Preface

THIS IS A HISTORY of a nineteenth-century American political party. It encompasses the careers, aspirations, ideas, and actions of many individual Whig politicians and nameless Whig voters. But it is not primarily a collective biography, a study of political ideology and political culture, or an analysis of the social experience and characteristics of the electorate. Rather, it is the story, told chronologically, of the birth, life, and death of a political organization and of its competitive relationship with other political parties. That life was short—scarcely more than twenty-two years. Yet this history of it, which has taken me almost that many years to write, is a very long book. The reader deserves to know why.

I set five objectives before starting to write. First, I believe that no political party can be fully understood in terms of its own beliefs, actions, and internal quarrels. Its relationships with rival parties must also be incorporated into the analysis. The Whig party operated in a definable two-party system, labeled by historians the Second American Party System, in which its major, but not its only, rival was the Democratic party. A central argument of this study, indeed, is that from the time of the Whig party's birth in the winter of 1833–34 until its death during the 1856 presidential campaign, Democrats played a profound role in shaping its fate. Thus I pay close attention to non-Whig and anti-Whig political actors, not just to the Whigs themselves.

Second, the American federal system, with its jurisdictional division of policy-making responsibilities among national, state, and local governments, had unusual importance for the structure and operations of nineteenth-century political parties. What state governments did often had far more impact on people's lives during that century than did actions taken in Washington. Whigs, therefore, often viewed control of state governments as a vital goal. Like its Democratic foe, moreover, the Whig party was a federation of state and local organizations, each of which had its own experience of internal rivalry and external competition. To write the history of the party as an institution—and not just of a few prominent national leaders—I was therefore compelled to analyze developments in as many states as possible over a period of some twenty years while simultaneously examining Whig attempts to capture the national government and their actions while in it.

x Preface

I am well aware of the hazards of this approach. Specialists on some states may accuse me of giving their subjects short shrift. I have relied heavily on such specialists' research, but in a project of this scope, my research on individual states could never be as thorough as theirs. More likely, readers may complain that my state-by-state surveys are unnecessary since a few illustrative examples usually would suffice. Occasionally one can generalize about patterns that apply to several states, but conditions in different states often varied sharply. I have sought to get the story straight, and I am convinced that neither the rise nor the fall of the Whig party can be explained without the comprehensive approach I have taken here

Federalism, of course, implies more than the division of jurisdictional authority among different levels of government. It also connotes interaction among the politicians who acted at each level. Far more than their twentieth-century successors, indeed, nineteenth-century partisan activists cared deeply about the party as a whole, about how it fared at all levels of government, if only because most people voted for or against what parties as institutions seemed to stand for. Since parties could establish their identity before the electorate at all levels of the federal system, and since national leaders were utterly dependent on state and local organizations to obtain or retain national office, connections among local, state, and national politicos were robust. Illustrating the reciprocal connection between politicians in Washington and those who made nominations, conducted electoral campaigns, passed laws, and rewrote constitutions in states thus became a primary objective of this study.

My detailed treatment of states, and occasionally of localities, also stems from a third assumption about nineteenth-century politics. The vitality of the Whig party depended far less on its ability to win the White House than on its strength in Congress, statehouses, and state legislatures. Especially in describing, let alone explaining, the disintegration of the Whig party between the presidential elections of 1852 and 1856, a focus on the state and local arenas that chose subpresidential officeholders is imperative. Thus I have made systematic analyses of Whigs' fortunes in congressional and state elections from the early 1830s until the mid-1850s. Since state legislatures chose United States senators, moreover, to explain the fluctuating strength of the Whigs in the Senate, I have closely studied legislative elections of senators to determine why Whigs were, or were not, elected and why one Whig rather than another got the seat if Whigs prevailed.

Nonpresidential elections had importance far beyond determining who staffed government. Since different states held elections throughout the year almost every year, not uniformly in Novembers of even-numbered years, political leaders read them as their modern counterparts read running public opinion polls. They set strategy and often shifted actions in one place in reaction to earlier outcomes in another. Similarly, internal feuds over nominations and senatorial selections often reverberated long after those choices were made, influencing reactions to policy, patronage, and party strategy. These observations point to a fourth objective that has shaped this study.

Concerned that too much political history written since 1960 sacrificed contingency or change over time in its attempt to explicate underlying structures of collective political behavior, the central tenets of party ideology, or the dominant features of an era's political culture, I have consciously sought to restore a sense of history, of change over time, to my story. Events mattered; they, and not just social structures, economic conditions, fixed political contexts, or ideology, often shaped subsequent behavior. What happened at point A in time influenced what actors did at points B and C. To recapture that constant flux, that importance of contingent decisions and actions, I have tried to write a detailed chronological narrative of developments that occurred simultaneously in numerous different political arenas and that converged to influence subsequent calculations and behavior.

Recapturing those calculations, the various factors that influenced them, and the implications of decisions once made is the fifth goal that I set for myself before starting to write. Hindsight is of great advantage to historians; we know how the story turned out and thus what was pivotal and what was not. By directing our attention to what seems most important to us now, however, hindsight can also distort the priorities of historical actors themselves, obscure their sense of possibility and uncertainty, and blind us to their motivations. I have tried to reconstruct those actors' perceptions and expectations, to recapture what they thought they were doing and why, to re-create their world as they experienced it. To do this, I rely extensively on quotations from my sources to allow Whigs themselves, in effect, to narrate their own history in their own words.

This method has other significant implications. Whose words and perceptions matter most, and how representative is the surviving evidence of the viewpoints of the historically inarticulate? To write the story of an institution that eventually encompassed over a million people, one must make choices about perspective or vantage point. For various reasons, I have narrated my story from the perspective of political leaders, officeholders, and political activists, not rank-and-file Whig voters, largely because I believe Whig and non-Whig leaders, not voters, society as a whole, or impersonal forces made the decisions that account for the Whig party's rise and fall. Obviously, developments outside the relatively narrow echelon of political leaders and activists affected the Whig party, and I try to incorporate them in terms of leaders' responses to them. But this is not meant to be a history from the bottom up, a social history of the United States from the 1820s to the 1850s, or even an attempt to mesh social history with political history. It is, instead, an attempt to reintegrate different aspects of a too-often compartmentalized political universe in order to tell the story of a political party.

As a result, some demographic groups are largely missing from its pages. Because African-Americans were disfranchised in all but a few northern states and because the political activists about whom I have evidence were exclusively white, black voices are not heard here. Where possible, I draw heavily on the letters to Whig politicians from their wives, whose partisan zeal I appreciate and whose political acumen I deeply admire, none more so than Emily Baldwin, the wife of Connecticut's Whig Senator Roger Sherman Baldwin, who has recently been rescued from obscurity by the film Amistad. But, this is, perforce, a study of white men. I do not call them "elite" white men, for many of the now-forgotten characters who people the follow pages would deserve that appellation only because their words have been preserved on paper.

I knew, as I envisioned the book, that these five goals constituted an ambitious agenda. But once I began to write I also changed the study's chronological scope. When I began my research on the Whigs, I was most interested in answering a single perplexing question: why did the Whig party die as a competitive political organization? My previous studies of the antebellum Republican party and of the Know Nothings convinced me how pivotal the death of the Whigs was to the chain of political developments that triggered southern secession and the subsequent Civil War. For that reason alone, accounting for the party's demise is of vital importance. But profound dissatisfaction with the state of partisan politics in the 1970s, 1980s, and 1990s also increased my desire to find an explanation for the Whigs' death. Anyone who has pondered (and deplored) the longevity and the apparent irreplacebility of the modern Republican and Democratic parties, as I have done, should know that the total disappearance or displacement of a mass major party is an exceedingly rare event in American political history. Why, I asked myself, have the modern Democratic and Republican parties endured for so long, when virtually every index of public opinion, from polling data to low voter turnout, suggests that Americans loathe or ignore them, whereas the Whig party, which helped generate historically high levels of voter turnout, which engendered truly passionate loyalty from voters and leaders alike, and which, I confess, I genuinely admire, ceased to exist? How could such an anomaly—indeed, from my perspective, such an injustice—occur?

Thus, I set out to explain why the Whig party went out of business. My original plan was to write a book that began with Henry Clay's narrow, but traumatic, defeat in the presidential election of 1844 and then traced the party to its grave. During an academic year's leave in 1976–77, I conducted archival research across the country in the expectation of writing such a book. When I set out to write during my next leave in the fall of 1981, however, I found it impossible to compress into a single background chapter the party's history prior to 1844. Thus I decided that I must attempt to tell the whole story.

That decision had profound consequences. I spent the remainder of that academic year bringing the Whigs' story only up to 1844, my anticipated starting point. I made this decision at the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences at Stanford, a glorious environment in which to write but not necessarily the best place to do the research on the party's early years, which I had ignored before arriving there. I relied heavily on secondary works, published collections of politicians' papers, microfilm, and whatever else I could find there, but readers will note a decided difference in the density of archival documentation between the chapters on the years up to 1843 and those covering 1844 and beyond.

My decision that fall also had benefits. Close study of the Whig party's founding and of its early, much-frustrated career increased my faith in the plausibility of the argument I wished to make about the reasons for its death. Just as I intended to argue that the party died primarily because both the reality and the popular perception of Whigs' substantive differences from and conflict with the Democratic party markedly diminished after 1848, I also discovered that the party took root in different states after 1833 only when it managed to carve out distinctive positions on concrete matters of state public policy and to demonstrate the congruence between those positions and the stand Whigs took on national affairs. Such study also led me to recognize two other points that shape the book's argument.

First, for both strategic and principled reasons, the Whig party formed behind an ideological mission. Genuinely appalled by Andrew Jackson's Caesarism, by Preface xiii his apparently flagrant contempt for the separation of powers and the rule of law, a contempt that, early Whigs believed, threatened the people's political freedom, the party's founders tried to rally politicians and voters behind a crusade to save the Revolutionary experiment in republican self-government or, in Henry Clay's words, "to rescue public liberty." Many Whig activists always cherished this mission, and they clung tenaciously to the very name "Whig" because of its association with the Revolutionary founders. Yet that self-conscious devotion to bedrock republican principles clearly had decided limitations in terms of arousing voters' interest or helping Whigs win office. Instead, many voters responded positively to the party only when it developed a distinctive agenda on more concrete matters of public policy. Thus, only after the depression following the Panic of 1837 gave salience to a concomitant republican principle embraced by Whigs—the commonwealth tradition of using the state actively for the benefit of the people—did Whigs succeed in mobilizing enough voter support to become truly competitive with the Democrats.

During the heyday of Whiggery in the 1840s, Whigs' commitment to liberty and republican self-government remained a distinctive but subsidiary weapon in the party's competitive arsenal. Partisan conflict instead revolved primarily around governmental economic policy, territorial expansion, war with Mexico, and slavery expansion into the West. When a number of developments converged to reduce and often end partisan conflict over those matters in the early 1850s, however, ideological concerns about protecting republican self-government and political freedom from liberty-crushing threats again took center stage. This time, however, the menace did not come from executive tyranny. It seemed to come instead from unresponsive politicos, a papal plot, a Slave Power conspiracy, or a heartless northern majority intent upon treating the South as the unequal minority that it in fact was. This reconfiguration of the threat to republicanism and of the ideological crusades necessary to save public liberty helped allow new parties to displace the Whigs as the major anti-Democratic party in American political life

Second, examination of the party's early years convinced me that serious internal divisions plagued the party throughout its existence, not just in its later years. That recognition, in turn, compelled me to reformulate my central focus on Whigs' competitive relationship with the Democrats as the key to the party's rise and fall. In essence, I now believe, the history of the Whig party can best be understood in terms of a tension or balance between centrifugal forces that always threatened to tear it apart and the centripetal force of conflict with Democrats that held it together. Both the divisive and cohesive forces waxed and waned in response to economic, social, and political events at the state and national levels of the federal system. Neither ceased to have an impact until the party's last days. But over time, the tilt in the balance between them followed a parabolic path, one inverse to that traced by the centrality of ideological concerns about saving republican institutions and principles. During the party's first few years, as during its last six or seven years, divisive forces clearly overpowered the cohesive glue of hostility to Democrats. Yet from approximately the spring of 1837 through the presidential election of 1848, a common determination to defeat Democrats and end Democratic governance held the Whigs together, despite their manifold divisions. Only after the election of the second—and last—Whig presidential adxiv Preface ministration did the balance between centrifugal and centripetal forces in the party tilt irreversibly and disastrously toward the former.

In the following pages I undertake to describe how and why these transformations occurred. To follow that story, I ask the reader to embark upon a long journey. I hope it is as edifying as it is extended.

Acknowledgments

ONE OF THE PLEASURES of finally finishing a book on which I have worked for so long is the opportunity to thank the many people who helped me along the way. Indeed, precisely because I have been grappling with this study for over two decades, I have been particularly dependent on others for various kinds of support to see it through to completion. One of the costs of taking so long to complete it, however, is the near certainty that I will omit the names of individuals who merit my gratitude, and for those omissions I apologize in advance.

Let me begin with institutions that helped fund my research and writing. During 1976–77 I received a Senior Fellowship from the National Endowment for the Humanities that funded extensive archival research. Aside from my own study at home, the drafting of the manuscript was done at three splendid places: the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences at Stanford in 1981-82; the National Humanities Center in 1987–88; and Downing College, Cambridge, during my year as Pitt Professor of American History and Institutions at the University of Cambridge in 1993–94. I am indebted to the first two institutions for fellowships and also to the University of Virginia for Sesquicentennial Fellowships that allowed me to visit them for a full year. Working on a book was not part of my official job description at Cambridge, but I was given such a humane teaching load that I managed to get a great deal done. Thus I am very grateful to Professor Tony Badger and his colleagues in the History Faculty at Cambridge for inviting me and to the Master and Fellows of Downing College for offering me such warm hospitality during that year. Since 1990, I have been the Langbourne M. Williams Professor of American History at the University of Virginia, and chair leaves associated with that position facilitated my completion of the book.

In 1976–77, I traveled widely in search of material, and I want to thank the following people for finding or providing lodging to me: Claude Barfield; Professor John Milton Cooper; Professor John Hope Franklin; Mr. and Mrs. James W. Henry, Jr.; Mimi Jones; Betsy and Paul Mendelson; Professors Sydney Nathans and Elizabeth Studley; and John Fox Sullivan.

As the list of manuscript collections consulted in the bibliography reveals, I visited a number of archives and libraries, and I want to thank the helpful people at each of them for their aid. The staffs at the Microform and Rare Books Divisions of Alderman Library at the University of Virginia were also a great help. And anyone who has had the privilege of working at the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences and at the National Humanities Center knows how wonderfully supportive and efficient the staffs at those institutions are. I thank them all, and I am delighted that, at long last, I shall have copies of the book on which I labored while benefiting from their help to send them. Before I learned to use a word processor, the secretaries in the Corcoran Department of History at the University of Virginia—Lottie McCauley, Ella Wood, Elizabeth Stovall, and Kathleen Miller—typed seemingly innumerable drafts of seemingly endless chapters, and I am deeply grateful for their help. I also want to thank Diane Cronk for converting the early chapters for which I lacked computer disks into a machine-readable form compatible with the latter chapters.

New and old friends in Stanford, North Carolina, Cambridge, and Charlottes-ville helped me write the book by diverting my attention to more pleasant activities. Were the book shorter, I'd name them all, but I risk straining the reader's patience already. Thus I shall trust that the individuals whom I mean will know who they are. I cannot thank you all enough.

I am most deeply indebted to fellow scholars who shared material with me, suggested ideas that changed my approach, or carefully read and criticized parts or all of my manuscript. Professors William J. Cooper, Jr., Stephen Cresswell, William W. Freehling, Eugene D. Genovese, and William E. Gienapp kindly sent me materials discovered during their own research. At Stanford, my co-Fellow John Ferejohn, a political scientist of boundless energy and ideas, introduced me to a literature on twentieth-century election analysis that is central to the study. It was also my unique good fortune to be a Fellow at the National Humanities Center when Eugene Genovese was there. To my pleasant surprise, I learned that Gene has a passionate interest in and profound knowledge of antebellum political history. During that year, he read the first ten chapters I had drafted, and they have benefited enormously from his wise suggestions and ruthless editorial pen. He recognizes bloat when he sees it, and he did much to keep this opus from being even longer than it is.

Professor William W. Freehling also read later versions of the first ten chapters, and I am deeply obliged to him for cutting still more fat from my prose and attempting to make it more muscular. Readers familiar with his own books will readily recognize his stylistic input, and my only regret is that a temporarily incapacitating accident and his own busy schedule prevented him from reading more. I know from his pointed letters that he will still find this product too long and too detailed, but I also know that it is a far better book because of the attention he lavished on it.

Over the many years that I was writing this book, I floated ideas before gatherings of my colleagues at the University of Virginia, and their trenchant but sympathetic critiques only confirmed my conviction that I'm privileged to belong to a truly great History Department. In addition, my colleagues Edward Ayers, Charles McCurdy, and Peter Onuf read individual chapters of the manuscript, and they are markedly improved because of their insightful responses. But I am even more indebted for help in bringing this monster to bay to four other people.

My dear friends Professors William J. Cooper, Jr., of Louisiana State University and William E. Gienapp of Harvard University read all but the last two draft chapters and offered numerous keen insights that have reshaped the final version. Loyalty such as theirs defines what is best about the profession we share. My colleague at Virginia Stephen Innes, though a colonialist, insisted upon reading the entire manuscript and constantly prodded me to give him additional chapters. He then gave me a marvelously trenchant, apposite, and helpful critique for revising—and condensing—the manuscript. The labors of these three friends were truly heroic, for the manuscript I sent them and initially submitted to the press was fully twenty percent longer than the final product presented here. Much of the credit for reducing it belongs to my editor at Oxford University Press. That legendary friend of historians at Oxford, Sheldon Meyer, originally arranged a contract for this book after reading the chapters I had drafted in the early 1980s, but when he retired several years ago, he put me in the good hands of Thomas LeBien, who initially, I know, could not believe he was inheriting such a white elephant. In an act of amazing faith and generosity, Thomas went through the entire manuscript suggesting line-by-line and paragraph-by-paragraph deletions while I attempted the same kind of cutting on my own. Together we excised fully 750 manuscript pages from the even more detailed tome that I had originally drafted. That this book has ever reached the printed page—and certainly in a single volume—is largely a product of his help in condensing it and of his confidence in the finished product.

Only a very few of the graduate and undergraduate students I have taught at Yale, Stanford, and the University of Virginia between 1965 and 1998 have read a word of this manuscript. Nonetheless, it is with great pride that I dedicate this book to them. As a glance at my endnotes and bibliography will show, I have heavily relied upon the research papers of those students, the majority of whom were undergraduates when they wrote them. As well, most of the ideas in this book were first tested on undergraduates in my lecture courses on the Coming of the Civil War. But I want to acknowledge something more with this dedication. For almost two decades, many of my students have expressed a seemingly genuine interest in what I was doing and an intention actually to read (and buy!) my book on the Whigs when it finally appeared. Unlike myself and many others, they never seemed to doubt that it actually would appear. I am deeply grateful for this wondrous trust.

My family, who have been forced to endure this long saga with me, have contributed to its completion in a very different way. A superbly efficient manager of our household even while masterfully pursuing a career of her own, my wife Joyce constantly prodded me to finish it. My three children quite literally grew up with this book. When I began research in the fall of 1976, my son Adam was three and my daughter Erin was born. Another daughter, Annie, arrived in the fall of 1981, when I first put word to paper at Stanford. Adam and Erin have now graduated from college, and Annie, who gave me valuable help tracking down illustrations this past summer, is a senior in high school. As they matured, "Dad's Whig book" became a kind of standing family joke, a mirage, a quixotic goal. Though usually offered in the spirit of good-natured joshing, this skepticism was a constant goad, a burr in my saddle, that kept me at it over many long years.

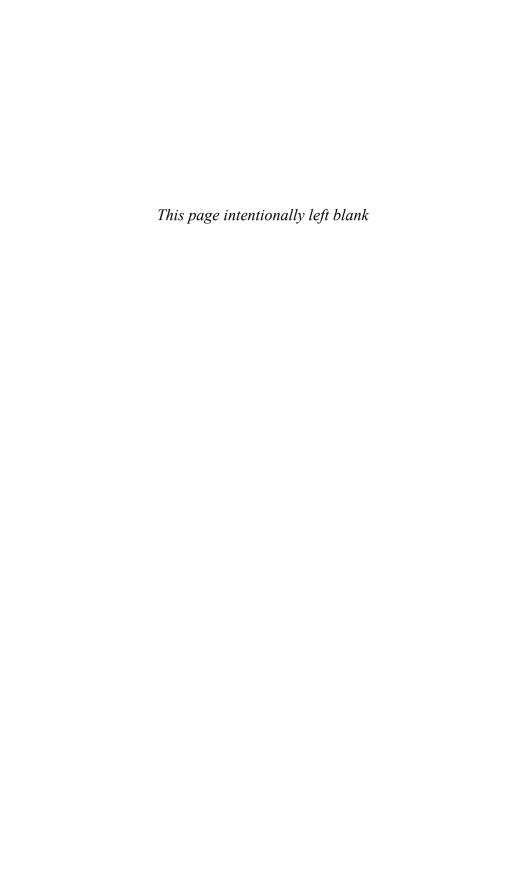

Perhaps the greatest satisfaction I have in finally finishing the book is being able to show them I've done it.

Tradition obliges me to exempt any of those mentioned above from blame for any errors of fact or interpretation that remain in the text. And so they should be, for while I have benefited from advice and different kinds of inspiration, what follows is my own. In a work of this length the laws of probability alone suggest that errors will appear. For those I am solely, if unintentionally, responsible.

The very life of liberty is maintained only by the strife of contending parties

Chapter 1

"Not Fitted to Make Converts"

"THE WHIGS LOOK FORWARD to the approaching contest with all the confident ardor of men who are conscious of the justness of their cause—and in its right-eousness read their claim to certain success." So wrote a Baltimore resident in February 1844 about the impending presidential election to the son of the certain Whig standard bearer, Henry Clay of Kentucky. That winter and spring, through the summer and into the fall, Whigs everywhere forecast triumph. Their own unprecedented harmony, the Democrats' apparent disarray, and faith that they had the superior issues and candidate generated Whig confidence. Their missionary tone, the frequent use of words such as "righteousness" and "redemption," however, derived from another aspect of the race.

Clay's candidacy gave the campaign a special dimension. It vividly reminded Whigs of their ill-starred past even as they contemplated a glorious future. Born in Virginia during the Revolutionary War, Clay had studied law there before moving on to a long and distinguished political career in Kentucky. First a state legislator and interim United States senator, he was elected to the House of Representatives in 1810 and chosen Speaker when he reached Washington. Aside from duty as a peace negotiator at Ghent during the War of 1812, he served as Speaker almost continuously from 1811 to 1825, as secretary of state in John Quincy Adams' administration, and as Kentucky's United States senator for most of the period after 1831. As senator, Clay led the effort to build and define the Whig party. By 1844, most Whigs considered him "the embodyment [sic] and polar star of Whig principles."

At the same time, no other Whig leader had suffered so many mortifying setbacks as Clay during, and even before, the Whigs' oft-times losing crusades against Democratic foes. Although the Whigs' chief congressional spokesman, he had been bypassed for their presidential nomination in both 1836 and 1840 on the grounds of "unavailability." When Whigs won power in the latter year and had a splendid chance to enact the sweeping legislative program Clay had done the most to formulate, a cruel twist of fate deprived him of the opportunity. In 1844, therefore, circumstances seemed to offer Henry Clay long overdue personal vindication and his party long overdue dominance. This prospect of atonement generated Whigs' religious language and euphoria.

Clay's long years of frustration began before the creation of the Whig party in 1834. In 1824 and again in 1832 he ran for president, and each time he was soundly thrashed. That record of failure both stigmatized Clay as a loser and, ironically, made the formation of the Whig party both necessary and possible. To understand why and to identify the seeds from which the Whig party grew, a brief review of political developments between 1800 and 1832 is necessary.

I

Like most politically active residents of his native Virginia and of his adopted Kentucky, Henry Clay was an ardent Jeffersonian Republican and a passionate foe of the rival Federalist party during the fitful existence of the so-called first party system. Clay's Jeffersonian pedigree emblemizes a crucial fact. Throughout the Whig party's existence, Democrats repeatedly sneered that Whigs were simply discredited Federalists hiding behind a new name. This superficially cogent accusation proved extraordinarily difficult to overcome. Even historians routinely echoed Democratic propaganda and described Whigs as ex-Federalists.³ Experts now know better. Massive research in the past forty years has shown that the Whig party evolved not from the Federalists but from divisions within the Jeffersonian Republican party.⁴

After 1800, as the Federalist opposition atrophied, a tension that had always existed among Jeffersonians became more important.⁵ On one side moderate nationalists, associated with James Madison, fully accepted the strengthening of the national government inherent in the Constitution. Though appalled by Federalists' excesses and elitism, which seemed to them to endanger republican self-government, they acquiesced in much of the Hamiltonian economic program. Commercial development, they hoped, would provide a constant market for the nation's farmers, and a diversified economy would keep the population industriously employed.⁶ Their state governments chartered banks to supply capital for investment and credit to finance the transfer of goods. Frightened by the prolonged diplomatic and military crisis between 1807 and 1815, these development-minded Republicans also sought to strengthen and secure the union. At the end of the War of 1812, therefore, they sponsored congressional legislation to tie together the country's diverse economic regions.

Henry Clay was a leading congressional proponent of this nationalistic Jeffersonian economic agenda. In the following years, his coherent program, known as the American System, included high protective tariffs to nourish American manufacturing and create a home market for American agricultural products, a national bank to provide a sound and uniform currency, and federal subsidization of internal improvement projects to ease the movement of goods. In later years, when federally funded internal improvements became infeasible, Clay instead promoted distribution of federal land revenues to the states for their own improvements.⁷

In 1816, the nationalists pushed through Congress, and President Madison signed, laws effecting two parts of their program: a somewhat protective tariff and a twenty-year charter for the Second Bank of the United States. When the Federalist party disintegrated after 1815, many former Federalists embraced the Republican party, strengthening this nationalist wing. It would eventually form the initial core of the Whig party.

These developments appalled the other main branch of Jeffersonians, purists known as Old Republicans or Radicals, who feared the degeneration of original Jeffersonian principles. Beginning in 1801 and even more frequently after the nationalistic legislation of 1816, they deplored the dangers of loose construction and consolidation. Republicans' developmental policies, other Radicals feared, threatened the egalitarian and moral basis of republican society and thereby jeopardized the Revolutionary experiment in republican self-government almost all Americans venerated. 9

Since the Revolution, quarrels over how to achieve and preserve republican institutions had created most political conflict. The British "real Whig" oppositionist tradition, so prominent a part of American Revolutionary rhetoric, had influenced those battles. Revolutionary republicans called on citizens to place the general good ahead of private interests. Officeholders, in turn, must protect citizens' political freedom and legal equality from any concentration of public or private power, and especially from law-granted privileges that gave advantages to some to the disadvantage of others.

While Americans generally agreed on these ends, other aspects of republican theory spawned quarrels over the means of securing them. Disagreements flourished over exactly what the common good entailed and over what government could or should do to promote it without encroaching on popular liberty and equal rights. Contention also developed over which selfish interests, whether political, economic, or religious, sought special privileges that flouted a virtuous commitment to the common good. The defense against these threats lay in citizens' active political participation to oppose those who subverted republican ideals. To Americans of the post-Revolutionary generation, the motto that "The price of liberty is eternal vigilance" was no empty slogan. It was instead the essence of republicanism.

Political leaders had also guarreled about the proper character of a republican society, that is, about what social and economic arrangements would best sustain citizens' virtue, their commitment to the public good or commonweal. A few Radicals groused about the excessive materialism of the market-oriented economy promoted by Clay and other development-minded Republicans. John Taylor of Virginia and Nathaniel Macon of North Carolina, for example, hymned paeans to republican simplicity and to the benefits of a stable agrarian economy that valued hard, honest work. Simultaneously, they preached jeremiads against speculation, arcane financial manipulation, and lust for instant wealth. The egalitarian ethos that had begun to effervesce during the Revolution and spread rapidly thereafter also generated Radicals' laments. 10 According to that ethos, the common good demanded that white men must attain roughly equal condition and, more important, equal rights before the law. Any legal privileges that gave unequal advantages to some seemed to pave a road toward the aristocratic, unrepublican society that all Republicans had accused Federalists of fostering. Radicals like William Duane of Philadelphia and Virginia's Taylor denounced banks and other corporations as bastions of aristocratic privilege inimical to equal rights. They condemned paper banknotes as fraudulent since banks often refused to redeem them for full face value. And they castigated the new monied men as an artificial aristocracy, inherently antagonistic to humble farmers and artisans. To restore social and political equality, they insisted, entrepreneurial policies such as Clay's must be checked.

In the buoyant years immediately following the War of 1812, frightened Old Republicans were a minority in the Jeffersonian party. Outside of a few southeastern states, their cries of alarm resonated faintly. The spirit of nationalism that had helped cause and sustain the war and had then been intensified by Americans' successful escape from that war dulled popular concern about the impending consolidation against which state rights Cassandras wailed. An economic boom blinded most men to the potential pitfalls of a speculative economy. Most important, by 1815, if not long before, most Americans saw no conflict between civic duty (virtue) and economic self-interest. To them, republican citizenship required political participation and vigilance, not economic abnegation. To them, the Declaration of Independence's self-evident truth about the right to pursue happiness freed individuals to seek prosperity. Any other definition of the common good was not merely an abstraction; it was an absurdity.

To most Americans in 1816, Madisonian nationalists like Clay, who had presided over the recent war effort and then passed legislation to rectify national weaknesses, had fulfilled the central duty of elected political leaders. They had preserved the Revolutionary generation's experiment in republican self-government.¹¹ At the close of Madison's second term in 1817, therefore, nationalists held the upper hand within the Republican party. They would be represented in James Monroe's new Cabinet by John Quincy Adams, the secretary of state and a former Federalist who had joined the Republicans before the War of 1812, and by Secretary of War John C. Calhoun, manager of the Bank charter in the House in 1816 and proponent of federal internal improvements. In Congress, Clay, the long-time Speaker of the House, continued to exert great influence.

The Radical doomsayers, in contrast, were largely ignored. They lacked a sufficient popular following to control the party either in Congress or in most states, and few voters by 1816 seemed interested in these leadership rifts. ¹² Nonetheless, Secretary of the Treasury William H. Crawford of Georgia gave the state righters a potential national rallying point, should events create the opportunity for a rally.

The panic of 1819 and the sharp sectional split in Congress between 1819 and 1821 over Missouri's admission as a slave state provided it. Those developments shifted the balance of power toward the Radicals in a number of states and split the Jeffersonian party in the presidential election of 1824. The depression following the panic of 1819 awakened tens of thousands of men to the importance of politics. Farmers who lost their property, artisans who lost their jobs or were paid in worthless paper scrip, and businessmen who faced bankruptcy all turned to government for relief from their economic plight or for retaliation against the forces that they believed had caused it. Thousands voted who had never bothered before or demanded the vote if they did not have it. State politics began to revolve around debtor relief, stay laws, paper money, and banks. Newly politicized citizens seeking positive legislation to promote economic recovery gravitated toward the nationalist or pro-development wing of the party epitomized by Clay. Radicals, however, benefited most from the reaction.

For one thing, thousands of midwestern and southwestern farmers and land speculators, having suffered the foreclosure of mortgages, blamed the Bank of the United States and the eastern elite for causing the panic. As an attorney for the Bank who oversaw its foreclosures in Kentucky and Ohio, Clay earned resentment for serving the despised Easterners. This inflamed sectional animosity influenced congressional debates over the tariff, internal improvements, and land policy for years thereafter. It also made the juggling of sectional interests part of the task of constructing a national party.

Antibanking sentiment ignited resentment of established elites everywhere. Now farmers and urban working men joined the Radical ideologues in denouncing bankers who seemed both to cause calamitous economic fluctuations and to escape their consequences. When a farmer or artisan could not pay his debts, he usually lost everything he owned and might be thrown into debtors' prison. When banks could not pay their debts, in contrast, they simply suspended specie payments and went about their business. Stockholders in the bank faced no further penalty because of limited individual liability. To many Americans such privileges seemed outrageously unfair, a flagrant violation of the republican principle of equal rights. In state after state, movements emerged to regulate banks, to substitute state-controlled banks for private corporations, or to abolish banks and/or paper money. In sum, the panic created a widespread animosity toward the political and economic establishment that gave the old egalitarian Radicals overwhelming reinforcements.¹³

Simultaneously, Northerners' attempt in Congress to stop the admission of Missouri as a slave state strengthened southern Old Republicans. The problem, according to Old Republicans, was that nationalists' program of aggrandizing national power augured the destruction of slavery. If northern congressmen could demand the abolition of slavery in a new state, they reasoned, they would soon attempt to destroy it in old states. The solution, Old Republicans contended, was to rededicate the party to state rights and strict construction. Newly empowered southern Old Republicans coalesced with key northern politicians, especially Isaac Hill of New Hampshire and Senator Martin Van Buren, leader of the powerful Bucktail faction in New York. Thus did the panic and the Missouri crisis shift the political balance against the nationalist, pro-development wing of the Republicans.

The presidential election of 1824 revealed the degree of the change. Initially five contenders, all of whom called themselves Republicans but who represented different impulses in the party, sought the White House. One, Secretary of War Calhoun, still regarded as a nationalist, eventually dropped out of the race and consoled himself with election to the vice presidency. Of the remaining aspirants, John Quincy Adams and Henry Clay also belonged to the Madisonian nationalist wing, although their images among the electorate differed. Adams of Massachusetts appealed to the regional pride of New England and to Yankees elsewhere who considered slavery immoral, who rankled at the additional political power it gave the South through the Constitution's three-fifths clause, and who blamed the slaveholder Clay for conceding too much to the South by arranging the Missouri Compromise that admitted Missouri as a slave state. Clay, in turn, had greater appeal to those regions and to those voters who sought internal improvements and higher tariffs.

William H. Crawford was the candidate of the state rights Old Republicans. Nominated by a congressional caucus, by now the detested instrument of an insulated Washington establishment, Crawford was stigmatized as the candidate of politicians who violated the first principle of republicanism: government by the people. Instead, those who wanted to smite the political and economic elite turned to the remaining candidate in the field, General Andrew Jackson of Tennessee.¹⁵

Although Jackson served in the Senate in 1824 and cast votes for a protective tariff and internal improvements, he was still known primarily for his military exploits. The hero of the battle of New Orleans, where in 1815 he had routed the British in the only significant American land victory during the War of 1812, he had also crushed various Indian tribes in the southeastern states and had helped force the Spanish into ceding Florida to the United States in 1819. In a nation where thousands of local militia companies revered military prowess, his achievements guaranteed him wide support. 16 But there was more to Jackson's appeal than martial glory. Though himself a wealthy slaveholding member of Tennessee's plantation gentry, Jackson was a perfect standard bearer for angry voters bent on venting resentments. Westerners and Southerners embraced the Tennessean as a foe of the haughty East. His ownership of slaves and his renown as an Indian fighter only increased his appeal to such men. More important, Jackson was clearly a political newcomer compared to Adams, Clay, and Crawford. All who wanted to throw the establishment out of Washington, or at least out of the White House, could cleave to him.

Jackson and his friends also brilliantly capitalized on spreading popular fears that corruption in government was undermining republicanism. According to the republican ideas with which Americans were indoctrinated, corruption was doubly insidious. It induced officeholders to place their self-interest ahead of the public good and thus reduced their effectiveness as guardians of the people's liberty. At the same time, corruption of private citizens eroded their vigilance and their concern with public life by creating an obsession with materialistic self-advancement. The result would be inevitable. Since neither the people nor their representatives placed a priority on the protection of popular liberty and equality any longer, power would encroach on liberty. Tyranny would prevail, and the people would lose their liberty and equality and be reduced to slavery. Since the mid-eighteenth century, indeed, Americans had believed that slavery was the inevitable result of the loss of republican liberty.

Jackson himself believed that such a process of degeneration had already begun, and in 1824 he and his friend John H. Eaton wrote a campaign document expressing his views that soon became the basis for newspaper editorials endorsing Jackson's election. Known as The Letters of Wyoming, the pamphlet labeled the nation's capital a sinkhole of corruption that subverted the very basis of self-government. If virtue continued to be abandoned, it predicted, "freedom of necessity . . . must be laid prostrate." "We are not as we once were," it warned. "The people are slumbering at their posts; virtue is on the wane; and the republican principles with which we set out, are fast declining." But the people could "sustain [their] republican principles . . . by calling to the Presidential Chair . . . ANDREW JACKSON."

Capitalizing on his popularity as a military hero, on regional resentments, on hostility to privileged elites, and on promises to preserve republican liberty, Jackson won a plurality of both the popular and electoral votes. He ran especially well in recently settled states like Illinois, Indiana, Mississippi, Alabama, and Louisiana, in North and South Carolina, and in Pennsylvania and New Jersey. Adams, who placed second in both votes, swept New England and took the bulk of New York's electoral votes. Crawford's strength, aside from Van Burenite support in New York, was confined largely to his native South, especially Virginia and Georgia. Clay, the one avowed champion of a nationalistic economic program, made a dismal showing in this first reach for the presidency, carrying outright only Kentucky, his home state, and neighboring Ohio. Stigmatized in much of the North as a slaveholder, in much of the South as a foe of strict construction, and in much of the recently settled West as an agent of the hated Bank and a critic of Jackson's successful wars against Indians, Clay captured only about 13 percent of the popular vote and came in last in the electoral count.

Nor did his problems in the 1824 election end there. Since no candidate had a majority of the electoral vote, the House of Representatives chose among the top three finishers: Jackson, Adams, and Crawford. Although Clay and Adams did not get along personally, Clay threw his considerable influence among his House colleagues to the New Englander, who then triumphed. When Adams subsequently appointed Clay as his secretary of state and thus his presumable successor in the White House, the embittered Jackson supporters immediately cried that a "Corrupt Bargain" between Clay and Adams had larcenously denied the popular will to keep an encrusted and arrogant elite in power. This charge would haunt Clay for the remainder of his long career. 18

H

Between 1824 and 1828 a new alignment among politicians and voters began to crystallize. Adams and Clay supporters, divided in 1824, united behind the administration. This Adams party represented that portion of the old Madisonian wing who still believed in positive national legislation to promote economic development. In addition, Daniel Webster of Massachusetts led the remaining Federalists in Congress to support the administration. Federalists not only shared in its patronage but found congenial Adams' bold advocacy of protective tariffs, federal internal improvements, and unprecedented new activities such as the congressional establishment of a national university, a national observatory, and a national naval academy.

The nature and program of the Adams party, in turn, prompted the merger of the followers of Jackson, Calhoun, and Crawford in opposition to the administration and in support of Jackson's candidacy in 1828. The sweeping expansion of national power implicit in Adams' agenda offended state rights men. The apparent hostility of Adams and his attorney general, William Wirt, toward slavery and what slaveholders regarded as their rights alienated Southerners, and their inaction in regard to Indian land titles irritated land-hungry western settlers eager to force Indians off their lands.²¹ Furthermore, high protective tariffs were becoming increasingly unpopular in the South, especially in Calhoun's South Carolina, and this sentiment helped drive Calhoun into the Jackson camp. Charges of the Corrupt Bargain, moreover, stigmatized the administration as privileged enemies of the popular will and greatly increased the credibility of the Jacksonian cause.

The Jacksonian opposition to the Adams party quickly developed into a powerful combination that won the congressional elections of 1826–27. Nor did shrewd managers of the Jackson coalition rest content with advantages already possessed. Confident that most Southerners would prefer a ticket of Jackson and Calhoun to one headed by Adams, Jacksonian leaders in the Senate such as New York's Van Buren and Levi Woodbury of New Hampshire maneuvered to pass a tariff in 1828 to neutralize whatever appeal Adams had as a proponent of protection in the Midwest and Middle Atlantic states. To get the necessary congressional votes to pass that bill, they willingly made concessions to New England textile interests. Although Southerners shrieked about a "Tariff of Abominations," in the campaign Jackson men took care to pose as champions of protection where they thought they could benefit from such an image.²² More important than such attempts to manipulate national policy in order to enhance their appeal, the Jackson men built an organization to exploit the potential of an expanding and previously apathetic electorate.

Appeals for voter support had been relatively less important at the presidential level than for state and local offices. Many states chose to elect presidential electors in state legislatures rather than by popular vote, thus negating the need of organizations to get out the vote. In 1824, one-fourth of the states—Delaware, Georgia, Louisiana, South Carolina, Vermont, and New York—still chose electors in the legislature. Because of the dominance of the Republicans in most parts of the country, moreover, presidential elections since 1800 had generally been less competitive than state and local contests, thereby reducing voter interest in a given state. Some states had also placed property restrictions on the suffrage, reducing the number of eligible voters.

Consequently, prior to 1828, turnout rates in presidential elections were frequently lower than in gubernatorial races.²³ In 1824 only slightly more than a fourth of the adult white males voted for president. With voters minimally involved, national leaders, to construct winning coalitions, forged alliances with members of local elites in their own states and coalesced with national leaders from other states who had built similar alliances. Politicians, in short, counted on deferential voters to follow where local leaders led. Party building from the center to the periphery, in sum, had been largely leader oriented rather than voter oriented.²⁴

By 1828, however, most states had abolished property qualifications for suffrage so that virtually all adult white males could vote. By 1828 as well, only South Carolina and Delaware still allowed the legislature to choose presidential electors, and after that date only the Palmetto State clung to that practice. Thus presidential contenders could tap a much larger electorate. As astute Jacksonian managers recognized much more quickly than the Adams party, dealing with a mass electorate required different strategies than could be used with a relatively small one. Voters had to be mobilized directly; alliances of local elites loyal to one political leader or another could no longer win. Issues now had to be framed in terms that were understandable and compelling to relatively less educated and less interested voters. At times this necessity meant presenting specific policies in broad ideological or symbolic terms; at times it meant developing campaign issues that resonated with voters' emotions, values, and prejudices but that had no specific programmatic focus. Strikingly adept at all these tasks, Jacksonians adapted to the new rules of the game much more quickly than the hapless Adams men.²⁵

Riding and channeling the waves of resentment mounting against Adams since 1825 and the popular enthusiasm for the hero of New Orleans, the talented Jackson managers organized the Jackson party from the top down. Central committees in Nashville and Washington corresponded voluminously with politicians around the country, who in turn established lackson clubs and committees at the country and local levels. Sniffing victory that might result in federal patronage or local office, opportunistic politicians in state after state clambered aboard the Jackson bandwagon. They disseminated propaganda that had been mailed from Washington praising Jackson's virtues and dedication to republican principles, reminding voters that he had been the victim of a corrupt and cynical bargain, pillorying the supposed misdeeds of the Adams administration, and lacerating the president himself as an effete intellectual snob who spoke Latin and guoted Voltaire; as a papist or an antipapist, depending upon the audience; and even as a former pimp for the czar of Russia. State and local organizations purchased existing newspapers or established new ones to spread the Jackson gospel. They aroused public interest with mass rallies, parades, barbecues, and pole raisings, all new rituals of American political campaigns. These local organizations, finally, performed the most pragmatic yet important function of political parties in the nineteenth century. They printed and distributed Jackson ballots to voters on election day, for until the end of that century the parties themselves, not government, provided voters with ballots 26

The Adams party did not remain inert in the face of these developments. They too gained control of local newspapers, engaged in mudslinging, and developed an organization in various states. Some Adams leaders proved to be effective party managers. For example, Secretary of the Navy Samuel Southard, an old Jeffersonian and son of a former Jeffersonian congressman, created a competitive Adams machine in his native New Jersey. Nonetheless, in most states the Adams organization remained a loose alliance of local elites supplemented by the federal officeholders who remained loyal to Adams. Certainly Adams' campaign apparatus was less extensive and less effective in directly mobilizing voters than the Jackson organization.²⁷

The elaboration of an organization gave Jackson a great advantage against Adams in 1828. It was not his only advantage, however. To Southerners and Westerners, Jackson seemed a firmer friend of slavery and foe of Indians than the Yankee president. Moreover, the erudite, Harvard-educated Adams proved a perfect foil for Jackson's campaign to establish himself as the people's champion against a hated northeastern elite. Nor could Adams match Jackson's stirring appeal to fundamental republican values. As a result of this combination a broad, powerful, and heterogeneous movement overwhelmed Adams and swept Jackson into the White House. In 1828, the turnout of eligible voters more than doubled since 1824. Jackson carried 56 percent of the popular vote, and he won in the electoral college by more than a two-to-one margin. Only tiny Delaware, New Jersey, a few congressional districts in Maryland and New York, and Adams' home region of New England resisted the tide.

Ш

The Adams and Clay forces now found themselves a beleaguered minority. Jacksonians not only captured the White House, but they also controlled both houses of Congress, the House of Representatives by a substantial 138–74 margin. To Clay, Webster, and others fell the classic task of leadership for a minority or "out" party, a task that would preoccupy and define the Whig party for most of its existence—uniting the opponents of the majority and broadening that coalition until it was competitive. Nor did personal ambition alone motivate them. They believed that they had a republican duty to maintain a vigil on the actions of the new government.

Clay, the foremost leader of the opposition, was genuinely appalled by Jackson's election. He feared that Jackson's military background portended a despotism that menaced republican liberty. Clay wrote in the January following the election, for example, that the National Republicans must keep "constantly in view the danger to civil liberty of the predominance of the military spirit" and be prepared to rally the people against it. Rallying the people meant finding attractive issues, picking up converts or defectors from the majority, and winning a decisive share of new voters. Those objectives, in turn, meant waiting for the Jacksonians to alienate former supporters or finding new issues and a new image to win over new supporters.

Surprisingly optimistic about their ability to topple the new regime, National Republicans initially decided to wait quietly for the Jacksonian coalition to disintegrate. Refusing to acknowledge the 1828 election as a repudiation of economic nationalism and of leadership by the traditional political elite they represented, they regarded the outcome instead simply as a triumph by the magnetic Jackson over the aloof and colorless Adams. Hoopla, demagoguery, and Jackson's refusal to take a stand on matters of national policy, they thought, had temporarily dazzled voters, while sheer opportunism had engaged politicians with divergent policy goals in the Jackson cause. Once Jackson clarified his position on matters such as the tariff and internal improvements, they believed, people would regain their senses and desert the Jackson movement as quickly as they had joined it.²⁹

In November 1829, for example, Clay wrote to James Barbour of Virginia of his great "hope of a speedy restoration of the reign of reason and common sense." "We must but passively await the inevitable fragmentation of Jackson's alliance," he crowed. "The next session of Congress will... greatly add to the dissolvents of that party," Clay again predicted in July 1829. "Whatever the President may say or recommend in his message to Congress, his friends in the body must divide on certain leading measures of policy." Once they did, the dissidents "must, sooner or later, attach themselves to the party which has all along been averse to the General." Hoping for "much" from "discontent and schisms among our opponents," Webster emphatically agreed. "My own firm belief," he wrote to Clay from the Senate in April 1830, "is, that if we were to let the Administration, this session and the next, have their own way, and follow their own principles, they would be so unpopular as that the General could not possibly be re-elected."

In some ways this passive strategy made sense. The members of Jackson's extraordinarily heterogeneous coalition did disagree on policy questions. An alliance of men joined more by ambition for office or common hostility to the Adams administration than as yet by any positive loyalty to Jackson or his embryonic party, Jacksonian politicians were susceptible to disillusionment. For many voters the attachments and alignments that had developed during the mid-1820s were still new and unfixed. The election of 1828 had mobilized thousands of new voters to throw the "ins" out; a durable realignment of the electorate depended on what Jackson did in office.³¹ Thus the possibility of breaking off large chunks of Jackson's coalition theoretically remained open.

But National Republicans badly underestimated the skill with which Jackson solidified his ties to voters. His vigorous advocacy of Indian removal increased his popularity in the South and West. His demand for rotation in office among federal officeholders and his defiant contempt for the snobbish social pretension evident in the so-called Peggy Eaton affair enhanced his image as a foe of privilege and elitism. He cemented his hold on Old Republicans with solicitous respect for state rights, strict construction doctrine. Not only did he echo that doctrine continually in his annual messages and dramatically by his Maysville Veto of May 1830, but he also emphatically supported assertions by southern states of sovereignty over Indians within their borders. At the same time, his willingness to sign other internal improvement legislation and to acquiesce in protective tariffs allowed him to offset the appeal of National Republicans in the West and Mid-Atlantic states on those issues.³² Thus, in the off-year congressional elections held in 1830 and 1831, the number of National Republican seats in the House fell from 74 to 58, while the Democratic total climbed from 139 to 141. Members with other affiliations occupied the other fourteen seats.

This last figure indicates the second reason why National Republican hopes were dashed. The issues that generated opposition to Jackson did not automatically unite his foes and drive them into the National Republican camp. The case of John C. Calhoun illustrates the point. National Republicans' anticipation of gaining defectors from the Jackson coalition seemed initially to be confirmed when the vice president bolted the Jackson team, taking some southern supporters with him. Personal animosity between the proud South Carolinian and the egotistical president, as well as rivalry between Calhoun and Secretary of State Martin Van Buren to be Jackson's successor, in part caused this rift. Feuding that had divided the administration since 1829 broke into the open in 1831 when Calhoun published a pamphlet detailing his private quarrels with Jackson and when Jackson, at Van Buren's suggestion, reorganized the cabinet to expunge Calhoun allies. Jackson then signaled that Van Buren had replaced Calhoun as his chosen successor by appointing the New Yorker minister to England. In response, National Republicans in the Senate wooed Calhoun by opposing Van Buren's confirmation. When the Senate vote on Van Buren resulted in a tie, the bitter vice president cast the deciding vote against him and thus completed his estrangement from Old Hickory. When Van Buren was named Jackson's running mate by a Democratic national convention in May 1832, National Republican hopes for a more permanent alliance with Calhoun rose even higher.33

Yet fundamental disagreements over the tariff issue prevented the absorption of Calhoun and other southern dissidents into the party. By 1828, Calhoun, under pressure from his South Carolina constituents, had shifted from his previous nationalism to a position more in line with southern opponents of protectionism. In that year, he had secretly authored the South Carolina Exposition and Protest, which affirmed the right of a state to nullify a tariff law it considered unconstitutional. Jackson's failure to push for tariff revision was one source of Calhoun's alienation from him, and in 1831 Calhoun openly endorsed nullification. Such a stance put him at odds with National Republicans, who iterated their devotion to a protective tariff in a series of addresses and resolutions issued by national conventions in 1831 and 1832 and who agreed with Webster's retort to South Carolina Senator Robert Hayne in 1830 that nullification was treasonous.

Even the passage of a new tariff in July 1832 that lowered rates to the 1824 level could not close the breach between nationalists and nullifiers. In 1832 South Carolina refused to give its electoral vote to National Republican candidate Clay. Instead, in a gesture of protest, the state legislature threw it to John B. Floyd of Virginia. Nor were National Republicans more successful in attracting disillusioned former Jacksonians in other southern states. Dissenters in Alabama, Virginia, Mississippi, Georgia, and North Carolina expressed their anger over developments in Jackson's first term by an abortive effort to substitute P. P. Barbour of Virginia for Van Buren as vice president on Jackson tickets, not by supporting the nationalistic tariff proponent Clay. National Republican expectations of uniting the various opponents of Jackson in the South had aborted.³⁴

Nor could they successfully combine all opponents of Jackson in the North. There the problem was not so much that matters of national policy divided the foes of the Jacksonians, most of whom agreed with or at least acquiesced in National Republican positions. Rather, the National Republican leadership's faith in the ability of national issues and a coalition of congressional leaders to rally grassroots voters made them blindly insensitive and, in the end, resistant to important popular currents and political developments at the subnational level that had little to do with national concerns. For most of the nineteenth century, state governments addressed more matters that affected people's everyday lives than did Congress or the president. As a result, many people cared more about controlling state governments than the national regime. Moreover, since an organization could distribute ballots more easily for a single state than for the entire nation, the possibility of starting new parties oriented toward state issues always existed.

National Republicans were especially vulnerable to such a challenge in the late 1820s because permanent voter identifications had not yet been fixed. A new two-party system was still in its incipient stages; it had not yet crystallized. In sum, the same political fluidity that encouraged National Republican leaders to hope for defections from the Jackson movement encouraged other political groups to operate outside the orbit of National Republicans and to challenge their credentials as leaders of the opposition to Jackson. As soon as the presidential election of 1828 was over, National Republican state organizations evaporated in the North, except for a few places like Massachusetts, New Jersey, and Maryland. In this vacuum a new, state-oriented organization called the Antimasonic party displaced the National Republicans as the primary opponent of the Democrats.

Started in 1826 as a protest over the murder of a defecting Freemason in western New York and the apparent effort of Masonic officeholders to cover up the crime, Antimasonry evolved into a defense of republican institutions against the secrecy and power of the Masonic fraternity. Initially its political purpose was to drive all Masons from public office by electing declared Antimasons, but its proclaimed defense of equal rights and civil liberties against the purported Masonic conspiracy quickly developed into a broad condemnation of all privileged corporations and state policies that abetted them. Antimasons vented the anger of farmers who suffered from economic dislocation and who resented the increasing control of urban commercial centers. In addition, they reflected the anxieties of rural evangelical Protestants who were alarmed by what they perceived as an increasing secularization of society and a degeneration, indeed a subversion, of fundamental Christian values. Emphatically embracing the basic republican principle that the people could and must rule themselves, they stressed that simply by voting, the people could install new governors and thereby change government policies. They were happy, declared Antimasons, to represent the "lower classes . . . for in this country the lower classes are the head of all. The PEOPLE are SOVEREIGN." By the tens of thousands, disenchanted voters responded to this bracing appeal.³⁵

By 1832 the Antimasons had ridden such populistic, antielitist, and moralistic sentiments to a powerful position in several northern states. They controlled the governorship and legislature in Vermont and had come close to winning New York and Pennsylvania. In Massachusetts, Antimasons captured 150 of the 490 seats in the general assembly in 1831, and they were influential in Connecticut and Rhode Island as well. Because Jackson was a Mason and therefore anathema to Antimasons, because the Democratic followers of Jackson in states like New York and Pennsylvania were responsible for the state policies Antimasons abhorred, and because Antimasons properly blamed Democrats in the Senate for frustrating a petition campaign by evangelical Protestants to have Congress stop Sunday mail deliveries and thereby restore the purity of the Sabbath, Antimasons seemed like natural allies for the National Republicans.

Yet a profound difference in style and purpose separated Antimasons from National Republicans. For one thing, many Antimasons distrusted all politicians, not just Democrats, for abetting the Masonic conspiracy. "Antimasonry has no use for any officeseeking, selfish, time-serving politician," they declared. They took "their candidates, not from the exclusive circle of aristocracy, but from the people." With some justice, therefore, Antimasons regarded National Republican patricians as hateful, snobbish, privileged aristocrats. Antagonism toward National Republicans was particularly strong in New England, where National Republicans rather than Democrats controlled state governments. Massachusetts Antimasonic conventions, for example, railed that the state's National Republican party was "completely under the control of the ultra aristocracy, the ultra Federalism, and the ultra Freemasonry of Boston and Worcester." To declare their independence from both major parties, the Antimasons nominated their own presidential candidate, William Wirt, in September 1831.

As early as the fall of 1830, National Republican leaders recognized that "this cursed anti-masonry embarrasses everything, and defeats all attempts at systematic operation against the common enemy." Until their own national convention in December 1831, however, they remained arrogantly confident that they could enlist Antimasonic support against Jackson on their own terms, namely, by stressing national economic policy, not state issues, and by retaining control of the anti-Jackson forces in their own hands. Despite Antimasonry, a New Yorker assured Clay, National Republicans could succeed "under the banner of Clay and the American System." Clay, who was a Mason himself, firmly believed that Antimasons must join the National Republicans, "for the natural tendency of all divisions of the minority is to cohesion." The National Republicans were stronger than the Antimasons, Clay informed another correspondent, and "upon the laws of gravitation, we ought to draw them to us, instead of being drawn to them." Convinced of the inevitability of such a merger and insisting as well that topics like Masonry, no matter how important they were to voters, should not be discussed by national political leaders, he refused to answer requests from Pennsylvanians and New Yorkers that he denounce Freemasonry or renounce his membership in the order. Antimasons would have to come to Henry Clay. Mohammed would not go the mountain.³⁶

Not only did Clay refuse to repudiate Masonry in order to construct a winning anti-Jackson coalition; after Wirt's nomination, he publicly denounced Antimasonry instead. Most other National Republican leaders shared his contempt for the third party, and when the National Republicans' national convention met in December 1831, they nominated Clay unanimously. Despite such obduracy, pragmatic politicians like New York's Thurlow Weed sought to combine the two parties behind common electoral tickets and gubernatorial candidates in Ohio, Pennsylvania, and New York in 1832. In the first two, however, National Republicans simply backed Antimasonic tickets on the understanding that those electors would support Clay in the electoral college if he had a better chance than Wirt to defeat Jackson. More important, New England's Antimasons insisted on running separate tickets for Wirt, and in November he would carry Vermont and drain support from Clay in other states as well.³⁷

If most National Republican leaders stubbornly refused to deal with Antimasons as equal partners, they also reacted to "this demon of Antimasonry," as one called it, with fear and revulsion. Antimasonry's insistence that plain people, "the lower classes," should themselves govern challenged deeply held beliefs of National Republican leaders that educated gentlemen such as they, men of demonstrated talent, experience, and breadth of vision, had a right and a duty to rule. They clung to an eighteenth-century version of republicanism that stressed governance by an insulated elite on behalf of the public good rather than other republican values like self-government, equal rights, and liberty. Public issues, they thought, should be decided by reasoned debate among leading public figures. not by referenda at the polls. In their eyes, the egalitarian populism of Antimasonry was just as dangerous as the antiestablishment impulse that had brought Jackson to power. Even though both the Jacksonians and the Antimasons had demonstrated the efficacy of making direct appeals to the electorate and emphasizing basic republican principles, therefore, the National Republicans refused at first to emulate them. They had learned nothing about the changes transforming American politics, or at least they acted that way. This adherence to an outmoded strategy and style constituted the third and overarching reason for the National Republicans' failure to mount an effective opposition to Jackson.³⁸

Even though the National Republicans abandoned their initial tactic of passively awaiting events by the middle of Jackson's first term, their underestimation of Jackson's skill, their failure to unite all the foes of Jackson, and their dependence on an old-fashioned leader-oriented strategy continued to plague them. To their credit, National Republicans did recognize by the end of 1830 that they had to attack Jackson openly in order to break up his coalition in Congress and the states.

"The quiescent policy, which it was deemed expedient for us to act upon during the last year, . . . is not fitted to make converts," Alexander Everett of Massachusetts had advised Clay. To most National Republicans in 1831, however, changing tactics simply meant denouncing Jackson's mistakes, proving his unfitness for office to other leaders, and portraying Clay as a politician possessing the traditional qualifications for the presidency.

To be sure, some National Republicans recognized in the fall of 1831 that Clay's long service in the House and Senate, his close identification with the American System, and his purported participation in the Corrupt Bargain made him precisely the wrong candidate to win converts to the National Republican cause. Instead, they predicted accurately, Clay would repel Antimasons and Calhounites and galvanize even disillusioned Democrats behind Jackson. Clay's chances, Oran Follett of Buffalo wrote on the eve of the National Republicans' national convention in December 1831, were as "hopeless as salvation without repentance." The vast majority of National Republican leaders, however, were unwilling to dump Clay in favor of someone more likely to unify the foes of lackson, such as Supreme Court Justice John McLean, who was popular with the Antimasons. The convention nominated Clay unanimously and then issued a staggeringly long address explaining their action. The address condemned virtually everything Jackson had done since taking office and especially faulted him for "deficiencies" of the "character" and the "dignity, judgment, good temper, discretion, and moderation" necessary for discharging the duties of the presidency. Clay merited support, it contended, because he was "one of the principal founders, and supporters of the American System," because he was a statesman of long and varied experience whose "qualifications and services . . . are too well known to require the aid of our testimony." The very length of this document, the detail in which it reviewed Jackson's record, and its language all indicated that National Republicans were still trying to convert leaders rather than court voters.40

IV

By early 1832, even Clay realized that this tack seemed little better than the previous policy of watchful waiting. Dissident Democratic congressmen still clung to Jackson, often professing their personal loyalty to him before voting against his recommended policies. Jackson had neutralized Clay's appeal on internal improvements and the tariff in the North, and those issues in any event were not attracting the support Clay needed in either the North or the South. ⁴¹ Thus National Republican leaders recognized that they must find a new issue to wean away Democratic leaders and rouse local elites to action. Eagerly, enthusiastically, and blindly, therefore, they created a new issue, one that hitched the fate of the National Republican party to the Bank of the United States.

Although the charter of the Bank would not expire until 1836, its president, Nicholas Biddle, petitioned Congress for recharter in January 1832. In his annual messages, Jackson had frequently criticized certain provisions of the Bank's operation and called for reform. Biddle knew, however, that Jackson also hoped to roll up a huge popular vote in 1832, and he anticipated that Jackson would not dare to veto recharter in an election year for fear of reducing his popular majorities, especially in Pennsylvania, where the Bank was headquartered. National Republican leaders like Clay and Webster, in contrast, encouraged and supported Biddle's recharter effort precisely because they expected Jackson to veto it.

Such a veto exactly fit their old-fashioned conception of how politics operated. Correctly, they believed, the Bank was now popular in the South and parts of the West, which were Jackson strongholds, as well as in the Northeast. A veto, they calculated, would alienate the businessmen, lawyers, and planters who benefited from the cheap credit and uniform currency the Bank provided and turn those community leaders against Jackson. In the Northeast such community leaders could presumably persuade suspicious Antimasons to support Clay. For two years Clay had predicted that if he could pry either New York or Pennsylvania from Jackson he could defeat him, and the veto promised to be just the lever he needed.

More important, National Republicans calculated that the veto would reduce Jackson's influence and increase their own strength among congressional leaders. On the one hand, it could forge a link with Calhoun and South Carolinians. On the other, it would drive a wedge between Jackson and his remaining congressional supporters, many of whom favored the Bank. A veto, they believed, would vividly dramatize that Jackson was determined to undermine the position and authority of traditional political elites. By emphasizing executive usurpation of congressional prerogatives, they hoped to convince proud Democratic leaders that Jackson considered his own personal views superior to those of congressional statesmen. Once Democratic congressmen became convinced of that, National Republican leaders assumed, they would rush to preserve their own status as leaders by bringing their supposed legions of local supporters into the National Republican camp.⁴²

When rechartering legislation passed Congress with the support of a third of the Jackson men and when Jackson then vetoed it on July 10, 1832, however, National Republican hopes were pulverized. Not only did pro-Bank Democrats fail to bolt once the president declared a party line, but overly eager National Republicans had forged a mace with which Jackson could bludgeon them, not a sword for their champion. A masterpiece of political propaganda aimed directly at voters, Jackson's veto message denounced the Bank as an unconstitutional excess of national authority, as a monstrous concentration of private power that threatened popular liberty, and as an engine of aristocratic privilege that favored the rich at the expense of the poor. The message tremendously enhanced Jackson's credentials as a champion of republicanism and strict construction and as a foe of the corrupt and entrenched political establishment in Congress. Democratic newspapers and resolutions around the country praised Jackson for saving "the people from becoming enslaved by the corruptions of a moneyed aristocracy and desperate politicians." The veto marked "the final decision of the President between the Aristocracy and the People—he stands by the People." "The Jackson cause," one paper summarized, "is the cause of democracy and the people, against a corrupt and abandoned aristocracy."43

Democratic rhetoric proved potent. Americans continued to view powerful, privileged aristocracy and corruption as the natural enemies of the liberty, equality, and virtue necessary for republics to survive. The similarity of the Democrats' appeal to the Antimasonic message allowed them in states like New York and Pennsylvania, where they were on the defensive for supporting state monopolies denounced by the Antimasons, to strike back. As shrewd Antimasonic leaders like Weed instantly recognized in horror, Democrats could now divert attention to the national level and argue that their party opposed the most monstrous threat to republican liberty and equality of all.⁴⁴

All in all, the renewed popularity Jackson and his party won by the crusade against the Monster Bank nullified any advantage Clay may have received from negative reaction to the veto. Having allowed Antimasons to preempt the assault on privilege at the state level, National Republicans could only pose as champions of republicanism by attacking executive tyranny. "THE KING UPON THE THRONE: The People in the Dust!!!" one newspaper thundered. Jackson "has set at utter defiance the will of the people as strongly expressed by their Senators and Representatives . . . he has . . . proved himself to be the most absolute despot now at the head of any representative government on earth." Finally adopting the Antimasonic tactic of calling on the people directly to save republicanism by voting, another National Republican sheet proclaimed, "One more opportunity— perhaps the last—is yet afforded us, of strangling the monster of despotism before it shall have attained its full growth, and checking the full tide of corruption before it shall have become too strong to be resisted."

What marked the shift in National Republican tactics even more than their antityrannical rhetoric was their brilliant use of political cartooning to mock Jackson. The most famous and effective of these caricatures was called "King Andrew the First," which portrayed the aged Jackson wearing a crown and regal robes trimmed in ermine, with a scepter in one hand and the veto message in the other, and a copy of the Constitution torn to shreds at his feet. No piece of propaganda summarized so forcefully the National Republicans' conception of how the presidency had been perverted by Jackson, and none symbolized so well their belated turn to the public.

Thus, at the end of 1832, the National Republicans developed the credo upon which the Whig party would be founded and which would remain its central principle. In that year, however, such efforts proved too little and too late. The National Republican organization remained embryonic and truncated compared to the Jackson machine. The party failed even to run electoral tickets in Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi. Elsewhere Jackson's skill in establishing himself as a paladin of popular liberty and equality blunted the initial attempts to portray him as the subverter rather than the savior of republicanism. Above all, the onus of the Bank of the United States smothered the National Republicans' lastminute attempt to change their own image from a party of the wise and talented to a party of the people. By making Jackson's veto and the Bank central issues in the summer of 1832, the National Republicans had only engaged in self-annihilation.

Jackson registered another smashing triumph in November, and Henry Clay suffered a second humiliating defeat. Although the popular vote was slightly larger than in 1828, Jackson still won 55 percent of it, and he swamped Clay in the electoral college, 219 to 49. Antimasons who refused to back Clay won Vermont and almost a tenth of the popular vote. Clay carried only Kentucky, Delaware, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, and a few congressional districts in Maryland and only about 37 percent of the voters. Clay performed especially dismally in slave states south of Maryland and Kentucky. There, Jackson rolled up an astounding 88 percent of the popular vote.⁴⁶

The election of 1832 clearly stamped the National Republican party as a loser and as the tool of the northeastern elite whom neither Antimasons nor Southerners could support. That stigma was, in the words of Alexander Everett, palpably "not fitted to make converts." Mounting a successful challenge to the dominant Jacksonians required changing that image and developing new strategies, new organizations, and new issues credibly based on republican values. Given the rout of Clay, it also demanded fresh faces to lead the opposition. In sum, competing on even terms with the Jacksonians meant abandoning the National Republican party for a more enticing political vehicle.

Chapter 2

"To Rescue the Government and Public Liberty"

"As to politics we have no past, no future," moaned Henry Clay two months after Old Hickory had crushed him. "The will of Andrew Jackson is to govern; and that will fluctuates with the change of every pen which gives expression to it." Although Clay referred to Congress' failure to enact his American System, his words reflected as well National Republicans' gloom. As a tiny minority, they would resist but they could not stop Jackson. The last Congress had frustrated their program, and the next Congress would apparently be even more heavily Jacksonian.

To improve their position, National Republicans had to win over alienated Jacksonians and mobilize new voters. But first, as Clay's lament indicates, Jackson had to do the alienating. Jackson, in short, would largely determine the fate of the anti-Jackson party. The opposition party was locked into a symbiotic relationship with its rival, and he had the initiative.

The recent past had persuaded National Republican leaders that criticism of the Democratic majority alone would not create an effective opposition. They also had to unite those who disliked Democrats. Their failure in 1832 to rally southern dissidents and northern Antimasons demonstrated that unification required compromise. Unless all anti-Jackson men sacrificed some principle, Clay declared, "there can be no union or harmony."

At the same time, National Republican leaders could not conciliate former Democrats at the expense of offending their original supporters. Thus in 1835, when Ohio's Whigs nominated Supreme Court Justice John McLean, a former member of Jackson's cabinet, for president, Clay warned that they "looked too much to support... from the Jackson ranks, without sufficiently estimating the amount that might be lost in our own."

Because National Republicans disagreed with each other, and with other anti-Jackson men, over which principles should be abandoned, a more effective opposition party proved dauntingly difficult to construct. Over the next eight years, as Jackson's opponents struggled to coalesce and expand the anti-Democratic coalition, the name of the National Republicans, to say nothing of their issues and their nationally oriented strategy, would be jettisoned. Prominent party builders like Clay and Daniel Webster would also learn, to their dismay, that they must temporarily sacrifice their presidential ambitions as well as their principles. Out of this prolonged effort between 1833 and 1840, the Whig party would emerge, larger in numbers, more heterogeneous in composition, and more successful in competing for office than National Republicans had ever been.

Ι

The national issue that commanded attention after the presidential election of 1832 both divided Jackson's foes and enlarged their ranks. It seemed to point to a complete reshuffling of leadership and voter alignments, not to a more effective anti-Iackson party. In November 1832, immediately after the election, South Carolina nullified the tariffs of 1828 and 1832 and defied the federal government to collect duties after February 1, 1833. Jackson responded with a proclamation on December 10, denouncing nullification as treasonous and warning that he would uphold national laws over spurious pretensions to state sovereignty. In January 1833, he called on Congress to increase his enforcement powers, but to work as well for a lower tariff to defuse the crisis. Congress, in response, passed both the so-called Force Bill, giving Jackson additional powers to collect revenues in South Carolina, and the so-called Compromise Tariff, gradually lowering rates over a ten-year period. After Jackson signed both bills into law, South Carolina nullified the Force Bill but accepted the Compromise Tariff. These actions ended the confrontation, for Jackson now had no need to use the supposedly nullified Force Act.4

Yet the Nullification crisis's ramifications extended well beyond its brief duration, especially by increasing southern opposition to Jackson. State righters outside of Calhoun's personal clique detested nullification. But they considered Jackson's willingness to coerce a state and his affirmation of the supremacy of the national government "violent & danger[ou]s in its principles." To them, Jackson's belligerence gave a different meaning to the cry of executive tyranny that National Republicans had raised at the end of the 1832 campaign. Now Jackson was not simply vetoing the people's representatives in Congress; he was threatening to use military power against constituents in the South. Hence, a Georgia newspaper denounced him as "the meanest and most palpable of hypocrites—the most daring, reckless and dangerous of usurpers—and the most self-willed, heartless and bloody of tyrants." Portentously, meetings in South Carolina and a few other states adopted the name Whig in 1833 to signify their resistance to such monarchical despotism. In states such as Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi, moreover, state rights zealots broke with Jackson and often formed independent State Rights factions.⁵

Those defecting politicians constituted only a small minority of southern Jacksonians. The majority of Democratic leaders in Dixie, while dismayed by Jackson's actions, stood by their president. Meanwhile, the vast majority of the Democratic rank and file applauded Jackson's bold Unionism. So great was the continued support for Jackson in the South, indeed, that Senator Willie P. Mangum, who would break with Jackson in 1834 over a different issue, complained at the end of 1833 that Jacksonians slanderously portrayed any Southerner who disagreed with them as a nullifier. "The popularity of Jackson on the one hand and the unpopularity of nullification on the other, give the party in power great advantages in the South."

State rights extremists who bolted in 1833 provided an alternative leadership cadre for any future southern anti-Jackson party. These dissidents differed profoundly from the nationalistic National Republicans who had supported Clay in 1832 and who generally applauded Jackson's stand on nullification. But state rights men such as Senator John Tyler, Benjamin Watkins Leigh, and Littleton W. Tazewell of Virginia; John Branch of North Carolina; John Berrien of Georgia; Senator George Poindexter of Mississippi; and the mammoth 350-pound Dixon H. Lewis of Alabama would play central roles in founding the Whig party in their respective states. When the new Congress would assemble in December 1833, six senators would identify themselves as anti-Jackson State Righters in addition to the two Nullifiers from South Carolina. These eight independent slave state senators would hold the balance of power between the twenty National Republicans and the twenty Jacksonians in that body. As such, their position would have to be considered by any National Republicans who hoped to extend the anti-Jackson party to the South.

In Washington at the start of 1833, however, policy makers only knew that South Carolina had created a crisis, that Jackson had met it, and that some important southern Jacksonians loathed Jackson's stand. National Republican leaders divided sharply over how to respond. Clay, having fared miserably in the South in 1832, privately criticized Jackson's Nullification Proclamation for going too far toward consolidation. Publicly, he ducked the Senate vote on the Force Bill so as not to antagonize southern state righters' sensibilities. Most important, he cooperated with Calhoun, who had resigned the vice presidency and returned to the Senate as a member from South Carolina, to arrange the Compromise Tariff of 1833.

Webster and a number of other northern National Republicans, in contrast, regarded Clay's Compromise Tariff as a surrender of protectionist principles and a sellout of northern interests. Hence, they doggedly opposed it. Moreover, they admired Jackson's strong nationalistic position; many remarked that it echoed Webster's arguments in his debate with Hayne three years earlier. In their eyes, Jackson had erased any reason to fear executive usurpation just at the time southern fears escalated. Now they praised Jackson as the savior of the Union instead of pillorying him as a tyrant. Webster himself lauded Jackson's proclamation in a speech at Boston's Faneuil Hall before resuming his seat in the Senate in December, and once there he managed the passage of the Force Bill, which Southerners considered so offensive. The split between Webster and Clay and the surprising cooperation of the former with Jackson fed speculation that old parties were dead and that a new alignment was forming—nationalists versus state righters, Jackson and Webster versus Clay and Calhoun.8

Webster himself fervently prayed for such an alliance. Easily the most imposing figure in American political life, the senator from Massachusetts had celebrated his fifty-first birthday in January during the midst of the crisis. Born in New Hampshire and educated at Dartmouth College, he had moved to Boston in 1816, and for the next thirty-five years he served as attorney and political spokesman for its leading bankers, merchants, and manufacturers. A constitutional lawyer of formidable intelligence, learning, and prestige, he had argued many landmark cases before the Supreme Court. For all of his intellectual power, however, Webster's fame and professional success rested on his awesome abilities as an orator and his commanding physical presence. Five feet ten inches tall, with broad shoulders and a deep chest, he usually dressed in white trousers, a buff waistcoat, and a blue coat with brass buttons. But it was his uncommonly large head with its jet black hair, massive forehead, swarthy complexion, shaggy black brows, and glowing black eyes that transfixed audiences and caused his admirers to call him "Godlike Daniel." When he addressed a court, Congress, or a public assemblage, Webster transported men with the artistically crafted structure, the carefully modulated tones, the compelling marshaling of facts, and the logical clarity of his rhetoric. Almost from the day he closed his reply to Robert Hayne in 1830, schoolboys began to memorize it, and they would continue to do so for much of the century. Exceptionally few politicians have been so mesmerizing as he.

Despite the fame Webster had earned from his nationalistic oratory and from his Supreme Court practice, he was not content. His appetites were as large as his talents. His taste for fine wines, good food, and expensive furnishings caused him to live beyond the ample income he earned as a lawyer and to borrow heavily from the Bank of the United States and from wealthy Boston constituents. Similarly, his political ambition caused him to covet the presidency. While he had let Clay carry the National Republican banner in 1832, he now saw in the Nullification crisis his chance to grasp the only prize he considered worthy of his greatness.⁹

After Congress adjourned in March 1833 with the crisis apparently resolved, Webster sought an alliance with Jackson. He realized that his own and his constituents' advocacy of a high tariff virtually wiped out any hope of southern support. Appalled at what he regarded as Clay's apostasy on the tariff, moreover, he no longer trusted an alliance with Southerners to secure that vital measure. Instead, he sought to position himself as the preeminent candidate of the North, and what better way to rally the North, he thought, than to champion the Union against its southern subverters? Such a stance, he realized, might erase the stigma he had incurred as a defender of the unpopular Bank of the United States in 1832 and attract previously suspicious Antimasons. The Union issue would allow him to exploit his reputation as a nationalist while ignoring the nationalistic economic programs the public regarded as elitist and inequitable. The new tack also accorded perfectly with his antipathy toward organized parties and his sense that politics should be conducted instead by high-minded statesmen who were valued for their dedication to the welfare of the nation, not for their partisan identity. To carry out this scheme, Webster had to align himself publicly with Jackson, but this necessity did not deter him. The aged and sickly Jackson seemed unlikely to run for a third term, and crusading for the Union promised to give Webster an edge in the North over the general's apparent choice as a successor, Martin Van Buren.

Throughout the spring, summer, and fall of 1833 Webster labored to forge the new coalition. He arranged for his Massachusetts friends to give a warm reception to Jackson when the president visited Boston that summer. Newspapers friendly to him announced that a new era of good feelings existed, in which the old "party spirit is at rest." Instead, a "new organization" should be founded on "the principles of the President's Proclamation." Let us have "no Jacksonians nor National Republicans, as party men—let us have no Free-masons nor anti-masons, no Southrons or Northmen—but let all be for the principles of the Proclamation." While his Massachusetts supporters launched the new party movement, Webster pushed the scheme during a speaking tour of New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. Everywhere he warned of "a deep determination among the politicians of the South to produce a separation" and predicted that the "great approaching political division of the whole country is to be between Unionists and anti-Unionists." Everywhere he urged newspapers to stress Unionism. 10

Had Webster succeeded in 1833, the American Whig party would probably never have been created, certainly not the Whig party that historically existed. But Webster failed. Instead, all he did was to muddle the political situation still further and increase the difficulty of joining the northern and southern opponents of Jackson in a single party. Webster failed because, as Clay had perceived in January, the will of Andrew Jackson and his advisors—and nothing that the opposition itself did—would determine the political future.

II

Webster's attempted rapprochement with Jackson in a new party depended upon a prolongation of the disunionist crisis beyond the winter of 1832–33 and on a lull in Jackson's war against the Bank of the United States. On the banking issue, Jackson and his Democratic supporters stood fundamentally divided from Webster and most northern National Republicans. After his veto of the new charter in Iuly 1832 and his vindication in the November election, Jackson had seemed willing to drop the Bank issue in order to smash the Nullifiers. In the spring of 1833, however, Jackson prepared to take further steps against the Bank. Webster frantically negotiated with the administration to head off any such action. In the spring, Jackson was content to bide his time, humor Webster, and benefit from the famous orator's powerful voice in behalf of his policies. But he was hardly ready to arrange peace terms with Nicholas Biddle's institution. Even as he was being feted by Webster's Boston cronies in June 1833, indeed, Jackson was writing his lieutenants in Washington to make the necessary arrangements to deposit government money in selected state banks rather than in the Bank of the United States.11

Jackson's closest advisors, the Kentuckians Amos Kendall and Francis P. Blair, who edited the Washington Globe, shared Jackson's hate for the Bank. Like Jackson, moreover, they worried that the disruption of party lines provoked by the Nullification crisis endangered the party's ability to carry out their goals. In March 1833, Kendall advised Jackson that the Democrats required "some decisive act to reunite and inspirit" them. Reopening the war on the Bank by removing the deposits, he counseled, would redivide Democrats from National Republicans. Democrats such as Vice President Van Buren, who questioned the wisdom of removal, also vigorously opposed any alliance with Webster. Van Buren especially had a personal stake in preserving the links with Democratic state righters in the South, a link that could be snapped by coalescing with Webster and other nationalistic National Republicans in the North. Moved by these considerations and even more fundamentally by Jackson's personal hostility to the Bank, his administration announced on September 25, 1833, that beginning October 1, the government would no longer deposit its revenues in Biddle's bank but would instead place them in selected state banks around the country that the opposition soon labeled as "pets."

With this stroke, Jackson reemphasized his command of the political universe and his ability to make parties revolve around his actions, not around the wishes of mere satellites like Webster. As the epicenter of the majority party, he determined what shape the minority party would take. Although it took several months for Webster to admit it, no realignment on the Union issue would occur. Instead, the removal of the deposits inspired the creation of a new anti-Jackson party. With a few exceptions like Webster, National Republicans instantly reopened fire on Jackson as a high-handed tyrant. A writer in the Newark, New Jersey, Sentinel epitomized the National Republican reaction. "As Louis of France said, in the plenitude of his despotic glory, 'I am the state,' our Executive Officer openly proclaims, I am the Government."

By reinvigorating the issue of executive tyranny, removal of government deposits from the Bank made it more compelling to state rights Southerners who had previously remained loyal to the president. According to the Bank's charter, the deposits could be removed only after congressional committees demonstrated that they were unsafe. Yet recent committee reports had found no evidence that would warrant removal. At the close of the previous Congress in March 1833. indeed, the House had voted by over a two-to-one margin to accept the majority report of its Ways and Means Committee that the deposits were perfectly secure. 14 By executive fiat Jackson had thus ignored Congress' will, removed government funds from an institution where congressional law mandated they be placed, and in the process apparently violated as well the constitutional clause guaranteeing the obligation of contracts. As Senator Mangum of North Carolina put it in a major speech breaking with Jackson the following February, the question was no longer Bank or no Bank, but "law or no law, constitution or no constitution." As Mangum and other Southerners saw it, by placing deposits in state banks chosen for their loyalty to the administration, Jackson had increased his patronage, his power to corrupt politics, and his capacity to voke politicians to his will. He had wielded the government's sword through the Force Act; now he seized its purse. Finally, Jackson sacked two secretaries of the treasury, who defied his order to remove the deposits, before naming one who would do his bidding. Such behavior menaced the independence of statesmen, as well as the control the Senate supposedly exercised over the cabinet through its power of confirmation, and some senators considered the very dismissal of a cabinet member without Senate permission unconstitutional.15

Senate voting patterns show that Southerners considered the removal question one of executive usurpation rather than one involving the economic merits of the Bank. Outside of the border states, only three of sixteen southern senators voted for recharter of the Bank in 1832 and only two supported the resolution to override the veto. But in the spring of 1834, nine Southerners voted for, while seven opposed, Henry Clay's resolution to censure Jackson for removal.¹⁶

Jackson's foes also charged that the alleged tyrant had caused the severe recession that gripped the nation by the time Congress met in December 1833. In actuality Biddle was the culprit. Even before September, Biddle had responded to the threatened removal of government deposits by curtailing discounts of commercial paper and calling in loans. To create economic discontent that could be mobilized against Jackson, Biddle continued the policy of contraction far longer than economic prudence required. State banks, in response, also retrenched. The resulting sharp reduction in credit and circulating currency forced prices down.

The squeeze was not confined to northern commercial and manufacturing areas. Western farmers, who had borrowed money to buy land, as well as southern bankers, merchants, cotton factors, lawyers, and planters who relied on credit to move their crops, also experienced economic hardship. Many sufferers blamed Jackson for precipitating the crunch. One North Carolinian, for example, told Mangum about a substantial swing of opinion against Jackson in his state: "I admit with you that the question is 'law or no law, constitution.' But it is the pecuniary embarrassment, the great and overwhelming distress consequent upon the removal of the deposites [sic], which comes home to the people."

By removing the deposits, Jackson thus greatly expanded the number of his opponents. When Congress assembled in December 1833, however, his foes remained divided. They included nationalistic National Republicans who had previously supported the Bank, Calhoun's Nullifiers who had only recently been sharply at odds with Webster and other Northerners over the tariff, and other state rights men from the South who were alienated from Jackson but despised National Republicans' economic programs. Indeed, most of these men regarded the very name "National Republican" as an insult hurled at them by Jacksonians to cripple their political fortunes in the South. They clung tenaciously to the label "State Rights men" to distinguish themselves from both National Republicans and Nullifiers. Although Webster had not yet given up on an alliance with Jackson, most of the other leaders wanted to unite against Jackson and to prevent the election of Van Buren as his successor in 1836. The problem was how to do it.

Ш

Clay took the lead in attempting to consolidate the polyglot opposition. At the age of fifty-six, Clay was five years the senior of Webster, his great rival in the anti-Jackson camp. Whereas the granite-like Webster evoked awe and admiration, the irresistibly appealing Kentuckian inspired love, affection, and often rapturous adoration from virtually everyone he met. Where Webster tended to be aloof, somber, and taciturn at private gatherings, Clay was a brilliant conversationalist, sparkling, witty, playful. Tall and thin, with a sandy complexion, a shock of brunette hair that had turned white with age, gray, laughing eyes, and a straight, thin-lipped mouth that broke readily into a smile, the gracious, fun-loving Clay charmed both men and women wherever he went. Neither as profound nor as learned as Webster, he exuded emotion and charisma when he addressed public audiences. The inspirational visions and the warmth of feeling that punctuated his speeches made them almost as effective, at least when heard, as the weighty learning and cold, penetrating reason that made Webster's oratory so compelling.

Both men loved the Union dearly, both could appeal to patriotic sentiment to uphold it, and both longed for the presidency. Although Clay had written a friend in the summer of 1833 that he intended to suspend his quest for that office, he had not relaxed at all his fear and resentment of Jackson. Often imperious and overweening, moreover, he loved to dominate any arena he was in, be it the Senate or simply a dinner party. As Congress convened in December 1833, therefore, he found a situation ready made for his particular talents and personal magnetism, and his natural inclinations moved him to take command of the anti-Jackson forces.¹⁹

Toward that end, Clay met during the winter of 1833–34 at private dinners with other anti-Jackson leaders to coordinate strategy and to find some common candidate to run against Van Buren. Representing the divergent regional and ideological strains among the anti-Jackson men, the dining partners included the Nullifier Calhoun from South Carolina; the State Rights senator from North Carolina, Mangum, who constantly rejected the notion that he was either a Nullifier or a National Republican; the stalwartly orthodox National Republican from New Jersey, Senator Samuel L. Southard, who had served with Clay in John Quincy Adams' cabinet; and the former president himself, who had returned to Washington as a congressman from Massachusetts. The Antimasonic candidate for governor, Adams might be particularly useful as a bridge to that organization.

Notably absent from these planning sessions was Daniel Webster. Webster continued to hope for a compromise with Jackson, remained independent of the Clay-Calhoun coterie, and even obstructed Clay's initial tactical moves to organize the opposition to Jackson. Only at the end of January 1834, after Jackson had spurned his overtures for some compromise on the Bank with unmistakable finality, and when he was pressed by Biddle, to whom he was financially obligated for loans and a retainer, did Webster openly attack Jackson and thus move reluctantly back into the anti-Jackson camp.²⁰

The coadjutors quickly discovered that they could not agree on a common presidential candidate. But they enjoyed more success in deciding upon the forum in which, and the issue with which, they would battle the president. Because Jackson's supporters controlled the House, his foes agreed to concentrate on the Senate, where the combination of State Rights men, South Carolina Nullifiers, and National Republicans outnumbered the Jacksonians 28 to 20. In mid-December, the anti-Jacksonians seized control of the major Senate committees, and the birth of the Whig party can be dated from this parliamentary coup. Neither Clay nor Calhoun took a chairmanship, but Webster, who was still keeping his distance from them, exacted as the price of his future cooperation the chairmanship of the Finance Committee, which would direct the Senate's response to the removal of the deposits. From this power base incipient Whigs launched an all-out war against the administration by refusing to confirm Jackson's appointments of new government directors for the Bank and, in June 1834, of Roger B. Taney, the man Jackson had named secretary of the Treasury the previous September to remove the deposits.²¹

The anti-Jacksonians emphasized removal of the deposits and executive usurpation, rather than a renewed defense of the Bank itself, to galvanize the new coalition and rally popular support. At the end of December, Clay defined the opposition's platform in a ringing three-day speech. "We are in the midst of a revolution, hitherto bloodless, but rapidly tending towards a total change of the pure republican character of the Government, and to the concentration of power in the hands of one man," he warned the Senate. He demanded passage of two resolutions. One rejected Secretary Taney's report to the Senate justifying removal. The other denounced Jackson for trampling on the laws and the Constitution. With these resolutions, the Whig party at its birth focused on its everlasting basic principle: opposition to executive usurpation in general and to Andrew Jackson in particular.²²

To highlight the removal issue and demonstrate the legitimacy of resistance to Jackson's course, Clay and other Whig leaders encouraged supporters to send petitions to Congress blaming Jackson's high-handed action for causing economic distress and demanding that he restore the deposits. Petitions for relief inundated Congress in February and March. This outpouring, Clay hoped, might turn the House against Jackson, forcing the president to admit his error and restore the deposits. The Bank arranged some of these petitions, seeking to show its indispensability. Anti-Jackson politicians circulated others to manufacture opinion against the president. Most, however, reflected genuine economic suffering.

That suffering, however, also produced disagreement about Whig strategy. Some House and Senate Whigs, hoping to exploit the economic crisis, sought recharter of the Bank rather than redeposit of the federal funds. Webster, ambitious for both objectives, introduced a bill calling for restoration of the deposits and an extension of the Bank's charter beyond March 4, 1837.

Those like Webster who wanted recharter, however, formed a minority of the embryonic Whig coalition. The dominant wing, led by Clay, Calhoun, Mangum, and their inner circle, sought only to restore the deposits. They recognized that a defense of the Bank, rather than an assault on Jackson's allegedly despotic action, would revive the elitist image that had wrecked the National Republican party in 1832. Any hint that Whiggery was the discredited National Republican party reborn would especially repel potential southern recruits, who viewed the very name "National Republican" as a political death warrant. Clay warned Biddle in early February against any attempt at recharter. Only executive "usurpation," he maintained, "has convulsed the country. If we put it by and take up the Bank, we may and probably would divide about the terms of the charter, and finally do nothing." Accordingly, Clay forced Webster to table his own bill within a week of offering it, thereby confirming the Kentuckian's leadership. Three days later the chastened Webster helped pass Clay's censure resolutions and echoed Mangum by declaring that the central issue was the "SUPREMACY OF THE LAWS."23

In short, the necessity of expanding the National Republican base by incorporating other foes of Jackson dictated Clay's strategy. "I want aid—all the aid that can be given," he pleaded in December. In the winter of 1833–34, Clay sought that aid primarily from the South, where he had run so dismally a year earlier. Rescuing "the Government and public liberty from the impending dangers, which Jacksonism has created," he wrote his Virginia friend Francis Brooke in December, "depends, in my opinion, mainly upon the South." By focusing on executive tyranny rather than on the impending death of the Bank, he told Brooke, he would resume "the campaign of 1777."

By alluding to the Revolutionary struggle for independence against a tyrannical English monarch, Clay encapsulated the main reason the opposition coalition used the name "Whig." That magic label, reverberating with memories of the revered Founding Fathers who had used it during the Revolution, signified that the party's main purpose, at least originally, was resistance to King Andrew Jackson. The name provided an umbrella under which all who opposed Jackson could gather.²⁵ More important, it struck an ideological chord. By resonating with republican values Americans had cherished since the eighteenth century, it fused National Republicans, Antimasons, and state rights Southerners. Constructing a new party required more than arranging organizational alliances in Washington and the various states. The new party also needed ideological glue, some principle for which it stood.

IV

This last point merits amplification, for the impulse behind the formation of the Whig party has often been misrepresented. Historians have normally portrayed the name "Whig" as a sheer expedient, designed to assemble the widest possible assortment of men who had nothing in common save hatred, fear, resentment, or jealousy of Jackson and his allies. They usually stress the negativism of the Whig party, sneer at its dearth of ideas and ideals, and point to the diversity of its constituent elements as proof of its instability and opportunism. One early student of its formation wrote that "Principles had little part in the origins of the Whig party." Twenty years later, Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., called the cry of executive tyranny a façade behind which disgruntled conservatives could hide their greed. "The Whigs," wrote Schlesinger, "in scuttling Federalism, replaced it by a social philosophy founded, not on ideas, but on subterfuges and sentimentalities. As Henry Adams observed, 'Of all the parties that have existed in the United States, the famous Whig party was the most feeble in ideas.' "26"

As already noted, the men who formed the Whig party in the winter of 1833–34 had often opposed each other over national and state issues during Jackson's first term. Although congressional Whigs in 1834 showed surprising unity in supporting Clay's proposal to distribute federal land revenues to the states and several other measures, original National Republicans and southern state rights men like Mangum remained profoundly at odds over national promotion of economic development.²⁷ "The principles that you and I hold to be the only conservative principles of our Federative system," Mangum lamented to a North Carolina friend in October 1834, "are scarcely comprehended by the most intelligent of the National Republicans" in "the North & East." Common opposition to Jackson therefore was, at least initially, the strongest bond uniting incipient Whigs. Opposition to, and perceived difference from, the Democratic party would, indeed, remain essential to the vitality of the Whig party throughout its lifetime. It was intimately bound to, and decisively shaped by its relationship with, the Democratic majority.²⁹

Nonetheless, strictures about the ideological bankruptcy of the early Whig party are wrong-headed. Opposition to executive tyranny was based on principle, a principle with profoundly powerful ideological ramifications. Only a passionate devotion to the Revolutionary experiment in republican government and a common conviction that Jackson threatened it explain how men with such diverse views on other matters formed a united front against him.

From the Whigs' perspective, everything that Jackson had done demonstrated his intention to amass power in his own hands; to upset the constitutionally mandated balance among the branches of the federal government; to subvert or destroy the independence of other political leaders and voters through patronage, the influence of his pet banks, or intimidation; and thereby to crush popular liberty. Convinced that Jackson was following the same classic scenario as King George III in orchestrating a conspiracy against popular liberty, his opponents adopted the name "Whig" to signal their commitment to the independence of the other branches of government and of the people. As Mangum saw it, he and other Whigs were "The Independents," whereas Jacksonians were "the absolute submissionists, (I mean submission to the bad influences here in Washington.)" Or, as the Raleigh, North Carolina, Register rejoiced in June 1834, "The happy cognomen of Whigs, which all parties opposed to Executive usurpation had adopted," provided "a standard under which . . . men of all parties, could rally in defense of LIBERTY against POWER."

To defend liberty was to give the Whig party at birth a greater ideological legitimacy with the American voting public than the National Republicans had ever enjoyed. By itself the name helped to erase the stigma of antirepublican elitism that had stunted the growth of its predecessor and to supply the credible appeal to republican values necessary for any party that hoped to compete successfully with the Jacksonian Democrats. Through this party, it promised voters, you can perform your duty to preserve the fruits of the Revolution.

Hence the assertion that the adoption of the name "Whig" "fixed attention upon opposition to Jackson rather than upon principles as the reasons for the party's existence" utterly misses the central ideological foundation of the party. Opposition to Jackson was based on principle. Whigs saw themselves acting from the necessity, as Clay had put it, "to rescue the Government and public liberty, from the impending dangers, which Jacksonism has created." "A Whig in its pure signification," pronounced Richmond, Virginia's, Whig in April 1834, "means one who prefers liberty to tyranny—who supports privilege against prerogative—the rights and immunities of the people, as ascertained by the equity of nature, the Constitution and the laws of the country, against the predominance of the Crown, or Executive power." "

Rank-and-file Whigs repeatedly echoed their leaders' fears about the threat that executive tyranny posed to republican self-government. In 1834, for example, a New Yorker wrote to Clay of his "trembling sense of alarm" about "the measures of the present Executive." Jackson displayed "an unbridled lust of power, that attacked the very foundation of our free institutions." A North Carolinian added that "we are at present under a practical despotism & unless the ballot boxes shall vindicate a violated Constitution, it is fearful to think of our Country's doom."

Previously, northern Antimasons had condemned the power and privilege of the Masonic order and of entrenched officeholders as a threat to republican liberty. By adopting a name and rhetoric signifying opposition to the tyranny of King Andrew, Whigs therefore facilitated the merger between Antimasons in the North and State Rights men in the South. This reaching out to the Antimasons and adoption of the aggressive populistic style that had distinguished them so sharply from the patrician National Republicans was especially apparent in New York rhetoric. Salvation from Jackson's "unlawful" actions rested "IN THE HANDS OF THE PEOPLE," Whig papers proclaimed. The tyrant must be resisted "THROUGH THE MEDIUM OF ELECTIONS." "The time has come," intoned an address of Whig state legislators, "when it must be decided for ourselves and for posterity, whether this government shall be a republic in fact as well as in name, or whether it shall be converted into a monarchy, with the form only of popular power." ³³

Whig denunciations of executive tyranny helped attract Antimasons for another crucial reason. The Antimasonic movement originated in resentment that Masons had literally tried to get away with murder by subverting the legal system. In a fundamental sense, that is, Antimasonry was founded on the proposition that America must have a government of laws and not of men, that no man or group of men, however powerful, was above the law. Thus the Whigs' insistence that their true issue with Jackson was not the Bank, but "law or no law, constitution or no constitution," resonated with Antimasons' deepest values. Antimasons rallied enthusiastically to the new party, one told Seward, because the "common object" of Antimasons and Whigs was "to redeem the Constitution and restore the supremacy of the laws."

By absorbing the great majority of former Antimasons, Whigs accomplished, in ideological terms, a feat of no mean proportion. Perhaps more than any single group in the United States, Antimasons reflected a purist strain of classical eighteenth-century republican ideology that condemned modernization itself industrialization, commercialization, economic growth and the materialistic values it spawned—as the greatest threat to republican virtue and independence. In contrast, the National Republicans and entrepreneurial Jacksonians who joined them in the Whig party in the North represented par excellence the modernizers in American society, men who lauded economic growth and development, who appealed to materialistic self-interest and considered it desirable, who valued luxury as an incentive to economic effort, not an acid that dissolved pristine virtue. As the historian Daniel W. Howe has argued, when Whigs channeled the republican fears of Antimasons against political degeneration rather than economic change, they "performed the remarkable feat of synthesizing 'virtue' and 'commerce' as political appeals."35 By merging with populistic Antimasons, in turn, Whigs went even further to shed the elitist image that had wrecked the National Republicans.

Other strains of thought besides a common commitment to republicanism facilitated this ideological synthesis. Scottish Common Sense moral philosophy and evangelical Protestantism also contributed to a unique Whig "political culture." All three strains of thought helped produce a critical feature of Whiggery in its formative years. Antipartyism, an aversion to party organization itself, motivated many early Whigs.

Evangelical Protestants insisted on freedom of conscience for an individual. Nothing should interfere with allegiance to Christ; a Christian conscience alone should determine human behavior. Evangelicals had condemned Freemasonry as "an infidel society at war with true Christianity" because it interposed oaths and pagan rituals between a man and his conscience, because its "ceremonies and appendages" struck "at the basis of all morality and religion." This same impulse fueled evangelicals' moral antipathy toward the Roman Catholic church, which, they thought, controlled laymen through the dictates of priests; toward drunkenness and alcoholic consumption, which made men dependent and subverted self-control; and toward Negro slavery, which viciously eradicated all human potential. Such beliefs caused evangelicals to translate their fears of Masonry and the Catholic church into hatred of political parties, especially the Democratic party, which they often associated with both Masonry and Catholics. Because party discipline required men to sacrifice their own views for the good of the organization, because it encouraged blind obedience rather than independent action, party organization crushed freedom of conscience and made men moral slaves. In a significant sense the Antimasons had been an antiparty party, and they, as well as many state rights southern men, brought those views with them to the new Whig coalition.³⁷

Secular republican ideology reinforced the animus of evangelical religion. Until the 1820s, American political philosophers had damned organized parties, and especially systemic interparty conflict, as destructive of a government devoted to the public interest. This traditional fear of parties, along with a fear that parties inflamed passion at the expense of reason and thereby violated the canons of Common Sense moral philosophy, motivated a number of National Republican patricians. Men like John Quincy Adams and Daniel Webster never fully accepted subordination to the new Whig party. Contemptuous of Democrats' party discipline, Whigs prided themselves on being independents rather than submissionists, on thinking for themselves rather than sheepishly obeying instructions. Whigs, they boasted, "are too independent to wear the collar of party discipline"; they represented the "liberty of Freemen" in contrast to the Democrats' "slavery of party." Savery of party."

By the 1840s Whigs' antiparty sentiment would wane perceptibly, but in the 1830s it strongly fueled their animosity against Democrats in general and Martin Van Buren in particular. To patriarchal Whigs, Van Buren, the architect of the highly centralized Albany Regency machine in New York, which first articulated both the necessity of sacrificing an individual's will to party discipline and the virtue of interparty conflict, epitomized almost everything that was dangerous about the Democratic party. If Van Buren won in 1836, Whigs direly predicted, "the necks of the American people are forever subjected to the yoke of a system of party discipline subversive of personal independence, destructive to freedom of opinion, and fatal to our free institutions."

Jackson, by successfully demanding that the national Democratic convention in May 1835 obediently rubber-stamp Van Buren and Richard M. Johnson of Kentucky as presidential and vice presidential candidates, only increased Whigs' conviction that party dictation meant slavery. An address of Illinois Whigs called "the convention system attempted to be forced upon the American people by the Van Buren party . . . destructive of the freedom of the elective franchise, opposed to republican institutions, and dangerous to the liberties of the people." Anti-Van Buren newspapers in Alabama added "that this odious convention system should be spurned from the embrace of freemen." If conventions continued to usurp the choice of rulers from the people, "we may linger out a degrading political existence under a caucus despotism—we may wear for a while longer the forms of freemen; but our spirits will be effectually enslaved."

Antiparty sentiment made Whigs particularly dependent upon issues rather than party loyalty when conducting campaigns. Antiparty sentiment also may explain why turnout rates for Whig voters in off-year elections, when no clear issue seemed to be at stake, were often lower than Democratic turnout rates. Furthermore, antiparty sentiment may help explain why far more Whigs than Democrats turned to nonpartisan or apolitical voluntary associations to achieve certain morally oriented goals: Bible societies, Sunday school unions, temperance associations, and antislavery or abolitionist organizations. In the 1830s, however, antiparty sentiment above all else hampered the organization of the Whig party itself in a number of states like Michigan, Illinois, and Alabama and at the national level. Revulsion at party dictation was a two-edged sword, at once a weapon against the Democrats and a bar to fusion within the opposition.

VI

By the time Congress adjourned on June 30, 1834, Whigs had taken significant steps toward becoming a more competitive anti-Iackson party than the National Republicans had been. In the Senate the incipient Whig coalition had passed resolutions calling for the government revenues to be replaced in the Bank, censuring Jackson, and refusing to record Jackson's protest of that censure in its journal. In the House, however, Democrats had passed resolutions killing recharter, blocking a return of the revenues to the Bank, and endorsing their deposit in state banks. Yet even in the House, Whigs smothered an administration-backed bill for the regulation of the deposits, and in a special election for a new Speaker in early June they had combined with anti-Van Buren Democrats to elect the pro-Bank Democrat John Bell of Tennessee over his Tennessee colleague James K. Polk, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee and the chief spokesman for Jackson's antibanking policies in the House. More important, with their new name and with the issues of removal and executive despotism, the Whigs had discovered a formula with great potential for uniting National Republicans, Antimasons, Nullifiers, and southern State Righters.

As Whig leaders like Mangum and Clay had recognized as early as the winter of 1833–34, however, building a congressional coalition could not create a new party. Whigs now needed to form a more broad-based party in the electorate that could win state and national elections. The new Whig party had a foundation. But could it erect a popular edifice?

Chapter 3

"No Opposition Man Can Be Elected President"

"You will have heard the result of our K[entucky] election," an ebullient Henry Clay gushed to Willie P. Mangum in August 1834. "We could not desire that it should have been better—76 out of the 101 members of the [state] H. of R., Letcher's re-election [to Congress in a special election], and 11 of the 12 [state] Senators to be chosen elected on our side." Meanwhile, "Indiana has done nearly as well, and Illinois and Missouri are not much behind her. Ohio will bring up the rear gloriously in the West." Everywhere the new party seemed to be taking hold. Everywhere the various opponents of the Democrats seemed to be rallying behind the Whig banner. Everywhere the Whigs seemed to be riding a wave of resentment against Jackson's actions that would wash Democrats out of office and eventually cleanse the White House itself of the Jacksonian stain.

But Clay, characteristically, was overly sanguine. Convinced of Andrew Jackson's unpopularity in the spring of 1834 and concerned primarily with resisting the tyranny of the national executive, national Whig leaders hoped to transplant their party to the states in 1834 and 1835 and build momentum for the 1836 presidential election by stressing national issues—presidential despotism and Democratic depression. That emphasis, however, proved to be flawed. Economic conditions improved, and disenchantment with the Democratic president dissipated. As a result, Whigs' electoral fortunes fluctuated. Similarly, they sometimes failed to bring all of Jackson's disparate foes into the Whig camp, and they utterly failed to unite behind a single presidential candidate. Thus they could not compete successfully for the office that, according to their ideological standards, especially menaced republicanism if it remained in Democratic hands.

Far more important, contrary to Whigs' initial assumptions, rallying voters against Jackson proved insufficient to launch successful state organizations. Transplanting a nationally oriented party to the states required more than the nutrient of national issues, especially when those issues began to lose their sustaining power. To sink permanent roots in the states, the Whig party had to address matters of state political concern so that citizens would vote Whig in state as well as presidential elections.

Exclusive reliance upon the issue that allowed the creation of the Whig party, in other words, ultimately stunted its growth and hindered its competitiveness at the vital state level. Whigs might initially convert voters with their attacks on Jackson, but to sustain that allegiance they had to demonstrate the congruence between a Whig ideology based on national issues and state affairs. In this task, they also enjoyed only mixed results. Building a victorious Whig party at the local, state, and national levels proved far more difficult than Henry Clay imagined in the bright summer of 1834.

I

During the spring and early summer of 1834, Whigs dramatically extended their new party beyond Washington. Prospects in all-important New York, the nation's largest state, seemed particularly good. In New York City's municipal election in the spring, Whigs triumphed by running against the Democratic recession, and earlier that year, Antimasonic members of New York's legislature called for the dissolution of the Antimasonic party, thus paving the way for a merger of the state's National Republicans and Antimasons in the new organization.

A Democrat facilitated this anti-Democratic merger by allowing incipient Whigs to take a stand on state banking policy that meshed with their attack on Iackson's deposit removal. To save New York's banks from Nicholas Biddle's contraction in the spring of 1834, Democratic Governor William L. Marcy pushed a bill through the state legislature that provided for a potential state bond issue of $6 million. Accordingly, $2 million would be made available to private individuals in upstate New York, and $4 million would go to New York City's banks to cover their deposits and note issues. Led by Thurlow Weed in the editorial columns of his Albany Evening Journal and by William Henry Seward in the legislature, Whigs condemned Marcy's plan. Marcy, they charged, tried to rescue Jackson from the disastrous removal of deposits at the expense of the state's taxpayers, who would ultimately have to pay for the bonds issued to privileged individuals. Whigs portrayed an enormous slush fund of state monies with which Marcy could corrupt the polity, just as Jackson had done by depositing federal revenues in his pet banks. Marcy's bullying tactics, continued the Whig indictment, resembled Jackson's executive tyranny.

At the end of his biting address of the Whig minority in the legislature to the people, Seward, who was the Whig gubernatorial candidate in 1834, called on voters to repudiate Jackson, Marcy, and the slavish Democratic legislators and congressmen who had done their bidding and to replace them in November with independent men. The Whigs' fall campaign thus focused on executive usurpation and on both national and state banking policy. In New York, the major national Whig themes had been inextricably linked to state politics.²

In some other states, Whigs also organized with relative ease in opposition to Jackson, even without distinctive stands on state policy. Ohio's Antimasons and National Republicans also quickly joined the Whig party's campaign in 1834 against removal and party dictation. In Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, and Louisiana, where the National Republican party had previously taken hold, Whig leaders in Washington could count on the influence of men like Clay, Webster, Southard, and John M. Clayton of Delaware to convert it into the Whig party. In most of those states, former National Republicans contested elections as Whigs in 1834, and an early victory in Louisiana's July gubernatorial contest further fueled Whig hopes of a rising tide against Jackson. In all these states, Whigs could take advantage of preexisting voter cleavages and anti-Jackson organizations to create the new party.³

The new Whig party also quickly penetrated slave states where National Republicans had been feeble and Jackson unbeatable. In early 1834 in Virginia, the South's largest state, nationalists from the West, who had backed Clay in 1832, merged in the legislature with the more numerous state rights zealots from the East to condemn Jackson's deposit removal. The new coalition forced the resignation of the pro-Jackson loyalist William C. Rives from the United States Senate by instructing him to vote for restoration of the deposits and elected prominent state righters Littleton W. Tazewell as governor and Benjamin Watkins Leigh as the new senator. In the Senate, Leigh joined his fellow Virginian John Tyler in the Whig camp. Proclaiming that the issue was "a struggle between liberty and power," rather than between Bank or no Bank, and often adopting the name "Whig," this combination then won a convincing victory in the state legislative elections of May 1834.4

Meanwhile, in North Carolina, Calhounites led by John Branch, state rights followers of the enormously influential Senator Willie P. Mangum, and a tiny group of National Republicans joined to protest Jackson's removal policy and to contest the August legislative elections. By the summer of 1834, they were often using the name "Whig," although the first statewide Whig convention was not held until December 1835. In Georgia, a pro-Jackson Union party and an anti-Jackson State Rights party, led by John M. Berrien, vigorously fought the congressional elections of 1834 and the gubernatorial contest of 1835. The State Rights party denounced Jackson's action toward the Bank as tyrannical and economically pernicious, but its main platform was support of state rights and hostility to both the Force Bill and Jackson's Nullification Proclamation. In Mississippi, a State Rights Association was formed in the spring of 1834 to protest the Force Bill. By December a Whig convention, denouncing the removal of deposits and Jackson's tyranny, arranged a ticket for the gubernatorial and congressional elections the following November that might gain State Rights support and thus fuse the two major anti-Democratic groups in that state. At the end of 1834, only Alabama, Tennessee, and South Carolina, among southern states, had not yet formed a coherent anti-Democratic party that might align with the Whigs.⁵

Election results during the summer and fall of 1834, however, destroyed Whigs' rosy vision of quickly subduing Jacksonians. Even where the Whigs scored victories, with the exception of Clay's Kentucky, local factors rather than a national trend against Jackson explained the triumphs. The perpetually overoptimistic Clay wrongly interpreted the election of nominal Whigs as governor in Illinois and Indiana in August as referenda against Jackson. Instead, the personal popularity of candidates and the long tradition of chaotic factional rivalries produced the victories; they had nothing to do with national issues.⁶

Success in Louisiana's gubernatorial election in July also stemmed from local factors, not from national anti-Jackson sentiment, even though Whig legislators had denounced removal in the spring. Ethnic rivalries between French Creoles in southern Louisiana and native Americans in the northern part of the state had long shaped state politics. The French had maintained power through suffrage restrictions on potential opponents, gubernatorial patronage, and overrepresentation in the legislature. When the Democratic candidate for governor in 1834 urged the abolition of suffrage restrictions, reduction of the governor's powers, and legislative reapportionment, the French rallied behind the Whig candidate, a Creole himself, and the Whigs prevailed.⁷ These victories in Illinois, Indiana, and Louisiana demonstrated not that Whigs could run successfully against Jackson but that the opposition could, in certain places, exploit state issues and preexisting intrastate rivalries to win irrespective of national issues.

Where the Whig party campaigned almost exclusively against Jackson because it lacked salient state issues, it met defeat. Democrats won the North Carolina legislature in August, and the new legislature immediately tried to force Mangum's resignation. In October, Georgia's pro-Jackson Union party swept the congressional and legislative elections. While the Whigs managed to capture the governorship in Massachusetts, a former National Republican stronghold, Democrats crushed the opposition in Maine and New York and carried New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Ohio by narrower margins.

Nor did the spring elections in 1835 bring much solace to disheartened Whigs. In New Hampshire, Whigs lost the governorship by almost a two-to-one margin and all five congressional seats. In Connecticut, a state Clay had carried comfortably in 1832, Whigs lost the governorship, both houses of the legislature, and all six U.S. congressional seats. Similarly, Democrats captured both of Rhode Island's congressional seats. Worst of all, the promising start in Virginia proved ephemeral. In May, Democrats elected sixteen of twenty-five congressmen, recaptured the legislature, and quickly passed resolutions of instruction that compelled both Tyler and Leigh to resign from the Senate.⁸

The spring setbacks filled New York's perspicacious Whig leaders with fore-boding. "Politically, I am sick at heart," Weed informed Seward after seeing the Connecticut results. "All looks fearfully, hopelessly black." "Virginia has blasted every hope," he added a month later. Albert Tracy, another of Seward's correspondents, was even more demoralized. "The Whigs as a party are without plan, purpose or principle," he lamented. "Their unskillfulness and imbecility . . . deters the young and ambitious from joining them."

Returns from the summer and fall of 1835 only aggravated Whigs' miseries. True, they won eight of thirteen congressional seats in Clay's stronghold of Kentucky, but across the Ohio River in Indiana, which the Whigs had nominally carried in 1834, they elected only one of seven congressmen. While Whigs captured the governorship and eight of thirteen congressional seats in Tennessee, they won only six of thirteen in North Carolina, two of five in Alabama, and neither of Missouri's two seats. Results later in the fall were equally depressing. Victory in Mississippi's gubernatorial contest was offset by the loss of both congressional seats and the legislature by more than a two-to-one margin. Although Whigs secured five of Maryland's eight congressmen, Democrats elected the governor and four congressmen in Georgia, the governor and the lone congressman in Michigan, and a two-to-one majority in both the New Jersey and Ohio legislatures. Whereas the Whigs won 58 percent of the congressional seats filled before September 1834, they captured only 42 percent in the remainder of that year and a dismal 33 percent in 1835.

II

The causes of the reversal were readily evident. Improving economic conditions in 1834 dissolved discontent and blunted Whig assaults on Jackson as author of the recession. By July, Biddle began to relax his restraints on credit, and this turnabout added credibility to Democratic charges that Biddle had artificially contracted the Bank's operations in order to stir up anti-Jackson sentiment and that he, not Old Hickory, was responsible for economic hardship in the spring. Actually, neither Biddle nor Jackson deserved credit or blame. A marked injection of specie into the economy in 1834 through foreign investment and a favorable balance of trade increased bank reserves and, therefore, loans. As a result, cash in circulation, which had increased by a modest 3 percent between 1833 and 1834, grew by 15 percent between 1834 and 1835 and jumped 38 percent between 1835 and 1836. Expanding money supplies fueled a booming economy between the fall of 1834 and the spring of 1837 that extirpated economic resentment against Democratic policies and Whigs' remaining loyalty to Biddle's bank.¹⁰

The boom also prevented Whigs from exploiting Jackson's new antibanking initiatives during the remainder of his term. In 1835 and 1836, Jackson aggressively pushed a hard-money policy. His goal was to undermine the circulability of private banknotes by eliminating the government market for them. He urged Congress to bar deposit banks from issuing or receiving notes of small denominations. He ordered his secretary of the Treasury to effect this change through executive circulars to the deposit banks. And in July 1836 he issued a Specie Circular prohibiting the purchase of public lands with paper money. These measures alienated Democratic businessmen, and they would eventually provide ammunition for Whig campaigners. The three-year boom starting in 1834, however, nullified their immediate use as Whig issues.

In several states, Whigs also stood on the losing side of religious and ethnic disputes that weakened their competitiveness in congressional and state legislative elections between 1834 and 1836. In New Jersey, they, like their National Republican predecessors, were morbidly distrusted by dissident Hicksite Quakers, who blamed them for siding with the Hicksites' Orthodox Quaker rivals in legal disputes over Quaker school funds. That distrust kept western New Jersey, and with it the entire state government, in Democratic hands through the elections of 1836, even though virtually all Quakers disliked Jackson himself. In Michigan, virulently anti-Catholic Presbyterians dominated the Whig party and committed it to oppose a provision to allow alien suffrage in the new state's constitution. Presbyterian intolerance alienated virtually all other demographic groups in the state, allowing Democrats to crush Whigs in 1835 and again in 1836. In Proposition in the state, allowing Democrats to crush Whigs in 1835 and again in 1836. In Proposition in the state, allowing Democrats to crush Whigs in 1835 and again in 1836. Even more debilitating to Whig hopes of rallying all anti-Jackson men behind their party, Antimasons persistently retained a separate organization in Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Vermont, and Pennsylvania, despite the Whigs' adoption of a similar ideological position. In Massachusetts, where Anti-masons regarded Whigs simply as the same old aristocrats who had dominated the National Republicans, they cooperated with Democrats to come within a single vote of defeating the Whig nominee for United States senator in the 1835 legislature. In Connecticut and Rhode Island, enough Antimasons supported Democrats in 1834 and 1835 to deny Whig control of two states Clay had carried in 1832. In Vermont, Antimasons easily carried every gubernatorial election over both Democrats and Whigs between 1831 and 1836, and when the Whigs and Antimasons finally merged, former Antimasons dominated the party's leadership. In Pennsylvania, normally a Democratic state, Antimasons clearly outnumbered Whigs in the opposition ranks, especially outside of Pittsburgh and Philadelphia. Of forty-six opposition members elected to the state legislature in 1834, for example, thirty-three were Antimasons and only thirteen Whigs. 13

Where state issues divided Whigs from Antimasons, Whig strategists realized, they must divert Antimasons' attention to national concerns. The removal issue had obviously failed to bring the two groups together by the end of 1834. Whigs therefore increasingly focused their hopes on a common presidential candidate in 1836. That strategy gave the Antimasons, a tiny proportion of the anti-Jackson men nationally, a decisive and disproportionate influence over the selection of the nominee.

To protect liberty from executive tyranny, that nominee would have to defeat Jackson's chosen successor, Martin Van Buren, who seemed eminently more beatable than the charismatic military hero. Virtually salivating at the prospect of campaigning against him, Whigs scourged Van Buren from the moment of his nomination in May 1835 as a corrupt political manipulator and dangerous intriguer. By taking that tack, they could shift the executive usurpation issue from the removal of the deposits, which had failed to move sufficient voters, to Jackson's supposedly dictatorial attempt to impose his successor on his party and on the American people. To anti-elitist Antimasons, they could invoke the horrors of the Albany Regency. To Southerners, they could point out that a slaveholding planter was about to be replaced by a Yankee. With genuine zeal and unbounded relief, Whigs launched a crusade against Van Buren that they hoped would prove more successful than had their forays against Jackson's evisceration of the Bank.

III

Once Whigs shifted their attention to Van Buren's liabilities, however, they confronted the age-old impossibility of beating somebody with nobody. As an impatient North Carolinian warned Mangum in November 1834, "We can never . . . commence operations—with success—without a candidate in the field for the Presidency."

But what candidate could unite nationalistic National Republicans, who distrusted State Rights men and Nullifiers and were distrusted by them, or National Republican patricians and Antimasons, who regarded each other jealously? Every conceivable candidate seemed to have a political past that made him unpalatable to one element or another in the new party, yet, as Whigs recognized, only a single standard bearer who could keep Whigs "together" could "defeat Van Buren and Jacksonianism." "We must run but one candidate lest we break up and divide," protested Kentucky's John J. Crittenden in frustration. Yet the fact remained that while incipient Whigs could unite in opposition to Jackson, Van Buren, executive tyranny, and Democratic economic policies, they could not agree upon a single presidential candidate for 1836.¹⁵

John C. Calhoun, for one, insisted on going his own way. He acted with the Whig alliance until 1837, but he and his loyal South Carolina supporters were never really of it. The Whig party, indeed, never took hold in Calhoun's fiefdom. "We are aware of the danger... of our merging into one or both of the great parties now contending for the Presidency," Calhoun wrote in January 1834. "We are determined to preserve our separate existence on our basis. If there is to be Union against the administration, it must be Union on our own ground."

That ground remained Nullification. But precisely Calhoun's insistence on the constitutionality of state interposition set him apart from National Republican and State Rights Whigs who hoped to bury the divisive issue. When Calhounite editor Duff Green announced in his United States Telegraph that the Calhoun men would support no candidate for president who repudiated the right of Nullification, they were furious. I am "shocked with the impudence of D. Green," Clay exploded to Mangum. "Now it is clear that if each element of the opposition ... will support no Candidate who does not entertain its principles, there can be no union or harmony."

Calhoun's stubborn insistence on sticking to his guns epitomized the disharmony that Clay lamented. By the end of 1834 most Whigs forlornly admitted that they could not hold a national convention without its blowing apart. The antiparty animosity of some early adherents and the desire to condemn the Democratic national convention itself as a menace to self-government further militated against even attempting such an assemblage.

More fundamentally, Whigs' inability to arrange a national convention or agree on a single presidential candidate revealed that the party was still inchoate. To call all who opposed the Jackson administration before 1836 "Whigs" or to speak of a "Whig party" in the mid-1830s is more a literary convenience than an accurate description of fact. Although the opponents of Jackson could cooperate in Congress and although they cheered on each other's efforts in different states, they had developed no central organization. More important, they had not yet formed any institutional loyalties to the new Whig party. Indeed, many foes of Jackson and Van Buren who would later adopt the name "Whig," like the Antimasons in Vermont and Pennsylvania or State Rights men in certain southern states, still eschewed that label in the mid-1830s. It is little wonder that so polyglot and embryonic a coalition failed to hold a national convention in 1835 or 1836. 18

Instead, Whigs relied by default on newspapers and caucuses of state legislators in different parts of the country to make nominations. At first they hoped that one state's favorite would catch fire elsewhere and that anti-Jacksonians throughout the country would then concentrate behind him. But by the summer of 1835, the party's newspaper in Washington, the National Intelligencer, succinctly confessed, "We desire a candidate who will concentrate all our suffrage and we desire what is impossible." With one candidate an impossibility, some Whigs hoped that multiple candidates might deprive Van Buren of the required majority of electoral votes. Then, one of the Whig candidates might prevail in the House of Representatives. Few if any Whigs publicly or privately articulated that hope, however, and there is no evidence of concerted planning among Whigs to bring it about. Indeed, the stigma of the corrupt bargain of 1825 required Whig newspapers to deny any intention of thrusting the election into the House. More pragmatically, some Whigs favored different regional candidates to maximize their advantages in state politics, where they might win control of state governments even if they did not stop Van Buren. As Virginia's James Barbour wrote Clay in the summer of 1835, "By running two popular men," we can secure "the State Government, an object of great importance, and almost a compensation for the loss of our Presidential candidate." 19

With this priority on winning state elections in mind, Whigs especially rejected as candidates the nationally prominent leaders who had created the Whig party in Congress. Winning required converting former Democrats and Antimasons, and National Republicans, discredited by their association with the Bank of the United States, were deemed exactly the wrong kind of candidates for the chore. Just as Jackson had defined the original shape and thrust of the Whig party, he served as a model of the kind of candidate that Whigs without National Republican antecedents sought. "With Clay, Webster or Calhoun, or indeed any man identified with the war against Jackson and in favor of the Bank or the Bank's Shadow," New York's Thurlow Weed warned, "the game is up." In December 1834, Mangum wrote from Washington that most opposition politicians shared Weed's gloomy prognosis. "Mark it. No opposition man can be elected President. They may mar, but they can't make," he told William A. Graham. "Clay is off—Calhoun is off—& Webster, though anxious for a nomination, must soon find that overwhelming defeat is inevitable."

Ohio's Whigs demonstrated the expedient considerations that motivated the party when, in December 1834, they nominated a native son, Supreme Court Justice John McLean. A supporter of Jackson in 1828, McLean was praised for his potential to attract Democrats in a state Democrats had just carried. He was also presumed to be attractive to Antimasons who had courted him as their own candidate in 1831. Southern Nullifiers and state rights men immediately rejected McLean for lacking any principles, and National Republicans in New England and the border states refused to back an erstwhile Jacksonian.²¹ Once his weakness was clear, Ohioans quickly abandoned him for a different candidate who offered a better chance to capture the state.

Ohio's actions particularly offended Clay, who still thirsted for the presidency and counted on Ohio's support. Indignant that the McLean boomlet doomed his chances, he bitterly complained that he, like many Whigs, "could not see the policy or propriety of selecting, as a candidate, a gentleman who was an original friend of Jackson, in preference to all who had been in uniform opposition to him." Clay's fury was understandable, but as usual, he exaggerated his prospects. By the end of 1834, neither Southerners nor New Englanders would support his pretensions.²²

Nor were Webster's chances much brighter. The collapse of the Union party movement in 1833 had done nothing to quell his lust for the office, and he arranged for Massachusetts Whigs to nominate him in January 1835 in order to head off McLean. Webster succeeded in stopping McLean, who eventually withdrew, but in little else. Even Webster realized that he could get no support from the South. Southern Whigs were not Webster's main obstacle, however; they were willing to let him be the Whig candidate in the North, so long as they could run somebody else in the South.²³

But too many northern Whigs regarded Webster as a liability. Outside of New England, Antimasons like New York's Weed and Seward considered Webster's Federalist background, his connections with the Boston Brahmins, and his well-known links to Biddle's Bank as dead weight they could not carry. "It is the height of madness to run Webster as a candidate," Seward warned Weed. "To vote for Webster is indirectly to elect Van Buren—and to fix upon the Whigs the perpetual stigma of federalism." Similarly, Whigs in the Middle West, where, outside of Ohio, National Republicanism had been almost nonexistent, were left cold by Webster's political background and regional identity. They wanted a man of their own, just as Southerners did.

In the spring of 1835, both Midwesterners and Antimasons from the Middle Atlantic states began to float the name of a man they considered perfect—General William Henry Harrison. Hero of the battle of Tippecanoe in 1811, a former governor of the Indiana Territory and United States senator from Ohio, an Indian fighter with plain airs, and a long-time resident of the West, even though he had been born in Virginia, Harrison was a marvelously attractive newcomer. True, he had never been a National Republican, but Jackson had sacked him from a minor diplomatic post. He was, in sum, an anti-Jackson man.

Harrison's potential appeal caused Webster's supporters in and outside Massachusetts to complain loud and long of the danger of man worship and military candidates. Harrison, they protested, had insufficient experience, no record on recent issues, no qualifications as a statesman, nothing but fame for a few skirmishes fought in the distant past. To such strictures Harrison's supporters like the Cincinnati Gazette tellingly responded, "Harrison takes with the people.... Mr. Webster cannot be elected President—General Harrison may be elected. South, West, North, East, all can support General Harrison." If, in the eyes of Webster men, Harrison was just as bad as Andrew Jackson, the general's similarity to the Jackson of 1824 and 1828 made him particularly appealing to Westerners and Antimasons. "If it was right to elect General Jackson because he was a favorite citizen, and not the candidate of officeholders, it is right to elect General Harrison on the same principle," declared the Ohio State Journal in 1836.²⁵

Harrison adroitly took steps to reassure Whigs that he shared the principles that mattered most. In a public letter he strongly denounced Jackson's executive usurpations and condemned the dictatorial spirit of party. He advocated federal subsidization of internal improvements and endorsed Clay's scheme for distributing federal land revenues to the states for that purpose. He even said he would back a new national bank if events demonstrated its necessity. By such statements, he won the grudging support of former National Republicans like Clay and Clayton of Delaware, although Webster loyalists refused to be budged.²⁶

The choice between Webster or Harrison as the preeminent northern Whig candidate remained unclear until the end of 1835. For several reasons, Whigs' decision between the two hinged on Pennsylvania's preference. Having lost New York decisively in 1834 and having virtually conceded it to the Democrats in 1835, Whigs realized they had no possibility of snatching it from the New Yorker Van Buren in 1836. Hence they needed the nation's second largest state to have a chance. In addition, a rift within the Pennsylvania Democratic party assured an opposition victory in the state's gubernatorial election in October 1835 and portended triumph in the Keystone State a year later. Finally, Pennsylvania's primary opposition party remained the Antimasons, not the Whigs, and for the Whigs to have any chance of garnering Antimasonic support throughout the North, they had to accept the favorite of Pennsylvania's Antimasonic party. Waiting until after their victory in October, the Antimasons met in convention at Harrisburg in December 1835. Webster had carefully cultivated support among Pennsylvania's Antimasons—but not enough. The convention, and with it the Whig party of the North, gave its nod to Harrison.²⁷

Webster would remain in the race through the November 1836 election. But he was reduced to being a New England candidate and the chief Whig candidate only in Massachusetts. Elsewhere in the North, as well as in the border states and Virginia, Harrison headed the Whig ticket. The Whigs had found a man of the people, an Indian fighter, a military hero of their own.

Other Southerners had settled on a favorite long before. Like Harrison, he had not been a National Republican or a prominent leader of the original Whig forces in the Senate in 1834. During that session, indeed, Senator Hugh Lawson White of Tennessee had remained a staunch supporter of Jackson, as had most politicians in his state. A close personal friend of the president who had faithfully voted against recharter of the Bank and for the Force Bill in the previous session, White considered himself and was presented to southern voters as a true Jacksonian who agreed with his fellow Tennessean on all issues but one: Jackson's insistence that Martin Van Buren be the next president.

Although White's Democratic pedigree, like McLean's, dismayed former National Republicans, most southern Whigs themselves had initially supported Jackson. They had to compete in states that Jackson had swept overwhelmingly. To win converts they needed a candidate with a Democratic background. More important, White possessed three credentials they deemed crucial. He was a Southerner, he owned slaves, and he wanted to keep Van Buren out of the White House. He had been bruited as a possible candidate in 1833 and 1834, but his formal nomination grew out of the exigencies of politics in Alabama and Tennessee, two of the three southern states in which deposit removal had not provided sufficient impetus to launch a viable Whig party.²⁸

Jackson had remained so popular in Tennessee that, unlike elsewhere, an opposition party could not organize on the basis of anti-Jacksonism itself. Still, a number of nominally Jacksonian politicians in the state harbored resentment against Jackson's patronage allotment and his antibanking policies. The skirmishing between the two camps crystallized around the rivalry between Congressmen James K. Polk and John Bell, who opposed each other for Speaker of the House both in June 1834 and in December 1835. Jackson sided with Polk, his antibanking spokesman in the House. In retaliation, Bell, in December 1834, helped arrange a meeting of Tennessee's congressional delegation in Washington, which Polk and other Jackson loyalists refused to attend. That meeting then secured White's permission to run him for president. Tennessee's fanciers of White knew that Jackson required his supporters to back Van Buren for president. They also knew that they might discredit those loyalists by running White as a favorite son and demanding another Tennessean in the White House. On that issue and the advocacy of a state program of internal improvements they would eventually elect Newton D. Cannon governor in 1835 over the pro-Jackson, pro-Van Buren William Carroll, and the Tennessee Whig party would be born.²⁹

Before the Tennessee caucus announced White's candidacy, the Alabama legislature had nominated him in January 1835. That decision resulted from a combination of the personal supporters of Governor John Gayle, thitherto a nominal Jacksonian, a faction of extreme state righters, and a tiny coterie of National Republicans behind White's candidacy. Calling themselves the White party, this motley proto-Whig coalition contested the Alabama gubernatorial election of 1835 against the Jacksonians on the issues of Van Buren's unfitness for the presidency and the illegitimacy of party conventions.³⁰

In sum, White was first nominated because dissident politicians in Tennessee and Alabama wanted to exploit Van Buren's unpopularity in state elections during 1835. To their surprise and northern National Republicans' dismay, fever for the Tennessean then spread across Dixie in 1835 with the speed of an epidemic. White was portrayed not only as the people's candidate against the Democratic convention's dictated choice, but also as slaveholders' defender against northern aggression. "I think our interests imperatively require a Slave holding President," Louisiana's Whig Senator Alexander Porter declared, and he and other southern Whigs constantly pointed to the rising abolitionist movement in the North as the reason that no Northerner, especially the crafty Van Buren, could be trusted in the White House. For it was precisely in 1835 that northern abolitionists began their great campaign to flood the South with antislavery literature and to petition Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia. No Northerner could be relied on to resist that pressure, southern Whigs cried, especially the chameleonlike Van Buren, who had proved he was no friend of the South by supporting the Tariff or Abominations in 1828. If placed in the White House, Van Buren might open up southern mails to abolitionist propaganda. "Vote for a Northern President from a free state," summed up a Virginia Whig paper, "and when the test comes, he will support the abolitionists."31

Southern Whigs vilified not only Van Buren but also Democratic vice presidential nominee Richard M. Johnson of Kentucky, who lived openly with his mulatto mistress and their two children. Such a public crossing of the color line shocked southern sensibilities. Even one of Jackson's Tennessee loyalists told him that Johnson was "not only positively unpopular but affirmatively odious" because he flouted social propriety. "In every slaveholding country, this must be so and ought to be so."

Pillorying the obnoxious Democratic nominees, inciting and exploiting visceral fears among white Southerners at the very prospect of abolition or slave insurrection or race mixing that might be caused by abolitionist literature, Whigs across Dixie rallied to the cry: "The cause of Judge White is the cause of the South." In state after state, fearful Democrats howled that the Whigs' "great effort is to excite Southern prejudice" and that "the effort to make a southern sectional party out of the abolition question has been most eagerly pressed by the enemies of the administration." Grudgingly, they confessed the efficacy of that strategy. "Judge White is cutting into our ranks," moaned Virginia's Thomas Ritchie.³³

Southern Democrats fought back against the Whig onslaught as best they could. They denounced White as an apostate who was now allied with Federalists, minions of Biddle's Bank, and Nullifiers. They charged that White had no chance to be elected, that he was simply a stalking horse for Whigs who would turn to Clay, Webster, or Harrison if the election went to the House. They proclaimed the necessity of party loyalty to protect the gains Jackson had won on behalf of the people against moneyed aristocrats, and they insisted that party principles were more important than men. Over and over they pronounced that Van Buren was "emphatically a FIRM FRIEND OF THE SOUTH." Finally, to stanch the hemorrhaging of their southern support, southern Democratic leaders pressured the Jackson administration and Van Buren to assure southern voters that the Democratic party was safe on the slavery issue.³⁴

Democratic leaders in Washington responded with alacrity. Jackson ordered his postmaster general to direct southern postmasters to destroy abolitionist literature and asked Congress for a law banning it from the mails. In addition, he appointed three Southerners to the Supreme Court in 1835 and 1836, including P. P. Barbour of Virginia, the man southern dissidents had run for vice president against Van Buren in 1832, and the new chief justice, Maryland's Roger B. Taney. In May 1836, Van Buren himself helped arrange the gag rule in the House of Representatives under which debate on abolitionist petitions was quashed, and in March 1836 he came out publicly against abolition in the District of Columbia. Privately, he urged northern allies like New York's Governor Marcy and Senator Silas Wright to denounce abolitionist activities in order to prove his reliability to Southerners. His friends circulated a pamphlet that rehearsed his faithfulness to the South. All in all, the frenetic Democratic response to the southern Whig offensive offers telling testimony to its power.³⁵

Many northern Whigs blanched at southern Whigs' tactics, for they hoped to enlist antislayery sentiment in the North against the Democrats. From the very inception of the Whig party, its northern and southern wings divided over the slavery issue. In roll-call votes concerning slavery in the House of Representatives in 1836 northern and southern Whigs were sharply polarized, in contrast to their cohesion on economic policies. Southern Whigs took a more proslavery position than southern Democrats, while northern Whigs took a decidedly more antislavery stance than northern Democrats. Much more frequently than northern Democrats, northern Whigs like John Ouincy Adams and Joshua Giddings of Ohio introduced the antislavery petitions that so infuriated Southerners, and in 1836 and thereafter, northern Whigs were consistently more unified against the gag rule than were Democrats.³⁶ In short, spreading the Whig party to the South had a price. It incorporated into the party at its birth a pronounced sectional split over matters relating to slavery, a chasm that yawned so wide that Whigs could accommodate it throughout most of the party's history only by agreeing to disagree, only by allowing northern and southern Whigs to take opposing stands on the issue in their respective sections.

Though sharply divided over slavery, northern and southern Whigs still shared a common cause: defeating Van Buren and Jacksonianism. In Congress, Whigs united behind Clay's land bill, on opposition to the deposit banks, and against Democratic efforts during 1836 to expunge the censure of Jackson from the Senate's journal. Despite regional variations in appeals, moreover, Whigs everywhere lambasted Jackson's dictatorial attempt to impose his successor on the nation and warned that Van Buren would continue King Andrew's pernicious perversions of the republican order.³⁷

The "Address to the People" issued by the New York State Whig convention in February 1836 perfectly epitomized the dominant Whig refrain: voters must rescue public liberty in order to save the Revolutionary experiment in republican self-government. Jackson's palpable tyranny and corruption, it averred, called "on all to awake who wish to preserve for themselves something more than the form of a republic." Cataloguing the supposed horrors committed by Jackson and his slavish "minions," it queried, "Could those patriots of former days, who so zealously guarded the security of personal independence and the freedom of individual opinion against the arbitrary exercise of executive power . . . now revisit us, would they be able to recognize the outlines of that system they toiled and bled to establish?" Condemning Jackson's "high-handed attempt to control the free choice of the people in the election of their rulers, and to force upon them a Chief Magistrate" as his most egregious usurpation, it shrilly predicted that if Jackson succeeded, "the form of our government is changed—our constitution subverted, our liberties extinct." Echoing Whig hostility to party proscription and discipline. finally, the address vituperated Van Buren as the architect of "a conspiracy, which seeks to promote the interests of the few at the expense of the many" and subverts "personal independence, . . . freedom of opinion, and . . . free institutions." 38

Unable to pose as prophets of prosperity or effectively to criticize Jacksonian economic policies during the existing boom and bereft of any national achievements of their own to point to, the Whigs thus resorted to mounting a crusade for political freedom. At stake in the election, they iterated and reiterated, was the very salvation of republicanism.

IV

In 1836 that tocsin was not enough. Despite their impassioned pleas to stop Van Buren and despite the advantages they gained from a three-pronged offensive, they narrowly failed to arouse enough new voters or convert enough old ones to win. The proportion of eligible males who voted increased only from 55.4 percent in 1832 to 57.8 percent in 1836, and since the Whigs captured the bulk of new voters, their inability to evoke an even greater increase in turnout with an essentially ideological appeal proved fatal. Van Buren prevailed by an electoral vote margin of 170 to 124 over his combined opponents. Both in its size and in its geographical distribution, however, the popular vote revealed considerable Whig gains over previous National Republican showings. Nationally, Van Buren eked out a 50.9 percent majority, 764,198 to 736,147. Webster carried Massachusetts, as had Adams and Clay. White won both Tennessee and Georgia, which Jackson had swept almost unanimously in 1832. And Harrison captured Delaware, Maryland, and Kentucky, as had Clay, along with Vermont, New Jersey, Indiana, and Ohio, but he lost Connecticut and Rhode Island, which Clay had won. Obeying Calhoun, South Carolina's legislature refused to vote for White because he had supported the Force Bill in 1833 and instead cast the state's eleven electoral votes for Mangum, the Whig senator from North Carolina. Put another way, where Jackson had lost only eight states in 1832, Van Buren lost eleven.

The results clearly demonstrate the disruptive impact that Jackson's second term and the formation of the Whig party had on voting alignments.³⁹ Whigs scored their most dramatic gains over previous anti-Jackson showings in southern and western states, where Adams and then Clay had been weakest. Even in states they did not carry—Pennsylvania, Illinois, Missouri, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, North Carolina, and Virginia—Whigs were significantly more competitive than the National Republicans. Van Buren narrowly squeaked by in North Carolina in November, for example, but the Whigs had triumphed in the first popular election for governor there the previous August. In contrast, Whigs were notably weaker in New England than the National Republicans had been. Democrats actually captured a majority of the region's popular vote and four of its six states.

The Whigs clearly attracted a large majority of new voters who had joined the electorate since 1832. As Table 2 indicates, with a few notable exceptions in New England, the anti-Democratic share of the vote grew most markedly in precisely those states where the size of the popular vote increased the most. At the same time, the Whig proportion of the vote was uniformly smaller than the National Republicans' had been in those states where the turnout was lower in 1836 than in 1832.⁴⁰ Of the states in which the Whigs scored gains, moreover, only Virginia, Louisiana, and Tennessee showed Democratic losses, but they were never large enough to account for more than a fraction of the Whig growth. In short, Van Buren's candidacy undoubtedly hurt the Democrats in the South, but new voters must have disproportionately supported the Whig party.

These data support Horace Greeley's assertion in 1838 that the Whig party formed as an amalgam of former National Republicans dedicated to the American System, state rights Southerners and Nullifiers, the bulk of Antimasons, dissident Democrats angered by Jackson's "high-handed conduct," and "numbers who had not before taken any part in politics; but who were awakened from their apathy by the palpable usurpations of the Executive." More likely, however, the regional popularity or unpopularity of the candidates, as well as the competitiveness of parties in different states, shaped both the dimension and direction of voter participation. Surely, the presence of White explains a great deal of the Whig surge in the South, as does Harrison's in the Midwest and Pennsylvania, where most Antimasons embraced him.

The substitution of a race between Harrison and Van Buren for one between Clay and Jackson also accounts for the smaller turnout and weakened Whig position in Kentucky. Neither Democrats nor Whigs could be as enthusiastic about their candidates as they were in 1832. Similarly, the shared conviction that Van Buren would win New York depressed both the Democratic and Whig votes, the latter obviously to a greater extent. At the same time, Van Buren's identification as a Northerner helped him run better in New England than the slaveholder Jackson ever had, although infusions of Antimasons also aided the Democrats in Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Massachusetts. Finally, the dominance that Democrats had demonstrated in gubernatorial elections in Maine and New Hampshire in 1835 and especially in 1836 made the outcome of the presidential poll so certain that neither Democrats nor their foes turned out in the same numbers they had in 1832.⁴²

By 1836, in sum, a national pattern of two-party conflict had replaced the largely regional one of 1832 in the presidential vote. The Whigs had extended their voting base to the South and West, while competition between the two parties was also generally closer in the Middle Atlantic and New England states than it had been four years earlier. That the opposition's share of the popular vote had increased from 45 to nearly 50 percent of the national total, and that it approached that average in every region of the country, testified to how far the Whigs had traveled in three short years.

Yet those same results also showed that the Whigs still had far to go to fulfill their mission of rescuing the government and public liberty from Jacksonism. As Mangum had predicted at the end of 1834, they might mar but they could not make. Even as a lame duck, Jackson had thwarted them. They could not stop his drive toward hard money, overcome his vetoes, or derail his legatee. Despite Whigs' widespread and multifaceted antipathy toward Van Buren, they could not unite behind a single challenger even though they knew that Van Buren would otherwise win. While they improved their performance in the congressional elections of 1836, they still claimed only 40 percent of the members chosen that year, a slightly smaller proportion than they had won in 1834. Control of any branch of the national government still seemed far beyond their grasp.

^bRanking Alabama, which had no opposition to Jackson in 1832 and no recorded vote, first may be arbitrary, but surely it was in the top five in terms of growth in turnout, and that ranking does not distort the overall pattern.

Nor did Whigs' record in state elections provide much encouragement. Whigs like James Barbour of Virginia had reconciled themselves to the necessity of running more than one presidential candidate with the hope that the local popularity of different regional candidates could help the party win control of state governments, even if it lost the White House. There is, however, little evidence of such a coattails' effect. Rather, the Whigs won legislative or gubernatorial elections only in those states where the party inherited a National Republican majority or where they carved out a distinctive and advantageous position on salient state issues—that is, where they demonstrated that Whig ideas were relevant to the needs of a state's voters. Where Whigs relied solely on the presidential question in campaigns for state offices or took unpopular stands on state issues, they made their poorest showings, no matter how well their presidential candidates ran.

The original objective of the Whig party, a party founded in Congress, was to save public liberty, first by using Congress to check executive tyranny and then by keeping Jackson's hand-picked successor out of the White House. Whigs, of course, had begun to build state organizations, but primarily because state legislatures chose United States senators and because each state's citizens picked a slate of presidential electors. Since Whigs' top priority was to control the national government, moreover, they had relied primarily on charges of Jackson's tyranny and the presidential campaign of 1835–36 to plant and nurture successful state Whig parties.

By the end of 1836, they had failed to achieve their main goal. They had no chance to capture Congress until the next set of elections in 1838–39 or the presidency itself until 1840. Somewhat ironically, therefore, the party's survival in the near-term future, like its durability over the long haul, depended on the viability and vitality of over twenty state Whig organizations, each of which operated in a unique political environment. At the end of 1836 Whig state parties could carry that burden with only varying reliability. During the extended presidential campaign of 1835–36, some were far more successful than others in sinking permanent roots and contesting elections for state offices. Contrary to Whigs' initial expectations, moreover, almost invariably the key to Whigs' success at the state level lay in their ability to go beyond questions stemming from national politics. Success instead depended on Whigs taking appealing stances that differed from those of Democrats on concrete matters stemming from the agendas of state politics and governance that, in the American federal system, were often distinct from those of the national government.

Since at least the spring of 1835, many Whigs had counted on the presidential question to complete the job of building state Whig organizations begun with attacks on Jackson's deposit removal in 1834. Especially in southern and western states, where the National Republicans had been a negligible force, and in northeastern states, where Antimasons still clung to independent existence, they expected to strengthen embryonic state parties by pillorying Van Buren's purported evils and touting their own candidates' supposed strengths, whether it was White's safety on the slavery issue in the South or, in the North, Harrison's popularity among Antimasons, his western residence, and his glamor as an Indian fighter. With the possible exceptions of Indiana, Ohio, Georgia, and Alabama, however, Whig presidential candidates provided very little help to anti-Democratic candidates for state office. In many states, the incipient opposition parties did far better in 1834, when Jackson's tyranny and alleged responsibility for the recession were the issues, than in 1835 or 1836, when the focus was on the impending presidential election. In the West and South, where state Whig candidates depended most heavily on presidential coattails in 1835 and 1836, Whig organizations often remained inchoate or nonexistent. To flourish at the state level, Whigs had to make themselves relevant to state affairs.

Table 3 provides an overview of the presidential campaign's impact on state races. It compares the proportion of the presidential vote won by anti-Democratic candidates in 1832 and 1836 with two measures of Whig (or opposition) performance in state elections between 1834 and 1836: the share of the popular vote won by anti-Jacksonian gubernatorial candidates and, where available, the proportion of seats won by Whigs or their fellow travelers in the lower houses of state legislatures.

Aside from the notable discrepancy between the vote for Whig state and presidential candidates in at least ten states, these figures show that Maine, New Hampshire, Illinois, Missouri, and Mississippi had become so heavily Democratic by 1832 or 1834 that Whig presidential candidates, no matter what their own popularity, could not help state Whig candidates win. When Arkansas became a state in 1836, it joined that category. 44 In Missouri and Mississippi, reliance on presidential coattails not only failed to help Whig state candidates, it helped to retard any self-conscious identification as Whigs by voters and leaders alike until the late 1830s. Missouri's Whigs were so feeble that they preferred to act as a pressure group and throw their support to dissident Democrats who resented Jackson's hard-money economic policies and their prominent Missouri champion, Senator Thomas Hart Benton. In the gubernatorial election of August 1836, for example, Whigs backed a probanking Democrat named William Ashley, who drew 47.7 percent of the vote. But in the same election, Whigs won less than threetenths of the legislature, and in a markedly smaller turnout in November the Whig electoral ticket drew less than 40 percent. With disputants over state economic policy represented by rival Democratic factions, there seemed little room or need—for the Whig party.⁴⁵

Partisan identities remained so inchoate and partisan positions on state issues so incoherent in Mississippi that it is an act of generosity even to speak of a state Whig party existing there. The Whigs had held a state convention at the end of 1834 to nominate a gubernatorial candidate for 1835 and to cooperate with the State Rights Association, but by 1835 Whigs there, as in many other southern states, relied primarily on Hugh White's popularity, Van Buren's unpopularity, and the purported abolitionist menace to slavery. As a result, the relevance of the new party to state politics remained unclear, and little consciousness of being Whigs emerged among Mississippi's voters or politicians. In November 1835, when the Whig gubernatorial candidate prevailed with 51.1 percent of the vote, for example, Democrats simultaneously swept both congressional seats in the atlarge election with 55.7 percent and captured 69 percent of the seats in the lower house of the legislature. Whigs improved their showing slightly in November [&]quot;With a few exceptions, the figures on share of state legislative seats (L) are taken from data compiled by Walter Dean Burnham for the Inter-University Consortium on Political Research at the University of Michigan. Gubernatorial returns (G) are taken from the Congressional Quarterly's Guide to U.S. Elections. Figures for Connecticut, Vermont, and Pennsylvania combine the Antimasonic and Whig shares, as do the figures for the 1832 presidential vote for those states where there were Wirt and Clay tickets. Months listed in parentheses next to states refer to the time when state elections were held.

1836 by winning 37.5 percent of the legislative seats, but at the same time, White drew 49 percent of the presidential poll. Clearly, many voters made no connection whatsoever between White and other Whig candidates for different offices.⁴⁶

Nor did Mississippi's nominally Whig officeholders develop a much firmer identity with the party. Aside from the nationally oriented election for United States senator in 1836, there was little partisan influence or organization among state legislators even during the election of officers and committee assignments, let alone in voting on matters of substantive state policy, until the late 1830s. In Mississippi, anti-Jackson politicians placed all their hopes on national issues, and by the end of 1836 the state party lacked stability, a coherent identity, and power.

Conversely, inherited National Republican strength, whatever its source, rather than presidential candidates' coattails, clearly accounts for Whig success at the state level in 1835 and 1836 in Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, and Louisiana. In New England's former National Republican strongholds after 1834, meanwhile, neither Harrison's purported attractiveness to Antimasons nor Webster's favoriteson status in Massachusetts stopped hostile Antimasons, who had long resented National Republican/Whig control of state governments, from helping Democrats to win state elections in Connecticut and Rhode Island and sharply to reduce Whig majorities in Massachusetts from their 1834 high. To recover in state elections, New England's Whigs clearly needed something more tangible than presidential coattails.

Even in Vermont, where Antimasons, not National Republicans or Whigs, dominated the anti-Democratic majority between 1831 and 1836 and where most Antimasons did finally join the Whigs, Harrison had little impact in facilitating that merger or increasing the Whig vote. Fusion first occurred in the gubernatorial campaign of September 1836, when Whigs backed the Antimasonic candidate. That joint candidate won, but with a smaller proportion of the vote than the combined share garnered previously by the two separate parties, just as Harrison's percentage was smaller than the combined share won by Wirt and Clay in 1832. In short, the elimination of the Antimasonic party in New England generally left the Democrats stronger and the anti-Democrats weaker than they had been earlier.

The other northern states where National Republicans had been competitive—New York, New Jersey, and Ohio—underline the central point: in state politics, presidential coattails were no substitute for popular and partisanly distinctive stands on state issues. Whereas New York's Whigs in 1834 had mounted a full-fledged gubernatorial campaign on state as well as national issues for Seward, their well-known state legislative leader, in 1836 they put all their emphasis on the presidential race and gave only tepid editorial and organizational support to Jesse Buel, their superannuated and nondescript gubernatorial candidate.⁴⁷ In 1834, Seward garnered 48.2 percent of the vote; in 1836 Buel received only 45.1 percent. In New York's state races, clearly, Whigs were more competitive when they took concrete stands on state issues, when they demonstrated the congruence between national party ideology and matters of state concern.

Ohio and New Jersey suggest that however much concrete and distinctive stands on state issues helped state Whig parties sink permanent roots, they were not enough to carry state elections. For Whigs to win, their distinctive stance also had to have popular appeal. Harrison carried both states in November by comparable majorities, yet Whigs' state candidates in the two met dramatically different fates a month earlier. In Ohio, Whigs won the gubernatorial election and sharply increased their strength in the state legislature over the previous year. In New Jersey, where the legislature still elected the governor, Whig legislative candidates fared almost as badly in 1836 as in 1835, despite Whig triumphs in all six congressional races on the same day and Harrison's victory a month later. Nor does a Democratic gerrymander of the legislature explain New Jersey's result, for a year later, under the same apportionment, Whigs would win 68 percent of the seats. As a native son, Harrison did undoubtedly have longer coattails in Ohio than in New Jersey, but the main reason for the different state results is that Ohio's Whigs took the popular, and New Jersey's Whigs the unpopular, side on specific state economic issues.

Between 1834 and 1836 in both Ohio and New Jersey the two parties developed sharply different positions on state economic policies. As in New Jersey, Ohio's Democratic governor recommended legislation to ban bank notes of small denomination in 1835 and 1836, and sharp partisan conflict developed in the legislature over it, as well as over bills to charter banks and other companies. Whig control of the legislature during early 1835 blocked this hard-money initiative, but after Democrats won the 1835 legislative elections, they passed it in 1836. Basing their 1836 state campaign on denunciation of Democrats' antibanking legislation, Whigs recaptured the legislature in October and elected Joseph Vance governor with 51.6 percent of the vote, slightly less than Harrison's proportion a month later.

Because Ohio's Whig party successfully differentiated itself from Democrats on specific state policies, it had, by the end of 1836, developed much greater stability and a clearer partisan identity than its counterparts in Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, and Mississippi. Of all the nation's states, however, by 1836 the emerging two-party system of Whigs and Democrats had developed most completely in New Jersey. Both parties coordinated state and congressional campaigns with central organizations in Trenton composed of legislative caucuses and prominent editors. Candidates for all offices had clear party identities, legislators were organized and disciplined by party caucuses, and elections for legislative offices and state patronage positions, as well as committee assignments, were dominated by the majority party. After 1834, moreover, Whigs and Democrats became sharply polarized against each other in legislative roll-call votes and election campaigns over state policy toward corporations, banks, and paper money.

What differentiated New Jersey from Ohio, where Whigs rebounded on a probanking platform in 1836, was the salience of another state issue: the so-called Joint Companies, the combination of the Camden and Amboy Railroad and the Delaware and Raritan Canal. Jacksonians had arranged that combination, and Whigs attacked it as a privileged Democratic monopoly because it controlled all transportation routes in the state. In 1835 and 1836, Whigs introduced a number of bills to break the Joint Companies' domination by chartering rival transportation concerns, and Democrats fought those bills just as fiercely as Whigs battled the Democrats' hard-money, anticorporation measures.⁴⁹

Given the ethos of the Jacksonian era, New Jersey Whigs' antimonopoly platform intuitively strikes the modern reader as a wonderfully potent weapon, a can't-miss anti-Democratic missile. In fact, their attack on the Joint Companies, a far more powerful monopoly than the banks that Democrats ritualistically flayed, offended far more voters than it pleased. Since the Camden and Amboy Railroad ran through the same West Jersey counties where Whigs suffered from Hicksite Ouaker defections, the assault further cemented those counties in the Democratic column. More important, in compensation for its monopoly, the Joint Companies made an annual payment to the state that effectively negated any need for state real estate taxes, but that payment would stop as soon as a single state-chartered competitor entered the transportation field. To break up the monopoly as Whigs demanded, in short, would almost inevitably impose a new tax burden on every landowner in the state. Unquestionably, New Jersey's Whigs had a distinctive platform on the state policies salient in state elections, but it was hardly a platform that enthralled most voters. As a result, despite Whigs' success in contests for national offices, they could not break the Democrats' lock on the state legislature, which until 1844 elected all of New Jersey's executive officers. In New Iersey, as in New York and New England, Whig state parties badly needed fresh ammunition.50

An unpopular stand on a specific state economic policy also put Pennsylvania's Whigs at a fatal disadvantage in the October 1836 state elections. Ironically, however, it also proved far more crucial in facilitating the merger between Antimasons and Whigs than Harrison's presidential candidacy, even though northern Whigs ran him primarily in order to secure Pennsylvania's Antimasonic votes. Almost from the moment of the decisive Pennsylvania Antimasonic state convention in December 1835, that tactic had in fact backfired. An exclusivist or purist faction of Antimasons led by Gettysburg's Thaddeus Stevens bitterly protested the convention's choice of Harrison as a sellout to the Whigs. Stevens instead called for a national Antimasonic convention to meet in Philadelphia in May 1836 to make a separate nomination. It was, nonetheless, Stevens who forged a merger between the state parties in the legislative session of 1835–36.

Because of Democratic rifts, the Antimason Joseph Ritner won the governor-ship in 1835, and a coalition of Whigs and Antimasons simultaneously captured overwhelming control of the legislature. In exchange for Whig support for authorization to conduct a legislative investigation of the Masonic Order, which later turned into a fiasco, Stevens obtained Antimasonic support for Whig legislation. The two groups coalesced against the Democrats to pass resolutions that instructed the state's Democratic United States senators to vote against resolutions to expunge the Senate's censure of Jackson and for Clay's bill to distribute federal land revenues to the states.

The Whigs and Antimasons also created a distinctive record on state issues. The coalition reapportioned the state senate in a blatantly partisan manner. More significantly, on a party line vote it passed an omnibus bill that gave a state charter to Biddle's Bank of the United States, whose congressional charter expired in March, in return for a large cash bonus to be used to cut taxes and invest in the state's canal system. In addition, Biddle was required to invest additional Bank funds in various transportation projects around the state. Whig papers proudly boasted of this bill as a magnificent achievement that would aid development in the state and eliminate taxes for years, and they confidently made it the centerpiece of their campaign in 1836. This legislative maneuvering, not Harrison's presidential candidacy, which Stevens so bitterly opposed, was chiefly responsible for bringing Antimasons and Whigs together in a single state party behind a distinctively Whiggish program, a party that, after 1836, Whigs, not Antimasons, dominated.

That accomplishment came at a terrible price, for the coalition's legislative record inextricably linked the state's Whig party to Biddle's monster. Able once again to flog the Bank, the previously disrupted Democrats reunited and trounced the Whigs in the state elections of October 1836. Whereas Whigs and Antimasons together had won 38 of 100 seats in the state assembly in 1834 and 68 in 1835, they captured a pathetic 28 in 1836. One month later, Harrison rolled up almost 49 percent of Pennsylvania's vote, but his luster clearly had not rubbed off on state Whig candidates tarred with rescuing the Bank of the United States.⁵¹

VI

The contrasting fortunes of Whig state parties in slave states where White headed the Whig ticket in 1836 demonstrate even more starkly how important taking distinctive stands on state issues was to the development of competitive and coherent state Whig organizations. In all those states Whigs trumpeted White's southern identity, Van Buren's untrustworthiness on the slavery issue, the northern abolitionist menace, and antipartyism in the presidential race.

As in Mississippi, those were virtually the only issues used in 1835 and 1836 by Alabama's White party and Georgia's State Rights party, neither of which would adopt the Whig label until the late 1830s. White carried Georgia with 52 percent of the vote and lost Alabama with 45 percent, results that accurately prefigured the later strength of the Whig party in the neighboring states. Yet in state elections, or at least state legislative elections in 1835 and 1836, Alabama's proto-Whig party experienced greater success than its Georgia counterpart, even though Georgia's Whig affiliate, the State Rights party, succeeded better than its counterparts in Alabama and Mississippi in building an extensive chain of local, county, and state organizations. Its platform, however, focused exclusively on federal relations between the state and national governments, not on intrastate affairs.⁵² In contrast, while Alabama's heterogeneous White party also lacked a distinctive program for state economic policy by 1836, since its inception in early 1835 it had coupled attacks on Van Buren with attacks on the venality of Democratic conventions and the inherent incompatibility between party dictation and republican self-government. The Democrats' state convention of December 1835 gave an explicit state dimension to their antiparty crusade in 1836, allowing Alabama's proto-Whigs to run better in the state legislative elections of August than White himself did in November.53

Virginia, however, provides the clearest example of the failure of presidential coattails to succor Whigs in southern states. Until 1851, state politics focused on the annual legislative races in May since the legislature, not the electorate, chose the governor. Virginia's incipient Whig party had scored a stunning victory in 1834 when it captured 59 percent of the seats in the lower house of the legislature by campaigning against Jackson's tyranny and blaming him for the depression that still wracked the nation. By the time of the next two elections, the business cycle was on the upswing, as was popular opinion of Jackson. Nor could Whigs fashion a distinctive party platform on state economic affairs, largely because regional conflicts and identities more than partisan affiliation shaped positions on internal improvement projects such as the James and Kanawha Canal. Thus, the Whigs insisted that the preferability of White to Van Buren formed the central issue in both the 1835 and 1836 elections. Yet in 1835, the Whig share of legislative seats fell to 42 percent, and it rose only slightly, to 43 percent, in 1836. Numerous factors undoubtedly contributed to this decline, but neither the popularity of presidential candidates nor a nationally oriented campaign based on the northern menace to slavery could retain the state party in power within Virginia.⁵⁴

In contrast, Whigs carried state elections in Tennessee and North Carolina in 1835 and 1836 because they took distinctive party stands on state issues in addition to pushing White for president. The Tennessee Whig party was launched in 1835 solely on the issue of White's presidential candidacy, and White would rack up a larger share of the vote in his home state than anywhere else. As elsewhere, Tennessee's Whig politicians attempted to make the gubernatorial, congressional, and legislative elections of August 1835 referenda on White and Van Buren. Most Democratic candidates, including three-term incumbent Governor William Carroll, tried to deflect this thrust by remaining mum about the unpopular Van Buren until after the state election was over. Nonetheless, the state election of 1835 did not revolve exclusively around presidential candidates or sectional issues. As Whigs recognized, their candidate, Newton D. Cannon, won the gubernatorial election not because he favored White, but because he rolled up huge margins in East Tennessee by advocating an expansive program of state-financed internal improvements and because some voters regarded Carroll's attempt at an unprecedented fourth consecutive term as illegal and arrogant.55

The magnitude of Cannon's triumph compared quite favorably with that of White a year later. The gubernatorial election of 1835 brought more men to the polls than had ever voted in Tennessee—27,000 more—indeed, than voted in the subsequent presidential contest. Whereas 55.2 percent of the eligible electorate voted in 1836, between 78 and 80 percent did in 1835. Hence, neither the regional appeal of White nor the southern Whig tactic of agitating the slavery issue can be credited for the great jump in turnout. Cannon attracted 8,000 more votes in 1835 than White won in 1836, and if one counts the votes of a dissident Whig gubernatorial candidate who siphoned off a tenth of the 1835 turnout, Whig candidates in 1835 ran 17,000 votes ahead of White. Because their candidate had the imagination to take a distinctive stand on state issues instead of relying on White's coattails, Tennessee's Whigs scored a most impressive victory in the gubernatorial election of 1835, where they faced a far tougher opponent than Van Buren. That race, not the presidential campaign, put the Tennessee Whig party on a firm foundation.⁵⁶

In no slave state outside Kentucky and Maryland, however, did the Whigs secure so solid a base by the end of 1836 as in North Carolina. As elsewhere, the Whig party formed in North Carolina in 1834 as a disparate coalition opposed to executive tyranny and the economic consequences of deposit removal. By the time of the legislative elections in August of that year, the economy had improved and discontent with Jackson had subsided. As a result, the sweeping Democratic victory caused some Whigs to despair that they could not compete in the state unless they had a popular presidential candidate in the field. Certainly North Carolina Whigs bounded onto the White bandwagon in 1835, and by February 1836 the party's first gubernatorial candidate was proclaiming that "Mr. Van Buren is not one of us. He is a Northern man . . . in soul, in principle, and in action."

But the party quickly moved beyond playing on southern fears of Yankees in 1835 by exploiting regional grievances and aspirations within the state, and it artfully linked its position on those state issues to Whig programs in Congress. Inadequate transportation facilities had aborted economic development in the state's western mountain and piedmont regions, as well as in the northeastern corner near Albemarle Sound. Residents there pleaded for the state to finance internal improvements, but they were rebuffed by the relatively prosperous and predominantly Democratic planters from the coastal plain region who enjoyed the natural benefits of navigable rivers. Even though the merchants of eastern towns also clamored for state aid to transportation, the planters, who feared higher taxes, were able to block action since the old constitution of 1776 gave them grossly unfair overrepresentation in the legislature.

To rally this potential coalition of the frustrated, Whigs took the lead in 1835 in voicing the demand for a new constitution to give the western area a more equitable share of legislative seats and for state aid to internal improvements. Whigs alone were not responsible for the revision of the constitution that occurred in 1835, but once it was ratified, they did carve a distinctive position by pushing for state aid to transportation and education in 1836. They also trumpeted Clay's bill for distribution of federal land revenues to the states, which North Carolina's Democrats opposed, as the way the state could pay for the programs Whigs demanded without burdening the state's taxpayers.

As even Democrats admitted, the internal improvements issue helped the Whig candidate, Edward Dudley, defeat the incumbent Democratic Governor Richard D. Spaight in August 1836 with 53.6 percent of the vote. "The impression has been studiously created that Gov. Spaight is the implacable opponent of Internal Improvement in every shape," lamented the New Bern Sentinel after the election. "On the other hand, General Dudley has been held up as a sort of patron of the Internal Improvement policy. . . . This very ground has assisted to elect him as much as any other." In addition, Whigs carried the state senate by a majority of two and came within two seats of capturing the house. The party ran especially well in the western piedmont and mountain areas and in eastern towns, all places that wanted improvements. Once the legislature met in the fall of 1836, moreover, Whig legislators almost invariably voted in larger proportions for state aid to transportation projects than did Democrats, regardless of what region they represented, although on some bills regional conflict was sharper than party conflict. 58

The importance of this stand on internal improvements to Whig fortunes in North Carolina became clear three months later in the presidential election. Between August and November the Whig press dropped that issue and promoted White almost exclusively on the sectional grounds of protecting slavery from the abolitionist menace. Whereas the August gubernatorial election drew out 67 percent of potential voters, only 53 percent turned out in November. Whereas Dudley secured 53.6 percent of the vote, White garnered only 49 percent. The lesson was evident. The bigger the turnout in North Carolina, the better the Whigs' chances. They could draw out a much larger vote with a program aimed at the specific needs of the state's voters than with a sectional appeal for the defense of slavery.

Throughout Dixie the returns from state elections in 1835 and 1836 exposed the limits of what William J. Cooper, Jr., has termed "the politics of slavery." Cooper marshals massive evidence to demonstrate that Whigs emphasized the abolitionist threat to slavery and the probable unreliability of Van Buren in the campaign for White. Throughout the life of the second party system in the South, he shows further, Whigs and Democrats jockeyed with each other in elections for national office to prove their own party a better defender of the South's peculiar institution than the opponent. ⁵⁹ Yet in 1835 and 1836 this strategy by itself neither caused the great increase in southern voter turnout since 1832 nor brought the Whigs victory in state elections. Because of a widespread consensus among white Southerners, slaveholders and nonslaveholders alike, that slavery must be protected and sudden abolition prevented, this particular tack simply had little relevance to elections for internal state offices. To win them, Whigs could not depend on presidential coattails or regional patriotism alone. They had to find advantageous positions on relevant state issues.

Although the trend in the South was less ambiguous than that in the North, the races for state office in 1835 and 1836 indicated that Whigs could not win control of state governments by pointing to popular presidential candidates alone. Rather, they did best where they found a clear and advantageous Whig position on state concerns, where they demonstrated that the Whig party was relevant to the needs and grievances of voters at the state level. Since Whigs had failed to do this in most places, their condition in the states by the end of 1836 was just as precarious as it was nationally. To the extent that they had relied on the presidential campaign to breathe life into their party, they now faced four lean years without that sustenance. Yet since they had failed to capture control of either Congress or the presidency, securing a competitive position in state elections became all the more vital to the future health of the party.

At the close of 1836, Whigs must have reviewed the events of the past four years with mixed emotions. They had taken significant steps toward establishing a new and much more competitive party in presidential elections than its predecessor. Still, the Democrats had installed Andrew Jackson's personal choice in the White House, and to add salt to that terrible wound, in January 1837 they would finally expunge the Whigs' censure of Jackson from the Senate journal. Understandably, therefore, Whigs could look forward to their triumphant tormentor's departure from the presidency on March 4, 1837.

Yet once Jackson retired, the party would lose the impetus that had launched it and the cement that had held it together since 1834. Even with Jackson in office, the crusade against executive tyranny had not been enough to bring the Whigs to power in the nation or the states, and his impending departure from the scene almost ensured that they would have to look elsewhere to buttress their appeal. All Whigs shared antipathy to Martin Van Buren, but it was not certain that Van Buren's actual course in office would galvanize the Whigs to action the way fearful anticipations of that course had. Nor was it clear that new voters attracted to the Whig party by the regional appeal of White and Harrison would remain in it if the Whigs ever did unite on a single candidate. The embryonic Whig party was still so new that many voters, especially those who had not been National Republicans and those who despised the notion of party itself, had not yet developed any institutional loyalty to it. Even if the Whigs could rally those voters again in the next presidential campaign, finally, they could not rely on that hope to help them in state and congressional elections prior to 1840.

Despite the giant strides forward, in sum, the Whigs continued to face the same task that had confronted National Republican leaders in 1833. They had to find some formula that would simultaneously hold the coalition together, reinforce the commitment of recent converts, and broaden it still further. Recent experience demonstrated that they could best accomplish this task by taking clear and advantageous stands on concrete issues. At the end of 1836, however, it was impossible to tell what those issues might be.

"We Have Many Recruits in Our Ranks from the Pressure of the Times"

CAN I OFFER "any consolation to you for the future, as to public affairs?" Henry Clay glumly wrote a friend three days after Martin Van Buren's inauguration. "I lament to say not much." To Clay the new Whig party seemed as ineffectual and divided as the various anti-Jackson elements had been at the beginning of 1833. Unlike some Whigs in Washington, he could entertain no hope of capturing a majority in the next House of Representatives, for Whigs lacked "union as to the ultimate object."

Clay and other Whigs had good reason to despair. They had won only twofifths of the House seats filled in 1836, and the defeat or forced resignation of party founders like John Tyler and Willie P. Mangum had depleted their Senate strength. Meanwhile, the party had barely begun to organize in the West and Southwest, and in many eastern states it had been thrust into the minority.

Worse, no improvement seemed likely, for no issue appeared ripe for exploitation. Resistance to executive tyranny had given the new party an identity but not a victory. Pennsylvania Whigs' connection with Biddle's Bank had proved to be political poison. The recent attempt in the winter of 1837 to make an issue of Jackson's Specie Circular had floundered when Jackson vetoed a Whig bill altering the system. Now Whigs could do nothing until Congress met again in December. Worst of all, congressional Democrats had defeated Clay's promising proposal to distribute federal land revenues to the states. Instead, in June 1836 bipartisan majorities had passed a Deposit Act that contained a different form of distribution.

Aimed primarily at regulating Jackson's deposit banking system, the Deposit Act also provided that surplus government funds in excess of $5 million should be deposited with state governments, rather than private banks, in proportion to the states' population. These deposits, one-year interest-free loans rather than permanent grants of aid, were to be made in four equal installments at three-month intervals, beginning January 1, 1837. Clay, in contrast, had called for continuing annual grants of land revenues to the states, not a one-year loan. The Deposit Act not only buried Clay's proposal for the immediate future, but also stripped Whigs of their claim to be the sole champions of federal aid to the states, for Democrats seized equal credit for the law.²

With old issues gone, Whigs would have to sustain their new party as an anti-Van Buren venture. But the new president's intentions were unclear. He promised in his inaugural address to continue his predecessor's policies, and Whig politicos had sadly learned that most voters tolerated those policies more easily than they did. While the president's course "will not be such as you & I are likely to approve," Webster guessed, the "Country" might find it "acceptable."

Within nine weeks of Van Buren's accession to power, however, an economic collapse swept away the fog that had shrouded the Whigs' political future. On May 10, 1837, banks in New York City suspended specie payments. Financial panic immediately seized the country as banks elsewhere followed suit, credit disappeared, loans were called, and prices plummeted. That panic began a cycle of recession, recovery, and depression that became the dominant force shaping American politics between 1837 and 1844. Those economic fluctuations spawned a political agenda for Whigs and Democrats to battle over in national and state arenas. They allowed Whigs to add support for programs to spur growth and economic recovery to their attacks on antirepublican tyranny. Since governments' response to economic hardship heightened people's political interest, Whigs' chances for broadening their electoral base brightened.

More important, the economic tailspin that began in 1837 ensured that the Whig party would endure. It was not foreordained in 1834 that the Whig party would for twenty years remain the primary political vehicle for almost all the Democrats' foes. Since it was founded primarily to rescue the government from Democratic presidents, it might well have disintegrated after it failed to accomplish that task in 1836, to be replaced by a new party based on different principles. That was exactly what Clay feared, in view of the party's divided and aimless condition at the beginning of 1837.

Had events focused attention on slavery and abolitionism, for example, the party's 1836 problems might have become insurmountable. Abolitionists' continued petitions to Congress, calling for an end to slavery in the District of Columbia, and the proslavery Republic of Texas' appeal for admission to the United States portended sectionally divisive issues that could fundamentally alter political alignments.

The economic crisis in the spring of 1837 channeled political development in a different direction. However shaky its condition, the Whig party was in place to benefit from discontent with the "in" Democratic regime engendered by depression. The slump allowed Whigs to fashion a distinctive national and state program of governmental economic policy, a program that united its northern and southern wings, reinforced the partisan identity of Whig voters, and massively extended that partisan allegiance to new voters. Once created, that partisan identity became a prism through which Whig voters viewed sectional issues themselves. All in all, the economic disaster that followed Jackson's departure from office was the pivotal episode in the growth of the Whig party.⁴

The financial panic that began in May 1837 stunningly terminated a seemingly endless and dizzying upward economic spiral. Between the summer of 1834 and the end of 1836, high foreign demand for key export crops like cotton, ample foreign credit for American merchants, and significant infusions of foreign gold and silver doubled the nation's money supply and propelled prices to unprecedented levels, thus ensuring profits to the vast majority of Americans who produced goods for sale.⁵ Easy credit and burgeoning money supplies spawned a boom mentality. Private investors started new businesses. State governments frantically launched internal improvement projects such as canals and railroads that they hoped would match the spectacular success of New York's Erie Canal.

The most apparent aspect of the frenzy, however, was massive purchasing of western land. Government land sales exploded from $6 million in 1834 to $16 million in 1835 and $25 million in 1836. As crop prices rose, farmers and planters sought more land so that they could plant more acres to cash in on the bonanza, and they recklessly took out readily available bank loans to do it. But most of those government sales reflected sheer speculation by people who hoped to resell land at a profit to the settlers who were swarming into the North and Southwest in the 1830s.6

Dazzled by present prosperity and the prospects for even more in the future, most Americans had ignored warning cries about the vulnerabilities of this economic structure. Both Whig and Democratic spokesmen had long predicted some kind of collapse, and both had ready explanations when it came. Jackson and his antibank advisors, for example, had cringed at the expansion of paper money and banking that followed the removal of deposits. As a result, they had moved toward a hard-money standard in order to restrain the economy and to develop a new Democratic issue to substitute for their victorious war against the Bank. The famous Specie Circular of July 1836 specifically aimed at slowing the land boom and "the ruinous extension of bank issues and credits." And in April 1837, Van Buren defended that Circular as "the only measure that could save the country."

When the panic broke, Democrats quickly condemned bankers for inciting a corrupting speculative spirit that was bound to produce a crash. Private economic actors, not Democratic policies, they insisted, were responsible. Jackson and other Democrats, these spokesmen asserted, had sought to mitigate the damage by returning the country to a hard-money standard. Now, only that standard could cure the disastrous consequences of excessive credit, speculation, overtrading, and paper money.

Whigs, in contrast, blamed Jackson and Van Buren for causing the panic. Since the inception of their party, Whigs had warned that by destroying the Bank of the United States, Jackson had jettisoned the American financial system's stabilizing anchor. Without Biddle's institution to restrain other banks, they charged, currency would lose its uniform value, bank notes would no longer be accepted at face value, and chaos would ensue. Furthermore, Jackson, by placing federal deposits in state banks, first encouraged the overextension of the banking system and then compounded the problem by undermining public faith in the value of bank notes with executive orders banning government use of small notes and the Specie Circular. The Specie Circular further aggravated that pressure by forcing the movement of specie from eastern banks to the West, where the land markets were located. Jackson, in sum, had spurred the expansion of notes beyond the system's capacity to redeem them, and then he had sabotaged confidence in those notes so that people would try to redeem them. To account for the panic and the subsequent economic hardship, Whigs jeered, one need look no further than Democratic incompetence.

Both Whig and Democratic explanations contained elements of truth. Yet external pressure on the economy, not the domestic activities partisans pointed to, mainly caused the collapse. In the summer and fall of 1836, the Bank of England, fearing a drain of its own specie reserves, raised its interest rates and curtailed credit to British firms dealing in the American trade. English merchants, in turn, cut off credit to the United States and began to demand payment of outstanding accounts in bills drawn on England or in specie. That contraction put pressure on American commercial centers, where interest rates on loans rose to prohibitive levels.

Simultaneously, restricted credit in England caused the price of American cotton to plummet in early 1837, for English dealers could no longer get the money to pay high prices for it. Falling cotton prices meant that American merchants who anticipated selling cotton at higher levels faced disastrous losses. Consequently, the value of bills of exchange based on cotton in the United States dropped precipitously. That decline was catastrophic, for the entire American commercial network was largely based on commercial paper secured by cotton exports. Mercantile houses holding those bills as assets found themselves with uncollectible debts and went bankrupt. Even before May 1837, a number of prominent merchants, cotton factors, and brokers with assets totaling $60 million went under. Other merchants who had anticipated paying off outstanding debts to English creditors with the proceeds of cotton sales now needed specie to meet their obligations.⁸

Distress among merchants prior to May menaced bank solvency in two ways. Banks that had made loans to failed firms lost potential assets they needed to cover their own liabilities—their bank notes and customer deposits. Demand from merchants for specie to ship abroad further threatened their specie reserves. To forestall that drain, New York's banks suspended specie payments on May 10, and they were closely followed by banks in New Orleans and other commercial centers. The banks, that is, announced that they would no longer redeem their notes or their deposits at par in specie.

The panic therefore represented a defensive gesture by banks in anticipation of runs on their specie deposits; it did not result from the actual depletion of specie resources. The amount of specie in the country actually increased by 20 percent during 1837. But the banks' action helped decrease the total money supply of bank notes and specie by 16 percent. Once banks suspended specie payments, people no longer would accept bank notes or checks as payment for goods, services, or debts. Bank notes and checks were not legal tender. They were promises to pay the bearer legal tender, that is, specie, promises on which the banks had now reneged. Since banks refused to release specie, the amount of usable currency shrank, and prices sank accordingly.

The ensuing financial panic had important ramifications far beyond banking. Manufacturers unable to sell goods profitably or to secure loans to make up for losses had to close their doors, thus shutting out their workers. Farmers, if they could find credit to move goods to market, had to sell their crops at sharply lower prices than they had anticipated. Often the price received could not cover bank loans they had previously contracted to tide them over until the crop came in or to finance additional land purchases. Nor could they sell land to meet their debts, for if the Specie Circular had slowed land sales, bank suspension slammed them to a halt.¹⁰

The bank suspension of May 1837 began a bewildering chain of economic fluctuations. By the end of that month, wholesale prices had plunged 22 percent from their high in February, and they remained low for over a year. In May 1838, however, New York's banks resumed specie payments, largely because they received new specie from the Bank of England. Coordinated by Nicholas Biddle, whose Bank of the United States of Pennsylvania still had huge assets, bankers from a number of other states agreed to resume specie payments simultaneously on August 13, 1838. By September 1838 most places were well on the way to recovery, and prices remained at relatively high levels for a year. In October 1839, however, another English contraction of credit forced another American suspension of specie payments and another drop in prices. This time, no rapid recovery followed. Prices continued to fall throughout 1840, 1841, 1842, 1843, and 1844. In July 1840, for example, the general wholesale price level was fully 38 percent below its flush time peak in February 1837, and four years later it was 45 percent below that level. Meanwhile, the nation's money supply shrank from a peak of $276 million in 1836 to $215 million in 1839, $186 million in 1840, and $158 million in 1842 11

The economic roller coaster had profound political ramifications. Whigs gleefully pronounced the plunge a vindication of their previous warnings, declared Jackson's policies culpable, and began agitating even in 1837 for a new national bank that could bring stability and recovery. Complaining that Whigs were trying "to make the distress of the country subservient to party politics," Democrats stridently denied Democratic responsibility and attributed the collapse instead to overbanking and overspeculation that had fed on an excess of paper money and banking credit. Echoing the hard-money line that Jackson had tried to make official Democratic policy during his last years in office, Democratic newspapers began to insist in the spring of 1837 that to right the economy, the government must outlaw rag currency. Honest citizens would never be safe from wrenching economic oscillations until the bankers' control of currency was ended by prohibiting or restricting the privilege of note issue.¹²

In 1837 Whigs clearly had the better political argument. As the "out" party nationally and in most states, they benefited from voters' inclination to throw the "ins" out during hard times. Both disillusioned Democrats and first-time voters seeking economic recovery flocked to the Whig camp. Starting in the August 1837 state elections and continuing into the fall of 1837 and the spring of 1838, Whigs made dramatic gains almost everywhere. As William Henry Harrison would observe in early 1840, "We have many recruits in our ranks from the pressure of the times."

Of far more long-lasting importance in shaping voter behavior than the panic itself, however, were the sharply contrasting policies Democrats and Whigs advocated to deal with it. In 1837, for the first time, the two parties articulated clear, coherent, and conflicting philosophies about the proper role of both state and national governments in the economy and framed concrete legislative programs reflecting those philosophies. While stalemate between the parties from 1837 to 1840 prevented Congress from enacting much legislation that incorporated these divergent orientations, state governments enacted both Whig and Democratic laws dealing with the economy, allowing voters to judge not just what parties said, but what they did.

President Martin Van Buren took the lead in defining the Democrats' response to the panic. According to the Deposit Act of 1836, no bank that suspended specie payments could retain government funds; yet eighty-two of the eighty-eight deposit banks defaulted during the crisis. Van Buren had to determine what to do with new government revenues and how to withdraw existing deposits from state banks without aggravating the crisis. In addition, a dramatic decline in tariff collections caused by sharply reduced imports and the cessation of land sales reduced government revenue to a fraction of its former level. The government's problem abruptly changed from disposing of a surplus to operating with a deficit. To meet these and other demands, Van Buren at the end of May called for a special session of Congress to assemble in September.¹⁴

During the summer, Van Buren agonized about what to do. On the one hand, he knew that the drive toward hard money had antagonized probanking elements in the party, including some of his closest Albany associates. These powerful Democrats wanted ample credit for economic growth. On the other hand, he recognized that the panic, by rekindling hostility toward paper money and privilege, had greatly strengthened the party's antibanking wing.

Throwing his support to the larger of the party's rival factions, Van Buren took a moderate antibanking position in his message to the special session in September. Events then rapidly forced him even further toward the hard-money camp. He called on Congress first to allow merchants to defer tariff payments, to give deposit banks time to return government funds, to postpone the government's payment on the fourth installment of the rapidly dwindling surplus, and to authorize an issue of Treasury notes to meet government expenses. The Democratic majority in both houses quickly passed those measures over Whig resistance.

Van Buren's subsequent plan for handling government funds stirred intense controversy. He called for the permanent divorce of federal monies from private banks by depositing them instead in a network of government vaults or subtreasuries around the country to be called the Independent Treasury system. He recommended (but did not require) that the federal government refuse to accept notes from banks that had suspended specie payments. He wanted the government to deal in hard money as much as possible. As soon as Congress began debate on the proposal, Calhoun successfully amended the bill in the Senate to require the government to deal exclusively in specie. From that point in the fall of 1837 until the Independent Treasury bill passed in the summer of 1840, hard money was an integral part of the measure.

Van Buren's message emphasized his swing to an antibanking position. Denouncing "corporate immunities," he urged state governments to restrict the privileges of banks they chartered. Thus, he provided a concrete agenda for Democrats in state legislatures as well as in Congress. Throwing the gauntlet down to the Whigs, he explicitly rejected their plea for a new national bank since voters had spurned it as "a concentration of power dangerous to their liberties." Such an institution, he went on, represented "the constant desire among some of our citizens to enlarge the powers of the Government and extend its control to subjects with which it should not interfere."

Repeatedly in the message, Van Buren stressed the doctrine of a negative state that became Democratic dogma for the remainder of the nineteenth century. "The less government interferes with private pursuits the better for the general prosperity." Government intervention into the economy, whether by Congress or state legislatures, inevitably produced justified "complaints of neglect, partiality, injustice, and oppression." Any positive government action created privilege. Government could best preserve equal rights by doing nothing. Ignoring his own call for relief to importers and deposit bankers, Van Buren ringingly proclaimed that government "was not intended to confer special privileges on individuals or any classes of them, to create systems of agriculture, manufactures, or trade, or engage in them either separately or in connection with individual citizens." Demands for relief to help people ruined by the depression should be rejected, for it was not government's "legitimate object to make men rich or to repair by direct grants of public money or legislation in favor of particular pursuits losses not incurred in the public service." Van Buren, in sum, did not simply call for a divorce of government funds from private banks. He called on government to stop aid to economic growth altogether.15

Van Buren's message set the tone for Democrats across the nation, and as successive waves of bank suspensions swept the country again in 1839 and 1841, the Democrats' commitment to hard money, antibanking, anticorporation, and negative government doctrines intensified. From Maine to Mississippi and Missouri, Democrats, apparently untroubled by the blatant inconsistency with their own demands for minimal government interference "with private pursuits," advocated and in legislatures voted for policies to force banks to resume specie payments or forfeit their charters, to increase specie ratios or ban paper bank notes altogether, to strip corporate stockholders of their privilege of limited liability, to block the chartering of new corporations, and to end state subsidies for canals, turnpikes, and railroads. When the renewal of hard times in late 1839 threatened the ability of a number of states to meet annual interest payments on bonds they had issued to create state-run banks or to fund internal improvements, most Democrats demanded the repudiation of those bonds rather than tax increases to fund them. In Congress, meanwhile, Democrats pushed for enactment of the Independent Treasury, denounced Whig proposals to raise the tariff as an attempt to aid manufacturing monopolists, and adamantly opposed federal subsidies to state governments or internal improvements.

Everywhere Democrats defended this antibusiness stance in language similar to Van Buren's. Paper money, they fulminated, not only produced speculation and instability; it was the currency of parasitic and aristocratic bankers who used it to cheat honest farmers and mechanics out of their hard-won earnings by refusing to redeem their notes. Bankers must be stripped of their control over the money supply by substituting the people's money—government-minted coins—for the bankers' rags. This "Money Power" flagrantly menaced republicanism. Its gross privileges violated equal rights, and its offer of credit in the form of loans only caused men to surrender their freedom and become slaves by going into debt. Peter D. Vroom aptly summarized this part of the Democratic credo in a speech to the New Jersey constitutional convention in 1844. "If there is any danger to be feared in a republican government, it is the danger of associated wealth, with special privileges, and without personal liability. It is the aristocracy of wealth we have to fear, and that is the only aristocracy from which danger is to be apprehended."¹⁷

Since government created these privileges through its positive actions, government should do as little as possible. If government acted at all, Democrats asserted, it should be the government closest to the people—the states before the nation, localities before the states—and the purpose of such action should simply be to guarantee equal rights and individual freedom. As the Democratic Review put it in 1838, ''The democratic creed may be summed up in this brief formula. As little government as possible; that little emanating from, and controlled by, the people; and uniform in its application to all.'' Only by attacking privilege and protecting equal rights could government advance the general welfare. ''By general good,'' declared a Vermont Democrat in 1839, ''I do not mean the promotion of riches, splendor, and power in the nation, but the equal protection of every citizen in his rights.''¹⁸

Whigs, in diametric contrast, believed government must promote prosperity. Especially in hard times, government must take positive action to stimulate economic recovery. The electorate, Whigs also believed, would respond positively to such a message. Attacking first Van Buren's proposals to Congress as hard-hearted, they broadened that appeal into a full-fledged defense of positive government. Seizing on the commonwealth tradition of eighteenth-century republicanism, they argued that government as the agent of the people had an obligation to help them.

The proposed Independent Treasury provided Whigs with a concrete target to run against in congressional elections from 1837 to 1840; after the bill passed in July 1840, Whigs immediately campaigned for its repeal. By denouncing Van Buren's efforts to ram his proposal through Congress as executive tyranny, they reinforced the party's original role as a champion of liberty against despotism. They stressed even more the plan's pernicious economic consequences. Removing government money from private banks, they charged, would shrink the reserves on which notes and loans were based, further depress the money supply, and thereby aggravate price deflation. Prices needed to be lifted, not driven down still further, argued Whigs. To promote recovery, the country needed an ample and sound currency, one that would expand rather than diminish credit and confidence. The Democrats' prescription of hard money and restrictions on banks was exactly the wrong medicine. The private banking system must be nourished, not starved, to restore economic health.

Like Democrats, Whigs backed up their rhetoric with action. With remarkable cohesion during the special session of 1837 and regular sessions of Congress thereafter, they voted against every Van Buren recommendation that entailed a retreat by government from its role as partner to, and abettor of, private economic interests. They opposed the Independent Treasury; they voted against postponement of the final deposit payment to the states; they railed against authorization of Treasury notes. ¹⁹ Instead of printing its own money as an alternative to bank notes, Whigs cried, the government should remain intimately involved with banks.

This desire was shared by a number of Democrats who called themselves Conservatives, who were appalled by the administration's willingness to shirk responsibility for the economy, and who were infuriated by Van Buren's attempt to dictate party policy. In the summer of 1837, before the special session met, the Conservatives established their own newspaper in Washington called the Madisonian. While their foremost spokesmen were Senators Nathaniel P. Tallmadge of New York and William C. Rives of Virginia, Conservative Democrats actually proved more decisive in the House, where party strength was more closely balanced. Together with the Whigs, the Conservatives blocked passage of the Independent Treasury bill for three years.

Van Buren's Independent Treasury proposal thus provoked a realignment at the leadership level. Calhoun and his most devoted acolytes in southern states now rejoined the Democratic party to help the administration secure its passage. The more numerous Conservatives, who were especially strong in New York and Virginia, became potential recruits for the Whigs. Although Conservatives and Whigs disagreed about the desirability of a new national bank, their attitudes toward executive tyranny, the demerits of the Independent Treasury, and the necessity of substantial banking credit were congruent. From 1837 to 1840, Whig leaders would woo Conservatives, and by the time of the presidential election most Conservatives had shifted permanently to the Whig camp.²⁰

While the Democratic push for the Independent Treasury dominated the special session, by 1838 and 1839 the parties were battling over other issues as well. Whigs revived and Democrats opposed plans to redistribute federal land revenues to the states. Some Whigs also resurrected the tariff issue, which had been dormant since passage of the Compromise Act in 1833. That act's provisions scheduled the most substantial cuts in duties for 1841 and 1842. Whigs contended that manufacturing and government deficits required an increase in rates rather than the impending reductions. Democrats opposed this proposal, just as they did Whig attempts to relieve ruined businessmen through a national bankruptcy law.

While action stalled in Congress, partisan battles shifted to state legislatures, which traditionally had intervened more actively in the private economic sector than had Congress. Almost all states required banks that suspended specie payments to forfeit their charters. While probanking Democrats initially blocked the implementation of those laws, particularly in New York, Virginia, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, the increasingly disciplined and cohesive parties fought over the forfeitures of charters, over the date by which banks would be forced to resume specie payments to avoid forfeiture, over new charters for banks and other corporations, over stockholder liability, over how much specie banks would have to keep in reserve, and over bans on bank notes. Consistently Whigs took the procorporation, probanking, and pro-paper-money side both in their votes and in their rhetoric, while over time more and more Democrats clustered on the opposite side.

These contrasting partisan perspectives on governmental activism also engendered conflicts over social legislation. To a far greater degree than Democrats, Whigs backed state intervention to regulate social behavior: temperance legislation, Sunday blue laws, and the creation of state-run public school systems. Democrats denounced such legislation as intolerable infringements on individual freedom, and although they did not oppose education, they feared that state-supported schools would compel increased state taxation and threaten local supervision of schools.²¹ Increasingly, Democrats portrayed Whigs as bigoted and self-righteous religious fanatics intent on imposing their ethical values on others. Whigs retorted that Democrats were immoral deadbeats or dangerous radicals bent on destroying the very fabric of society—property, morality, education, and the rule of law. "Elements of that party," the American Review said of Democrats in 1844, support every "dangerously radical opinion, [every] specious, delusive theory, on social, political, or moral points."

