the colonial administration. Whereas among the Bamileke there had grown a class of the economically empowered, whose farms competed with those of European settlers, the Bassa formed a class of largely literate people, in whose environment colonial economic infrastructure had been established with little returns to the indigenous population.

The UPC was strategically organized with a large network of local branches (numbering about 450 by 1955), numerous affiliate organizations, and newspapers to publish its thoughts and campaigns. As the UPC gained prominence among the Cameroonian population, the colonial government sought to curtail its popularity and growth through repression. Thus, the police and the military were empowered to carry out repressive operations against the leadership and supporters of the UPC, while pro-French groups and local administrators attacked UPC followers. In one such attack Um Nyobe and other

UPC leaders were ruffled in the Bamileke area in 1955. When the UPC retaliated by attacking state infrastructures, its leadership and supporters were ruthlessly hunted down, arrested, imprisoned, and killed. The colonial government further advanced its policy of containment of the UPC. Hence, the RDA, which had by 1950 severed relations with the French Communist Party, was apparently influenced to expel the UPC due to its refusal to discontinue relations with French communists in July 1955. Furthermore, in the same month, following a proposal from Roland Pre, the colonial governor, the French government proscribed the UPC and prevented it from presenting candidates for election to the parliament as France prepared Cameroon for self-rule.

Banned and incessantly subjected to brutal acts of repression, the leadership of the UPC retreated underground and subsequently engaged the colonial regime in armed struggle. From his native region of Sanaga Maritime (a predominantly Bassa region), Um nyobe led the UPC and commanded its guerrilla army. Having been excluded from the impending elections, the UPC responded by carrying out acts of sabotage and attacking public institutions in order to disrupt the elections slated for 1956. The elections still went on, however, culminating in the election of moderates into the parliament. Having failed in reconciliatory attempts with colonial authorities, Um Nyobe once again deployed his militia to carry out actions in a number of locations around the Sanaga Maritime province, which was his main area of operation. The attacks, which were carried out in September 1957 in Eseka and Ngambe, led to the killing of 44 people, the wounding of 55, and the kidnapping of 61.

French authorities responded with a requisition force deployed to the Sanaga Maritime province. The UPC resistance gradually succumbed under French superior firepower, and on September 13, 1958, Um Nyobe was killed in action. By November as many as 2,070 militants had surrendered, 371 had been killed, and 882 captured.

Post-Um Nyobe UPC Resistance and Anti-Nationalism

With the demise of Um Nyobe and the surrender of some of his lieutenants, the government allowed members of the UPC who had surrendered to participate in elections and assume positions at the parliament in 1959. This was meant to reintegrate the UPC, but it led to its factionalization. Since the Bassa had largely surrendered with the killing of Um Nyobe and the suppression of his resistance, the new revolutionists recruited mostly from the Bamileke region, reorganizing its army into the Armée de Liberation Nationale Kamerounaise (ANKL).

Meanwhile, the French government commenced a process of devolution of power to moderates who would not threaten French influence in Cameroon. Hence, in 1958, the anti-nationalist Ahmadou Ahidjo was elected prime minister. Thus, the revolt of 1959 was not just one against the colonialists, but also one that posed the threat of toppling Ahidjo. Hence, while Ahidjo offered amnesty to those who surrendered, he opted for a total military onslaught against those holding out.

By January 1, 1960, then, independence was officially granted to Cameroon but power ended up in the hands of the very people who opposed independence. With independence granted, the new Cameroonian authorities called on the French government for military assistance in the crushing of the Bamileke revolt. The French government responded by deploying troops and weapons in January 1960.

By the time the rebellion was fully crushed, about 20,000 revolutionaries and civilians had been killed, and about 1,000 soldiers had died in action. Unlike other African colonies, Cameroon gained independence through the suppression of the nationalist forces that fought for it, while ironically power was handed over to those who did not desire independence. Hence, the modern political state of Cameroon has risen not so much as a realization of a national consciousness uniting diverse peoples into one movement against the colonial power – as was the case of most African countries – but out of the repression of such a movement . . . it was on the basis of struggling against the most politicized sections of its own population that the independent Cameroon has established its authority. (Joseph 1974: 447)

SEE ALSO: Charismatic Leadership and Revolution; Marxism; Revolution, Dialectics of

References and Suggested Readings

- Atangana, M. (1997) French Capitalism and Nationalism in Cameroon. African Studies Review 40 (1): 83–111.
- Djiffack, A. & Mitsch, R. (2000) The Myth of Reuben. Research in African Literatures 31 (2): 91–116.
- Hallet, R. (1974) Africa since 1875. London: Heinemann.
- Joseph, R. (1974) Reuben um Um nyobe and the Kamerun Rebellion. African Affairs 73 (293): 428–48.
- Smith, T. (1978) A Comparative Study of French and British Decolonization. Comparative Studies in Society and History 20 (1): 70–102.

Camus, Albert (1913–1960)

Jin H. Han

Albert Camus, French novelist, essayist, and playwright, was a major exponent of existentialism along with Jean-Paul Sartre. His writings centered on the notion of human alienation from the world and from one's own self. His philosophy taught that one should embrace courageously the absurdity of life and pursue truth and justice through moral rebellion. He was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1957.

Camus's vision of human existence as a paradox of wonder and absurdity informed his spirit of rebellion. In his philosophical essay, The Myth of Sisyphus (Le Mythe de Sisyphe, 1942), he described the human condition that yielded no fruit despite endless efforts. In spite of the meaninglessness of life, however, Camus refused to surrender to the grip of death without a fight. His personal rebellion was made manifest in political activism. In 1934–5 he was a member of the Algerian Communist Party. As a left-wing intellectual of Algiers, he wrote articles for Alger-Républicain that portrayed the injustices suffered by the Muslims in the Kabylie region. Camus's writings provided a humanitarian view on the colonial woes that eventually led to the Algerian War (1954–62). His critique of colonialism was paired with his hope for France's role in Algeria.

During World War II, Camus was a member of the Resistance. His writings from the war years demonstrated that he sought to come to terms with the absurd in life and history. In the novel

The Stranger (L'Étranger, 1942), which was also translated under the title of The Outsider, he portrayed an alienated person who was condemned for failing to conform to the conventions of his society. Camus's wartime writings are marked by the awareness of the brunt of nihilism and the threat of the absurd while refusing to surrender to them. The war apparently kept him from becoming a pure theorist of the absurd.

From 1944 to 1947 Camus wrote for Combat, the Resistance newspaper of Paris, promoting morality-based politics. After World War II he became a representative voice of postwar estrangement and disillusionment. His second novel, The Plague (La Peste, 1947), showcased a vision of human dignity in the face of a devastating epidemic that drove home the finality of death. It depicted the heroism of those who fought the bubonic disease that rampaged Oran. Camus declared that it was an allegorical account – in other words, a political novel, which permitted the reader to identify the disease with every form of social evil inflicted upon humanity. Though efforts to save lives from the epidemic were largely unsuccessful, the characters in the story embodied the perseverance of the human spirit that defied the evil condition, as well as the capacity of human beings to come together to combat the malady. His later novel, The Fall (La Chute, 1956), traced the Christian framework of sin and judgment, but in the final analysis showed that frustrated modern life had no redemption in sight.

In his second major essay, The Rebel (L'Homme révolté, 1951), Camus pursued the notion of rebellion that aspired for human dignity in defiance of oppression. He described the process in which the oppressed became awakened to political consciousness. The conscientized rebel recognized the moral imperative embedded in his revolt, and the revolt became more than an individual protest against death and the absurdity of life – it gave birth to a revolution. Camus was aware of the danger of the rebellion subverting itself by spawning systems of totalitarianism. As such examples of deformation, he pointed to the institutionalized church and dogmatic communism. In contrast, he argued, the French Revolution was a historical example of the triumph of justice, which lasted only until the Reign of Terror.

It is not easy to delineate Camus's vision of a society born out of rebellion and revolution.

In Camus's design, the revolt is triggered by the rebelling human being's defiance to oppression and desire for life, but does not grow into a revolution until it is propelled by supra-personal moral mandates. Camus posited certain meta-physical norms that would guide the rebellion, but the contraposition of his pure revolt and historical revolutions drew heavy criticisms from Marxists and others, including Sartre.

In addition to his better-known novels and essays, Camus wrote plays that portrayed scenes of life's disappointing endeavors. His Cross Purpose (Le Malentendu, first produced in 1944) and Caligula (first produced in 1945) became classics in the Theater of the Absurd. Until his death, Camus was involved in various aspects of the Workers' Theatre (Théâtre du Travail) in Algiers, whose efforts were to bring quality plays to working-class audiences.

One of the less frequently discussed themes of Camus's writings was the problem of poverty; he stated that it was not Karl Marx but poverty that taught him the meaning of freedom (Letemendia 1997). He observed the devastation caused by destitution that affected every aspect of the human experience and threatened to eclipse human dignity. The peril of poverty worsened the already overburdened life with threat of sickness and death. While Camus accepted the inevitable reality of the absurd, he found poverty to be a form of unnatural suffering caused by inexcusable social injustice.

SEE ALSO: Algerian National Revolution, 1954–1962; Marx, Karl (1818–1883); Marxism; Sartre, Jean-Paul (1905–1980)

References and Suggested Readings

- Bartlett, E. (2004) Rebellious Feminism: Camus's Ethic of Rebellion and Feminist Thought. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Carroll, D. (2007) Albert Camus the Algerian: Colonialism, Terrorism, Justice. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Cruikshank, J. (1959) Albert Camus and the Literature of Revolt. London: Oxford University Press.
- Eubanks, C. L. & Petrakis, P. A. (1999) Reconstructing the World: Albert Camus and the Symbolization of Experience. Journal of Politics 61, 2 (May): 293–312.
- Fitch, B. T. (1982) The Narcissistic Text: A Reading of Camus' Fiction. Toronto: University of Toronto Press.
- Letemendia, V. C. (1997) Poverty in the Writings of Albert Camus. Polity 29, 3 (Spring): 441–60.

Tarrow, S. (1985) Exile from the Kingdom: A Political Rereading of Albert Camus. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press.

Willhoite, F. H., Jr. (1961) Albert Camus' Politics of Rebellion. Western Political Quarterly 14, 2 (June): 400–14.

Canada, indigenous resistance

Anthony J. Hall

Indigenous peoples have reacted to various forms of colonization and imperialism in Canada with accommodation, adaptation, and resistance. Early on, indigenous resistance to the expropriation of land and the tyranny imposed by European settlers was passive and conciliatory, commonly involving alliances and treaties with the empire-builders themselves. In time, the governments with whom the First Nations held treaties reneged on their promises; indigenous peoples were forced onto reservations and into Indian boarding schools, and poverty, exploitation, and social iniquity plagued the indigenous communities that had managed to survive. Indigenous resistance during the first half of the twentieth century often involved lobbying and other forms of top-down political engagement with the state. With the ascendance of the civil rights movement in the 1950s, however, indigenous organizers became more militant in their demands for civil and treaty rights, and more recalcitrant in their methods.

Accommodating the Empire

The success of the fur trade in New France was the primary vehicle for the geopolitical emergence of Canada in its original incarnation. The fur trade's viability depended initially on the thick web of commercial, diplomatic, military, and familial ties that allied Indian groups and agents of the French empire in North America. After the British military defeated the French army on the Plains of Abraham in 1759, the governors of a dramatically expanded British North America opted to retain Canada primarily as an Indian reserve, and also as a hinterland of the fur trade metropolis of Montreal. This decision, as formalized in the Royal Proclamation of 1763, was in some measure a concession aimed at appeasing a loose confederacy of Indian nations whose military opposition to the British occupation of the Great Lakes area was given strategic leadership by the Ottawa sage, Pontiac. The resulting decision of the imperial sovereign to prohibit unauthorized Anglo-American settlements beyond the height of land defining the eastern extreme of the Mississippi Valley was one of the primary causes of the civil war in British North America that gave rise to the creation of the United States. In the split that developed between patriots of the new republic and those who opted to remain within the British empire, the largest numbers of Indians in Canada were drawn to the second camp.

This pattern of alignment culminated in the military mobilization of a powerful Indian Confederacy that saved Canada from annexation by the United States in the War of 1812. The call to arms came from Tecumseh, a gifted Shawnee general whose goal was to promote Indian unity in the North American interior as the necessary precondition for the creation of a sovereign Indian polity with British imperial protection. Some influential figures in imperial Britain were prepared to back the goal of creating a sovereign Aboriginal Indiana as a way of creating a buffer between the US and the vulnerable Crown colony of Upper Canada.

The 10,000 Indian soldiers who answered Tecumseh's call changed history. Although they failed to obtain a sovereign state for themselves, the Indian Confederacy's defense of Canada entailed the most concerted Aboriginal resistance ever faced by the United States in the course of its transcontinental expansion. The Indian intervention in the War of 1812 occurred at a time when Canada would otherwise have fallen because the vast bulk of British soldiers were tied down on the European continent in the fight against Napoleon's forces. Tecumseh's martyrdom in 1813 at the hands of the US Army presaged a fate that would befall many indigenous freedom fighters struggling to defend their peoples and lands.

Assimilation and the Emergence of Indigenous Organizations

Indigenous peoples lost a lot of political ground after the War of 1812 in eastern Canada, and after the building of the Canadian Pacific railway in western Canada. As Canada was remade to accommodate large-scale immigration from Europe and elsewhere, the pressure grew to contain indigenous peoples within the legal and physical constraints of Indian reservations. This desire to enclose indigenous peoples within narrow enclaves, combined with a renewal of the missionary drive, inspired the policies of the 1800s and early 1900s, which sought to acculturate indigenous people according to a vision of civilization that gave prominence to Christianity, capitalism, and European culture. After confederation in 1867, Canada's new federal government advanced this assimilationist ideology through the activities of a Department of Indian Affairs, the agency charged with implementing a body of statutes known as the Indian Act (1876). Together these instruments of federal power transformed those native people registered under the Indian Act into wards of the federal state who could not, amongst other things, vote in Canadian elections, make binding contracts, or bring civil litigation to court. While many native people were thus placed outside the circle of Canadian citizenship, they were subjected simultaneously to the authority of laws not of their own making and administered by a Minister of Indian Affairs not of their own choosing. As part of this process, the Christian churches in Canada were financed and empowered by the federal government to run about 80 residential schools where about 120,000 indigenous youths were trained to renounce their Aboriginal heritages, belief systems, and languages, and adopt instead the ethos and skills deemed essential for integration into Canadian society. Almost half of those who went through these schools died in the process, many from epidemics of tuberculosis that ravaged the inmates of these institutions.

Indigenous leadership faced serious recriminations whenever it attempted to directly oppose these blended policies of church and state. Federal Indian agents collaborated closely with the federal police to monitor and sometimes criminalize those individuals who challenged the power of the Dominion government to aggressively govern Indians. In 1885 federal officials apprehended several key figures, such as Big Bear (ca. 1825–88) and Poundmaker (1842–86), who had most effectively opposed the imposition of the Indian Act and the reserve system in the central plains of Canada. Another of those so targeted was the Métis leader Louis Riel (1844–85). Riel was executed in 1885, the year of the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, for leading an armed opposition against the dispossession and disempowerment of those peoples of mixed ancestry whose interests he had first represented in the negotiations resulting in the creation of the province of Manitoba in 1870. In his final address to the court before being sentenced to death for treason, Riel warned that officials of the federal government had erred “when they began treating the leaders of the small [Aboriginal] community as bandits, as outlaws, leaving them without protection”; in this way they “disorganized that community.” As demonstrated by the socioeconomic maladies that today disproportionately plague the First Nations, Riel’s warning proved prophetic. The wrongful criminalization of Big Bear and Poundmaker, both of whom died shortly after their incarceration, as well as the execution of Riel, did indeed contribute significantly to the disorganization of indigenous peoples.

20th-Century Associations

The Canadian government’s effort to discredit and marginalize the natural leadership of the movement to assert the sovereign rights of indigenous peoples in Canada continued into the twentieth and twenty-first centuries. At the large Six Nations community near Brantford, Ontario, for instance, Dominion officials intervened in 1923 to preempt the system of Longhouse governance responsible for the diplomatic mission of its ambassador, Levi General, to the League of Nations in Geneva, Switzerland. Another Six Nations activist, Lieutenant Fred Loft, faced persistent harassment from Indian Department officials in his efforts throughout the 1920s to organize Indians across Canada into an effective lobby. Jules Sioui, a Huron Indian from a small reserve in the area of Quebec City, took up this organizational task, culminating in the creation of the League of Indian Nations of North America in 1944. Among Sioui’s aims was to use the newly formed United Nations as an international venue where the Crown–Aboriginal treaties of Canada could be validated. The government of Canada responded to Sioui’s more radical approach and to the reality that many Aboriginal soldiers had volunteered for military service in World War II by recognizing the legitimacy of a class of Aboriginal political leaders whom it believed it could control through the power of federal funding.

In the late 1940s, Andy Paull continued the work of a long line of Indian activists in British Columbia to found the North American Indian Brotherhood as the more moderate cousin to Sioui’s organization. Paull’s strand of activism was taken over by Len Marchand and George Manuel. Manuel gave early leadership to the National Indian Brotherhood (NIB) founded in 1968. That organization led the rejection of Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau’s attempt in 1969 to bring both Crown–Aboriginal treaties and the Indian Act to an end. Sensing the trap of the domestication of Indian nations, Manuel founded the World Council of Indigenous Peoples in 1975 in order to internationalize the struggle for the recognition of Aboriginal rights. In 1980 the leadership of the NIB, composed of chiefs elected through the procedures of the Indian Act, reconstituted their organization as the Assembly of First Nations (AFN). The change came in anticipation of the major role the AFN would play in attempts to elaborate a made-in-Canada constitution. While the leaders of the AFN, as well as other Ottawa-based organizations for Inuit, Métis, native women, off-reserve, and so-called non-status Indians, were willing to accept federal funding for their political activities, this conditional compromise with the very agencies that had colonized indigenous peoples offended some Aboriginal leaders. Leaders within this uncompromising camp were inclined, rather, to see themselves as servants of the real First Nations whose sovereign existence was rooted in indigenous constitutions of custom and convention that long predated the existence of Canada. This more difficult heritage of leadership, some have argued, was more consistent with the true legacies left by the likes of Tecumseh, Big Bear, Levi General, Jules Sioui, and many others.

Challenging the Constitutional Order

At the same time, many indigenous leaders were harkening back to the imperial promises of Great Britain, as legally secured in King George’s Royal Proclamation of 1763 and the Covenant Chain of Crown–Aboriginal treaties. From 1979 to 1982, Indian organizations from throughout Canada mounted a major lobbying campaign at the Westminster parliament in London. The aim of this intervention was to challenge the right of the British government to transfer constitutional powers to the federal and provincial governments without the consent of Indian nations, but especially those whose leaders had made treaties directly with the sovereign of the British imperial government. The role of indigenous peoples in the patriation of the Canadian constitution helped establish patterns of interaction that remain integral to the workings of Canada's political culture to this day. In the process of trying to articulate the legitimate place of indigenous peoples in the changing constitutional order of Canada and the larger global community, many indigenous leaders emerged, bolstering a widespread movement of indigenous peoples to resist assimilation by insisting that Canada must be transformed to give fuller and more equitable expression to Crown-Aboriginal treaty relationships, Aboriginal titles, as well as the right and responsibility of the First Nations to govern themselves.

Much of this effort revolved around processes of constitutional negotiation and judicial arbitration aimed at determining how section 35 of Canada's Constitution Act, 1982 would be interpreted and implemented. That provision "recognizes and affirms" the "existing Aboriginal and treaty rights of the Aboriginal peoples of Canada." Aboriginal peoples are said to include "Indians, Inuit, and Métis." The wording of the new constitution was amended in 1983 to address a systemic problem in Canadian law that has historically disadvantaged Aboriginal women even more than Aboriginal men. Aboriginal involvement in Canada's constitutional politics became increasingly intertwined with the politics of contestation over title to Canada's lands and resources. The Supreme Court intervened in this dispute first in 1973 with its ambivalent ruling on the assertions brought forward by Nisga'a Indians of the Nass River Valley in British Columbia. The effect of this ruling was to pressure the federal government to adhere to the legal requirements of the Royal Proclamation of 1763 by extending the Covenant Chain of Crown-Aboriginal treaties into those areas of Canada, including much of Quebec, most of British Columbia, and all the eastern Arctic, where indigenous peoples had never given consent for the imposition of non-Aboriginal settlements, laws, and institutions.

Militancy and Direct Action

The creation of the American Indian Movement (AIM) in the late 1960s and early 1970s was rooted in the view that indigenous peoples in North America should not accept some municipal or corporate status as subordinate polities within the nation-states that colonized them. Instead the treaty relationships of Indian nations with other sovereign powers were proof of the sovereign character of Aboriginal polities within the framework of international law. The leadership of AIM attempted to assert these principles by taking a stand at Wounded Knee in South Dakota in 1973 and at Anicinabe Park in Kenora, Ontario, in 1974. Louis Hall, AIM's chief iconographer, became a key figure in the genesis of the Mohawk Warriors Society. That group of militant Longhouse traditionalists became prominent in 1990 with its armed refusal to allow the expansion of a municipal golf course at Oka, Quebec. The confrontation at Oka set off a series of confrontations that escalated into an Indian occupation of a major bridge in Montreal, train blockades in northern Ontario and British Columbia, and an armed stance by Peigan Lonefighters opposed to the building of an irrigation dam up river from their reserve in arid southern Alberta. In making their stand the Lonefighters continued to draw attention to a range of issues similar to those raised in previous years by the Lubicon Cree in northern Alberta. By leading the call to boycott a museum show connected to the Calgary Winter Olympics in 1988, the Lubicons emphasized how the failure to observe Aboriginal rights and titles in their traditional lands prevented indigenous peoples from exercising some degree of continuity with the traditional cultural practices of their ancestors.

The influence of AIM was a factor in the armed confrontation at Gustafsen Lake in 1995, when a small group of protesters called into question the legitimacy of the format for negotiating modern-day Crown-Aboriginal treaties throughout extensive territories in British Columbia. Those inside the besieged camp were insistent that the legitimacy of these negotiations was undermined because their structuring within the administrative and funding mechanisms of the Indian Act denied the true international character of the transactions. The stand was closely connected in time and philosophy to the unarmed occupation of an Indian burial ground at Ipperwash, Ontario. This peaceful protest, rooted in a government failure to live up to a promise to return territory to an Ojibway community, resulted in the unprovoked murder of Dudley George by a member of the Ontario Provincial Police. George's martyrdom stands at the extreme end of an ongoing process aimed at preventing targeted individuals from asserting effective leadership in the quest to exercise First Nations sovereignty. One of those so targeted was William Jones Ignace, a Shuswap elder who was sentenced to a long jail term as a result of his actions during the confrontation near Gustafsen Lake.

The lobster fishery off the east coast of Canada became the site of major confrontations between Indian fishers, federal fisheries officials, and non-Aboriginal fishers in 1999, after a Supreme Court ruled in the Marshall decision that a Crown-Aboriginal treaty should be interpreted to give members of the Mi'kmaq nation a measure of autonomy in regulating the harvesting of that renewable resource. The exercise of that right generated a violent response from the non-Aboriginal community in and around Burnt Church, New Brunswick. The Supreme Court responded to this vigilante protest by issuing a "clarification" that effectively limited the extent of the Indian win before the judges. The west coast fishery, too, has been the scene of considerable conflict on the waters. One of the main sites of conflict between the federal Department of Fisheries and Aboriginal fishers has been the Sto:lo community of Cheam on the Fraser River. Chief June Quipp has been a formidable leader of this Aboriginal resistance movement, one closely connected to the AIM-related Native Youth Movement.

In Ontario, the Six Nations community near Brantford and the Mohawk community of Tyendinaga have been sites of important indigenous resistance movements in the early twentieth century. In 2005 a movement originating in the actions of clan mothers led to the occupation of a suburban building site at Caledonia. The occupation had its roots in the Indian contention that the Six Nations community was wrongfully deprived of its title to land going back six miles on either side of the Grand River. This land grant was meant to compensate those Six Nations peoples who had lost their traditional lands south of Lake Ontario after allying themselves militarily with the British imperial army during the American Revolution. In 2007, Shawn Brant of Tyendinaga faced a long jail sentence after he led a series of protests culminating in a blockade of the 401 Highway between Toronto and Montreal. Brant's militant stance was founded on his contention that the wrongful taking of lands from his own community was simply a local manifestation of a more elaborate array of injustices faced by indigenous peoples in Canada.

SEE ALSO: Alcatraz Uprising and the American Indian Movement; Crazy Horse (1849–1877), Sitting Bull (1831–1890), and Native American Resistance at the Battle of Little Bighorn; Native American Protest, 20th Century; Oka Crisis; Riel, Louis (1844–1885)

References and Suggested Readings

- Allen, R. S. (1996) His Majesty's Indian Allies: British Indian Policy in Defense of Canada 1774–1815. Toronto: Dundurn.
- Benjamin, D. (1852) Life of Tecumseh and His Brother the Prophet. Cincinnati: H. S. & J. Applegate.
- Hall, A. J. (2005) The American Empire and the Fourth World. Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press.
- Kulchyski, P. A. (1988) Considerable Unrest: F. O. Loft and the League of Indians. Native Studies Review 4 (1 & 2): 95–113.
- Morris, A. (1880) The Treaties of Canada with the Indians of Manitoba and the North-West Territories. Toronto: Belfords, Clark.
- Sprague, D. N. (1988) Canada and the Métis. Waterloo: Wilfred Laurier Press.
- Tobias, J. L. (1983) Canada's Subjugation of the Crees, 1879–1885. Canadian Historical Review 64 (4): 519–48.
- White, R. (1991) The Middle Ground: Indians, Empires, and Republics in the Great Lakes Region 1650–1815. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Canada, labor protests

David L. Bent

Labor protests accompanied the rise and maturation of industrial capitalism and urbanization in Canada during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries and continued in new forms afterwards. As the employment relationship became more common, workers sought to improve their economic position and the condition of their workplaces through collective action and protest, which in turn led to the birth of a more formal Canadian labor movement.

The earliest acts of working-class agitation came from canal builders, artisans, and longshoremen in the early to mid-nineteenth century. These workers used their numerical strength and influential position in the colonial economy with some success to seek better wages and other improvements. Labor organization at this time often took the form of fraternal organizations or charitable societies, though a number of these societies also functioned as unions in setting hours and wages. However, their employers' willingness to use force against strikes, the seasonal nature of much labor, and the exploitation of ethnic rivalries ensured that gains could also be taken away. Early protests sometimes took the form of crowd actions or riots, and some 350 to 400 such incidents are reported in the years prior to 1850.

The most successful labor protests came from urban craftsmen whose traditional skills were threatened by the rise of industrial production after the middle of the nineteenth century. These craft unions often exhibited a strong centralized authority that allowed them to coordinate actions, share information about wage and working conditions, and distribute funds to member branches in need. In this vein, tradesmen from different towns and cities formed regional alliances, and several of these unions were connected with larger American and British unions, reflecting the large number of immigrants and their cultural and political ties to both countries. Many unions were organized along occupational lines, such as the Knights of St. Crispin, an American shoemakers' association with 16 locals in Canada, whose protests focused on the threat that mechanization posed to their craft. Other labor protests were geared toward specific grievances, such as the Nine Hour League, a multi-occupational movement dedicated to shorter hours for industrial workers; it was the first coordinated act of labor protest in Canadian history and was responsible for a wave of strikes in the burgeoning industrial centers of Québec and Ontario in 1872. The most notable was the Toronto printers' strike which led to large protests against the arrest of union leaders for conspiracy and was followed by the enactment that year of the Trade Unions Act, which recognized the legality of union organization. Strike activity showed a general increase in the years following Confederation, as 204 strikes are known to have occurred in the 1870s, a decade of depression, compared with the 72 reported in the 1860s.

The labor movement developed further in the 1880s in tandem with a maturing industrial capitalism. In this decade 425 strikes were reported, most in the country's large urban centers such as Toronto, which accounted for 122. The ideology of labor also developed further in this period, and with it came questions about the place of workers in society. One reform-minded organization that questioned the subordination of labor to capital in this period was the Knights of Labor, a movement founded in Philadelphia in 1869 which enjoyed relatively more success in Canada. It was built upon the principles of worker cooperation and education and was styled after the secret fraternal societies that were then in fashion. It allowed workers from nearly all backgrounds (Asians being excluded) and industries, including women, to join in the quest for recognition and respect for workers as well as better wages and conditions. At its peak in the 1880s and 1890s the Knights organized some 450 local assemblies across Canada, almost all in Ontario, Québec, and British Columbia.

However inspiring the utopian aspirations of the Knights could be, workers still faced the tough realities of the capitalist system; a system in which pragmatism was as important as reform sentiment. For this reason the framework of the old craft unions became a source of strength for workers possessing the vital skills of the industrial economy, which gave them considerable bargaining power within the developing economy. In 1886 the Trades and Labor Congress (TLC) was established by the unions in order to lobby governments for improvements in legislation and to coordinate the efforts of its members.

An influx of immigrant workers from Britain and other countries where labor radicalism was more firmly entrenched in working-class culture, including Europeans such as Finns and Ukrainians, led to new forms of labor protest. Because many of these immigrants settled in the newly opened West, becoming farmers, fishermen, loggers, and railway workers, this region became the heartland of Canadian labor radicalism. Some of these workers supported the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), founded in Chicago in 1905, dedicated to organizing workers under a single banner to confront the capitalist system. The IWW made several efforts to organize western workers, with its greatest impact possibly being in the Fraser River Railway strike of 1912 when it organized over 7,000 poorly treated railway construction laborers into an ill-fated year-long strike against the Canadian Northern Railway.

Canadian labor entered the twentieth century in a fractured state, while the capitalist class showed remarkable cohesion and was not shy about using its influence to ensure that police and militia forces were available to quash strikes. Such incidents occurred more than thirty times in the years leading up to 1914, reflecting the precarious legal position of unions. Though legal by the terms of the Trade Unions Act of 1872, unions had few rights under the law, as employers could fire union members at will and were not legally required to recognize the unions chosen by their workers.

Though keen to maintain economic growth, the Dominion government was also eager to maintain social order and prevent ugly confrontations between capital and labor. It was thus propelled to reduce confrontation by enacting the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act of 1907, the brainchild of industrial relations expert and future prime minister William Lyon Mackenzie King. This act required workers, especially in vital sectors such as transportation and mining, to go through an extensive "conciliation" process before going on strike legally.

World War I proved to be a catalyst for greater class conflict and a further sundering of the Canadian labor movement along radical and moderate lines. The spirit of patriotism that accompanied the first years of the war ensured that industrial relations were relatively calm, but as the war dragged on, casualties mounted, and evidence of profiteering piled up, workers became restless. They protested the contentious conscription legislation of 1917, and strikes became more frequent in the last two years of the war. Union membership reached 378,000 in 1919, and 400 strikes were reported that year, most of them in Ontario and Québec. The apex of increased strike activity occurred in the 1910s when a total of 2,349 strikes were reported. This atmosphere and the news of the Bolshevik Revolution in Russia buoyed the hopes of the radical faction of the labor movement that the time had come for the overthrow of the capitalist system. Three general strikes occurred in 1919 in Amherst, Nova Scotia, Toronto, and the famous, and violently put down, Winnipeg General Strike. Most strikers were more concerned with securing themselves a better standard of living than overthrowing capitalism, but the "red scare" of the era ensured that the ruling classes would be tuned to the radical rhetoric of the strikes rather than their practical demands. Radical ideals were resurrected in the form of the One Big Union (OBU) in 1919, which was followed in 1921 by the formation of the Communist Party of Canada (CPC).

The 1920s did not prove kind to labor protest, as the strength of the increasingly moderate TLC ensured that labor could not present a united front. The fragile industrial economy of the era did not encourage strike activity (only 989 were reported in this decade), but the exception to this was seen in the coal fields of Cape Breton Island, where miners and steel workers under radical leadership, most notably the fiery Scottish immigrant J. B. McLachlan, waged a series of violent strikes against the British Empire Steel Corporation over wages and union recognition. By 1925 these strikes had resulted in the preservation of the status quo in wage and working conditions, and the formal recognition of the workers' chosen union, but in the face of their continued exploitation and the decline of Cape Breton industry, these provided small comforts.

Labor protests became more widespread in the course of the Great Depression of the 1930s, which demonstrated the need for further organization and for a stronger place for workers within the economy. Though outlawed, the CPC continued to exert influence over unions and labor politics during the 1930s, while moderate socialists founded the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in 1932, a political party that was dedicated to social and economic transformation through parliamentary means. Unemployment was the direst problem facing workers during the 1930s, and thus most labor protests and agitation were geared towards unemployment relief and job security.

The Depression pushed community relief systems to the limit, and the government-based relief was hard to come by or inadequate. One of the major government depression relief initiatives was the establishment of a system of work camps for unemployed single men. The poor conditions of these camps led to protests and strikes among camp inmates which culminated in the Ontario-Ottawa Trek and Regina Riot of 1935, and the abolition of the camp system the following year. The need for a comprehensive system of national unemployment insurance was behind many depression-era labor protests and was a key platform plank in all labor parties. This reform was finally achieved in 1940.

It was also during the 1930s that the idea of industrial unionism achieved greater acceptance as workers in the new mass production industries joined organizations that met their needs more effectively than the craft unions based on particular skills. These new industrial unions included all workers in one industry, regardless of craft or skill. The Oshawa Strike of 1937, when 4,000 workers struck against General Motors, was among the most significant of the new organizing drives among industrial workers, in this case by workers who supported the United Auto Workers. In 1940 the industrial unions formed the Canadian Congress of Labor (CCL), a more aggressive counterpart to the moderate TLC.

The onset of World War II strengthened this drive, as workers protested against government attempts at wage controls and other restrictions. Strike activity rose considerably in the 1940s, with 2,537 strikes reported. Such action convinced the government to change in 1944 to issue an emergency order-in-council, PC 1003, which protected the workers' right to join unions and required employers to recognize unions chosen by their employees. This reform was codified after the war by the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act of 1948 and in complementary provincial legislation.

Further gains in wages and job security were achieved after a series of postwar strikes, such as the Ford strike in Windsor, Ontario in late 1945. This strike was noteworthy for the decision by Justice Ivan C. Rand, later known as the Rand Formula, which allowed for the compulsory check-off of union dues, thus making it possible for unions to achieve greater financial security. These decisions proved to be the foundations of Canada's postwar welfare state and ensured that the working class of Canada would enjoy a more secure and comfortable lifestyle than their predecessors had.

Despite these gains, challenges remained for workers, their unions, and their parties in the postwar world. Although legal, there were still attempts to suppress the rights of workers to strike. This was perhaps strongest in Québec, where the government of Premier Maurice Duplessis did all it could to clamp down on union activity. Québec always remained distinct in the Canadian labor movement. International unions had strong support in Québec, but the perceived socialist and anti-Catholic leanings of these organizations did not endear them to the province's powerful Catholic hierarchy and conservative nationalists who organized the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labor (CCCL) in 1921. By the late 1940s, however, workers in one of these "conservative" unions waged an illegal strike against their American employers for better wages in the asbestos mining district. Subsequent years saw Québec unions become staunch critics of the Duplessis regime, and the CCCL was secularized and modernized as the Confederation of National Trade Unions in 1960.

Another notable example of persistent labor protest in the face of state resistance to unions occurred in the newly confederated province of Newfoundland. In 1958–9 loggers organized under the International Woodworkers of America (IWA) struck for better wages and working conditions but were met with hostility from the government of Joey Smallwood, who managed to set up a rival union under state sponsorship and drive the IWA from Newfoundland. Such direct squelching of strike activity by the government was less common after the 1950s, with the state more often turning to legislated settlements or arbitration to terminate disputes.

Challenges also came from within the labor movement itself and from changing economic and social conditions. The postwar environment was not friendly to workers' parties, and the prosperity of the era and the Cold War paranoia surrounding socialist politics caused the CPC to fade into obscurity. The CCF found itself moribund at about 8–10 percent of the national vote, but fared better at the provincial level, and in 1944, under Tommy Douglas, it began a 20-year period of governing Saskatchewan, the first time a socialist party won political power in North America.

The changing economic landscape also imposed changes upon organized labor. From the 1950s onward the traditional blue collar industrial base was in decline and a white collar office-based workforce, particularly in the civil service, was growing. Organizing this segment of workers became a key effort of unions, but it was not easy and often unsuccessful. Banks and retail outlets proved to be resistant to drives to unionize their employees, but union organizers had more success in the civil service. Government work, be it in the bureaucracy, public works, health services, or education, was the “growth industry” of the postwar era, and by 1970 one in five workers was on the public payroll. However, they did not enjoy union rights until the mid-1960s. A series of illegal strikes by postal workers in 1965 convinced the state that allowing their employees the right to organize and bargain was better than the threat of wildcat action. Thus the Public Service Staff Relations Act of 1967 was passed giving public servants union rights similar to other workers.

The workforce was also changing due to the rising number of women workers, who reached about 35 percent of the workforce by the end of the 1960s. Their increasing numbers led them to demand pay equity and fair representation in union leadership. Gains were slowly made on these fronts, so much so that by 1984 a woman, Shirley Carr, was the president of the Canadian Labor Congress (CLC).

The CLC was itself another strategy for coping with the changing times through further unity within the labor movement. Founded in 1956, it united the TLC and CCL unions under one banner. It also made strides to ensure that unions had a stronger political voice by joining forces with the CCF to form the New Democratic Party (NDP) in 1961, which has formed governments in four of the provinces at various times but has had less success at the federal level. In the years following 1970 labor organizations and workers have faced many new challenges, such as deindustrialization, inflation, globalization, and free trade, and have responded to them by building on an established tradition of protest that has contributed to the shaping of modern Canada.

SEE ALSO: Canada, Law and Public Protest: History; Cooperative Commonwealth; Regina Riot; Winnipeg General Strike of 1919

References and Suggested Readings

- Avery, D. (1979) “Dangerous Foreigners”: European Immigrant Workers and Labor Radicalism in Canada, 1896–1932. Toronto: McClelland & Stewart.
- Cruikshank, D. & Kealey, G. S. (1987) Strikes in Canada, 1891–1950. Labor/Le Travail 20 (Fall): 85–145.
- Frank, D. (1999) J. B. McLachlan: A Biography. Toronto: James Lorimer.
- Heron, C. (1989) The Canadian Labor Movement: A Short History. Toronto: James Lorimer.
- Heron, C. (Ed.) (1998) The Workers’ Revolt in Canada, 1917–1925. Toronto: University of Toronto Press.
- Kealey, G. S. (1995) Workers and Canadian History. Montreal-Kingston: McGill-Queens University Press.
- Kealey, G. S. & Palmer, B. D. (1982) Dreaming of What Might Be: The Knights of Labor in Ontario, 1880–1900. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Kealey, L. (1998) Enlisting Women for the Cause: Women, Labor, and the Left in Canada, 1890–1920. Toronto: University of Toronto Press.
- Morton, D. (1998) Working People: An Illustrated History of the Canadian Labor Movement. Montreal-Kingston: McGill-Queens University Press.
- Palmer, B. D. (1992) Working Class Experience: Rethinking the History of Canadian Labor, 1800–1991. Toronto: McClelland & Stewart.

Canada, law and public protest: history

Irina Ceric

Moments of protest and rebellion have always challenged systems of power and authority, but particularly since the rise of the liberal democratic state, laws and legal institutions have mediated the tensions and contradictions between individuals, social movements, and the existing order. In the Canadian context, the ongoing history of law and social protest has been shaped by the evolution of a legal framework inherited from England but continually altered by the demands of settlement and nation building, and more recently, by constitutional rights guarantees. While criminalization of dissent, particularly of street demonstrations and other forms of collective action, remains a key issue in studies of the relationship between law and protest, law has also become a tool of resistance in itself, either in conjunction with or instead of other forms of mobilization.

Many of the provisions which still constrain political protest and assembly in Canada, such as riot, unlawful assembly, and breach of peace, first arose under English common law and, beginning in the nineteenth century, subsequently developed as public order offenses in an attempt to replace treason and seditious libel as the primary, and increasingly unpopular, political crimes committed. Some of these offenses can only be described as archaic. For example, it appears that the earliest recorded definition of an unlawful assembly stems from the reign of King Henry VII (1485–1509). Sir William Holdsworth’s A History of English Law concludes that unlawful assembly and its allied offenses (such as riot) began to acquire their modern characteristics at the end of the sixteenth century, based partly on the treatment of these offenses by the Court of Star Chamber. By 1986, when the Public Order Act was introduced, public order law in England had become “depoliticized,” in that the explicit political crimes such as treason and sedition were no longer prosecuted in favor of resort to the “ordinary” criminal offenses to deal with outbreaks of disorder (Smith 1987). Nonetheless, the old common law offenses of riot and unlawful assembly continue to be deployed in England, a notable example being the police response to the 1985 coal miners’ strike.

Canadian criminal law traces its genesis to English law (the influence of the French civil code having been relegated to civil matters in what would become the province of Québec), and the early colonial era reflects this influence in instances of social unrest. A representative example arose in 1788 in the district of Ferryland in what is now Newfoundland, when 114 Irish immigrants were convicted of riotous or unlawful assembly, with some sentenced to transportation (deportation) or banishment, following clashes among the Irish Catholics in Ferryland – divisions which were exploited and exacerbated by the town’s Protestant merchants and employers. The English and Canadian criminal justice systems have, perhaps not surprisingly, diverged considerably since the colonial period. In The Birth of a Criminal Code: The Evolution of Canada’s Justice System, Desmond Brown argues that the particular economic and social conditions in colonial North America initially resulted in short, concise proscriptions on criminal behavior that became more comprehensive over time as life in the colonies itself became more complex and stratified. It was not until almost three decades after Confederation, however, that the first Criminal Code of Canada came into force in 1893, with common law offenses abolished only in 1953, thereafter precluding further resort to the some of the political crimes inherited from England.

The public order offenses have remained almost unchanged since the inception of the Criminal Code, yet both the unlawful assembly and riot provisions remain relevant and are regularly charged and prosecuted to varying degrees across Canada. Unlike the now disused charges of seditious libel and treason, riot and unlawful assembly (as well as general provisions such as mischief and breach of peace), are predicated on the claim of proscribing the manner of political speech rather than its content – in other words, by criminalizing political action or even the very assembly of the disaffected, rather than searching for evidence of seditious or treasonous intent in their words. The fallout from two key events signaled this evolution in the Canadian state’s legal practice: the sedition trials following the 1919 Winnipeg General Strike which engendered public scrutiny of such political crimes, and the debate over the repeal of the Criminal Code’s unlawful association provisions following the trials of Community Party leaders in the early 1930s (MacKinnon 1977). Nonetheless, the resilience of public order offenses, as reflected in their resurgence in the face of increased political activism in the last decade and the failure of challenges to the constitutionality of the unlawful assembly provisions, demonstrates that the legal regulation of political activity has not entirely escaped its repressive roots. Despite the constitutionally protected status of political speech and peaceful assemblies, the actual regulation of such activities reveals a pattern of criminalization and repression in which the utilization of criminal charges has played a central role.

Historically, the use of criminal law, including unlawful assembly, riot, and picketing-related charges, has followed the trajectories set by expressions of political, social, and economic dissent and disruption, peaking at moments when protests and resistance boil over onto the streets, including two main spikes: the first during the Great Depression and the second during the last decade. During the 1930s, perhaps not surprisingly, disputes arising out of strikes, unemployed workers’ movements, and emergency relief related protests formed the bulk of public order prosecutions. Palmer (2003) argues that the ways that law was actually challenged most directly in the 1930s was in the class-related but union-separated struggles of the jobless, the homeless, and the relief-dependent poor. Such victims of the capitalist marketplace’s vicissitudes sustained a creative arsenal of resistance and opposition that flaunted the laws of the land in the same way that the laws of the market had bluntly bypassed their needs.

The creativity in tactics cited by Palmer is evident in the range of marches, occupations, protests, and other collective actions which would give rise to criminal charges. Although the reported cases from the 1930s are primarily related to the actions of unemployed workers, media archives suggest a parallel targeting of socialist and communist organizers, and there was certainly an overlap between these movements. A key example is the Québec case of R. v. Pavletich which arose from a May Day meeting at a Ukrainian Temple in 1932. Police moved in to arrest the speaker, sparking off a confrontation that began with the throwing of rocks at the officers, use of a fire hose against the assembled crowds, warning shots fired by officers, and finally, the arrest of 32 people.

The decades following the Depression saw few public order prosecutions, although strikes and other labor actions continued to be criminally proscribed, as did the activities of religious minorities, including the Doukhobors in British Columbia and Jehovah's Witnesses, particularly in Québec. Nonetheless, the 1954 parliamentary debates on the public order provisions of the Code reveal the ideological cleavages then still evident in Canadian politics. One member of Parliament from the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation, Angus MacInnis, framed his opposition to the riot and unlawful assembly offenses in broad terms, maintaining that "useful as these provisions might be in time of trouble, they will not of themselves maintain an orderly society. We have riots, and we have riots only when economic and social conditions have brought people to the point of desperation. These are the basic causes of this sort of disturbances of the people."

By 1970, however, a different sort of political action captured attention across Canada. Members of the Front de liberation du Québec (FLQ), a leftist movement with the aim of independence for the province of Québec, had been engaging in illegal activities for close to a decade, including bombings and robberies; but the kidnappings of James Cross, a British trade commissioner, and Pierre Laporte, a Québec cabinet minister, in October of 1970 raised suspicions of a broad insurgency. Led by Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau, the Canadian government invoked emergency legislation suspending civil liberties and arrested close to 500 people, the majority of them later released without charges. Some FLQ leaders, however, were tried twice on charges of seditious conspiracy, and although none were convicted of those charges (convictions on other criminal charges were upheld), the October Crisis represents the apex of legislative and judicial responses to political activity in modern Canada.

Only a few years later, however, and despite sporadic prosecutions for political protests and strike-related activities, the relative lull in social activism in the 1980s and early 1990s was reflected in the minimal deployment of public order criminal charges. But this situation changed dramatically again in 1997 with the resurgence of political activism by a new generation of activists clustered around the emerging anti-globalization and urban anti-poverty movements, and a concomitant revival in public order prosecutions across Canada, but particularly centered in Toronto and Montreal. Dozens of small local or regional protests and other actions have attracted criminal sanction, as have larger gatherings such those opposing the Free Trade Area of the Americas meeting in Québec City in 2001 and the Organization of American States Ministerial in Windsor in 2000; however, the number of incidents does not even approach the number of individuals affected, as many of the smaller events throughout Québec actually involved the arrests of hundreds of people and the cumulative prosecution of almost 2,000 people in the last decade.

Although it has always been the case that the voices of the poor and powerless are heard in the streets and workplaces, this recent trend suggests that the significance of the public order offenses has grown in tandem with the rise of protest and public demonstrations as the primary expressive vehicles for marginalized groups and individuals. As Stoykewych (1985) argues, in the current Canadian context, "the public demonstration can be seen as a functional corrective to a capitalist-democratic form of order that, by restricting the scope of discourse within its representative institutions in order to preserve the legitimacy of its decisions, denies many of its citizens the possibility of meaningful political participation." Despite the centrality of public protest as an embodiment of political speech, the limits on state sanction of such protest have not been greatly reduced by the inclusion of rights of assembly and expression in the 1982 Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and the regulation or outright criminalization of demonstrations and other expressive activities continues to constitute a significant restraint, despite the focus on expressive form rather than content. It was not until 2000, for example, that a Charter challenge to the Criminal Code's unlawful assembly provision reached a provincial appeal court, and the resulting judgment is notable for its explicit rejection of the notion that a pre-Charter statute or doctrine merits reexamination on constitutional grounds. Nonetheless, in the modern Canadian context, the deployment of unlawful assembly and other public order offenses has resulted in a cumulative impact that has criminalized dissent nearly as effectively as a content-based sanction would, particularly during eras of increased political mobilization.

Constitutional rights guarantees have also had a negligible effect on the broader political context informing judicial and policing policy. The limits of constitutional rights are reflected in the Canadian state's repeated use of force against Indigenous activism, particularly land claim disputes, such as the deployment of military personnel in Mohawk territory in 1990 and the killing of protester Dudley George in an Ontario park in 1995. More recently, as in other liberal democracies, the introduction of antiterrorism legislation in late 2001 created a chilling effect on legitimate but potential unlawful advocacy.

SEE ALSO: Peterloo Massacre, 1819; Winnipeg General Strike of 1919; World Trade Organization (WTO) Protests, Quebec City, 2001

References and Suggested Readings

- Esmonde, J. (2003) Bail, Global Justice and the Limits of Dissent. Osgoode Hall Law Journal 41: 322–61.
- Greenwood, F. M. & Wright, B. (1996) Introduction: State Trials, the Rule of Law, and Executive Powers in Early Canada. In F. M. Greenwood & B. Wright (Eds.), Canadian State Trials, Volume I: Law, Politics and Security Measures, 1608–1837. Toronto: University of Toronto Press.
- MacKinnon, P. (1977) Conspiracy and Sedition as Canadian Political Crimes. McGill Law Journal 23: 622–43.
- Palmer, B. D. (2003) What's Law Got to Do with It? Historical Considerations of Class Struggle, Boundaries of Constraint and Capitalist Authority. Osgoode Hall Law Journal 41: 465 at 481.
- Sheldrick, B. (2004) Perils and Possibilities: Social Activism and the Law. Halifax: Fernwood.
- Smith, A. T. H. (1987) Offences Against Public Order: Including the Public Order Act 1986. London: Sweet & Maxwell.
- Stoykewych, R. (1985) Street Legal: Constitutional Protection of Public Demonstration in Canada. University of Toronto Faculty of Law Review 43: 43–69.
- Waddington, D. (1992) Contemporary Issues in Public Disorder: A Comparative and Historical Approach. London: Routledge.

Canada, Rebellion of 1837–1838

John Robert Henris

The Canada Rebellion of 1837 and 1838 resulted from a number of disparate political and social grievances that increasingly gained momentum among political reformers and the rural populace during the 1830s. In Lower Canada, Louis-Joseph Papineau led the Parti Patriote and spoke out against the power of the Château Clique, a group of wealthy British and French Canadian businessmen wielding almost absolute political authority in Lower Canada. Papineau increasingly agitated for reforms providing individual voters, as well as the elected assembly, with more political power. In Upper Canada William Lyon Mackenzie led other reformers against a group of similarly privileged officeholders known as the Family Compact. Despite the seeming collusion of reformers in Upper and Lower Canada, there were substantial differences. A strong current of French Canadian nationalism ran through many of the supporters of the Papineau faction, while many of McKenzie's rural supporters originally came from the United States and harbored particular resentment toward the monopolization of large tracts of land by the Anglican Church. Such longstanding grievances were only exacerbated by the agricultural and economic crisis of the 1830s. The international wheat market collapsed and harvests were poor on a number of occasions during the 1830s as well.

In May of 1837, Patriot leadership learned that the British parliament rejected earlier calls for reform under the Ninety-Two Resolutions and placed further limitations upon the elected assembly. The agitation for reform having always been stronger among the rural populace of French ancestry in Lower Canada, the nature of the Patriot movement became increasingly radical in the fall of 1837. The political leadership of the Patriot movement demanded political reform while agrarians increasingly sought the end of such traditional forms of rural oppression as seignorial rents. Alarmed at the growing instances of protest and unrest in the rural districts, British regulars were brought in to bolster colonial authority even as Patriot militias began assembling in the countryside around Montreal and in the Richelieu Valley.

Armed conflict broke out in the winter of 1837 when Sir John Colborne ordered British military forces on a punitive expedition to break up Patriot strongholds and arrest their leadership. Despite initial Patriot success in holding St. Denis, British regulars crushed rebel positions at St. Charles and St. Eustache. William Mackenzie, taking advantage of the absence of British troops and hoping to relieve pressure on Lower Canada, moved against Toronto only to have his force dispersed by Canadian loyalist militia at Montgomery's Tavern. As the rebellion collapsed in Upper and Lower Canada, Patriot leaders, including Papineau and Mackenzie, abandoned their respective colonies and were across the US border by January of 1838.

In the United States the Patriot leadership found refuge in northern states like Michigan, Vermont, and New York. Sympathetic American supporters established secret societies called Hunters' Lodges while Patriots formed similar organizations called Frères Chasseurs in Lower Canada. The Hunters' Lodge movement proved particularly active in Vermont, New York, Ohio, and Michigan.

Americans embraced the Patriot cause for a number of reasons. Some wanted fervently to bring republican government to the colonies of Upper and Lower Canada, while others, hostile toward the British, wanted only to cause instability in the empire. Still others were related to American emigrants who settled, particularly in Upper Canada, following the end of the War of 1812. Agricultural hardship and the subsequent market panic of 1837 provided the catalyst for Americans to embrace the Patriot cause for potential economic gain as well. Some of the Patriot leadership even offered prospective American recruits land in Canada should the rebellion eventually succeed in toppling British authority.

In December of 1837 the destruction of the steamer Caroline threatened to escalate tensions between Britain and the United States. American regulars came to the border and New York and Vermont called up their militias. The following month the United States again affirmed neutrality; however, federal officials did little to prevent the northern states bordering Upper and Lower Canada from being used as staging areas for the Patriot movement. During the spring and summer of 1838 Patriot forces made a number of raids into Upper and Lower Canada at Week's House, Pelee Island, and Short Hills. British regulars and loyal militia easily repelled cross-border raids.

Conflict again broke out in early November in Lower Canada as the Frères Chasseurs assembled in the rural districts and Robert Nelson gathered a large Patriot contingent at Napierville. In the northern states, Patriot rebels and American sympathizers crossed the frontier into Upper Canada and were defeated by British and royalist forces at both Prescott and Windsor. Nelson managed to briefly hold Napierville before a large British force under Colborne reentered the city and the remnants of the Patriot army fled south across the border. In the aftermath of the fighting of November and December 1838 soldiers burned many farms, and British authorities executed a handful of Patriots and transported others to Australia. Some of these were Americans.

Ultimately, the elite leadership of the rebellion under men like Papineau, McKenzie, and Nelson failed to channel popular rural discontent into sustainable rebellion. In response to their unsuccessful uprisings, however, the British government sent Lord John Durham to report on grievances in Upper and Lower Canada. Lord Durham concluded that British authorities should grant more political autonomy and that Upper and Lower Canada should be united. British officials hoped the merging of the two colonies into the Province of Canada might weaken French Canadian cultural identity and help assimilate the rural populace of Lower Canada. Consequently, the merging of Upper and Lower Canada came to pass under the Act of Union in 1840, marking the beginning of more decentralized rule and responsible government in Canada.

SEE ALSO: Canada, Law and Public Protest: History

References and Suggested Readings

Greer, A. (1993) The Patriots and the People: The Rebellion of 1837 in Lower Canada. Toronto: University of Toronto Press.

Guillet, E. (1968) The Lives and Times of the Patriots: An Account of the Upper Canada Rebellion of 1837–1838 and of the Patriot Agitation in the United States, 1837–1842. Toronto: University of Toronto Press.

Cannon, James P. (1890–1974) and American Trotskyism

Bryan D. Palmer

Growing up in Rosedale, Kansas in the 1890s, James P. Cannon was the son of Irish immigrants. But he would have fit comfortably in a Mark Twain novel, his Midwestern twang and homespun aphorisms marking him as very much a native son. By 1911, however, he was a self-identified professional revolutionary, committed to the creation of a world in which the exploitation of the working class was brought to a decisive halt.

Cannon's father, John, was a small-town socialist who supported a complicated and changing family (two wives predeceased him and a third did not remain in his home long) through waged work and, by the turn of the century, on the earnings of marginal business ventures. He revered Eugene Debs and had socialist publications like the Appeal to Reason in the home. Jim Cannon was won to radical ideas by reading such journals and through active involvement in labor defense campaigns.

Joining the Socialist Party in 1908, Jim Cannon thirsted for knowledge. After a stint working in Kansas City's packinghouses, he returned to high school, where he quickly gained a reputation as Rosedale's boy orator and star debater. Older than his fellow students by four-to-five years, Cannon struck up an intimate bond with his teacher, a free-thinking woman of Scandinavian descent, Lista Makimson.

Economic pressures forced Cannon out of his classes and back into the job market. Keen to be directly involved in class struggle, he joined the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW). From 1911 to 1914 Cannon soapboxed and hoboed his way from Kansas City to Chicago, from Newcastle, Pennsylvania to Duluth, Minnesota, agitating and organizing workers. He was soon a veteran strike leader and free speech militant, a galvanizing advocate of workers' uprisings.

He also married. Fearful that a threatened jail sentence would part them decisively if they did not sanctify their union, Lista and Jim wed in 1913. With two children, Carl and Ruth, born in the difficult years of World War I, Cannon returned to Rosedale-Kansas City. His antiwar views and the menacingly anti-radical climate led him to be ostracized and caused him to question the possibilities of revolutionary social change.

The Russian Revolution of 1917 revived Cannon's commitments. Drifting from the IWW, Cannon rejoined the Socialist Party and was a staunch member of its vocal left wing. Cannon was soon a leading activist in the Nebraska, Missouri, and Kansas regional development of the fractured underground communist milieu, and he helped establish the Communist Labor Party (CLP). With Earl Browder, another Kansas revolutionary, Cannon founded and edited one of the few communist newspapers in the Midwest, the Workers' World.

As the post-World War I Red Scare unleashed by Attorney-General A. Mitchell Palmer drove the revolutionary underground deeper and deeper into its subterranean lairs, Cannon was numbered among the thousands of activists arrested and imprisoned. He languished in jail for two months in 1919–20, arrested for stirring up the Kansas miners.

Upon his release, Cannon grasped that the critical need was to unite the communist forces, divided into foreign-language sections (which formed the core of the Communist Party of America) and a more Americanized, labor-oriented contingent in the CLP. Cannon played a pivotal role in bridging various divides, chairing a December 1921 Manhattan convention that founded the Workers' Party, later to be renamed the Workers (Communist) Party and, eventually, in 1929, the Communist Party, USA.

As one of the leading figures of communism in the United States in the 1920s, Cannon made a number of trips to Moscow, meeting with prominent Russian Bolsheviks such as Leon Trotsky and Gregory Zinoviev. He pioneered the creation of the party's most successful united front endeavor, the International Labor Defense, dedicated to the non-partisan defense of all class war prisoners. A stunning orator and a party official with a keen sense of the importance of trade union issues, Cannon dedicated himself to making communism a legal movement that registered its importance in US working-class circles. Perhaps his strongest ally in these years was Rose Karsner, and in the mid-1920s, while in Chicago and separated from Lista and the children, Jim began a lifelong love relationship with Rose that was sealed in political convictions. Cannon and Makimson separated as a consequence.

Cannon battled factional intrigues and party opponents, gathering around him an able group that included youth leaders Max Shachtman and Martin Abern and trade union stalwarts Bill Dunne and Arne Swabeck. They eventually ran headlong into other factions headed by, on the one hand, William Z. Foster, and, on the other, Jay Lovestone. The factional log-jam in the American communist movement worsened in 1927 with the death of Charles Emil (C. E.) Ruthenberg, long the leading functionary in the party. Lovestone quickly usurped the communist administrative apparatus. Undoubtedly the most unscrupulous of American communism's leaders, Lovestone relied on his contacts with the Communist International's (Comintern/CI) increasingly bureaucratized Stalinist officialdom, the leading emissary in the United States being a Hungarian exile known as John Pepper.

Cannon grew increasingly disillusioned. He tended not to appreciate the larger animating political degeneration within the Soviet Union and the Comintern, concerning himself largely with the American troubles. Attending the Sixth World Congress of the CI in the summer of 1928, reading the exiled Leon Trotsky's Draft Program of the Communist International: A Critique of Fundamentals, and discussing the document with Maurice Spector, a Canadian revolutionary and theoretician, Cannon came to believe that the Comintern had lost its way. Stalin had subordinated the world revolutionary movement to the protection and preservation of "socialism in one country," and Cannon began to appreciate how this larger political degeneration fostered the factionalism in the American party by balancing forces against one another and keeping all sufficiently weakened and incapable of exercising effective leadership.

Returning to the United States, Cannon was committed to forging a left opposition within the CPUSA by convincing the ranks of the rightness of Trotsky's critique. This was not to happen. Cannon and about 100 sympathizers were soon expelled, forming the Communist League of America (Opposition). The CLA lived through a difficult period, which saw Cannon and his long-time ally, Shachtman, cross factional swords.

By 1934, however, the two leading figures in the CLA had worked through their early 1930s differences sufficiently to develop the strategy behind the Minneapolis teamsters' General Strike. The CLA merged with A. J. Muste's American Workers Party and then orchestrated a 1936 entry into the Socialist Party (SP) of Norman Thomas. Cannon and the Trotskyists were expelled from the SP in 1937, forming the first Trotskyist political party in the United States, the Socialist Workers Party (SWP) on New Year's Day, 1938.

No sooner was the SWP formed, however, than it faced the onslaught of state repression. The 1940 Smith Act, passed as war broke out in Europe, made criminal any act or advocacy of overthrowing the constituted government of the United States. This legislation, combined with an antiquated Civil War statute, was soon used to bring indictments against 29 leaders of the SWP, among them the national secretary, Jim Cannon, and most of the leadership of the rebel Minneapolis Local 544 of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, long a thorn in the side of the union's conservative bureaucracy. Eighteen of the indicted eventually went to trial, and Cannon spent almost 14 months in jail, finally released in January 1945.

Between 1939 and 1953 the SWP also weathered a series of internal oppositions and factional contests that drained members and leading cadres in splits and expulsions. But these challenges also clarified programmatic issues on the nature and meaning of the Soviet Union; the obligation of members to exist under some form of party discipline; and the tasks of a revolutionary organization in the changing context of post-World War II America, one part of which was the danger of right-wing revival, evident in McCarthyism, another component being the softening of Stalinism with the "Great Leader's" death and the increasing defections from the ranks of orthodox communism.

As World War II ended, the Cannon-led SWP seemed poised for a breakthrough. It had grown to 1,500 members, had significant strengths in certain trade union sectors, and was beginning to recruit African Americans to its ranks. The party press, the Militant, had a circulation of over 30,000.

This, however, was to prove the SWP's height of influence and importance. Cannon's capacities to exercise leadership in the United States and international Trotskyist movements (where other factional contests had also fractured national sections and weakened the global movement) was waning. Approaching 65 years of age, Cannon retired as national secretary in 1953, but held on to the more honorific post of national chairman for the rest of his life.

Over the course of the late 1950s the SWP did not fare particularly well. It continued to lose members and leading cadre, especially as contentious debates developed with respect to the meaning of policies and practices in China and Cuba. The party led few campaigns, concentrating more and more on electoral politics by running candidates for office. The SWP thus entered the 1960s ill-suited to capitalize on the rise of the New Left.

Cannon's last years were spent in an uneasy tension as he saw the SWP and its new leadership adapt to the changes of a tumultuous decade. The rise of black nationalism and the mass mobilization of hundreds of thousands against the war in Vietnam affected the SWP greatly. Cannon welcomed some of this but was cognizant of how distanced much of the new political terrain was from a radical revival of the working class.

With Rose Karsner's death in 1968 Cannon was deeply shaken, missing acutely her companionship, both social and political. His own death followed in 1974. Cannon left a legacy of revolutionary continuity reaching from the pre-World War I syndicalist and socialist movements into the 1960s. He is unrivalled in the history of the American revolutionary left for his organizational acumen, his refusal to compromise revolutionary principle, and his capacity to build a party of communist opposition on the basis of programmatic clarity, centralized in its essential purpose but democratic in everyday governance.

SEE ALSO: Communist Party of the United States of America (CPUSA); Industrial Workers of the World (IWW); Russia, Revolution of February/March 1917

References and Suggested Readings

Breitman, G., Le Blanc, P., & Wald, A. (1996) Trotskyism in the United States: Historical Essays and Reconsiderations. Atlantic Highlands, NJ: Humanities Press.

- Cannon, J. P. (1943) The Struggle for a Proletarian Party. New York: Pioneer.
- Cannon, J. P. (1972) The History of American Trotskyism: From Its Origins (1928) to the Founding of the Socialist Workers Party (1938) – Report of a Participant. New York: Pathfinder.
- Cannon, J. P. (1973) Notebook of an Agitator. New York: Pathfinder.
- Cannon, J. P. (1983) The First Ten Years of American Communism – Report of a Participant. New York: Pathfinder.
- Cannon, J. P. (1992) James P. Cannon and the Early Years of American Communism: Selected Writings and Speeches, 1920–1928. New York: Prometheus Research Library.
- Cannon, J. P. (2002) Dog Days: James P. Cannon vs. Max Shachtman in the Communist League of America, 1931–1933. New York: Prometheus Research Library.
- Evans, L. (Ed.) (1976) James P. Cannon as We Knew Him: By Thirty-Three Comrades, Friends, and Relatives. New York: Pathfinder.
- Myers, C. A. (1977) The Prophet's Army: The American Trotskyists, 1928–1941. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.
- Palmer, B. D. (2007) James P. Cannon and the Origins of the American Revolutionary Left, 1890–1928. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.
- Wald, A. (1987) The New York Intellectuals: The Rise and Decline of the Anti-Stalinist Left from the 1930s to the 1960s. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

Canudos, religion and rebellion in 19th-century Brazil

Diogo L. Pinheiro

Canudos was the name of the abandoned farm where Antônio Vicente Mendes Maciel (1830–97), popularly known as Antônio Conselheiro (the Counselor), and his followers settled in 1893. It is now associated with the massacre of Belo Monte, the most brutal event of the early days of the Brazilian republic, which had been established in 1889. Though the exact figures are the subject of some historical controversy, at least 15,000 people were killed by the army, many of them after their capture. This event had a profound impact on Brazilian self-identity and inspired one of the greatest novels of lusophone literature, Os Sertões, by Euclides da Cunha (1866–1909). The official version of what transpired in Canudos described Antônio Conselheiro as a religious fanatic who was staunchly opposed to the recently established republic and who used his charisma to attract thousands of uneducated peasants to the village he created. Recent historiography has called this into question, and there exist different definitions of the events at Canudos, which have been called a war, a revolt, and a massacre at different points in time by different people.

Historical Background

Brazil underwent significant changes in the last quarter of the nineteenth century which were particularly severe for those living in the sertão, the arid backlands of the Brazilian Northeast. The period was marked by economic recession and significant shifts in the national distribution of income. The monarchy that had ruled Brazil since its independence in 1822 was overthrown by a military government in 1889; eventually, a president was elected by the minority of the population eligible to vote. These changes significantly affected the northeastern states, which saw both their political and economic power reduced drastically.

As in most Latin American nations, industrialization proceeded at a very slow pace in Brazil during the nineteenth century. The nation was still heavily dependent on the export of primary agricultural goods. The production of sugar, the Northeast's principal economic resource, underwent drastic transformations. Large plantations responsible for the majority of sugarcane production had relied almost exclusively on slave labor up until 1888. The abolition of slavery that year, coupled with the long cycle of droughts that plagued the region from 1870 onwards, led to a deeply felt economic crisis in the region.

This crisis increased growing regional disparities of income as coffee production, concentrated mostly in the southeastern states, grew in importance, absorbing most of the immigrant labor force from Europe. The growing disparity also generated internal migration flows as many fled the deteriorating conditions of the Northeast. The abolition of slavery and internal migration created a problem for sugar producers, as they saw their main sources of cheap labor dwindle. The creation of centralized refineries and the modest efforts at mechanization that accompanied them did little to alleviate the problem. One of the main impacts of these changes on the local economy was the growing importance of the sertanejos, or peasants from the sertão. They lived under miserable conditions as sharecroppers, but were usually self-reliant and enjoyed a greater degree of freedom than their counterparts throughout the region. Most of Conselheiro's followers would come from this class, who became a significant force in the reaction to the establishment of Belo Monte.

In 1889 Brazil saw a monarchic authoritarian regime replaced by an authoritarian military one, with a civilian elected to the presidency only in 1894, in another election that allowed only a few white, literate property owners to vote. Given Brazil's minimal transition toward greater popular participation in government at that point, the late adoption of a republic (seven decades later than in most other South American nations) had a profound effect on the national distribution of power. A new constitution was adopted, exhibiting an extreme form of federalism. A republican movement emerged in the southern half of the nation as coffee planters sought the power to create militias, subsidize immigration, and finance investment in infrastructure through foreign loans – all things deemed vital to their interests. The states with the most dynamic economies, such as São Paulo and Minas Gerais, benefited greatly from this federalism, while the Northeast, with its economy in a significant downturn, saw state power greatly weaken. With federal and local state power decreasing, the figure of the Coronel – a local boss with a land monopoly organized in large plantations – became central to northeastern political life. These bosses employed armed henchmen, known locally as jagunços, as their own private police forces, charged with violently resolving disputes over land and rent. It is against this background – which saw increased power for the Coronéis alongside the growing importance of local peasants in the economy – that the events staged in Canudos must be understood.

Antônio Conselheiro and Millenarianism

Antônio Vicente Mendes Maciel was born on March 13, 1830 in the town of Quixeramobim, Ceará. His family raised cattle elsewhere in the state, and from early on he experienced the violence of the Brazilian backlands. Family feuds were common in the region at that time, and they were solved through force, not legal action. In 1833 the Maciel family started a feud with the locally powerful Araújo family, a conflict that would last for decades and result in numerous deaths on both sides. In 1834 Antônio's mother died and a few years later he went back to his hometown of Quixeramobim to study Latin, geography, and other subjects with his grandfather, a local school teacher.

Young Antônio grew up in this unsettled environment with an alcoholic father, an abusive stepmother, and a history of violence in his family. Despite this, he was described as a quiet, hardworking, and incredibly pious boy. At the age of 25 he took over the family's business after his father died. A couple of years later, in 1857, he married Brasilina Laurentina de Lima, with whom he had two children. In 1861 his wife began an affair with a police officer, an event that left Maciel deeply disturbed. After leaving his family, he went on to live in several different towns and work in a number of different occupations, from teacher to salesperson, all of them unsuccessful. Deeply religious, in the early 1870s he decided to embark on a journey through the backlands, preaching and serving as a sort of lay religious advisor. A very charismatic man, it was not long before he had a number of devoted followers. In addition to his charisma, two factors contributed to his popularity: the state of the Church and the Millenarian tradition in the region.

For all its power and prestige, the Brazilian Roman Catholic Church had little control over several parishes in the backlands. Very few priests wanted to minister in the isolated and impoverished regions of the nation. Most parishes in those regions only had part-time ministers, if any at all. Overworked priests appreciated at first the type of support that Antônio and other lay preachers gave them. Ministering to a number of parishes, Antônio soon had a loyal following of jagunços and sertanejos. His followers called him Antônio Conselheiro and later on he was even called Bom Jesus Conselheiro (Good Jesus the Counselor). He and his followers moved across the backlands, not only preaching, but also performing certain services – building and reforming churches, among other things. His sermons mixed orthodox Catholicism with more mystical elements of the Millenarian tradition.

Millenarianism refers to a belief that a major transformation of society is about to occur and that all wrongs will be corrected. In its Christian version popular in the Brazilian Northeast during this period, the return of Jesus Christ would be preceded by a number of catastrophic signals. Many saw the severe droughts of the region as such a signal, and turned to charismatic leaders for direction. Conselheiro became such a leader in the eyes of his followers. But his leadership soon started to upset the traditional leadership of the Church, especially after the reforms of the 1880s. The Roman Catholic Church in general and the Brazilian Church in particular promoted a number of administrative changes designed to root out heterodox elements. The Church saw its authority threatened by secularism, Protestantism, mysticism, and other outside influences, and it sought to reestablish traditional liturgical practices. These "Ultramontane" reforms led to large numbers of European priests being sent to Brazil. Figures such as Conselheiro were soon seen as threats, and in 1882 the Archbishop of Bahia banned him from giving sermons in all churches. He was considered politically subversive and theologically unorthodox. These tensions mounted with the proclamation of a republic in 1889 and the official separation of Church and state. Conselheiro became a thorn in the side of not only the Church, but also the republic, against which he preached violently, and the landed oligarchies, which saw him as spreading "fanaticism" among their labor force.

Creation and Destruction of Belo Monte

Through his preaching and the work that he and his followers performed in the poorest areas of the region, Conselheiro's following continued to increase throughout the 1880s and early 1890s. Just as his popularity grew, so did tensions with the republic, the Church, and the landed oligarchies. In 1893, in an act of protest against the federal government, he and his followers burned tax notices in the town of Bom Conselho, Bahia. They were chased by police forces, but these forces were soon routed. After this confrontation, Conselheiro and his followers settled in the abandoned Canudos farm, on fertile land at the margins of the Vaza-Barris River in Northern Bahia. This settlement received the name of Belo Monte, and soon a number of sertanejos and jagunços flocked there.

Life in Belo Monte was pastoral. Inhabitants lived in mud-brick houses, farmed the land, and raised cattle. Property was communal, and many, if not all, donated proceeds to the community from the sale of their properties outside Canudos. The local elites initially tolerated the village. The owner of the land where the village was created had no interest in expending the resources needed to either reactivate the Canudos farm or to root out its new inhabitants. This attitude slowly changed as Belo Monte's population grew. At its peak, most estimates place Belo Monte's population at between 30,000 and 35,000. This meant that it had become the second largest city in the state of Bahia, smaller only than the capital, Salvador. The local Coronéis saw their pool of available labor dwindle. Church authorities, despite their opposition to the newly established separation of Church and state, wanted to avoid being seen as monarchists in a state where support for the new republic was far from universal. The pressure to do something to disband the village of Belo Monte was mounting.

The first attempt to hem in Belo Monte occurred in May 1895. A Church delegation, led by Italian Capuchin missionary João Evangelista de Monte Marciano, was sent to establish Church control over the village. Conselheiro's refusal to cooperate, as well as his open disdain for the new republic, led the Capuchin to report that Belo Monte housed a political sect that was a source of resistance to the federal government. Soon afterwards the first armed conflict since the events of 1893 took place. Conselheiro and the residents of Belo Monte spent much of 1895 and 1896 planning and building a new church. They ordered a large supply of timber from the river port town of Juazeiro. But the transaction was blocked by the local magistrate, who requested protection from the state government. The governor, under mounting pressure to do something about Conselheiro, sent 104 policemen to intercept the jagunços who were in charge of taking the timber. This force, and the conflict that ensued, became known as the First Military Expedition. In October 1896 Conselheiro's followers and the police clashed in a battle that lasted four hours. Ten policemen were killed and another 16 wounded, causing the government forces to withdraw. It was the beginning of the end for Belo Monte, as now it received unwanted attention from federal authorities.

The Second Military Expedition was dispatched to attack Belo Monte in January 1897. It comprised 543 federal troops with artillery support. Poorly prepared, these troops were ambushed by a group of jagunços from Belo Monte and, lacking in ammunition and supplies, failed even to reach the village. The Third Military Expedition was planned a little more carefully. Led by Colonel Antônio Moreira César, considered a hero for his role in the suppression of previous revolts, this expedition involved about 1,300 federal troops. It set out to attack Belo Monte in February 1897. Despite a prolonged bombardment of the village, the federal troops were once again overcome. Colonel Moreira César himself was mortally wounded and on March 3 the troops withdrew.

This defeat was considered a national tragedy, with the Brazilian minister of war himself declaring a state of national mourning. The following expedition, the Fourth, involved a considerable number of soldiers, supplies, and guns. In April 1897 over 8,000 troops equipped with the most modern weapons available to the Brazilian army set out to destroy Belo Monte once and for all. This massive contingent encircled Belo Monte. After weeks of fighting, it finally razed the village on October 2, 1897. Conselheiro died a few days earlier, on September 22, of dysentery. Most of the survivors of the final assault were brutally killed, and only a handful of residents survived. At least 15,000 people from both sides died during this final expedition. The events of Canudos went on to mark Brazilian culture and politics for decades to come.

Impact of Canudos on Brazilian Politics and Culture

The newly established Brazilian republic was inspired in many ways by its own brand of Comtean Positivism. It emphasized the need to modernize the nation with a government of those who were considered the most capable. Race played an important role in determining just who were "the most apt" to govern. The inhabitants of the backlands, of mixed race and little formal education, were considered by most urban elites to be ignorant, superstitious, and naturally inferior. The events of Canudos served to reinforce these notions in their minds. Conselheiro's followers were described as crazed fanatics who sought to destroy the modernizing efforts of the new republic. They were accused of taking part in a secret conspiracy to promote the return of the monarchy. Therefore, the brutality of the fights and the description of the residents of Belo Monte as religious fanatics served to galvanize support for the republic among the urban areas near the coast.

If Canudos served politically as a means to delegitimize the last defenders of the Brazilian monarchy, its cultural function shaped national self-identity for a significant time. Of key importance here is the publication of Os Sertões in 1902 (translated into English as Rebellion in the Backlands), a vivid first-hand account of the last military expedition against Belo Monte. Its writer, Euclides da Cunha, a former military officer, accompanied the Fourth Military Expedition as a reporter for a traditional São Paulo newspaper. His deep ambivalence towards the conflict and his treatment of the Brazilian racial question generated an account in which the national character itself became a central figure. An advocate of the deterministic biological theories of the time, da Cunha believed that the jagunços were naturally inferior to the white urban elite. At the same time, he admired their determination and inventiveness in fighting the federal troops and surviving in such a hostile environment, going so far as to call them the basis of the “Brazilian race.” Besides this ambivalence towards the inhabitants of the backlands, the book also marked Brazilian culture by describing the primitive conditions of the region to urban readers, that there lay beyond the fast-growing cities a land apparently unaffected by all the modernization that was supposed to be taking place. The question of what was “the real Brazil” was never more alive.

No longer seen as a case of mere religious fanatics trying to secede from a republic they opposed, the history of Canudos now takes into account the complex economic relations of the region, the neglect and disdain with which authorities treated the backlands, and a more insightful analysis of Conselheiro’s motivations.

SEE ALSO: Brazil, Peasant Movements and Liberation Theology; Brazil, Rebellions from Independence to the Republic (1700s–1889); Latin America, Catholic Church and Liberation, 16th Century to Present

References and Suggested Readings

Cunha, E. da (1957) Rebellion in the Backlands. Trans. S. Putnam. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Levine, R. M. (1991) Canudos in the National Context. The Americas 48 (2): 207–22.

Levine, R. M. (1992) Vale of Tears: Revisiting the Canudos Massacre in Northeastern Brazil, 1893–1897. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Caonabo (d. 1496)

Viviana Uriona

Caonabo was a cacique of the Cibao region on Hispaniola Island at the time Christopher Columbus arrived in the Americas. A native of the Caribs tribe, he was well known and feared for his skills and ferocity in combat. When Columbus tried to land on the north coast of the island (now known as Punta Flecha), he suffered an attack of arrows and was pursued by Caonabo.

The attack forced the Europeans to disembark in the south of the island near where Bartolomé Columbus founded the city of Santo Domingo. The ship Santa Maria was destroyed during the December 25, 1492 landing, so the stranded Spaniards stayed and built Fort Christmas. Caonabo attacked this fort in 1493, destroying it and killing the 39 Spaniards commanded by Diego de Arana. Caonabo’s wife, Anacaona, confessed later to having incited him to exterminate the Spaniards because their abuses of indigenous people had led her to see them as a threat. When Columbus returned, he found the fortress destroyed and the inhabitants killed.