Primarily, however, Whig rhetoric focused on the economy and the need for government to get the country moving again. Whig politicians, editors, and pamphleteers articulated a coherent and sophisticated philosophy of the positive state that underlay the position they took in battles over specific policies in Congress and state legislatures. They derided Democratic do-nothingism as niggardly, selfish, and utterly inadequate in a depression. According to Whigs, Van Buren and his cold-hearted Democratic cronies were calling for the government to save itself while abandoning the rest of the population to rot in the decay of depression. As Calvin Colton argued in his 1840 campaign pamphlet The Crisis of the Country, "The maxim of Mr. Van Buren, 'Let the people take care of themselves, and the Government take care of themselves,' is as destructive as it is fallacious. . . . The appropriate function of Government is a parental care of the people."²³

Ringing changes on the principle of beneficent government to which Whigs remained committed for the remainder of their party's existence, Whigs contended that the public welfare or commonweal included far more than equal rights. Government, particularly during a depression, had an obligation to promote economic recovery. Even in good times, argued Whigs, private capital was too small and fragmented to finance economic development. As the agent of the people, the national government therefore should supply that capital, either directly or indirectly. It should subsidize expensive transportation projects or transfer its funds to the states so that they could do it. It should deposit government funds in banks, preferably a new national bank, so that banks could expand money and credit. It should provide tariff protection for American manufacturers to increase their attractiveness to private investors. Meanwhile state governments should provide liberal terms to corporations—especially limited liability for stockholders—to lure capital to them.

According to the Whig analysis, in short, the economy could not grow if it remained atomized and fragmented. Prosperity required economic institutions like banks, manufacturing firms, or railroad corporations that could pool capital and thus accomplish tasks beyond the capacity of individual actors. Government's role was to facilitate the creation of such institutions.

This program, Whigs repeatedly retorted to Democrats, hardly violated equal rights by bestowing privileges on the rich, as Democrats charged. Everyone suffered during hard times, and government as the agent of the people must help them. Their measures would democratize wealth and equalize opportunity. Tariff protection for manufacturers would mean jobs for the unemployed at higher wages than were possible if manufacturers had to compete with cheap goods turned out by the pauper labor of Europe. Limited stockholder liability ensured that less wealthy individuals, no less than the rich, could own businesses. Banking credit, far from enslaving men to debt, as Democrats charged, would open opportunity to all. The economic growth and diversification that would result from Whig programs, they promised, would enhance what the young Illinois Whig Abraham Lincoln called the "right to rise" by increasing individuals' opportunities for upward economic mobility from a dependent to an independent economic status.²⁴

"The Whig party is devoted to progress, but it does not seek to destroy," summarized the New York Whigs' legislative address in 1844. "It seeks to establish perfect equality of political rights; but it levels upward, not downwards, by education and benignant legislation, not by subverting established laws and institutions. It is the party of law, of order, of enterprise, of improvement, of beneficence, of hope, and of humanity." "The Whig party have [sic] always been distinguished from their [sic] opponents, by the attribution of a beneficent and protective power to government," echoed the American Review at the end of the 1840s. Precisely because Whigs still adhered to that commonwealth tradition of beneficial government, "they assert for themselves the name of 'republicans.'"

No single document captures the ideological chasm that opened between the rival parties after 1837 so perceptively as Horace Greeley's best 1845 editorial. "The Whig party is the champion of general CONCORD or united interests, and thrives upon these," Greeley contended. The Democratic ("Loco Foco") party "is the party of DISCORD, or divided, repugnant, hostile interests and is prospered by whatever makes the separation of interests and classes more broad and palpable." So too, "'THE COMMONWEALTH' is the term best expressing the Whig idea of a State or Nation, and our philosophy regards a Government with hope and confidence, as an agency of the community through which vast and beneficent ends may be accomplished." In contrast, "Loco Focoism regards Government (not its offices) with distrust and aversion, as an agency mainly of corruption, oppression, and robbery."

In sum, even when Whigs added positive promotion of economic growth to their negative opposition to executive tyranny, they continued to present themselves as paladins of republicanism, just as did the Democrats by fighting for equal rights and freedom. The depression-induced economic agenda vastly broadened the debate between the parties after 1837, but it did not replace the core of that debate. The central argument remained which party could better preserve, protect, and perpetuate republican liberty, equality, and self-government.

Had the Panic of 1837 done no more than clarify the differences in the parties' economic programs and orientation toward government, it would have benefited the Whigs. Hard times gave credibility and urgency to the case Whigs made. But Whigs—and Democrats—did more than talk and write. They voted in Congress and state legislatures in accordance with their divergent views and thus established records for voters to judge. Internal party cohesion and interparty conflict, which had been high in Congress during 1836, rose even higher in the next two Congresses, 27 but the change in roll-call votes in state legislatures was especially dramatic. In virtually every state of the nation, partisan conflict became sharper after the Panic of 1837 than it had been before. In some states, partisan fighting increased immediately in the first session that met after the panic broke out; in others, there was a delay until the second stage of the depression hit in 1839. But almost everywhere Whigs and Democrats took distinctly different stands on state policy that were congruent with their positions on national legislation. Since Democratic state legislators prior to 1836 had often flouted the antibanking, anticorporation, antidevelopment line Democrats took in Congress, this change meant that there was a marked increase in the intensity and clarity of interparty conflict on roll-call votes after the panic (Table 4).

Ш

The economic oscillations between 1837 and 1840 and the political developments they provoked—the articulation of rival programs, the intensification of partisan combat over concrete policy options in Congress and state legislatures, and the realignment of Calhounites and Conservatives—all had a profound impact on Whig fortunes in the state and congressional elections of 1837, 1838, 1839, and 1840. In these so-called off-year elections—and most of the state and congressional elections even in 1840 were held months before the presidential poll in November—Whigs developed the momentum to win the presidency for the first time.

Although no election is ever a referendum on a single issue, to a remarkable extent Whigs' electoral fortunes followed the fluctuations of the economy. When prices were falling and the economy was depressed, Whigs fared better than they did during the brief recovery from September 1838 to October 1839. Not only their proportion of the popular vote but also the share of seats they won in state legislatures and the House of Representatives, as well as that of governorships, dramatically increased during hard times and fell during the recovery (Tables 5 and 6).²⁸

The condition of the national economy alone, however, did not determine Whig fortunes. There are too many exceptions to the general pattern. In some states, especially in the South, Whigs did better during the recovery of 1838–39 than they did during the panic itself. In others, notably Massachusetts and Mississippi, they lost in November 1839 after the second wave of bank suspensions had started. Elsewhere, they retained much of their popular vote and many of the offices they had won even after the recovery began. Their fortunes, in short, rarely fell as fast or as far during the recovery as they had risen during the initial postpanic slump.

Regional variations from the national economic pattern help account for some of these anomalies. The idiosyncratic movement of cotton prices that were based largely on the size of the crop and on foreign demand, for example, clearly affected southern elections. Although the price of cotton fell sharply in early 1837, by autumn it had not dropped as far as the general wholesale price index. Thus Southerners who sold cotton had higher real incomes in the fall of 1837 than did other Americans. In 1838, however, cotton prices continued to drop throughout the year when other prices were rebounding, thereby cutting the real income of cotton growers. Then cotton prices jumped in 1839 while most other prices peaked in July and were dropping rapidly by the fall, especially after the second wave of bank suspensions in October.²⁹ Accordingly, Whigs did better in Arkansas, Georgia, Mississippi, and North Carolina in 1838 than in 1837 but suffered badly in 1839. In Mississippi, for example, the party's vote and share of offices increased sharply in November 1837, at the depth of the general panic; it improved its position in the legislative races of 1838; and then it lost its legislative majority, the governorship, and both congressional seats in November 1839.30

Even the erratic pattern of cotton prices cannot explain all the variation in southern Whigs' fortunes. The realignment of Calhounites and Conservative Democrats provoked by Van Buren's Independent Treasury plan also played a role. The key in Alabama—and to a lesser extent in Mississippi, Tennessee, and Virginia—was the return of Calhounites to the Democratic party. Calhoun's

^aThis table is based on a number of different sources. The figures for Missouri, New Hampshire, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Virginia are drawn from the tables in Shade and Ershkowitz, "Consensus or Conflict? Political Behavioral in the State Legislatures during the Jacksonian Era." Those figures are sample votes drawn from different years, so blanks indicate that these authors provided no figures, not necessarily that no votes on these issues were held that year. In addition, I have supplemented the votes on banking in Virginia for 1838, 1839, and 1842 with figures from Sharp's chapter on Virginia in The Jacksonians versus the Banks. The figures for Alabama are drawn from the tables for votes in 1839, 1840, and 1841 in Thornton, Politics and Power in a Slave Society, pp. 463-64. The figures for New Jersey are not the same as those listed in the Shade and Ershkowitz article; rather, they are taken from Levine, The Behavior of State Legislative Parties in the Jacksonian Era: New Jersey, 1829-1844, and represent all the votes on those topics, not just samples. Similarly, the figures for Mississippi represent all the votes. They are taken from Table VII in Lucas, "The Period of Political Alchemy: Party in the Mississippi Legislature, 1835-1846," pp. 162-63. The figures for North Carolina are taken from three sources: the samples of five internal improvement votes for 1836 and 1838 in Table 3 of Jeffrey, "Internal Improvements and Political Parties in Antebellum North Carolina, 1836-1860," p. 155; three votes on stockholder liability for 1838 and 1840 in id., "Party Alignment and Realignment in North Carolina, 1836– 1860," (paper presented at the Southern Historical Association's annual meeting, 1979), Table 1; and the figures in Table 8 in Kruman's Parties and Politics in North Carolina, 1836-1865, p. 57. Kruman's tables begin in 1840, so blanks after that date indicate that no votes on a particular subject were taken. The figures that are underlined indicate the first session held following the outbreak of the panic in

It should be noted that these figures differ somewhat from those presented in Table 1 of my previous book, The Political Crisis of the 1850s, pp. 26–27. There are two reasons for this difference. The sources for New Jersey and Mississippi are different from the ones I relied on there. In addition, I have tried to list the votes under the year in which they occurred, not the year in which the legislative session began. Hence, whenever a legislative session started in December and carried over into the winter of the following year, I have listed the votes in the latter year. I did this because I was especially interested in isolating the votes that occurred before and after the outbreak of the panic and because I wanted to list votes in the year in which they might affect the subsequent elections of that year if the session met before the election.

devoted lieutenant, the mammoth Dixon H. Lewis, and his followers defected from the Alabama Whig party in the summer of 1838 and joined the Democrats. Since the extreme state rights wing of the Whig party was especially strong in the black-belt plantation regions that Whigs had hitherto carried, that shift threw the state into Democratic hands in the state elections of August 1838 and 1839. It also gave the Democrats a sufficient cushion in the legislature to withstand a Whig surge in August 1840, when cotton prices again slumped. The loss of the extreme state rights men left the leadership of the Alabama Whig party in the hands of politicians who stressed positive economic programs rather than state rights and who by 1839 were even trumpeting the merits of a new national bank. That loss, however, also left Alabama's Whigs in a minority.³¹

In Virginia, Conservative Democrats far outnumbered Calhounites, and they helped Whigs' improvement in 1838 and 1839. Determined to keep hard-money Democrats in the legislature from ousting Conservatives' preeminent national leader, William C. Rives, from the Senate, Conservatives ran their own legislative candidates in 1838 and 1839, thereby splitting the Democratic vote and allowing Whig gains in those years. Similarly, Conservatives' refusal to support hard-money Democrats for Congress allowed the Whigs to gain three additional seats in 1839 over their total in 1837 and to increase their share of the popular vote from 43.6 percent in 1836 to 48.2 percent in 1839.³²

[&]quot;This table is based on the results of the congressional elections listed in Congressional Quarterly's Guide to U.S. Elections, pp. 568–73, and Kallenbach and Kallenbach (eds.), American State Governors, 1776–1976: Volume I, which lists both the results of gubernatorial elections and the date on which state elections were held.

New York's Conservative leaders like Senator Tallmadge and Congressman John C. Clark also called on their followers to support Whig tickets in 1837 and 1838. Clark won reelection as a Whig the latter year, and Tallmadge, who faced reelection by the legislature chosen that year, swapped an endorsement of the Whig gubernatorial candidate, William H. Seward, for Thurlow Weed's promise to persuade new Whig legislators to support Tallmadge. In 1837 the Democratic vote fell by 26,000 and the Whig vote grew by 17,000 since 1836, so Conservative conversions and abstentions contributed to Whigs' astonishing legislative gains. In 1838, however, 1837's Conservative nonvoters apparently returned to the Democratic column. Whigs added 37,000 more votes to their 1837 total, but Democratic turnout increased by 42,000. Still, the combined Whig increment of 54,000 since 1836 more than tripled Democrats' net gain of 16,000, and Whigs prevailed in New York in 1838 despite the economic recovery.³³

New York's results point to the most arresting feature of the elections held between 1837 and the end of 1840: the extraordinary mobilization of new voters by both Whigs and Democrats. Turnout for both parties usually increased from one election to the next in a leapfrogging pattern of voter recruitment. During the postpanic slump, Whigs outgained Democrats among new voters. They usually retained almost all of those new converts during the recovery and occasionally even increased their totals. That is why Whigs did so much better in congressional, gubernatorial, and legislative elections during the recovery of 1838–39 than during the prepanic boom. Nonetheless, during the brief recovery, Democrats mobilized even more additional supporters to produce their comeback. When prices plunged again after 1839, however, Whigs once again far outpaced Democrats among first-time voters. That surge of additional voters in the spring, summer, and fall of 1840 explains why Whigs won such sweeping victories in the legislative, gubernatorial, and congressional, as well as presidential, elections that year.³⁴

"With the exception of Alabama and Mississippi, these data on the partisan division of state legislatures were made available by the Inter-University Consortium for Political and Social Research. They were originally collected by Walter Dean Burnham. Neither the original source or collectors of the data nor the Consortium bear any responsibility for the analyses or interpretations presented here. For Alabama, I supplemented Burnham's data with information from Niles Register, Volume 51, p. 19, and Thornton, Politics and Power in a Slave Society, pp. 34–36. For Mississippi, I utilized what I consider the more reliable data in Table III of Lucas, "The Period of Political Alchemy: Party in the Mississippi Legislature, 1835–1846." N.A. indicates that Burnham found no data available. Results from periods of economic decline are printed in boldface.

^bIn 1836, the Antimasonic and Whig parties in Vermont still ran separate candidates. Thus the figure given represents the combined total of Antimasonic and Whig seats and helps explain the curious fact that the Whig share of seats in Vermont appears to have declined after the outbreak of the panic.

That mobilization of voters in off-year elections has never been equaled in the subsequent history of American politics. Its extent can be measured against the presidential turnout. Nationally, the proportion of eligible males who cast presidential votes jumped from 57.2 percent in 1836 to 80.2 percent in 1840, and the rate was even higher than the national average in fifteen states.³⁵ That record turnout is normally attributed to the popular enthusiasm roused by the carnival-like Whig presidential campaign that year or to the maturation of partisan organizations that were closely competitive in most states and that turned out every possible voter because every voter was needed. 36

Most of the increased turnout between November 1836 and November 1840, however, had already been achieved in state and congressional elections prior to the latter presidential poll, including earlier elections in 1840 itself. In some states, turnout in subpresidential races even exceeded the total recorded in the 1840 presidential election, and where the Whigs' presidential candidate secured a larger share of the vote than did Whig candidates early in the year, a decline in the Democratic vote by November almost always explained the difference.³⁷ Voters responded to what the Whig party stood for as an institution, not simply to an attractive presidential ticket.

Quite unlike the state and congressional elections prior to the presidential election of 1836, moreover, the off-year contests between 1836 and 1840 forged lasting partisan allegiances. Voters did not move massively back and forth between Whigs and Democrats from one election to the next as economic conditions changed. The state and congressional elections of 1837, 1838, 1839, and 1840, not the hoopla of the Whigs' 1840 presidential campaign, converted hundreds of thousands of previous nonvoters into Whigs and transformed a losing party into a winner.³⁸

The critical question is why the electorate responded to those elections in the fashion it did. The leapfrogging pattern of voter mobilization suggests that Whigs and Democrats attracted voters from different social and economic milieus and that different economic conditions triggered different Whig and Democratic turnouts. Both parties focused their state and congressional campaigns between 1837 and 1840 largely on the alternative programs advocated in Congress and state legislatures. Promising that their policies would produce recovery, Whigs attracted most new voters during hard times, but they also retained those gains when Whig voters credited the postrecession recovery in part to programs Whig state legislators enacted. Democrats, in contrast, brought out new voters during the recovery by railing against Whig programs as violations of equal rights. Voters, in sum, responded to what government did, not simply to economic conditions.³⁹

Demonstrating that connection between policy and popular voting behavior requires one to follow the chronological rhythm of specific policy battles, how parties tried to educate voters about policy alternatives that legislatures had fought over, and the subsequent response of voters in individual states. Since limitations of space (to say nothing of readers' patience) preclude a comprehensive state-by-state survey, a few representative examples must suffice.

New York's Whigs blamed the depression on the Democrats during the 1837 campaign, but they also argued that revival of the economy required more banking credit and expansion of the state's canal system. Even before the outbreak of the panic in May 1837, New York's talented Whig leaders had realized that the Democrats' refusal to allow bank notes of small denomination and to expand the banking system would doom them at the polls. As the state legislative session of 1837 drew to a close in May, Weed exulted to his protegé, Seward, "The whole People are demanding small notes, and they must know who refused them and how it was done. . . . We have the Regency on the hip and must keep them there." Weed's only regret as the November 1837 election approached was that the subtreasury bill had not passed Congress. Then Democrats would have had to suffer the consequences of their national, as well as their state, actions.⁴⁰ Weed clearly believed that voters responded to governance, not just to economic conditions.

He was right. Whigs scored a stunning triumph in the legislative elections, increasing their proportion of seats in the lower house from slightly more than one-fourth to slightly less than four-fifths. Because Democrats retained control of the state senate, the stage was set for an even sharper polarization over state economic policy when the legislature met in 1838. The Whig house pressed for small notes. The Democratic senate rejected the pressure. By the fall, Whigs were confident that they could pillory the intransigent Democratic resistance to small notes once again. Hotis enjoyed more success in expanding the canal and banking systems, as they had promised in the campaign of 1837. Their programs passed the senate with the aid of Conservatives and other probusiness Democrats appalled by the swing of their party's majority to negative state doctrines. The Whigs authorized a new bond issue to finance canal expansion. More important, they passed and Democratic Governor William L. Marcy, who sided with his party's probusiness minority, signed a free banking act in 1838 that encapsulated the Whig philosophy of the positive state.

That law stated that the system of special bank charters, long attacked by Whigs and Antimasons as a Democratic monopoly, should be ended. Instead, individuals wishing to secure bank charters should receive them automatically if they met certain requirements for capitalization. The capital was to consist of federal and state bonds deposited with a comptroller in Albany rather than specie, and the banks were required to have a specie ratio of only 1 to 8 for their note issue. While some Democrats applauded the antimonopoly aspects of this law, they pushed unsuccessfully for higher specie requirements and individual stockholder liability. Even though Governor Marcy and a few Democrats accepted the measure, it was distinctly a Whig bill. Both it and the canal appropriation were defended as Whig achievements by party newspapers and by the address Whig legislators issued at the end of the session. Whigs campaigned on a record, not just on economic conditions.

Whigs considered the contrast between their desire to expand banks and credit and the deflationary potential of the Democrats' Independent Treasury plan, which Van Buren reendorsed in December 1837, an enormous advantage. "We cannot fail to carry the next election," Weed boasted that month. The restoration of prosperity by the summer of 1838 temporarily dissipated that confidence, for economic recovery, some Whig leaders worried, would "lull" their new supporters "to inaction, and endanger us by default." To counteract such apathy, Whig leaders astutely defined the policy alternatives between the parties as sharply as possible. From around the state, requests cascaded on Weed in Albany and on Seward, the Whigs' gubernatorial candidate, to circulate copies of the as-yet unpassed Independent Treasury bill so that voters could actually read its hard-money provisions. "Our new converts 'wish to see the bill," one wrote Seward. "Speeches and Reports should be printed to show up the Loco Foco party. . . . Our opponents are trying to whip back the Conservatives by telling them they are the 'friends' of the Banks & we are not.' Let them be exposed on this tack.'' From Buffalo, the Whig congressional candidate Millard Fillmore asked Seward, "Have you got anything at Auburn showing up the Sub-Treasury in its most odious form that would make a good hand bill?... Do send us anything you have on the Sub-Treasury or Small Bills." ¹⁴²

Improved economic conditions alone, therefore, did not determine the outcome of New York's 1838 election. With concerted effort, Whigs spelled out the precise alternatives on state and national policy options, on what they had already accomplished, on what they still hoped to do in the future, and on what the rival Democrats had done or hoped to do. As a result, turnout soared, with Whigs gaining 37,000 and Democrats 42,000 additional votes since 1837. Two contradictory impulses explain the Democratic gains. Advocacy of the Independent Treasurv and attacks on the Whigs' free banking act and canal bill aroused the party's antibanking majority who had been disappointed in 1837 that Marcy had prevented Democrats from punishing banks for suspending. At the same time, Marcy's signature on the canal and free banking bills appeased Conservatives and other probusiness Democrats who otherwise might have continued to abstain. In any event, Whigs' cumulative increases since 1836 allowed them to retain twothirds of the assembly seats, cut Democrats' senate majority in half, elect twentyone of forty congressmen compared to only ten in 1836, and install Seward in the governor's chair.

The new governor quickly moved to add planks to the successful Whig platform. He called on the Whig legislature in 1839 to issue $4 million worth of bonds a year for the next ten years in order to expand the state's canal system, bonds that he claimed could be paid off from canal tolls. Stunned by the extravagance of Seward's grandiose program of canal enlargement, the Democratic senate refused to enact it, which allowed Whigs to make Democratic control of the senate their chief target in the 1839 campaign. The legislature did repeal the small note ban and thus allowed Whigs to take credit for expanding the currency supply during 1839. On those issues, Whigs captured the state senate for the first time in 1839 and thus gained complete control of the state government.

Total control was a mixed blessing. The minimal specie-reserve requirements of the new free banking act, as well as the strength of the old safety-fund banks. allowed New York's banks to resist the wave of suspensions that swept the rest of the nation in October 1839, and state banking was thus effectively removed from the political agenda. But New York hardly escaped the depression that encompassed the nation in 1840. Despite that slump, Seward pressed ahead with his schemes for state aid for internal improvements. Over sharp Democratic resistance, Whigs authorized bond issues worth almost $6.5 million for canal construction and aid to railroad corporations. Thus, Democrats could savage them for recklessly increasing the state's debt. 43 Worse still, nativistic elements in the party persuaded the legislative majority, over Seward's protests, to pass a voter registration law to restrict immigrant voting in New York City. This law had the predictable result of arousing that metropolis's immigrant community against the Whigs. With a controversial Whig record to run against; with Van Buren, who signed the Independent Treasury bill in July, on the ticket as presidential candidate; and with a new gubernatorial candidate to replace Marcy, Democrats made their strongest showing since 1836. Seward narrowly squeaked by in the gubernatorial election, Whigs' majorities in the legislature were reduced, and Whigs lost the congressional seats in New York City they had won two years earlier.

Banking, canal funding, and state fiscal policy also sparked partisan battles in Pennsylvania between 1837 and 1840. Pennsylvania's probanking Democrats were particularly numerous since the state government relied on loans and stock dividends from banks, rather than on taxes, to fund its expenditures. Because they granted a state charter to Biddle's Bank of the United States, the Whig-Antimasonic coalition had been routed in the legislative elections of 1836, but by blaming the panic on Jacksonian policies, they increased their minority in the house in 1837 and exploited their earlier gerrymander to retain control of the state senate.

In the 1838 legislative session, the Democratic house passed and the Whig senate defeated antibanking measures on party-line voting. Together with conservative Democrats, the Whig-Antimasonic coalition also authorized expansive expenditures for the Main Line canal. During the summer, moreover, Antimasonic Governor Joseph Ritner's administration won popularity by securing funds from Biddle's Bank for immediate repairs on a section of the canal damaged by floods. Biddle, moreover, assured Ritner well in advance that he intended to resume specie payments in August, and to gain partisan credit for what Biddle intended to do anyway, Ritner issued a proclamation in July ordering the state's banks to resume on August 13.

That ploy paid dividends in the October 1838 elections when turnout surpassed that of the 1836 presidential election by 40 percent. Ritner lost his bid for reelection, but he garnered 49 percent of the vote in 1838, whereas he had won in 1835 with 47 percent only because of Democratic divisions. Whigs also picked up an additional congressional seat; together with Antimasons, they retained control of the senate; and that coalition came within a whisker of capturing the lower house. The record Whigs established in the legislature and the executive branch, in short, allowed them to benefit from the recovery, while the banks' resumption and the nomination of a probanking conservative named David R. Porter for governor defused the Democrats' antibanking appeal.

Divided control of the legislature blocked passage of controversial bills in 1839, and Porter continued Ritner's policy of funding state expenditures by selling bonds to Philadelphia banks. That dependency on banks left Whigs more vulnerable to economic fluctuations than Democrats. When the Bank of the United States of Pennsylvania led Philadelphia's banks in suspending again, a few days before the October election, Democrats gleefully revived the crippling charge that the coalition had given Biddle his state charter in 1836. The banks' action thus reinforced antibanking sentiment among Democratic voters, but the price slump was not yet severe enough to help Whigs when Pennsylvanians voted. As a result, Democrats increased their majority in the assembly and finally captured the senate.

Complete control of the state government during 1840, when the depression deepened, proved an albatross for Pennsylvania's Democrats. Democratic majorities in each house passed punitive, but differently worded, antibanking bills, but because of this disagreement and Porter's intervention, neither became law. Instead, Whigs combined with probanking Democrats to give banks more than a year to resume specie payments. At the close of the session, a Democratic address blasted this measure as "passed by the Whigs and antimasons, together with a few apostate democrats" and as meriting "the eternal and everlasting execration of every genuine democrat in the commonwealth." Meanwhile, Porter was forced to borrow more money to meet the state's interest payments on previously issued bonds and to continue work on the canal. Admitting that the state could no longer rely exclusively on bank loans, he asked the legislature to levy taxes on real and personal property for the first time since 1836 in order to pay the interest on the new bond issues.

During the 1840 campaign, therefore, the Whigs enjoyed the best of both worlds. They accused Porter of increasing the state debt by $6 million during his two years in office, a debt that required Democrats to reimpose taxes Whigs had abolished in 1836. At the same time, they cited the Democrats' aborted antibanking bills as examples of radicalism. The Democrats, Whig legislators declared in their address at the close of the session, were "breathing nothing but destruction to the banking and credit systems of the Commonwealth." Posing as protectors of those systems from the "bearded enthusiasts" of the Democratic party, Whigs in October 1840 recaptured both houses of the legislature and gained two additional seats in Congress for a total of thirteen out of twenty-eight. Attacks on the recently passed Independent Treasury Act and the presidential campaign helped this resurgence, but Whigs had also carved a winning platform on state issues. 45

In New Jersey, Ohio, Connecticut, New Hampshire, Alabama, Louisiana, Virginia, and Mississippi, the same chronological rhythm between legislative action and subsequent elections appeared. Democrats passed or attempted to enact antibanking and hard-money legislation. Whigs campaigned against those laws, won legislative majorities, and then repealed the laws and often expanded banking credit instead. Democrats, denouncing Whig actions and posing as bank reformers, then often won again in 1838 or 1839. The battle between Mississippi's hard-money Democratic Governor Alexander G. McNutt and Whig legislators was especially ferocious, but virtually everywhere, Democrats' antibanking initiatives in 1839 or early 1840 cost them dearly in the state elections of 1840 when the economy once again turned sour.⁴⁶

Antipodal positions on banking did not develop so quickly in Georgia and Tennessee or in Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan, largely because the Democrats had been deeply involved in creating the dominant banking systems there. Whigs campaigned against the Independent Treasury system in state elections throughout the late 1830s in the first two states, 47 however, and by 1840 sharper party lines had emerged over banking and other economic matters in the three midwestern legislatures. In Michigan, the collapse of a bank prominently affiliated with Democrats during the suspension of October 1839 contributed to Whigs' victory the following month. In Indiana and Illinois, the parties fought over Whig-sponsored canal projects as soon as the panic broke in 1837. Whigs had claimed credit for launching lavish improvement schemes in both states in 1836, and in each, Democrats were quick to assault the projects as extravagantly expensive, ill-conceived, incompetently managed, and boons only to the New York and foreign purchasers of the state bonds with which they were financed. Whigs, in turn, condemned the Democrats for opposing improvements necessary for economic development. By defending the canals, accusing the Democrats of causing the depression, and charging them with currying the favor of Irish immigrants working on the canal itself, Whigs carried both houses of the Illinois legislature in August 1838. They swept to victory a year earlier in Indiana when they could still focus attention on Democrats' purported responsibility for the panic, and they maintained control in 1838.

The following year, the worm turned. Indiana was the first state to suffer from the contraction of the British market for American bonds in the spring of 1839. Unable to sell new bonds, the state suspended work on the canals in August and confronted the weight of interest payments on the previously sold bonds. Then the Democrats had the best of both worlds. They could both blame the state's Whigs for financial bungling and point to the general prosperity that summer as proving the wisdom of Van Buren's economic policies. For even though the Independent Treasury Law would not be passed until the following summer, Van Buren had refused to restore the deposit banking system fully following the resumption of specie payments. Democrats cited the recovery of 1838–39 as proof that an Independent Treasury system and hard-money currency would work. In August 1839 that appeal succeeded, and Indiana's Whigs were swamped. They fell from a three-fifths majority to a two-fifths minority in the state legislature, and they won only two of seven congressional seats, whereas in 1837 they had captured six. A year later, when plummeting prices gave new salience to Whigs' calls for government-aided economic development, Whigs would capture threefourths of the legislature.48

Aid to state transportation projects and banking also spawned the sharpest partisan battles in Whigs' two main southern strongholds, Kentucky and North Carolina. While Kentucky's parties had been sharply divided over national issues prior to 1837, they, like those in many other states, had cooperated in enacting measures to spur state economic development. In 1832 and 1833 they had joined to charter the Bank of Kentucky and the Bank of Northern Kentucky. Later, they jointly committed the state to fund a massive program of slack-water navigation projects on its rivers to improve transportation. After the panic, however, Democrats attacked the state's Whig-run banks for causing the panic and cheating noteholders by suspension. In response, Whigs defended them as necessary engines of credit. In 1838 and particularly during the recovery of 1839. Democrats had the better of this debate and scored gains in the legislature. In 1839 and 1840, Democrats also vilified the Whig management of the navigation projects as wasteful and demanded an end to further expenditures. Whigs praised those projects as necessary to improve communication within the state, and in 1840 they even advocated an increase in taxes to pay for their completion. Voters were apparently persuaded, for in August they elected a Whig governor and gave the party an even bigger majority in the legislature than it had won in 1837.49

The North Carolina Whig party had won the governorship in 1836 largely because of its advocacy of internal improvements, and in the legislative session that year it had given more consistent support to such projects than Democrats. Again, after its victory in 1838, the party proved much friendlier to transportation firms than did Democrats, even though regional rivalries clearly played a role in the roll-call voting. On a bill to provide state aid to the strapped Raleigh and Gaston Railroad, for example, 70 percent of the Whigs but only 30 percent of the Democrats in the house supported the relief bill. Similarly, 74 percent of the Whigs supported and 69 percent of Democrats opposed state subscription of stock in the Fayetteville and Western Railroad. By 1838, North Carolina's state parties were also sharply at odds over the issue of stockholder liability for corporations, and by the early 1840s they would clash over banking and currency as well. Party platforms in North Carolina tended to focus more on national than state issues, and even in the legislature, resolutions concerning the Independent Treasury or distribution of federal land revenues polarized the parties more sharply than did substantive state legislation. Nonetheless, the rival parties had established distinguishable records on state matters. North Carolina voters knew which party favored internal improvements, banks, and corporate rights and which did not.⁵⁰

Massachusetts, finally, provides an important variation on this central theme by showing that noneconomic state issues could also move voters in the late 1830s. The 1837 economic collapse sharply reversed the surge toward Democrats in 1835 and 1836, even as it clarified differences between the parties on economic policy. Blaming the panic on Democratic hard-money policies and calling for a new national bank, Whigs in 1837 crushed the Bay State Democrats, who loyally, if foolishly, defended Van Buren's Independent Treasury proposal. In 1838, the differences between the parties sharpened. The antibanking wing took firmer control of the Democrats when George Bancroft replaced the conservative businessman David Henshaw as customs collector in Boston. Meanwhile, the Whig legislature delayed the resumption of specie payments and successfully floated a bond issue in England to finance railroad projects in the state. Whigs could thus claim credit for the return of prosperity, which came earlier to Massachusetts than to most other states because its Whig financial community resumed specie payments early in the year. With such a record the Whigs again won the election of 1838.

In that election, however, the Democrats clearly outgained Whigs among new voters and narrowed the gap between the parties. In part, the clearer antibanking, anticorporate privilege stance of the party led to this gain, but the major cause was probably the negative reaction to an antiliquor law that Whigs passed in the spring of 1838 in response to pressure from temperance elements in the party. Aimed primarily at closing down groggeries, that statute banned the sale of liquor in quantities smaller than fifteen gallons. In 1839, Democrats made the fifteengallon law the focal point of their campaign. Incumbent Whig Governor Edward Everett praised the law as enlightened social policy. Attacking it for blatantly discriminating against the poor and for puritanically imposing restrictions on individual freedom, Democrats promised to repeal it. Riding this issue, the perennially defeated Democratic gubernatorial candidate, Marcus Morton, scored a stunning upset in 1839. The Democratic vote increased by 24 percent, while the Whig total declined slightly.

Then, in his message to the legislature in early 1840, Morton outlined a sweeping plan to impose restrictions on banks, corporate rights, and state subsidies to railroads. Whigs in the legislature countered with reports and speeches blasting every aspect of this program as inimical to the commonwealth's economic welfare. With the depression of 1840 refocusing attention on economic concerns, and with the contrasting positions of the two parties on the government's economic role clearer than they had ever been, the Whigs demolished the Democrats in the state elections of November 1840. Both parties increased their vote, but Whig gains outpaced the Democrats' by more than four to one.⁵¹

As this survey makes clear, the Whig and Democratic parties advocated specific policies in order to gain office. They attempted to enact those policies once elected. And they expended enormous effort to educate voters about what officeholders had done. Voters knew what the parties stood for in terms of both specific legislation and general goals. They could judge the expected results of those programs because of recent experience with both. And they responded in rational ways to the contrasting programs and party images presented to them.

Repelled by strident Democratic rhetoric about class conflict, appalled by the consequences of the negative state, and attracted by what they perceived as the economic benefits of the Whig program, the vast majority of wealthy businessmen, professionals, and planters supported the Whig party. So did most people in those areas most deeply involved in the commercial economy—farmers who grew cash crops, miners, manufacturers and their workers, artisans, merchants, and tradesmen. In such areas, the Whig promise to promote economic development and restore prosperity through the expansion of banking credit, government subsidies, and economic diversification drew the majority of voters.

In contrast, Democrats received support from the groups most impervious to such promises and most likely to think that Whig programs would create a privileged aristocracy, with enough economic and political power to reduce men to slavery. Throughout the nation, Democratic voting strength was concentrated among subsistence farmers in the most remote and economically underdeveloped regions of states—among voters, that is, who feared becoming ensnared in precisely the kind of commercial-monetary network Whigs wanted to foster. In addition, Democrats drew votes heavily from immigrants, Catholics, and others who resented the self-righteous moral imperialism of the dominant Protestant groups they associated with the Whigs. Ethnic and religious tensions, indeed, sometimes offset the general economic pattern of partisan support. Not just poor Irish newcomers but also long-settled and relatively prosperous Dutch and German farmers in New York and Pennsylvania responded to Democratic charges that Whigs would arrogantly crush freedom in order to impose the religious and social values of dominant ethnic and religious groups on cultural minorities.⁵²

There were other exceptions to this demarcation of partisan constituencies. Some voters in market-oriented areas, for example, had clearly been victimized by commercialization, and they retaliated against harmful economic changes by voting Democratic. Nonetheless, each party recruited primarily from pools of potential voters that had different degrees of involvement in and different attitudes toward the market economy, toward the cultural values of the emerging Protestant middle class the market economy spawned, and especially toward promotion of that economy by active governmental intervention. That distinction unravels the complicated relationship among changing economic conditions, the parties' contrasting responses to those conditions, and the variation in election results. The alternating pattern of voter mobilization caused the variation over time in the parties' fortunes because new voters turned out from Whig and Democratic constituencies at different rates during different economic conditions.

Financial turmoil, not low productivity, caused the depressions of the late 1830s. The credit crunch and plunging prices more clearly menaced Whig market-oriented areas than the economically peripheral areas of subsistence farming where Democrats were strongest. Whigs triumphed in the panic period of 1837–38 because they won so many new votes in the areas most crippled by bank suspensions and reduced government expenditures. During the recovery of 1838–39, in turn, Whigs retained the voters they had gained because those voters were pleased with Whig efforts to expand currency and promote growth.

Nonetheless, Whigs won fewer offices during the recovery for two reasons. First, other potential supporters from market-oriented areas saw no need to vote, for the Whig program seemed less necessary during good times than during hard times. Second, Democrats mobilized tens of thousands of new voters from economically underdeveloped regions where men were less concerned about the possible economic consequences of Democratic policies than they were attracted by the Democrats' crusade against debt, high taxes, privilege, and the Money Power.⁵³ Put differently, potential Democrats did not turn out in unusually large numbers during the panic because they were largely unaffected by it. Nor did economic recovery itself bring them out; the recovery coincided with, but did not cause, the growth of the Democratic vote. New Democratic voters responded instead to the programs Whigs had tried to enact in state legislatures in 1838. For the first time in many states, that is, Whigs' actions provided concrete evidence for Democratic charges against them, just as Pennsylvania Whigs' charter for the Bank of the United States had rejuvenated Democrats there in 1836.

The second wave of bank suspensions and price declines at the end of 1839, in turn, caused another surge of new voters toward the Whigs in market-oriented areas that outpaced the gains Democrats had made elsewhere. Hard times gave new salience to the Whig program. They also intensified popular opposition in market-oriented areas to laws Democrats had enacted. Both state legislation threatening banks and the Independent Treasury Act that Democrats passed in July 1840 were deemed more likely to harm than to help the economy.

This argument that different kinds of new voters responded to party records at different rates under different economic conditions fully accords with the results of longitudinal time-series analyses of contemporary voting behavior by political scientists.⁵⁴ It is further supported by additional literary and quantitative evidence from the 1830s. Developments in Tennessee provide a good example. In 1837, the Whigs won the gubernatorial election with an even larger percentage of the vote than favorite son Hugh Lawson White had rolled up in the presidential election of 1836. Both parties gained votes over 1836, but the Whigs gained more: 19,000 compared to 10,000 by the Democrats. Then, in 1839, in an election with an unprecedented turnout, Democrat James K. Polk, after stumping the state denouncing the Whigs as aristocrats and praising hard money, captured the governorship. The Whigs lost about 4,000 votes between 1837 and 1839, but their 1839 total was still considerably larger than in 1836. Polk won because he polled 18,000 more votes than had the Democratic candidate in 1837, not because the Whigs lost votes. To explain where the additional Democratic vote came from, a Whig paper in Memphis argued, "They are the men from the deep gorges of the hills and mountains, and by the sides of the creeks, in the far-off corners of the counties—who take no newspapers and come not into the towns." The closest student of that election agrees with this analysis. Democratic strength in 1839 was concentrated in the least prosperous, most remote regions of the state, whereas Whigs were strongest in the most prosperous counties, areas within the commercial orbit of the state's major trading centers like Knoxville, Nashville, and Memphis.⁵⁵

Extant quantitative data point to the same conclusion. The lack of annual county-level economic data and the spottiness of election returns by county for state and congressional elections prevent a year-by-year analysis of voter mobilization by type of constituency for the late 1830s. But Professor James Roger Sharp has computed indexes of the relative economic status of counties in 1840 for three states—Mississippi, Ohio, and Virginia—and the presidential returns for those counties are readily available. ⁵⁶ Comparison of the relative gains made by Whigs and Democrats between the presidential elections of 1836 and 1840 in rich and poor counties produces intriguing results.

Perhaps no state had such a sharp class basis in its voting alignment as Mississippi. In 1836 the Democrats carried 70 percent of the vote in the state's fifteen poorest counties, whereas the Whigs carried 60 percent of the vote in its fifteen most prosperous counties. More to the point, between 1836 and 1840 the Democrats outgained the Whigs by a margin of 2,344 to 1,907 in the fifteen poorest counties, while the Whigs outgained the Democrats 2,774 to 989 in the fifteen wealthiest counties. Put another way, in the poorest counties Democrats won 55.1 percent of the new voters, while in the richest counties Whigs secured 74 percent of them. The pattern in Ohio was less clear-cut. There, too, the Whigs outgained the Democrats 8,414 (71 percent) to 3,474 (29 percent) in the fifteen wealthiest counties, but in the poorest fifteen counties they almost matched the Democratic gain, 6,283 to 6,325.

Virginia is the most ambiguous case, largely because many wealthy planting counties in the tidewater and piedmont areas were Democratic, while Whigs gained support in poor western counties that wanted internal improvements. Again, Whigs outpaced Democrats among new voters in the fifteen wealthiest counties 1,296 (56 percent) to 1,023 (44 percent), but the Whigs also outgained the Democrats in the fifteen poorest counties, nine of which were in the present state of West Virginia. Far more new voters, indeed, came out in the poorest counties than in the wealthiest. Whigs captured 4,428 (57 percent) of those new voters compared to 3,352 (43 percent) for the Democrats.

If one divides all the counties in each state into three groups ranked according to wealth in 1840 and assumes that wealth indicates the degree of involvement in the market economy, it is possible to determine what proportion of the total statewide increase in the two parties' votes between 1836 and 1840 came from different kinds of constituencies (Table 7). The absolute figures show that, except for Mississippi's poorest counties, Whigs outgained Democrats in every kind of constituency, in part, no doubt, because of Whigs' theatrical 1840 presidential campaign. Nevertheless, Whigs drew proportionately more of their new vote from wealthy counties and Democrats more from the poorest counties in Ohio and Mississippi. In Virginia the distribution of each party's gain among different economic constituencies was almost exactly the same.

At first glance, the Virginia results confound any theory that Whigs drew additional voters disproportionately from wealthy constituencies, whereas [&]quot;The counties are grouped according to their economic ranking in Appendix A of Sharp, The Jacksonians versus the Banks: Politics in the States after the Panic of 1837, pp. 334–42. The increase in vote is measured from the returns in the presidential elections of 1836 and 1840 in Burnham, Presidential Ballots, 1836–1892.

Democrats added voters primarily in the poorest regions. Clearly, the Whig campaign in 1840 was efficacious throughout the Old Dominion in attracting recruits. Yet, closer inspection reveals that the Whig party was measurably more successful in relatively prosperous, commercially oriented counties than in isolated, poorer ones even if the data do not permit one to locate different economic regions or constituencies within individual counties.

Seventeen of the thirty-six counties included in the poorest third of Virginia's counties were located in the present state of West Virginia, while only one of the most prosperous thirty-six was found there. West Virginia counties were almost uniformly poor compared with the rest of the state, but if they are ranked only with each other, a predictable pattern appears. In the eight wealthiest among that group of seventeen, Whigs outpaced Democrats among new voters by a 2 to 1 margin, 1,860 to 924. In the remaining nine, the Whigs drew only 51 percent of the new voters, 2,816 to 2,704.

Whigs enjoyed their greatest success among new voters in the western Virginia counties bordering the Ohio River or in the Kanawha River Valley, areas that wanted to develop commercially and that were attracted to the Whig economic program. In Ohio County, which included Wheeling, for example, the Whigs gained 386 new votes between 1836 and 1840, while the Democrats gained only 48. In Kanawha County, Whigs increased their vote by 330, the Democrats by only 96. In Cabell County, located on the Ohio River in the state's extreme western corner and the only western Virginia county among the wealthiest thirtysix, the Whigs outpaced the Democrats 289 to 230 among new voters. That county, like Kanawha and some others, moreover, was large enough geographically to indicate that Whigs gained in the areas along the river, while Democrats attracted votes in remote areas outside the commercial economy. Even in Virginia, therefore, as in Mississippi, Ohio, Tennessee, and other states, the rival parties tended to draw their new voters from different economic constituencies.⁵⁷

In sum, the contrasting party platforms not only attracted different kinds of people, but they also had more salience for new voters under different economic conditions. During periods of economic decline, the Whigs won because they drew out additional supporters in commercial areas most affected by the depression, and they tended to hold them during recovery. They did not increase their vote at the same rate during recovery, however, for new voters in those areas were more likely to respond to hard times than to prosperity. Instead, during periods of prosperity. Democrats usually won, not because Whigs lost votes in commercial areas, but because Democrats mobilized new voters in their strongholds by condemning the newly articulated and often newly enacted Whig programs as a menace to equal rights. Where Whigs continued to win during the recovery, as in New York in 1838 or in Virginia in 1839, it may have been because the prominence of conservative probusiness Democrats in those states' parties prevented them from maximizing their appeal to Democratic constituencies. In New York, Democratic Governor Marcy had signed into law the canal bond issue and the Free Banking Act on which Whigs campaigned, and prominent Conservative Democratic leaders were urging Democrats to support Whigs. In any event, once Democrats acted upon their antibanking, antibusiness animus in those states that they captured during the recovery, those programs turned still more new voters in commercial areas against them when the economy slumped again in 1840. For voters intimately connected with the commercial economy, Whigs rather than Democrats had the proper prescription to bring about economic recovery.

VI

The surge of new voters to the Whigs generated by the divergent party responses to economic conditions in the late 1830s brought them to power in a number of states, greatly increased their strength in Congress, and ensured that the Whig party would survive. Just as the Whig party had planted its strongest roots between the spring of 1834 and the spring of 1837 in states where it took distinct positions on concrete policies, its strength soared after the Panic of 1837 precisely because economic conditions forced the rival parties to take divergent policy positions almost everywhere and made those positions extraordinarily salient to voters who looked to government to advance or retard the growth of the market economy. A sharp contrast with Democrats on measures, not just men, was the nutrient that brought the Whig party to maturity.

The trends established in state and congressional elections between 1837 and 1840 almost ensured the Whigs' triumph in the presidential election of 1840. The party had gained enormous strength during the economic slump of 1837–38 and retained most of it during the recovery of 1838–39. The second wave of bank suspensions and falling prices that began at the end of 1839 obviously spurred another dramatic upswing in Whig fortunes in the spring and summer of 1840 that augured victory in November of that year (see Tables 5 and 6).⁵⁸ Equally important, on votes in state legislatures and Congress and in the campaigns that sought consciously to educate voters about the policy differences separating the parties, Whigs and Democrats established records that indelibly etched their contrasting approaches to the economy. Voters had to know generally what policies to expect should one party or the other win the presidential election. Hard times and the Whigs' prescription for ending them, not hard cider, would put a Whig in the White House.

Whig politicians who considered the party's prospects for that presidential race did not enjoy the advantage of such hindsight. Appalled by Van Buren's policies and disgusted with the prolonged Democratic control of the national government, they were determined to win the presidency at all costs in 1840. They could see that the Conservative Democratic revolt against Van Buren and the defection of Calhoun and his most ardent southern followers to the Democrats created both exciting opportunities and difficult challenges. They could also see, from the results during the recovery, that they could lose office just as rapidly as they gained it. To the Whig politicians who gathered in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, to nominate a presidential candidate in December 1839, in short, the future seemed at once hopeful and uncertain. In addition to other reasons, that uncertainty would frustrate once again the ambitions of the party's foremost national leader, Henry Clay. Instead, the party selected a different standard bearer whose nomination almost inadvertently launched the party into a different kind of campaign than they would have or could have run for the Kentuckian.

The decision to bypass Clay proved one of the most fateful in this nation's history. Had Whig leaders known in December 1839 what would happen to the economy and Whig electoral fortunes during the spring and summer of 1840, or had the Whigs postponed their convention until the following May when the Democrats met, Clay would have undoubtedly been nominated. Had Clay been nominated, he most certainly would have been elected, for 1840 was the Whigs' year. Sadly for Henry Clay, for the Whig party, and especially for the American people, who would soon be launched on the road to Civil War, it was not to be.

"Harrison and Prosperity or Van Buren and Ruin"

AFTER THE WHIGS' first national convention in December 1839, Henry Clay reportedly exclaimed, "I am the most unfortunate man in the history of parties: always run by my friends when sure to be defeated, and now betrayed for a nomination when I, or any one, would be sure of an election." This lament is probably as apocryphal as Clay's supposed assertion that "I had rather be right than be President," although it surely reflects his sentiments more accurately. Historians often cite them to illustrate Clay's undeniable and understandable personal frustration and Americans' failure between the administrations of Jackson and Abraham Lincoln to elevate great statesmen like Clay, Webster, or Calhoun to the presidency. Instead the parties nominated "available" men—politicians and especially nonpoliticians without stature, experience, or past records and the enemies such records produced.

The Whigs' choice of General William Henry Harrison instead of Clay at Harrisburg has made them seem particularly opportunistic. Whigs, indeed, nominated military heroes rather than civilian leaders in four of the five presidential campaigns they contested, including the only two times they won. That record has led to the illusion that the Whig party was a natural loser, triumphing only when it evaded issues and clung to the coattails of figurehead leaders who had popularity beyond the boundaries of the Whigs' normal voting constituency.

The Whig victory in 1840 is, accordingly, usually attributed to the legendary "Log Cabin–Hard Cider" campaign the party ran in Harrison's behalf. According to this view, hungry Whig politicos nominated the ostensibly apolitical general rather than the prominent Senate leader because they believed that only Harrison could triumph. Then, carefully avoiding issues, they lubricated voters with hard cider and other strong drink; stirred them with ingenious slogans, songs, and symbols rather than hard analysis of programmatic alternatives; and roused them to a frenzy through the brilliant imitation of Jacksonian techniques like parades, mass rallies, and log cabin raisings. Excited, dazzled, and a bit befuddled, voters then poured out in record numbers to sweep Harrison into office. As one historian summarized this interpretation, "Issues counted for little in the 1840 campaign."

Whigs did demonstrate real genius in generating enthusiasm for Harrison, but they deployed far more than hoopla. The overemphasis on ballyhoo during the presidential race ignores the party's equally impressive performance in the state and congressional elections of 1840 that often preceded the presidential poll and that cannot be explained by a coattails' effect. The exclusive focus on parades and carping that Whigs eschewed a national platform in 1840 also belittles the importance of issues in the election, both what was said during the campaign and, more important, the concrete records and programmatic alternatives the parties had created in state legislatures and Congress since 1837. Whigs, in fact, more often avoided specific issues and relied on the popularity of their presidential candidate in the election of 1836, which they lost, than in the election of 1840, which they won.

Worst of all, the traditional interpretation of the 1840 election ignores the political patterns in state and congressional elections since 1836. Those fights over contrasting party responses to economic conditions had brought out many of the new voters who contributed to the record turnout of 1840, and they clearly pointed to a Whig victory in the presidential election once the economy plunged again at the end of 1839. Despite his congenital overoptimism about his own prospects, Clay's prescient assertion in December 1839 that he or anyone else could be elected by the Whigs was, for once, emphatically right.

What is most extraordinary about Clay's statement is not its accuracy but its timing. In December 1839, most Whigs could not foresee what would happen to the economy and to Whig fortunes in 1840. For a variety of reasons, the men who made the decision at Harrisburg, or at least the majority of them, did not believe Clay could win, and they turned opportunistically to a more available candidate. Yet Harrison's purported assets as a standard bearer do not explain his November victory. The inverse relation between economic conditions and the Whigs' political fortunes played the major role in both Harrison's nomination and his subsequent election.

I

The long and bitter scramble for the Whig presidential nomination began almost as soon as the canvass of 1836 ended, and it intensified as the fortunes of potential nominees rose and fell with the fluctuating results of off-year elections. The scent of victory exacerbated rivalries among the aspirants that would have important ramifications for the victorious party. Yet conflicting personal ambitions alone did not shape the race for the nomination. Sectional rivalries growing out of the abolitionist and Texas issues, the machinations of influential state leaders, and especially the decision to hold the national convention in December 1839 also shaped the outcome. Had the convention assembled at an earlier or a later date, its results might have been very different.

From the start, Whigs' central choice lay between nominating a prominent Whig congressional leader, who could rally the party's stalwarts, or a standard bearer not identified with Whig programs, who had appeal to Democrats and new voters. Those of the latter disposition initially leaned almost unanimously toward Harrison, the party's leading vote getter in 1836, while those who preferred the former divided their support between the Senate giants Webster and Clay.

To many Whigs at the beginning of 1837, running Harrison again seemed the necessary route to success. The shrewd upstate leaders of New York's Whig party, William Henry Seward and Thurlow Weed, believed that Harrison might have won even in 1836 had the party exerted more effort. Two weeks after the polls closed, Seward advised Weed that New York's Whigs must manifest "new zeal for the Hero of Tippecanoe as a candidate by continuation." Weed emphatically agreed that it was "utter folly" for Webster to run and that Harrison "is our man—our only man." Harrison also remained popular among Pennsylvania's Antimasonic Whigs and in Ohio and Indiana. Ohio's Whigs, indeed, formally nominated him for president at their state convention in July 1837, and they repeated that endorsement in May 1838.

Harrison himself continued his quest for the presidency. However ambiguous his stand on issues, he was hardly apolitical. Aided by an able lieutenant in Colonel Charles Todd, Harrison assiduously sought support among other veterans of the Indian wars in which he had won fame, as well as among the numerous militia companies scattered around the country, just as Jackson had done in the 1820s. Pointing to that popularity, Harrison and Todd then corresponded widely with politicos to advertise the general's availability.

Just as in 1835, however, Whig regulars resisted Harrison's pretensions. The upturn in the party's electoral fortunes in the summer and fall of 1837, they believed, demonstrated that the depression was making all the converts Whigs needed and that the party could win in 1840 behind one of its two orthodox statesmen, Clay or Webster.

Even before the outbreak of the panic in May 1837, Webster, who had so stridently protested the party's recourse to irregulars like Harrison and White in 1836 and who had forlornly remained in the race until its bitter end, laid plans for seizing the plum in 1840. Recognizing his palpable weakness in the South and his subordinate position to Clay in the Senate, he utilized his connections with wealthy businessmen in Boston and New York City and his oratorical skills to challenge Harrison in the North. His strategy was three-pronged. He would engineer a nomination by the Whigs in New York City, where his wealthy friends controlled newspapers and the local organization. Then he would use that endorsement to create a bandwagon effect in the rest of the state. Simultaneously, he would make a speaking tour of Harrison's stronghold, the Midwest, in order to demonstrate his popularity outside the Northeast.

Just as he had attempted to use the Nullification crisis in 1833 to rally the North in his behalf, Webster intended to arouse northern sentiments against the South in order to wrest the nomination from Harrison in 1840. The Republic of Texas' pending application for annexation provided his new vehicle. Annexation, which Texans had requested almost as soon as they established the Republic in 1836, could plunge the United States into a war with Mexico, which refused to recognize Texas' independence. Annexation would also mean the acquisition of additional slave territory, for slavery was legal in Texas. In March 1837, Webster powerfully addressed 6,000 cheering partisans in New York City, pledging eternal resistance to 'anything that shall extend the slavery of the African race on this continent." The following October he repeated his staunch opposition in a major Senate speech. Webster's implication was clear: northern Whigs could trust no Southerner like Clay or the Virginia-born Harrison, who was mum on the issues. Northern Whigs needed a presidential candidate who forthrightly championed northern interests and values.⁴

Webster probably planned to repeat this theme during his speaking tour of the Midwest, which began in May, but his journey coincided with the arrival of the panic. Hence, Webster changed tack. To enthusiastic throngs in city after city he lambasted the Democratic hard-money policies that, he asserted, had destroyed the credit system on which the prosperity of ordinary Americans depended.

Despite his rhetorical success in the West, Webster failed to make early headway toward the nomination. Harrison's advocates remained unmoved. Ohio's nomination of Harrison in July 1837 symbolized Webster's inability to penetrate Old Tip's fortress, and even before that the movement of his friends in New York had fizzled. That failure stemmed, in part, from the hostility of upstate leaders like Seward and Weed, who continued to consider Webster's Federalist background and his intimacy with Nicholas Biddle's Bank of the United States as fatal liabilities. Within New York City itself, Webster's friends were checked by the partisans of Clay, whose star ascended rapidly once the panic broke. By threatening to repudiate the action of a public meeting called by Webster's friends in June, they forced them to settle for a recommendation, rather than a formal nomination, of Webster and to issue a call to other Whigs to agree that the party's nominee should be chosen by a national convention.⁵

For a number of reasons in the summer of 1837, many Whigs concluded that a national nominating convention should name the party's candidate. The Ohio convention that nominated Harrison in July urged that a national gathering be held in Pittsburgh in May 1838 to select the ticket. Clay endorsed the idea of a convention in a public letter to his New York City supporters in August. Various Whig leaders, however, quickly decided that May 1838 was far too early for a convention. Friends of each aspirant, fearing that the other might get an early advantage, wanted to forestall the decision. Perceptive Whig leaders also wanted to prevent the emerging asperities from dividing the party and damaging it in the important off-year elections of 1837, 1838, and 1839. If one candidate or another clinched the nomination early, the dejected supporters of the others might not work hard enough in state and congressional campaigns. State leaders like Weed did not want to carry the burden of unpopular national leaders during state elections when Whig prospects seemed so bright.

Despite disagreements over the best date, most Whigs deemed a convention imperative. A national convention seemed the best way to concentrate the party behind a single candidate rather than to repeat the multiple-candidate debacle of 1836. Still, not all Whigs embraced the idea with equal enthusiasm. Clay dutifully recommended it to his New York followers in August 1837, but he had little choice since they had used the demand for a convention to block Webster's early efforts. Aware that many Whigs, especially in the South, had vehemently denounced conventions as instruments of party dictation in 1836, Clay worried, with good reason as it turned out, that his full strength might not be represented at a convention because southern Whigs might not send delegates. Harrison, for his part, feared that Clay, the archetypal party insider, could use his Whig congressional supporters to stack the convention. Clay's only "chance of success," he protested in the summer of 1838, was "a packed convention[,] one which will represent the politicians*not* the people ."6

By the time Harrison wrote that letter, however, a convention had already been decided upon. In December 1837, a caucus of congressional Whigs agreed to pressure their state parties to accept a call. Clay hoped for an early gathering, and in mid-April 1838 he confidently wrote his friend Francis Brooke that the convention would be called for some time in the first half of 1839. Later that month, however, the congressional Whigs decided instead on December 1839. As Clay correctly understood, leaders in New York, Vermont, Pennsylvania, and Ohio wanted to postpone the nomination until after the state elections of 1839 so that they could continue to run on efficacious state issues without the burden of defending a presidential candidate.

But Webster also helped delay the convention. His chances had begun to fade almost as soon as the boomlet in New York City collapsed in June 1837. By the end of that year, Weed bluntly told Webster that Harrison was the strongest candidate for 1840. Webster informed at least one friend in February 1838 that he believed Harrison would get the nomination, but as in 1835 and 1836, he stubbornly refused to withdraw until the summer of 1839. Pride and the hope of some last-minute swing in his direction influenced Webster's course, but a jealous determination to stop Clay also motivated him. He had never forgiven Clay for supporting Harrison rather than himself in 1836. By staying in the race, he intended to prevent Clay from locking up the party regulars. For the same reason, Webster told his Massachusetts and New York followers to acquiesce in a convention only if it were held late in 1839. The later the convention, Webster believed, the more time he had to derail Clay.

H

By the spring of 1838, Clay had clearly become the front-runner. In August 1837, he had reported disingenuously to a Louisville editor that "whatever may be my own inclinations or disposition, I shall again be forced into the Presidential arena." In October, his close colleague from Kentucky, Senator John J. Crittenden, wrote that "a vigorous & united effort for one more year must make us triumphant." A month later, Clay himself bragged, "I receive almost daily gratifying proofs of attachment and confidence from all quarters." Because of Whigs' spectacular victories in New York in 1837, "I now hope that I shall live to see the Goths expelled from the Capitol and competent men once more in the Administration of the Government."

In April 1838, Clay gushed that "everything is going on as well as my most zealous friends could desire. Public opinion everywhere, even in Indiana and Ohio, is rapidly concentrating." An attempt to get Pennsylvania Whigs to endorse Harrison had fizzled, and even Ohio's Whigs, though still booming the general, agreed to abide by a convention decision. At the end of May, therefore, Clay cheered that "our Cause everywhere is making sure and certain progress; and that my particular cause could hardly be improved."

The grounds for Clay's bravado in the spring of 1838, while seemingly firm enough, turned out to be very slippery. So long as the economy slumped and Whig fortunes rose, the stronger Clay looked, since his spirited Senate resistance to Van Buren's Independent Treasury scheme caused his stock to soar in commercial communities. The obverse of this formula was equally true, however. When the economy and the Democrats rebounded in 1838–39, Clay ceased to look like a winner.

Whatever the economic conditions, Clay retained an asset that could not be matched by either Harrison or Webster—southern support. As in 1836, southern Whigs wanted one of their own in the White House. Since Tennessee Senator Hugh Lawson White showed no inclination to run again, the slaveholder Clay appeared the potential heir. Webster's strident opposition to the acquisition of Texas accelerated southern Whigs' movement in Clay's direction. A Whig editor in North Carolina exclaimed that "Mr. Clay is the only one under [the] circumstances that the Whigs can expect to run with success. . . . Mr. Webster can never get the full Whig vote of the South. His late declarations concerning Texas (right enough perhaps in the abstract) will of themselves like Banquos [sic] ghost stare him in the face and shake their gory or rather sable locks at him throughout the contest."

Yet even Clay's popularity in the South proved a two-edged sword, for his southern support was rather shaky and, in attempting to shore it up, he ran the risk of alienating northern Whigs. Alone among the candidates he had to balance the conflicting interests of northern and southern Whigs. Because of his prominence as Senate Whig leader, he could not easily dodge issues that threatened to exacerbate that conflict, especially issues involving slavery.

As early as October 1837, South Carolina's Whig Senator William C. Preston, who refused to follow Calhoun into the Democratic ranks, warned that while Clay remained the only man whom Whigs could elect president, serious obstacles blocked his path to the nomination. Not only were Harrison and Webster in the way, but "there is already a battery opened against him in the South." Although Clay's ownership of slaves made him seem the natural legatee of White's southern support, southern Whigs with state rights views had long mistrusted his nationalism; Clay's American System violated their sense of constitutional propriety and sectional interest.

Satisfying Southerners without alienating northern Whigs in regard to economic policy proved relatively easy. Like Northerners, southern Whigs enthusiastically followed Clay's lead in denouncing and voting against the Independent Treasury bill and Democratic hard-money proposals in order to protect the banking and credit systems. Many southern and some northern Whigs, however, wanted no part of a new national bank, which Clay considered a necessity. Still, in a Senate speech in May 1838, Clay noted that chartering a bank would be inexpedient until public opinion demanded it; and in the fall of that year, he privately conceded that no demand existed. In 1839, in a letter to the state rights ideologue Beverley Tucker, Clay virtually abandoned the rest of his American System. The tariff of 1833, despite its impending reductions, finally settled that issue, he averred, and he no longer saw a need for federal internal improvements. The distribution of federal land revenues sufficed, for the states had made great strides.¹³

The explosive slavery issue posed more problems, for John C. Calhoun and his followers sought an explicit proslavery, prosouthern resolution of that issue from Congress. If Clay condoned any such solution, he realized, he would alienate abolitionists in key northern states like Ohio, New York, and Massachusetts. Worse, he might antagonize the far more numerous northern Whigs who deplored the abolitionists as dangerous agitators but who would brook no political concessions to the South on the issues involving slavery. Yet Clay also knew that he could not desert his southern base on this issue since, as Preston had warned in October 1837, Calhoun and his friends would discredit his credentials as faithful tribune of the South.

Calhoun rejoined the Democratic party in the fall of 1837 in part because he believed that both Harrison and Webster were antislavery. Furthermore, he fumed, "abolitionists, consolidationists, [and] colonizationists" would control the Whig national convention. By "colonizationists," Calhoun meant members of the American Colonization Society like Henry Clay, who would send free blacks to Africa to induce Southerners to manumit their slaves. The soundest friends of slavery, Calhoun believed, were in the Democratic party, and therefore he returned to it with the hope of controlling it.¹⁴

Yet Calhoun gave the Democratic party little more fealty than he had given the Whigs. In his attitude toward political parties and toward the slavery issue, the South Carolinian was a political wild card who did not match the dominant suit in either party's hand. Most southern politicians believed that the South could best protect slavery through the party system itself. They sought to mute the issue, to convince northern party allies that party unity necessitated removing slavery from the national political arena. They willingly jousted with each other at home as to which party better defended Southern Rights, but in Congress they wanted to bury all discussion of slavery. On both counts Calhoun vehemently disagreed. He did not think that political parties could protect the South or slavery. The clash of the two parties, he thought, only divided the South. Furthermore, instead of avoiding the slavery issue in Congress, Calhoun insisted that the South must confront the North with demands and force Yankee concessions. Precisely that strategy posed Clay's problem.¹⁵

Determined to "carry the war into the non-slave holding states," Calhoun on December 27, 1837, introduced six resolutions broadly defending Southern Rights and pressed for their passage. The first two restated Calhoun's familiar argument that the nation was a compact of states and that states had jurisdiction over their own domestic institutions—that is, slavery. Both quickly passed. But the other resolutions insisted that the national government must give "increased stability and security to the domestic institutions of the states," that any interference with slavery in the District of Columbia or in federal territories was "a direct and dangerous attack on the institutions of all the slaveholding States," and that any refusal to annex new slave territory discriminated unconstitutionally against the South.¹⁶

In response, Clay charged that Calhoun's inflammatory resolutions, especially the demand for Texas' annexation, would only strengthen the abolitionist movement and thereby endanger the Union. His counterresolutions concurred that Congress had no jurisdiction over slavery within the states, that Congress should immediately reject any petitions calling for its abolition there, that abolitionist activities endangered the Union, and that no attempt should be made to abolish slavery in the District or in federal territories like Florida. At the same time, however, Clay firmly upheld the right to petition Congress for abolition in areas over which Congress had jurisdiction. He also asserted that Congress had no power to interfere with the interstate slave trade. Most important, his resolutions said nothing about annexing Texas or any other slave territory.

Although Clay failed to substitute all of his resolutions for Calhoun's, he managed, with support from northern Democrats like James Buchanan, to modify Calhoun's most inflammatory statements. The Senate ultimately resolved that Congress should not interfere with, rather than work to increase, the stability and security of the states' domestic institutions; denounced abolitionist activities as a threat to the Union, not as an attack on the South; and eliminated any mention of Texas' annexation. To separate himself still further from Calhoun, Clay stridently denounced him as a Nullifier during a major speech in February 1838.¹⁷

By the spring of 1838 Clay believed that he had neutralized the slavery issue. He regarded Calhoun's resolutions as a trap to discredit him in either the North or the South, and he rejoiced that he had escaped it. By defending the right of petition and burying the obnoxious Texas resolution, he thought he could appease most northern Whigs. Yet by denouncing the abolitionists, he appealed to the South. And by attacking Calhoun as a Nullifier, he ingratiated himself with southern state rights Whigs like Mangum who had long considered Nullification folly and Calhoun a traitor for his defection to the Democrats.¹⁸

Hence, even during the debates on Calhoun's resolutions in January 1838, Clay privately exulted that he was losing "nothing neither at the South nor at the North." Later, after Van Buren spurned the overtures from Texas for annexation order to preserve the intersectional harmony of his own party, Clay rejoiced "that the ridiculous charge against me of being an Abolitionist propagated by the Calhoun school, can deceive nobody." The Kentuckian had in fact managed to satisfy most southern Whigs about his proslavery pedigree by the summer of 1838. Despite the sniping from Calhoun and other Democrats, southern members of his party still favored him.

Ш

Nonetheless, Clay correctly realized that he was a long way from securing the nomination. Newspaper endorsements meant little. He needed delegate commitments. The South was for him, but he constantly worried that southern states might not attend the convention and he constantly urged his friends to ensure that they did.²¹ The real problem, however, lay in the North. Without some northern support at the convention, he could not obtain a majority.

As early as August 1837 Clay had informed his New York supporters that they should promptly press for commitments to him, but by the summer of 1838 the results had been disappointing. Whigs in the Kentucky legislature had formally nominated him in January, and Rhode Island and Maryland had soon followed suit. There things had stalled. Clay had support in Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio, but only the last had made any official nomination and it had gone to Harrison. Philadelphia's Whigs boomed him, but the more numerous Antimasonic branch of the Pennsylvania Whig party, led by Thaddeus Stevens and Governor Joseph Ritner, won an overwhelming endorsement for Harrison from the state convention that renominated Ritner for governor in March 1838. Prospects in New York seemed just as uncertain. Clay had friends throughout the state, but Webster's allies checked him in New York City and Seward and Weed stalled upstate, fearing that neither Antimasons nor abolitionists would support him. In most of New England, Webster's partisans blocked the Kentuckian.²²

Clay moved on several fronts in the spring and summer of 1838 to enhance his northern prospects. In the Senate, he sought to take advantage of resentment toward the British along the Canadian border. Rebellion had broken out in Upper Canada against British authorities in late 1837, and Americans along the frontier generally sympathized with the rebels. After being easily routed by British authorities, many rebels fled to the United States, where they tried to raise men and arms to continue the revolt. In response, on December 29, 1837, a British raiding party seized the Caroline, an American ship that had been used to run arms to the rebels, on the New York side of the Niagara River. They killed an American on board, set the ship afire, and sent it over the falls. Headstrong Americans in the area demanded revenge, and President Van Buren dispatched General Winfield Scott to keep the peace. Throughout much of 1838, Scott toured the border regions trying to calm Americans down and preserve neutrality. At the same time, his majestic uniformed presence reassured them that the national government would protect them from further assaults. While these commotions stirred the border west of Vermont, Canadian authorities from New Brunswick clashed with the Maine militia over possession of the Aroostook River Valley in the northern part of that state, and eventually Scott was again dispatched to settle the matter peacefully.²³

Clay saw no serious possibility of war with England, but he saw a chance to score points in the upper North. He made several bellicose Senate speeches defending Maine's right to all the territory it claimed and announcing that if war should occur with England, "it would be a just war, and he would be ready to meet it." As Clay would eventually learn to his dismay, however, the general on the scene, Scott, and not the defiant Senate orator would earn the most political credit from these clashes along the Canadian border.²⁴

Clay's covert efforts to advance his cause proved equally futile. Recognizing that New York was crucial, he urged his friends in New York City to arrange a public meeting to endorse him in May 1838. Because of the antagonism of Weed and Seward upstate and Webster's supporters in the city, however, this effort proved stillborn. In June, Clay approached Webster personally and vainly urged him to withdraw. Next, Clay turned to his primary Massachusetts backers like Harrison Gray Otis, Boston's former mayor, and Abbott Lawrence, the wealthy textile manufacturer, urging them to persuade Webster to bow out. They also failed. Spitefully, Webster remained in the race to squelch Clay.²⁵

By the end of the summer, Clay's stalled drive for the nomination began to unravel. In September the Boston Atlas, thitherto a major Webster paper, withdrew Webster's name from its masthead. Instead of swinging to Clay, however, it charged that Clay was the "darling of aristocratic Whigs, not the choice of the democracy of the Whig party." Massachusetts must support Harrison, the Atlas insisted. If she could not have her favorite son, she should aid a candidate who was "in truth available." By the end of the year, Otis informed Clay that he could only hope to be named the Bay State's second choice when the Whig legislative caucus endorsed a candidate the following February. Webster, he admitted, remained the state's first choice.²⁷

The Atlas's switch to Harrison especially stung because, by the fall of 1838, Whigs elsewhere were also pressing for a more "available" candidate. With the economy recovering between August and the end of the year, Whigs lost control of governorships, state legislatures, and congressional delegations they had won during previous elections in Alabama, Illinois, Maine, Maryland, New Jersey, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Delaware. True, they captured the governorship of New York and retained offices in North Carolina, Mississippi, and Massachusetts, but their losses raised considerable doubt that a Whig like Clay, the party's preeminent congressional leader, could win.

Once again, the party seemed to need a candidate who could attract Democratic converts. Instead, Clay seemed more likely to deter defections and rally Democrats behind Van Buren. As one Harrison supporter in Pennsylvania told Nicholas Biddle in February 1839, Clay's "long and brilliant career in public life while it furnishes much to admire is fruitful of topics upon which he is vulnerable to the prejudices of the masses."

Almost simultaneously, Harrison's attractiveness to non-Whigs seemed to be reaffirmed when a purported national Antimasonic convention nominated Harrison for president and Webster for vice president on a separate ticket in November 1838. The numbers at that gathering in Philadelphia were small, but its impact on the Keystone State was great. Ritner's defeat for governor in 1838 convinced the Antimasonic members of Pennsylvania's Whig coalition that Harrison offered the only hope of recapturing the state.²⁹

Identified far more closely than Harrison with the fortunes of the Whig party as a whole, Clay himself regarded his prospects as desperate by November 1838. The recent elections, he glumly confessed, had been "very unfavorable" to his cause. Deeply discouraged, Clay even contemplated withdrawing his hat from the ring. Grasping at any straw, Clay hoped that recent Whig victories in New York and Virginia might still salvage his nomination if their legislatures endorsed him. Those two large states might convince delegates to the national convention that Clay could win in 1840. Clay viewed the two states as inextricably connected; a nomination from Virginia would, he believed, influence New York. In both states, moreover, an alliance with Conservative Democratic factions, led by his Senate friends Nathaniel P. Tallmadge and William C. Rives, could bolster pro-Clay Whigs. In the winter of 1838–39, therefore, Clay pressed for mergers with the Conservatives and legislative endorsements in both states.³¹

Clay's supporters in New York had begun the maneuver even before the state election in November. Aware that Weed's reservations about Clay's electability posed the biggest obstacle, they had aided the Albany editor's effort to secure the 1838 gubernatorial nomination for Seward instead of the Antimasonic favorite, and likely Harrison supporter, Francis Granger. The Clay men also joined Weed in pushing for an alliance with Tallmadge's Conservative Democrats and backing Tallmadge's reelection to the Senate after the election. Weed welcomed such support, but it hardly improved his opinion of Clay's chances in New York. Indeed, by alienating former Antimasonic Whig leaders from western New York like Granger and Millard Fillmore, who wanted the senatorial nomination for himself, Clay had only increased the enmity of Antimasons. By the end of 1838 Fillmore warned Weed that Seward must not become "stuck in Clay." In February 1839, he advised another supporter that the legislature must not nominate Clay, for only Harrison could win. Clay's attempt to capture New York from within had been blocked.³²

Stymied in the Empire State, Clay pressed all the more feverishly in Virginia. If the Whigs in the Virginia legislature would nominate him, he wrote in December 1838, that "movement would probably be followed and seconded at Albany; and in that case, I think the question would be settled." Clay especially wished a Virginia endorsement to come from a combination of Whigs and Conservative Democrats. Such a merger would not only enhance the Whigs' chances in Virginia; it would also allow Clay's supporters in New York, like Tallmadge himself, to argue that Whigs must choose the candidate who commanded Conservative rather than Antimasonic backing.³³

Clay worked frantically to facilitate a merger with Conservatives in Virginia by persuading the Virginia Whigs to support William C. Rives' reelection to the Senate in the winter of 1839. "Co-operation between the Whigs and Conservatives will secure a majority against the Administration," he wrote, and "without it the majority may be the other way." Rives held the key to that new majority. "It is manifest that, if we repel the advances of all the former members of the Jackson party to unite with us, under whatever name they may adopt, we must remain in a perpetual and hopeless minority."³⁴

Clay's logic was unassailable, even if it flatly contradicted his response to the proposed candidacies of John McLean, Harrison, and Hugh Lawson White in 1835. But he and his friends could not sway die-hard state rights men, who hated Rives for supporting the Force Bill in 1833 and insisted on replacing him with John Tyler. As a result of Tyler's friends' intransigence, the deadlocked Virginia senatorial election had to be postponed to the following year, preventing the legislative endorsement for which Clay yearned.³⁵

Clay then adopted a different and very dangerous tack to sway the Virginia legislature before it, and the New York assembly, adjourned. In February 1839, he delivered a blistering speech in the Senate in which he denounced the abolitionists as dangerous disunionists, defended slavery as a necessity, and denied federal power over slavery in the states, the territories, or the District of Columbia. Abolition, he warned, would destroy the nation, "and beneath the ruins of the Union would be buried, sooner or later, the liberty of both races." If Clay could not move Virginia's Whigs by cementing the merger with the Conservatives, he might by reemphasizing his proslavery pedigree.³⁶

Clay's bold declarations virtually ensured the South's support for his candidacy, but they failed to secure Virginia soon enough. A state Whig convention would endorse him overwhelmingly in September and Virginians would support him resolutely at Harrisburg in December, but that was far too late to help him in New York. Its legislature, like Virginia's, adjourned without taking any action on the nomination.

As a last resort, Clay toured New York in the summer of 1839 while ostensibly on his way to vacation at the fashionable summer resort of Saratoga. Everywhere the crowds were large and friendly. Even a few abolitionists offered their support. His rearoused hopes were dashed, however, when he reached Saratoga in August. There Weed personally urged him to drop out of the race, for his former connections with the Bank of the United States, his alienation of the Antimasons, and the antagonism of most abolitionists caused by his speech in February all made him too heavy a load for New York Whigs to carry. New York's hardheaded politicos also saw Whig defeats in Indiana, Tennessee, and North Carolina in August 1839 as evidence that Clay was now unelectable. As one Whig who dined with Clay in Albany put it, "The honest truth is, that the recent elections show us that Mr. Clay" can rely on only two states, "Louisiana and Kentucky. . . . Between us, Mr. Clay is dished and in my opinion, he thinks so himself." "37

But Clay, however "disappointed and depressed" by August's "calamitous" results, refused to withdraw from the race. He thought that the people of New York were for him, even if its Whig bosses were not, and that his withdrawal would damage the party irreparably in the South. He therefore determined to await the outcome of the Harrisburg convention.³⁸

Because of the reversal of Whig electoral fortunes that began in the fall of 1838 and continued throughout most of 1839, many Whigs looked to Harrison as the most available candidate. But to Weed and other New York leaders, those results had damaged Old Tip's credibility as much as Clay's. After all, Ohio's Whigs, having unanimously endorsed Harrison in both 1837 and 1838, lost state elections in both 1838 and 1839. Pennsylvania's Whig-Antimasonic convention had boomed him in March 1838, but the party had lost in the fall. And in Indiana, where Harrison was supposedly enormously popular, the Whigs suffered a devastating defeat in the congressional and legislative elections of August 1839.

Harrison, recognizing the potential damage of these defeats, moved astutely to separate himself from the party's losses and to reemphasize his popularity among non-Whig voters. His message was clear. The Whig party could no longer win on its issues, but Harrison could still win on personal charisma. In December, Harrison boasted of his support among military veterans, who had formerly enlisted behind Jackson, to Ohio Whig Congressman Joshua R. Giddings. Realizing that New York held the key to the nomination, his campaign manager, Charles Todd, told Governor Seward in February 1839 that Whigs must not "disregard the most available candidate," since "it is our common purpose to effect a redress of grievances by a change of rulers."

This case for Harrison remained compelling to many northern Whigs when the party staggered from defeat to defeat in 1839. Indiana and Ohio stayed safely in his camp, and outside of Connecticut and Rhode Island, which leaned toward Clay, New England also seemed safe for Harrison, especially once Webster issued a public letter of withdrawal during the summer. Most important, though some Pennsylvania Whigs in June chose pro-Clay delegates to the national convention, Pennsylvania seemed secure because Antimasons headed by Charles B. Penrose, one of Thaddeus Stevens' lieutenants and the speaker of the state senate, arranged a September state convention that chose pro-Harrison delegates and declared that

Clay's nomination would fatally offend Antimasons and abolitionists. "No one but Harrison," it proclaimed, "could unite all elements of the party." 40

New York's upstate leaders remained unconvinced. By the spring of 1839 they were turning to another general, Winfield Scott, who had won enormous popularity in the western part of the state for the way he had handled the border disputes with Canada. Constantly garbed in magnificent full-dress uniforms, laden with medals and trimmed with gold epaulets, the 6-foot 5-inch, 300-pound soldier had cut an imposing, if not quite dashing, figure as he proceeded along the border from Vermont to Michigan arguing that the neutrality laws must be observed. Already renowned in western New York as the Hero of Bridgewater for his exploits at the Battle of Lundy's Lane near the New York border during the War of 1812, Scott appeared to many New Yorkers a more certain winner than the Hero of Tippecanoe.

As one western New Yorker put the case, "Scott's name will bring out the hurra boys. The Whig party were broken down by the popularity and non-committal character of old Jackson, and it is but fair to turn upon, and prostrate our opponents, with the weapons . . . with which they beat us." To win, "the General's lips must be hermetically sealed, and our shouts and hurras long and loud."

Weed raised Scott's banner with alacrity, and from the summer of 1839 until December he worked to lock up convention support for Scott in New York and other northern states. Weed managed to secure thirty of New York's forty-two delegates for Scott; ten were for Clay and two for Harrison.⁴² New Jersey, where Scott, a native of Virginia, now resided, took him as a favorite son; Michigan seemed disposed toward him; and Vermont too swung to the general who had calmed the strife on its borders. Weed also hoped to persuade Pennsylvania's warring factions to agree upon Scott as a compromise candidate, for both the Clay and Harrison conventions were sending rival delegations to the national conclave.

V

When the Whig party's first national convention opened in Harrisburg on December 4, 1839, in sum, what had begun as a three-way race between two regulars—Clay and Webster—and one outsider, Harrison, had become a three-way race between two "non-committal" generals and the party's leading congressional spokesman. By then, Clay's best hope seemed to be that Scott and Harrison might deadlock and that the party might turn to him as a compromise choice. He had solid support from the South, but portentously, all four states unrepresented at the convention were southern—Arkansas, Georgia, South Carolina, and Tennessee. Much of that support was discounted by the politicos at Harrisburg anyway, for in 1839 Whigs had lost elections in which Democrats had made Clay's potential candidacy an issue in Tennessee, North Carolina, Alabama, Georgia, and Mississippi. And the proslavery speeches Clay had made to win southern backing further alienated northern managers like Weed and Stevens.

Clay still had significant support in the North and had a plurality of the entire convention behind him. The delegations from Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Illinois as well as the border slave states of Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, and Missouri solidly favored the Kentuckian, and he had minority support in Ohio, New York, and Pennsylvania. With 128 of the 254 delegates necessary to win, Clay might still seize the prize if he could register the votes of his minorities in northern delegations.

But Whig losses in 1838 and 1839 and the subsequent conviction that victory required recruits from Democratic ranks made ambitious leaders like Weed and Stevens determined to stop Clay by neutralizing his plurality. To win in 1840, these leaders spurned a champion of Whig programs and sought instead a military hero with no preexisting political enemies who could broaden the base of the Whig electorate. Weed and Stevens cleared their first hurdle when the dispute between the rival Pennsylvania delegations was settled by deciding to have both represent the state. Since Stevens' pro-Harrison men outnumbered the pro-Clay delegates, the Harrison forces would control Pennsylvania. Then a Harrison delegate from Massachusetts, aided at a critical juncture by Stevens' Pennsylvania henchman. Charles Penrose, persuaded the convention to count the votes in a way that negated Clay's strength by concealing it. Instead of an open vote on the floor by the entire convention, balloting would be done in secret by a committee composed of three-man delegations from each state. Those men were instructed to poll their states and to report the preference of the majority as the vote of the entire delegation. Clay's minorities in the North would not be counted. Belatedly, Clay's floor managers recognized the danger, but after repeated efforts, they failed to reverse Penrose's insidious unit rule. The Southerners had been outmaneuvered by the savvy politicos from New York and Pennsylvania, an egregious lapse that later caused Clay to proclaim, "My friends are not worth the powder and shot it would take to kill them!"43

On the first ballot, Clay still led with 103 votes. All the Southerners, all the border states, and Illinois, Connecticut, and Rhode Island supported him. Harrison followed closely with ninety-one votes from Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana. Scott trailed with fifty-seven: forty-two from New York, seven from Vermont, and eight from New Jersey. Michigan's two delegates on the scene were divided between Scott and Clay, and they awaited the arrival of the state's third delegate to break the deadlock.

Frantic secret negotiations ensued. Weed, who had honed his formidable persuasive skills in the lobby of the New York legislature, was a master at such bargaining. After several ballots he had convinced Connecticut to shift to Scott and picked up Michigan's three votes after the arrival of the tardy delegate. Then the count read Scott, sixty-eight; Clay, ninety-six; and Harrison, ninety-one. At this juncture the tall, affable editor with his abundant supply of cigars prepared to approach the delegates from the South, especially North Carolina and Virginia, where he knew of some Scott sentiment.

Thaddeus Stevens beat him to the punch. Wandering among the Virginia delegation in the convention hall, he ostentatiously dropped a letter on the floor that Scott had written to Francis Granger of New York. How Stevens obtained this letter is unknown, but it was dynamite. Scott's letter was a clumsy attempt to win antislavery support in New York, and it immediately had the effect Stevens hoped for. The Virginians stopped all talk of switching to Scott and made it clear that if they deserted Clay, they would swing to Harrison.

As soon as Weed realized that he could get no southern support for Scott, he swung the votes he commanded into the Harrison column to finish off Clay. On the final ballot, New York, Michigan, and Vermont deserted Scott for Harrison, and Illinois abandoned Clay for the same bandwagon. Harrison won the nomination with 148 votes; Clay had 90; and Scott was reduced to 16 from New Jersey and Connecticut. Later, after Leslie Combs of Kentucky read a letter that Clay had written before the convention met pledging his cordial support for the choice of the convention, another one of Clay's friends moved that the nomination be made unanimous.

A combination of poor timing, poor management, and poor attendance had foiled Clay. Clearly, the most important cause of his defeat was the date of the convention itself, for the gathering followed a string of Whig defeats not only in the South but also in Indiana, Maine, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and even Massachusetts. Whigs in those states, as well as in New York, were in no mood to take a chance with the well-known senator, especially since the real impact of the price slump that began late in 1839 had yet to be felt. Had the Whigs chosen to convene in May 1840 when the Democrats renominated Van Buren, for example, prices would have been 16 percent lower than they were in December and the Whigs would have had a string of victories in Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Virginia behind them—a trend that pointed in a very different direction than the results in the summer and fall of 1839.⁴⁴

By itself, the timing of the convention had not been decisive. Clay's friends at Harrisburg had obviously been outmaneuvered by the Scott and Harrison managers like Weed, Stevens, and Charles Penrose. Had state delegations been allowed to split their votes, his support in Ohio, New York, and Pennsylvania might have pushed him so close to the necessary 128 votes on the first ballot that he would have been impossible to stop.

Less obviously but just as significantly, Clay also suffered from the failure of all the southern states to attend the convention. He received every southern vote on every ballot, and he paid a penalty for that firm southern support since it convinced Northerners that he had become too proslavery in order to get it. Yet Clay did not enjoy the full benefits of his popularity in the South because Arkansas, Georgia, South Carolina, and Tennessee were not represented at the convention. While Whigs had no chance of carrying Arkansas, its delegate would have cast the state's three votes for Clay had he arrived in Harrisburg in time for the convention. Nor did the Whigs have a realistic chance of carrying Calhoun's bailiwick; but had Clay supporters such as Senator William C. Preston bothered to come to Harrisburg, they could have added eleven more votes to Clay's column.

Support from Georgia would have been more problematic. Georgia's State Rights party did not send a delegation to Harrisburg because it still considered itself a separate organization and would not endorse Harrison until the spring of $1840^{.45}$ But given the solid southern support for Clay and northern resistance to him at Harrisburg, Georgians, had they attended the convention, would likely have joined the Clay camp, if only to help it overturn the unit rule.

Tennessee's absence from the convention was perhaps more crucial. Neither distance nor distaste deprived Clay of its support. Tennessee's Whig leaders like John Bell and Hugh Lawson White heartily favored Clay, as did other Whigs among Tennessee's congressional delegation. These men could easily have traveled from Washington to nearby Harrisburg to support him. But a foolish insistence on consistency stopped them. In 1835 and 1836 they had campaigned for Hugh White against Van Buren on the grounds that Van Buren's nomination by a convention denied the people a choice of their rulers, so Tennessee's Whigs had agreed from the moment the national convention was called in April 1838 that they could not possibly attend. Anticonvention sentiment thus cost Clay fifteen sure votes.⁴⁶

Had all four of these missing states attended the convention and supported Clay, the total number of votes would have been 294 and the majority necessary to win the nomination 148. Clay would have received 143 votes on the first ballot exclusive of his support in New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania, and even the skillful maneuvering of Weed and Stevens would probably have been unable to prevent his picking up the additional five votes, say, in New Jersey, where ailing Whig Senator Samuel Southard favored Clay's nomination.⁴⁷ Alternatively, the Clay forces almost surely could have overturned the unit rule on a floor vote, thereby releasing his supporters in New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania and guaranteeing his success.

Had Clay triumphed, the Whigs necessarily would have nominated a Northerner like New York's Tallmadge for vice president. Harrison's nomination instead ensured that the party would turn to a Southerner to balance the ticket and appease the disappointed Clay men. The names of John M. Clayton of Delaware, Benjamin Watkins Leigh of Virginia, Preston of South Carolina, and Willie Mangum of North Carolina were floated but with no result. The angry Clay supporter Reverdy Johnson of Maryland, who said that Clayton would never consent to benefit from the defeat of Clay, withdrew his name. Leigh, who was at the convention, refused to run. When none of the Southerners most closely associated with Clay would take the second place, the convention by default turned to former Senator John Tyler of Virginia.

The choice of Tyler would later prove to be disastrous. A state rights Democrat who had broken with Jackson over his Nullification Proclamation, he shared none of the views of the nationalistic wing of the party. A bitter personal foe of Conservative Senator William C. Rives, he and a few friends had blocked Clay's attempt to arrange a Whig-Conservative coalition behind Rives' reelection the previous spring. Nonetheless, Tyler had faithfully supported Clay for the nomination and had worked for him at the Harrisburg convention itself. Thus he seemed (quite wrongly) a prototypical southern Clay loyalist. No one else who fit that description would accept the nomination. Tyler, who was on the scene, eagerly agreed to run. Later, the patrician Whig diarist Philip Hone would wittily remark that "there was rhyme but no reason in it." But there was, of course, a reason—to rally the disgruntled southern Whigs behind Harrison. It was simply luck that the Whig ticket also inspired the most famous alliterative campaign slogan in American history—"Tippecanoe and Tyler, Too."48

The Whigs left Harrisburg with more than a snappy slogan. Despite their failure to adopt a national platform or issue a formal address to the voters, they defined the central themes of their ensuing campaign. Long before the convention, the strategists who defeated Clay for a more available candidate determined to prevent any formal programmatic commitments that might diminish his availability. One Whig had written to Weed in 1839, for example, "To correct the abuses of the Administration is sufficient motive to vigorous and efficient effort, and in politics, as well as in Philosophy—it is unwise to give more reasons than are necessary." Historians have long fastened on this and similar evidence to show that the Whigs were intent on avoiding issues. But to the Whigs, correcting "the abuses of the Administration" was itself a matter of deep principle. When one of the speechmakers on the convention's last day portrayed that mission in a particularly compelling way, therefore, the party published and widely broadcast his remarks. The Whig campaign, Judge Jacob Burnet of Cincinnati intoned, was a crusade "to save the liberty, the morals, and the happiness of the people, and to rescue the Constitution from the hands of profligate men, under whose management it is sinking into decay."

Although the Whigs had made it abundantly clear since 1837 that they meant economic prosperity when they referred to the happiness of the people, Burnet's delineation of the party's purpose was essentially the same credo that Henry Clay had advanced when he helped found the Whig party in the winter of 1833–34. The party had thrust its founder aside for a more available standard bearer, but the standard itself maintained first principles. As the Whig party launched its presidential campaign of 1840, therefore, it possessed more than a catchy motto. It also had a compelling cause—the restoration of prosperity and the salvation of republicanism itself.

VI

At a testimonial dinner arranged in Clay's behalf by his disappointed southern backers after the convention adjourned, Clay did much to ensure southern support for the ticket by calling for party unity. "We have not been contending for Henry Clay, for Daniel Webster, or for Winfield Scott," he declared. "No! We have been contending for principles. Not men, but principles, are our rules of action." Yet the marvelously imaginative presidential campaign the Whigs waged in 1840 is far better remembered for its slogans, its symbols, and its songs than for its principles. As soon as the convention had adjourned, Democratic newspapers accused the Whigs of fearing "to meet the issue upon all the momentous topics which . . . divide the American people," and many historians have agreed. To them the Whigs seemed to follow the scenario a New Yorker had outlined for Scott in 1839: "The General's lips must be hermetically sealed, and our shouts and hurras must be long and loud." The Whigs themselves appeared to admit that this was their strategy in one of the songs that made the campaign so notorious. 50

Mum is the word boys, Brag is the game; Cooney is the emblem of Old Tip's flame.

Without doubt, the Whigs employed flummery, mummery, and hoopla with astonishing ingenuity in order to arouse enthusiasm for Harrison and the Whig party. They rolled giant leather balls across the countryside to attract attention to the anti-Democratic slogans inscribed on them. They held countless parades and processions featuring transparencies and mobile floats. Tippecanoe clubs that proliferated across the country organized and provided supplies for huge rallies that drew tens of thousands of men—sometimes up to 100,000, according to Whig estimates—in Baltimore, in Nashville, in Springfield, Illinois, in Dayton, Ohio, at the Bunker Hill monument, at the Tippecanoe battleground itself, and elsewhere. Undeniably, as well, the Whigs raised sloganeering and political song making to a fine art. Chants such as "Tippecanoe and Tyler, Too," "Van, Van, Van—Van's a Used Up Man," and "Down with Martin Van Ruin!" were not only memorable, they were marvelously effective in bolstering Whig morale. So were the songs Whigs chorused at virtually every party gathering such as

Farewell, dear Van You're not our man; To guide the ship We'll try old Tip.⁵¹

Democrats might protest that all the rigmarole that accompanied the Whig campaign was superficial nonsense designed to disguise a senile, unqualified candidate and to evade issues, but they had only themselves to blame for handing the Whigs the central emblems that made that campaign so famous. Shortly after the nomination was announced, Democratic newspapers widely reprinted a story that had first appeared in a Democratic sheet in Baltimore in order to ridicule Harrison's pretensions to the presidency. Taunting an unhappy Clay supporter when news of the decision at Harrisburg became public, the Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Republican proudly reported this put-down of Harrison: "Give him a barrel of hard cider, and settle a pension of two thousand a year on him, and my word for it, he will sit the remainder of his days in his log cabin. . . ."⁵² The sixty-seven-year-old ex-soldier, Democrats everywhere jeered, was ready for retirement. Nothing in his undistinguished career qualified him for high office.

William Henry Harrison was neither poor nor the resident of a log cabin. While he currently held only the lowly post of a clerk of court, he had been not only a general, but also a territorial governor, a congressman, and a United States senator. Still, shrewd Whigs gleefully seized on this Democratic canard to prove that their candidate was a common man who would represent the poor. "Log-Cabin Candidate," the New York Daily Whig indignantly trumpeted, "is the term of reproach given . . . to General Harrison . . . by pampered office-holders . . . who sneer at the idea of making a poor man President of the United States." "Gen. Harrison is sneered at by the Eastern office-holders' pimps, as the 'Log-Cabin Candidate,'" echoed a professedly outraged Whig editor from Illinois.⁵³

Thus log cabins, hard cider, and the accompanying coonskins that attested to the candidate's frontier background became the dominant symbols of a symbol-laden campaign. Transparencies featuring log cabins were hoisted during parades, log cabins were raised at Whig gatherings, and hard cider was freely dispensed. A weekly campaign sheet, ably edited by the brilliant young Horace Greeley and called the Log Cabin, became the Whigs' major newspaper during the race, with a national circulation reaching 80,000 copies a week. One item of the paraphernalia used to publicize this pervasive theme made a permanent contribution to the American vernacular. To quench the thirst of ardent Whigs, a Philadelphia distiller bottled Log-Cabin Whiskey in small bottles shaped like cabins. The liquor became so famous that the name of its distiller, E. G. Booz, soon became a synonym for whiskey itself.

The slogans, symbols, songs, and speeches that glorified log cabins, hard cider, and coonskins had a more serious purpose than providing simple amusement, however. They were meant to draw a sharp contrast between Harrison and Van Buren and to remind voters that Van Buren and the Democrats both were responsible for the depression and refused to help the common man out of it. Whigs eagerly if falsely proclaimed Harrison a poor man because they tried to paint Van Buren as a pampered, aristocratic dandy—much as the Jacksonians had unfairly vilified John Ouincy Adams in 1828.

The central weapon in this smear campaign was a scandalously demagogic speech delivered by an obscure Whig congressman from Pennsylvania named Charles Ogle. Entitling his diatribe "The Regal Splendor of the Presidential Palace," the ostensibly horrified Pennsylvanian took three days in April to recount the unrepublican luxury in which Van Buren wallowed. Bewailing the poverty of his unemployed constituents, the congressman contrasted it to the opulence of the White House. Room by room he described its thick "Royal Wilton" carpets, its silk draperies, and its huge gold-framed mirrors. While the poor had to eat hominy and hog meat, he claimed, Van Buren had hired French chefs to prepare gourmet meals served on gold plates with sterling silver service. While they made do with hard cider, Van Buren guzzled champagne. Worst of all, while they were lucky to make 25 cents a day, Van Buren earned $2.81 an hour while living like a king.⁵⁴

This outrageous philippic was widely circulated by the Whigs' central campaign committee in Washington, and throughout the campaign the army of Whig orators who crisscrossed the country rang variations on the same theme. The Whigs were the party of the poor and the Democrats were the party of uncaring office-holders, corrupted by the wealth of office. "The Log Cabin is a symbol of nothing that Van Burenism knows, feels or can appreciate," argued Thurlow Weed in his Albany Evening Journal. "It tells of the hopes of the humble—of the privations of the poor— . . . it is the emblem of rights that the vain and insolent aristocracy of federal office-holders have . . . trampled upon." 55

Whigs did more than simply agitate class antagonisms against the Democrats. They constantly reminded voters that there was a depression, that the Democrats had caused it, that Van Buren argued that government should do nothing about it, and that a Whig triumph was necessary to end it. The theme of one document broadcast by the central committee of Whig congressmen in Washington was encapsulated in its title: "Harrison and Prosperity or Van Buren and Ruin." Campaigning in New Jersey, South Carolina Senator William C. Preston carefully reminded his audience that no previous presidential campaign had ever found prices as low as "wheat at fifty cents a bushel and cotton at six cents." Then, ravaging the Democratic response to such hardship, he proclaimed, "Well indeed may the President, in his marble palace, amid luxurious appliances, with well-paid salary, exclaim 'The people expect too much from Government.'" Ohio's

Whig gubernatorial candidate, Tom Corwin, stressed the same theme when he promised that wheat would be a dollar a bushel under Harrison and forty cents a bushel under Van Buren.⁵⁶

Many Whig speakers and much Whig propaganda simply denounced the Democrats for causing the depression and promised prosperity with a change of regime without delineating Whig measures to effect economic recovery. Furthermore, Whigs in some states, especially in the South, specifically denied that the party favored higher tariffs or a new national bank. But others campaigned differently. In 1840, the Whigs' most important presidential elector in Illinois, Abraham Lincoln, based his campaign for Harrison on the need for a new national bank to supply credit for the common man. Similarly, the brilliant Mississippi orator S. S. Prentiss, while touring the North, openly defended the Bank of the United States with the epigrammatic motto "Credit is the poor man's capital." In New Jersey, Prentiss also stressed the need for a protective tariff, and Pennsylvania's Whigs marched under banners proclaiming "Tip, Tyler, and the Tariff." Stumping for Harrison in North Carolina, Whig George Badger charged that the deflationary impact of the Independent Treasury Act's specie provisions would fall most harshly "upon the poor, and those who are in moderate circumstances and owe money." Furthermore, he pledged that Harrison favored repeal of that act and distribution of federal land revenues to the states. While Harrison personally opposed a new national bank, he added, if a Whig Congress chartered a new one, Harrison would sign rather than veto the legislation.⁵⁷

The disappointed Senate duo of Clay and Webster also injected issues into the campaign on occasion, although God-like Daniel shamelessly posed as a common man and at one point even threatened to use fisticuffs if any Democrat dared call him an aristocrat. In a few speeches, however, Webster specifically lashed out at Democratic deflationary policies as disastrous to the poor and said that government had a duty to provide a sound and ample currency through a new national bank or some other means. Henry Clay, during an address near his birthplace in Hanover County, Virginia, called for the deposit of federal funds in state banks or a new national bank, whichever voters deemed more expedient, and advocated once again his scheme to distribute land revenues to the states. In the same speech, however, Clay also renounced any plans to raise the tariff and said that the compromise schedules of 1833 should remain intact.⁵⁸

More important, voters did not require concrete proposals from campaign orators to know where Whigs stood on the issues. Since 1837 in both Congress and the states, they had outlined their economic program and sharply contrasted it with Democratic alternatives. In 1840, it should be recalled, Massachusetts Whig legislators published a point-by-point rebuttal to Democratic Governor Marcus Morton's anticorporation agenda. Kentucky's Whigs boldly proposed to raise taxes in order to complete the state's river improvements. Pennsylvania Whigs condemned Democrats as "bearded enthusiasts" whose ignorant and visionary schemes would prostrate the state's banking and credit systems. New York's Whig Governor Seward continued to call for lavish expenditures on the canal system; Ohio's Whig newspapers attacked the antibanking policies of the state's Democrats for destroying the credit poor men so badly needed; Virginia, Alabama, and Mississippi Whigs made much of trying to defend state banks from Democratic assaults on them; and Whigs and Democrats in the North Carolina legislature were at well-publicized loggerheads over banking, corporate rights, and subsidies for internal improvements. The epithet "Loco Foco" that Whigs everywhere used to describe Democrats was meant to underline their dangerous economic radicalism. It hardly took campaign speeches to remind the electorate that the two parties were fundamentally at odds over general economic philosophy and specific economic programs.⁵⁹

If the motto "Down with Martin Van Ruin!" encapsulates the central thrust of the Whig campaign. Whigs also used other issues to discredit Democrats and justify reform. Judge Jacob Burnet's widely circulated speech had promised a crusade to save not only the prosperity but also the liberty and morals of the people, and the Whigs addressed those themes as well. To appeal to the sober, churchgoing middle class they portrayed Democrats as an irreligious, immoral rabble who threatened the very foundations of social order. In September, Horace Greeley sounded the tocsin in the Log Cabin. "Wherever you find a bitter, blasphemous Atheist and an enemy of Marriage, Morality, and Social Order, there you may be certain of one vote for Van Buren."60 Such a charge coming from a party that was simultaneously drenching the electorate in booze may seem palpably hypocritical, but it was effective. So was one of the Whigs' biggest campaign innovations that year. In sharp contrast to Democrats, whose demonstrations remained exclusively male and often rowdy affairs, Whigs ostentatiously invited their wives, sisters, and daughters to rallies to testify to the party's familyoriented respectability.61

Yet the salvation of liberty and republican self-government constituted the Whigs' second most important theme. Their portrayals of Van Buren as a dissipated, effete monarch reminded voters that Democrats represented executive despotism. To save freedom and republicanism, Whigs iterated and reiterated, the people had to oust their oppressors. The title of Calvin Colton's campaign tract, The Crisis of the Country, conveyed the Whigs' sense that republicanism was in danger. Abruptly abandoning Whigs' antipartyism of the mid-1830s, Colton called two-party competition necessary to preserve republicanism by allowing the people to change their rulers. "The two great parties of this country will always remain nearly equal to watch each other, and every few years there must be a change," he asserted. "This is essential to the preservation of our liberties. If power stays always in the hands of one party, the leaders would ruin us." "62"

Other Whigs emphasized the same theme in even more apocalyptic language. "Your Federal Government, which was established with limitations, checks and balances, to preserve the principles of civil liberty, is undergoing a change fatal to its republican character," declared the address of the New York Whig state convention. Like the Revolution, Clay proclaimed in his speech at Hanover County, Virginia, "this contest... is to preserve the liberties of the country." The election, declared the Whig Raleigh Register in North Carolina, "must determine the great question [of] whether we are to live as SLAVES or FREED-MEN."

As members of a slaveholding society, southern Whigs had an acute sense of the difference between slavery and freedom and a particularly strong fear of enslavement. As they had in 1836, and as they would continue to do in presidential campaigns as long as the Whig party existed, they gave a peculiar sectional cast to this central Whig theme. Like southern Democrats, southern Whigs included the freedom to own black slaves in the concept of liberty for white men, and they attacked Van Buren once again as a menace to that right. In contrast, they portrayed Harrison, a native of Virginia, as perfectly safe on the slavery issue and proudly printed in their newspapers statements that Harrison had made averse to the abolitionists. "The entire portion of that speech relating to abolition," declared the Richmond Whig in a fashion typical of Whig papers throughout Dixie, "breathes the most ardent and devoted attachment to the rights and institutions of the South."

Southern Whigs also iterated the standard line that Van Buren tyrannically menaced liberty in general. Even more than their northern compatriots, they focused on a proposal by Van Buren's secretary of war, Joel Poinsett, himself a South Carolinian, to reform the militia system. Poinsett's well-publicized proposal in effect called for mandatory service by all young men in the militia and national supervision of its training. Whigs everywhere, but especially in the South, jumped on this scheme as an attempt to create a standing army, enslave young men, enlarge the patronage at the disposal of the executive, and centralize more power in his hands—power, they implied, that might some day be used against slavery itself. "ONE STEP TOWARD FURTHER MONARCHY," thundered the New Orleans Bee. "Strike off these manacles of a cold-blooded party despot, and restore your sons to freedom," urged the Richmond Whig. "Expel from the Capitol the man who would subjugate them and you."65

Even Harrison himself raised the call to save republican liberty. According to custom in the nineteenth century, presidential candidates did not take to the stump themselves. They left that chore to congressmen, presidential electors, and other politicos. But the old soldier, goaded by Democratic taunts that he was "General Mum" kept in an iron cage by his advisors so that his views would not be publicized, decided to break the tradition. He accepted an invitation to attend an anniversary celebration of the battle of Fort Meigs in June and then toured Ohio, giving some twenty-three speeches to cheering throngs. Harrison stressed the traditional Whig fear of a strong executive. He pledged that he would serve only one term, denounced excessive use of the veto power, and said that he would abide by congressional decisions on most policies. With such declarations, he assured regular Whigs that he adhered to their most important principle—resistance to executive tyranny.

Harrison's stand on specific issues like a new national bank and abolitionism was artfully ambiguous in these speeches, and he personally repeated the nonsense about his residence in a log cabin. Clearly and emphatically, he nevertheless established his credentials as a champion and exponent of republican values. "The old-fashioned Republican rule is to watch the Government," he lectured the sunscorched multitude at Fort Meigs. "See that the Government does not acquire too much power. Keep check upon your rulers. Do this, and liberty is safe." As a simple republican, he proclaimed to an even larger crowd at Dayton, he was appalled that "the Government is now a practical monarchy." If elected, he would reduce "the power and influence of the National Executive"; he would not run for reelection; and he would not attempt to name his successor. Instead he would return "that high trust... to the people."

Democrats tried to resist the Whig juggernaut as best they could. They attacked "old Granny" Harrison as a phony hero and claimed that mantle for their own vice presidential candidate, Richard M. Johnson, the purported slayer of Tecumseh. They denounced the Whig campaign as a carnival that insulted the intelligence of the people. Through "banners of Cider Barrels, log cabins, coonskins, gourds, and a hundred other such fooleries," an Alabama Democrat protested, the Whigs were "practicing the most corrupt and unprincipled acts that ever men did, by misleading the ignorant portion of the people." At the same time, Democrats tried to match the Whigs by inventing symbols, songs, and slogans of their own. And they too bequeathed a phrase to the American lexicon when they attempted to coin a nickname for their own candidate to show his common origins. Jackson had been Old Hickory and Harrison was Old Tip. Now Van Buren became Old Kinderhook, which was rapidly reduced in Democratic slogans to O.K., as in "Down with the Whigs, boys, O.K." To counteract the Whig posture as the party of the respectable classes, Democrats both denounced their copious use of spirits to benumb voters and parodied it in ditties such as:

Hush-a-by-baby; Daddy's a Whig, Before he comes home Hard Cider he'll swig;

Then he'll be Tipsy And over he'll fall; Down will come Daddy, Tip, Tyler and all.⁶⁷

More seriously, Democrats mobilized their control of local postmasterships to distribute copies of the official campaign paper, the Extra Globe. Southern Democrats labeled Harrison himself an abolitionist, stressed that abolitionists dominated the Whig party's northern wing, and warned that if Harrison truly did accede to the will of Congress, disaster threatened the South. "PEOPLE OF THE SOUTH," screamed Thomas Ritchie's Richmond Enquirer, "You will find out (will it be too late?) that Whiggery and Abolition are BOTH ONE throughout the Northern, middle, and Northwestern States." Whiggery was "Federalism and Abolition United" echoed the Globe. In the South as elsewhere, Democrats repeatedly attacked as blatant hypocrisy the Whigs' attempt to pose as the party of the poor. Whatever Whigs said, they insisted, the Whigs were the party of wealthy Federalist aristocrats and bankers. The central Democratic slogan was "SHALL THE BANKS OR THE PEOPLE RULE?" Only the Democratic party, they proclaimed in countless ways, could protect the equal rights and freedom of the people from the privilege and despotism of the corrupt Whig Money Power. Just as the Whigs continued to portray themselves as champions of republican liberty and equality, in short, so did the Democrats. Both parties insisted that the salvation of republicanism was at stake.68

For all of the charges and countercharges, for all of the demonstrations and counterdemonstrations, for all of the bandying back and forth of catchy slogans, one fact above all determined the outcome of the election. The depression deepened as the year progressed. The Democratic response of removing federal money from private circulation, restricting the note issues of private banks, and curtailing credit had clearly failed to produce a recovery. The Democratic message that people should not look to their government for aid seemed heartless. In contrast, the Whig call for positive governmental intervention to restore prosperity appeared both promising and necessary.

Despite the circus-like campaign and the tomfoolery, the voters knew what policies they could expect should either party win. They had not only past policies but also the outcomes of these policies to go by.⁶⁹ In consequence, the hard-pressed residents of commercially oriented regions turned to the Whigs in even greater numbers than they had in 1837 and early 1838. While the Whigs gained fresh support from all kinds of voters, their appeal to both new and old voters was especially strong among residents of the wealthiest communities whose farmers, planters, and businessmen were most heavily involved in the production and exchange of goods for cash. In the areas most concerned with economic recovery and the promotion of growth, in short, not only the wealthy and the middle class but also many workers who depended on prosperity for jobs surged toward the Whig party.

From March until October 1840, the Whigs rolled up a stunning string of victories in state and congressional elections in which the programmatic differences between the parties had been sharply etched. The voter turnout in those elections often matched and sometimes surpassed the outpouring in the presidential election itself. Only setbacks in heavily Democratic New Hampshire, Arkansas, Illinois, and Missouri and a narrow loss in Maine bucked the Whig trend. Contrary to the calculations of Whig managers at Harrisburg, triumphs in the subnational elections of 1840 demonstrate that the Whigs hardly needed a military hero or campaign hoopla to win the White House. The depression and the perceived party responses to it largely determined the outcome.

In November, Harrison carried nineteen of twenty-six states to crush Van Buren in the electoral vote by a margin of 234 to 60. Old Kinderhook won only Arkansas, Missouri, and Illinois in the West; Alabama, South Carolina, and Virginia in the South; and New Hampshire in the Northeast. The popular vote was closer than the electoral rout indicated. Harrison captured about 53 percent compared to Van Buren's 47 percent, with the newly formed abolitionist Liberty party draining off less than 0.3 percent. Harrison's margins in Maine, New York, and Pennsylvania were perilously thin, but he lost Illinois and Virginia almost as narrowly.

The contest drew a larger proportion of the eligible electorate to the polls than any previous presidential election. The share of adult male voters jumped from 57.8 percent in 1836 to 80.2 percent in 1840, and the rate of participation was even higher than that in fifteen of the twenty-five states that had a popular vote. In absolute numbers the total vote grew by over 900,000 between the two elections, a jump of some 60 percent over 1836. Those new voters constituted 37.5 percent of the total vote in 1840, and the Whigs captured almost three-fifths of them. Surely, the excitement generated by the log-cabin campaign and the furious reaction of Democrats to Whig boasting helped account for this record participation. Surely, the new voters who were brought out primarily by hoopla and free cider helped Old Tip to triumph. Harrison, indeed, ran ahead of gubernatorial and congressional Whig tickets in every state of the nation, and by significant margins in some, like Kentucky, New Hampshire, and Pennsylvania.⁷² To that extent, one might credit mummery and meaningless hurrahs for the individual success of Tippecanoe and Tyler too. But Harrison outpaced state and congressional Whig candidates in 1840 largely because Democrats, demoralized by defeats earlier in the year, cast fewer votes for the unpopular Van Buren than they had for state and congressional candidates (Table 8).

By the same token, most of the increment in the Whig popular vote in 1840 occurred in the state and congressional elections that preceded the November balloting, not in the presidential election itself. Such was the case in eleven of the fourteen states that held elections prior to November for which returns are available.⁷³ The Whig party as an institution, and not simply the popular military hero, enjoyed an immense accession of new voter support in 1840.

VIII

The Whig party did more than win control of the White House, Congress, and many state governments in the elections of 1840. It also established the basic organizational structure, the basic electoral strategy, and the basic voter coalition that would characterize the party until its disintegration in the 1850s. To be sure, the party would be required to address new issues in the future, but always it would pose as the champion of liberty, morals, and prosperity. As they had in 1840, moreover, Whigs would always attempt to demonstrate that their response to an issue differed from that of Democrats. The size of the Whig voter coalition would grow in the future, but never as rapidly or as decisively as it had since 1837. Never again, indeed, would the total vote increase between presidential elections at the same rate it had between 1836 and 1840. It would expand by only 330,000 between 1840 and 1844, by 178,000 between 1844 and 1848, and by 280,000 between 1848 and 1852. Equally important, the size of the vote would never again grow continuously in off-year elections, as it had between 1836 and 1840. Instead, the familiar modern pattern of a drop-off rather than an increase in turnout became more and more frequent in those contests.

Although new voters helped decide some future elections, never again would they weigh as heavily in the total vote or in the calculations of political leaders. After 1840, both Whig and Democratic leaders concentrated primarily on reinforcing the allegiance of previously committed voters to rouse the faithful rather than on making converts. Both parties would continue to use techniques they had adopted in 1840. They developed elaborate organizations coordinated during presidential campaigns by central committees in Washington and extending to states, congressional districts, counties, towns, precincts, and wards that identified voters who favored their party and tried to get them to the polls. Both depended heavily on skillful newspaper editors, who were supported when possible by government printing contracts or other party funds, to denounce the enemy in hyperbolic terms as some dreadful monster intent on destroying republicanism. Both parties utilized hurrah techniques and liberal quantities of liquor to mobilize their constituents and draw the uninitiated into their ranks.

"This table is based on the raw vote totals for congressional and gubernatorial elections listed in Congressional Quarterly's Guide to U.S. Elections and the sums for the presidential vote in 1840 listed in Burnham, Presidential Ballots, 18364892. Changes in the vote are calculated from the immediately preceding election. For every state in which congressional or gubernatorial elections were held in 1840 prior to November, the change registered in the "Congressional or Gubernatorial" column is measured from equivalent elections in 1838 or 1839, whereas the change registered in the "Presidential" column is measured from that previous 1840 election. For the November states of Delaware, Massachusetts, Michigan, Mississippi, and New York, both columns reflect changes from the results of the most proximate election in 1838 or 1839.

Nonetheless, just as in the issue-oriented contests from 1837 to 1840, after Harrison's victory both Whigs and Democrats sought to mobilize voters primarily by defining their differences as sharply as possible. Political leaders palpably believed that voters responded to conflict between the parties. The chief function of party-controlled newspapers was to educate voters about those contrasts. In addition, both parties spent enormous amounts of time and money printing and circulating speeches, pamphlets, and addresses defining where the parties stood on issues and the probable outcomes of their respective policies.

Like the Democrats, the Whigs not only emphasized that they advocated distinctive programs, they also stressed that they represented the values, interests, and needs of the particular groups in society who formed their voting base. Each party drew some support from virtually every element in the social spectrum, whether that element was defined by occupation, class, religion, ethnicity, or regional identity. Nonetheless, Whigs and Democrats attracted distinguishably different constituencies. The new recruits added to each coalition after 1837 reinforced earlier tendencies. The central fault line or cleavage in the electorate separated men with different degrees of experience in and different attitudes toward the market economy and the cultural values it spawned. Broadly put, Democrats were a coalition of those still outside the market economy who feared its spread and those who had experienced and been victimized by market mechanisms. Whigs, in contrast, attracted those who wanted to expand the market sector because they had already enjoyed its benefits or hoped to do so in the future. But that was not the only cleavage in the electorate. The Whig constituency requires closer examination, for it simultaneously contributed to the party's image, placed constraints on leadership strategy because Whig politicians could not flout it, helped engender the factional rivalry that mushroomed in many states and within the national party as a whole, and helped determine how the party would later break up.

Whigs ran well among almost all social classes in cities and trading centers, but they were especially attractive to the economic and social elite of those communities. Of men worth more than $100,000 in New York, for example, 85 percent were Whig; in Boston, 89 percent of a similar category adhered to Whiggery; and in the relatively poorer city of Pittsburgh, three-fourths of the men worth more than $25,000 were Whigs. Not only fear of Democratic radicalism and attraction to the Whig economic platform explain this behavior. For such patricians, belonging to the Whig party was the equivalent of belonging to an exclusive gentlemen's club of social peers.⁷⁴

The economic demarcation between the parties' constituencies was especially clear in a number of southern states because soil types varied from region to region and wealthy and poor counties were separated geographically. Intrastate regional antagonisms therefore often reinforced the different economic needs and values of Democratic and Whig voters. Whigs were strongest in the black-belt plantation regions, where the proportions of both slaves and slaveholders were high: central Georgia, central and southern Alabama, the western delta counties of Mississippi along the river, western Tennessee, the southern sugar-growing parishes of Louisiana, and the bluegrass, hemp-producing center of Kentucky. Louisiana's sugar planters, like Kentucky's hemp producers, not only favored a protective tariff, in contrast to cotton planters, but the majority of the population in those southern parishes was French Creole. In contrast, Democrats dominated the less prosperous areas of northwestern Louisiana, the piney woods regions of eastern Mississippi, the hill country of northern Alabama between the Tennessee River and the black belt, the hilly Cherokee district of northwest Georgia, and the mountainous regions of eastern Kentucky and southwestern Virginia. Not only was the soil of those areas less valuable and less productive, but most of the Democratic voters were nonslaveholders.

There were, of course, variations from this central pattern in every state. In Louisiana, for example, while the French sugar-planting parishes in the southern portion of the state were Whig strongholds, cotton-growing native American planters along the Mississippi River north of New Orleans tended to vote Democratic, as did the poorer farmers in the northwestern sector of the state. Within New Orleans, the South's largest metropolis, in contrast, the ethnic pattern was reversed. There native-born Protestants in general, and the commercial community in particular, tended to vote Whig, whereas recently arrived German and Irish immigrants, most of whom were Catholic, voted Democratic.⁷⁵

In Kentucky, class rather than ethnic lines shuffled with location. In the central, commercially oriented and Whig-dominated bluegrass regions, slaveholders normally voted Whig and nonslaveholders Democratic. Yet in the peripheral areas of the state controlled by Democrats—poor farming communities along the Ohio River to the north, eastern mountainous counties, less developed counties along the southern border with Tennessee, and the Jackson Purchase in the extreme west—wealthy slaveholders voted Democratic, while Whigs drew support from the economic and social outs.⁷⁶

Aside from idiosyncratic South Carolina, Virginia and North Carolina provided the greatest exceptions to the usual electoral cleavage in slave states. In both, most slaveholders voted Democratic, whereas nonslaveholders who lived outside the slaveholding cotton- and tobacco-producing regions voted Whig. In those states remote regions wanted Whig internal improvements, while planters feared the taxes necessary to pay for them. Regardless of region, towns that wanted commercial development like Raleigh, Fayetteville, Newburn, Wilmington, and Ashville in North Carolina and Norfolk, Richmond, Petersburg, Danville, and Staunton in Virginia supported the Whig party much more strongly than did the rural areas of the counties in which they were located. Tennessee offered its own variation on this pattern. Many slaveholders in the wealthiest counties of middle and western Tennessee voted Whig, but so did many nonslaveholders in mountainous eastern Tennessee.⁷⁷

The division of the electorate in many northern states was even more complex because the population was much more diverse. There rival cultural groups were much more frequently in contact, and they often chose one party simply because the hostile group supported the other. These groups might be religious. Everywhere, for example, Catholics voted overwhelmingly for the Democrats, while the Protestants who disliked them the most—Presbyterians, Congregationalists, and Baptists—voted Whig when they lived near them. But Protestants were hardly unified behind the Whig party. Often long-standing rivalries among more or less established denominations determined how men chose political sides. In New England, for example, Congregationalists tended to be Whig, whereas Baptists, Methodists, and in some states even Episcopalians tended to vote Democratic because of residual animosities from earlier battles to disestablish the Congregational church.⁷⁸

At the same time, northern Protestant denominations tended to divide on moral reform. Evangelical men and women stirred by the revivals of the 1820s and 1830s, who saw no separation between religious and secular realms and thought that Christians must ensure that society adhered to God's standards of behavior as revealed in the Bible, tended to support the Whigs. These included New School Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Free Will Baptists, and some Methodists. On the other hand, denominations that believed religious and secular spheres should be kept separate, that frowned on intrusive and especially stateimposed do-goodism, like Catholics, Lutherans, German Reformed churches, and southern Anti-Mission Baptists, tended to vote Democratic. The following statement by Virginia's Anti-Mission Baptists well reflects the resentment that Democratic voters felt toward what they regarded as the moral imperialism of Whig voters. "We have no Christian fellowship for those who advocate the Missionary, Bible, Tract, or Temperance societies, Sunday School Union, anxious seats or anything of that kind as a religious institution or means of grace; nor with any person who communes with a church which advocates any of these institutions." Yet the Whigs attracted precisely those people most likely to belong to such religious organizations, people who wanted to impose moral standards on others through legislation like Sunday blue laws or prohibition, people who favored a culturally homogeneous society and who felt threatened by alien cultural values.⁷⁹

Ethnocultural divisions also fragmented the northern electorate. In most cities, recent immigrants from Germany and Ireland tended to support the Democrats, while recent British immigrants—the Scots, Scotch-Irish Protestants, English, and Welsh, who despised their Catholic countrymen and yearned for assimilation into the community—voted Whig since the Whigs were the party of the upper and middle classes in most communities. Those native-born American Protestants who felt threatened by immigrants also voted Whig, but clearly there was no nation-wide polarization of natives against immigrants. Even so, Whigs who lived in cities near immigrants were much more prone to nativism and openly anti-immigrant political positions than were Whig leaders from rural areas where few if any immigrants or Catholics resided. By the same token, Whigs who lived in those areas of the North that had more than negligible black populations—and those areas were usually cities—were generally more biased against black rights than were Whigs from white rural areas. The seeds of Whig factionalism over the proper party strategy with regard to nativism, prohibition, black rights, and slavery, that is, often lay in the social composition of different communities.

Northern voting alignments also reflected distinctive regional outlooks. While voters within New England divided along religious and economic lines, for example, Yankee migrants to western New York, northern Pennsylvania, and the northern portions of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois voted more solidly Whig than did their relatives back in New England. Once they left New England, Yankees came into contact with Democratic demographic groups with conflicting values. In the Midwest, the rival group was primarily Southerners who had settled in southern portions of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois years before the Yankees arrived in northern portions of those states. In part, this clash reflected different economic orientations as well. Yankees advocated more economic diversification and commercial development than did Southerners. Hence, they leaned toward Whiggery. But again, no group unanimously supported one party or the other.⁸⁰

One social distinction was more important than all others. The majority of the middle and upper classes in rural areas, small towns, and large cities supported the Whigs—especially in relatively prosperous areas involved in the production and exchange of goods for cash. The party's economic platform constituted one reason for this support, but not the only one. Whigs portrayed themselves as the party of probity, respectability, morality, and reason—as "the party of law, of order, of enterprise, of improvement, of beneficence, of hope, and of humanity," New York's Whigs put in 1844. By improvement and order, Whigs meant more than physical improvement of the community or social order. They meant selfimprovement and self-discipline. They believed that men must be educated, that individuals must control carnal appetites and other dangerous passions with their reason, and that they must develop habits of sobriety, thrift, industry, and selfcontrol. In contrast, the Whigs painted the Democrats as wild-eyed radicals, agrarian levelers, "bearded enthusiasts," lawless and lazy drunkards, a contemptible and dangerous rabble. In many communities, those who considered themselves church-going, God-fearing, law-abiding, sober, educated, and respectable probably voted Whig. In turn, they probably associated any manifestation of social disorder—be it prostitution, public drunkenness, Sabbath breaking, or rowdyism—and any opposition to social improvement—such as resistance to school taxes—with Democrats. In addition to evangelical desire for moralistic legislation, in short, a cultural tone of patrician respectability attracted many Whig adherents. Not only middle-class shopkeepers and artisans but also native-born workers and English,

Scottish, and Scotch-Irish immigrants who yearned for respectability leaned toward the Whigs because of that tone or image.⁸¹

Precisely Whigs' smug, holier-than-thou attitude, precisely their attempt to distance themselves (psychologically, rhetorically, and often physically) from supposedly uncouth inferiors allowed Democrats to pillory them as silk-stocking snobs. Democrats thus not only capitalized on resentment toward and fear of the Whigs' economic and social programs. They also exploited popular antagonism against Whigs' very tone and image.

Different economic circumstances, different values, different needs, and different sides on a host of ethnic, religious, regional, and cultural rivalries thus all helped to determine why an individual joined the Whigs or the Democrats. Once men attached themselves to a party, moreover, they rarely changed that affiliation, even though they might not participate in every election. Once formed, indeed, party identity caused partisans to vote as much because of what their party had stood for in the past as because of how it stood on current issues. Intense emotions and rational calculations of future benefits had caused hundreds of thousands of voters to affiliate with the Whig or Democratic party between 1837 and 1840. Then party identity itself often shaped behavior. Party adherents would vote as much out of loyalty to their own organization or a negative reaction against the other as because of immediate issues.

After 1840 political leaders could predict how most men would vote. The question was whether they voted at all. To mobilize the troops, Whig politicians developed an organization, used hurrah techniques, and stressed that the parties were in conflict. By demonstrating that interparty conflict existed, they reinforced party identity and capitalized on the animosity between Whig and Democratic voters. They could usually count on their former supporters voting Whig, if only to inflict a defeat on, or to avert the mortification of a victory by, the despised foe. "As a general rule," wrote a Mississippian, "about one half of those who vote look upon the privilege as worthless unless they can use it to gratify a personal hostility or religious antipathies, or to inflict injury on what they hate." Party leaders sought to instigate men "to inflict injury on what they hate" rather than to stay home on election day.

Not all voters, in short, shared leaders' awareness of, or interest in, every issue contested in distant state capitals and Washington. For them nineteenth-century partisan combat resembled the competitive mechanism between fans of opposing twentieth-century college football teams. At most times their support for the team is latent, but the big game with the traditional rival fills the stadium with screaming partisans. Aroused spectators may have little interest in the game's intricacies or even in bettering the team's overall record, but they thirst for triumph over the long-time foe, if only to avoid his taunts. In 1846, for example, a Massachusetts Democrat gloried in a rare triumph over the party's "common and uncompromising enemies; for I deeply feel the truth of the fact that they are our bitterest foes! And a small victory, like this gained over them, gives me more pleasure than I can express in words." Sometimes, more than pride or boasting rights was involved in this yen for victory. Just as with many athletic contests today, Whig and Democratic partisans bet heavily with each other on the outcome of elections. Thus they had a financial as well as an emotional stake in which party won.83

Just as it took the event of the game itself to covert latent into active support in the case of football fans, it took conflict to get Whig and Democratic voters to the polls. Hence, Whig newspapers defined how the parties differed on specific issues, and Whig committees distributed pamphlets highlighting the contrast between the parties. Hence, Whigs and Democrats alike welcomed joint debates on the stump, not only to educate voters on where the respective parties stood but also because the spectacle of Whig and Democratic spokesmen actually clashing on the hustings galvanized a party's voters the way a big game excited a team's fans. Thus, in 1851 when a Tennessee Whig deplored "some lukewarmness, not to say defection, among some Whigs," he thought "they need warming up. If we could have a collision on the stump here, it would help us much." The sheer fact of conflict caused adrenalin to flow.

For similar reasons, politicians welcomed attacks from the opposing party because nothing better stirred up the fighting spirit in their own ranks. In 1844, for example, Georgia's Alexander H. Stephens rejoiced that "the Locos seem determined to do what they can by gasconnading, and the only effect of it is I think to arouse the Whigs and make them energetic, and that is all we want." Five years later, a Chicago Whig echoed Stephens: "Whenever a locofoco abuses, or attempts to abuse a Whig—the more I like that Whig—and the more opprobrium a Locofoco Press, attempts to hurl upon him, the closer I cling to him."

Yet interparty conflict involved far more than competition for the sake of competition. Party battles often directly channeled regional, social, economic, religious, and cultural conflict of the deepest sort. If the political parties did not stand for something different from each other, antagonistic social groups would not bother to support one party rather than the other, for they could not score a victory over the other through the political process. That triumph might result in a concrete policy advocated by a social group's party and opposed by its rivals—say, a Sunday blue law, a bank charter, or an internal improvement bill. It might be simply vicarious for some ethnic, religious, or regional groups—the thrill that our party won while theirs lost. But for rival social groups to retain faith in the efficacy of the Whig and Democratic parties as channels for their social conflict, they had to believe that the parties were in political conflict over the various issues with which they dealt, whether or not those particular issues directly touched the interests of the social group.

Casting a ballot also served a political purpose broader than enactment of legislation or humiliation of a traditional foe. Many Americans had come to believe by 1840 that, as Calvin Colton had written in The Crisis of the Country, two-party competition was necessary to protect republican liberty from the reckless power of rulers. By voting one party out and the other in, people could change the regime and install new governors more closely in touch with their will. True self-government, in short, necessitated conflict between parties that provided alternative stands on issues so that governmental policy could be changed by changing the party that controlled the government. As a Whig journalist put it in 1848, "The very life of liberty is maintained only by the strife of contending parties." "To carry out in practice the theory of our Republican Government," former Democrat Preston King echoed in 1855, we must "openly and clearly . . . declare principles and measures," and parties must "divide upon them as they are for and against them." Choice was critical to self-government. "Our whole theory of Government stands upon the idea that the electors of the whole country can and will understand and choose the right." As King implied, in sum, if the electors saw no clear choice between the parties, they would consider republican government in jeopardy. 86

Ultimately, the very legitimacy of the Whig and Democratic parties and of the two-party system depended upon this belief that party competition provided the best way to perpetuate and preserve republicanism. For that legitimacy to survive, the public had to believe that a change would result when they replaced one set of rulers with another. The parties therefore had to stand for different things, and they had to enact different policies. Just as the Whig party had attracted enough new voters to win the elections of 1840 by advocating policies different from those of the Democrats, they would have to implement different policies in order to retain that voting support.

Certainly, most Whigs expected that revolution in governmental policy after the elections of 1840. After twelve years of seemingly fruitless opposition to the Jacksonians, they finally controlled a popular majority, the White House, both houses of Congress, and most state governments. As the year 1840 closed, Whigs throughout the land rejoiced at their long-delayed chance "to save the liberty, the morals, and the happiness of the people, and to rescue the Constitution."

Chapter 6

"The Whig Party Seems Now Totally Broken Up and Dismembered"

"I NOW REJOICE in the almost certain prospect of the restoration of our common Country to its original prosperity and greatness," an Alabama Whig wrote a month before the installation of the new administration.1 With control of the presidency, a 29-22 majority in the new Senate, a 133-102 margin in the new House of Representatives, and possession of a majority of state governments, the Whig party stood poised to reform government and to promote economic recovery.2 The nation's desperate economic condition and the financial disarray of state and national governments required new policies. Their promised alternatives, they believed, would provide the necessary remedy. More than that, they now had the opportunity to restore what they considered the proper balance between the legislative and executive branches of the national government and thus end supposed executive despotism. Harrison had repeatedly pledged to defer to the will of Congress, and Whigs intended to prove that congressional initiative could work. Additionally, the party had its first opportunity to fill the 18,000 offices subject to federal appointment and thus to replace Democrats, whom they scorned as corrupt, incompetent spoilsmen, with public servants of talent and ability.³ Best of all, from the perspective of Whig politicians, by demonstrating the efficacy of their principles and programs and by using federal patronage to bolster local organizations, the Whig party had a chance to cement the loyalty of those hundreds of thousands of voters who had rallied to the party since 1837 in order to achieve change. They had the opportunity, in short, to effect a durable voter realignment and become a permanent majority party if they could redress the grievances and address the needs that had turned an electoral majority against the Democrats.4

Whig leaders in 1841 thought they must act immediately, lest their grand opportunity slip away. As Henry Clay's fellow Kentuckian, Senator John J. Crittenden, put it, Harrison and the Whigs "must act. The people expect it, and are entitled to expect it.... The real danger is in inaction, and falling behind, and disappointing the high hopes and feelings of the people." This pressure to enact their program decisively shaped Whigs' behavior during the next two years.

As Crittenden's letter reveals, Whigs realized that opportunity entails risk. The chance to succeed implies the chance to fail. And fail they did. Almost every one of their bright expectations went aglimmering. Instead of harmony between the executive and the legislature, they suffered rancorous division. Instead of using appointments to demonstrate the high caliber of Whig officeholders and thus consolidating the party, federal patronage first caused internal party strife and popular disillusionment and then became a weapon utilized against them. Instead of quickly legislating a cogent program for economic recovery, they suffered internal bickering, paralysis, and frustration. Instead of restoring prosperity, they witnessed continuing stagnation and depression. As a result, instead of confirming the allegiance of voters and their control of state and national governments, they suffered some of the most severe reversals in off-year congressional and gubernatorial elections in American history. Table 9 reveals these setbacks, and in the state legislative elections of 1841, 1842, and 1843 Whigs suffered still worse losses. In sum, Whigs' "almost certain prospect" for success turned instead, as John C. Calhoun had presciently forecast within weeks of Harrison's triumph, into a "speedy and utter overthrow."

The story of the first Whig presidential administration is therefore the story of opportunity lost. Although it is a tale often told, most accounts have been biographical and have focused largely on personal rivalries among Whig leaders in Washington. Historians have carefully delineated the early maneuvering by Henry Clay and Daniel Webster for the presidential nomination in 1844 and the subsequent conflict between Clay and John Tyler, who succeeded Harrison as president. Personal rivalry and the clash between the president and the congressional wing of the party have thus been seen as the dominant themes of that administration and as the major causes of the Whigs' downfall.⁷

"This table is based on the Congressional Quarterly's Guide to U.S. Elections. I have included all the congressional elections in each year, including special elections to fill vacancies, so that the total number of seats contested often exceeds the total number of seats in a given Congress. The number of contested seats in 1842 was unusually low, for the requirement of reapportionment after the census of 1840 and the need of some states to abandon at-large congressional tickets for the district system in compliance with an 1842 federal statute caused a number of states that would normally have held elections in 1842 to postpone them until 1843.

Factionalism did play an important role in the Whig debacle, but it must be understood in a broader context. Rivalry between Webster and Clay, after all, as well as other factional fault lines, had fissured the Whig party since its inception. Such rivalries, endemic to political parties, had not prevented the sweeping Whig electoral success between 1837 and 1840. The problem is why internal division demolished the party's electoral fortunes at some times but not at others. What defined the Whigs' debacle was the party's crushing defeats in state and congressional elections in the early 1840s, exploding all hopes of their quickly becoming a new majority party. How persisting factionalism related to success in the late 1830s but failure in the early 1840s is what must be explained.

Similarly, tension and conflict between the president and the congressional wing of his party are endemic to the American political system. Yet rarely in American history has that tension produced electoral disasters as extensive as those the Whigs suffered in the off-year elections between 1840 and 1844. During the Civil War, for example, Abraham Lincoln and congressional Republicans differed over how to conduct the war. Despite that disagreement, the Republicans remained the majority party. A more apt analogy would be the conflict between Lincoln's successor, Andrew Johnson, and the congressional Republicans. However stunning the similarities between that strife and the battle between John Tyler and congressional Whigs, the two collisions yielded different results. Despite Johnson's use of patronage and his open campaigning against the Republicans, despite his attempt to form a new party, just as Tyler eventually would, the Republicans expanded their congressional majorities in the elections of 1866 by running against the president. The difference between 1866 and 1842–43 was that the Republicans' program was passed over Johnson's objections, thus reinforcing the loyalty and fervor of their voters. Stymied by Tyler, Whigs could pass no such program. Hence, not just personal rivalry for the presidency or factional battles over patronage or disagreements between the president and Congress upended the Whig party during its first presidential administration. The paralyzing effect of those divisions on the attempt to legislate policies did the most damage.

I

Rifts within the Whig leadership at Washington appeared even before Harrison's inauguration. Whigs expected to win the next presidential sweepstakes in 1844, and Harrison's pledge not to seek a second term meant that a new man would reap that reward. Both Clay and Webster, who had been thrust aside for Harrison in 1839, determined as soon as the polls closed in 1840 to be that lucky man. Expecting to manipulate the supposedly malleable figurehead in the White House, they both therefore sought to influence the makeup of the cabinet and the allocation of patronage.

As the party's most prominent congressional leader, Clay expected an offer of the State Department in Harrison's cabinet, but he declined the post even before it was tendered because he preferred to remain in the Senate. With his blessing, Webster received that important slot instead. But Clay hoped to staff the remainder of the cabinet with his friends. He succeeded to the extent that he blocked the rumored appointment of Charles Wickliffe, a Kentucky rival, and secured instead the attorney generalship for his faithful lieutenant Crittenden. John Bell of Tennessee, the secretary of war, and Thomas Ewing, the secretary of the Treasury, could also be considered Clay allies.

Clay was especially anxious for the appointment of John M. Clayton of Delaware. Initially, Clay had suggested Clayton for the Treasury and Ewing for the postmaster general's office. But Webster had prevailed on Harrison to appoint New York's Francis Granger as postmaster general instead and to switch Ewing to the Treasury Department. Frantic to get Clayton into the cabinet, Clay then held a stormy personal interview with Harrison, demanding Clayton's appointment as navy secretary, the remaining cabinet post. Proud and vain, Harrison was determined not to appear subservient to the party's senior statesman and reportedly reminded Clay that he, rather than Clay, had been elected president. Instead, Harrison chose to let Whig congressmen from the South Atlantic states fill the last spot, and they decided on George Badger of North Carolina, who was also friendly to Clay. Thus, despite Clay's failure to win a place for Clayton, his heated argument with Harrison, and Webster's appointment to the most important post, Clay had done well. The other cabinet members were either his outright supporters or at least personally cordial to him.

Stung by the old general's response to his efforts for Clayton, Clay decided not to interfere with lesser patronage appointments, lest he appear too dictatorial. There was, however, one significant exception to this rule. The most important patronage position in the United States, both symbolically and in terms of substantive political influence, was the collectorship of the New York Custom House. The collector could fill some 600 subordinate positions in that office, as well as influence other federal appointments in New York City and Brooklyn. Thus, the post provided a base of power in New York State. The Seward-Weed wing of the New York Whig party, which had opposed Clay's nomination, favored Edward Curtis, a Webster lieutenant, for the job. Clay vehemently opposed Curtis' appointment, but to no avail. When the cabinet chose Curtis, Clay's enemies in New York had seemed to prevail, and Clay had succeeded only in infuriating Harrison still more. Citing Clay's humiliation, the sympathetic Willie P. Mangum predicted a "widening of the breach between Clay and Webster."

Clay still retained one powerful weapon with which to win the presidential nomination he craved—his leadership of the Whigs in the Senate. Indeed, the most significant aspect of the jockeying between Webster and Clay in January, February, and March 1841 was that the two had chosen alternate routes to their common goal. Webster decided to work from inside the administration, while Clay remained outside it.

Necessity as well as personal inclination dictated the choice of these divergent courses. The dynamics of personal or factional rivalry within one party were the same as the dynamics of conflict between the parties. Rivals had to distinguish themselves from each other in order to woo different elements in the same party. They might, for example, adopt different stands on issues or argue for different priorities. Webster and Clay had followed this course in 1833 when Webster took an aggressively northern stand on the Nullification and tariff issues, while Clay tried to appease the South and defuse the crisis in South Carolina with the Compromise Tariff. Again, in 1837, Webster had tried to establish himself as a northern candidate by opposing the annexation of Texas on antislavery grounds, while Clay strove to bury the divisive sectional issue. Now their shared ambition led them once again down different paths.

Aware that he was doomed to play second fiddle to Clay in the Senate, Webster saw the State Department as a distinctive niche for himself. Negotiations with England over the disputed Maine boundary were pending, and skillful management of foreign policy would enhance his reputation as a statesman. Because the Whigs believed that the cabinet was coequal with the president in the executive branch, Webster as its "premier" had a chance not only to shape administration policy but to gain credit for it. Finally, by operating in continuous contact with the president, even during the long spells when Congress was in recess, Webster might win the president's blessing as his successor. At the very least, he could have more direct influence on patronage dispensation than Clay—as his apparent success in the Curtis affair demonstrated.¹⁰

Clay's reasons for wanting to remain in the Senate were equally compelling. All Whigs expected Congress to formulate Whig policies, and as the party's legislative leader, Clay expected to get the main credit for the program that was passed. Beyond that, he sincerely believed that a comprehensive program of economic legislation was desperately needed to succor the economy and pull the federal government out of debt. He was further convinced that unless the Whig party enacted that program quickly, it would be repudiated at the polls. By uniting his party behind legislative proposals, therefore, Clay could win the gratitude of Whig politicians as well as Whig voters. Such a combination would guarantee his nomination in 1844.

In that belief, Clay and his friends in the Senate like Crittenden used the second session of the Twenty-Sixth Congress, from December 1840 to March 1841, to formulate the Whig program. Mercilessly and obnoxiously taunting the Democrats about the impending overthrow of their measures, Whigs called for repeal of the subtreasury system, incorporation of a new national bank, distribution of land revenues to the states, a new loan to tide the government over until its revenues could be increased, a national bankruptcy law to relieve debtors, and an upward revision of the tariff. To forward that goal, a Whig caucus urged Harrison to call a special session of Congress because of the economic emergency and laid out an agenda for it. They did so, again, primarily because they felt pressure to fulfill the hopes they had raised in the electorate. Hence Crittenden, in the letter quoted earlier, called such a special session "absolutely necessary." "The real danger is in inaction, and . . . disappointing the high hopes and feelings of the people."

Not all Whigs were so sanguine about a special session. Some feared that the party was still so divided that a rush to precipitate action could prove calamitous. Far better, they thought, to await the normal session of the new Congress scheduled to meet in December 1841 in order to give the Whigs time to negotiate a program upon which all could agree. New York Congressman Millard Fillmore, for example, wrote to Thurlow Weed in February that "the course of events had unfortunately precipitated upon us the discussion of the proposed measures of the incoming administration." Democrats would benefit if those measures proved "odious," but, given Whigs' promises to restore prosperity, an extra session was now "indispensable or at least politic."

Significantly, one of the Whigs who continued to oppose a special session was Webster. He realized that he could benefit from Clay's prolonged absence from Washington, and he worried about the disruptive potential of hasty action. Clay, in contrast, passionately supported a special session. When he learned that Harrison, with Webster's concurrence, had tentatively decided against it, he sent Harrison a letter virtually instructing him to call the session and writing out a draft for the presidential proclamation.

For Harrison, this insulting "lecture" was the last straw. In reply, he chastised Clay for being too "impetuous" and ordered the mortified Kentuckian to communicate with him in the future only by writing rather than through personal visits to the White House. Clay's imperious letter undoubtedly confirmed the president in his intention not to call a special session. When Ewing reported that the government was in debt and faced an additional deficit of more than $11 million unless additional revenue was quickly raised, however, Harrison reluctantly consented. On March 17 he summoned an emergency session of Congress to meet on May 31, 1841, to address the economic crisis. ¹⁴

Within two weeks of Harrison's inauguration, Clay had fallen out with the new president, and Webster seemed to have won an initial advantage. Both sought to benefit the Whig party as a whole, for only if the party retained its popularity would the nomination in 1844 be valuable. Yet each clearly had a different understanding of what was best for the party and for his own personal ambition. How this conflict might have been resolved had Harrison served out his term can only be speculated. Old Tippecanoe turned sixty-eight just days before his inauguration and was in frail health. Enervated by the hordes of ravenous office seekers who descended on the White House like a swarm of locusts, he contracted pneumonia and died on April 4, one month to the day after his inauguration. Harrison's death immediately changed all calculations, for it brought to the presidency a man of decidedly different values, a man who had not pledged to defer to the legislative will of Congress, and a man who had not foresworn a second term.

II

The accession of John Tyler at first betokened an improvement in Clay's fortunes. Tyler considered himself and was considered by others a Clay man, and he immediately filled some patronage posts with Clay's friends as a gesture of friendship. Tyler was not only the first vice president to serve out another president's term, but at the age of fifty-one he was the youngest man yet to hold that office. Harrison's death, that is, seemed to restore Clay's stature as the undisputed leader of his party, for Whigs could not believe that Tyler, given his relative youth and accidental incumbency, would have the temerity to oppose him. Tyler's pleasant personality further aroused expectations of harmony between the two. The model of a gentleman planter, the Virginian was unfailingly polite, amiable, and apparently eager to please. Members of the cabinet, which he retained, soon wrote Clay that he could count on Tyler's cooperation. By mid-April, Clay himself was informing friends that he expected to pass the entire agenda the Whigs had laid out for the special session.¹⁵

Whigs in the cabinet and Congress soon discovered that they had mistaken Tyler's courtesy for diffidence, his affability for malleability. Ascetically thin, with a long, angular face, sunken cheeks, and a long, pointed nose, Tyler's very physique betokened rigidity. A former state legislator, governor, congressman, and United States senator, Tyler possessed strong principles and the self-confidence to stand by them. He wanted to work with the congressional Whigs, but the former Democrat belonged to the dwindling state rights faction of the party and had long opposed a national bank, a protective tariff, and federal internal improvements as unconstitutional. His adherence to these beliefs was fortified by the counsel of unofficial advisors from Virginia who were even more ideologically rigid in their affirmation of state rights and strict construction than the president. This group, whom regular Whigs soon castigated as "Impracticables" or the "Virginia Cabal," included Judge Abel P. Upshur, Judge Nathaniel Beverly Tucker, and Thomas R. Dew, president of the College of William and Mary, all of whom resided in Williamsburg, as well as Littleton W. Tazewell and the Virginia Whig congressman Henry Wise. The ideological objections that these men, as well as other Virginia Whig congressmen like Robert M. T. Hunter, Thomas R. Gilmer, and Francis Mallory, raised against the proposed Whig program were contemptuously dismissed by the vast majority of Whigs as "Virginia abstractions." 16

Even before the special session of Congress assembled at the end of May, Tyler privately informed Clay and other Whigs that he opposed a national bank. In his message to that session, he publicly spelled out which parts of the anticipated Whig program he could accept. He endorsed repeal of the subtreasury, the distribution of land revenues, and new revenue measures including an additional bond issue because the government faced a severe deficit. He indicated, however, that he would reject both new revenue measures and distribution if they required an increase in tariff rates above the 20 percent ad valorem duties due to be reached on July 1, 1842, under the Compromise Tariff of 1833. He warned that he would also reject any new bank or fiscal agent for government funds if he thought it unconstitutional. Both duty and honor, he specifically cautioned, would force him to resort to a veto in such a case.¹⁷

The Whigs thus confronted an immediate challenge to their fundamental principle of congressional supremacy. Tyler clearly intended to shape the Whig program to comply with his wishes. By controlling patronage, he could reward or punish members of Congress, for each had scores of friends at home hungering for some federal plum or other. By using the hated veto, he could block their program and thus jeopardize their future success at the polls. Whigs therefore faced a choice. They could abide by the president's wishes, in order to get part of their program passed and preserve harmony between the executive and legislature, or they could risk Tyler's wrath and party disruption by attempting to pass their entire program. How different Whigs made this choice depended not only on their personal ambition and how they judged the president's firmness, but also on honest disagreements about what was best for the nation and for the Whig party.

Despite Tyler's warnings, Clay and the great majority of congressional Whigs massed behind the whole Whig program. Clay and his supporters quickly seized control of the relevant House and Senate committees when the special session opened. To reduce Democratic obstructionism, the Senate, on Clay's suggestion, resolved to confine its business to the economic measures necessary to relieve the crisis. Later the Whigs unsuccessfully tried to amend Senate rules to limit debate. The all-important Whig caucus, which Willie P. Mangum of North Carolina chaired, agreed to vote down any Democratic amendments. And the Whig leadership kept the House and Senate sitting for seven or eight hours a day, six days a week, despite the suffocating summer heat and humidity.¹⁸

On June 7, Clay spelled out the agenda. In order to save time and avert duplication of effort, he proposed, the House should immediately begin writing bills for a new loan and an increase in tariff duties while the Senate prepared bills to repeal the Independent Treasury Act, create a new national bank, and distribute land revenues. Undeterred by Tyler's message, he explicitly said he intended a national bank, and on June 10 he introduced a distribution bill that contained no proviso limiting tariff duties to 20 percent, as Tyler wished.¹⁹

To this agenda Whigs soon added a uniform national bankruptcy act. This legislation consumed both houses of Congress during the special session that dragged on from May 31 to September 13, 1841. Although the measures became inextricably entangled, for purposes of clarity it is useful to separate the banking issue and the Whig response to it. The question of a new national bank first provoked the clash between Tyler and congressional Whigs. That issue preoccupied Washington politicians and their correspondents during the summer. On that rock the Whig program would founder and the Whig party splinter.

On June 7, Clay asked Treasury Secretary Ewing to send Congress a proposal for a new bank that met Tyler's constitutional reservations. Five days later Ewing submitted a bill that had the cabinet's reluctant endorsement. Ewing's bill called for Congress, in its capacity as Washington's municipal legislature, to charter a bank in the District of Columbia. That bank could establish state branches only with the explicit consent of state legislatures. The federal government would subscribe to one-fifth of the bank's $30 million stock. As the fiscal agent of the government, the bank would receive governmental deposits. But it could also engage in normal private banking practices.²⁰

Whigs in and outside Congress greeted the administration's proposal with howls of dismay, derision, and anger. For one thing, it struck many as being unconstitutional. By requiring state approval of branches, it seemed to subvert the supremacy of the national government. By restricting the bank's freedom to establish branches and by offering no guarantee against state taxation, Congress would ensure that no private investors would buy stock. "What a bank would be that!" sneered Clay to Kentucky Governor Robert P. Letcher. Not one New York Whig in a hundred approved the Ewing bill, a Whig editor informed Mangum.²¹

Appalled at the inadequacy of Tyler's measure, the Whig majority referred Ewing's bill to a select committee on the currency that Clay chaired. But that committee did not write a new banking measure. Instead, the Senate Whig caucus, meeting in three-hour sessions for four or five consecutive nights, designed a substitute.²² On June 23, Clay reported the product of the party's labors to the full Senate. It differed from Ewing's plan in two significant respects. It implied that Congress was acting as the national legislature, not as a municipal government, and thereby signaled that Congress was establishing a true national bank.

The bill also authorized the bank to establish branches without prior consent of states. Senate Whigs thus boldly flouted Tyler's will.

The urgency, discipline, and defiance that characterized the Whig majority during June and the remainder of the special session require explanation. Given the risk to the party inherent in angering the president, why did they do it? Many Democrats at the time accused Clay of imperiously lashing his colleagues into line in order to further his own ambition and to demonstrate that he rather than Tyler led the Whig party. Many historians agree. According to this interpretation, Clay acted for personal reasons, not out of concern for the party or its program. He explicitly tried to provoke Tyler into a veto and thereby to eradicate Tyler as the Whig nominee in 1844.²³

Without question, Clay was jealous of Tyler, and he was determined to demonstrate his undisputed party leadership by pushing his program through. Yet he also sincerely believed that the good of the country and of the Whig party required the passage of the whole program. Whatever Clay's personal motives, moreover, other Whig senators, let alone members of the House, hardly deferred to Clay's will simply to satisfy his personal desires. After the Whig caucus framed the bank bill, Mangum reported that the Whigs had been concerned with putting "the Vessel of State on the right tack," not with the presidential succession. He indicated as well that in the crucial caucus sessions that framed the bill, Clay had remained virtually silent for fear of lending credence to Democratic charges that he was a dictator. Alternately magnetic, imperious, and impatient, Clay led the Whig forces in the Senate. But his colleagues did not slavishly do his bidding.

Nor can institutional considerations fully account for the performance of the congressional Whigs. Granted, many regarded Tyler's stipulations about what he could or could not accept from Congress as a form of executive tyranny, and over time this resentment increased. But above all else, Clay led so effectively because most Whigs agreed with his legislative goals. They too believed that they had to pass their entire program, regardless of Tyler's strict constructionist, state rights scruples.

Congressional Whigs were alarmed about economic conditions and about the political necessity to improve them. Prices had remained low throughout 1840 and the first months of 1841. Commerce had stagnated, and in many places credit had disappeared. Bankers, merchants, planters, and farmers clamored for a national bankruptcy law to relieve their burden of debt. Many state governments that had recently come under Whig control faced insolvency and could not pay the interest, let alone the principal, on their bonds. Without federal aid, in sum, Whig governors and legislatures would have to impose unpopular new taxes. Having already been forced to sell Treasury notes to make up for its revenue shortfall, the federal government expected an additional deficit of $11 million in 1841. Tariff rates were due to drop sharply in 1842 when the major reductions under the tariff of 1833 would take effect. These cuts would deprive the government of $5 million.²⁵ To most political leaders in the nineteenth century, deficit financing was a calamity. As the majority party, Whigs felt a heavy responsibility to resuscitate both the private and public economic sectors.

As Congressman Christopher Morgan of New York proclaimed in June, "We came here to relieve the country. The eyes of the nation are bent upon us with an intensity which has never before been experienced. The people demand justice at our hands. They demand that we should work and not talk." Calhoun also recognized the Whigs' desperation to deliver on their promises to the electorate. The Whigs feared "the shame and certain overthrow, if a session call[ed] for the purpose of passing their batch of measures, should terminate without doing anything," he reported in July. "This and this alone holds them together, and this and this alone will carry their measures, if they should be carried at all."

Precisely that fear of failure convinced most Whigs that they must pass their entire "batch of measures," no matter what Tyler wanted. His insistence on no tariff duties above 20 percent would cripple any attempt to balance the federal budget. Distribution without substantial increases in tariff revenue would only deplete the federal treasury still further since, aside from borrowing, duties and land sales provided virtually all its revenue. Yet Whigs dared not renege on distribution, for Whig governors and Whig newspapers in the West and South were demanding it to spare those states the unpalatable choice between repudiation of their bonds and new taxes. Simultaneously, New York's Whig Governor William H. Seward was justifying his call for a huge new state bond issue in 1841 with assurances that no new state property taxes would be required since the money from federal distribution could pay off the debt.²⁷

Nor were most Whigs willing to sacrifice a new national bank. Only a bank with the power to establish branches where it pleased and to make direct local loans, they believed, could possibly attract private investors and provide the uniform currency and credit necessary to fuel an economic recovery. Only such a bank, moreover, could prevent disaster at the polls because the Whig rank and file demanded it. They believed, in short, that unless they chartered a real national bank, their newly won supporters would abandon them and they would be overwhelmed. "We have deliberately made up our minds to go to the Country & take all the consequences," Mangum explained, "rather than to be forced to do what will be an entire failure, involving loss of personal character & public interest, to say nothing of the dissolution of the party."

The Whig program, even if passed in its entirety, would probably not have spurred an economic revival. But most Whigs were convinced that the whole program was vital. Unless they passed their complete package, they feared, it would not satisfy public demands. Conciliating the president would decimate the party. Half a loaf was not enough.

Fear about "the magnitude of the consequences of failure" caused congressional Whigs to accuse Tyler of placing the party itself in jeopardy by his rigid intransigence. "We are in a crisis as a party," Clay lamented in June, and on July 4 he warned a friend that "Mr. Tyler's opinions about a Bank are giving us great trouble. Indeed, they not only threaten a defeat on that measure, but endanger the permanency, and the ascendancy of the Whig cause." "The Whig party is in a most woeful plight," echoed Mangum, "and there is ground for apprehension that the Session will prove abortive—the consequences of disgrace, disaster & final discomfiture are palpable & appalling."

Far from attempting to provoke Tyler into a veto, in short, the congressional Whig leadership originally feared its consequences. By demonstrating Whig sentiment in the country and in Congress, they hoped to convert the president. Why, rank and file Whigs wondered, did the administration prefer Ewing's bill, "with its Democratic features of establishing branches whereby the constitutional board is virtually surrendered," to a true Whig bill? No real Whig could oppose "Whig measures" like Clay's bank bill, a North Carolinian informed Senator William A. Graham. Hence, "the absorbing subject throughout the land is . . . whether since the death of Gen. Harrison, the country is to be considered under a Whig Administration, or not." ³⁰

Whereas congressional Whigs thought the party would be wrecked unless it met Whig voters' demand for an unadulterated Whig program, cabinet members feared the party would be wrecked if Tyler aborted the whole program through his vetoes. They therefore deemed half a loaf considerably better than nothing at all.³¹ Predictably, Webster led the cabinet campaign to arrange a compromise. Since the Massachusetts banking system was sound, he saw no need for Clay's national bank to spur economic recovery. Ewing's alternative, he believed, was perfectly feasible; given Tyler's stubbornness, moreover, it was the only bank Whigs could get. As mediator between Congress and the president, Webster also hoped to advance his presidential candidacy. If Clay provoked a rupture between the president and Congress, Webster could assume the role of party harmonizer and savior.³²

Through private conversations with Whig congressmen and newspaper articles in the National Intelligencer, therefore, Webster worked frantically to win over congressional Whigs to the Ewing bill. The main point, he insisted, was to get "something . . . done." The choice was between "getting no Bank" and "breaking up the Administration" or enacting the "practicable and attainable" Ewing plan. The "one remedy for the urgent necessities of the country" and "the salvation of the Whig party," Webster wrote in July, "is union, immediate UNION. Let us try such a bank as we can agree upon and establish."³³

These pleas and the lure of patronage weaned enough defectors away from the Whig leadership to produce a stalemate in the Senate. Of the Southerners, William C. Rives and William S. Archer of Virginia, William C. Preston of South Carolina, and John Henderson of Mississippi shared Tyler's state rights scruples to varying degrees. William D. Merrick of Maryland and Alexander Barrow of Louisiana, seeking patronage favors from Tyler, were amenable to the Ewing bill. In addition, Webster's argument that only Ewing's bill could preserve party harmony had great weight with the two senators from Massachusetts, Rufus Choate and Isaac Bates, as well as with Maine's George Evans. Those three, as well as John M. Berrien of Georgia, argued both in the Whig caucus and on the Senate floor that Clay's measure was suicidal, for Tyler would veto it. Some kind of bank was better than no bank, they contended.³⁴

By early July, Whig leaders saw that Clay's bill could not pass. While the Kentuckian insisted that "the question is a National Bank or no National Bank," the caucus grudgingly accepted the need to conciliate the administration. Nonetheless, Rives' amendment, restoring Ewing's provision that states must consent to branches, received only eight Whig votes. It was overwhelmed by the main body of Whigs and Democrats, who sought a bill that was so offensive that Tyler must veto it. Indeed, throughout the session the minority Democrats played a brilliant hand, offering little opposition to those measures Tyler agreed with but strenuously objecting to the measures that offended the president's constitutional sensibilities. By ensuring a breach between Tyler and the Whigs, Democrats thought they would guarantee a Democratic victory at the next election.³⁵

Late in July the Whig caucus finally agreed upon a concession that might carry enough Whig votes to pass the bill on the Senate floor. On July 23, Clay offered an amendment that states could accept or reject branches. If any state did not act at the first session of its legislature after passage of the law, however, its consent to branches would be assumed. Furthermore, the amendment provided that Congress could subsequently establish a branch after a state rejected one if Congress deemed such a branch vital to the national interest. This transparently cosmetic straddle satisfied no one. Still, the compromise amendment passed (barely), 25 to 24. Rives and Archer joined the Democrats in opposition, while the furious Henderson absented himself from the vote so that it could carry. On July 25, the amended bill passed by a 26–23 margin, with the Virginia Whigs again supporting the Democratic minority.³⁶

Compared to the prolonged struggle in the Senate, the House acted with relative dispatch, passing the amended bill after only five days of debate, 128 to 98. Democrats opposed the bill unanimously, while 95 percent of the Whigs favored it. After two months of wrangling and frustration, the Whig majority had finally chartered a new bank, the linchpin of their economic program.³⁷

But could the amended bill survive John Tyler's scrutiny? Since early July, Whigs and Democrats alike had predicted that Tyler would veto it, and the president had told several congressmen that he considered Clay's supposedly conciliatory amendment a contemptible hoax. Nor could the cabinet dissuade the president. During July and August their influence upon the president had diminished as he moved closer to the Virginia cabal. Tyler informed the cabinet on August 11 that he intended a veto, but only at the last moment, when it was too late for changes, did he reveal to them the contents of the veto message itself. On August 16, nine days after the bank bill reached his desk, Tyler sent the veto message to the Senate. He castigated the branching provision as an unconstitutional sham. He also denounced the bank's power to discount local promissory notes as both economically pernicious and grotesquely beyond Congress' constitutional authority to regulate the currency.³⁸

The night before the veto message officially arrived at the Senate, the Whig caucus tentatively agreed upon a response. They would table the veto message and immediately pass Ewing's original bill. If Tyler dared veto that, the cabinet would resign and the Whigs would read Tyler out of the party. If he signed it, as most Whigs expected he would, then experience with its inadequacies would soon force Tyler himself to request amendments in line with Clay's bill. Either way, Tyler would look like a fool, and congressional Whigs' program would be vindicated.

Attorney General John J. Crittenden discerned a better alternative. Since Tyler really objected not to branches per se but to branches with power to make local loans or discounts on promissory notes without state assent, he excitedly wrote Clay on the morning of August 16, why not confine the branches' power to discounting bills of exchange? As Crittenden and the congressional Whigs perfectly understood, but Tyler apparently did not, such a change would not hamper the power of the bank to boost the economy. Unlike promissory notes, which were in effect loans to individuals, widely used and readily available bills of exchange were commercial notes secured by physical goods in transit that promised payment at a future date when those goods reached their ultimate destination.

To get a loan, a planter or businessman need only obtain a bill of exchange and sell it to the bank at a discount. The bank branch could thus pump money into a local economy simply by financing an interstate or international transaction.³⁹

After Crittenden informed his cabinet colleagues of his discovery, Webster and Ewing apparently won Tyler's assent to the change. If the power to discount promissory notes were prohibited, the jubilant cabinet members told congressional leaders, the president would even agree to allow such a bank or Fiscal Agent, as he wanted it called, to establish branches without state consent.

Within two days of the veto message, therefore, the Whigs had miraculously discovered a formula for party harmony and a workable bank. Far more eager to charter a bank than to break with the president, the congressional Whig caucus immediately agreed to pass such a measure under the impression that Tyler was committed to it. Tyler in fact had warned his cabinet members not to make any such intimation to the congressional Whigs, but they, as well as the Whig congressmen who talked to Tyler on August 17 and 18, distinctly gave Congress the impression that Tyler had pledged to sign the bill.⁴⁰

Once again, the Whigs had misjudged the proud Virginian in the White House. On August 19, the very day that the new bill was introduced into the House, his vanity was stung by the Whig reaction to his veto of the first bill. In the Senate, Clay railed that Tyler's kitchen cabinet of Virginians was trying to break up the Whig party in order to form a third party behind their peculiar doctrines. The same day a letter that the Richmond, Virginia, Whig Congressman John Minor Botts had written on August 16 was published. Botts denounced the president's veto but promised that the Whigs would "head" him by passing the Ewing bill, which he was committed to sign, and when that bank failed to attract any investors, Tyler's ignorance about banking would be revealed to the world. Refusing to be intimidated, Tyler resolved not to sign the new bill. He immediately told every congressman he could contact that he would veto the bill, and newspaper correspondents in Washington began to predict it while the new banking measure was still working its way through Congress.

Although Tyler had run out of patience with both the congressional Whigs and his cabinet, he still wished to avert an open rupture. In order to avoid a veto, therefore, he hoped Congress would postpone the whole banking matter until the next regular session convened in December. This time, however, the cabinet's entreaties to congressmen were to no avail. The Whig caucus pressed the matter to a conclusion. Most preferred Tyler to sign the new law. If so, they would have a workable bank and could claim party credit for it. If they could not get the bank, their constituents told them, it was preferable that Tyler veto the bill than that they back down in order to preserve party harmony. For if Tyler vetoed the measure, they could read him out of the party, blame him for sabotaging Whig banking policy, and deny that the Whig party itself was responsible for that failure. If they conciliated the president by delay, they feared that the Whig party itself would be blamed for failing to fulfill its promises.⁴²

In short, by August the Whigs had decided that they had more to gain from an open rupture with Tyler than by inaction. If they lost the bank, at least they could argue that it was because Tyler was a traitor to the party and not a real Whig. Clay had laid the groundwork for that claim with his charge that Tyler was trying to start a new party and disrupt the Whigs, an accusation that Whig newspapers had broadcast all summer. With this tack Whigs might lose a bank but regain the unifying issue of executive tyranny. "The Whigs are more firmly united now than before," Letcher told Crittenden on September 3. "The vetoes are a good cement to hold them together."

So convinced, Whigs rammed the new bank bill through both houses of Congress on party-line votes within two weeks. Six days later, on September 9, Tyler vetoed it. Whigs might console themselves that their constituents would applaud their faithful adherence to their program and respond to the renewed issue of executive despotism. But they had been forced to sacrifice the keystone of their legislative agenda. As a New York editor warned presciently in July, "If no compromise takes place and the extra session terminates without adopting all or nearly all the measures of reform we cannot go to the people of this State at the next election with any hope or prospect of success."

Despite their disarray on the banking issue, the disciplined Whig majority wielded their control of committees and skillfully employed the caucus to push their other measures through on largely party-line votes, and they received Tyler's signature. But the legislation proved so incomplete, defective, or palpably stopgap in nature that Whigs could not effectively run on that record.

While they successfully repealed the Independent Treasury, for example, they replaced it with nothing, thus leaving unclear what would become of government deposits or how the funds could be used to pump credit into the economy. Whigs also enacted a uniform bankruptcy measure that allowed debtors, rather than creditors, to initiate legal proceedings to scale down debts. But this act seemed to allow the rich to escape the consequences of poor business decisions. Before the law took effect in February 1842, therefore, many of the Whigs' own constituents agitated against it, and within a year, Whig congressmen joined Democrats to repeal it. Such an unpopular measure hardly made an attractive campaign issue.⁴⁵

Nor could the Whig-enacted new loan of $12 million, to cover the federal government's expected deficit, provide a captivating issue. Democrats during the Van Buren administration, after all, had sold bonds and Treasury notes to fund the government; borrowing money was hardly a partisan program, even though votes on the measures were partisan. Worse still, because the government was bankrupt, few subscribers could be found for the Whigs' new bonds, and the loan failed.

Equally a failure from Whig purists' perspective was the new tariff law written by Millard Fillmore, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee. It only raised duties on goods previously taxed below Tyler's mandated 20 percent level to that scarcely protective rate. Fillmore insisted that Congress must readdress the whole tariff issue at the next session a few months later, but with the stopgap tariff of 1841, Whigs could hardly claim to have restored the government's fiscal stability.⁴⁶

The most important measure passed at the special session, the land bill, was a far cry from Whigs' ideal distribution measure. For years, Westerners generally had wanted a reduction of land prices and the cession of federal lands to the states. In contrast, the Northeast had tried to keep land prices high and prevent cession. Meanwhile, congressmen from the South Atlantic states worried primarily about the impact of land prices on tariff levels since land sales and tariff duties provided virtually all federal revenue. Like Tyler, they therefore opposed the reduction of land prices or loss of land revenue if such measures might produce an increase in tariff duties.

Despite these conflicting sectional positions, the Democrats and Whigs had developed distinctive, opposing partisan stands on land policy. Since 1833, Whigs had favored distribution of land revenues to all the states rather than a reduction of prices or cession of lands to the states. Following the lead of Missouri's Senator Thomas Hart Benton, Democrats pushed for price reductions. Democrats had also sought and Whigs opposed the principle of preemption: squatters who settled on government land before it was sold would have the preemptive right to buy it at the lowest starting price, not bid for it against others at the customary land-office auctions.⁴⁷

A distinctive Whig land law, therefore, would have provided for distribution of revenues among all the states with no provision for preemption, let alone a proviso requiring the suspension of distribution if tariff rates were raised. That was the kind of bill Clay introduced on June 10 in the Senate and the kind of bill that Whigs reported out of the House Committee on Public Lands on June 22. Yet the Whigs were immediately forced to retreat before pressure from their own western wing and from Democrats. The result was a final bill that reflected a compromise among the interests of Whigs and Democrats and of the respective sections.

Fearful of retaliation at home, western Whig congressmen had never hewed to the party line on land policy. Instead, many had voted with Democrats for preemption. House and Senate to reflect western demands. Future preemption rights for permanent settlers to 160 acres at the minimum price were guaranteed. Reflecting the Democratic demand for lower prices, the final bill also stipulated that if the minimum price for government land were ever raised, distribution would stop. Democrats and Westerners also extorted two other concessions that reduced the revenues available for distribution to the East: a reservation of 10 percent of the proceeds from sales to the states in which the federal lands were located, before the remainder was distributed among all states, and an outright grant of 500,000 federal acres to each of nine western states, as well as federal subsidies to Alabama and Mississippi for internal improvement projects. House the states in which the federal subsidies to Alabama and Mississippi for internal improvement projects.

To get a bill out of the House, in sum, the Whig leadership had to make a number of compromises—including the adoption of the hated Democratic preemption formula—that seriously reduced potential distributions to the states. Then in the Senate, the Democrats, acting in conjunction with Whigs from the South Atlantic states, insisted on an amendment that distribution must cease whenever tariff rates exceeded 20 percent. That built-in self-stultification, if Congress raised the tariff at an ensuing session, hardly made the compromised distribution act an attractive Whig achievement. Indeed, although Democrats opposed final passage, they seemed the only winners, for preemption had finally been made permanent.

Ш

Whigs thus emerged from the special session in September with a truncated legislative record rather than the attractive platform they had expected to take to the voters. They had failed to restore prosperity or the financial stability of state and national governments—and they knew it. All they retained was the fatuous hope that voters would blame John Tyler and not the whole Whig party for the fiasco.

To absolve the party, Whigs tried to isolate Tyler, using the second bank veto message as the pretext. On September 11, two days after Congress received that message, all cabinet members except Webster resigned. Two days later, Whig congressmen adopted a manifesto written by John Pendleton Kennedy, the novelist and Baltimore Whig congressman. Gathering in the public gardens outside the Capitol, they literally read Tyler out of the party. They accused him of betraying and abandoning the Whig party to launch a new organization of Democrats and southern state rights ideologues. The Whig party, they proclaimed, loathed his actions, especially his reviving Jackson's executive tyranny. Most Whig organizations around the country praised this excommunication. Whig newspapers savaged Tyler as the "Executive Ass," "His Accidency," and "a man destitute of intellect and integrity, whose name is the synonym of nihil," while public meetings burned the apostate in effigy. The same is the synonym of nihil, while public meetings burned the apostate in effigy.

But Tyler, having frustrated the party's program, now frustrated this new strategy. Conciliatory, almost apologetic in tone, his second veto message stressed his support for the great bulk of the Whig program and his desire to work with his congressional Whig partners at the next session for a satisfactory bank.⁵² His new cabinet appointments further indicated his desire to remain within and to dominate the Whig family. Ignoring his Virginia advisors' pleas to sack the entire cabinet and to cut his ties entirely with nationalist Whigs, Tyler aimed instead to rally anti-Clay Whigs throughout the nation, regardless of their views on state rights. Two members of the new group, Virginia's Abel P. Upshur, the secretary of the navy, and Attorney General Hugh S. Legaré, a South Carolinian, shared the state rights faith. The other cabinet members, however, were explicitly selected because they belonged to preexisting state Whig factions that favored the congressional Whig program but were known to be hostile to Henry Clay and his presidential ambitions. Walter Forward of Pittsburgh became the new secretary of the Treasury, and John C. Spencer of New York, an ally of Seward and Weed, the new secretary of war. Most blatantly, for the patronage-laden postmaster generalship he chose Clay's most bitter personal enemy in the Kentucky Whig party, Charles Wickliffe.53

Above all else, Tyler's retention of Webster, despite his Virginia friends' strident protests, signaled his intention to thwart Clay. Clay's most prestigious and powerful rival within the national Whig party, Webster could deliver to the administration strong support from Massachusetts, other New England states, and New York. When Webster agreed to stay in the State Department, Tyler reportedly exclaimed, "Give me your hand on that, and now I will say to you that Henry Clay is a doomed man." ⁵⁴

Jealousy of Clay played a major role in Webster's risky decision to stick with Tyler. He wanted to complete negotiations with England over the troublesome Maine boundary—negotiations that would result in the Webster-Ashburton Treaty of 1842. And he carefully cleared his decision with the Massachusetts Whig congressional delegation so as not to commit political suicide at home. But Webster also regarded the congressional pressure on the cabinet to resign as the work of the imperious Clay, and his prodigious pride prohibited his submission to such dictation. His lust for the presidency also militated against it. If he resigned along with the other cabinet members, he feared, the country would regard this as acquiescence in Clay's claim on the next presidential nomination. By his deluded reasoning, remaining in the cabinet seemed to offer the only chance of securing that prize himself. He recognized that Tyler aspired to the nomination, but he knew that the vetoes had destroyed Tyler's prospects. He, however, might escape their stigma since the Whig press had accused Tyler of overriding the cabinet when he made them. By mediating between the congressional Whig party and the discredited president, he might gain credit for preventing a fatal disruption. By remaining in the cabinet, he also retained access to federal patronage in the fight to wrest the nomination from Clay. Although the congressional Whigs' break with Tyler had greatly increased the consequences of failure, Webster imprudently remained in the new administration for many of the same reasons that he had joined Harrison's old one.⁵⁵

Tyler, Webster, and the other cabinet members immediately demanded that federal officeholders side with the administration against Clay, "There was war," Webster told one late in September. "Mr. Tyler must know his friends." The administration also appointed Clay's enemies in various states to still unfilled offices. Tyler especially courted Thurlow Weed and his powerful organization in New York. Unlike other Whig editors, Weed had not condemned his first veto but had instead urged compromise, as had Weed's extraordinarily able editorial ally, Horace Greeley, in the new but already influential New York Tribune. While the public outcry against the second veto and the cabinet disruption briefly forced Weed and Greeley to denounce Tyler, the president rewarded Weed's friends with postmasterships in the state, while customs collector Curtis directed other plums in their direction in New York City. By October, Weed and Greeley were once again calling for a cessation of warfare and a restoration of harmony between the president and the party, exactly as Tyler and Webster wished.⁵⁶

So too in Massachusetts, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Kentucky, Indiana, Ohio, Michigan, and Maryland, when one wing of a state's Whig party sided with Clay and the congressional Whig majority in 1841, the administration could use patronage to lure their intraparty opponents. While in every state except perhaps Massachusetts the majority of Whig politicians joined congressional Whigs in denouncing Tyler, the proadministration minority, with its control of federal jobs and key newspapers, could sabotage the majority's strategy of rallying the party once again on the issue of executive despotism.⁵⁷

Thus instead of an open battle between a unified Whig party on the one hand and an alliance of Tyler, state rights ideologues, and the Democrats on the other, Tyler's activities split the Whig leadership. Worse, divided leaders, especially pro-Tyler jobholders who refused to mobilize for pro-Clay Whig candidates, had an impact on Whig voters. Fully aware that their legislative failures would disenchant those voters who had rallied to the party since 1837 in order to obtain economic recovery, the Clay leaders now hoped to rouse them instead against Tyler, the traitorous Democrat and executive despot. Such a campaign, however, could not work when local Whig officeholders and influential Whig papers like the Albany Evening Journal, the New York Tribune, and Webster's sheets in Boston defended Tyler as a good Whig, denied that he had wrecked the Whig program, and urged congressional Whigs to work with him in the future. Such conflicting signals to the electorate obfuscated what the Whig party stood for.

Nor, in 1841, did state issues provide Whigs with an effective weapon. With banks closing their doors or suspending specie payments, with state governments on the verge of bankruptcy, and with farmers unable to get loans to move their crops, Whig efforts to aid banks and continue canal construction only stirred the hostility of Democratic constituents without satisfying their own. In Georgia, Mississippi, Pennsylvania, New York, Ohio, and Michigan, Democrats flayed Whig legislatures for economic mismanagement, favoritism toward privileged institutions, and failure to provide any economic relief.⁵⁸

As a result of internal leadership divisions, popular disappointment with Whig achievements at the national and state levels, and confusion among Whig voters, the party suffered disastrous defeats in the fall elections of 1841. Whigs did as well in the congressional elections of 1841 as in those of 1840, since all those contests were rescheduled prior to the meeting of the special session on May 31 and Whig candidates could still run on the promise of future action to promote economic recovery. Similarly, Whigs performed strongly in gubernatorial and state legislative elections held before Tyler's first bank veto on August 16. They won three of five gubernatorial races contested before September and held or increased their previous gains in all state legislatures except Indiana's and, to a lesser extent, Alabama's. In contrast, from September to November, when Whigs' programmatic failure and internal disarray were evident, Democrats vigorously assaulted Whig incumbents and former Whig voters abstained in droves.

Of eight gubernatorial elections held after August, for example, Whigs lost six—in Maine, Georgia, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Michigan, and Mississippi. Whigs were particularly decimated in state legislative races that fall. In the eight states that held legislative elections between March and mid-August, prior to Tyler's first veto, Whigs lost an average of only 3.7 percent of their previous seats. Yet in eleven states holding legislative elections after mid-August, Whig losses averaged 21.7 percent. Maryland vividly illustrates the tidal swing against the Whigs. In its rescheduled congressional elections in the spring, Whigs won six of eight House seats with 57 percent of the total popular vote. But in October, Whigs lost the gubernatorial race with only 49.4 percent of the vote, while their representation in the lower house of the legislature plunged from 76 percent of the seats to 47 percent. Altogether, whereas Whigs controlled both houses of state legislatures in fifteen states in 1840, by the end of 1841 they retained total command in only six states, the same number as Democrats controlled. This shift was portentous since congressional districts were due to be reapportioned in 1842, and now Democratic legislatures would often dominate that vital process (see Tables 6 and 9).

Unpopular positions on state issues undoubtedly contributed to the rout in the fall, but the Whigs' major problem was clearly their failure in Washington to deliver on their promise to enact programs for economic recovery. Tennessee's Democratic Governor James K. Polk, who had narrowly lost his bid for reelection in August 1841 before Tyler's first veto, emphasized the importance of changed circumstances in a postmortem he wrote in early 1842. He had been defeated in August, he complained, because the "obnoxious" Whig measures of the new tariff, the distribution act, the bond issue, and the bankruptcy act "had not been sufficiently developed to be known, and the people acted in view of the liberal promises of relief and reform which had been made to them." Now, he added, "they are disappointed and dissatisfied. They now find that they have been deceived."

However obnoxious the Whig measures may have been to partisan Democrats like Polk, the dissatisfaction, disappointment, and consequent refusal to vote of Whig supporters played a larger role in the turnaround. Democrats did not beat Whigs by outgaining them among new voters. Instead, Whigs' disillusioned supporters simply did not vote (Tables 10 and 11). A New York Whig howled about the party's "split into cliques and factions" and about "apathy on the part of the people unexampled, arising solely from disgust at the doings of the Capitol." Predictably, Clay cast the blame for Whigs' demoralization on Tyler. "An army which believes itself betrayed by its commander-in-chief, will never fight well under him," he pouted. "Our defeats have not been produced by any accession of strength to our adversaries, but simply because our friends would not go to the polls."

Many observers now predicted the impending demise of the party. "I now regard the Whigs as destroyed," Calhoun wrote in December. "They can never again rise under their present name, nor on their present issues." "The Whig party now seems totally broken up and dismembered," shrieked an anguished Washington officeholder in October upon seeing the results from Maryland, Georgia, and Pennsylvania. "Some decisive step must be taken soon or unquestionably the Whig party is at an end," the New Yorker Willis Hall warned Mangum the following January. "A rally must be made soon or there will be no party to rally."

Most Whigs believed that the rally depended upon reemphasizing Whig measures and Whig identity. And the best way to reassert Whiggery, they believed, was to commit the party in 1842 to Henry Clay's presidential nomination. Then John Tyler would clearly no longer lead the Whig party. Immediately booming Clay for the presidency, argued Hall, was "the only course which can possibly save the party from destruction." Worries that pushing Clay so soon would widen party divisions were misplaced. "We are at present in greater danger of death from torpidity and mortification than from fear [of Tyler's retaliation]. A fight, even among ourselves, is better than the indifference and disgust that proved so fatal to us last Fall."

IV

Sharply divergent motives thus impelled proadministration and congressional Whigs when Congress reconvened in December 1841, yet in hindsight it is clear that politically both groups engaged in fantasy. Tyler was willing and Webster frantic to restore harmony between the administration and the congressional wing of the party. Clay's congressional followers, in contrast, carried on war to the knife. In the Senate, Whigs rejected Tyler's recent appointments, while in both houses they contemptuously dismissed his legislative proposals.⁶³ From the start, they sought to prove once and for all that Whigs had read the administration out of their coalition.

"This table is based on the same sources for gubernatorial (G) and congressional (C) election returns used in earlier tables. States are again listed in the chronological order in which elections were held. The first column on the left lists the party percentage of the vote in the presidential election of 1840. "These proportions of the congressional vote are based on partial returns: fourteen of fifteen districts in Virginia in 1843, six of seven districts in Alabama in 1843, nine of thirteen districts in North Carolina in 1841. Because returns for only seven of Kentucky's thirteen districts were listed by the Congressional Quarterly's Guide for 1841, I did not give those figures.

The New Jersey congressional elections for 1843 provide an especially difficult case to interpret. Popular vote totals for only four of five districts are given, and in one of those, two Whigs opposed each other without a Democratic challenger. In the fifth district the Democrat won with 100 percent of the vote, but no popular total was given. Hence, I have calculated the party percentage of the total vote two different ways. The first figures are based on the absolute votes for the four districts. The figures in parentheses represent an average of the party percentages in all five. They probably reflect the true distribution of party strength better than the first figures.

[&]quot;This table is based on the same data as Table 10. The changes in each column are measured from the total in the presidential election of 1840. I have excluded heavily Democratic Missouri because of insufficient data.

^bThese figures again are based on only partial returns for the congressional elections and therefore inflate the dropoff suffered by the parties. This inflation is particularly misleading for the Democratic vote in New Jersey for 1843 because the Democrats won 100 percent of the vote in the district for which no returns are listed in the Congressional Quarterly's Guide.

In his annual message in December and in a series of special messages to Congress during the spring, Tyler pressed two main legislative priorities. He presented his long promised plan for a fiscal agent known as the exchequer. Designed to combine Whig and Democratic ideas about how to handle governmental monies, as well as meet Tyler's constitutional hostility to a nationally chartered bank, it dissatisfied both Whigs and Democrats. Buried by the Whigs in committee, it never came to a vote until the winter of 1843.⁶⁴

Tyler also stressed that Congress must remedy the federal government's deplorable financial situation. The government, still running at a deficit, had to sell new bonds in order pay off old ones. Yet investors, doubting the government's ability to repay its debts, had purchased only $5 million of the $12 million bond issue authorized at the special session. Revenues from tariff duties were also due to plunge. According to the terms of the Compromise Tariff Act of 1833, rates would drop sharply on January 1, 1842, and then again on July 1, 1842, when they were finally to reach the 20 percent level. Beyond preventing further deficits and restoring faith in public credit, Tyler argued, Congress must make new appropriations for the national defense. 65

In December 1841, Tyler expressed hope that increased revenues could be found without raising the tariff above 20 percent, but he insisted that distribution must be suspended if rates exceeded that level. By the following spring, as the revenue shortfall became increasingly serious, the Virginian admitted that the tariff had to be raised above the 20 percent level, but he also demanded that distribution cease. In March, he urged Congress to stop distribution even before it passed a new tariff and to allocate land revenues to pay off the debt. Only then, he argued, could the government sell its bonds.⁶⁶

The Whig majority seized on the interrelated deficit, tariff, and distribution questions to finalize their divorce from Tyler. Whereas the president pleaded with Congress for rapid action to restore the government's credit, the Whigs deliberately stalled in order to embarrass him. Furthermore, they insisted on both a higher tariff and continued distribution. Henry Clay, who would resign his Senate seat at the end of March under the disingenuous pretext of attempting to create greater harmony between Congress and the president, took the lead in outlining the alternative Whig program. His series of resolutions committed the Whig party to both a higher tariff and distribution. Spurning Tyler's plea that land revenues should be reserved for reducing the national debt, he insisted instead that they be distributed to the states, which desperately needed them to pay their own debts. From Kentucky, Clay also showered Whigs with advice that the nation's and party's welfare required adherence to distribution, passage of a higher tariff, and the scuttling of Tyler's defense expenditures.⁶⁷

Clay's program, by clearly distinguishing the Whig party from Tyler and from the Democrats, might help win the important congressional elections of 1842 and 1843. Yet this strategy entailed the same risk as the insistence on a national bank in 1841. As the majority party, the Whigs bore the responsibility for enacting legislation. Nonetheless, they pushed a program the president seemed almost certain to veto. To minimize the risk of such frustration, the Whigs delayed action as long as possible in the hope that the worse the government's financial condition became, the greater the pressure on Tyler to eat crow and sign the Whig measures in order to get some revenue. If Tyler still vetoed their measures, the party could blame him for sacrificing the country's welfare because of his hostility to Henry Clay and the Whig party.⁶⁸

Only in June, six months after the session began, did Millard Fillmore, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, report tariff legislation to the full House. He proposed first an explicit stopgap measure called the "little tariff" designed to tide the government over until a permanent law could be written. This bill merely postponed the final cuts due under the 1833 tariff from July 1 until August 1. Concomitantly, it postponed the distribution of land revenue scheduled for July 1 for a month as well. The bill passed both houses on decided party-line votes, and on June 29 Tyler vetoed it for illegally continuing distribution while tariff rates remained above the 20 percent level.

The veto infuriated the Whigs and reinforced their animosity toward Tyler. The normally mild-mannered Crittenden wrote Letcher, "My wish is to see the Whig party rid of him—rid of the nuisance." Whigs should "strip him of all disguise" and expose "his true character of enmity and hostility." At the same time, Crittenden told Clay that Whigs' anger at Tyler ensured Clay's election in 1844. "Tyler is one of your best friends. His last Veto has served us all well." Clay agreed. Since Democrats would vote to uphold Tyler's veto, he exulted, "that will identify them still further with him, and . . . they will have to share with him the odium of its defeat." "The more Veto's [sic] now of right measures the better," Clay iterated in July. Should Tyler cast the expected veto of the Whigs' second tariff bill, House Whigs should initiate impeachment proceedings against him. Democrats would "rally around the President," and "the more complete the evidence shall be of their thorough identification with him the better for us." 69

To expose Tyler as a Democrat, to clarify Whig differences from Democrats and to rally Whig troops, congressional Whigs wrote a permanent tariff bill they knew Tyler would veto. It coupled an increase in rates far above the 20 percent level with an explicit provision for the continuation of distribution. The bill reached Tyler on August 5. Four days later he vetoed it.

If the Whigs had succeeded in demonstrating that Tyler was no Whig, he forced them to choose between their cherished goals of distribution and a higher tariff. Many southern and western Whigs had gone along with higher tariff rates only because they were combined with distribution, and now the party quarreled over which to keep. "The Whigs are now divided into two parties," Calhoun wrote on August 22, "one preferring the Distribution to the Tariff, and the other the Tariff to the Distribution; and neither willing to join in a bill simply for revenue with us." Disgusted southern Whigs wanted to adjourn without raising any new funds for the administration. As Crittenden told Clay, however, "Our friends of the North seem to be very seriously and sincerely apprehensive that their constituents will be discontented to such an extent as to be fatal to their coming elections if we should adjourn without doing or attempting something more." Southern Whig leaders like Mangum also recognized that as the majority party, the Whigs simply could not shirk their responsibility for providing the government with revenue. In the end, the Whigs chose to pass a tariff and a distribution bill separately. In both houses, southern Whigs deserted the party on the separate tariff act. It passed only because of solid support from Pennsylvania Democrats, and Tyler reluctantly signed it into law because he was desperate for additional revenue. The Whigs reunited on the new distribution act, but Tyler pocket-vetoed it 70

Whig efforts to enact a distinctive legislative program in the regular session of the Twenty-Seventh Congress therefore proved as abortive as in the special session. True, they obtained a higher tariff that was popular among manufacturing elements in the North. It levied high specific duties on some items, raised ad valorem rates to the levels of 1832, and required that importers pay all duties immediately rather than delaying for up to a year. Thus it provided much more protection for depressed manufacturing areas than had the 1833 tariff and promised as well to raise badly needed additional revenue for the government.⁷¹ But everyone realized that its restorative effects would be slow in coming. And in areas such as Pennsylvania where it was most popular, Democrats could claim equal credit for its passage.

In order to obtain the tariff, Whigs had been forced to sacrifice distribution, thereby alienating some of their southern and western supporters and leaving state administrations that faced crushing debts in the lurch. They had also done little to restore government credit. Bond sales still lagged, and to finance the government in the short term, the Whigs had been forced to issue Treasury notes. Even though these notes bore interest, with their issue the government in effect had printed more money to pay its debts rather than borrowing it, a practice the Whigs had deplored and voted against when the Democrats employed it during Van Buren's administration. Palpably, they had failed to demonstrate the superiority of Whig management.

Even worse, the Whigs paid a high price for their strategy of delaying action until the summer in order to coerce Tyler. The tariff of 1842, their lone positive achievement, passed on August 30, but before that date congressional, gubernatorial, and legislative elections had been held in New Hampshire, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Virginia, Louisiana, Alabama, Illinois, Kentucky, Missouri, and North Carolina. In all except Rhode Island and Kentucky, the Whigs lost, and even in Kentucky they lost seats in the legislature. In March, Thurlow Weed, who still urged reconciliation with the administration, warned presciently in his Albany Evening Journal:

The Whig members of Congress, instead of taking the President "for better or for worse," as wives take their husbands, array themselves against his Administration. This is a source of interminable mischiefs and evils. And what is worse, it's a warfare that will not only bring defeat and disgrace to both parties but is proving destructive to public interests.⁷²

Weed shrewdly recognized that voters cared little about who was at fault—Tyler or Congress. All they could see was politicians who were carrying on personal warfare at the expense of the economic recovery the Whig party had promised, and they were not about to spare the party from blame.