The following year, Caonabo also tried to attack the fortress of St. Thomas, but was defeated by Alonso de Ojeda and made a prisoner. His brother Manicac prepared the frontal assault, but the attack became a slaughter. Caonabo was sent to Spain and died during the voyage. His body was thrown into the sea.

The governor of Jaragua, Nicolás de Ovando, received false news that Anacaona was plotting against the Spaniards and took a group of more than 350 men to stop her. When they arrived they were received with celebrations and dances in a house of wood and straw, known as a caney. When everyone was gathered at feasts hosted by Ovando in the caney, his men set the building on fire, but Anacaona escaped with the help of some indigenous friends. Others who managed to escape included Anacaona’s daughter Higüemota, her nephew Guarocuya, who was handed over to Fray Bartolomé de las Casas and baptized

Enriquillo, her granddaughter Mencía, and tribal leader Hatuey, who subsequently escaped to Cuba and organized resistance there, but was captured in battle, tortured, and burned alive on the orders of Diego Velázquez de Cuéllar. When Nicolás de Ovando realized that Anacaona was missing, he launched a search until she was captured. Three months later, she was sent to the gallows.

SEE ALSO: Enriquillo and the Taíno Revolt (1519–1533); Jumandi (d. 1578); Lempira (d. 1537); Túpac Amaru (ca. 1540–1572); Urracá, Cacique of Veraguas (d. 1516)

References and Suggested Readings

Grimshaw, W. (1830) The History of South America from the Discovery of the New World by Columbus to the Conquest of Peru by Pizarro. New York: Collins & Hannay.

Cape Verde, independence struggle

Justin Corfield

The Cape Verde Islands, off the west coast of Africa, were taken over by the Portuguese from 1462, with governors appointed from 1698. When the Portuguese arrived, the islands were uninhabited and the Portuguese quickly established vineyards, bringing slaves from adjacent parts of Africa and turning the Cape Verde Islands into a transit point for the transatlantic slave trade. In 1585 the English buccaneer Sir Francis Drake attacked Riberia Grande, on the northernmost of the Cape Verde Islands. This, and the worry about possible slave revolts, led the Portuguese to fortify their bases on the islands. Portuguese rule then remained unchallenged until the twentieth century, with little unrest during most of the period. Even so, the harsh conditions caused by food shortages and a rapid depletion in arable land caused many Cape Verdeans to migrate to other parts of the Portuguese empire or the United States.

In June 1951 the Cape Verde Islands became an overseas province of Portugal, which was trying to lock in its overseas territories more closely, economically and politically. Some nationalists on the Cape Verde Islands saw the future of the islands being with Portuguese Guinea (modern-day Guinea-Bissau), and in 1956 one of the leading African nationalists, Amílcar Cabral, formed the Partido Africano da Independência do Guiné e Cabo Verde (PAIGC). Five years later this group launched an “armed struggle” for independence.

Cabral’s parents were from Cape Verde but he was brought up in Portuguese Guinea. Seeing links between the two, he hoped to unite the territories in common struggle against Portugal. However, there were problems with this plan. Although from the start Cabral’s supporters were able to gain the upper hand in Portuguese Guinea, the better educated Cape Verdeans were less keen on a revolution. He did, however, find an ally in Cape Verde when Aristide Maria Pereira, who had been with Cabral at school and then worked in the post and telegraph office in Portuguese Guinea, joined the insurrection.

Pereira was born on November 17, 1923 on the island of Boavista, Cape Verde and attended Mindelo secondary school, where he met and befriended Cabral. Pereira read extensively on uprisings around the world while he was working at the post and telegraph office in Portuguese Guinea. In 1955 he was deported for his political activities, and in the following year joined as a founder member of the PAIGC.

The first move towards independence took place in 1959 when Pereira helped organize dockworkers in the port of Bissau during the Pijiguiti strike. It was the first major move against the colonial power in Portuguese Guinea, although Pereira remained chief of telecommunications in Bissau until 1960. After that he went into exile to Conakry, in the Republic of Guinea, which had gained its independence from France two years earlier. There he became a member of the Council of War in 1965. He then succeeded Cabral as general-secretary of PAIGC after Cabral was assassinated. The actual fighting began in the early 1970s when about thirty revolutionaries, trained in Cuba, landed in Portuguese Guinea to widen the revolution, and the PAIGC managed to easily take control of much of Portuguese Guinea, leading to a unilateral declaration of independence in 1973.

On the Cape Verde Islands the people waited, hoping that the Portuguese would leave without fighting, and few were shocked when this did come to pass. After the April 1974 coup d’état in Portugal, it was announced that the Cape Verde Islands would become independent, gaining their full independence on July 5, 1975 with Aristides Pereira being elected as the first president by the National People's Assembly. At first there was talk of union between the Cape Verde Islands and Guinea-Bissau – as Portuguese Guinea had been renamed. However, this came to nothing.

The first years of independence in Cape Verde were a period of want with drought hitting the islands in 1969 and lasting through to the mid-1970s. Accordingly, in 1977 no beans or maize were harvested. Many people migrated overseas, famine relief was sent to the islands to feed the population, and talks of merger recommenced. On November 14, 1980 a coup d'état in Guinea-Bissau, deposing the president, Luís de Almeida Cabral, who was from the Cape Verde Islands, led to strained relations with Cape Verde, and the PAIGC officially split in January 1981. The Cape Verde arm of the organization then became the Partido Africano da Independência de Cabo Verde (PAICV). The two countries then enjoyed better relations after talks in June 1982. Pereira was reelected president in January 1986 for a further five-year term, but there was discontent in July 1987 and January 1988 over laws which decriminalized abortion. These led to wider protests against the nature of the government, leading the PAICV to accept constitutional proposals that would result in multi-party elections. These took place on January 13, 1991, and saw the PAICV defeated by the Movement for Democracy (MPD), which had been founded a year earlier by Carlos Veiga, a Portuguese-trained lawyer. The MPD won decisively with 68 percent of the vote. On March 22, after losing the presidential election to António Mascarenhas Monteiro, a former Supreme Court judge, Pereira stood down. On April 4, Carlos Veiga became prime minister, taking over from Pedro Pires who had held that position since independence.

Veiga introduced changes which reduced the power of the presidency and increased those of the National Assembly. He also reduced the civil service, eventually halving its size, amid protests from those being retrenched. In March 1993 he dismissed his foreign minister Jorge Carlos Fonseca, and in February 1994 Enrico Monteiro, the minister of justice and labor, resigned to form his own opposition party. However, in December 1995 the MPD won 50 of the 72 seats in the National Assembly, and in February 1996 Monteiro was reelected president unopposed.

In 1998 the Solidarity Party was formed by Onesimo Silveira, keen on forming a socialist alternative to the MPD. The PAICV, still in opposition, decided to elect Pedro Pires, the ageing former prime minister, as its leader and candidate for the 2001 presidential election, over the much younger José Maria Neves. In the January 2001 parliamentary elections the MPD was defeated by the PAICV, who narrowly won with 37 of the 72 National Assembly seats, and Neves became prime minister. In the following month, Pires was elected president, taking office on March 22.

Neves has tried to get many overseas Cape Verdeans to return to the islands, especially from the United States and Wales. The overseas Cape Verdeans now significantly outnumber those who remain on the islands, with many being much better educated than those who remained. The Cape Verde Islands, with a population of 423,613 (July 2007 estimate), operate as a stable democracy with a very good human rights record, and the largely homogeneous and highly literate population has seen almost no ethnic or religious tensions.

SEE ALSO: Cabral, Amílcar (1924–1973); Guinea-Bissau, Nationalist Movement

References and Suggested Readings

- Davidson, B. (1989) The Fortunate Isles: A Study in African Transformation. London: Hutchinson.
- Foy, C. (1988) Cape Verde: Politics, Economics and Society. London: Frances Pinter.
- Fyfe, C. (1981) The Cape Verde Islands. History Today 31: 5–9.
- Galli, R. E. & Jones, J. (1987) Guinea-Bissau: Politics, Economics and Society. London: Frances Pinter.
- Lobban, R. & Lopes, M. (1995) Historical Dictionary of the Republic of Cape Verde. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press.
- Meintrel, D. (1984) Race, Culture and Portuguese Colonialism in Cabo Verde. Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs, Syracuse University, Syracuse, NY.
- Pereira, A. (1980) Vencer a batalha da ideologia [With the Battle of Ideology]. Bissau: Edições PAIGC.

Caracazo, 1989

Christoph Twickel

The Caracazo, also known as 27 F, was a spontaneous rebellion that began on February 27, 1989 in Venezuela's capital city of Caracas and which lasted about five days. The popular revolt – in response to a package of economic measures applied by the government – not only led to the worst state-led massacre in twentieth-century Venezuela, but is also seen by many as the starting point of a mass movement that a decade later brought Hugo Chávez to power.

On February 16, 1989, Carlos Andrés Pérez, president of Venezuela's social democratic Acción Demócrata (AD) Party, announced a series of economic adjustments which he referred to as "the Package." Pérez, sworn in as president just three weeks before in a costly ceremony commonly known as "the coronation," coordinated the measures with the International Monetary Fund (IMF) as the basic conditions for a US$4.5 billion loan that it was hoped would remedy Venezuela's debt crisis, which followed years of economic boom dependent on petrodollars. Between 1986 and 1988, the country had accumulated an external debt of $7 billion. In the midst of falling oil prices, there were no foreign currency reserves to depend on. The measures Pérez and the IMF agreed upon seem to have been drawn from a Chicago Boys' textbook: the termination of price controls, the discontinuation of subsidies, and the deregulation of the currency rate, a macroeconomic instrument for the allocation of goods on the Venezuelan market.

In the weeks before the "big turn," even Venezuelans without economic training foresaw the consequences of Pérez's announcements. Milk, rice, corn, coffee, sugar, salt, and eggs disappeared from the shelves and rumors spread that opportunistic merchants were stockpiling food in anticipation of the price increases to come. Moreover, a spectacular corruption scandal at Recadi, the state office for foreign exchange control, caused unrest as people became upset by a political class that imposed austerity measures on the poor while enjoying its own affluence.

Early on Monday morning, February 27, commuters in the suburbs of Caracas began to protest against the drastic rise in bus fares. Following a petrol price increase of 100 percent, bus fares had doubled over the weekend. It was end of the month. Many commuters around Caracas were almost broke and could not afford the higher fare. Quickly the protests led to the spontaneous burning of buses and the looting of nearby supermarkets and shopping centers. In Guarenas, northeast of Caracas, cars burned and windows were broken as early as 7.30 in the morning. Transmitted by hundreds of Moto taxis from Caracas, news about stockpiled goods found by looters spread like wildfire in the barrios of Caracas, inciting similar actions across the city. Students of the Central University of Venezuela and the Instituto Universitario Politécnico blocked two main roads in the city center. At 2 p.m. the protesters succeeded in closing the Francisco Fajardo Highway, forcing truck drivers to surrender their freight. By nightfall, the entire center of Caracas had been taken over. Protesters and looters swarmed the city from the mountainside in an effort to achieve some sort of revenge; similar situations dominated in almost all the major cities of Venezuela: Barinas, Barcelona, Puerto La Cruz, Maraicaibo, and Porlamar.

On the morning of February 28 the National Guard took over Caracas. Most of the soldiers were young men from the countryside; many had never before even visited the capital. While the army descended upon the streets of Caracas, the poor caraqueños were busy appropriating things they had always had dreamed of. Furniture, beds, washing machines, tires, stereos, kitchenware – all found their way from city shops to shacks in the barrios. Footage from Venezuelan filmmaker Lillian Blazer showed a man rolling a Hammond organ up into the hills. When President Pérez announced the state of emergency, along with a 6 p.m. curfew, almost nobody assumed that this would mark the beginning of a terrible crime on the part of the state.

After dark, an inferno erupted in the Venezuelan capital. In the densely populated areas soldiers began to fire bullets with little discretion. The chaos was terrifying. Days after the massacre the Venezuelan government claimed that 277 persons were killed during the "disturbance," but later investigations proved a single morgue alone counted 322 corpses following the violence. In April 1989, the human rights organization COFAVIC (Committee of Families of Victims of the Caracazo) published a list of 396 documented deaths that occurred during the conflict. After opening mass graves, where the army had secretly dumped hundreds of bodies, forensic doctors reported that 86 percent of the victims had died from gunshot wounds, 29 percent of which were from a bullet in the head. Some officials, including Fernando Ochoa Antich, challenged politicians who blamed the conflict on civil unrest, claiming that it was simply a “massacre.” In his book Los Golpes de Febrero, Ochoa Antich bore testimony that the command to fire came from President Pérez in person.

The influence of the Caracazo on the later Bolivarian Revolution and rise of President Hugo Chávez is undisputed. Chávez himself, in those days a technical officer at the National Security Committee, did not participate in the events because he was suffering from chickenpox. The MBR 200 (Revolutionary Bolivarian Movement 200), a conspiratory cell led by Chávez, eventually benefited from the fact that many of the lower ranks in the Venezuelan army were no longer willing to obey leadership that commanded them to use military force against the people. When three years later, on February 4, 1992, Chávez and his fellow officers led a military insurgency, it was backed by an estimated 10 percent of the armed forces.

On the other hand, the February 27 rebellion and the subsequent massacre was the starting point of a process of political awareness and organization that transcended the scope of traditional leftist parties or unions and can be seen as the nucleus of the Bolivarian Movement in Venezuela. The Asamblea de Barrios (Assembly of Shantytowns), founded after the Caracazo, became the protagonist of massive protests against the government of Pérez and a movement for communal self-organization.

The Caracazo is one of the most globally disregarded state-led crimes of the twentieth century. While the Tiananmen Square massacre in Beijing, just three months later, gained worldwide attention and harsh reactions from both the United States and European governments, the Caracazo was barely covered by the international media. The international business press quickly filed the massacre as an operational accident necessary to insure economic reform, deregulation, and free trade. Not accidentally, during events following the massacre, Venezuelan soldiers presented to the press trucks with goods that had been recaptured from the lootings. The message was obvious: at the beginning of the neoliberal decade in Latin America, it was by all means necessary to clarify that the free market had to be protected against the poor.

SEE ALSO: Bolívar, Simón (1783–1830); Bolivarianism, Venezuela; Chávez, Hugo (b. 1954); Chávez, Hugo, and the Bolivarian Revolution, 1998–Present; Venezuela, Exclusionary Democracy and Resistance,

1958–1998; Venezuela, MBR-200 and the Military Uprisings of 1992

References and Suggested Readings

- Blanco Muñoz, A. (1998) Habla el Comandante Hugo Chávez Frías. Caracas: Catedra Pio Tamayo.
- López Maya, M. (2003) The Venezuelan Caracazo of 1989: Popular Protest and Institutional Weakness. Journal of Latin American Studies 35: 117–37.
- Ochoa Antich, E. (1992) Los Golpes de Febrero. De la Rebelión de los Pobres al Alzamiento de los Militares. Caracas: Fuentes Editores.
- Twickel, C. (2006) Hugo Chávez: Eine Biographie. Hamburg: Edition Nautilus.

Cardenal, Ernesto (b. 1925)

Edward T. Brett

Ernesto Cardenal was a leader in the effort to overthrow the dictatorship of Anastasio Somoza García dictatorship in Nicaragua. Born into a wealthy family in Granada, Cardenal attended Catholic schools run by Christian Brothers and Jesuits and joined a circle of Nicaraguans opposed to the Somoza dictatorship. In 1942 Cardenal entered the Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México. After receiving a licentiate (master's degree) in letters in 1947, he went to New York where he studied literature for two years at Columbia University. Following another year of European travel and study in Spain, he returned to Nicaragua in 1950. By this time, he was already receiving notice for his romantic and political poetry.

For the next seven years he ran a small publishing company and a bookstore in Managua, while continuing to build his reputation as a poet. In 1954 he was part of a group that planned an attack on the presidential palace. The so-called April Rebellion was aborted, however, when the Somoza government discovered the plot. This episode provided him with subject matter for his La hora cero (1960).

In 1957, after experiencing a religious conversion, he entered Our Lady of Gethsemane Trappist monastery in Kentucky. There he developed a close friendship with the monk-scholar and poet Thomas Merton, who served as his novice master and spiritual director. He was not permitted to write poetry while at the Trappist monastery. However, he kept a journal that later served as the basis for his Gethsemani, Ky (1960) and his spiritual diary, Vida en el amor (1970).

In 1959 Cardenal was forced to leave Gethsemani due to health problems. He transferred to a less physically rigorous Benedictine monastery in Cuernavaca, Mexico, where he continued his studies for the next two years. He then transferred again, this time to a seminary in Columbia, where he completed his studies for the priesthood. He was ordained in 1965 for the archdiocese of Managua. By this time he had written Con Walker in Nicaragua (1952), a collection of poems on the history of Nicaraguan resistance to foreign domination, Oracion por Marilyn Monroe, y otros poemas (1965), Antología de la poesía Norteamericana (1963), and Literatura indígena Americana: Antología (1964), all of which merited him a reputation as one of the finest modern poets of Latin America.

Following his ordination, Cardenal returned to Gethsemani to confer with Thomas Merton. With the latter's support he made plans to establish an experimental Christian community for mostly illiterate peasants on the remote archipelago of Solentiname in Lake Nicaragua. On February 13, 1966, with the help of the Colombian poet William Agudelo and his wife Teresita, the commune became a reality. Influenced by liberation theology and employing the techniques of the comunidad de base movement, Cardenal eventually published El evangelio en Solentiname (1975–7), a four-volume set of peasant discussions on the scriptures that document the transformation of commune members from fatalistic peasants to radical anti-Somoza Christian revolutionaries. During this phase of his life Cardenal also published four volumes of mostly political poetry, El estrecho dudoso (1966), Homenaje a los indios americanos (1969), Canto nacional (1972), and Oraculo sobre Managua (1973). Increasingly critical of the Somoza regime, the Solentiname community was finally attacked and destroyed by the Nicaraguan National Guard in 1977.

In 1970 Cardenal visited Cuba and his laudatory views of the Cuban Revolution soon found poetic expression in his En Cuba (1972). Up to this time the poet-priest had advocated change through Mertonian non-violent methods, but his Cuban experience convinced him that for the Nicaraguan revolution to succeed, violent methods had to be employed. Thus, he proclaimed "Christian Marxism" and became a proponent of the Marxist Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN), traveling to Peru, Chile, and the US as an advocate of its cause.

In 1979 he was appointed minister of culture in the new Sandinista government, but as the Marxist regime and the Nicaraguan Catholic hierarchy began to clash, he, along with three other priests who also held government positions, were ordered by the Vatican to resign their posts. When they refused, the Vatican, in February 1985, suspended them from the priesthood. Shortly after the electoral defeat of the FSLN in February 1990, Cardenal broke with the Sandinista Party over ideological differences.

SEE ALSO: Nicaraguan Revolution, 1970s–1980s; Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN)

References and Suggested Readings

- Beverly, J. & Zimmerman, M. (1990) Literature and Politics in the Central American Revolutions. Austin: University of Texas Press.
- Borgeson, P. W., Jr. (1984) Hacia el hombre nuevo: Poesía y pensamiento de Ernesto Cardenal. Woodbridge: Tamesis Books.
- Cabestrero, T. (1983) Ministers of God, Ministers of the People: Testimonies of Faith from Nicaragua. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books.

Cárdenas, Lázaro (1895–1970)

Felipe Arturo Ávila-Espinosa

Lázaro Cárdenas del Río was president of Mexico from 1934 to 1940. He was born in Jiquilpan, Michoacan to a rural family. At 18 he joined the Mexican Revolution on the side of the constitutionalist troops and participated in several campaigns in central Mexico. In 1915 he joined the troops of future president Plutarco Elias Calles in Sonora, where they fought Pancho Villa and his followers, the Villistas, until 1917. After Calles gained the presidency, Cárdenas became governor of his home province in 1928 and gained a reputation as a progressive reformer. This reputation carried over into his presidency.

During the Revolution, Cardenas witnessed the manner in which the British and American oil companies treated Mexican workers, and this, among other factors, led him to seek better conditions for the poor in Mexico. After he gained the presidency he carried out the most comprehensive agrarian reform of the twentieth century, distributing among peasants and farmers some of the most fertile land. He took a paternalistic attitude, assuming guardianship over peasants as he promoted his National Peasant Confederation, which was established in 1938 to help promote his agrarian reform. He also supported urban and industrial workers in the quest for wage increases and the right to unionize, and he nationalized the railway and expropriated the nation's oil, using the proceeds to fund national development. To perform these transformations, Cárdenas relied on the strength of workers, peasants, and bureaucrats. The climax of his efforts came with the establishment in 1936 of the Confederation of Mexican Workers.

The success of Cárdenas's policies was largely due to the contentment of the peasants and workers, who obtained tangible improvements. The workers enjoyed wage increases and collective strength. The peasants gained land, technical assistance, and credit at a rate that they had never seen before. Cárdenas distributed almost 18 million hectares of land and even gave the peasants weapons to defend their lands.

With this support, Cárdenas made one of his most momentous moves: the expropriation of oil. This move put in the hands of the state the most important industry in the country, which had been controlled by American and British companies. Cárdenas took advantage of the international situation, calculating that American President Franklin D. Roosevelt would be respectful of the independence and sovereignty of nations like Mexico, that supported the United States against Germany, Italy, and Japan and would not take military reprisals against his decision. However, the seizure resulted in the serious displeasure of the American government, which placed a trade embargo on Mexican exports of oil and silver, demanding compensation immediately.

Just as the Cardenista reforms reached their zenith, however, they lost their radical momentum. The fear was that continued reform would polarize Mexican society further. The imminence of World War II, the defeat of the Spanish Republic, which the Cárdenas government had supported, and the reaction from conservative groups, led Cárdenas toward a more moderate stance. However, the reforms of the Cardenistas modernized the country and brought economic development and relative political stability to Mexico for the next 50 years.

SEE ALSO: Mexican Revolution of 1910–1921; Villa, Pancho (ca. 1878–1923) and the Division of the North; Zapata, Emiliano (1879–1919) and the Comuna Morelense

References and Suggested Readings

- Knight, A. (1998) "The Rise and Fall of Cardenismo, c. 1930–c. 1946." In L. Bethell (Ed.), Mexico Since Independence, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 241–320.
- Kraunze, E. (2005) General Misionero, Lazaro Cardenas. San Diego: Fondo de Cultura Economica.

Caribbean islands, protests against IMF

Kristina Hinds Harrison

English-speaking Caribbean countries share colonial pasts, a common sea, developing country status, and often financial difficulties. Financial troubles in this Caribbean sub-region have led Barbados, Belize, Grenada, Jamaica, the Commonwealth of Dominica, the Cooperative Republic of Guyana, and the Republic of Trinidad and Tobago to seek loans from the International Monetary Fund (IMF). Such IMF assistance has been contentious and has resulted in protests in five of these seven small states.

Anti-IMF protests in the Anglophone-Caribbean have generally taken the form of workers' strikes, which other marginalized groups in society have joined to vent their frustrations. Anti-IMF protests in the sub-region have also included roadblocks in Jamaica and an attempted coup in Trinidad and Tobago. Regardless of the form protests have taken, they all represented public responses to suffering brought by governments repositioning themselves vis-à-vis citizens in compliance with market-oriented IMF proposals.

Debt and IMF Conditionality

From the 1980s many developing countries began to face rising interest rates on commercial bank loans that they acquired at favorable interest rates during the 1970s. Although not always used efficiently, debts accumulated by English-speaking Caribbean states were mostly used to finance social spending, infrastructure development, and other interventions aimed at bolstering their economies. By the 1980s all of this led to developing countries spending more on debt and imports than they were earning from their exports (balance of payments difficulties) and prompted some Caribbean states to seek loan assistance from the IMF.

Access to IMF help, however, came with conditions. Governments usually were asked to reduce their spending by privatizing state-owned enterprises, by decreasing or stabilizing public sector wage bills, by cutting back on social services spending, and by ending subsidization schemes wherever possible. States were encouraged to abandon interventionism and instead liberalize their economies by promoting private sector-led growth and by allowing markets to direct trade, to determine interest rates, and to set rates of exchange. Additionally, countries were advised to devalue their currencies both to make domestic exports more attractive to importers and to put a brake on the outflow of foreign exchange spent on imports. IMF counsel also led to new taxes being introduced to generate supplementary government revenue. These structural adjustment policies were thought to allow struggling countries to better meet their external obligations. Yet the assumptions on which the IMF's approaches to lending were grounded often led to social dislocation. Currency devaluations did not halt imports in heavily import-reliant countries in the Caribbean, but led to consumer price increases. What is more, wage decreases and layoffs, decreased government spending, and increased taxation meant that the already poor lower classes faced privation while the middle classes began to experience decline. In essence, people struggled to make less money, or money worth less, go at least as far as it did previously.

It is not totally surprising, then, that protests emerged in opposition to IMF prescriptions. However, lurking beneath these more obvious motivations for protesting the demands that states abruptly change their relationships with their societies by metamorphosing from interventionist to minimal should not be separated from the discontent expressed by Caribbean citizens. Hence, anti-austerity protests were also protests against the way in which IMF-led structural adjustment policies pushed Caribbean countries in a neoliberal or market-oriented direction as part of a wider international trend for managing national economies.

The Protests

IMF loans to the Caribbean commenced with loans to Jamaica and Guyana in the late 1970s. Jamaica commenced borrowing from the Fund in 1977, received further funding in 1981 and, thereafter, to cover every year between 1984 and 1996. It appears that the fourth lending arrangement with the Fund, though, truly began to burden the country's population. Consequently, in January 1985, following Prime Minister Edward Seaga's announcement of the conditions to be met as part of the 1985 IMF loan agreement, workers shut down virtually all essential services in the country. Especially significant in sparking these protests was the government's decision to increase fuel prices by 20 percent. Citizens signaled their defiance by burning tires in streets across the country and by setting fire to sugar cane fields.

Like Jamaica, Guyana also saw a time lag between its first IMF encounter and anti-IMF protests. Guyana secured its first IMF loan in 1978 and subsequently received loans in 1979 and 1980. However, by 1985 the country was listed ineligible for IMF loans, for failing to implement sufficiently the advised austerity measures and for failing to meet its financial obligations to the Fund. Nonetheless, Guyana regularized its relationship with the IMF after committing to the Fund's lending terms in 1989. It is to this event that citizens responded in protest on April 4, 1989. Workers in the bauxite and sugar industries and employees of the University of Guyana struck in protest over a 70 percent devaluation of the Guyanese dollar in compliance with IMF conditions for the release of funds in 1990. The devaluation, which commenced on March 30, 1989, had the immediate effect of making life in Guyana difficult by increasing consumer prices. Therefore, as in Jamaica, citizens' reactions to devaluations can be linked to price hikes that were precipitated by government attempts to comply with IMF conditions for financial assistance.

Unlike the previously presented countries, Trinidad and Tobago was able to prolong its receipt of IMF loans until the close of the 1980s when it obtained loans in 1989 and 1990. In response to the difficulties that these measures bought, protests emerged in the country on March 6, 1989. Trade unions across Trinidad cooperated to stage a general strike in which workers peacefully demonstrated over the government's decision to decrease civil service salaries by 10 percent. The dislocations that accompanied IMF austerity were further met with opposition between July 18 and August 2, 1990, this time in a more violent form when the country's president along with government Cabinet members were taken hostage in an attempted coup. Although this coup can be viewed more widely as an embodiment of opposition to the administration in power, this protest should not be disentangled from anti-IMF sentiment, especially since those attempting the coup demanded that IMF austerity measures be suspended. As in the previously noted cases, government efforts to meet IMF conditionality directly impacted on citizens' abilities to provide for themselves. However, protests against austerity measures in both Trinidad and Guyana during 1989 and 1990 coincided with the collapse of the Soviet bloc and the apparent bankruptcy of development models that were heavily state interventionist. Protests in Guyana, Trinidad, and those that followed, therefore, should not be disconnected from the emergence of neoliberal orthodoxy that by the end of the 1980s was transforming the world and taking the Caribbean with it.

Following the Trinidadian experience, protests against public sector wage decreases and concomitant hardships expected to follow also occurred in Barbados during 1992. Although Barbados received its first stand-by loan from the Fund in 1982, it was to the country's second encounter with IMF loans that workers across the country responded. Barbados' structural adjustments comprised employment cuts, wage cuts, and various other measures to decrease public expenditure. Decreasing wage rates without controlling inflation inevitably made life more arduous in Barbados. Furthermore, the Barbadian government attempted to short-circuit the norm of negotiating public sector pay cuts with unions when it went directly to public sector employees to arrange an 8 percent pay cut. These actions combined to propel workers to take to the streets bearing placards on October 24 and November 4–5. In addition, the opposition political party (the Barbados Labour Party) attempted to oust the prime minister (who was also the minister of finance) via a vote of no-confidence in response to popular discontent, and unions attempted to take the Democratic Labour Party government to court over unconstitutionally reducing public sector pay. Ten years later, protests against IMF prescribed adjustments continued in Dominica.

Dominica received IMF loans in 1984, 1986 and, so far for the twenty-first century, in 2002 and 2003. In response to the latter two loans, employees in the country's public sector took to the streets led by the Dominica Public Service Union and with the support of the Opposition United Workers Party, first in September 2002 over a 4 percent stabilization levy imposed by the government on those earning at least $9,000 per year. Subsequently, in February 2003, public sector workers stayed off their jobs to demonstrate over a host of government proposals geared towards decreasing the country's public sector wage bill. The proposed policies included a work furlough that would reduce the number of days public servants worked per month and thus the amount they would earn. The following month public sector employees struck in opposition to a 6 percent reduction in their wages – once more a government initiative to comply with IMF advice.

The foregoing accounts of protests in the English-speaking Caribbean should make it clear that, no matter the country or the decade, increasing costs of living brought by IMF loan conditions were highly contentious. In each of the countries mentioned, higher commodity prices, lower wage rates, heavier tax burdens, currency devaluations, or some combination of these measures were intimately linked to IMF lending arrangements. Inseparable from these occurrences, too, was a neoliberal shift being thrust on developing countries via the IMF and further supported by the demise of non-market based developmental options. This commonality may further be extended to the non-English speaking Caribbean as protests in the Dominican Republic and the Republic of Haiti demonstrate.

The Dominican Republic saw anti-IMF protests in 1984 following the signature of a loan agreement with the Fund in January 1983. The Fund recommended reductions in public subsidies, a reduction in the supply of money, that market forces determine the value of the Dominican peso, and that a sales tax be introduced. These measures bore heavily on the country's people by increasing food prices to the extent that Dominicans, particularly from the urban poor, rioted in the streets to express their disgust. Almost twenty years later, further strikes befell the Dominican Republic in coincidence with negotiations with the IMF when in November 2003 and then January 2004 Dominicans rallied in the streets supported by citizens groups, unions, and opposition parties. Citizens created roadblocks to protest continual power outages, sharp currency devaluations, and increases in the prices of significant commodities (e.g., fuel and medications). Once more citizens responded to hardships connected to IMF prescriptions for economic recovery.

As for Haiti, the story is much the same. Anti-IMF protests erupted in this country during 1995. Already existing in a turbulent political and economic climate and with experience of IMF austerity measures throughout the 1980s, Haitians launched demonstrations in March, May, and September of 1995 in connection with the signature of an IMF loan agreement that entailed the privatization of state entities and contributed to rising costs of living. These protests were also supported by widespread leafleting in August of 1995 in efforts to raise awareness about the role of the IMF in worsening the plight of Haitians.

Conclusion

This survey of the Caribbean illustrates that Caribbean populations have responded to social dislocations attributed to IMF austerity measures through protest. Decreases in wages, increases in the prices of significant commodities, and currency devaluations have been particularly contentious in both the English-speaking Caribbean and in the non-English speaking Caribbean states of Haiti and the Dominican Republic. Moreover, one can assert that these protests were responses to changes in state-society relations across the region. IMF conditionality sped the retreat of the state from economic activities by reducing states' spending on wages; by decreasing states' funding of social services; and by liberalizing trade, rates of interest, and exchange. In so doing, IMF prescriptions led to unease in societies that faced sudden changes in the ways in which their states related to them. IMF austerity measures signaled a neoliberal turn; a turn towards markets, based on private sector-led growth and away from state-sponsored economic interventions. Consequently, one can further argue that though locally bounded responses to specific difficulties brought through compliance with IMF counsel, Caribbean anti-IMF protests have been reactions to a broader neoliberal shift that commenced in the early 1980s, intensified from 1989 with the demise of a communist option, and that continues to date.

SEE ALSO: Barbados and the Windward Islands, Protest and Revolt; Global Justice Movement and Resistance; Guyana, Protests and Revolts; Haiti, Protest and Rebellion, 20th Century

References and Suggested Readings

- Auvinen, J. Y. (1996) IMF Intervention and Political Protest in the Third World: A Conventional Wisdom Refined. Third World Quarterly 17, 7: 377–400.
- Baritlow, H. A. (1997) The Debt Dilemma: IMF Negotiations in Jamaica, Grenada and Guyana. London: Macmillan.
- Espinal, R. (1995) Economic Restructuring, Social Protest, and Democratization in the Dominican Republic. Latin American Perspectives 22, 3: 63–79.
- Ghai, D. (Ed.) (1991) The IMF and the South: The Social Impact of Crisis and Adjustment. New York: Zed Books.
- McAfee, K. (1991) Storm Signals: Structural Adjustment and Development Alternatives in the Caribbean. Boston: South End Press.
- Massiah, J. (1990) Economic Change, Structural Adjustment and Women in the Caribbean. Cave Hill, Barbados: Institute of Social and Economic Research (Eastern Caribbean), University of the West Indies.
- Mobekk, E. & Spyrou, S. I. (2002) Re-evaluating IMF Involvement in Low-Income Countries: The Case of Haiti. International Journal of Social Economics 29, 7: 527–37.

Caribbean protest music

Daniel Tannehill Neely

In the West Indies, music plays an important social role. Symbolically, it is a part of how people construct reality and helps give life to both the dominant and oppositional ideological aspects of Caribbean society and culture. As a means for protest and contestation, music plays a particular role by giving voice to the oppressed and helping to develop ideological and social solidarity among those with common values and kindred social identities.

One of music's functions is to help develop cohesion by appealing to and reinforcing values and identities through ritualized performance. This sometimes occurs in state-approved contexts that balance bureaucratic organization with informal exuberance. Trinidad and Tobago's Carnival, for example, is an important seasonal reference point that mobilizes the public and momentarily overturns the social order by creating a context within which people can express ideas about cultural, political, and economic inequality.

Although Trinidad and Tobago's is the largest and best known Carnival in the West Indies, Carnival celebrations take place elsewhere in the region, including Antigua, Aruba, the Bahamas (Caribbean Muzik Festival), Barbados (Crop Over), Carriacou, and Jamaica. Each of these uses local music to rally opinion in different ways. Carnival events are also held in diasporic West Indian communities in Toronto, London, and Brooklyn, where the music of a pan-Caribbean polity becomes a means for expressing West Indian unity and defining cultural difference. Other annual community-based festival traditions that use music and contribute to social solidarity (albeit with a lower level of official intervention) exist in the Caribbean as well, including Jonkonnu in Jamaica, Junkanoo in the Bahamas, Gombey in Bermuda, and Masquerade in St. Kitts-Nevis.

More often, social cohesion is developed outside of state contexts. Another institution in which ideology is negotiated largely through performance is the dancehall. Both a physical space and a theoretical concept, dancehalls are common throughout the Caribbean, although they represent an especially important area in Jamaican cultural studies. Within the dancehall, musical performance has a strong effect on how social alliances are made and unmade and how cultural tensions are created and resolved.

Perhaps the most poorly theorized (but no less important) articulation between music and community mobilization in the West Indies is radio. Radio has great cohesive power and because the technology is widely available and disseminated, it is uniquely capable of reaching all strata of society. However, radio's role in rallying political opinion generally only garners an oblique mention in studies of music and politics.

Song lyrics are perhaps the most obvious source for defining and articulating oppositional political ideology. In Trinidad and Tobago, for example, resistance can be found in the lyrics of calypso and rapso artists including Sniper, Chalkdust, Lancelot Layne, and Cheryl Byron. In Jamaica, reggae is famous for its revolutionary rhetoric and confrontational philosophical stance. Often infused with the political and spiritual beliefs of Rastafari, reggae helped transform Jamaican society in the 1970s and 1980s and has since become a symbol of protest by the marginalized the world over. More recently, dancehall music has become a forum for expressing similar ideas.

Music's value in building ideological solidarity is not, however, limited to the content of song lyrics. Performance genres, the handling of musical elements, and even the use of individual instruments often involve elements that have ideological and symbolic value to oppressed groups. For example, a strong argument can be made that improvised jazz is the most overlooked protest music in the West Indies.

The accents, rhythms, and stylistic idiosyncrasies of jazz are reflective of a shared history of social oppression and melodic improvisation is an ideological expression of both individual and group identity. Jazz has been played in the West Indies since at least World War I, but its role in developing a black cultural awareness became even more pronounced after World War II. In Jamaica, for example, many musicians (including Johnny "Dizzy" Moore, Tommy McCook, and Don Drummond) better known for their role in developing an Africanist sensibility in the emergence of ska and reggae began as jazz musicians, learning their craft from noted local jazz performers (including Lennie Hibbert and Eric Deans) at the Alpha Boys School in Kingston. There has been comparatively little research into jazz in the West Indies. Many internationally known jazz musicians (including Leslie Hutchinson, Shake Keane, and Joe Harriott) were born there, and many others (including Wynton Kelly, Sonny Rollins, and Randy Weston) were of West Indian heritage and brought a cultural awareness to their music.

In addition, musical instruments also accrue symbolic value around which ideological solidarity develops. Perhaps no other instrument embodies this as fully as the drum. Under colonialism, the drum was long considered a symbol of oppositional power and was often banned by authorities. However, it also had a major role in helping oppressed groups, particularly those of African descent, develop social solidarity in opposition to power.

One of the most important musics in which drums and drumming have symbolic value is nyabinghi, a neo-traditional style that was the product of the cross-fertilization of buru and kumina, two neo-African drumming traditions. Nyabinghi consists of three drums, the repeater, fundeh, and bass, which play a steady heartbeat-like rhythm and accompany chanted adaptations of psalms, hymns, local traditional songs, and sometimes original songs. While it first came to national prominence in Jamaica in 1961 through the Folks Brothers' recording of "Oh Carolina," nyabinghi drumming can be heard in countless subsequent recordings in every stylistic period. Because it was drawn from traditional styles of marginalized groups in Jamaican society, nyabinghi imparted an ideological value to Rastafari that stressed the importance of Jamaica's African heritage.

Another instrument with symbolic value is the steel pan from Trinidad and Tobago. After drums were banned in Carnival masquerades by the British colonial authority at the end of the nineteenth century, bamboo-bamboo bands (comprised primarily of black men from the grassroots working class playing instruments made of bamboo) emerged in their stead. In time, members of these bands began to incorporate metal objects into their musical revelry. Soon, metal objects became the norm and out of this, a tunable "steel drum" developed. While its popularity was seen as a threat to the social order, it nevertheless became a symbol of the struggle against colonial oppression. By the 1960s, it was dispersed throughout the West Indies and had become a symbol of Trinidadian independence. In 1992, the steel pan was formally declared Trinidad and Tobago's national instrument, and contemporary support from corporate and government sectors has made the steel pan's class and political associations ambiguous. Such ambiguity has helped redraw the boundaries of pan's symbolic value in Trinidadian culture. Official elevation of steel pan yielded opposition from Trinidad and Tobago's East Indian community, who held that the harmonium better represented their experience and should be accorded similar recognition. While little came of the protest, the episode underscored the symbolic value of instruments in West Indian culture.

A final example is the abeng, a cow's horn, which was an important part of the liberation struggles of Jamaican Maroons in the eighteenth century. Capable of passing on messages through a secret musical language, it has long been a part of strategic Maroon communication. The abeng's symbolic importance was recognized in the late 1960s when the instrument's name and form were appropriated by Jamaican intellectuals for a weekly newspaper known for its pointed critique of colonialism and cultural imperialism.

SEE ALSO: Bread and Puppet Theater; French Revolutionary Theater; Harlem Renaissance; Latin American Punk Rock and Protest; Music and Protest, Latin America; Punk Movement

References and Suggested Readings

- Cooper, C. (2004) Sound Clash: Jamaican Dancehall Culture at Large. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Dawes, K. (1999) Natural Mysticism: Towards a New Reggae Aesthetic. Leeds: Peepal Tree.
- Guilbault, J. (2000) Racial Projects and Musical Discourses in Trinidad, West Indies. In P. Bohlman & R. Radano (Eds.), Music and the Racial Imagination. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Liverpool, H. (2001) Rituals of Power and Rebellion: The Carnival Tradition in Trinidad and Tobago, 1763–1962. Frontline Distribution International.
- Manuel, P. with Bilby, K. & Largey, M. (2006) Caribbean Currents: Caribbean Music from Rumba to Reggae. Revised and expanded ed. Philadelphia: Temple University Press.
- Murrell, N. S., Spencer, W. D., & McFarlane, A. A. (Eds.) (1998) Chanting Down Babylon: The Rastafari Reader. Philadelphia: Temple University Press.
- Paquet, S. P., Saunders, P. J., & Stuempfle, S. (Eds.) (2008) Music, Memory, Resistance: Calypso and the Caribbean Literary Imagination. Kingston: Ian Randle.
- Stolzoff, N. (2000) Wake the Town and Tell the People: Dancehall Culture in Jamaica. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.

Carmichael, Stokely/Kwame Turé (1941–1998)

Kenneth R. Sullivan

Stokely Carmichael (later, Kwame Turé) was born into a working-class family on June 29, 1941 in Port of Spain, Trinidad. Carmichael remained in Trinidad with his grandparents when his parents left for the United States in search of work, and was eventually reunited with his parents in 1952, moving with them to the South Bronx in New York City. The family later moved to the working-class Italian American, Morris Park-White Plains neighborhood in the Bronx. As a young man, Carmichael frequented Michaux's African Bookstore on 125th Street and the Schomburg Museum on 141st Street. It was in Harlem, on 125th Street especially, where Carmichael became familiar with the passionate oratory of numerous "stepladder" speakers, as well as elder Trinidadian activists C. L. R. James (1901–89) and George Padmore (1902–59).

Carmichael's interest in social activism took hold while he was a senior at Bronx High School of Science, where he met some young communists and was deeply influenced by their radical analysis of history and capitalism. Early on, he supported the Congress on Racial Equality (CORE) pickets of New York area department stores that discriminated against blacks in their Southern stores. Later, Carmichael organized students at Bronx Science for one of Bayard Rustin's Youth Marches for Integrated Schools in Washington, DC. It was in DC that he met students from the Nonviolent Action Group (NAG), an affiliate of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) at Howard University, a historically black university. In 1960 Carmichael turned down scholarships at several other universities to be a part of the vibrant academic and political community at Howard University, where Carmichael's life as a civil rights activist intensified.

At the age of 19 Carmichael received his apprenticeship in non-violent struggle during the Mississippi Freedom Rides of the early 1960s. Carmichael, along with CORE's James Farmer (1920–99), was sentenced to a month in Mississippi's infamous Parchman Prison Farm for attempting to integrate train service in the state. Through his organizing in Mississippi, Carmichael met noted civil rights activist and organizer Fannie Lou Hamer (1917–77), whose authenticity and commitment to the grassroots had a profound effect on him and other SNCC activists.

In 1963 Carmichael and the SNCC joined Cambridge movement leader and activist Gloria Richardson in her efforts to desegregate its public schools and hospitals and develop public housing for Cambridge, Maryland's black community. In August 1965 Carmichael and the SNCC teamed with the Lowndes County Freedom Organization (LCFO, in Alabama) to organize what would later become an all-black political party: the Black Panther Party of Lowndes County. The press referred to the LCFO as the Black Panther Party primarily because of their "snarling" black panther ballot symbol, which would later be appropriated by Oakland, California Black Panther co-founders Huey P. Newton (1942–89) and Bobby Seale (b. 1936).

Many in the civil rights movement viewed the rising Black Power militancy of Carmichael and the SNCC as racially divisive, and worse – "anti-white." Carmichael, however, viewed Black Power as the coalescence of mounting black frustration over state violence against civil rights protesters, and the dwindling accomplishments of the civil rights movement. This shift in consciousness and a growing frustration with non-violent protest was documented in the book Black Power: The Politics of Liberation in America (1967), which Carmichael co-authored with Charles V. Hamilton: "Each time the people saw Martin Luther King get slapped, they became angry; when they saw four little black girls bombed to death, they were angrier; and when nothing happened they were steaming. We had nothing to offer them that they could see except to go out and be beaten again. We help build their frustration." Black Power was also the first time the term "institutional racism" was used; it identifies what Carmichael and Hamilton describe as "the real effect of power and race in the society."

Carmichael's increasingly radical positions, heavily influenced by Malcolm X (1925–65) and Frantz Fanon (1925–61), soon alienated others within the SNCC, which split into two factions – one advocating for non-violence and integration, the other taking a more revolutionary stance and advocating for Black Power. Soon after writing Black Power, Carmichael left the SNCC and joined the Black Panthers as their honorary prime minister. This was short-lived, however, as Carmichael – then living in Guinea with his wife Miriam Makeba – published a letter in 1969 condemning the Black Panthers for their lack of revolutionary Pan-Africanist nationalism, as well as their associations with white radicals.

Carmichael spent the later half of his life primarily in Guinea, writing and speaking for the Pan-African socialist cause. He died of prostate cancer in Guinea at the age of 57.

SEE ALSO: Baker, Ella Josephine (1903–1986); Black Panthers; Civil Rights Movement, United States, 1960–1965; Civil Rights, United States, Black Power and Backlash, 1965–1978; Fanon, Frantz (1925–1961); Malcolm X (1925–1965); Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC)

References and Suggested Readings

- Carmichael, S. & Thelwell, E. M. (2003) Ready for Revolution: The Life and Struggles of Stokely Carmichael. New York: Scribner.
- Jefferies, H. K., Theoharis, J., & Woodard, K. (2005) Groundwork: Local Black Freedom Movements in America. New York: New York University Press.
- Kelley, N. (2003) Memoirs of a Revolutionist. The Nation, December 8. Available at: www.thenation.com/doc/20031208/kelley. Accessed June 5, 2008.
- Ogbar, J. O. G. (2004) Black Power: Radical Politics and African American Identity. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

Carney, James Francis "Guadalupe" (1925–1983?)

Edward T. Brett

James Francis Carney was born in Chicago, Illinois. After living in several cities in Ohio, his family settled in St. Louis, Missouri in 1941, where he was awarded a football scholarship to St. Louis University. When the US entered World War II, however, he left school to serve in the Army Corps of Engineers. Following the war, he entered the University of Detroit to study engineering. In August 1948 he decided to study for the Jesuit priesthood and therefore began matriculating at the order's seminary in Florissant, Missouri. After 13 years of study and pastoral training he was ordained in 1961.

As part of his training, he taught English and elocution in British Honduras at St. John's College (a Jesuit high school) from 1955 through 1958, while also ministering to the region's poor blacks and Ketchi Indians. Perhaps because of this experience he was immediately assigned after ordination to mission work in Honduras, where he served mostly in the department of Yoro. There he trained village catechists to lead Bible services and helped them form peasants into Christian base communities (comunidades de base), where scripture study was employed to raise awareness among the rural poor of structural socioeconomic injustice. In 1963 he became chaplain for the newly formed National Association of Honduran Peasants (ANACH) and quickly developed a national reputation for his support of land reform and labor rights. In 1974 he became a naturalized Honduran citizen, but in 1979 the military government of General Policarpo Paz García revoked his citizenship and expelled him from the country.

He was next assigned by his Jesuit order to rural Nicaragua, where the social programs of the new Sandinista government greatly impressed him. Consequently, in 1983 he became chaplain to a Honduran guerrilla group known as the Central American Workers' Revolutionary Party (PRTC), which had been trained by the Sandinistas. After writing his autobiography, The Metamorphosis of a Revolutionary, where he declared himself a "Christian Marxist," he and the 96-member PRTC, led by Dr. José María Reyes, entered Honduras. They hoped to spark a Sandinista-like revolution, but were quickly located and destroyed by the Honduran military, which had been assisted by logistics supplied by US military advisers. All the guerrillas were either killed or captured.

Although the Honduran government claimed that Carney had died of starvation in the rugged mountainous terrain prior to the battle, the fact that it was unable to produce his body made this assertion highly suspect. For this reason, his family along with some human rights organizations began an investigation of his case. Requests were made in the United States for Carney's files through the Freedom of Information Act. The CIA, the Defense and State Departments, and the US army did send some documents, but they were heavily censored with about 50 percent of their contents blacked out. Over 300 requested documents were withheld in their entirety on the grounds of "national security." A major break in the case occurred in 1987, however, when Florencio Caballero, a former sergeant in Honduran military intelligence, told the New York Times "that the Honduran Army high command maintained a network of secret jails, special interrogators and kidnapping teams who detained and killed nearly 200 suspected leftists between 1980 and 1984." He further claimed that the teams were trained and advised by CIA operatives who had access to the jails, as well as "to written reports summarizing the interrogation of suspected leftists.” Caballero added that Carney and several other members of his guerrilla unit had been captured, taken to Aguacate, a Honduran military base, and turned over to his unit, the Battalion 3–16. After several days of interrogation he was thrown to his death from a military helicopter. In 1995, under a new reformist government, the Honduran Commission for Human Rights requested that the US government turn over its files on the Carney case. What they received was CIA and US army documents with 50 percent of their contents blacked out. Although President Bill Clinton promised that Carney’s file would be declassified by the end of 1997, to date this has not happened.

SEE ALSO: Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN)

References and Suggested Readings

- Brett, D. W. & Brett, E. T. (1988) Murdered in Central America: The Stories of Eleven US Missionaries. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books.
- Carney, J. G. (1985) To Be a Revolutionary: An Autobiography. San Francisco: Harper & Row.
- LeMoyné, J. (1987) Honduras’s Army Tied to 200 Deaths. New York Times, May 2: 1, 8.

Carson, Rachel (1907–1964)

Patricia DeMarco

Rachel Louise Carson was born on May 27, 1907 in Springdale, Pennsylvania, a small industrial town on the banks of the Allegheny River. She was the third child of Marion and Robert Carson, people of modest means, who settled in the Allegheny Valley in 1906. Rachel Carson’s father had a dream to develop his 65 acres of land for residential use to offer homes for the burgeoning town of Pittsburgh. This dream never materialized in his lifetime, but the area surrounding the Carson homestead is now a suburban neighborhood with a high school and junior high school on the former Carson property.

Rachel Carson grew up in Pittsburgh at a time when the industrial age was at a pinnacle. The Allegheny Valley and the Monongahela Valley were bordered with factories that manufactured steel, chemical products, and power for a growing city. The workers of Pittsburgh who manufactured steel and other products were crucial to the further expansion of the US into a major industrial era. Many of the public and private institutions that flowed from its wealth, once driven by steel production, stand to this day. But Rachel Carson saw the production of steel and metal products as detrimental to conserving the natural environment. When she looked out her windows over the Allegheny Valley, the view looked like this:

From whatever direction one approaches the once lovely conjunction of the Allegheny and Monongahela, the devastation of progress is apparent. Quiet valleys have been inundated with slag, defaced with refuse, marred by hideous buildings. Streams have been polluted with sewage and waste from the mills. (R. L. Duffus, Atlantic Monthly, 1930)

With close tutoring from her mother, Rachel formed her bond with nature as she grew up among the fields and farm animals as the once bucolic environment was transforming into a gritty industrial suburb. She wrote of her natural history observations and was curious about the world around her from an early age. She was published in St. Nicholas Magazine at age ten. She attended the Pennsylvania College for Women, now Chatham College, where she gravitated toward biology as her great educational pursuit. She graduated magna cum laude in 1929, and moved to Baltimore to continue her academic studies at Johns Hopkins University, where she earned a Master of Science degree. Upon completion of her studies, Carson was drawn to pursuing further research at Woods Hole, but financial constraints during the Great Depression prevented her from achieving a doctorate. Carson took a position for the Fish and Wildlife Service from 1932 to 1951, ascending in various positions to the level of editor-in-chief of conservation publications, the first woman ever to hold that level of appointment in the civil service of that department.

Rachel Carson’s literary works convey her deep passion and eloquent connection to the wonders of nature. Her first published books were about the ocean and the intercoastal ecosystems she studied closely: Under the Sea-Wind (1941), The Sea Around Us (1951), and The Edge of the Sea (1955). Her most influential work, Silent

Spring, was published serially in the New Yorker magazine, and appeared as a book in 1962. It drew tremendous attention to the environment and brought Carson worldwide acclaim. Because she had distributed chapters for review and comment, and the chapters were exposed in advance through serial publication, many influential people were aware of her work and her message of warning. That message was received with great concern among a growing number of scholars and academics, but with outrage and disdain from the chemical companies whose products she argued despoiled the environment.

Rachel Carson's Environmental Ethic

Against this backdrop of concern for the wholeness of the earth's environment, Rachel Carson wrote her most influential work to urge for caution in introducing dangerous chemicals without knowing their effects on the ecosystem as a whole. She was one of only a few predictors of the future – noting the connection between people and their environment. Human action could cause damage to the earth, and concomitantly human action could also reverse or prevent damage. Carson introduced the observation that when we see serious effects on the health of plants and animals we should take precautions because people are animals too and may be subject to health risks. This was a completely revolutionary and controversial concept at that time.

Rachel Carson's environmental ethic is simple:

- Live in harmony with nature.
- Preserve and learn from natural places.
- Minimize the impact of man-made chemicals on natural systems of the world.
- Consider the implications of human actions on the global web of life.

In 1958 when Rachel Carson began work on Silent Spring, DDT was all the rage. DDT stands for dichloro-diphenyl-trichloroethane, a potent insecticide used widely as a de-lousing agent during World War II. This and a number of other chemicals came into broad commercial use after the war ended as munitions providers sought non-military markets. DDT was widely touted in all the media as the savior of mankind, the answer to pests and diseases of all kinds. Broadcast spraying of crops and fogging of neighborhoods occurred all over the world as part of public health campaigns to control malaria, typhus, and insect pests such as fire ants. Reports of poisonings, death of wildlife, and illness – especially in children – were dismissed, or not directly proven to be the result of DDT use. When Rachel Carson began her writing, pharmacologists and scientists already had begun to question the wisdom of the increasing toxicity of insecticides used broadly. Insects had within a few years begun to show resistance to DDT, precipitating the development of even more toxic chemicals. President Kennedy and Congress convened independent investigations on pesticide policy in 1963.

Rachel Carson's testimony before the Subcommittee on Reorganization and International Organizations of the Senate Committee on Government Operations regarding Environmental Hazards, Control of Pesticides, and Other Chemical Poisons on June 4, 1963 summarizes her position on the matter. After reviewing a large body of evidence, she presented two significant conclusions:

All the foregoing evidence, it seems to me, leads inevitably to certain conclusions. The first is that aerial spraying of pesticides should be brought under strict control, and should be reduced to the minimum needed to accomplish the most essential objectives. Reduction would, of course, be opposed on the grounds of economy and efficiency. If we are ever to solve the basic problem of environmental contamination, however, we must begin to count the many hidden costs of what we are doing and weigh them against the gains or perceived advantages.

The second conclusion is that a strong and unremitting effort ought to be made to reduce the use of pesticides that leave long-lasting residues, and ultimately to eliminate them. I concur with this recommendation of the President's Science Advisory Committee, for I can see no other way to control the rapidly spreading contamination I have described.

In her testimony, Rachel Carson made six recommendations for legislative action:

1. Citizens have a right to be secure in their own homes and property against the intrusion of poisons applied by other persons.
2. The government should establish new programs of research and education of medical professionals, because physicians are generally unaware of the wide distribution of pesticides, their toxicity, and their effects on human health.

3. Restrict the sale and use of pesticides to those who have been trained in their safe use and application, who are capable of understanding the hazards and following directions.
4. The registration of chemicals used as pesticides should be the function of all agencies, rather than the Department of Agriculture alone.
5. The hazards of pesticides are compounded by the fantastic number of chemical compounds in use as pesticides, whose great proliferation has been driven more by economic competition than by actual need. New pesticides should only be approved when no other existing chemical or other method would do the job.
6. I hope the government will fully support research on new methods of pest control in which chemical use will be minimized or entirely eliminated. One of the outstanding values of biological controls for insect pests is that they are specifically adapted to a particular species or group of species. We must search, not for a super weapon that will solve all problems, but for a diversity of options, each precisely adjusted to its task.

Rachel Carson's Legacy

Rachel Carson died of cancer in Silver Spring, Maryland on April 14, 1964. Her work spawned a new direction for several environmental organizations, including the Sierra Club and the Audubon Society of which she was a member, and to whom she left modest bequests. Her work laid the foundation for modern activism and social protest. The Environmental Defense Fund took as part of its charter the implementation of her recommendations, and other organizations such as the Rachel Carson Council and Beyond Pesticides continue in that effort. Carson was so influential that a new public policy agenda was introduced in response to the wide outcry that her research and writing generated among the public. Some of the consequent actions taken include the following:

- The Environmental Protection Agency was established in 1970.
- The Clean Air Act and the Safe Drinking Water Act began to address air and water pollution.
- Environmental Protection Agency and Federal Drug Administration regulation of poisons, chemicals, and labeling of their properties became law.

- Hundreds of organizations, such as the National Resources Defense Council, the Sierra Club, and the World Wildlife Fund, developed a focus on protecting the environment, and a strong environmental watchdog presence became an integral part of the public policy process.

Why Was Rachel Carson So Effective?

Time Magazine named Rachel Carson one of the most influential people of the twentieth century in 1999. In 2006 the Environment Agency of the United Kingdom named Rachel Carson the most effective environmental activist. Her popularity and effectiveness continue to transcend national boundaries and persist today. Her message was simple, visionary, and courageous. She spoke out for the masses of working-class people who had no voice in decision-making, and she was effective because she exhibited the qualities of a selfless leader with great humility. Her seminal achievements were the culmination of her undaunted persistence in defending the environment against corporate polluters. Carson possessed three important qualities that made her a leader. These are qualities that grew from her own life experiences, and her own strong training and cultivation from her early childhood forward.

These three qualities contributed to her great credibility and her own personal acceptance by such a large part of the public:

- Strong research on the basis of documentation of oceans and ecology of the estuarine areas.
- Passion and a deep personal connection with the natural world and the concept that people are part of nature.
- Eloquence in her writing through creating an image of the future as a consequence of the introduction of new policies powerful enough to move Congress to act to protect the environment.

The Continuing Challenge

There are several issues at the turn of the twenty-first century which pose significant challenges to the future of the world and the environment's capacity to sustain humans, flora, and fauna. The most striking is the disparity in the consumption level of resources per capita between the United States population and the consumption levels of other nations. This is especially significant when we examine the needs of emerging economies. The challenge we face is to provide for the sustainability of the earth, which means we must find ways to meet the needs of the current generation without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs. Some ways to approach a more environmentally sustainable future are:

- Align public policies and laws with the laws of nature.
- Consider the global implications of US policies and practices.
- Incorporate the precautionary principle into law.
- Incorporate sustainability policies into law.

The Rachel Carson Homestead Association preserves and promotes Rachel Carson's environmental ethic through education programs, publications, and projects.

SEE ALSO: Ecological Protest Movements; Environmental Protest, United States, 19th Century

References and Suggested Readings

- Carson, R. (1962) Silent Spring. Boston: Houghton Mifflin.
- Carson, R. (1991) The Sea Around Us, 3rd ed. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Grunwald, M. (2006) The Swamp: The Everglades, Florida, and the Politics of Paradise. New York: Simon & Schuster.
- Lear, L. (1997) Lost Woods: The Discovered Writing of Rachel Carson. Boston: Beacon Press.
- Lear, L. (1997) Rachel Carson: Witness for Nature. New York: Henry Holt.
- Matthiessen, P. (Ed.) (2007) Courage for the Earth: Writers, Scientists and Activists Celebrate the Life and Writing of Rachel Carson. Boston: Houghton Mifflin.
- Rachel Carson Homestead Association (RCHA) at www.rachelcarsonhomestead.org.

Casa del Obrero Mundial

Leticia Pacheco Espejel

On September 22, 1912, the Casa del Obrero Mundial (House of World Workers, COM) was founded by four union syndicates – the Sociedad Mutuo Cooperativa de Dependientes de Restaurantes (Mutual Society of Restaurant Employees), the Sociedad Mutualista Union y Concordia de Ramo de Meseros (Mutualist Union and Gastronomic Unity of Waiters), the Confederación Tipográfica de México (Typographic Confederation of Mexico), and the Union de Canteros Mexicanos (Union of Mexican Stone Crushers) – and the Grupo Luz. The Grupo Luz, whose members had formerly cooperated with the Socialist Party, established the Escuela Racionalista (Rationalist School), which was comparable to the existing schools in Spain headed by Francisco Ferrer y Guardia. COM assumed the political direction of the Corte Anarchosindicalista group, which worked to improve working conditions, create international cooperation between workers, encourage self-organization, raise standards for all workers, and reject the power of church and state. The Syndicalist Union and the Grupo Luz created COM and immediately appointed Luis Mendez as treasurer and Jacinto Huitrón as administrator. From the beginning COM was an anarcho-sindicalist center, a place for encounters and sharing ideas. Gradually other syndicates joined COM, and others were founded with COM's help.

Syndicalism is the movement of workers fighting to achieve rights concerned with their labor, independently from the state. Syndicalists believe that with active struggle through unions, better labor conditions and liberation will finally be achieved, and they disregard parliamentary reforms as ineffective. The goal is to raise workers' awareness of the reasons for their misery and exploitation and to show them the need to organize themselves against capitalism. One of the tasks of the syndicate is the political formation of its members. Before changing existing systems in centers of production, the proprietors' influence over the means of production must be eliminated without interference from the state. Syndicalists call this the socialization of the means of production, the working instruments, and the accumulated wealth that is generated from the labor of all workers. Freedom of speech, free agreements, and free federalism were the basic principles of COM.

On June 6, 1914, President Victoriano Huerta began to clamp down on COM's activities. Various members were arrested, but some held out undercover until the fall of President Huerta on June 15, when COM resumed its activities. As General Alvaro Obregón, a supporter of Venustiano Carranza, returned to politics, he granted COM the right to use the installations of the former Jesuita de San Juan de Letrán convent in Mexico City. At that point, the workers' organization gained support, but it also began to split. New syndicates had been established under the guardianship of COM, and, perhaps more importantly, a second COM was founded in Monterrey, along the lines of the first in Mexico City. The Confederación Regional Obrera Mexicana (CROM), founded in 1918, emerged as the first regional workers' confederation, differing from COM in propounding a regulated syndicalism instead of a strategy of direct action, which had debilitated Mexican syndicalism because of constant repression against syndicates and their leaders. During the Labor Congress in Saltillo in 1918, the majority of delegates expressed their support for CROM. At that point the Mexican Labor Party (PLM) was founded as the first Mexican party for workers. The divergent strategies and ideologies of CROM and COM provoked a separation of the syndicates. Years later COM was consolidated within CROM, which finally became the Confederación de Trabajadores de México (CTM, Mexican Confederation of Workers), which continues to exist and receives support from the government.

COM was also affected by the creation of the Batallones Rojos (Red Battalions), which were set up in 1917 to help the constitutional government. This decision was not accepted by all members of COM, provoking further splits in the organization. The collaboration between COM and the constitutionalistas was cemented in a firm pact on February 17, 1915. Members of COM also agreed to further efforts at propaganda and help win sympathizers for the constitutional government. They also assembled revolutionary committees, known as "rojos" (red), which actively collaborated with the constitutional government.

The constitutional government never felt comfortable with these agreements, which had been provoked by the protests of the different syndicates. As COM worked in solidarity with the strikers, the government reacted by locking out COM. With the approval of the Constitution of 1917, the right of workers to an eight-hour workday and the right to strike were upheld by Venustiano Carranza. With the consolidation of CROM and COM, the COM steadily declined, disappearing altogether in 1918.

SEE ALSO: Anarchosyndicalism; Escuela Moderna Movement (The Modern School); Mexican Revolution of 1910–1921; Mexico, Labor Movement and Protests, 1980–2005; Mexico, Worker Struggles and Labor Unions, 1950s–1970s

References and Suggested Readings

- Carr, B. (1976) El Movimiento obrero y la política en México, 1940–1929 I. Mexico City: Secretaria de Educación Pública.
- Huitrón, J. (1976) Orígenes de la Historia del movimiento obrero en México. Mexico City: Editores Unidos Mexicanos.

Casement, Roger (1864–1916)

Fintan Lane

Roger Casement was a British diplomat, human rights activist, Irish revolutionary nationalist, and anti-imperialist. He was born in Sandycove, County Dublin, in Ireland on September 1, 1864, the son of Roger Casement (an officer in the British army) and Anne Jephson. His father was Protestant and his mother was Roman Catholic, but he was raised a Protestant by his father's relatives in Ulster, following the deaths of both his parents by the time he was 13 years old. Casement left formal education at the age of 16, securing a clerical position with a shipping company in Liverpool. In 1892, he entered the British colonial service.

He subsequently served as a consul in Africa (1895–1904) and South America (1906–13), developing a reputation as a human rights activist. While in Africa, Casement served in the Niger, Mozambique, Angola, and the Congo. In 1903, while British consul in Léopoldville, he was commissioned by the British government to investigate human rights abuses by colonists against the indigenous population; the following year, he delivered a detailed eyewitness account exposing widespread human rights abuses in the Congo Free State. The Congo Free State had been under the control of King Leopold II of Belgium since 1885, when it was granted to him by the Berlin Conference, and the king, acting as a private capitalist, exploited the area's natural resources – mostly rubber – while annihilating the existing inhabitants. Casement's damning report played a significant part in Leopold's eventual relinquishment of his personal holdings in Africa.

Casement's human rights work continued during his time in South America, and in 1910 the British Foreign Office asked him to investigate the actions of an Anglo-Peruvian rubber company in the northwest Amazon region. Casement's inquiries and his subsequent report on the Putumayo atrocities did much to alert the European public to the brutal nature of the colonial commercial exploitation of South America. He detailed the genocide of indigenous peoples at the hands of ruthless companies engaged in rubber extraction, and his exposures led to the establishment of a lengthy Parliamentary Select Committee Inquiry in the British parliament. In 1911, he was awarded a knighthood for his work in Peru.

Casement retired from the British civil service in 1912, by which stage he had developed hostility to imperialism and to the British empire in particular. His growing interest in Irish nationalism led him to join the Irish Volunteers in 1913, a paramilitary organization which sought home rule for Ireland and a weakening of the link with Britain. As World War I unfolded, he traveled to Germany and sought to persuade captured Irish-born British soldiers to fight against Britain in an "Irish Brigade"; his efforts were mostly unsuccessful. He had more success in soliciting arms from Germany to assist a rebellion in Ireland, and, in April 1916, he attempted to smuggle a shipment of weapons into the country via submarine, but was arrested at Banna Strand, near Ardferit in County Kerry. The arms were intended for the rebellion that broke out in Dublin at Easter that year, by a section of the Irish Volunteers led by Patrick Pearse, Tom Clarke, and James Connolly.

Casement was conveyed to London and charged with treason. His knighthood was taken from him and, in an attempt to discredit him, excerpts from his alleged private diaries were circulated during his trial by the British government; these diaries, which highlighted Casement's homosexuality, remain a source of controversy, with some commentators claiming that they are British forgeries. However, they are now generally considered to be genuine.

Roger Casement was convicted of treason and hanged on August 3, 1916. He converted to Catholicism while awaiting execution. Following a campaign, his remains were later returned to Dublin in 1965 where they were reinterred following an official state funeral.

SEE ALSO: Connolly, James (1868–1916); Easter Rising and the Irish Civil War; Irish Nationalism; Pearse, Patrick (Pádraig) (1879–1916)

References and Suggested Readings

- Daly, M. (Ed.) (2000) Roger Casement in Irish and World History. Dublin: Royal Irish.
- Doerries, R. R. (2000) Prelude to the Easter Rising: Sir Roger Casement in Imperial Germany. London: Routledge.
- Hochschild, A. (1998) King Leopold's Ghost. Boston: Mariner Books.
- Mitchell, A. (Ed.) (1997) The Amazon Journal of Roger Casement. London: Anaconda.
- Siocháin, S. O. (2008) Roger Casement: Imperialist, Rebel, Revolutionary. Dublin: Lilliput Press.
- Siocháin, S. O. & O'Sullivan, M. (Eds.) (2004) The Eyes of Another Race: Roger Casement's Congo Report and 1903 Diary. Dublin: University College Dublin Press.

Caste war of Yucatan (Guerra de castas en Yucatán)

Vittorio Sergi

The caste war was a wide rebellion of the Mayan population of Yucatan against the white elite of the colonial government. The rebellion began as a widespread guerilla war against white rural properties. The Mayans then established autonomous territories; when they had gained enough strength, they threatened the main colonial centers of Valladolid and Merida. The war, influenced partly by religious ideology, was organized by a segmental political and military organization and lasted with unequal intensity from the upheavals of 1847 to the last armed clashes of 1933.

In the nineteenth century, the society of Yucatan was a mixed system of colonial rule and institutions, with a combination of Mayan and colonial cultures. The ideological frame of the rebellion was established in a syncretic cult: several sanctuaries of the talking Holy Crosses arose in different centers of the rebellion. The cult had various prophets, the best known of whom was Juan de la Cruz, who claimed to foresee the resurrection of the Mayan culture and the punishment of white colonialists. Beginning in 1847, whites, led by Governor Miguel Barbachano, were driven out of almost all the territories of Yucatan. Then, between 1848 and 1851, with the support of the Mexican state, they regained the majority of the peninsula. The first Mayan leaders, Cecilio Chi and Jacinto Pat, were killed in 1849 over internal conflicts, and leadership passed to Florentino Chan and Venancio Puc. The Mayan rebels recovered in the southeast, with the support of the border state of Belize, with which they established a trade in weapons and other war implements. The main rebel territory was established around the ceremonial center of Chan Santa Cruz, southeast of Tulum. There were also other autonomous Mayan centers, such as Ixcanha and Icaiche Maya in the south-center of Yucatan.

In 1857 Puc led a new wave of rebellion. His army, called the Cruzob, attacked and conquered the colonial towns of Bacalar and Tekax. In 1861 the new governor of Yucatan, Agustín Acereto, sent a strong army to regain Chan Santa Cruz and crush the rebellion. The colonial army of more than 3,000 men entered the ceremonial center, abandoned by the Mayans without a fight, but soon they suffered heavy guerilla attacks from the natives and were forced to retreat, having suffered more than 2,000 casualties.

In December 1863, Puc tried to organize a strong column of 5,000 to attack Merida, but when the planting season came the majority of the soldiers abandoned their units to take care of their crops. In the next years, guerilla attacks continued with lower intensity from the autonomous Mayan zones. Negotiations in 1883 led to a treaty signed on January 11, 1884 in Belize, between Mexico and Chan Santa Cruz territories. Bacalar remained in the hands of Mayans until January 22, 1901, when it was conquered by Mexican Admiral Angel Ortiz Monasterio, while General Ignacio A. Bravo occupied Chan Santa Cruz. The conflict caused between 40,000 and 50,000 casualties.

SEE ALSO: Cuauhtémoc (1502–1525); Cuba, Struggle for Independence from Spain, 1868–1898; Ecuador, Indigenous and Popular Struggles

References and Suggested Readings

- Abreu Gómez, E. (1997) La conjura de Ximúm: la guerra de castas en Yucatán. Mérida, Yucatan, Mexico: Maldonado Editores.
- Dumond Don, E. (1997) The Machete and the Cross: Campesino Rebellion in Yucatan. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press.
- Reed, N. (1964) The Caste War of Yucatan. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Rugeley, T. (Ed.) (2001) Maya Wars: Ethnographic Accounts from Nineteenth-Century Yucatan. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press.

Castoriadis, Cornelius (1922–1997)

Christos Boukalas

Political philosopher, economist, psychoanalyst, and “sovietologist,” Castoriadis was among the most radical and original postwar thinkers. His theory informed the 1968 uprising in France and has deepened its influence since. Born to Greek parents in 1922 in Istanbul (then Constantinople), he soon moved to Athens, where he experienced the Nazi occupation, the resistance and liberation, the Greek civil war, and the Stalinist attempted coup of December 1944. His life can be seen as a series of ruptures, unified by the quest for autonomy.

During the Greek civil war (1945), and persecuted by both Fascists and Stalinists, he fled to Paris and joined the Trotskyite Parti Communiste Internationaliste (Internationalist Communist Party) (PCI). While the latter defended the Stalinist regimes, seeing them as a temporary deviation from socialism, Castoriadis insisted that the rise of the bureaucracy was an organic, permanent element of “soviet” societies, which were as exploitative and repressive as any capitalist regime.

A scission occurred in 1949 when the PCI offered enthusiastic support to Tito’s dictatorship in Yugoslavia. Together with Claude Lefort and others, Castoriadis formed the Socialisme ou Barbarie (Socialism or Barbarity) group. In a series of publications in the group’s review, Castoriadis conceptualized the widespread workers’ struggles throughout the 1950s (East Germany, Poland, Hungary, Britain, France, US) as revolts against the bureaucracy: against the state (in the East) and against trade unions (in the West). Drawing from the experience of these struggles, and attempting to contribute to their advance in a revolutionary direction, he engaged with the question of the “revolutionary organization.” He saw the latter as necessary for connecting topical struggles with the question of the overall social organization, thus opening their horizon of action to transcend the capitalist-bureaucratic institution of society; and he fervently opposed the Leninist premise that “vanguard” organizations should be leading social movements.

This critique of the bureaucracy (including “revolutionary” vanguards) and the idea that social struggles contain seeds of a social organization beyond capitalism and statism, combined into developing the positive content of revolutionary theory, encapsulated in the notion of autonomy.

Apart from predating the many revolutionaries who adopted autonomy as their goal since 1968, Castoriadis is the only one to offer a clear explanation of the term. Given that “society” can only exist through institutions (norms, practices, ethos, structures), “autonomy” refers to the relation between society and its institution. An autonomous society is one that is conscious of, and explicitly recognizes “itself” as, the only creator of its institutions. It can thus at any time question, challenge, and alter them. This unceasing instituting work is especially clear in revolutionary periods, when society shatters its old institution and seeks to create a new one.

Opposed to autonomy is heteronomy: the condition that occults social self-creation by imputing it to an extra-social source. For millennia, heteronomy meant that societies could not question their institution, since it was perceived to be deriving from Divinity. Modern societies have, through their revolutions, rejected God and recognized human beings as the instituting source. This autonomous tendency is countered by heteronomy in the perception that Laws (of nature, history, or the economy) determine social institution.

In the political plain, autonomy corresponds to democracy: since society recognizes itself as the sole source of its institution, politics (i.e., the institution, organization, and direction of society) is a process equally involving all its members. Heteronomy, on the contrary, is pertinent to “government by experts”: since society is instituted by some extra-social force, the direction of social affairs is the prerogative of those who successfully claim knowledge of that source and its ways.

Subsequently, statehood is incompatible with democracy, and a condition of heteronomy. Among forms of political organization, statehood is characterized by the radical division of political labor it introduces. All directing functions are monopolized by a tiny fraction of the population, and everyone has to conform with and execute their decisions. This division is based on the premise that “public affairs” are the realm of special knowledge and expertise possessed by state leaders. Whether this expertise derives from the knowledge of “God’s will” or of the “laws of the market” makes little difference. Additionally, permitting the ruled to choose their ruler does not cancel the rulers-ruled relationship. Thus, the quintessential condition for democracy is to shatter the myth that politics is a distinct “science.” Politics implicates everyone in a society, hence everyone should have equal participation in the political process.

In this context, Castoriadis vehemently rejected techno-rationality (and its buzzwords: “development,” “progress,” “productivity”) for denying the possibility for social self-determination. On the same grounds he broke (in the mid-1970s) with Marxism – and Marx – tout court. In his critique, ongoing for two decades, Castoriadis perceived an apparent tension between revolutionary and determinist features in Marx – the former evident when Marx addressed phenomena as historically specific, the latter when he attempted to construe ahistorical universals. Nonetheless, the revolutionary elements are invariably subservient to determinism. Thus, Marx’s theory of history extrapolates an understanding of the dynamics of capitalist society into universally valid “laws,” and his economic theory is based on essentializing “socially necessary labor.” While class struggle is recognized as the motor of history, classes are in fact compelled to execute their historically determined role once a mode of production has exhausted its capacity to develop the productive forces. In short, by placing it “on its feet,” Marx has kept the Hegelian framework intact: history is the gradual materialization of preexisting universals. Thus Marxism reinstates heteronomy and impedes the revolutionary project of autonomy.

Attempting to broaden and deepen the project of autonomy, Castoriadis focused on the autonomous individual as a product and producer of autonomous society. He also recuperated ancient Greek social organization and thought as reference points for the project, and sought to inscribe a horizon of autonomy to the feminist and ecological movements.

Castoriadis' importance for revolutionary politics is hard to overstate. He is the only political thinker to undertake a tortured, honest break with Marx for the sake of the revolutionary project; his notion of autonomy informs the organization and defines the horizon of action for every post-1968 radical/revolutionary gesture worth the name; and his conception of democracy can serve as a point of orientation, and as a basis for a radical critique of statism – which currently parades its “democracy” as the ultimate justification for its brutality.

SEE ALSO: Autonomism; Leninist Philosophy; Marxism; May 1968 French Uprisings; Socialisme ou Barbarie; Trotsky, Leon (1879–1940); Vanguard Party

References and Suggested Readings

- Castoriadis, C. (1984) Crossroads in the Labyrinth. Brighton: Harvester.
- Castoriadis, C. (1988–93) Political and Social Writings, 3 vols. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Castoriadis, C. (1991) Philosophy, Politics, Autonomy. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Castoriadis, C. (1997) The Imaginary Institution of Society. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Curtis, D. A. (Ed.) (1997) The Castoriadis Reader. Oxford: Blackwell.

Castro, Fidel (b. 1926)

Mike Gonzalez

Few figures have excited such hostility or inspired such unconditional loyalty as Fidel Castro. The Cuban Revolution of 1959, from which Castro emerged the undisputed leader, turned the tide of politics in Latin America. The Revolution challenged the regional domination of the United States, which until then had regarded the southern continent as its backyard. The response from Washington, predictably, was to seek to overthrow Castro and bring down the Cuban Revolution by means ranging from crude attempts at assassination to full-scale military assault and economic siege. Forty-nine years later, an ailing Castro defiantly remained the leader and representative of a Cuba that has survived every attempt to destroy it, although the day-to-day tasks of leadership passed to his brother, Raúl. It is testimony to Castro's determination, his political skill, and his enormous personal authority that he has survived his erstwhile allies in the Soviet bloc and every external attempt to subvert his regime.

Fidel was the third of five children born to Galician immigrants. The Castros became a landed family whose finca, at one point, measured 26,000 acres. In 1945 he entered the Faculty of Law at Havana University, where he became involved in an often violent world of student politics. The university directly reflected the wider society where successive presidents – Batista, Grau, and Prío Socarrás – governed by corruption and violence in equal measure. The Havana campus was run by two criminal organizations which tended to resolve disputes in armed confrontations. Belonging to neither, Fidel Castro took to carrying his own revolver.