The case of North Carolina, which held gubernatorial and legislative elections in August, illustrates the fate of Whigs elsewhere. In March, one resident warned that the Democrats were making hay in the state because the voters saw only "a Whig Congress cut up by Faction, doing nothing scarcely but idle debate upon abstractions; and a Whig President doing all that can be done to break down that party by whose acts he came into power—the country suffering, in the meantime, and becoming worse and worse every day; and such a state of affairs produced by those who promised better things, and were confided in almost by the acclamations of the people." Two months later, another resident predicted to Senator William A. Graham that the Democrats would carry the crucial legislative elections that would decide the fate of Graham's seat and determine which party could reapportion the state's congressional districts in accordance with the new census, with the cry "of the promise of better times not being redeemed." Although the Whigs managed to salvage the North Carolina gubernatorial election, they suffered far more drop-off than the Democrats, and they lost control of the legislature for the first time since 1834. Upon seeing those results, as well as Whig defeats elsewhere, Mangum despairingly protested, "The traitor has destroyed the party, & I fear, we have not time to recover."

To salvage what they could from the legislative debacle, congressional Whigs dramatically reaffirmed their excommunication of the president and exposed Democrats as his primary defenders. House Whigs referred Tyler's veto message of August 9 to a select committee chaired by former President John Quincy Adams and a week later adopted its vindictively partisan report. Inspired especially by Tyler's venomous Virginia enemy, John Minor Botts of Richmond, the committee report castigated everything that Tyler had done since taking office, called his behavior worthy of impeachment, and recommended against formal proceedings only because Democrats could block it. When Tyler sent the House an indignant protest, the Whig majority, on a party-line vote, refused to include it in the House Journal, just as the Senate Whigs had done to Jackson in 1834.⁷⁵

Meanwhile, state and local Whig organizations moved to eradicate any hint that the administration or its supporters could be considered Whigs. In the summer and fall of 1842 state conventions in Maine, Kentucky, Georgia, North Carolina, Louisiana, Indiana, Vermont, New York, New Jersey, and even Massachusetts formally endorsed Clay for the presidency. Stalwart Whig papers like the Albany Evening Journal and the New York Tribune that had formerly urged reconciliation between Congress and Tyler now vilified him. The small band of Whigs in the House who had supported the president—Caleb Cushing of Massachusetts, George Proffit of Indiana, and Wise, Mallory, and Gilmer of Virginia—were purged and denied renomination as Whigs. In succeeding sessions of Congress, the Senate rejected even more of Tyler's nominees.⁷⁶

Yet neither denunciation of Tyler nor unification behind Clay solved the party's problems in 1842 and 1843. For one thing, so long as Webster remained in the cabinet, internal party divisions persisted, especially in Massachusetts. In the Bay State, Webster's personal rival for control of the state party, the affluent and influential textile manufacturer Abbott Lawrence, attempted to exploit the disrepute of the Tyler administration to take revenge on Webster. Lawrence had favored Clay for the nomination in 1839, but Webster's influence had thrown the state to Harrison. When Webster joined the cabinet, Lawrence had sought his seat in the Senate, but Webster secured it instead for his friend Choate. Now Lawrence attempted to banish Webster from the Massachusetts Whig party. In September 1842 he gained control of the state convention, which proceeded to denounce Tyler and his entire administration and to nominate Clay. On September 30, however, Webster delivered a ringing speech in Boston's Faneuil Hall repudiating the convention's actions, defending Tyler, and proclaiming that he was and always would be a good Whig. Given Webster's immense prestige and wide personal following in Massachusetts, the state's voters remained confused about who spoke for the Whig party.⁷⁷

Elsewhere Whigs paid a price for their new unity against the administration in terms of lost federal patronage. Dismayed by the deliberate procrastination of the congressional Whigs during the spring and outraged by suggestions of impeachment in the summer, Tyler abandoned any hope of reconciliation with moderate Whigs. In the spring and summer of 1842 he began to remove Whigs and increasingly to appoint Democrats in their place in an attempt to build up a third party composed of state rights Whigs and Democrats from the South and anti-Van Buren Democrats in the North. The first notable purge occurred in the Philadelphia custom house; Tyler ordered the collector, Jonathan Roberts, to replace some thirty Clay men with Tyler loyalists. When Roberts protested, he himself was sacked. Whereas prior to June 1842 Tyler had appointed primarily Whigs to the federal judiciary upon the advice of Webster, after that date all of his nominees were Democrats. As further evidence of his shift, Tyler directed the administration's newspaper in New York City to support the Democratic gubernatorial candidate in the fall of 1842.

Tyler's courtship of the Democrats accelerated after 1842. Because of deaths, resignations, and Senate rejections, he had to reshuffle his cabinet considerably in 1843 and 1844, and with the exception of the turncoats Cushing and Gilmer. every new appointee was a Democrat: David Henshaw of Massachusetts; John Nelson of Maryland; William Wilkins and James Porter of Pennsylvania, the latter being the brother of Pennsylvania's Democratic Governor David Porter; John Y. Mason of Virginia: and eventually, and most important, John C. Calhoun, But Tyler reached far below the cabinet level to build up a personal organization hostile to the Whigs in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, St. Louis, and elsewhere. Late in the spring of 1843 and again in 1844, he conducted what was called "the reign of terror" against Whig officeholders and replaced them with Democrats. Symbolic of his strategy, he made great efforts to form an alliance with Tammany Hall, the notorious Democratic organization in New York City.⁷⁸ Reviewing Tyler's manipulation of patronage in the fall of 1843, John Davis of Massachusetts complained to Clay, "Corruption and Tyler, and Tyler and Corruption, will stick together as long as Cataline and treason. The name of Tyler will stink in the nostrils of the people; for the history of our Government affords no such palpable example of the prostitution of the executive patronage to the wicked purpose of bribery."79

All of these developments had the effect of distilling Tyler elements out of the Whig party. But they also stripped Whigs of federal offices. The loss of local appointive offices, as well as the frustration of the Whig program in Congress, sapped the enthusiasm of state and local Whig organizations as they entered the campaigns of 1842 and 1843. There was little use electing new Whigs or reelecting old ones to Congress, many despaired, since Tyler would only stifle them with the veto. Much better, some openly argued, to let those elections go by default so that the Democratic party would have control of the legislative as well as the executive branch, and thus the Whig party would no longer bear the responsibility for the government's fortunes.⁸⁰

Despite the party's rally around Henry Clay during 1842, therefore, it entered the congressional and state elections of 1842 and 1843 divided in some states, demoralized in others, and discredited everywhere for its apparent failure to fulfill its promises. In the fall of 1842 Whigs lost gubernatorial, state legislative, or congressional elections in Maine, Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Arkansas, and Georgia. In 1843 they were defeated in New Hampshire, Connecticut, and Virginia in the spring; Alabama, Illinois, and Indiana in the summer; and Maine, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, and Mississippi in the fall. In addition, they lost congressional seats in Kentucky, North Carolina, and Tennessee in August, even though they still carried a majority of the vote in those states

Altogether, the Whigs suffered one of the most staggering reversals in off-year congressional elections ever witnessed in American history. Of the fifty-one Congresses that met between 1835 and 1936, only eight saw as many as 20 percent of the total seats in the House of Representatives shift from one party to another, and the House elected in 1842 and 1843 was one of those. In the Twenty-Seventh Congress, Whigs held a majority of 29–22 in the Senate and 133–102 in the House, with six members listed as Independents. In the next Congress, their margin in the Senate was reduced to 28–25 because of defeats in state legislative elections, while in the House they were in a minority of 79 to 142. As the data in Table 12 indicate, Whig losses were especially heavy in Connecticut, Virginia, Louisiana, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Maine, Georgia, New Jersey, Ohio, and New York, although they also suffered declines in North Carolina, Tennessee, and Michigan.

Paralleling and in part contributing to the thrashing Whigs received in congressional elections was the devastation they suffered in state legislative elections during 1842. Although the Whigs had lost one house of the legislature in a number of states in 1841, their ability to retain control of the other had provided them with a way to check Democratic programs. In 1842, however, they lost control of both houses in a number of states, so that by the end of the year, Democrats completely controlled the legislature in almost as many states as the Whigs had won in 1840 (Table 13). As a result, in 1842 and 1843, Whigs had no way to block Democratic reapportionment schemes or to stop Democratic legislation.

Inevitably, the major leaders of different Whig factions read into these returns what they wanted. Tyler, who was moving irreversibly back toward the Democratic party, later crowed that the Democratic sweep was "the greatest political victory ever won within my recollection . . . achieved entirely upon the vetoes of the Bank bills presented to me at the special session." Webster, who clung to the administration until May 1843 but still hoped to remain a Whig, peevishly interpreted the Whig setbacks as a repudiation of his rival, Clay, and of Clay's strategy of warfare upon the administration. "Blight and mildew afford the same auspices for good crops, as Mr. Clay's name does for political success," Webster wrote Edward Everett, the minister to England, in November 1842. The Whig party could be regarded "as now broken up." "The name may remain, but without entirely new leaders, the members of the party can never again be rallied." "82

[&]quot;Where possible, I have used the percentage of the popular vote won in the congressional election, but where those data were unavailable, I have substituted the Whig percentage of the vote in the gubernatorial election held on the same day as the congressional election. "A.L." refers to at-large elections. Here as elsewhere, "N.R." indicates that no returns were available.

^bAgain for the New Jersey elections in 1843, I have calculated the statewide Whig percentage of the vote in two different ways. The first figure is based on the absolute returns for four of the five districts. The second figure, in parentheses, is the mean of the Whig percentage in all five districts.

The Whig proportion of the popular vote in the 1840 congressional elections is based on returns from only twenty-one of twenty-five districts.

Clay, alarmed that the party would indeed seek new leaders and desert his presidential candidacy again, minimized the defeats in 1842 and once again blamed "disgust and dissatisfaction" with Tyler's perfidy. The following December he reported buoyantly from New Orleans, "Every where I find great confidence prevailing among the Whigs of their success in 1844," for they knew that "all of the elections of the past fall which have been lost by them" were "lost not by the increased strength of their opponents, but by voters remaining absent from feelings of mortification and disgust, created by the acting President."⁸³

None of these self-serving explanations was entirely correct, but Clay was more accurate than either Webster or Tyler. As in 1841, the Whigs lost primarily because of a systemic drop-off in turnout rates among their own disillusioned supporters, not because of increases in the Democratic vote. Of all the states where Whigs lost control of state governments, congressional seats, or both, Democratic gains contributed to the results more heavily than Whig abstentions only in Arkansas, Connecticut, Indiana, Kentucky, and Mississippi. Elsewhere, the failure of Whigs to retain the vote they had achieved in the state and presidential elections of 1840 proved far more important (see Tables 10 and 11).

Historians have long noted this failure of Whigs after 1840 to turn out in nonpresidential elections at the same rate as did Democrats. Some have attributed that abstention to the residual influence of antiparty sentiment among Whig supporters. According to this theory, Whig voters could be brought out only when the stakes were high and the issues clear. Party loyalty alone could never be used to mobilize Whig voters because they never developed intense party loyalty. This analysis minimizes the extent to which Tyler's manipulation of patronage had deprived local Whig organizations of the mechanisms to mobilize voters. More important, it ignores the evidence that the Whig vote soared in the off-year elections of the late 1830s, when the residual influence of antiparty sentiment should have been stronger than in the 1840s.

The crucial difference between the late 1830s and the early 1840s was not the degree of antiparty sentiment but the public perception of what Whig party leaders stood for and would accomplish. Whig voters did indeed respond to issues and programs, but those platforms had to be clear and promising. Instead, in the early 1840s, what the Whig party stood for and how it differed from the Democrats often remained murky. And when its record became clear, it was hardly compelling. Between 1837 and 1840, the Whigs had attracted hundreds of thousands of new recruits by articulating a distinctive and promising program. By failing to fulfill that promise after 1840, the Whigs could not retain the full support they had won earlier.

State issues often depressed Whig turnout further and provided weapons with which the Democrats could mobilize their own constituencies in gubernatorial and state legislative elections. In New York the Whigs suffered, as they had in 1841, from two of Governor Seward's favorite programs. His attempt to secure public funding for Catholic parochial schools in New York City alienated nativistic elements in the party there and contributed to the decline in Whig turnout in 1841 and 1842. At the same time, Democrats pilloried the Whigs' continuing issue of bonds to expand the canal system as ruining the state's credit, and they successfully advocated instead a stop-and-tax policy whereby construction would be halted unless funds were raised immediately by taxes to pay for the canals. In North Carolina, Democrats attacked the Whigs in 1842 and 1843 for their efforts to provide relief to failing railroads. Mississippi's Democrats exploited hostility to banks by demanding the repudiation of state bonds that had been issued to certain banks to raise capital, and the Whigs' resistance to such laws only reinforced the conviction of Democratic voters that the Whigs favored rich and privileged institutions.

Almost everywhere, so long as the economy remained depressed and banks suspended specie payments, the antibanking platform of the Democrats proved far more appealing to Democratic voters than did the efforts of Whigs to aid banks. Put another way, Whigs in a number of states had been given a fair chance to produce economic recovery with their probusiness programs. The enactment of those programs incited Democratic voters against them, as it had in 1838 and 1839. Their failure to produce the promised recovery simultaneously deterred disappointed Whig supporters from voting at all. Developments at the state level, in short, generally reinforced the differential pattern in Whig and Democratic turnout created by events in Washington.⁸⁵

The systemic abstention by Whig voters also left the party vulnerable in several northern states to new challengers for the anti-Democratic vote. Of these, the most important was the recently formed Liberty party, the political arm of the abolitionist movement, which sought to mobilize voters in almost every northern state. During the mid-1830s, most abolitionists had spurned a separate party for fear that the corruption and expediency they associated with parties would dilute the zeal for real reform. Instead they had relied on moral suasion to convince Americans of the sinfulness of slaveholding in the South and of racism in the North, on petitions to Congress calling for eradication of slavery in the District of Columbia, and on interrogation of regular party candidates to determine which ones were more favorable to their goals.

By the late 1830s, a number of abolitionists had grown disenchanted with these tactics. Aside from a few northern Whig congressmen, the petition campaign seemed to fall on deaf ears. From 1836 until 1844, Congress stifled open discussion of antislavery petitions through a formal gag rule in the House and an informal one in the Senate. Interrogating candidates proved less and less useful since abolitionists had no effective sanction against those major party candidates who simply ignored them or who, upon winning office, reneged on promises to back antislavery action. Hence a number of abolitionists became convinced that they could be a more effective pressure group if they established their own party. By aggregating a readily identifiable bloc of voters, they might force regular party politicians to bid for their support. A separate party would also ensure that zealous antislavery men would have genuine abolitionist candidates to vote for and would no longer need to waste their votes on untrustworthy regular party candidates.⁸⁶

The Liberty party's initial plunge into the electoral arena during the presidential contest of 1840 had been far from auspicious. The party received less than three-tenths of 1 percent of the total vote, and only in Massachusetts did its proportion exceed 1 percent. In 1840, partisan attachments were too strong and economic issues too vital to wean any but the most dedicated antislavery men from the regular parties. The opposition of northern Whig congressmen to the gag rule, moreover, provided evidence enough that those who opposed slavery could safely express that antagonism by voting Whig.

Disillusionment with the Whig party after 1840 abetted the growth of the tiny Liberty party. Antislavery men who had clung to Whiggery in order to achieve economic reform saw little reason to remain in the party once it failed to enact that reform. In the Twenty-Seventh Congress, moreover, the Whig majority had proved no more tolerant of abolitionist petitions than had Democratic majorities previously. Eager to push through their economic program without delay, a few Whig congressmen even moved to censure such antislavery Whig stalwarts as John Quincy Adams and Joshua R. Giddings. Although the vast majority of northern Whig congressmen voted against such resolutions, just as they did against the gag rule, the defection of a few Northerners and the solid hostility of southern Whigs on these matters put the Whig party in bad odor among the most committed antislavery men.⁸⁷ Tyler's accession to the presidency and his reliance on proslavery Virginia advisors further alienated them from the party. Nor did the Whigs' rally behind Clay's candidacy reassure them, for they had opposed Clay in 1839 precisely because of his antiabolitionist statements.

Abolitionists appealed to and shared the same moralistic fervor for reform that characterized the evangelical Protestant groups who normally supported the Whigs. The Liberty party consequently cut into the ranks of Whiggery. It grew most rapidly in rural strongholds of Whiggery and revivalistic sentiment like northern New England, upstate New York, western Massachusetts, the Western Reserve in northeastern Ohio, and Michigan.⁸⁸

The authenticity of moral antagonism toward slavery among Liberty party voters cannot be questioned, and to an extent, that impassioned antislavery sentiment accounts for the growth of the Liberty party after 1840. The decisive political position it achieved in certain states by 1842 and 1843 nonetheless depended far more on the evaporation of Whig voting support. The data in Table 14 indicate that the Whigs lost far more voters from abstention than from defections to the Liberty party. The ratio of Whig losses to Liberty gains ranged from 2 to 1 in Massachusetts and Vermont, to 4 to 1 in Michigan and Indiana, 7 to 1 in Ohio, 9 to 1 in New York, and 30 to 1 in Pennsylvania. Whatever the Liberty party's success in mobilizing voters, in short, its proportion of the total vote would never have been so large had other Whig supporters continued to turn out.

The Liberty party achieved its greatest proportionate strength in states such as New Hampshire, Maine, and Michigan, where the Whigs declined into a hopeless minority position after 1840. The futility of the Whig cause there freed antislavery voters to support the Liberty party without the fear that their defection might cause the Whigs to lose to the Democrats. In short, the weakening of Whiggery through erosion of its voting base after 1840 did far more to cause the growth of the Liberty party than the growth of the Liberty party did to weaken the Whig party.

Whatever the reasons, the Liberty party achieved a crucial balance of power between the major parties in certain states. In the Connecticut, Massachusetts, and Ohio gubernatorial elections of 1842 and 1843, the small proportion of the vote attracted by the third party could have tipped the elections to the Whigs had it gone to Whig candidates. In Massachusetts, Liberty incursions into the Whig vote, especially in legislative elections, helped the Democrats elect Marcus Morton governor in 1842 when the contest went to the legislature after no candidate received a majority of the popular vote. Even in those states, however, the overall drop-off in the Whigs' vote contributed far more to their defeat than did defections to the Liberty party, and elsewhere Democrats won with absolute majorities. In congressional elections as well, although the Liberty party ran candidates in a number of northern districts, they rarely affected the outcome. Third-party candidates, however, cost the Whigs a seat in Ohio in 1843 and may have contributed to their defeat in three Connecticut districts.

These exceptions aside, the emergence of the Liberty party caused fewer Whig losses in congressional elections than did congressional redistricting. The Constitution required reapportionment of congressional districts according to the census of 1840. In addition, Congress enacted a law in 1842 requiring all states to establish individual congressional districts and to abandon statewide or citywide atlarge districts that a number of states had employed until that time. That law, moreover, reduced the number of total seats in the House by increasing the ratio of constituents to representatives and thus forced a reallocation of seats among the states. All this meant that virtually every state in the nation had to redraw its districts in 1842. The political battle waged over reapportionment was so fierce that several states like Ohio, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maine, and Vermont, which would have held elections in 1842, were forced to postpone them until 1843.

Where Democrats controlled legislatures, the Whigs were the losers from the reapportionment process. Table 12 lists the proportion of congressional seats and the proportion of the popular vote won by the Whigs before and after redistricting. Those data reveal the disadvantage Whigs endured in a number of states. Abolition of New Jersey's at-large system reduced Whig representation despite an increase in Whigs' popular vote. In North Carolina the Whig vote increased from 52 to 58 percent between 1841 and 1843. But because Democrats had designed the districts, the Whig share of seats fell from seven of thirteen to four of nine. In Tennessee, where the Whigs' proportion of the total vote remained the same in 1841 and 1843, their share of seats fell from eight of thirteen to five of eleven. Elsewhere, relatively small declines in the Whig share of the total popular vote in Illinois, Ohio, Virginia, and New York produced disproportionately large declines in their share of seats.

Very small increases in the Democratic share of the popular vote also produced very large increases in Democratic seats. In 1842–43, the Democratic popular vote nationwide increased by only about 2 percent. The Democrats' share of House seats, in contrast, increased from 42 to 64 percent. Since the impact of the Liberty party was so slight, the redrawing of congressional districts primarily accounts for this discrepancy.⁹²

[&]quot;Except where otherwise indicated, these figures are taken from gubernatorial elections. The first column on the left lists the total vote in the presidential election of 1840, but the other columns are not all measured from that total. Instead, they list the changes in the party vote from the immediately preceding election listed in the table. For example, the change in Maine in 1842 is measured from 1841, while the change in New York that year is measured from 1840.

Comparison of the results for the lower house of the state legislature listed in Table 6 with those for congressional elections listed in Table 12 further highlights the effectiveness of the Democratic reapportionment, since elections for both offices were held simultaneously. In Connecticut, Whigs won 41 percent of the legislative seats in 1843 but none of the congressional seats. In Louisiana in 1842, they won 57 percent of the legislative seats but none of the congressional ones; in Virginia in 1843, 43 percent of the state seats but only 20 percent of the congressional ones; in Indiana, 45 percent of the legislative seats but only 20 percent of the congressional ones; in New Jersey, 40 percent of the legislative seats but only 20 percent of the congressional ones; and in Ohio in 1843, 54 percent of the legislative seats but only 43 percent of the congressional ones. To be sure, the previous success of Whigs in designing favorable assembly districts, differences in the popularity of local and congressional candidates, and differences in the salience of state issues in state and congressional races partially account for the disparity of these results. But Democratic control of both houses of the legislatures that drew the new districts in all of these states except Indiana and New Iersev surely contributed to it.

The Whigs did not suffer everywhere from the redrawing of districts. Although their share of the popular vote in Pennsylvania dropped from its 1840 level, they won a higher proportion of seats in 1843. Even though their electoral performance was woeful in Alabama in both 1841 and 1843, the abandonment of the at-large system allowed them to pick up at least one seat in that Democratic stronghold. The same was true of Georgia. In 1842 the Democratic legislature retained the at-large system in defiance of the new congressional statute. As a result, the Whigs lost all eight seats despite winning 48.5 percent of the vote. But when the Whigs won the gubernatorial and legislative elections of 1843, they designed congressional districts that would benefit their party. Hence in 1844 they carried four of eight seats with precisely the same percentage of the statewide vote. These were exceptions, however. All in all, the ability of Democratic legislatures to shape new congressional districts in most states allowed them to turn small gains in the popular vote into enormous increases in their congressional representation.

VI

The dramatic shift of House seats to the Democrats exaggerated the competitive weakness of the Whigs and disguised the beginnings of a Whig comeback in 1843. Despite the erosion of voting support in some states and the more insistent challenge of the Liberty party for anti-Democratic voters, the Whig party still obtained approximately 48 percent of the popular vote in the congressional elections of 1842-43 compared with approximately 51.5 percent in 1840-41. Even more encouraging, except for Pennsylvania, Ohio, Maine, North Carolina, and Virginia, the erosion of Whig support slowed perceptibly, and in all of those states the Democrats also suffered serious drop-off in 1843. Whigs lost both Connecticut and Indiana that year, but former Whig supporters there rallied to the party once again, although not in the proportions that had melted away in 1841 and 1842. In addition, Whigs increased their share of legislative seats in twelve of the seventeen states that held elections in both 1842 and 1843 while losing ground only in Vermont. Best of all, the Whigs won statewide majorities or pluralities of the vote in Kentucky, Tennessee, and North Carolina in August; in Vermont in September: in Maryland and Georgia in October: and in Massachusetts in November. Equally significant, they recaptured control of the lower house of the Ohio legislature for the first time in three years.

Many circumstances contributed to this minor comeback. Signs of economic recovery appeared by the summer of 1843. Astute local leadership also played a role. In Georgia the brilliant young Alexander H. Stephens, who was destined to become a major figure in the Whig party, stumped across the state in a special congressional campaign and helped himself and the rest of the Whig ticket win. In Tennessee, Ephraim H. Foster rallied the Whigs behind James Jones' campaign for reelection as governor. In Massachusetts, Webster, who was frantic to reinstate himself in the good graces of a party that had come close to ostracizing him, endorsed the Whig ticket, whereas the previous year he had denounced it.

By 1843, Whigs were also able to capitalize on state issues in those states where they returned to power. In Ohio, where Whigs pointed to signs of economic recovery as the product of the Whig tariff of 1842, they also attacked antibanking legislation Democrats had passed in 1842 and 1843 for threatening to abort that recovery by extirpating credit and currency just when they were most needed. Similarly, in Massachusetts, while the Whigs benefited from renewed unity and growing Democratic disarray caused by Tyler's appointment of conservative Democrats to federal offices in the state, they also attacked every part of Democratic Governor Marcus Morton's proposed program to reform taxes, banks, legislative apportionment, and state loans to railroads, just as they had done in 1840. In Georgia, where the cotton economy remained depressed in 1843, Whigs attacked Democrats for mismanagement of the state's finances and for failure to produce relief when they controlled the government. Tennessee's election focused primarily on national economic issues, but Whigs also blasted the Democratic majority of the state senate that had blocked the election of United States senators in 1841 and 1842 and thus deprived the state of representation in the Senate during the second and third sessions of the Twenty-Seventh Congress. 94

Renewed unity within the party and a clear reaffirmation of its economic principles were most responsible for the improved Whig showing. By 1843 Tyler's courtship of the Democratic party through patronage appointments in Philadelphia, Boston, New York, Tennessee, and elsewhere had become undeniable. No longer were local Whig activists paralyzed by indecision toward the administration. Even though many had been purged from patronage jobs, they now at least agreed that the administration was as much an enemy as the Democrats. In most states, Whigs also came out forthrightly for Henry Clay and the economic principles he had long championed—the high Tariff of 1842, the need for distribution of land revenues, opposition to state repudiation of debts, and, especially in the South, the need for a new national bank. Reflexively the Democrats had run against those traditional Whig programs. Unlike Pennsylvania, where both parties ran as champions of the tariff and both suffered declines in turnout, in the states the Whigs carried, they had once again carved out a clear and distinctive platform. As the Nashville Banner boasted of the result in Tennessee, it showed that Andrew Jackson's home was now "A WHIG STATE—A NATIONAL BANK STATE—A TARIFF STATE—A CLAY STATE."95

Contrary to Webster's prediction about the need for new Whig leadership after the rout in 1842, many Whigs interpreted the results of 1843 as a vindication of the Kentuckian. He lectorate's disgust with Tyler and the apathy it produced. Now that the warfare between Tyler and the Whigs was undeniable, now that Tyler had revealed his true Democratic colors, and now that the party had rallied behind Clay and his principles, it seemed once again on the road to recovery.

Henry Clay's New York friend Peter B. Porter exuberantly wrote to him in October, "On the whole our political prospects are uncommonly bright and promising. The cheering and unexpected result of the elections in Maryland and Georgia, seems to have inspired our friends with new ardor and energy; and we anticipate with a confidence, that we have never before felt, on your triumphant election a year from this time." John Davis of Massachusetts also exulted that the results in Tennessee, Georgia, and North Carolina proved that the country was once again committed to Clay's economic doctrines and his presidential candidacy. "There seems here, in the real Whig party, to be but one sentiment on that head, and it looks to your name as the rallying word."

Despite the setbacks the Whig party had suffered in the elections of 1841, 1842, and 1843, in sum, Whigs showed no inclination to pursue the route they had taken in 1839. This time they would not jettison their foremost leader for an available man. This time they were determined to mount a presidential campaign behind Henry Clay and the programs he had long championed. They were convinced that by running "the embodiment of Whig principles" and drawing the sharpest possible contrast between the Whig and Democratic parties, they would emerge triumphant. To many, the tortuous odyssey of the Whig party and the long frustration of Henry Clay both appeared to be nearing an end. As the year 1843 closed, victory in the next seemed certain.

Chapter 7

"The Whigs Are in High Spirits"

GEORGIA'S WHIGS WERE "active & buoyant, full of hope and energy," exulted Robert Toombs, chairman of the Whig State Central Committee, in January 1844. "I doubt not we shall achieve a brilliant victory in November for Mr. Clay." "The enthusiasm of 1840 is returning," a Baltimore Whig added in February. "The Whigs look forward to the approaching contest," rejoicing in "the justness of their cause—and in its righteousness read their claim to certain success." The following month a Virginian concurred: Nothing "can prevent the election of Mr. Clay, but his death." That spring northern Whigs as diverse as Indiana editor Schuyler Colfax, Ohio's antislavery zealot, Congressman Joshua R. Giddings, and Boston's patrician Robert C. Winthrop also boasted that the Whig "party will succeed by an overwhelming majority at the coming election."

Even though the issues and contestants changed during the 1844 campaign, most Whigs voiced continual certitude about their triumph. "Everywhere the Whigs are confident," Gustavus Henry, a Whig presidential elector in Tennessee, cheered while stumping the state in July. In October one New Yorker felt "just as sure that this state will vote right as I am of anything not yet positively proven," while another bragged that "the state is safe." Only two days before the presidential balloting a Philadelphian gushed, "The Whigs are in high spirits and fully expect to get the state of Pennsylvania, and to elect H. Clay." All these Whigs rejoiced that fate had now given them another opportunity to vindicate "the justness of their cause" and the charismatic leader who best personified the party's principles and the frustrating struggle to establish them. If superior men and superior policies were ever going to prevail, if right and justice were ever to triumph, Whigs believed, 1844 had to be the year. Defeat was, quite literally, unthinkable.²

Whigs' ebullience in early 1844 now seems unwarranted, indeed incomprehensible. Although they had carried nine states in 1843 and tiny Rhode Island in April 1844, those states could not deliver the electoral vote necessary to win the presidency even if Whigs could carry them again in November. The congressional results of 1843 hardly provided grounds for optimism, and Whigs found themselves in a House minority of 79 to 142 when the new Congress convened in December 1843. Democratic gerrymandering of congressional districts undoubtedly contributed to the lopsided results of 1842 and 1843, but Whigs would have to overcome that same obstacle to capture Congress in 1844. At the same time, the reapportionment following the census of 1840 had reduced the representation of states Whigs might carry, like Vermont, Connecticut, New York, Ohio, Maryland, Kentucky, Tennessee, and North Carolina, and had increased the congressional weight and thus the electoral vote of overwhelmingly Democratic states like Illinois, Michigan, Missouri, Alabama, and Mississippi. By the end of 1843, moreover, President Tyler was actively replacing Whigs with Democrats in local patronage posts, stripping Whigs of their financial and organizational services in the impending campaign.

Despite these cold facts, Clay and other Whigs attributed the party's defeats after 1840 to the disillusionment of Whig voters with Tyler's treachery and to disappointment with the Whigs' failure to enact their program. Whigs had lost, they argued, not because Democrats gained supporters but because Whigs failed to vote. "With the old issues we are safe," declared an Ohioan. "All we want is to bring the voters out." We will win, wrote the chairman of the Whigs' national committee in June, if we "bring the whole Whig force into action." And to bring the Whig majority of 1840 back to the polls, Henry Clay, the "embodiment of the Whig party," was the ideal candidate.³

By the beginning of 1844, Clay's nomination seemed virtually certain. In 1841, 1842, and 1843, anti-Clay groups had floated trial balloons for Winfield Scott, Justice John McLean, and even Daniel Webster. The challengers had pressured the congressional Whig caucus in February 1843 to call a national convention for the following year, a convention that the front-runner had initially opposed. But by the beginning of 1844 virtually all Whigs realized that the May gathering would crown Clay.⁴

Whigs' enthusiastic unity behind their most prominent national leader contrasted wonderfully with Democratic disarray. Even when despairing of Whig fortunes during the dark days of July 1843, Maryland's Whig Senator John L. Kerr pointed to "the divisions of the Locos or the Democrats" as a source of Whig hope for 1844. In May 1844, the Bostonian Winthrop predicted the certainty of Clay's election because "the enemy are utterly confounded & distracted," while an Indiana Whig jeered that "any reconciliation" of "the jarring factions of Locofocoism will be superficial & they will enter upon the contests dispirited & with forebodings of defeat."

Whigs were not whistling in the dark. The Democrats began 1844 seriously divided along ideological, sectional, and personal lines. Two weeks before the Democratic national convention, Virginia's powerful Democratic leader, Thomas Ritchie, privately complained that "never have I seen the . . . party in so much danger," for "we are divided by miserable contests and contemptible jealousies." In part, policy disagreements rent the Democrats. Democrats from Pennsylvania and other mid-Atlantic states, for example, staunchly supported a protective tariff, while the great majority of their party loathed the idea. In most states, a minority of the party continued to resist the majority's hard-money, antibanking, anticorporation policies. In Ohio, for example, Democrats feared in 1844 that "the Whig policy is clearly to drag us into Local [banking] matters upon which we are divided," while in New York probusiness, pro-canal-expansion Democrats aligned with Governor William C. Bouck established their own paper in Albany, the Argus, to battle the Albany Atlas, which represented the party's antibanking, anticanal wing.⁶

These divisions both exacerbated and complicated personal rivalries for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1844. The favorite of the antibanking wing of the party, ex-President Martin Van Buren, led the chase. Infuriated at the willingness of some Democrats to coddle corporations and banks, Van Buren's ardent supporters attributed his defeat in 1840 to the treachery of soft-money elements, and with his renomination and reelection they meant to purge the polluters from the party. Meanwhile, conservative Democrats blamed Van Buren's ideological rigidity and personal unpopularity for the ignominious defeat in 1840, and they intended to deprive the New Yorker of the prize.

South Carolina's John C. Calhoun also vehemently opposed Van Buren's nomination. By December 1843, he had abandoned his quixotic hope for his own nomination, but he still adamantly resisted Van Buren's claims because some of Van Buren's northern supporters had deserted the South on the tariff and on maintenance of the gag rule in the House of Representatives. To protect southern interests, Calhoun and his supporters in Virginia, Georgia, and Alabama increasingly insisted that the Democratic nominee in 1844 must be a slaveholding Southerner.

Tyler's courtship of anti-Van Buren Democrats further fragmented the party. Once Tyler completely abandoned attempts at a rapprochement with the Whig majority and began to fill patronage posts with conservative Democrats, he became as disruptive to the Democrats as he had been to the Whigs, for crucially placed federal officeholders could influence the choice of delegates to the national Democratic convention.

Tyler was clearly trying to build a third party consisting of anti-Van Buren Democrats and southern state rights Whigs, but historians disagree about his motives. Some insist that he sought primarily to advance his policy initiatives, if only by forcing the Democrats to endorse them. Others believe that he was pursuing reelection by running on a third-party ticket or, more likely, by securing the Democratic nomination for himself. Toward that latter end, Tyler's band of officeholding adherents called for a Tyler convention to be held in Baltimore at the end of May, just when the Democratic convention was scheduled to meet in the Monument City. Democrats worried about Tyler's ambitions and his divisive impact on their own ranks, and Whigs agreed that he could only weaken their foes. "Capt. Tyler is going boldly for the nomination against Van Buren," Crittenden gloated to Ohio's Thomas Ewing in March. "This is well."

Though the Democratic party fissured over its impending nomination, most Whigs, like most Democrats, expected Van Buren to emerge as the standard bearer. And Van Buren, Whigs believed, would be the easiest Democrat to defeat. "Van Buren is surely to be the Loco Candidate," Crittenden informed Robert P. Letcher in January, and "that is the sealed doom of the party." Similarly, Georgia's Whig Governor George W. Crawford assured Congressman Alexander H.

Stephens that "should Mr. Van Buren be the nominee," we shall hand "Georgia to Mr. Clay by a majority between 5 and 10,000 votes." "Every intelligent Whig" in Washington wants "the contest to be with him," North Carolina's Willie P. Mangum summed up. "If we cannot beat Mr. Van Buren, we can beat no one."

As 1844 began, Whigs joyously anticipated rehashing the same diatribes they had hurled against the Little Magician four years earlier. "Against him all the documents are prepared and ready," Clay wrote in December 1843, "and we have nothing to do but publish another edition of them, without revisal or correction, organize, and go ahead." Indiana's voters, Schuyler Colfax concurred, will prove "that they were neither 'drunk' nor 'mad' in 1840." They will show Van Buren "that they cast him out because they were opposed to his Sub-Treasury—his profligate expenditures—his disregard of the petitions of the People—and his retention in office of pampered defaulters."

Above all else, Whigs confidently believed that a race between Clay and Van Buren would dramatically highlight the two parties' contrasting national economic policies, and they were utterly convinced that they had the better side of those issues, just as they did in 1840. Although signs of recovery from the long economic slump were beginning to appear at the end of 1843, Whigs still considered their programs far better calculated to produce prosperity than those of the Democrats. John Tyler's perfidy had blocked those programs, but with Henry Clay as president and a new Whig Congress, the party would at last enact them. "We have always insisted," Horace Greeley declared in the New York Tribune, "that the Whig party has only to place its great distinctive principles fairly and fully before the People, advocate them fearlessly and frankly, and stick to them, to secure their hearty and early adoption by the great mass of the People."

Greeley and other Whig leaders confidently believed that an issue-oriented campaign would produce triumph in 1844 because it would reinforce the partisan identity and revive the partisan zeal of the men who had voted Whig in 1840 but abstained thereafter. Such a strategy aimed not to convert Democrats but to mobilize Whigs. Hence, the chairman of the Whig Congressional Executive Committee argued that Whigs should circulate documents that contrasted in detail the Whig position on issues from that of the Democrats. Hence, Whigs freely admitted that party rallies and Whig speechifying sought not to change the minds of Democratic voters but to "rouse the luke warm" among their own, "and cause their attendance at the polls."

Precisely because a race between Clay and Van Buren would dramatize long-standing party differences on policy and thereby mobilize the mutually antagonistic Whig and Democratic legions, Whigs salivated at the prospect. Such a race would draw out the maximum vote of both. And, the Whigs firmly believed, the election of 1840, unlike the atypical off-year contests of 1841, 1842, and 1843, demonstrated that when both parties brought out their full vote, Whigs would win.

Contemporaneous developments both in Washington and in a host of state capitals reinforced Whigs' optimism that their issues gave them the advantage. Although 1844 was a presidential election year, the Whigs were just as interested in winning congressional, gubernatorial, and state legislative elections. To do so, they relied on the continuing battles in state legislatures over banking, corporate privileges, subsidies for internal improvements, the repudiation of state bonds, and other state policies to sharpen the differences between the parties and to increase the Whig party's appeal to its constituents.

Georgia's Whigs crowed in early 1844 about the record of the recent Whig-controlled legislature that arranged for payment of the state's debt, put the currency of the state-operated Central Bank on a sound basis, and blocked Democratic efforts to sell off the state-owned and as-yet uncompleted Western and Atlantic Railroad. Largely because of that record on state issues, state chairman Toombs rejoiced, "I have not seen our prospects at any time so bright." Because Ohio's Democrats suicidally nominated a hard-money gubernatorial candidate on an extreme antibanking platform, one Whig informed Clay, "Our friends in Ohio are in high spirits and our enemies depressed in a corresponding degree."

Similarly, in New York, Greeley welcomed an open battle with the Democrats on the canal expansion issue because he believed that a report by a Whig legislator irrefutably demonstrated that the Erie Canal earned enough revenue to pay off the state debt. New bond issues for immediate construction were therefore preferable to the Democrats' stop-and-tax policy. Emphasizing the canal issue, Whig editors like Greeley and Thurlow Weed also knew, would focus the campaign on the state policy that most divided Democrats.¹⁴

The two parties were also sharply at odds over state economic policy in North Carolina, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Mississippi, and elsewhere in late 1843 and early 1844, and Whigs counted on those conflicts to galvanize their voters. Nonetheless, Whigs looked primarily to national issues in 1844. Tyler's vetoes had revived the Whigs' founding principle of opposition to executive usurpation, and Democrats' applause for those vetoes, including one of a rivers and harbors bill in June 1844, dramatically demonstrated Democratic antipathy to governmentally sponsored economic development. Other congressional actions during the spring of 1844 also reinforced party differences on the land and subtreasury issues. Democrats unanimously supported and Whigs unanimously opposed reinstitution of the subtreasury system, while Whigs supported and Democrats opposed resumption of land revenue distribution, thus providing Whigs with fresh ammunition for their subsequent campaign.¹⁵

Whigs articulated no clear substitute for the defunct Democratic monetary system. Mindful of past experience and apparently hopeful that voters would forget their congressional agenda of 1841, northeastern Whigs often denied that the party wanted a new national bank and insisted only on a sound, uniform paper currency. Southern and western Whigs, in contrast, boldly proclaimed that a Whig victory would produce a new national bank to provide much needed credit. Still, Whigs unitedly opposed the Independent Treasury and an exclusive specie currency—the fruits, they warned, of a Democratic victory.¹⁶

The Tariff of 1842 seemed Whigs' most promising issue. Its passage had been their most significant achievement during the Twenty-Seventh Congress. They had predicted that higher duties would increase government revenues and reduce the debt, revive industry and expand employment, reverse the imbalance between imports and exports, cause gold to flow into rather than out of the country, and thereby increase the total money supply enough to fuel a general economic recovery. Many of these predictions had come true by the spring of 1844. The sharp increase in government revenue between June 1843 and June 1844 wiped out the deficit. The balance of trade shifted in favor of the United States, and a surplus of foreign specie came into the country. As a result, the total money stock in the country burgeoned by almost 14 percent between 1843 and 1844. By the last quarter of 1843, the long slump in economic activity ended, and indexes of agricultural and industrial production as well as new construction turned up. That ascent accelerated in 1844.¹⁷

Whigs proudly asserted that the Tariff of 1842 had reinvigorated the economy. Horace Greeley trumpeted the tariff's virtues almost daily in his influential New York Tribune. But Greeley was hardly alone in believing that the tariff provided the Whigs with an invincible issue. In January 1844, Georgia's Toombs jeered that the Democrats no longer dared talk about repealing it. Thus, he looked forward to "the sport I shall have out of them next summer on the stump about their unredeemed pledges to repeal that 'odious Whig Tariff.' "Clay, who made a tour from New Orleans through Alabama, Georgia, and North Carolina in the winter and early spring of 1844, rejoiced that southern Whigs everywhere finally seemed united behind the protective tariff principle.¹⁸

Nor did Clay exaggerate. Higher cotton prices, chortled North Carolina's David F. Caldwell, proved that a protective tariff for American industry "is decidedly beneficial to the Southern States, & that the clamor of the subject is all humbug." The Virginia state Whig convention in 1844 pledged to campaign in defense of the Tariff of 1842 "in principle and in detail." Southern Whig senators like Georgia's John M. Berrien, Mangum, and Virginia's Rives all gave major speeches in support of the tariff of 1842, while southern Whigs in the House of Representative joined their northern colleagues to form a united front against tariff revision ¹⁹

Contrary to Toombs' prediction in January, Democrats in the House did try to lower the tariff in the spring of 1844. When the House finally tabled the Democratic McKay tariff bill by a vote of 105 to 99 in May, Greeley proudly reported that only one Whig, the state rights Georgian Absalom Chapel, had joined the Democratic majority in attempting to keep the bill alive, while 77 Whigs and 28 Democrats had voted to table it. The result, he proclaimed, was "the most decisive Whig victory gained in Congress, since the Sub-Treasury was laid on the table [in 1837]." ²⁰

As the tariff result demonstrated, the Whig party proved far more united, and the Democrats far more divided, during the Twenty-Eighth Congress' first session than previously, especially on the great symbolic issues that could be used to rally the troops—the tariff, revenue distribution, the Independent Treasury, and support for federally funded internal improvements.²¹ The vote on the McKay bill also pleased Greeley because Whig congressmen chosen in special elections after Congress convened in December, from districts formerly represented by Democrats, provided the crucial Whig margin. Greeley and other Whigs did not merely hypothesize about the expected appeal of the tariff issue in November. They closely followed election results in the winter and spring of 1844, and they interpreted Whig victories as popular mandates for Whig policies—especially the tariff. After Whigs won Connecticut's April gubernatorial and legislative elections, for example, Greeley crowed: "The Moral effect upon the Public sentiment of the Union cannot be overestimated. The struggle has been for great National objects." Later that month, Pennsylvania Whigs interpreted their victory in a special congressional election as a triumph of a protariff Whig over an antitariff Democrat, while New Jersey's Whigs proclaimed their sweep of local township elections a victory for "Clay and Protection."

That these and other local contests turned solely on national issues, let alone the tariff by itself, is doubtful. Nonetheless, Whigs saw those results, just like the early elections of 1840, as establishing an irreversible momentum that would carry the party to victory in the fall. "The result in Connecticut insures, if there was any doubt before, that our success in Novr. is certain," Reverdy Johnson wrote Mangum from Baltimore. "If Connecticut has gone for the Whigs," echoed a North Carolinian, "it almost puts the election of Mr. Clay beyond praying for."

No wonder, then, that Whigs exuded confidence in the spring of 1844. Unprecedented unity behind their presidential candidate and their program, bitter Democratic divisions over men and measures, the expectation that the Democratic presidential nominee would be particularly vulnerable, and the belief that the sharp issue differences between the Whigs and Democrats could once again bring Whigs to the polls all produced a conviction that triumph in November was inevitable. If any additional evidence were needed, the spring's results provided it.

H

Just as Whigs' confidence soared in the spring of 1844, a new issue forced them to revise their calculations about the men and measures upon which the campaign would focus. The transforming issue, Texas annexation, involved the sectionally divisive question of slavery expansion, a dispute with ominous potential to divide both the Whig and Democratic parties along sectional lines. After Texas declared its independence in 1836, virtually all agitation for annexation had emanated from the South, while the most vociferous and vehement opposition had come from the North. When Texans sought admission to the United States, a deluge of hostile petitions, state legislative resolutions, and speeches from northern Democrats, northern Whigs, and northern abolitionists quickly persuaded first Andrew lackson and then Martin Van Buren to shun the project like a leprous pariah. When calls for annexation reemerged in 1842 and 1843, again they came from southern sources—southern Democratic newspapers; John Tyler's Virginia cronies like Abel P. Upshur, Thomas R. Gilmer, and Henry A. Wise; and a few Democratic politicos like Tennessee Congressman Aaron V. Brown, Mississippi Senator Robert J. Walker, and the Marvland editor Duff Green. But propagandists constituted only a tiny fraction of southern politicians. Most southern Whigs and Democrats remained apathetic or at least silent about Texas because they recognized how dangerously divisive it was. Still, the new clamor for Texas came from the South, and in reply, a storm of protest again poured from the North.

Nor is there any doubt that the legality of slavery in Texas chiefly caused sectional disagreement over annexation. While the assertion by the Ohio State Journal in November 1842 that "as a party, in the free states, the Whigs are opposed to the acquisition of Texas" was entirely accurate, the party's most adamant antislavery men led northern Whigs' anti-Texas assault. Veterans of the fight against the gag rule like John Quincy Adams, Joshua R. Giddings, Seth M.

Gates of New York, and William Slade of Vermont published addresses, made speeches, and mobilized grass-roots opposition to annexation. Acquisition of Texas meant slavery expansion, they screamed. The vast, rich Texas soil would guarantee slavery's future economic viability. Slavery extension would thus prolong an immoral and barbaric institution and spawn more slave states, more southern political power in Washington, and more frustration of northern policies like protective tariffs and internal improvements. Indeed, fumed Adams, Giddings, and others, the whole Texas revolution and subsequent pro-Texas agitation proved that a Slave Power conspiracy meant to spread and perpetuate slavery and to increase the South's political power at the North's expense.²⁴

Texas annexation, wrote Giddings in April 1844, involved "the great question of slavery or liberty. Will we extend slavery or will we promote Liberty & Freedom? To give the south the preponderance of political power would be itself a surrender of our Tariff, our internal improvements, our distribution of the proceeds of the public lands," he railed. "In short it would be a transfer of our political power to the slaveholders. And a base and degrading surrender of ourselves to the power & protection of slavery. It is the most abominable proposition with which a free people were ever insulted."

Those Southerners who promoted annexation wanted it for precisely the same reasons Northerners objected to it. True, in propaganda aimed at the North they often denied that the South would benefit from incorporating Texas into the Union. Instead they stressed gains for the North—more land for farmers to buy, increased markets for northern manufactured and agricultural products, and national glory. But such protestations aside, southern enthusiasts for Texas hoped to gain more land, more political power, and more security for the South in general and for slaveholders in particular.

This pro-Texas junto by 1843 harbored the belief—for which some, though not conclusive, evidence existed—that the British sought to make Texas a virtual satellite and would use both political and financial inducements to inveigle Texas authorities into abolishing slavery. Should that happen, proannexation men feared, Texas would become a beachhead for abolitionist activity on the southwestern border of the United States, and the dread disease would inevitably spread to the southern states. To stop this abolitionist plot, proslavery ideologues insisted, Texas had to be saved from perfidious British influence. Annexation must proceed immediately; delay would endanger the entire South.²⁶

Both proponents and opponents perceived Texas annexation as a proslavery measure, and neither Whig nor Democratic party leaders wanted to touch it in a presidential election year when support from both sections of the country was considered vital. When Clay first learned that Congress might consider annexation, he warned Crittenden that the Whig majority in the Senate must quash it because such "an exciting topic" could only produce "dissension, discord, and distraction." Van Buren's closest advisers were equally appalled at the prospect. Benjamin F. Butler bluntly warned him that Texas could "prostrate, at the North, every man . . . connected with it," while New York's Democratic Senator Silas Wright predicted that any scheme of annexation that recognized slavery in Texas "is sure to destroy any man from a free State who will go for it." Endorsing annexation, in sum, might cause northern voters to abstain or defect to the growing Liberty party. Openly opposing it on antislavery grounds could alienate southern voters. Far better, most Whig and Democratic strategists believed, to bury the question, just as it had been smothered in the 1830s.

Both Whig and Democratic leaders, however, underestimated the ability of the Virginian in the White House to force the issue upon them. John Tyler made annexation a concrete issue the parties could not avoid, thereby frustrating Whig plans, just as he had done in the past. As president, Tyler could negotiate a treaty of annexation with the Texans and present it to the Senate for ratification. Tyler had been enthusiastic about Texas since the fall of 1841, but Webster's presence in the State Department had deterred him. Once Webster resigned in May 1843, however, Tyler and his friend Upshur, who replaced Webster, made secret and frantic efforts to entice the reluctant Texans into signing such a treaty. The submission of that treaty to the Senate in April 1844 placed annexation and the concomitant problem of slavery extension on the national political agenda.

Tyler lusted after Texas for several reasons. As a Southerner he shared the proslavery leanings, although not the investments in Texas lands and Texas bonds, of some of his Virginia advisors. He also shared their fear of a British conspiracy to force abolition on Texas. Distrusting the minister to England, Edward Everett of Massachusetts, as an antislavery sympathizer, Tyler sent Duff Green to England as a special envoy, and in the summer of 1843 Green wrote Upshur that he had hard evidence that the British government was prepared to make a loan to the Texas authorities so that they could pay slaveholders to emancipate their slaves. This charge ultimately proved to be exaggerated, but Tyler and Upshur believed it and thus frantically courted the Texans.²⁸

Personal and political motives also turned Tyler toward Texas. The acquisition of such a vast area, he believed, would bring historical glory to his hitherto inglorious administration. If he could achieve reelection in 1844, he could inflict a stinging rebuke on tormentors in both parties. As a president without a party other than the band of rapacious office seekers he had gathered through his manipulation of patronage, Tyler knew he needed an issue that could generate popular enthusiasm. The major parties already monopolized all salient economic issues. But annexation, he believed, could arouse much support from Southerners in both parties. Then, too, land hunger and Anglophobia could attract northern Democrats. By securing a treaty and demonstrating its popularity, he could thus create a viable third party to reelect him or snatch the Democratic nomination from Van Buren.²⁹

For all these reasons, Tyler yearned to present a treaty to Congress before the 1844 campaign began. Even though negotiations did not start in earnest until February 1844, Tyler's annual message in December urged Congress not to be deterred from considering annexation by Mexican threats to declare war should the United States attempt it. By the end of February, Upshur had almost completed a treaty, but on February 28 he suffered a ghastly death when a cannon accidentally exploded on a warship that he and other cabinet members were inspecting. Then Tyler made a fateful decision that ensured that annexation would be presented to the nation in the most explosive way possible. He appointed Calhoun as Upshur's successor.

Calhoun remained a wild card in southern politics. Unlike other southern politicians, he did not believe in political parties or in the wisdom of burying divisive questions for the sake of national party unity. Rather, he sought to unite Southerners of both parties into a solid sectional bloc by confronting the North with sectional ultimatums. Since 1838 Calhoun had promoted Texas annexation to strengthen the South, and Upshur and Duff Green apprised him of the Tyler administration's Texas negotiations. In the Texas project, Calhoun hoped to attain his most cherished political goals. By presenting Texas annexation explicitly as a prosouthern measure and provoking northern resistance to it, he might forge that southern party, across Whig/Democratic lines, he had long dreamed of. Such a tactic might threaten Tyler's attempt to arouse national support for annexation, but Calhoun had no stake in Tyler's career. Although he had publicly withdrawn from the race for the Democratic nomination that February, moreover, he still hungered for Van Buren's defeat. By inciting northern assaults on annexation as a proslavery measure, he believed, he could turn southern Democrats against the New Yorker and thus deny him the nomination. This was the man to whom Tyler entrusted the completion of the Texas treaty.³⁰

Calhoun arrived in Washington at the end of March and by April 12 had a signed treaty in his hands. Before Tyler sent it to the Senate, Calhoun wrote a letter to British Minister Richard Pakenham, which he included in the documents accompanying the treaty. The famous Pakenham Letter dragged up again the charge that the British were endeavoring to persuade the Texans to abolish slavery and justified annexation as a defensive move by the United States to save southern slavery from the abolitionist threat. Contrary to the long propaganda campaign designed to convince the North that annexation would not benefit the South or slavery, Calhoun explicitly presented annexation as a proslavery measure. Southern voters, he hoped, would repudiate any party or any politician who dared oppose it. On April 22, Tyler sent the treaty, along with this letter and other documents, to the Senate and requested it to consider them in absolute secrecy. On April 27, a furious antislavery Democrat from Ohio, Senator Benjamin Tappan, released them to the press. By that date, the Texas question was before Congress and the nation in the most divisive form conceivable.³¹

Almost all Whigs remained confident even after they learned of Tyler's treaty in April. Until the end of May, they believed that they could still smother the issue. Because the Whigs controlled the Senate, they could easily prevent the two-thirds majority vote necessary for ratification. From December 1843 until April 1844, Clay urged southern Whigs in the Senate to reject any treaty, and by the end of March, Whigs in Washington assured fearful Northerners that all congressional Whigs would unite against it. To strengthen the resolve of Southerners, Clay decided in mid-April to release a public letter opposing immediate annexation.³²

Nor did Whigs expect Democrats to attempt to resurrect the issue once the treaty was rejected, for Van Buren, who appeared certain to win the Democratic nomination, had as much interest in burying it as Clay. As early as 1838, Calhoun had written contemptuously yet prophetically that "the two prominent candidates Mr. Van Buren and Mr. Clay naturally come together on all questions on which the North and South come into conflict.... They of course dread all conflicting questions between the two sections, and do their best to prevent them from coming up, and when up to evade them." Certainly Clay expected Van Buren to assume "common ground" with him against the treaty; indeed, he insisted on publishing a letter against annexation even before the Senate acted or either party's convention met partly because he feared Van Buren would beat him to the punch and gain an advantage in the North.³³

With both major candidates committed to oppose the treaty, Whig strategists believed, neither party's convention would endorse it. Then the issue would remain the exclusive property of those isolated political mavericks Tyler and Calhoun. They might make a treaty, Whigs believed, but they could not make a president with their third-party movement because of party loyalty among Whig and Democratic voters, an allegiance that would be reinforced by the salience of traditional partisan issues in the campaign. As Clay put it on April 21 while explaining to Crittenden his reasons for writing his Raleigh Letter against annexation, "The public mind is too fixed on the Presidential question, the current is running too strong . . . as to now be affected by Texas." Similarly, when Georgia Whig Congressman Stephens was warned in May that Calhounites in Georgia were demanding ratification of the treaty, he dismissed "the whole annexation project" as "a miserable political humbug got up [by Tyler and Calhoun] as a ruse to divide and distract the Whig party at the South." "But it will avail them nothing," he assured a correspondent on May 17.34

At first, it seemed as though Whig expectations would be fulfilled. On April 27, the very day that Tyler's treaty and the Pakenham Letter appeared in the New York press, the major Whig and Democratic papers in Washington published letters from Clay and Van Buren, respectively, opposing immediate annexation and the treaty. Although Calhoun had probably hoped to provoke such letters from the candidates when he wrote the Pakenham Letter, it is unlikely that either of them saw it before putting pen to paper. Clay had forwarded his famous Raleigh Letter to Washington on April 17, the day before Calhoun wrote Pakenham, and he constantly badgered Crittenden after that date to get it into print. Van Buren's letter was dated April 20, before Tyler sent the treaty to the Senate. Four days after the publication of the two letters, the Whig convention unanimously nominated Clay. The short Whig platform endorsed the party's now-familiar economic programs, castigated executive usurpation, and never mentioned Texas. Clearly, the Whigs still hoped to focus the upcoming campaign on traditional issues.

In that hope they would be disappointed. The various elements within the Democratic party who opposed Van Buren's nomination pounced on his public stand against immediate annexation as an excuse for dumping him. Many southern Democrats, while nominally pledged to Van Buren, wanted Texas and believed that annexation could provide them with a much more effective southern issue than hard money. Democratic politicians like Brown, Walker, and Calhoun, while cooperating with Tyler's Virginia friends, were more interested in using Tyler to force the annexation issue on the Democratic party than in using Texas to reelect Tyler. Others, like Lewis Cass' soft-money supporters, however, had far more interest in stopping Van Buren than in acquiring Texas. Fomenting a storm of demands that the party must take up Texas and jettison Van Buren before the Democratic convention met on May 27, they succeeded in derailing the frontrunner. Van Buren was thrust aside after a bitter convention fight, and instead the Democrats nominated James K. Polk of Tennessee and George M. Dallas of Pennsylvania on a platform pledging the Democratic party to "the reoccupation of Oregon and the reannexation of Texas, at the earliest practicable period." Thus, the Democrats had deprived the Whigs of the candidate whom they thirsted to run against and forced them to confront an issue they especially wanted to avoid.³⁵

Nevertheless, the unexpected developments at the Democratic convention initially inflated Whigs' optimism since they seemed to perpetuate, indeed to increase, Whigs' advantages. While Whigs had considered Van Buren to be a vulnerable foe, most at first believed that Polk would be even easier to beat. They reacted with the joyous surprise of children opening Christmas presents when they learned what the Democrats had done. After "such a farce as these Baltimore nominations," exclaimed New York's Francis Granger, "we must beat them out of sight," unless, he warned, the very weakness of the Democratic ticket created Whig overconfidence. "It is a literal disbanding of the party for this Campaign," a delighted Mangum proclaimed. "We will literally crush the ticket." "We consider it here as giving up the game," professed an astonished Georgia Whig. Clay could scarcely believe his good fortune. "Are our Democratic friends serious in the nominations which they have made at Baltimore of candidates for President and Vice President?" he sarcastically asked Mangum. "We must beat them with ease if we do one half of our duty." "36

Whigs jeered at the nation's first dark-horse candidate because of his supposed obscurity and lack of qualifications. "What possible chance can such a man stand of being elected President of the U.S. whose qualifications & Claims are so small if not contemptible?" exclaimed a Virginian. Polk "is too small, too feeble," sneered a Tennessee Whig. Despite Polk's previous service as speaker of the House of Representatives and governor of Tennessee, Whigs mockingly and repeatedly chanted "Who is James K. Polk?" After all, he had lost his own state's gubernatorial election in both 1841 and 1843. The American people could not possibly prefer such a political pygmy to the great Whig statesman.³⁷

Whigs rejoiced not only at Polk's personal weakness but also at the Democrats' deleterious divisions. Van Burenites were furious that their favorite had been dropped and that Texas had been taken up. When Tyler's treaty came to a vote in the Senate on June 8, eight Van Buren Democrats joined twenty-seven Whigs in rejecting it by a vote of 16 to 35. Similarly, on roll-call votes in the House concerning slavery and Texas, rebellious northern Democrats bolted the party, while the Whigs, in sharp contrast, were far more united in opposition to annexation than they had ever been on any previous votes involving slavery. If the Democrats attempted to make expansionism a central issue of the campaign, it seemed unlikely that they could ever pull the party together. Equally promising from the Whig perspective, the Tyler convention in Baltimore had nominated the president on a Texas platform even after the Democrats had selected Polk. His candidacy would divide annexationists and drain votes from the Democrats, while all the opponents of annexation might rally behind Clay.³⁸

By the end of the summer, however, the Whigs' confidence in these supposed advantages had evaporated. Polk ran far better in the South than Van Buren could have, and he also proved more attractive to anti-Van Buren elements among northern Democrats than the New Yorker. Nor could Polk be arraigned as an aristocratic dandy who had cold-heartedly luxuriated in the splendor of the White House while common folk were ground down by the depression.³⁹

Similarly, the Democratic wounds healed more quickly than Whigs anticipated. Polk's nomination dumbfounded many Democrats and embittered Van Buren's most loyal followers. Within weeks, however, Democratic politicos realized that a dark-horse candidate and the new issue of territorial expansion would allow them to patch up the damaging divisions that had rent the party before the convention. Polk himself shrewdly promoted party unity by promising not to seek a second term if elected and by assuring Van Buren and his closest lieutenants of his friendship and fidelity to their cherished economic dogmas. At the other end of the Democratic spectrum, Calhoun was so delighted by the derailing of Van Buren and the adoption of the Texas platform that he threw his influence behind the ticket. In South Carolina he quelled a movement to call a southern convention at Nashville that might demand secession were Texas not annexed. In other southern states his allies rejoiced over having a slaveholding advocate of annexation as their candidate.⁴⁰

To guarantee a full Democratic vote, moreover, the Democrats nominated gubernatorial candidates of exceptional popularity. David Tod in Ohio represented the hard-money wing that contained the vast majority of Democratic voters and was the wing most disappointed by Van Buren's defeat. Tod's candidacy ensured that Van Buren's friends in Ohio would exert themselves for the party cause. Similarly, George Bancroft seemed sure to strengthen whatever chances the Democrats had in the Whig bastion of Massachusetts, while even Whigs admitted that Democratic candidates like William O. Butler in Kentucky, Michael Hoke in North Carolina, and Henry Muhlenberg in Pennsylvania would arouse enormous enthusiasm among Democrats, no matter what they thought of the national ticket. 41

In terms of directly increasing Polk's chances of carrying a state, however, the most significant Democratic gubernatorial nomination was that of Van Buren's friend Silas Wright in New York. Because Wright was the most popular Democrat in the state, New York's Whigs warned, "He is the hardest man for us to beat. He gives them that which before they lacked—strength and union. With any other nomination our success was assured," but "now the field is studded with their seried legions—and their consuls and proconsuls and all their subordinate officers are at their head, disciplining & marshalling the banded forces."

Like the Whigs, the Democrats were convinced that if they could get out their full vote, they would win. While the Whigs viewed 1840 as the true measure of the two parties' relative strength and the subsequent congressional and gubernatorial elections as flukes, Democrats saw Harrison's triumph as the aberration and Democratic dominance of the midterm elections as proof that they were still the majority party. As Pennsylvania's James Buchanan wrote the Kentucky Whig Robert Letcher in July, "Pennsylvania is a Democratic state by a majority of at least 20,000 and there is no population more steady on the face of the earth. Under all the excitement of 1840 & Mr. Van Buren's want of popularity, we were beaten but 343, and ever since, we have carried our state by large majorities."

Democrats ensured their largest possible turnout by maneuvering Tyler out of the race. Tyler's terms for such a sacrifice were easy to meet. He wanted the virulent personal assaults upon him in the Democratic Washington Globe to cease; he wanted assurance that the Democrats who held office under him would not be disqualified in a Polk administration; and he demanded that Democrats ignore the anti-Texas Van Burenites and push for the immediate acquisition of Texas. As Robert Rantoul, the Democrat whom Tyler had appointed customs collector of Boston, wrote to another Massachusetts Democrat, "The Pres. is ready to go for Polk tooth & nail" if "Texas should be backed up strongly. This is true policy & no time is to be lost."

Anxious to secure the financial and organizational resources available to the federal officeholders Tyler had appointed, Democrats moved adroitly to satisfy Tyler's demands. Polk muzzled the Globe's editor, and other Democratic newspapers welcomed Tyler with open arms. Former President Jackson wrote letters implying that Tyler men would be considered as equals in any new dispensation of patronage. Northern Democrats began to boom immediate annexation, although their public enthusiasm for the project varied. Democratic orators and newspapers were most forthright in their advocacy of annexation in states Democrats had little chance of carrying, like Massachusetts and Connecticut; in states they appeared to have little chance of losing, like Illinois, Maine, and New Hampshire; and in states like Indiana, where the combination of Oregon with Texas in the Democratic platform made western expansion in general a viable issue. In states that appeared to be close or where the antislavery vote was strong, like Ohio, New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, in contrast, advocacy of annexation was as muted as it was infrequent.⁴⁵

Still, the Democratic courtship of Tyler proved successful. On August 20 he withdrew from the race and urged all annexationists to unite behind Polk. Tyler himself would later contend that this endorsement and the aid provided by his thousands of followers produced Polk's victory in November. While Tyler probably exaggerated his own impact, the alliance between the Democratic organization and federal patronage holders played an important role in Pennsylvania and New York, changing Whig calculations of what it would take to carry those states. Since Tyler's appointees had especially wooed immigrants to his now-defunct third party, that alliance also ensured Democratic control of the growing immigrant vote in northeastern cities, forcing a decisive revision of Whig strategy.

By themselves, however, these developments during the summer of 1844 did not undermine the chief source of Whigs' confidence growing out of Polk's nomination—their conviction that they would win because of the sharp differences between the parties on concrete issues. Polk had come out vehemently against the Whig tariff of 1842 and the distribution of land proceeds and for the Independent Treasury, with its hard-money, antibanking implications, during his unsuccessful gubernatorial campaigns of 1841 and 1843. To a party that hoped to etch the sharpest possible line separating Whigs from Democrats on these economic issues, Polk initially appeared to be an ideal opponent. The best strategy for the Whigs in Pennsylvania, Clay advised John M. Clayton, was to contrast Clay's well-known support for the protective tariff and distribution with Polk's equally well-known hostility to those measures. "If by such an exhibition of our respective views Pennsylvania remains unmoved, I know not what would operate upon her." Similarly, Greeley boasted in the Tribune that Whig victory was certain precisely because the issue differences between the parties were so clear. "

Not just Polk's position on economic issues but also his enthusiasm for annexation engendered Whig optimism. Whigs reckoned that they could hold their own on annexation in the South because of the salience of economic issues and use it to pummel the slaveholding Polk in the North. The clear differences between Clay and Polk on annexation would bring out northern Whigs who had abstained since 1840 and win back antislavery Whigs who had deserted to the Liberty party. Against Polk and the Democratic platform Whigs could make the case that the best way—indeed, the only way—to stop slavery expansion was to elect Henry Clay. With roll-call voting records in Congress and state legislatures to supplement Clay's Raleigh Letter as evidence of the party's anti-Texas credentials, Whigs exuberantly embraced hostility to immediate annexation as a partisan issue in the campaign.⁴⁷

Like the other advantages that seemed so apparent at the end of May, however, Whig hopes of winning because of the clear party differences on Texas and other issues diminished during the summer. Concurrent though somewhat different developments in the North and the South eroded their hopes so that, by the fall, Whigs would resort to a desperate tactical gamble in order to salvage the election. It was a gamble they would lose.

V

Like their northern colleagues, most southern Whigs believed that Polk's nomination in May ensured Clay's triumph in November, but their optimism is much more difficult to understand. To be sure, they too ridiculed Polk's pretensions to the presidency and praised the potency of Whig economic issues. Nevertheless, the Democrats had adopted a candidate and a platform committed to annexation, which had, since 1836, been interpreted as a distinctly prosouthern measure. Their own candidate, in contrast, was committed against immediate annexation, and therefore seemed to stand against the interests and needs of slavery. Northern Whigs might happily denounce annexation on antislavery grounds, but such a position meant political suicide in the South. How, then, could southern Whigs have been so sanguine?

Southern Whigs exuded confidence primarily because they found the case that Clay and other Whig politicians made against immediate annexation compelling. For one thing, they anticipated that loyal Whigs would automatically oppose anything Tyler or the Democrats wanted. Moreover, Whigs had long opposed territorial expansion on principle because it would make the country ungovernable and divert energy from necessary internal development. Dismissing Democratic cries about a British abolitionist plot in Texas, Whigs contended instead that annexation would threaten the honor, safety, fiscal stability, and very existence of the nation. Because Texas claimed large areas that clearly belonged to Mexico, Whigs castigated acquisition as an immoral and perfidious rape of Mexican soil to satisfy the greed of land-hungry Americans in general and of speculators in Texas lands and Texas bonds in particular. Tyler was mistaken, Alexander Stephens informed his Georgia constituents in May, in believing "that the people of this country are as much lost to all sense of national honor as he is of personal."

Worse still, Mexico had never recognized the independence of Texas and had threatened to declare war on the United States should it attempt annexation. "Annexation and war with Mexico are identical," proclaimed Clay in his Raleigh Letter, and such a war would be neither painless nor honorable, especially since

European powers like England might come to Mexico's aid. Throughout the presidential campaign, Whig speakers warned mothers that within months of a Polk victory, their sons would be fighting and dying in some godforsaken part of Texas or Mexico. To enlist the sympathies of women who could influence how their husbands, brothers, and fathers voted, indeed, Whigs enthusiastically welcomed them at partisan rallies during 1844, just as they had in 1840.⁵⁰

Nor, Whig orators proclaimed, would the fruits of such a war be worth the human and financial cost. The United States, still unable to pay off its own debt, would have to assume a Texas debt of $13 million, according to the terms of Tyler's treaty. Worse, annexation would, in Clay's words, "menace the existence, if not certainly sow the seeds of dissolution of the Union." Clay summarized the Whig indictment of immediate annexation in a single sentence at the end of his Raleigh Letter. "I consider the annexation of Texas, at this time, without the assent of Mexico, as a measure compromising the national character, involving us certainly in war with Mexico, probably with foreign powers, dangerous to the integrity of the Union, inexpedient in the present financial condition of the country, and not called for by any general expression of public opinion."

Clay initially exuded confidence that he could oppose immediate annexation even in the South. During his triumphant tour from New Orleans through Alabama, Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, and Virginia in March and April, he assured nervous Whig senators, he had found "a degree of indifference or opposition to the measure of annexation that quite surprised me." Urging Crittenden to arrange for the publication of his Raleigh Letter on April 19, he announced, "I entertain no fears from the promulgation of my opinion. Public sentiment is every where sounder than at Washington." Again, on May 6, he boasted to New York's Thurlow Weed, "I am firmly convinced that my opinion on the Texas question will do me no prejudice at the South."

At least until Polk's nomination and even after it, many, if not most, southern Whigs agreed with Clay's assessment. When Democrats in the Mississippi legislature pressed resolutions endorsing annexation in February 1844, Whig papers scorned the project as "supremely ridiculous," and almost two-thirds of the Whig legislators voted against those resolutions. In March 1844 the New Orleans Bee, the most influential Whig paper in the Southwest, admitted that annexation would benefit the nation but rejected it as dangerous and unconstitutional. After the Raleigh Letter's publication, so savvy a political operator as Alexander Stephens pronounced annexation "a humbug" that could have no effect in Georgia, while a North Carolinian assured his congressman that "No. Ca. will not be affected by that measure. . . . Mr. Clay has not nor will he lose a friend on account of his Texas opinion." 52

Not all southern Whigs, to be sure, were so sanguine even before Polk's nomination. In April, Tennessee's Whig Senator Ephraim H. Foster warned that the Democratic clamor for Texas could hurt in the South and West, and others admitted that "nothing can defeat us but the Texas question." Despite such qualms, when southern Whigs like Foster met the Democrats on the issue, they almost uniformly adopted Clay's position of opposition to immediate annexation. Across the South the Whig press praised the Raleigh Letter as "bold and statesmanlike," southern Whig delegates to the national convention enthusiastically nominated Clay after he had come out against annexation, Southerners made every Whig speech against Tyler's treaty in the Senate, all southern Whig senators except Henderson of Mississippi voted to reject that treaty after the Democrats had endorsed immediate annexation, and southern Whigs in the House joined their northern colleagues in voting against it. Henry Clay, in sum, was far from being the only southern Whig politician who confidently believed the Whigs could carry southern states even though they opposed a measure that Democrats and subsequent historians labeled prosouthern.⁵⁴

Resolutely opposing annexation in Congress was one thing for southern Whigs; defending that position on the hustings was another. The Whigs' initial optimism began to melt before the fierce heat of the pro-Texas campaign Democrats mounted in the summer. Southern Democrats, an Alabama Whig lamented, rode the Texas issue "with both whip and spur." Equating opposition to immediate annexation with abolitionism, Democrats castigated Clay and the Whig party as traitors to the South. Democratic papers screamed that the antislavery attack on annexation by northern Whigs exposed "THE COALITION BETWEEN THE CLAY PARTY, AND THE ABOLITIONISTS OF THE NORTH AND THE NORTHWEST." Belittling the threat of war and the dangers to the Union that might result from acquisition, they stressed instead the menace to slavery and the permanent loss of limitless acres of cheap land if Texas were not annexed without delay. 55

Thrown unexpectedly on the defensive, southern Whigs scrambled to blunt the ferocious Democratic attack. Some tried unsuccessfully to divert debate from Texas to economic issues. A mass Whig rally held in Memphis in June ignored Texas in its resolutions. A meeting in Lexington, Kentucky, in early July complained plaintively that designing politicians used annexation to shift public attention from "far more important questions which should alone decide" the presidential contest. Others endeavored to cast off the fatal stigma of abolitionism and to prove the Whigs' fidelity to the South. The slaveholder Clay, they protested, had always denounced abolitionists and would never betray his homeland. Hostility to slavery had nothing whatsoever to do with their antagonism toward annexation. Some Whigs went so far as to argue, indeed, that annexation would weaken rather than strengthen slavery. Slaves and slaveholders would be attracted to Texas, thereby causing land prices in older regions to plummet as the population declined while simultaneously exposing older areas to ruinous competition from the huge crops that could be grown on its rich soils. That competition would force other slaveholders to migrate themselves or to sell their slaves to Texans. Either way, slavery would be jeopardized.⁵⁶

Such arguments exposed the greatest threat that the Texas annexation issue posed for southern Whigs. It was not so much the hypothetical abolitionist conspiracy against slavery that made Texas a compelling issue in the South. It was the prospect of abundant, cheap, and fertile land, especially to nonslaveholders. In his journey during March and April from New Orleans to Mobile, Montgomery, Savannah, Charleston, Raleigh, and the Virginia tidewater, Clay had met the wrong Southerners. He visited some of the wealthiest areas of the South, where Whig planters and merchants had long deplored the penchant for migration to new lands that characterized their fellow Southerners. Many Whigs in such areas considered it perfectly feasible to oppose annexation, for they had no interest themselves in moving to Texas and were far more interested in the programs of national economic development propounded by Whigs. The same apathy prevailed in certain border areas whose economic activities resembled those in the North more than those in the South. In September, for example, a Whig in Wheeling, Virginia, declared confidently, "We go against Texas, now, always, and in any way."⁵⁷

Such implacable resistance to annexation seemed suicidal to other southern Whigs. The vast majority of the southern white population and much of the Whig constituency consisted of small slaveholders and nonslaveholders who aspired to slaveholding status. Unlike the large planters who resided in the most demographically stable areas of the South, those groups had long identified upward economic mobility with their freedom to move west and buy fresh lands. They could indeed be excited by Democratic warnings that it was now or never for Texas and that on the issue of annexation, the future of the South was at stake. The last thing Whig campaigners among those groups wanted was to have their party labeled the enemy of such southern expansion. Hence, when Tennessee Whig Senator Spencer Jarnagin proposed at the end of the congressional session in June to publish his blistering speech against Tyler's treaty as a campaign document, "the Whig members from Tennessee in a body" threatened that if he did so, they would "denounce him from one end of the State to the other." Similarly, a Virginian worried in July "that heedless & rash men of our party, because the democrats go for immediate annexation will run to the opposite extreme, & go against it at all times.... And when the Whigs occupy that ground in Va., the scepter will depart from Judea."58

Within weeks, if not days, of Polk's nomination, therefore, many southern Whigs retreated from the adamant hostility to annexation that southern Democrats and northern Whigs read into Clay's Raleigh Letter and resorted to a more defensible position. Nowhere in that letter, they pointed out, had Clay taken an irreversible stand against annexation. Rather, he stressed only that it was dishonorable and inexpedient "at this time" because the prior consent of Mexico had not been secured and because northern opinion was so strongly against it. Once Mexican assent had been negotiated and sectional harmony restored by a Whig administration, they hinted, Texas could and would be safely acquired. The only difference between Democrats and Whigs, therefore, was that Democrats insisted on annexation immediately, when it was dangerous, while Whigs would achieve it in the near future, when it was safe. As a Georgian advised Senator Berrien on Iune 3, the Democratic demand for immediate annexation, regardless of the consequences, has "failed here of its objects. Direct opposition to ultimate annexation would perhaps be as unwise as at present unnecessary. Taking as the party ground the position in favor of that measure when the country requires it, and when it can properly be effected, we have thought the safest ground, on which to meet the usual feeling of our people for the acquisition of lands." The Georgia Whig platform endorsed that position in June, Virginia's Rives echoed it in a Senate speech in June that was widely circulated and praised in the South, and southern Whig papers increasingly employed the argument as the campaign progressed.⁵⁹

By seeking to put a southern spin on Clay's Raleigh Letter, southern Whigs followed their traditional strategy. Northern and southern Whigs had long taken a two-faced approach to questions involving slavery. That tactic, espousing one position in the North and another in the South, was possible only if the campaign waged by Whigs in one section did not embarrass Whigs in the other. Had the shift of southern Whigs been confined to newspapers and local Whig campaigners, it might have worked in 1844, as it had in 1836 and 1840. Clay himself, however, apparently felt compelled to shift his position in line with that taken by other southern Whigs. Saving his prospects in the South may have compelled that shift, but he thereby jeopardized the ability of northern and southern Whigs to interpret his position differently.

On July 1, Clay wrote a letter to the obscure Tuscaloosa, Alabama, Independent Monitor in which he insisted that his objection to immediate annexation was hardly meant to please northern abolitionists, whom he had long denounced. Instead, he stressed, he was primarily concerned with preserving the Union. While it angered a few abolitionists, this first Alabama letter by itself would probably have done little harm to the northern Whig campaign. Potentially much more damaging was a second letter Clay wrote on July 27 to another Alabama newspaper. This time he asserted that he had no personal objection to annexation and that the existence of slavery in Texas had nothing to do with its propriety. Should the danger of sectional disruption and war he had alluded to in his Raleigh Letter be removed, he indicated, he might consider annexation himself if elected president. At the same time that northern Whigs insisted that annexation must be stopped precisely because of the legality of slavery in Texas, in other words, Clay deliberately minimized the importance of slavery to the matter and promised, as did other southern Whigs, that he himself would "be glad to see it, without dishonor, without war, and with the common consent of the Union, and upon fair and just terms."60

Clay's decision to publish the Alabama letters ranks among the biggest mistakes of his long political career. Eventually they would help force a ruinous shift in Whig strategy in the North while they little helped the Whig cause in the South, where Democrats jeered at his vacillation. Precisely why he chose to write them in July—especially the critical second letter—is unclear. Later, Clay would say that he had to write the letters in order to hold southern states in the Whig column, and some historians, blessed with the hindsight knowledge of the closeness of the results, agree that without the letters Clay would have lost additional southern states.⁶¹

To many Whigs, however, the situation in June and July did not appear so dire as to require the letters. One able student of the election has suggested that Clay wrote them because he was worried about the enthusiasm for Texas in Kentucky, but Crittenden, Clay's closest lieutenant in the state, wrote privately on July 1 that Texas "has passed away as a humbug" in Kentucky. Clay did receive in late June a letter dated June 20 from Stephen Miller, the Alabama editor to whom he had sent the first letter, warning him that Alabama Democrats were pushing Texas "with great assiduity," but on June 24 Clay assured a northern correspondent that signs were good everywhere and that he expected to poll a larger vote than Harrison had in 1840. In the first Alabama letter, in fact, Clay himself expressed the conviction that the Texas question could not hurt the Whigs in Kentucky or Alabama and that it "was a bubble blown up by Mr. Tyler in the most exceptional manner, for sinister purposes, and its bursting has injured no body but Mr. Van Buren."

More to the point, in July before the second letter was written and in early August before it could have been circulated, Whigs across the South expressed confidence that they had blunted the Democratic drive on Texas simply with their own reinterpretation of the Raleigh Letter. There is, in short, abundant evidence, to which Clay must have been privy, that southern Whigs did not believe they needed another statement from Clay himself in late Iuly. Only Iuly 10, for example, Virginia's former governor, David Campbell, assured Rives, "The democratic party will not be able to make anything out of the Texas question." Rives wrote Clay on July 15 that while the majority of Virginia Whigs favored eventual annexation, they were willing to wait until it could be safely accomplished by a Whig administration. Similarly, Whig campaigners in Tennessee boasted in late Iuly and early August that because Texas had failed to dent their ranks, "surely we cannot lose this state." An Alabama Whig reported on August 5 (without mentioning either Clay letter) that while many Whigs in his state wanted annexation, they would never accept it "on the principle of the late shameful treaty." "Some of our Whigs were alarmed when Texas first became the rallying cry of the democratic party," he reported, "but the thing is dead." Even from the remote Democratic stronghold of Arkansas, Whigs crowed that the "Texas humbug" had proved "abortive."63

Southern Whigs pounced on the results of elections held during July and August as evidence that they could withstand the Democratic challenge on Texas. On the first Monday in July, Louisiana's Whigs captured the state legislature and one of the two congressional seats they contested. Whigs everywhere were ecstatic because no state in the nation was thought to be more avid for Texas than Louisiana. "If the Texas question has failed in Louisiana where will it not fail?" queried a joyful Georgia Whig, while another reported to the New York Tribune that "the news of the Election in Louisiana operates like a dose of jalap upon the poor Locos, whose disappointment and chagrin are pitiable in the extreme." Whigs also pointed to their victory in North Carolina's gubernatorial and legislative elections in the first week of August, after Clay had written the second letter but before it could have been circulated outside of Alabama, as evidence of certain Whig success in November because, they claimed, Democrats had tried to make Texas the central issue in the campaign. Others interpreted the impressive Whig gains in the Missouri and Kentucky legislative elections in early August as signs of an upward Whig trend reminiscent of the one in the summer of 1840 that had culminated in Harrison's triumph. Clay himself reported on August 7, before his second letter could possibly have had any widespread impact, that the Texas issue would do the Whig cause "no prejudice" in the South, where he still expected to carry two-thirds of the states.64

In contrast, by the fall, when Whigs and Democrats were for the first time debating the Alabama letters, Whig confidence was clearly eroding. Alabama and Arkansas Whigs might prate about neutralizing the Texas issue, but no one expected Clay to carry those Democratic fiefdoms any more than he could South Carolina or Mississippi. Even so sanguine a forecaster as Horace Greeley, moreover, refused to place Missouri in the Clay column for November because he properly recognized that Whig gains there were attributable to cooperation with dissident Democrats who wanted to prevent the reelection of Thomas Hart Benton to the Senate. Clay could never get such Democratic support.⁶⁵

Even the elections Whigs had won in the summer bore portents of a Democratic surge that might doom them in November, portents that the veteran Clay probably saw. The Whigs dramatically increased their representation in the Kentucky and North Carolina legislatures, but in each state the Democrats had garnered unprecedentedly large proportions of the gubernatorial vote. With some justice Whigs attributed those gains to local questions and to the undeniable popularity of the Democratic candidates, but there was no gainsaying cold facts: since the presidential election of 1840, the Democrats had increased their popular vote by 17 percent in North Carolina and by an astounding 69 percent in Kentucky, while the Whig vote had remained virtually stagnant.⁶⁶

If the Democrats could gain voters at anything like those rates in Louisiana, Virginia, Tennessee, and Georgia, where the parties were much more closely balanced than in Kentucky or North Carolina and where the Democrats were moving heaven and earth on the Texas issue, Whigs realized, they were in deep trouble. Although many Whigs had initially exulted about the Louisiana results, the hard truth was that their margin in the legislature had declined from what it had been in 1842, while they captured only one of four congressional seats. A low turnout in July made realistic predictions about what would happen in November impossible, but perceptive Whigs knew that Louisiana was too close to call.⁶⁷

Nor, by the fall, did prospects seem more auspicious elsewhere in the South. Virginia's Whigs, for example, continued to predict Clay's victory nationally, but more and more often they despaired of carrying the Old Dominion and its seventeen electoral votes for him. The Whigs' loss of confidence in Tennessee is well reflected in the letters that passed between the Whig elector Gustavus A. Henry and his wife, who, like so many women with Whig husbands, was ferociously partisan. While the sanguine Gustavus boasted in July that the state was safe, his wife was frantic about the real possibility of defeat by September. Urging her peripatetic husband to "work harder than you have ever done," she cried in alarm, "It makes my blood boil to think of James K. Polk being president. Surely the people of these United States have not lost all sense of honour." Though less worried about the outcome, a prominent Maryland Whig was equally perplexed by the apparent surge in Democratic strength. "Who would have thought," John Pendleton Kennedy asked in October, "that this miserable nomination of Polk & Dallas was to give us such trouble?"

Even Clay began to despair by the fall. In September he worriedly wrote Mangum that the close result in North Carolina in August boded ill. "Our opponents are manifestly making great exertions everywhere, and affect if they do not feel great confidence." Although his Alabama letters had neither caused the earlier Whig optimism nor stemmed the apparent Democratic surge by the fall, he feared the appearance of any new charge that could tip the South against him. "Their whole system now seems to be directed to the propagation of the most detestable libels and lies," he warned Mangum. Thus, when his distant cousin, the Kentucky abolitionist Cassius M. Clay, circulated a letter in the North calling on antislavery men to vote for Clay because he sympathized with the abolitionist movement, the beleaguered Whig candidate felt compelled to refute the allegation. On September 2 he published a letter in the Lexington, Kentucky, Observer adamantly denying the antislavery sentiments attributed to him and condemning as unconstitutional any congressional interference with slavery in both the states and the District of Columbia. He realized that such a letter would antagonize northern abolitionists, he later admitted to the angry Giddings, but he had been forced to issue it. Efforts to appease the Liberty party in the North were "vain and fruitless," while failure to repudiate his cousin's claims could have cost him as many as four slave states. Just as he had done in July, that is, Clay quite consciously risked offending potential supporters in the North in order to salvage the Whig campaign in the South.⁶⁹

Word of Clay's efforts to propitiate Southerners reached the North at the beginning of September. The nationally circulated Niles' Register reprinted the second Alabama letter on August 31. Soon thereafter Clay's September 2 letter, disavowing antislavery sentiments, appeared. The news could not have come at a worse time for northern Whigs. Since May the foundations of their confidence had crumbled one by one. To appreciate the full impact of Clay's letters on northern Whigs, therefore, one must understand what had already happened to them over the summer.

Initially northern Whigs had rejoiced after the Democratic national convention. Instead of running Clay, the Kentucky slaveholder, against Van Buren, the New York nonslaveholder, with all its disadvantages, they now ran against a Tennessee slaveholder who espoused a prosouthern annexation program. The Democratic strategy, fulminated Greeley in the Tribune, aimed to satisfy "the ultra Slavery prejudices of the South—the new fanatics enlisted by Calhoun & Co. for a crusade to extend and consolidate Human Bondage." The Philadelphia North American proclaimed that the choice for voters was now "Texas and No Tariff, or Tariff and No Texas." In a widely circulated pamphlet, Ohio's Whig state committee called the central question "Polk, Texas, and Slavery; or Clay, the Union, and Liberty." Michigan's Whig state convention added that Polk's agenda had the "avowed purpose of extending and perpetuating the institution of slavery." Because of Polk's commitment to Texas, exulted an Indiana Whig in June, "locofocoism is doomed to bite the dust in November."

Northern Whigs also believed that they had a decisive edge over the Democrats on traditional issues like the tariff, distribution, and the Independent Treasury and with the superior qualifications of their candidate. Seward wrote Weed on June 20 that because of the tariff and Texas issues "we are safe and right," and as late as September 11, he iterated to another correspondent that "the election is to be won or lost on the grounds exclusively" of "Tariff and No Texas." Similarly, Justin Morrill, the chairman of a Whig county committee in Vermont, taunted his Democratic counterpart in August for fearing to debate on "Texas, Public Lands, Tariff, and the Men." On these issues, he insisted, the "'Democratic' and Whig parties are most emphatically at variance," and "we cannot smother these great National Topics, if we would."

The Democrats, however, proved to be remarkably successful in obfuscating the issue differences that Whigs hoped to clarify. Their ability to neutralize what Whigs saw as their advantage on economic issues frustrated and enraged the Whigs. On no issue, indeed, did the Democrats prove more evasive than on the one on which Whigs had placed their hopes in the spring—the tariff. Almost as soon as Polk received the Democratic nomination, Pennsylvania Democrats pleaded with him to modify his opposition to a protective tariff. For two years they had trumpeted their important role in securing the Tariff of 1842, and in the spring of 1844 the Democratically controlled Pennsylvania legislature unanimously protested any attempts to lower the tariff rates. Polk, realizing that his past opposition to protective tariffs could doom Democrats in the Northeast, penned a letter to a Philadelphia Democrat named John K. Kane in which he artfully shrouded his tariff stance in ambiguity. Admitting that he had always opposed tariffs aimed explicitly to protect manufactured products rather than raise revenue, he said that he favored revenue tariffs with moderate discriminating duties that "afford reasonable incidental protection to our home industry." Meanwhile, the duplicitous Polk privately assured Southerners that one of the first acts of his administration would be to lower duties to the 20 percent ad valorem level designated in the tariff of 1833. Had Polk honestly wrote that to northern Democrats, the outcome of the election and the subsequent course of American history might have been very different.

Certainly the use to which Democrats put the Kane Letter was anything but forthright. While southern Democrats candidly contrasted Polk's hostility to the protective tariff of 1842 with Clay's defense of it, in Pennsylvania and other northern states Democrats boldly declared that Polk was a firmer friend of that tariff then Clay. "POLK, DALLAS, SHUNK and the DEMOCRATIC TARIFF OF 1842" proclaimed Democratic banners throughout Pennsylvania. "WE DARE THE WHIGS TO REPEAL IT."

Furious, frustrated, and alarmed, Whigs protested the effrontery of these Democratic tactics. From June until the end of the campaign, Greeley's Tribune raged against Democrats' fraudulence on the tariff and pleaded with the voters of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, and other northern states not to be bamboozled by it. "In Pennsylvania our opponents have" outdone themselves "in the art of lying and meanness," complained a Whig reporter in August. Aware that Democrats in the South were promoting Polk as a free trader, a Philadelphia Whig sputtered indignantly, "They go for Free Trade where it is popular, and the Tariff where it is popular, . . . solely to deceive the People." Desperately northern Whigs begged evidence from Tennessee with which to expose this hoax, but by the fall they knew that their biggest gun in Pennsylvania had been spiked."

Elsewhere the Democrats were not so brazen. In certain northern states like Maine and New Hampshire, as in the South, they minced no words in their condemnation of all parts of the Whig economic program because they were as confident as the Whigs that they could benefit from such contrasts. While they defended the standard Democratic opposition to the tariff, paper currency, and distribution in Illinois and Michigan, however, they flagrantly insisted that Democrats and Polk wanted federal rivers and harbors improvements just as fervently as Clay and the Whigs did. So too in New Jersey, where the tariff of 1842 was as popular as it was in Pennsylvania, they argued that because Clay and Polk both favored the tariff, a new national bank was the central economic question.⁷⁵

Still, the major Democratic tactic to neutralize any Whig advantage on economic issues, in most of the Midwest as in the South, was to emphasize western expansion in general and Texas annexation in particular. In Michigan, Illinois, and Indiana, Democrats trumpeted the glory of additional land, urged Americans to take possession of Oregon as well as Texas, and stressed the anti-British implications of both Oregon and Texas, thus playing upon the Anglophobia of their constituents, especially Irish and Canadian immigrants.

This tack started an electoral steamroller. In Illinois' August state legislative elections Democrats crushed the Whigs, and Whig strategists knew they had no hope of gaining the state's nine electoral votes in November. That same month, Whigs recaptured control of the lower house of the Indiana legislature and drew even in the state senate, but the Democrats seemed to have the edge in the popular vote. Opposition to Texas annexation had not given Indiana's Whigs the advantage they had counted on. Nor had it persuaded Liberty party voters to return to Whig ranks. Few Whigs, moreover, expected to win Michigan, for the Democrats had carried it decisively since 1840. If Polk captured all three together with New Hampshire, whose loyalty to the Democratic party seemed unshakable, his electoral vote would more than match what the Whigs could count on from their four New England strongholds.⁷⁶

That likelihood left Maine, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio as the decisive states in the North, but by September the Whigs had begun to doubt the potency of their No Texas platform in any of them. In both New Jersey and Pennsylvania, where economic issues remained most salient, Democrats were neutralizing the Whigs' protariff platform. Whig strength had declined so much in Maine since 1840 that it seemed unlikely that even the addition of the Liberty vote could put it in the Whig column.

Finally, the Whigs' effort to lure Liberty voters by opposing Texas' annexation in both Ohio and New York seemed stalemated. Democrats muddied the difference between the parties on that issue as well. In Ohio, Democrats ducked the Texas question whenever possible, and if they discussed it at all, they clung to Van Buren's ambiguous position, not to Polk's forthright advocacy of immediate annexation. In New York, Democratic dissembling on Texas frustrated Whig hopes of drawing clear party lines on Texas or No Texas. The long state Democrat address that happily announced the clarity of differences between the parties remained absolutely silent on the Texas issue, as did many campaigners, while a leading Democratic newspaper, the New York Evening Post, continued to denounce annexation throughout the campaign. Whigs' difficulty in pinning down where the Democrats stood on annexation was compounded by the Democratic nomination of Silas Wright for governor in early September, for Wright had been a leading figure among the Van Buren Democrats who had fought Tyler's treaty in the Senate. After his nomination, instead of presenting a ringing demand for immediate annexation regardless of the consequences, Wright spoke only vaguely of the peaceful and honorable acquisition of Texas and Oregon within a few years, a position paralleling that taken by southern Whigs.⁷⁷

While Democrats fudged on Texas in New York and Ohio, they brilliantly campaigned to alienate the most advanced antislavery men from Henry Clay and to keep them firmly in the Liberty party. Just as Whigs sought to unite all opponents of Texas annexation behind Clay, Democrats aspired to keep antiannexationists divided. Aware of the moralistic attitudes of the deeply religious evangelical Protestants who supported the Liberty party, Democrats dragged up every charge they could to smear Clay's personal reputation. With telling effect, they lacerated the Kentuckian as a blasphemer, duelist, gambler, profligate, drunkard, and philanderer. As one prominent abolitionist wrote Giddings long after the election, abolitionists never considered "for a moment" voting for Clay. "Why did not the Whigs set up a man of good character? As it was, if Mr. Clay's character had been as good as Mr. Polk's, he would have been elected."

Primarily, however, Democrats attacked the untrustworthiness of the slave-holding Clay on the annexation issue in order to discredit him with the abolitionists. Hence, when Clay's letters on Texas and abolitionism were published in the North in September, both Whig and Democratic politicos immediately recognized their import. Whigs mourned. Democrats celebrated. "Mr. Clay's letter has caused much discussion & some consternation among his friends, & great exultation among his enemies," Webster wrote from New York on September 1 after conferring with Weed and Greeley. "Mr. Weed is quite despairing." Weed indeed was despairing. "Things look blue!" he moaned to Francis Granger on September 3. "Ugly letter, that to Alabama. Can't stand many such." From western New York Seward warned on September 2 that the Alabama letter "jeopard[ize]s, perhaps loses this State."

The results of the Vermont and Maine elections increased Whigs' fears that Clay's vacillation would alienate Liberty party voters and, indeed, drive still more antislavery Whigs to the Liberty camp. The Whigs carried the gubernatorial election in Vermont on September 3 with their largest percentage of the vote since 1840, but, ominously, the Liberty party attracted more voters and a larger proportion of the vote than ever before. The Whig gubernatorial candidate, former Congressman William Slade, a renowned foe of the gag rule and Texas annexation, had been placed on the ticket explicitly to win back antislavery voters. If Slade could not reverse the growth of the Liberty party, how could Clay? The results in Maine on September 9 were even worse. While the Whigs almost doubled their vote since 1843, they still garnered only 42 percent of the total, while the Liberty party siphoned off 7 percent. Realistic Whigs correctly concluded that Maine's nine electoral votes were lost.⁸⁰

The results in Vermont and Maine intensified Whig anxiety about additional defections of antislavery Whigs to the Liberty party in other, more closely balanced states where Whigs might need every vote to win. Clay "is as rotten as a stagnant fish pond, on the subject of Slavery & always has been," exCongressman Seth Gates of New York cursed as he deserted the Whigs. Clay's last letter "has produced a bad effect upon . . . the Abolitionists," moaned one New York Whig in early October, and "the Abolition vote will decide the election."

Clay tried to stem further such defections by publishing a final public letter on the Texas question, dated September 23, in the Washington National Intelligencer. In it he insisted that all his letters over the summer were perfectly consistent with the original Raleigh Letter and that he had not retreated an inch from his firm opposition to immediate annexation. "Nothing was further from my purpose than to intimate any change of opinion as long as any considerable portion of the confederacy [i.e., the North] should continue to stand out in opposition to the annexation of Texas." That letter apparently allayed antislavery Whigs' suspicions of Clay. On October 5, the very day Clay's final letter was reprinted in Niles' Register, Washington Hunt assured Millard Fillmore, the Whig gubernatorial candidate in New York, that the state was safe for the Whigs. "I rejoice

Even more important in stanching the flow of northern Whig voters to the Liberty party, their suspicions of James G. Birney, antislavery men's presidential nominee, increased just when their suspicions about Clay began to decline. Word reached the East in October that Birney had denounced Whig economic programs, that he preferred the election of Polk to that of Clay, and that he had accepted a Democratic nomination for the Michigan legislature. To embellish these damaging revelations. Ohio's Whigs circulated a fictitious statement, falsely attributed to Birney, that he had always been a Democrat and that he believed that he was doing the Democratic cause more good by running as an abolitionist than he could by openly supporting Polk. Largely because of these sensational charges, the same New York Whig who predicted on October 2 that the Birney vote could throw New York to Polk wrote on October 30 that two-thirds of the Liberty men would vote for Clay and thus that he would carry the state. Even more reassuring than such predictions, the Whigs eked out a narrow victory in the Ohio gubernatorial election in October despite a significant jump in the Liberty vote, a victory that, according to Ohio's Whigs, guaranteed the Buckeye State for Clay.83

By the end of October, in sum, many Whigs had regained confidence that they could hold their own voters in the North, and some still hoped to woo back Liberty men. In September, however, New York and Pennsylvania still seemed in particular jeopardy. Not only had the tariff issue had been neutralized in Pennsylvania, but on September 2 Pennsylvania's Democrats nominated the popular Francis Shunk for governor to replace their previous candidate, Henry Muhlenberg, who had died, and worried Whigs admitted that Shunk seemed unbeatable. On September 8, New York's Democrats nominated Silas Wright for governor, thus ensuring a full Democratic turnout in the nation's largest state, while simultaneously many former Conservative Democrats, who had supported Harrison in 1840, were threatening to sit out the race because Nathaniel Tallmadge had been denied the Whigs' vice presidential nomination.⁸⁴

Worse, in both Pennsylvania and New York, the Polk/Tyler merger might assure the Democrats of a large immigrant vote. That surge of immigrants toward the Democrats had to be offset. Otherwise, the Whigs would lose Pennsylvania and New York and with them the presidency. In September and October, therefore, the Whigs reached out in desperation to the most determined enemies of the rapidly growing immigrant population—nativists and rabidly anti-Catholic Protestants.

In some ways this shift in strategy seems natural, if not inevitable. Ethnic and religious rivalries had influenced American politics since the colonial period, and they had helped to shape the allegiances of some Whig and Democratic voters since the birth of the second party system. The Whigs not only won the support of many native-born evangelical Protestants who often despised Catholics and immigrants; they also consciously portrayed themselves as the party of moral probity, as an organization of church-going, sober, and respectable citizens, while contemptuously stigmatizing the Democrats as godless and immoral. Reinforcing that purported difference was one reason Whig strategists welcomed the attendance of women at their rallies in 1840 and 1844. That Whig image, in turn, caused many immigrants, especially Catholic foreigners, as well as nonevangelical Protestants and the unchurched, who resented the moral imperialism of Whigs, to support the Democrats.

Such ethnocultural tensions had unusual salience in 1844. Democratic demands for Texas and Oregon were presented in ways that stoked the Anglophobia of Irish and Canadian immigrants. At the same time, local federal officeholders in cities were mobilizing immigrants, first for Tyler and then for Polk.85 Far more critical in alienating potential immigrant and especially Catholic voters from the Whigs, however, was the identity of the man whom the Whigs had chosen as Clay's running mate in May—Theodore Frelinghuysen, a former United States senator from New Jersey and the current chancellor of New York University. If Henry Clay was widely viewed as the embodiment of Whig principles, Frelinghuysen personified the reform impulse of American Protestantism. The son of a famous Presbyterian minister, he was renowned for his prominent participation in the American Tract Society, the American Sunday School Union, the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, and the American Temperance Union. The organizations with which Frelinghuysen was associated, moreover, attracted not only zealous Protestant do-gooders, but also fanatical anti-Catholic bigots. At a meeting of the American Missionary Society in 1844, for example, two Protestant clergymen denounced the Roman Catholic Church as "the Whore of Babylon" and "the Lady in Scarlet." Frelinghuysen thus suffered guilt by association with men far more prejudiced than he. Several years after the election, indeed, at least one Whig charged that Bishop John Hughes of New York ordered Catholics to vote against the Whig ticket because Frelinghuysen had refused to admonish the offensive ministers publicly.86

Perhaps more than any other politician of the day, in short, Frelinghuysen could arouse suspicions among Catholics and immigrants about what the Whig party stood for. Consequently, Democrats were quick to sound the alarm. A Democratic paper in New Orleans, for example, savaged Frelinghuysen as a self-righteous bigot "who boldly attacks religious liberty, demands the unhallowed union of church and state, and contends that the government should legally recognize the religion of the majority."⁸⁷

Precisely why the Whigs nominated Frelinghuysen for vice president is a mystery. Later, some insiders claimed that the convention hoped to facilitate a merger between the Whigs and independent nativist political parties. But in the spring of 1844, the Whigs in general and certainly Clay in particular had no intention of courting the nativists by openly attacking Catholics and immigrants. They had far too much confidence in their traditional issues.

A more plausible guess is that Whigs chose Frelinghuysen to offset Clay's supposed weakness on the "character" issue. Even before the Whig convention assembled, Democrats were flaying Clay as a drunkard, gambler, profligate, and blasphemer. As one Ohio Democrat asserted, "Clay's duelling is a bitter pill and many of the moral and reflecting portion of the Whig party refuse to support him." Certainly the Whigs trumpeted Frelinghuysen in a way to assuage those suspicions of Clay among "the moral and reflecting portion" of their party. The national platform of 1844 praised him for giving "his head, his hand, and his heart... without stint to the cause of morals, education, philanthropy, and religion," while a Whig magazine identified him as "the Christian statesman" who sought to defend the Indians and the sanctity of the Sabbath during his service in the Senate. Later, in fact, Democrats jokingly referred to the supposedly incongruous pair on the Whig ticket as "The Bane and the Antidote."

Yet even this theory implies more premeditation than the existing record sustains. Although the Whigs had every reason to choose their nominee carefully in light of Tyler's betrayal, few Whig leaders seriously considered the matter prior to the convention. Clay shortsightedly left the selection to the delegates and later expressed astonishment at Frelinghuysen's nomination. Southern Whigs favored Delaware's Clayton, but they knew that a free-state man must balance Clay. New Jersey's Whigs nominated Frelinghuysen, but his name rarely figured in preconvention speculation. Instead, men from states with more electoral votes than tiny New Jersey were most frequently mentioned: Maine's Senator George Evans; former Governor John Davis of Massachusetts, who had powerful backing from Webster's rival, Abbott Lawrence; the wealthy Lawrence himself, whom the influential Mangum favored; ex-Congressman Millard Fillmore of New York; Senator Nathaniel Tallmadge, the darling of New York's Conservative Democrats; Supreme Court Justice John McLean of Ohio; and a bevy of Pennsylvania congressmen and ex-congressmen, most prominently Philadelphia's John Sergeant.⁸⁹

Yet each of the most frequently mentioned possible candidates had drawbacks that prevented any preconvention consensus from emerging. Regarded as Webster's man, Evans was tarred by Webster's stubborn loyalty to Tyler. Lawrence and Davis faced opposition from Webster, and resolutions from the Massachusetts legislature in early 1844 calling for elimination of the Constitution's three-fifths clause discredited any Bay State man among Southerners. Southern Whigs also distrusted McLean, whom many Ohio Whig leaders also opposed. None of the Pennsylvanians was deemed popular enough to swing the Keystone State to Clay or capable enough to assume the presidency, an eventuality snake-bitten Whigs had to consider. Regular Whigs both in and outside New York rejected the convert Tallmadge because of their experience with Tyler. Fillmore, who badly wanted the nomination, had the state party's official support. Yet Southerners feared that his popularity among New York abolitionists would sink the ticket in the South. Equally important, Weed, hoping to run Fillmore for governor, privately ordered delegates to knife him.⁹⁰

On the eve of the Whig national convention, in short, "the Vice Presidency" was, in Winthrop's words, "still a very vexed question." That uncertainty appeared when delegates finally filled the second slot. Frelinghuysen led on the first ballot with 101 votes, compared to 83 for Davis, 53 for Fillmore, and 36 for Sergeant. Aside from New Jersey's seven votes, significantly, Frelinghuysen received only three northern votes. Nine-tenths of his support came from the South. Again, on the second ballot, only 16 of his 118 votes came from nonslave states. On the third ballot Frelinghuysen prevailed with 155 votes compared to 79 for Davis and 40 for Fillmore. Northerners gave him fifty-one votes, 30 percent of their total, but 91 percent of Southerners supported him. "2"

Southerners, in short, were primarily responsible for Frelinghuysen's nomination. Possibly they wanted him to balance Clay on the "character issue." More likely, Southerners gravitated to Frelinghuysen because he originally came from New Jersey, a state that bordered on Clayton's Delaware and that in 1844 still possessed a few slaves, and because he seemed less dangerous to Southerners on the slavery issue, despite his long career in humanitarian crusades, than did either Davis or Fillmore. Willing to follow Clay despite his opposition to immediate annexation, they apparently refused to add a potentially unpopular vice presidential candidate to their burden in the South. Such reasoning is understandable, but by placing Frelinghuysen on the Whig ticket with Clay, southern Whigs damaged Whig prospects in crucial northern states even more than Clay's apparent retreat on the Texas annexation issue itself.

By underlining the image of the Whig party as an association of narrow-minded, silk-stocking patricians bent on telling other people how to behave, Frelinghuysen's nomination by itself impaired Whigs' ability to win over Catholics, immigrants, and the unchurched. Certainly it gave a different tone to the Whig campaign than the rough-and-tumble log-cabin, hard-cider theatrics of 1840. What ultimately made the nomination so dangerous, however, was that almost simultaneously with the Whig convention, events in New York City and Philadelphia enhanced the chances that the Democrats could mobilize a wave of new immigrant voters against Clay if the Whig party could be portrayed as anti-Catholic and anti-immigrant.

Private nativist societies had long existed in the United States, inspired by sheer bigotry, superpatriotic fears that the American republic was being undermined by corrupt foreign elements, and sustained Protestant propaganda that the pope was plotting to take over the United States through the emigration of his slavish European minions. Until the early 1840s, however, those societies had been small and relatively apolitical. Then a confluence of developments increased antiforeign and anti-Catholic fears and provided nativists with concrete political issues they could use to establish a party separate from both the Whig and Democratic organizations. Economic competition between native-born artisans and immigrant workingmen increased as jobs disappeared during the prolonged depression. In New York City, a widespread desire for reform of the municipal government, frustrated by both Whig and Democratic politicians, provided a perfect opening for a new party. Equally important, immigration increased in the early 1840s, and so did Americans' repugnance of the social evils they attributed to it: pauperism, crime, public drunkenness, and disorder. Most important, many Americans increasingly feared the political influence of foreigners, especially Catholics. Those anxieties were fed by what seemed to be successful efforts by the Catholic clergy to weaken the control that Protestants exercised over public schools in New York City and Philadelphia and to prohibit the use of the Protestant King James version of the Bible in those schools. Immigrants and Catholics, that is, could be credibly if incorrectly charged with corrupting the political process and subverting the republic by undermining its moral foundations.

The American Republican party emerged as a response to those developments in a number of cities where immigrants were concentrated. It pledged to restore the purity of the political process and to deter further immigration by lengthening the period of naturalization for aliens from five to twenty-one years, by limiting officeholding to native-born citizens, and by protecting the public schools and other social institutions from supposed Catholic assaults upon them. In elections held for state assemblymen in New York City in November 1843, the American Republicans astonished observers by capturing 8,600 votes compared to 14,410 for the Democrats and 14,000 for the Whigs. Even more impressive, the American Republican mayoral candidate, James Harper, triumphed there in April 1844 with 24,570 votes compared to 20,538 for the Democrats and 5,297 for the Whigs. A month earlier, American Republican candidates had swept local township elections in Philadelphia County, Pennsylvania, normally a Democratic bastion.⁹³

This performance indicated that the American Republicans could mobilize thousands of new voters, as well as convert both Whigs and Democrats to their cause. In New York, for example, the best estimates are that two-thirds of the nativists' vote in the fall and two-fifths of it in the spring came from normal Democrats. Similarly, they could have carried Philadelphia County only with the help of Democratic voters. For Whigs anxious to carry the critical states of New York and Pennsylvania, therefore, the American Republicans presented a very tempting bloc of voters indeed. If the more than 10,000 former Democrats who supported the American Republicans in New York City in April could be lured to the Whig party, for example, they would almost offset the 16,000 men who voted for the Liberty party in New York State in 1843.⁹⁴

In the spring and summer of 1844, however, most Whigs disdained an alliance with nativists. American Republicans usually reciprocated those feelings. 95 Then an outbreak of rioting between Catholic and immigrant workingmen in the Philadelphia suburb of Kennsington in May, a week after the Whig convention met in Baltimore, reinforced Whig disdain. Those riots and subsequent violence in Southwark in July saw scores of men killed or wounded and at least two Catholic churches, as well as numerous Irish homes, burned to the ground. The Philadelphia riots not only intensified fears and animosities across ethnic and religious lines; they unfairly stigmatized the American Republican party as a band of lawless, church-burning incendiaries who threatened social tranquility. In Philadelphia, even as the Whig Northern American praised the goals of the American Republicans and called for revision of the naturalization laws, the Whiggish middle class denounced the violence they blamed on working-class rabble. Elsewhere Whigs recognized that any open association with the American Republicans or their principles would not only infuriate immigrants and Catholics but might also alienate the respectable middle class, whose allegiance Frelinghuysen's nomination was in part meant to secure.96

Clay perfectly understood the hazards of nativism. In June, Peter Sken Smith, a leading American Republican from Philadelphia, sent him reports of a mass rally urging a change in the naturalization laws and denouncing the House Judiciary Committee for bottling up nativist petitions on the matter. Clay replied that the spirit behind the American Republican movement was "right" and capable of producing good results "if conducted with discretion and prudence," but he then asked pointedly "whether it be expedient to throw any new issues into the Presidential canvass." Furthermore, Clay denied that he had ever proposed an amendment of the naturalization laws while serving in Congress. In August he told Clayton, an early proponent of cooperation with the nativists, that Pennsylvania Whigs ought to emphasize the tariff and distribution; he said nothing about an alliance with the American Republicans. Similarly, in an August letter to New York City Whigs, urging them to find some way to cooperate with the American Republicans in the fall elections, Clay again never mentioned the naturalization question. Clay, in short, hoped for American Republican support, but he and most other Whigs carefully eschewed any public antiforeign or anti-Catholic appeals to get it.⁹⁷

Until the deluge of bad news in September, in other words, the Whigs had no intention of openly appealing to or bargaining with the nativists. Yet the withdrawal of Tyler in August and the neutralization of the tariff issue made the situation in Pennsylvania seem desperate. The Alabama letters and Democrats' nomination of Silas Wright clearly imperiled New York. Everywhere, in any case, Democrats were successfully arousing apprehensive immigrants against the Whigs by attacking Frelinghuysen as a fanatic and by charging that the Whigs were bargaining with the nativists. Greeley, for example, protested that Maryland's October state election was in danger because Democrats sought to convert "thousands of Catholic Whigs" with "the base falsehood . . . that the 'Native' movement of Philadelphia and New York was a Whig device, and that The Whigs raised the riots and destroyed the Catholic Churches in Philadelphia." In this situation, many Whigs believed, they might as well openly bid for the nativist vote. Thus Webster, who had called a strategy session in Boston after the Vermont and Maine elections, began in October to urge New York's Whigs to bargain with the American Republicans, while Massachusetts Whig papers began to demand a reform of the naturalization laws.98

Chances for a deal with the nativists seemed particularly bright in New York and Pennsylvania. Because American Republicans' strength was largely confined to New York City and Philadelphia County, the nativists there presented separate tickets only for city and county officers, the state legislature, and congressmen, not for governor or president. Whigs might therefore swap support for local nativist candidates in return for American Republican votes for Whig gubernatorial candidates and presidential electors.

Although Pennsylvania Democrats at the time and historians thereafter asserted that such a deal was struck in Philadelphia, the evidence for it is slim. It is clear, however, that the substitution of Shunk for Henry Muhlenberg as the Democratic gubernatorial candidate in early September encouraged Pennsylvania's Whigs blatantly to seek the anti-Catholic vote. Shortly after Shunk's nomination, Whig papers across the state charged that he had participated in laying the cornerstone for a Catholic church in Pittsburgh and, worse still, that he had pledged to help Catholics ban the Bible from public schools. Shunk was a Catholic and an agent of the Catholic conspiracy against the school system, Whig papers falsely shrieked, while Democrats retorted in kind that Whigs believed "there can be no peace until the Catholics are exterminated from this country."

Such rhetoric, as well as reverberations from the bloody riots in May and July, aroused passions on both sides and increased the turnout in Philadelphia County, which cast about 13 percent of the statewide vote, to unprecedented levels in the October elections. Contrary to charges of a bargain, Whigs ran candidates for all local offices and carried the city of Philadelphia itself. But in the county the American Republicans, with the help of some Whig defectors, elected all county officers, the eight-man delegation to the state assembly, and two of four congressmen. Moreover, Whig appeals to the nativists clearly helped the Whig gubernatorial candidate, Joseph Markle, carry Philadelphia County, a traditional Democratic stronghold, by 4,000 votes. Nonetheless, the combined margin of Whigs and American Republicans over Democrats in the election for county commissioners was almost 12,000 votes. Some American Republicans had voted for the Whig state ticket, but not all. If the Whigs had made a bargain, it was a bad one. 100

The results of Pennsylvania's October election were two-edged. On the one hand, Democrats seized on them as hard evidence that Whigs had indeed trafficked with church burners and broadcast that warning to immigrants throughout the nation. On the other hand, Whigs both inside and outside the state were enormously encouraged by what the result implied for November. The Democrats won the gubernatorial election by only 6,000 votes. The Whigs had increased their vote by 43,000 since 1841 compared to a Democratic gain of 24,000, and Markle's vote actually exceeded Harrison's total in 1840. Because Whig tacticians believed that Polk could never get as many votes as Shunk and that the American Republicans would hold firm in the Whig column, they hoped again for a Whig victory in November. To them wooing nativists appeared to have paid off, and thus the Pennsylvania result hastened the completion of a bargain between the two camps in New York, where cautious Whigs had waited to see what happened in Philadelphia before committing themselves. 101

As early as August, New York City's American Republicans had approached Whigs about a bargain on the local ticket in November, whereby they would give Whigs two of their congressional nominations and half of the seats on their state assembly ticket if Whigs supported other American Republican candidates. In August, however, the Whigs still hesitated to make any such deal. For one thing, the American Republicans insisted on running a new Whig against an incumbent Whig congressman in one district. For another, Horace Greeley in the Tribune, as well as the followers of Seward and Weed, vehemently opposed the bargain because it would weaken the party's integrity and alienate immigrants. ¹⁰²

The revelation of the Alabama letters in early September and especially Wright's nomination, however, changed many minds. A New York Whig, who was himself a Catholic, wrote Mangum on September 8, for example, that while American Republicans repulsed him, he now thought that only such an alliance could save the state for Clay. "With this Union we sweep everything-without it we may go out of New York in an overwhelming minority—say 10,000," and "we will be whipped 'horse-foot & dragoon." Although Whigs outside the state encouraged the alliance, some New Yorkers still demurred. Besides awaiting results from Philadelphia to test American Republicans' trustworthiness, they demanded guarantees of American Republican support for Clay and Fillmore as "a sine qua non." The nativists in turn wanted Fillmore's pledge to work for maintenance of Bible reading in the schools and repeal of the 1842 school law that had stripped control of the city's schools from the Protestant New York Public School Society. Fillmore refused to commit himself on the school law, but he did write the nativists that he favored Bible reading in schools, although not as a legal requirement. That letter, however, was never delivered for Fillmore by Greeley, who had so stubbornly resisted any approach to the nativists. While neither side got the pledges it wanted, by the end of October the Whigs and American

Republicans arranged a common ticket for local offices. Whatever the facts were, moreover, Whigs believed that the American Republicans would deliver their supporters to Fillmore and Clay. 103

By the end of October, therefore, Whig spirits, which had sagged in September and early October, soared once again. Nativist support seemed to ensure victory in New York and Pennsylvania. Hemorrhaging to the Liberty party had stopped. October triumphs in Ohio, Maryland, and New Jersey augured victory there. Newfound enthusiasm swept over Georgia, despite a narrow defeat in its October congressional elections, as well as North Carolina, Virginia, and Tennessee. Even the recently worried Seward cautiously wrote Clay on October 25 that "the present setting of the current is clearly and strongly... flowing rapidly enough to give us success." "Judging from the strong assurances which are given me," Clay added on October 26, "the Whigs will carry all the four great States of New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Ohio," giving me "a larger electoral vote than was given to Gen. Harrison in 1840."

VIII

This preelection optimism left Whigs completely unprepared for the results of the presidential balloting. Of the "four great States" Clay captured only Ohio. Polk carried fifteen states to Clay's eleven and the electoral vote by 170 to 105. The electoral margin was deceptive, however, for Clay came heartbreakingly close to victory. Polk defeated him by only 38,000 votes out of 2,700,000 cast, and the Democrat lacked a popular majority because the Liberty party's vote had burgeoned from 6,200 in 1840 to 62,000 in 1844. Although Clay barely retained Ohio, New Jersey, and Tennessee, he lost eight other states that Harrison had carried in 1840, six of them by exceedingly narrow margins. Relatively minuscule changes in those six states would have thrown the race to him. Had he carried New York, for example, he would have won, yet he lost it by only 5,100 votes (1.05 percent) out of 486,000 cast. Even without New York, he would have triumphed by taking Pennsylvania and Indiana, yet Polk's margin in the former was 7.000 votes, 1.9 percent of the total, whereas Clay lost Indiana by only 2.300 votes, 1.7 percent of the total. Perhaps even more remarkable, the Whigs could have lost both New York and Pennsylvania and still have won with a total of 8,600 additional votes—2,300 in Indiana, 2,000 in Georgia, 700 in Louisiana, and 3,600 in Michigan.

The closeness of the contest proved little consolation. "So unexpected and so calamitous" was this "astounding" result that the Whigs were filled with "gloom and consternation." "The people have been appealed to & have elected a mere Tom Tit over the Old Eagle," protested Leslie Combs from Kentucky. Clay's defeat at the hands of such an opponent, indeed, temporarily shattered their faith in the wisdom and viability of popular self-government. "The malcontents of these United States have given the greatest blow to elective government that was ever given," a North Carolinian complained to Clay. "That such a cause, under such a leader, should have been lost, is a reproach to the general intelligence, on which the safety of a Republic rests," added a New Yorker. "Nothing has happened to shake my confidence in our ability to sustain a free government so much as this," a dejected Millard Fillmore, who lost his own gubernatorial bid in New York, reported to Clay. "May God save the country, for it is evident the people will not." More pungent was a furious Virginian who punned, "With a most emphatic by God, I do say it is a disgrace, a lasting disgrace to our God Almighty-God d—n-raggedy-arse-hyena-made Republic to have elected over H. Clay that infernal poke of all pokes James K. Polk of Tenn." ¹⁰⁵

So superior had Whigs' candidates and their position on the issues seemed that many believed that if they could not win in 1844, they could never win. The passage of time would reveal, indeed, that the election of 1844 constituted a fundamental watershed in the history of the Whig party. The unexpected defeat forced disillusioned Whigs to reassess the purpose, the principles, and the viability of their party. Recalculations began almost immediately as dismayed Whigs attempted to identify what had gone wrong. Their list of explanations for Clay's defeat was long and varied, although partisan bias warped some judgments. Still, the heart of the matter was whether Clay and the Whigs had been beaten fairly on the issues. How Whigs answered that question, in turn, largely determined whether they wanted to stick with traditional strategies and leaders or to jettison them for new issues, new men, and perhaps even a new party.

The crux of the debate was encapsulated in the apparently divergent responses of Whig editors Thurlow Weed of the Albany Evening Journal and Horace Greeley of the New York Tribune. Three months after the election, the shrewd Weed privately wrote Francis Granger that "the Tariff and Texas were distinctly in issue and . . . the people have declared against the Tariff and for Texas." Yet Greeley in editorial postmortems emphatically declared, "We are beaten not because we were in favor of Protection and opposed to Annexation, but because our opponents concealed or mystified these vital issues throughout two-thirds of the Union, and adroitly but dishonestly made the Election turn on irrelevant and unimportant matters."

Historians have largely repeated this Whig debate. Most have argued that issues, especially the question of annexation, decided the contest. According to this interpretation, Clay's equivocations on Texas drove proslavery voters to the Democrats in the South and antislavery voters to the Liberty party in the North, thereby destroying his chances in both sections. Others, impressed by ample evidence of voter constancy from election to election, have minimized the role of Texas or any other campaign issue and have argued forcefully that party allegiances formed prior to the election, not issues in it, motivated most voters. As Charles G. Sellers puts it, "Probably more voters favored annexation because they were Democrats than voted Democratic because they favored annexation." Yet even Sellers adds, "While candidates and issues would determine only a small percentage of the vote, this marginal effect could be decisive of the outcome."

Foreshadowing later historians, some Whigs did angrily attribute Clay's defeat to the "asinine fatuity of the abolition party." Indeed, if Clay had captured only a third of Birney's 15,800 votes in New York, he would have won the election. Similarly, Clay lost Indiana by 2,300 votes, while Birney attracted 2,100 there. The Liberty party's 3,600 votes in Michigan, added to his own total, would have given Clay that state too. 108

Although the importance of the enlarged Liberty vote seemed obvious, Whigs disagreed about why antislavery men refused to support Clay. While a few blamed

Clay's waffling on Texas annexation, others discounted the impact of the Alabama letters. Instead they cited the stubborn refusal of abolitionists to vote for Clay because of the "character issue" or because he owned slaves, no matter what he said about annexation or abolitionism, and at least one argued that abolitionists vengefully sought to punish the Whigs for forging a letter supposedly written by Birney.¹⁰⁹

Some Whigs railed at the obstinacy of the abolitionists, most of them had been well aware of how much the Liberty party had grown since 1840, and their campaign strategy had been aimed as much at containing that growth as at reversing it. But what disturbed the Whigs far more and what they recognized (far better than many historians) as the chief cause of their defeat was the disproportionate and unexpected growth of the Democratic vote since 1840.

The Whigs had gone into the campaign assuming they would win if they could reassemble the forces that had elected Harrison in 1840. If each party achieved a full turnout, they had calculated, Clay would prevail. Hence, the whole point of emphasizing the differences between Democrats and Whigs on Texas annexation and other issues had been to maximize the turnout of previous Whig voters, not to convert Democrats. In many places and on most issues the Democrats had pursued the same strategy. As a result, each party succeeded in bringing out the bulk of its previous supporters. Recent statistical analysis, for example, suggests that Whigs retained at least 87 percent of their 1840 vote in 1844, and fully 95 percent of those who voted Democratic in 1840 also voted for Polk four years later. 110

Whatever caused the apparent loss of an eighth of Harrison's supporters, those losses did not cause the Whig defeat. Of the seven states in which the Whig vote declined since 1840—Alabama, Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, North Carolina, Tennessee, and Vermont—the Whigs still won the last four, and only in Maine did the diminished Whig turnout provide the Democrats' margin of victory. Elsewhere Whigs gained votes since 1840; Clay's national total surpassed Harrison's by 25,473 votes. 111

What the Whigs had not anticipated at the beginning of 1844 was the jump of 210,683 votes in the Democratic total since 1840. Some of these recruits may have voted for Harrison in 1840, but the great majority represented new voters. Of the total increase in the presidential vote between 1840 and 1844, indeed, the Whigs captured a minuscule 8.7 percent, the Liberty party garnered 19.1 percent, and the Democrats won a whopping 72.2 percent. Even had all the additional Liberty voters backed Clay in 1844—and many of them probably had defected from the Whigs since 1840—the Democrats would still have outpaced Whigs among new voters by almost three to one.¹¹²

Inspection of state returns indicates, moreover, that this surge of new voters to the Democrats in 1844, rather than abstention by former Whigs or their defection to the Liberty party, accounted both for the closeness of the result and for Polk's victory. In every northern state that the Democrats narrowly carried—New York, Pennsylvania, Indiana, and Michigan—the difference between the Democratic and Whig gains since 1840 exceeded both the Liberty party's vote in 1844 and the margin by which the Democrats won (Table 15). In Michigan, for example, the number of new Democratic voters since 1840 was almost twice as large as their winning margin, in Pennsylvania it was three times as large, in

New York almost five times as large, and in Indiana eight times as large. In Illinois the Democratic gain far surpassed that of the Whigs, as well as the Liberty party vote, and accounted for nine-tenths of the Democratic margin. New Democratic voters, not new Liberty voters, in short, provided the critical Democratic edge in most northern states. Conversely, in Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, and Massachusetts, the drop in the Whig vote far exceeded Democratic losses. Whig losses were also larger than the 1844 Liberty vote in all those states except Massachusetts. The ability of Democrats to attract new voters outside of New England and the inability of Whigs to retain their vote in upper New England states thus contributed far more to the result than did the votes siphoned off by the abolitionist candidate.

In the South as well, the decisive Democratic proclivity of new voters accounted for the narrowing of Whig margins in states Whigs retained like Delaware, [&]quot;This table is based on election returns reported in Burnham, Presidential Ballots 1836–1892. The letters D for Democratic and W for Whig in the "Winning Margin" column indicate which party carried the state.

Maryland, Kentucky, Tennessee, and North Carolina; for the expansion of Democratic margins in Alabama, Missouri, and Virginia since 1840; and for Democratic victories in key southern states Harrison had carried in 1840—Georgia, Mississippi, and Louisiana. In Georgia, for example, the Democratic vote grew by six times the Whig gain between 1840 and 1844, and the differential in the parties' number of new voters was five times as large as the Democrats' margin of victory.

Since Democrats hardly organized more thoroughly or campaigned more ardently than Whigs, these figures, at first glance, imply that the Whigs had badly overestimated the ability of their issues and their candidates to stir the electorate. Conversely, they seem to show that the Democratic platform of territorial acquisition and hostility to Whig economic programs had far more appeal to both new voters and traditional Democratic supporters than did Whig policies.

Yet Whigs disputed the causes of the increased Democratic vote even when they agreed upon its importance. Some, for example, blamed Clay's personal unpopularity. "Any other respectable Whig candidate would have received a large majority," the petulant Webster smugly announced. Yet a Virginian who was no friend of Webster similarly interpreted the loss as a "personal" rebuke of Clay. "I believe we have a majority of the people with us upon our principles & measures. With a popular man we could have carried the election easily." The election demonstrated "that our national republican friends must be content to play second fiddle in these national contests, and take pay accordingly." In contrast, many Whigs believed Clay's candidacy had brought great strength to the Whig cause. "The Whig party regard you as the only man upon whom we can rally with one heart and one mind," a Pittsburgher wrote Clay. An Ohioan concurred. "One thing that added greatly to the enthusiasm of the Whigs in the last political contest was a warm personal affectionate attachment to their leader. That personal attachment still continues," he assured the crestfallen candidate.

Those Whigs who remained convinced of the superiority of their candidate and their issues could only attribute the Democratic surge to "the utter mendacity frauds & villainies of Locofocoism." The Democrats, Whigs repeatedly inveighed, relied on "appeals to every bad passion, the hostile instinct of the poor against the rich, lies and calumnies etc etc" to "bamboozle" the masses. Worse still, Whigs charged, Democrats illegally naturalized immigrants and marched them to the polls, openly bought votes or paid the taxes of those who could not meet taxpaying requirements to vote, employed double and triple voting, and stuffed ballot boxes to steal the election from the Whigs in Louisiana, Georgia, New York, Pennsylvania, and elsewhere. "You have lost this state by the most unprecedented frauds and rascality," a New Orleans Whig consoled Clay. "Parishes giving more votes or as many as there are white inhabitants of all sexes & ages being in them. Steamboats chartered to convey voters in the same day at different Polls, and every other species of fraud that could be imagined."

Accusations of corruption accompanied virtually every election in the nine-teenth century and are difficult to assess. In this case, however, the charges represented more than sour grapes. Historians agree that the Democrats carried Louisiana, at least, only by padding the vote of Plaquemines Parish, a veritable Democratic rotten borough. The Democratic vote in that parish jumped from 250 in 1840 to 1,007 in 1844, even though only 538 white males over twenty and only 577 over fifteen resided there in 1840, according to the census.

To many Whigs, in short, the apparent Democratic gains consisted largely of illegal or fictitious voters. At the very least, they represented "a most 'unholy alliance' of the most discordant materials"—the ignorant and the ill-informed, the envious and unqualified poor, and the superstitious and malicious foreignborn who had been whipped into an overwhelming horde by "infamous frauds, ... irrelevant issues, ... [and] unblushing misrepresentations." The election had not turned on the parties' respective platforms. Instead, Democrats had employed demagoguery and deceit to assemble an unthinking rabble against an outnumbered coalition of the intelligent, the industrious, and the virtuous. "I never knew a case before where the good and intelligent ranged themselves on one side and the worthless on the other so completely as in the late contest," a New York Whig complained. As a Charlottesville, Virginia, editor put it, "We have seen the will of a large majority of the qualified voters of the country—of the native sons of the soil (as I firmly believe)—contained and set aside by a combination of foreign force & domestic fraud and ignorance against which the intelligence and virtue of the country have, alas! been arrayed in vain."117

The disappointing results drove the normally liberal-minded and warm-hearted Greeley to one of his sporadic fits of mean-spirited contempt for Democratic voters. "Is there not illumination, revelry and extra blue rum at the Five Points and in nine-tenths of the three thousand drunkard manufactories of our city?" he sarcastically queried. "Does Not Ignorance and Vice exult; if only to see Intelligence and Virtue perplexed and afflicted? Let universal Rowdyism strain its throat on one more execration of Clay, and three cheers for Polk and Dallas."¹¹⁸

Yet even some of the Whigs who denounced Democratic frauds could not deny that Whigs had suffered from certain issues. Southern Whigs in particular blamed their disadvantageous stand on the tariff and especially on Texas annexation. While castigating "fraud the most unparalleled and falsehood the most barefaced," for example, a Georgian concluded that "the preposterous humbug of Texas... ruined us in Georgia." "The Texas question did more to beat us than any other thing," echoed an Alabama Whig. Clay's Kentucky friend Leslie Combs agreed. "I assure you that the Texas question was the only one made & openly advocated every where by the Locofocos, & upon it all our losses in the South & West occurred." Another southern Whig summed up the sentiment of many of his colleagues, and of many historians as well, when he flatly asserted, "For anyone now to say that the Texas question had no influence on the Presidential election only makes a fool or an ass of himself."

This insistence that the Texas issue crippled southern Whigs rings true. Even if, as some historians contend, previously formed party loyalty determined the behavior of most voters, Democrats, like Whigs, recognized that interparty conflict over issues was necessary to reinforce that loyalty and get those voters to the polls. Thus southern Democrats had gleefully stressed the parties' differences on immediate annexation, and virtually all southern Democrats who had voted for Van Buren in 1840 also voted for Polk. Furthermore, one would be a fool to gainsay the fact that the Democrats captured an awesome 86.1 percent of southern voters who joined the electorate between 1840 and 1844.

Since Whigs had suffered serious erosion of their voting support in the offyear elections of 1841, 1842, and 1843, while the Democrats had already increased their vote in some states before Texas became a partisan issue, a comparison of Whig and Democratic gains between the last election prior to May 1844 with the presidential results affords a more precise estimate of its impact. By this measure Democrats still garnered 57.6 percent of the total increment in the South, but Texas' impact varied from state to state (Table 16). Whigs actually outgained Democrats in Delaware, Arkansas, and Louisiana after the emergence of the Texas issue. Moreover, Democrats did not need the Texas issue to carry Mississippi and Arkansas; they had already achieved a decisive margin in previous battles over economic issues. The same is probably true of Missouri, Alabama, and Virginia, where most of the gain by both parties after 1843 represented a return to the polls of previously committed voters. Only in Georgia, and to a lesser extent Louisiana, did Democratic gains among new voters after the emergence of the Texas issue prove critical to the result, although such gains also clearly helped Democrats narrow the gap in the slave states that Clay carried.

If annexation sentiment did cause the Democratic surge, hunger for cheap land among nonslaveholders rather than fears of an abolitionist plot among slaveholders apparently constituted the chief appeal of Texas. Throughout the campaign Whigs warned of the lust for land among poor whites, and after the election several complained that the prospect of cheap land in Texas was what made annexation such a compelling issue "among the lower order of people." Whigs, in fact, singled out Georgia as the state where Texas fever was most decisive, and there, they lamented, it reached its height in the hilly northwestern Cherokee District, a fast-growing region populated primarily by nonslaveholders. 120

Between 1840 and 1844, Georgia's Democrats outgained Whigs in counties where slaves constituted less than 30 percent of the population by 7,080 to 1,772. Both the number of new Democratic voters and the rate of growth in the Democratic vote since 1840 were higher in low slaveholding than in high slaveholding counties (Table 17). Hence, Democrats achieved 58 percent of their total statewide gain in the 43 percent of Georgia's counties with the fewest slaves.

Democrats also recruited new supporters more heavily in the poorest counties with the fewest slaves in Virginia and Tennessee. But in Mississippi, their rate of gain in counties with the heaviest concentrations of slaves almost equaled their gain in counties with the lowest concentration, and in Alabama, Democrats' recruits came primarily from counties where slaves constituted between 30 and 50 percent of the population. In Louisiana, finally, while Democrats gained the most votes in low slaveholding counties, proximity to Texas was more important. The closer a Louisiana parish was to the Texas border, the more its Democratic vote grew after 1840.¹²¹

More than likely, then, the Texas issue contributed heavily to the Democratic surge in Dixie, and it may have been the decisive issue in the crucial state of Georgia. Nevertheless, it would be, in the words of Virginia's former governor, David Campbell, "mistaken" to argue "that the Texas question decided the Presidential election." The Whigs lost the election in the North, not in the South. If Clay had been able to carry New York and Pennsylvania, he could have lost Tennessee and North Carolina in addition to other southern states and still have won the election. "Had Mr. Clay come out in favor of annexation, he would still have been defeated," Campbell astutely insisted. "The election was decided . . . by the people of New York & Pennsylvania, Michigan & Maine, on considerations and feelings, unconnected with any great national principles or interests." 122

[&]quot;This table is based on the same sources as earlier tables, although I have supplemented returns for congressional and gubernatorial elections with returns from the Tribune Almanac.

Closer examination of northern voting returns, indeed, suggests that the Texas issue, if anything, helped the Whigs far more than it did either the Democrats or the Liberty party in the North. Whigs' faith in their platform and in the appeal of Clay, that is, was well placed. Whigs substantially outgained the Democrats after the nominations of Clay and Polk and the emergence of the Texas issue in every northern state except Maine, Indiana, and Illinois (Tables 15 and 16). The boost that the issues of 1844 gave Whigs, compared to their relative stagnation between 1840 and 1844, was especially impressive in Maine, Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Michigan. Obviously, much of the increase in the Whig vote between 1843 and 1844 represented a return of former supporters to the polls rather than the recruitment of new voters. Even so, in every northern state in which Whigs gained votes between 1840 and 1844 except Rhode Island, they achieved that increase after the introduction of the Texas issue.

 $[^]b$ I have used the 1843 gubernatorial returns in Rhode Island because the April 1844 election was uncontested by the Democrats. If one uses those later figures, however, the respective changes are Whigs, +1,762; Democrats, +4,659; and Liberty, +5.

^{&#}x27;The returns for New Jersey in 1843 are incomplete congressional results.

[&]quot;I calculated the proportion of slaves in each county's population from the figures listed in the census of 1840. Because the concentration of slaves varied considerably from state to state, I thought it wiser to divide the states differently rather than to use a standard formula. Thus, in Virginia and Mississippi, I have ranked the counties from the lowest third according to the proportion of slaves to the highest third, whereas elsewhere I have grouped counties according to specific proportions of slaves.

Equally stunning, comparison of the 1843 and 1844 returns demonstrates that the Whigs mobilized far more additional voters than the Liberty party after the emergence of the Texas issue. In three New England states, the Liberty party's vote actually dropped from what it had been in the preceding election. In Vermont and Massachusetts, moreover, its gains after 1843 may have been drained from the Democrats rather than the Whigs. In New York the Liberty party gained a paltry 245 votes after 1843; the Whigs added 61,000. Indiana's Liberty party increased its vote by 425, but the Whig vote grew by 9,000. In Michigan the jump in the Whig vote after November 1843 was ten times the size of the abolitionists' gain. 123

In sharp contrast to the case of the South, in short, northern voting returns strongly suggest that the issue differences of 1844 and Clay's candidacy benefited the Whigs far more than the Democrats or the Liberty party—a fact that did not escape the attention of northern Whig politicians. Summary comparisons make the point even more emphatically. Between 1840 and 1844 the increment in the total northern vote was apportioned among the parties as follows: Whigs, 9,778 (4.3 percent); Democrats, 116,997 (63.9 percent); and the Liberty party, 56,301 (30.8 percent). Conversely, the total northern gains between 1843 or the spring of 1844 and the presidential vote were thusly divided: Whigs, 256,629 (54.7 percent); Democrats, 200,383 (42.7 percent); and the Liberty party, 12,389 (2.6 percent). With good reason, then, many northern Whigs had a very different view than southern Whigs about the desirability of perpetuating the issues and strategies on which they had campaigned in 1844.

Or at least some of the issues. Even if Whigs were dramatically more successful than the other parties in bringing additional voters to the polls after 1843, they still recognized that the gains Democrats did make after 1843 were crucial to their victories in northern states. While a few admitted that the promise of immediate territorial expansion in Texas and Oregon engendered some of these accessions in the Midwestern states, most refused to credit the Democratic position on either Texas or economic issues for Democratic gains in New England and the Middle Atlantic states. In New York, for example, Greeley and others pointed to the undeniable impact of Silas Wright on the presidential race. The widely popular Democratic gubernatorial candidate ran ahead of Polk, thus pulling out votes for the presidential ticket that might not otherwise have been there. Moreover, his well-known opposition to Tyler's Texas treaty had helped Democrats obfuscate party differences on annexation. 124

Primarily, however, Greeley, Weed, and scores of other Whigs around the country pointed quite correctly to a more important cause of the Democratic gains that defeated Clay, a complex of issues and events that most Whigs had considered peripheral to the campaign—the increase in ethnic and religious animosities that had turned the vast majority of foreign-born and Catholic voters against their party. Not only did the fraction of immigrants who had previously voted for Harrison and other Whigs desert the party, Whigs complained, but the Democrats had been terrifyingly successful in mobilizing massive numbers of new immigrant voters behind Polk and their other candidates.

Throughout the North, Whigs howled that they had been inundated by a tidal wave of newly and often illegally naturalized immigrants. "The foreign vote also destroyed your election," Ambrose Spencer informed Clay from Albany, New York, while Fillmore in Buffalo estimated that a unanimous immigrant vote allowed the Democrats to cut the Whig majority in Erie County by 1,000 votes. Whigs in New York City emphatically agreed. "We feel here that the whole result has been changed by the Foreign Votes in this city, and unless some change is made in our Naturalization Laws, that it will soon be too late to prevent an entire foreign control of our government," one wrote his father. "Foreigners who have 'no lot of inheritance' in the matter have robbed us of our birth-right, the 'scepter has departed from Israel,' "chimed the disgusted patrician Philip Hone. "Ireland has reconquered what England lost." "It comes to this," cried an indignant Massachusetts Whig, "that Americans cannot enjoy their birthright—that the destinies of our country are controlled by foreigners—that we are not our own master." 125

From Cincinnati, Pittsburgh, New York, Baltimore, New Orleans, and virtually every place with significant concentrations of immigrants poured horror stories of thousands of immigrants being naturalized in the last weeks prior to the election, immigrants who gave the Democrats their decisive edge. Weed and Greeley, both exceptionally careful students of election returns, even pointed to examples of small groups of Irish and Germans in upstate counties in New York who joined the Democrats. In the northern tier of counties along Lake Ontario, Greeley added, the Democrats had gained almost 7,000 votes since 1840. Some of these came from Irish workers employed on Canada's public works who came across the border and illegally voted for Polk to protect "Foreigners' Rights," he asserted, but many of the others represented Canadian refugees who had voted for Harrison in 1840. Even from Maine, where the Democratic vote declined slightly between 1840 and 1844 an hysterical Whig wailed that "an army of [20,000] Irish paupers, set on and marshaled by their infernal priests," had "prostrated" the Whigs "in the dust." "Something must be done," he warned. "The naturalization law must be modified somehow, or we must sink under the weight of the worst of all European influences." The Whigs, Greeley exaggerated at one point, had been crushed by 200,000 foreign votes.126

Democrats characterized immigrant voters quite differently than the Whigs did, but they agreed that the foreign vote did the Whigs in. Hence, a delighted supporter wrote Polk that "the true-hearted Adopted Citizens abandoned the Whig party almost en masse and supported you with the same zeal and devotedness they did General Jackson. It was an avalanche they could not resist." ¹²⁷

Many Whigs could not admit that this avalanche had natural causes. Instead they blamed Democratic fraud and Democratic demagoguery for setting it off. To many Whigs, indeed, the very openness of the Democratic appeals to the ethnic and religious prejudices of immigrants and Catholics during the 1844 campaign was unethical—indeed un-American. "We deplore the want of true American patriotism which our opponents have exhibited throughout this contest, in their appeals to foreigners and religious sects," protested a Whig meeting in New Haven, Connecticut. Similarly the Cincinnati Gazette excoriated "the rousing up of the prejudices of foreign Catholics, inducing them to vote against the Whigs because one of our candidates was a Presbyterian, thereby introducing a religious test into a political contest." "The Naturalized Citizens have all been carried for Polk by appeals to their Religious and old-world feelings and prejudices," fumed Greeley. Although these complaints conveniently ignored the Whigs' own appeals to antiforeign and anti-Catholic prejudices, the very frequency and indignation with which Whigs alluded to such Democratic propaganda suggests that ethnocultural and religious issues had far more salience in the election of 1844 than in any previous election.128

Still more Whigs pointed simply to massive and illegal naturalization of ineligible immigrants who had not yet met the five-year residency requirement for citizenship as the source of the Democratic gain. Democrats could not have won without "the spurious and illegal foreign vote," such Whigs ranted. "It is this that defeated us." In the weeks prior to the election, scores of Whigs protested, judges and, even worse, the clerks of state and municipal courts that Democrats controlled had issued thousands of naturalization papers to undeserving foreigners, some of whom had been on American soil less than thirty days. Explicitly blaming the loss of New York and Pennsylvania on "false and fraudulent votes" rather than on the unpopularity of Whig stands against annexation and for a protective tariff, Webster, for example, asserted in a blistering speech at Boston's Faneuil hall, "There is not the slightest doubt, that in numerous cases different persons vote on the strength of the same set of naturalization papers; there is little doubt, that immense numbers of such papers are attained by direct perjury." ¹²⁹

Whatever the extent of illegal naturalization, tens of thousands of immigrants naturalized in the fall of 1844 cast their first presidential vote for Polk. Yet, as some Whigs realized, the ability to vote or even the Democratic agency in securing that ability did not ensure that immigrants would vote Democratic. Thus, while many Whigs blamed Democratic dishonesty for the surge of the foreign vote against them, others, including Greeley himself, thought that the Whigs had primarily themselves to blame. To such men the behavior of immigrants was understandable, if tragic in its consequences. Whigs' flirtation with nativism and alliances with the American Republican party in New York and Philadelphia drove immigrants and Catholics to the Democrats in self-defense. Whig papers and campaigners had embraced the nativists' demand for an extension of the naturalization period to twenty-one years. Whigs had boasted of the American Republican support for their gubernatorial candidate in Pennsylvania, cried Weed. "Can we blame Adopted Citizens, under such circumstance, for leaving us?" 130

Not only had the embrace of nativism alienated immigrants, Whigs complained, but the American Republicans had betrayed them. While the Whigs had faithfully supported local American Republican candidates as the quid pro quo that these informal bargains demanded, they charged with some justice that former Democrats among the nativists had backed Polk instead of Clay. As a result, Clay's vote in New York City and Philadelphia was lower than it should have been. "Their perfidy has lost us the present election beyond doubt," an angry Whig congressman from Indiana exaggerated. To these Whigs, in short, the attempt to truck with nativists had backfired. 131

Other Whigs, however, believed that the party had estranged immigrants and Catholics long before Tyler's withdrawal, the revelation of the Alabama letters, and the Democratic nominations of Shunk and Wright in September forced them to turn to the American Republicans for aid. They cited the party's unthinking nomination of Theodore Frelinghuysen, instead of the courting of nativists, as the fatal mistake of the campaign. "Our opponents by pointing to the native Americans and to Mr. Frelinghuysen, drove the foreign Catholics from us and defeated us in this state," Fillmore told Clay. New York's Catholics had voted solidly Democratic, not so much to defeat Clay as to defeat Frelinghuysen, echoed a Long Island Whig. "Mr. F's nomination made the Catholic opposition intense," Leslie Combs informed Delaware's Clayton. Had Clayton been chosen for the second spot, he added, Clay would have won. Clay himself was persuaded of that fact. On December 2, he wrote Clayton that had he been nominated for vice president, "the Catholics would not have been so united against us." 132

Former Treasury Secretary Thomas Ewing, whose wife was a devout Catholic, also blamed the Whigs' defeat on their haphazard decision at Baltimore. "I felt during the whole canvass that we were suffering greatly by the connextion [sic] of Mr. Frelinghuysen with out ticket. We could have got over the Philadelphia riots, but we could not at all obviate the objections to Frelinghuysen on the part of the Catholics." Whigs, he went on, must learn a lesson from this mistake. "Twice we have been destroyed by an injudicious choice of candidate for the Vice Presidency & in both instances Men were taken up, who had not before been spoken of, or their Merits & popularity weighed." In the future, Whig conventions must adjourn before the vice presidential balloting so that delegates could assess "the merits and demerits" of new men suggested for the office. "You and I could have told this convention at once that Frelinghuysen would destroy us, & we might thus, if one day had been given us, have avoided the Mischief." The Whigs would never make such mistakes with their presidential nominee, Ewing forecast, but they "may again & again with the Vice President unless we take proper measures to avoid it." Little could Ewing have known in January 1845 how accurate this prophecy would prove to be. 133

IX

Various elements thus produced the traumatic Whig defeat of 1844. The stubborn refusal of deeply religious antislavery men to support a Kentucky slaveholder whom they considered immoral helped keep New York, Michigan, and Indiana out of the Whig column. The lure of cheap lands in Texas and Oregon helped swell the Democratic vote in the South and the West. Democratic fraud cost the Whigs Louisiana and perhaps padded Democratic totals elsewhere. The popularity of Van Buren's close friend Wright helped carry the nation's largest state for Polk, whose nomination Wright had bitterly protested. Most important, the unanticipated salience of ethnic and religious tensions, along with readily exploitable Whig blunders, allowed the Democrats to mobilize an unprecedented number of foreign-born and Catholic voters against the Whigs.

Together these elements prevented the Whigs from finally achieving the vindication they had sought through the nomination of their most revered and renowned champion. Clay's defeat alone, however, was not what made the results of 1844 so disheartening. While the Whigs captured almost three-fifths of the gubernatorial races that year, they won fewer than two-fifths of the seats in the House of Representatives filled in 1844, and their narrow margin in the Senate stood in jeopardy because of losses in key state legislatures. Whigs' high hopes of recapturing control of the government had been almost completely dashed. As a result, the hated Democrats now had the power to enact policies Whigs genuinely dreaded as inimical to the prosperity, the honor, and the security of the republic.

Internal disagreements about why the party had lost, moreover, would prove as crucial as the fact of defeat itself. What, if anything, Whigs wondered, could the party do about the nettlesome Liberty party that threatened their northern base? How should they respond to the new and potent force of Catholics and immigrants that the Democrats had mustered? Should they join with the nativists in an attempt to ban immigrant voting, as those who believed that fraudulent naturalization had doomed the party in 1844 advocated? Or should they shun any further association with nativists and anti-Catholics that might antagonize still more immigrants, as those who insisted that the stigma of Frelinghuysen and American Republicanism had caused the defeat argued?

As most Whigs only dimly perceived at the time, what made this dilemma so perplexing was that they could probably never satisfy the nativists, for the most virulent nativists found the Whigs' anti-Catholic and antiforeign credentials too suspect. Despite the Whigs' bargaining, despite the Whig editorials demanding an extension of naturalization laws, Clay himself had refused to endorse American Republican demands when given an opportunity. In New York, moreover, Fillmore's letter to the New York City nativist B. F. Whitney had never been delivered by Greeley. Theodore Frelinghuysen might frighten Catholics, but he personally did not denounce them in the vitriolic language of some Protestants. In sum, the most extreme antagonists of immigrants and Catholics may not have considered the Whigs sufficiently committed to their cause to merit support. If so, the Whigs in 1844 confronted for the first time a problem that would plague them until the party's demise a dozen years later. To immigrants and Catholics the Whig party seemed impossibly bigoted and hostile. To the most fervent haters of Catholics and immigrants, however, Whigs appeared too moderate, too restrained, too maddeningly neutral in what seemed to them a life-and-death struggle for the soul of the republic. As ethnic and religious antagonisms intensified, as they surely did in 1844, the Whigs had much more to lose than to gain.

At the end of 1844 other choices facing the Whigs were even more basic and more divisive. Whereas some demanded that the party abandon the issues that had failed in 1844 when they seemed invincible, others asserted just as strongly that Whigs could win in the future only by maintaining those policies and clarifving how they differed from Democrats on them. Whereas some believed that only Clay or someone like him could lead the party to future victory, others insisted that the election had demonstrated that no well-known proponent of Whig measures could win and that the party must return to the victorious strategy of 1840. Within weeks of the election, indeed, some were already booming military heroes like Winfield Scott for the nomination in 1848. Most fundamentally of all, Whigs disagreed about what should become of the Whig party itself. Some insisted that "we ought to fight under no other name than that of Whigs." Others argued that they should "form a party under the name of the 'American Republican' and drop that of Whig, which appears to be so objectionable to some." While most agreed with Clay that the Whig "minority constitutes a vast power, which, acting in concert, and with prudence and wisdom, may yet save the country," others had been persuaded by the events of 1844 that "the Whigs proper (so called) never can rule this nation" and that a reconstitution of parties was necessary, if not imminent.135

By the end of 1844, therefore, the high spirits, unanimity, and certitude that had inspired the Whigs during most of the year had given way to demoralization, disillusionment, and divisive uncertainty. The issue, as George H. Colton, editor of the American Whig Review, put it only days after the election, was "what the Whig party will do." Together with the results of the Polk administration, which Whigs forecast so accurately, divisions over how to answer that question would largely determine the fate of the Whig party, not only during the next four years but for the remainder of its existence.¹³⁶

"The Present Administration Are Your Best Recruiting Officers"

"THE WHIG PARTY seems to be doomed to misfortune—if not to dissolution," one Massachusetts Whig lamented after Clay's shocking defeat. His despair about the party's continued viability was widely shared. Many historians have accepted these Whig obituary notices as correct, if slightly premature. They have interpreted the reasons for Clay's loss as auguries of the Whig party's eventual death and as the beginning of that end. Supposedly, President James K. Polk's policies would greatly inflame tensions over slavery expansion and thus split the Whigs along sectional lines. Allegedly, Clay's defeat had also shown that the Whigs' economic platform was not popular enough either to bring them victory at the polls or to divert public attention from the fatal sectional issues. The appeal of Whig economic issues purportedly continued to deteriorate after 1844, thereby exposing the feebleness of Whig ideas and destroying the fealty voters paid the two-party system.²

According to these historians, the inflamation of sectional tensions and the obsolescence of economic issues would lead Whigs in 1848, as in 1840, to eschew a national platform, shun well-known proponents of Whig principles, and nominate another politically inexperienced military hero as their presidential candidate. In the words of one sympathetic historian, "The Whigs had failed to get their message across," and "their policies were not viable enough to be carried to victory by party regulars."

Like traditional interpretations of the 1840 election, however, this pessimistic analysis focuses exclusively on the presidential election year rather than including off-year elections. A broader perspective suggests that the party was robust and its issues vital during the years of Polk's presidency. The Whigs remained internally cohesive in Congress and in many state legislatures between 1844 and 1848. Their record in those legislative bodies remained attractive to the electorate, for they recaptured the House of Representatives and a number of state governments in the midterm elections of 1846–47. In congressional and gubernatorial contests during 1848 itself, Whig candidates who identified with traditional Whig programs ran better than any Whig candidates since 1840. Thus, in 1848, as eight years earlier, the Whig party as a whole, and not just an attractive presidential candidate, scored a convincing victory (Tables 18 and 19). This strong performance raises two questions. Given the widespread Whig despair after Clay's defeat, what accounts for the party's comeback during the Polk years? And since the party recovered in those midterm state and congressional elections, why in 1848 did Whigs select a military hero whose very nomination signaled an abdication of Whig principles?

The reasons Whigs would look to military chieftains for a presidential candidate in 1848 hardly reflected some universal recognition that their issues were dead and that their party was "doomed to misfortune" unless they resorted to a popular hero. For Whigs the months and years following Clay's defeat constituted a period of reassessment, divisive internal debate, and experimentation with strategies that varied from state to state and from year to year. Only by examining closely the changing fortunes of Whigs in congressional and state elections held between 1844 and 1848 can one properly assess the viability of Whig issues and the reasons they ultimately turned to a military hero.

This is not meant to deny that the Whig defeat in 1844 marked a fundamental turning point. Although some historians tend to inter the party prematurely and to oversimplify the reasons for its demise, they are correct about the direction in which it was moving after the traumatic events of that year. They simply have not gauged correctly the speed at which it descended toward its grave.

One can conceive of the history of the Whig party as a fluctuating tension between a centripetal force holding it together and centrifugal forces blowing it apart. Both before and after 1844, the principal cohesive pressure was the party's conflict with the Democratic party. As long as voters perceived sharp programmatic and ideological differences between Whigs and Democrats, and as long as the Whig party had a better chance of defeating the Democrats than other anti-Democratic parties, the Whig party would survive. What made the loss in 1844 so important was that at no other time in the party's history did the balance between centripetal and centrifugal forces so favor the former. Never again were Whigs so united. Never again were their differences from the Democrats so clear. And still the Whigs lost. From that point on, the divisive forces within the Whig party would grow stronger and the unifying force of interparty conflict would gradually wane.

Clay's loss accelerated that shift by exacerbating the divisions within the party. After 1844 Whigs split over the best way to seek recovery. Sectional antagonisms over slavery and slavery expansion also increased after 1844, for some Whigs in both the North and the South blamed the attempt to take a nationwide party stand against Texas' annexation for the defeat. They often wished to exploit sectional animosities in order to safeguard the party's base in their own section. regardless of the consequences for the party in the other section. The loss of federal patronage for at least four years ensured that rival factions within different state parties would battle all the more fiercely for control of state organizations and the state offices such control might bring. Pressure to win state elections, in turn, aggravated disagreements about how the party should respond to the abolitionist and nativist challengers who had appeared in 1844. In addition to these problems, emerging regional conflicts over economic development and state constitutional revision, as well as intraparty divisions over newly salient issues such as prohibition, would rend the fabric of state Whig organizations still further. Over and above all these sources of internal strife, and interlocking with many of them, would be the battle for the party's presidential nomination in 1848 itself.

Ironically, Clay's loss, which divided the Whig party in so many ways, also engendered a new passion for unity. James K. Polk's domestic and foreign policies violated virtually every Whig tenet of good government. Whig resistance to that program revived the competitive spirit of Whig voters throughout the nation and revitalized their conviction that the Whig party, and only the Whig party, could best serve the nation's interests and save Revolutionary ideals. Only after a new Whig president replaced Polk in 1849 would the disuniting forces within the party overwhelm the cohesive force of interparty conflict with Democrats.

I

The first decision that confronted Whigs after Clay's defeat was fundamental—whether or not to perpetuate their party itself. So devastating were the November results that some believed that the Whigs, like their National Republican predecessors after Clay's defeat in 1832, must abandon their standard for a new organization with a different name that might attract broader voter support. Fury at the immigrant surge toward Polk caused vengeful Whigs to advocate "the amalgamation of the Whig party with the Native Americans." As a Virginian declared, "We intend to rally again and form a party under the name 'American Republican' and drop that of Whig, which appears to be so objectionable to some."

Proponents of such party suicide were a distinct minority. Most Whig politicians clearly preferred to continue to battle the Democracy as Whigs, and within days of Clay's defeat they sought to rally their discouraged troops. Some, like Webster in a speech to a Whig rally in Boston's Faneuil Hall, stressed that only preserving the Whig party would yield control of state governments. Those governments, insisted Webster, touch "closely all our concerns, all our relations of social life, and all our enjoyments of the fruits of a wise and parental government." In the American federal system states had more direct influence on people's lives than did Washington, and as long as Whigs could capture them, it made no sense to sacrifice the party.⁵

Others attempted to persuade disconsolate Whigs that the party's future was bright. "We assure our brother Whigs throughout the country," vowed a meeting of Connecticut Whigs, "that though defeated, and anticipating the enactment of laws unfavorable to the prosperity of the country, our hearts are still buoyant with hope—and we feel that if our opponents venture to carry out their true principles, they will, in the next contest, give us the victory, with but little effort on our part to obtain it." Similarly, Horace Greeley in virtually every issue of the New York Tribune in the two months following the election predicted that once Democrats took power and revealed where they actually stood on the Texas and tariff issues, voters would repudiate them. "The nominal victory of our opponents, won by false pretenses and fraudulent voting, will yet prove their ruin," promised Greeley. Since the Whigs were a large minority that "constitutes a vast power which . . . may yet save the country," Clay himself argued, he did "not see the wisdom of assuming a new name, and giving up our separate organization."

Clay particularly warned against the "great tendency amongst the Whigs to unfurl the banner of the native American party." Such a merger, he told Kentucky's John J. Crittenden, would only allow the Democrats to mobilize more immigrant voters. "I am disposed to think it best for each party, the Whigs and the Natives, to retain their respective organizations distinct from each other, and to cultivate friendly relations together." Prominent Whig editors like Greeley, Thurlow Weed, and John H. Pleasants of the Richmond Whig rejected a merger with the American Republicans even more emphatically and denied that nativism by itself could be the basis "for a great political party."

Other Whigs emphasized their patriotic duty to preserve the party. At Clay's urging, Whig senators gathered in Washington on March 15, 1845, after the second session of the Twenty-Eighth Congress adjourned, to discuss the party's future. The resulting manifesto ringingly reaffirmed Whigs' original mission: "That the Constitution of the United States, the honor and security of the Country, and all its interests, can only be preserved by maintaining the leading principles, and supporting the leading measures of Policy, of the Whig Party."

An even more remarkable brief for the continuation of the party appeared in the February 1845 issue of the new Whig periodical The American Review. No document, indeed, better reflects how the two-party system had matured and how thinking about the role of political parties had changed since the birth of the Whig party in the winter of 1833–34 than this article, which was probably written by the Baltimore Whig congressman and novelist John Pendleton Kennedy. Whereas some early Whigs had been hostile to the very idea of political parties, the author began by asserting the necessity of interparty conflict to the preservation of republicanism itself. "We regard the presence, activity, and vigilance of great political parties, in this country, as alike essential to the permanence of liberty and the best security for the virtual and beneficent dominion of constitutional government." So let us "abide by our organization, our principles, our leaders and our name." Since the very "name of WHIG" forcefully indicated "the party of liberty and patriotism and loyalty to constitutional government," "Let us cherish the conviction that whatever good can be hoped for the country, must be accomplished through the agency of the Whig party, in its present form and constitution.''9

By March 1845, if not earlier, therefore, the vast majority of Whigs had determined to persevere as a separate organization. Yet that decision hardly solved all their problems. What could Whigs do in states where Whig principles were not enough to secure control of state governments? How could they contend with the single-idea American Republican and Liberty parties, whose supporters had spurned Whig appeals in 1844 and might continue to do so in future elections? Without those key anti-Democratic voters, how could they possibly overcome the triumphant Democrats, who had gained so many new supporters since 1840? By what routes, in short, could Whigs make a political comeback and recapture the White House?

II

To convince discouraged followers and skeptical new voters that "the Whig party, in its present form and constitution," remained the most effective vehicle for opponents of the Democrats, Whigs had to carry the state and congressional elections in 1845–47. Yet Whigs' ability to achieve these necessary triumphs varied enormously from place to place. Since 1840 the Whigs had apparently fallen into permanent minority status in a number of states. Table 20, which ranks the states according to Clay's share of the popular vote in 1844, lists various indices of Whigs' competitive position vis-à-vis the Democrats and divides the states into three categories: (I) those states Clay carried in 1844 and Whigs normally controlled; (II) states the Whigs lost narrowly in 1844 and were clearly within reach of retaking; and (III) states where Clay lost decisively in 1844, where the margin of the popular vote between Democrats and Whigs had generally exceeded 10 percent since 1840, and where Whig delegations in state legislatures consistently languished in a powerless minority.

Whig prospects of electing governors, congressmen, and United States senators in Alabama, Arkansas, Illinois, Maine, Mississippi, Missouri, and New Hampshire were virtually nil. Texas would join this group of Democratic bastions when it was admitted to statehood in December 1845, for there Whigs bore the crippling stigma of opposing Texas' admission to the Union in the first place. Realistically, Michigan belonged in this category as well. True, Harrison and other Whig candidates had carried it in 1840. Yet, in no state of the Union had the Whigs experienced such catastrophic defeats in state elections after 1840 as in Michigan. And the decreasing share of the popular vote they garnered in the congressional and gubernatorial races of the 1840s effectively precluded a comeback in Michigan unless the party could capture all of the abolitionist vote and win some Democratic converts.

Whigs won only nine of sixty-eight congressional seats filled from this group of states in 1845, 1846, and 1847. Moreover, they refused to contest fourteen of those races, letting the Democrats win by default. Despite small gains in Arkansas, New Hampshire, and Maine in 1846 and 1847, Whigs' record in elections for state legislatures remained equally pathetic. Finally, of fourteen gubernatorial elections held in those states in 1845, 1846, and 1847, the Whigs won just one while failing to run any candidate in two.

Whigs and Democrats alike commented on the bleak Whig position in these states. In 1845, a Mississippi Whig moaned in despair, "We have no hope as a party in this state—you know we are in the Egyptian darkness of Locofocoism," while another complained that the Whigs "are disheartened here and will let everything go by default." Arkansas' tiny Whig minority openly admitted that their only hope lay in a possible division among the dominant Democrats. In Illinois a prominent Whig legislator lamented in early 1845, "I have hardly the faintest hope of this State ever being Whig." By the end of that year he had decided to leave politics for private business since "there is precious little use for any Whig in Illinois to be wasting his time and efforts. The state cannot be redeemed. I should as leave think of seeing one rise from the dead." He was right. The Whigs, who had won a dismal 42 percent of the vote in 1844, did even worse in the congressional and gubernatorial elections of 1846. In virtually all the states in this group, many Whigs did not consider it worth their time and effort even to go to the polls in off-year elections because prospects of victory were so slim. In fifteen such races in Michigan, Alabama, Mississippi, Maine, Illinois, and New Hampshire between 1844 and 1848, Whig turnout on average was 19.4 percent lower than it had been in 1844, while the Democratic vote was only 11.3 percent lower than Polk's total, which, of course, had been considerably higher than Clay's in all those states. A furious Greeley complained of the Whig performance in Maine in 1847, "The indifference of the Whigs has left a full victory to our opponents."

Because of their weakness in state and congressional elections, in short, the only plausible road to recovery for such Whigs was to nominate a military hero for president and hope that his appeal across party lines might extend to other Whig candidates. Thus Whigs from these states would overwhelmingly favor the nomination of General Zachary Taylor or General Winfield Scott in 1848. Even those who, like an Arkansas Whig, "would rather go to Clay than for any man," realized that "with him the chances here would be desperate."

Perhaps the most famous example of a devotee of Clay who quickly jumped on board the Taylor bandwagon is Abraham Lincoln, the only Whig sent to Congress from Illinois in the disastrous election of 1846. Lincoln became an ardent Taylor booster in 1847, as did other Illinois Whigs who publicly endorsed Rough and Ready in the summer of that year. He was well aware that he was the lone Whig congressman from Illinois and that the Whigs had to reach far beyond the ranks of their own voters to have a chance of carrying the state. Only Taylor might win the presidency for the Whigs, Lincoln insisted over and over, and equally important, only Taylor could help other Whig candidates in Illinois. "In Illinois, his being our candidate, would certainly give us an additional member of Congress, if not more, and probably would give us the electoral vote of the state."

In the balloting for presidential nominees at the Whig national convention in June 1848, indeed, delegates from this third group of states would give Taylor and Scott markedly greater support than would Whigs from the first two categories, particularly on the first ballot (Table 22). Where the Whigs were weakest, they did need a popular general to have a fighting chance. Whig leaders, however, never expected to win off-year elections in heavily Democratic states. They looked instead to the states where they were competitive, the states Clay had carried in 1844 and especially the states he had lost narrowly: New York, Pennsylvania, Georgia, Indiana, Louisiana, and Virginia. Those two groups of states, after all, supplied almost four-fifths of the House of Representatives and the Electoral College and three-fifths of the United States Senate. The vast majority of Whigs resided in those states. Here Whigs would make a comeback in off-year elections and score victories in the congressional, gubernatorial, and presidential elections of 1848. Zachary Taylor would not receive a single electoral vote from the non-Whig states in Group III, whose Whigs supported his nomination so enthusias-

III

The top priority for southern Whigs in 1845, a year in which many faced important gubernatorial and congressional elections, was to bury the national issues they believed had hurt them so badly in 1844: the tariff and especially Texas annexation. To do so, they looked to the second session of the Twenty-Eighth Congress, scheduled to meet from December 3, 1844, to March 3, 1845, before Polk was inaugurated. They had known since the previous summer that lameduck President John Tyler, who had failed to secure Senate ratification for his Texas treaty in June, now intended to seek annexation through a joint resolution of Congress that required only a simple majority in both houses. Tyler's new tack appeared more likely to succeed than his previous one. It provided a chance to settle the Texas question once and for all.

Almost as soon as the polls closed in 1844, therefore, southern Whigs frantically urged their congressmen to support annexation in order to kill the Texas issue before the 1845 campaigns began. "The question was in our way last year, it is in our way now, and will be a thorn in our side until it is . . . put to rest in some way," an alarmed Georgian told Senator John M. Berrien. "The Texas question ought to be put out of the way immediately," Leslie Combs warned Delaware's Clayton from Kentucky. "We cannot now sustain ourselves in opposition to it." "If Whigs could be blamed for delaying annexation," a Virginian warned Senator William C. Rives, it "will . . . injure the party in the spring elections." "The Texas question did more to beat us than any other thing," chorused an Alabama Whig to Georgia Representative Alexander H. Stephens. "I think you the Whig leader in Congress had as well dispose of this question at once and Let the Southern Whigs go for annexation immediately if not sooner for we can never come into power until that question is settled. $^{\prime\prime 18}$

These frantic entreaties created a dilemma for southern Whigs in Congress. On the one hand, they recognized that the Texas issue had increased the Democratic vote in the South in 1844, and it might damage southern Whigs again if it was not neutralized. Representatives seeking reelection themselves in the congressional elections of 1845 in Kentucky, Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee, and Alabama, as well as senators whose seats were to be filled by state legislatures chosen that year, had a direct personal stake in eliminating the issue. Beyond considerations of partisan expediency, many of these southern Whigs sincerely believed annexation necessary to protect slavery and the South from the increasingly vehement antislavery and antisouthern attacks emanating from the North. By admitting Texas, argued Tennessee's Whig Congressman Joseph H. Peyton, "The South would acquire a wonderful increase in political power. . . . Can anything be better calculated to check that infernal spirit of abolitionism which is increasing with such fearful rapidity at the North?" 19

Yet other factors militated against acquiescing to annexation in that session. For one thing, northern Whigs continued to oppose annexation and wanted to delay it as long as possible. Texas' admission was certain once Polk took office and Democrats assumed complete control of Congress in December 1845, they assured the Southerners. But they wanted to prevent admission until that date in order to place total responsibility for annexation upon the Democratic party, to prove to Liberty men that the Whig party, including its southern wing, was reliable, and, most important, to keep the Texas issue alive in the northern state and congressional elections scheduled for 1845. Northern Whigs, that is, knew that they, unlike southern Whigs, had benefited enormously from the emergence of the Texas annexation issue in 1844. It had helped bring former Whig voters back to the polls and stunt the growth of the Liberty party. Thus, they tried to exploit it again in the 1845 elections by passing anti-Texas resolutions in northern state legislatures in order to neutralize the appeal of the Liberty party and woo back antislavery voters. As a New Yorker wrote Virginia's Rives, "All we ask is that our Southern Whig Senators will stand firm upon this question till, our opponents having the power, must take the responsibility, of carrying through the measures "20

In addition to a desire to cooperate with northern colleagues, most southern Whig congressmen still hated the very thought of supporting any proposal from the apostate Tyler, especially one that perpetuated the reasons why Tyler's treaty had been repugnant. According to Whigs, that treaty, by calling for the United States to assume the Texas debt, would create an enormous windfall for corrupt speculators in Texas bonds and plunge the nation into war with Mexico. Still more important, many southern Whigs, especially those in the Senate, were convinced that the only way the Constitution permitted the acquisition of foreign territory was through a treaty duly ratified by at least two-thirds of the Senate. In their minds, Whigs who tolerated the attempt to bypass that requirement would abet the subversion of constitutional government, to which the Whig party and they personally were committed. As a perceptive Indiana Whig congressman reported home at the beginning of the session, "The Southern Whigs are in a peculiarly unpleasant situation. They follow the feelings of their people [on Texas annexation] but are not satisfied with the means of doing the thing."²¹

Whipsawed by conflicting pressures of party loyalty, political expediency, regional identity, and principle, southern Whigs in Congress fragmented. Certain that it was impossible to stop passage of annexation in the heavily Democratic House and reluctant to let Democrats get sole credit for it, a group of southern Whigs led by Milton H. Brown of Tennessee moved to present an alternative Whig plan for annexation that would be even more appealing to southern voters than the Tyler measure that Democrats endorsed. In the candid words of one of its backers, Brown's plan was "well calculated to trip the heels of Locofocoism in Tennessee, to prevent them from making capital out of a question that should never have been made a party question." Brown's proposal called for the admission of the entire Republic of Texas as a single slave state rather than as a territory, stipulated that the United States would take responsibility for settling the disputed boundary with Mexico, and provided that Texas would retain both its public lands and the obligation to pay off its debt. More important, it stated that in the future, as many as four additional states could be carved from Texas and that all of those states south of 36°30', the Missouri Compromise line, could enter the Union as slave states if their residents so desired. It was this possibility of gaining as many as ten additional slave state senators from Texas that caused Tennessee's Ioseph Peyton to trumpet the Brown plan as a boon to southern political power. With this bold stroke, he exulted, southern Whigs could eclipse the Democrats' claim of being the better proslavery party. Nor, Peyton made it clear, did he care what passage of the Brown proposal might do to northern Whigs. Each sectional wing of the party would have to look out for itself.²²

Here the potential that the Texas question had always possessed for dividing the Whig party into hostile northern and southern wings appeared to be reaching fruition. Southern Whigs "can never unite with the northern Whigs and do any good," Arthur Campbell exclaimed to his brother. "The northern Whigs are the most cold-hearted—bigoted—selfish & incorrigible people upon earth. . . . They are the abolition party of the U. States. They have no common feelings with us whatever." Similarly, Robert Toombs warned Berrien in February 1845 that southern Whigs would be forced to vote for annexation because "our Northern Whig friends" are "wickedly narrowing it down to a simple question of pro & anti slavery." Once Texas became "purely a sectional question," he feared, its opponents in the South "must need be swept from the political boards." 23

Still, in the House of Representatives, only 8 southern Whigs joined with 112 Democrats to pass the Brown plan over the opposition of 72 Whigs and 26 Democrats. Four of the five Whigs from Tennessee, where Clay had edged Polk by a mere 267 votes, led this pro-Texas band. Joining the Tennesseans were Willoughby Newton, the only one of four Virginia Whig congressmen seeking reelection in 1845; James Dellet, the lone Whig congressman from Alabama; and both Whig representatives from Georgia, Stephens and Duncan L. Clinch. On the other hand, seventeen southern Whigs voted against annexation, including the entire Whig delegations from Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, and North Carolina. Altogether 90 percent of the Whigs opposed 81 percent of the Democrats.

The fight over Texas was still predominantly a partisan battle despite its sectional ramifications.²⁴

Partisan lines held even more firmly in the Senate. Pressure on southern Whigs became enormous once the Brown plan reached that chamber, for the Whigs still had a slight majority. It could pass, in other words, only with Whig support or acquiescence in the form of abstention. Senator Ephraim Foster of Tennessee, whose term was due to expire in March and who was angling for that year's Whig gubernatorial nomination instead, begged his Whig colleagues to back the Brown proposal. Whigs in the Virginia legislature framed and heavily supported resolutions urging the state's two Whig senators, Rives and William S. Archer, to pass the measure. Berrien's correspondents from Georgia assured him that they agreed with his constitutional objections to annexation by joint resolution, but they also warned that "nothing can save the unity perhaps the existence of the Whig party but the passage of the resolutions by the Senate." Nevertheless, Rives, Archer, Berrien, and the vast majority of southern Whigs refused to budge.²⁵

As the session neared adjournment, indeed, it became clear that the Brown plan could not pass the Senate. Not only did all but three or four Whigs oppose it, so did Thomas Hart Benton of Missouri and several Van Buren Democrats from northern states who had voted against Tyler's treaty in June. They wanted the president to negotiate a new treaty with Texas that would admit only the settled area of the huge republic as a slave state and thus open the possibility that some of Texas might be free soil. In the end, only a Democratic amendment giving the president the option of offering Texas admission under the terms of the Brown plan or of negotiating a new treaty brought the dissident Democrats, who clearly expected Polk to exercise the second option, on board. In this new form, the joint resolution passed by the narrow margin of 27–25. Three southern Whigs—John Henderson of Mississippi, who had supported Tyler's treaty in June, Henry Johnson of Louisiana, and William D. Merrick of Maryland—joined twenty-four Democrats in the majority. All of the negative votes came from Whigs, including fourfifths of the Southerners. Even Foster, who had argued so strenuously for the unamended Brown plan, voted nay. Southern Whig votes had provided the margin of victory, but party lines were still sharp. And when the Senate version went back to the House, only one of the eight Whigs who had supported the Brown plan, Dellet of Alabama, voted for it. Six others joined the Whig minority in the negative, and Stephens did not vote. Equally important, all of the Democrats who had opposed the Brown plan now voted for the joint resolution in its new form. Texas' annexation thus passed the House on virtually a strict party-line vote.²⁶

The congressional Whig party thus emerged from the Twenty-Eighth Congress with its unity largely intact and the Texas horror settled. But the action of Congress did not resolve the dilemma of Whigs as they turned their attention to the campaigns of 1845. Northern Whigs had clearly failed to stop annexation, and the crucial vote of a few southern Whigs for it promised to exacerbate northern Whigs' problems with the Liberty party in impending elections. Technically, of course, annexation might still have been delayed if Polk had initiated new negotiations with Texas, as many northern Democrats expected. On his last day in office, however, Tyler offered Texas admission under the terms of the Brown plan, and Polk renewed that offer when he assumed power. By July 1845, Texas formally approved those terms.

Many southern Whigs were delighted by the final resolution of the Texas question, but the form of its enactment denied them the political benefits they had anticipated. Southern Whigs were clearly more divided over annexation than southern Democrats, and the majority of the party had continued to vote against it. To the extent that Texas remained a salient issue in southern elections in 1845, therefore, Whigs were still bound to suffer from it. If they somehow avoided the Texas question, moreover, it was not clear to Whigs in most southern states what other issues they could use in 1845 to effect recovery.

IV

Like most off-year state and congressional elections, those of 1845 have received little, if any, serious attention from historians. More congressional seats were at stake in the South than in the North that year, but the contests in both sections merit intensive examination because of the very real problems faced by the Whig party that they reveal. Much more than the narrow defeat in 1844, indeed, the disarray of, and the truly dismal performance by, Whigs in 1845 make their comeback in 1846 and 1847 seem all the more remarkable.

Of the Whigs in all the slave states, those in Georgia suffered the most serious divisions over the Texas question during 1845, yet they also possessed the best chance of diverting attention from them. Georgia, indeed, provides a textbook example of how the American federal system strengthened political parties in the nineteenth century by allowing them to substitute advantageous state issues for unattractive national issues.

Both of Georgia's Whig congressmen had voted for the Brown plan in the House of Representatives, but Berrien, the only Georgia Whig in the Senate, had steadfastly opposed it. This split reflected genuine disagreement about annexation and a growing generational division among Georgia's Whigs. Ambitious younger men like Stephens, Clinch, and Robert Toombs increasingly resented Berrien, whose prestige and determination to remain in the Senate blocked their own aspirations. From 1845 until the final demise of the Whig party in the 1850s, they would use differences from Berrien on slavery matters to end Berrien's control of the Georgia Whig party. Berrien's friends, in turn, regarded the pro-Texas votes of Stephens and Clinch as demagogical attempts to discredit them for being insufficiently proslavery. Principled differences surely counted, but Texas had become a political football for rival Whig factions, just as it had been for rival Democratic factions in 1844.²⁷

Whigs from both the pro-Berrien and anti-Berrien camps in 1845 particularly worried that Berrien sought reelection to the Senate from the legislature to be chosen in October, along with a new governor. The longer the intraparty feud over Texas lasted and the longer Whig disputes publicized Berrien's record, the greater the chances that the state election would hinge on precisely the national issues most Whigs hoped to bury. As Toombs, the party's state chairman, told Berrien in February, since "Texas was too strong for us when we were united, how hopeless is the contest when we are divided." Even Berrien's most loyal lieutenants recognized that his support for the Tariff of 1842 and his opposition to annexation in 1844 and 1845 could be a severe liability. They hoped "that no allusion will be made in any way to national politics" because they believed "it would be worse than madness even to allude to them." The Whig campaign should "confine itself exclusively to state issues."

To gloss over intraparty divisions on Texas, Georgia's Whigs ran incumbent Governor George W. Crawford for reelection and concentrated their campaign rhetoric exclusively on his popular record on state economic policy. To Berrien's dismay, they also remained absolutely mum about the impending election for senator. In contrast, Democrats tried to make Berrien and national issues, rather than Crawford and state issues, their focal point. Here was a classic example of how rival parties in the nineteenth century jockeyed to center elections on distinctively different issue agendas generated by the division between national and state jurisdictions.²⁹

Perhaps because only state-level offices were directly at stake in Georgia in 1845, the Whig effort at diversion succeeded. Crawford won reelection with 51 percent of the vote, and even though the Whigs lost the state senate, they retained a large enough margin in the lower house to have a majority on the joint ballot. By stressing state issues and ignoring national concerns, the Whigs redeemed a crucial slave state Clay had lost the previous year. Seeing "a Southern state emerging from the abyss of locofocoism," rejoiced one northern Whig, "really galvanized my Whig torpor."

Georgia, however, was the only slave state to ascend from the Loco Foco abyss in 1845. Elsewhere in Dixie the elections that year proved calamitous because the Whigs could not shift attention to state issues. States that Clay had carried toppled into the Democratic deep, and those he had lost sunk even lower into it. In Virginia, for example, where internal regional rivalries prevented a coherent party stand on any state issues, the Whigs unexpectedly lost the state legislative elections in May and, with them, Rives' Senate seat. Equally revealing, they elected just one of Virginia's fifteen congressmen, a net loss of three seats, with even Newton going down to defeat.³¹

Tennessee's Whigs, whose congressional delegation had supported Texas' annexation in 1845 more avidly than that from any other state, fared almost as badly. To capitalize on that pro-Texas record, the Whigs ran Ephraim Foster for governor and made annexation the central issue of the gubernatorial campaign. Democrats correctly chided Foster for talking in favor of annexation but voting against it, while his Democratic opponent, Congressman Aaron V. Brown, had consistently voted for it. Foster lost narrowly, and the Whigs also lost control of the state legislature. Although they retained five of Tennessee's eleven seats in the House of Representatives, moreover, their share of the popular vote in the congressional elections dropped from 53 percent in 1843 to 46.2 percent in 1845.

The trend in other slave states was just as dismal because Whigs lacked issues to mobilize discouraged supporters. North Carolina's Whigs captured only three of nine House seats, and two of those were not contested by the Democrats. Moreover, in the districts that Democrats did contest, the Whig share of the vote dropped from 46.3 percent in 1844 to 42.9 percent in 1845. Kentucky's Whigs gained an additional congressional seat, but their proportion of the statewide vote declined since 1844, a decline reflected by a reduction of their majority in the state legislature. The Whigs' performance in the Alabama and Mississippi elections of 1845 proved to be as pathetic as they expected. Whigs also lost the governorship and control of the state legislature in Louisiana in a special election required by the new state constitution in January 1846, when they garnered a smaller share of the vote than Clay had attracted in 1844. Worst of all was the Whig experience in Maryland, which Clay had carried handily. Controlling all six of the state's congressional seats going into the October election, Whigs lost four of them and saw their share of the vote plummet from 52.4 to 43.3 percent. Despair, apathy, and a lack of viable issues, among other factors, obviously contributed to these reverses. In every southern state except Georgia, the Whig dropoff in voter turnout since 1844 was significantly greater than the Democratic dropoff (Table 23). By early 1846 southern Whigs were clearly in trouble.

V

Greater difficulties plagued northern Whigs in 1845 and early 1846. In contrast to their southern colleagues, they were convinced that they had profited from the tariff and Texas issues in 1844 and could do so again. Greeley asserted in a typical postelection editorial that "We are beaten not because we were in favor of Protection and opposed to Annexation, but because our opponents concealed or mystified these vital issues throughout two-thirds of the Union." The road to Whig victory, Greeley and others concluded, lay in sharply clarifying the differences between the two parties. Such a tactic could revitalize downcast Whigs and might also convert those hoodwinked by Democratic evasions in 1844. Equally important, opposition to annexation might win back antislavery voters who had defected to the Liberty party.

Because the Twenty-Eighth Congress had not altered the Tariff of 1842, defending it remained a secondary weapon in the Whig arsenal in 1845. Texas was a different matter since northern Whigs and Democrats had established such clearly contrasting records on annexation and since virtually all northern Whigs were genuinely appalled by the prospect of another slave state. Even after Tyler and Polk offered Texas annexation in early March, therefore, northern Whigs kept up a steady drumfire against Texas in editorials, party platforms, and legislative resolutions.

Texas had not yet accepted the offer, they argued, and even if it did, Congress could still block its admission as a state if northern opinion were sufficiently aroused. Webster instructed Massachusetts Whigs "to show the People that the question is not yet settled." To foment a public outcry, the Whig-dominated Massachusetts legislature on March 31 published resolutions denying that the joint resolution authorizing Texas' admission was "a legal act" and pledging the commonwealth to use "her utmost exertions in cooperation with other states . . . to annul its conditions, and defeat its accomplishment." In June a corresponding committee of young Whigs circulated a call to Whig and Liberty party leaders throughout the North, urging them to organize nonpartisan public meetings against statehood for Texas. Well into the summer of 1845, Whig candidates and editors in New York, Ohio, and Indiana expressed hope that they could win over Liberty voters and defeat Democrats by highlighting the differences between the parties on annexation. As late as September, two months after Texas formally accepted annexation, Michigan's Whigs denounced it as an "outrage" and an "act of National sin and dishonor." They also condemned "the political ascendancy and rule of the Slave Power" and the "arrogant demands of the Slave States . . . [whose] power is so often put forth in remorseless sectional hostility to our free institutions."

"This table is based on the same returns as Table 21. When congressional and statewide elections were held in the same year, I used the statewide returns to calculate drop-off. On Rhode Island, I again put the Law and Order party in the Whig column and the Liberation party in the Democratic column. A negative drop-off indicates that a party drew more votes in that election than it had in the presidential election of 1844.

So long as the issue remained salient and the hope of stopping statehood seemed plausible, the Whigs clearly benefited. In April, Connecticut's Whigs swept to victory on a protariff, anti-Texas platform, winning the governorship, increasing their majority in the state legislature, and replacing the entire congressional delegation of Democrats, who had supported the joint resolution of annexation, with Whigs.³⁵ After July, however, the prospect of preventing final admission of Texas, given the heavily Democratic Twenty-Ninth Congress, seemed increasingly remote. Continuing a crusade to exclude Texas, therefore, lost its power to rejuvenate discouraged Whig voters, who correctly saw defeat on that issue as virtually certain.

By the summer, further agitation of the issue in states Democrats had carried in 1844 also appeared counterproductive as a means of converting supposedly mystified Democratic voters. From Ohio, New Hampshire, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, and elsewhere in the North the responses to the circular of the Massachusetts anti-Texas committee were uniform on that point. Attempts to organize nonpartisan anti-Texas rallies were doomed, for annexation had become a party question and northern Democratic voters were now determined to achieve statehood for Texas, if only because Whigs continued to oppose it. As an astute Pennsylvanian put it, further opposition to Texas by Whigs and the Liberty party would only increase the pro-Texas fervor of Democrats. "The whole movement would necessarily assume a party aspect, and that alone would ensure its defeat. For if the old parties have one principle of action, more influential than another in deciding their conduct, it is opposition to each other, right or wrong." That shrewd observation testified eloquently to the strength of party loyalty in the North and the inability of even a slavery-related matter like Texas' annexation to disrupt party lines, although it distorts the reasons why many northern Democrats wanted annexation. Most of them desired Texas to expand the realm of America's republican liberty. The observation also underlined the dilemma of Whigs who sought a comeback in states Polk had carried. Prolonged resistance to Texas seemed just as likely to bring angry, proexpansion Democrats to the polls as Whigs.36

Worse, continued agitation of the Texas question threatened to aggravate internal divisions within the Whig party. This was especially the case in Massachusetts, the center of the anti-Texas movement. Massachusetts Whig leaders had long been divided between the followers of Daniel Webster and those of his rivals, like the extraordinarily wealthy textile manufacturer Abbott Lawrence and former Governor John Davis of Worcester. In the early 1840s, just when Lawrence was attempting to crucify Webster for remaining in Tyler's cabinet rather than rallying behind Clay, a third distinctive group of Whigs entered the fray for control of the state party. These were the so-called Young Whigs like Charles Francis Adams, John Gorham Palfrey, Charles Allen, and Stephen C. Phillips, Often scions of old, socially prominent families that had been eclipsed economically and politically by the rising industrial magnates, they resented the monopolization of state and national offices exercised by the older men who led both the Webster and Lawrence factions. Frustrated ambition, however, was hardly Young Whigs' only motivation. They despised slavery as immoral and furiously condemned its westward expansion.

Almost as soon as it emerged, the Texas annexation issue had provided grist for this intraparty feud. In 1844, all Massachusetts Whigs had opposed Texas. But the Lawrence faction had stressed nonsectional reasons for doing so, while the Young Whigs had emphasized the sinfulness of slavery and their abhorrence of its possible extension. They had therefore challenged the leadership credentials of Lawrence and his friends because of their attempt to gloss over the moral aspects of the question. As in Georgia, impatiently ambitious younger Whig politicians emphasized their deeply principled, yet sectionally more extreme convictions about the slavery issue to gain an intraparty advantage. This stress on the immorality of slavery and slaveowning would later earn for the Young Whigs the sobriquet of "Conscience Whigs." In late 1843 and throughout 1844, Webster had taken the lead in the anti-Texas movement in order to win their support in his rivalry with Lawrence, and to Lawrence's dismay, that strategy paid off in January 1845, when the Whig-dominated legislature again elected Webster to the Senate.

Later that month, Lawrence, Davis, and others boycotted an anti-Texas meeting in Boston, largely because Webster had organized it. After March, they grew increasingly annoyed at the efforts of Adams, Allen, and Phillips to perpetuate the anti-Texas movement and openly to cooperate in it with both members of the Liberty party and apolitical abolitionists like the notorious William Lloyd Garrison. Textile manufacturers like Lawrence and Nathan Appleton had willingly fought annexation as long as there was a chance to stop it, but by the summer of 1845 they deemed "farther action upon the subject . . . useless." For one thing, they worried that continued agitation of the issue would only alienate southern Whigs, whose help they would need to defeat Democratic efforts to lower the tariff at the impending session of Congress. To these conservative or "Cotton Whigs," preserving the unity of the national Whig party was more significant than wasting "our energies in hopeless efforts upon the impossible." For another, since they stood at the top of the Whig heap in Massachusetts, they feared attempts to change its composition by adding extreme antislavery men to it. To them the existing Whig party and their own governance of the state through it were just fine. Massachusetts Whigs, they correctly believed, did not need potentially disruptive converts from the Liberty party to carry the state, and their opposition negated Young Whigs' efforts to attract extreme antislavery men. In 1845, the Liberty party garnered just as large a share of the Massachusetts vote as it had in 1844.37

Elsewhere in the North, attempts to lure Liberty voters into the Whig column proved just as divisive and just as futile. In New York, for example, the state's two most prominent Whig editors, Weed and Greeley, promoted revision of the state constitution to abolish the property requirements for black suffrage. Since New York blacks voted overwhelmingly for the Whigs, the party would gain from enfranchising 10.000 additional black voters, but they also saw suffrage reform as a way to court the political abolitionists. As ex-Governor William Henry Seward candidly explained to Gerrit Smith when soliciting the Liberty party's aid, "In this state the obvious interests of the Whig party (to do no violence to their sympathies) lead to efforts for a convention to extend the Right of Suffrage." With equal bluntness, Weed in the Albany Evening Journal warned "the Political Abolitionists, who profess to be the exclusive friends of the people of color," to watch Democrats' certain efforts to block black suffrage. The conservative wing of the Whig party, spearheaded by Greeley's great editorial rival, James Watson Webb of the New York Courier and Enquirer, however, stridently opposed any attempt to revise the constitution or to portray the Whig party as a friend of black suffrage. This public brawling destroyed the attempt to forge a distinctive Whig position on the question, as well as any appeal the Whig party might have for Liberty voters.38

In New York as elsewhere in the North, in sum, efforts to broaden the Whig constituency in 1845 by courting the Liberty party had clearly failed. Indeed, that year the Liberty party's share of the vote increased, largely at Whig expense, in Vermont, New Hampshire, Maine, and Michigan. Whigs' antislavery efforts had only fragmented the party in key states. Whigs would have to look elsewhere for the road to recovery.