There were other active political organizations as well, but the Cuban Communist Party (PSP), as far as Castro was concerned, was wholly discredited as a result of its collaboration with the Batista and Grau governments. The nationalist organizations emerging from the previous decade were corrupt and personalistic. The only other alternative was the Directorio Universitario, also born out of the events of 1933 that brought Batista to power and committed to a politics of armed actions and clandestine organization. In 1947, Castro participated in an abortive armed expedition against Trujillo, the dictatorial ruler of the Dominican Republic, escaping arrest by a marathon swim across dangerous waters. A year later he was in Bogota when the assassination of Liberal leader Jorge Eliécer Gaitán sparked the violent events known as the Bogotazo.

Upon his return to Havana, Castro began to work with one of the few political leaders who had not succumbed to corruption – Eduardo Chibás, whose Ortodoxo Party was formed to rescue the nationalist tradition from its more cynical users. A radio journalist, Chibás was hugely popular, and Castro – already a well-known figure in Cuban politics – joined his team in preparation for the elections of 1952. Chibás's sudden death at his own hands in August 1951 left Castro to assume his mantle. The opportunity never came, however, as in March 1952 the ubiquitous Fulgencio Batista took power in a military coup and the elections were annulled.

Fidel Castro lifts a young admirer in the air after assuming power following the Cuban Revolution. Castro arrived in Havana on January 8, 1959 following the overthrow of Fulgencio Batista's dictatorship. On February 16, Castro was sworn in as prime minister of Cuba. (Burt Glinn/Magnum Photos)

For Castro, this was definitive evidence of the futility of electoral politics. The history of the Cuban Communist Party, itself mired in the politics of corruption and patronage, could offer him no alternative. Instead he began to mobilize for a strategy of armed struggle. One year later, on July 26, 1953, he led 165 young people in an assault on the Moncada Barracks. It was a failure. Nineteen soldiers and eight rebels died in the attack and over 60 rebels were tortured to death under Batista's direct orders in subsequent days. Castro was put on trial in September and sentenced to 15 years in jail. His speech in the court lasted four hours, and represents the first manifesto of the 26th of July Movement. The title of the speech, named after its presentation, was "History will absolve me." In it he sets out a program of political independence and economic reform within a national, capitalist framework.

Released two years later under amnesty, Castro went to Mexico where he immediately began to plan a new and ultimately successful armed campaign against Batista. Among those who joined him there were his brother Raúl and the young Argentinian doctor, Ernesto "Che" Guevara. In November of 1956, 82 men boarded the motor launch Granma to sail to Cuba and establish the base of a new guerilla army.

They landed on December 3. The voyage took longer than expected and the group sent to meet the boat had dispersed, thinking there had been a change of plan. In effect this first action of Castro's 26th of July Movement (J-26-M) was inauspicious, all the more so since the rebels were met by Batista's troops and only 19 survived the first armed encounter with the state.

Formed in 1955, J-26-M was presented to the world in March 1956 as the inheritor of Chibás's nationalist Ortodoxo tradition. At that point it had the support of José Antonio Echeverría's Directorio Revolucionario and the backing of some more sinister individuals, including ex-president Prío Socarrás. Within Cuba, the organization could claim supporters among young officers in the armed forces, students, and some young trade unionists, chief among them Frank País, a teacher based in Santiago de Cuba.

The failure of the landing left Castro and the 18 survivors adrift for several days in the Sierra Maestra. Castro's strategy was to establish a guerilla base in the mountains and from there to harry Batista's troops. The clear assumption was that in a remote area where landowners and local bosses held power over a poor landless peasantry, support for the rebel army would come quickly. In fact, the initial support came from local groups that could more accurately be described as bandits than revolutionaries. But some individuals did join the small armed band. When Herbert Matthews, the correspondent for Life magazine, arrived in the Sierra in February 1957, there were no more than 18 people in Fidel's encampment. He convinced Matthews that they were many more, however, and the journalist's admiring report had a double effect. It challenged Batista's false claims of having eliminated all the rebels, and it boosted Castro's reputation within and outside Cuba. Fidel was quick to use the opportunity it offered him. The "First Sierra Maestra Manifesto" followed some days later, calling on the population of Cuba to rise against Batista. It was characteristically over-confident.

There were unresolved tensions within the Movement, particularly between Frank País, the acknowledged leader of the urban movement, and Castro. País felt Castro was arrogant and overbearing and unwilling to negotiate with his colleagues. Beyond the personal there were matters of strategy at issue; País argued for a strategy based on the urban movements, including the trade unions, and for a broad resistance front. Castro, on the other hand, insisted that the mountains should lead and the urban movement should act in a support capacity. A second manifesto published in July assimilated some of these suggestions, and argued for agrarian reform with compensation and a return to the liberal 1940 Constitution. This formed the basis of an agreement among anti-Batista forces signed in Miami in October, but Castro drew back from it when it became clear that the Rebel Army would be expected to place itself under the orders of returning exile leaders. In the internal battle within the Movement, the balance was clearly tipping in Castro's direction. And despite their enduring hostility to the Movement in the cities, the Cuban communists had a permanent representative in Castro's camp.

By early 1958 the revolutionaries controlled significant areas of the Sierra Maestra and Raúl opened a second front in the Sierra Cristal in March. Regular radio broadcasts and some judicious seizures of land and cattle for redistribution raised the profile of the rebels and Batista responded with the declaration of a state of emergency in March 1958. Castro then issued a call for an uprising, but the general strike in April failed and ushered in a period of extremely intense repression lasting until late June. Despite their propaganda successes there were no more than 300 rebels and for a brief period Castro's camp was in imminent danger of being overrun. Yet the tide turned by the end of the month and in July a meeting of opposition groups in Venezuela proclaimed Castro the sole leader of the revolution. The communists had refused to engage with the April strikes; now they sent one of their leaders to the mountains to acknowledge Castro's leadership.

As the last days of the Batista regime approached, it was clear that the leadership of J-26-M rested now with Castro. Through skillful maneuvering between factions, he had won over the communists as well as several sections of the right-wing nationalist opposition. In August Che Guevara moved to the center of the island, to Escambray, to open a second front. This would prove crucial as a wounded national army and a regime rotten with corruption lost the support of its Washington mentors and came under pressure from the guerrillas. The first column that moved into Havana on January 1, 1959 was led by Che Guevara and Camilo Cienfuegos; Castro himself arrived eight days later after a triumphant motorcade across Cuba starting in Santiago. There was now no doubt as to who was the leader of the Revolution – the manner of Castro's entry into the capital proved it beyond doubt.

Yet for the initial period Castro exercised power indirectly. He had first to negotiate with other forces – the bourgeois opposition to Batista, the remnants of the Directorio, and most crucially the communist party and the old trade union leaders. What was not clear was where Castro stood politically. His earlier manifestos expressed the ideas and strategies of a revolutionary nationalist and an anti-imperialist, but beyond shaping a new relationship with the United States, nothing was very clear. "The Revolution is Cuban and democratic in its core and its conceptions," wrote Castro in an article in January 1959 (Skierka 2004: 72). He repeated these views during his visit to the United States in April. The new government, led by high court judge Manuel Urrutia, consisted almost entirely of members of the old Cuban bourgeoisie; Castro himself had no official role beyond commander of the armed forces, though the reality of his leadership was uncontested. At this stage it seemed that Castro was primarily concerned with negotiating with Washington and cautious about alienating US interests.

At the same time, Castro was meeting regularly with PSP leadership, even though the public relationship between the PSP and J-26-M remained extremely hostile. The PSP had acknowledged Castro's leadership of the Revolution, and he in turn was concerned to contain any threat from what remained, after all, a significant organization (its membership was around 50,000). Most importantly, perhaps, it was an organized and disciplined political structure, whereas Castro had created a structure of command, which would be increasingly reflected in the state, and a culture of mass support – but not an independent political organization capable of acting outside the state and of demanding accountability for the leadership.

The relationship between Castro, the PSP, and the trade unions changed and shifted through 1959 as he tested US attitudes toward the Revolution. His April visit to Washington, with President Eisenhower permanently unavailable and the virulently anti-communist vice-president, Richard Nixon, conducting high-level discussions, was a clear sign of things to come. Nixon's discussions with Raúl and Che at a refueling stop in Houston while Castro was traveling to Venezuela clearly gave the US an opportunity to warn Castro not to move too close to the United States. In any event, Washington's attitudes certainly pushed a wary Castro toward the PSP and a more radical strategy than the one set out in his speech from the court in 1953.

In the trade unions, for example, the new leadership, coming from the urban wing of J-26-M, was fiercely anti-communist; later that year, at the first congress of the new national union, the leaders were removed and replaced by communists. This opened splits within J-26-M as well as creating tensions between Castro and his old bourgeois allies. The president resigned in July and in October Huber Matos, an ex-Ortodoxo and military leader during the guerilla war, resigned in protest at the growing communist presence in government. He was immediately arrested and sentenced to 20 years in prison after trial.

The Matos trial not only indicated the internal rifts within J-26-M and the growth of communist influence, it also left little doubt as to how opposition would be dealt with by Castro. Within the United States, liberals like C. Wright Mills despaired that government intransigence was driving Castro to the left; the right, meanwhile, pointed to the (fairly moderate) agrarian reform law passed in May 1959 as evidence of Castro's determination to attack US interests on the island and argued that Castro had secretly always been a communist. This clearly was not the case. On the other hand, two developments were clearly already shaping the new Cuban state. First, the belligerence of US attitudes (then as now), expressed in a de facto economic boycott made official early the following year, meant that Cuba had urgently to seek other allies and other markets. Secondly, it was clear that the closeness of a sworn enemy made national defense a priority – indeed, it became the justifying ideology for an increasingly militarized state whose political culture was shaped by concepts of command and hierarchy. The Revolutionary Armed Forces, under Castro's command, numbered around 100,000; a new Intelligence Directorate was and remained a highly effective unit; the armed militias were a reserve force of a further 100,000; and the Committees for the Defense of the Revolution (CDRs) effectively comprised a locally based apparatus of control.

In February 1960, the signing of a Cuban–Soviet trade arrangement signaled a fundamental change. Economic rapprochement would imply also a much closer political relationship with the Cuban Communist Party as the pro-Soviet force within Cuba. As the US cut the sugar quota and prepared for direct intervention, Castro had very little choice. When US oil companies refused to refine Russian oil in August 1960, Castro nationalized the oil companies; their refineries would now process Soviet oil and Cuban sugar would flow to Eastern Europe in return. At the same time, the exodus of the middle classes intensified, reaching half a million by the end of 1960. Internally, the closure that year of the cultural magazine Lunes de Revolución signaled a growing control over dissent.

Against this backdrop Castro attended the United Nations General Assembly in September. The decision to house the Cuban delegation in a Harlem guest house endeared him to the public and enraged the North American right. His four-hour speech was not long by his standards, and it was in many ways conciliatory, keeping the door open to further negotiation. While he met stony silence from many delegates, Russian Prime Minister Khrushchev expressed audible delight. But US attitudes were hardening and there seemed little alternative for Castro than to further a relationship with the Soviets. As the year ended, a series of small-scale attacks and acts of sabotage were a sign of things to come.

The Bay of Pigs invasion in April 1961 showed Castro at his most resolute and charismatic. The invasion was defeated in less than three days and proved Castro to be a far more prepared and formidable enemy than had been expected. It was also a turning point. In December Castro unexpectedly announced that the Revolution was now “Marxist-Leninist.” Although Raúl Castro and Che had long been pressing for political radicalization, Castro's decision was, as ever, pragmatic and realist. Relations with the United States were clearly severed and Cuba's economic survival now depended on the Soviet connection. This move had internal implications, as far as the role of the Communist Party in particular was concerned. An overall political shift occurred, as the Soviets began to take an increasingly central role in economic planning with all its political consequences. In more general terms, the centralized structure of power, with Castro now its unassailable political and military leader, echoed the shape of the Soviet state as well as the command model that informed Castro's more general strategy. The popular organizations, strengthened in the wake of the Bay of Pigs, were conduits of control rather than organs of mass democracy. Yet they also counterbalanced the growing influence of the PSP. The denunciation of the "microfaction" led by Anibal Escalante, the communist leader closest to the Soviets, and his later incarceration, were a clear warning note as to where control lay in the new Cuba.

There were other tensions in the air early in 1962, as inadequate planning, waste, and bureaucracy had produced crises in the economy and the introduction of rationing. At the same time, negotiations with the Russians led Castro to accept the construction of missile launch bases on the island. Their discovery by US spy planes, and the subsequent confrontation between the Soviets and Washington, produced the 13 days of global tension known as the October Missile Crisis. For Castro, the security of Cuba was the sole priority; if Cuba were to be attacked, then the Soviets must strike back with full force. During the event, the Soviets withdrew and the doomsday clock ticked a few minutes back. For Castro, however, this was a betrayal and a clear expression of the real limitations of Soviet support for Cuba. Clearly Castro expected a different response, and his anger produced a shift in Cuban foreign policy.

The image of Castro for decades to come would be shaped by this new direction: a search for an alternative framework for the Cuban Revolution. These were the years in which Fidelismo was closest to the ideas of Guevara, with its emphasis on extending the Revolution and its new discourse of third world solidarity and tricontinentalism. Che's travels in Africa and Asia as well as Eastern Europe were clearly exploratory, and the emphasis within Cuba on the symbolism of the guerilla no doubt reflected a genuine search for an alternative road to revolution and for an end to Cuba's isolation. It also made very clear that Castro's primary and overriding concern would always be the survival of the Cuban Revolution rather than ideological dogmatism.

The following year, 1963, was a difficult one: continuing inefficiencies and miscalculations in the economy meant that demand outstripped capacity while productivity fell in many areas. Castro's own explanation is that the Revolution tried to run before it could walk. By the end of the year it was clear that the rapid industrialization that Guevara had pushed for would not be possible. The 1964 sugar agreement with the Soviets was an example of Cuba's continuing economic dependence. This made Che's position increasingly difficult, though none of this emerged publicly. Che's decision to leave Cuba and open a new guerilla front, first in the Congo and later in Bolivia, was clearly taken with Fidel's knowledge and consent – though subsequent accounts have often differed as to what was discussed between them. What is known is that Guevara left an undated resignation letter with Fidel in case his death or capture on foreign territory should prove an embarrassment to Cuba. In October of 1965, Fidel read the letter at the first congress of the new Communist Party of Cuba. Effectively this severed Che's relationship with Cuba, though he would return once more in secret before moving on to Bolivia.

There are a number of explanations offered for Fidel's decision. Some suggest that Che was a rival for political leadership, though this explanation seems unlikely. Still, Guevara had recently been writing and speaking from a critical perspective against the backdrop of a deteriorating relationship with the Soviets. His last speech, in Algiers, had been overtly critical of the Soviet role in the world. Fidel, for his part, seemed to have been cognizant of the fact that the continental armed struggle was increasingly a rhetorical device and that the survival of the Cuban Revolution – always his priority – necessarily depended on the relationship with the Soviet bloc. Soviet disapproval of Che required that Fidel distance himself from his comrade in arms.

Fidel was equally unwilling to sacrifice his own political independence, especially in the light of the October crisis. Thus, he did not attend the fiftieth anniversary celebrations of the Russian Revolution in Moscow in October 1967, and in his speeches at the time emphasized Che's concept of the "new man" as distinct from the economic realism advocated by Soviet advisors.

In January 1968, the Cultural Congress in Havana drew together radical and revolutionary intellectuals from around the world in a debate deeply imbued with the “spirit of 1968” and overseen by iconic portraits of Guevara. The strains between Cuba and the Eastern European bureaucracies were far from resolved. The Cuban economy was in a serious crisis, and the criticisms coming from Eastern Europe were specifically directed at Castro who was, it seemed, the source of all decision-making. Criticisms of his autocratic style were legion, and the concentration of power in the hands of Castro and his immediate circle gave credence to those arguments. It seemed strange, therefore, that the intellectuals of the new generation should give such uncritical support to a leader who enshrined many of the problems which that generation was beginning to acknowledge within existing socialist models. It is perhaps testimony to Castro’s charisma, or equally to the third worldist idealism typified by Régis Debray, that so little of the critical thought of the period should have been applied to Castro.

In March 1968 Castro launched the “Revolutionary Offensive,” an apparent radicalization of the Revolution which nationalized the remaining small businesses and caricatured their owners as a parasitic class. It was not a new device, nor would it be the last time an ideological offensive was launched to veil material difficulties. At the same time, the theme of the “new man,” who championed social responsibility over personal comfort, appeared again in anticipation of the Gran Zafra, the Great Sugar Harvest of 1970. In fact, Castro simultaneously invoked the spirit of Che and distanced himself from the continental revolution identified with the dead guerillero. In August 1968, Castro supported the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia as an unfortunate necessity and condemned the political reforms initiated there by Dubček in the Prague Spring as a concession to imperialism.

The decision to produce a 1970 harvest of ten million tons of sugar fell far short of its objective. The attempt to increase production, however, mobilized huge numbers of voluntary laborers, brought production and activity to a halt in many areas, and yielded only some six and a half million tons. If the intention had been to generate a surplus sufficient to relaunch a program of diversification, then it manifestly failed. Castro’s speech at the Third World Summit in Algiers in 1970 gave unequivocal support to Soviet foreign policy objectives; it coincided too with Cuba’s entry into the Warsaw Pact. While Castro would frequently seek opportunities to emphasize minor differences with the Soviet bloc, in reality Cuba had now become a member. The consequences within Cuba were increasingly draconian measures affecting labor and a clear integration of the Cuban economy into the Soviet ambit.

Cuba’s reliance on Soviet markets and supplies deepened as the US embargo became increasingly savage. Cuba’s role in Africa, and in particular in Ethiopia and Somalia, must be seen in the context of Soviet geopolitical strategy. The presence of the Cuban military in Angola undoubtedly tipped the balance in favor of the Angolan liberation movement in its struggle against South African-backed forces – but their presence there was not unproblematic and the social consequences for Cuba of the returning dead, sick, and wounded were greater than was ever officially acknowledged. The new Constitution of 1976 formalized a system that had already existed on a de facto basis. While establishing certain mechanisms for election, the concentration of state power in the hands of a series of small interlocking commands with Castro as their undisputed head was confirmed by the constitution rather than changed by it.

In 1986 Castro’s sudden call for rectification, with its recognition of bureaucratic failures, corruption in the regime, and the inequalities that undoubtedly existed in Cuba, was not so much a road to Damascus as a deft political shift. Glasnost and perestroika threatened Cuba’s very existence, given the continuous and tightening US siege. Soviet trade was now to be conducted in dollars only – and within three years the Revolution faced the end of subsidies and support of every kind. The potential crisis was incalculable, especially given the inefficiencies that Castro had exposed in his call for rectification. In 1989, the full consequences of two decades of dependence would be exposed in the absence of spare parts and the catastrophic decline in energy supplies. The “Special period in Time of Peace” that Castro announced in 1989 was in reality a period of extreme austerity, scarcity, and disastrous economic decline. Electricity was available for only a few hours a day, some diseases of malnutrition reappeared, factories cut production, and ox-drawn plows reappeared to replace the tractor.

Yet Castro and the Cuban state survived. It can be argued that this was once again evidence of Castro's extraordinary charisma, though it is an unconvincing explanation on its own. The continuing US siege, however, provided a unifying focus which Castro and the government continually emphasized. Secondly, the Mariel boatlift and the regular expulsion of dissidents and malcontents certainly removed one potential source of opposition. More significantly still, the hardening of state control at every level of the society certainly dissuaded public criticism of Castro's leadership. The summary execution of Arnaldo Ochoa, Castro's old comrade in arms and a hero of Angola, on corruption charges certainly served to discourage the others.

By the mid-1990s, Cuba was registering positive results of economic growth. Ironically, remissions of dollars from Cubans resident in the United States became as significant as the rapidly growing tourist industry, which was Cuba's real salvation. Cuba's opening to the world market was a reality, even if it was systematically denied in its leader's speeches. By the mid-2000s Cuba was receiving over two and a half million visitors and was locked into joint initiatives with European and Canadian capital in both service and industrial areas. Castro's Charm Offensive embraced the Vatican and the king of the Yorubas. Cuba was opening to the world in the wake of 1989 but without a major change of regime, as had happened elsewhere in Eastern Europe. Cuba had changed, as was evident to anyone walking the streets of Havana. Many government bureaucrats were now successful entrepreneurs in what was an unacknowledged but burgeoning private sector. Increasingly, economic decisions were made in a more managerial style, a response to the demands of international economic relations rather than the needs of the Cuban majority.

Fidel Castro's term of leadership lasted until 2008 when he finally yielded political power to his brother Raúl after a lengthy bout of illness. Still, it was clear that Fidel, from his sick bed, remained in charge.

For some that longevity is evidence of success. Cuba's survival in the face of unremitting hostility from its powerful neighbor is certainly an achievement. But there has been a cost, especially if socialism is to be defined as a process of self-emancipation and increasing control by the majority of their own lives. The democratic principles at the core of the socialist tradition have been the victim of the central presence of Fidel Castro at the heart of Cuban politics for almost 50 years.

SEE ALSO: Bogotazo and La Violencia; Cuba, General Strikes under Batista Regime, 1952–1958; Cuba, Struggle for Independence from Spain, 1868–1898; Cuba, Transition to Socialism and Government; Cuban Post-Revolutionary Protests; Cuban Revolution, 1953–1959; Cuban Revolutionary Government; Guevara, Ernesto “Che” (1928–1967); Martí, José (1853–1895) and the Partido Revolucionario Cubano; Prague Spring

References and Suggested Readings

- Castro, F. (2007) A Fidel Castro Reader. New York: Ocean Press.
- Castro, F. & Ramonet, I. (2007) Fidel Castro: My Life. London: Penguin.
- Franqui, C. (1994) Family Portrait with Fidel. New York: Random House.
- Gonzalez, M. (2004) Che Guevara and the Cuban Revolution. London: Bookmarks.
- Schlesinger, A. (1965) A Thousand Days: John F. Kennedy in the White House. New York: Houghton Mifflin.
- Skierka, V. (2004) Fidel Castro: A Biography. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Szulc, T. (1986) Fidel: A Critical Portrait. New York: HarperCollins.

Catalan protests against centralism

Andrew Dowling

The Spanish Civil War of 1936–9, a conflict that saw Spanish democracy overthrown, was fought over many issues. One key component that bound the disparate forces of the Spanish right wing together was the perceived challenge to the unity of Spain, from both the Basque Country and Catalonia. The fear of territorial dismemberment expressed by broad swathes of the Spanish right reflected the acute anxiety within Spanish nationalism at the international status and position of Spain if it lost the important territories of Catalonia and the Basque Country. By the 1930s the Catalan national movement embodied in the project of Catalanism was in the ascendant, though a complex dynamic and conflict with the anarchist-led working class was apparent, above all in the city of Barcelona. Autonomy for Catalonia was obtained in 1932, though this measure was highly controversial and led to much anxiety on the part of the right at a perceived break-up of Spain and much anti-Catalan hysteria.

Catalan society in the 1930s had four main political constituencies. There was a revolutionary left, in which the anarchist and anarchosindicalist movement of the Confederación Nacional del Trabajo (CNT) was hegemonic. In this sector were also to be found other smaller forces of varied forms of socialism and communism. Catalanist liberals and a moderate left were led, above all, by Esquerra Republicana de Catalunya (ERC), whose main political base was formed around professionals and petit bourgeois sectors and was also supported by rural smallholders. The Catalanist right was led by the once dominant forces of the Lliga Regionalista. In particular this force felt threatened by both liberal Catalanism and, more profoundly, by the forces of organised labor. Finally, there were the anti-Catalanists, which ranged from important sectors of anarchism to right-wing monarchical sectors, who were known as the Espanyolists.

Catalonia, prior to the Spanish Civil War, displayed a complex and fluid political situation. Catalan society was relatively modernized and socially advanced, and within it was to be found a stronger bourgeois sector than in any other area of Spain. This sector of society had not only provided much of the social base for Catalanism since the late nineteenth century, but it was also able to provide cultural patronage. In spite of the reversals experienced by Catalan culture since the early eighteenth century, language and culture had been preserved, in particular in Barcelona. This was in marked contrast to the absence of the regional language in Bilbao and Santiago de Compostela. Catalan exceptionalism in this regard was expressed by the fact that many workers and most peasants, as well as bourgeois sectors, continued to speak the Catalan language. Furthermore, until the mid-1930s, Barcelona was Spain's most dynamic city, though Madrid would soon displace it.

The defeat of the Spanish Republic in the Civil War led to a particularly hostile expression of revenge on the part of the Spanish right towards Catalonia, as the territory contained both a strong nationalist movement and the most powerful organised labor movement in Spain. One of the most important weapons in the ideological armory of the Franco regime was that of Spanish unity: España, una grande y libre (One Spain, Great and Free). Franco's bloody victory in the Civil War gave an opportunity to fanatical anti-Catalanist elements to attempt the extirpation of Catalan national identity. The Franco regime was unconcerned with achieving a political consensus and the Catalans were portrayed as disloyal betrayers of Spain. A program of the full incorporation of Catalonia into the Spanish fatherland was begun with the prohibition of all that marked out Catalonia as culturally and politically distinct from the rest of the Spanish state. The aim became to harmonize the "national territory" both culturally and linguistically. The main thrust of this attack was centered on the Catalan language and all public usage of Catalan was prohibited. What marked repression in Catalonia from the Castilian-speaking areas of the state was the linguistic and cultural character of the regime's assault. However, in proportionate terms, actual executions in Catalonia were relatively small, at around 3,000. This was because of geographic proximity to the Pyrenees, where Catalanists and anarchists fled to France and many onwards to Mexico, where most would remain exiled until the 1970s. One execution which had great symbolic importance for Catalan nationalists was that of Lluís Companys, the legally elected president of the Catalan autonomous government of the Republic, the Generalitat.

Francoist victory and the institutionalization of a long-lasting and brutal dictatorship would lead to the disappearance of two pre-1936 actors: the anarchists and the old Catalanist right. Over the course of the 1940s the anarchist movement was subject to constant repression and at least 11 CNT organizing committees were captured by the regime's secret police. By 1950 the historic anarchist movement as a mass movement was dead. It failed to adapt to new times and new social forces, including what can be termed a new working class that emerged in the 1950s and beyond. Secondly, the political expression of right-wing Catalanism, the Lliga, also disappeared. This process had begun in the 1930s as it exhibited increasing hostility to the Republic, and in the summer of 1936, with increasing polarization and the outbreak of the Civil War, it collapsed and mostly supported Franco. Bourgeois and Catholic sectors that had been represented by the Lliga had been subject to revolutionary persecution in the first year of the war. Most welcomed the Franco regime, bringing with it the restoration of property, order, a disciplined working class, and the restoration of the Catholic religion. For most of the peasantry and the working class in particular, conditions were especially brutal. Workers who had experienced a radical transformation in their lives during the Civil War were now subject to harsh neo-military discipline in their employment.

Organized protest against Francoism came from two main areas. Firstly, a transformed left led by the Catalan communists of the Partit Socialista Unificat de Catalunya (PSUC). Secondly, the nationalist movement would be rebuilt by a new generation from within sectors of Catholicism. The PSUC was, in 1936, weak and unimportant in the Catalan political spectrum. However, the circumstances of the Spanish Civil War and the role of the USSR and International Communism transformed its status, as also occurred with the PCE. The PSUC was the only stateless communist party in the Comintern and by the 1960s it became the dominant force of opposition in Catalonia. Above all, it was a Catalan communist party, as it repeatedly demonstrated its commitment to Catalan identity during the course of the dictatorship. Its major publications, Treball and Nous Horitzons, were published in Catalan and it played an important role in the incorporation of Spanish-speaking immigrants into Catalan society. The PSUC resisted incorporation by the PCE, while as with its sister Spanish party, its Leninist structure aided it in conditions of clandestinity, in spite of many of its leading figures being captured and executed by the dictatorship.

However, the PSUC was caught unawares by the first major protest against the regime, the Barcelona tram strike of March 1951, which rapidly spiraled into a general strike. By the late 1950s the party sought a policy of national reconciliation and hoped to lead a broad-based opposition. Even so, most other Catalan opposition forces, from Christian Democrats to other branches of Marxism and socialism, remained extremely suspicious of the party. The PSUC also began to see the Church as a potential ally in this new strategy of opposition to the dictatorship. The mass migration of Spanish-speaking immigrants in the 1950s led to the transformation of Catalan society and a new labor movement appeared which was principally organized by the forces of communism. Between 1930 and 1970 Catalonia doubled its population. The emergence of the Workers Commissions, the CCOO, was testimony to the new sociology of labor in Catalonia. Furthermore, the strength of this indigenous communism prevented the emergence of hostility towards Catalanism, which had certainly existed prior to 1936. Although this migration certainly produced discourses of anxiety and sometimes hostility to this Spanish-speaking migration, for the immigrants, the acquisition of the Catalan language, if not for themselves, for their children, developed an aspirational content.

The Catalan cultural renaissance, la Segona Renaixença that emerged in the 1960s, was based on the activities and organizations that bourgeois Catholics had carefully constructed throughout the 1950s. Catalan-language publishing, having its origins in Church-led and Catholic publications, expanded into all areas of cultural life. Prior to 1936 the Catalan Church had been deeply unpopular in many sectors of society, and strong anti-clerical traditions culminated in persecution during the Civil War. This sector of Catalan society welcomed the Franco regime as it became part of the triumvirate of power including the military and the Falange. However, the restoration of the Church gave it relative autonomy, allowing it slowly to rebuild and, to some extent, mold a new version of Catalanism. By the mid-1950s almost all cultural expressions of Catalanism were possible due to Church patronage. Furthermore, from 1965 to 1975 communists and Catholics cooperated, as churches and other religious buildings become sanctuaries for CCOO meetings.

Social issues emerged among new Church sectors, in particular through younger urban priests. In ideological terms, a proto-liberation theology can be discerned. Symbolic of the breach made with the regime by bourgeois Catholic sectors were the events of the early 1960s. In 1960 Catholics sang publicly a Catalanist song in the presence of regime dignitaries. This resulted in the imprisonment and torture of some individuals, including the future president of democratic Catalonia, Jordi Pujol. Catholics also led a boycott of the Barcelona daily La Vanguardia when the editor, Luis de Galinsoga, described all Catalans as "shits." The boycott led to his removal as editor. In 1963 the Abbot of Montserrat was forced into exile after describing the regime as "un-Christian" in Le Monde. Finally, a group of priests demonstrated in Barcelona in 1966 against police torture and were subject themselves to beatings by the police.

The second half of the 1960s was marked by enormous international investment in the Catalan economy, drawn by low labor costs. An increasingly affluent society was able to support a variety of new cultural forms. By this time, the worst of the persecution of Catalan culture was over. The year 1966 remains important in the history of popular music through the electrification of folk embodied by Bob Dylan. In Catalonia this inspired the Nova Cançó, the new song movement. From this period of the mid-1960s we see an explosion in cultural production. As the PSUC noted in 1969, “the Franco regime has lost the battle over Catalan identity.” The Franco regime conceded that it could do no more than contain Catalanism, as its attempt at suppression, though vigorously pursued for many years, had to be abandoned. The final ten years of the Franco dictatorship were a period marked by popular democratization and the reconstitution and vertiginous expansion of civil society. The emergence of the student protest movement was another component of this process. The PSUC led the way in the positioning of the left as inheritors of Catalanism. Almost all of the opposition to the regime within Catalonia had become Catalanist by the late 1960s. Expressive of this transformation and unity of purpose is the Assemblea de Catalunya (Assembly of Catalonia) in 1971. Its creation symbolized the transformation in Catalan political culture that took place over the course of the Franco regime. The Assemblea, which brought together almost all sectors of the Catalan opposition to devise a common program, was communist-led yet took place under the protection of a monastery, at Montserrat.

The final years of the dictatorship, a period that became known as the “agony of Francoism,” were marked by an increase in intolerance and repression. The regime began to wither to a hardcore of fanatics, a sector known as the “bunker.” Regime insecurity included the prohibition of performances of the Nova Cançó and the executions of 1974 and 1975, including that of the Catalan anarchist Puig i Antich. Organized labor protest and strikes grew enormously in every year from 1969 to 1976. The working class in Catalonia, itself composed overwhelmingly of native Spanish speakers, was more radicalized than at any time since the 1930s. Catalan protest, combining Catalanist demands with calls for popular democratization, continually mobilized the largest numbers of any protest culture throughout Spain. In the period from 1975 to 1977, at a time of popular mobilization for the restoration of Catalan autonomy, the presence of migrants from other parts of Spain was notable. In September 1977, on Catalan national day, over one million people protested in Barcelona calling for freedom, amnesty for political prisoners, and the restoration of a Statute of Autonomy. Catalan autonomy was restored in 1979 and the first elections to its parliament took place in 1980, where victory went to conservative Catalanism and the left, dominant under Francoism, were defeated.

The Catalan question has remained central to the politics of democratic Spain since the end of the Franco dictatorship. The Francoist attempt at the crushing of Catalan identity led rather to it being more deeply rooted and politically powerful than was the case in 1936, prior to the outbreak of the Spanish Civil War.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Franco Worker Struggles, 1939–1975; Confederación Nacional del Trabajo (CNT)

References and Suggested Readings

- Balfour, S. (1989) Dictatorship, Workers and the City: Labour in Greater Barcelona since 1939. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Dowling, A. (2001) The Reconstitution of Political Catalanism 1939–1975. International Journal of Iberian Studies 14, 1 (April): 17–25.
- Eaude, M. (2007) Catalonia: A Cultural History. Oxford: Signal Books.
- McRoberts, K. (2001) Catalonia: Nation Building Without a State. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Mir, C., Agustí, C., & Gelonch, J. (Eds.) (2001) Violència i repressió a Catalunya durant el franquisme. Balanç historiogràfic i perspectives. Lleida: Espai/Temps.
- Solé i Sabaté, J. (Ed.) (2005) La repressió franquista a Catalunya, 1938–1953. Barcelona: Edicions 62.
- Termes, J. (1984) La immigració a Catalunya i altres estudis història del nacionalisme català. Barcelona: Empúries.

Catholic emancipation

Nancy LoPatin-Lummis

Catholic emancipation was the popular campaign in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries to end political restrictions on the Catholics of the United Kingdom, which had been established by the Act of Uniformity, the Test Act, and the Penal Laws. Daniel O'Connell (1775–1847), a Catholic lawyer, was the primary mover in establishing, organizing, and leading the campaign for Catholic emancipation and removing political restrictions from Catholics in the United Kingdom through the strategic use of cultivating and organizing the unenfranchised in extraparliamentary political organizations and exerting the force of popular opinion on a variety of governments.

The first Catholic Relief Act, passed in 1778, allowed Catholics to own and inherit land as well as join the military. However, popular discontent at the end of the century, most notably the Great Rebellion of 1798 led by Theobald Wolfe Tone and the United Irishmen, only grew with the Act of Union in 1800. This granted Irish Protestant landowners representation in Westminster and the British government full political and legal authority over Ireland. Prime Minister William Pitt consistently promised that legislation abolishing political restrictions on Catholics would follow, but Catholic emancipation legislation failed to pass in 1801 and then again in 1807. Thus, about 80 percent of Ireland remained disenfranchised and Protestant political domination over the island continued.

Catholic emancipation advocates began to organize politically in 1809 with the Catholic Association. Consisting of lawyers, businessmen, and Catholic gentry, the middle-class and moderate group was interested in both promoting Catholic interests and maintaining good relations with Westminster. But when the Catholic Committee suggested emancipation go hand in hand with the right of the British government to veto Catholic bishopric appointments, O'Connell's vehement refusal to accept this proposal began a new phase of the Catholic emancipation movement.

After biding his time and forming alliances with more radical Irish Catholic leaders like Richard Lalor Shiel, O'Connell founded the new Catholic Association in 1823. Rejecting violence as a tool of political protest, O'Connell sought to use only legal and constitutional means to end Catholic political restrictions, although he also sought to give the disenfranchised a political voice, sometimes in direct violation of the British laws defining seditious behavior. The Catholic Association instituted mass politics by opening membership up to any individual who could pay one penny a month dues. Thousands paid the "Catholic Rent" and identified with the Association as their political voice. The Catholic Church became supportive, allowing churches to hold meetings and priests to serve as local agents of the national organization by collecting rent and distributing information. Within months, a national political extraparliamentary organization of Irish Catholics was fully operational and Irish Protestants as well as the British government were nervous.

Despite its popularity, the Catholic Association did not succeed in eliminating restrictions against Catholics. What it did do was give enormous public support to O'Connell when, in 1828, he won a by-election for the seat in County Clare. The Association made it clear that if the government did not end all political restrictions that prohibited a legally elected representative from taking his seat based upon his religious affiliation, its peaceful campaign would turn into civil war.

In 1829, Wellington and his leader of the House of Commons, Sir Robert Peel, capitulated and pushed through a Catholic emancipation measure. Historians of the nineteenth century give credit to O'Connell for launching a national movement, but many argue that his insistence on linking Ireland with Catholicism and his refusal to utilize violence in any mass political campaign put him out of touch with the very masses he gave political voice to in the Catholic Association. Irish nationalism displaced Catholicism as the primary force behind Irish identity and extraparliamentary political organization, be it Young Ireland, the Fenians, or the Irish Republican Brotherhood.

Ironically, the impact of the Association, mass political action, and extraparliamentary organization had a longer-lasting effect in Britain than in Ireland. Though most historians have not made the direct connection between them, LoPatin-Lummis (1999) has argued that the Catholic Association was the main influence in the first British national popular political movement – the Political Union campaign of the Reform Act period. In 1830, Thomas Attwood formed the Birmingham Political Union with a penny associate membership status and a goal to create a national movement with regional branches. The Birmingham Argus described the two organizations as “a noble pair of twins.” From the Birmingham Political Union came the one hundred-plus Political Union movement, and from that sprang Chartism. The Catholic Association thus became a model of political organization and public opinion that launched popular campaigns and protest that impacted mass politics and modern political party machines in Britain throughout the nineteenth century.

SEE ALSO: Chartists; Fenian Movement; Ireland, Age of Revolutions, 1775–1803; Ireland, Great Rebellion, 1798; Irish Nationalism; O’Connell, Daniel (1775–1847); Tone, Theobald Wolfe (1763–1798); Young Ireland

References and Suggested Readings

- Gwynn, D. (1947) Daniel O’Connell. Cork: Cork University Press.
- Lefevre, G. J. S. (1887) Peel and O’Connell: A Review of the Irish Policy of the Parliament from the Act of Union to the Death of Sir Robert Peel. London: Kegan Paul.
- LoPatin-Lumms, N. (1999) Political Unions, Popular Politics and the Great Reform Act of 1832. Basingstoke and New York: Macmillan.
- McCaffrey, L. (1966) Daniel O’Connell and the Repeal Year. Lexington: University of Kentucky Press.
- O’Farrell, F. (1985) Catholic Emancipation: Daniel O’Connell and the Birth of Irish Democracy. Dublin: Gill & Macmillan.

Catholic Worker movement

Benjamin J. Pauli

The Catholic Worker movement is an association of communities concerned with radical social change informed by the spiritual ideals of Catholicism. The movement began in New York City in 1933 with the founding of the Catholic Worker newspaper by Dorothy Day, a former journalist and member of the bohemian left, and Peter Maurin, a French peasant who had spent much of his life as an itinerant laborer. The paper’s stunning success and rapid growth laid the groundwork for the movement’s other activities, which took their cues from Maurin’s original three-step program of round-table discussions, houses of hospitality, and agricultural communes. Day’s and Maurin’s principal influences included the personalism of Emmanuel Mounier and Nicholas Berdyaev, the Sermon on the Mount and Christ’s exhortation to spiritual and corporal works of mercy, the pacifism of Tolstoy, the active love of Dostoevsky, the agrarian and ethical anarchism of Peter Kropotkin, and the “distributism” of Hilaire Belloc, G. K. Chesterton, and Father Vincent McNabb. They envisioned their movement as a reaction to the depersonalizing effects of economic logic, the anonymity of the bureaucratic state, and the destructive consequences of nationalism, war, racism, and technological “progress.” Thus, Catholic Worker philosophy emphasizes the spiritual and personal nature of human beings, “subsidiarity” and the viability of decentralized social coordination, and extreme skepticism toward political action and the state. Worker communities arise autonomously, receiving inspiration and support rather than direction from the original New York branch. The lack of membership requisites or centralized authority of any kind (besides the exemplary spiritual authority of Day) has ensured that the movement stays true to its organic roots.

The activities of the Catholic Worker fall into three major categories: non-violent protest against social injustice, direct aid to the disadvantaged, and attempts to create alternative models of community. On the first front, the Worker has supported and organized strikes, protests, and boycotts, and Catholic Workers have refused to pay taxes, register for conscription, or take part in civil-defense drills. Active resistance has, however, always been complemented by the recognition that positive assistance to the poor is just as immediate an imperative. The hospitality houses which have arisen around the country and the world under the Worker’s name have offered free living accommodations, meals, clothing, and spiritual instruction, all the while functioning within the limits of voluntary financial “precarity,” meant to illustrate a deep solidarity with the plight of the poor and emboss the sustaining life-force of Christian love and charity. The Catholic Worker’s vision of just and moral community is evident in both the organization of these houses and the various agricultural experiments the Worker has tried throughout its history, both of which illustrate the movement’s commitment to building a new society within the shell of the old. This aspect of the Worker’s activities, far from evidencing a desire to withdraw from society and delimit the movement’s broader relevance, in fact reflects a strong belief in the power of an example, the force of which will be multiplied as surely as loaves and fishes in the gospels. Limited resources and skills, as well as the Worker's non-coercive principles, have tended to hamper the viability of the large-scale agricultural endeavors, though smaller agricultural projects have continued to supplement the enduring backbone of the houses of hospitality.

From the beginning of the movement until her death in 1980, Dorothy Day was the spiritual center of the Catholic Worker, and her large role in the production of the New York paper, as well as her indirect influence as a figure of matriarchal authority, gave her broad leeway in setting the movement's agenda. This was perhaps most consequential in determining the relation of the movement to the institutional Church and its teachings. As a lay movement, the Catholic Worker has considerable autonomy from the Church and has always made a distinction between the fallibility of the Church's teaching about the temporal order and the eternal validity of the theological truths under its care. Radicalism on social questions has not always carried over to theological questions. Despite the mildly anti-clerical leanings of many of the Catholic Worker's members, Day effectively put a moratorium on criticism of Church authorities, and strictly toed the Church line on matters such as abortion, birth control, and the role of women. Day's passing has opened up a space in the mainstream of the movement for discussion of these controversial topics, but the Worker lost an immeasurably important source of cohesion and moral clout in the figure of Day. Nonetheless, Catholic Workers continue to carry on the movement's core agenda in over 185 Worker communities around the world.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism; Anarchism, United States; Day, Dorothy (1897–1980); Kropotkin, Peter (1842–1921); Tolstoy, Leo N. (1828–1910)

References and Suggested Readings

- Kleiment, A. & Roberts, N. L. (Eds.) (2006) American Catholic Pacifism: The Influence of Dorothy Day and the Catholic Worker Movement. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.
- Meyer, D. (2006) The Politics of Protest: Social Movements in America. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Miller, W. D. (2000) A Harsh and Dreadful Love: Dorothy Day and the Catholic Worker Movement. Milwaukee: Marquette University Press.

Zwick, M. & Zwick, L. (2005) The Catholic Worker Movement: Intellectual and Spiritual Origins. Mahwah, NJ: Paulist Press.

Cedar Revolution, Lebanon

Kristian Patrick Alexander

Gathering in opposition to Syrian military control of Lebanon through a surrogate government that denied freedom and basic rights, peaceful demonstrations were led by a multi-confessional coalition of Lebanese in 2005. While many believed that Syria had successfully restored peace and political order after the 1980s civil war, a growing number opposed their military presence, even if a withdrawal could potentially renew communal and factional conflicts.

The demonstrations were triggered by the assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafiq Hariri on February 14, 2005, who was believed by some to have been killed by Syria after calling for it to pull its troops out of Lebanon. After Hariri's assassination the opposition called for a timetable for the complete withdrawal of Syrian armed forces and intelligence services. In addition, it demanded an international investigation into Hariri's death. The degree of US and other foreign influence and pressure on the Lebanese at this writing remains unclear.

Dubbed the "Cedar Revolution" by the US State Department, the majority of the protesters were young Lebanese from Beirut's middle and upper classes, predominantly Christian, Druze, and Sunnis. Opposition groups included members of the Socialist Party (mostly Druze), the Qornet Shahwan Gathering (Christian), the student movement of the outlawed Christian Lebanese Forces Party, the Christian Phalangist Party, and Hariri's own predominantly Sunni Future Movement. Also present were large numbers of Shi'ite Muslims who belonged neither to the Amal movement or to Hezbollah.

Though the US may have instigated the protests, the events were transformed beyond its control. The Cedar Revolution was heralded as a return of class politics. Many marchers openly opposed governmental reforms that sought to slash pensions, increase VAT from 10 to 12 percent, raise fuel prices by 30 percent, and impose short-term contracts on government workers

A mass rally called by Hezbollah brings out hundreds of thousands of Lebanese in opposition to foreign military presence. The primary goal of the Cedar Revolution was to end Syrian occupation and unify Lebanon as one country. On April 27, 2005, after months of demonstrations triggered by the assassination of former Prime Minister Rafiq Hariri on February 14, the Syrian military withdrew all 14,000 of its troops. (REUTERS/Sharif Karim) and teachers. The demonstrations were locally referred to as the “uprising of independence,” and Lebanese flags, red and white scarves, and slogans such as “Freedom, Sovereignty, Independence” came to symbolize the marches, gatherings, and events. Opposition groups organized daily vigils and marches, promoted by various elements of civil society using mobile phones, email, and public announcements. All efforts by the authorities, such as issuing bans, were relatively ineffective.

When the force of opposition led to the resignation of pro-Syrian Prime Minister Omar Karami, a counterdemonstration was mounted by the Shi’ite movement Hezbollah, together with several other smaller pro-Syrian groups. Their slogans advocated pro-Syrian sentiments against US interference, and the right of Hezbollah to sustain its military resistance against Israel. Although both groups supported a withdrawal of the Syrian military, the discourse differed over the implementation of the Taif agreements (1989) ending the civil war in Lebanon. The Taif agreements, supported by the pro-Syrian movement, basically stated that after various institutions had been rebuilt and the economy revitalized, a bilateral Syrian–Lebanese agreement would stipulate a gradual Syrian military disengagement from Lebanon, but this had yet to be achieved.

United Nations Security Council (UNSC) Resolution 1559, issued in September 2004 and sponsored by the United States and France, had called for free and fair elections in Lebanon without foreign interference and the ultimate disarmament of any remaining operating militias (Hezbollah). However, a day after UNSC Resolution 1559 had been issued, the Lebanese parliament endorsed a constitutional amendment allowing sitting pro-Syrian President Emile Lahoud to remain in power for three more years, suspending Lebanese presidential elections.

As a result of the Cedar Revolution, fierce international pressure forced the remaining Syrian troops out of Lebanon by April 2005. However, segments of the population were pro-Syrian, especially Shi’ites, who considered Syria to be their protector. While a poll conducted in February 2005 by Zogby International revealed widespread revulsion for Hariri’s murder, it also showed that most people were split on who was responsible. Non-Shi’ites were significantly more inclined to pin the blame on Syria, with some 50 percent of Druze and Maronite Christians blaming Syria or its allies, while 53 percent of Shi’ites blamed Israel, and 19 percent held the US responsible.

When elections finally did arrive on May 29–June 19, 2005, many supporters began questioning the veracity of politics as usual. While the elections ushered in new candidates, they also saw the return of the same politicians who had previously dominated the country’s political scene. In April 2005, Syrian troops exited Lebanon after 20 years. However, without Syrian military intermediaries and offsetting power, in July 2006 war broke out between Israel and the Hezbollah.

SEE ALSO: Hezbollah: Organization and Uprisings; Lebanese Insurrection of 1958; Lebanon, Civil War, 1975–1990; Lebanon, 19th-Century Revolts

References and Suggested Readings

- Blandford, N. (2006) Killing Mr. Lebanon: The Assassination of Rafik Hariri and its Impact on the Middle East. London: I. B. Tauris.
- Deeb, M. (2003) Syria’s Terrorist War on Lebanon and the Peace Process. New York: Palgrave.
- Knio, K. (2005) Lebanon: Cedar Revolution or Neo-Sectarian Partition? Mediterranean Politics 10, 2 (July): 225–31.
- Safa, O. (2006) Getting to Arab Democracy: Lebanon Springs Forward. Journal of Democracy 17 (1): 22–37.
- Weinberger, N. (1986) Syrian Intervention in Lebanon. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Central America, music and resistance

T. M. Scruggs

While relatively small geographically, Central America encompasses a variety of distinctive musical cultures that have suffered from poor cultural communication and cross-fertilization with one another across national borders. This isolation has often been even more pronounced between regions inside nations, especially the fundamental divide between indigenous/mestizo Pacific coast majorities and smaller Afro/indigenous Caribbean coast communities. With the advent of the massive social mobilizations throughout the 1970s and 1980s, Central America – and therefore its music – received unprecedented attention from many sources, probably the highest global recognition the region’s music has received besides the novelty introduction of the marimba by Guatemalan and Mexican bands in the 1910s and 1920s.

Socially committed music from El Salvador and Nicaragua received most of the world’s notice, but it should be noted that musicians in Guatemala, Belize, Honduras, Costa Rica, and Panama formed part of the search for solutions to the region’s purportedly intractable social ills. Many were not able to record, and those that did often circulated primarily through informal cassette distribution. Fitting an established historical pattern, it was an unfortunate reality that communication between the seven Central American nations was difficult and that artists frequently remained unaware of committed song in neighboring countries. It is even fair to say that most Central American musicians had as much or even more access to political music from outside the region than from their colleagues on the isthmus. This fact does not detract from the significance of the musical movements within each of the nation-states, but complicates any claims of a pan-Central American political music.

As in the rest of Latin America, there is no one single nomenclature for socially committed music: Música de protesta (Protest Music), Música testimonial (Testimonial Music), and especially Nueva canción (New Song) are the most common. After the triumfo (triumph) of the Sandinista Popular Revolution in 1979, an innovative term to describe Central American political music was coined from conflating volcán (volcano) and canto (song) to form volcanto. Inspired by the line of impressive volcanoes that distinguishes the topography of western Central America, volcanto was offered as a new label to encompass all Central American socially committed music, but in actual practice the term has remained essentially limited to post-1979 Nicaraguan political music.

Mention should be made that there is no reason not to think that music was used to advocate for better conditions under the various Mayan kingdoms, the large Chorotegan-Mangué and Nahuatl-speaking realms in Nicaragua/Costa Rica and other smaller indigenous groups, but any record has been completely obliterated over time. Surviving written records after European and African contact ushered in the colonial period are almost entirely devoid of any mention of music or any other expressive cultural forms of the popular classes, including the decades following separation from Spanish rule in the 1820s. Thus, the first remaining documentation of protest music stems from post-independence struggles against foreign intrusions. An early (and prophetic) example is the still-famous “La Mama Ramona,” sung in the 1850s in the city of Granada, Nicaragua, lauding its defense against the North American filibusterer (mercenary) William Walker (for lyrics, see Mejía Sánchez 1976: 116–17).

A more direct musical precursor to the flurry of activity of the 1970s is the musical proselytization of Nicaraguan Augusto César Sandino’s nationalist and reform movement in the early 1930s. Just as Sandino drew political inspiration from the Mexican Revolution, Sandino followers turned to the corrido, the “musical newspaper” of the Mexican Revolution, a song form based on 4-line coplas (verses) with simple melody lines and rudimentary guitar accompaniment. The corrido, also known by its earlier Iberian form romance, remains well known throughout Spanish-speaking Central America and has frequently been employed by contemporary New Song musicians. Its format is well suited to political communication: the repetitive musical format emphasizes the verses that recount exploits of important figures and major events and conclude with a moral message.

Nicaragua

Nicaraguan political music is the best known outside of Central America. A continuity to the present can be traced back to the first protest song under the Somoza dictatorships (1936–79), “Campesino” by Jorge Isaác Carvalho, accompanied by also-important Otto de la Rocha, released in the late 1960s. However, the prolific singer-songwriter Carlos Mejía Godoy established socially committed music in the early 1970s with his musical and lyrical syntheses of rural campesino (peasant/small farmer) and urban popular culture. It would be hard to underestimate the importance of the role Carlos Mejía Godoy and other musicians played in the social movement that overthrew the Somoza regime (Scruggs 2002a.)

Carlos Mejía Godoy’s prolific output starting in the mid-1970s was supported by his group Los de Palacagüina, a name invented by the Nicaraguan people themselves in honor of his immensely influential song “El Cristo de Palacagüina” (The Christ of Palacagüina). This song typifies the strength of the best of socially conscious Central American music’s appeal to the majority exploited population. It takes a familiar moral tale, localizes it, and calls for action to transform unjust conditions: Christ is born in the northern Nicaraguan village of Palacagüina, from a carpenter of the rural working class and “una tal Maria” (“some Mary”), and he resolves at the song’s end to become a fighter, specifically a guerilla fighter. The verses recount the circumstances of misery in a minor key in low register; then happily announce the birth of this “Christ” in a higher register in a major key. Though perhaps never done more effectively than in this continent-wide “hit,” the systematic alternation between major and minor chords is a hallmark of Iberian, and therefore much Latin American, folk-rooted music, a formal feature used repeatedly by New Song composers to contrast a negative past/present with an optimistic future. At the height of the civilian insurrection against the dictatorship in 1978, Carlos Mejía Godoy put aside his noted subtle form of criticism when he composed Guitarra armada (Armed Guitar), an album unique in world political music for it essentially musicalized instructions on the assembly and use of weapons for untrained street fighters.

Music groups proliferated during the insurrectionary period of the late 1970s and several were able later to record on the new state label ENIGRAC, Empresa Nicaragüense de Grabaciones Culturales (Nicaraguan Company for Cultural Recordings) (Pring Mill 1987; Avendaño, Cuadra, & Cedeño 1989). Volcanto groups drew from a wide palette of local and continental musical styles. Among the most important groups (all of which disbanded by the late 1980s) were: Pancasán, which used an eclectic array of Latin American and Caribbean styles and made their first LP clandestinely at night between patrols of Somoza soldiers; Grupo Pueblo, whose compositions centered around strong vocal arrangements; the jazz-influenced Igñi Tawanka; and especially Mancotal, which collaborated with Carlos’s younger brother Luis Enrique Mejía Godoy and achieved the highest profile of the volcanto groups after his brother (Scruggs 2002b). Besides the Mejía Godoy brothers, the only early volcanto group sporadically to continue into the twenty-first century is Duo Guardabarranco (named after the national bird), the duet of Katia and Salvador Cardenal, which has recorded and traveled extensively outside Nicaragua. Luis Pastor is a folk-rooted singer-songwriter who has become increasingly politically involved in recent years.

The return of neoliberalism in force from 1990 onwards brought on a deliberate governmental and corporate policy of “acoustic white-out” (Scruggs 2004: 265), a wholesale import of English- and Spanish-language popular music dovetailed with an evisceration of national music production. Nevertheless, the 1980s in Nicaragua stimulated an awakening of the majority, mestizo Spanish-speaking population to the reality of the Caribbean coast, and the English-Creole Afro-Nicaraguan popular music related to Trinidadian soca, known as Palo de Mayo (Maypole), displaced imported styles as the nation’s dance music of choice. Despite misunderstandings such as the majority mestizo condescension evident in the title of Luis Enrique Mejía Godoy’s “Un Gigante Que Despierta, La Costa” (A Giant That Awakes, The Coast), music played a paramount role in creating a new, inclusive national consciousness that moved the nation towards a multi-ethnic identity (Scruggs 1999.)

El Salvador

The 1932 “matanza” (“massacre,” estimated at over 30,000 deaths) so severely repressed the left and indigenous peoples generally that it marks an unfortunate national cultural watershed. For instance, the same diminutive marimba de arco found throughout the isthmus earlier in the twentieth century in indigenous enclaves moved on to develop its current near-national instrument status in Nicaragua, but Salvadoran musicians burned their marimbas in 1932 as part of a widespread erasure of any indigenous cultural markers. Thus, as the social movements recuperated through the 1960s, politically committed culture workers confronted an environment of heavy North American and Mexican influence. The use of native musical elements took on a special significance, though one often diminished by the passage of time since their near-elimination in the early 1930s.

Xolotl was the first important New Song, formed in 1969 and still active. Typical of many Latin American New Song groups, they performed music stylistically inspired by Chilean New Song, but also emphasized local forms and instruments, such as the marimba de arco. Other groups active in the 1970s include Guinama and Hombres de Maíz (Men of Corn), the latter disbanded under the government repression that would eventually kill several of its members. Socially committed music was transmitted through underground cassette distribution and the important Radio Venceremos that broadcast from the liberated eastern part of the country (López Vigil 1994). This network popularized a peasant-based group inside the country, Los Torogoces de Morazán (The Songbirds of Morazán), named for their home province in the FMLN-controlled east. Their Mexican-influenced acoustic string instrumentation and nasal peasant singing style resonated with the popular classes and they became by far the most popular political group based within El Salvador (González 1994); they helped elevate “El Sombrero Azul” (“The Blue Hat,” written for the Salvadoran struggle by Venezuelan Ali Primera) to be the left’s unofficial hymn.

Many groups that provided new music for the intense revolutionary struggle of the 1980s were only able to do so from outside the country. These are the bands best known to non-Salvadorans and feature a broader musical palette and urban sensitivity. Yolocamba Ita (Lenca: The Rebellion of Sowing), whose changing membership included Mexican nationals, and Catumay Camones produced several albums on US and European labels and toured incessantly through the 1980s (Kirk 1985). Yolocamba Ita pointedly purchased a Nicaraguan marimba de arco while in exile there in 1980 and with other folk instruments attempted to contribute to a new status for traditional musical forms within a synthesis of modern styles. Banda Tepanhuani, in exile in Managua, Nicaragua, especially emphasized Hispano Caribbean-based rhythms.

The lyrics of these groups closely followed the changing strategic goals of the FMLN through the 1980s (Almeida & Urbizagástegui 1999), and their success in transmitting these goals through internal Salvadoran distribution was matched by their success in representing the popular struggle through international solidarity conduits. Since the peace accords of the early 1990s, Radio Venceremos transferred to the capital city and modified its format to attract a more urbanbased audience. Recent groups whose repertoire includes social critique include Exceso de Equipaje (Overweight Baggage) and the duo Juan Carlos Berríos and Lenín Álvarez.

Guatemala

There is much less documentation of the many musical groups that flowered in Guatemala in the late 1970s through the early 1990s. First, much of the music was created in Mayan languages in home recordings and their cassette distribution often did not move beyond the particular Mayan language group. Second, the mountainous Guatemalan highlands limited the effectiveness of low-power clandestine radio. Third, and perhaps most important, the murderous dictatorship’s wholesale destruction of entire village populations kept any progressive political opposition deep within the countryside. The non-Mayan musicians in the salient group of Kin Lalot (Kiché: We Sing) produced several albums while in exile in Nicaragua that supported the armed struggle inside their country. Their music both received significant underground distribution in Guatemala and contributed to the international awareness of the genocidal reality in their country, which always remained lesser known than the situations in El Salvador and Nicaragua.

With the peace accords of the early 1990s other New Song groups have appeared, particularly in the university environment. The most noteworthy contemporary critical commentary comes from the unexpected source of Ricardo Arjona, whose early career revolved around apolitical romantic ballads. He continues that same trajectory interspersed with an eclectic array of (sometimes vaguely) socially informed musical statements. His best-known songs with political content achieved continent-wide popularity with their acerbic anti-imperialist lyrics, the most popular being “Si el norte fuera el sur” (“If the North Were the South,” 1996) and the most recent a collaboration with the Tejano/Norteño band Intocable (Untouchable), in a call for US immigrant rights, “Mojado” (“Wetback,” 2005).

Honduras, Costa Rica, Panama

All three of these countries generated several New Song groups in a process that accelerated through the 1970s and 1980s, though the majority never made recordings. In Honduras no single group distinguished itself until Guillermo Anderson’s debut recordings in the 1990s. His most socially engaged songs to date relate to the challenge of environmental destruction. Of mestizo background, his danceable compositions are based on punta rhythms from the Garifuna/Garinagu peoples from his native Caribbean coast, a further consolidation of this Afro-Honduran population’s acceptance into the majority inland mestizo population. Several Garifuna/Garinagu musicians include references to the need for respect of their culture and social rights, the best known outside Honduras being Andy Palacios, whose promise as social commentator and cultural representative was cut short by his tragic death in 2008 at the height of his career (Greene 2002).

Creole-speaking Afro-Costa Ricans on the Caribbean coast have often sung of the stark racism directed against them by the majority inland population of heavy European background, though virtually no compositions have been recorded by the mestizo-controlled studios. Beginning in the 1980s, Manuel Monestel, himself mestizo, helped to introduce and legitimize Afro-Creole calypso to the broader national population with his group Centroamérica that has not shied away from including politically tinged lyrics. The foremost composer and performer of patently socially conscious music is Argentinean exile Adrián Goizueta, who formed El Grupo Experimental (The Experimental Group) in 1979. With 14 albums and still active, the group is one of the longest-surviving political bands on the isthmus despite many personnel changes. Goizueta’s eclectic style integrates folk and rock in a type of essentially pop-New Song, using both acoustic and electric instruments.

In Panama Rómulo Castro and his Grupo Tuira has been the leading exponent of politically conscious music. Originally in a New Song band, Grupo Liberación, Castro’s excellent work from the 1990s on sets a new artistic standard that combines a sophisticated musical exploration of diverse styles with poetic lyrics that cast a critical eye on the nation’s social reality. Rubén Blades moved from his humble origins in Panama City to New York in the 1970s and composed some of the best salsa compositions with overt social consciousness. In the 1990s he redirected his creative activity towards Panama and reestablished his career for a time with the Grammy-winning album La rosa de los vientos (1996), the title track and major hit being a cover of Rómulo Castro’s original. This album and Blades’ Tiempos (1999) feature Panamanian styles and musicians, with the political content more muted than the heyday of his hard-hitting political salsa.

Religious Music

A fundamental aspect of left politics in the region is the impact of liberation theology within the overwhelmingly Catholic population. When Vatican II opened the mass to the linguistic and musical vernacular, progressive clergy in Central America were among the first and most fervent in creating new musical material that carried strong messages denouncing social injustice. The first mass in Latin America with significant liberation theology content was created in Nicaragua in 1968, La Misa popular nicaragüense (The Nicaraguan Popular/People’s Mass). The best known within Latin America remains La Misa campesina nicaragüense (The Nicaraguan Peasant Mass), composed almost in its entirety by Carlos Mejía Godoy in 1975. Though initially banned by the Somoza government, La Misa campesina nicaragüense went on to have a tremendous impact throughout the continent (Scruggs 2005). In Central America it directly inspired La Misa salvadoreña and La misa panameña, as well as much other socially conscious Christian music. The Misa Campesina (as it is known in English) remains Central America’s most enduring socially engaged musical composition, and has been celebrated worldwide and translated into several languages.

Pan-Central American Initiatives

The impulse to move from national to regional integration reached a new level with the formation in 2000 of the Central American All-Stars. This innovative pan-national grouping included Guillermo Anderson and Rómulo Castro and showed promise of presenting a progressive political agenda of the region incorporating a “unity in diversity” artistic approach. The project, however, soon fell under the leadership of Costa Rican keyboardist Manuel Obregón, who transformed it into Manuel Obregón and the Orquesta Papaya. In its various incantations, Papaya became a mostly apolitical “planet soup” amalgam of Central American musical forms highly influenced by Obregón’s own US “suburban blues” stylistic predilection; they have released three CDs.

SEE ALSO: Caribbean Protest Music; Music and Protest, Latin America; Music, Songs, and Protest, France; Primera, Alí (1942–1985)

References and Suggested Readings

- Almeida, Paul & Urbizagástegui, Rubén (1999) Popular Music in El Salvador’s National Liberation Movement. Latin American Perspectives 26 (2): 13–42.
- Avendaño, X., Cuadra, J., & Cedeño, F. (1989) Cantos de la lucha sandinista. Mangaua: ENIGRAC – Editorial Vanguardia.
- Carrasco, E. (1982) La nueva canción en Nicaragua, Costa Rica y Puerto Rico. La Nueva Canción en América Latina, CENECA (Santiago, Chile): 58–61.
- González, I. (1994) Las guitarras del fuego de ayer. San Salvador: Ediciones Arcoiris.
- Greene, O. (2002) Ethnicity, Modernity and Retention in the Garifuna Punta. Black Music Research Journal 22 (2): 189–216.
- Guerrón Montero, Carla (2006) “Can’t Beat me Own Drum in me Own Native Land”: Calypso Music and Tourism in the Panamanian Atlantic Coast. Anthropological Quarterly 79 (4): 633–63.
- Judson, F. (2002) Central American Revolutionary Music Lyrics. In Regula Burckhardt Qureshi (Ed.), Music and Marx: Ideas, Practice, Politics. New York: Garland.
- Kirk, J. (1985) Revolutionary Music, Salvadoran Style: “Yolacamba Ita.” In Hernán Vidal (Ed.), Literature and Contemporary Revolutionary Culture, I. Minneapolis: Society for the Study of Contemporary Hispanic and Lusophone Revolutionary Literature, 338–352.
- López Vigil, J. (1994) Rebel Radio: The Story of El Salvador’s Radio Venceremos. Willimantic, CT: Curbstone Press.
- Mejía Sánchez, E. (1976) Romances y corridos nicaraguenses. Managua: Banco de América.
- Pring Mill, R. (1987) The Roles of Revolutionary Song: A Nicaraguan Assessment. Popular Music 6 (2): 179–90.
- Scruggs, T. M. (1999) “Let’s Enjoy As Nicaraguans”: The Use of Music in the Construction of a Nicaraguan National Consciousness. Ethnomusicology 43 (2): 297–321.
- Scruggs, T. M. (2002a) Socially Conscious Music Forming the Social Conscience: Nicaraguan música testimonial and the Creation of a Revolutionary Moment. In Walter A. Clark (Ed.), From Tejano to the Tango: Popular Musics of Latin America. New York: Routledge, pp. 41–69.
- Scruggs, T. M. (2002b) Musical Style and Revolutionary Context in Sandinista Nicaragua. In Jan Fairley & David Horn (Eds.), I Sing the Difference: Identity and Commitment in Latin American Song. Liverpool: Institute for Popular Music/University of Liverpool Press, pp. 117–34.
- Scruggs, T. M. (2004) Music, Memory, and the Politics of Erasure in Nicaragua. In L. Knauer & D. Walkowitz (Eds.), Memory and the Impact of Political Transformation in Public Space. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, pp. 255–75.
- Scruggs, T. M. (2005) (Re)Indigenization? Post-Vatican II Catholic Ritual and “Folk Masses” in Nicaragua. World of Music 47 (1): 91–124.
- Scruggs, T. M. (2006) Música y el legado de la violencia a finales del siglo XX en Centro América [Music and Legacy of Violence in late Twentieth Century Central America]. Trans. Revista Transcultural de Música. Transcultural Music Review 10 (December). www.sibetrans.com/trans/trans10/indice10.htm.

Central Asian protest movements

Dorothea J. Coiffe

A recurring theme through Central Asian history is protest and rebellion against foreign occupying powers. Contacts with ancient cultures like Greece, Persia, and regions in the East, Middle East, Europe, and Central Asia both antagonized and enriched Central Asia. Each of these invaders, in turn, introduced customs and language that Central Asians assimilated in complex ways.

In the mid- to late nineteenth century, tsarist Russia asserted its dominance over Central Asia. During the 1700s and mid-1800s, the Russians had already incorporated much of Central Asia, including the Khivan Khanate and the Bukharan Emirate. The British in South Asia viewed Russia's capture of the Bukharan Emirate as a potential threat to its interests in the region. In what is known as "The Great Game," the English and the Russians struggled for access, control, and occupation of Central Asia. The Russo-Anglo battles for control over this area killed thousands of people.

One imperial decree that reverberated in Central Asia up to the early twentieth century was the replacement of subsistence farming with cash crops, a practice that was widespread throughout the world during the era. The tsars resettled (pereselenie) ethnic Russian peasants into these new territories, creating local resentment and Central Asian ethnic groupings. Russian expansionism, national chauvinism, and supremacy remained a point of contention through the twentieth century, even after the fall of the Soviet Union.

In the late nineteenth century, Central Asia lacked centralized authority, maintaining clan- and familial-based allegiances. Central Asians identified through complex detailed nomadic genealogies dating back several centuries. After numerous invasions, nomadic mobility guaranteed a degree of autonomy and was a source of power, unlike neighboring settled peasant peoples who were frequently viewed as weak and easily victimized. Despite a more sedentary lifestyle in the nineteenth century, patrilineal genealogies defined tribal clans and remained important in political, economic and social life.

With the rise of the Soviet Union, the countries of the region gained nominal independence, but as pressure mounted from internal and external opponents in the 1930s and 1940s, autonomy was curtailed in the broader interest of preserving the USSR. Following the Bolshevik revolution local modernizing forces gained ascendancy over traditional Islamic authorities, who engaged in insurrections to maintain and extend control over the new regional powers, which in turn were suppressed. Following the fall of the Soviet Union in the early 1990s, traditional and modernizing forces continued to struggle over the region's future.

One reason for the Soviet Union's delineation of the boundaries of Central Asian republics in the 1920s was to recognize the nationalist ethos of people in the region, long denied to them by their predecessors. At times, the new structure of authority was in conflict with traditional decentralized ways. The Soviet leaders in the region, many from Central Asia, sought to modernize their nations rapidly under the leadership of local authorities, with the goal of a "great synthesis" through socialist union of people in a multinational Soviet Union.

The socialist republics in the region sought to modernize through diminishing religious influence, which created discord among the most orthodox Muslims and the basis for future insurgencies. Another major source of antagonism was the fact that urbanized populations and ethnicities modernized more rapidly than those in the rural regions. The Soviet Union's effort to advance the standard of living for all peoples in the region had the unintended consequence of expanding the power of the urbanized and educated populations, who typically rose to leadership positions in a polity already entangled with rankings among local clans. The effort to collectivize the land and reduce land inequality was often challenged by larger landowners and those associated with orthodox religious currents.

Moscow's Central Asian Bureau tried to have a balance of tribal representation on the titular national bureaus, the committees that actually drew the borders for the socialist republics in 1924. Based on boundaries drawn in an Anglo-Russian treaty of 1895 and faulty 1897 census data, the committees drew the borders of the Central Asian states.

Soviet theory was that all groups of humans were equal and all would eventually evolve as one given the correct guidance and conditions. The USSR supported dividing the region to allow distinct populations to assimilate and modernize quickly so that they might evolve into socialism. The Soviet thinking was that all their nations' interests would never take precedence over the "all-union" interests. By October 1924 the various Central Asian Soviet socialist republics were established, under central Soviet leadership.

Throughout the 1920s and early 1930s, once these republics were fully established, the Soviets actively promoted "national cultures" with policies that were known as korenizatsiia or indigenization. The devolution of power was a means to initially compensate for the tsarist mistreatment and neglect of native languages and cultures of ethnically non-Russian peoples, stimulating a sense of nationality among non-Russian minorities.

In the Soviet era, Central Asia continued to violently resist indigenization of leadership and collectivization, especially among traditional sectors of society composed of the less educated semi-nomadic Central Asians who spoke different languages and a multitude of dialects. Before the states' delimitations in 1924 the Soviets ordered new indigenous cultural commissions to standardize each republic's language and publish textbooks in the language/dialect officially selected in the early 1920s. The Soviet administration used various state languages to rapidly modernize Central Asia.

In the 1930s, conflicts over the future of Central Asia, between forces of modernization and tradition, contributed to military conflicts. In an effort to create a Soviet ethos, or Homo Sovieticus, the central state's attempt to forge an identity was a cause of political turmoil, especially among conservative traditional religious forces, who violently resisted efforts to homogenize the culture.

Initially imperialist Russia sought to Christianize those in Central Asia. In the late nineteenth and early twentieth century, cultural change began emerging internally and externally. The conquest of Central Asia brought European modernization which spurred a reformist movement by the Muslim elites and intellectuals, called Jadid (Arabic for "new"), which sought to protect the local Islamic culture of these countries while adapting to modern conditions. Jadidists called themselves Young Bukharans, akin to the Young Turks. Bukhara and Samarkand were religious and cultural centers in Central Asia and a source of great pride amongst Muslims.

The Jadid reformists sought to modernize the society through combining the best of Islam and the European enlightenment. Prior to the upheavals of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, the social and political structures of the native population had been practically unchanged since the twelfth century, when the area was an important Islamic center. Towns and villages were primarily populated by Muslims, and cities typically by Russian Christians. Jadids wanted Islamic values to intersect with European knowledge and skills, and sought to modernize politics, social institutions, and especially education.

The Jadids saw their Muslim opponents stubbornly clinging to traditional ways that had not changed in centuries. Jadids believed that literacy was essential to modernization, and established local and independent newspapers.

Printed languages came to Central Asia with the Russian military. The Jadids established innovative teaching methods and curricula and taught in Arabic and in local languages. They used pan-Islamic and pan-Turkic ideas to further local social struggles in Central Asia. Their main goal was to modernize Islam. By 1914 there were as many as 30 new-method Jadidist schools in Central Asia. These schools educated and influenced many early twentieth-century Central Asian political and civic leaders.

On November 2, 1917, Vladimir Ilyich Ulyanov Lenin (1870–1924) signed the Declaration of Rights of the Peoples of Russia, which guaranteed the equality and sovereignty of all peoples of Russia no matter what nationality or religion. Some historians characterized the Declaration as a cynical ploy for the support of Russia's non-Russian people, because when it was put to the test thousands lost their lives. For example, the Kokand Autonomous Provisional Government of Turkestan, formed on December 13, 1917, followed Shari'a, or Islamic, law. The traditional and modernizing Islamic religious currents came into conflict, and both sides engaged in attacks on the other.

The Soviet effort to end formal religious practice, though embraced by some, was another source of resentment and unrest, and was a factor in the formation of the Muslim Basmachi movement. Basmachi was a derogatory name given to this resistance by the Russians, meaning plunderer, brigand, or bandit in Turkic. The Turkestanian fighters called themselves Beklar Hareketi (the bek or freeman's movement). Though they had no single centralized leader or political agenda, this movement lasted through the 1930s. One reason for this long-lived and popular Turkestanian resistance may be attributed to Muslim resistance to what was seen as the atheistic Soviet system, viewed by many as an attack on their identity and way of life.

Gaigysyz Atabayev (1888–1937), the first prime minister of the Turkmen Soviet Socialist Republic, told a subcommittee of the Politburo that the Basmachi was "the strongest reproach to all of our work in Turkestan." It was the decentralized character of the Basmachi that made the many anti-Soviet attacks successful. At their height, the Basmachi had between 20,000 and 30,000 activists.

The Soviets were increasingly fearful of "nationalist deviations" in the Central Asian republics, especially as the USSR was under threat from global powers. From the mid-1920s, the Bolsheviks sought to create greater gender equality for women in civil society. At times, the Soviet and Jadid efforts to advance women's equality were fiercely opposed by traditional elites. When the Bolsheviks encouraged women to stop wearing the hijab or veil in public, local elites saw this as a sign of religious interference, and the effort was defeated.

When the Soviets came to power, three broad peasant groups were classified: the bednyaks (poor peasants), seredniaks (peasants who were not impoverished), and kulaks (landowning farmers). Vladimir Lenin oversaw the 1922 Land Code, the nationalization of all lands for purposes of regulating ownership by local communities. The new Soviet republics adopted similar land codes throughout the 1920s. However, once collective farming decrees were initiated under Stalin, land codes no longer carried weight. Initially, peasants were allowed to work their own land, use what they needed, and sell surplus to the state.

Under collectivization most farmers were forced onto either state sovkhoz farms, created by seizing large estates, or kolkhoz farms, created through combining smaller farms. Peasants on kolkhoz farms could own one acre and several animals privately while retaining a share of the collective farm's product and profit. Both sovkhoz and kolkhoz farms were issued quotas and produce was exchanged using state-controlled prices.

In 1928 Stalin introduced the Socialist Offensive, increasing Moscow's central powers, and promoting industrialization and collectivization, while eliminating the capitalist market. Impatient to modernize the Soviet Union, the Bolsheviks began a series of five-year plans under Stalin, seeking to advance manufacturing and collectivization of farming.

In the late-1980s the Soviet republics began moving toward independence. Some declared sovereignty, citing Article 72 of the USSR Constitution, which freed constituent republics to secede. On March 17, 1991, only 9 out of 15 Soviet republics voted "yes" in a referendum to stay the course and preserve the Soviet Union, a course that was abandoned under the Russian nationalist, Boris Yeltsin.

Central Asia's relations with the non-socialist Russia in the decades following the collapse of the Soviet Union have been volatile, linked to past ethnic and clan divisions. The first 15 years since independence in Central Asia have been marked by autocratic rule, ethnic conflict, and socioeconomic instability, and protests and insurrections that have been violently suppressed by the state. Official and public sentiment toward Russia and the former Soviet Union in the region during the early twenty-first century is complex, encompassing perspectives ranging from ex-colonizer to powerful friend.

SEE ALSO: Bolsheviks; Russia, Revolution of 1905–1907; Russia, Revolution of October/November 1917; Stalin, Joseph (1879–1953) and "Revolution from Above"; Tajikistan, Protests and Revolts; Turkmenistan, Protest and Revolt

References and Suggested Readings

- Allworth, E. (2002) Central Asia: One Hundred Thirty Years of Russian Dominance. A Historical Overview. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Crews, R. (2006) For Prophet and Tsar: Islam and Empire in Russia and Central Asia. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Hopkirk, P. (1992) The Great Game: The Struggle for Empire in Central Asia. New York: Kodansha America.
- Khalid, A. (2007) Islam After Communism: Religion and Politics in Central Asia. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Luong, P. (2003) The Transformation of Central Asia: States and Societies from Soviet Rule to Independence. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.

Césaire, Aimé (1913–2008)

Magda Romanska

Aimé Césaire, a writer, activist, and playwright, was born on June 25, 1913 in Martinique. In 1932 he moved to Paris, where he attended the Lycée Louis-le-Grand. In 1934 he published the essay "L'Étudiant noir" (The Black Student), in which the word négritude was used for the first time. In 1935 Césaire was accepted into the Ecole Normale Supérieure and he became actively involved in the Négritude movement, which aimed to liberate African and Caribbean countries from colonial rule. In 1939, on the eve of World War II, Césaire returned to Martinique, where he began teaching at the Lycée Victor Schoelcher. At that time he also traveled and lectured in Haiti. In 1945 he became a mayor of Fort-de-France and deputy of the Communist Party to the National Assembly. The new position allowed him to request that Martinique and Guadeloupe become departments of France; the request, although controversial, was granted in 1946. In 1948 Césaire published his landmark Anthologie de la nouvelle poésie nègre et malgache, introduced by Sartre's essay "Black Orpheus."

Like many intellectuals of his time, Césaire was initially drawn to communism as a solution to colonialism, but he eventually became disillusioned with it in 1956 after the Russian invasion of Hungary. In 1956 he also participated in the First International Congress of Black Writers in Paris. Césaire's most important political writings include the 1950 essay "Discours sur le colonialisme" (Discourse on Colonialism), "Lettre à Maurice Thorez" (1956) (Letter to Maurice Thorez), in which he openly rejected communist ideology, followed shortly thereafter by "Culture et colonisation" (Culture and Colonization), "L'Homme de culture et ses responsabilités" (1959) (The Man of Culture and His Responsibilities), and "Crisis dans les départements d'outremer" (1961) (Crisis in the Overseas Departments), the historical study Toussaunt Louverture (1961), the essay "La Grandeur de Lumumba était de nier la réalité" (1966) (The Greatness of Lumumba Was to Deny Reality), and many other essays published in Le Monde and Présence africaine. Césaire's two most important plays are La Tragédie du roi Christophe (The Tragedy of King Christopher) and Une Tempête (A Tempest), a reworking of Shakespeare's classic, told from Caliban's point of view. In 2006 Césaire refused to meet with Nicolas Sarkozy, then the leader of the Union for a Popular Movement (UMP) and an anticipated presidential candidate, because of the 2005 law sponsored by the UMP that required schools "to recognize the positive role of the French presence abroad" (this was the official title of the law). The law, generally viewed as a nod to colonialism, was eventually repealed by President Jacques Chirac.

SEE ALSO: Hungary, Revolution of 1956; Négritude Movement; Senghor, Leopold (1906–2001)

References and Suggested Readings

- Césaire, A. (1969) A Season in the Congo. Trans. R. Manheim. New York: Grove Press.
 Césaire, A. (1970) The Tragedy of King Christophe. Trans. R. Manheim. New York: Grove Press.

- Césaire, A. (1972) Discourse on Colonialism. Trans. J. Pinkham. New York: Monthly Review Press.
 Césaire, A. (1978) Tropiques. Paris: Jean-Michel Place.
 Césaire, A. (1990) Theater and Politics: An International Anthology. New York: Ubu Repertory Theater Publications.
 Davis, G. (1997) Aimé Césaire. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
 Frutkin, S. (1973) Aimé Césaire: Black Between Worlds. Coral Gables, FL: Center for Advanced International Studies.
 Pallister, J. L. (1991) Aimé Césaire. New York: Bowling Green State University Press.

Chakravartty, Renu (1917–1994)

Soma Marik

Renu Roy, daughter of Sadhanchandra and Brahmakumari Roy, was born on October 21, 1917, in Calcutta. Born to a well-off Brahmo (strict monotheistic Hindu sect) family, she studied in Cambridge, where she did her tripos.

Renu was acquainted with Nehru, Sarojini Naidu, and others from the early years through her uncle, the well-known Congress politician Dr. Bidhan Chandra Roy. Due to her mother's influence, she was inclined to work actively for women's causes. However, it was her stay in Cambridge in the 1930s that turned her to communism. Returning to India, she was among the first middle-class women to work in the communist milieu. She joined the Communist Party of India (CPI) in 1938 and remained a member until her death. In 1942, she married a fellow communist, Nikhil Chakravartty.

In 1942, the CPI came out from its underground conditions, after supporting the British in World War II. A small number of women set up a women's fraction in Bengal, which soon changed to a broader organization, the Mahila Atma Raksha Samity (Women's Self-Defense Association, MARS). It grew in leaps and bounds due to its active role in famine relief work during the Bengal famine of 1943. By 1944, the Second Conference of MARS recorded 43,000 members. Renu Chakravartty was, along with Manikuntala Sen, one of the two key communist women organizers of MARS. In 1943, at the height of the famine, MARS organized an unprecedented demonstration of over 5,000 women in front of the State Legislative Assembly. She was also involved in organizing civil defense as well as relief kitchens.

MARS, and Chakravartty personally, played a leading role in the campaign for the Hindu Code Bill from the middle of the 1940s – an attempt to codify and reform Hindu laws relating to marriage, inheritance, and other issues collectively called “personal laws” in favor of women.

After the war, MARS faced difficulties owing to sharp conflicts and even violence between nationalists, who had taken part in the Quit India movement, and communists, who had opposed it. But MARS continued its work. When communal violence broke out in Calcutta in 1946, Renu Chakravartty was active in mobilizing women to support Gandhi, who was on a fast in an effort to call for communal harmony.

Apart from working in MARS, communist women also worked in the All-India Women’s Conference (AIWC). From the Bombay session of 1944, communist women tried to broaden the AIWC, whose membership climbed from 8,000 in 1944 to 35,000 in 1946. Chakravartty was one of the communist women involved in this work.

After independence, the CPI adopted a line calling for an immediate revolutionary struggle to overthrow the new government (1948–51). In West Bengal, the CPI as well as many mass organizations were banned, including MARS. Chakravartty went underground. The CPI line changed in 1951–2 and the party emerged into the open. In 1952 Chakravartty became a CPI candidate in the first parliamentary elections in independent India. She was elected for the rural Basirhat constituency in 1952 and 1957, and for the Barrackpur industrial seat in 1962. In parliament, she participated strongly in debates over the Hindu Code Bill. In the 1950s Chakravartty was among the founders of the National Federation of Indian Women. She was also connected to the Women’s International Democratic Federation.

In 1958, Renu Chakravartty was elected to the National Council of the CPI. In the same period, she played a leading role in the historic working-class strike in Jamshedpur. In 1962, when war broke out between India and China, she was among those in the CPI who denounced China as an aggressor. Combined with previous differences, this led to a party split in 1964 and Chakravartty remained with the much shrunken CPI. In 1967, and again in 1969, anti-Congress parties combined to form a United Front government in West Bengal. In the 1969 state government, she served as minister for cooperatives and social welfare.

For many years Renu Chakravartty served as a member of the Central Control Commission of the party. In 1980 she wrote an important book, Communists in the Indian Women’s Movement. She died on April 16, 1994.

SEE ALSO: Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand (1869–1948); India, Post-World War II Upsurge; Indian National Liberation; Quit India Movement; Women’s Movement, India

References and Suggested Readings

- Chakravartty, R. (1980) Communists in the Indian Women’s Movement. New Delhi: Peoples’ Publishing House.
- Marik, S. (2004) Interrogating Official and Mainstream Discourses: Communist Women Remember the Forties. Jadavpur University Journal of History 21: 77–98.
- Sen, M. (2001) In Search of Freedom: An Unfinished Journey. Kolkata: Stree.

Charismatic leadership and revolution

Paul Rubinson

Conventional wisdom dictates that a social movement’s success depends on a charismatic leader. Such an individual can galvanize the masses through passionate oratory and mobilize people into action for their cause. Men and women as diverse as Mohandas Gandhi, Adolf Hitler, Jesus Christ, and Mother Jones have been cited as leaders who used their charisma to bring people to their cause through sheer force of personality, rhetoric, and will. From this perspective, a charismatic leader becomes the physical embodiment of a movement’s cause, leading by eloquence, passion, and example. But charismatic leaders appear relatively rarely, and movements have often succeeded without one. While a charismatic leader can indeed awaken the forces of social change, their relationship to their movement is far more complicated than the traditional leader–follower dynamic. Furthermore, a charismatic leader can be a curse if a movement relies too heavily on him or her. Finally, the concept of a charismatic leader was shaped, to an extent, by the specific context in which it was created, which has led social movement scholars to move beyond an exclusive focus on charisma.

Weber and the Origins of Charisma

In its original meaning, charisma referred to religious or spiritual qualities, but today it can refer broadly to any sort of engaging personal demeanor. Although contemporary uses of the term have gone far beyond his intent, the initial transformation of this term can be traced to one individual: the influential sociologist Max Weber (1864–1920). In the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries Weber formulated the idea that charisma can be as much a secular characteristic as a religious one. In many writings, including his influential analysis of political systems Economy and Society, Weber outlined three types of legitimate political rule: legal, traditional, and charismatic. In each type of ruling system the governed accept their particular system for a different reason. This concept implicitly endorses a belief that individuals can have some influence on their political system, similar to the Enlightenment idea that political rule rests on the consent of the governed. According to Weber, authority is destiny – the established authority system ultimately determines the behavior of actors within each system.

Legal and Traditional Rule

According to Weber, a system of legal rule grants political power to a leader through accepted procedures and institutions. Legal rule then consolidates its authority through bureaucracy, which is legal rule's defining characteristic. Since a bureaucracy in its ideal form consists of individuals chosen by merit rather than patronage, all the structures and functions derive their authority from impartial rules and procedures. Weber modeled his idea of legal rule on constitutional democracies but argued that this style extended as well to institutions outside of government, including capitalist businesses and voluntary organizations. Because of legal rule's impartiality and limited power, Weber believed people accepted its authority over them.

Traditional leaders, in Weber's taxonomy, derive their power simply from having always held power. Weber had in mind monarchies, but he extended the definition: "Every sort of authoritarian rule that successfully claims legitimate authority simply on the basis of acquired custom belongs to the same category." Under traditional rule, the laws of the land are dictated by the personality and whims of the ruler; the leader's handpicked cronies fill the roles of government functionaries. Because they have never known any other system, the people willingly assent to this system.

Charismatic Rule

Weber's political theories reflected the ongoing geopolitical revolution of his time, as nationalism created new nation-states, constitutional democracies, and colonial empires. As the nations of the world drew closer through technology and conquest, however, Weber realized that many countries did not exhibit either traditional or legal rule. Even more importantly, as political regimes rose and fell, Weber desired to explain how systems could change from one form of rule to another. Thus he formulated his concept of charismatic rule.

Weber defined charismatic rule as "affectual surrender to the person of the lord and his gifts of grace, in particular magical capabilities, prophecies or heroisms, spiritual power and oratorical powers." Charles Tilly refers to charismatic leaders as "religious and ideological virtuosos" who manage to gain adherents to support their belief system. Weber did not discriminate in giving examples; he included people as different as the Dalai Lama, Jesus Christ, Napoleon, and a "Norse berserker" as charismatic individuals. To attain power, Weber explained, a charismatic leader must prove his or her righteousness by performing some sort of heroic feat and exhibiting superhuman qualities. Given its mixture of fervent belief and iconoclastic behavior, charismatic rule is inherently unstable.

In a charismatic system the people play a more active role than in legal and traditional systems. Here Weber balances the power of charisma with individual agency. Only dedicated followers can validate the charismatic leader's claim of authority; concurrently, the leader loses his or her authority if the followers withdraw their loyalty.

Each of Weber's three systems of rule has leaders, but charismatic leaders differ greatly from traditional and legal ones. Although Weber acknowledged that systems could cross – for example, a democracy could legally elect a charismatic leader – the source of authority in each system does not change. That is, even an elected charismatic leader would hold power because of his or her election, not charisma. Likewise, although people swear allegiance to a king, it is the king's mantle of tradition and connection to God's will – what the king represents – that people fear. On the other hand, charismatic leaders draw adherents because of themselves and their cause.

Revolutionary Power of Charismatic Rule

In his ideology Weber intended charismatic rule as an academic explanation for the transition from one political system to another, a sort of deus ex machina of political revolution. To do so, charismatic leadership had to explain what would spur people to revolt against established systems. Central to this concept is Weber's characterization of charismatic rule as the antithesis of traditional and legal rule.

More than anything else, traditional and legal forms of rule establish a daily routine, either through the routine of bureaucracy or the creation of tradition. But Weber believed that people also had needs that transcended the everyday. These needs most frequently manifested themselves in times of distress. At these times, Weber wrote, a charismatic figure was most likely to arise directly because the established ruling system failed to address the people's deeper concerns. Weber then explained that the rise of a charismatic leader is inherently revolutionary. Iconoclastic and willful, charismatic leaders oppose routine and order and allow their followers to envision a world beyond the one they inhabit. Since charismatic leaders stand diametrically opposed to order, their cause is destabilizing; it overturns and upsets the daily routine. Weber liked to use the example of the charismatic leader's ability to tell his followers, "It is written, but I say unto you." As proof of their otherworldliness, charismatic leaders live above the concerns of the ordinary, such as jobs and families.

Despite the revolutionary nature of charisma, Weber maintained that power – be it legal, traditional, or charismatic – is domination. The charismatic leader, if successful in his or her revolution, would naturally want to establish a legacy. At the same time, charisma is unique to one person and its "fate" is to wane. So Weber developed a formula of the "routinization" of charismatic authority, explaining how charisma is transferred to successors and various institutions. Through this process, charismatic power transforms into lasting political rule, but charisma itself dies.

Adapting and Critiquing Weber

As one of the early giants of sociology, Weber has strongly influenced scholars ever since he offered his conceptualization of the modern world. Although Weber wrote more about routinization than charisma, his idea of revolutionary charisma has interested scholars far more because consolidation of power is relatively easy to understand. Conversely, scholars still debate the causes of social change.

Weber's theories have set the terms of debate. Most scholars accept Weber's arguments about political rule, but have adapted them in many ways. Scholars of social movements, protests, and collective action, attracted to Weber's assertion that charisma drives large-scale social change, have been particularly active in reshaping Weber's theories. One major adaptation has been the application of the charismatic leader theory to leadership on all levels, rather than just heads of state, as Weber implied.

Although Weber's conception of charismatic rule provided a useful template, his description was brief and only preliminary. The theory needed to be adapted for the twentieth century because – most fundamentally – charisma occurred far more frequently than Weber predicted. Scholars identified other problems with Weber's theories, including his unbalanced focus on transition and routinization; his failure to explain the circumstances of how leaders arise (as opposed to just when they arise); and his relatively incomplete explanation of charisma. At the opposite end of the spectrum, some scholars have questioned the basic utility of Weber's taxonomy, arguing that charisma as Weber envisioned it no longer exists.

But Weber appeals to most scholars interested in social change; his vision of charisma tantalizingly hints at why people engage in social protest. The reason why scholars find Weber's theory of charisma so influential can be seen in his comments about the revolutionary power of charisma: "charismatic authority is indeed one of the great revolutionary powers of history," undoubtedly a bold and telling statement that hints at a prime mover of social change. Charisma, however, has a negative side as well, as Weber continues: "but in its pure form it [charisma] has a thoroughly authoritarian and dominating character," an aspect of charisma with which many scholars have struggled. Thus Weber's theory of charisma simultaneously presents many explanations and challenges to those who study collective action.

Leadership and Social Movements

Weber's three-system model not only attempted to explain how political systems changed, but also suggested that ordinary individuals had a role in determining their own political fate. Scholars since Weber have adapted these ideas into the core question of social movement studies: why do people join social movements? Although the question seems simple, closer examination reveals a web of contradiction. The costs of activism are terribly high and reward is unlikely – and yet social change undoubtedly does occur. Much of the scholarship about social movements has thus started its analysis by adopting Weber's concept of charisma. Scholars feel that leaders (especially charismatic ones) might have a role in galvanizing members who would not otherwise mobilize.

Many ideas about leadership stem from Vladimir Lenin's adaptation of Marxist revolutionary theories. Since Lenin believed that working-class organizations would mobilize only in favor of their narrow personal interests, he proposed the creation of the "vanguard," a select group of revolutionaries who would assume leadership of the working class. Scholars of social movements managed to separate the decidedly counterrevolutionary nature of the Soviet Union from Lenin's theories about leadership, which resonated with those seeking to understand collective action. In the 1960s sociologist Mancur Olson characterized Lenin's dilemma as the "free-rider" problem – the idea that in groups, few people will willingly participate for the collective good. Only those with the most interest in attaining the group's goal will work hard at it. Regarding social movements, Olson posited that only the most important members of a group have a major interest in achieving the collective good, and so these individuals take on a leadership role (essentially similar to Lenin's vanguard). Upon assuming leadership, the leaders must give members incentives to avoid free riding.

Since Olson first addressed the free-rider problem, scholars have gone from looking at the importance of leadership to examining collective forms of behavior within movements. But many still consider leaders important. Tarrow has summarized leadership's "creative function" as responsibility for selecting the concrete forms of collective action by inventing and adapting tactics to gain the support of neutral observers.

Charismatic Leaders

With conventional wisdom suggesting the importance – or even necessity – of a charismatic leader, it is essential to ask: What do charismatic leaders do for social movements? A main challenge to scholars of charismatic leaders is the inherent difficulty of the term charisma. Although charisma is an evocative term accessible to any audience, one can hardly measure its occurrence scientifically. Furthermore, scholars have wondered how something as abstract as charisma actually works. In general, scholars have examined Weber's theory in four ways. The main refinements to Weber's theory have been to define charisma, identify the origins of charisma, explain how charisma works, and outline what effect charismatic leadership has on a movement.

Definitions of Charisma

Weber stressed the importance of charismatic leaders, but he also made it clear that a leader could not be considered charismatic until his or her followers recognized him or her as such. Nevertheless, Weber spent a lot of time describing many different examples of charismatic individuals and their power over people, including doctors, prophets, judges, generals, and even "leaders of big hunting expeditions." The idea that one person could sway whole movements fits in well with the "Great Man" vision of history and politics that was popular in the first half of the twentieth century. Until the late 1960s, scholars tended to see charisma in this psychological sense – that is, charisma was a result of the personal qualities of one individual who almost hypnotized people into following him or her. But since the late 1960s, with the advent of social history, definitions of charisma have shifted away from the individual and back toward Weber's initial conception of charisma as a relationship between a leader and followers. Thus the study of charismatic leadership balances Great Man history with history "from the bottom up." Essential to recent studies of charismatic leadership is Weber's argument that a charismatic leader depends on the people's devotion, "a devotion born of distress and enthusiasm." Since people can take their devotion away, they exhibit a form of control over their leader.

Above all, definitions of charismatic leadership emphasize the relationship between a leader and his or her followers, reflecting the fact that movement adherents are not automatons but individual agents. In their study of Peronists in Argentina, Madsen and Snow (1991) define charisma as an "an influence relationship marked by asymmetry, directness, and, for the follower, great passion." In his groundbreaking study of the American civil rights movement, Aldon Morris (1984) defines charisma as "strong face-to-face personal relationships that foster allegiance, trust, and loyalty, and give rise to a shared symbolic world that provides an interpretation of earthly affairs and the anticipated after life." These definitions also reflect Weber's concern that charisma acts in ways opposed to routine and bureaucracy, and that charisma also contains an aspect of "performance."

Origins of Charisma

Weber described the times when charismatic leaders would arise as moments of "psychic, physical, economic, ethical, religious, political distress," and scholars have apparently appreciated Weber's vague description of charisma's emergence. In general, it seems that the opportune moment for a charismatic leader is the same as that for a social movement, which Tarrow (1998) identifies as a change in political opportunities or constraints that creates incentives for launching a new phase of contention. Because a charismatic leader relies on his or her potential adherents, the need for a leader must start with the people. Put another way, plenty of individuals are always espousing causes and preaching for revolution, but only when these messages resonate with the public will a charismatic relationship begin.

How Charisma Works

In her work on charismatic political figures, Willner (1984) identifies four factors that catalyze a charismatic leader's ascendance. First, the would-be leader must assimilate his or herself into a dominant cultural myth, such as when Fidel Castro presented himself as the heir to the legendary Cuban revolutionary José Martí. Second, the leader must perform a heroic feat, which differs depending on the cultural and historic context. US President Franklin D. Roosevelt, for example, frequently received credit for ending the Great Depression of the 1930s. Third, the leader must possess a powerful aura, such as Gandhi's otherworldly asceticism. Fourth, a charismatic leader must have an outstanding rhetorical ability that inspires followers.

Although this list provides useful criteria for deciding who can be characterized as a charismatic leader, one way Weber's ideas have been adapted is by applying them to individuals outside of mainstream politics, including subalterns and revolutionaries. Furthermore, other scholars have not taken Weber's talk of heroic acts and superhuman deeds so literally. A charismatic bond can be created in personal relationships described by Morris (1984) as "face-to-face" interaction. Examining the role of leaders in southern black churches, Morris follows Weber in writing "allegiance was conferred by the congregation on the earthly but charismatic leader." The church, furthermore, encouraged preachers to practice and hone their charisma. But beyond all that, charismatic leadership was a function of the mass participation of an entire community, of which leaders were but a vocal minority. Ministers who became charismatic leaders "occupied strategic community positions which enabled them to become extremely familiar with the needs and aspirations of blacks." Because the ministers knew the community and shared its values, the people accepted them as leaders.

With charisma so dependent on the individuals and political context, the mechanics of charisma surely differ in each instance. Wasielewski (1985), however, has suggested that, in general, charismatic leaders reframe adherents' beliefs by using an emotional appeal followed by a logical conclusion. First, the charismatic leader articulates the feelings of others in "emotionally charged situations," making an emotional connection to the people. The leader then disrupts this emotional connection by questioning the basis of these emotions; that is, he or she challenges the group by telling them that their emotional reactions are inappropriate or counterproductive. The leader then introduces concrete plans for change. Finally, the leader motivates the adherents by fusing goals with new framing rules. This approach brings a new perspective to the study of social movements by looking at emotions rather than interests as motivational factors.

What Charisma Does for a Movement

After all the various ways in which people have analyzed Weber's writings on charisma, the effect of a charismatic leader on a movement seems relatively simple. Scholars generally agree that a charismatic leader mobilizes more people, reaches a broader audience, and gets more people-power behind their cause. In political terms, a charismatic leader can easily mobilize popular support for legislation or a particular agenda. Outside mainstream politics, charismatic leaders make it easier for a movement to recruit, mobilize, and sustain adherents. As Morris (1984) puts it, "a movement organization with a charismatic leader rooted in a mass-based institution is more likely to mobilize masses of people than a movement organization without such a leader. Charismatic leaders of this type play a crucial role in the mobilization process and the building of an internal organization."

The End of Charisma

As Weber pointed out, charisma is unique to one person. It can thus be inferred that the death of a charismatic leader incites, at the very least, a crisis for the movement. Some activists believe that the presence of a charismatic leader makes people too dependent on that leader, leaving them unable to exist beyond the lifespan of that leader.

Weber argued that charismatic leaders can consolidate their power through routinization, but this meant the death of true charisma, as the leader's revolutionary charisma inevitably turned into another form of domination. Schweitzer (1984), however, has argued that charisma can insinuate itself into non-charismatic political structures and institutions that Weber thought would nullify charisma's power.

Example of a Charismatic Leader

The popular perception of Martin Luther King Jr.'s role within the civil rights movement epitomizes the relationship between a charismatic leader and a movement. King clearly fits within the traditional Weberian definition – as well as more recent ideas – of a charismatic individual. King eloquently preached a revolutionary message and spurred countless people to commit acts of bravery and resistance.

King's emergence as a leader began amid southern blacks' anger with the stifling effects of institutionalized racism, manifested most visibly in Jim Crow laws. As white America experienced unprecedented economic growth during the 1950s, blacks remained an oppressed and humiliated underclass. Pivotal events, including the lynching of Emmett Till in Money, Mississippi, and the Supreme Court's Brown v. Board of Education decision, further inspired a budding movement. When NAACP activists in Montgomery, Alabama began a boycott of the local bus company in 1955, King assumed a leadership role. Soon, the Montgomery protest encouraged blacks across the nation to engage in non-violent protest against racial injustice. Because of King's appeal to observers of both races in the north and south and his ability to reach agreements with radical student activists as well as elite political leaders, the civil rights movement reached goals it would not have otherwise achieved.

King's particular brand of charisma fits in with established theories. In her analysis of King's speeches, Wasielewski (1985) finds that he connected emotionally with listeners by empathizing with their anger about unequal status. But he then reframed their beliefs by questioning if anger was the best solution. Instead, King offered a feasible program of non-violent, direct action against injustice. King also exhibited some of the superhuman qualities of a charismatic leader. He endured bombings, survived a stabbing, and subjected himself to numerous arrests – all evidence of heroism, if not superhuman fortitude. And reflecting the two-sided relationship theory of charismatic leadership, King's charisma emerged from the black community as much as from his own personal qualities. The black church encouraged charismatic relationships between ministers and their congregations. King and other ministers could become charismatic leaders because they knew the community, shared its values, and enjoyed the people's support. Charisma alone did not achieve civil rights; the movement depended just as much on organizations such as the Southern Christian Leadership Coalition and the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) and networks of activists across the country. The movement combined solid organizational skills with the charisma of religious leaders – of which King was the most powerful.

Weber predicted that charisma's fate is to fade. When King took his non-violent brand of activism to Chicago in 1966, his non-violent tactics failed. As King faltered, younger, more radical black activists began to distance themselves from his leadership. King's death by assassination proved an even greater blow to the civil rights movement. With no unifying figure, the movement splintered further into factions with different goals. The trajectory of the movement, centered as it was around King's charismatic leadership, indicates both the strengths and weaknesses of reliance on a charismatic leader.

Charisma Reinterpreted

As straightforward as the above interpretation of the civil rights movement may seem, the charismatic leader paradigm no longer dominates the study of social movements. Scholars have indeed continued to apply Weber's theories to the study of social movements, including identifying as charismatic leaders individuals who have not traditionally been seen as such. Belinda Robnett (1997) analyzed the experiences of individuals in the civil rights movement and found that black women often acted as charismatic leaders, using their personal qualities to lead young people in the movement. For the most part, however, scholars tend to de-emphasize the importance of a charismatic leader for five reasons.

First, although Mancur Olson's free-rider theory explains the emergence of leaders, charisma alone does not fully explain why people follow leaders. In fact, the free-rider problem indicates that people are not predisposed to join a movement. Instead, McCarthy and Zald (1987) place more emphasis on organizations than leaders. Snow et al. (1997) refer to framing processes in which individuals' beliefs come to reflect a social movement's ideology. Scholars generally speak of "collective action," a phrase that emphasizes a grassroots effort rather than a call-and-response dynamic implicit in the relationship between leaders and followers.

Second, as noted above, theories emphasizing a charismatic leader too closely resemble the Great Man theory of history – that a powerful individual has shaped events according to his will – resulting in many studies looking at charisma among major political leaders. Meanwhile, the rise of social history and subaltern studies over previous decades emphasize the power inherent in ordinary, anonymous individuals. According to this interpretation, overemphasizing a charismatic leader robs ordinary actors of their agency.

Third, many scholars have objected to the near-ubiquity of the term charisma. Glassman and Swatos (1986), for example, argue that the business world, mass media, and modern politics have all coopted the term. As used today, the term has been desiccated of the revolutionary connotations Weber gave to it. Instead, so-called charismatic leaders only exhibit pseudo-charisma: the ubiquity – and vacuity – of the modern celebrity. Scholars have even suggested that, depending on one's definition of the term, charismatic leaders can arise in groups as minuscule as friendships and therapy sessions.

Fourth, contemporary and mainstream social movements tend to consist of bureaucratic organizations, which more closely resemble Weber's first rule of legal authority, rather than the charismatic model. Indeed, Weber explicitly included voluntary associations – precursors to modern, mainstream social movement organizations – as examples of bureaucratic, legal rule. Although the civil rights movement joined charisma with organization, this combination does not occur very frequently. Spontaneous, insurrectionary movements would seem to lack the time needed to develop the relationship required of charismatic leaders and followers.

Fifth, it seems evident that social change can happen without a charismatic leader. Ever since Weber discussed charismatic leadership, scholars have looked at the concept to explain activism, rebelliousness, and political change. But history contains plenty of examples of successful movements that lacked a charismatic leader. Recent work suggests that mild-mannered bureaucrats have done as much or more for environmental protection as iconoclasts like John Muir and Henry David Thoreau. The American anti-nuclear movement in the 1950s helped pressure the government for a nuclear test ban without an obviously charismatic leader; although the Nobel Prize-winning chemist Linus Pauling mobilized people for a test ban, he based his arguments on the rational basis of scientific logic and data, rather than the emotional appeal of charisma. For a successful protest movement, more important factors include shared interests, access to resources, and the favorable reaction of elites.

The term charismatic leader carries such a stigma of Great Man history that scholars have even begun to disassociate Martin Luther King from the label. Debunking King's charismatic leadership as a myth, Carson (1987) argues that King's leadership qualities were far less influential than "impersonal, large-scale social factors." Unlike traditional charismatic leaders, Carson argues, King did not have the unquestioning support of his followers; indeed, he competed with other charismatic leaders, including James Farmer, Fannie Lou Hamer, Malcolm X, and Stokely Carmichael. Civil rights activism, such as the 1960 sit-ins, occurred in communities without any connection to King, instigated by activists with no particular loyalty to him. Although many people embraced King's rhetoric, plenty of activists differed over specific tactics. The SNCC worried that people would become too dependent on King. Carson praises King's leadership skills that enabled him to reconcile – for a time – the movement factions who disagreed with him, but still maintains that the movement would have happened without King. The idea that a Great Man is necessary for social change, Carson argues, is comparable to waiting for the messiah to arrive.

Conclusion

For all the asserted benefits and potential drawbacks of a charismatic leader, the fact remains that charismatic leaders seem to just happen. They cannot be willed into being, nor nominated by a group. In fact, this magical quality of charisma is what gives Weber's theories their continued salience. For those under the thrall of a charismatic leader, charisma might go a long way toward explaining why people engage in activism they might not otherwise attempt. Still, scholars recognize that other factors besides a leader's charismatic qualities influence people's behavior. The recognition that the adherents are as important as the leader has led many to question the importance of a charismatic leader at all, since activists might be just as well off if they mobilize themselves rather than wait for a leader.

However one defines charisma, a charismatic leader helps a movement reach potential adherents it might not reach otherwise. The charismatic leader acts as a focal point of the movement, giving the unit purpose and specific goals as outlined by one individual. And the mere existence of a charismatic leader challenges the dominant classes of society. At the same time, reliance on a charismatic leader can substitute the leader's personality for goals. Without the leader, the movement risks obsolescence.

But as Tarrow (1998) points out, true movements are seldom under one leader's control; consequently, scholars now place less emphasis on the importance of a charismatic leader. Since Weber posited the idea of a charismatic leader as an explanation of broad political change, other theories have challenged this. Scholars take many more factors into consideration when discussing revolution. Still, as long as people continue to dedicate themselves to a seemingly obscure, unpopular, difficult, or destructive cause defined by a charismatic individual, Weber's theories will hold great appeal.

SEE ALSO: Carmichael, Stokely/Kwame Turé (1941–1998); Hitler, Adolf (1889–1945) and German Nazism; King, Martin Luther, Jr. (1929–1968) and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC); Malcolm X (1925–1965)

References and Suggested Readings

- Carson, C. (1987) Martin Luther King, Jr.: Charismatic Leadership in a Mass Struggle. Journal of American History 74, 2 (September): 448–54.
- Friedland, W. H. (1964) For a Sociological Concept of Charisma. Social Forces 43, 1 (October): 18–26.
- Gerth, H. H. & Mills, C. W. (1946) From Max Weber: Essays in Sociology. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Glassman, R. M. & Swatos, W. H., Jr. (Eds.) (1986) Charisma, History, and Social Structure. New York: Greenwood Press.
- Hager, T. (1995) Force of Nature: The Life of Linus Pauling. New York: Simon & Schuster.
- Harvey, M. (2005) Wilderness Forever: Howard Zahniser and the Path to the Wilderness Act. Seattle: University of Washington Press.
- McCarthy, J. D. & Zald, M. N. (1997) Resource Mobilization and Social Movements: A Partial Theory. In S. M. Buechler & F. K. Cylke, Jr. (Eds.), Social Movements: Perspectives and Issues. Mountain View: Mayfield Publishing.
- Madsen, D. & Snow, P. G. (1991) The Charismatic Bond: Political Behavior in Time of Crisis. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Morris, A. D. (1984) The Origins of the Civil Rights Movement: Black Communities Organizing for Change. New York: Free Press.
- Robnett, B. (1997) How Long? How Long? African-American Women in the Struggle for Civil Rights. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Schweitzer, A. (1984) The Age of Charisma. Chicago: Nelson-Hall.
- Snow, D. A., Rochford, E. B., Jr., Worden, S. K., & Benford, R. D. (1986) Frame Alignment Processes, Micromobilization, and Movement Participation. In S. M. Buechler & F. K. Cylke, Jr. (Eds.), Social

- Movements: Perspectives and Issues*. Mountain View: Mayfield Publishing.
- Tarrow, S. G. (1998) Power in Movement: Social Movements and Contentious Politics. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Tilly, C. (1978) From Mobilization to Revolution. Reading, MA: Addison-Wesley.
- Wasielewski, P. L. (1985) The Emotional Basis of Charisma. Symbolic Interaction 8, 2: 207–22.
- Weber, M. (1978) Economy and Society: An Outline of Interpretive Sociology. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Whimster, S. (Ed.) (2004) The Essential Weber: A Reader. London: Routledge.
- Willner, A. R. (1984) The Spellbinders: Charismatic Political Leadership. New Haven: Yale University Press.

Charter 77

Joseph C. Santora

In 1977, as more and more Czechoslovakians strived for greater freedoms and human rights, 243 citizens from different walks of life signed a document published in a West German newspaper calling for the government to conform to international human rights rules of behavior. Two of the most important articles that the Czechoslovakian activists demanded adherence to were the Helsinki Accords and United Nations protocols for human rights. Charter 77 took on national prominence as more and more prominent citizens signed the document.

In effect Charter 77 was no more than a document that gained movement status as more and more Czechoslovakian citizens became signatories. According to some observers, the document gained a movement status as it encouraged political opposition to the government. Still, notably, Charter 77 did not call for illegal opposition. By the mid-1980s the document had 1,200 signatories. Significantly, Charter 77 was initiated less than a decade after the deposition of reformist Communist Party leader Alexander Dubček in 1968 by USSR and Warsaw Pact troops after instituting a series of sweeping political reforms to initiate a period of liberalization he called “socialism with a human face.” In March 1968 Dubček abolished censorship and permitted open criticism of the government. Following the Soviet invasion, Dubček lost his position as party leader and was replaced by Gustav Husak, who immediately introduced what he called normalization, a process of five interconnected policies. Essentially, these policies returned Czechoslovakia to the status quo prior to the Dubček reforms.

Demanding freedom of speech and human rights, in January 1977 Václav Havel, Jan Patocka, and Jiri Hajeka, writers and members of the Czechoslovak intelligentsia, prepared, wrote, published, and became the spokespersons for a revolutionary document called Charter 77 in West Germany. The document criticized the Czechoslovakian government for its failure to address human rights issues in their country in accordance with the Final Act of the Helsinki Accords of 1975, which had been signed by 35 nations, including Czechoslovakia. In addition to the original designers and spokespersons of the document, many of the original 243 signers and more than 1,000 future signers through the 1980s did not consider themselves dissidents.

In response to Charter 77, in newspaper articles, the Czechoslovak government officially called the document “an anti-state, anti-socialist, and a demagogic, abusive piece of writing.” Besides public scolding, the government harassed Charter 77 spokespersons, signers, and their families. The actions the government took against signers of Charter 77 included loss of work, suspension of drivers’ licenses, and denial of education to their children. These forms of harassment and further retaliation escalated into more severe forms of persecution: loss of citizenship and exile from the country. For example, in mid-January 1977 Havel, one of the chief spokespersons for Charter 77, was arrested, tried, and incarcerated for a few months as a result of his leadership role.

Charter 77 was only the beginning of several forms of protests by outspoken leaders seeking basic human rights for all Czechoslovak people. In April 1978 the Committee for the Unjustly Persecuted (VONS), a support group, was founded, and about 18 months later Civic Forum, a political reform movement, which consisted of Charter 77 and other groups, was founded to champion human and civil rights, contributing to the withdrawal of the USSR, regular elections, and institution of greater freedoms.

SEE ALSO: Dubček, Alexander (1921–1992); Havel, Václav (b. 1936); Prague Spring; Velvet Revolution, 1989

References and Suggested Readings

- Bugajski, J. (1987) Czechoslovakia: Charter 77’s Decade of Dissent. Westport, CT: Praeger.

- Havel, V. (1991) Disturbing the Peace: A Conversation with Karel Hviždala. New York: Vintage.
- Keane, J. (2000) Vaclav Havel: A Political Tragedy in Six Acts. New York: Basic Books.
- Kusin, V. V. (1978) From Dubček to Charter 77: A Study of Normalization in Czechoslovakia, 1968–78. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.

Chartists

Jason M. Kelly

Chartism was a massive, working-class political movement that became a prominent feature of British politics between 1837 and 1848. The name Chartist was a derivation from their petitioning activities, which culminated in the presentation of three People's Charters to parliament in 1838, 1842, and 1848. While unsuccessful in achieving their immediate goals, the group became a potent symbol of early working-class political agitation, for radicals and conservatives alike.

Background

To understand the significance of Chartism to early Victorian politics, it is necessary to understand the political and social milieu from which the coalition emerged. The late 1820s and early 1830s were heady years for British reformers. The Whig party, with the aid of Daniel O'Connell's massive support in Ireland, had outmaneuvered the Tories, forcing them to submit to the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts in 1828 and to Catholic emancipation in 1829. The death of George IV brought with it hope that the new regime would bring the reform of "old corruption" – the end to sinecures, preferments, rotten boroughs, and more. A poor harvest in 1829 sparked higher bread prices and the increased politicization of the working classes. In the south and east of the country, agricultural laborers expressed their anger at high prices and low wages in the so-called Swing Riots. In the wake of the repeal of the Combination Acts (1824), trade union activity was on an upswing, and in April 1831 a variety of London-based radical groups combined their resources into the National Union of the Working Classes. In some instances workers and moderate middle-class reformers were willing to work together to campaign for national electoral reforms. This was the case with the Birmingham General Political Union, which formed in 1830. Robert Owen, while reeling from the failure of New Harmony, had returned to Glasgow to find that over 300 cooperative societies had been founded throughout Britain. In 1830 Owenite socialism provided Britain's most viable philosophic alternative to laissez-faire political economy, and it found an increasingly eager reception among the British proletariat. Given the July Revolution in France (1830), these events created an atmosphere that many believed was ripe for social and political change.

Despite some concern among conservatives that an alliance between the working classes and the middle classes was possible in the early 1830s, it was unlikely. In general, the middle classes were uninterested in wide-sweeping electoral reform that would embrace all workers. Likewise, the interests of the middle classes were being well served by a government whose policies generally steered toward laissez-faire economic policies – the Corn Laws notwithstanding. So the 1832 Reform Acts and the Municipal Corporations Act (1835), which attempted to reform the grossest electoral abuses within the kingdoms, left the working classes little to show for their alliance with the bourgeoisie. The Reform Acts removed many of the rotten boroughs and they gave more representation to growing cities such as Leeds, Sheffield, and Manchester. Furthermore, they regularized property qualifications for voting and expanded the franchise. Nevertheless, the resulting legislation only extended the vote to one out of every seven adult males. This was hardly the wish of radical reformers, many of whom argued for universal male suffrage. And the fallout from the 1832 reforms was such that it put the interests of the increasingly politicized working classes at odds with the enfranchised wealth of the growing middle classes. By splitting the coalition of the middle classes and the working classes, the elite had maintained their hold on power and undermined the potential for more radical reform, at least in the short term.

The failure of the working classes to gain any political leverage in 1832 did not put an end to working-class radicalism. In fact, spurred by the potential for reform, they continued to organize and pressure the government, both through legal and illegal means. The enfranchised inadvertently gave the working classes the motivation to organize more cohesive class-based political organizations. The conservatives were generally opposed to major social or political reforms. They were ardent protectors of the Church of England and their own landed interests. Thus, they strenuously protected the 1815 Corn Laws, which guaranteed their financial well-being through protective tariffs. Their status as landholders put them at odds with their tenants, who felt their greed in the form of high rents and evictions. The land situation was particularly pronounced in Ireland, sparking the creation of secret societies such as the Whiteboys and the Rockites, who used violence and intimidation to protect their meager possessions.

For their part, landowners used the potent legal mechanisms at their disposal to retaliate. A particularly apt example of this retaliation relates to the 1834 case of the Tolpuddle Martyrs, a group of six agricultural workers from Dorsetshire who had organized legally as the Friendly Society of Agricultural Labourers. They were prosecuted by a local landowner, not for combining, but for administering an oath, prohibited under the 1797 Illegal Oaths Act. Just one of many examples of the elite's abuse of power, the Tolpuddle case became a cause célèbre in the radical and trade union press – a powerful symbol for disenfranchised British and Irish workers.

Likewise, the enfranchised liberals found themselves at odds with the desires of the masses. While they were willing to remove the privileges of the Church of England, including the imposition of church rates, liberals tended to favor free trade capitalism as a panacea to social ills. Thus, for them, especially among the factory owners of the North, the Corn Laws became symbolic of illegitimate landed influence on the economy. These businessmen argued that the Corn Laws kept grain at an artificially inflated price. Ostensibly a humanitarian appeal on the grounds that the repeal of the Corn Laws would raise the average standard of living, astute radicals recognized that a drop in grain prices would be accompanied by a decline in wages. At best, the standard of living would stay the same for the average wage laborer.

For the working classes, the most objectionable action from the free trade liberals was the passage of the English Poor Law Act of 1834, followed by similar acts in Scotland (1845) and Ireland (1838). Overturning the Elizabethan statutes, the 1834 act – the child of the Benthamite Edwin Chadwick – took a draconian approach to poverty. Working from the assumption that relief for the poor created a cycle of dependence and laziness among otherwise able-bodied laborers, the new Poor Law mandated the creation of workhouses in every parish. Workers had to submit themselves to a prison-like regime of workhouse order to receive aid. For many, the cure was worse than the disease. And, in any case, economic cycles – especially in the industrial North – often led to high rates of unemployment with which the workhouses were ill-prepared to cope. The response was an anti-Poor Law movement, which helped consolidate the political ambitions of the various working-class movements, including the nascent Chartist movement of the late 1830s.

Birth of Chartism

Chartism was a broad-based national coalition that formed from several movements among the working classes. Because of the diversity in leadership and different regional concerns, there were, at times, breakdowns in leadership and consensus among self-professed Chartists. Nevertheless, the Chartists had an overarching political and social reform agenda that gave the group a unified character for a decade. The leaders articulated the group's platform within a class-conscious framework. However, unlike the Owenites who suggested that social inequality was the product of economic disenfranchisement, the Chartists argued that the roots of social and economic inequality could be found in the political system. Thus, their ultimate objective was to reform the political system, but this did not mean that they were unconcerned with relieving social ills.

As early as 1836 the Chartist leadership began to coalesce. Led by William Lovett, a London cabinetmaker, a small group of artisans formed the London Working Men's Association (LWMA). Focusing much of their energies on pamphleteering, Lovett, the group's secretary, was effective in creating a large coalition of like-minded individuals and organizations throughout Britain. This included influential organizers such as Robert Owen and Feargus O'Connor, the editor of the Northern Star, a Leeds newspaper which became the printed voice of Chartism after 1838. Between 1836 and 1837 Lovett drafted what became the People's Charter, a six-point program for a massive reform of the electoral system. The first draft of the People's Charter called for universal suffrage. However, to solidify their support among male laborers, the provision for female suffrage was soon dropped. Despite this, many women were supportive of Chartism, and they played an integral role in the movement through organizing, petitioning, writing, fundraising, and forming nearly 150 women's Chartist organizations throughout Britain and Ireland between 1838 and 1852.

In general, Chartist women supported the primacy of universal male suffrage, often with the assumption that universal female suffrage would follow soon thereafter. The People's Charter also called for the abolition of property qualifications to vote, annual parliaments, voting by ballot, and a rewriting of electoral districts. A sixth demand would provide a salary for MPs, a provision that would allow working-class MPs to participate in the London parliament. Traveling the countryside in the wake of the 1837 economic depression, Lovett, O'Connor, and their fellow Chartist leaders were able to generate mass support for their program.

O'Connor quickly became the de facto leader of the movement. He linked the Chartist agenda with that of the anti-Poor Law movement. And, traveling through the midland and northern counties, he formed close associations with radical leaders such as Richard Oastler and Joseph Rayner Stephens. Massive torchlight meetings, which accompanied Oastler's and Stephens' calls for sabotage and strikes, troubled moderate Chartists and led to division within the ranks soon thereafter. In December 1838 Stephens was arrested for unlawful assembly, one of the earliest arrests of the Chartist leadership. Throughout the countryside the Chartists circulated their People's Charter in print, and with massive support the leadership decided to organize a national petition as well as a national convention – the General Convention of the Industrious Classes.

A failed national convention in London in February 1839 was followed by another in Birmingham in May. The Birmingham convention was also unsuccessful, in part because of a polarized vision of the means to achieve Chartist ends. On the one hand, the “physical force Chartists” were willing to use violence and intimidation to attain their goals. On the other hand, the “moral force Chartists,” which included William Lovett, sought to induce change through non-violent rallies, pamphleteering, and petitioning. Nevertheless, the convention decided on several courses of action. They planned a run on the banks, which would disrupt financial systems. “Exclusive dealing” would mean that they would only buy from Chartist tradespeople. And, finally, they decided on the “Sacred Month,” a general strike that would force the government to concede to their demands. On June 14 the Chartist leadership presented parliament with their first charter, with 1.28 million signatures. Before it was read in parliament the Birmingham police force broke up a Chartist meeting on July 4, 1839, arresting two Chartist leaders. Denouncing the arrests at the convention, William Lovett was subsequently arrested. These so-called Bull Ring Riots led to the withdrawal of the moderate Birmingham Political Union's support for the Chartists. On the heels of the riots, parliament rejected the People's Charter and the convention collapsed.

As the government began arresting the Chartist leadership over the next months, they met small pockets of spontaneous resistance by workers. In November the government faced up to 5,000 Welsh ironworkers and colliers in armed confrontation. Descending on the town of Newport, the men were inspired by Chartist ideology and frustration over working conditions. Soldiers intercepted the men and killed over twenty workers, following this with the arrest, trial, and transportation of their leaders. In the wake of the Newport Rising, more workers organized themselves in Dewsbury, Sheffield, and Bradford, but these were easily suppressed, and the government continued arresting Chartist leaders and suspected conspirators. By January 1740 Chartism was in a shambles.

National Charter Association and the Decline of Chartism

The second stage of Chartism took place from the summer of 1840 to 1842. This period in the movement's history was characterized by strong organization in the Midlands and the North. While Chartism's leaders were still in prison, James Leach, a radical organizer from Manchester, and Robert Kemp Philp, a news vendor from Bath, organized the National Charter Association (NCA). The NCA's stated purpose was to pursue universal male suffrage through peaceful means, specifically through petitioning. Its significance was in providing a centrally organized administration for Chartism, which would have branches throughout Britain. While the branches were generally concentrated in the industrial towns of the Midlands, the NCA gained a larger following in the economic downturn of 1841–2. And, with O'Connor's support – most significantly through turning over the Northern Star to the NCA – the second Chartist petition in 1842 gathered 3.3 million signatures. The NCA's branches eventually totaled 400 with 50,000 members. Nevertheless, their success was short lived.

For a second time, parliament rejected the Chartist petition outright. And once again, in the wake of its failure, the political climate merged with social dissatisfaction and economic turmoil to mobilize the working classes. In the industrial towns of the Midlands and the North, laborers sabotaged machinery and went on strike, protesting cuts in their wages. Removing boiler plugs was a popular way to shut down production, and the prevalence of this action led to this period in working-class activism to be known as the Plug Plots. Violence increased throughout the summer of 1842 and there were frequent confrontations with the military. The workers' demands reflect the extent to which their economic situation found voice through Chartist politics. Many of the strike petitions required that Chartist principles be met before they would return to work. Despite their ambivalent reaction to what nearly amounted to a general strike, the Chartist leaders were once again arrested. Even as the NCA failed to support the workers, the government quelled the movement through extensive arrests.

Between 1842 and 1848 the Chartist agenda transformed. There was some disagreement among the leadership about the next course of action. Some, such as Bronterre O'Brien, favored joining reform-minded moderates in the abolitionist Joseph Sturge's National Complete Suffrage Union. O'Brien failed in the face of O'Connor's objections, and the two men disagreed publicly in debates and in the press. Chartism's six points were put on hold while leaders pursued a variety of alternative agendas. O'Brien battled the Anti-Corn Law League in his National Reformer. O'Connor focused on creating a Chartist Cooperative Land Society, for which he received approval from the NCA in 1843. His idea was to form cooperatives which would give land back to the people, potentially giving them the right to vote, and relieve some of the pressures caused by an oversupply of urban labor.

Between 1845 and 1848 O'Connor had 70,000 subscribers contributing small amounts to a subscription total of £2.10s. He used this money to purchase five estates, which were divided into smaller properties and let by ballot. Complicated lawsuits and failed efforts to create a friendly society and a joint stock company eventually caused O'Connor's land scheme to collapse in financial turmoil.

As Chartism's leaders struggled to address social reform, the government pursued a similar path, but to different ends. Much of the support for Chartism came from people who saw that their social condition was, in part, the product of a government that was unwilling to reform itself. Disenfranchised, Chartism was their political voice. Once the government responded with limited reforms that appealed to the working classes, Chartism's base of support began to erode. Those wishing for moderate reform found that parliament was responding, and they began to abandon more radical reformers – especially the “physical force Chartists.” For example, the administration found widespread working-class support for the Factory Acts of the 1840s. These laws removed women and children from certain industries, such as mining. Or, they limited the hours that women and children could work in factories.

The justifications and implications had important consequences for working-class gender and labor relations. On the one hand, the Factory Acts worked from the premise that women were degraded by certain forms of labor – in particular those that undermined the idealized image of bourgeois domesticity. Many among the working classes, including the Chartists, absorbed the image of domesticity and separate spheres ideology as a way to reassert a patriarchal vision of the family. To be masculine was to be the wage-earning head of a household. To be feminine was to be “the angel in the house,” as Victorian writers later described the ideal. On the other hand, the removal of women from wage labor promised less competition and higher wages for men. From this perspective, female workers had become a threat to the success of male workers in a laissez-faire economy. By passing these Acts the government appeared to be reasserting the patriarchal moral order as well as moderating the economic order. Coupled with inquiries and reforms of public health, education, and even the Poor Laws, the British government seemed, to many, to be protecting the rights of the people.

When the 1848 revolution swept through France, Feargus O'Connor and his fellow Chartists prepared to petition the government in a third People's Charter. Promising 5 million signatures, the Chartists were only able to muster 1.9 million. This lack of support reflects a general dissatisfaction with the Chartist cause among the working classes. Still, with revolution spreading in Europe, the palpable threat of an Irish revolution, and riots sparked by economic distress in England and Scotland, O'Connor believed that he could force constitutional change.

In April 1848 he amassed 150,000 workers at Kennington Common, just south of Westminster. These men planned to march the petition to parliament, but over 12,000 troops and police stood in their way. Rather than risk a violent clash, O'Connor presented the petition to parliament himself. And, for a final time, the government rejected the Chartist petition. As in 1839 and 1842, the rejection of the petition led to violent confrontation and mass arrests in urban areas. However, unlike previous incarnations of Chartism, the movement faded after the 1848 defeat. In part, this was the result of an ensuing alliance between reformers, trade unionists, and liberals. Nevertheless, the Chartist movement provided a model for working-class organization and helped establish a working-class consciousness in nineteenth-century Britain.

SEE ALSO: Anti-Corn Law Agitation, Britain, 19th Century; Britain, Trade Union Movement; Class Identity and Protest; European Revolutions of 1848; Irish Nationalism; O'Brien, Bronterre (1805–1864); O'Connor, Feargus (1796–1855); Owen, Robert (1771–1858); Poor Law, Britain, 1834; Reform Bills, Britain, 1867 and 1884; Swing Riots; Tolpuddle Martyrs, Britain, 1834

References and Suggested Readings

- Briggs, A. (1959) Chartist Studies. London: Macmillan.
 Epstein, J. & Thompson, D. (Eds.) (1982) The Chartist Experience: Studies in Working-Class Radicalism and Culture, 1830–1860. London: Macmillan.
 Jones, G. S. (1983) Rethinking Chartism. In G. S. Jones (Ed.), Languages of Class: Studies in English Working-Class History, 1832–1982. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 90–178.
 O'Higgins, R. (1961) The Irish Influence in the Chartist Movement. Past & Present 20: 83–96.
 Pickering, P. A. (1986) Class Without Words: Symbolic Communication in the Chartist Movement. Past & Present 112: 144–62.

- Pickering, P. A. (1995) Chartism and the Chartists in Manchester and Salford. Basingstoke: Macmillan.
 Schwarzkopf, J. (1991) Women in the Chartist Movement. New York: Palgrave.
 Taylor, M. (1996) Rethinking the Chartists: Searching for Synthesis in the Historiography of Chartism. Historical Journal 39, 2: 479–95.
 Thompson, D. (Ed.) (1971) The Early Chartists. London: Macmillan.
 Thompson, E. P. (1963) The Making of the English Working Class. New York: Vintage.

Charusathira, Prapas (1912–1997)

Justin Corfield

Prapas Charusathira was appointed deputy prime minister of Thailand and minister of the interior in December 1972, during a difficult time in his country's history, becoming the military strongman who tried to end the pro-democracy movement in Thailand. Prime Minister Thanom Kittikachorn had dissolved parliament the previous November, banning all political parties. Charusathira, a tough army general who had been deputy prime minister from 1963 to 1971, was to provide the brawn to ensure there were few demonstrations. Charusathira saw his greatest achievement as maintaining an anti-communist Thailand.

Charusathira was born November 25, 1912 at Udon in northeast Thailand, and in 1933 entered the Royal Siamese Army (renamed Royal Thai Army in 1939). He graduated from the elite Chulachomklao Royal Military Academy, where fellow students included future prime ministers Thanom and Sarit Thanarat. (The academy's former students have run Thailand for 47 of the past 60 years.) He then went to the National Defense College and began his career in the infantry. His first big campaign was against the French when Thailand claimed western Cambodia in 1940. It was a short military conflict, and after Japanese "mediation" the French ceded two Cambodian provinces.

In September 1957, dictator Pibul Songgram was overthrown in a coup d'état organized by Thanom, and a provisional government was formed under the diplomat Pote Sarasin. Three months later Thanom was chosen by the Nationalist Socialist Party as prime minister. After another coup in October 1958, General Sarit took over. When Sarit died in 1963, Thanom returned as prime minister, remaining in the post for the next ten years. Throughout all these upheavals (during these 16 years there were only two coups, both of which were to strengthen the hand of the military), Charusathira was minister of the interior. He was content to remain the strongman behind the scenes, but he exercised real power and served on the boards of 11 companies. From 1963 to 1971 he was deputy prime minister, army deputy commander, deputy supreme commander, and supreme commander.

The US was then increasing its role in South Vietnam and was ejected unceremoniously from Cambodia between 1963 and 1965. Thus the importance of keeping Thailand as a bastion against communism was something that dominated much western planning – and Charusathira was a key link in this. In 1971 he was appointed to the National Executive Council, and as director of the Security Council for Defense and Interior he relinquished these posts in 1972 to become deputy prime minister again and minister of the interior. He was appointed in December 1972 to end the student pro-democracy movement in Thailand. In addition to his political role, he was vice-president and rector of Chulalongkorn University, the most famous and influential seat of learning in the country.

Student activism was on the rise in Southeast Asia. Partly taking inspiration from Keo Ann's demonstrations against the Lon Nol government in Cambodia in May and June 1972, students eventually went out on the streets of Bangkok to demonstrate against Thanom, his son Colonel Narong Kittikachorn, and Charusathira. The protests reached a peak in late 1973. In an attempt to release some of the tension, Charusathira announced on September 10 that he would resign as commander of the army on October 1. But he remained interior minister and on October 6 ordered the arrest of student leaders, accusing them of involvement in a "communist plot."

On October 13, 300,000 students demonstrated in Bangkok – the largest rally the city had seen. Some of the students who had been arrested were released, but on the following day disturbances began again. Charusathira's successor as army commander refused to intervene. But when some students tried to take over a government broadcasting station, Narong's 11th Infantry Regiment, backed by a helicopter gunship, opened fire on crowds at Thammasat University. Officially, 66 people were shot dead, but some estimates put the death toll as high as 300. Angry at the developments, King Bhumibol Adulyadej called the triumvirate to an audience and announced their immediate exile, thus ushering in three years of democracy. The demonstrations only stopped when news was broadcast that Charusathira and Narong had left the country. Charusathira spent most of his remaining years in exile in Taiwan. It was only in January 1977 that he was allowed to return to Bangkok, where he lived until his death on August 18, 1997.

SEE ALSO: Student Movements; Vietnam, First Indochina War, 1945–1954; Vietnam, Protest and Second Indochina War, 1960–1974; Vietnam, Protests, 1975–1993

References and Suggested Readings

- Bartak, E. (1993) The Student Movement in Thailand 1970–1976. Clayton, Australia: Center of Southeast Asian Studies, Monash University.
- Corfield, J. (1997) Deputy Behind Thai Bloodbath. The Australian, September 4: 14.

Chávez, César (1927–1993) and the United Farm Workers

Cyrus Ernesto Zirakzadeh

Toward the end of the twentieth century, César Chávez promoted a distinctive type of social rebellion in the United States, which became associated with the phrase la Causa and with a hybrid poor-people's organization, the National Farm Workers Association (later renamed United Farm Workers, or UFW). Chávez, a passionate activist who knew how to arouse listeners, celebrated the spirited and unruly citizen who confronts bosses and government officials alike and who refuses to suffer injustice silently. Conversely, Chávez distrusted the selfish ambitions of not only the wealthy but of elected politicians (including self-described liberals), and sought to pressure government leaders into action that they (in Chávez's opinion) would normally not undertake if exposed to convincing arguments alone.

César Chávez (center), leader of the National Farm Workers' Association (NFWA), walks a picket line in California in 1966. In 1962 Chávez, along with Philip Vera Cruz, Dolores Huerta, and Larry Itliong, founded what later became the United Farm Workers of America (UFW) to urge migrant workers to join in the fight for better wages and workers' rights. (Paul Fusco/Magnum Photos)

Political Education and Evolution

In his autobiography Chávez attributes his moral sympathies largely to his parents' experiences, their egalitarian maxims, their commitments to unions, their hostility toward violence, and their compassion toward others who were suffering from poverty. When Chávez was a child, his father lost his mortgaged farm and became a migrant farm worker who hoped to save enough from wages to purchase another farm. He dreamt in vain. Since the late nineteenth century California's enormous agribusinesses not only monopolized the state's arable land but also exercised control over local government officials, banks, newspapers, water works, and other private forms of power. Spared of fears about legal prosecution and social censure, agricultural corporations paid below-subsistence wages to short-term field hands, housed them in unheated and crowded hovels, and did not worry about their need for potable water and toilets. As a result, migrant farm hands, such as the Chávez family, were too busy surviving day-to-day to salt away investment capital. Despite chronic "hard times," the Chávez family generously shared its moments of good fortune with neighbors and fellow workers whose sufferings, in the eyes of César's mother and father, seemed even greater than their own. The parents' practice of selflessly helping the poor (and not simply trying to escape poverty) shaped their son's outlook, which, he argues, became a psychological inclination that he could not resist as he grew older.

After serving two years in the military, Chávez married and settled in a Mexican American barrio in San Jose, California. There, he met a priest, Father Donald McDonnell, who exposed Chávez to the social justice ideas of Left Catholics, such as Dorothy Day. Chávez also made friends with community organizer Fred Ross, an Anglo Chávez initially expected to dislike but whose ideas about poor people collectively fighting for better conditions made intuitive sense to him.

With the help of Ross's connections to a community service organization oriented toward the ideas of Saul Alinsky, Chávez soon became a professional community organizer, working in Mexican American neighborhoods. When entering a new community, Chávez would arrange for friends and neighbors to meet at a local's home and talk about their immediate problems, which could involve discrimination at schools or banks, difficulties navigating welfare bureaucracies, or locating affordable housing. With Chávez's suggestions and encouragement, the local groups planned collective projects – for example, the establishment of a credit union – that might reduce their stress. Chávez also helped local residents process citizenship papers and register to vote.

In the course of organizing communities, Chávez became convinced that poverty per se was the most salient issue for many Mexican Americans. Economic topics seemed to excite the individuals he met and generated levels of participation that related social issues, such as discrimination at schools or shortages of medical centers, seldom produced. Unable to convince his superiors to mobilize residents around explicitly economic themes, such as joblessness and low wages, Chávez resigned from the Community Service Organization (CSO), founded the National Farm Workers Association, and dedicated the remainder of his life to helping rural poor people address perceived economic injustices.

Chávez never saw the negotiation of contracts between employers and employees as the sole aim of his fledgling union. He saw his union as part of a more comprehensive program of community organizing and empowering poor people. When working with field hands, Chávez typically employed the recruitment techniques he had mastered in the CSO. He scheduled house meetings, where poor people conversed, pondered alternative courses of action, and later derived lessons from both the successes and mistakes of their actions. Chávez believed that local projects and social services – for instance, the establishment of a neighborhood medical center or credit union, or help in completing legal documents – generated gratitude and loyalties that his nascent labor organization could draw upon when negotiating contracts with resistant employers. In addition, through such small-scale achievements, everyday people acquire the confidence and self-esteem necessary to initiate their acts of self-defense.

In the course of organizing California's rural poor, Chávez discovered that many farm hands worried about temporary Mexican immigrants who, despite laws that required growers to first offer jobs to US workers, took jobs (and at extremely low pay) from US citizens and permanent residents. The curtailment of the employment of non-permanent residents was an early priority of the UFW, which saw itself initially as a nationalist organization for all US farm workers – regardless of the worker's skin color, ethnic background, or religious beliefs. Over the years, the UFW would become more immigrant friendly and more cosmopolitan in its approach to the plight of the poor, but this was not its initial orientation.

Part of the UFW's challenge in organizing California's farm hands was their transience. Laborers moved from place to place according to the harvesting season, which made verification of union membership, votes for strikes, and votes on negotiated contracts very difficult. Conversely, growers could count on the lack of stable communities among workers and their continual need for paid work as potential breeding grounds for strikebreakers. To offset the workers' fluid social life (as well as their need to secure money during strikes) Chávez sought outside sponsors and allies, such as students, the clergy, established unions, and the liberal wing of the Democratic Party. To generate knowledge about and sympathy for the plight of farm workers, the UFW combined traditional strikes and worksite picketing with long-distance marches to population centers, dramatic fastings by Chávez, and nationwide boycotts of selected products, such as Gallo wine. Chávez also began to use California's legal system to register complaints about growers' hiring practices, and he pressured judges and police to enforce frequently ignored labor laws (if, of course, the laws on the books seemed to help the rural poor, which was not always the case).

The UFW acquired national fame in the late 1960s and early 1970s when Chávez, against great odds, compelled grape growers to sign a contract with their pickers that would not only promise better pay, but a reasonable hiring policy (through UFW hiring halls) and protection of workers from dangerous pesticides. The victory was, however, short lived. In retrospect, it was the first exchange in an on-again, off-again war between the UFW and growers in California – a war that continues today, as contracts are renegotiated, abrogated, and reinterpreted amid changing political climates.

Vision

Chávez never promoted a single, comprehensive political philosophy. Nonetheless, his political activism was characterized by an identifiable set of moral concerns and precepts that loosely hung together.

For example, he was not preoccupied with advancing the interests of Latinos as a distinct social group. Chávez had suffered from discrimination throughout his life and was extremely sensitive to ethnic slights. This is not surprising. Mexicans and Mexican Americans were continually ridiculed in school, ushered to separate seating areas in movie theaters, and harassed by police (patterns of behavior that endure in many places). Still, Chávez viewed his cultural inheritance ambivalently. He believed deeply in the personal and political value of religious faith, and often used symbols and rituals that resonated among Mexicans and Mexican Americans – such as the eagle on the Mexican flag and the Catholic Church's penitent marches and fasting – to galvanize onlookers' support and manipulate activists' passions. At the same time, Chávez often spoke of his distrust of all racialist and ethnic enthusiasms. In his opinion, narrow cultural pride allows the wealthy to divide and conquer the have-nots. Chávez, therefore, pointedly prohibited discrimination by UFW activists against people of non-Latino backgrounds. Indeed, he expelled several Chicano activists from the UFW who would not welcome African Americans. This resulted in Chávez and his followers being called negreros (which, translated roughly, derogatorily means “Negro lovers”) in communities where large numbers of residents were committed to the post-Mexican Revolution notion of La Raza (or a cosmic Mexican race).

Even though Chávez intentionally distanced himself from numerous Chicano groups and ideologies of his time, he took seriously the notion that everyday people have the capacity to be remarkably creative when thinking about how best to fight for their rights and interests. Chávez concedes in his autobiography that sometimes he is impatient with the temerity of the poor, their willingness to engage in violence, and their silly stereotypes of women, students, and other ethnic groups. He nonetheless insists that poor people are remarkably generous, courageous, and playful about ideas, and ultimately are the source of effective political action.

Chávez sometimes calls his faith in the creative energies of the populace a “non-violent” approach to politics, partly because of its resemblances to the practices of Mahatma Gandhi and the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr. Like Gandhi and King, Chávez chastised his followers whenever they physically attacked an opponent or goaded an opponent into violent behavior. Such aggressive behavior is counter-productive, Chávez argued, because police forces typically will arrest and jail the poor, while lightly slapping the wrists of the wealthy and their henchmen (or “goons,” in Chávez’s words). The refusal to strike back when attacked, on the other hand, will convince onlookers of the nobility of poor people’s character and the justness of their position. The challenge for poor people is to have enough faith in their creativity and their ability to inspire onlookers to ward off the despondency and desperation that lead to physical violence.

The long-term goal of la Causa was economic: to overthrow “capitalism,” which Chávez saw as inherently and inevitably exploitative. The unqualified rights of property owners to use their land and tools as they wish (and, conversely, the legal helplessness of those without property) reward the ruthless and demanding boss who does not wish to spend more than the absolute minimum on his temporary employees. Consequently, Chávez questioned the wisdom of proposals for “Black capitalism” or “Brown capitalism.” Regardless of skin color, reasoned Chávez, a private capitalist will be pressured by market conditions to exploit employees. At the same time, Chávez refused to embrace socialism because of the excessive power that he believed socialists wished to place in the hands of the state. Socialism, because it innocently celebrates state intervention in human affairs, naturally becomes “totalitarian,” according to Chávez.

Towards the end of his life, Chávez began to champion what he considered to be a satisfactory “third” way of organizing modern economies. He advocated the establishment of a large cooperative sector (about 15 percent of all firms) in every capitalist economy. Private businesses owned and managed by the workers themselves would, Chávez argued, lead to increased enthusiasm among employees and, therefore, increased productivity. Challenged by the efficiency of producer cooperatives, traditional capitalist firms would be pressured by their competitors into treating their workers better. Shortly before his death, Chávez visited Spain to observe the Mondragon collection of cooperatives, which he believed illustrated the feasibility of a coop-based capitalist economy.

Criticisms

Chávez has become an icon on the American left partly because of his deep and unwavering commitment to improving the lot of the poor, as evidenced in a number of physical and economic sacrifices, including his jailing. In addition, he successfully organized California’s migrant farm workers – a population that previously had been immune from labor organization.

Nonetheless, some American progressive, rebel, and radical writers and activists criticize aspects of Chávez’s program and behavior. Some former UFW activists, for example, argue that Chávez’s “non-violent” theory about the virtues of grassroots democracy was superficial and weak. Allegedly, he refused to hold elections for key leadership posts within the UFW and instead personally appointed officials who were devoted first and foremost to him. He also, some say, used gestures, symbols, and slogans to inhibit critical thinking and promote conformity at the grassroots.

Some proponents of Latino politics have expressed unease with Chávez’s relative indifference, if not hostility, to identity politics. As mentioned before, Chávez argued that many proponents of La Raza and Brown Capitalism in fact buttressed the power of the wealthy. In addition, UFW officials, trying to secure jobs for their members, sometimes have helped US immigration officials identify and expel illegal immigrant workers, episodes that do not sit well with most activists committed to international solidarity.

Finally, Chávez's passion for cooperatives (especially when combined with his profound distrust of government leaders and state initiatives) arguably reflects a romantic, frictionless syndicalism that exaggerates the absence of exploitation and inequalities within modern working classes. Chávez seems to have been either unaware of, or indifferent to, the criticisms of the internal workings of the Mondragon cooperatives (such as the poor treatment of temporary workers, who are not given the rights of full-time cooperative members) that have been made by Iberian trade unionists and Spain's socialist and communist parties. Conversely, distrusting almost all government leaders and suspecting their hidden agendas, Chávez may have unnecessarily discounted the potential of states to help the poor in modern capitalist societies.

SEE ALSO: Alinsky, Saul (1909–1972) and the Industrial Areas Foundation; Day, Dorothy (1897–1980); Farm Labor Organizing Committee; Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand (1869–1948); Huerta, Dolores (b. 1930); King, Martin Luther, Jr. (1929–1968) and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC); Mondragón Collective

References and Suggested Readings

- Bardacke, F. (2002) César's Ghost: Decline and Fall of the UFW. In R. W. Etulain (Ed.), César Chávez: A Brief Biography with Documents. Boston: St. Martin's.
- Dunne, J. G. (2008) Delano: The Story of the California Grape Strike. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Etulain, R. W. (Ed.) (2002) César Chávez: A Brief Biography with Documents. Boston: St. Martin's.
- Jenkins, J. C. (1999) The Transformation of a Constituency into a Social Movement Revisited: Farmworker Organizing in California. In J. Freeman & V. Johnson (Eds.), Waves of Protest: Social Movements Since the Sixties. London: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Ley, J. E. (2007) César Chávez: Autobiography of La Causa. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Meister, D. & Loftis, A. (1977) A Long Time Coming: The Struggle to Unionize America's Farm Workers. New York: Macmillan.
- Mendel-Reyes, M. (1995) Reclaiming Democracy: The Sixties in Politics and Memory. New York: Routledge.
- Mooney, P. H. & Majka, T. J. (1995) Farmers' and Farm Workers' Movements: Social Protest in American Agriculture. New York: Twayne.

Chávez, Hugo (b. 1954)

Christoph Twickel

On December 17, 1982, under a historic Samán tree in Maracay where Simón Bolívar used to spend shady hours, that Hugo Chávez made his first revolutionary promise, swearing to three fellow officers “my arm will not rest nor will my soul find peace until the chains are disrupted that hold us prisoners.” After this pledge, inspired by Bolívar's “juramento de Monte Sacre” from 1805, the four young officers, all members of a parachutist regiment, founded the Ejército Bolivariano Revolucionario 200 (EBR-200), a clandestine cell within the Venezuelan army. This step toward conspiratorial political work marked the beginning of a political career that led Hugo Rafael Chávez Frías, the son of poor teachers from the Venezuelan Llanos, to the presidency and made him the leader of the Bolivarian Revolution.

Hugo Chávez was born on July 28, 1954 in a palm-leaf cabana in the small town of Sabanetas. His family moved to Barinas when Chávez was of high school age, and there he befriended the two sons of a historian and member of the communist party named Esteban Ruiz Guevara. It was in the library of the former political prisoner Ruiz Guevara where Chávez first read not only classic socialist literature – from Marx and Engels to Lenin – but also the writings of Simón Bolívar and Bolívar's teacher Simón Rodríguez. There he also learned about the life and times of Ezequiel Zamora, an anti-oligarchic general in the Venezuelan civil war of 1859.

Aiming at a career as a baseball pitcher, the 17-year-old Chávez joined the military academy in Caracas, where within a year his interest had shifted completely from baseball to the history of Venezuela's independence wars, which he investigated intensively in the libraries. The class of 1974, to which he belonged, was the first one studying not only in the military academy but also at the civil university. Thus, Chávez and his fellow cadets, many of whom became ministers

Hugo Chávez surrenders on television after a failed coup attempt on February 4, 1992. Chávez and the group he founded, Movimiento Bolivariano Revolucionario 200 (MBR-200), had planned the coup in response to popular dissatisfaction and economic decline following the International Monetary Fund structural adjustment programs implemented by then president Carlos Andrés Pérez. During this television appearance, Chávez famously remarked that he had only failed por ahora ("for the moment"). (Ali Gomez/AP/PA Photos) in the Bolivarian government, must be seen as a new generation within the military.

During the 1980s Chávez, in search of a revolutionary civilian-military pact, met with key figures of the left, such as Alfredo Maneiro, founder of Causa Radical. His elder brother Adán Chávez, member of the illegal Partido Revolucionario de Venezuela (PRV), convinced him to team up with PRV leader and legendary guerilla Douglas Bravo. Bravo knew that it was impossible for a civilian-military pact to build on socialist ideologues like Karl Marx because of the powerful anti-communist tradition within the Venezuelan army, in those days still strongly influenced by the Cold War military doctrine of the US. So Bravo introduced Chávez to a progressive, left-wing reinterpretation of Venezuelan independence heroes.

The so-called árbol de los tres raíces (Tree of three roots), founded in the supposedly revolutionary thinking of Simón Bolívar, Simón Rodríguez, and Ezequiel Zamora, became the ideological foundation of the neo-Bolivarian movement fronted by the PRV and the Chávez cell within the army. Bolívar stood for gran patria, Latin American integration. Rodríguez stood for liberation from colonialism through education, and Zamora was the reference figure for land reform and anti-oligarchism.

Chávez first gained public attention as the leader of a failed military coup against the government of the social-democrat president Carlos Andrés Pérez on February 4, 1992. It was not at all obvious whether the charismatic 37-year-old parachutist was a leftist revolutionary or a nationalist caudillo. Andrés Pérez called him the head of a fascist coup, but among the people living in the poor barrios (shantytowns) of Caracas, the young lieutenant, obviously not part of the higher army hierarchy, was hailed as a rebel against the corrupt and elitist regime of the Punto Fijo pact of the social democratic AD and the Christian democratic COPEI, signed in 1958 and installing a formal parliamentary democracy totally controlled by the two parties. When oil prices went down in the 1980s and Venezuela faced a financial breakdown, this two-party system showed its brutal face. On February 27, 1989, following a government agreement with the IMF on economic shock therapy, a spontaneous uprising known as El Caracazo in Caracas and other cities led to a massacre. Repressive forces killed thousands of people. The massacre was a turning point for Chávez's conspiratory movement within the army, and the young officers decided to organize their military rebellion as soon as possible.

When he was freed in March 1994 after only 782 days of prison, Chávez had already changed the face of Venezuelan politics. Denominated "the imprisoned candidate of the people" by left-wing groups in the presidential election of 1993, he was constantly visited by intellectuals, political leaders, and activists. Out of prison, Chávez began to regroup the MBR-200 as a revolutionary organization and to conquer Venezuela by car. The men who joined him were of great political diversity, ranging from radical-left perspectives to extreme militarism. The group embarked upon a political tour de force in a black Toyota Samurai, with Chávez giving speeches in little towns throughout the country, sharpening his rhetorical skills, and showing an exceptional talent in relating to the poor people, their needs and worries. However, the tour became a political failure. The MBR-200 was persecuted by the secret police (DISIP) and the military police (DIM). People were restrained from joining its gatherings, and although there was much sympathy for its leader, MBR-200 remained marginalized.

In 1996 Chávez made a political turnaround, remodeling the MBR-200 from a semi-conspiratorial group aimed at taking power by revolutionary force into a party that would take part in the elections in 1998. Although there was strong radical-left opposition against the parliamentarization of the movement, in 1997 the MBR-200 renamed itself Movimiento Quinta República (MVR) and registered for the presidential elections with Chávez as the candidate. It was at this point that Chávez gained the support of influential circles of the Venezuelan establishment that disagreed with the neoliberal project of President Rafael Caldera. Under advice from businessman and spin doctor Luis Miquilena, Chávez climbed in the polls. And the marriage with blonde TV anchorwoman Marisabel Rodríguez Oropeza won him further votes.

On December 6, 1998 Chávez, candidate of a broad alliance of parties named Polo Patriótico, won the presidential elections with 56.2 percent of the vote. When he took office on February 2, 1999 he introduced himself as a reformer and a reliable partner, ready to make friends with everybody, from Fidel Castro, to Pope John Paul, to British Prime Minister Tony Blair.

The Chávez of the late 1990s was a man in search of an ideology. In the early speeches there are traces of traditional Latin American developmentalism, of social democratic reformism, and of a nationalist, anti-corruption attitude. Critics also point at the influence of Norberto Ceresole, a right-wing Peronist who became adviser to Chávez during this period and wrote a tailor-made, proto-fascist essay “Caudillo, ejército, pueblo,” which suggested replacing democracy with a regime based on a military junta plus direct acclamation from the masses. After Ceresole openly admitted anti-Semitism, he was fired from his job and expelled from the country.

Despite the ideological diversity, there was one clear hint that Chávez was a man of the left – his first official act after being sworn in as president was to decree a referendum for a new constitution, the main election pledge of the Polo Patriótico. The constitutional assembly that convened on August 3, 1999 for the first time did not comply with the original radical leftist idea of a Soviet-based constitutional process, but it gave birth to a broad discussion that engaged all sectors of society. The new constitution of March 2000, gender balanced and conceding dozens of new forms of civil participation, became the main foundation for “Chavismo.”

While Chávez gained popularity among poor people, middle- and upper-class Venezuelans began to feel more and more uncomfortable with his reformatory politics. An agrarian reform, the readjustment of duties and taxes for the petroleum sector, and an educational reform provoked protests and demonstrations in the white-collar areas of Caracas during the years 2000 and 2001. Because the traditional parties had lost credibility, the private media – four national TV stations and the national newspapers – assumed the role of a political opposition. The consequence was a constant media war with anti-Chávez news and propaganda, answered by the president with a growing number of “cadenas,” chain-switched proclamations that intercepted the program.

In April 2002 a plot of mass-media owners, generals, and politicians escalated the situation. Following a general strike, the opposition mobilized for a mass demonstration in Caracas on April 11. When the demonstrators marched upon the presidential palace of Miraflores, snipers fired from the roofs, killing and injuring two dozen protesters and Chávez-followers. The killings were then attributed to a group of activists from the so-called Bolivarian Circles, a Chavista mass organization.

A group of high-ranking military withdrew their support for the president and ordered tanks and helicopters to surround Miraflores, putting pressure on Chávez to resign. He refused, but agreed to be taken away from the presidential palace in the early hours of April 12. That afternoon Pedro Carmona Estanga, president of the employer’s association, declared himself president and dissolved the National Assembly and the High Court. The private TV stations hailed the putsch and the US Bellsouth-Telcel put up a full-page ad, saying: “Telcel is celebrating freedom with all of Venezuela.”

But a massive mobilization of Chávez’s followers from the barrios of Caracas and other cities, and a spontaneous counter-putsch planned by lower-ranking officers, finally drove away the coup-government in the afternoon of April 13. Chávez, held prisoner on the small Caribbean island La Orchila, was brought back by helicopter in the early morning of April 14 and instantly reinstated as president.

The failed coup in April 2002, logistically and diplomatically supported by the US government, became a highly significant episode in Chávez's Bolivarian Revolution. First, it exposed the Chavista multitude from the poor barrios as the subjects of revolutionary sovereignty. It was they who had forced the illegitimate Junta out of the presidential palace. Second, it had neutralized many of his opponents within the military ranks. That is why the next oppositional strike took place on the economic battlefield when in December 2002 most of the administration and data-processing offices of the national oil company Petróleos de Venezuela S.A. (PdVSA) went on strike for almost two months. During the 1990s the PdVSA management had outsourced and privatized more and more services and did not adhere to OPEC quotas, resulting in a massive downfall of prices during this decade. Plus, it had deprived the nation of a good part of its income, reinvesting the petrodollars outside Venezuela. With the strike against Chávez, the oil company's management tried to get rid of a government that had put a halt on this gradual privatization of Venezuelan oil and gas and the removal of PdVSA from state control.