Throughout 1845, in fact, many northern Whigs insisted that nativists would be more valuable recruits than abolitionists or blacks. The Whigs' decision in the spring of 1845 to avoid a formal merger with the American Republican or Native American party, as it was called in different places, failed to quell their enthusiasm for the use of nativism as a Whig issue, especially since nativists might continue to siphon off Whig voters if the party did nothing to neutralize their appeal. That threat became apparent shortly after the presidential election. In December 1844, an independent nativist candidate attracted so many votes in Boston's mayoral election that no one received the majority necessary to carry that normally Whig bastion. Nativist parties also wooed Whig defectors in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Pittsburgh, and Cincinnati, and in April 1845, the bulk of New York City's Whigs continued to support the American Republican rather than the Whig mayoral candidate. The menace grew even graver in the summer of 1845, when nativists nominated separate tickets for governor in Massachusetts and Louisiana, for canal commissioner in Pennsylvania, and for the state legislature in New York.³⁹

In the face of this challenge, many Whigs, who themselves considered immigrant voting a threat to republican institutions, contended that the party had to establish its own antiforeign and anti-Catholic credentials. If Whigs could persuade die-hard nativists to support Whig candidates, the party could retake Pennsylvania and New York and widen its margin in other northern and border states. Accordingly, the Whig governors of Maryland and Kentucky asked their legislatures in January 1845 to pass voter registration laws to combat illegal immigrant voting. Webster was convinced that nativism could prove as potent a weapon for Massachusetts Whigs as anti-Texas sentiment, and during the winter of 1844–45 he and other Whigs repeatedly urged Congress to revise the naturalization laws.⁴⁰

This pressure forced the Whig-controlled Senate to make a futile gesture toward nativism during the second session of the Twenty-Eighth Congress, when Texas annexation occupied most attention. Aside from William S. Archer of Virginia, Whig senators had much less enthusiasm for naturalization reform than their angry constituents, if only because they knew they had no chance of getting such a bill past the Democratic House of Representatives. Yet they also recognized the need to appease their supporters' nativist fury, if only symbolically. Thus the Senate Judiciary Committee appointed commissioners to investigate naturalization frauds during the recent presidential election in New York City, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and New Orleans. As if to emphasize the partisan purpose of this inquisition, moreover, they hired a prominent American Republican as one of the investigators in New York. But even before those commissioners reported their findings, the committee's chairman, John M. Berrien, introduced a naturalization reform bill in January 1845.

In essence this would have established an elaborate structure of paperwork, requiring immigrants to report to federal officials and receive certification at frequent intervals from the time they first landed on American shores until the moment they applied for naturalization papers five years later. In short, the purpose of the bill was to make the process of naturalization more difficult and to monitor the movements of immigrant aliens more closely. Significantly, however, it did not require a lengthening of the naturalization period itself, as the nativist parties demanded. No vote was ever taken on Berrien's bill. The best the Whigs could do was, after a strict party-line vote, to secure the publication of 5,000 copies of the final committee report presenting verbatim all the testimony taken in the four port cities that supposedly had documented naturalization fraud.⁴¹

These feeble efforts hardly persuaded nativists to abandon separate political action. They regarded Berrien's bill as woefully inadequate. More important, although some Whigs tried to demonstrate their anti-immigrant pedigree to mollify the nativists, others tried just as hard to prove to immigrants that the party was untainted by nativism. They condemned antiforeign and anti-Catholic bigotry as morally intolerable and politically unwise. Internal strife over nativism, in sum, proved just as bitter as divisions over the proper response to the Liberty party, and, as in the case of the political abolitionists, the rancorous public quarreling destroyed whatever chances the Whigs might have had of absorbing the nativists. For example, while a Whig rally in New Haven, Connecticut, condemned "the illegal foreign votes that are thrown against us," Whig Governor William Ellsworth urged a Whig meeting in Hartford to spurn nativism. While the Whig Boston Courier insisted that the Whig gubernatorial candidate, George N. Briggs, "was heart and soul a Native American" who favored the "entire exclusion from the ballot box . . . of all foreigners," especially Catholics, other Whig newspapermen in Boston insisted that Briggs had "not adopted a single idea of the Natives." that he did not favor extension of the naturalization period to twenty-one years or oppose popery. In New York, the self-described "conservative" Whigs, who opposed constitutional revision and black suffrage, openly sought nativist support by demanding revision of the naturalization laws and condemned Seward. Weed, and Greeley for pampering foreigners and Catholics by opposing Bible reading in public schools. In reply, the "progressive" Weed-Seward-Greeley wing of the party pilloried American Republicans' religious bigotry, blasted naturalization reform as unfair, and declared that New York's Whigs "have definitely taken ground in hostility to the Native movement."42

As a result of these internal divisions, the flight of Whig voters to nativist ranks continued in the fall of 1845. Separate nativist and temperance tickets cost the Whigs John P. Kennedy's congressional seat in Baltimore in October 1845, even though Kennedy himself called for reform of the naturalization laws. The results from Pennsylvania that month were even more calamitous. The Native American candidate for canal commissioner drew 9.6 percent of the vote, the Whigs' share of the statewide total plummeted from 48.5 percent in 1844 to 38.1 percent, and they won less than a third of the seats in the state legislature, their worst showing since 1839. A month later, the nativist gubernatorial candidate in Massachusetts garnered 8 percent of the vote, as large a share as the Liberty candidate, and the Whigs lost their statewide majority. In New York, Whigs gained nothing even as the American Republican vote declined. Chastened by their futility, Whigs in early 1846 renounced any plans to merge with nativists or change the naturalization laws.⁴³

Unable to exploit a compelling national issue by the summer of 1845 and divided over the wisdom of appealing to nativists and political abolitionists, most northern Whigs fell back on state issues. In most places, however, those concerns only fragmented the party still further in 1845 and early 1846. Ohio was an exception. There the party united against Democrats over state banking policies, and Whigs scored impressive gains in the October 1845 legislative elections by defending their recently passed probanking measures. Pennsylvania was more typical. Whigs from the eastern and western ends of the state, like Democrats, were dividing over the rival claims of the Baltimore & Ohio and Pennsylvania railroads for chartered routes to Pittsburgh. This battle would completely disrupt Whig cohesion in the legislative session that began in January 1846. Similarly, Indiana's Whigs split along regional lines over issues like slavery, state internal improvements, and the repudiation of state bonds issued for construction of the Wabash and Erie Canal, and those divisions apparently contributed to the party's defeat in the congressional and legislative elections of August 1845. Indiana's Whigs held such conflicting views on these matters, contended Godlove Orth, that "no one universal policy should be adopted by our party in the next campaign." Instead, "every district, county, & township must carry on the battle without reference to any other portion of the State." In Connecticut, where Whigs had scored sweeping victories in April 1845 on a protariff and anti-Texas platform, they lost the entire state government in 1846 because of internal divisions between "dries" and "wets" over toughened antiliquor laws and between Hartford and New Haven Whigs over a proposed railroad bridge across the Connecticut River at Middletown. So prolonged were those bitter regional divisions over bridging the Connecticut, indeed, that a year later the politically astute wife of New Haven's most prominent Whig moaned, "Sectional feelings overcome party lines ''44

Rhode Island provides yet another example of Whig vulnerability to divisive state issues following the settlement of the Texas question. In 1844, the Whigs had rolled up a higher percentage of the vote in Rhode Island than in any other state, but in the April gubernatorial elections of 1845 and 1846 the Whig coalition virtually disintegrated. Legacies of the Dorr Rebellion, those campaigns were conducted by state-oriented parties called the Law and Order party and the Liberation party, which divided over the question of releasing Thomas Dorr from prison and each of which ran a Whig as its candidate for governor. Whigs fractured so badly that in March 1846 one berated the folly of his party's newspapers for making so much of the law-and-order issue when Whigs needed to unite to reelect Senator James F. Simmons to fight Democratic attempts to lower the tariff. Only by focusing attention on national issues, in short, could the Rhode Island Whig party be saved from its suicidal internal bloodletting.⁴⁵

Another New England election in the spring of 1846 surprisingly provided the only other exception, along with Ohio, to the discouraging Whig performance in northern states in 1845 and early 1846. It was, however, an exception that proved the rule, for Whig success depended on a situation that was unique and so temporary that it did not seem to provide a formula for Whig success elsewhere—at least initially. In 1845 and again in 1846, the New Hampshire Democratic party ruptured over the slavery issue when the party's state chairman, future President Franklin Pierce, tried to purge antislavery Democratic Congressman John P. Hale from the party because he had voted against the joint resolution for Texas annexation. Out-of-state Whig leaders like Webster encouraged Granite State Whigs to exploit this rift by forging a coalition with the Liberty party and dissident Hale Democrats in the legislative elections of March 1846. That coalition, known as the New Hampshire Alliance, carried the legislature and quickly seized the opportunity to bargain for other offices as well.

Like most New England states, New Hampshire required an absolute majority rather than a plurality to secure election. Because none of the three gubernatorial candidates had received the necessary majority, the Alliance in the legislature had the chance to select the winner and to dispose of a United States Senate seat as well. In return for sending Hale to the Senate, it picked Anthony Colby, the Whig candidate, as governor, the first and only Whig governor ever to serve in that Democratic stronghold. Whigs everywhere rejoiced at this unanticipated triumph, but the real strength of the Whig party in New Hampshire was reflected in the 32 percent of the popular vote Colby had won in March. In 1847, when turnout was substantially higher than in 1846 or even in the presidential election of 1844 because of determined Democratic efforts to retake the state, the Whigs received only 35 percent of the statewide vote. As Greeley glumly concluded, the result demonstrated that New Hampshire was solidly Democratic. The apparent Whig success in 1846 had been a fluke.⁴⁶

By the spring of 1846, in sum, northern Whigs, like their southern colleagues, had made a series of false starts. Routes that seemed like shortcuts to power turned out to be blind alleys. In the few states they had carried, they had either exploited ephemeral issues or suffered serious erosion of their voting support. They had failed to come back in the key states of New York, Pennsylvania, and Indiana and seemed in danger in former strongholds like Rhode Island, Connecticut, Vermont, Massachusetts, and Maryland. To pull back apathetic and defecting voters and to overcome the growing Democratic lead, Whigs clearly had to look elsewhere for gripping issues. An indication of where most would look came from a discouraged Indiana Whig in January 1846. Pessimistic about winning the state's impending gubernatorial campaign on state issues that divided the party internally, he wistfully yet accurately predicted, "Congress may kick up some deviltry out of which we can make something to put in our pipes."

VI

Since the Whig party's birth in the winter of 1833–34, its vitality had never depended exclusively on Whigs' initiative or actions or even on economic conditions. Instead, its fate had always been determined primarily by its relationship with its Democratic opponent. The most effective force to counteract the disruptive impulses that had emerged in 1845, therefore, had always been interparty conflict with the Democrats. That conflict could be provoked by Democrats just as easily as by Whigs. Modern research indicates that negative voting against an incumbent party is a more powerful and pervasive political phenomenon than positive voting by those who approve its record, and Whigs, too, had usually benefited more from opposing Democratic policies than from defending their own proposals.⁴⁸ Largely unable to define viable issues on their own in 1845, Whigs were rescued by the vigorous determination of Democrats in Washington to enact their own program. The actions of the Polk administration and the Democratic majority in Congress during 1846 and 1847 would reverse the slide that Whigs had experienced in 1845, revitalize the Whig electorate, and spark a dramatic recovery in the midterm congressional and state elections.

Months before the Twenty-Ninth Congress assembled in December 1845, Whigs knew that Democrats would have the power to pass any legislation they wanted, and they regularly predicted the dire consequences of the Democratic program. Whig spokesmen genuinely believed that Democratic policies would bring ruin to the country, yet they also realized that the worst policies for the nation could provide the best Whig platform against Democrats. As the Whig minority in Congress saw it, then, they had a choice between what was best for their country and what was best for their party, a choice of attempting to modify Democratic legislation as much as possible to mitigate its negative results or of letting the Democrats have their way and suffer certain repudiation at the polls. The question, as Whigs most frequently put it, was whether to save the Democrats from their own folly. The Whigs' response to different Democratic policies varied between these alternatives, but consistently throughout the two terms of the Twenty-Ninth Congress, they attempted to highlight the differences between the parties and to stake out a position that would afford them maximum political advantage.

Whigs displayed the most caution on foreign policy. Even though the admission of Texas was assured by December 1845, Polk and most congressional Democrats wanted to keep alive the issue of territorial expansion, from which they believed they had benefited in 1844. Hence, in his inaugural address of March 1845 and again in his annual message to Congress in December 1845, Polk called on the United States to take title to the entire Oregon country north to 54°40', the southern boundary of Alaska, by giving England formal notice that the joint occupation of Oregon by both nations that had existed since 1818 would be terminated. Between those messages, in August 1845, John L. O'Sullivan, editor of the Democratic Review, permanently grafted expansionism to the Democratic platform by coining the phrase "Manifest Destiny" to justify the nation's territorial designs.

Polk's proposal initially divided congressional Whigs. Opposed in principle to territorial expansion and adverse to any initiative of the Democratic president, some Whigs refused to vote for the joint resolution notifying England that joint occupation would be ended. Other Whigs regarded such adamant opposition as suicidal. Fearing that the party would be saddled with the stigma of appearing pro-British and unpatriotic, and that Polk was only posturing in order to keep the Oregon question alive until the 1848 presidential election, they wanted to resolve it as quickly as possible. Thus, when the House of Representatives passed the notice to England in January 1846, the Whig delegation was almost evenly divided pro and con.

What allowed Whigs finally to assume a coherent partisan stance on Oregon was the action of Senate Democrats. When bellicose midwestern Democrats in that body raised the cry of "Fifty-four-Forty or Fight" and demanded military preparations to take all of Oregon from Great Britain by force, Senate Whigs urged negotiation or arbitration of the dispute instead, and Whigs across the country railed against Democrats' belligerent recklessness and the dangers of war for Oregon. On Oregon, that is, Whigs posed as propeace rather than antiexpansion. When Polk negotiated and secured ratification in June 1846 of a treaty establishing the northern boundary of Oregon at the forty-ninth parallel, as he had apparently planned all along, relieved midwestern Whigs shifted position and charged Polk with betrayal.⁴⁹

Polk also coveted California, and his efforts to acquire it one way or another from Mexico eventually prompted the outbreak of war with that nation in May 1846, a war Whigs had warned would inevitably follow the annexation of Texas and a war that grew increasingly unpopular as it dragged on until the spring of 1848. Whigs in Congress and throughout the nation castigated Polk's original dispatch of troops under the command of Zachary Taylor to the Rio Grande River as an unwarranted provocation that started the conflict and an unconstitutional usurpation of Congress' power to declare war. When the Democrats in both houses of Congress attached a preamble declaring that Mexico started the war to the initial bills to raise troops and supplies, however, Whigs confronted a dilemma. Knowing the fate of the Federalists for opposing the War of 1812, most were convinced that they had to provide the men and materiel to pursue the war to a successful conclusion. Yet they considered the Democratic assertion of Mexican responsibility for the war a flagrantly spurious attempt to exonerate Polk of culpability. In the end, only fourteen of seventy-seven Whigs in the House and two of twenty-four in the Senate voted against the initial appropriations, which in effect constituted Congress' declaration, or at least recognition, of war with Mexico. This division had a lingering disruptive impact on the party, especially in Massachusetts, where Conscience Whigs exploited Boston Representative Robert C. Winthrop's affirmative vote to attack the Cotton Whigs.⁵⁰

Despite these internal divisions, and despite the willingness of most Whig congressmen to join the Democrats in voting for men and supplies for the army, the Whigs had no difficulty establishing a coherent and distinctive party position on the war. On most roll-call votes in Congress and in state legislatures regarding the war, the rival parties were sharply polarized against each other. For two years, Whigs inside and outside of Congress condemned the war as an immoral aggression to steal territory from a weaker neighbor. They vilified Polk's management of it as grossly partisan and corrupt, especially his treatment of the Whig Generals Taylor and Scott and his attempt to supersede them with Democratic commanders, and they denounced the prospect of a territorial indemnity from it as dangerous to North and South alike. The longer the war lasted, the more vehemently Whigs lambasted the Democrats' insistence on the rape of Mexican territory as the chief obstacle to peace. It was perfectly clear who the prowar and antiwar parties were, and agitation of antiwar sentiment became an increasingly powerful weapon in the Whig arsenal.⁵¹

While Whig denunciations of the Mexican War became more strident the longer hostilities continued, in 1846 Whigs focused their fire primarily on Democrats' domestic legislation. Here their choice between what they regarded as the best interests of the country versus those of the party was more clear-cut and their decision more cynical. At Polk's command, the Democratic Congress enacted three important economic measures in the summer of 1846 that together marked a frontal assault on the Whig economic program: the Independent Treasury Act, which removed government revenues from private banks and required the government to deal exclusively in specie; the Walker Tariff, which lowered rates on most manufactured goods, raised rates on a number of raw materials imported by American manufacturers, and substituted ad valorem for specific duties; and the Public Warehouse Act, which in effect gave government credit to importers and foreign manufacturers by allowing them to deposit imports in government warehouses for up to a year before paying customs duties rather than paying the tariff immediately upon the arrival of the goods. To compound matters, midwestern Democrats defied Polk's wishes and combined with the Whig minority to pass a massive rivers and harbors improvement bill, which Polk vetoed. The veto offended the intended recipients of government aid in New York, Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, Georgia, and along both banks of the Ohio River.⁵²

All of these actions presented the Whigs with something they could put in their war pipes. For one thing, Polk's active intervention in the legislative process, like his policies toward Oregon and Mexico, revived the Whigs' cardinal principle of opposition to executive tyranny. More important, they seemed to confirm the prediction that Greeley and others had been making since the election of 1844: that Democratic ascendancy meant economic disaster for the country. Clay himself had confidently forecast at the end of 1844 that "errors" by the Polk administration would generate "abundant cause of public dissatisfaction." Yet, like Clay, most Whigs were prepared to let the Democrats have their way with the tariff and subtreasury because the inevitable depression would spark a Whig comeback. With regard to the Democrats' economic policy, that is, the Whigs attempted to kill not the legislation itself, but rather any attempts to dilute, soften, or delay its impact on the country at large. By their own admission, they chose what was good for the party over what they regarded as good for the country. Only painful experience with Democratic measures, they contended, would turn the electorate permanently against the Democratic party.53

Whigs had long maintained that the Independent Treasury system would irreparably harm the economy by draining the banks' specie reserves, undermining public faith in bank notes, and choking commercial credit. In April 1846, after the bill had passed the House, they gleefully pointed to the tightening of credit by bankers as the inevitably disastrous response. Yet when Senate Democrats seemed ready to delay implementation of the bill to ease credit, Whig writers urged congressional Whigs not to let Democrats off the hook. As one Whig urged in the May 1846 issue of The American Review, "Let the specie exaction take full effect at once, and the country will not endorse it beyond the term of the present Congress. Will it be wise in the Whigs of the Senate to aid in giving it a shape calculated to purchase a little present relaxation in the money market?" Similarly, in August, when the Democratic leadership in the House made a last-ditch attempt to amend the bill to delay the implementation of its specie clause from January 1 until April 1, 1847, Whigs voted almost unanimously to help kill the amendment, and Greeley in the Tribune fulsomely praised them for their action.⁵⁴ Clearly, Whigs were more concerned with the political than the economic results of Democratic legislation.

Whig opportunism was even more blatant regarding the tariff. Many Whigs, especially manufacturers, genuinely feared the economic consequences of tariff reduction, which would increase competition from foreign goods and, by increasing gold shipments abroad to pay for them, aggravate the pressure on the currency and the credit supply. Consequently, they wanted congressional Whigs to fight to the last to preserve the Tariff of 1842, which virtually all Whigs credited with ending the prolonged depression between 1839 and 1843. The desire to win southern Whig support for that law, for example, was a chief reason why Abbott Lawrence and Nathan Appleton had opposed the anti-Texas movement of the Young Whigs in Massachusetts in the fall of 1845 and why Lawrence distributed protariff arguments to Whig congressmen early in 1846.⁵⁵

Other Whigs, however, preferred to let the Democrats suffer the voters' reaction against the anticipated depression that tariff reduction supposedly would induce. Such men urged congressional Whigs not to stop Democratic efforts; let them "take the responsibility and the consequences." It is also revealing that many Whig attacks on the impending Democratic measure concerned its hypocrisy, as well as its potential for economic harm. Secretary of the Treasury Robert J. Walker's voluminous report to Congress in December 1845 defending tariff reduction, they pointed out, was based forthrightly on free trade principles, but his proposed bill provided some protection for politically sensitive items like iron, while the McKay bill reported by the House Ways and Means Committee called for even higher levels of protection. Democrats, Whigs jeered, lacked the courage of their own stated convictions.⁵⁶

Although these Whigs would have preferred an even lower tariff to pillory, they regarded the Walker-McKay bill or "The Tariff Reduction and Labor Destruction Bill," as Greeley called it, as sufficiently horrendous to provide Whigs excellent ammunition for the impending congressional and state campaigns in 1846. By June, as the Walker bill progressed through the House, Georgia's Whigs anticipated the final law "with the eagerness of hyenas and jackals waiting only for the final onslaught to be over to rush on to the work of mutilation," while Pennsylvania and New York Whigs salivated at a measure that would doom Democrats in the ensuing elections.⁵⁷

Lest they lose such a potent issue at the last moment, Whigs resisted attempts to alter the bill in the Senate, which was more closely divided than the House and contained a number of protariff Democrats. Businessmen beseeched Whig senators to modify the McKay bill to offer them more protection. Webster, after extensive consultation with northeastern manufacturers and mine owners, prepared a compromise amendment to the Democratic bill, one that would lower rates more gradually and preserve the specific duties businessmen cherished. He was confident that he could garner the votes to adopt the substitute in the Senate and kill the whole bill when it returned to the House. Webster, however, had not reckoned on the determination of Whig politicians to construct a winning platform even at the expense of their constituents' economic interests. When Greeley and his Washington correspondent, "Richelieu," learned of Webster's proposal, for example, they urged Senate Whigs to spurn it: "Stand strongly for the Right. Let them work their will on the Country.... Let Polk & Co. break down the Tariff if they can, and let us go to the People once upon a distinct issue of Protection against Free Trade."58

In the end, Webster never introduced his amendment because other Whigs would not go along. They wanted the Walker tariff passed, regardless of businessmen's pleas. The worst tariff possible would make the best platform possible. The Whigs, Webster lamented, "wished the administration to make its own Bill and to make it as bad as it pleased." Similarly, a bitter manufacturer concluded with perfect accuracy that Whig politicians were "striving to make political capital to overthrow the present administration at whatever cost to the country." 59

Once the Democratic program passed Congress, Whigs, exulting that "it is an ill wind that blows no one any good," predicted that they would sweep the 1846 congressional elections and win the White House in 1848 by attacking Democrats' economic package. As William Bebb, Ohio's Whig gubernatorial candidate for 1846, rejoiced, "If the repeal of the Tariff, the passage of the Sub Treasury, the veto of the river and harbor bill and other measures of this administration added to our state issues fail to 'stir up the very stones to meeting' we may as well hang our harps on the willows." "If we have not misread the signs of the times," summarized a jubilant Whig in the September issue of The American Review, "the tariff of 1846 will precipitate the ruin of its contrivers and hasten the day of our National redemption."

To take maximum advantage of the issues that Democrats had handed them. Whigs made an unprecedented effort in 1846 to provide centralized direction and assistance to the midterm congressional campaigns. Like its Democratic counterpart, the Whig party was a decentralized organization, with no permanent national committee or clear lines of authority from the center to the periphery. Rather, it was essentially a federation or alliance of largely autonomous state organizations that were, in turn, alliances of largely autonomous county and local organizations. Common commitment to the party's principles and common devotion to its victory, rather than a hierarchical model of command and obedience, characterized its operations. Every four years in presidential elections, a semblance of national coordination appeared as Whigs came together in a national convention to nominate the presidential ticket and as a national committee, appointed temporarily for that campaign, dispatched information, money, and speakers to different states and localities to rally support for the standard bearer. Customarily, however, local candidates and organizations were left to their own devices in terms of raising money and defining issues in gubernatorial and congressional campaigns, although out-of-state speakers had occasionally been imported to help gubernatorial and congressional candidates.⁶¹

In 1846, Whigs considered this normal practice inadequate. They regarded the Democratic measures passed in 1846 as so heinous that national Whig leaders had to orchestrate the various local congressional campaigns in order to take control of Congress from the Democrats. As one furious Whig wrote Webster after the Walker Tariff passed, "I trust you will not leave Washington without a general concert among all the opponents of such destructive measures, in a plan of action for the next election of Representatives." The man who led the effort to coordinate Whig campaigns in 1846, however, was not Webster, but Connecticut's Truman Smith, then serving his third term in the House. Smith lacked the commanding physical presence and oratorical skills of Webster and the legislative talents of Winthrop, Alexander Stephens, Clay, or Crittenden. Yet along with Seward and Weed of New York, Smith was perhaps the party's shrewdest political strategist and manager. He was, moreover, absolutely without peer in terms of looking beyond the parochial concerns of his own district and state to the needs of Whigs as a national organization. Truman Smith, in short, was and would remain until he retired in 1854 the Whigs' closest equivalent to a modern national party chairman. $^{62}\,$

As soon as Congress adjourned on August 8, 1846, Smith traveled to Boston and then back to Washington again via New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore in order to raise money for the Whig campaign from outraged manufacturers and businessmen. From Washington and then from his home in the beautiful town of Litchfield, Connecticut, he corresponded with other members of the campaign committee such as Thomas Butler King of Savannah, Georgia, and Senator John Davis of Worcester, Massachusetts, keeping them abreast of developments. Smith hoped to raise $7,500, a not inconsiderable sum for that day, but fell short of his goal. He spent the funds at his command, apparently some $5,500, in two ways.

First, as he had intended since April, he had thousands of copies of Whig speeches against the Democratic measures printed in Washington at a cost of $2,300. Smith had hoped to send these around the country free of charge using the franking privilege of Whig congressmen, but upon arriving back in Washington on September 15, he learned to his dismay that federal law prohibited any congressman from franking documents more than thirty days after the expiration of a congressional session. Thus, only 50,000 documents were distributed in this fashion under the frank of Congressman Alexander Ramsey of Pennsylvania, a member of Smith's campaign committee, who had remained in Washington since August 8, monotonously franking documents. Smith had to box and mail, at the committee's expense, an additional 120,000 documents to other districts.

This stupendous, unprecedented effort to distribute campaign literature in an off-year election demonstrated the conviction of Whig leaders that voters paid close attention to concrete issues. The speeches of congressional Whigs against the new tariff, the Independent Treasury, and the Public Warehouse Act were almost uniformly lengthy, intricately argued, minutely detailed, and teeming with facts, figures, and arcane data on federal revenues, price levels, specie flows into and out of the country, and wage levels in different industries. They were, in sum, difficult and often tediously dull. In 1846, clearly, Whigs believed they could win with closely reasoned arguments addressed to specific issues and that they needed neither slogans, nor songs, nor the glamour of military heroes as their candidates.

Over half of the money Smith raised was devoted to party-building activities in new states, an effort that reflected Smith's solicitude for the good of the national Whig party, especially the congressional Whig party, as a whole. Whigs were outraged that the two new Democratic senators from Texas had provided the narrow margin for victory when the Walker Tariff passed the Senate in late July. Smith therefore sought to offset that additional Democratic strength by building up Whig organizations in federal territories that appeared on the brink of applying for statehood so that the new congressmen they sent to Washington would be Whigs. In 1846, Smith sent some funds to the incipient Whig party in Wisconsin Territory, but his priority that year was Iowa, which had been authorized by Congress to choose a new state government and congressmen in elections scheduled for late October. In September, Smith dispatched J. H. Clay Mudd from Washington to Iowa and gave him $3,000 of the $3,100 then in his possession to buy newspapers, print ballots and campaign literature, and finance

Whig speakers in the Iowa campaign. His goal was to capture the new state legislature and thus send to Congress in December two Whig senators from the nation's newest state.⁶³

Despite Mudd's optimistic reports to Smith, the Whigs failed to carry the Iowa elections, but elsewhere in 1846 they scored truly sweeping gains. They picked up fourteen additional House seats in New York, one in New Jersey, five in Pennsylvania, three in Ohio, and one in Georgia, and they held all their seats in other northern states, including the entire Massachusetts delegation. Altogether Whigs won 53.6 percent of the congressional seats contested that year, a dramatic improvement over their performance in 1844 and 1845. They also won gubernatorial races in New York, Ohio, North Carolina, and Massachusetts, where they did much better than in 1845. Although they narrowly lost the election for governor in Indiana in August, they won control of the state legislature. In contrast to the elections held earlier in the year before Democrats in Congress had acted, indeed, the Whigs ran impressively in most state legislative contests after August, especially in Maine, Maryland, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and New York. More important for the future, Whigs won a larger proportion of the vote in the fall elections of 1846 than they had in the presidential election of 1844 in every state except Delaware, Georgia, and Ohio and Vermont, two states where the Liberty party still cut into their ranks. Although voter turnout in no state was as large as it had been in 1844, it was uniformly larger than in 1845, and the Whigs had obviously won the lion's share of those returning voters. Reaction against the Democratic program had brought previously demoralized Whigs back to the polls.64

Perceptive Whigs, nonetheless, might have found cause for concern even in the midst of this genuinely impressive performance. Attacks on the Polk record did not give the Whigs firm control of the crucial states they would need to carry the presidency in 1848, that is, those states they had lost narrowly in 1844. In Georgia, for example, reapportionment of the congressional districts by the Whig legislature was probably more responsible for the Whigs' success in carrying four of eight seats than the Walker Tariff. The Whigs won only 47 percent of the popular vote in contrast to Crawford's 51 percent the previous year. 65 Pennsylvania's Whigs won the statewide election for canal commissioner in 1846, but with less than a majority of the vote. The Native American candidate still drew 7.5 percent, and Democrats, who had pledged their party in 1844 to a defense of the Tariff of 1842, suffered a significantly larger drop-off than the Whigs as betrayed Democratic voters stayed home on election day. Manifestly, Pennsylvania's Whigs were still vulnerable to a full Democratic turnout if Democratic leaders could induce it. Even in New York, where Whigs scored their biggest gains, they depended in 1846 on more than their opposition to the Democratic record in Congress.

During the off-year elections of 1845, 1846, and 1847, every state in the nation had special peculiarities that influenced the precise shape of political developments within it. In no state, however, were conditions as complex as in New York.

Though unusual in that respect, New York still provides a marvelous microcosm of the trial-and-error method by which Whigs in all states searched for a winning strategy between 1844 and 1848. Whig efforts there in 1846, therefore, merit detailed examination.

Divided into self-styled "progressive" and "conservative" wings, New York's Whig leaders quarreled vehemently about the proper course for recapturing the state. In 1845, the majority who followed Weed, Seward, and Greeley wanted to spurn nativism in order to attract immigrants. They also courted Liberty men and blacks by pushing for a broadening of black suffrage and opposing Texas' annexation on antislavery grounds. The smaller conservative wing, located primarily in the lower Hudson Valley and New York City and represented by papers like the Express and the Courier & Enquirer, denounced the majority's Southbashing tactics and argued that the party instead should embrace nativism.⁶⁶

But for most of 1846 and especially prior to the passage of the Democratic economic legislation in July and August, which all Whigs opposed, strategic maneuvering for new voters and intraparty strife focused on two state issues. The first concerned revision of the state constitution, which New York's electorate endorsed overwhelmingly in a referendum that scheduled the election of delegates to a state constitutional convention in late April. The convention itself was slated to begin meeting in June.

Conservative Whigs like James Watson Webb and James and Erastus Brooks openly opposed constitutional revision in their newspapers on the grounds that any change was inimical to conservatism, although they also castigated specific revisions pushed by reformers. Among the most enthusiastic of those constitutional reformers were Weed, Greeley, and Seward and their followers in the party's majority wing, who saw a number of advantages in promoting revision.

First, some of the specific changes they advocated, like stripping the governor of most of his patronage powers, substituting single-member assembly districts for countywide general tickets, and replacing the eight huge state senate districts with thirty-two single-member districts, stood to benefit the Whig party. They would reduce the appointments available to the incumbent Democratic administration and increase Whig representation in the state legislature by giving a voice to Whig enclaves trapped in Democratic strongholds.

Second, in early 1846, constitutional revision seemed the best way to add antislavery, black, and immigrant voters to Whig ranks. Both Greeley and Weed pressed for a provision in the new constitution removing the freehold property requirement from black voters, as did a few upstate Whig county conventions controlled by the Sewardites. Weed went even further than Greeley. In the columns of his Albany Evening Journal, he advocated suffrage rights for immigrant aliens before they became naturalized citizens, a measure he publicly defended as the best way to stop illegal naturalization but that he also obviously intended as an effort to outbid Democrats for the immigrant vote.

Third, the dominant Whig faction considered reform good politics since it could erase the conservative image so assiduously cultivated by their intraparty rivals and challenge the Democrats' reputation as the party of the people. Indeed, because Van Burenite or Barnburner Democrats supported and Hunker Democrats opposed constitutional revision, Whig leaders saw agitation of constitutional reform as a way further to divide and thus weaken their Democratic foe.⁶⁷

By the early summer of 1846, before Congress had passed Democratic economic legislation, the dominant Whig leadership realized they must change tack. Democrats, most of whom were Barnburners, won control of the constitutional convention, and while some Whig reforms, like reduction of gubernatorial patronage, would probably pass, the new constitution would be no Whig document. Democratic control also doomed expanded black suffrage and alien suffrage, nullifying Whigs' bid to the beneficiaries of those reforms. Weed and Seward, with Greeley's reluctant acquiescence, therefore, jettisoned the strategy aimed at antislavery, black, and immigrant voters for a new one.⁶⁸

Sewardite Whigs now sought to exploit Democratic divisions. They recognized that the Hunkers and Barnburners were deeply split over provisions of the new constitution and over control of the state Democratic machine. They had previously cooperated with the Barnburners to call the constitutional convention in the first place, but once the convention met, they turned to the Hunkers for aid. Barnburners wanted to insert into the state's fundamental charter economic provisions prohibiting state aid to internal improvements, blocking completion of the state's canal system, inhibiting the incorporation of businesses, and imposing unlimited individual liability on stockholders. The Hunkers, in contrast, like the Whigs, had always been more favorable to business interests and especially completion of the canal system than the Barnburners.

Before the convention met in June, the Albany Argus, the chief Hunker organ in the state, announced a series of revisions Hunkers could support that were roughly congruent with Whig proposals. More important, on roll-call votes in the convention itself, Hunkers often aligned with the Whigs to moderate the Burnburners' economic proposals and bring them more in line with Whig thinking. Until the convention closed, therefore, it made eminent sense for the Whigs to cooperate with the Hunkers.⁶⁹

More important for the impending gubernatorial election, during the summer the Hunkers privately informed Sewardite Whig leaders that if Whigs chose an acceptable gubernatorial candidate, Hunkers would sit out the fall election and allow the Whigs to win. With Barnburners out of power and stripped of state patronage, Hunkers believed, their chances of controlling the state party machinery would be enhanced. Here was an offer Whigs could not refuse.⁷⁰

Exploiting Democratic divisions thus seemed the clearest road to recovery to Sewardite Whig leaders. Even after the Walker Tariff passed Congress, for example, Seward wrote one of his lieutenants that New York's Whigs could not count on the tariff issue for victory in 1846 because they could never mobilize the full Whig vote in nonpresidential elections. The Whigs' chief hope, he asserted, "arises out of the feud in our enemy's ranks." New York's Whigs, like Whigs elsewhere, were dependent upon their relationship with the Democrats, in other words, but in the Empire State the Democrats' national policies seemed less vulnerable than their internal divisions.

Simultaneously, the prospect of running against Barnburner Silas Wright's record as governor opened up the possibility of securing a bloc of new voters other than blacks, Liberty party members, or immigrants. Wright was anathema to the Anti-Rent movement, the second purely state issue upon which political attention and intraparty squabbling had focused in the first half of 1846. Spread across some fifteen upstate counties but centered in Rensselaer, Albany, Columbia, Scholarie, and Delaware Counties, the turbulent Anti-Rent movement erupted from the grievances of farmers living on lands once belonging to the colonial manors or patroonships in that area. In some counties, these farmers had longterm leases running for two or three generations of the renter's family, after which the land had to be returned to the proprietor. In others, in return for feesimple titles to farms, these families or their ancestors had contracted to pay in perpetuity to owners of the estates and their descendants annual payments that the farmers called "rents" but that in reality were lifelong mortgage interest payments on the purchase price of the land, the principal of which was never collected. Technically, the farmers were not tenants or renters since they, and not the original proprietors of the estates, owned the land and paid taxes on it. What the proprietors owned were legally guaranteed contracts obliging the farmers to pay them an annual sum and granting them other privileges, such as the right to sell the farmer's personal property without court trial if the farmer failed to pay rent and to collect one-fourth of the selling price if the farmer sold the property to another man.

Denouncing the system as feudal and unrepublican, increasing numbers of these farmers, beginning in 1839, refused to pay their rents, and they used armed force to prevent public officials from collecting them. In the summer of 1845, a deputy sheriff was killed by a mob of armed farmers in Delaware County, causing Democratic Governor Wright to declare the entire county in a state of insurrection, to have scores of Anti-Renters arrested and imprisoned, to refuse to grant clemency to the men convicted of the official's murder, and to tell the legislature to provide no redress for the Anti-Renters' grievances until farmers everywhere laid down their weapons. In response, the Anti-Renters organized successful state legislative tickets in several counties in the fall of 1845, and in 1846 Anti-Renters across the state flooded the legislature with demands to free the prisoners and to abolish the inequities of the system. Those demands became the hottest issue of the legislative session.⁷²

Even more than black suffrage, nativism, and constitutional reform, the Anti-Rent issue divided progressive and conservative Whigs. To the latter the issue was one of law and order, the obligation of contracts, and the rights of property. Accession to Anti-Renter demands, one warned, would lead "to the utter overthrow of all social order, and the ruin of the whole social fabric." In contrast, the Seward-Weed-Greeley wing of the party regarded the rent arrangements as blatantly oppressive and unrepublican restrictions on economic freedom. But they were also mesmerized by the potential voting strength of the Anti-Renters, many of whom had customarily supported Democrats, especially since that vote could so easily be turned against Wright and the Democrats. Over the howls of his conservative editorial rivals, therefore, Greeley ardently championed the cause of the Anti-Renters in the columns of the Tribune, which circulated widely in upstate counties and had more influence on Whigs there than in New York City itself. He lavishly praised Whig legislators like Ira Harris of Albany and John Young of Livingston County for leading the fight on behalf of the Anti-Renters' agenda, studiously ignored votes by conservative Whig legislators against that agenda, and falsely blamed Democrats for killing those measures.⁷³

By the fall, the factional dispute boiled down to the identity of the Whig gubernatorial nominee to be chosen by a September state convention. Led by Webb, conservatives threatened to bolt the party if the nominee advocated Anti-Rentism, and they strenuously sought the nomination of Millard Fillmore, the unsuccessful Whig candidate in 1844, who had no ties to the Anti-Rent movement. As author of the Tariff of 1842, Fillmore, conservatives insisted, would be a perfect candidate in a campaign in which the tariff would be a major issue. Sewardite Whigs, on the other hand, wanted to exploit Anti-Renters' anger before it subsided, and they knew that Fillmore could never draw their support. Nor was Fillmore the kind of candidate Hunker Democrats could tolerate; instead, Hunkers would be determined to defeat such a prominent Whig partisan. Because Sewardites wanted to lure Anti-Renters and keep Hunkers at home, they wanted a more palatable candidate.

Instead of throwing their support to Ira Harris, the favorite of the avowed Anti-Renters at the state convention, they backed John Young, who won the nomination. Young was not a member of the tightly knit Seward-Weed clique within the Whig party, and they would eventually rue his selection. But in 1846, Young had the credentials they were looking for. Anti-Renters applauded his votes in the 1846 legislative session, and Hunkers accepted him. To soothe infuriated conservative Whigs and balance the ticket, they then nominated Hamilton Fish, a patrician from Manhattan who was regarded as a foe of Anti-Rentism, for lieutenant governor. Referring to the necessity of juggling the demands of Whigs, Hunkers, and Anti-Renters, Seward concluded, "Our ticket is formed so as neither to offend nor cement any one of three interests, either of which fully secured would give us success."

Although New York Whigs' strategy for defeating the Democrats in 1846 concentrated on internal state affairs, they hardly neglected the national issues that were so prominent in Whig campaigns elsewhere. In addition to lambasting the state's Democrats for stopping canal construction, the address of the Whig state convention and resolutions of different Whig county conventions mainly flayed the Walker Tariff, the Independent Treasury Act, and the Mexican War. Yet the dominant Sewardite Whig leaders obviously regarded divisions within the state Democratic party and the unique Anti-Rent movement as the key to the campaign. Despite the Whig gains in congressional races, indeed, Young was the only candidate on the Whig state ticket to win because only he benefited from Hunker Democratic abstentions and additional Anti-Rent votes. Publicly in the columns of the Tribune Greeley trumpeted the results in New York and elsewhere as an outright repudiation of Polk and of the legislation recently passed by the Democratic Congress. Privately, however, he informed Henry Clay that Whigs had elected Young and as many as five congressmen only by capturing the Anti-Rent vote and capitalizing on the growing division between Hunker and Barnburner Democrats. Whether or not such favorable circumstances would ever exist again was unclear.75

Though extraordinarily convoluted, Whigs' 1846 campaign in New York was not atypical. In virtually every state, Whigs experienced the same interaction among factional jockeying for power, state issues, and the new national issues generated by Democrats in Washington. State issues and unique state conditions, for example, clearly influenced the outcome in Ohio, North Carolina, and Pennsylvania, as well as in New York. Factional rifts in the party also continued to widen in Massachusetts, Georgia, and elsewhere despite Whigs' success. Nowhere was the Whig party as united and secure as the 1846 results seemed to portend. The record of the Polk administration had indeed provided Whigs with remarkably potent ammunition. By itself, however, it did not guarantee future success, as perceptive Whigs should have known.

VIII

Instead, most Whigs interpreted the 1846 results as a repudiation of Polk's record and dreamed of riding continued attacks upon it into the White House in 1848. "Whiggism ascends," proclaimed one enthusiast. "The present administration are your best recruiting officers, tho' rather expensive." Marveling at the apparent Whig capture of the House of Representatives, a Georgian gushed to Thomas Butler King, "Did you ever see such a rapid and tremendous revolution?" Ohio's Whigs explicitly interpreted their victory as a repudiation of Polk's policies and predicted triumph in 1848 on those issues. The tariff, asserted Massachusetts Senator John Davis, explained the Whig sweep. "We have at last reached an open palpable issue which all can understand, the policy of the administration is enough to excite alarm without coonskins, hard cider, or even a song or a hurrah." Rather than diverting attention to potential Whig presidential nominees for 1848, Henry Clay concluded, "the public mind, I think, had better be left to the fully undisturbed, and undivided consideration of the disastrous measures of the last session of Congress."

Utterly convinced that they could continue to win on economic issues, Whigs worried only that Webster might foolishly reintroduce his compromise tariff proposal when Congress met in December 1846 and thereby "produce the overthrow of that ascendancy which we are now gaining with the country and ought to preserve in 1848." Aware that Pennsylvania's Whigs believed they had "secured positive superiority . . . through the influence of the Tariff issue," Senator Davis assured Clay that he and other Massachusetts Whigs would not support Webster if he resubmitted the bill. Even Massachusetts manufacturers, who liked Webster's plan, would back a Whig platform demanding a complete return to the tariff of 1842. "If this is the best issue to keep before the public and the great end we have in view can be obtained by it then it is our best policy to adhere to it and I have no doubt Mass. will acquiesce in that policy." By the end of November, Whigs rejoiced that Webster had abandoned his scheme."

Buoyed by the results of the 1846 elections and the apparent power of their new issues, Whigs who faced campaigns in 1847 were convinced that they could maintain the party's momentum into the presidential campaign itself. Virginia Congressman John Pendleton exulted, "For my part, I have never doubted since the new Tariff and the war, that the Whigs must carry the election the next time." Whoever the presidential candidate might be in 1848, he predicted, "we shall beat them and beat them badly." As early as August 1846, an excited Tennessee Whig had predicted that "from the signs of the times . . . the canvass next year will be the easiest one for the Whigs since 1840. We have them on the defensive now." By the end of the year, other Tennessee Whigs confidently anticipated victory in 1847 and 1848 because of disgust with Polk. So, too, did North Carolina's Whigs. Although their victory in the North Carolina gubernatorial election in August 1846 had resulted primarily from the unpopularity of the Democratic gubernatorial nominee and his vulnerability on the issue of state aid to railroads, the Whigs had also stressed the tariff in the campaign. In July of that year, moreover, one Tarheel Whig argued that "the war question properly managed may be made to break the Democrats." By January 1847, Whig Congressman Alfred Dockery was even more certain that anger at the war, hostility to territorial acquisition from Mexico, and the virtual certainty that the new tariff and subtreasury measures would bankrupt the government ensured Whig victories in that state's impending congressional elections. Convinced by defeats in 1845 and 1846 "that the majority of Ind. voters are against us" and that "we must avoid as much as possible all merely national politics," Indiana's Whigs also changed their tune dramatically as the August 1847 congressional elections approached. "Attack the Administration at every vulnerable point—upon the Oregon question—the veto of the River and Harbor bill—the subtreasury with a raking fire at the Mexican war," congressional candidate Richard W. Thompson was urged in July 1847. Thompson agreed: "If we can't sustain the issues on which we now stand—we are gone."78

Whigs' momentum did appear to continue into the spring and summer of 1847. In March, they almost captured the New Hampshire legislature, even while losing the governorship decisively. In April, they rebounded strongly in Connecticut, where once again they swept the state and congressional elections on the tariff and antiwar issues.⁷⁹ In Rhode Island, where the new national issues allowed them to campaign for governor as Whigs for the first time in three years, they amassed 57 percent of the vote and scored striking gains in the legislature, just as they did in Connecticut. Whig candidates also picked up five additional congressional seats in Virginia and made significant gains in the legislature for their strongest showing in the Old Dominion in years. In August they captured two new House seats in Indiana while winning a statewide majority of the vote, added three new congressmen in North Carolina, and recaptured the governorship of Tennessee.

Yet the ability of national issues to sustain the Whig comeback was apparently weakening even in these early elections, especially in the South. However impressive the Whig performance was in Virginia, for example, it still left them with only six of fifteen congressmen and less than a majority of the statewide popular vote in an election in which the Democrats had suffered far heavier dropoff than they did. Virginia Whigs, in short, had good reason to doubt their ability to carry the state on those issues in a presidential campaign. Kentucky's Whigs had increased their share of the vote statewide since 1845, but they lost two congressional seats and saw their majority in the legislature decline. Whigs probably gained congressional seats in North Carolina in 1847, moreover, just as they had in Georgia in 1846, as much because of a Whig-engineered reapportionment of the districts as because of the issues they raised.⁸⁰

The results in Tennessee were equally ambiguous so far as the efficacy of the new national issues Whigs had been so confident of early in the year. Most Whig congressional candidates ran openly against the war and Polk's economic legislation, but the balance of Tennessee's congressional delegation remained exactly what it had been in 1845, six Democrats and five Whigs. Whig gubernatorial candidate Neill S. Brown eked out a narrow victory, but he shunned economic issues, refused to denounce the war, and instead lauded the war hero Zachary

Taylor, whom, he insisted, Whigs should nominate for president in 1848. His tactics, the stalemate in congressional races, and legislative losses by Whigs, like those in Kentucky, suggested that the crusade against Polk's record was losing steam.⁸¹

If the Whig tide crested in August, it ebbed markedly in the fall of 1847. In September, the Whigs' share of both the popular vote and legislative seats plummeted in Maine and declined in Vermont. Although Whigs carried Ohio and Massachusetts, both their vote and their share of legislative seats sank. They elected the state officers in New York and retained their large majority in the legislature, but only because of massive Democratic abstentions stemming from the Hunker-Barnburner feud. As the Whigs in New York well knew, their future there depended upon preventing the Democrats from reuniting.⁸² Elsewhere the news was even grimmer. Georgia's Whigs continued to stumble in 1847. Their margin in the legislature declined, and they lost the governorship because they could not match the growing Democratic vote among nonslaveholders in north Georgia. Worst of all were the results from the Middle Atlantic states, where the Whigs continued to campaign hard on the tariff. Although they picked up two congressional seats and increased their legislative margin in Maryland, they lost the governorship, thus raising doubts about their ability to carry a statewide election. More telling, they lost the governorship and a significant number of legislative seats in both New Jersey and Pennsylvania, where the Native American party still siphoned off vital voters from them. In the fall of 1847, in sum, Whigs' prospects sagged most dramatically in precisely those states where one year earlier they had boasted that economic issues and hostility to the war could carry them to the White House.

Some historians have attributed this turnabout in Whig fortunes between 1846 and 1847 to a change in sentiment regarding the war. According to this interpretation, Whigs won in 1846 because of widespread hostility to the war, but in 1847, as Winfield Scott's army marched victoriously from Vera Cruz to Mexico City, prowar sentiment supposedly increased. Consequently, Whigs fell victim to Democratic charges that their antiwar fulminations were treasonous and were largely responsible for the unwillingness of Mexicans to surrender. Yet there is little evidence that prowar sentiment was greater in 1847 than in 1846 among Whig voters. Certainly, as will be further developed below, Whig politicians retained confidence that an antiwar stance could bring political victory. The reversal in Whig fortunes stemmed instead primarily from the temporarily reduced effectiveness of the Whig assault on the Democrats' economic program.⁸³

In November 1846, even as he exuberantly cheered the "tremendous revolution" in Whig fortunes, a Georgia Whig had worried that "the only fear is that the revolution has come too early, its effects may wear out before the next Presidential election." Unfortunately for the Whigs, he was right. Whig campaigns in 1846 and the spring of 1847, when they made their biggest gains, had been based on predictions of what would happen under the Democratic economic program, not on its actual impact. Most of their triumphs and most of their boasting about the power of economic issues occurred before the economic legislation even went into effect. The Walker Tariff did not begin operation until December 1, 1846, and the Independent Treasury Act until January 1, 1847. Indeed, the requirement of the latter law that the government pay out only specie or Treasury notes was not implemented until April 1, 1847. What happened, simply, was that most Whig predictions turned out to be wrong. Despite the conviction of Whig politicians and businessmen alike that the economy would be plunged into disaster—and the private correspondence of Whigs establishes beyond cavil the sincerity of that belief—the nation instead prospered in 1847 and the Democrats reaped the benefit. They could and did say "I told you so," and thus they burst the Whig balloon.

Whigs' case against the Democratic economic program was internally coherent and powerful. By increasing imports, Whigs charged, the low Walker Tariff would propel gold out of the country to pay for them, a net drain on the economy that receipts from exports could never balance. Simultaneously, the Independent Treasury would remove government deposits from banks, reducing their gold reserves still further and quarantining huge sums of money from general economic activity. The inevitable result would be to dry up credit, which Whigs had always considered the vital lubricant that oiled the engine of economic growth. All would suffer, but manufacturers and their workers would be particularly damaged by the low ad valorem tariff duties and the public warehousing act that would allow foreign competitors to accumulate inventories on American shores and sell them only when profitable. Worse still, they charged, provisions of the Walker Tariff raising duties on raw materials used by American manufacturers would raise their production costs and render them even less competitive with foreign goods. In addition, Whigs predicted, the federal government itself would go bankrupt. Tariff revenues would decline just when the war required huge new expenditures. Nor could the government finance the war by bond sales since the hard-money clauses of the Independent Treasury Act required their purchase exclusively in gold, which bankers would no longer have in sufficient quantity. Workers, farmers, merchants, manufacturers, and the government itself would be prostrated.85

In 1847, however, almost every one of Whigs' predictions proved fallacious. Because of the Irish potato famine and crop failures in Europe at the end of 1846, foreign demand for American grain soared. As a result, the nation enjoyed its most favorable balance of trade in years. Gold and silver flowed into the economy from abroad in record amounts, eastern cities were awash in specie, and farmers earned unprecedented profits. Rather than hoarding its revenues in federal vaults, as Whigs had forecast, the government spent its money on war contracts, thus stimulating industries and recirculating revenues. Commerce, agriculture, and industry all flourished.

The forecast of government bankruptcy also went awry. Government revenues did decline, just as Whigs said they would, and so did the circulation of state bank notes. But the government ingeniously financed the war by selling short-term Treasury notes in small denominations, which could be used as currency. Because Treasury notes earned interest and could be used to pay tariff duties, businessmen demanded them. Bankers, profiting from the sale of Treasury notes, scrambled to handle the loans for which Walker allowed installment payments. The government, in short, pumped much more money into the economy than it took out. Instead of the shrunken money supply and sudden deflation Whigs had dreaded, the amount of circulating currency jumped sharply in 1847, wholesale prices rose, and prosperity prevailed. 86

As the year 1847 progressed, Whig hopes of exploiting economic issues dimmed perceptibly. Because of increased grain exports, warned a Tennessee Whig congressman in February, "money will be plenty—the Banks easy—Treasury notes in demand and the people prosperous." Since Democrats would get the credit for good times, he glumly concluded, "the Whigs will have heavy work in Tennessee next summer." In the May issue of the American Review, a rueful Whig admitted that "all was prosperity, where, according to the apprehensions and predictions of the Whig party, all was to be untoward and disastrous." Galled beyond measure that Treasury notes had averted the currency contraction that implementation of the Independent Treasury Act should have produced, a frustrated Greeley howled that the "'Independent Treasury' ragmill is at this moment aiding sensibly the general inflation of the currency" because it "vomits forth its promises to pay, of all shapes and sizes." In July a worried New Yorker on a business trip to Pennsylvania aptly summarized the party's dilemma:

The famine in Europe has produced such an enormous rise in all grains and specie has flowed in on us to such an extent that they have drowned the effects of the Tariff of 46 and somewhat neutralized the effects of the Sub-Try. Besides the mania for Railways in Europe and this country has kept up the price of iron; and the war has called for such enormous supplies, of all its materials, and such immense expenditure of money, that almost every branch of business has been greatly stimulated. Thus, to the great mass, the country appears to be eminently prosperous.⁸⁷

In April 1848, Congressman Meredith Gentry of Tennessee flatly told Webster that it would be a mistake for the Whigs to attempt to repeal the Walker Tariff. "A combination of circumstances at home and abroad has made it eminently successful as a revenue measure and less destructive to our home manufacturers than was anticipated." Because Democrats now had the advantage on economic issues, Gentry concluded, the Whigs' only chance of carrying the presidency in 1848 was to run Zachary Taylor.88

The changed perspective on which party benefited from economic issues is plainly revealed in the shifting emphases of the platforms on which they went to the voters. North Carolina's Whigs, for example, made the Walker Tariff and the Independent Treasury centerpieces of their attack during the gubernatorial election of 1846. In 1847, however, Whig congressional candidates campaigned primarily against the Mexican War and territorial acquisition, and the Whig state platform adopted in February 1848 explicitly tried to shift the focus from economic issues to the war. New York's Whigs abandoned economic issues entirely in their official address to voters in 1847, while Democrats continued to boast of the tariff and subtreasury. In 1846, 42 percent of the Whig address had been devoted to economic issues, but in 1847 it focused entirely on the war and slavery extension issues. Even in Pennsylvania, where Whigs continued to attack the Walker Tariff in their platforms of 1847 and 1848, Democrats, who had been grievously embarrassed by the issue in 1846, were defending it in 1847 and 1848 in both state platforms and local resolutions as "the most judicious and equitable that has ever been established."89

By the summer and fall of 1847, many Whig strategists had shifted their focus to Polk's conduct of the Mexican War and to opposing any territorial acquisition from it. At first blush, that issue too looked unpromising. Considerable evidence, ranging from high rates of volunteer enlistment to popular literature to the cult of hero worship that quickly exalted the names of courageous officers and enlisted men, all suggests that a majority of Americans enthusiastically approved of the nation's first war on foreign soil. Why, then, did Whigs deem opposition to the war a viable platform, especially when the Democrats, led by President Polk himself, continually excoriated them for giving aid and comfort to the enemy by their criticism?⁹⁰

In brief, Whigs correctly recognized that what enthralled the general public about the war was neither its causes nor its possible consequences but the fighting itself and the feats of derring-do in the face of the enemy. Imbued with a romantic fascination with chivalry, martial skills, and foreign places, Americans in the 1840s hungered for military glory and military heroes to reassure them that they still possessed Revolutionary virtues. Therefore, Whigs attempted to distinguish between Polk's culpability for causing the war, his mismanagement of it, and the unworthiness of his purposes, on the one hand, and the stirring activities of American armies on the battlefield, on the other. They focused their attack on incompetent and selfishly envious Democratic civilians in Washington, not on courageous soldiers at the front.

Throughout the war Whigs vilified Polk's ineptitude for prolonging the war and endangering American lives, and they lacerated as mean-spirited his efforts to monopolize credit for winning the war by advancing Democratic generals at the expense of Whigs. Throughout the war they warned of its mounting costs that burdened future generations with a huge debt, and in both December 1846 and December 1847 they hooted that Walker's request for a tax on coffee and tea revealed the bankruptcy of Democratic fiscal policies. Throughout the war they denounced Polk's executive tyranny, first for unconstitutionally provoking the war, then for establishing a tariff in occupied Mexican ports without consulting Congress, and then for ordering American military commanders to claim American jurisdiction in the Mexican provinces of New Mexico and California without congressional authorization. Yet at the same time that congressional Whigs, like the Whig press, vituperated virtually every aspect of Polk's conduct of the war, most continued to vote for the supplies, funds, and troops he needed to prosecute it and to boast that they were doing all they could to ensure the success of American armies.92

More important, almost from the moment the shooting started, Whigs attempted to appropriate the lion's share of the military glory that so dazzled the public. Although Zachary Taylor had never even voted, let alone attended a Whig gathering, the Whig press praised "the bravery of that old Whig General Taylor" and "the brilliant Whig achievements of Taylor" when word of his surprising victories at Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma first reached the United States in late May 1846. Similarly, Whigs promptly labeled the war's first popular martyr, Major Samuel Ringgold, who was killed while directing artillery fire at Palo Alto, a "gallant Whig." Later in the war, when Taylor was publicly quarreling with the Polk administration, even Webster, who already worried about Taylor as a competitor for the presidency in 1848, insisted that the Whigs must take advantage of his popularity by placing "him in opposition to the Administration, not only as a Whig, but as a Whig attempted to be injured & kept down by Mr. Polk & Co."

With more justice, Whigs claimed the commanding general of the army, Winfield Scott, who had been mentioned as a Whig presidential possibility for 1848 since Clay's defeat, as an exemplary Whig patriot. They condemned Polk's efforts to keep him from command of the armies in Mexico and to replace him with Democrats like Thomas Hart Benton. And they later basked in the glory of his triumphant campaign from Vera Cruz to Mexico City. As early as June 2, 1846, finally, William E. Robinson or "Richelieu," the Washington correspondent of Greeley's stridently antiwar New York Tribune, sounded a refrain that Whigs would echo throughout the war. Only Whig blood and "Whig courage," he asserted, "could rescue the country from Loco-Foco mismanagement." The duplicitous and imbecile Polk administration had plunged Americans into a war it was unprepared to fight, "but they left it to the Whigs to get us out of it." "93

Not all Whigs condoned this two-faced approach to the conflict. Led by Ohio's Joshua Giddings, the old champion of antislavery petitions, who in 1846 began to cooperate closely with the fervently antislavery Young Whigs of Massachusetts, a few northern Whig congressmen denounced the war from the outset as a southern conspiracy to spread the realm of slavery, flayed the hypocrisy of their Whig colleagues for speaking against the war while voting to support it, and steadfastly refused to vote for men and materiel. The fastest way to end an immoral war of aggression, they logically insisted, was to cut off the lifeblood of the invading armies so that they would be forced to withdraw from Mexico and disband. Even more notorious was the sensational antiwar speech of Ohio's Whig Senator Thomas Corwin, who was not a member of Giddings' clique of antislavery zealots. In February 1847, Corwin boldly proclaimed to a stunned Senate chamber, "If I were a Mexican, I would tell you, 'Have you not room in your own country to bury your dead men? If you come into mine we will greet you with bloody hands, and welcome you to hospitable graves!" "94

This dogmatic opposition to the war and the refusal to support American troops divided the Whigs in Congress and frayed tempers on both sides of the issue. It also divided Whig organizations in several northern states, especially Massachusetts. Young Whigs there pounced on the prowar votes of Boston Whig Congressman Robert C. Winthrop to skewer the regulars or Cotton Whigs who controlled the state party for supporting an immoral war to spread slavery and thus flouting the sentiments of Bay State Whigs. 95 Such extremism, however, remained a minor strain in the Whig chorus. On the whole, Whigs avoided being trapped in the unpatriotic posture of criticizing or undermining American armies in the field. In a war in which the two greatest commanders quarreled publicly with the Democratic administration and were extolled as Whigs, in a war in which sons of both Henry Clay and Daniel Webster died in uniform, the Whigs could successfully argue that they were doing more than their share to attain military victory while simultaneously reviling the war's origins and potential outcome.

For the first few months of the war, Whigs concentrated their fire on its unseemly origins. By the fall of 1846 and thereafter, however, they focused on its likely consequences. By then it was clear that Polk intended to seize New Mexico, California, and possibly additional Mexican territory as an "indemnity" for American expenses in the war. Even in 1844 Whigs had outlined arguments against the dangers of territorial expansion, but they regarded acquisition by military conquest as particularly intolerable. America's mission, they iterated and reiterated, was to spread republican institutions by example, not by coercion. Forceful incorporation of territory into the United States against the will of its inhabitants violated the basic tenet of the Revolutionary experiment in selfgovernment, government by consent of the governed. As Virginia's former Governor David Campbell fulminated to his nephew, "The administration's views on the subject of conquests & occupancy of the country are so wild and despotic and destructive of everything like republican government, that opposition must necessarily be provoked against every movement they make."96 Just as Whigs insisted that opposition to territorial acquisition was necessary to save the republican principles of the Revolutionary Fathers, however, Democrats extolled it as spreading republican liberty to additional areas of the continent. Thus the battle over expansion became another chapter in the debate over which party better defended republicanism.

The Whigs also employed less exalted themes. Although prominent Whig editors and congressmen had renounced nativism and the drive to revise naturalization laws in early 1846, many Whigs played on Anglo-Saxon and Protestant biases to deter expansion. Reflecting an ethnocentric arrogance shared by most Americans, Whig papers and orators warned that annexing Mexican territory would add to the body politic an ignorant, slavish, superstitious, and mongrel race of Mexicans totally unfit for republican citizenship. As the staid National Intelligencer at the capital put it, "The weightier objection . . . is the annexation of a [morally degraded] people who are . . . unfit . . . to sustain a free government."

More important, the coalescing of Whigs around the demand that no territory be taken as a consequence of the war represented a classic case of finding a position on an issue that simultaneously could preserve internal party unity and distinguish Whigs from Democrats. Since most Whigs were determined to share the credit for the military prosecution of the war, opposing acquisition became the simplest way for Whigs to differentiate themselves from Democrats once Polk made it clear that he would not stop the war without a territorial indemnity from the defeated foe. When Polk first made his territorial ambitions clear in August 1846, however, it initially appeared that the expansion issue would divide Whigs internally rather than unite them against the Democrats. The question of territorial acquisition immediately became entangled with the issue of slavery expansion into those territories, and even more than Texas annexation had in 1845, that issue ruptured the party along sectional lines.

XI

As soon as the war began, many northern Whigs and other antislavery groups in the North charged that Polk was acting on behalf of a southern or Slave Power conspiracy to gain additional territory for slavery. When Polk asked Congress for a $2 million appropriation to conduct negotiations with the Mexicans in August 1846, that charge gained credibility, for his intention to force Mexico to sell the United States territory as the price of peace became clear. Northern Democrats feared that Polk's move would allow their Whig rivals to accuse them of supporting a southern-sponsored war for slavery extension. Those fears crystallized when Hugh White, a New York Whig congressman, demanded that Polk's appropriation bill "be so amended as to forever preclude the possibility of extending the limits of slavery." To prevent Whigs from preempting opposition to slavery expansion, to neutralize the expected Whig charge that they condoned it, and to vent anger at Polk and southern Democrats for their actions on Oregon, the tariff, the Rivers and Harbors veto, and patronage distribution, northern Democrats almost to a man voted for an amendment to the appropriation bill introduced by a thitherto obscure first-term Democratic congressman from Pennsylvania named David Wilmot. Thereafter renowned as the Wilmot Proviso, that amendment barred slavery from any territory to be acquired from Mexico as a result of the war. 98

The amendment was adopted, and the bill then passed the House on virtually a strict sectional vote. Northern Democrats and all northern Whigs voted for it. Though the amended bill died in the Senate when the first session of the Twenty-Ninth Congress expired, the Wilmot Proviso would be reintroduced in subsequent sessions of Congress, and each time it came to a vote the same sectionally polarized pattern appeared. The Proviso undeniably split both parties along sectional lines.

Antislavery Whigs both in and outside Congress rejoiced at the introduction of Wilmot's Proviso and at the evidence of solid northern support for it. Greeley, for example, immediately endorsed it as "a solemn declaration of the United North against the further extension of Slavery under the protection of our Flag," as did the leading Whig papers in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and other northern states. Polk, northern Whigs believed, had resurrected the slavery extension issue that had proved so beneficial to them in 1844 and 1845. Wilmot's Proviso had opened the eyes of Northerners, exulted Ohio's Columbus Delano, one of "the immortal fourteen" who had voted against the original troop authorizations. "The free states ought in my opinion now to take this position openly & avowedly 'Unyielding opposition to the acquisition of any territory by any means unless freedom is guaranteed & slavery prohibited; and like opposition to the admission of any further slave state."

Despite the subsequent sectional rancor provoked by Wilmot's Proviso, there is little evidence that support for it played a significant role in northern Whig victories in the 1846 elections. Those contests revolved primarily around national economic issues and local concerns. In the fall of 1846 the Proviso still seemed a hypothetical issue. The outcome of the war, let alone the prospect of territorial acquisition from it, was still very much in doubt.

Equally important, perceptive northern Whigs immediately saw what few historians seem to have understood about the Proviso issue in 1846. Since both northern Democrats and northern Whigs had supported it, the Proviso did not offer a distinctive party stance on the war. It differentiated northern Whigs from Southerners of both parties, but not from their northern Democratic rivals. Where they did differ from northern Democrats was on the question of territorial expansion, not slavery extension, for northern Democrats pledged to support territorial acquisition from Mexico if slavery were prohibited from it, while northern Whigs, as even men like Delano and Giddings admitted, were just as opposed to territorial conquest as to slavery extension. To highlight that difference seemed to require shifting the issue from the Proviso to territorial acquisition itself.¹⁰⁰

Developing a distinctive party stance and record on the war also required continued cooperation with southern Whigs, which could never be achieved on the Wilmot Proviso. To the dismay of extreme antislavery Whigs like Giddings and the Young Whigs of Massachusetts, most northern Whigs, like their southern colleagues, were primarily concerned in 1846 and 1847 with returning to power, not with venting sectional grievances. Although Whigs had made great gains in the congressional elections of 1846, control of the House depended upon the ninety seats to be contested in 1847, and most of those seats were in the South. Beyond that, of course, party unity would be necessary to carry the presidential election of 1848. The problem was not simply that the Proviso divided southern Whigs against northern Whigs. It was that opposition to the Proviso in the South, like support for it in the North, could not provide southern Whigs with a distinctive party position to run on in 1847 and 1848 because of the bipartisan sectional consensus against it. To compound the problem, southern Whigs were even more eager than their northern colleagues to demonstrate that they matched Democratic support for American armies in the field because enthusiasm about their exploits in battle was especially avid in the South. Just like northern Whigs, however, southern Whigs quickly realized that opposition to all territorial acquisition offered them a viable and distinct platform. 101

To fathom southern Whig confidence in the issue, one must understand the reasons for southern opposition to the Proviso. Contrary to the accusations of northern antislavery men, there was no widespread southern conspiracy to spread slavery by attacking Mexico. Most southern Whigs and many southern Democrats, including John C. Calhoun, who joined Whigs in opposing a war of conquest against Mexico, believed and openly argued that slavery could not possibly exist in any territory to be acquired from it. Whatever the accuracy of that analysis and it was undoubtedly wrong about California—for most Southerners the significance of the Proviso was symbolic, not substantive. They regarded it as a humiliating insult by the northern majority, a denial of the equal rights of white Southerners even when they had no intention of exercising those rights, and an attempt to subjugate Southerners to northern dictation, that is, as an attempt symbolically to reduce white Southerners to the status of slaves. Southerners who were particularly sensitive about defending their individual and collective honor and particularly fearful of enslavement to someone else's power refused to tolerate it. Some Southerners did indeed expect to carry slaves to acquisitions wrested from Mexico. But to most—and especially to most Whigs—Southern Rights, the defense of republican liberty and equality, were at stake, not the extension of slavery.102

Since more Southerners were interested in defeating the Proviso than in taking slaves into former Mexican territory, southern Whigs saw No Territory as a perfectly viable stance that distinguished them from southern Democrats, most of whom quickly embraced Polk's territorial ambitions. Thus, when the second session of the Twenty-Ninth Congress convened in December 1846, two Georgia Whigs, Berrien in the Senate and Alexander Stephens in the House, introduced amendments to appropriation bills stipulating that there should be no territorial acquisitions or cessions as a consequence of the war. Southern Whigs argued that since slavery could never be profitably implanted in any cession from Mexico, acquisition would eventually result in adding more free states to the Union even if the Proviso were not attached to it. Forcing a territorial cession from Mexico, indeed, would only ensure a northern effort to impose the galling Proviso on the South and thus provoke dangerous sectional antagonism. If no new territory were acquired, there would be no need for Northerners to inflict the hateful Proviso on the South.¹⁰³

According to southern Whigs, No Territory offered the best hope of simultaneously stopping an immoral war of aggression by making its prolongation pointless, preserving sectional harmony in their party and nation, and protecting Southern Rights from attack. "Can a contest be imagined more frightful and furious than that which this very acquisition of Mexican Territory will excite between the North and South?" a Georgia Whig newspaper queried prophetically in the spring of 1847. "Nothing appears plainer to us than that the North is united on the Wilmot Proviso. The South is united against it. Hence rises a question of lurid and fearful portent." As Tennessee's William B. Campbell, himself a hero of the war, put it at the end of 1847, "The North have the power in Congress and if Mr. Polk gets territory by treaty, will it not be far worse for the South, and better that no territory had been acquired than that it should be admitted as free states. The South will be enclosed by a cordon of free states, which will diminish the value of slave property wherever it may be adjacent to free territory."

At first, the North's most vehement antislavery Whigs viewed the No Territory resolutions offered by their southern colleagues in Congress simply as evidence of Southerners' fear that a united North could indeed impose the Proviso on them. Already convinced "that there can be no permanent union as a party between us & the slaveholders," Whigs like Giddings and his Massachusetts Young Whig allies protested "the great efforts... to change the issue from the Willmont Proviso [sic] to that of opposing the acquisition of territory." Scorning the conversion of northern Whigs to the No Territory position as "the truckling of doughfaces," Giddings fumed that "it is an insult to common sense to talk of opposing the acquisition of territory and at the same time continue the war." 105

By the summer of 1847, the vast majority of northern and southern Whigs had nonetheless adopted that incongruous combination. Most northern Whigs joined their southern colleagues in unsuccessfully attempting to attach No Territory riders to appropriation bills in the winter of 1846–47. Once Congress adjourned, most northern Whig papers, even those that had previously endorsed the Proviso, took up the demand for No Territory. "We want no more territory, NEITHER WITH NOR WITHOUT THE WILMOT PROVISO," vowed the Ohio State Journal in April 1847, even though it had praised the Proviso the previous August. In a public letter to the voters of his southern Indiana congressional district in June 1847, Whig candidate Richard W. Thompson pledged that he would vote for the Proviso whenever it came before the House, but he insisted that rather than agitating for the Proviso, the Whigs should devote their energies to ending the war and stopping territorial expansion.

I think the Wilmot Proviso . . . was prematurely introduced—not because it asserts any principle which I do not approve, but because it agitates the country with a question not now legitimately before it. It assumes that a portion of Mexican Territory may be acquired by conquest. This admission I am not willing to make. That the present administration desires and designs to acquire territory by the war, I do not doubt, but I have yet seen nothing to satisfy me that the people of this Country will approve conduct so at war with the genius and spirit of our institutions. The elections which have taken place since the war began have proven the reverse.

Similarly, Corwin privately advised Thomas B. Stevenson, the editor of the Cincinnati Atlas, that insisting upon the Proviso was unnecessary. No Territory was the surest way to stop the spread of slavery, and he and other northern Whigs could always use the Wilmot Proviso as a fallback position if the calamity of territorial acquisition actually occurred. Until that time, opposition to any territorial indemnity from Mexico offered the best hope of gaining the necessary cooperation from southern Whigs and of contrasting the Whig position with that of the Democrats in both sections of the country. 106

Northern Whigs continued to declare their steadfast opposition to slavery expansion, but they did not insist upon the Proviso as the only or even the most desirable method to stop it. The 1847 state platform of Pennsylvania's Whigs, for example, asserted that "if an addition to our territory be desirable, it should not be ... attended with an extension of slavery." But it further asserted that "we believe that the interests of North and South, the welfare of the race, and the honor of the nation demand that territory should not be acquired for the purpose of an extension of slavery." Similarly, the state convention of New York's Whigs in October 1847 declared "their uncompromising hostility to the extension of Slavery into any territory now Free which may be hereafter acquired by the action of the Government of our Union." Ohio Whigs stated the party position most forthrightly in the state platform of January 1848: "We deprecate a war of conquest, and strenuously oppose the forcible acquisition of Mexican Territory; but, if additional territory be forced upon us, or acquired by the nation, we shall demand that there shall neither be slavery nor involuntary servitude therein. otherwise than for the punishment of a crime."107

Even Massachusetts Whigs seemed to swing into line behind the new position, if only grudgingly. Animosities between the Young Whigs and the party regulars or Cotton Whigs had steadily intensified since 1845. Originating in the division over the Young Whigs' diehard agitation of the anti-Texas issue in 1845, that conflict had focused on Winthrop's votes for war supplies in 1846. In 1847, the dispute shifted to the question of whether the party should make No Territory or the Proviso the centerpiece of its state platform. The state convention in September did iterate the party's customary firm hostility to slavery expansion, but it also endorsed Daniel Webster for president. Webster had been a proponent of No Territory since the winter of 1847, and in a speech to the Whig convention itself he openly defended No Territory as preferable to the Proviso as a means of stopping the spread of slavery. 108

Perhaps even more important than official platforms in shifting the Whig appeal to No Territory were the editorial columns of Greeley's widely read Tribune.

In the fall of 1846, Greeley had called on a united North to rally behind the Proviso to demonstrate to the South its determination that slavery would never spread. By December 1847, however, Greeley candidly admitted that "thousands at the South resist and execrate the Wilmot Proviso . . . not because they really desire the Extension of Slavery, but because they view the proposition as needlessly offensive and invidious toward the Slave States—as intended to fix a brand upon them." Since Southerners had no intention of spreading slavery, the North no longer needed to push the insulting Proviso. "'No More Territory' we still think the simplest and safest solution of the impending difficulty; if the South will unite on that the whole danger will be averted."

Obviously, one reason northern Whigs were promoting No Territory rather than the Proviso by the end of 1847 was concern about holding the party together for the impending presidential campaign. As Corwin wrote Kentucky's Crittenden in September, the Whigs would lose that contest if slavery extension rather than territorial expansion became the central issue.

The Whigs of the South will not sustain any man, in favor of the Proviso, & the Whigs of the North will not vote for any man who is opposed to it. . . . Hence arises the great necessity of taking early and strong ground against any further acquisition, settle on that, & the Wilmot Proviso dies. . . . Whilst this would do justice to Mexico, it would restore comparative tranquility to us. It would preserve in its entire strength the Whig party.

Corwin and other leaders who sought party unity, in fact, were enormously pleased that, when the first session of the Thirtieth Congress opened in December 1847, northern and southern Whigs alike appeared determined to rally to the No Territory standard. Rather than driving southern Whigs away from their northern colleagues, the northern Whig platforms that threatened to impose the Proviso if territory were annexed had only increased the commitment of southern Whigs to the No Territory position. As Winthrop, who was elected Speaker of the House by the Whig majority, rejoiced in January 1848, "My view of the Wilmot Proviso has always been that its chief value was in creating an interest North and South against extending our Territory. If the North can be prevented from uniting in such extension for fear the new Territory should be slave & the South for fear it should be Free, we can put an end to all these projects of aggrandisement."

XII

By the end of 1847, in fact, stopping Democratic "projects of aggrandisement" not only seemed more necessary than ever to most Whigs. No Territory also seemed to provide the best issue on which Whigs could win the elections of 1848. Winfield Scott's invading army captured Mexico City in September 1847, and the military phase of the war, the chief source of its popularity, was for all intents and purposes at an end. Americans, observers in both parties believed, now yearned for peace, but the stubborn, if vanquished, Mexicans refused to negotiate an end to hostilities. And they refused to make peace, Whigs repeatedly charged, only because they knew that Polk insisted on dismemberment of their nation.

"This question of Territorial Acquisition is that on which hinges the issue of Peace of War," intoned Greeley in November. "We should have had peace in September but for the inexorable determination of the Executive to acquire a large slice of Mexico by conquest." Until Polk was convinced to renounce his territorial ambitions by continued Whig success at the polls, Whigs asserted, the war would drag on with its staggering expense, its mountainous debt, and its appalling mortality rates as American soldiers continued to die from diseases contracted in their unsanitary encampments scattered across Mexico. Worse still, Whigs warned, the obsessive Polk and his Democratic toadies in Congress now meant to annex all of Mexico to bring the war to a close. That charge received apparent confirmation when Polk, in his annual message to Congress, asked for additional loans and ten more regiments of regular troops to continue the war and insisted that a territorial indemnity from Mexico was an indispensable condition for peace.¹¹¹

Genuinely fearful that Polk intended to conquer all of Mexico and that the war would go on and on. Whigs also recognized that he had helped define the choice before voters exactly as they wanted it, just as he had done with his economic program in 1846. The question was not the Wilmot Proviso, which divided North from South. Rather, the issue was continued war and territorial acquisition versus peace and No Territory, an issue that clearly and sharply divided Whigs from Democrats. Because of war weariness and what seemed to them the palpable immorality and danger of the All Mexico movement, moreover, Whigs believed it was an issue on which they could win in 1848. Expressing "disgust and astonishment" at Polk's annual message, a Rome, Georgia, Whig informed Berrien in December, for example, "I do feel confident that any reasonable method which can be devised to put a stop to this game of blood and disgrace will be sustained by the people." Nor, he averred, was the prospect of territorial cession any more palatable to Georgians than a prolongation of the war. "The great majority of Whigs are opposed to the acquisition of territory in this section of Georgia. And the democracy have seen so little benefit accrue from the annexation of Texas that they are quite indifferent to the matter. I mean the masses." If Georgia, where Democrats had benefited more from the Texas annexation issue than in any other state in the Union, could be carried on a peace and No Territory platform, the future indeed seemed bright. 112

Even before Polk's message to Congress, Greeley had evinced similar confidence that northern states could be carried on that platform in an extraordinary editorial assessing the contrasting results of the Ohio and Pennsylvania elections in 1847. The Whigs had won in Ohio and lost in Pennsylvania, he asserted, because they had forthrightly opposed the war and territorial conquest in the former while downplaying the war issue in favor of the tariff in the latter. Assailing the war had brought Whig voters to the polls in Ohio; failing to assail it vigorously enough had kept potential Whig voters away from the polls in Pennsylvania. What made this editorial extraordinary was not the accuracy of this contention, although Greeley undoubtedly believed it, but his explicit articulation of the values of the Whig electorate and of the need for concrete issue contrasts to mobilize them to vote.

"The simple truth," Greeley maintained, "is that the strength of the Whig party is its hold on the understandings of the intelligent, the sympathies of the humane, the consciences of the religious among our people. When this fails we are weak as water. We have not a blind, headlong, fiery mass who believe a thing right merely because we affirm it, or who vote and electioneer for whatever is put forth as the 'Regular Whig Ticket.' Unless there are in the issues presented or the contrasted character of the candidates strong moral reasons for preferring the success of our nominations," a very large portion of Whig supporters "will not come out to vote." It was up to Pennsylvania Whigs to mobilize those voters by opposing territorial conquest. Thousands of Pennsylvanians "will not only vote but work for the Whig candidates on the understanding that they thus vote for calling home our troops from Mexico and stopping the butchery going on there, who would not vote at all if they understood the Whigs to favor 'a more vigorous prosecution of the War,' until Mexico shall be thoroughly humbled." Pennsylvania, like the rest of the North, could thus be carried by a strong antiwar and antiexpansion stand. 113

XIII

Despite the slowing of the Whigs' comeback effort in the fall elections of 1847 and the emergence of the sectionally divisive slavery extension issue, therefore, most Whigs remained optimistic about the party's prospects as the year 1848 began. Although the economic issues that had helped generate the triumphs of 1846 had lost salience, the Whigs had still recaptured control of the House of Representatives. More important, they had found a distinctive issue that could unite all Whigs, bridge the sectional chasm over the Wilmot Proviso by entirely avoiding that issue, mobilize Whig voters, and place the Democrats on the defensive. Whig politicians recognized and openly admitted in the winter of 1847–48 that the party was no more united than it had ever been on the question of voting against supplies to force an immediate cessation of the war and that most Whigs would probably continue to go along grudgingly with Polk's request. The Even that disarray did not dismay them, however, for it placed responsibility for ending the war on the Democratic commander-in-chief.

Given Polk's apparent determination to seize all of Mexico and the stubborn refusal of Mexicans to surrender on Polk's terms, the war could last another year. Whigs could thus make the presidential election itself a referendum on the issues of war or peace, All Mexico or No Territory. "The issue in the next campaign, presidential I mean, will be whether we shall annex the whole of Mexico or not," North Carolina Congressman David Outlaw wrote his wife in late January 1848. On February 9, Virginia's Alexander H. H. Stuart echoed that belief. The war would not be terminated, he predicted, "until the issue of 'Conquest' or 'no conquest' is fairly made and tried at the polls in the next presidential election."

As in the off-year elections of 1846 and 1847, that is, Whigs at the beginning of 1848 expected to base the presidential election on a concrete issue over which the parties, rather than the sections, were divided. Once again they would ask voters to judge the record of Polk and his Democratic allies, who had proven to be such effective "recruiting officers" for the Whigs in 1846 and early 1847. In Whigs' minds, in short, the question was not whether they could win the presidency on issues or what those issues would be. Of that they were certain. Rather, the question in most Whigs' minds at the outset of the presidential year was something else, a question phrased succinctly by Connecticut's canny Truman Smith in a letter to William C. Rives in the fall of 1847. The Whig party, Smith insisted, had to find a way to "close this war without any considerable acquisition of territory." That could "only be done through the medium of the next Presidential election. The Whigs must succeed or all the evils of this war will be brought on the country. To do so we must have a proper candidate. Who shall he be?"

Chapter 9

"The Contest for President Should Be Regarded as a Contest of Principles"

"THE WHIGS ADMIT that" the 1844 election "proved" that they could never "succeed of their own unassisted strength" and must "come into power, if at all," only "with the aid of Democratic votes as in 1840," jeered the notorious Rhode Island Democrat Thomas Dorr in January 1848. "Hence," Whigs sought "a taking candidate. A brave old soldier they think is the man for them." Many historians have echoed Dorr's charge that the Whigs' nomination of Zachary Taylor in 1848 was an act of desperation, a confession that they could not win on issues.

Dorr's gibe, and the interpretation it prefigured, were in fact only partially accurate. By January 1848, Whig leaders, having squabbled about their nominee for three years, remained far from a consensus. By then most southern Whigs, like northern Whigs from strongly Democratic states, enthusiastically backed Taylor. Despising the war in which he gained fame, many Whigs, however, vehemently opposed him. Others adamantly rejected Taylor because they demanded a committed advocate of Whig programs. They objected to a candidate who, in Dorr's words, "has not made up his mind on any of the great questions of principle & policy that have so long divided the country." Only days after Dorr wrote, indeed, Rhode Island's Whigs officially endorsed Henry Clay for the nomination explicitly because he embodied Whig principles.²

Whigs, in short, did not rush en masse to seize Zachary Taylor as their savior. The shifting fortunes of Whig candidates in off-year elections, the aggravation of sectional animosity over slavery extension, state factional rivalries, and, above all else, the oscillating salience of issues all influenced the contest for the nomination. By June 1848, a majority of delegates at the Whig national convention believed that the party did need a "brave old soldier" to win. For a variety of reasons, Taylor was their preferred chieftain. But the choice followed a long and divisive struggle, the wounds of which festered long after the convention and the ensuing election. Opposition to Polk's administration united and strengthened the Whigs in 1846 and 1847. Conflict with the Democrats always did. The simultaneous struggle to choose a Whig candidate to replace Polk, in contrast, dangerously rent them. Since both a diminution of interparty conflict and the deepening of intraparty divisions would ultimately doom the Whig party, the prelimary skirmishing for the 1848 nomination therefore requires explication.

I

Jockeying for the 1848 presidential nomination began as soon as the polls closed in 1844. In the nineteenth century, seekers of the White House did not publicly announce their candidacy, as they do today. Openly to pursue a party's nomination for office, especially the presidency, was bad form. Instead, one supposedly waited for a call to serve from one's party. To make sure that call went to the right man, an aspirant and his friends worked to create support among party leaders, the press, and the rank and file that could produce a majority of delegates at the national convention. Although much of this maneuvering occurred behind the scenes, candidates' major instrument for influencing local leaders and voters was their public posture on contemporary issues.

Competition for the nomination therefore engendered divergent responses among Whig hopefuls and their backers to the issues that emerged between 1844 and 1848. Just as the Whig and Democratic parties took contrasting positions on issues to mobilize their respective electorates, contenders for the nomination had to differentiate themselves to court distinctive elements within the Whig coalition. For the same reasons, existing state factions backed rival candidates to best their intraparty foes for control of state organizations. From the beginning to the end of the long contest, the fundamental division was over what kind of candidate the Whigs needed to win: an orthodox regular like Clay, who championed Whig programs and who could rally the Whig faithful, or a new face, who might bring non-Whigs to the party column by soft-pedaling traditional Whig programs.

Even Clay's warmest admirers initially blanched at the thought of subjecting their beloved leader to the agony of another campaign. Clay, sixty-seven when 1844 ended, himself seemed finally ready to give up the chase. He never definitively refused to run again. But his remarks to Kentucky's Whig electors in December 1844 sounded like a valediction; he privately informed Crittenden that "my anxious desire is to remain during the remnant of my days in peace and retirement"; and his refusal to permit Kentucky's legislature to return him to the Senate reinforced that impression.³

Of other Whig regulars, Delaware's John M. Clayton, North Carolina's Willie P. Mangum, and Crittenden himself all drew early mention as possibilities. But the regular who first chased the prize was Clay's long-time rival, Daniel Webster. Himself sixty-two in 1844, Webster had never lost his hunger for the presidency and feared that 1848 might be his last opportunity. "Any other respectable Whig candidate would have recd. a large majority," he churlishly wrote shortly after Clay's defeat. "The Whig party is strong, but it wants good direction." Webster meant to provide that leadership himself. By orchestrating the Massachusetts anti-Texas movement and the drive for naturalization reform in the winter of 1844–45, he clearly sought to woo antislavery and nativist elements within the party.

When economic issues became prominent in the summer of 1846, Webster tried to carve a distinctive stance with his abortive compromise tariff proposal. When his fellow Whigs insisted on a clear choice between the tariffs of 1842 and 1846—and once he was informed he might win the presidency by attacking the Walker Tariff—Webster abandoned his compromise in the next congressional session. Instead, to distinguish himself from other Whig protectionists, Webster began stressing internal improvements to exploit the angry reaction against Polk's veto of the 1846 Rivers and Harbors bill.⁵

Webster's response to the Mexican War also sought to maximize his Whig support. By a stroke of good fortune, he was attending the installation of his friend Everett as president of Harvard College when the Senate voted on the initial war appropriations bills in May 1846. Thus he escaped the wrath that militant antiwar Whigs, including Massachusetts' Young Whigs, heaped on his ally Winthrop for condoning the war. At first, Webster was content to join other Whigs in castigating Polk for unconstitutionally instigating an immoral act of aggression. Antislavery Whigs' enthusiastic response to the introduction of the Wilmot Proviso changed his calculations. Well aware that he needed southern as well as northern support to capture the nomination and win election, Webster from the beginning of 1847 advocated southern Whigs' No Territory position as an alternative to the Proviso while continuing to vote for troops and supplies.⁶

None of Webster's twistings and turnings advanced his candidacy very far. He had never developed a network of friends outside of New England, New York City, and Philadelphia who could organize a viable nationwide campaign.⁷ In the fall of 1847, the Massachusetts Whig convention endorsed him, and Webster also locked up the delegates from his native New Hampshire. Elsewhere, Whig politicos resisted his charms. Since 1844, other names had evoked far more enthusiasm among party professionals.

Prior to the summer of 1846, the two front-runners for the nomination pursued decidedly different strategies than Webster. They contended that the party needed a fresh face and must spurn candidates who, like Webster and Clay, carried the baggage of National Republicanism. They and their boosters touted their appeal across party lines and their ability to bring non-Whigs to the party fold.

One was a man whose passion for the presidency had burned almost as long and torridly as Webster's: Associate Supreme Court Justice John McLean of Ohio. Postmaster general in the Monroe and Adams administrations, McLean had supported Jackson for president in 1828, and Jackson had appointed him to the Court in 1829. McLean had flirted with an Antimasonic candidacy in 1832 and was an early aspirant for the Whig nomination in 1836. Following McLean's cue, his supporters in New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana began to boom him in early 1845 as the champion of former Democrats in the Whig coalition.⁸

Sidelined from partisan politics since 1829 by his judgeship, McLean scorned a campaign based on specific Whig programs like Webster's. Instead, he appealed to residual antiparty sentiment among Whigs and especially to jealousy of National Republicans. McLean trumpeted himself as a foe of the corrupt spoilsmen and demagogues who controlled both major parties. As a reformer, he would restore the moral, "pure and elevated" nonpartisan statesmanship of Monroe's administration, when "the glory of our republic was at its height." McLean also boasted that his noninvolvement with traditional Whig issues would allow him to bring tens of thousands of moderate Democrats, Native Americans, Liberty men, and independents to his support. Posing as an outsider, a man above party and narrow partisan considerations who could restore a disinterested republican commitment to the common good, McLean hoped to avoid a national Whig convention and an exclusive Whig nomination. He relied instead on state and local endorsements to force regular Whig leaders to acquiesce in his candidacy.⁹

With his early support concentrated in the North, McLean needed southern followers to secure the nomination. His lieutenants like John B. Mower of New York City and the well-connected and seemingly ubiquitous Washington newspaper correspondent James E. Harvey therefore courted the influential Mangum by promising him the vice presidential candidacy on the McLean ticket. Some Tennessee Whigs like Milton Brown also leaned toward him because he had not opposed Texas' annexation. Meanwhile, McLean and his men targeted the group in the South most likely to respond to his antiparty appeal: the Virginia followers of William C. Rives, Conservative Democrats who had joined the Whig party only in 1840 and who saw themselves as the true guardians of the Jeffersonian Republican heritage of impartial government. Rives' closest supporters had bitterly complained after 1844 that "the Old Adams men," "the ultras who have blundered us into this miserable defeat will utterly ruin the party if the lead is not taken from them." Seeking to capitalize on this resentment, McLean wrote Rives in early 1846, lashing at "the hotheads and iron wills" who have "led the Whigs to defeat for many years past" and pontificating that "a victory on ultra ground can lead to no reform."10

McLean's effort suffered from fatal liabilities. He was a prominent Methodist layman, and his "Methodistical cant" caused Whigs, still spooked by memories of Frelinghuysen, to shun another "Psalm-singing Candidate." Legions of Ohio Whigs reviled him, thus jeopardizing his command of his home state. His entire strategy was predicated on the obsolescence of traditional partisan issues and partisan asperities, a strategy that the issue-oriented state and congressional campaigns of 1846–47 negated. McLean admitted as much. While other Whigs credited their triumphs in 1846 to specific attacks on Polk's economic policies, McLean sourly continued to insist "that we should make as few issues as possible and that they should be general." Most important, other possible candidates aroused more enthusiasm among Whig leaders.

At the beginning of 1846, McLean's chief rival was General Winfield Scott, whose battlefield heroics during the War of 1812 seemed more likely to broaden the Whig base than calls for nonpartisan government from the colorless jurist. Scott's name had been raised to the masthead of a few Ohio Whig papers even before 1844 ended. A November 1844 meeting of Philadelphia's Native Americans that boomed a Scott-McLean ticket for 1848 demonstrated the two men's relative appeal to nativists. "We go for success," Savannah's Thomas Butler King candidly told Scott in February 1845. "The people have shown, in all cases, their partiality for military men whenever they have been placed before them. All the civil merits of waggon bills and mill boys cannot give the eclat of a single victory on the battlefield." In March 1845, Ohio Senator Tom Corwin enthusiastically reported from Washington that Scott looked "ten feet high."

The Whigs' dismal electoral performance in 1845 apparently convinced other Whig leaders that a military hero offered the only chance of success. Numerous observers reported in January 1846 that Senators Crittenden, Clayton, and Mangum, all mentioned themselves as potential nominees, had dined with Scott and pledged him their support, although the reports differed as to whether they favored Corwin or Crittenden for the vice presidency. Crittenden denied these rumors, but he admitted that Scott expected the nomination and that he fit the requirements Crittenden thought the Whigs needed, a candidate who would not reunite the feuding Democrats against him. "We all think that if we can be wise we can succeed in the next Presidential election." By common consent, Scott was the front-runner in the spring of 1846.¹⁴

The outbreak of war with Mexico in May, passage of Democrats' economic program in midsummer, and the introduction of the Wilmot Proviso in August 1846 rearranged the race. Scott's stock plummeted. In correspondence with Secretary of War William L. Marcy, explaining why he remained in Washington making necessary preparations rather than moving at once to the front to command American forces, Scott complained that he feared "a fire upon my rear, from Washington." In another communication he blurted that a note from Marcy had interrupted him just as he was taking "a hasty plate of soup." To embarrass the Whigs' front-runner, the Democratic administration released these letters to the press. Gleeful Democrats across the country pounced on Scott's unfortunate phraseology to mock him as the "soup candidate" and to joke about the mammoth 350-pounder's ample posterior. Overnight he became a national laughingstock. Perceptive Whigs quickly pronounced him "used up for the Presidentsy [sic]." "Gen. S. has made a fudy of himself," concluded a Massachusetts Whig. "I always thought him an ass, and am more & more convinced of it every day." Scott had "committed suicide on the point of a goose quill," summed up the Boston Courier. 15

McLean initially benefited from Scott's blunders. His lieutenant John Teesdale edited the influential Ohio State Journal at Columbus, which began to promote him publicly in March 1846. During the summer his backers reported growing support in Pennsylvania, New York, New Jersey, and various New England states. A mass meeting in Pittsburgh formally launched his candidacy in January 1847, and many Whig congressmen formerly linked to Scott, like Mangum and Maryland's Reverdy Johnson, now scurried into McLean's camp. In late February, Seward informed Weed of the changing scene in Washington. McLean "is quite happy," Seward wrote. "Last Winter he was alone. Now he is manifestly the head of a party, and is visited, consulted and flattered as such."

Even as McLean's optimism soared, however, events catapulted other contenders ahead of him. Taylor's initial victories at Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma and again at Monterrey in September 1846 propeled him into the race as a popular hero who might replace the discredited Scott. Only after Taylor's apparently miraculous victory against overwhelming odds at Buena Vista in February 1847, however, did the Taylor boom achieve real power. Initially, other developments in the summer and fall of 1846 posed a greater challenge to McLean's hopes.

The Whig showing in the congressional and state elections of 1846 and early 1847 convinced many Whigs that the party could win the presidency in 1848 by denouncing the Walker Tariff, the Independent Treasury, Polk's veto of the Rivers and Harbors bill, and the war. Hence, an orthodox regular who championed Whig programs rather than an outsider like McLean or a military chieftain like Scott or Taylor seemed perfectly capable of leading the Whigs to the White House. Faith in the power of Whig issues caused some Whigs in the winter of 1846–47 to caution against the rush to McLean or any hasty nomination. Whigs should postpone all talk about their presidential candidate, urged Crittenden, and focus public attention instead upon "the conduct & measures of the present Administration which is now bringing down daily condemnation upon it, & the party that sustains it."

Indiana's Whigs, upon whose support McLean counted, illustrate the thinking that stymied him. Throughout 1845 and most of 1846, Godlove Orth had bemoaned the disadvantages Hoosier Whigs suffered on both national and state issues. At one point he had insisted that "we must 'stoop to conquer'" and jettison "high-strung Whig doctrine." By February 1847, however, he argued that "upon a calm survey of the issues that must necessarily enter largely—yes almost exclusively into [the 1848 presidential] campaign," he concluded "that the result will be crowned with victory to the Whigs." Insisting that Whig principles were "well known and settled and defined," Orth stated his criteria for the Whig nominee three months later. "I want a man whom I know to be a Whig, who by a long life has shown his devotion to ... our principles. The contest for President should be regarded as a contest of principles." "If you can't make prosolytes [sic]" by rehearsing Whig principles, another Indianan advised a Whig congressional candidate that year, "you can at least stimulate the Whig party and bring them out at the election." There it was! A campaign based on standard Whig issues aimed at drawing out the Whig faithful rather than making converts would doom the chances of men like McLean, Scott, and Taylor. It was a campaign designed for a regular candidate long identified with Whig programs. 18

Such sentiments certainly quickened the pulses of those "who by a long life" had demonstrated their devotion to Whig principles. The Whig comeback in 1846, ostensibly on omnipotent economic issues, raised Webster's hopes. ¹⁹ It also recharged the ambition of Kentucky's great man, thereby thrilling his legion of loyalists around the country.

In the winter of 1846–47 Clay would not allow his friends to boom him as a candidate, but he carefully hinted at his possible availability. For the moment, Clay was content to await events and to disparage potential rivals in letters that poured forth from Ashland. To check McLean's issueless campaign, Clay insisted that it was far too soon for Whigs to be considering the presidency and that they should concentrate instead on the issues generated by the Democrats. To stifle Webster's budding candidacy, Clay cleverly concentrated on Webster's proposed compromise tariff in the summer of 1846. "As to the Tariff of 1846," Clay advised Pennsylvania's Whigs, who complained that the party's commitment to the Tariff of 1842 had been insufficiently explicit in 1844, "I think our true policy is to go for its repeal, and the restoration of the Tariff of 1842, and nothing else than the repeal of the one and the restoration of the other."

Clay also adroitly played Taylor and Scott off against each other. In April 1847 he told Clayton, who had promoted Scott in early 1846, that he "decidedly prefer[red] Taylor to Scott." Yet a month later, after the news of Buena Vista had created a frenzy in Whig ranks, he informed his zealous backer Daniel Ullmann that attempts to bring Taylor out as a Whig candidate were premature. "There is much reason to hope that the Whig party may be able to elect any fair and honorable man they may choose to nominate." Lest this self-serving suggestion prove too subtle, Clay added, "Up to the battle of Buena Vista, I had reason to believe that there existed a fixed determination with the mass of the Whig party, throughout the United States, to bring me forward again." Besides, Clay predicted, Scott's military successes would undoubtedly cause some Whigs to prefer him to Taylor. "In the collisions which may arise," Clay cooed, "the Whig public may deem it wise and expedient finally to put aside both Generals, and select some civilian." Ullmann got the point. Clay should pretend not to be a candidate until Taylor and Scott killed each other off. "Then go it with a vengeance." 21

The renewed salience of specific issues by the fall of 1846 also allowed Mc-Lean's Ohio foes to promote Tom Corwin, the state's junior United States senator, to block McLean's bid. Corwin possessed a number of assets. Although he had long been prominent in the state party, serving as governor from 1840 to 1842. he was new to the national scene and could thus be presented as a fresh face to those Whigs who considered Clay and Webster too old and too vulnerable. In contrast to McLean, Corwin had participated in the fight against the Polk administration. Although the freshman had remained largely silent during the busy 1846 Senate session, he was on record as joining his fellow Whigs to vote against Democratic measures and for the Rivers and Harbors bill. He had announced at the end of that session that the combination of those issues should provide midwestern Whigs with an invincible platform, and that fall he had campaigned across Ohio, flaving the Democrats on behalf of Whig congressional and legislative candidates. A vigorous and spellbinding orator at the age of fifty-two, Corwin was far more popular among Ohio's Whigs than the aloof and antiseptic McLean, who turned sixty-one in 1846.22

McLean's friends railed at Corwin's selfish ambition, but the Corwin boom seems to have originated not with Corwin personally, but with Ohio Whigs who despised McLean and feared that if he won the nomination, the national Whig party would not turn to another Ohioan as its nominee for a generation. Dayton's Congressman Robert C. Schenck spearheaded this effort. After Ohio Whigs' triumphs in 1846, Schenck wrote Thomas Butler King, a member of Truman Smith's national campaign committee, that the Whigs could easily win the presidency in 1848 on the same issues they had exploited that year. "Give us Corwin to fight for in 1848, & we'll tell the old story of 1840." Upon returning to Congress in December 1846, Schenck spread the word that McLean could never carry Ohio, while Corwin would sweep it.²³

Corwin fanned this boomlet in February 1847 with his electrifying speech against the Mexican War and his vote against military supplies. Many Ohio Whigs in the House, including Schenck, had been among the "immortal fourteen" who had refused to vote for men and materiel in May 1846, and most Whigs in the state abhorred the conflict. By assuming national leadership of the antiwar movement, Corwin enormously increased his attractiveness to such men. By the end of February, Ohio's entire Whig congressional delegation boomed him, and the Ohio State Journal, no longer edited by McLean's friend Teesdale, declared that Corwin's speech would be "more read and more admired than any other made in Congress for twenty years past." Corwin's sudden fame won him backing outside of Ohio as well. The influential Greeley told several Whigs in the winter and spring of 1847 that he now favored Corwin for the nomination.

Corwin's injection into the race infuriated McLean. What most galled McLean was that Corwin's emergence as the leading antiwar Whig forced him to abandon his calculated reticence on current affairs. Prior to Corwin's speech, McLean himself had privately counseled Whig congressmen to vote against all appropriations for the war.²⁵ After Corwin preempted the antiwar ground with his February speech, however, McLean wrote an editorial for the Cincinnati Gazette that bluntly questioned the patriotism of those who refused to vote for supplies, insisted that Congress had to support the army while the war lasted, and argued that Whigs must concentrate instead on preventing any territorial acquisition from Mexico. This stance offended Ohio's extreme antiwar Whigs but, as McLean informed Teesdale and Rives, it was the best way to win over Pennsylvania and southern Whigs who were adopting exactly that position in the winter of 1846–47. McLean, who had once trumpeted his ability to win over Liberty men, was thus forced to forsake the party's extreme antiwar and antislavery wing and to look for a different constituency.²⁶

Antislavery Whigs' growing intransigence also affected calculations about the Whig nominee. Even in 1844 a few had vowed never again to vote for Clay or any other slaveholder. Their conviction that the Mexican War reflected a Slave Power plot to spread slavery, their disgust at Whigs who condoned sending supplies for a proslavery war, and their disdain for the attempt to substitute No Territory for the Wilmot Proviso only increased their demand for an openly antislavery Northerner as a presidential candidate in 1848. Neither Clay, Crittenden, Clayton, Mangum, Webster, nor McLean suited them. By the end of 1846 Massachusetts' Charles Sumner and his fellow Young Whig, Henry Wilson, predicted that they would have to combine with antislavery Democrats and Liberty men "who join in warfare with slavery & the 'Slave Power'" to run a separate northern candidate. "The free state Whigs must dictate the policy of the Party or the Party had better be defeated and broken up," insisted Wilson. The Whig candidate must be explicitly committed against slavery extension. "I for one had rather see the Party defeated than that we should succeed with any slaveholder or any Northern man with Southern principles."27

After Corwin delivered his thunderous antiwar speech, antislavery Whigs greeted him as a messiah. Here was the antiwar, antislavery, northern candidate they had prayed for! From the spring until the fall of 1847, antislavery Whigs in Ohio, Massachusetts, and elsewhere became the driving force behind the Corwin movement. What had begun as a stop-McLean tactic became a vehicle for northern resentment against slavery and slaveholders. To the dismay of older, more conservative Ohio Whigs, who insisted that the state party must await and abide by the decision of a national convention, local groups of younger Whigs in the Western Reserve, motivated by "hatred to the War," began booming Corwin for president in April 1847. The Corwin boom, Giddings explained, would increase "opposition to the war and slavery." Since Ohio's Whigs would never vote for a "slaveholder or supporter of the war," he added, "Corwin's early nomination may save us from defeat by preventing the nomination of a man on whom we cannot unite."

New England's Young Whigs were said to be enraptured with Corwin's speech. "I hear it said all around that we must have him for our candidate," reported Wilson. Yet even as they rejoiced that Providence had given them Corwin as a leader, antislavery Whigs voiced doubts. For one thing, Corwin displayed no ambition to be president or to lead an antislavery phalanx. "You know, as I do, in spite of what the public supposes, Corwin is a timid man," Greeley advised Giddings. "I don't know anybody more afraid of getting his feet wet." More important, although Corwin had discharged a withering fusillade against the iniquity of the war and the rape of Mexican territory, he had said nothing about the Wilmot Proviso or slavery. "Tell him to come out strong in favor of the Wilmot Proviso," Wilson urged Giddings. "We can give him every state in New England if he will take the right ground against slavery." To these entreaties Giddings could only reply that he was sure Corwin would take "a correct position . . . in regard to slavery" at the next session of Congress in December.²⁹

Corwin, in fact, was cut from far more conservative cloth than the antislavery Whigs who so exuberantly embraced him. He passionately opposed the war because he loved the Union, not because he hated slavery or because he yearned for the presidency. Just as Clay had warned in his Raleigh Letter of 1844 about Texas' annexation, Corwin wanted to end the war to avoid sectional conflict over slavery extension, not, as antislavery Whigs wished, to "make a direct issue with the South." Corwin made his position clear in a widely publicized speech at Carthage, Ohio, in September 1847. Criticizing abolitionists as provocateurs of sectional discord, Corwin condemned the Wilmot Proviso as a "dangerous question" and advocated instead that Congress pledge to take no territory from Mexico to prevent disruption of the Union. A few days later, in a letter meant for publication in the Cincinnati Atlas, Corwin complained that his speech had been misunderstood and that the Proviso must be adopted if new territory were acquired. Still, he averred, opposition to territorial acquisition was the best way to stop slavery expansion and preserve sectional harmony in the Whig party and the Union.³⁰

Deeply disillusioned, antislavery Whigs in Massachusetts and Ohio abruptly jettisoned Corwin. By the end of 1847 they were talking more and more seriously about cutting loose from southern Whigs and launching a new, explicitly antislavery, northern party. The Corwin boom of 1847, nonetheless, had decisively altered the presidential race. His popularity in Ohio gravely challenged McLean's claims to be the state's favorite son. By smoking McLean out on the war, Corwin had also damaged the judge's prospects among antislavery Whigs in other northern states.³¹

Nor did McLean's attempt to offset the loss of antislavery men by courting southern Whigs bear fruit. While the Wilmot Proviso strengthened some Northerners' insistence that the candidate must not be a slaveholder, it also convinced many southern Whigs that he must be one. In the fall of 1846 Southerners largely ignored the Proviso, and the prominence of southern Whigs like Mangum and Reverdy Johnson in the McLean camp in early February 1847 reflected their belief, among other things, that the Whigs' next candidate should come from the North.³² Yet the acerbic debates that followed the reintroduction of the Proviso in the second session of the Twenty-Ninth Congress changed many Southerners' minds. The turning point came on February 19, 1847, eight days after Corwin's oration against the war.

On that date Calhoun introduced into the Senate a series of resolutions denouncing any congressional legislation to bar slavery from the territories as an unconstitutional deprivation of Southerners' property rights and a humiliating violation of southern equality. Southerners' submission to Wilmot's Proviso, raged Calhoun, would acknowledge their inferiority to Northerners. "I would rather meet any extremity upon earth than to give up an inch of our equality," he thundered. "The surrender of life is nothing to sinking down into acknowledged inferiority." Georgia's Whig Governor George W. Crawford immediately recognized Calhoun's purpose. For twenty years, he correctly noted, Calhoun had been trying to break down party lines in the South in order to form a separate southern party to confront the North. His resolutions marked a renewal of that effort. Immediately after Congress adjourned, Calhoun, in an address at Charleston, openly called on Southerners to abandon the Whig and Democratic parties, shun their national conventions, and combine in a united front behind a proslavery presidential candidate to protect slavery and Southern Rights from northern aggression.33

Few southern Whigs believed that Calhoun could create a separate southern party, especially when the economic and war issues of 1846–47 had revived interparty animosities. Both Democratic and Whig papers, indeed, quickly denounced the notion as a product of Calhoun's unslaked ambition for the presidency. A few Whigs did fear that an independent Calhoun candidacy might cut into their southern electorate. What worried them far more, however, was that Calhoun had permanently changed the equation of presidential politics by focusing attention on the danger that the Proviso posed to slavery and Southern Rights. This fear was confirmed as early as May, when Democratic state conventions in Alabama and Georgia and prominent Democratic politicians and newspapers in Virginia, Mississippi, and Florida insisted that their party have a candidate who opposed the Proviso and who would protect Southern Rights. As in 1844, southern Whigs again faced the risk of being one-upped on the slavery issue.³⁴

Even before southern Democrats threw down that gauntlet, William Ballard Preston, a Virginia Whig congressional candidate, warned Rives that Southerners would now demand a proslavery candidate who could avert "the impending danger" of sectional dissolution. "General Taylor beyond doubt is the man for the crisis. He is sound on the slave question. He is not embarrassed by it." Taylor could prevent a sectional collision because "his claims address themselves to the patriotism, love, pride, gratitude of the land." Thus, "the South finds him the only man at their command whose position enables us to offer a candidate to the nation with the least hope of success."³⁵

Sixteen months before the Whig national convention, Preston outlined southern Whigs' case for Taylor's nomination. As a planter who owned over 100 slaves in Louisiana and Mississippi, he was manifestly safe for the South; as a patriot and war hero, he was acceptable to the North. Taylor, in short, was advanced by Southerners not simply as a proslavery candidate but as the personification of nationalism, who—somehow—would heal the sectional rift unleashed by the Proviso.

Southern Whigs' insistance, as the Florida Sentinel put it, that "just as long as the Wilmot Proviso is an open question, WE ARE FOR A SOUTHERN MAN AND A SLAVEHOLDER FOR THE PRESIDENCY," obviously menaced the bid of the Ohioan McLean. Just as Corwin was outflanking McLean among northern antiwar, antislavery Whigs, Taylor seemed capable of outflanking him among proslavery Whigs in the South. And McLean knew it. By the end of April 1847 the frustrated judge complained that Taylor "is rallied upon by a set of politicians determined to give ascendancy to the South, and to advance themselves. They expect to control the administration."

Ш

Doubt that the Whigs could win the presidency with a regular advocate of Whig economic policies played just as great a role in turning Whigs toward Rough and Ready as southern fears about the Proviso in the spring of 1847. Since Democrats would get credit for the prosperity produced by the unexpected grain sales abroad and by Walker's financing of the war, Tennessee Whig Congressman Meredith P. Gentry predicted in February 1847, Whigs must run Taylor in 1848. The general, he declared, could easily secure the Whig nomination "but for his negroes and cotton bales." Here then was a southern Whig who recognized that Taylor's slaveholding was as great a liability as an asset. He and other Whigs wanted Taylor because changed economic conditions had undermined an issue-oriented campaign.³⁷

The most important convert was Crittenden, who began to act as Taylor's unofficial campaign manager. Long an acolyte of Clay, Crittenden took seriously Clay's intention to retire from political life after 1844. Dismayed by the dismal Whig performance in 1845, Crittenden had joined other congressional Whigs in promoting Scott, but unlike them, he had studiously kept his distance from the McLean boomlet in the winter of 1846–47 in the temporary hope that the party could exploit the issues generated by the Democrats. By the spring of 1847 he had abandoned that hope and turned instead to Taylor.³⁸

In part, personal considerations shaped Crittenden's shift of allegiance. Though born in Virginia, Taylor was raised in Kentucky, where Crittenden befriended him. Crittenden's first wife was Taylor's cousin, and his son served on Taylor's staff in Mexico. Crittenden corresponded regularly with the general during the war, and it was apparently he who finally persuaded Taylor to toss his hat into the ring.

In letters to Crittenden and others throughout 1846 Taylor adamantly refused to be a candidate, despite the popularity his early victories had won him. Citing his total lack of experience in civil affairs and partisan politics, he insisted that "under no circumstances have I any aspirations for the office" and hoped Clay or Crittenden would be the nominee. During the winter of 1846–47, however, Taylor grew increasingly embittered at the Polk administration and at Scott, and the thought that some Democrat or Scott himself might win the presidency in 1848 because the Whigs proved unable to unite behind a viable candidate enraged him. Thus, when Crittenden obliquely suggested in March 1847 that Taylor could vindicate his reputation in the political arena, Taylor responded in May that while he still preferred "some able & tried Whig, . . . if my friends deem it for the good of the country that I be a candidate . . . be it so."³⁹

Beyond personal intimacy, Crittenden turned to Taylor rather than McLean in the spring of 1847 because Taylor possessed what the Ohioan only aspired to—demonstrable appeal across party lines because of his military exploits. Taylor won his greatest victory at precisely the same time that Calhoun sought to unite Southerners in defense of Southern Rights, and martial glory was obviously the chief source of Taylor's appeal. On February 23, 1847, four days after Calhoun introduced his anti-Proviso resolutions in the Senate, Taylor gained a stunning triumph against a much larger Mexican force at Buena Vista. Even though the skill and vigor of Taylor's subordinates, rather than Taylor's generalship, produced the victory, Taylor got the credit.⁴⁰ As word of the triumph spread from the Mississippi Valley to the Atlantic Coast in late March and early April, a volcano of enthusiasm erupted for its supposed author. Scores of mass meetings quickly proclaimed Taylor as the people's choice for president, and newspapers of every partisan description began to boom him.

Taylor's meteoric ascent astounded Whig and Democratic politicians alike. Worried friends of other aspirants like McLean and Webster described it as a fever or contagion that must be allowed to run its course. Less biased observers saw an irresistible tide carrying the general toward an inevitable electoral triumph. Two days after reading about the battle, the shrewd Weed wrote, ''If Gen. Taylor's life should be spared, he will be our next President. Circumstances over which no man, or class of men, have control, will produce this result.''⁴¹

To a great extent, the Taylor boom of 1847 was spontaneous and nonpartisan. To be sure, some Whigs immediately grabbed for the hero's coattails to exploit his popularity for their party's advantage. Yet for most of 1847 they had no monopoly on his name and prestige. Democrats across the country also rushed to take up the Hero of Buena Vista despite warnings from the Democratic press that nothing was known about his principles. Editors of the Washington Union, the administration organ at the capital, spoke in May of nominating Taylor before the Whigs did because they feared that "nothing but death can prevent Taylor from being our next President." Calhoun's closest followers among southern Democrats, despairing of a separate southern party, urged Calhoun instead to organize "a new National Republican party" behind Taylor's candidacy. If the slaveholding statesman had made too many enemies among both Whigs and Democrats to unite Southerners across party lines, they reasoned, the slaveholding general without political baggage might banish "Whiggery and democracy both . . . from the South." Nativists also claimed Taylor as one of their own, and in September 1847 the national convention of the Pennsylvania-based Native American party recommended him as the "People's Candidate for President." Similarly, many of the mass meetings that mushroomed in the spring and summer of 1847 promoted Taylor as a "People's" or "No Party" candidate rather than as a Whig, Democrat, or Native American.42

The attempt to portray Taylor as a nonpartisan, even antiparty, people's candidate ultimately proved to be his campaign's most important aspect. Different men with different motives arrived at that strategy simultaneously. In part, the "No Party" label reflected the determination of genuinely nonpartisan mass meetings to prevent the major parties, which had thitherto controlled the presidency, from denying Taylor the office. To some extent as well, it represented a device by dissident Democrats and Whigs to outflank their intraparty rivals who controlled the regular party machinery and to use Taylor's popularity to capture control of state organizations. In Kentucky, for example, at the same time that Crittenden's lieutenants tried to mobilize Whigs for Taylor, long-time Whig foes of both Clay and Crittenden like Thomas F. Marshall, Robert and Charles Wickliffe, Ben Hardin, and John Helm organized No Party Taylor meetings to neutralize the regular Whig apparatus that their foes dominated. More important, men who stood outside both major parties seized on the enthusiasm for Taylor as a weapon to smash the monopolistic grip they held on the political life of the nation. The public was disgusted with both the Whigs and the Democrats, declared the Cincinnati Signal in an open letter to Taylor in May. It was time for someone to "take independent ground and become president of the people!"⁴³

Disparate groups could seize upon Taylor as a potential candidate because he utterly lacked political experience. He had never voted, let alone participated in the activities of any party. Before the Mexican War elevated him to prominence, even his military career had been obscure. In short, he seemed eminently malleable. What people learned of Taylor from newspaper accounts made him appear a perfect choice. He was unpretentious, plainspoken, and plain-dressed—in contrast to the pompous Scott—courageous, and unflappable in the face of the enemy. Taylor thus seemed to embody the virtue and genius of the mythical republican citizen who in time of crisis heroically sprang to the defense of his country. That the Buena Vista battle began on February 22 had extraordinary symbolic significance. Here was a new Cincinnatus, a man who, like the revered Washington, stood above party, a man without personal ambition dedicated to the common good, a man who indeed might be able to restore the glories of the early republic.

Conceiving of himself as nonpartisan, Taylor personally fomented the People's or No Party campaign. Various contemporaries and a number of subsequent historians considered Taylor a babe in the political woods, a hopelessly ignorant and unskilled amateur. Yet the tactics he pursued in 1847 and 1848 and the views he expressed in his private correspondence reveal instead a shrewd political observer with a keen understanding of how he could win the election. Taylor's ideas and strategy were strikingly similar to those of McLean, and they strikingly foreshadowed his postelection agenda.

Throughout 1847 Taylor carefully fostered his image as a No Party man, as a true republican who put the public interest ahead of party goals. He cheerfully accepted nominations from any group that tendered them—Whigs, Democrats, nativists, Calhounites, and independents—"as long," he wrote, "as they continue[d] to use [his name] independent of party distinctions." Both in his private correspondence and in letters published in newspapers across the country, Taylor repeatedly and emphatically insisted that "in no case can I permit myself to be a candidate of any party, or yield myself to any party schemes." Just as McLean had earlier, he declared that while he would accept spontaneous support from the people, he could never acquiesce in his selection by a formal national party convention. It would be an enormous mistake for the Whigs even to hold a national convention, Taylor warned Crittenden and others. As an independent "People's" candidate, he could garner the support of a "strong party of Whigs, Democrats, & Natives." By arousing the mutual animosity between Whigs and Democrats, a convention nomination would also destroy Taylor's "hope of allaying party asperity which has been carried much to [sic] far, for the interest of the country, & the well being of society."46

Taylor's attitude toward the presidency and traditional partisan issues also paralleled McLean's. "Although a Whig I do not wish or intend to be a party president in the strict sense of the term if elected," he promised Crittenden in December 1847. "Our affairs ought & must be so managed that the honor & offices of the country could be equally distributed according to numbers among the Whigs, Democrats, & natives." Taylor was equally indifferent to programs Whigs had long considered vital. Publicly, he was artfully ambiguous, refusing to answer queries about his views on banking, the tariff, and internal improvements. Privately, he was more forthright. The idea of a national bank "is dead, & will not be revived in my time." In the future the tariff "will be increased only for revenue"; in other words, Whig hopes of restoring the protective tariff of 1842 were vain. There would never again be surplus federal funds from public land sales to distribute to the states, and internal improvements "will go on in spite of presidential vetoes." In a few words, that is, Taylor pronounced an epitaph for the entire Whig economic program. Such issues, "which have divided the two great parties, Whigs and Democrats," he maintained, should "for the most part be considered as settled at any rate for many years to come, if not by the act of limitation at least by common consent." Thus he scorned the "rabid politicians on both sides [who] hold on to the whole of them with greatest tenacity, and enter their discussion when generally acknowledged to be dead, with the same warmth and zeal, as if the existence of the union depended on their doing so."47

Taylor's repeated rejection of party ties, his palpable appeal across party lines, and the possibility that he might indeed win the presidency without the official blessing of either major party account for his attraction to many of the elements that initially boomed him. Patently, the tiny Native American party had no chance of electing a president unless it could break the major parties' lock on most voters. Similarly, Calhounites who saw "Party Organizations" as "the curse of the Union" believed that "Genl. Taylor is the best man to break up those long standing corrupt organizations, which have exercised more despotism over the citizen than ever existed under any other constitutional Government."48 For the same reasons, Conservative Democratic followers of New York's Nathaniel P. Tallmadge and Virginia's Rives also quickly embraced Taylor as a true people's candidate, as "a Democratic-Republican of our school," as another George Washington who stood above the corrupt strife of parties.⁴⁹ The Conservative Democratic wing of the Virginia Whig party, urged William Ballard Preston, must ignore Clay's friends and organize the state for Taylor in order to "be in the van of this great popular, republican and virtuous movement which is to emancipate all from the excesses of party and relieve all from the fearful consequences which successful combinations for vicious party ends have brought upon the land."50

To less discontented Whigs, Taylor's nonpartisan appeal posed a dilemma. His obvious attractiveness to non-Whigs thrilled those who, by the spring of 1847, despaired of winning on economic issues or without the help of defecting Democrats. Such men eagerly promoted him as the Whig nominee. In addition to Crittenden's activities in Kentucky, for example, John Pendleton Kennedy worked to have Maryland's state central committee and state convention endorse Taylor in July 1847. Enthusiasm for Taylor "springs from spontaneous combustion, and will sweep all before it," Kennedy explained. "We are anxious therefore to place the General in the Whig ranks, and to show that with whatever evil designs Locofocoism invented this war, the Whigs have executed it with imperishable honor to themselves." Georgia's Alexander H. Stephens arranged for Georgia's state Whig convention in June to nominate Taylor. Like other southern Whigs, he wanted a slaveholding candidate, but he also sought to exploit Taylor's martial luster to cut into the growing Democratic vote among nonslaveholders in northwestern Georgia. Yet Stephens also hoped to upstage his intraparty rival Berrien, who continued to favor Clay and deplored "the rage" for "military candidates." Neill S. Brown, the Whig gubernatorial candidate in Tennessee, also promoted Taylor for president in the summer of 1847 to attach military glamor to the Whig cause. For the same reason, the entire Whig delegation to the Illinois state constitutional convention that summer endorsed the hero, as had a mass meeting of Iowa Whigs. Undeterred by Taylor's unconventional views, such men wanted a winner regardless of the potential consequences for the Whig party.⁵¹

Taylor's refusal to commit himself exclusively to a Whig nomination, his apparent ignorance of Whig principles, and his preference for a nonpartisan administration of government, however, aroused visceral suspicions among many Whigs. Still haunted by memories of Tyler, they feared they might be buying a pig in a poke. As more and more letters from Taylor appeared during the summer of 1847, more and more Whigs declared their unwillingness to sacrifice everything the Whig party stood for merely to achieve victory behind an announced No Party man. The party, they insisted, must nominate a certifiable Whig.

Rival candidates and their partisans agitated much of this backlash to slow Taylor's accelerating bandwagon. "We want no 'no party' candidate," declared the pro-Scott Harrisburg Pennsylvania Telegraph. Clay loyalists, who viewed support for the Kentuckian "to be a duty growing out of fidelity to Whig principles," especially fumed at the Taylor boom. Whigs needed a candidate "thoroughly and publicly committed to Whig principles and Whig policy," insisted Virginia's John Minor Botts. Taylor's refusal to accept a convention nomination was outrageous. "If we were to vote for Genl. Taylor on the terms he proposes we could only do so by a disorganization of the Whig party." North Carolina's pro-Clay Whig Congressman David Outlaw chorused the same refrain: "The Whig party cannot without disgrace or dishonor" run any candidate other than an "avowed Whig." 52

Distrust of Taylor's no-convention, no-party, no-issue posture extended beyond jealous rivals. Still uncommitted Whigs, especially in the North, voiced similar reservations. To gain northern Whig support, Tennessee's Senator John Bell admitted in December 1847, Taylor must declare unequivocally that he was a Whig and would accept the nomination from a Whig convention. Even that would not be enough for most northern Whigs. "I go for no man blind," declared Indiana's Godlove Orth. Taylor must openly endorse Whig principles. Threefourths of northern Whig congressmen, Indiana Congressman Caleb Smith reported from Washington in early 1848, believed "that Genl. Taylor cannot be run with the least prospect of success in the North, if he shall adhere to his present position of declining to give his opinions. The idea of running him as a 'No Party candidate' is out of the question." Taylor's "nomination and election," unaccompanied by his "unqualified" commitment to Whigs' "known & universally acknowledged principles," echoed Buffalo Congressman Nathan K. Hall, "would end in the annihilation of the Whig party." Infuriated by Taylor's acceptance of the Native American nomination in early 1848, Cincinnati editor Thomas B. Stevenson, who ten months earlier had endorsed the general, was even more emphatic. "If we don't get a true blue nominated by the N[ational] Conv[ention]," he exclaimed, "I am for making organizations all over the north, to beat Taylor, believing that next to the success of our principles, that is the best thing we can do." 53

Northern Whigs opposed Taylor's nomination for three reasons. Even more than their southern colleagues, they were firmly committed to Whig economic programs and sincerely believed that the primary justification for the party's existence was to promote them. Throughout most of 1847 they were convinced that the Whigs could carry northern states with those issues, as they had in 1846. Willingly to abandon those principles for a noncommittal candidate thus struck them as outrageous and suicidal.

Outrage at the Mexican War as an immoral aggression was also especially widespread among northern Whig voters. Northern Whig politicians believed their antiwar constituents simply would not tolerate a candidate whose fame rested on his participation in that heinous invasion. Southern Whigs and prowar northern Whigs who gloried in the military heroics of the war were behind the Taylor candidacy, warned Ohio's Columbus Delano, and if he is run, "distraction, and in the free states, defeat awaits us." "The excitement for Taylor is all over, and I do not know a single Whig in this part of the state in his favor," echoed a western New York Whig in January 1848. As the odious war dragged on and as the prospect loomed that Democrats would demand all of Mexico, Taylor's refusal openly to espouse Whig principles appeared especially unconscionable to men from antiwar constituencies. Unless Taylor took "the 'No Territory' ground," unless he "avow his hostility to the prosecution of the Mexican War for the purposes of conquest," northern Whig after northern Whig affirmed, his nomination "would use us up in the northern states." "54

Northern Whigs' deep hostility to slavery expansion also powered their insistence that Taylor openly renounce territorial acquisition. That some southern Whigs explicitly promoted Taylor because he was a large slaveholder virtually disqualified him for some. Personal hostility to slavery extension, resentment at an apparent southern attempt to dictate the nominee, and a conviction that their northern constituents would never abide a Whig candidate who favored slavery extension all turned them against him. Fervent antislavery Whigs like Henry Wilson and Charles Sumner of Massachusetts denounced Taylor's candidacy from the start and demanded that free state Whigs select their own candidate if Taylor secured the regular Whig nomination. Condemning "the slave influence" as unyielding, Charles Hudson of Massachusetts, who was not a Young Whig, snarled that "the southern Whigs want to go for Taylor on the ground of slavery, even if they knew it would break up the Whig party." Repeating Thomas Stevenson's May warning to Crittenden, Corwin iterated in September that Ohio Whigs would support no candidate who was not explicitly pledged against slavery in new territories. Taylor must publicly endorse the Wilmot Proviso to carry New York and other northern states, Greeley editorialized in his influential New York Tribune. By the fall of 1847, numerous observers reported that "antislavery sentiment is stronger than the appetite for warriors" among Whig voters in New England, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Ohio.55

Had northern Whigs known what Taylor was privately writing to southern friends about the proper settlement of the war and slavery extension issues, their objections to his candidacy may have been mitigated. Taylor considered the sectional dispute over slavery the most dangerous issue that had ever threatened the Union, yet he also believed that the Wilmot Proviso was a gratuitous insult invented by agitators to array North against South. It was, concluded this veteran planter and slaveholder, wholly unnecessary. The parts of northern Mexico American armies had occupied were so barren that "no one will, while in his senses, carry his slaves there." Since Mexican law prohibited slavery in that territory and since Northerners in Congress would never tolerate the establishment of slavery there, the best settlement of the war would be to fix the Rio Grande River as the border of Texas and take no additional territory south of 36° 30'. In short, Taylor privately endorsed the southern Whig position of No Territory, which, by the end of 1847, many northern Whigs also embraced as the best way to stop slavery expansion and preserve sectional harmony.⁵⁶

But these views had not been publicized, and northern enthusiasm for Taylor had palpably waned by the fall of 1847. "The Taylor stock is quite flat in this region," mourned a New York Taylor man in October. Taylor's decline raised the hope of other contenders like McLean, Corwin, and Webster. By the end of 1847, however, many northern Whigs were turning to yet another name to stop Taylor and capture the Whig nomination. Previously convinced of the inevitability of Taylor's nomination, New York's sagacious Seward and Weed now believed that Whigs would choose a man for whom they had never evinced much enthusiasm, a man whose closest New York supporters had long fought their control of the state Whig organization. The Whig ticket, Weed told Seward over dinner in October, would be Henry Clay for president and Seward himself for vice president.⁵⁷

Until midsummer of 1847, Clay kept a low political profile. Privately knifing other potential candidates and insisting that the party nominate "an unmistakeable [sic] Whig," he was genuinely reluctant to hazard another campaign. Since 1845, he had repeatedly asserted that only a unanimous demand by the Whig party and a certain prospect of victory could induce him to run again. He well understood why his record as a three-time loser diminished confidence among Whigs that he could lead them to victory. Whig triumphs in the issue-oriented campaigns of 1846 and early 1847 dissipated much of his pessimism, but the apparent ebbing of the Whig tide in the summer of 1847 gave him pause. Furthermore, a prolonged period of mourning occasioned by the death of his son and namesake at the battle of Buena Vista precluded public speeches on current affairs that might signal his reentry into active political life.

Even during this period of quiescence, however, Clay positioned himself for another race by rectifying the weaknesses that were blamed for his downfall in 1844. Some of the reasons Whigs cited for that defeat, such as Democratic fraud, were beyond his personal power to remedy. Others, specifically the antagonism of immigrants and Catholics who believed that he had bargained with nativists, the "character issue" that had caused deeply religious Northerners to reject him as immoral, and his alienation of antislavery Whigs in the North by the Alabama letters, were attributable to the candidate himself. Clay clearly determined not to repeat those mistakes should he run again. Clay's whole effort for the Whig nomination in 1848, therefore, reversed his strategy of 1844. Where he had been portrayed as an ally of nativists, he would now pose as immigrants' friend. Where he had been smeared as a godless profligate, he would embrace organized Christianity. Where he had seemed to bend to the pressure of proslavery Southerners, he would now bid emphatically to antislavery Northerners. Only through such a dramatic reversal of tactics, in fact, could he hope to attract those elements of the Whig party most offended by the Taylor movement.

In the fall of 1844 Clay had welcomed, even if he had not blatantly courted, the support of American Republicans in the crucial states of New York and Pennsylvania. Immediately after that election, however, he had warned Whigs against merging with the nativist party, lest they mobilize still more immigrants against them. By 1847 he was ready publicly to erase any stigma of nativism still attached to him. In January, prior to his son's death, he made a speech at New Orleans calling on Americans to send relief to famine-plagued Ireland. In April, he firmly rejected an inquiry from Peter Sken Smith, Philadelphia's Native American leader, as to whether he would accept the organization's presidential nomination. Greeley later published that reply in the Tribune to contrast Clay's rebuff to the nativists with Taylor's willingness to accept their support.

After a Native American national convention recommended Taylor for the presidency in September, Clay intensified his bid to the nativists' targets. He privately asked Smith to return all letters he had written him in 1844 so that they could not be circulated against him in 1848. Then, in a public address in Lexington, Kentucky, in November primarily devoted to the Mexican War, Clay went out of his way to woo Catholics and immigrants. Comparing Mexico to "poor, gallant, generous, and oppressed Ireland," he called for harmony between Protestants and Catholics and boldly asserted that "no potentate in Europe, whatever his religion may be, [is] more enlightened or at this moment so interesting as the liberal head of the Papal See." The contrast with Taylor could not have been clearer. "59"

Even as Clay distanced himself from the most bigoted anti-Catholics, he reassured Protestants on the character issue that had haunted him throughout his public career. Personal tragedy, not cynical calculation, inspired his religious conversion. Forced to ponder the meaning of death by the loss of his son in Mexico, the grief-stricken seventy-year-old statesman was baptized into the Episcopal Church during a private ceremony at his Ashland estate in June 1847. Friendly Whig newspapers broadcast these tidings to the nation, and grateful Protestant clergymen congratulated him for finally becoming "a member of the visible Church of Christ."

Clay's age itself, of course, had also seemed an obstacle precluding another race after his dispiriting defeat in 1844, but by the fall of 1847 he had dissipated some of the qualms it caused. In trips to New Orleans, Baton Rouge, and Mobile in the winter of the year, his excellent health and youthful appearance drew widespread comment. By the summer he himself was surprised at how good he felt, and on a widely reported trip to White Sulphur Springs and then via Baltimore and Philadelphia to Cape May, New Jersey, in July and August he dazzled onlookers with his vigor and stamina, animatedly greeting throngs of admirers for hour after hour at every stop and even frolicking with young women in the surf at the Jersey shore. Newspapers described him as looking forty-five or fifty, not a superannuated relic of the past. Even though he said absolutely nothing about public events on the trip, Clay's energy, elan, and palpable popularity convinced both his admirers and his rivals that he was still a viable candidate.⁶¹

As Clay made his way homeward in September, a number of Whig presses and public meetings in Ohio, Pennsylvania, and New York boomed him for the Whig nomination and demanded, contrary to the wishes of the Taylorites, that the Whigs hold a national convention to select their nominee. The most important convert to Clay's banner was Greeley, who for most of 1847 had favored Corwin for the nomination and who as late as April 24 had pronounced Clay "out of the question." "What man lives except Henry Clay whom any great proportion of the People really desire to see President?" Greeley asked in the Tribune on September 3. Later that fall, as enthusiasm for Corwin among northern antislavery Whigs waned, Greeley, who despised the thought of Taylor's nomination, embraced Clay as the best stop-Taylor candidate even more emphatically. Greeley's conversion, in turn, suggested that "Seward, Weed, Greeley & Co" were now willing to take up the Kentuckian.⁶²

By the time Clay reached home on September 19, 1847, he was ready to run again, although he still refused to commit himself irrevocably to the race. The growing resistance to Taylor's nomination among northern Whigs, the widely expressed demand for a candidate committed to Whig principles, the warm reception he had received in the East, and the evidence of support elsewhere in the North revived his optimism that another effort could succeed. A letter to Ashland from Joseph L. White, a New York loyalist, complaining that press accounts indicated that Kentucky's Whigs preferred Taylor to Clay, spurred him to vindicate his status as chief of the state and national party. Above all, he considered Taylor unfit for the office. Like the supporters who beseeched him to run to reaffirm Whig principles, he feared that Taylor's nomination meant abdication of the policies and dissolution of the party he had worked so long to establish. He simply could not tolerate the idea that either he or his creation should be abandoned.⁶³

Beginning in late September, Clay rapidly made preparations for his candidacy. After recalling his letters of 1844 from Peter Sken Smith, he attempted to neutralize the impression that Kentucky's Whigs were committed to Taylor. He wrote Crittenden that the organizers of Kentucky's Taylor meetings were his "personal enemies." He had still not decided whether to consent to the use of his name, he informed Crittenden, but he would "regret extremely any collision" between Taylor's friends and his own. The implication was clear: Clay expected Kentucky's Whigs, including Crittenden, to rally behind him should he enter the race. Then, in October, Judge George Robertson and other Clay men in Lexington sent a confidential printed circular to various Whig leaders around the country. Contending that the Taylor meetings in Kentucky had not been as numerous or as well attended as newspaper accounts indicated, it insisted that most Kentucky Whigs still preferred Clay. No direct evidence exists that Clay arranged this circular, but since it met so directly White's concern that Whigs elsewhere believed Kentucky had deserted him, it is difficult to believe he did not. "If the Whig party cannot elect him," Robertson later wrote Georgia's Berrien, "it can elect no one, as a Whig."64

Even as he moved to hold Whigs in and outside of Kentucky behind him, Clay wrote to Taylor directly in late September, apparently to persuade the general not to stand in his way should he run again. "I fully agree with you in the necessity for more deliberation in the selection of a candidate for the presidency," Taylor replied on November 4. He added that he had written Crittenden "that I was ready to stand aside, if you or any other Whig were the choice of the party and that I sincerely hoped such might be their decision." He fully understood the importance of harmony within the party, "and whatever may be the decision of the party, I shall be studiously guarded in this particular, and strive to lend my best endeavor to the preservation of unity."

Before Clay received this apparent pledge to step aside, which Taylor would subsequently renege on, he decided to make a public speech to reassert his leadership of the party. Although he continued to view Democrats' economic record as vulnerable, he understood that the prosperity of 1847 had temporarily neutralized attacks upon it.66 Thus he chose to focus on the issues that most Whigs still believed could carry their party to the White House in 1848—opposition to the war and to territorial acquisition.

Clay, in fact, had to address those matters. Because many southern Whigs were already committed to Taylor, he could win the nomination only with solid support from northern Whigs, many of whom objected to Taylor precisely because he was Southerners' favorite. Clay knew that he was subject to many of the same reservations. The most fervent antislavery Whigs in the North adamantly vowed never to support a slaveholder again, yet Clay, like Taylor, owned slaves. More important, he knew that the vast majority of northern Whigs were committed against slavery expansion, that they insisted that no territory be acquired from Mexico, and that they demanded imposition of the Wilmot Proviso should a territorial cession materialize. Some of these Whigs could accept Taylor's ownership of slaves, but they could not condone his refusal publicly to endorse their No Territory platform. Clay had remained equally silent on the issue, and his commitment against slavery expansion was suspect because of his waffling on Texas' annexation in 1844. To capture the support he needed, Clay had to reassure northern Whigs that he stood with them.

If Clay had any doubts about the necessity of such a public declaration, an editorial in the militantly antislavery Cleveland True Democrat, that Clay must have read, given the tone of his subsequent address, dispelled them. Rejecting Greeley's September brief for Clay's candidacy, the True Democrat angrily insisted that Clay deserved defeat in 1844 because he had alienated antislavery Whigs with his Alabama letters. Those Whigs had no reason to trust Clay in 1848, it huffed. What had Clay done to secure emancipation in Kentucky? the paper demanded. "What has been his influence in respect to the Mexican War? The day is gone by when Mr. Clay can again receive the votes of Anti-Slavery men in the Whig party, unless he identifies himself, openly and boldly, with the cause of Liberty."

Greeley, who had previously declared in the Tribune that Taylor must publicly endorse the Wilmot Proviso before northern Whigs could safely back him, was hard put to respond to this sally, but he tried in an editorial on October 11. Admitting that no candidate could succeed in the North unless he favored the Proviso, he weakly contended that any fair reading of Clay's Raleigh Letter showed that Clay opposed the extension of slavery to any territory thereafter acquired by the United States. The Raleigh Letter of April 1844, muddled as it was by the subsequent Alabama letters, however, hardly met the demands of antislavery Whigs in 1847. Greeley and Clay realized that more had to be done.⁶⁸

Thus it was arranged that Clay would give an address on the war and slavery extension issues. The site was Lexington, Kentucky, but the intended audience was the northern Whig party. When Clay spoke in Lexington on November 13, Greeley had a reporter on hand who was instructed to ride eighty miles to Cincinnati immediately after the speech ended. From there, reports of it would be telegraphed via Pittsburgh and Philadelphia to New York City so that it, or at least the resolutions Clay had carefully written out for distribution, could be printed in the New York papers within twenty-four hours. Then Clay's New York friends would hold a mass rally, using his Lexington remarks as the platform on which to launch his candidacy.⁶⁹

Clay aimed primarily at Northerners, yet he dared not embrace the Proviso itself, lest he completely alienate southern Whigs. Hence, he focused on the No Territory position around which Whigs from both sections had coalesced during 1847. But he took advanced antiwar, antislavery grounds that might appeal to frustrated northern Whigs. Rehearsing the traditional Whig charge that the war was caused by Texas' annexation and presidential aggression, he pointedly asserted that he (like the "immortal fourteen") would never have voted for the original appropriation, polluted as it was by Polk's fraudulent preamble that Mexico had initiated the conflict. He demanded that the House Whig majority in the impending Congress define the war's objectives precisely and stop it immediately if Polk continued to prosecute it for purposes beyond those objectives. Pointing to the dangers entailed in the acquisition of any or all of Mexico, he introduced resolutions declaring that we "are utterly opposed to any purpose like the annexation of Mexico to the United States" and that "we have no desire for the dismemberment of the Republic of Mexico, but wish only a just and proper fixation of the limits of Texas." After announcing that "I have ever regarded Slavery as a great evil" and reminding his audience that he had worked for gradual emancipation, in Kentucky and through the American Colonization Society, he came out squarely against war-induced slavery extension. In language that echoed virtually every 1847 northern Whig platform, his seventh resolution pledged:

That we do positively and emphatically disclaim and disavow any wish or desire on our part, to acquire any foreign territory whatever, for the purpose of propagating Slavery, or of introducing slaves from the United States into such foreign territory.⁷⁰

Determined that "the Whig party ought to take the ground he had assumed at Lexington," Clay intended his resolutions to provide the party platform on the war and territorial acquisition for 1848, just as he had intended the Raleigh Letter to provide the platform on Texas annexation in 1844. Whigs who had already taken that position were happy to chorus his strictures. Whig newspapers praised them; Whig state conventions in Indiana, Ohio, and North Carolina adopted strong antiwar, antiexpansion platforms in early 1848; and Georgia's Whig state legislators introduced resolutions on the war and territorial indemnity in December 1847 that, in the words of a Democrat, "occup[ied] pretty much the position of Mr. Clay in his late speech."

Nonetheless, Clay's attempt to reassert his erstwhile command of the Whig party with the Lexington Address fell short. McLean men bitterly complained that Clay had stigmatized all Whigs who voted supplies and that his "anti-American" speech was "aiding and abeting [sic]" the Mexican enemy. In addition, key New York Whigs like Governor John Young and editor James Watson Webb accused Clay of aiding the enemy and blamed Mexico for starting the war. 72 More important, no consensus developed behind Clay's specific proposal that the new Whig House of Representatives pass a resolution or law to define the objectives of the war and to stop it immediately if Polk refused to abide by their actions. When the Thirtieth Congress assembled in December 1847, the Whig majority was at sea about the proper policy. Some wanted to press for immediate withdrawal of all troops from Mexico. Some opposed new appropriations but would remain silent about troop deployment. Others favored continued supplies for the armies already in Mexico, accompanied by a stipulation that Polk could not order conquest of additional territory. And still others, realistically recognizing that the Democratic Senate would kill any effort to force Polk's hand, admitted that the Whigs had no choice but to do what they had previously done—support the appropriations he requested but oppose the territorial indemnity he demanded. The selection by the Whig caucus and subsequent election of Robert C. Winthrop as Speaker of the House epitomized this last course and signaled that the Whig House would not attempt on its own to halt the war. Only the presidential election, most Whigs admitted, could settle the quesions of war or peace, All Mexico or No Territory.73

While many Whigs interpreted Clay's address as an announcement of his candidacy, it also failed to engender the unanimous support he had long stipulated as a precondition for another race. Instead, it established Clay as a leading alternative to Taylor, especially among regular Whigs. This development aggravated personal animosities between the backers of the two rivals and dramatically reinforced the sectional overtones of the struggle. By the end of 1847, what seemed to be at stake was not simply who the nominee would be but whether northern or southern Whigs would control the party.

By insisting in his Lexington Address that "every state has the supreme, uncontrolled and exclusive power to decide for itself whether slavery shall cease or continue within its limits, without any exterior intervention from any quarter" and by shunning the insulting Wilmot Proviso, Clay obviously hoped to retain the support of slave-state Whigs, especially the thousands of old-line Whigs who deeply distrusted Taylor's refusal to embrace the party or its principles. And he enjoyed some limited success. The Louisville Journal, Kentucky's chief Taylor newspaper, now conceded that a national convention must choose the Whig nominee; the Vicksburg Whig and Mobile Advertiser urged Clay's nomination. The intensely partisan wife of Gustavus Henry, a frequent Tennessee Whig presidential elector, pleaded with her husband to work for Clay against Taylor, railing that "Southern Whigs do not deserve the name if they desert him." Just as frequently, however, avowals of admiration for Clay's speech and preference for his candidacy were accompanied by admissions that he could not possibly win and that the party must thus turn elsewhere."

Rather than reviving enthusiasm for Clay, the Lexington Address convinced many southern Whigs that Taylor was their only remaining hope. Clay's naked hunger for the presidency, his willingness, in the words of a scornful Alabama Democrat, to do "anything and everything that, by any manner of means, may lift him into the presidential saddle" had caused him "to conciliate the Wilmot Proviso men" of the North, thereby "driving off all the South," Southern Whigs not only concluded that Clay had "done himself great injury in his late speech," but they also feared that he had inflicted "much hurt" on all southern Whigs by discrediting their commitment to Southern Rights just when they were facing increasing pressure from southern Democrats and the independent Calhoun movement. "The Whigs will not rally on Mr. Clay, or any Whig who swears by his Lexington resolutions," reported an Alabama Democrat, an assessment that could have been extended across the South. "Depend upon it," the Georgian Charles Jenkins reported to John M. Berrien, an ardent Clay man, "unless the Whig party will take ground against the Wilmot Proviso, or present us a candidate above suspicion at the South, Georgia's Whigs will take this matter into their own hands" and select independent electors pledged to Taylor. Clay's "cause is hopeless at the South," he reported three months later. "His candidacy would crush the party in Georgia." "With Mr. Clay we should be in danger of losing all, with Taylor assured of gaining all," echoed North Carolina editor E. J. Hale.75

Northern Whigs' reaction, in contrast, was almost all Clay could have wished. As planned, Greeley immediately pronounced Clay the strongest potential candidate northern Whigs could back because his resolutions demonstrated "that the better portion of the South do not desire or expect an extension of our Slave Territory—that far from regarding Slavery as good . . . they profoundly realize that it is a formidable evil to be deplored, limited, and as soon as may be, exterminated." Other northern Whig papers rang changes on the same theme. Weed's Albany Evening Journal announced that the speech "settles the Presidential question," while New Jersey's Trenton State Gazette insisted that Clay must be "the standard bearer of the great Whig army in the coming battle." Mass meetings called by Clay-dominated Whig committees boomed Clay for president in New York City, Philadelphia, and elsewhere; Rhode Island's state convention formally instructed its delegates to the expected national convention to support him; and observers reported that the great majority of Whigs in Iowa, Indiana, and Connecticut preferred Clay's nomination."

Not all northern Whigs, however, clambered aboard the Clay bandwagon. Supporters of Webster and Taylor remained firm. McLean's livid backers denounced "the 'glory' Whigs—the men 'who would sooner be defeated with Mr. Clay than succeed with anyone else'" and lambasted "the aristocratic, browbeating, dogmatical, selfish, dictatorial simpletons, called Clay Whigs, spread all over the United States." The rancor of McLean men plainly reflected their exasperation that the sudden rush to Clay, the ultimate party insider, seemed within a few weeks to demolish their three-year effort to persuade the party that it needed an outsider like the Ohioan. Yet it also sprang from a more general belief that "defeat will be the result of his [Clay's] nomination." The Kentuckian's age, his record as a loser—especially in 1844, when circumstances had seemed so advantageous—his lack of support in the South, and the near certainty that his nomination could reunite the feuding Democrats against him all convinced a number of Whigs across the North and border slave states that running Clay would be "folly and madness." "I am quite satisfied that Clay stands no chance of success," Buffalo Congressman Nathan K. Hall, like many others, concluded.⁷⁷

Ominously, northern Whigs' biggest objection remained that Clay, like Taylor, was a slaveholder. If they were aware that Clay had infuriated southern Whigs with his remarks at Lexington, zealous antislavery men in Whig ranks were unimpressed. Nor did they buy editorial assertions that Clay had assumed satisfactory antislavery ground. To them, Clay's refusal explicitly to embrace Wilmot's Proviso meant that he could not be trusted as a northern champion against the southern drive for Taylor. "Mr. Clay's notices of slavery and the extension of slavery will not satisfy the North," Seward observed to his wife. More fervent antislavery Whigs like Charles Francis Adams and Giddings, convinced that either Clay or Taylor would get the nomination, now insisted upon preparing "the way for a separation from the Whig party" and for the organization of a new party that could unite all the North's principled antislavery men. Unhappiness with Clay convinced other northern Whigs "that we must have a Northern candidate as the South are bent upon rushing Taylor into the field."

So grave did Clay's liabilities seem that some Whigs correctly suspected that Greeley and other northern Whigs were simply using him as a stalking horse to blunt the Taylor movement. Once Taylor was stopped, they predicted, Clay would be dropped, and some northern Whig like Corwin or McLean or even Scott taken up. Disappointed by his failure to evoke the unanimous support he had previously called a prerequisite. Clay, indeed, drew back from another campaign. Nor was Greeley fully committed to Clay's nomination. Both publicly and privately he admitted that his first objective was to stop Taylor. Clay was his first choice, he announced in the Tribune, but after Clay, he would take any civilian in preference to Taylor. Privately, Greeley told Clay himself two weeks after the Lexington Address that should Clay decline to run, he would throw his support to Corwin, and he repeated that determination to others. At the same time, he managed to convince some of McLean's friends in New York that he would back McLean. rather than Corwin, should Clay step down. Ultimately, McLean's New York friends concluded, the influential Weed and Greeley were playing a game to stop all the front-runners and arrange, somehow, for Seward to get the nomination.⁷⁹

By the end of 1847, when Truman Smith asked William C. Rives who would be the best Whig candidate to drive the Democrats from the White House, therefore, no agreement within the party had been reached. Corwin, McLean, Webster, Clay, and Taylor all had proponents. Even the discredited Winfield Scott retained some backing, particularly in Pennsylvania. Yet each possible candidate had grave liabilities so far as many Whigs were concerned. Equally important, by the end of that year, no candidate had created an organization to secure the nomination. Throughout 1847 much speculation about the party's nominee had been voiced, and preferences had been advanced, often vociferously, for and against different men in both private correspondence and public print. Newspapers and letters could reflect and even shape public opinion, but efforts to do so, with a few exceptions like the arrangements for Clay's Lexington Address, had been largely diffuse and uncoordinated.

Public opinion, moreover, was a nebulous and volatile phenomenon that alone could bring about no specific results, despite the naive hopes of some that spontaneous public demands would determine the next president. Picking a presidential nominee required concrete action by specific political leaders. It required bringing public opinion to bear on the political elite who could effect a decision. It required organization of and action by those leaders, not just propaganda. At the end of 1847, little of this concrete work had been done, if only because the presidential election had seemed so distant and the political leaders who could make the choice had been preoccupied with trying to defeat Democrats in state and local races. Actions and events during 1848 would determine who won the Whig nomination.

If the identity of the eventual Whig nominee remained far from clear at the end of 1847, the basis on which all Whigs, including Southerners, intended to run their man was not. They still envisioned the presidential contest as a contest of principles. Specifically, they anticipated that the campaign against the Democrats would focus on the twin questions of war or peace, territorial acquisition or No Territory. They expected to best the Democrats by promising peace without the dismemberment of Mexico and a dangerous increase in American territory. Corwin, Webster, and Clay had all come out forthrightly against the war and a territorial indemnity. McLean would take a similar public stand in early 1848, as would Whig state conventions that met early in the year. Only Taylor's views on the proper resolution of the war were unknown, and his silence constituted one of his gravest liabilities. Many Whigs so hated the war that they rejected Taylor precisely because of his famous role in fighting it. Thomas Dorr's sneer in January 1848 that the Whigs opportunistically sought a "brave old solder" who was noncommittal on issues to attract Democrats grossly misrepresented the vast majority of Whigs at that time. Three weeks after Dorr penned his caustic analysis, indeed, Seward wrote Weed from his home what could have served as Whigs' retort to Dorr: "The war is so odious that no one in this region is thinking about Genl. Taylor as an available candidate."81

"We Must Have the Aid of Gunpowder"

"President Making has commenced," Joshua R. Giddings reported from Washington in December 1847. His verb was apt. Although much maneuvering and speculation about the Whig candidate had occurred since 1844, systematic efforts to secure the party's presidential nomination began only with the opening of the Thirtieth Congress.

Almost every event during 1847 that influenced opinion about the nomination—the news of Buena Vista and the subsequent Taylor frenzy, Scott's capture of Mexico City, the convergence of the Whig press and state platforms on the No Territory position, the up-and-down cycle of Whig fortunes in congressional and state elections, Clay's trip east in the summer and his Lexington Address in November—had occurred outside of Washington when Congress was not in session and Whig leaders were widely scattered around the country. Congress not only assembled when many Whig politicians first began seriously to focus on the presidential question, therefore. Its convening also provided the first chance since March 1847 for leading Whigs from different states and regions to meet face-to-face, compare notes, refine calculations, and directly confront opposing points of view.

The congregating of so many officeholders from different states also offered the first opportunity for congressional backers of rival candidates to organize cooperation across state lines and so convert opinion in the periphery. Washington thus became a magnet that attracted elected Whig officeholders, politically influential lawyers with Supreme Court cases like Clay and Seward, and the different aspirants' strategists. Clay men like Greeley and Daniel Ullmann, McLean's lieutenants James E. Harvey and Thomas Dowling, and even Zachary Taylor's brother Colonel Joseph Taylor converged on Washington to make the case for their favorites to the gathered Whig leadership. The ensuing dynamic of group interaction, with its incidents of harmony and friction, agreement and disagreement, fundamentally altered the struggle for the nomination.²

Ultimately, decisions at the periphery of the American political system, in states and localities that chose delegates to the Whigs' national convention, determined the outcome of the race. During the first three months of 1848, however, decisions made in Washington had the greatest impact. One of those decisions decisively changed Whig opinion and thus Whig behavior at the periphery; more than anything else, it brought about the nomination of Zachary Taylor. But as much as that outcome itself, the abrasive process by which it was reached opened wounds that debilitated the Whig party during its remaining lifetime.

Ι

Within two months of Congress' opening, the contest for the nomination had essentially narrowed to a two-man race. Whatever the doubts about Henry Clay's intentions and availability, and whatever solace those doubts gave other hopefuls, events in Washington during December and January convinced most Whigs that only Clay could stop Taylor and become the Whig nominee. After talking to a number of Whig congressmen while in Washington on legal business, Seward grudgingly admitted to his wife in late January that "the presidential canvass . . . seems now to be confined to Clay and Taylor."

Only in December did most southern and northern Whig congressmen fully realize the depth, breadth, and intensity of Southerners' demand for Taylor and rejection of Clay as an apostate who had sacrificed slaveholders' interests and Southern Rights in his Lexington Address. To be sure, a few Southerners—Richmond Congressman John Minor Botts, Georgia's Berrien, Mangum, and several representatives from North Carolina—bravely professed their preference for Clay. Yet majority sentiment in every slave-state Whig delegation except North Carolina's favored Taylor. However strenuously Clay's southern supporters argued, they were effectively spiked among Southerners by the presence of Kentucky's Senator Crittenden and the majority of its Whig representatives. Despite their devotion to Clay, Robertson's secret circular of October, and Clay's warm reception in Lexington, they insisted, Taylor was the stronger even in Kentucky.⁴

Sentiment for Taylor did not spread solely over boarding-house dinner tables and in congressional lobbies. Early in December, seven particularly determined Whig members of the House set about in coordinated fashion to proselytize for Taylor and to commit Whigs from their home states to his nomination. Known as the Young Indians, this small group, which gradually expanded, cooperated with two other blocs of pro-Taylor leaders. The first was Crittenden and his Kentucky lieutenants Brown and Letcher, who had been organizing Kentucky for months, for Kentucky Whigs' preference had enormous influence among those elsewhere. The second was a small group of former Kentuckians living in New Orleans, headed by Albert T. Burnley, a wealthy businessman, and Alexander C. Bullitt, co-editor of the influential Whig New Orleans Picayune. In December, when Taylor triumphantly returned to Louisiana, they began in earnest to enlist southwestern Whigs behind his nomination. In Washington, nonetheless, the Young Indians constituted the most active Taylor force.⁵

Unlike the two groups of Kentuckians, the seven Young Indians had no personal ties to, or even a personal acquaintance with, Taylor. Nor did the reinforcing mechanisms of long friendship and common residence, except in Washington itself, bring them together, as it did the other groups. They came from four different states, North and South, and four of them were first-termers.

Five were Southerners—Georgia's congressional veterans Alexander Stephens and Robert Toombs, and three freshmen from Virginia, William Ballard Preston, John C. Pendleton, and Thomas Flournoy. Like most southern Whigs, all five deemed Clay an impossible burden for the party to carry in the South after his speech at Lexington, and they shared the faith that Taylor's credentials as a slaveholder could help protect the party from any imputation that it was unsafe on sectional issues. By itself, however, the slavery issue explains neither their opposition to Clay nor, more intriguingly, the unusual initiative that they, in contrast to other southern Whigs with similar attitudes, displayed in organizing Taylor's support. Like most southern (and northern) Whigs in December 1847, indeed, they still believed that they could use No Territory to avert the insulting Wilmot Proviso, that the war could continue indefinitely, and that the contrast between All Mexico and No Territory would be the central issue of the presidential contest. In sum, in December they, like most southern Whigs, still relied primarily on their platform, not their candidate's regional affiliation, to deal with the slavery extension issue. It cannot explain why they—and not other southern Whigs—became Young Indians.

All five, in fact, had committed against Clay and for Taylor months before Clay spoke at Lexington, when, if anything, Taylor's reliability seemed even more questionable than Clay's. In a widely recirculated letter to the Cincinnati Signal in June 1847, Taylor had carelessly given his "decided approval" to its earlier editorial that boomed him as a People's candidate for president while also insisting that Congress apply the Wilmot Proviso to any territory taken from Mexico and that the next president not veto such legislation. Many Whigs interpreted Taylor's letter as a flat endorsement of the Proviso.⁶ What mattered most to the five southern Young Indians was the contrast between Clay's fame as "the embodiment of Whig principles" and Taylor's image as a nonpartisan military hero. Behind their choice lay calculations of intraparty factional advantage and interparty competitive needs that would eventually influence most delegates to the Whig national convention.

Toombs and Stephens, for example, were motivated in part by the resentment that they and other ambitious younger Georgia Whigs like William C. Dawson harbored against Berrien, whose insistance upon retaining his Senate seat blocked their own advancement. In 1845 they had forced the postponement of Berrien's reelection by stigmatizing him as unsafe on slavery by contrasting their support for Milton Brown's Texas annexation bill with his adamant opposition to it.⁷ But their common support for No Territory in 1847 deprived them of issues to wield against Berrien's reelection in the November legislative session.

The party's presidential nomination was another matter. Berrien was a committed nationalist. His preference for Clay was well known, and, like Clay and Webster, he passionately opposed running soldiers as Whig candidates because it smacked of opportunistic Jacksonism. Since martial ardor and pride in the victorious American campaigns in Mexico were intense in Georgia, Stephens saw Berrien's stand as a potentially fatal blunder. To Berrien's dismay, Stephens skillfully arranged for the Whig state convention in June 1847 to recommend Taylor for president and to nominate Duncan Clinch, a foe of Berrien and a West Point graduate, who rose to the rank of brigadier general commanding troops against the Seminole Indians in the 1830s, for governor. By demonstrating that Berrien was out of step with Whig sentiment in Georgia, they hoped that Whig legislators elected on the same ticket as Clinch in October 1847 might refuse to reelect the obstinately old-fashioned senator. Had news of Clay's Lexington Address reached Milledgeville a few days earlier than it did, this tack may have succeeded, but Berrien was elected before the Whig legislators learned of it. Nonetheless, the same legislature endorsed Taylor for president, and the subsequent eruption of anger at Clay across Georgia caused Berrien's closest allies to warn him frantically to renounce the Kentuckian or suffer grievous consequences. To highlight their differences from Berrien, therefore, Stephens and Toombs became Young Indians when Congress met.⁸

As even Berrien recognized, however, Stephens and Toombs insisted on nominating military men in 1847 and 1848 primarily because they feared that the party could never carry the state legislature or governorship again without attracting Democratic support. Even in the congressional elections of 1846, when Whigs had joyously pilloried the record of Polk and the Democratic Congress, they had won less than 47 percent of the statewide vote. And the chief source of their weakness was clear to all—the seemingly unshakable grip Democrats had on the growing nonslaveholder vote in the Cherokee District of northwestern Georgia. Running military heroes appeared the easiest way to cut into that vote, and hence Whigs from northwestern Georgia clamored more vociferously than anyone else for Clinch's nomination in 1847. After his narrow defeat in October 1847, those same Whigs insisted that Taylor be the Whig nominee. Taylor was a more famous military hero than Clinch. His image as a No Party or People's candidate who repeatedly spurned a regular Whig nomination made him potentially far more attractive to Democrats than Clinch, who had served in Congress as a Whig. "Very many Whigs from the counties North & West say that we are down unless we hoist the Taylor flag," wrote one Georgia Whig. "Nothing can ... save us but Genl. Taylor—nothing can destroy the Democracy but Genl. Taylor." Gaining control of a party that could not control the Georgia state government had little appeal for Stephens and Toombs. Thus they insisted on, and energetically worked for, Taylor's nomination in December 1847, not only to isolate Berrien but also to win crucial Democratic votes.9

Virginia's three Young Indians dearly hoped that Taylor would renounce Whig programs and run a nonpartisan administration, but the same combination of factional rivalry and Whigs' electoral weakness also turned them to Taylor. Whigs had never carried Virginia in a presidential election, and in May 1847 they elected only six of fifteen congressmen while failing to secure a majority of the statewide popular vote when Democratic abstentions were unusually numerous. To win, Virginia's Whigs needed to attract Democratic voters, and this consideration seems particularly to have influenced Thomas Flournoy, who won his congressional seat by a single vote, 650–649.

The other two Virginians, Preston and Pendleton, more secure in their own districts, were Rives men who had long denounced the folly and arrogance of regular, or "ultra," Whigs like Botts, who insisted on emphasizing Whig economic programs and imposing old National Republicans like Clay on the party as its nominee. Unlike the Georgians, indeed, the Rives Whigs did not want to use Taylor's candidacy simply to best their intraparty rivals for control of the state Whig organization. They sought to replace the Whig party with a new organization dedicated to the nonpartisan, republican principles they associated with Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe. The Rives Whigs thus wanted to bypass a regular Whig national convention and to have the state Whig convention, scheduled for February 1848, "nominate Genl. Taylor, as the candidate of the true Republican party of the country, saying nothing of Whig economics." Pleading with Rives to write the convention's address, a Richmond editor urged him not to "make the favorite point of the ultras about the origin of the war . . . [and not to] put Genl. Taylor's nomination too exclusively upon the ground that he is committed to Whig doctrines," lest it "drive off the locos without some of whom we will probably fail." The Virginia Young Indians, in short, demanded Taylor's nomination to jettison Whig issues and transform the Whig party into something far more palatable.¹¹

Antipathy to the Whig party and its programs decidedly did not motivate the two northern Young Indians. One was an obscure freshman congressman from Illinois, the legendary future president, Abraham Lincoln. In both 1840 and 1844 Lincoln had served as an at-large presidential elector for the Whigs, and he had crisscrossed the state ardently and eloquently defending specific Whig economic programs like a national bank, a protective tariff, and distribution of federal land revenues to the states. Few people in the party were so committed to its economic agenda as Lincoln, and Henry Clay had long been his model statesman. Nor, obviously, did Lincoln embrace Taylor because he was a large slaveholder who could protect southern Whigs on the slavery issue. Rather, Lincoln, the lone Whig representative from a heavily Democratic state, believed that only an apparently nonpartisan hero like Taylor could help Illinois Whigs attract the Democratic votes they needed to win additional congressional seats in August and perhaps even carry the state in the presidential contest itself.¹²

Sharing Lincoln's ardor for Whig programs, Connecticut's Truman Smith, the other northern Young Indian, exerted vastly more influence among congressional Whigs than the newcomer Lincoln. The unofficial national party chairman who had coordinated the successful congressional campaigns of 1846-47 and who would perform that same role in 1848. Smith initiated organization of the Young Indians. Unlike Lincoln and the five Southerners, Smith came from a safe Whig state that could be carried by a party regular on orthodox Whig issues. Connecticut had gone for Clay in 1844, the Whigs had won it handily in 1847, and they would do so again in April 1848 by running against the war, territorial annexation, and Democratic economic programs. Unlike the other Young Indians, who risked little at home by supporting Taylor, moreover, Smith defied the wishes of Connecticut Whigs, who decidedly preferred Clay. When Smith published an open letter in the National Intelligencer in support of Taylor's nomination, it met a stony reception in the land of steady habits. What moved Smith was his ability to look beyond the needs of Connecticut Whigs to the welfare of the national party as a whole. Certain that the Whigs must win the presidency to avert the pernicious consequences of the Mexican War and aware of the strong sentiment for Taylor in the South, he believed that the Whigs could not prevail with "any man from the free states." Both Clay and Taylor were Southerners, but the dismal performance of regular Whig candidates in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Maryland in the fall of 1847 convinced him that the former would not do. Explaining his preference for Taylor, Smith later wrote, "We are a minority party and cannot succeed unless we have a candidate who can command more votes than the party can give him."¹³

Most Whigs in Washington at the end of 1847 were less concerned with the Young Indians' motives than with their activity and effectiveness. "General Taylor seems as formidable now as Napoleon was when expected from Egypt," Seward reported to Weed on January 20. After being lobbied by the Young Indians, Buffalo Congressman Nathan K. Hall also surmised that "Genl. Taylor's chances of success are superior to those of any other candidate." Similarly, North Carolina's David Outlaw, a devoted Clay man, concluded after conversations with his colleagues that "Gen. Taylor is sweeping everything at the South & West, and I go for anybody rather than the present corrupt and unprincipled dynasty." 14

Because of this aura of invincibility, when the Young Indians tried to enlist at least one Whig representative from every state, some Whigs eagerly boarded the Taylor bandwagon in order, as Hall put it, "to be known as one of his early friends." Most of these recruits were Southerners: Tennessee's Meredith P. Gentry, North Carolina's Daniel M. Barringer, Henry Hilliard and John Gayle of Alabama, Florida's E. Carrington Cabell, and others. A few Northerners also joined the Taylor congressional committee, notably Andrew Stewart of Pennsylvania, a renowned advocate of protective tariffs who sought the vice presidency on the Taylor ticket, and Indiana's George Dunn, who, like the Virginians, hoped to bypass a formal Whig nomination and to run Taylor as an independent People's candidate. Altogether, according to Lincoln, between forty and forty-five Whig representatives, including fifteen Northerners, were committed to Taylor by the end of February.¹⁵

The great majority of the numerically preponderant northern Whigs, nonetheless, regarded the Taylor committee as a southern effort to dictate the party's nominee, and they were infuriated by the tactics of the Taylor zealots. The original intention of the Taylor men—or at least some of them—was to stampede the congressional Whig party into endorsing Taylor on his chosen ground, as a No Party or People's candidate without a national convention or formal party nomination. This most Whigs refused to do. As a result, the Taylor men suffered a series of stunning setbacks in December and January. In late December, the Young Indians tried to arrange an open meeting of Whigs in Washington committed to Taylor's nomination as an independent. It failed completely because so many congressmen refused to attend and because those who did blocked its organization. This presumptuous effort convinced most Whigs that a national convention must choose the nominee and that they must stop Taylor unless he announced himself to be a Whig, openly committed himself to the Whig position against the war and territorial acquisition, and agreed to abide by the decision of the national convention, conditions that more moderate Taylor men like Truman Smith, Barringer, and Tennessee's John Bell had all along recognized must be met.16

This determination became clear when Taylor's supporters again tried to commit congressional Whigs to his candidacy without a formal convention nomination. At a Whig congressional caucus held on the night of January 27, fanatical Taylorites from Virginia and Tennessee, caustically dismissed as a "corporal's guard" by Outlaw, attempted to browbeat their colleagues by threatening that no Whig but Taylor could carry Alabama, Virginia, and Tennessee, that Whigs therefore must not risk the chance that a national convention might choose someone else, that southern Whigs would continue to back Taylor "on the noncommittal basis" even if a convention nominated someone else, and "that the Whigs of the North must consent to go for Taylor or be beaten." Outraged rather than intimidated by such blatant extortion, the Whigs voted by a four-to-one margin, with virtually all Northerners and half of the Southerners in the majority, to hold a national convention. A few days later, the caucus called it to meet in Philadelphia on June 7.¹⁷

H

Both inside and outside Washington, Whigs and Democrats alike interpreted the caucus' insistence upon a convention as a stinging rebuke to, and perhaps a decisive defeat for, Taylor's candidacy. Insiders chosen by regular Whig conventions, not outsiders, mass meetings, or newspaper editors, would select the Whig nominee. Party regulars might now pick one of their own. The northern Whig majority refused to be steamrolled by the party's southern minority. To the delight of suspicious Whigs and anxious Democrats, who "apprehended the greatest danger" from a No Party Taylor campaign, and to the dismay of original Taylor men, Whigs' decision indicated that Taylor would have to jettison his nonpartisan, noncommittal stance to obtain the nomination and thereby probably alienate those Democrats he had attracted with it. As the hostile Indianan Godlove Orth rejoiced, "I am truly glad to learn that the Whigs of the North take the noble stand of requiring Taylor to pass the ordeal of a National Convention & to require an expression of his political opinions. Those opinions must accord with the well known principles of the party." 18

Fury at southern Taylorites' overbearing tactics increased most Whigs' antipathy toward a No Party Taylor candidacy. It also further convinced many Northerners that the party must nominate a committed Whig partisan. Anger at southern intimidation now caused some Northerners to insist that the nominee come from the North. Ironically, however, firsthand experience with southern vituperation of Clay as a traitor and toady to the North erased others' doubts that Clay had taken an adequate antislavery stance in his Lexington Address. Though a slaveholder himself, Clay now seemed perfectly acceptable to many Northerners.

Clay arrived in Washington to argue some Supreme Court cases on January 10, just when angry anti-Taylor Whigs were looking for an alternative. As he had during his trip east in the summer of 1847, Clay mesmerized the throngs who crowded around him with his physical vigor, his mental alertness, and his sparkling conversation. A disgusted Seward reported the fawning of sycophants who begged Clay to enter the race and the excitement he stirred among women in Washington's fashionable society: "That gentleman is bland and persuasive as ever, and one set of admirers only give place to another. Matrons save the gloves he has pressed for relics, and young ladies insist on kissing him in public assemblies." Yet as Seward also noted with alarm, something more occurred than an outpouring of adoration by the faithful. "The influences around him are irresistible and what is more his presence and conversation here are turning the tide of this place in his favor." What transpired, in other words, was a process of reciprocal conversion. Clay's warmest admirers convinced him that he had a chance finally to win the presidency and therefore must enter the race—or at least not publicly withdraw from it. They particularly stressed that northern Whigs would be ruined if Taylor were nominated and that only Clay's candidacy could save them. At the same time, Clay persuaded skeptics among the anti-Taylor men that he was physically and mentally sound enough to serve as president and that his opposition to slavery extension was firm.¹⁹

More than Clay's presence in the right place at the right time, his personal charm and the backlash against Taylor account for the gravitation of most congressional Whigs toward him. Almost all Whigs, including the Taylor men, still expected the impending presidential campaign to focus on the issues of the Mexican War and territorial acquisition from it. If they had any doubts, Polk's insistence upon a territorial indemnity in his annual message and his request for ten new regiments of regular army troops dispelled them. Most Whigs remained confident that they could win the election by adamantly opposing both. The centrality of the related war and expansion issues is why uncommitted Whigs insisted that Taylor take a stand on them. Anti-Taylor Whigs found Clay so appealing, moreover, because he had articulated the Whig position more forcefully than any other viable candidate. True, Corwin had denounced the war in even more sensational terms, but Corwin's early endorsement by extreme antislavery Whigs rendered him unacceptable to the South.

Clay's northern supporters never envisioned him as an exclusively sectional candidate. They recognized that they needed both southern and northern electoral votes to elect a Whig president, and neither Taylor nor Corwin, they feared, could attract both. Despite the heated rhetoric of southern Taylorites, they believed Clay could carry traditionial southern Whig strongholds on an antiwar, antiacquisition platform because virtually all southern Whigs had pledged themselves to that position. As long as the war continued, and as long as Whigs retained a hope of blocking a territorial cession and thereby avoiding the explosive Wilmot Proviso, Clay struck many Whigs as their strongest man.

Clay thus emerged as the chief stop-Taylor candidate by the end of January 1848, but his status rested largely on the continued salience of the war and expansion issues. Those issues formed Clay's greatest asset and Taylor's greatest weakness—at least from the standpoint of anti-Taylor Whigs. Even though the contest for the nomination had seemingly narrowed to a two-man race, therefore, it remained contingent upon events. As Godlove Orth accurately predicted even as he rejoiced that Taylor had apparently been stopped, "This Mexican War and its probable termination—and the consequences of such termination will all have an important bearing upon our candidate."

Ш

Whigs' decision to hold a national convention and the concomitant emergence of Clay fundamentally changed the contest for the nomination. Although Taylor had been endorsed by numerous newspapers, mass meetings, Democratic and Native American gatherings, state legislative resolutions, and even Whig state conventions, few delegates had been named or committed to him because the heterogeneous Taylor movement had sought his nomination by public acclamation. Now the specific politicos who went to Philadelphia, not puffery or even popularity, would determine the nominee. Even states that had previously nominated Taylor, like Maryland, Tennessee, and Georgia, were thus opened to competition, for different men than those who had earlier named Rough and Ready might choose the Whig delegates. The problem for the candidates and their friends now was to secure enough reliable delegates to control the June convention. Now, even though events in Washington would continue to exert a decisive influence on the race, the battleground shifted back to thirty states and the innumerable localities within them that could affect their ultimate decisions.

Developments in Maryland quickly demonstrated how the convention call changed the race for the nomination. Maryland's Whigs had nominated Taylor at their state convention in July 1847, and by the end of that year Maryland seemed as solidly in the Taylor column as the Deep South was. Senator Reverdy Johnson's faction of the Maryland party, known as the "Courthouse clique," led the Taylor Whigs in Maryland, and like some other Southerners, Johnson was intent upon running Taylor as an independent without a formal Whig nomination. Several days after the caucus on January 27, therefore, Johnson called in a Senate speech for Maryland's Whig state legislators to carry out their plans for selecting independent Taylor electors and to refuse to send delegates to the Whig national convention. Johnson's chief rival in the state Whig party, Maryland's other United States senator, James Pearce, responded by insisting that Maryland's Whigs adhere to regular party procedure. As a result of Pearce's speech and the pressure of his followers on the legislature, Whigs in Annapolis dropped plans for a Whig-sponsored independent nomination of Taylor and instead, on February 6, called for state and district Whig conventions to select delegates to the June convention. Eventually, indeed, those conventions would pledge their delegates to go for Clay as long as he had a chance to win the nomination.²¹

By early February, therefore, it was evident that Whig insiders would determine the nominee, that Taylor's momentum could be stopped, and that the race for delegates was wide open. The choice and behavior of delegates to the Philadelphia convention, in turn, resulted from the interaction of a number of variables: the nature of the delegate selection process in each state; the exertions of different candidates and their supporters; conflicting assessments by state and local Whig politicians as to which standard bearer could most help Whig candidates in local, state, and congressional races in 1848; intraparty factional rivalries like those that had brought about the Maryland reversal; and, above all else, events that changed the issues to be confronted in the election and thus impressions of the electability of different men.

Ironically, the process of delegate selection gave Taylor's supporters several advantages. Since each state had as many votes in a Whig national convention as it did electoral votes, the Constitution's three-fifths clause gave slave states more votes than their white population alone justified. Nor did Taylorites' edge end there. Most states sent a number of delegates equal to their assigned voting strength, but there was no requirement that they do so. Sometimes fewer delegates attended and cast a state's entire vote, whether or not they fully reflected Whig sentiment in the state. Sometimes, as was the case with Louisiana and Indiana in 1848, more than the allotted number attended, and the delegates themselves determined who among them cast the state's votes. In those situations, a majority of delegates for one candidate could deny a state's delegates who favored someone else any vote at all on the convention floor. At Philadelphia, Taylor's friends would ruthlessly exploit both of those openings.

The use of the electoral-vote formula implied that each state would choose two delegates in some statewide body, who would be the equivalent of electors-atlarge or senatorial delegates, and that the others would be chosen by separate congressional district conventions. But there was no requirement that state parties do so. As a result, practices varied from state to state. Many states, especially in the North, did hold separate state and district conventions, usually in that order, to pick delegates. Accustomed to holding their state conventions in September, New York's Whigs followed a variation on this practice, choosing the two statewide delegates at a Whig legislative caucus in Albany and leaving the choice of other delegates to district conventions to be held later. In contrast, many southern states and a few northern ones like Indiana, Iowa, and Rhode Island appointed all the delegates at a single state convention. Even then practices differed. Some state parties chose all delegates by a majority vote of the whole convention. Others chose the two senatorial delegates that way and then broke up into separate caucuses of members of the state convention from the individual congressional districts, who then chose the delegates from their own districts.

The differences in procedure were important. The more centralized the decision-making process, the easier it was for a single candidate to garner all the delegates; the more decentralized the process, the more difficult it was. Obviously, the dynamic of a state convention, where all delegates were chosen in a single place on a single day, differed considerably from that of picking the bulk of delegates at widely scattered district conventions held at different times. District conventions were less susceptible to majority sentiment statewide and more reflective of local preferences. District conventions held seriatim also rendered the choice of delegates more responsive to the shifting course of events. These customs were not written rules. They could be changed. Friends of a particular candidate who had a majority at a state convention could insist that it choose all the delegates and dispense with district conventions. That possibility ensured rancorous conflict at many state conventions. And since more southern than northern states picked all delegates at the state convention, the ability of Southerners to concentrate behind a single candidate was considerably greater than that of northern Whigs.22

Even the few state Whig conventions held in January prior to the call for a national convention illustrated the intense factional rivalries and the pattern of sectional polarization that would characterize the contest until June. In late January, for example, Rhode Island's state convention picked all four of the state's delegates and pledged them to Clay. A state convention in Iowa, on the other hand, appointed delegates who were instructed for Taylor, though Iowa's Clay Whigs complained that the convention was self-appointed and unrepresentative of Whig opinion. On January 27, the very day of the congressional caucus, Whig members of the Tennessee legislature, together with various Whig editors in Nashville, pronounced themselves the Whig state convention, nominated Taylor, and chose two at-large delegates pledged to him. They also called for district meetings to be held in May to select the state's other delegates, thus allowing Clay men in the state to battle for them. Intraparty factionalism shaped alignments on the nomination in Tennessee, as it did elsewhere, and Clay's supporters included John Bell's most prominent intraparty rivals: ex-Governor James C. Jones, ex-Senator Ephraim Foster, and Gustavus Henry. The influential Knoxville editor William G. "Parson" Brownlow, a partisan of Bell, also continued to support Clay. By the time district conventions met in May, however, issues had changed so substantially that the delegates chosen, like those in most other southern states, unanimously favored Taylor.²³

Two large northern states also held conventions in January. At Indianapolis on January 12, some Indiana Whigs, led by John Defrees, editor of the influential Indianapolis Indiana State Journal, pressed the convention to choose delegates instructed for Taylor. But the majority, most of whom apparently favored Clay, defeated that effort. The convention thus chose uninstructed delegates to the anticipated national convention. Thus they remained vulnerable to changing events and to the lobbying of different candidates. No one could tell how Indiana delegates might vote at the convention.²⁴

Neighboring Ohio sent the pivotal delegation to the Whig national convention, and, compared to Indiana, the struggle in the nation's third largest state assumed titanic proportions. Despite intense antislavery sentiment in northern Ohio, Taylor had some support, chiefly among conservative Whig followers of former United States Senator and Treasury Secretary Thomas Ewing. Clay had even more strength at the state convention. In the winter of 1847–48, however, the two largest factions within the Ohio Whig party backed the rival Ohioans Corwin and McLean. Although Corwin himself admitted by the end of 1847 that his chances for the nomination approached nil and was prepared to withdraw, his Ohio friends determined to commit the state Whig party officially to him. McLean and his associates realized that any such action would be fatal to the justice's own chances, and they strove to secure an endorsement for McLean instead or to prevent the meeting from nominating anyone.²⁵

The bitter animosity between the Corwin and McLean men spilled over into a battle over the state platform. Since May 1846, Ohio's Whigs had divided deeply over the question of supplying American armies in Mexico. On one side, the most vehement antiwar Whigs-members of the "immortal fourteen" like Joseph Root, Robert Schenck, Columbus Delano, and Joshua Giddings-had embraced Corwin after his famous antiwar speech in February 1847. On the other, McLean, as party insiders knew, had denounced opposition to supplies as unpatriotic in an unsigned editorial printed in the pro-McLean Cincinnati Gazette, and conservative opponents of a radical antiwar stance had gravitated to his column or to Taylor's. If the platform embraced the extreme antiwar position of the Corwin men, it would be widely interpreted as a repudiation of both McLean and Taylor. The struggle over the platform gained focus because the party had to nominate a gubernatorial candidate for 1848, and each of the major factions had its favorite. Corwin's backers promoted Delano; McLean's friends pushed Colonel James Collier, who had fought in the hated war and, on several occasions in 1846, stoutly defended the Democratic version of its origins. Attitudes toward the rival candidates for the gubernatorial nomination were inextricably intertwined with the contest for the presidential nomination.

With rival Whig editors hurling vitriol at each other and at the potential gubernatorial and presidential candidates, many Whigs wanted to postpone the state convention from its customary January date until May 1848. But the Corwin men forced the issue. In mid-December 1847, the Corwin-dominated Whig state central committee, at the urging of the pro-Corwin incumbent Whig Governor William Bebb, but over the objections of virtually all Whig state legislators, called a convention in Columbus on January 19. The committee specified that this should be a mass meeting, where everyone who attended had an equal vote, rather than the normal delegate convention, where equal numbers of delegates were allotted to each congressional district and where voting at the convention on both the resolutions committee and for candidates was conducted by district. As the alarmed McLean men suspected, the Corwinites intended to pack this assemblage with their friends around Columbus and from the Miami Valley, who were known as the "Miami boys" or "Xenia clique," to stampede the meeting into nominating Corwin and Delano, and then to select and instruct all the state's delegates to the national convention, which Ohio's Whigs would insist upon holding in a direct slap at McLean and Taylor.

Caught off guard by this coup, McLean's Ohio lieutenants like John Teesdale and Samuel Galloway in Columbus and J. C. Wright, editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, frantically tried to expose the custom-breaking scheme of the Corwin-Delano faction and to persuade McLean adherents and friends of other candidates to make the trip to Columbus in the dead of winter. Again, because a mass meeting was planned, it would not do simply to mobilize the relatively small number of professional politicos who might normally attend a state convention. They had to arouse the rank and file.

In this attempt they immediately confronted two obstacles. First, although McLean and his friends had been maneuvering for the presidency since 1845, they had not organized Ohio's Whigs for him since they presented McLean as a nonpartisan reform candidate, not a regular Whig. As a result, they lacked an apparatus even to identify reliable McLean men in different parts of the state. Thus, they had to rely primarily on agitating antagonism to Corwin or Delano. not on mobilizing pro-McLean sentiment, to persuade Ohio's Whigs to attend the meeting in sufficient numbers to stifle the Corwin effort. Second, many rankand-file Whigs in Ohio distrusted McLean for the same reason they distrusted Taylor. They did not consider him a Whig and doubted his commitment to Whig principles, since McLean, like Taylor, had carefully refused to endorse Whig programs publicly. Therefore Wright, Teesdale, Galloway, and other McLean men in Ohio pleaded with the judge to publish a statement or write a letter they could circulate at the Columbus meeting setting forth his views on Whig economic policies, the war and territorial acquisition, and slavery extension. Without such a statement, they warned, McLean could never get an endorsement from Ohio's Whigs.26

McLean therefore published in the Washington National Intelligencer a letter dated January 7, stating his position on the war, one that was strikingly similar to those previously taken by Corwin and Clay and strikingly different from the stance he had taken in the anonymously published letter a year earlier. Denouncing the war as "unnecessarily and unconstitutionally commenced," he called on Congress to end it by framing a peace treaty and forcing Polk to effect it through its control of military appropriations. He also urged the Whig House to stop the issuance of any more Treasury notes and to force the administration instead to sell bonds or levy taxes, thus bringing home the cost of the war to the public. Notably, McLean said nothing specific about territorial acquisition or the Wilmot Proviso, and despite the further pleas of his Ohio managers that he do so, he refused. There matters stood when several thousand Whigs assembled in Columbus on January 19 for what one of them later called "the most noisy and uproarious assemblage of the kind ever held in Ohio."

Neither the Corwin-Delano nor the McLean-Collier forces gained clear control of the meeting, despite the strenuous efforts of Governor Bebb on Corwin's behalf. Friends of Clay and Taylor and uncommitted Whigs held the balance of power. Over the vociferous protests of Corwin men, non-Corwinites on the arrangements committee successfully neutralized the chief threat of the mass meeting by insisting that all convention business follow the normal procedure of allotting seats on the platform committee and votes on the floor by congressional district. In other words, no matter how many men the Corwin forces mustered from a particular congressional district, it would have only one seat on the resolutions committee and the same number of votes on the floor as less well represented districts. The Corwin men, in contrast, seemingly won the battle over the platform, which not only insisted on a national convention and strenuously denounced the war, territorial acquisition, and slavery expansion, but specifically praised Corwin's opposition to the war in the Senate.²⁸ This victory was deceptive. The plank lauding Corwin passed the resolutions committee by a razor-thin 12–11 margin, and a plank endorsing Corwin for president was handily defeated. Given McLean's recent statement on the war, his friends could easily accept the platform, as could Clay men, for some of the planks, like one comparing the dismemberment of Mexico to the notorious partition of Poland, echoed Clay's remarks at Lexington. Although Corwin papers later asserted that the platform implicitly endorsed their man, events quickly revealed that it did not.

When the platform was presented on the convention floor, Lewis D. Campbell of Butler County, the chief spokesman for Bebb and the Corwin managers, passionately insisted that the convention must add the plank the committee had rejected, nominate Corwin, and select delegates pledged to him. Failure to do so, he stated, would deprive Ohio of any influence on the deliberations of Whigs elsewhere. His motion met decisive defeat. Instead, the convention refused to announce a preference for any candidate, although its vow to support "any true Whig" chosen by the national convention reflected the widespread hostility to Taylor in Ohio, as well as lingering suspicion of McLean's Whig credentials. The convention did choose two senatorial delegates to the national convention, but they were uninstructed and, at the time, both leaned toward Clay. Ewing's friends, Clay men, and uncommitted Whigs infuriated by the bulldozing tactics of Governor Bebb and the Xenia clique had combined with McLean's supporters to frustrate Corwin and rebuke the governor.

The same coalition prevailed on the gubernatorial nomination. The Ewing men at Columbus included Ohio's most conservative Whigs, men who were terrified that an "ultra anti-war candidate" like Delano on the ticket would prostrate the Ohio Whig party.²⁹ Nor did they favor Collier. Instead, they rallied on Seabury Ford, the favorite of Western Reserve Whigs. Once the McLean men realized they lacked the votes to nominate Collier, they dropped him and combined with the Ewing faction and the Reserve Whigs to select Ford.

McLean and his friends immediately rejoiced over their triumph at Columbus, but it was a partial victory at best. Corwin and Delano had been stopped, but largely by the Ewing men, who preferred Taylor, and by others hostile to the permanently discredited Bebb. "Bebb and the Miami boys have been completely routed—and the conservatives of our party have gained a great victory," exulted one of Ewing's followers. "The Gov. electioneered for days for Delano & Corwin. ... And it was the disgust created by his effrontery and impertinence that helped ensure our success." Despite surprising strength at the convention, McLean's friends had failed to secure his own nomination or Collier's. Those failures and the obvious division in the Ohio party scarcely constituted a strong recommendation that Whigs in other states look to Ohio for the party's nominee. McLean still had time to repair the damage if he could capture the district delegates to be chosen in the spring. But that task meant lining up Whig politicos for McLean in twenty-one individual congressional districts, and over sixty-five counties would select the delegates to the district conventions. Winning the district delegates, in short, required the creation of a statewide organization that McLean's managers, by their own admission, had not even begun to build. In the end, McLean would be forced to rely upon an exhausting but fruitless odyssey around the state by his faithful friend, the unemployed former editor Teesdale, to secure the Ohio delegates he needed to be a credible candidate.³⁰

Still, Corwin suffered a severe blow. Although he refused to issue a public statement of withdrawal, and although he continued to be named as a second choice by Greeley and other northern Whigs, his Ohio friends' confidence had been shattered. Rather than try to secure the remaining Ohio delegates for Corwin, they took up other candidates to stop the despised McLean. This shift away from Corwin was vastly significant, for Ohio's would be the pivotal delegation at the June national convention.