After two months of a strike that brought Venezuela near to bankruptcy and caused impoverishment among its people, students, retired workers, and the military finally succeeded in resuming oil production and distribution. With the strike the PdVSA management had handed over the company to the control of the government – an extremely important step for Chávez, because it gave the Bolivarian Revolution a solid economic base. With PdVSA under his control and oil prices rising, Chávez was able to fund his so-called missions, which included social programs designed to improve conditions for the poor majority of the population. This included the Misión Barrio Adentro that brought more than 20,000 Cuban doctors to the poor barrios. Backed by these extremely popular programs, Chávez won election after election. The oppositional referendum in July 2004 for his dismissal was defeated by 59.1 percent of the vote. The presidential elections in 2006 resulted in a 62.84 percent vote for Chávez. And after a 2005 election boycott by the opposition parties the National Assembly fell completely into the hands of Chavistas (though in 2007 the Podemos Party shifted from pro-government to opposition).

At the 2005 World Social Forum Chávez for the first time spoke of socialism as the only way to overcome capitalism and the hegemony of the US. The centerpiece of his “socialism of the twenty-first century” became the Alternativa para la Américas (ALBA), a pan-American alliance based on solidarity and economic and political relationships, designed as the opposing model to the US-backed Free Trade of the Americas (ALCA in Spanish), which Chávez helped to bury at the Fourth International Summit of the Americas in Mar de Plata, Argentina in November 2005.

In December 2007 Chávez had to face his first major defeat in domestic policies. A constitutional referendum about institutionalizing new forms of collective property and civil participation (such as the Communal Councils) was defeated by a razor-thin majority.

Chávez's vision of la gran patria, a socially balanced integration of the Latin American nations emancipating the continent from US domination, is a distant prospect. Nevertheless, Chávez has become the key figure in the Latin American shift to the left. Not only does he represent an answer to neoliberal politics that had dominated the continent for almost five decades, pushing the reconstruction of the welfare state that has been dismantled all over Latin America in the last decades, but he also spectacularly plays the role of the enfant terrible of the global South, calling US President G. W. Bush “the devil” in front of the UN General Assembly. Last but not least, he is a politician who successfully brings politics to the common people, for example in his Sunday TV show Aló Presidente, which seldom lasts less than six hours – a mix of edutainment and government declaration. Thus, apart from being a politician, he must be seen as a people's educator: “There will be no revolution, if we do not decolonize our souls,” he said in a speech on April 30, 2008.

SEE ALSO: Bolívar, Simón (1783–1830); Chávez, Hugo and the Bolivarian Revolution, 1998–Present; Rodríguez, Simón (1769–1854); Zamora, Ezequiel (1817–1860)

References and Suggested Readings

- Blanco Muñoz, A. (1998) Habla el comandante Hugo Chávez Frías. Caracas: Fundación Catedra.
- Ceresole, N. C. (2000) Ejército, pueblo. La Venezuela del Comandante Chávez. Madrid: Al-Ándalus.
- Chávez, H. & Harnecker, M. (2002) Un hombre, un pueblo. Caracas: Entrevista.
- Denis, R. (2001) Los fabricantes de la rebellion. Movimiento popular, chavismo y sociedad en los años noventa. Caracas: Primera Línea.
- Garrido, A. (1999) Guerrilla y conspiración military en Venezuela. Caracas: Lithopolar.
- Golinger, E. (2005) El código Chávez. Decifrando la intervención de los EE.UU en Venezuela. Caracas: Fondo Editorial Question.
- Gott, R. (2000) In the Shadow of the Liberator: Hugo Chávez and the Transformation of Venezuela. London: Verso.
- Twickel, C. (2006) Hugo Chávez. Eine Biographie. Hamburg: Nautilus.

Chávez, Hugo and the Bolivarian Revolution, 1998–present

Gregory Wilpert

That Venezuelans should elect Hugo Chávez, a complete outsider, someone who only six years earlier tried to overthrow a president via a military rebellion, should not have come as much of a surprise given the political and economic crisis the country suffered. In the 20 years prior to Chávez's election, poverty had increased from 15 percent to over 60 percent, corruption was perceived to be rampant, and abstention had reached historic proportions. Chávez promised to set the country right again by promising nothing less than a revolution – a Bolivarian revolution, named after Latin American independence hero Simón Bolívar.

While Chávez initially enjoyed support from a broad segment of Venezuela's middle class and even from some of the country's elite, such as segments of its domestic business class and even from a key member of its transnational business class (Gustavo Cisneros, Latin America's media mogul), his support shifted dramatically after his first three years in office. His middle- and upper-class support rapidly turned into enmity, so that his support eventually came almost entirely from the country's urban and rural poor. The process by which this shift in support took place was the result of Chávez's rejection of the country's old elite, his identification with the country's poor, and his pursuit of policies that redistributed the country's oil wealth and political power towards the poor.

1998 Election

Chávez's promise of radical change appealed to a broad segment of Venezuela's population, including most progressive groups and social movements, leftist and even centrist political parties, and large parts of the middle and even upper class. The reason for this broad support was that the country had been undergoing a 20-year period of steep economic and political decline, which had pushed a large part of the country into poverty and had completely destroyed the old regime's legitimacy. Venezuelans thus were desperate for real change. However, to get elected, Chávez needed to form a political party. He could not directly transform his clandestine revolutionary organization that had organized the 1992 coup attempt, the MBR-200 (Movimiento Bolivariano Revolucionario-200/Bolivarian Revolutionary Movement-200) into a political party because it was a loose movement and because Venezuelan electoral law did not allow the use of the name Bolívar for political parties. Chávez's new political party was thus named the Fifth Republic Movement (Movimiento Quinta República) (MVR). The party wanted to found a fifth republic (using the Roman numeral "V") in that it counted four since Venezuela's independence and the fifth would begin with the passage of a new constitution.

Parties that ended up supporting Chávez's bid for the presidency included the PPT (Patria para Todos – Fatherland for All), MAS (Movimiento Al Socialismo – Movement Towards Socialism), Movimiento Electoral del Pueblo (Electoral Movement of the People) (MEP), Partido Comunista de Venezuela (Communist Party of Venezuela) (PCV), Bandera Roja (Red Flag), and Gente Emergente (Emergent People). Of the parties in the pro-Chávez coalition only the MVR had some centrist nationalists in it. The others were all parties with a long leftist tradition.

The 1998 presidential contest boiled down to an establishment candidate (Henrique Salas Römer), who was supported by the country's two former governing parties, the social democratic Acción Democrática and the Christian democratic Copei, and the anti-establishment candidate, Hugo Chávez. Given the country's disgust with the old political establishment, Chávez won easily, with 56.2 percent of the vote – one of the largest margins in Venezuela's history.

However, even though Chávez had a clear mandate for the task of transforming Venezuela's political system, the country's old political class, once it realized that Chávez could not be coopted, rejected Chávez as the legitimately elected president. At first, there was not much this former governing class could do, except to denounce the new president in the private mass media outlets that it controlled. Eventually, though, the opposition gained momentum and managed to destabilize the country severely in its all-out effort to oust Chávez. One can divide this battle into four distinct phases: new constitution and consolidation of power; coup attempt and Chávez's retreat; oil industry shutdown and Chávez's comeback; and recall referendum and radicalization.

1999 Constitution and Consolidation of Power

Chávez's landslide election, with crucial support from segments of Venezuela's middle and upper classes, gave him a mandate to convoke a constitutional assembly and to introduce far-reaching changes to Venezuela's political system. At first, those segments of the upper class that supported Chávez assumed he would be just like many politicians before him and would agree to do their bidding by appointing ministers out of their ranks. They presented him with a list of possible appointees, all of which came from the upper ranks of the country's business and media elite. Chávez rejected all of their suggestions and thus the stage was set for confrontation. Chávez proceeded with his plan to convoke a referendum on whether the country should hold a constitutional assembly. Voters easily approved the project. Next, a vote was held for who should constitute this assembly. Still riding his wave of popularity, Chávez won this vote overwhelmingly when 95 percent of the assembly members who were elected were supporters of his. Following a relatively accelerated discussion process, the new constitution was put to a vote in December 1999, when it passed with 72 percent in its favor. With the new constitution in place, all elected offices had to be renewed in August 2000. In the National Assembly election the pro-Chávez coalition won two-thirds of the seats, with Chávez's own party, the MVR, winning just under an absolute majority. Also, in the regional elections for state governors and city mayors, Chávez supporters won a majority. Chávez was also reelected, this time to a six-year term, winning 59 percent of the vote.

The new 1999 constitution introduced many important changes to Venezuela's political system. One of its main objectives was to create a democracy that was both representative and participatory. The participatory elements included the possibility of organizing citizen-initiated referenda to recall any elected official, to rescind or approve laws, and to consult the population on important policy issues. Also, the new constitution opened up the possibility of forms of direct democracy at the local level, via local planning councils and citizen assemblies, which would later become the basis for the creation of communal councils. Another key objective of the 1999 constitution was to include previously marginalized segments of the population, such as the country's indigenous population, which received a series of new rights to their lands, culture, and language, and Venezuelan women, who received rights to non-discrimination and to affirmative action in all governmental programs. Also, in terms of human rights, the new constitution gives constitutional rank to all international human rights treaties. Another important change includes the creation of two new independent branches of government, the electoral power and the "citizen" power, which includes the attorney general, comptroller general, and human rights ombudsperson. The new constitution's most controversial aspect was that it slightly strengthened the office of the president by increasing the term in office from five to six years, allowing for one immediate reelection, and by giving the president stronger control over the military by allowing him or her to make all upper-level promotions. Finally, in an important departure from most constitutions in the world, it raises the state's commitment to achieve social justice to the same level as the state's commitment to the rule of law (article 2).

By winning the so-called "mega-elections" of August 2000, Chávez consolidated his control over the country's executive, with his supporters controlling the other four branches of government:

the judiciary, the legislature, the electoral power, and the “citizen” power. Chávez then had to act fast to introduce social programs to address some of the most urgent needs of the country’s poor. Since state revenues were quite low, largely due to an oil price that had hit rock-bottom in 1998 at around $10 per barrel, Chávez immediately set about reconsolidating OPEC, so as to raise international oil prices. Chávez visited all OPEC members in 1999, plus several non-OPEC oil producers, and managed to convince them to lower oil production. The result was immediate and prices started to climb again. However, in order to save money, Chávez also got the military involved in the organization and provision of a new social program known as Plan Bolívar 2000. This plan provided free food in the country’s poorest neighborhoods and improved barrio housing, among other issues.

Meanwhile, the opposition, since it was increasingly locked out of political power for the first time in 40 years, still could not accept Chávez as the legitimately elected president. At first, given Chávez’s political momentum, there was little the opposition could do to stop him. However, as Chávez’s honeymoon began to wear off and his approval ratings started to go down – as they had to – from the unheard of heights of 90 percent approval, the former political class managed to regain its foothold in Venezuela’s middle class by waging a relentless media campaign against the new president. Chávez ignored this development, which took place throughout 2001, and forged ahead with his larger political program by presenting a set of 49 law decrees in October of that year, which Venezuela’s National Assembly had in the previous year given him the authority to pass. The 49 law decrees were supposed to bring Venezuela’s legal framework up to date with the new constitution and introduced far-reaching reforms, particularly in terms of a comprehensive land reform and large tax increases for the oil industry.

Heightened Resistance, Coup Attempt, and Retreat

The outcry against these law decrees was immediate. Fedecamaras, the country’s largest and most important chamber of commerce, which unites most of Venezuela’s big businesses, complained that the laws were anti-business, undermined private property rights, and were passed without consulting them or anyone outside of government circles. Venezuela’s main union federation, the Confederation of Venezuelan Workers (CTV), quickly supported Fedecamaras, arguing that the laws were harmful to Venezuela’s business community and therefore harmful to Venezuelan workers. A more likely explanation for the CTV’s support, in addition to its ties to the former governing party AD, was that the CTV had just gone through a pitched battle with the government over who would control the organization. A month earlier Chávez had forced the CTV leadership to submit itself to a grassroots vote, which the federation’s old established leadership won amid Chávez supporters’ claims of fraud, resulting in the government’s non-recognition of the leadership. The result of this vehement CTV/Fedecamaras opposition to the government was that the two organizations called for a general strike on December 10, 2001. The strike met with moderate success, but the private media’s bias and the private sector’s lockout of employees for a day gave the strike a heightened visible effect.

But it was not only the package of 49 laws that added fire to Venezuela’s conflict. Another crucial factor was that the economy abruptly slowed down in the wake of the September 11 terrorist attack on the US. The attack sparked a worldwide recession and with it a drop in the price of oil. This double blow forced the government to adjust its budget and cut back spending in all areas by at least 10 percent, meaning that Plan Bolívar 2000 had to be abandoned, among other things. The impact was almost immediately noticeable, as unemployment and poverty began inching upwards again after they had declined in 2000 and 2001.

Meanwhile, there was an escalation of verbal attacks between Chávez and the opposition. The economic downturn, the 49 laws, and Chávez’s strongly worded discourse against the “squalid opposition” and the “rancid oligarchy” all made it relatively easy for the opposition to chip away at Chávez’s popularity, along with substantial help from the private mass media. Opposition opinion polls indicated that Chávez’s popularity declined rapidly in this period, from a popularity rating of around 60–70 percent to 30–40 percent between June 2001 and January 2002.

This was the context in which the opposition became convinced that it could oust Chávez – whose legitimacy it never truly accepted – before the end of his presidency. Three specific attempts took place between January 2002 and August 2004. The first was the April 2002 coup attempt, whose apparent detonator was the oil industry management's resistance to Chávez's efforts to wrestle control of the state-owned oil industry away from the old management. Crucial to the coup, however, was a disgruntled sector of the military that, for a variety of ideological and opportunistic reasons, believed it could and should get rid of Chávez. The failure of the coup, a mere 47 hours after Chávez was removed from office, was emblematic of all subsequent opposition failures to oust Chávez from the presidency. The opposition consistently underestimated the president's popularity – especially among the poor – believing instead the mass media's constant claim that Chávez was highly unpopular and incapable as president. It was precisely Chávez's popularity among the country's poor and the military that swept him back into the presidency.

For the opposition this was a bitter defeat because it lost an important base of its power: the military. With Chávez's election, the country's old elite had already lost the presidency, which in Venezuela's very presidentialist society is by far the most important form of political power. Each subsequent effort to oust Chávez, the oil industry shutdown and the recall referendum, represented the loss of another base of opposition power.

Chávez's reaction to the coup attempt, after his return, was to moderate his tone and to play it safe. He put a new economic team in charge that appeared to move to the mainstream and promised to include the opposition more in his policy deliberations. Also, he reinstated the old board of directors and former managers of the state oil company PDVSA, whose replacement had been one of the reasons for the coup.

Oil Industry Shutdown and Chávez's Comeback

Following a brief period of uncertain calm and few policy initiatives, the opposition interpreted Chávez's retreat as an opportunity for another offensive against him, this time by organizing an indefinite shutdown of the country's all-important oil industry in early December 2002. While the opposition labeled this action a general strike, it actually was a combination of management lockout, administrative and professional employee strike, and general sabotage. Also, it was mostly the US fast food franchises and the upscale shopping malls that were closed for about two months. The rest of the country operated more or less normally during this time, except for food and gasoline shortages throughout the country, mostly because many distribution centers were closed down. Eventually, the shutdown was defeated, once again due to the opposition's underestimation of Chávez's support. While about 19,000 employees (about half of the oil company's workforce) were eventually fired for abandoning their workplaces, the government managed nonetheless to restart the oil company with the help of blue collar workers, retired workers, foreign contractors, and the military. The opposition thus lost another crucial base of power, this time in the oil industry, whose managers were practically all opposition supporters and were all removed from their jobs.

Despite the oil industry's eventual recovery, the strike represented a severe blow to Venezuela's economy, which shrank an unprecedented 26 percent in the first quarter of 2003, relative to the same quarter of the previous year. Unemployment skyrocketed to over 22 percent in March and capital flight caused the currency to plummet. It is estimated that the oil industry shutdown cost the industry over $14 billion in lost revenues. The oil industry's recovery – which was said to be complete by May 2003 – along with a dramatically increasing price of oil and thus oil revenues, meant that Chávez gradually had the resources to introduce new social programs, called missions, to address the desperate needs of the country's poor. The first missions Chávez introduced between late 2003 and early 2004 were for literacy training (Mission Robinson), high school completion (Mission Ribas), university scholarships (Mission Sucre), community healthcare (Mission Barrio Adentro), and subsidized food markets (Mission Mercal). The population living in the barrios welcomed these missions with great enthusiasm, contributing to Chávez's renewed rise in opinion polls.

Recall Referendum and Radicalization

The third and last attempt to oust Chávez during his first full six-year term in office was the August 2004 recall referendum. After having suffered defeat in two consecutive illegal attempts, the opposition was forced to follow the only democratic and constitutional route for getting rid of the president. The commitment to follow a strictly constitutional route for resolving Venezuela's political crisis was formalized following many months of negotiations in a signed agreement between opposition and government that the Organization of American States and the Carter Center facilitated in May 2003. Eventually, once the National Electoral Council (CNE) and the rules governing recall referenda were in place, which took until the end of 2003, the opposition collected 3.1 million signatures in December of that year. Of these, following much political debate, 2.5 million signatures were validated – a mere 100,000 over the required sum of 20 percent of registered voters – and a referendum was convoked for August 15, 2004. The vote took place peacefully and the following morning, shortly after 4 a.m. on August 16, the CNE announced the first preliminary results of the referendum, giving Chávez a 58 percent to 42 percent victory. Immediately after the announcement, opposition leaders held a press conference in which they stated unequivocally that fraud had been perpetrated. They offered no evidence for this claim, however. Election observer missions of the Organization of American States and of the Carter Center ratified the official result.

For the opposition, this was perhaps the most bitter defeat of them all. Not only did it no longer have a base of power in the executive, in the military, or in the oil industry, it had also lost perhaps its most important base of power in the middle class. That is, following three years of continuous battle with Chávez, promising its supporters that he was on his way out and that Chávez was illegitimate because the opposition represented the majority, opposition supporters increasingly saw their leadership as being hollow and incompetent. Polls shortly after the recall referendum documented a dramatic loss of support for the opposition, so that only 15 percent of Venezuelans said they identified with the opposition.

While the opposition leadership managed to win over and then gradually lose middle-class support, between 1999 and 2006 Chávez won over ever more solid support from the country's poor. This can be seen most clearly in the voting pattern of different neighborhoods with different average incomes. For example, while middle-class neighborhoods voted for Chávez by around 50–60 percent in 1998; for the 2004 recall referendum these neighborhoods tended to vote against him at a rate of 60–70 percent. In contrast, although support for Chávez in poor neighborhoods remained in the range of 60–70 percent in 1998 and 2004, voter registration and participation increased dramatically in these neighborhoods, thus giving Chávez a decisive edge in 2004 and 2006.

Chávez and the Bolivarian movement that supported him realized the near total loss of opposition power and thus saw themselves in a position to further radicalize the government's political program. In his victory speech following the recall referendum, Chávez announced that a new phase of his government would begin. "From today until December 2006 begins a new phase of the Bolivarian revolution, to give continuity to the social missions, to the struggle against injustice, exclusion, and poverty. I invite all, including the opposition, to join in the work to make Venezuela a country of justice, with the rule of law and with social justice." Later, in January 2005, Chávez took this call for a new phase even further by announcing that from now on his government would seek to build socialism of the twenty-first century in Venezuela. Thus, the continuous efforts of the opposition to oust Chávez, based on its non-recognition of his legitimacy, led to a continuous weakening of this opposition and to the concomitant opportunity for Chávez and the Bolivarian movement to radicalize their program.

The main expression this radicalization found during this period was in the creation of a nationwide effort to develop communal councils. These councils, which were first launched in early 2005, are constituted by 200 to 400 families in a contiguous neighborhood. They represented an effort to deepen participatory democracy by giving them power and funds to decide on important infrastructure projects in their neighborhoods. Also, these councils represented a pooling of grassroots mobilizing that had taken place over the previous five years, whereby communities founded health committees to work with the community health program, water committees to work on improving the water supply, urban land committees to work on acquiring ownership title to barrio homes, and education committees to work with educational missions, etc. With the creation of communal councils all these committees were turned into work committees of the councils, thereby pooling and systematizing community organizing. While the opposition decried the communal councils as tools of patronage and clientelism, the communities themselves largely welcomed them enthusiastically and formed over 20,000 throughout the country by late 2007.

Chávez's call to build twenty-first-century socialism received another boost on December 3, 2006 when he decisively won a second six-year term. Chávez beat the opposition candidate Manuel Rosales with 62.9 percent to 37.9 percent. This 26 percentage point margin of victory was the largest in Venezuelan history. Also, Chávez managed to nearly double his support from an initial 3.7 million votes in 1998 to 7.1 million in 2006. More significant than the increase in support, though, was that Rosales admitted that Chávez defeated him. This was the first time that an opposition leader conceded defeat in a confrontation with Chávez since he was first elected in 1998. In none of the opposition's confrontations with Chávez, whether following the 2002 coup attempt, the 2003 oil industry shutdown, or the 2004 recall referendum, did the opposition admit defeat. This implies that the 2006 presidential election was the first time in Chávez's presidency that the opposition recognized Chávez as the legitimately elected president and thus opened the path towards a normalization of Venezuelan politics in the Chávez era.

Hubris and Renewal of the Bolivarian Movement

At the start of his second term in office in January 2007 Chávez seemed unstoppable. His popularity had reached new highs and his mandate to create twenty-first-century socialism for Venezuela was indisputable. The first thing Chávez announced after his reelection victory was the creation of a new political party for socialism, the reform of the 1999 constitution, a new enabling law that would allow him to nationalize key industries, the politico-territorial reorganization of the country, and the deepening of communal power.

When the broadcast license of the oppositional TV station RCTV was up for renewal on May 27, 2007, Chávez decided to let the license lapse and to give the wavelength to a new state TV channel. This was perhaps Chávez's most unpopular decision of his presidency, since RCTV was the country's most widely watched TV station. However, Chávez and his supporters argued that since RCTV participated in the April 2002 coup attempt and since it continued to violate broadcast regulations, it did not deserve to have its license renewed. This move gave the opposition an opening to launch a new movement against Chávez, this time, though, headed by new student leaders mostly coming from the country's private universities.

Many of the other changes Chávez had announced for 2007 depended on the constitutional reform effort, which he presented in August of that year. The National Assembly, which had to pass the president's proposal before it could be put to a national referendum, added another 36 articles to be reformed to Chávez's original proposal of 33 articles. The reform was to address four major areas: strengthening participatory democracy, broadening social inclusion, supporting non-neoliberal economic development, and strengthening central government. The first two of these were relatively uncontroversial, but the second two, which included shortening the working week, strengthening land reform, removing central bank autonomy, and removing the two-term limit on holding presidential office, were far more controversial.

The combination of the reform's top-down development, its complexity, well-orchestrated disinformation by the opposition, the government's neglect of key social programs, and the defection of prominent Chávez supporters all contributed to the referendum's eventual failure, despite Chávez's continuing popularity. The reform was defeated with a vote of only 50.7 percent against it, but it was generally interpreted as a major loss for Chávez and the Bolivarian movement. Based on an analysis of the referendum results by voting center, it was clear that the main reason the referendum failed was because Chávez's supporters did not turn out to vote as strongly as they did in previous elections. The result prompted Chávez to launch a process of "reevaluation, revision, and relaunch" of the effort to establish twenty-first-century socialism.

The demise of the constitutional reform project took place in parallel to the effort to start a new party, the Unified Socialist Party of Venezuela (PSUV), which brought together supporters from all parties of the pro-Chávez coalition. By April 2008 PSUV delegates, who had been elected in a grassroots democratic process, approved of an explicitly anti-capitalist party program and a new leadership for the Bolivarian movement that came mostly from the country's traditional left (between the center left and the far left). With the formation of the PSUV it seemed that the Bolivarian movement was gradually developing a structure that would be less dependent on Chávez and thus more long lasting and better equipped to develop new leadership and to channel debate within the movement.

SEE ALSO: Bolívar, Simón (1783–1830); Bolivarianism, Venezuela; Venezuela, Exclusionary Democracy and Resistance, 1958–1998

References and Suggested Readings

- Ellner, S. (2008) Rethinking Venezuelan Politics: Class, Conflict, and the Chávez Phenomenon. Boulder: Lynne Rienner.
- Ellner, S. & Hellinger, D. (Eds.) (2003) Venezuelan Politics in the Chávez Era: Class, Polarization, and Conflict. Boulder: Lynne Rienner.
- Ellner, S. & Tinker Salas, M. (Eds.) (2007) Venezuela: Hugo Chávez and the Decline of an "Exceptional Democracy". Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Gott, R. (2005) Hugo Chávez and the Bolivarian Revolution. New York: Verso.
- Jones, B. (2007) Hugo! The Hugo Chávez Story from Mud Hut to Perpetual Revolution. Hanover, NH: Steerforth Press.
- Raby, D. L. (2006) Democracy and Revolution: Latin America and Socialism Today. London: Pluto Press.
- Wilpert, G. (2007) Changing Venezuela by Taking Power: The History and Policies of the Chávez Government. New York: Verso.

Chen Duxiu (1879–1942)

Alexander V. Pantsov

If there is one individual who deserves to be remembered as the “father of Chinese Communism” it is not Mao Zedong but Chen Duxiu. And yet in China and elsewhere Chen Duxiu's name has been all but forgotten. The obscurity of Chen's historical reputation is not accidental. His leading role in the origins of the political party that came to power in China in 1949 was deliberately erased from the standard history books in a concerted effort by Mao Zedong and his minions.

Chen Duxiu, whose real name was Chen Qiansheng, was one of the founders of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) and its earliest leader. He was born at Huaining (now Anqing), capital of Anhui Province, into a moderately wealthy middle-class family and received a classical Chinese education. He also attended lectures at various modern schools in China and Japan. In Tokyo in 1902, together with Zhang Ji and Feng Ziyou, who later rose to prominence in the Guomindang (Nationalist Party), Chen organized the Chinese Youth Society to promote the National revolution. Returning to China the next year, he engaged in intense revolutionary activity and participated in establishing progressive newspapers and magazines in Shanghai as well as Anhui.

Following the anti-monarchical Chinese Nationalist Revolution of 1911–12, Chen served as head of the secretariat of the new revolutionary provincial government in Anhui. In the summer of 1915, in Shanghai's foreign settlement, he founded the journal Qingnian (Youth), later renamed Xin qingnian (New Youth). This journal quickly became one of the most influential forces in promoting western-style concepts such as democracy, humanism, and scientific methods. Such was the origin of Chen Duxiu's seminal campaign for a new culture to replace the “Confucian Family Shop,” as he contemptuously described China's traditional Confucian ethos. This campaign stimulated China's new-style intelligentsia to search for new theories and concepts with which to resolve China's continuing economic, political, and social crisis. Xin qingnian also played a vital role in promoting the replacement of China's archaic classical language with a literary form of the vernacular in education, literature, and the press.

In 1917 Chen was invited to become the dean of Beijing University's Faculty of Letters, a post he occupied until 1919. In Beijing, along with Cai Yuanpei, the university's president, and Professors Li Dazhao and Hu Shi, Chen initiated and led the May 4th movement of 1919. The political content of this activity was anti-imperialist, and aimed at combating Japan's occupation of Chinese territories and the West's collusion with that occupation. The May 4th movement also opposed the reactionary Beijing warlord regime that had failed to resist Japan's encroachments. Because of his role in the movement, Chen was arrested and jailed for 83 days. Upon his release, he left Beijing for Shanghai.

During the May 4th movement, workers entered upon the stage of Chinese politics for the first time. This action alerted Chen Duxiu to the Marxist tenet that workers play a vital historical role in world progress. In April 1920, shortly after the May 4th movement, Grigorii Voitinsky (Zarkhin), a Russian Jew who was the special envoy of the Vladivostok department of the Far Eastern Bureau of the Russian Communist Party, arrived in China. His special mission was to make contact with radical democrats and help them to create Marxist “nuclei” (small leadership groups with the goal of developing mass movements). Voitinsky met Chen Duxiu and in the summer of 1920 helped him establish the Shanghai Marxist nucleus, which was the first such organization in China. Xin qingnian became the chief voice of these Marxist groups. In late July and early August 1921 representatives of various Chinese Marxist organizations assembled in Shanghai to hold the inaugural congress of the CCP, at which Chen Duxiu was elected secretary of the party’s central bureau. (In 1922, this post was renamed “chairman,” and in 1925, “general secretary of the party’s central executive.” Chen Duxiu occupied this post until July 1927.) As the party’s central leader, he took an active part in organizing the First United Front with the Guomindang, and in the preparation and execution of the National Revolution of 1925–7.

During the revolution, as leader of the CCP Chen Duxiu was obliged to submit to Comintern discipline and to follow the Stalinist concept of the united front, which required Chinese communists to subordinate themselves to Guomindang leadership. In 1927 this policy proved disastrous, resulting in the Guomindang’s massacre of many thousands of communists. Stalin used Chen Duxiu as the scapegoat for the failure of a policy for which Stalin himself bore ultimate responsibility in designing.

In July 1927 Chen Duxiu resigned as general secretary. Unwilling to accept the role of scapegoat, he declined invitations to Moscow from the executive committee of the Comintern (ECCI). Nevertheless, the new CCP leadership as well as the ECCI launched a harsh campaign of criticism against him. In response to this challenge, in the autumn of 1929 an important group of party members gathered around Chen Duxiu, forming an internal fraction within the CCP. They denounced the increasing tendency to subordinate party policy to the state interests of the USSR, and demanded an end to the campaign of vilification waged against Chen Duxiu. In addition they called upon the party to admit the extent of the defeat suffered by the communist movement, advancing the argument that the country had entered a period of relative bourgeois stabilization. After several warnings from the new party leaders to toe the line or face the consequences, Chen and four of his closest associates were expelled from the party on November 15, 1929, a decision confirmed by the Presidium of the ECCI on December 30, 1929 and formally implemented on June 11, 1930. A number of others were expelled a month later.

Meanwhile, through some of his followers who were in touch with several of Leon Trotsky’s supporters in China, Chen Duxiu became acquainted with Trotsky’s ideas about the Chinese revolution. Contrary to Stalin, Trotsky supported the complete political independence of the CCP, emphasizing that the true aim of the communists should be to prepare the workers’ liberation. Encouraged by the Trotskyist program, on December 10, 1929 Chen Duxiu sent an open letter to all members of the party in which he exposed the Comintern’s fateful mistakes in China. Soon afterward, in early 1930, he founded the Communist Left Opposition group and began to publish a propaganda journal entitled Wuchanzhe (The Proletarian). Chen and his followers continued to denounce the Comintern and CCP leadership, and defended Trotsky’s theory of the Chinese revolution. Even though it was the largest pro-Trotskyist organization in China, Chen Duxiu’s group did not exert much influence on the revolutionary movement. This situation did not change even after the unification conference of various Chinese Trotskyists that was held in May 1931. At this conference Chen Duxiu was elected secretary of the executive committee of the merged party, which numbered just 483 members.

This small Trotskyist group existed for only a short time. By the end of 1932 all of its founding leaders were in Guomindang prisons. Chen himself was the last to be arrested, on October 15, 1932. In the spring of 1933 he was tried before the Jiangsu provincial High Court and sentenced to 15 years in prison. On August 19, 1937, just six weeks after the outbreak of war against Japan, he was paroled. Upon his release, he announced that he would not associate with any political group. He went into retirement in a small town in Sichuan Province, and devoted himself to the study of modern political science, philosophy, and ancient Chinese philology. In 1940–2 he wrote a number of papers and letters to his friends in which he expressed his deep disappointment in any kind of totalitarian dictatorship, including the proletarian one. Thus, toward the end of his life, he returned to the ideals of his youth, pointing out the significance of “eternal” principles such as democracy, humanism, and scientific methods. He died on May 27, 1942, at the age of 63. After Mao Zedong came to power his regime attempted to eradicate Chen Duxiu and the Chinese Trotskyists from historical memory, even to the extent of dynamiting his grave.

SEE ALSO: China, May 4th Movement; China, Student Protests, 20th Century; Chinese Nationalist Revolution, 1911; Marxism; Mao Zedong (1893–1976); Trotsky, Leon (1879–1940)

References and Suggested Readings

- Dangshi yanjiu ziliao* (1982) Study Materials on Party History, Vol. 2, 2nd ed. Chengdu: Sichuan renmin chubanshe, 796.
- Pantsov, A. (1996) Chen Duxiu (1879–1942). In Collier's Encyclopedia, Vol. 6. New York: P. F. Collier, pp. 180–180A.
- Reusch, J. (1977) Die Marxismus Rezeption bei Ch'en Tu-hsiu, 1879–1942. PhD dissertation, Bonn, Germany.

Chernov, Victor (1873–1952)

Sally A. Boniece

Victor Mikhailovich Chernov, co-founder and leader of the Russian Socialist Revolutionary (SR) Party from its inception in 1901 until its demise at the hands of the Bolshevik/Communist-led Soviet government in the early 1920s, drew from both Marxism and populism to advocate the union of the “toiling” classes of workers and peasants against political and economic oppression. Architect of the party's maximum and minimum programs approved at the first SR congress in early 1906, his unique contribution to Russian socialism was his emphasis on “socialization of the land,” a concept that he took care to differentiate from “nationalization of the land” as proposed by European and American agrarian reformers and as implemented by the Bolshevik/Communist Party several decades later. For Chernov, socialization meant taking the land out of commodity circulation by doing away with private ownership. The land would then belong to all of the people. His idea was quite different to nationalization, however, which called for the transfer of all land ownership to the central power.

The author of a land socialization platform that would ultimately be appropriated and corrupted by the victorious Bolshevik/Communist Party, Chernov was born the grandson of a serf in Samara province; his father, however, had advanced the family's social status through education and service in the provincial bureaucracy. He became involved in student radicalism while completing his secondary education in Saratov and led a circle of “young populists” as a law student at Moscow State University in the early 1890s. Exiled under police supervision to Tambov province in 1895, Chernov joined local intellectuals in propagandizing the ideals of Russian populism among secondary students, workers, and peasants, an experience that imbued him with a mission to focus on socialism as a movement of social justice rather than selfish economic gain. After assisting in organizing Russia's first peasant Brotherhood for the Defense of the People's Rights in Tambov, Chernov focused on establishing a national organization of like-minded populists that would coordinate propagandizing and agitation among peasants across the empire.

Having emigrated to Europe to avoid imprisonment by the government of Tsar Nicholas II, Chernov returned to Russia after the February revolution of 1917 forced the tsar to relinquish his throne. In the summer of 1917 Chernov served as minister of agriculture in the Provisional Government of the new Russian republic; in the winter of 1917–18 he was elected chair of the All-Russian Constituent Assembly, over which he presided for a single session before it was dispersed by the Bolshevik-led government that had come to power in October.

One of the first decrees issued by the new regime guaranteed the redistribution of all the land to those who worked it; moreover, the Bolsheviks, anxious for peasant support, formed a short-lived alliance with a breakaway group of leftwing SRs who had become disenchanted with Chernov. The Bolshevik-Left SR coalition allowed the Constituent Assembly to go forward as scheduled but unsuccessfully demanded that its predominantly SR membership acknowledge the primacy of the October revolution and the government of soviets. Instead, the Constituent Assembly in its final hour under Chernov's direction passed a land socialization law that excluded the soviets from carrying out land reform.

During the civil war that followed the Soviet government's dismissal of the Constituent Assembly, Chernov proposed that the SRs lead a democratic "third force" against both the Bolshevik/Communist "Red" dictatorship in the Russian heartland and the rightwing "White" dictatorship in Siberia. While he did not recommend armed combat for his party, "Red" and "White" regimes alike considered him such a pernicious influence that he escaped capture only by leaving Russia. He lived in Prague in the 1920s and 1930s and after 1940 in the United States, where he died of pneumonia in Manhattan in 1952.

SEE ALSO: Leninist Philosophy; Marxism; Russia, Revolution of 1905–1907; Russia, Revolution of February/March 1917; Russia, Revolution of October/November 1917; Russian Civil War, 1918–1924; Stalin, Joseph (1879–1953) and "Revolution from Above"

References and Suggested Readings

- Chernov, V. (1966) The Great Russian Revolution. Trans. P. E. Mosely. New York: Russell & Russell.
- Perrie, M. (1976) The Agrarian Policy of the Russian Socialist-Revolutionary Party from Its Origins through the Revolution of 1905–1907. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Radkey, O. H. (1958) The Agrarian Foes of Bolshevism: Promise and Default of the Russian Socialist Revolutionaries, February to October 1917. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Sossinsky, S. B. (1995) Pages from the Life and Work of an SR Leader: A Reappraisal of Victor Chernov. PhD dissertation, Boston University.

Chernyshevsky, Nikolai G. (1828–1889)

Paul Le Blanc

Nikolai Gavrilovich Chernyshevsky (1828–1889) was a Russian revolutionary populist thinker, writer, and activist. Chernyshevsky's "populism" blended various elements: a commitment to Enlightenment thought; hostility to the tsarist autocracy; a desire for a democratic society and a socialist economy; a human community in which human freedom would be available to all; and a belief that the masses of Russia's people, particularly the vast laboring classes of countryside and city, must become involved in the struggle for this better future. He became a powerful influence among the Russian intelligentsia in his generation and beyond, due to his writings, his example, and his virtual martyrdom – for "the translation of Populist Socialism into active politics," historian Franco Venturi has noted, "cost Chernyshevsky his life."

Born in Saratov, a town in the lower Volga, into a family with a long tradition of producing ecclesiastics for the Russian Orthodox Church, it was initially assumed that he himself would enter the priesthood. His voraciously inquiring mind and obvious intellectual brilliance, however, drew him along more secular pathways – to literature, the natural and social sciences, philosophy, and history. In contrast to many of Russia's older, aristocratic intellectuals, Chernyshevsky was of more modest birth. He won a scholarship to attend St. Petersburg University, graduating in 1850.

While studying in Petersburg, Chernyshevsky had been radicalized by intellectual currents given special impetus by the revolutionary upsurge that swept through Europe in 1848 – particularly Hegelian philosophy and the atheist-materialist perspectives of Ludwig Feuerbach, and the utopian socialism of Robert Owen and Charles Fourier. These and other interests – for example, what became an influential orientation in the realm of aesthetics – were hardly abandoned when he returned to Saratov to take up a teaching position. From 1855 to 1862 he was a central figure in the widely read journal The Contemporary (Sovremennik), which took up a wide range of cultural, social, and political questions. Among other contributions were a critical analysis of Darwin's writings, and an engagement with the work of John Stuart Mill (whose Principles of Political Economy he translated into Russian). His greatest innovations, however, were in the realm of revolutionary political theory.

Chernyshevsky developed a more radical orientation than that represented by such figures as Herzen, but also a more systematic orientation that that of such anarchist theorists as Bakunin. In his view, the great mass of Russia's peasant toilers could be the key to the country's future – carrying out a revolution that would topple the tsarist system and creating an agrarian-based socialism based on the traditional village commune (obchchina) that – in conjunction with socialist revolutions in the more industrialized areas of Western Europe – could enable Russia to achieve a detour around what he saw as an oppressive capitalist development. While by no means a student of Karl Marx, Chernyshevsky's views did have an influence on the thinking of Marx in the 1870s, and they also helped to shape the orientation of later generations of Russian revolutionaries, including such Marxists as Vladimir Ilyich Lenin.

Chernyshevsky was arrested in 1862 on specific charges that appear to have been trumped up, although the more general accusations – that he was steeped in “extremely materialistic and socialist ideas” and was “an extremely dangerous agitator” who was “plotting to overthrow the existing order” – were true enough. Imprisoned while awaiting trial, he continued to write, including his famous novel entitled What Is To Be Done?, partially written in response to Ivan Turgenev's literary assault on Russia's revolutionaries in the novel Fathers and Sons.

Chernyshevsky's novel has been criticized for limitations of literary style and character development. Nonetheless, as intellectual historian Avrahm Yarmolinsky has noted, “it became the Bible of radical youth.” While its revolutionary message was somewhat veiled in order to avoid censorship, the censor soon caught on, and the work was banned until 1905. Yet What Is To Be Done? enjoyed a widespread clandestine circulation among those who shared its author's dream of overthrowing the existing order. (In 1902 Lenin reverently used the title of Chernyshevsky's novel for his own major political tract.) The book's heroine, Vera Pavlova – socialist, free thinker, and feminist – gently preaches her ideals but also demonstrates their positive qualities through the determined way she lives her own life. Other characters in the novel also seek to develop an understanding of the world as it is and the world as it should be, and to live their lives in a manner that can bring a transition from the one to the other. We see the consequent communes of students and intellectuals as a model of cooperative living of all of society, which will be made possible by production cooperatives providing for the lives of all the people. The paths of personal freedom and devotion to the people are inseparable from uncompromising opposition to the despotism of the tsar, the aristocrats, and the newly emerging capitalists.

Cherneshevky was condemned to 14 years' hard labor and to penal exile for the rest of his life. Amid widespread protests, the Tsar lightened the sentence. Yet he remained in the Siberian hinterland until 1883, when he was allowed to return to Saratov, his health shattered, where he died a few years later.

SEE ALSO: Herzen, Alexander Ivanovich (1812–1870); Lenin, Vladimir Ilyich (1870–1924); Marx, Karl (1818–1883)

References and Suggested Readings

- Chernyshevsky, N. G. (1989) What Is To Be Done? Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Chernyshevsky, N. G. (2002) Selected Philosophical Essays. Honolulu: University Press of the Pacific.
- Shanin, T. (Ed.) (1983) Late Marx and the Russian Road: Marx and “The Peripheries of Capitalism.” New York: Monthly Review Press.
- Venturi, F. (1983) Roots of Revolution: A History of the Populist and Socialist Movements in Nineteenth-Century Russia. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Yarmolinsky, A. (1962) Road to Revolution: A Century of Russian Radicalism. New York: Collier Books.

Chile and the peaceful road to socialism

Alan Angell

Chile was the first country in the world to elect a Marxist government. Salvador Allende became president in 1970, heading a coalition of parties, known as the Popular Unity (UP), committed to the revolutionary transformation of the economic, social, and political structure of the country. Yet it was also committed to do so within the confines of the constitutional and legal order. This unique combination of features brought widespread international attention to the country and sparked off a debate about the correct road to socialism, notably within Latin American but also in European countries with powerful left-wing parties such as France and Italy.

Yet the attempted revolution collapsed in 1973 facing hostility from the opposition right, from business sectors, from large sectors of the middle class, from the United States and, finally and decisively, the military. The international debate over the lessons of Chile preoccupied the socialist world for years after 1973, as in Chile a ruthless and repressive dictatorship embarked upon its own revolution – but one combining neoliberal economics with an authoritarian political order.

At first sight, Chile seemed an unlikely country for a revolution – whether peaceful or not. More than many European countries, Chile had a long tradition of respect for the constitution and the laws, well developed political parties of all colors, a military that last intervened in politics in the early 1930s, and regular and fair elections with rotation between the various shades of the political spectrum from a Popular Front government elected in 1938 to a right-wing businessman elected as president in 1958. Unlike neighboring Peru or Bolivia there was no ethnic majority facing entrenched discrimination, left-wing parties and unions were allowed to act freely (though not in the countryside until the 1950s), and there were no real separatist movements in the provinces.

Yet there were profound reasons for political and social discontent, and there were powerful parties and unions of the left that were prepared to act to secure a more egalitarian society. Social discontent was fueled by a combination of erratic growth with persistent inflation. Growth was lower than the Latin American average for the 1950s to the 1970s and inflation was significantly higher. All sorts of remedies were tried but the problem of inflation remained intractable and gave rise to political discontent – not least among labor as it saw incomes eroded by inflation – and a search for new solutions.

Increasing social discontent was one factor producing in the 1960s and early 1970s a massive expansion of political participation. The electorate grew from 1 million in 1958 to over 4 million by 1973. The labor movement doubled in size from 1964 to 1970, including for the first time rural unions. But not only had the working class organized. There were also powerful middle-class associations, known as the gremios (guilds) – grouping together professional occupations such as lawyers and doctors, and also the many sorts of small businesses that employed a majority of the labor force. Society became highly organized and polarized – too much so for the ability of the state to deal with the sharp increase in demands.

Chile was home to the strongest left in Latin America. The Communist Party (PC) had a strong base in the union movement, especially among the coal and copper miners, and was the largest and one of the oldest communist parties in Latin America, and with support from prominent intellectuals such as Chile's Nobel Prize winning poet, Pablo Neruda. But unusually for the continent there was an even larger and more radical socialist party (or rather parties, for splits were a recurring phenomenon). The Socialist Party (PS) has its origins in a short-lived socialist republic in 1932, was electorally stronger than the PC, had a more widespread national presence, and attracted many middle-class members. Always open to new ideological currents, it became much influenced in the 1960s by the success of the Cuban Revolution and declared its sympathy not just for revolution but for a violent revolution if necessary – but only at a theoretical level, as it took no practical steps to engage in revolutionary violence. There were smaller though influential parties even further to the left – notably the Left Revolutionary Movement (MIR) with a strong following among university students, and active leadership in the seizures of farms and the takeover of factories. The MIR was not part of the UP coalition, but gave it what it called “critical support,” and indeed supplied the bodyguards for President Allende.

The Chilean labor movement was highly politicized, with leaders elected with clear political affiliations to the two major forces on the left, but also to the radical but non-Marxist Christian Democratic Party (PDC). A major boost to the union movement came with the decision of the Christian Democratic government to allow rural trade unions to form. Levels of unionization rose and militancy increased, led by the powerful copper mining unions.

But if there was ideological fervor and increasing organization on the left, there were similar developments in the center and the right. Indeed, the prelude to Allende's election was a Christian Democratic government (1964–70) elected on a non-Marxist but very radical platform known as the Revolution in Liberty. Although this government failed in its promise to curb inflation, it oversaw a process of profound social change with a dramatic expansion in the number of unionists, an equally dramatic expansion of the movement of shanty town dwellers who began an extensive process of land seizures, and the start of the process of state takeover of the copper mines which supplied the vast majority of Chile's export revenue.

The PDC government, and then the election of an even more radical UP government in 1970, galvanized the political right. Chile was very unusual in Latin America in having a political right that commanded the support of close on a third of the electorate. Alarmed by the threat, and then by the reality, of massive land reform and factory expropriation, it abandoned commitment to the democratic process and from the first day of the Allende government sought – with help from the USA – to depose Allende and impose an authoritarian alternative.

The period preceding the 1970 elections was marred by violence. Squatters were killed in the southern town of Puerto Montt by the police. There were constant seizures of farms and factories by their workers. Even the military reflected political unease when the Tacna regiment took to the streets to protest about pay and conditions, and about the rise of the revolutionary left.

The presidential campaign of 1970 was fought between three evenly balanced movements. Former president Jorge Alessandri, candidate of the right and a prominent businessman, was the first to announce his candidacy, and seemed to take the political initiative, but he did poorly in TV programs and in the campaign. Radomiro Tomic, the candidate of the PDC, was on the left of his party. His electoral platform was as radical as that of Allende: he promised to complete the agrarian reform by expropriating all the large estates "from the Andes to the sea." Salvador Allende, a senator and at 62 the presidential candidate of his party for the fourth time, only barely received the nomination of his Socialist Party – a foretaste of the difficulties he was to have with his party when he became president.

Allende had only a narrow margin of victory over Alessandri, with a vote of 36.2 percent to 34.9 percent. Tomic was placed third with 27.8 percent. Although Congress had in the past normally ratified the candidate with the most votes, on this occasion the PDC insisted that Allende sign a statute of guarantees before they gave him their support in Congress. This was a foretaste of the political suspicion and hostility that was to come. And as a prelude to the violence that was to disfigure Chilean political life, the commander-in-chief of the armed forces, General Rene Schneider, was killed in an attempted coup by a group of the extreme right encouraged by the CIA. A capital flight heralded the difficulties that the incoming government was going to have with the business sector.

The UP took power with an ambitious program. It was going to nationalize the commanding heights of the economy, implement a massive program of income distribution, end the dominance of the large farms, transform the political system through the creation of a unicameral legislature, develop popular participation in the running of the economy and the political and legal system, and pursue an independent foreign policy. Yet all this would be achieved within the existing constitutional system: the Chilean road to socialism would be legal and peaceful.

How could this be done? The UP never clearly answered the question, not least because it was a coalition of six different parties all with their distinct ideas over tactics and strategy. Moreover, the president never really controlled his own Socialist Party, which generally advocated more radical measures than Allende thought possible. But most serious of all, the UP lacked a majority in Congress. In the Senate it had 18 seats but the opposition had 32: in the lower house it had 57 to the 93 of the opposition. The gains that the UP made in the 1973 elections only narrowly reduced the majority of the opposition.

A successful economic policy might have overcome these problems, but after a good first year, when there was idle capacity in the economy to be utilized, the deterioration set in. The government's initial action was a massive wage and salary increase – but in effect there was a wages explosion rather than redistribution in favor of the poor. There was an acceleration of land reform, important industries were nationalized (including the copper mines), and by 1971 virtually all the financial sector was under government control.

The government fell victim to international factors as the price of the major export, copper, fell sharply, and to compound the difficulties on the external front, traditional credit sources dried up, and as a result of increased living standards, the importation of food rose sharply. As workers seized factories, employers in general refused to invest. A black market grew up in response to government attempts to control the distribution of basic necessities. Daily life was a round of queuing for goods in short supply. Inflation went out of control. The opposition in Congress blocked measures for tax reform. The government's strategy had failed. The cost of ignoring short-term fiscal considerations in the interests of a long-term growth strategy based on redistribution was simply too high for a small vulnerable economy like Chile to bear. Worker pressure for higher wages was difficult for a government elected by the workers to resist, but it added to the inflationary spiral and further discouraged those private enterprises that were still functioning. There was some international help from the socialist bloc, but it came too late and was insufficient to help an economy that was already locked into a spiral of recession and inflation.

Economic collapse and political intransigence interacted and reinforced each other. The famous Chilean constitutional system proved too weak to contain political conflict in Allende's Chile. Neither government nor opposition was prepared to make concessions in order to safeguard that system. The opposition indulged in a whole series of measures designed to obstruct the executive: measures which if not illegal certainly violated the conventions of the congressional system. The government too employed measures of dubious legality. Such actions reinforced mutual suspicions and made it difficult to see any way out of the impasse.

The UP government did well at elections in 1971 and 1973, but not well enough to give it unquestioned legitimacy for its reform program. In the municipal elections of 1971 it gained 48.6 percent of the vote to the 48.2 percent for the opposition, but this was still short of a majority and in any case municipal authorities had very little political power. The congressional elections of March 1973 were also rather inconclusive. The UP gained 44.2 percent of the vote (with the socialists taking 18.4 percent and the communists 16.2 percent) and the opposition 54.2 percent (with 28.5 percent for the PDC and 21.1 percent for the far right National Party) and 1.6 percent of the votes blank or void. This result meant that if the government still lacked the moral authority to impose its program then the opposition for its part lacked the congressional two-thirds majority necessary to impeach the president. The UP considered at various times the possibility of dissolving Congress and calling for a plebiscite to support the president and allow for new congressional elections, but was never united enough to enact the proposal.

The remaining hope for a peaceful resolution was an agreement between the government and the PDC. There were always members of the PDC and always members of the government who wanted and who worked hard for an agreement. And in several cases discussions reached such a level of substantive agreement that it only needed an act of political will for the agreement to be concluded. But forces both inside the PDC and the UP were keener on confrontation than they were on agreement and they were strong enough to have their way. In the end the UP found it easier to bring the military into the Cabinet in October 1972 to deal with the so-called "bosses' strike" than it was to revive talks with the PDC.

Both government and opposition began to mobilize for political confrontation, though the government never seriously considered arming the workers, for such an action would inevitably have produced a military coup from the formidably powerful and united military. The lines of confrontation did not neatly coincide with social classes, for the opposition, especially the PDC, had strong elements of support in the working class. In the elections for the trade union confederation, the CUT, in mid-1972 the PDC took 16 percent of the vote in the blue collar unions and was front runner with 41 percent of the vote in the white collar unions. Indeed, in Santiago the PDC had most votes, with 35,000, compared with 30,000 for the communists and 25,000 for the socialists. In the countryside the PDC and the National Party had considerable support, not least among those farm workers who had benefited from the PDC reforms and did not want to lose those benefits by further reforms involving the collectivization of agriculture.

Political life became increasingly bitter and parties began to organize themselves to fight the class war. On the government side, this process was known as poder popular or people's power, and there were a whole host of organizations at the factory and communal level that demanded a share in political power. The most radical expression was the cordones industriales, the organizations of workers and squatters set up in the working-class belt that surrounded Santiago. They took shape during the bosses strike of 1972 in an effort to run industries and administer local services, and at their height counted on some 100,000 members. They were not, however, docile supporters of the government. On the contrary, they argued for an intensification of the revolutionary process just at a time when the government was trying to restrain change in the hope of restoring some degree of political and economic order. The cordones were never strong enough to launch a successful revolution, but they were strong enough to alarm the right, and to add fuel to its conviction that the only way out of the deadlock was by military coup.

As impressive as the growth of popular organizations was the parallel development of those professional associations known in Chile as the gremios. They brought together doctors, lawyers, architects, small shopkeepers, taxi drivers, small businessmen, and other non-manual workers in an impressive range of organizations dedicated to defying the UP government. In 1973 a Comando Nacional del Defensa Gremial was created to coordinate the activities of hundreds of gremios.

Although these associations enjoyed financial support from Chilean big business and the USA, it would be a mistake to see them as the pliant instruments of larger interests. The UP failed to win over the support of the middle class, in spite of Allende's insistent and consistent attempts to do so. But whatever Allende said, there was the example of factory and farm takeover, of worker indiscipline, and of economic shortages to persuade small businessmen and farmers that their real interests lay with the right. The opposition press incessantly played on these fears by drawing parallels between Chile and Castro's Cuba.

The major confrontation with these groups came in October 1972 after a proposal to increase state control over supplies to the trucking companies. The truckers went on strike and economic activity was paralyzed. There were solidarity strikes from other gremios. The armed forces were incorporated into the Cabinet and this brought the strike to an end, but it was a temporary reprieve only. The slide into anarchy continued.

With both government and opposition lined up against each other in bitter confrontation, with the economy out of control, with the commander-in-chief of the armed forces resigning after his failure to mediate, with the Church unable to bring the sides together, and with increasing violence, there was little prospect of a peaceful solution. The end came with a violent military coup on September 11, 1973, with the bombing of the presidential palace, with the death of Allende, and with the murder and imprisonment of thousands of Chileans.

It seems difficult to see how Allende could have avoided a coup. He was too weak and the opposition too strong. Allende was never in complete control of his followers and that control weakened even more as time passed. There was bitter disagreement inside the UP coalition about the right road to take and no effective mechanism for reconciling differences. As the economy deteriorated, massive mobilization in the shanty towns and factories put pressure on a government unable to meet their demands.

But as the government weakened, the opposition grew stronger. It could use its congressional strength to veto government proposals, it could mobilize support on the streets on a scale enough to worry any government, it had substantial backing from the USA, and it gained the support of the courts, which abandoned their normal political neutrality to join the call for the ousting of the president. The final blow came with the decision of the military to overthrow the government.

The UP, and indeed civilian politicians in general, tended to assume that the Chilean military was constitutional and not likely to be drawn into politics. Allende himself was scrupulous in not interfering in internal military affairs, and in paying higher salaries to the military. But the military could hardly remain indifferent to the political conflict and not long after the election groups of civilian right-wing politicians began to call on them to intervene. Once involved in the Cabinet at a result of the October 1972 conflict, it became inevitable that they would consider political solutions to the crisis. The commander-in-chief, Carlos Prats, was a loyal defender of the constitution, but he lost the confidence of the other generals, and when he resigned in August 1973, those who favored a coup were in a stronger position. Tensions between the army and the left heightened as military searches for arms in the factories led to bitter clashes, though few arms were actually found. The major plotters were the commander of the navy, Admiral Merino, and the commander of the air force, General Leigh. The newly appointed head of the army, General Augusto Pinochet, was a late and reluctant plotter, but once he signaled his support the armed forces moved with terrifying speed and ferocity to install a military government. Another utopia was eventually offered – or more accurately imposed by force – but this time the offer was to be a dramatically different combination of free market economics and political dictatorship.

It is difficult to exaggerate the impact of the failure of the UP experiment on the political consciousness of a wide variety of countries. In the European Parliament the country most debated (and condemned) for many years after 1973 was Chile. In Britain Allende's ambassador to that country, Alvaro Bunster, became the first foreigner to address the conference of the Labour Party since La Pasionaria at the time of the Spanish Civil War. In Italy analysis of the coup by the Communist Party and its intellectual leader Enrico Berlinguer led to the "historic compromise" by which the Italian CP joined the government for the first time for many years. In France the Socialist Party debated long and hard how to change its tactics after the Chilean coup. In Moscow the lesson learnt was that revolutionary transformation needed to be slower and more gradual and with the CP in the dominant role. China – and Cuba – drew the opposite lesson, arguing that the government lacked audacity and that only armed violence could achieve success against the domestic and international bourgeoisie.

But the most important lesson for Chilean politicians – though agreement was reached only in the late 1980s – was that the errors of the UP had to be avoided and that only political consensus and a market economy would produce political stability and sustained economic growth. There would be no more attempts at revolutionary transformation.

SEE ALSO: Mapuche Indian Resistance; Uruguay, Labor and Popular Movements, 1965–Present

References and Suggested Readings

- Angell, A. (1972) Politics and the Labour Movement in Chile. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Angell, A. (1991) Chile since 1958. In L. Bethell (Ed.), The Cambridge History of Latin America, Vol. 8. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

- Bitar, S. (1986) Chile: Experiment in Democracy. Philadelphia: Institute for the Study of Inter-American Issues.
- Davis, N. (1985) The Last Two Years of Allende. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Faundez, J. (1988) Marxism and Democracy in Chile: From 1932 to the Fall of Allende. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Garces, J. (1976) Allende y la Experiencia Chilena. Barcelona: Ariel.
- Valenzuela, A. (1978) The Breakdown of Democratic Regimes: Chile. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

Chile, people's power

José Molina Bravo

In Chile during the period of the People's Unity (Unidad Popular, UP) government (1970–3), people's power was conceived by revolutionary-oriented currents as the movement toward socialist transformation by self-organization, self-management, and the construction of participation and decision structures from below. It was a concept supported by mobilizations, organizations, and alliances of political parties, unions, students, community organizations, and peasants.

From the 1960s to 1970, several workers' and community organizations emerged in Chile, especially those linked to the Movement of the Revolutionary Left (MIR), founded in 1965. The most important organizations of people's power arose in poor areas of Santiago and in industries and factories. On a theoretical level, people's power complemented the analysis and interpretation of working-class reality in Chile, giving strategic direction to the programmatic proposals of the parties of the revolutionary left. Organization, party, government, and territory became part of a new political language in the midst of a situation of institutionally radicalized political conflict, which was ultimately crushed by the coup of 1973.

The traditional left, comprised mainly of the Communist Party (PC) and the Socialist Party (PS), upheld the concept of consolidating the Salvador Allende government with the support of social movements. The strategy was one of gradual reforms, with the state understood as an instrument of social change, the first step in establishing a socialist society. By contrast, the strategy of the revolutionary left was to build a parallel power to the state, in the belief that the people and their organizations had the ability to radicalize their struggles and develop their own power. According to the MIR, the alliance between workers and community organizations needed the support of student protests and direct action by peasant organizations. This period saw the formation of the Revolutionary Workers' Front (FTR), the Movement of Revolutionary Communities (MPR), the Revolutionary Students' Front (FER), and the Revolutionary Peasants' Movement (MCR).

In the 1960s, social mobilizations and protests had multiplied. Social movements pressured the state to take measures to reduce poverty, improve education and health, ameliorate working conditions, and enhance access to housing. While the UP government and the social movements linked to the traditional left mobilized for nationalization (for example of copper) and the redistribution of wealth, movements and protests linked to the revolutionary left fought for the development of socialism through the control of the productive apparatus, a new distribution of land tenure, and the state ownership of factories and industries, among other measures.

In this period of acute social conflict, political institutions were heavily criticized and lost much of their legitimacy. Broad social sectors, including the Christian Democrats, were in favor of the state and its social policies to improve general living conditions as a means of controlling social conflict. However, it proved impossible to avoid a crisis of the Chilean democratic system, considered to be one of the most stable in Latin America. This generated a growing rift between left-wing parties involved in the political system and the burgeoning movements of the revolutionary left.

The revolutionary left saw people's power as a necessary political response to the context of marginality and poverty in Chile, exacerbated by ongoing migration from rural to urban areas and the shortcomings of the national development project headed by the state. In addition, the UP project of gradual political and economic transformation assigned an important role of support to the national bourgeoisie and made concessions in their interests. According to the UP, gradual reforms were necessary to prevent civil war in the country.

People's power had opposed the welfare policies of the government of Christian Democrat Eduardo Frei Montalva (1965–70), which attempted to improve living conditions among the poor but were unable either to solve the economic crisis or control the social conflict. The UP thus received broad popular support, based on its perceived ability to accelerate the rate of the country's transformation. Nevertheless, there were conflicts between the socialist government and its social base. This division deepened in the period from 1972 to 1973. The main conflict arose in relation to workers' demands to expropriate factories and industries and hand over their administration, as well as control over the production and distribution of goods, to the workers. At the heart of the conflict between the "Chilean road to socialism" and people's power were different ideas about how to build socialism: gradual reforms by the state, or increasing the role of social movements by giving them control over the means of production and local political institutions.

The revolutionary left promoted an alliance with grassroots and community organizations that involved extending the hegemony of workers into the territories. This occurred, for example, in the Yarur textile industry and in industries and factories of the so-called Cerrillos–Maipú Belt, in a process that became known as revolution from below. The revolutionary left also developed revolutionary organs of power in popular areas and factories. These were guided by the political logic of the duality of power: namely, to build up people's organizations and to destroy the bourgeois state institutions and their means of domination. These Leninist ideas also corresponded to the organic conception of the MIR as a "revolutionary vanguard," which was believed necessary to lead the organized workers, communities, and peasants to take control of their territories and socialize the means of production and distribution of goods.

This approach produced a change in the political conception of social emancipation. Demands to provide solutions to the problems of the country were no longer directed toward the state; rather, concrete leadership in the political process was to be taken up by grassroots organizations, which would combine the struggle against capitalist exploitation with direct political control of their territories.

People's power reflected the experiences of the settlers' movement and their direct actions to occupy sites and build homes and communities. These occupations had been increasing since 1957, and were especially prolific from 1969 to 1971. Community organizations embraced the practice of a more participatory democracy, planning the production and distribution of goods and organizing their own system of "people's justice." For example, at Camp New Havana (created November 4, 1970), inhabitants themselves punished theft, alcohol abuse, family violence, and public disorder, among other social problems. In these popular neighborhoods, people organized themselves around health, food, and education and came into dialogue, as well as conflict, with the state over these issues.

Moreover, people's power reorganized the relationship between management, production, and consumption. Along with developing direct democracy in the territories, social movements also controlled the market and exchange of goods in local communities – this in a context of economic crisis, famine, inflation, and the black market. To meet the crisis of supply, the UP had formed Boards of Supply and Price Control (JAP). Food and essential goods were delivered through delegates and neighborhood committees. Scarce goods were available only in neighborhood stores through a ration card controlled by a delegate.

The JAP bureaucracy aggravated shortages, resulting in long queues for food or fuel. In some places, like Camp New Havana, "people's warehouses" were set up to streamline distribution of family food baskets through the operational structure of the camp. The camp was divided into "blocks" (smaller units), which each elected a delegate as part of the camp directory. The distribution of food baskets was the responsibility of the "head of supply," composed of representatives from each "block." In addition, workers' control in factories aimed to produce what was necessary to meet the needs of the people.

The coup of 1973 brutally suppressed all social organizations and leftist political parties. Military operations included attacks on worker-controlled factories and popular neighborhoods, hitting areas where progress had been made in building up organs of people's power particularly hard. There were clashes between the army and community workers in the early days of the dictatorship. However, people's power could not resist the military offensive.

SEE ALSO: Allende Gossens, Salvador (1908–1973); Chile and the Peaceful Road to Socialism; Chile, Protests and Military Coup, 1973; Chile, Social and Political Struggles, 1950–1970; Class, Poverty, and Revolution

References and Suggested Readings

- Angell, A. (1972) Politics and the Chilean Labor Movement. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Espinoza, V. (1987) Para una historia de los pobres de la ciudad. Santiago: SUR.
- Gaudichaud, F. (2004) Poder Popular y Cordones Industriales. Santiago: LOM.
- Mires, F. (2001) La Rebelión Permanente. Las revoluciones sociales en América Latina. Mexico City: Siglo XXI.
- Moulián, T. (1997) Chile Actual. Anatomía de un mito. Santiago: LOM.
- Salazar, G. (1990) Violencia Política Popular en las "grandes alamedas," Santiago 1947–1987. Santiago: SUR.
- Salazar, G. & Pinto, J. (1999–2003) Historia Contemporánea de Chile, 5 vols. Santiago: LOM.
- Silva, M. (1999) Los Cordones Industriales y el socialismo desde abajo. Santiago: n.p.
- Winn, P. (2004) Tejedores de la Revolución, los trabajadores de Yarur y la vía chilena al socialismo. Santiago: LOM.

Chile, popular resistance against Pinochet

Héctor Guerra Hernández

Following a Popular Front period that saw unity among communists, socialists, and radicals, Chile fell under the rule of a military dictatorship on September 11, 1973. The dictatorship began with the firm intention of breaking down the popular advance. The military junta imposed a repressive system to assure the process of "national restoration." This repressive system worked in the first years of the dictatorship as Congress was dissolved, political parties and trade union organizations were prohibited, and revolutionaries were jailed, tortured, summarily executed, and disappeared. Concentration camps were established to lodge hundreds of leaders and militants and exile began to be the only alternative to death for revolutionaries.

Perhaps the main cause of the coup was related to the negotiating character of Salvador Allende's government. On the one hand, it negotiated with a disguised oligarchy and a more and more reactionary political center. At the same time, the government also negotiated with peasants occupying big estates to expropriate them in their favor, and workers occupying factories, fulfilling the revolutionary itinerary conceived by the same government. Trying to mediate between all factions, it negotiated a revolution with different social actors to avoid, in vain, the constituent violence of the process. This conciliatory stance alarmed the peasants and workers, who feared the results such concessions might have on their revolutionary program. In sum, it was a government which wanted to negotiate when where there was little real room for maneuver.

The difference between this coup d'état and previous ones was that it not only desired to reestablish "order" and favor a threatened oligarchy. It also aimed to destroy the foundation constructed over almost a century of popular, confrontational, and legalist fights to favor the majority of workers. It was a brutal process, labeled by many historians as the period of terror because of the repressive apparatuses the military regime applied systematically and with impunity to crush popular and workers' organizations. At the same time, a political and legal framework was created to introduce a neoliberal economic model. Thus, political repression and reprivatization of the economy at any cost were the main ingredients that marked the years between 1973 and 1976.

This political repression also extended into the period of institutionalization of the dictatorship, between 1977 and 1981. The parties of the left, unions, and neighborhood organizations were totally repressed. However, this did not prevent sporadic protests from the population. The church, as the only sector untouched by the repression, offered its spaces to the resistance and initiated the process of rearticulation of social movements against the dictatorship and for the fight for human rights.

A new stage in the dictatorial regime was inaugurated when the absolute power of Augusto Pinochet was consolidated by the constitution of 1980 in a context of juridical exception. This constitution legitimized the military government in the legal sense and from there the repression broadened, since it created an authoritarian political and legal framework, allowing those in charge of the repression to operate without any fear of resistance or protest. While the left parties fought to survive in the underground, popular organizations began to regroup, mainly in secondary schools, universities, churches, and communities of marginalized populations.

The period from 1980 to 1983 saw the imposition of a new neoliberal economic model, which with its new Labor Law (1979) eradicated all the gains made by the working class since the end of the nineteenth century. This new law, together with laws and "transitory" decrees created to support the repressive activity of the dictatorship, began to collapse in 1982 and 1983. Although there was growth in the economy at the beginning of the dictatorship, the exchange crisis of 1982 and the high level of unemployment (19.2 percent in 1983) caused by the closing of many national industries created conditions that led the population to demonstrate its displeasure. In 1983 the first street protest and the first union strike opened the way for such demonstrations. The main actors were the young people of the second generation, rather than organizations of workers, although the call to strike was made by the national coordinator of workers. The working organizations were extremely debilitated by the repression and control to which they were exposed, as well as by the new labor laws that practically removed all the advances made by union organizations.

In the meantime, young people began to resist, initiating an accelerated process of politicization and becoming unexpected protagonists in the protests and strikes that followed that of 1983. Students in secondary schools began to organize themselves, culminating in the creation of regional and supranational organizations, and at universities they began to win positions in student federations previously occupied by Pinochetist elements. Christian base organizations promoted local neighborhood organizations, thus initiating a process of politicization that culminated in the first hunger marches and violent protest and confrontation with the police.

Much of this activity grew out of an important antecedent which had taken place in 1980, when the Communist Party, by means of its organizations in exile, renewed its policy of using violence to overthrow the dictatorship. This changed the forms of resistance, encouraging spontaneous cacerolazos to the barricades and the organization of youths' military groups. Some political organizations like the MIR (Movement of Revolutionary Left) and the MAPU Lautaro (Movement of Popular and Unitarian Action Lautaro), began to express themselves politically and militarily. The Frente Patriótico Manuel Rodríguez (Patriotic Front Manuel Rodríguez) (FPMR), an armed wing of the Communist Party, was also born.

On the other hand, the political parties, still banned, began to work through organizations of a multi-party character. Participating parties included the Democratic Alliance, represented by Christian Democrats, the Radical Party, some socialist parties, the MDP (Movimiento Democrático Popular), which represented the Communist Party, the socialist parties of Marxist and "Allendist" tendencies, the Christian left, and MAPU – all the parties that had belonged to the Popular Unit of Allende.

These combined forces led to increasing protest against the dictatorship between 1983 and 1986. In spite of renewed repression – mainly through the arbitrary detention and torture of many Chileans – protests became more confrontational, with assaults on banks, bombings, neighborhood protests organized by armed military groups, and even the murder of members of the police and torturers. This growth in organized political violence was sustained by the hope of overthrowing the military regime by insurrection. Even youths in the moderate parties, like the Christian Democrats, began to adhere to the thesis of civil disobedience. This climate of rebellion reached its climax with the discovery of a large cache of arms in Carrizal Bajo in the North in 1985 and an attack by the FPMR against the dictator in September 1986.

Some historians have called the period 1987–9 an opening to democracy, while other, more radical, writers define it as one of negotiation towards an authoritarian democracy. Within the first group are the parties of the Democratic Alliance, which had supported the military coup. They promoted dialogue with the dictatorship to negotiate free elections and to reduce violence and repression. The dictatorship, on the other hand, began to feel vulnerable in the face of what amounted to a delegitimation decree issued by the people. The incapacity of the parties of the left to agree a unified policy, their hesitancy about the possibility of overthrowing the dictatorship by insurrection, and their efforts to negotiate with the regime were perceived by young people as a betrayal of the revolutionary ideals that accompanied the anti-dictatorial fight. An important part of this body of youth was absorbed by existing political-military organizations, which augured a negotiated exit for the regime and gained the support of sectors of the left such as the MDP. The Communist Party began to review its policy of popular rebellion and insurrection. A fraction of its armed sector, the FPMR, departed and set out a new policy called "national patriotic war," rescuing the thesis of armed resistance. Young people with an accumulated experience in the confrontational fight with the dictatorship began to adhere to this thesis and to swell the ranks of other insurrectionist organizations like the MAPU Lautaro and a fraction of the MIR. Between 1987 and 1988 armed actions, including the execution of members of the military and torture squads, increased drastically.

Chile, already considered by the international community as politically unstable, began to suffer reduced commercial activity with the rest of the world. To rectify this, negotiations between all Chile's contending parties would have to be hurried. Taking advantage of the ebb tide produced by the failed attempt to assassinate the dictator and the wave of repression that culminated in the murder of resistance leaders, the moderate opposition began negotiations, framing discussions within the parameters established by Pinochet's constitution. The idea was to ensure the continuity of the regime and the maintenance of economic stability. A referendum was then held on October 5, 1988 to decide whether or not to continue with the dictatorship or hold free elections. The second option was the one that won. At the same time, the armed organizations of the left continued their fight.

The election of Patricio Alwyn in 1989 was seen as the triumph of reason over force. Even so, it did not prevent the continuation of armed activities – mainly the execution of torturers and important personages of the dictatorship. Many in the popular movement felt betrayed by the political leadership, from both the left and moderates. Youth saw in this negotiation a disciplining by the Pinochetist machinery of the old guard of parties, including those of the left.

A new phase was begun in the history of “democratic” Chile with a return to the old belief in the supposed Chilean democratic tradition. In reality, however, the new Chile, a product of neoliberal orthodoxy, was no more democratic than the old. It remained submissive, obedient, and forgetful.

SEE ALSO: Chile, Protests and Military Coup, 1973; Chile, Social and Political Struggles, 1850–1970

References and Suggested Readings

- Barros, R. (2005) La Junta Militar Pinochet y la Constitución 1980. Santiago de Chile: Editorial Sudamericana.
- Ensalaco, M. (1999) Chile Under Pinochet: Recovering the Truth. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Huneus, C. (2000) El Régimen de Pinochet. Santiago de Chile: Editorial Sudamericana.
- Katz, C. (1998) Chile Bajo Pinochet. Barcelona: Anagrama.
- Oppenheim, L. H. (2007) Politics in Chile: Socialism, Authoritarianism, and Market Democracy. New York: Basic Books.
- Vial, G. (2002) Pinochet La Biografía. Santiago de Chile: El Mercurio – Aguilar.

Chile, protests and military coup, 1973

Uta Wagenmann

The 1973 military coup did not only eliminate Unidad Popular (Popular Unity, UP), the only elected government in Chile dominated by Marxist parties. Beyond interpretations concerning Chilean society, it can be seen as a landmark within the global process of reframing fascist methods in terms of “freedom” and “democracy.” Moreover, the putsch was the starting point for a momentous historical change: under Augusto Pinochet, Chile – a veritable laboratory of class struggle – became the first factory of neoliberalism.

The Chilean 9/11

On September 11, 1973, Chilean armed forces launched an all-out offensive to seize power. Some 100,000 soldiers were mobilized to overthrow the government led by socialist president Salvador Allende. After the Chilean navy had stationed marines throughout the central coast, radio and television stations were either shut down or bombed by the air force. Around 9 a.m., all of Chile was controlled by the armed forces, with the exception of some parts of Santiago. It took about six more hours, a few tanks, and an air force bombardment to defeat the small group of civilians who were defending the presidential palace, La Moneda. Allende, who refused to resign, died when the building was invaded by troops.

However, it took much more to destroy the socialist project. Armed resistance against the military forces continued about 36 hours in some working-class areas of Santiago, stopped by mass executions on September 12 (Rojas 1975). Factories occupied by workers were destroyed by bombardments or violently evicted. A period of unprecedented terror had begun in Chile.

The commando units composed of military personnel and civilian fascists were raging particularly in the first days and months after the coup. According to the Valech Commission (National Commission on Political Imprisonment and Torture Report, the second part of which was published in 2005), on September 11 alone, about 6,000 persons throughout the country were arrested. Up to the end of the year, the number of documented cases increased to more than 13,500, most of them involving leaders of unions, leftist political parties, or cultural organizations. Prisoners were taken to military headquarters, tortured, and interrogated. Some of them were executed immediately; others disappeared or were held in concentration camps. In the National Stadium in Santiago, approximately 40,000 people were imprisoned in the aftermath of the coup. Physical as well as psychological torture was the order of the day. Members of the army described the actions as “cleaning up the motors of Marxism” (Rojas 1975: 3).

The number of victims depends on the definition adopted by those who are doing the counting. According to the Latin American Mental Health and Human Rights Institute, approximately 200,000 persons were affected by situations of extreme trauma. Official investigations in the post-Pinochet era specified 3,195 assassinations and acknowledged 28,459 political prisoners, of whom 94 percent were tortured (Report of the Chilean National Commission on Truth and Reconciliation [Rettig Report] 1991; Valech Commission 2005).

Global Power Relations

Two days after the coup, parliament was dissolved by the junta. UP's member parties were outlawed as well as all political activity. While unions and leftist organizations all over the world protested against the coup, western governments reacted cautiously. Owing to the prevailing global, bipolar world order, the generals with their anti-communist ideology seemed to be better allies than an elected president promoting an experiment in democratic socialism.

At least the Nixon administration was bent on overthrowing the UP government right from the start. Between 1970 and 1973, approximately US$8 million was spent on Chilean covert actions. Details of US involvement in Chilean politics have been verified by CIA documents declassified at the end of the 1990s (Hinchey Report 2000; see Kornbluh 1998). Although the documents that are publicly available do not indicate direct CIA participation in the 1973 putsch, they attest the agency's support of terrorist attacks and the involvement of multinational corporations. They also show the strategic background of US intervention: the UP government was seen as a danger because of its socialist program regardless of the actions it implemented. As Nixon's national security advisor Henry Kissinger put it: "I don't see why we need to stand by and watch a country go communist due to the irresponsibility of its own people. The issues are much too important for the Chilean voters to be left to decide for themselves" (Fagen 1975: 3).

Local Inconsistencies

Despite various attempts to undermine the UP government, it was tolerated initially by the Chilean bourgeoisie. The nationalization of the copper mining industry in 1971 and the expropriation of large landowners by an agrarian reform were approved by members of all parties in parliament. Nevertheless, UP's attempt to integrate the bourgeoisie in its non-capitalist project failed. Beyond the US destabilization policy, the UP administration underestimated the power of class differences. The middle class tolerated the socialist project as long as its living conditions were not affected but became openly opposed when its own power seemed to be at risk. Cooperation was easy in the first year of the UP government when inflation and unemployment decreased and the living conditions of many people improved. But then, in response to UP's call for forming organs of poder popular (popular power), Chilean workers began occupying, managing, and, in some cases, expropriating factories in which they were employed. Simultaneously, the rapid reduction of foreign exchange reserves resulted in a severe economic crisis. World prices for copper, Chile's main export, collapsed. In addition, due to the persistent effort of the Nixon administration to undermine Allende, Chile was boycotted by international financial institutions.

The crisis became a motor of as well as an instrument for the right-wing offensive. In October 1972, these activities culminated in a CIA-funded strike by truck owners, headed by members of the far-right paramilitary group Patria y Libertad (Fatherland and Freedom). The 24-day road blockade not only exacerbated the economic crisis but also resulted in an important concession: as a sign of appeasement, the head of the army, General Carlos Prats, was appointed minister of the interior.

The Right-Wing Offensive

Despite destabilization policies and economic problems, popular support for UP even increased. In March 1973, the government was confirmed by parliamentary elections, obtaining about 44 percent of the vote. Since this made it clear that UP would not be voted out in the near future, the elections initiated a period of increasing violence, demonstrating that parts of the state apparatus were no longer under UP control. Police and military forces violently dispersed demonstrations and legal meetings. Factories and poblaciones (poor neighborhoods) with a high degree of organization were provocatively searched. There were even cases of torture among members of the marines who had been politically active. In May the parliamentary opposition formally declared a boycott of the government, and in June the first attempt to overthrow Allende by military force further heated up the situation. The so-called tanquetazo (tank putsch), instigated by chief leaders of Patria y Libertad, failed only because of loyal soldiers led by Carlos Prats. When in August negotiations between opposition and government led nowhere, Allende appointed the four military commanders-in-chief as ministers. This last attempt at appeasement resulted in a loss of support for the government among the left wing.

Three weeks before the putsch, a motion of no-confidence in parliament was followed by the resignation of the generals, and Augusto Pinochet became commander-in-chief of the army. When on September 4 the largest demonstration ever in Chilean history took place in Santiago, mobilizing about 700,000 people in support of Allende, the course of the disaster that began one week later was already set.

A Factory of Neoliberalism

During Augusto Pinochet's dictatorship, the neoliberal project of a market-driven society, a mere theoretical concept until then, was implemented for the first time. One and a half year after the putsch, the generals appointed as policy advisors a group of Chilean economists who had been educated at the University of Chicago. The "Chicago Boys" recommended cuts in social services and the broad privatization of public goods and services. The junta radically put these policies into effect, financially and ideologically supported by the United States and by international financial institutions. Foreign multinational corporations, expropriated by the Allende administration, returned to Chile.

The junta's policy brought about a society where the idea of the market is the leading principle and opportunities for social organization are rare. The Chilean model served as a pilot project: in the 1980s, promoters of neoliberalism like Margaret Thatcher in the United Kingdom based their policies on the experiences made in Chile under Pinochet before them.

SEE ALSO: Allende Gossens, Salvador (1908–1973); Chile and the Peaceful Road to Socialism; Chile, People's Power; Chile, Popular Resistance against Pinochet; Neoliberalism and Protest

References and Suggested Readings

- Comisión Nacional sobre Prisión Política y Tortura (2005) Informe de la Comisión Nacional sobre Prisión Política y Tortura (National Commission Report on Political Prisoners and Torture). Santiago de Chile: Ministerio del Interior. Available in Spanish at www.comisiontortura.cl.
- Comisión Nacional de Verdad y Reconciliación (1991) Informe de la Comisión Nacional de Verdad y Reconciliación (Report of the Chilean National - Commission on Truth and Reconciliation). Santiago de Chile: CNVR. Available in English at www.usip.org/library/tc/doc/reports/chile/chile_1993_toc.html.

- Fagen, R. R. (1975) The United States and Chile: Roots and Branches. Foreign Affairs. Available at www.foreignaffairs.org/19750101faessay10135/richard-r-fagen/the-united-states-and-chile-roots-and-branches.html.
- Kornbluh, P. (1998) Chile and the United States: Declassified Documents Relating to the Military Coup. Available at www.gwu.edu/~nsarchiv/NSAEBB/NSAEBB8/nsaebb8i.htm.
- Kramer, A. M. (1974) Chile: Historia de una Experiencia Socialista. Barcelona: Peninsula.
- Rojas, R. (1975) The Murder of Allende and the End of the Chilean Way to Socialism. New York: Harper & Row. Available at www.rrojasdatabank.org/murder.htm.
- Valdes, J. G. (1995) Pinochet's Economists: The Chicago School in Chile. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Chile, social and political struggles, 1850–1970

Héctor Guerra Hernández

Protest in Chile from 1850 to 1970 emerged as the working class sought to improve labor and living conditions against a dominant national oligarchy, which had consolidated control over land and industry. To maintain its grip on power and control over natural resources and industry, the oligarchy repressed strikes and other forms of labor militancy, leaving the working class particularly receptive to radical political ideologies. This led to the emergence of strong anarchist, socialist, and communist movements. As labor's capacity to resist grew, the state and its oligarchic benefactors periodically advanced reforms to improve working conditions by legally expanding labor rights and permitting a process of negotiation and bargaining.

In the years leading up to the civil war, the national oligarchy consolidated economic power through annexation of land in the north (Tarapacá and Antofagasta) and south (the Araucanía region in 1887) on the territorial frontiers, incorporating strategic mining and agricultural regions. In the late 1880s and early 1890s, tensions mounted between President José

Manuel Balmaceda and the Chilean Congress over control of state resources, particularly the rich nitrate (saltpeter) industry. Balmaceda sought to advance the interests of national capitalists against foreign investors, chiefly from the United Kingdom and North America. Subsequently, the state instituted reforms to protect and extend the influence of the Chilean capital in the extraction of nitrate used in explosives and fertilizer industries, and to weaken foreign monopolies. Balmaceda also sought to reinforce Chilean capitalist control in agriculture and the emerging industrial sectors. The process culminated in civil war in 1891 and the overthrow of Balmaceda's government.

The discovery of silver deposits in Chañarcillo and the growth of nitrate companies after the annexation of the northern provinces of Tarapacá and Antofagasta in the 1880s stimulated a wave of labor migration to the mining centers. This migration advanced the process of the proletarianization of Chilean workers. Deplorable working conditions and poor wages led to worker militancy and the proclivity to strike and engage in other forms of resistance.

Chile's first general strike occurred in 1890 in response to a weak currency, which intensified exploitation among mining workers. The industrialists, backed by the military, swiftly responded to the strike by arresting and executing workers, leaving hundreds injured and the organizers imprisoned. As the strike expanded working-class consciousness, anarchist and socialist influences became particularly popular in Chile's northern and southern mining enclaves.

In the 1870s and 1880s, mutual aid organizations (mutuales) were the most significant form of working-class organization in mining centers, harbors, and among craftsmen in cities. In 1880, 39 mutual aid institutions encouraged the material and intellectual advancement of workers, organized recreational activities, and opened small libraries for Chilean workers. Mutual aid organizations were not labor unions but strictly sought the improvement of workers without regard to confronting employers or the state.

A stronger ideological movement emerged, however, as mutuales transformed into societies of resistance called mancomunales, and labor parties began to develop. The objective of mancomunales was to organize workers in cooperative or regional confederations, cultivate class consciousness, and coordinate insurrectionary general strikes. The associations constituted the first Chilean organizations of craftsmen and industrial workers, and their radical methods of resistance against the company and the state served as a model for Chilean labor organizations that followed. They also became centers of working-class social and cultural life. Working from outside the established system, mancomunales fought against supervisors and advocated the socialist transformation of society. These geographically based associations unified workers on provincial lines, crossing occupational and ideological boundaries to form broader, more powerful coalitions.

Anarchism appealed increasingly to workers in Chile as the material conditions of life and class-based ideology advanced among workers and the popular masses. On the one hand, in 1895 a considerable growth of the urban and mining proletariat had occurred, creating the social base for the development of a revolutionary ideology. The prevailing political system of repression toward workers and peasants was propitious for strikes – the primary means of collective action for anarchists. Anarchists helped form labor organizations and were a driving force in the cooperative development of the mancomunales, federations, and the societies in resistance that gained popularity among workers and craftsmen in Santiago, Valparaíso, Talca, and Concepción.

Anarchists were primarily involved in extra-legal action. When protests culminated in arbitration and negotiation with employers, democrats and socialists typically led bargaining teams on behalf of workers. The combination of ordered mobilization, negotiation, and arbitration seemed a successful formula for gaining concessions from employers and the state. The “maximalist” position among anarchists of opposition to state intervention in disputes between labor and capital was most effective under repressive conditions. When the state began implementing mediation, arbitration, and conciliation, the maximalist position faded as many workers considered state intervention a safer means of defending their rights.

From 1902 and 1908, some 200 strikes occurred. Most notable were the 1903 Valparaíso harbor strikes, the 1905 Santiago meatworker strike, and the 1907 miners' strike in Tarapacá province. While the strikes demonstrated strong worker militancy, state repression severely diminished the growth of the labor movement. For example, in December 1907, an estimated 2,000 men, women, and children were killed by army forces in the Santa Maria School Massacre. This brutality against nitrate workers in Iquique demonstrated the state's determination to repress militancy and strikes.

Concomitantly, by 1880 the Democratic Party sought to advance legal means of worker representation, through recognizing their societal importance to the state and capital. A new independent working-class movement headed by Luís Emilio Recabarren formed a Marxist working-class labor movement to foster collective bargaining. As a legal means to representation was advanced, anarchists continued to use militant forms of collective action from 1910 to 1920. The combined efforts led the way to obtaining the eight-hour workday, six-day work weeks, the end of child labor, and safer workplaces.

The formation of the Communist Party (1922) and the Socialist Party (1933) also paved the way for a workers' presence within the political framework of the 1920s and 1930s. The differences among leftist organizations and their objectives over the direction of the workers' movement reflect the diversity of political ideology in Chile. According to historian Luis Vitale, standard forms of anarchism confronted greater obstacles in Chile than in other Latin American countries due to the strong influence of Marxist anarchosindicalism in the early twentieth century. Under Recabarren, Marxists challenged anarchists over the direction of the labor movement, primarily following the foundation of the Socialist Working Party in 1912. By the 1930s, anarchosindicalism remained influential but entered a crisis period due to its inability to improve working-class conditions among the industrial proletariat.

At the formation of the Confederation of Workers of Chile (CTCH) in 1936, a majority of delegates supported state-sanctioned legal protection for workers, and the anarchists' opposition to formal engagement with the state marginalized their position in the labor movement. The result was what Moulian refers to as a phase of "pseudo-parliamentarism" characterized by "weak governments who distributed benefits between the oligarchic groups and of bloody workers' massacres" from 1891 to 1924. The "social question," a well-known aphorism of the time referring to the sprouting militancy of the urban popular masses, began dominating Chilean political debates (Moulian 1997: 153). In the north, the cyclical crisis of nitrate resulted in masses of unemployed workers swarming near mining establishments and in cities to protest the delay of a new labor contract. Meanwhile, a public workers' movement began emerging. In the south, workers demanding wage and housing improvements went on strike.

The political renaissance led to the emergence of a growing anti-oligarchic sentiment. This led first to the formation of mesocratismo, a populist movement personified by Arturo Alessandri, a charismatic liberal leader who in 1920 tried to neutralize the power of the oligarchy. Alessandri's populist program was obstructed by conservatives and parliamentary oligarchic groups. Then, in 1922, the Communist Party emerged from Recabarren's Socialist Working Party, assuming the position of leadership over the labor movement.

The anarchists, on the other hand, continued organizing strikes. The most important of these was that by the Working Federation of Magallanes, which ended in another massacre in 1921. In the same year, the closing of the San Gregorio nitrate mining center led to a revolt suppressed by the military, killing 65 workers and injuring 35. It was followed by another massacre in June of 1925 in the Coruña office. The nitrate workers raised, among others, the following demands: increase of wages according to the rise of the cost of living, improvement of the conditions of work, nationalization of the saltpeter offices, replacement of authorities who had shown anti-labor behavior, abolition of the Association of Producers of Saltpeter of Chile, recognition of union rights, correct weight of the saltpeter coats, "dry laws" in the saltpeter camps and their gradual extension throughout the country, and immediate nationalization of the longitudinal railroad.

Historically, 1925 marks the end of Chile's "parliamentary" regime and the beginning of the "presidential" government. Following approval of a new constitution that diminished the power of oligarchs, new labor laws prefigured a more hopeful future. In the summer of 1925 the military junta led by Generals Juan Pablo Benett, Luis Altamirano, and Admiral Francisco Neff was overthrown by the young officials of the army commanded by Colonels Carlos Ibáñez and Marmaduke Grove. The coup d'état was caused by discontent against the oligarchic opposition to social reform laws, proposed by President

Arturo Alessandri Palma. In February of 1927 a crisis cabinet was formed, and Ibáñez was named home secretary. Ibáñez initiated what appeared to be a campaign of remarkable welfare and called for limited economic reforms. Nevertheless, the plan was canceled in the aftermath of the October 1929 collapse of the stock market in New York, which ushered in the Great Depression and led to a global downturn that shook Chile's precarious economy in the 1930s.

The serious economic crisis aggravated political instability, as workers, students, and intellectuals protested Ibáñez's authoritarianism. Ibáñez left Chile and went into exile on July 26, 1931, handing power over to members of his government. After Ibáñez fled, the socialist Marmaduke Grove was allowed to return from exile and was reincorporated into the army. On June 4, 1932, Grove and other members of the military led a coup d'état against the government, proclaiming the Socialist Republic of Chile in which the military, intellectuals, and workers combined to create a republic with a revolutionary character. But Carlos Davila, a military leader proclaimed president, betrayed the movement and crushed the Socialist Republic with another coup d'état after 12 days. In the October 1932 presidential elections, Grove came in second with 17.7 percent, even though he had returned from exile just two days before the elections.

In sum, this period, which began with the civil war of oligarchic sectors against President Balmaceda and concluded with a socialist rise against a military dictatorship (1891–1932), was crucial to understanding the development of the labor movement. The confrontational means of the anarchists in the late nineteenth century was replaced by a process of interaction with Marxist sectors. In April 1933, Grove was among the founders of the Socialist Party of Chile (PS), the same party to which Salvador Allende would later belong. Thus, the experience of the Socialist Republic of Grove laid the foundations for the development of socialism in Chile and defined the future trajectory of popular struggles, which started to be influenced by reformists, social democrats, and bourgeois nationalist intellectuals – a tendency which became visible during the periods of the Radical Party governments between 1938 and 1952.

The significant popular support for worker parties provided an opening for the left into the electoral arena. Moreover, working-class organizations did not surrender a confrontational style of politics to the oligarchy. Despite some losses, such as an increased state role in the economy from 1932 to 1952, the working class remained socioeconomically and politically powerful in Chilean society. The Popular Front (FP) was formed, unifying communists, socialists, and radicals in a center-left electoral and broad coalition that supported presidential candidates of the Radical Party. The FP spanned diverse constituencies, from reformist syndicalist, socialist, and communist, to social organizations supporting electoral and revolutionary politics. The diversity stimulated many controversies as to whether changes would be achieved by legal means or by revolution.

The contradictions reached their peak in the last radical government of Gabriel González Videla (1946–52), who after winning the elections with Communist Party support outlawed the party and started a broadly systematic suppression of communists. The persecution was extended after Ibáñez was elected president again for the period 1952–8. Meanwhile in 1952 the Socialist Party, which had not been outlawed, named Senator Salvador Allende as its candidate for the presidential elections. Because of divisions within the Socialist Party (some sectors were supporting Ibáñez), he obtained just 5.4 percent of the vote. These years were also marked by labor strike waves and huge social discontent.

According to Moulian (1997), between the 1930s and the 1960s a new romantic humanism arose in Chile, spreading the myth of political-democratic stability that supposedly differentiated Chile from the experiences of other Latin American countries. This narrative of Chile's exceptional democratic tradition perhaps grew out of the incorporation of the working-class parties into electoral politics and the abandonment of the position of class struggle confrontation. However, as Moulian asserts, an "illusion of a solid democratic tradition" concealed "an implicit pact of interests that regulated the political interchanges, in a society with strong class perception" (1997: 157). The contradictions that emerged among the working class unfolded again in a forceful way during the Allende government of Popular Unity, a period during which two positions – the legal and confrontational – challenged each other. While the legal position was concerned with ensuring that the bourgeoisie would not have a legitimate reason to overthrow the Allende government, the social transformation process led to a revival of revolutionary struggles.

The growing popular discontent led to the victory of Christian Democrat Eduardo Frei Montalva in the 1964 presidential elections. He won the majority by promising extensive social reforms in education, health, and housing as well as agrarian reform. But the reforms did not go far enough to thoroughly resolve massive social problems, and Frei was criticized by the left. The failure of his reforms contributed to the strengthening of the left and Allende's electoral victory in 1970.

SEE ALSO: Allende Gossens, Salvador (1908–1973); Anarchism, Chile; Anarchosyndicalism; Chile and the Peaceful Road to Socialism; Chile, Protests and Military Coup, 1973

References and Suggested Readings

- Aldunate, H. (1991) Antecedentes sobre el movimiento obrero. Santiago de Chile: Instituto de Ciencias Alejandro Lipschutz.
- Barr-Melej, P. (2001) Reforming Chile: Cultural Politics, Nationalism, and the Rise of the Middle Class. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Collier, S. & Sater, W. F. (2004) A History of Chile: 1808–2002. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- De Shazo, P. (1983) Urban Workers and Labor Unions in Chile: 1902–1927. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.
- Greaz, S. (2007) Los anarquistas y el movimiento obrero La alborada de "la Idea" en Chile, 1893–1915. Santiago de Chile: Editorial Latinoamericana.
- Jobet, J. (1955) Luis Emilio Recabarren: los orígenes del movimiento obrero y del socialismo chilenos. Santiago de Chile: Editorial Latinoamericana.
- Moulian, T. (1997) Chile actual autonomía de unimilito. Santiago de Chile: ARCIS LOM Ediciones.
- Pinto, J. & Valdivia, V. (2001) ¿Revolución proletaria o querida chusma? Socialismo y Alessandrismo en la pugna por la politización pampina (1911–1932). Santiago de Chile: LOM Ediciones.
- Ramírez Necochea, H. (1988) Historia del movimiento obrero en Chile: antecedentes siglo XIX. Concepción: Editorial Lar.
- Recabarren, L. E. (1965) Ricos y pobres a través de un siglo de vida republicana. Obras escogidas. Santiago: Edit. Recabarren.
- Salazar, G. & Pinto, J. (2002) Historia contemporánea de Chile, Vols. 1–5. Santiago de Cuba: LOM Ediciones.
- Winn, P. (1986) Weavers of the Revolution: The Yarur Wars and Chile's Road to Socialism. New York: Oxford University Press.

Chilembwe, John (1871–1915)

Eliakim Sibanda

John Chilembwe was the key figure in early resistance in Nyasaland (now Malawi), and a revered protest figure in Southern Africa. Chilembwe was born in June 1871 at Sangano, Chiradzulu, near present-day Blantyre. His father's name was Kaundama, and he was a member of the Yoa people; his mother, Nyangu, was a member of the Mang'anja. Chilembwe grew to manhood in the era of the Scramble for Africa. The territory that became Nyasaland was traditionally claimed by the Portuguese, but had a significant British commercial and missionary presence, and was declared a British protectorate in 1891, controlled by the British South Africa Company of Cecil John Rhodes from 1893 to 1907, after which it reverted to direct British rule.

Like many men of his generation, John Chilembwe was exposed to Christianity and was apparently educated in a Church of Scotland mission. Like many converts, he was strongly opposed to polygamy and beer-drinking, emphasizing thrift and industrious labor. His identity was, however, complex, playing on both traditional and modern traditions. His mother's name, Nyangu, could be traced to a kingdom in Central Africa, suggesting a royal descent that Chilembwe sometimes evoked; at the same time, he adopted the name "John" from the Bible.

Chilembwe's next encounter with Christianity came while employed by Joseph Booth, a radical British missionary who espoused an apocalyptic Baptist doctrine and racial equality. Born in Derby, England in 1851, Booth came to Africa to promote radical Christianity, African advancement, racial equality, and, ultimately, independence. Chilembwe worked for Booth from 1892 at his Zambezi Industrial Mission at Mitsidi and his Nyasa Industrial Mission near Blantyre, the first of a number of missions Booth established. In 1893, Chilembwe was baptized, becoming Booth's interpreter and travelling companion. While Chilembwe worked with Booth – he moved quickly from servant to protégé – he was exposed to the latter's radical Christianity, stressing African economic and political independence. The two men founded a Christian Union of Nyasaland on a platform of equal rights for black and white.

In 1897, Booth published Africa for the Africans, which condemned European colonialism and advocated African independence and self-reliance. That year, Chilembwe accompanied Booth and his family to the United States where he studied for three years at the Virginia Theological Seminary and College, an African American Baptist institution, qualifying as a minister. He was exposed to Booker T. Washington, as well as abolitionist works and the story of John Brown's attack on Harper's Ferry.

Chilembwe traveled across America with Booth, who hoped to generate support for his project of African independence and self-help. Chilembwe witnessed firsthand not only segregation, but also the activism of the African American. Segregation was, presumably, not a complete shock: in Nyasaland, even educated Africans were expected to defer to Europeans, and racial boundaries were stark. Chilembwe and Booth approached black organizations such as the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Black National Baptist Convention: while warmly received, they gained little moral and material support. In 1889, Booth circulated a petition advocating African independence within 21 years, and free higher education for 5 percent of the African population. The two men parted amicably that year. Booth, on returning to East Africa, was deported, and later barred from Nyasaland.

Armed with his seminary diploma, Chilembwe returned to Nyasaland in around 1900 for the American National Baptist Convention, and he established the Providence Industrial Mission (PIM) at Chiradzulu, adjacent to the white-owned farm, the Brant Estate. Chilembwe founded the first fully independent African Baptist industrial mission, which was an important factor in the rise of independent African churches across southern and central Africa in the early twentieth century. The PIM was run by Africans, who planted cotton, coffee, and tea to achieve economic independence. Like Booth, Chilembwe believed that industrious labor on the land was the key to prosperity, and that African economic and political advancement required a strong African peasantry.

In the PIM grounds Chilembwe also had independent African schools built, with seven schools serving 1,000 students and 800 adult learners by 1912. He was leader of a growing community, and also dabbled in commerce by running a small store. On the whole, the mission was a success, hosting more than 1,000 people over its first 11 years of existence.

Through education, Chilembwe tried to inculcate in the mission's residents the values of self-respect, hygiene, hard work, and abstinence from drinking alcohol. He also insisted that European clothes be worn at the mission. Yet Chilembwe also promoted African leadership, and was increasingly critical of the harsh treatment of Africans by white settlers, as well as the racial attitudes of many white churchmen. He condemned the British government for effectively condoning abusive treatment of Africans.

From 1912 onwards, Chilembwe became increasingly radicalized. Like many educated Africans, he was dissatisfied by the barriers to African advancement, racial discrimination, the failure of Britain to protect Africans from settlers, and the harsh conditions facing African tenants and workers on white-owned farms. The neighboring Brant Estate had a hostile relationship with the PIM. Many of Chilembwe's parishioners resided at Brandt, which heavily exploited the labor of Africans, prevented tenants from traveling without restrictions, and burned down buildings – including churches linked to the PIM.

Whereas some educated Nyasas in his situation, like Clements Kadalie, left for work in the neighboring countries, Chilembwe was heavily invested in the future of Nyasaland, and chose to stay and resist. With the support of a small minority of missionary-educated Nyasas, Chilembwe began promoting non-violent protests, including withholding of taxes. Serious grievances were lodged against William Jerves Livingstone, a notoriously brutal manager at the Brant Estate.

Tensions grew from 1912 to 1915, as new restrictive laws were introduced, as many areas experienced famine, and as Africans were conscripted to support the British forces, with the outbreak of World War I. Chilembwe became convinced of the futility of petitioning colonial authorities to honor the promises of social justice and equality embodied in the Bible and English law. In November 1914, he published a letter in the Nyasaland Times condemning colonial rule, and called on Africans to refuse to join the war effort.

Then, inspired by John Brown, Chilembwe started an uprising on January 23, 1915. Armed parties advanced on the estates, killing Livingstone and two other white farmers, as well as several Africans, and attacking an ammunition store. The uprising seems to have been somewhat rushed due to concerns that Chilembwe was about to be deported, and the actions were often disorganized and unsuccessful. Chilembwe hoped the rising would spread quickly, but this did not happen.

The rebels carefully avoided attacks on white women and children, but a climate of fear gripped the settlers. Concerned about the rising spreading – and perhaps inviting an invasion from the neighboring German colony of Tanganyika – the authorities responded swiftly and ruthlessly. Chilembwe’s church was demolished, a number of his followers were killed, and the rising ended when Chilembwe was killed as he fled to Mozambique.

While a military failure, Chilembwe’s rising was a watershed in that it drew in Africans from a range of ethnic backgrounds in a common struggle, presaging the later history of African nationalism, and in a sense foreshadowing the beginning of decolonization. Chilembwe remains a revered figure in today’s Malawi, where his face appears on the 200 kwacha Malawi banknote.

SEE ALSO: Brown, John (1800–1859); Malawi National Liberation; Non-Violent Movements: Foundations and Early Expressions

References and Suggested Readings

- Phiri, D. D. (1976) John Chilembwe. Blantyre, Malawi: Longman.
- Shepperson, G. & Price, T. (1958) Independent African: John Chilembwe and the Origins, Setting and Significance of the Nyasaland Native Rising of 1915. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.

Chiluba, Frederick (b. 1943)

Miles Larmer

Frederick Chiluba was a product of the powerful Zambian trade union movement, which played a leading role in overthrowing the post-colonial one-party state of Kenneth Kaunda’s United National Independence Party (UNIP) in 1991. Chiluba’s subsequent election as president of Zambia, a position he held for ten years, was the labor movement’s greatest triumph – and its greatest disaster. Under his presidency, employment collapsed as part of the wider devastation resulting from economic liberalization. Chiluba serves as a warning that leaders who emerge from social movements to take up national political leadership are sometimes the bitterest enemies of those movements once in power.

Chiluba was born in 1943 in the Copperbelt town of Ndola in what was then the British colony of Northern Rhodesia. His secondary education was interrupted by his expulsion for political activities, but he continued his studies by correspondence. Chiluba worked as credit manager at Atlas Copco, a company supplying equipment to Zambia’s copper mines. His later political allies recall an ambitious young man whom they initially underestimated, both because of his limited education and his diminutive stature. Chiluba became the chairman of the National Union of Building, Engineering and General Workers (NUBEGW) in 1971. At a time when the labor movement’s political autonomy was threatened by Kaunda’s one-party state, Chiluba won popularity through his outspoken defense of union autonomy.

In 1974 Chiluba was elected chairman-general (equivalent to president) of the Zambian Congress of Trade Unions (ZCTU), in the first free election of ZCTU leaders since independence. This was a turning point in the congress’s transition from agent of UNIP’s corporatist state to an autonomous representative of the Zambian working class. In the late 1970s Chiluba and Secretary General Newstead Zimba turned the ZCTU into a leading critic of UNIP. Although careful to express their loyalty to “the party and its government,” they highlighted the gap between UNIP’s socialist rhetoric and its economic policies. In 1980–1 a major confrontation arose during a dispute over changes to local government in mining areas. Following a number of major wildcat strikes, union leaders were accused by UNIP of failing to control their members. In July 1981 Chiluba, Zimba, and two colleagues were detained for two months, prompting further industrial unrest. The refusal of union leaders to be intimidated led to the labor movement being identified as the de facto opposition to UNIP (Woldring 1984). The negative impact of structural adjustment policies, adopted against the backdrop of a downward economic spiral, became a focus of ZCTU criticism; Chiluba condemned the International Monetary Fund (IMF) for putting African governments on a collision course with their peoples. In 1986 IMF pressure led to the removal of subsidies on basic foodstuffs. Large-scale protests across the Copperbelt secured the reversal of the decision. Workers also fought for wage rises to address soaring inflation. Faced with popular unrest, the government broke temporarily with the IMF in 1987.

During these campaigns the ZCTU leadership made common cause with local business interests and wider civil society; such alliances formed the basis of organized opposition to the one-party state. In the late 1980s the Copperbelt was the center of underground opposition: Chiluba traveled incognito to meetings at people's houses, leading discussions on how UNIP could be removed (Larmer 2007). In 1989 Chiluba was the first to suggest that the fall of the regimes in Eastern Europe showed the need for a parallel transition in Zambia.

Chiluba also played a leading role in the emergent opposition Movement for Multi-Party Democracy (MMD). The MMD was a diverse formation, including business groups, labor, churches, and former UNIP leaders. Chiluba was one of the few MMD leaders not tainted by a previous leadership role in UNIP. By placing the union movement at the party's disposal, he not only provided the MMD with a country-wide infrastructure, but also secured the MMD's presidential candidature. Some colleagues felt he used strong-arm tactics reminiscent of UNIP politics (Mbikusita-Lewanika 2003). Others saw him as a front man, selling the policies they believed necessary.

Chiluba and his colleagues abandoned their opposition to structural adjustment for a focus on political power. Following the MMD's election victory in October 1991, Chiluba's government enacted one of Africa's most sweeping economic liberalization programs, with the new president calling on union members to sacrifice in the national interest. With the opening up of the economy, Zambia experienced a calamitous economic decline (Rakner 2003). Chiluba, far from being marginalized by the powers behind his throne, proved adept at using presidential powers to marginalize his opponents. When the MMD was threatened with electoral defeat in 1996, Chiluba changed the constitution to prevent Kaunda from standing, and in 1997 detained Kaunda on spurious grounds.

Despite being a second-generation African leader, Chiluba competed with his predecessors in self-aggrandizement. His expensive wardrobe became notorious, and along with his inner circle, he accumulated vast sums from the corrupt privatization of Zambia's loss-making mining industry. Chiluba was not, however, able to overcome the multi-party system he had helped establish. In 2001 he was prevented from overturning the constitutional limit of two terms in office by a popular campaign that resembled the pro-democracy movement he had led a decade earlier. Chiluba nominated Levy Mwanawasa as his successor and helped place him into power in elections condemned by observers as neither free nor fair. This was Chiluba's biggest political miscalculation. Far from being Chiluba's puppet, in 2002 Mwanawasa waged a campaign that led the Supreme Court to remove Chiluba's immunity from prosecution: Chiluba made history as the first former African president to stand trial for corruption. A London court found Chiluba guilty of stealing $46m of public funds in 2007, a verdict he refused to recognize. The ailing Chiluba is unlikely to face jail for his offenses. Once a respected, fearless, and radical popular leader, he is now reviled by most Zambians. Chiluba's fall from grace symbolizes the wider failure of African pro-democracy movements to turn their victory into improvements in the lives of their supporters and to overcome the inequities of the post-colonial political order.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism and Syndicalism, Southern Africa; Kaunda, Kenneth (b. 1924); South Africa, African Nationalism and the ANC; South Africa, Labor Movement; Southern Africa, Popular Resistance to Neoliberalism, 1982–2007; Zambian Nationalism and Protests; Zimbabwe, Labor Movement, 1890–1980; Zimbabwe, Labor Movement and Politics, 1980–2007; Zimbabwe, National Liberation Movement

References and Suggested Readings

- Akwey, E. O. (1994) Trade Unions and Democratization: A Comparative Study of Zambia and Ghana. Stockholm: Department of Political Science, University of Stockholm.
- Larmer, M. (2007) Mineworkers in Zambia: Labor and Political Change in Post-Colonial Africa. London: I. B. Tauris.
- Mbikusita-Lewanika, A. (2003) Hour for Reunion, Movement for Multi-Party Democracy: Conception, Dissension and Reconciliation. Mongu-Lealui: African Lineki Courier.

- Nordlund, P. (1996) Organizing the Political Agora: Domination and Democratization in Zambia and Zimbabwe. Uppsala: Uppsala University Press.
- Rakner, L. (2003) Political and Economic Liberalization in Zambia, 1991–2001. Uppsala: Nordic Africa Institute.
- Woldring, K. (1984) Survey of Recent Inquiries and their Results. In K. Woldring (Ed.), Beyond Political Independence: Zambia's Development Predicament in the 1980s. Berlin: Mouton.

Chimurenga armed struggles

Gwinyai P. Muzorewa

The term “Chimurenga” means revolution or rebellion which is continuous. Zimbabwe, formerly Southern Rhodesia or just Rhodesia, has seen two Chimurenga. The first occurred between 1896 and 1897. The second commenced in 1970 and ended in 1979. The Chimurenga engaged with here is the first Chimurenga, along with directly connected events which influenced the rising of the Africans in Zimbabwe both before and after the continuous armed resistance of 1896–7.

The Shona

The Shona “state” just prior to 1850 cannot be characterized as a centralized state, though various chiefs gave tribute to the Rozvi-Changamire dynasty. Rather, the Shona may be considered as a society which for the most part is religiously, culturally, economically, socially, linguistically, and historically homogeneous. Collectively, Shona society also extended into present-day Mozambique, along the Zambezi River to as far south as Sena. While the political aspects of Shona life among the leaders were relatively decentralized, all Shona sought religious guidance in matters including war and peace, as well as issues pertaining to spiritual favor or to bring about rains and other blessings. There were many strong political alliances, as well as rivalries. Prior to 1850 the most influential state was that of the Rozvi-Changamire dynasty, which was militarily, politically, economically, and spiritually the most capable. Most other Shona states regarded it as preeminent among them and looked to it for protection and security in times of distress, danger, or famine. A good example is when the Ndebele encroached upon Shona territory. The Rozvi-Changamire state had at that time the best opportunity to create a centralized pan-Shona state capable of assuring security for all Shona.

In addition to the Shona who lived in present-day Zimbabwe, there were the Shona who lived in present-day Mozambique. These Shona enjoyed amicable trade relations with the Portuguese as far back as the late 1500s, when they settled the coastal areas of Mozambique. Though the Portuguese were driven from present-day Zimbabwe by the Changamire in 1628, the relations with the Shona in Mozambique endured. This agriculturally based economy also traded in gold, ivory, and other natural resources. Thus the agrarian economy of the Shona was also supplied with goods including rifles, ammunition, cloth, and glass beads. It is not clear when, but the Shona in the Zambezi valley acquired the techniques of gun powder production. The sites of production were strategically located, and this supply would be used by the Shona on the plateau during their Chimurenga.

The Ndebele

The Ndebele, an Nguni-speaking group, originated from the Khumalo clan and were former allies of the Ndwande. Upon Ndwande defeat the Ndebele were nominally under the authority of Shaka Zulu. Rather than submit to Shaka's rule, the Khumalo chief, Mzilikazi, led his highly trained people to the South African highveld in 1822. There they took on the name Matabele and adopted Amandebele or Ndebele from the Sotho, of whom they absorbed large numbers of men and women. They continued to develop and expand their Zulu-style regiments into a highly centralized and militarized people. The Ndebele had a short-lived settlement, as they would be expelled after attacks in 1837 by the Boers and their collaborators, the Griqua and the Rolong, whom they had previously expelled. Thereafter, they withdrew further north past the Limpopo River from 1838 to 1840.

The Shona and the Ndebele, 1850–1894

When the Ndebele entered the plateau in present-day Matabeleland they encountered the resident Shona. The Ndebele nation and Rozvi-Changamire kingdom would come to war with cattle raids and counter-raids as the pretext. From 1850, however, the Ndebele would emerge victorious, and the Shona warriors who were not killed or captured in battle would withdraw from Matabeleland. Skirmishes and tension continued between the Shona and Ndebele, as the Ndebele regularly pillaged and raided cattle from their Shona neighbors. In response to the constant threats to their sovereignty and interests, resident Shona developed a defense system which advanced their abilities in warfare. Casualties during this period included the widely revered and probably most influential of the Shona Mwari-cult officers, Pasipamire, who was the spirit medium of Chaminuka. This and other events subsequently intensified tensions between the two to the point where the Shona had to collaborate with the Portuguese in anti-Ndebele treaties as late as 1890. The alliance between the Shona and the Portuguese against the Ndebele, however, would be nullified as the Shona came to view the more imminent threat posed by the British South Africa Company (BSAC). The Shona in Zimbabwe would ally themselves with those who opposed the Portuguese in Mozambique, the Makombenguruve who reigned in Mozambique.

The Makombe-nguruve dynasty waged full scale hondo (war) against the Portuguese as they turned their attention from occupying a meager settlement to efforts at solidifying their tenuous empire and asserting their hegemony. The supplies of manpower and arms would be utilized by the Shona in Zimbabwe during their Chimurenga and more so after 1897. Indeed, relations with longstanding Portuguese trade partners, who indirectly supplied a fair amount of arms to the Shona in Zimbabwe, experienced dramatic changes as the Portuguese and the British under the auspices of the BSAC engaged in imperialist ambitions across the continent in the scramble for Africa. However, elements of the Shona in Mozambique would continue with some aspects of trade as the Portuguese in many instances illicitly continued to supply arms to the Shona. These Shona, who were the Makombe, would later be instrumental in supplying manpower and even refuge for the Shona of Zimbabwe to fight colonial powers – both the BSAC in Zimbabwe and the Portuguese in Mozambique.

The effect of the Ndebele victory in 1850 was that the Rozvi-Changamire suffered severe damage. While the state did not fall, its prestige diminished to such an extent that tribute was no longer paid. As with the Ndebele in Matabeleland, other Nguni speakers who were similarly displaced from their native South African lands also clashed with the Shona in Mozambique and along the eastern border of Zimbabwe. The Nguni groups were not as successful as the Ndebele, but the Shona collectively experienced formidable threats to their sovereignty individually and collectively. After the war in 1850 and subsequent assertions of Ndebele hegemony in and around Matabeleland, many Shona were absorbed into the Ndebele state.

Among the conquered was the Shona by the name of Mkwati, who was a Mwari (God)-Cult officer and a spirit medium or svikiro. Mkwati was of considerable importance and stature, as he was a svikiro of the mhondoro spirits or royal ancestors, who when not in possession of a medium spirit of the royal ancestor was said to roam the wilderness in the form of a young lion. Thus, mhondoro are also referred to as royal lion spirits. This distinction was recognized by the Ndebele as they came to adhere to his directives, especially after the loss of their king in 1894 with no agreed-upon successor, and more so with the opening of offensives against the BSAC in 1896. In religious and cultural terms, the Ndebele resisted the missionary efforts of John Smith Moffat and instead accepted the teachings of the Mwari cult, renaming it M'limo (God). The Shona are monotheistic. While having many religious sites across their territory such as designated caves, pools, and altars around which religious activity was observed, they kept no fetishes. In Mwari, the creator was believed to be so divine that human beings could not gain access to him without the use of an intermediary. The spirits of deceased ancestors were thus looked to in order to appeal to Mwari on their behalf. It is believed that royal spirits had closer proximity with Mwari and thus mhondoro spirits were more highly revered. These ancestral spirits concerned with their descendents also relayed information to them through spirit mediums that they possessed. This religious form of Mwari worship was reportedly ushered in and led by the Ndebele captive Mkwati, who was then their M'limo high priest. This religious cohesion would supply a unifying context whereby the Ndebele and the Shona would join forces in Chimurenga.

Other significant events in this period for the Ndebele include the death of Mzilikazi and the installation of Lobengula in 1874. The BSAC, recognizing that the Ndebele were a tightly unified and formidable force, sought a treaty with them. Moffat, who had built relations with the Ndebele, was a supporter of the BSAC and encouraged Lobengula to ally himself with the British. On February 11, 1888 Lobengula signed the Moffat Treaty in which Lobengula promised to refrain from entering into any correspondence with European powers with a view to negotiate any or all of the land under his control without prior sanction from Her Majesty's High Commissioner for South Africa. This essentially initiated the British occupation of Zimbabwe. This was followed by Cecil John Rhodes' efforts to obtain full and exclusive rights to Lobengula's mineral resources, which essentially cited that any measures necessary to attain those resources would be permitted. Unwittingly, Lobengula signed the Rudd concession, as the terms of the treaty were deceitfully cited to him by the BSAC agents. Lobengula was led to believe that the BSAC would send no more than ten prospectors and have only limited access to natural resources. Also, he was under the impression that he would be supplied with 1,000 Martin-Henry breech loading rifles, 100,000 rounds of ammunition, and £100 per month to him and his subsequent heirs. A further provision that Lobengula thought was included was that the BSAC would provide troops and supplies to Lobengula as needed, of which Lobengula would be in command. A known condition set by the treaty was that Lobengula would enter into no diplomatic relations with any other European power.

When the real terms of the treaty were revealed to Lobengula, he published a repudiation of the concession in the Bechaland News in February 1889. He also sent emissaries in order to appeal to the British queen to declare the treaty void or to declare a protectorate over Matabeleland and MaShonaland. These efforts were in vain, and Rhodes had his monopoly. In early 1890 Rhodes led a column of 1,200 white soldiers, 200 imperial troops, 1,000 auxiliary African troops, and 600 mounted horsemen. This column moved from South Africa through Matabeleland and then onto MaShonaland, where they arrived and hoisted the Union Jack at Harare on September 12, 1890. With Lobengula's appeals rejected, no European allies, and surrounded by Shona groups weary of them, the Ndebele were in peril.

Lobengula went to great pains to avoid warfare with the BSAC. The administration of the BSAC's newly formed Native Commission enacted policies which had the objective of disrupting and subjugating the Ndebele way of life. The effects of such policies included the seizure of massive tracts of land, raiding cattle, and conscripting unpaid labor hands, among other acts intended to humiliate elders and others of traditional importance. This resulted in relatively minor instances of Ndebele firing on BSAC patrols as they collected taxes. Offensives against the Shona by the Ndebele also continued. Impi or Ndebele regiments were sent to raid Shona settlements in and around Matabeleland. On one such occasion near Victoria (presently called Masvingo) in April 1893, Lobengula's Impi engaged the BSAC and a battle ensued. Neither the BSAC nor the Ndebele were interested in pursuing the matter as both had interests at stake. The BSAC were not interested in engaging the Ndebele unless they could muster a convincing victory. Anything less would be protracted and costly. The Ndebele did not want to engage the BSAC, whose advanced weaponry would inflict devastating losses and unquestioned defeat. However, this incident as well as further Ndebele raids against the Shona would culminate in the BSAC establishing a pretext for marching on Bulawayo in order to wage war against Lobengula and finally bring the centralized and militarized state firmly under BSAC domination.

As part of their pretext for entering MaShonaland provinces and demanding taxes from the Shona, the BSAC stipulated that they would protect the Shona against the Ndebele. This coupled with the Victoria incident, in addition to fabricated reports of Lobengula planning attacks against the BSAC stationed in MaShonaland, instigated a rationale by which whites assembled in mid-1894 and prepared to march on Bulawayo. The resulting conflict was very light and awarded the BSAC a swift victory, as Ndebele generals used conservative tactics and surrendered quickly. Upon news of the coming BSAC forces, Lobengula opted for flight rather than send his 20,000 warriors into warfare against the superior firepower of the BSAC forces, who had maxim guns. This battle was not representative of Ndebele military capability or courage; rather, it was tactful maneuvering on the part of the Ndebele in order to avoid suicidal confrontation. Lobengula would withdraw north toward present-day Zambia in the hopes of escaping the conditions in Matabeleland. He fell ill and died while in flight in late 1894, with no named successor. While there were many credible candidates, the position of king of the Ndebele was never reoccupied.

The BSAC, 1890–1896

The objectives of the colonizing power before the Chimurenga can be divided into two parts, from 1890–4 and from 1894–6. The major objective of the 1890–4 period was to find and mine the upper-reef gold deposits rumored to be vast on the plateau. When attempts to find these deposits failed, further settler objectives emerged. For the Shona and the Ndebele, this meant that relations with BSAC agents became more volatile. From 1894 to 1896 the objectives of colonization shifted. They were to provide raw materials for the emergent industrial complexes of the West: in the case of Zimbabwe these raw materials were agricultural and mineral. They would also import manufactured goods from the West, converting the Shona and Ndebele into consumers of British manufactured goods. The colonies would become self-sufficient producers, enriching the colonists and promoting their interests, including religious, economic, political, and cultural hegemony. An instance of this aspiration manifested itself in the 1894 offensive against the Ndebele. The Victoria Agreement of August 14, 1894 was a contract whereby mostly poor European volunteers would enlist and battle the Ndebele in the hope of acquiring land and loot by right of conquest. Such plunder included some 6,000 acres of land per volunteer, and the acquisition of the king's cattle, which was in excess of 30,000 head, among other goods.

These objectives entailed huge changes for the Africans. In many cases the native Shona were forcibly removed from their land and relocated to native reserves. Hut tax was imposed, as well as conscripted labor. Colonial laws were arbitrarily adhered to by BSAC representatives, who were often farmers who settled in the area. The BSAC comprised executives and commissioners who formed a minority elite, educated and skilled. The majority of the settlers were volunteers, many of whom were uneducated and until recent acts of incursion under the auspices of the BSAC, poor. The majority of BSAC agents were then given charge of areas in which they settled and exercised their newly found authority over native populations. BSAC mismanagement of the new colony was attributed to Rhodes and weakness in methods of administration. For instance, the BSAC police force was withdrawn from MaShonaland provinces and reassembled near the Limpopo close to the Transvaal in order to raid President Kruger to the south.

The duties of policing and administrative functions such as tax collection were placed in the inexperienced hands of former volunteers. Many BSAC agents adjudicated versions of justice by means of corruption, as they decided disputes between Shona parties on the basis of who promised a share of the award with the local authority. Wanton brutality with the intent of humiliating those who traditionally held offices of stature was widespread, as elders or people of high social standing were flogged in public for nominal offenses. Other acts of abuse of power included the rape of women, random unpaid labor conscription, and cattle theft in the name of the hut tax. Such acts quickly became common against the Africans. The Shona's assumption of a brief and non-invasive BSAC visitor was quickly being replaced with the reality that these settlers intended to stay, and that they wanted ever more.

Though the Shona were not conquered at this point by the Europeans, the settlers were fairly confident that the Shona were sufficiently divided such that resistance to BSAC rule was out of the question. The BSAC were also confident that the Ndebele threat was well behind them as the highest authority of their centralized kingdom; Lobengula had been neutralized, so that the BSAC believed that militarily the Ndebele were irreparably subdued. It was certainly outside of the BSAC's comprehension that the Shona, who they believed to be docile, would ally themselves with the Ndebele, as the BSAC believed the Shona would be grateful for their intervention against the Ndebele. Thus when Chimurenga commenced in March 1896 in Matabeleland, its was a complete surprise. The BSAC was further astonished when it commenced in the central and eastern districts of MaShonaland in June of the same year. The BSAC overestimated its contributions to the Shona and underestimated the resilience of the Shona in the face of BSAC posturing against the traditional way of life the Shona had enjoyed for millennia.

The attempts at western indoctrination of the Africans included a demonization of their religion, as well as a change from subsistence agriculture to a directed one. Imposed changes to the economy of colonial Zimbabwe included cash crops such as coffee, tobacco, wheat, maize, and cotton which were valuable to the West's interests and so were systematically pursued. Conditions on the plateau as set by the colonizers were such that the indigenous groups were to be their cheap supply of labor. Mining, farming and other building work were taken on by other African migrant workers, as well as "Coloreds" or those of a mixture African, Indian, and/or White ancestry. Taxes were to be implemented in 1894 and the BSAC moved to capitalize on and settle Zimbabwe. Native laws taken from South Africa were implemented, rich farmlands were appropriated, and with the assistance of missionaries the four objectives of colonial settlement were underway. As of 1893 the search for vast deposits of gold converted to ventures in agricultural wealth.

As if the prevailing factors in Zimbabwe were not harsh enough, the 1895 season brought severe drought, plagues of rinderpest (a viral disease fatal to cattle), and locusts, all of which were deleterious to the mixed-farming economy. Such occurrences were occasions for the Shona to seek spirit mediums in order to find solutions to their problems. The svikiro told both the Shona and the Ndebele that the white man had brought all their sufferings, namely forced labor, the hut tax, and flogging, as well as the natural disasters of locusts, rinderpest, and drought. They told the people that Mwari (God), having been moved by the suffering of his people, had decreed that the white men were to be driven out of the country; and that the Africans had nothing to fear because Mwari, being on their side, would turn the white man's bullets into harmless water.

Armed Struggle, 1896–1897

The act of uprising or resistance called Chimurenga commenced in March 1896, initiated in the Matabeleland under the direction of the spirit medium Mkwati. In contrast to the random, unconnected, and often more subtle acts of resistance to date, Chimurenga was widespread, continuous, and effectively coordinated by the mhondoro and allied chieftaincies. The first five days of the Chimurenga produced 100 European casualties. The Ndebele rising in Matabeleland was effective and demonstrated that the Ndebele were indeed still a state able to make war. This prompted the company to mobilize against Matabeleland in efforts to break the rebellion. This had the effect of thinning their armed forces in MaShonaland.

The initial attacks were sudden and after a long period of relative calm. These strikes took place in relatively isolated locations and against persons who knew their assailants. They took place on farms and rural stores: the rebels calmly approached their targets and after a brief exchange, killed them. These small attacks turned to massive offensives against BSAC outposts and patrols. It is said that after the first week, no whites existed outside of laagers or defensively fortified enclosures in Matabeleland. Migrant workers and known collaborators were also targeted in these attacks, as were women and children. This was total revolution, whereby the complete expulsion of whites and the restoration of the traditional African paramounts were the objectives. As the offensives extended throughout the province, Chimurenga warriors used the guerilla tactics of collecting the enemies' weapons after battle, as well as ambush and withdrawal maneuvers, whereby passing patrols were targeted. Seizures and frontal attacks also comprised the offensives employed by the Ndebele.

The initial BSAC response was muted, as the events were downplayed in reports back to the London Board of the BSAC. The response of a media blackout concerning these events would soon change to pleas for 500, then 700 or more troops to be sent into Zimbabwe, as the priority of holding the perception of control of the colony gave way to the reality of the threat faced in Zimbabwe. BSAC holders in Zimbabwe did not want imperial British troops to have an extended presence in the land, as this would threaten their charter there. However, the rash of quick defeats forced the BSAC to weigh risking their charter against annihilation. Troops were dispatched to Zimbabwe via Beira, but did not arrive until January 1897. In the meantime, the BSAC enlisted volunteers and retreated to laagers, with incoming relief from South Africa. Early Ndebele victories would become fewer and further between as the element of surprise passed. Also, of the four paramounts in and around Matabeleland, only three chiefs adhered to the calls for revolt. The fourth was positioned to block the road to South Africa, which was instead a safe thoroughfare for reinforcements.

After weathering the colonial response, Mkwati sent a messenger, Tishiwa, who was a Rozvi Mwari-cult officer, under the pretext of collecting anti-locust medicine, to inspire Chimurenga in the central districts of Zimbabwe. Before May 1896 Tishiwa would procure the support of Bonda, a Rozvi Mari-cult officer in the Charter district, and Mashayamombe, a head man for the Hartley district, as well as gain audiences with various paramounts, headmen, or trusted court officials, and possibly sons of some of the chiefs. Mashayamombe would immediately contact Gumboreshumba, who was the spirit medium for mhondoro spirit Sekuru Kaguvi (also known as Kagubi, or Kagumi). He would be endorsed as the lead mhondoro svikiro among the mhondoro svikiro Nehanda and Mkwati by Mashayamombe. Gumboreshumba had credibility by lineage, as his relative was Pasipamire, who was the spirit medium for Chaminuka.

Bonda, upon receiving the call to arms from Tishiwa, went about as a facilitator of communication, carried messages himself, raided loyalist Shona, and was a field commander. By June 1896 preparations for the Shona rising commenced in earnest, using prearranged fire signals or chivara from hill top to hill top as the indicator to start the rebellion in the central and eastern Shona lands. Mkwati was forced out of Matabeleland and tactically retreated to Mashayamombe's stronghold, thus reinforcing it. This area in the Hartley district became the headquarters of the Shona offensive.

Kaguvi, also stationed in Mashayamombe's district, planned to revive the Rozvi-Changamire Empire. In July Kaguvi and Mkwati planned, against Mashayamombe's wishes, to go north near his home area to support the resistance there and encourage warriors not to surrender. They also intended to install a would-be mambo (king), Mudzinganyama a Rozvi, who would be a politically unifying force for that empire. He was subsequently apprehended and arrested, however. The loss of that political figure lent more credibility to the mhondoro svikiro, as the people who were in resistance looked to their spiritual leaders more earnestly. However, many obstacles remained to be overcome.

In August 1896, after successfully holding positions and effecting raids against BSAC positions, the Ndebele, who started their rising after a devastating agricultural season, and also before harvest time, were inclined to hold negotiations with Rhodes. The BSAC were taxed in terms of the cost of funding their efforts and so a quick end to hostilities was their goal, as bankruptcy was an increasing possibility. Rhodes sponsored talks over the next four months which produced drastic results. The Indunas or tribal head men/generals were able to air their grievances and cite terms, as they had earned Rhodes' attention. Head men such as Nymanda, Lobengula's eldest son, and generals such as Umlugulu, Sikombo, Bayaan, and Somabulana were incorporated into the BSAC structure by being given back some of their land and cattle, holding positions of authority where they resided, and being salaried. Such measures were viewed by Rhodes as an investment in quieting the resistance in Matabeleland as well as resolving the risings in western, central, and eastern MaShonland. He held to the belief that the Ndebele were the true instigators of Chimurenga, and that the Shona who had chronologically followed suit would do the same again and lay down their arms. This gamble was calculated in order to put an end to the expensive venture of war, and to get Zimbabwe back to being profitable for him. He was wrong.

As the planting season approached, negotiations were attempted. Some Shona chiefs such as Makoni and Mashingombi entertained envoys as a stall tactic. While indabas or negotiations proceeded, they were planting their crops for the coming year. They also fortified their respective territories with walls, some as high as 10 feet and as thick as 3 feet, in order to repel offensives. Other measures included fortifying near caves, where rebels could continue to fight and hold positions indefinitely. In addition to this, other Shona groups held the major arteries to and from Harare and the other major urban areas of Bulawayo, Mutare, and Masvingo. However, the arrival of 700 British troops along with their 7-pound mortar rounds would turn the tide in BSAC's favor.

The previous drought had depleted food reserves. Perhaps that is why the Shona element of Chimurenga coincided with the end of the harvest season of 1896, went into a lull at the beginning of the wet season of 1896 into 1897, and then started again at the end of that season as crops began to ripen. As hostilities resumed in 1897 the ability of the rebels to resist was limited by a lack of pan-Shona cohesion, old rivalries, and the question of supplies. Strategic hindrances existed for the Shona. Chimurenga did not immediately spread in the south, as Shona there were still weary of the Ndebele, regarding them as a greater threat than the BSAC. Thus, some paramounts remained neutral or even collaborated with the BSAC. In some instances some would join in Chimurenga after the most strategically opportune moment had lapsed. Thus, a lack of unanimous support coupled with the BSAC tactics of slash and burn crippled resistance efforts. By the end of January negotiations with the Ndebele were all but complete, and the troops that were stationed in Matabeleland were redeployed to MaShonaland districts. The addition of artillery and dynamite to BSAC positions meant that rebels were forced to retreat to their defensive positions in nearby caves. They were then blasted continuously by dynamite charges lowered into the caves. Upon fleeing from the caves, rebels were often shot, including Makoni and Mashiangombi, both of whom perished in separate incidents. Though at one point up to a tenth of whites in Zimbabwe were reportedly killed, the ranks of collaborating Africans made up for lacks in police, and demoralizing defeats also took their toll.

Further frustrating the rebellion was the fact that Shona paramounts had yet to achieve a greater form of pan-Shona unity. The British tactic of divide and conquer was utilized in exacerbating cleavages between and among Shona groups. This tactic proved effective as old rivalries among some Shona groups persisted. In addition, chiefs seldom combined forces in order to mount offensives or hold gains unless those groups had been pushed off of their territories. While many Shona did provide guerillas with supplies and information, in addition to joining them in battle, the resistance would end unfavorably for the Shona as slash and burn tactics eroded the ability to continue defending strongholds. In due course the strongholds of chiefs central to the resistance efforts such as Mashiangombi, Makoni, and Kunzwi Nyandoro, were each militarily overwhelmed as they were killed or captured.

It became apparent to the BSAC that the negotiated settlement with the Ndebele which ran from August 1896 until December of that year, as well as many violent victories against the Shona in 1897, was not enough to break the rebellion. The BSAC came to the recognition that the central actors, without whom the resistance would end, were indeed the Shona svikiro mhondoro Sekuru Mkwati, Sekuru Kaguvi, and Ambuya Nehanda. As efforts intensified against these, supplies as well as morale and refuge among the rebels became exhausted.

Mkwati, after being separated from the other mediums, was reportedly killed by Shona who accompanied him in late September or early October of 1897. On October 27, 1897 Sekuru Kaguvi was captured, as was Ambuya Nehanda in December of that same year. They were both hung on March 2, 1898, effectively ending the Chimurenga in Zimbabwe. Shortly before execution, Father Richartz converted Sekuru Kaguvi to Christianity, while Ambuya Nehanda remained defiant. Other chiefs such as Maporenda who survived Zimbabwe's Chimurenga would again take up arms and rebel against the BSAC and eventually the Portuguese, as he and other chiefs crossed the border to the east in continuation of resistance efforts alongside the Makombe. Nonetheless, the continuous armed revolt in Zimbabwe ended, but inspired future rebellion.

SEE ALSO: Southern Africa, Popular Resistance to Neoliberalism, 1982–2007; Zimbabwe, Labor Movement and Politics, 1980–2007; Zimbabwe, National Liberation Movement

References and Suggested Readings

- Alpers, E. A. (1970) Dynasties of the Mutapa-Rowzi Complex. Journal of African History 11, 2: 203–20.
- Beach, D. N. (1974) Ndebele Raiders and Shona Power. Journal of African History 15, 4: 633–51.
- Beach, D. N. (1979) "Chimurenga": The Shona Rising of 1896–97. Journal of African History 20, 3: 395–420.
- Gelfand, M. (1977) The Spiritual Beliefs of the Shona: A Study Based on Field Work Among the East-Central Shona. Gwelu (Gweru): Mambo Press.
- Huffman, T. N. (1972) The Rise and Fall of Zimbabwe. Journal of African History 13, 3: 353–66.
- Isaacman, A. (1973) Madzi-Manga, Mhondoro and the Use of Oral Traditions: A Chapter in Barue Religious and Political History. Journal of African History 14, 3: 395–409.
- Isaacman, A. (1976) The Tradition of Resistance in Mozambique: The Zambezi Valley 1850–1921. Berkeley: University of California Press.

- Ranger, T. O. (1967) Revolt in South Rhodesia 1896–1897: A Study in African Resistance. Evanston: Northwestern University Press.
- Ranger, T. O. (1982) The Death of Chaminuka: Spirit Mediums, Nationalism and the Guerilla War in Zimbabwe. African Affairs 81, 324: 349–69.

China, Maoism and popular power, 1949–1969

Pierre Rousset

With the proclamation of the People's Republic of China on October 1, 1949, the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) found itself at the head of a country three times larger than Western Europe, with a population of some 500 million. The internal situation was favorable to the revolutionary regime. At the end of a long series of civil and foreign wars, the population sought and relied on the new leaders for peace while the ongoing people's mobilization opened the way for an in-depth reform of society.

In December 1949, while fighting against the Guomintang nationalists still raged in the south, Mao Zedong flew to Moscow to meet Stalin. The USSR may have been the first country to recognize the People's Republic, but it had not yet abrogated the Sino-Soviet Friendship Treaty, signed with Mao's opponent, Chiang Kai-shek. For three consecutive weeks, the two heads of state played a game of cat and mouse before the Soviets agreed to prepare a new treaty – signed on February 14, 1950 by Zhou Enlai and A. Y. Vychinski, foreign ministers respectively of China and the USSR.

After the victory of October 1949, distrust was the rule between the Russian and Chinese leaderships. Mao noted how Stalin looked down upon his experience (“He thought our revolution was fake,” he said) and did not want to commit to supporting China if it were attacked by the United States. However, it was Beijing that indirectly came to the help of Moscow when the Korean War broke out on June 25, 1950. The Korean War was not propitious timing for the Chinese leaders, who would have preferred to prioritize consolidation of the regime, revival of the economy (industry was ruined, famine hit the central plains), and reconquest of Taiwan.

Faced with the advance of American forces in North Korea, the Politburo of the CPC was split on Chinese intervention. But the decision was made to join the war effort when US troops approached China's northern border, with Peng Dehuai leading the Chinese counteroffensive. Following four months of intensive and bloody fighting, the front line was stabilized around the 38th parallel. Two years later, the armistice was eventually signed, on July 27, 1953, with up to 800,000 Chinese killed or injured.

The Korean War overshadowed and dominated the whole period following the 1949 Chinese communist victory. The confrontation (revolution/counterrevolution) assumed an international dimension, the United States building a security belt around China, with important military bases in South Korea, Japan (Okinawa), the Philippines, Thailand, and South Vietnam. For the United Nations, under the hegemony of the United States, there was only one China: that of Guomintang, retrenched in Taiwan.

Faced with a new US imperial threat, China reverted to the Soviet bloc. But the seeds of Sino-Soviet conflict of the 1960s were already sown as Mao and the Chinese leadership lost trust in Moscow, Stalin's promises of military failing to materialize. The Russian leadership, on this occasion, gauged the power and the capacity of China to act independently with trepidation.

The first and primary consequence of the Korean War was disorganizing the effort to consolidate the new regime, leading to a hardening of policy.

The Social Upheaval: 1949–1953

In China, the Korean War provoked vast anti-imperialist demonstrations. Workers sacrificed part of their wages and peasants increased production to support the war effort at the front. In this context, the campaign launched by the Maoist regime to liquidate the counter-revolutionaries took a particularly violent turn. Over a period of six months, 710,000 people were executed (or driven to suicide) for their links, no matter how tenuous, with the Guomintang. Probably more than 1.5 million others were confined to camps of “reform by labor.”

Landlords and Rural Notables

China's agrarian reform itself also took a violent turn in a society where class divisions in villages were wide: poor peasants did not forget the arrogance, contempt, stinginess, and inhumanity (at their expense) of the wealthy. Poor peasants could not forget the manner in which large landlords, traders, and notables had provoked deadly famine by speculating on cereals – refusing to return rice to the famished villagers to sell at a good profit in the cities. They could not forget all the militant members of peasant associations summarily tortured and assassinated by police, the army, or the goons of the rich. They remembered the dispossession by powerful owners of children and young women from powerless families. Social relationships in the countryside were not brutal everywhere, but the domination of the wealthy over poor peasants was widespread. It was time for the historical settling of scores.

Where class divisions in the villages were narrow, and no one was really rich, social tensions were nevertheless acute because of extreme poverty, where notables and clan networks were the first target of the CCP. To address the complexity and the regional variations of rural stratification, the CCP classified families into five categories, from landless to landlords. In some places, middle or even poor peasants could suffer repression.

The CCP organized and encouraged mass meetings against landlords and the wealthy, at the risk, in its own words, of “excesses.” But the collective anger of poor peasants was not feigned. The revolutionary violence in the countryside was social, much more than a simple police operation. Beyond settling scores, it paved the way to a real change of power, the overthrow of the old order. In most villages, one landlord, sometimes several, was killed, summarily beaten to death, or publicly executed. Many fled or were shielded from people’s vengeance. At the end of 1950, the class that ruled the rural world for centuries ceased to exist as a coherent social layer.

Urban Bourgeoisie

In the urban centers social antagonisms, even if profound, were less acute than in rural regions. Moreover, in 1949, the CCP, stemming from the rural people’s war, was quite incapable of supporting industrialization. In the framework of the “New Democracy,” the CCP tried to win the private entrepreneurs’ favor. But in 1952, the bourgeoisie felt strong enough to take the initiative against the new regime through sabotaging and blocking implementation of government policies, refusing orders given by the administration. Class struggle reasserted itself. On June 6, 1952, Mao Zedong announced that the entrepreneurs were becoming a target of political struggle.

In the cities, the Communist Party launched three mass mobilization campaigns to remold the urban society. The first two targeted the underworld and capitalist class, the bourgeois elites: the “Three Anti” (against corruption, waste, and bureaucracy) and the “Five Anti” (against corruption, fiscal evasion, fraud, embezzlement, and leakage of state secrets) campaigns. Once again, most were not classical police operations and their implementation varied according to region or the fluctuating relationship of forces among factions of the CCP. Everyone was called to inform the authorities: workers denounced their superiors, cadres denounced each other, wives denounced husbands and children their parents. Psychological pressure was so great that the majority of human losses were suicides and not executions.

The fines imposed on private firms for illicit activities during these campaigns amounted to US$2 billion, a colossal amount at the time. The majority of the large traders and entrepreneurs withdrew to Hong Kong (transferring their means of production) or abroad. The capital drain actually began as early as 1946 in reaction to Guomindang rule. A certain number of large capitalists, however, remained and sometimes benefited from a very favorable situation. The activity of microentrepreneurs (craftsmen, hawkers, peddlers, and so on) was both repressed and tolerated by the regime. Chinese capitalists were not physically liquidated and some collaborated in exchange for departure from the country. Following the “Five Anti” campaign, the bourgeoisie (merchants and industrialists) ceased to exist as a coherent class dominating the modern economic sector. Seven years after victory, in 1956, the nationalization of industries and trade sanctioned the capitalist class’s disappearance as an autonomous social force.

As the old order was uprooted, the power structures of the Guomindang were dismantled, both in the urban centers and in the countryside.

The third campaign – reform of thought – targeted mostly urban intellectuals, in particular those trained in the West. Conceived ideologically as the “movement of rectification,” implemented in Yen’an (Yan’an) during the war to consolidate the Maoist leadership’s authority, the campaign denounced individualism, elitism, indifference to politics, and pro-Americanism. This campaign was implemented in different ways to the “Three” and “Five Anti” campaigns: through successive self-criticism implemented by small discussion groups, combined with police repression. As such, intellectuals found themselves under the firm control of the Communist Party.

“Class origin” became an important criterion to gain access to education, political positions, or good employment. Not without perverse effects, children of rich families (or classified as such) became forever “responsible” for who their parents were before 1949. But the symbolic upheaval of the social hierarchy had a radical ideological importance in a society where “inferior” classes were despised, at everyone’s beck and call. The process was not merely symbolic. In parallel to the disintegration of the old dominating classes, the status of the dominated classes was substantially modified as new social layers developed.

Peasantry

The fact that the peasantry played an important role was peculiar to the Chinese Revolution. Before the Long March, the Comintern enjoined the CCP to work among the peasantry, but for a long time the Chinese Politburo turned a deaf ear to the advice of its Russian comrades. The CCP became the principal political force organizing the peasantry – which was not the case in Russia, where the influence of revolutionary socialists or anarchists (or, more simply, of local non-politicized rural elites) was much more significant than communist influence.

In the years following the conquest for power, the CCP was careful not to impose a Stalinist type of forced collectivization. The party started through the creation of “mutual aid” teams, paving the way to the formation of cooperatives of “inferior” level and relatively modest size. The approach evokes what Lenin envisaged retrospectively in one of his last critical and self-critical writings, constituting his “testament”: “On Cooperation” (January 4, 1923). The approach helped to consolidate the new status of the poor peasantry, while offering the peasant class a future in the revolution rather than demanding their transformation into agricultural workers in state farms. But in order to block any rural migration, the peasants had no right to change their residence without authorization.

Working Class

With the rapid industrialization policy initiated by the Maoist regime, the working class was considerably reinforced: from 3 million before 1949 to 15 million by 1952 and nearly 70 million in 1978. The change was not only quantitative, as a new state-directed industrial sector was born together with a new working class with a radically different status than had prevailed before 1949.

Workers were recruited in the framework of a policy of massive salarization (“low wages, many jobs”). Only urban workers benefited from the new administrative status of “worker and employee.” As a general rule, peasants had no right to migrate in search of work in cities. Once obtained, employment became a guaranteed right. Low wages were offset by social benefits (including residence, health service, life employment, old-age pension). Each worker was assigned to an enterprise and to a work unit as in other countries civil servants are assigned to a position. Workers reaching retirement age could frequently pass on their status to a family member. Benefiting from important privileges in relation to the rest of the population – notwithstanding political cadres – the working class was for a long time a solid social base of the regime.

Women

In the 1920s in Chinese progressive circles, it was commonplace to denounce both “feudal” and “patriarchal” oppression. The emancipation of women and the criticism of Confucian conservatism were considered essential to modernization. Laws in favor of gender equality were adopted under the Soviet Republic of Jiangxi. The establishment and development of feminist organizations were crucial in the national and civil war eras. Membership in the CCP-led Women’s Democratic Federation reached 20 million in 1949 and 76 million in 1956.

In 1950, the law on marriage was among the first two pieces of legislation (with agrarian reform) promulgated under the young People’s Republic. This new legislation insured in theory, and often concretely, the free choice of partner, monogamy, women’s equal rights, and protection of the legal interest of women and children. The law opposed traditional arranged marriages and permitted administrative divorce by mutual consent. Thanks to measures of agrarian reform, women gained the right to own land. The law’s implementation faced strong social resistance – including within the CCP – but was supported by a strong women’s movement.

Cadres and Bureaucracy

Two parallel power structures were established in China: the administration and the Communist Party. Cadres in both structures emerged from the revolutionary struggle. Those among them from well-to-do family backgrounds sacrificed wealth and social status to advance the revolution and were not privileged similarly to the old dominant classes. Henceforward, those in both cadres enjoyed mostly modest privileges but, more importantly, a quasi-absolute monopoly of political power. Even before the victory, the CCP cadres constituted a thin “bureaucracy of war” in “liberated zones.” After 1949, the politico-administrative structure was considerably enlarged with the reconstruction of the state at the national level and the development of a vast public economic sector. These new social strata assumed an unprecedented place in Chinese society, rapidly gaining consistency and giving birth to a ruling social elite.

Army

To relieve the population, as early as the 1930s soldiers were called to produce food when possible. In the postwar reconstruction, the movement for an autarchic economy within the Red Army (initiated at the beginning of the 1940s) was extended. The army was essential in the aftermath of 1949, but continually occupied an ambivalent position in the Maoist structures of power. As the backbone of the revolutionary struggle, the army was the only institution that resisted all crises, including the “Cultural Revolution.” Nevertheless, up to the end it remained subordinate to the political leadership. In the words of Mao Zedong, “political power grows out of the barrel of a gun,” and always, “the party commands the gun.” This role of the army, both central and subordinated, is typical of the Maoist revolution.

A Succession of Crises

The new Maoist government in 1949 was a radical revolutionary and dynamic force. But in 1966 – less than 20 years later – the society was shaken to the core by a paroxysmal crisis: the misnamed “Cultural Revolution.” The tumultuous history of the People’s Republic in the first two decades has been interpreted variously: apologetically, critically but progressively, and in a bluntly reactionary way (considering revolution illegitimate), based on the weight of the past on international pressures. But there are also recurrent political questions that help understand the succession of unresolved crises leading to the explosion of 1966: pluralism, legality and socialist democracy, and one-party rule.

During the 1950s, debates raged within the Communist Party on the independence of unions and other mass movements like the Women’s Federation. But the CCP reaffirmed its direct leadership, refusing to grant any political autonomy. These organizations were responsible for implementing official policy and also, thanks to their genuine social roots, for informing the leaders on the people’s state of mind – or their grievances. But this conception of the cadres “listening to the masses,” of a two-way transmission belt, was inoperable, at least in times of peace.

The Hundred Flowers

In 1954–5, strong tensions emerged between numerous intellectuals and the Communist Party. The latter reacted by repression, incarcerating even some close fellow travelers like Hu Feng. The leadership of the CCP anxiously monitored the crises that hit the eastern bloc (for example, in Hungary and Poland) in 1953–6, wondering about the implications of the death of Stalin and Khrushchev’s report at the 20th Congress of the Communist Party of the USSR. In 1957, in the same speech, Mao denounced both the vestiges of bourgeois ideology and the gravity of the “bureaucratic style of work” hampering “socialist development.” Given Mao’s popularity, he had the legitimacy to exert pressure on the apparatus, seeking political and cultural liberalization and launching the slogan “Let a Hundred Flowers Bloom, a Hundred Schools of Thought Contend.” Mao could not foresee the extent to which his words would be acted upon.

In May–June 1957, the CCP became the target of a wave of criticism concerning the recruitment process of its members (who then numbered over 10 million), the abuse of cadre privileges, authoritarianism in its organisms, and domination of the party. Students rapidly took over where intellectuals had left off, denouncing the dogmatism of study and demanding respect for constitutional rights: freedom of speech and expression. In response to this flurry of criticism, on June 8, 1957 the People's Daily denounced the “poisonous weeds.” In Wuhan, worker activists brutally intervened on June 12 and 13 to reestablish order after two days of near rioting.

The repression of the Hundred Flowers severed the CCP from an important sector among intellectuals and students – a missed opportunity that deeply influenced the future course of events. The main leader (in title at least) of the Federation of Unions, Lai Ruoyu, again raised the demand for trade union independence: to no avail. The issue of socialist legality was eluded by the party leadership: recognition of civic rights was only a question of political opportunity. Such an approach had far-reaching consequences in all spheres of life, especially in the women's emancipation struggle. Under the circumstances, the women's movements were unable to intervene as an autonomous force to shatter deeply rooted patriarchal ideologies. Whatever the progress in women's rights, the “other revolution” of gender equality remained largely an unreachable utopia.

Rapid Collectivization and the Great Leap Forward

The Hundred Flowers movement had barely ended when another crisis of even greater proportions erupted, threatening the relationship between the party and the peasantry as well as the political balance within the CCP.

In 1956–7, new social tensions manifested themselves in the countryside and enterprises. A meager harvest provoked peasant discontent and poor working conditions pushed dockers in Canton (Guangzhou) to launch a strike. As a whole, the regime resolved the crises and the protest movements remained localized, but the social unrest was a warning signal. After its seizure of power, lacking experience, the CCP had initially copied the Stalinist model of heavy industrialization. In the late 1950s, the CCP had to define a “Chinese way” that was adapted to the peasantry and to the demographic density of the country, since by 1958–60 China's population had reached 700 million.

The economic orientation elaborated by the CCP in 1956–7 sought to respond to real needs. To prevent the impending formation of a huge megalopolis in the coastal urban areas (similar to, if not worst than, those in the early twentieth century in the Global South), the CCP found it necessary to avoid the European model of urbanization, industrialization, and massive rural–urban migration. However, in spite of strict controls, rural migration started spontaneously, to the point of instigating conflict between undocumented labor of rural origin and urban workers with “official” status.

To avoid mass relocation of the population, the CCP favored local development through the creation of large peasant cooperatives, the introduction of infrastructures and services in the countryside, and the creation of industries in small towns and rural centers. To increase women's participation in the workforce, many canteens, nurseries, and children's playgrounds were opened. Ideologically, the ideal of the abolition of wage labor was again raised. China had to become a vast federation of communes, largely decentralized and self-sufficient, linked together through the powerful apparatus of the Communist Party and its mass organizations.

The CCP leadership assigned to this new economic model unrealizable goals (to “overtake Great Britain in 15 years,” in Mao's words), which quickly proved highly problematic. The regime chose to resort to mobilization methods that were successful in times of war, but not in peacetime. In China, the policy of the “Great Leap” placed intolerable burdens on the administration and the population. The policy left no time to prepare, coordinate, or plan economic measures. After an initial success, it retreated into chaos and failure. Micro-industrial production (iron, steel, tools) proved to be of low quality, and harvests and transport were disorganized. In 1959–61, various regions of the country were hit by scarcity and deadly famine, aggravated by a succession of natural catastrophes, with the tragic consequence of possibly 30 million deaths.

The Communist Party leadership lacked the capacity to respond quickly to the disaster. In the absence of independent mass organizations and democratic political institutions, the CCP did not perceive the development of the crisis in time. Tensions between the Communist Party and peasantry reached breaking point and upheavals erupted in some areas. Belatedly, appeasement measures were taken. In 1961–62, at the initiative of leaders such as Peng Dehuai, Liu Shaoqi, Zhou Enlai, and Deng Xiaoping, a new, more modest concept of cooperatives was adopted, leaving space for family production. Emphasis was placed on the development of light industry to assist agriculture rather than on heavy industry.

The failure of the Great Leap deeply impacted the leadership of the CCP. Mao Zedong offered a half self-criticism. Previously, he had enjoyed a unique position in the summits of the party on account of his role during the revolutionary struggle and a cult of personality that had been built up from the early 1940s. With the Great Leap's failure, CCP cadres realized the Great Helmsman could commit catastrophic errors.

In the early 1960s, Mao's authority in the party and the authority of the party in society were seriously weakened, while social tensions remained highly acute. Adding to the crisis, from 1958 the Sino-Soviet conflict rapidly worsened. Moscow called back Russian experts from China, then negotiated and signed a treaty on nuclear tests with Britain and the US, excluding China. For the Maoist leadership, the USSR gradually replaced the US as the country's "main enemy."

The "Cultural Revolution"

The post-Great Leap conflicts in the CCP leadership could not be contained within the party. In 1965, the political confrontation became public under the guise of cultural polemics – hence the title of "Great Cultural Proletarian Revolution." But much more was at stake than terminology. Each faction began launching mass mobilizations to strengthen its hand, opening Pandora's box and giving way to extensive social contradictions. The resulting crisis in China was so explosive that it destroyed a large part of the state apparatus.

In spite of the many failures, the country undeniably experienced significant economic growth and real social progress. But the Maoist revolution nourished radical egalitarian aspirations while inequalities among villages, between the countryside and cities, and between social sectors remained enormous. Many students did not find jobs corresponding to their diplomas. Poor peasants entered into conflicts with richer peasants, just as, in the cities, undocumented workers clashed with those benefiting from a protected status. The privileges and authority of the cadres and the authoritarianism of the bureaucracy were denounced. The socioeconomic contradictions culminated in massive street demonstrations, larger than at any time since 1949.

Student protests flared in mid-1966 as numerous groups attacked professors and teachers they considered to be "revisionists," protected by their pre-1949 bourgeois social status and still enjoying privileges. Eventually the "rebels" turned against the party itself, denouncing its "fascist" control. Some called for "big democracy" and "freedom." In August, Mao Zedong seized the occasion to launch the slogan "Bombard the Headquarters" – a declaration of war against the CCP's number two, Liu Shaoqi. Mao called for the creation of Red Guards' organizations and revolutionary committees. Seeking to limit the rebel movement to the cities, Mao used the Red Guard as a bulldozer to reestablish his position in the CCP leadership and reorient the party policy in the spirit of the Great Leap.

Nevertheless, the crisis went far beyond the limits initially foreseen. High-level cadres were thrown to the Red Guards, including Beijing's mayor, Peng Zhen. In November the movement reached the working class, which freed itself in various places from party control. From December 1966 to January 1967, the industrial metropolis of Shanghai was the scene of violent confrontations and a spontaneous general strike where unofficial workers played an important role. The troubles spread to the countryside, and in July and August 1967 spread to a growing number of localities, leading to the disintegration of the CCP and the administration. The party leadership was severely divided as local civil wars broke out. But the rebellion too sank into confusion, as democratic and social aspirations for the "Cultural Revolution" were going round in circles, lacking political direction and undermined by factional hyper-violence.

In the eyes of all the tendencies within the CCP leadership, the reconstruction of the party and administration was an urgent requirement, for which the army was the sole institution that could maintain coherence. But it would take time. In spring and summer 1968, violence increased in many areas across the country. In the midst of political confusion, certain groups were still formulating radical propositions, as in Hunan, where the treason of Mao was denounced and calls made for a generalized system of democratically elected "communes" to prevent the return of a "new class of red capitalists." Indeed, by then, Mao Zedong was calling unambiguously for a return to order and stability.

The Reconstruction of a Bureaucratic Order

In September 1968, in their tens of thousands, former students who had become Red Guards were sent to the countryside for reeducation and work. In some factories resistance continued, but only rear-guard opposition.

For months the “rebels” of the “Cultural Revolution” had lived the exhilarating experience of a rare freedom of action, traveling throughout China to propagate the call for revolt. For sure, they were manipulated by various factions of the CCP (in particular Mao). They engaged in blind violence and committed irreparable acts against the elderly, including numerous veterans of the revolutionary struggle, who were accused of being “revisionists,” beaten, sometimes tortured, and forced to make humiliating self-denunciations. But they gained a spirit of independence, radical aspirations, and political experience. If many old Red Guards withdrew from activism, some participated ten years later in the origin of the 1978 democratic movement.