Many Corwin men, especially from southern Ohio, gravitated to Clay, but others from northern Ohio and the Corwin leaders from the Miami Valley, like Schenck and Campbell, now promoted as the strongest Whig nominee the Hero of Lundy's Lane and Chapultepec, General Winfield Scott. The humiliated Governor Bebb vacillated between the two. In February he told Teesdale that he favored Scott as an alternative to Corwin because "Clay cannot receive assurances of success that will or ought to induce him to run." Yet in early April, Bebb begged Clay to stay in the race, predicted that he could carry Ohio and New York, as well as other states he had won in 1844, promised that Corwin men at the national convention would consider him interchangeable with Corwin, and warned that the northern Whigs would "suffer utter dissolution" if Taylor got the nomination. Overly sanguine as always, Clay placed great stock in Bebb's apparent promise of Ohio support at the convention, an egregious mistake since Bebb, whatever his true intentions, no longer had the ability to deliver Ohio's vote. At the end of January these developments lay in the future. All that was clear was that Ohio's delegates were not committed to a favorite son. They remained to be won. 31

IV

In February, when the race had seemingly narrowed to a two-man contest between Clay and Taylor, attention shifted to the conventions in Kentucky, North Carolina, and Virginia, all scheduled for February 22, Washington's Birthday and, not coincidentally, the anniversary of Buena Vista. Since each convention would choose all the state's delegates to Philadelphia, forty delegates, and the momentum elsewhere they could generate, were at stake on a single day. But national attention also focused on those three states because the Clay and Taylor forces were far more evenly balanced there than in the Deep South. To make a credible case that Clay could retain crucial slave states for the Whigs, his friends had to stop the election of Taylor delegates, especially in the traditional Whig bastions of Kentucky and North Carolina. Conversely, to demonstrate that Taylor was the choice of Whigs in southern states that the party had a realistic chance of carrying, and not simply of the hopeless Whig minorities in Democratic states like Alabama and Mississippi, Taylor's proponents wanted the endorsement of all three. Given the apparent turnabout in Maryland, if Taylor failed to secure their support, his aura of invincibility would dim and thus his ability to enlist reluctant northern Whigs would diminish.

Just as both camps recognized the potential impact these conventions could have on northern Whigs' choice, they believed that northern Whigs' preference might sway the conventions' decisions. Hence, during February, the rival camps not only marshaled their forces in the three southern states; they also strove to demonstrate their strength in the North.

Still not committed to another race in January and February, Clay was less interested in securing committed delegates than in preventing Taylor from doing so—something he knew Taylorites in Kentucky and Virginia were straining to achieve. Clay and his friends believed that if uncommitted Whigs were sent to the national convention from the three states and learned there that Clay was the favorite of northern delegates, they would swing to the "Embodiment" out of loyalty to the national party. For the same reason, Clay sought an early demonstration from the North that he was the strongest potential candidate in that section. Such evidence, he hoped, would convince Upper South Whigs that they must not nominate Taylor if they genuinely hoped to win the presidency. The northern state to which Clay and his backers looked for such evidence, just as in 1839 when he had tried to influence Virginia's selection of delegates, was New York.³²

Clay turned to New York for several reasons. Greeley, its leading Whig editor, was already promoting him. Its thirty-six delegates were the biggest prize at the national convention. Most important, since many Whigs thought Clay had lost the 1844 election because New York's antislavery Whigs defected, Clay wanted public assurances from its leading Whigs that he could carry the state in 1848. Before he left Kentucky for Washington in December 1847, Clay urged Greeley to arrange a demonstration on his behalf by Whigs in the New York legislature.

Later his friends begged state comptroller Millard Fillmore to have Weed and other prominent New York Whigs send assurances to Leslie Combs that Clay could win New York so that Combs could circulate them at the impending Kentucky state convention.³³

Taylor, Clay, Webster, McLean, Scott, and Corwin all had supporters in New York, but Clay's loyalists were the most numerous, the most ardent, and the best organized. Nor, as even the hostile Seward admitted, was there any doubt that Clay could carry New York in 1848. The rancorous Democratic divisions that had handed it to the Whigs in 1846 and 1847 still festered and in fact would worsen in 1848. Any Whig presidential candidate seemed likely to carry New York. To the clamorous Clay men who hungered to atone for the robbery of 1844, that fact, as well as justice to the Kentuckian and to Whig principles, made New York's support for Clay's nomination imperative. As in so many states, however, the presidential question became entangled in intraparty rivalries that in New York were especially visceral. Any attempt to commit New York to Clay was bound to aggravate factional wounds.³⁴

Since 1844, New York's self-consciously "progressive" Whigs led by Weed and Seward had clashed with their self-styled "conservative" rivals over nativism, state constitutional revision. Anti-Rentism, black suffrage, and what seemed to conservatives the increasingly radical antislavery stance of the Weed-Seward wing. Yet neither faction was monolithic, and the contest for the presidential nomination jumbled alignments still further. Although Seward and Weed had allies in New York City's wealthy mercantile, banking, and legal community like Simeon Draper and Moses Grinnell, that community, along with wealthy businessmen and lawyers in Brooklyn and in towns along the Hudson River, provided the heaviest concentration of conservative opposition to them. Many of these Whigs had been National Republicans in the early 1830s, rather than Antimasons, and many of their fathers had been Federalists. Millard Fillmore and his Buffalo associates Nathan Kelsey Hall, Solomon G. Haven, and the editor Thomas Foote cooperated with these eastern conservatives but were distinct from them. Like Seward and Weed, Fillmore began his political career as an Antimason, but over the years he and his friends had grown increasingly disillusioned with Weed's control over Whig nominations, state patronage, and canal contracts. The two conservative groups, therefore, were united by common antagonism to Seward and Weed, not by common economic or policy interests or common presidential preferences.35

Some of the wealthy Manhattan conservatives, like Hiram Ketchum and Edward Curtis, sought Webster's nomination, but the great majority favored Clay. Repeatedly denounced by McLean's adherents as impractical aristocrats, Clay men dominated the Whig city committee as well as the Young Men's Whig Committee. While most conservative Whigs in the Hudson Valley and western (or upstate) counties also wanted Clay, Fillmore and his closest Buffalo associates did not. In early 1848 Congressman Hall, among others, preferred Taylor to Clay.³⁶

To complicate matters, conservative Whigs' leading editorial exponent, James Watson Webb of the New York Courier and Enquirer, came out for Taylor in April 1847 and steadfastly held to him. He was joined in the Taylor camp in early 1848 by Governor John Young, whose nomination in 1846 had been arranged by Weed over Webb's vociferous protests. Webb's commitment to Taylor became a major but not the only reason why Greeley, his editorial rival in New York City, opposed Taylor's nomination and ardently pushed Clay's candidacy beginning in the fall of 1847.

Greeley had long been an ally of Seward and Weed—they were usually considered a triumvirate—yet Seward and Weed did not share Greeley's apparent enthusiasm for Clay. By early 1848 neither doubted Clay's ability to carry New York. They worried instead about his ability to carry the nation. In addition, they feared that if the New York Whig party committed itself to Clay, their downstate conservative foes, the Clay loyalists, would get the credit and would thus enhance their ability to challenge Weed for control of the state organization.³⁷

Seward and Weed were also unenthusiastic about Taylor. Weed's Albany Evening Journal had boomed Taylor for president in the summer of 1847, but in September, citing Taylor's refusal to endorse Whig principles or to accept a regular Whig nomination, Weed had withdrawn his support. More than Taylor's unorthodoxy compelled this decision. The Seward-Weed faction's strength lay in upstate and western counties, whose fervently antiwar, antislavery Whigs wanted no part of Taylor. As Weed well knew, many of those Whigs preferred Clay's nomination after his Lexington Address. If Taylor won the nomination and the subsequent election, moreover, Webb and Young would have a much stronger claim than Weed to serve as dispensers of federal patronage in New York. Weed and Seward thus feared the nomination of either Taylor or Clay.

They hoped instead that some alternative candidate might emerge if they could keep the state's Whigs from prematurely committing themselves. As George W. Patterson of Chautauqua County wrote Weed in late January, after pronouncing both Taylor and Clay impossibilities, "The true course is to take a known Whig of the north, one who has not been mixed up with the war question, and his election would be quite sure." Patterson specifically named Seward himself as the best choice, but Weed was perfectly willing to consider other men, including Corwin, Greeley's second choice.³⁸

Weed's desire to stall for time and prevent the New York Whig party from pledging itself to either Clay or Taylor explains his vacillation in the winter and spring of 1848, an oscillation that puzzled contemporaries and has puzzled historians ever since.³⁹ Weed had a much stronger sense about whom he did not want nominated than whom he did. Given the sentiment among New York's Whigs, preventing an official endorsement of Clay was his biggest problem. Thus Weed secretly helped organize demonstrations for Taylor in order to stop Clay's momentum. Thus he floated trial balloons for Corwin, Webster, Scott, and even John M. Clayton in the columns of the Albany Evening Journal. Thus, beginning in February, he insisted that New York's Whigs send unpledged delegates to the national convention, not delegates instructed for Clay, as the Clay men demanded. From Clay's point of view, what made Weed's opposition ominous was less his editorial influence—Greeley's Tribune was more than a match for that—than his legendary influence among Whig state legislators from whom Clay sought a public endorsement that might turn the tide in the Kentucky, Virginia, and North Carolina state conventions.40

New York City's Whigs responded to Clay's entreaties for aid with alacrity. Greeley and the two Whig city committees arranged mass meetings in December and again in January that demanded Clay's nomination. Well aware that an early commitment by New York to Clay could be decisive, supporters of Webster and McLean helped Webb and the Taylor men in the city schedule a counter-demonstration for Taylor on February 15. Attended by about 500 people, this anti-Clay meeting promoted Taylor's nomination on antiparty grounds that constituted a thinly concealed attack on the party insiders fervently working for Clay. "We need what we have now [behind Taylor]—A PARTY OF THE PEOPLE," declared the meeting's chairman. Without specifically naming Clay, another speaker asserted that it was time for Whigs to jettison "old party shackles" and take up new men. To neutralize the effect of this Taylor meeting and achieve maximum impact on the impending southern state conventions, Greeley and the city's Whig committees then arranged a mammoth Clay demonstration at Castle Garden on February 17, five days before those conventions were to meet. Attended by a crowd variously estimated at between 10,000 and 12,000 people, it left no doubt where New York City's Whigs stood. 41

Closely coordinated with Greeley's effort in the city, a caucus of Whig legislators met in Albany on the night of February 16 to issue a statement on the presidential race that could be printed in New York Whig papers the next day and then telegraphed to the rest of the nation. Like the majority of the state's rank-and-file Whigs, most Whig legislators wanted Clay's nomination. Even the persuasive Weed, therefore, could not stop them from making some public statement, as Clay requested. But Weed did prevent an explicit endorsement. The caucus adopted two resolutions. One simply praised congressional Whigs for calling a national convention. The other announced that the New York Whig party "expect[ed]" the party's presidential nominee to be "a thorough and blameless Whig of known and well-tried principles and opinions; a statesman of known capacity and qualifications for the highest civil employment, and one who shall fully represent and maintain ... the distinctive doctrines and character of the Whig party of the State." Because Clay seemed to meet these criteria, many Whigs took this as a pro-Clay recommendation. Shrewder observers realized that it was not. Instead, as almost everyone recognized, it expressed New York Whigs' emphatic opposition to Zachary Taylor. Whether this would sway Whigs' decision in Kentucky, Virginia, and North Carolina remained to be seen. 42

To offset New York's anticipated endorsement of Clay, the Taylor congressional committee laid plans for a demonstration of the general's own popularity among northern Whigs at Philadelphia, the nation's second largest city and commercial entrepot of its second largest state. Organized by Philadelphia members of the congressional Taylor club and their local allies, the Buena Vista Celebration was scheduled for February 22, the same day as the three southern conventions. Since Clay had carried six northern states in 1844 and had narrowly failed to carry New York, Pennsylvania, and Indiana, Taylor's managers sought plausible evidence that Whigs from critical northern states other than New York preferred Taylor to Clay. Otherwise, they feared, Taylor's prospects in the impending Whig conventions in Kentucky, Virginia, and North Carolina might unravel just as quickly as they appeared to be coming apart in Maryland. Each member of the Taylor congressional committee, as well as other prominent Whigs who favored Taylor, like Virginia's Rives and Maryland's John Pendleton Kennedy, was invited to attend the Philadelphia meeting or to prepare letters of support that could be read there. One by one, Truman Smith and Lincoln, Kennedy, Barringer of North Carolina, Rives, and the others sent off letters that rehearsed their loyalty to the Whig party and its principles, their love of Clay, and their conviction that Taylor alone could lead the Whig party back to the White House. One by one they warned that defeating the Democrats to end the war was too important to risk Clay's nomination.⁴³

Aside from the need to exhibit Taylor's purported popularity in a major northern city, his congressional managers chose Philadelphia primarily to shore up Taylor's fading strength in Pennsylvania and New Jersey. Some Whig congressmen from both states were committed to Taylor, and since early 1847 Philadelphia's three-term Congressman Joseph Ingersoll had lauded Taylor both privately and in House speeches as "a Whig—not indeed an ultra-partisan Whig, but a Whig in principle." By the end of 1847, however, enthusiasm for Taylor elsewhere in Pennsylvania and in northern New Jersey had dwindled perceptibly, and support for Clay had risen accordingly. To Taylor's avid Whig supporters in Philadelphia and contiguous areas of southern New Jersey, this trend had to be reversed, for the results of the 1847 gubernatorial elections in the two states had convinced them that Clay could carry neither.

Buoyed by their victories in the 1846 congressional elections, which they attributed primarily to attacks on the Walker Tariff, both Pennsylvania and New Jersey Whigs had made tariff protection the centerpiece of their 1847 campaigns, despite the unexpected prosperity in each state that year. When Clay aroused so much enthusiasm in Philadelphia and at the Iersey shore during the summer of 1847, moreover, his devotees in both states sought to make the anticipated Whig gubernatorial victories a referendum on Clay's personal popularity and his viability as a presidential candidate. Instead, both Whig candidates lost, and in Pennsylvania Whigs were reduced to a meager 37 seats in the 100-member state assembly. As a Philadelphian wrote Rives after that debacle, "Since the election of Pennsylvania, the Whigs here seem disposed to fall back again on Genl. Taylor. Had the result of the election been in their favor, they would certainly have nominated Mr. Clay." "This defeat is considered decisive of Mr. Clay's future prospects," gloated a McLean man from Philadelphia. His friends "did all in their power to make the success of the governor's ticket a Clay triumph and of course would have reasoned themselves into the belief that he would be the strongest man to press for the Presidential nomination." Instead, the loss proved that Clay "has no popularity in this state."45

What especially turned Philadelphia's anti-Clay Whigs toward Taylor, however, was the continued strength of the Native American party in Pennsylvania, a party whose voting support was concentrated almost exclusively in the city and county of Philadelphia. Since 1844, Philadelphia Whig associates of Delaware's Clayton, like Morton McMichael, an editor of the Philadelphia North American, and Edward Joy Morris, had argued that Whigs could never carry Pennsylvania's statewide elections without nativist support. That judgment seemed to be supported by the results in 1844, 1845, 1846, and 1847. Since Clay had publicly spurned a Native American presidential nomination, his candidacy could not possibly effect the merger they sought. Taylor, in contrast, had been nominated by the Native Americans in September 1847, and he appeared receptive to them. With Taylor as their candidate, Whigs might therefore attract nativist support without resorting to counterproductive immigrant-bashing. "Taylor is the only Whig who can carry Pennsylvania," Morris, who headed the local arrangements committee for the Buena Vista Celebration, later explained. "With Gen. Taylor as the Whig candidate we gain the 15,000 Native American votes without being connected with Nativism politically." With that help Whigs could win the October state legislative elections and put a Whig in the Senate. If the Whig national convention rejected Taylor, however, "the Whig party of this State will be broken up into hopeless confusion."

Despite its elaborate preparations and extensive publicity, the Buena Vista Festival scarcely affected the hunt for delegates in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, or the rest of the North. To mitigate its influence, Clay's numerous Philadelphia friends arranged a public dinner on the following day, where the Kentuckian, who came up from Washington, was lionized. Thus outsiders could not tell whom Philadelphia Whigs preferred. Back in Washington, for example, Outlaw believed that "the reception of Mr. Clay in Phila. will knock the Taylor concern into a cocked hat," while an Illinois Whig who saw both celebrations wrote his wife that the Taylor men had prevailed in this public relations contest. An independent convention composed of Democrats and Native Americans chose a separate Taylor electoral ticket in Harrisburg on February 22, thus undercutting the attempt to present him as a good Whig. Within a week of the Philadelphia extravaganza, moreover, Whigs from the Pittsburgh and Erie congressional districts chose Clay delegates to the national convention, and other districts would subsequently follow suit. When the Pennsylvania state Whig convention met in March, Scott, not Taylor, had the most support. The senatorial delegates it chose were officially uncommitted, but one of them, William F. Johnston, who would unexpectedly become the Whigs' gubernatorial candidate in 1848, was an unabashed Scott man. In addition, that convention insisted "that the Whig candidate for the Presidency, to be worthy of the support of the Whig party, must be known to be devoted to its principles, willing to become their exponent and champion, and prepared to carry them faithfully out in the execution of his official duties." Obviously the Philadelphia celebration had not resolved all doubts about Taylor's Whiggery in the Keystone State.47

New Jersey's Whigs seemed equally unimpressed, at least according to one Clay man. Several days after the Philadelphia demonstration, he wrote Greeley's Tribune that all the Whigs in the New Jersey legislature, except four or five "croakers," wanted to come out for Clay immediately. "The honest yeomanry of New Jersey are not willing to abandon the glorious old Whig cause for a no party candidate," he vowed. "No! They are for a party candidate." Nineteen-twentieths of the Whigs in New Jersey preferred Clay, he boasted inaccurately. "Yes, gentlemen, your Native American Managers from Philadelphia can make no headway among the Jersey Blues." The selection of delegates later in the spring would prove him wrong. Four would back Clay, three Taylor, but the reasons for Taylor's strength, as elsewhere in the North, stemmed from later developments, not the Buena Vista Celebration.⁴⁸

Nor did the Clay and Taylor demonstrations in the North discernibly affect the crucial state conventions in Kentucky, North Carolina, and Virginia. Intraparty factional wrangling dominated their proceedings and determined their outcomes.

Because those struggles, which often involved matters other than the presidential nomination, were so intense, finding a formula to hold the party together became a higher priority for many of their participants than resolving the presidential question. As a result, a clear winner emerged in only one of the three.

In Kentucky, where a decision for Taylor could finish Clay's chances, Taylor and Clay leaders sought to avert a blow-up by arranging a truce in November 1847 and publishing it in George Prentice's pro-Taylor Louisville Journal. This document insisted that the Whig party must hold a national convention, called on the impending state convention to express no preference on the presidency, and urged it to choose uninstructed delegates. Confident that Clay would not run and reluctant to embarrass their old friend, Letcher, Orlando Brown, Prentice, and Crittenden had been happy to enter this accord. Pleased with the concession on the national convention, unsure of Clay's intentions, and anxious to spare him personal humiliation, Clay's friends like George Robertson and Leslie Combs were too.⁴⁹

As the February convention approached, however, avid Taylorites rejected this bargain and insisted on nominating Taylor and selecting committed Taylor delegates at the state convention. Some of these were Clay's lifelong enemies, but younger zealots particularly exploded when the secret Lexington circular disparaging the Taylor movement was exposed. Reports from Washington about Taylor's setbacks and Clay's reception only increased their determination. To pressure the state convention, they called a separate Taylor meeting in Frankfort on the same day as the official Whig conclave there. "Things are in a most terrible confusion" and the party "in the greatest peril," warned Crittenden's alarmed lieutenants. Convinced that Clay intended to withdraw, Letcher moaned, "But great G-d, if he could have seen the predicament in which he has placed his friends and his party...he could not have hesitated a moment about declining." To placate the angry Taylor men and keep the November agreement, therefore, Letcher solicited letters from both Senators Crittenden and James Morehead, as well as from Whig congressmen from other states, promising that Clay would soon announce his refusal to run and urging Kentucky's Whigs not to insult him by nominating Taylor. Robertson obtained a similar letter from Georgia's Berrien.50

A fight for the gubernatorial nomination between Archibald Dixon and William J. Graves aggravated the party's problems. Both contenders preferred Taylor for president, but the friends of each threatened to bolt the party should the other get the nomination, thereby jeopardizing the party's ability to capture the state government in the August election. That prospect particularly unnerved Whig leaders, for, as elsewhere, they considered control of the state government as important as control of the White House.

Preserving party harmony thus became the leaders' top priority when the Kentucky state convention opened in the Frankfort Presbyterian Church on February 22. Delegates turned first to the gubernatorial question. Before anyone mentioned Dixon or Graves, a delegate from Logan County proposed Crittenden for governor. Enthusiasm erupted, and protests from Crittenden's friends that he did not want the post were shouted down. Dixon, Graves, and other candidates withdrew, and Crittenden was nominated by acclamation. The state party had escaped a rupture over the governorship, but at a significant long-term cost. Like most southern governors, Kentucky's exerted little influence over legislative policy since a simple majority could override his vetoes, and a new state constitution in 1850 would eradicate the governor's formerly substantial patronage power. As elsewhere in Dixie, the chief function of Kentucky's gubernatorial nominee seems to have been to pull out a large vote of the party faithful in order to elect as many of the legislative candidates on the same ticket as possible.⁵¹ Crittenden, whose rigid sense of personal honor and party loyalty obligated him to accept a nomination he did not want, easily led the Whig ticket to victory in August 1848. But then he languished in Frankfort when he would have been of far more service to the Whig party in Washington.

Over zealous Taylorites' protests, the convention adhered to the November bargain on the presidency. It recommended both Taylor and Clay to the national convention as worthy candidates, promised to support the Philadelphia nominee, and, without instructions, chose all twelve Kentucky delegates. Although some observers mistakenly concluded that eleven were Taylor men, Clay's friends considered this outcome a great victory, especially the commitment that Kentucky's Whigs would support the winner at Philadelphia. Some participants concluded that the result hinged on the reading of the letters from Washington promising that Clay was about to withdraw. Others attributed it to the strength of Clay sentiment at the convention, which supposedly cowed the Taylorites. "The true Whigs overwhelmed the available men, & we adjourned perfectly confident of success in August & hot for the nominee of the Whig convention," crowed Leslie Combs. "Clay 1st of all the world—Taylor next." 22

Incensed at this rebuff, the separate Taylor meeting in Frankfort, after being reinforced by disappointed Taylorites from the Whig convention, then declared Taylor the clear favorite of Kentucky's Whigs. Telegraphic reports of the two gatherings left Frankfort simultaneously on February 23. Some Whigs elsewhere, confusing the Taylor meeting's action with that of the formal party convention, concluded that Kentucky's Whigs had nominated Taylor. Virginia's Taylor men exploited that distorted impression to score a decisive victory.

The scene of "a very animated and exciting debate in which hard blows were dealt and received," Virginia's Whig convention extended over three days. The congressional champions of the rival candidates—Botts for Clay and Preston and Flournoy for Taylor—traveled from Washington to Richmond to lead their respective forces. Botts first attempted a procedural coup. Each county and city was to have as many votes in the convention as it had in the state legislature. Because the Whig vote was heavily concentrated in a few counties and cities, this arrangement meant that delegates from normally Democratic jurisdictions, whose Whigs favored Taylor far more decisively than those from Whig strongholds, had a majority. Botts therefore proposed that voting in the convention be proportional to the popular vote Clay had received in 1844. If not, he complained accurately, the 170 Whig voters in Shendandoah County would have more votes on the convention floor than the 1200 Whig voters in the city of Richmond. Well aware that a proportional vote would result in a Clay victory, the Taylorite majority killed Botts' proposal. Unable to secure committed Clay delegates, Botts then pushed for an uncommitted delegation and no nomination. Convinced that "with Gen. Taylor as our candidate we must succeed" and that "with Mr. Clay defeat is inevitable," the Taylor forces demanded that the convention nominate Taylor.

For over twelve hours the two sides argued. Then, as Botts appeared close to winning a floor vote on his motion to send unpledged delegates, Preston suddenly announced that he had received telegrams indicating that both the Kentucky and North Carolina conventions had gone for Taylor. Stunned by this false report, the convention crushed Botts' motion 81 to 27 and then adopted a resolution nominating Taylor by an 86–17 vote. It did not explicitly instruct the state's delegates to Philadelphia, but the preference of the state party was clear. Only two of the seventeen delegates selected—one from Botts' own congressional district and the other from a neighboring Whig stronghold—would go for Clay at the convention. The remaining fifteen were staunch Taylor men.⁵³

Contrary to Preston's assertion at Richmond, the Raleigh convention of North Carolina's Whigs made no presidential nomination and sent unpledged delegates to Philadelphia. Support for Clay was broader and that for Taylor correspondingly narrower in North Carolina than in any other slave state, with the exception of Maryland. Most of its Whigs, who had lost the state only once since 1838, remained confident of carrying it in the presidential election by opposing the war and territorial acquisition, a confidence reflected in the state platform they adopted. The state's Whig leadership, nonetheless, divided over the presidency, the party's gubernatorial nominee, and the proper strategy for the impending state election in August. Consequently, their state convention also witnessed heated conflict.

Doubtful of Clay's electability outside of North Carolina, two of the state's Whig congressmen, Augustine Shepperd and Daniel M. Barringer, urged the convention to nominate Taylor. Barringer and his constituent E. J. Hale, editor of the influential Fayetteville Observer, also feared that the Whigs might lose the August state election unless they endorsed Taylor in February and kept his name atop the Whig ticket from that point on. They anticipated, correctly as it turned out, that the Democrats planned to run a populistic campaign in 1848, pillorying the Whigs as an aristocratic and unresponsive establishment party, and they hoped to use Taylor's image as a nonpartisan People's candidate to parry that expected thrust.⁵⁴

Taylor's most prominent North Carolina backer, however, was United States Senator George E. Badger, whose ambition and arrogance generated the state party's major divisions. A constitutional lawyer of prodigious talent but great conceit, secretary of the navy in the doomed Harrison administration, and highly respected Senate debater, Badger lacked tact and a common touch. He offended many other Whig leaders in the state, including his Senate colleague, the increasingly alcoholic Willie P. Mangum, whom Badger considered his intellectual inferior. Sent to the Senate by a Whig legislature in 1846 to complete the final two years of a resigning Democrat's term, Badger faced reelection by the legislature to be chosen in August 1848. Arguing that "the renomination of Mr. C[lay] would be the signal for the dissolution, not the dismemberment of the Whig party," he pressured the state convention to nominate Taylor to ensure Whig victory in those legislative elections. Secure in statewide elections for governor and president, North Carolina's Whigs over the past decade had been most vulnerable to Democratic challenges in legislative and congressional elections decided in local districts, so Badger's concern was understandable. In addition, Badger maneuvered to secure the 1848 gubernatorial nomination for his eastern North Carolina kinsman Edward Stanly, who, Badger openly boasted in Washington, would serve two terms and then replace Mangum as United States senator in 1852.

The many intraparty foes of Badger and Stanly exploded at the temerity of Badger's scheme to monopolize the state's highest offices for his own family. Mangum, the state's other four Whig congressmen, and other Whig leaders lined up against both Taylor and Stanly. Because of the angry reaction, Charles Manley, rather than Stanly, won the gubernatorial nomination, and no preference for president was expressed. The majority of Whigs at Raleigh favored Clay, but like Whigs elsewhere they waited to see what he would do rather than commit delegates to him.⁵⁵

At exactly the same time that rival demonstrations in the North and state conventions in the South produced a stalemate, two developments elsewhere fundamentally altered the race. Together they constituted the decisive turning point in the four-year search for a candidate. One should have been predicted but was not. The other upset the predictions of virtually everyone in the Whig party about the focus of the impending presidential election. The first gravely damaged Taylor's chances; the second ultimately killed those of Henry Clay.

A major objective of Taylor's advocates in Washington since the decision of the Whig caucus was to reassure suspicious Whigs about Taylor's Whig credentials. Beginning on February 23, however, New York City newspapers and then the press elsewhere in the nation printed letters that Taylor had written to Peter Sken Smith to accept the Native American party's nomination, to Colonel A. M. Mitchell of Cincinnati, and to independent groups in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, and Montgomery, Alabama, who had previously nominated Taylor as a People's candidate. In each he emphatically iterated his refusal to be considered the special candidate of any party or "the exponent of their party doctrines." He would accept nominations from Whigs, Democrats, and Native Americans alike, he told Smith, but only if they were made "entirely independent of party considerations." "If the Whig party desire . . . to cast their votes for me," Taylor declared to Mitchell, "they must do it on their own responsibility without any pledges from me." 56

These letters stunned Taylor's supporters and infuriated party regulars. New York Congressman Washington Hunt, who was helping Weed organize Taylor demonstrations in New York to counteract the rival Clay Whigs, immediately pronounced Taylor's chances hopeless. Evincing "indifference or contempt" toward the Whig party, Taylor's letters, sputtered Hunt, proved that he was not a Whig "unless indeed we have reached a political millennium & the Whig party is to be disbanded." Taylor's letter to Smith "ought to put an end to all idea of his nomination by the Whigs," groaned Thomas Ewing's son. "A Northern man with southern principles' was bad enough, but a Southern man with no principles may be worse." Kentucky Whigs also "declare[d] they will not support any man who declines being considered the 'exponent' of Whig principles." Taylor's letter to Montgomery "has given a death blow to the hope of his friends & with them, I fear, to the hopes of a Whig triumph," moaned North Carolina's E. J. Hale.

Whigs could not "run anyone but a man who will accept a Whig Convention nomination." No one, however, better expressed the indignation of anti-Taylor Whigs than Indiana's Orth. If the Whigs nominated Taylor after seeing his recent letters, he raged, they would "stultify themselves, discard all their cherished principles—and foresake [sic] the faith of their fathers."⁵⁷

All too aware of this outrage, the Young Indians and other Taylor managers frantically solicited new testimony from the seemingly uncontrollable general that he was indeed a Whig who endorsed Whig programs and positions. Even before this latest batch of letters appeared, Truman Smith had written Taylor in order to "bring out a cautious, judicious exposition of his views on two or three leading points." Similarly, Crittenden, who futilely urged Taylor to be careful in his letters, warned Orlando Brown in late March not to publish a letter in which Taylor was expected to demand a territorial indemnity from Mexico. In March as well, Lincoln prepared a letter that could be issued over Taylor's signature, promising that as president he would not veto a national bank or protective tariff or allow any territorial acquisition from Mexico into which slavery could expand. The Tennesseans Bell and Gentry also begged the hero publicly to embrace Whig principles. 58

Such pleas accomplished little. Replying to Smith on March 4, Taylor refused to take a public position on Whig domestic policies. Still worse, in early April, a Taylor letter to a Kentucky Democrat indicated his willingness to accept either the Democrats' or Whigs' nomination, and he was rumored among Whig congressmen to have written still other letters lauding the Independent Treasury system and the Walker Tariff. "The man is certainly demented," concluded Indiana's Whig Congressman Caleb Smith. "His friends will now make an effort to get him to come out & take more decided ground in favour of Whig principles. To do this now will only render him more ridiculous." "Taylor cannot get a Whig nomination unless [he] promises to be a Whig president," the shrewd Weed concurred, "and it seems too late for that." Indiana editor John Defrees, who had earlier boomed Taylor in his Indiana State Journal, dumped him as too great a liability. "There are thousands of old partizan Whigs who will not vote for a man who says he will not carry out the measures of the party, and I do not very well see how a National Convention, having regard for principle, can nominate him." he told George Dunn, one of the Indiana members on the Taylor congressional committee. Thousands of other Whigs rejected Taylor because he owned slaves and had taken a leading role in the heinous Mexican War, Defrees added. "All this, however, might have been overcome had the 'Old Hero' said 'I am a Whig and should regard it my duty, if elected, to carry out Whig measures.' But he persists in the position that he will not do it, and, I fear, he has 'sinned his day of grace away." "59

Alarmed by Taylor's plummeting prospects, Truman Smith, Crittenden, and southern Taylorites in Washington prepared yet another letter endorsing Whig principles for Taylor to publish. They dispatched it to Baton Rouge on April 11 with Major William Bliss, Taylor's chief aide during the Mexican War. By the time Bliss reached Taylor's home, he discovered that the New Orleans Taylor men had anticipated him. They, in turn, had been stirred to action both by their concern at Taylor's fading chances and by their anger at Clay's dramatic public entrance into the race.⁶⁰

Clay had benefited from the deepening Whig dissatisfaction with Taylor's No Partyism. By the time he left Washington on February 23, his friends had convinced him that he could win the election, and any remaining doubts were dissolved by the tumultuous public reception he received in Philadelphia, New York, and other cities on the way home, as well as by letters he found there from both northern and southern Whigs pleading with him to remain in the race. By April 1, reports that he could carry Tennessee and Louisiana especially encouraged him. "I am persuaded that everywhere, in the Whig states, the Whig masses are for me," he wrote James Harvey, and several days later he explained to another friend that he expected to carry all the states he had won in 1844 plus New York and Louisiana, with the possibility of Indiana and Florida as well. The arrival of letters from Ohio's Governor Bebb and Thomas Stevenson, urging him not to withdraw, and news that on April 6, New York's Whig legislators had named him their favorite, announced he could win the state's thirty-six electoral votes, and chosen two at-large delegates devoted to him clinched his decision. To bury the widespread rumor that he would withdraw from the race at any moment, Clay then released a statement to the press in which he announced his intention to go before the national convention as a candidate. Written on April 10, it appeared in Lexington papers on April 12, eastern papers the following day, and throughout the nation within a week.61

Both the fact and the content of Clay's announcement were remarkable. Never before in American history had a candidate shed the fiction of passively waiting to be anointed by his party. The apparent arrogance and naked ambition revealed in Clay's "ukase" shocked and alienated many Whigs. Clay attributed his decision to the warnings "that the withdrawal of my name would be fatal to the success, and perhaps lead to the dissolution of the party with which I have been associated, especially in the free states" and to the assurances "that at no former period did there ever exist so great a probability of my election . . . that New York would more certainly bestow her suffrage upon me than any other candidate and that Ohio would give her vote to no candidate residing in the Slave States but me." 62

One of the people most incensed by Clay's presumptuous manifesto was the other slave state candidate, the Hero of Buena Vista himself. The previous November, Taylor had promised Clay that he would withdraw from the race if Clay were the Whig candidate, but by April he viewed Clay's announcement as a last-minute attempt to steal a prize he now considered rightfully his. Thus, on April 20, Taylor angrily wrote the editor of the Richmond Republican that he intended to remain in the presidential contest as an independent even if the Whig convention nominated Clay or anyone else. Taylor, indeed, flatly and falsely denied that he had ever told anyone he would withdraw from the race if Clay were nominated.⁶³

Clay's announcement also infuriated the anxious Taylor clique in New Orleans, but they realized that Taylor now could win the presidency only as the Whig nominee. Hence, he must issue a public declaration of his Whig principles similar to the one the Young Indians had sent from Washington with Bliss. Logan Hunton, Balie Peyton, James Love, and Alexander Bullitt thus drew up such a letter, and on April 21 the first three presented it to Taylor at his Baton Rouge home. Rewritten that evening on the candidate's veranda to his specifications and edited by the New Orleans committee, this letter was addressed to John

S. Allison, a Kentucky tobacco factor, who happened to be visiting Taylor at the time. Dated April 22, the famous Allison Letter first appeared in the New Orleans Picayune on April 25 and then was telegraphed to be reprinted throughout the nation.⁶⁴

In this statement Taylor identified himself as "a Whig but not an ultra Whig," stubbornly reiterated his intention "to act independent of party domination" if elected president, condemned aggressive wars of conquest, and called for magnanimity toward the defeated Mexicans. More important, he embraced the fundamental Whig principle of a weak executive by declaring that Congress should set policy regarding the tariff, currency, and internal improvements and that the president should exercise the veto power only when proposed legislation was clearly unconstitutional. Although the Allison Letter was not the forthright endorsement of Whig programs many had demanded, several historians cite it as the decisive event in securing Taylor's nomination because it finally convinced suspicious Whig regulars that Taylor was one of their own. The appearance of the letter did in fact reassure Taylorite Whigs who had worried about his previous statements, but since its impact was offset by the simultaneous publication of Taylor's defiant and duplicitous letter to the Richmond Republican, the great majority of Whig regulars continued to oppose him.⁶⁵

An event that occurred two months before the release of the Allison Letter played a far greater role in determining the ultimate outcome at Philadelphia. It vastly expanded Taylor sentiment in the party by tremendously increasing the desperate sense that the party needed a war hero to win the election. Equally important, it prevented the party's anti-Taylor majority from uniting behind Clay. Had all of Taylor's Whig foes in fact rallied behind Clay, Taylor would never have won the nomination.

On February 23, 1848, the same day that Whig state conventions were squabbling in Kentucky and Virginia, the same day that Clay was feted in Philadelphia, and the same day that Taylor's Peter Sken Smith letter appeared in the New York press, President Polk sent the Senate the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, which would end the war with Mexico. Negotiated by Nicholas Trist in violation of his instructions from Polk, the treaty had arrived by courier from Mexico only four days earlier. It called for the cession to the United States of the former Mexican states of Upper California and New Mexico, as well as the remaining Mexican territory south of the 42nd parallel, some 500,000 square miles in all. In exchange for this immense acquisition, the United States was to pay Mexico $15 million, as well as all claims against the government of Mexico by private American citizens. Polk's submission of this treaty suddenly, unexpectedly, and forcefully reaffirmed that Democrats largely determined the fate of the Whig party. 66

The treaty created an anguishing problem for Whig leaders. It promised the peace for which they and their constituents had long clamored, yet it also entailed the territorial acquisition they deeply abhorred. Whig senators would be forced to sacrifice a cherished principle whether they voted for or against ratification. Nor could they remain true to both by voting no and leaving it to the Democrats to ratify the treaty. Whigs held twenty-one Senate seats, and it would take only nineteen votes to prevent the two-thirds majority necessary for ratification. The fate of the treaty rested in Whigs' hands, and they faced a stark choice between peace and expansion or continued war and the probability that Polk's administration would seize still more Mexican territory. As a Georgian wrote Berrien, who voted against ratification, "The Southern Whigs are decidedly opposed to the large acquisition of Territory, reported to have been made, but looked also with great apprehension to the continuance of the war, much to be deprecated under any circumstances, but especially so under the auspices of a Democratic administration." ⁶⁷

To be sure, a few Democratic observers and northern Whig senators who voted against the treaty, like Daniel Webster and Connecticut's Roger Sherman Baldwin, denied that rejection of the treaty implied rejection of peace. They believed instead that it would cause the Whig-controlled House immediately to halt the war—and without a territorial indemnity—by cutting off funds to American armies in Mexico. Whigs like Congressman David Outlaw, who understood the disarray of House Whigs on the issue of military appropriations, knew that could not happen and feared that rejection would only give Polk an excuse to conquer all of Mexico. "Though I am now, as I have been heretofore, utterly opposed to the acquisition of territory," Outlaw wrote his wife in a judgment shared by many Whigs, "yet were I a Senator, I should vote for ratification of the treaty upon the ground that it is less evil, to have a part, and that a most sparsely settled part of Mexico, than the whole with its mixed breed of Spaniards, Indians, and negroes." 168

As Whigs immediately recognized, their quandary over the proper policy had significant ramifications for the impending elections. If they rejected the noxious treaty, they would betray their antiwar professions and their antiwar constituents and thus risk punishment at the polls. If they helped secure ratification, they would surrender the last concrete issue they had to use against the Democrats and the issue on which they expected to win the presidency—opposition to both the war and territorial annexation. "In truth we have the wolf by the ears and it is doubtful which is most dangerous, to hold or let go," moaned Buffalo's Nathan Hall on the day the treaty went to the Senate. Hall's New York Whig colleague William Duer was equally alarmed. "If this treaty is rejected [by Whig votes], good bye to the Whig party." "69"

Given their unhappy choice, Senate Whigs were understandably divided. But so too were the Democrats, many of whom angrily denounced the treaty for not securing enough Mexican soil. As a result, both parties fragmented. Nor was there a clear sectional alignment. A Democratic attempt to amend the treaty by increasing the size of the territorial cession failed, as did George Badger's effort to delete the territorial cession from it entirely. Baldwin's motion to incorporate the Wilmot Proviso into the treaty was laid on the table by the votes of all but two Democrats and the southern Whigs. Finally, on March 10, the treaty was approved by a 38–14 vote. Only seven of the twenty-one Whigs joined the opposition on the final roll call.⁷⁰

Slightly less than three months before their national convention, therefore, Whigs lost the central issue they had counted on to carry the presidential election. Mexico's congress did not ratify the treaty until May 30, and Connecticut's Whigs won their April gubernatorial election by campaigning against the war and annexation. Most Whigs, however, recognized that, since the Democrats had achieved both peace and territorial expansion with the aid of two-thirds of the Senate Whigs, they could no longer rail against the war or demand No Territory. Because the country remained prosperous in the spring of 1848, Whigs also lacked salient economic issues. Able to tout a record of peace, prosperity, and the acquisition of Oregon and the Mexican Cession, Democrats, in contrast, appeared almost certain winners. "It is doubtful whether we can beat the scoundrels next Pres. Election," moaned John Defrees. "The war will have been ended—and an immense acquisition of Land will be pointed to as the result of Democracy—the Land stealing, even among our best Christians, is popular!"⁷²

Worse still, the sole issue left at Whigs' disposal was one they least wanted to face—the Wilmot Proviso. The actual acquisition of Mexican territory made concrete what had hitherto been only a theoretical problem, the question of slavery expansion into that territory, while simultaneously vaporizing the No Territory formula Whigs had used to paper over their sectional divisions on it. As early as September 1847, Tom Corwin had warned Crittenden, "If the President should get a treaty ceding to us any territory not a part of Texas (which is already in the Union) & the Wilmot Proviso should be a question pending at the next Presidential election, I feel confident we shall fail in electing any Whig." Southerners would reject any candidate who endorsed the Proviso, and northern Whigs "will not vote for any man who is opposed to it."

Both peace and the sudden unavoidability of the slavery extension issue fatally undermined Clay's candidacy, even as he confidently announced his availability to the nation. As the "embodiment of Whig principles," Clay needed an issue-oriented campaign and thought his Lexington Address had outlined a winning platform. Even Whigs who opposed his nomination thought Clay could be elected if the war were still going on in November 1848.⁷⁴ The Senate's action on March 10 thus shattered Clay's hopes. All he had left to recommend him to a party that was looking for a winner was the fealty of thousands of Whig loyalists, his reputation as the foremost champion of Whiggery—and his record as a three-time loser.

In the spring of 1848, when every extant issue seemed either to favor the Democrats or to endanger the Whigs, that was no recommendation at all. Across the North, but especially in midwestern states, whose delegates were considered crucial by all contenders, Whig after Whig insisted that Clay would not do. Thus it was only after the loss of the antiwar, No Territory issue in March that large numbers of Whigs resorted to the opportunistic strategy Thomas Dorr had mocked in January. Without any concrete issues to mobilize the Whig electorate, many argued, "what is wanted & what we must have is a candidate that will receive other than strictly Whig votes." Yet they also recognized that "the Locos never can be brought into the support of Mr. Clay" since "opposition to Clay is part of their nature." To win, Indiana's Orth concluded, Whigs must abandon Clay, shun the untrustworthy Taylor, and find "a firm, decided, available Whig." "If Mr. Clay is the nominee," echoed scores of other midwestern Whigs, "the Whig party" would again be "doomed to inevitable defeat" and Clay would "be the most beaten man that ever ran the race."

The end of the war with a territorial cession posed the greatest danger to Clay's prospects, but the reigniting of the divisive slavery expansion issue also sharply reversed the considerable momentum Clay had developed in the South since December. Shorn of the No Territory formula's protective shield, southern Whigs became, for the first time, solely dependent on the identity of the party's presidential nominee to meet the Democratic and Calhounite challenge on the slavery issue. To most Southerners, Clay was a hopeless paladin in such a contest, for as soon as the Senate ratified the treaty, thereby obviating No Territory, northern Whigs in the House tried to impose the hated Proviso on the Mexican Cession. And Clay, in his April 10 announcement, smugly portrayed himself as the savior of those very same northern Whigs.

John Berrien's Georgia friend Iverson L. Harris described the dilemma and mindset of southern Whigs precisely. "It has ever seemed to me that the acquisition of territory would necessarily dissolve the Whig party," he mourned, "if the anti-slavery men madly make the exclusion of slavery a sine qua non in their support of a Presidential candidate." Northerners, he grumped, would support Clay because of his antislavery Lexington Address. "Had no territory been acquired [Clay's] opinions (abstractions) would have been a matter of indifference." But now "the very countenance of an anti-slavery man will do the Whig party more prejudice at the South than all other matters combined; there is more involved than even our great interests—they become questions of feeling—passion—and reason is powerless to subdue or even allay them." Now only Taylor's nomination could save southern Whigs from electoral disaster. Without it, the Whig party in the South "will be prostrate for years." Should northern Whigs reject Taylor for an antislavery nominee, indeed, southern Whigs could have "no further fraternity" with them. At stake in Taylor's nomination, in sum, was the continued existence of the national Whig party itself.⁷⁶

Tennessee's Meredith P. Gentry reached the same conclusion. Northern Whigs who wanted to run Clay on antislavery grounds, he explained, had been brought "to the verge of abolitionism." For years they had agitated against slavery and denounced northern Democrats for their "subserviency to the Slave power of the South" in order to win over northern voters. "They commenced this game for political effect," but "those who commenced it as a mere political game, have in many instances worked themselves into the madness of fanaticism. Compel them to take Taylor as a Candidate, and the necessity of their position compels them to breast the storm they themselves have conjured up." In contrast, should Clay or anyone else but Taylor get the Whig nomination, northern Whigs would become "a contemptible abolition faction, the South will be necessarily confined to the dominion of Locofocoism, and the Whig party will be annihilated."

After March 10, in sum, Clay's defeat and Taylor's nomination appeared to be absolutely essential to the political safety, indeed, to the continued existence of the southern Whig party. Clay's April 10 announcement deepened that conviction. Clay "is determined to rule or ruin the party," erupted Robert Toombs after seeing Clay's "Ashland ukase." "He has sold himself body and soul to the Northern Anti-Slavery Whigs." Thus his election posed "the greatest possible danger to the South, and I shall never do any act to aid it." Clay "turned his back upon the South in his Lexington speech and cast his hopes upon the north," chorused Gentry. He was supported in the North only because "of his opposition to Slavery" and therefore, if he won the Whig nomination, "he will be supported at the north upon such grounds as will make it improper & impossible for southern men to sustain him."

Terrified of Clay's nomination, southern Taylor Whigs redoubled their efforts between March 10 and June 7 to send safe Taylor delegates to the Philadelphia convention. On the same day that Taylor penned the Allison Letter, Orlando Brown issued a circular to the Taylor Whigs of Kentucky arguing that the state convention in February had recommended both Clay and Taylor and had selected unpledged delegates only because of assurances from Washington that Clay would withdraw. Taylor was the clear favorite of Kentucky's Whigs, the circular declared, and therefore the state's delegates must vote for Rough and Ready. Tennessee's Whig congressmen bombarded leading Whigs in their state with demands to make sure that Taylor delegates were chosen at the May district meetings. Every vote would count, they warned: an independent Taylor nomination was now impractical. Similarly, Georgia's Whigs, who had initially refused to hold a convention to choose delegates, changed course and called a state convention for May. Despite eloquent pleas from Berrien that the Georgia party stand by Clay, the great majority of the delegates it chose were avid Taylor men, although the device of allowing district caucuses to choose each congressional district's delegate resulted in the selection of a few of Clay's friends like Lucius Gartell. The realization that Taylor might lose the party's nomination and his status as the last hope of proving that southern Whigs were safe on the slavery issue nonetheless drove the vast majority of southern Whig delegates into the Taylor column.⁷⁹

Clay's northern support also eroded. Extreme antislavery Whigs had always rejected him, but most northern Whigs considered the Lexington resolutions a viable platform so long as slavery extension could be stopped by preventing territorial expansion. The cession of Mexican lands and northern Whigs' renewed demands for the Wilmot Proviso thus made Clay's refusal to embrace it a grave liability. On April 6, Corwin warned Clay's friend, the Cincinnati editor Thomas B. Stevenson, that Clay could never win the nomination because "he is not anti-Territory or anti-Slavery enough to meet the inflammatory feeling of the North." Two days later. Stevenson informed Clay that his Ohio supporters "confidently" expected him to "publicly declare against the extension of slavery in the new territories." Significantly, Stevenson also told Clay that he need not endorse the Proviso and thereby destroy his chances in the South. Instead, he implored Clay to insist that the laws regarding slavery that existed in a foreign territory prior to its acquisition remained in force after its acquisition. Thus, just as Florida and Louisiana had automatically become slave territories because Spanish and French law had allowed slavery, the Mexican Cession was free soil because Mexican law prohibited slaveholding. Demanding that this traditional precedent be followed with the Mexican Cession could not offend the South, Stevenson assured Clay, and it would satisfy antislavery Whigs in Ohio, but only if Clay avowed it publicly. That Mexican law prohibited slavery from the Mexican Cession even without the Wilmot Proviso was, indeed, widely believed by Northerners and Southerners, Whigs and Democrats, alike. Thus Stevenson planted the seed from which would grow Clay's famous, but misunderstood, compromise proposals of 1850.80

Many northern Whigs had long looked for a northern alternative to Clay and Taylor. Even before ratification of the treaty, some apprehensive Whig congressmen concluded that the struggle between the two rivals' adherents was becoming so rancorous that "it would be better for the Whig party if Clay & Taylor both could be satisfactorily disposed of and some new man less prominent than Mr. Clay yet a decided Whig, placed in nomination." After March 10, far more northern Whigs hoped "that some third man will be taken." The reality that slavery might expand into the Mexican Cession unless the Proviso were adopted convinced a growing number of northern Whigs that "we must have a Northern man for our candidate."

Cries for a northern candidate created no consensus on an alternative to Clay and Taylor, but they resurrected hopes of other aspirants who had largely been forgotten since December. They jump-started Webster's long-stalled candidacy, for example, if only briefly. Shortly after the Senate ratified the treaty with Mexico, Webster delivered a thundering speech denouncing the territorial cession, which his friends then eagerly trumpeted as a "creed for Northern Whigs...to rally under." With the aid of Edward Everett and direct encouragement from Webster himself, New York City's Hiram Ketchum published a series of letters in the New York Commercial Advertiser, later circulated as a pamphlet entitled "A Whig from the Start," that rehearsed Webster's long support for Whig programs to promote economic growth, his dedication to the supremacy of law and the Constitution, and the necessity of nominating a Northerner. Privately, in letters to Millard Fillmore and Maine's William Pitt Fessenden, Ketchum trumpeted Webster's opposition to slavery expansion, insisted that northern delegates to the Whig convention must resist "all these concessions and compromises which end in making a slaveholder a candidate," and vowed that his cause was "Webster and the free states. Webster & the North."83

Webster, Ketchum implausibly contended, could mobilize the Whig vote and garner non-Whig support better than anyone else. Webster was undeniably a Northerner, in contrast to Clay and Taylor, and, unlike Taylor, a committed proponent of Whig programs. Still, Democrats had no more incentive to vote for Webster than for Clay. Nor did members of the Liberty party and other extreme antislavery men, for Webster had dodged endorsing the Proviso just as assiduously as had Clay. Even so orthodox a Whig as Fillmore doubted Webster's availability. $^{\rm 84}$

Northern Whigs' aversion to any slaveholding candidate also rejuvenated the hopes of McLean's friends. During April and May, McLean's deluded supporters grew increasingly confident that Greeley and the New York Whigs would dump Clay and turn to the judge rather than Corwin. And McLean picked up significant new support in Indiana from Congressmen Caleb B. Smith, Elisha Embree, and Richard W. Thompson, as well as from Indianapolis editor John Defrees. 85 Moreover, to advance McLean's appeal as a party-healing compromise candidate, his managers sought to worsen relations between the Taylor and Clay camps. Newspaper correspondent James E. Harvey, the most astute and best-informed political operative in McLean's camp, published a story about Taylor's November 1847 letter to Clay promising to withdraw if Clay were nominated, a promise Taylor wantonly broke in his Richmond Republican letter. Since Clay's friends would be incensed by the story and Taylor's friends would blame Clay for leaking it, he chortled, "A fierce personal war is to occur between these two divisions, headed by their respective leaders, which of course must result to the advantage of a third candidate."86

But even McLean's most optimistic advocates knew that shrewd tactics alone would not snatch the nomination from a deadlocked convention. To do that, three formidable obstacles had to be overcome. First, whatever else McLean was, he was not "A Whig from the Start," and he remained just as vulnerable as Taylor to the determination among northern Whigs that the alternative to Taylor and Clay be a "firm, reliable . . . Whig." Second, McLean had no chance at the convention unless he won solid support from the Ohio delegation. In Ohio, however, McLean lacked a reliable organization and faced bitter opposition from the Corwin men, who, since February, had swung to Clay or Winfield Scott in order to stop him. By early May the most influential Corwin men—Schenck, Lewis Campbell, and Governor Bebb—were all raising Scott's banner. Ohio's delegation to the Philadelphia convention would in fact be surprisingly united, not behind McLean or Clay, as Bebb had predicted, but behind the other great hero of the hated Mexican War. **

Here was the third and insurmountable obstacle to McLean's chances in Ohio and at Philadelphia. Just as in 1845, Winfield Scott, "Old Fuss and Feathers," the "hasty plate of soup candidate," once again blocked his bid to become the alternative to regular Whigs like Clay and Webster and to another outsider like Taylor. During April and May, Scott aroused far more enthusiasm among northern Whigs than anyone else. Several reasons explain his phoenix-like rise from the humiliation and ridicule of 1846. Unlike McLean and Taylor, he was deemed a good Whig. Unlike Clay and Taylor, he was a nonslaveholder and yet Virginia born. Most important, unlike Clay, Webster, and McLean, and more justifiably than Taylor, he possessed the sheen of military heroism.

VIII

Between March 10 and June 7, the unexpected obliteration of the Whigs' major issue, Democrats' ability to campaign on peace, prosperity, and territorial expansion, and the suddenly perceived need to attract non-Whig voters led many Whigs from competitive states to the same conclusion reached much earlier by fellow Whigs in Democratic strongholds. Not simply Clay, but no civilian could lead the Whigs to victory in 1848. The candidate, one wrote, must be able to "unite whatever there is left amongst the people of the popularity of the Mexican war and also the opposition to the mode of prosecuting it by the present administration." Running a general "gives us an answer in a word to all the clamor & humbug about the war," urged New York Congressman Washington Hunt while advocating Scott's nomination. "After all, the locofocos rely mainly on the war. . . . With a victorious general we could readily turn the popular current to our side." ⁸⁹

During these months some Whigs in Democratic states like Maine and safe Democratic counties in New Jersey selected Taylor delegates to the national convention. Taylor also generated considerable enthusiasm in parts of Indiana. Far more Whigs in Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and New York, however, now boomed Scott, whose popularity and delegate count in these states ascended like a rocket. "The Whigs have to run either Scott or Taylor or be defeated so badly that you will hardly know we run a candidate," declared Indiana's ex-Congressman Edward McGaughey five days after the treaty was ratified. "To talk of Clay or McLean is worse than madness." Within weeks of McLean's nomination, "the Whig party would be so dead" that "a galvanic battery could not move a muscle in the whole body." No civilian would do! "We must have the aid of gunpowder—the fortress of Locofocoism can not be taken without it." No one expressed so pungently the panicky sense of desperation that drove thousands of Whigs across the North toward military heroes after—and only after—the end of the Mexican War. "

Battlefield glory was Scott's greatest, but not his only, asset. A few Whigs saw his candidacy as the best solution to the party's bitter divisions over the Wilmot Proviso. So unbridgeable did that chasm appear after March 10, indeed, that some Whigs and Democrats predicted that "Southern and Northern Whigs [could] never agree on the same candidate," and that the party instead would run Taylor in the South and somebody else in the North. As late as May 30, only eight days before the Whigs' national convention met, Illinois' Democratic Congressman John McClernand warned, "It is to be feared that the Whigs will present two candidates, one upon the Northern platform of slavery or rather antislavery, and another upon the Southern pro-slavery platform."

Scott, several astute Whigs realized, offered a way to achieve the same goal—conducting a Janus-faced campaign by running against the Proviso in the South and for it in the North—behind a single candidate. "The Wilmot Proviso brings some perplexity," Hunt informed Weed nine days after the Senate approved the treaty. "Our Southern brethren are restive and fractious, and they sometimes threaten to draw Mason & Dixon's line between us. I tell them they may have their way south of it, & we must manage things for ourselves on the north side." He had conferred with Corwin and Clayton, he went on, and they all agreed that the way to do this was to drop both Taylor and Clay and nominate Scott. As a slaveholder, Taylor would lose the North unless he openly endorsed the Proviso, something he could not do without alienating his southern supporters. Clay was bound to lose the South since Southerners believed he favored the Proviso. Only by publicly denouncing it could he win the South, but then he would lose the North. Scott was "the only man who can run without declaring himself on the Wilmot Proviso." As Godlove Orth, who swung to Scott, put it, "He is a northern man, without being in the least identified with the anti-slavery movement so as to make him obnoxious to the South."

But Scott also carried serious liabilities that advocates of other aspirants were quick to expose. He offended the many Whigs who considered the nomination of any soldier a betrayal of fundamental party principle. Elevating a leading participant in a despised war also risked alienating Whigs who had opposed it on moral grounds, particularly Quakers, who were deemed vital to Whig success in Indiana and Ohio. Taylor's personal animosity toward Scott was widely known among Whig leaders, and many dismissed as fantasy the assumption that Scott would inherit Taylor's support. No nomination, they argued accurately, was more likely to spur a vengeful Taylor into an independent candidacy than that of Scott, and if Taylor remained in the race, realistic Whigs understood, the Whigs could not win. Scott also remained vulnerable to the mockery of Democrats, who could and assuredly would endlessly reprint the foolish letters he had sent Marcy at the beginning of the war.⁹³

To many strategists, however, Scott's gravest liability was a different letter he had written before the war started. In December 1844, in a clumsy bid for nativist support, Scott had published a letter over the name "Americus" in the National Intelligencer. The Americus letter denounced the growing political influence of ignorant foreigners and argued that naturalized immigrants should serve for two years in the United States Army before being allowed to vote. Since December 1844, intervening events had monopolized public attention, and most political observers had long forgotten, if they had ever seen, this letter. During one of Greeley's trips to Washington in the spring of 1848, however, McLean's lieutenants, who were eager to quash the incipient Scott boom, showed it to him in old newspaper files. Greeley then flayed the letter and its author in the Tribune. The Whigs, he proclaimed, dared not run anyone who offended immigrants. On this point, at least, Seward and Weed and other like-minded Whigs agreed. Aware that the stigma of nativism had mobilized tens of thousands of immigrants against them in 1844 and had, more than anything else, defeated Clay in key northern states, they had no desire to repeat that mistake.94

If Scott had liabilities as a candidate, northern Whigs' frantic hunt for a non-slaveholding military hero caused many to dismiss them. Scott simply excited more enthusiasm among rank-and-file northern Whigs than any other alternative to Clay and Taylor. Unlike the pipe-dreaming McLean men, Clay's friends recognized that fact and the likelihood that Scott could siphon off vital delegates from Clay in Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and New York.

Their response, with the significant exception of Greeley's exposé of the Americus letter, was not to publicize Scott's weaknesses but to capitalize on his strengths by combining him on the ticket with Clay as the vice presidential candidate. Clay denied any personal responsibility for this initiative, but a Whig paper in Lexington, Kentucky, as well as Clay's champion Botts, in a speech at Philadelphia, broached the idea. Rumors circulated that another Clay lieutenant, Leslie Combs, had gone to New Orleans to meet Scott when he returned to the United States to persuade him to accept the second slot. And when Scott landed in New York City in mid-May, Clay's friends there urged him to take it. Scott, surprisingly, agreed, and he apparently told a Whig member of Congress, whom he took to be a friend of Clay, to inform the convention that he would run for vice president on a Clay ticket. The unidentified individual never delivered the message to the convention. Nor did Scott, driven to bed for weeks with a severe case of diarrhea contracted in Mexico, make any further contact with the convention. Thus was aborted what may have been Clay's last hope.⁹⁵

As Whig delegates converged on Philadelphia in early June, therefore, northern Whigs remained as fragmented as ever over their preferred candidate. Taylor had garnered delegates in Illinois, Maine, and New Jersey, and he had popular support in Indiana, although no one knew what its delegates might do. With the end of the war and continuing absence of salient economic issues, some Pennsylvania Whigs, especially those around Philadelphia who sought Native American help, also frantically promoted Taylor's nomination. Yet the vast majority of northern Whigs still believed that his candidacy would destroy them by keeping orthodox regulars at home on election day and driving antislavery Whigs to the Liberty party or to a new and broader antislavery organization, a threat openly and repeatedly voiced by extreme antislavery Whigs like Giddings and Henry Wilson. 96

When the Democratic national convention in late May, over the vehement protests of New York's Barnburners, nominated Michigan's Lewis Cass, northern Whigs' alarm that it would be suicidal to run a southern slaveholder increased. Paradoxically, however, Cass' nomination simultaneously presented northern Whigs with a splendid opportunity that also seemed to require nominating a Northerner. Cass was a leading proponent of ''popular sovereignty,'' the formula Democrats had devised to preserve sectional harmony on the divisive slavery expansion question when the Whigs had turned to No Territory. Unlike No Territory, popular sovereignty continued to be viable after the fact of territorial acquisition, for it called on Congress to leave to the residents of the territories themselves the decision regarding slavery.

On the one hand, because Cass had publicly denounced the Wilmot Proviso as unconstitutional and pledged to veto it, his nomination left the Democrats in the North vulnerable to a Whig campaign that advocated the Wilmot Proviso as a surer way than popular sovereignty to keep slavery out of the territories. Roll-call votes in Congress in the spring of 1848 demonstrated that northern Whigs supported the Proviso much more firmly than northern Democrats, but such a campaign would lack credibility if the Whigs nominated a slaveholder who seemed likely to veto the Proviso.

On the other hand, Van Burenite Democrats, committed to the Proviso by the end of 1847, absolutely abhorred Cass. Astute Whigs thus recognized that Cass' nomination greatly increased the chances that Van Burenite Democrats across the North might join the new antislavery party that was apparently forming in the North. With the considerable strength the Van Burenites could bring to such an organization, it might be an even more attractive alternative to dissident antislavery Whigs should the party fail to nominate a nonslaveholder.⁹⁸

Keenly aware of the consequences of not stopping Taylor, northern anti-Taylor Whigs still could not unite on a candidate. Webster controlled the delegates from Massachusetts and New Hampshire, and he still hoped to pick up additional New England delegates while preparing last-minute arguments to sway Southerners.

Clay retained considerable support in New York, Vermont, Connecticut, and Rhode Island, as well as in the new state of Wisconsin, whose delegates were primarily concerned with obtaining federal subsidies for internal improvements. But in Pennsylvania and most of the Midwest, enthusiasm for Clay had cooled considerably. Support for McLean had also eroded in those states, and by the end of May an Indianan who had lobbied his state's delegates for the judge admitted that McLean "cannot be nominated." All the northern delegates must rally on Scott, a Michigan delegate warned on June 2, or "the Whig party is disorganized & disbanded forever."

So fragmented did the northern delegates who arrived at Philadelphia appear that Thurlow Weed, who came as an observer rather than a delegate, sought to unite them at the last moment behind Delaware's John M. Clayton, a short, corpulent, heavy-drinking Yale graduate, who was the only Whig senator from a slave state who had ever voted for the Wilmot Proviso. According to cynics and Weed's enemies within the New York Whig party, Weed pushed Clayton for another reason. Only the nomination of a Southerner would allow the selection of a Northerner to balance the ticket as the vice presidential candidate, and Weed wanted that slot for his friend Seward.¹⁰⁰

In contrast to the disarray of northern delegates, southern Whigs almost unanimously insisted upon Taylor's nomination because they now considered an independent Taylor campaign impractical. Southerners still regarded Clay as Taylor's chief rival, and the few Clay men who had been chosen as delegates in the Deep South like Georgia's Lucius Gartell, Louisiana's William Brashear, and Alabama's C. C. Langdon received terrific pressure from the Taylorite majorities within their state delegations to go for Rough and Ready. Adding to that pressure, the pro-Taylor members of Congress, now labeled the Palo Alto Club, met every train that came to Washington carrying delegates from the South and West on their way to Philadelphia and frantically browbeat them with the message that only Taylor could lead Whigs to victory. So successful were these lobbying efforts that Clay's managers Greeley and James Harlan conceded defeat before the convention even met. The loss of three delegates in New Jersey and the frenzied pro-Taylor atmosphere in Washington, Greeley warned Clay on May 29, meant that "we are doomed to be beaten and that the men who control the counsels of the Whig party, through the machinery at Washington have resolved to throw overboard a good part of our principles so as to make a surer rush for the spoils."101

ΙX

By June 7, not just delegates and alternates but literally thousands of Whigs had jammed into Philadelphia, straining the capacity of hotels, boarding houses, and private homes to accommodate them. Over 10,000 Whigs were reported to have descended from New York alone, as advocates of different men hoped to stampede the proceedings by packing the galleries of the Chinese Museum, the convention site, and by staging street demonstrations outside. According to some observers, the local Taylor organization, particularly Native Americans dedicated to him, exerted the greatest external pressure on the delegates. Editors, wire workers, and political managers who enjoyed more direct access to delegates on the convention floor and in hotel rooms were also abundant. Three of the Young Indians, Smith, Flournoy, and Preston, were official delegates, as were Gentry and Bell of Tennessee, but Lincoln, Crittenden, Webb, and Taylor's brother also attended the convention to marshall his forces. Meeting nightly at the mayor's office, Greeley, Botts, Leslie Combs, and James Harlan, a Kentucky delegate, captained Clay's troops. James Harvey, Thomas Dowling, and Caleb Smith represented McLean's interests; Hiram Ketchum, Theodore Lyman, and Fletcher Webster, those of Webster. Clayton, Weed's compromise choice, was also there, as was Weed himself, looking for the best way to serve Seward. 102

Surveys of delegates' opinions on the night of June 6 indicated that the chances of uniting the anti-Taylor forces were dim. Pledged to Webster on the first ballot, the Massachusetts delegation contained three distinct groups, all determined to stop Clay: die-hard Webster loyalists who had always been jealous of him; antislavery Young Whigs like Charles Allen and Henry Wilson, who would stick with Webster but who now welcomed the prospect of Taylor's nomination as an excuse to break up the Whig party and form a new antislavery organization in the North; and the friends of Webster's in-state rival Abbott Lawrence, who were cooperating with Southerners to achieve Taylor's nomination in return for Lawrence's elevation to the vice presidency. Though they dared not vote directly for Taylor, they would help by preventing Massachusetts delegates from defecting to Clay. 103

Ohio's caucus that night dealt a shattering blow to Clay's bid. Many Ohio delegates had been elected by district conventions favorable to Clay, but ex-Governor Joseph Vance, a delegate-at-large, persuaded twenty of the twenty-three men to go as a unit for Scott and to stick with him throughout the balloting. Vance apparently made the case that only Scott now provided northern Whigs a viable candidate and that the convention would eventually come to him if Ohio held its ground. How sincerely Vance sought Scott's nomination is questionable. Friends of other candidates would later charge that he fronted for Corwin and Bebb, who were determined to stop McLean, or, alternatively, that he was in league with Taylor's Washington managers and acted solely to keep Ohio's votes from Clay. But only the surging sentiment for Scott in the Midwest during the two months prior to the convention can explain why the great majority of Ohio delegates, who viscerally opposed Taylor, agreed to go along with Vance. Whatever the Ohioans' motives, their decision, along with the resolve of the Massachusetts men, doomed Clay's candidacy.¹⁰⁴

The chances that anti-Taylor Whigs would unite on Scott or some other name were equally remote. The few Clay delegates from the South and border states preferred Taylor, not Scott or Clayton, as their second choice, so northern Clay men had little incentive to rally behind Scott to unite the party. The ubiquitous Weed persistently lobbied against Scott among the delegates, yet Weed proved powerless to swing even the New York delegation to Clayton as a compromise candidate. According to a delegate poll taken on the night of June 6, twenty-nine New Yorkers intended to go for Clay on the first ballot, five for Scott, one for Webster, and only Weed's faithful Chautauqua ally George W. Patterson for Clayton. Admitting defeat, Weed abandoned Clayton and, by the morning of June 7, was openly working for Taylor, whose New York supporters he considered less dangerous than Clay's. His enemies, at least, charged that he did so because he had worked out a deal with the proponents of a Taylor-Lawrence ticket that Seward would become secretary of state in the new administration.¹⁰⁵

The convention's organization also advanced Taylor's cause. Clay men served as temporary and permanent officers, but the credentials and rules committee gave Taylor's forces a more concrete edge. Composed of one delegate from each state and chaired by Georgia's Thomas Butler King, a Taylor man, it allowed Arkansas' single delegate, a Taylorite, to cast all three of the state's allotted votes. It called on the oversized Louisiana delegation, most of whom favored Taylor, to pick four men from their ranks to vote for Texas, which had sent no delegates of its own. And it provided that the six Louisiana votes at the convention should be divided among its ten delegates in proportion to the preferences of the eighteen delegates originally appointed by a state convention in Louisiana. 106 Since they had been split between fifteen Taylor men and three Clay men, this decision meant that Louisiana would give Taylor five votes and Clay only one on the first ballot. The Taylorites in the Louisiana delegation, led by Samuel Peters, Cuthbert Bullitt, and Lafayette Saunders, refused to allow William Brashear, Clay's firmest friend in the delegation, to be a voting delegate for either Louisiana or Texas. Instead, Bullitt voted as both a Texas and a Louisiana delegate, and Garnett Duncan, a Taylor man, cast the Louisiana vote for Clay on the first ballot—and only on the first ballot. Finally, to ensure that Taylor garnered all of his scattered support in the free states, the committee rejected the unit rule and called for each delegate to vote individually and publicly as the roll was called, a procedure that rendered delegates vulnerable to pressure from pro-Taylor spectators.

Speech-making prior to the actual balloting further helped Taylor. Duncan announced that he had seen a letter from Taylor to Balie Peyton of New Orleans that took "a decided stand in favor of Whig principles." Later, Lafavette Saunders, attempting to mitigate the damage caused by Taylor's Richmond Republican letter, declared that Taylor had assured him that he would abide by the decision of the convention and that his friends would withdraw him should it nominate someone else. Between the statements by the two Louisianans, Ohio's Lew Campbell offered an anti-Taylor resolution, declaring that the convention would consider for nomination only men who had publicly pledged to support the convention's nominee and to promote Whig measures, something Taylor had steadfastly refused to do. When the chair ruled this motion out of order and the convention then tabled Campbell's protest of the ruling, delegates' readiness to capitulate to Taylor was etched too clearly for Clay regulars to miss. "The treatment of such a resolution, in the manner it was disposed of by the Convention," scribbled an angry Clay delegate from the convention floor, "is a virtual dissolution of the Whig party of the Union, by their chosen representatives, and absolves every honest man from being fettered by their decisions."107

In the early evening of Thursday, June 8, six names were formally placed in nomination: Taylor, Clay, Webster, Scott, McLean, and Clayton. Before the balloting began, Samuel Galloway, a McLean loyalist at the January Ohio state convention, withdrew McLean's name to spare him the humiliation of a meager vote. ¹⁰⁸ His action had important implications for pro-McLean delegates from Indiana.

The voting began shortly thereafter. Because the convention, in sharp contrast to the arrangement for Arkansas and Texas, refused to allow the votes of unrepresented congressional districts from South Carolina and Alabama to be cast or counted, there was a total of 279 votes, with 140 required to win. Slave states, including Delaware, had 111 votes; the free states, 168. Even with the rules rigged to favor Taylor, he could not win without northern support. The first ballot revealed the South's unity behind him, the fragmentation of the North's anti-Taylor forces, and the erosion of Clay's expected strength. McLean got two votes, Clayton four, Webster twenty-two, and Scott forty-three. As had long been expected, Taylor and Clay were the frontrunners, but their order stunned many in attendance. Taylor led Clay 111 to 97, when as late as the previous night, most observers had credited Clay with at least 115 first-ballot votes. 109

That Clay garnered only one Ohio vote and only five of Kentucky's twelve convinced most attendees that he was finished. As delegates worriedly reported, however, the balloting's clearest pattern was the stark clash between Northerners and Southerners. Of the 111 southern delegates, 85 backed Taylor; three-fourths of Taylor's initial vote thus came from slave states. Aside from Delaware, which clung to Clayton, the twenty-three remaining Southerners went for Clay—all eight of Maryland's delegates, five from both Kentucky and North Carolina, two from Virginia, and one each from Louisiana, Alabama, and South Carolina, which had two self-appointed delegates at the convention. Excepting Delaware, Maryland, and South Carolina, in short, Taylor had majorities in every slave state, narrow in Whiggish Kentucky and North Carolina, heavy in Virginia, Louisiana, and Alabama. Georgia, Tennessee, Mississippi, Texas, Florida, Arkansas, and Missouri went for him unanimously. In contrast to Taylor's 76 percent of the southern vote, 85 percent of northern delegates voted against him.

What devastated Clay was the division in the free states, where he got two-thirds of his total. Taylor won only twenty-six northern votes compared to Clay's sixty-four, yet those sixty-four votes represented only 38 percent of northern delegates. Almost half of the Northerners divided their votes among Webster, Scott, Clayton, and McLean, but it was the crucial defection of forty votes to Scott in Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and New York—the big northern states on which Clay had counted—that ruined him. Had Clay attracted Scott's forty-three votes, he would have won the nomination on the first ballot despite the stubbornness of the Webster men. Little wonder that Clay and his friends considered the suppression of Scott's willingness to run for vice president on Clay's ticket the key to his defeat.¹¹¹

Equally revealing, just as Clay and even McLean had complained, Taylor did far better among the delegates from Democratic states the party had little chance to carry, as well as among the delegates from Democratic congressional districts in Whig and competitive states, than he did elsewhere. Taylor received thirty-five votes, or a third of his total, from Democratic strongholds like Maine, Illinois, Missouri, Arkansas, Alabama, Mississippi, Texas and South Carolina. Altogether he captured 69 percent of the votes of irredeemably Democratic states; in contrast, Clay received just six votes, or 12 percent of their total. Clay outpaced Taylor in Whig and competitive states, but, again because of the fragmentation of the anti-Taylor vote, his edge was not nearly as decisive as Taylor's margin in Democratic states. 112

On the second ballot that evening, Taylor gained seven votes while Clay lost eleven. Five first-ballot Clay voters—four Northerners and Duncan—shifted to Taylor, but the other Clay defectors, all Northerners, went to Scott. Clay's southern supporters remained steadfast despite the immense pressure on them. Webster's and Clayton's delegates also stood pat. Thus at the end of the roll call the totals stood: Taylor, 118; Clay, 86; Scott, 49; Webster, 22; and Clayton, 4.

At this point, Clay's adherents pressed successfully for a recess until the following morning in order to shore up Clay's fading support. Rather than make a positive case for Clay or bargain for votes with promises of office, Clay's friends apparently devoted the rest of the night to damning the Scott and Webster men for betraying Whig principles by refusing to rally behind the Kentuckian, a tack that made more enemies than it gained friends. Meanwhile, Weed and other Taylor operators used the recess to play on the ambition of younger men and small-fry politicos among the delegates. Clay was an old man with lifelong friends in every state, they pointed out. If he were elected, he would obviously reward his aged, blue-stocking loyalists with federal jobs. Only a new man would give younger Whigs a crack at the spoils. Simultaneously, southern Taylorites pointed to the sectional pattern of the two votes and increased pressure on southern Clay men to go for Taylor out of regional loyalty. Reverdy Johnson lobbied the Maryland delegation, which had gone solidly for Clay on both ballots. They had been instructed to stick with Clay as long as he had a chance to win, but Clay's decline between the first and second ballots provided the excuse for three Taylor men in the delegation to break ranks. 113

Taylor's managers were nonetheless badly shaken. Taylor's failure to gain significantly between the first and second ballots, the evidence that Northerners seemed more inclined to shift to Scott than to Taylor, and the undeniable sectional polarization over his candidacy jolted those men who envisioned Taylor as the savior of the national Whig party rather than as a paladin of Southern Rights. Most upset was Truman Smith, the party's unofficial national chairman, who, with the possible exception of Crittenden, had done more than anyone to promote Taylor. That night the unnerved Smith vigorously entreated his colleagues to adjourn the convention without making a nomination.¹¹⁴

Widely known for his role as the manager of Whig congressional campaigns, a role he was expected to fill again in the fall, Truman Smith was the convention's most influential and fascinating figure. His mysterious course has long baffled historians. Chairman of the Connecticut delegation, he had joined his colleagues to vote unanimously for Clay on both ballots, despite having publicly defied the pro-Clay Whig sentiment in Connecticut since the previous December. Palpably, he hoped that Taylor would win without his personally having to vote for him, and the question is why. Why would Smith now seek to adjourn the convention rather than be forced to vote for Taylor himself, thereby flouting sentiment he had already flouted for seven months?¹¹⁵ The intense sectional animosity on the convention floor possibly so frightened this guardian of the national party organization that he wanted to adjourn to avert disruption. More likely, he desperately sought to avoid voting for Taylor, whom he ardently supported, because of the concurrent struggle in the Connecticut legislature over the state's two Senate seats. After a bitter internal brawl among Whigs, Smith and New Haven's Roger Sherman Baldwin had been very narrowly elected senator on May 31, one week before the convention opened. The legislature was still in session, and Whigs could rescind Smith's election if he did anything to anger them. 116

Hence Smith's reluctance to abandon Clay at Philadelphia. He dared not vote for Taylor and risk alienating any more Whigs in the Connecticut legislature. Other Taylor leaders at Philadelphia, however, would not hear of adjourning the convention without a nomination. Since every vote now seemed necessary to put Taylor over the top, Smith reluctantly decided to vote for Taylor and to use his considerable influence among the rest of the Connecticut delegation and other New England Whigs. That Connecticut came third in the alphabetical roll call of states and that Smith, as chairman of the delegation, would vote first ensured that his vote would have enormous impact in swaying the convention.

The combination of developments on Thursday night clinched Taylor's victory. On Friday morning, even before the balloting began, a New York Clay delegate glumly informed Fillmore that the general would win, and he warned prophetically that the nomination would ignite an uproar from angry Northerners. No changes occurred as Alabama and Arkansas led off the voting on the third ballot. C. C. Langdon, Alabama's lone Clay man, heroically held firm. Then Smith and two other Connecticut delegates announced their switch to Taylor, setting off wild cheering from the pro-Taylor galleries and loud groans from the Clay supporters on the floor. The dike had broken. By the end of the ballot Taylor's total had climbed to 133, just seven short of a majority, Clay's had fallen to 74, Webster's to 17, and Clayton's to a single vote. Scott gained five more votes for a total of fifty-four. In addition to the six votes from Connecticut and Maryland, five other Clay men, only one a Southerner, switched to Taylor's remaining recruits, Massachusetts' George Lunt was symbolically most important since he broke away from Webster. On this decisive ballot, the slaveholder Taylor gained only five more southern votes compared to ten from the North. Scott gained the other defectors from Clay, Webster, and Clayton. 117

With Taylor so close to victory, an avalanche of delegates tumbled toward the obvious winner on the fourth ballot. Taylor soared to 171 votes, Scott climbed to 63, Clayton was eliminated, and Clay and Webster, the two greatest statesmen the Whig party boasted, were reduced to the humiliating totals of 35 and 13 votes, respectively. Again, Taylor's gains from the North outpaced those from the South, twenty-three to fifteen. He won majorities from the Maine, New Jersey, and Indiana delegations, while Iowa, Wisconsin, Illinois, and, astonishingly, Rhode Island, which had been Clay's banner state in 1844, now supported Taylor unanimously. The shift of Southerners toward Taylor was much more significant than on the previous two ballots. The inevitability of Taylor's victory, not alarm about slavery or Southern Rights, produced this last-minute movement, but the defections from Clay reduced his count in the slave states to five. 118

Altogether, between the first and fourth ballots fifty Northerners and twenty-one Southerners had switched to the Taylor column. He could not have won without that northern support, and his gain among Northerners blurred the sharp sectional dimension that had characterized the first ballot. Nevertheless, the polarization between North and South remained stark to everyone in the convention hall. Since a Missouri delegate voted for the first time on the final ballot, slave states had a total of 112 votes, and Taylor received 106 of them. Southern votes now constituted 62 percent of his total rather than the 76 percent on the first ballot, so that Northerners now made up almost two-fifths rather than one-fourth of his vote. But those Northerners constituted only 39 percent of free-state delegates. Although this figure marked a great improvement over his 15 percent on the first ballot, three-fifths of the party's northern wing continued to oppose 95 percent of the Southerners. More important, with the exception of Democratic Illinois and Maine and the swing state of Indiana, Taylor did least well among delegates from the biggest northern states. Pennsylvania gave him twelve of its twenty-six votes; New York, six of thirty-six; Massachusetts, one of twelve; and Ohio, one of twenty-three.

The final ballot also culminated another important trend that had been apparent from the outset. Even on the first ballot Scott and Taylor together had received a majority of the convention's votes, and on each subsequent ballot the military heroes had gained at the expense of civilian candidates. On the ultimate vote, fully 84 percent of the delegates, three-fourths of the Northerners and virtually all of the Southerners, supported the victorious generals. Together, Clay and Webster, the issue-oriented champions of specific Whig measures, had been reduced to a fourth of the Northern votes and a meager 16 percent of the entire convention. Little wonder that Greeley labeled the Philadelphia conclave "a slaughterhouse of Whig principles." As the delegates had conferred with one another both before and during the convention, their sense of desperation as they confronted a campaign with no effective issues had quite obviously spread. With each ballot, more delegates concluded that the Whig party did indeed require the aid of gunpowder to capture the fortress of Loco Focoism.

Both the palpable abandonment of any pretense to an issue-oriented campaign and the Southerners' predominance in Taylor's victorious coalition provoked immediate and angry comment from delegates and observers at the convention. Clay's friends repeatedly accused "the mis-representatives of the Whig party" of committing parricide. "They would not take a true ultra Whig & a constitutional conservative slaveholder," fumed Leslie Combs, "and they have gotten an ultra slaveholder & no particular Whig." The fury of northern antislavery men at the triumph of the Louisiana slaveholder and at the gloating jubilation of his "hotheaded" Southern supporters, however, had the most immediate impact on the remaining proceedings. Amid the tumult that broke out after the reading of the final tally, John Collier of New York announced that while he had opposed Taylor, he would support the nomination. He then warned, in a thinly veiled reference to the visible and audible anger of northern anti-Taylor men, that the convention could still result in disaster. To preserve harmony it should immediately proceed to the vice presidential nomination, and he wanted Millard Fillmore for that post. Collier's implication was clear. Nominating Fillmore rather than Abbott Lawrence, southern Taylorites' favorite, alone could restore harmony. 120

Charles B. Allen, a Conscience Whig from Massachusetts, was more intransigent. New York might be satisfied with the nomination, he snarled, but the Bay State was not. "We have a man who will continue the rule of slavery for another four years." Massachusetts "rejected the nominee of the Convention, and . . . Massachusetts would spurn the bribe that was to be offered to her [of a candidate for vice president]." Because not a single southern vote had been cast for a northern Whig, exclaimed Allen, "the Whig Party of the United States is . . . dissolved." ¹²¹

Four Ohioans, whose large delegation had given Taylor but a single vote, next spoke: John Bingham, Samuel Galloway, Daniel R. Tilden, and Lewis Campbell. Even before the third ballot started on Friday morning, the Ohioans had planned to insist that the party adopt the Wilmot Proviso as its platform should Taylor win, and one of the four, variously identified as Bingham, Galloway, or Campbell in the conflicting newspaper reports of the proceedings, introduced a resolution stating that the Whig party would endorse the nomination of Taylor only "on condition that he will . . . adhere to [the party's] great fundamental principles, no extension of slave territory, no acquisition of foreign territory by conquest, protection of American industry, and opposition to Executive patronage." Whoever introduced this resolution—and even its wording differs in the various accounts—all four Ohioans unequivocally declared that their constituents intensely opposed the extension of slavery and would never support Taylor unless he publicly committed himself against it. 122

Amid yells of approval and disapproval, the chair ruled the resolution out of order and tried to press ahead with nominations for vice president. Before he could restore order, Henry Wilson of Massachusetts shouted a speech above the din. He came to the convention as a Whig prepared to support the nomination of a Whig, he declared disingenuously. But "we have nominated a gentleman . . . who is anything but a Whig, and, sir, I will go home, and so help me God, I will do all I can to defeat the election of that candidate."

It is extraordinarily significant that Wilson, who for over a year had privately objected to Taylor because of his slaveholding and was eagerly planning to build a new antislavery party, publicly justified his bolt from the party by citing Taylor's dubious Whiggery. All of the Ohioans also emphasized and condemned Taylor's lack of party regularity. While antislavery sentiment was a powerful cause of northern Whig opposition to Taylor, in short, they well knew that Taylor's No Partyism generated even deeper discontent among their Whig constituents.

Ohio's Vance and George Ashmun of Massachusetts attempted to restore a modicum of comity to the proceedings by insisting that the men who had spoken did not represent Whig opinion in their states. Ohio and Massachusetts would support the nominee, they declared. The fervent hostility of the Northerners nonetheless left some Southerners "thunderstruck and alarmed" that defeat could be snatched from the jaws of victory. The party seemed to stand on the edge of a schism that would deny Taylor the northern votes he needed for election. It could topple over that precipice if southern hotheads in their moment of exultation tried to press their advantage too far. As sensible Southerners knew, the preservation of party harmony now depended on the vice presidential candidate. ¹²³

Fourteen names were placed in nomination, including that of New York boss Weed, who had always shunned elective office, but only four Northerners were serious contenders since even extreme proslavery Southerners realized the ticket had to be balanced. Southerners decidedly preferred Lawrence, the millionaire textile manufacturer, for his friends had been cooperating with them for months to achieve Taylor's nomination. Wealthy New York merchants also favored Lawrence, as did many New Englanders out of regional pride. Rumor suggested that Lawrence would supply $100,000 to the party's war chest if he were on the ticket, and that prospect lured additional support. Allen's speech, however, harmed

Lawrence's chances, and Fletcher Webster informed the delegates of his father's decided hostility to Lawrence. 124

The second prominent candidate was Ohio's Thomas Ewing, a major figure in both his state's and the national Whig party. Since January he had privately lobbied Ohio delegates for Taylor. Immediately prior to the convention he pressed John Sherman, whose brother William Tecumseh Sherman had been raised in the Ewing home, to go for Taylor rather than Scott on the ground that it was more important to have a Northerner as vice president than president since he could break a Senate tie on the Wilmot Proviso. Because most Ohio Whigs knew nothing of Ewing's activity for Taylor, his nomination might provide a way to save that state. Before the voting began, however, Lew Campbell, citing authorization from Ewing and the rest of the Ohio delegation, withdrew Ewing's name from consideration. Neither the other Ohio delegates nor Ewing had given such authorization, and twenty years later, Ewing was still fuming that Campbell had sabotaged his chance to become president. Thus did Campbell gain revenge in June for his defeat in January at the hands of the McLean and Ewing forces. 125

The New York rivals Seward and Fillmore completed the list. In the spring Seward had asked Weed to withdraw his name in the Albany Evening Journal. A man of superb intellect and restless energy, Seward had no interest in the post and was ill-suited for it. By late May, he had changed his mind. Aware that his foes in the New York party were plumping Fillmore for the nomination, he feared the threat that Fillmore, if successful, could pose to the ascendancy of the Weed-Seward faction. Weed came to Philadelphia in early June hoping to secure the nomination for Seward, and that desire was one reason he pushed Clayton and opposed Scott, since Scott's nomination would have mandated a southern vice presidential candidate. Weed also promoted Seward, as did Greeley, as the best candidate to attract Catholic immigrants and help the party carry New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana. Scott, he argued, would alienate those same voters. Precisely because of Seward's pro-Catholic reputation, the numerous Native Americans at the convention warned delegates that Seward's nomination would doom the ticket in Pennsylvania even with Taylor at its head. In fact, once Weed cast his lot with Taylor, he gave up hope for the vice presidency since the deal between Lawrence and the Taylor men seemed too fixed. One of Weed's henchmen in the New York delegation, therefore, withdrew Seward's name before the balloting began. Weed, however, apparently obtained a promise of the State Department for Seward from Colonel Joseph Taylor, whose accommodations in Philadelphia he had arranged. 126

As early as 1846, New York's conservative Whigs believed that Weed was plotting to make Seward vice president or secretary of state in order to groom him for a presidential run in 1852. If Seward obtained a voice in the distribution of federal patronage in New York, let alone the presidency, they feared, their faction could be crushed. To keep Seward out of the next administration, they came to Philadelphia intent upon securing the vice presidential nomination for Fillmore. As a fallback position, they were prepared to sacrifice Clay and switch to Scott to keep Seward out of the vice presidency. 127

Once Taylor was nominated, anti-Weed Whigs redoubled their efforts for Fillmore, since they reckoned that if he won, another New Yorker could never be named secretary of state. Seizing on northern Whigs' anger at Taylor's triumph and the damage it did Lawrence, Collier, an anti-Weed man, thus immediately suggested Fillmore's nomination to pacify northern anti-Taylor Whigs. Even as Collier spoke, Harry Bradley, a prominent Vermont Whig, Clay lovalist, and close friend of Fillmore, delivered the same message to Southerners. Seated near the Kentucky, Tennessee, and Louisiana delegations when Taylor's victory was announced and the cries of outrage arose from northern Whigs, he instantly warned them that the party faced ruin if they rubbed salt in northern wounds by pressing ahead with Lawrence and that only Fillmore's nomination could salvage party unity. He then ran over to Solomon Foot, the chairman of the Vermont delegation, who planned to vote for Lawrence because of his New England residence, and urged him to vote for Fillmore instead. Foot and southern Taylor leaders were convinced. Meredith Gentry told the Tennesseans "that the Whig party must be saved" and Lawrence abandoned, Bradley later reported, and the Kentuckians agreed. With the Louisianans, however, "the Lawrence bargain was too strong and I could not detach them."128

Bradley's efforts for Fillmore paid off when the voting began. Fifty ballots were scattered among various favorite sons, but Fillmore and Lawrence ran way ahead with 115 and 109 votes, respectively. Lawrence amassed fifty-seven southern and fifty-two northern votes, twenty-six of which were from New England. Fillmore received only twelve New England votes, three of which came from Vermont, and only twenty-three from the South. Tennessee and Kentucky, however, cast thirteen votes for him and thus provided his margin over Lawrence, a lead that probably ensured his triumph on the next ballot. Bradley was immensely proud of his handiwork. "Weed was never more surprised," he later chortled. "He was sure of Taylor & Lawrence & Seward for Secretary of State. He was foiled."

Before the next roll call began, William Tyson, another of Fillmore's friends in the New York delegation, threatened Alabama's Henry Hilliard that unless Fillmore were placed on the ticket, the New York State Whig convention would "make an electoral ticket favorable to Henry Clay and Millard Fillmore." Neither Hilliard nor other southern Taylorites took that threat lightly. Between the two ballots fourteen Southerners shifted from Lawrence to Fillmore. ¹³⁰ Fillmore easily won on the next ballot with 173 votes compared to 83 for Lawrence.

In the excitement that followed the completion of the ticket, delegate after delegate stood up and pledged his state's support for Taylor and Fillmore. Eager to get to a prearranged mass ratification meeting at Independence Square, no one, save Ohio's Daniel Tilden, even mentioned that the party had not adopted a platform. Tilden again moved that the party pledge itself against the extension of slavery into free territory, but his resolution was promptly tabled. The convention's desire to shun the explosive Proviso is understandable, but given the ticket, a platform that rehearsed the Whig position on economic measures or any other issue also seemed superfluous to most delegates. As a Pennsylvanian boasted in the convention's final moments, Taylor gave the Whigs the only ammunition they needed. From that moment until November, he predicted, Pennsylvania's Whigs would campaign with the cry, "A little more grape, Captain Bragg." 131

Thus ended the long and divisive struggle for the Whig presidential nomination in 1848. One could point to any number of things to account for the result: the divergent procedures in the North and South for selecting delegates; the impatience of younger Whigs with the seemingly inexhaustible ambition of Clay and Webster; personal and factional rivalries; the superior organization and energy of the Taylor managers in Washington; the Allison Letter; the suppression of Scott's willingness to run with Clay; the important decisions on the nights of June 6 and June 8; the selection of Philadelphia, with its concentration of nativists, as the locale for the convention; and the expedient desire to find a winner at all costs. With justice, all of these factors and more were pointed to by contemporaries who sought to explain the outcome.

William Ballard Preston, the Young Indian from Virginia, however, captured the essence most succinctly in a jubilant note to Rives. "The large states of N.Y. Ohio & Pennsylvania in their attempt to exercise a commanding influence in the nomination have in truth exercised but little," he wrote. "The result belongs to those who had but one purpose one choice and one object." Southerners had been extraordinarily united behind Taylor from the beginning to the end. The northern states on which Clay had depended, in contrast, had failed to unite on him, Webster, or anyone else. Factional and personal rivalries in part caused the northern divisions. The main reason why northern Whigs fragmented, however, and why Southerners rallied so cohesively behind Taylor, was the end of the war and the acquisition of the Mexican Cession. Ratification of the peace treaty seemingly destroyed Whigs' last viable issue and left them defenseless to confront the divisive Wilmot Proviso, From March 10 on, growing numbers of northern Whigs reached the conclusion Thomas Dorr had jeeringly attributed to them in January. Forced to find a candidate who could hold southern votes, they lacked concrete issues to mobilize the normal Whig electorate in the North. Thus they believed they required Democratic defectors to win, and to attract them they would need "a brave old soldier" who might prove to be "a taking candidate." a Nominating Taylor, however, was a far cry from electing him. Despite the lovefest that ensued at the end of the convention and the confident boasts of triumph, the convention had produced profound bitterness and fractious division. Despite their postconvention euphoria that they had averted a rupture, departing Whigs had good reason to heed the warnings of a Michigan delegate. "Fatal consequences . . . must ensue" from "the flagrant contempt for the wishes & will of the north," J. R. Williams wrote Fillmore. Fillmore should therefore spurn his nomination. The imposition of Taylor upon the Whigs "must lead to an utter dissolution & defeat of the Whig party, to an array of a greater northern against a southern party—the calamities of which no man can foresee." ¹³³

"Stimulate Every Whig to Turn Out"

"THE POLITICAL ADVANTAGES which have been secured by Taylor's nomination," southern Whigs cheered after the Philadelphia convention, are "impossible to overestimate." If the Whigs had not chosen a victorious Mexican War general, Meredith Gentry explained, Democrats would have crucified them for treason throughout the campaign "and our overthrow would have been complete." Even more important, Taylor's victory demonstrated that all future aspirants for the presidency must "keep themselves clear upon the negro question." The selection of the Louisiana slaveholder "has scotched if it has not killed abolition. It is literally expurgating the Whig party. For example, Giddings, Root, & Co. will leave now."

That prospective defection of militant antislavery men terrified most northern Whigs. From New England, the Middle Atlantic states, and the Midwest came immediate predictions of a bolt by furious opponents of slavery expansion, not just a few well-known leaders, but tens of thousands of Whig voters. "What in God's name shall be done?" queried a worried New Yorker. "The masses are in rebellion. The rank and file are swearing they'll wheel out by Regiments. Taylor's nomination is regarded as infamous."

These contrasting reactions support traditional interpretations of the 1848 election. According to many historians, sectional disputes over slavery extension and the resulting shift of northern Whigs and Democrats to a new Free Soil party constituted its central story. By this analysis, even though Taylor won, Free Soilers' deep incursions into the Whigs' northern constituency gravely weakened the party's competitiveness and heralded its subsequent disruption. This chapter reassesses how much the sectional split over slavery expansion actually debilitated Whigs in 1848. Northern and southern Whigs had long disagreed about matters involving slavery, yet the cohesive force of interparty conflict had held them together and retained the allegiance of Whig voters despite those divergent sectional views. The question is how successfully that same centripetal pressure operated during the 1848 campaign once the contest was against the Democratic enemy rather than among fellow Whigs.

Whatever historians' preoccupations with the slavery issue, following Taylor's nomination Whigs feared abstentions by Whig regulars disgusted at Taylor's No

Partyism as much as defections by angry antislavery men. "We feel as if we were stripped of every great and strong issue with which to go to the people," the same worried New Yorker complained. "What is there (Taylor being our exponent) left on which to stand?" An embittered Henry Clay chorused that refrain to justify his refusal to endorse Taylor or participate in the campaign. "If it was between Locofoco principles and Whig principles, I would engage in it with all the ardor of which I am capable," he contended. "But alas! I fear that the Whig party is dissolved and that no longer are there Whig principles to excite zeal and stimulate exertion."

This perception that Whigs lacked issues to mobilize their voters better prophesied the election's outcome and significance than did warnings about bolts to a new antislavery party. Since Whigs won the presidency in 1840 and 1848 while running military heroes without platforms, historians normally pair those two elections to demonstrate the Whigs' unprincipled expediency, their policies' unattractiveness, and their electoral weakness. In one important respect this bracketing is valid. Just as in 1840, in 1848 the conditions that caused Whigs to resort to a renowned warrior changed dramatically after the national convention adjourned. Just like Harrison, Taylor would win in 1848 less because of the smell of gunpowder than for other reasons.

Nonetheless, equating the two elections is misleading. The 1840 election was fought over contrasting Whig and Democratic programmatic responses to economic depression, and it culminated a three-year process in which unprecedented numbers of new voters were mobilized. The 1844 presidential election also revolved around concrete issue contrasts, and it induced a turnout rate nearly equal to that of 1840. In the context of previous presidential campaigns, the 1848 election most resembled that of 1836, despite their divergent outcomes. Just as in 1836, when the Whigs ran different regional candidates, in 1848 they would run different campaigns for Taylor in the North and South. In both, Whigs depended heavily on contrasting the images of the parties' respective presidential and vice presidential candidates rather than providing clear alternatives on public policy to attract voters. Consequently, the 1848 election evoked the lowest voter turnout in any presidential election since 1836. The estimated nationwide voting rates of adult white males were 57.8 percent in 1836, 80.2 percent in 1840, 78.9 percent in 1844, and 72.7 percent in 1848. Although Zachary Taylor won in 1848, whereas Henry Clay lost in 1844, Taylor in fact received a smaller share of the actual vote and even less of the potential vote than had Clay in the issue-oriented campaign of 1844.5

Aside from the incursion of a separate antislavery party into Whig ranks, therefore, the election of 1848 portended the Whig party's ultimate collapse by demonstrating its inability to retain old voters or to mobilize new ones without demonstrating clear differences from Democrats on concrete issues. That fact creates a paradox. To understand how Taylor won the election, we must understand how the Whigs were able to retain as much of their vote as they did—how they were able to minimize both defections and abstentions. To understand how the election augured the party's demise, we must understand why the Whigs lost the support they did.

I

Whig leaders had good reason to fear that northern antislavery Whigs would defect. Outrage at Taylor's nomination and at Southerners' apparent control of the convention was intense. Discontent erupted immediately in Maine, Vermont, New York, Indiana, Michigan, and elsewhere, but it centered in Ohio and Massachusetts, largely because certain Whig editors and officeholders fomented and organized it. "Stunned Stupefied outraged abased Mortified and enraged to the last degree of endurance" by Taylor's nomination, Albert G. Riddle, a Whig state legislator from Ohio's Western Reserve, for example, was "prepared to pronounce a valedictory to the dead and rotten carcass of the National Whig party." Cincinnati editor Thomas B. Stevenson predicted that over 20,000 Ohio Whigs would defect to a new antislavery party. The Philadelphia convention was the last straw, a young Massachusetts Whig explained. Southerners "have trampled on the rights and just claims of the North sufficiently long and have fairly shit upon all our Northern statesmen and are now trying to rub it in." Northerners must "take a stand" and bring "the South to their proper level."

Plans for a broader antislavery party had been laid in Massachusetts, Ohio, and New York even before the Whig national convention assembled. On May 27, seven Massachusetts Young Whigs (now called Conscience Whigs) gathered in the editorial offices of Charles Francis Adams' Boston Whig, the Conscience Whig organ. Including Adams, Charles Sumner, Stephen Phillips, E. Rockwood Hoar, and Henry Wilson, a delegate to the Philadelphia convention, the conferees agreed to convene dissidents should Taylor win the Whig nomination. "I do not know that we ought to regret the result," Adams wrote John Gorham Palfrey, the Conscience Whigs' representative in Congress. "The issue must be made at some time or other, and there is no fairer time than this." Accordingly, on June 10, the day after Taylor's nomination, the group called for a mass protest meeting at Worcester on June 28. Pronouncing Taylor "a candidate whom no Northern Whig is bound to support," they invited all who opposed both Taylor and Cass to meet and to take the steps necessary to unite all northern opponents of slavery extension in a new party."

In Ohio, Salmon P. Chase and the Liberty party launched the new organization. A resident of Cincinnati, a renowned lawyer for free blacks and fugitive slaves, and a one-time Whig, Chase joined the Liberty party in the early 1840s and immediately sought to combine it with antislavery Whigs and Democrats. During 1847, Chase corresponded frequently with Conscience Whigs in Massachusetts, with Joshua R. Giddings in Ohio, and with New York's Barnburner Democrats, who were committed to the Wilmot Proviso. Although he failed to stop the Liberty party from nominating New Hampshire's John P. Hale as its own presidential candidate in October 1847, he continued to favor disbanding the party for a wider coalition. Sensing uneasiness among both Whigs and Democrats in Ohio about their approaching national conventions, Chase on May 17 issued a call, signed by 3,000 antislavery men of all parties, for a "Free Territory Convention" to meet in Columbus on June 21.8

Angry Van Burenite Democrats led in New York. At their separate state convention to protest Hunker control of the party in the fall of 1847, the Barnburners adopted the slogan that would identify the new party: "Free Trade, Free Labor, Free Soil, Free Speech, and Free Men." When Barnburners and Hunkers chose separate delegations to the Democratic national convention in 1848, the Barnburners determined to revolt if the convention did not recognize them alone as New York's official delegates. Infuriated by their treatment in Baltimore and by Cass' nomination, they stormed home. Even as Whig delegates passed through New York City on their way to Philadelphia, the Barnburners held a massive protest rally there and issued a call for a Democratic convention to meet in Utica on June 22 to choose their own "democratic presidential candidate," one who was not the product of "abject subserviency to the slave power."

When most Whig delegates adjourned on June 9 to hasten to Independence Square to celebrate Taylor's nomination, therefore, fifteen angry antislavery men remained behind in the Chinese Museum to precipitate the long-awaited bolt. Including delegates and alternates from Maine, Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, and Ohio, they commissioned the Ohioans to ask the impending Free Territory Convention on June 21 to call a national Free Soil meeting at Buffalo in early August. From there events proceeded rapidly. Repudiating Cass and Taylor as slaveholders' candidates who refused to oppose slavery extension, the Columbus gathering, which attracted nearly 1,000 Ohioans from all three parties, announced its readiness "to cooperate with any party thoroughly resolved and inflexibly determined to permit no further extension of slavery." It summoned "Freemen of every State and Every Party" to meet in Buffalo on August 9 to select "candidates of Freemen, determined to remain Free," The following day in Utica, Barnburners nominated a presidential ticket of Martin Van Buren and Wisconsin's Henry Dodge, denounced slavery as "a great moral, social, and political evil," proclaimed it both the right and duty of Congress to prohibit slavery in the territories, and appointed the same Barnburner delegates who had gone to Baltimore to attend the Buffalo convention called by the Ohioans. On June 28, some 5,000 Conscience Whigs and a few Democrats met in Worcester and called on "the lovers of Freedom from both parties" in Massachusetts to attend the Buffalo gathering. To facilitate coalition among different antislavery groups, it divided a state committee equally among Whigs, Democrats, and Libertv men.10

Prior to the June meetings, a few northern conservatives had greeted the prospective bolt by antislavery zealots with equanimity. Tired of the endless wrangling with the impatient antislavery leaders and confident that the defection could be confined to a few dissidents, they welcomed it, in the words of a Massachusetts Whig, as "a sort of sluice way through which, the Whig party could run off some cumbersome material." The size of the three gatherings and Northerners' enthusiastic response to their actions made it clear, however, that leaders might carry a substantial chunk of the Whig rank and file with them into the new party. Preventing a massive hemorrhage of their northern electorate thus became a top priority for most northern Whig leaders in July.¹¹

That goal obviously affected the behavior of congressional Whigs when they addressed the problem of slavery expansion during the summer prior to the Buffalo Free Soil meeting. Even before ratification of the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, northern House Whigs had unanimously but unsuccessfully attempted to impose the Wilmot Proviso on the Mexican Cession. For the remainder of the session, attention focused on Oregon, where no one expected slavery to be established but that might set a precedent for other territories. After ratification of Polk's Oregon Treaty in 1846, American residents in Oregon, without congressional authorization, formed a provisional government that prohibited slavery in the territory. But many congressmen refused to recognize that government's legitimacy, and some Southerners particularly objected to its ban on slavery. When Congress attempted to create a territorial government of its own, however, it stalemated over the slavery issue. In 1847, the House, on a sectionally polarized vote, passed a bill organizing the Oregon Territory and barring slavery from it. Southerners of both parties vehemently denounced congressional prohibition of slavery, and they killed the House bill in the Senate with the aid of northern Democrats, who favored popular sovereignty. In the spring of 1848, the House's northern majority prepared a similar bill. As a Senate alternative, Jesse Bright, an Indiana Democrat, moved to amend the Oregon bill by specifying that slavery was excluded from Oregon because the Territory was north of the 36° 30' line, which at the time barred slavery in the northern portion of the Louisiana Purchase but not west of the Rocky Mountains. This formula offended most Northerners because it implied that slavery would be permitted south of the Missouri Compromise line, that is, in most of the Mexican Cession. 12

Before the Senate voted on Bright's amendment, Delaware's Clayton moved simultaneously to break the logiam over Oregon, to find a position on the slavery extension issue that could hold the Whig party together, and to quash the threatened northern Whig revolt by resolving the entire territorial issue before the Free Soil convention met on August 9. By settling the slavery extension question in a way satisfactory to both sections, he could render the divisive Wilmot Proviso irrelevant, just as the Whigs' now-obsolete No Territory platform had once done, thereby demolishing the rationale for a new Free Soil party. On July 12, Clayton moved that the Senate form a select committee to consider the related problems of Oregon and the Mexican Cession; as author of the motion, he automatically became its chairman. Carefully balanced to reflect conflicting partisan and sectional views, the committee's leading figures, aside from Clayton, were three Democrats: Bright, who sought to attach the 36° 30' clause to the Senate's Oregon bill; Daniel S. Dickinson, chief of New York's Hunker Democrats and a leading exponent of popular sovereignty, which would allow residents of territories to make the decision on slavery; and Calhoun, who since early 1847 had repeatedly insisted that the Constitution guaranteed the right to own slaves on every foot of United States territory and that neither Congress nor a territorial government could prohibit it.13

After heated discussion, the committee reported a bill on July 18. Immediately dubbed the Clayton Compromise, it created a territorial government for Oregon, specifically allowing the unofficial provisional government's antislavery ban to continue in effect until the new territorial legislature ruled for or against slavery. It also established territorial governments for California and New Mexico, but it explicitly barred those governments from taking any action either establishing or prohibiting slavery. ¹⁴ Instead, it left the decision on slavery there to the federal judiciary. Specifically, it authorized any slave brought into those territories to sue in the federal territorial courts to see if slavery legally existed there and provided that the decision of the territorial court could then be directly appealed to the Supreme Court. ¹⁵

Clayton defended his measure as eminently fair to North and South alike. Congress would neither establish nor prohibit slavery in any western territory. The House's ban on slavery in Oregon would be dropped, but the same result would be achieved by adhering to the provisional government's prohibition until the new territorial legislature acted. New Mexico and California, on the other hand, were too underpopulated to allow the same kind of sovereignty to their governments. The conflicting claims of the South and the North about the status of slavery there would be settled by the courts, "by the silent operation of the Constitution itself."

Ignoring Clayton's arguments, Northerners and Southerners of both parties attacked the bill for giving an advantage to the other section. Southerners who had never subscribed to Calhoun's theory protested that the courts would rule that the Mexican prohibition of slavery still applied to the Cession because Congress had not explicitly replaced it. Thus slavery would be effectively barred and the South denied its equal rights. One of the northern Whigs on the select committee, Samuel Phelps of Vermont, in fact defended the bill on precisely those grounds. A few northern Democrats and the vast majority of northern Whigs both inside and outside Congress, however, vehemently assaulted Clayton's bill as a proslavery measure. They objected that it prevented residents of California and New Mexico from prohibiting slavery if they so desired. They complained that men could legally own slaves in the two territories until a definitive court ruling occurred and that therefore slavery would be covertly extended to territory they regarded as free. Nor, they groused, would the judicial system reach a fair decision. The proslavery Polk would appoint the territorial judges, who were bound to rule initially against the slaves and would not issue the writs of habeas corpus seemingly necessary to carry the case on appeal to the Supreme Court. Even if they did, the Court might rule for slavery's legality, refuse to hear the case, or stall for so long that slavery would become firmly established and proslavery state constitutions written.¹⁷

Behind these objections lay northern Whig fears about the immediate political consequences of the bill. Aware of the impending Free Soil convention at Buffalo, Whigs reasoned that if they surrendered the sure-fire prohibition of the Proviso and allowed slavery even temporarily into free territory by supporting Clayton's measure, they might drive hundreds of thousands of northern voters to the new antislavery party. Opposition to slavery extension among New York's Whigs was vehement, one told Fillmore. "On the local tickets, a man cannot get elected pathmaster who is not a most decided 'Free Soil Man.' The feeling is almost as strong as in the times of Antimasonry." Because passage of Clayton's bill would increase the new party's support, it would doom Taylor in New York and New England, Weed warned Seward. Such tocsins were perspicacious. Insisting that "there must be no more compromises with Slavery," the platform of the new Free Soil party would proclaim the Clayton Compromise "an absolute surrender of the rights of the non-slaveholders of all the States."

Over northern Whig opposition, Clayton's bill passed the Senate in the early morning of July 27 by a vote of 33 to 22. Nineteen southern and seven northern Democrats favored the proposal, as did Phelps and six southern Whigs. Ten northern Democrats, eight northern Whigs, and four southern Whigs opposed it. In sum, Whigs split seven to twelve against Clayton's bill, and Democrats divided twenty-six to ten in favor. Northerners opposed the measure by an eighteen to eight margin; Southerners supported it twenty-five to four. 19

Even as the Senate debated Clayton's plan, observers predicted that Northerners would kill it in the House, yet the fatal stab came from Georgia's Alexander Stephens. As soon as the House took up the Senate bill on July 28, Stephens moved to table it without debate, and his motion passed 112 to 97. Seven Whigs from the Upper South joined Stephens to combine with all seventy-three northern Whigs and thirty-one northern Democrats to bury Clayton's handiwork. Twenty-seven southern Whigs, forty-nine southern Democrats, and twenty-one northern Democrats were in the minority. Again, support for the compromise came primarily from the South and from Democrats, opposition primarily from the North and from Whigs. Still, just as in the Senate, the vote provided a blurred record to take to the electorate. Southern Democrats unanimously supported the measure in both houses, but so did a majority of southern Whigs. Conversely, in both houses, majorities of Northerners from both parties, equally desperate to stem defections to the new Free Soil party, opposed it.²⁰

Had Stephens and the seven other southern Whigs voted like most Southerners, the Clayton Compromise would have survived 105–104 and possibly passed. Stephens' motives therefore provoked considerable speculation. In a cogent speech to the House on August 7 and in a public letter to the Milledgeville Federal Union at the end of that month, Stephens defended his course by condemning the supposed compromise as a capitulation of Southern Rights that no true Southerner could support. Flatly rejecting Calhounite doctrine, he denied that the Constitution automatically established slavery; rather, it only protected the institution where state or municipal laws had already established it. Because the bill prohibited the passage of proslavery legislation in California and New Mexico, the only law the courts could rely on when deciding the legality of slavery in these territories was the Mexican law abolishing slavery. Hence acquiescence in the bill meant an intolerable surrender of the South's equal rights. Better, he declared, to return the territories to Mexico than to accept such a settlement.²¹

Stephens never abandoned this insistence that only positive territorial or congressional statutes, rather than the aegis of the Constitution itself, could legally establish slavery in federal territories. His conviction was firm, but political factors were also at work. Having cooperated with northern Whig congressmen in the Taylor movement since December, he possibly hoped to extend an olive branch to Whigs still smarting over Taylor's nomination. More likely, he was targeting opponents in the South. Stephens and his Georgia Whig allies repeatedly condemned southern backers of Clayton's Compromise for selling out "our Southern position & Southern Rights." These included every southern Democrat but also his Georgia Whig rival Berrien. Such attacks on disloyalty, Berrien's allies protested, "are shafts sped at you." Toombs, Stephens, and others were "all banded together to advance themselves" by directing "the action of the Whig party." 22

With the interment of Clayton's Compromise, the House and Senate again stalemated. The House immediately took up its own bill, organizing the Oregon Territory with slavery barred. Southerners and a few northern Democrats tried to remove that stipulation, but most northern Democrats and all the northern Whigs defeated their amendment. The prohibition of slavery from Oregon "practically . . . is of no consequence because no man supposes, that Slavery will ever exist [there], or would if there were no prohibition," admitted North Carolina's Outlaw. "But it is important as manifesting the determination of the Northern States, to appropriate the whole of our late acquisitions to themselves." With the measure viewed as a precedent for the Mexican Cession, the final vote on the House's Oregon bill produced the same sectional polarization between North and South that had appeared in early votes on the Wilmot Proviso.²³

Once the House bill reached the Senate, Southerners and a few northern Democrats, over the objections of all ten northern Whigs and most northern Democrats, attached Bright's amendment to it and returned the amended bill to the House. The House refused to concur in the Senate amendment on virtually a strict sectional vote. Finally, on August 13, after another all-night session, the Senate receded from its amendment and accepted the House bill, 29 to 25. Despite vociferous southern protests, three Southerners, the Delaware Whig Presley Spruance and Democrats Thomas Hart Benton and Sam Houston, joined Northerners in the majority. In response, Polk noted when he signed the bill that he accepted it only because Oregon was north of the 36° 30' line.²⁴

Congress' record on Oregon starkly illuminated the naked sectional polarization that kept the explosive question of slavery's possible extension into the Mexican Cession alive during the 1848 campaign. Yet that record left quite unclear which major party would suffer most from a new antislavery organization in the North or even why such a new party was necessary. Northern spokesmen of both parties could cite their congressmen's votes against slavery extension to deny the need for any new antislavery party. Southerners had clearly fought congressional prohibition, and, just as clearly, a slaveholder headed the Whig presidential ticket. As a counterbalance to this apparent Whig disadvantage, however, northern Whigs brazenly trumpeted the crucial southern Whig votes against Clayton's Compromise as evidence that southern Whigs, like their northern colleagues, were committed to free territory.²⁵ Democrats had warts of their own. Aside from the northern Democratic Senators who aided Southerners in attempting to extend the 36° 30' line to the Pacific coast and to defeat the House's Oregon bill, Lewis Cass vigorously advocated popular sovereignty, which Clayton had included in his Oregon bill and which the northern majority in the House had rejected in favor of congressional prohibition. Which party could pose as more trustworthy on slavery extension in response to a Free Soil challenge, in sum, remained uncertain.

That challenge crystallized even before the Senate finally passed the Oregon bill. Whatever the hopes of northern Whigs and Democrats, their congressional votes did nothing to slow the momentum that had been growing since June. Over 20,000 elected and self-appointed delegates poured into Buffalo for the August convention. Uniformly zealous, they were a heterogeneous lot: midwestern Democratic proponents of rivers and harbors improvements, which neither party had officially endorsed and Polk had vetoed; labor reformers interested in free homesteads in the West; and even vengeful Clay loyalists from New York City. But most were primarily determined to stop slavery's spread, and they included three main groups: antislavery Whigs from New England and the Midwest; antislavery Democrats, including New York's Barnburners; and Liberty men. Such an assemblage was obviously too huge to be manageable, and from the start the convention operated on a dual track. Most delegates attended what was in effect a mass meeting, where they listened to a succession of speakers who denounced both

Taylor and Cass as lackeys of the Slave Power and called on free men in the North to unite to defend freedom. A separate group consisting of six at-large delegates from each state in attendance and three from each congressional district was responsible for picking a presidential ticket and composing a platform, both of which would then be submitted to the mass meeting for ratification.²⁶

Representatives of each of the three preexisting parties had a favorite for the presidential nomination. Most Liberty men pushed their existing nominee, Hale, who made known his willingness to step aside should the convention choose another man. Whigs from Ohio and New England, as well as Salmon Chase, promoted John McLean, the disappointed aspirant for the Whig nomination, but McLean refused to submit his name to the convention. Democrats decisively favored Van Buren, and largely to hold the rebellious Barnburners and attract Democrats elsewhere, Van Buren got the nod.²⁷ For vice president the convention chose Charles Francis Adams.

The lengthy platform reflected the disparate interests of the incipient Free Soil party's polyglot constituency. One plank called on Congress to subsidize rivers and harbors improvements. Another demanded free homesteads for settlers in the West. The tariff plank, which was written by Joseph L. White, perhaps Clay's staunchest New York friend, called for duties sufficiently high to defray the government's expenses and pay off the debt accumulated in the Mexican War-a plank White insisted was necessary to attract Whig support.²⁸ Other planks advocated cheap postage, retrenchment of government expenditures, and the election, rather than appointment, of civil servants. Predictably, most of the platform addressed the slavery question. Although it pledged noninterference with slavery in the states where it existed, it incorporated Chase's demand that the federal government divorce itself from slavery wherever it had the constitutional authority, that is, in the District of Columbia, federal military installations, and the territories. Denouncing "the aggressions of the Slave Power," it insisted that Congress bar slavery from all free territory and that there be "no more slave states and no more slave territory." The platform closed with the resounding pledge "that we inscribe on our banner 'Free Soil, Free Speech, Free Labor, and Free Men,' and under it will fight on and fight ever, until a triumphant victory shall reward our exertions."

All of the proceedings on August 9 and 10 evoked an enthusiasm that reminded observers more of a religious revival than a political convention. So fervent, determined, and surprisingly unified was the Buffalo assemblage that the Free Soil party seemed, at least to some, capable of wreaking havoc in the North. Now the Whig party had to confront what many of its most thoughtful members had long dreaded: a new party seemingly capable of mobilizing northern antislavery men of all partisan hues.

II

Two weeks after the Buffalo convention, George Patterson warned Weed that New York's Whig leaders would have "to work in order to save our troops from going to Van Buren." Leadership, in fact, largely determined how many Whigs were saved and how many lost. Virtually all northern Whigs—and most northern Democrats—opposed slavery expansion, but the great majority remained loyal to the major parties. By itself, in sum, antislavery sentiment does not explain who became Free Soilers and who did not. The Free Soil party's ability to siphon off Whig troops varied sharply from state to state, and the disposition of Whig leadership toward the new party largely accounted for the differential. No matter how angry antislavery Whig voters were at the selection of Taylor, most followed the lead of Whig officeholders, editors, and party officials whom they had come to trust and respect. Where significant numbers of prominent Whig opinion makers joined and promoted the Free Soil party, it cut into the Whig rank and file. In contrast, where respected Whig leaders, often renowned antislavery men, spurned the new party and left it dependent on ex-Democrats and Liberty men as spokesmen, the Free Soil party posed a much greater threat to the Whigs' Democratic rivals than to the Whigs themselves.

Influential Whigs played a larger role in Ohio's Free Soil organization than in that of any other northern state. Leaders of the Corwin faction like Columbus Delano and Lew Campbell initially encouraged a bolt after their disappointment at the national convention, as did McLean's lieutenant Samuel Galloway. The Free Soilers' nomination of Van Buren, as well as Corwin's and McLean's adherence to the regular organization, however, brought these men back to the Whig fold. The popular antislavery Whig congressmen from the Western Reserve, Joseph Root and Joshua R. Giddings, in contrast, defected permanently, as did most local Whig politicos and newspaper editors in northern Ohio. "All over the Reserve men who have acted as leaders among the Whigs have abandoned the party for this new platform," complained a loyalist in September. Because of those leaders and "the strong antislavery sentiment here, the defection is alarming." So great was the influence of these men, especially Giddings, in the former Whig stronghold on the Reserve that Whig loyalists—be they state leaders like Corwin and Thomas Ewing, antislavery Whigs from the Reserve itself like future United States Senator Benjamin F. Wade, or outsiders like the New Yorkers Francis Granger and Seward, who were desperately summoned to help save Ohio—could only slow the flight of Whig troops into the Free Soil column, not reverse it. "This Free Soil movement . . . will sweep over the Reserve as Antimasonry did in Western New York." Seward reported.30

In sharp contrast, Pennsylvania's Whigs believed their own party could keep slavery out of the West, and their leaders shunned the third party. In Pittsburgh, Whig Congressman Moses Hampton won renomination after pledging his commitment to the Proviso. Running Thaddeus Stevens for Congress, Lancaster's Whigs adopted "free soilism" as their platform and "support[ed] Genl. Taylor on those grounds." In the seventeenth congressional district, Rush Petrikin declined a Free Soil congressional nomination because Samuel Calvin, the Whig candidate, was as good a free-soil man as the district needed. Deprived of influential Whig leaders, the Free Soil party in Pennsylvania depended largely on Democrats like David Wilmot to recruit voting support. As a result, a Philadelphia Whig boasted as early as August that "Free Soil can do no injury to the Whigs in Penna." but might draw as many as 10,000 votes from Cass.³¹

Whig politicos also spurned the new Free Soil party in New Jersey and, more important, in New York. For several months after Taylor's nomination, Horace Greeley petulantly refused to endorse the Whig ticket in his influential New York Tribune, thereby causing Fillmore's friends to accuse him of sabotage. During June and July, indeed, Greeley blessed the preparations for an antislavery revolt. But Greeley never joined the Free Soil party himself, and in September he grudgingly endorsed the Whig ticket as the only one that could defeat the Democrats. Most other New York Whig leaders did not even flirt with the Free Soilers. Citing Van Buren's nomination and the prominence of Barnburners in the state Free Soil organization, they stressed the necessity of remaining faithful to Whiggery. During the campaign, for example, Seward gained notoriety as the most militant antislavery man in the Whig party by declaring in Massachusetts, New York, and Ohio that "slavery can and must be abolished, and you and I can and must do it." But, he declared, "All that is ever to be done for Freedom must originate with the Whig party, and in point of practicability, must be accomplished by it."

In Massachusetts, Conscience Whigs had orchestrated the antislavery revolt. Adams was on the Free Soilers' national ticket, and Stephen C. Phillips became the new party's gubernatorial nominee. Such men, however, represented at best the second echelon of the state's Whig leadership. John Gorham Palfrey did serve in Congress, but he was a relatively obscure first-termer, unlike the well-known Giddings and Root of Ohio, and he was the only Whig in the Massachusetts congressional delegation to embrace the third party. Conscience Whigs hoped that Palfrey's new House colleague Horace Mann, who had been elected in April 1848 to replace the deceased John Quincy Adams, would also endorse it. Mann refused, fearing that he would lose his position as secretary of the state board of education. Realizing their limited influence, the founders of the state's Free Soil party sought to recruit more prominent Whigs to it. Adams and Wilson, though not Palfrey, initially hoped that Webster would lend his enormous prestige to the new organization. Although angered and embarrassed by his inconsequential support at the Whig national convention, Webster nonetheless wanted no part of the Free Soil movement. He admitted as early as June that he would have to swallow his pride and publicly support Taylor, even though he delayed that distasteful obligation until September. With equal futility the Free Soilers solicited support from the orator Edward Everett. By the fall, the front-line leadership of the state Whig party—Senators Webster and John Davis, Governor George Briggs, Abbott Lawrence and Nathan Appleton, Rufus Choate and Everett—and the entire congressional delegation other than Palfrey were campaigning for the Whig ticket.33

Elsewhere in New England, even fewer Whig politicians and editors cast their lot with the new party. In Maine, Whig leaders like William Pitt Fessenden and most of the Whig hierarchy remained loyal, thereby reducing Whig defections to the new party. Similarly, an advocate of the Free Soil party in Vermont complained that "a palsy has struck the editors of Whig newspapers . . . all over the State." Because of disputes between the Vermont equivalents of Hunkers and Barnburners, he accurately predicted, most Free Soil support in Vermont would come from the Democrats and the Liberty party, not the Whigs.³⁴

With the single exception of lame-duck Democratic Senator John M. Niles, former Liberty party activists provided leadership for Connecticut's embryonic Free Soil party. In contrast, Connecticut's Whig officeholders and editors campaigned actively and ardently against the Free Soil party and on behalf of the Whig nominees. The most important figure in this effort was Senator Roger Sherman Baldwin, whose antislavery credentials were impeccable. With Connecticut's other most prominent Whig, Truman Smith, in Washington superintending the national committee's distribution of documents, the burden of saving Connecticut fell on Baldwin, who crisscrossed the state passionately and cogently explaining to its Whig voters why they must shun the siren call of Free Soilers and stand loyally by the Whig party.³⁵

Because the likelihood that Whig voters would defect to the third party depended upon a combination of its attractiveness to them and their alienation from the Whig party, steadfast Whig leaders took two related tacks to deflect the Free Soil challenge. They argued that the Whig party, even with Zachary Taylor as its presidential candidate, deserved voters' continued fealty, and the impressive number of faithful Whig editors, orators, and officeholders enhanced their arguments. They also attempted to discredit the need, the motives, the personnel, and the likely consequences of the Free Soil party. Here the predominantly Democratic tilt of Free Soil leadership in most states, and especially Van Buren's nomination, proved a decisive advantage. Conflict with the Democrats had always been the chief source of Whigs' strength, and it would serve them well again in 1848, when they faced not one opponent but two.

Long before the Buffalo convention, Whigs sympathetic to the Free Soil movement warned that Van Buren's nomination could quash the rebellion stirring in Whig ranks. Inventor and devious manipulator of machine politics, proponent of the negative state, and repeated conciliator of slaveholders, Van Buren epitomized what northern Whigs hated most about Democrats. To place him at the head of an antislavery party struck them as hypocritical, if not ludicrous. Even abolitionists such as Joshua Leavitt suspected that Barnburners had nominated Van Buren at Utica more "to avenge his old quarrel with the Hunkers than for his sympathy with the cause." Give us good Free Soil nominations & we will leave old parties unite with you," numerous Whigs told Free Soil organizers before the August convention, "but you need not talk to us about going to Van Buren & the Barnburners." Van Buren, they repeatedly protested, represented "everything we have opposed through life" and was motivated simply by "a desire to injure the politicians who have injured him," not by "a spirit of pure devotion to Freedom."

After the Buffalo convention, relieved Whig regulars voiced almost identical opinions. Because Whigs had opposed Van Buren since the 1830s, few "Whigs—even those strongly tinctured with abolition"—would "vote for him," the North Carolinian Outlaw confidently predicted. From across New York poured assurances that Van Buren's nomination would quell the incipient mutiny in Whig ranks since antislavery Whigs regarded the Free Soil party merely as the product of "a Democratic party quarrel" whose purpose was not "to elect Mr. Van Buren" but "to defeat Gen. Cass." In Massachusetts, Van Buren's selection proved as chilling to potential Whig defectors as apprehensive Conscience Whigs had imagined. By September, members of the Whig state committee pronounced the state safe for Taylor, and in October Phillips, the Free Soil gubernatorial candidate, complained that aversion to Van Buren had deterred at least 25,000 potential Whig recruits from joining the new party.³⁸

Nonetheless, it soon became apparent that Van Buren's name alone could not stem Whig rebellion in Ohio, Indiana, Wisconsin, Michigan, and Illinois.³⁹ Hence Whig speakers and editors redoubled their efforts to discredit the third party. Its domination by Democrats, their dubious motives, and their untrustworthiness on the slavery issue remained constant targets of Whig invective throughout the campaign. Editorials in Pittsburgh's leading Whig paper, which were widely reprinted in midwestern Whig sheets, charged that Van Buren and his fellow Democratic bolters were the same men who "brought about the annexation of Texas, the extension of slavery, the disgraceful Mexican War, the prostration of the Protective Tariff, and numerous other evils which have affected the country." Repeatedly the paper vilified Van Buren as an unconverted Jacksonian and an insincere opponent of slavery. Constantly it denounced as traitors Whigs who would support such a man. Nor were Van Buren's personal intentions alone impugned. Pointing to the New York Barnburners' well-known hopes of regaining control of the state's Democratic organization and to the Conscience Whigs' unsuccessful struggle for power in the Massachusetts Whig party, Whigs savaged the entire Free Soil leadership as ambitious politicos whose lust for office had been frustrated in the major parties. Castigating the selfish purposes of Free Soil leaders. Whigs also condemned the consequences of supporting them. Voting for the Free Soilers would divide the opposition to the hated Democrats and elect Cass. Not only would a Democratic victory place a seal of approval on Polk's obnoxious record, but Cass' jingoistic expansionism ensured further aggressive wars of territorial conquest. Rehearsing the standard Whig refrain that the misguided souls who voted for Birney in 1844 had allowed the election of Polk and with it the annexation of Texas and the Mexican War, northern Whig after northern Whig warned that if additional Whigs now abandoned their party for the Free Soilers, "the consequence is inevitable, more slave territory," just the result honest antislavery men most wanted to avoid.40

Antislavery Whigs had no need to betray their objective by voting for Free Soilers, protested Whig leaders. Throughout the North, they accurately insisted, Whigs were pledged to the Wilmot Proviso, and northern Whig congressmen's recent votes demonstrated beyond cavil their determination to stop the spread of slavery. As Baldwin insisted in the speech he made across Connecticut, "The question of free soil...is for Congress to decide." Since southern Whigs had helped defeat Clayton's Compromise, spuriously contended one Indiana Whig, "The passage of the Oregon Bill, with a provision similar to the Ordinance of '87, is strong evidence that when the remaining Territories come to be provided with Territorial govts. a like prohibition will be submitted to even by the South." Southern Whig help in defeating Clayton's bill, echoed New York's Poughkeepsie Eagle, showed that "while we have a Whig Congress the free labor and free soil doctrine will be triumphant."

Most northern Whigs were not so brazen as to ascribe free soil sympathies to their southern colleagues. Instead they exploited the flexibility the American federal system had long provided both national parties. In the spring of 1848, New York Whig Congressman Washington Hunt noted that southern Whigs threatened to draw the Mason-Dixon line on the Wilmot Proviso issue and that he had told them that "they may have their way south of it, & we must manage things for ourselves on the north side." After June, Whigs conducted the two-faced campaign Hunt envisioned. Whatever appeals the southern Whigs made on Taylor's behalf, northern Whigs presented themselves as the North's preeminent free soil party. In September, Pennsylvania's Whig state convention pledged itself against the extension of "perpetuated bondage . . . which would degrade the nation and bring reproach upon republican principles." Adamant resistance to slavery expansion was the theme of Thaddeus Stevens and other Pennsylvania Whigs; of Seward in his speeches in Massachusetts, New York, and Ohio; of Baldwin in Connecticut; and of northern Whigs everywhere. "The Whigs of the North, and especially the Whigs of Massachusetts," declared the Massachusetts Whig state platform, "may rightfully claim the appellation of the free soil party."

The utter superfluousness of a new northern party, Whigs chorused, proved the selfish ambition of Free Soil leaders. What could be accomplished, they asked with much justice, by replacing such staunch Whig friends of freedom with Free Soilers who would vote exactly the same way as northern Whigs did on the territorial issue and who, because of their Democratic background, would vote against Whig interests on other matters? Since everyone in New England opposed slavery expansion, asserted the Boston Advertiser, the Free Soilers' platform "can afford no good reason for abandoning other principles of political association, and erecting the standard of a new party."43 Free Soilers retorted that principles on old issues were irrelevant, for only slavery extension now mattered. Whatever Van Buren's past record, he was a Northerner who was now publicly pledged to the Free Soil platform to impose the Wilmot Proviso on all territories and to sign into law a bill to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia. And certainly no antislavery man could expect the Louisiana slaveholder who headed the Whig ticket to sign a territorial bill that incorporated the Proviso or a ban on slavery in the District.

Citing Taylor's antiveto pledge in the Allison Letter of April, northern Whigs responded that Taylor would not veto the Wilmot Proviso. To stop the spread of slavery, therefore, Northerners need only elect a Whig Congress along with Taylor. It would pass the Proviso, and the faithful Whig Taylor would sign it into law. "The question of free soil as I have before remarked, is for Congress to decide, and we already have a candidate who will not seek to control their action," repeated Baldwin as he stumped across Connecticut. Not only did Whigs have a presidential candidate who would accept the Proviso, in contrast to Cass, bragged Thomas Ewing in a widely distributed public letter, their ticket held the key to its passage: a northern man as vice president who could break a Senate tie between Northerners and Southerners. In Millard Fillmore the Whigs had such a man: with the Kentuckian William O. Butler as their vice presidential candidate, the Democrats patently did not. The best way to achieve free territory was to ignore the hopeless Free Soilers, shun the proslavery Democrats, and vote Whig. Across the North, Whigs promised that Taylor would not veto congressional legislation prohibiting slavery from the territories. That was what allowed northern Whigs, in the words of Connecticut's frustrated Free Soiler John Niles, to take "the position of . . . Taylor and free soil."44

With apparent candor, some Whigs like Baldwin and Abraham Lincoln admitted they lacked positive proof that Taylor would not veto the Proviso. They simply inferred it from the Allison Letter, which they trusted since Taylor was an honorable man. Actually, the Whig high command did have more evidence. Prior to the national convention, John Wilson, a proslavery Missouri Whig, interviewed Taylor in New Orleans. On May 10, Wilson reported to Truman Smith that "on the subject of the principle of the Wilmot Proviso (for I put the question direct) he answered instantly, that the ordinance of 1787 had been passed by Congress, approved by Washington and upheld by the Judiciary, and he saw no power left for the President to veto it on constitutional objections." Taylor would sign the Proviso if Congress passed it, and he "would not intrigue or in any way meddle to defeat it in its passage" by Congress. Smith had undoubtedly shown this letter to northern Whigs in Washington like Baldwin and Lincoln, and in late June he sent these quoted excerpts and others to Ewing for private circulation among Ohio Whigs. But Smith insisted that Ewing must not publish them, and he did so for the same reasons Baldwin and Lincoln refused to reveal their sources—to protect southern Whigs. Whig strategists were determined to let Whigs south of the Mason-Dixon line have their own way on the Proviso question, and that way most assuredly was not to admit that Zachary Taylor would sign the insulting Wilmot Proviso into law.⁴⁵

Perhaps because of this reluctance to buttress promises about Taylor's future course with more evidence, many antislavery Whigs discounted them. Despite the barrage northern Whigs leveled at the Free Soilers and Van Buren, despite their repeated trumpetings of their own free-soil record, the slaveholder at the head of the Whig ticket remained northern Whigs' biggest problem. Taylor's position must be convincingly explained to the Whig rank and file, warned the brother of Indiana Whig Congressman George Dunn, an early Taylor supporter. "I wouldn't vote for him myself if I did not regard him as committed substantially to the Wilmot Proviso. . . . There is a deep and growing hostility in the West against the ever encroaching and exacting demands of the South." Michigan's Whigs are "immovably opposed to the further extension of slavery & consequent increase of slave representation in Congress & in the Presidential electoral college & therefore they look with some fearfullness [sic] upon the coming of Gen. Taylor," wrote one of their number in September. "The great difficulty with us in our efforts with Anti Slavery men is to convince them, that Taylor is right on the Proviso question," confessed a western Pennsylvania Whig as late as October. "The Allison letter, Mr. Mann's letter, & others are insufficient."46

Not only uncompromising antislavery Whigs needed reassuring. Ultimately, faith in Taylor's willingness to accept the Proviso rested on faith in his commitment to Whiggery and Whig principles. That was the rub. Far more Whigs than those likely to bolt to the Free Soil party doubted that commitment because of Taylor's No Party campaign before the national convention and his behavior after it. The immediate and widespread stress on Taylor's pledge in the Allison Letter not to use the veto, in fact, was aimed as much at disgusted Whig regulars who had no intention of joining the antislavery revolt as at angry antislavery Whigs who might.

Ш

Even as nervous Whig leaders watched the gathering free-soil revolt in the summer, they feared that disillusioned regulars might not vote at all. "Where apathy and indifference do not prevail, the most indignant spirit pervades the Whig ranks," an Ohioan reported in July. His juxtaposition and ordering of apathy and anger spoke volumes. Every disillusioned Whig who refused to vote because he considered Taylor's nomination an "abandonment... of those principles which have heretofore graced our banner" compounded the damage done by a Whig who defected to the Free Soilers.⁴⁷ The very threat of losses to the Free Soilers, in short, increased the necessity of bringing Whigs not attracted by them to the polls. The Whig leadership quickly recognized that winning in 1848 required them not only to minimize bolts to the Free Soilers but also to maximize their residual support.

To be sure, some Whigs believed that Taylor's posture of nonpartisan independence and reputation for battlefield heroics would excite both Whigs and new voters and attract more than enough Democrats to offset any Whig losses from abstention or defection. Now "there was hope for the Whig party," rejoiced Indiana's Whigs upon learning of the decision at Philadelphia. Taylor's "nomination gives the Whigs here, in Illinois, and Mo. new life." Even New England regulars like Winthrop and Vermont's Justin Morrill proclaimed that "Old Taylor is bound to run like prairie fire" among potential Democratic converts. In Pennsylvania, too, the Whigs carefully kept the organization for Taylor's presidential campaign, known there and elsewhere as "Rough and Ready Clubs," separate from the regular Whig apparatus and founded a new newspaper in Philadelphia in order "to work on the Democrats."

Southern Whigs were particularly eager to mine the Democratic vote. Taylor's nomination, Gentry excitedly wrote Whigs in Tennessee after the convention, afforded an opportunity "to Revolutionize the strong Democratic Districts" in the state. Whig speakers should therefore "measure their denunciations of Democracy and infuse a larger quantity of persuasion and conciliation into their speeches than heretofore." In Georgia, where the Democratic vote was mushrooming among nonslaveholders, Whigs speakers also stumped "the Cherokee Counties—the missionary ground of the State."

Wooing Democrats entailed a risk, but one seemingly worth taking. Vigorously assailing the Democrats had been the traditional means for arousing the Whig electorate, galvanizing competitive energies and the will to win. Only confidence that Taylor's status as a slaveholder and fame as a military hero would mobilize Whigs anyway encouraged the leadership to forsake their customary strategy. As they further admitted, winning over Democrats also required Whig speakers to iettison traditional Whig issues that might alienate them and to rely instead on Taylor's military renown to do it. And that is precisely what many southern Whigs initially attempted to do. "Old party issues are worn out and have nearly disappeared," declared the New Orleans Bee, a Taylor sheet. "All the old issues are obsolete," chorused a Taylor supporter from Alabama. Taylor deserved election, declared a Rough and Ready Club in Hinds County, Mississippi, because "according to his own declaration, [he] has 'no private purposes to accomplish, no party projects to build up, no enemies to punish, nothing to serve." In Louisiana, chortled a New Orleans Whig, the party campaigned for Taylor and Fillmore solely by sending into the parishes groups of young men who with "songs, shouts, music, and banners" foiled the hapless Democrats. Furious at Whigs' reliance on hoopla, a frustrated Georgia Democrat complained that the standard Whig speech consisted of "miscellaneous abuse of Cass and the Democrats, comments on the danger to slavery, and the impossibility of trusting any Northern man . . . and lastly a glorification of Old Taylor's battles."50

Some Whigs viewed this outreach to Democrats as more than an opportunistic attempt to increase the party's vote. Sharing Taylor's belief that superheated partisan strife threatened the consensus necessary for republican self-government, they sincerely, if naively, welcomed the chance to restore the supposed golden age of American politics before the advent of Andrew Jackson and mass parties. Taylor would win because he had "plain republican virtues which distinguished 'the better days of the republic,' " gushed Indiana Congressman Richard W. Thompson to his constituents. "He owes no allegiance to any party. . . . He looks to the people as the only true source of political power, and will never consent that politicians—for the mere purposes of party—shall endanger or diminish this power for their own selfish ends and aggrandizement." Taylor's repeated vows not to be a mere party president, chimed another Indianan, ensured "an era of good feeling—good men & good measures all over the land & a mighty abatement of the bitterness of party." "51

No one was happier about Taylor's nomination than William C. Rives and his Virginia Whig followers. "Your insistence that Whigs are the exponents of the doctrines of the old Jeffersonian Republican party," Rives fawningly wrote Taylor in July, ensured "permanent success" for the Whig party since "the great body of the people in the Country are thoroughly Republican in their sentiments." Because the Rives men controlled Virginia's Taylor campaign, the state platform adopted at a convention in Lexington in September said nothing about specific Whig issues. Instead it extolled Taylor's character and his commitment against executive power as guarantees that basic republican principles would be restored. "The Whigs of Virginia recognize a recurrence to the original and better days of the Republic," they boasted. Taylor's belief in "the legitimate supremacy of the popular will, . . . his lofty personal character, his well known patriotism . . . afford the highest guaranty for an administration of the Government, in his hands, conforming to those republican landmarks."

All Whigs opposed executive usurpation and supported the preservation of republican self-government. Yet those Whigs who believed that Taylor's subscription to these values proved he was a good Whig and that rehearsing his fidelity to them would win the election were a distinct minority—at least among those whose private correspondence is still extant. Far more typical was outrage at the abandonment of traditional Whig policies such men advocated in order to attract Democrats and pessimism that paeans to Taylor's nonpartisan independence could mobilize the Whig electorate. Such a strategy, most Whigs insisted, merely reinforced doubts that Zachary Taylor was a legitimate Whig who merited support from principled Whig regulars.

Predictably, Clay and his many devotees immediately repudiated the ticket. Bitterly and repeatedly he wrote his friends that he would not lift a finger to help Taylor because "the Whig party has been overthrown by a mere personal party," just like the Jackson party. "The Philadelphia convention humiliated itself, and as far as it could, placed the Whig party in a degraded condition" by nominating a man who refused to "pledge himself" to Whig measures and who "is presented as a no-party candidate." Clay's friends were equally indignant. "Thousands" would vote for Cass "to annihilate politically your base and cowardly assassins," snarled a furious Philadelphian. "The last Whig convention committed the double crime of suicide & paricide [sic]," echoed a New Yorker. "The Whig party as such is dead. The very name will be abandoned, should Taylor be elected, for 'the Taylor party.' "53

A few Clay men intended to vote for Cass or Van Buren to punish those who had nominated Taylor, but far more commonly they refused to help Taylor with their money, their time and effort, or their votes. Whig turnout would be so low in New York, they chortled, that only "the dissensions of our opponents," and "not Whig votes," could "save" Taylor. Because of regular Whigs' disgust, ratification meetings in New York City and upstate towns had to be postponed or canceled altogether. Midwestern Whigs also reported "apathy and indifference" and warned that Whig voters would never support Taylor unless Clay publicly endorsed him.⁵⁴

Visceral discontent extended to the South. Clay loyalists in Georgia, Tennessee, and North Carolina also denounced the ticket. "I have no hopes for the Whigs in the next presidential election" and "no interest in the election except for the State elections," declared a North Carolinian who refused to vote for Taylor. "We have had one John Tyler and I don't want another." In Virginia, Richmond Congressman John Minor Botts condemned the ticket as unworthy of support, causing Taylorites to condemn him as "an inexpressible ass" even as they worried "that the discord he has produced may have so disabled us as to lose the state."

Dissatisfaction was hardly limited to Clay's closest friends. Since Taylor's nomination abdicated traditional Whig issues, a New Yorker warned Fillmore, "here our ears are saluted with 'The Kangaroo Ticket' 'The Kangaroo Ticket' 'I would vote it if I thought Taylor would die.' "The inability to hold ratification meetings also terrified Weed's New York lieutenants who sought to mobilize the traditional Whig vote. "If we succeed, it will not be a Whig triumph, based upon Whig principles, but a triumph obtained by the aid of disaffected Democrats," complained Indiana's Orth. The nomination alienated "the very best portion of the party, who disgusted at our inconsistency will never return." According to another disenchanted Indianan:

The pageant is old Zack and a new order of things, without principle, object, or aim, torn loose from the landmarks of the past, burying in oblivion the venerated objects of former devotion, sailing with singular sang froid [sic] on the turbid ocean of availability.... Now the Whigs openly disclaim any party issues with the Democrats. And declare their party is virtually dissolved, dead, and buried!⁵⁶

Initially, Whigs attempted to assuage the discontented and arouse the apathetic in their ranks in three interrelated ways. First, they proclaimed it a duty to party and country to vote. To abstain was to betray both. Progressive Whigs like Weed in his Albany Evening Journal and conservatives like Massachusetts Congressman George Ashmun and the Albany patrician Daniel D. Barnard in public letters argued that the convention had followed regular procedures and Taylor had won on a fair vote. Therefore, both the delegates who attended it and the constituents they represented had an obligation to support its nominee. "Party conventions are not under the laws of the land; they are therefore governed by the code of honor," maintained a writer in The American Review. "The integrity and success of a party depend on its rigid adherence to this code. Whatever be our chagrin or disappointment, the debt of honor must be paid, or we lose all consideration, and therefore all force." Most likely, only a small minority of educated and affluent Whigs ever read the unusually articulate, learned, and well-crafted essays in The American Review. Such men, however, formed an influential segment of the Clay loyalists and other regulars who most vociferously protested the nomination. Therefore, its articles, however atypical their rhetorical refinement, illuminate the appeals directed at the disenchanted.

By far the most striking version of this theme of duty appeared in an anonvmous essay revealingly entitled "Necessity of Party." No document better shows how Whig thinking about political parties had evolved since the 1830s. In contrast to early Whigs, who denounced parties as inimical to republican self-government and popular liberty, this writer maintained that the preservation of republicanism required interparty competition. His theme was the fundamental American axiom that the price of liberty is eternal vigilance. Newspapers could play a vital role in monitoring government and alerting citizens to threats to their liberty, he admitted, but newspapers could also be corrupted by governmental patronage. The more reliable shield of freedom was the ability to vote an incumbent party out of office, Elections, therefore, were the most important struggles "men can engage in," for "the very life of liberty is maintained only by the strife of contending parties." Casting a vote, in other words, was how a citizen performed his historic duty to protect the Revolutionary experiment in republican self-government. "When the Constitution confers the power of suffrage upon a citizen, it imposes a duty.... How unworthy, then, of this high privilege are those inert or supercilious citizens, who affect to disregard the elections, or who speak of them as a vain and interested contest of office-seekers. . . . Whoever feels within himself the least spark of that generosity of soul which makes men republicans, is, so far, a POLITICIAN." A true republican, in short, was defined by his active participation in the political arena. The eighteenth-century concept of virtue, the willingness to sacrifice self-interest, including material self-interest, for the common good, had been transformed into a narrower but still vital obligation: the willingness to vote. "Politics, the judging and acting for the honor and prosperity of the nation, is properly an art to which all of us are born. We, the citizens, who think we have no masters but the laws, cannot be too careful or too vigilant in the power of election, in which we perform the initiative art of government."

Second, in addition to shaming abstainers, Whig leaders insisted that the election could determine vital matters of public policy. Besides those who considered Taylor's nomination a disgraceful abandonment of principle, some Whigs, like New York's James Ogden, believed that the end of the war, the achievement of territorial expansion, however regrettable, and the prosperity attained under the Walker Tariff and the subtreasury system meant that "the question, as to the success of either of the two Presidential candidates, becomes, perhaps, of less consequence than at any previous period of our history." To arouse the indifferent to action, most Whigs therefore strove "to mark the contrast" between the parties, "to set [Whig principles] forth in bold contrast to those of the enemy."

"To present a firm and unbroken front to the enemy," Whig propagandists repeatedly contended, they must "press home upon the public mind the great principles by and for which we exist as a party." Whigs "constantly endeavor to identify the interests of the people with those of the government"; Democrats. in contrast, "opposed every national measure which should call the creative and protective functions of government into action." Admitting that famine in Europe had temporarily produced a favorable balance of trade and prosperity, Whigs nonetheless asserted that the tariff had to be raised and specific duties reimposed to protect American manufacturers and workers from European competition, "to save the industrious Germans in the iron factories of Pennsylvania from ruin." The Subtreasury must be abolished to ensure an ample circulating currency and adequate credit. Congress had not only a right but a duty to fund necessary rivers and harbors improvements. Yet while Democrats were willing to spend millions on unconstitutional and unnecessary wars to conquer new territory, they "declare against all projects of internal improvement." "With EXTERNAL IMPROVE-MENTS they are greatly in love, with internal not at all."

Whig spokesmen particularly targeted Polk's record, which, they maintained, accurately forecast what Cass would do in office, since that record "necessarily involved the pretensions of the party that supports him to have its dominion perpetuated." To frighten lethargic Whigs to vote against Cass, therefore, Whigs castigated Democratic enormities under Polk: his unconstitutional, unrepublican, and tyrannical commencement and conduct of the Mexican War; his ballooning the national debt by over $100 million; his economic legislation that would inevitably bankrupt the government and devastate the national economy; and his disdain for domestic improvement.

A dishonorable and antirepublican lust for empire achieved through "rapacity and conquest," war, and crippling debt were the legacies of the Polk administration, and, if possible, the record under Lewis Cass would be even worse. Cass had demanded war with England to get all of Oregon. He supported "our Executive war of conquest and spoilation" against Mexico. "He would not hesitate to make war on his own responsibility, as Mr. Polk has done, with his full sanction and support" to seize Canada, Cuba, or the Yucatan. Cass "seems to look upon the United States as if the country were some monster reptile, that must subsist and swell its huge, unsightly bulk, by gorging itself with every living thing, small and great, that comes in its way." The contrast between Cass and Taylor was clear, declared the Washington National Intelligencer. "In Gen. Taylor is presented to us the representative of a constitutional, conservative, and beneficial policy at home, and a peaceful, just, non-intervention policy in regard to foreign Powers." Cass was "the representative of Dorrism and Locofocism, of the Veto upon liberal legislation at home, and of intervention, war, conquest, and annexation with almost every accessible part of the foreign world."59

Trumpeting the Whig party's superior principles, of course, meant nothing if men doubted Taylor's commitment to those principles. Therefore the third, and most emphasized component of Whigs' message, rehearsed Taylor's fealty to "the great doctrine which gave us our party designation," "the very foundation . . . the very essence of Whig faith," "opposition to executive usurpation." Over and over, Whig after Whig insisted that Taylor's pledge not to use the veto or to interfere with Congress proved his Whiggery. "He who adopts and maintains this great and distinctive principle is a Whig," declared one writer, "and all Whigs will welcome him to their fellowship." Taylor's Allison Letter clearly embraced Whigs' desire "to see the congress restored to its original powers under the Constitution and the President confined to the proper executive duties of his station." As a lifelong Democrat, in contrast, Cass would not "hesitate, when once in office, to exercise the Executive prerogative with the same arbitrary will that led Louis XIV to proclaim 'I am the State.' "Instead, rhapsodized the National Intelligencer, Taylor would "restore the republic to its original purity as administered by the earlier Presidents, before kingly vetoes had practically converted the Government into an Elective Despotism." 60

During the summer, however, Seward, Weed, and other perceptive leaders realized that Taylor's Allison Letter did not suffice to reassure skeptical Whigs, if only because Taylor had written so many other letters refusing to be the exponent of any party's principles. Why then, Whig voters asked, should they believe his professed commitment to the fundamental Whig tenet? Additional evidence of the hero's Whiggery was urgently required, and the first place nervous Whig leaders looked for it was in Taylor's official acceptance of the Whig convention's nomination, a reply that seemed agonizingly slow in coming. Unless Taylor accepted the nomination "as a Whig," Weed moaned five weeks after the convention adjourned, he would lose New York and six other northern states critical to Whig success. Weed had Seward prepare a draft letter of acceptance Taylor could use, and the Albany editor had sent it to Taylor's Louisiana cronies with whom he had worked at the convention. To his dismay, however, Rough and Ready rejected Seward's draft. Lamenting Taylor's decision as a "blunder," Weed warned Seward that "the General's letter should be a very good one, or we shall be in a bad box."61

Even as Weed wrote, Taylor's letter of acceptance, dated July 15, was on its way to the northern press, and it proved disappointing indeed. Taylor simply and briefly accepted the nomination and promised to carry out his duties faithfully if elected. He did not reaffirm his own Whiggery or his opposition to the veto. He did not even pledge that the Whig nomination was the only one he would accept. William L. Hodge of New Orleans candidly explained to Fillmore the thinking of the Louisiana Whigs who advised Taylor on the letter. "Any promises to carry out Whig measures or that his administration would be predicated upon Whig principles could only drive back into the bosom of the Loco party, thousands and tens of thousands who are desirous of voting for him." Those Louisianans still expected Taylor to carry Democratic bastions like Arkansas, Alabama, and Mississippi, and to do so they needed Democratic votes. "If any of our northern ultra friends think his letter is not strong enough," Hodge added disdainfully, "you and your press also must tell them it is."

Taylor's bland letter of acceptance was bad enough, but he then quickly compounded the damage with other letters penned that summer. Prior to the Whig convention, Taylor had jeopardized efforts to present him as a good Whig with careless epistles like that to Peter Sken Smith. Now, after it, he seemed almost willfully to sabotage Whigs' attempts to reassure and arouse the faithful. Shortly after his tepid acceptance letter appeared, papers published his letter of July 24 to a Philadelphian named George Lippard in which Taylor reasserted his independence: "I am not a party candidate, and if elected cannot be President of a party, but the President of the whole people." The Lippard letter shocked northern Whigs and fanned their fears of massive abstentions and defections to the Free Soilers. "I hope Genl. Taylor has got done writing letters," moaned a member of Weed's organization. "It requires considerable labor to satisfy our friends he is the candidate of our party and after his acceptance it is insufferable that he should qualify his position by letters to others.... Is there no way to gag him?" Friends of Weed's rival, Fillmore, were also appalled. "The late Lippard letter has produced a most chilling influence," wrote one from Rochester. "We are losing quite a large number of those who have always been true or faithful to our party in consequence of distrust over Gen. T.'s opinions." 63

Watching in horror as the flames of Whig anger incinerated his chances for the vice presidency, Fillmore frantically wrote Taylor on August 19 that he must counteract the Lippard letter. The northern Whig rank and file demanded absolute proof of Taylor's Whiggery, he warned, because they were still haunted by memories of Tyler's betraval. Worse still, Free Soil papers charged that southern Whigs, the authors of Taylor's nonpartisan strategy, planned to cut Fillmore and vote instead for William O. Butler, the Democratic vice presidential candidate and, like Taylor, a southern slaveholder. 64 Almost as if on cue, Taylor then provided evidence for Free Soilers' wild charges. Because of his apparent soundness on the slavery issue, Taylor aroused considerable enthusiasm in South Carolina, even though it lacked an organized Whig party and popular voting for presidential electors. On July 20, a meeting in Charleston nominated an independent ticket of Taylor for president and Butler for vice president. In August, Taylor gratefully accepted the Charleston nomination. In another letter to the Charleston News he explained that he had accepted the Whig nomination on his own terms and would have just as readily received that of the Democrats had it been offered. He must run, he declared, "without pledges or being trammeled in any way."65

If the Lippard letter scandalized northern Whigs, Taylor's South Carolina letters almost precipitated a revolt that would have ended any chance he had of winning the presidency. Word of the letters reached Albany, New York, by telegraphic despatch in the early afternoon of Saturday, August 26. The usually unflappable Weed exploded in rage and had handbills posted calling a protest meeting that night at the state capitol, where he planned to introduce resolutions repudiating Taylor's nomination and launching a new ticket headed by Clay. Fillmore and his friends initially suspected that Weed acted to sabotage Fillmore, either by driving a wedge between Taylor and Fillmore or by bringing about the ticket's defeat. But Weed believed that Taylor's candidacy was doomed in the North and that only a new ticket could salvage Whig congressional candidates. To save his chances for the vice presidency, Fillmore intervened with Weed in the late afternoon as he was preparing his rebellious resolutions in the editorial offices of the Albany Evening Journal and persuaded him not to present them. Fillmore and other Whig leaders then tried to calm the crowd of angry Whigs that night by protesting that the South Carolina reports must be false or, if true, that South Carolina's Democrats had dropped Cass for Taylor, not Fillmore for Butler. By Monday morning, August 28, Weed editorially repledged his support to the ticket on the grounds that only Taylor could defeat Cass, and another mass meeting that night also endorsed it.66

Nonetheless, the South Carolina letters undid northern Whigs' campaign to rally their troops. "The most sanguine and earnest Taylor men are perfectly dumbfounded and are ready to give up in despair," reported a western New York Whig. "It will be utterly impossible to make the rank & file in this region swallow Taylor now. The universal feeling here is that a new candidate must be started or we lose the state."67 The shocking letters also gave disgruntled conservative Whigs in New York City an excuse to launch an independent Clay candidacy and thus avenge the Kentuckian's defeat at Philadelphia. "We are at the very brink of a party explosion here," wrote one of Clay's correspondents in early September. "The People will not go Taylor—they insist upon having a Whig, a whole Whig, and nothing but a Whig, and are rallying with an enthusiasm, that nothing can stay, or repress, upon your name." On September 7, a mass meeting of furious regulars at Vauxhall Garden named a slate of electors for a new ticket of Clay and Fillmore. Clay's friend Daniel Ullmann begged him not to discourage this revolt. The telegraph had so facilitated communication, he argued, that electoral tickets could be arranged for Clay and Fillmore across the North even at the last moment. Besides, Clav owed it to true Whigs to "let us have a nucleus around which a Whig party may be re-organized after we shall have emerged from the smoke of the present contest. It is the only door open for us, through which we may retreat with a conservative band, which may finally rescue our beloved country from the horrors of military rule or corrupt charlatanism."68

The New York City insurgency eerily prefigured future conservative bolts, but how much harm it could have inflicted upon the official Whig ticket is unclear. Calling the Clay men "crack-brained," one New Yorker assured Crittenden that "the move of the aristocratic, crazy Clay idolaters in this city will not change the vote, enough, to be put on paper." Less potentially dangerous than a Clay ticket that bore the imprimatur of Weed and the state Whig leadership at Albany, it nonetheless frightened numerous Whigs. Fillmore denounced the new ticket in a public letter in the Albany Evening Journal and refused to serve on it. Men in New York, Pennsylvania, and Washington called on Clay both publicly and privately to renounce it to save Whigs' chance to capture the White House.⁶⁹

Mortified by his rebuff at Philadelphia, Clay had no stomach for an independent candidacy. Unlike his old rival Van Buren, he refused, as early as July 5, to lead an insurgency against his party. Warned in advance about the Vauxhall Garden meeting, he wrote James Brooks that "I am utterly opposed to the use of my name as a candidate for the Presidency," a refusal Brooks published in his New York Express the day after that gathering. To extinguish any lingering doubts, Clay then formally wrote the officers of the meeting declining their nomination, and the Whig press widely publicized his declination.⁷⁰

Though stillborn, the September New York Clay insurgency vividly increased the evidence of regular Whigs' deep discontent with Taylor. And if those men could not vote for Clay, they could still abstain. In the longest part of his letter of September 20 refusing the New York nomination, a part he insisted not be published, indeed, Clay provided an extensive list of reasons why good Whigs should not support Taylor. By early September, in short, Whig leaders knew that their first attempts to reassure the alienated and arouse the apathetic had failed. It still remained "essential to do something to keep as many of our forces as possible."

 \mathbf{v}

During August and early September, it also became abundantly clear that blurring partisan differences, eschewing Whig issues, and instead boasting of Taylor's non-partisan independence, republican virtue, and glorious military exploits was failing abysmally to win Democratic converts or energize new voters. By early September, in short, the Whig campaign was in deep trouble, not only in northern Whig strongholds, but in the West and South as well. Something more desperately needed to be done to get Whig troops to the polls in November.

First, the August and September state elections dispelled optimism that Taylor's coattails could help other Whig candidates. Crittenden easily won Kentucky's governorship despite Democratic efforts to turn Clay men against him. Nonetheless, Crittenden's constant defense of Taylor and of Whigs' refusal to adopt a national platform yielded only a few more votes than Whig congressional candidates had amassed in 1847, while his Democratic opponent, Lazarus Powell, an unexpectedly able campaigner, garnered the largest vote yet obtained by a Democrat in Kentucky. If Whigs expected Democratic converts, they did not get them.⁷²

North Carolina's Whigs squeaked by with an 854-vote margin out of some 84,000 votes cast in the gubernatorial contest, lost their majority in the state senate, and had it sharply reduced to one seat in the house. As the Whigs had feared, the Democratic gubernatorial candidate, David Reid, found an unusually popular issue in his call for the elimination of the property qualification for voters in state senate elections, an issue Whigs had trouble contending with. Whig candidate Charles Manly's immediate opposition to Reid's proposal offended many Whig voters. Then Whigs charged the Democrats with humbugging the voters and trying to evade their participation in, and approval of, the obnoxious Democratic record in Washington. Finally, Whigs tried to shift the issue away from equal suffrage to equal apportionment of the legislature—"equal power," as they called it—but that proposal divided them along regional lines. Western Whigs ardently favored reapportionment based on the white population rather than the federal ratio, which counted slaves, but eastern Whigs just as adamantly opposed it, a rift that portended difficult times ahead for the North Carolina Whig party. Thus the state issues at stake confounded the Whigs and excited the Democrats. Turnout was unusually large, higher in absolute terms than in the presidential election of 1844, and all of the increased vote went to the Democrats. Reid's vote exceeded Polk's by 2,800, the 1846 Democratic gubernatorial candidate's by 7,000, and the total amassed by Democratic congressional candidates in 1847 by 11,000. With some justice, Whigs claimed they would do better in November. Still, Taylor's name at the top of their ticket had obviously failed to forestall a Democratic surge.73

Returns from normally Democratic states dealt the severest blow to Whig hopes. In Missouri, whose delegates had gone unanimously for Taylor at Philadelphia, the Democratic vote soared 20 percent above its levels in 1844 and 1846, leaving the Whig candidate with only two-fifths of the total and Taylor doomed in November. Taylor also lacked coattails in Illinois. The demoralized Whigs did not even contest the gubernatorial election against the Democratic incumbent, but they did run state legislative and congressional candidates. The Whig share of seats in the state house of representatives sank from a dismal 33 percent to 31 percent, and it hovered at 28 percent in the state senate. Again, the Whigs won only one of the state's congressional seats, and they polled only a third of the popular vote, running some 30,000 votes behind the Democrats, another margin that Taylor seemed unlikely to overcome. Finally, in Indiana, where some Whigs had boasted of the converting power of gunpowder and nonpartisanship, Whigs lost control of the lower house of the state legislature, declining from 53 percent of the seats in 1847 to 39 percent in 1848. As realistic Indiana Whigs admitted, Taylor's military reputation backfired against them since his public criticism of two Indiana regiments that deserted at Buena Vista infuriated some Hoosier voters, while Quakers, an important segment of Indiana's electorate, who disliked Taylor's military background altogether, threatened to abstain in November or vote for Van Buren. Gunpowder was proving to be no aid at all in capturing Indiana's sector of the Loco Foco fortress.

Surveying the August results, the vindictive Clay pronounced Taylor a sure loser. To the shaken Whig lovalists conducting the campaign, the results indicated that winning the White House would depend on mobilizing Whig voters in traditionally Whig and closely contested states, not on large-scale Democratic defections or a surge of new voters. The Vermont and Maine results in September reinforced that assessment. Whigs carried the gubernatorial election in Vermont and three of the four congressional seats, as they had in 1846. Yet their absolute and proportionate votes were down since 1847; indeed, they drew less than 44 percent of the total. In contrast, Free Soilers' absolute vote and share of the total doubled what the Liberty party had won in 1847. Even though Democratic losses meant that Taylor would probably carry the state, Whig erosion boded ill for more closely contested states. Maine was a disaster. The Whigs picked up an additional congressional seat, raising their total to two of seven, and their gubernatorial candidate drew substantially more votes than had his three predecessors. Still, he won only 37 percent of the total vote, and Whigs captured only 35 percent of the seats in the lower house of the state legislature. Some observers in Maine blamed the September results on lame effort and poor organization and still predicted Democratic votes for Taylor in November. More realistic Whig politicos knew better.76

Reports from the southern states without summer elections also demonstrated that the initial no-issue, no-party, military glory campaign waged for Taylor neither attracted Democrats nor aroused Whigs. Taylor's very nomination by the Whigs' national convention, warned one Georgian, killed any chances of winning Democratic converts in his state. Missionary efforts among Democratic nonslave-holders in North Alabama also quickly foundered. Democrats there reported either a total lack of "enthusiasm" among voters of both parties or that the Whigs' "claptrap about military glory and no-partyism cannot shake the mountain democracy." Meanwhile, in Whig areas of the black belt, abandonment of traditional tactics produced a stultifying indifference. When Whig Congressman Henry Hilliard made a speech for Taylor in Montgomery in late September, his audience was small and unresponsive. "Politics is quiet," concluded a Democratic state official in the capital. "There is no excitement on either side."

Missionary efforts also failed to catch fire among Democrats or ignite Whigs in Tennessee, a state Whigs almost had to carry. In early August, William B. Campbell, a prominent Whig leader from middle Tennessee, complained that "I have not witnessed so much quietness in any general election in fifteen years." By the fall Tennessee Whig leaders were frantic. "The Democrats are making the most desperate effort to carry the State"; they were winning back "the Taylor Democrats" and would "bring their full force to the polls," Governor Neil Brown warned Campbell. Yet Whigs complacently "slumber[ed]." Whig leaders like Campbell must forget about the Democrats and work to "get out [the Whig] vote on election day." Whigs must jettison their wrong-headed and futile focus on Democratic districts and concentrate on strong Whig counties, insisted another of Campbell's correspondents. "Stimulate every Whig to turn out and work on that day. For our opponents are at work." Success, in short, hinged on mobilizing Whigs. Democratic votes must not be expected."

VI

By September, if not earlier, therefore, Whig leaders in both sections had abandoned their reliance on Taylor's nonpartisan heroism and reverted to the traditional tactic of emphasizing differences between the parties and condemning rather than courting Democrats. But southern and northern Whigs went about it in distinctive ways. Southern Whig politicians possessed far fewer options for reinvigorating their rank and file than those available in the North. Unlike the North, where several key states held state and congressional elections in October and November, most slave states did not. In most of the South, Whigs could not expect attractive local candidates to heal intraparty wounds, remind Whig voters of Whig principles, help boost the Whig vote, or create a bandwagon effect. Nor could southern Whigs hope to win many votes by condemning Cass as a warmonger. After all, the Mexican War had been popular in the South, and they boomed Taylor's military exploits to neutralize Democrats' advantage on the issue. They thus doubted the utility of stressing Cass' supposed bellicosity, and to do so in light of the campaign they were making for Taylor would simply expose them as hypocrites.

In sharp contrast to northern Whigs, southern Whigs also did not renew their assaults of 1846 on Democrats' economic record. At first glance, this failure is puzzling. As with northern grain products, the prices of southern export staples, especially cotton, soared in 1847, but they plummeted even further than the prices of northern commodities in 1848, whether measured by the differences with 1847 prices or the differences from the beginning to the end of the year 1848 itself (Tables 24 and 25). At the same time, however, the volume of southern exports swelled in 1848, and the income the region earned from them consequently billowed. The total value of cotton exports, for example, jumped from $43 million to $53 million between 1846 and 1847, but it climbed to $62 million in 1848 for a healthy gain of 17 percent. Similarly, tobacco sales, which had been worse in 1847 than in 1846 increased by 14.3 percent in 1848. In contrast, the total value of wheat exports plunged by 50 percent between 1847 and 1848. In short, Southerners enjoyed relative prosperity during 1848, thus neutralizing any Whig attempt to exploit economic issues.

In the fall, therefore, southern Whigs increasingly emphasized one of their old themes—that Taylor's ownership of slaves meant that Whigs provided greater security to slavery and Southern Rights than did Democrats. Reflecting Whigs'

Table 24Percentage Drop in Wholesale Prices Between 1847 and 1848 in Five Cities^a

"This table is based on Tables 46, 53, 77, 90, and 101 in the appendix of Arthur H. Cole, Wholesale Commodity Prices in the United States, 1700–1861 (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1938). Although each is weighted by different commodities, they measure different things. The table for New York City is the least helpful because it reflects wholesale prices for all commodities, including imported goods. The table for Philadelphia is limited to the prices of domestic commodities and that for Cincinnati to the prices of northern agricultural commodities. Those for Charleston and New Orleans are based on export staples from South Carolina and Louisiana, respectively, and in each, cotton was weighted far more heavily than other products, 85 compared to 15 for rice in South Carolina and 39 compared to 9 for sugar in Louisiana. I have taken cotton prices in these two ports to represent cotton prices across the South.

I constructed the table by calculating the percentage differences in the specified months in the two years, for example, between July 1847 and July 1848.

calculated two-faced strategy on the slavery issue, Truman Smith sent documents to the South, pledging Taylor's and Fillmore's fidelity to southern interests, while simultaneously sending different documents to the North, promising that Taylor opposed slavery expansion and would sign the Proviso. Southern Whigs happily played this cynical game, for they believed they held a winning hand. Whatever northern Whigs claimed about Taylor, they were convinced he would never betray his section. If northern Whigs wanted to hoodwink their electorate, let them. So

Significantly, southern Whigs did not stress concrete past actions regarding slavery to distinguish themselves from Democrats since their voting records in the recent Congress on Oregon and the Clayton Compromise had been so similar. Instead, Whigs and Democrats alike emphasized what their respective presidential and vice presidential candidates might do in the future. Praising Cass's manly pledge to veto the Wilmot Proviso in his Nicholson Letter of December 1847, Democrats belittled Taylor's cowardly silence. Despite owning some 100 slaves, they insisted, Taylor could not be trusted without a public pledge to veto the Proviso—a pledge he refused to make. Every northern Whig congressman had supported the Proviso, and Whigs across the North promised that Taylor would never veto that odious implement of Yankee tyranny. Thus, Democratic papers in the South vilified the "Two Faces" of the Whig campaign. "The Northern and Southern sections of the Whig party are playing off the boldest attempt at fraud ever made upon the American people," declared a Democratic sheet in Florida. "LET THE SLAVEHOLDERS OF NORTH CAROLINA BEWARE! THEY ARE ABOUT TO BE BETRAYED," warned the Democratic organ in Raleigh.81

In many slave states, however, Fillmore bore the brunt of Democratic invective. As soon as Whigs chose their ticket, southern Democrats eagerly scanned the excongressman's record for incriminating evidence. They discovered that Fillmore, like most northern Whigs, had consistently voted against the gag rule. Far more damaging, they found and widely printed an 1838 Fillmore letter to abolitionists endorsing congressional abolition of both slavery in the District of Columbia and the interstate slave trade. That letter, chorused the southern Democratic press, irrefutably proved Fillmore's "unsoundness on the question of Southern rights." Did Southerners dare put an avowed abolitionist within a heartbeat of the presidency? "Let every southern man before he goes to the polls put this solemn question to himself."

Southern Whigs could not pooh-pooh so embarrassing a record. When they first learned of Fillmore's nomination, they were as apprehensive as Democrats were hopeful that he had antislavery skeletons in his closet. Southern Whigs thus bombarded Fillmore with questions after the convention about whether he had ever publicly endorsed the Proviso, and they expressed enormous relief when he replied he had not. Citing Democratic attacks on Fillmore's votes against the gag rule, still more demanded a public avowal that he was no abolitionist. But Democrats' unearthing of Fillmore's 1838 letter in early September particularly unnerved them. Virginia's Rives and New York editor James Brooks insisted that Fillmore must issue a public statement to defuse that explosive document. From Georgia, Robert Toombs wailed that the Democrats' exposure of it 'has fallen upon us like a wet blanket, & has much injured us in the State.''83

Fillmore desperately sent southern Whigs ammunition to repel the Democratic assault. In a letter to Alabama's John Gayle, which Whig papers broadcast across the South, Fillmore pledged that he was no abolitionist and would never "assail Southern institutions." On September 13, he sent Brooks a missive intended for southern dissemination dealing with his incendiary remarks about outlawing the interstate slave trade. Apparently referring to the Supreme Court's Groves v. Slaughter decision, in which three justices had stated or implied that Congress could not interfere with the interstate slave trade, Fillmore argued that the Court's 1841 decision rendered his 1838 statement moot. He concurred with the decision and would abide by it. Thus he would not abide, he implied, any congressional attempt to end that trade. By late September and early October, at least a few Southerners assured the beleaguered candidate that he had done enough. No more letters were needed.⁸⁴

The major emphasis of the Whig campaign in the fall, however, lay less in defending Fillmore than in attacking Cass. Whatever Cass had written about vetoing the Proviso, Whigs charged, he was manifestly a Northerner and therefore less trustworthy than a native Southerner who owned 100 slaves. And if voters needed evidence of Cass' potential for perfidy, Whigs gleefully proclaimed, they need only look at Martin Van Buren, the original northern man with southern principles and now the candidate of the Free Soil party, that organized embodiment of discrimination against the South.

In trumpeting Taylor's virtues, southern Whigs rarely pledged explicitly that he would facilitate slavery expansion into the Mexican Cession or even veto the Proviso. Rather, southern Whigs promised that Taylor's popularity as a national hero in both sections would enable him somehow to restore sectional comity, stop northern aggressions on southern liberty and equality, and thereby save Southerners from enslavement to a despotic northern majority. Simultaneously, they cited Taylor's identity as a Southerner and slaveholder as sufficient proof, even without any positive pledges, that he would never sacrifice southern interests. Taylor, declared an Alabama ratification meeting, possessed "the same feelings" and had "the same interest in regard to slavery as ourselves." "Will the people of Georgia vote for a Southern president or a Northern one?" asked the Milledgeville Southern Recorder in October. "Can Gen. Taylor, a Southerner . . . prove recreant to the institutions of those among whom he has lived, sacrifice his own and your interests?" queried North Carolina's major Whig paper. "Or is it safer to trust Gen. Cass—who is a northern man, with Northern ideas about the matter—who is proclaimed by his neighbors the uncompromising advocate of free soil—who once expressed a desire to VOTE for the Wilmot Proviso?" For southern Whigs, those questions could have only one answer.85

By its final months, in sum, the presidential campaign in the South had essentially become a shouting match about which party's candidates would better protect the region against the Wilmot Proviso and northern aggression. Democrats pointed to their man's pledge to veto the Proviso; Whigs cited Taylor's Louisiana residence. Yet this difference rested on conflicting promises and threats about what might happen in the future, not on demonstrable differences over concrete policies. Instead, the record of congressional votes on specific legislation demonstrated that southern Whigs and Democrats consistently united in rigid opposition to a statutory ban on slavery extension.

In 1844, in contrast, the two presidential candidates had taken sharply opposed stands on the policy of immediate Texas annexation. More important, in both the House and Senate during 1844, southern Whigs and Democrats had polarized against each other in votes on Texas and, of course, on economic legislation as well. Even in some slave state legislatures, Whig majorities had opposed the Democratic demand for immediate annexation. In 1844, that is, a concrete record established partisan differences over the policy itself. In 1848 there were no differences on the policy, only over which of the two presidential candidates might block the policy everyone in the South opposed.⁸⁶

Only time would tell whether a campaign based on windy rhetoric and Cassandra-like cries of danger could stimulate enough Whigs to carry necessary slave states for Taylor. Evidence from two of them in October, however, should have given Whigs pause about the mobilizing power of their campaign. From North Carolina, whose policy-oriented August gubernatorial election had generated such a high turnout, a Whig warned that there was "very little excitement or feeling manifested by either party. I think Old Zack will carry the State, but not by such a majority as many anticipate." Meanwhile, Georgia's Whigs carried four of eight congressional districts, as they had in 1846. While their statewide vote considerably exceeded their total in that midterm contest, it lagged 3.300 votes behind the turnout for their losing gubernatorial candidate in 1847, and Democratic candidates still garnered a majority of the state's popular vote. At least one Georgia Whig attributed this disappointing performance to overconfidence that kept some Whigs home on election day. But there are other ways to interpret it. In October 1844, when the parties in Georgia and other slave states stood on a concrete record of voting against each other on slavery expansion and other issues, the turnout rate in Georgia's congressional race was 92.2 percent of the eligible voters, and Whig candidates had attracted 40.7 percent of the potential electorate. In 1848, only 72.3 percent of eligible voters participated in the congressional races, and Whig candidates garnered only 36 percent of the potential electorate. Like the observation from North Carolina, those figures suggest that a campaign in which the two southern parties agreed upon the fundamental issue and ran only on unsubstantiated promises and charges about their candidates' future course regarding it, rather than on a concrete record of substantive disagreement in the immediate past, evoked little voter interest. They suggest, furthermore, that if Zachary Taylor carried southern states, it would be in lowturnout elections in which the Democrats did an even poorer job than the Whigs of getting their voters to the polls. Here, then, is a central reason why turnout plunged in 1848.87

Northern Whigs, unlike Southerners, did not rely exclusively on the sectionally divisive slavery extension question to arouse their alienated and apathetic troops. Most certainly, they continued to trumpet their free-soil credentials, their commitment to the Wilmot Proviso, and their promise that Zachary Taylor would not veto it, in contrast to Cass, who had pledged to do so. Yet northern Democrats replied that popular sovereignty would prevent slavery expansion just as reliably as the Proviso, since nonslaveholders could move into the territories more easily and more quickly than slaveholders. Besides, they bragged, their candidate was manifestly a Northerner, unlike the slaveholder heading the Whig ticket. Just as both parties in the South promised to block enactment of the Proviso, in sum, all three parties in the North pledged opposition to slavery extension. As in Dixie, the dispute concerned means, not ends, unlike 1844, when the parties fundamentally disagreed over the policy of territorial expansion itself. According to some Free Soilers like John Van Buren, "The free soil movement . . . compelled all to do homage to its spirit." Others, like Connecticut's John Niles, concluded that Whigs' and Democrats' adamant resistance to slavery expansion neutralized the third party's appeal. Niles perceived the essential point. If all three parties in the North opposed slavery expansion, why should a northern voter prefer one to the other two? Why, indeed, should that individual bother to vote at all?88

To mobilize angry and apathetic Whig voters, therefore, northern Whig leaders insisted that other issues were at stake, that the salvation of Whig principles depended upon Whig voters coming to the polls and helping Taylor defeat Cass. In August, Taylor's Lippard and South Carolina letters had undermined this case by deepening suspicion that he had no commitment to the Whig party or its principles. Therefore, Whig politicos demanded additional evidence of Rough and Ready's Whiggery. That was the major purpose of Fillmore's frantic letters to Taylor in July and August.

This time Taylor, at long last, responded to their pleas for help. On September 6, Taylor wrote Fillmore that he regretted "the use that has been made of isolated letters and parts of letters addressed by me to individuals under the seal of private correspondence . . . against me and against the Whig party." Thus the press in New Orleans was publishing that very day another letter he had written to John Allison "calculated to correct the misrepresentation in regard to my position before the country as a Presidential candidate." "I trust," he concluded, "it will meet your approbation and that of our friends at the North."

Although it said nothing about specific Whig programs, Taylor's second Allison Letter was a masterstroke. He denounced those who accused him of occupying "an equivocal attitude towards...the Whig party." While commander of an army in Mexico that contained brave men from both parties, he explained, he could take no open partisan stance, but "all knew I was a Whig in principle." He had always pronounced himself a Whig when the occasion warranted it, and he proudly accepted Whigs' nomination because "the Convention adopted me as it found me—a Whig—decided but not ultra in my opinions." True, he said that he would have accepted the Democratic nomination, but it could have been offered only on the understanding that he was a Whig. True, he said that he would not be a party president. But he meant that "I am not engaged to lay violent hands indiscriminately upon public officers, good or bad, who may differ in my opinion with me. I am not expected to force Congress, by the coercion of the veto, to pass laws to suit me, or pass none. This is what I mean by not being a party candidate. And I understand this is good Whig doctrine." At last, Taylor had buttressed the keystone of Whigs' case for him. He was a good Whig because he would defer, rather than dictate, to Congress.90

The appearance of Taylor's second Allison Letter in mid-September delighted northern Whig leaders as much as his earlier letters had enraged them. Taylor's "frank, manly, independent" statement, editorialized Weed, should cause "thousands of alienated Whigs" to "warm back to General Taylor." The letter "is precisely what we wanted," gushed Fillmore. "It will be immediately published through all our papers, and must give general satisfaction to every true Whig in the state." Along with Clay's refusal to accept the independent nomination from New York City, reported other New York Whigs, Taylor's renewed vows of Whiggery had extinguished the revolt by Clay Whigs and strengthened the party. Taylor's letter was shoring up support among Whigs in Massachusetts and other New England states, echoed House Speaker Winthrop in mid-September. "1"

Important as the second Allison Letter and the free-soil arguments were to northern Whigs' mobilizing efforts, two other developments had equal, and possibly greater, significance. First, Whigs shrewdly selected attractive gubernatorial candidates who helped offset disaffection from Taylor. Four large northern states held gubernatorial elections in the late fall: Ohio and Pennsylvania in October, Massachusetts and New York in November. Massachusetts Whigs ran popular five-term incumbent George N. Briggs, thus signaling their reaffirmation of traditional principles. Briggs' campaign was inextricably entwined with the campaign for Taylor, but the other three merit closer attention.

Writing off Taylor's chances in Ohio from the moment of his nomination, its Whig leaders desperately wanted to win the October state elections. If we cannot "carry Taylor," worried Corwin, "how are we to carry the October election?" Ohio's Whigs craved control of the state government because it significantly shaped economic, social, and political life. The legislature to be chosen in October, for example, would select two state supreme court judges and a new United States senator, allot the usual number of less prestigious but still coveted state jobs, and set state policy for banking and currency, business incorporations, subsidization of transportation enterprises, and other economic matters that remained objects of intense partisan competition. The Democratic state platform in 1848, for example, demanded imposition of a tax on banks in the state and hard money, measures Whigs opposed. During the 1848 legislative session, partisan conflict had extended to social measures like temperance and state aid to education, but it had been especially apparent on two issues that would have great impact on Ohio's future politics and were certain to emerge again in the next legislature. Democrats backed and most Whigs vehemently opposed revision of the state constitution. In turn, the Whig majority, over bitter Democratic protests, had pushed through a reapportionment of the state legislature that promised to perpetuate their control, a law Democrats had challenged as unconstitutional and pledged to repeal in the next session.92

Whig voters' deep interest in their party's agenda for the state government, in fact, helped answer Corwin's question. "Of one thing there can be no doubt," a Whig declared to Thomas Ewing in August. "The whole of the Whig party here are firm on the State issues." No matter what propensity antislavery Whig voters displayed toward bolting to the Free Soil ticket in November, Whigs might hold them in October by focusing on state issues, especially since Free Soilers ran no gubernatorial nominee. Thus, Ewing was urged to try to rally traditionally Whig Quaker voters, who despised Taylor's participation in the Mexican War as well as his slaveholding, by stressing "state matters."

The contrast between the Democratic and Whig gubernatorial candidates provided Whigs with their second weapon in the state race. Democrat John Weller had fought in the Mexican War, which was hated by most Ohio Whigs, and he emphatically endorsed the Democrats' state and national platforms. Seabury Ford, Whigs' compromise choice in January and an avowed opponent of slavery expansion, was especially popular on the Western Reserve, where Whig bolts to Van Buren were most likely. Thus he was precisely the best candidate to hold those Whigs in October.

Ford, nonetheless, came under enormous and conflicting pressure after Taylor's nomination to repudiate or endorse him. Chase directly threatened him with a separate Free Soil candidacy unless he rebuked the Whig nominee, and antislavery Whigs refused to support him unless he did so. Loyalist Whigs, especially those from southern Ohio, demanded that he endorse Taylor, both to help hold rebellious Reserve Whigs in the presidential election and to guarantee their own votes on election day in October. Convinced that either course would alienate more men than it appeased and that the welfare of Ohio depended on the defeat of

Weller and Democratic legislative candidates, Ford steadfastly refused to announce his presidential preference. By the fall, Free Soil papers were urging antislavery men to support him, and on the Reserve, Free Soilers and Whigs coalesced on state legislative tickets to unite all "that hate Democracy." Dissatisfaction and suspicion persisted in both wings of the party, however, and there is little doubt that because of it, some Whigs in both regions of the state refused to vote in October.⁹⁴

Ford squeaked by with a 314-vote margin out of some 298,000 cast, whereas the Whig pluralities in the three-way races of 1844 and 1846 ranged between 1,300 and 2,300 votes. The turnout rate of 68 percent understandably exceeded the 60 percent rate in the mid-term election of 1846, but it lagged appreciably behind the 78.2 percent rate in October 1844. Results from the congressional and state legislative elections, where Free Soilers ran their own candidates, were even less favorable to the Whigs. In 1846 Whigs had captured eleven of Ohio's twentyone House seats; in 1848 they won only eight, although both of the victorious Free Soilers, Joseph Root and Joshua Giddings, had Whig lineage. In the state legislative races the Whigs suffered a crippling blow. After the 1847 elections, the state senate had been evenly divided between the parties, and the Whigs had controlled the state house forty to thirty-two. In 1848, the major parties retained an equal number of seats in the senate, but Free Soilers won the balance of power. Because of two contested seats from Hamilton County, the ultimate complexion of the house remained uncertain. But eight victorious Free Soilers had reduced the Whigs to a maximum of thirty-two seats, and those eight men could determine what the legislature did.95

New York's Whigs did not nominate their state ticket or pick their slate of symbolically significant presidential electors until the state convention in September. Just as New York's Democrats had brilliantly used the nomination of Silas Wright in 1844 to reunify their party and neutralize dissatisfaction with Polk, New York's Whigs hoped to pick a state and electoral ticket that could heal intraparty wounds and stimulate support for Taylor. At the state convention, conservatives' arch-foe Weed performed one of his most dazzling displays of political wizardry. The electoral ticket was carefully larded with Clay's friends. Weed also blocked the bid of the unpopular Governor John Young for renomination and secured the top spot for Hamilton Fish, a conservative from New York City, with Weed's friend George W. Patterson as his running mate. Some of Weed's allies expressed dismay at his blatant concessions. Yet most Whigs, and particularly the conservatives who had been most likely to abstain, were vastly pleased. Fish's nomination for governor, one rejoiced to Crittenden, would reunite the party in New York. Most New York Whigs would now back Taylor, groaned Free Soil gubernatorial candidate John Dix in October.96

The state platform and address to the electorate praised Taylor's opposition to executive despotism, pilloried Cass' warmongering and Van Buren's proslavery record, and reiterated the party's commitment to the Wilmot Proviso. Significantly, they also renewed the assault on the Democratic economic legislation of 1846, which had virtually disappeared from the New York Whig platform in 1847. Attacking Cass' opposition to internal improvements and support for the subtreasury system, Whigs demanded both the repeal of the Independent Treasury Act to ensure an ample and sound circulating currency and an upward revision of the tariff. Those economic planks represented more than a bid to conservative Whig businessmen. They signaled a conviction that economic issues, which had been so ineffective during the prosperity of 1847, had regained their salience with the Whig electorate. Whigs, in sum, used both an attractive ticket and specific issues to mobilize their latent support.⁹⁷

With New York apparently secure by mid-September and Ohio extremely doubtful, Pennsylvania truly became the keystone to Whig victory in November. With chances of carrying any traditionally Democratic state remote, Whigs knew they had to capture at least two of the nation's three largest states. Hence the wealthy businessmen in New York City and Boston who bankrolled the party were tapped for funds to send to Pennsylvania. When Whig leaders turned their attention to Pennsylvania, they saw a race that was almost impossible to handicap. Both Whigs and Democrats from outside the state, in fact, considered its politics hopelessly corrupt and uniquely byzantine. 98

Certainly it differed from other northern states Whigs hoped to carry. Unlike Whigs in Ohio, Massachusetts, and New York, those in Pennsylvania had never feared significant defections to the Free Soilers. Unlike Whigs in those states, many Pennsylvania Whigs had vigorously promoted Taylor's nomination as the best way to rescue the party from desperate straits. In 1847, the popular Democratic incumbent Governor Francis Shunk had easily won reelection to another three-year term; his hapless Whig opponent had received less than 45 percent of the vote, in part because the nettlesome Native Americans had siphoned off 4 percent. Worse still, Whig representation in the lower house of the state legislature had plunged from fifty-nine to thirty-seven seats. Then sheer serendipity in 1848 gave the Whigs a vigorous and extraordinarily effective stump speaker as a gubernatorial candidate who could arouse the rank and file. Francis Shunk. who was scheduled to govern until 1851, fell mortally ill, and on July 9, 1848, he resigned the governorship. Pennsylvania had no lieutenant governor, so the speaker of the state senate, the Whig William F. Johnston, became acting governor. Within a few weeks Johnston called for a new gubernatorial election in October.

Although Johnston received the Whig nomination unanimously at a hastily gathered state convention on August 31, he was not a conservative Clay Whig like Fish in New York. In the spring, Johnston had ardently pushed Scott's nomination. Hailing from Armstrong County near Pittsburgh in western Pennsylvania, Johnston had served as a Democrat in the state legislature for ten years. Even then, he had consistently voted with the Whigs in favor of banks, against hard money, and for protective tariffs. At the end of 1846 Johnston converted to Whiggery because of his outrage at the Walker Tariff, which he damned as a betraval of Polk's promises in 1844. Delighted by the accession of so talented a politician, Whigs had sent him to the state senate in 1847, and in 1848 they made him speaker in the expectation that he would replace the dying Shunk. Perhaps because of his recent conversion to the party, Johnston decided to break precedent and personally stump the state for himself and the rest of the Whig ticket during September and early October. Whigs rejoiced at this decision, for Johnston's formidable oratorical skills might arouse the hitherto alienated and apathetic Clay Whigs.99

Iohnston's well-publicized break with the Democrats over the tariff issue also made him the perfect exponent for what became Pennsylvania Whigs' central theme that fall. Prior to September, Whigs there had concentrated on reaching out to potential converts by stressing Taylor's nonpartisanship. Conducting the canvass through Rough and Ready Clubs rather than regular Whig committees, they had appealed to Democrats and bargained with nativists. In return for Native American support for Taylor and other Whig candidates in populous Philadelphia County, for example, Whigs promised to back the nativist Lewis C. Levin for Congress and five Native Americans for the state legislature. In addition, Whigs in central and western Pennsylvania stressed their commitment to the Wilmot Proviso and the promise that Taylor would not veto it. With Johnston's nomination, however, the thrust of the Whig campaign shifted markedly to economic questions. Over a third of their new state platform was devoted to the Independent Treasury and tariff issues, and in Johnston's rousing speeches across the state he focused most heavily on the need to repeal the Walker Tariff and restore the Whig tariff of 1842. The Walker Tariff, he repeatedly declared, "had brought or was bringing ruin, stagnation, and business revulsion." By the fall, in short, Whigs were attempting to stimulate their apathetic troops with precisely the same economic issues they themselves admitted had proved so unproductive a year earlier. Like the resurrection of economic planks in the New York Whig platform of September, the Pennsylvania campaign signaled a renewed confidence that the Democratic economic legislation of 1846 was again vulnerable. 100 Without question, the revived salience of economic issues was the most important development between the Whigs' June convention and the November election because it gave northern Whigs their most effective instrument for mobilizing Whig voters. Clay was defeated at Philadelphia primarily because of northern Whigs' pell-mell rush toward military candidates in the spring, and they had deemed gunpowder candidates necessary then because an issue-oriented campaign appeared hopeless. Aside from the loss of their antiwar and No Territory appeals, the prosperity engendered by Walker's financing of the war and unprecedented grain sales abroad had apparently made their economic programs superfluous. Yet the end of the war stopped the war contracts, government purchases, and injection of Treasury notes into the money supply that had done so much to create prosperity in 1847 and early 1848. Similarly, good harvests in Europe spelled the end of grain exports that had pumped huge quantities of foreign specie into the American economy.