The CCP was in ruins at the close of the 1966–8 period, with eight of the 11 members of the Politburo in prison or reeducation. Out of 63 members of the central committee, 43 disappeared and nine were severely criticized: a process that occurred at all levels of the party. In many places the CCP structure ceased to function. The apparatus of cadres was reconstituted through long seminars within the “May 7 Schools.” But years were needed to reconstruct the party throughout China.

In 1969, the ninth Congress of the CCP could not put an end to the crisis as a new conflict erupted between Mao Zedong and Lin Biao, commander in chief of the army, previously considered the best of the Maoists. Lin Biao died in September 1971 while fleeing in an airplane to the USSR, and more than 100 generals were removed from office.

At the beginning of the 1970s, many historical leaders of the Chinese revolution were out of contention, including Liu Shaoqi (who died in exile in 1969), Peng Dehuai (tortured by the Red Guards), Lin Biao, and Deng Xiaoping. The way was open for the accession to power, after the tenth Congress in 1973, of the “Group of Shanghai,” also called by its adversaries the “Gang of Four,” who were centered around Mao’s last wife, Jiang Qing.

Paradoxical Legacy

After the death of Mao in 1976, it was the Gang of Four’s turn to be thrown from power. “Historical” Maoism had died a decade before, in the delirium of Mao’s personality cult and betrayal of the anti-bureaucratic aspirations expressed in the Cultural Revolution. No coherent “left turn” was available after 1969, and in 1971 Nixon traveled to Peking (while the US military was escalating the war in Vietnam), announcing normalization of the Sino-American relationship. The reign of Jiang Qing, an ossified dictatorship, finally discredited the “left,” paving the way for the return of Deng Xiaoping and other surviving “rightists.”

In the 1980s, counterrevolution took the form of a sustained and controlled transition to capitalism. A “reverse” social transformation occurred, as radical as the post-1949 era. The state sector of the economy was largely dismantled, privatized, or administered according to neoliberal capitalist criteria. A new class of entrepreneurs formed, composed of bureaucrats committed to personal enrichment and allied to Chinese transnational capital in Taiwan, Hong Kong, the United States, and elsewhere.

The protected status of the established working class was methodically dismantled, giving way to a layer of technicians and skilled workers and a new and young proletariat, a mass of unstable labor from rural regions, often denied any social or labor rights. After benefiting from decollectivization initiated in the early 1980s, the peasantry found itself faced with many of the same threats of dispossession as its counterparts in other countries of the Global South. Social inequality increased brutally: the poor were again ignored, and the rich honored.

Over the twentieth century, the growth of the Chinese bourgeoisie was hindered by the Guomindang dictatorship before being crushed by the revolution. But – through an irony of history – by the early twentieth century Chinese capitalism had reaped the benefits of Mao’s radicalism. Without it the country would have fallen under the exclusive dependency of Japan or, most probably, the grip of American imperialism. Without Maoism, as in many other “Third World” countries, China’s modern capital could not free itself from rural traditional landowning, a legacy of the past. It can be said that, thanks to the CCP-led revolution (and its eventual failure), Chinese capitalism received a second historical chance. But the memory of the revolution can also serve as a political ferment for social resistance against the growing inequalities and uncertainties of life.

SEE ALSO: China, Student Protests, 20th Century; Chinese Communist Revolution, 1925–1949; Chinese Nationalist Revolution, 1911; Deng Xiaoping (1904–1997); Lin Biao (1907–1971); Liu Shaoqi (1898–1969); Mao Zedong (1893–1976); Peng Dehuai (1898–1974); Zhou Enlai (1898–1976); Zhu De (1886–1976)

References and Suggested Readings

- Benton, G. (1982) Wild Lilies, Poisonous Weeds: Dissident Voices from People's China. London: Pluto Press.
- Bergère, M.-C. (2007) Capitalisme et capitalistes en Chine, XIXe–XXIe siècle. Paris: Perrin.
- Bianco, L. & Chevrier, Y. (Eds.) (1985) Dictionnaire biographique du mouvement ouvrier international: la Chine. Paris: Editions Ouvrières/Presses de la Fondation Nationale des Sciences Politiques.
- Chan, A. (1985) Children of Mao: Personality Development and Political Activism in the Red Guard Generation. London: Macmillan.
- Chen, E. (1984) China: Crossroads Socialism. An Unofficial Manifesto for Proletarian Democracy. London: Verso.
- Croll, E. (1983) Chinese Women since Mao. London: Zed Books.
- Deng Xiaoping (1985–) Selected Works of Deng Xiaoping, 3 vols. Beijing: People's Publishing House.
- Hinton, W. (1983) Shenfan: The Continuing Revolution in a Chinese Village. New York: Random House.
- Klein, D. & Clark, A. (1971) Biographic Dictionary of Chinese Communism 1921–1965, 2 vols. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Li, Y. (1977) Socialist Democracy and the Legal System. In A. Chan & J. Unger (Eds.), Chinese Law and Government, 10, 3 (Autumn).
- Liu, S. (1984) Selected Works of Liu Shaoqi, Vol. 10. Beijing: People's Publishing House.
- MacFarquhar, R. (1974, 1983, 1997) The Origins of the Cultural Revolution, Vol. 1: Contradictions among the People, 1956–1957; Vol. 2: The Great Leap Forward, 1958–1960; Vol. 3: The Coming of the Cataclysm, 1961–1966. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- MacFarquhar, R. & Fairbank, J. K. (Eds.) (1987–92) The Cambridge History of China, Vols. 14 & 15. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Maitan, L. (1976) Party, Army and Masses in China: A Marxist Interpretation of the Cultural Revolution and its Aftermath. London: New Left Books.
- Mao Zedong (1975) Chairman Mao Talks to the People: Talks and Letters: 1956–1971. Ed. S. Schram. New York: Pantheon.
- Mao Zedong (1977) Selected Works of Mao Tsetung, Vol. 5. Beijing: People's Publishing House.
- Schram, S. (1969) The Political Thought of Mao Tsetung. New York: Praeger.
- Vogel, E. (1969) Canton Under Communism: Programs and Politics in a Provincial Capital, 1949–1968. Harvard: Harvard University Press.
- Wolf, M. (1985) Revolution Postponed: Women in Contemporary China. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Zhou Enlai (1981) Selected Works of Zhou Enlai. Beijing: People's Publishing House.

China, May 4th movement

Michael J. Thompson

The May 4th movement in China is generally considered to mark the inception of modern Chinese history. A movement of students and intellectuals, it sought to challenge the pre-modern nature of Chinese society, culture, and politics. The members of this movement were united by their insistence that Chinese society be reworked by democracy and modern science; that the older Confucian traditions and feudal institutions of the past be swept away by more enlightened, rational forms of life; and for an insistence on a new humanism which would be able to transform the “inner life” of Chinese people. It was also an explicitly nationalist movement in the sense that it was seen that corrupt officials and foreign domination (both by western powers and the Japanese) were corroding Chinese society and its future.

The initial thrusts of the May 4th movement concerned an opposition to the increasing imperial presence within China's borders, but they also concerned the increasing corruption within China itself. China's weakness can be traced to the late Qing Dynasty when it became increasingly difficult for the central government to provide military defense against bandits within the countryside. As a result, local lords began to organize their own militias. Over time, this led to the increasing power of local lords and the weakening of the central state. This loose connection of powerful lords would later become a system of warlords who would come to exert powerful influence on the country until the late 1940s. After the 1911 republican revolution, promises for a renewed, unified China were soon dashed once Sun Yat Sen lost power to the warlords. Sen had based his revolution on three interdependent political principles: nationalism, democracy, and equalization, by which he meant not only equalization in terms of political rights, but of land distribution as well. These principles were also the aims of the new modern class of intelligentsia, many of whom had returned from teaching and studying in the West to remake China.

Sen's loss of power led to China having little power on the world political stage, and on April 28, 1919, at the Versailles Conference, Japan had won the rights to former German colonies in the East, including Jiaozhou Bay in Shandong Province. Once this news hit China, there were massive protests in Beijing, followed by a series of student strikes directed at the Beiyang government. These protests were remarkable for their level of organization, but also for the forcefulness of their demands. The students pushed specifically for the resignation of the diplomats Cao Rulin, Zhang Zhongxiang, and Lu Zongyu, deemed responsible for the handover of land to the Japanese and whom they accused as traitors. The government suppressed the demonstrations and arrested students.

Protests and strikes spread to Shanghai and there was a national boycott of Japanese goods. The strikes also spread to peasants, workers, and businessmen, creating a convulsive context for the Beiyang government. As a result of the enormous pressure exerted first by the students and then the rest of Chinese society, the Beiyang government released the students from prison and also dismissed the three diplomats from their posts; and as a further result the Chinese did not sign the Peace Treaty in Versailles.

But the movement was even more striking for the way that it pushed new intellectuals to emerge and the way it began to politicize them. Throughout Chinese history, intellectuals had traditionally been essentially apolitical. Despite the inherited Confucian moral tradition of trying to teach the political leader to do what was just for the people, their political activity was usually one of maintaining the status quo. This changed after 1919. For one thing, the May 4th movement created a push toward modernity and modernization. It also created the space for a new public sphere in China – one hitherto unknown – even as it showed that public political action could have positive outcomes.

New periodicals also began to emerge and a new cultural energy was produced. A culture of critical discourse spread throughout the intelligentsia. These new intellectuals came mainly from the educated, emerging middle class in urban areas. Thinkers and writers like Lu Xun would begin to create a new literature which would call into question China's cultural backwardness and urge rational Enlightenment critique of these older forms of life. This was a part of the larger "new culture movement" which sought a reworking of Chinese culture along modern lines. Other philosophers such as Hu Shi worked on translating the work of American philosopher John Dewey into the Chinese context; and thinkers such as Chen Duxiu, the dean of humanities at Peking University, and Li Dazhao introduced Marxism to China.

The character of the May 4th movement's politics and intellectual perspective was uniquely cosmopolitan. Seeing Chinese culture as essentially backward, they looked to the West – most specifically western thought since the Enlightenment such as Kant, Hegel, Marx, and Dewey, among others – to try to forge a new path toward a new society. Less well-known figures of the movement such as Ye Shengtao, Zhu Ziqing, and Yu Pingbo among many others all wanted to bring western ideas into contact with Chinese realities without sacrificing what was distinct in Chinese culture and history. They believed in the unique nature of the Enlightenment (what they referred to as qimeng) – particularly Kant's notion of autonomy and his opposition to dogmatism – and they saw that this renewal had to emerge democratically, but more importantly that a democratic revolution which could save the nation had itself to be based on a populace which was freed from dogma and backward tradition.

As events within China became ever more turbulent, the democratic aspirations of the intellectuals of the May 4th movement began to splinter. Some saw that a liberal path was the best way to proceed, while others became more radical, embracing Marxism and communism. Nevertheless, the May 4th movement was central to the transformation of Chinese history and politics and was itself based on student and intellectual opposition to the state and the regressive nature of Chinese cultural life. It was a spirit that precipitated the Communist Revolution in 1949, which itself chose not to carry forward with the spirit of Enlightenment and open-minded critique that the May 4th movement and its intellectuals inaugurated in China.

SEE ALSO: Chen Duxiu (1879–1942); China, Student Protests, 20th Century; Chinese Communist Revolution, 1925–1949; Lu Xun (1881–1936); Mao Zedong (1893–1976)

References and Suggested Readings

- Bianco, L. (1971) Origins of the Chinese Revolution, 1915–1949. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Chow, Tse-tung (1960) The May Fourth Movement: Intellectual Revolution in Modern China. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Schwarz, V. (1986) The Chinese Enlightenment: Intellectuals and the Legacy of the May Fourth Movement of 1919. Berkeley: University of California Press.

China, peasant revolts in the empire

Leonard H. Lubitz

In premodern China the overwhelming majority of the population were peasants. Unlike their European counterparts, laws and traditions allowed this sector of society to lease or own land as well as to be mobile in choice of location in which to live. However, these rights did not alleviate the greater burden thrust upon peasants, which was the heavy and often intolerable burden of taxation. During the second half of this millennium, population grew at extraordinary rates. In response to the potential Malthusian quagmire that could have driven this populace toward massive starvation and the turmoil expected to accompany such social pressures, the peasant class responded with a stoic focus on survival through intensive labor. Agricultural output in this pre-industrial period also steadily increased. This was a result of the process of involution, whereby progress is realized through intensive physical labor rather than an increase in productivity or improved technology. This pressure, combined with the burden of taxation, made rebellion a reoccurring course of action over the centuries.

The Ming Dynasty was established in the fourteenth century as a result of peasant rebellion. In 1368 Zhu Yuanzhang became the imperial emperor of China, being the third and last peasant to rise to that auspicious position. Two hundred and sixty years later, the dynasty which was established with enlightened policies regarding China's massive population of workers would again fall to a peasant rebellion. More precisely, this involved numerous peasant revolts, many uncoordinated with each other, as this enormous social class lost any impetus to remain silent in the face of the widespread abuses. As the regime became enormously corrupt, various factions within the court, some centered around nobles and others around eunuchs, lost sight of the crumbling kingdom. A punishing famine hardened the already difficult plight of the peasants, while the empire also faced military pressures on its borders.

During the 1630s and 1640s, Zhang Xianzhong led peasant-based rebel forces to victory as they devastated Sichuan, emptying this fertile province of most of its population as those who escaped the massacre fled to outlying areas. Li Zicheng conquered the capital Beijing, under battle cries that included the call for the equalization of land (jun tian), triggering the suicide of the last Ming emperor. Though Zhang declared himself the head of the new Daxi Dynasty and Li similarly proclaimed himself at the helm of the Shun Dynasty, both of these proved to be little more than illusory, as the formidable Manchus filled the vacuum created by the seeming evaporation of the Ming Dynasty.

The Qing Dynasty would come to replace its predecessor, with the foreign Manchus taking over the rule of China. As part of their strategy to demonstrate their legitimacy, a state funeral was held in commemoration of the final Ming emperor, Chongzhen. More pointedly, the Confucian philosophical mode and civil service system were retained, giving the regime a sense of legitimacy as the conquerors offered the public impression that they were inheritors of the seat of power rather than usurpers.

Upon consolidation of their control of China, the Manchu rulers allowed and in fact encouraged peasants to migrate past the Great Wall and farm the great grasslands. This policy both increased the amount of land cultivated and offered Manchu and Mongol landlords greater potentials of rents as these new tenants migrated to these lands. However, this is not to imply a utopian situation simply because of this change in regime. The daily goal of the peasant was survival, and the ebbs and flows of agrarian culture, compounded by an empire ruled by an oligarchy whose objectives included not only power but an increase in its wealth, led to periodic occurrences of starvation. A great number of peasants worked as sharecroppers, with their rent being set as high as 80 percent of their grain crops. Over time, with silver currency becoming more widespread, leases were shifted away from the demand for commodities such as rice and toward currency payments.

SEE ALSO: China, Protest and Revolution, 1800–1911; Ming Rebellions, 1600s

References and Suggested Readings

- Isett, C. M. (2007) State, Peasant, and Merchant in Qing Manchuria, 1644–1862. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Little, D. (1989) Understanding Peasant China: Case Studies in the Philosophy of Social Science. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Perry, E. J. (1980) When Peasants Speak: Sources for the Study of Chinese Rebellions. Modern China 6, 1 (January): 72–85

China, protest and revolution, 1800–1911

Leonard H. Lubitz

The nineteenth century would come to be defined in Chinese history as a particularly fervent period of rebellions. Some scholars surmise that this is a result of a confluence of various factors, the most important of which were the stresses of a regime attempting to remain in force over a growing population while also being engaged in various military actions such as the Opium Wars, the advent of foreign sovereign powers on Chinese soil, economic difficulties, and natural disasters, the latter portending the end of a regime according to the cultural beliefs of the Middle Kingdom.

Ethnic Uprisings

The artificial image of China as a monolithic society has been promoted by numerous regimes throughout its history. Within this scope, tolerance for religious and ethnic minorities who dare to identify with their own background rather than conforming are considered unacceptable. A vivid example is the Qing Dynasty's goal of forcing all of the peoples of the lands it enveloped obediently to submit to its absolute rule. A particular target were the Muslims of China. Originating from Persia, Central Asia, and Mongolia, this sizable minority had received favorable treatment from the Ming Dynasty that encouraged their emigration to China, but they suffered losses estimated at 12 million people between 1648 and 1878 at the hands of the ruling Manchus. Numerous revolts ensued, their causes ranging from frustration at the refusal of the Qing Dynasty to elevate Muslims to high official office, to the desire of national determination.

Miao Revolt

The Miao Revolt, which began in 1797, was aptly named by an imperial government which sought to focus history from its own perspective, for while the Miao people were active in this movement, they made up less than half the activists in this series of actions. There were many ethnicities, including the Hans, involved in the activities which shook western Hunan for several years. There was neither a single movement nor organization that led the revolt. Rather, it was a popular uprising in response to the longtime suffering of the residents of this region, as their meager lives as subsistence farmers made revolt a calculated conclusion that offered no worse a possibility than the misery that defined their lives. Manchu government officials engaged in corruption and extorted the local populace without mercy. While the revolt was not centralized, various factions and militias were organized throughout the community. Weapons were stockpiled and even some government military units were infiltrated. When the revolt was waged, various ethnic factions, especially the Miao, Han, and Bouyei, cooperated as allies. The ethnic divisions which were often found throughout China were dispensed with by the peasants of this region as they attempted to throw off the yoke of the Qing Dynasty.

The rebellion was violently ended by the Qing government in 1806. The Qing troops relocated enormous numbers of civilians, land was confiscated from suspected rebels, Han civilians were brought in large numbers to alter the demographics of the region, and large military structures were erected throughout western Hunan in order to maintain control over the populace. The central government instituted self-policing regulations for this frontier region, whereby Miaos were required to enforce discipline on the most local level while Hans were appointed to all positions of regional power. Trade was allowed between Miaos and Hans only in specified locales, while all other interactions between these communities were to be avoided. Ethnic abuses by the Hans would persist and in fact escalate, including the closing of Miao schools and the forbidding of their religious rituals and practices. The combination of these pressures, paired with the excessive rents charged to Maiois for use of lands that were confiscated by the imperial government, drove the local population to begin another popular revolt – the Panthay Rebellion.

Panthay Rebellion

The Panthay Rebellion, which began in 1855 and continued for 18 years, is an example of the fate of rebels in the Middle Kingdom. This struggle, which began with a workers' revolt against the conditions suffered in the silver mines, rose to a crescendo when the peasants of this region, primarily Hui and Uyghur Muslims, declared the territory an independent political entity. It concluded with the brutal military subjugation of the peasants, which consisted of an overt act of "ethnic cleansing" as 1 million Muslims were massacred on a wholesale basis, without the sparing of either women or children. The decapitation of the rebel leader Du Wenxiu, who called himself Sultan Suleiman (taking the name of the infamous sixteenth-century monarch also known as Suleiman the Magnificent), ended the short-lived Pingnan Guo (Kingdom of the Conquered South).

Dungan Revolt

The Dungan Revolt, which began in 1861 in the northwest region of China, was in fact a series of efforts to overthrow Qing domination of this Muslim-populated frontier. Initially stirred by rumors of impending massacres by government forces, the local population of Hui and Salar peoples engaged in a bloody struggle that would claim the lives of several million victims. It also led to the relocation of many others, as many Muslims were forced to move in order to reduce their concentration, while others fled to the Russian Empire. The complexity of this period can be seen in the fact that one of the rebel leaders, Yaqūb Beg, upon assuming what would be a fleeting victory, declared himself in 1870 to be a vassal of the Ottoman Sultan. Further, the rebels received material support from the British government, which was engaged in attempting to reduce the powers of the Qing Dynasty for decades prior to this interference.

Further Revolts

While the aforementioned ethnic revolts were significant in their length, loss of lives, and their toll on the Qing Dynasty, it is important to recognize that they did not have a direct effect on the rest of Chinese society. Scholars attribute this to the fact that the minority peoples involved in those struggles were essentially isolated from the mainstream population of China.

White Lotus Society

More significant were the various secretive societies known as triads which pervaded the country's society for centuries and which were often the impetus of anti-government revolts. Most noted was the White Lotus Society (bailian jiao), a group that would fracture into numerous independent sects over time. A Buddhist millenarian organization, it greatly appealed to the impoverished masses as it promised an imminent future when all of society would become bound into a single family in a world of enlightenment. Revolts fought by adherents to this philosophy occurred in 1622 in Shandong Province.

More significant was their revolt in 1796–1804 in the mountainous area that traverses the border region of Hubei, Sichuan, and Shaanxi. There, the Qing military forces and militias took a terrible toll on the civilian population in response to their frustration in being unable to identify members of the secret society among the local population, since the primary strategy was to use guerilla warfare, with the rebels remaining an invisible army. Interestingly, it is estimated that only 10 percent of the rebels were actually members of the White Lotus Society, with the majority being allies that included smugglers, bandits, and other social outcasts that believed they could profit from the social disruption as well as a change in local regime.

Eight Trigrams

In 1813 another offshoot of the White Lotus Society, known as the Eight Trigrams, attempted to overthrow the Manchu leadership in a glorious though ill-fated attack on the Forbidden City in Beijing. Like other White Lotus organizations, the Eight Trigrams was a teacher-student based institution which foresaw a mystical new society replacing the misery of their current existence.

Their leader, Lin Qing, is described as an individual more concerned with gaining personal power than with any sincere belief in his sect's religious mores. His background as a drifter and a gambler prior to his ascendancy foretold his failure to be present at the fatal attack on the Imperial Palace, though he was to be the leader of the assault. Li Wencheng was promoted by Lin Qing as the figurative head of the movement, proclaiming that he was a true heir to the Ming Dynasty, thus legitimizing the sect's attack upon the government. Though there were eunuchs and other members of the royal household who conspired with the Eight Trigrams, their attempts failed and government troops killed 20,000 members of the organization.

Nien Rebellion

The Nien Rebellion, which spanned the years 1851 to 1868, was neither a singular movement nor an organized revolt. The term nien literally means "band" and refers to the secretive gangs that roamed the southern tier of China's northern territory. Their method of operation was described by Qing officials as robbery, kidnapping of wealthy citizens, and plundering farms. However, these bands were in fact made up of members of various secret societies which some scholars surmise were also descended from the White Lotus Society. It is estimated that the rebel forces consisted of 50,000 men. The rebellion, located in the provinces of Shantung, Honan, Kiangsu, and Anhwe, had limited success as the rebel forces lacked the capacity to control the rural areas beyond the earthen city walls that they used for their defense. Its longevity can be attributed to the central government's forces being diverted to the Tai Ping Rebellion, though in 1868, 100,000 troops would eventually be dispatched to crush the rebels.

Tai Ping Rebellion

The Tai Ping Rebellion was the most significant revolt in the second half of the millennium. While western scholars often attribute its impetus to widespread poverty and hunger, Chinese scholars ascribe the force of the movement to its anti-Manchu ideology, as the proponents of this attempted revolution saw their mission as the destruction of idol worship in order to establish a "New Kingdom of God."

Its leader was Hong Xiuquan, the son of a poor farmer. After having failed the national civil service examination several times, he converted to Christianity and soon announced that he had several mystical visions in which he saw God in the vision of the Father and as Jesus Christ, and most significantly, that he himself was the younger brother of Christ. Though he did not cite it as an inspiration, China's loss in the Opium War surely inspired Hong and many of his followers with the notion that the end of Manchu rule over China was near. No longer could the Qing Dynasty claim to be invincible and everlasting. The kingdom which he intended to establish would be one of Great Peace (Tai Ping) where class differences would not exist and all citizens would be regarded as brothers and sisters. In this egalitarian kingdom, wages would not exist and private property would not be allowed, as this contradicted the social vision. Vices such as opium use, gambling, and robbery would be punishable by summary execution.

The movement established a highly disciplined military organization whose soldiers gladly died for the holy cause they believed in. Its generals, too, fanatically believed in the mission of conquering the whole Middle Kingdom, and led their troops with the unquestioning confidence that God was guiding them to victory. In 1856 the Tai Ping army numbered 1 million troops. Administratively, however, the Tai Ping bureaucracy was not a competent organization. Its army conquered vast territories but failed to rule these lands in the aftermath of battle. The Qing rulers, recognizing the weakness of their army in defeating the Tai Ping forces, turned to an array of forces including a newly formed military organization, militias, and even one military unit financed by Shanghai merchants and led by an American adventurer, to defeat and eventually decimate the Tai Ping rebels. Their belief in martyrdom was exemplified during the third battle in Nanking when the New Kingdom of God was being destroyed. One hundred thousand died in three days in the city, as it was torched by the government-supported military forces. As one general noted, there was not a single individual who surrendered. The total number of casualties from this rebellion was 20 million people.

Boxer Rebellion

The Boxer Rebellion occurred in what would become known as the waning days of the Qing Dynasty. A religious sect linked by some scholars to the White Lotus Society, called the Righteous and Harmonious Fists, practiced a Chinese form of boxing known as mushu. Their religious beliefs included the notion that they were impervious to either bullets or pain. Unlike the rebellions and revolts that preceded it, the target of the Boxers was what they defined as foreigners. This distinction was made to demonstrate the differentiation between the Manchu rulers, who were in fact also ethnically foreign to China, and westerners and Christians – both Chinese and foreign. Though the rebels initially included the government in their scope of adversaries, casualties suffered at the hands of the imperial army caused the Boxers to modify their outlook, a move which was positively responded to by the Qing Dynasty.

Most significant in their ability to raise the rebellion to a national level was the support given to the Boxers by the Empress Dowager Tzu-Hsi, who was the tacit ruler of the Qing government. Though the Boxers would be seen as serving the mutual interests of the Empress Dowager, they never came under the control of the government. The Boxers were furious that foreign states including Austria, France, Germany, Great Britain, Italy, Japan, and Russia were establishing “spheres of influence” in China as these governments usurped China’s exclusive power within its territory. Christian churches were an early target of the Boxers. In 1898, when a court in rural Shandong ruled that an abandoned temple was properly possessed by Roman Catholic clergy, the Boxers took to the streets, rallying the public to attack the structure. Christians, both foreign and Chinese, became targets of the Boxers, as did foreign nationals and their properties. Beijing was a major site of Boxer action, where in 1900 a 55-day siege of the city left 230 foreign diplomats and civilians murdered.

A multinational military force responded to this uprising, eventually putting the rebellion down. Its units included the US cavalry riding through the Gate of Heavenly Peace and into the Imperial Palace. The Empress Dowager was forced to escape the palace in disguise in order to avoid arrest. In its aftermath, China was compelled to sign a treaty binding it to pay extraordinarily high reparations, to execute the leaders of the Boxers, and to allow the maintenance of foreign troops on its soil.

SEE ALSO: China, Peasant Revolts in the Empire; Yi Ho Tuan (Boxer) Rebellion

References and Suggested Readings

- Jenks, R. D. (1994) Insurgency and Social Disorder in Guizhou: The “Miao” Rebellion, 1854–1873. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press.
- Kissling, H. J., Spuler, B., Barbour, N. et al. (1969) The Last Great Muslim Empires: Translation and Adaptations by F. R. C. Bagley. Boston: Brill.
- Mao Tse-Tung (1961) Selected Works of Mao Tse Tung, Vol. 3. Beijing: Foreign Languages Press.
- Perry, E. J. (1980) When Peasants Speak: Sources for the Study of Chinese Rebellions. Modern China 6, 1 (January): 72–85.

China, student protests, 20th century

J. Megan Greene

Prior to the twentieth century, student protest was a relatively uncommon phenomenon in China. The only large academic institutions that existed were state-run academies populated by students who had performed exceptionally well in the civil service examinations. Most students were the sons of elites, and they were trained by private tutors or in very small village schools in the Confucian texts, so that they too would be able to pass the civil service examinations. In other words, student culture, to the extent that it existed, centered on the examinations and examination venues, where virtually all of the participants had been rigorously trained in the ideological orthodoxy that the state wished to perpetuate. By the early twentieth century, however, a new student culture arose, and it was one in which students took a leading role in calling for and shaping new political and social structures through protest. Throughout the twentieth century, Chinese students have used protest as a tool to try to accomplish political goals.

In the last decade of the nineteenth century, especially in China’s “treaty ports” where western influence was fairly strong, the educational system and social structure were already beginning to change. Missionaries erected new schools that took in students of various social backgrounds, and over time some of these schools developed into China’s first universities. For a limited number of students, therefore, by 1900 the student experience was already not as it had been. In the first decade of the twentieth century, the declining Qing Dynasty, seeking to hold onto power, introduced a new education system, part of which entailed the creation of new schools and universities, and some of the missionary schools were eventually absorbed into this new system. At roughly the same time, the Qing court abolished the examination system, thereby liberating the curriculum from traditional constraints and facilitating the development of a wide array of new courses of study.

Although these and other reforms were by no means sufficient to resuscitate the dying dynasty, they did give Chinese youth access to a wider variety of educational opportunities than ever before, and at the same time they took away the old, clear path that students had followed in their quest to become members of China's elite. As the Qing weakened and the new republic that replaced it quickly faltered, there was no shortage of political, social, and international relations issues that concerned young Chinese. In this environment protest became an increasingly common strategy used by students to voice their discontent with China's political leadership, its social and economic backwardness, and its state of semi-colonization by western powers.

By the 1890s major political events were already motivating students to take political action. China's loss to Japan in the Sino-Japanese War of 1894–5, in particular, led numerous young Chinese to seek out ways to strengthen China. Many traveled to Japan to study, partly because they were curious about Japan's own self-strengthening experience, and partly because Japan was the closest venue in which they could access western learning. These activist youths were, for the most part, inspired by nationalistic zeal and many of them wished to overthrow the Manchu Qing government so that China could be ruled by Chinese, who might, they reasoned, take more care to build and defend the nation. As these students began to return to China during the last decade of the Qing, some, such as Qiu Jin, undertook to instigate revolts against the Qing, and died as a consequence of their actions.

In the second decade of the twentieth century the Qing were finally overthrown and the new republic that followed rapidly deteriorated into warlordism. The weak state of Chinese government during this period gave students ample reason to protest, and enabled them to do so with limited backlash from political authorities. At the same time, this was also a period during which China's educational system rapidly developed. Increasing numbers of schools at all levels were opened by both private and state actors, and many of the people who taught in them had studied abroad in Japan, Europe, or the United States. During this period it was not uncommon for teachers and professors to encourage, guide, and participate in student protests.

In the years that immediately followed the end of the Qing Dynasty in 1911, students increasingly took to the streets to protest political events and participate in boycotts. Students, for example, participated in boycotts and protests of the Twenty-One Demands that Japan made of China in 1915. These protests were not, by and large, terribly extensive, and although 1915 marked the beginning of a period of increased student political activity, it was not until May 1919 that China experienced its first major wave of student protests.

On May 4, 1919 a group of students representing a number of Beijing universities met and decided to launch a large-scale demonstration. They were protesting the unfair treatment that China received in the treaties that ended World War I. In spite of the fact that China had sent thousands of workers to assist the Allies in behind-the-lines factory and other work, China received no reward for its contributions to the Allied war effort. Instead, the Chinese territories in the Shandong peninsula that had until that time been German possessions were granted under the Treaty of Versailles to Japan. Students were enraged not only by the humiliation of these actions, but also by the weakness and ineffectiveness of China's government.

That afternoon, over 3,000 students gathered at the Gate of Heavenly Peace (Tiananmen) in Beijing and marched to various sites in Beijing, including the house of Cao Rulin, one of the Chinese diplomats who had failed to defend China's interests in the treaty negotiations, which they burnt down. The following day Beijing's students went on strike, and in subsequent days students as well as workers in other cities such as Shanghai also went on strike. Although the government in Beijing suppressed the protest and arrested numerous students following the burning of Cao's house, it was nonetheless compelled by the spreading protest to release the students, dismiss the diplomats negotiating the treaties, and refuse to sign the peace treaty. These actions yielded no change in the terms of the treaties, however. Nonetheless, the May 4th protests did have a significant impact on student protest throughout the twentieth century. As a part of the protest movement, students in Beijing and Shanghai established patterns of activity and organization that lasted throughout the century. They formed leagues, took oaths, called for and participated in student strikes, participated in boycotts, organized demonstrations and speeches, and started using slogans, banners, and songs to advertise their aims and their affiliations.

The May 4th protests not only set off a more intense period of student political and intellectual activity, they also developed over time into an icon of political protest that students of later generations would draw upon. In the immediate wake of the protests, urban China saw an intensification of student political activity, especially among leftist students. New political parties were formed, including the Chinese Communist Party (CCP), and students and other young intellectuals intensified the print debates that had started around 1915 over the best way to build a new future for China.

Student unions helped to organize labor in China's urban areas and strikes and protests often involved both students and workers. China's youth also became actively involved as both producers and consumers in the construction of a new, modern literature that encouraged readers to transform and modernize Chinese society. Although the May 4th protest was not, as a protest, an event of great enormity, the activism that it generated transformed China, and the event inspired further student activism throughout the century.

Chinese anger at the continuing presence of foreign imperialists led to more protest later on. When, in May 1925, for example, a Japanese factory foreman killed a Chinese laborer, large numbers of students and workers marched together in protest. Police responded to the May 30 protest by opening fire on the crowds, killing at least ten people, including some students. These events set off a wave of further protests and a general strike by students and workers took place in Shanghai and elsewhere, including Guangzhou (Canton) and Hong Kong. The patterns of organization and methods used by these protestors drew heavily upon those employed by the student protestors in 1919. Students continued to protest Japanese aggression against China in the 1930s and the Chinese civil war in the 1940s. China's single-party Guomindang state did not embrace student protest in the 1930s and 1940s, as it saw this sort of activism as having the potential to undermine its authority. The Guomindang preferred to orchestrate student activities by organizing them into fascistic groups that would demonstrate not against the government, but in support of its agenda.

In its early years the CCP encouraged student participation in protests in China's major cities. By the 1930s and 1940s many of the leaders of the CCP had participated in such student protests in their youth. Once the CCP attained power in 1949, however, it, like the Guomindang, viewed student protest as potentially disruptive. The CCP did see a role for student activism, however, and encouraged students to participate in state-orchestrated mass movements. As it did so, it utilized many of the same sorts of organizations and forms that students had constructed for themselves in 1919 and after. Students in the People's Republic of China (PRC) participated in student organizations and unions, marched in state-sanctioned marches carrying banners, sang student songs, and assisted in the party's political work with other sectors of society.

These patterns intensified with the creation of Red Guard units at the beginning of the Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution in 1966. The first Red Guard unit established itself at Tsinghua University. It was composed of a group of students who criticized the university administration for elitism and bourgeois thinking. When Mao Zedong showed his approval of the attitude of this student group, other Red Guard units began to form themselves in high schools and universities around the country. Until 1969 the CCP leadership permitted the Red Guards to disrupt academic activities, hold public struggle sessions to criticize teachers, bureaucrats, and others in positions of authority of bourgeois or capitalist thinking, destroy symbols of China's old culture, and recreate an environment of revolution.

Although loosely guided by Mao and the party leadership, and clearly seeking to help Mao achieve his goals of shaking up the party-state bureaucracy and reinvigorating the revolution, the Red Guard nonetheless had a great deal of autonomy and followed many of the patterns established by students of the May 4th era. By 1969 China's Red Guard units were no longer useful to the party leadership, and they were disbanded as the student population was sent en masse to the Chinese countryside.

In 1976 the death of Mao signaled the end of the Cultural Revolution and the gradual return to normalcy of the Chinese educational system, which had been virtually suspended for much of the previous decade. In 1978 and 1979, as the new premier, Deng Xiaoping, called for changes in China's approach to economic development, some students participated in the Democracy Wall movement and called upon the CCP to implement political change as well. On the whole, however, Chinese students did not engage in political activism again until the spring of 1989, when, in response to the death of Hu Yaobang, a member of the CCP political leadership who had supported calls for political reform and who had been purged from the leadership in 1987, they began to organize themselves to call for Hu's rehabilitation and for a series of democratic reforms. As they did so, they consciously referred to the seventieth anniversary of the May 4th protests. On April 15, 1989 students marched from the campus of Beijing University to Tiananmen Square carrying a wreath to commemorate Hu.

A week later 70,000 students and 30,000 workers again went to Tiananmen Square to protest. They called upon the PRC government to implement a series of democratic reforms and to improve conditions for China's students. On May 4 another march of about 100,000 students and workers descended upon the square, and this time they began a sit-in that lasted for a month. As had happened in 1919, students and workers in cities around the country also participated in protests. By June 4 it had become apparent to the CCP leadership that the movement was getting out of hand, and it responded with a violent crackdown. Some students were killed or injured, others made their way out of China. Many of the leaders of the 1989 movement continued to agitate for democratization from outside of China.

Since 1989, Chinese students have protested on numerous occasions, but the targets of their activities have generally been foreign, and the protests have been sanctioned, if not organized, by the state. Students protested the United States bombing of the Chinese embassy in Belgrade and the Japanese textbook treatments of the role played by Japan in Nanjing in 1937, for example, and in 2008 Chinese students abroad protested the demonstrations that followed the Olympic torch around the globe. All of these protests had a strong nationalistic dimension, and in that respect, they, too, resembled the protests of the early twentieth century.

SEE ALSO: Anarchism, China; China, Maoism and Popular Power, 1949–1969; China, May 4th Movement; Chinese Communist Revolution, 1925–1949; Democracy Wall Movement, 1979; Mao Zedong (1893–1976); Tiananmen Square Protests, 1989

References and Suggested Readings

- Calhoun, C. (1997) Neither Gods nor Emperors: Students and the Struggle for Democracy in China. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Chiang, Wên-han (1948) The Chinese Student Movement. New York: King's Crown Press.
- Hartford, K., Sullivan, L., Ogden, S., & Zweig, D. (1992) China's Search for Democracy: The Student and Mass Movement of 1989. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe.
- Wasserstrom, J. N. (1991) Student Protests in Twentieth-Century China: The View from Shanghai. Stanford: Stanford University Press.

Chinese Communist Revolution, 1925–1949

Pierre Rousset

Retrospectively, we know the importance of the period opened in China by the overthrow in 1911 of the Qing Dynasty: it concluded, nearly four decades later, with the victory of the Communist Revolution in 1949 – an event of historical scope. However, at the time, the future of the country looked very uncertain. Power was fragmenting in China, but the European states were not in a position to seize this opportunity to impose their colonial domination on the Middle Kingdom and were soon going to be at war with each other. The new imperialist powers (the United States and Japan) were not yet ready to replace them and claim for themselves the conquest of China. But it was only a matter of time. China seemed to be condemned to be dismembered into Nippo-western zones of influence.

Born amid the commotion of World War I, the Russian Revolution of 1917 showed that an alternative was possible: even in a country

Soldiers of the Red Army of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) march in retreat during the Chinese Civil War with the forces of the Guomindang (Chinese Nationalist Party). The Long March is a common reference to the transfer of the Red Army from Yu Du in the province of Jiangxi to Yan'an in Shaanxi. It began on October 16, 1934 and continued until October 19, 1935. However, the retreat was not complete until October 22, 1936. (Private Collection / The Bridgeman Art Library) deemed backward, communism could be the answer to the threat of imperialist domination and could at the same time save the oppressed classes and the nation. However, China was not Russia. It belonged to another cultural world and another social formation, the product of a very different historical past. Modern political movements like the Guomindang (Nationalist Party) were at the initial stage of formation and their characteristics had yet to be defined. The fact that the European revolution had started in Russia rather than Germany had been a great surprise for Marxists. That the torch would be passed to East Asia meant a leap into the unknown. Russian Marxism did offer a political paradigm for the first Chinese communists, as it had to conceptualize revolution in a country with a large pre-capitalist social structure. But Chinese communism still essentially remained to be invented.

To add to the uncertainties, during a few decades of civil and world wars, two new actors made their entrance on the world scene via the Chinese question. On the one hand, there was the USSR, which played an important role because of its influence on Chinese political movements. On the other hand, there was imperial Japan, which revealed its Asian ambitions in wanting to conquer China. Also, for the first time, at least from the 1940s, the United States affirmed its superiority in the Asia-Pacific theater. The Great Powers game became more complex.

China and Modernization

The Manchu Dynasty in China was overturned before the start of the great revolutionary struggles of the 1920s. The First Chinese “republican” Revolution in 1911 only mobilized limited social forces, even if a great variety of political forces were involved. While it rapidly lost its dynamism, it did cause people to think about how China could be modernized. In the aftermath of the Second Chinese Revolution (1925–7), the Guomindang on one side and the Communist Party (CCP) on the other took form. After having allied against China’s warlords, they fought one another violently during a long civil war, confronting each other head on over the essential issue of modernization: whether in a backward country like China, modernity meant capitalism and subservience to the West.

The crisis of the Middle Kingdom obviously did not mean the disappearance of traditional social relationships, especially in the vast rural areas. The Guomindang willingly put up with this, but not the CCP. The revolution that the CCP carried out was social, spearheaded against the old order and the desire of hegemony asserted by the Chinese bourgeoisie. It was national and anti-imperialist, aimed at safeguarding the unity of the country and its independence. It also had a vision of modernity potentially opposed to the dominating conceptions of the time, for which the capitalist West incarnated the future of the world. The search for a “Chinese way” was, from the very beginning, a subject of continuous debate within the newly emerging revolutionary left.

In reaction to the 21 Demands of imperial Japan in 1915 and in the wake of World War I, this national mood was reinforced among traders, students and intellectuals, workers, and employees of foreign “settlements.” It was further strengthened when the Versailles Peace Conference rejected the claims of the Chinese delegation: the rights and privileges of Germany in Shandong were not cancelled to the advantage of China, but were transferred to Japan, which was starting to play the role of policeman in the Far East against the Bolsheviks in Siberia. The May 4th movement in 1919 was shaped within the new urban intelligentsia. It initiated a period of intense intellectual activity where everything was subject to debate: nationalist ideals and the future of China; tradition and modernization; opening to the world and the protection of cultural heritage; the philosophy of the Enlightenment; anarchism and socialism.

Against the ancient dynastic order and the conservative grip of Confucianism, the radical intelligentsia was open to western thought, but the same movement set Chinese national identity against imperialism and western cultural pretensions. The Chinese revolutionary milieu was thus pluralist, with libertarian and anarchic currents, or non-Marxist socialists. Under the influence of the Russian Revolution, key personalities of the May 4th movement such as Chen Duxiu and Li Dazhao helped with the foundation of the Communist Party, which held its first congress (it then had 57 members) in 1921. A decade of social and political commotion later, it was Marxism (itself plural) that imposed itself on the revolutionary side.

China is one of the countries of the “third world” where Marxism took hold early on. In doing so, it had to cease being an imported ideology and find new national, cultural, and political roots and “become Chinese.” This fundamental process of “sinisation” was facilitated by the existence in the Middle Kingdom of a state history more ancient than in Europe. The Chinese revolutionaries had to fight strong conservative traditions which their enemies made good use of. But the transplanting of Marxism proved successful.

Second Chinese Revolution

The First Chinese Revolution had started in 1911 in Wuhan (Hubei) on October 10, in the center of the country, with a military upheaval. The Second Revolution started in the South in 1925 amid increasing social and national struggles. Sun Yat-sen, a great figure of the national democratic movement, was at that time president of the revolutionary government of Canton – his power was only regional. A large part of the territory was under the military control of warlords. The goal of the Chinese revolutionaries was the reunification of the country in the framework of a republic. During the revolution of 1925–7 new social actors appeared on the scene. In addition to the rural classes, an important role came to be played by the urban bourgeoisie and the (semi-) proletariat. Thus, during the 1920s, the national movement went through intense class conflicts. The First Revolution had closed a chapter of Chinese history: the imperial era. The Second opened the next chapter: that of the relationship between national war and social revolution.

Most waves of industrialization in China were very recent – the end of the nineteenth century and the first years of the twentieth, and during the 1910s and 1920s. This was the golden age of Chinese capitalism, with modern rice and oil mills, a cotton industry and weaving looms, tobacco, silk, and the heavy metallurgy of the Yangtze valley and Manchuria. In 1915–20 the young working class was estimated at 650,000 all over China and 1.5 million by the beginning of the 1920s (there were at least 250 million peasants). Coming from urban plebeians and the rural poor, the new working class experienced the trauma of being uprooted and savage exploitation. It remained a very small minority in the country, and much of China’s textile and garment production remained a cottage industry. Capitalist expansion affected China in a very unequal manner. A large part of the semi-proletariat was composed of unskilled day laborers, the coolies. The industrial working class was often concentrated in big factories, which, like in Shanghai, employed more than 500–1,000 workers.

The trade union movement and the Chinese Communist Party both emerged at the same time. Hong Kong’s seamen led a victorious strike in January–March 1922. The first national All-China Labor Congress was held in Canton on May 1 that same year (it claimed 300,000 members). Communist militants, though very small in number, were already present in the metallurgical industries, docks, mines, and textile industries. Repression intensified in the North and center of the country, where the union movement retreated.

In the rural world, the crisis of central power contributed to unsettling the village’s traditional balance. A lack of arable land and the partition of properties heightened the tensions between the peasantry and landlords in many provinces, and within the peasantry itself, between richer and poorer. The vast hinterland evolved much more slowly than the coastal zones, the Yangtze valley, and Manchuria. However, in these regions the impact of the agrarian crisis still made itself felt, as the proletariat and the urban poor still maintained links with their families in the countryside. Then, after World War I, western capital and goods made a strong comeback, directly competing with the Chinese industrial sector. Thus, conditions were such that, in some places at least, rural upheaval could link with urban struggle.

At the beginning of the 1920s underlying tensions were social, and in coastal China the political mood was largely anti-imperialist. The western powers, at the time of the Washington Conference in November 1921–February 1922, had forced Japan to return Shandong, but they were also taking advantage of the political fragmentation of the country and in 1923 demanded control over the railways. The weakness of China was obvious. The Communist Party was then too small to claim the leadership of the national movement. This role was incumbent upon the Guomindang, based in Canton, under the mobilizing theme of Northern Expedition: the reunification of the country via a military campaign against the warlords and the Beijing government, allied with the big powers.

The Guomindang benefited from the prestige of Sun Yat-sen, but was disorganized and divided. It turned to Moscow to strengthen its organization and for military training and aid. The offer of collaboration with China came at the right moment for the Soviet leadership: in 1923, after the failure of the German revolution, revolutionary expectations were postponed in Europe. As the western horizon was shut, the geopolitical importance of China in the East grew. In this context, on the advice (or rather orders) of envoys of the Komintern, members of the CPC, in spite of hesitations, integrated with the Guomindang. The Third Congress of the Communist Party ratified this unusual tactic of “united front from within” or “bloc within” in June 1923; it had then 420 members. The Guomindang did the same in January 1924. Alliance with Moscow was sealed. Three communists, one of whom was Li Dazhao, were elected to the Central Committee of the Guomindang; six others were alternates, one of them the young Mao Zedong. After disappointing beginnings, the alliance between the Guomindang of Sun Yat-sen, Moscow, and the CPC proved very dynamic. After the frustration of the 1911 revolution, it gave new life to the national movement.

On May 30, 1925 police under English leadership shot dead demonstrators in Shanghai’s International Settlement who were denouncing the assassination of a Chinese striker by a Japanese foreman. It was the beginning of a colossal movement of protest against imperialism. Solidarity with Shanghai’s strikes spread to the North and the South. On June 23, 1925 it was the turn of Franco-English forces to shoot at a demonstration in Canton, killing 52 people and provoking the boycott-strike of Canton–Hong Kong, which lasted 15 months. A strike Central Committee was established and became an effective “second power” in the region. People’s military detachments guarded the coast. Nationalist in its goals, the movement was proletarian in form and popular in its roots, opening the possibility in some regions of the center and the South of an unprecedented convergence of urban and rural mobilizations. Peasant unions started to see the light of day under the Guomindang flag, with the help of some communist militants active in the countryside, like Peng Pai in the Guangdong. The Northern Expedition against the warlords actually began in July 1926: the army of the Canton government progressed rapidly thanks to the accompanying mass upheaval.

It is in this context that the trade unions, the peasant movement, and the CCP rapidly expanded. In May 1926 the third national Labor Congress (where the role of Liu Shaoqi was important) announced 1,240,000 members; in April 1927 it was 2,800,000. In March 1926 Mao Zedong published his Analysis of the Classes in Chinese Society. The first National Congress of the peasant movement was held in April of that year and in 1927 some 10 million peasants would have been under the influence of the Communist Party, especially in the Guangdong and the Hunan. In 1925–6 CCP membership grew from 1,000 to 30,000, reaching 57,000 on the eve of the counterrevolution of 1927.

The nationalist May 30th movement had started in 1925 in the industrial metropolis of Shanghai as a vast inter-class mobilization, with the participation of workers’ unions, student organizations, associations of small traders, and the chamber of commerce (the big modern bourgeoisie). Chinese social elites soon became worried by the rapid rise of this popular movement and the increasing influence of the communists. Sun Yat-sen died in March 1925, leaving the way clear for the right wing of the Guomindang represented by Chiang Kai-shek, who rapidly took anti-communist measures: proclamation of martial law, disarmament of workers’ pickets, arrest of Communist Party members, and restriction of trade union activities.

It was clear that a decisive show-down was looming within the Guomindang and the national movement. Chen Duxiu informed the Communist International and requested that the CCP withdraw from the Guomindang in order to insure its organizational independence. The policy of the “bloc within” had been proposed (against Chen’s opinion) by the Dutch Henk Sneevliet (Maring) and later supported by Joffe (a friend of Trotsky), then the official delegate of the Communist International in China. Sneevliet was inspired by previous experience in Indonesia. In 1926, however, as the situation evolved, Trotsky and his comrades supported the position of Chen Duxiu. Two years after the death of Lenin, factional struggles were raging within the Soviet Communist Party. The “Chinese issue” became locked in the ongoing political conflicts of the USSR. On the orders of Stalin and Bukharin, the Communist International, at the plenary meeting of November–December 1926, rejected the constitution of left communist “factions” within the Guomindang and any perspective of getting out of it. At that time, the CCP was not in the political position to reject the discipline imposed by Moscow and the Communist International. It therefore lost the initiative while Chiang Kai-shek organized the counterrevolution. The defeat of the Second Chinese Revolution was played out in three bloody acts in 1927.

The first act began in Shanghai on March 21, 1927, when trade unions and the communists led a successful uprising. In conformity with the policy of the Communist International, they did not oppose the occupation of the town by Chiang Kai-shek’s military forces. On April 12 thousands of labor activists were massacred by the “National” army operating jointly with underworld gangs and bosses’ goons. On May 21 the Guomindang launched another massacre in Changsa. Some 10,000 communists were killed in Hunan province’s capital and its surroundings.

The second act played in Wuhan, the capital of the province of Hubei in the center of China. Wang Jinwei and the “left-wing” government of the Guomindang (its leadership split) were based there. Moscow and Stalin gave them their support. On May 11, 1927, however, Wuhan’s government turned against its communist ally and repressed it violently in order to reconcile with Chiang Kai-shek.

Finally, the third act played in Canton. Faced by the disastrous evolution of the situation, Moscow abruptly decided to organize an insurrection in the South on December 11, 1927. Isolated, the “Canton Commune” could not hold out. Repression was again ferocious.

Civil War: 1928–1935

The CCP paid a high price for the counterrevolution. Throughout the country, numerous militants and some central leaders like Li Dazhao were killed. The CCP only retained its forces thanks to the insurrections of the summer of 1927. The right wing of the Guomindang controlled most of the nationalist armed forces, but communist influence was sometimes great, like in the Fourth Army, which rebelled on August 1, 1927 (celebrated afterwards as the founding date of the Red Army): this was the Nanchang Uprising, led by Zhou Enlai and pro-communist officers like He Long and Ye Ting. In September, a peasant insurrection erupted in Hunan, where Mao Zedong was then: this was the Autumn Harvest Uprising. Mao withdrew into the mountains of Jinggangshan, at the border of Hunan and Jiangxi, where Zhu De joined him. Further to the north, in the region of Wuhan, Peng Dehuai also commanded a significant military force.

In 1930 most of the communist military forces commanded by Mao Zedong, Zhu De, Zhou Enlai, and Peng Dehuai ended up grouping themselves in the new Soviet republic of Jiangxi. In spite of the series of defeats, the CCP still controlled some 300,000 soldiers in the whole country, which indicates the scope of radicalization in 1925–7. The Red Army was therefore born from mass upheavals, great social struggles, and military rebellions, not from small guerilla units. This explains its longevity: born within the Second Chinese Revolution, it became the spearhead of the Third Chinese Revolution and of the 1949 victory. The Red Army thus bridged the gaps between all the big revolutionary episodes from 1920 to 1940.

In the USSR the Stalinist faction consolidated its power. Instead of criticizing itself for the orientation it had imposed in China, it placed complete responsibility for the defeats on successive leaders of the CCP from 1927 to 1930: Chen Duxiu, Qu Qiubai, Li Lisan, etc. This was extremely unfair considering that the CCP was a young party in the midst of a revolutionary storm just a few years after its birth and which very naturally placed its trust in the Russian comrades and envoys of the Communist International. The CCP was one of the first parties to have been directly confronted with the international consequences of the Stalinist victory in the USSR.

Chen Duxiu, one of the greatest surviving figures of Chinese Marxism, joined for a while the International Left Opposition (the Trotskyist movement) and its criticism of the process of bureaucratization of the revolution. Returning from Moscow officially to take the leadership of the Communist Party, Wang Ming remained faithful to the Stalinist faction. In Jiangxi, however, the new leadership constituting itself around Mao started more pragmatically to distance itself from the Soviets, convinced that from now on it was up to the Chinese to decide the orientation in China. The conflict between the Wang Ming and Mao factions marked the whole history of the party for the next two decades. It started early on in the Soviet republic of Jiangxi. Mao was elected president on November 7, 1931, but the members of his faction were kept from significant positions in 1933, and he himself was isolated. It was only two years later, during the Long March, that the Maoist leadership began to consolidate its authority. Meanwhile, the Red Army had to abandon its bases in South China.

From 1930 to 1934, Chiang Kai-shek led five big anti-communist extermination campaigns against the zones controlled by the CCP, mobilizing enormous military means. The bases in Henan, Hubei, and Anhui had to be rapidly evacuated, but the base in Jiangxi – where Mao remained – resisted. It was only in August 1934 that the abandonment of the base was decided on. The Red Army broke through the blockade: it was the beginning of the legendary Long March, a real epic but also a strategic retreat that ended only in October 1935, in Yan'an, in Shaanxi, in the Northwest of the country. When he started out on the Long March, Mao's army corps counted 86,000 soldiers. After a long and perilous journey of 10,000 kilometers, when it reached Shaanxi, they were less than 5,000. Thanks to the arrival of troops from other regions, the Red Army, finally based at Yan'an, increased to 40,000 fighters, a derisory figure for China.

The new Maoist leadership team was steeled through such trials, but was not yet unified (it divided again in the years that followed). Around Mao Zedong there were key politico-military leaders like Zhu De, Peng Dehuai, Lin Biao, Chen Yi or the “One-eyed Dragon” Liu Bocheng, as well as major political figures who previously often opposed Mao, like Zhou Enlai. Cadres operating in zones other than Jiangxi afterwards integrated into this leadership, especially Deng Xiaoping and Liu Shaoqi.

While revolution and counterrevolution confronted one another in the nationalist camp, imperial Japan reinforced its positions on the continent. In September 1931 it invaded Manchuria in the Northeast, where it created in the following year a protectorate: the state of Manchukuo. In January 1932 the Japanese attacked Shanghai, breaking resistance after three months of siege and an atrocious massacre. In 1933 it occupied Jehol and penetrated into Chabar. These were the early signs of World War II in Asia. During this period, Chiang Kai-shek made agreements with Japan to concentrate its army against the communist strongholds. For its part, the CCP symbolically declared war on Japan and presented the forced retreat of the Long March as instead a means of approaching the Japanese.

Thus, in the midst of the civil war, the national question remained at the heart of the Chinese political situation. In the early 1920s a large array of social forces had closed ranks in opposition to Japanese, British, or French rule. The political evolution of Sun Yat-sen's Guomindang seemed promising. The workers' movement itself was created within the national movement. However, as soon as the anti-imperialist fight gained strength – thanks to the workers and popular and peasant mobilizations – social contradictions sharpened and the unity of the nationalist movement was smashed. Chiang Kai-shek's Guomindang became an instrument of the bourgeois counterrevolution. Class antagonisms prevailed over national unity.

Maoism did not yet exist in the mid-1920s. It took form as a distinct political current in the heat of the Second Chinese Revolution and the violent confrontations that followed. It then passed through a formidable experience of urban and rural struggle; a rich and complex political experience, especially as regards the relationship between the Guomindang, the CCP, and the USSR. It learnt at a very early stage from extensive military experience against the warlords, then in the civil war launched by Chiang Kai-shek. It experienced the intimate connections between national and social questions. It suffered the merciless violence of the counterrevolution and was toughened by defeat.

Anti-Japanese Resistance: 1937–1945

At the end of the Long March the young Maoist leadership was socially and geographically marginalized and had fallen back on Yan'an. But, matured through the experience of the years 1925–35, it was able to take the political initiative as soon as the situation would allow it. This proved the case when, in July 1937, Japan launched the conquest of China. The old Middle Kingdom this time was running the risk of being integrated into the Japanese zone of influence. It was also a major turning point for the whole region: World War II had begun in the Far East. In some countries the pan-Asian nationalism promoted by Tokyo obtained temporary favorable interest from sectors of the national anti-colonial movement, but in China the imperial army was perceived as a brutal occupation force. The Rape of Nanking remained in the memory as the symbol of the atrocities committed by the occupants, after six weeks of massacres from December 1937 to January 1938. The nation looked to Chinese political parties to fight the invader. The issue of national alliance was again raised.

In 1937 Chiang Kai-shek had established his control over most of the Chinese territory. The warlords were defeated militarily or otherwise integrated into the new regime. In the towns the labor movement was crushed, both by the Japanese army and the Chinese bourgeoisie. Communist cadres were decimated and the main representatives of the left opposition incarcerated (Chen Duxiu, Peng Shutze). The Guomintang had built a dictatorial regime with fascist characteristics (its Blue Shirt thugs wreaking terror) around the slogan "One Doctrine, One Party, One Chief." Chiang Kai-shek did not want to leave any democratic space which would have allowed the social movements to make a comeback or a "third force" to exist. He did not succeed in crushing definitively the Communist Party under the Maoist leadership – a failure which proved fatal.

Thus, the Sino-Japanese conflict involved the Japanese army, the forces of the Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, and those of the Communist Party. The Guomintang and the CCP formed an Anti-Japanese Front in 1937, but this fragile alliance did not end the class conflict that opposed the two parties.

Two wars were waged simultaneously from 1937 to 1945: a war of national defense against Japanese invasion and the civil war between the revolutionary and counterrevolutionary forces. Neither Chiang nor Mao was fooled by the alliance they built against Tokyo. Both of them knew that the question of power would be posed in China immediately the Japanese were defeated. Thus, in the midst of the "united front" period, violent battles sometimes opposed the "whites" against the "reds." In January 1941 the South Anhui Incident showed where this antagonism could lead: a communist army of 9,000 was decimated by the Guomintang. Chiang Kai-shek had to pay a heavy political price for this crushing military victory: in the eyes of the public, he had massacred nationalist fighters moving up to the front against Japanese occupying forces.

Chiang Kai-shek had a rational conception of the anti-Japanese resistance from what we might call his class point of view. He wanted to preserve his military forces as much as possible and weaken those of the CCP in order to be in a favorable position when the Japanese defeat left the two Chinese armies face to face. To this end he used the immensity of the Chinese territory, retreating gradually with the advance of Japanese troops: he was losing space but gaining time. This strategy was reinforced when the United States entered the war after Pearl Harbor in December 1941: Japan would be defeated in the Pacific by the Allies; all the more reason to economize forces in China. The Achilles' heel of the Generalissimo's strategy was political: his retreat left the population defenseless, while the communist guerillas stood firm and infiltrated enemy lines to organize resistance alongside the people. Nationalist opinion progressively tilted in favor of the CCP. Chiang Kai-shek also underestimated the efficiency of the alternative strategy implemented by the Maoist leadership: the protracted people's war.

In China the civil war preceded by many decades the conquest of power, while in Russia it succeeded it. The social structure of the two countries was moreover very different. To what extent, then, could the Chinese communists draw their inspiration from the Russian Red Army – or rather from the national traditions of peasants' wars? From 1932 the debates of the CCP leadership on the "Chinese road" took the form of a long military controversy between those who held to “Russian orthodoxy” and those who followed the “Chinese archaism” of Mao Zedong. These debates were neither simple nor static – some critics of Mao later joined his leadership team – but the basic disagreements between the Wang Ming faction and the Maoists continued throughout the 1930s and 1940s, with the Wang Ming faction of the CCP advocating a more conventional military policy that relied more on the alliance with the Guomindang.

The Red Army arose from mass insurrections (urban and rural) and military upheavals. The retreat to Yan’an was not a free political choice, but an option imposed by defeat. Mao would have preferred to hold on to “red” zones in the South from which to launch anti-Japanese resistance. Therefore, in the mid-1930s and after a major defeat, he wondered how he could preserve the social and military forces that escaped the disaster, and how to take back the initiative. His answer was deeply political and expressed another class point of view to that of Chiang Kai-shek.

The redeployment of communist armies to the North is a clear example of Mao’s bold choices. At the end of the 1930s the Maoist leadership took a very daring decision to expand communist networks in the whole country, but to send a large part of the best military forces to the North, behind Japanese lines, even if it meant withdrawing troops from their traditional strongholds. This decision took into account military, political, and social factors. Recourse to the mobility of the partisans and the great operational flexibility of a guerilla war made it possible to confront a well-armed enemy. The Red Army would operate in the Northern provinces without getting into direct conflict with Chiang Kai-shek’s forces (which remained on the other side of Japanese lines) and take the opportunity to liquidate the residual power of the Guomindang. Faced with the brutality of Japanese occupation, it could easily gain a mass base even in the zones where it did not have any organization. By responding to peasants’ demands it transformed the war of national defense into a real people’s war, thus giving it considerable strength. In this way the CCP could create new liberated zones under its sole control.

The CCP took a big risk in redeploying its armies so radically: the Guomindang moved into the regions from where troops were withdrawn and could even (in 1947) capture Yan’an, the “war capital” of the communists. But the Maoists gained a lot. Their conception of a protracted people’s war allowed them to accumulate important military, social, and political forces. In 1945, at the time of Japanese surrender, the liberated zones under their control had nearly 100 million inhabitants, or 20 percent of the population. It became an effective territorial form of dual power, an alternative to Chiang Kai-shek’s regime.

Third Chinese Revolution

The Japanese army was bogged down and exhausted in its attempt to conquer China. By emphasizing essentially the battle of the Pacific and the intervention of American forces (and British and Australian), western authors often underestimate the essential role of the Chinese resistance in Japan’s defeat. Nevertheless, the Japanese surrender was precipitated by the nuclear devastation (arguably, war crimes) of Hiroshima and Nagasaki. The Chinese general staffs were surprised by the rapidity of events, when all their forces were then engaged in a race to reinforce their positions in expectation of the Japanese crumbling.

On August 6, 1945 the first atomic bomb hit Hiroshima. On August 8 the USSR entered the war against Japan and penetrated into Manchuria. On August 9 Mao called for a general counter-offensive against Japan to seize its armaments. On August 14, Tokyo signed the surrender. Soon after the capitulation, the Allied command ordered Japanese troops stationed in China to surrender only to the Guomindang. Chiang Kai-shek’s forces were then positioned in the Southwest, enormous air resources were deployed by the United States to transfer them rapidly to the Central and Northern provinces, keeping the communists from conquering the principal urban centers. With such help, the Guomindang recuperated most of the spoils of war.

In spite of the American intervention, the Communist Party succeeded in extending its liberated zones. It concentrated forces in Manchuria. However, in Manchuria, the Soviets occupied the terrain up to 1946. It was Moscow that accepted the Japanese surrender and took the opportunity to bring back to Russia the industrial infrastructure of the region, rich in Japanese investment. Moscow also left the Guomindang to take control of the main towns, but the CCP reinforced its own bases and armaments.

In parallel with this race for advantage, the Guomintang and the CCP engaged in peace negotiations. Their forces had attained an unstable equilibrium. The population looked for peace and each political party had to show that the eventual resumption of the civil war was the responsibility of the other. The United States and The Soviet Union were also negotiating. Moscow took its time in leaving Manchuria, but fundamentally the Soviet leadership respected the Yalta Agreement in which China's buffer state became part of the western zone of influence (Stalin in fact did not believe that a communist victory was possible in China). The United States efficiently supported the Guomintang, but they were not in a position to involve themselves in a new war on the continent. Chiang Kai-shek was in control of formidable military might, but he needed time to redeploy its forces, and the first attacks made against CCP zones soon turned sour.

Retrospectively, the resumption of the civil war seems inevitable, despite peace negotiations. The battle for peace was for a while an essential terrain of political confrontation between the revolution and the counterrevolution. The negotiations were held under American aegis and rapidly bogged down. The return to civil war began in March–April 1946. Fighting spread throughout that summer. One year later, the Red Army (renamed the People's Liberation Army) (PLA) took the offensive in Manchuria. The national collapse of the Guomintang started at the end of 1948. Communist forces won Beijing in January 1949, Shanghai in May, Canton in October, and Nanning (at the border with Vietnam) in December. Severely defeated, the Guomintang retreated to Taiwan, to the great displeasure of the population of the island.

While battles were still being fought in the Southwest, the People's Republic was proclaimed on October 1, 1949. The victory of the PLA was remarkably quick, even though the military balance of power was very unfavorable. It was the evolution of social forces that allowed the communists to win in such a way: the Chinese civil war really became a social revolution.

There was not always agreement between the aspirations of peasant movements and the CCP's action program, which was more or less radical depending on fluctuating alliance policies. The party was sometimes bypassed by sudden spontaneous mobilizations of poor peasants, while in other places or times it required intense efforts to free the most disadvantaged people in villages from subjection to clans. From the end of 1945 the question of agrarian reform (and not only the reduction of rents) became more and more important. In May 1946 the central slogan "The land to the tiller" was launched nationally. In September 1947 the CCP called a conference on land to adopt the principle of an agrarian law abolishing the system of feudal and semi-feudal exploitation. It advocated radical measures that later it had to moderate so as not to alienate itself from richer peasants.

The agrarian structure varied considerably in China, which did not help when it came to devising specific programs of reform. Where land was particularly scarce, poor peasants turned against richer peasants, not just the wealthy and the landlords. The CCP tried to moderate its policies in the course of 1948, but nevertheless a real agrarian revolution took place during the Third Chinese Revolution, and was generalized after the victory. In many cases, in villages, the change in power was radical, with the disintegration of the class of landlords and the marginalization of rich peasants.

In the aftermath of World War II, Chiang Kai-shek could still hope to stabilize his regime in the urban centers of the coastal areas. However, his authority rapidly dwindled. Corruption, malpractice, factionalism, and authoritarianism alienated democratic opinion. Students initiated a vast campaign against American occupation after two navy officers were accused of raping a young Chinese woman. Inflation reached gigantic proportions, crashing headlong into the middle class and civil servants. The working class entered into struggle, showing a combativeness that allowed it to obtain in 1946 a sliding scale of wages. Demonstrations and strikes multiplied in 1947–8. However, the urban proletariat was much less politicized than in the 1920s. The CCP retained a militant network in the workers' movement, but it was very weak. On the other hand, corporatist traditions were powerful.

The Chiang Kai-shek regime also alienated national opinion when it seemed ready to enter into a new international alliance with the United States and Japan. Looked down upon and hated, Chiang Kai-shek lost the war politically in the urban areas before any military battle. The final confrontation with communist forces began on the occasion of a great national crisis.

End of Four Decades of War and Revolution

Four decades after the Chinese Revolution of 1911 and the Russian Revolution of 1917, China changed sides: it was one of the first (with Yugoslavia) and worst failures of the Yalta conference. Without breaking with the Stalinist leadership of the Communist International, the CCP had gained its independence and elaborated its own strategic orientation. Somehow, Mao Zedong seemed personally to incarnate the formation of a “sinisied” Marxism. As a student, he had read a lot and worked on translations of European thinkers, comparing philosophical approaches and classical political theories, and only coming to know of Marxism when he was 26 years old. He devoured the press and followed world events with care. He was subject to numerous intellectual influences and was interested in many trends, especially anarchism. However, in spite of great effort, he never succeeded in mastering a foreign language. He never traveled out of China (except briefly to meet Stalin) and quoted more willingly Chinese philosophers than the fathers of western Marxism. In this way he was very different from the other main personalities of Asian Marxism like Ho Chi Minh, who incarnated to perfection the Vietnamese figure of “Uncle Ho,” but who also made his debut in France and in the Komintern. Nevertheless, there were other strong personalities in the Maoist leadership team, including those who knew the world well, like Deng Xiaoping and Zhou Enlai.

The “sinisation” of Marxism was neither limited to Mao Zedong nor to Maoism. Other figures – like the founders of the CCP Li Dazhao (assassinated in 1927) and Chen Duxiu (who died in 1942) – and other currents (libertarian, left opposition, etc.) contributed to the diffusion of Marxism in China. But 25 years of war and repression suffocated the pluralism of the Chinese revolutionary movement. The CCP under Maoist leadership emerged as the only party to have passed through this ordeal. The pivotal role of Mao was undeniable.

The Maoist revolution possessed numerous authoritarian and repressive characteristics. The new leadership of the CCP was forged in a permanent, merciless, military fight and intense factional struggles. It retreated into remote regions, socially very conservative. It leant back against an international “camp” dominated by Stalinism and built the personality cult of Mao as opposed to the cult of Stalin. Long before the conquest of power on a national scale, a politico-administrative bureaucratic structure was created in the vast liberated zones of the North.

The Maoist revolution was also the product of intense social struggles which raised the issue of modernization from the point of view of the dominated class. The fact that poor peasants spoke out and seized part of the power in villages represented a major democratic act. It was the same for the mobilization of women in the countryside. Maoist doctrine concerning women’s liberation varied through time: it was very libertarian at the time of the Soviet republic of Jiangxi, but much more conservative at the time of Yan’an. But the involvement of peasants in the struggles, the creation of women-communist structures in the villages, the multiplication of mass women’s organizations, and the famous “speak bitterness meetings” during which the poor and the women villagers reached a collective consciousness of their oppression and asserted their rights, shook the traditional oppressive relationships of domination. The criticisms (often justified) of Maoist authoritarianism should not hide this important dimension of the Chinese agrarian revolution. It was a democratic dimension sanctioned by the adoption of two important laws by the new regime: on land reform and on the family and women’s rights.

Under the dictatorial regime of the Guomindang, Chinese society also evolved, but confined essentially to urban society. The condition of rich or educated women changed, but the “national revolution” of Chiang Kai-shek could not challenge the oppression of the poor peasant or the female villager, as he had to depend on the traditional authority of the wealthy, the landlords, and the clans in the countryside. The bourgeoisie (Chinese or international) was not anti-feudal. In the towns and surrounding rural areas the development of capitalism dissolved traditional social relationships, but under such exploitative conditions that it prevented it from acquiring a democratic dimension.

During the civil war there were, in the towns, important changes of opinion that prepared the way for the revolution of 1949, including anti-imperialist mobilizations, evolution of intellectual and nationalist opinion in favor of the CCP, rejection of the Guomindang, and growing student identification with the Red Army. The communists won the battle of legitimacy, but their networks were too weak in the urban metropolis to organize from within the popular classes. As much as the proletariat revealed itself pugnacious on social demands after World War II, it remained largely passive at the political level.

Scenting victory, the CCP took a major political turn. In March 1949 Mao Zedong announced that from then on the center of gravity of communist action had to again be in the urban centers, while, from 1927 to the beginning of 1949, it was in the countryside. The CCP declared in its March 5 report to the Central Committee: “The period ‘from the city to the village’ and of the city leading the village has begun.” This implied, as Liu Shaoqi emphasized on March 12, an enormous effort to organize the working class:

Our party used to have close ties with the working class, but later we were compelled to move to the countryside. The Guomindang has been operating among the workers for so many years that, through its influence, it has made the ranks of the workers more complicated. Moreover, our ties with the workers have been weakened and our cadres (including members of the Central Committee) do not know them very well and are no longer good at working among them. Hence, we must study assiduously.

The sociopolitical trajectory of the CPC is one of the most surprising characteristics of the Chinese Revolution: obliged to retreat to the countryside, it remained for more than twenty years immersed in the rural world. It depended on the peasants to continue a fight started in the towns. In spite of this, and contrary to prognostics, it did not become a peasant party. As soon as it resettled in urban centers, the town “commanded” again, to use Mao’s expression. This is what allowed the CCP to rebuild a state on the scale of China, opening a new chapter of the country’s history, that of Maoism in power.

SEE ALSO: China, Maoism and Popular Power, 1949–1969; Chinese Nationalist Revolution, 1911; Lu Xun (1881–1936); Mao Zedong (1893–1976); Peng Dehuai (1898–1974); Sun Yat-Sen (1866–1925); Zhou Enlai (1898–1976); Zhu De (1886–1976)

References and Suggested Readings

Belden, J. (1970) China Shakes the World. New York: Monthly Review Press.

- Benton, G. (1996) China’s Urban Revolutionaries: Explorations in the History of Chinese Trotskyism, 1921–1952. Atlantic Highlands, NJ: Humanities Press.
- Benton, G. (1999) New Fourth Army: Communist Resistance Along the Yangtze and the Huai, 1938–1941. Richmond: Curzon.
- Bergere, M.-C. (1986) Sun Yat-sen. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Bergere, M.-C. (1989) The Golden Age of the Chinese Bourgeoisie, 1911–1937. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Bianco, L. (1971) Origins of the Chinese Revolution, 1915–1949. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Bianco, L. (2005) Jacqueries et révolution dans la Chine du XX^e siècle. Paris: La Martinière.
- Brand, C., Schwartz, B., & Fairbank, J. K. (1952) A Documentary History of Chinese Communism. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press; New York: Atheneum.
- Broue, P. (documents presented by) (1976) La Question chinoise dans l’Internationale communiste (1926–1927) (The Chinese Question in the Communist International (1926–1927)). Paris: Etudes et documentation internationales (EDI).
- Carrere D’Encausse, H. & Schram, S. (1969) Marxism and Asia. London: Allen Lane.
- Chen, Y.-F. (1986) Making Revolution: The Communist Movement in Eastern and Central China, 1937–1945. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Chesneaux, J. (1968) The Chinese Labour Movement: 1919–27. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Chow Tse-tung (1960) The May Fourth Movement: Intellectual Revolution in Modern China. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press
- Dirlik, A. (1991) Anarchism in the Chinese Revolution. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Fairbank, J. K. (Ed.) (1983–6) The Cambridge History of China, Vols. 12 (with Twitchett, D.) & 13 (with Feuerwerker, A.). Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Hinton, W. (1966) Fanshen: A Documentary of Revolution in a Chinese Village. New York: Monthly Review Press.
- Isaac, H. (1961) The Tragedy of the Chinese Revolution. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Johnson, C. A. L. (1962) Peasant Nationalism and Communist Power: The Emergence of Revolutionary China 1937–1945. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Liu Shaoqi (1981) Selected Works of Liu Shaoqi. Vol. 1. Peking: People’s Publishing House.
- Mao Tsetung (1972) Selected Works of Mao Tsetung. 4 vols. Peking: People’s Publishing House. (In this official publication, Mao’s writings have sometimes been modified. For the original versions, see in this bibliography Mao’s works as edited by S. Schram.)

- Mao Tsetung (1992–9) Mao's Road to Power: Revolutionary Writings 1912–1949. 5 vols. Ed. S. Schram. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe.
- Salisbury, H. (1985) The Long March: The Untold Story. New York: Harper & Row; London: Macmillan.
- Scalapino, R. A. & Yu, T. (1961) The Chinese Anarchist Movement. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Schram, S. (1966–7) Mao Tse-tung. London: Pelican.
- Schram, S. (1969) The Political Thought of Mao Tse-tung. London: Pall Mall; New York: Praeger.
- Short, P. (1999) Mao: A Life. London: Hodder & Stoughton.
- Snow, E. (1938) Red Star Over China. New York: Random House.
- Wang, F.-H. (1991) Memoirs of a Chinese Revolutionary. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Zhou Enlai (1980) Selected Works of Zhou Enlai. Vol. 1. Peking: People's Publishing House.
- Zhu De (1983) Selected Works of Zhu De. Peking: People's Publishing House.

Chinese Nationalist Revolution, 1911

Amit Bhattacharyya

The Revolution of 1911 in China signaled the end of the Manchu (also known as Ching/Qing) dynasty and the establishment of the republican form of government in China. It was also called the Hsin-hai revolution because 1911 is a Xinhai year in the sexagenary cycle of the Chinese lunar calendar. Three distinct phases are discernible in this revolution, as different social forces and political groups played their role in it – the new gentry, western-educated intellectuals, reformists, the later-Ching reformers, constitutionalists, secret societies, toiling people, overseas Chinese students and, above all, the revolutionaries who assembled under the leadership of Sun Yat-sen.

First Stage (1894–1904)

From the 1890s, reformist ideology had been gaining ground among the western-educated professional and commercial people who resided in China's partially westernized port cities. The national sentiment of the Chinese people was hurt at the aggressive war waged by the French imperialists during 1884–1885 and the humiliating treaty that China was compelled to sign. Sun Yat-sen, along with others, presented conventional proposals for reform, known as the "Petition to Li Hung-chang," one of China's most influential exponents of modernization. Three measures were prescribed as essential means of bringing wealth to the nation and well-being to the people. They were: full utilization of the nation's talents, better use of land and natural resources, and complete free-flow of goods. Essentially, these proposals related to the newly emerging national bourgeoisie who were influenced by western ideas. However, Sun's attempts failed, impelling him to think in terms of the revolutionary overthrow of the Manchu rulers and the setting up of a republic.

With this end in view, Sun Yat-sen formed Hsing Chung Hui (Revive China Society) in 1894 in Honolulu. It was China's first bourgeois revolutionary organization, formed initially with about 20 members, and the number increased to 120 sometime later. Meanwhile China was defeated in the Sino-Japanese War (1894–1895) and compelled to accept the humiliating treaty of Shimonoseki in 1895, representing a flagrant interference in the internal affairs of China. Anti-Manchu popular outbreaks spread from one area to another. Sun Yat-sen first planned a revolutionary uprising in Canton. The Chien Heng Company in Hong Kong – ostensibly a commercial firm – acted as a legal cover for the Hong Kong branch of Hsing Chung Hui. H. Z. Schiffrin (1968) has written an account of how the rising in Canton was to take place.

However, the plot was exposed and Sun became a fugitive in China. He left China first for England and then went to other European countries, giving him firsthand experience of western societies. This foreign exposure also helped him to gain fame as the Chinese national leader. Meanwhile China's defeat in 1894–1895 proved the futility of the program of "westernization" and "learning from foreigners."

The reform movement got a stimulus from then on. The failure of the reform movement of 1898 made many people skeptical about the efficacy of such programs as long as the Ching remained in power, for within that structure no permanent solutions would be available for the ill China had been suffering. Meanwhile the situation in Japan turned out to be favorable for the Chinese revolutionaries. With the end of the privilege of extra-territoriality from July 1899 to all foreign nationals residing in Japan, the Chinese revolutionaries were in an advantageous position. Sun Yat-sen was now free to move about openly and spread propaganda among the 10,000 overseas Chinese residents in Japan, convincing them of the need for revolution in China.