By the fall of 1848, the economy was heading toward recession. By some indices, indeed, the downturn became particularly sharp in July, the month after the Whig convention, and with each successive month as the presidential election approached the deterioration of economic conditions worsened. By September and October, that is, almost all of the ominous predictions Whigs had made in 1846 about the pernicious impact of Democratic economic policies—the drainage of specie reserves, shrinkage of circulating currency, and desiccation of credit, a deleterious imbalance between imports and exports, falling prices, reduced wages and increased unemployment in manufacturing, and shortfalls in government revenue—appeared, finally, to be coming true. Tables 24 and 25 reveal the slump in wholesale commodity prices in five cities. Nationally, wholesale prices of all commodities sank 9 percent but consumer prices only 7 percent in that period. Grain exports in 1848 were half their 1847 level, and domestic prices of foodstuffs also tumbled. The favorable balance of trade was sharply reversed despite the jump in cotton and tobacco exports. In 1847, the country had been a net importer of $24 million worth of gold and silver, largely because of the payments for grain exports. In 1848, a net of $10 million in specie flowed out of the nation's bank reserves to pay for purchases from abroad. This palpable economic slide revivified Whig attacks on the Democrats' Independent Treasury system, Public Warehouse Act, and Walker Tariff.¹⁰¹

Recession struck New England as early as the spring, largely because the outflow of specie had drained the bank reserves used to make business loans. Credit was extraordinarily tight and expensive in Boston and other cities throughout the year. "I never knew it [money available for loans] to remain so scarce for so long a time," complained a Boston businessman in September. Denied access to the short-term loans necessary to meet operating expenses, textile manufacturers were forced to slash wages and lay off workers. Even the immensely wealthy Abbott Lawrence, whose textile enterprise was far less dependent on banks for operating capital than were those of most manufacturers, saw economic ruin ahead. 102 By July, New England Whigs were already blaming the Walker Tariff and the Independent Treasury for causing economic distress, and during the fall they increased their emphasis on economic themes. More than the revived relevance of Whig programs explains this tack. Stressing economic issues reminded Whig voters how the parties differed and why Whig victory was essential. All three parties in New England and the rest of the North might denounce slavery extension, but only the Whigs demanded positive government action to aid the economy. Thus, Lawrence told a Vermont ratification meeting that repeal of the subtreasury system and restoration of the tariff of 1842 formed the election's central objectives. Thus, Whig papers in Boston and elsewhere blamed Democratic legislation for ruining the balance of trade, "exhaust[ing] the specie of the country, and bringing the business of the country very nearly to a dead stand." "The only remedy," cried Whigs, "is some change in that system of legislation." Thus the state platform adopted by Massachusetts Whigs in September not only defended Whigs as the preeminent free-soil party in the state; it also insisted that it was the duty of government to promote prosperity and "to regulate wisely the currency and commerce of the country, to protect the labor and encourage the industry of the people," and to carry out internal improvements. Thus Daniel Webster, in the speeches he made on Taylor's behalf starting in September, focused primarily on economic issues, not slavery extension, not Taylor's character, and not executive despotism. 103

Friend and foe alike testified to such appeals' impact. Webster's speeches, Massachusetts Whigs told Fillmore, cemented the state for Taylor. "The last card is to be played by Webster's appeal to the pocket-issue!" exclaimed the pessimistic Free Soiler Phillips in mid-October. "This appeal will have great weight under the circumstances, and will effect much more than any of the other pretexts, upon which Genl. Taylor is sustained." Similarly, Connecticut Free Soiler John M. Niles admitted after the election that the tariff issue had been crucial to the Whigs' ability to hold their vote. Throughout the campaign, he had constantly changed his mind about whether the Free Soilers were making greater inroads into the Whig or Democratic vote, and then his only worry had been that the universal claim by all parties that they opposed slavery expansion might blunt the Free Soilers' appeal. After the election he confessed that the recession, by affecting the many metal shops and small manufacturers in the state, had given the tariff issue unexpected salience. Many manufacturers and their employees had thus voted for Taylor "in hopes of a modification of the act of '46. They expected nothing from Taylor but did from the Whig party." As a result of this Whig success in retaining support, the Free Soil party "got more democratic than Whig votes."

Falling prices gave particular salience to Whig attacks on the Walker Tariff in New Jersey and Pennsylvania. Coal and iron prices plunged in 1848. At the same time, imports of cheap British iron increased 39 percent over their levels of the previous year. Mines, foundries, and rolling mills laid off workers or suspended operations entirely. As a result, Whigs triumphed in both states' October elections. New Jersey had no statewide race, but Whigs, benefiting from a surge in voter turnout, captured four of five congressional seats, retained control of the legislature, and reversed the popular majority Democrats had gained in the gubernatorial election of 1847. The Whigs' real prize was Pennsylvania. Turnout for both parties soared from the previous year, when the Democrats had enjoyed an 18,000-vote margin over the Whigs. In 1848, Johnston won the governorship by 300 votes out of some 337,000 votes cast. Johnston, in fact, polled the largest vote ever attained by any Whig candidate in Pennsylvania until that time, including Harrison in 1840. He attracted 40,000 more votes than the Whig candidate in 1847 and 8,000 more than Clay in 1844. Whigs also won fourteen of twentyfour congressional seats, although that represented a loss of two seats from their remarkable performance in 1846. Furthermore they won forty-five seats in the lower house of the state legislature, and the five Native Americans they backed in normally Democratic Philadelphia County also won. 107

Almost all Pennsylvania Whigs credited their October victory to Johnston's ability to bring out the entire Whig vote and to the tariff issue. Webster encountered several Philadelphia Whigs in New York City who "all ascribe the change in Pa. to the Tariffs, & they wish to make new and stronger efforts on that point" in the three weeks remaining before the presidential election. While Whigs expected that Taylor would get more Democratic votes than the turncoat Johnston, they feared he would not retain all the antislavery voters Johnston had won. Thus Whigs redoubled their efforts to carry the state. Not only did they pour more money into it, they reemphasized the demand for the restoration of the Tariff of 1842, which had apparently been so successful in mobilizing Whigs in October. Throughout Pennsylvania's anthracite coal region, a Whig speaker reported, the Whig slogan was "Taylor, Fillmore, and the Tariff of 1842." Large banners with the same message hung from business establishments in Philadelphia and Pittsburgh. 108

After the presidential election, Whigs and Democrats alike attributed Pennsylvania's result primarily to the tariff issue. "Thousands voted with us on the tariff question alone," Moses Hampton declared from Pittsburgh. Pointing to Schuylkill County, where the Whigs gained 2,300 votes and the Democrats only 86 between 1844 and 1848, a Philadelphian cited the tariff as the key for Whigs in coal-mining districts. Democrats agreed. "The Whigs as a party would go down down if it was not [for] the tariff principle which keeps them up," a frustrated

Pittsburgh Democrat sputtered to James Buchanan. Another contended that Democratic losses in the coal regions resulted from "gun powder and the Tariff! which of these had the greatest influence—it will be hard to ascertain." Faced with tumbling wages and the specter of unemployment, Democratic miners could not be kept in the party traces. "They said it was bread and they would not stand to principle." The reports from Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and elsewhere demonstrate that contentions that the 1848 presidential election revolved around slavery extension alone are nonsense. 109

On November 7, for the first time in American history, voters from all the states trooped to the polls on the same day to select a president. Zachary Taylor emerged victorious, with 1,360,967 votes compared to 1,222,342 for Cass and 291,804 for Van Buren, a gain of almost 229,000 votes over the Liberty party's total in 1844. Although Van Buren ran ahead of Cass in New York and Vermont and almost even with him in Massachusetts, he did not win a single electoral vote. Taylor and Cass each carried fifteen states, but Taylor prevailed in the electoral college 163 to 127. Aside from the three states already mentioned, Taylor won Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Connecticut, and Rhode Island in the North. Maine and New Hampshire remained Democratic bastions in Whiggish New England, and the Michigan resident Cass carried every midwestern state, including, most importantly, Ohio and Indiana. In the South, Taylor took Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, Tennessee, North Carolina, Georgia, Louisiana, and Florida. Between 1844 and 1848, in sum, Taylor's home state, Georgia, New York, and Pennsylvania shifted from the Democratic to the Whig column, while Ohio moved in the opposite direction. As most Whigs had correctly recognized since 1844, the traditional Whig states Clay had carried that year and those he had come close to winning provided the keys to Whig victory. Heavily Democratic states whose Whigs had ardently supported Taylor's nomination contributed nothing to this triumph despite his gains over Clay in some of them.

Unlike Harrison's surging triumph in 1840, widespread voter enthusiasm did not account for Taylor's success. Neither the presence of a popular military hero on the Whig ticket nor the attention devoted by all parties in both sections to the Wilmot Proviso, slavery extension, and sectional rights stimulated a large turnout. Nationwide it declined from about 79 percent of adult white males in 1844 to about 73 percent in 1848. Only in Massachusetts and Louisiana did the rate of voter participation exceed that of 1844. Remarkably, indeed, despite four years of population growth, the actual vote in 1848 was lower than that of 1844 in three New England states, New York, Virginia, North Carolina, and Alabama. As the figures in Table 26 indicate, while Taylor drew a larger share of the actual vote than Clay in a number of states, including eleven of twelve slave states, his share of the potential vote surpassed Clay's only in Pennsylvania, Arkansas, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana.

These results raise important questions. Why did turnout decline, and did the drop-off benefit one party more than another? How did Whigs manage to mobilize the votes they did, given the overall trend, and to what extent did Taylor's purported appeal to Democrats, nativists, and new voters help them? And what impact did the new Free Soil party have on the outcome in the North? Did it in fact damage the Whigs as gravely as some historians contend?

"The figures for the turnout rates in northern states in this table are taken from Table 1 in Gienapp, "'Politics Seem to Enter into Everything,' "pp. 18–19. Those for the South are taken from the estimates in Historical Statistics, p. 1072. Property qualifications on the right of suffrage in Rhode Island, Virginia, and Louisiana help account for the unusually low turnout rates in those states.

Democrats suffered and Whigs therefore benefited disproportionately from the slump in turnout. Democratic losses between 1844 and 1848 exceeded, and Democratic gains lagged behind, those of Whigs in every region of the country except the Midwest. The significant decline in the Democratic vote indicates that Lewis Cass' unpopularity may have been as important in explaining the Whig victory as any unique attractiveness of Zachary Taylor. A large number of northern Democrats faithfully followed Van Buren into the Free Soil movement, and the split in the northern Democratic party may have caused other Democrats to stay home on election day either as a response to conflicting loyalties or from a conviction that the divided Democrats could not win.

Not only did the unpopular Cass net some 15,000 fewer votes than Polk in slave states, but he ran significantly behind 1847 or 1848 Democratic gubernatorial candidates in Kentucky, North Carolina, Missouri, Florida, Arkansas, Alabama, and Tennessee. Nonetheless, Democratic declines did not affect the outcome in any slave state except perhaps Florida. It narrowed the margin between the parties in securely Democratic states like Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Virginia or increased the Whig majority in usually reliable North Carolina, Maryland, Kentucky, and Tennessee. Taylor could have carried all of those states simply by replicating Clay's vote in 1844. In contrast, Georgia and Louisiana shifted to the Whig column because of Whig gains, not Democratic losses (Table 27).

Excluding the new states of Texas and Florida, Democrats lost 17,000 southern votes between 1844 and 1848, while Whigs' total increased by 39,000. On their face, these figures suggest that Whigs succeeded in attracting Democrats, but contemporaries disagreed on whether the missing Democrats abstained or defected to Taylor.¹¹¹ Existing statistical studies that measure voter movement between elections in the South suggest greater abstention than defection among previous Democratic voters in 1848. An analysis of voter movements between the congressional elections of 1846 and 1848 in Florida, for example, indicates that almost twice as many previous Democrats sat out as voted Whig. Still, almost a fifth of the 1846 Democrats voted Whig in 1848, and new voters preferred the Whigs by a margin of three to two. 112 A study of the switches between the presidential elections of 1844 and 1848 in Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana suggests that about 10 percent of the Polk voters supported Taylor, while another 25 percent abstained. 113 Still another analysis, based on all southern counties, suggests that the Democrats retained 87 percent of Polk's vote in the lower South and 93 percent in the upper South, or 91 percent in the region as a whole, and that the missing Polk voters defected to Taylor. The comparable retention rates for the Whigs were 97, 96, and 97 percent. 114

Whatever the sources of new southern Whig voters, Whig gains in Dixie were geographically skewed, even though Whigs everywhere presented Taylor as the quintessential Southerner and a hero. Significant Whig gains were disproportionately concentrated in Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana. His average increase over Clay in those four states was 25.3 percent, compared to 5.5 percent in the four border slave states and 11.2 percent in Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee, and Arkansas. Taylor ran ahead of North Carolina's Whig gubernatorial candidate, but his gain over Clay among Tarheels was a negligible 804 votes. Given the enthusiasm of Virginia's Rives Whigs about Taylor's supposed attractiveness, his paltry gain in the Old Dominion of 405 votes over Clay speaks volumes about the supposed ability of the slaveholding hero and the slavery issue to stimulate southern voters. Aggregate regionwide figures point to a similar conclusion. The unweighted average total turnout in twelve slave states sank from 79.4 percent in 1844 to 70.5 percent four years later. The average decline in the rate of voter participation of the eight states from the upper South almost doubled the rate of decline in the four Deep South states voting in both years. 115 Equally important, turnout in Kentucky, North Carolina, and Missouri sank markedly between gubernatorial elections in August and the presidential contest in November, while presidential turnout in Alabama lagged behind that in a gubernatorial election the previous year. Granted that southern Democrats deemed their candidate particularly unpalatable, disgruntled Democrats as well as previous nonvoters could vote for a southern slaveholder who was presented as the embodiment of republican nonpartisanship, as another George Washington. Why, then, was voter turnout in the South comparatively so low when both parties insisted that the sole issue in the campaign was the defense of slavery and of Southern Rights from northern aggression? Why, moreover, was the additional vote Taylor attracted so geographically skewed within the South?

"In the free states and in Delaware and Texas, the share of the vote unaccounted for by these figures went to the Liberty party in 1844 and the Free Soilers in 1848. The percentages are taken from Rayback, Free Soil, p. 286.

Deep South voters possibly cared more about the slavery extension issue than other Southerners because of the unusually heavy concentrations of slaves and slaveholders in the Deep South. Yet Taylor lived in Louisiana, owned plantations in Mississippi, and was run as a favorite son in both, and that identity probably explains some of the additional Whig vote in those states. More important, non-slaveholders as well as slaveholders had a stake in the defense of Southern Rights and the preservation of slavery, and it would be foolhardy to infer that a lack of interest in those issues caused the lower turnout in 1848 in the upper South or the region as a whole.¹¹⁶

Rather, it seems more proper to attribute the apathy reported so extensively in letters and demonstrated by the low turnout to the form the slavery extension issue took in 1848. In 1844, the southern wings of the Whig and Democratic parties had established concrete records of partisan disagreement on Texas' annexation, records that were reinforced by the voting behavior of each party's northern wing. Although those records worked to the disadvantage of the Whigs, they spurred a relatively high turnout for both parties. In 1848, no concrete differences distinguished the parties on the Wilmot Proviso, only conflicting claims as to which presidential candidate offered the South greater security against it. Obviously the Whigs enjoyed the advantage this time, but predictions about an uncertain future lacked the power of concrete differences established in the immediate past to stimulate the electorate to vote.

Northern turnout rates also sagged in 1848, but unlike the South, both major parties suffered a net decline in their absolute votes between 1844 and 1848. Unlike southern Whigs, who proudly displayed their candidate as the party's trump card, in most northern states, and especially traditionally Whig states, Whigs regarded the slaveholding general as a liability, not an asset. Thus, aside from praising Taylor's opposition to the veto and executive usurpation, they had concentrated on attacking Polk's record, denouncing the consequences of a Cass victory, proclaiming the necessity of overturning Democratic economic policies, and rehearsing their commitment to free soil in order to mobilize former supporters and recruit new ones. Such appeals failed to appease all of the distrustful or angry rank and file or to attract enough new voters to replace all those who abstained or defected. The absolute Whig vote declined from 1844 in both New England and the Midwestern states that had participated in the earlier election.¹¹⁷ It grew by almost 13,000 (3 percent) in the Middle Atlantic states, but that increase lagged behind the gain of 27,800 (6.9 percent) between 1840 and 1844.

Democratic losses were even more severe. The Democratic decline in New England was more than double that of the Whigs, and the heavy drop in New York through defection to Van Buren and abstention also gave the Democrats a huge net loss in the Mid-Atlantic region. The Democrats did gain votes in Cass' home turf in the Midwest, but their increase was quite small compared to the surge they had enjoyed there between 1840 and 1844. To view these net shifts another way, Professor Thomas B. Alexander has estimated that in the North as a whole, Democrats retained 89 percent of Polk's vote in 1844, while the Whigs retained 90 percent of Clay's vote. 118

Figures for the section as a whole or for even regions within it disguise significant variations among the states. Still, Taylor's vote exceeded Clay's in only two of the northern states he carried, New Jersey and Pennsylvania. As in 1846 and 1847, Whig victory in New York depended upon Democratic divisions, which engendered both defections to Van Buren and Democratic abstentions. Together, Van Buren and Cass outpolled Taylor in the Empire State and three of the New England states Rough and Ready won.

Taylor's success in attracting new voters to the Whig column also varied in Democratic states. Already a hopeless minority, the New Hampshire Whig party lost almost a fifth of its small vote. As had been predicted for months, Taylor's candidacy devastated the party in Ohio. Whigs suffered a net decline of a tenth of their voting strength, and their actual losses may have been substantially larger. One statistical estimate of voter movement between the October gubernatorial election and the November presidential election, for example, suggests that one-fourth of the men who voted Democratic for governor supported Taylor in November. At the same time, over a third of those who had voted for Ford went to Van Buren, while another tenth of Ford's voters abstained. 119 Taylor was also exceedingly unpopular among Whigs in Michigan, many of whom bolted to Van Buren or stayed home on election day. 120 Not only did he draw fewer votes than Clay, but he also ran 7,700 votes (8.8 percent) behind Whig congressional candidates on the same ticket with him. Similarly in Iowa, Taylor received a smaller vote than two Whig congressional candidates had garnered in October. and his proportion of the vote was lower than any received by a Whig since Iowa had become a state. Finally, in Wisconsin, Taylor got only 35 percent of the vote, vet because of substantial Democratic defections to Van Buren since the spring elections, he trailed Cass by only 3 percent. 121

In Maine, Indiana, and particularly Illinois, however, Taylor increased the Whig vote over Clay's 1844 totals, although the gains obviously did not suffice to carry those states. Taylor added only 783 votes to the Whig column in Democratic Maine, not nearly enough to close the gap between the major parties, even combined with Democrats' heavy net loss of 5,900 votes (13 percent). Regression analysis of the movement of Maine's voters between the two presidential elections suggests that Taylor attracted far more previous nonvoters than that small net gain and that the increment barely offset the desertion of Clay supporters to the Free Soilers and the ranks of nonvoters (see Table 28). The 2,400 votes Whigs gained in Indiana were also neutralized by an even larger Democratic increase. Again, the net change in the Whig vote probably conceals much greater movement of individual voters to and from the party. After the election, Indiana Whigs complained that at least 5,000 Whigs had bolted to Van Buren, while an equal number had abstained rather than vote for Taylor. If so, some 12,500 men, almost a fifth of Taylor's total, voted for Rough and Ready who had not voted for Clay.¹²²

Returns from the seemingly impregnable Loco Foco fortress of Illinois shocked Whigs and Democrats alike. Taylor garnered 7,000 more votes there than had Clay and 18,500 more than the Whig congressional ticket in August. At the same time, Cass ran 3,000 votes behind Polk and 9,500 behind Democratic congressional candidates. Taylor's performance was the strongest by a Whig in Illinois since 1840. Although Taylor won the same share of the total vote as had Clay, the margin between the major parties was sharply reduced because of Democrats' marked decline (see Table 27).

Since the Democrats now seemed to be within striking distance and since they suffered significant partisan disadvantages from the adoption of a new state constitution in 1848, Illinois Whigs expressed more optimism than they had voiced in a decade. "Everybody was astonished at the vote," David Davis reported after the election. "The Democracy were terribly scared, the new constitution cutting them off from the [state] patronage and the General Govt. being out of the hands of their friends." Once determined to abandon politics because of Whigs' futility, Davis now envisioned a bright future for Illinois Whiggery, largely because the new constitution had made judgeships, like the one he had just won, and other state offices elective rather than appointive. "The patronage of the Legislature being withdrawn has broken up the Democratic party in this horribly governed state."

Martin Van Buren's Free Soil candidacy obviously contributed to Democratic disarray in both the North and the South. Surprisingly, however, the Free Soil party had only minimal impact on the outcome. In the South, Democrats' reduced vote did not account for Taylor's carrying a single state, although the possible impact of Van Buren's betrayal in deterring a normal increase in the southern Democratic vote cannot be measured. Despite losses to the Free Soilers, the Whigs still managed to carry the four traditionally Whig states in New England. Without question, the havoc wreaked by the Free Soil party on New York's Democrats gave the Whigs its thirty-six electoral votes. Just as clearly, defections to the Free Soilers cost the Whigs Ohio's twenty-three electoral votes. "We are beaten by our friends and not by our old enemies," moaned a Cleveland Whig. 124 In any event, had there been no Free Soil ticket in 1848, and had New York gone Democratic and Ohio Whig, as it had in 1844, 1846, and October 1848, Taylor would still have won the electoral vote, 150-140. Given Cass' sweep of the Midwest, that left New Jersey and especially Pennsylvania, with thirty-three electoral votes between them, as the keys to Taylor's triumph. Taylor won both by a clear, if narrow, majority, and in each the Free Soil party was a negligible presence. 125

Those two states were the only two free states Whigs carried in which Taylor's vote exceeded Clay's, and one wonders why. Free Soilers' relative weakness in both suggests that fewer Whig voters defected to the third party in Pennsylvania and New Jersey than elsewhere, but their Whigs were still vulnerable to abstention by disgusted regulars that obviously reduced the Whig vote in other northern states. What explains Whigs' unusual success in Pennsylvania and New Jersey in getting out the vote?

During most of the 1840s Whigs had carried New Jersey, and Taylor's gain over Clay there was a modest 1,700 votes. Thus the result might be attributed simply to party loyalty and fixed voting habits. Yet ingrained habit had not stopped Whigs from losing the 1847 gubernatorial election, and Taylor ran almost 8,000 votes (25 percent) ahead of their unsuccessful aspirant that year as well as 3,500 votes ahead of the Whig congressional slate in October. Regression analysis of voter movement between 1844 and 1848, indeed, suggests that Democrats actually retained more of their 1844 vote than did the Whigs. About 3 percent of former Clay voters switched to Cass, and 14 percent abstained. Those losses were more than replaced by former Democrats and previous nonvoters. Over a fifth of Taylor's vote apparently came from men who had not supported Clay. 126 There were some Native Americans in New Jersey, and some of Taylor's new vote could have come from them. But the stagnation in the state's iron and manufacturing industries, which gave renewed salience to the tariff issue, probably accounts for most of it, just as it had sparked the Whig comeback in the congressional elections.

Pennsylvania provided the keystone to Taylor's victory in 1848. Taylor could have lost both Georgia and Louisiana and still have won with Pennsylvania in his column. Without it, he would have lost even though he captured New York. With Pennsylvania, Whigs prevailed despite the loss of every free state to its west. The Whig showing there was simply remarkable. Though closely contested, it was normally a Democratic state. Harrison had won there in 1840 by fewer than 400 votes, Polk had carried it handily in 1844, and Whigs had been crushed in 1845 and 1847. Whigs' smashing triumph in the 1846 congressional elections had broken a skein of Democratic victories, but that year, Democrats disillusioned by passage of the Walker Tariff abstained in droves, an advantage the Whigs did not enjoy in 1848. Precisely because of the difficulty and importance of carrying Pennsylvania, Whigs had poured both speakers and money into it before and after the October state election. Even they, however, could not have anticipated that Taylor would run 25,000 votes ahead of Clay or outpace the 1847 gubernatorial candidate by 57,000 votes and Johnston's October total by 17,000.

This outpouring undoubtedly had multiple sources. Pennsylvania's Whigs had long recognized their need to absorb the separate Native American vote, some of them had explicitly promoted Taylor's nomination in order to attract it, and they had worked assiduously after the Whig convention to ensure it. Nativists provided some of the additional Whig vote, although their party had never polled more than 15,000 votes and many of them had also voted for Johnston.

Certainly nativists claimed after the election that they had provided Taylor's winning edge, as did former Democrats, in order to claim a share of the federal patronage to be dispensed by the new Taylor administration. The Whigs brought out their entire vote for Taylor, argued one Democrat, but "Gen. Taylor's declaration of entire independence of party, and freedom from ultraism of all kinds," not a "conviction among the people of the soundness of Whig measures," attracted the Democrats who provided his winning margin. Loyal Democrats also admitted that they lost votes to Taylor, but their explanation rings truer than such self-congratulatory letters, for it was echoed by virtually every Whig commentator in the state. Whigs, Democrats, nativists, and previous nonvoters surged toward the Whig ticket in 1848 because Whigs promised to restore the Tariff of 1842, a tariff that Pennsylvania's Democrats themselves had pledged to retain in 1844. Zachary Taylor, of course, never promised to restore the tariff. He vowed only to leave domestic legislation to Congress. Unlike the self-promoting politicos who bid for patronage, that is, voters in Pennsylvania and New Jersey who experienced or feared slashed wages, unemployment, and business stagnation, just like those in Connecticut, "expected nothing from Taylor but did from the Whig party."127

How Whigs managed to mobilize the northern vote they did is central to any explanation of Taylor's triumph in 1848. Historians obsessed by the slavery extension issue and the emergence of the Free Soil party, however, have paid more attention to Whig losses in the North than to the votes they retained. In net terms, the Whig vote did fall from its 1844 level in the other five northern states Taylor carried, yet the Whigs attracted enough men to equal 94 percent of their 1844 total in New York, 92.6 percent in Rhode Island, 92.4 percent in Connecticut, 90.5 percent in Massachusetts, and 86.4 percent in Vermont. Those figures—like the regionwide estimate that Whigs retained 90 percent of Clay's votes—are surely as impressive as the much smaller numbers lost through defection, disgust, or indifference, and the reasons for them merit scrutiny.

A combination of factors produced the respectable Whig turnout in these and other northern states. Attractive gubernatorial candidates like Briggs, Fish, and Johnston helped. The steadfast refusal of most antislavery Whig leaders to join the Free Soil party and the case northern Whigs made for their own commitment to the Wilmot Proviso undoubtedly contributed. Yet the clearest difference among the three contending parties in the North was not how they stood on slavery expansion. All three declared determined opposition to it. Rather, the parties differed most sharply on their reaction to the Polk administration's record, on executive power, on further territorial expansion, and, above all, on economic policy. Thus Whig attacks on Democratic economic programs also helped the party draw out a large enough vote to carry New York, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, and Vermont, despite the undoubted losses they experienced.

Northern Whigs did suffer losses, and the damage Free Soilers inflicted on them can best be measured in three ways. One is to consider the Free Soilers' impact on the Whigs' competitive relationship with the Democrats since Whigs worried far more about a Democratic than a Free Soil victory in 1848. As New York made abundantly clear, Free Soilers could hurt Democrats far more than Whigs, and the figures on the differential between the major parties' share of the vote in Table 27 indicate that, of the fifteen free states listed, Whigs ran further behind the Democrats than they had in 1844 only in New Hampshire, Michigan, Ohio, and Indiana. Elsewhere, their margin of victory was larger or that of defeat far smaller. In the two new states of Iowa and Wisconsin, the Free Soilers produced divergent results. The Democratic margin in Iowa was larger than it had been in previous state and congressional contests, suggesting disproportionate Free Soil recruitment of Whigs. In contrast, only substantial movement by Wisconsin's Democrats into the Free Soil camp reduced the margin between the major parties to so competitive a level.¹²⁸

More directly, one can attempt statistically to measure the extent of Free Soil incursions into Whig and Democratic voting support and to compare the proportions of Whig converts with those who abstained or crossed over to the Democrats. The Free Soil vote in New Jersey was so tiny that statistical analysis would be fruitless. Van Buren also received an inconsequential vote in Pennsylvania. While a few Whigs may have bolted to him in western counties near Ohio, his support was concentrated in a tier of heavily Democratic northern counties along the New York border in David Wilmot's congressional district. Most Free Soil voters in Pennsylvania, that is, were former Democrats and Liberty men, and attempting through statistical manipulation to measure the size of the Whig defection is hazardous. Estimates for the movement of voters between 1844 and 1848 in the other northern states are more helpful, and they are aggregated in Table 28.¹²⁹

"This table is based on the following sources: The regression estimates for all the New England states except Massachusetts were calculated by my former student Lex Renda; Table 1 in Baum and Knobel, "Anatomy of a Realignment," p. 65; Table VII in Kirn, "Third Party System," p. 37; Sweeney, "Rum, Romanism, Representation, and Reform," p. 118. The estimates for the major party losses to the Free Soilers in the Midwest are taken from Alexander, "Harbinger of the Collapse of the Second Party System: The Free Soil Party of 1848" (a manuscript version of the essay cited in note 136, read at the Conference on Nineteenth Century Political History, University of Nebraska, May, 1987), cited with permission of the author. Scatterplots in Alexander's paper suggest that virtually all Liberty party men in the Midwest voted Free Soil, as did Liberty men in the Northeast.

The category labeled "Abstained" in 1844 includes both men who were legally eligible to vote then but did not and those who became legally eligible between 1844 and 1848.

^bThe regression estimates for Massachusetts measure movement between the gubernatorial election of 1847 and the presidential election of 1848 rather than between the two presidential elections.

These are regressions of the voter movement in New York between the gubernatorial elections of 1844 and 1848.

These estimates indicate that the Free Soil party cut far more deeply into the Whig vote in the Midwest than in the Mid-Atlantic and New England states. Only in Massachusetts did the level of Whig support for Van Buren approach that in the midwestern states. No appreciable number of Whigs backed him in New York, Pennsylvania, New Iersey, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Connecticut. Fewer than a tenth of previous Whig voters did in Vermont and Maine. In most of New England, in fact, Whig abstention was a much more severe problem than Whig defection, a point of some importance since men who stayed home because of dissatisfaction with Taylor might be mobilized behind a more appealing candidate in the future. Abstention may also have been a problem for the Whigs in the Midwest in addition to their losses to the Free Soilers. At least one analysis based on all northern counties suggests that while Whigs retained about 90 percent of their vote in the North as a whole, they held only about three-fourths of it in the Midwest. 130 Because none of the available estimates for the Midwest indicate such heavy losses to the Free Soilers, some of the former Clay voters undoubtedly abstained, as midwestern Whigs reported. Proportionately, Democrats suffered equal or greater incursions into their vote from the Free Soilers in New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois. Equally revealing, where we have figures on the behavior of previous nonvoters, they show that such men were far more likely to support one of the major party candidates, and particularly Taylor, than the Free Soilers in all states except Vermont and Massachusetts. A third party widely regarded as a single-issue antislavery party had a markedly limited ability to bring first-time voters or previous nonvoters to the polls.

Finally, one can move beyond the presidential returns to measure Free Soilers' impact on Whig fortunes in state and congressional elections. Ohio has already been discussed. There the Free Soilers cost the Whigs at least two congressional seats and jeopardized Whig control of the state legislature. There Whigs admitted that the results "had prostrated the Whig party" and that "without conciliation [of the Free Soilers] the Whig party of Ohio is doomed to become a small party."¹³¹ In contrast, little evidence exists that Free Soilers contributed to the Whig defeats in the August state and congressional elections in Illinois and Indiana. The new party did run a separate congressional candidate in one of Illinois' seven congressional districts, but Democratic incumbent John Wentworth won with a majority anyway, while the Whig candidate ran far better than his counterpart in 1846 had. And if Indiana's Whigs worried about the defections they had suffered in November, ¹³² their Whig neighbors in Illinois were too busy rejoicing over the devastating impact the Van Buren candidacy had on the Democrats and the increase in their own vote to be concerned about any threat the Free Soilers might pose.

The situation was more complex in Michigan and Wisconsin. In two of Michigan's three congressional districts all three parties ran candidates, and the Democrats won both with less than a majority of the vote. Had all the men who supported the Free Soilers gone Whig, that is, Whigs would have carried both districts. In the third district, however, the Whigs chose to bargain rather than fight, and together with the Free Soilers they elected William A. Sprague, whom they described as a firm "Taylor Whig." Attempts at fusion with the Free Soilers in other areas did not prevent the Whigs from being routed in the state legislative elections. 133 In Wisconsin, all three congressional districts saw three-way races and each party emerged triumphant in one of them. By draining votes from the Democrats, the separate Free Soil candidate in the second district may have helped the Whig Orasmus Cole win, for he garnered less than a majority of the vote. Democrats won majorities in both houses of the Wisconsin legislature, with the Whigs holding less than a fourth of the seats in each and the Free Soilers the balance. Such figures, like the three-way split in the popular vote, suggested the wisdom, indeed the necessity, of working for a Whig-Free Soil coalition in the future.

Of the Mid-Atlantic states, the Free Soilers had no impact on the state and congressional races in New Jersey or the state contests in Pennsylvania. Two Pennsylvania congressmen elected in October were claimed as Free Soilers. David Wilmot most assuredly was a Free Soil leader, and he would have been reelected as a Democrat had he chosen to run as one. Wilmot's candidacy, in other words, did not deny the Whigs a seat they might have won. In the Twenty-Second District, which the Whigs had carried in 1846, John W. Howe won with the combined backing of Whigs and Free Soilers. Antislavery sentiment was strong in the counties composing the district, and although Whigs outnumbered Free Soilers, as measured by the presidential vote, Free Soil support was vital to Howe's victory. Elsewhere in the state, Free Soilers had no decisive impact on the outcome of congressional races. ¹³⁴

The disruptive impact of the Free Soilers on New York's Democratic party was even clearer in state and congressional races than in the presidential contest. Even though more former Whigs apparently voted for John A. Dix, the Free Soil gubernatorial candidate, than for Van Buren, Hamilton Fish won easily because of the divided Democratic vote. More spectacularly, Whigs won thirty-one of New York's thirty-four congressional seats, three-fourths of its state senate seats, and an astonishing 84 percent of the members in the legislature's lower house. If the negative impact of the Free Soilers on the Whigs was clear in Ohio and ambiguous elsewhere, palpably its presence helped the Whigs in New York. Accordingly, they had an incentive to do anything they could to keep the Democrats from reuniting.

Free Soilers' threat to New England's Whigs is more difficult to assess, if only because three of the region's six states would not hold state and congressional elections until the spring of 1849. In the three that voted in the fall of 1848, moreover, results were mixed. As they had in 1846, Whigs won three of Vermont's four congressional seats in September, and they retained control of the state legislature. Such control proved vital to the Vermont Whig party, for the Free Soil gubernatorial candidate got almost three-tenths of the vote, while the Whig Carlos Coolidge received less than 44 percent. Coolidge, that is, would have to look to the legislature for election. Although the Free Soil party in Vermont clearly sapped more votes from Democrats than from Whigs, it still hurt the Whigs and left them vulnerable to a challenge from a Democratic-Free Soil coalition.

In Maine, the dynamic was reversed. There the Democrats lost their secure majority in the gubernatorial election and had it sharply reduced in the state legislature. Maine's Whig minority had an incentive to bargain with the antislavery men in the future, just as their neighbors in New Hampshire had done in the past. Two Whigs won congressional seats in Maine, moreover, only because Free Soil candidates siphoned off votes from their Democratic opponents. In Maine, in sum, Whigs gained rather than lost from the presence of the Free Soilers.

Finally, Massachusetts Whigs palpably suffered from the new party's emergence. Not only did they lose a greater percentage of their former supporters to it than did Whigs anywhere else in the Northeast, but George Briggs polled less than a majority for the first time since 1845, largely because Stephen Phillips attracted 29 percent of the vote. Thus, the gubernatorial election was thrown into the legislature. There Whig control of the forty-member state senate was secure, and proportionately Whigs did even better in the house races than they had done in 1847 (see Table 19). That increase, however, disguised a significant deterioration of Whig strength. Not all towns in Massachusetts could send members to the legislature every year, and in many towns the presence of Free Soil candidates prevented anyone from winning the absolute majority necessary for victory. Because of those stalemates and the state's apportionment law, a number of towns went unrepresented, and the legislature elected in 1848 was significantly smaller than that selected in 1847. The number of seats won outright by Whigs dropped from 196 to 174. Conversely, where the Liberty party had won twelve seats in 1847, Free Soilers captured forty-nine, or a fifth of the total, in 1848, and their potential strength was even greater because they were strongest in many of the towns that went unrepresented that year. As time would soon show, the Massachusetts Whigs were extraordinarily vulnerable to any future alliance of Democrats and Free Soilers that might challenge their control of the commonwealth's government.136

The Free Soilers also deprived Massachusetts Whigs of two congressional seats they had captured in 1846. In one district, Charles Allen won outright over Whig and Democratic challengers. In another, John Gorham Palfrey, whom the Whigs had officially read out of the party, siphoned off enough votes in repeated elections to prevent anyone from winning the seat with the necessary majority. That district would go unrepresented during the entire Thirty-First Congress. Some conservative Whigs in Massachusetts might prate that it was "a real blessing to the Whig party . . . to have an occasional sifting such as the Free Soil agitation has given it" and that "we are really all the stronger for the secession of calculating, self-seeking men like Sumner, Adams, Palfrey, et id genus omne." More discerning men knew otherwise. ¹³⁷

The immediate harm inflicted by the Free Soilers on the northern wing of the Whig party thus varied sharply from state to state. Yet, its real menace to the Whigs would only be determined in the future. If it continued to grow as rapidly as it had during 1848 or if it combined with Democrats against the Whigs in New England, New York, and the Midwest, its potential threat was immense. What happened in the future, in turn, would be determined by the exigencies of political conflict in individual states and by what the new Taylor administration and Congress did about the problem of slavery expansion into western territories.

IX

At the end of 1848, with the significant exception of some Ohioans, most Whigs ignored this cloud on the horizon. Neither the relative decline in their vote, nor the low turnout, nor the sectional division in the party demonstrated by its divergent campaigns in the North and South worried many Whigs. Nor did Whigs' ambiguous message in some places and the accession of Native Americans and Democrats to the Whig column trouble many about precisely who or what was responsible for Taylor's victory. Instead, they were too busy celebrating the overthrow of the Democrats and "the evidence that this result gives of the truly national character of the Whig party, and the soundness of the nation's heart." "Never did true Whigs glory as they do now," Ohio's Benjamin Wade exulted, and he did not gloat alone. 138

Ominously, however, not all Whigs agreed about what they were celebrating. A Tennessean, for example, proclaimed Taylor's election a "glorious triumph of Whig principles." and others interpreted it as ensuring the enactment of specific Whig measures: an increase in tariff rates, repeal of the Independent Treasury, and restoration of federal subsidies for internal improvements. To Kentucky's Leslie Combs, Clay's great friend, the victory meant "the restoration of the great principles of self government and the protection of Human Labour in practical legislation—1st majorities & not vetoes are hereafter to govern the country. 2nd Citizens & not foreigners beyond the sea are to be protected in their honest earnings by the sweat of the fires." Other Whigs saw the victory in quite another light. Regular Whigs, warned Georgia's Alexander Stephens, had no sympathy for the Taylor movement or "even now understand it." "The Real Taylor men ... look upon the late most glorious achievement as a public deliverance and not a party victory." They looked "to a Reform in the Government and not bounties and rewards for partizan services." Similarly, a New Yorker declared that "public opinion is very decided against some old issues, of the Whig party, and old worn out, political Hacks like Mr. Clay and Webster." Still another New Yorker attributed the triumph not to Whig principles, but to what he called "the Taylor Republican Party." "The recent revolution, effected by the election of General Taylor upon the principles laid down in the 'Allison Letter,'" he declared in a New York City newspaper, "has completely removed all the old and obsolete platforms of the Whigs and Democrats and re-established the popular and Republican doctrines of Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe.... Old party issues have been totally swept away and a new order of things established under the influence and name of General Taylor whose virtues and patriotism will adorn the brightest page in history."

Aside from the future challenge posed by the Free Soil party—and more broadly the free-soil movement—and the need to resolve the slavery extension issue, therefore, Whigs confronted another problem. Their presidential candidate and most of their gubernatorial and congressional candidates had triumphed in 1848. Exactly what that victory entailed for the administration of government and the course of the Whig party itself, however, evoked sharp disagreement. Conflicts among Whigs about what kind of campaign to run for Taylor were carrying over into disputes about how to proceed after he won. Such uncertainty portended serious trouble ahead.

Chapter 12

"Many Discordant Political Interests to Reconcile"

"THE WHIG PARTY has safely passed through . . . a transition state and will be as enduring as the union itself," one Whig rejoiced after Taylor's election. "Its perpetuity as a great national party, is placed beyond doubt." Optimism abounded among Whigs in the weeks following Rough and Ready's victory. They appeared to be ascending because of their presidential, congressional, and gubernatorial triumphs in 1848, while Democrats plummeted in the opposite direction. "We have precisely changed ground with the locofocos," boasted a New York Whig. "We stand new, fresh, hopeful before the country—full of promise and glittering with the prestige of success. They have drooped beneath the weight of odious men, of names that stink in the public nose, & of recent measures." Democrats "are regarded as hopeless," while "we have the destiny of the party, in its new form, in our hands." "With the right policy by the incoming Administration," chorused a Vermont leader, "the locofoco party will never see daylight again."

The modern observer can savor the irony of such predictions. Within a year of Taylor's victory, hopes raised by Whigs' performance in 1848 would be dashed. Within four years, they would be routed by their supposedly discredited foe in the next presidential election. Within eight, the Whig party would totally disappear as a functioning political organization. Four years after that, the perpetuity of the Union itself would be in grave jeopardy, in no small part because of Whigs' disintegration as "a great national party."

Whatever their unintended irony, such predictions provide important clues to what brought the Whig party acropper within a year of Taylor's election. Numerous Whigs rejoiced that Northerners and Southerners had stood behind the ticket despite the corrosive sectional animosity evident at the national convention, profound sectional disagreement over the Wilmot Proviso, and the new Free Soil party's threat in the North. Yet Whigs had maintained unity largely by taking very different tacks on the slavery extension issue in the North and South, and Taylor's triumph had not resolved the divisive issue itself. It could still disrupt the party along sectional lines, a potential enhanced by the Democrats, whose resilience and ability to reshape the immediate political agenda some Whigs so badly underestimated.

After 1848, Whigs' destiny lay exclusively in their own hands no more than it ever had. Interaction with Democrats had always shaped their party's history. As the "out" party after 1848, Democrats could now move to more extreme sectional stances on slavery questions to outflank Whigs in both sections. Cass' defeat, reduced Democratic support everywhere, and northern Democratic defections to the Free Soilers almost ensured that Democrats would adopt new positions that would force Whigs in both sections to respond. That necessity, in turn, enormously increased northern and southern Whigs' difficulty in finding a mutually acceptable policy on slavery extension.

To some extent, however, Whigs could determine their own fate. Here is where allusions to "a transition state" and "the party, in its new form" are instructive. Not all Whigs employed such terminology after the election, and some who did probably meant by it only that new men had finally replaced an older generation of Whig leaders symbolized by Clay and Webster. Others, however, insisted that the party's personnel and principles had been fundamentally transformed by the Taylor campaign, that the Whig party itself had been displaced by a new "Taylor party" or "Taylor Republican party." The supreme irony of statements that Taylor's victory ensured the perpetuity of the Whig party was that Taylor and most of the men he gathered around him at the highest echelons of his administration were bent on replacing the Whig party with a new and broader organization based on the coalition that they believed had brought Taylor to power.

That intention guaranteed an internal struggle for the soul of the Whig party. Countless thousands of men who loved it would not brook abandonment of its name or its principles. Some dismissed Taylor's purposes as bizarre; others condemned them as perverse. The internal conflict over the party's future direction decisively shaped disagreements over the administration's policy initiatives, including its policy on slavery extension. More immediately, it influenced the incoming administration's dispensation of patronage. The unseemly scramble for the victor's spoils that immediately developed among hungry Whig office seekers engendered bitter internal divisions within the party in almost every state. Some of those battles reflected and intensified long-established factional rivalries. More generally, they represented conflicts between self-styled original Taylor men, including Democrats, nativists, and political newcomers, bent on changing the Whig party, and orthodox regulars, who had often preferred other candidates for the nomination and who were determined to resist such change and to retain control of the organization. At the same time that Whigs confronted aggressive new challenges from the Democrats and Free Soilers on the slavery extension issue, that is, they suffered debilitating internal fragmentation. The result, by the time Zachary Taylor sent his first annual message to Congress in December 1849, was the loss of much of the promise that had inspired rhapsodic predictions after the victories of 1848.

The combination of external challenge and internal division that would wrack the Whig party appeared even before Taylor's inauguration on March 5, 1849. Developments during the second session of the Thirtieth Congress from December 1848 to March 1849 and within a large number of states exposed the shoals that lay ahead by intensifying intraparty sectional and state factional divisions that ultimately helped destroy the American Whig party. Simultaneously, the maneuvering to determine the composition of Taylor's cabinet not only confirmed the judgment of a Bostonian that the Whig party could be rent "by the jealousies, plans, & counterplots of our great politicians to thwart each other." It also revealed deep disagreement over the kind of administration different Whigs envisioned.²

I

If any Whigs harbored illusions that they controlled their own destiny or that common support for the Taylor-Fillmore ticket might end sectional conflict over slavery expansion, the second session of the Thirtieth Congress quickly dispelled them. Sobered by Free Soil incursions into their respective ranks, northern Whig and Democratic congressmen returned to Washington determined to demonstrate their commitment to the Wilmot Proviso or to settle the territorial issue in a way that undermined the third party's rationale. Early in the session, for example, Senator Stephen Douglas, head of the Illinois Democratic party, which had been so jolted by large defections to the Van Buren ticket, introduced a bill that would immediately admit the entire Mexican Cession as a single state of California and thereby skip the territorial stage to which Congress might apply the Proviso. Meanwhile, northern Whigs, who scorned Douglas' plan as a pusillanimous dodge, called on their representatives in the House to push legislation organizing territorial governments with the Wilmot Proviso attached to solve the issue and undercut the Free Soilers.³

Free Soilers, in turn, intended to maintain pressure on their major party rivals. Both John Gorham Palfrey and Joshua Giddings unsuccessfully attempted to introduce bills to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia. To deflect that threat, the Whig-dominated northern majority passed a resolution instructing the committee on territories to report bills for California and New Mexico with the Wilmot Proviso attached. Then, on December 21, a New York Whig named Daniel Gott, who had won reelection in 1848 with less than 43 percent of the vote over a strong Free Soil challenger, moved a resolution instructing the House committee on the District of Columbia to report legislation abolishing the slave trade there. Passage of the Gott resolution ignited southern protests, which quickly evolved into an effort by southern Democrats to embarrass southern Whigs.⁴

The political situation in most southern states changed immediately after the presidential election. Blaming their defeat on Whigs' artful ambiguity on the Proviso and on the inadequacy of Lewis Cass' popular sovereignty formula, southern Democrats determined to gain explicit guarantees of southern equality in the territories and to expose the readiness of Whigs to betray Southern Rights. Across the South, Democratic newspapers increased their warnings that Taylor and his Whig supporters would accept the Proviso. Democrats in Florida, Virginia, and elsewhere pushed resolutions through state legislatures demanding formal resistance should the Proviso pass Congress, thus raising the specter of secession. Simultaneously, southern Democrats abandoned popular sovereignty, and more and more of them demanded the extension of the Missouri Compromise line to the Pacific Coast as the only equitable solution for the Mexican Cession, a demand President Polk endorsed in his final message to Congress that December.⁵

Southern Democratic congressmen continued this offensive when they returned to Washington. Virginia Democratic Senator James M. Mason privately told Vice President George M. Dallas that he would work for Virginia's secession if territorial legislation barring slavery were passed. Southern Democrats also rejected Douglas' statehood proposal as merely a disguised attempt to achieve the same end—barring slavery from the Mexican Cession. As a Georgian wrote Democratic Representative Howell Cobb, slaveholders were "wrought up, by the late movements in Congress, into a greater jealousy of their rights." They spurned immediate statehood for the Cession even if it avoided the Proviso, because "the whole population that is to decide the question [of slavery in California] is north of 36 ½ degrees, and the North gets the whole territory as a matter of course." Southerners therefore banded together to defeat those Northerners present in the Senate and to consign Douglas' bill to the southern-dominated judiciary committee, which everyone knew would bury it without floor action.

Incensed by northern proposals for the Mexican Cession in both the House and Senate, southern Democrats were further infuriated by northern support for Gott's resolution on December 21. John C. Calhoun seized on this anger to renew his effort to break up both major parties in the South and to unite Southerners in a separate party. With the aid of Mississippi's Henry Foote, he called a caucus of all Southerners in the House and Senate for the night of December 22 to formulate a southern ultimatum that denounced northern aggression. Calhoun's initiative created a quandary for southern Whigs, who found Gott's resolution as reprehensible as did southern Democrats. Would they remain loyal to their fellow Whigs, who were Northerners, or to their fellow Southerners, who were Democrats?

From the start, as Calhoun himself admitted, the vast majority of southern Whigs wanted no part of the caucus. They regarded it as a preemptive strike to disrupt the Whig party and wreck Taylor's administration before he was inaugurated. "Their real object," complained Calhoun, "is to keep the two wings of their party, North & South, together." Most southern Whigs wanted to postpone any action on slavery until after Taylor took office. "We feel secure under General Taylor," Georgia's Alexander Stephens wrote Crittenden. "We are determined to insist upon his controlling the Question." The southern Democrats who embraced Calhoun's movement, echoed Robert Toombs, acted "not on the conviction that Genl. T. can not settle our sectional difficulties, but that he can do it. They do not wish it settled."

Although southern and northern Whigs alike considered Calhoun's caucus movement "shaped for mere party effect," they disagreed about the proper response to it. Some, like North Carolina's David Outlaw, who was "opposed to geographical parties, or anything which tends to form them," and his fellow North Carolinian Senator George Badger, who considered Calhoun "absolutely deranged" on any matter "concerning niggery" and who denounced the meeting as "insane & dangerous," refused to attend. Others, including the Georgians Stephens, Toombs, and Berrien, Clayton of Delaware, and the Kentuckians Thomas Metcalfe and Joseph R. Underwood, went to prevent or dilute any action.

All told, 69 of 124 southern congressmen attended the initial meeting on December 22, which decided that a committee chaired by Calhoun would prepare an address to the Southerners' constituents. When Calhoun's address was reported to a second meeting of the caucus on January 15, Whigs and moderate Democrats condemned it as too radical and sent it back to committee for revision. There, Berrien wrote what Toombs carped was "a weak milk & water address to the whole Union," but Calhoun and his more extreme Democratic adherents rejected the substitute statement as too conciliatory and insisted on issuing Calhoun's original Address to the People of the Southern States.¹⁰

Ultimately, southern unity broke down completely, and three separate statements were issued to the public. The most important, Calhoun's Southern Address, rehearsed a long series of supposed northern aggressions against Southern Rights and slavery and warned that the Union's preservation depended upon their cessation. It demanded that slaveholders have equal access to the Mexican Cession. "What then we do insist on," Calhoun declared, "is, not to extend slavery," but that slaveholders not be prohibited merely because they owned slaves. Such a denial of equal rights would sink Southerners "from being equals, into a subordinate and dependent condition." More significant than the specifics of the Address was its overall tone. Northern aggressions, warned Calhoun, were leading inevitably to the horrors of abolition and racial equality. Southerners must unite to prevent that cataclysm, and they were justified in using any method of resistance, regardless of the consequences, because their "property, prosperity, equality, liberty, and safety" were at stake. The Address implied, in short, that any Southerner who did not unite in defense of slavery was a traitor to his section and that secession itself might be required to protect the South.¹¹

If Calhoun intended his address as a challenge to the honor of southern Whigs, they refused to accept it. So did many southern Democrats. Only 48 of 124 southern congressmen signed the Southern Address, which appeared on February 4, and that total included only two of forty-eight southern Whigs. Some Whigs endorsed Berrien's statement, which was published later, while four Democrats also issued a circular defending those Democrats who refused to sign the Address. Many of these Democrats, significantly, represented districts where nonslave-holders were in a preponderant majority, and they complained that raising the specter of disunion would smash the Democratic party in those regions. 12

"We have completely foiled Calhoun in his miserable attempt to form a Southern party," gloated Toombs. What the Whig refusal to sign the Southern Address did instead, as observers both inside and outside Washington immediately noted, was to hand southern Democrats a weapon with which to bludgeon southern Whigs. From Virginia to Georgia, from Florida to Louisiana, Democratic papers attacked the Whigs for betraying Southern Rights and declared support of the Address a test to obtain Democratic nomination for office. That theme of treachery remained central to Democratic campaigns throughout 1849.¹³

Southern Whigs had to respond to those assaults or risk defeat in the congressional and gubernatorial elections impending in virtually every slave state in the summer or fall of 1849. Although Whigs had captured the majority of House seats filled in 1848, their continued control of the House depended on the results in 1849, and most of the congressional elections were scheduled for the South. Southern Whigs faced almost certain defeat unless they demonstrated their own loyalty to Southern Rights or found a way to eliminate the immediate issues that gave weight to Democratic criticism. The northern threat to the slave trade in the District of Columbia was defused when enough Northerners in the House retreated and voted to reconsider the Gott resolution, thereby consigning it, in the words of Nathan K. Hall, "to the tomb of the Catapults." But the explosive slavery extension question remained, and southern Democrats immediately charged that Whigs' refusal to sign the Southern Address proved they would betray the South on the territorial issue. Most southern Whigs had returned to Congress prepared to postpone any action on the Mexican Cession until after Taylor took office. But because of their jeopardy in the impending elections of 1849 and the increasing threat that this "dangerous subject" posed "to our beloved country," they could no longer wait for him to formulate a policy. 15

Northerners' determination to pass the Wilmot Proviso to neutralize Free Soilers' challenge also raised the frightening possibility that they might succeed in the next Congress and confront Taylor with the choice of signing or vetoing a bill that barred slavery from the territories. In early 1849, most southern Whigs still believed that Taylor would veto the Proviso, but if he did, they now realized, he could cripple their northern allies by increasing defections to the Free Soilers. As their refusal to sign the Southern Address indicated, they wanted to hold the national party together, but that effort would be meaningless if northern Whigs were decimated in future elections. At the same time, a small but growing number of southern Whigs that winter began to suspect that Taylor might do the unthinkable and sign the Proviso into law. Everyone realized that enactment of the Proviso with Taylor's blessing would "place the Southern Whigs in a hopeless minority." Any response Taylor made to a congressional ban on slavery in the territories, in sum, would ruin the party in one section or the other. His administration's success and the preservation of the Whigs as a national organization thus required protecting Taylor from the necessity of making a response. And the best way to do that was to settle the territorial question before he took office. 16

The solution to which southern Whigs resorted was Douglas' California proposal, which had been bottled up in the Senate since early December. Some of them, like Clayton and his frequent correspondent, Kentucky Governor Crittenden, had favored that plan from the time Douglas introduced it, but only after the majority of southern Democrats signed the Southern Address did most southern Whigs turn to it. Skipping the territorial phase and admitting the Mexican Cession at once as a single state struck Whigs as a suitable solution for a variety of reasons, even though everyone expected that California would be a free state. First, given northern Whigs' insistence on enacting the Proviso, they knew they needed Democratic support to pass the measure. Such support seemed probable, not only from northern Democrats like Douglas, who wanted to resolve the territorial issue permanently in order to undermine the Free Soil party, but also from the many southern Democrats who rejected the Southern Address as bad politics and a threat to the Union. Furthermore, the prospect of blocking slavery extension and gaining a new free state might even win over support from northern Whigs like Nathan Hall, who feared the disruptive impact of the territorial issue as much as southern Whigs.

Second, virtually all southern Whigs, convinced "that no sensible man would carry his slaves there if he could," had always regarded the question of slavery extension into the Mexican Cession as symbolic rather than substantive. As Toombs told Crittenden when he described the bill southern Whigs planned to introduce, "It cannot be a slave country; we have only the point of honor to save; this will save it, and rescue the country from all danger of agitation."¹⁷

Third, if they passed their proposal, they might be able to claim concrete as well as symbolic gains for the South—not just an end to northern aggressions but the actual expansion of the area in which slavery was legal. That paradox is explained by the ambiguity of what men meant by the "territory" in the Mexican Cession that was to be included in the state of California. Texas, a slave state, claimed all the land east of the Rio Grande River as its own, an area that encompassed about a fourth of the former Mexican province of New Mexico and half of the present state of New Mexico, including Santa Fe. At the beginning of the congressional session, residents of New Mexico petitioned for the establishment of civil government in the former Mexican province and asked Congress to protect them from the introduction of slavery into it. Since the petitioners explicitly denied that any of New Mexico belonged to Texas, outraged Southerners in Congress vowed never to tolerate the surrender of lands legally owned by Texas. From the point of view of Southerners, in short, not all of the land acquired in the Mexican Cession had been ceded to the United States government. A healthy chunk of it belonged to the slave state of Texas and hence would never be included in the new free state of California.18

The bill southern Whigs eventually introduced blandly—and imprecisely—spoke of erecting a new state "out of and including all that territory ceded to the United States by the recent treaty of peace." Toombs, a major proponent and engineer of the southern Whig plan, explicitly denied that "that territory" included the areas claimed by Texas. He wrote Crittenden on January 22 that the state of California to be proposed in the bill would encompass only the area west of the Sierra Madre Mountains. "This will leave out a very narrow strip, not averaging more than 15 or 20 miles, between this California line and the Rio Grande line of Texas. This Texas line the Democrats are committed to, and some of our very worst Northern Whigs (Corwin, etc.) say, if that line is established they will vote this slip with it to Texas." When southern Whigs proposed to admit the Mexican Cession immediately as a single free state, that is, they by no means envisioned barring slavery from all of the land won from Mexico. They would also be enlarging Texas.¹⁹

Because Douglas' bill was irretrievably mired in the Senate and because southern Whigs wanted the credit for solving the issue for themselves, they moved in the House, which Whigs controlled. On February 7, three days after publication of the Southern Address, Representative William Ballard Preston of Virginia, one of the original Young Indians and soon to be secretary of the Navy in Taylor's administration, introduced the Whigs' measure and defended it as the "only door" through which the rival sections could reach a mutually acceptable solution on the divisive territorial issue. Despite Preston's passionate entreaties to Northerners to give up the unnecessary Proviso, despite southern Whigs' optimism about the effect of Preston's speech, and despite backing for some sort of statehood bill from President Polk, important Democratic newspapers, and many Democrats in Congress, Preston's bill failed because of northern Whigs' implacable opposition. Whether they recognized its implications for enlarging Texas or feared that any conciliatory step might leave them vulnerable to the Free Soilers, they insisted that the Proviso be applied to the Cession. When Preston's bill came up for a vote on February 27, only five days before Congress adjourned, northern Whigs successfully amended it by barring slavery from the proposed state. The motion to pass the statehood plan in that amended form did not receive a single favorable vote. The Preston bill was dead—and with it the hopes of southern Whigs for settling the territorial issue before Taylor's inauguration and the 1849 elections.²⁰

Last-minute attempts to find an alternative solution proved futile. Thus the second session of the Thirtieth Congress adjourned in the early morning of March 4, 1849, without providing for the government of the Mexican Cession or resolving slavery's status there. Despite the recognition by both southern and northern Whigs that the slavery issue was tearing their party apart, they had been unable to reach an accord. So fraved were the tempers of congressmen after three months of fruitless wrangling that fistfights broke out between Northerners and Southerners in both chambers on the session's final night. "It all grew out of the Slavery question," lamented an Alabamian in Washington. "The whole matter... was disgraceful to the Congress of the United States."21 By the time Zachary Taylor was inaugurated, the façade of national party unity behind his candidacy had cracked, and the sectional fault lines dividing the party were reexposed. Taylor's administration and the next Congress would have to seek a solution to the territorial issue. And because it remained unresolved, Whigs seeking office in the elections of 1849 would have to meet the challenges from Democrats and Free Soilers on it.

II

Historians have long argued that the widening sectional rift over slavery among Whigs contributed to—and, for some, primarily caused—the Whig party's ultimate demise. Yet the sectional fault line was hardly the only intraparty split that weakened the Whigs or that intensified during the months between Taylor's election and inauguration. Even as congressional Whigs maneuvered futilely for a mutually acceptable resolution of the territorial issue, in the winter of 1848–49 state legislative sessions created or exacerbated rifts within state Whig organizations, laid the foundations for future clashes between Taylor men and orthodox Whig regulars over policy formation and patronage distribution, and demonstrated how Democratic-Free Soil alliances could jeopardize the ability of northern Whigs to control state governments. The unusual volatility and significance of state legislative sessions that winter stemmed primarily, but not exclusively, from the necessity of electing United States senators to the Thirty-First Congress in time for the special Senate session in March to confirm Taylor's cabinet selections. Those decisions had a profound impact on the Whig party.

Of the senatorial elections with relevance for the Whigs, the least significant occurred in Vermont and Florida. Even those, however, illustrated the factional or personal infighting that proved so pernicious to state Whig organizations everywhere and the subsequent consequences such choices could have. Despite the emergence of the Free Soil party and the reduction of the Whigs' share of the popular vote, Whigs dominated both houses of Vermont's legislature after the 1848 elections. Such control virtually ensured the election of a Whig senator, and that certainty fueled the ambitions of rival aspirants. Three-term Congressman Jacob Collamer, who had not been renominated in 1848, angled for the seat of incumbent Whig Senator William Upham, much to the latter's annoyance. Upham fended off that challenge and won reelection, but the result left the disappointed Collamer, a power in the Vermont Whig party, unemployed. By a process of elimination, the starchy and conceited Collamer would emerge as the lone New Englander in Taylor's cabinet. As postmaster general, Collamer would have control over more federal jobs than anyone else in the administration. It was a position that required tact and a touch the Vermonter lacked.²²

With a margin of thirty-six to twenty-three on a joint ballot over the Democrats, Florida's Whigs had their first opportunity in December 1848 to send a Whig to the Senate. Whig legislators, however, fragmented over regional and personal rivalries. Such divisions might have been overcome had the state's most popular Whig, Representative E. Carrington Cabell, theretofore a moderate on the sectional issue and an ardent Taylor man, consented to move up to the Senate. His unwillingness to do so prevented the squabbling Whigs from uniting behind a single choice and allowed the Democratic minority to dictate the winner. The first attempt at an election ended in a deadlock among four Whig contenders. The second saw twenty-two Democrats combine with eight Whigs to elect Jackson Morton over George T. Ward, the choice of the Whig majority and a much firmer proponent of Whig principles than Morton. Indebted for his election primarily to Democrats, Morton would vote like most southern Democrats rather than like most southern Whigs on the slavery issue during the momentous Thirty-First Congress.²³

North Carolina's Whigs almost suffered a similar fiasco. Like Vermont, North Carolina had been one of the Whigs' most reliable strongholds during the 1840s, yet there too personal animosities and increasingly virulent regional tensions rent the party. As in Florida, Whigs from the eastern and western portions of the state resented the control that Whigs from its central counties exercised over the state party. To many eastern and western Whigs a conspiracy of the "Raleigh Clique" to monopolize all the state's important offices was evidenced in 1848 by the interim appointment of William M. Battle to the state supreme court and by Charles Manly's gubernatorial nomination—both from Orange and Wake counties near Raleigh.²⁴

But more than thirst for office fueled these regional tensions. Mountainous western North Carolina had consistently been the state's Whig stronghold, in large part because Whigs promised to subsidize transportation development.²⁵ Whig legislators had faithfully voted expenditures for railroad and turnpike construction, but by the end of 1848 the western region had been grossly short-changed in the allocation of funds. The emergence of the free suffrage issue, which almost cost Manly's election in 1848, also increased regional tension. Western Whigs not only protested Manly's initial opposition to free suffrage; they introduced the demand for a reapportionment of the legislature based on the white population instead of the federal ratio, which counted three-fifths of the slaves, a demand opposed by Whigs in the Piedmont and eastern coastal plain alike. After Manly's narrow escape in the August election, Whig Congressman Thomas Clingman of Asheville, a self-proclaimed champion of western interests against central domination, instructed his paper to keep up the cry for reapportionment on the white basis. "Should the clique at Raleigh throw themselves in opposition to the movement," he warned Senator Willie P. Mangum, "it will damage them."²⁶

By the time the North Carolina legislature assembled in December 1848 to elect a senator and a permanent supreme court justice, its Whig members were "in a state of shameful disorganization." Yet the Whigs required the strictest cohesion to control events, for the senate was evenly divided 25–25, while the Whigs possessed only a one-vote majority in the house, 60–59. Intraparty dissensions quickly took their toll. Most Whigs favored the election of Judge Richmond Pearson, a westerner, to the supreme court over Graham's appointee, Battle, but some clung to Battle even after the embarrassed judge withdrew from the contest. Finally, Pearson was elected with the aid of a few Democratic votes. Enraged by the stubborn opposition of Battle's friends to Pearson, a few Whigs then aided the Democrats to elect their own John Ellis over Battle to Pearson's now-vacant seat on the superior court.²⁷

The debacle in the selection of judges caused Whigs grave anxiety about the senatorial election. The candidate of the Whig caucus was incumbent Senator George E. Badger, but Whig observers in Raleigh predicted his defeat since numerous Whigs opposed him. Many still fumed over his domineering effort to steamroll the state convention in February 1848 into nominating his kinsman, Edward Stanly, for governor and endorsing Taylor over Clay for president. Some complained about his public admission that the Wilmot Proviso was constitutional and about his vote against the Clayton Compromise in the summer, both of which seemed betrayals of Southern Rights. Primarily, Whigs disliked Badger because he "is at the head of this central influence," which "many Whigs are now execrating."

When the balloting for senator commenced, two or three Whigs refused to support him, thus denying him the necessary majority. Perhaps because Democrats feared unifying the Whigs behind Badger, they did not nominate a candidate of their own. Instead, they fomented Whig disarray by backing other Whigs against him. That strategy opened up an opportunity for the ambitious Clingman, who rushed back to Raleigh from Washington to engineer a coalition between Democrats and western Whigs behind his own elevation to the Senate. Defending his bid as an act of justice to western Whigs, Clingman bargained blatantly with the Democrats, and he willingly provided written answers to their questions about his positions on economic issues and the territorial question. Evasively ambiguous on the tariff and subtreasury, Clingman was forthright in his denunciation of the Wilmot Proviso as an unconstitutional and tyrannical attempt to enslave white Southerners to northern domination. Its passage, he declared, would necessitate the most extreme southern resistance. Clingman had assumed this defiant stance a year earlier in a congressional speech, but because it was more congruent with the position southern Democrats were then taking on the territorial issue than that of any other North Carolina Whigs, increasing numbers of Democratic legislators began to vote for Clingman on subsequent ballots for senator. Never enough Democrats, however, to bring Clingman victory. Finally Clingman admitted defeat, withdrew from the race, and urged one of his western Whig supporters to go for Badger. Together with a few Democratic abstentions, that was enough to elect Badger on the fifth and final ballot.²⁹

Even though most Whigs had stood lovally by Badger and condemned Clingman for his opportunistic trafficking with Democrats, the damage to Whig unity continued after Badger's election. Clingman published an address to his western constituents that justified his course, damned the Raleigh Clique's monopolistic power, and urged western Whigs to send men to the legislature who would resist its attempts to enslave them. Estranged from the power structure of the state Whig party, Clingman thereafter declared himself an independent, and in the mid-1850s he joined the Democrats. A spellbinding orator who brilliantly posed as the defender of his constituents' liberty and equality from the menace of enslavement, whether it came from the North or central North Carolina, Clingman easily withstood repeated Whig attempts to unseat him. Finally, in the late 1850s, the Democrats elevated him to the Senate seat he had long coveted. Far more disastrous to Whig fortunes in the short term than Clingman's defection, the regional animosities that had boiled over in the 1848-49 legislative session caused eastern and western Whigs in 1850 to force a restructuring of the state central committee that demolished the influence of Raleigh Whigs and gutted the committee's ability to raise funds or coordinate statewide campaigns. In a state as closely competitive as North Carolina, this suicidal emasculation of the party's organizational apparatus virtually ensured electoral defeat.30

The contest for senator in Pennsylvania reflected personal jealousies rather than regional rivalries, but its outcome engendered a factional struggle that wracked the state Whig party for the next four years. To an extent this battle pitted younger men and newcomers, who had joined or aligned with the Whig party during the 1848 campaign, against older Whig regulars who had often worked for the party since the 1830s, veterans whom the younger men disparaged as "Hunkers." Little separated these groups in terms of state or national policy at the end of 1848, when all Pennsylvania Whigs desperately sought restoration of the Tariff of 1842 and economic recovery. They contended instead for control of the elective and appointive offices at the party's disposal. The leader and hero of ambitious younger Whigs was newly elected Governor William F. Iohnston, the recent convert from the Democrats, whom they credited with redeeming the state from Democratic rule and for being "an independent man" rather than "an ultra and violent Whig." The man who became champion of the Whig regulars was the Whig Pennsylvania elected to the Senate in January 1849, James Cooper, a thirty-eight-year-old attorney from Pottsville and a former congressman and state legislator. 31

By Cooper's own account, he had been the unanimous favorite of the state's Whigs to run for governor in 1848 when Francis Shunk resigned, but he had declined to seek the nomination because he wanted to go to the Senate instead. To help unify the Whig party behind the ex-Democrat Johnston, whom Cooper said most Whigs distrusted as a dishonest and self-serving opportunist, he had accepted Johnston's appointment as state attorney general and urged Whigs to give Johnston the gubernatorial nomination. Then, for reasons Cooper found unfathomable, Johnston had turned against him during the senatorial election and lobbied Whig legislators to vote instead for Johnston's cronies like Thaddeus

Stevens of Lancaster, the old Antimasonic fanatic, or William M. Meredith, president of the Philadelphia City Council. Despite the governor's opposition, which earned Cooper's abiding enmity, Cooper prevailed on the third ballot with all but six of the seventy Whig votes cast.³²

Johnston's opposition may have baffled Cooper, but his motives are clear. The former Democrat meant to consolidate his personal control of the state Whig party despite the apparent suspicion of many Whig state legislators. To do so, he wielded the state patronage at his command to form alliances with men outside the circle of established Whig leaders, men like Meredith, Stevens, and Cornelius Darragh, head of the young Whig faction in Pittsburgh, whom Johnston appointed state attorney general to replace Cooper. Johnston's primary goal after Taylor's election, however, was to monopolize the federal patronage allotted to Pennsylvania, including an expected cabinet post. He alone could save the Pennsylvania Whig party "from positive and absolute destruction," the ambitious governor immodestly informed Crittenden in Ianuary. Pennsylvania's man in the cabinet must not come "from among those personally hostile to me." Johnston thus wanted no Whig as United States senator from Pennsylvania who might challenge his control of federal patronage in the state. As a two-term congressman and four-term state legislator, Cooper had a wide network of friends and an independent power base in the Whig party that placed him securely beyond the governor's control. Hence, Johnston unsuccessfully tried to block Cooper's elevation to the Senate.33

Cooper's victory set the stage for a titanic battle between Pennsylvania's Whig governor and Whig senator for the federal offices that Taylor's administration dispensed to the state. Long-time tillers in the Pennsylvania Whig vineyard resented the effort of the newcomer Johnston to build a personal machine, but they could do little to thwart his appointive powers as governor. Therefore, they had to look to federal offices to offset his command of the state spoils. To do that, they necessarily embraced Cooper as their point man in Washington. During Taylor's presidency, Johnston would handily prevail in this struggle, but such a divisive contest between the state's two most prominent Whig politicians boded ill for the party's ability to retain control of a normally Democratic state. The fight over patronage eventually engendered divisions among Pennsylvania's Whigs over the proper resolution of the territorial issue in 1850 and subsequently over the party's presidential nominee in 1852. What began as a battle over patronage became an even more destructive battle over policy and the party's future.

The struggle between Johnston and Cooper in Pennsylvania paled in ferocity to the prolonged and open factional warfare among New York's Whigs over their new senator. For two months, friends of Vice President-elect Fillmore and their conservative allies among Clay Whigs in New York City and the Hudson Valley battled the rival Seward-Weed wing to a standstill. Appalled by "the bitterness of this strife at Albany," unaligned New York Whigs declared that unless the dispute was resolved, "the Whig party will be severed."³⁴

Both sides considered the stakes enormous. Seward and Weed dreaded Fillmore's impending accession to the vice presidency because they feared that "the ascendancy of factious councils" in the new administration would wreck their own wing of the New York party through the allotment of federal appointments in the state. Their fear was justified. A month after Taylor's triumph, he promised to consult Fillmore on patronage for the state and to allow him to attend cabinet meetings at which the spoils would be distributed. To check Fillmore's influence in Washington, Weed wanted Seward in the Senate. Rejoicing that Fillmore's election finally provided a chance to smash Weed's machine. Fillmore's friends, in turn, warned him that as a senator Seward "would use his influence and abilities to build up and sustain a party opposed to your interest and the welfare of your friends in this State." Factional rivalry in New York had always involved disagreement over policy as well as competition for office, and the radicalism of Seward's antislavery statements during the 1848 campaign increased conservatives' opposition to his election. Seward had become an abolitionist, they complained. His "ultraism" would shatter Whig unity in Washington and thus destroy any prospect for a successful Taylor presidency. "Seward will be an active 'Architect of ruin' if he comes to the Senate in the present condition of things," warned Congressman Nathan K. Hall from Washington. "Seward will come here to demagogue. He will distract & divide the party and next to Clay is the worst man we or any other people can send to the Senate."35

Before the legislature convened, Fillmore papers like the Buffalo Commercial Advertiser and Rochester American came out publicly against Seward's election. Instead, they and most Fillmorites promoted John A. Collier of Binghamton, a former congressman and state comptroller, who had nominated Fillmore for the vice presidency at the national convention to foil Weed's plans and then served as a presidential elector on the ticket Weed had constructed as a sop to conservatives. Although Fillmore, who remained at Albany until late February to complete important duties as state comptroller, wanted to avoid the appearance of publicly interfering in the contest, he too preferred Collier and was determined at the very least to find some office for his loyal friend. The Sewardites, in turn, regarded Collier with loathing and contempt as an intellectually unqualified, dishonest, and undignified "libertine," "a low buffoon," whose "morals are notoriously profligate to the lowest degree."

Because Whigs held overwhelming majorities in both houses of the new legislature, the struggle for the nomination focused on Whigs' legislative caucus. Weed's organization had skillfully packed Whig assembly tickets the previous fall with firm Seward men, and the Albany editor was confident of ultimate victory. Conservative Whigs dominated the Whig delegation in the state senate, however, and they refused to go into caucus with their house colleagues in order to prevent Seward's inevitable nomination. This fractious and widely publicized deadlock embarrassed unaligned New York Whigs who were concerned primarily with preserving party unity, and they pleaded with the politicians in Albany to find some other man. But Weed, who managed the effort for Seward at Albany, stood resolutely by his man.³⁷

Neither Weed nor Fillmore wanted to push the issue to a head. Both hoped to prevent an open rupture because they feared that it could destroy any influence New York's Whigs might have with the new administration. Scornful of Collier, Weed had no wish to humiliate Fillmore. The incoming vice president's ability to exact revenge once the new administration assembled in Washington remained an ominous threat. Besides, he had to work with Fillmore as long as he remained comptroller, for the comptroller headed the canal board that dispensed contracts for canal repairs that winter. Those contracts were among the juiciest patronage plums available to the state Whig party. Finally, the legislature would elect not only a senator but also a new comptroller to replace Fillmore, and in terms of control over state patronage, the comptrollership was the most powerful office in the state. Weed feared that if the Sewardites rode roughshod over Fillmore's friends in the Senate election, they would retaliate on the comptrollership, where Weed hoped to place the self-proclaimed neutral Washington Hunt.³⁸

Fillmore's situation was more awkward, and his motives are more difficult to infer. Millard Fillmore was a man of considerable intelligence but weak will. His report as comptroller that winter, for example, contained a brilliantly lucid analysis of the state's safety fund and free banking systems that could have provided a blueprint for the later National Banking System. As a politician, however, the unaggressive Fillmore was no match for the shrewd Weed. Later, even his disgruntled friends would accuse him of timidity and naiveté, and it is difficult to decide which defect was more grave. After the presidential election, for example, Fillmore wrote Taylor praising the mortal enemies Weed and Collier as the two men most responsible for his victory in New York. That winter his friends urged him to threaten Whig legislators with future patronage retaliation unless they supported Collier, but early on he recognized that Collier could not win and refused. Instead, to avert an open defeat at the hands of the Sewardites that might discredit him with Taylor, Fillmore sought a face-saving compromise. He asked Weed to support Collier or his law partner Nathan Hall, who had not sought reelection to Congress in 1848, for the comptrollership, but Weed refused to allow an open Fillmore ally in that important post. Then Fillmore sought pledges of Weed's help in securing a federal job, the lucrative post of naval officer at New York City, for Collier and pledges of Seward's cooperation at Washington.³⁹

Finally, under the auspices of Governor Hamilton Fish, a deal was worked out that allowed Seward's election. The patrician Fish did not belong to the Seward-Weed circle, and like Fillmore and his friends he was worried about the "ultraism" of Seward's antislavery statements during the campaign. But Fish could count votes, and he knew Seward had them. To end the unseemly and dangerous infighting, he called Weed, Fillmore, and the leaders of their respective factions in the legislature to a meeting at his home to hammer out a compromise. In return for a cessation of the conservative resistance to Seward and Hunt, it was arranged that Seward would write a letter to Albany pledging not to agitate for abolition in the Senate and to support the Taylor administration in which, of course, Fillmore was to be a major figure. Fish and Fillmore would then circulate the letter to mollify Seward's conservative opponents. In addition, it was agreed that Collier could have the Naval Office at New York City. Significantly, the details of this last understanding were murky. Fillmore left the meeting before they were worked out, but his friends there later recalled that Weed had pledged that Seward would help Fillmore get the appointment for Collier. Weed, in turn, asserted that he had promised only that Seward would not block it; Fillmore himself must secure the post for Collier if he could. Later, after Seward's election, he and Fillmore met at Weed's house and agreed to consult with each other on New York appointments when they got to Washington. Carrying away decidedly different interpretations of what this agreement implied, the two rivals set off for Washington.40

Whatever the implications of the senatorial decisions in Vermont, Florida, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, and New York for the Whigs' future, that winter Whigs around the country most closely watched the elections in Kentucky and Ohio. Although only the Ohio River separated the two states geographically, their respective selections evoked interest for quite different reasons. Whigs looked to Ohio for clues to how northern Whigs and Free Soilers might interact now that the 1848 elections were over. To many, Kentucky's choice would determine the success of Taylor's administration and the subsequent direction of the national Whig party.

Within weeks of the presidential election, it became clear that Henry Clay, who had not held public office since 1843, desired to return to the Senate in the seat Crittenden had vacated to become governor. Whigs dominated both houses of Kentucky's legislature, and Clay's numerous friends, fully aware of his mortification at Taylor's nomination, were determined to bestow that honor upon him. With Taylor safely elected, even his Kentucky Whig supporters were willing to give Clay one last opportunity to serve. Thus no serious opposition organized within the state to stop Clay, and his election was more coronation than contest.⁴¹

Outside Kentucky, Clay's prospective return to the Senate struck Whigs with alarm and dread. Recalling Clay's domineering attitude toward Harrison in the winter of 1840–41 and his belligerence toward the apostate Tyler that helped turn the Whigs' first occupation of the White House into a nightmare, they foresaw disaster. More than that, the presence of Webster and Clay together again in the Senate betokened a resurrection of an older generation of National Republican leaders who might resist what many younger Whigs considered salutary changes in men and measures promised by Taylor's election. If "ultra Whigs, of the Clay and Webster school of politics" should "give direction to the 'Taylor Republican Party,' " one New Yorker warned Fillmore, "its fate can easily be foretold."

Southerners who had originally boomed Taylor's nomination over Clay rang most of these alarms: Clayton of Delaware, Reverdy Johnson of Maryland, John Pendleton of Virginia, William B. Campbell of Tennessee, Toombs and Stephens of Georgia, Balie Peyton and Albert T. Burnley of Louisiana. While some warned that Clay would complicate settlement of the territorial issue by siding with northern Whigs, the dominant concern was the inevitable friction that would emerge between Taylor and Clay. Clay, they shrieked, was "vindictive & peevish." He would go "into the Senate with unkind & revengeful feelings towards Genl. Taylor" and "throw as many difficulties in Taylor's path" as possible. "He will try to rule or ruin & his rule will be ruin." According to Pendleton, every Whig in Washington for the short congressional session wanted to keep Clay shelved on his Ashland estate. Many northern Whigs, including Fillmore's law partner Nathan Hall, condemned the notion of Clay's election as vehemently as did Southerners. If Clay insisted upon returning to the Senate, moaned New Iersey Senator William L. Dayton, "it would seem as if he had almost been born for the destruction of his friends & is resolved not to disappoint his destiny.''43

These apocalyptic predictions had some basis in fact. Though deeply humiliated by Taylor's nomination, Clay was willing to support the new administration, particularly since he sought a diplomatic post for his son James, but he and his friends intended to cooperate only so long as Taylor faithfully ran what they considered a Whig administration. That meant adherence to traditional Whig programs and a willingness to share federal offices with all Whigs, not just original Taylor men. What they would not tolerate was an effort to proscribe old-line Whig lovalists to favor the newcomers who had boarded the Taylor bandwagon in 1847 and 1848 or especially to transform the Whig party into a personality cult built around Taylor or to foster an amorphous entity known as Taylor Republicanism that Pendleton and other Taylor men envisioned. Disgust at the attempt "to create a mere personal party" behind Taylor had fueled Clay's refusal to help in the 1848 campaign, and his closest friends also regarded it as anathema. "If the accession of Taylor, if Taylorism, should prove Jacksonism Nos. 2—fore God we will fight," proclaimed a New York Clay man shortly after Taylor's triumph. "The reappearance of Mr. Clay in the Senate," exulted Kentucky's Leslie Combs, "will be as terrific to official imbeciles and guerrilla-Whig office-seekers as would the sudden entrance of an old tom cat into a room of cheese-stealing mice & rats." To friend and foe alike, in sum, Clay's restoration to the Senate portended a clash between old-line Whig regulars, "the old politicians," and younger Whigs, along with those who had entered the party under the auspices of Taylor's No Party campaign, between those who wanted to preserve the Whig party as it had existed for over a decade and those who wanted to change and broaden it.44

In contrast, Ohio's prolonged struggle to name a successor for Democratic Senator William Allen widened the divisions among national Whig leaders over the territorial question by stiffening northern Whigs' insistence that slavery be barred from the entire Mexican Cession. It increased northern Whig adamance because it vividly demonstrated the party's vulnerability in northern states to Free Soil-Democratic coalitions and the consequent necessity of depriving the Free Soil party of its rationale. In all likelihood, the developments in Ohio, along with evidence that similar coalitions were forming in Vermont, Connecticut, and Indiana, directly influenced northern Whig behavior in Congress that winter, particularly the scuttling of Preston's statehood bill with a Proviso amendment.

Historians have long pointed to Ohio's election of the Free Soiler Salmon P. Chase to the Senate as evidence of the growing strength of northern antislavery sentiment and its ability to prostrate northern Whiggery. A recent student of Ohio politics, for example, cites Chase's election as the final nail in the coffin of the state's Whig party, the point at which the slavery issue ended Whigs' competitiveness in the state. The circumstances surrounding Chase's election, however, illuminate a different fact of great importance to a proper understanding of antebellum politics. He owed his success less to his advanced antislavery views than to the exigencies of state politics. Contrary to the assertions of some historians that Americans during the fifteen years before the Civil War were obsessed with the debate in Congress over slavery expansion, the majority of actors in the drama that unfolded at Columbus were not. Their gaze was fixed firmly on control of the state legislature, the state jobs at its disposal, and the policies it might enact for Ohio concerning banks, corporations, taxes, constitutional revision, and other subjects, not on what the state's new senator might do about the slavery issue in Washington. To a large extent, they viewed the Senate seat as a bargaining chip that might gain them advantage on what really mattered.⁴⁵

Ohio's legislative session that winter was the most tumultuous in the nation. It took over a month to select officers and appoint committees to conduct business, two months officially to validate the election of Seabury Ford as governor the previous October, and three months to name a senator. That chaos stemmed largely from an uncompromising battle between Whigs and Democrats for dominance of the state government.⁴⁶

The stage for this fierce struggle was set in February 1848 when Whigs reapportioned the legislature's house and senate districts in order to perpetuate their control. Decisively breaking from traditional gerrymanders that combined counties in legislative districts to increase a party's representation, Whigs also divided Hamilton County, which encompassed populous Cincinnati, into two districts in order to secure for the Whigs two of its five-man house delegation that had been solidly Democratic under the customary system of running at-large countywide tickets. Denouncing the tactic as tyrannical, unconstitutional, and invalid, Democrats demanded its repeal, urged Hamilton Democrats to ignore it during the 1848 legislative elections, and lambasted Whigs as revolutionary anarchists for their flagrant violation of sanctioned practice. Citing Democrats' threats to disrupt the state government and disobey the law, Whigs returned the charge, and the inflammatory rhetoric of both parties made the apportionment act the central issue in the state election that October.⁴⁷

Predictably, the election yielded disputed results. Democrats claimed all five members of Hamilton's house delegation on the basis of the countrywide vote; Whigs demanded the two from the new Cincinnati district they had created. Control of the house, and ultimately of the legislature, hinged on the resolution of this dispute, and both sides vowed to prevent its organization and the appointment of the necessary committees rather than allow the other's attempt at usurpation to succeed. Exclusive of the two contested seats, Democrats had, at most, a margin of two over the Whigs in the house and only one in the senate. Even then, eight Free Soilers in the house and three in the senate held the balance of power between the two rivals. Their leverage, ironically, derived in large part from the Whigs' own gerrymander, for the Whigs had purposely increased the representation of normally secure Whig counties in the Western Reserve, which subsequently elected Free Soil legislators.⁴⁸

All three groups quickly understood that some kind of bargaining, if not an outright coalition, between two of them was necessary. The questions were whether Whigs or Democrats would win Free Soil aid and at what price. The different priorities of the three parties and their internal divisions determined the answers to those questions. Free Soilers were indeed primarily concerned with slavery: they sought the Senate seat and repeal of the state's discriminatory black laws, which restricted various rights of Ohio's free blacks. Although all Free Soilers recognized that the three-way split of the legislature enhanced their chance of success, they disagreed about their senatorial candidate and how to achieve his election.

A few of them favored Chase's election and wanted to deal with the Democrats to secure it. Chase himself visited Columbus frequently that winter and actively promoted this strategy. The majority of Free Soilers, including six of the eight in the house, however, were former Whigs. They pushed Joshua R. Giddings for the senatorship and secured his nomination from the Free Soil caucus. The Whig-Free Soilers also wanted to preserve the new party's independence and to remain neutral in the dispute between the two major parties. They wished to nominate their own candidates for speaker of the two chambers, stand by them, and wait for one of the major parties to come to their men, a plan that resulted immediately in the election of a Free Soil speaker in the senate. Above all, they wanted no trafficking with the Democrats on state economic policy or on the disputed house seats from Cincinnati. Democrats' attempt to steal those seats, fumed a Western Reserve Free Soiler, was "the grossest corruption."

The Free Soil delegation's Whiggish hue initially fostered Whig hopes of cooperation between the two parties. At the very least, Whigs expected the Free Soilers to "act like Whigs at the organization" of the legislature. The two groups agreed on much. Aside from abolitionist and Liberty party lobbying efforts, what support there had been for repeal of the black laws during the previous ten years had come from Whigs, and during the 1848 campaign itself Whig candidates, including Ford, had advocated repeal. Like the Free Soilers, Ohio Whigs demanded congressional prohibition of slavery in the territories. Of critical importance, the Whigs did not insist on placing one of their own men in the United States Senate, and they could live with a Free Soiler who pushed enactment of the Wilmot Proviso. Friends of both Thomas Ewing and Justice John McLean would have liked to put their favorites in Allen's seat, but early on they admitted that the complexion of the legislature rendered that goal unobtainable. Whigs, therefore, were willing to concede the Senate seat to the Free Soilers in return for Free Soil help in securing what Whigs considered a far higher priority—control of the legislature. They were determined to implement their new apportionment law by seating the two Whigs from Cincinnati, to stop Democrats from repealing it, and to squelch the expected Democratic efforts to revise the state constitution and overturn Whig economic policies. As one Whig wrote Ewing, the Whigs had to compromise with the Free Soilers to save our "unequaled Banking system—an equitable and fair law of taxation—and an economical administration of state affairs" from "the wild fury of Locofocoism."50

Together, Whigs and ex-Whig Free Soilers could have easily dominated the legislature. But the proposed alliance foundered on a large rock. Although Whig-Free Soilers were willing to help Whigs seat their two men from Cincinnati in the house, they insisted on the election of Giddings to the Senate. Aside from the ambitious Chase, whom Whigs reviled, Giddings was the one Free Soiler whom they considered absolutely "out of the question" for the post. As Giddings himself realized, Whigs blamed him for wrecking their party by leading Reserve Whigs into the Free Soil camp. On his election, one Whig legislator snarled, "there can be no compromise."

To the dismay of Democratic friends of incumbent William Allen, most Democrats were also ready to sacrifice his Senate seat to the Free Soilers in return for help in securing the legislature. Aware that their traditional support for the state's black laws and their opposition to the Wilmot Proviso during the 1848 campaign posed obstacles to any bargain, they shamelessly flip-flopped. As soon as the presidential election was over, Democratic papers around the state repudiated popular sovereignty, embraced the Proviso, and endorsed repeal of the black laws. Desperation impelled their about-face. Having lost the governorship for the third consecutive time and confronting the loss of federal patronage once Taylor replaced Polk, they coveted the jobs at the disposal of the legislature—clerkships. judgeships, and state printing contracts—the last of special concern to the primary Democratic deal maker, Samuel Medary, editor of The Ohio Statesman at Columbus. To win those jobs, they needed Free Soil help in organizing the house and seating the two Democrats from Cincinnati. Allen's Senate seat seemed a small price to pay for such cooperation, especially since their somersault on the slavery issue indicated it meant little to them. More than sheer opportunism motivated the Democrats, however. Although they were prepared to "abandon the South [and] join the free soilers" on the slavery question, the year-long warfare over the recent apportionment act had invested state issues with great emotional intensity. In addition to winning jobs, therefore, they were determined to repeal it, rewrite the state constitution, and roll back Whig economic legislation.52

Prepared though they were to support a Free Soiler for the Senate, the Democrats could not stomach Giddings. Giddings' ardent hatred of slavery and the Slave Power obviously was not at issue. Rather, it was his previous prominence as a Whig and a powerful exponent of Whig economic policy. Salmon Chase was another matter because Chase avidly sought a coalition between Democrats and Free Soilers to promote his own chances of election. He called a state Free Soil convention to meet at Columbus during December while the legislature was in session and wrote its platform to curry favor with the Democrats. To the disgust of former Whigs in the new party, that platform took the Democratic position on everything most dear to Ohio Democrats. It demanded a new constitutional convention, a new tax law, and a ten-hour act for workers; it denounced aid to corporations and the Whigs' recent bank law. Chase also persuaded the two non-Whigs among the Free Soilers' house delegation to oppose the apportionment act and to help the Democrats organize the house. With Chase closely monitoring the negotiations, those two Free Soilers then worked out a bargain with the Democrats that caused both Whig-Free Soilers and Whigs to sputter in rage. In return for Democratic help in electing Chase to the Senate and repealing the black laws. the two renegade Free Soilers, Norton Townshend and John Morse-and only those two of the eight Free Soilers—helped the Democrats elect a Democratic speaker of the house, seat the two Democratic representatives from Cincinnati, place two Democrats on the state supreme court, award a number of district judgeships to Democrats, and make Medary the senate's printer. 53

Ohio Whigs regarded the consummation of this bargain and the election of Chase, whom they despised, as significant defeats. Although they could have stopped it by agreeing to support Giddings, they blamed Democratic opportunism and Chase's self-serving ambition instead. They vilified the Free Soil-Democratic coalition as "the vilest combination of cutthroat demagogues that ever disgraced or ruled any land." Most important, their defeat convinced them that they must destroy the Free Soil party and win back Whig defectors to have any chance in Ohio. "Unless something is done speedily and efficiently, we are badly whipped in Ohio for some year or two to come," Oran Follett frantically warned Ewing. What had to be done, they repeatedly told members of the Taylor administration, was to cut the ground from under the Free Soilers on the slavery issue. Taylor had to sign the Wilmot Proviso into law when the new Congress met or, preferably, devise a plan that barred slavery from the entire Mexican Cession even before it met.⁵⁴

Yet other aspects of the Ohio story merit emphasis. Although its Whigs considered action by national Whig officeholders necessary to break up the Free Soil party, what most infuriated them was not the loss of the Senate seat to Chase, but the Democrats' success in trading national offices to the Free Soilers in return for control of the state legislature. The Free Soilers promised to give "the Democrats all the offices & [to] carry out all their abominable measures provided they will elect him," moaned one Whig before the consummation of the deal. "Chase's election in itself is not so much to be deprecated although it is bad enough—but the idea of throwing the State into the hands of the locos as a consequence of it is perfectly outrageous." The Democratic-Free Soil coalition in Ohio set a pattern for similar alliances in Indiana, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Vermont, and other northern states. Free Soilers who were primarily concerned with slavery expansion, against which only the national government could act effectively, wanted national offices, whether in the House or the Senate. Northern Democrats, who had little concern with the slavery issue, always demanded state offices in return. for control of state government and the policies it promulgated was their chief goal. Certainly, the main fear of Ohio's Whigs was the Democratic threat to their programs within the state.55

That fact, in turn, argues against an interpretation that events of the 1848–49 legislative session destroyed the Whigs as a serious competitive force in Ohio politics. The acid test of the Whigs' influence was not who won appointive or elective offices, but who controlled public policy. Ex-Whigs constituted the majority of Free Soilers, and they agreed with their former colleagues about most aspects of state policy. Together the two groups had a majority in both houses, even with the seating of the two Democratic members from Cincinnati. Together they voted time and again to defeat the Democrats on the repeal of the apportionment act, on banking and currency legislation, on incorporations, on stockholder liability, and on subsidies for internal improvements. 56 The major exception to this record of effective cooperation concerned the calling of a convention to revise the state's constitution, which Whigs had long opposed. There the Free Soilers combined with Democrats to defeat the Whigs, a defeat Whigs properly regarded with alarm.⁵⁷ On the whole, however, Whigs enjoyed success on what had always mattered most to them. While a serious problem, the appearance of Free Soilers in the Ohio legislature did not eliminate Whigs' power within Ohio politics—certainly not when public policy is placed where it should be, at the center of political analysis.

IV

However portentous the actions of Congress and of various state legislatures during the winter of 1848–49, many Whigs believed that the party's success hinged on a different set of decisions to be made in the same period—the selection of Zachary Taylor's cabinet. Now that Taylor had served as the Whigs' standard bearer, even fervent proponents of his nomination—Crittenden, Truman Smith, John Pendleton, Alexander Stephens, and Alexander C. Bullitt, among others—admitted that his political inexperience required the appointment of seasoned advisors. Nor did most Whigs trust a novice like Taylor to pick his official team by himself. They bombarded Crittenden, Fillmore, and Smith with conflicting suggestions and importuned them to convince Taylor to wait until he came to Washington and conferred with Whig politicos before making any final decisions. Initially, the apparently unassuming Taylor seemed willing to follow that course. He informed Fillmore and Smith that, with the exception of one man, he would postpone construction of the cabinet until he arrived in the capital in late February. That delay allowed time for rival Whigs to jockey for position. Not just the outcome but also the process of selecting the cabinet had serious consequences for the party.⁵⁸

Agreeing upon the necessity of surrounding Taylor with knowledgeable political hands. Whigs differed sharply about the cabinet's optimal composition. In part their bickering reflected difficult problems that confront any incoming presidential administration. To which states and regions should the six cabinet posts be distributed? Was it better to use them to reward Whigs in party strongholds like Massachusetts and North Carolina for faithful service, to acknowledge the role of key swing states like Georgia and Pennsylvania in putting Taylor over the top, or to boost Whigs in Democratic states like Maine or Virginia by giving them a prestigious cabinet appointment? Whigs from each type of state vigorously advanced their respective claims. Those from the rapidly growing and Democratic midwestern states of Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, and Iowa were especially vociferous in their clamor for an authentic Westerner in the cabinet. Without one, they contended, the party would never have a chance in a region whose representation in the House and thus in the Electoral College was certain to increase after the impending 1850 census. All of the competing claims could not be satisfied; Taylor and his advisors were bound to offend some Whigs.

Other customary tensions complicated the proper geographical allocation of posts. Within individual states, personal jealousies and factional rivalries ensured strife over every potential appointee. Many Whigs also questioned the wisdom of taking talented men from Congress to serve in the administration if doing so risked losing their seats to Democrats. Beyond those concerns lay a more fundamental and rancorous conflict. Early supporters of Taylor's nomination insisted that the cabinet must be confined to original Taylor men. Backers of defeated contenders like Clay, Webster, and McLean protested just as ardently that internal party harmony could be restored only if they were also represented in the cabinet. This conflict, which would later extend to the distribution of jobs below the cabinet level, involved more than mere contention for spoils. It reflected fundamentally different strategies about how Whigs should compete with the Democrats in the future. Together these cross pressures and contentious disagreements narrowed the choices available to Taylor and almost ensured that he would not pick the best men the party had to offer.

Taylor quickly ruled out making any appointments from Louisiana or New York since he and Fillmore represented those states. But he wanted a man from the Deep South in the cabinet, and he was known to be considering three Whig congressmen from Georgia: Stephens, Toombs, and Thomas Butler King. All three had fervently supported Taylor's nomination, but King, who chaired the House Committee on Naval Affairs in the Thirtieth Congress, appeared to be the front-runner as a possible naval secretary. King, however, was not close personally to Stephens and Toombs and did not belong to their wing of the state party. Distrusting King, Stephens advised Crittenden, whom most Whigs expected to have the greatest influence on Taylor's choices, that ex-Governor George W. Crawford would be the best selection from Georgia. Largely because of Stephens' intervention, Taylor would appoint a man who later caused his administration enormous trouble.⁵⁹

Backbiting over an appointee from New England was particularly vicious. To the dismay of original Taylor men who believed the public opposed "some old issues of the Whig party, and old worn out, political Hacks like Mr. Clay and Webster,"60 some of Daniel Webster's fervent supporters boldly and unrealistically promoted him for secretary of state. Webster himself had no illusions that Taylor might appoint him. His top priority, other than obtaining a good government job for his son Fletcher, was to keep his Massachusetts rival, Abbott Lawrence, out of the cabinet. Lawrence had the advantage of being an early Taylor man, and he had been the southern Taylorites' favorite for the vice presidential nomination. Many Massachusetts and other New England Whigs thus pushed the enormously successful businessman for secretary of the Treasury. Taylorites outside of New England thought it insane to put a Massachusetts millionaire in that post. The appointment, they warned, would "revive the cry of ancient Federalism [and] Essex Juntoism." Webster, a former Federalist himself, was hardly in a position to make that case against Lawrence. Instead, he and his friends cleverly spread the word that making the wealthy textile manufacturer Treasury secretary would create an unseemly conflict of interest for the new administration, for Whigs expected the new Treasury secretary to draft a new tariff bill with higher rates for presentation to Congress in December 1849. Maine's George Evans, whom Maine Whigs were ardently promoting for a cabinet slot, would make a far better Treasury secretary, the Webster men argued. Lawrence's many advocates responded by smearing Evans as a National Republican, a Webster lackey, and a drunkard who would embarrass the administration. 61

Such subversion and countersubversion turned Taylor against both Lawrence and Evans and toward Robert C. Winthrop. Yet Winthrop's appointment raised a different problem. He had served admirably as Speaker of the House during the Thirtieth Congress, and most congressional Whigs wanted to keep him in that post if the Whigs retained control of the House. Winthrop was simply too valuable to be removed from Congress.⁶²

A similar consideration limited the chances of another contender from New England. Outside of New England itself, many Whigs preferred Connecticut's Senator-elect Truman Smith, the de facto national party chairman, whom one Whig hailed as "the Murat of the [1848] campaign" because of his brilliant leadership of the party's national committee. Whigs in and outside Congress deemed Smith the best-informed and wisest politician in the party. Even those shrewd tacticians Seward and Weed came away from conversations with Smith after the election impressed, indeed almost awed, by his sagacity and keen judgment of the party's personnel. They, the astute Georgian Stephens, and others wanted to place

Smith in the cabinet, preferably as postmaster general. That was a perfect post for the only man in the party who had corresponded with leading Whigs from every congressional district in the country when he distributed documents during the 1846 and 1848 campaigns. Local postmasters could be vital cogs in the Whig organization because they relayed political information between its center and periphery, and no one knew better than Smith which men to place in those sensitive posts.⁶³

Seward, Weed, and others wanted Smith in the cabinet for an even more important reason. With the possible exception of Crittenden, whom most Whigs recognized as Taylor's closest advisor and expected to go into the cabinet, no one in the party had done more to secure the nomination and election of Taylor than Truman Smith. No one could question his commitment to the administration's success or detect in him the jealous envy of Taylor they suspected in Webster and Clay. Unlike Crittenden and other original Taylor men, however, Smith vehemently opposed proscribing non-Taylorites from the cabinet and other federal jobs. Concerned as always with the good of the national party, he recognized the need to conciliate, rather than to exclude, other elements of the party, and to build it up in the West and in Democratic states of the South. Thus it was to Smith that Clay men, Websterites, friends of McLean, and those like Seward and Weed, who had backed no particular candidate, looked for influence with the new administration. Without question, Truman Smith's selection was the most valuable one that could have been made for the good of the Whig party. 64

Yet some Whigs feared removing Smith from the Senate, even though he was a far better party manager and strategist than floor debater or parliamentary tactician. Since Connecticut held legislative elections in April 1849, if the Democrats won control, as appeared likely that winter, they could replace Smith with a Democrat for the full six-year term. Better, those Whigs argued, to keep Smith in the Senate and look elsewhere for a postmaster general. Smith would remain in contention for a post until the very end, but the need to keep his Senate seat in Whig hands, as well as a surge of southern Whig opposition because of his votes for the Wilmot Proviso during the second session of the Thirtieth Congress, forced Taylor to look elsewhere for a New Englander. 65

Midwestern Whigs also laid claim to the postmaster generalship, and in that region, too, personal, factional, and state rivalries fueled infighting over the proper man. Some Ohio Whigs proposed Thomas Ewing on the grounds of his support for Taylor before and after the national convention and the unlikelihood that Whigs would be able to elect Ohio's new senator in the forthcoming legislature. Thus, they argued, Ewing would be a far better appointment than Tom Corwin, who was already secure in the Senate. Other Ohio Whigs, like Cincinnati's Thomas B. Stevenson, feared the damage that the conservative Ewing might inflict on other elements in the state party, particularly supporters of Corwin and McLean. He argued that if Taylor wanted to honor Ohio symbolically with a cabinet post, he should name Corwin, not Ewing. Corwin would decline in order to keep his Senate seat in Whig hands, and then Taylor, having honored Ohio, could turn to a different state for the Midwest's representative. Stevenson had a specific alternative in mind. He and most Whigs from the other midwestern states strenuously pushed Caleb B. Smith, a three-term Indiana congressman, for postmaster general. They complained that Ewing, who came from eastern Ohio, had no understanding of the needs or personnel of Whig parties elsewhere in the Midwest and demanded that a genuine Westerner be appointed.⁶⁶

Ewing's friends, led by Joseph Vance, who had kept Ohio's delegates from going to Clay at the convention and who spoke with Taylor when he was on his way to Washington, retaliated by attacking Smith's support for McLean's nomination in 1848. As postmaster general, Smith would build up an organization that could secure McLean Whigs' 1852 nomination. Only true Taylor men like Ewing, they contended, deserved cabinet appointments. "There is great effort making by the original Taylor men to prejudice his mind against the appointment of any man who opposed the nomination," fumed the Indianapolis editor John Defrees and other Smith backers. "Should he be so weak as to pursue such a course the Party will be blown to the devil in three weeks."

What was at stake in the construction of the cabinet, Defrees and others worried, was not just that original Taylor men would monopolize its positions. They feared that the Taylorites intended to abandon the Whig party in order to build a new party with a new name. Conciliation and conversion of Democrats, not implementation of Whig policies by Whig personnel, appeared to be Taylorites' goal. Rumors that Taylor was being strongly advised to retain Democrats in federal jobs in order to woo their support appalled them, for a course so reminiscent of Tyler's would outrage "honest Whigs." Some Whig leaders, Cincinnati's Stevenson protested to Caleb Smith, "desire a reconstruction of parties." And the evil genius behind this mad scheme was Taylor's most trusted advisor, Crittenden 68

That suspicion was only partially accurate. The impulse to change the name and the policies of the Whig party, to eradicate every trace of what was scorned as the "ultra Whiggery" of "the Clay and Webster school of politics," in order permanently to convert the nativists, Democrats, and new voters who had supported Taylor sprang from numerous men after the election, including Taylor. Everywhere these newcomers identified what they called the "Taylor party" or the "Taylor Republican party" as an entity distinct from the old Whig organization. Everywhere they urged that policies be formulated and appointments made that would keep the new party intact. To attract Democrats, an Illinois resident advised Crittenden, "a new party designation should be adopted in place of Whig." Similarly, a Rough and Ready Club in Natchez, Mississippi, praised Taylor's election as a victory "of the Taylor Republican Party."

That Taylor's Louisiana advisors meant to foster a new party and to jettison old Whig staples along with the Whig name became clear shortly after the election. As early as January 12, 1849, Albert T. Burnley informed Crittenden that Taylor meant to replace the staid Whig National Intelligencer in Washington as the administration organ because the Intelligencer was too "committed to ultra measures." Taylor wanted Alexander C. Bullitt of New Orleans to edit the new sheet, which, significantly, would be called the Republic. Burnley, who would publish the new paper, wrote Crittenden in the summer of 1849 that the Whigs must discard "the old Hunker Whig politicians & the stale, chronic & unpopular doctrines of ultra whiggery." By attracting "tens of thousands" of Democrats who "repudiate & despise Locofocism," Taylor could "reconstruct the true old

Republican party.'' Since "the elements of this Republican party elected Genl. Taylor—they will sustain him if he acts wisely." 70

While others also wanted to transform the Whig party after Taylor's election, Crittenden wholeheartedly endorsed the project, and he had enormous influence on Taylor. Crittenden was Taylor's first choice for the cabinet, no matter what the post, and he intended to appoint him before consulting Whigs in Washington. But by late November, rumors were circulating that Crittenden hesitated to leave Kentucky; he felt obligated to serve out his gubernatorial term, and he and other Kentucky Whigs distrusted the lieutenant governor who would succeed him.⁷¹

Though unwilling to leave Kentucky, Crittenden continued to have great influence on the shaping of the cabinet, and he rejoiced that Taylor did not intend "to administer the government as a partisan, or for a party." To advance that goal, Crittenden sought to control events in Washington by securing the appointment of an alter ego as secretary of state, Clayton of Delaware. By early December it was evident to knowledgeable Whigs that Clayton would be Crittenden's man in the cabinet, and the prospect of the Delaware senator as secretary of state appalled Webster, Seward, and, most significantly, Truman Smith. They worried about his heavy drinking, his lack of candor and penchant for backbiting, and his infirm will. Most of all, they questioned Clayton's judgment and also Crittenden's, for whom they knew he would be a catspaw. "I think I see many breakers ahead," moaned the horrified Smith. "I doubt whether the measure of wisdom with which we are likely to be blessed or the temper of the People will allow the admn. to continue over four years."

Clayton was not up to the job of secretary of state, and he knew it. He took it largely because he could not withstand Crittenden's pressure to take it, and throughout his term he leaned shamelessly on the Kentucky governor, nervously soliciting his advice on every move and pathetically begging him to come to Washington to take his place. 73 Yet Crittenden saw great advantages in Clayton's appointment beyond the latter's utter deference to him. First, Clayton had great influence with Whigs in Delaware and, more important, in nearby Philadelphia. Second, the two agreed wholeheartedly that the best solution for the divisive slavery extension question was immediately to form states out of the Mexican Cession and bypass the territorial stage to which Congress might apply the Wilmot Proviso.⁷⁴ Most important, they both wanted to replace the Whig party with a new organization based on Taylor's personal prestige and popularity, not on sharply defined doctrine or old Whig policies. "Old Zach is the Rock politically, on which you ought to build," Crittenden wrote Clayton. "There is . . . the source of strength and popularity . . . for the Administration." They would make loyalty or opposition to Taylor himself the main issue, just as Jackson had done twenty years earlier.75

Convinced that "we won our victory as Taylor men—not merely as Whigs," and determined "to sink the name of the Whig party in that of the Tarylor Republican Party after the election," Clayton agreed to take the state department in part because of his influence in Pennsylvania, where he first promoted the new party scheme. Immediately after the election, Clayton and his Philadelphia allies like Morton McMichael, Edward Joy Morris, William D. Lewis, and Robert M. Bird, editor of the influential Philadelphia North American, organized Taylor Republican Associations to give permanent institutional form to the campaign alliance between Native Americans and Whigs. Regular Whigs in the area, especially Clay men, fought the proposal tooth and nail. "The Old Fogies in Philadelphia kick angrily against the Taylor Republican movement, upon the ground that it must break up the dear Whig party," Bird reported. Clayton himself complained bitterly to Crittenden that "the ultra Whigs in Philadelphia—headed by Josiah Randall—Charles Gilpin & one or two others" labeled Taylor's triumph "an exclusive Whig victory," refused "to call themselves 'Taylor men' & insist[ed] on retaining the old name of Whigs," and defiantly reorganized Whig committees as alternatives to the new Taylor Republican Associations. Their myopic stubbornness, he fumed, was driving the nativists away from the new organization. Pennsylvania, in short, provided vivid evidence that any attempt to replace the Whig party would not go uncontested."

Even Crittenden thought Clayton had gone too far in offending old-line Whigs by his rash scheme. Seward and Truman Smith considered it insane. The battle lines that formed over the Taylor Republican movement also fueled an extraordinarily rancorous fight over a cabinet appointment from Pennsylvania. As a vehicle for newcomers to the party, the Taylor Republican movement was an obvious ally for Governor William F. Johnston, the ex-Democrat, who sought to seize control of the state Whig organization from orthodox party regulars. Thus Johnston opposed any cabinet appointment from that wing of the party. Yet it was widely understood that Taylor was interested in one of three elderly and prominent Philadelphia lawyers to serve as attorney general or Treasury secretary—John Sergeant, Horace Binney, and Josiah Randall. The possible choice of one of these patrician old-line Clay Whigs infuriated the younger Taylorites in Philadelphia since they wanted to eradicate the last vestiges of National Republican influence in the party in order to cement their alliance with working-class Native Americans. Johnston immediately informed one of Clayton's lieutenants that it was better that Pennsylvania have no appointment than that one of these three get it. Since "we have many discordant political elements to reconcile," another Clayton correspondent explained, any cabinet appointment from the state would split Taylor's triumphant—and heterogeneous—coalition. The mass of "the Taylor party of Pennsylvania" cared far more about the new administration's policies than about a cabinet appointment.⁷⁸

Yet Clayton wanted a Pennsylvanian in the cabinet to foster his Taylor Republican movement. Because none of the prominent contenders fit his needs, he ordered his Pennsylvania followers to find a suitable man for the Treasury Department. Such an appointment could also keep the old-line Whig Abbott Lawrence out of that important post. For several weeks the search proved fruitless. Then, in early January, two of Clayton's Philadelphia lieutenants recommended the little-known William M. Meredith. An accomplished lawyer who served on the Philadelphia City Council, Meredith had never held national or state office. Nor was he closely identified with the state's manufacturing or financial community. But he had other credentials that mattered far more to Clayton. He had enthusiastically endorsed the formation of the Taylor Republican Association in a speech at its inaugural meeting. Meredith had an "early connection with the movement," wrote one of Clayton's allies, and he "would add especial strength to our views." Furthermore, Meredith was Johnston's friend, and Johnston, who sought to control all federal appointments in Pennsylvaia, was delighted with the idea of Meredith in the cabinet. Predictably, Whig regulars, including Senator-elect James Cooper, vehemently protested that "Mr. Meredith's appointment will be productive of great pain to many." They wanted a different man to avoid "discord and an open quarrel" in Pennsylvania and to assure regulars of the administration's "entire fidelity to our principles."

Serenely unaware of this feuding in Pennsylvania, Taylor departed Baton Rouge for Washington in early February with only the vaguest ideas about the cabinet's composition. He still hoped to induce Crittenden to join that body when he stopped in Frankfort for consultation with his friend. Despite early rumors that he might give a place to his former son-in-law, the Mississippi Democrat Jefferson Davis, he intended to confine his selections to full-blooded Whigs. He wanted representatives from Georgia and Pennsylvania, was leaning toward Clayton, and preferred Winthrop as the New Englander for the cabinet. Beyond that, he had not considered specific men for specific jobs. ⁸⁰

Taylor was stunned and deeply disappointed when, even in person, he could not persuade Crittenden to leave Kentucky, and he spurned Crittenden's plea that he appoint Robert Letcher postmaster general instead. Crittenden's influence on Taylor nonetheless remained substantial. Those who interviewed him after he spoke with Crittenden reported that he had decided on four men, three of whom Crittenden recommended: Clayton as secretary of state, Horace Binney for the Treasury, George W. Crawford for the War Department, and Abbott Lawrence as navy secretary. Unlike his friend Clayton, Crittenden wanted to conciliate Clay regulars in Pennsylvania; hence his acquiescence in Binney, who was to be replaced by John Sergeant if he declined. Crittenden had also always wanted Lawrence in the cabinet, and the conflict-of-interest charge could be avoided by giving him the Navy Department, which carried less prestige than the Treasury. Although no one had been decided upon for attorney general or postmaster general, Taylor also made it clear that he had no intention of naming Caleb or Truman Smith. To obviate the concern that Delaware's Democratic governor might appoint Clayton's successor, Taylor telegraphed Clayton with the offer before he reached Washington. Clayton accepted and immediately resigned from the Senate so that the Whig-dominated Delaware legislature, which was still in session, could elect his successor.81

After Taylor reached Washington on the evening of Friday, February 23, ten days before his scheduled inauguration, the Whig hierarchy finally had a chance to press their conflicting advice on him directly. As a result, Taylor reshuffled his plans. Clayton persuaded him to appoint Meredith rather than Binney or Sergeant to the Treasury Department. Taylor offered the postmaster generalship to Tennessee's Meredith Gentry. When he refused to leave the House, Ohio's Ewing was slated for that post instead. Then Taylor learned that the proud Lawrence would not take the navy secretaryship. He had been considering Virginia's William Ballard Preston for attorney general, a post for which Preston lacked adequate legal talent, and when Lawrence declined, he shifted Preston to the naval post. For the attorney generalship he then named Reverdy Johnson, who had eagerly sought it and had resigned his Senate seat in December so that Maryland's Whig governor might appoint his replacement. By the final weekend before his inauguration, therefore, Taylor had performed a minor miracle. By picking four

Southerners and only two Northerners, he had failed to balance the six cabinets posts evenly between the two sections, and his cabinet would have no representative from New England, the staunchest Whig region in the country.⁸²

Seasoned party professionals attributed this fiasco to Taylor's naiveté, his susceptibility to the malign machinations of Crittenden and Clayton, and pressure from the South. Virtually no Whig politician in Washington had ever laid eyes on the new president, and they were understandably as curious about the man himself as about his cabinet selections. Almost uniformly they came away with impressions of a guileless political infant. "Genl. Taylor means well, but he knows little of public affairs & less of public men," reported Webster. Seward described Taylor as "the most gentle-looking and amiable of men," but he and Fillmore were both furious that Taylor had committed himself on the cabinet before they reached Washington. "Of course Mr. Crittenden advised all this," ranted Seward, "and of course his advice was at once honest, misconceived, and erroneous. General Taylor relied on it implicitly." On March 1, Seward sent his wife an even more revealing evaluation of Taylor: "He is a sensible and sagacious man, but uninformed about men, and will fail to obtain a Cabinet politically strong. It remains to be seen how far honesty and the very purest and exalted patriotism will cover the defect of political sagacity."83

Even as Seward penned that letter, the opportunity emerged to repair some of Taylor's damage by assuaging New Englanders' outrage. At the end of the session, Congress created a new Home Department (later renamed the Department of the Interior), so Taylor had a seventh post to fill. New Englanders assumed it would be theirs, and Webster immediately pressed for the appointment of his Maine friend Evans, whom he vigorously defended from the charges of habitual drunkenness. Seward and Fillmore, with the concurrence of Weed, urged Taylor instead to name Truman Smith. They knew that Smith would decline in order to protect his Senate seat, but New England's honor would be mollified. Seward would have preferred that the post then be given to Caleb Smith, but because he knew that Southerners opposed Smith, he hoped that Truman Smith could select a New Englander for the post. Even this opportunity went awry. Taylor did offer Truman Smith the position, but when he declined, Taylor shifted Ewing from the postmaster generalship to the Home Department. As New England's representative, he then appointed Vermont's Jacob Collamer postmaster general. Whether Truman Smith recommended Collamer is unclear, but within days of his appointment the acerbic Vermonter had already offended dozens of office seekers. As a consolation prize for Evans and Caleb Smith, Taylor then appointed both to the new Mexican Claims Commission that would pay off claims by private American citizens against the Mexican government.84

"The cloud is already rising," an alarmed Tennessean reported home as early as March 12. "I find many are not pleased with Taylor's Cabinet." Dissatisfaction was in fact widespread. North Carolina's Whigs were "indignant" that Democratic Virginia had "a place in the Cabinet to the exclusion of North Carolina." Indianans and other midwestern Whigs angrily protested Ewing's appointment over

Caleb Smith, and the South Bend editor Schuyler Colfax ridiculed the other Northerners, Meredith and Collamer, as weak nonentities. Miffed that his friend Evans had been denied a post, Webster groused that the "construction [of the cabinet] has been botched." Ominously, Clay also complained that all the appointments had gone to "the Taylor men to the exclusion of friends of other candidates." Even Georgia's Whigs, who had twice elected George Crawford governor, worried that his scandalous private life might embarrass the administration. As one later scolded, "The appointment by Mr. Crawford of that man Anderson as his Chief Clerk has met with almost universal reprobation and has subjected Mr. Crawford's private life to scrutiny which cannot but be unpleasant to a gentleman so extremely sensitive as he is & has given birth to the foulest conjectures." Horace Greeley, who in early 1849 happily "concede[d] all the places to the originals," rendered a crushing verdict on the whole administration a year later.

Old Zack is a good old soul, but don't know himself from a side of sole-leather in the way of statesmanship; while his whole cabinet is a horrid mixture, just such as a blind man (or one blind folded) would probably have picked up, if turned in among three or four hundred would be magnates of the Whig party and ordered to touch and take. Clayton is a drunkard, Preston a weak country lawyer, Meredith a good commercial lawyer, but no politician at all, Reverdy Johnson a good lawyer and a bad politician (which is better than none at all)[,] Jake Collamer an upright, attentive, faithful man of business, but a little too conceited to be popular; Ewing an able man and well informed politician, but overbearing and selfish. Such is the Cabinet.85

Even though the last-minute changes in personnel appeared slapdash, and even though criticism of the cabinet increased steadily during 1849, Greeley's sour verdict was unfair. The cabinet possessed men of talent, and Taylor, despite his palpable political inexperience, had pursued definite goals in constructing it. Even Ewing's detractors admitted that he was a forceful and seasoned politician, and Truman Smith, among others, expected him to lead the cabinet. One of the few people in Washington acquainted with the obscure Meredith, Webster praised him as "a man of first-rate talent, tho' little experience in politics," and the Pennsylvanian quickly emerged as one of the administration's pillars. Similarly, Seward, an able lawyer himself, applauded the appointment of Johnson because of his immense legal ability. Despite his character flaws and self-doubts, Clayton would labor steadfastly to forward the president's agenda. And even though Crawford had no military background, he had displayed considerable administrative ability as Georgia's governor.⁸⁶

Fair-minded Whigs should also have noted that Taylor acted carefully not to weaken the ranks of elected Whig officeholders, and that constraint limited his choices. Ewing, Crawford, and Meredith held no state or national office in 1849. Collamer had not run for reelection in 1848, and his Vermont constituents had already replaced him with another Whig for the Thirty-First Congress. His selection did far less damage to the party's congressional wing than Winthrop's or Truman Smith's would have done. Both Clayton and Johnson had time remaining in their Senate terms, but both resigned early to allow Whigs in Delaware and Maryland to elect or appoint Whig replacements. Only with the choice of Virginia's Preston did Taylor risk the loss of a Whig congressional seat, but the party had won 57 percent of the House seats filled in 1848, and its chances of retaining control seemed good even with the probable loss of Preston's seat in 1849. When Taylor later picked sitting congressmen to serve in the executive branch, moreover, he chose men like Indiana's Caleb Smith, North Carolina's Daniel M. Barringer, and Georgia's Thomas Butler King, who appeared to represent secure Whig districts that the party might carry even without those individuals. In many respects, Taylor was in over his head, but far from acting blindly, he showed a solicitous concern for the welfare of the party's congressional wing.

More important, Taylor carefully selected men who might help him settle the divisive territorial question without having to confront the Wilmot Proviso. Aware that the accelerating gold rush to California in early 1849 made the establishment of civil authority there imperative, Taylor scorned Southerners' insistence that slavery be allowed in part or all of the Mexican Cession as an economically unrealistic demand that would block creation of territorial governments. During the week before his inauguration, Taylor also directed Clayton, Ewing, and Senator-elect Seward to lobby congressmen to kill the Democratic effort to abrogate the Mexican prohibition of slavery in the Cession. Its repeal, he realized, would only increase northern opposition to any organization of government without a congressional ban on slavery. As his course in office quickly revealed, Taylor favored immediate statehood for California and New Mexico as the best way to secure civilian government, bypass the territorial stage, and thus avert the possibility that Congress might bar slavery from the area. If Mexican law continued in force until state constitutions were written, he understood, those new states would probably be free, but he counted on that likelihood to induce Northerners to drop their demand for congressional prohibition. That slavery would not be allowed to expand bothered him not at all. As a cotton planter himself, he may have recognized that plenty of land remained within the existing slave states to sustain the southern economy. Certainly, he shared the belief of most southern Whigs and many southern Democrats that slavery could not flourish in the Cession and that therefore only symbolic rights were at stake. Immediate statehood would spare the South the insult of congressional prohibition while giving the North what it wanted—the prevention of slavery's expansion.88

Clayton and Preston obviously agreed with this plan; Johnson, from the border state of Maryland, might be expected to go along with it; and Crawford had been recommended by Stephens and Toombs, who had enthusiastically endorsed the Preston bill. The Northerners in the cabinet were less committed to enactment of the Wilmot Proviso than the men from that section whom Taylor rejected. Ewing and Meredith, obviously, had never cast votes in Congress in its favor. Collamer had, but Taylor agreed to appoint him only at the last moment in an attempt to assuage angry New England Whigs. With the exception of Collamer, in short, Taylor tried to pick moderates from both sections, men whom he expected to support a compromise solution to the sectional question that might bar slavery from the Mexican Cession but without the insulting Wilmot Proviso.

Nonetheless, if Taylor's choices showed him to be canny and broad-minded in some ways, they also revealed that he was peevishly narrow-minded in others. Taylor's biggest mistake was ruthlessly excluding friends of Clay, Webster, and McLean in favor of men who might support his intention of running a No Party administration that could reach out to nativists and Democrats.90 As non-Taylorites had feared, the cabinet was largely confined to original Taylor men. North Carolina's Whigs might protest the injustice of appointing a Virginian rather than someone from that loyal Whig bastion, but Taylor vindictively never considered choosing a North Carolinian since the state's Whig convention in February 1848 had refused to endorse his nomination. Virginia's state convention, in contrast, had nominated Taylor, and Preston was one of the original Young Indians who wanted to resurrect the old Ieffersonian Republican party. Georgia's Whigs, too, had nominated Taylor, and Crawford, one of Taylor's biggest blunders, was the choice of Stephens and Toombs. Johnson had worked both before and during the national convention to commit Maryland's Whigs to Taylor, and he was the known foe of that state's Clav Whigs, who were led by James Pearce. Ewing had endeavored to line up Ohio for Taylor, while Meredith was advanced by the same men who had arranged the Buena Vista celebration in Philadelphia. men who shared Taylor's goal of merging Native Americans with Whigs in a new party. With the exception of Horace Binney, even the men whom Taylor approached but who subsequently declined appointments—Crittenden, Lawrence, Truman Smith, and Meredith Gentry—had been enthusiastic proponents of Taylor's nomination. Clayton had been a contender himself at the convention, but more as Delaware's favorite son than as a serious rival. Besides, he was Crittenden's man, and manifestly Clayton wanted to replace the Whigs with a new party. Only Collamer was not known as a Taylor man or a new party proponent, but he had the negative virtue of not being Webster's choice as the cabinet's New Englander.

Regular Whigs who had opposed Taylor's nomination as an abandonment of Whig principles could and did complain about the selfish narrowness of Taylor's criteria for selecting his cabinet. The point is that he had criteria. He had not acted blindly. Greeley's savage indictment of Taylor and his cabinet should be seen for what it was—a reflection of the anger he and other regular Whigs felt about the agenda Taylor brought with him to the White House.

From the moment Taylor had first been mentioned as a possible Whig nominee, he had insisted that traditional Whig policies must be shelved and that he would run a nonpartisan, rather than an exclusively Whig, administration in order to build a party of Whigs, Natives, and Democrats. His carefully crafted cabinet demonstrated that he intended to do just that. And just as savvy Whig politicos like Seward and Truman Smith predicted, this delusionary scheme and the cabinet Taylor chose to implement it would have calamitous consequences for the Whig party.

Chapter 13

"Patronage Is a Dangerous Element of Power"

"IF WE CANNOT RALLY a new party—composed of the elements which brought Taylor into power," John M. Clayton warned John J. Crittenden six weeks before Zachary Taylor's inauguration, "we shall be beaten under the old name of Whig this year." To avert that calamity, Taylor must reaffirm his intention to run an all-parties or No Party, rather than exclusively Whig, administration in his inaugural address. If he did, "thousands will join in who never voted with us before." All the Whigs whom Clayton spoke with in Washington concurred in his plan for "some demonstration on the Republican basis."

Here Clayton, one of its chief architects, outlined the central agenda of Taylor's presidency, a term that can best be understood in two phases. During the nine months between his inauguration and the meeting of Congress in December 1849, the sixty-four-year-old president and his men attempted to transform the Whig party into a broader and more inclusive organization. Based on loyalty to Taylor himself, patriotism inspired by Taylor's heroics in Mexico, and a self-conscious dedication to republican principles, this new organization was to be called the Taylor Republican or Republican party. It would abandon what Taylorites deprecated as ultra Whiggery, seek middle ground on issues that had traditionally divided Whigs from Democrats and North from South, and carefully distribute government jobs to non-Whigs, not just Whig regulars.

From its inception, this foolish and utopian initiative provoked angry resistance from most Whigs. The administration's inept patronage policies bitterly divided Whigs against each other and contributed to a truly dismal performance in the crucial state and congressional elections of 1849, thereby neutralizing the solid successes of 1848. By the time Congress assembled in December, the new party initiative had utterly failed, thereby jeopardizing the administration's far more sensible policy proposals. For the remainder of his presidency, therefore, Taylor and the Whig party suffered the consequences of this abortive, fractious, and misguided foray into party building. Since it both exacerbated intraparty divisions and propelled the diminution of interparty differences, the party itself never fully recovered from Zachary Taylor's first nine months in the White House.

I

Only the most perceptive political observer could have discerned Taylor's intentions from the exceptionally brief and bafflingly vague inaugural address he mumbled to the throng gathered before the Capitol on March 5, 1849. Without mentioning Whiggery, he reiterated the Allison Letter's Whiggish principles—his commitment to a nonbelligerent, noninterventionist foreign policy and his willingness to let Congress formulate domestic economic policy. Significantly, in light of Congress' previous inability to settle the divisive slavery extension question, he also asserted Congress' responsibility "to adopt such measures of conciliation as may harmonize conflicting interests and tend to perpetuate [the] Union." Taylor, in short, implied that he had no plans of his own for the Mexican Cession, leaving Northerners and Southerners to speculate how he might react to passage of the Wilmot Proviso.

Contrary to Clayton's hopes, Taylor did not explicitly promise not to be a party president in order to gather his diverse supporters into a new coalition. He suggested his hostility to partisan strife, however, by pledging to emulate George Washington, the original national hero who stood above party, and to base his actions on "those great republican doctrines which constitute the strength of our national existence." Much more clearly than such platitudes, the administration's actions during its first months in office demonstrated how Taylor's aims threatened the very existence of the Whig party.²

By the end of March, Taylor moved to replace the staid and orthodox Washington National Intelligencer, the major Whig paper in the capital since the founding of the party and a frequent mouthpiece for Clay and Webster, with a new sheet to serve as "the organ" of the administration. When cabinet members protested the establishment of this rival influence with the president, Taylor insisted in "very decided . . . language" that it be done. Owned by Albert T. Burnley and co-edited by Alexander C. Bullitt, formerly an editor of the New Orleans Picayune, and John O. Sargent, who had written for James Watson Webb's pro-Taylor New York Courier and Enquirer, the Washington Republic began publication on June 1. Describing the paper's editorial thrust to Crittenden in July, Burnley disdained the economic issues that other Whigs believed had secured key northern states for Taylor in 1848. The administration's success, he argued, depended upon "discarding the old Hunker Whig politicians & the stale, chronic, & unpopular doctrines of ultra Whiggery." It would be insane to contend for a new national bank, "for a high protective tariff-for a splendid system of internal improvements—for a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, etc., etc., etc." Instead, the new Taylor party should seek to "improve" but "not repeal, the Subtreasury, improve [but] not repeal the Tariff of 1846," recommend minimal internal improvements, and use revenue from land sales to pay off the national debt. Such a course, he dreamed, would "popularize conservative Whig doctrines" and reaggregate the old Republican party behind Taylor.3

Whatever Burnley's and Taylor's policy preferences were, until Congress met in December they drew far less public attention and provoked far less controversy among Whigs than did the distribution of patronage, a task that preoccupied Taylor and his advisors from the moment they took office. Dividing the spoils has been a headache for virtually every incoming presidential administration in American history, if only because many more people sought offices than there were offices to give. Under Taylor, however, the process proved exceptionally painful and pernicious.

One can easily get the impression from surviving letters that patronage was the only thing politicians, be they small-fry politicos on the periphery or eminent leaders at the center of public affairs, cared about and that the life and death of political parties depended on how offices were allocated. That obsession seems puzzling since only a tiny fraction of the Whig, let alone the national, adult male electorate could hold or would even seek the approximately 18,000 jobs available from the national government. One might well ask, therefore, why both the seekers and dispensers of patronage considered it so important.

One reason is that government jobs paid very well compared to other occupations available in the American economy, particularly an economy still in recession at the end of 1848. At a time when laborers made a dollar a day on the days they could find work and when most skilled artisans' annual income averaged less than $600, government salaries seemed generous indeed.4 The consulship at Glasgow was said to be worth $7,000 to $8,000 yearly and that at Liverpool even more. Customs collectors in large ports could earn even more, and the naval officer in Philadelphia, New York, or Boston was paid $5,000 annually. Through the assessment of fees and fines. United States marshals could earn $10,000 to $15,000 a year. Government clerks in Washington earned $1,000 or $2,000 annually. Postmasterships in large cities paid $3,000, and even third- and fourth-class postmasters in small towns earned $1,000 a year. Those positions were worth far more to newspaper editors who particularly clamored for them than the salary alone, however. Postmasters had a franking privilege that allowed editors to mail their papers to subscribers free of charge. Moreover, they could charge the government to print contract lettings for mail carriers or lists of letters received since any newspaperman who served as postmaster would give printing contracts to himself. The prospect of high pay, in sum, largely accounts for the rush of office seekers.5

Several sitting Whig congressmen coveted foreign missions or lucrative consulships, but most elected Whig officeholders sought federal jobs for their relatives and political friends, not for themselves. They valued patronage for the edge it gave them over intraparty rivals, not for the high salaries. Success in winning positions for friends could enhance leaders' prestige among local party activists and wean the allegiance of job seekers away from factional foes. Failure to land jobs for supporters could drive them into the arms of a rival. Seward, for example, warned Weed that their wing of the New York party would suffer if he could not secure appointments for the hundreds of men who looked to him for influence with the administration. Conversely, friends of Fillmore despaired that Seward's apparent ability to "dictate" New York appointments allowed Sewardites to boast "that their chief is in the ascendant." Pennsylvania's Governor William F. Johnston also recognized that he could raid the Cooper camp by brokering the state's federal patronage. Thus he urged Treasury Secretary Meredith to find jobs for two prominent Cooper supporters in order to "secure the active friendship of these gentlemen, both worth detaching from their present alliances."6

To politicians who held or aspired to elective office, "active friendship" meant help in securing or retaining it. Patronage was the currency politicians dealt in, and the more one amassed, the better one's chances of controlling the party's organizational apparatus that nominated candidates for elective offices. Men who owed government jobs and contracts to a particular patron were expected to repay him with undeviating loyalty, friendly newspaper editorials, campaign contributions, and especially faithful support at local, district, and state conventions. Every federal appointee could render such service, but those who hired subordinates like customs collectors or the superintendents of navy yards were deemed particularly valuable. Voting the right way at, and bringing friends who would vote the right way to, nominating conventions was a condition of employment in these subordinate posts. The more hired hands a politician had in his pocket, the easier it was to pack conventions.

Important as naval officers, postmasters, and customs collectors were to an efficient machine, however, in 1849 Whigs knew that a different federal post had even greater organizational potential since its incumbent could influence a wider geographical area than a single city or congressional district. This was the position of United States marshal, for in 1850 a new federal census was to be taken. That year each marshal would appoint a deputy for every county in his district, and those deputies would hire assistants who would presumably visit—and could proselytize—every voter in the county. At government expense, through the marshals and their deputies, a politician could build a grass-roots organization unrivaled by anything an opponent could contrive. Thus one of Johnston's lieutenants frantically opposed naming a Cooper ally marshal for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania: "The appointment of Deputies to take the Census, will give him the opportunity to raise a party, which will be deeply injurious to the Whig party of this State." Thus Fillmore's friends warned that if Sewardite Palmer V. Kellogg was named marshal for New York's Northern District, "every county in the district will have a deputy to take the canvass thoroughly committed to do Seward's bidding.'' Kellogg had announced, shrieked another Fillmorite, that he would hire as deputies only men pledged to wage "war to the knife against you and all your friends."7

The palpable advantages of government jobs to office seekers and Whig politicos, however, hardly explain the widely reported interest that rank-and-file Whigs, who neither sought nor expected jobs themselves, took in their allocation. Popular fascination can be understood in two ways. Men voted Whig in 1848 to change the direction of the national government, and their faith in the responsiveness of the political system, in the efficacy of self-government, required concrete evidence that changes would be made. For most of 1849, however, Taylor's administration concealed its policies for the Mexican Cession and tariff revision from the public. Until December, therefore, changing the personnel of government constituted the only tangible proof that Whigs had accomplished anything by defeating the Democrats.

For most Americans, who never traveled to Washington, local federal office-holders personified the national government. Thus it mattered greatly to Whigs that Democrats be turned out of local post offices and customs houses and good Whigs put in their place. To Whigs at the grass-roots level, only such changes proved the power of the popular will. If ex-Governor James Jones "were appointed to office," one Tennessean reported, "the people would feel more like it was given to them than the appointment of any other man in our State." Whigs had not voted in November simply "to elect a Whig President," argued astute Whigs from Connecticut and New York. "They desired that result, certainly, but chiefly as a means to a greater end"—"to remove [Democrats] & place a better class in their stead." "The people here desire and expect a change," a Pennsylvania Whig congressman complained a month after Taylor's inauguration, "and a refusal to make a change would reduce the Whig party here to a corporal's guard."

More powered such demands than simply a desire to throw the rascals out or to reaffirm republican self-government. Since at least 1840, the dynamic of interparty combat itself, just as much as the programmatic substance of that combat, had activated the competitive instincts of Whigs and Democrats alike. Prior to December 1849, when patronage distribution served as a surrogate for interparty conflict over issues in Washington, Whig voters insisted that Democratic heads roll in order to keep up their élan, to allow them to boast and brag over their fallen foe. They took the same vicarious satisfaction in the decapitation of some hapless Democratic officeholder as they did in watching a Whig spokesman best a Democratic orator during a joint debate on the stump. What mattered to committed partisans was victory over the archrival, no matter what the context of that triumph, and for most of 1849 filling government jobs was the context that attracted attention. The administration must move on appointments with more "rapidity or resolution," Crittenden chided Clayton in July. Even a wise decision, if slowly made, would produce "no impression or excitement" among the rank and file. Any sign that Taylor's administration hesitated or refused to remove Democrats, therefore, demoralized the Whig faithful. Consequently, as the perception of such timidity and apparent treachery spread during 1849, increasingly strident alarms about apathy, disillusionment, and anger among Whig troops sounded. "Many-very many, of our hardest working rank & file Whigs feel discouraged," moaned a Michigan Whig on the eve of the state election. "They say it is no use to succeed for if we do Locofocos will be retained in office."9

Patronage allocation, in short, profoundly affected the morale and performance of local activists and Whig voters in elections, especially those occurring before the administration provided a policy platform on which Whigs could campaign. Recognizing that fact and the certainty that patronage could tilt intraparty factional balances, Whig after Whig chorused the warning of Indianapolis editor John Defrees that a "proper distribution of offices" was crucial to "the future prospects of the Whig party." For many Whigs, however, distribution by the Taylor administration proved to be anything but proper. Both the process by which it allotted spoils and the selections it made produced consternation and outrage. By November 1849 most Whigs would agree with the caustic assessment Balie Peyton made of the administration's record. "Patronage is a dangerous element of power," he mourned, "a two-edged sword which cuts both ways."

II

Specific appointments inevitably produced discontent and factional squabbling, but the administration's procedures for handling requests also appalled eager Whigs. One problem was Taylor's perceived noninvolvement in the selection process. Within five days of his inauguration, Seward informed Weed that Taylor cast

"all responsibility on the Cabinet," and in the succeeding months the impression spread that Taylor was a mere figurehead who absented himself from personnel decisions Whigs deemed vital. That complaint was inaccurate. Taylor attended many of the cabinet meetings where appointments were discussed, and he demanded the best jobs in Louisiana for his friends Samuel J. Peters and Logan Hunton. Taylor also directed plums to his Kentucky relatives. He gave personal attention to major diplomatic appointments, often overriding Clayton, and to the important federal posts in New York City. In addition, Taylor personally dealt with the requests of his defeated rivals Clay and Webster when they sought jobs for their sons, and he secured the appointment of James B. Clay as chargé d'affairs to Portugal when some cabinet members preferred to let Clay grovel interminably. Most significantly, no evidence exists that the cabinet appointed anyone against Taylor's wishes. As Crittenden correctly inferred from Kentucky, "nothing is done but by his dictation or approbation."

Nonetheless, for good reasons, Taylor delegated unprecedented authority to the cabinet on most appointments. Although fewer than 950 of the approximately 18,000 civilian government jobs were direct presidential appointments, sifting through the thousands of applications for them would have been a physically exhausting task. Moreover, Taylor had successfully delegated authority to subordinate commanders in Mexico, and he was most comfortable with that administrative style. He may also have realized that he could use the cabinet as a buffer against complaints from disappointed applicants by shifting responsibility to them.¹²

Yet while the cabinet bore the brunt of popular criticism, Taylor's hands-off style also drew considerable fire. Office seekers and would-be office brokers who swarmed over Washington protested that since they had elected Taylor, not his cabinet, Taylor personally should judge their claims. His apparent abdication of power, in short, betrayed his campaign vows to represent the people as president. Democratic and even some Whig newspapers charged him with weakness, incompetence, and torpor. Rather than the bold tribune Whigs had promised in 1848, he was stigmatized as an insignificant cipher whom selfish Whig politicos manipulated for ends of their own.¹³

By July 1849, tocsins of alarm that Taylor's apparent remoteness and lassitude "will damn us all inevitably" filled Whigs' correspondence. Taylor, Whigs complained, "has yielded too much power to his cabinet." People considered him "a mere man of straw" who "shrinks from responsibility." Because of "the impression that Taylor is removed behind the curtain so that he can neither be seen or approached," sputtered an aghast Indianan, "surely the Whig party is a doomed party." All complaints would stop if people knew that Taylor himself directed appointments, concluded Orlando Brown, Crittenden's Kentucky lieutenant, who had gone to Washington officially as commissioner of Indian affairs but unofficially to advise Taylor and the cabinet about Crittenden's views on policy and patronage. "Yet if the current is not changed and that speedily—if the President does not come to be considered as an acting principal in politics and not merely as a consenting instrument for others, it will be impossible for us to hold our own." "Old Zack is the Rock on which, politically, you ought to build," Crittenden impatiently instructed Clayton. He must be seen as "the active[,] moving[,] energetic cause of all things."14

Criticism of Taylor's passivity reflected dissatisfaction with the cabinet's own procedures. Cabinet members appeared purposely to wall themselves off from the public and other Whig politicians, dictating appointments as a closed corporation. They demanded that all applications go to individual department heads, refused to see applicants outside of official office hours, and insisted on interviewing men in groups of two or three rather than individually. They demanded that each applicant or aspiring patron submit letters of recommendation and then refused to read them. Worst of all, although they insisted that each secretary was responsible for the appointments under his department, they considered all major decisions "as a board" and required unanimous consent of the full cabinet before taking any action. Denouncing these "ridiculous formalities," Brown lamented the popular "dissatisfaction" with "the infernal ceremonious checks & balances in official intercourse with the citizens—with the neglect of letters of recommendation—the disinclination to talk to anybody but each other about measures or appointments." An administration that came to office promising to restore republican self-government, sighed Brown, had done nothing to reassure the public "that the Government is in the hands of its citizens." 15

Closed-door procedures created frustration, but the cabinet's dispensation of jobs provoked widespread outrage among both disappointed job seekers and those who sought no position. Whigs across the country squawked that the cabinet unfairly favored sitting Whig officeholders and their relatives over "working Whigs," the activists who had put those men in elective office. "Activity, labor, zeal, & association with the masses," Whigs griped, had been subordinated to "elevated standing & family influence." These charges had a solid foundation. Lame-duck and newly elected Whig congressmen who sought and often won jobs from the administration included Illinois' Edward D. Baker and Abraham Lincoln, Indiana's Caleb Smith and Richard W. Thompson, Alabama's John Gayle and Henry Hilliard, Pennsylvania's Moses Hampton, North Carolina's Daniel M. Barringer, and Virginia's John Pendleton. 16

Flagrant nepotism also characterized the cabinet's allotment of jobs. Thomas Ewing appointed his son, in-laws, and cousins to offices at his disposal. At the request of Clayton, Senators Truman Smith and James Cooper, along with Tom Corwin and Caleb Smith, drew up a slate of territorial officers for Minnesota, and Truman Smith and Cooper padded it with relatives. Thomas C. Perkins, the nominee for United States attorney in Connecticut, was related to the state's other senator, Roger Sherman Baldwin, as was Charles W. Rockwell, designated commissioner of customs in the Treasury Department, to Connecticut Congressman John A. Rockwell. James Johnston, brother of Pennsylvania's ambitious governor, was nominated for the lucrative consulship to Glasgow, and Crittenden's son got the even more valuable post at Liverpool.¹⁷

Even more than the rank favoritism in some appointments, "the delay, hesitation, & indecision exhibited at Washington" ignited a firestorm of protest against the administration. When the dilatory removal of Democrats did not strike Whigs as inexcusable, it produced suspicion of a malign, counterproductive scheme to "conciliate" Democrats at the expense of Whigs. "Loud, very loud complaints are made of the indisposition to act, & of the perfect noncommittalism of Mr. Meredith," Nathan Sargent reported to Crittenden from Washington. "Nothing, they say, is done, or if anything is done, it is delayed and procrastinated so long, that patience is exhausted and gives place to the most bitter complaints." The "temporizing policies" of the cabinet, warned a New Orleans Whig, have produced "a great deal of dissatisfaction here." Alarmed by the cabinet's snail's pace, Crittenden urged Clayton to "execute with audacity even, than with any appearance of hesitation or slowness."

Whigs who denounced the cabinet's dallying as early as March or April surely overestimated the speed at which it could act. Still, it did procrastinate in making appointments. Aside from an understandable caution in negotiating the minefield of conflicting claims from hungry Whigs, its very procedures forced delay. By demanding letters of recommendation from most applicants and requiring unanimous consent from the full cabinet, it guaranteed postponement of decisions. In addition, when Senate Democrats in March defeated Taylor's nomination of former Indiana Congressman Edward McGaughey as governor of Minnesota Territory and Indiana Whigs then blamed Taylor for blundering, the chastened Taylor and his men abandoned all thought of fast action and waited to make recess appointments.¹⁹

The cabinet's exasperating indecision and delay, however, primarily reflected deep internal disagreements and conflicting external advice about how fast Democrats should be axed and what purpose patronage allocation should serve. Interior Secretary Thomas Ewing, the veteran politico whom Whig regulars regarded as the most savvy and sympathetic cabinet member, favored swift and extensive decapitations of Democrats. He appointed Whigs as marshals, U.S. attorneys, Indian agents, and land office personnel far more quickly than William B. Preston, George W. Crawford, Jacob Collamer, William M. Meredith, and Clayton acted on positions at their disposal. Postmaster General Collamer inclined toward a similar policy, but Collamer refused to appoint any postmasters in congressional districts represented by Whigs until the appropriate congressman submitted written recommendations for office seekers. Navy Secretary Preston, in contrast, urged caution in sacking Democrats, as did Secretary of War Crawford, who heeded the advice of his patron, Alexander Stephens, that Democrats from Georgia and other slave states be retained in office at least until after the 1849 state and congressional elections.20

The close partners Clayton and Meredith, who owed his post at the Treasury to Clayton, pursued Taylor's new party agenda and were thus at odds with Ewing and Collamer. Nominally responsible for all subordinate Treasury officers in Washington and all customs collectors and subtreasurers across the country, Meredith knew virtually nothing about any Whigs outside Philadelphia. Aside from the Pennsylvania appointments, on which he acted as Governor Johnston's pawn, therefore, Meredith insisted on gathering information on the candidates for those coveted positions before acting. His caution was understandable, admitted Nathan Sargent, but "it has been unfortunate for us." By making business capacity and integrity, rather than partisan Whig activity, his chief criteria for customs collectors, moreover, Meredith repeatedly flouted the recommendations of Whig congressmen, notably Florida's E. C. Cabell, North Carolina's Edward Stanly, and Georgia's Senator William C. Dawson. Yet Meredith's hesitation to appoint Whigs also reflected his alliance with Secretary of State Clayton. As Whigs who knew him repeatedly reported, Clayton wanted to use federal jobs "to build up a Taylor party, distinct from, independent of, and superior to the Whig party."21

To achieve that goal, Clayton insisted upon honoring job requests from Native Americans, Democrats, and nonpartisan independents who claimed to have supported Taylor, at the expense of Whig contenders for those positions. He also urged retention of all Democratic appointees whose commissions had not yet expired. Clayton's designs infuriated orthodox Whigs who had fought Taylor's nomination as a No Party man and who demanded instant execution of Democrats. "Every day's delay in [removing Democrats] is disastrous," protested one. "A no party 'conciliating' course toward the locos will sour our friends and gain strength no where," echoed another. "Any attempt to propitiate Locofocoism proper," the shrewd newspaper reporter James Harvey told Clayton, "will be attended with just as much success as an attempt to propitiate a hungry anaconda." Only massive decapitation of remaining Democrats could save the party. "Any other policy would be suicidal."

A significant minority of party leaders, however, urged the opposite course. For some, retaining Democrats in office fulfilled "those admirable principles of moderation" and nonpartisanship on which, they believed, Taylor had been elected. Most, however, were motivated by less altruistic calculations of partisan advantage. Crittenden, who urged the retention of the Democratic marshal and U.S. attorney in Kentucky, and Stephens, who ordered Crawford to have Collamer retain all Democratic postmasters in Georgia, genuinely believed that such restraint would keep Taylor Democrats in the Whig column for the important congressional and state elections of 1849. Thomas B. Stevenson, the Cincinnati Whig editor, scorned Crittenden's policy of "Conciliating the Democrats," but he understood its rationale. "He thinks patronage will gain accessions to the party."

Most Whig advocates of leniency, who included many 1849 congressional candidates, however, sought temporarily to anesthetize Democratic voters, not win them over permanently to a new Taylor party. They recognized that Democrats, like Whigs, watched patronage decisions closely and that removals could incite vengeful Democrats to come to the polls to retaliate against Whig candidates. Whig politicos from safe party strongholds might demand Democratic blood with impunity, but those from Democratic areas depended less on mobilizing Whigs to win elections than on low Democratic turnout. Warning that anything that aroused the Democratic majority to vote would doom Whig chances in 1849, an Indiana Whig therefore advised a passive course by which "the State will be kept still. That is what we want—until the new administration can organize and show off." Since Taylor's administration could show nothing but its appointments until December, Whigs from Georgia, Mississippi, Indiana, Alabama, Tennessee, Virginia, and North Carolina urged against removals until after their 1849 elections were over.²⁴

For every letter to the administration prophesying Whig defeat unless Democrats were purged, in sum, another contended that hasty, wholesale removals guaranteed Democratic victory. To the cabinet, however, one Whig's opinion outweighed all others in setting their patronage policies. And Zachary Taylor fully intended to carry out his preelection promise to reward Whigs, Democrats, and Natives equally. In a silly attempt to court Democrats, for example, Taylor made no effort in March to reverse several of Polk's last-minute Democratic diplomatic appointments, including several Virginians and the notoriously partisan Indiana Senator Edward Hannegan. Democrats dominated both states, and both had pending congressional elections in 1849. Still, regular Whigs from both vehemently protested against this self-defeating appearsement.²⁵

More dramatically, the few nominations for domestic posts sent to the Senate in March indicated that the partisan complexion of states would often determine the party identity of their appointees. In an exception to the cabinet's sluggish pace, it quickly nominated customs collectors, customs surveyors, postmasters, naval officers, and U.S. attorneys for the six New England states, but especially the three with spring elections—New Hampshire, Connecticut, and Rhode Island—as well as Virginia, another state that voted in the spring. Probably because of the Vermonter Collamer's influence, the New England posts, even in Democratic Maine and New Hampshire, went without exception to orthodox Whig regulars in an attempt to arouse the Whig faithful. In New Haven, Connecticut, for example, a Whig was appointed customs collector despite petitions from that city's merchants to retain the honest and efficient Democratic incumbent.²⁶

In sharp contrast to the New England pattern, the cabinet blatantly courted Virginia's Democrats. Aside from retaining Democratic Virginians in the foreign service, it boldly reappointed four Democrats in the Old Dominion itself to new terms, including Richmond's postmaster and the naval agent at the large Norfolk navy yard. No other Virginia appointments were announced in March, but for the remainder of 1849 Virginia's Democratic postmasters, customs collectors, both U.S. marshals and both U.S. attorneys, and over sixty clerks in Washington retained their jobs. The purpose of what was immediately dubbed the "Virginia policy" was clear to all. Taylor hoped to win Democratic support for Whig candidates or at least to keep Democratic voters away from the polls at the May state and congressional elections.²⁷

Sweeping Democratic victories in Virginia convinced most Whigs that the administration's "patent medicine" of appeasement had "been spurned alike by friend and foe." Nonetheless, for the remainder of the year the cabinet retained Democratic postmasters, marshals, attorneys, and customs collectors in North Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Tennessee, and Kentucky in the foolish hope of helping Whig candidates. "Unless the policy of the Administration is changed & speedily & a new spirit infused into the party," James Harvey bluntly warned Ewing in May after traveling from Virginia to Georgia, "our fate in the Old Dominion will extend over the eight [other] Southern States" in the 1849 elections, and "we shall be a minority in the House." "Working & energetic" Whigs, furious that they had "been discarded" to conciliate "the common enemy," others echoed, were paralyzed by unprecedented "apathy," while "the Locos are in high spirits believing they are safe." Democratic officeholders were indeed smugly complacent. "I have not the most distant idea, that I would be removed," the Democratic U.S. attorney in Alabama informed the Whig lawyer who sought his place. Whigs demoralized by such arrogance, Whig congressmen repeatedly told cabinet members, would not lift a finger in the 1849 contests. Castigating the Virginia policy as "weak & deeply pernicious," Willie P. Mangum instructed Meredith "that you must act in advance of the elections or lose much."28

Much more than disgruntlement over job allocation produced the predicted Whig defeats across the South in the August, October, and November elections. Nonetheless, many furious Whigs attributed their rout to the cabinet's imbecilic patronage policy. From Tennessee, Kentucky, North Carolina, and other slave states came howls that the coddling of Democrats "has almost broken us down." And even where some Democrats were removed, Whigs complained that the administration had "done enough to exasperate our enemies, but not enough to satisfy our friends."

Ш

In addition to sapping local Whig activists' zest for electoral combat against Democrats, the administration's bungling dispensation of jobs bitterly pitted Whig against Whig. Most of the squawking about retention of Democrats came from orthodox Whigs who had opposed Taylor's nomination, and they found the Whigs who did win positions no more palatable. From the start it was clear that original Taylorites would be favored at their expense. Yet even Taylorites exploded at some of the cabinet's missteps. Crittenden disliked the Kentucky appointments, and by the fall Truman Smith had labeled the cabinet "incompetent . . . in a political point of view." Clayton's diplomatic appointments particularly infuriated southern Taylorites, and his wavering, duplicitous course made him one of the administration's two most loathed figures. Even Bullitt openly vilified him in the Washington Republic.³⁰

Clayton and Taylor quickly decided to give the French mission to Virginia, and Clayton promised it to Congressman John S. Pendleton, one of the original Young Indians. Then Clayton changed his mind and offered the post instead to William C. Rives. Having already served as minister to France under Jackson, Rives had excellent credentials for the post. But the betrayed Pendleton blamed this humiliating insult for his defeat in the 1849 congressional election.³¹

North Carolina's Whigs, in turn, fumed that Virginia received both a cabinet seat and a foreign mission before they got anything. To appease them, Clayton allotted the Spanish mission to that state. Eager contenders mushroomed among North Carolina's Taylorites: Congressman Daniel M. Barringer, who had promoted himself for months; Senator George Badger's kinsman Edward Stanly; and B. M. Edney, Congressman Thomas Clingman's favorite. Meanwhile, Senator Willie P. Mangum, a strong proponent of Clay's nomination in 1848, pushed Hugh Waddell. Fearful of alienating any of these applicants or their powerful sponsors, the hapless Clayton offered the mission to ex-Governor William A. Graham, a Clay Whig who had not sought it. Yet Graham also personified the Raleigh Clique, whereas Clingman had specifically warned Clayton not to appoint anyone from Orange or Wake counties. Only after furious Whigs from eastern and western North Carolina forced Graham to decline did Clayton give the mission to Barringer, but by then he had earned the enmity of Clingman, Edney, Stanly, Mangum, and Badger.³²

Clayton also rebuffed other southern Whigs. Alabama Congressman Henry Hilliard never got the foreign mission he coveted. Regional and factional jealousies frustrated the bid of Tennessee's Gustavus A. Henry for a consulship. By July both Clay Whigs and Taylorites in the South execrated Clayton.³³

Whatever Clayton's blunders—and he insisted that Taylor personally chose every diplomat—every important foreign post, with the exception of Hannegan's retention as minister to Prussia, went to an original Taylor man. Abbott Lawrence got the prestigious mission to England, Rives to France, Barringer to Spain, Robert Letcher to Mexico, and Balie Peyton to Chili. Edward Kent, the Maine Whig who first nominated Taylor at the 1848 convention, won the attractive consulship to Rio de Janeiro. James Watson Webb, who had boomed Taylor in his editorial columns since 1847, was eventually dispatched to Austria, and Crittenden's son went to Liverpool as consul. A few friends of Clay, Webster, Fillmore, and other regulars did secure foreign assignments, but they were a distinct minority. The choicest plums went to Taylor men.³⁴

The allotment of domestic jobs tilted still more steeply in favor of Taylorites and against regulars, thereby aggravating intraparty factionalism in many states and infuriating still more Whig congressmen who would ultimately be asked to enact Taylor's policy recommendations. No Whigs were more prominent or more alienated from the administration than those symbols of orthodox or ultra Whiggery, Clay and Webster, both of whom angrily protested their victimization at its hands. "The public patronage has been too exclusively confined to the original supporters of Genl. Taylor," Clay repeatedly complained. So blatant was the discrimination that Crittenden urged Clayton to appoint some recognized Clay men to counteract the "impression" that "all who were friendly to Mr. Clay are proscribed by the Administration." Only after that imprecation and after pressure from Taylor himself did Clayton send James B. Clay to Lisbon.³⁵

Webster suffered even more galling treatment. He managed to secure a naval agency in New York City for his wife's brother, but every major appointment in Massachusetts, except that of his friend Franklin Haven as subtreasurer in Boston, went to an ally of Lawrence, the new minister to England: Charles Hudson as naval officer in Boston; Philip Greely, Jr., as its customs collector; William Hayden as postmaster there; and Frederick Coffin as postmaster in Newburyport. Modern observers bored by, and modern academics contemptuous of, petty squabbles among white male politicians might well ask what difference such choices made. The answer is that these men, all Webster's enemies, later bore responsibility for enforcement of the Fugitive Slave Act in Boston and the rest of Massachusetts.

That obligation was emphatically true of the office that mattered most to Webster in 1849, the U.S. attorneyship. Hoping to secure that post for his financially strapped thirty-six-year-old son Fletcher, Webster quickly discovered that the administration had another man in mind. At the 1848 national convention, Tennessee's Meredith Gentry had promised it to the Massachusetts delegate George Lunt, another Lawrence minion, as a payoff for Lunt's switch from Webster to Taylor on the third ballot. Taylor was determined to honor that bargain. Contemptuous of Lunt's scant legal ability and outraged that Gentry could dictate a Massachusetts appointment, Webster exhausted every avenue to block Lunt. Swallowing his immense pride, he trekked repeatedly to the White House to present Fletcher's case to Taylor. He begged help from Ewing and Clayton. He had Fletcher gather recommendations from the Massachusetts bar. He even persuaded Rufus Choate, perhaps the nation's most prominent attorney, to offer to take the position if Fletcher could not get it.³⁶

For his ignominious groveling Webster reaped only humiliation. "This business of Fletcher, I confess, has wounded me," he moaned to Edward Curtis, who in turn beseeched Ewing to spare Webster "from the chagrin & mortification of the entire failure of Fletcher's expectations." Taylor and the cabinet refused to budge. Not only did Lunt become U.S. attorney, but Ewing's promise to give Fletcher the U.S. marshalship in Massachusetts as a consolation prize went unfulfilled. Finally, the administration offered Fletcher the much less prestigious customs surveyorship in Boston, and his pathetically eager snapping at that insignificant bone only punctuated his father's impotence with the administration.³⁷

Clay and Webster were the most conspicuous losers in the patronage sweep-stakes, but they were hardly the only aggrieved Whigs. In almost every state the appointments engendered discontent and bitter intraparty feuds, thereby eroding party unity. Missouri's Clay Whigs protested that its marshalship went to a Taylorite with no prior connection to the Whig party. Proscription of everyone who had opposed Taylor's nomination by Assistant Postmaster General Fitz Henry Warren, the arbiter of all Iowa jobs, its Whigs fumed, produced "more distraction in the Whig ranks in Iowa" than "all other causes." In Illinois, a regional battle raged over the appointment of Chicago's Justin Butterfield, a Clay Whig, or ex-Congressman and Taylorite Abraham Lincoln of downstate Springfield as commissioner of the land office. When Butterfield prevailed, Lincoln's ally Congressman Edwin D. Baker spat that "the administration is gone to the devil."

The primary struggle in the Midwest, however, pitted Whigs west of Ohio against Ewing, the Ohioan who dictated virtually all the region's appointments because it lacked enough Whig senators and representatives to challenge him. Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, Illinois, and Indiana Whigs furiously complained about Ewing's blatant nepotism and especially his preference for Ohioans at their own states' expense. Ewing, such Whigs railed with considerable accuracy, made willingness to support his own bid for the party's 1852 presidential nomination his sole criterion for appointment. The Indianans who had hoped to place Caleb Smith in the cabinet were especially livid about their abuse at Ewing's hands. "The people want servants, not masters, at the capital," they raged. I warned that Ewing "would be the curse of the administration" when he was appointed, carped Indianapolis editor John Defrees, "and the sequel goes far to prove that I was right."39 Chafed beyond endurance, Indiana's Whigs, led by Smith, Defrees, and South Bend editor Schuyler Colfax, enlisted other Whig editors like Chicago's Lisle Smith, Milwaukee's Rufus King, and Cincinnati's Thomas Stevenson in a newspaper campaign to oust Clayton, Ewing, and other targets of Whig anger from the cabinet. Across the Midwest, Whigs demanded a cabinet reshuffle. 40

While midwestern Whigs united in protest against Ewing, patronage distribution elsewhere exacerbated factional divisions in state Whig parties that had often originated in or antedated fights over the 1848 presidential nomination. In Tennessee, for example, "two irreconcilable parties"—pro-Taylor Whigs, led by Congressman Meredith Gentry and Senator John Bell, and their "bitter enemies," anti-Bell Clay Whigs led by ex-Senator Ephraim H. Foster, ex-Governor James Jones, and incumbent Nashville Congressman Washington Barrow—jousted for the spoils. The Taylorites claimed the juiciest plums, but disaffection on both sides over the allotment of jobs was so great that neutral Whigs blamed the party's losses in the August state and congressional elections on "Faction," which "was our powerful enemy," and on the "indolence, inactivity, and entire indifference" produced by "the disaffection of E. H. Foster & a few others."

Maryland, Pennsylvania, and New York, however, best illuminate the pernicious impact of the divisive battles over patronage. In 1848 Maryland's Clay forces, led by Senator James Pearce, had triumphed over the pro-Taylor "Courthouse Clique" of Senator Reverdy Johnson in picking delegates to the national convention. Johnson's subsequent appointment to the cabinet, therefore, appalled Pearce and his allies, for they correctly foresaw that he would become "the sole dictator of Maryland matters." Using the "board" meetings of the cabinet, Johnson systematically blocked all recommendations by Pearce and directed Maryland's jobs to his own friends, even in Pearce's Eastern Shore bailiwick. "Humiliat[ed] and mortif[ied]," Pearce's "very indignant" allies wailed that he "has been utterly repudiated, if not absolutely insulted by the Cabinet." Because Johnson is "the grand almoner for Maryland" and because "every appointment which I have pressed has been denied," the incensed Pearce himself exploded, "my personal resentment will scarcely allow me to maintain terms of civility with the new cabinet." "The selfishness and incapacity of those who should have been the able and disinterested advisors of the honest old soldier." Pearce warned Crittenden. had rendered the victory in 1848 "worse than barren." 42

Such anguished howls were common, but the Maryland protests were especially ominous for two reasons. First, just as furious Indiana Whigs solicited allies from other midwestern and eastern states in their campaign to change the cabinet, Maryland's aggrieved Whigs communicated with their counterparts in Kentucky, North Carolina, and Georgia to marshal a larger force against the administration. Second, and more important, Pearce's allies bluntly announced their intention to oppose the administration not just on its appointments but also on its policy recommendations when Congress finally met in December. Because the administration "refuse me any share of their confidence," threatened Pearce, "I am not likely to give [it] any support; except as a sense of duty to the country may compel me to sustain the measures which I approve." Blindly or willfully, that is, the administration had stupidly alienated congressional Whigs upon whose support enactment of its policies depended.⁴³

Pennsylvania's main antagonists over the spoils were Governor William F. Johnston and Senator James Cooper, but to many Whigs the continued existence of the Whig party itself, not just the personal triumph of either man, seemed at stake. Johnston had demonstrated his determination to crush old-line Whigs in his draconian allotment of state jobs, especially his appointment of Cornelius Darragh, head of Pittsburgh's Young Whig faction, as state attorney general, since Darragh could appoint an assistant in every county of the state. To prevail in a "fierce & animated competition" between older regulars and ambitious upstarts, Johnston allied himself with Clayton and his Philadelphia lieutenants Edward Joy Morris, Morton McMichael, and William D. Lewis, who sought to cement an alliance with Native Americans in order to build a new Taylor party. To facilitate that goal, Johnston removed Isaac R. Davis, a respected and factionally neutral regular, from the chairmanship of the Whig state central committee and replaced him with McMichael, an ardent advocate of Taylor Republicanism. Insisting that "the great mass of the party will never agree to surrender the name Whig," one regular accurately protested that Johnston, McMichael, and their Washington allies intended "to break down the Whig organization by prostrating the prominent men of the party" and "to raise a new party upon its ruins to be called the Taylor Republican Party." ⁴⁴

That effort's fate hinged on the allotment of the state's federal jobs, and in the struggle for them Cooper, the champion of the regulars, possessed certain resources. The majority of Pennsylvania's Whig voters and "nearly all the active working Whigs" opposed to the new party scheme backed the senator. Cooper also had powerful friends in Washington, notably Truman Smith. Aware of the escalating feud between Johnston and Cooper and utterly contemptuous of Clayton's plan for a Taylor Republican party, Smith urged Ewing to make sure that Pennsylvania's appointments were divided evenly between the two rival factions. Meredith must not be allowed to decide Pennsylvania's appointments himself, Smith warned. Meredith owed his cabinet seat to Johnston's influence, and the administration required "a much more impartial judge of Pennsylvania questions."

Meredith was indeed Johnston's man in Washington, and the governor wasted little time in sending him marching orders. "The appointments" for Pennsylvania "should be so arranged as to counteract the schemes of our personal enemies," he commanded two days after Meredith moved into his Treasury Department office. Cowed by Johnston, Meredith quickly exerted complete control over Pennsylvania's jobs, in part because Ewing, to Truman Smith's and Cooper's dismay, came down decisively on Johnston's side, as did Clayton. Following a policy that the cabinet pursued with equally great consequences in other states, Ewing insisted that the success of the Whig party in Pennsylvania hinged on the success of its gubernatorial administration. Johnston must get everything and Cooper nothing.⁴⁶

Against the combination of Johnston, Meredith, Clayton, and Ewing, Cooper and the regulars he represented had no chance. To review Pennsylvania's appointments is to witness the utterly ruthless exercise of political muscle. In March, Meredith named Charles B. Penrose, a Johnston crony, first assistant secretary of the Treasury, while the cabinet ostentatiously signaled its outreach to nativists by appointing William B. Norris, another Johnston favorite, customs surveyor in Philadelphia. When regular or "Old Hunker" Whigs in Pittsburgh recommended Walter Forward, a former United States senator and cabinet member, for postmaster there, Darragh warned Meredith that "Forward is not and has not been an ardent friend of Governor Johnston, and his appointment would not be gratifying to the Governor's friends here." Their choice was Samuel Roseburg. Roseburg got the job.⁴⁷

So it went until Johnston had swept the board. He ordered Meredith to bury Cooper's choice for marshal in the Eastern District, and Meredith did so. Anthony Roberts, a Johnston ally, got that post, and another Johnston man, Alexander Irwin, became marshal in the Western District. Over the livid protests of the Philadelphia bar, John Ashmead, a Native American whom they regarded as hopelessly unqualified, was named U.S. attorney there. Likewise, that city's postmaster and naval officer were Johnston's friends with strong ties to the nativists. Arrogantly and successfully, Johnston ordered Meredith to get his brother the consulship to Glasgow and E. Joy Morris a post in Sicily.⁴⁸

The most powerful patronage post in Pennsylvania, however, was the Philadelphia customs house since the collector could appoint scores of subordinates. After some delay and in order to consolidate "our strength in the City & County" by cementing the friendship of Native Americans, Meredith appointed William D. Lewis to that coveted position. A Clayton lieutenant who had tried to establish Taylor Republican Associations the previous winter, Lewis promised to satisfy "the various political interests here by the union of which the present Administration was brought into power." Lewis therefore immediately appointed James Wallace, editor of the Philadelphia Sun, the city's chief nativist newspaper, as one of his chief subordinates. While on the government payroll, Wallace carried on an editorial war with the Philadelphia Daily News, the organ of Charles Gilpin, leader of Philadelphia's regular Whigs, who had stubbornly refused to abandon their existing organization for the new Taylor Republican Association. Gilpin was also the regular Whigs' candidate for mayor of Philadelphia in 1849, and when he lost that election, Gilpin blamed Wallace, Lewis, and the Taylor administration.⁴⁹

It is difficult to imagine and certainly to convey how so few people in so short a time could have so wantonly and unnecessarily antagonized so many. Across the state in 1849 anguished and apoplectic recriminations poured from Whig regulars. Pittsburgh's Whigs, who had no love for Cooper, termed the interference of Cornelius Darragh and Johnston against Walter Forward "a monstrous wrong" and an "insult." Declaring Norris' success in Philadelphia a repudiation of the "measures that we have for the last twenty years been contending." a Mifflin County Whig insisted that "this usurper must be removed or the Whig party is utterly ruined in Penna." Because "the veterans of the Whig party" were uniformly proscribed, complained a Chambersburg Whig, the party was "doomed to a most overwhelming defeat" in October. Unless the administration used its patronage exclusively to sustain the Whig party, deposed state chairman Isaac Davis sputtered, "parties are useless and our efforts farcical, and the Whigs had as well disband and surrender the country at once" to "the locofocos." For the Whig party, this, the grudging resignation to give up the ghost, was the true fire bell in the night.50

In 1849, however, nothing infuriated Pennsylvania's Whigs so much as the appointment of Lewis as Philadelphia's customs collector. Lewis, they cried, "has never been known until recently as Whig." His preference for Native Americans and "Young Taylor Republican men" over Whigs in Philadelphia "together with the effort to cast away or change the name of Whig in this section of Pennsylvania," orthodox Whigs exploded, had produced "a feeling of burning indignation & disgust" that "will prove disastrous and disorganizing for a long period." Whig defeat in October, when Lewis' henchman Wallace opposed the Whig ticket, proved the last straw for old-line Whigs. The Whig vote had plummeted since 1848, they charged, only because Whig activists stood "aloof" once they saw Taylor appointing "a class of politicians who are selfish, insidious, and sinister." The Whig party would never carry Pennsylvania again, snarled Charles Gilpin, until the state leadership abandoned the fruitless courtship of Native Americans, jettisoned the divisive Taylor Republican apparatus, and cooperated with orthodox Whigs.⁵¹

Shorn of the organizational resources accruing to state and federal patronage, vengeful regulars could still pursue two courses to regain command of the state party from Johnston. First, they could try to control local and state nominating conventions by rallying Whigs against the policies of Johnston and his allies in the Taylor administration. That avenue would not be open, however, until after Taylor or Johnston advanced policies that significant numbers of rank-and-file Whigs disliked. In 1850, 1851, and 1852 they would travel it, but in 1849 an alternative route seemed more direct—carrying the battle over federal appointments to a different arena. Regulars were powerless to stop Taylor's cabinet from making recess appointments, but once Congress met in December, Johnston's henchmen would have to be confirmed by the Senate. "I hope our national Senators will discover the true cause of the contemplated Whig downfall, and at once hurl from their places the agents of treachery and sedition," a defiant regular threatened Ewing in August. Like Maryland's Pearce, James Cooper intended to do exactly that. In the fall he publicly vowed to go to Washington and defeat the confirmation of Lewis, Norris, Irwin, and the rest of Johnston's minions.⁵²

The widely anticipated struggle between Seward and Fillmore for New York's spoils in 1849 spawned divisive distrust and bitterness that infected the New York Whig party for the remainder of its existence. Whatever promises of cooperation the two men had made at Albany, agreement collapsed as soon as they reached Washington. They bickered over the district attorneys, marshals, subordinate officers in Washington departments, and especially the naval office at New York City, which Fillmore demanded for John Collier, whom Seward despised. Each accused the other of bad faith but, given the pressure on both from their respective allies, a break was inevitable. For New York's rival Whig factions, the symbolism, or "moral effect," of controlling appointments mattered as much as the substantive political power it brought. "Each section of the Whig party is watching with the most intense anxiety for the announcement of the first important nomination," warned one Fillmorite, "as that will be taken as indicating which actor is now the controlling voice in the administration."

If many observers saw the contest as a personal duel between Fillmore and Seward for Taylor's favor, each had help from New York allies. Fillmore primarily sought jobs for a small circle of personal friends: Collier; Jerome Fuller, his chief spokesman in the state legislature; his law partner Solomon G. Haven, whom he promoted for a U.S. attorneyship; Buffalo's ex-Congressman Nathan K. Hall, who sought the Minnesota governorship; and Thomas Foote, editor of his organ, the Buffalo Commercial Advertiser, who wanted the mission to Constantinople. Nonetheless, since Clay Whigs outside Fillmore's personal circle shared his jealousy of the Seward and Weed "Regency at Albany," important conservative Whig congressmen like David A. Bokee of Brooklyn, James Brooks and J. Phillips Phoenix of New York, Robert Rose of Ontario County, and Abraham Schermerhorn of Rochester joined Fillmore in lobbying against Seward. Most important, Fillmore allied himself with devious ex-Governor John Young, who had broken with Weed after being denied renomination in 1848, who lusted for the customs collectorship in New York City, and who joined his fellow Binghamton resident

Collier to press their cases in Washington during the first months of the administration. To keep the job-rich posts in New York City out of Seward's hands, they relentlessly portrayed him as an abolitionist fanatic to southern Whig congressmen, southern cabinet members, and Taylor's Louisiana friends like Balie Peyton.⁵⁴

As co-leader with Weed of the state party's majority wing, Seward brought even more powerful influences to bear from New York. "Seward's friends are the strongest and deserve the most favors, but the Vice President should have some," the self-professed neutral Washington Hunt informed Clayton. Most of New York's huge Whig congressional delegation also sided with Seward. It included freshmen who counted on Seward to get the right men appointed in their districts, but also three tough, seasoned veterans who came to Washington frequently that spring and who were ruthlessly determined to crush the Fillmore and Clay conservatives. Of these the most important was Albany's John L. Schoolcraft, a wealthy businessman and Weed's handpicked manager of the machine's patronage interests. Another, Orsamus B. Matteson of Utica, who engineered the Sewardites' first coup by duping Clayton, was particularly contemptuous of Fillmore. Allow him nothing, Matteson urged Seward. "The more you whip him, the better he will like you." The third, Elbridge G. Spaulding, the new Whig congressman from Buffalo, proved pivotal in humiliating Fillmore in his own home town. 55

Seward also received considerable aid from the conservative bastion of New York City itself. The merchants Simeon Draper, Jr., and Moses Grinnell came to Washington frequently to promote Seward's and Weed's choices for the city's federal jobs. More important, James Watson Webb, one-time editorial champion of the conservatives against the Seward-Weed wing and an original Taylor man, defected to the Sewardite camp because he hungered for a foreign mission and mistakenly believed that "Fillmore has cheated me, and is playing for the succession." Almost deranged by anger and vindictiveness, Webb constantly derided Fillmore to cabinet members as "weak & false—habitually regardless of the truth," a man who "imagines himself cunning, without the capacity for even that low vice." Therefore Fillmore must be kept "weak in this State," and the cabinet should instead "cultivate Seward." "56

Above all, Seward had the aid of Weed, the legendary mastermind of the state Whig organization, whom even the blundering Fillmore commended to Taylor for special treatment. In the spring Weed traveled repeatedly to Washington, where he beguiled Taylor and the cabinet with the persuasive skills he had honed in Albany for twenty years. Through Weed, Seward obtained a letter in late March anointing him as spokesman for the state's Whig officers and signed by Governor Hamilton Fish, Lieutenant Governor George W. Patterson, and Comptroller Washington Hunt. "All trouble is at an end," Seward exulted after the letter was read to the cabinet, which was determined to favor incumbent Whig state administrations with the spoils. "This seasonable step has removed all difficulties." Even the seemingly obtuse Fillmore recognized that the letter had sealed his doom.⁵⁷

The divergent personalities and political skills of the two main protagonists, in fact, also shaped the outcome of their joust. Physically, the forty-nine-year-old Fillmore was far more prepossessing than Seward, a year his junior. A handsome figure, with a robust physique, blue eyes, and silver hair, Fillmore looked more dignified than the often disheveled Seward, a short, slight man with reddish hair, shaggy eyebrows, a macaw-like nose, and oversized ears. Fillmore not only looked like a statue, he acted like one. Friend and foe alike regarded him as "bland," stolid, passive, phlegmatic, even cold. He dealt with Taylor and the cabinet in formally polite but inconclusive interviews. In contrast to the stiff Fillmore, Seward, though possessing genuine and wide-ranging intellectual interests, had the instincts of a clubhouse pol. Urbane, witty, energetic, and enthusiastic, fond of brandy and cigars, he exuded warmth and charm. He quickly disarmed critics who were suspicious of his antislavery zeal and befriended all the cabinet members except the pompous and hostile Collamer, whom Seward and Weed partially outflanked by establishing close ties to his assistant, Warren. Seward, who had long been friendly with Colonel Joseph Taylor, also quickly formed a close personal relationship with his brother, the president. Before March ended, it was Seward who attended cabinet meetings rather than Fillmore, and Seward. not Fillmore, who defended the administration in newspaper articles.⁵⁸

Personally and politically, in sum, the balance of power tilted overwhelmingly against Fillmore and his conservative allies, and initially Seward and Weed appeared capable of achieving as thorough a rout as Maryland's Johnson or Pennsylvania's Johnston. Matteson struck the first blow by convincing Clayton to appoint a rabid Sewardite, Palmer V. Kellogg, marshal of the state's Northern District, on the false grounds that he was acceptable to both Fillmore and Seward. Shocked and appalled, Fillmore's Buffalo friends then increased pressure on their hesitant champion to secure the few appointments he had made a priority. "It needs but two or three more appts. like that of Kellogg to shake my faith in your ability to secure what is right," Hall bluntly warned. One by one, nonetheless, Fillmore's favorites were slaughtered. Philip Hone, Weed's candidate, won the New York naval office rather than Collier, who also lost the Treasury Department's solicitorship to Weed's man, John C. Clark. Fitz Henry Warren got the post Fillmore wanted for Jerome Fuller. Sewardite James Lawrence became U.S. attorney for the Northern District instead of Haven. Hall was ruled disqualified for the Minnesota governorship. Foote got a chargeship in New Granada, but not Constantinople, and he had been forced to seek Seward's aid to get even that. Most galling of all, Spaulding, with Seward's aid, won the three main jobs in Buffalo—keeper of the lighthouse, postmaster, and customs collector—for Sewardites, and Fillmore's friends especially regarded the selection of Levi Allen over William Ketchum for the last position as a mortifying defeat.⁵⁹

Other jobs in the state also flowed to Seward and Weed. Both the marshal and the U.S. attorney for the Southern District were their lieutenants. Their allies also won key postmasterships in New York, Albany, Troy, Utica, and Syracuse. Yet Seward never enjoyed the unalloyed success and Fillmore never suffered the unmitigated defeat some historians have attributed to them. Weed's allies, in fact, vociferously protested that too many jobs went to Clay conservatives, if not Fillmore's personal friends, especially in congressional districts represented by conservative Whigs. Darrius Perrin, Rochester's postmaster, was a Fillmorite, and Isaac Platt won Poughkeepsie's postmastership over Weed's opposition. Despite Seward's protests, Fillmore and Bokee secured C. B. Stuart's appointment as engineer of the dry dock at Brooklyn's navy yard, and Stuart could hire scores of subordinates. Most important, Weed and Seward lost all the job-rich posts in New York City except postmaster, which went to William Brady. Hone, the naval officer, was a wealthy patrician, not a partisan activist, and William LeRoy, the naval agent, was Webster's brother-in-law, not Weed's subaltern. Seward and Weed did keep the dangerous Young out of the customs house, but Taylor appointed him subtreasurer in New York and named Hugh Maxwell customs collector. Nominally unaligned with either Weed or Fillmore, Maxwell quickly became Young's virtual puppet. The two would throw the considerable forces they could hire behind Fillmore and the Clay conservatives in a prolonged and increasingly bitter battle with Weed for control of the Whig state organization itself.⁶⁰

Outraged by Seward's interference in the Buffalo appointments, mortified that "my recommendations in my own State and even my own city have been disregarded," stung by the growing criticism of friends, and humiliated that the administration had not sought his advice "as to the policy to be pursued," the normally torpid Fillmore finally stirred himself to wage open warfare against his tormentors. Like Maryland's Pearce and Pennsylvania's Cooper, he and his allies determined to seek rejection of Taylor's nominations by the Senate, a tack that, significantly, required them to seek help from Democratic Senator Daniel S. Dickinson. Once aroused, however, Fillmore refused to wait until Congress met. He and his allies determined to effect "a radical change of state officers" in 1849 by capturing the Whigs' state organization from Weed and the "Regency influences at Albany."

Conservatives launched a two-pronged assault on Weed. A consortium including Fillmore, Fuller, Alex Mann, editor of the Rochester American, Young, John Bush, and James Kidd, a wealthy Albany businessman who bankrolled the operation, tried to buy out Weed's interest in the Albany Evening Journal and convert it into a conservative Whig organ. Failing that, they intended to supplant Weed's paper by starting a rival conservative Whig sheet at Albany. During the summer, Weed offered to sell his paper to Fillmore, Bush, and Kidd. But he was only stalling to delay establishment of the new paper, and negotiations broke down. Weed achieved his immediate tactical goal, however; the conservatives' Albany New York State Register did not begin publication until March 1850, too late to help them in 1849.⁶²

That delay mattered, for Fillmore's second line of assault in 1849 was to create, for the first time, a statewide conservative Whig organization that could compete with the Weed-dominated Whig state central committee and "counteract the central dictation at Albany." This new organization was to gain control of the county conventions that chose delegates to the state convention, which, in turn, would select the Whigs' state ticket for 1849. That year every important state office except governor and lieutenant governor was up for election: comptroller, treasurer, auditor, secretary of state, state engineer, attorney general, and a canal commissioner—in short, a majority of the canal board. For conservatives shut out of state and federal patronage jobs, capture of the state convention and control of the party's nominations for elected offices appeared to be their last hope to topple Weed's "regency," and they were determined that "no stone" be "left unturned" to bring about that defeat. If Weed retained control of the party's nominations, conservatives were prepared to resort to one last desperate measure to defeat him. They would cooperate with Hunker Democrats, who seemed likely again to nominate a separate ticket, to defeat Weed's Whig candidates and thereby deprive Weed of the state offices. 63

Building a rival Whig organization from scratch was easier said than done. Young and Maxwell packed the New York City Whig convention with federal employees hostile to Weed, but the real problem was the rest of the state. The state committee's list of local activists was unavailable to Fillmore and was composed primarily of Weed's henchmen in any event. Fillmore therefore had to identify and facilitate coordination among reliable conservatives in scores of counties across the state who could seize command of local and county conventions. To do so secretly, so that Weed could not infiltrate his organization, was impossible in an age without telephones. In May, Jerome Fuller sent out a circular asking for the names of reliable men "opposed to certain Regency influences at Albany." Clumsily, in July and again in September, Fillmore mailed copies of similar circulars over his own signature from Buffalo, thus opening himself up to the charge, which Seward quickly lodged with the cabinet, that the vice president was trying to split the state party. Frustrated conservatives were nonetheless overjoyed at the chance finally to dethrone Weed. "The organization suggested by you is much needed," approved Kidd from Albany. "I long to see the great Whig party of New York the party of the People and not the instrument of intriguants and Demagogues," chimed a recipient from the Hudson Valley.64

Inevitably, Weed's men learned of Fillmore's effort, and Whigs from other states who visited New York that fall were astonished by the openness and ferocity of the factional warfare. Seward carped to Meredith that his subtreasurer, Young, was helping Fillmore "to divide and distract" the state party and sent some of the names Fillmore had gathered as men the cabinet should proscribe from federal jobs. Weed redoubled his exertions to control the state convention. He had Horace Greeley and Seward draw up its platform and address in advance. Convinced that the spread of antislavery sentiment in Whig ranks could "defeat the factionalists of our own party," Seward devoted the bulk of the address to denunciations of slavery and slavery expansion, precisely the emphasis that galled conservatives. While Young and Maxwell commanded their employees to oppose the incumbent state administration, and while Bokee circulated a letter he had pried from Navy Secretary Preston asserting that Taylor's administration wanted the present state officeholders dumped, Weed retaliated by ordering the U.S. marshals and their deputies under his command to bring loyal Sewardite delegates to the Syracuse state convention.65

Fillmore's counteroffensive of 1849 was therefore crushed. Weed's forces dominated the convention by a two-to-one margin. It nominated his handpicked ticket for state officers and adopted Seward's antislavery address that conservatives found so offensive. Fillmorites left the convention "disgusted & indignant, whispering threats of disunion," but by September their last-ditch ploy of fusing with Hunker Democrats was no longer available. By finessing their differences over the Wilmot Proviso, the Hunkers and Barnburners managed an uneasy union behind a common ticket for the first time in three years. From Buffalo, Spaulding gloated that Fillmore was now ready "to exhibit the white flag," but Weed and Seward knew the party's condition was precarious. Democratic reunification ended divisions they had counted on for victory since 1846. Conservative Whigs could still express dissatisfaction by staying home on election day, and reliable rumors circulated that Young and Maxwell were ordering their minions to sabotage the Whig ticket in New York City. The approaching 1849 state election had the earmarks of a calamity.⁶⁶

VI

From its inception, the Taylor administration had shaped its patronage decisions with an eye toward the 1849 state and congressional elections. That year's election cycle also profoundly influenced the policies that the administration prepared to recommend to the new Congress in December. Patronage allocation constituted only one part of the attempt to transform the Whigs into a broader Taylor Republican party. Building a national consensus on issues that had long divided Whigs from Democrats and Northerners from Southerners was its complementary strategy. By any objective standard, the administration's distribution of jobs was an unmitigated disaster for the Whig party. By the same standard, in contrast, the policies it sought to implement were wise, politically shrewd, and potentially of great benefit to the nation. Unfortunately for Taylor and the Whig party, however, those policies became victims of the rancor provoked by the patronage component of the new party initiative.

By far the most pressing and seemingly most intractable problem confronting the new administration was the sectionally divisive territorial question that Congress had failed to resolve prior to Taylor's inauguration. The wave of fortune hunters flooding California's gold fields rendered establishment of civil government in the Mexican Cession imperative. The readiness of northern and southern Democrats to outflank Whigs on the slavery extension issue in the 1849 elections simultaneously increased the difficulty of doing so in a way that was mutually acceptable to Northerners and Southerners and increased the political costs of not doing so. So long as the territorial question remained unresolved, that is, Whig candidates in both sections remained vulnerable to Democratic taunts that Taylor's administration planned to sell out their particular section's rights.

The Democratic-Free Soil coalition's success in the Ohio legislature at the start of 1849 alerted northern Whigs to the danger they faced from similar alliances forming in Indiana, Vermont, Massachusetts, and Connecticut. That threat had already caused them to kill the Preston Bill by adamantly insisting on adding the Wilmot Proviso to it, and in light of the apparent readiness of northern Democrats in 1849 to jettison popular sovereignty and reembrace the Proviso, they saw only political catastrophe in any retreat from it. Ohio Whigs, for example, repeatedly warned Ewing that their only hope lay in cutting "the throat of the Free Soil party" by winning back Whig defectors. To achieve that, Congress must pass and Taylor must sign the Proviso, which "has now become a sine qua non with us." Should Taylor instead veto it, "the Whig party is ruined forever."

As the administration well knew, however, southern Whigs facing gubernatorial and congressional campaigns in 1849 could never accept enactment of the Proviso, even if they believed the Cession unfit for slavery. From Virginia to Louisiana, Democrats flayed Whig congressmen for refusing to sign Calhoun's Southern Address and predicted that they would betray the South on the Proviso too. Returning to Georgia from Congress, where he had championed Preston's plan to admit California as a free state, Robert Toombs discovered that "public feeling in the South is much stronger than many of us supposed." Passage "of the Wilmot Proviso would lead to civil war," he warned Preston in May, and even California's admission as a free state would create "bitterness of feeling." "Proslavery feeling is growing stronger and more bitter," echoed Kentucky Congressman C. S. Morehead. Kentucky's Whigs could not bear any additional antislavery weight, Morehead told Clayton. "The Wilmot Proviso must never come before Genl. Taylor for his approval or rejection, if we intend to maintain our party ascendancy." 68

The spring elections provided ample evidence of how easily Whigs could be whipsawed by antislavery Democratic campaigns in the North and proslavery Democratic campaigns in the South and why it was therefore necessary to resolve the territorial question. The New Hampshire and Rhode Island elections reaffirmed New England Whigs' commitment to the Proviso. Whigs retained control of the state government and both congressional seats in the latter, and by combining with Free Soilers behind a pro-Proviso platform they managed to reelect Congressmen Amos Tuck and James Wilson in the former. Connecticut's results in early April, however, shocked Whigs across the country.

In both 1847 and 1848 Whigs had carried the Nutmeg State handily. As they confidently approached the 1849 elections, they controlled all four House seats, both U.S. Senate seats, the governorship, and both houses of the state legislature. Adamantly opposed to slavery extension, Connecticut's Whig leaders had stressed their commitment to the Proviso to hold the state for Taylor in November 1848, and in 1849 they anticipated a reprise of the three-way presidential race. The state's leading antislavery Democrat, lame-duck Senator John M. Niles, had joined the Free Soilers and would be their gubernatorial candidate. His defection and Gideon Welles' absence in Washington left Connecticut's Democrats under the leadership of a conservative triumvirate—Isaac Toucey, attorney general during the Polk administration's final year; Alfred E. Burr, editor of the Hartford Times; and Thomas Seymour, the Democrats' gubernatorial candidate. All three proudly clung to popular sovereignty and openly denounced the Wilmot Proviso as the radical doctrine of traitors to the Democrats.

With Democrats divided and their candidates taking a discredited position on the territorial issue, another Whig triumph seemed assured. Over the angry protests of Toucey, Burr, and Seymour, however, Democrats combined with Free Soilers in three congressional districts and carried all three, even though Whig candidates trumpeted their own antislavery credentials. Because of Free Soil gains in the legislature, moreover, Whigs lost their majority in the house and had it reduced in the senate. Whig legislators still managed to elect Joseph Trumbull governor. Trumbull, however, lacked an outright majority because his vote dropped by 10 percent from Whig turnout in the two previous gubernatorial elections, while Niles, with only 6 percent of the total, had achieved the magical balance of power between the major parties.⁶⁹

Various observers cited anger at the slow removal of Democrats, Trumbull's alienation of Protestants by wooing Catholic voters, and the unpopularity of two of the defeated Whig congressional candidates, Hartford's Charles Chaplin and New Haven's James F. Babcock, for the Whigs' poor showing. But the explanation that carried weight was Niles' boast that "this is altogether a free soil triumph."