Meanwhile, events in China were moving towards a national crisis with unabashed imperial aggression. Railway and mining concessions were being lavishly given away. In 1896, Russia had obtained concessions in Manchuria for the Trans-Siberian railway. The Germans, the French, and the Belgians had railway projects in their pockets. These rapid developments of foreign enterprise played havoc with China's economy. The condition was ripe for a revolutionary uprising. The spark of the Boxer Rebellion, which started a prairie fire, raised the slogan "Exterminate the foreigners." It also failed. But failures did not mean the spirit of rebellion was dead.

Besides Hsing Chung Hui, there were other societies which played a positive role in the revolution. These included Kuang Fu Hui (Society for the Restoration of China) and Hua Hsing Hui (Society for the Revival of the Chinese Nation). The former was the outgrowth of Chun Kuo Min Chiao Yu Hui (Society for Military Education), set up by Chinese students in Japan in 1903. Before the establishment of this society, two intellectuals from Shanghai, Tsai Yuan-pei and Chang Tai-yen, set up Chun Kuo Min Chiao Yu Hui (Educational Society of China), which secretly sent people back to China to prepare for armed revolution. They spread revolutionary propaganda in the guise of education, collected funds and planned to set up their own college. Students in Nanyang College in Shanghai organized a strike against college authorities for suppressing their freedom of speech. The students in the Army College at Nanking went on strike, and some came to Shanghai to join Chun Kuo Min Chiao Yu Hui. In 1904 Tao Cheng-chang and others established contact with Lung Hua Hui (Dragon Flower Society) and other organizations in Chekiang. The regulations of Lung Hua Hui demanded the transfer of all land to public ownership and stopping its usurpation by wealthy, despotic landlords. The members of the secret societies in Kiangsu, Chekiang and Anhwei welcomed this demand.

The three revolutionary organizations – Hsing Chung Hui, Kuang Fu Hui and Hua Hsing Hui – were in agreement about overthrowing the Ching government by armed revolt. The regions embracing Kwangtung, Hunan, Hupei and the lower Yangtze valley region were the main centers of the movement. These areas, more advanced in industry and commerce, were in regular touch with the outside world and sent many students abroad for study. Here the conflict between the old and the new was particularly sharp. Moreover, secret societies, whose central slogan was "overthrow the Ching and restore the Ming," extended their active support to such revolutionary efforts.

Along with these developments, a number of periodicals containing revolutionary-democratic propaganda were gaining wider circulation. Books exposing the torture committed by the Ching nobility ever since they seized power by overthrowing the Ming in 1644 were reprinted. Two such books, namely Ten Days at Yangchow and The Massacre at Chiating, helped to stir nationalist feeling against the Manchu ruling clique.

Writings by gentry-intellectuals were published revealing the corruption of the Manchus and their subservience and "selling out" of the country to the imperialist powers. Tsou Jung's The Revolutionary Army, Chen Tien-hua's Alarm Bell and Awakening, and Chang Tai-yen's Kang Yu-wei's Theory of Revolution Refuted were a few of the writings among this anti-establishment literature which created the deepest impression on the public mind. Chen Tien-hua could write in very powerful, passionate language and his style was lively. His writings included a call for direct political action. His demands included the expulsion of the foreign invaders and the destruction of the native traitors and collaborators who served them, in order to nullify humiliating treaties, recover lost sovereign rights and achieve complete independence.

Western materials written during the bourgeois revolutions were compiled and translated to disseminate bourgeois democratic revolutionary ideas. Among the progressive periodicals, Chung Kuo Jih Pao (China Daily), founded by Hsing Chung Hui in Hong Kong, deserves special mention. The Chinese students settled in Japan published periodicals such as The Compilation of Translations by Students Abroad, Mainland, Hupei Students News, Kiangsu, New Hunan and the Chekiang Tide.

Like all repressive regimes, the Manchu government also resorted to state terror and repression to combat such political and ideological attacks. When the Kiangsi News was banned, the revolutionaries brought out another paper called Citizens' Daily. As more and more papers faced the wrath of the Manchu police, people became increasingly interested to know what was being written in this proscribed literature.

Repression was not the only path adopted by the Manchu rulers to keep their rule intact. In fact, in the years after 1900, the already awakened intellectual movement showed a vigor that could not be denied. The reforms demanded in 1898, and rejected at the time, were now reconsidered. Empress Tzu-hsi had to take a more conciliatory attitude towards requests for the encouragement of western learning in order to protect her regime from impending disaster. The later-Ching reforms included investment by private capital in the railways. These reforms ultimately moved towards the demand for the establishment of a constitutional parliament.

Second Stage (1905–1908)

Japan's victory over Tsarist Russia in the Russo-Japanese War (1904–5) partially removed the sting of China's own defeat at the hands of Japan in 1894–5. Russia's defeat instilled, in a different way, a spirit of confidence in the minds of Chinese people (Sharman 1934). Japan's victory was attributed to its modernization. Instead of moving along the road to modernization, the Ching government, after the signing of the Protocol of 1901, had surrendered the country to foreign powers. This, along with merciless plunder of the people, brought China to the brink of national collapse in the first decade of the twentieth century. China's position in world affairs had also deteriorated as US-Japanese conflict led to a realignment of forces in the East. In order to counter US imperialism Japan concluded a secret agreement with Russia in July 1910, under which the tsar's government let Japan annex Korea, while Japan promised to facilitate the tsar's thrust into Mongolia, thereby endangering Chinese imperial possessions.

The new situation demanded the rapid formation of a unified revolutionary party to lead the bourgeois-democratic revolution on a nationwide scale. The outcome was the founding of Tung Meng Hui (Revolutionary Brotherhood) on July 30, 1905 in Tokyo under Sun Yat-sen. This organization was different from all previous revolutionary bodies, which bore deep marks of the old secret societies and were rather local in character and formed along the coastal zones and confined within the overseas groups. Tung Meng Hui, on the contrary, was the prototype of the modern political party. The new organization extended its network to the heart of China. In contrast to Hsing Chung Hui, which had been overwhelmingly Cantonese, the new organization was more broad-based and commanded multi-provincial, national support. This Revolutionary Brotherhood consisted of a loose alliance of the bourgeois and petty-bourgeois revolutionaries plus anti-Manchu elements from the landlord class. There were also intellectuals, Chinese living abroad, members of secret societies and Chinese small businessmen, particularly from Shanghai. Its leadership adopted the "Program of Revolution," consisting of eight documents, including the "Manifesto of the Military Government" and "Manifesto to the World," and adopted policies for general administration, foreign affairs and particularly for armed uprisings in the various parts of the country.

From 1905 to 1911, numerous anti-tax riots and revolutionary outbreaks occurred in different parts of China, particularly in Chaochou, Huichou, Chinchou and Linchou in Kwangtung province. The uprising in Liuyang county in Hunan was led by Hung Fu Hui, and the revolt in Chennankuan in Kwangsi province was organized by Sun Yat-sen. The rebellion of the Anyuan coal miners and the mutiny of the soldiers in Anking, the capital of the province of Anhwei, under the leadership of Kuang Fu Hui, and the Canton rising under Ni Ying-tien were some of the remarkable stirrings, though many of them failed.

The essence of Sun Yat-sen's ideology lay in the slogan: "Drive out the Manchus, restore Chinese rule, establish a republic and equalize land-rights." From this slogan developed the "Three Principles of the People": People's Nationalism, People's Democracy and People's Livelihood.

Third Stage (1909–1911)

Alarmed at the growth of the revolutionary movement, the Ching rulers felt that certain constitutional concessions should be made to hold off revolutionary outbreaks. The Manchu state brought the provincial administration under central control to minimize corruption, extortion and misrule, and also carried out some constitutional reforms. The plan was to move gradually towards a full-fledged parliament by first developing provincial assemblies, and then a national assembly. On August 27, 1908, a nine-year program of constitutional reform was promulgated.

In terms of constitutional changes, the Chinese people were moving in a direction favorable to revolution. Those who had experienced limited parliamentary power were now impatient to gain more. Another event proved helpful to the revolution. The provincial spirit encouraged in some areas considerable opposition to the Peking government's policy of nationalizing the railways and transferring their control to imperialist powers. The Rights Recovery Movement was directed both against the manner in which the loan was procured from the foreigners and the loan itself, which bartered away the country's independence. The government retaliated by arresting members of the league which, in turn, led to massive protest demonstrations all over Sichuan.

The Manchu crisis became more serious than ever before. On the one hand, the reformers had been putting pressure on the rulers to carry out reforms and opposing their pro-imperialist and anti-provincial measures. On the other hand, Tung Meng Hui led by Sun Yat-sen had been secretly preparing for the final showdown with the imperial army. In September 1911, a rising in Sichuan stimulated the revolutionary mood of the people. Events were precipitated by the accidental explosion of a bomb in a secret ammunition depot in Hankow on October 9, 1911, whereby a revolutionary plot was discovered. The imperial artillery of Wuchang openly mutinied and the viceroy fled. On October 11, Wuchang fell to the revolutionaries. Within a month, 13 provinces had been lost to the empire. After the revolution of 1911, the defeated Manchu rulers had stepped down and recalled Yuan Shikai, who had been a mainstay of Empress Tzu Hsi during her coup against the Hundred Days' Reform (1898), as the premier. Yuan favored a settlement by peace conference. Sun Yat-sen, as expected, took over as the president of the Republic on January 1, 1912, at Nanking. The republicans were in control of south China with Nanking as their capital, and Yuan Shikai and his forces were in control of north China with Peking as the capital.

Nature and Assessment of the Revolution

Bergere (1989) refers to Chinese historians like Li Shu, who have described this revolution as a bourgeois democratic revolution and the third revolutionary tide in the modern history of China, following the Taiping and Boxer uprisings. The bourgeoisie of Shanghai directly supported and participated in the uprising. The Shanghai chamber of commerce took part in coordinating the attack on the city arsenal. Li Ping-shu, civilian chief of Hu Army Government, sent members of the chamber of commerce to the Shanghai customs warehouse, where they removed by force 1,500 boxes of ammunition for the use of the insurgent troops, despite foreigners' protests. The industrial and commercial circles in the triple city of Wuhan firmly supported the revolution. A huge sum of money amounting to 4 million taels, which was needed by the Sichuan military government, was supplied by the Chungking chamber of commerce. The same role was played by the industrial and commercial concerns of the capitals in the provinces of Zhejiang, Fujian, Kwangtung, Kwangsi and Anhwei. Their demands for political reforms sprang from the need for political stability as a precondition for capitalist development.

The Revolution of 1911 was brought about by a conjunction of efforts. The imperialist penetration into China and the signing of a series of unequal treaties after the Opium War of 1840–2, peasant rebellions of varying magnitude against the feudal Manchu rule, failure of the reform movement of 1898, the part played by the secret societies, overseas Chinese, revolutionary intellectuals, the laboring poor, a section of the bourgeoisie – all combined to form the mass revolutionary wave. It is not that all wanted revolution; but even those opposed to violence were forced to join the tide because the later-Ching reforms left them with no other alternative. Of the revolutionary forces, it was Sun Yat-sen who set up Tung Meng Hui, placed a program before the people, organized the overseas Chinese, procured money, helped in the revival of secret societies, and inspired sections of the Chinese military students studying in Japan.

However, despite its progressive character, the revolution also suffered from major limitations. The Tung Meng Hui program recognized all the privileges of imperialist powers in China.

The revolution merely made the emperor step down without altering the class structure of the society vis-à-vis the state. China had no respite from imperialist and feudal domination. The content of the dictatorship set up by Yuan Shikai also did not change. Thus the bourgeois-led revolution failed in the end, and its revolutionary aims were achieved only through the revolution of 1949.

SEE ALSO: Chinese Communist Revolution, 1925–1949; Mao Zedong (1893–1976); Sun Yat-Sen (1866–1925); Taiping Rebellion, 1851–1864; Yi Ho Tuan (Boxer) Rebellion

References and Suggested Readings

- Bergere, M. C. (1989) The Golden Age of the Chinese Bourgeoisie 1911–1937. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Compilation Group for the History of Modern China Series (1976) The Revolution of 1911. Peking: Foreign Languages Press.
- Epstein, I. (1956) From Opium War to Liberation. Beijing: New World Press.
- Lu Bowei & Wang Guoping (1991) The Revolution of 1911: Turning Point in Modern Chinese History. Beijing: Foreign Languages Press.
- Schiffirin, H. Z. (1968) Sun Yat-sen and the Origins of the Chinese Revolution. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Sharman, L. (1934) Sun Yat-sen: His Life and its Meaning: A Critical Biography. New York: John Day.
- Sheng, H., Liu, D. et al. (1983) The 1911 Revolution: A Retrospective After 70 Years. Beijing: New World Press.
- Wilbur, C. M. (1976) Sun Yat-sen: The Frustrated Patriot. New York: Columbia University Press.

Chipko movement

Michael Menser

The Chipko movement was an action of local peasants and villagers against state-contracted commercial forestry operations in the Indian state of Uttar Pradesh from 1973 to 1981. Chipko achieved worldwide recognition thanks to the image of villagers non-violently preventing the cutting down of trees by claspings them in their arms. But more importantly, Chipko showed that peasants themselves were capable of successfully responding to the social dislocation caused by ecological degradation. Chipko has inspired other movements throughout the world.

Located in the hills of northern India in the central Himalayas, Uttar Pradesh had been the site of many social struggles and popular uprisings against the Indian department of forestry, both in colonial times and after independence. By the 1960s, deforestation had led to major ecological disasters, especially the Alakananda flood of 1970. The movement began in the Chamoli district in 1973 and spread throughout the Uttarakhand Himalayas by the end of the decade. In Tehri district, Chipko activists would go on to protest limestone mining in the Dehradun hills in the 1980s as well as the Tehri dam, before founding the Beej Bachao Andolan or Save the Seeds movement that continues to the present day. In the Kumaon region, Chipko joined the general movement for a separate Uttarakhand state, which was successful in 2000. Key figures in the movement include Gaura Devi, Sudesha Devi, Bachni Devi, Chandi Prasad Bhatt, Sundarlal Bahuguna, Govind Singh Rawat, Dhoom Singh Negi, and Shamsher Singh Bisht.

In the history of modern environmentalism and social movements, Chipko is noteworthy first because peasants themselves, rather than some elite or vanguard, were the principal agents in the struggle. In particular the local knowledge possessed by villagers with respect to soil, wildlife, and vegetation led to specific seasonal practices that enabled the local ecology to remain vibrant and stable. Also, both women and men played a prominent role. Finally, Chipko was not a single-issue environmentalism but one that integrated sociocultural, economic, and ecological issues in a manner that grounded politics outside of the state and in local communities. (The peasants themselves viewed it as an andolan or “popular movement.”) Indeed, Chipko is cited by ecofeminists, environmentalists, and practitioners of participatory democracy.

SEE ALSO: Eco-anarchism; Ecological Protest Movements; Environmental Protest, United States, 19th Century; Shiva, Vandana (b. 1952)

References and Suggested Readings

- Guha, R. (1994) The Unquiet Woods: Ecological Change and Peasant Resistance in the Himalayas. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Shiva, V. (1989) Staying Alive: Women, Ecology and Development. London: Zed Books.

Chirinos, José Leonardo (d. 1796)

Dario Azzellini

From the 1790s the Haitian Revolution and the ambition of freedom for all echoed throughout the Atlantic world, providing comfort and hope for the abolition of slavery to Africans seeking freedom, equality, and self-determination from European colonial rule. José Leonardo Chirinos, or Zambo Chirinos, was eyewitness to the Haitian Revolution as a free Afro-Venezuelan in the employ of an affluent merchant. As a first-hand observer of the Haitian liberation, Chirinos found the experience a foundation for leading the movement to advance Afro-Venezuelan rights and establish universal principles of equality while freeing Venezuela from Spanish colonial rule. The son of an Afro-Venezuelan father and indigenous mother, Chirinos was not born into servitude. As a worker for José Tellería, a rich merchant and attorney of Coro, Venezuela, Chirinos was brought on the voyage to Saint-Domingue (Haiti) in 1794 while African slaves in the colony were in open revolt against the French colonial slave system. During his visit, Chirinos was introduced to rebels fighting for the abolition of slavery, equality, and later, independence from France. Upon his return to Venezuela in March 1795, a highly politicized Chirinos sought to advance the goal of ending the slavery of Afro-Venezuelans and ending Spanish colonial rule, joining with fellow Afro-Venezuelan revolutionaries in Curimagua, Falcón, a farm in Macanillas, where they planned a major rebellion to abolish slavery.

Chirinos joined José Caridad González, a free African from Congo in Central Africa, fluent in French and Spanish as well as in his Bantu dialect. As a legal advocate for Africans from the Dutch Caribbean island of Curaçao, González earned great respect for establishing land rights for the migrants. Chirinos also met with Cocolfo, a Luango shaman or spiritual leader and traditional medicine man. Cocolfo agitated Afro-Venezuelans through spreading rumors that Spain had already abolished slavery by decree and that local government authorities were secretly withholding this knowledge from their slaves. The Luango formed a distinctively large share of the rebel groups and were noted as an African ethnic group that frequently participated in slave rebellions throughout the Americas. Some 50 years earlier, in 1749, the Luango in Caracas participated in a major slave rebellion.

The conspirators organized and participated in a series of rebellions and insurrections, starting May 10, 1796. After socializing at a local dance, they stormed the El Socorro farm in Macanilla where Chirinos proclaimed the “Law of the French,” the abolition of slavery and white aristocracy, the establishment of a democratic republic, the elimination of duties and taxes on indigenous people, the abolition of all privileges, and total equality for all.

The rebels moved through the hills of Falcón, south of Coro, attacking and burning farms and killing slaveholders. Some insurrectionist followers joined the attacks and marched to Coro with González while Chirinos planned another route of attack and organized additional support along the way. But as González’s rebel force neared the lowlands south of Coro it was met by a militia wielding firearms. The rebels, armed poorly with machetes and clubs, were routed and all survivors decapitated. While Chirinos escaped he was arrested three months later in Baragua and brought to Caracas, where he was sentenced to death by hanging on December 10, 1796. His children were sold into slavery and his wife was tortured and killed.

Chirinos is recognized as a precursor of the struggle for independence and the abolition of slavery and a symbol for the African heritage of Venezuela. In 1995, Chirinos’s name was placed on a tablet in the National Pantheon of Venezuela and his historical relevance forms part of a shared history among those who espouse democracy and freedom throughout the country.

SEE ALSO: Bolívar, Simón (1783–1830); Haiti, Saint-Domingue Revolution, 1789–1804, Aftermath; Haitian Revolution and Independence, 1801–1804; Venezuela, Negro Miguel Rebellion, 1552

References and Suggested Readings

- García, J. (1990) Africa en Venezuela. Caracas: Edición de Lujo.
- García, J. (1993) Afrovenezuela: una visión desde adentro. Caracas: Editorial Fundación Afroamérica.

Chissano, Joaquim (b. 1939)

Justin Corfield

Joaquim Alberto Chissano was the president of Mozambique from the death of Samora Machel in 1986 to 2005. He was one of the long-time members of the Mozambican nationalist movement, FRELIMO (Frente de Libertação de Moçambique), but became a more moderate statesman in his old age.

Born on October 22, 1939 at Chibuto village in Gaza Province in the southern part of Mozambique, Chissano decided to turn to the nationalist cause while at high school in Lourenço Marques (modern-day Maputo). Working with other secondary students, he was one of the early members of FRELIMO, trying to bridge the gap between the intellectual elite such as Eduardo Mondlane (1920–69) and the many illiterate “traditionalists.” Chissano was active from at least 1963, and soon became FRELIMO’s representative in Paris, France, before becoming an instructor at the FRELIMO camp at Kongwa, Tanzania. Working as secretary to Eduardo Mondlane, the president of FRELIMO between 1966 and 1969, he became FRELIMO’s representative in Dar-es-Salaam from 1969 to 1974.

When Mozambique moved toward independence, Chissano was appointed premier of the first government on September 20, 1974, a post he held until independence on June 25, 1975. With the rank of major general, he then became foreign minister, retaining that position until 1986. This saw him gain a significant international profile and considerable political experience.

With the death of Samora Machel in a plane crash on October 19, 1986, Chissano became president of Mozambique. More pragmatic than his predecessor, Chissano abandoned Marxism as a state ideology and one of his first acts as president was to visit the United States of America, where he met with US President Ronald Reagan to request assistance for Mozambique. Chissano was able to gain grants from the International Monetary Fund in 1987, a move that saw a dramatic devaluation of the Mozambican currency; he also introduced the free market economy in November 1990. Chissano tried to end the escalating civil war by seeking peace talks with RENAMO (Resistência Nacional Moçambicana), which led to a truce being signed on August 7, 1992, with the final peace accord being signed in Rome, Italy, on October 6, 1992.

In the presidential elections held in 1994, Chissano managed to defeat the RENAMO leader Afonso Dhlakama, with 53.3 percent to Dhlakama’s 33.7 percent, a victory that surprised the foreign observers for its small size, as few of them had credited Dhlakama with being able to muster many votes. In another presidential election in 1999, Joaquim Chissano managed 52.3 percent of the vote to Dhlakama’s 47.7 percent. It seemed possible that Chissano might lose another election, so he left office at the end of his term on February 2, 2005. FRELIMO’s candidate, Armando Guebuza, was able to convincingly defeat Dhlakama in that election.

During his time as president, Chissano was chairman of the African Union from July 2003 to July 2004. On December 4, 2006 he was appointed, by United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan, as his special envoy to Northern Uganda to try to end the civil war there between the Ugandan government and the Lord’s Resistance Army.

SEE ALSO: FRELIMO (Frente de Libertação de Moçambique); Machel, Samora (1933–1986); Mondlane, Eduardo Chivambo (1920–1969); Mozambique, Worker Protests; Portugal, Carnation Revolution, 1974

References and Suggested Readings

- Azevedo, M. (1991) Historical Dictionary of Mozambique. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press.
Núñez, B. (1995) Dictionary of Portuguese-African Civilization. London: Hans Zell.

Chomsky, Noam (b. 1928)

Christian Garland

Noam Chomsky is a US political theorist and activist, and institute professor of linguistics at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT). Besides his work in linguistics, Chomsky is internationally recognized as one of the most critically engaged public intellectuals alive today. Chomsky continues to be an unapologetic critic of both American foreign policy and its ambitions for geopolitical hegemony and the neoliberal turn of global capitalism, which he identifies in terms of class warfare waged from above against the needs and interests of the great majority. Chomsky is also an incisive critic of the ideological role of the mainstream corporate mass media, which, he maintains, “manufactures consent” toward the desirability of capitalism and the political powers supportive of it.

Over the past five decades, Chomsky has offered a searing critical indictment of US foreign policy and its many military interventions across the globe, pointing out that the US’s continued support for undemocratic regimes, and hostility to popular or democratic movements, is at odds with its professed claim to be spreading democracy and freedom and support for tendencies aiming toward that end. Indeed, as Chomsky argues, the current concern from Washington with so-called “Rogue States,” as much as the stated goal of aiding democratic movements in other countries, is not supported by successive administrations’ support (either direct or indirect) for political and military dictatorships across Latin America, the Middle East, and Asia. As Chomsky stated: “As the most powerful state, the US makes its own laws, using force and conducting economic warfare at will.” It also threatens sanctions against countries that do not abide by its conveniently flexible notions of “free trade.”

On the role of the mass media, Chomsky argues that the vested corporate interests controlling newspapers, television, and radio, no less than the content of what these outlets offer, form what he and Edward Hermann in their seminal study Manufacturing Consent call a “propaganda model” supine in the service of power.

Chomsky has described his own politics variously as anarchist, anarchosyndicalist, and libertarian socialist, allying himself with both classical anarchism and the critical libertarian Marxist and left communist traditions equally hostile to orthodox Marxism and Leninism. Chomsky maintains that these currents represent the logical development of the Enlightenment precepts of rational and critical inquiry engaged with the social world of which they are part.

Chomsky’s position on achieving small victories in the short term which “expand the floor of the cage” – for example, struggles to defend universal public services from privatization – has not been without controversy, with some anarchists accusing him of reformism and in some cases “statism.” Chomsky has countered such accusations with the response that short-term victories aimed at expanding the cage in which we are trapped by capital and state should be seen as “preliminaries to dismantling it.”

SEE ALSO: Anarchism; Anarchosyndicalism; Anti-Vietnam War Movement, United States

References and Suggested Readings

- Barsamian, D. & Chomsky, N. (1997) Expanding the Floor of the Cage: Noam Chomsky interviewed by David Barsamian. Available at www.chomsky.info/interviews/199704.htm.
- Chomsky, N. (1970) Notes on Anarchism. Available at www.zmag.org/Chomsky/other/notes-on-anarchism.html.
- Chomsky, N. (1998) The United States and the “Challenge of Relativity.” Available at www.chomsky.info/articles/199811.htm.
- Hermann, E. & Chomsky, N. (1994) Manufacturing Consent: The Political Economy of the Mass Media. London: Vintage.
- www.chomsky.info/
www.zmag.org/chomsky/

Civil rights movement, United States, 1960–1965

Sven Dubie

In the winter of 1960 four African American students at the North Carolina Agricultural and Technical College in Greensboro decided they had had enough. They had grown impatient with the lack of progress in dismantling the edifice of segregation since the Supreme Court’s Brown decision nearly six years earlier. After much deliberation, they felt the time had come to take matters into their own hands to try and hasten progress. After a night of informal planning, the four men – Ezell Blair, Jr., Franklin McCain, Joseph McNeill, and David Richmond – decided that the next day, February 1, they were going to go to the local Woolworth’s store, make a few purchases, and then demand service at the whites-only lunch counter. If they were refused, as was to be expected according to the South’s Jim Crow custom, they would remain seated until they eventually received service.

Events at the Woolworth’s counter unfolded largely as the four young men had anticipated

A young civil rights activist takes part in the Selma to Montgomery civil rights marches, which were staged to demand Alabama Governor George Wallace to protect black registrants. The march was attempted three times, including one dubbed "Bloody Sunday" because of the repression and violence visited on the marchers by state and local police before it was finally completed. (© Steve Schapiro/CORBIS) and soon a crowd gathered, with some offering words of encouragement and others condemnation. They remained on their stools until the store closed and promised to resume their protest the next day. Word of this first "sit-in" spread quickly across the college campus and throughout Greensboro. The next day, Blair, McCain, McNeill, and Richmond were joined by nearly thirty other students. By the end of the week, the numbers of protesters had swelled to 300, white students had joined the movement, and the list of stores targeted with sit-ins was rapidly expanding. And that was just the beginning.

By April 1960 nearly 80 communities across the South witnessed similar direct action campaigns, and tens of thousands of students had joined the movement. Many of the student protesters were heckled and, in some cases, brutally attacked for their participation. Hundreds would be arrested. And yet the students, drawing inspiration from Gandhi, Martin Luther King Jr., and other practitioners of non-violence, remained unfailingly polite, peaceful, and persistent. They also began to target other types of public accommodations such as pools, libraries, museums, parks, and beaches. Slowly over the course of the coming months and years – and only after tedious negotiations and many false starts – white leaders began to yield to the protesters and lift the Jim Crow restrictions. A bold new phase of the civil rights movement had begun.

In the heady early months of the sit-in movement, as it came to be called, several hundred students met at Shaw University in Raleigh, North Carolina, to build on their initial successes. The conference was organized by Ella Baker, the long-time activist and executive director of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC). She counseled participants to establish their own organization independent of the SCLC and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), which she deemed to be too cautious and self-serving. The students, flush with confidence and ambition, followed her advice. Thus was born one of the most dynamic and important civil rights organizations in the 1960s, the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee, or SNCC.

As its name indicates, the group took its lead from King and SCLC in that it was committed to the principle of non-violence. Yet, at the same time, SNCC clearly signaled a new path. It was much less institutionally rigid, lacked the clear top-to-bottom hierarchy, and was more devoted to the concept of participatory democracy – as an organization and as a strategy – than most civil rights organizations already in existence.

In light of the new wave of activism in early 1960, and with presidential elections slated for the fall, civil rights figured to be an increasingly important issue in the upcoming campaign. Republicans wanted to lure African Americans back to their party, but they realized they would have to do more to win over the black electorate. In reality the Civil Rights Act of 1957 had scarcely made an impact on the ability of blacks to vote, and the first report on the national status of civil rights, issued by the Civil Rights Commission in 1959, was sharply critical of the administration. These factors prompted the administration and its congressional allies to press successfully for passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1960, which provided for further modest enhancements of federal protection for voting rights.

At their respective presidential nominating conventions, Republican Richard M. Nixon and Democrat John F. Kennedy embraced relatively strong civil rights positions. The pivotal development in the campaign, however, came when Martin Luther King was arrested in October in Atlanta on a legal technicality. He was then sentenced to four months of hard labor at one of Georgia's maximum security facilities, traditionally reserved for hardened criminals. Civil rights leaders appealed to both the Kennedy and Nixon campaigns for a response. Nixon, wary of offending Southern whites, refused to weigh in on the case. However, several top staffers in the Kennedy campaign with an interest in civil rights – most notably, Harris Wofford and Sargent Shriver – devised a plan to have Kennedy call Coretta Scott King to express sympathy and concern for her husband's welfare. When they approached Kennedy with the idea, he consented and placed the call unbeknownst to his campaign manager and brother, Robert. When Bobby, as the younger Kennedy was sometimes called, learned of the call he was furious, fearing that if word about it leaked to the public, his brother's standing with Southern whites would be jeopardized. Ironically, Bobby would soon find himself involved in the case even more directly than his brother.

At the urging of Georgia Governor Ernest Vandiver, Robert Kennedy called the judge who had sentenced King and urged him to reconsider the civil rights leader's harsh sentence. The confluence of these phone calls would give the Kennedy campaign a critical boost among black voters. The Georgia judge reversed his earlier ruling and ordered King to be released. Meanwhile King's father, a highly influential minister in Atlanta's black community, responded to John Kennedy's phone call and the subsequent release of his son by promising to deliver the black vote for Kennedy. The Kennedy campaign shrewdly spread word of the senior King's sentiments to black neighborhoods across the country. On election day, Kennedy won nearly three-quarters of the black vote nationwide, a factor that helped him secure a whisker-thin victory over Nixon.

As the new administration prepared to take charge, African Americans understandably had high expectations. The pro-civil rights positions Kennedy had taken during the campaign combined with the role blacks had played in the president-elect's victory led many to conclude that they stood on the threshold of a new era in the struggle for black equality. Unfortunately, Kennedy's razor-thin margin of victory caused the administration to proceed cautiously and to table for the time being any bold initiatives – especially in an area as controversial as civil rights. Moreover, Kennedy instinctively was more interested in foreign policy matters than the struggle for black equality. Consequently, his initial civil rights program was limited to a series of modest initiatives that would largely escape public scrutiny.

Soon after taking office, for instance, Kennedy established the Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity, which was charged with improving the federal government's record in the hiring of blacks for civil service and to encourage private sector businesses with federal contracts to do likewise. And his brother Robert, whom Kennedy had tapped to be attorney general, pressed lawyers in his department to pursue voting rights and school desegregation cases more vigorously. Beyond such steps, however, the administration early on failed to launch the second Reconstruction anticipated by many in the black community. Even his campaign pledge to ban discrimination in federal housing “with the stroke of a pen” took nearly two years to carry out, and was very narrowly tailored. The action also was carefully timed so as not to cause any significant political damage or even to attract much attention. The reform was unveiled the day before Thanksgiving in 1962, after the midterm congressional elections and when most Americans were focused on holiday gatherings, not politics. Such procrastination, not surprisingly, contributed to a growing sense of betrayal and disillusionment among civil rights leaders. As was so often the case in the past, however, direct action by black Americans would inevitably force the government to return its focus to the incipient civil rights struggle.

For the Kennedy administration, the first major confrontation came in May 1961, after just four months in office, when CORE proposed a series of interracial “freedom rides.” Modeled on the organization's 1947 Journey of Reconciliation, activists would ride through the South on public buses to test local compliance with court-ordered desegregation of bus terminals. The riders – many of whom had participated in the sit-in movement the previous year – would commence their journey in Washington, DC and proceed to New Orleans, arriving there in time to mark the seventh anniversary of the Brown decision on May 17.

During the first week of the rides there were only a few scattered incidents of harassment or violence, but when the buses entered Anniston, Alabama, on May 14, the riders were confronted by an angry mob. The lead bus was pelted with rocks and its tires were slashed. Fearing for the riders' safety, the bus left Anniston, with part of the mob following in hot pursuit in cars. The bus was forced to pull to the side of the road when its slashed tires went flat, giving the mob another chance to attack the riders. An improvised incendiary bomb was tossed into the vehicle, forcing the riders out into the hands of the seething crowd of thugs. A major bloodbath was prevented only because of the intervention of a plainclothes policeman, who had been planted on the bus in Atlanta at the insistence of Alabama Governor John Patterson. The governor was no fan of desegregation, but he also did not want an ugly incident to tarnish the reputation of his state or administration. Meanwhile, the second bus, which had also been attacked in Anniston but escaped in better shape, made its scheduled stop in Birmingham. As the riders got off the bus, they were besieged by a group of young white men, many of whom it turned out were members of the Ku Klux Klan. They pummeled the riders with impunity since the city's commissioner for public safety, Eugene "Bull" Connor, had ordered his law officers to take the day off and promised the Klansmen they would have 15 minutes to inflict a savage beating on the group.

The Kennedy administration was appalled by the violence and called for law and order. But it also put pressure on the Freedom Riders to end what the administration deemed to be an unnecessarily provocative venture. The riders not only refused to heed the administration's request; they also found fresh recruits to take the place of those who had been wounded in the violence. This forced Attorney General Robert Kennedy to demand better police protection for the riders. But the riders were again attacked by a mob in Birmingham. This time, however, John Seigenthaler, a personal representative sent by Attorney General Kennedy to monitor developments, was beaten unconscious. The Seigenthaler incident brought the viciousness of the mob close to home for the attorney general. To avoid further violence and negative publicity that would accompany it, he cut a deal with Mississippi authorities, who agreed to guarantee safe passage of the riders through Mississippi in exchange for being allowed to arrest and imprison the riders for violating segregation laws. Some languished for weeks without any federal intervention.

The deal brokered by Kennedy incensed the riders, as it effectively validated the Jim Crow regulations. Rather than dampening the spirits of the riders, however, the actions of the administration inspired new recruits to join the cause. By the early fall, Attorney General Kennedy relented and quietly ordered the Interstate Commerce Commission to enforce more rigorously prohibitions against segregation in bus terminals and other facilities related to interstate transportation. In the end, though they had been badly bloodied and partly betrayed by the administration, the freedom riders could now claim an important victory in the struggle for black equality.

Having witnessed the successful use of the direct action campaign of the freedom riders to spur the federal government to action, Martin Luther King was drawn to Albany, Georgia to participate in the desegregation campaign that local blacks and SNCC activists had launched there in the fall of 1961. The Albany movement, as the struggle came to be known, began with high hopes, as it brought together a unique blend of local and national civil rights organizations, including SNCC, King's SCLC, and the NAACP. It also set an ambitious agenda which, if successful, would lead to a comprehensive program of desegregation in Albany that could serve as a model for other Southern communities. This inspired hundreds of ordinary blacks in the Albany area to join the cause, even at the risk of going to jail, marking a heightened commitment to the struggle for equality among the very people who stood to benefit most directly.

Yet from the start the movement was beset with in-fighting among the major civil rights organizations. And they encountered a tenacious and wily opponent in the Albany city government, which refused to enter into negotiations with the activists, shutting down the city's bus lines, parks, and playgrounds rather than desegregating them, thereby preventing blacks from claiming any clear cut political or legal victories. Undoubtedly the best exemplar of this strategy was the city's police chief, Laurie Pritchett, who steadfastly refused to allow his force to be seen using heavy handed tactics against the demonstrators which might elicit public sympathy for the movement. As Pritchett bragged, “We . . . met non-violence with non-violence.” Unable to win any concessions from Albany’s city leaders or to generate much public sympathy for their cause, the movement simply fizzled out by the late summer of 1962, dealing the national struggle a demoralizing blow.

Soon after the Albany movement had disintegrated, the Kennedy administration was again forced to enter into the civil rights fray in the most serious crisis since the Freedom Rides. On the day President Kennedy was inaugurated, James Meredith, a 28-year-old air force veteran, sought to transfer from an all-black college in Mississippi to the University of Mississippi – better known as Ole Miss – the crown jewel of the state’s higher educational system. After more than a year of wrangling with university officials over whether he could be admitted, during which time he had successfully appealed his case to the federal appeals court, Meredith formally attempted to register in late September 1962. He was turned away by the governor of Mississippi, Ross Barnett, who had assumed control over the university.

Barnett’s actions prompted Attorney General Robert Kennedy to intervene. He pressed the governor to comply with the Supreme Court’s school desegregation rulings and to provide assurances of Meredith’s safety. Barnett gave non-committal replies, however, and for several days the situation remained deadlocked. As the administration continued to negotiate with Barnett, hundreds of pro-segregationist troublemakers descended upon the idyllic university town of Oxford. Desperate to avoid its own Little Rock crisis, the administration struggled to reach an agreement with Barnett that would allow both sides to save face. As a precaution, however, it moved hundreds of federal marshals onto the campus. Additionally, thousands of troops stationed in nearby Memphis, Tennessee were placed on stand-by in case reinforcements were needed.

On the night of September 30, after Barnett had privately given his assurances that he would allow Meredith to enter the university, he publicly helped to whip up pro-segregationist sentiments in Oxford. Eventually a riot broke out when word came that Meredith was on the campus. The federal marshals were quickly overwhelmed as a crowd estimated at 3,000 began to hurl rocks, bricks, and bottles, set cars aflame, and then began firing guns. President Kennedy ordered the federal troops in Memphis to be rushed to the scene. This use of overwhelming force quelled the riot by the next morning, but not before two civilians died, scores suffered serious injuries, and hundreds of thousands of dollars of property was damaged. For the Kennedy administration, the Ole Miss crisis was a black mark on its civil rights record, and the deadly riot in Oxford clearly overshadowed Meredith’s admission to the university. Nevertheless the event proved to be a turning point in the Kennedy brothers’ thinking about civil rights, as they slowly came to realize more forceful leadership would be needed on the issue.

An opportunity to demonstrate lessons learned presented itself to the Kennedy administration in the spring of 1963, when King and the SCLC targeted Birmingham, Alabama for its next major direct action campaign. Still smarting from its failed initiative in Albany, the leadership of SCLC deliberately selected Birmingham because it was confident that its ardently pro-segregationist public safety commissioner, Eugene “Bull” Connor, would react much differently than had Laurie Pritchett. Using Connor as a foil, the goal was to provoke a crisis that would draw national attention to the pervasive repression and inequality in Birmingham and elicit a federal response. The campaign began in early April and, initially, Connor remained composed and ordered his police force to refrain from using violence when arresting demonstrators. King himself was soon arrested for defying an injunction against the demonstrations. While imprisoned, a group of white religious leaders took out ads in local papers and prominent national editions such as the New York Times that were critical of the Birmingham campaign. King used the opportunity to write a lengthy reply to his critics in which he sought to identify precisely why he was in Birmingham and the transcendent moral issues that were at stake in the local campaign as well as the broader struggle for black equality. King’s “Letter from Birmingham Jail,” as the epistle came to be known, was circulated nationally and is widely recognized as one of the most comprehensive, eloquent statements of the aims of the civil rights movement and of that struggle’s broader meaning in the context of American democracy.

On April 20, a week after King issued his landmark letter, he was released from jail, only to find the desegregation campaign losing momentum. Seeking to inject new energy into the movement, SCLC's leadership made a pivotal decision: they would seek the participation of black high school students, positing that young people would be less fearful of political and economic retribution than their parents. The use of teenagers – and in some instances, their younger siblings – was highly controversial, even among supporters of the desegregation campaign. But the decision proved to be the turning point in the Birmingham struggle. Thousands of young people gleefully heeded the call of SCLC and took to the streets in what came to be called the Children's Campaign. Despite their youth, Bull Connor ordered his officers to arrest them and some 900 were sent to jail on the first day of their participation. But the next day the youth turnout was just as strong. Far from a stigma, arrest at the hands of Connor's forces became a badge of honor and the Birmingham campaign took on new life. Sensing this, Connor cracked and resorted to using fire hoses, nightsticks, and dogs on adults and children alike. Ominously, some of the most despondent blacks in the city who were not under the authority of SCLC responded in kind, hurling rocks, bricks, and bottles at the police force. By early May Birmingham appeared to be teetering on the brink of a major racial conflagration. The Kennedy administration sent its point-man on civil rights, Assistant Attorney General Burke Marshall, to Birmingham to try to head off the crisis. Marshall was eventually able to work out a tenuous compromise: in exchange for calling off the demonstrations, the city's businesses would begin to desegregate and hire more black employees. While the agreement had many critics – and very nearly came unraveled as violence and rioting sporadically erupted – there was no doubt that the Birmingham campaign had proven to be a success. Indeed, it would prove to be a major milestone in the modern civil rights movement.

Events in Birmingham, however, failed to dissuade the segregationist governor of Alabama, George Wallace, from pugnaciously defending the racial status quo. Sworn in as governor in January 1963, Wallace very publicly promised to preserve segregation now and forever. In June he demonstrated his intent to do just that. When two African American students announced their intention to register at the University of Alabama, Governor Wallace promised personally to intervene to prevent them from doing so. When the prospective students tried to follow through with their plans on June 11, 1963, Wallace literally stood in the doorway of the admissions office to block their entry. The governor was subsequently ordered by federal officials to stand aside, which he did. But cameramen had captured Wallace's defiant "schoolhouse-door stand" on film and the message was not lost on Alabamians and others throughout the South: Wallace would contest any attempt to modify the racial status quo.

That same day, in response to the events of Birmingham and at the University of Alabama, President Kennedy at long last made good on his campaign rhetoric on civil rights. In a nationally televised address to the nation, the president spoke of the struggle for civil rights as "a moral issue" that was "as old as the scriptures and as clear as the American Constitution." He went on to state that at the "heart of the question is whether all Americans are to be afforded equal rights and equal opportunities, whether we are going to treat our fellow Americans as we want to be treated." He added that African Americans could no longer be expected patiently to endure their second-class citizenship and that he would urge Congress to pass a strong civil rights bill. Kennedy's speech marked a major milestone in the civil rights movement and in the long and difficult history of race relations in America. No American president had gone before a national audience and spoken that candidly about the fundamental racial inequalities in American society or associated himself so publicly with the struggle for civil rights.

Yet even as the president was enlisting himself in the battle for civil rights, one of the movement's rising stars was gunned down by an arch segregationist. Medgar Evers, a leader in the Mississippi branch of the NAACP, was returning home from a meeting just as the country was absorbing the president's civil rights message. Waiting in ambush was Byron De La Beckwith, who shot Evers to death as he stepped out of his car. De La Beckwith was prosecuted twice for the crime in 1964, but each prosecution ended in a mistrial. It would take 30 years before justice was finally served.

The cold-blooded killing of Evers and the demonstrations that it sparked heightened pressure on President Kennedy to move quickly on his civil rights legislation. Little more than a week after his national address, the president called on Congress to pass a comprehensive civil rights bill that would guarantee blacks equal access to voting and public accommodations, as well as providing the federal government with stronger authority to promote school desegregation and end discrimination in federally supported programs. To build support for this initiative in the following weeks, Kennedy met at the White House with delegations of representatives from all facets of American society upon whom he tried to impress the urgent need for new civil rights legislation.

The strongest pressure for action, however, came from the civil rights movement itself. A new March on Washington movement was launched, headed as before by the veteran civil rights activist A. Philip Randolph, who took advantage of the momentum for significant civil rights reform that had been building since the 1950s. Randolph organized a massive, interracial demonstration on behalf of the civil rights bill scheduled to take place on the National Mall on August 28, 1963. All of the major civil rights organizations supported the endeavor. Initially, the Kennedy administration was staunchly opposed to the march, fearing that it could trigger a wave of conservative backlash and jeopardize the already tenuous support for the administration's civil rights bill. When it became clear, however, that the administration would not be able to stop the event, they had to settle for persuading the civil rights leadership to temper some of its rhetoric. Accordingly, the march was billed more as a rally for economic justice and freedom than as a demonstration demanding a far-reaching political transformation. Speakers such as SNCC leader John Lewis were pressured to modify their remarks, which, only after the personal intercession of Randolph, they reluctantly agreed to do.

It was Martin Luther King, with his "I Have a Dream" speech, who stole the show that day, delivering what is widely regarded as one of the greatest orations in American history. As with his "Letter from Birmingham Jail," King used his speech to place the civil rights movement in the context of the long struggle for greater liberty and social justice in the United States. Speaking on the steps of the Lincoln Memorial, King recalled that a century earlier President Lincoln had given hope to slaves by issuing the Emancipation Proclamation, but that a hundred years hence blacks were "still sadly crippled by the manacles of segregation and the chains of discrimination," trapped in poverty and relegated to the status of "exile" in their own land. Reflecting "the marvelous new militancy of the Negro community," King warned that this was "no time to engage in the luxury of cooling off or to take the tranquilizing drug of gradualism," and that African Americans would not cease in their struggle "until justice rolls down like waters and righteousness like a mighty stream." He then concluded by sharing his dream of a transformed America that would rise up and live out the true meaning of its creed: "We hold these truths to be self-evident – that all men are created equal." He challenged the entire country, insisting that "if America is to be a great nation, this must become true." And when that day arrived, King promised to thunderous applause, "all of God's children, black men and white men, Jews and Gentiles, Protestants and Catholics, will be able to join hands and sing in the words of the old Negro spiritual, 'Free at last! Free at last! Thank God Almighty, we are free at last!'" The civil rights movement had reached its pinnacle. Fittingly, the following year, King was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize.

Three weeks after the triumphal March on Washington, the hopeful mood created by the march was abruptly punctured by the savage bombing of Birmingham's Sixteenth Street Baptist Church, which resulted in the deaths of four young black girls attending Sunday school. Meanwhile, the Kennedy administration's civil rights legislation was stalled in Congress as Southerners fought a ferocious rearguard action to preserve the racial status quo. The president would not live to see the fate of this struggle, however, as he was felled by an assassin's bullet in Dallas, Texas, on November 22, 1963.

Kennedy's martyrdom generated a surge of goodwill, which his successor, Lyndon Johnson, seized upon to make passage of the bill his top legislative priority. Johnson was the former Senate majority leader and, prior to joining the Kennedy ticket, one of the most powerful and influential individuals in the Congress. He was also determined quickly to move out from under the shadow of Kennedy's legacy by getting a civil rights bill passed that was even stronger than the version supported by Kennedy. In the more liberal House of Representatives the bill passed by a comfortable margin as early as February 1964. The real challenge would be in the Senate, where conservative Southern Democrats and their allies made it clear they intended to try to kill the bill with a filibuster. Johnson coaxed, cajoled, and threatened his old friends in the Senate to end the filibuster and vote on the bill. Backed by the lobbying clout of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, an umbrella organization that represented dozens of labor, civil rights, and related groups, the longest filibuster in the history of the Senate – 57 days – was finally broken. This cleared the way for an up-or-down vote on the measure which, in the end, passed by a comfortable majority.

On July 2, 1964 Johnson signed into law the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which was the most sweeping and comprehensive civil rights legislation ever passed in the United States. Included among its important provisions was a ban on discrimination in most areas of public accommodations, as well as in employment and union activities. It also gave the attorney general the power to initiate school desegregation suits and authorized the government to withhold federal funds from government programs where discrimination was practiced. Voting rights protections were further strengthened. Finally, the law established two agencies: an Equal Opportunity Employment Commission to curb discriminatory hiring practices; and a Community Relations Service to help resolve civil rights disputes at the grassroots level.

Despite important advancements such as these, there were some in the black community who scoffed at what they deemed to be the token legislative and symbolic victories of the mainstream movement. No individual had become more prominent in this regard than the spokesman for the Nation of Islam, Malcolm X. Although the activities of the NOI remained largely confined to the nation's black ghettos, the charismatic and articulate Malcolm X had helped elevate the profile of the group in the late 1950s and early 1960s. His fiery rhetoric, drawing from the teachings of Elijah Muhammad, blended militant black nationalist themes with ideas of economic and political self-sufficiency, and were often interwoven with bitterly frank condemnations of the white, blue-eyed devils. He flatly rejected any idea that there could be a reconciliation of the races or that integration would lead to equality. Indeed, he openly advocated black separatism as the only basis upon which a better society for black Americans could be constructed. Malcolm's ideas, and particularly the forthright manner in which they were delivered, resonated with the urban poor, but they were clearly at odds with Martin Luther King's emphasis on non-violence and constructing an equal society through interracial brotherhood. This sharp contrast eventually attracted the attention of the national media to Malcolm, which regarded him with a kind of morbid fascination.

The growing prominence of Malcolm X was a troubling development, not simply to whites, who tended to be shocked, if not completely put off by his pronouncements, but also to mainstream civil rights leaders, who saw him as a threat to their credibility in both the white and black communities. For whites skeptical of the civil rights movement, especially segregationists, Malcolm provided plenty of opportunities to charge that whites were the victims of reverse discrimination and that the NOI preached hate, so why should they try to reach some accord with the black community? In the black community, particularly among the black bourgeois, Malcolm X was simply the most obnoxious of the "troublemakers" who threatened to arouse white anger and jeopardize their perilous status in society. And among young black activists, Malcolm's blunt depiction of racial realities and his refusal to compromise with the white establishment was winning growing respect, even with those formally committed to King's philosophy of reconciliation and non-violence. This trend would become more obvious as racial tensions escalated in the mid-1960s. Yet, at the same time, some civil rights leaders seized on this point in their negotiations with the white establishment as a way of warning, "If you don't deal with us, here's what is waiting outside the door."

The failure of the NOI to offer a roadmap out of despair – indeed, Elijah Muhammad's outright prohibition against political activism – caused Malcolm himself to begin to chafe under his mentor's leadership, but that relationship had already grown tense as Malcolm had risen in stature. Then, in late 1963, a rift erupted between the two when several paternity suits made clear to Malcolm that Elijah Muhammad was not living up to the moral code he espoused. The split was deepened when Malcolm described the assassination of John Kennedy as a case of "the chickens coming home to roost." Malcolm meant to suggest that those who perpetuate violence – as he believed the president had done in Vietnam and elsewhere – would have violence inflicted upon them. In the midst of the national shock over Kennedy's death, however, Elijah Muhammad used the occasion to silence Malcolm for 90 days. Muhammad justified the action by asserting that Malcolm's remarks were insensitive to a nation in mourning. But observers familiar with the leadership dynamics within the NOI indicated that the real reason was to corral the young firebrand.

For his part, Malcolm seized the opportunity to reassess his relationship with the NOI as well as to re-examine the Islamic faith, which he increasingly believed had been twisted and distorted by Elijah Muhammad. In March 1964 he formally broke with the NOI and took the first step toward creating his own independent political and religious organization when he founded the Muslim Mosque, Inc. He made a pilgrimage to Mecca, Islam's holiest sight, and there he encountered Muslims of all colors worshipping harmoniously, prompting him to reevaluate his ideas about the intrinsic nature of whites. He also proclaimed that during his travels he had come to embrace traditional orthodox Islam as his faith. Upon his return to the United States he established the Organization for Afro-American Unity through which he hoped to develop closer ties to more mainstream civil rights organizations and to encourage greater black participation in the political system. In fact, in early February 1965, just weeks before he was assassinated, Malcolm would journey to Selma, Alabama at the invitation of the SNCC to rally activists who had launched a voting rights campaign in that city.

In mid-1964, as Malcolm X was transforming himself and the United States Congress was taking its historic step toward providing greater protection for civil rights, several movement organizations were busy in Mississippi with one of the most ambitious undertakings to date. The Council of Federated Organizations (COFO), an aggregation of local and national civil rights groups, launched what came to be known as Freedom Summer. The plan was to send some 800 black and white student volunteers into Mississippi to spend the summer canvassing the state, encouraging black Mississippians to become active in the electoral process and providing them with the training to register and then cast a ballot. The leader of the project, Robert Moses, also planned to have volunteers organize the interracial Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party (MFDP) that would stand as an alternative to the traditional whites-only Mississippi state Democratic Party. Finally, volunteers would also set up Freedom Schools to teach black children basic reading and math skills, as well as black history and the core ideas behind the civil rights movement. Community clinics were also established so that indigent citizens could obtain basic legal and health services.

Almost immediately the Freedom Summer volunteers ran into trouble. On June 21, 1964 three young workers – James Chaney, who was black, and Andrew Goodman and Michael Schwerner, who were white – were briefly arrested near Philadelphia, Mississippi. They were subsequently released, only to disappear later that night. Following a massive search operation their corpses were discovered buried in an earthen dam six weeks later by the FBI. The subsequent investigation implicated a group of local officials and Klansmen in a plot to kill the three young men. While seven of the men were eventually convicted of conspiracy to murder the workers, no one was given a sentence longer than six years.

The murder of the civil rights workers sparked outrage and brought national attention and sympathy to the cause, but their deaths also fostered mistrust between blacks and whites in the movement. Because two of the three victims were white, black activists grumbled that the media focused on the deaths only because whites were involved. The murders also exposed fissures between the civil rights workers and the federal government that would only grow over time. COFO wanted greater federal protection for Freedom Summer workers, but the Johnson administration backed FBI Director Hoover's adamant refusal to allow the bureau's agents to be used as a national police force to uphold civil rights. Movement members were bitterly disappointed and found this position difficult to accept in light of the recent passage of the civil rights bill.

Divisions between the administration and COFO would deepen later that summer when Democrats met in Atlantic City to nominate President Johnson as their candidate in the upcoming 1964 election. Freedom Summer volunteers had succeeded in organizing the MFDP on an integrated basis, which now insisted it should represent the state at the Democratic National Convention since it was more reflective of the racial composition of the state. In an echo of the Dixiecrat revolt of 1948, members of the all-white state Democratic Party threatened to walk out of the convention if the MFDP delegates were seated. The situation was increasingly awkward for Johnson and the party, torn between their desire to demonstrate support for civil rights, but not wanting the nomination of Johnson to be overshadowed by a racially charged intra-party squabble. The MFDP kept the pressure on the national party, however, and with public opinion building in their favor, they traveled to Atlantic City with the intention of representing the state during the convention. As spokeswoman Fannie Lou Hamer put it, "If the Freedom Democratic Party is not seated now, I question America. Is this America? The land of the free and the home of the brave?"

Eventually a compromise was worked out whereby the all-white regular delegates would be seated so long as they pledged loyalty to the party platform – including its strong civil rights planks. Two delegates from the MFDP would also be seated but as at-large delegates, rather than as representatives of Mississippi. And finally, future conventions would disqualify delegations like Mississippi's which advocated segregation. The compromise left both sides deeply dissatisfied: MFDP delegates charged the party with sacrificing moral principles on the altar of political expediency, and most of Mississippi's white delegates refused to pledge their loyalty to the party's platform and boycotted the convention. MFDP delegates, still hoping to make their presence felt, attempted to take the seats of the white delegates who were boycotting the convention. They were aided by some sympathetic delegates already on the floor, but the insurgents were forcibly ejected from the convention hall, a cruel reminder of the segregationist practices of the South that only served to intensify the sense of betrayal and disillusionment among the MFDP members.

Despite fears that the fight over seating the MFDP delegates could cause a crippling rift in the Democratic Party, Lyndon Johnson went on to win a resounding victory in 1964, although in a portent of shifting sands of political allegiance, the conservative Republican candidate Barry Goldwater won five traditionally Democratic states in the South. Freedom Summer and the Atlantic City debacle along with persistently low black registration rates in the Southern states, however, underscored the need for further reform in the area of voting rights. President Johnson indicated a willingness to offer new legislation in this area once passions over the 1964 legislation had dissipated.

Once more the movement would not wait for the establishment to act. Civil rights leaders announced the start of a voting rights campaign that would center on Selma, Alabama. Nearly a century after the Fifteenth Amendment had prohibited denying persons the right to vote based on race, only 3 percent of the eligible black population in Selma was registered to vote. SNCC staff members had been working on voting rights in Selma since 1963, but their efforts had produced few results. This was partly because the county sheriff, Jim Clark, was cut from the same cloth as Birmingham's Bull Connor, and Clark was determined to crush any direct action campaign intended to empower the black community. The situation seemed to have reached a stalemate when, in the fall of 1964, Martin Luther King was invited to join the campaign. King agreed and, fresh from his triumphant trip to Oslo to claim his Nobel Peace Prize, the civil rights leader settled in Selma in early 1965 to help coordinate operations. At the outset of the campaign, those blacks who attempted to register were arrested without incident, but after several days of restraint, Sheriff Clark began to lose patience and to violently suppress the prospective registrants. As the police force violence escalated and the numbers of black protesters in the jails skyrocketed, national media attention began to turn to Selma and, eventually, so did the attention of President Johnson.

The president's hand was forced when, on March 7, 1965, John Lewis and one of King's deputies, Hosea Williams, led several hundred blacks on the first leg of a planned 50-mile march to the state capital in Montgomery, where they would call on Governor George Wallace to provide protection from the state for those attempting to register to vote. The marchers had just crossed the Edmund Pettus Bridge leaving town when they were brutally driven back into retreat by state and local officers, egged on by a large crowd of cheering whites. The saving grace of what came to be known as Bloody Sunday was that television cameras had caught the whole incident on tape. When the footage was broadcast on national television that evening and over the course of the next several days, the American public was outraged by what it saw. The viciousness of the police action proved to be a transformative moment for many SNCC activists, who insisted the next time they were “gonna give as good as we git.” The ugly developments prompted President Johnson to go before a joint session of Congress to urge passage of the voting rights legislation he would soon be submitting. The president told legislators that what the Selma demonstrators sought was “part of a far larger movement . . . the effort of American Negroes to secure for themselves the full blessings of American life.” Universalizing the black struggle, Johnson insisted “their cause must be our cause too. Because it is not just Negroes, but really all of us who must overcome the crippling legacy of bigotry and injustice.” And then, invoking the great anthem of the civil rights movement, Johnson vowed – “And we shall overcome!”

Less than a week later, in what is generally deemed to be one of the last great events of the civil rights movement, a massive, peaceful, and diverse group of marchers made their way from Selma to Montgomery. Although they failed to secure an audience with Governor Wallace, the completion of the march, after its notably inauspicious beginning, was a major symbolic victory. And though Southern conservatives in the Senate again put up a fight, the Voting Rights Act of 1965 was passed by solid majorities in both houses of Congress in early August. The legislation provided for significant increases in federal protection and oversight of voting rights. Within a matter of years, the numbers of blacks who registered and actually voted skyrocketed, demonstrating that the voting rights legislation provided one of the most important victories of the modern civil rights movement.

SEE ALSO: African American Resistance, Jim Crow Era; Baker, Ella Josephine (1903–1986); Black Nationalism, 19th and 20th Centuries; Civil Rights, United States, Black Power and Backlash, 1965–1978; Civil Rights, United States: Overview; CORE (Congress of Racial Equality); Freedom Rides; Freedom Summer; King, Martin Luther, Jr. (1929–1968) and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC); Malcolm X (1925–1965); Parks, Rosa (1913–2005) and the Montgomery Bus Boycott; Randolph, A. Philip (1889–1979); Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC); Students for a Democratic Society (SDS)

References and Suggested Readings

Branch, T. (1989) Parting the Waters: America in the King Years 1954–63. New York: Simon & Schuster.

Dittmer, J. (1995) Local People: The Struggle for Civil Rights in Mississippi. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.

Fairclough, A. (2001) To Redeem the Soul of America: The Southern Christian Leadership Conference and Martin Luther King Jr. Athens: University of Georgia Press.

Payne, C. (1995) I've Got the Light of Freedom: The Organizing Tradition and the Mississippi Freedom Struggle. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Shull, S. A. (2000) American Civil Rights Policy from Truman to Clinton: The Role of Presidential Leadership. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe.

Civil rights, United States, Black Power and backlash, 1965–1978

Sven Dubie

A week after President Johnson signed into law the Voting Rights Act of 1965, the Los Angeles ghetto of Watts erupted into one of the worst urban conflagrations in the history of the country. Precipitated by a series of misunderstandings related to a routine traffic violation, longstanding resentment among blacks toward the Los Angeles Police Department – and fueled by lingering resentments over the mistreatment of voting rights marchers in Selma – the Watts riots lasted nearly a week and involved thousands of blacks over a large swath of the ghetto. Thirty-four people died and nearly a thousand were injured; thousands more were arrested for violence and looting; and hundreds of individuals, mostly black, lost their homes or businesses. It took more than 14,000 national guardsmen and thousands of local police to quell the unrest. To mainstream civil rights leaders it was a disheartening setback and a painful reminder of how much work remained in the struggle for equality.

Sadly, the unrest in Watts was but a harbinger of things to come. During the ensuing three summers, nearly three hundred race riots and disturbances occurred all across America and involved tens of thousands of urban blacks. An estimated 250 blacks died in the disturbances, thousands more were injured, and combined property losses were incalculable. The violence led to permanent and bitter divisions in the civil rights movement that would leave it noticeably weakened, as advocates of non-violence squared off against the growing influence of those not willing to rule out the use of violence in response to brutal oppression.

Two cheerleaders give the Black Power salute during the national anthem at a Yale–Dartmouth football game in 1968. This was less than a month after Tommie Smith and John Carlos raised their fists, among several symbolic gestures, during the national anthem at the 1968 Summer Olympics in Mexico City. The two had won medals and used their place in the international public spotlight to show solidarity with oppressed blacks and working-class people. (© Bettmann/CORBIS)

In response to the uprisings, President Johnson established the National Advisory Committee on Civil Disorders – also known as the Kerner Commission, named for its chairman, Illinois Governor Otto Kerner – to explore the causes of the unrest. In 1968 the committee reported back that the disturbances were the result of the combined effects of “poverty, unemployment, slum housing, and segregated education.” Famously, it went on to warn that despite the apparent progress of recent years, the nation was “moving toward two societies, one black, one white – separate and unequal.” By contrast, conservative critics, reflecting growing impatience with the civil rights movement, contended that irresponsible hoodlums and liberal permissiveness were behind the disturbances. These divergent views indicated the general parameters of the debate over civil rights that would develop in the coming decades. Yet as one observer of the Northern riots concluded, “urban blacks chose to protest . . . because they had no other viable strategy of change and because the struggle for black equality in the South had changed the psychology of the Northern ghetto.” Increasingly, in the North and the South, the militancy of the late Malcolm X was being embraced by those frustrated by the slow pace of change in the racial status quo all across America.

There was perhaps no better example of this than the emergence of the Black Power movement in the mid-1960s. The Black Power phenomenon was one of the more ironic developments in the modern civil rights movement, given that it burst onto the scene just as civil rights activists had secured their most important victories with the passage of civil rights legislation in 1964 and 1965. In spite of these triumphs, however, there was, especially among the younger members of the movement in the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) and the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE), growing doubt about the prospects for achieving a truly equal and integrated society. Their struggles during the 1964 voter registration campaign known as Freedom Summer, as well as the initial violence and repression of the Selma campaign, caused some to question whether whites genuinely wanted to reconcile their differences with blacks. There was also a nagging sense that, with important legislative victories largely behind them, the mainstream civil rights movement was now adrift. For these reasons many young activists were increasingly drawn to the strident black nationalism of the late Malcolm X, who seemed much more attuned to the core economic and institutional obstacles hindering further advancements in black equality. As a result, a growing number of young black activists reached the conclusion that the next phase in their struggle would require greater self-determination and self-sufficiency by the black community if genuine change was going to occur. In turn, this might necessitate abandoning one of the cardinal principles of the mainstream movement: the policy of interracial cooperation.

Among those most prominently representative of this tendency was Stokely Carmichael, who had prevailed in a 1966 leadership struggle against John Lewis to become the newly elected head of SNCC. Carmichael was determined to chart a more militant course for SNCC, including breaking with its traditions of interracial cooperation and non-violence. Soon after assuming the helm of SNCC, Carmichael had taken a lead role in creating the all-black Lowndes County Freedom Organization (LCFO), an independent political party designed, like the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party, to break the lock that white Democrats had on the state. As Carmichael explained at one point, “We want power, that’s all we want.” As if to underscore this growing militancy, LCFO adopted as its symbol a black panther that looked as if it was stalking its prey.

Several months later, in June 1966, during a series of demonstrations in Greenwood, Mississippi, Carmichael was attempting to rally his fellow demonstrators. He raised a clenched fist in the air and shouted, “The only way we gonna stop them white men from whippin’ us is to take over. We’ve been saying freedom for six years and we ain’t got nothin’. What we gonna start saying now is Black Power!” And then, adopting a rhythmic call-and-response mode, Carmichael asked the crowd, “What do you want?” – to which the frenzied reply was “Black Power!” Later, Carmichael would echo Malcolm X by declaring: “Power is the only thing respected in this world and we must get it at any cost.” A dynamic and – depending on one’s perspective – frightening new insurgency had been born.

Carmichael’s embrace of Black Power – underscored by his subsequent adoption of the African name Kwame Turé – and his advocacy of black separatism had its costs, however. White participation in and support for the organization plummeted, leaving SNCC in dire financial straits. Even Martin Luther King, while sympathetic to the mounting frustration of the young activists, recoiled from the harsh rhetoric of the Black Power movement and counseled Carmichael to use less provocative language. The tide had turned, however, and by 1967 SNCC was bankrupt and Carmichael left the organization. His successor, H. Rap Brown, proved to be even more controversial. Among Brown’s most famous pronouncements was his insistence that violence is as American as cherry pie and because America would not reform itself, “we’re going to burn America down.” He repeatedly urged blacks to arm themselves for the coming race war with white America. When Detroit was consumed by rioting in the summer of 1967, Brown told his audience in Cambridge, Maryland, that it was time for their city to explode. Shortly thereafter it did, and the black ghetto was devastated by fire. The next year, Brown presided over the merger of SNCC with the newly formed Black Panther Party. Although they would work jointly on projects for the next several years, for all practical purposes, SNCC was defunct.

The Black Panther Party for Self-Defense, as the organization was formally named, had been established by the black activists Huey Newton and Bobby Seale in Oakland, California, in the fall of 1966. The stated purpose of the organization was to monitor police action and combat brutality against the city’s black community. Toward this end, they prominently displayed the guns they carried, harassed those officers they believed were mistreating blacks, and advocated sweeping social and political reforms. Such behavior inevitably brought them into conflict with local police, as well as inviting scrutiny from such federal authorities as FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover, who immediately launched a campaign to infiltrate the group and to sow dissent which, he hoped, would disrupt its operations. Raids on Panther offices resulted in several armed confrontations and shootouts and in 1967, as a result of one such incident, Huey Newton was sentenced to 15 years in jail.

Meanwhile, Martin Luther King was trying to adapt to the rapidly changing political environment and to infuse the mainstream movement with a new sense of purpose. Taking a cue from the Watts riots, King shifted his campaign for black equality out of the Deep South. He announced a new anti-discrimination initiative in Chicago, hoping thereby to provide a more positive and constructive way for the urban poor to address their frustrations. When he arrived in Chicago in early 1966, however, he found a black populous more disheartened and disenfranchised than that of the South. And, much to his surprise, King found whites in the North every bit as hostile to his presence, if not more so. King said of the frosty reception he received in Chicago: “I’ve been in many demonstrations all across the South, but I can say that I have never seen – even in Mississippi and Alabama – mobs as hostile and hate-filled as I’ve seen in Chicago.” After the mayor of Chicago, Richard J. Daley, made some vague pledges to fight residential segregation, King concluded his Chicago initiative. Some observers did not shy away from pointing out that the Chicago Campaign was eerily reminiscent of the failed Albany Movement.

King’s efforts in Chicago were part of a broader shift in the focus of the civil rights leader’s actions during the last years of his life. Shaken by the unrest that erupted from the nation's cities with disconcerting regularity, King increasingly emphasized issues of basic economic and social justice. He seemed to acknowledge a fundamental reality expressed by a civil rights worker who pondered aloud what good was it that blacks could now sit at a lunch counter with whites if they could not afford the cost of a hamburger. In this regard, King was playing catch-up. Malcolm X and the Black Muslims, of course, had always acknowledged the central importance of economic issues in the struggle for black equality. And even the Johnson administration, as part of its Great Society initiative, had declared "War on Poverty" in 1965.

As part of its efforts to advance the cause of civil rights and, more specifically, to address the problem of poverty in the black community, the administration hosted a conference in June 1966 under the banner "To Fulfill These Rights" – deliberately echoing the landmark Truman era report To Secure These Rights. Johnson named the elder statesman of the movement, A. Philip Randolph, honorary chairman of the gathering. Randolph used the platform to unveil his "Freedom Budget for All Americans," which proposed to end poverty in the United States within ten years. The Freedom Budget called for a massive expansion of federal investments – $18.5 billion spread over ten years – in public works as well as education and job training. Under the plan, blacks would be the primary, though not exclusive, beneficiaries because they traditionally constituted the largest proportion of economically disadvantaged Americans.

Attempts to make economic justice the central rallying cry of the civil rights movement soon faltered in the face of the seemingly intractable challenges of the urban ghettos and ballooning military expenditures for the war in Vietnam. In turn, a growing number of black leaders began to question the sincerity and depth of the federal government's commitment to the struggle for black equality now that major civil rights legislation had been passed. Skepticism and mistrust deepened in the wake of the controversy stemming from the 1965 government study on urban poverty known as the Moynihan Report. Named for its author, Daniel Patrick Moynihan, the study acknowledged that white racism was an important cause of chronic poverty in the black ghettos. However, to some, the report seemed to place greater emphasis on the lack of a strong male presence in many families, provoking howls of angry protest from the black community. Charging that the government's anti-poverty programs were "fragmentary and spasmodic," and had done little to alleviate the suffering of those most in need, King began to contemplate another massive march on Washington to dramatize the problem. The initiative would be called the Poor People's Campaign and planning for the Washington march began in late 1967.

King simultaneously became more outspoken in his criticism of America's role in the Vietnam War, provoking the wrath of the administration and even eliciting criticism from some of his fellow civil rights leaders. But with his increasing emphasis on economic and social justice, King insisted that he could not in good conscience ignore the disparate impact the war was having on young black men who, because they lacked the means to continue schooling or pursue other activities that would exempt them from service, were being drafted to fight in the bloody conflict at disproportionately higher rates than whites. And although the days of segregated units had passed, blacks still were more likely to be given the most demeaning and dangerous jobs, and less likely to receive promotions or commendations, than were their white counterparts. In a speech delivered in New York on April 4, 1967 – a year to the day before he was assassinated – King formally declared his opposition to the war in a speech sharply critical of the administration for what he claimed was its practical abandonment of the War on Poverty in exchange for the war in Vietnam. And he pointedly faulted the administration for sending young black men to fight and die to protect the rights of a nation half-way around the world, when similar rights were still contested in black communities here at home.

In retribution, President Johnson unleashed King's longtime nemesis, FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover, who had long suspected that King was doing the bidding of the global communist movement. The FBI had closely monitored King since his rise to prominence in the mid-1950s, but surveillance was intensified in 1963, when Hoover finally persuaded Attorney General Robert Kennedy to allow the Bureau to wiretap King's phone conversations. Although the tap failed to reveal any connection between King and the communist movement, evidence of indiscretions in his private life was gathered and used as part of an effort by Hoover to discredit King.

Despite the intense controversy that surrounded him, King pressed ahead with his struggle for justice. In the spring of 1968, as part of his Poor People's Campaign, he traveled to Memphis, Tennessee, to give his support to the predominantly black sanitation workers who were striking in support of a wage increase and better working conditions. King envisioned the demonstrations in Memphis as a kind of dry run for the march on Washington, planned for that summer. It was in the midst of the Memphis initiative that the civil rights movement lost its best-known leader to an assassin's bullet on April 4, 1968. As the nation's black ghettos were again overcome by paroxysms of rage, an intense manhunt was launched to find King's killer. A prime suspect in the killing, James Earl Ray, was eventually captured in London and, after pleading guilty to the crime, was sentenced to life in prison. Shortly thereafter, however, Ray recanted and insisted he was innocent. Given the breakdown in relations between King and the government, and the FBI efforts to discredit him, some people – including members of King's family – began to wonder whether the killing might have been part of a broader conspiracy to engineer the civil rights leader's downfall.

The outpouring of emotion in the wake of King's assassination helped to push forward the last of the major civil rights bills of the 1960s. Although the Johnson administration and King had parted ways, and Johnson had by this point withdrawn from the presidential race, the president remained keenly aware of the continued importance of the black vote to the fortunes of his party. Predictably, die-hard Southern segregationists attempted to kill the legislation, but the momentum from King's martyrdom was too great to resist. A week to the day after King's death, President Johnson signed into law the third major piece of civil rights legislation passed during his presidency – the Civil Rights Act of 1968, better known as the Fair Housing Act. This law banned discrimination in all forms of housing, though it was dramatically limited in its impact because there were no federal enforcement provisions.

Significantly, the day before Martin Luther King was killed, the Supreme Court heard arguments in one of the most important school desegregation cases since its Brown rulings in the mid-1950s. Though nearly a decade and a half had passed since the Court ruled that segregation in public education was unconstitutional, only a handful of school districts in the South had made much headway in desegregating. Some states, like Virginia, sought to convey the impression of compliance without actually doing so by creating "freedom-of-choice plans," allowing students to choose whether they wanted to attend a traditionally all-white or all-black school. In rural New Kent County this approach had resulted in no white students attending the black school, and only 15 percent of black students electing to attend the white school. Blacks in New Kent County challenged the freedom-of-choice program, contending that it largely perpetuated the dual school system that had existed under Jim Crow. The Supreme Court unanimously agreed with the plaintiffs in Green v. School Board of New Kent County, stating that in the face of "massive resistance," simply removing the requirement that blacks and whites attend separate schools – which was, in essence, what the freedom-of-choice plans did – was unlikely to eradicate the legacy of the dual school system. The Court's decision implicitly laid the foundations for much more proactive court-ordered desegregation plans, including the extensive cross-district busing of students.

Just three years later the Court unanimously upheld a federal district court judge's plan to promote desegregation through cross-town busing in Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Board of Education. By so ruling, the Court opened one of the most bitterly divisive chapters in the long struggle over racial equity in education. While many Southerners, perhaps even a majority, had by this time begrudgingly come to terms with the abolition of officially sanctioned segregation, mandated desegregation was an entirely different matter.

Opposition to the use of busing as a tool to achieve desegregation was not limited to the South. Some of the most ferocious and violent opposition to busing would occur in the cradle of liberty, Boston, Massachusetts. In the fall of 1974, residents of the city's South Boston neighborhood, predominantly white and fiercely protective of their working-class Irish Catholic community, fought a busing plan that would send some of their children to the predominantly-black Roxbury community and bring black children from Roxbury into South Boston. Although the depth of opposition to busing was perhaps nowhere stronger than in Boston, the city's residents were hardly alone in expressing their displeasure with this means of promoting desegregation. In scores of communities across the country where busing was being used to promote desegregation, whites as well as blacks were unhappy sending their children to schools far from the neighborhood in which they lived and into an environment that was frequently hostile.

As resentment grew over what many whites perceived to be judicially imposed integration, even the Supreme Court started to draw limits. With four, generally more conservative, Nixon appointees sitting on the high bench by 1974, the Court narrowly overturned, in Milliken v. Bradley, a district court imitative to desegregate the mostly black Detroit school system by incorporating 85 neighboring and predominantly white school districts into the plan. The Court's majority opinion asserted that the suburbs could not be held accountable for the problems of the cities. By rejecting so-called interdistrict desegregation plans the Court sharply limited the desegregation options available to the nation's large urban school districts. It also helped to intensify white flight out of these cities, as parents who could afford it moved their children beyond the reach of urban desegregation efforts. Nevertheless, court-ordered busing would remain a divisive issue into the 1990s, by which point most busing schemes had been abandoned.

The controversy over busing fueled a growing white backlash in the 1970s, as sympathy for the civil rights movement began to wane. This trend had begun in the late 1960s, in response to several summers of urban rebellions, the growing militancy among certain factions of the movement, and Martin Luther King's public criticism of the war in Vietnam. It was also stimulated by the growing stature of such figures as Alabama Governor George Wallace, who tempered his overt racism and devotion to segregation to the times, but nevertheless rode the tide of white backlash to national prominence in the late 1960s and early 1970s. He combined his thinly veiled contempt for the growing radicalism of the civil rights movement with sharp criticism of the anti-war movement and a sweeping indictment of what he and his followers asserted was an increasingly intrusive federal government. Wallace surprised his critics by gaining a significant following outside the South, and made an impressive showing in the 1968 presidential election when he captured five states – albeit all in the Deep South. He was poised to make another strong run in 1972, but a gunman's bullet left him paralyzed from the waist down and forced him to withdraw from the race.

Still another source of white resentment was the increasing use of affirmative action to redress the legacy of past discrimination against blacks. The term was first employed as early as 1961, when President Kennedy ordered firms with federal contracts to take "affirmative action" to recruit and hire larger numbers of qualified black employees. The original idea was to ensure that such hires be strictly merit based. But as the struggle for equality radicalized over the course of the ensuing years, seeking out potential black employees sometimes evolved into a system of racial preferences and, occasionally, racial quotas which, in the eyes of some, emphasized numbers rather than merit or qualifications. In a climate of white backlash it is not surprising that this led to the charge of reverse racism. The Supreme Court waded into these tempestuous waters for the first time in the late 1970s, when it agreed to hear the case of Allan Bakke, who contended that he had been rejected by the medical school at the University of California at Davis while less qualified black candidates were admitted. In 1978 a highly fragmented Court issued an ambiguous, multi-faceted ruling in University of California Regents v. Bakke by affirming Bakke's claim that he was the victim of a racial quota while still upholding the legitimacy of affirmative action. As with the controversy over busing, polarized debates over affirmative action would persist for decades to come.

During the last quarter of the twentieth century the civil rights movement struggled to press ahead with its agenda but did so in an environment that presented tremendous challenges. The movement itself was splintered, and much of the energy and momentum from previous decades had dissipated. White sympathy for the movement had been substantially eclipsed by white backlash, and an increasingly conservative political environment only served to reinforce this tendency. Nevertheless, civil rights issues and the struggle for black equality would remain important, if generally less prominent, throughout this period. Indeed, echoes of many of the important developments and controversies from the 1950s and 1960s would reverberate throughout this era and on into the twenty-first century.

SEE ALSO: Black Nationalism, 19th and 20th Centuries; Black Panthers; Brown H. Rap (b. 1943); Carmichael Stokely/Kwame Turé (1941–1998); Civil Rights Movement, United States, 1960–1965; Civil Rights, United States: Overview; CORE (Congress of Racial Equality); King, Martin Luther, Jr. (1929–1968) and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC); Malcolm X (1925–1965); Student Non-Violent (Coordinating Committee (SNCC)

References and Suggested Readings

- Branch, T. (1988) Parting the Waters: America in the King Years, 1954–1963. New York: Simon & Schuster.
- Branch, T. (1998) Pillar of Fire: America in the King Years, 1963–1965. New York: Simon & Schuster.