Though small, Connecticut's Free Soil party could defeat Whigs by combining with Democrats. Democrats certainly recognized that fact. In the ensuing session, again over the protests of Toucey, Burr, and Seymour, Democratic legislators caucused with Free Soilers and supported Free Soil resolutions instructing the state's two Whig United States senators to vote against confirmation of any federal officeholder who owned slaves and against the admission of any more slave states. As long as the territorial issue gave life to the Free Soil party, in short, Connecticut's Whigs remained vulnerable.⁷⁰

Three weeks after Connecticut's shock, the other blade of the sectional shears closed on Whigs in Virginia. Having won half of the popular vote and six of fifteen congressional seats in 1847, they saw Democrats sweep fourteen districts and their popular vote dip to 45.6 percent in 1849. This wipeout, many southern Whigs complained, exposed the fatuity of not sacking Democratic patronage holders, yet Democrats' exploitation of the slavery issue chiefly accounted for the result. Democrats touted the Southern Address, and Jeremiah Morton, the lone Whig congressional winner, attracted Democratic support and defeated the district's Whig incumbent, John Pendleton, by pillorying him for failing to sign Calhoun's manifesto.⁷¹ In contrast, the state legislative races, in which slavery was not a salient issue, saw Whigs' share of house seats slip only from 48 to 46 percent. Virginia's voters, in sum, singled out Whig congressional candidates, who might betray the South on the territorial issue, for repudiation.

During April, between the Connecticut and Virginia elections, Taylor's administration, following advice from Crittenden and Illinois' Congressman-elect Edward Baker, devised a policy for the Mexican Cession that, it hoped, could satisfy both northern and southern Whigs. "The slavery question is the only really formidable obstacle in the way of the Administration," argued Crittenden, and it could "only be effectively removed by the admission of California into the Union as a State." Like Crittenden, Baker urged Clayton to send agents to California to foster its application for statehood before Congress met in December. "The permanency of Whig ascendancy may depend upon it," since Whigs would get credit for "the settlement of a very dangerous question" and probably two additional Whig United States senators from California to boot."

Having been repeatedly warned that enactment of the Proviso would destroy the Whig party, the administration sought to avoid a formal territorial stage to which the Proviso could be applied by resurrecting the defeated Preston plan through executive, not congressional, initiative. But they were determined to do their petitioners one better. By itself, California statehood would not finesse the territorial question, for it would leave the remainder of the huge Mexican Cession as a focus of agitation over the divisive Proviso. To avert that threat completely, the entire Mexican Cession would have to be admitted as states so that no area remained to require territorial organization by Congress.

That was the administration's bold solution. Savannah Whig Congressman Thomas Butler King was despatched by sea to California to urge its residents to form a civil government, although Clayton explicitly instructed him to say nothing about whether Californians should write a proslavery or antislavery state constitution. Simultaneously, James S. Calhoun, whom Taylor sent as Indian agent to Santa Fe, was to encourage New Mexicans to write a constitution and apply for statehood. Less well known to historians, Utah, then called Deseret, was also encompassed by Taylor's visionary plan. To ensure that the flourishing settlement of Mormons near Salt Lake was included in the statehood scheme, Taylor appointed the Missourian John Wilson as Indian agent to it and instructed him to persuade the Mormons to join the Union as part of the new state of California. If that state proved too large to manage, as it undoubtedly would have, Taylor suggested, it could later be divided.

While Wilson would travel overland and King by sea, Taylor expected the two men to act in tandem. If Wilson obtained Mormons' consent to this stunning proposal, he was to proceed west with Mormon representatives to rendezvous with King in San Francisco, so that the Mormons could attend the California constitutional convention King had arranged and sprawling Utah could be included within the boundaries of the new state of California. King, meanwhile, was to delay proceedings in California until he heard from Wilson and then persuade Californians to include Deseret in their new state. On April 18, Clayton confidently informed Crittenden, "As to California and New Mexico, I have been wide awake. The plan I proposed to you last winter will be carried out. The States will be admitted—free and Whig."

Breathtaking in scope and ingenious in conception, Taylor's policy, if successfully implemented, had brilliant political potential. Unlike the aborted Preston Bill, it eliminated the entire territorial question, for the status of slavery in other federal territories was already determined. It could thereby render the Proviso obsolete and eradicate the Free Soil party's rationale. While violating Whigs' preference for a passive executive and an active legislature, the plan's shrewdest feature circumvented Congress by having state governments formed in advance of congressional enabling legislation, thereby depriving northern Whigs of the opportunity and incentive to repeat the torpedoing of the Preston Bill by imposing the insulting Wilmot Proviso. His plan gave them the substance of free soil and two new free states without having to enact it. Nor would they have to stomach the surrender of additional land to the slave state of Texas, for Taylor's plan made no concession to Texas' claim to the entire area east of the Rio Grande. He intended to admit the entire former Mexican province of New Mexico, which stretched almost to San Antonio, as a state.⁷⁴ At the same time, northern Democrats who had abandoned popular sovereignty in 1849 and those who had supported Taylor as a national hero in 1848 might be expected to go along.

Southern Whigs who embraced the Preston Bill in February also could be expected to concur. Taylor's plan averted what they most dreaded—enactment by a northern congressional majority of legislation barring slaveholders from the territories and the possibility of a presidential signature on such legislation. Taylor's plan saved southern honor and allowed southern Whigs to assert that, just as they had promised, Taylor had stopped northern aggressions on Southern Rights by resolving the issue that prompted those aggressions.

During the summer and fall, however, far from Washington and the eastern states holding elections, Taylor's plan unraveled. Incredibly, Wilson persuaded the Mormons to become part of California, and several of them, expecting to serve as delegates to the California constitutional convention, accompanied him on the arduous trek across the Sierra Nevada for his planned rendezvous with King. By the time Wilson and the Mormons reached San Francisco, however, it was too late. King reached that city on June 4, only to find that on the previous day, at Monterey, Brevet Major General Bennet Riley, the military governor of California, had issued a proclamation calling a constitutional convention to meet there on September 1. Ignoring his instructions to await word from Wilson about the Mormons' intentions, King plunged into the business of touring California with Riley and General P. F. Smith to sell its residents on applying immediately for statehood rather than awaiting congressional authorization. In September the convention wrote and forwarded to Washington a constitution that prohibited slavery from the new state and claimed its modern-day boundaries. King later unblushingly denied that his mission and Wilson's were related. The furious Wilson, in turn, charged that King had violated his instructions because of his eagerness to secure one of California's Senate seats. Whoever was at fault, an extraordinary opportunity had been lost.⁷⁵

As the administration hoped, California applied for admission as a free state to the Thirty-First Congress, but it did not encompass Utah in its boundaries. Deseret and the Mormons remained in limbo. The vexatious territorial question remained alive no matter what happened to California. The administration's plans for New Mexico also went awry. At the urging of James Calhoun and federal military officers, its residents held a convention in September. Rather than drafting a constitution and applying for statehood, however, they only requested Congress to grant them formal territorial status, a request that left the worsening boundary dispute with Texas unsettled and virtually guaranteed a renewal of the divisive feud over the Proviso. Even before receiving this bleak news, Taylor had despatched a new military commander to New Mexico with orders to advance statehood "if the people of New Mexico desired" it, but the chance to preempt Congress before it met was lost."

Before news of these developments in the West reached Washington, the 1849 elections had been held. And while Taylor's policy for the Mexican Cession was largely intended to shelter northern and southern Whigs from Democratic shafts on the slavery extension issue, he and his advisors wanted to conceal their plans during the 1849 campaigns themselves. As both Crittenden and Morehead anxiously warned Clayton in April, formation of states in the Cession was imperative to avoid enactment of the Proviso, but it was equally imperative, given the sensitivity of Southerners about equal treatment and the demands from Free Soilers for imposing the Proviso on formally organized territorial governments, to avoid any public indication that administration agents had pressured Californians and New Mexicans to apply for statehood and especially that they sought antislavery state constitutions. Morehead was particularly emphatic that "everything connected with it should be kept a most profound secret," even from other members of the cabinet. "The two extremes of North and South are already at work to prevent such a consummation, and if you do not act with circumspection and at the same time with energy, you will find yourself defeated before you know it."

While exposure of the project during the 1849 campaign season carried potential risks, however, the administration's resolute silence left Whig candidates vulnerable to the same Democratic and Free Soil charges that had proved so lethal in Connecticut and Virginia. Southern Democrats endlessly predicted that Taylor would betray the South by signing the Proviso; northern Democrats and Free Soilers chorused that he would veto it. For the welfare of Whig candidates, even North Carolina's former Democratic Senator William H. Haywood admitted, Taylor's "equivocal attitude in this Proviso question" was "the very weakest position he could assume."

Regardless of its impact on Whig candidates, the administration doggedly maintained that position as long as possible. A Cincinnati Whig, for example, frantically warned Ewing in July that the October state elections would "turn mainly or entirely upon the Slavery proviso." Hence, Ohio Whigs "are in embarrassing suspense for want of some revelation of the policy to be expected on that head from the Administration." Yet Ewing refused to divulge that Taylor meant to avert the occasion for enacting the Proviso. Admitting in a letter intended for publication in Cincinnati that Westerners understandably took "the most interest [in] the course of the President on the question of Slavery in the Territories," Ewing affirmed his belief that Taylor would sign the Proviso should Congress pass it. But, he added, Taylor "does not say, & he ought not to say anything on the subject in advance of their action." By the end of August many anxious northern Whigs were still in the dark about Taylor's intentions. "The sails of many of the Whig journals seemed to be shivering in the wind, as if uncertain which tack to take," a New Yorker complained. "The administration takes no line of policy and marks out no course of action." As late as November 29, on the very eve of the new Congress, New York's Governor Hamilton Fish begged information from Seward on what Taylor's policy on slavery extension would be so that he would not contradict it in his annual message to the state legislature.79

For most of 1849, therefore, Whig candidates were deprived of vital ammunition and left to fend for themselves against taunts about Taylor's probable reaction to the Proviso. Southern election returns in August suggested the wisdom of the administration's calculated silence—but also the foolishness of trying to conciliate Democrats on patronage. In Kentucky, Alabama, and North Carolina, Whigs elected the same number of congressmen as in 1847. Nonetheless, they failed to contest Alabama's governorship and lost seats in both houses of Kentucky's legislature. More ominously, Democrats gained control of Kentucky's impending constitutional convention by charging that Whigs were unreliable on the slavery issue, and everyone expected them to write a constitution that dramatically reversed the partisan balance in the state. In Tennessee, where Democrats flogged Whigs on the slavery issue, the Whig vote declined and the Democratic vote increased by 6 percent. Incumbent Whig Governor Neil Brown was defeated, Whigs lost one congressional seat, and they remained a minority in the lower house of the state legislature. Public knowledge of Taylor's plan, in sum, very likely would have increased Whig losses in those states.80

If concealment helped limit southern Whigs' losses in August, however, it proved calamitous for Indiana's Whigs that month. In the doldrums for most of the 1840s, they had won a majority of the legislature and four of ten congressional seats in 1847. In 1848, however, Democrats took the August and November elections handily, and by the start of 1849 some Whigs thought they should avoid running a gubernatorial candidate so as not to incite an overpowering Democratic backlash in August. Others, however, wanted to use that race to win back the approximately 5,000 Whig defectors to Van Buren and an additional 5,000 Whig voters who had abstained rather than support Taylor, but they split over how to do it. Some, described as "ultra," "over-zealous free-soil Whigs," demanded an open merger with Free Soilers behind a common gubernatorial candidate like Joseph Cravens or John H. Bradley, former Whigs who had decamped to the Free Soilers. Insisting that that tack would inevitably alienate conservative Indiana Whigs of southern origin, some, like influential editor John Defrees, argued that the party instead must nominate "some good old-fashioned Whig." Whipsawed by conflicting advice, Whigs straddled. The January state convention adopted a stridently antislavery platform and nominated incumbent Whig Congressman Elisha Embree, one of Taylor's early congressional backers, for governor.⁸¹

This two-faced strategy instantly collapsed. Pointing out that two Indiana Whig congressmen, George Dunn and Richard W. Thompson, had voted against Gott's resolution to ban the District of Columbia's slave trade, while Caleb Smith had ducked that vote, Free Soilers mocked Whigs' supposed antislavery commitment as sheer hypocrisy. Embree, who had voted for Gott's resolution, declined the gubernatorial nomination, forcing Whigs to undertake an embarrassingly prolonged search for a successor. One Whig after another refused to run, causing Defrees to moan about the party's "bad fix about a candidate for Governor" and Democrats to scorn Whigs' feebleness. Finally, in May, a vociferous critic of the Free Soilers, Joel A. Matson, consented to run, thereby ending any chance of recapturing Whig Free Soilers. "The bumbling empyrics who manage" the Whigs, Bradley exploded to Ewing, had handed both the state and congressional elections to the Democrats by alienating Free Soil voters. "End of the State and congressional elections to the Democrats by alienating Free Soil voters."

Once Whigs muffed their own bid for Free Soil support, Democrats co-opted it. They jettisoned popular sovereignty in 1849 and reembraced the Proviso. They ran fusion legislative tickets with Free Soilers in northern Indiana. Most significantly, in Caleb Smith's congressional district, where Samuel W. Parker ran as the Whig candidate, Democrats backed Free Soiler George W. Julian for Congress in return for Free Soil support for Democratic legislative tickets. An erstwhile Whig like his father-in-law, Joshua Giddings, Julian savaged Whigs' promise to keep slavery out of the Mexican Cession as hollow. Under the slaveholder Taylor, he fulminated, the national administration remained mum about "the alarming encroachments of the Slave Power" and sought to divert public attention by engaging "in a hopeless attempt to drag certain defunct measures of [economic] policy from the grave into which they were sinking and re-animate them with life." The refusal of Taylor's administration to publicize its plans for the Mexican Cession, in sum, only supplied Whigs' Indiana foes with evidence of their purported indifference to the slavery issue.⁸³

The August elections, in the words of one stunned Indiana Whig, "proved truly disastrous." Since 1840, Whigs had never trailed Democrats by more than 4,000 votes in a statewide race, but in 1849 the margin was almost 10,000. In contrast to the four Whigs elected to Congress in 1847, only Edward McGaughey won in 1849, along with Julian and eight Democrats. Reduced to only 45.6 percent of the popular vote, Whigs also suffered significant losses in legislative races, trailing Democrats in the next legislature by eighteen seats in the house and eight in the senate, which they still controlled after the 1848 state elections. As a final blow, the Democratic majority approved a call for a constitutional convention that most Indiana Whigs, like those in Kentucky and Ohio, deeply—and properly—dreaded. "We are beat terribly and I fear, finally, in Indiana," exclaimed one disconsolate Whig, and another lamented that "our state is beyond redemption."

Members of Taylor's administration viewed the August returns from the South, where Whig losses were minimal and confined primarily to Tennessee, with equanimity, but they could not shrug off Indiana's results. By the end of August, Whigs had lost a net of twelve congressional seats, and recouping those losses in Maryland, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas later that year seemed virtually impossible. Mississippi, Louisiana, and Georgia also had impending gubernatorial elections, but after August the bulk of the remaining elections for state officers and legislators were scheduled for the North-Vermont and Maine in September; Ohio, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey in October; and Wisconsin, Michigan, New York, and Massachusetts in November. The Free Soil party was strong in all those states except Pennsylvania and New Iersey, and the Connecticut and Indiana elections dramatically demonstrated that so long as the administration concealed its policy for the Mexican Cession, Whig candidates could be crucified by Free Soil-Democratic alliances that impugned Taylor's still unknown intentions and took advanced antislavery ground. In Vermont, for example, a Democratic-Free Soil coalition adopted a platform in June that flatly condemned "American slavery [as] a great evil and wrong, which ought to be repented of and abandoned" and that instructed Congress to exclude slavery from the territories, abolish the slave trade in the District of Columbia, and prohibit the admission of any more slave states. Protecting northern Whigs from what a Vermonter called this "most odious and corrupt coalition" required the administration to supply the necessary ammunition for self-defense.85

Quite unlike twentieth-century presidents and their cabinet members, who usually feel or feign almost total indifference to off-year state elections that do not directly affect the balance of partisan power in Washington, Taylor and especially his cabinet members cared deeply about the outcome of these impending northern contests. In the nineteenth century, of course, state legislatures elected United States senators, but no Senate seats Whigs currently held or had a chance of taking were affected by the remaining state legislative races in the North. Rather, relations between state and national politicians were far closer than in this century because the sense of common party identity was stronger and because politicians in Washington depended on state and local organizations to mobilize voters for them. Off-year elections were studied for signs of the party's popularity as a whole, not just of an isolated and insignificant segment of it, particularly when state governments had jurisdiction over matters Whigs and Democrats alike deemed vital. State elections, in sum, were the equivalent of modern public opinion polls. That is why Taylor's men were intent upon building up state Whig administrations with federal patronage, and that effort would fail if Whigs lost state elections. Defeat in Pennsylvania would also doom the attempt of Taylor and Clayton to sell northern Whigs on the desirability of creating a new Taylor Republican party. Beyond these considerations, Ewing, Meredith, and Collamer had a personal stake in the welfare of state Whig parties in Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Vermont, and Clayton's interest in Pennsylvania matched Meredith's.

By August all cabinet members were receiving cries of alarm from northern Whigs still facing elections, but Ewing came under the most pressure from his home state. Stung by the success of the Democratic-Free Soil coalition in the winter legislative session, Ohio's Whigs most feared the Democratic threat to their state economic programs, especially since the electorate in October would decide whether to call a constitutional convention as well as pick a new legislature. Unless Whigs won back defectors to the Free Soilers, Columbus Delano warned Ewing, "radical locofocism & radical abolitionism" would control the constitutional convention. To lure back wayward Whigs, counseled another correspondent, "Our contest in 1849 should be on State questions. Our currency and revenue policy, and with them state credit and prosperity are the great questions." Whigs must therefore cultivate Whig-Free Soilers "who have desired and still desire harmony on our currency and revenue policy."

Former Whigs in Free Soil ranks did indeed still cherish the Whig economic program. But they feared that by returning to the Whig party, they would surrender Free Soil machinery to Chase and his friends, who sought a fusion with Democrats "for the sole purpose of putting down our excellent system of Whig state policy." The only way Whigs could safely reunite to save their state economic program, a Whig-Free Soiler told Ewing, was to break down the Free Soilers by guaranteeing free soil in the Mexican Cession, for it was the Proviso issue and only the Proviso issue that Free Soilers were using to fuse with Democrats behind common legislative candidates. "Something must be speedily done to change matters on the Reserve" to avert "the most calamitous consequences," Ewing was warned in May. Whatever Whigs' priorities, in short, they had to neutralize Free Soilers on the slavery extension issue—something they could never do, Ewing was repeatedly told, unless Taylor, not Ewing, made Taylor's intentions for the Mexican Cession public.⁸⁷

After Indiana's August 6 election, therefore, Ewing and other cabinet members knew that they must reassure northern voters that Taylor intended to keep slavery out of the Mexican Cession in order to salvage Ohio and other northern states. Publicizing that intention might hazard Whig prospects in Georgia, Mississippi, Louisiana, and perhaps even Maryland. But nine northern states had yet to vote, five of which Taylor had carried, and in six of them, including the nation's three largest states, Whig governors whom the administration was determined to bolster still reigned.

By early August, in fact, the administration's shroud of secrecy had already been partially lifted. Newspaper stories circulated in Georgia and other Deep South states about Thomas Butler King's journey to California and his speeches urging Californians to apply for statehood. Details of Taylor's three-pronged strategy remained unknown and conventions in California and New Mexico had yet to assemble, but even these stories provoked the hostile reaction among Southerners that Crittenden and Morehead had predicted in April. King's mission "appears to me to betray weakness—and an apprehension in reference to the Slavery question which should have been veiled from the public eye," a nervous Georgia Whig wrote Senator John M. Berrien. Every sensible man in the South knew that free states would eventually be carved from the Mexican Cession, "but why should the President despatch a messenger to hasten an event which will certainly happen?" 88

By mid-August, in sum, the political cost of reassuring northern Whigs had declined even as the necessity of doing so had increased. The cat was already out of the bag in the South. Southern Whigs would reap the consequences of its escape no matter what the administration told the North. Nonetheless, the administration could not completely reveal its plan, for in August it was still not certain that California and New Mexico would apply for admission as free states. Rather, it could only indicate its opposition to slavery extension in a way that did not commit it to the Wilmot Proviso.

How to get this message out proved as delicate a problem as what to say. The Whigs' biggest difficulty in the North remained distrust of the slaveholder Taylor himself. To allay that suspicion word must come directly from him, not his newspaper or a cabinet member. During the nineteenth century, however, presidents did not hold press conferences. There was no radio or television on which to address the nation, even if there had been a pretext for doing so. Taylor could not issue a proclamation about a policy that had not been fully implemented, nor could he send a message to a Congress that was not in session. Fortunately for the Whigs, however, Taylor had long planned a trip through Pennsylvania and New York to enhance his personal popularity, the rock upon which, Clayton and Crittenden insisted, a new party could be built.

Taylor left Washington by train for Pennsylvania on August 9, three days after Indianans voted and while the new telegraph reported how they had done so. As he traveled west across southern Pennsylvania from Lancaster, York, and Harrisburg to Pittsburgh, he studiously ignored the slavery question and stressed the tariff issue in speeches to crowds along the way. The preferred site for the announcement on slavery had been carefully selected. His target was Ohio's Western Reserve. On August 23 at Mercer, a town south of Erie in northwestern Pennsylvania and, more significantly, close to Ohio and the eastern edge of the Reserve, Taylor made his antislavery declaration. Although the issuance of some free-soil statement cannot be questioned, exactly what Taylor declared is unclear, for newspapers either ignored or disagreed about precisely what he said. According to his most assiduous biographer, he announced, "The people of the North need have no apprehension of the further extension of slavery. The necessity of a third party would soon be obviated." 89

Taylor said nothing specific at Mercer or anywhere else on his trip about how slavery extension would be stopped. That very night, indeed, he became so sick that he made no more speeches, and newspapers reported on his current health, not his past remarks. Some northern Whigs, therefore, remained mystified about his territorial policy until he sent his message to Congress in December. Others took his opposition to slavery extension as a promise to sign the Proviso. Campaigning against the Free Soil-Democratic coalition on Ohio's Western Reserve, Benjamin Wade rejoiced that "things look bright here" when he read reports of Taylor's remarks. "The Whigs were never in better spirits," and "Old Zack's declaration in favor of free territory altogether make it rather hard sledding" for the enemy. 90

With considerably less enthusiasm, southern Whigs more accurately grasped the meaning of Taylor's announcement. It explained the purpose of King's mission to California and placed the man whom they had promised would never betray his fellow slaveholders squarely against slavery expansion. However much the Mercer speech may have aided its intended northern beneficiaries, when word of it filtered south in September and October, it crippled Whigs in Georgia, Mississippi, and Louisiana as much as if Taylor had openly endorsed the hated Proviso itself. The prediction of an Alabama Whig the previous December that "the whole South in two years will come out and repudiate Gen. Taylor on account of his slavery notions" was coming true ahead of schedule.⁹¹

VIII

That most of Taylor's Pennsylvania speeches focused on the tariff reflected an important fact. Slavery extension might be the key issue in Ohio's Western Reserve and in parts of New York and New England, but it was not in Pennsylvania and New Jersey. There the continuing depression in the coal and iron industries generated cries for increased tariff rates, not restriction of slavery. When Pennsylvania's 1849 Democratic state convention again defended the Walker Tariff, therefore, Pennsylvania's Whigs, who believed attacks on that law had won over Democratic voters in manufacturing and mining districts in 1848, happily made demands for more protection the centerpiece of their own platform. "This is the one question upon which the Whigs have always carried Pennsylvania, and it is the only one upon which it can be carried," ex-Congressman Andrew Stewart wrote Meredith in July, advice he repeated to Taylor himself.⁹²

Even Taylor's tour, however, did not sufficiently reassure Pennsylvania's nervous and divided Whigs, who feared a catastrophe in the October elections. On August 18, in the midst of Taylor's visit, Morton McMichael, the new chairman of the Whig state committee, urged Meredith, whom everyone expected to formulate the administration's economic policy, to tour the state's coal and iron regions himself in order to inspire confidence that the administration would seek higher duties. "Gen. T's visit has thus far undoubtedly been of service, but in the particular quarters indicated a visit from you I feel confident would be of far more." Five days later, McMichael again begged Meredith personally to reassure the state's depressed mill and mine owners that the administration would "save them from ruin" and to convince "the farmers, mechanics, and laborers—especially those who delve in coal fields & sweat over forges & ply the shuttle"—that it would fulfill the promises Pennsylvania's Whigs had made during the 1848 campaign. "Save the sweat over forges and the shuttle sampaign."

Such pressure meant that the administration had to do more in 1849 than devise a solution for the Mexican Cession. It had to address the economic concerns of crucial constituents. By August, in fact, Meredith was already concocting recommendations for tariff revision to submit to Congress in December. Yet the pleas he received exposed two problems about that effort. First, as with the administration's territorial policies, no one knew precisely what Meredith would recommend. Alerted by the reporter James Harvey, who had seen preliminary drafts of the report, that it, not the plan for the Mexican Cession, would be the most important document issued by the administration, the cautious Meredith refused to discuss or release any parts of the report until it was completed. Thus, he spurned McMichael's requests to visit the state.⁹⁴

Second, perfectionism was not the only reason Meredith hesitated to reassure Pennsylvanians that the promises its Whigs had made in 1848 would be honored. Pennsylvania's Whigs had not simply promised a higher tariff, but also repeal of the Walker Tariff and restoration of the highly protective Whig tariff of 1842, just as New England's Whigs had flatly demanded repeal of the Independent Treasury Act to ease the credit crunch that palsied their economy. As Meredith well knew, restoring the tariff of 1842 and abolishing the subtreasury system smacked of ultra Whiggery and thus violated the wishes of Taylor and his closest advisors like Crittenden, Clayton, Bullitt, and Burnley to jettison the stigma of ultra Whiggery and, in Fillmore's words, instead to take "a middle course" on "old party issues." Fulfilling Whig promises, in short, would revive the partisan strife Taylor was determined to abate. Even the sycophantic Andrew Stewart, who had been denied renomination for Congress in 1848, who had unsuccessfully sought a cabinet post, and who still hoped for an appointment from the administration, advised Taylor that in his speeches to Pennsylvanians he must shun ultra Whiggery, lest he alienate Democrats who had supported him. Thus he must say nothing about repealing the subtreasury system or funding internal improvements. Nor, Stewart cooed, need Taylor promise to restore the tariff of 1842, no matter what Pennsylvania Whigs had said in 1848. He should simply tout the advantages of specific rates over ad valorem duties, which is precisely what Taylor did 95

Meredith had already decided on such a policy, and during the summer and fall he prepared his Treasury report with exceptional thoroughness. Despite pressure from Pennsylvania, he opted to replace ad valorem duties with the lowest specific rates that would offer adequate protection, not to return to the high rates of 1842. To ascertain what those rates might be, the former corporation lawyer endeavored to educate himself on the intricacies of the tariff and other federal economic policies. He sent circulars to customs collectors, subtreasurers, and naval officers around the country seeking information on how the public warehouse system, the subtreasury system, and the Walker Tariff were working. In particular, he wanted factual evidence of fraud and gross undervaluation of imported goods under the Democrats' ad valorem rates in order to justify replacing them. In July, Meredith also enlisted Isaac R. Davis, Pennsylvania's deposed Whig state chairman, to coordinate an effort to write to Louisiana sugar planters, hemp growers in Kentucky and Missouri, coal mine operators and ironmakers in Pennsylvania and New Jersey, and textile manufacturers in New England to suggest the lowest specific rates that would provide sufficient protection for their enterprises. With the help of Massachusetts Whigs, Davis wrote a new tariff bill, which he forwarded to Meredith in late September, listing precise rates on various products and estimating the differences in revenue it would earn compared to the Walker Tariff. All this information and analysis helped shape the report Meredith prepared for Congress.⁹⁶

Almost totally ignored by later historians obsessed with the sectional crisis but of intense interest to contemporary Whigs, the massive and remarkable report Meredith sent Congress in December encapsulated the Taylor administration's economic policy. Probiously meant to complement Taylor's effort to satisfy both Northerners and Southerners on the territorial question, it reflected his desire to trod "a middle course" on "old party issues" in order to build a new Taylor party. Eschewing traditional Whig charges that the subtreasury system caused depressions by sucking specie from the private economic sector, undermining bank note circulation, and strangling credit, Meredith simply said that Congress should determine the "expediency" of continuing it. He added, however, that the system was understaffed and required changes to facilitate the movement of government specie from points of accumulation to points of expenditure. Similarly, he did not call for repeal of the public warehousing system. Instead, he pointed out that it cost more to administer than it earned, strained the personnel resources of the customs service, and marked a "return to the system of credit upon duties, under a new name and form." A far cry from the angry Whig rhetoric of 1846, these words nonetheless represented a distinctively Whiggish critique.

The bulk of the report, apart from its staggeringly long appendixes, dealt with the tariff, and there Meredith took even more markedly Whig ground. He did not ask for reenactment of the 1842 tariff or present Davis' detailed bill, although he told Congress he could present a bill if requested to do so. Rather, he stressed two reasons for tariff revision that Whigs could—and emphatically did—applaud. Without saying that Whigs had predicted as much for two years, he declared that interest payments on debts incurred to fund the Mexican War ensured government deficits for the foreseeable future unless additional revenues were found, and they could only come from tariff duties. More important, in rhetoric reminiscent of Clay's stirring defenses of the American System, Meredith argued that the government had an obligation to encourage and protect manufacturing because the nation's economic future depended upon expansion of its industrial base.

"All history shows that where are the workshops of the world, there must be the marts of the world, and the heart of wealth, commerce, and power," Meredith asserted. "It is as vain to make these marts by providing warehouses," he skillfully skewered Democrats, "as it would be to make a crop by building a barn." Nor would fostering manufacturing harm agriculture and commerce, for, as Whigs had always maintained, all economic interests were interconnected. The more prosperous manufacturers and their workers became, the more they would consume from farmers and planters and the more they would produce to fuel commerce. The future of American merchants, Meredith contended, lay in shipping manufacturing products, not raw materials. With encouragement, he rhapsodized in a flight of rhetorical fancy, American textile manufacturers could process the South's entire cotton crop, not just the fraction they currently purchased.

To clinch his brilliant argument, Meredith provided a succinct and stunning contrast between the rationales for Democrats' doctrine of the negative state and Whig advocacy of the positive, activist state. "All legislation designed to favor a particular class to the prejudice of others, or to injure a particular class for the benefit of others, is manifestly unwise and unjust," he admitted in a tip of his hat to Democrats. "Nothing can be more destructive of the true interests of the country than such legislation, except the refusal of really salutary legislation under the erroneous impression that it might favor one class to the prejudice of others, while in fact the denial of it injures all classes, and benefits nobody." On the fundamental ideological issue regarding government's economic role, in short, Whigs were right!

Under the Walker Tariff, Meredith maintained, manufacturing interests that should be pulling the economy into a prosperous future lay stagnant and underdeveloped. Because of this, capitalists refused to invest in the necessary plants and machinery to launch an industrial takeoff. At Walker's instruction, goods were evaluated on the basis of foreign production costs, not American market prices, and with pauper labor, foreigners undersold American competitors and threatened to drive them entirely out of business. Because ad valorem tariff duties were based on a percentage of the foreign price and because that price fluctuated wildly, moreover, the instability and unpredictability of prices for manufactured goods in American markets prevented potential investors from making the necessary calculations of profit margins that would justify their sinking capital into manufacturing. Only permanent price levels that allowed reasonable predictability would foster capitalization of manufacturing, and only specific rather than ad valorem duties could produce price stability. Finally, he charged, ad valorem duties encouraged fraud and deliberate undervaluation that would drive honest importing merchants, as well as manufacturers, to the wall.

To remedy these evils and thereby catalyze manufacturing development, Meredith recommended four revisions of the Walker Tariff. Rates on foreign products that competed with American goods should be raised, although he listed no precise levels. On certain enumerated staples—coal, pig iron, finished iron products, wool and woolens, cotton textiles, sugar, hemp, and the like—specific duties, a fixed price per ton, yard, bushel, and so on should be substituted for ad valorem rates. On those goods on which it was impossible to levy specific duties, moreover, evaluations should be based on the American market price, not the foreign cost of production, so that foreign goods would always be priced higher than the American products with which they competed. Finally, to redress a loud complaint raised against the Walker Tariff, Congress must make sure that the rates on imported raw materials used by American manufacturers were lower than the rates on the finished products they made with those materials.

Here, then, was the blueprint for an economic policy on which Taylor hoped to build a new party that combined Whigs, Democrats, and Native Americans. Meredith had brilliantly tried to find a middle ground between traditional Whig and Democratic positions on economic issues, but the overall tilt suggested that the administration had finally understood the need to pacify Whigs outraged by its disastrous patronage policies. True, the report totally omitted traditional Whig demands for distributing federal land revenues to the states. But it projected those revenues as being inconsequential because so many land warrants had been issued to contractors and soldiers during the war—Mr. Polk's war, Whigs hardly needed to be reminded. The report was equally silent about subsidies for internal improvements, aside from funds for lighthouses, customs houses, and marine hospitals already under construction. Its pointed estimates of government deficits for the future sought to prevent the nettlesome subject of internal improvements from ever coming up for debate, even as they reminded people of the reason for those deficits—a war that Whigs abhorred. While it largely ignored Democrats' public warehousing and subtreasury systems, its gentle jabs at their inefficiency were meant to warm Whigs' hearts. Meredith did not insult Democrats by demanding a return to the Whig Tariff of 1842, and his arguments for protecting American miners and manufacturers and their employees undoubtedly aimed at cementing the allegiance of working-class Democrats and Native Americans who had supported Taylor in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Connecticut, and other manufacturing states. Nonetheless, his stunning case for governmental promotion of economic development was decidedly a Whig brief. By December 1849, when Meredith presented his report, in sum, the administration appeared to be signaling a retreat from the most destructive aspects of its new party initiative. By December, however, it was too late.

IX

The fall returns shattered whatever possibility had ever existed that Taylor could actually replace the Whig party with a new organization, and they also had enormous impact on Whigs' behavior in the impending congressional session. Without firm evidence of his administration's plans for the Cession and recommendations for economic reform to tout as a platform, Whig candidates fell in droves. What was known about King's mission to California and Taylor's free-soil remarks in Pennsylvania proved especially damaging in the South. In Louisiana, a state Tavlor had carried, for example, the Whig vote dropped by 6 percent and the Democratic turnout jumped by 20 percent since the previous November. Accordingly, Whigs' share of the total fell from Taylor's 54.6 percent to 48.5 percent in the gubernatorial race. Whigs retained one of Louisiana's four House seats and increased their majority in the lower house of the legislature, but that was small consolation for men who had expected to perpetuate the Taylor coalition in the race. "Well, Campbell, the sun of Buena Vista does not shine on the Whig party of late," moaned Balie Peyton from New Orleans. "Even this city has gone horse, foot, & dragoons for the democrats."99

In Mississippi, where ostensibly bipartisan Rough and Ready clubs had been kept intact to manage the campaign, Whigs were thrashed. The state's leading Democrats, Congressman Albert Gallatin Brown, Senator Jefferson Davis, and gubernatorial candidate John A. Ouitman, aggressively defended Southern Rights, and by the fall they flatly opposed statehood for California because it would cheat Southerners of their rights in the Mexican Cession. Some Democrats already called California statehood, like passage of the Proviso, grounds for secession. Thrown on the defensive, Mississippi's Whigs joined the state's Democrats in a Calhoun-inspired scheme to call a southern convention at Nashville in Iune 1850 to prepare a united sectional response to purported northern aggressions. That move, however, failed to save Whig candidates. Democrats swept all four congressional seats, both legislative chambers, and the governorship. In 1848, Taylor trailed Cass in Mississippi by only 729 votes. A year later in the gubernatorial race Democrats won by a margin exceeding 10,000 votes, and Whigs' share of the total plummeted to a pitiful 41 percent. The surge toward Taylor in 1848 had been a one-time blip on the electoral chart; Mississippi remained a Democratic bastion. 100

Only state offices were at stake in Georgia, and its Democratic leaders were less uniformly militant on the slavery question than Mississippi's. Only one had signed the Southern Address, while Congressmen Howell Cobb and John H. Lumpkin, who represented nonslaveholding districts, had led those southern Democrats who denounced the Address as dangerously disunionist. Cobb and Lumpkin were attacked during 1849 by fellow Democrats for their timidity, however, and in the gubernatorial campaign the state's Democrats stressed Governor George Towns' promise to call a state convention immediately to resist any violation of the South's equal rights—a promise that betokened secession should the Proviso become law.¹⁰¹

This Democratic challenge significantly exacerbated tensions between the rival Stephens-Toombs and Berrien factions of the Georgia Whig party. Toombs and Stephens had led the attempt to sabotage Calhoun's southern caucus, ostentatiously walking out before the vote on the Southern Address. They had also enthusiastically endorsed the Preston Bill, even if it admitted another free state. Surprised by the vehemence of anti-Proviso sentiment and the opposition to California statehood when they returned to Georgia, they nonetheless cautioned Whigs to continue to rely on Taylor and to avoid extreme anti-Proviso rhetoric that smacked of secessionism. Such a position was understandable. Their man Crawford was in the cabinet, they controlled the state's federal patronage, and they did not want to appear to abandon Taylor, especially before his intentions for the territories became known. Able to control most Whig papers in the state with the leverage of federal printing contracts, the Stephens-Toombs forces also dominated the party's June state convention. Gubernatorial nominee Benjamin Hill was not their preferred candidate, but the state platform reflected their position on the territorial question. Denouncing the Proviso as "violative of all the Compromises of the Constitution, and making an unjust discrimination against the people of the South," it also expressed full confidence that Taylor would protect Southern Rights. At the insistence of Stephens and Toombs, in sum, Georgia's Whigs, still unaware of King's mission to California, attempted to repeddle the message of 1848.102

That message's moderation, in contrast to Democrats' strident rhetoric, opened an opportunity for Berrien and his followers. Ruthlessly excluded from federal jobs because they had preferred Clay for the 1848 nomination, they knew that the ambitious Stephens and Toombs sought to knock Berrien "unceremoniously out of their way." Since "Mr. Toombs would like to be in the Senate & that you should be out of it," one wrote Berrien, the pair had used "the antagonism of yr. respective positions on the Slavery question in all its breadth" to "destroy yr. political power for they are perhaps sensible that if they do not destroy you, you will destroy them." Since 1844, indeed, Stephens and Toombs had consistently outflanked Berrien by taking a more extreme proslavery position than he, but their actions in the winter of 1848-49 and their recommendations for Georgia Whigs' 1849 campaign at last offered Berrien a chance to turn the tables and "destroy them." In the Senate that winter Berrien had voted against the California statehood plan, whereas Toombs and Stephens had supported it in the House. Berrien had remained in the southern caucus after they abandoned it, and even though his own address was more moderate than Calhoun's, he had flatly denounced the Proviso as unconstitutional, not just insulting. Now, in sum, he could pose as a more vigilant sentinel of Southern Rights than his nemeses. Hence his Georgia allies in 1849 openly denounced their plea to rely upon Taylor as inadequate and instead promised firm resistance to any proposal that denied southern slaveholders equal access to all of the Mexican Cession. 103

Pregnant with implications for the future, the rival factions' different positions on the territorial question had little impact on the 1849 gubernatorial election itself. While the Democrat Towns breathed fire in defense of Southern Rights, the Whig Hill steadfastly refused to discuss the Proviso and what he might do should it pass or to wrap himself in the protective armor of Taylor's supposed fealty to the South. Hill's attempt to avoid national issues altogether so disgusted Stephens and Toombs that they refused to stump for him. For a while, however, Hill's tack appeared to work. Reporting "no excitement [in middle Georgia] upon the slavery question," Berrien's kinsman Charles Jenkins thought that "our people generally have a strong reliance upon the old General in the last resort." For most of the summer, in fact, the race's outcome appeared to hinge on which candidate won the backing of the state's growing temperance movement, although, as one wag cracked, "It is not a pretty issue to be determined—which drinks the most liquor, Hill or Towns?"

Word of King's mission to California and Taylor's speech at Mercer decisively changed the race. In Georgia, Taylor was reported as calling slavery "a great moral and political evil" and insisting that Congress could bar it from the territories. That news gave Democrats deadly ammunition and made Hill's adamant silence about the Proviso suicidal. Hill ran 4,000 votes behind Taylor and Towns 2,000 ahead of Cass, transmuting Taylor's 3,000-vote margin into a Democratic majority of the same size. Whigs also lost control of the entire legislature, which in the next session would reapportion the state's legislative districts. 105

Defeat only widened the breach among Georgia's Whigs. Stephens and Toombs blamed Hill for not defending Taylor as safe on the Proviso. Though shaken, they clung to the president and waited to see his still-unknown plans for the Cession. Berrien's friends scorned that analysis. Had Hill simply clung to Taylor, "the Whig party as such would have ceased to exist or been doomed to a hopeless minority for years." His rivals' stubborn and impolitic loyalty to Taylor, one told Berrien, provided the chance to end their "unhealthy and selfish domination." Repeating earlier advice, he urged Berrien to make "a personal address to the Whig party of Georgia" on the slavery issue in the next Congress that outlined "yr. efforts to enforce [i.e., strengthen] their oft repeated declarations & resolutions upon this subject." Berrien refused to waste this opportunity to take a tougher proslavery stance than his rivals. That determination guaranteed his opposition to Taylor's statehood plans for California and New Mexico. 106

To the north, Whig hopes climbed in September, only to be dashed in October and November. Vermont's Whigs reelected Governor Carlos Coolidge by retaining control of the legislature. The Democratic-Free Soil coalition appeared to backfire by causing conservative Democrats to back their own candidate and driving some Whig-Free Soilers back to their former party. Even without a popular majority, Coolidge ran 3,000 votes ahead of Taylor and his own 1848 total, while the coalition candidate polled 5,000 fewer votes than the combined Free Soil and Democratic totals a year earlier. Vermont's Whigs crowed that they had crushed the odious coalition, and Whigs elsewhere took heart.¹⁰⁷

With no expectations of carrying Democratic Maine, in contrast, few Whigs were disappointed when the additional voters Taylor had attracted disappeared and the Whig state ticket slumped to its traditional 37–38 percent of the gubernatorial vote. Even in Maine, moreover, two contradictory trends looked promising. The Free Soil vote dropped by a third since the presidential contest, suggesting that the third party might be running out of steam. Because of Free Soil and Whig gains in legislative races, Democrats lost their majority in the state senate and had it reduced to a single seat in the house. Besting Democrats in

Maine's legislature, however, would require Maine's Whigs to cooperate with Free Soilers, a necessity that precluded any relaxation of their adamant opposition to slavery in the Mexican Cession. 108

Returns from the Midwest helped shatter September's optimism and reaffirmed Whigs' weakness in that burgeoning region, which was certain to gain additional congressional seats and electoral votes after the 1850 census. Illinois had no 1849 elections, but in Wisconsin's legislative elections, Democrats, not Whigs, benefited from a marked decline in Free Soil strength. Michigan's Whigs, in contrast, attempted to forge a coalition with Free Soilers against the dominant Democrats in state races. Although the coalition's gubernatorial candidate drew 45.5 percent of the total compared to Taylor's 36.7 percent, he still ran some 19,000 votes behind the combined total for Taylor and Van Buren, a decline that indicated considerable Whig and Free Soil dissatisfaction with the bargain. Winning less than a third of the house and a fourth of the senate seats, moreover, Whigs' position in the legislature remained hopeless. 109

Because of its size and Ewing's presence in the cabinet, Ohio was the most important midwestern state to the administration. Taylor had delivered his Mercer speech to help Whigs on the Western Reserve, and because of it, Democratic dissent outside the Reserve about coalition with Free Soilers in it, and faith that Whigs would rally to defend their state economic programs, some Whigs by September rejoiced that "our Locofoco adversaries are manifestly in trouble in almost every part of the state." Despite small Whig gains and Democratic losses, however, Free Soilers elected with Democratic support continued to hold the balance of power in both houses of the legislature. Worse still, Ohioans approved the referendum calling for a state constitutional convention in 1850. Whigs blamed the result on apathy, poor organization, and lack of a coordinated newspaper response to the Free Soil challenge since some Whig papers wooed and others denounced Whig defectors to the third party. Whatever the cause, so long as Free Soilers threatened Whigs' chances, they would insist that slavery not expand into the Mexican Cession. 110

Since Whigs had lost all midwestern states in 1848, defeats there did not jolt them nearly so much as returns from the New England and Middle Atlantic states Taylor had carried. Combinations between Democrats and Free Soilers stung Whigs in Massachusetts and New York, although the combinations took very different forms in the two states. To the dismay of ex-Whigs like Charles Francis Adams, the Bay State's Free Soilers openly courted Democrats by endorsing Democratic positions on state issues, especially electoral reforms to undermine the influence of Whiggish Boston in the state legislature. Simultaneously, Democrats tried to attract Free Soilers by jettisoning popular sovereignty and declaring in their state platform: "We are opposed to slavery in every form and color, and in favor of freedom and Free Soil wherever man lives throughout God's heritage." This was not the forthright commitment to the Proviso that Free Soilers demanded, and the two parties ran separate gubernatorial candidates, allowing Whig nominee George Briggs once again to get a plurality of the popular vote and win election in the state legislature.

Nonetheless, Whigs' control of that body was much more precarious than it had been after the 1848 elections. Unlike the gubernatorial contest, Democrats and Free Soilers fused behind common legislative candidates and scored dramatic gains at Whigs' expense. The Whig margin plunged from seventeen to eight seats in the senate and from ninety-three to thirty-five seats in the house. What made those results especially ominous was that, because of the peculiarities of the Massachusetts apportionment system, a large number of small towns, where antislavery sentiment was intense, were not entitled to representation in 1849 but would be the following year. If the Free Soil party remained in existence, Whigs' control of the state government stood in grave jeopardy. Like their Ohio brethren, in short, Massachusetts Whigs required a quick resolution of the territorial question that guaranteed free soil.

In contrast to Massachusetts, New York's Free Soil party effectively collapsed when Barnburners returned to the Democratic fold. Democrats had to dodge any statement about the Proviso to achieve their tenuous unity, but they were nonetheless more unified going into the 1849 campaign than they had been in four vears. Of the eight officials chosen by a statewide vote. Whigs and Democrats each elected four, with Whigs retaining the four most influential posts—comptroller, treasurer, secretary of state, and state engineer. Even so, it was a close call. Washington Hunt, Whigs' front-runner, won the comptrollership by only 5,900 votes out of over 400,000 cast, largely because Democratic drop-off from the combined Cass and Van Buren totals in 1848 almost tripled Whig drop-off from that year. Statistical analysis, in fact, suggests that over one-fifth of 1848 Whig voters defected to Hunt's Democratic opponent and that only abstentions by 1848 Free Soil and Democratic voters disgusted by the Barnburner-Hunker rapprochement allowed Hunt to win. Hunt had angered some Whigs with his dispensation of canal contracts, but most Whig defectors were probably conservatives who had lost their fight to control the state convention. The willingness of aggrieved Whigs to vote for the enemy in order to punish Weed's organization rather than simply abstain boded serious trouble in the future. 112

The outcome of the legislative races proved of more immediate concern to Weed and Seward. In 1848, Whigs had compiled huge margins in both chambers because of the Democrats' rupture, and in the house, at least, most Whigs were Sewardites. In 1849, more Whig winners were conservatives, and the reunited Democrats made stunning gains. The phenomenal eighty-six-seat edge in the house that Whigs enjoyed over Democrats and Free Soilers combined after 1848 changed to a two-seat Democratic majority after 1849. Whigs' comfortable sixteen-vote margin in the senate was slashed to a precarious majority of two.

The extraordinary Democratic resurgence in New York would shape the response of Weed and Seward to the great debate over the territories in 1850. The reunified Democrats seriously jeopardized Whig control of New York's state government, the linchpin of Weed's power. Seward and Weed knew that Democrats had reunited only by avoiding an open party stand on the Wilmot Proviso and that the easiest way to redivide them was to compel Democrats in the legislature to vote on the Proviso. Forcing a legislative vote on the slavery extension issue could also reassert the ascendancy of Sewardites over their conservative Whig rivals and perhaps recruit remaining Free Soilers, furious about Barnburners' return to the Democrats, into Whig ranks, thereby reinforcing Sewardites against conservatives. Taking defiant antisouthern ground, in short, seemed to Seward and Weed the best, if not the only, escape from the quandary in which the 1849 elections had left them. Their implementation of the strategy in 1850, and Fillmorites' response to it, would have enormous implications for events that year.¹¹³

The results from Maryland, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey in 1849 were equally shocking to Whigs, although in none of them did the slavery issue play as significant a role as it did elsewhere. In Maryland, where a Democratic governor would hold office until 1850, Democrats narrowly captured a western congressional seat Whigs had won in 1847 and retained the two seats from Baltimore. They also scored impressive gains in the legislature despite a healthy Whig majority in the statewide popular vote. Holis legislative majorities in New Jersey plummeted from twenty to eight seats in the house and from five to a single seat in the senate. But it was Pennsylvania, the scene of Whigs' most remarkable gains in 1848 and the keystone of the administration's attempt to build a new Taylor Republican party, that dealt Whigs and the administration's hopes their severest blow.

For months, disgruntled Whig regulars in Pennsylvania had warned that apathy and disaffection guaranteed a catastrophe in the October elections, and their prophecies proved self-fulfilling. Dissident Native Americans, who had not shared the jobs allocated by federal patronage holders, combined with Democrats to sweep the local offices and state legislative seats in the city and county of Philadelphia. The spurned nativist faction also ran its own candidate for canal commissioner, the sole statewide office at stake, and he drained 5.400 votes from the Whig ticket, which was reduced to 46.5 percent of the vote. Abstention of 1848 Whig voters was a far graver problem. Statewide in 1849 the party drew 35,000 (21 percent) fewer votes than Johnston had won the previous October and 52,000 (28 percent) fewer than Taylor. In contrast, Democrats' vote dropped by only 20,000 (12 percent) since the previous October and 25,000 (14.5 percent) since November. Democrats won the seat on the patronage-rich canal commission, and in the legislature Whigs were reduced to a two-fifths minority in the house and had their previously secure majority in the senate reversed. Democrats controlled both houses of the legislature for the first time since 1845. The attempt to consolidate a broader Taylor Republican party had manifestly failed.

Angry regulars blamed the attempt by Johnston and state chairman McMichael to supplant Whigs with a Taylor Republican party for the debacle. The state committee "never deign[ed] to consult any of us," fumed one, hence "the great falling off" of the Whig vote since 1848. "They have irretrievably thrown the State into the hands of the Locofocos, for under their lead each succeeding election will be as disastrous as the last one." Johnston and McMichael could "never obtain the confidence of the Whig party," for "the great mass of the party will never surrender the name of Whig."

The similarity of the trend in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Maryland also suggests a broader cause of the crippling drop-off in the Whig vote. During 1849 the party had failed to establish a concrete record of achievement that could retain its earlier support. Taylor's administration had issued no clear signal about its intention on the tariff and other national economic policies, and in none of the three states had Whig parties filled that void. Little partisan conflict occurred during the 1848–49 session of Maryland's legislature, perhaps because the Democratic governor could veto any distinctively Whig program. Divided control of Pennsylvania's legislature blocked enactment of Whig policies that could have provided a platform for Whig legislative candidates, even though partisan conflict on roll calls in the Democratic house remained fairly high.¹¹⁶

The situation in New Jersey, where Whigs controlled the governorship and both legislative chambers, was more complex. The salient issue during its 1849 legislative session was an outbreak of popular resentment against the Camden and Ambov Railroad's monopoly of transportation in the state. Although Whigs had traditionally opposed the notorious Joint Companies (the Camden and Amboy and the Delaware and Raritan Canal), in 1849 they waffled because state revenue from the railroad, which legally depended upon retention of its monopoly, paid for 90 percent of state expenditures. Chartering new railroads to compete with the Camden and Amboy, in short, would force Whigs into the political suicide of levying property taxes to compensate for the lost annual payments from it. In the legislature, therefore, Whigs joined Democrats in killing proposals for competing lines. During the subsequent election campaign Whig candidates divided along geographical lines, condemning the monopoly in some counties and supporting it in others. This shilly-shallying course infuriated previous Whig voters who hated the Joint Companies. In some counties, independent antimonopoly legislative tickets reaped the votes of angry Whigs. In others, Whigs repudiated the state party for its inaction and ambivalence by voting for Democratic antimonopoly candidates. In still others, Whigs protested by abstaining, As a result, between the legislative elections of 1848 and 1849, the Whig vote declined by an average of 14 percent per county, twice the Democratic rate of decline. Bereft of national or coherent state policies to trumpet, Whigs could neither retain nor mobilize their previous electorate. 117

Election results from individual states dismayed Whigs, but the cumulative totals from 1849 were especially demoralizing. In 1847, they had won 45 percent of the congressional seats and in 1848, 57 percent. In the ninety contests held in 1849, their share plummeted to 30 percent. They had won over two-fifths of the governorships up for election in 1847 and, in 1848, an impressive ten of fourteen (71.4 percent). In 1849, however, they could claim only four of the fifteen elected (26.6 percent), and those were all in New England. In the states that chose legislators in 1849, Whigs controlled both legislative houses in nine states before the elections but only six afterward. States where the two parties split legislatures increased from five to seven, and those with complete Democratic control rose from seven to eight. Even these figures disguise the extent of the Whigs' reversal. In ten states in which Whigs held a majority of the lower legislative chamber going into the elections, the average size of their margin over Democrats was 33.7 seats. Coming out of those contests, their average margin had been reduced to 8.7 seats, and in New York and Georgia, previous Whig majorities had been converted to Democratic majorities. Whigs performed slightly better in states where Democrats controlled the lower house going into the elections. Still, their average deficit in eleven such states dropped only from 22.2 to 19.6 seats, and that small average gain conceals a marked increase in the Democratic margin from 5 to 20 seats in Pennsylvania.

Some Whigs took what solace they could from these dismal results. Clay men and other regulars rejoiced that the elections had extinguished Taylor's misguided attempt to build a new party. After surveying the Ohio and Pennsylvania returns, Kentucky's Leslie Combs, for example, gloated, "The 'Great Taylor Republican Party' which was to overshadow Whig & Democrat & everything is in rather a Blue way—for my friend Clayton. The Govt. at Washington have failed in their philosophical experiment." It could not "sit on two stools at once. When the sympathies of the Whigs is second & last & the contempt of the Locos obtained—things are in a bad way."

More commonly, Whigs reacted with gloom and despair. "The elections everywhere indicate a great cooling in the enthusiasm which brought 'Old Zack' into power," moaned Balie Peyton. "It does seem to me that the Whigs are incapable of maintaining power." And these defeats occurred, he added significantly, "before any measure of the Administration has been presented to the nation." The Whig party had sunk "into a miserable and hopeless minority... before a single measure has been tried or tested," echoed Elihu B. Washburne from Illinois because "Genl. Taylor permitted himself to go into the hands of a set of mercenary and unprincipled political scape-goats who foisted upon him a cabinet with no hold upon the popular feeling of the country and whose selection was an unpardonable outrage upon the Whig sentiment of the nation."

Precisely because Whigs could not attribute their rout to public repudiation of policies the administration had not yet announced, they usually blamed the disaster on the "ignorance, imbecility & ingratitude combined" of the cabinet. Whig after Whig denounced its appointments—its calculated appeasement of Democrats, its preferential treatment of newcomers and nativists, and its cold-blooded exclusion of old-line Whig regulars—as "fatuity and madness." As early as July, a New Yorker complained to Weed that "General Taylor's Administration is, or will be crushed—wasted and the interest of the Country, as advocated by the Whig party mined, by the unstatesmanlike conduct of the Cabinet." It "must be dissolved." Otherwise, Taylor's administration "will chain the Whig party to the wheels of the car of Locofocoism for a quarter of a century." After the August and fall returns came in, murmurs of protest escalated to a roar. Alexander Bullitt in the columns of the Washington Republic, Schuyler Colfax and his coterie of midwestern editors, Caleb Smith, Truman Smith, Leslie Combs, Tom Corwin, Thurlow Weed, and others all demanded a change in cabinet personnel. "Upon such change depends the very existence of the Whig party," declared the furious Washburne in November. 120

By November 1849, in sum, incensed Whig politicians blamed the cabinet, not Taylor himself, for the calamitous attempt to build a new party with patronage. Taylor was faulted for his passivity and failure to ride herd on the scoundrels in his cabinet, but not for masterminding a strategy most Whigs repudiated. Yet Taylor's personal insulation from criticism could easily be stripped away, for as insiders like Truman Smith and Orlando Brown well knew, Taylor liked his cabinet and would resist pressure to change it. 121

That determination boded ill for relations between Taylor and congressional Whigs who would assemble in December. For months Whig regulars had threatened to put the cabinet upstarts in their proper place once Congress met. The number of angry Whig senators who might challenge the confirmation of Taylor's recess appointees was impressively long: Berrien and Dawson, Badger and Mangum, Pearce, Cooper, Webster, Clay, and perhaps others who would be lobbied by an even longer list of rebellious Whigs in the House.

A potential blowup over the cabinet and patronage was not the biggest problem the party faced. Whigs knew they had run at a disadvantage in 1849 because the administration had not yet presented, let alone enacted, any measure of public policy. This knowledge implied that, to reverse their electoral slide, Whigs would have to pass an attractive program that could remobilize the voters who had brought Taylor to power. Only wise policies now seemed capable of overcoming the damage wrought by foolish appointments.

In three ways, however, Whigs' defeats in 1849 and their angry reaction to those losses jeopardized their ability to agree upon and pass an attractive program. First, their woeful performance in 1849 meant that Whigs would lack a majority in both the House and the Senate. Enactment of legislation would require cooperation with Democrats, Free Soilers, or both. Second, the success of northern and southern Democrats in outflanking Whigs on the slavery extension question reduced the likelihood that northern and southern Whigs could agree upon a policy for the Mexican Cession. Third, congressional Whigs angry at the patronage dimension of the administration's attempt to "rally a new party" might reject its policy dimensions as well. The administration's territorial and tariff reform program was far wiser than its blundering allotment of government jobs. Yet men who castigated Clayton, Ewing, Meredith, and the others for wrecking the party with stupid appointments might also spurn their policy recommendations, as Maryland's James Pearce had already announced.

A different border state Whig, however, emerged as the key player in the first session of the Thirty-First Congress. When news had spread the previous winter that Kentucky's legislature might return Henry Clay to the Senate, Whig after Whig had warned that Clay would come to Washington only to make trouble for Taylor and his administration, only to avenge his loss of the 1848 nomination, only to reassert his command of the Whig party, as he had done with John Tyler. After Taylor's inauguration, in contrast, few Whigs mentioned Clay, or any threat he might pose, in their correspondence. Their attention was diverted in part by their own anger at the cabinet's folly and their preoccupation with the 1849 elections. But Clay also carefully refrained from saying or doing anything that could fuel suspicions that he intended to challenge Taylor. To be sure, astute observers like Ohio's ex-Whig Free Soiler Joseph Root predicted that the growing disenchantment of Whig politicos with the administration would inevitably tempt Clay to rally anti-Taylor Whigs behind him once Congress met. For most Whigs, however, Clay seemed a forgotten man.¹²²

Forgotten was the last thing Henry Clay wanted to be. He still seethed at his rude overthrow by his party and at its elevation of an unqualified neophyte like Taylor. Repeatedly, in private, he complained that his friends had been short-changed by the administration, but just as repeatedly he told his loyalists that they must not complain publicly about the appointments. Unlike Pearce and Cooper, Clay did not seek a showdown over patronage in the Senate. Personal considerations partially account for his reluctance. Clay cared deeply about the success of his son James, whom the administration, after what seemed to Clay an agonizing delay, had appointed to Portugal in August. He would seem like a hypocrite if he then assaulted the cabinet for poor appointments. Any such attack might also cause Taylor or Clayton to withhold the nomination when the Senate met and name another man for Lisbon. Well into 1850, Clay's desire to protect his son from the wrath of the administration and have him succeed in delicate negotiations in Portugal tempered his actions and delayed an open, public break with Taylor. More fundamentally, Clay considered an open fight against Taylor's appointees counterproductive since it would only paint him and his friends as sore losers in a selfish race for spoils. 123

Unwillingness to battle the administration over patronage did not mean that Clay was prepared to obey the party's new commander-in-chief or to surrender his conviction that he, not Taylor, was its rightful leader. Unfair job distribution was one thing, he wrote in June; the administration's failure "to support and recommend the great measures of the Whig party" would be quite another. Fully aware that large numbers of Whig congressmen who fumed over patronage gave him a potential constituency, he would fight the administration over policy, not patronage, if he chose to fight at all.¹²⁴

When Clay wrote in June, Taylor's new organ, the Washington Republic, was already calling for the abandonment of ultra Whig economic measures long identified with him. At that time, therefore, he may have anticipated a battle with the administration over economic policy. While vacationing at Newport in August, however, Clay learned from the reporter James Harvey what the gist of Meredith's proposals would be, and he gave them his hearty approbation. Whether Clay knew more than any other Whigs about Taylor's plans for the Mexican Cession that summer is unknown. But he knew that the disposition of slavery in that area was the most divisive and pressing question facing the nation. If, as many Whigs believed that summer, the sphinx-like Taylor had no plan for the Cession, this might be a question on which Clay himself could devise a policy to reassert his leadership of congressional Whigs.¹²⁵

Slavery was also a pressing issue in Kentucky during the summer of 1849. A small group of emancipationists, led by Clay's cousin Cassius M. Clay, were running a ticket of delegates for the state constitutional convention pledged to a program of state-sponsored gradual emancipation. Ridding Kentucky of slavery had long been a favorite cause of the aged statesman. He had been president of the American Colonization Society for years, and in February 1849, shortly after his election to the Senate, he published a letter in the Lexington press endorsing gradual emancipation. Then, shortly before the August elections and his departure for Newport, Clay circulated "a free soil letter" in the fourth congressional district defending the propriety of Whig candidate Aylett Butler's vote in the previous Congress to apply the Wilmot Proviso to the Mexican Cession. Putting this letter together with Clay's impending return to the Senate, a horrified Taylor Whig from Kentucky asked Clayton with astonishing perspicacity, "Can it be... that free soilism may be used by him Clay to overslaugh Taylor & again take the head of the Whigs himself hoping still to be made president before he dies?" 126

"The Slavery Excitement Seems Likely to Obliterate Party Lines"

"THERE IS A GREAT AND BITTER COMPLAINT against the Administration from all the Whigs, or nearly all," Henry Clay reported upon his return to Washington for the first session of the Thirty-First Congress. Because "the Whigs are so divided & the administration so feeble," even a job hunter recognized that "our party will have an uphill business in sustaining the Appointments of the President." Since Senate Democrats, who outnumbered Whigs thirty-three to twenty-five, with the Free Soilers Salmon Chase and John Hale holding the other two seats, had rejected some of Taylor's first nominations in March on party-line votes, Whigs, Democrats, and Free Soilers all predicted "a great deal of 'cutting and slashing work" when "the new appointments" came up for confirmation.

Whig anger and Democratic vindictiveness also clouded prospects for congressional enactment of the administration's policy recommendations. But the intensification of sectional squabbling over slavery extension proved an even more formidable obstacle to Taylor's hope of winning immediate statehood for California and New Mexico and thereby finessing the explosive Wilmot Proviso. "Sectional feeling is stronger than I ever saw it before," Georgia's Stephens warned Crittenden in mid-December. "The excitement in the South upon the Slave question is much greater . . . than those who are at the head of affairs here have any idea of." At the same time, he found northern Whigs "insolent and unyielding," totally unwilling "to calm and quiet" the South's "feelings." Sobered by the power of Democratic-Free Soil coalitions in 1849, northern Whigs, indeed, came to Washington convinced that "a compromise by which slavery would be extended would be death to the Whig party." Therefore they vowed "to stand firm on the rights of California and New Mexico to be free." Shocked by the rancorous sectional chasm in both major parties, an Illinois Democrat forecast that "the slavery excitement seems likely nearly to obliterate party lines temporarily."

This situation—a crippled president, a fractious and angry congressional party, a grave sectional crisis over the territories—thus presented an opportunity for Henry Clay to pursue a course that many had predicted from the day of his election to the Senate. "Mr. Clay," chorused forecasters, "will probably put himself at the head of such of the Whigs as distrust Taylor," try "to effect a second compromise," and "lead off so many Whigs that the administration cannot be sustained." In hindsight these prophecies appear astonishingly accurate. Accordingly, historians have often described the prolonged struggle that ultimately produced the Compromise of 1850 as a personal clash between Taylor and Clay and their sharply different policies for the Mexican Cession and other slavery issues. To be sure, historians have properly highlighted the roles of prominent supporting players in this drama, and many have given Democrats their just due for helping to frame and pass the compromise measures. Nonetheless, from the Whig party's perspective, the battle during 1850 has usually been portrayed in bipolar terms—Taylor and his congressional supporters versus Clay and his allies, anticompromisers versus procompromisers.

Though admirably coherent, this scenario distorts the impact of the unprecedentedly long congressional session on the Whig party. Whigs did not divide neatly into pro-Taylor and pro-Clay, anticompromise and procompromise camps. For one thing, some Whigs did not see much difference between Clay's original proposals and those of Taylor, both of which they correctly recognized as compromises. More important, many Whigs did not follow the lead of either Taylor or Clay but instead pursued independent courses. During the heated congressional debates and numerous roll-call votes of 1850, the Whig party splintered into numerous fragments that changed shape over time and assumed the coherence of a bipolar division only toward the session's end.

Bitter feuds over Senate confirmation of Taylor's appointees, personal convictions, factional rifts within state Whig delegations, disagreements about the seriousness of disunionist threats, and calculations about how stands taken in Congress would affect the fortunes of one's faction or party at home all helped fragment the Whig party in 1850. The shaping of the Compromise of 1850 vividly illustrates the intimate connection between state and national politics in the nineteenth century. State legislatures and state nominating conventions met while congressional Whigs struggled with the territorial problem. What happened in those legislatures and conventions decisively influenced Whigs' behavior in Congress, just as developments in Washington shaped how rival Whig factions opposed each other within the states.

As intraparty rivalries intensified, moreover, interparty conflict with Democrats, which had always counteracted those centrifugal forces in the past, weakened perceptibly. Whigs of all varieties—Northerners and Southerners, pro- and antiadministration men, compromisers and anticompromisers—found themselves compelled to cooperate with Democrats of some kind. Sectional divisions over slavery helped blur party differences. Whigs and Democrats from the North or South often acted together rather than concede to demands of fellow party members from the other section. As Seward accurately predicted at the start of the session, would-be compromisers "of both parties" also cooperated with each other to effect a settlement they considered necessary to save the Union. Wherever Whigs stood on the territorial issue, in short, they were driven into the arms of Democrats.⁵

The concomitant feud over patronage also dissolved partisan distinctions. Since Democrats controlled the Senate committees that judged Taylor's nominees, Whigs who sought their confirmation or rejection needed Democratic help to achieve it. That necessity ultimately proved pivotal to passing the Compromise of 1850. Northern Democratic senators with the greatest influence over patronage were deeply committed to a congressional compromise that differed from Zachary Taylor's plan. As the price for their help on appointments, they pressured northern Whigs to support the Democratic alternative. By cooperating with Democrats on both policy and patronage, Whig congressmen helped mute the partisan differences and interparty combat that, along with Whigs' economic policies and commitment to activist government, had sustained the loyalty of Whig voters since the 1830s. Not simply internal divisions, in sum, but also their deadly combination with diminished interparty differences made 1850 a portentous year for Whigs.

I

When congressmen streamed into Washington in late November 1849 for the new session, only a few insiders like Seward had learned of Taylor's intentions. Most people knew that Californians had written a free constitution and would apply for statehood, but because Congress had not authorized their convention and might ignore their application, speculation still centered primarily on whether Taylor would sign the Wilmot Proviso. Many northern Whigs remained doubtful, while some southern Whigs like Georgia's Robert Toombs now feared that Taylor would indeed do so. In their minds, the Svengali-like Seward had bamboozled the cabinet into building up the northern party's antislavery wing with patronage, and they now intended to help it outbid Democrats for Free Soil support by passing the Proviso and securing Taylor's signature to it.6

Taylor, of course, meant to evade the Proviso by urging immediate statehood for California and New Mexico. That plan, he hoped, could hold his party together and attract sufficient Democratic support to pass by promising the North the substance of free soil in the Cession while sparing the South the indignity of congressional prohibition. Some able historians argue that Taylor's plan was doomed to defeat because it was "unrealistic" or an inadequate solution for an increasingly grave sectional crisis. Yet Taylor had reason to be hopeful. Southern Democrats would certainly oppose it, but given the ground many northern Democrats had taken against slavery extension in 1849, they seemed unlikely to balk at the immediate admission of two free states. More important, the common rout that northern and southern Whigs had suffered at Democratic hands in 1849 made his plan potentially appealing to both sectional wings of the party.

Shaken by Democratic-Free Soil gains in 1849, personally hostile to slavery expansion, deluged by demands from constituents "that the proviso shall be incorporated in any Territorial Government created by Congress," and well aware that those constituents would judge their actions at the impending 1850 congressional elections, northern Whig congressmen could never allow the creation of formal territorial governments in the Mexican Cession without an explicit prohibition of slavery. In 1849, moreover, the Sewardite majority in New York's legislature had instructed the state's congressional delegation to fix Texas' western boundary at the Nueces River, and Sewardites would push similar resolutions in early 1850. Thus New York's huge Whig congressional delegation and many other northern Whigs regarded any proposal to legitimate Texas' grandiose claim to all the land east of the Rio Grande River as the kind of compromise to extend slavery that "would be death to the Whig party."

Taylor's plan might appeal to such determined northern Whigs. Free Soilers and their northern Democratic allies seemed committed to the organization of territorial governments with the Proviso. Taylor's proposal to bypass the territorial stage and admit two free states immediately gave Whigs an attractive alternative to run on in 1850, especially as residents of New Mexico would never recognize Texas' boundary claims in any state constitution it drafted when applying for admission. By the end of 1849, in fact, growing numbers of northern Whigs were prepared to adopt alternative methods of stopping slavery expansion. After the Connecticut and Indiana congressional elections, some believed that northern Whig congressional candidates could never trump Free Soilers on the Proviso issue. Conservatives like New York's Daniel D. Barnard, who had long complained that the "Radical" antislavery line taken by Seward and Weed to attract Liberty and Free Soil voters would "denationalize our party and convert it, in this state, into an abolition party merely," worried that continued adherence to the Proviso would permanently alienate southern Whigs. 10 Massachusetts, Michigan, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Ohio, Indiana, and other northern states also contained conservative Whig factions who chafed at the attempt to outbid Free Soilers for the antislavery vote, and their readiness for a new position offered the administration a potential base of support.

Primarily, however, many northern Whigs no longer deemed the Proviso necessary to stop slavery expansion. Upon learning in November about California's impending application for statehood, for example, Indiana editor John Defrees rejoiced that "the settlement of the slavery question by the California convention will do much to do away excitement on that subject. Let New Mexico do the same—and then let the Gen. Government cede to Maryland the District" to deprive Congress of jurisdiction over slavery and the slave trade there. Then "the infernal nigger business will not injure the Whig party as it has done last year." Northern Whigs like Defrees would readily back Taylor's plan since it would undermine much of the justification for a Free Soil party.

Equally important, the earlier debates on the Clayton Compromise and the Walker amendment¹² convinced most northern Whigs that slavery could legally exist only where positive local law recognized it; that the local laws relevant to slavery in the Cession were the Mexican laws abolishing the institution; and that until Congress, territorial legislatures, or state constitutional conventions explicitly replaced Mexican laws with proslavery legislation, those laws would bar slavery from the Cession. Hence the positive congressional legislation against slavery that Free Soilers demanded was superfluous. The Wilmot Proviso was nothing "but an abstraction, a bugbear, a nonentity," counseled the conservative Nathan Appleton, since "there is no law [in the Cession] by which the master can hold his slave." A Fillmore ally also contended that "we need no laws for the Mexican territories as the laws of Mexico govern (which are opposed to slavery) until we shall pass laws for their future government. Hence, none but slaveholders want affirmative action to protect themselves." Seward's upstate New York constituents also wanted to admit California and leave the rest of the Cession unorganized because it was "under the Mexican law." A surprising consensus had emerged between antislavery Whigs and their conservative rivals in the North. Congress must "not . . . pass any territorial bill without the proviso," but congressional "noninterference" that left the unorganized Cession under Mexican law was just as acceptable. ¹³

When the Thirty-First Congress assembled, in sum, northern Whigs insisted that slavery be barred from the Mexican Cession by one of three methods: inaction that would continue Mexican laws in force, imposition of the Proviso on any formally organized territories, or the immediate admission of free states. Because Taylor's plan incorporated two of these alternatives, it had the potential of drawing strong northern Whig support.

Southern Whig congressional survivors of the Democratic pummeling in 1849 might also find Taylor's plan attractive, if only because Democrats' very militance during 1849 made it promising both as a face-saving alternative to Democratic demands and as a Union-saving measure with which to counter southern Democrats' Union-threatening extremism. During 1849 southern Democrats had not simply pilloried Whigs as potential traitors to Southern Rights; they had demanded guarantees that slavery would expand into the Mexican Cession. Some iterated Calhoun's contention that the Constitution automatically legalized slavery in all federal territories. Others demanded that Congress organize territorial governments that recognized slavery or extend the 36° 30' line to the Pacific coast and protect the right to own slaves south of it by federal law.

Not coincidentally, this latter stance challenged the claim Californians made in their new constitution to all of the Pacific coast from the 42nd parallel to the Mexican border. Democrats across Dixie vehemently objected to immediate statehood for California. Some protested that its proposed boundaries would deny slaveholders a port on the Pacific from which to export crops. Others cited the lack of congressional authorization. More complained that another free state would upset the balance between fifteen free and fifteen slave states in the Senate. Primarily, however, southern Democrats fumed that, by bypassing a formal territorial stage, California had denied slaveholders their equal rights in territories won by southern blood. Immediate statehood for California was just as intolerable as the Proviso. 14

Most ominously, some southern Democrats in 1849 threatened disunion in response to purported northern aggressions. Democrats initiated Mississippi's call for a regionwide convention to meet in Nashville in June 1850 to hammer out a common strategy of resistance, and that call had cited any congressional attempt to bar slavery from the territories, to abolish it in the District of Columbia, or to interfere with the interstate slave trade as grounds for action. Only the need to retain Whig support for the call, moreover, had caused Mississippi's Democrats to drop California statehood from the list of contingencies justifying secession. Even as Congress assembled, however, Democrats rammed resolutions through the Georgia legislature demanding "that in the event of the passage of the Wilmot Proviso by Congress, the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, the admission of California as a state, in its pretended organization, or the continued refusal of non-slaveholding states to deliver up fugitive slaves as provided for in the Constitution, it will become the immediate and imperative duty of the People of this State to meet in Convention to take into consideration the mode and measure of redress."15

Most southern Democrats, in sum, would obviously oppose California statehood, let alone New Mexico's, and a few southern Whig congressmen, who evinced comparable extremism by the fall of 1849, also seemed unlikely to support Taylor's plan. Appalled by Taylor's "indifference to the extension of slavery to the territories," Georgia's Berrien returned to the Senate determined to prevent California's admission and to vindicate slavery's legality throughout the Mexican Cession. In November, rumors also circulated that Senator Willie P. Mangum and Representative Thomas Clingman of North Carolina intended to instigate their southern Whig colleagues to issue their own "Address to the people on the subject of Slavery in California" that would "embarrass the Administration and cause a fearful rupture in our ranks." As an alarmed northern Whig warned Fillmore, "Look out for breakers ahead," since Mangum and Clingman now asserted "that neither Congress nor the people of California have any right to prohibit the introduction of slavery into that territory."

Southern Whigs who were determined to stop California statehood at all costs, nonetheless, were atypical. The manifesto against California planned by Clingman and Mangum died stillborn because their fellow North Carolina Whigs ferociously opposed it. By early January, the moderate David Outlaw was predicting that both men would join the Democrats, Mangum because "he has lost influence with his own party" and Clingman because he "has an insane wish to be in the Senate, and thinks there is little hope of reaching that position by Whig votes." All southern Whigs regarded congressional prohibition of slavery from the territories as intolerable, but many were untroubled by the prospect of immediate statehood for California and even for New Mexico. They believed that the whole quarrel over the Cession was about "moonshine" since "no matter what you may do or omit to do at Washington, there will never be slavery in any new territory." "The whole question is an abstract one without any practical bearing," wrote New Orleans editor William L. Hodge, "as there is not nor ever was any prospect for slavery in those territories." Tennessee's William B. Campbell agreed that if California and New Mexico applied for statehood and "exclude slavery in their constitutions, no one will pretend to require that they should be slave states." Georgia's Charles Jenkins concurred. Southerners in Congress must prevent enactment of the Proviso, he wrote Berrien in December, but he personally could accept any other arrangement that "involved the exclusion of slavery," including immediate statehood, because slaveholders had "no practical interest in the question." Georgia Democrats' legislative resolutions were thus sheer bluster. The people of Georgia would never secede over the admission of California or even the enactment of the Proviso.18

Most southern Whigs, indeed, regarded Democrats' threats of disunion as insane, stressed their own devotion to the Union, and openly fought Democratic demands that delegates be sent to the impending Nashville Convention. Most, unlike Clingman and Berrien, flatly rejected the Calhounite doctrine that the Constitution automatically legalized slavery in the Cession and instead contended that only positive local or congressional laws could establish it there. Most regarded the whole sectional dispute over slavery extension as far more symbolic than substantive. To them, protecting southern equality and "Southern honor" by escaping the stigma of enslavement to northern dictation that congressional prohibition of slavery entailed, rather than actually extending the institution of slavery westward, was the heart of the territorial issue. Even Berrien, who argued that slavery could flourish in California, saw the territorial dispute primarily in symbolic terms. He admitted to his kinsman Jenkins that Northerners in Congress had no intention of abolishing slavery and that slavery could prosper into the unforeseeable future even if its extension were prohibited. Nonetheless, he protested, if the Northern majority could exclude slavery from the Cession, they would gain complete control of the national government. "Slavery will then exist in a double aspect. The African, and his owner, will both be slaves. The former, will as now, be the slave of his owner—but that owner, in all matters within the sphere of federal jurisdiction, will be the doomed thrall of those, with whom he associated on the basis of equal rights." For Berrien, other southern Whigs, and many southern Democrats, in sum, what was at stake in the territorial question was neither the end nor the weakening of African-American slavery. Rather, it was that dictatorial Northerners intended to treat white Southerners themselves as slaves.²⁰

That southern Whigs regarded the slavery extension issue primarily as a matter of fending off white slavery rather than spreading black slavery, and that many would accept free states from the Mexican Cession, boded well for their reaction to Taylor's plan. Since Taylor's plan gave southern Whigs a platform that might settle the territorial crisis, evade the stigma of congressional prohibition, and thereby allow them to pose as defenders of the Union against dangerous Democratic hotheads, while simultaneously giving Northerners the substance of free soil, in short, it had more merit and greater potential for passing Congress than some historians have admitted.

Its chances of adoption, however, depended less on its merits than on contingencies over which Taylor had little control. Necessary support from northern Democrats required their willingness to sacrifice narrow partisan advantage. Northern Democratic support also depended on the maintenance of the advanced free-soil, antisouthern ground northern Democratic parties had assumed in 1849. If northern Democratic leaders decided instead that their fire-eating southern colleagues must be appeased, then the chances that they would acquiesce in the administration proposal would plummet.

Unified Whig support was equally problematic. Whigs angry with the allotment of patronage would have to forgive and forget or, at the least, divorce their patronage concerns from matters of policy. Likewise, rival factions within state parties and congressional delegations, whose enmity had been increased by patronage battles, must resist the temptation to strike out on separate paths, as Mangum, Clingman, and Berrien seemed prepared to do. Cooperation across the Mason-Dixon line required the preservation of comity that could be eroded by the abrasive interaction of northern and southern Whigs once Congress opened. Specifically, just as the willingness of southern Whigs to support Taylor's plan depended upon northern Whigs' abandoning the Proviso, northern Whigs' willingness to do that had a price. Because of Free Soil pressure, most of them would resist attempts by southern Whigs to extort concessions weakening the seemingly airtight defenses against slavery expansion contained in the other two alternatives—retention of Mexican law and statehood without a formal territorial stage. To many northern Whigs, indeed, the very word "compromise" connoted morally reprehensible and politically disastrous appeasement. "What do we gain by Compromise?" Indiana editor Schuyler Colfax asked in February. "We weaken our ranks in the North. We drive from us the Free Soil Whigs whom we won back to our standard last year with our pledges. And we gain nothing in the South."²¹ To forego demands for such concessions, southern Whigs, in turn, must heed convictions regarding the impossibility of slavery extension rather than succumb to the taunts and barbs from their Democratic competitors.

Above all, the success of Taylor's plan required speed, for delay would only increase the chances that one or more of the other contingencies could turn against the administration. As Congress prepared to open, in sum, substantial potential support for Taylor's policy existed both in Congress and in the country. But its adoption depended on an extraordinarily large number of cards falling into place. Almost none of them did. The course of events, not the substance of Taylor's plan or the transformation of the "crisis" into one that required a "broad sectional adjustment," doomed the administration to defeat.²²

The odds against preserving Whig unity and passing Taylor's plan lengthened even before he presented it to Congress. Submission of his annual message had to await organization of the House of Representatives. As early as the summer of 1849, the Massachusetts Free Soiler Charles Sumner had predicted that both the Whig and Democratic parties would shatter along sectional lines when the House attempted to select a speaker.²³ Because the speaker appointed all committees, his party would control that chamber. Electing the speaker, in turn, required an absolute majority of those voting, and, in contrast to the Senate, where Democratic dominance was assured, when Congress opened no one could tell which party might marshal the necessary majority.

Nominally, Democrats had the advantage. At full strength they held about 114 safe seats compared to 106 or so for the Whigs. But this edge did not guarantee success. Not all members had reached Washington when voting for speaker began. Even when all were in attendance, Free Soilers held the balance of power, yet few knew the exact size of that critical minority or how it might act in the speakership contest. Newspaper estimates of Free Soil strength ranged from eight to seventeen. The list included former Democrats like Preston King and David Wilmot, as well as men elected by Free Soil-Democratic coalitions like Connecticut's three representatives. Most, however, were former Whigs or men who had run on joint Whig-Free Soil tickets. If all of these men backed their own candidate for speaker, they could prevent either major party from electing its man and perhaps force concessions from one or the other, as Ohio's Free Soilers had in the state legislature. Conversely, if the Free Soilers failed to hang together or nominate their own candidate, their votes might be up for grabs.²⁴

If so, Whigs might have an advantage and not simply because most Free Soilers had Whig backgrounds. The sectional balance within the party delegations and the aggressive antislavery stance northern Democrats had adopted in 1849 also seemed to favor them. Exclusive of Democratic-Free Soilers, Southerners outnumbered Northerners sixty-one to fifty among House Democrats. The dominant Southerners could insist upon a southern candidate for speaker whom northern Democrats and Free Soilers might not support, especially if he had signed Calhoun's Southern Address. Among Whigs, in contrast, the sectional imbalance tilted steeply northward. Unlike the Senate, where the thirteen northern and twelve southern Whigs were almost evenly matched, in the House the thirty southern Whigs could be overwhelmed by seventy-six northern colleagues. Of the thirty Southerners, moreover, only seven came from the Deep South—one from Florida, three from Georgia, two from Alabama, and one from Louisiana—while ten hailed from the hitherto moderate border slave states of Delaware, Maryland, and Kentucky.²⁵

The implications of this arithmetic were clear. Any Democratic proposals for the territories would be oriented toward the party's southern majority. Conversely, any Whig proposals, including those of both Taylor and Clay, had to satisfy the party's northern majority. Because of their heavy numerical preponderance, northern Whigs expected to choose the Whig candidate for speaker and to chart the party's course. With Whigs running a Northerner and Democrats a Southerner, who would probably own slaves, Whigs' chances of electing the speaker and controlling the House seemed decent. If they could hold Northerners and Southerners together behind their candidate, they might pick up enough votes from disaffected northern Democrats and erstwhile Whigs among the Free Soilers to elect their man.

Encouraged by such calculations, House Whigs caucused on the night of Saturday, December 1, to select their candidate. The overwhelming favorite was the scholarly, bespectacled Boston patrician Robert C. Winthrop, who had performed ably as speaker during the previous Congress. A special target for abuse from ex-Whig Free Soilers like Root, Giddings, and Allen, Winthrop was unlikely to get their votes, but their intransigent hostility might not extend to other former Whigs in Free Soil ranks. Their antagonism, along with Winthrop's moderate record, moreover, made him perfectly acceptable to most southern Whigs.

Most, but not all, Southerners. Before the Whigs could vote on Winthrop, Stephens and Toombs sought to extort a pledge from the northern majority that they would not try to impose the Proviso on the Mexican Cession or to abolish slavery in the District during the ensuing session. Just as two years earlier, when the northern-dominated Whig caucus had called a national convention over the protests of southern Taylorites, the northern majority refused to be bullied and unceremoniously shelved Toombs' motion. In response, Stephens, Toombs, their Georgia colleague Allen Owen, Florida's Edward Carrington Cabell, Alabama's Henry Hilliard, and Virginia's Jeremiah Morton ostentatiously marched out of the caucus, which then nominated Winthrop for speaker.²⁶

Two weeks later on the House floor, Toombs justified his bolt. Blasting Northerners' intransigent commitment to the Proviso, he belched defiance. "If by your legislation you seek to drive us from the territories of California and New Mexico . . . and to abolish slavery in this District, thereby attempting to fix a national degradation upon the States of this Confederacy," he exclaimed, "I am for disunion and . . . I will devote all I am and all I have on earth to its consummation." When Illinois Whig Edward Baker retorted that disunion was impossible, Stephens sprang to his friend's aid. "I tell this House that every word uttered by my colleague meets my hearty response. . . . I would rather that the southern country should perish . . . than submit for one instant to degradation." Thus did the two Georgians, who had helped sabotage Calhoun's southern caucus explicitly to preserve the Whig party and who had happily promoted California's admission as a free state ten months earlier, emphatically—or so it seemed—mouth the rhetoric of radical proslavery Democrats. It appeared indeed as though "the slavery excitement" would "obliterate party lines."

Long before these speeches, indignant Whigs across the country had denounced the Southerners' bolt and wondered what had provoked it. They recognized that it probably doomed Winthrop's chances of election because some of the six seceders had angrily pledged to oppose him. That all of the bolters except the freshmen Owen and Morton had helped secure Taylor's nomination and that Stephens and Toombs had helped select Taylor's now-reviled cabinet especially enraged Whigs. "Toombs," complained the mild-mannered Winthrop, "is a spoiled child—jealous, impatient, & perverse. He had his own way in respect to the Cabinet, & now he must rule or ruin in the House." Toombs' personality may have explained his action to Winthrop, but other Whigs wondered what "madness" caused it.²⁸

Angry about a ruling Winthrop had made during the last Congress, Toombs made no secret of his "personal hostility" toward Winthrop, but his personal peeves do not explain his extreme language on the House floor, the specific content of his resolutions, or the actions of the other bolters. Stephens and Toombs later told an appalled Crittenden that loyalty to the South had motivated them. Apprehensive that Taylor, the cabinet, and the northern Whig majority in Congress had fallen under Seward's influence and meant "to form a coalition with the Free Soilers" by enacting and securing Taylor's signature to the Wilmot Proviso, they had moved resolutely to deter northern Whigs. "My course became instantly fixed," explained Toombs. "I would not hesitate to oppose the proviso, even to a dissolution of the Union." Hence he determined "to prevent the organization of the House going into the hands of the Northern Whig party." "29

Ultimately, however, these explanations seem self-serving and unsatisfactory. Since all southern Whigs feared enactment of the Proviso, why did Toombs and Stephens, rather than other Southerners, introduce the resolutions, and why did only six of thirty Southerners bolt the Whig caucus when it rejected them? Taylor's refusal to divulge his plan to Toombs at a White House interview prior to the Whig caucus, Toombs told Crittenden, convinced him that Taylor now intended to sign the Proviso. Yet in early December, both Stephens and Georgia Senator William C. Dawson wrote home that they had learned of Taylor's plan, and both pronounced it perfectly acceptable. If they knew of Taylor's plan, how could Toombs not know? And why make such a fuss about the Proviso if they knew Taylor intended to sidestep it? Most important, why go out of their way to threaten secession on the House floor if slavery were kept out of California? Their speeches implied that both the enactment of the Proviso and the admission of California as a free state would be grounds for dissolving the Union since either action constituted legislation barring slavery from it.³⁰

Seward came closer to the mark when he explained the bolt as a defensive gesture against taunts by southern Democrats that the Whig party, led by Taylor, meant to sack the South. Alabama's Henry Hilliard, who liked Winthrop and was deeply embarrassed by his action, sheepishly explained that the caucus' rejection of Toombs' resolutions "leaves those of us who come from heavy slaveholding Districts under the necessity of maintaining just now an independent course—lest we should seem to sanction the course of the caucus on that dangerous question." That five of the seven Whigs from the Deep South, where the party had been thrashed in 1849 and where Democrats now threatened secession should Congress admit California or pass the Proviso, joined the bolters suggests that fear of disunion and of Democratic demagoguery on the issue influenced them. Jeremiah Morton did not come from a heavy slaveholding district, even in terms of Virginia, but Morton had won with Democratic support over the regular Whig candidate, John Pendleton, whom he attacked for failing to sign the Southern Address. He, too, felt pressure to veer to the Democratic position.³¹

Toombs, Stephens, and Owens were undoubtedly worried by the Democratic trend in Georgia, especially since Democrats had also won a special congressional election to fill Thomas Butler King's Savannah seat in November, just when Democratic state legislators were pushing their defiant resolutions. Hence they may have sought to neutralize any Democratic advantage by forcefully espousing the Democratic position. Two facts, however, argue against the sufficiency of this explanation. Stephens contemptuously dismissed those "fighting resolves" as mere "braggadocio." By mid-February, moreover, he and Toombs were working for a compromise that included California statehood, exactly what Democrats and they themselves in December called grounds for disunion.

That about-face suggests that more than an attempt to blunt Democratic criticism spurred Stephens and Toombs. The key to their action lay in their rivalry with Berrien, who returned to the Senate in December determined to expose his Georgia Whig nemeses' supposedly weak commitment to Southern Rights. Unlike Berrien, Stephens and Toombs had bolted Calhoun's southern caucus the previous winter, endorsed immediate statehood for California, and publicly challenged Calhoun's doctrine by admitting the constitutionality, even as they denounced the unfairness, of congressional prohibition and by insisting that only local laws could protect slavery and that Mexico's antislavery laws retained force in the Cession until Congress replaced them. All of these heresies, Berrien and his Georgia lieutenants concluded, left them vulnerable to political destruction.

Berrien's intended weapon was the resolutions on federal relations that the Georgia legislature was formulating as Congress met. Although the Democratic majority had railroaded extreme resolutions through the lower house in November, Whig state representative Charles J. Jenkins, Berrien's closest Georgia ally, successfully moved that the house and senate create a joint committee to draft new resolutions, which everyone expected Jenkins to write. Thus Berrien bombarded Jenkins from Washington with word-by-word instructions for the new resolutions that he thought would annihilate Stephens and Toombs politically. Georgia must condemn California statehood, he ordered. Jenkins must expose, as well, "the fallacy of the position that slavery exists only by statute and cannot exist beyond the limit of the state enacting it." He must also attack "the perversion, or entire misconception that the laws of the conquered country continue in force until repealed by Congress." Instead, he should "show that the laws of Mexico have ceased to exist in California and New Mexico and that a Southern slaveholder has a right to carry his slave there since there is no existing law to forbid it." Nor could Congress prohibit slavery there, for the Northwest Ordinance formed no precedent for the Wilmot Proviso. Here, Berrien commanded, Jenkins should stop. The legislature must not threaten secession or give "even an indication of what in any given circumstances she w[oul]d do." Berrien, in sum, wanted the Georgia legislature to repudiate virtually everything Stephens and Toombs had said since 1847.³³

Stephens and Toombs had to have known that Berrien hoped to outflank them on the slavery issue, and their strident rhetoric and disruptive behavior in December, especially their willingness to threaten secession when Berrien would not, were meant to foil him by reestablishing their own credentials as champions of Southern Rights. Berrien's Georgia friends certainly interpreted the duo's action as a response to their own more militant position. Their movement, crowed one, "is a tacit admission I take it that they have waited too long in taking decisive ground on the Slavery question."³⁴

Equally significant, Berrien's friends warned him, most Georgia Whigs applauded Toombs' and Stephens' bold stand. Thus Berrien found himself once again in danger of being outmaneuvered by his wily antagonists, especially as his attempt to dictate Georgia's legislative resolutions to rebuke their earlier stands was frustrated.³⁵ Refusing to surrender the advanced proslavery ground to them once again, Berrien later announced his hostility to both the Taylor and Clay plans because both called for California statehood. Only after Berrien had publicly committed himself to this position did Stephens and Toombs begin to work for a compromise that included California's admission. Their defiant behavior in December, in sum, was a preemptive strike to forestall criticism from Democrats and Whigs in Georgia, one that goaded Berrien out onto an extremist limb on the California issue. And as soon as he had crawled out on it, they began to saw it off with consummate skill. Thus did factional rivalry shape the bewildering behavior of Georgia Whigs in the Thirty-First Congress. Thus did selfish and myopic tactical decisions help inflame sectional antagonisms and reduce the chances that Taylor's plan could succeed.36

Whatever motivated the six Southerners' bolt, it decisively influenced attempts to organize the House. On Monday, December 3, the House began a three-week marathon that took sixty-three ballots to choose a presiding officer. Democrats ran Georgia's Howell Cobb, and despite his well-publicized opposition to Calhoun's Southern Address, some northern Democrats refused to support him. Nor would all Whigs unite behind Winthrop. The first ballot set a pattern for subsequent roll calls. Cobb received 103 votes, Winthrop won 96, and the remaining members scattered their votes, thus denying either one the necessary majority. Eight or nine Free Soilers consistently voted for David Wilmot or some other member of their group. The six southern Whig bolters cast their votes for Meredith Gentry, who had not yet arrived in Washington to protest their action. After a few ballots Hilliard swung behind Winthrop, but the other five remained in stubborn opposition. A few northern Whigs and Democrats who had won with Free Soil backing also deserted the two caucus candidates and wasted their votes on still other men.³⁷

So it went for vote after vote, day after day. Resentments intensified. Tempers frayed. On one occasion, fists flew. This long agony clearly aggravated sectional animosities within both major parties and reduced the likelihood that northern and southern Whigs might combine behind Taylor's plan. Night after night Whigs caucused to reconsider their commitment to Winthrop, and night after night the northern majority, pressured by northern senators and their constituents, pledged to stick by Winthrop rather than succumb to the extortion of Toombs and his fellow bolters, who vowed, in turn, that no northern Whig would be speaker. For northern Whigs, Winthrop's candidacy became a test of sectional will and honor, a test they refused to fail.³⁸

Democrats, in fact, splintered long before the Whigs, but sectional jealousies still kept anyone from prevailing. From the first ballot on December 3 through the thirty-ninth ballot on December 11, between 96 and 102 Whigs (including the Philadelphia Native American Lewis C. Levin) steadfastly adhered to Winthrop, but five southern bolters and the Free Soilers resolutely opposed him. Meanwhile, Cobb's support eroded and Democrats fragmented as early as the thirteenth ballot. By the end of the session's first week, between sixteen and twenty men were receiving votes on each ballot. Gradually, however, the Democrats began to coalesce behind Indiana's William J. Brown. By the final ballot on Tuesday, December 11, with 114 votes necessary for election, the tally stood 109 for Brown, 101 for Winthrop, 7 for Wilmot, 5 for the Kentucky Whig Charles S. Morehead, to whom the Stephens-Toombs bolters had suddenly switched that day, and five other votes scattered. Then came an indelible demonstration of the sectional rancor that paralyzed the House.

At their caucus the previous night, Whigs agreed to stick with Winthrop one more day and then, on December 12, to concentrate behind Morehead, who, it was hoped, could hold all of Winthrop's supporters and pick up enough southern Democrats to triumph. Before balloting began on the 11th, Whigs made their intentions known, and by the end of the day, according to Morehead, as many as twenty southern Democrats had promised him support. The switch of Toombs and company from Gentry to Morehead on the 11th, however, irreparably stigmatized him among northern Whigs, who, by this point, would never support anyone Toombs and Stephens favored. At the caucus on the night of the 11th, northern Whigs complained that Morehead's election "would ruin the Whig party in the North," particularly if southern Democrats also supported him. The disappointed Morehead graciously withdrew as the nominee, and the caucus voted to back North Carolina's Edward Stanly instead. But Stanly, a firm Taylor man, had the same drawback as Morehead. Because he represented a slave state, northern Whigs refused to support him.³⁹

On December 12 eleven different Whigs—four Southerners and seven Northerners—received votes for speaker, with William Duer of New York leading the pack with a mere twenty-six votes and Stanly garnering only eighteen. The Democrat Brown meanwhile climbed to 112, and his triumph on the next ballot seemed assured. Now Democrats foundered on the rock of sectional distrust. Brown's total included five Free Soilers, who had threatened to help elect him unless Whigs abandoned Winthrop. Shocked southern Democrats immediately demanded to know why Brown, who had "professed great friendship for the South" in the Democratic caucus, got Free Soil votes. Before the day ended, it was proved that Brown had secretly promised Wilmot that, if elected, Brown would allow Free Soilers to name the three committees that dealt with slavery and also support abolition in the District. As Outlaw succinctly wrote his wife, "This exposure has overwhelmed him." Brown never got another vote. 40

The following day, on the forty-first ballot, a staggering total of thirty different men received votes for speaker. Winthrop and Cobb reemerged as their parties' front-runners, but with only fifty-nine and forty votes, respectively. The stale-mate continued until Saturday, December 22, when, after the fifty-ninth fruitless ballot, a Democrat moved that the House vote three more times and, if no one secured a majority on those roll calls, determine the winner by a plurality on the sixty-third ballot. This procedural motion carried 113 to 106, with most Whigs in the majority. Voting against it were the Free Soilers and the five southern Whig bolters, who preferred a stalemate to an enemy's triumph. On the sixty-third and final ballot Cobb edged out Winthrop 102 to 99, an outcome most northern Whigs viewed as a southern as much as a Democratic victory. Southern Democrats were not content with their success in the contest for speaker, however. When the Democratic caucus nominated Pennsylvania's John Forney for the influential clerkship of the House, southern Democrats rebelled and helped elect the Whig candidate, Thomas J. Campbell of Tennessee. 41

Thus did the southern minority overcome a substantial northern preponderance within the chamber and within the Whig party to organize the House. That victory and the sectional ill-feeling it both reflected and exacerbated decisively influenced the attempt to resolve the territorial crisis. Although Cobb was no fire-eater, one consequence of his election as speaker and of Democratic control of both the House and Senate committees was abundantly clear. The chance that Congress might heed Taylor's policy recommendations measurably declined.

Ш

Cobb's election finally allowed Taylor to send his annual message, along with the reports of his department heads, to Congress on Christmas Eve. During the three-week delay, speculation about Taylor's intentions had intensified. "Thunder-struck" after seeing Taylor, Indiana Free Soiler George W. Julian sneered that he was "an old, outrageously ugly, uncultivated, uninformed man" who "can't converse in decent language" and who "cannot be otherwise than a perfect tool in the hands of Clayton & Co." Contrary to this biased assessment, Taylor was infuriated rather than intimidated by southern threats to secede and refused to abandon what he regarded as the best compromise solution to the squabble over the Cession. Taylor, Seward assured Weed, was "as willing to try conclusions with [southern malcontents] as General Jackson was with the Nullifiers." He would make his determination to crush any attempt at disunion unmistakably clear in his message to Congress. "

The message, drafted primarily by Clayton, emphasized foreign relations since Taylor's inauguration. It also echoed the recommendations for tariff revision and a congressional reconsideration of the subtreasury system in Meredith's accompanying report, but unlike Meredith, Taylor, in good Whig fashion, called on Congress to fund rivers and harbors improvements. Sandwiched between these sections was a single paragraph dealing with the Mexican Cession. Californians had written a constitution and would apply for statehood, Taylor blandly reported, and he recommended "their application to the favorable consideration of Congress." The people of New Mexico would follow suit "at no very distant period," and "by awaiting their action all causes of uneasiness may be avoided and confidence and kind feeling preserved." Obviously referring to the Free Soilers, he pointedly repeated Washington's warning against political parties characterized by "geographical discriminations" and urged that "we should abstain from the introduction of those exciting topics of a sectional character which have hitherto produced painful apprehensions in the public mind."

Two other passages merit attention. "The Executive has authority to recommend (not to dictate) measures to Congress," Taylor asserted. He would not interfere with Congress' deliberations until it sent bills to him, and he would use the veto "only in extraordinary cases." Members of Congress, when writing legislation, owed "no responsibility to any human power but their constituents." Some southern congressmen took this passage as confirmation of their worst fears—that Taylor would indeed sign the Proviso if Congress enacted it. Instead, he was reassuring Whigs that he would heed Congress' will. Whig congressmen, therefore, could understandably interpret Taylor's recommendations for the Cession not as non-negotiable demands, but as mere suggestions that Taylor would readily abandon if they devised an alternative policy.

Taylor was much clearer about threats to the Union. "In my judgment its dissolution would be the greatest of calamities, and to avert that should be the study of every American," he declared. "Whatever dangers may threaten it, I shall stand by it and maintain it in its integrity to the full extent of the obligations imposed and the power conferred upon me by the Constitution." Time would soon show that this pledge was not mere rhetoric.

Reaction to the message predictably followed party lines. Democrats ridiculed a careless malapropism about foreign relations. Whigs generally praised the tone and substance of the document. The few Whigs who alluded to Taylor's brief remarks about California and New Mexico, including Southerners, applauded them. "We think 'the world' of the Message," summarized one of Seward's New York allies.⁴⁵

Completely neglected by historians, Meredith's Treasury report excited Whigs far more than Taylor's message. "I have read the message with great pleasure," gushed John Pendleton Kennedy. "But above all papers I have ever read of the kind I have never seen anything better than Meredith's. That report alone ought to be a bulwark to Taylor's administration which nothing could shake." Manufacturers in Boston, New York, and Philadelphia were said to be delighted. Even a few Democrats lauded Meredith's recommendations for tariff revision and the subtreasury system. Whatever happened to the territorial issue, it appeared when Congress opened that the administration's economic program stood a chance of winning the bipartisan backing Taylor and Meredith envisioned.⁴⁶

One significant group of businessmen, however, did not join the chorus praising Meredith's report. Importing merchants in Boston and New York City who benefited from the public warehousing system were frightened by Meredith's critique of it as a drain on public revenues. Fear in the mercantile community became outright alienation when, in late January, Meredith laid off New York's superintendent of public warehouses and all of his subordinates on the grounds that the customs service could not afford their salaries. To angry merchants this action seemed abolition of the public warehousing system by administrative fiat. That importing merchants in Boston, New York, and Philadelphia would take the lead in organizing and financing opposition to Taylor's proposal for the Mexican Cession was no coincidence. Resentment of Meredith's economic program prepared the way. 47

Whatever Whigs' reactions, Democrats in Congress quickly flouted Taylor's recommendations, thereby jeopardizing their adoption. Three days after Taylor's message arrived, Senator Henry Foote of Mississippi moved that Congress' "duty" was "to establish suitable territorial governments for California, for Deseret [Utah], and for New Mexico." Organizing territorial governments that provoked fights over the Proviso was, of course, precisely what Taylor hoped to avert. In early January, Senator James M. Mason of Virginia introduced a harsh fugitive slave bill. At the same time, southern Democrats in both the House and Senate demanded that Taylor send Congress all the administration's correspondence with its agents in California and New Mexico in order to expose Taylor as the instigator of western movements for statehood with free constitutions. During January, Foote and Missouri's Thomas Hart Benton also sparred over a crucial topic that Taylor had ignored in his annual message—the location of the boundary between Texas and New Mexico. Foote insisted that Texas retain all the land it claimed east of the Rio Grande River, while Benton granted New Mexico everything north of the Red River and west of the 102nd meridian, hundreds of miles east of the Rio Grande, in return for a payment of $15 million from the federal government. Democrats emphatically signaled, in short, that Whigs alone would not determine congressional policy.48

Taylor clarified his own proposal in special messages to the House and Senate on January 21 and 23 responding to Democrats' demands for information about the administration's activities in California and New Mexico. Protesting that he had instructed his emissaries not to interfere when local residents drafted state constitutions, he freely admitted that he had urged them to write such documents and apply for statehood in order "to put it in the power of Congress, by the admission of California and New Mexico as States, to remove all occasion for the unnecessary agitation of the public mind." Without immediate statehood sectional conflict over slavery extension was inevitable, for "under the Constitution Congress has power to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territories of the United States." Hence every acquisition of territory had provoked conflict over whether slavery "should or should not be prohibited in that territory." For the first time, in short, Taylor publicly asserted that Congress had the constitutional right to ban slavery from territories and thus hinted that should Congress pass the Proviso, he would not veto it. 49

But his proposal would avert the Proviso. Californians had written a constitution and would apply for statehood, and "I earnestly recommend that it may receive the sanction of Congress." In a clear allusion to the northern Whigs' earlier burial of Preston's California statehood bill through a Proviso amendment, Taylor then warned Congress not to "annex a condition" regarding slavery to California's "admission as a State." Such a stipulation would be meaningless since, once admitted, California could change its constitution. Moreover, such congressional dictation denied a state's right to determine its "domestic institutions" for itself, a right, Taylor did not have to add, that Southerners stridently defended. Furthermore, "it is to be expected that in the residue of the territory ceded to us by Mexico the people residing there will at the time of their incorporation into the Union settle all questions of domestic policy to suit themselves."

As for New Mexico, its residents would also seek statehood "at no very distant period." Until they did so. Taylor declared, it would be inexpedient for Congress "to establish a Territorial government . . . especially as the people of this Territory still enjoy the benefit and protection of their municipal laws originally derived from Mexico and have a military force there to protect them from the Indians." Ouick statehood for New Mexico would also allow the Supreme Court to resolve its boundary dispute with Texas. If New Mexico instead remained a territory, Congress itself would have to find an adjustment, a task that was impossible without sacrificing the claims of Texas or New Mexico. Because "the question which now excites such painful sensations in the country will in the end certainly be settled by the silent effect of causes independent of the action of Congress," Taylor concluded, "I again submit to your wisdom the policy . . . of awaiting the salutary operation of those causes." Nonaction by Congress, other than the admission of states, would "avoid the creation of geographical parties and secure the harmony of feeling so necessary to the beneficial action of our political system "

Taylor thus brilliantly charted a middle path between sectional extremes defined by the Free Soilers and Calhounites, a path that nonetheless clove to the northern side of the sectional divide in terms of substantive benefits. Taylor could count. Northern Whigs dominated the congressional party. He would save southern honor by averting the "degradation" of congressional prohibition, but he would guarantee the North free soil, under Mexican law prior to statehood and under antislavery constitutions after statehood.

Immediate reaction to Taylor's plan divided along partisan and sectional lines. Free Soilers like Ohio's Edward Wade contemptuously dismissed it as a sellout to the South. Not only did Taylor flatly denounce sectional parties like theirs, but he opposed congressional prohibition of slavery from the territories and seemed to deny Congress' right to deny admission to new slave states. Northern Democratic papers, in contrast, endorsed immediate statehood for California, but they accused Taylor of shamelessly pirating Lewis Cass' popular sovereignty doctrine, which northern Whigs had scorned in 1848, and sneered that his "nonaction plan" for the remainder of the Cession was hopelessly inadequate.⁵⁰

Everything about the plan—the recommendation of immediate statehood, the admission that congressional prohibition was constitutional, the proposal that Mexican law operate until statehood, the apparent animus against Texas—infuriated southern Democrats. Editors and congressmen blasted it as their long-forecasted betrayal of the South by Taylor, as a thinly veiled attempt to keep slavery out of the Mexican Cession that was more loathsome than even the Wilmot Proviso because Taylor tried to accomplish by deceit what Northerners had attempted in the open. Taylor's action in California and New Mexico, thundered Virginia's Congressman James A. Seddon, was "insidious and fatal to the rights and interests of my section." The administration had thrown its "whole weight against the . . . slaveholder."

In the North and border states, Whig papers and politicos fulsomely praised the special message. "The ground taken is just right," proclaimed an enthusiastic

Bostonian, a judgment widely shared by his fellow northern Whigs. ⁵² Most southern Whigs, in contrast, reacted frostily. While a few Whig papers publicly praised Taylor's plan and while many southern Whigs privately contended that the whole question of slavery extension was a nettlesome abstraction, only one southern Whig congressman responded immediately to Taylor's special message. North Carolina's Clingman denounced it as vehemently as did southern Democrats. The "impudent" plan would leave the South "degraded and enslaved." "Give us . . . fair settlement," thundered Clingman, but do not "cheat us by a mere empty form." If California were admitted, slavery must be guaranteed in the remainder of the Cession. If Northerners would not make such a concession, he would welcome secession, and to stop Taylor's unjust scheme he was prepared to lead filibusters against all appropriation bills. Thus did Clingman, who was obviously courting North Carolina's Democrats to gain a Senate seat, mount the barricades of revolt thrown up earlier by Toombs and Stephens. ⁵³

Other southern Whig congressmen remained silent, but most were cool to Taylor's proposal. It was not long, however, before they articulated their own proposal as the price of California's admission. Because almost all congressmen agreed that Mexican law barred slavery from the Cession until Congress replaced it, Massachusetts' Julius Rockwell explained to a friend, "it becomes the policy of the South to have territorial govts. established" without the Proviso and to extend the boundary of Texas to the Rio Grande. As to which southern Whig was expected to challenge Taylor by advancing such a scheme, there was little doubt. On the day that Taylor sent his annual message to Congress, Iverson Harris wrote Berrien, "In Georgia the hope is extensively diffused that Mr. Clay means to crown his illustrious life with the adjustment of all of these questions." 54

Almost seventy-three when he reached Washington in December, Henry Clay suffered from a protracted and enervating cold. Nonetheless, when Clay ventured out for social occasions, he still exhibited the sparkling wit and personal magnetism that had dazzled Washington society for four decades. Even the caustic Free Soiler Julian begrudgingly admitted that Clay exerted "a peculiar power in his presence," and at the traditional White House New Year's levee Clay was "an object of as much attraction as the President himself." "From everybody, of both parties," Clay wrote his wife, "I receive friendly attentions and kind consideration." "55

For months politicians had speculated about Clay's relationship with the new administration, and the president and his cabinet officers showed Clay every social courtesy, calling at his lodgings and showering him with more dinner invitations than his poor health allowed him to accept. Social politeness did not translate into political intimacy, however. Clayton was an exception. To Clay's delight, Clayton kept him posted on the activities of his son James' efforts in Lisbon to settle a long-disputed American claim against Portugal. With the others, Clay's relations were "civil . . . but nothing more." 56

Clay's dealings with Taylor himself were also superficially polite, but he still disdained and resented the former general. In January he bluntly told the Free

Soilers Julian and Giddings that the nomination of Taylor "had been & would be the ruin of the Whigs." Clay shared congressional Whigs' anger at Taylor's appointments, but he faulted Taylor primarily for failing to outline a policy during 1849 on which Whigs could successfully campaign. "The elections of this year," he groused to James in early December, "have gone very unfavorably to the Whigs, and without some favorable turn in public affairs in their favor they must lose the ascendancy." Supplying a program that could put the Whigs back on a winning track thus appealed to Clay as a fitting way to turn the tables on the political novice in the White House and the ingrates who had nominated him. Clay could reestablish his own stature as the party's preeminent statesman by doing what the military hero had manifestly failed to do.

The sectional rift within the Whig party and the nation also genuinely alarmed him. The secessionist rhetoric of "Hotspurs" like Stephens and Toombs and the menacing legislative resolutions adopted in the Deep South persuaded him that "disunionist sentiment" had spread further than he had thought. By mid-Ianuary he was clearly worried that the Union stood in jeopardy and that Taylor's elliptical December message would not satisfy either section. Nor did Taylor's annual message address what Clay astutely saw was the crux of the problem. As early as the previous June. Clay had written his friend Thomas Stevenson "that more difficulty will be encountered in fixing the boundaries of Texas than in deciding the question of the introduction of Slavery in the new territories." Taylor was also mum about other southern grievances growing out of "the vexed subject of Slavery"—fear of abolition in the District and the emerging demand for a new fugitive slave law. Here then was an opportunity to give a "favorable turn" to "public affairs" that might help the Whigs. By January 2, three weeks before Taylor sent his special message to Congress, Clay had already decided to proffer "some comprehensive scheme of settling amicably the whole question, in all its bearings."59

Patriotism, paternal concern for his beloved and endangered Whig party, and jealousy of Taylor, in sum, all motivated Clay. In January, he had no desire to split the Whig party or to lead Whigs into a bipartisan coalition with Democrats. Clay's model was the Tyler administration when congressional Whigs as a body had isolated the president, ignored his recommendations, and rallied behind Clay's leadership to formulate their own program. If Taylor betrayed his pledge to allow Congress to make policy without any interference from the executive and dared to oppose the congressional plan, he might share Tyler's fate. If instead he accepted Clay's formula, then, as one Whig had predicted a year earlier, "all that is done will be attributed to Clay & Taylor will be regarded as a mere tool in his hands." Either way, Clay's revenge would be sweet.

During the first three weeks of January, Clay worked out the details of his plan at night in the seclusion of his hotel rooms, and whom, if anyone, he consulted in that period is unknown. Then, on the night of January 21, after Taylor's special message had been read to the House, the sick Kentuckian braved a cold rainstorm to make an unannounced visit to the house of Daniel Webster. Although Clay had barely spoken to his ancient rival during the previous eight years, he now informed his surprised host of the gist of his scheme, argued that it would satisfy some Democrats and all southern Whigs except the Georgians, and asked Webster's help in saving the Union. Refusing to commit himself to the specifics of the plan, Webster approved its principle and praised Clay's patriotism.

Thus did the two symbols of ultra Whiggery, both of whom resented their displacement by the neophyte Taylor, appear to join forces.⁶¹

On January 29, before packed galleries, Clay presented to the Senate eight resolutions that together comprised his alternative to the president's plan. Ten months later, after Congress had adjourned, he would assert that his "whole system of measures, as originally proposed, finally prevailed in both houses of congress" to become the famous Compromise of 1850. Throughout his illustrious career Henry Clay had a truly magnificent capacity for self-deception, but some historians have accepted the essential accuracy of this self-serving statement. To appreciate how preposterous it was, in exactly what ways Clay's original proposals differed from Taylor's, and why Whigs reacted to the different plans as they did, one must examine Clay's propositions closely and especially distinguish their content from the rhetorical gloss in which he encased them.⁶²

Clay did characterize his resolutions as a Union-saving compromise. "Taken together in combination," he began, they proposed "an amicable arrangement of all questions of controversy between the free and the slave states, growing out of the subject of slavery." They represented "a great national scheme of compromise and harmony" that was imperative, for the Union was in danger. Southerners might secede rather than submit to northern aggressions against slavery. Hence he was asking the North to make a "more liberal and extensive concession" than the South. The North could afford such magnanimity because it was "numerically more powerful than the slave States" and because northern hostility to slavery was but a mere "sentiment without sacrifice, a sentiment without danger, a sentiment without hazard, without peril, without loss." At stake for the South, in contrast, was not only the potential loss of an incalculable amount of property but also insurrection, arson, pillage, murder, and rape—in short, obliteration of "the social fabric, life, and all that makes life desirable and happy." Justice and the Union's preservation required Northerners to make the greater sacrifice. 63

In modern political jargon, Clay's assessment of his proposals would be called "spin control." It bore little relationship to their substance. Clay hoped to rally all congressional Whigs behind his plan, and, like Taylor, he could count. He offered southern Whigs reassuring words, but his actual recommendations were slanted to appeal to the northern Whig majority.

Clay's plan was more comprehensive and, superficially, more prosouthern than Taylor's. His last four resolutions dealt with subjects Taylor had ignored. One called on Congress to abolish the notorious slave market in the District of Columbia, a demand long pressed by northern Whigs. The other three addressed southern fears and grievances. Congress should declare that it had no power to prohibit the interstate slave trade and that it was "inexpedient" to abolish slavery itself in the District of Columbia without the approval of Maryland, the consent of the District's residents, and "just compensation to the owners of slaves within the District." Finally, Clay asked Congress to enact a "more effectual" fugitive slave law.

Clay obviously intended the three prosouthern resolutions to reassure Southerners that secession was unnecessary, but they bear closer examination. Two of the three entailed no concrete legislation that benefited Southerners. Rather, Clay merely called on Congress to declare that it would not take action against the interstate slave trade or slavery in the District. By asserting that abolition in the District was "inexpedient," moreover, Clay implied that Congress had the right to do it, a right that southern Democrats and many southern Whigs furiously denied. Finally, while Clay did call for a new fugitive slave law, the law Congress eventually passed omitted provisions Clay included in his own version to provide minimal procedural protection to alleged fugitives, provisions Clay clearly hoped would make the bill palatable to northern Whigs. Even Clay's most overt concession to the South, in short, was framed to garner support from the northern Whig majority.⁶⁴

Clay's first four resolutions, which addressed the Mexican Cession and which formed the heart of his compromise proposal, were decisively pronorthern. The first resolution averred that California "with suitable boundaries" ought to be admitted to statehood immediately upon its application "without the imposition by Congress of any restriction in respect to the exclusion or introduction of slavery within those boundaries." Zachary Taylor had recommended exactly the same thing. From there Clay appeared to diverge from the president. He pointedly explained that he could not agree with Taylor's request that Congress do nothing about the remainder of the Cession until its residents also applied for statehood. Congress had a duty "to legislate for their government if they can, and at all events to legislate for them, and to give them the benefit of law, and order, and security." Thus Clay's second resolution called for Congress to organize the entire remainder of the Cession into an unspecified number of territorial governments, exactly what Taylor had warned Congress not to attempt.

Taylor hoped to dodge conflict over the Proviso, and so did Clay. Yet the wording of his resolution on the territories was even more explicitly antislavery in its implications than Taylor's proposal. "That as slavery does not exist by law, and is unlikely to be introduced into any of the territory acquired by the United States from the Republic of Mexico," the resolution contended, "it is inexpedient for Congress to provide by law for its introduction into or exclusion from any part of the said territory." Thus Congress should establish territorial governments "without the adoption of any restriction or condition on the subject of slavery." In his brief speech on January 29 and in a fuller two-day address in early February, Clay elaborated at length on the meaning of this resolution. Climate and the poor quality of the soil in the remainder of the Cession outside of California guaranteed that slavery could never be profitably established there, and therefore the North should not insult the South unnecessarily by demanding congressional prohibition. More than that, the existing laws in the Cession, the Mexican laws, prohibited slavery in the Cession, and Congress must do nothing to replace those laws when it organized territorial governments. In sum, Clay implied that those laws would continue in force even after Congress created territorial governments unless residents in their territorial legislatures decided to change them, and New Mexico's residents had already shown that they had no intention of doing so.65

This analysis significantly reduces the supposed differences between the Taylor and Clay plans. By again using the word "inexpedient," Clay, like Taylor, recognized Congress' right to bar slavery from the territories, but both men argued that the Proviso was unnecessary. Taylor would avoid it by having Congress do nothing until residents in the remainder of the Cession applied for statehood and by allowing Mexican law to operate in the interim. Clay would have Congress organize territorial governments but would bar it from replacing the Mexican antislavery laws. Unlike Taylor, who referred only in general to the laws of Mexico, Clay explicitly and repeatedly emphasized Mexican antislavery statutes in particular as a reason why the Proviso was unnecessary. Thus he went further than Taylor had both in attempting to convince northern Whigs to drop the Proviso and in reassuring them that slavery would never spread into the Cession.

But it was in his third and fourth resolutions dealing with Texas that Clav made his most astonishing bid for northern support. Unlike Taylor, who urged Congress to leave the boundary dispute to the courts after New Mexico became a state, Clay wanted Congress to fix Texas' boundary. And what a boundary he had in mind! Responding to southern demands, he would make the Rio Grande Texas' western boundary, but to appease the North he would lop off the northern half of the area Texas claimed by continuing the southern border of New Mexico from El Paso on the Rio Grande River straight eastward across Texas until it reached the Sabine River between Texas and Louisiana. The area south of that line between the Rio Grande and the Gulf of Mexico would become the new state of Texas. The area north of that line, which included the towns of Dallas and Fort Worth and some 20,000 slaves in 1850, would not become a new state. Rather. it would become part of the Mexican Cession, where, Clay had stressed, Mexican law prohibited slavery. What Clay was proposing, unless the owners of slaves north of his line moved, was outright abolition. Whether Clay realized what he was proposing, it may have been the most startling antislavery measure introduced in Congress before the Civil War. That Clay could later declare in a public speech, and some historians contend, that this measure "as originally proposed" became part of the Compromise of 1850 defies belief!66

Carefully omitting any reference to compensating Texas for the loss of more than half of the area it claimed in 1850, Clay's fourth resolution proposed that the United States government assume the Texas debt, that is, that Congress fund the bonds that the Republic of Texas had issued between 1836 and 1845 and for which it had pledged customs revenues it lost upon joining the Union. Clay left the precise dollar amount of this funding unspecified, but he insisted that such payment would not be made until the Texas legislature or a state convention passed an "authentic act" that relinquished "to the United States any claim which it has to any part of New Mexico," that is, to all the land north of the boundary line Clay proposed to draw. By this scheme, in short, the state of Texas itself would not receive a nickel. The holders of Texas bonds, most of whom were not Texans or residents of other slave states but northern businessmen, would receive the monetary compensation for slicing in half the nation's largest slave state.⁶⁷

Method rather than malice impelled this proposal. Clay had been thinking about a settlement of the Texas-New Mexico boundary dispute for months. He knew that many Northerners, and especially northern Whigs, totally rejected Texas' claims and would strenuously object to paying it for land it did not own. He must have known as well that Texans themselves would resist any redrawing of their borders. He may also have been informed that holders of Texas bonds did not believe that the Texas state government would pay them off if the United States paid Texas directly. By advocating that the federal government assume that debt, he thus created an incentive for bondholders across the country to lobby Congress on behalf of a boundary settlement Texans themselves would oppose.

He would counter the expected opposition of Texans and other Southerners in Congress, that is, by bringing a new player into the game.

Even as Clay concluded his fervent call for a compromise to save the Union by waving a fragment from George Washington's coffin, southern senators sprang to their feet in angry protest. Unlike some historians, they instantly recognized Clay's sweet talk about the North making greater concessions for the sugar coating it was. Seven Democrats—Thomas Rusk of Texas, Foote and Jefferson Davis of Mississippi, Solomon Downs of Louisiana, James M. Mason of Virginia, William R. King of Alabama, and Andrew Pickens Butler of South Carolina—and the Georgia Whig Berrien denounced the scheme as a flagrant violation of Southern Rights. They had to speak immediately, one after another insisted, lest their silence mistakenly indicate that their states would submit to such an outrage. They pilloried the rape of Texas soil without any compensation, Clay's admission that Congress could abolish slavery in the District, his insistence that Mexican law outlawed slavery in the Cession and should not be replaced, and his willingness to admit California without giving slaveholders a chance to carry their property there. Clay's supposed compromise conceded "the whole question, at once, that our people shall not go into the new Territories and take their property with them." declared Mason. "Is a measure in which we of the minority are to receive nothing, a measure of compromise?" sputtered Davis. "I consider this compromise as no compromise at all," echoed Downs.69

While southern Democrats blasted the scheme in toto, they honed in on what Clay maintained about Mexican law, thus again revealing a more acute understanding of Clay's proposals than some historians have subsequently displayed. They recognized that Clay's emphasis on Mexican law, not his willingness to organize territories without the Proviso, was the linchpin of his plan. "What matters it whether it be under cover of the acts of the Mexican Government or by the operation of Congressional law, that slavery is excluded?" Davis protested. "What is there in the nature of a compromise here?" queried Butler since Clay insisted "that, by the existing laws in the Territories," slaveholders cannot "go there with their property." Clay cannot "palm off this proposition as a compromise," summarized the Virginian Thomas Ritchie, editor of the Democratic Washington Daily Union, since he "asserts that the Mexican edict abolishing slavery is tantamount to the Wilmot Proviso." Therefore "we must now look to clearer, and more generous and more intrepid spirits to save the Union."

Ritchie obviously had Democrats in mind, and ultimately, Democrats who controlled both houses of Congress reshaped the plan Clay intended to unite congressional Whigs into an essentially Democratic compromise. Because Southerners dominated the Democrats in Congress, moreover, the final Compromise made far more concessions to the South than Clay had intended. As the shrewd Truman Smith accurately predicted six weeks after Clay first spoke, "Our northern democracy will cave in as usual & the South will do as it pleases except in the matter of California."

Hence the final Compromise differed substantially from the "whole system of measures, as originally proposed" by Clay on January 29. California was admitted as a free state and the slave trade in the District was outlawed. But the borders of Texas were far more generous than Clay and northern Whigs wanted, and

Texas received direct compensation for its surrendered claims, a stipulation Clay had tried to avoid precisely because northern Whigs found it so offensive. The Fugitive Slave Act was easier on purported owners and harsher on alleged fugitives than Clay wanted. Most important, territorial governments were organized without the Proviso but also without the explicit continuation of Mexican law. States carved out of those territories, moreover, were explicitly guaranteed admission by Congress "with or without slavery, as their constitution may prescribe at the time of their admission," and territorial legislatures were granted the power to pass pro- or antislavery laws during the territorial stage. In short, the final Compromise created more potential opportunity for slavery's spread into the Mexican Cession than either the Taylor or Clay plans.⁷²

Democrats were primarily responsible for these changes and for the defeat of both the Taylor and Clay plans. But they were not solely responsible. The divergent reactions of Whig congressmen to those and other plans also played a crucial role. Some Whigs like Clay, who invested an emotional stake in the idea of compromise, had little choice but to cooperate with Democrats once they assumed command of the legislative agenda. The motives for the behavior of other Whigs were shaped by events in Washington, in their respective states, and in Texas, and by the simultaneous battle that was raging among Whigs over Senate confirmation of Taylor's appointees.

V

Clay's effort to rally Whigs in and outside Congress behind his plan proved stillborn. The similarity of Clay's proposals to those offered by Taylor a week earlier also stunted support. Both Whig papers in Washington—the Republic and the National Intelligencer—as well as a few Whig papers elsewhere, with good reason, minimized the differences between the two plans. Clay's plan was more comprehensive than Taylor's and called for congressional action to create territorial governments and to set Texas' boundaries that Taylor opposed. But on the admission of California and the extension of slavery to the remainder of the Mexican Cession the plans were quite similar, as southern Democrats instantly recognized.⁷³ Most southern Whigs therefore found no more sectional justice or hope of political salvation in Clay's plan than in Taylor's. The savagely accurate attack by southern Democrats on January 29 permanently discredited Clay's propositions. For southern Whigs, to endorse the plan as he presented it would betray the South and sign their political death warrants. Unlike the majority of southern Democrats, most, though not all, southern Whigs were willing to admit California, but they demanded as the price of admission far more concessions on other questions than Clay offered. John Bell, one of the few southern Whig senators besides Clay to speak between early February and mid-March, for example, proposed to offset California's admission by carving two new slave states out of Texas.74

Southern Whigs in the House did not immediately offer alternative plans of their own, but men like David Outlaw and Alexander Stephens rejected Clay's plan precisely because they also believed that only positive local law could sustain slavery and that Mexican law continued in force in the Cession until it was replaced. They preferred Clay's idea of forming territorial governments without the Proviso to Taylor's nonaction formula, but they sought territorial governments that could write proslavery territorial legislation if the residents so wished. Furthermore, they insisted that California's admission be contingent upon the organization of such territorial governments. In sum, like Bell, they rejected both the Taylor and Clay plans.⁷⁵

In addition, neither the administration nor most northern Whigs would support Clay's scheme. For one thing, to the extent that Northerners saw it as similar to Taylor's, they had little incentive to back it, especially if they wished to remain in Taylor's good graces on patronage matters. More important, many northern Whigs rejected the very idea of compromise as a pusillanimous surrender to phony threats of secession. "I do not myself propose to enter into any scheme of compromise whatever," Connecticut's Senator Roger Sherman Baldwin informed his wife. "As to the threats of disunion, they do not frighten anybody here." "California will be admitted . . . by decided majorities," predicted one of Seward's Buffalo lieutenants in early March. "Meanwhile the gas will escape, the courage of the turbulent will ooze out. The South will take up its hat and walk out of the house, probably get drunk and swear oaths in barrooms and eating houses, a night's rest and soda water will bring it round and the South will again take its seat."

But the substance of Clay's plan was as objectionable as the idea of compromise itself. Unlike Taylor's plan, Clay's proposal to organize territorial governments without the Proviso opened them to Free Soilers' charges that they had betrayed explicit pledges to prohibit slavery in all formally organized territories.⁷⁷ Contemptuous of both the Taylor and Clay plans, Free Soilers intensified the pressure on northern Whigs when, on February 4, Joseph Root forced a vote on a resolution instructing the House Committee on Territories to present bills organizing territorial governments in the Mexican Cession outside of California with slavery explicitly prohibited. This resolution confronted northern Whigs with a Hobson's choice. Supporting the measure meant flouting Taylor's wish that territorial governments not be established; opposing it implied retreat from the Proviso.

Eighteen northern Democrats and fourteen northern Whigs joined a solid southern phalanx to defeat Root's motion 105 to 78. But the deep embarrassment it caused northern Whigs, like southern attacks on Clay's proposals, convinced them, in the words of Truman Smith, that "Genl. Taylor's platform is the best—the only safe one for all parties." "The true way is to admit California & let the Territories alone," echoed Winthrop, who opposed Root's motion. "Any other course will kill Whiggery at one end of the Union." Across the North, Whigs who cared far more about the Free Soil threat in their own section than the welfare of southern Whigs reached the same conclusion about Clay's scheme. "Clay's resolutions on the Slavery question" knock "our position in regard to it, all to the winds," complained a Michigan Whig because they would abort efforts to attract Free Soilers. "Henry Clay's Compromise Bill will not satisfy Whigs in this region," chorused a New Yorker. "The territories had better be left to form states according to President Taylor's plan."

Yet northern Whigs, even with the help of Free Soilers, lacked the political power to enact it. On February 13, Taylor finally sent California's free constitution to Congress. Five days later, Wisconsin's Democratic-Free Soil Congressman

James Doty demanded the previous question on a resolution instructing the House Committee on Territories immediately to prepare a bill admitting California under that constitution. Northerners had a heavy majority in the House; they had the votes to pass the resolution. If the House immediately admitted California, the Senate would probably follow suit. Southern Whig demands for concessions as the price of California's admission would have been rebuffed. Yet the southern minority in the House held a trump card. One of their own was speaker. Stephens and Clingman frantically arranged a filibuster with southern Democrats to frustrate the northern majority. To stop a vote on Doty's motion, Southerners continually moved to adjourn and demanded roll call votes on the motions. Northerners had the votes to defeat adjournment, but the roll calls took precious time. And because Speaker Cobb recognized only Southerners, that minority tied up the House with roll call after roll call until midnight, when Doty's motion ceased to be the order of the day. To the dismay of northern Whigs, who recognized that "our rules present no means of success to the majority," the southern Whig minority had staved off California's immediate admission, but they had done so only by cooperating with southern Democrats who, through Cobb, could control the House agenda. On the question of California statehood, by itself, sectional lines had almost completely replaced party lines.⁷⁹

Stephens desperately organized a filibuster on February 18 because he believed some kind of compromise was necessary to defuse the growing threat of Deep South secession. Southern and northern Whigs did not just jockey for political advantage at home during 1850. They shared a deep commitment to the Union, even if they disagreed profoundly about the seriousness of the threat to it. Unlike Clay and Taylor, Stephens believed that secession could be averted only by making the prior organization of territories into which slavery might expand the price of California's admission. In mid-April, Stephens, Toombs, and possibly Clingman visited Taylor to plead the necessity of their own version of compromise. Unless Taylor pledged to veto the Proviso and supported the organization of such territorial governments before California was admitted, they warned, secession might be unstoppable. Mistakenly interpreting this warning as a threat by the southern Whig congressmen that they themselves would go for secession unless he capitulated, the old soldier furiously declared that he personally would lead troops into the field to put down secession and apparently denounced the three men as traitors who deserved to be hanged to visitors who saw him immediately after the close of the stormy interview. Whatever actually happened, one thing was clear. Southern Whigs who wanted some kind of quid pro quo for California's admission could expect little help from the administration.80

Confronted by the insistence of northern Whigs, Taylor, and even Clay that California be admitted with no strings attached, southern Whigs who wanted greater concessions had to look to Democrats for help. Some southern Democrats, of course, adamantly opposed California statehood under any circumstances, and on March 4, John C. Calhoun, whose health was rapidly failing and who would die by the end of the month, voiced the demands of such diehards in a speech that Mason read for him to the Senate. The equilibrium between North and South upon which the security of slavery and Southern Rights depended had been incessantly eroded by northern aggressions, Calhoun protested. Now the willingness of the North to forego California statehood formed the acid test of continued

Union. If California were admitted, the South must secede.⁸¹ Democratic firebrands like this offered potential southern Whig compromisers no room for maneuver, but other southern Democrats and influential northern Democratic leaders moved to frame a compromise southern Whigs could support since it salvaged Southern Rights and might save the Union.

Between December and February, in fact, northern Democrats changed tack on the slavery issue and thereby further dimmed the chances that Taylor's plan could attract enough votes to pass. Key northern Democratic senators like Lewis Cass, the party's standard bearer in 1848, Daniel S. Dickinson of New York, Stephen A. Douglas of Illinois, Jesse Bright of Indiana, and Daniel Sturgeon of Pennsylvania feared for the integrity of the national Democratic party and for the Union itself. But they also deeply resented the trafficking with Free Soilers, in which northern Democratic state parties had engaged during 1849, as well as the blithe jettisoning of popular sovereignty, to which they were intellectually and emocratic state parties in the North to reverse course once again, shun the Free Soilers, readopt popular sovereignty as the optimal solution to the territorial problem, and support the kind of compromise with the South that southern Whigs sought and that northern Whigs considered anathema.

They achieved considerable success. Cass pressured the Democratic majority in the Michigan legislature to rescind its instructions for him to support the Proviso, and in January 1850 he urged Samuel Medary, the leading Democratic editor in Ohio, to follow a similar course. "The union is in the most eminent danger," he warned, and "nothing can save us but a spirit of moderation from the North and West." Even before Medary received that epistle, Ohio's Democratic state convention repudiated its previous coalition with the Free Soilers by defeating resolutions asserting the right and duty of Congress to prohibit slavery in the territories. Although Dickinson, leader of New York's Hunker Democrats and an ardent proponent of popular sovereignty, lacked the clout in the New York legislature to have his own instructions on the Proviso rescinded, he proudly ignored them and set out to reimpose support for popular sovereignty as a test of party orthodoxy in order to humiliate the Barnburners, whose readmission to the Democratic party in 1849 he bitterly opposed.⁸²

Douglas had proposed immediate statehood for the Mexican Cession in the Thirtieth Congress, but he championed popular sovereignty as the best solution for the territories and the best platform for the Democratic party. Legislative instructions from Illinois to support the Wilmot Proviso infuriated him since they had been adopted in 1849 by a coalition of Free Soil Democrats and Whigs explicitly to force his resignation from the Senate. His allies at home therefore worked to recommit Democrats to popular sovereignty, and by April he was assured that "Wilmot provisoism is dead among the Democrats of Illinois." Pennsylvania's Democrats also renounced any alliance with the Free Soilers, and by February they were insisting instead on compromise with the South. "This new test of democracy" was being enforced at Democratic meetings to select delegates to the party's state convention, reported a Whig. "Prominent men at Washington originated this reorganization, which seems to be general, and no doubt extends to other states." Their rallying cry will be "the preservation & perpetuity of the Union."

Northern Democrats of this ilk offered southern Whigs seeking a more palatable compromise the help they needed. During the fierce struggle over Doty's resolution on February 18, for example, John McClernand, an Illinois Democrat acting at the behest of Douglas, chairman of the Senate Committee on Territories, approached Stephens and asked if there was a way out of the crisis. Stephens apparently set down his terms in writing. California could be admitted only after territories were organized in the remainder of the Cession without the Proviso, territories that were "distinctly empowered" to write proslavery laws in the territorial stage and proslavery constitutions when applying for statehood. The following night Stephens and Toombs attended a meeting at the house of their old Georgia enemy Cobb, along with Democrats Linn Boyd of Kentucky, chairman of the House Committee on Territories, McClernand and William A. Richardson, another Douglas lieutenant from Illinois, and John Miller of Ohio. Together they prepared a compromise plan that Democrats would introduce into the House and Senate, one that admitted California, reduced Texas' western boundaries in return for monetary compensation, and organized territorial governments in the rest of the Cession with the Democratic formula of popular sovereignty. The foundation was laid for the bipartisan coalition of southern Whigs, moderate southern and border state Democrats, and northern Democrats that would eventually pass their own version of compromise, not the plan Clay had proposed.84

Thus potential compromisers among southern Whigs were forced to ally themselves with Democrats—sometimes, as was the case of Stephens, Toombs, and Cobb, with Democrats from their own state. They had little choice, however, if they hoped to resolve the crisis in a way that did not entail political disaster, let alone threaten the Union. Besides, whatever the predisposition of a few southern Democrats like Cobb and Boyd toward compromise, it was primarily northern, not southern, Democrats who were prepared to bargain. Democratic parties in the South, in contrast, had moved to the extreme by threatening secession and endorsing the Nashville Convention. By backing compromise, southern Whigs could still distinguish themselves from the great majority of Democrats in their home states. Compromise could save their political careers at the same time that it saved the Union.

Henry Clay was also forced to seek Democratic cooperation in the Senate. During the first month after Clay introduced his proposal, aside from Badger and Bell, who did not back Clay's plan itself, only Democrats in the Senate had promoted the idea of admitting California in return for other concessions to the South. Those Democrats, however, had made it clear that they could not accept Clay's solution to the Texas-New Mexico boundary dispute or his insistence on the perpetuity of Mexican law. One of the chief Democratic critics of these aspects of Clay's plan was the Democratic editor Thomas Ritchie, and through the mediation of a reporter named James Simonton and Virginia's Democratic congressman Thomas Bayly, chairman of the powerful House Ways and Means Committee, Clay met privately with Ritchie on February 10. In return for editorial support from the Union, Clay apparently agreed to drop his stress on Mexican law and to accept Democrats' popular sovereignty formula.⁸⁵

Ritchie also pressed Clay to accept Foote's procedural strategy of turning over to a select Senate committee, rather than to Douglas' existing Committee on Territories, all the proposals regarding slavery that had been introduced and instructing that committee "to procure a compromise embracing all the questions now arising out of the institution of slavery." Everyone recognized that this procedure would inevitably result in combining California's admission with territorial legislation and resolution of the Texas boundary in a single bill. It would create a formal quid pro quo for the admission of California that Taylor, almost all northern Whigs, and Clay himself abhorred. To write what Clay first derisively called—and thereby permanently labeled—an "omnibus" bill, the Kentuckian knew, would be to ensure the opposition of northern Whigs whom he had courted so ardently with his own propositions. Eventually, however, Clay capitulated to that demand as well. That reversal marked his recognition that only help from Democrats and southern Whigs like Badger, who liked the idea better than Clay's own proposal, offered any hope of passing some kind of compromise. Clay reluctantly reached that conclusion, in turn, because of northern Whigs' reaction to developments in March.⁸⁶

While Clay and other southern Whigs solicited Democratic aid to resolve the territorial issue on terms acceptable to the South, the administration and its supporters around the country fumed about the lack of vocal congressional support for Taylor's plan. During February, Southerners who blasted both the Taylor and Clay proposals dominated the debate. Only a few northern Whigs in the House and Jacob Miller in the Senate defended the administration. While Miller's speech was able, friends of the administration grew increasingly disappointed that Clay and Webster had not entered the fray to shield Taylor from Democratic barbs. "Those gentlemen must be sensible that their silence & neglect will have the effect of opposition," carped Crittenden from Kentucky. The administration, he warned Clayton, must have a powerful spokesman in the Senate. Truman Smith, despite his skills as a party manager, would not do, for Smith was an "unadroit, I might almost say fatal defender."

With Clay promoting a broader settlement than Taylor, and with other southern Whigs disenchanted with the president's scheme, Daniel Webster, who at the age of sixty-seven was still "the most intellectual looking man" George Julian had ever seen, became the chief hope of administration supporters. Unaware of Webster's meeting with Clay, northern Whigs almost unanimously expected him to back Taylor's plan. During February, in fact, Webster said nothing on the Senate floor as he agonized over what to do. Clay had called for compromise to save the Union, but Webster, whose views oscillated, did not share Clay's sense of crisis. He frequently wrote friends that "the Union is not in danger." "There will be no disunion or disruption. Things will cool off. California will come in. New Mexico will be postponed. No bones will be broken." When Webster announced that he would speak on March 6 or 7, Winthrop, for one, was positive he would endorse Taylor's plan. Yet by late February, Webster was also writing his son Fletcher about the need "to beat down the Northern and the Southern follies, now raging in equal extremes," and by March 1, significantly the very day on which the Senate confirmed Fletcher's appointment as customs surveyor of Boston, he had determined "to make a Union speech, and discharge a clear conscience." Until a coterie of close advisors met with Webster on the night of March 6 and read his speech for the first time, no one except Webster himself knew what he intended to say, and both Taylor and Clay eagerly looked forward to the speech.⁸⁸

Both were disappointed. In his controversial Seventh of March speech, Webster neither endorsed nor attacked the Taylor plan, but he also did not embrace Clay's plan. Aware of Southerners' intense hostility to it, Webster went much further than Clay had to appease them, causing Calhoun to applaud Webster's speech where he had condemned Clay's. The speech was less a detailed legislative agenda for compromise than a passionate paean to the Union and a call to reconcile sectional differences over slavery, a reconciliation that Webster insisted was primarily a matter of emotion, not concrete legislation.⁸⁹

Most of Webster's speech reviewed the history of sectional conflict over slavery. 90 He had always abhorred slavery and still did, but the constitutional compact required Northerners to allow Southerners to live in peace with their chattels. Abolitionists, however well intentioned, had done more harm than good and should cease agitation. He had also always opposed slavery extension and still did. He had fought Texas' annexation as long as possible, but Texas had been admitted and slavery was legal on every foot of its soil. Moreover, Webster emphasized, the terms of annexation explicitly allowed as many as four more states to be carved from Texas, and the law required Northerners to admit all of them as slave states if they so desired. Beyond Texas, however, slavery could not and would not go. Very briefly alluding to the desirability of admitting California with its free constitution, he stressed that climate, the law of nature—but, pointedly, not Mexican law, which Clay had emphasized and Webster entirely ignored—barred slavery from the remainder of the Mexican Cession. 91 For Northerners to insist on the Wilmot Proviso if—and Webster himself, quite unlike Clay, did not advocate it—Congress organized territorial governments was therefore superfluous and insulting. Finally, with regard to the Cession, Webster briefly applauded the idea of giving Texas monetary compensation for surrendering its claims to New Mexico, a formula that Bell and others, but not Clay, had broached, but he made no specific boundary proposal himself. Webster also stressed the need for a new fugitive slave law. The Constitution clearly obliged Northerners to return fugitives, and it was unjust for individuals or state legislatures to impede their capture. Therefore, "with some amendments," he would support the bill that Mason had already introduced "with all its provisions to the fullest extent."92

Rather than rallying Whigs behind Clay's compromise scheme, Webster further compounded the confusion in Whig ranks. He clearly favored compromise, but many conservative Whigs in the North regarded Webster's compromise as entirely distinct from Clay's. For example, Daniel D. Barnard of Albany urged Fillmore to embrace Clay's scheme as a way to differentiate Fillmore Whigs from Sewardites, whereas ex-Governor and New York City Subtreasurer John Young preferred Webster's to achieve the same goal. More important, Webster immediately followed an erratic course that seemed to contradict what he had said. On the day following the speech, he told Winthrop that he would support "General Taylor's plan, unless he himself should . . . recommend . . . a Territorial Government for New Mexico." Indeed, since Webster had not advocated the creation of territorial governments, many thought his speech endorsed Taylor's nonaction scheme, not Clay's compromise. On March 13, Webster enhanced that impression by urging the Senate to admit California immediately and ignore the other questions since no legislation on them could possibly pass. So convinced, he opposed a select committee that would combine all legislation for the Cession in a single bill. If some Whigs saw Webster as the author of an alternative compromise proposal, in sum, his "flitting about like a weathercock" caused others to doubt that he favored any compromise on what northern Whigs deemed the central question—untrammeled admission of California.⁹⁴

Even before Webster performed this volte-face, the Republic and the National Intelligencer praised his speech just as they had Clay's, implying that Webster represented Taylor. "Let it not... be understood that Mr. Webster speaks for the Administration," Weed frantically warned Meredith on March 10. "Gen. Taylor has found a way round the 'Proviso' [while] Mr. Webster dashes his brains out against it. In a word, we can sustain ourselves and the Administration only by standing firmly up to Gen. Taylor's plan for California and New Mexico." ⁹⁵

As Weed well knew, Webster's speech flabbergasted most northern Whigs. Among commercial circles in northeastern cities and in the South, it drew extravagant praise. By the end of March he had already franked 120,000 copies and was predicting that he would mail out 200,000 by May 1. Most northern Whigs, however, condemned the speech as an unconscionable betrayal, an act of prostitution to win southern support for another presidential bid in 1852. Across the North, Whig papers and speakers denounced Webster as another Benedict Arnold or Judas. "It is not a compromise," sputtered Fitz Henry Warren when urging a Boston Whig editor to denounce Webster. "It is a virtual surrender of everything without even the reservation of marching out with the honors of war." Webster "has ruined himself politically," summarized an upstate New Yorker in an assessment chorused from Maine to the Midwest. "He is dead as a herring & it will be hard work to galvanize him to life."

In the immediate aftermath of Webster's disappointing speech, however, the administration's biggest concern was that it still lacked a powerful champion in the Senate. Taylor himself was reported to be "aggrieved at the course Mr. Clay has taken and at that of Mr. Webster," while Truman Smith sarcastically scorned the failure of "the so-called great men of the Whig party" to support Taylor. By default, therefore, that role fell to the New Yorker Seward, who spoke four days after Webster. Compared to Godlike Daniel, Seward was a poor public speaker. His voice was hoarse and raspy, and he read his speech verbatim in a dull monotone. Nonetheless, no man in the Senate was closer to Taylor's administration, and it had every right to expect him powerfully to advocate its position. On March 11, however, Seward disappointed Taylor almost as deeply as Webster had on the 7th.

Like Webster, Seward had been relatively quiet since Congress opened. In late January, even before Clay spoke, however, he began working on a set speech in which he intended to demonstrate "the certain deliverance of the continent from slavery to be inevitable, and the dissolution of the Union to be impossible." Whatever the context of debate and whatever the administration's needs, in short, Seward determined to deliver an antislavery harangue that might make him the preeminent leader of the North's antislavery Whigs. As he wrote Weed on the morning before he addessed the Senate, "The unlooked for course of Mr. Webster has prepared the way for me in the North, but has rendered of little value the little moderation I can practice in regard to the other portion of the Union." Although Clayton, who had seen his notes for the speech, deplored its extreme "Northern sentiment," Seward added, to suppress that sentiment would conflict "with my view of [political] safety."

Seward's speech emphasized the insidiousness of compromise itself. Legislative compromises were "radically wrong and essentially vicious." He demanded California's immediate admission "directly, without conditions, without qualifications, and without compromise." He would oppose slavery's extension into any of the Mexican Cession and a new fugitive slave law, and he favored the abolition of slavery itself in the District as soon as possible. The idea that compromise was necessary to save the Union was rubbish, since the Union could not split and the South had ample security for slavery in its control of the national government and support from the northern Democratic party. 99

Lest anyone miss the point. Seward went on to rebut individual advocates of sectional compromise. Calhoun's demand for a formal equilibrium between the fast-growing North and the sluggish South subverted the principle of majority rule. Webster's willingness to admit four more slave states from Texas flouted northern sentiment. Clay's flawed resolutions rested on two false assumptions. They presumed that slavery was a permanent institution in the South that required acknowledgement and protection, when in truth slavery was transient and freedom permanent. Moreover, Clay, like Webster, assumed that slave states had an equal claim to common territories with free states when the Constitution devoted the national domain "to union, to justice, to defence, to welfare, and to liberty." Indeed, there was "a higher law than the Constitution, which regulates our authority over the domain, and devotes it to the same noble purposes." The Mexican Cession was part of God's creation for the good of all mankind. "We are his stewards, and must so discharge our trust as to secure, in the highest attainable degree, their happiness." Slavery must be kept out of the Cession, for it was incompatible with "the security of natural rights, the diffusion of knowledge, and the freedom of industry."

Seward's reference to "a higher law than the Constitution" immediately stoked controversy, but in its context Seward was not calling on men to put conscience ahead of constitutional obligations. Rather, he meant that God had a purpose for the Mexican Cession, and both Webster and Clay had implied much the same thing when they stressed that nature would prevent slavery expansion beyond Texas. Far more important, Seward explicitly rejected their corollary conclusion that, since aridity and parched soil barred slavery extension, Congress need not do so. Slavery might expand despite the climate, Seward warned, and since all human laws were reenactments of God's law, men, as His "stewards," should reaffirm His design with the sanction of civil legislation. Indirectly, that is, Seward demanded imposition of the Wilmot Proviso on the remainder of the Mexican Cession.

As notable as what Seward said was what he did not say. He nowhere mentioned, let alone endorsed, Taylor's plan. That omission appalled Weed, who immediately demanded an explanation for what he considered an inconceivable and perhaps a fatal blunder. Seward lamely and disingenuously replied that praising Taylor's patriotic proposal would have destroyed his speech's symmetry and lengthened an already overlong effort, despite his readiness to work in detailed criticisms of Clay, Webster, and Calhoun. 100 More accurately, Seward also maintained that praising Taylor amounted to hypocrisy in light of what he said. Rather than simply ignoring Taylor, indeed, Seward implicitly repudiated the entire thrust of his recommendations. Taylor presented his plan as a compromise to restore sectional comity; Seward attacked the very idea of compromise as "vicious." Taylor urged congressmen to avoid agitating subjects; Seward purposely introduced one after another, thereby infuriating southern Whigs and Democrats alike and confirming his reputation as a dangerous fanatic. Most important, Taylor called on Congress to admit California and New Mexico as states and to leave the rest of the Cession alone. Seward endorsed California statehood, but he seemed to call on Congress to prohibit slavery in all the remaining Cession in order to give civil sanction to God's will.

Furious that Seward had so heedlessly antagonized southern Whigs like Mangum, Taylor commanded Alexander C. Bullitt to lacerate him in the columns of the Republic. Within days of the speech the administration organ, which had praised Clay, Bell, and Webster, accused Seward of repudiating the Constitution and self-righteously posing as God's legislative agent. Everywhere men proclaimed an irreparable breech between the administration and the New York senator, a perception that clearly unnerved Weed.¹⁰¹

Why Seward risked the administration's wrath, instead of becoming its chief legislative spokesman, is a vital question. In letters to Weed, Seward sanctimoniously protested that a statesman's reputation depended upon his sincerity, and he therefore had to speak his conscience. He also asserted that northern Whigs in the House would "cave in" and submit to compromises unless their antislavery constituencies were aroused to put pressure on them. Hence he called on Weed to have northern newspapers print his speech, and like Webster, he immediately began franking tens of thousands of copies of it for distribution across the North. 102 All of this may have been true, but political needs in New York motivated Seward's speech as much as the compulsion of conscience.

Two crucial developments in 1849 set the stage for New York politics in 1850. First, conservative Whigs of all kinds—Clay men, Websterites, patricians, friends of ex-Governor John Young—had rallied behind the leadership of Millard Fillmore and his western New York allies openly to combat Seward and Weed for control of the state Whig organization. Weed and Seward beat back this challenge, and both because they believed their control of the state party depended on arousing antislavery Whigs and because they wanted to humiliate their foes, they devoted the state Whig platform and address to a denunciation of slavery and its spread. That platform, in turn, convinced apoplectic conservatives like Daniel Barnard, John Spencer, and John L. Dox that their foes meant to abolitionize the Whig party. 103 Second, Democrats made a sweeping comeback in the November elections, capturing four of eight statewide offices, sharply reducing the Whig majority in the state senate, and winning a narrow majority in the house. The Democrats achieved this feat, in turn, only because the Barnburners and Hunkers. who had split in 1846, 1847, and 1848, papered over their differences on the Wilmot Proviso.

To preserve Whig control of the state government and his own faction's control of the state Whig party, Seward wanted his lieutenants to maintain advanced antislavery ground and to portray both Democrats and his intraparty foes as prosouthern doughfaces. To differentiate his followers from their conservative Whig critics and to throw Democrats off balance, therefore, he had an ally named George Geddes introduce a series of antislavery resolutions into the state senate on January 1, 1850, the first day of the legislative session. The Sewardites clearly hoped these measures would disrupt the Democrats, when they were forced to vote on them, and embarrass their conservative Whig foes, who could oppose them only at the risk of alienating their constituents.

Similar to the resolutions the Sewardite majority had rammed through in 1849, Geddes instructed the state's United States senators and requested its United States representatives to abolish the slave trade in the District, to oppose any compromise extending slavery to any part of the Mexican Cession, to prohibit Texas from controlling the area between the Rio Grande and Nueces rivers, and to admit California as rapidly as possible. Unlike the 1849 resolutions, these did not explicitly demand congressional prohibition of slavery in the Cession, but the imprecation that New York's congressional delegation use "all Constitutional means" to resist the spread of slavery implied imposition of the Proviso if necessary. During the six-week legislative debate on the resolutions, indeed, Sewardite Whigs insisted that they had instructed the New York delegation to organize new territorial governments with the Proviso attached. 104

The Geddes resolutions easily passed the Whig-controlled senate, and Seward's allies in Albany openly hoped that Hunkers and Barnburners would rupture over them in the house, where anguished Democrats frantically tried to delay a vote. Yet conservative Whigs also abhorred them as a transparent bid by "the left wing of our party" for Free Soil support, an attempt that would needlessly alienate southern Whigs and discredit New York's Whigs with Taylor's administration. When Taylor sent his more detailed California message to Congress on January 21, therefore, the Fillmorites seized the opportunity to embarrass the Sewardites by substituting resolutions praising the Taylor plan for the Geddes resolutions. Determined to maintain a different and more blatantly antisouthern position than their intraparty rivals, Sewardites continued to call for imposition of the Proviso, abolition of the District slave trade, and fixing of the Texas boundary at the Nueces—all of which violated the spirit and letter of the president's plan. 105

Thus an extraordinarily tangled situation emerged in Albany and the rest of New York. Once Taylor fully articulated his plan, Weed and other Sewardite editors like Henry J. Raymond, simultaneously the acting editor of the New York Courier and Enquirer and floor manager for the Geddes resolutions in the state house of representatives, had no choice but to endorse it in their editorial columns. Similarly, on the day before Seward spoke in the Senate, Weed pointedly wrote Meredith to assure him of his support for Taylor's plan. At the same time, however, Sewardite legislators strove mightily to defeat the Fillmorite resolutions endorsing the president's policy and to pass instead the inflammatory Geddes resolutions.¹⁰⁶

On February 15, the Sewardites prevailed in the assembly. Having unceremoniously crushed the pro-Taylor resolutions introduced by John L. Dox, they passed the Geddes resolutions of instruction with the aid of Barnburner Democrats over the opposition of Hunker Democrats. Conservative Whigs felt compelled to go along with the Sewardites even though they found "the antislavery resolutions forced through our legislature . . . hateful." Victory in the legislature, however, left New York's Sewardites hanging in an extraordinarily exposed position. Anti-Weed papers across the state blasted their hypocritical newspaper support for Taylor's plan and proclaimed Fillmore and his allies its only trustworthy champions in the state. The new Albany State Register, which began publication in March 1850 and which was edited by Fillmore's friend Jerome Fuller, who constantly sought editorial cues from Fillmore and Nathan Hall, led this assault. The point cannot be made strongly enough. Within New York, Seward's allies demanded imposition of the Proviso on the Cession and other antislavery measures, while his Fillmorite enemies backed the president's plan. 107

Here, then, is the key to Seward's speech on March 11 and to Weed's panicky response to it. Seward could not endorse the president's plan without betraying his Albany allies, whom he had instigated to take advanced antislavery ground, and without surrendering the initiative to his conservative enemies. Yet by failing to endorse the president's plan, indeed by implicitly opposing it in the substance of his speech, he undermined the spurious contention of Weed and other Sewardite editors that there was no conflict between Taylor's proposal and the pro-Proviso legislative resolutions. More than that, he allowed the Fillmorites to pose as the administration's staunchest New York defenders, and both crestfallen Weed men and exultant Fillmorites knew what that might mean—a complete revolution in who got the state's federal jobs. Across New York, Fillmore's vindictive friends rejoiced that "Seward's speech is fatal to him with the president, cabinet, and Senate and that his ambition has overleaped itself." Even better, the speech "may ensure the rejection of [the] favorite nominees for office" of "this sorrel-topped embodiment of radicalism, demogoguism & abolitionism." Best of all, Seward had handed the Fillmorites the weapon with which to accomplish what they had attempted in 1849—capturing the state Whig organization from Weed. The way to dethrone King Thurlow was obvious, crowed Gideon Hard. "We should organize everywhere on the Taylor platform. Call meetings & strip the mask from these men & let the General Government see them in their true light."108

Over time, the unity of the anti-Weed coalition would disintegrate as conservatives increasingly demanded support for Clay's compromise measures. Nonetheless, Millard Fillmore personally and his Buffalo allies like Nathan K. Hall and Solomon G. Haven resolutely stood by "the Taylor platform" until July 2, 1850, when Seward finally announced to the Senate his firm support for Taylor's plan. Once Seward did so, backing it lost its utility for the Fillmorites—its distinctiveness vis-à-vis the hated Sewardites in New York, who, whatever Weed's own reservations, had wildly applauded the senator's morally inspired antislavery stand. Then, and only then, when the sectional crisis had also escalated to a far more dangerous level, did Fillmore and his closest advisors consider supporting a congressional compromise. 109

In March these developments lay in the unknown future. From Clay's perspective, that month's events had been disastrous. Instead of helping to rally northern Whigs behind Clay's compromise, Webster had ignited a firestorm of protest before which he himself immediately quailed. Seward seemed capable of mobilizing moralistic antislavery northern Whigs against any compromise at all, at least if the demand for franked copies of his speech indicated their attitude. Worst of all was the reaction of New York's conservative Whigs, to whom Clay had always looked first for northern help. Despite their bitterness over patronage, his New York friends cast their lot with Fillmore, and the Fillmorites were proudly trumpeting their allegiance to Taylor's proposal precisely because Seward seemed to oppose it.

In contrast to Whigs, northern Democrats sought a compromise, but one different from Clay's proposal. Procompromise sentiment in New York centered in the Hunker Democratic allies of Dickinson, a longtime champion of popular sovereignty who abhorred the Geddes resolutions of instruction, and in ostensibly nonpartisan Union meetings of merchants in New York City that Democrats helped organize. By March, Democrats in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and elsewhere were also calling for concessions to save the Union and were pushing for a compromise on the basis of popular sovereignty, which Douglas called "that great Democratic principle, that it is wiser and better to leave each community to regulate its own local and domestic affairs in its own way." On March 25, Douglas reported separate bills from the Senate's territorial committee that admitted California as a state and created territorial governments for Utah and New Mexico with "legislative power" over "all rightful subjects of legislation." Shortly thereafter McClernand introduced an identical package of bills in the House.

Southern Whigs like Stephens and Toombs backed this Democratic initiative because it allowed the writing of proslavery local laws in the territorial stage, unlike Clay's original insistence on the perpetuity of Mexico's antislavery statutes. But March's events now reconciled Clay to that Democratic approach. To garner southern support in the Senate, Clay also submitted to Foote's demand that all slavery-related matters be sent to a select committee that everyone expected to write an "omnibus bill" that inextricably tied California's admission to a favorable resolution of the Texas-New Mexico boundary dispute and to organization of territorial governments without the Proviso. Clay, like Douglas, Webster, and northern opponents of any compromise, had previously denounced this procedure, but in early April he came out strongly behind it, a reversal of course that infuriated Zachary Taylor.¹¹¹

Between late March and April 18, when the motion to create a select committee of thirteen finally passed, the Senate engaged in a lengthy and revealing series of votes on Foote's motion. Most of the roll calls concerned amendments that tried to instruct the committee on where to fix the Texas border or whether or not California should be attached to other legislation, votes on which Northerners and Southerners were often sharply polarized against each other. Precisely because of that basic sectional alignment, the roll calls revealed who favored and who opposed compromise.

Consistently supporting Clay were the Whig senators from Maryland, North Carolina, Georgia, Florida, and Tennessee, as well as all southern Democratic senators except Benton, who spearheaded the opposition to an omnibus bill and to any recognition of Texas' claim to New Mexico east of the Rio Grande. That Berrien and southern Democrats, who opposed California's admission on any terms, voted with Southerners, who were willing to accept it in return for other concessions to the South, is explicable. They saw creation of an omnibus bill, which anticompromise Northerners could be expected to oppose, as the best way to stop California's admission. Clay's Kentucky Whig colleague Joseph Underwood, who was a Taylor Whig rather than a Clay loyalist, voted against Clay as frequently as he supported him. Only two northern Whigs ever voted with this southern bloc—James Cooper of Pennsylvania and, less consistently, Webster. Five procompromise northern Democrats gave it steadfast support—Dickinson, Sturgeon, Cass, and Jesse Bright and James Whitcomb of Indiana. Four other midwestern Democrats also frequently joined them—George Jones and A. C. Dodge of Iowa, James Shields of Illinois, and Douglas—although Shields often voted with the anticompromise bloc and Douglas purposely abstained on many embarrassing votes. 112

Benton forcefully led the opposition to this predominantly southern bloc. He was consistently supported by the two Free Soilers, the six remaining northern Democrats, and all of the northern Whigs except Cooper and Webster. Of great significance, the two Whig senators from the border slave state of Delaware, Presley Spruance and John Wales, also adamantly opposed creation of the committee, proslavery concessions on Texas, and attempts to connect California's admission with anything else.

Two aspects of this voting pattern stand out. Southern Whigs could never have forced concessions as the price of California's admission without Democratic aid, especially the five Northerners who always voted with them. Attitudes toward Taylor's administration also clearly influenced the Whig alignment. With the exception of John Bell, Maryland's Thomas Pratt, and Underwood, who fluctuated, every Whig who voted with the procompromise bloc harbored grievances against the cabinet and Taylor about patronage. This was undeniably true of Clay, Webster, Cooper, Dawson, Berrien, Mangum, and Badger, but the stark contrast between the two Delaware senators and the neighboring Maryland Whigs best makes the case. Both Spruance and Wales were close lieutenants of Clayton, and their faithful opposition to compromise at his bidding defied Whig sentiment in their state. James Pearce of Maryland, in contrast, hated Attorney General Reverdy Johnson, Maryland's cabinet member, and he had previously threatened to oppose administration policies. Pratt, Johnson's ally, could not ignore the procompromise sentiment orchestrated among Maryland's Whigs by such influential figures as John Pendleton Kennedy. 113

On April 18, the motion creating the committee of thirteen finally carried, 30–22. As expected, Clay became chairman, and he presided over a committee carefully preselected to achieve compromise. Douglas refused to serve on it, and the reluctant Webster attended only its first meeting. The other northern Whigs were Cooper and Samuel Phelps; Berrien, Mangum, and Bell represented southern Whiggery. All three northern Democrats—Cass, Dickinson, and Bright—were ardent compromisers, as was one of the southern Democrats, William R. King, who was joined by Mason and Downs. Of this group only Phelps, Berrien, Downs, and Mason seemed certain to oppose compromise, although Mangum's earlier stance also stamped him as potentially hostile. After a few meetings, which never attracted the full membership, Clay wrote the committee report, which he presented to the Senate on May 8.¹¹⁴

Two matters concerning the creation of this committee require emphasis. First, it was charged with addressing all aspects of the slavery question, not just those relevant to the Mexican Cession. Mason, who stridently opposed California's statehood, was included because he had introduced a new fugitive slave bill in early January that the friendly Judiciary Committee had reported out on January 16. After that date, however, diverse proposals for the Cession monopolized attention. Superficially, the fugitive question related only tangentially to slavery extension, and when contemporaries spoke of compromise, they almost always referred only to proposed bargains on the territorial question. Nonetheless, the fugitive issue was integral to the tactics Southerners used to secure concessions on the territorial bills that formed the heart of the Compromise of 1850.¹¹⁵

Two months after the Judiciary Committee reported out the fugitive slave measure, when Foote's motion for a select committee was stalled, Cass urged the Senate to take up Mason's bill, but nothing happened. In August, when the fugitive slave bill finally was debated, Cass blamed this delay on Southerners. As he then explained, in March he had asked Foote to urge the bill's southern managers to bring it to a vote because, Cass believed, he had sufficient votes at that time (March) to pass it. Foote did so and "reported" to Cass "that they would not; for what cause I shall not undertake to say." Foote, too, attributed the delay to Southerners, but he offered more of a clue about their reasoning than did Cass. Mason and Butler, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, he explained in August, refused to bring the bill to a vote in March because "it was the opinion of various southern Senators that it was inexpedient to settle that particular point; that the South had other great contests; and that it was better to have a broad than a narrow ground of action." Southerners, in short, saw a connection between the fugitive slave bill and legislation for the Cession, and they purposely stalled its passage so that it could be sent to a select committee along with other bills. 116

Foote revealed why in a candid speech to the Senate in December 1851. The Fugitive Slave Act, he asserted, "would have been passed by the two houses of Congress at a much earlier period of the session . . . but for the fact that it was not deemed politic by several Southern Senators, who had special charge of the subject," to report the bill "until it should be ascertained that all the other questions connected with the subject of domestic slavery were likely to be satisfactorily disposed of in Congress." Mason and Butler had refused to allow a vote on the bill in March on the grounds that "if the question involved therein should be satisfactorily adjusted at that time, it might prove impossible thereafter to rouse the border states to energetic action in cooperation with the other Southern States, for the vindication of their essential rights." In short, southern Democrats would use the promise of a fugitive slave bill as a carrot to entice help from border state senators, whose constituents had the greatest stake in a new law, on matters of far more importance to them—California, Texas, and New Mexico. As Mason himself confessed during the same debate in 1851, southern Democratic senators in early 1850 freely admitted "that it would be impolitic in Southern Senators [to pass the bill] lest, among other reasons, they weaken their position upon other vital questions affecting the institution of slavery, then before the Senate."117

One need only recall the situation in March 1850 to appreciate the logic of this hard-nosed strategy. Six of the eight border state senators were Whigs, and the Whig administration, to whom Delaware's two senators, at least, were devoutly loyal, had recommended admitting California and New Mexico as free states and doing nothing else. The four Whigs from Maryland and Kentucky were not administration loyalists, but the only one of them who had taken a position was Clay, who had recommended the untrammeled admission of California, the retention of Mexico's antislavery laws in the remainder of the Cession, the reduction of Texas to half its size, and the abolition of the District slave trade. Finally, one of Missouri's two Democrats was Benton, who also wanted to shrink Texas, stop slavery expansion, and bring in California alone. Why not then threaten to shelve the fugitive slave bill permanently, which Mason and Butler certainly could do, unless these border men went along with southern Democrats? And if they failed to cooperate on California, Texas, and the rest of the Cession and to oppose abolition of the District slave trade, let them face the wrath of the citizens of Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, and Missouri, who would be denied a new fugitive slave act. In terms of procedural strategy, in short, the fugitive slave bill was integral, not peripheral, to the Compromise of 1850.

Second, from the moment in late March when Foote's motion to form a select committee became the focus of debate and roll-call voting in the Senate, Whig advocates of the Taylor plan lost, and Democratic advocates of compromise seized, control of the congressional agenda. Taylor's program, which called for nonaction except on California until New Mexico applied for statehood, was moribund, and it could be resurrected only if his congressional supporters could first kill whatever plan the select committee came up with. Friends of the president would now be defined by negative opposition to the compromisers, not positive advocacy of a plan that might realistically be enacted. That some Whigs abetted this Democratic coup galled Taylor and his cabinet. "Old Zack . . . hates Clay," reported a northern newspaperman who saw him in April. "Old Zack is quarreling at Clay openly," repeated another insider. "He evidently don't like the idea of being overlooked in Congress."

Developments outside of Congress also imperiled Taylor's plan. During February and March, anger at Meredith's apparent attempt to undermine the public warehousing system welled up among merchants in Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, and those merchants took the lead in organizing procompromise Union meetings in their cities. ¹¹⁹ Then, in late March, a financial scandal involving Meredith, Reverdy Johnson, and Secretary of War George W. Crawford broke into the open, a scandal that immediately escalated calls from already angry and now embarrassed Whigs for a complete cabinet shake-up.

The details of the Galphin Claim, whose final payment in early 1850 rocked the Taylor administration and instantly made the term "Galphinism" the newest synonym for governmental sleaze, were complex. But the salient points can be quickly summarized. Before the Revolutionary War, a Georgia Indian trader named George Galphin lodged a claim against the British government, and for six decades after the winning of independence, he and then his heirs petitioned both the state of Georgia and Congress to pay it off. The Galphin heirs may have been Whigs; certainly they were well connected to the Georgia Whig party. Since 1832 their attorney had been George Crawford, who during his two terms as governor in the mid-1840s pressed Berrien, Stephens, Toombs, and other Georgia Whig congressmen to push a bill through Congress paying the Galphins. In 1848 they succeeded, and Congress ordered Treasury Secretary Robert J. Walker to pay the Galphin heirs the principal of the claim, about $43,500, or over $760,000 in current dollars. Congress, however, left it to the Treasury secretary's discretion whether sixty years' worth of accumulated interest on the claim, an amount over four times as large as the principal, should also be paid, and Walker deferred a decision on that question.

In 1849 the decision on the interest fell to the new Taylor administration. Preoccupied with preparing his report on the tariff, Meredith referred the claim to the comptroller, who ruled against payment. Then, at Berrien's urging, Meredith sought an opinion from Attorney General Johnson, who ruled in early 1850 that the interest must be paid. Accordingly, Meredith ordered interest amounting to over $191,000 paid to the Galphin heirs, bringing the total settlement to about $235,000 (or $4.1 million in modern dollars). 121

The size of the payment alone, when the government was already running a deficit, provoked cries of a Treasury raid. Much more embarrassing, Crawford profited immensely from the settlement. No longer the Galphins' attorney of record, he had worked since 1832 on a contingency basis and was due to receive half of any interest payment. Thus, as a direct result of a decision by Johnson and Meredith, Crawford received a windfall of $95,000 (or $1.66 million in modern currency), an enormous sum of money. Neither Meredith nor Johnson knew that Crawford had ever been a lawyer for the Galphins, let alone that he stood to profit from their decision. Crawford had told Taylor about his previous legal work but not about his personal financial stake in the claim.

When news of the payments broke in late March, the decision looked like an act of collusion among the three cabinet members to plunder the public purse for their own advantage and that of other Whigs. Democratic newspapers shrieked for blood. Whig papers, led by the Republic, condemned the cabinet for not holding meetings on so huge a claim in order to avoid both the fact and the appearance of impropriety. Public outrage was so intense that, on April 2, Crawford asked the House to investigate his role in the matter. Thus, just when senators were battling over a select committee, House Democrats were gleefully accusing the administration of corruption. Talk of impeachment filled the air, and the three cabinet members were not the only targets mentioned.¹²²

The scandal mortified Taylor and embarrassed other Whigs. Since the 1830s, Whigs had always promised to provide more honest and capable government than Democrats, and now a Whig administration, through incompetence or worse, had betrayed the public trust. The administration, intoned Alabama Democrat King, "is destined to go out of office, execrated and despised by every upright and honorable man in the nation." Whigs feared exactly that result. The claim "is enough to finish what little there is left of the present Cabinet," moaned Winthrop. "The Galphin affair," Weed predicted, "will weaken us badly anyhow, and ruin all, I fear, if some do not resign." Seward, Schuyler Colfax, and others concurred. "The dissatisfaction with the Cabinet increases, and their resignation is desired by a very large majority of the Whigs in Congress," summarized David Outlaw on May 12.123

When Henry Clay presented his committee report on May 8, therefore, the tarnished Taylor administration could not reclaim the initiative from congressional compromisers. That the cabinet opposed any compromise that entangled California's admission with other matters only further infuriated procompromise Whigs and incapacitated Taylor supporters. Worst of all, complained congressional Whigs, the stubborn Taylor refused to replace his discredited advisors. "The truth is," Weed bluntly warned Meredith, "Mr. Crawford and his friends are costing the Whig party, the Administration, and the country too much. We really cannot afford such expensive luxuries." Because of this obtuse loyalty, a contemptuous Webster predicted, "I fear the Administration is doomed, & the Whig Party doomed with it." Taylor "is an obstinate man," agreed Outlaw. "He did not have when he came here sufficient political information, or experience to qualify him for the office."

With criticism of Taylor and his cabinet growing, on May 8 Clay presented a revised compromise plan consisting of three bills and a twelve-page report explaining their rationale. One bill contained two amendments to Mason's fugitive slave bill, and another abolished the slave market in the District. The third, a huge omnibus bill, that by itself contemporaries identified as "the compromise bill" or "Clay's compromise," linked together all the legislation for the Mexican Cession. On May 8 and again on May 13 Clay urged the Senate to enact the bills. To a degree, he was more conciliatory than in January. Southern Whigs particularly applauded Clay's pointed rejection of Taylor's approach in the committee report. Congress must create territorial governments in the remainder of the Cession because "they are not now, and for a long time to come may not be, prepared for State government." Immediate statehood for New Mexico, in short, was out of the question. Southern Whigs also liked the report's recommendation that Congress refrain from imposing any legislation about slavery on territorial governments and that the people of each territory, when they applied for statehood, "decide for themselves the question of the allowance or prohibition of domestic slavery." Nonetheless, close scruiting of the report, the bills, and Clay's speeches shows that he had bent to Democratic and southern pressure but not broken completely before it. He still sought primarily to rally northern Whigs behind him.

With one significant exception, the omnibus bill adopted verbatim the bills Douglas had prepared admitting California and creating territorial governments for New Mexico and Utah. Rather than granting their legislatures authority over "all rightful subjects of legislation"—that is, slavery—as Douglas had, they were instead specifically prohibited from passing any law "in respect to African slavery."126 This was a far cry from popular sovereignty as Douglas and many other Democrats defined it. It meant that a territorial legislature could not prohibit slavery during the territorial stage, but it also meant that a legislature could not pass proslavery laws to replace the existing Mexican laws, thereby neutralizing, if not rendering completely meaningless, the right of residents to write proslavery constitutions at the time of statehood. Southern Whigs who did not believe that slaveholders would ever go into the Cession could live with this phrasing, although they considered impolitic, if not fatal, Clay's insistence in the report that California's example proved that slavery would never spread to any part of the Mexican Cession even if Congress eschewed the Proviso. Most southern Democrats and a few southern Whigs, however, found Clay's new formulation totally unacceptable. Nor did Clay's omnibus bill contain Calhounite language extending the Constitution, with its supposed guarantee of the right to own slaves, over the territories or language guaranteeing congressional admission of states carved from the territories with or without slavery as their constitutions prescribed. Only at the insistence of Southerners would such amendments be added to what later became the final laws. Clay himself was offering the South only the creation of territorial governments without the Proviso as compensation for California's admission.

Clay's continuing attempt to mollify northern Whigs also appeared in the omnibus bill's provisions for the Texas-New Mexico boundary. Clay relented on the draconian border he had first proposed for Texas, but not by much. Now he would set the northern and western borders of Texas along a diagonal line that ran northeastward from a point on the Rio Grande River twenty miles north of El Paso to the intersection of the Red River at the 100th meridian. This proposal would restore to Texas the area between the 32nd parallel and the Red River, which encompassed Dallas, Fort Worth, and some 20,000 slaves, and to that extent Clay retreated before southern pressure. But it would leave Texas smaller than its eventual size and considerably smaller than the area Texas claimed in 1850.¹²⁷

Clay's omnibus bill would also directly compensate Texas for surrendering its claims to part of New Mexico with United States bonds worth a still-unspecified amount. But the bill stipulated that before the government of Texas could spend that money on anything else, it must settle its debt with the holders of Texas bonds. Finally, the bill was silent on the matter of admitting new slave states from Texas to balance California, just as Clay had been in his January resolutions. The committee agreed, Clay explained in his report, that any initiative for carving new states out of Texas must come from the people of Texas themselves, not from Congress.

That Clay still hoped to rally northern Whigs behind this revised compromise became clear when he defended it on May 13. Declaring that he still believed that Mexico's antislavery statutes held force in the Cession, he argued explicitly that because the new territorial governments would be prohibited from passing laws regarding slavery, those Mexican laws barring slavery would remain in force until the population of the territories was numerous enough to write constitutions and apply for statehood. Recognizing that most northern Whigs preferred Taylor's plan, Clay now invited Taylor himself to join the procompromise coalition. When the president had presented his plan in January, Clay admitted, it made sense. But conditions had changed. If Taylor were now to submit a proposition, Clay was sure that "he would not limit himself to a recommendation merely for the admission of California, leaving the territories to shift for themselves." It would instead be "much more comprehensive, and much more general and healing in its character." 128

Clay admitted in his report that not all members of the committee agreed with the recommendations, and this last-ditch attempt to find a formula to hold the Whig party together, like his first, failed miserably. If most southern Whigs now embraced Clay's omnibus bill as a reasonable compromise, Berrien immediately denounced it, even though his closest advisors had informed him that Georgia's Whigs could accept the admission of California if it were tied to the creation of territorial governments without the Proviso and even though, or perhaps because, Stephens and Toombs now supported such a compromise. If California were admitted at all, Berrien declared as soon as Clay finished reading his report, its southern boundary must be fixed at 35° 30'. Slaveholders must not be excluded from the entire Pacific coast. Mangum, who also served on the committee, and his sidekick Clingman had apparently savaged the proposal even before Clay read it to the Senate, causing the procompromise Outlaw to fume, "The fact is, I do not consider Mangum or Clingman as Whigs." Southern Democrats blasted the insufficient safeguards for slavery in Clay's territorial propositions and the stinginess of Clay's new Texas boundary, which would still substantially reduce the area in which slavery was unequivocally legal. Primarily, however, they personally and their state parties remained hostile to California statehood under any circumstances. They demanded instead the extension of the 36° 30' line to the Pacific, a demand the Nashville Convention would endorse in June. 129

In part because most northern Democrats lavishly praised Clay's omnibus bill, most northern Whigs, who also thought it gave the South far too much, still spurned Clay's overtures. They found the omnibus bill repugnant because it created a quid pro quo for California's admission and because it organized territorial governments without the Proviso. Although southern amendments would later make the bill even worse from their point of view, Clay's version was bad enough. They could never support it, as Phelps of Vermont, another dissenting committee member, immediately announced on the Senate floor. "I shall vote against any bundling in the matter," Winthrop had vowed in early April. "I certainly will take no bad measures in company with the admission of California. Taylor's plan is still the best." A month later a New Yorker told Thomas Ewing, "The great body of the Whig party are with the administration on the California question. They are against the selfish and suicidal course in the Senate pursued by Clay and Webster. They are as decidedly opposed to any compromise, as that necessarily involves an extension of slave territory."

Taylor also refused to alter course. "He is true as steel," wrote an admiring northern reporter on May 3. "He sticks strongly to his plan," echoed another correspondent, who had talked to Taylor three times. "He said if Congress had adopted his recommendations, the whole thing would have been settled three months ago." Though administration insiders knew of Taylor's determination to fight Clay's compromise, it became public knowledge only when Taylor finally replaced Alexander Bullitt and John Sargent as editors of the Republic.¹³¹

Taylor's growing exasperation with Bullitt's unceasing criticism of his cabinet precipitated this editorial reshuffling. The change, which occurred on May 14, "was done by Old Zack," reported a Whig from Washington. "He is determined to throw overboard everybody opposed to the Cabinet, & there seems no alternative but to support the Administration, or go to pot." 132

Taylor's indignation that Bullitt lavished praise on Clay and Webster and failed to support his own plan adequately, however, lay behind the move. As early as April 19, Taylor privately told Orlando Brown, Crittenden's friend, that he no longer considered the Republic the administration's organ, and Bullitt's editorials in May proved the last straw. "We do not see any such discrepancy between the principle of [Taylor's] platform and" Clay's committee report, Bullitt editorialized. "We see no necessary enmity to the PRESIDENT in the resolutions of Mr. CLAY and Mr. BELL, [or] the speeches of Mr. WEBSTER, Mr. BERRIEN, Mr. BADGER, and other distinguished Whigs," since "the settlement was more important than the plan of settlement." 133

Bullitt and his publisher, Albert Burnley, may have believed this, but Zachary Taylor emphatically did not. Hence, he forced Burnley to sack Bullitt. Pro-Taylor northern Whigs unsuccessfully asked Horace Greeley to succeed Bullitt, and Taylor consulted with Weed about other northern possibilities. In the end, however, they chose another Southerner, Allen A. Hall, an assistant Treasury secretary, former editor of a Whig paper in Nashville, and henchman of John Bell. On May 20, Hall announced in the Republic what insiders already knew. Taylor had never wavered from his belief that his January proposal for California's admission as an "independent measure" was "the best practicable." ¹³⁴

That shaft forced Clay the following day to do what he had carefully refrained from doing since December—break irrevocably with the administration. "Here are five wounds . . . bleeding and threatening the well being, if not the existence of the body politic," Clay proclaimed to the Senate. Taylor's plan would heal only one, leaving "the other four to bleed more profusely." The committee's bills would salve all five. "I have seen with profound regret" Taylor's "persistence . . . in his own peculiar plan," Clay continued. And then came the ultimate Whig riposte. Given what Taylor had repeatedly said about deferring to the will of Congress, he "ought . . . to permit us to consider what is best for our common country" rather than obstruct the efforts of the people's chosen representatives. ¹³⁵

Clay's "arrogant" and "dictatorial" speech appalled pro-Taylor Whigs. "True to his hates he has flung down the defiance to the friends of General Taylor," the outraged Orlando Brown wrote Crittenden. "I am glad myself that he has at last stepped out with his armor on—an avowed enemy though formidable can be met." Clay's unforgivable break with the president, moaned Fillmore's friend Nathan Hall, "will probably end in the dissolution if not the destruction of the Whig party," exactly what Clay sincerely wanted to avoid. Yet, Clay wrote his son, he had no choice. "I had to attack the plan of the Administration for compromising our Slavery difficulties," he explained. "Its course left me with no other alternative."

While the Republic's May 20 editorial ended Clay's hopes of weaning northern Whigs away from the president's plan and left him almost exclusively dependent on Democratic support from the North, other developments also explain the timing of his break. On May 17, a House committee exonerated Crawford, Johnson, and Meredith of collusion on the Galphin claim, even while condemning the payment of interest as unwarranted. That finding, along with the firing of Bullitt, temporarily doomed chances of a cabinet shake-up, which Clay hoped might purge anticompromise elements from Taylor's circle of advisors. Equally important, the mission of Clay's son James to Lisbon, about which he had been so solicitous, appeared a failure by mid-May. Indeed, in the letter of May 27 in which Clay informed James of his attack on Taylor, he also assumed "that your public duties in the port of Lisbon are brought to an unsuccessful close." So convinced, Clay no longer feared administration retaliation against him.¹³⁷

Whatever Clay's motives, the Republic's new editor signaled that the administration would pick up his gauntlet. On May 27, Hall emphatically declared that Taylor still considered his original proposal superior to Clay's, that immediate statehood for New Mexico was the best way to resolve the Texas boundary dispute, and that Taylor steadfastly opposed the "establishment of territorial governments" because he wanted to end "all agitation" on slavery and no territorial bill "could pass Congress without bringing up the . . . proviso." Clay, continued Hall, came to Washington determined to appropriate "to himself the glory of a third compromise." "He came to lead, not to follow. . . . He came to originate measures of compromise, and pacification, not to adopt such as others might recommend." 138

VIII

Presentation of the omnibus bill and the public rupture between Clay and Taylor helped clarify the confused situation that had existed in Whig ranks since December. No longer could Whigs preserve the fiction that they were not divided. Now Whig politicians and Whig newspapers would have to choose sides for or against the administration. Moreover, Whigs like Bell and Webster, who had preferred a compromise plan different from either Taylor's or Clay's, now had to rally behind Clay's omnibus since it had first place on the Senate agenda. This fact became indisputable when the Senate defeated Douglas' motion to substitute his bill admitting California alone for the omnibus bill. After that defeat, Webster threw his support behind the omnibus, even though he considered it a tactical mistake. By early June, in sum, the divisions within the Whig party were assuming a bipolar form, although some men, like Berrien, continued to denounce both the omnibus and the Taylor plan.¹³⁹

As Whig divisions became clearer, they also grew more rancorous. With Webster and Clay leading the Whig compromisers and anticompromisers rallying behind the administration, the battle seemed to pit ultra Whig regulars against Taylor men, just as did the simultaneous struggle raging over patronage. The split occurred primarily, but not exclusively, along sectional lines, causing Seward to comment caustically that "the North and South, after studying Mr. Clay's juggle for three months, are falling back upon their first positions." Whigs seemed no more capable of bridging their sectional chasm than they had been in December. 140

The great majority of southern Whigs, including the Stephens-Toombs bolters of December, now rallied behind the omnibus bill, which they saw as the only alternative to the naked admission of California and the secession it might provoke. There were a few exceptions to this rule. Representatives Meredith Gentry of Tennessee and Edward Stanly of North Carolina remained loyal to the Taylor plan, as did Delaware's Whigs. John Bell also voiced a preference for it, but Bell wavered so much that no one could tell how he might eventually vote. Other Taylor men, both in and outside Washington, abandoned the president. Crittenden, for example, reversed course even before Clay presented his report. By early Iune he was warning Orlando Brown, in words echoing Bullitt's editorials, that "the public is anxious for a settlement, & comparatively indifferent as to the exact terms, provided that they embrace anything like a compromise." Therefore, Taylor must avoid "the responsibility of defeating the Bill of the Committee of thirteen, or any other measure of compromise." A Mississippian denounced "Old Hal" as "a complete marplot [who] must be first or nothing" for opposing Taylor's plan, which "avoided the only really alarming aggression of the North, 'the Wilmot' and it avoided it on principles entirely just to all parties." Yet he concluded that Clay's opposition doomed any chance that Congress would follow Taylor and that therefore southern Whigs must back the omnibus.¹⁴¹

A few southern Whigs—Clingman, Berrien, and Florida Senator Jackson Morton—joined Democrats from their region in opposing any plan that admitted California. Worried that Berrien was assuming a politically untenable position, his closest Georgia friends found his case against California's admission, with its claimed boundaries, powerful but pointless. "California must one day be admitted, and if Slavery cannot be profitable there, it is far better for us that she should not be divided," advised Francis S. Bartow, a Savannah Whig editor. More important, they warned, because there now seemed to be only two Whig positions and because Georgia's Whigs favored Clay's new plan, Berrien's opposition to Clay made him seem an ally of Taylor, whom Georgians now reviled. In short, the rupture between Clay and Taylor made any independent Whig stance impossible unless one was ready to defect to the Democrats, and, unlike Berrien and Clingman, most southern Whigs, including North Carolina's Mangum, who had previously breathed fire and who hated the idea of marching in step with the procompromise Badger, now fell in line behind the omnibus.¹⁴²

In contrast, most northern Whigs still believed that any concessions to southern demands would doom the administration and their own careers, and that sticking to Taylor's plan provided the only feasible way to satisfy their constituents. 143 Dissenters from the prevalent northern Whig position, however, far outnumbered their southern Whig counterparts. In the Senate, both Webster and Cooper came out for the omnibus by early Iune. Webster and Clay, moreover, had close personal ties to a small number of northern Whigs in the House, a fact of considerable importance since even people who expected the omnibus to pass the Senate knew that the real battle would be in the House, where the huge northern Whig delegation together with the Free Soilers could block it. James Brooks and three other Whig representatives from New York City, as well as Joseph Casey of Pennsylvania, would heed Clay's bidding. George Ashmun of Massachusetts, James Wilson of New Hampshire, David Bokee of Brooklyn, and George G. King of Rhode Island were all deemed Webster's lackeys. Although their impassioned speeches had failed to move most northern Whigs, Clay and Webster could split a few away from their colleagues. 144

Parallel divisions over the compromise among Whigs mushroomed in most northern states. Procompromise Whigs may have been more fearful about the danger to the Union than anticompromise Whigs. But Webster's private correspondence and public utterances alone raise doubts that fear of secession drove northern Whigs to support concessions to the South. Pocketbook concerns motivated some northern Whig compromisers. Whig merchants in northeastern cities, just like their Democratic counterparts, feared the loss of valuable southern customers if the crisis was not settled on acceptable terms, demanded enactment of the omnibus, and organized Union meetings to support it. Whig manufacturers from Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, and Massachusetts wanted tariff revision, and the longer Congress was tied up by the seemingly interminable debate over slavery, the more impatiently they sought its settlement. When Webster and others warned that southern Whigs would never consider tariff legislation until the compromise passed, therefore, some Whigs in manufacturing and mining areas also backed the omnibus. Seward, for one, feared that this pressure on northern Whig congressmen for a new tariff posed the biggest threat to killing the omnibus. 145

Constituents' economic demands swayed some northern Whig politicos, but personal and factional political affiliations had a more direct and powerful impact. Webster had a personal following in Massachusetts and other New England states that he could rally. Clay could mobilize more numerous and even more fanatical loyalists in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, and some midwestern states, men who remained as ready to march to his drumbeat as they had ever been. A Whig from Lancaster, Pennsylvania, warned Seward that procompromise sentiment flourished there because "Mr. Clay's name is a tower of strength in our County," and Clay's devotees in Philadelphia, the regulars or ultras who had fought the Taylor Republican movement, organized procompromise rallies. Zealous Clay Whigs in New York's legislature tried to pass resolutions endorsing Clay's January proposal, and after the open break between Clay and Taylor in May, both angry Clay men and Websterites in New York City pressed Jerome Fuller of the Albany State Register to endorse the omnibus and renounce Taylor and the Republic. Despite repeated pleas from Fillmore and Nathan Hall that Fuller stick to Taylor's plan, the harried editor buckled under that pressure almost immediately. "Henry Clay has hosts of friends in and out of that city upon whom we must retain our hold" and "the Webster men are in favor of territorial governments," Fuller plaintively explained to Fillmore. Moreover, southern Whigs endorsed Clay's omnibus, "and it is important for us to maintain a good standing with them. It is an advantage over Seward and Weed which we must make the most of." From Fuller's vantage point in Albany, the only way to preserve the alliance of anti-Weed Whigs Fillmore had begun to construct in 1849 was to side with Clay and Webster. "To let Clay and Webster fall is to let Weed and Seward walk over the course."146

Fuller's candid letters graphically illustrate how preexisting factional rivalries and jealousies spawned by the distribution of federal jobs largely determined which northern Whigs backed the Taylor plan and which swung behind the Compromise. Fuller considered southern Whigs' support crucial for New York's anti-Weed Whigs because he hoped southern Whig senators might vote to reject, rather than confirm, Sewardite appointees. This change of tack at Albany embarrassed Fillmore's western New York supporters, who still favored Taylor's plan, for it allowed Whig papers affiliated with Seward and Weed, which attacked the omnibus, to stigmatize them with guilt by association with pro-Clay doughfaces. Support for Taylor's plan in New York had become so exclusively identified with Fillmore's Sewardite enemies, complained one Fillmorite in early July, that it was "regarded as almost a fixed fact that, one who is not a Sewardite, is, of course, in favor of the omnibus bill, [and] hence our friends in this region labor under a great disadvantage." Blaming this impression on the editorials of the State Register, the Rochester American, and other pro-Fillmore papers, he warned that unless "that rickety concern of the Omnibus bill" was "abandoned" and the conservative Whig press backed the president's plan, "we must submit to the will of that demagogue Bill Seward."147

Such complaints struck Fuller and other Fillmore allies as nonsense. They could never outflank Seward and Weed by taking a harder line against compromise with slaveholders or courting Taylor's favor. Their best policy was to resolve all slavery issues permanently so that Seward and Weed could no longer exploit antislavery sentiment against them and use it to convert the Whig party into "a sectional party." Thus, "we must stay the progress of abolitionism, or we are gone." After a quick trip to Washington to consult with Fillmore, Fuller concluded that "Genl. Taylor's administration is used up.... Is it wise to align ourselves too closely with the fortunes of a sinking ship? He may defeat Clay, but in doing so he will use up himself, has done it already." Fillmore's closest confidant, Nathan Hall, who had steadfastly instructed Fillmore to stick with Taylor's plan since January, approached the same conclusion by July. "The President I suppose must desire as you and I do the admission of California & New Mexico as States," he wrote Fillmore, "but with you I fear that this cannot be done. In that event I prefer the Compromise Bill to inaction." $^{''148}$

Within New York, in sum, no perfect correlation existed between preexisting factional lines and attitudes toward the compromise. The Weed-Seward Whigs and one wing of their Fillmorite rivals backed the Taylor plan, while eastern anti-Weed Whigs, hard-core conservatives more loyal to Clay and Webster than to Fillmore, swung behind the omnibus. In other northern states, the relationship was much more direct. The Whig faction that controlled federal patronage advocated the president's platform and vilified proponents of compromise, especially Clay and Webster, as traitorous doughfaces who sought to destroy the Whig party. Losers in the patronage sweepstakes promoted compromise and lauded Clay and Webster as pillars of Whig nationalism. In Detroit, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, and Boston, Whig newspapers with federal printing contracts attacked the compromise, while rival Whig papers, which had been denied that coveted largesse, supported it. Thus did northern Whigs divide against each other.¹⁴⁹

Two states suffice to illustrate this pattern. In Massachusetts, Abbott Lawrence's wing of the party controlled the state Whig organization and most federal jobs. During the mid-1840s, that notorious Cotton Whig faction had taken a distinctively conservative stance on slavery extension, in contrast to their Conscience Whig and Websterite rivals, but by 1850 positions had changed. With Lawrence absent in London and Nathan Appleton, his fellow textile tycoon, largely retired from politics, leadership of the anti-Webster Whigs had fallen to men who shared the state's prevailing sentiment against any compromise with the South—elected politicians like "Honest" John Davis, Webster's colleague in the Senate; Representatives Winthrop, Julius Rockwell, and Joseph Grinnell; Philo Shelton, a state committeeman; and patronage recipients like William Schouler, editor of the Boston Atlas, Boston's customs collector, Philip Greely, Jr., Charles Hudson, the naval officer there, and George Lunt, the United States attorney. Among this group, Shelton, Greely, and Schouler remained in close touch with Seward and Weed, just as did officeholding Whigs in Michigan.¹⁵⁰

Since Webster's Massachusetts Whig enemies had the inside track with Taylor's administration, he had little to lose, once his son Fletcher won Senate confirmation, and much to gain by opposing it. By working for compromise with southern Whig senators and northern Democrats like Cass, Dickinson, Sturgeon, and Bright, he might influence enough votes to defeat Senate confirmation of Lawrence's minions, who held the Bay State's federal jobs. 151 Once Webster and his Massachusetts organization came out for compromise, the Lawrence men used their papers in Boston, and especially in central and western Massachusetts, to marshal Whig opinion against him. As in New York, the intraparty conflict quickly extended to the state legislature, where, after the Seventh of March speech, anti-Webster Whigs and Free Soilers steamrollered resolutions through the lower house instructing Webster and Davis to insert the Proviso into any territorial bills Congress considered. Because of the gross overrepresentation of Boston in the state senate, Websterites there tabled the resolutions 15–11, but the stalemate bitterly divided the state's Whigs throughout the summer. 152

Similarly, the strife between Pennsylvania Whig supporters of Governor Johnston and Senator Cooper quickly spawned disagreement over the Taylor and Clay plans. Prior to 1850, little separated the personal views of the two protagonists on the slavery issue. The former Democrat, Johnston, had delighted Pennsylvania's Whigs with his blistering speeches against slavery expansion during the 1848 campaign. Cooper also had a long antislavery record, and his elevation to the Senate in 1849 had been applauded by Quakers and other antislavery Whigs as "a 'free soil' triumph." When Cooper broke with most northern Whigs to vote for the committee of thirteen and publicly announced his support for the omnibus in early June, therefore, Pennsylvania's antislavery Whigs howled that he had betrayed them and wondered "what has brought his present deplorable insanity upon poor Cooper?" 153

The possibility that Cooper genuinely feared disunion cannot be discounted, but he also wanted to cement the support of the zealous Clay Whigs in Philadelphia and the rest of Pennsylvania, who undoubtedly wanted the sectional controversy resolved. The Whigs' state convention was scheduled to meet on June 19 in Philadelphia, a hotbed of Clay sentiment, and Cooper was determined to seize control of that convention to oust Johnston's allies from state office and the state committee. To gain a majority of the delegates chosen at local and county conventions, Cooper required a weapon to counteract the organizational leverage Iohnston gained from his command of the state and federal appointed officials. who could pack conventions with their employees. Lacking organizational resources himself, Cooper had no option but to use an issue to arouse rank-andfile Whigs to attend local conventions and to make the choice of delegates to the state gathering issue-oriented contests. Since the newspapers and politicos loyal to Johnston were firmly committed to Taylor's plan, Cooper tried to mobilize support from Whig regulars by pledging to write a state platform that committed Pennsylvania's Whig party to Clay's compromise as the best and quickest solution to the sectional crisis, as the only plan that could possibly pass Congress and allow it to address other business, which to depression-wracked Pennsylvania Whigs meant action on the tariff.

As soon as Clay presented the omnibus bill on May 8, Cooper's allies in Pennsylvania began offering resolutions at county conventions praising Cooper and Clay for their procompromise stance in order "to create an issue between the Admn. and Mr. Clay" and thus arouse Clay lovalists against Johnston and his allies. As Johnston himself reported to Meredith, "All the Clay & Cooper influence was excited to smuggle into [the state convention] reliable delegates and among [them] our secret and worst enemies." With the aid of Clay's Philadelphia friends, the Cooper forces easily won command of the delegations from the city and county of Philadelphia. In a pattern quite similar to those of New York and Massachusetts, however, procompromise Whigs could not make much headway beyond their eastern, urban beachhead. Johnston's forces firmly controlled the state convention. The platform committee defeated pro-Cooper, pro-Clay, and procompromise resolutions, although the votes indicated indisputably that Henry Clay remained more popular among Pennsylvania Whigs than Cooper, their own senator. The platform instead committed the state Whig party to Taylor's plan statehood for California and New Mexico and no territorial governments. "It is a great triumph for you," crowed one of Meredith's friends, "to wheel Penna, moderate, compromising, Clay and Cooper Penna into the line of direct, manly and decided support for the Administration and all its measures."154

Cooper and Clay Whigs may have lost the battle, but they refused to suspend the war. By mid-June they were too committed to the omnibus to reverse course, and after the state convention they organized mass meetings in Philadelphia repudiating the Whig platform and endorsing compromise. ¹⁵⁵ In Pennsylvania as in other states, intraparty strife over the territorial crisis showed no signs of abating.

In sum, the open breach between Clay and Taylor deepened the chasm separating most northern and southern Whigs from each other, and it unquestionably widened rifts in northern state parties by injecting emotion-laden issues into battles that had previously been confined to scrambles for spoils. These internal divisions prevented Whigs from defining a clear party position on the sectional crisis that differentiated them from Democrats and that might bring Whig voters to the polls at the impending 1850 elections. Who could say what the Whig position was when Whig newspapers in the same city took diametrically opposed stances, when Whig mass meetings repudiated Whig state platforms, and when the Whig governor and Whig senator from the same state, as in Pennsylvania, or two Whig senators, as in Massachusetts, were publicly crucifying each other? Such visceral and vitriolic intraparty feuding could only confuse and paralyze, rather than arouse, the Whig electorate when it was time for Whigs to confront Democrats on the hustings.

The Whigs' difficulty in defining a cogent party position on the sectional issue was aggravated when congressional Whigs on both sides of it openly cooperated with Democrats against Whigs on the other side, thereby muddying the differences between the two parties even further. Once most southern Democrats turned against the omnibus, for example, anticompromise northern Whigs like Seward immediately solicited their aid, along with that of antiomnibus northern Democrats like Douglas and Shields, in order to kill it. In early June, one of Seward's Whig allies, Senator John Clarke of Rhode Island, predicted that twelve Southerners and nineteen Northerners would combine to defeat the bill. His list included eleven southern and five northern Democrats, along with the two Free Soilers, one southern Whig, and twelve northern Whigs. It was an odd combination to be sure, for southern Democrats and northern Whigs disliked the omnibus for opposite reasons. It was a combination nonetheless, and that bipartisan, cross-sectional alliance held together as long as there was a chance that the omnibus might pass. However strange these bedfellows were, moreover, the existence of this coalition was important. If pro-Taylor Whigs could accuse procompromise Whigs of subverting the Whig party by opposing the administration, pro-Taylor Whigs could be accused of betraying it by working arm in arm with Democrats who execrated everything about the Whig party. 156

In contrast to the procompromise forces, the anticompromise coalition engendered very little cooperation between Whigs and Democrats in the same region, let alone the same state. Both senators from Florida, the Whig Jackson Morton and the Democrat David Yulee, fought the omnibus, and at some local meetings in Georgia, Whigs and Democrats joined together to denounce it, causing one of Berrien's euphoric correspondents to rejoice that "the distinction of democrat & whig is generally passing away." For the most part, however, in the slave states below the border states combat over the compromise was fought on traditional party lines. Similarly, only in a very few northern states like Maine and Wisconsin, which Democrats controlled and where the Free Soil party was a threat to both major parties, did bipartisan cooperation against the compromise emerge. After the introduction of the omnibus bill, for example, Whigs and Democrats in the Maine legislature joined to pass resolutions instructing the state's two Democratic senators to vote against it.¹⁵⁷

In most northern states, instead, Taylor's adamant hostility to creating territorial governments increased Democrats' support for compromise because they were confident that they could eviscerate pro-Taylor northern Whigs for recklessly endangering the Union. As an Illinois Democratic congressman gloated in June, "This gives opportunity to push the issue of disunion directly at them." Antislavery, anticompromise northern Whigs like Seward would have been delighted to meet that issue head on and to make compromise with the South the focus of interparty, partisan combat in the impending northern elections. But procompromise Whigs from northern and border states rendered it impossible to draw clear lines between the parties.

The Republic's assault on Clay and his omnibus on May 27 forced procompromise Whigs to work closely and publicly with procompromise northern Democrats like Bright, Cass, Dickinson, Douglas, and Sturgeon. "The Democrats are seeking to save their party by the passage of the Compromise Bill," Seward complained to his wife in mid-June. "The principles maintained by us are, therefore, in great jeopardy when all our ancient leaders cooperate with our adversaries." Seward's correspondents denounced Cooper, Clay, and Webster in the same breath with Dickinson, Cass, and Sturgeon as traitors to the North, but their obvious anger did nothing to dissipate the confusion caused by the cooperation between the Whigs' traditional leaders and the Democratic enemy. The "trouble" with the omnibus, wrote one frustrated Whig, was that "it is proved to be the identical 'hobby horse' of which certain men of each party claim paternity." The whole purpose of the omnibus bill, huffed another, was to make Cass "the next Democratic nominee," yet Whigs supported it. Such behavior by the congressional Whig party could never repair the damage done to the rank and file's morale by Taylor's No Party dispensation of patronage in 1849. 159

Even worse for Whig politicians seeking to arouse an apathetic and disillusioned electorate, the bipartisan procompromise alliance extended to many states. Georgians knew that Cobb, Stephens, and Toombs were cooperating with each other, but the collapse of party lines was especially prominent in the border states and the North. Procompromise meetings in Delaware, a Democrat proudly wrote Clay, were uncontaminated by any "thought or feeling connected with party. . . . Our Senators will find that on questions involving hazard to the Union, the people of Delaware know nothing of parties." He could have written the same thing about Maryland and Kentucky, where Democrats and Whigs, like their representatives in Congress, banded together to support the omnibus. From Philadelphia, New York, and Boston to Detroit, Indiana, and Illinois, Whigs joined their traditional political enemies in meetings demanding a settlement. In Massachusetts, for example, the Democrat Caleb Cushing was urged to run for Congress as the candidate of "Independent Whig & Democratic voters . . . standing upon the Webster . . . platform." Not only was the Whig party divided, but distinctions between Democrats and at least some Whigs appeared to be disappearing. The split between

Taylor and Clay seemed capable of generating a complete realignment or reorganization of parties, one far different from that which the president and Clayton had envisioned for the now-aborted Taylor Republican movement.¹⁶⁰

Only a minority of Whigs in any northern state supported compromise or aligned themselves with Democrats. Their behavior again raises the question of motivation. Heightened anxiety about disunion, pressure from economic interest groups, loyalty to Clay or Webster, the instinctive impulse of rival factions to oppose each other on issues—all these undoubtedly played a role. But behind certain Whig politicos' and editors' open embrace of Democrats and of what was primarily a Democratic position in the North lay a stark fact. Democrats controlled the Senate, and the Senate disposed of federal appointees.

IX

Democrats and Whigs alike understood that the Senate's Democratic majority would determine the fate of patronage recipients, but that hard fact suggested different possibilities to the two parties when the session opened. Professing shock that Taylor had broken his vow of nonpartisanship by removing Democrats from government jobs, Democrats plotted revenge. Astute Whigs across the country, in contrast, "expected Whigs will defeat Whigs, by soliciting the aid of opposition, locofoco, Senators." In that need for Democratic help on patronage lay the nub of Whig cooperation with Democrats on policy. 161

Not all Democratic senators returned to Washington in December intent upon purging the bureaucracy, but enough did to cause both Democrats and Whigs to predict massive Senate rejections. Cass, Dickinson, Bright, and Downs of Louisiana were believed to be particularly vindictive. After Cass and his Michigan colleague Alpheus Felch stopped in Buffalo on their way to Washington, for example, Nathan Hall warned Fillmore that Cass "is inclined to make a fight on the nominations as well as the measures of the administration & the warfare will be bitter. It will be indiscriminate." ¹⁶²

Senate Democrats flexed their muscle quickly. In January, Dickinson demanded that Postmaster General Collamer justify the removal of Democratic postmasters in New York. Later that month, Maine's James W. Bradbury introduced another resolution requesting the administration to lay "before the Senate" the "charges . . . preferred . . . against individuals . . . removed from office." By insisting that Taylor demonstrate incompetence or malfeasance on the part of decapitated Democrats, Bradbury intended, as Webster recognized, to delay Senate action on appointments "until the President's answer shall come." The Democrats meant to embarrass the administration and let nervous Whig officeholders agonize in uncertainty. Virtually all patronage holders had been appointed after the Senate adjourned in March 1849, and no interim federal appointee could retain his job unless confirmed by the Senate before this session of Congress adjourned. 163

The Senate never passed Bradbury's resolution, but throughout the spring and into the summer, the Democratic caucus repeatedly voted to delay action on most nominees until the resolution passed and Taylor replied to it. That calculated obstructionism delayed Senate action on the vast majority of Whig appointees until August and September, when the Senate and House were voting on the compromise measures. Thus Democratic senators maximized their leverage to pressure Whigs into voting the way Democrats wished on the compromise itself 164

In late January, Webster informed a friend that "any leading Whig Senator, who should be so inclined, might produce rejections, in plenty," by cooperating with Democrats. Yet not all Democrats were equal in the eyes of Whigs who sought a favorable or adverse decision on particular appointments. Committee chairmen who could bottle up nominations or submit hostile reports obviously had clout, but the Democrats mentioned most frequently in Whig correspondence as the arbiters of patronage were William R. King of Alabama, Downs of Louisiana, Douglas, Bright, Cass, and Dickinson. No man in the Senate, indeed, was believed to have more influence over patronage than Dickinson, New York's senior senator, leader of his party's Hunker faction, and chairman of the Finance Committee. That all of these Democrats except Downs became staunch supporters of the Compromise was a fact of incalculable importance. That most Whig senators unhappy with Taylor's appointments eventually joined them was no coincidence. 165

How Whigs who sought the confirmation or rejection of individual appointees worked with Democratic senators depended primarily on the composition of the Senate delegations from their own states. If both senators from a state were Whigs, their constituents relied on them to cut deals with the Democrats, and Webster, for one, lost no time in seeking the cooperation of Bradbury, Dickinson, and other Democrats. Generators, Whigs represented by two Democratic senators, as was the case in Virginia, Maine, and all the southwestern and midwestern states except Ohio, pursued one of two courses. They asked a Whig from a different state to run interference for them in the Senate or they worked directly with their own Democratic senators.

Since most complaints about southern appointments involved the retention in office of Democrats who had already been confirmed, disgruntled southern Whigs had little recourse in the Senate. Maine and the midwestern states were another matter. There Whigs had been appointed, men whose proponents and opponents actively lobbied the Senate. Of these heavily Democratic states, Michigan illustrates the tactics used by rival Whigs and how the struggle over patronage affected the battle over compromise measures.

Michigan's antislavery Whigs closely affiliated with Seward won the juiciest patronage plums: Josiah Snow, editor of the Detroit Tribune, who had the state's federal printing contracts; Alpheus S. Williams, Detroit's postmaster; Oliver M. Hyde, its customs collector; and Charles Babcock, Indian agent in the state. Aware that their Whig rivals, represented by the Detroit Advertiser, had sent a delegation to Washington to defeat Senate confirmation of Hyde and Babcock, Snow begged Seward's help in the Senate on the grounds that Hyde and Babcock "belong to our school in views of public policy in relation to slavery, tariffs, etc. The opposition is wholly from the other side on the slavery question." Precisely that conservative effort to defeat Hyde and Babcock caused another of Seward's Michigan allies to warn "that it is expected Whigs will defeat Whigs, by soliciting the aid of opposition, locofoco, Senators." Whether the conservative Whig delegation conferred with Cass, the final arbiter of Michigan nominees, is unknown, but as soon as Cass announced his support for Clay's compromise, the Detroit Advertiser began promoting it and denouncing Taylor's obstinate hostility to a general settlement. Similarly, Whigs unhappy with the appointments from Indiana and Illinois began working with Democrats for compromise once it became clear that the Democratic senators from those states wanted it.¹⁶⁷

States with split Senate delegations created a different dynamic. Ohio's was divided between the Whig Corwin and the Free Soiler Chase, and most Ohio Whigs unhappy with Ewing's distribution of jobs were content to work through Corwin, who adamantly opposed Clay's omnibus, to kill appointments. In contrast, some of Ewing's favorites, notably Aaron Perry, the Columbus postmaster and editor of the Whigs' state organ there, actively sought Democratic aid in securing their confirmation. Yet Perry and other officeholders could hardly oppose the policy favored by Taylor and Ewing for the Cession. Hence, far fewer Whigs supported compromise in Ohio than in other northern states. 168

In 1850, four states' Senate delegations were divided between a Whig and a Democrat, and in all four the Democrat was the senior senator, who had the final say on his state's jobs. Hopkins L. Turney of Tennessee had two years' seniority over his Whig colleague Bell, but since Bell had been a cabinet member and speaker of the House, people expected Turney to defer to Bell rather than vice versa. ¹⁶⁹ Bell had managed the appointments in Tennessee, and he wanted his friends confirmed, not rejected. He was also considered one of the few southern Whigs who remained loyal to Taylor's administration. Nonetheless, his wavering course on compromise in May, June, and July and his ultimate support of it in August may have been a bid for the necessary Democratic votes on patronage.

All three Whigs from the other states were freshmen who knew they had to work with their Democratic colleagues to sway the Democratic majority. Florida's Jackson Morton, who had been elected by Democratic votes over the choice of the Florida Whig party, could be expected on that account alone to curry favor with the Democrat Yulee. On most roll-call votes concerning both patronage and policy throughout the session, Morton in fact voted the same way as Yulee—that is, like a southern Democrat rather than a southern Whig. Hence, he was one of the very few southern Whigs consistently to oppose compromise. The other two states with split Senate delegations—Pennsylvania and New York—witnessed the most convoluted struggles over Senate confirmation of any states, and none illustrate better the intimate connection between Senate action on appointees and battles over the Compromise.

By the time Congress met in December 1849, the rancorous conflict over federal patronage in Pennsylvania between old-line Whig regulars and Johnston's state administration was widely known. Both sides barraged Whig senators from other states with warnings that the confirmation or rejection of Johnston's friends would wreck Pennsylvania's Whig party. Johnston and his job-holding lieutenants knew that freshman Senator Cooper would lead the fight against their confirmation, and they, as well as Cooper's Democratic predecessor, Simon Cameron, predicted that he would be forced to seek Democratic help to do it. The Democrat whose cooperation Cooper most needed was Daniel Sturgeon, the state's senior senator. As soon as Congress opened, Cooper sought Sturgeon's aid against the federal appointees in Philadelphia, and by mid-January, Sturgeon as well as Dickinson joined Cooper in presenting remonstrances from Pennsylvania against William D. Lewis, the Philadelphia customs collector, and other Taylor appointees in the state. 171

Given Democrats' control of the Senate and the probability that Sturgeon's voice would decide Pennsylvania affairs, Johnston, Lewis, and other Whig office-holders realized that lining up support from other Whig senators to offset Cooper would not suffice. They had to compete with Cooper for Sturgeon's favor. Hence Lewis and William I. B. White, Philadelphia's postmaster, hired scores of Democrats to demonstrate to Sturgeon and other Democratic senators that they deserved confirmation. The longer the Senate delayed action on Pennsylvania appointments, the more Democrats nervous Whig officeholders employed. That frantic defensive effort, in turn, further incensed regulars who had been denied jobs. Both rival wings of the Pennsylvania Whig party thus wooed Democrats in a bidding war that simultaneously widened the division between them and blurred the difference between Whigs and Democrats, at least on the allocation of government jobs.¹⁷²

Unlike Johnston's friends, Cooper and his Pennsylvania allies could not offer jobs to Democrats to sway Sturgeon. Nor would they have; their whole point was that government largesse should go to reliable Whigs, not Democrats, Native Americans, or opportunistic newcomers who wanted to junk the Whig party. But they could and did cooperate with Sturgeon and the Pennsylvania Democratic party on policy. Daniel Sturgeon was not as influential a proponent of either popular sovereignty or the Compromise of 1850 as more famous northern Democrats like Cass, Dickinson, and Douglas. But throughout the session he voted with the procompromise, anti-Taylor camp as consistently as anyone in the Senate, and on virtually every roll call Cooper voted right along with him. Back in Pennsylvania, Cooper's friends repudiated the Whig state platform and worked arm in arm with Democrats for a compromise that the state's Democratic party had made a test of Democratic orthodoxy. There were two reasons, then, for Cooper's course that so enraged antislavery Whigs in Pennsylvania. He wanted the help of Clay's friends in his battle against Johnston within the state party, and he wanted to guarantee Sturgeon's help in the Senate in his battle against Johnston over patronage.

No state's Whigs were more obsessed by patronage than New York's, and because of its unique cast of characters, New York surpassed all other states in the byzantine complexity with which Whigs maneuvered to influence Senate decisions on appointees. New York had three, not two, voices in the Senate. Vice President Fillmore could vote only to break ties, but as the chamber's presiding officer, he was expected by his New York allies to exert substantial influence on senators. His rival Seward, though only a freshman, was the ablest, most strident, and, after his Higher Law speech, most famous anticompromise Whig in the Senate. Seward's senior colleague Dickinson was, unquestionably, the Senate's most powerful Democrat. A fervent proponent of popular sovereignty and Clay's omnibus bill, Dickinson was also more interested in playing the role of patronage broker than any other Democrat. The tricornered relationship among these men ensured a drama with a tangled plot.

Both the Seward-Weed Whigs, who had won the bulk of federal jobs in the Empire State, and Fillmore and his conservative Whig allies approached the Senate session with specific agendas. Seward and Weed hoped to win confirmation for their friends and to defeat the few conservatives who had won places, particularly John Young and Hugh Maxwell, the subtreasurer and customs collector, respectively, in New York City. "If it be possible we must get rid of Young," Weed instructed Seward. "The Whig party is not safe with such a traitor in a position of power." So desperate were Weed's and Seward's lieutenants in the city to depose Maxwell, and especially Young, that they initially tried to persuade Taylor to give one or both of them a foreign assignment to get them out of the country.¹⁷³

Fillmorites returned to Washington in December with a much longer hit list. Fillmore and his Buffalo advisors gave priority to ousting Levi Allen and Isaac Harrington from the customs house and post office in that city, but other conservatives were equally determined to axe Weed minions such as Lewis Benedict and Thomas Clowes, postmaster-designates in Albany and Troy, and James R. Lawrence, the United States attorney for the Northern District of New York. At first, Fillmore and his friends hoped to persuade Taylor not even to nominate Allen and Harrington, but by mid-December they decided that it would be easier and politically wiser to defeat their confirmation in the Senate. "If you can't defeat Allen in the Senate," Nathan Hall bluntly warned Fillmore, "you may as well come home, for I should hate to preside over a body which did not take my words for as much as this." ¹⁷⁴

Seward had to contend with Fillmore's influence in the Senate, as well as with lobbying efforts from hostile members of New York's huge Whig delegation in the House, at least half of whom, according to Weed, were Seward's enemies. Yet every interested Whig understood that Dickinson would decide New York's appointments. That fact, in turn, caused Sewardite Whigs grave concern and enormously encouraged Fillmore's conservative Whig allies.

Dickinson hailed from Binghamton, New York. So did the two Fillmore men Sewardites most despised, John Collier and John Young, both of whom were on friendly terms with Dickinson. The duplicitous and ambitious Young, who still hungered for the lucrative customs collectorship in New York City even after he had been named subtreasurer there, huddled with Dickinson at the start of the session and promised to work among conservative Whigs in the New York legislature to secure the Democrat's reelection to the Senate in 1851 if Dickinson. in turn, would exert his influence in the Senate to force Taylor to make Young customs collector. And as dangerous as Young seemed to Sewardites as subtreasurer, they dreaded what he might do to their wing of the party if he gained direct control of the customs house and its hundreds of jobs. Indeed, his indirect control of customs house employees through Maxwell was the main reason Sewardites wanted to get Young out of office. As the Senate term progressed, Young proved far readier than Fillmore to go down the line with the procompromise Dickinson on policy. He urged New York's Whig congressmen to frank copies of Webster's Seventh of March speech to the state to counteract the impact of Seward's Higher Law address. After Clay presented his omnibus bill, this former nemesis of conservative Clay Whigs in New York joined them in pressuring Fuller to abandon the president and back the compromise. He ordered his own and Maxwell's employees to help organize bipartisan procompromise rallies. Young, in short, pulled out all stops to win Dickinson's backing against Seward when the Senate voted on his appointment and Maxwell's. 176

Collier, who was far more loyal to Fillmore than the self-serving Young, spoke to Dickinson before he left Binghamton for the Senate session and, as he informed Fillmore, urged him "to cultivate friendly relations with you and assured him it would be fully reciprocated by you." Dickinson knew that Seward and Weed had mauled Fillmore on patronage, Collier added. "You may I think talk fully and freely with him, and he can do a great deal—and I think feels disposed to act favorably in what concerns us both in relation to the action of the Senate upon the appointments in this State." Thus, even before Congress opened, the foundation for a Fillmore-Dickinson alliance against Seward was laid.¹⁷⁷

At the end of this revealing letter, Collier alluded to the other reason Sewardites feared Dickinson. As the junior senator, Seward would also have to seek Dickinson's aid, Collier accurately predicted, but since the two senators disagreed so deeply on the slavery issue, "they will be naturally and almost necessarily thrown into a rival and hostile attitude." When Collier wrote of Fillmore's reciprocating Dickinson's kindness, he obviously envisioned a quid pro quo. If Fillmore cooperated with Dickinson on policy toward slavery, Dickinson would help him to reject appointments. Precisely the same expectation caused dissident Whigs in Michigan, Illinois, and Pennsylvania to adopt a procompromise position in the spring, but the action of Sewardite state legislators and Seward's March speech rejecting Taylor's approach caused Fillmore Whigs to cling to it.

Nonetheless, anti-Weed Whigs throughout New York unabashedly sought Dickinson's aid, thereby jumbling the lines that had previously separated Whig from Democrat. Dickinson's hostility to patronage-holding Sewardites seemed so certain, because of Seward's previous antislavery record, that panicked Whig postmasters across the state warned Seward that their conservative Whig enemies were working with Dickinson to defeat them. Poughkeepsie's Isaac Platt, who claimed neutrality in the factional rivalry between Weed and Fillmore, protested to Fillmore himself that Whig members of the House "were striving through an arrangement with Dickinson to bring about the rejection of all incumbents." Conservative Whigs meanwhile optimistically counted on the "Hunker Senators . . . to go for rejecting all the obnoxious." Nathan Hall and Solomon G. Haven, Fillmore's closest Buffalo allies, were especially confident of Dickinson's help on the Buffalo appointees. "It strikes me you will have no difficulty in the Senate & certainly none if Dickinson will go agt. Harrington & Allen," Hall predicted in Ianuary. Hall predicted in Ianuary.

Dickinson's bias and his decisive influence on New York appointments appeared so predictable that some of Fillmore's friends urged him to stay out of the Senate fray and let Dickinson do his dirty work for him. The phlegmatic Fillmore himself decidedly preferred such a passive stance so as "not to impair my influence with the administration." Other conservatives, however, insisted that Fillmore actively seek Democratic aid. "Do not hinder their action, but promote it by all means," wrote a Troy Whig seeking the rejection of Thomas Clowes. "It is our political salvation." "You had better see Dickinson & have a confidential talk with him," pressed Hall, who persistently pushed his lethargic friend to take decisive action. Well into the spring and summer, Hall prepared batches of letters for Fillmore to show to Dickinson, Cass, and other Democrats to secure the defeat of Harrington and Allen. In mid-April he listed six senators who would determine the fate of New York's nominees and urged Fillmore to lobby them all: three southern Whigs—Dawson, Bell, and Pearce—and three northern Democrats—Dickinson, Cass, and Douglas. That all of these men later supported the Compromise of 1850, as would Fillmore himself, speaks volumes.¹⁷⁹

By mid-February, Weed and Seward, like their frantic lieutenants, were convinced that Fillmore "was uniting with ex-Gov. Young and Senator Dickinson to have several N.Y. appointments rejected." They complained to the cabinet that Young and Fillmore had betrayed the party by working with Dickinson, but they knew they had to find a way to counteract that alliance and outbid their rivals for Dickinson's help. Recognizing that Seward could never gain Dickinson's personal confidence the way Young, Collier, and even Fillmore might, they and their friends turned for help to Democrats within New York itself, men who might be more amenable to a bargain and who then might lobby Dickinson on the Sewardites' behalf. Their approach to Dickinson would be indirect, but it had the same result as Young and Fillmore's direct approach—a total collapse of party lines as Whigs cooperated with Democrats.¹⁸⁰

In Buffalo, for example, Allen and Harrington cut a deal with the local Democratic organization. In the spring mayoral election, they refused to allow their employees to work for the Whig candidate and instead ordered them to cast Democratic tickets. As a result, the Democrats captured that normally Whig stronghold. In return for this help, Buffalo's Democrats then commended them to Dickinson for confirmation.¹⁸¹

Weed's approach to Dickinson was even more ingenious. Neither he nor Seward could abandon their rigid antislavery stance to curry Dickinson's favor; to support compromise would surrender their constituents to the Fillmorites. Instead, Weed tried to reach Dickinson through his Democratic counterpart in Albany, Edwin Crosswell, editor of the Albany Argus, the major Hunker newspaper in the state. Despite deep partisan differences, Weed and Crosswell had cooperated over the years in several business ventures. One of them was the Canal Bank of Albany, in which Crosswell had invested heavily and the management of which he helped control. In 1849, the Canal Bank shut its doors because of a dearth of funds and suspected fraud. Cries arose for a legislative investigation of the bank that might cost Crosswell a good deal of money and, even worse, result in a criminal indictment and a jail sentence. In return for blocking an investigation into Crosswell's involvement in the bank by the Whig state senate, Weed secured Crosswell's promise to get Dickinson to confirm Weed's friends. As one of Fillmore's outraged correspondents reported from Albany in early January, "The terms of the treaty is Weed is to keep the Whigs right in the Legislature & Crosswell to manage the United States Senate on the confirmation of the Presidential nominations, confirming Weed's friends and rejecting yours." "Crosswell has been very active with his Democratic friends to secure this result," another conservative complained to Webster in April. "He owes his being outside the penitentiary to Weed's exertions."182

The longer the Senate delayed action on New York appointments, the more heated became the bidding war between the state's rival Whig factions for Dickinson's help. With both sides wooing him, neither could rest assured that it had consummated a deal until the Senate actually voted. Formerly confident Fillmorites began to panic. "Is it possible that Dickinson and the Democratic Senators are deceiving you?" a worried Buffalo supporter asked Fillmore in March. "You ought to see Gov. Dickinson and Gov. Cass for they say here that they are both to go for Allen," Hall commanded in April. Dickinson had become the absolute broker of New York's patronage, and, as one Whig lamented, "Dickinson understands very well how to beef up a division of Whigs in this state." The problem, however, was not simply that Dickinson and other Democrats used their leverage over appointments to exacerbate Whig factionalism. The longer rival Whigs courted Democrats, the more blurred the lines separating Whigs from Democrats became, and, as elsewhere, this dangerous tendency eventually extended to the slavery issue. 183

At the end of June, a month after the dramatic break between Clay and the Taylor administration, the fate of both patronage nominees and Clay's omnibus bill remained cloudy. The Senate's Democratic caucus still stubbornly refused to take action on appointments. Pro- and anticompromise forces in Congress remained deadlocked as senators fought over a seemingly endless series of amendments that drove an increasingly desperate Clay to the kind of "irritable, impatient, and occasionally overbearing" behavior that alienated even his allies. Partisan lines seemed as chaotic as they had been in December, "in consequence," Outlaw wrote his wife, "of the sectional issues which have arisen."

If anything, developments during June caused friends and enemies of the omnibus to entrench more deeply in their hostile positions. To the dismay of Clay, Berrien and two southern Democrats, Pierre Soulé of Louisiana and Florida's Yulee, successfully tacked amendments onto the bill's territorial provisions enhancing the likelihood that slavery could legally exist in New Mexico and Utah and that they could enter the Union as slave states if they desired. Southerners also rejected Clay's revised Texas border and pressed northern compromisers to grant Texas more land. Meanwhile, lobbyists for Texas bondholders wined and dined congressmen in order to get a better deal for their clients than the omnibus entailed. As Clay realized, all of these changes made the omnibus even more hateful to its northern enemies.¹⁸⁵

During June, the long-feared Nashville Convention also met. The movement for compromise in Congress sapped the secessionist drive that had once seemed unstoppable, and the gathering proved a fiasco. Some slave states refused to send any delegates at all, while previously chosen Whig delegates from others declined to attend. The unrepresentative rump at Nashville could do little more than endorse the southern Democratic formula of extending the Missouri Compromise line to the Pacific and call for a second meeting after Congress adjourned. This pathetic anticlimax reaffirmed most northern Whigs' conviction that no broad sectional compromise was necessary. At the same time, the convention's recommendation increased most southern Democrats' determination not to allow California's admission. Their adamant hostility to the omnibus, in turn, made them seem even more politically vulnerable to its southern Whig proponents, especially since the June amendments made it more favorable to the South. 186

tainous Santa Fe. While congressmen in Washington debated and debated and debated, the residents of Texas and New Mexico acted in ways that intensified the sectional crisis. Furious that federal troops were stationed in Santa Fe and that Taylor, Clay, Benton, and other Washington politicians refused to recognize the legitimacy of Texas' grandiose claims to all the land between the Rio Grande and the Louisiana Territory, the governor of Texas in the spring had asked his legislature for authority to send Texas militia to seize the disputed territory by force. When it rebuffed him, he instead named Robert S. Neighbors as Texas' "Commissioner" and ordered him to organize new Texas counties in the disputed area. Starting in El Paso and working his way north toward Santa Fe, Neighbors established several counties whose residents pledged fealty to Texas. When Neighbors reached Santa Fe in May, however, the United States army officers there refused to allow him to proselytize for Texas. Instead, they persuaded the town's residents to call a convention and apply for statehood, a goal Taylor had sought since the previous year. The New Mexican convention in May wrote an antislavery constitution that was overwhelmingly ratified in June and sent on its way to Washington.187

Weeks before it reached Washington, tensions in the Southwest had escalated to the point of war. When Neighbors returned to Austin in May with the news of what had transpired at Santa Fe, Texas Governor P. H. Bell immediately called for a special session of the legislature to meet in August, a session everyone knew would indeed dispatch Texas troops to occupy Santa Fe. Armed conflict between the United States army there and the Texas militia impended. Nor would the anticipated confrontation be confined to those antagonists, for governors and mass meetings across the Deep South promised Texas military support should confrontation ensue. Unlike South Carolina during its showdown with Jackson over nullification, Texas would not be isolated. If the failure of the Nashville Convention seemed to scotch the threat of secession, the likelihood of a shooting civil war between Southerners and the national government seemed to soar at exactly the same time.

Since January, both proponents and opponents of the Taylor plan had regarded his suggestion that Congress do nothing about the Texas-New Mexico boundary dispute and allow the Supreme Court to settle it after New Mexico became a state as its weakest feature. Yet they disliked it for vastly different reasons. Nonaction struck proponents of a congressional compromise as a reckless, indeed unconscionable, abdication of responsibility. If nothing was done to resolve the dispute, they predicted, an armed confrontation between Texans and New Mexicans, with the United States army caught in the middle, was inevitable, and by June those predictions seemed borne out. When word reached Washington that army officers in Santa Fe had sent Neighbors packing and that Bell had called a special session of the Texas legislature, procompromise men became even more convinced that Congress must enact the omnibus and give Texas a more generous border than Clay had drawn.

Of much more immediate concern, however, was the past and future behavior of the federal troops in Santa Fe, for the rebuff of Neighbors appeared to indicate that Taylor had ordered them to resist Texans with force, an order that guaranteed a bloodbath in the fall. Livid Southerners pushed a resolution through the Senate demanding to know if Taylor had commanded those officers "to hold" Santa Fe against Texas or to "prevent the exercise of her jurisdiction." Taylor replied honestly on June 17 that no such orders had ever been given and that the army had been instructed to observe strict neutrality in the dispute. Referring specifically to Neighbors' effort to organize Texas counties, he then added that he regarded the disputed area to have been "acquired by the United States" from Mexico and that it should "remain" the property of the United States until the boundary dispute was resolved "by some competent authority." Whatever his orders to the army in Santa Fe, in sum, Taylor had no intention of allowing Texas to seize half of New Mexico. 189

Since Taylor had repeatedly identified the Supreme Court as the only authority competent to settle the boundary dispute, southern Whigs saw the message as an announcement that even the threat of civil war could not force the stubborn old soldier to retreat from his original position. After talking with Taylor in the White House on June 21, Outlaw glumly reported, "The old man . . . did not hesitate to advocate his own plan and condemn Mr. Clay's. . . . It is evident his mind has been poisoned against Mr. C." Such intransigence struck southern Whig compromisers like Outlaw as insane, and when rumors circulated that Taylor, over the protests of the embattled Crawford, was preparing new orders sending more troops to New Mexico and commanding them to resist Texans with armed force, it proved the last straw. 190

In late June, southern Whigs held a caucus to pick a committee to see Taylor and "inform him, what will probably be the result of a defeat by his Admn. of the Compromise bill, of the disastrous effect of such a policy to our party in the South." One by one in early July the caucus' chosen emissaries, Charles Conrad of Louisiana, Humphrey Marshall of Kentucky, and Toombs, entreated the president to change his mind. Stephens, who purposely had not been selected, also spoke alone with Taylor. Exactly what transpired during these interviews may never be known. But Taylor clearly refused to change his New Mexico policy and may have threatened to send more troops to Santa Fe, a threat that, by some accounts, caused Stephens to tell Secretary of the Navy Preston that he himself would lead a movement in the House to impeach Taylor. 191

By early July, Taylor and the vast majority of southern Whigs had reached a final parting. In reply to an editorial in the National Intelligencer calling on federal troops in Santa Fe to resist Texans, Stephens declared in its columns on July 4 that "the first Federal gun that shall be fired against the people of Texas, without the authority of law, will be the signal for the freemen from Delaware to the Rio Grande to rally to the rescue." Two days later, on July 6, Stephens, Toombs, Owen, Cabell, and Morton, the bolters of December, joined Democrats in the House to pass a resolution censuring Taylor for the Galphin affair.¹⁹²

If Taylor's inflexible course infuriated and alarmed southern Whigs, it endeared him all the more to northern Whig opponents of compromise. From their perspective, what had always been wrong with Taylor's "nonaction" proposal for the Texas-New Mexico boundary was precisely the possibility that Texas might seize the disputed area and thereby "spread" slavery before New Mexico ever became a state. News that Neighbors had successfully established Texas counties around El Paso consternated them, for it seemed to indicate that federal troops would tamely allow Texas imperialism. "If that county of El Paso is lost to New Mexico and given up to Slavery, ever more, I'll blister all those who ought to have prevented it and did not," Greeley fumed to Seward. "This Congress must not adjourn without organizing New Mexico and shutting out Texas somehow, and I shall go hard for Clay's log-roll if something better is not put ahead of it." ¹⁹³

The possibility that developments in the west could cause northern Whigs to abandon Taylor and submit to the omnibus to stop slavery expansion unnerved Weed. The army's neutrality "hurt the administration," he protested to Meredith. Northern Whigs could not support Taylor's plan if the army stood meekly by and allowed Texas to steal the eastern half of New Mexico for slavery. "The danger is that those movements [to organize Texas counties] made with the approbation of the U.S. officers there, will compel the North to fall back on the Proviso" and thereby desert Taylor. 194

Accordingly, when Weed learned that troops in Santa Fe had checked Neighbors, that the New Mexicans were finally applying for statehood with a free constitution, and that Taylor would stand firmly by his plan, he was overjoyed. "The New Mexico Constitutional movement 'sets us up.' It is glorious, for that was the only weak point in our 'case.'" Once it was clear that Taylor would never allow Texas to expand, indeed, Weed was certain of success. "The administration stands upon a rock; its opponents have built upon sand." ¹⁹⁵

The administration may not have stood upon a rock, but it certainly stood rock-like. And as long as Taylor adhered to his policy, there was no chance that the omnibus bill could pass Congress because northern Whigs clung to the president. Indeed, the possibility that Taylor could send New Mexico's constitution to Congress provided hope that they could regain the initiative from Clay, Webster, the other procompromise Whigs, and their Democratic allies. Even if they could not, a prolonged stalemate seemed assured.

Thus a dejected Webster wrote on July 4, the very day that Stephens' defiant manifesto appeared in the Intelligencer, that prospects for compromise were bleak. "Many, many members do not wish to vote against the President's plan. He seems to have more feeling on the subject than I can well account for, & I believe some members of his Administration take a good deal of pains to defeat the compromise." Webster's pessimism was well founded. As long as Taylor and his cabinet remained in office, no compromise could pass. 196

That very night, word came from the White House that the president had fallen ill. Independence Day had been sultry in Washington, and after exposing himself to the sun for several hours during a ceremony at the Washington Monument, Taylor had gulped down huge quantities of fresh fruits and vegetables and iced milk. By nightfall he suffered acute stomach pains. That night, at least, the news of his distress seemed regrettable but of little consequence. 197

"The Long Agony Is Over"

"THE SUDDEN, & until yesterday, the unexpected death of the President shocks beyond anything I have witnessed," a shaken Senator Willie P. Mangum wrote his wife on July 10. The diarrhea and painful indigestion that afflicted Zachary Taylor on the night of July 4 had been diagnosed by his doctors as "cholera morbus," and they had prescribed doses of quinine and calomel, a compound of mercury and chloride. Taylor probably suffered instead from acute gastroenteritis, an infection of the stomach wall and intestines, and the primitive treatment did him more harm than good. The sixty-five-year-old president managed to conduct business for two days and then began to decline rapidly. By the afternoon of July 9, word spread around Washington that his end was near. At 10:35 that night the "Hero of Buena Vista" died.¹

As soon as the doleful news spread, stunned Whigs began to speculate about "the effect of Gen. Taylor's death upon the Country" and upon their party. Millard Fillmore's unanticipated ascension to power suddenly created the possibility of change in men and measures. Whigs unhappy with Taylor's cabinet, his as yet unconfirmed appointees, and his territorial policy took heart at this prospect. Among administration supporters, it spawned dread. Thus anguished uncertainty mingled with the gloom that immediately shrouded Whig ranks.²

Whig divisions over current affairs alone sufficed to create anxious foreboding about Fillmore's course. But behind Whigs' apprehension lay the traumatic specter of John Tyler, whose accidental presidency had so devastated the party. Inevitably, therefore, almost the first thought that crossed the minds of shocked Whigs, including Fillmore's, was the necessity of preventing a recurrence of that previous nightmare. They sharply disagreed, however, about how best to avert it.

As a Northerner and an orthodox Whig regular, Millard Fillmore was no John Tyler, but ultimately his presidency had almost as deleterious consequences for the Whig party as did the proslavery Virginian's. Whipsawed by conflicting advice, he would shift the stance of the White House toward policy and personnel, and, as most historians have long agreed, that shift facilitated passage of the Compromise of 1850.3 However beneficial to the nation, that achievement failed to reverse the downward course of the Whig party since 1848. Where Tyler had united Whigs against him, Fillmore's actions deepened Whig divisions and ignited a ferocious and prolonged struggle for the party's 1852 presidential nomination. Where Tyler's obstruction of Whig economic legislation contributed to Whig defeat in state and congressional elections, the divisions caused by Fillmore's actions helped produce the same result in 1850 and 1851. Where Tyler, like Taylor, had unsuccessfully attempted to start a new party, the bipartisan alignments over the Compromise and the electoral defeats many Whigs blamed on Fillmore created the possibility of a partisan reorganization in which other, new parties might supplant the Whigs. Unlike John Tyler, Millard Fillmore cherished the Whig party, but by joining Democrats to settle the controversy over slavery expansion that Tyler helped spawn, he, like Tyler, jeopardized its very existence.

I

Aside from the still fresh memories of Tyler, Whigs' pervasive alarm after Taylor died stemmed from two sources. First, by July 1850 they were so sharply divided over patronage and policy that no one could imagine a middle course by which Fillmore might reunite the party. For Whigs, politics had become a zero-sum game. If some benefited from Fillmore's presidency, their intraparty rivals had to lose. Either Fillmore would retain Taylor's appointees, including the stigmatized cabinet, and adhere to Taylor's plan for the Mexican Cession, or else he would choose new advisors, throw the spoils to the regulars whom Taylor had short-changed, and back the omnibus bill. About the only thing that potential winners and losers in this struggle could agree on was that Fillmore's decision to retain or replace the cabinet would determine his course. As one of Seward's panicked supporters wrote from New York, all would be well if Fillmore followed Taylor's plan, "but if a new shuffle is to be made, and new counsels invoked, I fear the consequences."

Second, no one had a clue what Fillmore might do, and that uncertainty fueled Whigs' anxiety. Like most vice presidents in American history, he had been largely ignored while Taylor was alive, and he seemed a blank sheet on which rival Whigs projected their hopes and fears. Thus, even as preparations for Taylor's funeral proceeded, both friends and foes of the cabinet and of the congressional compromise bravely predicted that Fillmore would align with them while they simultaneously pressed their conflicting claims upon him. Fillmore's endemic caution, his phlegmatic temperament, and his unfailingly courteous response to advice from every quarter only heightened nervousness about his intentions. Contemptuously sneering to his wife that "Providence has at last led the man of hesitation and double opinions, to the crisis, where decision and singleness are indispensable," Seward reported to Weed on July 12, "All men of all parties have called on the P., and all come away without knowing or being able to conjecture anything." Robert C. Winthrop and Thomas Ewing, indeed, were convinced that Fillmore would adhere to Taylor's plan, while Daniel Webster, who saw Fillmore almost daily after July 10, predicted that he would back the omnibus.⁵

The new president was in fact genuinely unsure what to do. Almost two years later, Fillmore told a New York ally that on July 1, 1850, he had informed Taylor that if the Senate deadlocked on the omnibus bill he might cast his tie-breaking vote to pass it. Most historians have accordingly inferred that Fillmore's course was set from the moment he took office. Such a conclusion is logical if only because Seward, Fillmore's chief New York Whig rival, led Senate Whig opposition to the omnibus and because many of Fillmore's New York Whig allies had been pressing him for months to throw in with Webster and Clay behind the Compromise. Nonetheless, even if Fillmore's recollection was accurate, his willingness to back the omnibus on July 1 clearly was contingent on its content, which was then changing almost daily because of Senate amendments. More significantly, whatever Fillmore's resentment of Seward, he knew that all but two northern Whig senators and the vast majority of northern Whig representatives also rejected the omnibus. Most important, he knew that his closest supporters in western New York, like Nathan K. Hall, far preferred Taylor's plan to Clay's. At the time of Taylor's death, in short, Fillmore had not yet committed himself to the omnibus.

The conflicting advice that deluged Fillmore from inside and outside Washington only increased his initial hesitation. Those letters reveal not only how stark the choices confronting Fillmore appeared to most Whigs, but also how closely Whigs identified policy options with specific individuals and therefore how critical they deemed Fillmore's decision about the cabinet. Whigs everywhere greeted the potential changes created by Taylor's death with a mixture of hope and fear, but understandably, emotions ran deepest among New York's warring Whigs because Fillmore was personally involved in their battles. He now had the opportunity not just to adopt a different policy for the Cession but also to reallocate New York's federal jobs. Consequently, both Sewardites and conservatives bombarded the harried president with unsolicited and conflicting advice.

Swallowing his pride, Seward spoke with Fillmore three times on July 10 and urged him to retain all of the cabinet except Crawford and to stick with Taylor's plan. Expecting the worst from his rival, Seward came away from those meetings convinced that Fillmore would back the omnibus and conduct his administration "in the spirit of war and proscription against me, and all with whom I act." Vowing never to crawl to Fillmore again, Seward frantically telegraphed Weed to come to Washington and use his persuasive charm on the president. Too proud to supplicate Fillmore, Weed refused to leave Albany and instead sent Comptroller Washington Hunt, the self-proclaimed neutral in New York's factional war. Hunt was instructed by Weed and Governor Hamilton Fish to tell Fillmore to retain in office all of Taylor's New York appointees, and to insist on statehood for California and New Mexico, while opposing the organization of any territorial governments."

Weed published the gist of his instructions in an imperious editorial in the Albany Evening Journal on July 10. Fillmore had two examples to "guide and instruct him": the "inflexible firmness" of Taylor and "the perfidious course and ignominious fate" of John Tyler. If Fillmore "will resist the extension of Slavery and uphold the banner of Freedom," if he "adopts" the measures and "vindicates" the "Policy" of Taylor, Fillmore would have Weed's "hearty support." But "we shall stop short if there be, in the President, any wavers of Principle or any compromises of Freedom."⁸

Even some Sewardites considered this insulting manifesto "extremely dictatorial[,] uncourteous[,] and impolitic," while Fillmore's most conservative allies exploded in rage. Nonetheless, many of Fillmore's New York friends agreed with Weed's message, if not its tone. Winning Seward's support was more important than propitiating Clay, one wrote from Buffalo. Therefore Fillmore must spurn compromise and adhere to Taylor's plan. "We must give up Clay & Webster both and take care of ourselves as a party," echoed another correspondent. The patrician Governor Hamilton Fish, who commanded Fillmore's respect, also warned Fillmore that a large majority of New York Whigs opposed Clay's compromise and that the state party could not "sustain itself upon its principles."

Other conservatives from eastern New York sent Fillmore the opposite message. The cabinet must be changed, implored Daniel D. Barnard. "The Whigs in Congress must be conciliated. Mr. Clay and his mighty army of friends throughout the Republic must be conciliated." Above all, Barnard insisted, Webster must be appointed to the new cabinet in order "to form a national administration . . . to give you the full confidence and support of both the North and South." Weed and Seward must be shunned, for adoption of "their peculiar & ultra notions" would convert the Whig party, "a national party," into "an Abolition, a free soil, or sectional party." Fuller agreed: "Conciliate Mr. Clay and obtain his support. Act for the good of the whole country & not a section."

Southern Whigs, who had reached the breaking point with Taylor by early July and who feared an eruption of fighting with Texas, also pressured Fillmore to abandon Taylor's cabinet and policies. "For God's sake, save the country," pleaded Kentucky's Leslie Combs. "Save us from civil war & bloodshed. . . . It can be prevented & it ought to be—by a general settlement of the Slavery question." Fillmore must back Clay's compromise to avert bloodletting over the Texas boundary dispute, concurred Louisiana's Whigs. Spurn Seward and form a new cabinet, commanded Alabama's Henry Hilliard. 11 Yet northern Whigs other than New Yorkers bluntly and repeatedly warned Fillmore that aligning with Clay and Webster or appeasing southern Whigs by endorsing the congressional compromise would devastate Whig fortunes from Maine to the Midwest. In New England, Maine's William Pitt Fessenden frantically warned Fillmore, Clay and Webster "have been most decidedly reprobated by a vast majority of Whigs." "The salvation of the Whig party in Ohio depends upon the successful repudiation of Webster & Clay," echoed Whigs from the Buckeye State. From neighboring Pennsylvania, the refrain was the same. Passage of the compromise bill "would greatly weaken the Whig party in Penna."12

Fully aware that he had to traverse a minefield, Fillmore thus appeared "exceedingly cautious" in charting a course during the first weeks after Taylor's death.¹³ But he was not paralyzed by indecision. A loyal Whig since 1834, he hoped to reunite his dangerously divided party. Despite the babel of conflicting advice inflicted upon him and the widespread belief that no middle ground was available, he initially believed it possible to bring Whigs together behind his administration. Postponing decisions on policy, he focused first on matters of personnel, which he considered the key to restoring party harmony.

He began by assembling a new cabinet. On July 10 Taylor's department heads submitted their resignations as a formal courtesy, and by the next day Fillmore decided to accept them. ¹⁴ Choosing a new circle of advisors would declare his independence and promised to be widely popular among Whigs. Criticism of Taylor's cabinet had risen for over a year, even among supporters of his territorial policy, and the Galphin scandal pushed it to a fever pitch among congressional Whigs. Nothing could so effectively signal Fillmore's desire to improve relations between the White House and Capitol Hill as replacing Taylor's official family.

The question, of course, was, with whom? Aware that many Whigs considered Taylor's estrangement from Clay and Webster a blunder, Fillmore consulted them and other procompromise Whigs like James Pearce of Maryland. But he also solicited advice from staunch proponents of Taylor's plan like Winthrop and Truman Smith. This broad survey revealed Fillmore's desire to balance the cabinet not only between Northerners and Southerners, as was customary, but also between Taylor Whigs and the so-called ultras and between friends and foes of Taylor's territorial policy. Both the search process and the final selections also reflected his intention to repair as far as possible Taylor's mistakes in constructing his own cabinet.¹⁵

Aside from failing to consult congressional Whigs before picking his team, Taylor had been faulted for failing to bring Crittenden into the cabinet, and, with Webster's enthusiastic concurrence, Fillmore immediately recruited Crittenden as his new attorney general. Midwestern Whigs had complained bitterly that Ohio's Ewing did not represent them, and Fillmore, again at Webster's urging, sought someone more to their liking. Friends of Indiana's Caleb B. Smith, whom many Midwesterners had preferred to Ewing, instantly lobbied for his appointment, but as a replacement for Crawford in the War Department, Fillmore first turned to Edward Bates of Missouri, whom Webster specifically recommended as "a North Western appointment" who is "well known, not only to the people of Missouri, but also to those of Illinois, Wisconsin, & Iowa & I believe highly respected by the Whigs of those States." Finally, North Carolina's loyal Whigs had stridently protested Taylor's selection of William Ballard Preston from Democratic Virginia over one of their own, and Fillmore sought to heal that wound by appointing William A. Graham as secretary of the navy. 16

As usual when blueprints for new cabinets were outlined, however, most speculation centered on the so-called premier, the secretary of State. Webster's detailed list of recommendations to Fillmore left that slot blank because his own name had immediately surfaced as a favorite candidate. Certainly, he was the favorite of procompromise Whigs and the bête noire of anticompromise Whigs in the North. Hence, Fillmore's ultimate selection of Webster is usually cited as evidence that he intended from the start to back the Compromise.

Even this appointment, however, suggests Fillmore's initial ambivalence toward the omnibus. Fillmore leaned heavily on Webster for advice following Taylor's death, but he first inclined toward appointing Winthrop to the State Department. And Winthrop adamantly opposed the omnibus bill and any organization of territorial governments. Why pick an acknowledged opponent of the Compromise as his most influential cabinet minister if he had already decided to back it? On July 19, Fillmore offered the post to Winthrop, who flatly declined it and urged Webster's appointment instead on the egregiously mistaken grounds, as he wrote Edward Everett, that Webster favored "the admission of New Mexico as a State, in case the Compromise fails, as it will fail. This was Taylor's plan, & it will be Fillmore's plan." Contrary to Winthrop's pipe dream, in fact, Webster passionately urged the Senate to pass the omnibus two days before Winthrop's July 19 interview with Fillmore. Fillmore knew that Webster and Winthrop fundamentally disagreed about the omnibus, yet he preferred Winthrop.¹⁷

That preference suggests that Fillmore's litmus test for northern members of his cabinet was not whether they favored Taylor's plan or the omnibus, but whether they opposed imposition of the Wilmot Proviso on the Mexican Cession. Since January, opposition to the Proviso, rather than a preference for Taylor's plan or Clay's compromise, had been the issue that separated all of Fillmore's New York supporters from their Sewardite rivals. In Seward's Senate speech of July 2, moreover, he had not just finally endorsed Taylor's plan for California and New Mexico statehood. He had also explicitly, rather than implicitly, demanded that Congress bar slavery from any territorial governments it organized.¹⁸

Every Northerner Fillmore considered for his cabinet had taken an anti-Sewardite or anti-Proviso position, even though all of them but Webster fiercely opposed the omnibus bill. Webster repeatedly called the Proviso unnecessary and insulting, and Francis Granger, one of Fillmore's staunchest New York allies, urged Webster's appointment precisely because New Mexico's recently written state constitution proved Webster right in declaring that slavery extension could be stopped without the Proviso. Placing Webster in the cabinet, wrote Granger, would be a splendid putdown of New York's Sewardites, who were still carping at him "for not deeming the proviso necessary." Winthrop, too, had always opposed the Proviso. That's why Free Soilers scourged him. He had refused to support Joseph Root's February resolution demanding the creation of territorial governments with slavery prohibited, and he favored Taylor's plan because he thought it the best way to avert a divisive up-or-down vote on the Proviso.²⁰ Congressman Samuel F. Vinton of Ohio, who was briefly considered for a cabinet post, had voted to table Root's motion in February. Senator Tom Corwin, the Ohioan eventually appointed to the cabinet and, like Vinton, a firm proponent of Taylor's plan, had earlier publicly, and at some political cost, denounced the Proviso as unnecessary and divisive. The New Yorker Fillmore selected as postmaster general also agreed with him that it must be avoided to conciliate southern Whigs and to differentiate Fillmorites from Sewardites. Disregarding their stance on the Taylor plan versus the omnibus, Fillmore sought to restore party harmony by appointing Northerners who did not antagonize southern Whigs because of their aggressive antislavery record.

Fillmore's determination to reunite the party before he decided upon a territorial policy explains his initial preference for Winthrop over Webster. The prolonged speakership struggle in December revealed that, with a very few exceptions, Winthrop commanded the respect of all House Whigs, Northerners and Southerners, Taylorites and regulars, pro- and anticompromise men. His appointment would have been a long step toward reconciliation with the entire congressional wing of the party, which had become so alienated from Taylor's advisors. Webster, in contrast, was far more controversial. Northern antislavery Whigs considered him a Judas. In some circles, moreover, Webster had a reputation for, if not outright corruption, being in the pocket of wealthy men who purchased his talents, and it did not help matters that Webster balked at joining the cabinet until monied men in Boston guaranteed to raise a fund to supplement his official salary. As an anonymous correspondent in Washington pungently warned Fillmore on July 16, virtually every Whig paper in the North and all but a dozen northern Whigs in Congress distrusted Webster. "He is a prostitute in morals and something worse in politics.... Loose in money matters, tainted with fraud.

fixed in profligacy, he is a living ulcer and infection."²¹ When Winthrop refused to serve, therefore, Fillmore still hesitated to appoint Webster. Since his selection could build a bridge to party regulars slighted by Taylor and add an experienced statesman with a formidable intellect to the cabinet, however, Fillmore, on July 21, sent Webster's name to the Senate.²²

By that date Fillmore had settled on four other men. Crittenden accepted the attorney generalship and Graham the Navy Department, although neither had yet reached Washington. They were to be balanced by two Northerners. Corwin's appointment as Treasury secretary was expected to mitigate whatever furor Webster's raised among northern Whigs since he adamantly opposed any concessions to the South in the Cession other than eschewing the Proviso. Corwin, like Webster, had the additional advantage, moreover, of representing a state with a Whig governor who could appoint his replacement in the Senate, and Governor Seabury Ford immediately named Ewing to Corwin's seat to demonstrate Ohio Whigs' continuing commitment to Taylor's policy. In contrast, Governor George Briggs of Massachusetts appointed Winthrop to Webster's seat, thereby shifting its probable vote in an anticompromise direction.²³

By July 21 Fillmore had also appointed a new postmaster general, his Buffalo law partner and closest political confidant, Nathan K. Hall. Next to Webster, Hall was the most controversial member of Fillmore's team. His views on the territorial issue were unknown to the public, but since January he had ardently preferred Taylor's plan to Clay's, although, as he wrote Fillmore on July 9, if statehood for both New Mexico and California proved unachievable, he would reluctantly back the omnibus.²⁴ What made Hall a lightning rod was his character. Where Fillmore was mocked by even his supporters as passive, indecisive, and timid, Hall was renowned as a ruthless partisan who wanted all-out war against the Seward-Weed Whigs. In his own words, he had "savagely and angrily" told Washington Hunt in April 1850 that he could no longer sit on the fence, that neutrality was impossible in the struggle between Fillmorites and Weed men. Weed and other Seward allies bravely chortled that Fillmore had committed a blunder because other cabinet members would regard Hall as "a Spy" for the president. But they knew they now faced an enemy with an iron will in the position where he could hurt them the most, head of the most patronage-rich department of the national government. "N. K. Hall is President of the U.S.," moaned a Sewardite from Buffalo. "It will be he who after the Cabinet meeting will go to the private chamber of Mr. F. and revise the decisions."25

Fillmore's prolonged effort to fill the other two cabinet seats proved embarrassing. For secretary of war he sought Bates, and for the Home Department, Maryland's James Pearce, his closest friend in the Senate. Had both accepted, significantly, the cabinet would have lacked a representative from the Deep South. This omission was no oversight. Since it had been primarily Deep South Whigs, notably the Georgians Berrien, Toombs, Stephens, and Crawford, who had most infuriated their northern Whig colleagues, the absence of anyone from that region was yet another indication that Fillmore's top priority was to heal the party's wounds.

Nothing was heard from Bates until August 1, when he telegraphed his declination. Next, using Bates as an intermediary, Fillmore turned to another Missouri Whig, Henry Geyer, but on August 6, Geyer also refused to serve. This rebuff ended Fillmore's attempt to find a Missourian who might satisfy midwestern Whigs, and only then did he look to the Deep South. On that ground he rejected Truman Smith's recommendation of Tennessee's Meredith Gentry, a Taylor loyalist, but he also refused to consider a number of names suggested by Smith, Mangum, Berrien, and others: Luke Lea, a former Whig gubernatorial candidate in Mississippi; Judge William Sharkey of that state; Georgia's Toombs; and an Alabama judge. Fillmore clearly sought a Deep South Whig who would not offend Northerners, just as he wanted Northerners acceptable to the southern wing of the party. He wanted no part of Toombs, whom most northern Whig congressmen loathed, or of Sharkey, who had chaired the recent Nashville Convention, or anyone from Alabama, which sent Whig delegates to it. Any hint of proslavery extremism from a state's Whigs disqualified them.²⁶

Finally, after six fruitless weeks, Fillmore named Congressman Charles Conrad of New Orleans, who resigned his House seat on August 17 to take the post. Conrad epitomized Fillmore's hope of reuniting the party. He came from the most moderate state in the Deep South, one that had refused to send any delegates to the Nashville conclave. He had been an early and energetic supporter of Taylor in Louisiana and thus a rival of Clay Whigs there, but he was also one of the three men sent by the caucus of House Whigs in early July to persuade Taylor to desist from his defiant stance on the Texas boundary dispute and to support Clay's compromise. Conrad, like Crittenden, in sum, could be a bridge both to the Taylor Whigs, who feared displacement, and to procompromise Whigs.

The secretaryship of the new Interior Department proved the most difficult slot of all to fill. Pearce, Fillmore's first choice, declined because Maryland's Democratic governor would appoint a Democrat to replace him in the Senate. Fillmore next considered Pearce's Maryland ally John Pendleton Kennedy, but because of ferocious opposition to Kennedy from Reverdy Johnson's wing of the party, he decided instead to give the post to Pennsylvania. In many ways his choice from that state, ex-Congressman Thomas McKennan, was inspired. Even in 1849 Pennsylvanians had told Fillmore that McKennan would have been a better cabinet selection than Meredith, and by the summer of 1850 they considered him the only Whig in the state who could patch up the debilitating quarrel between Johnston and Cooper. As a private citizen, moreover, McKennan had taken no public stand for or against the compromise and thus would offend neither side. Yet McKennan hesitated to take on the backbreaking work of the Interior Department because of poor health. He accepted the post on August 9 and then resigned from it on August 26 without ever coming to Washington.²⁷

McKennan's almost instantaneous resignation set off another frantic scramble. Pearce again pressed Kennedy's name, but Kennedy preferred the Navy to the Interior Department, which would require persuading Graham to switch hats. Meanwhile Webster and Berrien convinced Fillmore to offer the job to Berrien's Georgia ally Charles Jenkins, but Jenkins refused the offer. Again, Kennedy's name emerged, but because Graham balked at shifting departments unless it was absolutely necessary, Fillmore made one last attempt to find someone else. Finally, in mid-September, two full months after Fillmore was sworn in, Alexander H. H. Stuart of Staunton, Virginia, took the post. At last, the embarrassing ordeal was over.²⁸

П

Despite taking longer to assemble than Fillmore had hoped, his official family went far toward meeting his goal of reuniting the party. Most northern Whig congressmen applauded his choices, except for Webster, and Webster's inclusion made them even more appealing to Southerners.²⁹ His decisions on policy, however, neutralized this gain, for long before Fillmore filled his cabinet, he decided to throw his weight behind the omnibus bill. That decision undoubtedly influenced his ultimate choice of Webster and of a cabinet member from the Deep South. Grousing that Clay had dictated the cabinet's roster, Seward complained to his wife as early as July 24 that administration influence was converting both houses of Congress "to favor the Compromise" and that formerly firm opponents of Clay's bill were now "giving way" before administration pressure. Because of "the tergiversations of the Whig Administration," both Seward and procompromise Whigs now predicted that it would soon pass the Senate and then sail through the House.³⁰

Pinpointing what brought Fillmore off the fence within two weeks of Taylor's death is impossible. The reflexive inclination to take a different stance than Seward—who, to the jubilation of his New York backers, came out for Taylor's plan on July 2—pressure from eastern New York conservatives, pleas from southern Whigs, and the influence of Clay and Webster all played a role. Most likely, however, the escalating crisis over the Texas-New Mexico boundary dispute most swayed Fillmore, just as it did Webster. Pressure for a fast resolution of that crisis was enormous, for the Texas legislature was due to meet in special session on August 12. Unless a settlement was found, it would likely send Texas troops against United States forces in Santa Fe, and a bloodbath could ensue. Because the omnibus bill contained a redrawn border between Texas and New Mexico, its rapid passage seemed to provide the quickest solution to the problem.³¹

Fillmore became aware of the urgency of the situation in Texas on July 12 when a letter Texas Governor Peter H. Bell had addressed to Taylor on June 14 finally arrived in Washington. Bell demanded to know if Taylor had ordered or condoned the action of his military commander in Santa Fe, Colonel John Munroe, in calling a convention to establish a new state government "within the rightful limits of the State of Texas." As early as July 13, Texas Congressman Volney Howard pressed Fillmore to respond to Bell's letter; on July 27 the Texas congressional delegation demanded answers during a meeting with Fillmore at the White House; and on August 1 Howard bluntly warned Fillmore that he must disavow and reprimand Munroe before the special legislative session in Texas met. Nor, threatened Howard, should Fillmore attempt to resist Texas' claim to Santa Fe, as Taylor had done. "The state ought not again to be trifled with."

Fillmore thus knew that fast action on the Texas boundary question was imperative. Only two alternatives seemed available—the congressional omnibus bill or immediate statehood. Although official notice of ratification of New Mexico's proposed state constitution had not yet reached Washington by mid-July and could not before August 12, several copies of that document had arrived by July 7. It claimed the boundaries of the old Mexican Department of New Mexico, which would push back the western border of Texas almost to San Antonio in the center of the modern state. That outrageous claim, Congressman Howard fumed to Fillmore, consigned to New Mexico territory that was "within the undisputed limits of Texas!" Thus Fillmore never considered immediate statehood under New Mexico's constitution. Only rapid passage of the omnibus bill appeared to offer a timely escape from the crisis.³³

To avert a clash between the United States troops at Santa Fe and the Texans, Webster desperately lobbied his recent Senate colleagues during the last week of July to pass the omnibus, and he was thought to speak for Fillmore. "It is quite well, universally understood here that the President desires the passing of the Compromise Bill and his influence is rapidly demoralizing us," Seward lamented to his wife on the morning of July 31. Yet Webster was equally pessimistic. He knew of at least seven northern Whig senators who now wanted the omnibus to pass, he informed a friend. Because they had previously committed themselves to Taylor's plan and refused to appear inconsistent, however, they were "ready to do anything but vote for it." Both men, paradoxically, proved to be accurate prophets.³⁴

During the last two weeks of July, the Senate made frantic and extraordinarily confusing efforts to amend the omnibus to break the two-month deadlock over it. One of the most significant of these, because of what its defeat implied, was a motion by Jefferson Davis explicitly to repeal, or declare null, the Mexican statutes abolishing slavery throughout the Mexican Cession. Davis' motion indicated that many men, despite the other changes in the bill's territorial provisions, still believed that those laws would prohibit slavery after the territories were organized. It was defeated 33 to 22. Every northern senator who answered the roll call voted against it, as did four southern Whigs—the two Delawareans, Clay, and North Carolina's George Badger. The stalwart Missouri Democrat Benton and Mississippi's Foote, Davis' archrival, also joined the northern phalanx. Exactly what slavery's status in the territories would be remained murky, but its illegality, as Clay insisted, remained a real possibility.³⁵

The haggling, however, focused primarily on the disputed Texas-New Mexico boundary, which had not been changed since Clay reported the omnibus bill on May 8. Benton tried to reduce the area the select committee granted to Texas; Thomas Rusk of Texas demanded everything east of the Rio Grande. Both proposals were summarily rejected. On July 24, Maine Democrat James Bradbury sought to break this logjam by proposing that, rather than attempting to fix the boundary itself, Congress should create a commission composed of representatives from Texas and the United States government to draw the boundary. By that amendment, the rest of the omnibus could become law, including organization of the New Mexico Territory, but the border between Texas and New Mexico would not be determined until later.

Bradbury's motion ignited a flurry of unsuccessful attempts to amend his amendment. But a crucial proviso from the Georgia Whig William Dawson narrowly won adoption. It stipulated that the territorial government of New Mexico, created by the omnibus bill, would have no authority over any of the area east of the Rio Grande until Bradbury's commission reported its boundary. Although it appeared to prejudge the issue by favoring Texas's claims, both it and Bradbury's motion as amended by it passed, despite opposition from every northern Whig except Cooper.³⁶

So stood the omnibus bill on July 31, when Fillmore's Maryland friend Pearce objected to Dawson's proviso as patently unfair to New Mexico's claims and moved to remove everything related to New Mexico from the omnibus bill in order to delete it. Pearce, who had steadfastly supported Clay's bill since May, promised to try to restore the New Mexico section, once Dawson's clause was stricken, with a fairer amendment of his own. Nonetheless, Clay was appalled. He recognized, better than the well-meaning Pearce, that removing any one of the building blocks from the omnibus would open Pandora's box. Delighted by this unexpected opportunity, opponents of the omnibus scented blood.³⁷

Pearce's motion carried 33–22 and began the complete unraveling of the omnibus bill, for his attempt to restore the section unencumbered by Dawson's proviso failed. With the prospect of endangering a pro-Texas boundary settlement, the Florida Democrat David Yulee then moved to strike everything relating to Texas from the bill. Yulee's motion carried 29–28. Since the organization of the New Mexico Territory without the Wilmot Proviso and a potentially favorable settlement of the Texas boundary had been included in the omnibus to sugarcoat the admission of California for Southerners, their deletion caused Missouri's David Atchison to move successfully to strike California in the hope that all Southerners, regardless of party, might now oppose it. "The omnibus is overturned, and all the passengers spilled out but one," crowed Benton. Its overjoyed opponents danced jigs in the aisles.³⁸

The issues and thus the perceived sectional advantage involved in the three roll calls on July 31 differed. Hence each evoked slightly different voting coalitions. Even most of the southern Whigs who favored compromise, for example, joined the majority of southern Democrats who opposed it to support California's deletion once the Texas and New Mexico provisions, whose retention procompromise Whigs supported, had been stripped from the bill. Nonetheless, aggregating the three votes dramatically reveals the extent of sectional division in both parties, as well as the continuing partisan polarization in each section's delegation, a pattern that would reappear in the House. Southern Democrats and especially northern Whigs strongly opposed the omnibus and voted to break it up. Southern Whigs and especially northern Democrats tried to defend it from destruction by opposing all three motions to delete.

Northern Whig opponents of the omnibus exulted over their good fortune, especially Seward, who had despaired of preventing its passage that very morning. One of Seward's allies, Congressman Orsamus B. Matteson of Utica, encountered Fillmore after the Senate votes and relayed the news of the afternoon session to him. According to the contemptuous Matteson, who had once urged Seward to "whip" Fillmore during the patronage struggles of 1849, the president looked "blank enough" and exclaimed, "What a pity!" Fillmore, Matteson gloated to Weed when recounting this episode, "must now 'face the music' and that is not his policy." "39

Table 29Percentage of Whig and Democratic Senate Votes Favoring and Opposing the Retention of the Omnibus Bill Intact^a

	Against the Omnibus	For the Omnibus
Northern Whigs	87%	8%
Northern Democrats	18%	75%
Southern Whigs	39%	58%
Southern Democrats	68.5%	26%

"This table is based on the roll-call votes listed in Hamilton, Prologue to Conflict, Appendix B, pp. 193–94. The percentages are calculated on the basis of the total votes the sectional wings of each party could cast when the three roll calls on July 31 are combined. For example, the thirteen northern Whigs had a total of thirty-nine votes, and thirty-four (87.2 percent) of them were cast to break up the omnibus. The difference between the sum of the two columns and 100 percent for each group is the share formed by abstentions. To use the example of northern Whigs again, the missing 5 percent represents abstentions by James Cooper, the lone pro-omnibus northern Whig, on the Pearce and Yulee motions, which seemed so favorable to the North that even Cooper dared not vote against them.

Yet Sewardites and other northern Whigs celebrated too soon. The very night of July 31, after several exhausted senators had gone to a favorite watering hole or home to bed, the Senate passed the remaining section of the overturned omnibus, the Utah Territory bill, by a vote of 32–18. Despite eleven negative votes from all the northern Whigs present on the floor, as well as two more from the Free Soilers, northern Whigs' determination never to allow organization of a territorial government without the Proviso had been foiled. The vote meant, as procompromise men realized and as Sewardites should have, that the Compromise might pass the Senate as individual measures more easily than combined in a single bill, just what Henry Clay had originally proposed and what Webster and Stephen Douglas had argued all along.⁴⁰

The wreck of the omnibus changed the tactics and leadership of the contending sides but not their goals. The session had dragged on for eight months and would soon surpass the record for the longest session of Congress yet held. Temperatures in muggy Washington hovered above 90°, and members' health began to fail. Utterly exhausted and heartbroken, the aged Clay, after petulantly blasting Pearce for destroying his handiwork, departed the capital for Newport, Rhode Island, to recuperate. His starring role in the great drama had ended, and the Democrat Douglas replaced him as manager of the now-separated compromise measures. In August the tiny, wan, and emaciated Alexander Stephens, who had never enjoyed robust health, returned to Georgia to recover. Seward, Senate leader of the Whig anticompromise forces, was also worn out, and his wife begged him to come home to the cooler climate of Auburn, New York, to rest. Duty and political necessity required him to remain in Washington, the New Yorker explained to his alarmed wife. He could not desert the Senate without voting for California and against the other bills. Fillmore wanted the two territorial bills and the Texas boundary proposition to pass both houses separately, he told Weed. "These bills cannot pass the House without disgracing the New York delegation, and perhaps ruining the hopes of the State."

Seward understood the new tactical situation and the ramifications of defeat precisely. Now that the omnibus was shattered, northern Whigs in the Senate were determined to admit California and, if possible, to block all other legislation for the Cession since immediate statehood for New Mexico now seemed impossible. Hence they wanted to place the California bill first on the Senate agenda. Conversely, proponents of compromise hoped to place the New Mexico and Texas bills ahead of California to extort the same price for California's admission that the omnibus would have involved. Their success, as Seward shrewdly grasped, would spell political calamity for northern Whigs. "If the Compromise Bill should pass now and obtain the signature of the President," he wrote Weed on July 28, "what will be the issue on which we go to the Polls?" Seward intuitively knew, in short, that Whig voters could be mobilized only if they perceived conflict between their party and the Democrats. The Senate votes of July 31 displayed dramatic differences between northern Whigs and Democrats, but if Fillmore, the new Whig president, backed the compromise, he could negate that record, align Whigs with the Democratic position, and strip northern Whigs of their best issue. By opening the door to slavery expansion in violation of northern Whigs' pledges, that course, Seward fully realized, entailed electoral disaster for Whigs in New York and other northern states in the impending 1850 elections. 42

Fillmore, however, was now adamant about passing not only the territorial and Texas bills but also the District of Columbia's slave trade and fugitive slave measures that had always been separate from the omnibus. After the breakup of the omnibus, he intensified his intervention in Congress's proceedings, thus violating the Whig party's founding principle. While word had gone out privately in late July that Fillmore wanted the omnibus passed, by early August the administration had still not taken a public stand. Volney Howard's note of August 1 demanding a response to Texas Governor Bell's letter offered the opportunity to do so, just as it made resolution of the Texas boundary dispute Fillmore's top priority. Fillmore therefore acted to alter the Senate's legislative agenda, for Douglas, supremely confident that all the bills could pass separately, was content to take up California before addressing the Texas boundary and New Mexico bills, just what Fillmore's Sewardite enemies wanted.⁴³

The urgency of the Texas boundary dispute and the need to answer Bell's letter also provided Fillmore with a slim chance of finding a middle ground on which the party could reunite. Southern Whigs repeatedly warned Fillmore that he must prevent fighting around Santa Fe. At the same time, northern Whigs emphatically threatened that if he yielded to the "unwarrantable" claims of Texas to everything east of the Rio Grande, "the Whig party is ruined." Thus Fillmore might satisfy Northerners by taking a tough public stand against the saberrattling Texans and working with congressional Whigs for a Texas boundary to the east of the Rio Grande and Santa Fe. That meant junking Bradbury's commission plan, but it also provided a chance to give Texas more land than Clay's omnibus bill provided. If Texans accepted the new bill, Fillmore could avert civil war and win the plaudits of southern Whigs. It would require close coordination with procompromise Whig congressmen to find a fair boundary, but it just might work.

Beginning August 1, the day after the omnibus overturned, Webster and Fillmore, occasionally consulting with Hall and Corwin, the only other cabinet members yet in Washington, began to draft two messages. One was the administration's answer to Governor Bell, which would go out over Webster's signature. It, in turn, formed the pretext for a message from Fillmore to Congress emphasizing the gravity of the situation and the imperative necessity for a quick solution.⁴⁵

Meanwhile, Fillmore urged his friend Pearce, who had been so instrumental in breaking up the omnibus, to draw up a new boundary between Texas and New Mexico, and Pearce worked closely on one with Douglas. On August 5, in the midst of debate on the California statehood bill, Pearce introduced a new bill for Texas—not New Mexico, to which the Bradbury and Dawson amendments had been attached. This set the western boundary of Texas at its modern location. New Mexico would keep Santa Fe and much, but not all, of the area east of the Rio Grande it claimed. At the same time, Texas was given much more land than the original omnibus granted by carving out the panhandle section of the state. Altogether, angry antislavery Whigs estimated, Texas got 70,000 square miles more than it deserved. Pearce's new bill also included new terms of compensation for Texas that, in effect, paid the state of Texas $5 million for releasing its claims and reserved an additional $5 million to pay people holding Texas bonds. After hearing the bill read on August 5, the Senate went back to debating on California 46

That Pearce introduced this bill in the midst of debate over California at the administration's behest, as Webster later explained, became clear the following day. On August 6 Fillmore sent Congress his special message on Texas, along with Governor Bell's letter and Webster's response to it. By coordinating the delivery of this message with the presentation of Pearce's bill, Fillmore intended to shift the Senate agenda from California to Texas, from a northern to a southern priority.⁴⁷

The message that Fillmore and Webster concocted was a political masterstroke. Echoing the stern language of Taylor's June 17 message, Fillmore declared that the boundary dispute was not between residents of New Mexico and Texas but between the United States government and the state of Texas. By the terms of the treaty of 1848 the area claimed by Texas belonged to the United States, and Fillmore was sworn to protect it by his oath of office. If Texas militia invaded United States territory by marching on Santa Fe, they would "become at that moment trespassers, they are no longer under the protection of any lawful authority, and are to be regarded merely as intruders." In such an event, Fillmore would have no choice but to use his ample constitutional and statutory authority to call up the militia and the regular army to repel Texas' aggression.

At the same time, Fillmore continued, Congress had the power to make "an immediate decision or arrangement or settlement" of the "boundary between Texas and the Territory of New Mexico." "All considerations of justice, general expediency, and domestic tranquility" required Congress, not some other body, to fix the border. It was "the first question, or one of the first," growing out of the Mexican Cession, "now requiring decision." Neither the Supreme Court nor a boundary commission could act quickly enough. The United States should indemnify Texas for its concessions, but Congress must act immediately. Nor was that all. "The settlement of other questions connected with the same subject" before Congress adjourned "is greatly to be desired, but the adjustment of this appears to me in the highest degree important." ⁴⁸

Together, Fillmore and Webster accomplished the seemingly impossible. Just as northern Whigs demanded, they followed Taylor by defying the Texans, thereby disarming potential northern critics who looked for any signs of betrayal. "It seems that the policy of Mr. F. on the boundary question is one we cannot quarrel with about," admitted one of Seward's dismayed allies. Yet, simultaneously, Fillmore publicly urged the kind of broad settlement involving organization of territorial governments and fixing of the Texas boundary that Taylor had always opposed. Southern Whigs like Mangum purred their approval, and procompromise Democrats like Foote were delighted.⁴⁹

Equally important, the message helped shift the Senate's agenda from California, the only measure on which antislavery Whigs wanted action, to the Texas boundary. On August 7, Pearce moved that his Texas bill take priority over California. The following day the Senate defeated Ewing's motion to pass the California bill first, and on August 9, to the outrage of Seward and other antislavery Whigs, the Texas bill passed easily, 30–20. "One-third of New Mexico was surrendered to Texas, with a purse of ten millions of dollars, to make peace," grumped Seward. "Seventy thousand square miles of free territory made slave, & a gratuity of $10,000,000," fumed John Otis, Maine's lone Whig congressman. "This done by northern Whig votes, who could have defeated it, if they had voted the other way."

The Senate vote on Texas was, in fact, extraordinary. Once the omnibus was broken up, it must be reemphasized, only the Texas bill required concessions from both sections. The other bills clearly favored one section or the other. California statehood, for example, was universally viewed as a pronorthern measure, just as territorial governments for Utah and New Mexico without the Proviso represented concessions to the South. In contrast, northern antislavery men thought Pearce's bill gave Texas too much land, while proslavery Southerners thought it granted Texas far too little. Both Northerners and Southerners who supported it would assuredly be accused of sacrificing sectional interests and could expect potential retaliation from their constituents. Hence its enactment became the key to the passage of all the other compromise measures.

On July 31, with the exception of James Cooper, northern Whigs had united to smash the omnibus because it exacted concessions as the price of California's admission. On August 9, not just Cooper but also six New England Whigs joined six southern Whigs, eleven northern Democrats, and six southern Democrats, including both Texans, in the majority. Furthermore, both New Jersey Whigs were missing or purposely ducked the vote rather than record their opposition. All eight of these northern Whigs had voted against the Utah bill as well as the omnibus, but now the six from New England—Samuel Phelps of Vermont, Truman Smith of Connecticut, John Clarke and Albert Greene of Rhode Island, and both Winthrop and "Honest" John Davis of Massachusetts—helped pass the Texas bill. Had they voted the other way, as Otis noted, Pearce's measure would have lost 24–26. Altogether, indeed, northern Whigs who had fought any westward extension of Texas' border beyond the Nueces River for months supported the Texas bill, 7–4. Only Ewing, Baldwin of Connecticut, and William Upham of Vermont joined the bitter Seward in the minority, as did two southern Whigs—Underwood of Kentucky, whose motives invite speculation, and Morton of Florida, who, as always, voted with the majority of southern Democrats against what they considered a betrayal of the South. For northern Whigs, it was a stunning reversal. Raising a question that could have been directed at all six New Englanders, Maine's aghast Otis asked, "How could John Davis vote for that bill?" 51

The need to settle the boundary question before the Texas legislature met and thereby avert civil war obviously contributed to the conversion. Winthrop desperately explained to friends that he and Davis had voted to keep the peace. "The Bill involved no principle—it was a mere question of acres & dollars. But it was the one thing needful for the public peace." Moreover, he pointed out, their vote on Texas did not mean that they now favored all the compromise measures. "If we can now admit California, we shall have nothing to regret. It is not a farthing matter about the Territories. They can get along under their own provisional governments until they are ready to come in as states. I shall stand upon old Zack's system & this Boundary Bill (if it passes the House) will remove any obstacle to its adoption." ⁵²

Winthrop's exculpatory gloss puts the votes of the New England Whigs in a different light. They may have believed that the Texas bill was necessary to avert civil war, but it also had to be passed before the Senate could take up California. And regardless of what the Senate did with the New Mexico bill, which Winthrop, Davis, Phelps, and every other northern Whig who voted on Texas except Cooper would later oppose, they counted on the huge northern Whig delegation in the House to prevent the organization of territorial governments. In that expectation, they were hardly alone. Illinois Democratic Congressman Thomas Harris reported on August 23 that northern Whigs in the House "now want simply to pass the California bill & the boundary bill to relieve the administration from all its troubles & let the territorial bills go." In short, the escalating crisis over the Texas boundary may have persuaded northern Whig proponents of Taylor's plan that opposition to a congressional boundary settlement was now unrealistic, but they were determined to salvage as much of Taylor's original policy as possible by stopping the organization of territorial governments in the House. As they had recognized throughout the long congressional session, the House, not the Senate, posed the crucial barrier to compromise, and for that reason, as soon as the Texas bill passed the Senate, Webster turned all of his lobbying efforts toward the lower chamber.53

Yet hope of resolving the boundary dispute while still blocking territorial bills in the House cannot explain why the only northern Whigs who abandoned their previous position came from New England, although the two New Jerseyans who abstained may have been responding to similar pressures.⁵⁴ Put simply, the significant fact was that Zachary Taylor was no longer president. Fillmore was, and Webster was now New England's representative in the cabinet. Webster came to the heart of the matter when he wrote confidently on the morning of August 9, "The R. I. Senators, at last, have waked up." What the Rhode Islanders and other New England Whigs woke up to was not just the impending bloodbath at Santa Fe, but the cold fact that Webster now seemed to command New England's patronage, and he insisted that all the compromise measures pass. For whatever reason, Taylor's cabinet had not sent formal nominations to the Senate for a huge number of interim federal appointees in New England. Unless those men were nominated and confirmed by the Senate before it adjourned, they would, by law, be forced to vacate their offices. And Webster had the power to withhold their names or substitute new ones. On August 11, moreover, Webster moved to take federal printing contracts away from the Boston Atlas and give them instead to the Boston Courier, a threat that undoubtedly contributed to the shift in Schouler's editorial policies. Nor is it coincidence that Fillmore waited until September 19, after all of the compromise bills had safely passed both houses of Congress, to send to the Senate the names of seventy-four customs collectors, naval officers, and other federal appointees in New England. With the patronage axe poised, New England Whigs who had formerly gone down the line with Taylor caved in.⁵⁵

The six New Englanders' defection on August 9 meant that for one of the few times in the session thus far, majorities of northern Whigs and northern Democrats voted the same way on what, in tactical terms, had become the most important piece of the compromise package. Among Southerners, it is true, Whig and Democratic majorities opposed each other on Texas, but they had already voted together in lockstep for the Utah bill. Seward's nightmare was coming true. Partisan distinctions in both sections' Senate delegations were disintegrating, and the question of what issue Whigs could use against the Democrats in the impending 1850 elections was becoming all the more pressing.

Debate in the Senate remained abrasive, but passage of the Texas bill allowed easy enactment of the other compromise measures. On August 13, California statehood prevailed 34–18. Not a single northern vote was cast against it. John Bell and the two Delaware Whigs joined the majority, as did the Democrats Benton and Houston of Texas. Pearce and both North Carolina Whigs abstained rather than vote against this pronorthern measure. For the most part, however, sectional lines replaced party lines on California.

New Mexico passed on August 15, 27–10. Twenty-three senators, over a third of the membership, missed the vote. Some were out of town and others may have been paired, but many ducked the vote to allow passage of a measure the administration wanted but their constituents opposed. In addition to the discouraged Seward, who went home to Auburn on August 14, five northern Whigs—Baldwin and Smith of Connecticut, Dayton of New Jersey, Clarke of Rhode Island, and Ewing of Ohio—went unrecorded, as did Delaware's Spruance, who had previously voted with the Northerners. Only six of thirteen northern Whigs voted against the organization of New Mexico without the Proviso, and Cooper voted for it. That record distinguished them from northern Democrats, who supported the New Mexico bill 10–3, but the absence of so many northern Whigs precluded any thought of blaming the bill's passage on northern Democrats. Since every southern Whig and Democrat who cast a vote favored the bill, moreover, partisan distinctions evaporated in that section too.

Only after the individual bills that had once constituted the omnibus went to the House did the Senate take up the fugitive slave and district slave trade measures. The former passed 27–12 on August 23. Again, what stood out were the twenty-one abstainers, including five northern Whigs and eight of fifteen northern Democrats, who failed to record a vote against this proslavery legislation. Otherwise, with the exception of the northern Democrats Sturgeon and George Jones of Iowa, who supported the bill, voting went strictly along sectional lines. The public, who would take far more interest in this measure than their congressmen had, found little in the voting records to distinguish between the parties.

The pattern reversed on September 16, when the Senate finally passed the bill abolishing the slave market in the District of Columbia by a 33–19 vote, with 10 abstentions. Now Northerners could safely vote for legislation that their section clearly desired, while Southerners could indicate their support for compromise either by a positive vote or by abstention. Every northern senator who voted, including the two new members from California and the procompromise Cooper, supported the bill, as did six Southerners—Clay, who had finally returned from Newport, his Kentucky colleague Underwood, the two Delaware Whigs, and two defiant Democrats, Benton and Sam Houston. In addition, Pearce and four southern Democrats, at least one of whom was clearly out of town, did not vote. Absent Democrats may have been paired with Whigs because four northern Whigs—Miller, Phelps, Smith, and Upham—also failed to record a vote for the measure. As in most of the preceding roll calls, in sum, the bipartisan sectional solidarity of those who did vote offered little grounds for partisan exploitation at the impending elections.

V

The House delayed action regarding the Mexican Cession until it received all four Senate bills. The central question in the lower chamber was whether its large northern majority would allow anything but California's admission to become law. For months Southerners and procompromise northern Democrats, aided by rulings from Speaker Cobb and Democratic control of crucial committees, had blocked a separate vote on California in order to give the Senate time to pass the omnibus. Once the omnibus was shattered, they sought the same objective by putting the territorial and Texas bills on the House agenda before the California bill, which would certainly pass if it ever came to a vote. The continuing need to prevent the Texas legislature from launching an attack against Santa Fe, moreover, made passage of the Senate's Texas bill compromisers' top priority.⁵⁶

Stopping the northern majority from admitting California through procedural manipulations was one thing. Passing the Texas and territorial bills was another, for that required winning support from hostile Northerners. The Free Soilers and many northern Whigs adamantly objected to the Utah and New Mexico bills because of the absence of the Proviso, but, as in the Senate, the real sticking point was Texas. Since many southern Democrats could be expected to oppose Pearce's bill as a rape of slave territory, northern votes were absolutely essential to get it through. A few northern Whigs were willing to pass it in order to spare the Fillmore administration an armed confrontation with Texas, but most abhorred it as a sellout of free soil. More important, numerous northern Democrats, unlike their counterparts in the Senate, initially vowed to defeat the Texas bill. Ideologically imbued with a hatred of the money power and anything that smacked of privilege, they detested the payoff to speculators in Texas bonds and the shame-lessly blatant lobbying by agents of the Texas bondholders on the floor of the House itself.⁵⁷

With some southern Democratic opposition assured and northern Democratic support doubtful, the backing of northern Whigs became essential, and Fillmore's administration strove to secure it. Personally directing that campaign, Webster met almost daily in strategy sessions with procompromise Whigs, the most important of whom were Congressmen William Duer, a Fillmorite from New York, and George Ashmun, Webster's chief lieutenant in the Massachusetts delegation. Truman Smith, who as national campaign chairman in 1848 had provided funds and documents to many of the targeted Whig congressmen, also frequented the House floor to press for settlement. Elbridge G. Spaulding, the Sewardite Whig from Buffalo, attested to the effectiveness of this onslaught. Denouncing Pearce's Texas bill as an outrageous concession to the South, he bitterly complained, "We are very much cut and divided up without concert of action and consequently not effective in anything we undertake. . . . The Administration hits back upon the progressive Whigs in New York through its papers and patronage and I come in for my full share of it." 58

While the administration pressured northern Whigs to support the Texas and territorial measures, the House's Democratic leadership hit upon an extraordinarily astute strategy to enhance the chances of their passage. Recognizing that numerous northern Whigs wanted the Texas boundary question settled but opposed the organization of territorial governments, while northern and southern Democrats wanted the territorial bills but opposed Pearce's Texas trade-off, Linn Boyd, chairman of the Committee on Territories, abetted by John McClernand, Douglas' Illinois ally, and Speaker Cobb, moved to combine the Texas and New Mexico bills into a single measure that was immediately dubbed the "little omnibus."59 The label was appropriate, for if Boyd was successful, the new bill would create the same tensions inherent in its Senate namesake. Since Democrats controlled the House and insisted that it dispose of Boyd's motion before it considered California statehood or anything else, they could force the hand of those who recoiled from the trap Boyd had laid. In a single brilliant stroke the Kentuckian upset the calculations of northern Whigs like Winthrop and Davis, who expected the House to admit California and settle the Texas boundary while blocking territorial bills, thereby presumably leaving Mexico's antislavery statutes in the rest of the Cession intact.

Boyd's artful motion ignited nine days of emotional debate, dramatically close roll-call votes, and frantic maneuvering for advantage. On September 2, Boyd managed to make his motion the continuing order of the day, but two days later the House moved to bury it by sending the proposal to the Committee of the Whole on a razor-thin vote of 101–100. This tense roll call provided a vivid index of pro- and anticompromise sentiment. Northern Democrats opposed referral in order to save Boyd's little omnibus by a vote of 14–27, as did southern Whigs unanimously, 0–27. In contrast, southern Democrats split evenly, 28–27. Free Soilers unanimously favored referral to kill the compromise, while northern Whigs divided 49–19 in favor. One-fourth of the seventy-six northern Whigs in the House, in short, were prepared to support Boyd's bill and compromise. This group included ten New Yorkers, two Massachusetts men, and four Pennsylvanians, precisely the delegations on whom Fillmore and Webster had exerted the most pressure. 60

Compromisers then snatched victory from the jaws of defeat by immediately passing a motion to reconsider referral, 104–103, with Speaker Cobb himself casting the tie-breaking vote, and on the second roll call referral itself was defeated by a single vote. Five men switched their votes to carry the motion to reconsider: two of Cobb's fellow Georgia Democrats, New York's lone Democratic representative, another Whig from that state, and an Ohio Whig. The arm-twisting by the administration, now working with the House's Democratic leadership, was being felt.

With Boyd's initiative revived but not vet adopted, crucial efforts were made to amend it. Inexplicably ignored by most previous historians, the most crucial was an amendment offered by a Whig, the Georgian Toombs. 61 Toombs' proposed amendment would have fundamentally altered the legal status of slavery in New Mexico, and it marked a final effort to upstage his Georgia rival Berrien. Throughout the session, Berrien had argued the Calhounite position that the Constitution established the right to own slaves in all federal territories and that no local or federal statutes were necessary to secure that right. Thus he had voted for both the Utah and New Mexico bills in the Senate, even though both in their final form had been stripped of his amendment barring territorial legislatures from establishing or prohibiting slavery and instead once again gave those bodies authority over "all rightful subjects of legislation." More important, Berrien had supported the territorial bills even though Jefferson Davis' move explicitly to repeal Mexico's antislavery statutes throughout the Cession had been defeated. Those votes, Toombs reckoned, left Berrien vulnerable to a proslavery flanking maneuver.

Earlier in the session, both Toombs and Stephens had attempted to expose Berrien's position as inadequately proslavery by demanding a federal slave code in New Mexico and Utah, a demand that had no chance whatsoever of passing. Now, in September, Toombs turned to an even more ingenious alternative. In its entirety his amendment to Boyd's proposed Texas-New Mexico bill read:

That no citizen of the United States shall be deprived of his life, liberty, or property in said Territory [New Mexico], except by the judgement of his peers and the laws of the land; and that the constitution of the United States, and such statutes thereof as may not be locally inapplicable, and the common law, as it existed in the British colonies of North America until the 4th day of July, 1776, shall be the exclusive laws of said Territory upon the subject of African slavery, until altered by the proper authority. 62

The potential significance of this amendment cannot be exaggerated. The Senate bills for New Mexico and Utah already extended the Constitution and applicable United States statutes to them, as well as granting their territorial legislatures authority over "all rightful subjects of legislation." The key to Toombs' amendment was the application of common law as it stood prior to the Declaration of Independence, for, according to common law, slavery had been legal in all of the American colonies prior to that date. It was a brilliantly imaginative stroke. Where Jefferson Davis had failed to nullify Mexico's antislavery statutes in the Senate, Toombs moved explicitly to replace them with proslavery common law rulings that would have "exclusive" jurisdiction over slavery in the territory. Thus he would legalize slavery in New Mexico, which Northerners and the residents of New Mexico itself considered free soil. By insisting that only some "proper authority," rather than the territorial legislature, could alter that proslavery law, moreover, Toombs seemed to narrow the grant of authority to those legislatures in the Senate bill, at least as that grant pertained to slavery. In short, his amendment would not only legalize slavery; it would inhibit popular sovereignty by barring elected territorial legislators from acting against slavery.

Northerners in the House immediately recognized the proslavery consequences of Toombs' amendment, and their response was just as ingenious as his motion. One moved successfully to divide the proposed amendment at the semicolon after 'land' and to vote on the two parts separately. The second or common law clause was summarily crushed by a vote of 134–64. Every northern representative except one Democrat voted to defeat it. Nine Southerners, seven Democrats and two Whigs, joined the majority, but every other Southerner who cast a vote supported the second clause. The muscle of the North in the House of Representatives had at last been flexed.

Equally important, by a voice vote, the House then adopted the first clause of Toombs' amendment, and it was part of the Texas-New Mexico statute the House passed on September 6, although similar wording was never added to the Utah bill. Without the second clause, Toombs' amendment had decisively antislavery implications. It stated flatly that any Southerner who dared settle in New Mexico could be deprived of his slave property by the "laws of the land." To many men, including Southerners like Jefferson Davis and Toombs who had tried unsuccessfully to repeal or explicitly replace them, those laws could be Mexico's abolition statutes. Just as important, the wording strongly implied that the territorial legislature of New Mexico could abolish or prohibit slavery by law. However vague the popular sovereignty provisions of the Compromise of 1850 may seem to some historians, very few of whom have even noted Section 19 of the Texas-New Mexico statute, most congressmen had to have believed that New Mexico's territorial legislature was empowered to bar slavery. 63

Although the first part of Toombs' amendment was adopted, Boyd's proposal to combine New Mexico and Texas itself still faced tough sledding. It was passed on September 5, 107–99, defeated on the third reading the same day, 99–107, resurrected the following morning, and finally passed on September 6, 107–99. On all of these votes every southern Whig except Clingman, who had cast his lot with anticompromise southern Democrats, supported Boyd's measure. On each vote, northern Whigs opposed it by a two-to-one margin, but between twenty and twenty-six northern Whigs voted to keep it alive. On the final vote of passage, twenty-two northern Whigs supported the bill, forty-five opposed, and seven abstained. As in the Senate, northern Whigs who could have killed the bill with negative votes instead supplied the critical margin to pass it.⁶⁴

Analysis of this final vote reveals where the administration's pressure took its greatest toll, for there is no doubt that northern Whigs who supported Boyd's measure betrayed their colleagues and their previous pledges never to allow territorial governments without the Proviso. As a furious Pennsylvania Whig wrote Seward on September 1, "If the territorial bills pass without the proviso, the Whig party is ruined—free soil will then be the cry from one end to the other." New York's thirty-two Whigs split thirteen to sixteen against the measure with three abstentions, including the harried Sewardite Spaulding. All five Whig congressmen from New York City and Brooklyn backed the measure, as did upstate Fillmorites like Duer, Robert Rose, and Hugh White. Perhaps the most surprising positive vote was that of Abraham Schermerhorn of Rochester, who had previously operated with Seward's faction. That Schermerhorn buckled under pressure is clear, for he was facing a strong challenge from the Fillmorite organization in Rochester to his renomination at precisely the time the House voted, and only after he voted with the compromisers did the Fillmore men allow his renomination. Four Pennsylvania Whigs and an Ohioan, who were Clay men, and four New England supporters of Webster—Samuel Eliot and James Duncan of Massachusetts, James Wilson of New Hampshire, and George King of Rhode Island—supplied the remaining northern Whig support for the bill.

Because of these northern Whig defections and surprisingly heavy southern Democratic support for Boyd's bill, partisan lines were scrambled in both sections. Northern Whigs opposed the little omnibus 22–45, while northern Democrats backed it 32–13. Southern Whigs approved it by a whopping 26–1 margin, while Democrats from Dixie narrowly opposed it, 26–30.67 In proportionate terms, as in the Senate, northern Democrats and southern Whigs provided the heaviest support for the compromise, but in each section enough Democrats and Whigs voted the same way to blur party lines.

Passage of the Texas-New Mexico bill (which easily cleared the Senate, 31–10, on September 9) facilitated quick action on the other compromise measures by the House.⁶⁸ On September 7, California statehood passed 150–56. Every northern representative who voted supported it, as did twenty-seven Southerners, sixteen of whom were Whigs. Thus a majority of southern Whigs openly voted for the admission of California, although no Whig from the Deep South did.⁶⁹ The Utah bill passed much more narrowly that same day, 97-85, with thirty-nine men failing to vote, at least twenty-six of whom had voted on the California bill only hours earlier. Only forty-one Northerners supported this prosouthern measure, ten of whom, including five Fillmorites from New York, were Whigs, while fortyseven northern Whigs voted against the bill. At the same time, however, the key to passage were the seventeen northern Whig abstainers, who, if they had cast negative votes, could have defeated it. Nine of those skulkers also hailed from New York, including the desperate Schermerhorn. Massachusetts and Pennsylvania supplied most of the rest, just as they did the other positive northern Whig votes for Utah. Again, the pressure from Fillmore and Webster had succeeded.

A week later the House took up the final two bills. Given its northern majority, it passed the Fugitive Slave Act by the surprisingly large margin of 109–76. Even the thirty-six abstainers probably could not have reversed this outcome had they all voted, for their numbers included Southerners who would have undoubtedly supported the legislation. Nonetheless, the pattern on this roll call again illustrates the heavy pressure brought to bear on northern Whigs to support, or passively allow passage of, the compromise measures. Only thirty-one Northerners supported what was clearly the most proslavery piece of the compromise package. Only two of those thirty-one were Whigs—Samuel Eliot, a Webster loyalist who had replaced Winthrop in Boston's seat, and John L. Taylor, a native of Virginia, who represented a district in southern Ohio—while forty-nine northern Whigs (97 percent of those who voted) opposed the bill. Hence outright northern backing for the Fugitive Slave Law came overwhelmingly from Democrats, not Whigs. Nonetheless, twenty northern Whigs, including eleven New Yorkers, three Pennsylvanians, and three Massachusetts men, did not vote, while New Hampshire's Wilson, Webster's puppet, resigned his seat three days prior to the vote. A few of these men were probably away from Washington—the session, after all, had dragged on to an unprecedented length—but the others, notably Fillmorites like Bokee, Duer, Rose, Brooks, White, and Underhill, simply ducked the vote. They would not or dared not oppose a measure the administration wanted passed, and after the vote, Thaddeus Stevens sarcastically sneered that a page be sent to tell these cowards that they could return to the House floor.

Enactment of the law abolishing the District of Columbia's slave market by a 124–59 margin on September 17 was an anticlimax. Every Northerner who voted predictably supported the bill, and thus every negative vote came from the South. Only four Southerners—two Democrats and two Whigs, the more notable of whom was Tennessee's Gentry—dared to vote for this antislavery measure. Sectional solidarity was virtually complete; partisan differences within the two sections' delegations were nonexistent.

As well he might, Millard Fillmore exulted over the final passage of the compromise bills, which he quickly signed. "The long agony is over," he crowed to Hamilton Fish on September 9. "Though these several acts are not in all respects what I could have desired, yet I am rejoiced at their passage." He was especially pleased that "their success is not owing to any party or section, but portions from both parties & all parts of the Union, have united in their passage." Clay and Webster also exalted the bipartisan support for the compromise measures. Clay repeatedly contended that he had found Democrats like Cass more reliable than Whigs, and at the end of September, Webster congratulated Dickinson, the New York Democrat who had unwaveringly supported the Compromise. Waxing nostalgic about "our companionship in the Senate," Webster gushed, "The more I have known of you, the greater has been my esteem for your character & respect for your talents. But it is your noble, able, manly & patriotic conduct, in support of the great measures of this session, which has entirely won my heart, & secured my highest regard."

The delight of Fillmore, Clay, and Webster that Democrats had joined Whigs in support of the Compromise was genuine and generous. But it had ominous implications for the Whig party. It suggested a propensity to embrace pro-Compromise Democrats at the expense of anti-Compromise Whigs. It betokened an acquiescence in, indeed a desire for, a cessation of partisan conflict that could—and would—ultimately undermine the appeal of the Whig party to the electorate. Interparty combat had always been the nutrient that nourished the Whig party. Programmatic conflict with the Democrats had allowed it to mobilize and retain voting support. Cessation of partisan conflict, therefore, would first enervate and then kill the party.

VI

Cooperation between Fillmore's administration and Democratic senators like Dickinson and Cass extended beyond common support for the compromise measures. The administration also sought help from Democratic senators to resolve intraparty patronage disputes. Though the administration clearly threatened some Whig congressmen directly about patronage decisions, it ultimately expected Democratic senators, not Whig cabinet members, to serve as the administration's hatchet men.

Of all the decisions that confronted Millard Fillmore upon becoming president, none had greater potential for irreparably splitting the Whig party and none seemed less susceptible to a compromise solution than what he did regarding subcabinet-level appointments. Legions of Whigs had been offended by Taylor's choices, and Fillmore, Hall, and Webster had been personally humiliated in their home states. Fillmore had full constitutional authority to sack jobholders who had already been confirmed by the Senate, but those still unconfirmed presented an even more tempting target. By mid-July, the Senate had not yet acted on hundreds of nominations Taylor had made months earlier. For a variety of reasons, ranging from sloth to incompetence to calculated pressure on nominees' congressional sponsors, moreover, the names of hundreds of additional interim appointees had not yet been submitted to that body. Fillmore could reverse Taylor's choices, appease the vengeful, and shift the balance of factional power within the party simply by withdrawing the former, withholding the latter, and replacing both groups with his own favorites.

Little wonder that Whigs of every variety anticipated a reign of terror as soon as Fillmore and his new cabinet turned their attention to patronage. As Thomas Ewing's son delicately phrased it, "The ascension of Mr. Fillmore will to a great extent give prominence to a class of men different from the materiel of the present [Taylor] administration." Winners under Taylor like Weed and Seward feared an all-out war of proscription against their friends. Former losers demanded a "clean sweep" of federal offices, instant decapitation of the remaining Democratic jobholders, and the replacement of Taylor's choices with different Whigs. Reverdy Johnson's enemies in Maryland, for example, clamored for a purge of the Baltimore customs house once Johnson left the cabinet. Similarly, with Clayton and Meredith, who had championed Governor Johnston's favorites for federal sinecures in Pennsylvania, forced into retirement, Johnston's Whig enemies from that state, including Senator Cooper, implored Fillmore to withdraw the nominations of Johnston's most obnoxious lackeys, particularly James Johnston, the governor's brother, to whom Clayton had given the lucrative consulship at Glasgow, and William D. Lewis, Philadelphia's customs collector, whose preference for nativists and newcomers at the expense of veteran Whigs when hiring subordinates was described as "Paradise for Natives, purgatory for Whigs, and hell for an Irish Catholick [sic]." From Michigan to Massachusetts and Maine rose the same refrain: the heads of Taylor's choices must roll and different, presumably better, Whigs must replace them.72

Understandably, New York's anti-Weed Whigs clamored most loudly for Fillmore to axe their rivals, and, just as understandably, Fillmore dearly wanted to make amends for his failure to secure positions for friends like John Collier or to stop Spaulding from naming Buffalo's customs collector and postmaster. Placing Hall in his cabinet began to balance the books, but his vindictive allies regarded that appointment as only a down payment. As elsewhere, state and district nominating conventions were impending in New York, and Weed's enemies saw federal patronage as the key to controlling the party organization. Hence they demanded further retribution. One, citing "the vital importance of securing this most favorable occasion to so fortify yourself in this great State" against the "corrupt and tyrannical regency" of Weed and Seward, urged Fillmore to purge as many Sewardites as possible. Others singled out U.S. Marshal Kellogg and individual postmasters for eradication. Of particular concern to Fillmore personally were Isaac Harrington, the postmaster, and Levi Allen, the customs collector, in Buffalo. Not only had their nominations mortified him, but his law partner, Solomon G. Haven, whom Fillmore was desperately trying to recruit to run against Spaulding for the Whig congressional nomination in 1850, refused to make that race unless Fillmore personally and instantly removed Harrington and Allen.⁷³

Aside from avenging insults and gaining offices for themselves, New York's conservatives wanted Fillmore to exert forceful leadership to dispel his embarrassing, namby-pamby image of "timidity." "The withdrawal of one or two appointments in this State," they urged, "would strike terror in the whole corps of officials holding of the general Government and bring them to the support of the administration." Solomon G. Haven, for example, emphatically advised with regard to axing Harrington and Allen: "Do not get rid of these men by the action or aid of the Senate. Of all things avoid that." Fillmore, in short, could not pass the buck. To gain credit as leader of the anti-Weed Whigs, he would have to do his own dirty work."

Yet Fillmore refused to be a mere factional leader or tool for soreheads bent on revenge. He sincerely—and, some of his allies would say, naively—hoped to reunite, not further divide, the party in New York and in the nation. He realized that any spree of retaliation would so divide the party that it would lose the fall elections, and he would then be blamed for the defeats. Front men for Weed and Seward like Governor Hamilton Fish and Comptroller Washington Hunt warned him not to touch Taylor's appointees in New York, and even some of his own friends agreed. Alex Mann, editor of the pro-Fillmore Rochester American, advised "the utmost forbearance and conciliation" because "we shall need all our strength" in the fall. Similarly, in contrast to Solomon Haven's demand that Fillmore himself replace Allen and Harrington, another Buffalo Fillmorite counseled that "the Senate will gratify your desires & cut off both these men. But if not, will not more be perilled by seeming too bloody than gained by exercising this high prerogative in both cases?" ⁷⁷⁵

Equally important, Fillmore believed that a middle course that could restore party harmony and still pressure Whig congressmen into supporting the Compromise was possible. To salve his pride and indicate his willingness to decapitate foes if necessary, he would make a very few symbolic removals of Taylor's appointees. To avoid alienating the majority of those men and their champions, however, he would do nothing about their nominations himself and instead would rely on Senate Democrats to reject them. To find jobs immediately for the regulars who had been shortchanged by Taylor, he would do two things. First, he would put the nominations of Whigs that had been held up by Taylor's cabinet, especially the favorites of pro-Compromise Whigs, on a fast track for Senate confirmation. Second, he would sack not the Whigs appointed by Taylor, but the Democrats whom Taylor had stupidly and stubbornly allowed to retain office, and he would replace them almost exclusively with regular Whigs who endorsed the administration's support for the Compromise. By firing Democrats, he could win popularity among Whigs of every variety. As Washington Hunt wrote him, Sewardites could hardly complain if their factional rivals got the bulk of new appointments so long as Fillmore allowed them to retain the jobs Taylor had allocated.⁷⁶

During a two-week period beginning on July 31, Fillmore demonstrated the potential of this plausible strategy. In his first message to the Senate regarding patronage, he withdrew Taylor's appointee as customs collector for the Miami District of Ohio and nominated his own man, undoubtedly a friend of new Treasury Secretary Corwin, who meant to demonstrate that he, not Ewing, was now in charge of Ohio's jobs. More important, he recalled Levi Allen's nomination for customs collector in Buffalo and replaced him with his friend William Ketchum. That single action had almost as great an impact as Fillmore could have hoped. The previously hostile and supercilious Spaulding retreated, lest Fillmore also execute Harrington, whose backing Spaulding needed in his struggle with Haven for the congressional nomination. Hence, when the House voted on the compromise measures in September, Spaulding prudently abstained rather than join other Sewardite Whigs in opposition. Upon learning of Allen's decapitation, another panic-stricken Sewardite from Buffalo gasped, "Much has been said of the timid and noncommittal character of Mr. F. It will be found in one season that he will be neither timid nor noncommittal in the matter of pursuing his own fortunes."

A week later, Fillmore, with Webster's concurrence, nominated Daniel D. Barnard, a prominent procompromise Albany conservative and an opponent of Weed, to the most prestigious foreign post still to be filled, the mission to Prussia, which Taylor, to the widespread indignation of Whigs, had allowed Democratic exSenator Edward Hannegan of Indiana to retain. The symbolism of rewarding Weed's enemies in eastern as well as western New York was clear to all. Fillmore, indeed, relied heavily on foreign appointments to make amends to Whigs who had been shunned by Taylor. Later in August, for example, he offered his friend Collier the consulship to Equador, and when the gratified Collier turned it down, Fillmore tendered the post to an Indianan named Cushing specifically to soothe a state that felt shortchanged by Taylor.⁷⁸

Most of Fillmore's new nominations between the end of July and the adjournment of Congress on September 30 went to southern Whigs. Because most southern Whig congressmen backed the compromise, replacing Democrats in the South with their friends rewarded them. Patronage could also swing recalcitrant southern Whigs in a procompromise direction. One reason the formerly anticompromise Berrien voted for the procompromise position on most of the individual measures in August was probably his hope that Fillmore would appoint Charles Jenkins to his cabinet. Florida's Whig Congressman Edward Carrington Cabell, one of the six bolters from the Whig caucus, to give another example, repeatedly clashed with Taylor's cabinet over Florida's appointments, and in part because of Fillmore's new appointments for Florida, in early September, during the procedural votes to merge Texas and New Mexico into the little omnibus and on passage of that measure itself, Cabell voted down the line for the compromise.⁷⁹

Fillmore also greased the skids for quick Senate approval of procompromise Whigs whose nominations had been held up by Taylor's cabinet or the Senate's Democratic majority. The only Taylor appointee in Massachusetts allied with

Daniel Webster, aside from his son Fletcher, was Franklin Haven, the designated subtreasurer in Boston. To punish Webster for his procompromise course, Taylor's cabinet refused to submit Haven's name to the Senate, and Haven had become frantic by the time of Taylor's death. On August 14, after the Senate passed the Texas and California bills, Fillmore sent in Haven's name. The following day, after passage of the New Mexico bill, Haven was confirmed, on the motion of Dickinson, chairman of the finance committee and Webster's procompromise ally, whereas hundreds of other nominees whose names had been submitted the previous winter still awaited action. As soon as Haven was approved, moreover, Dickinson moved and won confirmation of John Young, the subtreasurer in New York City, Fillmore's ally against Weed and Seward and Dickinson's neighbor from Binghamton, New York. The quid pro quo between the Fillmore administration and Dickinson—and the lesson to Whigs in the House who still had to vote on the compromise measures—could not have been clearer.⁸⁰

Finally, the administration possessed one other bargaining chip with which to reward pro-Compromise Whigs. Patronage decisions involving personnel—at least for the jobs with the best salaries and most political clout—required Senate approval. Federal printing contracts that could provide vital financial sustenance to Whig newspapers did not, and pro-Compromise editorials from a Whig congressman's home paper could make a procompromise vote seem much safer. By mid-August, Webster was pressuring his cabinet colleagues to switch contracts for printing departmental notices from William Schouler's anticompromise Boston Atlas to procompromise Whig papers in Boston—the Courier, the Bee, and the Advertiser. He was hardly alone in spotting the opportunity. Almost as soon as Fillmore took office, his conservative allies in New York sought federal printing business for the Albany State Register, which had been denied it under Taylor. In September the federal officers in Detroit switched their printing from the anti-Compromise Detroit Tribune to the pro-Compromise Detroit Advertiser, and a similar scenario among Whig papers unfolded in Pittsburgh, where the procompromise Daily Commercial Journal replaced the anti-Compromise Gazette as the recipient of federal largesse.81

On the whole, however, while Congress remained in session, Fillmore bent over backward not to punish anti-Compromise Whigs himself in order to preserve party harmony. Most printing contracts were switched from anti- to pro-Compromise Whig newspapers only after Congress adjourned, and the salient fact about the situation in New York is that conservatives had to beg the administration to give printing business to the State Register rather than getting it automatically. Between July 31 and September 30, the final day of the session, when Fillmore made another dramatic move in New York, no other nominations were withdrawn to coerce Whig votes in the House and Senate.

In northern states other than New York, Fillmore's actions were especially erratic and counterproductive. Although he eschewed removals for political reasons, his administration was ruthless in dispatching Whigs whom it suspected of fraud or malfeasance in office. For example, Alex Irvin, the U.S. marshal in western Pennsylvania and a crony of the anti-Compromise Governor Johnston, was fired because of illegal activities. Rather than allowing Senator James Cooper's pro-Compromise allies to name the replacement or even soliciting the opinion of western Pennsylvania Whigs, however, Fillmore, incredibly, replaced Irvin with his own brother William, who spelled his last name Irwin. Even Pennsylvania Whigs who shared Johnston's dislike of the Compromise criticized the move as a transparent attempt to cover up a scandal, a blunder that would doom the prospects of Whig congressional candidates throughout western Pennsylvania by handing Democrats the corruption issue on a golden platter. Richard Wilson, Taylor's nominee for postmaster in Chicago, was also removed for peculation, even though editor Lisle Smith, a friend of both Webster and Clay, protested that the move would devastate friends of the administration in northern Illinois. In contrast, when Oliver Hyde, the Sewardite nominee for customs collector in Detroit and a known leader of the antislavery, anti-Compromise Whigs in Michigan, also had charges of impropriety lodged against him, Corwin refused to sack him to make way for a pro-Compromise Whig. "I thought it best to let him take his trial in the Senate," Corwin explained to Fillmore. "I took it for granted you did not wish to withdraw a nomination of yr. predecessor unless cogent reasons impelled such a step. I feel quite sure the Senate will reject him."

Here was the key to the administration's calculated leniency toward intraparty foes and anti-Compromise Whigs. The best way to preserve party harmony, Fillmore believed, was not to fire Taylor's appointees but instead to allow the Democratically controlled Senate to dismiss all those Whigs whom he and his allies found objectionable. As early as July 15, Fillmore wrote to a friend that he had determined to wait for the Senate to reject, rather than personally to remove, Taylor's nominees for New York and elsewhere. ⁸³ If he had indeed made up his mind by then, it is signficant, for by July 15, Fillmore had not yet picked a cabinet or decided to support the congressional compromise. In other words, Fillmore's decision to duck the responsibility of leadership and rely on Senate Democrats may have been one of the factors that brought him to support the compromise since the Democrats he depended upon, like Dickinson and Cass, were its ardent proponents.

Fillmore's reliance on Senate Democrats to punish his intraparty enemies produced some curious circumstances. The ruthless Hall fired postmasters at will on the suspicion of malfeasance, but he could not touch a hair on the heads of Sewardite postmasters he hated—Isaac Harrington in Buffalo, William Jackson in Syracuse, Thomas Clowes in Troy, or Lewis Benedict in Albany. Instead, just as when Taylor was alive and Fillmore had no influence on appointments, all Hall could do was to cajole Fillmore to make sure that Dickinson stayed in line. Thus on September 2, he frantically telegraphed Fillmore from Buffalo: "I think that you had better see Senator Dickinson personally in reference to Benedict & Harrington. They must not be confirmed if it is possible to prevent it." The situation was not just bizarre; it was surreal. The postmaster general of the United States was telling the president of the United States to crawl to a senator from the opposing party to stop the confirmation of postmasters they had every right to replace themselves.⁸⁴

Similarly, Webster loathed most of Taylor's appointees in Massachusetts, especially Charles Hudson, the naval officer at Boston; Philip Greely, Jr., the customs collector there; and George Lunt, the legal lightweight who had been appointed U.S. attorney instead of his son Fletcher. His friends expected the administration to withdraw those nominations, and Webster repeatedly warned Fillmore that they were antislavery Whigs who sided with Weed and Seward. But he was powerless to axe them. Greely's ''nomination will not be recalled, and how it will fare in the Senate, I know not,'' he sighed to a friend on September 15 85

As Webster indicated, the administration had no guarantees that procompromise Democratic senators would or could marshal Senate majorities to reject the men pro-Compromise Whigs found most obnoxious. As it turned out, in fact, the great majority of Seward's allies in New York and of anti-Compromise Whigs in Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and other northern states were confirmed rather than rejected when the Senate finally voted on them. Those eventually approved included Hudson, Greely, and Lunt from Massachusetts; Oliver Hyde and Charles Babcock from Michigan; Harrington, Clark, Kellogg, Clowes, and Jackson from New York; and Governor Johnston's subalterns in Pennsylvania, including Philadelphia Customs Collector William D. Lewis, whom Senator James Cooper had devoted the entire congressional session to defeating by voting in lapdog fashion with Democrat Daniel Sturgeon. By relying on Senate Democrats, rather than acting directly by withholding or withdrawing nominations, in sum, the administration muffed an opportunity to intimidate anti-Compromise Whigs and bolster its supporters.

In addition, Senate Democrats' postponement of action on the most controversial appointments until the last two weeks of September deprived the administration's supporters in crucial states like Massachusetts and New York of a vital resource in the intraparty battle for control of nominating conventions. Without removals or rejections, pro-Compromise Whigs could neither get control of federal offices themselves in time to influence the selection of delegates nor intimidate the Taylorite incumbents into acquiescing to their wishes regarding nominees and platforms. Worse still from the administration's perspective, some of the nominees held up by the Democrats were its own supporters who refused to participate in the struggle to pack conventions for fear that their Whig enemies would then engineer their rejection by the Senate.

One reason Webster rued his inability to get Hudson and Greely removed before the Senate acted on them in late September, for example, was that the Massachusetts Whig state convention was scheduled for October 1. Convinced, with reason, that at least half of the state committee opposed him and the Compromise, he feared that without action from Washington to chasten the state's antislavery Whigs, the influence of Schouler's Atlas and the federal officeholders would be used to secure a platform that endorsed "the insane conduct of Northern men in Congress" and drove "the Whig party of Massachusetts to the very brink of utter separation from all other Whigs." When the Senate confirmed rather than rejected Greely on September 24, therefore, all the desperate Webster could do was to beg his friend Edward Everett to go to the convention in Worcester and "make a speech & nationalize the Whig party." "87

Similarly, district conventions to nominate congressional candidates were scheduled to meet in New York during the middle two weeks of September, and the state convention was slated for Syracuse at the end of the month. Both Fillmore's conservative Whig allies and the Seward-Weed Whigs who competed to control those gatherings knew that patronage holders could order their employees to attend and promise future employment to sway other delegates. The intimidation produced by Fillmore's axing of Levi Allen and appointment of Daniel

Barnard was enough to give the conservatives leverage in some districts. As even Solomon Haven admitted, the penurious Isaac Harrington, fearful that he too would be sacked, remained neutral in the race between Haven and Spaulding for the Buffalo nomination, while Ketchum, Fillmore's replacement for Levi Allen, used promises of customs house jobs to fill the local convention with Haven's friends. Deprived of the necessary support of federal officeholders, Spaulding announced his withdrawal from the race even before the convention met. Fillmorites had enough clout in the Rochester district to force Congressman Abraham Schermerhorn to cast pro-Compromise votes as the price of renomination, and they gave Weed's friends concern in other districts as well.⁸⁸

Fillmore's conservative allies, however, remained at a distinct disadvantage in the struggle to control the state convention. For one thing, Hugh Maxwell, the customs collector in New York City, who had enormous potential influence over delegates because of his ability to hire subordinates in that metropolis, Brooklyn, and the Hudson Valley as far north as Albany, refused to use that influence until he won Senate confirmation, for he feared that Seward would secure his rejection if he did. Lacking the personal and political ties to Dickinson of his assertive ally, Young, to obtain fast action, Maxwell was not confirmed until September 26, the very day the state convention opened.⁸⁹

With Maxwell neutralized during most of September and Young himself in direct control of only a few subordinates, conservative Whigs had few weapons with which to counteract Sewardite control of postmasterships, U.S. attorneyships, and the marshals' offices, to say nothing of state jobs. Thus, the closer the convention approached, the louder conservatives screamed for Fillmore to sack Lewis Benedict in order to send a signal to the delegates. "Nobody will take pains to be on the side of the Administration, if those opposed to it are as safe and as well off as its friends," wrote the frantic Jerome Fuller. Fillmore's attempt to preserve party harmony by relying on the Senate was only encouraging "Albany Slanderers" like Weed and Benedict to "boast that the administration dare not remove" Benedict, "a Seward abolitionist Whig, and as such not only opposed to you personally but to your administration."

Despite this rising crescendo, Fillmore steadfastly refused to decapitate Benedict or anyone else prior to the meeting of the Whig state convention. Genuinely committed to preserving party harmony and reassured by Washington Hunt, Fish, and others that Weed too wanted unity, Fillmore would do nothing to threaten it. Only when the Whig convention openly ruptured and when the Sewardite majority adopted a platform that intentionally insulted him did Fillmore retaliate. On September 30, two days after the state convention adjourned and the final day of the congressional session, Fillmore withdrew the nomination of the still unconfirmed Benedict and replaced him with James Kidd, the wealthy Albany conservative who had helped fund the Albany State Register. Kidd, in turn, was immediately confirmed.⁹¹

The dramatic last-minute decapitation of Lewis Benedict reflected Fillmore's recognition that his alliance with Democrats had limits on patronage matters, that his conciliatory efforts to restore intraparty harmony had failed, and that he had to harm opponents in order to help his friends. Equally important, Benedict's removal was not intended to secure congressional votes for the compromise measures, as earlier patronage actions had been. All of those bills had already been signed into law. Rather, as with subsequent firings, it was explicitly meant to punish intraparty enemies who would not cease their opposition to the Compromise even after it became the law of the land.

That New York's Whig state convention ruptured over the platform, not the ticket, and that Benedict became the target of Fillmore's wrath because he and his Sewardite allies refused to acquiesce in, let alone openly endorse, the administration's position on the Compromise signaled that factional warfare had entered a new and more deadly phase. Now conflict did not simply revolve around offices or pelf. Rather, supporters and opponents of the administration fought for the power to determine where the party stood on policy and whether it accepted the Compromise of 1850 as a final settlement of sectional strife over slavery. Benedict's sacking, like the concomitant switching of printing contracts in Detroit, Pittsburgh, and other cities, signaled that this was a battle the administration was determined not to lose.

VII

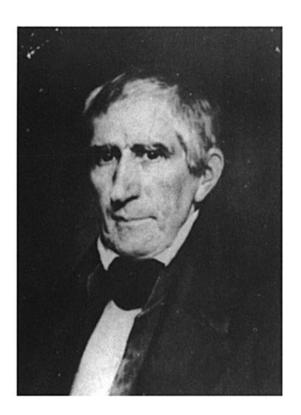

Millard Fillmore's accession to the presidency measurably contributed to the passage of the Compromise of 1850, but it failed to reunite the Whig party, as he had so dearly hoped in mid-July. In Congress and in many states Whigs remained deeply divided over the wisdom, fairness, and necessity of the Compromise, and those disagreements added a volatile policy dimension to long-standing intraparty factional rivalries. Fillmore knew perfectly well why most northern Whig congressmen felt compelled to vote against parts of the compromise package. To preserve as much party unity as possible, he forced his cabinet to eschew a jihad against them on patronage matters. As a payback for that restraint, they expected foes of the Compromise to exhibit similar solicitude for party unity once they had failed to prevent its enactment and to close ranks behind the administration that had treated them so benignly. From the administration's viewpoint, acceptance of the Compromise as a settlement of the four-year-old quarrel over the territories was necessary for the good of the nation and the survival of the Whig party's southern wing.

Across the North, however, most Whigs viewed endorsement of the Compromise as a betrayal of principles and a prescription for electoral disaster. It flouted commitments they had made to northern voters, and, they believed, it nullified their significant advantage over northern Democrats by aping the Democrats' pro-Compromise posture. To mobilize Whig voters and thus maintain the party's competitiveness in the North, such Whigs believed, they must denounce the Compromise as a Democratic sellout to the South even if that required repudiating the Whig administration, which rejoiced in its alliance with Democrats. Continued northern Whig resistance to the Compromise even after it became the law of the land, in turn, was something the Fillmore administration would not tolerate because it alienated southern Whigs, threatened intersectional comity within the Whig party, and, most important, endangered the Union.

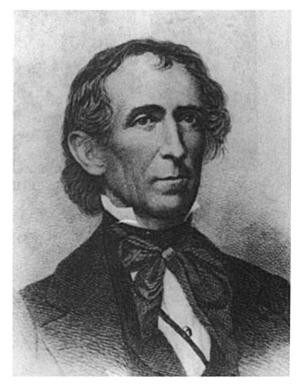

Both sides, in sum, considered open warfare for control of the party necessary to save it from extinction. Lewis Benedict was only the first of many casualties in that war, a conflict that raged until the national convention in the summer of 1852, and one that grew so bitter that increasing numbers of Whigs prepared to abandon the Whig party altogether rather than accept their rivals' victory. To counteract such divisive pressures from within, Whigs had always relied on external conflict with Democrats. For the first nine months of 1850, however, Whigs of every variety had openly joined with like-minded Democrats on both patronage and policy matters. Whether Whigs could still mobilize enough voters to carry elections with conflict between the parties apparently attenuated would be determined only by the elections themselves. When Congress finally adjourned on September 30, 1850, weary congressmen could, at long last, go home. For the Whig party, however, the "long agony" was far from over.

Chapter 16

"God Save Us from Whig Vice Presidents"

"IF THE COMPROMISE BILL SHOULD pass now and obtain the [President's] signature," Seward worried in late July 1850, "what will be the issue on which we go to the polls?" The shrewd New Yorker pinpointed northern Whigs' problem throughout Millard Fillmore's presidency. They could mobilize their voters only by differentiating themselves from Democrats. Fillmore's promotion of a measure backed overwhelmingly by northern Democrats could cripple them at the polls. When Fillmore signed the Compromise measures in September and the New York Democratic state platform endorsed them, therefore, Seward's New York allies instructed Weed that the Whigs' state platform must demand revision or repeal of every prosouthern concession Congress had made. Fillmore's pro-Compromise stance, like John Tyler's vetoes nine years earlier, must be publicly repudiated. "We must make war on this administration to save the Whig party from contempt and scorn."

Five days after New York's Whigs met, Daniel Webster penned the administration's response to this declaration of war. "If any considerable body of the Whigs in the North shall act in the spirit of the recent convention in New York," he told a friend, "a new arrangement of Parties is unavoidable." He understood why many northern Whigs opposed the compromise measures in Congress. Now that those bills had become laws, however, loyal Whigs should "resist all attempts at further agitation and disturbance, and make no efforts for another change." Any northern Whigs who "continue to talk about the Wilmot Proviso, and to resist, or seek to repeal the Fugitive Slave Bill, or use any other means to disturb the quiet of the Country" deserved excommunication. "The present administration will not recognize one set of Whig Principles for the North, and another for the South," Webster insisted. "That can be regarded as no Whig Party, in New York, or Mass., which espouses doctrines, and utters sentiments, hostile to the just, and Constitutional rights of the South, and therefore such as Southern Whigs cannot agree to."

Defining precisely the horns of the dilemma that confronted the Whig party, these salvos opened a battle between Fillmore's administration and its northern Whig critics that lasted from the fall of 1850 to the Whigs' national convention in June 1852. Longtime personal animosities and conflicting political ambitions helped fuel that clash. Fundamentally, however, it revolved around a dispute over how to carry elections, about whether the campaign needs of local Whigs should be placed ahead of intersectional comity within the nation and the national party and of support for the national administration.

Ι

Simply ignoring the Compromise and using other campaign issues against the Democrats in 1850 and 1851 was not a realistic option for northern Whigs. Still discounting southern threats of disunion, most of them personally detested its prosouthern concessions as an unnecessary surrender to Slave Power intimidation, and they knew that Free Soilers would court anti-Compromise voters if they themselves did not. Because northern Democrats endorsed the Compromise as a fair settlement, therefore, most northern Whigs wanted to trumpet their votes against it in Congress and to promise to gut its most obnoxious provisions as soon as possible. The new Fugitive Slave Act particularly repelled many Northerners. Aside from denying basic rights to blacks, many of whom had resided in the North as free men and women for years and still might be claimed as fugitives, the provisions of the act criminalizing aid to fugitives and fining anyone who refused to join in pursuing them struck Northerners as a Slave Power violation of their own rights. Blaming Democrats for that odious measure, these northern Whigs believed, would make an invincible platform.⁴

Conversely, southern Whigs, who recognized the seriousness of secessionism in a few slave states, sought to celebrate the Compromise for redressing southern grievances. They believed that their Democratic foes, by promoting the Nashville Convention and opposing the Compromise, had aligned themselves with disunionists. That Clay first proposed a comprehensive sectional compromise and that Fillmore's administration decisively embraced it enhanced Whig claims of paternity for the settlement and reinforced southern Whigs' conviction that they could win on a pro-Compromise platform. To ensure those expected triumphs and to undermine residual pockets of secessionist sentiment, however, Fillmore's administration would have to enforce the statutes that northern Whigs found most hateful.

Differing northern and southern Whig priorities whipsawed Fillmore's administration in 1850 and 1851. But he was equally concerned by another threat to his beloved Whig party. Responding to the confusion of party lines in Congress, some Whigs contemplated abandoning the party altogether and allying instead with like-minded Democrats in new coalitions for or against the Compromise. By the summer, talk of partisan realignment and reorganization because "the distinction between whig & democrat is rapidly passing away" and "the old party lines . . . could not be revived" was rampant in both the North and the South. Even Webster, who had always deplored the fierce partisanship of the past fifteen years and who lauded "the softening of political animosities" between pro-Compromise Whigs and Democrats in Congress, contemplated the creation of a new bipartisan Union organization should northern Whig state parties continue to oppose the Compromise.⁵

During Fillmore's presidency, therefore, Whigs had to do more than reconcile profound sectional differences over how best to compete against Democrats. Their party's very survival seemed at stake. To ward off the challenge of potential new parties, Whig politicians and voters alike had to be persuaded not to join them. That task required restoring sufficient internal unity and winning enough elections to maintain the Whig party as a credible competitive force. Again, the problem could be reduced to an essential core. How could fractious Whigs frame platforms on which they agreed that simultaneously distinguished them sufficiently from Democrats to mobilize Whig voters? On what issues would the Whigs go to the polls?

The administration's formula for preserving the national Whig party was crystal clear. It would no longer tolerate the previous unstated agreement between northern and southern Whigs to disagree about matters involving slavery, an implicit truce that had allowed the party to withstand sectional divisions since the 1830s. It would obviate the need for a new pro-Compromise Union party by proving that the national Whig party was pro-Union and pro-Compromise. Condemning attacks on the Compromise that most northern Whigs considered necessary to carry elections, it sought to keep anti-Compromise Whigs from writing party platforms, monopolizing party nominations, and controlling state party organizations. In doing so, it forced most northern Whigs to "make war on this administration to save the Whig party."

Whigs' common conviction that they must win the elections of 1850 and 1851 to preserve their party intact, therefore, fueled an increasingly brutal struggle between Fillmore's administration and its northern Whig opponents. Beginning in March and ending in November, the elections of 1850 had a cumulative and synergetic impact on the internal struggle for control of the Whig party. Whatever factors actually determined those contests, politicians interpreted them as running public opinion polls about developments in Washington. Losses early in 1850, therefore, made Whig leaders in other states all the more desperate to carry elections later in the year; all the more determined to write the platforms upon which, they believed, success depended; and, if they lost those platform battles, all the more willing to repudiate the product of the victors and to sabotage their chances of election. Both by reducing potential Whig turnout and by muddying exactly what Whigs, as a party, stood for and therefore how they differed from Democrats, such actions jeopardized Whig chances of mobilizing enough voters to win.

Further defeats in the fall of 1850, in turn, led to angry finger pointing, produced even more divisive struggles to control subsequent state conventions and legislative elections for United States senators, reinforced northern and southern Whigs' belief that they must put their own electoral success at home ahead of the needs of Whigs elsewhere, and provoked Fillmore's administration to wield its patronage powers against anti-Compromise elements in the party. This assault forced targeted Whigs to rally behind their own presidential candidate for 1852 to block Fillmore and Webster from the nomination. The battle among Whigs was so stark and its deleterious impact on Whig electoral fortunes between 1850 and 1852 so clear that one might easily overlook a crucial fact: Whigs alone had never determined their party's fate. Democratic actions had always decisively shaped it, and they did so again between 1850 and 1852.

Ħ

Whigs carried only four of the eleven states to vote before Congress adjourned on September 30, 1850. A fluke upset gave them one Democratic stronghold, but they lost two reliable, if closely contested, Whig states. Unique elements influenced the outcome in each of the eleven states, but their collective results shaped the behavior of Whig congressmen in Washington and increased the pressure Whigs felt to carry the October and November contests. They also widened the disagreement between northern and southern Whigs about how to do so.

Three New England states, where Whigs confronted Free Soilers as well as Democrats, and Virginia voted in the spring while Taylor was still alive and before Clay submitted his omnibus bill to the Senate. As usual, Whigs swept the legislative and gubernatorial contests in tiny Rhode Island, where the party staunchly backed Taylor's plan, Free Soilers were weak, and Democrats did not contest the reelection of incumbent Whig Governor Henry Anthony. This easy triumph reinforced the commitment of the state's Whig Senators Albert Greene and John H. Clarke to Taylor's plan. Conversely, Free Soilers' negligible strength and Whigs' apparently safe majority over Democrats also help explain why they felt free to abandon it after his death and to support the Texas boundary bill.6

Just as predictably, Whigs lost the Democratic Gibraltar of New Hampshire, but the dimension of their defeat and the tactics Democrats used to inflict it etched an indelible lesson for other northern Whigs. Incensed that Whig-Free Soil coalitions elected Amos Tuck, a Free Soiler, and James Wilson, a Whig, to the House of Representatives in 1849, New Hampshire Democrats determined in 1850 to outbid Whigs for Free Soil support. The Concord Patriot, Democrats' leading newspaper, endorsed Free Soiler Joseph Root's February resolution demanding immediate congressional organization of territorial governments with slavery explicitly prohibited and condemned Wilson and Robert C. Winthrop, the Whigs' recent speakership candidate, for allowing Root's motion to be tabled out of slavish loyalty to the slaveholder Taylor. Northern Democrats, it baldly lied, opposed slavery expansion more firmly than northern Whigs. With voters apparently content with Democratic state economic policies that year, Whigs were crushed. Their hapless gubernatorial candidate garnered only a third of the popular vote, and they lost nineteen seats in the state house of representatives, reducing their share to a pathetic 31 percent. New Hampshire's results, in short, suggested that a bare hint of appeasing the South could be political suicide in New England.⁷

Connecticut's April state election taught the same lesson, although there the muddying of the Whigs' message as much as Democratic brazenness produced the result. Unlike Rhode Island and New Hampshire, Connecticut was closely competitive, and Whigs had lost three of the state's four House seats in 1849. In 1850, however, Whigs considered it safe. Repudiating the previous year's alliance with Free Soilers, the Democratic state convention nominated doughface Thomas Seymour, a vociferous enemy of the Wilmot Proviso and antislavery men, for governor, while the state's most prominent Democratic editor, Alfred Burr of the Hartford Times, demanded prosouthern concessions in the Mexican Cession. With the state's Whig platform, its Whig press, and Whig Senators Roger Sherman Baldwin and Truman Smith firmly committed against any compromise that allowed slavery expansion west of Texas, Whigs held the high antislavery ground, just as they had in 1844, 1845, 1847, and 1848, when they won sweeping victories.

For various reasons, however, Whigs suffered a narrow but nonetheless shocking defeat. Regional jealousies continued to plague the party, reducing support for gubernatorial candidate Lafayette Foster outside of his own New London County. And as they had so successfully in 1846, Democrats also played the temperance issue like a drum. Roger Baldwin's wife, Emily, whose political zeal and acumen equaled those of any male in the Whig party, astutely, if biasedly, appraised the effectiveness of their two-faced strategy after the returns were in. "The democratic party had worked under all colors and been literally without principles in carrying the election," she reported. "Whatever was most popular in a town, that they seized. Temperance in some, all antitemperance in others. Allied with free soil in many places and in others joined against it and electing ... out and out ... proslavery [men]."

Most Whigs in Connecticut and beyond its borders attributed the defeat to the loss of Whigs' advantage on the slavery issue. And Whigs themselves, they admitted, helped blunt that edge. Connecticut's polls were open on April 1 and 2. By those dates, only one New England Whig had spoken in the Senate on the sectional controversy in time to have his speech printed in Connecticut's newspapers—Daniel Webster on March 7. Everyone in Washington knew that Baldwin and Truman Smith favored Taylor's plan, but Smith, an inept orator, shunned the Senate floor, and the frustrated Baldwin could not get it to make a speech until the end of March, when no time remained to circulate it before Connecticut's voters cast their ballots. Thus, even though Whig papers like the Hartford Courant flatly asserted that Webster's "ground is not that of the Whigs of Connecticut," Whig leaders blamed their senators' silence in March for allowing Democrats cynically to charge that Webster represented them and gleefully to contrast the votes cast for Root's resolution by Connecticut's three Democratic/Free Soil representatives with the refusal of Winthrop and other northern Whigs to support it.9 Democrats had gained only about 4,000 votes since 1849, but that was enough to give them a plurality of the popular vote and complete control of the legislature. It elected Seymour and blocked Baldwin's reelection to the Senate, forcing a postponement of that decision to 1851. 10 As in New Hampshire, in sum, Connecticut's Democrats outflanked the Whigs on the slavery issue, and, more than anything else, the loss of Connecticut convinced northern Whigs that identification with Webster's pro-Compromise position was political poison.

Whigs fared no better in the only slave state to vote that spring. While Virginia's Democrats won two-thirds majorities in the state senate, as they had in 1848 and 1849, their margin over Whigs in the house increased from six seats in 1848, when Whigs clutched Taylor's coattails, to eleven seats in 1849, shortly after Taylor was inaugurated and southern Whigs had refused to sign the Southern Address, to thirty seats in 1850, after Taylor had announced his plan for the territories and Virginia Democrats in both houses of Congress had taken a leading role in denouncing both it and Clay's initial proposals.

This trend certainly deterred most Virginia Whigs from embracing Taylor's policy, but they did not interpret the results as public endorsement of the extremist proslavery, anticompromise position assumed by some Virginia Democrats like James M. Mason. For one thing, other Virginia Democrats followed the lead of Thomas Ritchie in Washington and were promoting compromise before the election. For another, Webster's Seventh of March speech, unlike Clay's original proposals, was widely popular among Whigs and Democrats in Virginia. Thus, when Clay presented his more palatable omnibus bill, Virginia's Whigs enthusiastically backed it.

Nor did the elections turn primarily on what was transpiring in Congress. In the spring of 1850, apathy and anger about the continued retention of Democrats in the state's federal patronage posts drove down Whig turnout. More important, the state legislature had scheduled a public referendum during the legislative elections to decide whether a convention to revise the state constitution should be held later that year. Although Virginia's Whigs at the last minute had shifted their stance and now endorsed a convention, since the mid-1840s the party had opposed, while Democrats had advocated, constitutional revision. Thus the convention issue undoubtedly helped Democratic legislative candidates by bringing out proconvention Democratic voters. Whatever the exact causes of the Whigs' defeat, Virginia seemed to be slipping further and further beyond their reach.¹¹

By the time seven more states voted in August and September, conditions had changed. Taylor was dead; immediate statehood for New Mexico was a dead letter; Whigs and Democrats in the Senate had taken pro- and anticompromise positions on roll-call votes; and Fillmore, despite pleas from Whigs across the North to shun Clay, Webster, and compromise, was doing just the opposite. Five of these contests went according to form, but even they reinforced the divergent convictions of northern and southern Whigs about what was necessary to carry elections.

By the summer both parties in Kentucky, as in its sister border state of Maryland, were booming compromise. Because Kentucky had long been a Whig fiefdom, that consensus helped Whigs win the August legislative elections. Yet all was not well for Kentucky's Whigs. Ratified in May 1850 and due to take effect in 1851, a new state constitution gravely threatened Whigs' monopolistic grip on Kentucky. It stripped the governor of vast amounts of local patronage; required new elections in August 1851 for every office in the state, including the previously appointive judiciary, thus jeopardizing their Whig incumbents; and reapportioned the legislature in ways that decisively benefited Democrats. The 1850 election was the last cakewalk for Kentucky's Whigs. 12 Safely Democratic Iowa's August election was a mirror image of Kentucky's. Its totally Democratic congressional delegation in Congress firmly supported the Compromise, and by the end of July, so did Iowa Whigs. Lacking a distinctive position to mobilize voters against the incumbent majority party, the Whigs were trounced. Democrats won the governorship, both congressional seats, and virtually the entire legislature. Despite the important offices at stake, indeed, the "metoo'' campaign of 1850 generated the lowest turnout rate in Iowa since it became a state. Seriously to challenge, let alone topple, the dominant Democrats, Iowa's Whigs needed to bring new voters to the polls. Manifestly, aping the Democrats' pro-Compromise stance could not do it.¹³

In Indiana, where only legislative seats and local offices were contested in August and where Whigs had stumbled since the 1847 congressional elections, Fillmore's support for the Compromise ruined Whigs' chances for a comeback. As in most northern states, Indiana's Democratic newspapers fervently urged conciliation of the South, and its Democratic congressmen, especially Senators Jesse Bright and James Whitcomb, supported compromise on almost every roll-call vote taken during the session. By attacking that record, Whigs like Theodore Barnett and Schuyler Colfax, who blamed the failure to win back antislavery defectors for Whigs' defeat in 1849, hoped to fuse with Free Soilers on legislative tickets in 1850. Such a coalition, if successful, could replace Bright in the Senate with an antislavery Whig.

To Colfax's great dismay, however, some Whig papers in southern Indiana subverted the chance of coalitions with Free Soilers by praising Clay's omnibus bill in June, and Fillmore's swing behind the Compromise in late July doomed it. "Just as certainly as the Administration links its fortunes to the Omnibus, just so certainly are all our hopes of resurrection lost," Colfax groaned. "We're killed now after what Clay & Webster & [George W.] Crawford have done for us this season." The August elections, which increased Free Soil representation while reducing the Whigs' proportionate strength in both houses to its lowest level since the party's birth, only deepened Colfax's pessimism.¹⁴

Indiana's returns taught northern Whigs the same lesson as New England's spring results. Where the Free Soil party posed a serious threat, Whigs had to repudiate Fillmore's pro-Compromise position to stem further defections to the Free Soilers and to get their voters to the polls. To win they had to take a tougher stand against the South than their Democratic rivals. September elections in reliably Whig Vermont and stubbornly Democratic Maine reinforced that conviction.

Despite the presence of a vigorous Free Soil party, Vermont was the safest Whig state in the nation. In 1850, its voters would choose congressmen, a governor, and a state legislature, which in turn would elect a successor to incumbent Whig Senator Samuel Phelps. As in 1849, Whigs faced a Free Soil/Democratic coalition, but by September 1850 that alliance was unraveling because northern Democrats' pro-Compromise stance inside and outside Congress decisively refuted Democrats' antislavery pledges. In contrast, Whigs' state platform and leading papers, especially the Burlington Free Press, were staunchly antislavery and anti-Compromise. True, by the time Vermonters voted in September, Phelps had wavered by supporting Pearce's Texas boundary bill on August 9, but Vermont's other Whig congressmen defied the administration and voted solidly against the prosouthern parts of the Compromise. Unlike Indiana's Whigs, that is, Vermont's Whigs boasted a congressional record to offset Fillmore's pro-Compromise stance.¹⁵

Retaining their advantage on the slavery issue, Vermont's Whigs scored an impressive triumph. They won the governorship with an outright popular-vote majority for the first time since 1844, carried three of four congressional districts, as in 1848, and retained comfortable majorities in both houses of the legislature. Nor would Vermont's Whigs sacrifice their antislavery credentials after the election to mollify the Fillmore administration. Over the howls of conservative Democrats and proadministration Whigs, who complained that "our" legislators "always have and always will pass Abolition Resolutions" to satisfy "the strong Abolition feeling in our State," Whig legislators rammed through a personal liberty law that defied the new Fugitive Slave Act, legislation that permanently drove a wedge between grateful Free Soilers and scandalized Democrats. To solidify their antislavery credentials Whig legislators also ousted Samuel Phelps from the Senate and replaced him with Solomon Foot, although Phelps' "sour, saucy, and doggedly aristocratic" personality caused his displacement as much as his Texas boundary vote.¹⁶

By successfully distancing themselves from Fillmore's pro-Compromise record, Vermont's Whigs appeared more secure than ever. Maine's Whigs, with no members of the Senate and only a single man in the House to establish an antiad-ministration voting record, could not achieve a similar distance. "Our reliance for success is upon a pretty serious quarrel among the Democrats," moaned Whig congressional candidate William Pitt Fessenden in late August. "If they unite well, I shall be defeated."

Totally dominant in the state since 1840, Maine's Democrats were deeply divided. Led by incumbent Governor John Hubbard and Senator Hannibal Hamlin, an original backer of Wilmot's Proviso in the House, who delivered a powerful speech in March supporting Taylor's plan, the free-soil Democratic majority opposed the Compromise. The doughface minority, nicknamed Wildcats, favored compromise with the South and was nominally led by Hamlin's Democratic Senate colleague James W. Bradbury, who voted for all the Compromise measures except the Fugitive Slave Act. Between early May and late July 1850, these contending Democrats fought a bruising battle in Maine's legislature over Hamlin's reelection. Hamlin finally prevailed, but only with the help of Free Soilers and a few antislavery Whigs.¹⁸

Democrats' rift offered Whigs hope, but it was dashed. Hamlin's stand in Congress prevented Whigs from painting the Democrats as proslavery and also deterred Democratic defections to the Free Soil party that some Whigs tried to instigate. To boot, Maine's Whigs themselves split over the Compromise. Webster's allies captured the Whig senatorial nomination during the summer legislative contest for Webster's close friend George Evans. Trumpeting the Fillmore administration's support for compromise, this faction further hampered Whigs' attempts to exploit antisouthern sentiment even though several Whig congressional candidates were stalwart antislavery men.¹⁹

Hubbard easily won reelection, and Democrats also increased their margins in both legislative chambers. While Whigs again carried only two of seven congressional districts, however, their anti-Compromise stance made them markedly more competitive in these national contests than earlier. Robert Goodenow won in the third district, which John Otis had carried in 1848. In the sixth, Israel Washburn, Jr., launched his family's remarkable career in national politics when regular and Wildcat Democrats split the opposition vote, allowing Washburn to win with a plurality. Fessenden lost by only 40 votes out of almost 12,000 cast in his district, and James S. Pike trailed the victorious Democrat in his by only some 200 votes.²⁰

Despite the dismayingly familiar futility of Maine's Whigs, therefore, they remained competitive enough to exploit any further breach in Democratic ranks. Obviously, however, they had to rely on Democratic dissensions to make further gains, and they had done as well as they had only by flouting Fillmore's support for the Compromise and running staunch antislavery Whigs like Pike, Fessenden, Washburn, and Goodenow. Those men, moreover, deeply offended Webster's loyalists in the state, and even as the campaign wound down, Evans went to Washington to secure Senate rejection of patronage appointees allied with the party's antislavery faction. All of this pointed to trouble ahead.

With the exception of Connecticut, past patterns made the election results from the nine states discussed so far predictable. Such was decidedly not the case, however, with the August contests in Missouri and North Carolina.

Missouri, like its neighbors Arkansas, Illinois, and Iowa, was a Democratic fiefdom. Whigs had never come close to carrying a statewide race for president or governor, and they had languished as a pathetic minority in the state legislature. Since 1834, moreover, only one Whig had served among the twenty-three men Missouri sent to the House of Representatives. So weak were Missouri's Whigs that their closest historian labels them a pressure group, not a party. Yet in August 1850 Whigs carried three of Missouri's five congressional districts, 41 percent of the state house of representatives, and 36 percent of the state senators. Those Whig legislators subsequently achieved a still more astounding feat: the election of Whig Henry S. Geyer to the United States Senate.²¹

The reason for this startling reversal of Whig fortunes can be reduced to three words—Thomas Hart Benton. For years, Benton, a leading opponent of slavery expansion and a champion of Taylor's plan in the Senate, and his rabidly loyal followers had been the target of other Democrats, who shared militantly proslavery Southerners' antipathy toward both the Taylor plan and Clay's compromise. That split allowed Missouri's Whigs, who had no representation in Congress, to join other border state Whigs in promoting Clay's omnibus bill as the fairest compromise between the extreme northern and southern positions.²²

The Democratic split dominated the 1850 elections because the legislature chosen that year would fill Benton's Senate seat. Benton and anti-Benton Democrats ran separate slates of candidates for the legislature and in four of the state's five congressional districts. In two of those four Whigs triumphed, with popular pluralities of 39.6 and 42.3 percent. In the fifth district, the Bentonians threw their support to the Whig to keep their Democratic rivals from winning. That was the only district Whigs carried with an outright majority. The plurality of seats won by Whigs in the legislature also gave them the balance of power between Benton and anti-Benton Democrats in both chambers. Because Benton's supporters stubbornly insisted on his reelection, while anti-Benton men lacked the votes to choose his successor, the anti-Benton Democrats ultimately supported the Whig Geyer for the Senate in order to purge Benton from it. Thus did Democratic divisions inject new life into the moribund Missouri Whig party just when Democratic actions elsewhere were helping to sap the life from Whig parties.²³

North Carolina's Whigs would have loved to make their August gubernatorial and state legislative elections a referendum on the Compromise. By July, North Carolina's entire Whig congressional delegation, except Thomas Clingman, was strongly supporting the compromise measures. In contrast, the state's three Democratic congressmen fiercely opposed the package as a sellout of Southern Rights.²⁴

Within North Carolina itself, moreover, the parties' platforms and press, led by the Whig Raleigh Register and the Democratic Raleigh Standard, mirrored the stance of their respective congressional delegations. Partisan differences were crystal clear, and Whigs were confident that they held the edge, especially since they could cite Democratic enthusiasm for the Nashville Convention as evidence that their opponents were disunionists. Had the state election focused on events in Washington, therefore, the Whigs, as usual, would probably have prevailed.²⁵

North Carolina's Democrats, however, refused to oblige. On August 1, North Carolinians would elect only a governor and members of the state legislature. Since those new legislators had no Senate seat to fill, no national offices were at stake, and Democrats plausibly argued that state issues should determine those races. On state issues, Whigs suffered several disadvantages. Whig divisions over men and measures and Democrats' demand for equal suffrage (elimination of property qualifications to vote for state senators) threatened to reverse the tiny 854-vote margin by which Charles Manly had defeated Democrat David Reid in 1848.

The disadvantages tipped the balance against them. Considered the creature of the hated Raleigh Clique, Manly was distrusted by both eastern and western Whigs. Although he won renomination at the Whig state convention in June, angry eastern and western Whigs abolished the existing state central committee, which Raleigh Whigs dominated, and replaced it with a totally ineffectual executive committee designed to minimize Raleigh influence. Manly had also proved himself an inept campaigner in 1848 and an unpopular governor after his election, and by sticking with him in 1850, Whigs committed a serious blunder. Furthermore, in 1848 Manly had clearly benefited in western North Carolina because he favored, while Reid opposed, state subsidization of turnpike and railroad construction. After that election, however, William W. Holden, the state's leading Democratic editor, persuaded the state's Democrats to renounce their traditional opposition to internal improvements and support state aid to railroads, thus neutralizing Whigs' best issue.²⁷

As if these hurdles were not enough for the Whigs to clear, Manly then committed a fatal mistake during the campaign by charging that if Democrats really favored political reform they would back the white basis for apportioning legislative seats, not just equal suffrage criteria in state senate and house elections. He meant to ridicule both reforms, but the Democratic press leaped on his gaffe to charge that he favored the white basis, a charge that proved lethal among slaveholders in eastern and central North Carolina. Between 1848 and 1850 Manly suffered a net loss of only some 200 votes, although his loss in Rutherford County was heavier than that, and Reid gained 3,400. That small swing was enough to convert Manly's small majority in 1848 to a small majority for Reid in 1850 and to give the Democrats decisive margins in both legislative chambers.²⁸

Although Democrats jubilantly boasted that they had won complete control of the state government for the first time since the emergence of the Whig party, North Carolina's Whigs remained a very competitive force. Neither they nor Whigs in other slave states interpreted the defeat as a repudiation of Whig support for the Compromise. The election occurred before Fillmore publicly endorsed a broad congressional settlement and before anti-Compromise votes by North Carolina Democrats in the House established a record they could not fudge. Instead,

Whigs properly attributed the loss to state issues, and they remained confident that they could prevail if elections were focused on what had transpired in Congress during 1850. That confidence was reinforced when they carried six of nine congressional races in 1851.²⁹

When Congress adjourned on September 30, 1850, in sum, Whigs had lost three of five gubernatorial elections; retained control of state legislatures in only three of eleven states, not counting their decisive plurality in Missouri; and won only six of eighteen congressional seats. Only in congressional races—and then only because of Missouri—did they run ahead of their 1848 pace. To match their earlier performance, therefore, Whigs had to do exceptionally well in the October and November elections, when most congressmen would be selected that year.

Of the remaining contests for state and congressional offices, only four were scheduled in slave states. Unshakably Democratic Arkansas held legislative elections in October, and although the Whigs gained seven seats in the house, they were still outnumbered two-to-one in that chamber and five-to-one in the state senate. Maryland, where pro-Compromise sentiment was bipartisan and universal, held a gubernatorial election in October, but the normal legislative elections that would have accompanied it were suspended to allow elections of delegates to a state constitutional convention instead. Without partisan disagreement over the Compromise, constitutional revision, which would reapportion the legislature to increase the representation of Baltimore City and County and western counties, became the central issue of the race. As elsewhere, Whigs were at a decided disadvantage on that question. For years Democrats had promoted reform, while overrepresented Whigs in southern Maryland had spearheaded opposition to it. During the fall gubernatorial campaign, Democrats tarred the Whig candidate with his party's opposition to the convention, and the Democrats won with a slightly larger majority (51 percent) than they had polled in 1847.³⁰ Although the impending constitutional convention posed a potential danger to the party, most Maryland Whigs took their narrow defeat in stride. Some, in fact, positively rejoiced over the outcome. Despite their common support for the Compromise, Maryland's Whigs were deeply divided into hostile factions. Senator James Pearce and his friends, like John Pendleton Kennedy, bitterly opposed former Attorney General Reverdy Johnson and his allies, like Senator Thomas Pratt and the Baltimore customs collector George P. Kane, whom they labeled "a Court House clique, composed of a set of very unprincipled men, selfish, immoral & tyrannical," and whose gambling and "hard drink[ing]" scandalized them. 31 Though Johnson was forced to leave the cabinet after Taylor's death, Fillmore's hands-off policy on appointments left Johnson's friends in control of Maryland's federal jobs. They had used that power to capture the Whigs' gubernatorial nomination in 1850 for William B. Clarke. Johnson's Whig enemies, therefore, uniformly exulted in Clarke's defeat, attributed it to mass abstention among the disgusted rank and file, and smugly interpreted it as a salutary "defeat of the Court House faction" that would revive "the hopes of the orthodox portion of the Whig party."32

Whatever role rebellious abstention by angry Whigs played in Maryland's election, their loss of the governorship and of control of the constitutional convention boded ominously for the future. Johnson's friends could retaliate in like manner against friends of Kennedy and Pearce in impending elections, and willingness to accept a Democratic victory in order to punish an intraparty foe bespoke a weakening commitment to Whiggery itself. Maryland Whigs' complacency after their 1850 defeat was unjustified.

Florida, whose tiny population had developed only a fraction of its vast reaches, also voted in October. Whigs had carried its governorship, legislature, and lone House seat in 1848, and Taylor won easily in November of that year. Florida's congressional delegation, with the exception of Whig Senator Jackson Morton, who owed his election to Democrats, had divided along the prevailing partisan lines over the Compromise measures. Meanwhile Whig Governor Thomas Brown vigorously opposed the Nashville Convention as a disunionist conclave; Whig papers praised his stand and endorsed compromise. Democratic papers blasted the governor as a betrayer of Southern Rights and hurled vitriol at the Compromise as a contemptible surrender to northern pressure. Whigs' renomination of Congressman Edward Carrington Cabell, who supported the Texas-New Mexico boundary bill and sent letters to Florida's newspapers lavishly praising Clay, Webster, and their compromise measures, made the Compromise the central issue in the fall elections, for his Democratic opponent demanded resistance to it to the "last extremity." Confident that they held the edge in the congressional campaign. even though Cabell remained in Washington throughout its duration, Whigs hoped it would set the tone for the simultaneous legislative elections, for the new legislature could replace Democrat David Yulee in the Senate with a Whig.³³

That hope was dashed. Cabell won reelection, but his share of the vote dropped slightly since 1848. Both parties enjoyed small net gains of fewer than 200 voters between the two elections, but it seems likely that there was considerable switching of voters between the two parties. Some men who voted for Cabell also backed Democrats or abstained in legislative races, for Democrats overturned Whig majorities in both chambers and won by razor-thin margins. The Democratic triumph in the legislative races doomed Whig hopes of electing a United States senator. Later, however, a few dissident Democratic legislators who disliked Yulee joined Whigs to replace him with the Democrat Stephen Mallory. Just as the Democratic minority had helped dissident Whigs elect Jackson Morton over the preferred Whig candidate in the legislature of 1848–49, the Whig minority in the 1850–51 session joined dissident Democrats to defeat the preferred candidate of the Democratic majority.³⁴

Delaware was the final state below the Mason-Dixon line to elect congressmen and state officials in the fall of 1850. Delaware's tiny population qualified it for only a single seat in the House of Representatives, but Whigs counted on solid Whig congressional delegations from small eastern states like Delaware and Rhode Island to offset the solidly Democratic congressional delegations from geographically large but thinly populated western states like Arkansas and Texas. In particular, Whigs stood no chance of controlling the Senate unless small eastern states like Delaware sent Whigs to that body.

Throughout the 1840s, Delaware had played that strategic role for the Whigs almost as reliably as Rhode Island. Though Whigs had narrowly lost the previous gubernatorial election in 1846, going into the 1850 contests they held majorities in both houses of the legislature, the House seat, and both Senate seats, one of which would be refilled by the legislature chosen in 1850. With regard to the internal politics of the Whig party, Delaware also had special significance, for it was the home base—some would say the political fiefdom—of John M. Clayton, Taylor's controversial secretary of state.

Clayton played a role in Delaware's politics strikingly similar to that of the Democrat Benton in Missouri. Not only did Clayton, like Benton, personally dominate his state's majority party, but, like Benton, he had the iconoclastic reputation of being a free soiler from a slave state. Prior to his inclusion in Taylor's cabinet, Clayton had been the only southern Whig senator ever to cast a vote for the Wilmot Proviso. He had helped formulate Taylor's plan to admit California and New Mexico as free states, and even after Taylor's death he had stubbornly denounced the congressional compromise as a betrayal of Taylor's policy and an unnecessary concession to southern pressure.

By 1850 slaves and slaveholders constituted such a small proportion of Delaware's population that it was even less southern than Missouri, which was itself considered by many contemporaries as more of a western free state than a southern slave state.35 Hence, nothing like the extreme proslavery, anti-Compromise stance of Benton's Missouri Democratic enemies emerged in Delaware. Instead, Delaware shared the bipartisan enthusiasm for the Compromise evident in Maryland and Kentucky, and Clayton, like Benton, seemed to side with its northern, free-soil opponents. That heresy portended trouble for Delaware's Whig candidates in November 1850. As long as Taylor remained alive, Senators Presley Spruance and John Wales, Clayton's close allies, rigidly adhered to Taylor's plan and fought the omnibus bill. On July 1, Clayton's foremost Democratic rival in Delaware, James A. Bayard, wrote Clay that pro-Compromise sentiment was universal in Delaware, that Clayton's commitment to Taylor's plan embarrassed Delaware's Whigs, and that the two senators were "the mere tools of the Secretary of State," who would be punished when Delaware's electorate went to the polls. In particular, Wales, whose seat was due to be filled, stood in jeopardy. Even though both senators, like Whig Representative John Houston, another Clayton lieutenant, retreated after Taylor's death and voted for the individual Compromise measures, they could not shed the stigma of earlier helping northern, anti-Compromise Whigs.³⁶

Clayton's prominence as Delaware's foremost Whig aggravated the party's problems there in two additional ways. First, because of his adamant refusal to abandon Taylor's plan after he left the cabinet and because of the considerable ill will he had earned as a dispenser of patronage while in it, pro-Compromise Whigs allied with Fillmore's administration determined to make him an example by undermining his political base. In particular, they wanted to prevent Delaware from returning him to the Senate to replace Wales, just as Democrats in Missouri determined to dump Benton for his apostasy. Clayton's grip on the Whig party machinery in Delaware seemed so unshakable that they had no chance of dislodging him from within the state party itself by challenging his control of Whig nominations. Thus, they did not, as Clayton feared they would, immediately remove Clayton's lieutenants from federal patronage posts in Delaware.

Instead, they moved to build up Clayton's pro-Compromise Democratic enemies in Delaware, regardless of the consequences that tilt might have for Whigs' electoral fortunes. Clay, who proudly boasted of his alliance with Democrats in the Senate, urged Fillmore to appoint James Bayard to the Interior Department when he had so much difficulty filling that post. Fillmore, who had no intention of breaking openly with the Whig party, wisely ignored that recommendation. In October, however, Fillmore and Webster achieved the same effect by offering a chargéship in Belgium to Bayard's older brother, Richard. Richard Bayard had served as a Whig in the Senate in the early 1840s, but by 1850 Delaware's Whigs considered him an "avowed enemy" of Clayton and much closer to the Democratic party of his brother than to the Whigs. Although this nomination would not be sent to the Senate until December, its announcement prior to the election sent an unmistakable signal to Delaware's Whigs. The administration wanted Clayton and his allies defeated even if that meant sacrificing Delaware to the Democrats. Three-term Congressman John Houston, for one, got the message; he prudently refused to seek renomination.³⁷

Second, Clayton was also notorious among Whigs in Washington and Delaware as a heavy drinker, and that reputation alienated temperance elements in the state from the Whig party, which Clayton personified. Whether or not temperance men intended to punish Clayton personally, they ran separate candidates in 1850 for governor and congressman. In a state with so small an electorate as Delaware's, that insurgency was enough to tip the balance. The antiliquor aspirants drew only about 450 votes, but they cut disproportionately into the ranks of anti-Clayton Whigs and allowed the Democrats to win the governorship by 23 votes and the congressional seat by 129 votes out of some 12,000 cast.

Worse still from the Whigs' perspective, Whigs in New Castle County abstained or voted Democratic in the legislative race, thus allowing Democrats to carry that normally Whig bastion. Because each of Delaware's three counties had seven seats in the state house and three in the senate, this revolt was enough to give Democrats majorities in both houses of Delaware's legislature, and they replaced Wales in the Senate with none other than James A. Bayard. Thus did a minuscule number of votes cost the national Whig party a vital Senate seat, as well as a traditionally safe seat in the House. The loss of a Whig United States senator from Delaware, as well as the failure to gain one in Florida, therefore, negated Henry Geyer's surprising election in Missouri.

V

Congressional results from Illinois, Wisconsin, and Michigan in November committed most of their Whigs against the Compromise and Fillmore's position on it. In all three states, moreover, the hope or necessity of winning Free Soil votes explains their adamant stance. Two House races in Illinois served as Whigs' litmus test. When Chicago Democrats, now lashed by Stephen Douglas into unconditional support for all the Compromise measures, dumped incumbent anti-Compromise Democratic Congressman John Wentworth from their ticket, the city's Free Soilers threw their support to the Whig, who came within three percentage points of winning, whereas Wentworth's Whig foe in 1848 trailed him by fifteen points.³⁸ In the seventh district surrounding Springfield, Whig candidate Richard T. Yates defeated incumbent pro-Compromise Democratic Congressman Thomas L. Harris by lambasting his voting record and demanding repeal of the Fugitive Slave Law and abolition of slavery itself in the District of Columbia.

Initially confident that he could "push the proviso disunion issue on Yates" and thereby secure the votes of pro-Compromise Whigs, Harris howled in November that his defeat "is virtually a condemnation of the compromise by the people of this district." "If this [slavery] issue continues," he fumed, "Illinois will give her vote for any northern Sewardite Whig in 1852." Harris exaggerated, but the results suggested that Illinois Whigs had every reason to support such a presidential candidate in 1852. They had every incentive, in short, to break with Fillmore's administration.³⁹

Whig newspapers in Wisconsin also blasted the Compromise and demanded repeal of the Fugitive Slave Act, but so did the state's Free Soil and Democratic sheets. Wisconsin's entire congressional delegation, including two Democratic senators and Democratic Congressman James Doty, indeed, voted against every prosouthern concession in 1850. In Wisconsin, only Fillmore's support for the Compromise distinguished Whigs' position from their opponents', and that distinction was lethal.40 Whigs dared not even challenge the reelection of Doty or of Free Soil Congressman Charles Durkee, since their anti-Compromise votes were so popular. Whig Orasmus Cole sought reelection, but Democrats and Free Soilers reunited to defeat him despite his voting record. Simultaneously, Whig legislative candidates were reduced to 17 percent of the house and 16 percent of the senate as Democrats captured districts that both Whigs and Free Soilers had carried in 1849. By November 1850, in sum, Wisconsin's Whigs had reached rock bottom, largely because its Democrats retrieved Free Soilers by denouncing the Compromise. Whigs could not convert old voters or mobilize new ones without a distinctive platform, but the 1850 results made it absolutely clear that at least one distinctive platform—identification with Fillmore's pro-Compromise stance meant self-immolation, a fact that Nathaniel Tallmadge, now a Wisconsin resident, made abundantly clear to Fillmore a month after the election.⁴¹

Events in 1851 further hardened Wisconsin's Whigs against Fillmore's position. That year its Democrats foolishly pronounced the slavery issue dead and declared they would ignore it in favor of old issues. This incredible misstep threw the state's Free Soilers into the Whigs' arms. In outright defiance of Fillmore's administration, they merged with Free Soilers to elect as governor the Whig Leonard Farwell, who had issued a letter demanding repeal of the Fugitive Slave Act, and, even more astonishing, to win a majority in the state house of representatives.⁴²

Pro-Compromise votes by Michigan's Democratic senators and congressmen in 1850, in contrast, infuriated the state's Free Soilers and spurred Michigan's Sewardite Whigs to seek an alliance with them, as they had in 1848 when the two parties combined to elect William Sprague to the House. But the anti-Compromise Whigs, who were led by Taylor's appointees still in office and the editors of the Detroit Tribune, faced stiff opposition to this tactic from pro-Compromise Whigs, including Fillmore's brother, whose organ was the Detroit Advertiser, to which the administration shifted federal printing contracts that fall. Thus a ferocious internecine brawl ensued to control the state and district conventions that would choose Whig candidates and determine their platform statements on the Compromise.⁴³

This struggle resulted in a draw. Fillmorites won narrow control of the state convention, where, by threatening removal of postmasters who resisted them, they adopted a state platform endorsing the Compromise, even though all but one of the Whigs nominated for statewide office opposed it. In contrast, the Sewardite Whigs won control of the district conventions that chose Whigs' congressional and legislative candidates. In all three congressional districts, anti-Compromise Whigs prevailed over administration men for the nomination; similarly, most of the Whigs' legislative candidates were antislavery men, chosen explicitly to attract Free Soil support. As editor Josiah Snow proudly told Seward later, "Every Whig elected is a free soil Seward doctrine man."

The results of the elections against the Democrats were as mixed as the results of the Whigs' internal struggle. In 1850, only minor statewide offices were at stake, and, saddled with a pro-Compromise platform, Whig candidates lost them all. Together Whig and Free Soil candidates captured a few legislative seats Democrats had won the previous year, but the Democrats' margin was so huge that these losses meant little. Whig congressional candidates, who ignored the state platform and blasted the Compromise, however, carried two of three districts and lost the third by only 400 votes. The losing Whig candidate in that district in fact garnered about 2,000 fewer votes than the popular Sprague, who refused to seek reelection, and Snow blamed the defeat on abstention and defection by proadministration Whigs. What most satisfied Michigan's Whigs was their defeat of Alexander Buel, the Democratic incumbent from the Detroit district, who had voted for every prosouthern Compromise measure, including the Fugitive Slave Act. Whigs' share of the total vote rose from slightly less than 46 percent in 1848 and 1849 to 51.3 percent in 1850. For the first time in over a decade, that is, Whigs won a majority of Michigan's vote, and they did so by openly flouting the Fillmore administration, defeating its preferred candidates for Whig nominations, and condemning the Compromise of 1850. That they would sacrifice this beneficial platform in order to accommodate the administration in the future seemed unlikely.45

Prior to Congress' reapportionment after the 1850 census, Iowa, Wisconsin, Michigan, Illinois, and Indiana had a combined total of twenty-five House seats. With twenty-one seats by itself, Ohio had always been the most important midwestern state in Whig calculations and, traditionally, the midwestern state where Whigs were most successful. Though Ohio had also been the northern state where Free Soilers posed the biggest challenge to Whigs since 1848, prior to Taylor's death Ohio's Whigs exuded confidence that they could negate the Free Soil threat and crush the Democrats in the 1850 elections for Congress, governor, and a new legislature that would fill Thomas Ewing's Senate seat. By the beginning of 1850, the nettlesome Free Soil/Democratic alliance was falling apart over state policy toward currency, banks, and other corporations, matters that remained of central concern in Ohio. Free Soilers of Whiggish antecedents continued to agree with and in the legislature to vote with—Whigs on state economic policy. That proclivity embittered their relationships with Free Soilers of Democratic and Liberty party background, who were Salmon Chase's closest allies, and caused them to reconsider the wisdom of remaining in the third party.

Fearful of driving away former Whigs by tilting toward the Democrats, Free Soilers in the 1849–50 legislature refused to help Democrats organize the two houses, as they had the previous winter. In retaliation, indignant Democrats cooperated with Whig legislators to divide the state jobs between the two major parties and completely shut out the Free Soilers. In addition, the Democratic state convention on January 8, 1850, adopted a platform with hard-money, antibanking planks that infuriated Whiggish Free Soilers and increased their inclination to return to their old party to protect Whig economic programs. As Chase's chief lieutenant in the legislature nervously wrote him in March, "There is a strong disposition now among the Whig Free Soilers in the North part of the State, to unite with the Whigs in local and state politics."

More important, the Democratic state convention emphatically renounced coalition with the Free Soilers by defeating a resolution stating that Congress had authority to bar slavery from territories (thus implicitly repudiating the Wilmot Proviso and the fundamental platform of the Free Soilers) and by adopting another resolution that deplored the absence of Democrat William Allen from the United States Senate (thus implicitly repudiating their complicity in the election of Chase, who replaced Allen). Jettisoning their 1849 commitment to the Proviso in their platform, the Democrats expounded on the virtues of popular sovereignty, and during 1850 Ohio's Democratic papers praised the Compromise that incorporated it. To Free Soilers, Democratic betrayal necessitated running their own gubernatorial candidate to defeat Democratic nominee Reuben Wood. To Whigs, the Democrats' action signaled that Free Soil votes were theirs for the taking.⁴⁷

During the first few months of 1850, Whigs believed that winning back Whig Free Soilers on the Western Reserve required Whig insistence that the Proviso be imposed on the Mexican Cession, but their May state platform praised Taylor, demanded immediate statehood for California and New Mexico without offsetting concessions to the South, and insisted that if Congress instead organized territorial governments in the Cession, it must explicitly bar slavery from that area. Chase's Free Soil friends sneered at this Whig retreat toward "Taylorism in its worst shape," but Ohio's Whigs believed otherwise. By trumpeting "Old Zac's plan," Whig gubernatorial candidate William Johnson wrote Treasury Secretary Corwin in late July, he had been "amazingly successful" in wooing back to the Whig party "the narrow-minded, one ideal descendants of the Roundheads on the Reserve." By adhering to that platform, a Cleveland editor told Seward on July 14, the Whigs could disrupt the Free Soilers' August state convention, retrieve all Whig defectors on the Reserve, and rout the Democrats in October. Since February, indeed, Ohio's Whigs had attempted to outdo each other in execrating Clay, Webster, and Democrats who would appease the Slave Power. Little wonder that Whig after Whig from Ohio warned Fillmore to shun the Compromise and its famous Whig proponents.48

With so much riding on continued fidelity to Taylor's plan, Ohio's Whigs were understandably crushed when Fillmore embraced the Compromise instead, especially the Fugitive Slave Law, which provoked paroxysms of rage on the Reserve when it was finally printed in Ohio's newspapers in September.⁴⁹ Unlike other northern states, in Ohio Fillmore's course did not seriously divide Whigs against each other. They remained almost unanimously hostile to the Compromise's prosouthern laws. During August and September, however, they could not broadcast their disagreement with an administration that included so prominent an Ohio Whig as Tom Corwin, who, in fact, soon regretted his decision to join the cabinet.

Fillmore's policy, rather, stopped all talk among Whig Free Soilers about returning to their old party and ensured that Free Soilers would run their own candidate for governor against Reuben Wood and Johnson. Whig warnings that Free Soil/Democratic legislative tickets would give hard-money Democrats control of the legislature proved unavailing, for by the fall, the effective arena for settling economic questions in Ohio had shifted from electoral politics to a state constitutional convention, whose delegates were elected in April 1850 and who wrangled endlessly over economic policy. Once Fillmore signed the Compromise measures into law, finally, Democratic newspapers hypocritically accused Ohio's Whigs of betraying their pledge never to allow the organization of territorial governments without the Proviso. 50

Elsewhere in the North, Whigs had contrasted Whig and Democratic votes on the Compromise in Congress to counteract the embarrassment caused by Fillmore's course. The votes of the Ohio delegation, however, left little room for drawing favorable contrasts. For one thing, Ohio had Free Soilers in both the Senate and the House, and any deviation by Whig congressmen from the Free Soil voting line might be held against them. In the Senate, for example, Ewing joined Chase in voting against Pearce's Texas boundary bill, against Utah, and for California and abolition of the District of Columbia's slave market. For whatever reason, however, Ewing recorded no votes on the New Mexico and fugitive slave bills, both of which Chase opposed, thereby suggesting that Whigs were a less reliable antislavery party than the Free Soilers.

In the House, with the glaring exception of southern Ohio's John Taylor, who voted for the Texas-New Mexico and fugitive slave bills, all of Ohio's Whigs voted in almost identical fashion with the Free Soilers Joshua Giddings and Joseph Root—for California, for abolition of the District slave trade, and against everything else. The problem was that four of Ohio's eleven Democrats in the House voted exactly the same way, thus negating any advantage Whigs might have among antislavery voters in their districts and paving the way instead for Free Soil/Democratic coalitions on legislative and congressional tickets. Only three of the eleven Democrats, moreover, voted in an indisputably pro-Compromise fashion, including two who cast votes for the Fugitive Slave Act. The differences were insufficient to neutralize Democratic taunts that a Whig president had signed the Texas-New Mexico, Utah, and fugitive slave laws.⁵¹

The cumulative effect of Fillmore's actions, the voting records in Congress, and the campaign conducted by Whigs, Democrats, and Free Soilers in Ohio was to blur the distinctions among the parties, although Free Soilers could still lay claim to being the state's most forthright antislavery party. As a result, voter turnout dropped to its lowest level in over a decade, even though the state's House delegation, a Senate seat, and the governorship were at stake and even though many people were furious about the Fugitive Slave Act. The turnout rate in 1850 trailed that in the off-year election of 1842 by ten percentage points, and it lagged three points behind that of 1846, when partisan differences on the Democrats' economic policies in Congress were drawn so sharply. Undoubtedly, the wide-spread perception in Ohio that the already elected constitutional convention would settle many of the economic questions that had obsessed Ohioans for over fifteen years contributed to the decline. But the conflicting signals sent by both Whigs and Democrats about where their parties stood on the Compromise and the absence of any differences between them in many congressional districts did so as well. Confused or disgusted voters simply stayed home on election day.⁵²

In the gubernatorial race Whigs clearly lost most from the electorate's alienation. In 1848, they had eked out a victory when many anti-Taylor Whigs and Liberty party men supported Seabury Ford. Virtually none of those Free Soil Whigs voted for Johnson in 1850, and about three-fifths of them voted for the Free Soil candidate. The others abstained, as did many other antislavery Whigs who had refused to support either Taylor or Van Buren in 1848 and who were alienated once again by Fillmore's pro-Compromise stance in 1850. Johnson lost to Reuben Wood by 12,000 votes, while the Free Soil candidate garnered 14,000, or 5.1 percent of the total.⁵³

Obviously, had everyone who voted Free Soil instead supported Johnson, Whigs could have retained the governorship, and at least one historian has argued that Free Soilers were the biggest winners in 1850 because they helped defeat the Whigs. There is no reason, however, to believe that former Democrats and Liberty men in the Free Soil column would have voted for Johnson had there been no Free Soil candidate in the race. In 1846, for example, the Liberty party had garnered almost 11,000 votes in the gubernatorial election, and if all of those men voted Free Soil in 1850, more recent Whig losses to the third party were small indeed. Equally important, Free Soilers ran a separate candidate explicitly to defeat the Democrat Reuben Wood, not the Whig William Johnson. Genuinely antislavery men, a furious Free Soiler wrote Chase after the Democratic state convention, insisted that "the Hunker Democrats must be beaten out next Oct" since Wood's victory would be "disastrous." If defeating Democrats was the Free Soilers' chief goal, they had stultified themselves.

There are other reasons to question the extent of the Free Soil triumph and the Whig defeat. If one compares the 1850 returns with the November vote for president in 1848, rather than the October gubernatorial returns, the picture is different. The Free Soil vote dropped from 35,523, 10.7 percent of the 1848 total, to 13,747, 5.1 percent of the 1850 total. In short, Free Soil turnout had plummeted by over 57 percent. Similarly, Wood ran 21,000 votes behind Cass, a drop of almost 15 percent. Johnson had only 17,000 fewer votes than Taylor, a drop of about 13 percent, and he won a larger share of the total vote than Taylor had. Since November 1848, in sum, Whigs had lost fewer votes than either of their opponents in both absolute and percentage terms. ⁵⁶

Most important, one has to look beyond the gubernatorial race to assess who "won" and who "lost" the 1850 elections. Free Soilers did retain their balance of power in the legislature, but in 1850, unlike 1849, they fused as often with Whigs as with Democrats on legislative tickets, a fact that would prove of enormous importance during the subsequent election for United States senator. Even so, Whigs gained three seats in the state house and one in the senate. In the congressional races, moreover, Whigs won ten seats, compared to eight in 1848, while the Democratic total dropped from eleven to nine. Among the Democratic losers was incumbent Moses Hoagland, who voted for every Compromise measure, and among the Whig winners were incumbents Lew Campbell, whom Free Soilers had supported in 1848 but were now determined "to crush... for being a Whig," and John Taylor, the defiant Whig who supported the Compromise, even though a Free Soiler siphoned off a few of the votes he had attracted in 1848. In state legislative and congressional races, in sum, Whigs rather than Free Soilers or Democrats benefited most from the Compromise issue. 58

Finally, one might look at the two outright Free Soilers elected in 1850. One was Giddings, whom the district's Whigs, to the chagrin of some, did not even bother to oppose and who crushed a Democratic opponent with 78 percent of the vote. The other was Norton Townshend, the Free Soiler of Democratic antecedents who had done so much in the 1848–49 legislature to engineer Chase's election to the Senate. In 1850, Townshend again sought an alliance with Democrats, and he won the Free Soil congressional nomination only over the howling protests of Joseph Root's Whig/Free Soil supporters. So furious were those former Whigs that they ran Root as an independent Free Soil candidate against both Townshend and the regular Whig candidate. Whereas Root had not been opposed by a Whig in 1848 and defeated his Democratic challenger with 57.8 percent of the vote, Townshend won with only 47.6 percent, the Whig garnered 44.4 percent, and Root polled 8 percent.

Unquestionably, the Free Soilers won and the Whigs lost this district, but even this cloud was lined with silver. Townshend's nomination clearly alienated Whiggish Free Soilers and weakened the Free Soil party. Moreover, absolutely no one had been a greater thorn in the side of northern Whigs in the Thirty-First Congress—and for years before—than Joseph Root. It had been Root's resolution about creating territorial governments with the Proviso that so embarrassed northern Whigs in the spring. It had been Root who heaped scorn and contempt on the beleaguered Robert Winthrop. To see Root's defeat by the opportunistic Townshend as a victory for antislavery sentiment and a Whig defeat is to ignore its effect on the remaining northern Whigs in Congress. No matter who won the district, that is, ousting Joseph Root from Congress was a boon for the Whig party.⁶⁰

Nonetheless, Ohio's Whigs themselves saw the 1850 elections as a defeat and sought scapegoats to blame. "With Webster, Clay, & others entertaining their views, for leaders of the Whig party, we are to be overthrown, crushed—annihilated," groaned one. "Those at the North who sustain the fugitive Bill & kindred measures, are doomed." To have any Whig support beyond patronage holders, "President Fillmore & his administration" must not "sustain these measures" or "strive to put down those of the party who oppose them." Signing the Fugitive Slave Law "will put Fillmore in as indefensible a plight as that of John Tyler," Ben Wade exploded after stumping the Reserve. "By this measure, the Administration has driven their friends to repudiate them to save the party from utter annihilation," he concluded. "God save us from Whig Vice Presidents."

VII

The four remaining northern states with fall elections—Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, and Massachusetts—constituted the heartland of northern Whiggery. Taylor had carried all four, and New York and Pennsylvania provided his electoral vote margin. All but New Jersey had elected Whig governors in 1848. More important, the four together sent six Whigs to the Senate and fifty-eight Whigs to the House of Representatives. Altogether in 1848, Whigs won an astounding 79 percent of the House seats contested in the four states, and those representatives formed 55 percent of the entire House Whig delegation and 76 percent of its Northerners. For Whigs to have any chance of regaining control of Congress and maintaining their credibility as a competitive force, they had to run well in those states.

In no other northern states outside of Michigan, however, were Whigs' state organizations so bitterly riven by the Compromise and by administration pressure to adhere to it. The rivalry between Pennsylvania's Governor William F. Johnston and pro-Compromise elements in the state led by Senator James Cooper has already been discussed. With a Democratic governor, New Jersey's Whigs suffered no such split, but the state's Whig congressional delegation found themselves disowned by the state party. Daniel Webster's immense residual influence among Massachusetts' Whigs, now buttressed by his potential command of federal jobs there, guaranteed a donnybrook in the Bay State. Finally, the escalating feud between Weed, Seward, and their allies, on the one hand, and Fillmore, Nathan Hall, and conservative Whigs from the Hudson Valley, on the other, ensured a ferocious struggle over the platform and nominations in New York. In precisely those northern states where Whigs most needed to mobilize their full strength, in sum, the prospect of doing so seemed most remote.

New Jersey, the smallest and least studied of the four, had always been crucial to Whig power in Congress. Both of its senators and four of its five representatives in the Thirty-First Congress were Whigs. At stake in October 1850 were the governorship, the House seats, and the legislature, which would not only choose a successor to Senator William L. Dayton but also reapportion legislators' districts. 62

Though spared a potent Free Soil threat, New Jersey's Whig congressmen opposed the Compromise's prosouthern components as staunchly as any northern Whigs. In most free states such antislavery firmness would have won these Whig champions kudos from their constituents. In New Jersey, however, concern for the Union's safety vastly outweighed antisouthern sentiment. By the early summer, New Jersey's Democratic papers were lacerating the Whigs for opposing the Compromise, and, one after another, Whig papers ceased to defend their congressmen's actions and instead welcomed peaceful resolution of the sectional crisis. 63 Having gone far beyond what New Jersey's Whigs would tolerate, all four incumbent Whig congressmen issued public letters at the close of the session, declining renomination to avert certain defeat at district conventions. The Whig state platform said nothing about the Compromise or the behavior of the sitting Whig congressmen. Until election day Democrats painted Whigs as wild-eyed disunionists; Whigs responded with embarrassed silence. In New Jersey, the Compromise was an issue on which Whigs dared not go to the polls. To the extent that any differences separated the parties on the salient national issues of 1850, therefore, Democrats had an edge.
